Just as it was a practice of Jewish teachers to reduce the many commandments to one or two (compare Mark 12:28–34), so it was often the case that Jewish teachers would give synopses of the Eighteen Benedictions (Babylonian Talmud, Berakoth, 29a). The Lord's Prayer seems to be Jesus' synopsis of various Jewish prayers of the time.

If the language of the Lord's Prayer and that of various Jewish prayers is similar, the meaning must be determined from Jesus' overall message. Jesus and the early Christians believed in two ages, the Present Evil Age and the Coming Good Age. The Age to Come would be brought by a decisive intervention of God at the end of history. This shift of the ages would be accompanied by the resurrection from the dead and the last judgment. Before either of these events, there would be a time of great suffering or tribulation. One name given to the Age to Come was the Kingdom of God. It was a ideal state of affairs when Satan would be defeated, sin would be conquered, and death would be no more. Jesus believed that in His ministry, the activity of God that was to bring about the shift of the ages was already taking place. Within this world of thought, the Lord's Prayer must be understood.

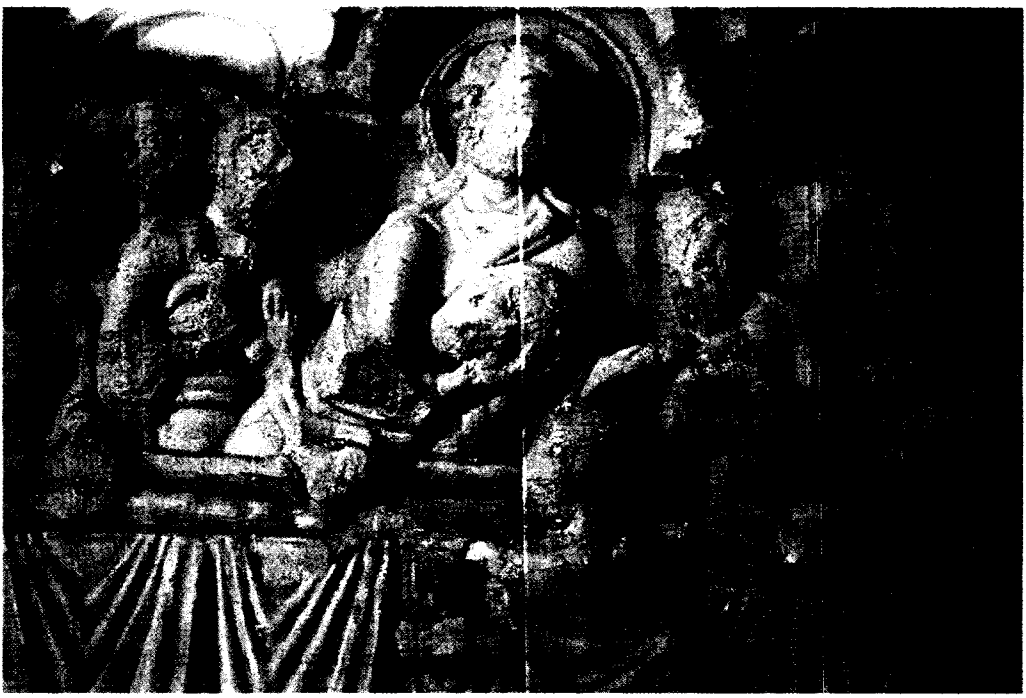
The "Thou-petitions" are synonymous parallelism. They all mean roughly the same thing. "Hallowed be thy name," "Thy kingdom come," and "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven," are all petitions for the shift of the ages to take place and for the ideal state of affairs to come about. They constitute a prayer for the final victory of God over the devil, sin, and death. It is possible that they were also understood by the early Christians to be a petition for God's rule in their lives in the here and now.



The "Us-petitions" participate in the same tension between the ultimate future and the disciples' present. "Give us our bread for the morrow" (RSV note to Matt. 6:11) may refer to the gift of manna to be renewed at the shift of the ages. As the Jewish rabbi, Joshua (about A.D. 90) said: "He who serves God up to the last day of his death, will satisfy himself with bread, namely the bread of the world to come" (Genesis Rabbah 82). It also refers to the bread necessary for daily life in this world as Luke 11:3 indicates: "Give us day by day." "Forgive us our debts or sins" may very well refer to the ultimate forgiveness of sins on the last day, but it also refers to the continuing forgiveness of the disciples by their Heavenly Father as they, living in this age, continually forgive those indebted to them. "And cause us to go not into temptation" may refer to protection of the disciples in the final tribulation (as in Rev. 3:10), but it also speaks about being helped to avoid something evil within history where we now live. In all of the petitions, therefore, there is a tension between the present and the future. All of the petitions can be understood to refer both to the shift of the ages and to the present in which we now find ourselves. This is not surprising, considering the tension between the two in both Jesus' message and the early church's theology. The concern about the shift of the ages in the prayer sets it apart from the Jewish prayers whose language was so similar.

The Lord's Prayer in the New Testament is a community's prayer: "Our Father," "Give us . . . our bread," Forgive us our debts," "as we . . . forgive our debtors," "Cause us," "Deliver us." It is the prayer of the community of Jesus' disciples.

The Lord's Prayer is a prayer of petition. It is significant that the Model Prayer for Christians is not praise, thanksgiving, meditation, or contemplation, but petition. It is asking God for something.

This prayer of petition seeks two objects. First, one who prays in this way implores God to act so as to achieve His purpose in the world. Second, one who prays in this manner requests God to meet the physical and spiritual needs of the disciples. It is significant that the petitions come in the order they do: first, God's vindication; then, disciples' satisfaction.

Such a prayer of petition assumes a certain view of God. A God to whom one prays in this way is assumed to be in control; He is able to answer. He is also assumed to be good; He wants to answer. The Father to whom Jesus taught His disciples to pray is One who is both in control and good. See Eschatology, Kingdom of God; Mishnah; Midrash; Rabbi; Talmud and Targums.

LORD'S SUPPER A memorial celebrated by the early church to signify Jesus' sacrificial death for humankind's sin. The form of the observance was established by the Lord at the Last Supper when He symbolically offered Himself as the paschal Lamb of atonement. His actual death the next day fulfilled the prophecy. Only Paul uses the phrase "Lord's Supper" (1 Cor. 11:20), although implication of it is made in Revelation 19:9 ("marriage supper of the Lamb"). Church fathers began to call the occasion the "Eucharist" (that is, "Thanksgiving") from the blessing pronounced over the bread and wine after about A.D. 100. Church groups celebrate the Lord's Supper regularly as a sign of the new covenant sealed by Christ's death and resurrection. See Ordinances.

LO-RUHAMAH (Lō-rū hă' mah) Symbolic personal name meaning "without love." Name God gave Hosea for his daughter to symbolize that Israel by rebelling against God and serving foreign gods had forfeited God's love (Hos. 1:6).

LOSS See Restitution.

LOT (Lŏt) A personal name meaning "concealed." Lot was the son of Haran and nephew of Abraham (Gen. 11:27). Lot, whose father died in Ur (Gen. 11:28), traveled with his grandfather to Haran (Gen. 11:31). Terah had intended to travel to Canaan, but stayed in Haran instead (Gen. 11:31). When Abraham left Haran for Canaan, he was accompanied by Lot and Lot's household (Gen. 12:5).

After traveling throughout Canaan and into Egypt, Abraham and Lot finally settled between Bethel and Ai, about ten miles north of Jerusalem (Gen. 13:3). Abraham and Lot acquired herds and flocks so large that the land was unable to support both (Gen. 13:2,5). In addition, the herdsmen of Abraham and Lot did not get along (Gen. 13:7). Thus, to secure ample pasturelands for their flocks and to avoid any further trouble, Abraham suggested they separate. Abraham allowed Lot to take his choice of the land. Lot took advantage of Abraham's generosity and chose the well-watered Jordan Valley where the city of Sodom was located (13:8–12).

Some interesting details of the split between Abraham and Lot remind the reader of earlier events in Genesis. For example, the Jordan Valley is described as being well watered "like the garden of the Lord" (Gen. 13:10) reminding one of the story of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. One wonders if Lot would be more successful in this garden spot than Adam and Eve had been. The prospect of success was thrown in doubt by the way Lot's journey is described—he journeyed east, a description that recalls Adam's and Eve's journey after their expulsion from the garden (Gen. 3:24).

The Jordan Valley is also described as being fertile like Egypt (Gen. 13:10). This detail not only recalls Abraham's nearly disastrous journey to Egypt to avoid the famine in Canaan (Gen. 12:10–20) but also foreshadows the journey that Jacob and his family would later make (Gen. 42—50)—a journey that did have disastrous consequences (Ex. 1:8–14).

The mention of the cities of the Jordan Valley also carries negative connotations. One is reminded of the story of the tower of Babel where the people had gathered in one place (they had migrated from the east) to build themselves a city and make a name for themselves, so that they would not be scattered over the face of the earth and live like sojourners (Gen. 11:1–4). One is also reminded that Terah gave up his pilgrimage to Canaan to settle in the city of Haran (Gen. 11:31). To add to the negative connotations that cities have in the stories of Genesis, we are told that the people of Sodom were great sinners against the Lord (Gen. 13:13).

All in all, things did not look as good for Lot as they might at first glance appear when he chose to live in the well-watered Jordan Valley. We begin to see this unfold in Genesis 14. Not only was the Jordan Valley atttractive to herdsmen like Lot, but the riches of this valley were also attractive to foreign kings. Prominent among them was Chedorlaomer who, along with three other kings, captured and sacked Sodom, taking Lot as prisoner (Gen. 14:1–12). Abraham, upon hearing of Lot's fate, gathered an army and rescued his nephew (Gen. 14:13–16).

Lot is not mentioned again until Genesis 19 when two angels visited him. God had already told Abraham that He intended to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18:20). Abraham interceded on behalf of Sodom, that if ten righteous men were found in Sodom that God would not destroy the city (Gen. 18:32). The two angels were apparently going to Sodom to inspect it. When the angels arrived, Lot received them with hospitality. When the townsmen heard that two strangers were staying with Lot, they wanted to have sexual relations with them. Lot protected his guests and offered them his daughters instead. The townsmen refused this offer and tried unsuccessfully to get the two strangers. For Lot's help, the angels revealed God's desire to destroy Sodom and urged Lot to take his family to the hills to safety. They warned Lot and his family not to look on Sodom. Lot, instead of going to the hills for safety, decided to live in another city (Zohar). In their flight from Sodom, Lot's nameless wife looked at the destruction and turned to a pillar of salt (Gen. 19:1–29). Abraham had rescued Lot, again, (Gen. 19:29; compare 12:4).

As it turned out, Lot feared to live in the city of Zohar and decided to live in the surrounding caves instead. His daughters, fearing that they would never have offspring, decided to deceive their father into having intercourse with them. They got their father drunk; both conceived a son by him. The son of the eldest daughter was called Moab and became the father of the Moabites. The son of the youngest daughter was named Ben-ammi and became the father of the Ammonites (Gen. 19:30–38). Later in Israel's history, God desired to ensure the place of the Moabites and Ammonites in Palestine (Deut. 2:9). The Moabites and Ammonites betrayed their relationship, however, by joining with Assyria at a later period (Ps. 83:5–8).

In the New Testament, the day of the Son of man is compared to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Luke 17:28–29). The followers of Jesus are warned not to desire their former lives, like Lot's wife, but to be willing instead to lose their lives. Losing one's life is the only way to gain life (Luke 17:32). The story of Lot is also used to show the faithfulness of God to rescue His people (2 Pet. 2:7). Phil Logan

LOTAN (Lō′ tăn) Personal and tribal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Seir the Horite and apparently the original ancestor of clan in Edom (Gen. 36:20–29). See Seir; Edom.

LOTS (Lŏts) Objects of unknown shape and material used to determine the divine will. Often in the Ancient Near East people, especially priests, made difficult and significant decisions by casting lots on the ground or drawing them from a receptacle. Several times Scripture mentions the practice. We do not know exactly what the lots looked like. Nor do we know how they were interpreted. We do know that people of the Old and New Testaments believed God (or gods in the case of non-Israelites or non-Christians) influenced the fall or outcome of the lots (Prov. 16:33). Thus, casting lots was a way of determining God's will.

One of the best examples of this use of lots is in Acts. Matthias was chosen to be Judas' successor by lot (Acts 1:26). The apostles' prayer immediately before shows the belief that God would express His will through this method. In the Old Testament Saul was chosen as Israel's first king through the use of lots (1 Sam. 10:20–24).

In a similar fashion God communicated knowledge unknown to human beings through lots. Saul called for the casting of lots to determine who sinned during his day-long battle with the Philistines. Specifically, he called for the use of the Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. 14:41–42; see Urim and Thummim). When Joshua brought people near to the Lord to find the guilty party after the defeat at Ai, he may have used lots although the word is not found in the text (Josh. 7:10–15).

Lots helped God's people make a fair decision in complicated situations. God commanded that the Promised Land be divided by lot (Num. 26:52–56). Later, lots established the Temple priests' order of service (1 Chron. 24:5–19). This practice continued into Jesus' day. Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, was burning incense in the holy place when the angel spoke to him. Zechariah was there because the lot fell to him (Luke 1:9). The awful pictue of soldiers casting lots for Jesus' garments was this kind of "fair play" use of lots (Matt. 27:35). Proverbs teaches that the use of lots is one way to put an end to a dispute when decisions are difficult (Prov. 18:18).

Lots are memorialized in the Jewish Feast of Purim. Purim, the Akkadian word for lots, celebrates the frustration of Haman's plan to destroy the Jews in Persia. Haman had used lots to find the best day for the destruction (Esther 3:7).

Finally, the word lot came to refer to one's portion or circumstance of life. The righteous could confess that God was their lot (Ps. 16:5). The lot of those who violated the people of God was terror and annihilation (Isa. 17:14). See Oracles; Urim and Thummim. Albert Bean

LOTUS The lotus which serves as the habitat for behemoth (Job 40:21–22) is a thorny shrub (Zizyphus lotus) which flourishes in hot, damp areas of North Africa and Syria. The plant is especially abundant around the Sea of Galilee. This plant should be distinguished from the Egyptian lotus (Nymphae lotus) which is a water lily. The translation thorn bushes (TEV) or thorny lotus (REB) is preferable to the simple lotus (NAS, NIV, NRSV) which leaves the reader wondering what plant is in view.

LOVE Unselfish, loyal, and benevolent concern for the well-being of another. In 1 Corinthians 13, Paul described "love" as a "more excellent way" than tongues or even preaching. The New Testament maintains this estimation of love throughout. The King James Version uses the word charity instead of "love" to translate the Greek word Paul used (agapē). The word charity comes from the Latin caritas which means "dearness," "affection," or "high regard." Today, the word charity is normally used for acts of benevolence, and so the word love is to be preferred as a translation of agapē. Nevertheless, the reader who comes to the agapē of the New Testament with the idea of benevolence in mind is better off than the reader who comes with the idea of physical pleasure and satisfaction.

In the Old Testament In the Old Testament, the verb "to love" has a range of meanings as broad as the English verb. It describes physical love between the sexes, even sexual desire (Judg. 16:14; 2 Sam. 13:1–4). It describes the love within a family and among friends (Gen. 22:1–2). Love as self-giving appears in the significant commandment that Israelites love the stranger. The basis for such selfless love is God's act of redemption (Lev. 19:33–34).

Hosea used the image of married love to teach us to understand both the faithlessness of Israel and the faithfulness of God. Israel's love is "like a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away" (6:4). God desires steadfast love, but Israel had been unfaithful. His own relationship with an adulterous wife allowed Hosea the insight that God had not given up Israel in spite of her faithlessness. The Shema (Hebrew for "hear") of Deuteronomy 6:4–6 is echoed in Paul's declaration that love is the fulfillment of the law (Rom. 13:10).

In the Teachings of Jesus In Jesus' teachings in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the Shema of Deuteronomy (the command to love God) is united with Leviticus 19:8 ("Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself") (Matt. 22:34–40; Mark 12:28–34; Luke 10:25–28). Just before the parable of the good Samaritan, a lawyer quoted the two commands to love and then asked Jesus: "And who is my neighbor?" (Luke 10:29) Jesus gave the story of the Samaritan who took care of the man who fell among robbers to illustrate the selfless love which is to be characteristic of citizens of the Kingdom.

In Matthew 5:43–48, Jesus gave the radical command to love one's enemies and to pray for those who persecute. Loving only those who love you is, according to Jesus, no better than those who are not His disciples. The love that Jesus' disciples have for others is to be just as complete as God's love (Matt 5:48; compare Rom. 5:8).

In these teachings, of course, the selfless love is a response to God's prior activity. It is a way of living expected of those who are citizens of the Kingdom. The teachings of Jesus on love of enemy, it will be noted, are a part of the Sermon on the Mount which is directed to Christian disciples. See Sermon on the Mount.

In the Teachings of Paul In the poem on love in 1 Corinthians 13, Paul associated love with the all-important biblical words of faith and hope (see also 1 Thess. 5:8; Gal. 5:6) and declared love the greatest. The context for this poem on love is Paul's discussion of relationships within the church. First Corinthians 13:1–3 indicates that the gifts of the Spirit (ecstatic speech, wisdom, faith, and self-sacrifice) are good for nothing without love; only love builds up. The Spirit distributes His gifts for the common good (1 Cor. 8:1; 12:7). First Corinthians 13:4–7 characterizes love: Love is patient and kind, not jealous or boastful, not arrogant or rude. Love is not selfish, irritable, or resentful. Love does not rejoice at wrong but in the right. Love bears, believes, hopes, and endures all things.

Finally, 1 Corinthians 13:8–13 contrasts love with preaching and knowledge, on the one hand, and faith and hope, on the other. All of these (with love) are important aspects of our lives here and now. Love in contrast to these, however, is not only for the here and now; it is forever. Love, therefore, is "the greatest" of the most significant realities we experience as Christians.

Paul's understanding and discussion of love make love a central theme, and his use of the noun agapé makes that term almost a technical term. Prior to Paul, in fact, the Greek term agapē was little used. Instead of using a word for love already filled with meaning, Paul took the seldom-used term and filled it with Christian meaning. This love of which Paul wrote is somewhat different from the love we normally experience and speak about. Christian love is not simply an emotion which arises because of the character of the one loved. It is not due to the loving quality of the lover. It is a relationship of self-giving which results from God's activity in Christ. The source of Christian love is God (Rom. 5:8), and the believer's response of faith makes love a human possibility (Rom. 5:5).

Even though love does not begin in the human heart, the believer must actualize love. In Paul's admonition to Christians to love, the nature of love as self-giving is manifest (Gal. 5:13–15). The Christian walk is to be characterized by love so that Paul could even speak of "walking in love" (Rom. 14:15). The Christian is to increase and abound in love (1 Thess. 3:12).

Love is vitally connected with faith in that the believer's faithful response is one of love. Love is also connected with hope. In his prayer for love to increase and abound, Paul indicated that this increase of love has the end that the hearts of Christians might be established "unblameable in holiness" before God when Jesus returns with all his saints (1 Thess. 3:13). Paul also wrote of the hope we have of sharing the glory of God and declared that this hope does not disappoint us, because our hearts have been filled with God's love through the Holy Spirit (Rom. 5:2,5). Christian love is evidence of and a foretaste of the goal of God's purposes for His children.

In the Writings of John The Johannine writings magnify the significance of love as forcefully and fully as any other writings. John's writings account for only one tenth of the New Testament but provide one third of the references to love.

The key text in the first half of the Gospel of John is John 3:16. This passage indicates the relationship of the Father's love to the work of Christ and of both to the life of believers. These themes are repeated throughout the Gospel of John. The second half of the Gospel of John emphasizes the ethical dimension of love among Christians. The key passage is Jesus' new commandment in John 13:34–35 (see also John 14:15,21,23,24; 15:9,12,17).

This command of Jesus to love one another gives us insight into the nature of Jesus Christ for the church and the nature of Christian love. What is commanded is not an emotion; it is the disciplined will to seek the welfare of others. Jesus speaks with the authority of the Father, the only One with authority to make such demands of men and women. Jesus speaks as the incarnate Word (John 1:1,14). He has authority to give conditions for discipleship. The relationship of this commandment to Leviticus 19:18 should be noted. Both command love, but Jesus' commandment includes the clause: "as I have loved you."

When the overall importance of love in the Gospel of John is seen, the dialogue between Jesus and Peter concerning Peter's love for Jesus and Peter's tending the sheep (21:15–17) becomes more significant. Our love for Jesus Christ is closely related to our fulfillment of the pastoral task.

The Letters of John make explicit statements about the ethical implications of love. Our appreciation of these letters and the command to love is increased when we realize that John's opponents claimed that they loved God in spite of their unlovely temper and conduct. They claimed enlightenment and communion with God. (They were Gnostics or "Knowers." See Gnosticism). John's distress at the gap between profession and practice is seen in his repeated admonition to love. The "old commandment" which John saw as basic for Christians is belief in Jesus and love for one another (1 John 3:23). This love is be manifested in deeds (1 John 3:18). John left no doubt about the relationship of love and belief in God. Whoever hates his brother is in the darkness (1 John 2:9). Whoever does not do right and love his brother is not of God (1 John 4:20). First John 4:8 is the climax: "He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love."

In 2 and 3 John this command to love is repeated in direct and indirect ways. Second John 5–6 is addressed to the church, and they are explicitly reminded of the command from Jesus to love one another. Third John 5–6 speaks of the love of the "Beloved Gaius" in terms of giving service to Christian brothers. Diotrephes, however, will live in infamy, for he put himself first, refused to welcome the brethren, stopped those who wanted to welcome the brethren, and put them out of the church (3 John 9–10).

Love and Judgment The judgment account in Matthew 25:31–46 illuminates and is illuminated by the New Testament teachings on love. The account depicts not only what happens at the end. The narrative makes plain that what happens at the end is what happens here and now. Christians love because they have been loved. In such love, God's eternal purposes are being experienced and carried out by his people (Matt. 25:34–36). Edgar V. McKnight

LOVE, BROTHERLY See Brotherly Love.

LOVE FEAST A fellowship meal the Christian community celebrated in joy in conjunction with its celebration of the Lord's Supper. See Ordinances. Agape (This love meal) was a significant dimension of the fellowship and worship of the early church. As a concrete manifestation of obedience to the Lord's command to love one another, it served as a practical expression of the koinonia or communion that characterized the church's life. While the only explicit New Testament reference to the agape meal is found in Jude 12, allusions to the practice may be seen in other New Testament texts. Thus, while the mention of "the breaking of bread" in Acts 2:42 is most likely a reference to a special remembrance of Jesus' last supper with His disciples, the allusion in Acts 2:46 to their taking of food "with gladness and singleness of heart" implies that a social meal was connected in some way with this celebration. Paul's discussion of the Lord's Supper in 1 Cor. 11:17–34 also suggests a combining of the ceremonial act with a common meal. Such a practice is also suggested in Acts 20:7–12. By the second century the word agapai had become a technical term for such a common meal which seems to have been separated from the ceremonial observance of the Lord's Supper sometime after the New Testament period.

The origin of the love feast is probably to be found in the religious fellowship meals, a common practice among first-century Jews. While the Passover meal is the most familiar of these, such meals were also celebrated to inaugurate the sabbath and festival days. On these occasions a family or a group of friends who had banded together for purposes of special devotion (know as chaburoth from the Hebrew word for "friends") would gather weekly before sundown for a meal in the home or another suitable place. After hors d'oeuvres were served, the company would move to the table for the meal proper. The host would pronounce a blessing (a thanksgiving to God), break the bread, and distribute it among the participants. The mealtime would be characterized by festive, joyous religious discussion. At nightfall lamps were lit and a benediction recited acknowledging God as the Creator of light. When the meal was over, hands were washed and a final benediction pronounced over the "cup of blessing" (see 1 Cor. 10:16) praising God for His provision and praying for the fulfillment of His purposes in the coming of His kingdom. The meal was concluded by the singing of a psalm. It was not uncommon for small groups of friends to gather weekly for such means.

Jesus and His disciples possibly formed just such a fellowship group. The fellowship meals of the early church appear to be a continuation of the table of fellowship which characterized the life of Jesus and His disciples. Such joyous fellowship served as a concrete manifestation of the grace of the kingdom of God which Jesus proclaimed. Jesus' last meal with His disciples may represent one specific example of such a fellowship meal causing some to trace the origins of the love feast directly to this event. See Ordinances; Worship.

LOVING KINDNESS Occasional KJV translation of the Hebrew, chesed. The Old Testament's highest expression for love. It is variously called God's election-, covenant-keeping, or steadfast love. It is a love which remains constant regardless of the circumstances. Although used mostly with God, it sometimes is used of love between people. See Kindness; Love.

LOWLAND See Shephelah.

LUBIM (Lū′ bĭm) Racial name of uncertain meaning apparently applied to all white North Africans, especially the inhabitants of Libya (2 Chron. 12:3; 16:8; Dan. 11:43; Nah. 3:9). Many English translations read Libyans. See Libya.

LUCAS (Lū′ căs) KJV transliteration of Greek for Luke. See Luke.

LUCIFER (Lū′ cĭ fĕr) The Latin translation (followed by the KJV) of the Hebrew word for "day star" in Isaiah 14:12, where the word is used as a title for the king of Babylon, who had exalted himself as a god. The prophet taunted the king by calling him "son of the dawn" (NIV), a play on a Hebrew term which could refer to a pagan god but normally indicated the light that appeared briefly before dawn. A later tradition associated the word with evil, although the Bible does not use it as such.

LUCIUS (Lū cĭ′ ŭs) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Christian prophet and/or teacher from Cyrene who helped lead church at Antioch to set apart Saul and Barnabas for missionary service (Acts 13:1). Early church tradition tried, probably incorrectly, to identify him with either Luke or with 2. below. Thus an African was one of the first Christian evangelists and had an important part in the early days of the church of Antioch and in beginning the Christian world missions movement. 2. A relative of Paul who sent greetings to the church at Rome (Rom. 16:21). He was apparently one of many Jews who adopted Greek names.

LUD (Lŭd) Racial name for person from Lydia. Plural is Ludim. 1. Son of Egypt in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:13) and thus, apparently, a people living near Egypt or under the political influence of Egypt. 2. Son of Shem and grandson of Noah in Table of Nations (Gen. 10:22). Attempts to identify them with peoples mentioned in other Near Eastern sources have produced varying results: Lydians of Asia Minor called the Luddu by Assyrian records or the Lubdu living on the upper Tigris River. They were known for skill with the bow (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 30:5 which place them under Egyptian influence and may refer to 1. above if a distinction is to be made at all; otherwise, the reference is to mercenary soldiers from Lydia in Asia Minor serving in the Egyptians army, a practice apparently testified under Pharaoh Psammetichus before 600 B.C.). Lydian soldiers apparently served in Tyre's army (Ezek. 27:10). God promised even the isolated peoples like Lydia who had never heard of His glory would be invited to share in that glory (Isa. 66:19).

LUDIM (Lū′ dĭm) Hebrew plural of Lud. See Lud.

LUHITH (Lū′ hĭth) Place name meaning "plateaus." It apparently identified a settlement in Moab on the road between Areopolis and Zoar, perhaps at present khirbet Medinet er-rash. Isaiah mourned for Moabite refugees who would have to climb the heights of Luhith to escape the enemy taking over their country (Isa. 15:5; compare Jer. 48:5).

LUKE Author of the Third Gospel and the Book of Acts in the New Testament, and a close friend and traveling companion of Paul. The apostle called him "beloved" (Col. 4:14). Luke referred to his journeys with Paul and his company in Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1—28:16. Many scholars believe Luke wrote his Gospel and Acts while in Rome with Paul during the apostle's first Roman imprisonment. Apparently Luke remained nearby or with Paul also during the apostle's second Roman imprisonment. Shortly before his martyrdom, Paul wrote that "only Luke is with me" (2 Tim. 4:11).

Early church fathers Jerome (about A.D. 400) and Eusebius (about A.D. 300) identified Luke as being from Antioch. His interest in Antioch is clearly seen in his many references to that city (Acts 11:19–27; 13:1–3; 14:26; 15:22,35; 18:22). Luke adopted Philippi as his home, remaining behind there to superintend the young church while Paul went on to Corinth during the second missionary journey (Acts 16:40).

Paul identified Luke as a physician (Col. 4:14)

and distinguished Luke from those "of the circumcision" (Col. 4:11). Early sources indicate that Luke was a Gentile. Tradition holds that he was Greek. The circumstances of Luke's conversion are not revealed. An early source supplied a fitting epitaph: "He served the Lord without distraction, having neither wife nor children, and at the age of 84 he fell asleep in Boeatia, full of the Holy Spirit." See Luke, Gospel of. T. R. McNeal

LUKE, GOSPEL OF The third and longest book in the New Testament. Luke is the first of a two-part work dedicated to the "most excellent Theophilus" (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). The Book of Acts forms the sequel to Luke, with the author explaining in Acts that Luke dealt with "all that Jesus began both to do and teach, until the day in which he was taken up" (Acts 1:1–2; see Acts).

Authorship Though the author of Luke-Acts never mentioned himself by name, he was obviously a close friend and traveling companion of Paul. In the "we-sections" of Acts (Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1—28:16) the author of the narrative apparently joined Paul on his journeys. Through a process of elimination, the most likely choice for this person is "Luke, the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14).

Tradition for Lukan authorship is very strong, dating back to the early church. Early lists and descriptions of New Testament books dating from between A.D. 160–190 agree that Luke, the physician and companion of Paul, wrote the Gospel of Luke. Many of the early Church Fathers from as early as A.D. 185 readily accepted Luke as the author of the Third Gospel.

With the early church tradition unanimously ascribing the Third Gospel to Luke, the burden of proof is on those who argue against Lukan authorship. See Luke.

Date and Place of Writing The Book of Acts ends abruptly with Paul in his second year of house imprisonment in Rome. Scholars generally agree that Paul reached Rome around A.D. 60. This makes the Book of Acts written at the earliest around A.D. 61 or 62, with the Gospel written shortly before. Luke 19:41–44 and 21:20–24 records Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem. This cataclysmic event in ancient Judaism occurred in A.D. 70 at the hands of the Romans. It hardly seems likely that Luke would have failed to record this significant event. Assigning a date to the Gospel later than A.D. 70 would ignore this consideration. Many scholars, however, continue to favor a date about A.D. 80.

A second historical consideration pushes the dating even earlier. Many scholars feel Paul was released from the Roman imprisonment he was experiencing as Acts concludes. The apostle was later reimprisoned and martyred under the Neronian persecution which broke out in A. D. 64. Paul was enjoying considerable personal liberty and opportunities to preach the gospel (Acts 28:30,31) even though a prisoner. The optimism of the end of the Book of Acts suggests the Neronian persecution is a future event. One can hardly imagine that Paul's release would find no mention in the Acts narrative had it already occurred.

It seems best, then, to date the writing of Luke somewhere between A.D. 61 and 63. Those who argue that this does not allow Luke time to review Mark's Gospel (assuming it was written first) fail to take into account the tight web of association between those involved in Paul's ministry. See Mark.

As to where the Gospel was written, the most probable place is Rome. Luke reached Rome in Paul's company and was in Rome when Paul wrote Colossians (4:14) and Philemon (24) during this first Roman imprisonment. The circumstance would have allowed time for the composition of Luke-Acts. One ancient source suggested Achaia, a Greek province, as the place of writing. It seems reasonable to conclude that the Gospel, written in Rome, perhaps made its first appearance in Achaia or was finished there.

Purpose and Readership Luke himself identified the purpose of his writing the Gospel (Luke 1:1–4). He wanted to confirm for Theophilus the certainty of the things Theophilus had been taught. Luke also wanted this information available for a wider readership. Most scholars conclude that Luke's target audience were Gentile inquirers and Christians who needed strengthening in the faith.

Luke's purpose was to present a historical work "in order" (1:3). Most of his stories fall in chronological sequence. He often gave time indications (1:5,26,36,56,59; 2:42; 3:23; 9:28; 12:1,7). More than any other Gospel writer, Luke connected his story with the larger Jewish and Roman world (see 2:1; 3:1–2).

A strong argument can be presented for a second, though clearly subordinate, purpose. Some see Luke-Acts as an apology for the Christian faith, a defense of it designed to show Roman authorities that Christianity posed no political threat. Pilate declared Jesus innocent three times (Luke 23:4,14,22). Acts does not present Roman officials as unfriendly (Acts 13:4–12; 16:35–40; 18:12–17; 19:31). Agrippa remarked to Festus that Paul could have been freed if he had not appealed to Caesar (Acts 26:32). Paul is pictured as being proud of his Roman citizenship (Acts 22:28). The apostle is seen preaching and teaching in Rome openly without hindrance as Acts draws to a close. It is possible to see in all this an attempt by Luke to calm Roman authorities' fears about any supposed subversive character of Christianity.

Beyond the immediate purposes of the author, the Holy Spirit has chosen Luke's Gospel to reach all nations with the beautiful story of God's love in Christ. Many claim the Lukan birth narrative (2:1–20) as their favorite. The canticles or songs in Luke (1:46–55; 1:67–79; 2:13–14; 2:29–32) have inspired countless melodies. Luke's Gospel has been a source for many artists, including Van Eyck, Van der Weyden, Rossetti, Plockhorst, Rubens, and Rembrandt.

Luke's sources Though Luke was not an eyewitness to the earthly life and ministry of Christ, he was in intimate contact with many who were. Luke was with Paul in Palestine in the late 50s, especially in Caesarea and Jerusalem (Acts 21:1—27:2). Members of the Jerusalem church (including James, the brother of Jesus) would have provided much oral testimony to the physician intent on writing an account of Jesus' life. Luke's association with Paul brought him into contact with leading apostolic witnesses, including James and Peter.

Most scholars believe Luke (as well as Matthew) relied on Mark's written Gospel. Mark probably was an eyewitness to some events in Jesus' life. His Gospel is generally recognized to reflect Peter's preaching about Christ. Mark was in Rome with Luke and Paul during Paul's captivity (Col. 4:10,14; Philem. 24). It would be natural to assume Luke had access to Mark's writings. Scholars have identified a source "Q" (an abbreviation for the German word Quelle, meaning "source"), referring to passages and sections of written material apparently available to Matthew and Luke either unavailable or unused by Mark (for example, Matt. 3:7–10/Luke 3:7–9; Matt. 24:45–51/Luke 12:42–46). This source may have been a collection of Jesus' sayings written down by His followers. See Logia.

John's Gospel certainly was not available for Luke (most scholars date John late in the first century). Any similarities between Luke's Gospel and John's can probably be accounted for by recognizing that a rich tradition, especially oral, provided a common source for all the Gospel writers.

Some scholars have posited an "L" source (an abbreviation for Luke) identifying some 500 verses exclusive to Luke, including the 132 verses of Luke 1 and 2. The argument that a separate document existed that only Luke had access to is not convincing. The new material introduced by Luke should be seen as the result of his own research and literary genius. One obvious example is the birth narratives of John the Baptist and Christ. The material that Luke uniquely presents give the Third Gospel much of its character.

Special emphases and characteristics As already noted, Luke took great pains to relate his narrative to contemporaneous historical events. Beginning with the birth narratives of John the Baptist and Jesus, he wrote with the eye for detail of a historian (see 1:5,36,56,59; 2:1,2,7,42; 3:23; 9:20,37,57; 22:1,7,66; 23:44,54; 24:1,13,29,33).

Luke stressed the universal redemption available to all through Christ. Samaritans enter the kingdom (9:51–6; 10:30–37; 17:11–19) as well as pagan Gentiles (2:32; 3:6,38; 4:25–27; 7:9; 10:1,47). Publicans, sinners, and outcasts (3:12; 5:27–32; 7:37–50; 19:2–10; 23:43) are welcome along with Jews (1:33;2:10) and respectable people (7:36; 11:37; 14:1). Both the poor (1:53; 2:7; 6:20; 7:22) and rich (19:2; 23:50) can have redemption.

Luke especially notes Christ's high regard for women. Mary and Elizabeth are central figures in chapters 1 and 2. Anna the prophetess and Joanna the disciple are mentioned only in Luke (2:36–38; 8:3; 24:10). Luke included the story of Christ's kind dealings with the widow of Nain (7:11–18) and the sinful woman who annointed Him (7:36–50). He also related Jesus' parable of the widow who persevered (18:1–8).

VIII. Jesus' Kingdom Power Aroused Opposition (19:28—22:6).
A. Israel rejected its promised King (19:28–44).
B. Jesus exercised authority in the Temple (19:45—20:19).
C. Jesus exercised God's authority (20:20–26).
D. Jesus' understanding was greater than that of Sadducees (20:27–40).
E. Messiah's role was greater than the political role of David (20:41–44).
F. False religious leaders face judgment (20:45–47).
G. Value of kingdom stewardship is determined by generosity (21:1–4).
H. The Son of man controls the future (21:5–36).
I. Human betrayal, not popular demand or legal justice, led to Jesus' arrest (21:37—22:6).
IX. Jesus Died as the True Passover Lamb (22:7—23:56).
A. Jesus' Passover sacrifice opens the door for kingdom service and rule (22:7–30).
B. Participation in Jesus' Passover brings satanic and human opposition (22:31–38).
C. Participation in Jesus' Passover demands prayer (22:39–46).
D. Spiritual darkness is responsible for Jesus' death (22:47–53).
E. Refusal to participate in Jesus' Passover brings sorrow (22:54–62).
F. Jesus was crucified because of religious blindness and pride (22:63–71).
G. Crowd approval, not guilt, led to Jesus' crucifixion (23:1–25).
H. Corrupt religious systems are judged by Jesus' crucifixion (23:26–31).
I. Jesus responded to opponents with forgiveness (23:32–34).
J. Jesus died to bring sinners into the kingdom (23:35–43).
K. Jesus showed faith and control in death (23:44–36).
L. Jesus died unjustly as a righteous Man (23:47–49).
M. Jesus' burial proves His death (23:50–56).
X. Jesus' Resurrection Is the Doorway to Faith and Mission (24:1–53).
A. Jesus' resurrection fulfilled prophecy, confirmed Jesus' teaching, and awakened faith (24:1–45).
B. Jesus' resurrection prepared for the church's gospel of forgiveness (24:46–48).
C. Church needed Spirit before undertaking mission (24:49).
D. Jesus' ascension leads church to worship (24:50–53). T. R. McNeal

LUKEWARM Tepid; neither hot nor cold (Rev. 3:16). The city of Laodicea received its water from an aqueduct several miles long. The lukewarm water which arrived at the city served as an appropriate illustration for a tasteless, good-for-nothing Christianity.

LUNATIC KJV term for epilepsy or insanity (Matt. 4:24; 17:15). The term lunacy derives from the Latin luna (moon) and reflects the popular notion that the mental state of the "lunatic" fluctuated with the changing phases of the moon. The Greek terms underlying Matthew 4:24 and 17:15 are likewise related to the Greek term for moon. Lunacy was not clearly distinguished from demon possession (Matt. 17:18; compare Mark 9:17; Luke 9:39).

LUST In contemporary usage, a strong craving or desire, especially sexual desire. KJV and earlier English versions frequently used lust in the neutral sense of desire. This older English usage corresponded to the use of the underlying Hebrew and Greek terms which could be used in a positive sense: of the desire of the righteous (Prov. 10:24), of Christ's desire to eat the Passover with His disciples (Luke 22:15), or of Paul's desire to be with Christ (Phil. 1:23). Since lust has taken on the primary meaning of sexual desire, modern translations often replace the KJV's lust with a term with a different nuance. NRSV, for example, used crave/craving (Num. 11:34; Ps. 78:18); covet (Rom. 7:7); desire (Ex. 15:9; Prov. 6:25; 1 Cor. 10:6); long for (Rev. 18:14).

The unregenerate (preconversion) life is governed by deceitful lusts or desires (Eph. 4:22; 2:3; Col. 3:5; Tit. 2:12). Following conversion, such fleshly desires compete for control of the individual with spiritual desires (Gal. 5:16–17; 2 Tim. 2:22). First John 2:16–17 warns that desires of the flesh and eyes are not from God and will pass away with the sinful world. Here lust or desire includes not only sexual desire but also other vices such as materialism. James 1:14–15 warns that desire is the beginning of all sin and results in death. Jesus warned that one who lusts has already sinned (Matt. 5:28). Part of God's judgment on sin is to give persons over to their own desires (Rom. 1:24). Only the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life of the believer makes victory over sinful desires possible (Rom. 8:1–2).

LUTE A stringed instrument with a large, pear-shaped body and a neck. NRSV used lute to translate two Hebrew terms (Pss. 92:3; 150:3). NAS and NIV translated the first term as "10-stringed lute" and the second as harp. The KJV translated both terms as psaltery. See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

L

LUZ (Lŭz) Place name meaning "almond tree." 1. Original name of Bethel (Gen. 28:19). See Bethel. Joshua 16:2 seems to distinguish the two places, Bethel perhaps being the worship place and Luz the city. Bethel would then be Burj Beitin and Luz, Beitin. 2. A city in the land of the Hittites which a man founded after showing the tribe of Joseph how to conquer Bethel (Judg. 1:26). Its location is not known. See Hittites.

LXX The Roman numeral seventy which serves as the symbol for the Septuagint, the earliest Greek translation of the Old Testament. According to one tradition, the Septuagint was the work of seventy scholars. See Septuagint; Bible, Texts and Versions.

LYCAONIA (Lŷc ā ō′ nī à) Roman province in the interior of Asia Minor including cities of Lystra, Iconium, and Derbe. See Acts 14:1–23.

LYCAONIAN (Lŷc ā ō′ nī an) Citizen of or language of Lycaonia. See Lycaonia.

LYCIA (Lŷc′ ĭ à) Geographical name indicating the projection on the southern coast of Asia Minor between Caria and Pamphylia. See Acts 27:5.

LYDDA (Lŷd′ dà) Place name of uncertain meaning. The Old Testament Lod (1 Chron. 8:12), Lydda was a Benjaminite town near the Plain of Sharon. It was located at the intersection of the caravan routes from Egypt to Babylon and the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. According to Ezra 2:33 it was resettled after the Exile (See Neh. 7:37; 11:35). Later, it became a district captial of Samaria. The church spread to Lydda early (Acts 9:32) as the result of Peter's ministry. Christianity became a strong influence in Lydda by the second century.

LYDIA (Lŷd′ ĭ à; from king Lydus). Both a place and personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. The country in Asia Minor whose capital was Sardis. Habitation of the area dates from prehistory. The Hittites left their mark on the land through monuments. Lydia's most famous ruler was Croessus (560–546 BC), a name synonymous with wealth. His kingdom was captured by Cyrus, who seven years later captured Babylon and freed the exiles. Lydians were named by Ezekiel as "men of war" or mercenaries who fought to defend Tyre (27:10) and who made an alliance with Egypt (30:5) 2. Lydia was the first European converted to Christ under the preaching of Paul at Philippi (Acts 16:14). Her name originally might have been the designation of her home, "a woman of Lydia," since Thyatira was in the province of Lydia. Being a worshiper of God, Lydia could have been a convert to Judaism, although this cannot be stated with certainty. She did know enough about Judaism to converse with Paul about the religion. Lydia hosted Paul and his entourage in Philippi after her conversion. Her profession as a "seller of purple" meant that she probably was quite wealthy (Acts 16:12–15,50). Mike Mitchell

LYDIAN (Lŷd′ ĭ an) Person from Lydia. See Lydia.

LYE Substance used for cleansing purposes from the earliest times. Two Hebrew words are used in the Old Testament for lye. Nethar probably refers to sodium bicarbonate. This material occurs naturally and is referred to by ancient writers as appearing in Egypt and Armenia.

Bor likely refers to potassium carbonate and is sometimes called vegetable lye. It is a strongly alkaline solution made by burning certain plants like soapwort and leaching the lye from the ashes. This was the type of lye normally used in Palestine, for there are no known deposits of sodium bicarbonate there. The same Hebrew spelling also means, "purity" (Ps. 18:20,24) leading to confusion in English translations.

LYSANIAS (Lŷ sā′ nī as) Personal name of unknown meaning. Roman tetrarch of Abilene about A.D. 25–30 and thus at beginning of John the Baptist's ministry (Luke 3:1). See Abilene.

LYSIAS (Lŷs′ ĭ às) Second name or birth name of Roman tribune or army captain who helped Paul escape the Jews and appear before Felix, the governor (Acts 23:26). See Claudius. His name also appears in some Greek manuscripts at Acts 24:7 but not in the manuscripts followed by many modern translations as the earliest. Compare 24:22.

LYSTRA (Lŷs′ trà) A city in south central Asia Minor and an important Lycaonian center. According to Acts 16:1, it probably was the home of young Timothy, one of Paul's companions in the ministry. Paul's healing of a crippled man at Lystra (Acts 14:8–10) caused the inhabitants to revere him as a god. Many believed his preaching but were turned against the missionary by Judaizers from Antioch and Iconium. Paul was dragged out of Lystra, stoned, and left for dead. He revived and later went back to the city to lend strength to the new Christians.

Detail of the famous sixth century A.D. mosaic map of Medeba (Madeba) in Jordan.

M Symbol designating one of the alleged sources of Matthew's Gospel according to the four document hypothesis. The source purportedly consists of that part of Matthew not paralleled by Mark or Luke.

MAACAH (Mā′ ȧ cah) A personal name of uncertain meaning (possibly "dull" or "stupid"). 1. Son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:24); this Maacah perhaps gave his name to the Aramean kingdom west of Basham and southwest of Mount Hermon; the residents of this kingdom, the Maachathites (Mā′ ăch ȧ thītes), were not driven out during the Israelite conquest of Canaan (Josh. 13:13). Later, this people sided with the Ammonites against David (2 Sam. 10:6–8). This nation is perhaps personified as the wife (ally) of Machir at 1 Chronicles 7:16. 2. Concubine of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:48). 3. Wife of Jeiel of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29; 9:35). 4. Wife of David and the mother of Absalom (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chron. 3:2). 5. Father/ancestor of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:43). 6. Father/ancestor of Shephatiah who led the tribe of Simeon in David's reign (1 Chron. 27:16). 7. Father/ancestor of Achish, king of Gath (1 Kings 2:39). 8. Mother of King Abijam (1 Kings 15:2) and ancestress of King Asa (1 Kings 15:10,13).

MAACATH (Mā′ ȧ căth) NRSV, NAS spelling of Maacah (Jos. 13:13).

MAACHAH (Mā ȧ chah) KJV alternate form of Maacah.

MAADAI (Mā ȧ dā ī) An Israelite forced to give up his foreign wife as part of Ezra's reforms (Ezra 10:34).

MAADIAH (Mā ȧ dī′ ah) Personal name of uncertain meaning (perhaps "Yah assembles," "Yahu promises," or "Yah adorns."). A priest who returned from Exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5). He is perhaps the same as Moadiah (Neh. 12:17) or Maaziah (Neh. 10:8).

MAAI (Mā ā ī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. A musician participating in Nehemiah's dedication of the rebuilt Jerusalem walls (Neh. 12:36).

MAALEH-ACRABBIM (Mā′ ȧ lĕh ă crăb′ bĭm) KJV transliteration of a phrase meaning ascent (NAS, NRSV, REB) or pass (NIV) of Akrabbim (Josh. 15:3). See Akrabbim.

MAARATH (Mā ȧ răth) Place name meaning "barren field." Name of a village in Judah's hill country (Josh. 15:59), possibly identical with Maroth (Mic. 1:12). The site is possibly modern khirbet Qufin two miles north of Beth-zur.

MAAREH-GEBA (Mā′ ȧ rĕh-gē′ ba) Place name meaning, "clearing of Geba." Israel's army readied an ambush there for tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 20:33 NAS). Other translations translated the first part of the name or follow a Greek text in reading "west of Gibeah," a change of the final Hebrew letter. See Gibeah.

MAASAI (Mā′ ȧ saī) Possibly a shortened form of Maaseiah meaning, "work of Yah. One of the priests returning from Exile (1 Chron. 9:12), Maasai is likely identical with Amashai (Neh. 11:13). KJV transliterated Maasiai.

MAASEIAH (mā ȧ seī ah) Personal name meaning, "work of Yahweh," appearing in a longer and shorter Hebrew form. Several of the many scattered references perhaps refer to the same person, though it is no longer possible to press identifications: 1. Levite musician during David's reign (1 Chron. 15:18,20). 2. Participant in high priest Jehoida's revolt which put Joash on the throne (2 Chron. 23:1). 3. One of Uzziah's military officers (2 Chron. 26:11). 4. Son of King Ahaz of Judah (2 Chron. 28:7). 5. Governor of Jerusalem during the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:8). 6. Father of false prophet Zedekiah (Jer. 29:21). 7. Father of the priest Zephaniah (Jer. 21:1; 29:25; 37:3). 8. Temple doorkeeper (Jer. 35:4). 9. Postexilic resident of Jerusalem from tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:5), likely identical with Asaiah (1 Chron. 9:5). 10. Benjaminite ancestor of some returned exiles (Neh. 11:7). 11.–14. Names of three priests and one layman in Ezra's time who had taken foreign wives (Ezra 10:18,21,22,30). 15. Father/ancestor of the Azariah participating in Nehemiah's rebuilding of the wall (Neh. 3:23). 16. Chief of the people who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:25), possibly identical with 14 and/or 18. 17. One of those standing beside Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh. 8:4), possibly 14 and/or 16. 18. One of the Levites interpreting the law which Ezra read (Neh. 8:7), possibly identical with 17. 19. Priest participating in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), perhaps identical with 11, 12, or 13. 20. Another priest participating in the dedication, perhaps identical with 11, 12, or 13. 21. KJV form for Mahseiah. See Mahseiah.

MAATH (Mā′ ăth) Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:26).

MAAZ (Mā ăž) Personal name of uncertain meaning (possibly "angry"). See 1 Chronicles 2:27.

MAAZIAH (Mā ȧ zī′ ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is a refuge." 1. Ancestor of a division of priests serving in David's time (1 Chron. 24:18). 2. Priest who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:8).

MACBANNAI (Măc' băn nâi) NIV spelling of Machbanai.

MACBENAH (Măc bē' nah) NIV spelling of Machbenah.

MACEDONIA (Măç ĕ dō nĭ a) Now the northernmost province of Greece; in antiquity, the fertile plain north and west of the Thermaic Gulf from the Haliacmon river in the southwest to the Axios in the east ("Lower Macedonia") and the mountainous areas to the west and north ("Upper Macedonia," today divided between central northern Greece, southeastern Albania, and the Yugoslav province of Macedonia). Macedonia is the link between the Balkan peninsula to the north and the Greek mainland and the Mediterranean Sea to the south. The important land route from Byzantium (Istanbul) in the east to the Adriatic Sea in the west (in Roman times the "Via Egnatia") crosses it as does the north to south road from the central Balkan (the area of the Danube and Save rivers) which reached the Aegean Sea at the Thermaic Gulf and continued past Mount Olympus through the narrow valley of Tempe into Thessaly and central Greece.

History Archaeological discoveries have demonstrated that Macedonia was settled as early as the Middle Bronze Age (about 1500 B.C.) probably by Thracian and Illyrian tribes. The Macedonians, Hellenic tribes which were part of the Dorian invasion, settled first in the western mountains (the upper Haliacmon valley) before 1200 B.C. They began to conquer the central plains about 700 B.C. The Macedonian kings established their first capital in Aigai, probably not at modern Edessa but at modern Vergina south of the Haliacmon river. There a golden sarcophagus, supposedly of King Philip II (father of Alexander), was found in a vaulted tomb. Later the capital was moved to Pella (birthplace of Alexander the Great) where houses of the Macedonian nobility with beautiful pebble mosaics and the gigantic foundations of the royal palace have been excavated. Between 800 and 600 B.C. the Macedonians expelled or subjected the older populations. They extended their realm to the east where they incorporated the lands between the Axios and the Strymon. They also reached southward to the coastal lands between Mount Olympus and the Aegean Sea. For several centuries, the Macedonian kings were involved in battles for the control of Upper Macedonia with its mixed Greek, Illyrian, and Thracian population. At the same time, Macedonia came increasingly under the influence of Greek culture and language (the original Macedonian language was probably a different Hellenic dialect). The famous Greek tragedian Euripides spent some time at the court of the Macedonian kings; and Aristotle, before he founded his philosophical school in Athens, served as the teacher of the Macedonian prince Alexander.

Philip II (359–336 B.C.) established firm control over the entire Macedonian area and extended it to the east beyond the Strymon into Thrace. There he founded the city of Philippi in place of the Thracian colony Crenides. It became the chief mining center for the gold and silver mines in the Pangaeon mountain. Philip II also subjected Thessaly to his rule and incorporated the Chalcidice peninsula into his realm. When he was assassinated in 336 B.C., Macedonia was the strongest military power in Greece. Its military strength and the wealth established by Philip II enabled his son Alexander to defeat the Persian Empire and to conquer the entire realm from the eastern Mediterranean to the Indus River (including today's Turkey, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Iraq, Iran, and parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan).

In the Hellenistic period the capital was moved to Thessalonica, founded 315 B.C. at the head of the Thermaic Gulf by Cassander and named for his wife Thessalia. During the Hellenistic period, Macedonia was ruled by the Antigonids, descendants of Alexander's general Antigonus Monophthalmus. In 168 B.C. Perseus, the last Macedonian king, was defeated by the Romans. Rome first divided Macedonia into four independent "free" districts, then established it as a Roman province (148 B.C.) with Thessalonica as the capital and Beroea as the seat of the provinical assembly. During the time of Augustus, some of the Macedonian cities were refounded as Roman colonies: Dion, at the foot of Mount Olympus, became Colonia Julia Augusta Diensis; Philippi, where Marc Antony had defeated the assassins of Caesar—Brutus and Cassius—was settled with Roman veterans and renamed Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensium. While the general language of Macedonia remained Greek, the official language of the Roman colonies was Latin (until after A.D. 300 almost all inscriptions found in these cities are in Latin). At the time of the Great Persecution of the Christians (303–311), Thessalonica was one of the four capitals of the Roman Empire and served as residence of the emperor Galerius, one of the most fanatic persecutors of Christianity.

Religions Ancient Macedonian religion was dominated by two different elements. (1) The Macedonians who had conquered the country brought their own gods which are on the whole the same as the traditional gods of the Greeks. Among them, Zeus as the father of Makedon, founding hero of the Macedonians, and Herakles are the two most important deities. Also the cult of the Greek god Dionysus was widespread. Both Dionysus and Herakles appear as the patron deities of Alexander the Great. (2) At the same time, the Macedonians adopted several of the older cults and deities of the indigenous population, especially of the Thracians. A female deity of Thracian origin appears under the Greek name Artemis; numerous rock reliefs of this Artemis have been discovered on the Acropolis of Philippi where she sometimes appears with a tree of life in one hand. In Lefkopetra, a few miles west of Beroea, a temple of the "Aboriginal Mother of the Gods" has recently been discovered. Most important became the acceptance of the Thracian Cabirus. On the island of Samothrace two Cabiri were worshiped in a famous mystery cult together with a Thracian mother goddess. In the cities of Thessalonica and Philippi, one Cabirus was venerated as the founding hero of the city. As he is depicted with a hammer in one hand and a drinking horn in the other, he also seems to have been revered as the patron deity of construction workers and miners. In Thessalonica, his role was later assumed by the Christian martyr Demetrius. A widespread religious symbol was the "Macedonian rider," depicted on coins of the Macedonian kings and on many tombstones. He may have been understood as a guide to the afterlife. This originally Thracian hero became the prototype for the Christian saint George. Belief in the judgment of the dead and an afterlife is in evidence in the paintings of a Macedonian tomb found near Lefkadia.

In the Hellenistic and Roman periods, new cults were introduced to Macedonia. The cult of the Egyptian gods Sarapis, Isis, and Anubis was established in Thessalonica before 100 B.C. The Egyptian sanctuary discovered in Thessalonica included, together with many inscriptions and votive offerings, a dining club for slaves and freedmen under the tutelage of the god Anubis. An Egyptian sanctuary was also excavated on the slope of the acropolis of Philippi and in the Roman colony Dion. Worship of "God the Most High" (Zeus Hypsistos), elsewhere associated with the God of the Israelites, is also in evidence. Roman veterans who were settled in the newly founded colonies brought their gods to Macedonia; a sanctuary dedicated to the Italian god Silvanus was found on the acropolis of Philippi. Temples for the worship of the Roman emperor were established in most cities. In Thessalonica the imperial cult appears in the special form of the worship of the Roman benefactors. The evidence for ancient Judaism in Macedonia is meager. An inscription (still unpublished) recently found in Philippi mentions a synagogue. The only evidence for Israelites in Thessalonica comes from a Samaritan inscription dating after A.D. 400. A Jewish synagogue has been excavated recently in the Macedonian city of Stobi in the valley of the Axios (Vardar) River (in Yugoslav Macedonia).

Christianity in Macedonia The Christian message came to Macedonia through the preaching of the apostle Paul. Acts 16:9–10 describes the dream vision that came to Paul in Troas: a Macedonian appeared to him and invited him to Macedonia. Paul and his associates, sailing from Troas via Samothrace, arrived in Neapolis (today Kavalla), the most important port of eastern Macedonia, and went inland to Philippi where, according to the account of Acts 16:14–15, they were received by Lydia, a God-fearer from Thyatira, and founded the first Christian community in Europe, probably in the year A.D. 50. The correspondence of Paul with this church, now preserved in the Epistle to the Philippians, gives testimony to the early development, organization, and generosity of this church. Forced to leave Philippi after an apparently brief stay (Acts 16:16–40 reports the incident of the healing of a possessed slave girl and Paul's subsequent imprisonment), Paul went to the capital Thessalonica via Amphipolis on the Via Egnatia (Acts 17:1). The church which he founded in Thessalonica (compare Acts 17:2–12) was the recipient of the oldest Christian writing, i.e., the First Letter to the Thessalonians which Paul wrote from Corinth after he had preached in Beroea and in Athens (Acts 17:13–15).

Apart from this Pauline correspondence, our information about the Macedonian churches in the first three Christian centuries is extremely slim. Shortly after A.D. 100, bishop Polycarp of Smyrna wrote to the Philippians who had asked him to forward copies of the letters of the famous martyr Ignatius of Antioch. Polycarp also wrote to advise the Philippians with respect to the case of a presbyter who had embezzled funds. Otherwise, almost no detailed information is available for the time before Constantine. Helmut Koester MACEDONIANS (Mă çĕ dō′ nĭ ans) Natives or residents of Macedonia (Acts 19:29; 27:2; 2 Cor. 9:2). See Macedonia.

MACHAERUS (Mă chē′ rŭs) Palace-fortress located about fifteen miles southeast of the mouth of the Jordan on a site rising 3,600 feet above the sea. Herod the Great rebuilt the fortress. Josephus gives the Machaerus as the site of the imprisonment and execution of John the Baptist. Mark's reference to Galilean nobles among Herod's guests has prompted some interpreters to suggest a site further north. The Gospels, however, associate John's ministry with the Judean wilderness (Mark 1:5; Matt. 3:1; John 3:22–23). That John's disciples claimed his body (Mark 6:29) suggests a site, such as the Macherus, near the center of John's ministry.

MACHBANAI (Mčh′ bà nâi) Military captain of tribe of Gad who served David (1 Chron. 12:13).

MACHBANNAI (Măch' băn nâi) TEV spelling of Machbanai.

MACHBENA (Măch be' nà) NAS spelling of Machbenah.

MACHBENAH (Măch bē' nah) A descendant of Caleb or a village in Judah, possibly identical with Meconah, inhabited by descendants of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:49).

MACHI (Mā' chī) Personal name, possibly meaning "reduced" or "bought" (Num. 13:15). Spy of tribe of Gad who explored Promised Land.

MACHIR (Mā' chĭr) Personal name meaning "sold." 1. Oldest son of Manasseh and grandson of Joseph (Josh. 17:1). He was the father of Gilead (Josh. 17:1), Peresh, and Sheresh (1 Chron. 7:16), and a daughter whose name is not given (1 Chron. 2:21). He had a brother named Asriel (1 Chron. 7:14) and a wife named Maacah (1 Chron. 7:16). Machir was the head of the family called the Machirites (Num. 26:29). Apparently Machir along with his family had a reputation for being expert warriors (Josh. 17:1). "Because he was a man of war," Machir was allotted the territory of Bashan and Gilead, east of the Jordan (Josh. 17:1). Apparently the territory of the Machirites started at the site of Mahanaim, on the Jabbok River, extended northward, and included the region around the Yarmuk River (Josh. 13:29–31).

2. Son of Ammiel and member of the tribe of Manasseh. He came from the site of Lo-debar, perhaps a village near Mahanaim. He is recognized in the Old Testament for the assistance he provided Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan (2 Sam. 9, especially vv. 4–5) and David during the period of Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 17:27–29). See Manasseh. La Moine De Vries

MACHIRITES (Mā' chĭ rītes) See Machir.

MACHNADEBAI (Măch năd' ė bâi) Name, possibly meaning "possession of Nebo," of one of the laymen forced to give up their foreign wives in Ezra's reform (Ezra 10:40).

MACHPELAH (Măch pē' lah) Place name meaning, "the double cave." Burial place located near Hebron for Sarah (Gen. 23:19), Abraham (25:9), Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, Leah, and probably other members of the family. After Sarah's death Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah and its cave as a sepulcher. The owner, Ephron the Hittite, offered it to Abraham for free, but the patriarch refused the gift and paid the fair price of 400 shekels of silver. Such conversation was typical of negotiations to purchase land in that day. Both Ephron and Abraham expected a purchase to be made. The cave became the burial place for each of the succeeding generations. Jacob requested burial there before he died in Egypt, and was returned there by his sons (Gen. 49:29; 50:13).

MACNADEBAI (Măc nă' dė bâi) NIV spelling of Machnadebai.

MADAI (Mā' dâi) Name of a son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). The name means "Middle land," suggesting that Madai is to be understood as the ancester of the Medians.

MADIAN (Mā' dī an) KJV spelling of Midian (Acts 7:29).

MADMANNAH (Măd măn' nah) Place name meaning, "dung heap." City in the Negeb assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:31), possibly identical with Beth-marcaboth (Josh. 19:5). Suggested sites include the modern khirbet umm Demneh and khirbet Tatrit, both in the vicinity of Dharhiriyah. The reference to Shaaph as the father of Madmannah (1 Chron. 2:49) is open to various interpretations: (1) Shaaph (re)founded the city; (2) Shaaph's descendants settled in the city; or (3) Shaaph had a son named Madmannah.

MADMEN (Măd mĕn) A name meaning "Dung pit," applied to a city of Moab (Jer. 48:2). Dimon (Dibon), the capital city, is perhaps the intended reference. See Dimon. Jeremiah's dirge perhaps refers to Asshurbanipal's suppression of a Moabite revolt in 650 B.C.

MADMENAH (Măd mē nah) The place name (meaning "Dung Hill") of one of the points on the northern invasion route to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:31). The site is possibly Shu'fat. Isaiah perhaps refers to the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C.

MADON (mā' dŏn) Place name meaning, "site of justice." Town in Galilee whose king joined in an unsuccessful alliance against Israel (Josh. 11:1; 12:19). The site has been identified as the summit of Qarn Hattim, northwest of Tiberias.

MAGADAN (Măg' a dăn) A site on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 15:39). At Mark 8:10, most translations follow other Greek manuscripts reading Dalmanutha. KJV follows the received text of its day in reading Magdala. The location of Magadan, if it is a correct reading, is not known.

MAGBISH (Măg bĭsh) Place name meaning, "pile." A town in Judah's territory, possibly identified with the modern khirbet el-Mahbiyeh three miles southwest of Adullam, to which exiles returned to reclaim their inheritance (Ezra 2:30).

MAGDALA (Măg' dà là) Place name perhaps

The area of the village of Magdala and the plain surrounding it.

meaning, "tower." City on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee and center of a prosperous fishing operation. The town was located on a main highway coming from Tiberias. See Magadan. A certain Mary, who had been healed of demon possession by Jesus, was from Magdala. See Marys of the Bible.

MAGDALENE See Magdala; Marys of the Bible.

MAGDIEL (Măg dĭ' ĕl) Personal (and tribal) name meaning "choice gift of God." Edomite chieftain or the area occupied by his descendants (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

MAGGOT A soft-bodied, legless grub that is the intermediate stage of some insects (Job 25:6; Isa. 14:11). The term always occurs in parallel with worm and serves to highlight human mortality. See Insects.

MAGI (Mā' gī) Eastern wise men, priests, and astrologers expert in interpreting dreams and other "magic arts."

1. Men whose interpretation of the stars led them to Palestine to find and honor Jesus, the newborn King (Matt. 2). The term has a Persian background. The earliest Greek translation of Daniel 2:2,10 uses "magi" to translate the Hebrew term for astrologer (compare 4:7; 5:7). The magi who greeted Jesus' birth may have been from Babylon, Persia, or the Arabian desert. Matthew gives no number, names, or royal positions to the magi. Before A.D. 225 Tertullian called them kings. From the three gifts, the deducation was made that they were three in number. Shortly before A.D. 600 the Armenian Infancy Gospel named them: Melkon (later Melchior), Balthasar, and Gaspar. The visit of the magi affirms international recognition by leaders of other religions of Jesus' place as the expected King.

2. In Acts 8:9 the related verb describes Simon as practicing sorcery, with a bad connotation. Such negative feelings had long been associated with some uses of the term.

3. In Acts 13:6,8 Bar-Jesus or Elymas is designated a sorcerer or one of the magi as well as a false prophet. Paul blinded Simon, showing God's power over the magic arts.

MAGIC BANDS Bands or cushions placed on the wrist in magical practices (Ezek. 13:18,20). The KJV translates "pillows." Their precise nature is unknown. Apparently they represented part of a diviner's paraphanalia used to determine the destinies the gods had determined. See Kerchiefs.

MAGISTRATE A government official with administrative and judicial responsibilities. At Ezra 7:25 magistrate is perhaps a parallel title to judge. Possibly, judges and magistrates handled different cases, for example, cases involving traditional law and royal cases in which the state had special interest. The term for magistrate at Daniel 3:2,3 is an Old Persian term of uncertain meaning. Since magistrates follows judges, officials with judicial responsibilities may again be in view. The term for magistrate at Luke 12:11 (KJV) and 12:58 (NRSV) is archon, a general term for ruler. The term rendered magistrates at Acts 16:20,22,35–36,38 stratēgoi is a term used both for military commanders and for civil officials of a Greek city who were charged with administering the community finances, enforcing enactments of the council or citizen body, and in some cases passing sentence in legal cases. In the case of Philippi, stratēgoi serves as the Greek equivalent of the Latin duumviri, the two magistrates who served as the chief judicial officials of a Roman city or colony.

MAGNIFICAT (Mag nĭ' fĭ căt) Latin word meaning "magnify." The first word in Latin of Mary's psalm of praise (Luke 1:46–55) and thus the title of the psalm. Very similar to the psalm of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1–10). See Benedictus; Nunc Dimittis.

MAGOG (Mā' gŏg) See Gog and Magog.

MAGOR-MISSABIB (Mā' gŏr-mĭs sā' bĭb) Name meaning "terror on every side" which Jeremiah gave to Pashur the priest after the latter had the prophet beaten and put in stocks (Jer. 20:3). The earliest Greek translation lacks the words "on every side," prompting some interpreters to conclude the words were added in imitation of the full phrase at Jeremiah 6:25; 20:10.

MAGPIASH (Măg pī' ăsh) Personal name, perhaps meaning "moth exterminator." Magpiash was among the chiefs of the people who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:20).

MAGUS, SIMON See Simon Magus.

MAHALAB (Mā hā' lab) A town in Asher's tribal territory (Josh. 19:29 NRSV, TEV) according to the earliest Greek translation. The existing Hebrew text lacks Mahalab as do other English translations.

MAHALAH (Mā hā' lah) KJV form of Mahlah (1 Chron. 7:18). See Mahlah.

MAHALALEEL (Mā hā' lā lē ĕl) KJV form of Mahalelel, a personal name meaning "God shines forth" or "praise God." 1. Son of Kenan, father of Jared, and ancestor of Christ [Gen. 5:12–17; 1 Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37, Greek form Malaleel (Mā lē lē ĕl) appears]. 2. Ancestor of a postexilic member of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:4).

MAHALALEL (Mā hā' lā lĕl) Form of Mahalaleel preferred by modern translations.

MAHALATH (Mā hā lăth) Personal name meaning, "dance" or "sickness" and a term used in the superscriptions of Psalms 53; 88. 1. Granddaughter of Abraham and daughter of Ishmael who married Esau (Gen. 28:9). 2. Granddaughter of David and wife of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:18). 3. In Psalms perhaps a choreographic instruction; the second element in the composite term mahalath-leannoth (mā' hā lăth-lē ăn' nŏth) perhaps refers to an antiphonal performance by two groups answering and responding to each other (Ps. 88).

MAHALATH-LEANNOTH See Mahalath 3.

MAHANAIM (Mā hā nā' ĭm) Place name meaning, "two camps." City somewhere in the hill country of Gilead on the tribal borders of Gad and eastern Manasseh (Josh. 13:26,30). It was a Levitical city (Josh. 21:38). It served as a refuge twice: for Ishbosheth after Saul's death (2 Sam. 2:8–9), and for David when Absalom usurped the throne (2 Sam. 17:24–27). During Solomon's administration, the city served as a district capital (1 Kings 4:14). German archaeologists locate it at tell Heggog, half a mile south of Penuel, while Israelis point to tell edh-Dhabab el Gharbi.

MAHANEH-DAN (Mā' hā nĕh-dăn) Hebrew term meaning "camp of Dan." During the period of the judges the tribe of Dan lacked a permanent inheritance in the Promised Land (Judg. 18:1) and continued to live according to the earlier seminomadic pattern. Thus it is not surprising that two places are designated "camp of Dan": 1. a site between Zorah and Eshtaol where the Lord's Spirit first stirred Samson (Judg. 13:25). 2. A site west of Kiriath-jearim where the Danites camped on the way to the hill country of Ephraim (Judg. 18:12).

MAHARAI (Mā hā' rā ī) Personal name meaning, "hurried one." One of David's thirty elite warriors who came from the clan of the Zerahites and the town of Netophah in Judah and commanded the troups in the tenth month (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 11:30, 27:13).

MAHATH (Mā' hăth) Personal name meaning, "tough." 1. Levite of the Kohathite clan (1 Chron. 6:35). 2. Levite assisting in Hezekiah's reforms (2 Chron. 29:12; 31:13). Both Mahaths are perhaps the same individual. The second may be the Ahimoth of 1 Chronicles 6:25.

MAHAVITE (Mā' hā vīte) Family name of Eliel, one of David's thirty elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:46). See Eliel 5.

MAHAZIOTH (Mā hā' zī ŏth) Personal name meaning, "visions." Son of Heman who served as a Temple musician (1 Chron. 25:4,6–7,30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (Mā' hĕr-shăl' ăl-hăsh' -băz) A personal name meaning "quick to the plunder, swift to the spoil" (Isa. 8:1). Symbolic name Isaiah gave his son to warn of the impending destruction of Syria and Israel as they threatened Judah and Ahaz, its king. The name appeared to show that God would deliver Judah from her enemies. The sign also called on Ahaz for faith. Without faith, Judah could become part of the spoil. The prophecy was that the two enemies of Judah would be destroyed before they could attack the Southern Kingdom. Assyria defeated Syria in 732 B.C. and Israel in 722 B.C. Judah survived until 586 B.C.

MAHLAH (Măl' lah) Personal name, perhaps meaning, "weak one." 1. Daughter of Zelophehad who with her sisters petitioned Moses to receive their father's inheritance in the Promised land since he had no sons (Num. 26:33; 27:1–11). God granted their request (Num. 27:6–7). The tribe of Manasseh later petitioned that daughters who inherit be required to marry within their father's tribe (Num. 36:1–12). The daughters' persistance in pressing their claim is evidenced by Joshua 17:3. 2. A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:18).

MAHLI (Măh' lī) Personal name perhaps meaning, "shrewd" or "cunning." 1. Son of Merari, a Levite who gave his name to a priestly clan (Ex. 6:19; Nu. 3:20; 1 Chron. 6:19,29; 23:21; 24:26,28; Ezra 8:18). 2. Son of Mushi, the nephew of the above (1 Chron. 6:47; 23:23; 24:30).

MAHLITES (Măh' līte) Descendants of Mahli. These Levites had charge of the set up and maintenance of the tabernacle (Num. 3:33–36; 26:58).

MAHLON (Măh' lŏn) Personal name meaning,

"sickly." One of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi (Ruth 1:2,5), and the husband of Ruth the Moabitess (4:9–10). Mahlon died while the family was sojourning in Moab because of a famine in their homeland of Israel. The reason for Mahlon's death is not given. Boaz, a distant relative to Mahlon, married the dead man's widow, Ruth.

M

MAHOL (Mā′ hŏl) Personal name meaning, "place of Dancing." The name belongs to the father of three renowned wise men (1 Kings 4:31). An alternate interpretation takes the phrase "sons of the place of dancing" as a title for those who danced as part of the Temple ritual (compare Pss. 149:3; 150:4). The wisdom of the Temple dancers may be akin to the prophetic wisdom associated with musicians (1 Sam. 10:5; 2 Kings 3:15; and especially 1 Chron. 25:3).

MAHSEIAH (Mäh′ sēi ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah is a refuge." Grandfather of the scribe Baruch (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

MAID, MAIDEN Unmarried woman, especially of the servant class. In the KJV, maid translated five Hebrew and four Greek terms. In the Old Testament amah and shipchah refer to female slaves. Alternate translations for these terms include: bondmaid; bondwoman; female slave; handmaid; and maid servant. See Slavery for literal uses. Both terms are used as expressions of deep humility (Ruth 3:9; 1 Sam. 25:24–31; 28:21; 2 Sam. 14:6; 1 Kings 1:13,17). A special case involves the use of these terms for the "handmaid of the Lord" (1 Sam. 1:11; Pss. 86:16; 116:16; compare Servant of the Lord), always with reference to prayer for the handmaid's son. KJV sometimes rendered bethulah as maid (Ex. 22:16; Deut. 22:17). Modern translations generally render the term virgin. KJV sometimes renders almah maid. At Exodus 2:8 almah means "girl." At Proverbs 30:19 a young woman of marriageable age is intended. KJV translated the term as "virgin" at Isaiah 7:14. The term naarah is used both for young women (2 Kings 5:2) and specifically for servants (Ruth 2:8; Esth. 2:4). In the New Testament, korasion refers to a child or young girl (Matt. 9:24–25). Paidiskē refers to a (young) female servant (Matt. 26:69; Mark 14:66; John 18:16). At Luke 8:51,54 pais means child. Elsewhere, the term can mean servant. Mary's reference to herself as the "handmaid [doulē] of the Lord" (Luke 1:38,48) reflects the Old Testament use.

MAIL, COAT OF See Weapons; Arms and Armor.

MAIMED Mutilated, disfigured, or seriously injured, especially by loss of a limb (Matt. 18:8; Mark 9:43). In the ancient world the maimed had difficulty finding work and relied on the generosity of others (Luke 14:13). A worthless shepherd (leader) does not care for the maimed (Zech. 11:16 NRSV). Christ, the Good Shepherd, cared for the maimed in His healing ministry (Matt. 15:30–31). He expected disciples to invite the maimed who could never repay (Luke 14:13). Cautioning His disciples to avoid what causes sin, Jesus taught it is preferable to enter (eternal) life maimed than to go into eternal fire with whatever causes one to sin (Matt. 18:8).

MAINSAIL The principal sail of a vessel (Acts 27:40). Modern translations render the Greek term "foresail," understanding the sail to be a smaller, auxiliary sail used in strong winds when the full force provided by the mainsail would be unnecessary or dangerous.

MAKAZ (Mā′ kăz) Place name meaning "cutting off" or "end." Center of Solomon's second administrative district (1 Kings 4:9). The site is possibly that of khirbet-el-Muskheizin south of Ekron.

MAKHELOTH (Māk hē′ lŏth) Stopping place during the wilderness wandering. Makheloth (Num. 33:25–26), like Kehelathah (Num. 33:22–23), means, "to assemble."

MAKI (Mā′ kī) NIV spelling of Machi.

MAKIR (Mā′ kīr) NIV spelling of Machir.

MAKIRITES (Mā′ kĭ rītes) NIV spelling of Machirites.

MAKKEDAH (Măk kē′ dah) Name meaning, "Place of shepherds," of a Canaanite city, the site of Joshua's rout of the combined forces of five Canaanite kings (Joshua 10:10). The kings sought refuge in nearby caves but were trapped there (10:16). Joshua captured the city, killing all its population (10:28). Later, Makkedah was assigned to the Shephelah (lowland) district of Judah (Josh. 15:4–1). Suggested locations include: Eusebius' suggestion of a site eight and a half miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin); tell es-Safi south of Hulda (Libnah); el-Muqhar ("the Caves") southwest of Ekron; and a site between Lachish and Hebron.

MAKTESH (Măk′ tĕsh) KJV transliteration of the Hebrew place name meaning, "Mortar" (NAS, NRSV). District in or near Jerusalem (Zeph. 1:11). Early commentators located the site in the Kidron Valley. Recently, the site has been linked with an area of the Tyropoean Valley within the city walls (thus "lower town," REB; "market district," NIV).

MALACHI (Măl′ ă chī) Personal name or common noun meaning, "my messenger," or "my angel" and name of the last book in the English

Old Testament. Some people in ancient Israel believed that an angel wrote this book because of the name. We know nothing about Malachi other than what we are told in this book. He is not mentioned anywhere else in the Old or New Testaments. The Hebrew word for "Malachi" occurs only in 1:1 and 3:1.

Date We can only estimate the date of Malachi's ministry. The dates of most Old Testament prophets are indicated in the superscription of their book by the names of the kings reigning at that time. No kings' names are listed in the superscription of Malachi. The book contains no reference to any historical incident such as an important battle, earthquake, or captivity which might give a historical context to the book. However, we do know the time was postexilic (after 536 B.C.) because of the use of the Persian word for "governor" (1:8). The Temple had been rebuilt (1:10; 3:1,10). The Edomites had suffered a crushing blow from an outisde invader, perhaps the Nabateans (1 Macc. 5:25). The Nabateans were an Arab tribe who came out of the desert and drove the Edomites out of their homeland in the fifth or sixth centuries B.C. Evidently, Malachi was a contemporary of Nehemiah. Their books show kinship. The same social and religious conditions prevail in both, and Nehemiah's reforms were probably intended to correct some of the social and religious abuses outlined by Malachi (Mal. 3:5; Neh. 5:1–13). Tithing is stressed in both (Mal. 3:7–10; Neh. 10:37–39). Divorce and mixed marriages were problems in both (Mal. 2:10–16; Neh. 10:30; 13:23–28). Nehemiah first returned to Jerusalem from Persia in 444 B.C. (Neh. 1:1; 2:1); therefore, Malachi should be dated after 450 B.C.

The people of Israel who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon and Persia in 536 B.C. came with high hopes. In Isaiah 40—55 the prophet painted a future for those repatriated people in such glowing terms that they expected the messianic age to come immediately. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah added to these hopes by assuring the people that unprecedented blessings would come when the Temple was complete. They finished the Temple in 516 B.C. (Ezra 6:14–15) and waited and waited, but no blessings came. Instead of blessings they faced drought, famine, poverty, oppression, and unfaithfulness to spouses and to God. Moral and spiritual laxity, pride, indifference, permissiveness, and skepticism were rife. Malachi tried to rekindle the fires of faith in the hearts of his discouraged people.

Book The purpose of Malachi was to assure his people that God still loved them, but He demanded honor, respect, and faithfulness from them. Malachi pointed out religious and social abuses and warned that judgment would come to purge the people of sin unless they repented. The style of the Book of Malachi is that of disputations. This style is not unique to Malachi. Micah and Jeremiah had disputes with false prophets (Mic. 2:6–11; Jer. 27—28). Jeremiah also disputed with God (Jer. 12:1–6). Job disputed with his friends. The Book of Malachi is made up of six disputation passages and two appendices. The disputes follow a regular form: (1) the prophet stated a premise; (2) the hearers challenged the statement; and (3) God and the prophet presented the supporting evidence.

Outline

I. A dispute about God's love (1:1–5)
II. A dispute about God's honor and fear (1:6–2:9)
III. A dispute about faithfulness (2:10–16)
IV. A dispute about God's justice (2:17—3:5)
V. A dispute about repentance (3:6–12)
VI. A dispute about speaking against God (3:13—4:3)
VII. Two appendices (4:4–6)
  A. An admonition to remember the law of Moses (4:4)
  B. An announcement of the sending of Elijah (4:5–6)

MALACHITE (Măl′ ă chīte) A green basic carbonate of copper used as an ore and for ornamental objects; according to the NEB and REB, a component of the mosaic pavement decorating the palace of the Persian king Ahasuerus at Susa (Esth. 1:6). The Hebrew root means "glistening." Suggested meanings include: porphyry (NAS, NIV, NRSV); red marble (KJV), and white marble (TEV), in addition to malachite.

MALCAM (Măl′ căm) See Malcham.

MALCHAM (Măl′ chăm) KJV form for Malcam (1 Chron. 8:9) and Milcom (Zeph. 1:5). The name meaning, "their King" is applied to 1. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:9). 2. The chief god of the Ammonites (Zeph. 1:5, KJV; Malcam, RSV and NAS margins). The Hebrew malcam is sometimes seen as a deliberate scribal misspelling of Milcom (compare Jer. 49:1,3; Zeph. 1:5), the common name for the Ammonites' god (1 Kings 11:5,33; 2 Kings 23:13). One text (1 Kings 11:7) links Milcom with Molech. At Amos 1:15 the Hebrew malcam is translated simply, "their king," though the word choice suggests that the Ammonites' god will go with them into Exile. See Ammon; Milcom; Molech.

MALCHIAH (Măl chī′ ah) Alternate form of Malchijah.

MALCHIEL (Măl′ chī ĕl) Name meaning, "My God is king," given to a descendant of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; 1 Chron. 7:31).

MALCHIELITES (Măl chī' ĕl ītes) Descendants of Malchiel (Num. 26:45).

MALCHIJAH (Măl chī' jah) Personal name with long and short spelling meaning, "My King is Yahweh." 1. Ancestor of the musician Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40). 2. Priest in David's time (1 Chron. 24:9; compare 9:12; Neh. 11:12). 3. Prince of Judah in Jeremiah's time, probably the father of Pashur (Jer. 21:1; 38:1,6); 4.–6. Three of Ezra's contemporaries with foreign wives (Ezra 10:25,31); some modern translations replace the second Malchijah in the Hebrew text of 10:25 with Hashabiah, the early Greek reading. 7. One standing with Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh. 8:4). 8. Priest signing Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:3); 9.–12. Four contemporaries of Nehemiah involved in the rebuilding (Neh. 3:11,14,31) or dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:42). Several of the references in Ezra and Nehemiah may refer to the same person(s).

MALCHIRAM (Măl chī' răm) Personal name meaning, "My king is exalted." Son of King Jeconiah of Judah (1 Chron. 3:18).

MALCHISHUA (Măl chī shū à) Personal name meaning, "My king is salvation." Son of King Saul and Ahinoam (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39) killed in battle with the Philistines at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 14:49; 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2).

MALCHUS (Măl' chŭs) Personal name meaning "king," common among the Idumaeans and Palmyrenes, especially for their kings or tribal chiefs. High priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off (John 18:10). The name is unusual for slaves who commonly had names such as Onesimus ("Useful"; Philem. 10–11). Perhaps the slave was chief of the Temple guard. Only Luke recorded the healing of the ear (Luke 22:51). Possibly Luke desired to stress Jesus' compassion in the midst of His passion (compare Luke 23:28,34,43) or respect shown to the high priest and his representative (compare Acts 23:4).

MALEFACTOR used in KJV to denote the two criminals who were crucified beside Jesus. (See Luke 23:32–33,39.) The word is the Latin translation of the Greek kakourgos, meaning "robber" or "criminal." The Latin means "evil-doer."

MALELEEL (Mà lē lē ĕl) Greek form of Mahalaleel used by KJV (Luke 3:37).

MALICE Vicious intention; desire to hurt someone. Malice is characteristic of preconversion life in opposition to God (Rom. 1:29; Tit. 3:3). Christians are frequently called upon to rid their lives of malice (Eph. 4:31–32; Col. 3:8; 1 Pet. 2:1).

MALKIEL (Măl' kī el) NIV spelling of Malchiel.

MALKIELITES (Măl' kī ĕ lītes) NIV spelling of Malchielites.

MALKIJAH (Măl kī jah) NIV form of Malchiah (Malchijah).

MALKIRAM (Măl' kī răm) NIV spelling of Malchiram.

MALLOTHI (Măl' lō thī) Personal name meaning, "I spoke." One of David's tabernacle musicians (1 Chron. 25:4,26). Like his father Heman (25:5), he may have exercised a prophetic role (king's seer). The sons' names may have formed a prayer (see REB note).

MALLOW In Scripture mallow refers to two plants: 1. Atriplex halimus L., the shrubby orache, is a salt marsh plant and unpleasant food (Job 30:4; "plant of the salt marshes," NAS margin). The saltwort (REB) is another possibility for this plant associated with the marshy areas around the Dead Sea. 2. The true mallow (genus Malva) is a flowering plant prominent around Jerusalem. Its fading flowers provide an image for the unrighteous according to one interpretation of Job 24:24 (NRSV, REB). Here mallow is supplied from the earliest Greek translation. Other translations follow the Hebrew text in reading "all."

MALLUCH (Măl' lŭch) Personal name meaning, "being king." 1. Ancestor of a Levitical singer in Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. 6:44); 2. Priest who returned from Exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2, perhaps identical with the Malluchi of v. 14); 3.–6. Four contemporaries of Ezra, two men with foreign wives (Ezra 10:29,32) and a priest (Neh. 10:4) and layperson (Neh. 10:27) who witnessed the covenant renewal. Some of the above may refer to the same person.

MALLUCHI (Mal' lū chī) Family of priests in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14). Some suggest Malluchi is a transcriptional error for Malluch (compare 12:2).

MALTA (Mal' ta) See Islands.

MAMMON The Greek form of a Syriac or Aramaic word for "money," "riches," "property," "worldly goods," or "profit." In general use it was a personification of riches as an evil spirit or deity. From about 1500 it has been current in English as indicating the evil influence of wealth. The word is not used in the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is used only by Jesus (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:9,11,13). In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." He meant that no one can be a slave of God and worldly wealth at the same time. The undivided concentration of mind to money-getting is incompatible with wholehearted devotion to God and to His service (Col. 3:5). In the parable of the unjust steward (Luke 15:1–13), Jesus commended the steward's foresight, not his method. His object was to point out how one may best use wealth, tainted or otherwise, with a view to the future. See Steward. Ray Robbins

MAMRE (Măm′ rē) Place name meaning, "grazing land." Main area of habitation for Abraham and his family. It apparently was named after an Amorite (Mamre) who helped Abraham defeat the evil king, Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:1–24). Mamre was famous for its oak trees. It was just east of Mamre that Abraham purchased a cave (Machpelah) for a family burial plot. Its location was at Ramet et-Chalil, two miles north of Hebron. See Abraham; Machpelah.

MAN OF LAWLESSNESS See Antichrist; Lawlessness; Man of Sin.

MAN OF SIN KJV designation for the ultimate opponent of Christ (2 Thess. 2:3). Modern translations follow other manuscripts in reading "man of lawlessness." See Antichrist; Lawlessness.

MANAEN (Măn′ ȧ ĕn) Greek form of Menahem ("Comforter"); the name of a prophet and teacher in the early church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). Manaen is described as the syntrophos of Herod the tetrarch (Herod Antipas, reigned 4 B.C. to A.D. 37). The term literally means "one who eats with." In the Old Testament, those who shared the king's table were persons recognized as valued members of the court (2 Sam. 9:10–13; 19:28; 1 Kings 2:7; 2 Kings 25:29; Neh. 5:17). The earliest Greek translation uses syntropoi to refer to those generals who were reared with Alexander (1 Macc. 1:6) as well as for members of court (2 Macc. 9:29). The meanings "member of court" and "childhood companion" are both possible for Acts 13:1. A less likely alternative is the early Greek translation's use of syntrophoi for fellow Israelites to mean, "kin" (1 Kings 12:24).

MANAHATH (Măn′ ȧ hăth) Place or personal name meaning "resting place" or "settlement." 1. Ancestor of the Horite subclan of Edomites (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40). 2. Site, probably outside of Palestine, to which some Benjaminites from Geba were exiled (1 Chron. 8:6). 3. City of tribal territory of Judah according to earliest Greek text of Joshua 15:59, there called Manocho, probably el-Malcha in the hill country of Judah three miles southwest of Jerusalem. The site is perhaps the same as Nohah ("resting place") associated with Benjaminites in Judges 20:43. See 1 Chronicles 2:54.

MANAHETHITES (Măn ȧ hĕth ītes) KJV, REB spelling of residents of Manahath (1 Chron. 2:54).

MANASSEH (Mȧ năs′ sĕh) A personal name meaning "God has caused me to forget" (trouble). 1. One of at least two sons born to Joseph by Asenath (Gen. 41:50–51). Manasseh was adopted by Jacob as one to receive his blessing. Along with Ephraim, Manasseh became one of the twelve tribes of Israel and received a landed inheritance. In almost typical Old Testament fashion, Manasseh, the elder brother, did not receive the blessing of the firstborn (Gen. 48:13–20). Jacob crossed his hands and gave that blessing to Ephraim. When the Promised Land was apportioned, half of the tribe of Manasseh settled on the east bank of the Jordan and half on the west. See Tribes of Israel.

2. King of Judah (696–642 B.C.) who was a son of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:21). His was the longest reign of any Judean king. Manasseh's reign was known as one of unfaithfulness to Yahweh. Second Kings blames him for Judah's ultimate destruction and exile (2 Kings 21:10–16).

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF See Apocrypha.

MANASSITES (Mȧ năs′ sītes) Members of tribe of Manasseh.

MANDRAKE A small, perennial plant (Mandragora officinarum) native to the Middle East. Although not grown for food, its root and berries are edible. The Ancient Near East viewed it as an aphrodisiac and fertility drug. It is often called love apple or devil's apple. According to Genesis 30:14–16, a barren Rachel bargained with Reuben (Leah's oldest son) for some mandrakes which he had found. Leah, however, produced the children (Gen. 30:17–21). Only when God "remembered Rachel" did she bear Joseph (30:24). Thus Israel learned that God controlled fertility; superstition and human manipulation cannot supply what God chooses not to.

MANEH KJV alternate term for mina at Ezekiel 45:12. See Weights and Measures.

MANGER A feeding trough used for cattle, sheep, donkeys, or horses. Archaeologists have discovered stone mangers in the horse stables of Ahab at Megiddo. They were cut out of limestone and were approximately three feet long, eighteen inches wide, and two feet deep. Other ancient mangers were made of masonry. Many Palestinian homes consisted of one large room which contained an elevated section and a lower section. The elevated section was the family's living quarters, while the lower section housed the family's animals. Usually a manger, in the form of a masonry box or a stone niche, was located in the lower section. Mangers were also put in cave stables or other stalls. The manger referred to in Luke 2:16 may have been in a cave stable or other shelter. There Jesus was laid to sleep after his birth. Floyd Lewis

A stone manger still in place in the archaeological excavations at ancient Megiddo.

MANNA (măn′ na) Grainlike substance, considered to be food from heaven, which sustained the Israelites in the wilderness and foreshadowed Christ, the true Bread from heaven.

Old Testament The small round grains or flakes, which appeared around the Israelites' camp each morning with the dew, were ground and baked into cakes or boiled (Ex. 16:13–36). Their name may have come from the question the Israelites asked when they first saw them: "What is it (man hu)?" Today a type of manna has been identified with the secretions left on tamarisk bushes by insects feeding on the sap. The Bible emphasizes that God caused manna to appear at the right time and place to meet His people's needs.

New Testament Jesus assured the Jews that He, and not the wilderness food, was the true Bread from heaven which conferred eternal life on those who partook of it (John 6:30–58). Barbara J. Bruce MANOAH (Mȧ nō′ ah) Personal name meaning "rest." A member of the tribe of Dan and the father of Samson (Judg. 13). Manaoh petitioned God for a son when his wife could not produce an heir. God promised a son on the condition that he be reared a Nazirite. Manaoh hosted the man of God who brought the news at a meal, but was told to offer the food as a burnt offering. The man ascended in the smoke of the fire, revealing his identity as God's angel. Manaoh is buried between Zorah and Eshtaol.

MANSERVANT KJV, RSV term for a male servant or slave. See Slavery.

MANSION Place to dwell or abide, separate living quarters.

Before going away, Jesus promised to make provision of a dwelling place for His disciples (John 14:2). The Greek noun means "abiding places." KJV translated this as "mansions," which meant a dwelling place but has come to represent an elaborate, expensive house in English. Thus modern translations read, "dwelling places" or "rooms." Christian theology holds that Christ's followers will abide with Him eternally in heavenly dwelling places.

MANSLAYER One guilty of involuntary manslaughter; one who accidentally causes another's death (Num. 35:9–15,22–28; Deut. 19:1–10). English translations distinguish manslayer from murderer though the underlying Hebrew term (ratsach) is the same. Compare Exodus 20:13.

MANSTEALING KJV term for kidnapping. See Kidnap, Kidnapper.

MANTLE A robe, cape, veil, or loose-fitting tunic worn as an outer garment. Many of the prophets wore them (1 Sam. 15:27; 1 Kings 19:13), as did women in Jerusalem (Isa. 3:22) and Job (Job 1:20). The transference of the mantle from Elijah to Elisha signified the passing of prophetic responsibility and God's accompanying power. These garments have been worn from at least the time of the Exodus until the present. See Dress; Ornaments; Veil.

MANUSCRIPT A handwritten copy of a text. Before the invention of the printing press in the fourteen hundreds, all books were handwritten. Large numbers of New Testament and some Old Testament manuscripts survive from the first few centuries B.C. until the fifteen hundreds. See Bible, Text and Versions; Paper; Papyrus; Writing.

MAOCH (Mā′ ŏch) Personal name meaning,

"dumb, foolish." Father of King Achish of Gath (1 Sam. 27:2). Moach is perhaps identical with Maacah (1 Kings 2:39), perhaps his ancestor.

MAON (Mā' ŏn) Name meaning "Dwelling." 1. Descendant of Caleb who founded Beth-zur (1 Chron. 2:45). 2. Village in the hill country of Judah (15:55). The site of Maon has been identified with tell Ma'in about eight miles south of Hebron in the vicinity of Carmel of Judah (compare 1 Sam. 25:2) and with khirbet el-Ma'in twenty-five miles northwest of Beersheba. Pottery finds at tell Ma'in demonstrate occupation from the time of David. David took refuge from Saul in the wilderness to the east of Maon (1 Sam. 23:24–25). Nabal, who foolishly refused hospitality to David, was a resident of Maon (1 Sam. 25:2).

MAONITES (Mā' ōn ītes) One of the peoples who oppressed Israel during the period of the judges (Judg. 10:12). These Maonites are perhaps the Meunites attacked by Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:41) and Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:7), a band of marauding Arabs from south of the Dead Sea in the vicinity of Ma'an. The earliest Greek translation reads, "Midianites" (REB).

MARA (Mā' rȧ) Personal name meaning "bitter," chosen by Naomi to reflect God's bitter dealings with her in the death of her husband and sons (Ruth 1:20–21).

MARAH (Mā' rȧh) Place name meaning "bitter." Place in the Wilderness of Shur, so named because of the bitter water found there by the wandering Israelites (Ex. 15:23). The site is typical of pools in the Sinai pennisula, having undrinkable water. The people complained against Moses because of their discomfort. God answered the leader's prayer by telling him to cast a tree into the water which became sweet and drinkable. Marah cannot be located definitely.

MARALAH (Mär' ȧ lah) Place name meaning "site on mountain ledge." Border town in Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). The site is perhaps tell Ghalta in the Jezreel Valley north of Megiddo or tell Thorah.

MARANATHA (Mär ȧ nă' thȧ) An Aramaic expression Paul used (1 Cor. 16:22) in closing a letter to the church at Corinth. Having prayed that those who do not love Christ (compare 1 Cor. 13) would be anathema (see anathema), Paul used a formula probably used in celebration of the Lord's Supper to pray that Christ would come. This highlighted the urgency of showing love to Christ. One way to show such love would be to obey Paul's instructions in 1 Corinthians. Maranatha is actually two Aramaic words. Dividing it as Marana tha means, "Our Lord, come." Maran atha means, "Our Lord has come." It reveals the expectant hope in which early Christians lived, watching for the imminent return of Christ. The division of the phrase is disputed by scholars. Whichever division is correct, the Aramaic formula shows that very early the church applied to Jesus the word Lord which otherwise belonged only to God.

MARBLE See Minerals and Metals; Alabaster.

MARCUS (Mär' cŭs) Latin form of Mark ("large hammer") used by the KJV at Colossians 4:10; Philemon 24; and 1 Peter 5:13. See Mark.

MARDUK (Mär' dŭk) Chief god of Babylon, sometimes called Merodach or Bel, the Babylonian equivalent of Baal meaning lord. He was credited with creation, a feat reenacted each new year and celebrated with a festival. In typical Ancient Near Eastern fashion, Marduk was proclaimed king. The reigning monarch was seen as the son of the god. As the kingdom grew, Marduk was attributed with more powers until he was acknowledged as lord of the heavens. The prophets mocked Marduk and his worshipers as products of human craftsmen who would lead Babylon to defeat and exile (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2,38; 51:47). See Babylon; Bel; Gods, Pagan.

MARE Female horse. See Animals; Horse.

MAREAL (măr ė ȧl) RSV; TEV form of Maralah.

MARESHAH (Mȧr' ē shah) Personal and place name meaning, "place at the top" with two Hebrew spellings. 1. Son of Caleb and founder of Hebron (1 Chron. 2:42). The Hebrew text apparently refers to this son as first Mesha then Meresha. 2. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21). 3. A Canaanite city incorporated into the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:44). The city was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8). Mereshah was near the site of the battle between the forces of King Asa and the Ethiopian (Egyptian?) commander Zerah (2 Chron. 14:9–14). Mareshah was home to the prophet Eliezar (2 Chron. 20:37). Micah foretold the destruction of the city (Mic. 1:15). The site has been identified with tell Sandahannah one mile southeast of Beit Jibrin.

MARI An ancient city accidentally discovered by Arab clansmen, and later excavated by French archaeologists under the supervision of André Parrot. Today known as tell el-Hariri, the site is comprised of about 135 acres (after erosion on its northeast sector), is located adjacent to the right (west) bank of the Euphrates river, roughly fifteen miles north of the modern Syrian-Iraqi border. Some thirty archaeological campaigns have unearthed city walls and various temples and palaces that date from about 3100 B.C. to 1760, when the city was demolished by Hammurabi of Babylon, never again to rise to a stature of prominence. See Hammurabi.

Located about midway between the great powers of Sumeria (Kish, Ur, Akkad) and Syro-Mesopotamia (Ebla, Aleppo), Mari played a significant role in the flow of trade as early as the third millennium, though, to judge from the documents which have already been published from this era, the city experienced a dependent status to these more powerful neighbors. By about 1800, no fewer than four trading routes converged on the city; the city's geographical and commerical horizons stretched from Iran in the east to the Mediterranean and Aegean in the west, including Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, Israel, and the Arabian desert. From such an enviable position, the kingdom of Mari played a crucial role in the international trade of timber, stone, wool, resin, garments, furniture, royal horses, wine, olive and sesame oils, myrtle, copper, lapis-lazuli and perhaps most importantly, tin—an essential component in the forging or casting of bronze.

For about 25 years immediately prior to its destruction by Hammurabi, Mari experienced a "golden age" under its king Zimri-Lim. This era in Mesopotamian history has been compared by one noted historian to the age of Pericles in Greek history or of Caesar Augustus in Rome. For Mari it became a period of unsurpassed greatness in material prosperity, and its cultural remains have been matched by few sites in the neighboring areas of the Ancient Near East.

The opulent prosperity in which Mari indulged is unmistakably etched into the remains of the magnificent palace of Zimri-Lim. Encompassing a nine-acre rectangular plot and containing more than 300 rooms, this palatial estate is one of the largest and best preserved buildings in all of Mesopotamian history. The excavators uncovered interior walls as thick as thirteen feet and standing as high as sixteen feet; lintels in some doorways were still intact. Apparently a two-story edifice, the palace was constructed to include many large open courts surrounded by a constellation of rooms that were interconnected by high doorways, thereby permitting ventilation and light to penetrate throughout a ground floor in which there were no windows. Floors were usually plastered or tiled; walls were plastered and frequently adorned with ornate sculpture or painting, and wood was used decoratively to add aesthetic luster.

Exhumed from this palace was Mari's greatest legacy of all: the royal archives. Embodying more than 25,000 texts and fragments, this documentation addresses almost every aspect within a culture: internal politics, international affairs, diplomacy and treaties, domestic policy, commerce and trade, agriculture, irrigation, law and jurisprudence, political intrigue, and religion. In point of fact, Zimri-Lim's reign is presently the most heavily documented of any king in antiquity, even including personal correspondence between himself and his wife, his daughters, his local administrators, and his territorial functionaries. His archive contains hundreds of bureaucratic registers which detail in a most graphic way certain aspects of daily life in a Mesopotamian court: where and how the king worshiped and his temples were serviced; where, what, and how often the king ate or was luxuriated; how courtiers were selected for the court or enticing female dancers were selected for the royal harem; what were various forms of entertainment for the court and/or visiting dignitaries; where, how far, and how frequently did the king journey; how was royalty attired.

Mari's bearing on biblical studies is significant, if indirect. Documentation from Mari has opened the historical, geographical, and social dimension of Northern Mesopotamia, the homeland of the biblical patriarchs. Certain patriarchal behavior attested in the writings of Moses may be seen to be reflected in the literature of Mari. This includes the prominence of the firstborn within family structure, the legal procedures entailed in adoption or formalizing inheritance, the centrality and interdependence of the clan as a model for social structuring, the notion of tribal or ethnic movement of peoples and the relocation and resettlement in a new area, the importance of genealogical registers similar to those of Genesis 5 and 11 as a means of establishing personal or clan authority, the prominent role and the forms of ritual in religious practices, the procedures for census taking, and the nature of prophets and prophecy. Mari's literary sources contribute to a richly-textured reconstruction of Mesopotamian history during the early patriarchal period, just as they often provide linguistic elucidation of certain biblical concepts (compass points, tribal terms and leadership, flora and fauna, military terms).

MARK, JOHN Early missionary and church leader; author of second Gospel. He was the son of Mary in whose home the Jerusalem believers met to pray when Peter was imprisoned by Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:12). Mark was sometimes called by his Jewish name, John, and sometimes by his Roman name, Mark.

John Mark was kin to Barnabas (Col. 4:10). After Barnabas and Saul completed a relief mission to

The south city gate (possibly Hellenistic) at Perga of Pamphylia, the port from which Mark returned home.

Jerusalem, they took Mark with them when they returned to Antioch (Acts 12:25). When Barnabas and Saul went as missionaries, they took Mark to help (Acts 13:5). They went from Antioch to Cyprus and then on to Pamphylia, where Mark left them and returned to Jerusalem (Acts 13:13). The most likely reason was because Paul had become the dominant missionary and was taking the gospel to Gentiles (Acts 13:4–12). Later, when Paul and Barnabas planned another journey, Barnabas wanted to take Mark. When Paul refused, Barnabas and Mark went together while Paul and Silas went together (Acts 15:36–40).

When Paul wrote Philemon, Mark was one of Paul's fellow workers who sent greetings (Philem. 24). Paul wrote to the Colossians to receive Mark if he came to them (Col. 4:10). When Paul wrote his final letter to Timothy, he asked Timothy to bring Mark with him because Paul considered Mark a useful helper (2 Tim. 4:11).

Peter referred to Mark as his "son," and sent greetings from him near the end of his first letter (1 Pet. 5:13).

MARK, THE GOSPEL OF The second book of the New Testament and the shortest account of the ministry of Jesus.

Author The title "according to Mark" was added to this Gospel by scribes who produced the earliest copies of the Gospel. According to early church tradition, Mark recorded and arranged the "memories" of Peter, thereby producing a Gospel based on apostolic witness. Although Mark was a common Roman name, the gospel writer is probably John Mark. Mark became an important assistant for both Paul and Peter, preaching the good news to Gentiles and preserving the gospel message for later Christians. See Mark, John.

Readers Mark wrote his Gospel for Gentile Christians. He explains Jewish customs in detail for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with Judaism (7:3–4; 12:18). Mark translated several Aramaic expressions for a Greek-speaking audience (5:41; 7:11,34; 15:22). Gentiles would have especially appreciated Mark's interpretation of the saying of Jesus which declared all foods clean (7:19; compare with Matt. 15:17–20). Mark's Gentile audience may explain his omission of the genealogy of Jesus. Perhaps these Gentile readers were Roman Christians. Mark's Gospel contains many terms borrowed from Latin and written in Greek, consider "taking counsel" (3:6), "Legion" (5:9), "tribute" (12:14), "scourged" (15:15).

Early Christian tradition placed Mark in Rome preserving the words of Peter for Roman Christians shortly before the apostle's death (see 1 Pet. 5:13). According to tradition, Peter was martyred in Rome during the Neronian persecution, which would place the date of Mark's Gospel about A.D. 64 to 68. Such a hostile environment motivated Mark to couch his account of the life of Jesus in terms that would comfort Christians suffering for their faith. The theme of persecution dominates the Gospel of Mark (see Mark 10:30; compare Matt. 19:29; Luke 18:29). Jesus' messianic suffering is emphasized to inspire Christians to follow the same path of servanthood (10:42–45). Roman Christians would be encouraged knowing that Jesus anticipated that "everyone shall be salted with fire" (9:49; see 13:9–13). Dying for the gospel would be equivalent to dying for Jesus (8:35; Matt. 16:25; Luke 9:24).

Style Mark has been called the "gospel of action." One of his favorite words in telling the story of Jesus is "immediately." Jesus is constantly on the move. In one day, according to Mark, Jesus instructed the multitudes by the sea, traveled across the sea of Galilee and calmed the storm, healed the Gerasene demoniac, crossed the sea again, healed the woman with a hemorrhage, and raised a little girl from the dead (4:1—6:1). Mark apparently had more interest in the work of Jesus than in the words of Jesus. Thus he omitted the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus taught as He moved from region to region, using the circumstances of His travel as valuable lessons for His disciples (8:14–21). Geographical references serve only to trace the expansive parameters of His ministry. According to Mark's "motion" picture, Jesus moved quickly—as if He were a man whose days were numbered.

Good storytellers captivate audiences by using everyday language which provokes strong imagery. Mark's language is simple, direct, and common. His sometimes rough and unrefined Greek grammar facilitates his ability to communicate the gospel message by using familiar patterns of speech. When Mark told a story, he possessed a flair for the dramatic and an eye for detail. His description of events was replete with vivid images which evoke a variety of emotions in just one story (see 5:1–20; compare Matt. 8:28–34). In the graphic account of Jesus' encounter with the demoniac boy, only Mark recorded the child's convulsion which caused him to fall on the ground, and roll "around, foaming at the mouth" (9:20, 26 NIV). Furthermore, Mark preserved Jesus' interrogation of the father as to the severity of the boy's condition and the depth of his own faith (9:21–24). Finally, only Mark recorded the actual words of Jesus' rebuke as well as the reaction of the crowd to the boy's lifeless body: "He's dead!" (9:25–26, NIV).

Mark's concern for detail, sometimes to the point of redundancy (see Mark 6:49–50 NIV, "when they saw Him . . . because they all saw Him . . . He spoke to them and said"), demonstrates his reliance upon eyewitness testimony. Mark was careful to relate not only the words of Jesus, but also His gestures, attitudes, and emotions (3:5; 6:34; 7:34; 8:12; 11:16). In the same fashion, Mark recorded the reaction of the crowds, facial expressions of conversationalists, conclusions drawn by the disciples, and private remarks made by opponents (5:40; 10:22,32,41; 11:31; 14:40). Only an observant insider would relate stories with such pertinent information. Furthermore, the prominent role of Peter in the narrative (Peter remembered, 11:21; see also 1:36; 14:37; 16:7) confirms early Christian tradition that Mark relied upon the recollections of the apostle when he produced "the gospel of Jesus Christ" (1:1).

Form Upon first reading, the Gospel of Mark appears to be an arbitrary collection of stories about Jesus. After the Baptist fulfilled his role as the forerunner to the Messiah (in a very brief appearance), Jesus began His public ministry in Galilee by preaching the "gospel of God" and collecting a few disciples (1:14–20). With these necessary introductions completed, Mark presented the life of Jesus by following a simple geographical scheme: from Galilee to Judea. The popular Galilean ministry of Jesus is recorded in chapters 1—9. The brief Judean ministry (10:1–31) serves primarily as a prelude to the approaching passion of Jesus. Over one-third of Mark's Gospel is devoted to describing the events of the last week in the life of Jesus (10:32—15:47). The story ends as abruptly as it began; Mark finished his Gospel account with the angelic announcement of the resurrection of Jesus the Nazarene (the earliest Greek manuscripts of the New Testament end Mark's Gospel at 16:8). Mark's chronology of Jesus leaves the reader with the impression that his only purpose in writing a Gospel was to preserve the oral tradition in written form. However, upon closer inspection, it becomes apparent to the observant reader that Mark arranged the material in a more sophisticated fashion to convey truth on a higher level.

The stories of the cleansing of the Temple and the cursing of the fig tree appear as isolated incidents in Matthew's Gospel, connected by chronological sequence (Matt. 21:12–22). In the Gospel of Mark, on the other hand, these two stories are interwoven to aid the reader in interpreting the parabolic activity of Jesus. Along the way to Jerusalem Jesus indicated to His disciples that He was hungry and approached a fig tree to harvest its fruit. The tree was full of leaves, giving every indication of life; but it possessed no fruit. Mark recorded that Jesus "answered" the tree and announced, May "no man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever" (11:14). The disciples, who "heard him," must have been puzzled by Jesus' actions, for Mark recorded that "it was not the season for figs" (11:13, NIV). Without explanation, Jesus led His disciples into Jerusalem where he cleansed the Temple. From a distance the daily activity of the Temple gave every indication of spiritual life, but upon closer inspection Jesus found no spiritual fruit. Israel, the fig tree, was supposed to provide a "house of prayer for all the nations" (11:17, NIV). Instead, the religious leaders turned the devotion of worshipers into financial profit (11:15,17). In essence, when Jesus "answered" the fig tree, he pronounced a curse on the Jewish religious leadership and demonstrated His divine displeasure by cleansing the Temple. In word and deed, Jesus prophesied that God would no longer use Israel as the vehicle of salvation for humanity. It should have come as no surprise, then, for Peter and the disciples, during their return trip, to find the cursed fig tree dead (11:21). By purifying the Temple, Jesus marked the death of Judaism, caused His own death (11:18), and gave birth to a religion for all people. The Gentile readers of Mark's Gospel would have especially appreciated the significant arrangement of these two stories.

Mark's Gospel is not just a collection of stories about Jesus; his book tells the story of Jesus as a whole. Mark developed the unifying "plot" of the gospel story by unveiling the hidden identity of Jesus. The messianic secret is part of the mystery of the kingdom of God, understood only by insiders—"to them that are without all these things are done in parables" (4:11,33–34). Throughout Mark's Gospel, Jesus made every attempt to conceal His true identity. Jesus silenced demonic profession because they knew Him (1:34). He ordered those who witnessed miracles not to tell anyone what they saw, although silence was only a remote possibility (7:36). Even after the climactic profession of faith, when the disciples revealed that they had learned the secret ("Thou art the Christ"!), Jesus swore His followers to secrecy (8:39–30). Mark used the messianic secret to organize his story around the progressive revelation of Christ and the faith pilgrimage of His disciples. Even Gentiles demonstrated that they belonged to the community of faith when they understood Jesus' parables and recognized Him as the Christ.

The literary form of Mark's Gospel is no accident. The arrangement of the gospel material gives every indication that a skilled literary craftsman has been at work. For example, Mark found irony in pairing the story of the disciples questioning the identity of Jesus after the stilling of the storm, "What manner of man is this?" (4:41) with the account of the demons who are quick to shout, "Jesus, thou son of the most high God" (5:7). When the disciples finally offered their superlative confession of faith at Caesarea Philippi (8:27–30), they failed to understand the full implications of Jesus' messiahship (8:31–38). Mark depicted their partial spiritual vision by recording the unique miracle of Jesus healing the blind man in two stages (8:22–25). Although the disciples saw the messianic secret, their vision would not be focused until the resurrection. Beyond doubt, Mark's portrait of Jesus is a "painting" which can be appreciated both up close (style) and from a distance (form).

Message Jesus' favorite self-designation, especially in Mark, was "Son of Man." In Mark's Gospel, Jesus is identified with humanity in title and in kind. Mark portrayed Jesus as a Man possessing every human emotion. Moved by compassion, anger, frustration, mercy, and sorrow (1:41; 3:5; 8:17; 14:6,33), Jesus ministered among His own kind. Mark offered the full humanity of Jesus without reservation (see 3:21; 4:38; 6:3–6; 13:32); from the beginning of His earthly ministry (2:20), Jesus lived in the ominous shadow of the cross until the agony of Gethsemane almost overwhelmed Him (14:34). However, Mark penned a Gospel which was also designed to evoke faith in the deity of Jesus: the divine voice announced it from heaven, demons screamed it in agony, Peter professed it boldly, even a Roman soldier acknowledged, "Truly this man was the Son of God!" (15:39).

Outline

I. God Has Acted for His People by Sending His Son as His Agent (1:1–13).
  A. God fulfilled the words of His prophets (1:1–3).
  B. God announced His action through the herald in the wilderness (1:4–8).
  C. God's endorsement of Jesus as His beloved Son showed He is the promised Lord (1:9–11).
  D. God sustained His Son in the experience of testing in the wilderness (1:12–13).

II. The Appearance of God's Son as His Agent Signaled the Presence of the New Age (1:14–45).
  A. God's Agent announced the presence of the new age (1:14–15).
  B. The call to become fishers of men was a consequence of the presence of the new age (1:16–20).
  C. The unique authority of God's Agent demonstrated the presence of the new age (1:21–28).
  D. Healing through God's Agent revealed the saving character of the new age (1:29–34).
  E. The urgency of preaching was consistent with the presence of the new age (1:35–39).
  F. The healing of a leper was evidence of the powers of the new age (1:40–45).

III. The Old Order Failed to Recognize God's Agent or the Presence of the New Age (2:1–3:6).
  A. The old order failed to recognize that Jesus had authority to forgive sins (2:1–12).
  B. The old order resented God's Agent for forgiving outcasts and sinners (2:13–17).
  C. The old order failed to understand fasting was inappropriate when God's Agent was present (2:18–22).
  D. The old order failed to recognize that God's Agent was the Lord of the sabbath (2:23—3:5).
  E. The old order displayed hardness of heart when it schemed to destroy God's Agent (3:6).

IV. The Presence of God's Agent Provoked a Reaction from Others (3:7—6:6).
  A. Crowds followed God's Agent to receive the blessings of the new age (3:7–10).
  B. Unclean spirits recognized the threat posed by the presence of God's Agent (3:11–12).
  C. God's Agent appointed the twelve to express His unique authority (3:13–19).
  D. God's Agent was regarded by His family as deranged (3:20–21).
  E. God's Agent was regarded by the old order as demonic (3:22–30).
  F. God's Agent identified His true family as those who do God's will in the new age (3:31–35).
  G. God's Agent used parables to clarify the character of the new age (4:1–34).
  H. When God's Agent subdued the hostile power of the sea, the reaction was awe (4:35–41).
  I. When God's Agent extended the salvation of the new age to the Gentiles, the reaction was both terror and gratitude (5:1–20).
  J. When God's Agent subdued the powers of disease and death, the reaction was fear and amazement (5:21–43).
  K. When God's Agent addressed those who knew Him well, the reaction was contempt and unbelief (6:1–6).

V. God's Agent Extended the Blessings of the New Age in Spite of Opposition (6:7–8:30).
  A. God's Agent extended the blessings of the new age through the twelve, warning them to expect opposition (6:7–13).
  B. The murder of the herald of the new age anticipated the death of God's Agent (6:14–29).
  C. God's Agent provided rest in the wilderness as a blessing of the new age (6:30–44).
  D. God's Agent provided relief to those who obey Him as a blessing of the new age (6:45–52).
  E. God's Agent provided healing for those who seek Him as a blessing of the new age (6:53–56).
  F. God's Agent challenged the old order traditions with enduring commandments (7:1–23).
  G. God's Agent extended new age blessings to believing Gentiles (7:24—8:10).
  H. God's Agent experienced the old order's opposition in their demand for a sign (8:11–13).

I. The twelve failed to understand the significance of the blessings of the new age (8:14–21).
J. God's Agent opened blind eyes as a sign of the new age (8:22–26).
K. Jesus was recognized as God's Agent, the mediator of the blessings of the new age (8:27–30).

VI. God's Agent Exhibited the New Age Paradox: Suffering Precedes Vindication (8:31—10:52).
A. God's Agent must experience suffering prior to vindication by resurrection (8:31–33).
B. New age people participate in the paradox: the way to life is through death (8:34–38).
C. The transfiguration provides assurance: vindication will follow suffering (9:1–8).
D. Both the herald and the Agent of the new age exhibited the pattern of suffering and rejection followed by vindication (9:9–13).
E. The powers of the new age are released through faith and prayer (9:14–29).
F. The paradox of the new age that suffering precedes vindication is reaffirmed (9:30–32).
G. The paradox of the new age is that greatness is expressed through humble service (9:33–41).
H. The fact of the new age accounts for the stringent requirements of discipleship (9:42–50).
I. The creation intention of God for marriage is reaffirmed in the new age (10:1–12).
J. Entrance into the new age is through childlike faith (10:13–16).
K. Entrance into the new age requires sacrificial commitment (10:17–31).
L. The paradox of the new age is reaffirmed (10:32–45).
M. True discipleship responds immediately to the blessings of the new age (10:46–52).

VII. The Presence of God's Agent in Jerusalem Intensified the Conflict between the Old Order and the New Age (11:1—12:44).
A. The significance of the entrance of God's Agent into Jerusalem was unrecognized (11:1–11).
B. The presence of God's Agent in Jerusalem introduced judgment on the old order (11:12–25).
C. The authority of God's Agent was challenged by representatives of the old order (11:27–33).
D. God's Agent taught of His transcendent dignity (12:1–12).
E. The wisdom of God's Agent was challenged by representatives of the old order (12:13–27).
F. God's Agent was vindicated by His teaching on the greatest commandment (12:28–34).
G. God's Agent exposed the inability of the old order to understand Scripture (12:35–37).
H. God's Agent exposed the hypocrisy of the old order (12:38–40).
I. God's Agent presented a proper response to the presence of the new age (12:41–44).

VIII. God's Agent Foresaw Impending Distress for Jerusalem and the Old Order (13:1–37).
A. God's Agent foresaw the impending destruction of the Temple (13:1–4).
B. God's Agent warned of deception through those who falsely claim to act for God (13:5–8).
C. God's Agent warned of impending persecution and called for steadfastness (13:9–13).
D. God's Agent warned of the sacrilege that causes desolation (13:14–23).
E. God's Agent looked beyond the impending distress to triumph for His people (13:24–37).

IX. The Old Order Was Unified in Its Action Against God's Agent (14:1—15:47).
A. Representatives of the old order determined to seize God's Agent (14:1–2).
B. God's Agent was anointed for His burial (14:3–9).
C. God's Agent was denied by one of the twelve who agreed to betray Him (14:10–11).
D. God's Agent announced His betrayal during the Passover meal (14:12–21).
E. God's Agent provided His own symbol of the new age (14:22–26).
F. God's Agent foresaw the failure and denial of His own followers (14:27–31).
G. God's Agent affirmed His submission to the will of God in Gethsemane (14:32–42).
H. God's Agent experienced betrayal and arrest, fulfilling Scripture (14:43–52).
I. God's Agent was condemned, mocked, and brutalized by the old order (14:53–65).
J. The prophecy of Peter's denial was fulfilled (14:66–72).
K. The old religious order joined the political order to condemn God's Agent (15:1–20).
L. God's Agent was crucified as King of the Jews (15:21–37).
M. God's Agent was acknowledged to be

MARKET PLACE The narrow streets and clustered buildings of most towns and villages in ancient Paletine left little room for a public market place. Shops were built into private residences or clustered in the gate area to form bazaars (1 Kings 20:34). Merchants operated booths just inside the city gate or hawked their merchandise outside the gate area in an open space or square. This area also served as a marshaling place for troops (2 Chron. 32:6) and the site for public meetings (Neh. 8:1), victory celebrations (Deut. 13:16), and the display of captives (2 Sam. 21:12).

Herod rebuilt many of the cities of Palestine following the Greek pattern which included open areas for public gathering (Greek: agora). Amidst the shops, children played (Matt. 11:16), day laborers gathered to be hired (Matt. 20:2–3), and Pharisees and other leading citizens wandered, exchanging greetings (Matt. 23:7; Luke 11:43). Paul went to the marketplace (Greek agora) on his visits to Greek cities to speak to the crowd always gathered there (Acts 17:17). He and Silas were also tried by magistrates in the marketplace at Philippi after angering the local merchants (Acts 16:19). Victor H. Matthews

MAROTH (Mā′ rŏth) Place name meaning "bitter" or "bitter fountain." Town in lowlands of Judah which would be attacked as invading armies approached Jerusalem (Mic. 1:12). The town is perhaps identical with Maarath (Josh. 15:59).

MARRIAGE The biblical standard for marriage is a monogamous relationship in which a man and a woman share a lifetime commitment to each other, second only to their commitment to God. It is an unconditional, lifetime commitment. Jesus emphasized God's intention that marriage be a lifetime commitment (Mark 10:5–9; Matt. 19:4–9). He affirmed this as the principle of marriage inherent in divine creation (Gen. 2:24). Paul cited this key principle to show the sinfullness of sexual relations outside marriage (1 Cor. 6:12–20) and to emphasize the importance of self-giving love in marriage (Eph. 5:28). Genesis 2:24 emphasizes the oneness of the marriage relationship and the priority of the relationship over all others, including the relationship of the couple to their parents. Marriage is also for companionship (Gen. 2:18–23). Paul described the kind of mutual submission that should characterize the marriage relationship (Eph. 5:21–33). Although the husband is head of the home, his role is modeled after the role of Christ as Head of the church, who "loved the church and gave Himself for it" (Eph. 5:25).

Sex is one of God's good gifts God's intention is for sexual union to be expressed exclusively within the unique monogamous relationship of marriage. Human sexuality (Gen. 1:27) and sexual union within marriage (Gen. 2:24) were part of God's good creation. Sexual union is for procreation (Gen. 1:28) and also for expressing love within the oneness of marriage (Gen. 2:24; Prov. 5:15–19; 1 Cor. 7:2–5). Although polygamy was practiced by some Old Testament personalities, monogamy was always God's ideal for humanity (Matt. 19:4–5). The New Testament clearly teaches monogamy (1 Cor. 7:2). Adultery is a violation of the commitment inherent in marriage (Ex. 20:14; 1 Thess. 4:2–3; Heb. 13:4). So is any sexual intercourse that does not express the oneness of marriage (1 Cor. 6:12–20). The biblical condemnation of adultery covers such things as communal marriage, mate swapping, and the so-called open marriage. Likewise, homosexuality violates the intended purpose of sex (Lev. 18:22; 20:13; Rom. 1:26–27). Incest also is a violation of the biblical view of sex (1 Cor. 5:1–5).

Marriage and singleness are valid options for Christians. Jesus taught that marriage demands faithfulness within a relationship based on a lifetime commitment (Matt. 19:3–9). When the disciples said that this concept made marriage too demanding, Jesus replied that singleness—whether involuntary or voluntary—has its own demand, abstinence from sexual union (Matt. 19:10–12). Paul acknowledged that marriage is best for many; but, based on his own experience, he recommended singleness to those who wanted to devote all of their energies to Christian work and could forego sexual relationships (1 Cor. 7:7–9,32–35). Neither Jesus nor Paul presented marriage or singleness as a second-class or less holy state than the other.

Christians condemn sexual immorality in all its forms. Sexual sins are serious because they undermine the foundation of family life, the oneness of the marriage relationship; however, such sins are not unforgivable. Jesus sought out and offered forgiveness to persons guilty of sexual sins (Matt. 21:31–32; Luke 7:36–50; John 4:1–42; 8:2–11). Forgiveness does not condone such sins, but does offer a new start with God's help. David's experience shows that even when sexual sins are forgiven, the destructive consequences continue (2 Sam. 12—19). Love demands that followers of Christ seek to help persons caught in the grip of sin, being careful not to become involved in the sin themselves (Gal. 6:1). Persistent immorality is unacceptable behavior for Christians (1 Cor. 5:1–13; 6:12–20).

Christians should marry Christians, but Christians are to strive for a godly home even when this is not the case. The expectation for a Christian to marry another Christian is implicit in Paul's instructions about marrying "only in the Lord" (1 Cor. 7:39), and in his words about not being mismated with unbelievers (2 Cor. 6:14). As important as family relations are, a person's commitment to God takes precedence in those unfortunate situations when the two commitments are in conflict (Matt. 10:37; Luke 9:59–62). A Christian who is married to a non-Christian should seek to maintain the relationship, to raise any children as believers, and to win the unbelieving spouse (1 Cor. 7:12–16; 1 Pet. 3:1–12). There is no evidence that Timothy's father was a believer (Acts 16:1), but his mother passed her faith along to her son (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:14–15).

The biblical ideal is marriage that lasts a lifetime. Christians sometimes must cope with the breakup of a marriage. Because humans do not live up to the high ideals and standards of God, marriages do fail. With the strong biblical emphasis on marriage as a lifetime commitment, divorce poses a real dilemma for Christians. The dilemma of their proper attitude and response is most real for the persons directly involved and for those closest to them, but the dilemma also exists for the larger circle of friends and fellow church members. The Mosaic law allowed a man to divorce his wife but required a bill of divorce for her (Deut. 24:1). This was an advance over a time when a man simply sent his wife away. The writ of divorce was evidence of her release from the marriage and thus her freedom to be married to someone else (Deut. 24:2). Jesus explained Deuteronomy 24:1 as a concession to the hardness of human hearts; but He emphasized God's original intention as reflected in Genesis 1:27 and 2:24 (Mark 10:2–9; Matt. 19:3–9). Two verses in Matthew (5:32; 19:9) state that fornication can be grounds for divorce. Some interpreters believe that these and other relevant pasages in the Gospels (Mark 10:11–12; Luke 16:18) suggest that Jesus especially had in mind persons who divorce a spouse and marry someone else in an attempt to legitimize an adulterous relationship. The case of Herod and Herodias, who had divorced their spouses to satisfy their lust for each other, was notorious in that day. John the Baptist had been in prison for daring to rebuke Herod, and spiteful Herodias successfully plotted John's execution because of this (Mark 6:14–29; Matt. 14:1–12). Paul followed Jesus in emphasizing the permanence of marriage (1 Cor. 7:10–11), but he taught that a Christian was not bound to an unbelieving spouse if the unbeliever insisted on a separation (1 Cor. 7:12–16). Clearly, therefore, the Bible teaches permanence as the ideal; but unfortunately, human hearts are still hard; and divorce for various reasons still happens. The Gospels are filled with examples of how Jesus dealt with persons who were struggling with guilt and failure (Luke 19:1–10; John 8:2–11), including one woman who had been married five times and who was living with a man who was not her husband (John 4:1–42). Where guilt was involved, Jesus did not minimize it; but in every case He acted redemptively. That is, His goal was not to condemn people but to help them begin anew with God's grace and strength.

Marriage after the death of a spouse usually is not questioned; marriage again after a divorce is a difficult issue. Marriage after widowhood is clearly permissible in the New Testament (Rom. 7:2–3). Paul advised single persons and widows to remain unmarried if they could, but he counseled marriage for others (1 Cor. 7:8–9). For example, he advised younger widows to remarry (1 Tim. 5:10–14). Widows are free to remarry, but "only in the Lord" (1 Cor. 7:39). Those who oppose marriage again of divorced persons cite Mark 10:11–12; Luke 16:18; Romans 7:3; and 1 Corinthians 7:10–11. They interpret the statement by Jesus as teaching that divorced persons who marry again are living in adultery. They cite Paul as evidence that the apostle interpreted Jesus in this way. Based on these verses, some pastors refuse to perform a wedding involving a divorced person. Another group emphasizes Jesus' exception clause in Matthew 5:31–32 and 19:9. This clause, "Except it be for fornication," implies that when a married person commits fornication, the spouse is free to secure divorce and to marry another person. Others believe principles inherent in the gospel make marriage again a valid option for divorced persons. They cite the biblical principles of forgiveness and renewal. Those who advocate this position do not believe Jesus intended to establish a legalistic approach to marriage that would condemn every specific remarriage as an adulterous relationship.

Jesus was not a legalist. His interpretation of adultery in Matthew 5:27–28 should warn against being too heavy-handed about similar idealistic sayings. His hard sayings on divorce were intended to emphasize the biblical ideal of marriage as a lifetime commitment and to rebuke those men whose casual attitude towards divorce make a mockery of this ideal. The emphasis in Mark 10:11; Matthew 19:9; and Luke 16:18 is on the husband who divorces his wife and remarries again. This strongly implies that Jesus was talking about a man who divorces his wife to marry someone else. According to this point of view, Paul affirmed Jesus' ideal and cited Jesus as his authority (1 Cor. 7:10–11); however, he acknowledged certain exceptions in trying to apply this ideal (1 Cor. 7:12–16): "But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart, a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases" (1 Cor. 7:15).

Persons who hold this view believe Paul's words imply the possibility of divorce and remarriage. This approach also would leave to each divorced person the choice about marriage again. Such a decision would be based on the same biblical principles that apply to any persons considering marriage, plus the biblical principles of forgiveness and renewal. The former principles include these: companionship (Gen. 2:18), sexual fulfillment (Gen. 2:24; 1 Cor. 7:8–9), distinctive expectations of marriage or singleness (Matt. 19:3–12), parenting goals (Gen. 1:27–28; 1 Tim. 5:14), finding the right kind of person (1 Cor. 7:39).

Difference of interpretation exists about authority and submission in marriage. On the one hand are those who believe that the husband as head of the house has a delegated authority from God over his wife. In this view, the wife's response is submission. On the other side are those whose model is the modern democratic marriage in which the partners are equals in all things. In between are many Christians who advocate a mutual submission in love as the ideal (Eph. 5:21), but also believe the husband has special leadership responsibilities. The key biblical passages in this debate are Ephesians 5:21–32; Colossians 3:18–19; 1 Peter 3:1–7. Advocates of strong male authority interpret these passages in light of the various biblical passages reflecting the husband's authority (1 Cor. 14:34–35; 1 Tim. 2:11–14). Those who take a more moderate view make the following points: Jesus' actions gave women higher status than was accorded by the society of His day (Luke 8:1–3; 10:38–42; John 4:7–30). Paul's more idealistic statements (Gal. 3:28) and actual practice (Acts 16:14–15; 17:4; 18:2–3,18,26; Rom. 16:3–6) indicate that his harder teachings may have been conditioned by specific situations in some first century churches. The admonition to mutual submission in Ephesians 5:21 applies to all the relationships within the church (Eph. 5:25—6:10) and in a Christian marriage (Eph. 5:21–33). Both Paul and Peter's use of submission refers to voluntary submission in a loving relationship, not the forced subjection to authority in a military organization. The biblical references say submit yourself to one another, not subject the other person to yourself (Eph. 5:21–22,24; Col. 3:18; 1 Pet. 3:1). In such a relationship, the husband's role as head is modeled after the self-giving of Christ (Eph. 5:23,25,28–30 ; Phil. 2:1–11; Col. 3:19; 1 Pet. 3:7).

Differences of interpretation exist about the role of husbands and wives in marriage. The Bible presents a tension between two truths: the primacy of persons as persons whether they are male or female (Gal. 3:28) and human sexuality (maleness or femaleness) as an important aspect of human personality (Gen. 1:27). The Bible provides considerable support for traditional roles of husbands and wives; however, the Bible provides examples of a variety of masculine-feminine roles. Martha performed the traditional role of preparing a meal for guests, but Mary played the nontraditional role of learner (Luke 10:38–42). Esau was a hunter, but Jacob liked to cook (Gen. 25:27–29). In the Bible the leaders in home and in society were generally men; but there were exceptions: Deborah was a judge (Judg. 4—5); Lydia was a merchant (Acts 16:14); Priscilla and Aquila seemed to have acted as a team in teaching Apollos (Acts 18:26) and in providing a meeting place for the church (Rom. 16:3–5; 1 Cor. 16:19). Even the ideal wife of Proverbs 31 exercised considerable creativity and initiative in far-ranging projects (Prov. 31:16–20).

MARROW The soft tissue within bone cavities. In Old Testament times, marrow was regarded as among the choicest of foods (Ps. 63:5; Isa. 25:6). Good health was characterized by bones with moist marrow (Job 21:24). To fear the Lord and shun evil is marrow (KJV) or refreshment (NAS, RSV) or nourishment (NIV) to the bones (Prov. 3:8). The image of the dividing of joints and marrow pictures the power of Scripture to penetrate a person's thoughts and motives (Heb. 4:12).

MARS HILL A prominent rise overlooking the city of Athens where the philosophers of the city gathered to discuss their ideas, some of which revolutionized modern thought. Paul discussed religion with the leading minds of Athens on Mars Hill. He used the altar to an "unknown god" to present Jesus to them (Acts 17:22). See Greece.

MARSENA (Mär' sē nà) Aramaic or Persian personal name of uncertain meaning. One of the seven wise men or princes with access to the Persian King Ahaseurus (Esth. 1:13–14; compare Ezra 7:14).

MARSH Tract of soft, wet land (Job 8:11; 40:21). Ezekiel 47:11 refers to the salt marshes surrounding the Dead Sea.

MARSHAL Akkadian loan word for commander of troops (Jer. 51:27 NAS, NRSV; captain, KJV; commander, NIV, REB).

MARTHA (Mär' thà) Personal name meaning "lady [of the house]" or "mistress." Sister of Mary and Lazarus of Bethany and one of Jesus' best-loved disciples. True to her name, Martha is portrayed as a person in charge: she welcomed Jesus as a guest in her home (Luke 10:38); she was concerned with meeting the obligations of a hostess, whether preparing food (Luke 10:40; John 12:2) or greeting guests (John 11:20). Together with Mary, she sent for Jesus when Lazarus was ill (John 11:3). Luke 10:38–42 contrasts Martha's activist discipleship with Mary's contemplative discipleship. The church cannot minister without "Marthas" who are willing to serve alone. Jesus' gentle rebuke serves as a perpetual reminder not to major on minor matters. Jesus must not be neglected in the name of service. In John 11:21–27, Jesus led Martha from an inadequate to a lofty confession. Faced with the realities of death, Martha, however, later doubted (John 11:39). Some interpreters identify Martha as the wife (widow) or daughter of Simon the leper on the basis of harmonization with Matthew 26:6–13 and Mark 14:3–9. The three traditions which involve anointings of Jesus (1. Matt. 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; 2. Luke 7:37–39,44–50; 3. John 21:1–8) present a nearly insurmountable challenge to a harmonizer. A more sound approach is to appreciate each tradition within the context of the Gospel of which it is a part.

MARTYR The transliteration of a Greek word meaning "witness," in particular one who gives his life for a cause. In later usage it was applied to those who died because of their faith in Christ rather than recant. The transliteration was used for these persons and the translation "witness" came to be used for those who testified of Christ but were not put to death.

MARY (Ma' ry) Greek personal name equivalent to Hebrew Miriam, meaning, "rebellious, bitter." See Miriam.

1. Mother of Jesus. Mary seems to have been related to Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, and wife of the priest Zechariah. Elizabeth was also of a priestly family. If "kinswoman" in Luke 1:36 is a reference for family line and not a relationship established by marriage, then Mary's family heritage may have been priestly. Luke presented Mary as a person of great faith prepared to be an agent of God in the birth of the Messiah. In later church tradition, two important theological beliefs focus the significance of Mary. One has to do with what is referred to as "divine maternity," while the other is "virginal conception." Their scriptural orientation is based on Luke 1:34 that details Mary's response to the angel's announcement that she would have a son. Mary questioned how this could be since she did not have a husband. The Greek states, "I am not knowing a man." Some have interpreted the Greek text as making an eternally valid theological statement that her virginity is an on-going state that equals a "perpetual virginity." Matthew 1:24–25 (including, [Joseph] "knew her not until she had borne a son") would seem to challenge the perpetual virginity belief. The Luke text is sufficiently vague as to allow the growth of such doctrine. In contemporary Christianity, the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches embrace these doctrines, while most Protestant churches do not. However, in all cases, Mary is a revered character in Christian tradition who is believed to represent goodness, innocence, and profound commitment to the ways of God.

"Mary's House" in Ephesus where tradition says that Mary the mother of Jesus lived out her last days.

Mary does not play as high a profile in the Gospels as one might expect. The Gospel writers attempted to emphasize Jesus' divine origins at the expense of deemphasizing the importance of His mother. The Gospel of John presents women in an essential place in the public ministry of Jesus, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, functions in such a role. In John 2:1–11, Mary's presence at Jesus' first public miracle of changing water to wine at the marriage at Cana underscores, in a profound manner, that Jesus' destiny challenges all norms, including that of immediate family relationships. The recurring Johannine theological theme of Jesus' "hour" being divinely directed is pointedly made by Mary's presence in the episode (compare Mark 3:31–35; Luke 11:27–28). Mary's presence at the foot of the cross (found only in John 19:25–27) highlights the mother's love. Acts 1:14 indicates that Mary was present, along with other hero figures of early Christianity, in the upper room scene in Jerusalem.

2. Mary Magdalene. Magdala was an important agricultural, fishing, and trade center of ancient Galilee. Mark 16:9 and Luke 8:2 indicate that this Mary, from Magdala, was exorcised of some seven demons. In antiquity, demon possession was an indication of physical or spiritual illness; obviously, Mary Magdalene was quite ill before her encounter with Jesus. Mary eventually became part of an inner circle of supporters of Jesus. She was a witness of His crucifixion (Mark 15:40; Matt. 27:56; John 19:25), burial (Mark 15:47; Matt. 27:61), the empty tomb (Mark 16:18; Matt. 28:1–10; Luke 24:10), and she was a witness of Jesus' resurrection (Mark 16:9; John 20:1–18). A tradition, especially prevalent in western Christianity from about A.D. 500 onward, identified Mary Magdalene with the sinful woman of Luke 7:36–50. The text gives no reason for such an association, as the introduction of Mary in Luke 8 is quite removed topically from Luke 7:36. To confuse the interpretative tradition further, the sinful woman in the anointing scene of Luke 7:36–50 is often identified incorrectly with another Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazrus. On all accounts, no evidence exists that the sinful woman of Luke 7 should be identified as Mary.

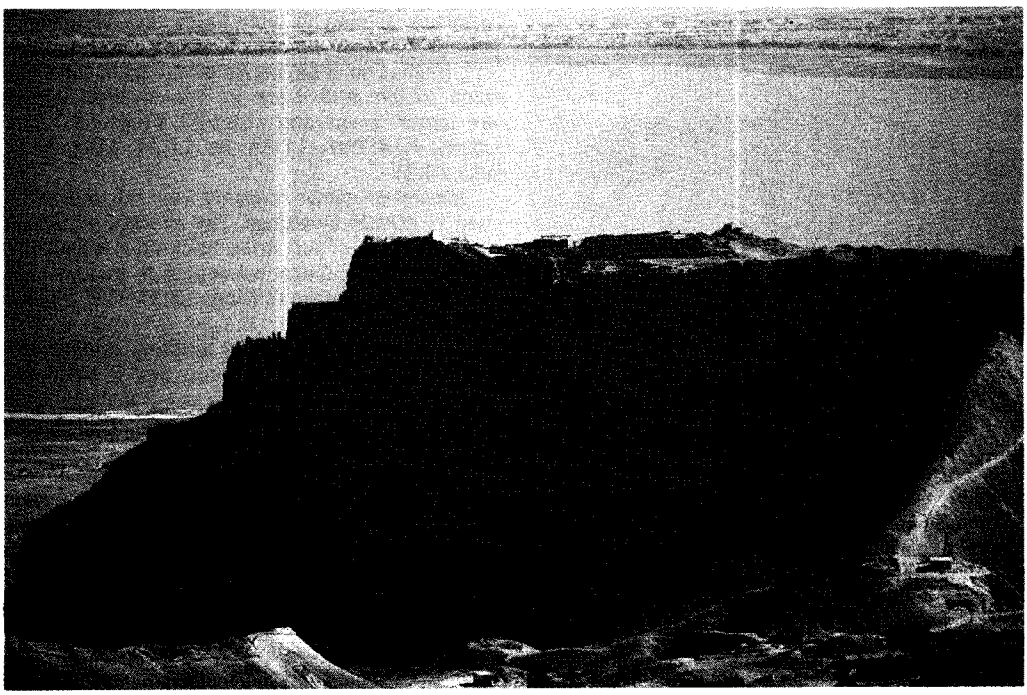
3. Mary (of Bethany), the sister of Martha and Lazarus. Mary, Martha, and Lazarus seem to have been part of an inner circle of Jesus' associates. The Gospel of John places particular emphasis on their select status. Mary from Bethany played a primary role in the episode of Lazarus' resurrection from the dead in John 11. In John 12, Mary anointed Jesus' feet with precious oil, thus serving an important confessional function of anticipating Jesus' death. Given the sequence of John's Gospel, Mary is represented as a follower of Jesus who is well acquainted with Jesus' ultimate destiny (compare Judas, the disciple in John 12:4, who is not as well informed).

4. Mary, the mother of James the younger and of Joses and Salome. This Mary would appear to be part of Jesus' following from Galilee who moved with Him during His itinerant public ministry (compare Mark 15:40–41). She witnessed Jesus' crucifixion and was part of the group of women who encountered the empty tomb (Mark 15:47; 16:1–8; Matt. 27:55–56; 28:1–8; Luke 23:56; 24:1–10).



5. Mary, the mother of John Mark. This woman was the owner of the house in Jerusalem where the first followers of Jesus met (Acts 12:12). Her son, John Mark, eventually became a disciple of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 12:25). See Mark, John.

6. Mary, the wife of Clopas. She witnessed Jesus' crucifixion (John 19:25) and may be the same character as Mary, the mother of James, Joses, and Salome in the Synoptic Gospels accounts.

7. Mary, from Rome. An individual Paul greeted in Romans 16:6. Wayne McCready

MASADA (Mȧ sä' dȧ) A mesa on the western shore of the Dead Sea. It rises about 820 feet above the surrounding valleys and was used as a stronghold between 142 B.C. and A.D. 73. Jonathan Maccabeus first fortified the rock. Herod the Great made it a monument to his building activity. A band of rebellious Jews held it briefly during the first revolt against Rome (A.D. 66–73). After a long struggle to recapture the fortress, the Tenth Legion raised an enormous seige ramp and broke through the walls. They found the bodies of over 900 men, women, and children, victims of a suicide pact to keep the Romans from taking them as prisoners.

MASCHIL (Mäs' chîl) KJV form of Maskil, a term used in the titles of thirteen Psalms (Pss. 32; 42; 44; 45; 52—55; 74; 78; 88; 89; 142). The term is translated psalm in Psalm 47:7. The origin of the term is disputed. Some see a connection with the root "to understand, ponder." Two of the maskils have clear references to instruction (Pss. 32:8–9; 78:1). Others suggest that maskil might be a musical notation or an indication that these psalms were performed at festivals (for example, Ps. 78). Though most of the maskils are laments (Pss. 42; 44; 52; 54; 55; 74; 88; 142), other form critical types are grouped as maskils as well (Ps. 32, a thanksgiving for healing; Ps. 45, a psalm in celebration of a royal wedding; Ps. 78, a recitation of sacred history).

MASH (Māsh) A son of Aram (Gen. 10:23) in Table of Nations and thus original ancestor of Syrian tribal group, possibly from Mount Masius (Tur Abdin) in Northern Mesopotamia or the Mashu mountains of the Gilgamesh epic, probably the Lebanon and anti-Lebanon mountains. The name is copied as Meshech in 1 Chronicles 1:17.

MASHAL (Mā' shăl) 1. City in the tribal territory of Asher later assigned to the Levites (1 Chron. 6:74). At Joshua 19:26; 21:30 the name appears as Misheal (KJV) or Mishal (modern translations). 2. Technical Hebrew term for proverb, parable, simile. See Proverbs, Wisdom.

MASONS Building craftsmen using brick or stone. The professional mason in Israel first appears in the Bible in David's time, though the craft was very ancient and highly developed in Egypt by that time. The Bible suggests that no Israelites were skilled in the art of quarrying, squaring, and setting fine building stones in David's time. David relied upon the king of Tyre for craftsmen (2 Sam. 5:11–12; 1 Chron. 22:2–4,14–18). Under the reign of Solomon, Israelites may have begun to develop this craft (1 Kings 5:18). As professional craftsmen, stone masons were probably members of a guild or trade association such as other tradesmen. Such associations were primarily social organizations, though in later times they could be a political force of concern to rulers (Acts 19:23–41). It was also common for members of the same trade to live and work in one location within the larger towns and cities (2 Kings 18:17; 1 Chron. 4:14; Neh. 11:35; Jer. 37:21; Matt. 27:7; Acts 18:3).

Dressed or ashlar masonry was not ordinarily used in private dwellings. The average man built his own home of sun dried brick on a foundation of field stones. Biblical references to masons thus involve public works (2 Kings 12:11–15; 2 Kings 22:3–8; Ezra 3:7).

Limestone was a primary building stone in the hill country. It was easily cut, and it hardened when exposed to the air. To cut the stone loose from its bed, wooden wedges were driven into triangular slots cut along the line of the split. These wedges were soaked with water. As the wedges expanded, the force split the stone from the bed.

Hammers, punches, and chisels were used to batter and dress the stone followed by rubbing with fine standstone rubbing stones. Blocks could be squared and polished so finely that a blade could not be inserted between the joints.

MASORA (Ma' sō ra) Hebrew term meaning, "tradition," used for note added to the margins of manuscripts of the Masoretic text of the Old Testament as a safeguard to transmission of the text. See Bible, Text and Versions.

MASREKAH (Măs rē' kah) Place name perhaps meaning, "vineyard." City in Edom whose king ruled the Edomites in the period before Israel had kings (Gen. 36:36; 1 Chron. 1:47). The site is perhaps Jebel el-Mushraq about twenty miles south-southwest of Ma'an. Eusebius (around A.D. 300) located Masrekah in Gabalene in northern Edom.

MASSA (Măs' sà) Hebrew term meaning "burden." 1. Seventh son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). 2. Arab tribe perhaps descended from 1. The Mas' a are listed among the peoples who paid tribute to king Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.) of Assyria. The use of Massa in the titles of collections of proverbs (Prov. 30:1; 31:1) probably refers to the nationality of the original compiler. 3. The Hebrew term is used in the special sense of oracle, especially at the beginning of prophecies of judgment (for example, Isa. 13:1; Nah. 1:1; Hab. 1:1).

MASSAH (Măs' sah) Place name meaning, "to test, try." Stopping place during the wilderness wandering near the base of Mount Horeb (Sinai). Moses gave the name in response to the people's desire to put God to the test by demanding water (Ex. 17:7). Massah became a reminder of Israel's disobedience or hardness of heart (Deut. 6:16; 9:22; Ps. 95:8). Massah often appears together with Meribah (meaning "to strive with, contend, find fault with"; Ex. 17:7; Deut. 33:8; Ps. 95:8). Deuteronomy 33:8 gives a poetic account of the origin of the Levitical priesthood at Massah.

MAST Long pole rising from a ship's keel which supports a sail (Prov. 23:34; Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:5). See Ships, Sailors; Navigation.

MASTER Scripture uses master in two basic senses: (1) one in authority and (2) teacher. 1. As one in authority, master applies to slaveholders and to heads of households (which in biblical times frequently included slaves or servants). Greek terms translated master (of servants or a household) include despotēs, kyrios, oikodespotēs (Mark 13:35; Luke 13:25; 14:21; 16:13; Eph. 6:9). 2. KJV regularly translated the Greek didaskalos (teacher) as master in the Gospels (as in Matt. 8:19; 9:11). KJV twice rendered kathēgētsē (guide, teacher) as master (Matt. 23:8,10). KJV sometimes also translated rabbi (rabbi, teacher) and rabboni (my rabbi, my teacher) as master (Matt. 26:25; Mark 9:5; John 4:31). Modern translations render the above terms as teacher or rabbi. Luke often uses epistatēs (manager, chief) where Matthew and Mark have teacher (didaskalos), rabbi, or Lord (for example, Luke 5:5; 8:24,45; 9:33,49; 17:13).

MATHUSALA (Mà thū' sà là) KJV New Testament form of Methuselah, an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:37).

MATRED (Mā trĕd) Personal name possibly meaning, "spear." The Hebrew text understands Matred to be the mother of Mehetabel (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). The earliest Greek and standard Latin translations take Matred to be Mehetabel's father.

MATRI, MATRITES (Mā' trī) The family within the tribe of Benjamin from which Saul came (1 Sam. 10:21).

MATRIX KJV term meaning womb (Ex. 13:12,15; 34:19; Num. 3:12; 18:15).

MATTAN (Măt' tan) Personal name meaning "gift of God." 1. Queen Athaliah's priest of Baal in Jerusalem killed in Jehoiada's purge (2 Kings 11:18).

2. Father of Shephatiah, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer. 38:1).

MATTANAH (Măt' tà nah) Place name meaning, "gift." Stopping place in the wilderness (Num. 21:18–19). The site is perhaps identical with khirbet el-Medeiyineh about twelve miles southeast of Madeba. Pottery shards at that site indicate occupation from before 1,200 to about 800 B.C.

MATTANIAH (Măt tā nī′ ah) Personal name meaning "gift of Yah." 1. Tabernacle musician-prophet in David's time (1 Chron. 25:4). 2. Ancestor of Jahaziel (2 Chron. 20:14). 3. Member of the Asaphite subclan of Levites who participated in Hezekiah's reforms (2 Chron. 29:13). 4. Original name of King Zedekiah of Judah (2 Kings 24:17). 5. Asaphite among the first to return from Exile (1 Chron. 9:15). 6. Levitic leader of the Temple choir in Zerubbabel's time (Neh. 11:17,22). 7. Levitic Temple gatekeeper (Neh. 12:25). 8. Father of the Levite Shemaiah (Neh. 12:35). 9. Grandfather of Hanan (Neh. 13:13). 10.–13. Four of those who returned from Exile with foreign wives (Ezra 10:26,27,30,37). Some of 5—13 may be identical.

MATTATHA (Măt′ tā thā) Grandson of King David and ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:31).

MATTATHIAS (Măt tā thī′ ăs) 1. Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:25–26). 2. Priest whose refusal to obey Antiochus' decree to offer sacrifice initiated the Maccabean revolt (1 Macc. 2). 3. Four high priests from 5 B.C. to A.D. 65. See Intertestamental History; High Priest.

MATTATTAH (Măt′ tăt tah) Personal name meaning, "gift." Layman with foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

MATTENAI (Măt′ tē nâi) Personal name meaning, "my gift." 1. Priestly contemporary of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:19). 2.–3. Two laymen with foreign wives (Ezra 10:33,37).

MATTHAN (Măt′ thăn) An ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:15).

MATTHAT (Măt′ thăt) Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:24,29).

MATTHEW (Măt′ thēw) Personal name meaning "the gift of Yahweh." A tax collector Jesus called to be an apostle (Matt. 9:9; 10:3). See Apostle; Disciples. Matthew's office was located on the main highway that ran from Damascus, down the Jordan Valley to Capernaum, then westward to Acre to join the coastal road to Egypt or southward to Jerusalem. His duty was to collect "toll" or "transport" taxes from both local merchants and farmers carrying their goods to market as well as distant caravans passing through Galilee. He was an employee of Herod Antipas. See Tax Collector. Matthew knew the value of goods of all description: wool, flax, linen, pottery, brass, silver, gold, barley, wheat, olives, figs, wheat. He knew the value of local and foreign monetary systems. He spoke the local Aramaic language as well as Greek. Because Matthew had leased his "toll" collecting privileges by paying the annual fee in advance, he was subjected to the criticism of collecting more than enough, growing wealthy on his "profit." Thus he was hated by his fellow Jews.

Matthew is the same person as Levi, a tax collector (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27), and thus the son of Alphaeus. James the son of Alphaeus is also listed among the Apostles (Mark 3:18; Matt. 10:3; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). This indicates that both Matthew and his (half) brother were in close association with Jesus. Mary, the mother of James, keeps the vigil at the foot of the cross with Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt. 27:55–56; Mark 15:40). If the James mentioned here is the same as the son of Alphaeus, then we have a larger family closely associated with the family of Jesus.

Later legendary accounts tell of Matthew's travel to Ethiopia where he became associated with Candace, identified with the eunuch of Acts 8:27. The legends tell us of Matthew's martydom in that country.

Why did Jesus call Matthew? Because Matthew had the gifts to be trained as a disciple to share with others, could keep meticulous records, and was a potential recorder/author of the Gospel. From earliest times Christians affirmed that Matthew wrote the Gospel that bears his name.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE The Thomas Matthew Bible was a revision of Tyndale's and Coverdale's versions likely prepared by John Rogers in 1537 in Antwerp. See Bible, Translations.

MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL OF The opening book of the New Testament which appropriately begins with the declaration, "the book . . . of Jesus Christ." When we begin reading this book today, we should, however, have in mind its ending (28:18–20). Matthew's purpose was to show that Jesus had the power to command His disciples to spread His gospel throughout all the world.

Matthew 28:16–20 is the scene of the resurrected Jesus meeting His disciples on a hill in Galilee. Jesus immediately declared his absolute authority: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (NIV). The disciples would be reminded of many experiences during Jesus' ministry that proved His authority. Now with this knowledge of the resurrection, it was evident to them that He had received His authority from God. Jesus then gave the disciples a Commission to "make disciples of all nations" (NIV). A disciple is (1) one who willingly becomes a learner of the Master's teaching and seeks to follow His example by implementing His teaching, and (2) who passes on to others what one has learned. Hearing Jesus' command, the disciples recalled His teaching and fellowship. Now they were called on to carry forward His mission. Jesus said they would make disciples as they went away from their meeting with Him. Their activities would include baptizing new disciples into the lordship of Jesus. This is the original commitment. The disciples would pass on to others all that Jesus taught them. In telling this story, Matthew emphasized that Jesus (1) has total authority, (2) His teachings must be transmitted, (3) and His message is for all people. If we, the modern readers, will keep these three themes in mind as we read the Gospel from the beginning, we will discover that the author shows us how Jesus demonstrated His authority, the teachings He employed, and His concern for all nations.

The Gospel is easily divided into seven sections: a beginning and an end with five teaching sections between. Because of this, Matthew has been recognized for its emphasis on the teachings of Jesus.

Matthew 1:1—4:25 opens the Gospel with the royal genealogy and builds to the proclamation of God in 3:17: "This is my beloved Son." The genealogies confirm Jesus' authoritative, kingly lineage and remind the reader of His relation to all nations by mentioning Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and the wife of a Hittite. The wise men (Gentiles) came seeking the King of the Jews (2:2). The angel affirmed Jesus' divine nature to Joseph. The child received a messianic name (1:18–23). Joseph took the holy family to Gentile territory (Egypt) to escape the threats of Herod. When Jesus came to John for baptism, the voice from heaven proclaimed Him as God's Son. As God's Son, Jesus had the authority and power to confront Satan and overcome. Jesus then went to Galilee of the Gentiles (4:15) to begin His public ministry. This opening section makes it obvious that Jesus is designated by God to be the Messiah with authority—for all nations.

Matthew 5:1—7:29 is commonly called the Sermon on the Mount. It should be called the Teaching from the Mount since that is what the text calls it (5:2). While teaching and preaching overlap, teaching emphasizes the essential principles which must be passed on to maintain the discipline or movement at hand. Jesus gave His essential doctrine in this teaching. He stressed the importance of His commandments in 5:19; emphasized the authoritative nature of His teachings by declaring: "But I say unto you" (5:22,28,32,39,44); and was recognized by the crowds as a Teacher with authority (7:28–29). Matthew presented Jesus as an authoritative Teacher. When the disciples went out to teach, they knew what to teach. When a believer goes out to teach today, he can refer to Matthew's Gospel.

Matthew 8:1—10:42 opens with a series of ten miracles demonstrating Jesus' authority over disease, natural catastrophes, demons, and death. What He had demonstrated verbally in the teachings on the Mount, Jesus acted in displays of power. His disciples wondered "that even the winds and sea obey him!" (8:27), and the crowds stood amazed that He had the authority to forgive sins (9:8). Ministry to a Gentile centurion is in this section also. After demonstrating His power, Jesus gave authority to His disciples to go out and heal and teach as He had done (10:1), thus preparing them for their final Commission in 28:18–20. By continuing the emphasis on authority, teaching, and Gentiles, Jesus prepared His immediate disciples for their task after His death. Matthew continues to teach later generations of believers about Jesus' power and concern for all mankind.

Matthew 11:1—13:52 shows various people reacting to Jesus' authority. Various responses are noted in chapter 11, including Jesus' thanksgiving that the "babes" understand (vv. 25–30). When the leaders rejected Jesus' authority in chapter 12, Matthew implied that Jesus would go to the Gentiles by quoting Isaiah the prophet (12:18–21). Jesus continued His teaching in parables to those who were willing to listen (13:10–13). So when Jesus commissioned His disciples to go into all the world and teach, they were aware that he had already begun the movement by His example in His earthly ministry.

Matthew 13:53—18:35 opens with the story of Jesus' teaching in the synagogue in Nazareth. The people had the same response to Jesus' teaching as the crowds did at the end of the Sermon on the mount. They were astonished (compare 13:54; 7:28). Although Jesus presented His authoritative teaching, His hometown people rejected it (13:57). His disciples accepted Him (14:33), and so did the Gentile woman (15:22). Again, Jesus taught authoritatively and related to Gentiles.

Matthew 19:1—25:46 makes the transition from Galilee to Jerusalem. Jesus dramatically presented His kingly authority by His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (21:1–9) and by cleansing the Temple (21:10–17). Then, while He was teaching, the chief priests and elders challenged Him saying, "By what authority doest thou these things?" (21:23). Jesus answered with parables and other teachings (21:28—22:46). Jesus warned the people about the examples of the Pharisees and Sadducees (23:1–38). He then concentrated His teaching only on His disciples (24:1—25:46). They could recall this when He commanded them to teach what He taught. The modern believer must also hear what Jesus taught and teach it to others.

Matthew 26:1—28:20 has no teaching situations, but it tells of the conspiracy ending in Jesus' execution. In the midst of the trial scene Jesus was asked if He was the Messiah. Jesus responded by affirming His authority: "Thou hast said" (26:64). Pilate, a Gentile, recognized, Jesus' kingly authority, placarding over the cross: "THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS" (27:37). The Gentile centurion proclaimed: "Truly this was the Son of God" (27:54). As in the birth story, so in the end, the author stressed Jesus' divine, kingly authority and emphasized the inclusion of the Gentiles.

When the resurrected Lord declared His authority to His disciples in 28:18, they understood because they had seen His authority displayed as they lived with Jesus. When modern readers come to 28:18, they understand because Matthew has shown us Jesus' authority from the beginning. When Jesus commanded His disciples to make other disciples by teaching all that He taught them, they knew what to teach; and we modern believers know what Jesus intended because we know Matthew's record of His teaching. When Jesus included baptizing, they realized it was the sign of commitment to discipleship, and so do we. When Jesus assured His disciples that He would be with them even to the ends of the earth, the disciples understood because already Jesus had included all people in His ministry.

As we read through the seven sections summarized above, we should also note that Matthew presented Jesus as the "Son of God," a term that appears twenty-three times in the Gospel of Matthew. While the virgin birth story affirms Jesus' sonship, the quotation from Hosea 11:1 (Matt. 2:15) confirms it. Twice God proclaimed Jesus' sonship: at His baptism (3:17) and at the transfiguration (17:5). Peter confessed it (16:16). Jesus attested to His sonship in the Lord's prayer (6:9), His thanksgiving to God (11:25–26), and the Garden of Gethsemane (26:39). The author wanted the reader to be aware that Jesus, the Son of God, is the One crucified on the cross; so Jesus called out to "my God" from the cross (27:46), and a Gentile centurion confessed that the dying One is "truly . . . the Son of God" (27:54).

Matthew wanted the reader to be aware that forgiveness of sins comes through the death of the divine Son of God. The angel had told Joseph that Jesus would "save his people from their sins" (1:21). Jesus Himself had assured His disciples that His destiny was "to give his life a ransom for many" (20:28). Jesus left behind a continuing reminder of His role in the forgiveness of sins when He instituted the Lord's Supper. "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (26:28).

It is impossible to know the exact date when the Gospel of Matthew was written. Some contemporary writers date it as early as A.D. 60; some, as late as A.D. 95. The place of writing was probably some place along the coast of Phoenicia or Syria such as Antioch. This is because of Matthew's several references to Gentiles, a reference to Phoenicia and Syria, and the terms (in the Greek text) used for coins (17:24,27). Although the Gospel nowhere identifies the author and many modern Bible students point to a complex history of editing and collecting sources, Matthew, the tax collector, the son of Alphaeus has been identified as the author since the second century. See Matthew.

Outline

I. Jesus' Birth Fulfilled Prophecy (1:1—2:23).
  A. Jesus was born of the line of David (1:1–17).
  B. God directed the circumstances of Jesus' birth (1:18–25).
  C. Even Gentile foreigners worshiped the newborn Jewish king (2:1–12).
  D. God provided for His Son's survival (2:13–23).

II. The Obedient Jesus Invites People to Kingdom Service (3:1—4:25).
  A. Jesus carried out God's will by being baptized by John the Baptist (3:1–15).
  B. God approved His Son (3:16–17).
  C. Jesus obeyed God's Word and defeated Satan (4:1–11).
  D. Jesus called people to God's kingdom through repentance (4:12–22).
  E. Jesus demonstrated the power of the kingdom (4:23–25).

III. Jesus Taught God's Way to Live (5:1—7:29).
  A. Real happiness comes from a right relationship to God (5:1–12).
  B. Christians must be like salt and light (5:13–16).
  C. Love, not legalism, is the rule of the kingdom (5:17–48).
  D. The desire to be seen by others is the wrong motive for good works (6:1–4).
  E. Prayer is private seeking of forgiveness, not public search for praise (6:5–15).
  F. Fasting is of value only if the motive behind it is right (6:16–18).
  G. Only spiritual wealth really lasts (6:19–21).
  H. Each person must choose whether to give God first place (6:22–34).
  I. To judge others is wrong; to show discernment is necessary (7:1–6).
  J. The kingdom requires persistence in prayer and faith in God's goodness (7:7–11).
  K. The Golden Rule summarizes the law and the prophets (7:12).
  L. Only the narrow path of submission to God's will leads to life in His kingdom (7:13–23).
  M. Jesus and His teachings form the only lasting foundation for life (7:24–29).

IV. Jesus' Power and Call Reveal His Authority (8:1—10:42).
  A. Jesus' healing power is available to all persons of faith (8:1–17).
  B. Discipleship is first priority (8:18–22).
  C. Jesus has authority over nature, demons, and sin (8:23—9:8).

D. Jesus calls sinners to share His authority (9:9–13).
E. Jesus' gospel requires new forms of piety (9:14–17).
F. Jesus' authority responds to faith, conquers demons, and does not come from Satan (9:18–34).
G. The compassionate Lord prays for compassionate helpers (9:35–38).
H. Jesus entrusts His disciples with His authority in word and deed (10:1–20).
I. To exercise His authority, disciples must face the dangers Jesus faced (10:21–25).
J. Jesus' authority removes cause for fear (10:26–31).
K. Disciples confess Jesus in all situations (10:32–39).
L. Those who welcome Christian messengers will receive rewards (10:40–42).

V. Jesus' Work Led to Controversy (11:1—12:50).
A. Jesus fulfilled messianic prophecy (11:1–6).
B. John marked the end of the prophetic era (11:7–15).
C. Blind religion seeks controversy rather than truth (11:16–19).
D. Repentance is the proper response to Jesus (11:20–24).
E. Discipleship requires faith in God's Son, not great human wisdom or works (11:25–30).
F. Mercy, not legalism, is the key to interpreting God's Word (12:1–14).
G. Jesus fulfilled Isaiah's servant prophecies (12:15–21).
H. Faith sees Jesus as Messiah, but blindness calls Him satanic (12:22–37).
I. Resurrection faith is the criterion for eternal judgment (12:38–45).
J. Obedient believers form God's family (12:46–50).

VI. Jesus Taught About the Kingdom (13:1–52).
A. Response to the kingdom depends on the "soil" (13:1–23).
B. God delays separating the true from the false (13:24–30).
C. God's kingdom, small at first, will finally transform the world (13:31–33).
D. Jesus' use of parables fulfills Scripture (13:34–35).
E. The Son of Man controls final judgment and will send those who reject Him to eternal punishment (13:36–43).
F. The kingdom is worth any sacrifice (13:44–46).
G. The kingdom involves both traditional and new understandings of Scripture (13:47–52).

VII. Jesus Confronts Conflict and Critical Events (13:53—17:27).
A. Jesus faced rejection and sorrow (13:53—14:12).
B. Jesus placed compassion for others over personal needs (14:13–21).
C. Jesus' power over nature and disease shows He is God's Son (14:22–36).
D. Thoughts and motives, not ritual acts, determine spiritual purity (15:1–20).
E. Faith overcomes all obstacles that would separate us from Jesus (15:21–28).
F. Jesus' compassionate ministry leads people to raise God (15:29–39).
G. Unbelieving authorities demand a sign but cannot interpret ones they have (16:1–12).
H. Confession of Jesus as Messiah and Son of God is the church's foundation (16:13–20).
I. Willingness to suffer with Jesus is as important as proper confessions of faith (16:21–28).
J. God revealed Jesus as His Son, whom people should obey (17:1–13).
K. Faith in God overcomes obstacles (17:14–21).
L. Jesus expected His coming death and resurrection (17:22–23).
M. Concern for others may mean forfeiting one's own rights (17:24–27).

VIII. Jesus Gives Insight into Life in His Kingdom (18:1—20:34).
A. Entrance into the kingdom requires a childlike trust in God (18:1–5).
B. Christians must be careful not to lead others into sin (18:6–7).
C. Radical self-discipline prevents sin (18:8–9).
D. God takes the initiative in finding the lost (18:10–14).
E. Reconciliation must be the Christian's aim (18:15–17).
F. Jesus promises power and authority to His church (18:18–20).
G. God requires that we forgive if He is to forgive us (18:21–35).
H. Lifelong marriage is God's plan for most people, but some can accept single devotion to Him (19:1–12).
I. Children have an important place in God's kingdom (19:13–15).
J. One must give up any obstacle to discipleship, knowing reward will come (19:16–30).
K. God's rewards may be different from human expectations (20:1–16).
L. Jesus taught the necessity of His coming death and resurrection (20:17–19).
M. The truly great person serves others as Jesus did (20:20–28).
N. Those who are healed by His mercy become His followers (20:29–34).

IX. Religious Authorities Reject Jesus as Messiah (21:1—23:36).
- A. Jesus fulfilled messianic prophecy by entering Jerusalem and cleansing the Temple (21:1–17).
- B. God punishes fruitlessness but rewards faith (21:18–22).
- C. Answerless authorities question Jesus' authority (21:23–27).
- D. Authorities must answer the call to repentance to be part of God's kingdom (21:28–46).
- E. God invites even sinners and outcasts to new life in His kingdom (22:1–4).
- F. Taxes belong to the state; we belong to God (22:15–22).
- G. Authorities do not understand Scripture and so do not believe in resurrection (22:23–33).
- H. Authorities must learn love for God and love for neighbor are the greatest commandments (22:34–40).
- I. Authorities must learn the nature of God's Messiah (22:41–46).
- J. Jesus the Authority calls for religious leaders' lives to agree with their teachings (23:1–36).

X. Jesus Has the Authoritative Word About the Future (23:37—25:46).
- A. Jerusalem faces destruction for rejecting Jesus (23:37–39).
- B. The world will hear the gospel before the end of the age (24:1–14).
- C. Jesus' disciples must flee Jerusalem when a sign appears (24:15–28).
- D. Spectacles in nature will mark Jesus' assured return (24:29–35).
- E. People must prepare for Jesus' return or face judgment (24:36—25:30).
- F. Jesus will judge us by our service to those in need (25:31–46).

XI. Jesus Prepared for Death, Obeying God and Fulfilling Scripture (26:1–56).
- A. Authorities plotted Jesus' death, as He had foretold (26:1–5).
- B. Jesus' anointing symbolized His messiahship and coming death (26:6–13).
- C. A disciple cooperated in crucifying Jesus (26:14–16).
- D. Jesus transformed Passover to His memorial supper, establishing His covenant (26:17–30).
- E. Jesus prepared His disciples for their time of falling and restoration (26:31–35).
- F. Jesus dedicated Himself to the Father's will (26:36–46).
- G. Jesus' arrest represented fulfillment of God's plan, not evidence of His weakness or God's forsaking Jesus (26:47–56).

XII. Jesus Conquered Death (26:57—28:20).
- A. The innocent Jesus was convicted on His testimony to His messiahship and to His role as Judge in the last days (26:57–68).
- B. Peter's denial showed Jesus' prophetic powers (26:69–75).
- C. Judas' guilt drove him to suicide and fulfilled Scripture (27:1–10).
- D. Government authority found no guilt in Jesus, but religious authorities accepted full responsibility for His death (27:11–26).
- E. Roman mocking pointed to the truth of Jesus' divine kingship (27:27–44).
- F. Spectacular events pointed to the saving significance of Jesus' death as God's Son (27:45–56).
- G. Jesus' dead body was entombed and could not be stolen (27:57–66).
- H. Jesus was raised from the dead (28:1–10).
- I. Religious leaders bribed people to disprove the resurrection (28:11–15).
- J. The authoritative Jesus gives His disciples a worldwide evangelistic mission (28:16–20). Oscar Brooks

MATTHIAS (Măt thī' ăs) Shortened form of Mattathias ("gift of Yah.") Disciple who followed Jesus from the time of John's ministry of baptism until Jesus' ascension, who was chosen by lot and prayer to succeed Judas as an apostle and official witness to the resurrection (Acts 1:20–26). This selection was regarded as necessary to fulfill Scripture concerning the band of apostles (Ps. 69:25; Acts 1:20). Scripture mentions nothing further about Matthias. See Disciples; Acts.

MATTITHIAH (Măt tĭ thī' ah) Personal name meaning, "gift of Yah." 1. Levite whom David appointed a Tabernacle musician with special responsibility for leading lyre music (1 Chron. 15:18,21; 25:3,21). Mattithiah also ministered before the ark (1 Chron. 16:5). 2. Levite baker (1 Chron. 9:31). 3. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:43). 4. Man standing beside Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh. 8:4).

MATTOCK See Tools, Agricultural Tools.

MAUL KJV term for a club (NAS, NIV, REB) or warclub (RSV) at Proverbs 25:18. See Arms and Armor.

MAUNDY THURSDAY See Holy Week; Church Year.

MAW KJV term for the fourth stomach of a cud-chewing animal. The maw was among the choice cuts of meat reserved for the priests' portion (Deut. 18:3). Modern translations use stomach (NAS, REB, NRSV) or innerparts (NIV).

MAZZAROTH (Măz' zå rŏth) Puzzling term in Job 38:22. Either a proper name for a particular constellation (so KJV, NRSV), a collective term for the twelve signs of the Zodiac (KJV margin, REB), or a general term meaning constellation or stars (NAS, NIV, TEV; compare 2 Kings 23:5).

MEADOW Tract of grassland, especially moist, low-lying pasture. The KJV used meadow at two passages. At Genesis 41:2,18, the reference is clearly to stretches of reed grass or papyrus thickets common along the Nile. The term rendered meadow in the phrase "meadows of Geba" (Judg. 20:33, KJV) is obscure. The NAS simply transliterates the phrase (Maareh-geba). In modern translations rich meadows illustrate God's blessing (Ps. 65:13, NAS, NIV, NRSV; Isa. 30:23; 44:4, NIV). Meadows are also used in pictures of God's judgment (Jer. 25:37; Hos. 4:16, NIV; Hos. 9:13, NAS; Zeph. 2:6, NRSV).

MEAH, TOWER OF (Mē' ah) KJV transliteration of a Hebrew phrase meaning "Tower of the Hundred" (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). See Hundred, Tower of the.

MEAL OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering, Grain Offering.

MEALS See Banquet; Food.

Dining area in villa in Pompeii with spaces for several persons to be seated while eating their meal.

MEARAH (Mė ā' rah) Place name meaning, "cave." Part of the territory left unconquered following Joshua's conquest. The site is perhaps the caves called Mughar Jezzin located east of Sidon (Josh. 13:4).

MEASURING LINE A cord used to measure length (compare 1 Kings 7:15,23; 2 Chron. 4:3). References to a measuring line point to the restoration of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:39; Zech. 2:1; compare Ezek. 47:3).

MEASURING REED Ezekiel's measuring reed was a cane about 10 feet long used as a measuring tool (Ezek. 40:3,5,6,7,8; compare Rev. 21:15–16). See Weights and Measures.

MEAT In modern English, meat refers to animal tissue used as food, frequently in contrast to plant products. Modern translations use meat in this sense, where KJV used the term "flesh" (for example, Num. 11:4–33; Judg. 6:19–21; 1 Sam. 2:13,15). KJV used meat in two senses: (1) for food, especially solid food in contrast to drink (for example, 1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12,14); and (2) for a meal, especially the evening meal (for example, 1 Sam. 20:5; Matt. 26:7). The KJV used meat in the general sense of food about 250 times. The context frequently indicates that flesh is not in view (Gen. 1:29,30; Ezek. 47:12; Hab. 3:17). A special case of the use of meat to mean food is the frequent use of the term "meat offering" (about 130 times in the Old Testament). Here "meat offering" means food offering in contrast to a libation (drink offering). Modern translations render the expression as cereal or grain offering. Modern translations, for example NRSV, frequently replace the KJV's meat with a more specific term in light of the context: provisions (Gen. 45:23); scraps [of food] (Judg. 1:7); present (2 Sam. 11:8); meager fare (2 Sam. 12:3); solid food (1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12). KJV also used meat in the sense of a meal. Modern translations generally replace the KJV's "sit at meat" with "sit at table" which means to take a meal (1 Sam. 20:5; Matt. 9:10; 26:7; Mark 2:15). "To come to meat" (1 Sam. 20:27) is to come to supper. A "morsel of meat" (Heb. 12:16) is "a single meal" (NRSV).

MEAT OFFERING KJV term used about 130 times in the Old Testament for a food offering in contrast to a drink offering (libation). Modern translations render the term grain offering. See Sacrifice and Offering.

MEAT TO IDOLS Offerings of animal flesh sacrificed to a god. Most religions of the Ancient Near East had laws regarding offering sacrifices to the god(s). Israel's laws are in Leviticus 1–8,16–17. Part of the ritual was for the people to eat some of the sacrifice. They believed that God and the people became closer by partaking of the same animal. Since most early Christians had Jewish backgrounds, a problem arose in the church when Gentile converts ate meat that had been offered to idols. The Jerusalem council decided that Christians should abstain from eating meat offered to idols so as not to cause weak believers to stumble. Paul echoed this sentiment in 1 Corinthians 8:13.

MEAT, UNCLEAN See Clean, Cleanness.

MEBUNNAI (Mė bŭn' naî) Personal name meaning, "building of Yah." One of David's thirty elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:27). The name possibly resulted from scribal confusion of the first and third letters in the Hebrew name Sibbecai which replaces Mebunnai in the parallel lists (1 Chron. 11:29; 27:11).

MECHERATHITE (Mĕ chē′ rā thīte) The title of Hepher, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:36). Mecherathite means inhabitant of Mecherah. The site is unknown unless it is to be identified with Maacah (2 Sam. 23:34).

MECONAH (Mĕ cō′ nah) Form of Mekonah preferred by modern translations.

MEDAD (Mē′ dăd) Personal name meaning, "beloved." Israelite layman who prophesied in the wilderness camp (Num. 11:26–27). See Eldad.

MEDAN (Mē′ dăn) Personal name meaning "judgment." Third son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32) and ancestor of a little-known Arab tribe. The Medan should perhaps be identified with the Badan, a people conquered by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (732 B.C.). Others argue for textual corruption of the term Media.

MEDEBA (Mē′ dĕ bà) Place name meaning "water of quiet." City in Transjordan on the main north-south road (the King's Highway) about 25 miles south of Amman. The strategic importance of Medeba is indicated by frequent references to its changing hands. Sihon King of the Amorites took Medeba from Moab only to have the area pass into Israel's control (Num. 21:24,26,30). Medeba was included in Reuben's tribal allotment (Josh. 13:9,16). According to the Moabite stone, Omri King of Israel (885–874 B.C.) recaptured Medeba. Mesha King of Moab retook the city during the reign of Omri's son. An alliance of Israel, Judah, and Edom recaptured the city but quickly withdrew (2 Kings 3:25,27). Jeroboam II again secured control of the city of Israel (2 Kings 14:25). Isaiah 15:2 reflects the city's return to Moab. The site of Medeba is that of the modern city of Madeba.

MEDES, MEDIA (Mēdes, Mē′ dĭ à) The region south and southwest of the Caspian Sea in the Zagros Mountains inhabited by the Medes, an Aryan people from north and west of the Caspian Sea. It is north of Elam and west of Assyria. The traditional capital of the region was Ecbatana.

Before 1500 B.C. the region was part of the Mitanni kingdom. Later the Elamites controlled the region and its nomadic inhabitants. The people known as the Medes entered the area over a long period between 1400 and 1000 B.C.

The Medes were first reported in history by the Assyrian Shalmaneser III about 850 B.C. They were a group of nomadic tribes rather than a state or kingdom. The Assyrians controlled them or sought to for more than 200 years, though the Medes enjoyed some periods of freedom before the Scythians conquered them in 653 B.C.. Sometime before this, Deioces were united and organized the Medes. Despite the the Scythians' invasion, the Medes continued to develop as a kingdom.

The greatest Median king was Cyaxares (625–585 B.C.). He was the third ruler of the united Medes and was able to defeat the Scythians. Afterwards, Cyaxares turned his attention to the Assyrians, attacking Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. Before Nineveh fell in 612 B.C., Cyaxares conquered Asshur, the ancient center of the Assyrian Empire. Then, with the aid of the Scythians and Babylonians and others, Nineveh was taken. The end of the Assyrian Empire was near.

Babylon and Media divided the Assyrian Empire with Media taking the land east and north of the Tigris River. Nebuchadnezzar II and Cyaxares' grandaughter wed to seal the pact. The Medes turned their attention to the north and toward Asia Minor. After a five-year war with Lydia, Cyaxares concluded a peace in 584 B.C., again sealing it with a marriage. His son Astyages married the daughter of the Lydian king. Astyages became king of the Medes when Cyaxares died.

The end of the Median kingdom came with the rise of Cyrus II, founder of the Persian Empire. Cyrus was king of Anshan and a vassal to Astyages. Indeed, Cyrus' mother was Astyages' daughter. About 550 B.C., encouraged by Babylon, Cyrus rebelled against the Medes. His rebellion led to the defeat of Astyages. The kingdom of the Medes was replaced by the kingdom of the Persians. See Persia; Cyrus.

Though conquered by the Persians, the Medes continued to hold a place of honor in the Persian Empire. Media was the second-most important portion of the Empire after Persia itself. Biblical references frequently combine "the Medes and the Persians" (Dan. 5:28; compare Esth. 1:19; 10:2). The kings of the Persian Empire are called "the kings of Media and Persia" (Dan. 8:20). The most famous Mede in Scripture is Darius the Mede (Dan. 5:31; 9:1). See Darius. Media is sometimes referred to as the instrument of God, especially against Babylon (Isa. 13:17; 21:2; Jer. 51:11,28); but the Medes also had to drink the cup of God's judgment (Jer. 25:25). Their final appearance in Scripture is the presence of Jews or Jewish converts from there at Pentecost (Acts 2:9).

MEDIATOR A person midway between two parties who establishes an agreement or relationship between the parties and may act as a guarantor of that relationship.

Old Testament Only once is a specific word used for mediator in the Old Testament. Bewilderment in the midst of extreme suffering forced from Job a plea for an arbiter, one to whom he could relate, to stand between him and God in judgment (Job 9:33). The concept of someone standing between opposing persons as spokesman or reconciler is a central one in the Old Testament. In human relationships, a champion could come between armies and represent his people (1 Sam. 17:4–10), and an interpreter or spokesman helped negotiate agreements. In divine-human relations, a leader such as Abraham could negotiate with God for the sparing of a city (Gen. 18:22–32), and a father such as Job could intercede with sacrifices for his family (Job 1:5).

More often, kings, priests, and prophets took this middle position. The king embodied the people and, at times, represented God to them (Ps. 93:1). Priests were consecrated to offer sacrifices of reconciliation, with the most awesome transaction dependent upon the high priest who entered yearly into the holy of holies to make atonement for the sins of his people (Lev. 16:29–34). Israel itself was to be a kingdom of priests to channel the blessings of God to all people. Constantly, the prophets had to recall the nation to its vows of obedience and deliver God's words of judgment and hope. The Servant Songs of Isaiah told of one—whose sacrifice of Himself would bring pardon to many (Isa. 53).

One of the greatest examples of mediators is Moses. He stood between the people and God, receiving the Commandments on which the covenant was based and beseeching God's mercy when the Commandments and covenant were broken (Ex. 20:18–21; Deut. 9:25–26). Also, the wisdom, word, and Spirit of God were almost personified and used along with angels (messengers) as mediating agents (Prov. 8:22–31; Ps. 104:4).

New Testament The Greek word used for mediator in the New Testament bore several ideas. Primarily, it meant an umpire or peacemaker who came between two contestants, a negotiator who established a certain relationship, or some neutral person who could guarantee an agreement reached.

The term is used of Moses in a negative sense (Gal. 3:19–28). There Paul stressed the preeminence of the promise given directly to Abraham by grace over the law which was instituted through the mediator, Moses, when the people feared meeting God face-to-face (compare Ex. 20:18–21). In 1 Timothy 2:5, the term is used in a positive sense to designate Christ, the only necessary Mediator. This passage emphasizes not only that the legalities of the law or the ministrations of a priest are no longer necessary, but also that individuals cannot come into full communion with God by their moral or rational efforts alone. Full communion comes through faith in the Mediator who gave Himself a ransom for others.

The only other uses of the term occur in Hebrews where Jesus is presented as the Son of God who transcends all previous agents of the divine will and who mediates a new covenant (Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24). In each instance, the mediation of a new covenant is bound up with Christ's sacrificial death.

Thus, all of the mediating activities of intercession, sacrificial atonement, and covenant making and guaranteeing culminate in the New Testament with Christ. He is the great Intecessor, praying for His disciples while on earth and continuing to do so in heaven (John 17; Rom. 8:34). He is the supreme High Priest who enters once for all into the sanctuary to make a sacrifice of Himself that brings eternal redemption (Heb. 9:11–12). He is the Mediator of a better covenant which replaces the old one (Heb. 8:6; 9:15). By remaining forever, He guarantees that the covenant He establishes will forever endure since His priesthood never ends (Heb. 7:22–25). As true God and true Man, Christ stands between and with both God and humankind and is the answer to Job's plea.

MEDICINE See Diseases.

MEDITATION The act of calling to mind some supposition, pondering upon it, and correlating it to one's own life. A wicked individual meditates upon violence (Prov. 24: 2). The meditation of a righteous person contemplates God or His great spiritual truths (Pss. 63:6; 77:12; 119:15, 23,27,48,78,97,148; 143:5). He hopes to please God by meditation (Ps. 19:14). Thus meditation by God's people is a reverent act of worship. Through it they commune with God and are thereby renewed spiritually.

Most references to meditation occur in the Old Testament, especially in the Psalms. The Hebrew words for meditation primarily were derived from two separate roots. The first (hagah) literally means "to utter in a low sound." The word is used to denote the growling of a lion (Isa. 31:4) or the cooing of a dove (Isa. 38:14). Therefore it has been suggested that, in ancient Hebrew meditation, Scripture frequently was recited in a low murmur. The second root word (siach) has the basic meaning of "to be occupied with," or "concerned about." Thus meditation is the repetitious going over of a matter in one's mind because it is the chief concern of life. The constant recollection of God's past deeds by the hearing of Scripture and repetition of thought produce confidence in God (Pss. 104:34; 119:15,23,48,78,97,99,148; Ps. 63:6–8; 143:5).

Meditation is only mentioned twice in the New Testament. Jesus instructed Christians to meditate beforehand on their attitude toward persecution (Luke 21:14). Paul advised Timothy to meditate on the matters about which Paul had written Him (1 Tim. 4:15). Meditation is an important part of the Christian's relationship with Christ.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA, THE (Měd ĭ tĕr rā′ nē an) Designated in the OT and the NT simply as "the sea" (Josh. 16:8; Acts 10:6); also referred to as the "Western Sea" (Deut. 11:24, RSV, NIV); and as the "Sea of the Philistines" (Ex. 23:31). The Mediterranean Sea is an inland ocean extending about 2,200 miles from Gibraltar to the Lebanon coast and varies in width from one hundred to six hundred miles. Most of the important nations of ancient times were either on the Mediterranean's shores or operated in its 2,200 miles of water: Israel, Syria, Greece, Rome, Egypt, Philistia, and Phoenicia. Strangely, nature has provided few natural habors for Israel (Dor, Joppa, and Acco). The shoreline is almost straight. In many places a high ridge rises up sharply from behind a narrow strip of beach.

The Hebrews were not a seafaring people. A more apt description might be that they were a sea-fearing people. The Hebrews' fear of the sea was paritally due to their desert origin; therefore, their culture developed chiefly around agriculture. The story of Jonah demonstrates the Hebrew's fear of the sea.

God exercises leadership over all creation. As part of God's creation, the sea is subservient to him. He rules over the raging sea (Ps. 89:9) and causes a storm on it (Jonah 1:4).

For the Hebrews, the Great Sea served as the western border for the land of Canaan (Num. 34:6) and the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:12). Only with the aid of the Phoenicians was Solomon able to assemble and operate a fleet of ships at Ezion Geber on the Red Sea. Timber was brought on rafts from Lebanon to Joppa (2 Chron. 2:16). Jehoshaphat's attempt at a navy ended in disaster (1 Kings 22:47–50). His ships were wrecked in the same harbor. Maritime commerce remained limited during most periods in Israel's history. Phoenicians were famous in the ancient world for their capacity as sailors and pilots.

Tyre eventually became the principal sea power in the Mediterranean. The extensive use of the Mediterranean by the Phoenicians was continued by the Romans, who called it "Our Sea." Following the conquest of Palestine by Pompey in 63 B.C., traffic on the Mediterranean increased. This development helped to make possible the missionary activity of Paul, Silas, Barnabas, and others. Paul made three missionary journeys across the Mediterranean. Under Roman arrest, Paul made his final voyage across the Mediterranean Sea and shipwrecked (Acts 27). Paul's work involved such Mediterranean cities as Caesarea, Antioch, Troas, Corinth, Tyre, Sidon, Syracuse, Rome, and Ephesus. See Phoenicia; Tyre; Transportation and Travel. Philip Lee MEDIUM One possessed by (Lev. 20:22) or consulting (Deut. 18:11) a ghost or spirit of the dead, especially for information about the future. Acting as a medium was punishable by stoning (Lev. 20:27); consulting a medium, by exclusion from the congregation of Israel (Lev. 20:6). The transformation of Saul from one who expelled mediums (1 Sam. 28:3) to one who consulted a medium at En-dor (28:8–19) graphically illustrates his fall.

The Hebrew word translated medium (ob) may refer to the spirit of a dead person, to the medium possessed by the spirit, or to images used to conjure up spirits. Manasseh made such images (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6). Josiah destroyed them as part of his reforms (2 Kings 23:24). Saul's success in quickly locating a medium (1 Sam. 28:8) points both to the popularity of the practice of consulting the dead and the difficulty of eradicating it.

Isaiah 8:19 suggests a possible connection between the consulting of mediums and ancestor worship. Those to be consulted are termed "fathers" and "gods." (Compare 1 Sam. 28:13 where Samuel is described as elohim or "god.") The chirping and muttering of the spirits perhaps refers to the inarticulate sounds which must be interpreted by the medium. Consulting of mediums defiled the land and was described as prostitution. God's people were to trust God in times of distress and not resort to other "gods" in an attempt to learn the future.

MEEKNESS A personality trait of gentleness and humility, the opposite of which is pride. Meekness does not refer to weakness or passivity but to controlled power. Aristotle described meekness as the middle position between excessive anger and an excessive lack of anger.

Meekness or gentleness is exemplified by God (2 Sam. 22:36, Ps. 18:35), Moses (Num. 12:1–13), and Jesus (Zech. 9:9, Matt. 11:29, 12:14–21; 21:5). In the Old Testament the meek were often the poor and the oppressed (Amos 2:7; 8:4; Job 24:4; Ps. 9:18; Pr. 3:34; 16:19). The Hebrew word translated meek (anaw) means, "wretched, impoverished, oppressed, in need, bowed over," but came to mean, "humble, pious."

The meek receive the special concern of God and are called blessed (Ps. 37:11; Matt. 5:5). God identifies with the poor and oppressed, hears their pleas, and helps them (Pss. 10:17; 22:26; 25:9; 147:6; 149:4). The Messiah will also have a special ministry to the meek (Isa. 11:4; 61:1; Luke 4:18).

Christians are encouraged to be meek (Eph. 4:1–2; Col. 3:12). Meekness is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23) and should mark the Christian's attitude toward sinners (Gal. 6:1). Paul was meek with the Corinthians (1 Cor. 4:21). Pastors should be meek and teach meekness (1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:25; Titus 3:2). Christians should receive God's Word with meekness (Jas. 1:21). Wisdom is expressed with meekness (Jas. 3:13). Christian wives can witness to their unbelieving husbands with their meek spirit (1 Pet. 3:1–4). All Christians should be prepared to give a defense of their faith in meekness (1 Pet. 3:15).

MEGIDDO (Mĕ gĭd' dō) Place name perhaps meaning, "place of troops." One of the most strategic cities of Canaan since it guarded the main pass through the Carmel mountain range. This range was an obstacle along the international coastal highway which connected Egypt with Mesopotamia and even further destinations. Identified with current tell el-Mutesellim, Megiddo had approximately twenty-five different eras of occupation during its life from the fourth millenium to the time of the Persian Empire. The city was very active while under Egyptian authority from the time of the patriarchs through to the judges (2000–1100 B.C.), but this golden age came to an end about 1125 B.C. when it was destroyed.

The city was allotted to Manasseh (Josh. 17:11; 1 Chron. 17:29) after the partial conquest of Joshua (Josh. 12:21), but neither it nor its surrounding villages were secured by the tribe. Due to its obvious strength, it was among many cities whose overthrow was delayed until later (Judg. 1:27). Deborah and Barak fought the Canaanites and their leaders King Jabin and Sisera near the "waters of Megiddo," possibly the wadi Qina running through the surrounding hills (Judg. 5:19).

When Megiddo was finally annexed to the nation Israel is not known. Probably by the time of David the city was serving Israel's defensive and security purposes. Certainly by the time of Solomon the city was firmly Israelite, since he fortified the city (1 Kings 9:15), including his mighty six chambered gate which followed the pattern of his other two key fortress cities of Hazor and Gezer.

Megiddo was under the jurisdiction of Solomon's deputy, Baana (1 Kings 4:12). Buildings of current controversy have been excavated and explained variously as Solomon's or Ahab's stables, or storehouses where animals were loaded and unloaded.

During the divided monarchy, Megiddo's authority changed from Egyptian to Israelite to Assyrian. Five years into Jeroboam I's reign, (about 920 B.C.), Pharaoh Shishak burst into both Israel and Judah, taking control of the coastal highway including Megiddo. However, the Egyptian grip was not long lasting. Later, the city was the place of death for the Judean king, Ahaziah, who was killed at the command of Jehu while fleeing from the scene of Jehoram's assassination (843 B.C., 2 Kings 9:27). Over a century later, the conquering Tiglath-pileser III chose Megiddo to be the seat of the Magidu administrative district in the Assyrian Empire (733 B.C.).

A view from Megiddo of the Valley of Jezreel with the town of Nazareth in the distance.

After about 650 B.C. the city was no longer strongly fortified; however, it was still strategically important. Josiah attempted to head off Pharoah Neco II as he advanced along the coastal plain on his way to Carchemish (609 B.C.), but Josiah's attack ended when Neco II's archers fatally wounded him (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron. 35:22–24).

After returning from Exile, Zechariah prophesied that the mourning for the false deities of Hadad and Rimmon (Hadad-rimmon) that took place in the plain below Megiddon (Megiddo) would be matched by Israel's mourning for its smitten Lord (Zech. 12:11).

Finally, in the New Testament, the Mount of Megiddo (har-Megiddon thus "Armageddon") will be where the kings of the world are gathered for that final battle in the last day of the Lord. Where Israel was initially frustrated during their conquest of Canaan is exactly where they will be victorious with Christ in the end (Rev.16:16).

Daniel C. Fredericks

MEGIDDON, VALLEY OF (Mė gĭd′ dŏn) KJV term for plain of Megiddo, the broad portion of the Jezreel Valley in the vicinity of Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). The passage perhaps alludes to the death of Josiah on this plain (2 Chron. 35:22). See Megiddo.

MEHETABEEL (Mė hĕ′ tå bē ēl) Personal name meaning "God does good." Ancestor of Shemiah, a contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10). Modern translations use the form Mehetabel.

MEHETABEL (Mė hĕ′ tå bĕl) Personal name meaning "God does good." Wife of King Hadar of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). Modern translations follow the Hebrew and also use Mehetabel for the KJV's Mehetabeel (Neh. 6:10).

MEHIDA (Mė hī′ då) Personal name meaning, "bought." Family of Temple servants (KJV, Nethinim) at Ezra 2:52; Nehemiah 7:54.

MEHIR (Mē′ hĭr) Personal name meaning, "purchased." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).

MEHOLAH (Mė hō′ lah) TEV reading for Meholathite.

MEHOLATHITE (Mė hō lå thīte) Title meaning inhabitant of Abel-Meholah, given to Adriel, Saul's son-in-law (1 Sam. 18:19; 2 Sam. 21:8). Abel-Meholah is located in Gilead about 14 miles southeast of Beth-Shean.

MEHUJAEL (Mė hū jā′ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "struck by God" or "priest of God." Son of Irad (Gen. 4:18). Some interpreters see the name as a variant form of Mahalelel (Gen. 5:12–17).

MEHUMAN (Mė hū′ măn) Personal name meaning "trusty." Eunuch serving the Persian king Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10).

MEHUNIM (Mė hū′ nĭm) KJV form of Meunim or Meunites, an Arab tribe whose name likely derives from the city of Ma'an about twelve miles southeast of Petra. The Meunites raided Judah during the reign of Jehoshaphat (873–849 B.C.) according to 2 Chronicles 20:1 (NAS, NIV, REB, NRSV following the Greek translation; the Hebrew text reads Ammonites). Uzziah (783–742) subdued the Mehunites (2 Chron. 26:7). During the reign of Hezekiah (727–698 B.C.), Israelites dislocated the Meunites from the vicinity of Gedor in Transjordan about eighteen miles north-northwest of Heshbon (1 Chron. 4:41; KJV reads "habitations"). The Meunites are listed as Temple servants in the postexilic period (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52). They were perhaps the descendants of prisoners of war.

MEJARKON (Mē jär′ kon) Name meaning, "waters of Jarkon" or "pale-green waters." Stream in the territory of Dan (Josh. 19:46), probably the Nahr el-'Auja ("winding river"), which, fed by springs at Ras el-'Ain about ten miles from the coast, flows year-round to the Mediterranean about four miles north of Joppa.

MEKERATHITE (Mĕ kē′ rå thīte) NIV spelling of Mecherathite.

MEKONAH (Mė kō′ nah) Place name meaning, "standing." KJV form of Meconah, town in southern Judah between Ziklag and Ain-rimmon (Neh. 11:28). The site is perhaps identical with Madmannah or Machbena (1 Chron. 2:49).

MELATIAH (Mĕ lå tī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah has set free." Man assisting Nehemiah in building the wall (Neh. 3:7).

MELCHI (Mĕl′ chī) Personal name meaning, "my king." Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:24,28).

MELCHIAH (Mĕl chī′ ah) KJV alternate form of Malchijah (Jer. 21:1).

MELCHISHUA (Mĕl chī shū′ å) KJV alternate spelling of Malchishua (1 Sam. 14:49; 31:2).

MELCHIZEDEK (Mĕl chĭz ĕ dĕk) Personal name meaning "Zedek is my king" or "My king is righteousness." Priest and king of Salem, a city identified with Jerusalem.

Old Testament When Abraham returned from the Valley of Siddim where he defeated Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and the kings aligned with Chedorlaomer, Melchizedek greeted Abraham with bread and wine. He blessed Abraham in the name of "God Most High." In return, Abraham gave Melchizedek a tenth of everything.

Melchizedek and Abraham both worshiped the one true God. Abraham also appeared to recognize the role of Melchizedek as a priest. Psalm 110:4 refers to one who would be forever a priest in the "order of Melchizedek." This messianic psalm teaches that the leader or ruler of the Hebrew nation would be able to reflect in his person the role of priest as well as the role of king.

New Testament The writer of Hebrews made several references in chapters 5—7 to Jesus' priesthood being of the "order of Melchizedek" as opposed to Levitical in nature. The author of Hebrews cited Psalm 110:4. For the writer of Hebrews, only Jesus whose life could not be destroyed by death fit the psalmist's description of a priest of the "order of Melchizedek."

Judith Wooldridge

MELEA (Mē lē′ ȧ) Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:31).

MELECH (Mē lĕch) Personal name meaning, "king." Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

MELICU (Mĕ′ lĭ cū) KJV form of Malluchi (Neh. 12:14).

MELITA (Mĕ lĭ′ tȧ) KJV form of Malta (Acts 28:1). See Islands.

MELONS See Plants in the Bible.

MELZAR (Mĕl′ zär) KJV transliteration of what is likely an Assyrian loanword meaning "guard" (NIV), "overseer" (NAS), or "steward" (RSV) at Daniel 1:11,16. The KJV follows some early versions (Theodotian, Lucian, the Syriac, the Vulgate) in taking Melzar as a proper name. Modern translators point to the use of the article as evidence of a title.

MEM (Mĕm) Thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which serves as the heading for Psalm 119:97–104. Each of these verses begins with this letter.

MEMBERS 1. Body parts. 2. Individuals composing a group. Jesus warned of body parts which cause one to sin (Matt. 5:29). As a Christian, Paul struggled with the reality of body parts which continue to give in to sin (Rom. 6:13). The bodily members are the sphere where the law of sin (Rom. 7:23) and passions (Jas. 4:1) are at work. The image of various body parts cooperating in the life of one organism frequently serves to illustrate the unity of the church which is composed of different individuals exercising various, necessary functions (Rom. 12:4–5; 1 Cor. 12:12,27; compare Eph. 4:25; 5:30). See Body; Body of Christ; Church.

MEMORIAL Something which serves as a reminder. Scripture witnesses to God's participation in human history for the salvation of God's people. Memorials to such events reinforced faith and provided opportunities for teaching. God's covenant name (Yahweh) was to be a "memorial name" (Ex. 3:15 NAS), a reminder of God's liberation of God's people. The Passover served as a similar reminder (Ex. 12:14; 13:9). The twelve stones taken from the Jordan's bed served as a reminder of God's provision of passage across the Jordan (Josh. 4:7). In the New Testament, the Lord's Supper serves as a reminder of Christ's sacrificial death and an encouragement of His future coming (Matt. 26:13; Mark 14:9; 1 Cor. 11:25–26). All these memorials serve to "proclaim" the good news of what God has done.

MEMPHIS (Mĕm′ phĭs) Place name meaning, "the abode of the good one." An ancient capital of Egypt located just south of modern Cairo on the west bank of the Nile River. It was founded by Menes, a pharaoh of the First Dynasty (about 2800 B.C.) and became the capital of Egypt as the Third Dynasty came to power (about 2686 B.C.).

One of several small sphinxes located at Memphis on the Nile River in Egypt.

For over 300 years Memphis was the principal city of Egypt. Gradually, other cities grew in importance, and Memphis was eclipsed as the seat of power. During later dynasties Thebes and Avaris-Tanis served as the capital. Memphis regained its status as capital during the Hyksos reign (1750–1570) but was replaced when the alien occupation ended.

There remains little, architecturally, to attest to the glory and grandeur once enjoyed by the city. As the Moslems began to build Cairo, they raided the buildings of Memphis for material, even dismantling the temple of Ptah, which probably was the largest and most opulent structure in the city.

MEMUCAN (Mė mū′ căn) One of the seven princes who served as advisors to King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esth. 1:14,16,21). See Marsena.

MEN-PLEASERS Those who serve (only) to gain approval or win favor (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22).

MENAHEM (Měn′ ȧ hěm) Personal name meaning, "consoler." King of Israel 752–742 B.C. Menahem became king by assassinating Shallum, who had killed King Zechariah only a month earlier (2 Kings 15:10–14). The period following the death of Jeroboam II in 753 B.C. was filled with turmoil. Several political factions fought for control. Shallum and Menahem each led an extremist party which sought the throne. They ruled by force. After becoming king, Menahem attacked and destroyed one of Israel's cities because it resisted his rule (2 Kings 15:16). He ruled at least ten years in Samaria. A significant event recorded about his reign is that he paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III, the king of Assyria. This is the first mention of the Assyrian monarch in the biblical record. See Tiglath-pileser. It is possible that Menahem obtained the throne of Israel with Tiglath-pileser's help. In any event, Menahem was little more than a puppet of the Assyrians during his reign. He was succeeded by his son, Pekahiah.

MENAN (Mē′ năn) KJV form of Menna, the name of an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:31).

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (Mē′ nė, mē′ nė, tē′ kěl, Ū phär′ sĭn) An inscription that King Belshazzar of Babylon saw a detached hand write on his palace wall as the king was hosting a drunken party (Dan. 5:1–29). After the wise men of the kingdom could not decipher the writing, Daniel was brought in to give an interpretation.

Scholars have proposed a number of translations, the best of which probably is "mina, shekel, and halves." Daniel interpreted the inscription with a wordplay using Hebrew words which sound similar to each word of the inscription, taking it to mean, "numbered, weighed, and divided."

Daniel's interpretation was that Nebuchadnezzar and his kingdom had been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The kingdom would be divided and given to his enemies, the Medes and Persians. Daniel 5:30 records that the overthrow occurred that very night. Thus God worked through Daniel to show His wisdom was greater than that of Persia's wise counselors and magicians and that only the God of Israel controlled history and human destiny.

MENI (Mē′ nī) Personal name meaning, "to count" or "to apportion." God of good luck worshiped together with the god Gad by Jewish apostates, probably in the postexilic period (Isa. 65:11 NAS margin). The god is possibly identical with Manat, a diety worshiped by the Arabs before the rise of Islam. The KJV translated the god's name as "that number." Modern translations prefer the translation "Destiny."

MENNA (Měn′ nȧ) Form of Menan preferred by modern translations.

MENORAH (Mė′ nō rah) A candelabrum used in Jewish worship, specifically the branched lampstand used in the tabernacle (Ex. 25:31–35; 37:17–20; compare Zech. 4:2,11). See Lamps, Lighting; Lampstand.

A large sculpture of a Jewish menorah adorns the grounds surrounding the Israeli Knesset building.

MENUHOTH (Mė nū′ hōth) Name meaning, "resting places." Family descended from Judah (1 Chron. 2:52 NRSV) or their town (TEV). Other English translations take this family as the other half of the Manahethites (KJV, REB; Manahathites, NAS, NIV) mentioned in 1 Chronicles 2:54. Menuhoth was possibly located to the northwest of Jerusalem towards Kiriath-jearim.

MEONENIM, PLAIN OF (Mė ŏn′ ė nĭm) Meonenim is the Hebrew term for diviners or soothsayers (Deut. 18:10,14; Micah 5:12). The KJV understood Meonenim as a proper name at Judges 9:37. See Diviner's Oak.

MEONOTHAI (Mė ŏn′ ō thaî) Personal name meaning, "habitations of the Lord." A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:14).

MEPHAATH (Mĕph ā′ ăth) Place name meaning, "height." Town in Reuben's tribal allotment (Josh. 13:18), assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79). In Jeremiah's time the town was in Moabite hands (Jer. 48:21). The site is perhaps that of modern Jawah about six miles south of Amman.

MEPHIBOSHETH Mĕ phĭb′ ō shĕth) Personal name meaning, "shame destroyer" or "image breaker." 1. A son of Jonathan, who was granted special position and privilege in David's court (2 Sam. 9). Jonathan was killed in battle when Mephibosheth was five years old. Fearing that the Philistines would seek the life of the young boy, a nurse fled with him, but in her haste she dropped him and crippled him in both feet (2 Sam. 4:4). Mephibosheth may be an intentional change by copyists to avoid writing the pagan god's name "baal." The original name would be Meribaal (1 Chron. 8:34). See Meribaal. When David invited Mephibosheth to be a part of his court, he entrusted the family property to a steward, Ziba. During the Absalom rebellion Ziba tried unsuccessfully to turn David against Mephibosheth. Upon the king's return to Jerusalem, Mephibosheth vindicated himself and was allowed to remain in the king's house (2 Sam. 16; 19). 2. A son of Saul, who with six other members of Saul's household, was delivered by David to the Gibeonites to be hanged. This was in retaliation for Saul's earlier slaughter of a band of Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:1–9). Mephibosheth's mother guarded the bodies until the time of burial.

MERAB (Mē′ răb) Personal name from the root "to become many." Eldest daughter of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:49), who was twice promised to David in exchange for killing Goliath (1 Sam. 17:25) and for fighting the Lord's battles against the Philistines (1 Sam. 18:17–19). Saul reneged on his promise and gave Merab to Adriel. Modern translators based on context and a few ancient texts often read Merab instead of the Hebrew text's Michal in 2 Samuel 21:8.

MERAIAH (Mė râi′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah has promised" or "stubborn." Head of a priestly family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:12).

MERAIOTH (Mė rā′ ĭŏth) Personal name meaning, "obstinate" or "rebellious." 1. Ancestor of the Zadokite high priests (1 Chron. 6:6–7,52). 2. Ancestor of Ezra the scribe, perhaps identical with 1. (Ezra 7:3; 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11). 3. Priestly family in the postexilic period (Neh. 12:15), perhaps a scribal corruption of Meremoth (Neh. 12:3).

MERARI (Mė rā′ rī) Personal name meaning, "bitterness" or "gall." Third son of Levi (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16; Num. 3:17; 1 Chron. 6:1,16; 23:6). Merari was the ancestor of a division of priests, the Merarites.

MERARITES (Mė rā′ rītes) Major division of priests descended from Merari, the third son of Levi. The Merarites and Gershonites were responsible for the set up, breakdown, and transport of the tabernacle (Num. 10:17; compare 3:36–37; 4:29–33; 7:8). The Merarites received an allotment of twelve cities from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun, including Ramoth-Gilead, a city of refuge (Josh. 21:7,34–40; 1 Chron. 6:63,77–81). Representatives of the Merarites participated in David's move of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:6), served as tabernacle musicians (1 Chron. 15:17,19) and gatekeepers (1 Chron. 26:10,19), shared in Hezekiah's (2 Chron. 29:12) and Josiah's (2 Chron. 34:12) reforms, and returned from Exile to assist in the new Temple (Ezra 8:19).

MERATHAIM (Mĕr à thā′ ĭm) Place name meaning, "double bitterness" or "double rebellion," possibly a play on the Akkadian phrase mat marrati ("Land of the Bitter River") or on nār mārratu, a designation for the area touching the Persian gulf known from Babylonian inscriptions. Jeremiah (50:21) announced God's judgment on the land.

MERCHANT Buyer and seller of goods for profit. With the exception of the period of Solomon (1 Kings 9:26–28; 10:15,22), Israel was not known in biblical times as a nation of merchants. References to Israelites involved in trade are surprisingly few. Israelites were prohibited from selling food to fellow Israelites for profit (Lev. 25:37), but could sell even carrion to a foreigner (Deut. 14:21). Merchants purchased cloth from housewives (Prov. 31:24). Olive oil was sold (2 Kings 4:7). Abuses by mercants were often condemned: holding back grain to force up prices (Prov. 11:26); impatience for sabbath or holy days to conclude so that commerce might resume; dishonest scales (Amos 8:5); forcing fellow Israelites into slavery to buy food (Neh. 5:1–8); violation of the Sabbath (Neh. 13:15–21). Jerusalem merchants assisted in Nehemiah's reconstruction of the walls, perhaps by providing finances (Neh. 3:32).

The majority of Old Testament references to merchants concern nations other than Israel. The term translated as merchant or trader at Proverbs 31:24 and Hosea 12:7 is, in fact, the word for Trajan's Market in Rome, a large second century A.D. "shopping center" where merchants sold their wares.

Canaanite. Men of Tyre sold fish and all kinds of merchandise in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 13:16). Ezekiel 27:12–25 recounts the activities of the merchants of Tyre in full. They traded in common and precious metals, slaves, livestock, precious stones, ivory, wool, cloth, clothing, agricultural produce, wine, spices, and carpets. (Compare Rev. 18:11–13.) Tyre's trading partners included twenty-two nations or peoples encompassing Asia Minor, Palestine, Syria, Arabia, and Mesopotamia. Merchants generated great wealth. The prophets railed against the pride which accompanied merchants' material successes (Isa. 23; Ezek. 27).

In the New Testament, Jesus used a merchant to illustrate the need to risk all to gain the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:45–46). Other references continue the prophetic attack on arrogant merchants. James 4:13 warns big businessmen who engaged in long-term foreign ventures not to dismiss God when making plans. Revelation condemns Roman merchants who grew rich on the sins of Rome (Rev. 18:3). See Economic Life; Commerce. Chris Church

MERCURIUS (Mēr cū′ rī ŭs) KJV translation of the Greek Hermes (Acts 14:12). The Roman god Mercury was identified with the Greek Hermes. See Gods, Pagan; Hermes.

MERCURY (Mēr′ cū rē) See Gods, Pagan; Hermes.

MERCY SEAT A slab of pure gold measuring about 45 inches by 27 inches which sat atop the ark of the covenant which was the same size. It was the base for the golden cherubim (Ex. 25:17–19,21) and symbolized the throne from which God ruled Israel (Lev. 16:2; Num. 7:89). On the Day of Atonement the high priest sprinkled the blood of a sacrificial lamb on the mercy seat as a plea for forgiveness for the sins of the nation (Lev. 16:15). The Hebrew word means literally "to wipe out" or "cover over." This has led modern translators to render the term "cover" (REB, NRSV note), "lid" (TEV), or "atonement cover" (NIV). "Mercy seat" is based on the earliest Greek and Latin translations. The mercy seat has been replaced as the symbol and place of God's presence and atonement. Christ's cross and resurrection showed the perfect presence and accomplished atonement once for all (Heb. 9).

MERCY, MERCIFUL A personal characteristic of care for the needs of others. The biblical concept of mercy always involves help to those who are in need or distress. Such help covers a broad range, from assistance in finding a bride to God's forgiveness of sin. A wide vocabulary is employed in the original languages to express these concepts, and an even wider vocabulary is found in English translations.

Mercy in the Old Testament Three main Hebrew roots involve the idea of mercy. 1. Racham/ rachamîm This word family consistently has the meaning of showing mercy, compassion, or pity.

Related to the word for womb, it may have the connotation of a mother's affection or of the bond between siblings. This sense of a mother's compassion for her child is found in 1 Kings 3:26, and a similar expression describes Joseph's feelings for his brother in Genesis 43:30. Likewise, God's mercy is often likened to family relationships: as a father to his children (Jer. 31:20; Ps. 103:13; Isa. 63:15–16), a husband to a wife (Isa. 54:6–8; Hos. 2:19), a brother to a brother (Amos 1:11), even as a mother toward a nursing child (Isa. 49:15).

God's mercy is bound up with His covenant with Israel. He is merciful to them because He chose them (Ex. 33:19; 2 Kings 13:23; Isa. 54:10; 63:7). God's mercy is never just a feeling but is expressed by His action: providing for Israel in the wilderness (Neh. 9:19; Isa. 49:10) and delivering her from enemies (Pss. 69:16–21; 79:8–11; Isa. 30:18; Jer. 42:11–12). When Israel turned from God, He showed no pity (Isa. 9:17; 27:11; Jer. 13:14; 16:5; Hos. 1:6–8; 2:4). On the other hand, He is a forgiving God and shows mercy to a penitent people (Pss. 25:4–7; 40:11–12; 51:1–4; Prov. 28:13–14; Isa. 54:7; 55:7; Lam. 3:31–33; Dan. 9:9; Mic. 7:19; Hab. 3:2). He is merciful in restoring the nation (Ps. 102:13; Isa. 14:1; 49:13; Jer. 12:15; 30:18; 33:26; Ezek. 39:25; Zech. 1:16; 10:6) and renewing His friendship with them (Hos. 2:19,23). God's mercy is the very source of His people's life (Pss. 103:4; 119:77,156).

Racham is also used to describe human mercy or lack of it. Israel's enemies were merciless (Isa. 13:18; 47:6; Jer. 6:23; 21:7; 50:42). In legal contexts, Israel was to show no mercy to criminals (Deut. 13:8; 19:13,21). On the other hand, God expected His people to be merciful to their neighbors (1 Kings 8:31–32; Prov. 3:29; 21:13). He especially expected their mercy toward the poor and needy (Zech. 7:9–10).

2. Chesed Chesed occurs 245 times in the Old Testament, 127 in Psalms alone. The Septuagint translators regularly rendered it with the Greek word for mercy, eleos. Likewise, the King James version translates it regularly as mercy or kindness. See Kindness. Other English versions render it as "steadfast love" (NRSV), "lovingkindness" (NAS), "loyalty" or "constant love" (REB), "love" or "unfailing love" (NIV), "faithfulness" (TEV).

Like racham, chesed describes a variety of human relationships: husband and wife (Gen. 20:13), next-of-kin (Gen. 24:49), father and son (Gen. 47:29), host and guest (Rahab and the spies—Josh. 2:12–14), friends like David and Jonathan (1 Sam. 20:8,14–17), king and subjects (2 Sam. 2:5). Also like racham, it expresses itself in action: Rahab delivered the spies; Jonathan protected David from Saul. The relationship is always reciprocal. One who experiences the chesed of another is to reciprocate when the opportunity presents itself. Thus, the spies promised protection for Rahab, and David pledged to protect the house of Jonathan. An element of covenantal fidelity was involved. An element of mercy was also involved. Each sought to meet the other's need. Since one can scarcely meet a need of God, this covenantal aspect of mercy was expressed in God's requirement to show mercy to others. This was often coupled with a command for justice (Mic. 6:8; compare Hos. 12:6; Zech. 7:9).

God expects His people to show chesed to one another because He shows chesed to them—to individuals such as Abraham (Gen. 24:12–14), Jacob (Gen. 32:10), David (2 Sam. 7:15), and Job (10:12). Above all, He was merciful to His chosen people Israel (Ex. 15:13; Ps. 107:8,15,21,31; Isa. 63:7; Jer. 31:2–6). The linkage of God's covenant and His chesed is explicit in such phrases as "keeping covenant and showing chesed" (1 Kings 8:23; Deut. 7:9; Neh. 1:5; 9:32; Dan. 9:4; compare Ps. 106:45; Isa. 54:10).

A final characteristic of God's chesed is its permanence (Pss. 23:6; 25:6; 103:17; 117:2; Isa. 54:8). This is often expressed in the set phrase, "for the Lord is good, his mercy (chesed) is everlasting" or "his mercy endureth forever" (Pss. 100:5; 106:1; 107:1; 118:1; 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; 7:3; Ezra 3:11; Jer. 33:11; compare Pss. 118:2–4; 136:1–26).

3. Chanan/chen This is the third Hebrew word family involving mercy and pity. Job used it in appealing for pity (19:21) and with it the psalmist described one who is generous to the poor (Pss. 37:21; 112:5; compare Prov. 14:21–23; 19:17; 28:8). The latter examples show how chanan involves not only pity but also being gracious. It is in this sense that the word is applied to God, referring to His gracious and generous nature.

4. Conclusion It is difficult to draw precise distinctions between the various words used in the Old Testament for God's mercy and grace. Racham, chesed, and chanan all refer to the one gracious, forgiving, loving God who is forever faithful in reaching out to His people in their need. Nowhere is their interrelatedness more evident than in the following recurrent Old Testament liturgy which combines all three: "God is merciful (racham) and gracious (chana), slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love (chesed) and faithfulness" (Ex. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Neh. 9:17; Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2).

Mercy in the New Testament Three word families express the idea of mercy in the New Testament. 1. Splagchna Splagchna literally refers to the upper human organs (heart, liver, lungs). This usage appears in the grim depiction of Judas' death in Acts 1:18. Much like the Hebrew rachamîm, splagchna developed the derived sense of strong emotional feelings, particularly of compassion and affection. The word is often used of Jesus' compassion—for the multitudes (Matt. 9:36; 14:14; 15:32), for the blind (Matt. 20:34), for a leper (Mark 1:41), for a possessed child (Mark 9:20–127), for a widow's plight (Luke 7:13). His parables use the term to describe the mercy of a master on his indebted servant (Matt. 18:27), the compassion of a father for his prodigal son (Luke 15:20), and a Samaritan's pity for a wounded Jew (Luke 10:33). With this word Paul urged the Corinthians to renew their affection for him (2 Cor. 6:12; compare 7:15), exhorted the Philippians to mutual love and concern (Phil. 2:1–2), and played on the sympathy of Philemon (Philem. 7,12,20). With it, John reminded his readers that one who closes his heart to a brother's need scarcely has God's love (1 John 3:17).

2. Oiktirmos This word also means "pity, mercy, compassion" and is used together with splagchna in Colossians 3:12, Philippians 2:1, and James 5:11. It can be used negatively as in Hebrews 10:28 where it describes the merciless justice of the Law. Paul pointed to the positive side of God as "the father of mercies" (2 Cor. 1:3), and he urged the Romans to sacrificial service based on God's mercy (12:1). Christian mercy is rooted in God's mercy, a principle already given by Jesus (Luke 6:36). 3. Eleos The most common words in the New Testament for mercy belong to the eleos family. In secular Greek, the word was often viewed as a sign of weakness, a sentimental inclination to be overly lenient. The New Testament does not share in this assessment, having more in common with the Old Testament perspective on God's mercy.

To be sure, the negative aspect appears. Drawing on Exodus 33:19, Paul showed how God in His sovereign purposes can withdraw His mercies (Rom. 9:15–16,18,23). The total New Testament picture is much brighter. Jesus brought the good news of a merciful, forgiving God. He embodied that good news in Himself, and everywhere He was met by cries and expectations for mercy—from two blind men (Matt. 9:27), a woman with a possessed daughter (Matt. 15:22), the father of an epileptic boy (Matt. 17:15), and by ten lepers (Luke 17:13). His healings are themselves testimony to the divine mercy (Mark 5:19). Reminiscent of chesed, Jesus' birth and that of John are testimonies that God is both merciful and faithful to His promises (Luke 1:58,72,78). Paul had a keen awareness of God's mercy in his own life (1 Cor. 7:25; 2 Cor. 4:1; 1 Tim. 1:13,16) and in restoring his co-worker Epaphroditus to health (Phil. 2:27).

God's mercy was shown in His readiness to forgive the penitent sinner (Luke 8:13). Especially was it transparent in the atoning work of Christ (Heb. 2:17). Through Christ, God's mercy delivers from the death of sin into life (Eph. 2:4–5) and includes the Gentiles as part of His people (Rom. 11:30–32). In Christ the mercy of God brings new life (1 Pet. 1:3) and undergirds the hope of life to come (Jude 21). In this life the mercy of God is always available for those who approach His throne (Heb. 4:16). The Christian life is lived under this assurance of God's mercy. This is why mercy is often an element in New Testament greetings and benedictions (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2; Gal. 6:16; 2 John 3; Jude 2). See Greetings; Benedictions.

Those who experience God's mercy are themselves to be merciful. God does not desire the external trappings of religiosity but deeds of mercy to others (Matt. 9:13; 12:7; 23:23). One who shows no mercy to others cannot expect God's mercy (Matt. 18:33–34; Jas. 2:13). Mercy is a mark of discipleship (Matt. 5:7). Disciples show deeds of mercy to a neighbor (Luke 10:36–37) and perform them cheerfully (Rom. 12:8). God is mercy, and one who shares in God's wisdom shares His mercy (Jas. 3:17).

3. Conclusion As with the Old Testament, the New Testament treatment of God's mercy cannot be separated from His love, His grace, and His faithfulness. They are all part of the same fabric. The difference, of course, is that the New Testament writers had come to see the mercy of God in a much brighter light in the face of Jesus Christ. He was the ultimate manifestation of God's mercy, the assurance of that mercy for believers, and the basis of their own mercy in their relationships with others. John Polhill MERED (Mĕ′ rĕd) Personal name meaning, "rebel." Descendant of King David who married Bithiah, a daughter of Pharaoh (1 Chron. 4:17–18), perhaps as part of a political alliance.

MEREMOTH (Mĕr ḗ mŏth) Personal name meaning, "heights." 1. Priest who returned from Exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3). 2. Priest in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah who assisted with the Temple treasury (Ezra 8:33), with the repair of the walls (Neh. 3:4,21), and witnessed the renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:5). 3. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

MERES (Mē rĕs) One of seven princes who served as counselors to King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esther 1:14). See Marsena.

MERIBAH (Mĕr ĭ bäh) See Massah.

MERIBAH-KADESH (Mĕr′ ĭ bah-Kā′ dĕsh) See Kadesh Meribah.

of Baal," "beloved or hero of Baal," or "Baal defends." Original name of Mephibosheth. See Mephibosheth. Apparently later copyists of text changed name with Baal to avoid use of pagan god's name (1 Chron. 8:34; 9:40, the latter with the Hebrew spelling "hero" compared to the former's spelling "opponent."

MERNEPTAH (Mĕr' nĕ ptäh) Personal name meaning, "beloved of Ptah" (god honored in Memphis, Egypt). Ruler in the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt 1236–1223 B.C. or according to some recent opinions 1212–1199 B.C. and thought by many to be the pharaoh of Egypt when the Exodus occurred. A stele produced during his rule is the earliest known nonbiblical reference to the Israelites. The stele praises Merneptah's conquest of Canaan, Ashkelon, Gezer, Yanoam, and Israel, Israel being marked as a people rather than a geographical place. Merneptah claimed to have "laid waste" to Israel. The stele shows that a people Israel existed in Canaan no later than 1207 B.C. and had sufficient strength to fight Merneptah even though they lost if his account is accurate. They may have been an ally of three city-states opposing Merneptah.

MERODACH (Mėr ō' dăch) Hebrew form of Marduk, the chief god of Babylon, also called Bel, corresponding to the Semitic Baal or "Lord" (Jer. 50:2). Merodach is an element in the names of the Babylonian kings Merodach-baladan (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1) and Evil-Merodach (2 Kings 25:27; Jer. 52:31). With a different vocalization, Merodach yields the name Mordecai (Esther 2:5). See Gods, Pagan.

MERODACH-BALADAN (Mė rō' dăch-băl' å dăn) Personal name meaning, "god Marduk gave an heir." A ruler of the Bit-Yakin tribe in southern Babylonia and king of Babylon 721–711 B.C. and for a short time in 704 B.C. He was little more than a puppet of Assyria, answering to Sargon. Merodach-baladan sent envoys to King Hezekiah of Judah (Isa. 39:1; 2 Kings 20:12–13), who inventoried the palace treasures. Two years later Sennacherib laid his ill-fated siege to the Holy City. Merodach-baladan continued to rebel against the Assyrians, coming out of exile more than once to oppose the kings of Nineveh. He eventually was beaten back to his seashore tribal lands. See Babylon; Hezekiah; Sargon; Sennacherib.

MEROM (Mē' rŏm) Place name meaning, "high place." Place in Galilee where Joshua led Israel to defeat a coalition of Canaanite tribes under king Jabin of Hazor in a surprise attack (Josh. 11:1–7). The location of the site has been debated, but now appears to be the modern Merion. The town is near a wadi which is fed annually by a spring during the wet season. Thutmose III and Rameses II of Egypt claimed to have captured the area during their respective reigns.

MERONOTHITE (Mė rŏn ō thīte) A resident of Meronoth (1 Chron. 27:30; Neb. 3:7). The site is perhaps Beituniyeh northwest of Gibeon.

MEROZ (Mē' rŏz) Place name of uncertain meaning. Town condemned in the Song of Deborah for failure to join in the Lord's battle against the oppressive forces of Sisera (Judg. 5:23). The site is unknown. Suggestions have included: khirbet Marus three miles northwest of Hazor; Madon (Josh. 12:19); and (Shimron-) Merom (Josh. 11:5; 12:20), identified with Semuniyeh north of Megiddo on the edge of the Jezreel Valley. Marus is too far removed from the battle site to have been expected to participate. Madon is closer, but still separated from the Jezreel by mountain terrain.

MESECH (Mē' sĕch) KJV alternate form of Meshech (Ps. 120:5).

MESHA (Mē' shà) English translation of three Hebrew names. 1. Personal name meaning "Safety." Ruler of Moab who led a rebellion against Israel (2 Kings 3:4–27). The designation of Mesha as a sheep breeder (2 Kings 3:4 NRSV) is perhaps an honorary title for chief. The date of his revolt is uncertain. Second Kings 1:1 suggests the revolt followed immediately on Ahab's death (850 B.C.). Second Kings 3:4 sets the revolt in the reign of Jehoram (849–842 B.C.). The Moabite stone erected by Mesha to celebrate his exploits contains two apparently irreconcilable time notes: in the middle of the reign of Omri's son and forty years after the beginning of Omri's oppressive taxation of Moab. If Omri's son is taken literally, the Moabite stone places the revolt in the reign of Ahab (869–850 B.C.). "Son of Omri" was, however, used as a title for any of the kings who succeeded Omri as king in Samaria, even of Jehu who overthrew Omri's dynasty. Jehoram, Omri's grandson, might thus be the "son" of Omri of the Moabite stone. Jehoram's reign, however, ended five years before the fortieth anniversary of the earliest date of Omri's oppression of Moab. At the beginning of the revolt, Mesha succeeded in seizing Israelite border towns and in fortifying towns on his frontier. An alliance of Israel, Judah, and Edom, however, outflanked his defenses and attacked Mesha from the rear. Mesha retreated to Kir-hareseth from which he attempted, unsuccessfully, to escape to his Aramean allies. With no escape possible, Mesha sacrificed his firstborn son to his god Chemosh on the city walls. In response, the Israelites lifted their siege and returned home. The Moabite stone describes Mesha as a builder of cities and highways. Archaeological evidence, however, suggests a decline in Moabite civilization following the revolt. See Moab.

2. Descendant of Benjamin living in Moab (1 Chron. 8:9). 3. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42; RSV follows early Greek translation in reading Mareshah). 4. Place name meaning, "debt." City in the territory of the Joktanites (Gen. 10:30), most likely to be identified with Massa (Gen. 25:14; Prov. 31:1), located between the head of the gulf of Aqaba and the Persian Gulf. This Massa is identified with the Assyrian Mash and the Persian Maciya. Chris Church

MESHACH (Mē' shăch) Personal name of unknown meaning, apparently corrupted in transmission from Babylonian to Hebrew, perhaps to avoid pronouncing or acknowledging name of Babylonian god. One of Daniel's friends exiled to Babylon after the fall of Jehoiakin in 597 B.C. (Dan. 1:6–7). His Hebrew name was Mishael ("Who is what God is") but was changed to Meshach (perhaps, "Who is what Aku is") to mock Israel's God. Declining the rich food of the king's table, he and his friends proved that the simple fare of vegetables and water was to be desired to make one wise and strong. After refusing to bow to the king's golden image, he, Shadrach, and Abednego were thrown into a furnace, but were delivered by God (Dan. 3). Thereafter, they were promoted in the king's court.

MESHECH (Mē' shěch) Personal name meaning either, "sowing" or "possession." 1. A people of Asia Minor (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), known for trading in copper vessels (Ezek. 27:13), frequently associated with Tubal (Ezek. 32:26; 38:2–3; 39:1). This Meschech is identical to the Assyrian Mushki and the Greek Moschoi. At Psalm 120:5 the name appears in the form Mesech (KJV). 2. An otherwise unknown Aramaean tribe (1 Chron. 1:17), perhaps identical with Mash (Gen. 10:23).

MESHEK (Mē' shěk) TEV form of Meshech (1 Chron. 1:17).

MESHELEMIAH (Mĕ shĕl' ĕ mī ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is recompense." Tabernacle gatekeeper in the time of David (1 Chron. 9:21; 26:1–2,9). Shelemiah is an abbreviated form of this name (1 Chron. 26:14). Other shortened forms include Shallum (1 Chron. 9:17, 19,31; Ezra 2:42) and Meshullam (Neh. 12:25). All may refer to the same Levite or various persons may be intended.

MESHEZABEEL (Mĕ shĕz' ă bēēl) KJV form of Meshezabel, a personal name meaning, "God delivers." 1. Ancestor of one of those working on the wall (Neh. 3:4). 2. One of the chiefs of the people witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:21). 3. Member of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:24). All three are perhaps the same individual.

MESHILLEMITH (Mĕ shĭl' lĕ mĭth) Alternate form of Meshillemoth at 1 Chronicles 9:12.

MESHILLEMOTH (Mĕ shĭl' lĕ mŏth) Personal name meaning, "reconciliation." 1. A priest (1 Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:13); 2. Member of the tribe of Ephraim (2 Chron. 28:12).

MESHOBAB (Mĕ shō' băb) Personal name from a root meaning, "return." Leader of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:34).

MESHULLAM (Mĕ shŭl' lăm) Personal name meaning, "allied," or "given as a replacement." 1. Grandfather of Shaphan, King Josiah's secretary (2 Kings 22:3). See Josiah. 2. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19). See Zerubbabel. 3. A member of the tribe of Gad who lived in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13). 4. A son of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17).

5. A son of Hodaviah, father of Sallu (1 Chron. 9:7). 6. A son of Shephatiah (1 Chron. 9:8). 7. A member of the priestly family, a son of Zadok, and the father of Hilkiah (1 Chron. 9:11). See Zadok. 8. A son of Meshillemith of the priestly Zadokite family (1 Chron. 9:12). See Zadok. 9. A descendant of Kohathite, one of the foremen during the repairs made in the Temple following the finding of the Book of Deuteronomy during Josiah's reign (2 Chron. 34:12).

10. One sent by Ezra to secure the services of a Levite for a group of returning exiles (Ezra 8:15–18). He later opposed Ezra's plan to end foreign marriages becaue he had a foreign wife himself (10:29). 11. A son of Berechiah, he helped Nehemiah repair the walls around Jerusalem following the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:4). 12. A son of Besodiah who helped repair the old gate (the Jeshanah Gate, NIV) when Nehemiah repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6). See Nehemiah. 13. He stood beside Ezra as the scribe read the Law to the people of Jerusalem (Neh. 8:2–4). 14. One of the priests who joined Nehemiah and others setting his seal to the covenant between the people and God (Neh. 10:7). 15. One of the leaders of the people who set his seal to the covenant between the people and God (Neh. 10:20). 16. A son of Ezra, head of a priestly house during the time Jehoiakim was high priest (Neh. 12:13). 17. Another head of a priestly house when Jehoiakim was high priest; son of Ginnethon (Neh. 12:16).

18. A guard of the storerooms at the gates (Neh. 12:25 NIV). 19. A prince of Judah who participated in the procession to dedicate the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:33).

MESHULLEMETH (Mĕ shŭl' lĕ mĕth) Personal name meaning, "restitution." Wife of King Mannaseh and mother of Amon (2 Kings 21:19).

MESOBAITE (Mē sō′ bā īte) KJV form of Mezobaite (NAS, NIV, NRSV), the title of one of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:47). The REB and TEV amended the text to give the reading "resident of Zobah."

MESOPOTAMIA (Mĕs′ o po tā′ mĭ ā) Strictly speaking, Mesopotamia (from the Greek "between the rivers") is the designation of the area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Mesopotamia applies more generally to the entire Tigris-Euphrates valley. At times in antiquity the culture of Mesopotamia dominated an even larger area, spreading east into Elam and Media, north into Asia Minor, and following the fertile crescent into Canaan and Egypt.

The Scriptures witness to a long history of contacts between the Hebrew people and the people of Mesopotamia. Mesopotamia was the homeland of the patriarchs (Gen. 11:31—12:4; 24:10; 28:6). A Mesopotamian king subdued Israel for a time during the period of the judges (Judg. 3:8). Mesopotamia supplied mercenary chariots and cavalry for the Ammonites' war with David (1 Chron. 19:6; superscription of Ps. 60). Both the Northern Kingdom of Israel (2 Kings 15:29; 1 Chron. 5:26) and the Southern Kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 24:14–16; 2 Chron. 36:20; Ezra 2:1) went into Exile in Mesopotamia.

MESSENGER One sent with a message. Messenger is often used in the literal sense (Gen. 32:3,6; Num. 20:14; 24:12; Deut. 2:26). In an extended sense, the prophets (2 Chron. 36:15–16; Isa. 44:26; Hag. 1:13) and priests (Mal. ?:7) are termed messengers in their role as bearers of God's message for humanity. The Hebrew and Greek terms for messenger are frequently rendered "angel," the heavenly messengers of God. See Angels. Sometimes messengers made advance travel arrangements for their master (Luke 9:52). In this sense the prophetic messenger of Malachi 3:1 prepares for the Lord's coming. The Gospel writers applied this preparatory function to John the Baptist (Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 7:27). See Herald.

MESSIAH (Mĕs sī′ ah) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning, "anointed one" that was translated into Greek as Christos. See Christ, Christology. Since apostolic times the name Christ has become the proper name of Jesus, the Person whom Christians recognize as the God-given Redeemer of Israel and the church's Lord. "Christ" or Messiah is therefore a name admirably suited to express both the church's link with Israel through the Old Testament and the faith that sees in Jesus Christ the worldwide scope of the salvation in Him.

The Old Testament and Early Jewish Background "Anointed" carries several senses in the Old Testament. All have to do with installing a person in an office in a way that the person will be regarded as accredited by Yahweh, Israel's God. Even a pagan king such as Cyrus was qualified as the Lord's anointed (Isa. 45:1) to execute a divinely appointed task. The usual application of the term anointed was to God's representatives within the covenant people. Prophets such as Elisha were set apart in this way (1 Kings 19:16). Israel probably saw a close link between the anointed persons and God's spirit though the link is specifically mentioned only occasionally (2 Kings 2:9). Israelite kings were particularly hailed as Yahweh's anointed(compare Jud. 9:8), beginning with Saul (1 Sam. 9—10 NIV) and especially referring to David (1 Sam. 16:6,13; see 2 Sam. 2:4; 5:3) and Solomon (1 Kings 1:39). The royal family of David as being the line of Israelite kings are mentioned by the title of the "anointed ones" (2 Sam. 22:51; compare 2 Kings 11:12; 23:30; Pss. 2:2; 20:6; 28:8; 84:9). The king in Israel thus became a sacred person to whom loyalty and respect were to be accorded (1 Sam. 24:6,10; 26:9,11,16,23; 2 Sam. 1:14,16). The oracle spoken by Nathan (2 Sam. 7:12–16) is important since it centers the hope of Israel on the dynasty of David for succeeding generations.

The king, especially in the Psalms, became idealized as a divine son (Ps. 2:2,7; compare 2 Sam. 7:14) and enjoyed God's protecting favor (Ps. 18:50; 20:6; 28:8). His dynasty would not fail (Ps. 132:17), and the people were encouraged to pray to God on his behalf (Ps. 72:11–15; 84:9). The fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. led to great confusion especially when Yahweh's anointed was taken into Exile as a prisoner (Lam. 4:20) and his authority as king rejected by the nations (Ps. 89:38,51). This humiliation of the Davidic dynasty posed a set of problems to Israel's faith, even when the people were permitted to return to the land. No revival came for the Davidic kingship; yet that restoration became the pious longing of the Jews both in Babylonian Exile (Jer. 33:14–18) and in the later centuries. One of the clearest expressions of the continuing hope was in the Psalms of Solomon (17—18)(70–40 B.C.), a Jewish writing of the Messiah as the son of David. There Messiah was a warrior-prince who would expel the hated Romans from Israel and bring in a kingdom in which the Jews would be promoted to world dominion.

After the Exile the Israelite priesthood came into prominence. In the absence of a king, the high priest took on a central role in the community. The rite of anointing was the outward sign of his authority to function as God's representative. This authority was traced back to Aaron and his sons (Ex. 29:7–9; 30:22–33; compare Ps. 133:2). The high priest was the anointed-priest (Lev. 4:3,5,16) and even, in one place, a "messiah" (Zech 4:14; compare 6:13; Dan. 9:25).

The coming of Elijah	Mal. 4:5,6	Matt. 11:14; 17:10–12

In the exilic and postexilic ages, the expectation of a coming Messiah came into sharper focus, commencing with Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's vision of a Messiah who would combine the traits of royalty and priestly dignity (Jer. 33:14–18; Ezek. 46:1–8; see, too, Zech. 4:1–14; 6:13). The people in the Dead Sea scrolls were evidently able to combine a dual hope of two Messiahs, one priestly and the second a royal figure. The alternation between a kingly Messiah and a priestly figure is characteristic of the two centuries of early Judaism prior to the coming of Jesus.

Messiahship in Jesus' Ministry A question posed in John 4:29; compare 7:40–43 is: "Is not this the Christ (Messiah)." It is evident that the issue of the Messiah's identity and role was one much debated among the Jews in the first century. In the Synoptic Gospels the way Jesus acted and spoke led naturally to the dialogue at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:29). Jesus asked His disciples, "Who do you say that I am?" a question to which Peter gave the reply, "Thou art the Christ (Messiah)" (Mark 8:29). Mark made clear that Jesus took an attitude of distinct reserve and caution to this title since it carried overtones of political power, especially in one strand of Jewish hope represented by the Psalms of Solomon. Jesus, therefore, accepted Peter's confession with great reluctance since with it went the disciple's objection that the Messiah cannot suffer (see Mark 9:32). For Peter, Messiah was a title of a glorious personage both nationalistic and victorious in battle. Jesus, on the other hand, saw His destiny in terms of a suffering Son of man and Servant of God (Mark 8:31–38; 9:31; 10:33–34). Hence He did not permit the demons to greet Him as Messiah (Luke 4:41) and downplayed all claims to privilege and overt majesty linked with the Jewish title.

The course of Jesus' ministry is one in which He sought to wean the disciples away from the traditional notion of a warrior Messiah. Instead, Jesus tried to instill in their minds the prospect that the road to His future glory was bound to run by way of the cross, with its experience of rejection, suffering, and humiliation. At the trial before His Jewish judges (Matt. 26:63–66) He once more reinterpreted the title Messiah ("Christ," KJV) and gave it a content in terms of the Son of man figure, based on Daniel 7:13–14. This confession secured His condemnation, and He went to the cross as a crucified Messiah because the Jewish leaders failed to perceive the nature of messiahship as Jesus understood it. Pilate sentenced Him as a messianic pretender who claimed (according to the false charges brought against Him) to be a rival to Caesar (Mark 15:9; Luke 23:2; John 19:14–15). It was only after the resurrection that the disciples were in a position to see how Jesus was truly a king Messiah and how Jesus then opened their minds to what true Messiahship meant (see Luke 24:45–46). The national title Messiah then took on a broader connotation, involving a kingly role which was to embrace all peoples (Luke 24:46–47).

Messiah as a Title in the Early Church From the resurrection onward the first preachers announced that Jesus was the Messiah by divine appointment (Acts 2:36; Rom. 1:3–4). Part of the reason for this forthright declaration is to be traced to apologetic reasons. In the mission to Israel the church had to show how Jesus fulfilled the Old Testament prophecies and came into the world as the "Son of David," a title closely linked with the Messiah as a royal person. Matthew's Gospel is especially concerned to establish the identity (Matt. 1:1), but it is equally a theme common to Luke (Luke 1:32,69; 2:4,11; Acts 2:29–36; 13:22–23). Paul also saw in Jesus the fulfillment of the messianic hopes of the old covenant (1 Cor. 5:7–8). Peter, too, sought to show how the sufferings of the Messiah were foretold (1 Pet. 1:11,20; 2:21; 3:18; 4:1,13; 5:1). Luke stressed the link between Jesus as the One anointed by the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:16–22) in a way that looks back to Isaiah 61:1, and he recorded Peter's statement (in Acts 10:38 NIV) that "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and power" as a fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy. The letter to the Hebrews is rich in this theme. See Hebrews 1:9; 2:2–4; 9:14–15.

The final stage of development in regard to the title Messiah came in the way that Paul used the word more as a personal name than as an official designation (seen in Rom. 9:5, "Christ"). The reason for this shift lies in the intensely personal nature of Paul's faith which centered in Jesus Christ as the divine Lord (see Phil. 1:21; Col. 3:4). Also, Paul taught his converts who were mainly converted to Christ from paganism that Jesus was the universal Lord whose mission was wider than any Jewish hope could embrace. In Pauline thought, "Christ" is a richer term than "Messiah" could ever be, and one pointer in this direction is the fact that the early followers of the Messiah called themselves not converted Jews but "Christians," Christ's people (Acts 11:26; 1 Pet. 4:16) as a sign of their universal faith in a sovereign Lord. MESSIANIC SECRET Title Bible students use to explain Jesus' commands to His audience and His disciples not to reveal who He was after His performance of messianic wonders. Throughout the Gospel of Mark, Jesus made every attempt to conceal His true identity as the Christ. Although the messianic secret can be found in the Gospels of Matthew (8:3–4; 9:29–31; 12:15–16; 17:9) and Luke (4:41; 8:56; 9:21), Mark used the mysterious unveiling of the messiahship of Jesus as the unifying theme of his Gospel. Typically, Matthew understood the messianic secret as the fulfillment of prophecy (Matt. 12:17–21); Luke provided no explanation. Mark, however, used the messianic secret to organize his story around the progressive revelation of the person of Christ and the messianic consciousness of the disciples. Demons demonstrated that they recognized Jesus immediately: "I know who You are—the Holy One of God!" (1:24–25,34; 3:11–12; 5:6–8; 9:20 NIV); nevertheless, Jesus suppressed their confession. Jesus prohibited public profession by those who experienced miraculous healing (1:43; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26). The parables of Jesus were offered in order to keep "outsiders" from learning the secret (4:11–12). Even the disciples, once they related that they understood the "mystery of the kingdom of God" (4:11), were sworn to silence (8:30; 9:9). Why did Jesus want to keep His messiahship a secret?

Perhaps Jesus avoided the title due to the popular messianic expectations of the people—they were looking for a political deliverer. Some believe that Jesus prohibited messianic proclamation so that He could continue to move about freely in public. The only parable of Jesus which Mark recorded exclusively may provide a clue to the purpose of the messianic secret. Jesus introduced the parable of the secret growing seed (4:26–29) with the proverb: "For nothing is hidden, except to be revealed; nor has anything been secret, but that it should come to light" (4:22 NAS). Jesus intended for people of faith to learn the secret of His messiahship (4:11,34). He compared the mystery of the kingdom of God to a man who sows seed and discovers, to his amazement, that seeded ground produces plants which secretly grow at night—"he knoweth not how" (4:27). Like the seed which is covered by ground, the secret of Jesus' identity would be concealed for a season: discovering the messianic secret would take time. Jesus did not force people to accept Him as Messiah; "those who had ears to hear" must learn the secret on their own. The disciples not only needed time to recognize Jesus as Messiah (4:41; 6:52; 8:17–21), they also needed time to come to terms with His messianic agenda: messianic suffering precedes messianic glory (9:31–32). Complete human understanding of the messianic secret would only be possible after the resurrection (9:9–10). Therefore, no immediate messianic profession would possess any depth of understanding (especially demonic confession!). Jesus forced the disciples to think about the secret until they could articulate the secret.

METALSMITH, METALWORKER See Minerals and Metals; Mines and Mining; Occupations.

METHEG-AMMAH (Měth' ĕg-ăm' mah) A phrase of uncertain meaning used at 2 Samuel 8:1. KJV, NIV, NRSV take it as a place name. NAS translated the phrase as "the chief city." The parallel in 1 Chronicles 18:1 has "Gath and its villages." Other suggestions for translation include: "bridle of the water channel," reins of the forearm," "control of the mother city," "take the common land," or "wrest supremacy from."

METHUSAEL (Mė thū' sā ĕl) KJV form of Methushael, a personal name of uncertain meaning. "Man of God" is possible. Canaanite patriarch (Gen. 4:18). Some scholars regard the name as a variant of Methuselah (Gen. 5:21).

METHUSELAH (Mė thŭ' sė lah) Personal name meaning either, "man of the javelin" or "worshiper of Selah." A son of Enoch (who walked with God) and grandfather of Noah (Gen. 5:21,26–29). According to the biblical record, Methuselah is the oldest human ever, dying at age 969 (Gen. 5:27).

MEUNIM, MEUNITES (Mė' ū nĭm; Mė' ū nītes) See Mehunim.

MEZAHAB (Mĕz' ā hăb) Either a personal or a place name meaning, "waters of gold" (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). If a person, Mezahab was the grandfather of Mehetabel, the wife of King Hadar of Edom. If a place name, Mezahab was the home of Matred which should perhaps be identified with Dizahab (Deut. 1:1).

MEZUZAH (Mė zū' zăh) Hebrew term for doorpost. Ancient doors pivoted on posts set in sockets. The blood of the passover lamb was to be applied to door posts (Ex. 12:7,22–23). At the beginning of the new year blood was to be applied to the doorposts of the temple to make atonement for it (Ezek. 45:19). The command to write the words of the Shema (Deut. 6:4–9; 11:13–21) on the doorposts of one's home, like the command to write them on one's heart (Deut. 6:6), is a challenge to always remember that love of God is central to faith. At a later time, these commands were understood literally. Today Mezuzah refers to small scrolls inscribed with Deuteronomy 6:4–9; 11:13–21 placed in a container attached to the door jambs of some Jewish homes.

MIBHAR (Mĭb' hăr) Personal name meaning "best" or "chosen." One of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:38). The parallel at 2 Samuel 23:36, reflecting a copying error in transmission of the text, reads, "of Zobah, Bani the Godite."

MIBSAM (Mĭb' săm) Personal name meaning, "fragrant." 1. Arab tribe descended from a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29). 2. Descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25).

MIBZAR (Mĭb′ zär) Personal name meaning, "fortification." Edomite clan chief and his tribe (Gen. 36:42; 1 Chron. 1:53). Mibzar is possibly Mabsara in northern Edom or Bozrah (Gen. 36:33; Amos 1:12).

MIC MASH (Mĭc′ măsh) NIV spelling of Michmash.

MICA (Mī′ cə) See Micha 2. Variant spelling modern translations used for Micah reflecting Aramaic spelling in text of 2 Samuel 9:12; Nehemiah 10:11; 11:17,22; 1 Chronicles 9:15. All passages reflect Levites.

MICAH (Mī′ cah) Abbreviated form of the personal name Micaiah, meaning, "Who is like Yahweh?" 1. Ephramite whose home shrine was the source of Dan's idolotrous worship (Judg. 17—18). 2. Descendant of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:5). 3. Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:34–35; 9:40–44); at 2 Samuel 9:12, the KJV used the form Micha. 4. Leader of a family of Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 23:20; 24:24–25). 5. Father of Abdon, a contemporary of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:20); at 2 Kings 22:12, the form Micaiah is used.

MICAH, BOOK OF (Mī′ cah) A prophetic book named after the eighth century B.C. prophet containing some of his messages. The prophet Micah's name means, "Who is like Yah?" People in the Ancient Near East commonly gave their children names that indicated devotion to their god, and Yahweh was the name by which the God of Israel and Judah was called. See Micah; Micaiah; Micha.

Micah 1:1 gives the reader three pieces of information about the prophet. He came from Maresheth (NIV) which probably should be identified with Moresheth-gath. This village was located about 25 miles southwest of Jerusalem in the tribe of Judah. Micah, however, may have lived in Jerusalem during his ministry. He worked in the reigns of Jotham (750–732 B.C.), Ahaz (735–715 B.C.), and Hezekiah (715–686 B.C.) who were kings of Judah. The identification of these kings does not mean that he was active from 750–686, but that his ministry spanned parts of each reign. Jeremiah 26:17–18 refers to Micah as prophesying during the time of Hezekiah. Determining exact dates, however, for each of the prophecies contained in the book is difficult. Micah was a contemporary of Isaiah, Hosea, and possibly Amos.

Finally, His prophecies addressed Samaria and Jerusalem. Samaria was the capital of the Northern Kingdom (Israel) and Jerusalem, of the Southern Kingdom (Judah). Even though Micah ministered in Judah, some of his messages were directed toward Israel.

Historical Background In Micah's time, many political and national crises occurred. Micah addressed those issues.

The Assyrian Empire began to dominate the Ancient Near East about 740 B.C. Judah and Israel became tribute-paying vassals of this new political power, and in 722 B.C. Israel felt the might of the Assyrian army. Shalmaneser V and Sargon II destroyed the Northern Kingdom and its capital, Samaria (2 Kings 16—17) because of an attempted rebellion. The records of Sargon II state that he "besieged and conquered Samaria, (and) led away as booty 27,290 inhabitants of it." While Judah survived, they still were vassals. Micah 1:2–7 associates the imminent destruction of Samaria as God's judgment for the people's idolatry. Hezekiah, king of Judah, instituted many reforms that caused the Assyrian king, Sennacherib, to respond with force. Many cities of Judah were destroyed, and Jerusalem was unsuccessfully besieged (2 Kings 18—19). The annals of Sennacherib boast that he laid siege to 46 cities and countless small villages. He took 200,150 people as booty along with the livestock. As for Hezekiah, Sennacherib says, "Himself I made a prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage." Despite the failure to take Jerusalem, the citizens of the Southern Kingdom suffered greatly from the invasion.

The Prophet's Message The subjects of Micah's messages reveal much about the society of his day. He constantly renounced the oppression of the poor by the rich. He characterized the rich as devising ways in which to cheat the poor out of their land (2:1–5). People were evicted from their homes and had their possessions stolen. Those who committed such crimes were fellow Israelites (2:6–11). The marketplace was full of deception and injustice (6:9–16). The rulers of the country, who had the responsibility of upholding justice, did the opposite (3:1–4).

Micah also denounced the religious practices of the nation. He predicted the destruction of Judah as an act of God's judgment. Other prophets, however, led the people to believe that this could never happen because God was residing in the nation and would protect them. Micah contended that the other prophets' message was not from God. Instead, the message from God was the imminent devastation of Judah (3:5–12).

The people worshiped other gods. They did not quit believing in and worshiping the God of Judah, but they combined this worship with devotion to other details (5:10–15). The people believed all that religion required of them was to bring their sacrifices and offerings to the Temple. No relationship was acknowledged between their activity in the Temple and their activity in daily life. Micah attempted to correct this misconception by arguing that God is not just interested in the physical act of making a sacrifice but is supremely concerned with obedience that extends into daily life (6:6–8).

Micah warned of impending judgment on God's people for their disobedience. At the same time, he proclaimed messages of hope. Judgment would come, but afterwards, God would restore a remnant of the people devoted to Him (4:1–13; 7:14–20). Unlike the unjust kings that the people were accustomed to, God would bring a ruler who would allow the people to live in peace (5:1–5). Ultimately, Judah was destroyed in 586 B.C. by the Babylonians, but a remnant returned. Matthew saw in Micah's hope for a new ruler a description of Christ (Matt. 2:6). MICAIAH (Mī cai' ah) Personal name meaning, "Who is like Yahweh?" 1. Son of Imlah and prophet of Yahweh who predicted the death of Ahab and the scattering of Israel's forces at Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings 22:7–28). Having witnessed Yahweh's heavenly council, Micaiah was certain Ahab's 400 prophets were possessed by a lying spirit. When accused and imprisoned on a charge of false prophecy, Micaiah replied, "If you return in peace, the LORD has not spoken by me" (22:28 NRSV). 2. Form of Michaiah modern translations prefer.

MICE See Animals.

MICHA (Mī chà) KJV alternate form for Micah and Mica. 1. Descendant of King Saul (2 Sam. 9:12; See Micah 3.). 2. One in a family line of Temple musicians (Neh. 11:17,22). Nehemiah 12:35 uses the longer form Micaiah.

MICHAEL (Mī' chaèl) Personal name meaning, "Who is like God?" 1. Father of one of the twelve Israelite spies (Num. 13:13). *2–3.*Two Gadites (1 Chron. 5:13–14). 4. Ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40). 5. Leader of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3) perhaps identical to the father of Omri (1 Chron. 27:18). 6. Leader of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:16); 7. Manassite who defected to David's army (1 Chron. 12:20). 8. Son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2). 9. Ancestor of one of those who returned from Exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:8). 10. Archangel who served as the guardian of the nation of Israel (Dan. 10:13,21; 12:1). Together with Gabriel, Michael fought for Israel against the prince (angelic patron) of Persia. This angelic Michael figures in much extra-biblical literature in the intertestamental period. In Revelation 12:7 Michael commands the forces of God against the forces of the dragon in a war in heaven. Jude 9 refers to a dispute between the devil and Michael over Moses' body. According to Origin (A.D. 185? to 254?), this account formed part of the extra-biblical work, The Assumption of Moses. The incident is not mentioned in the surviving fragments of this work. See Angel.

MICHAH (Mī' chah) Abbreviated form of the personal name Micaiah, KJV used for the leader of a family of Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 23:20; 24:24–25). Modern translations prefer the form Micah.

MICHAIAH (Mīch âi′ ah) KJV form of Micaiah, a personal name meaning, "Who is like Yah?" 1. Father of an officer of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:12). 2. Wife of King Rehoboam and mother of Abijah (2 Chron. 13:1–2). 3. Participant in Jehoshaphat's reforms (2 Chron. 17:7). 4. Member of a leading family in Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36:11,13); 5. Priest participating in Nehemiah's dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:41) and ancestor of a participating priest (Neh. 12:35).

MICHAL (Mī′ chăl) Personal name meaning, "who is like El (God)?," a variant form of Micah, "who is like Yah?" and abbreviated form of Michael. King Saul's younger daughter (1 Sam. 14:49) given to David in marriage for the price of one hundred dead Philistines (1 Sam. 18:20–29). (Saul may have thought David would be killed in the attempt). The king continued to set traps for David, but on one occasion Michal helped her husband escape (1 Sam 19:11–17). For revenge, Saul gave her to Phaltiel (1 Sam. 25:44). Following Saul's death at Gilboa, David made a treaty with Abner, Saul's general. One of the points of the pact was that Michal would be returned to David,much to Phaltiel's regret(2 Sam. 3:14–16). David's dancing before the ark of the covenant as he brought the sacred box to Jerusalem enraged Michal, who criticized the king to his face. As punishment Michal was never allowed to bear children (2 Sam. 6:16–23; compare 2 Sam. 21:8).

MICHMASH (Mich′ mash) Place name meaning, "hidden place." City in Benjamin about seven miles northeast of Jerusalem, four and a half miles northeast of Gibeah, rising 1980 feet above sea level overlooking a pass going from the Jordan River to Ephraim. It is four and a half miles southeast of Bethel, which rises 2,890 feet above sea level. It is modern Mukhmas. Michmash served as a staging area, first for Saul (1 Sam. 13:2) and then for the Philistine army as they prepared to fight. It lay on the standard invasion route from the north (Isa. 10:28). The Philistines mustered 30,000 chariots and 6,000 horsemen there (1 Sam. 13:5–6). Before the battle could begin, Jonathan and his armor bearer sneaked into the Philistine camp, killed twenty sentries, and set off great confusion, resulting in the Philistines fighting each other (14:20). Exiles returning from Babylon reinhabited the city (Neh. 11:31; compare 7:31). It served as Jonathan Maccabeus' residence and seat of government (1 Macc. 9:73). See Jonathan; Intertestamental History.

MICHMETHAH (Mīch′ mĕ thah) Place name meaning, "hiding place" or "concealment." Site near Shechem (Josh. 16:6; 17:7). Michmethath has been identifed with khirbet Makhneh el-Foqa about five miles southeast of Shechem and with khirbet Juleijil east of Shechem.

MICHMETHATH (Mīch mĕ thăth) Spelling following Hebrew of Michmethah in NAS, NIV, NRSV, REB.

View of the gorge at Michmash.

MICHRI (Mĭch′ rī) Personal name meaning, "purchase price." Member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:8).

MICHTAM (Mĭch′ tăm) KJV form of Miktam. Heading for Psalms 16; 56—60. The meaning of the term is disputed. Suggestions include a musical notation or a title for psalms connected with expiation of sin. At Isaiah 38:9, Hezekiah's "writing" (Hebrew miktab) should perhaps be Miktam.

MICRI (Mĭc′ rī) NIV spelling of Michri.

MIDDAY Noon or thereabouts (Neh. 8:3; Acts 26:13).

MIDDIN (Mĭd′ dĭn) Place name meaning, "judgment." Village in the wilderness district of Judah (Josh. 15:61). The LXX identified Middin with Madon. Recently, khirbet Abu Tabaq in the Achor Valley has been suggested as a possible site.

MIDDLE GATE A city gate of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3). Archeologists have found evidence of battle (arrowheads, charred wood) located outside the remains of a gate in the middle of the north wall of the preexilic city. It seems probable that the Babylonians attacked the city from the north and that these are, in fact, the remains of the Middle Gate. The gate is possibly identical to the Fish Gate (2 Chron. 33:14; Neh. 3:3; Zeph. 1:10).

MIDDLE WALL Term is found in Ephesians 2:14 and variously translated: "middle wall of partition" (KJV); "dividing wall of hostility" (NRSV; NIV); "barrier of the dividing wall" (NASB); "barrier of enmity which separated them" (REB). Investigation of the term has yielded several possible interpretations: (1) The wall that separated the inner and outer courts of the Temple and prevented Jews and Gentiles from worshiping together. Inscriptions in Greek and Latin warned that Gentiles who disregarded the barrier would suffer the pain of death. (2) The curtain that separated the holy of holies from the rest of the Temple. This curtain was rent at the death of Jesus (see Mark 15:38) and is representative of the separation of all humanity from God. (3) The "fence" consisting of detailed commandments and oral interpretations erected around the law by its interpreters to ensure its faithful observation. In reality, the fenced-in law generated hostility between Jews and Gentiles and further divided them, as well as furthering the enmity between God and humanity. Destruction of the law's mediators opens a new and living way to God through Christ Jesus (Eph. 2:18; 3:12; Heb. 10:20). (4) The cosmic barrier that separates God and persons, persons themselves, and other powers in the universe (Eph. 1:20–21)—angels, dominions, principalities. (5) Echoing Isaiah 59:2, the term refers to the separation of humanity from God as a result of sin.

No one interpretation is sufficient by itself. The writer of Ephesians stressed that every conceivable barrier that exists between persons and between God and humanity has been destroyed by God's definitive work in Jesus Christ.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES (Mĭd′ ĭ an, Mĭd′ ĭ an ītes). Personal and clan name meaning, "strife"

Midian was the son of Abraham by his concubine Keturah (Gen. 25:2). Abraham sent him and his brothers away to the east, leading to the assocation of the Midianites with the "children of the east" (Judg. 6:3). Midianites took Joseph to Egypt (Gen. 37:28,36). Since the caravan in the passage is described as Ishmaelite, it is possible that these two groups descended from Abraham had become interrelated. The Old Testament mentions the Midianites in widely scattered geographical locations, but their main homeland seems to be east of the Jordan and south of Edom. Later historians locate the land of Midian in northwestern Arabia east of the Gulf of Aqabah. The people of Israel had both good and bad relationships with the Midianites. When Moses fled from Pharaoh, he went east to Midian (Ex. 2:15). Here he met Jethro (also called Reuel), the priest of Midian, and married his daughter. During the wandering in the wilderness, Reuel's father-in-law Hobab served as a guide for the Israelites (Num. 10:29–32). The Midianites are associated with the Moabites in seducing Israel into immorality and pagan worship at Baal-peor (Num. 25:1–18). For this reason God commanded Moses to execute a war of vengeance against them (Num. 31:3; compare Josh. 13:21). In the time of the judges the Midianites along with the Amalekites began to raid Israel using camels to strike swiftly over great distances. Gideon drove them out and killed their leaders (Judg. 6—8). They never again threatened Israel; but Midian did harbor Solomon's enemy Hadad (1 Kings 11:18).

MIDNIGHT The middle of the night (Judg. 16:3; Ps. 119:62; Acts 16:25).

MIDRASH A Jewish term from the Hebrew verb darash meaning, "to search" and, therefore, to make exposition. Title of a body of Jewish literature that gathers together the Jewish scholars' exegesis, exposition, and homiletical interpretations of Scripture in the centuries just before and after Jesus.

Meaning to discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface, a midrash denotes a didactic (teaching) or homiletic (preaching) exposition or an edifying religious story such as that of Tobit. Midrash also includes a religious interpretation of history, as the prophet Iddo's commentary on the acts, ways, and sayings of King Abijam (2 Chron. 13:22) and the Commentary on the Book of the Kings, in which were set forth the burdens laid upon King Joash and his rebuilding of the Temple (2 Chron. 24:27). This Jewish method of searching the Scriptures sought to discover the deeper meaning of the most minute details contained in the sacred text. The main characteristics of midrash are: (1) its starting point is an actual text or texts (often two quite different passages are combined) from the Bible itself; (2) is homiletic, essentially designed to edify and instruct; (3) it is based on a close and detailed scrutiny of the actual text, in which it seeks to establish the underlying reasons for each word, phrase, or group of words (compare rabbinical method of systematically applying the question "why"); (4) it is concerned to apply the message thus established to the present age. Midrash is divided into halacha (oral law), midrashic investigation of the lgeal parts of the Old Testament with the aim of establishing rules of conduct, and haggadah, a similar investigation of the nonlegal parts with purpose of edifying or instructing.

Ezra used Midrash in the public reading of the law (Neh. 8). Midrash became the basic work leading to the production of the Targumin (Aramaic paraphrases of Scripture) and of the mainline expression of Judaism (Mishnah, Talmud). See Targum; Mishnah; Talmud. Ezra also seems to have practiced the use of midrash, by having as his objective in life to study and apply the Torah, as well as to instruct the nation in the ordinances and statutes of the Law (Ezra 7:10). Many Bible students believe numerous examples of midrash in most, if not all, of its various forms appear in the New Testament. Thus, Matthew 2:1–12 (the first part of the infancy narrative) is held to be a midrash on Numbers 24:17. Matthew 27:3–10 (the 30 pieces of silver) is regarded as a midrash on Zechariah 11:12–13 and Jeremiah 32:6–15. Midrashic elements are also present in Paul (Gal. 3:4; Rom. 4:9–11; 2 Cor. 3) and other areas of the New Testament. It is important, therefore, for the interpretation of the New Testament to understand the characteristic methods and approach of midrash. The term midrash is also used of the collections of midrashic expositions; or of a manner of religious teaching that follows the midrashic method.

An important use of the Midrash is that it gives the interpreter of Scripture a greater insight into interpretation from a people closer to the original appearance of the Old Testament books, as well as an understanding of the text across history by Jewish people. Stories contained in a midrash may be totally historically accurate or simply a piece of fiction based on history, or even a work of literary fiction without any basis in history.

Midrashic material was preserved orally from its inception for a considerable period. Only after A.D. 100 were the halakic midrashim written down. The most important of these were the Mekilta (treatise) to Exodus and the Sifra (book) on Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The earliest written haggadah was the midrash on Genesis, going back to about A.D. 200 or later. This was followed by the midrashim on the rest of the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls (Megilloth). These commentaries became known as the Midrash Rabbah, and with later compositions were much favored by the rabbis for homiletical purposes.

MIDWIFE Woman who assists in the delivery of a child (Ex. 1:15–21). The duties of the midwife likely included cutting the umbilical cord, washing and salting the babe, and wrapping the child in cloths (Ezek. 16:4). The civil disobedience of the Hebrew midwives Siphrah and Puah confounded Pharaoh's plan to exterminate male Hebrews for a time (Ex. 1:15–21). Their faithfulness was rewarded with families of their own (Ex. 1:21), suggesting that childless women frequently served as midwives. The women of Ruth 4:14–17 and 1 Samuel 4:20 were likely serving as midwives.

MIGDAL-EL (Mĭg' dăl-ĕl) Place name meaning, "fortress of God." Fortified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). Migdal-el was located in northern Galilee in the vicinity of Iron (Yiron).

MIGDAL-GAD (Mĭg' dăl-găd) Place name meaning, "Tower of Gad." Village near Lachish in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:37). The site is perhaps that of khirbet el-Mejdeleh five miles south of Beit Jibrin.

MIGDOL (Mĭg' dŏl) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning, "tower, watchtower, fortress." A town or a border fortress located in the northeast corner of Egypt. The site is mentioned in reference to two events in biblical history—the Exodus and the Exile. One of the sites on or near the route of the Exodus, Migdol was located near the sites of Pi-hahiroth and Baal-Zephon, all of which were near the sea (Ex. 14:2). Jewish refugees fled to Migdol during the Exile (Jer. 44:1). The coming doom of Egypt at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar was to be proclaimed there (Jer. 46:13–14). Ezekiel prophesied that the land of Egypt would be laid waste, "from Migdol to Aswan" (Ezek. 29:10; 30:6 NIV), that is from the northern extremity of the land, Migdol, to the southern extremity of the land, Aswan.

Since migdol could be used as a proper name,

Migdol, or as a common noun, "tower," two questions remain unresolved. What is the exact location of the site of Migdol? Do all of the references to Migdol refer to the same site, or was there more than one site in Egypt named Migdol? More than one site may have borne the name Migdol, though the evidence we have at hand is inconclusive. The Amarna Letters from Egypt refer to an Egyptian city named Maagdali, but information about its location is not given. See Amarna tell el. For instance a papyrus manuscript mentions the Migdol of Pharoah Seti I. This Migdol was located near Tjeku, the location of which is still debated. Some prefer to identify Tjeku with Succoth, modern-day tell el-Maskhutah, while others identify it with tell el-Her located further north near Pelusium. For this reason we may assume with some certainty that there were at least two sites named Migdol: the Migdol referred to by Jeremiah and Ezekiel located near Pelusium, and the Migdol on the route of the Exodus located near Succoth. Both may have been part of a line of border fortresses or migdols designed to provide protection for Egypt against invasion from the Sinai. See Watchtower, Egypt. LaMoine DeVries

MIGHTY MEN Applied to the descendants of the Nephalim, mighty men likely indicates men of great size (Gen. 6:4; perhaps Josh. 10:2). Elsewhere mighty men refers to valiant warriors, especially to the elite groups of three and thirty who served David (2 Sam. 17:8,10; 23:8–39; 1 Kings 1:10,38). Many of David's elite forces were mercenaries.

MIGRON (Mīg′ rŏn) Place name meaning, "precipice." Town (or towns) in Benjamin (1 Sam. 14:2; Isa. 10:28). The town of 1 Samuel is generally located near Gibeah south of Michmash. The town of Isaiah 10 is generally located between Aiath (Ai) and Michmash, that is, to the north of Michmash. Suggested sites include Makrun, tell Miryam, and tell el 'Askar.

MIJAMIN (Mīj′ ȧ mĭn) Contracted form of the personal name Miniamin, meaning, "lucky" (literally, "from the right hand"). The name is attested in Neo-Babylonian and Persian business documents. 1. Priest in David's time (1 Chron. 24:9). 2. Priest who returned from Exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5). 3. Priest witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:7). 4. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:25). The KJV form of 2. and 4. is Miamin.

MIKLOTH (Mīk′ lŏth) Personal name meaning, "sticks." 1. Descendant of Jeiel and resident of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:32; 9:37–38). 2. Officer in David's militia (1 Chron. 27:4). REB, RSV followed the early Greek translation in omitting the name.

MIKNEIAH (Mĭk neī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh acquires" or "Yahweh creates." Levitic musician in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,21).

MIKTAM (Mīk′ tăm) See Michtam.

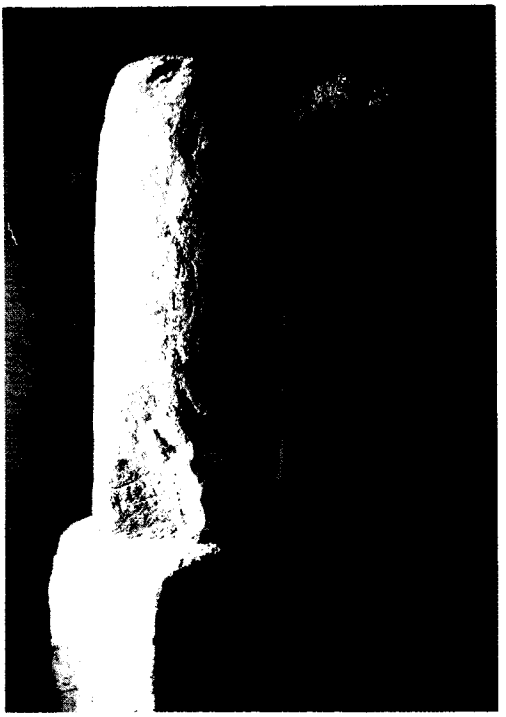
MILALAI (Mĭl′ ȧ laī) Personal name meaning, "eloquent." Musician participating in Nehemiah's dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:36). The earliest Greek translation lacks the name, prompting some to suggest a scribal corruption due to repeating the following name (Gilalai). The shorter Greek text may, however, result from omission due to the scribe skipping to a word with a similar ending.



MILCAH (Mŭl′ cah) Personal name meaning, "queen." Abraham's niece and the wife of Nahor, the patriarch's brother. She bore eight sons, one of whom was Bethuel, Rebekah's father (Gen. 11:29; 24:15). 2. One of five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33), left without support after the death of their father. They pled their case before Moses for an inheritance as a son would receive. In a landmark ruling for Israel, God commanded Moses to give each of the daughters an inheritance from their father's estate (Num. 27:1–8; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

MILCOM (Mĭl′ ĕŏm) Name of deity meaning, "king" or "their king." Apparently, a form created by Hebrew scribes to slander and avoid pronouncing the name of the national god of Ammon (1 Kings 11:5,7), who may have been identified with Chemosh, the god of Moab. See Chemosh. From the inscription of Mesha there appears to have been a god, Athar, whose local titles were Chemosh and Milcom. See Moab. This cult may have been practiced in Jerusalem before the Israelite conquest. "King" may have been the god's name or his title as King of the gods. David defeated Ammon and confiscated the crown (2 Sa. 12:30) of their king (KJV, NAS, NIV) or of the statue of the god Milcom (NRSV, REB; compare TEV). Solomon built sanctuaries to Milcom on the Mount of Olives at the request of his foreign wives, reviving the ancient cult (1 Kings 11:5,33). The sites of Solomon's sanctuaries were destroyed and defiled during Josiah's reforms in 621 B.C. (2 Kings 23:13). Jeremiah described past accomplishments attributed to Milcom, but in a play on Judges 11:24, he announced destruction and captivity for Milcom (Jer. 49:1,3 NRSV, NAS, REB; compare NIV, TEV). Worshiping Milcom was turning one's back on Yahweh (Zeph. 1:5–6). See Molech.

MILDEW Fungus causing a whitish growth on plants. The Hebrew term rendered mildew means, "paleness." The term may refer to the yellowing of leaves as a result of drought rather than to a fungus (Deut. 28:22–24; 1 Kings 8:37; 2 Chron. 6:28; Amos 4:9; Hag. 4:9). Mildew is one of the agricultural plagues God sent to encourage repentance.

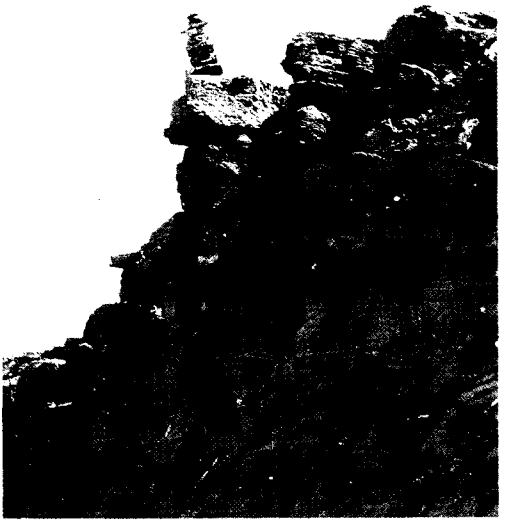
MILE The Roman mile of Matthew 5:41 is about 4,848 feet (about 432 feet shorter than the American mile).



A Roman milestone.

MILETUM (Mī lē′ tŭm) KJV spelling of Miletus in 2 Timothy 4:20.

MILETUS (Mī lē′ tŭs) An ancient city on the west coast of Asia Minor. Miletus had four natural harbors and was a major port for the Minoan and Mycenean cultures. After 700 B.C. the Ionians developed it into an even greater center of commerce. It served as the port for Ephesus.

It featured a major school of philosophy; many artisans practiced there; and it was among the first cities to mint coins. This culture flourished until 494 B.C. when the Persians sacked the city in answer to a revolt by the Ionians. Alexander captured Miletus on his way eastward in 334 B.C., and the city saw a revival of the arts under his Hellenistic regime. In particular the architectural beauty of the city increased. Rome's influence increased the pace of economic development.

to Miletus. The people probably were open to the gospel he preached. He chose to meet with the elders of the church at Ephesus in Miletus (Acts 20:15–17). A second visit may have been made by the apostle a few years later (2 Tim. 4:20). The harbor began to silt up by 100 A.D., bringing a gradual halt to the city's usefulness and prominence. Today the ruins are over five miles inland. See Asia Minor; Ephesus. Mike Mitchell

The theater of Miletus.

MILK Nourishing liquid and its by-products, the staple of the Hebrew diet. The Old Testament uses the term variously of sweet milk, soured milk, cheese, butter, and, symbolically, of blessing and abundance. The NT only has a symbolic use of what is first and basic in the Christian life. The word is used forty-three times in the OT with twenty being symbolic and only five times in the NT. Ben Sira mentions milk before wine and oil as among "the principal things for the whole use of man's life" (Ecclesiasticus 39:26). Most often milk came from sheep and goats (Prov. 27:27; Deut. 32:14); cow's milk was also known (Isa. 7:21–22), as was milk from humans (Isa. 28:9). Butter and cheese were known among the ancients (1 Sam. 17:18) as well as curdled, sour milk which still forms, after bread, the chief food of the poorer classes in Arabia and Syria. This soured milk was carried by travelers who mixed it with meat, dried it, and then dissolved it in water to make a refreshing drink such as that set by Abraham before the messengers (Gen. 18:8). After setting awhile, the drink would carry an intoxicating effect leading some to believe that the fermented variety is the drink that Jael gave to Sisera (Judg. 4:19).

The Old Testament's most extensive use of milk is in conjunction with honey to symbolize abundance and blessing (Ex. 3:17; 13:5; 33:3; Lev. 20:24, Num. 13:27; Deut. 6:3; Josh. 5:6). Milk is also used to symbolize whiteness (Lam. 4:7) and in Song of Songs as a symbol of marital bliss (5:1).

Milk as a symbol prevails in the NT where the term is used only five times (1 Cor. 3:2; 9:7; Heb. 5:12,13; 1 Pet. 2:2). In each instance it speaks concerning what is basic to the Christian life, but not all that is needed. The ancient bedouins could live on milk for days but eventually had to have meat; so must the Christian.

One of the more perplexing sayings of Scripture is the repeated rule (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21) not to boil a kid in its mother's milk. The rabbis interpreted this command to mean that milk and meat should neither be cooked or eaten together. Certain scholars have seen in the command a prohibition relating to Caananite sacrificial customs though recent archaeological investigations lend little support to this view. It remains one of the mysteries of scripture. G. Al Wright, Jr.

MILL Two circular stones used to grind grain. Usually, it was worked by two women facing each other. One woman fed the grain at the center, and the other guided the products into little piles. The grain to be ground is fed into the central hole in the upper stone and gradually works down between the stones. As the grain is reduced to flour, it flies out from between the stones onto a cloth or skin placed underneath the mill. To make fine flour, it is reground and sifted. The stone was made of basalt and was about a foot and a half in diameter and two to four inches thick.

It was forbidden to take millstones as a pledge because they were so important to sustaining life (Deut. 24:6). The manna which fell in the wilderness was tough enough so that people ground it in mills before cooking it (Num. 11:7–8).

Rotary mills at Capernaum.

In the New Testament, our Lord prophesied that at His coming, "two women shall be grinding at the mill, one shall be taken and one other is left" (Matt. 24:41). In Revelation 18:21, the millstone was cast into the sea as a symbol of absolute destruction. See Manna. Gary Bonner MILLENNIUM (Mĭ lĕn′ nĭ ŭm) A term not found in Scripture but taken from Latin to express the "thousand years" mentioned six times in Revelation 20:1–7. The meaning of the thousand years and the relation of Christ's future coming to them have given rise to various millennial views.

Evangelical Christians hold three main views: amillennialism, dispensational premillennialism, and historic premillennialism. A popular view of yesteryear was postmillennialism, but it is no longer widely held, though a new form of it combined with reconstructionist theology has appeared.

The use of the prefixes a-, pre-, and post- with the term millennial could be misleading. Much more is involved in these viewpoints than merely positioning the return of Christ in relation to a millennium. In spite of the danger of oversimplification these terms are so widely used that they furnish the working labels for a study of end time prophecy. The names given the views suggest the general drift of each one.

Postmillennialism The growth of the church and the power of the gospel will cause the world to get better and better until the present order blends into the millennium during which the righteous will be in charge on earth. Evil will be practically nonexistent. Christ will return at the end of the millennium at a time when Satan reasserts his power. The final victory of Christ will occur at that time with final judgment and the eternal order following.

Amillennialism The term suggests "no thousand years." The idea is no literal thousand year period, but a symbolic expression related to the spiritual blessedness of present Christian experience in which Satan is a defeated enemy and believers reign in life by Christ Jesus. Therefore, this view does not look for a literal, future thousand year reign of Christ on the earth during which Satan is bound.

Premillennialism The idea is that of "before the millennium or thousand years." Such a view positions the return of Christ prior to a millennial period. There are two broad types of premillennialism.

1. Dispensational premillennialism takes the thousand years to be literal both as to fact and number. The millennium is seen to follow a seven-year tribulation period. At the beginning of the tribulation, the church will be taken out of the world. This rapture of the church is seen as the first phase of the second coming of Christ. During the millennium, Christ will reign on the earth with His saints while Satan is bound in the bottomless pit. The Jews as a nation are seen to have a major place in the events of the millennial period. This view of future events also incorporates many other aspects of biblical prophecy, such as a second phase of Christ's return following the millennium.

2. Historic premillennialism holds to a literal, future reign of Christ on earth, during which Satan is bound a thousand years and the saints reign with Christ. Many who hold this view, however, allow for symbolism in the use of the number 1,000. While the reign of Christ will be literal, the length of the reign may or may not be exactly 1,000 years. This type of premillennialism does not divide the second coming into two phases. There is a single return between the tribulation and millennium.

See Eschatology; Rapture; Future Hope; Seventy Weeks; Tribulation. Jerry W. Batson

MILLET (Panicum miliacum L.) The smallest cereal grain. Millet makes a poor quality bread and is normally mixed with other grains (Ezek. 4:9). Some identify the Hebrew term with sorghum (Sorghum vulgare Pers.).

MILLO (Mĭ lō) Hebrew word meaning, "filling" which describes a stone terrace system employed in ancient construction. 1. The story of Abimelech in the Book of Judges mentions Beth Millo—"The House of the Filling." Probably a suburb of Shechem, the Beth Millo most likely was a Canaanite sanctuary. The shrine was built upon an artificial platform or fill and thus received the name "House of the Filling."

2. The extension of Jerusalem beyond the original Jebusite city David captured stretched northward to include the Hill of Moriah, the site of the future Temple. A large open space between the hill and the main city below left ample room for added construction. To provide a level platform upon which to build, a series of retaining walls were raised along the slope of the hill. Loads of earth and rock were dumped behind the walls to form large terraces to support the royal halls and residences planned by Solomon. The area came to be called the Ophel, meaning "high" or "lofty." It is probable that additional supporting terraces were built on the southern slopes in the city proper to extend the area available for general construction. Joash's murder by his own men near the Beth Millo "on the road to Silla" may refer to terraces in this portion of the city.

MINA (Mī' na) See Weights and Measures.

A Babylonian weight equaling one-third of a mina.

MIND The center of the intellectual activity, an English term translating several different Hebrew and Greek terms. The biblical languages possess no one word parallel to the English, mind. KJV translates at least six different Hebrew terms, mind. The primary word is leb, which means "heart." For example, Moses said, "The Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind" (Num. 16:28; compare 1 Sam. 9:20; Neh. 4:6). In addition, the word nephesh (soul) is translated "mind" in Deuteronomy 18:6 when it refers to the desire of a man's mind (soul) and in Genesis 23:8 where it refers to mind in the sense of a decision or judgment. The word ruach (spirit) is rendered "mind" in Genesis 26:35. It speaks of the "grief of mind" (spirit) which Isaac and Rebekah experienced because Esau married heathen wives. Also used are the words lebab (heart) in Ezekiel 38:10; yetser (imagination) in Isaiah 26:3; and peh (mouth, speech) in Leviticus 24:12.

The New Testament has a similar situation because of the large number of terms which are used to describe mankind's "faculty of cognition." As in the Old Testament the term heart (kardia) is sometimes used to represent the concept mind.

Matthew 13:15 speaks of understanding with the "heart." Other words include ennoia, which means "mind" in the sense of "intent" "arm yourselves likewise with the same mind" (1 Pet. 4:1). Gnomē refers to mind in the sense of "purpose" (Rev. 17:13) or "opinion" (Philem. 14). Noēma is also used to denote the mind, especially the "thought process." Paul said that Israel's "minds were blinded" so that they could not understand the Old Testament (2 Cor. 3:14; see also 2 Cor. 4:4; 11:3). The word phronēma refers to what one has in the mind, the "thought": "To be carnally minded is death" (Rom. 8:6).

The more common terms for mind, however, are nous and dianoia. Dianoia occurs twelve times in the New Testament. It refers to "thinking through" or "thinking over" of something or to the "understanding" or "sentiment" which results from that process of reflection. Paul said that in times past we all lived according to the flesh, "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (those things we had already thought over, Eph. 2:3). Nous is the most prominent term for mind; it occurs twenty-four times. Nous represents the "seat of understanding," the place of "knowing and reasoning." It also includes feeling and deciding. Hence it sometimes includes the counsels and purposes of the mind. An example is Paul's statement: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. 14:5). The meaning of purpose is found in Romans 11:34, which says, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counselor?"

Mind is sometimes associated with the human soul. Three times in the King James Version the word psuchē (soul or life) is rendered by the word mind. Philippians 1:27 says believers are to be of "one mind (soul)." Hebrews 12:3 urges believers not to "faint in your minds (souls)." (See Acts 14:2 also.) These passages illustrate the fact that the mind is considered to be the center of the person. However, in Scripture the heart is more often considered to be the center of the human personality. In the Old Testament, especially, this is true because of the lack of an exact equivalent for mind. The word heart fills this void, and the New Testament follows the practice of the Old Testament very closely. Why then can the mind as well as the heart be spoken of as the center of a person? Because in Hebrew thought a person is looked at as a single entity with no attempt to compartmentalize the person into separate parts which act more or less independently of one another. Therefore, the heart, mind, and soul, while in some ways different, are seen as one.

The mind is portrayed oftentimes, especially in the New Testament, as the center of a person's ethical nature. The mind can be evil. It is described as "reprobate" (Rom. 1:28), "fleshly" (Col. 2:18), vain (Eph. 4:17), corrupt (1 Tim. 6:5; 2 Tim. 3:8), and defiled (Titus 1:15). On the other hand, three Gospels command us to love God with "all" our mind (Matt. 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 10:27). This is possible because the mind can be revived and empowered by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 12:2) and because God's laws under the new covenant are put into our minds (Heb. 8:10; 10:16). MINERALS AND METALS Inorganic elements or compounds found naturally in nature. A number of minerals and metals are mentioned in the biblical record.

Precious Stones Stones are desirable because of rarity, hardness, and beauty, the latter expressed in terms of color, transparency, luster, and brilliance. The Bible has three main lists of precious stones: the twelve stones of Aaron's breastplate (Ex. 28:17–20; 39:10–13), the treasures of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13), and the stones on the wall foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:18–21). Other lists are found in Job 28:15–19; Isa. 54:11–12; and Ezek. 27:16. The precise identification of some of the terms is unclear, unfortunately, as can be seen by comparing these lists in various translations.

1. Adamant Appears in KJV, RSV, REB of Ezekiel 3:9 and Zechariah 7:12. The Hebrew word is sometimes translated "diamond" (Jer. 17:1 KJV, NRSV, REB, NAS). The stone was "harder than flint" (Ezek. 3:9) and may be emery (Ezek. 3:9 NAS) or an imaginary stone of impenetrable hardness. It is perhaps best translated "the hardest stone" (Ezek. 3:9 NIV, NRSV).

2. Agate A multicolored and banded form of chalcedony. It served on Aaron's breastplate (Ex. 28:19) and by some translations as the third stone on the New Jerusalem foundation (Rev. 21:19 NRSV).

3. Amethyst (Ex. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20) Identical with modern amethyst, a blue-violet form of quartz.

4. Beryl (beryllium aluminum silicate) Most translations show beryl to be the first stone in the fourth row of the breastplate (Ex. 28:20; 39:13;

Mineral deposits from the hot mineral springs at Hierapolis.

REB, "topaz"; NIV, "chrysolite"). The word also occurs in the list of the king of Tyre's jewels (Ezek. 28:13; RSV, NIV, "chrysolite"; NRSV, "beryl"; REB, "topaz"). The RSV translates another and the NIV a third word in the list as beryl. More certainty surrounds the use of beryl in Revelation 21:20.

5. Carbuncle In KJV, RSV the third stone of Aaron's breastplate (Ex. 28:17; 39:10; REB, "green feldspar;" NAS, NRSV "emerald;" TEV, "garnet"; NIV, "beryl") and material for the gates of the restored Jerusalem (Isa. 54:12; REB, "garnet"; NIV, "sparkling jewels"). RSV also appears to translate a third word as carbuncle in Ezekiel 28:13 by reversing the KJV order of emerald and carbuncle. NRSV omits carbuncle.

6. Carnelian (KJV and sometimes RSV, NASB, "sardius") A clear to brownish red variety of chalcedony. NRSV reading for one of the stones of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13; NAS, TEV, NIV, "ruby"; REB, "sardin") and the sixth stone on the foundation of the new Jerusalem wall (Rev. 21:20; compare 4:3).

7. Chalcedony An alternate translation for agate as the third stone decorating the New Jerusalem foundation (Rev. 21:19 KJV, NAS, REB, NIV). This noncrystalline form of quartz, or silicone dioxide, has many varieties including agate, carnelian, chrysoprase, flint, jasper, and onyx.

8. Chrysolite (Rev. 21:20) Represents various yellowish minerals. It replaces the KJV rendering beryl frequently in the RSV (Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; 28:13) and throughout the NIV but not in NRSV. REB reads, "topaz."

9. Chrysoprase or Chrysoprasus (KJV) An apple-green variety of chalcedony, the tenth stone of the foundation for the New Jerusalem's wall (Rev. 21:20).

10. Coral (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16) Calcium carbonate formed by the action of marine animals. NRSV, REB, NAS translated a second word as coral (Lam. 4:7 KJV, NIV, "rubies").

11. Crystal Refers to quartz, the two Hebrew words so translated being related to "ice." In Job 28:18, KJV has "pearls"; the NIV, "jasper"; but NRSV, NAS, read, "crystal," while REB has "alabaster." The glassy sea (Rev. 4:6) and river of life (Rev. 22:1) are compared to crystal.

12. Diamond The third stone of the second row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:18; 39:11; REB, "jade"; NIV, "emerald") and one of the jewels of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13; NRSV, REB, "jasper"; NIV, "emerald"). It is not clear, however, if diamonds were known in the Ancient Near East, and the translation is uncertain.

13. Emerald A bright green variety of beryl, readily available to the Israelites. It is the usual translation of the fourth stone of the high priest's breastplate and one of the stones of the king of Tyre (Ex. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 28:13; REB, "purple garnet"; NAS, NIV, NRSV, "turquoise"), with NRSV translating another word as "emerald." The rainbow around the throne is compared to an emerald (Rev. 4:3), which also served as the fourth stone in the foundations of the New Jerusalem wall (Rev. 21:19).

14. Jacinth A transparent red to brown form of zirconium silicate. It appears in Aaron's breastplate (Ex. 28:19; 39:11; KJV, "ligure"; REB, TEV, "turquoise") and the New Jerusalem wall foundation (Rev. 21:20).

15. Jasper (Ex. 28:20; 39:13; Rev. 21:11,18–19) A red, yellow, brown, or green opaque variety of chalcedony. In the RSV for Ezekiel 28:13, jasper translates the word elsewhere rendered "diamond" (REB, "jade"), but NRSV reads moonstone with the sixth stone jasper as in other translations.

16. Lapis Lazuli Not a mineral, but a combination of minerals which yields an azure to green-blue stone popular in Egypt for jewelry. It is an alternate translation for sapphire (NAS in Ezek. 28:13; NIV marginal notes).

17. Onyx A flat-banded variety of chalcedony; sardonyx includes layers of carnelian. Onyx was used on the ephod (Ex. 25:7; 28:9; 35:27; 39:6) and in the high priest's breatplate (Ex. 28:20; 39:13). It was provided for the settings of the Temple (1 Chron. 29:2) and was one of the precious stones of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13).

18. Pearl (Job 28:18 NAS, NRSV; KJV, NIV, "rubies"; REB, "red coral") Formed around foreign matter in some shellfish. In the New Testament, pearl serves as a simile for the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:46), a metaphor for truth (Matt. 7:6), and a symbol of immodesty (1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; 18:16). Pearl is also material for the gates of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:21).

19. Ruby A red variety of corundum, or aluminum oxide. The first stone of Aaron's breastplate is sometimes translated "ruby" (Ex. 28:17; 39:10 NAS, NIV; KJV, RSV, REB "sardius"; NRSV "carnelian). It also appears as a stone of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13 NAS, NIV; REB, KJV, "sardius"; NRSV, "carnelian").

20. Sapphire (Ex. 24:10; 28:18; 39:11; Job 28:6,16; Isa. 54:11; Lam. 4:7; Ezek. 1:26; 10:1; 28:13; Rev. 21:19) The Hebrew sappir is a blue variety of corundum. Despite the name, it is possible that sappir refers to lapis lazuli (NIV marginal notes) rather than true sapphire.

21. Topaz Second stone of Aaron's breastplate (Ex. 28:17; 39:10); also mentioned in the wisdom list (Job 28:19) and the list of the king of Tyre's precious stones (Ezek. 28:13). True topaz is an aluminum floro silicate and quite hard, but the Old Testament topaz may refer to peridot, a magnesium olivine. The ninth decorative stone of the New Jerusalem wall foundation is topaz (Rev. 21:20). See Beryl, Chrysolite above.

22. Turquoise Sky-blue to bluish-green base phosphate of copper and aluminum was mined in the Sinai by the Egyptians and was a highly valued stone in antiquity. Turquoise is sometimes substituted for emerald (Ex. 28:18 NAS, NIV); or jacinth (Ex. 28:19; 39:11 REB, TEV).

Commercial Minerals 1. Alabaster In modern terms a fine grained gypsum, but Egyptian alabaster was crystalline calcium carbonate with a similar appearance. Alabaster may be mentioned once in the Song of Solomon (5:15 NRSV, NAS; "marble" in KJV, REB, NIV). In the New Testament (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:37), it refers to containers for precious ointment.

2. Brimstone Refers to sulfur (NRSV, NIV). Burning sulfur deposits created extreme heat, molten flows, and noxious fumes, providing a graphic picture of the destruction and suffering of divine judgment (Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps. 11:6; Isa. 30:33; Ezek. 38:22; Luke 17:29).

3. Salt Sodium chloride is an abundant mineral, used as a seasoning for food (Job 6:6) and offerings (Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24). As a preservative, salt was symbolic of covenants (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5). Both meanings are present in Jesus' comparison of the disciples to salt (Matt. 5:13). Salt was also a symbol of desolation and barrenness, perhaps because of the barrenness of the Dead Sea, the biblical Salt Sea. The "saltpits" of Zephaniah 2:9 were probably located just south of the Dead Sea. Sodium chloride could leech out of the generally impure salt from this area, leaving a tasteless substance (Luke 14:34–35).

4. Soda (Prov. 25:20 NAS, NIV; Jer. 2:22 REB, NIV), or nitre (KJV), is probably sodium or potassium carbonate. Other translations prefer lye (Jer. 2:22 NRSV, NAS). In Proverbs 25:20 the Hebrew text refers to vinegar or lye or soda, but some modern translations follow the earliest Greek translation in reading "vinegar on a wound" (NRSV, REB; "salt in a wound," TEV).

Metals Many metals occur naturally in compound with other elements as an ore which must be smelted to obtain a usable product. Biblical lists of metals (Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18,20) mention gold, silver, bronze, iron, tin, and lead.

1. Brass A relatively modern alloy of copper and tin. Brass in the KJV should be rendered copper or bronze. RSV substitutes bronze, retaining brass only in a few places (Lev. 26:19, Deut. 28:23; Isa. 48:4; NRSV using brass only in Isa. 48:4). NIV does not use brass.

2. Bronze The usual translation of the Hebrew word which can indicate either copper or bronze. An alloy of copper and tin, and stronger than both, bronze was the most common metal used for utensils in the Ancient Near East. The Bible mentions armor (1 Sam. 17:5–6), shackles (2 Kings 25:7), cymbals (1 Chron. 15:19), gates (Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2), and idols (Rev. 9:20), as well as other bronze objects.

3. Copper Usually alloyed with tin to make bronze which possessed greater strength. The KJV uses copper only in Ezra 8:27 (NRSV, NIV "bronze"). See Ezion Geber.

4. Gold Valued and used because of its rarity, beauty, and workability. It can be melted without harm and is extremely malleable. Thus it can be used for cast objects, inlays, or overlays. A number of Israel's worship objects were solid gold or gilded (Ex. 37). Gold occurs in the Bible more frequently than any other metal, being used for jewelry (Ex. 12:35; 1 Tim. 2:9), idols, scepters, worship utensils, and money (Matt. 10:9; Acts 3:6). The New Jerusalem is described as made of gold (Rev. 21:18,21).

5. Iron A more difficult metal to smelt than copper, it did not come into widespread use until about the time of Israel's conquest of Canaan. Prior to this time, metal weapons and agricultural tools were of bronze. For some time thereafter iron technology was not widespread. The Canaanites' "chariots of iron" (Josh. 17:16,18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3) represent a technological advantage over Israel, while the Philistines may have enjoyed an iron-working monopoly (1 Sam. 17:7; 13:19–21). See Iron. Iron was more widespread by the time of David (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3; 22:14), though it remained valuable (2 Kings 6:5–6). It was used where strength was essential and became a symbol of hardness and strength (Deut. 28:48; Ps. 2:9; Isa. 48:4; Jer. 17:1; Rev. 2:27).

6. Lead A gray metal of extremely high density (Ex. 15:10) used for weights, heavy covers (Zec. 5:7–8), and plumblines (compare Amos 7:7–8). Lead is quite pliable and useful for inlays such as lettering in rock (Job 19:24). It was also used in the refining of silver (Jer. 6:27–30).

7. Silver Used in the Near East from quite early times; though not occurring often in a natural state, silver is easily extracted from its ores. Silver was originally more valuable than gold, usually occurring before it in lists. It became a measure of wealth (Gen. 13:2; 24:35; Zeph. 1:18; Hag. 2:8). By Solomon's day it was common in Israel (1 Kings 10:27) and was the standard monetary unit, being weighed in shekels, talents, and minas (Gen. 23:15–16; 37:28; Ex. 21:32; Neh. 7:72; Isa. 7:23). See Weights and Measures. Silver was used for objects in Israel's worship (Ex. 26:19; 36:24; Ezra 8:26,28), idols (Ex. 20:23; Judg. 17:4; Ps. 115:4; Isa. 40:19), and jewelry (Gen. 24:53; Song of Sol. 1:11).

8. Tin (Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18,20) Sometimes confused with lead; articles of pure tin were rare. It was principally used in making bronze, an alloy of tin and copper. See Mines and Mining.

MINES AND MINING The extraction of minerals from the earth.

The Earliest Mines Early mining efforts in the Fertile Crescent sought to provide people with the stones necessary to make weapons and tools.

While the earliest walled settlements in the region date back to before 6000 B.C., people had been mining stones for tools long before that. Before 10,000 B.C. people were using tools and weapons made of flint found on the surface of the ground. From exposed beds of obsidian (a black volcanic stone) and flint (chert) early people no doubt removed the stone necessary to produce the axes, knives, and scrapers used to kill and clean food. With the domestication of small animals, wheat, and barley, people found greater uses for stone tools. Sickle blades with serrated edges were chipped from flint, several pieces being fitted together in a bone or wood handle. Larger stone tools, such as the hand axe, were suitable for cutting and shaping wooden beams used in building. The greatest use of surface-mined stones was the making of weapons for hunting. Flake blades of all sizes served as knives. Finely worked arrowheads found alongside large quantities of animal bones indicated the dependence upon hunting by Neolithic man in Palestine. Flint scrapers and borers were used in the tanning and sewing of hides.

Copper The use of mined minerals to form metals began sometime around 6500 B.C. near Catal Hüyük in Asia Minor. While making pigment from crushed malachite, a greenish carbonate of copper, human beings probably stumbled upon the knowledge for smelting, ushering in the Chalcolithic Period, about 4500—3,200 B.C. (See Minerals and Metals). The Bible refers to Tubal-cain, a descendant of Cain, as the father of copper forging (Gen. 4:22). In the beginning, copper ore was taken from deposits above the ground. Soon, however, mine shafts and tunnels were cut into areas where surface deposits hinted at the larger ore supplies below. In the Arabah and Sinai, mining settlements were founded. Complex series of narrow shafts were bored into the mountains and hills of the Timna Valley to reach the valued copper deposits within the earth. Near the mines were constructed a series of huts, walls forming windbreaks, and areas for smelting to support the mining operations. The ruins of the mining center khirbet en-Nahas, seventeen miles south of the Dead Sea, possibly mark the location of biblical Irnahash, the "Copper City." Palestine, however, was relatively poor in copper ore. Much of what was used had to be imported from regions with greater ore concentrations. Trade relations were established with settlements in Asia Minor, Armenia, and the Island of Cyprus. Copper sheets and ingots were shipped by sea and land thousands of miles to meet the growing needs for metal tools, weapons, and jewelry. In later years these ingots served as a crude style of currency. Before 3000 B.C. people discovered that copper could be mixed with arsenic to form a stronger alloy. Copper tools last longer than stone implements and could withstand greater abuse. Men continued to mine the veins of minerals which ran into the earth, often following the deposits with tunnels fifty yards long into the side of a hill. The widespread use of copper in the Ancient Near East is highlighted from the magnificent copper hoard discovered at Nahal Mishmar, near the Dead Sea. Among more than 400 copper artifacts were numerous mace heads, chisels and adzes, scepters, and small, heavy "crowns." The copper from Naham Mishmar was most likely imported from Armenia or Azerbaijan, hundreds of miles away.

Bronze Copper tools, however, were soon replaced. Around 3200 B.C., metalsmiths discovered that by combining nine parts copper with one part tin a much stronger metal—bronze—was formed. Easier to cast than copper, bronze became the most widely used metal of the period. The copper for bronze continued to be mined in the same manner it always had, although stone tools for digging out the ore were replaced with stronger bronze counterparts. Tin deposits in Mesopotamia made the growth of this new technology easier in the northern Fertile Crescent, while Palestine and Egypt, without local tin deposits and mines, were forced to import raw materials. The regions of modern-day Afghanistan exported the necessary tin throughout the Ancient Near East.

Around 2500 B.C. Phoenicians established colonies in Spain and Portugal to mine the vast local supplies of copper and tin. These and other European tin supplies were shipped throughout the Ancient Near East as late as the Roman period. Roman tin mines in Britain were worked by slave labor and had shafts cutting 350 feet deep into the ground. In Palestine, the Timna copper mines came under the control of the Egyptians during the Late Bronze period. Remains of a small open-air temple dedicated to Hathor, patron goddess of miners, have been discovered. The small enclosure has a small sacred area set with masseboth, standing stones dedicated to the deity. A central shrine with small niches carved into the overhanging face of a cliff was the focal point of the sanctuary, its "holy of holies." The entire shrine was covered with a woolen tent. The design of the desert temple is similar to the Israelite tabernacle or tent of meeting. Before 1100 B.C. Kenites and Midianites occupied Timna, but no remains from between 1000 and 900 have been identified. It is hard to imagine, however, that Israel during the period of the United Monarchy, especially during Solomon's reign, would not have exploited these rich deposits within its domain.

Iron The chaotic political climate after 1300 B.C. disrupted the trade routes and commercial structures of the Ancient Near East. Copper supplies dwindled, and the import of tin and copper by Egypt and Palestine was disrupted, forcing metalsmiths to develop a new method for tool manufacture. Attention was turned to iron. Although small beads discovered in Egypt give evidence of the early use of meteoric rocks for iron smelting around 4000 B.C., the much higher melting point of iron (400 degrees higher than that of copper) necessitated the development of new smelting methods. So great was the heat needed that the Bible compares the enslavement of Israel in Egypt to the iron smith's furnace (Deut. 4:20). More efficient bellows were created to produce the high temperatures needed to melt the iron ore. Since iron deposits lay close to the surface, they were much easier to mine than those of copper had been.

The Hittites were among the earliest people to use iron on a large scale. They traded iron tools and weapons to Egypt. For the most part, however, the Hittites protected iron as a monopoly. Only after the fall of the Hittite kingdom about 1200 B.C. did iron become more widely used. Still, Israel made little use of it. The Bible describes Canaan as a land "whose stones are iron and from whose hills you may mine copper" (Deut. 8:9 NRSV). Only small amounts of both ores were available. Iron mines located in the Gilead near 'Ajlun at Magharat Warda probably served as one of the earliest iron sources in Palestine, possibly providing for the iron bedstead of Og, king of Bashan.

The Bible speaks of the Philistines as controlling the ironworking skills in Palestine (1 Sam. 13:19–22), an ability that prevented Israelite domination over the Philistine settlements in the Coastal Plain and Shephelah. The domination of iron technology by these "Sea-Peoples" points to the early development and usage of iron in the Aegean region, homeland of the Philistines. At Beth-Shemesh, a Philistine stronghold in the Jordan Valley, a large industrial area with bronze and ironworking facilities was discovered. Smelting ovens and flowpipes for the fires give evidence of the metalworking that occurred. Numerous iron weapons and pieces of jewelry were also found. However, excavation in other Philistine cities such as Ashdod and tel Qasile (near modern Tel Aviv) give little evidence of the widespread use of iron. While the Philistines may have controlled the use of iron to some degree, theirs was not a monopoly. For the most part, tools in Palestine continued to be made of bronze. Common tools such as sickles were still chipped from flint even after 1000 B.C. Iron chariots, spear points, knives and swords, and common tools such as sickles and plows became more common after 900 B.C., replacing earlier bronze counterparts. During the United Monarchy, Israel gained increased control of bronze and metal exports across the Ancient Near East, bringing great wealth to the empire of David and Solomon. Solomon created a virtual trade war between Israel and the Aramaeans to the north.

Other Minerals Other minerals were also mined in the Ancient Near East but were more difficult to obtain and work. Lapis Lazuli, a deep blue stone, was quarried for its beauty and used in jewelry. Egyptian faience was an attempt to produce a synthetic lapis. Lead was mined as early as 3000 B.C., but its soft nature made it unsuitable for tools or jewelry. Lead was later incorporated into bronze and, in the Roman period, was used in glassmaking. Silver was first mined in northeast Asia Minor and taken from a lead-silver alloy. Electrum, silver mixed with small amounts of gold, was also mined. Raw gold is found in veins in quartzy granite. These veins, however, were not mined in early periods. Rather, the weathering of gold-bearing rocks put pea-sized and larger bits of the metal into streams and rivers, mixing it with alluvial gravel. Found mostly at the upper reaches of rivers in areas of Egypt, the Nubian desert, and the Caucasus, gold began to be mined rather late because of its more isolated location. Since the headwaters of rivers and streams were often in locales less accessible or desirable for pasturing flocks, gold mines only became widespread around 2500 B.C. Egyptian paintings depict the washing of river sand to extract nuggets, and authors such as Strabo and Pliny the Elder (60 B.C.) spoke in later periods of rich gold deposits in Spain. The rarity of gold made it synonymous with extravagant wealth and luxury. The apostle John's description of heaven as a city with walls and streets of gold provided the believer with a glimpse of the grandeur and glory of an eternity with God. David C. Maltsberger MINGLED PEOPLE KJV term for foreigners who are perhaps of mixed race and are associated with a dominant population (Jer. 25:20,24; 50:37; Ezek. 30:5). Modern translations generally replace mingled people with foreigners or with foreign plus a noun suitable to the context (folk, tribes, troops). The underlying Hebrew consists of the same three consonants as the term for Arabia. Modern translations follow the alternate vocalization and read Arabia or Arabs at Ezekiel 30:5.

MINIAMIN (Mĭ nī' ā mĭn) Personal name meaning, "lucky" (literally "from the right hand"). 1. Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:15). 2. Priestly family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17). 3. Priest who participated in Nehemiah's dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:41).

MINNI (Mĭn' nī) People inhabiting the mountainous area south of Lake Urmia northeast of the Tigris-Euphrates valley (Jer. 51:27). The Minni are among the tribes summoned to punish the wickedness of Babylon. The Minni are known as the Manneans in Assyrian inscriptions from 800 to 600 B.C.

MINNITH (Mĭn′ nĭth) One of twenty cities involved in Jephthah's conquest of the Ammonites (Judg. 11:29–33). The site is unknown. The city likely lay between Rabbah-ammon and Heshbon. Suggested sites include khirbet Hanizeh and khirbet umm el-Hanafish.

MINSTREL KJV term for musician (Matt. 9:23). Modern translations have flute players or musicians. These musicians were hired to assist in mourning the child's death. See Grief.

MINT AND CUMMIN Mint is a sweet-smelling herb used to season food. Cummin is a caraway-like herb Judaism also used in seasonings and in medicine. Jesus named cummin, dill, and mint as He criticized the Pharisees for requiring the tithe of the herbs while ignoring more important matters of the Law (Matt. 23:23).

MIPHKAD GATE (Mĭph′ kăd) KJV, TEV transliteration of the Hebrew name of a gate of Jerusalem or of the Temple (Neh. 3:31), following the earliest Greek translation in taking Miphkad as a proper name. Other translations take Miphkad as a common noun. Suggested meanings include: inspection (NAS, NIV); muster (REB, NRSV); or prison (compare Jer. 52:11). If the Miphkad Gate is a city gate, it is perhaps identical with the Benjamin Gate (Jer. 37:13; 38:7; Zech. 14:10), located at the northernmost point on the east wall (perhaps identical with the Gate of the Guard, Neh. 12:39).

MIRACLES, SIGNS, WONDERS Events which unmistakably involve an immediate and powerful action of God designed to reveal His character or purposes. Words used in the Scriptures to describe the miraculous include sign, wonder, work, mighty work, portent, power. These point out the inspired authors' sense of God's pervasive activity in nature, history, and people.

Old Testament the two Hebrew words most frequently used for "miracle" are translated "sign" ('ōth) and "wonder" (mopheth). They are synonyms and often occur together in the same text (Ex. 7:3; Deut. 4:34; 6:22; 7:19; 13:1; 26:8; 28:46; 34:11; Neh. 9:10; Ps. 105:27; Isa. 8:18; Jer. 32:20; Dan. 6:27). "Sign" may be an object or daily activity as well as an unexpected divine action (Gen. 1:14; Ex. 12:13, RSV; Josh. 4:6 Ezek. 24:24. The basic nature of a sign is that it points people to God. "Wonders" describe God's supernatural activity, a special manifestation of His power (Ex. 7:3), but false prophets can perform actions people perceive as signs and wonders. (Deut. 13:1–3). Wonders can serve as a sign of a future event. Signs seek to bring belief (Ex. 4:5; compare 10:2), but they do not compel a person to believe (Ex. 4:9). At times God invites people to ask for signs (Isa. 7:11). The signs He has done should make all peoples on earth stand in awe (Ps. 65:8). They should join the Psalmist in confessing that the God of Israel "alone works wonders" (Ps. 72:18 NAS).

New Testament The phrase "signs and wonders" is often used in the New Testament in the same sense as it is found in the Old Testament and also in Hellenistic literature. (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22; John 4:48; Acts 2:43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:12; Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 12:12; 2 Thess. 2:9; Heb. 2:4).

"Sign" (semeion) in the New Testament is used of miracles taken as evidence of divine authority. Sometimes it is translated as "miracle" (Luke 23:8 NIV; Acts 4:16,22 NAS, NIV). John was particularly fond of using "sign" to denote miraculous activity (see 2:11,18,23; 3:2; 4:54; 6:2,14,26; 7:31; 9:16; 10:41; 11:47; 12:18, 37; 20:30; Rev. 12:1,3,; 13:13,14; 15:1; 16:14; 19:20)

"Wonders" (teras) translates a Greek word from which the word terror comes. It denotes something unusual that causes the beholder to marvel. Although it usually follows "signs," it sometimes precedes it (Acts 2:22,43; 6:8) or occurs alone (as in Acts 2:19). Whereas a sign appeals to the understanding, a wonder appeals to the imagination. "Wonders" are usually presented as God's activity (Acts 2:19; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:12), though sometimes they refer to the work of Satan through human instruments (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22; 2 Thess. 2:9; Rev. 13:11–13).

New Testament writers also used dunamis, power or inherent ability, to refer to activity of supernatural origin or character (Mark 6:2; Acts 8:13; 19:11; Rom. 15:19; 1 Cor. 12:10,28,29; Gal. 3:5; 2 Thess. 2:9; Heb. 2:4).

"Work" (ergon) is also employed in the New Testament in the sense of "miracle." John the Baptist heard of the "works" of Jesus while he was in prison (Matt. 11:2). The apostle John used the term frequently (5:20,36; 7:3; 10:38; 14:11,12; 15:24).

Worldview Considerations Contemporary philosophical and theological arguments over the possibility and definition of miracle reflect the altered worldview of the last several centuries—from a theistic to a nontheistic concept of the universe. The perceived tension between the natural and the miraculous is a by-product of a naturalism that is intent on sqeezing out the supernatural realm of reality.

The people of the Bible did not face this problem. The biblical perspective on the universe is that it is created, sustained, and providentially governed by God. The Bible makes no clear-cut distinction between the natural and supernatural. In the "natural" event the Bible views God as working providentially; whereas, in the miraculous, God works in striking ways to call attention to Himself or His purposes.

How do miracles relate to the natural order?

Christian thinkers have responded in different ways throughout the centuries. Some hold that miracles are not contrary to nature (Augustine and C. S. Lewis, for instance). This harmony view contends that human knowledge with limited perspective does not fully understand or comprehend the higher laws that God employs in working the miraculous. Others (like Thomas Aquinas) have maintained miracles stand outside the laws of nature. This approach is called the intervention view, based on their belief that God intervenes in the natural order to do the miraculous.

One's view of the miraculous is related to one's view of the universe. A mechanistic perspective believes the world is controlled by unalterable natural laws and cannot allow for the possibility of miracles. Christians in every century have refused to have their universe so limited. They have affirmed the continuing miraculous work of God in the universe He created, continues to care for, uses to reveal Himself, and has promised to redeem.

MIRIAM (Mĭr′ ĭ am) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "bitter," "God's gift," "beloved," or "defiant." 1. Sister of Moses and Aaron and the daughter of Jochebed and Amram. Miriam played a key role in the rescue of Moses (Ex. 2:4–8) and in the subsequent experience of the Exodus and the wilderness community. After crossing the Red Sea, she assumed the role of prophetess and led the women in the song of victory that was steeped in faith and gratitude (Ex. 15:20–21). See Poetry.

At Hazeroth, Miriam sided with Aaron in an act of rebellion against Moses when he married an Ethiopian woman (Num. 12:1–15). Beneath her disapproval of Moses' choice of a wife lay a deeper problem of ambition and insubordination. Consequently, God reminded her of Moses' divinely appointed leadership and chastened her with leprosy. She was healed following Moses' intercessory prayer and a seven-day quarantine (Num. 12:15). See Intercession; Leprosy.

Miriam died at Kadesh (Num. 20:1). Later biblical writers remembered her as an example to Israel in cases of leprosy (Deut. 24:9) and as a leader sent by God (Mic. 6:4).

2. Member of the clan of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

R. Dean Register

MIRMA(H) (Mĭr′ mȧ) Leader of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:10).

MIRROR A polished or smooth surface that produces images by reflection. Throughout the biblical period mirrors were made of polished metal (bronze, Ex. 38:8; molten [metal], Job 37:18). Glass mirrors became available only in the late Roman period. Paul's readers could be expected to appreciate the illustration of the unclear image of a metal mirror (1 Cor. 13:12). See Glass.

Bronze mirror with a bone handle from the Etruscan culture (ca. 350–330 B.C.).

MISGAB (Mĭs′ găb) KJV, REB transliteration of the Hebrew for height used as a proper place name (Jer. 48:1). Other translations treat the term as a common noun and translate as fortress or a similar term.

MISHAEL (Mĭsh′ â ĕl) Personal name perhaps meaning, "who is what God is?" 1. Cousin of Moses and Aaron (Ex. 6:22) who helped bury Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:4). 2. One standing with Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh. 8:4). 3. One of Daniel's three friends (Dan. 1:6–7,11,19; 2:17), given the Babylonian name Meshach.

MISHAL (Mī′ shăl) Personal name meaning, "depression." Form of Misheal in modern translations.

MISHAM (Mī′ shăm) Benjaminite builder of Ono and Lod (1 Chron. 8:12). The name perhaps derives from the root meaning, "to inspect."

MISHEAL (Mī′ shē ăl) Place name meaning, "place of questioning." Levitical town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26). Elsewhere, the KJV used the form Mishal (Josh. 21:30) or Mashal (1 Chron. 6:74). The town appears in the list of towns conquered by Pharaoh Thut-mose III. The site is unknown.

MISHMA (Mĭsh′ mă) Personal name meaning, "fame." 1. Arab tribe descended from a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). 2. Descendant of Simeon. Inclusion of the names Mibsam and Mishma in the geneologies of both Ishmael and Simeon suggest the incorporation of Arabs into that tribe as Simeon expanded southward (compare 1 Chron. 4:38–43).

MISHMANNAH (Mĭsh măn′ nah) Personal name meaning, "strength" or "tasty morsel." One of David's army officers (1 Chron. 12:10).

MISHNAH A Hebrew term that means "to repeat" and eventually, in the rabbinic period (beginning about A.D. 100), "to learn." Specifically, in rabbinic Judaism mishnah refers to the teaching or learning about the oral law (halakah) passed on by a particular teacher (rabbi). Today the Mishnah usually refers to the collected edition of rabbinic discussions of halakah compiled by Judah ha-Nasi (literally "the Prince," or Patriarch) head of the rabbinic academy at Javneh (or Jamnia) at about A.D. 220. In rabbinic tradition he is usually referred to simply as "Rabbi."

ORGANIZATION The Mishnah has six major divisions:

1. Zeraim (seeds) deals with agricultural produce and proper tithing;
2. Moed (set feasts) deals with religious festivals;
3. Nashim (women) deals with laws regulating women;
4. Nazikim (damages) deals with property rights and legal proceedings.
5. Kodashim (holy things) deals with the Temple;
6. Tohoroth (cleannesses) deals with laws of purity.

The six major divisions are each further subdivided into specific tractates. References to the Mishnah in scholarly writing are usually given according to tractate, not according to the major divisions. While these divisions appear clear and orderly, the modern reader of the Mishnah is frequently confused by the inclusion of what appears to be legal discussion unrelated to the major division in which they are found. For example, Benedictions (Berakoth) are treated in the first division on agricultural produce. To some extent these inconsistencies become more understandable when we look at the way in which the Mishnah was developed from earlier mishnoth of individual rabbis.

Development According to the Mishnah itself, oral tradition and its teachings goes all the way back to Moses himself who received the halakah from God on Sinai and passed it on to subsequent generations. In rabbinic tradition this understanding seems to have functioned in at least two ways. First, the teachings of previous generations is regarded as important in setting oral law. Second, this understanding did not mean that oral law was seen as the literal passing on of particular words. Halakah was to some extent a spiritual ideal only imperfectly brought to concrete realization in the teaching of specific rabbis. Therefore, halakah was a matter of exceptional religious importance and heated debate. The Mishnah frequently preserved contrary opinions, While it usually resolves the matter on one side or the other, the preservation in the tradition also allows for reconsideration by later generations.

Modern scholars see the Mishnah as a collection and editing of Jewish case law whose traditions may go back to about 150 B.C. but primarily from the period of 50 B.C. to 220 A.D. The tradition of the Mishnah appears to begin with the sect of Judaism called the Pharisees, who sought to liberalize the legal system of Judaism by applying regulations for Temple purity particularly with regard to food laws to the entirety of Judaism. This sect may be regarded as liberal since they argued that the entirety of the nation should be righteous before God in ways similar to the priesthood. The Pharisees were largely a lay movement. The major representatives of this party in the Mishnah are Hillel and Shammai who taught around A.D. 50.

After the Romans destroyed the Jerusalem Temple in A.D. 70, Yohannan ben Zakkai founded the rabbinic movement at Javneh (Jamnia) in Galilee. This movement succeeded in eventually unifying the surviving elements of Judaism into a coherent traditional system that forms the core of Judaism into the modern era. Hence, one of their primary concerns was to set the boundaries of legal interpretation or "make a fence around the Law." The Mishnah primarily represents the collections of various teachers' opinions on halakah and seeks to establish the limits of normative interpretation through an examination of case law and Scripture. Rabbi Akiba (50?–135 A.D.) is one of the towering figures who probably contributed the present system of the organization of the Mishnah. He also sought to make explicit the scriptural basis of halakah. His student Rabbi Meir appears to be the connecting link between Akiba's mishnah and the Mishnah of Rabbi.

The Mishnah of Rabbi is the basis of the Talmud which was written in Palestine about 360 A.D. and in Babylonia about 500 A.D. Those rabbis quoted in the Mishnah are referred to as the Tannaim while those in the Talmud are referred to as Amoraim. Scholars are somewhat divided on the issue to what extent Rabbi simply collected and systematized various rabbis' opinions or to what extent he functioned as an editor who left hs own stamp upon the material. It is probably safe to conclude that Rabbi was a highly respected rabbi whose opinion was considered authoritative in his day. Nevertheless, the extent to which he could creatively edit the rabbinic traditions of halakah was probably limited by the community of rabbis who would not hesitate to challenge him if he misrepresented tradition. The Mishnah may therefore be seen as a compendium of the tradition of rabbinic Judaism for the first two centuries.

Rabbinical Oral Law Several principles seem to have been used to determine the oral law that would enter the Mishnah. First, the Mishnah presumes the written Mosaic law as given in Scripture as its fundamental underpinning. Rabbi Akiba sought to give explicit scriptural precedent for decisions in the oral law, sometimes in what appear to be exceptionally strained logic. The Mishnah preserves some legal debate based upon direct scriptural commentary (referred to as midrash). In most of the Mishnah, however, the oral law is developed by reference to precedent and the development of case law, much on the same order that British and American jurisprudence has developed. From generation to generation certain rabbis are considered to be of particular importance in establishing the halakah. For example, almost always the halakah is according to Hillel rather than Shammai, even though Shammai's opinion is also quoted. While much of the Mishnah concerns matters of pragmatic concern to the social and religious organization (the rabbis do not distinguish between the two) of Judaism, some segments seem to preserve tradition for its own sake. For example, the Mishnah preserves an entire section dealing with the Temple organization and sacrifice, in spite of the fact that the Temple no longer existed at the time of the writing of the Mishnah. Such discussion indicates that perhaps priests were part of the academy of Yohannan ben Zakkai and also reflects the continuing hope through the first two centuries that the Temple would be rebuilt.

Mishnah and Understanding the Bible The Mishnah has proven helpful to an understanding of the Bible in two ways. First, it has helped in reconstructing specific elements in the Judaism of Palestine at the time of Jesus. Second, it has been helpful in understanding the development of Judaism during the same period that the early Christians were engaged in similar development.

1. An earlier generation of Christian scholars tended to see the Mishnah as descriptive of the practices of Judaism in Palestine during Jesus' life. More recent scholars are more cautious since they recognize the long history of development of the Mishnah and also since it has become more and more apparent that Judaism in Jesus' day was composed of many religious viewpoints and movements. See Jewish Parties. Particularly, the practices of the Pharisaic sect may be reflected in some of the early traditions included in the Mishnah. For example, Jesus' saying in Matthew 7:12 is quite similar to rabbinic statements in the Mishnah. Also, certain Mishnaic evidence may be helpful in better understanding social relationships depicted in the Gospels. For example, evidence from Nashim (on women) helps us to reconstruct the social position of Palestinian Jewish women in the first century. In this context it appears that Jesus is certainly more liberal in His treatment of women than was rabbinic tradition. The evidence of the Mishnah should not be taken as representative of what all or most Jews believed in the first century. Rather, it should be taken as a clue to what some Jews believed and balanced with other historical data.

2. Since the earliest Christians were also Jews, the Mishnah may give some indication of the development of early Christianity alongside of the development of rabbinic Judaism. At the same time that Yohannan ben Zakkai was founding the academy at Javneh, Christian Jews were coping with the loss of the Temple and the development of their own religious communities. Understanding of the development of Judaism in this period alongside the development of Christianity may help in understanding the commonalities and strains between the two sibling religions.

MISHRAITES (Mĭsh′ rā ītes) A family from Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53). The name designates residents of Mishra, a place of which nothing is known.

MISPAR (Mĭs′ pär) Modern translation spelling of personal name meaning, "writing." Exile returning with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2).

MISPERETH (Mĭs′ pĕ rĕth) Personal name meaning, "court recorder" or "learned." Exile who returned with Zerubbabel. Parallel list has Mizpar (Ezra 2:2).

MISREPHOTH-MAIM (Mĭs′ rĕ phŏth mā′ ĭm) Limit of pursuit of the coalition of King Jabin of Hazor (Josh. 11:8; 13:6). The most likely site is khirbet el-Mushreifeh at the north end of the plain of Acco. The meaning of the name is debated. Suggestions include: Mishrephoth on the west (REB); "eminence of the waters"; "hot springs"; "lime burning at the water."

MISSION(S) A task on which God sends a person He has called, particularly a mission to introduce another group of people to salvation in Christ. In the Christian context, the person sent is called a missionary. This person is charged with the task of spreading the gospel of Jesus Christ to people to whom he is sent. The mission of the churches is to send our missionaries to all parts of the world until everyone has had the opportunity to hear the message of Jesus and accept Him as Lord. Interestingly, the term mission is not found in the Scriptures, yet the concept of mission permeates the entire Bible.

ars insist that the Old Testament has little, if anything, to say about mission, the more general understanding is that mission is an important Old Testament concept. Its foundation lies in the understanding that the transcendent God is also the God who is involved in history. He is the God who acts. The record of His involvement in history indicates that His work is both revelatory and redemptive. People know who God is by what He has done. Since the Fall (Gen. 3), God's primary activity has been redemptive, as the confessions in the Old Testament reveal (see Deut. 6:20–24; 26:5–9; Jos. 24:2–15). This redeeming activity of God is missionary because God sends His messengers to the house of Israel and His prophets as His spokesmen to all nations.

Clearly, God's mission concern is inclusive, not exclusive. As indicated in the listing of the nations in Genesis 10, God's interest has been in all people, not just in Israel. When God called Abraham and his descendants, they were chosen, not to be exclusive vessels, but rather to be a means of blessing "all families of the earth" (Gen. 12:1–3; 18:16–19; 22:9–19; 26:1–5; 28:10–14). Later, God told Israel that they had been elected as God's chosen people (Ex. 19:3–6). They are to be the recipient and guardian of God's special revelation (Heb. 1:1–3) and the channel through which the Redeemer would enter the stream of human history (Isa. 49:1–10). Still, the election was not an end in itself. God called Israel to be holy, separate, or distinct from other nations, but they were also to be priests to the other nations. To live among them and lead them to God was their purpose for being.

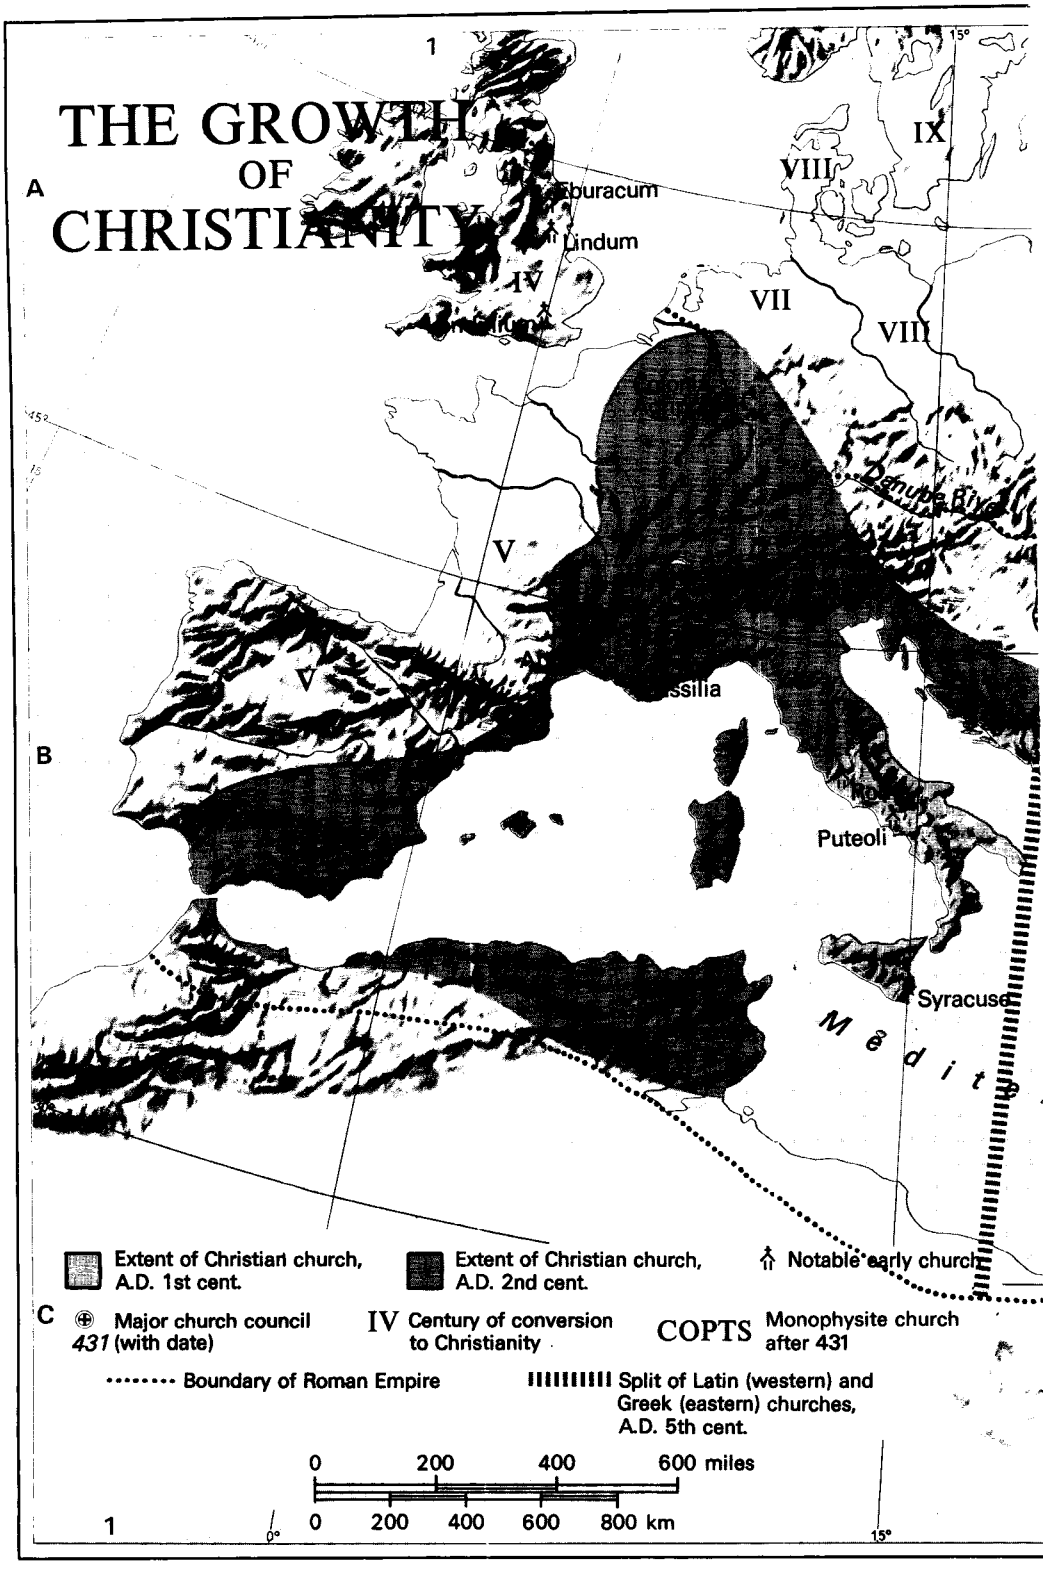
This truth was kept before Israel in three ways. The message of the prophets served as the first important reminder. For instance, Jeremiah was called to be a prophet to all nations (Jer. 1:3–10) and spoke out in judgment against them (Jer. 48:47; 49:6,39). He also prophesied that all nations would be gathered in Jerusalem (Jer. 3:17). In like manner, Isaiah envisioned that all nations would be redeemed by coming to Jerusalem (Isa. 25; 66:18–24). Further, he warned them of God's judgment (Isa. 12—25) and called upon Israel to be a "light to the Gentiles" (Isa. 49:6).

The second reminder of Israel's responsibility in mission came through worship. The Psalms took into account that God was the Lord of all nations (see Ps. 67:1–2; 72:8,17,19; 50; 96). The architecture of the Temple provided a place for foreigners to worship in the court of the Gentiles (1 Kings 8:41–43), and the prayer of Solomon at the Temple dedication mentioned this fact (2 Chron. 6:32–33).

Furthermore, the history of Israel reminded her of her mission responsibility through Rahab (Josh. 6:22–25) and Ruth (Ruth 1—4) becoming a part of Israel, although they were foreigners.

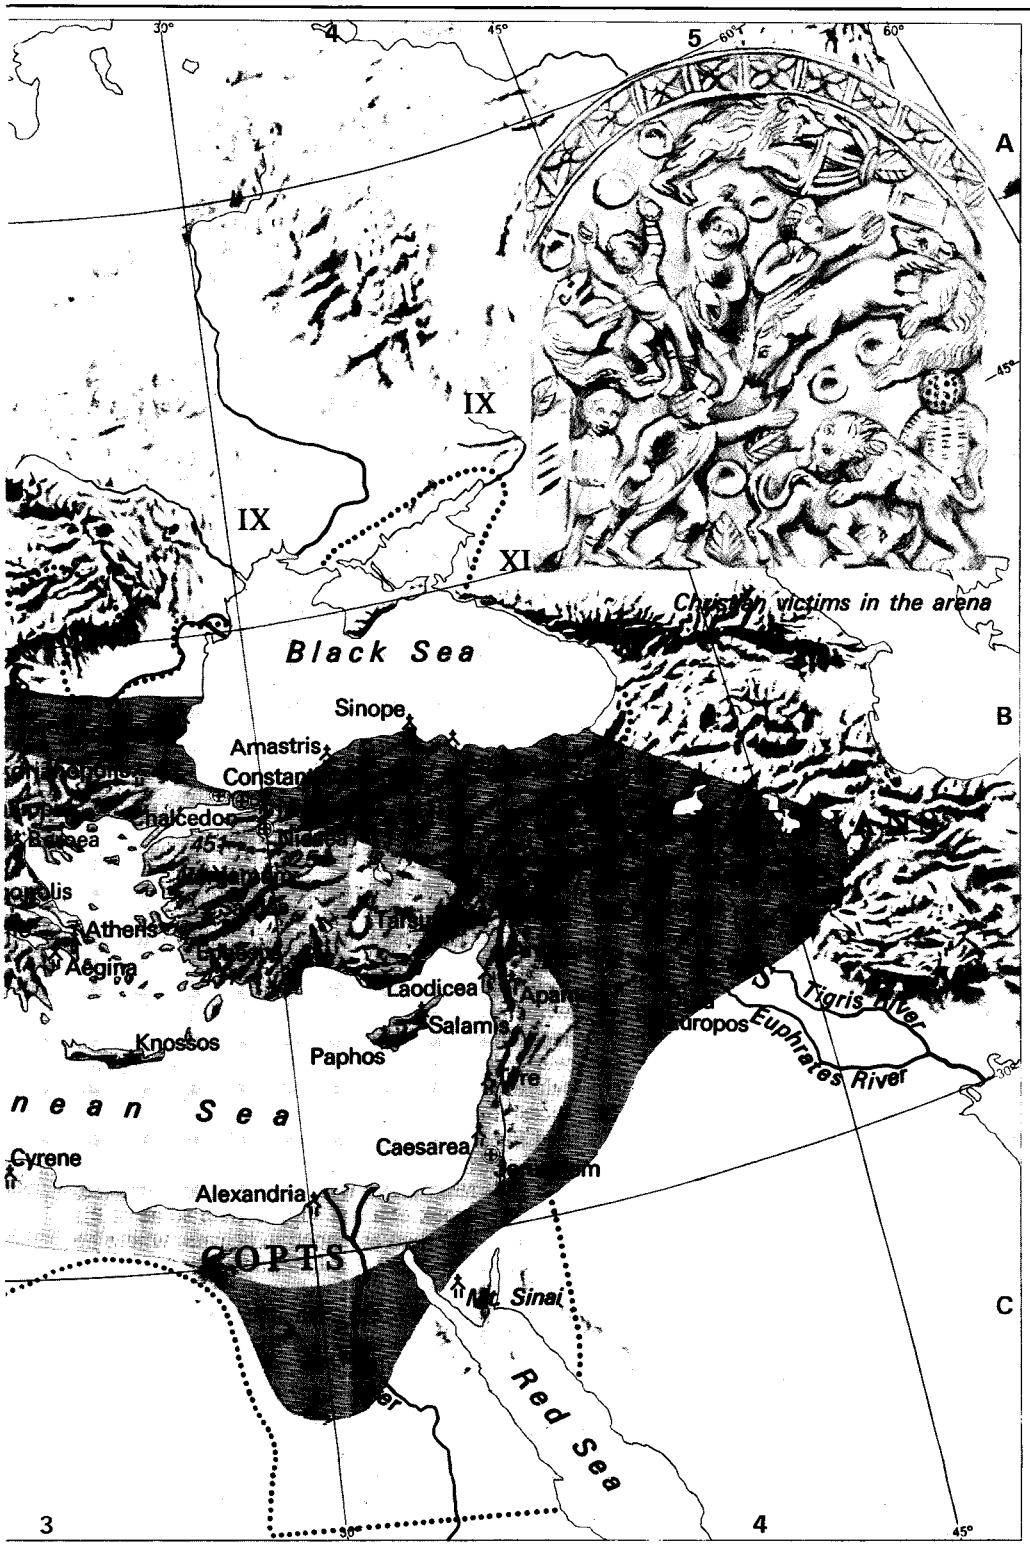
The Old Testament emphasized that the nations would have to come to Jerusalem to be saved. Jonah was shocked to receive a different kind of mission. God told him to go to Nineveh and call the people to repentance. He rebelled at helping the nation's oppressor escape judgment. Still, the Book of Jonah became the major Old Testament witness to God's love for and willingness to let foreigners relate to Him in worship.

Mission in the New Testament The New Testament brings to a crescendo the Bible's symphonic theme of mission. The mission begins with Jesus who was sent to earth to reveal the Father (John 1:18; 14:9), to glorify Him (John 13:31; 14:13; 17:1,6), to bring the kingdom of God on earth (Matt. 12:22–32), and to make God's love and mercy known to a lost world. He came to seek and save the lost (Luke 19:10). His mission was also inclusive. While Jesus' ministry was primarily for the Jews, He also met the needs of non-Jews. He healed the daughter of "a woman of Canaan" and praised the woman for her faith (Mat. 15:21–29). He also healed the servant of the Roman centurion (Matt. 8:5–13). On another occasion, He initiated a conversation with a Samaritan woman which led both to her conversion and to that of the entire community (John 4).



Through His teachings, Jesus made it clear that His mission was to continue after He ascended. Each of the Gospels and Acts contains an account of His mandate to His followers, telling them to go to all the world, make disciples, baptize them, and preach the gospel (Matt. 28:19–20; Mark 16:15–16; Luke 24:46–49; John 20:21–22; Acts 1:8). Jesus assumed that the church would reach out beyond itself. This commission made a dramatic change in the emphasis of mission. Instead of looking to foreigners to come to Jerusalem as did the Old Testament, the church's mission is to go into all the world and not wait for the world to come to it. Not just selected prophets like Jonah but all the believers were to go and tell what they had seen with others.

The scope of mission was inclusive. The church was to cross all barriers—to reach out to all ethnic groups, clans, tribes, social classes, and cultures. The message of salvation was to be shared with all people everywhere.



The new disciples were to be baptized and taught. The purpose of the teaching was to do more than share information. It was to provide nourishment in the faith as well.

Since the Great Commission is a mandate, the church is expected to be obedient. Even so, it does not have to do the job alone. Christ has promised that He will be with the church until "the end of the world." With this assurance, the church was obedient, for the gospel was presented first in Jerusalem (Acts 1—8), then in Samaria (Acts 8—12) and finally to all the world (Acts 13—28).

Jesus' presence would be felt through the Holy Spirit. In fact, the disciples were not to go out into the world until the Holy Spirit had come upon them (Acts 1:8). This is the only time in the Bible that a church is told not to be involved in mission. The reason are clear. The Holy Spirit empowers the church. He also convicts and converts sinners (Acts 5:14; 11:21,24; 18:8), performs mighty works of grace in believers (Acts 4:8–10), disciplines the church (Acts 5:13–14), sends forth workers (Acts 8:26; 13:1–3), presides over the missionary council (Acts 15), restrains and contains workers (Acts 16:6–10), and exercises supreme ecclesiastical authority (Acts 20:28).

Empowered by the Holy Spirit, the church did mission by preaching Jesus (Acts 2; 8:35; 10:36–44; 1 Cor. 2:1–2). The church's mission to the world was strengthened through its intimate fellowship and unity (Acts 2:44), and every effort was made to maintain this characteristic (Acts 6:1–7; 15; and Paul's letters to the churches in Corinth and Galatia).

The missionaries Jesus sent out were instructed to go only to the house of Israel, to preach and to meet human need. They were not to be overly concerned about their physical or material needs, nor were they to spend an undue amount of time with those who willfully rejected their message (Matt. 10:1–15). After the resurrection, missionaries were arrested (Acts 4 and 5), suffered (2 Cor. 4:7–10), and died (Acts 7).

The apostle Paul was the most outstanding of these missionaries. God had called him as a missionary to the Gentiles (Acts 26:16–18; Rom. 1:5; Eph. 3:1), and he was sent out by the church in Antioch (Acts 13:1–3). The Holy Spirit led him in his ministry (Acts 16:6–10). He preached Jesus (1 Cor. 2:1–2), met people on their own level (Acts 17), established autonomous, indigenous churches (Acts 14:23), and worked with others—often training them to do the works of the ministry (Acts 16:1–3). Paul further refused to be dependent on the work he established for his own livelihood, yet he was grateful when churches responded to his needs (Phil. 4:14–18). Significantly, he identified with those with whom he worked (1 Cor. 9:19–23).

Mission was the heartbeat of the New Testament churches. See Confession; Election; Evangelism; Gospel; Holy Spirit; Kingdom of God; Paul; Salvation. Bob Compton

MIST Translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms with a combined range of meaning including subterranean water, fog, and clouds. The KJV frequently has vapor(s) where modern translations have mist. The mist of Genesis 2:6 refers to subterranean waters welling up and watering the ground. In Job 36:27 rain distills from the mist or fog rising from the earth. Mist often appears as a symbol for something which quickly passes away (Isa. 44:22; Hos. 13:3; Jas. 4:14; 2 Pet. 2:17).

MITANNI (Mĭ tăn′ nī) Major kingdom between 1500 and 1300 B.C., located in what is now the northern parts of Turkey and Iran. Mitanni rivaled Egypt in its developed culture and control of the Ancient Near East during this period. The people had many advanced technologies, including horse-drawn chariots. They also had fairly sophisticated laws for that day. Mitanni maintained considerable influence over Palestine for several centuries, affecting in particular the Jebusite culture of Jerusalem. MITHAN (Mith′ an) Place name perhaps meaning, "gift." Town of unknown location; home town of Joshaphat (1 Chron. 11:43). Greek translation understood this as Bethany.

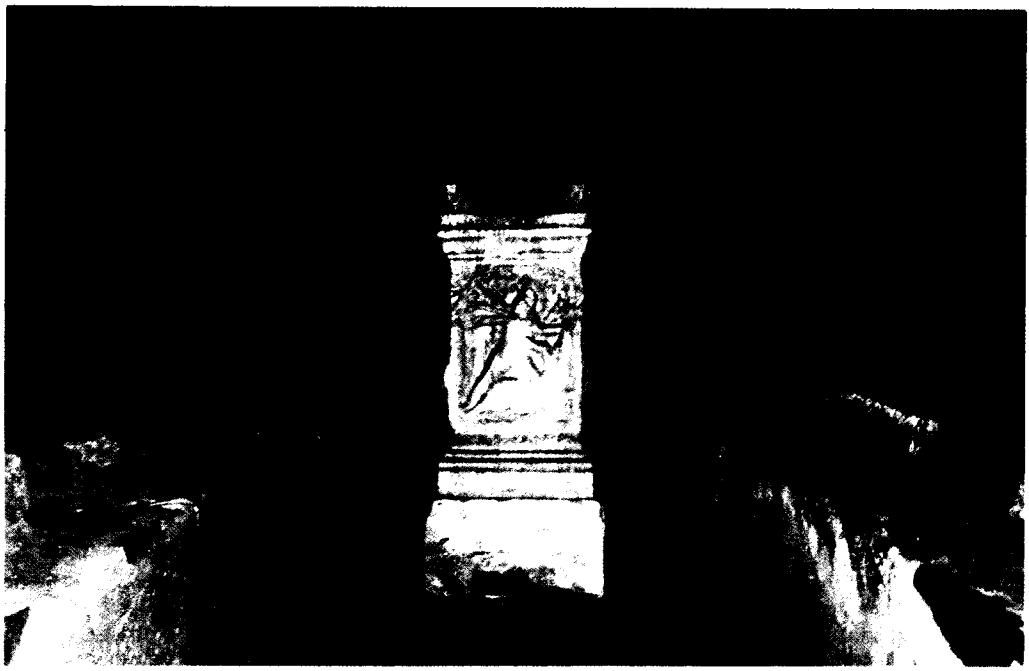
MITHCAH (Mĭth′ cah) KJV form of Mithkah, a place name meaning, "sweetness." One of the wilderness stations (Num. 33:28–29).

MITHKAH (Mĭth′ kah) Modern translations' spelling of Mithcah.



MITHNITE (Mĭth′ nīte) Title given to Joshaphat, a member of David's army (1 Chron. 11:43). See Mithan.

MITHRA, MITHRAISM Persian god and the mystery religion devoted to his worship.

The god Mithra Mithra was originally a Persian deity considered to be the mediator between mankind and Ahura Mazda, god of light. This god overcame evil and brought life, both animal and vegetable, to humankind. Statues of Mithra characteristically show him holding a bull by the nostrils while plunging a knife into its neck. The Romans identified Mithra with the sun god. December 25 was celebrated as his birthday. Three traditions relate the birth of Mithra: (1) he was born of an incestuous relationship between Ahura Mazda and his own mother; (2) he was born of an ordinary mortal; (3) Mithra was born from a rock. After his redemptive work on earth was finished, Mithra partook of a last supper with some of his devotees and then ascended to heaven, where he continues to assist the faithful in their struggle against demons.

The religion of Mithra Since Mithraism belongs to the general category known as Mystery Religions, our knowledge of its specific doctrines and rituals is very limited. Only devotees of the religion were allowed to witness its rituals or have access to its sacred doctrines. Most of our knowledge, therefore, consists of inferences drawn from artifacts and places of worship discovered by archaeologists.

Characteristics of Mithraism Mithraism was basically a religion of the common people, although at least one Roman emperor (Commodius, 180–192 A.D.) was initiated into its mysteries. It was the only mystery religion which excluded women from membership. It had no professional clergy. Its seven stages of initiation prepared the initiate for ascent to the god of light. These stages corresponded to the seven planetary spheres through which one must ascend to reach the abode of the blessed: the Raven, the Occult, the Soldier, the Lion, the Persian, the Runner of the Sun, and the Father. Male children were allowed to participate in the lower stages.

Rituals In its ancient rural setting the actual slaying of a bull was part of the ritual. The initiate was placed in a pit covered by an iron grate. The bull was slain on the grate, and the initiate attempted to catch its sacred blood with his tongue. By the time the religion reached the Roman Empire, this act seems to have become mere symbolism. Beyond this, we know almost nothing except that bas-reliefs depict celebrants carrying counterfeit heads of animals, Persians, etc. This suggests the wearing of costumes corresponding to the stage of initiation.

A rival to Christianity Of all the mystery religions, Mithraism became the strongest rival to Christianity. Its rivalry with Christianity may be explained by common external features. Among the more prominent are: December 25 the god's birthday, Sunday the holy day, baptism, a sacred meal, categorical ethics, belief in a final judgment with eternal life for the righteous and punishment for the wicked, and that the world would finally be destroyed by fire.

MITHREDATH (Mĭth′ rē dăth) Personal name meaning, "gift of Mithra" (a Persian diety). 1. Cyrus' treasurer who returned the temple vessels (Ezra 1:8). 2. Syrian officer who protested Nehemiah's rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7).

MITRE KJV term for a type of headdress, probably a turban (compare the related verb at Isa. 22:18). The mitre formed part of the high priest's garments (Ex. 28:4,36–39) and was required dress on the day of atonement (Lev. 16:4). Priests were prohibited from showing signs of mourning such as dishevelled hair (Ezek. 24:17; Lev. 21:10). They perhaps wore turbans whenever they went out. In Zechariah 3:5 the high priest Joshua received a clean mitre as a sign of the restoration of the priesthood.

MITYLENE (Mĭt ŷ lē′ nē) Place name meaning, "Purity." Chief city of the Aegean island of Lesbos southeast of Asia Minor. Paul stopped at Mitylene on his return trip to Syria from Achaia as part of his third missionary journey (Acts 20:14).

MIXED MULTITUDE Term for foreigners who associate themselves with a dominant ethnic group. The term is used for those foreigners who joined with the Israelites in the Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 12:38), who became associated with the people of Judah during the Exile (Neh. 13:3), or who were associated with the Egyptians (Jer. 25:20) or Babylonians (Jer. 50:37). See Mingled People.

MIZAR (Mī′ zȧr) Proper name meaning, "littleness" or an adjective meaning, "little" (Ps. 42:6). The context of the Psalm suggests a site at the headwaters of the Jordan in the territory of Dan.

MIZPAH, MIZPEH (Mĭz′ pä̆h, Mĭz′ pĕh) Place name or common noun meaning, "watchtower" or "lookout." A name commonly used in Palestine to refer to places used to provide security. The name appears in two different forms, Mizpah and Mizpeh, with the same basic meaning.

The name Mizpah was used for at least two different sites in the Transjordan, one located in the territory of Gilead, the other in Moab. In Gilead, Laban and Jacob made a covenant (Gen. 31:25–55), set up a pillar, and named it Mizpah (Gen. 31:49). Mizpah was also the name of the hometown of Jephthah, the Gileadite (Judg. 11). While the location of Mizpah of Gilead is not known, it was most likely located in the northern part of Gilead, perhaps a site like Ramoth-gilead. See Ramoth-gilead. The location of Mizpeh in Moab has not been identified. In biblical history, this was the site to which David took his parents (1 Sam. 22:3–5) when Saul sought his life.

At least two sites and one region west of the Jordan were named Mizpah. The account of Joshua's encounter with Jabin, king of Hazor (Josh. 11), refers to "the land of Mizpah" (v. 3) and "the valley of Mizpeh" (v. 8), a region in north Palestine, the location of which is unknown. A second Mizpeh west of the Jordan was located in the tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:38). While the exact location is unknown, this Mizpeh may have been near Lachish.

The town of Mizpeh located in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26) seems to be the most important of the Mizpeh's in the Old Testament. In spite of the numerous references to this important Old Testament site, its location is still debated. Two major sites have been suggested as possible locations: Nebi Samwil, located about five miles north of Jerusalem, and tell en-Nasbeh, located about eight miles north of Jerusalem. While a major excavation has never been done at Nebi Samwil, the stories of Samuel seem to fit this location. On the other hand, tell en-Nasbeh has been excavated, and the archaeological data fits well the history of Mizpeh of Benjamin.

The important role Mizpah played in Old Testament history is reflected in the many events associated with the site. Mizpah was a rallying point for Israel as they gathered against the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 20). Samuel gathered Israel to Mizpah for prayer in the light of the Philistine threat (1 Sam. 7:5–11). Mizpah was a major site at which legal decisions were made (1 Sam. 7:15–17). One of the most interesting chapters in the history of Mizpah took place after the Fall of Jerusalem. With Jerusalem in shambles following the Babylonian attack in 587 B.C., Mizpah became the administrative center of this Babylonian province. At Mizpah Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of the province, sought to encourage those who had remained behind (Jer. 40).

MIZRAIM (Mĭz′ rā̆ ĭm) Hebrew word for Egypt (Gen. 12:10; 13:10; 25:18). 1. Son of Ham (Gen. 10:6,13). 2. The Mushri, a people of Cilicia in southeastern Asia Minor (possibly 1 Kings 10:28; 2 Kings 7:6; 2 Chron. 1:16–17 TEV; NIV note). Mushri derives from the Assyrian word for "march" and possibly designates any people living outside their borders. Some scholars revocalize the Hebrew consonantal text to read Mushri; but they have no textual evidence for this. See Egypt.

MIZZAH (Mĭz′ zah) Personal and clan name meaning, "from this" or "light ray." Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13,17; 1 Chron. 1:37).

MNASON (Mnā′ son) Personal name meaning, "remembering," variant of Jason. Native of Cyprus and Paul's host during his final trip to Jerusalem in about A.D. 60 (Acts 21:16).

MOAB AND THE MOABITE STONE (Mō′ ăb, Mō′ ȧ bīte) Personal and national name and monument the nation left behind. The narrow strip of cultivable land directly east of the Dead Sea was known in biblical times as "Moab," and the people who lived there, as "Moabites." Moab is rolling plateau (averaging approximately 3,300 feet elevation), bounded on the west by the rugged escarpment which drops down to the Dead Sea (itself almost 1,300 feet below sea level), on the east by the desert, and running through it the steep Wady Mujib canyon (the Arnon River of biblical times). The Mujib/Arnon, which flows essentially east-west and enters the Dead Sea approximately mid-way along the latter's western shore, separates northern Moab from Moab proper.

Relatively few springs appear on the Moabite plateau, and the waters of the Mujib/Arnon are virtually inaccessible because of the steepness of the river canyon. Still, the area is well watered by winter rains brought by winds from the Mediterranean. The porous soil holds enough of the moisture for the villagers to grow cereal crops and to find good pasturage for their sheep and goats.

Moab's agricultural productivity is illustrated by the biblical passages pertaining to Ruth and King Mesha, surely the two best-known Moabites from the Bible. The Book of Ruth opens with a time of famine in Judah; thus Elimelech, Naomi, and their two sons emigrated to Moab where food was still available (Ruth 1:1–5). King Mesha, we are told, "was a sheep breeder; and he had to deliver annually to the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and the wool of a hundred thousand rams" (2 Kings 3:4 RSV).

The chief cities of northern Moab were Hesbon, Medeba, and Dibon. Since this region was somewhat cut off from Moab proper by the Arnon, it was more vulnerable to international pressures and often changed hands during biblical times. In fact, the Ammonites made claim to all the territory as far south as the Arnon (Judg. 11:13), while the Book of Joshua makes the same claim for Israel (13:15–28). Other biblical passages which pertain to the region immediately north of the Arnon clearly recognize it as Moabite territory (Isa. 15; Jer. 48), as does the inscription of the Moabite Stone (see below). A crux passage for understanding the whole matter is Numbers 21:25–30, which explains that King Sihon of the Amorites took northern Moab from the Moabites and that the Israelites took it from him. Unfortunately, this passage is open to various interpretations (especially when the essentially parallel version in Jeremiah 48:45–47 is taken into account).

Moab proper was more isolated from the outside world, bounded by the Dead Sea escarpment on the west, the desert on the east, the Mujib/Arnon on the north, and a second river canyon on the south—called today Wady el-Hesa, probably, but not certainly, the River Zered of biblical times (Num. 21:12). The chief cities of Moab proper were Kir-hareseth (present-day Kerak) and a place called Ar Moab (possibly to be identified with the present-day village of Rabbah approximately nine miles northeast of Kerak). Second Kings 3 describes a military campaign undertaken by King Jehoram of Israel and supported by King Jehoshaphat of Judah which penetrated Moab proper and culminated in a siege of Kir-hareseth. The siege was lifted when King Mesha of Moab sacrificed his oldest son on the city wall.

In addition to biblical passages such as those indicated above and occasional references in Assyrian texts, our major souce of information about ancient Moab is the so-called Moabite Stone. This stone, which bears an inscription from the reign of the same King Mesha mentioned in 2 Kings 3, was discovered in 1868, near the ruins of ancient Dibon, by a German missionary. Known also as The Mesha Inscription, the monument reports the major accomplishments of King Mesha's reign. He boasts especially of having recovered Moabite independence from Israel and of having restored Moabite control over northern Moab.

Since they were neighbors, the history of the Moabites was intertwined with that of Israel. Moreover, the Israelites regarded the Moabites as close relatives, as implied by Genesis 19:30–38. We hear of peaceful interchange as well as conflicts between the Israelites and Moabites already during the time of the Judges. The story of Ruth illustrates peaceful relations, while the episode of Ehud and Eglon illustrates conflict (Judg. 3:12–30). Saul is reported to have fought against the Moabites (1 Sam. 14:47). David, a descendant of the Moabitess Ruth according to the biblical genealogies (Ruth 4:18–22), placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab while he was on the run from Saul (1 Sam. 22:3–4). Yet he is reported to have defeated the Moabites in battle later on and to have executed two-thirds of the Moabite prisoners by arbitrary selection (2 Sam. 8:2). Moab was represented among Solomon's wives, and the worship of Chemosh, the Moabite god, accommodated in Solomon's Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:1–8).

Our most detailed information about Moabite-Israelite relations comes from the mid-ninth century B.C., the time of the Omri dynasty of Israel and King Mesha of Moab (1 Kings 16:15—2 Kings 10:18). At this point the inscription of the Moabite Stone supplements the biblical record. We learn that Omri conquered northern Moab and gained some degree of domination over Moab proper. Ahab continued Omri's policies. King Mesha ascended the throne of Moab approximately midway during Ahab's reign, however, and eventually succeeded in throwing off the Israelite yoke. Mesha apparently began the struggle for Moabite independence during the turbulent years following Ahab's death (2 Kings 1:1). Ahaziah, who succeeded Ahab to the throne of Israel, was unable to respond to Mesha's challenge because of an accident which led to his premature death (2 Kings 1). Later, when Jehoram followed Ahaziah to the throne of Israel and attempted to restore Israelite control over Mesha, he was unsuccessful (2 Kings 3).

Eventually, by 700 B.C., Moab fell under the shadow of Assyria as did Israel, Judah, Ammon, and the other petty Syro-Palestinian Kingdoms. Thus Moab and Moabite kings are mentioned in the records of Tiglath-Pileser III, Sargon II, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. Also, prophetic oracles such as Amos 2:1–3; Isaiah 15; and Jeremiah 48 pertain to these last, waning years of the Moabite kingdom.

MOABITE (Mō ȧ bīte) Resident of Moab.

MOABITESS (Mō ȧ bīt' ess) A female resident of Moab. Prominent women from Moab include

Ruth (Ruth 1:22; 2:2,21; 4:5,10), some of Solomon's wives (1 Kings 11:1), and the mother of Jehozabad (2 Chron. 24:26).

MOADIAH (Mō ā dī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah promises" or "Yah's ornament." Priestly clan in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17), perhaps to be identified with Maadiah (Neh. 12:5).

MODERATION Self-control; calmness; temporateness (Phil. 4:5). The underlying Greek term is used in parallel with kindness (2 Macc. 9:27). Modern translations read forbearance (RSV), forbearing spirit (NAS), gentleness (NIV, NRSV), and "consideration of others" (REB).

MOLADAH (Mō lā' dah) Place name meaning, "generation." City near Beersheba in southern Judah assigned both to Judah (Josh. 15:26) and to Simeon (Josh. 19:2), perhaps reflecting the political realities of different times or the dependence of Simeon on Judah. The similarity to the name Molid suggests that Moladah was a Jerahmeelite settlement (1 Sam. 27:10; 1 Chron. 2:29). The city was among those repopulated by Jews returning from Exile (Neh. 11:26). Moladah is perhaps identical to the Edomite village of Malathah which served as a retreat for Herod Agrippa I. Various sites have been proposed: khirbet Kuseifeh twelve miles east of Beersheba; tell el-Milh southeast of Beersheba; and khereibet el-Waten east of Beersheba.

MOLE See Animals.

MOLECH (Mō' lĕch; king) Transliteration of Hebrew word related to word for "king" but describing a foreign god or a practice related to foreign worship. The meaning of "Molech" is debated. Two views generally are proposed. One suggestion is that "Molech" denotes a particular type of offering—a votive sacrifice made to confirm or fulfill a vow. This viewpoint is supported by the fact that some Carthaginian-Phoenician (Punic) inscriptions from the period 400–150 B.C. imply that the word mlk is a general form for "sacrifice" or "offering." Such a meaning is possible in some passages (Lev. 18:21; 20:3–5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35).

A second suggestion is that "Molech" is the name of a pagan deity to whom human sacrifices were made. This deity often is associated with Ammon (compare 1 Kings 11:7—) "the abomination of the children of Ammon." Leviticus 20:5 condemns those who "commit whoredom with Molech" (see also Lev. 18:21; 20:3–5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35). Some recent archaeological evidence points to child sacrifice in ancient Ammon. Many scholars contend that all the biblical texts referring to Molech can be understood by interpreting it as a divine name.

The etymology of the term "Molech" is interesting. Scholars suggest that it is a deliberate misvocalization of the Hebrew word for king or for the related participle (mōlek), "ruler." They propose that the consonants for the Hebrew word for king (mlk) were combined with the vowels from the word for shame (boshet). Thus, this title was a divine epithet expressing contempt for the pagan god.

In times of apostasy some Israelites, apparently in desperation, made their children "go through the fire to Molech" (Lev. 18:21; 20:2–5; 2 Kings 23:10; compare 2 Kings 17:31; Jer. 7:31; 19:5; 32:35). It generally is assumed that references like these are to the sacrifices of children in the Valley of Hinnom at a site known as Topheth ("Topheth" probably means "firepit" in Syriac). See Hinnom; Topheth. Precisely how this was done is unknown. Some contend that the children were thrown into a raging fire. Certain rabbinic writers describe a hollow bronze statute in the form of a human but with the head of an ox. According to the rabbis, children were placed in the structure which was then heated from below. Drums were pounded to drown out the cries of the children.

An alternate view contends that the expression "passed through Molech" refers not to human sacrifices but that parents gave up their children to grow up as temple prostitutes. Such a view appeals to Leviticus 18 where throughout the chapter the writer is concerned with sexual intercourse (especially vv. 19–23). Another view sees an original fire ceremony dedicating, but not harming children, that later was transformed into a burnt-offering ceremony.

The practice of offering children as human sacrifice was condemned in ancient Israel, but the implication is clear in the Old Testament that child—sacrifice was practiced by some in Israel (2 Kings 21:6; 23:10; 2 Chron. 28:3; Ps. 106:38; Jer. 7:31; 19:4–5; Ezek. 16:21; 23:37,39). The Exile seems to have put an end to this type of worship in Israel. However, it lingered on in North Africa and among the Carthaginian Phoenicians into the Christian era.

MOLID (Mō līd) Personal name meaning, "begetter." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:29).

MOLOCH (Mō' lŏch) Variant form of Molech used at Acts 7:43.

MOLTEN SEA A large cast bronze basin that stood in the courtyard to the southeast of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7:23–26; 2 Chron. 4:2–5). The basin was cast by Hiram of Tyre who was responsible for all the bronze work in the Temple (1 Kings 7:13–14). The bronze for the molten sea was supplied by the spoils from David's campaigns (1 Chron. 18:8). The basin was over fourteen feet in diameter, over seven feet high, and over forty-three feet in circumference. It was about three inches thick. The estimated weight is about 30 tons, and the estimated volume is about 12,000 gallons (U.S.). The brim was turned outward resembling a lily, and below the brim were two rows of gourds (but compare 1 Kings 7:24; 2 Chron. 4:3). The sea rested on the backs of twelve oxen. The oxen were arranged in groups of three, each group facing toward one of the four compass directions (1 Kings 7:25; 2 Chron. 4:4). The oxen were later removed by Ahaz and replaced with a stone base (2 Kings 16:17; compare Jer. 52:20). After the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C., the basin was broken in pieces and taken to Babylon (2 Kings 25:13; Jer. 52:17). The basin was used for the purification of the priests (2 Chron. 4:6). Some have suggested that the molten sea was also symbolic of the great sea present when God began to create the heavens and the earth thus making the sea symbolic of God's creative activity (Gen. 1:2). Phil Logan

MONEY BELT Modern rendering of the term the KJV translated as purse (Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). See Purse.

MONEY CHANGERS Persons whose profession was to sell or exchange Roman or other moneys for Jewish money acceptable in the Temple worship. In New Testament times regions and cities issued their own money. This caused Jews of the Dispersion, those who lived outside of Judea, to bring many kinds of money to Jerusalem. To help visitors change money into that acceptable in Jerusalem, money changers set up tables in the Temple court of the Gentiles. Syrian silver coins were the money of Jerusalem then, and worshipers used them to pay their Temple tax of a half shekel and to buy sacrifices for the altar.

Three words are translated "moneychangers": kollubistōn (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15) of Semitic origin referred to the exchange rate or commission; kermatistas (John 2:14) referred to a dealer in small change; and trapetzitais (Matt. 25:27) which Luke used in a slightly different form (trapetzan, 19:23, or shulhanim in Hebrew) referred to a money agent who sat at a table.

Money changers were in the area with vendors who sold animals, birds, and other items used in Temple worship and sacrifices. Such transactions were numerous and required the service of brokers who knew the value of foreign money. Some exchangers profited greatly and loaned their money along with that others invested with them. Their interest rates ranged from 20 to 300 percent per year.

In anger at this corruption of the purpose of the Temple, Jesus turned over the tables of the money changers and drove them and the sellers of animals out of the Temple court (Matt. 21:12).

MONOTHEISM/POLYTHEISM The competing systems of religious belief that only one god exists or that many gods exist. Bible students often argue on the basis of biblical evidence that Israel in the first centuries of her life as a people did not have a monotheistic system of belief: indeed, that Moses' tradition does not appear in that kind of category. To support the accuracy of this statement, they examine the central text in the Old Testament for defining Israel's belief about God: the Ten Commandments. The first commandment stipulates a fundamental tenet in Israel's belief system: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" (Ex. 20:3). That requirement for participation in Israel's community of faith does not assert that serving other gods before one serves the Lord would be foolish since no other gods exist. It assumes quite to the contrary that other gods do exist. It asserts that, even though the other gods exist, the people who follow the Mosaic Commandments shall not embrace any of those other gods as gods who compete for the loyalty of the people. The Lord who brought Israel out of the land of Egypt will allow no compromise in the loyalty of the people. That assertion assumes the existence of other false gods who could call for loyalty and commitment from the Lord's people. That kind of belief system is commonly called henotheism.

In contrast to the call for strict commitment to the Lord alone, to a kind of divine jealousy that would tolerate no commitments from the people to gods other than the Lord, even though other gods might tempt the Lord's people with offers of power, the people among whom Israel lived in the early years of occupation in Canaan believed in numerous gods whose activities influenced their lives. Principal among the gods of the Canaanite pantheon were the great father figure, El; the younger hero, Baal; the adversary against order in the created land, Yam; the consort for Baal, Anat; and the ruler of Sheol, the place of the dead, Mot. In the Canaanite story about the various events involving these gods, Baal and his consort were primarily responsible for the success or failure of the agriculture in the social structure of Canaan. The fertility of the land depended on the fertility of Baal and his consort. The cult for the Canaanite farmers sought to stimulate the fertility of the divine couple, and thus the fertility of the land, by participating in fertility rituals at central sanctuaries called high places. The sexual activities of these rituals would stimulate Baal and his consort to similar activities and thus secure the fertility of the land.

One particular phase of that cult developed its drama from a belief that in the fall of the year, the time when vegetation on the earth dies, Baal died and descended into Sheol. On hearing the news of this tragedy, Anat began a long search for Baal. She found him in Sheol and effected his resurrection from the dead by coaxing him back to activity in the world of the living. This scene of resurrection occurred in the spring when the world springs back to life. Such mythology undergirds a belief system that depended on the activities, indeed, the interrelationship, of many gods. That system can be called polytheism.

A move away from henotheism and polytheism appears first in the Old Testament among the prophets. The prophetic movement appears as early as the prophet Elijah. Competition between the people of Israel and the people of Phoenicia was highlighted by a competition for loyalty of the people between the Lord and Baal. That competition came to its sharpest focus in the story about the contest between Elijah, the prophet for the Lord, and the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18). The issue for the contests is still competition for the loyalty of the people. That issue focused on the question of genuine claim to status as God. "If the Lord be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him" (v. 21). The issue of claim to genuine status as God is then focused on power. "The God that answereth by fire, let him be God" (1 Kings 18:24).

The pressure of the Exile challenged Yahweh's claim as the only God. If the Lord is really God and if that claim can be substantiated by acts of power, then how could the people of the Lord lose their independence and their land to a foreign people? Would the success of the Babylonians against Judah not undergird the claim that Marduk, the god of the Babylonians, is really God? Would it not suggest that the Lord, the God of the Judeans, had been defeated by Marduk, the god of the Babylonians? The prophets' response to this crisis was: the tragedy of the Exile was not the result of the power of Marduk against the power of the Lord, a result that would establish Marduk as God. To the contrary, the tragedy of the Exile was the result of Israel's own God using the Babylonians as an instrument of punishment against the Lord's own people since they had violated the terms of the covenant that bound them together. That theological justification for the Exile (see Amos 2:4–8) opened the door for a theological, philosophical position that asserted the existence of only one God who is Lord not only of Israel but also of all the rest of the world. That position can be called monotheism.

The beautiful poetry of Isaiah 40—66 represents the height of Israel's monotheism. For the first time in the Old Testament literature, a prophet explicitly argued that no other gods exist. The Lord alone is God. "I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me, I am the Lord, and there is none else (Isa. 45:5–7)." With that poetry, Israel reached a fully developed monotheism. Moreover, such monotheism asserts that the only God is Creator of the world: "I am the Lord that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone" (Isa. 44:24) and its Savior and Redeemer: "I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no savior " (Isa. 43:11). *George W. MONTH See Calendars; Time.

MOON Light in the night sky created by God and controlling the calendar (Gen. 1:14–19). Hebrew uses several words for moon, new moon, full moon, or bright, white moon. Two of Israel's greatest festivals were celebrated at the beginning of the full moon: the Passover in the spring and the Feast of Booths in the fall. Each month they celebrated the "new moon" with a little more festivity than a regular sabbath (Num. 28:11–15 NIV).

Still the Old Testament strongly teaches against worshiping the moon (Deut. 4:19; Job 31:26–28; Isa. 47:13–15) as did Israel's neighbors. The people of Israel were to remember that the moon was nothing more than an object created by Yahweh and had no power over people.

Joel said in the last days the moon would become dark (Joel 2:10; 3:15) or turn to blood (Joel 2:31). The moon will not give its light on the "Day of the Lord," the light of the sun and the moon being replaced by the everlasting light of the Lord (Isa. 13:10; 60:19–20). James Newell

MORASTHITE (Mō răs' thīte) Resident of Moresheth (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 1:1).

MORDECAI (Môr′ dė cāi) Personal name meaning, "little man." 1. Esther's cousin and the mastermind behind her rise to power and subsequent victory over the evil Haman. Haman, a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag, sought to destroy the Jewish race. Mordecai, a descendant of King Saul's family, led Esther to thwart the attempt, Haman was hanged on the gallows he had erected for Mordecai. See Esther.

2. A man who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerrubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

MOREH (Mō′ rĕh) Place name meaning, "instruction" or "archers." 1. Place where several important events in the lives of the patriarchs and the nation Israel occurred. An oak tree at the site is mentioned several times as being the focal point. Abraham's first encampment in the land of Canaan was at Moreh. There he built an altar after God had appeared to him and entered into covenant (Gen. 12:6–7). Jacob buried there the foreign gods his family had brought from Haran (Gen. 35:4).

The hill of Moreh.

At Moreh God pronounced the blessing and curse on Israel regarding their keeping the commandments (Deut. 11:26–30). Joshua set up a memorial stone under the oak as a reminder of the covenant made between God and the people (Josh. 24:26).

2. Hill in tribal territory of Issachar where Gideon reduced his troops by testing the way they drank water (Judg. 7:1). Modern Nebi Dachi opposite Mount Gilboa.

MORESHETH, MORESHETH-GATH (Mō′ rė shĕth-Găth) Place name meaning, "inheritance of Gath." Home of the prophet Micah (Mic. 1:1). The prophet pictured his home as a bride receiving a going away gift from Jerusalem, her father, a warning of exile for Jerusalem's leaders and thus separation from their neighbors (1:14). The city was apparently located near Philistine Gath and is usually identified with tell ej-Judeideh about twenty-two miles southwest of Jerusalem and nine miles east of Gath. Recently, this identification has been questioned. This may be the Gath Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. 11:8). It may be Muchrashti of the Amarna letters.

MORIAH (Mō rī′ ah) Place name of uncertain meaning translated in various ways, including "Amorites" by earliest translators. The rocky outcropping in Jerusalem located just north of the ancient city of David. It was on this rock that Abraham would have sacrificed Isaac as a burnt offering, but God intervened and provided a ram (Gen. 22:2,13). Later, the Jebusite city of Salem was built adjacent to the hill. After David captured the site, he purposed to build there a Temple for the ark of the covenant. However, God gave that task to his son Solomon (1 Chron. 28:3–6). It may be modern khirbet Beth-Lejj.

MORNING First part of the day by modern reckoning. Morning can refer to the time before dawn (Mark 1:35; compare Gen. 44:3), to dawn (Gen. 19:15; 29:25; Judg. 16:2), or to some time after sunrise. Morning is frequently paired with evening (Gen. 1:5,8) to indicate a complete day. The coming of morning serves as a figure for joy (Ps. 30:5) or vindication (Ps. 49:14) which comes quickly.

MORROW KJV term meaning the next day or tomorrow (Gen. 19:34; Luke 10:35; Acts 25:17).

MORTAL Subject to death in contrast to God, who is immortal or free from death (Job 4:17; Rom. 1:23). The mortal body is subject to sin (Rom. 6:12), to decay (1 Cor. 15:53,54), and to death (2 Cor. 4:11). See Anthropology; Immortality.

MORTAR 1. A vessel in which substances are crushed with a pestle. Mortars were frequently fashioned from basalt or limestone. They were used to grind grain for flour, herbs for medicine, olives for oil (Ex. 27:20). By extension mortar designates a hollow place (Josh. 15:19). Mortar is used as a proper name for a district of Jerusalem in Zephaniah 1:11. 2. A building material, usually clay (Ex. 1:14; Isa. 41:25; Nah. 3:14), though sometimes bitumen (Gen. 11:3; KJV "slime"), used to secure joints in brick or stone. Modern translations sometimes replace the mortar of the KJV with another term, for example, plaster (Lev. 14:42,45) or whitewash (Ezek. 13:10–11,14–15).

MOSERA(H), MOSEROTH (Mō ṣē′ rŏth) Place name meaning, "chastisements." A wilderness station (Num. 33:30–31). The singular form of the name (Mosera or Moserah) was the site of Aaron's burial (Deut. 10:6). Numbers 20:22–28 has prompted the location of Moseroth in the vicinity of Mount Hor.

MOSES (Mō′ sēs) A personal name meaning, "drawn out of the water." The Old Testament depicts Moses as the leader of the Israelites in their Exodus from Egyptian slavery and oppression, their journey through the wilderness with its threats in the form of hunger, thirst, and unpredictable enemies, and finally in their audience with God at Mount Sinai/Horeb where the distinctive covenant bonding Israel and God in a special treaty became a reality. Nothing is known about Moses from sources outside the Old Testament. To be sure, the name Moses doubtlessly appears in Egyptian dress in compound names such as Tuthmoses III, but none of these references gives information about the Moses of Israel.

Rock traditionally considered the Rock of Rephidim that Moses struck to get water for the Israelites.

The Old Testament describes Moses as a heroic leader of the people and as a man of God who brought the people into their special relationship with God. The story about Moses in the Old Testament, found in the extensive narratives from Exodus 1 through Deuteronomy 34, can be described as a heroic saga. It is more than simply a biography of Moses, an historical document that records the events of his life. It is a special kind of ancient art form. To understand its content, the reader must appreciate its special brand of truth as beauty in the story itself.

The artistic narrative begins in Exodus 1, not with data about Moses, but with an account of events in Egypt that affected Moses' people. Since the Israelites had grown to be a large people, the Egyptian Pharaoh feared their power. To control them, he launched an official policy of oppression against them. When the oppression failed to curb the population growth of the Israelites, the Pharaoh announced a new policy for limiting that growth. "Every boy that is born to the Hebrews you shall throw into the Nile, but you shall let every girl live" (Ex. 1:22, NRSV). The very next line announces the birth of Moses. Moses' life began under the Pharaoh's judgment of death.

The mother, however, acted to protect the baby Moses from the Pharaoh's death decree. When the baby could no longer be hidden, the mother constructed an ark, a basket of bulrushes made waterproof with bitumen and pitch. She placed the child in the basket and the basket in the river. A sister stood watch over the basket to know what might happen. She witnessed an apparently terrible twist of fate, however, when the Pharaoh's own daughter came to the river. She found the ark, opened it, and recognized the child as a Hebrew. Rather than killing the child as her father had commanded, however, the woman showed compassion on the child, made the proper preparations, and, with the help of the baby's sister, established a procedure for adopting the baby as her own child. As a part of that process, the princess committed the child to a wet nurse suggested by the girl watching the ark. Of course, the wet nurse was the child's own mother.

After the baby had been weaned, the mother delivered the child to the princess. As a part of the adoption procedure, the princess named the child Moses. The young hero grew to maturity in the palace of the king who had sought to kill him. The mature Moses became concerned about the oppression of his people. The storyteller emphasized the identity between the oppressed people and Moses. "He went out to his people . . . , and he saw an Egyptian beating a Hebrew, one of his kinsfolk" (Ex. 2:11 NRSV, author's italics). Moses responded to the particular act of oppression against his people by killing the Egyptian.

In the wake of his violent act against the Egyptian taskmaster, Moses fled from Egypt and from his own people to the land of Midian. Again he intervened in the face of oppression, inviting danger and risk. Sitting at a well, the typical meeting place for the culture (see also Gen. 29:2), Moses witnessed the violent aggression of male shepherds against female shepherds who had already drawn water for their sheep. Moses saved the oppressed shepherds, whose father, the priest of Midian, invited him to live and work under the protection of the Midianite's hospitality. Eventually one of the Midianite's daughters became Moses' wife. In the idyllic peace of the Midianite's hospitality, Moses took care of Jethro's sheep, fathered a child, and lived at a distance from his own people.

Stream in the Wilderness of Zin that local tradition says was formed when Moses and Aaron hit the rock.

The event at the burning bush while Moses worked as a shepherd introduced him to the critical character of his heroic work. The burning bush caught Moses' attention. There Moses met the God of the fathers who offered Moses a distinctive name as the essential key for Moses' authority—"I am who I am." This strange formulation played on God's promise to Moses to be present with him in his special commission. God sent Moses back to the Pharaoh to secure the release of his people from their oppression. The divine speech of commission has a double character. (1) As the heroic leader of Israel, he would initiate events that would lead to Israel's Exodus from Egypt. (2) As the man of God, he would represent God in delivering the people from their Egyptian slavery. With the authority of that double commission, Moses returned to the Pharaoh to negotiate the freedom of his people.

The negotiation narratives depict Moses, the hero, in one scene of failure after the other. Moses posed his demands to the Pharaoh, announced a sign that undergirded the demand, secured some concession from the Pharaoh on the basis of the negotiations, but failed to win the release of the people. The final scene is hardly a new stage in the negotiations. To the contrary, God killed the firstborn of every Egyptian family, passing over the Israelite families. In the agony of this death scene, the Egyptians drove the Israelites out of Egypt (Ex. 12:30–36). Behind this dominant scene of violence and death lies a different interpretation of the Exodus event. The Pharaoh closed negotiations with Moses by refusing permission for the Israelites to leave in accordance with Moses' proposition (10:28). In the wake of this failure, Moses returned to the people with a plan for escaping Egypt without the knowledge of the Pharaoh. The people borrowed silver, gold, and clothing from the Egyptians in preparation for the event. When they escaped, they took the silver, gold, and clothing with them. They despoiled the Egyptians, a sign of victory over the Egyptians. Thus in leaving Egypt, Israel robbed the most powerful nation of their time of its firstborn sons and of its wealth.

Moses led the people into the wilderness, where the pursuing Egyptians trapped the Israelites at the Red Sea. God who had promised divine presence for the people defeated the enemy at the Sea. The God proved His presence with His people. He met their needs for food and water in the hostile wilderness. Even the fiery serpents and the Amalekites failed to thwart the wilderness journey of the Israelites under Moses' leadership.

Exodus 17:8–13 shows Moses to be faithful in the execution of his leadership responsibilities. Numbers 12:1–16 shows Moses to be meek, a leader of integrity who fulfilled the duties of his office despite opposition from members of his own family.

The center of the Moses traditions emerges with clarity in the events at Mount Sinai/Horeb. The law at Sinai/Horeb constitutes God's gift for Israel. The law showed Israel how to respond to God's saving act in the Exodus. The law at Sinai/Horeb showed each new generation how to follow Moses' teaching in a new setting in the life of the people. The laws carried the name of Moses as an affirmation of their authority. The law of Moses became a model for Israelite society. Indeed, Israel's historians told the entire story of Israel under the influence of the Moses model and suggested that the Davidic kings should have constructed their leadership for Israel under the influence of the Moses model (Joshua—Kings). Only the good king Josiah and, to a lesser extent, Hezekiah matched that model.

The death of Moses is marked by tragic loneliness, yet graced with God's presence. Because of Moses' sin (Num. 20), God denied Moses the privilege of entering the Promised Land. Deuteronomy 34 reports the death scene. Central to the report is the presence of God with Moses at the time of his death. Moses left his people to climb another mountain. Atop that mountain, away from the people whom he served so long, Moses died. God attended this servant at his death. Indeed, God buried him. Only God knows where the burial place is.

The Moses saga serves as a model for subsequent leaders in Israel. Jeroboam I created a new kingdom, distinct from the Davidic kingdom centered in Jerusalem. The sign of his kingship included the golden calves of Aaron. Josiah modeled a reformation in Jerusalem on the basis of the Mosaic model. As the new Moses, he almost succeeded in uniting the people of the south with the people of the north. Perhaps the most important Old Testament figure that must be interpreted as a new Moses is the servant of Isaiah 40—66, the model for understanding Jesus in the New Testament. George W. Coats

MOSES, LAW OF See Law

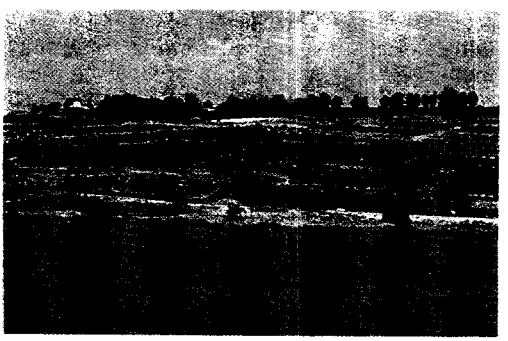
MOST HIGH The most common translation of the Hebrew word Elyon. It is used in conjunction with other divine names such as El (Gen. 14:18), and Yahweh (Ps. 7:17) to speak of God as the supreme being. See Names of God.

MOTE One translation of the Greek word karphos ("speck" in NRSV, NAS, NIV, TEV, REB). Jesus used the word in His Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 7:3–5) to illustrate hypocrisy, equating mote with the smallest particle of wood in contrast to a log or beam. Some older translations use "twig" or "straw."

MOTH Literally "consumer" or "waster," it is an insect whose destructive power is used to illustrate the result of sin (Ps. 39:11) and the judgment of God (Hos. 5:12). The moth's weakness is used to speak of the frailty of man (Job. 4:19). Jesus urged His followers to avoid the temptation to accumulate wealth on earth where the moth could destroy it, but to lay up immortal treasures in heaven (Matt. 6:19–20). See Insects.

MOTHER Female parent who carries, gives birth to, and cares for a child. Usually refers to humans but may refer to animals or even as a metaphor for deity. In the Bible a wife has two equally important roles: to love, support, and provide companionship and sexual satisfaction for her husband and to bear and rear children. So important was the latter that a stigma was attached to barrenness (Gen. 16:1–2; 18:9–15; 30:1; 1 Sam. 1:1–20; Luke 1:5–25, especially v. 25).

The Bible refers to every aspect of motherhood: conception (Gen. 4:1; Luke 1:24); pregnancy (2 Sam. 11:5; Luke 1:24); the pain of childbirth (Gen. 3:16; John 16:21); and nursing (1 Sam. 1:23; Matt. 24:19). A new mother was considered to be ritually unclean, and an offering was prescribed for her purification (Lev. 12; compare Luke 2:22–24). The Book of Proverbs (see 1:8; 31:1) indicates that even in ancient times mothers shared with fathers the responsibility for instructing and disciplining children. Mothers have the same right to obedience and respect as fathers (Ex. 20:12; Lev. 19:3), and in Old Testament times death was the fate of those who cursed or assaulted parents (Ex. 21:15; 17; Deut. 21:18–21). Jesus enforced the Fifth Commandment and protected it against scribal evasion (Matt. 15:3–6).



Motherly virtues are often extolled: compassion for children (Isa. 49:15), comfort of children (Isa. 66:13), and sorrow for children (Jer. 31:15, quoted in Matt. 2:18).

The fact that God would use a human mother to bring His Son into the world has bestowed upon motherhood its greatest honor. Jesus set an example for all to follow by the provision He made for His mother (John 19:25–27). Jesus made it plain, however, that devotion to God must take precedence to that of a mother (Matt. 12:46–50). Even the Old Testament (Gen. 2:24) indicated that a man's devotion to his wife supercedes that to his mother.

In addition to the literal sense, including that of animal mothers (see Ex. 34:26; Lev. 22:27), the word is often used metaphorically. Israel is compared to an unfaithful mother (Hos. 2:2–5; Isa. 50:1). Revelation 17:5 calls Babylon (Rome) the mother of harlots (those who are unfaithful to God). A city is the "mother" of her people (2 Sam. 20:19). Deborah was the "mother" (or deliverer) of Israel. In a more positive vein, the heavenly Jerusalem is the "mother" of Christians (Gal. 4:26). Jesus spoke of His compassion for Jerusalem as being like that of a mother hen for her chicks (Matt. 23:37). Paul compared his ministry to a mother in labor (Gal. 4:19) and a nursing mother (1 Thess. 2:7). James A. Brooks

MOTIONS OF SIN KJV expression for sinful desires (TEV) or passions (NAS, NIV, NRSV) at Romans 7:5.

Mount of the Beautitudes as seen from the Sea of Galilee.

MOULDY KJV spelling of moldy (Josh. 9:5,12). The underlying Hebrew term perhaps means "crumbled" (NAS, REB).

MOUNT BAAL-HERMON (Bā' ăl Hēr' mon) A variant name for Mount Hermon (Judg. 3:3), perhaps indicating its use as a worship place for Baal.

MOUNT OF CORRUPTION Hill on the southern ridge of the Mount of Olives upon which Solomon built pagan shrines for use by his wives. These highplaces were destroyed as part of Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 23:13).

MOUNT OF THE AMALEKITES A mountainous region in the territory of Ephraim (Judg. 12:15; compare the Hebrew "in Amalek" of 5:14). Some interpreters dispute a connection with the desert tribe of the same name.

MOUNT OF THE AMORITES KJV designation for the hill country of Judah and Ephraim (Deut. 1:7,20).

MOUNT OF THE BEATITUDES The "Horns of Hattin" near Capernaum which tradition identifies as the site of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:1—7:29). The reference to Jesus' ascending the mountain is perhaps meant to recall the story of Moses at Sinai (Ex. 19:3,20).

MOUNT OF THE CONGREGATION KJV expression generally rendered Mount of Assembly by modern translations. Part of Isaiah's exposure of the pride of the King of Babylon is the charge that he desired to ascend to the distant mountain where according to Babylonian myth the gods assembled (Isa. 14:13). The desire is tantamount to a claim to divinity.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY KJV designation for an elevation in a valley in the territory of Reuben in Transjordan (Josh. 13:19). Modern translations render the phrase hill in/of the valley.

MOUNT SINAI (Mount Sī' nā ī) Mountain in the south central part of a peninsula in the northwestern end of Arabia. God made many significant revelations of Himself and His purposes to Israel there. The meaning of the name is unclear; but it probably means "shining" and was likely derived from the word sin, a Babylonian moon god. The suggestion that it means "clayey" does not in any way fit the nature of the terrain.

Looking from the top of Mt. Sinai out across the massive, rocky granite cliffs surrounding it.

M

The entire peninsula takes the shape of an inverted triangle whose base is 150 miles long and is bounded on the east by the north end of the Red Sea and on the west by the Gulf of Aqaba. The Gaza strip lies directly north. This peninsula contains 23,442 square miles and has a population of approximately 140,000 at time of publication. The central and southern parts are extremely mountainous, ranging from 5000 to about 9000 feet, and the land today is valued for its oil fields and manganese deposits.

The Bible uses the term Sinai for both the mountain and the entire wilderness area (Lev. 7:38). Sometimes Sinai is called "the mount" (Ex. 19:2); sometimes "the mountain of God" (Ex. 3:1); sometimes "the mount of the Lord" (Num. 10:33).

The term Horeb is often used to refer to Sinai in such a way as to make the names synonymous (Ex. 3:1). Since Horeb means "waste" or "wilderness area," it seems best to think of Horeb as the general term for the area and Sinai as the specific peak where God manifested Himself to Moses.

The modern name for the traditional site of Sinai is Jebel Musa (the mount of Moses). Jebel is the Arabic word hill, sometimes written Jabal or Gabel (French has Djebel).

Jebel Musa (7500 ft.) is one of three granite peaks near the southern tip of the peninsula. The highest peak, Jebel Katarin (Mount Catherine, 8,652 ft.), lies immediately on the southwest, and Ras es-Safsafeh (6,540 ft.) on the north, northeast of Jebel Musa. Many explorers think Ras es-Safsafeh is the biblical Sinai because it has a plain, er Rahah, on its northwest base, which is two miles long and about two thirds of a mile wide. This plain was certainly large enough to accommodate the camp of the Israelites.

Another suggested location for Mount Sinai is far north and east of Jebel Musa, near the top of the Gulf of Aqaba. The major argument for this view is that Sinai's phenomena indicate volcanic action—fire, smoke, quaking earth (Ex. 19:16–18)—and no volcano is found in the Sinaitic peninsula. The nearest volcano lies far east of the Gulf. However, the phenomena that appeared at Sinai were undoubtedly supernatural in origin, for they were accompanied by the sounds of a trumpet and the voice of God (Ex. 19:19).

Another location for Sinai is sought far north of Jebel Musa, primarily because of historical references such as the battle with the Amalekites (Ex. 17:8–16). The Amalekites lived in Canaan proper (Num. 14:42–45) and would not, it is claimed, have met the Israelites in the Sinaitic peninsula. However, the Amalekites could have followed the recently delivered Israelites to the south of their territory for the purpose of preying on the poorly organized refugees (Deut. 25:17–19).

MOUNTAIN Elevated topographical feature formed by geological faulting and erosion. The geography of Palestine featured high mountains and deep rifts. See Palestine. The two usual words for mountain in the Bible are har (Hebrew) and oros (Greek). The simple definition for each is mountain or hill, though they may indicate hill country or a mountainous region.

Many important events in the Bible took place on or near mountains. God called Moses to His work at Mount Horeb, sometimes called "the mountain of God." A part of God's call was the promise that the Israelite people would worship there upon their escape from Egypt (Ex. 3:1–12).

After the Exodus, God commanded Moses to gather the people at Mount Sinai (probably identical to Horeb). There God gave the Law including the Ten Commandments to Moses.

Other Old Testament mountain episodes include Aaron's death on Mount Hor (Num. 33:38), the death of Moses on Mount Nebo (Deut. 34:1–8), and Elijah's defeat of the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:15–40).

Much of Jesus' life and ministry also took place on mountains. One of the temptations took place on "an exceeding high mountain" (Matt. 4:8). Jesus' most famous teaching session is called the "Sermon on the Mount" (Matt. 5–7). Jesus went up to a mountain to pray (Luke 6:12) and healed the Gerasene demoniac near a mountain site (Mark 5:11).

Perhaps it is significant that the scene of the transfiguration was on a mountain (Matt. 17:1–8). Jesus was declared to be preeminent over both Moses and Elijah, the representatives of the Law and Prophets. Many of their greatest victories came on mountains. Jesus is affirmed as Lord of all at this mountain experience.

The term mountain also is used symbolically in the Bible. It is a natural image for stability (Ps. 30:7), obstacles (Zech. 4:7), and God's power (Ps. 121:1–2). God will remove all obstacles when His redemption is complete, "and every mountain and hill shall be made low" (Isa. 40:4).

Mountains often have been called "holy places." Jerusalem (elevation 2,670 feet) often was called Mount Zion, the hill of the Lord (Pss. 2:6; 135:21: Isa. 8:18; Joel 3:21; Mic. 4:2). God met His people there in worship. The "New Jerusalem" is also known as Mount Zion (Rev. 14:1).

Some of the more famous biblical mountains with their feet elevations are: Ebal (3,084), Gerezim (2,890), Gilboa (1,630), Hermon (9,230), Nebo (2,630), Tabor (1,930), Sinai (7,500).

MOUTH Portion of head used to ingest food and to communicate. 1. Synonymn for lips (1 Kings 19:18; 2 Kings 4:34; Job 31:27; Prov. 30:20; Song of Sol. 1:2); 2. Organ of eating and drinking (Judg. 7:6; 1 Sam. 14:26–27), sometimes used in figurative expressions such as when wickedness (Job 20:12) or God's word (Ps. 119:10) is described as sweet to the mouth. Anthropomorphic descriptions of the earth or Sheol speak of them opening their mouths to drink blood or swallow persons (Gen. 4:11; Num. 16:30,32; Isa. 5:14). 3. Organ of speech (Gen. 45:12; Deut. 32:1) or laughter (Job 8:21; Ps. 126:2). The phrase "the mouth of the Lord has spoken it" serves as a frequent reminder of the reliability of a prophetic message (Isa. 1:20; 40:5; Jer. 9:12; compare Deut. 8:3; Matt. 4:4). Fire (2 Sam. 22:9) or a sword (Rev. 1:16) proceeding from the mouth of God pictures the effectiveness of God's word of judgment. 4. The Hebrew term for mouth is used for the openings of wells, caves, sacks, as well as for the edge of a sword.

MOZA (Mō′ zȧ) Personal name meaning, "offspring." 1. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:46). 2. Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:36–37; 9:42–43).

MOZAH (Mō′ zah) Place name meaning, "unleavened." City in Benjamin (Josh. 18:26), later a center for pottery production as attested by numerous vessels recovered at Jericho and tell-en-Nasbeh bearing the inscription Mozah on their handles. The site is likely that of modern Qaluniya, four miles northwest of Jerusalem on the Tel Aviv road.

MUFFLER KJV term for a scarf (NRSV) at Isaiah 3:19. The item is part of the finery of the Jerusalem socialites. Other translations render the Hebrew term as veils (NAS, NIV, TEV) or coronets (REB).

MULE A hybrid animal produced by the union of a male ass and a mare. David chose a mule to symbolize royalty for Solomon's coronation (1 Kings 1:33), possibly because the Israelites did not have horses. MUPPIM (Mŭp′ pĭm) Son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). The name perhaps derives from the root "to wave." See Shephupham.

MURDER Intentional taking of human life. Human life is given great value in the Bible. Persons are created in the image of God; and persons are called to obey, serve, and glorify God. Human life is viewed as a sacred trust. It is because of this that taking human life is viewed as a serious crime in the Bible.

The prohibition against murder is found in the Ten Commandments, the heart of Hebrew law (Ex. 20:13; Deut. 5:17). Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being by another. Deliberately taking the life of a human being ursurps the authority that belongs to God. The prohibition against murder is a hedge to protect human dignity.

The Old Testament (Gen. 9:6) prescribed that a murderer should be prepared to forfeit his own life. In Numbers 35:16–31, careful attention is given to determining whether a killing is to be classified as murder.

Jesus removed the concept of murder from a physical act to the intention of one's heart (Matt. 5:21–22). According to Jesus, murder really begins when one loses respect for another human being. Spitting in the face of another, looking with contempt upon another, or unleashing one's anger are signs that a murderous spirit is present. Jesus forces us to move to the spirit behind the prohibition of murder. We are compelled to do all that we can do to protect the life of our neighbor and help it flourish. The writer of 1 John pushed Jesus' teaching to its ultimate: "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him (1 John 3:15).

MURRAIN (Mū′ rân) KJV term derived from the French for to die (morir) referring to an infectious disease affecting livestock (Ex. 9:3). The earliest Greek translation used the term death. Modern translations use either disease (TEV), pestilence (NAS, NRSV), or plague (NIV, RSV).

MUSE To ponder or reflect upon something, often without coming to conclusions (Ps. 143:5; Luke 3:15).

MUSHI (Mū′ shī) Personal name meaning, "draw out." Son of Merari who gave his name to a family of priests, the Mushites (Mū′ shītes) (Ex. 6:19; Num. 3:20,33; 26:58; 1 Chron. 6:19,47; 23:21,23; 24:26,30).

MUSHITE (Mū′ shīte) Member of clan of Mushi.

MUSIC, INSTRUMENTS, DANCING The expression of the full range of human emotions vocally or instrumentally through the art of music was as much a part of the lives of biblical people as it is of modern times. Workers bringing in the harvest might sing a vintage song (Isa. 16:10; Jer.

48:33), while the working song of people digging a well (Num. 21:17) is heard as well. Indeed all of life could be touched by song. The celebrations of a community, ritual practices of worship, even the act of warfare gave rise to song.

In such a musical climate, celebration through dance found a natural place in both the religious and secular life of ancient Israel. A variety of musical instruments was available to provide instrumental accompaniment to both song and dance.

Music Music as performed in early Near Eastern times has become better known through archaeological finds of descriptive texts and the remains of actual instruments. Heptatonic and diatonic musical scales reflective of ancient Mesopotamian practice have been discerned through the research of Assyrian culture which has, over the last few decades, brought to light much pertinent information on the subject. The discovery of four Akkadian cuneiform texts describing the Mesopotamian theory of music from about 1800 to about 500 B.C. offers evidence 1400 years earlier than previously known in Greek sources for the antiquity of Western music. Giving evidence of seven different heptatonic-diatonic scales, the musical system of ancient Mesopotamia shows one similar to the major scale known today.

Textual evidence from the end of the third millennium B.C. shows ancient Sumer, the earliest center of civilization in the Fertile Crescent, to have enjoyed an expansive musical tradition. A variety of hymns offering divine praise or designed to or for kings and temples, many with musical terms, have survived and are joined by actual discoveries of instruments at the ancient site of Ur, in biblical tradition the ancestral home of Abraham (Gen. 11:31).

A cuneiform text found at ancient Ugarit in Syria dating from about 1400 B.C. is a complete piece of Hurrian cult music. As a hymn to the moon goddess Nikkal, the piece uses a notational system consisting of technical Akkadian terminology for interval names followed by numerals.

Going back to about 3000 B.C., the pictorial and written clues to Egyptian music tradition that have survived the centuries are particularly valuable in the appreciation of musical instruments, providing background information for instruments mentioned in the biblical text as well as comparative study with Mesopotamian data. Illustrations or references within the Egyptian sources include a variety of lyres, harps, and lutes. Flutes, double reed pipes, and a succession of percussion instruments (such as drums, bells, rattles, clappers) have been identified.

The secular and religious music of ancient Israel found its home against this background of Ancient Near Eastern music in which all of life could be brought under the spell of song. In reading the Old Testament, Genesis 4:21 stands as the first reference to music. As one of Lamech's sons, Jubal "was the father of all those who play the lyre and pipe" (NAS). Jubal brought the advent of music to the portrayal of cultural advance. The name Jubal itself is related to the Hebrew word for "ram" (yobel), the horns of which served as a signaling instrument in ancient Israel.

The joy taken in music is evidenced by its prominent role in the celebrations of life. A farewell might be said "with joy and singing to the music of tambourines and harps" (Gen. 31:27 NIV); a homecoming welcomed "with timbrels and with dances" (Judg. 11:34; compare Luke 15:25). Work tasks of everyday living enjoyed the music evidenced by the songs or chants of the well diggers (Num. 21:17–18), the treaders of grapes (Jer. 48:33), and possibly the watchman (Isa. 21:12).

Under certain circumstances musical celebration brought condemnation. The account of Moses' return from the mountain to be confronted by the singing and dancing of the people around the golden calf (Ex. 32:17–19) symbolized a condition of broken covenant. The prophet Isaiah's rebuke of the idle rich who have "lyre and harp, tambourine and flute and wine" at their feasts is cast against their failure to take notice of the deeds of Yahweh (Isa. 5:12 NRSV). Both the scorn of mockers (Job 30:9) and the acclamation of heroes (1 Sam. 18:6–7) were expressed in song.

Victory in warfare provided impetus for numerous songs. The song of Miriam, one of the oldest poetic verses in the Old Testament, celebrated the defeat of Pharoah at the Sea (Ex. 15:21). Judges 5 stands as musical witness to Israel's victory over Jabin, the king of Canaan. Known as the "Song of Deborah," the verses are the musical celebration of a narrative event. Chants of victory on the lips of the victor (compare Samson following his slaying of the Philistines recorded in Judg. 15:16) or those greeting the one successful in battle (compare 1 Sam. 18:7) establish music as a medium for uncontainable joy. Celebration erupted into song. Emotions that might be limited by the restriction of prose expressed themselves through the poetry of music as seen in David's moving lament at the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:19–27).

In the early days of Old Testament history a special place seems to be accorded women in musical performance. The prophetess Miriam and Deborah, a prophetess and judge, were among Israel's earliest musicians. Judges 11:34 pictures Jephthah's daughter greeting his victorious return from battle against the Ammonites "with timbrels and with dances." David's reputation for valor spread through the singing of women's voices: "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (1 Sam. 18:7). The depiction of dancing women entertaining at festive occasions found on Egyptian tomb paintings provides early Near Eastern background for the role of women in musical celebration.

The establishment of the monarchy about 1025 B.C. brought a new dimension to the musical tradition of ancient Israel with the appearance of professional musicians. Egypt and Assyria, neighboring countries to Israel, had known the tradition of professional musicians much earlier. Such musicians took their place both at court (1 Kings 1:34,39–40; 10:12; Eccl. 2:8) and in religious ritual. An Assyrian inscription, praising the victory of the Assyrian king Sennacherib over King Hezekiah of Judah, lists male and female musicians as part of the tribute carried off to Nineveh.

Although much uncertainty remains concerning the specifics of Temple worship, biblical references offer clues to the role music played in cult obervances. As a hymn proclaiming the future rule of God in all the earth, Psalm 98 calls for the employment of music in praise:

> "Make a joyful noise to the Lord, all the earth; break forth into joyous song and sing praises! Sing praises to the Lord with the lyre, with the lyre and the sound of melody! With trumpets and the sound of the horn make a joyful noise before the King, the Lord!" (vv. 4–6 RSV).

Worship featured trumpet calls (compare Num. 10:10) and songs of thanksgiving, expressions of praise and petition sung after the offering of sacrifices (2 Chron. 29:20–30).

The Psalms show not only the emotional range of music from lament to praise but also provides words for some of the songs used in Temple worship. Guilds of musicians, known through reference to their founders in some psalm headings (for example, "the sons of Korah"), were evidently devoted to the discipline of liturgical music.

During the Babylonian Exile the question, "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" (Ps. 137:4), arose. Psalm 137 further alludes to the demand of the Babylonians for the Hebrew captives to "sing us one of the songs of Zion" (v. 3). The return from Exile and reestablishment of the Temple saw the descendants of the original Levitical musicians (compare Ezra 2:40–41) reassume responsibility for liturgical music. Strabo's statement that the singing girls of Palestine were considered the most musicial in the world shows that music continued in importance in Israel during Hellenistic times.

The structures of some psalms offer evidence for conjecturing the nature of vocal performance. Refrains (such as the "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors" of Ps. 24) and acclamations such as "Hallelujah" as well as divisions into strophes stand as performance clues. The common device of poetic parallelism, whereby a thought is balanced synonymously or antithetically with a second thought, provides further evidence for surmising the nature of musical performance, responsive and antiphonal performances being possibilities.

In light of the recognized obscurity in many of the headings, one can speak in general terms of five different types of information provided by the Psalm titles. Representatives of this classification are titles that identify psalms with persons or groups of persons (see Pss. 3; 72; 90); titles purporting to indicate historical information concerning the psalm, particularly with respect to David (see Pss. 18; 34); titles containing musical information (see Pss. 4; 5); titles with liturgical information (see Pss. 92; 100); and titles designating the "type" of psalm in question (see Ps. 120, "a song of ascents"; Ps. 145, "a song of praise").

Nearly two thirds of the psalms contain terms indicating collections, compilers, or authors in their headings: David, portrayed in biblical tradition as a composer, instrumentalist, court musician, and dancer, being most often mentioned. Others mentioned include the sons of Korah, Asaph, Solomon, Heman the Ezrahite, Ethan the Ezrahite, Moses, and Jeduthun.

Deriving from the Greek translation of the Hebrew mizmor, the word psalm is applied to some fifty-seven songs. As a technical term appearing only in the Psalter, psalm refers to songs with instrumental accompaniment. Other terms indicating the type of psalm include "shiggaion" (Ps. 7), sometimes argued to indicate a lament; "miktam" (Pss. 16; 56—60) connected to the Akkadian meaning "to cover"; "maskil" (Ps. 78) whose meaning is still unknown. Some thirty Psalms include in their heading the word song (Hebrew shir), with "song of praise," "Prayer," "a song of love," and "a song of ascent" also occurring. Headings may include as well terms which indicate the liturgical aim and usage of the particular psalm (for instance, "for the thank offering," "for the memorial offering," "for the sabbath").

Some fifty-five psalms contain the expression "to the choirmaster" in their headings. Other technical musical expressions consisting of remarks that concern types or kinds of performances include "with stringed instruments" ("neginoth," see Pss. 4; 6; 54, perhaps meant to exclude percussion and wind instruments) and "for the flutes" ("nehiloth"), though both meanings are dubious. The terms "higgaion" (perhaps "musical flourish"), "sheminith" ("on the eighth," perhaps an octave higher), and "the gittith" (Pss. 8; 81; 84) remain obscure as to meaning.

The singing of psalms to other tunes popular at the time is suggested by headings such as "Hind of the Dawn" in Psalm 22 (RSV) and "to Lillies" used in Psalms 45; 69; 80 (RSV).

Although found some seventy-one times in the Psalter, the interpretation of the term "Selah" remains uncertain. Suggestions range from understanding the term according to its earliest Greek translation, generally thought to indicate a type of musical interlude or change in singing, to a call for repetition of the verse, louder singing, or the kneeling and bowing down of worshipers.

Musical Instruments Pictorial representations as well as remains from instruments discovered through archaeology aid in our present knowledge of ancient musical instruments. A wide scope of literary remains gives further evidence. Descriptions and comment on musical instruments are to be found in both the Old and New Testament, their early translations, rabbinic and patristic literature, and the writings of Roman and Greek authors. Caution, however, must be applied in using the data available, leaving many identifications difficult and at best hypothetical.

The most frequently named musical instrument in the Bible is the "Shophar" (ram's horn). Limited to two or three notes, the "Shophar" often translated "trumpet") served as a signaling instrument in times of peace and war (Judg. 3:27; 6:34; Neh. 4:18–20). Having as its chief function the making of noise, the Shophar announced the new moons and sabbaths, warned of approaching danger, and signaled the death of nobility. As the only ancient instrument still used in the synagogue today, the "Shophar" found a prominent place in the life of Israel, noted by its function in national celebration (1 Kings 1:34; 2 Kings 9:13).

Similar in function to the "shophar" was the trumpet, a straight metal instrument flared on the end and thought to have had a high, shrill tone. Sounded in pairs, the trumpet was known as the instrument of the priests (compare Num. 10:2–10 for a description of usages; see also 2 Chron. 5:12–13 where some twenty trumpeters are mentioned. The sound of the trumpets introduced Temple ceremony and sacrifice, the trumpet itself being counted among the sacred Temple utensils (2 Kings 12:13; Num. 31:6).

As the instrument of David and the Levites, the lyre (Hebrew, "kinnor"; KJV, "harp") was employed in both secular and sacred settings (compare Isa. 23:16; 2 Sam. 6:5). A popular instrument throughout the Ancient Near East, the lyre was often used to accompany singing. The number of strings on the lyre could vary; its basic shape was rectangular or trapezoidal.

The harp was a favorite instrument of the Egyptians. In Hebrew the designation nebel, though admittedly uncertain, may imply a type of angular harp with a vertical resonator or represent another type of lyre. Mainly a religious instrument in biblical tradition, the "nebel" is rarely mentioned in secular functions (compare Isa. 5:12; 14:11). Like the lyre, the harp was often associated with aristocracy, thus being often made from precious woods and metals (see 1 Kings 10:12; 2 Chron. 9:11).

Chief among "flutes" and "pipes," woodwinds generally associated with secular usages, was the "khalil," the most popular wind instrument in the Ancient Near East and principle among the biblical wind instuments. Perhaps better described as a primitive clarinet, the "khalil" (NAS, "flute" or KJV,"pipe") was an instrument consisting of two separate pipes made of reed, metal, or ivory; each pipe having a mouthpiece with single or double reeds. Used in the expression of joy (1 Kings 1:39–40) or mourning (Jer. 48:36; Matt. 9:23), the khalil was primarily a secular instrument that could be played at funerals or feasts.

Other musical instruments mentioned in the biblical texts include the timbrel or tambourine (Hebrew toph, often symbolic of gladness, Gen 21:27), cymbals, bells (presumably metal jingles without clappers; see Ex. 28:33–34; 39:25–26 where they are attached to the high priest's robe), and a rattle-type noisemaker translated variously as castanets, rattles, sistrums, cymbols, or clappers (2 Sam. 6:5).

Mentioned in the New Testament are pipes (RSV, "flute"), the lyre (RSV, "harp"), cymbals, and the trumpet. The "sounding brass" of 1 Corinthians 13:1 is perhaps understood through rabbinic literature in which it is seen as a characteristic instrument for weddings and joyous celebrations.

Dancing As rhythmic movement often performed to music, dancing enjoyed a prominent place in the life and worship of Israel. Various Hebrew words in the Old Testament used to express the idea of dance seem to imply different types of movement: to skip about (raqadh, Job 21:11), whirling about (karar, 2 Sam. 6:14,16), and perhaps twisting or writhing (makhol, Ps. 30:11). Pictured in the homecoming welcome of victorious soldiers by women, dancing could be accompanied by song and instrument music (1 Sam. 18:6).

Exodus 15:20 celebrates Israel's deliverance at the Sea of Reeds by dancing with singing and musical accompaniment. Judges 21:16–24 accords dancing a role in the celebration of the yearly feast at Shiloh, and David is pictured as dancing before the Lord as the Ark was brought to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:14). Psalm 150:4 calls God's people to praise Him with the dance.

As in Israel, dancing was a part of the religious practices of other peoples in the ancient Near East. Male and female dancers are known to us from Egyptian reliefs, and cultic dancers are attested in Mesopotamian texts. As an idolatrous act, dancing is mentioned in the golden-calf story (Ex. 32:19) and in the worship of Baal at Carmel (1 Kings 18:26).

In the New Testament, the return of the prodigal son was celebrated with music and dancing (Luke 15:25). The practice of dancers entertaining at royal courts in Hellenistic and Roman times is attested by the dance of Herodias' daughter, Salome, (Matt. 14:6).

MUSTARD A large annual plant which grows quite fast. Its seeds were once thought to be the smallest in the plant world. Jesus used the mustard plant in a parable to symbolize the rapid growth of the kingdom of God (Matt 13:31–32), and its seed as a simile for faith (Matt. 17:20). See Plants.

MUSTER GATE NRSV, REB designation for a Jerusalem city gate where troops were mustered, that is, gathered for enlistment (Neh. 3:31). See Miphkad Gate.

MUTENESS The inability to speak. In the Old Testament muteness is traced to God (Ex. 4:11). God made Ezekiel mute (Ezek. 3:26) in response to Israel's failure to listen to his message. Later He restored Ezekiel's speech (24:27; 33:22) as a sign of the people's receptiveness to hear. Daniel experienced muteness in response to the appearance of a heavenly messenger (Dan. 10:15). The psalmist considered muteness an appropriate punishment for liars (Ps. 31:18). By extension, to be mute means to hold one's peace (Ps. 39:2,9; Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32), especially in the face of injustice. In Proverbs 31:8 the mute are the symbol of all those who suffer without a voice. Isaiah 56:10 pictures Israel's leaders as mute dogs who cannot bark a warning. In Isaiah 35:6 the singing of those once mute accompanies return from the Exile. In Habakkuk 2:18–19 idols are mocked as mutes (also 1 Cor. 12:2).

In the New Testament muteness is either not explained (Mark 7:32,37) or else attributed to demons (Matt. 9:32; 12:22; Mark 9:17,25; Luke 11:14). An exception is Zechariah's muteness (Luke 1:20,22) which served as a sign of the truthfulness of Gabriel's message as well as a punishment for Zechariah's unbelief.

MUTH-LABBEN (Mŭth lăb′ bĕn) Hebrew phrase in the title of Psalm 9 which means, "death of the son." The phrase likely refers to the tune to which the psalm was performed.

MUTTER To utter words indistinctly or with a low voice. Muttering together with chirping characterized the speech of mediums (Isa. 8:19). The shades were thought to communicate through the medium in this fashion. See Medium; Sheol.

MUZZLE A leather or wire covering for an animal's mouth to prevent its eating or biting. Deuteronomy 25:4 is one of many laws in the Deuteronomic code concerned with humane treatment of others. Paul cited this prohibition of muzzling a treading ox to illustrate the principle that "the laborer deserves to be paid" and specifically that "those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel" (1 Cor. 9:9–14; 1 Tim. 5:17–18 NRSV).

MYRA (Mȳ′ rā) One of the six largest cities of Lysia in southeastern Asia Minor located on the River Andracus about two and one half miles from the sea. The site of the ancient ruins is called Dembre today. Myra was a stopping point on Paul's voyage to Rome (Acts 27:5–6). Some manuscripts of the Western Text give Myra as port call after Patara in Acts 21:1.

MYRIAD (Myr ĭ ad) Greek term literally meaning 10,000 but frequently used to mean countless or innumerable. See Jude 14; Revelation 5:11; 9:16; Luke 12:1; Acts 19:19; 21:20; Hebrews 12:22.

MYRRH An aromatic resin having many uses in the Ancient Near East. It was traded along with spices (Gen. 37:25), used as an ingredient in anointing oil (Ex. 30:23), applied as perfume (Esth. 2:12), placed in clothes to deodorize them (Ps. 45:8), given as a gift (Matt. 2:11), and used to embalm bodies (John 19:39).

MYRTLE See Plants in the Bible.

MYSIA (Mȳs′ ĭ ȧ) Northwest region of Asia Minor (Acts 16:7). The New Testament mentions several cities in this region: Adramyttium (Acts 27:2); Assos (Acts 20:13–14); Pergamum (Rev. 1:11; 2:12); and Troas (Acts 16:8,11; 20:5,6; 2 Cor. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:13). Hindered from mission work in Bythinia, Paul passed through Mysia before embarking on his Macedonian mission (Acts 16:6–11). Acts 20 records Paul's seven-day stay at Troas and an overland (mission) trip to Assos. On another occasion, Paul found in Troas an open door of mission opportunity (2 Cor. 2:12).

MYSTERY/MYSTERY RELIGIONS Several different cults or societies characterized in part by elaborate initiation rituals and secret rites. Though attested in Greece before 600 B.C., the mystery religions flourished during the Hellenistic and Roman periods (after 333 B.C.) before dying out before A.D. 500. In particular, the intermingling of religious concepts made possible by Alexander the Great's far flung conquests accelerated the spread of some cults and facilitated the development of others. Knowledge of the mystery religions is fragmentary due to the strict secrecy imposed on those initiated; scattered references in ancient writers, some antagonistic to mystery religions, and archaeological data provide the most important evidence. Scholars often disagree about the interpretation of the data.

Many mystery religions emerged, but among the more important were those associated with the following deities: the Greek Demeter (the famous Eleusinian mysteries) and Dionysus, the Phyrgian Cybele (the Magna Mater) and Attis; the Syrian Adonis; the Egyptian Isis and Osiris (Sarapis); and Mithra, originally a Persian deity. Orphism and Sabazius both contributed to the mysteries of Dionysus while Samothrace was the home of the Cabiri mysteries. Many of the deities in the mystery religions were ancient and were worshiped in separate cults both before and after the development of the mystery cults.

The central feature of each mystery religion was the sacred rites, called mysteries, in which the cultic myth of the god or goddess worshiped in the cult was reenacted. Only those formally initiated into the cult could participate. The precise nature of these rites is unknown due to the vow of secrecy, but probably involved a drama based upon the cult myth and the dramatic visual presentation of certain sacred objects. Mention is made of "things said," probably sacred formulas and secret love. References exist to eating and drinking, likely a form of communion. By participating in these rites the worshiper identified with the deity and shared in the deity's fate. These powerful symbols afforded those initiated the means to overcome the suffering and difficulties of life and promised a share in the life beyond.

Many, but not all, of the deities worshiped in the mysteries were originally associated with fertility. As such, their associated myths often referred to the natural cycle as it waxes and wanes (for instance, Demeter) or to the dying and rising of a god (Attis, Adonis, Osiris). Some scholars think that the mysteries used this feature of the myth to give symbolic expression of rising to immortality with the deity. However, not all scholars agree; some deities venerated in mystery religions did not die or rise; moreover, the exact use of the myth in the mysteries is often unclear, though some concept of immortality seems to be implied.

Public festivals were given in honor of some deities worshiped in the mystery religions, but their relationship to the secret rites is not clear. The spring festival of Cybele (March 15–27) involved processions, sacrifices, music, and frenzied dancing which led to castration. The public revelry, pantomimes, theatric productions, and excesses of drink associated with the worshipers of Dionysus/Bacchus (the Bacchanalia) are well known.

Rites of initiation into the mystery religions included ritual cleansing in the sea, baptisms, and sacrifices. Mention should be made of the Taurobolium, used in the worship of Cybele, a rite in which a bull was slaughtered on a grill placed over a pit in which a priest stood; the person below eagerly covered himself with blood. Some have interpreted this as a rite of initiation, but it is more likely a purification ritual affording rebirth for a period of time, perhaps twenty years.

The mystery religions dislodged religion from the traditional foundations of state and family and made it a matter of personal choice. With a few exceptions, for instance, Mithraism which was restricted to males, the mysteries were open to all classes and sexes. Those initiated formed an association bound together by secret rites and symbols peculiar to their cult. These associations met regularly with a designated leader in houses or specially-built structures. The worshipers of Mithras met in a structure called a Mithraeum designed to imitate the cave in which Mithras killed the bull, the central act of the cult myth. Scenes of the slaying (tauroctony) appear prominently in several such structures.

At the meetings ritual acts or sacraments practiced by the particular cult were shared by the members. Mention is made of common meals or banquets. Members of the association were required to meet certain moral standards; some mention also is made of ascetic requirements. However, a word of caution is in order; generalizations about the mystery religions are difficult since each cult was individualistic. Exceptions to nearly all generalizations can be found.

Mystery in the New Testament The New Testament uses the word mystery about twenty-five times, once in the Gospels (Mark 4:11; compare Matt.13:11; Luke 8:10), twenty-one times in Paul's writings, and a few times in Revelation. The term has several facets all of which cannot be discussed here, but it is clear that the New Testament usage differs from that of the mystery religions. The mystery of the New Testament has been described as an "open secret"; matters previously kept secret in God's eternal purposes have now been or are being revealed (Eph. 3:3–5; 1 Cor. 2:7–8). In contrast to the mystery religions, the mystery of the New Testament appears in the historical activity of the person of Christ (Col. 2:2; Eph. 1:9); the indwelling Christ is the hope of glory (Col. 1:26–27). The mystery is received spiritually (Eph. 3:4–5) and manifested in the proclamation of the gospel (Eph. 6:19). Part of the mystery involves the disclosure that Gentiles share in the blessings of the gospel (Eph. 2:11–13).

The Negev (Negeb) desert in southern Israel.

NAAM (Nā′ ăm) Personal name meaning, "pleasantness." Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:15).

NAAMAH (Nā′ ȧ mah) Name meaning, "pleasant" or "delightful." 1. Sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22). 2. Ammonite wife of Solomon and mother of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:21,31; 2 Chron. 12:13). 3. Village in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:41), likely khirbet Farad about twenty-two miles west of Jerusalem between Timnah and Eltekeh.

NAAMAN (Nā′ ȧ man) Personal name meaning, "pleasantness." Syrian general cured of leprosy under the direction of the prophet Elisha (2 Kings 5). Naaman's leprosy apparently was not contagious, nor was it seen as the result of some moral sin. Following his cleansing, he professed faith in Israel's God. See Leprosy.

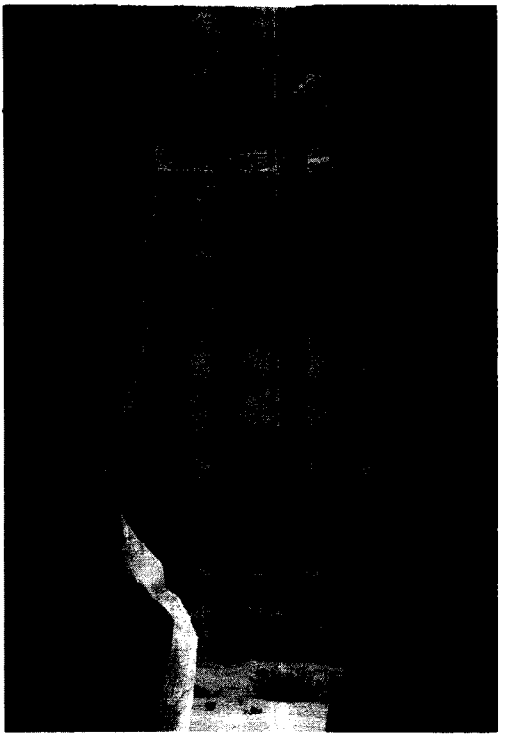
NAAMATHITE (Nā′ ȧ mȧ thīte) Title meaning, "resident of Na'ameh," given to Zophar, one of Job's three friends (Job. 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). Na'ameh is perhaps Djebel-el-Na'ameh in northwest Arabia.

NAAMITES (Nā′ ȧ mītes) Family of Benjaminites descended from Naaman (Num. 26:40).

NAARAH (Nā′ ȧ răh) Name meaning, "girl" or "mill." 1. Wife of Ashur (1 Chron. 4:5–6). 2. Form of Naarath preferred by modern translations.

NAARAI (Nā′ ȧ rȧî) Personal name meaning, "attendant of Yah." One of David's thirty elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:37). The parallel account gives the name Paari (2 Sam. 23:35).

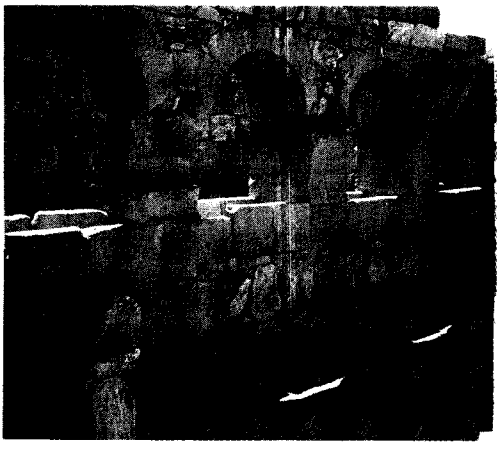
NAARAN (Nā′ ȧ răn) City allotted to Ephraim, likely identical with Naarah (1 Chron. 7:28; compare Josh. 16:7).



NAARATH (Nā′ ȧ răth) KJV form of Naarah, a city in the tribal territory of Ephraim just north of Jericho (Josh. 16:7). Suggested sites include 'Ain Duq, khirbet el 'Nayash about five miles northeast of Jericho, and tell el-Jishr. The city is perhaps identical to Naaran (1 Chron. 7:28).

NAASHON (Nā′ ăsh ŏn) KJV alternate form of Nahshon at Exodus 6:23.

NAASON (Nā ăs′ on) KJV alternate form of Nahshon (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32).



NABAL (Nā′ băl) Personal name meaning, "fool" or "rude, ill-bred." See Abigail.

NABATEANS (Nă ba tē′ ans) Arabic people whose origins are unknown. Although not mentioned in the Bible, they greatly influenced Palestine during intertestamental and New Testament times. They appear to have infiltrated ancient Edom and Moab from a homeland southeast of Petra. That city later became their capital. From Petra they continued pushing northward as far as Madeba. In 85 B.C. Damascus requested a ruler of the Nabateans. The Arabs responded. Although overrun by Pompey in 63 B.C., they continued to influence Transjordan through a series of governors. Paul narrowly escaped being arrested by the Nabateans in Damascus (2 Cor. 11:32). Paul spent time in Arabia following his conversion, probably preaching the gospel (Gal. 1:17).

NABOPOLASSAR (Nă bō pō lăs′ săr) Personal name meaning, "Nabu, protect the son." King (626–605 B.C.) who revolted from the Assyrians and established the Neo-Babylonian Empire. He rebelled in 627 B.C. and established his capital in Babylon. His reign was one of continual warfare as he slowly captured the cities of the Assyrian realm. He made an alliance with the Median King Cyaxares in 614, and the two sacked Nineveh in 612 B.C. See Babylon, History and Religion of.

NABOTH (Nā′ bŏth) Personal name perhaps meaning, "sprout." Owner of a vineyard in the Jezreel Valley adjacent to the country palace of King Ahab, who desired the property for a vegetable garden. Naboth refused to sell on the grounds that the property was a family inheritance (1 Kings 21:3–4). Hebrew law only allowed farmland to be leased for the number of crops until the Jubilee year (Lev. 25:15–16). Farmland was not to be sold in perpetuity (Lev. 25:23). Jezebel, who had no regard for Israel's laws, plotted Naboth's judicial murder on the charge that he had blasphemed God and the king (1 Kings 21:8–14). Naboth's murder evoked God's judgment on Ahab and his family (1 Kings 21:17–24).

NACHON (Nā′ chŏn) KJV form of Nacon, meaning, "firm" or "prepared." Threshing floor between Baal-judah (Kiriath-jearim) and Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:6). The designation is either a place name or the name of the owner. Chidon is given as the owner's name in the parallel account (1 Chron. 13:9).

NACHOR (Nā′ chôr) KJV alternate form of Nahor (Josh. 24:2; Luke 3:34).

NACON (Nā′ cŏn) See Nachon.

NADAB (Nā′ dăb) Personal name meaning, "willing" or "liberal." 1. Aaron's eldest son (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chron. 6:3), who participated in the ratification of the covenant (Ex. 24:1,9), served as a priest (Ex. 28:1), and was consumed by fire along with his brother Abihu for offering unholy fire before the Lord (Lev. 10:1–7; Num. 26:61). Nadab died childless (Num. 3:4; 1 Chron. 24:2). 2. Descendant of Judah and Tamar (1 Chron. 2:28,30). 3. Descendant of Benjamin and great-uncle of Saul (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36). 4. Son of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:20) and idolatrous king of Israel (901–900 B.C.). Baasha assassinated him during a seige of the Philistine city of Gibbethon (1 Kings 15:25–28). The extermination of the family of Jeroboam (15:29) was seen as fulfillment of the Ahijah's prophesy (14:10–11).

NAG HAMMADI (Năg Hăm mă′ dī) Modern Egyptian village 300 miles south of Cairo and about 60 miles north of Luxor, or ancient Thebes. Because of the close proximity of Nag Hammadi to the site of an important discovery of ancient documents relating to gnosticism, the collection of documents is usually referred to as the Nag Hammadi documents or library. Another name occasionally associated with the documents is Chenoboskion, the name of an ancient Christian community which is also near the discovery site. Although the documents were found in an abandoned cemetery near Chenoboskion, they probably had no ancient association with that community.

Unlike the Dead Sea Scroll materials, which consisted primarily of scrolls, the documents found near Nag Hammadi are codices, books containing leaves. Each codex was formed of sheets of papyrus bound in leather, and measured from about 5½ × 9½ inches to 5½ × 11½ inches. Thirteen separate codices were found containing fifty-one smaller writings. While the documents are written in the Coptic language, an ancient language of Egypt, they are probably translations of Greek originals. The date of the present documents appears to be about A.D. 350. While there is debate as to the dates of the original texts, some were probably written before A.D. 200.

The Discovery of the Nag Hammadi Documents

As in the case with many major archaeological discoveries, the find was something quite unexpected. In 1945 an Arab peasant digging in an ancient cemetery for soft dirt to be used as fertilizer, found instead a large earthenware jar. At first he feared to open the jar due to his superstitious beliefs, but the prospect of valuable treasure inside prompted him to break open the container. He found the thirteen leather-bound books, or codices. Some of the documents may have been destroyed, but the discovery eventually came to the attention of those involved in antiquity studies.

The Contents of the Nag Hammadi Documents

Practically all the materials reflect the religious outlook called gnosticism, an emerging world view that caused considerable difficulty for early Christianity. See Gnosticism.

Until the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Documents, our knowledge of gnosticism came primarily from early Christian writers who wrote against the movement. Christian writers such as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian not only gave descriptions of the teachings of gnosticism, but they also quoted from gnostic writings. With the Nag Hammadi discovery, however, a small library of actual gnostic writings became available for study.

The Nag Hammadi Documents represent a rather wide diversity of content. Of special interest are several more clearly defined categories. The materials referred to as "Gospels" are especially important. In this category are such works as The Gospel of Philip, The Gospel of Truth, and perhaps the most important work found at Nag Hammadi, The Gospel of Thomas, which purports to be a collection of sayings of Jesus. See Apocrypha, New Testament.

Another category of documents concerns the work and circumstances of the apostles. The Apocalypse of Paul relates an account of the heavenly journey of Paul. The Revelation of Peter describes special revelations given to Peter by Jesus before Peter's imprisonment. The Revelation of James tells of the death of James.

An additional category of documents contains a wide variety of mythological speculations covering such topics as creation, redemption, and ultimate destiny. In this category are such works as On the Origin of the World, Secret Book of the Great Invisible Spirit, Revelation of Adam, The Thought of our Great Power, The Paraphrase of Shem, The Second Logos of the Great Seth, and The Trimorphic Protennoia.

Although the Nag Hammadi Documents represent a diversity of gnostic systems, most of the materials do reflect the gnostic orientation. A possible exception is the work called The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles which is an apocryphal work about the twelve apostles.

Significance of the Nag Hammadi Documents

1. Provide primary source material enabling a greater understanding of Gnosticism.

2. Prove the existence of gnostic systems independent of the Christian framework. Some were primarily Jewish, and others existed as movements independent of either a Jewish or a Christian orientation.

3. Enhance the study of the New Testament, especially of the books that may have been written as reactions to Gnosticism, such as Colossians, John, and possibly 1 Corinthians.

4. Reflect the diversity of Gnosticism and point to the diversity of early Christianity and the resultant struggle for orthodoxy.

5. Reinforce an appreciation for the seriousness of the gnostic threat to early Christianity. Firsthand evidence now exists of the divergent gnostic views of creation, Christ, redemption, the doctrine of humanity, and the significance of the institutional church.

In conclusion, although not as well known as the Dead Sea Scrolls, the discovery at Nag Hammadi represents an important milestone in the understanding of the struggles and developments of the early Christian church.

NAGGAI (Năg′ gā̆i) Personal name perhaps meaning, "splendor of the sun." Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:25).

NAGGE (Năg′ gĕ) KJV form of Naggai.

NAHALAL (Nā hăl′ ăl) Place name meaning, "pasture" with alternate forms: Nahallal (Josh. 19:15); Nahalol (Judg. 1:30). Town Zebulun's territory allotted to the Levites (Josh. 19:15; 21:35). The Israelites were unable to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants of the city (Judg. 1:30). The site is uncertain. Tell-en-Nahl north of the Kishon River at the southern end of the plain of Acco is possible as are modern Nahalal about six miles west of Nazareth and tell el-Beida.

NAHALIEL (Nā hā′ lĭ ĕl) Place name meaning, "palm grove of God," "torrent valley of God," or less likely, "God is my inheritance." One of Israel's stopping places in Transjordan (Num. 21:19). The stream bed is perhaps the wadi Zerqa Ma'in or the wadi Wala, a north tributary of the Arnon.

NAHALLAL (Nā hăl′ lăl) Alternate form of Nahalal (Josh. 19:15 KJV, TEV).

NAHALOL (Nā′ hā lŏl) KJV alternate form of Nahalal (Judg. 1:30).

NAHAM (Nā′ hăm) Personal name meaning, "consolation." Either the brother (KJV, REB) or brother-in-law (NAS, NIV, NRSV) of Hodiah (1 Chron. 4:19).

NAHAMANI (Nā hå mā′ nī) Personal name meaning, "comfort." Exile who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7). The name does not appear in the parallel list (Ezra 2:2).

NAHARAI (Nā′ hå râi) Personal name meaning, "intelligent" or "snorting." One of David's thirty elite warriors who served as armor-bearer to Joab (2 Sam. 25:37; 1 Chron. 11:39). The KJV used the alternate form Nahari in 2 Samuel.

NAHARI (Nā′ hå rī) See Naharai.

NAHASH (Nā hăsh) Personal name meaning, "serpent" or perhaps "magnificence." 1. Ammonite ruler whose assault of Jabesh-Gilead set the stage for Saul's consolidation of power as king (1 Sam. 11:1–11). Saul's opponent was likely the Nahash who befriended David (2 Sam. 10:1–2). His son Hanun provoked David's anger (2 Sam. 10:3–5). Another son, Shobi, served as David's ally (2 Sam. 17:27). 2. Parent of Abigal (2 Sam. 17:25). Various harmonizations of 2 Samuel 17:25 and 1 Chronicles 2:16 have been offered. a. Nahash was a woman. b. Nahash is an alternate name for Jesse. c. The Amorite ruler Nahash and Jesse were at different times the husband of the same woman.

NAHATH (Nā′ hăth) Personal name meaning, "descent," "rest," "quietness," or even "pure, clear." 1. Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13,17; 1 Chron. 1:37). 2. Levite (1 Chron. 6:26), possibly identical with Toah (1 Chron. 6:34) and Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1). 3. Overseer in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron. 31:13).

NAHBI (Năh′ bī) Personal name meaning, "hidden" or "timid." Naphtali's representative among the twelve spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:14).

NAHOR (Nā′ hôr) Personal name meaning, "snore, snort." 1. Son of Serug, father of Terah, and grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:22–26). 2. Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen. 11:26). He married Milcah, his niece, who bore eight sons for him (11:29; 22:20–22). Nahor's genealogy shows the link between the Hebrews and other Semitic peoples of the ancient Near East. Of special interest is his relationship to the Aramaeans who dwelled in the region of modern Syria, probably descendants of his children born to Reumah (22:24), his concubine.

3. City in Mesopotamia where Abraham's servant sought and found a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:10); this in keeping with the ancient custom of marrying within one's family. The city probably was located southeast of Haran. It is mentioned in the Mari Texts.

NAHSHON (Năh′ shŏn) Personal name meaning, "serpent." Leader of the tribe of Judah during the wilderness years (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 7:12,17; 10:14), brother-in-law of Aaron (Ex. 6:23), and an ancestor of King David (Ruth 4:20–22) and of Jesus (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32).

NAHUM (Nā′ hŭm) Personal name meaning, "comfort, encourage." Hebrew prophet and the Old Testament book that contains some of his messages. Very little biographical information is known about the prophet Nahum. He is called an Elkoshite (1:1), but the location of Elkosh is unknown.

The date of the prophet's ministry can be placed between 600 and 700 B.C. by two events mentioned in his book. Nahum 3:8 refers to the destruction of the Egyptian capital, No-amon or Thebes, in 663 B.C. and indicates that the prophet was active after this time. In chapter 2, he looked forward to the destruction of Nineveh which took place in 612 B.C. Nahum, therefore, prophesied after 650 B.C., probably close to the time of the fall of Nineveh.

Historical Background Since about 730 B.C., Israel and Judah had been Assyrian vassals. Almost a century later, the Assyrian Empire began its decline. Many vassal nations revolted along with Josiah of Judah (2 Kings 22–23). A coalition of Medes, Babylonians, and Scythians attacked Assyrians and in 612 B.C. destroyed the capital, Nineveh. The Assyrians formed a coalition with the Egyptians, but in 605 B.C., they were defeated. See Assyria.

The Prophet's Message The Assyrian oppression created a troubling question. How could God allow such inhumanity to go unanswered? Nahum responded to Assyrian tyranny with a message marked by its vivid language. Assyria's might had been heavy upon Judah, but Nahum announced that God would destroy them.

The book opens with an affirmation of God as an avenging God. The fierceness of His wrath is pictured in terms of the destruction of nature. For over a century, the Assyrians seemed to have had an uncontrolled reign, but now God was responding. His judgment is likened to an approaching storm. Perhaps the people of Judah doubted God's justness since Assyria seemed to have no restraints. Nahum, however, sought to dispel this notion.

The second chapter graphically portrays the future fall of Assyria's capital, Nineveh. Such an event must have been hard for the people to imagine. Nineveh was a massive city with a defensive wall that measured eight miles in circumference and ranged in height from 25 to 60 feet. A moat also surrounded it. Yet, Nahum, poetically affirmed the city's fall. The enemy would rush upon the city with their chariots (2:4), and the gates would be unable to keep them out (2:5).

The great city would be plundered (2:7–10).

The Book of Nahum closes with more threats against Nineveh. Ironically, as Assyria had destroyed Thebes in 663 B.C., so the same fate would befall Nineveh (3:8–11). Preparations for a siege on the city are alluded to in 3:14. Water would be stored and fortifications strengthened by the addition of more mud bricks. Yet, these preparations would not keep away God's devastating judgment.

While the Book of Nahum is harsh and deals with the unpleasantness of war, it served to give hope to the people of Judah. They had been subjected to the cruel domination of Assyria for over a century, but now their faith in God to act on their behalf could be bolstered through God's response. God's justness was reaffirmed.

NAIL 1. Keratinous covering of the top ends of fingers and toes. If an Israelite desired to marry a prisoner of war, she was to cut her nails either as a sign of mourning for her parents or as part of her purification on entering the community of Israel (Deut. 21:12). 2. Metal fasteners used in construction and for decoration (1 Chron. 22:3; 2 Chron. 3:9; Isa. 41:7; Jer. 10:4). The earliest nails were made of bronze. With the introduction of iron, larger nails were made of iron. Smaller nails continued to be made of bronze. Nails were sometimes plaited with precious metal and nail heads decorated with gold foil when used for ornament (compare 2 Chron. 3:9). The nails used in the crucifixion of Jesus were likely iron spikes five to seven inches long (John 20:25). 3. KJV used nail as an alternate translation for a Hebrew term modern translations consistently render peg (Ex. 35:18; Judg. 4:21–22; Zech. 10:4).

Nails from Roman times.

NAIN (Nain) Place name meaning, "pleasant." Village in southwest Galilee where Jesus raised a widow's son (Luke 7:11–15). The ancient town sat on a hillside overlooking the Plain of Esdraelon.

NAIOTH (Nai' ŏth) Place name meaning, "dwelling." The name refers either to a building or district in the city of Ramah which housed the prophetic school Samuel led (1 Sam. 19:18–24). David sought refuge from Saul at Naioth. Three groups of royal messengers and finally Saul himself fell victim to prophetic frenzy when they attempted to capture David there.

NAKED Being without clothes (Gen. 2:25; Job 1:21; Eccl. 5:15; Amos 2:16; Mic. 1:8) or else poorly clothed (Deut. 28:48; Matt. 25:36–44; Jas. 2:15). The phrase "to uncover the nakedness of" means to have sexual intercourse (Lev. 18:6–19; 20:11,17–21). Nakedness frequently occurs in conjunction with shame (Gen. 3:7; 9:21–27; Isa. 47:3; Ezek. 16:8,36–37).

NAMES OF GOD The name of God holds an important key to understanding the doctrine of God and the doctrine of revelation. The name of God is a personal disclosure and reveals His relationship with His people. His name is known only because He chooses to make it known. To the Hebrew mind, God was both hidden and revealed, transcendent and immanent. Even though he was mysterious, lofty, and unapproachable, He bridged the gap with humankind by revealing His name. See Naming.

The truth of God's character is focused in His name. The divine name reveals God's power, authority, and holiness. This accounts for Israel's great reverence for God's name. The Ten Commandments prohibited the violation of God's name (Ex. 20:7; Deut. 5:11). Prophets spoke with authority when they uttered God's name. Oaths taken in God's name were considered binding, and battles fought in the name of God were victorious. Other nations would fear Israel, not because it was a mighty nation, but because it rallied under the Lord's name. In the New Testament, God's name is manifested most clearly in Jesus Christ. He is called "the Word" (John 1:1), and Jesus himself makes the claim that he has revealed the name of God (John 17:6). God's name is His promise to dwell with His people.

God of the Fathers Before Moses' encounter with God in the Midianite desert, God was known generally as the God of the Fathers. Various names were used for God under this conception, most of which were associated with the primitive Semitic word El.

El is a generic term for God or deity. It appears in ancient languages other than Hebrew. One can see the similarities to the modern Arabic word for God, Al or Allah. The word El refers to an awesome power that instills within humankind a mysterious dread or reverence.

Even though El was a term for God in pagan or polytheistic religions, it is not a designation for an impersonal force like one would find in animism. Pagans worshipped El as a high and lofty God. He was the chief God in the Canaanite pantheon. See Canaan.

The word El in the Bible is often a reference to deity as opposed to the particular historical revelation associated with the name "Yahweh" (see below). More often than not, however, it is used interchangeably as a synonym for Yahweh, the God of Isreal, and translated God.

One of the most interesting uses of El is its alliance with other terms to reveal the character of God. Some of these combinations are:

El-Shaddai "God of the Mountains" or "The Almighty God." This term is more closely associated with the patriarchal period and can be found most frequently in the Books of Genesis and Job. Exodus 6:3 underlines El-Shaddai as the name revealed to the patriarchs. God used it to make His Covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17:1–2).

El-Elyon "The Most High God" or "The Exalted One" (Num. 24:16; 2 Sam. 22:14; Ps. 18:13). Melchizadek was a priest of El-Elyon and blessed Abraham in this name (Gen. 14:19–20), refering to El-Elyon as "Maker of heaven and earth." Canaanites at Ugarit also worshiped god as El-Elyon. El-Elyon seems to have had close ties to Jerusalem.

El-Olam "God of Eternity" or "God the Everlasting One" (Gen. 21:33; Isa. 26:4; Ps. 90:2). God's sovereignty extends through the passing of time and beyond our ability to see or understand.

El-Berith "God of the Covenant" (Judg. 9:46) transforms the Canaanite Baal Berith (8:33) to show God alone makes and keeps covenant.

El-Roi "God who Sees me" or "God of Vision" (Gen. 16:13). God sees needs of His people and responds.

Elohim A plural form for deity. It is a frequently used term and the most comprehensive of the El combinations. The plurality of this word is not a hint of polytheism. It is a plural of majesty. It is a revelation of the infinite nature of God. In the creation narrative, we read: "Then Elohim said, 'Let us make man in our image.' " (Gen. 1:26) This name suggests that there is a mystery to the Creator-God which humankind cannot fully fathom. God is absolute, infinite Lord over creation and history. The Christian sees in this term a pointer to the trinitarian reality of creation.

Other Uses The name El is frequently combined with other nouns or adjectives. Some examples are: Israe-el (One who is ruled by God), Bethel (House of God), Peni-el (Face of God). In the crucifixion narrative (Mark 15:34), Jesus employed a form of El when he cried from the cross, "Eloi, Eloi," "my God, my God," quoting Psalm 22.

The Covenant Name The covenant name for God was "Yahweh." Israel's faith was a new response to God based on His disclosure. This name was so unique and powerful that God formed a covenant with His people based upon his self-revelation. See YHWH.

Yahweh-Jireh "The Lord will Provide" (Gen. 22:14). This was the name given to the location where God provided a ram for Abraham to sacrifice in the place of Isaac. This name is a testimony to God's deliverance.

Yahweh-Nissi "The Lord is my Banner" (Ex. 17:15). Moses acribed this name to God after a victory over the Amalekites. The name of God was considered a banner under which Israel could rally for victory. The Lord's name was the battle cry.

Yahweh-Mekaddesh "The Lord Sanctifies" (Ex. 31:13). Holiness is the central revelation of God's character. God calls for a people who are set apart.

Yahweh-Shalom "The Lord is Peace" (Judg. 6:24). This was the name of the altar that Gideon built at Ophrah signifying that God brings well-being not death to His people.

Yahweh-Sabaoth "The Lord of Hosts" (1 Sam. 1:3; Jer. 11:20; compare 1 Sam. 17:45). This can also be rendered, "The Lord Almighty." It represents God's power over the nations and was closely tied to Shiloh, to the ark of the covenant, and to prophecy. The title designates God as King and ruler of Israel, its armies, its Temple, and of all the universe.

Yahweh-Rohi "The Lord is my Shepherd" (Ps. 23:1). God is the One who provides loving care for His people.

Yahweh-Tsidkenu "The Lord is Our Righteousness" (Jer. 23:5–6; 33:16). This was the name Jeremiah gave to God, the Righteous King, who would rule over Israel after the return from captivity. He would establish a new kingdom of justice.

Yahweh-Shammah "The Lord is There" (Ezk. 48:35) This is the name of God associated with the restoration of Jerusalem, God's dwelling place.

Other Names Baal This was the chief god of the Canaanite pantheon. In some ancient religions, Baal and El could be used interchangeably. There were tendencies within Israel to identify Baal with Yahweh, but Baal worship was incompatible with Hebrew monotheism. Prophets, such as Elijah and Hosea, called the people away from these tendencies and back to the covenant.

Adon (or Adonai) This is a title of authority and honor. It can be translated "Lord." It is not exclusively a title for deity because it is used in addressing a superior, such as a king or master. In this sense, it is used to ascribe the highest honor and worship to God. Adon or Adonai was often used in conjunction with Yahweh. In time, Adonai became a substitute for Yahweh. In the postexilic period, it took on the connotation of God's absolute lordship.

Symbolic Titles A prominent characteristic of Scripture is its use of figurative language. Many of the names for God are symbolic, illustrative, or figurative.

Ancient of Days (Dan. 7:9,13,22) The picture presented is of an old man who lived for many years. This, of course, is not a literal description of God, but a confession that He lives forever and His kingdom is everlasting. His rule encompasses the expanses of time. Unlike the portrait presented in other religions where the gods are bound within time, Yahweh is active in time and history. He gives history meaning and is drawing it to a conclusion. He is from "everlasting to everlasting." (Ps. 90:2)

Rock (Deut. 32:18; Ps. 19:14; Isa. 26:4) God is strong and permanent. Yahweh is sometimes identified as "The Rock of Israel."

Refuge (Ps. 9:9; Jer. 17:17) God is a haven from the enemy.

Fortress (Ps. 18:2; Nah. 1:7) God is a defense against the foe.

Shield (Gen. 15:1; Ps. 84:11) God is protection.

Sun (Ps. 84:11) God is the source of light and life.

Refiner (Mal. 3:3) God is purifier.

Political Names Many descriptions of God came from political life.

King In the Ancient East, it was common to address gods as king. Kingship was also ascribed to Yahweh. His covenant people were to obey Him as a Sovereign. This title is the key to understanding the kingdom of God, which is the most frequent title used in Scripture to describe God's rule.

Judge The Judge was the political ruler during the time of tribal confederacy. Yahweh is the Judge who arbitrates disputes, sets things right, and intervenes for Israel in its military campaigns.

Shepherd God is frequently described as a Shepherd. This was a nurturing term to describe the care given to His covenantal people. It also had political or ruling connotations. Yahweh is the Shepherd King (Ezk. 34). In the New Testament, the image of God as shepherd is continued in parables (Luke 15:4–7) and in John's protrayal of Christ as the Good Shepherd (John 10:1–18).

God the Father In the Old Testament, the word father is used for God to describe the close kinship that He enjoys with His worshipers. There are many figurative references to God's fatherhood. "As a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear Him" (Ps. 103:13). God is a "father to Israel" (Jer. 31:9) and speaks of Israel as His "son" (Ex. 4:22; Hos. 11:1).

Father is the distinguishing title for God in the New Testament. Jesus taught His disciples to use the Aramaic "Abba," a term of affection that approximates our word Daddy, to address the heavenly Father. See Abba.

Father takes on a richer meaning when it is joined with other designations.

Our Father Jesus taught His disciples to address God in this manner when they prayed (Matt. 6:9):

Father of mercies (2 Cor. 1:3);
Father of lights (Jas. 1:17);
Father of glory (Eph. 1:17).

When the Father title is juxtaposed with the word Son, the significance of God's name in relation to Jesus Christ is understood. Christ's claim to have come in his Father's name reveals that He was God's unique representative (John 5:43). He shares the Father's essential authority and works done in his Father's name bear witness to this special relationship (John 10:25). Christ has provided a full revelation of God because He has clearly declared His name (John 12:28; 17:6).

NAMING In biblical tradition the task of naming a child generally fell to the mother (Gen. 29:31—30:24; 1 Sam. 1:20) but could be performed by the father (Gen. 16:15; Ex. 2:22) and in exceptional cases by nonparental figures (Ex. 2:10; Ruth 4:17). The last son of Jacob and Rachel received a name from each parent; Jacob altering the name Rachel gave (Gen. 35:18). Naming could be attributed to God originating through a divine birth announcement (Gen. 17:19; Luke 1:13). Naming took place near birth in the Old Testament and on the eighth day accompanying circumcision in New Testament narratives (Luke 1:59; 2:21).

The biblical concept of naming was rooted in the ancient world's understanding that a name expressed essence. To know the name of a person was to know that person's total character and nature. Revealing character and destiny, personal names might express hopes for the child's future. Changing of name could occur at divine or human initiative, revealing a transformation in character or destiny (Gen. 17:5,15; 32:28; Matt. 16:17–18).

The knowing of a name implied a relationship between parties in which power to do harm or good was in force. That God knew Moses by name occasioned the granting of Moses's request for divine presence (Ex. 33:12,17). The act of naming implied the power of the namer over the named, evidenced in the naming of the animals in Genesis 2:19–20 or Pharaoh's renaming Joseph (Gen. 41:45; compare Dan. 1:6–7; 2 Kings 24:17).

Proper names consisting of one or more terms consciously chosen by the namer conveyed a readily understandable meaning within the biblical world. Reflecting circumstances of birth Rachel called the child of her death, Ben-oni, "son of my sorrow" (Gen. 35:18). Jacob was named "the supplanter" for "he took hold on Esau's heel" (Gen. 25:26). Moses, the "stranger in a strange land," named his son Gershom (Ex. 2:22). Conditions of the times proved imaginative as well: Ichabod, "The glory has departed from Israel," (NRSV) came about by the ark of the covenant falling into Philistine hands (1 Sam. 4:21–22) and the symbolic names of Isaiah's sons:Shear-jashub, "a remnant shall return," (Isa. 7:3); Maher-Shalal-hash-baz, "swift is the booty, speedy is the prey," (Isa. 8:3, NASB).

Personal characteristics, Esau means "hairy"; Careah means "bald," (Gen. 25:25; 2 Kings 25:23); and the use of animal names in early times, Deborah means "bee"; Jonah means "dove"; Rachel means "ewe," are attested. Less frequently occurring are names taken from plants: Tamar meaning "palm tree"; Susanna meaning "lily."

Simple names functioning as epithets, such as Nabal meaning "fool" and Sarah meaning "princess," gave way to compound names factual or wishful in nature, such as Mattaniah meaning "gift of Yahweh" and Ezekiel meaning "may God strengthen." Compound names in the main are theophoric, employing the divine names El and Yah (Elijah, Ishmael, Nathaniel). Titles and kinship terms (Abimelech, melech means "king"; Abigail, Ab(i) means "father") and foreign names occur: Aramaic, Greek, and Roman (Martha, Salome, Alexandra, John Mark).

The patronymic practice whereby a child received the name of a relative, especially the grandfather (Simon Bar-Jona is "son of Jona") was common by the Christian era. Geographical identities are attested as well (Goliath of Gath and Jesus of Nazareth).

NAOMI (Nā ō′ mī) Personal name meaning, "my pleasantness." Wife of Elimelech and mother-in-law to Orpah and Ruth (Ruth 1:2,4). Naomi suffered the deaths of her husband and two sons while in Moab. Her matchmaking betwen Ruth and Boaz was successful, and she became a forebear of David, Isreal's greatest king (Ruth 4:21–22). See Ruth.

NAPHATH-DOR (Nā′ phăth Dôr) Designation of the region surrounding the coastal city of Dor about fifteen miles west of Megiddo (Josh. 12:23; 1 Kings 4:11). The alternate form Naphoth-Dor is used at Joshua 11:2. KJV translated the term Naphath variously (borders, coasts, regions). NAS rendered the term "height(s)," relegating the Hebrew to the margin; REB, "districts."

NAPHISH (Nā′ phĭsh) Personal name meaning, "refreshed." A son of Ishmael and ancestor of a northwest Arabian tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). The tribe dwelt in Transjordan before being displaced by Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:19).

NAPHOTH-DOR (Nā′ phŏth Dôr) RSV alternate form of Naphath-Dor (Josh. 11:2). The NIV consistently used the form Naphoth Dor (Josh. 11:2; 12:23; 1 Kings 4:11).

NAPHTALI (Năph′ tă lī) Personal name meaning, "wrestler." Sixth son of Jacob and second son by his concubine Bilhah (Gen. 30:6–8). In blessing him, Jacob likened Naphtali to a hind let loose (49:21), probably a reference to unbridled energy. The tribe which bears his name inhabited a territory north of the Sea of Galilee that extendsalong the northwest side of Jordan beyond Lake Huleh (Josh. 19:32–39).

Naphtali is praised in the Song of Deborah for placing itself in jeopardy on behalf of Israel (Judg. 5:18). The tribe joined with Asher and Manasseh to help drive the Midianites out of the land (7:23). During Solomon's reign the territory was designated a separate economic district (1 Kings 4:7,15) and produced Hiram, the king's chief brass worker (7:13–14). The Syrians invaded Naphtali during Baasha's reign and inflicted heavy losses (15:20). The territory finally succumbed to Tiglath-pileser III in 734 B.C. (2 Kings 15:29). See Tribes.

NAPHTUHIM (Năph′ tū hĭm) Residents of Naphtuh, an unidentified geographic area (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11; Naphtuhites, NIV and REB). The Naphtuhim were most likely residents of the Nile delta or else inhabitants of the oases to the west of the Nile Valley. The term may come from Egyptian for Ptah, pointing to Middle Egypt.

NAPKIN See Handkerchief.

NARCISUS (När cĭs′ sŭs) A common name among both slaves and freedmen meaning, "daffodil." The Narcissus of Romans 16:11 headed a household, perhaps including slaves and/or associated freedmen, which included some Christians. The most famous Narcissus was a freedman who served as an advisor to Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54). He committed suicide shortly after Nero's accession of the throne. It is possible, though not certain, that Paul had this Narcissus in mind.

NARD An expensive fragrance derived from the roots of the herb nardostachys jatamansi. The term appears twice in the Song of Solomon (1:12; 4:13–14) and in two of the gospel accounts of the woman anointing Jesus at Simon's house in Bethany (Mark 14:3; John 12:3; "spikenard," KJV). The disciples rebuked her for this action, stating that the ointment could have been sold for a sizeable sum and the proceeds donated to the poor.

NATHAN (Nā′ than) Personal name meaning, "gift." 1. Prophet in royal court during reign of David and early years of Solomon. David consulted Nathan about building a Temple. Nathan responded favorably. That night the Lord spoke to Nathan with instructions for David that his successor would build the Temple. Nathan included the words of the Lord that David would have a house, a great name, and a kingdom forever. David responded with gratitude to the Lord (2 Sam. 7; 1 Chron. 17).

David committed adultery with Bathsheba and had her husband, Uriah, slain in battle. The Lord was displeased and sent Nathan to rebuke the king. The prophet told a story in which a rich man took the only little ewe lamb that belonged to a poor man and prepared a meal for one of his guests. David said the rich man should die. Nathan responded, "Thou art the man." David repented, but his first child born to Bathsheba died (2 Sam. 11—12).

Adonijah tried unsuccessfully to become king in the closing days of David's life. Nathan, along with Zadok, the priest, Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, Shimei, Rei, and David's mighty men, opposed Adonijah. Bathsheba and Nathan spoke to David about an earlier decision to appoint Solomon as the next king. David declared Solomon to be king (1 Kings 1:5–53).

Later references indicate that Nathan wrote the chronicles for David (1 Chron. 29:29) and a history of Solomon (2 Chron. 9:29). Nathan advised David in arranging the musical instruments played by the Levites (2 Chron. 29:25).

2. Son of David, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 14:4). His mother was Bathsheba (Bath-shua) (1 Chron. 3:5). He is in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Luke 3:31). 3. Nathan of Zobah, father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:36). He may be the same as Nathan the brother of Joel (1 Chron. 11:38), within another list of David's mighty men. 4. The two Nathans mentioned as fathers of Azariah and Zabud may be same man and identified as the prophet Nathan (1 Kings 4:5) during Solomon's reign. If Zubad (1 Chron. 2:36) is the same as Zabud, his father Nathan may be the prophet; thus, the prophet's father was Attai, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:25).

5. A returning exile whom Ezra sent on a mission to secure ministers for God's house (Ezra 8:15–17). He may be the same exile who had married a foreign wife and put her away (Ezra 10:39). Omar Hancock

NATHAN-MELECH (Nā′ than Mē′ lĕch) Personal name meaning, "The king has given" or perhaps "Melech [= the god Molech] has given." Nathan-Melech served as an official of King Josiah (2 Kings 23:11). See Eunuch.

NATHANAEL (Nå thăn′ ā ĕl) Personal name meaning, "giver of God." An Israelite whom Jesus complimented as being guileless (John 1:47) and who, in turn confessed the Lord as being the Son of God and King of Israel (v. 49).

Nathanael was from Cana of Galilee (John 21:2) and apparently became one of the inner core of disciples who followed Jesus. Although Matthew, Mark, and Luke do not mention him by name, his two appearances in John point to his devotion to Christ. Some have equated him with Bartholomew.

Philip announced to Nathanael that Jesus was the promised Messiah (John 1:45). It was then that Nathanael made the infamous remark, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" See Disciples.

NATIVES Term used by several modern translations (NAS, REB, NRSV) to designate the inhabitants of Malta (Acts 28:2). Barbarous people (KJV) reflects the Greek barbaroi which designates the islanders as non-Greek speaking. NIV reads, "islanders."

NATIVITY OF CHRIST See Jesus Christ; Jesus, Life and Ministry of.

NATURAL According to nature. 1. Natural use (Rom. 1:26–27 KJV; natural relations, RSV) refers to heterosexual relations, thus "natural intercourse," (NRSV, REB). 2. Natural affection refers specifically to affection for family members. Those lacking natural affection (astorgoi) are unloving to their families or generally inhuman or unsociable (Rom. 1:31; 2 Tim. 3:3). 3. Natural branches refer to original or native branches as opposed to ingrafted ones (Rom. 11:21,24). 4. The natural or unspiritual person (1 Cor. 2:14) is one not open to receiving gifts from God's Spirit or to discerning spiritual matters (constrast 2:15). This contrast between the spiritual and natural is also evidenced by James 3:15 (NAS) and Jude 19 (NIV). 5. The natural face (Jas. 1:23) is literally the face of one's birth. To see one's natural face is to see oneself as one actually is.

NAUGHTINESS KJV used naughtiness to mean viciousness or wickedness (1 Sam. 17:28; Prov. 11:6; Jas. 1:21). In modern English naughtiness indicates disobedience, misbehavior, or mischievousness. Modern translations thus replace naughtiness with terms such as evil, greed, or wickedness to reflect the seriousness of the sin.

NAUM (Nā′ ŭm) KJV form of Nahum, an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

A religious service takes place inside the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem.

NAVE 1. Term used by some modern translations (NAS, NRSV) for the main room of the Temple between the vestibule and the holy of holies (1 Kings 6:3,5,17; 7:50; 2 Chron. 3:4–5,13; 4:22). KJV referred to this room as the temple or house. See Temple. 2. KJV used nave for the center of a wheel through which an axle passes (1 Kings 7:33). Modern translations render the underlying Hebrew as rim.

NAVEL 1. Depression in the middle of the belly marking the place where the umbilical cord was formerly attached. Ezekiel 16:4 graphically portrays Jerusalem's hopeless state before God's adoption in the image of a child whose navel string (umbilical cord) is not cut (see Midwife). Modern translations often replace navel with another word more appropriate to the context, for example, flesh or belly (Job 40:16; Prov. 3:8; Song of Sol. 7:2). 2. Hebrew expression for "midst of the land" or "center of the earth" (NRSV) in Judges 9:37; Ezekiel 38:12. Israel's neighbors used the term to designate the earthly place, often a worship place or sacred city, linking heaven and earth. Some scholars use later Jewish references to Jerusalem as the cultic "navel of the earth" to interpret Gerazim and Jerusalem as places celebrated as the earth's linking point. The two biblical passages seem to have only geographical meanings, however.

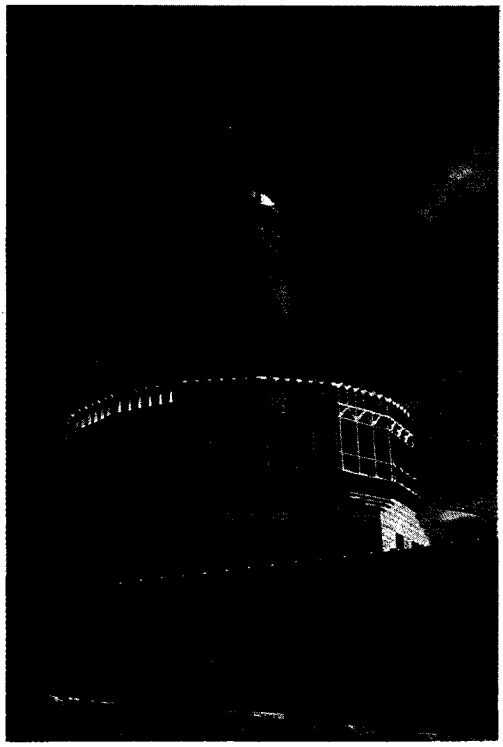
NAZARETH, NAZARENE (Năz' ă rĕth; Năz ă rēne') Place name meaning, "branch." Nazareth did not enjoy a place of prominence until its association with Jesus. It does not appear in the Old Testament. As He became known as "Jesus of Nazareth" (Matt. 26:71; Luke 18:37; 24:19; John 1:45; Acts 2:22; 3:6; 10:38), His hometown became fixed in Christian memory.



Nazareth was located in lower Galilee about halfway between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea. It lay in the hill country north of the Plain of Esdraelon. The hills formed a natural basin with three sides, but open toward the south. The city was on the slopes of the basin, facing east and southeast. Cana was about five miles to the northeast. A Roman road from Capernaum westward to the coast passed near Nazareth.

It was a small village in Jesus' day, having only one spring to supply fresh water to its inhabitants. Today, the spring is referred to as "Mary's well." The modern city has about 20,000 citizens, mainly Moslems and Christians.

The angel went to Nazareth to announce to Mary and Joseph the coming birth of Jesus (Luke 1:26–28). Following Jesus' birth in Bethlehem and the sojourn in Egypt, Joseph and Mary returned with Jesus to Nazareth (Matt. 2:19–23), where Jesus grew from boyhood to manhood (Luke 2:39–40; 4:16), being stamped as a Nazarene (Matt. 2:23), apparently a midrashic play on the Hebrew term netser, "shoot" in Isaiah 11:1.

The modern city of Nazareth with the Catholic Church of the Annunciation in the center of photo.

The Catholic Church of the Annunciation built over the caves where tradition says Mary and Joseph lived.

Nazareth did not possess a good reputation, as reflected in the question of Nathanael, himself a Galilean (John 1:46). The early church received similar scorn as the Nazarene sect (Acts 24:5). Such lack of respect was likely due to an unpolished dialect, a lack of culture, and quite possibly a measure of irreligion and moral laxity.

Jesus was rejected by His townspeople near the beginning of His public ministry, being cast out of the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16–30; see also Matt. 13:54–58; Mark 6:1–6).

NAZIRITE (Năz′ ī rīte) Member of a class of individuals especially devoted to God. The Hebrew term means consecration, devotion, and separation. Two traditional forms of the Nazirite are found. One was based on a vow by the individual for a specific period; the other was a lifelong devotion following the revelatory experience of a parent which announced the impending birth of a child.

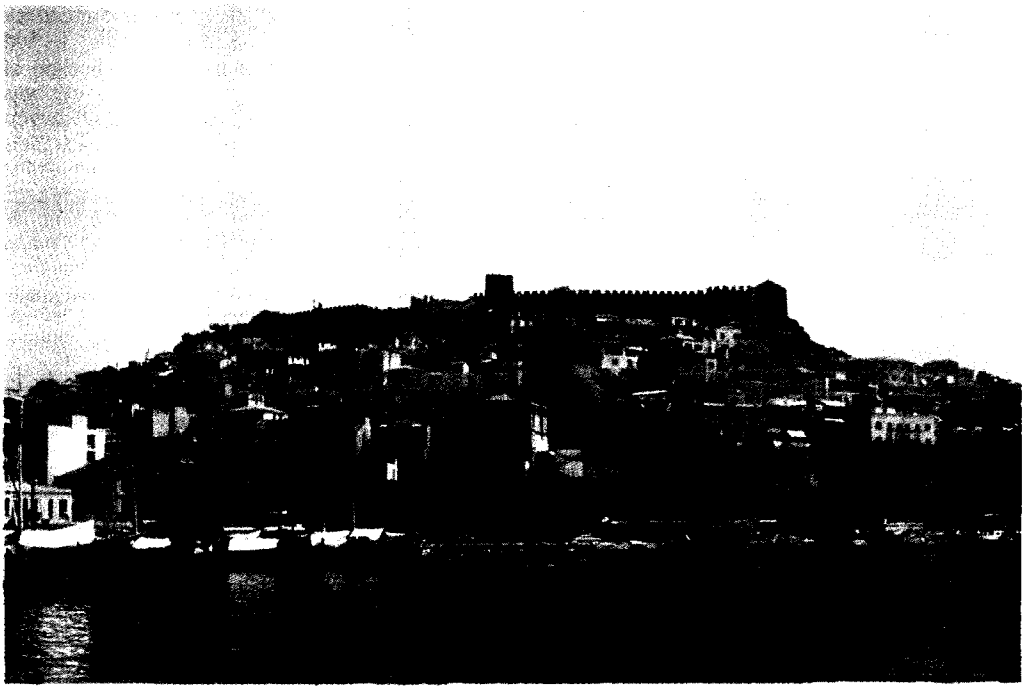
The Nazirite's outward signs—the growth of hair, abstention from wine and other alcoholic products, the avoidance of contact with the dead—are illustrative of devotion to God. Violation of these signs resulted in defilement and the need for purification so the vow could be completed. Numbers 6:1–21 regulated the practice and lined the phenomenon to cultic law and locality. Verses 1–8 show how the Nazirite's period was begun. In case of defilement, a method of purification was given (vv. 9–12). The status was terminated (vv. 13–21) by the burning of shaven hair and the giving of various offerings. Parallels exist between the cultic purity of the high priest and the Nazirite.

The lifelong Nazirite in biblical tradition included Samson (Judg. 13), Samuel (1 Sam. 1), and John the Baptist (Luke 1:15–17). In the New Testament, Paul took the Nazirite vow for a specific period of time (Acts 18:18; 21:22–26). Amos 2:12 shows an ethical concern for protecting the status of the Nazirite.

NEAH (Nē′ ah) Place name meaning, "settlement." Border town in the tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). The site was perhaps that of modern Nimrin west of Kurn Hattin.

NEAPOLIS (Nė ăp′ o lĭs) Name meaning, "new city," of the seaport of Philippi (Acts 16:11). Neapolis (modern Kavala) is located about ten miles from Philippi in northeastern Macedonia. The city sits on a neck of land between two bays, each of which serve as harbors.

NEARIAH (Nē â rī′ ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "Yah's young man." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:22–23). 2. Commander of Hezekiah's forces who defeated the Amalekites (1 Chron. 4:42–43).



NEBAI (Nē′ baî) Personal name meaning, "projecting" or "fruitful." One of the witnesses to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:19).

NEBAIOTH (Nė baî′ ŏth) Personal name meaning, "fruitfulness." Son of Ishmael and ancestor of an Arab tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:13; 28:9; 36:3). KJV used the alternate form Nebajoth as 1 Chronicles 1:29; Isaiah 60:7.

NEBAJOTH (Nė bā′ jŏth) KJV alternate form of Nebaioth (1 Chron. 1:29; Isa. 60:7).

NEBALLAT (Nė băl′ lăt) Place name perhaps meaning, "blessed with life." The name perhaps derives from Nabu-uballit, the personal name of an Assyrian governor of Samaria. Neballat was resettled by Benjaminites after the Exile (Neh. 11:34). The site is identical with modern Beit Nebala on the edge of the plain of Sharon about four miles east of Lod.

NEBAT (Nē′ băt) Personal name meaning, "God has regarded." Father of Jeroboam I (1 Kings 11:26; 12:2,15). Nebat was from Zeredah about ten miles west of Shiloh.

The harbor, town, and acropolis of Neapolis (modern Kavala).

NEBO (Nē′ bō) Place and divine name meaning, "height." 1. Babylonian god of speech, writing, and water. Worship of Nebo was popular during the Neo-Babylonian era (612–539 B.C.). Isaiah mocked parades featuring the idol of Nebo (Isa. 46:1).

2. Moabite city located southwest of Heshbon. The tribes Reuben and Gad requested the area around Nebo for their flocks (Num. 32:2–3). It was held by Israel until recaptured by King Mesha about 850 B.C. 3. Town reinhabited by exiles returning from Babylon (Ezra 2:29). The site has been identified with Nob. 4. Mountain about twelve miles east of the mouth of the Jordan River from which Moses viewed the Promised Land (Deut. 32:49). It rises over 4000 feet above the Dead Sea and gives an excellent view of the southwest, west, and as far north as Mount Hermon. Israel captured the area around Mount Nebo as they marched toward Canaan. They camped in the area of Mount Nebo opposite Jericho when the Balaam incident occurred (Num. 22—24). During the period of the judges it was the possession of Eglon of Moab. David recaptured the area (2 Sam. 8:2), and it remained a part of Israel until Mesha rebelled and took control about 850 B.C.

NEBO-SARSEKIM (Nē′ bō Sär′ sĕ kĭm) NIV form of the name of a Babylonian official (Jer. 39:13). The NIV and similar REB readings result from dividing the present Hebrew text differently than the majority of English translators. See Sarsechim.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Nĕb ū ch̲ăd nĕz′ zär) Personal name meaning, "Nabu protects." King of Babylon 602–562 B.C. He was the son of Nabopolassar and inherited the throne upon the death of his father. Nebuchadnezzar served as a general under his father and was a brilliant strategist. His victory over the Egyptian forces at Carchemish (605) signaled the completion of Babylon's conquest of Palestine. See Babylon, History and Religion of.

NEBUSHASBAN; NEBUSHAZBAN (Nĕ bū shăs′ băn, Nĕ bū shăz′ băn) Variant transliterations of personal name meaning, "Nabu save me." High official of Nebuchadrezzar involved in the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:13).

NEBUZARADAN (Nĕb′ ū zär ā′ dăn) Personal name meaning, "Nebo has given offspring." An officer in the Babylonian army during King Nebuchadnezzar's reign. His title is given as "captain of the guard," a designation which is uncertain. He led his troops in a siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:8–9), burned the city's buildings, tore down its walls, and carried away the people into Exile. Four years later he returned and deported still more citizens (Jer. 52:30). See Babylon, History and Religion of.

NECHO (Nē′ ch̲ō) KJV form of Neco (2 Chron.

NECHOH (Nē′ choh) KJV alternate form of Neco. This form always occurs in the hyphenated form Pharaoh-Nechoh (2 Kings 23:29,33,34–35).

NECK Portion of the body connecting the head to the torso. To put one's feet on the neck of an enemy is a sign of complete victory (Josh. 10:24). A yoke placed on the neck is a frequent emblem of servitude (Gen. 27:40; Deut. 28:48; Isa. 10:27). To fall upon someone's neck with weeping or kissing is a special sign of tenderness (Gen. 33:4; 45:14; compare Luke 15:20). To be stiff-necked or to harden one's neck is a common picture of stubborn disobedience (Ex. 32:9; 33:3,5).

A reconstructed section of the "Procession Street" of Babylon built by Nebuchadnezzar in about 580 B.C.

NECKLACE An ornament worn around the neck (Song of Sol. 1:10; Ezek. 16:11). The gift of a gold necklace is sometimes the sign of installation to a high office (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:29).

NECO (Nē′ cō) Second Pharaoh (609–594 B.C.) of the 26th dynasty of Egypt whose forces killed Josiah in battle (2 Kings 23:29–35; 2 Chron. 35:20–24) and who installed Jehoiakim as king of Judah in his place (2 Kings 23:34–35). The Twenty-Sixth Dynasty was established with Assyrian patronage. Neco began to reign three years after the fall of Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. The resulting power vacuum encouraged the ambitious Neco to seize Gaza as a base (Jer. 47:1) for a campaign to bring Syria under his control and to bring aid to the Assyrian remnant in their struggle with the rising force of Babylon. Josiah met Neco in battle as the latter was on route to Carchemish. There Neco was defeated by Nebuchadrezzar in 605 B.C. (Jer. 46:2). Later Nebuchadrezzar would extend his control as far as the Nile (2 Kings 24:7). See Assyria; Egypt; Josiah.

NECROMANCY (Nĕ crō măn′ cy) Conjuring the spirits of the dead to predict or influence future events. See Medium.

NEDABIAH (Nĕ dā bī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah is generous." Son of Jeconiah, the exiled king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:18).

NEEDLE Small slender instrument used in sewing with an eye at one end through which thread is passed. The needles of New Testament times were similar in size to modern needles with the exception of our smallest needles. Needles were most often made of bronze, though bone and ivory were also used. Jesus' teaching that "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24; compare Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25) illustrates the impossibility of a rich person's being saved apart from the intervention of God who does the impossible (Matt. 19:26). Some late Greek manuscripts read rope (kamilos) for camel (kamēlos). This attempt to dull the sharp edge of Jesus' saying runs counter to the context. The use of the term needle's eye for a gate of Jerusalem is an interpretive fiction, again designed to make Jesus' word more palatable. No such gate exists.

NEEDLEWORK Decorative work sewn upon cloth. Needlework was used in the decoration of the screens for the tabernacle door (Ex. 26:36; 36:37) and for the gate to its court (Ex. 27:16; 38:18) as well as for Aaron's girdle (Ex. 28:39; 39:29). Needlework was included in the prize spoils of war (Judg. 5:30) and in lists of luxury items for trade (Ezek. 27:16,24). Embroidered garments were the clothing of royalty (Ezek. 16:10,13,18; 26:16). The mention of material of various colors suggests that some needlework may have involved appliqué.

NEEZINGS (nēēz ings) KJV term meaning, "sneezings" or "sneezes" (Job 41:18).

NEGEB (Nĕ′ gĕb) Place name meaning, "dry" referring to an arid region in southern Palestine and coming to mean "south." During biblical times it was more populated than today, indicating either more rainfall then or better conservation of the resources. It was the land of the Amalekites during Abraham's day (Gen. 14:7). There he exiled Hagar (21:14). The Israelites wandered in the Negeb after a futile attempt to enter Canaan (Num. 14:44–45). David incorporated it into his kingdom, and Solomon established fortresses in the region. Daniel used the term to refer to Egypt (Dan. 11:15,29). After Judah fell in 586 B.C. Edom took the area into its kingdom. In New Testament times it was known as Nabatea. See Directions; Nabateans; Palestine.

NEGEV (Nĕ′ gĕv) Alternate spelling of Negeb.

NEGINAH, NEGINOTH (Nĕ gī′ nah, Nĕg′ ĭ nŏth) Neginoth, the plural form of Neginah, is used as a technical term in the superscriptions of several psalms (Pss. 4, 6, 54—55, 61, 67, 76) and as the subscription of Habakkuk 3:19. The term is generally understood to specify the instrumentation needed for performance, "with stringed instruments" (compare Isa. 38:20; Lam. 5:14). Other references suggest that neginah designates a taunt song (Job 30:9; Ps. 69:12; Lam. 3:14).

NEHELAM, NEHELAMITE (Nĕ hēl′ am, Nĕ hē′ la mīte) Either a family name or a reference to the home of the false prophet Shemaiah (Jer. 29:24,31–32). The name is perhaps a play on the Hebrew word for dreamer (compare Jer. 23: 25,32).

NEHEMIAH (Nē hē mī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah comforts or encourages" and name of Old Testament book featuring work of Nehemiah. Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah, is the main character in the book which bears his name. Two other Nehemiahs appear in the OT: one in the group who returned with Sheshbazzar (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7), and the other was the son of Azbuk, "the ruler of the half part of Bethzur" (Neh. 3:16), a helper with rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem.

Nehemiah and Ezra were one book in the ancient Hebrew and Greek OT, and probably were not divided until after the Interbiblical Period (see Ezra for more details). Jewish tradition says Ezra or Nehemiah was the author. Because of the close connection between Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, one person might have written or compiled all three books. Those who follow this argument refer to the author as the Chronicler.

The literary style of Nehemiah is similar to that in Ezra. There are many lists (ch. 3; 10:1–27; ch. 11; 12:1–26). The author/compiler wove Ezra's and Nehemiah's stories together, Ezra being featured in Nehemiah 8.

The book has four major sections: the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (chs. 1—7), the Great Revival (chs. 8—10), population and census information (chs. 11—12), and the reforms of Nehemiah (ch. 13). Nehemiah made two visits from King Artaxerxes to Jerusalem (2:1–6; 13:6–7). His first, 445 B.C., was to repair the walls; they were in a state of disrepair almost a century after the first arrival from Exile in 538 B.C. The second was a problem-solving trip in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes (13:6), 432 B.C. Nehemiah was a contemporary of Ezra and Malachi, and also Socrates in Greece (470–339 B.C.), and only a few decades later than Gautama Buddha in India (560–480 B.C.) and Confucius in China (551–479 B.C.).

Nehemiah held the distinguished position of cupbearer to the king (1:11). This was an office of trust; tasting the king's wine and food, the cupbearer stood between the king and death. That Nehemiah, a Jew and a captive, served this Gentile king in such a strategic capacity was an unusual credit and honor to this man of strong character.

Nehemiah's Memoirs include first person accounts (1:1—7:5; 12:27–47; 13:4–31), and the other material uses the third person pronoun (chs. 8—10). Thus his story is both autobiographical and biographical. Visitors to Susa informed him of the delapidation of Jerusalem's walls. He was so upset that he cried and mourned for days" (1:4). He prayed a confession (1:5–11). His grief became apparent to Artaxerxes who permitted him to go to Jerusalem.

Nehemiah's first act there was to inspect the walls at night (2:15). He then called an assembly and convinced the people of the need for a building program. He was an excellent leader who demonstrated engineering knowledge and brilliant organizing ability (ch. 3). The work began.

Trouble arose from without and from within. Sanballat and his friends tried to stop the work, but without success (ch. 4). Trouble from within was economic. Building the walls caused a labor shortage; farms were mortgaged, and high rates of interest were charged. Nehemiah said, "The thing you are doing is not good" (5:9 NRSV). He corrected the problem and even gave financial aid to those in need (ch. 5). Again Sanballat and other non-Jews made several attempts to lure Nehemiah away from the job and shut it down. They failed. Nehemiah proved to be a person of strong will and unusual boldness. "So the wall was finished . . . in fifty and two days" (6:15). The dedication of the wall is described later in 12:27–43.

The theological climax of the Book of Nehemiah and of the life of Ezra is the Great Revival (Neh 8—10). It was a grand experience. It warrants close study for revival attempts today. People assembled. They requested Ezra to read from the book of the law of Moses (8:1). The book was probably the Pentateuch (Torah) or some part of it. Ezra read, and others helped by giving "the sense, so that the people understood the reading" (8:8 NRSV). This probably included translating the Hebrew scripture into Aramaic, the commonly spoken language.

A great celebration occurred, and they observed the Feast of Tabernacles. Results were impressive: "They made confession and worshiped the Lord" (9:3 NRSV) and "separated themselves from all strangers" (9:2) that is, they divorced their foreign spouses. They prayed a long prayer of confession (9:6–37). The people responded, "Because of all this, we make a sure covenant and write it" (9:38). The signers and terms of the covenant were then recorded (ch. 10).

Nehemiah was dissatisfied with the small size of the population of Jerusalem. He made an ingenious proposal: to "cast lots to bring one out of ten to live in the holy city Jerusalem, while nine-tenths remained in the other towns" (11:1 NRSV). Nehemiah's last chapter cites his reforms made during his second visit to Jerusalem in 432 B.C. He threw out a Gentile who was permitted to live in the Temple; he restored the practice of tithing to support the Levites; he corrected sabbath wrongs by those who bought and sold on the sabbath; and he dealt forthrightly with those who had married foreigners, those not in covenant relation with God.

Nehemiah was indeed an outstanding person. His theology was very practical; it affected every area of life. Note his prayers and how practical they were (1:4–11; 2:4; 4:4–5,9; 5:19; 6:9,14; 13:14,22,29,31). He boldly asked, "Remember for my good, O my God, all that I have done for this people" (5:19 NRSV; compare 13:14,31). His faith was practical: "And the king granted me what I asked, for the gracious hand of my God was upon me" (2:8 NRSV; compare 2:18 for a practical application of this concept). He believed "the God of heaven is the one who will give us success" (2:20 NRSV) and that "our God will fight for us" (4:20 NRSV). He had respect for the sabbath, the Temple and its institutions, the Levites, and tithing.

Nehemiah was an unusual person. Nehemiah was a man of action; he got things done. He knew how to use persuasion but also force. One may properly call him the father of Judaism. Because of Nehemiah, Judaism had a fortified city, a purified people, a dedicated and unified nation, renewed economic stability, and a new commitment to God's law.

Outline

I. God's Work Must Be Done (1:1—7:33).
   - A. God's leaders must be informed of needs in God's work (1:1–3).
   - B. God's leaders must be responsive spiritually to needs in God's work and must pray (1:4–11).
   - C. God's leaders must enlist the aid of others, sometimes outside the family of God (2:1–9).
   - D. God's leaders likely will encounter opposition (2:10).
   - E. God's leaders must exercise caution and discretion along with careful planning (2:11–16).
   - F. God's leaders must inform and challenge God's people to work (2:17–20).
   - G. God's work demands hard work, good organization, plenty of cooperation, and good records to give credit where credit is due (3:1–32).
   - H. God's leaders will pray in the face of ridicule and insult (4:1–9).
   - I. God's leaders may expect opposition from within as well as from without (4:10–12).
   - J. God's leaders must encourage weary workers with practical, prayerful faith (4:13–15).
   - K. God's work gets done by hard work and committed workers (4:16–23).

L. God's work is slowed by internal problems of unfairness (5:1–5).
M. God's leaders must confront profiteering problem causers (5:6–13).
N. God's leaders at times can be sacrificially generous to meet a pressing need (5:14–19).
O. God's leaders know opposition can be very personal and must deal with it head on (6:1–14).
P. God's help and the cooperation of many workers bring success (6:15–16).
Q. God's work can have traitors within (6:17–19).
R. God's leaders will enlist others and give them clear instructions (7:1–5).
S. God's leaders need to keep and use good records (7:6–73).

II. God's Way Must Include Revival and Reformation (8:1—13:31).
A. God's people want to hear God's Word (8:1–3).
B. God's Word must be read and then interpreted (8:4–8).
C. God's way calls for joyous celebration (8:9–12).
D. God's way prescribes formal expressions of joyous worship (8:13–18).
E. God's way elicits confession (9:1–5).
F. God's people give practical expression to prayerful repentance (9:6–37).
G. God's people are willing to commit themselves (9:38).
H. God's people will sign pledges of commitment (10:1–27).
I. God's people must give practical expressions of commitment (10:28–39).
J. God's people must be willing to make some changes (11:1–2).
K. God's work requires good records (11:3—12:26).
L. God's work should be dedicated and celebrated (12:27–47).
M. God's people must be a separated people (13:1–9).
N. God's work, including His finance program, must not be neglected (13:10–14).
O. God's day must be respected (13:15–22).
P. God's way demands purity in marriage and in ministers (13:23–31).

NEHILOTH (Nē′ hĭ lŏth) A technical musical term in the superscription of Psalm 5. The term is generally understood to specify the instrumentation for the psalm, "with flutes."

NEHUSHTA (Nē hŭsh′ tä) Personal name meaning, "serpent" or "bronze." Mother of King Jehoiachin of Judah (2 Kings 24:8). As queen mother, she was among those deported in the first Exile (24:12,15).

NEHUSHTAN (Nē hŭsh′ tăn) Name of a "brazen serpent" destroyed by King Hezekiah as part of an attempt to reform Judah's life and worship (2 Kings 18:4). The object was believed to be the one Moses fashioned to relieve a plague in the Israelite camp during the Exodus (Num. 21:8–9). The word Nehushtan probably is a play on words in the Hebrew, the word for bronze being very similar. Nehushtan probably was a serpentine nature god worshiped in connection with the Canaanite cults. King Jehoiachin's mother was Nehushta (2 Kings 24:8) probably in honor of this foreign deity. See Bronze Serpent.

NEIEL (Nē ī′ ĕl) Name meaning, "dwelling place of God." Town assigned to Asher (Josh. 19:27). The site is probably that of khirbet Ya'nin on the eastern edge of the plain of Acco about eighteen miles southeast of that city.

NEIGH The loud, prolonged cry of a horse used as a figure of approaching battle (Jer. 8:16) or of unbridled sexual desire (Jer. 5:8; 13:27; 50:11).

NEIGHBOR A person living in the same vicinity, engaging in mutual activities, and for whom one takes some responsibility. The Bible's major concern is how we treat our neighbor.

Old Testament Leviticus 19:18 stated the OT law to love your neighbor. Most of the other references shed light on how this love could be carried out, telling what not to do to a neighbor (see Deut. 19:11–14; 27:24; Prov. 14:21; Hab. 2:15). Refusing to respect the rights of a neighbor constituted moral disintegration and provoked punishment on the nation (Isa. 3:5; Jer. 9:4–9; Mic. 7:5–6).

Leviticus 19:18 also defined neighbor. Neighbors were "the children of thy people." That is, neighbors had to come from your kind. Anyone who believed differently from you could not be your neighbor.

Jesus By Jesus' day, the rabbis had further restricted the definition of neighbor. For them a neighbor was a Jew who strictly observed the Law. Other people were hated as enemies (Matt. 5:43). Jesus sought to broaden the definition of neighbor. Neighbors included your enemies. Love meant doing good for them (Matt. 5:44). His most comprehensive definition of neighbor came in response to a lawyer's question, "Who is my neighbor?" (Luke 10:29). Jesus replied with the story of a man who had been beaten, robbed, and left to die. First, a priest went by and did nothing. Then, a Levite went by and did nothing. Finally, a foreigner (Samaritan) came and compassionately assisted the dying man, saving his life and making provisions for his immediate future (Luke 10:30–35).

Two truths are found from the parable. First, a neighbor is any person we encounter who has any need. Since every person we encounter has a need of some kind, we can understand the term to include every person we encounter. Second, we are to be a neighbor. The question is not just "Who is my neighbor?" but also, "Am I being a neighbor?" Neighboring is done as we show mercy (Luke 10:37). Loving our neighbor is second in importance only to loving God (Matt. 25:35–39) and means more than all the offerings and sacrifices we could ever give (Mark 12:33). New Testament The remainder of New Testament thought, of course, concurs with Jesus's teachings. Both Paul (Rom. 13:9–10; Gal. 5:14) and James (2:8) regard "love your neighbor" to be of utmost importance for every Christian. Gil Lain

NEKEB (Nē′ kĕb) KJV transliteration of a Hebrew term meaning tunnel, shaft, or mine (Josh. 19:33). Modern translations take Nekeb as a component of the place name Adami-nekeb. If a separate site is intended, el-Bossa is possible.

NEKODA (Nė kō′ dȧ) Personal name meaning, "speckled." 1. Family of Temple servants returning to Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50). 2. Family who returned from Exile but were unable to establish their Israelite descent (Neh. 7:62).

NEMUEL (Nĕ′ mū ĕl) 1. Ancestor of a family of Simeonites, the Nemuelites (Num. 26:12; 1 Chron. 4:24); this Nemuel is also called Jemuel (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15) 2. A Reubenite (Num. 26:9).

NEMUELITES (Nĕ′ mū ĕl ītes) See Nemuel.

NEPHEG (Nē′ phĕg) Personal name meaning, "boaster." 1. A Levite (Ex. 6:21). 2. Son born to David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

NEPHEW 1. The son of one's brother or sister. KJV never used nephew in this sense. NAS and NIV used nephew in this sense for Lot (Gen. 12:5; 14:12). 2. When KJV was translated, nephew was used in the broader sense of a lineal descendant, especially a grandson (Judg. 12:14; Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22; 1 Tim. 5:4).

NEPHILIM (Nĕph′ ī lĭm) Term probably derived from the root "to fall" and meaning either "the fallen ones" or else "ones who fall [violently] upon others." At Genesis 6:4 the term designates ancient heroes who, according to most interpreters, are the products of sexual union of heavenly beings ("sons of God"; compare Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Pss. 29:1; 82:6) and human women. The account illustrates the breakdown of the God-ordained order separating heaven and earth (Gen. 1:6–10) and specifying reproduction "each according to its kind" (1:11–12,21,24–25). God intervened to reestablish limits inherent in creation (6:3; compare 3:22–23). At Numbers 13:33 Nephilim designates a race of giants descended from Anak against whom the Israelites appeared as grasshoppers. See Sons of God; Rephaim.

NEPHISH (Nē′ phĭsh) KJV alternate form of Naphish (1 Chron. 5:19).

NEPHISHESIM (Nė phĭsh′ ē sĭm) See Nephisim.

NEPHISIM (Nĕ phī′ sĭm) Family of Temple servants who returned from Exile (Ezra 2:50), probably identical with the Nephushesim (Nephishesim, KJV) of Nehemiah 7:52.

NEPHTHALIM (Nĕph′ thȧ lĭm) Greek form of Naphtali used by the KJV (Matt. 4:13,15; Rev. 7:6).

NEPHTOAH (Nĕph tō′ ah) Name meaning, "opening," found only in the phrase "Waters of Nephtoah." Boundary marker for Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). The site was formerly identified with Atam south of Bethlehem. The most frequent identification is now Lifta about three miles northwest of Jerusalem.

NEPHUSHESIM (Nĕ phü′ shė sĭm) See Nephisim.

NER (Nĕr) Personal name meaning, "light." Father of Saul's general Abner and grandfather of Saul (1 Sam. 14:51; 26:5,14; 2 Sam. 2:8; 1 Chron. 9:36).

NEREUS (Nē′ rēus) Personal name borrowed from Greek mythology where Nereus is the sea god who fathers the Nereids (sea nymphs). The New Testament Nereus was a Roman Christian, possibly the son of Philogus and Julia (Rom. 16:15).

NERGAL (Nĕr′ găl) Name, perhaps a form of "Ne-uru-gal" (Lord of the great city), of the Mesopotamian god of the underworld whose cult was centered in the ancient city of Cuth (Cuthah, modern tell Ibrahim). Following the fall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, the Assyrians resettled Samaria with Mesopotamian peoples who brought their gods, including Nergal, with them (2 Kings 17:30). The name is also an element in the name of the Babylonian official Nergal-sharezar (Jer. 39:3,13). See Assyria.

NERGAL-SHAREZER (Nĕr′ găl-shȧ rē′ zĕr) A personal name meaning, "Nergal, protect the king." Probably a different spelling of the name

"Neriglissar." He is mentioned as being among the officers of Nebuchadnezzar's court who helped destroy Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer. 39:3,13). He was a son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar who usurped the Babylonian throne following the death of Evil-merodach. Nergal-sharezer quite possibly had something to do with the rebellion and the king's death. From the Babylonian Chronicle it is known that Nergal-sharezer mounted a military campaign across the Taurus Mountains to fight the Medes. He succeeded at first but was met with a bitter defeat later and soon died, perhaps at the hands of those who placed Nabonidus on the throne. See Babylon, History and Religion of.

NERI (Nē′ rī) Personal name meaning, "lamp." An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:27).

NERIAH (Nė rī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is light." Father of two men who assisted Jeremiah: Baruch the scribe (Jer. 32:12; 36:4–19) and Seraiah the quartermaster (Jer. 51:59).

NERO (Nē′ rō) Personal name meaning, "brave." Roman emperor A.D. 54–68.

Nero became emperor in A.D. 57 at the age of thirteen. He succeeded his stepfather, Claudius, who was probably murdered at the behest of Agrippina, Nero's mother.

For the first years of his reign, Nero was content to be dominated by his mother and his two mentors, Burrus and Seneca. The latter was a leading Stoic philosopher who was able, for a time, to moderate Nero's more excessive tendencies.

As he grew older, Nero threw off these moderating influences and took control. To remove opposition, he probably was involved in the death of his half brother, Britannicus, and he had his mother murdered.

Nero was a complex personality. He could be extremely cruel, and his life was marked with debauchery and excess. Yet he was also a poet, an actor, a musician, and an athlete. He attempted to turn the crowds of Rome away from the brutal gladitorial contests to an appreciation of the Greek-style Olympic games and other forms of cultural competition.

During Nero's rule the Great Fire broke out in Rome (A.D. 64). Much of the city was destroyed including Nero's palace. The story, probably true in part, goes that Nero fiddled while Rome burned.

Nero took measures to provide relief for those affected by the fire. Still he could not dispell the rumor that he had the fire set. People knew that he planned to build a much larger palace for himself and they reasoned that he used the fire to clear off the land. Nero felt the need to divert suspicion to another group. He selected the Christians as his scapegoats. He claimed that they had set the fire. A systematic persecution of the Christians followed. Because of his life-style and the persecution, many Christians viewed him as the antichrist.

Nero neglected the army. This proved to be his downfall. He lost the loyalty of large segments of the army. Finally, several frontier armies revolted. Nero's support at home melted away. Realizing that the end was inevitable and near, he committed suicide by stabbing himself in A.D. 68. See Rome.

NEST Hollow container fashioned by a bird to contain its eggs and young. Nest is often used as a simile or metaphor for a human dwelling (Num. 24:21; Job 29:18; Hab. 2:9; Prov. 27:8). The term translated "nest" (Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58) suggests a leafy "tent" rather than a nest.

NET 1. Loosely woven mesh of twine or cord used for catching birds, fish, or other prey. a. Fishing nets were of two basic types. The first was a cone-shaped net with leads around its wide mouth used for hand casting (Matt. 4:18–21; Mark 1:16–19). The second was the seine net, a large draw with floats at its head and lead sinkers at its foot. Such a net was often hauled ashore to empty (Isa. 19:8; Ezek. 26:5,14; 32:3; 47:10; Matt. 13:47). In the majority of Old Testament cases the seine net is a figure for judgment at the hands of ruthless military forces. b. Fowling nets frequently had hinged mouths which could clamp shut when sprung (Prov. 1:17; Hos. 7:11–12). c. Nets of unspecified type are frequently used as figures of the Lord's chastisement (Job 19:6; Ps. 66:11; Lam. 1:13; Ezek. 12:13) or of the plots of the wicked (Pss. 9:15; 31:4; 35:7–8). 2. Netting or network refers to grillwork used as part of the ornament of the altar of burnt offering (Ex. 27:4–5; 38:4) and of the capitals of the Temple columns (1 Kings 7:17–20). The grillwork of the altar perhaps functioned as a vent.

NETAIM (Nė tā′ īm) Name meaning, "plantings." Site of a royal pottery works (1 Chron. 4:23). The site has not been identified.

NETHANEEL (Nė thăn′ ė ĕl) Personal name meaning, "given by God." 1. Leader of the tribe Issachar and a son of Zuar (Num. 1:8). He commanded an army of 54,400 men (2:5–6).

2. The fourth son of Jesse and brother of King David (1 Chron. 2:14).

3. One of several priests to blow the trumpet before the ark of God (1 Chron. 15:24).

4. Prince of Judah whom King Jehoshaphat sent out with others to teach the law of God in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7–9).

5. A Levite and father of Shemaiah who recorded the names and order of the people who would minister in the Temple (1 Chron. 24:6).

6. The fifth son of Obed-edom who was a gatekeeper in the Temple (1 Chron. 26:4).

7. A Levite who contributed to the Passover offering when Josiah was king (2 Chron. 35:9).

8. A priest and son of Pashur who had married a foreign wife while exiled in Babylon (Ezra 10:22). He might have participated in the dedication of the wall around Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

9. Head of the priestly family of Jedaiah when Joiakim was high priest (Neh. 12:21).

10. A priest, one of Asaph's associates, who played a trumpet, in dedicating the rebuilding of Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 12:36). Some identify him with 8.

NETHANEL (Nė thăn' ĕl) Form of Nethaneel modern translations prefer.

NETHANIAH (Nĕth ā nī' ah) Personal name meaning, "given of Yah." 1. Son of Asaph who served in a company of prophets established by David. They issued their message with harps, psalteries, and cymbals (1 Chron. 25:1–2). 2. Levite sent along with Jehoshaphat's princes to teach from the book of the law of God in all the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7–9).

3. Father of Jehudi sent to Baruch by the princes of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14).

4. Father of Ishmael who killed Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23–25; Jer. 40:8,14–16;41).

NETHINIM (Nĕth' ĭ nĭm) Name meaning, "those given (to the priests and Levites)," which Ezra and Nehemiah apply to persons of foreign extraction who performed menial tasks in the Temple. Moses assigned Midianite prisoners of war to the priests (32 servants; Num. 31:28,40) and the Levites (320 servants; Num. 31:30,47). Joshua forced the Gibeonites to serve as woodcutters and water bearers for the sanctuary (Josh. 9:27). The servants which David gave to the Levites were also likely war prisoners (Ezra 8:20).

Representatives of the Nethinim returned from Exile with Zerubbabel in 538 B.C. (Ezra 2:43–54; Neh. 7:46–56). The lists of returnees contain many foreign names suggesting their origin as prisoners of war. Despite their foreign origin, the Nethinim appear to be accepted as part of the people of Israel. They were prohibited from mixed marriages with the people of the land (Neh. 10:28–30) and shared in the responsibility for repair of the Jerusalem city walls (Neh. 3:26; contrast Ezra 4:1–3). The Nethinim resided in the Ophel district of Jerusalem, likely near the water gate (Neh. 3:26), a site conducive with their task as water bearers.

NETOPHAH (Nė tō' phah) Name meaning, "dropping." A village and surrounding district in the hill country of Judah (2 Sam. 23:28,29; 1 Chron. 11:30; 27:13; Neh. 7:26). Netophah is frequently associated with Bethlehem, suggesting a site near that town. The inference finds added support in the inclusion of two Netophites in David's elite circle of warriors. The site is most likely khirbet Bedd Faluh about three and a half miles southeast of Bethlehem. The nearby spring, 'Ain en-Natuf, preserves the name.

NETOPHATHITES (Nė tŏph' ă thītes) Residents of Netophah (1 Chron. 9:16; Neh. 12:27–28).

NETTLE Coarse plants with stinging hairs belonging to the family Urtica; generally, any prickly or stinging plant (Job 30:7; Prov. 24:31; Isa. 34:13; Hos. 9:6; Zeph. 2:9). NIV frequently replaced nettles with undergrowth, weeds, or briers. The Hebrew term used at Job 30:7 and Zephaniah 2:9 perhaps refers to wild mustard. Nettles are used as a sign of desolation and judgment.

NEW Different from one of the same which existed before; made fresh. Scripture expresses God's concern for persons and the larger creation in the broad categories of a new act and a new relationship.

God's New Act Scripture often calls to mind past acts such as the creation and Exodus which reveal God's care for God's world and people. Though rooted in God's acts in history, biblical faith does not relegate God to the distant past. Time and again, writers of Scripture called God's people to anticipate God's new intervention in their lives. Isaiah 43:14–21 promised Babylonian exiles that God was now "doing a new thing" which paralleled God's acts saving Israel from Egyptian slavery. God again acted in a new way in Jesus Christ who offered a new teaching with authority (Mark 1:27) and whose ministry could be compared to new wine bursting old expectations of God's involvement in human salvation (Mark 2:22).

New Relationships God acted in the past to establish relationships, notably with the descendants of Abraham and the people of Israel at Sinai. Jeremiah anticipated God's establishing a new covenant with God's all-too-often faithless people, a covenant in which God would make knowledge of the law a matter of the heart (Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 8:8–13). Luke 22:20 points to Christ's sacrificial death as the basis for this new covenant. In Christ the believer experiences newness of life (Rom. 6:4; 2 Cor. 5:17). This renewed life is characterized by new relationships with God and others (Eph. 2:15–16; Col. 3:10–11). See New Birth.

NEW AGE A time when God acts decisively in judgment and salvation. The term new age does not occur in Scripture. Parallel expressions, such as the age to come, the close of the age, are common. Many biblical writers conceived of history in two periods, the present and a future time when God's salvation and judgment would be manifest. The age to come is associated with the experience of eternal life (Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30), the resurrection of the dead (Luke 20:35) and the immeasurable riches of God's gracious kindness (Eph. 2:7). The close of the age is associated with final judgment and reward (Matt. 13:39,40,49) and with the coming of Christ (Matt. 24:3). The preceding references point to a new age in God's future. Another group of New Testament texts focuses on the present reality of God's new age. According to Hebrews 9:26, Christ brought about the end of the age of sin through His sacrificial death. Paul spoke of his generation of Christians as those on whom the end of the ages has already come (1 Cor. 10:11). A biblical view of the new age must incorporate both strands. See Eschatology.

NEW BIRTH A term evangelicals use to describe the unique spiritual experience of beginning a changed life in Christ. The origins of the term lie in John 3:3, "Except a man be born again"; John 3:6, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit"; John 3:7, "Ye must be born again"; and 1 Peter 1:23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." New birth, like the earlier physical birth, is an initiation to a new experience of life. The new birth comes from hearing the word of God (Jas. 1:21; 1 Pet. 1:23). It is not a human accomplishment but an act of God (John 1:13; Eph. 2:8; Jas. 1:18). Individuals, however, cooperate with God's saving work through their repentance (break with a life of sin, Luke 13:3) and their commitment of life to Christ (John 1:12; 3:16). New birth makes one God's child forever. Rededication and renewal may come often in one's lifetime, but the new birth never reoccurs. See Regeneration; Salvation. James L. Sullivan

NEW GATE A gate of the Jerusalem Temple (Jer. 26:10; 36:10), which should perhaps be identified with the Upper Gate Jothan built (2 Kings 15:35) and/or with the Upper Benjamin Gate (Jer. 20:2).

NEW MOON See Calendars in the Biblical Period; Festivals.

NEW TESTAMENT The second major division of the Christian Bible with twenty-seven separate works (called "books") attributed to at least eight different writers. Four accounts of Jesus' life are at the core. The first three Gospels (called "Synoptic") are very similar in content and order. The fourth Gospel has a completely different perspective.

A history of selected events in the early church (Acts) is followed by twenty letters to churches and individuals and one apocalypse. The letters deal mainly with the interpretation of God's act of salvation in Jesus Christ. Matters of discipline, proper Christian behavior, and church polity also are included. The apocalypse is a coded message of hope to the church of the first century which has been reinterpreted by each succeeding generation of Christians for their own situations.

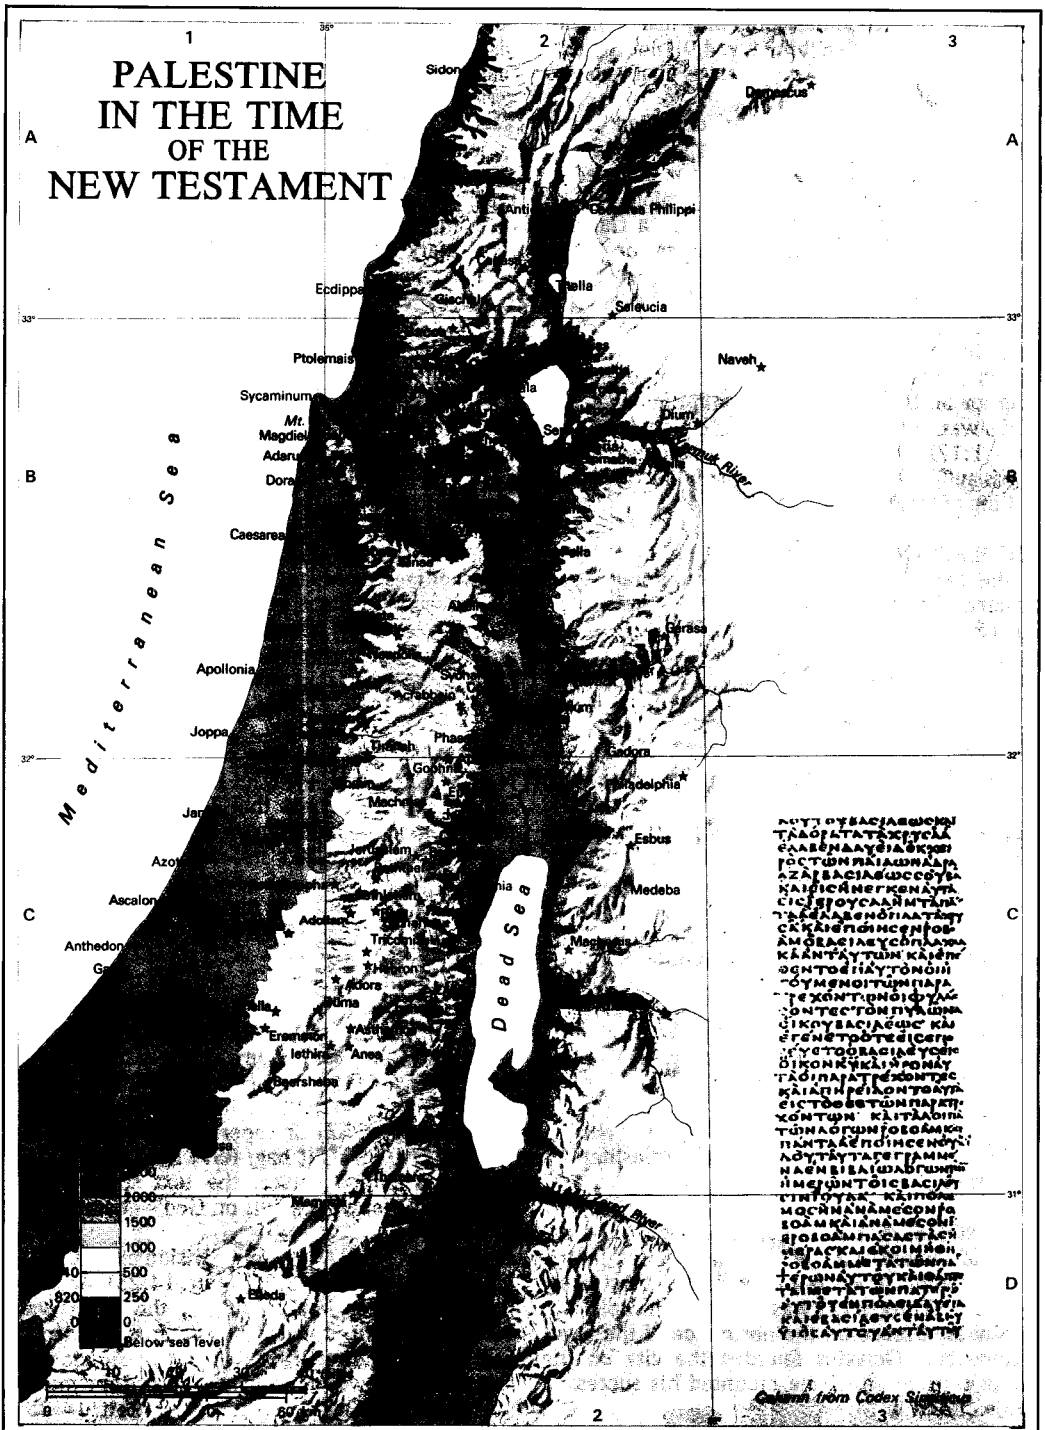
NEZIAH (Nė zī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "faithful" or "illustrious." Head of a family of Temple servants (Nethinim) who returned from Exile (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).



NEZIB (Nē zīb) Name meaning, "garrison," "idol," "pillar," or "standing place." Village in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:43). Site is identified with Beit Nesib east of Lachish about two miles from khirbet Qila (Keilah).

NIBHAZ (Nīb′ hăz) Deity worshiped by the residents of Avva whom the Assyrians used to resettle the area about Samaria after the fall of that city in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:31). The deity is otherwise unknown. The name is perhaps a deliberate corruption of the term for altar (Mizbeah) which had possibly become an object of worship.

NIBSAN (Nīb′ săn) Name meaning, "prophesy." Town assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:62). Location of the site is uncertain, though its position in the list suggests a locale on the shore of the Dead Sea.

NICANOR (Nī cā′ nôr) Personal name meaning, "conqueror." One of seven Hellenists "full of the Spirit and wisdom" chosen to administer food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5).

NICODEMUS (Nī co dē′ mŭs) Personal name meaning, "conqueror of the people." John identifies Nicodemus as a Pharisee, "a ruler of the Jews" (John 3:1), that is, a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council, and as "a teacher of Israel" (John 3:10), that is, an authority on the interpretation of the Hebrew scriptures. Nicodemus' coming at night suggests his timidity and his trek from the darkness of his own sin and ignorance to the light of Jesus (John 3:2). Nicodemus greeted Jesus with a title of respect, "Rabbi" (teacher), recognizing Him as a God-sent teacher whose signs bore witness to the presence of God (John 3:2). Jesus replied that Nicodemus could never see the kingdom of God without being "born again" (v. 3) or "born of water and of the Spirit" (v. 5). Nicodemus could only marvel at the impossibility of such a thing (vv. 4,9), but the text does not indicate whether Jesus was finally able to make it clear to him.

True to his name, Nicodemus defended Christ before his peers (John 7:51) who were unaware that one of their number might have believed in Him (v. 48). Their response is a twofold rebuke which may be paraphrased "Are you a Galilean peasant?" and "Are you ignorant of the Scriptures?" (v. 52).

The reference to Nicodemus' initial coming at night highlights his later public participation in Jesus' burial (John 19:39–41). Nicodemus' contribution was enough aloes and spices to prepare a king for burial, and so he did. On one level, the burial was a simple act of Pharisaic piety (compare Tobit 1:17). On a deeper level, it recognized that in His suffering and death, Christ fulfilled His role as King of the Jews.

NICOLAITANS (Nīc ō lā′ itans) Heretical group in the early church who taught immorality and idolatry. They are condemned in Revelation 2:6,15 for their practices in Ephesus and Pergamon. Thyatira apparently had resisted the false prophecy they preached (Rev. 2:20–25). The Nicolaitans have been linked to the type of heresy taught by Balaam (Num. 25:1–2; 2 Pet. 2:15), especially the pagan feasts and orgies that they apparently propagated in the first-century church.

NICOLAS (Nī′ cō lăs) Personal name meaning, "conqueror of people." One of seven Hellenists "full of the Spirit and wisdom" chosen to administer food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5). Nicolas was a proselyte, that is, a Gentile convert to Judaism, from Antioch. Some Church Fathers connect Nicolas with the heretical sect of the Nicolaitans (Rev. 2:6,15). The name, however, is common, and there is no other reason to associate this Nicolas with a sect active in Asia Minor.

NICOLAUS (Nī′ cō lā us) NRSV form of Nicolas (Acts 6:5), which more accurately transliterates the Greek Nikolaus.

NICOPOLIS (Nī cŏp′ ō lĭs) Place name meaning, "city of victory," shared by many cities in the ancient world. The site in which Paul most likely wintered (Titus 3:12) was Nicopolis in Epirus in northwest Greece on the north side of the Sinus Ambracicus. Octavius founded the city on the campsite from which he mounted his successful battle of Actium.

NIGER (Nī′ ġēr) Latin nickname meaning, "black." Surname of Simeon (KJV, Symeon), one of the teacher-prophets of the early church at Antioch. Blacks were a common sight among the populations of Egypt and north Africa in the Hellenistic period. Simeon's Latin nickname suggests that he originated from the Roman province of Africa, to the west of Cyrenica. His inclusion in Acts 13:1 demonstrates the multiracial and multinational leadership of the church at Antioch. Their concern for missions was likely rooted in their own ethnic diversity. Some have conjectured that Simeon Niger was identical to Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21). Acts 13:1, however, only designates Lucius as a resident of Cyrene.

NIGHT Period of darkness between sunset and dawn. Night occurs often in the simple temporal sense. Night forms part of God's ordering of time (Gen. 1:5,14; 8:22). Night is frequently a time of encounter with God, either through dreams or visions (Gen. 20:3; 31:24; 46:2; 1 Kings 3:5; Job 33:15; Dan. 2:19; 7:2,7,13; Acts 16:9; 18:9), appearances (Gen. 26:24; Num. 22:20; 1 Chron. 17:3; 2 Chron. 1:7; 7:12; Acts 23:11; 27:23), or by speech (Judg. 6:25; 7:9; 1 Sam. 15:16). Night is sometimes associated with danger (Ps. 91:5). The absence of night in the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. 21:25; 22:5) points to the security of believers and the constant presence of God there. Night can also be associated with God's acts of deliverance (Deut. 16:1; 2 Kings 19:35; Job 34:25).

NIGHT MARCH Breaking camp and traveling at night. The term is not used in Scripture, though Exodus 13:21 records that Israel followed the pillar of fire at night (compare Num. 9:21). Advantages of night marches include cooler temperatures and avoidance of enemies. Troops were sometimes positioned at night for an ambush or attack (Josh. 8:3; 10:9; Judg. 9:32; 1 Sam. 14:36).

NIGHT MONSTER KJV translation of the Hebrew term Lilith (Isa. 34:14 NRSV). The term occurs only here in Scripture unless textual emendations are accepted (Job 18:15; Isa. 2:18). Interpreters divide over the natural (night creatures, NIV; nightjar, REB) or supernatural (night monster, KJV, NAS; night hag, RSV) nature of Lilith. Whatever Lilith's nature, the text stresses the great desolation which falls on God's enemies.

NIGHT WATCH An ancient division of time (Pss. 90:4; 119:148; Lam. 2:19; Matt. 14:25). According to the later Jewish system, the night was divided into three watches (evening, midnight, and morning). The Greco-Roman system added a fourth (cockcrowing) between midnight and morning (Mark 13:35). The fourth watch (Matt. 14:25; Mark 6:48) designates the time just before dawn.

NIGHTHAWK Unclean bird whose identity is uncertain (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15 KJV, NRSV).

Other translations identify the bird with a type of owl (NAS, NIV, REB). See Birds.

NILE RIVER (Nīle) The major river considered the "life" of ancient Egypt. The Hebrew word usually used for the Nile in the Old Testament is y' 'or. This is in fact borrowed from the Egyptian word itrw or itr by which the Egyptians referred to the Nile and the branches and canals that led from it.

The Egyptian Nile is formed by the union of the White Nile which flows out of Lake Victoria in Tanzania and the Blue Nile from Lake Tana in Ethiopia. These join at Khartum in the Sudan and are later fed by the Atbara. Thereafter the Nile flows, 1675 miles northward to the Mediterranean Sea without any further tributary. In antiquity six cataracts or falls prevented navigation at various points. The first of these, going upstream, is found at Aswan, generally recognised as the southern boundary of Egypt. From Aswan northwards, the Nile flows between two lines of cliffs which sometimes come directly down to its edge but in other places are up to nine miles away. The shore land could be cultivated as far as Nile water could be brought. This cultivated area the Egyptians called the Black Land from the color of the rich soil. Beyond lay the Red Land of the low desert stretching to the foot of the cliffs. At the cliff tops was the great inhospitable desert where few Egyptians ventured.

Below the modern capital, Cairo, and the nearby ancient capital, Memphis, the Nile forms a huge delta. The many ancient cities in this area now lie below the water table. Little archaeological excavation has been done here, though this is the area where the closest links with Palestine are likely to have been located. The eastern edge of the Delta is the site of the land of Goshen where Jacob/Israel and his descendents were settled. See Goshen.

The Nile is the basis of Egypt's wealth, indeed of its very life. It is the only river to flow northwards across the Sahara. Egypt was unique as an agricultural community in not being dependent on rainfall. The secret was the black silt deposited on the fields by the annual flood caused when the Blue Nile was swollen by the run-off from the winter rains in Ethiopia. This silt was remarkably fertile. Irrigation waters raised laboriously from the river, let the Egyptians produce many varieties of crops in large quantities (Num 11:5; Gen 42:1–2). If the winter rains failed, the consequent small or nonexistent inundation resulted in disastrous famine: some are recorded as lasting over a number of years (compare Gen. 41).

Even today water is brought to the individual fields by small channels leading off the arterial ditches. These channels are closed off by earth dams which can be broken down with the foot when it is a particular farmer's turn to use the water. (See Deut. 11:10.) Since life was concentrated in the valley, the river was also a natural highway. All major journeys in Egypt were undertaken by boat helped by the current when traveling north or by the prevailing wind when headed south. The first of the ten plagues is often linked with conditions in the river at the peak of the flood season in August when large numbers of tiny organisms turn the water red and could make it foul and undrinkable. It would also kill off the fish which would decompose and infect the frogs (the second plague) leading to successive plagues of lice, flies, and pestilences. God may have used such natural conditions with His timing to plague Egypt. See Egypt; Plagues. John Ruffle

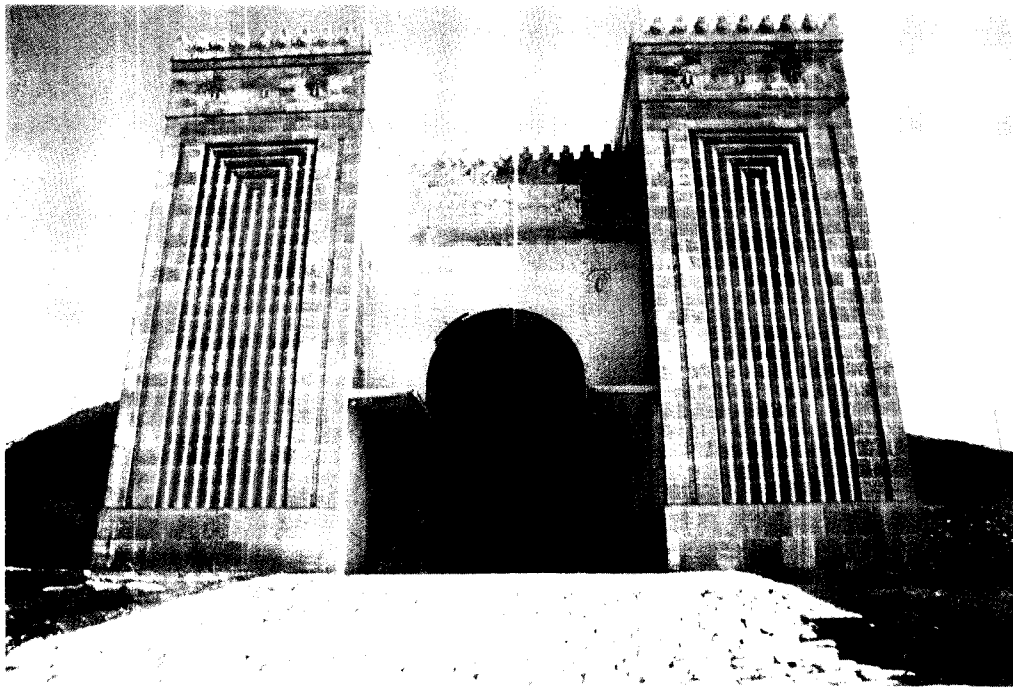
NIMRAH (Nĭm′ rah) Place name meaning, "clear (water)." Alternate form of Beth-Nimrah (Num. 32:36) used at Numbers 32:3.

NIMRIM (Nĭm′ rĭm) Place name meaning, "leopards" or "basins of clear waters." The name occurs in the phrase "Waters of Nimrim" (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34), the stream upon which Moab's agricultural productivity depended. The stream is either the wadi en-Numeirah which flows east into the Dead Sea about eight miles north of its lower end or the wadi Nimrin which flows east into the Jordan eight miles north of its mouth.

NIMROD (Nĭm′ rŏd) Personal name meaning, "we shall rebel." Son of Cush or Ethiopia (Gen. 10:8–10; 1 Chron. 1:10). A hunter and builder of the kingdom of Babel who some Bible students have linked to Tukulti-Ninurta, an Assyrian king (about 1246–1206 B.C.). The bible does not give sufficient information to connect him with any other known figure of history. Others think that Amenophis III of Egypt (about 1411–1375 B.C.) or the heroic Gilgamesh might have been the ancient Nimrod. Regardless, extremely popular legends involve Nimrod as a ruler in both Assyrian and Egyptian lore. The prophet Micah called Assyria "the land of Nimrod" (5:6). Nimrod shows that the great Mesopotamian culture had its origin from the creative work of the God of Israel.



NIMSHI (Nĭm′ shī) Personal name meaning, "weasel." Grandfather of Jehu (2 Kings 9:2,14). Elsewhere, Jehu is called the son of Nimshi (1 Kings 19:16; 2 Kings 9:20; 2 Chron. 22:7). Either son is used loosely in the sense of descendant, or a variant tradition is involved.

NINEVE (Nĭn′ ĕ vĕ) KJV alternate form of Nineveh (Luke 11:32).

NINEVEH (Nĭn′ ĕ vĕh) The greatest of the capitals of the ancient Assyrian Empire, which flourished from about 800 to 612 B.C. It was located on the left bank of the Tigris River in northeastern Mesopotamia (Iraq today). Its remains are represented by two mounds named Quyundjiq "Many Sheep" and Nebi Yunus "The Prophet Jonah."

Biblical References Nineveh is first mentioned in the Old Testament as one of the cities established by Nimrod (Gen. 10:9–12). It was the enemy city to which God called the reluctant prophet Jonah in the 8th century B.C. The Book of Jonah calls it "that great city" (1:2; 4:11), and "an exceeding great city" (3:3). The additional phrase "of three days' journey" (3:3) has been rendered by the NIV: "a visit required three days." The phrase could be an idiom which would refer to the first day for travel to, the second for visiting, and the third day for the return from a site. The phrase "more than a hundred and twenty thousand people who cannot tell their right hand from their left" (4:11) has sometimes been taken to refer to children, which would yield a population of 600,000. The area within the city walls, however, would not have contained more than 175,000.

The final biblical references are from Nahum, who prophesied the overthrow of the "bloody city" by the attack of the allied Medes and Chaldeans in 612 B.C. By 500 B.C. the prophet's words (Nah. 3:7) "Nineveh is laid waste" were echoed by the Greek historian Herodotus who spoke of the Tigris as "the river on which the town of Nineveh formerly stood."

Excavations A Muslim village and cemetery have occupied the site of Nebi Yunus, preventing excavations there. The tell of Quyundjiq which rises 90 feet above the plain has attracted excavators after it was first accurately sketched by C. J. Rich in 1820.

In 1842 Paul Emile Botta, the French consul at the nearby city of Mosul, became the first excavator of the Near East, when he began digging at Quyundjiq. In 1845 the Englishman, A. H. Layard, dug briefly at Quyundjiq for a month. Both moved to other sites they mistakenly believed to be Nineveh. Layard later returned in 1849 to Quyundjiq and discovered Sennacherib's palace there.

Hormuz Rassam, a native of Mosul assisted Layard and then worked at the site of Quyundjiq 1852–54 and 1878–82. He found Ashurbanipal's palace and library in 1853. George Smith, who had deciphered the Babylonian flood story in the Gilgamesh Epic in 1872, was sent to the site by The Daily Telegraph. In 1873 he found a tablet which contained 17 further lines of the flood story. Iraqi scholars made some soundings in 1954 at Nebi Yunus which confirmed Layard's guess that Esarhaddon's palace lay here.

Palaces Sennacherib (704–681 B.C.) built the enormous southwest palace at Quyundjiq. We observe on his reliefs captive Philistines, Tyrians, Aramaeans, and others working under the supervision of the king himself. His "palace which has no equals" covered five acres and had 71 rooms, including two large halls 180 feet long and 40 feet wide. He boasted that the materials for the palace included "fragrant cedars, cypresses, doors banded with silver and copper . . . painted brick, . . . curtain pegs of silver and copper, alabaster, breccia, marble, ivory." The rooms were embellished with 9,880 feet of sculptured reliefs, depicting Assyrian victories over enemy cities, including the Judean city of Lachish, captured in 701 B.C. Sennacherib's city was enclosed by eight miles of walls with fifteen gates. It had gardens and parks, watered by a thirty-mile long aqueduct.

Ashurbanipal (669–28 B.C.), the last great Assyrian king, built the northern palace with its magnificent reliefs of royal lion hunts. He amassed a library of 20,000 tablets, which contained important literary epics, magical and omen collections, royal archives and letters. See Assyria.

NINEVITES (Nĭn′ ē vītes) Residents of the Assyrian capital Nineveh (Luke 11:30,32). The Ninevites served as an example of Gentiles who repented and were accepted by God (compare Jonah 3; Luke 4:26–27; 7:9; 11:31; 17:15–18). See Assyria.

NIPPUR (Nĭp pŭr′) City located in Mesopotamia, approximately fifty miles southeast of the ancient city of Babylon and approximately one hundred miles south of modern Baghdad, Iraq. Although it is never mentioned in the Bible, its history is important in the larger context of the biblical world. It is believed to have been the center of one of the first true civilizations, that of Sumer.

The city was founded approximately 4000 B.C. by a primitive group called the "Ubaidians." Nippur was for more than two thousand years the undisputed cultural and religious center, although it never was used as the capital city for any kingdom.

Nippur was a flourishing center of industry and scribal education. Documents discovered in the area describe a variety of commercial enterprises. Some of the tablets, dating back to 2500 B.C. and earlier, were found, as were records of a much later time. One of the most important later discoveries appeared in the ruins of a business house. The records, known as the Murashu documents after the banking family responsible for them, give some indication of the extent of Jewish involvement in the business world after the time of the Babylonian Exile. Scribal education concerned the use of one of the earliest forms of writing called cuneiform. See Cuneiform. Also part of education was an emphasis on mathematics.

Nippur was most important, however, for its religion. Various gods controlled every aspect of life. The chief deity was En-lil, also occasionally called Bel ("the lord"). He was thought of as god of the terrestrial world and the father of other gods. His significance made his home, Nippur, the place where people from peasants to kings came to offer gifts.

According to tradition, kingly authority descended from heaven after the flood. The several cities in the area, except for Nippur, took turns as the seat of government and often waged war against each other for political supremacy. The undisputed source of this supremacy, however, was En-lil, the principal deity. His authority was transmitted to the human kings through the priesthood of his temple, the Ekur ("mountain house"), the leading shrine in the area.

Nippur's influence and prominence began to wane with the rise of Babylonian power. By the time of Hammurabi, 1792–1750 B.C., Nippur had been replaced by Babylon as the religious and cultural center. It did, however, continue to be an influential city down about 250 B.C.

NISAN (Nī′ săn) A foreign term used after the Exile for the first month of the Hebrew calendar (Neh. 2:1; Esth. 3:7). This month which falls within March and April was formerly called Abib. See Calendars.

NISROCH (Nīs′ rŏch) God worshiped by the Assyrian king Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). No god of this name is otherwise known. The name is perhaps a (deliberate?) corruption of the name Marduk, Nusku (the fire-god), or Ashur (compare early Greek readings Esdrach and Asorach).

NITER (Nī′ tēr) KJV term for lye (Prov. 25:20; Jer. 2:22).

NO, NO-AMON (Nō, Nō-ā′ mŏn) Ancient name for Egyptian city of Thebes (modern Luxor). Inherent in its name is its reputation. No is a word for the best of cities and Amon the name of the Egyptian god, Amun-Re. Jeremiah (46:25), Ezekiel (30:14,15,16), and Nahum (3:8) were well aware of its prominence. To attack this capital city was to strike at the heart and spirit of Egypt.

Although Thebes existed before the Middle Kingdom (about 2040–1750 B.C.), it was not particularly noteworthy. In the New Kingdom (about 1550–1070 B.C.) Thebes became the worship and cultural center of Egypt. Pharaoh after pharaoh added to the magnificent temples of Karnak and its "queen" just to the south, Luxor. These two edifices dominated the east side of the Nile while the funerary temples, and the valleys of the kings (Biban el-Moluk) and queens occupied the west side. Deir el-Bahri (Hatshepsut), the Memnon Colossi (Amenhotep III), the Ramasseum (Rameses II), and Medinet Habu (Rameses III) are just a few sites still witnessing to the past glory of Thebes. As Nahum indicated, Thebes was not invincible. In 661 B.C. Ashurbanipal (of Assyria) sacked the sacred site. Mortally wounded, the city never fully recovered. See Egypt. Gary C. Huckabay

NOADIAH (Nō ă dī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah has met." 1. Levite who returned from Exile and served as a Temple treasurer (Ezra 8:33). 2. Prophetess who discouraged Nehemiah's building of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 6:14).

NOAH (Nō ah) A personal name of uncertain meaning, related to "rest."

Old Testament 1. The son of Lamech, a descendant of Adam in the line of Seth, and a survivor of the flood. A good and righteous man, Noah was the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth who were born when he was 500 years old. God warned Noah that He was going to wipe mankind from the face of the earth. Because Noah walked with God and stood blameless among the people of that time, God gave him specific instructions for building the ark by which Noah and his family would survive the coming flood. Noah followed the building instructions down to every detail. Then a week before the flood (Gen. 7:4), Noah led his family and all of the animals into the ark just as God directed. After seven days, the rain began and lasted for 40 days. As he sought to know whether it was safe to leave the ark, he sent out first a raven and then a dove. When the dove returned with an olive leaf, Noah knew the water had receded.

Once out of the ark, Noah built an altar and sacrificed clean animals as burnt offerings on the altar. Then the Lord promised never again to destroy living creatures as He had done in the flood and established a covenant with Noah and his sons and sealed that covenant with a rainbow. See Covenant.

The sinful nature of humanity is one thing that remained preserved on the ark. Once on dry ground, Noah planted a vineyard, drank of its wine, became drunk, and exposed himself in his tent. Ham informed Shem and Japheth about their father's nakedness. The latter two showed respect for their father and covered him. As a result, they received rich blessings for their descendants from Noah. Ham in turn received a curse for his descendant: Canaan. Noah lived another 350 years after the flood and died at the age of 950 years.

New Testament Hebrews 11:7 affirms Noah's actions of faith in building the ark. The references to Noah in 1 Peter 3:20 and 2 Peter 2:5 speak of Noah and those of his family who were saved in the flood. See Flood.

2. One of Zelophehad's five daughters (Num. 26:33). Of the tribe of Manasseh, these daughters received an inheritance in the land in their father's name even though he was dead with no male offspring (27:1–11). This was most unusual in that time. Judith Wooldridge

NOB (Nŏb) City in Benjamin likely situated between Anathoth and Jerusalem (Neh. 11:31–32; Isa. 10:32). Following the destruction of the Shiloh sanctuary in about 1,000 B.C. (Jer. 7:14), the priesthood relocated to Nob. Because the priest Ahimelech gave aid to the fugitive David (1 Sam. 21:1–9), Saul exterminated 85 of the priests of Nob (1 Sam. 22:9–23). Only Abiathar escaped. The site of Nob was perhaps on Mount Scopas about one mile northeast of ancient Jerusalem, on the hill Qu'meh one mile further north, or Ras el-Mesharif about one mile north of Jerusalem. See Ahimelech.

NOBAH (Nō′ bah) Personal name meaning, "barking" or "howling." 1. Leader of the tribe of Manasseh who conquered Kenath in Gilead (Num. 32:42). 2. Town in Gilead, formerly Kenath (Num. 32:42). Site is perhaps identical with Kanawat about 60 miles east of the Sea of Galilee. 3. A town in Gilead (Judg. 8:10–11) to the east of Succoth and Penuel and west of the king's highway (KJV, "The way of them that dwell in tents"; NRSV, "caravan route").

NOD (Nŏd) Place name meaning, "wandering." After murdering his brother Abel, Cain was condemned to be "a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth" (Gen. 4:12,14; NRSV). Nod is located "away from the presence of the Lord" and "east of Eden" (Gen. 4:16). The text is not so much interested in fixing the physical location of Nod as in emphasizing the "lostness" of the wanderer Cain.

NODAB (Nō′ dab) Name meaning, "nobility." Tribe conquered by Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:18). The name is preserved by Nudebe in Hauran. The association of Nodab with Jetur and Naphish suggests its identification with Kedemah (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31).

NOE (No′ e) KJV New Testament form of Noah.

NOGAH (Nō′ gāh) Personal name meaning, "brilliance" or "luster." Son born to David in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6). The omission of the name in the parallel list (2 Sam. 5:15) has suggested that the name results from dittography or copying twice of the following name, Nepheg.

NOHAH (Nō′ hăh) Personal name meaning, "quiet." Son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:2). The name is omitted from the parallel list (Gen. 46:21).

NON (Nŏn) KJV alternate form of the personal name Nun (1 Chron. 7:27).

NOON The middle of the day, specifically twelve o'clock noon. Noon is frequently associated with death and destruction (2 Sam. 4:5; 1 Kings 20:16; 2 Kings 4:20; Ps. 91:6; Jer. 6:4; 15:8; 20:16; Zeph. 2:4). Noon is also associated with blessings and vindication (Job 11:17; Ps. 37:6; Isa. 58:10).

NOOSE A loop of rope used as a trap (Job 18:10 NAS, NIV; Prov. 7:22 NIV). See Fowler; Hunting.

NOPH (Nŏph) Variant form of Moph, the Hebrew term for Memphis (Isa. 19:13; Jer. 2:16; 44:1; 46:14,19; Ezek. 30:13,16). See Memphis.

NOPHAH (Nō′ phah) Place name meaning, "blast." Nophah passed from Moabite to Ammonite to Israelite control (Num. 21:26,30). The REB and RSV by altering one letter of the Hebrew text read "fire spread," a reading supported by the earliest Greek translation and Samaritan Pentateuch. If Nophah was a place, it is perhaps Nobah (Num. 32:42).

NORTH GATE Designation of two gates in Ezekiel's vision of the renewed Temple, a gate entering the outer court (Ezek. 8:14; 44:4; 46:9; 47:2) and a gate entering the inner court (Ezek. 40:35,40,44).

NORTHEASTER See Euroclydon.

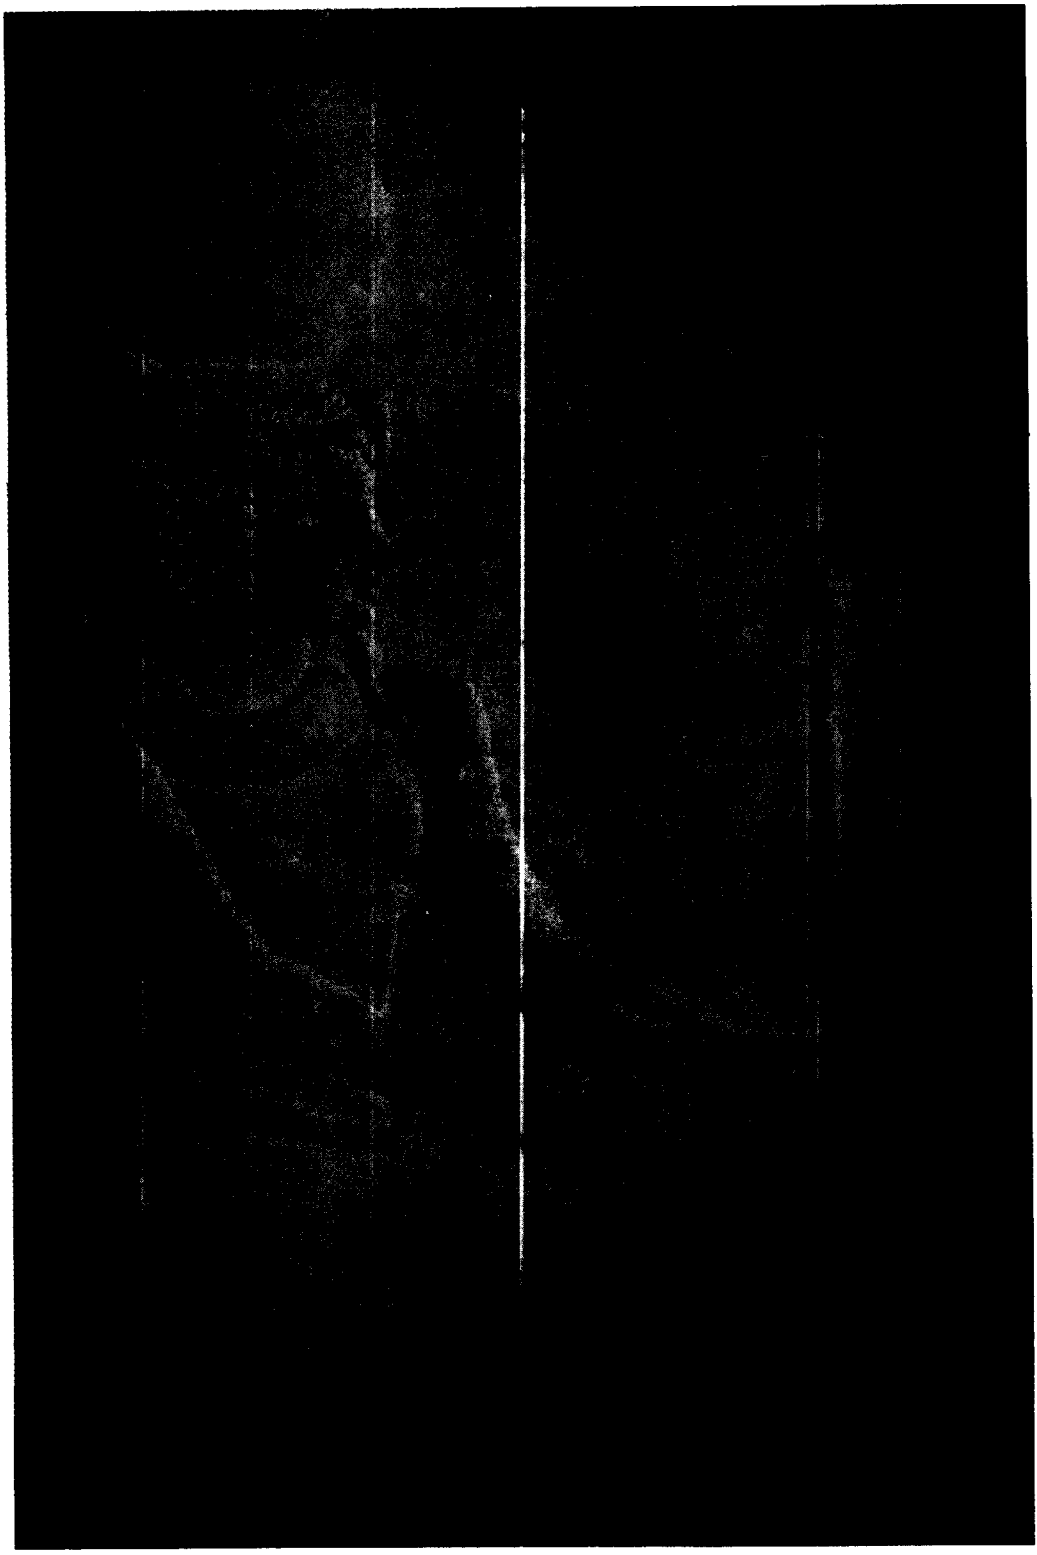
NOSE Part of the face between the eye and mouth which bears the nostrils and covers the nasal cavity. Jewelry was worn in the nose (Gen. 24:47; Isa. 3:21; Ezek. 16:12). Prisoners of war were sometimes led captive with hooks in their noses (2 Kings 19:28; Isa. 37:29). The precise significance of placing a vine or branch to one's nose (Ezek. 8:17) is unknown. Suggestions include an act connected with idolatrous worship, a provocative gesture (compare our turning up one's nose), or, if the text is emended, to a stench from the people which reaches God's nose. Cutting off the nose of an adulteress is a penalty known from Assyrian law (Ezek. 23:25,35).



Nostrils are often associated with the breath of life (Gen. 2:7; 7:22; Job 27:3; Isa. 2:22). The Lord's nostrils pile up the waters, allowing passage through the sea (Ex. 15:8; 2 Sam 22:16) and are associated with judgment (2 Sam. 22:9; Job 41:20; Ps. 18:8; Isa. 65:5).

NOSE RINGS See Jewels, Jewelry.

NOSTRIL See Nose.

NOVICE KJV term for a recent convert (1 Tim. 3:6).

NUBIANS (Nū′ bī ans) Residents of an ancient kingdom along the Nile river in southern Egypt and northern Sudan (Dan. 11:43, NIV; also NRSV margin). Cushites (REB) designates inhabitants of the same area. Other translations use Ethiopians, which formerly designated people of the same area. Modern Ethiopia lies further to the southeast. See Ethiopia.

NUMBER SYSTEMS AND NUMBER SYMBOLISM To understand properly the number systems of the biblical world, one must look to the neighbors of Israel. The Egyptians were already using relatively advanced mathematics by 3000 B.C. The construction of such structures as the pyramids required an understanding of complex mathematics. The Egyptian system was decimal. The Sumerians by that same time had developed their own number system. In fact, the Sumerians knew two systems, one based on ten (a decimal system) and one based on six or twelve (usually designated as a duodecimal system). We still make use of remnants of the Sumerian system today in our reckoning of time—12 hours for day and 12 hours for night, 60 minutes and 60 seconds as divisions of time. We also divide a circle into 360 degrees. Our calendar was originally based on the same division with the year having 12 months of 30 days for a total of 360. Even our units of the dozen (12) and gross (144) and inches to the foot may have their origin in the Sumerian mathematical system.

The Hebrews did not develop the symbols to represent numbers until the postexilic period (after 539 B.C.). In all preexilic inscriptions, small numbers are represented by individual strokes (for example, //// for four). Larger numbers were either represented with Egyptian symbols, or the name of the number was written out ("four" for the number 4). The Arad inscriptions regularly used Egyptian symbols for numbers, individual strokes for the units and hieratic numbers for 5, 10, and larger numbers. The Samaria ostraca more frequently wrote out the number. Letters of the Hebrew alphabet are first used to represent numbers on coins minted in the Maccabean period (after 167 B.C.).

Relief of the Nubian god Mandulis.

With the coming of the Hellenistic and Roman periods to Palestine, Greek symbols for numbers and Roman numerals appeared. The Greeks used letters of their alphabet to represent numerals, while the Romans used the familiar symbols I,V,X,L,C,M, and so on.

Biblical passages show that the Hebrews were well acquainted with the four basic mathematical operations of addition (Num. 1:20–46), subtraction (Gen. 18:28–33), multiplication (Num. 7:84–86), and division (Num. 31:27). The Hebrews also used fractions such as a half (Gen 24:22), a third (Num. 15:6), and a fourth (Ex. 29:40).

In addition to their usage to designate specific numbers or quantities, many numbers in the Bible came to have a symbolic meaning. Thus seven came to symbolize completeness and perfection. God's work of creation was both complete and perfect—and it was completed in seven days. All of mankind's existence was related to God's creative activity. The seven-day week reflected God's first creative activity. The sabbath was that day of rest following the work week, reflective of God's rest (Gen. 1:1—2:4). Israelites were to remember the land also and give it a sabbath, permitting it to lie fallow in the seventh year (Lev. 25:2–7). Seven was also important in cultic matters beyond the sabbath: major festivals such as Passover and Tabernacles lasted seven days as did wedding festivals (Judg. 14:12,17). In Pharaoh's dream, the seven good years followed by seven years of famine (Gen. 41:1–36) represented a complete cycle of plenty and famine. Jacob worked a complete cycle of years for Rachel; then, when he was given Leah instead, he worked an additional cycle of seven (Gen. 29:15–30).

A major Hebrew word for making an oath or swearing, shava', was closely related to the word seven, sheva'. The original meaning of "swear an oath" may have been "to declare seven times" or "to bind oneself by seven things."

A similar use of the number seven can be seen in the New Testament. The seven churches (Rev. 2—3) perhaps symbolized by their number all the churches. Jesus taught that forgiveness is not to be limited, even to a full number or complete number of instances. We are to forgive, not merely seven times (already a gracious number of forgivenesses), but seventy times seven (limitless forgiveness, beyond keeping count) (Matt. 18:21–22).

As the last example shows, multiples of seven frequently had symbolic meaning. The year of Jubilee came after the completion of every forty-nine years. In the year of Jubilee all Jewish bondslaves were released and land which had been sold reverted to its former owner (Lev. 25:8–55). Another multiple of seven used in the Bible is seventy. Seventy elders are mentioned (Ex. 24:1,9). Jesus sent out the seventy (Luke 10:1–17). Seventy years is specified as the length of the Exile (Jer. 25:12, 29:10; Dan. 9: 2). The messianic kingdom was to be inaugurated after a period of seventy weeks of years had passed (Dan. 9:24).

After seven, the most significant number for the Bible is undoubtedly twelve. The Sumerians used twelve as one base for their number system. Both the calendar and and the signs of the Zodiac reflect this twelve base number system. The tribes of Israel and Jesus' disciples numbered twelve. The importance of the number twelve is evident in the effort to maintain that number. When Levi ceased to be counted among the tribes, the Joseph tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, were counted separately to keep the number twelve intact. Similarly, in the New Testament, when Judas Iscariot committed suicide, the eleven moved quickly to add another to keep their number at twelve. Twelve seems to have been especially significant in the Book of Revelation. New Jerusalem had twelve gates; its walls had twelve foundations (Rev. 21:12–14). The tree of life yielded twelve kinds of fruit (Rev. 22:2).

Multiples of twelve are also important. There were twenty-four divisions of priests (1 Chron. 24:4), and twenty-four elders around the heavenly throne (Rev. 4:4). Seventy-two elders, when one includes Eldad and Medad, were given a portion of God's spirit that rested on Moses, and they prophesied (Num. 11:24–26). An apocryphal tradition holds that seventy-two Jewish scholars, six from each of the twelve tribes, translated the Old Testament into Greek, to give us the version we call today the Septuagint. The 144,000 servants of God (Rev. 7:4), were made up of 12,000 from each of the twelve tribes of Israel.

Three as a symbolic number often indicated completeness. The created cosmos had three elements: heaven, earth, and underworld. Three Persons make up the Godhead: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Prayer was to be lifted at least three times daily (Dan. 6:10; compare Ps. 55: 17). The sanctuary had three main parts: vestibule, nave, inner sanctuary (1 Kings 6). Three-year-old animals were mature and were, therefore, prized for special sacrifices (1 Sam. 1:24; Gen. 15:9). Jesus said He would be in the grave for three days and three nights (Matt. 12:40), the same time Jonah was in the great fish (Jonah 1:17). Paul often used triads in his writings, the most famous being "faith, hope and charity" (1 Cor. 13:13). One must also remember Paul's benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all" (2 Cor. 13:14).

Four was often used as a sacred number. Significant biblical references to four include the four corners of the earth (Isa. 11:12), the four winds (Jer. 49:36), four rivers which flowed out of Eden to water the world (Gen. 2:10–14), and four living creatures surrounding God (Ezek. 1; Rev. 4:6–7). God sent forth the four horsemen of the Apocalypse (Rev. 6:1–8) to bring devastation to the earth.

The most significant multiple of four is forty, which often represented a large number or a long period of time. Rain flooded the earth for forty days (Gen. 7:12). For forty days Jesus withstood Satan's temptations (Mark 1:13). Forty years represented approximately a generation. Thus all the adults who had rebelled against God at Sinai died during the forty years of the Wilderness Wandering period. By age forty, a person had reached maturity (Exod. 2:11; Acts 7:23).

A special system of numerology known as gematria developed in later Judaism. Gematria is based on the idea that one may discover hidden meaning in the biblical text from a study of the numerial equivalence of the Hebrew letters. The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, aleph represented one; beth, the second letter represented two, and so on. With gematria one takes the sum of the letters of a Hebrew word and seeks to find some meaning. For example, the Hebrew letters of the name Eliezer, Abraham's servant, have a numerical value of 318. When Gensis 14:14 states that Abraham took 318 trained men to pursue the kings from the east, some Jewish commentaries interpret this to mean that Abraham had but one helper, Eliezer, since Eliezer has the numerical value of 318. Likewise, the number 666 in Revelation is often taken as a reverse gematria for the emperor Nero. The name Nero Caesar, put in Hebrew characters and added up following gematria, total 666. Any interpretation based on gematria must be treated with care; such interpretation always remains speculative.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF Fourth book of Old Testament that teaches the identity of the people of God, God's provision for authority over His people, and God's plan for their fulfillment as a nation. It answers the questions: "Who are the people of God?" "Who is in charge here?" and, "What are we doing?"

Title The book title is "Numbers" in our English Bibles based upon the Vulgate (Latin translation) title, Numeri, and the Septuagint (Greek translation) title, Arithmoi. This title is based on the "numbering" of people (1:19; 1:45; 2:33; 3:42; 4:49; 26:4). The Hebrew bible uses the first word in the book, Bemidhbar ("in the wilderness"), as the title. This is a helpful description giving the setting for much more that happens to God's people than taking censuses. In fact, most commentators use a geographical outline to summarize the book. This outline is simply stated:

1:1—10:10 What happened at Sinai;

10:11—20:13 What happened in the wilderness; and 20:14—36:13 What happened from Kadesh to Moab.

Contents It seems most productive to consider the contents of the book in the light of the three questions asked above. The following should illuminate this.

Outline

I. Who are the People of God?
   - A. Those who are ready to defend the camp through military means (chs. 1; 26);
   - B. Those who dwell in a camp with provision for God's presence in their midst (ch. 2);
   - C. Those who participate in a religious system under the authority of the Aaronite priesthood and ministry of the Levites (chs. 3; 4);
   - D. Those who uphold the laws of ritual purity to keep the camp from becoming physically or morally contaminated or are willing to undertake appropriate rituals to restore wholeness (chs. 5; 6; 19);
   - E. Those who furnish the tabernacle of God's presence with appropriate furnishings and utensils (chs. 7—8);
   - F. Those who worship according to sacred rituals established by God (chs. 9; 28—30);
   - G. Those who are willing to migrate according to God's instructions (ch. 10);
   - H. Those who depend upon the priesthood to mediate the awesome presence of God (ch. 18);
   - I. Those who recognize that secular authority is dependent on religious authority (ch. 27);
   - J. Those who have an allegiance to justice beyond the idea of a family-blood feud (ch. 35).

II. Who is in charge of the People of God?
   - A. Moses is prime authority under God's direction and through God's intervention in vindicating him after rebellions (chs. 11—12; 14; 16);
   - B. Aaron is a prime spiritual authority due to God's active support (ch. 17);
   - C. Even Moses and Aaron are inadequate without God's support (ch. 20);
   - D. God Himself is final authority (ch. 21);
   - E. God will guide the priesthood in directing Israel away from apostasy and toward Him (ch. 25).

III. What are the People of God to accomplish?
   - A. They are to examine and investigate the land of promise (chs. 13—14);
   - B. They are to be victorious over God's enemies through ritualized "holy war" (ch. 21);
   - C. They are to recognize that no rival religious authority can spoil God's plan regarding the land of promise (chs. 22—24);
   - D. They are to keep the land of promise within the tribes and people it was promised to (in spite of extraordinary circumstances) (ch. 27);
   - E. They are to provide for "bonus" land beyond the initial promise (ch. 32);
   - F. They are to provide for keeping the land of promise secure (ch. 36).

In this way, the reader is able to see that every aspect of life during the wilderness wandering was permeated with the centrality of God. Under God's instructions Israel conscripted an army; God's presence radiated both a sense of awe and well-being in the center of the camp; God's promise of a landed inheritance gave them a goal to strive for and an identity; and God was the ultimate authority and spoke both indirectly through His human representatives and directly through His miraculous power. The rebellion narratives (11:1—12:16; 14; 16; 17; 20; 21:4–9; and 25:1–18), as well as the account of Balaam the wizard (22—24), serve to show how God's plan and provision cannot be thwarted by any rival possibility or power. Israel needed to stay on God's side to find success. See Aaron; Balaam; Eleazer; Joshua; Moses; Pentateuch; Holy War; Sacred Calendar; Tabernacle; Tribal Confederation.

NUN 1. (Nŭn) Father of Joshua (Ex. 33:11; Num.

11:28;13:8,16); 2. (Nūn) Fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which serves as a heading for Psalm 119:105–112 in the KJV. Each verse of this section begins with nun.

NUNC DIMITTIS Latin phrase meaning, "now lettest thou depart." The first words in Latin of Simeon's psalm of praise in Luke 2:29–32 and thus the title of the psalm. See Benedictus; Magnificat.

NURSE 1. Woman who breast-feeds an infant (Gen. 21:7; Ex. 2:7; 1 Sam. 1:23). In Old Testament times children were often nursed as long as three years (1 Sam. 1:22–24). Weaning was often a time of celebration (Gen. 21:8). Generally, a mother nursed her own child; though sometimes a wet nurse was employed (Ex. 2:7). A nurse might continue as an honored family member after the child was grown (Gen. 24:59; 35:8). Paul likened the gentleness of his missionary approach to a mother nursing her children (1 Thess. 2:7). 2. Woman who cares for a child such as a governess or nanny (Ruth 4:16; 2 Sam. 4:4). 3. One who cares for the sick (1 Kings 1:2,4 NAS, RSV).

NURTURE KJV translation (Eph. 6:4) of the Greek paideia (disciple, instruction). The noun occurs elsewhere in the Pauline corpus but once (2 Tim. 3:16) which relates that all Scripture is profitable for "instruction (paideia) in righteousness." To rear children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" is to discipline and correct them as the Lord would.

NUTS See Plants in the Bible.

NUZI (Nū′ zī) A city located in the northeast section of the fertile cresent, and then named Gasur, that flourished under Sargon shortly before 2000 B.C. Few cities that are not mentioned in the Old Testament contribute to its understanding as significantly as Nuzi (modern Yorghan Tepe). Its most relevant history, as far as the Old Testament is concerned, is its revival as part of the Hurrian kingdom, situated in the state of Mitanni, about 1500 B.C., about the time of the Israelites' bondage in Egypt. Twenty thousand Akkadian documents have been found at Nuzi that reflect primarily the legal, social, and economic situation of Mesopotamian culture about 2000–1400 B.C. The sociological importance of this discovery is estimated differently among scholars. Most scholars accept the value for general Near Eastern studies and biblical background, and some use the information to determine the date of the patriarchs and the literature about them according to biblical parallels with Nuzi customs.

Some parallels are more exact than others, but the following examples can be cited as relevant to patriarchal and later Israelite culture. Marriage customs of Nuzi and the patriarchs converge when we hear Rachel and Leah complain how their father Laban unfairly hoarded their dowry and left them nothing, contrary to provisions they expected under Nuzi-like marriage arrangements (Gen. 31:14–16). In spite of this injustice, Laban later relied on the honor of Jacob to conform to the custom of not marrying additional wives (Gen. 31:50). In the case of infertility, both Rachel and Leah offered their maids as surrogate mates that would bear sons to their husband Jacob, a convention seen also at Nuzi (Gen. 30:1–13). Jacob's grandmother, Sarah, had done the same for Abraham (Gen. 16:1–4), assuming as one would have in Nuzi, that the child would be hers (v. 2). Up to that point, Abraham had despaired that his servant Eliezer was his only legal heir, hinting that he had adopted Eliezer for this purpose, according to Nuzi custom (Gen. 15:2). Two further parallels in the area of inheritance are found in Jacob's verbally removing Reuben's privileges as the first born because of his sin against his father (Gen. 49:2–4), and the transfer of inheritance between the brothers Esau and Jacob (Gen. 25:27–34); both cases indicate prerogatives provided in Nuzi law. Though the exact reason why Rachel stole her father's idols is not explained in the Bible (Gen. 31:19,27–32), the importance of possessing one's father's idols appears at Nuzi as well. Nuzi parallels with Israelite law are also very interesting. The double portion granted to the firstborn on the basis of Deuteronomy 21:15–17 (compare Gen. 48:21–22), the occassional rights of daughters to be heirs (Num. 27:8), cancellation of debts after so many years (Deut. 15:1–3), are examples.

The name "Hebrew" for an alien as Joseph was in Egypt (Gen. 39:13–14), and as the Israelites were in that country (Ex. 1:15–19) or while in Philistia (1 Sam. 14:21), is very similar to the same use of the term habiru found in the Nuzi documents and elsewhere. This sheds light on the perpetual discussion of the source and meaning of this significant name for the Israelites. See Archaeology; Abraham; Mesopotamia; Habiru; Patriarchs; Hurriam. Dan Fredricks

NYMPHA (Nym′ pha) Christian hostess of a house church, likely in Laodicea (Col. 4:15). Because the name occurs only in the accusative case, it is not possible to determine whether it is masculine or feminine. Modern translations follow the best Greek manuscripts in reading "her house" and using the feminine name Nympha. The KJV followed other manuscripts reading "his house" and thus used the masculine form Nymphas, an abbreviation of Nymphadorus meaning "gift of nymphs."

NYMPHAS (Nym′ phas) See Nympha.

OAK See Plants in the Bible.

OARSMEN NIV term for those who row a galley (Ezek. 27:8,26). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

OATHS A formal appeal to God or some sacred object as a support to fulfill a promise. Ancient societies lacked laws and documentation as a means of legal enforcement. Binding transactions depended upon the power of a person's word. Without a modern judicial system, the very security of the society demanded that people speak the truth to one another. The oath maintained the obligation to speak honestly.

Solemn oaths in the Bible were binding. Violation of an oath was serious and could not be disregarded (Ezek. 17:13,16,18–19).

The Old Testament and Oaths The making of covenants revealed the binding nature of the oath. See Covenant. The parties made oaths to enforce the awareness that a violator of the covenant would suffer the same fate as the sacrificed animal.

Symbolic acts often accompanied an oath. Oath takers often raised their right hands or lifted both hands to heaven (Gen. 14:22; Dan. 12:7; compare Rev. 10:5–6). Bible writers could even use human images to describe God, saying the Lord swears by His right hand (Isa. 62:8).

Invoking the name of a reigning monarch was another symbolic act joined with oath taking. Using the Lord's name in an oath directly appeals to His involvement regarding testimony and establishes Him as the supreme Enforcer and Judge. To violate the Lord's name was to violate the Lord; therefore, oaths that used God's name carelessly are condemned (Ex. 20:7; Lev. 19:12).

The oath reinforced God's promises to His people (Ex. 33:1; Deut. 6:18; Deut. 7:8; Ps. 132:11). The oath established boundaries around human speech and set guidelines for human conduct (Num. 30; Deut. 23:21). Israel ratified their treaties by oaths (Josh. 9:15,18,20), and the writer of Ecclesiastes reminded his readers that it is better not to make a vow than to make a vow and not keep it (5:4–5).

The New Testament and Oaths The New Testament raised the oath to a new level of understanding. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus established a different standard of speech, one based not upon oaths but upon simple integrity. A clear yes and no would be sufficient for communication (Matt. 5:33–37; compare Jas. 5:12). Jesus spurned oaths made by the Temple (Matt. 23:16–21). At His trial before Caiaphas, He was silent to the questions until a binding oath was placed upon Him (Matt. 26:63–65). Jesus did not condemn oaths, only the abuse of God's name in the taking of oaths.

Other New Testament passages reveal the gravity of oath taking. Peter's denial of Christ was first, a simple refusal to acknowledge Jesus. An oath accompanied his second denial. He issued his final denial in the form of a curse (Matt. 26:69–75). The apostle Paul frequently called upon God in the form of an oath to witness to his own sincerity (Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 1:20). Hebrews establishes the superiority of Christ's priesthood over the Levitical priesthood because it was promised with an oath whereas the Levitical priesthood was not (7:20–22).

Throughout church history, some Christians have insisted that oath taking is a concession to the evil of this present age. Certain Christian groups have refused to take oaths under any conditions. Most Christians do not condemn oaths under any circumstance, but they condemn the abuse of God's name in oaths. Brad Creed

OBADIAH (O bā dī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh's servant." 1. Person in charge of Ahab's palace. He was devoted to Yahweh and saved Yahweh's prophets from Jezebel's wrath. He was the go-between for Elijah and Ahab (1 Kings 18:3–16). 2. A descendant of David through Hananiah (1 Chron. 3:21). 3. Son of Izrahiah of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3). 4. Son of Azel of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44). 5. A Levite who returned to Jerusalem with the first of the Babylonian exiles (1 Chron. 9:16). 6. A Gadite who joined David, along with Ezer and Eliab. Obadiah was second in command behind Ezer (1 Chron. 12:8–9). 7. Father of Ishmaiah, an officer from the tribe of Zebulun who served in David's army (1 Chron. 27:19). 8. One of five officials Jehoshaphat sent throughout the cities of Judah to teach "the book of the law of the Lord" (2 Chron. 17:7–9). See Jehoshaphat. 9. A Levite descended from Merari appointed by Josiah to oversee the repairing of the Temple (2 Chron. 34:12). See Josiah. 10. A priest who returned from Babylonian Exile to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:9). He joined other priests along with princes and Levites in putting his seal upon the covenant (Neh. 9:38) made between the people and God (Neh. 10:5). 11. A gatekeeper and guardian of "the ward" ("the storerooms at the gates," NIV) during the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 12:25).

OBADIAH (Ō bā dī' ah) The shortest book of the Minor Prophets, preserving the message of Obadiah, the prophet.

The Prophet No source outside his book mentions Obadiah. "Obadiah" is a common name in the Old Testament. Meaning "servant of Yahweh," it reflects his parents' faith and spiritual ambitions for their child. The title "The vision of Obadiah" turns attention to the divine author, "vision" being a technical term for a prophetic revelation received from God.

The Situation Historically, the book belongs to the early postexilic period, at the end of the sixth century B.C. Its central section, verses 10–14, deals with the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 586 B.C., concentrating on the part the Edomites played in that tragic event. Edom was a state to the southeast of Judah. Despite treaty ties ("brother," v. 10) the Edomites, along with others, had failed to come to Judah's aid and had even helped Babylon by looting Jerusalem and handing over refugees. Moreover, the Edomites filled the vacuum caused by Judah's Exile by moving west and annexing the Negeb to the south of Judah and even its southern territory (compare v. 19).

Judah reacted with a strong sense of grievance. Obadiah's oracle responded to an underlying impassioned prayer of lament, like Psalms 74, 79, or 137, in which Judah appealed to God to act as providential trial Judge and Savior to set right the situation.

The Message The response begins with a prophetic messenger formula which reinforces the thrust of the title, that God is behind the message. Verses 2–9 give the divine verdict. Addressing Edom, God promised to defeat those supermen and topple the mountain capital which reflected their lofty self-conceit. Their allies would let them down, and neither their famed wisdom nor their warriors would be able to save them. This seems to look fearfully ahead to the Nabateans' infiltration from the eastern desert and their eventual takeover of Edom's traditional territory. The end of verse 1 appears to be a report from the prophet that already a coalition of neighboring groups was planning to attack Edom.

The catalog of Edom's crimes (vv. 10–14) functions as the accusation which warranted God's verdict of punishment. Repetition raises "day" to center stage. The underlying thought is that Judah had been the victim of "the day of the Lord" when God intervened in judgment, and had drunk the cup of God's wrath (vv. 15,16; compare Lam. 1:12; 2:21). In Old Testament theology the concept of the day of the Lord embraces not only God's people but their no-less-wicked neighbors. This wider dimension is reflected in verses 15–16 (compare Lam. 1:21). The fall of Edom was to trigger this eschatological event in which order would be restored to an unruly world. Then would come the vindication of God's people, not for their own sakes but as earthly witnesses to His glory; and so "the kingdom shall be the Lord's" (v. 21).

The Meaning Like the Book of Revelation, which proclaims the downfall of the persecuting Roman Empire, the aim of Obadiah is to sustain faith in God's moral government and hope in the eventual triumph of His just will. It brings a pastoral message to aching hearts, that God is on the throne and cares for His own.

Outline

OBAL (Ō′ băl) Personal name meaning, "stout." Son of Joktan and ancestor of an Arab tribe (Gen. 10:28). At 1 Chronicles 1:22 the name takes the alternate form Ebal.

OBED (Ō′ bĕd) Personal name meaning, "serving." 1. Son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth 3:13–17), father of Jesse, and grandfather of King David. He was an ancestor of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:5; 3:32).

2. Son of Ephal and father of Jehu (1 Chron. 2:37–38). 3. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:47). 4. Gatekeeper in Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. 26:7). 5. Father of Azariah, a commander assisting in coronation of King Josiah (2 Chron. 23). See Athaliah.

OBED-EDOM (Ō′ bĕd-ē′ dom) A Personal name meaning, "serving Edom."

1. A Philistine from Gath who apparently was loyal to David and Israel. At Obed-edom's house David left the ark of the covenant following the death of Uzzah at the hand of God (2 Sam. 6:6–11). Obed-edom was unusually blessed of God (probably a reference to prosperity) during the three months the ark was at his house. 2. A Levite who served as both gatekeeper and musician in the tabernacle in Jerusalem during David's reign (1 Chron. 15:18,24; 16:5). His duties related especially to the ark of the covenant. A guild of Levites may have adopted the name "Obed-edom" as their title as keepers of the ark.

3. A member of the Korhites (1 Chron. 26:1,4–8) who kept the south of the Temple (v. 15).

4. A keeper of the sacred vessels of the Temple. Joash of Israel took him with the sacred vessels to Samaria following his capture of Jerusalem and of Amaziah king of Judah (2 Chron. 25:23–24).

OBEDIENCE To hear God's Word and act accordingly. The word translated "obey" in the Old Testament means "to hear" and is often so translated.

In the New Testament, several words describe obedience. One word means "to hear or to listen in a state of submission." Another New Testament word often translated "obey" means "to trust."

The person's obedient response to God's Word is a response of trust or faith. Thus, to really hear God's Word is to obey God's Word (Ex. 19:5; Jer. 7:23).

The Bible views disobedience as a failure to hear and do God's Word (Ps. 81:11). Israel's story was one of a nation who failed to hear or to listen to God (Jer. 7:13; Hos. 9:17). Jesus warned: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. 11:15).

How does obedience affect one's spiritual life? Obedience is essential to worship (1 Sam. 15:22; John 4:23–24). The obedience of faith brings about salvation (Rom. 1:5, 10:16–17). Obedience secures God's blessings (John 14:23; 1 John 2:17; Rev. 22:14). Spiritual insight is gained through obedience (John 7:17). A life of obedience to God is the fruit of faith (Jas. 2:21–26).

True obedience means imitating God in holiness, humility, and love (1 Pet. 1:15; John 13:34; Phil. 2:5–8). True disciples do the will of God (Mat. 7:21). Facing clashing claims for one's allegiance, the Christian obeys God rather than other persons (Acts 5:29).

What motivates us to obey God? Obedience springs from gratitude for grace received (Rom. 12:12). Christians obey God as an expression of their spiritual freedom (Gal. 5:13; 1 Pet. 2:16). Jesus taught that our love for God motivates us to obey Him (John 14:21, 23, 24; 15:10).

How does obedience affect our relationships with others? The Bible speaks of obedience from the wife to the husband (Eph. 5:22), from children to their parents (Eph. 6:1), from slaves to masters (Col. 3:22). Obedience with joy should be shown to church leaders (1 Thess. 5:12–13). Obedience is expected from all Christians to persons in authority (1 Pet. 2:13–14).

The New Testament places special emphasis on Jesus' obedience. Christ's obedience stands in contrast to Adam's disobedience (Rom. 5:12–21). A desire to obey the will of God motivated Jesus' actions (Luke 4:43; John 5:30). Jesus acted and spoke only as the Father directed (John 3:34). By living a life of obedience, Jesus showed Himself to be the Savior (Heb. 5:7–10). Christ's work on the cross is viewed as a sacrifice of obedience (Rom. 5:19; Heb. 10:7–10).

God has spoken in the Scriptures. Disobedience to God's Word comes from a sinful heart—a heart that will not trust God. Obedience comes from a heart that trusts God. If God's people obey Him, they find the blessings He yearns to give. If they disobey, believers receive judgment and necessary discipline. Gary Hardin OBEISANCE, DO To bown down with one's face to the ground as a sign of homage and submission. KJV and RSV translate the Hebrew shachah as obeisance when the object of homage is a person but as worship when the object of homage is God or other gods (84 times in the RSV). Most often persons did obeisance to the king (1 Sam. 24:8; 2 Sam. 1:2; 9:6–8; 14:4) or a royal official (Gen. 43:28; Esth. 3:2,5). Moses did obeisance before his father-in-law (Ex. 18:7). Saul did obeisance before Samuel's ghost (1 Sam. 28:14).

OBELISK (Ŏb′ ĕ lĭsk) Stone pillar used in worship, especially of the Egyptian sun god Amun-Ra. Four-sided and made from one stone, obelisks tapered to the top, where a pyramid rested. They apparently symbolized the rays of the rising sun and the hope of the Pharaoh for rejuvenation and new vitality. At times, they were used in tombs to represent hope for resurrection. A four thousand-year-old obelisk still stands in modern Matariyeh, ancient On. Another has been transplanted to Central Park in New York City. Many obelisks were built from about 1550 to about 1100 B.C. Some were more than 100 feet tall. The Hebrew term translated obelisks at Jeremiah 43:13 (NAS, NRSV, RSV) means pillar or standing stone ("sacred stone," NIV, REB). The Egyptian context suggests the pillars were in fact obelisks, perhaps dedicated to the sun-god Ra. See On.

OBIL (Ō′ bĭl) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "camel driver," "tender," or "mourner." Overseer in charge of David's camels (1 Chron. 27:30).

OBLATION Gift offered at an altar or shrine, especially a voluntary gift not involving blood. KJV used oblation to translate four Hebrew words. Modern translations often replace oblation with either offering (Lev. 7:38; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 44:30) or contribution (2 Chron. 31:14; Ezek. 20:40). RSV used oblation only at 1 Kings 18:29,36 where it replaced the "evening sacrifice" of the KJV, NIV, NAS. See Sacrifice and Offerings.

OBOTH (Ō′ bŏth) Place name meaning, "fathers" or "water skins." A wilderness station (Num. 21:10–11; 33:43–44), perhaps identical with 'Ain el-Weiba near Panon (modern Feinan).

OBSCENE OBJECT REB translation for an object the queen mother Maacah erected for the worship of Asherah, a fertility goddess (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron. 15:16). The precise nature of the image is unclear. The Vulgate or early Latin translation took the image to be a phallic emblem. Some recent interpreters have suggested a stylized palm tree as a symbol of fertility. Alternate translations include: idol (KJV); abominable image (NRSV); repulsive Asherah pole (NIV); and horrid image for Asherah (NAS). See Asherah; Fertility Cults.

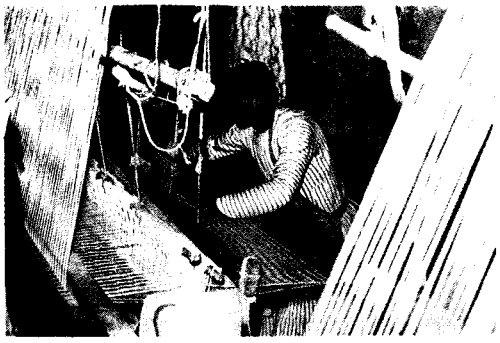
Fallen Egyptian obelisk at Rameses (Tanis).

OBSCURITY KJV term for gloom or darkness (Isa. 29:11; 58:10; 59:9).

OBSERVED, SIGNS TO BE Translation of the Greek paratērēsis (Luke 17:20) meaning, "observation" or "observance." The Lucan context suggests that the intended meaning is that the coming of God's kingdom is not preceded by visible signs so that one could say, "Lo, here it is." Other interpreters suggest that the kingdom is not preceded by observance of a Jewish festival (such as the Passover) or brought on by adherence to ceremonial law.

OBSERVER OF TIMES KJV term for a soothsayer (Deut. 18:10,14; compare Lev. 19:26; 2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6). See Divination and Magic.

OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS IN THE BIBLE The occupations and professions of ancient civilizations were, as in modern times, related to the natural resources, commerce, and institutions of the nations. Israel was no exception. Although readers of the Bible may be tempted to think of the Hebrews in general, and the Bible personalities in particular, as living lives totally absorbed by their religion, the ancients did have to make a living. In fact, few Hebrews followed a profession linked to the unique structure of their religion.



In the course of time, occupations developed from the simple task to the more complex and from unskilled to skilled labor. This evolution was spurred by Israel's shift from a nomadic existence to a settled life and from a clan-type government to that of the monarchy. The development of secular occupations paralleled the settlement of the people into towns and villages, and the evolution of their government from a loose-knit tribal group to a nation involved in international politics. In earliest biblical times, the Hebrews followed their herds from pasture land to pasture land and water hole to water hole, though at times they lived for long periods near major cities (Gen. 13:18; 20:1; 26:6; 33:19). Their occupations were centered in the family enterprise.

When Israel entered into Canaan, the Hebrews moved toward a settled existence. As a settled people, agricultural pursuits became extremely important for survival. As the monarchy developed, many new occupations appear within the biblical text, mostly to maintain the royal house. Finally, as villages grew larger, and commerce between cities and nations expanded, various trades and crafts expanded with them. See Commerce.

A sampling of the most common occupations and professions of the Bible are briefly described and grouped around the places where they were usually practiced: the home, the palace, the market place, and the religious occupations related to the church of Christianity and Temple of Judaism.

Occupations Around the Home The earliest occupations and professions mentioned in the Bible, as might be expected, are tasks and chores done at home. One of the principal duties around the home centered on food preparation. 1. Baker (Gen. 40:5) is mentioned early in Scripture as a member of the Egyptian pharaoh's court. Baking bread was a frequent task performed in the Hebrew home long before it evolved into a specialized trade.

2. Butler of the pharaoh's palace was also known as a cupbearer (Neh. 1:11; compare Gen. 40:21), one who was responsible for providing the king with drink. He, presumably, tasted each cup of wine before it was presented to Pharaoh as a precaution against poisoning.

3. Cooks did the majority of the ancient people's food preparation (1 Sam. 9:23–24). Within the home, female family members did the cooking. As cooking became an occupation outside of the home, men entered the trade. 4. A related, and daily, chore of grinding grain fell to the grinder (Matt. 24:41) or miller, another trade which later entered the market place. See Mill.

The majority of persons in biblical times were involved in some form of food gathering or production. 5. Fishermen (Isa. 19:8; Matt. 4:18) were one such group of food gatherers. The ancient fishermen's tools were not unlike his modern counterparts: fishing by hook and line, spears, and nets. The fisherman, and fishing, is mentioned often in Scripture, most notably as a metaphor, as in Mark 1:17 when Jesus challenged Simon and Andrew to become "fishers of men." See Fish.

6. Hunters (Jer. 16:16) form the second major group of food gatherers. The ancient hunter's success depended upon proficiency in the use of a bow and arrow, spear, traps and snares, and his knowledge of his prey. Nimrod (Gen. 10:9) is the first person to be designated a hunter in the Bible. See Hunter.

7. Shepherds (Luke 2:8) were also engaged in food production. Those persons who have rule over others are often described in terms of the shepherd's duties. They were to care for and feed the people for whom they were responsible. Psalm 23 identifies the Lord as a Shepherd and vividly describes the duties of the keeper of the sheep. Given the rugged terrain of Palestine, the constant threat from wild animals, and the ceaseless search for water and pastureland, the responsibilities and dangers of the shepherd were great. Abel is the first to be described as a "keeper of sheep" (Gen. 4:2). 8. Closely akin to the shepherd was the herdsman (Gen. 4:20). Jabal is described as one "having cattle." The only distinction that might be made between a shepherd and herdsman is in their charges: the shepherd, sheep; the herdsman, cattle.

9. Abel's brother, Cain, is identified as the first farmer (Gen. 4:2). The Bible calls the worker of land a "tiller" or "plower" (Ps. 129:3). He is closely associated with God in Scripture, since it is God who instructs and works closely with him in producing the crops. See Agriculture. Farm work involved the gleaner (Ruth 2:3), harvestman (Isa. 17:5), and reaper (Ruth 2:3). The harvestman and reaper are, apparently, two names for the same task. It is likely, also, that the farmer served as his own harvester. The gleaner is different. See Gleaning. By gleaning what farmers left in the field, the poor and landless obtained food.

Nomadic existence does not require any complicated structure of government. Rule was in the hands of the leader of each tribe. Some form of government became necessary, however, when towns and villages began to form. 10. Before the coming of the monarchy, with its more centralized system of government: judges (Judg. 2:16), God chose to lead His people, especially in times of crisis. Since the crises were generally wars, the judges were primarily military leaders, who rescued the Israelite tribes from destruction by their warring neighbors. These and later judges also settled disputes. (Compare Luke 18:2) See Judge.

Occupations Around the Palace People who worked around the home could be found doing multiple tasks on any given day. Outside the home, skills became more specialized. In Israel, with the development of the monarchy, some of the Hebrews found employment within the palace.

11. The king (1 Sam. 8:5) held first place. Many kings, among Israel's neighbors, were held to be gods; not so in Israel. The Israelite king was the political ruler and spiritual example and leader to his people. The king determined, by his obedience or disobedience to Israel's God, the fortunes of the nation, but he was never god. (Note, however, the poetic designation in Ps. 45:6). See King.

12. Joseph was a governor (Gen. 42:6) of Egypt. His position was second only to Pharaoh. He was, in fact, ruler (Gen. 41:43) over all the land of Egypt. 13. Daniel was another Hebrew who enjoyed rule in a foreign nation. He was one of three presidents (Dan. 6:2) given rule over the Median Empire. No information is given regarding his duties.

14. In New Testament times, the Roman government used a deputy (Acts 13:7), also called a proconsul, to oversee the administrative responsibilities of its provinces. The Romans had extended their empire beyond the limits of the emperor's abilty to rule personally. Deputies were used where the Roman army was unnecessary. 15. Where a military presence was necessary, a governor (Matt. 27:2), or procurator, was used. The New Testament names only three men employed as governors in Palestine, although there were more: Pontius Pilate, Felix, and Festus. See Rome; Governor.

Beyond the task of governing, the palace provided ample opportunity for military occupations to develop. 16. The armorbearer (Judg. 9:54) was one of the servants provided for a warrior as he went into battle. See Arms and Armor.

The army was made up of men of various ranks and responsibilities. Many of the terms designating those in places of leadership are ambiguous and may refer to one and the same rank. 17. The commander (Isa. 55:4) apparently referred to any leader among the people. It is possible that such ranks as captain, lieutenant, and prince, which could be included under the umbrella of "commander," were, in the first place, military ranks alone.

18. Soldiers (1 Chron. 7:4) are mentioned frequently in connection with the many wars recorded in the Bible. The geographical location of Israel put it in constant danger of invading armies. Every adult male (over the age of twenty) within the tribes of Israel, was expected to serve in the military. The Mosaic law, especially in the Book of Numbers, set forth the regulations for establishing an army.

The government included a corps of service and judicial personnel, as well. 19. The jailor (Acts 16:23) is prominent in several New Testament passages. He had charge of all prisoners—political or religious. Under Roman rule, the jailor was strictly responsible for the safekeeping of the inmates. If one were to escape, or otherwise be unable to complete his sentence, the jailor was liable to fulfill the sentence of the prisoner.

In addition to providing government and a military presence, nations found it necessary to collect taxes from their citizens. 20. The despised publican (Matt. 9:10) is well known from the New Testament. The principal duty was extorting as much taxes as possible. It is believed, by some, that the publican was able to keep for himself any amount of monies collected beyond that levied by the government.

21. The scribe (Matt. 5:20), in addition to service in a religious fashion, served in an administrative capacity in the government as well. Scribes involved in the copying and interpretation of the law of Moses are known from the time of Ezra, who is identified as a "scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7:6). Within ancient governments, scribes served the royal court, keeping records of the king's reign. Each king organized his government with advisors and people responsible for different areas. The Bible lists the organization of David (2 Sam. 8:16–18; 20:23–26) and Solomon (1 Kings 4:1–19). The exact responsibility of each official is difficult to determine as a look at different translations will show.

Work Around the Marketplace The marketplace offered numerous opportunities for employment outside the home. These opportunities may be grouped around the sale of goods, many of which could be classified as arts and crafts, and dispensing of services.

22. Among early craftsmen, the carpenter (2 Sam. 5:11) had special meaning as the occupation of Jesus. Most of the biblical references to carpenters, however, are to foreign workers. Most notable are the workers of Hiram, King of Tyre, who labored on Solomon's Temple. Associated with these craftsmen of wood are the feller (Isa. 14:8) and hewers (Josh. 9:21), both cutters of wood.

23. In metalwork, the Bible identifies the coppersmith (2 Tim. 4:14), the goldsmith (Neh. 3:8), and the silversmith (Acts 19:24) as workers in their respective metals. In more general terms, metal workers are identified as founders (Judg. 17:4) and smiths (1 Sam. 13:19).

Oddly enough, miners are not directly mentioned in the biblical text, although craftsmen in various metals were numerous. The metals used by the craftsmen were often imported, though Israel may have controlled some mines near the Red Sea when they controlled those regions. See Mines and Mining.

24. In the sphere of salesmanship, the merchant (Gen. 23:16) or seller (Isa. 24:2) held a prominent position in commerce from the earliest biblical times. Their trade developed into one of international proportions. See Commerce.

25. The potter (Jer. 18:2; Rom. 9:21) may have been one of the busiest men in the marketplace. The demands for his product would be great. Pottery was less expensive and more durable than other containers available to the Israelites, which accounts for its common use. 26. The mason sold his talent of cutting stone for building purposes (2 Kings 12:12), while 27. the tanner (Acts 9:43) busied himself with preparing skins for use in clothing and as containers.

28. Tentmaking (Acts 18:3) must have been a craft learned from Israel's earliest days of seminomadic existence in the time of the patriarchs. This trade carried over into the New Testament period. Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla are said to have made their living by making tents (Acts 18:3).

Many services were offered in biblical times. 29. The apothecary (Neh. 3:8) has been characterized as the equivalent of a modern druggist. His main task involved the compounding of drugs and ointments for medical purposes. Jewish religious practices suggest that making perfume was also a part of the apothecary's craft (Ex. 30:35).

30. The banker, called a lender (Prov. 22:7), suffered a poor reputation among the Jews. Their religious law forbade the lending of money for interest. In the New Testament, these bankers were the infamous "money changers" of the Temple. See Banking.

31. The fuller (Mal. 3:2) may be best described as an ancient laundryman. He worked with soiled clothing and with the material from the loom ready for weaving. His service entailed the cleaning of any fabric.

32. A host (Luke 10:35), often thought of as an "innkeeper," provided minimal accommodations for travelers, in some cases, little more than provision of space for erecting a tent or a place to lie down to sleep.

33. Among the most respected persons of Scripture was the master (Jas. 3:1), more appropriately called an instructor or teacher (Rom. 2:20). Biblical references to this profession apply mainly to religious teaching, but the term suited anyone who offered instruction. See Education.

34. Prominent, throughout the Bible, are various occupations related to musical talents. Descriptive names include: Singers and players (Ps. 68:25) in the Old Testament, and musicians, harpers, pipers, and trumpeters (Rev. 18:22) in the New Testament. In both Testaments, music played a significant part in the religious life and worship of the nation.

Occupations Around the Church and Temple While occupation is not a technically accurate term when referring to the early church, there were "offices" filled by Christians, normally on a voluntary basis. See Offices in the New Testament.

The officers of the Temple were much more authoritarian. 35. The priest (Ex. 31:10) acted as an intermediary between God and the people who came to worship at the Temple. In many cases, priests sacrificed the offerings for the people and the nation, taking for themselves a share in the offering. Priests also served as advisers to the king (2 Sam. 20:25).

36. Until recently, the prophet (Gen. 20:7) was looked upon as the antithesis of priesthood. Many of the prophets were hostile toward the abuses of the priests and the excesses of the priesthood, but they did not condemn the priesthood, itself. In fact, some prophets were members of the Temple personnel. The prophets functioned mainly as "messengers" of their God. Where the priest was a "ritual" intermediary, the prophet was a "speaking" one. Their message, at times, had a predictive element in it; generally, however, they addressed the historical situation facing their hearers. See Prophets; Priests; High Priest; Levite; Temple.

Conclusion Occupations during the entire span of biblical times were many and varied, as they are today. However, they were occupations suited to a nontechnological society. The nation of Israel remained an agriculturally oriented economy throughout its existence as recorded in the biblical text. Phillip J. Swanson

OCHRAN (Och′ răn) Form of Ocran NAS, REB, NRSV prefer.

OCRAN (Ŏc′ răn) KJV, NIV form of Ochran, a personal name meaning, "troubler." Father of Pagiel, a leader of the tribe of Asher (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72,77; 10:26).

ODED (Ō′ dĕd) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "counter," "restorer," or "timekeeper." 1. Father of the prophet Azariah (2 Chron. 15:1). 2. Prophet in the time of Anaz who urged the Israelites to release the people of Judah they had taken as prisoners of war (2 Chron. 28:8–15).

ODOR Scent of fragrance, usually in the phrase "pleasing odor" (KJV, "sweet savor"). A synonym for a burnt offering (Num. 28:1–2). See Sacrifice and Offerings.

OFFAL NIV term for the waste remaining from the butchering of a sacrificial animal (Ex. 19:14; Lev. 4:11; 8:17; 16:27; Num. 19:5; Mal. 2:3). Other translations render the underlying Hebrew as dung.

OFFENSE Offense translates several Hebrew and Greek terms. The following two senses predominate: 1. That which causes indignation or disgust (Gen. 31:36). Here offense approximates crime (Deut. 19:15; 22:26), guilt (Hos. 5:15), trespass (Rom. 5:15,17,18,20), or sin (2 Cor. 11:7). The application of the image of the rock of offense to Christ is a special case of this sense (Rom. 9:33; Gal. 5:11; 1 Pet. 2:8). What was especially offensive was the claim that an accursed one was the Messiah and that faith in this crucified one and not works was necessary for salvation. 2. That which serves as a hindrance (Matt. 16:23) or obstacle (2 Cor. 6:3). This hindrance is often temptation to sin (Matt. 18:7; Luke 17:1).

OFFERINGS See Sacrifice and Offering.

OFFICES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT Positions of leadership in the New Testament church including deacons, elders, pastors, apostles, bishops, and evangelists. In the New Testament, the concept of "office" speaks to functions and tasks, rather than status and position. Consequently, offices are dynamic rather than static and related to charismatic gifts of the Spirit rather than to the privileges of authority. Both the general terms used for "ministry" and the specific names and requirements of offices lead to this conclusion.

Many Greek words were available to describe Christian ministry. Some of these words, such as arche, from which comes the prefix in "archbishop," focus on rule and headship. Others, such as leitourgia, the root of the word liturgy, were widely used in Greek culture to refer to public service, secular as well as sacred. With very few exceptions, however, the New Testament writers chose the term diakonia, a Greek term which denoted serving at tables and which was not used for religious service in either the Greek Old Testament or in contemporary Greek writings.

Throughout the New Testament, humble, even menial service is expected of those who lead in the name of Christ. Jesus used the analogy of a person reclining at a table and another serving, identified Himself as "one who serves," and asserted that among His followers those who lead must likewise be servants (Luke 22:26–27; see also Matt. 20:25–28; Mark 10:42–45). The clear implication is that, whatever the other qualifications for leadership may be, diakonia is the prerequisite.

The New Testament also clearly teaches that the call to follow Christ is a call to the responsibility of service, and the abilities for that service are gifts from God. All ministries are not the same. The most prominent image of the church's order is Paul's depiction of the church as a body (1 Cor. 12). Just as the body depends on each member fulfilling its function, so the health of the church as a whole, and the ministry of individuals, depends on each member exercising the gifts that God has given. Every Christian has an office, a ministerial function to perform. The only head of the church is Christ. The order of the church is not based on a hierarchy of position and authority but on the faithfulness of the members in exercising their gifts of ministry.

Some offices are given names or descriptive titles in the New Testament, but it gives very little discussion of the job descriptions of the various offices and no indication of a ranking of them. The nature of some of the offices, of course, makes them more prominent in the life of the church.

Perhaps the most prominent New Testament office is that of apostle. See Disciples, Apostles. Although some of the apostles apparently remained in Jerusalem, the primary task of apostles was to spread the message of Christ. To accomplish that task many apostles, such as Peter and Paul, traveled widely, ministering to many churches rather than to one church.

Other officers whose tasks apparently were not limited to one church were prophets and evangelists. The prophets, similar to those in the Old Testament, were probably those who had demonstrated a gift for inspired preaching. Although some of those termed prophets spoke in tongues, Paul valued more highly those whose message was understood by the church (1 Cor. 14:4–5). Since prophetic utterance involved a direct gift from God, prophecy carried a greater risk of abuse than most other offices. Consequently, Paul advised that prophets should be tested carefully (1 Thess. 5:19–21; 1 Cor. 14:29–33). Very few prophets are mentioned specifically; among them are the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21:8–9). Though many prophets seem to have not had a settled ministry (Acts 21:10–11), others, as evidenced by Paul's discussion in 1 Corinthians 14, apparently exercised their gift within a local church. The term evangelist is used only three times in the New Testament, with reference to Timothy (2 Tim. 4:5), to Philip (Acts 21:8), and to a kind of spiritual gift (Eph. 4:11). Although spreading the gospel was central to several offices, we do not have enough to know whether "evangelist" was regularly a distinct office.

Two offices which apparently appeared in almost every church, at least by the end of the New Testament period, were elder and deacon. Although the evidence is not clear and is variously interpreted, the office of bishop was probably originally equivalent to that of elder. The tasks involved in these offices are not as easy to outline as those of apostles and prophets. The qualifications for bishops (elders) indicate that the office included a wide range of pastoral and administrative functions. Elders should be mature Christians of good repute, with gifts for teaching and pastoral ministry (1 Tim. 3:1–7; Titus 1:6–9). Since the word translated "bishop" means "overseer," it is natural to assume that a principal function of the office was to oversee the spiritual and physical life of the church. In every passage in which elders and/or bishops are mentioned, they appear to be ministers settled in local churches.

The word for deacon is derived from diakonia, the basic term for Christian ministry in the New Testament. The qualifications for deacons (1 Tim. 3:8–13) imply that they performed a wide variety of important services in their churches, including visiting the sick and administering relief funds. The name of the office also leads to the conclusion that deacons assisted in serving the Lord's Supper. The account of the appointment of the seven, who are not called deacons, may indicate the origin of the office (Acts 6), although some of the functions of the seven fit other offices equally well. The New Testament apparently refers to female deacons (Rom. 16:1; 1 Tim. 3:11, Williams). Ample evidence shows that female deacons were common in the second century. Similar in function to the female deacons, perhaps identical in some cases, were the widows. Apparently referring to a distinct office, 1 Tim. 5:5–10 gives instruction for enrolling in Christian service widows who had demonstrated their maturity and faithfulness.

Apostles, commissioned by Christ Himself, and prophets, whose gifts were directly and immediately from God, did not receive any additional commissioning ceremony from the church. Although there is very little direct evidence about the procedures and ceremonies involved, those who exhibited gifts for other ministerial tasks were chosen and commissioned by the churches. In some passages, the description of one's being set apart for a particular office includes reference to prayer and laying on of hands (see Acts 6:6; 13:1–3). In these passages, the emphasis is on the presence of spiritual gifts from God and on the church's blessing the ministry of the one chosen. There is no evidence that the ceremonies conferred special rights or status.

In addition to the offices mentioned earlier, the New Testament mentions other tasks and the gifts for performing them. Teachers and the gift of teaching are mentioned often. Sometimes reference to a distinct office may be intended (1 Cor. 12:28), but in many cases teaching was apparently a function of the elders (1 Tim. 3:2), as well as the apostles and perhaps the prophets. Pastors are mentioned only once (Eph. 4:11) in a list of those with spiritual gifts. Apparently the elders (bishops) and deacons were charged with pastoral functions. Performing miracles, healing, helping, and speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 12:28) are among the other tasks mentioned for which God has supplied spiritual gifts. Though these tasks may not have involved regular distinct offices, they were important ministerial functions in the early church.

The New Testament clearly teaches that all followers of Christ share in the responsibility of service. In Christ, no one has a special status which separates an officer from the regular members. All have gifts of service, and all must serve. The whole church is a royal priesthood; the only head of the church is Christ. Every member has an "office," whether or not that office is considered "official." Fred A. Grissom OFFSCOURING That which is removed by scouring; dregs; filth; refuse; scum (Lam. 3:45; 1 Cor. 4:13).

OG (Ōg) The Amorite king of Bashan defeated by the Israelites before they crossed the Jordan (Num. 21:33–35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1–13). Og is identified as the last member of the Rephaim or giants (Deut. 3:11). The term translated "bed" (compare Job 7:13; Amos 3:12) is perhaps better rendered "resting place" in the sense of burial place. Some interpreters suggest that this resting place was similar to black basalt sarcophagi found in Transjordan.

OHAD (Ō′ hăd) Personal name meaning, "unity." Son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15). The name is omitted in parallel lists (Num. 26:12–14; 1 Chron. 4:24).

OHEL (Ō′ hĕl) Personal name meaning, "tent," "family (of God)," or "(God is) shelter." Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:20).

OHOLAH (Ō hō′ lah) Personal name meaning, "tent dweller." A woman's name Ezekiel used to portray Samaria (Ezek. 23:1–10). Oholah and her sister, Oholibah (Jerusalem), are shown as whores who consorted with various men (other nations). The obvious meaning is their spiritual adultery against God. God declared through the prophet that Samaria eventually would be delivered into the hands of her "lover," Assyria (23:9).

OHOLIAB (Ō hō′ lĭ ab) Personal name meaning, "father's tent." Danite craftsman, designer, and embroiderer who assisted Bezalel in supervision of the construction of the tabernacle and its equipment (Ex. 31:6; 35:34; 36:1–2; especially 38:23).

OHOLIBAH (Ō hōl′ ĭ bah) Personal name meaning, "tent worshiper." Younger sister in the allegory of Ezekiel 23 identified with Jerusalem (23:4,11–49). The sexual misconduct of these sisters represents Israel's and Judah's embrace of idolatry. See Ohalah.

OHOLIBAMAH (Ō′ hŏl ĭ bā′ mah) Personal name meaning, "tent of the high place" or "tent dweller of the false cult."

1. The Hivite daughter of Anah and wife of Esau (Gen. 36:2). 2. Edomite leader descended from Esau (Gen. 36:41).

OIL An indispensable commodity in the Ancient Near East for food, medicine, fuel, and ritual. Oil was considered a blessing given by God (Deut. 11:14), and the olive tree was a characteristic of the land which God gave to Israel (Deut. 8:8).

Preparation In biblical times, domestic oil was prepared from olives. Sometimes oil was combined with perfumes and used as a cosmetic (Esth. 2:12). The extraction of oil from olives is abundantly confirmed by archaeological findings of stone presses found at several sites in Palestine. See Agriculture. This oil, called "beaten oil," was lighter and considered the best oil. After the beaten oil was extracted, another grade of oil was produced by heating the pulp and pressing it again.

Domestic oil was stored in small cruses, pots, or jars (1 Kings 17:12; 2 Kings 4:2); oil used in religious ceremonies was also kept in horns (1 Sam. 16:13).

Use Oil was used in a variety of ways in biblical times; but, most often, oil was used in the preparation of food, taking the place of animal fat. Oil was used with meal in the preparation of cakes (Num. 11:8; 1 Kings 17:12–16) and with honey (Ezek. 16:13), flour (Lev. 2:1,4), and wine (Rev. 6:6).

Oil was used as fuel for lamps, both in homes (Matt. 25:3) and in the tabernacle (Ex. 25:6).

Oil was extensively used in religious ceremonies. The morning and evening sacrifices required, in addition to the lambs, a tenth of a measure of fine flour and a fourth of a hin of beaten oil. Other cereal offerings also required oil. Oil was used during the offering of purification from leprosy. In the New Testament, oil was used to anoint a body in preparation for burial (Matt. 26:12; Mark 14:8). Several persons in the Old Testament were anointed with oil: kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13), priests (Lev. 8:30), and possibly prophets (1 Kings. 19:16; Isa. 61:1). Some objects were also anointed in dedication to God: the tabernacle and all its furniture (Ex. 40:9–11), the shields of soldiers (2 Sam. 1:21; Isa. 21:5), altars (Lev. 8:10–11), and pillars (Gen. 35:14).

As medicine, oil or ointment was used in the treatment of wounds (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34). James 5:14 may refer either to a symbolic use of oil or to its medicinal use.

Oil was used cosmetically as protection against the scorching sun or the dryness of the desert (Ruth 3:3; Eccl. 9:8). Since olives were found in abundance in Palestine, olive oil was also used as a commodity of trade (1 Kings 5:11; Ezek. 27:17; Hos. 12:1). See Cosmetics; Commerce.

Oil was regarded as a symbol of honor (Judg. 9:9), while virtue was compared to perfumed oil (Song of Sol. 1:3; Eccl. 7:1). The abundance of oil was a demonstration of blessing and prosperity (Job 29:6); Joel 2:24). However, as a symbol of affluence, oil was also associated with the arrogance of the rich (Hebrew: "valley of oil"; KJV: "fat valley," Isa. 28:1,4). Oil was a symbol of joy and gladness (Ps. 45:7), and in time of sorrow, anointing with oil was not practiced (2 Sam. 14:2). See Anoint. Claude F. Mariottini

OIL TREE KJV translation of the Hebrew phrase "tree of oil" (Isa. 41:19). Other translation include olive (NAS, NIV, NRSV, TEV), oleaster (NAS margin), and wild olive (REB). The same Hebrew phrase is rendered "olivewood" at 1 Kings 6:23,31–33 and "wild olive" at Nehemiah 8:15. The latter text distinguishes the "oil tree" from the olive. Some interpreters suggest pine or cypress as the material of the carved cherubim in 1 Kings.

OINTMENT Perfumed unguents or salves of various kinds used as cosmetics, medicine, and in religious ceremonies. The use of ointments and perfumes appears to have been a common practice in the Ancient Near East, including the Hebrews.

Terminology The Old Testament uses various words to describe ointment. The most common, shemen, simply means oil (Gen. 28:28; Hos. 2:8). The Old Testament does not distinguish between oil and ointment. In the New Testament, muron, "ointment" (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3–4; Luke 7:37–38) was a perfumed ointment.

Manufacture The base for ointment was olive oil. Olives were very common in Palestine; however, perfumed salves were very expensive. A great demand arose for ointments as people attempted to protect themselves against the hot wind from the desert and the arid condition of the land.

The preparation of ointments was the job of skilled persons trained in the art of producing perfume. Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed by God to prepare the sacred ointment and the incense used in worship (Ex. 31:1–11). While the blending of perfumes and ointment for secular use was probably done by women (1 Sam. 8:13), priestly families were responsible for the production of the large amount of ointments necessary for Temple use (1 Chron. 9:30). In the postexilic period a group of professional people in Jerusalem were skilled in the manufacture of perfumed ointments (Neh. 3:8). These people were called "apothecary" (KJV) or "perfumers" (RSV, NIV; Ex. 30:25,35; 37:29; Eccl. 10:1). Their function was to take the many gums, resins, roots, and barks and combine them with oil to make the various anointments used for anointing purposes. In many cases, the formula for these ointments and perfumes was a professional secret, handed down from generation to generation. Egyptian and Ugaritic sources have shown that water mixed with oil was heated in large pots (see Job 41:31). While the water was boiling, the spices were added. After the ingredients were blended, they were transferred to suitable containers. See Containers and Vessels. To preserve the special scents of the ointment, alabaster jars with long necks were sealed at the time the ointment was prepared and then broken just before use (Mark 14:3). Dry perfumes were kept in bags (Song of Sol. 1:13) and in perfume boxes (Isa. 3:20 NRSV; NIV: "perfume bottles"; KJV: "tablets").

Ingredients Various spices were used in the manufacturing of ointments and perfumes: aloes (Ps. 45:8; John 19:39); balsam (Ex. 30:23; 2 Chron. 9:1); galbanum (Ex. 30:34), myrrh, or more literally mastic or ladanum (Gen. 37:25; 43:11); myrrh (Esth. 2:12; Matt. 2:11), nard (Song of. Sol. 4:13–14; Mark 14:3; KJV: "spikenard"), frankincense (KJV: "incense"; Isa. 60:6; Matt. 2:11); balsam or balm (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22); cassia (Ex. 30:24; Ezek. 27:19), calamus (Ex. 30:23; Song of Sol. 4:14; NRSV: "aromatic cane"), cinnamon (Ex. 30:23; Rev. 18:13), stacte (Ex. 30:34), and onycha (Ex. 30:34). Onycha, an ingredient derived from mollusks found in the Red Sea, was used in the mixture to be burned on the altar of incense. These spices were used as fragrant incense in worship. They were also mixed with oil to produce the holy anointing oil and to produce cosmetics and medicine.

Value Most of these spices were imported by the people who lived in Palestine. The great variety of spices used in the manufacture of ointments gave rise to merchants who traded in expensive spices and perfumes (Gen. 37:28; Ezek. 27:17–22). In biblical times, Arabia was one of the principal traders in aromatic spices. Spices were also imported from Africa, India, and Persia. Perfumed ointments were highly prized. Solomon received an annual payment of perfume as tribute from his subjects (1 Kings 10:25); the queen of Sheba brought many costly spices as gifts to Solomon (1 Kings 10:2); Hezekiah, king of Judah, included valuable perfumed ointment and spices as part of his treasure (2 Kings 20:13; Isa. 39:2). When Mary anointed Jesus with a pound of costly ointment, Judas Iscariot rebuked Jesus because the ointment was worth the equivalent of one year's salary (John 12:3–8).

Use Many personal things were perfumed with spiced ointment. The breath was perfumed (Song of Sol. 7:8), probably with spiced wine (Song of Sol. 8:2). The garments of the king were perfumed with myrrh, aloes , and cassia (Ps. 45:8), or myrrh, frankincense, and "with all powders of the merchant" (Song of Sol. 3:6). The bed of the prostitute was perfumed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon (Prov. 7:17).

One of the most important uses of ointment in the Old Testament was in religious ceremonies. The manufacture of the anointing oil consisted of mixing olive oil with myrrh, sweet cinnamon, calamus, and cassia (Ex. 30:22–25). This ointment was considered to be holy; anyone who manufactured the sacred oil for use outside the worship place was to be cut off from the people (Ex. 30:33). See Oil; Anoint. Many individuals were anointed with the sacred ointment. The anointing of a person was viewed as an act of designation of that person to the service of God.

The shield of a soldier was anointed with oil (2 Sam. 1:21) as a symbol of dedication to God. Jacob anointed the pillar at Bethel, and the site where God appeared to him became a holy place (Gen. 28:18; 35:14).

Ointments were used in burial rites. See Burial.

Many people in the Ancient Near East believed strongly in the curative power of oil. See Diseases; Oil. For this reason they used ointments as medicine in the treatment of some diseases (Jer. 8:22; Mark 6:13; Jas. 5:14) and as unguents for wounds (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34). The law of Moses commanded the person healed of leprosy to be anointed with oil (Lev. 14:15–18,26–29).

Ointments were used as cosmetics for protection of the skin. Perfumes were used to counteract bodily odor. The whole body was usually anointed with perfume after bathing (Ruth 3:3; 2 Sam 12:20; Ezek. 16:9). Perfumes were used inside the clothes (Song of Sol. 1:13) and by women who desired to be attractive to men (Esth. 2:12).

OLD GATE KJV, NAS, NRSV designation for a Jerusalem city gate repaired in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:6; 12:39). This rendering is doubtful on grammatical grounds (the adjective and noun do not agree). Some interpreters thus propose gate of the old (city). Others take the Hebrew Jeshanah as a proper name (NIV, REB, TEV). A village named Jeshanah is located near Bethel. The gate may have pointed in this direction. Still others emend the text to read "Misneh Gate" (JB). In this case the gate led from the Old City West into the New Quarter (Mishneh). The gate is perhaps identical to the corner gate (2 Kings 14:13).

OLD TESTAMENT The first part of the Christian Bible, taken over from Israel. It tells the history of the nation Israel and God's dealings with them to the return from Exile in Babylon. For Jews it is the complete Bible, sometimes called Tanak for its three parts (Torah or Law, Nebiim or Prophets, Kethubim or Writings). Christians see its complement in the New Testament, which reveals Jesus Christ as the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy. The Old Testament has three major divisions: Law, Prophets (Former and Latter), and Writings. The Law (Genesis—Deuteronomy) begins with the creation of the world and concludes as Israel is about to enter the Promised Land. The Prophets—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets—continue with the nation in the land of Palestine until the Exile and includes prophetic messages delivered to the nation. The Writings (all other books) contain the account of the return from Exile, collected wisdom literature from throughout the nation's history, and selected stories about God's leading in individual lives. See Bible, Formation and Canon.

OLD TESTAMENT QUOTATIONS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT The influence of the Old Testament is seen throughout the New Testament. The New Testament writers included approximately 250 express Old Testament quotations, and if one includes indirect or partial quotations, the number jumps to more than 1,000. It is clear that the writers of the New Testament were concerned with demonstrating the continuity between the Old Testament Scriptures and the faith they proclaimed. They were convinced that in Jesus the Old Testament promises had been fulfilled.

Types of Quotations 1. Formula quotations are introduced by a typical introductory quotations formula which generally employ verbs of "saying" or "writing." The most common introductory formulas are: "as the scripture hath said" (John 7:38); "What saith the Scripture" (Gal. 4:30); "it is (stands) written," emphasizing the permanent validity of the Old Testament revelation (Mark 1:2; Rom. 1:17; 3:10); "that it might be fulfilled," emphasizing the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies (Matt. 4:14, 12:17, 21:4); "God hath said," "He saith," "the Holy Spirit says," which personify Scripture and reflect its divine dimension (Rom. 9:25; 10:21; 2 Cor. 6:16); "Moses," "David," or "Isaiah" says which emphasize the human element in Scripture (Rom. 10:16, 19,20; Heb. 4:7).

2. Composite quotations combine two or more Old Testament texts drawn from one or more of the sections of the Hebrew Old Testament canon (The Law, Prophets, and Writings). For example, Romans 11:8–10 quotes from the Law (Deut. 29:4), the Prophets (Isa. 29:10) and the writings (Ps. 69:22–23). In some cases, a series of Old Testament texts may be used in a commentary-like fashion as in John 12:38–40 and Romans 9—11. Composite quotes are often organized around thematic emphases or catchwords in keeping with a practice common to Judaism and based on the notion set forth in Deuteronomy 19:15 that two or three witnesses establish the matter. The "stumbling stone" motif reflected in Romans 9:33 (Isa. 8:14; 28:16) and 1 Peter 2:6–9 (Isa. 8:14; 28:16; Ps. 118:22) is a good example of this method.

3. Unacknowledged quotations are often woven into the fabric of the New Testament text without acknowledgment or introduction. For example, Paul quoted Genesis 15:6 in his discussion of Abraham (Gal. 3:6) and Genesis 12:3 (Gal. 3:8) with no acknowledgment or introductory formula.

4. Indirect quotations or allusions form the most difficult type of Old Testament quotation to identify. The gradation from quotation to allusion may be almost imperceptible. An allusion may be little more than a clause, phrase, or even a word drawn from an Old Testament text which might easily escape the notice of the reader. For example, the reader might easily miss the fact that the words spoken from the cloud at the transfiguration of Jesus as recorded in Matthew 17:5 combine three separate Old Testament texts: "Thou art my Son" (Ps. 2:7), "in whom my soul delighteth" (Isa. 42:1), and "unto him ye shall hearken" (Deut. 18:15).

Sources of Old Testament Quotations Since the New Testament was written in Greek for predominantly Greek readers, it is not surprising that a large majority of Old Testament quotes in the New Testament are drawn from the Greek translation of the Old Testament known as the Septuagint (LXX). Of Paul's 93 quotes, 51 are in absolute or virtual agreement with the LXX, while only 4 agree with the Hebrew text. This means that 38 diverge from all known Greek or Hebrew Old Testament texts. Of Matthew's 43 quotes, 11 agree with the LXX, while the other 32 differ from all known sources. How then are these quotes to be explained? The New Testament writers may have used a version of the Old Testament which is unknown to us, or they may have been quoting from memory. It is also possible that the New Testament writers were more concerned with meaning and interpretation. It has also been suggested that the Old Testament quotations may have been drawn from "testimony books," collections of selected, combined, and interpreted Old Testament texts gathered by the early Christian community for proclamation and apologetics. The frequent use of certain Old Testament texts, such as Psalm 110, Isaiah 43, and so forth, in the preaching and writing of the early church and the discovery of such collections at Qumran seem to support such a possibility.

The Uses of Old Testament Quotations The New Testament writers used Old Testament quotations for at least four reasons: (1) to demonstrate that Jesus is the fulfillment of God's purposes and of the prophetic witness of the Old Testament Scriptures (Rom. 1:2; Matt. 4:14; 12:17–21; 21:4–5); (2) as a source for ethical instruction and edification of the church (Rom. 13:8–10; 2 Cor. 13:1); (3) to interpret contemporary events (Rom. 9—11; 15:8–12); (4) to prove a point on the assumption that the Scripture is God's Word (1 Cor. 10:26; 14:21; 15:55). The approaches employed in the use of the Old Testament are reflective of first century Judaism as represented in the Dead Sea Scrolls, Philo of Alexandra, and later rabbinic Judaism. Some Old Testament quotations are used in their literal historical sense and, therefore, have the same meaning in the New Testament as they had in the Old Testament. The quotation of Psalm 78:24 in John 6:31 is a good example of such usage. Some quotations reflect a typical approach to interpreting the Old Testament in first-century Judaism known as midrash. Midrash is an exposition of a text which aims at bringing out its contemporary relevance. The Old Testament text is quoted and explained so as to make it apply to or be meaningful for the current situation. The use of Genesis 15:6 in Romans 4:3–25 and the use of Psalm 78:24 in John 6:31–58 reflect such an approach.

Some Old Testament texts are interpreted typologically. In this approach, the New Testament writer sees a correspondence between persons, events, or things in the Old Testament and persons, events, or things in their contemporary setting. The correspondence with the past is not found in the written text, but within the historical event. Underlying typology is the conviction that certain events in the past history of Israel as recorded in earlier Scriptures revealed God's ways and purposes with persons in a typical way. Matthew's use of Hosea 11:1 (2:15) suggests that the Gospel writer saw a correspondence between Jesus' journey into Egypt and the Egyptian sojourn of the people of Israel. Jesus recapitulated or reexperienced the sacred history of Israel. The redemptive purposes of God demonstrated in the Exodus (reflected by the prophet Hosea) were being demonstrated in Jesus' life. In some cases, the understanding and application of the Old Testament quotation is dependent on an awareness of the quotation's wider context in the Old Testament. The use of the quotation is intended to call the reader's attention to the wider Old Testament context or theme and might be referred to as a "pointer quotation." In first-century Judaism where large portions of Scripture were known by heart, it was customary to quote only the beginning of a passage even if its continuation was to be kept in mind. A good example of this use may be seen in Romans 1—3. Paul had discussed both the faithfulness of God and the sinfulness of humanity. In Romans 3:4 Paul quoted Psalm 51:4 to support his first point. He continued his argument with a further reference to human wickedness which is, in fact, the subject of Psalm 51:5; but he did not feel the need to quote the verse, since it was already suggested to those familiar with the biblical text. Finally, there is a limited allegorical use of the Old Testament text in which the text is seen as a kind of code having two meanings—the literal, superficial level of meaning, and a deeper, underlying meaning such as in Galatians 4:22–31.

Despite similarities with contemporary Jewish use(s) of the Old Testament, the New Testament writers interpreted the Old Testament in a radically new way. New Testament writers did not deliberately use a different exegetical method. They wrote from a different theological perspective. The writers of the New Testament were convinced that the true meaning of the Old Testament is Jesus Christ and that He alone provides the means of understanding it. True interpretation of the Old Testament is achieved by reading Old Testament passages or incidents in light of the event of Christ. While many of the Old Testament texts quoted in the New Testament had already been accepted as messianic (for example, Ps. 110:1) or could in light of Jesus' actual life claim to be messianic (Ps. 22; Isa. 53), for the early Christians, all Scripture was to be interpreted by the fact of Christ because it is to Him that the Old Testament Scripture points (John 5:39). In summary, the New Testament writer quoted or alluded to the Old Testament in order to demonstrate how God's purposes have been fulfilled and are being fulfilled in Jesus. Hulitt Gloer ered with olive trees, the ridge juts out in a north-south direction (like a spur) from the range of mountains running down the center of the region. Both the central Mount of Olives and Mount Scopus, the peak on its northern side, rise over two hundred feet above the Temple mount across the Kidron Valley. It provided a lookout base and signaling point for armies defending Jerusalem.

David crossed the Mount of Olives when fleeing Absalom (2 Sam. 15:30). Ezekiel saw the cherubim chariot land there (Ezek. 11:23). Zechariah described how the Mount of Olives would move to form a huge valley on the Day of the Lord (Zech. 14:3–5). Many crucial events in Jesus' life occurred on the Mount of Olives. (See, for example, Matt. 26:30; Mark 11:1–2; Luke 4:5; 22:39–46; Acts 1:9–12). Robert O. Byrd

OLIVET DISCOURSE, THE (Ŏl′ ĭ vĕt) Jesus' major sermon preached on the Mount of Olives; Jesus gave instructions concerning the end of the age and the destruction of Jerusalem. The discourse (Matthew 24—25; Mark 13) is in part an apocalypse because it uses symbolic, visionary language that makes it a difficult passage to understand. Parts of it appear scattered throughout Luke 12—21.

Meaning of the Signs (Matt. 24:4–8) The opening remarks warn against misplaced belief in deceptive signs which do not in any way signal the end of the world. These signs occurred in Jesus' day and preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, the event uppermost in Jesus' mind and for which He sought to prepare His disciples. They are still operative after two thousand years, a further indication that they do not herald the end time.

A Time of Persecution (Matt. 24:9–14) These verses suggest a time of severe distress. Many would say that the reference is to a period of ultimate suffering that is to take place just before the parousia (Christ's return or second coming; see 7:14). Jesus' assertion that the gospel must be preached worldwide seems to strengthen this view. "He that shall endure unto the end" (Matt. 24:13) could refer to the period immediately prior to the parousia. It could also pertain to the end of some other event such as the destruction of Jerusalem. Oppression of Christians and family betrayal were common. That Christians were despised and subjected to great suffering is an accurate description of the situation in Judea before the Jewish War, A.D. 66–70, when Titus destroyed the city.

The Abomination that Makes Desolate (Matt. 24:15–22) Extrabiblical histories describe the desecration of the Jerusalem Temple in 167 B.C. by Antiochus Epiphanes, who built an altar there to Zeus. That event is usually seen as having fulfilled Daniel's prophecy (Dan. 11:31). However, Jesus applied the prophecy to a future overthrow of Jerusalem by Titus' armies. The horror of this seige was unprecedented. Temple and city were utterly demolished. See Intertestamental History.

The Second Coming of Christ (Matt. 24:26—25:46) Jesus spoke in veiled language about His coming. Unnatural occurrences in the heavens were commonly used in apocalyptic writings to describe the indescribable, but also to deliberately screen from view those things meant to remain hidden. Much of God's plans are mystery, but Jesus disclosed enough. The coming of the Son of Man will be entirely public and completely unexpected. He will come in the clouds with great power (Acts 1:9–11). The sign of His parousia is obscure in its meaning. The sermon is interrupted by the statement, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt 24:34). Jesus was not confused or in error concerning these events. He referred to the destruction of Jerusalem which took place in that generation as a foretaste of the final coming. Concluding parables teach the necessity of remaining watchful. A description of final judgment ends the discourse. Its basic message is a call to be prepared when Jesus does return. Diane Cross

OLYMPAS (Ō′ lym′ pas) Perhaps a shortened form of Olympiodorus (gift of Olympus). Christian whom Paul greeted in Romans 16:15. Olympas was apparently a member of a house church including the others mentioned in 16:15.

OMAR (Ō′ mar) Personal name meaning, "talkative." Son of Eliphaz and ancestor of an Edomite clan of the same name (Gen. 36:11,15; 1 Chron. 1:36).

OMEGA (Ō mē′ gă) Last letter in the Greek alphabet. Together with the first letter, alpha, omega designates God and Christ as the all-encompassing Reality (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13). See Alpha.

OMEN 1. Sign used by diviners to predict the future. The Israelites were prohibited from interpreting omens (Deut. 18:10 NAS, NIV). Pagan prophecy employed reading of omens (Num. 24:1 NAS, RSV; Ezek. 21:21 NIV). As Lord of history, God frustrates the plans of "liars" who interpret omens (Isa. 44:25 NAS, RSV). See Divination and Magic. 2. Sign indicating a future event. Ahab's reference to Ben-hadad as "my brother" was understood as an omen or sign of Ahab's favor (1 Kings 20:33 NAS, NRSV). Companions of the high priest Joshua were a good omen (NRSV) or a symbol (NAS) of hope for a restored people of God (Zech. 3:8). The faithful witness of Christians in the face of opposition is likewise an omen or sign pointed to the salvation of believers and the destruction of God's enemies (Phil. 1:28).

OMER (Ō′ mĕr) 1. Unit of dry measure equal to one tenth of an ephah or a little more than two quarts (Ex. 16:13–36). See Weights and Measurements. 2. First sheaf (omer) of the barley harvest which was elevated as an offering (Lev. 23:9–15). See Sacrifice and Offerings.

OMNIPOTENCE (Ŏm nĭ′ pō tĕnce) The state of being all-powerful which theology ascribes to God. Scripture often affirms that all power belongs to God (Ps. 147:5), that all things are possible for God (Luke 1:37; 19:26), and that God's power exceeds what humans can ask or think (Eph. 3:20). For Scripture, God's omnipotence is not a matter of abstract speculation but a force to be reckoned with. God's power is revealed in God's creating and sustaining the universe (Ps. 65:6; Jer. 32:17; Heb. 1:3), in God's deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh's forces (Ex. 15:1–18), in the conquest of Canaan (Deut. 3:21–24), in the incarnation (Luke 1:35), in Christ's death on the cross (1 Cor. 1:17–18, 23–24), and in the ongoing ministry of the church (1 Cor. 2:5; Eph. 3:20).

OMNIPRESENCE See God.

OMNISCIENCE (Ŏm nĭ′ science) The state of being all-knowing which theology ascribes to God. Though Scripture affirms God's immeasurable understanding (Ps. 147:5), God's omniscience is not a matter of abstract speculation. Rather, God's knowing is a matter of personal experience. God knows us intimately (Ps. 139:1–6; Matt. 6:4,6,8). Such knowledge is cause for alarm for the unrighteous but for confidence for God's saints (Job 23:10; Pss. 34:15–16; 90:8; Prov. 15:3; 1 Pet. 3:12). See God.

OMRI (Ŏm′ rī) Personal name meaning, "pilgrim" or "life." 1. King of Israel 885–874 B.C. and founder of the Omride dynasty, which ruled until 842. Omri came to the throne in a very odd manner. Zimri, a chariot captain in Israel's army, assassinated King Elah and took control of the palace of Tirzah (1 Kings 16:8–15). Half of the people rebelled and installed Omri ("captain of the host," v. 16) as king. When Zimri realized his situation was hopeless, he burned the palace down upon himself. Omri became king only after successfully opposing another rebellion in the person of Tibni (vv. 21–22). In his reign of eleven years, Omri's greatest accomplishment was to buy the hill of Samaria and build the capital of Israel there. He was succeeded by his son, Ahab. Assyrian sources continued to call Israel, "the land of Omri." Micah accused Jerusalem of following Omri's actions and also his son Ahab's. That was grounds for God's destroying Jerusalem (Mic. 6:16). 2. Officer of tribe of Issachar under David (1 Chron. 27:18). 3. Grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8). 4. Grandfather of member of tribe of Judah who returned to Jerusalem from Exile about 537 B.C.

ON (Ŏn) 1. Egyptian place name meaning, "city of the pillar," called in Greek Heliopolis or "city of the sun" and in Hebrew as Beth-shemesh, "city of the sun" (Jer. 43:13) and Aven. It was the cult center for the worship of the sun-god, Ra (Atum). Although not important politically, the city became a vital religious center very early in Egypt's history. Located at Matariyeh about five miles northeast of modern Cairo, the city endured as a cult center ultil very late. Joseph's Egyptian wife came from On (Gen. 41:45), her father serving as priest in the temple there. Speaking in Egypt, Jeremiah warned that God would destory On and its worship (Jer. 43:13). Ezekiel or the scribes copying his work substituted Aven, Hebrew for "trouble, deceit," for On in pronouncing judgment on it (Ezek. 30:17). 2. Personal name meaning, "powerful, rich." Member of tribe of Reuben who was one of leaders challenging authority of Moses (Num. 16:1).

ONAM (Ō′ năm) Personal name meaning, "vigorous." 1. Ancestor of an Edomite subclan (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40). 2. Ancestor of a family of Jerahmeelites, a subclan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:26,28).

ONAN (Ō′ năn) Personal name meaning, "power." A son of Judah and his Canaanite wife, Shuah (Gen. 38:2–8). Following the death of his older brother, Er, Onan was to have married the widow and produced a son who would carry on Er's name. Onan repeatedly failed to complete the responsibilities of the marriage and thus God killed him (38:8–10). (See Levirate Law; Marriage).

ONESIMUS (Ō nĕs′ ĭ mŭs) Personal name that may mean, "profitable." The slave for whom Paul wrote his letter to Philemon. In the epistle, Paul pled with Philemon to free the servant because Onesimus had been so helpful to the apostle. Onesimus had robbed his master, escaped, met Paul, and accepted Christ. In sending him back to Philemon, Paul urged the owner to treat the slave as a Christian brother (v. 16).

Later, Onesimus accompanied Thychius in bearing Paul's letter to the church at Colossae (Col. 4:7–9). Two traditions connect Onesimus with a bishop of that name in the second-century church, and with Onesiphorus in 2 Timothy 1:16. Neither connection has been proven satisfactorily. See Philemon.

ONESIPHORUS (Ō nĕ sĭph′ ō rŭs) Personal name meaning, "profit bearing." Ephesian Christian praised for his effort to seek out the place of Paul's arrest, his disregard of the shame connected with befriending one in chains, and his past service in Ephesus (2 Tim. 1:16–18). The greeting of and prayer for the household of Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 1:16; 4:19) has suggested to some that Onesiphorus was already dead. All that can be assumed is that Onesiphorus was not at Ephesus.

ONION See Plants in the Bible.

ONLY BEGOTTEN KJV alternate rendering of the Greek monogenes (John 1:14,18; 3:16,18; Heb. 11:17; 1 John 4:9). Elsewhere the KJV rendered the term "only" (Luke 7:12; 8:42; 9:38). The phrase "only begotten" derives directly from Jerome (340?–420 A.D.) who replaced unicus (only), the reading of the Old Latin, with unigenitus (only begotten) as he translated the Latin Vulgate. Jerome's concern was to refute the Arian doctrine that claimed the Son was not begotten but made. This led Jerome to impose the terminology of the Nicene creed (325 A.D.) onto the New Testament.

Monogenes is used for an only child (Luke 7:12; 8:42; 9:38). The writer of Hebrews used monogenes of Isaac with full knowledge that Isaac was not Abraham's only child (Heb. 11:17–18). Here monogenes designates Isaac as the special child of promise through whom Abraham's descendants would be named.

KJV, NAS render monogenes as "only begotten" when referring to Jesus. NIV renders the term "One and Only" (Compare the NAS margin, "unique, only one of His kind.") Other translations (REB, NRSV, TEV) render monogenes consistently as "only." John used monogenes to designate the unique relationship which Jesus shares with God. John is careful to reserve the term Son for Jesus; believers are children (John 1:12; 1 John 3:1–2; 5:2). As unique Son of God, Jesus makes God's glory known in a unique way (John 1:14,18). As the One and Only Son, Jesus is the unique gift of God, the giving of God's own self for salvation (John 3:16; 1 John 4:9). Because Jesus is the unique representative of God, rejection of Jesus is tantamount to rejection of God. Such rejection results in swift condemnation (John 3:18). Chris Church

ONO (Ō′ nō) Name meaning, "grief." Benjaminite town about seven miles southeast of Joppa. The town appears in a list of Pharoah Thutmose III (1490–1436 B.C.). The Mishnah regarded Ono as fortified since the time of Joshua. The city was rebuilt by Shemed, a descendant of Benjamin (2 Chron. 8:12). Ono was home to some of those who returned from Exile (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:36). Ono is identified with Kefr' Ana in the wadi Musrara. This broad wadi is called the valley of craftsmen (Neh. 11:35) and the Plain of Ono (Neh. 6:2).

ONYCHA (Ŏn′ ў cha) A spice probably derived from the closing flaps or the shell of a Red Sea mollusk which was used in the incense reserved for the worship of Yahweh (Ex. 30:34).

ONYX See Minerals and Metals.

OPHEL (Ō′ phēl) Place name meaning, "swelling, fat, bulge," or "mound." It became the proper name of a portion of the hill on which the city of David was built (2 Chron. 27:3). The Ophel was just south of Mount Moriah, on which the Temple was constructed, joining the old city with the area of Solomon's palace and Temple. The hill has been inhabited since pre-Israelite times by peoples such as the Jebusites from whom David took the site. David and later kings further fortified Ophel. It served as the living quarters for those who rebuilt the ramparts following the Exile (Neh. 3:26–27). This may reflect a gradual extension of the name to an ever-larger area. Micah used the Hebrew term to name "the strong hold of the daughter of Zion" (4:8). Isaiah warned that the "forts" or "hill" (NAS) would be destroyed (32:14). The Hebrew term is used with an uncertain meaning in 2 Kings 5:24 for "tower," "hill," (NAS), "citadel" (NRSV). The term also occurs on the Moabite stone.

OPHIR (O′ phīr) Place and personal name meaning, "dusty." Place famous in the Ancient Near East for its trade, especially in gold. Solomon's ships with help from Phoenician sailors brought precious goods from Ophir (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11; compare 1 Kings 22:48). Gold from Ophir was apparently highly valued, the phrase becoming a stock descriptive term in Ancient Near Eastern commercial language (Isa. 13:12; Job 22:24; 28:16; Ps. 45:10). Ophir is mentioned outside the Bible on a piece of broken pottery found at tell el-Qasileh, north of Tel Aviv on the plain of Sharon. See Aphek. This inscription reads, "Gold of Ophir for Beth Horon, 30 shekels."

The geographical location of Ophir is disputed among biblical scholars. Three regions have been suggested: India, Arabia, and Africa. Scholars who support an Indian location do so because of the resemblance of the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Old Testament) form of Ophir to the Egyptian name for India. The available evidence with regard to trade practices indicates that Egyptian, Phoenician, and Greek fleets obtained eastern goods indirectly through ports in South Arabia and East Africa.

Other scholars have suggested that Ophir was located on the Arabian Peninsula. At least five areas have been identified, but the evidence for certainty with regard to any of them is lacking. The strongest argument for an Arabian location is the occurrence of the name Ophir among the names of Arabian tribes, descendants of Joktan, in the Table of Nations in Genesis 10.

Finally, one location in Africa has been suggested: the East African coast in the general vicinity of Somaliland. This location is supported because of its distance from Palestine and the products that are characteristic of Africa that are mentioned in biblical texts (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11,22).

The location of Ophir will remain a matter of uncertainty. A knowledge of ancient trade routes and practices, maritime ventures in the Ancient Near East, and economic policies in ancient Israel will be helpful in determining the cite of Ophir. See Commerce; Economic Life. James Newell

OPHNI (Ŏph′ nī) Name meaning, "high place." Town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:24). Ophni was likely in the vicinity of Geba and is perhaps Jifna, three miles northwest of Bethel near the intersection of the Jerusalem-Shechem road and the road leading from the Plain of Sharon to Bethel.

OPHRAH (Ŏph′ rah) Name meaning, "fawn." 1. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:14); 2. City in Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), likely north of Michmash (1 Sam. 13:17–18). This Ophrah is perhaps identical with Ephron (2 Chron. 13:19) and Ephraim (2 Sam. 13:23; John 11:54). Jerome located Ophrah five Roman miles east of Bethel. This site is likely et-Taiyibeh five miles north of Michmash and four miles northeast of Bethel. 3. Town associated with the Abiezer clan of Manasseh who settled west of the Jordan (Judg. 6:11,15,24; 8:32). This Ophrah was the home of Gideon. Suggested sites include et-Taiyibeh south of modern Tulkarm, et-Taiyibeh (Afula) on the Plain of Esdraelon west of Mount Moreh, and Fer'ata west of Mount Gerazim near Shechem. The latter site is better identified with Tizrah.

ORACLES Communications from God. The term refers both to divine responses to a question asked of God and to pronouncements made by God without His being asked. In one sense, oracles were prophecies since they often referred to the future; but oracles sometimes dealt with decisions to be made in the present. Usually, in the Bible the communication was from Yahweh, the God of Israel. In times of idol worship, however, Israelites did seek a word or pronouncement from false gods (Hos. 4:12). Many of Israel's neighbors sought oracles from their gods.

Although the word oracle is not very frequent in the Old Testament, oracles were common in that period. This difference occurs because the Hebrew words translated "oracle" may also be translated as "burden," "saying," "word," etc. Translations are not consistent in how they render these Hebrew words. Both the NRSV and the NAS translate the same Hebrew word as "oracle" in Numbers 24:3, but it is rendered "declare" in 1 Samuel 2:30. Jeremiah 23:33–34 makes a play on a Hebrew word which may be translated either "burden" or "oracle." The NAS uses "oracle," but the NRSV and KJV use "burden." Moreover, in the KJV the English word oracle is used to refer to the holy of holies in the Temple.

Concordance study shows the following meaning and use of "oracle." Sometimes "oracle" refers to the whole of a prophetic book (Mal. 1:1 NRSV) or a major portion of one (Hab. 1:1 NRSV). In Isaiah, several smaller prophecies of judgment or punishment are called "oracles" (13:1 NRSV; 14:28 NRSV). The NRSV also entitles Zechariah 9 and 12 "An Oracle." Specific sayings about God's judgment on Joram (2 Kings 9:25 NRSV) and Joash (2 Chron. 24:27 NRSV) are also called oracles. Other examples, although the word oracle is not used, include Elijah's word to Ahab (1 Kings 21:17–19) and Elisha's word to Jehoram (2 Kings 3:13–20). On the basis of these kinds of usages, many Bible students understand oracles to be divine words of punishment or judgment. However, Balaam's oracle (Num. 24:3–9) is a blessing. Also references to Ahithophel's counsel (2 Sam. 16:23) and to oracles in Jerusalem which were pleasing but false (Lam. 2:14) show us that prophetic pronouncements were not always negative.

The New Testament does not reflect quite the same use of oracles or the word oracle as does the Old. The early church did have prophets like Agabus (Acts 21:10–11), who expressed God's word regarding what was to come. The word oracles in the New Testament most often refers to the teachings of God in the Old Testament (Acts 7:38; Rom 3:2). It may refer to Christian teachings, too (Heb 5:12).

Why Were Oracles Given? We must distinguish between oracles that were sought and those that came without any request. The first kind might be called "decision oracles." The second kind will be referred to as "pronouncement oracles." Decision oracles came when people asked God a question or sought His counsel. For example, David needed to know the right time to attack the Philistines. So he asked God. The answers he received were oracles (2 Sam. 5:19,23–24). Saul, the first king of Israel, was chosen through an oracle (1 Sam. 10:20–24). In that case, the communication from God was through the casting of lots. The falling of the lots was considered an oracle from God. Decision oracles, then, were God's response to questions and concerns in the present. They did not condemn sin or predict the future in any specific sense.

Pronouncement oracles were God's word to a situation or a person even though no word from God had been sought. (But, see comments below on Balaam's oracle.) The pronouncement oracles were sometimes brief as when Elijah foretold a drought in Israel (1 Kings 17:1). The message could be long; thus the whole Book of Malachi is a pronouncement oracle. This kind of oracle usually told what was going to happen. It also frequently condemned sin. It expressed God's view of present acts or circumstances. In that sense, many of the prophecies in the Old Testament were pronouncement oracles. Because they were God's word, these pronouncements were true, even though they could be changed as in the case of Jonah's pronouncement over Nineveh (Jonah 3:4–9).

Pronouncement oracles were given to produce an effect. People were to hear and to change their ways. With that in mind, the pronouncement oracles against foreign nations form a special group. Many of the writing prophets have pronouncements against (or concerning) nations surrounding Israel (Amos 1; Isa. 13—19; Jer. 46—51). These foreign nations had little chance to hear and heed the word of an Israelite prophet. Other nations had their own gods and their own prophets. Apparently, the pronouncements over foreign nations were intended to have an effect on the people of Israel as well as bring about the events described. At times, Israel or Judah heard their name included among foreign nations (for example, Amos 2:4–16). God cared for the other nations even though they cared little for Him. God's expression of concern by pronouncing judgment (or salvation as in Isa. 19:19–22) was intended to remind Israel of her mission to share God with others. At least, these words reminded the hearers of God's international, even universal, power and expectations.

Balaam's oracle (Num. 24) is a special case. Balak sought a pronouncement through the prophet Balaam. Balak's intention was to curse or to pronounce judgment on the Israelites. God did not allow this but gave Balaam an oracle of blessing to pronounce. Balaam's oracle, then, was positive and sought—a positive pronouncement oracle. The seeking of a pronouncement like this may have been more common than we know. Oracles came either in response to human questions or when God wished to make His views known to produce a change.

How Were Oracles Given or Received? Oracles were given through special people. Although anyone could seek a word from God and many, such as Gideon or Abraham, received an oracle directly; these divine communications usually came through either priests, prophets, or prophetesses. These two groups seemed to have their own specific ways of receiving oracles. In the earlier period, priests were more often sought out to receive a word from God. Later, the prophets were more prominent. Of course, for a long period both functioned as intermediaries. One caution about prophets and their pronouncements must be made. Often the prophets were not prophets until they received God's word (consider Amos' experience in Amos 7:14–15). The word came to some reluctantly as in the case of Jeremiah. God's giving of an oracle to a man or woman made them a prophet; for, when the divine word came, the prophet had to speak (Amos 3:8*b*).

Different methods were used by priests and prophets to receive the two forms of oracles, although we should not try to make too rigid a distinction. Decision oracles often came through the use of objects. Examples of such objects include the High Priest's Urim and Thummim and the ephod. Lots, too, were used. See Urim and Thummim; Ephod; Lots.

Decision oracles could also come through a person without the use of any objects. David sought the Lord's will at the point of building a temple. His answer came through Nathan, the prophet (2 Sam. 7). In 1 Kings 22, a dramatic conflict arose while the kings of Judah and Israel together sought a decision oracle. No objects were used in this case. The drama came from a true prophet receving one answer regarding the decision and a large number of false prophets giving a different answer. Prophets did sometimes use music as a means of receiving a decision oracle as did Elisha (2 Kings 3:15). However, the exact way music was used is unclear to us.

Frequently, the Old Testament gives no indication as to how God communicated His pronouncement oracles to His prophet or priest. Careful reading of the Old Testament shows a variety of methods in use. Audition—the actual hearing of a voice—and visions undoubtedly played a part in the receiving of God's words. We cannot know how much of God's revelation came through the actual ear or eye or how much came through the mind. Balaam spoke when the Spirit came upon him (Num. 24:2). He described himself as one whose eye was opened, one who heard God's word and saw His vision. Nahum and Habakkuk wrote of a vision or of seeing their oracles (Nah. 1:1; Hab. 1:1). Through Jeremiah, God condemned those prophets who relied on dreams to receive an oracle (Jer. 23:23–32). However, Solomon earlier had received God's pronouncement in a dream (1 Kings 3:5*ff.*). Several times God used scenes which the prophet saw as a means of giving a pronouncement oracle. Some of the scenes were external (Jer. 18:1–12), and some were visionary (Ezek. 37:1–14). The frequent use of sights in pronouncements has led some to believe that the prophets had encounters with God that later they had to interpret and communicate to others.

Regardless of how the oracle came, it was to be expressed to others. This expression seems most often to have been oral. The priest or prophet told the oracle to either the individual or a group. The place may have been in a field or a king's throne room. The pronouncement oracles were often proclaimed in the city, even in a temple (Amos in Bethel and Jeremiah in Jerusalem). Many of the oracles, though, give us no indication of where or when they were spoken.

Oracles which were not simply yes or no seem most often to have been given in poetic form. This is especially true of the pronouncements of the writing prophets which have been preserved for us. Though given orally in the beginning, at some time the pronouncement oracles were written down. They may have been written by disciples of the prophet or by others who heard. They may have been written when they were first told or at a later time. Whatever the case, the oracles were given by God and preserved for us.

How Did People Respond to the Oracles? Again, a distinction should be made between the decision and the pronouncement oracles. Those who were seeking God's help or counsel in a decision-making process undoubtedly acted on what they learned. Others, who heard oracles they had neither sought nor welcomed, may not have been as quick to accept the pronouncement (consider Elijah's words to Ahab, 1 Kings 21:20–24). Most often the response of those who heard or read the oracles of God can be guessed at. Two points should be recognized. First, oracles were remembered long after their pronouncement. When Jehu killed Joram (2 Kings 9:25), he had the body taken to Naboth's vineyard in order that an oracle pronounced in Ahab's day might be fulfilled. Second, though we do not know the response of the original hearers, God's pronouncements are still being read and are producing change in people in our day. Thus, the oracles are still functioning. ORATION, ORATOR An elaborate speech delivered in a formal and dignified manner and designed to persuade an audience. An orator is one distinguished for skill and persuasiveness as a public speaker. Only the RSV used the term oration and then only once (Acts 12:21); NRSV used "public address." Herod Agrippa's oration found praise for the rhetorical skill (12:22); Herod was judged for failure to give God the glory (12:23). A similar antipathy between skill in oratory and reliance on God's power is often found in Paul (1 Cor. 2:1–2,4,13; 4:19–20).

Paul, spoke of "the debater of this age" (1 Cor. 1:20 NRSV). Paul disclaimed "lofty words" and claimed to be "untrained in speech" (1 Cor. 2:1; 2 Cor. 11:6 NRSV) but elsewhere compared his preaching to a skilled builder laying a foundation (1 Cor. 3:10) and spoke of destroying arguments and obstacles to knowledge of God (2 Cor. 10:5). Acts often presents Paul as a persuasive speaker (Acts 18:4,13: 19:26; 26:28–29). Festus, in fact, recognized Paul as a man of great learning from his speech (Acts 26:24). Acts also portrays Apollos as an eloquent speaker (Acts 18:24).

The Greeks classified oratory into three modes. 1. The judicial mode, the speech of the law court, concerns guilt and innocence. Examples of judicial rhetoric include the cases involving Paul which were brought before Gallio, Felix, and Festus (Acts 18:12–16; 24:1–21; 25:15,18–19; 26:1–29). 2. The deliberative mode is concerned with the expediency of a course of future action. Examples include the Sanhedrin's debate over Jesus' growing following which culminated in Caiaphas' suggestion that the expedient course was to seek Jesus' death (John 11:47–50) and Demetrius' discourse on what action was necessary to save the business of the silversmiths in Ephesus (Acts 19:23–27). 3. The epideictic mode concerns praise and blame. Examples include Paul's praise of love (1 Cor. 13) and his censure of the Galatians (Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1–5). Broadly speaking, this mode includes any exhortation to virtuous action (as in James). See Rhetoric. Chris Church

ORCHARD A grove of fruit (Neh. 9:25; Eccl. 2:5) or nut trees (Song of Sol. 6:11). An enclosed orchard is sometimes called a garden (Eccl. 2:5; Song Sol. 4:13 RSV) or park (Eccl. 2:5; Song Sol. 4:13 NAS margin).

ORDINANCES Christians agree universally that baptism and the Lord's Supper were instituted by Christ and should be observed as "ordinances" or "sacraments" by His followers. Neither ordinance or sacrament is a biblical term. Some interpreters believe sacrament conveys the concept that God's grace is dispersed almost automatically through participation in the Lord's Supper. Others believe ordinance stresses obedience in doing that which Christ explicitly commanded. Extreme dangers involved in the terms range from superstition to legalism.

The "sacraments" varied in number for a thousand years in the church's early history. Peter Lombard (about A.D. 1150) defended seven, and Thomas Aquinas (about A.D. 1250) argued that all were instituted by Christ. After A.D. 1500, Martin Luther and other Protestant reformers rejected five of these, insisting that only baptism and the Lord's Supper have a biblical basis. Most Protestants agree with their assessment.

Not only the name and number but the practice and meaning of the ordinances have been matters of continuing debate. Who should receive baptism or participate in observing the Lord's Supper? What are essential elements in the observances that ensure validity? What do they accomplish in the life of the individual and the church? Definitive answers acceptable to all Christians have not been forthcoming for these or many other questions, but a survey of biblical evidence should be helpful in reaching some conclusions.

Baptism Biblical references to baptism abound in the Gospels, Acts, Pauline Epistles, and other New Testament books. John the Baptist preached and practiced a baptism of repentance (Matt. 3:11–12; Mark 1:2–8; Luke 3:2–17). His proclamation looked forward to the coming kingdom. "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt.

3:2). Multitudes responded. Confessing their sins," they "were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, (Mark 1:5). Apparently, not everyone who came received baptism, for John challenged some to "bring forth therefore fruit meet for repentance" (Matt. 3:8). John regarded his role as a transitional one to prepare the way (Matt. 3:11). The coming One would baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire.

All the Gospel writers record that Jesus was baptized by John (Matt. 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–11; Luke 3:21–22; John 1:32–34). Matthew noted that John hesitated to baptize Jesus but finally consented "to fulfill all righteousness" (3:15). The identification of Jesus as Messiah followed as the heavens opened, the Spirit descended on Him like a dove, and a voice proclaimed Him the beloved Son. This event inaugurated His public ministry and set the stage for Christian baptism.

The coming age prophesied by John the Baptist arrived in Jesus. Jesus affirmed the ministry of John by submitting to baptism and adopted the rite for His own ministry, giving it new meaning for the new age. The Gospel of John indicates that Jesus gained and baptized more followers than John the Baptist (John 4:1–2), but notes that the actual baptizing was done by His disciples. Jesus referred to His impending death as a baptism (Luke 12:50), linking the meaning of baptism with the cross. These and other scattered references to baptism in the Gospels are evaluated and interpreted in a variety of ways by Bible students, but the total impact of evidence favors the view that Jesus practiced and commanded baptism. Central in this evidence is the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19–20).

The Acts of the Apostles reflects the practice of the earliest Christian churches regarding baptism, referring to baptism far more frequently than any other New Testament book. At Pentecost after Peter's sermon, "they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls" (Acts 2:41). They had been exhorted by the apostle to "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (2:38). At other times baptism was "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (8:16; 19:5). Sometimes the gift of the Spirit followed baptism; at other times, the spirit preceded baptism (10:44–48). These were apparently regarded as separate experiences.

Baptism "for" the forgiveness of sins may be translated "on the basis of." Many New Testament passages stress that forgiveness is based on repentance and trust in what Jesus had done, not on a rite—baptism or otherwise (John 3:16; Acts 16:31). The gospel is for everyone; baptism is for disciples. Salvation is provided by Christ and not through baptism. References to Jesus' blessing little children contain no indications of baptism (Mark 10:13–16), and baptism of "households" described in Acts (16:31–33) should not be utilized to defend a later Christian practice.

If baptism is for believers only and does not convey salvation, then why do Christians universally baptize? It is highly unlikely that the early Christians would have adopted this practice without hesitation unless they were convinced strongly that Christ had intended that they do so. Further reflection upon what Christ had done enabled them to understand baptism in relation to the gospel. No New Testament writer contributed more to a fuller theological interpretation of baptism than Paul.

Paul (Saul) encountered the living Christ while on a journey to Damascus to persecute Christians. This led to a meeting in Damascus with Ananias, where Paul's sight was restored and where he was also baptized (Acts 9:17–18). What Paul had known about baptism previously must have been largely negative, but from this time baptism became a part of his missionary message and practice among both Jews and Gentiles.

Paul's basic message declared that a right relationship with God is based exclusively on faith in Jesus Christ. "For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith' " (1:17 NIV). Throughout Romans Paul stressed the primacy of grace over law. Access to this grace is through faith in Jesus Christ (5:2). Where sin (breaking the law) abounds, grace much more abounds. This poses the question (6:1 NIV), "What shall we say, then? Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" Paul denied emphatically that this is the case, for one dead to sin lives no longer in it. This fact is clearly illustrated in Christian baptism. "Don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life" (vv. 3–4 NIV).

Paul assumed here the universal Christian practice of baptism and a common understanding that it symbolizes death, burial, and resurrection of the believer with Christ. The mode of immersion most clearly preserves this symbolism along with the added emphasis of death to sin and resurrection to a new life in Christ. The stress is upon what Christ has done more than what the believer does. Through faith in Him, grace is received and makes baptism meaningful.

Paul in 1 Corinthians related unity in Christ to baptism. "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body" (12:13). The body of Christ encompasses Jews and Greeks, slave and free, each with a diversity of gifts; but they are bound together in a unity of spirit and symbolized in baptism. Galatians 3:26–29 stresses identification with Christ and unity in Him also, using the figure of putting on clothing. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (3:27). But the preceding verse should be noted also. "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." For those who belong to Christ, earthly distinctions disappear; and all are one in Christ, heirs according to the promise.

The subjective aspect of baptism for the believer and the objective aspect in Christ are brought together in Colossians 2:9–12. In a circumcision not by hands of men but by Christ, the sinful nature is put off. The Colossians have been buried with Christ in baptism and raised with Him through faith in the power of God, who raised Him from the dead. Consequently, they are to set their hearts on things above and put to death the earthly nature (3:1,5).

It is evident from the above and other passages that, for Paul, baptism portrayed the gospel message of the death and resurrection of Christ, affirmed the death of the believer to sin and the rising to walk in newness of life, and signified a union of the believer with Christ and a unity with other believers. The rite itself does not effect these, for they are based on what Christ has done and is doing. Baptism serves as the effective public symbol and declaration for those who trust in Christ as Savior and Lord.

The Lord's Supper The earliest written account of the institution of the Lord's Supper is in 1 Corinthians 11:23–26. The Corinthian church was divided, and many of its members were selfish and self-indulgent. In their fellowship meal, therefore, they did not eat "the Lord's Supper" (v. 20); for some overindulged, while others were left hungry and humiliated. In response to this abuse, Paul reminded them of the tradition that he had received and passed on to them regarding the Supper of the Lord with His disciples the night He was betrayed.

> The Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

The terms eucharist or thanksgiving and communion or fellowship are often applied to the Supper, and each highlights a significant aspect of this ordinance. "The Lord's Supper" appears more satisfactory for the overall designation, reminding Christians that they share the loaf and cup at His table, not their own.

The account of the Last Supper in Mark 14:22–26 is roughly parallel to Paul's account but with some differences (see also Matt. 26:26–29 and Luke 22:17–20). Both accounts (Mark's and Paul's) record the blessing (thanksgiving) and breaking of bread. Both refer to covenant in connection with the cup as His blood, though only Paul called this a new covenant (see Jer. 31:31–34). Both contain a future emphasis, though in different forms. Mark indicated that Jesus said He would not drink again of the fruit of the vine until He drank it anew in the kingdom of God. Paul related that "whenever you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26 NIV).

Paul stressed the memorial aspect of the Supper. "Do this in remembrance of me." Christians were to remember that the body of Christ was broken and His blood shed for them. As in baptism, sharing the Supper is a proclamation of the gospel in hope, "until he comes." As the Passover was a symbol of the old covenant, the Lord's Supper is a symbol of the new. Christians remember the sacrifice provided for their deliverance from bondage and look forward to the ultimate consummation in the land of promise, the kingdom of God.

The Supper shared in remembrance of the past and hope for the future is fulfilled in fellowship for the present. Time and again the phrase "in Christ" is repeated in the writings of Paul. Union in Christ and unity with Christians is a recurring theme. Not surprisingly, therefore, one finds these emphases related to the Lord's Supper. "Is not the cup of thanksgiving for which we give thanks a participation in the blood of Christ? And is not the bread that we break a participation in the body of Christ?" (1 Cor. 10:16 NIV). Paul was not talking about a repetition of the sacrifice of Christ, but a genuine sharing of fellowship (koinōnia) with the living Lord. Fellowship in Christ is basic for fellowship in his body (v. 17).

All Christians are unworthy to share the Lord's Supper, but His grace has provided for them in their unworthiness. The tragedy is that some partake in an unworthy manner, not discerning the Lord's body. Paul addressed this matter for the Corinthians and for us, urging that Christians examine themselves and respect the corporate body of Christ as they share the Supper of the Lord.

Conclusions Christ instituted both ordinances. Both portray publically and visibly the essential elements of the gospel, and both symbolize realities involving divine activity and human experience. Baptism is a once-for-all experience, but the Lord's Supper is repeated many times. Baptism follows closely one's profession of faith in Christ and actually in the New Testament was the declaration of that faith. The Lord's Supper declares one's continuing dependence upon the Christ proclaimed in the gospel, who died, was buried, and rose for our salvation.

The significance of baptism and the Lord's Supper will increase as churches and people commit themselves anew to the Christ proclaimed by the gospel. This commitment will recognize that, in observing the ordinances, they are presenting in a unique way the gospel of Christ and committing themselves fully to its demands. Calling upon Christ the Savior and Lord to provide strength and leadership for the people of God individually and collectively, believers will leave the observance of the ordinances to give faithful service in His world. Claude L. Howe, Jr.

ORDINATION, ORDAIN The appointing, consecrating, or commissioning of persons for special service to the Lord and His people.

English Translations KJV uses ordain to translate over twenty Hebrew and Greek words. These words relate to a variety of ideas such as God's work and providence; the appointment to an office or a task; and the establishment of laws, principles, places, or observances. While all these ideas do not relate directly to ordination, they contain basic concepts of divine purpose, choice, appointment, and institution that undergird the practice.

Old Testament Four primary examples provide Old Testament precedents for ordination: the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests to God (Ex. 28—29; Lev. 8—9), the dedication of the Levites as servants of God (Num. 8:5–13), the appointment of seventy elders to assist Moses (Num. 11:16–17,24–25); and the commissioning of Joshua as Moses' successor (Num. 27:18–23). The variety in these examples helps explain the various contemporary understandings of ordination.

The ordination of the priest was based on God's choice of Aaron and his sons "that he may minister unto me in the priest's office" (Ex. 28:1). The ordination itself was a seven-day act of consecration accompanied by washing, donning vestments, anointing, sacrificing, and eating (Lev. 8). The basic Hebrew term for "ordination" literally means to "fill the hands" and may refer to filling the priest's hands with the offerings (Lev. 8:27). The ordination of the Levites also was based on God's choice of them "to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation" (Num. 8:15). The ordination involved cleansing, presentation before the Lord, laying on of hands by the whole congregation, offering the Levites as a wave offering, and sacrifices.

The appointment of the seventy to assist Moses in bearing "the burden of the people" (Num. 11:17) was at God's initiative, but Moses selected persons who were known as elders and leaders. Their ordination involved standing with Moses and receiving from the Lord the Spirit who previously was upon Moses. When the Spirit rested on them, they prophesied (11:25). The ordination of a successor for Moses was at Moses' initiative (27:15–17), but Joshua was chosen by God because he was "a man in whom is the spirit" (v. 18). Joshua's ordination involved standing before the priest and all of the congregation and being commissioned in their sight. Moses laid his hand on Joshua, and Moses placed some of his authority on Joshua, including the role of inquiring of the judgment of the Urim.

New Testament The New Testament practice of ordination is generally associated with the laying on of hands; but other appointments, consecrations, and commissionings must be considered even if they lack formal investiture.

Jesus' appointment of the twelve "that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach" (Mark 3:14) was based on prayer (Luke 6:12), His choice and call (Mark 3:13), and the apostles' responses. When He sent them out, He gave them "power and authority" (Luke 9:1) but no formal ordination. The same was true of the seventy (Luke 10:1). The Great Commission was given solely on the basis of Jesus' "power" (or authority, Matt. 28:18). The Holy Spirit was given directly without the laying on of hands (John 20:22). The disciples were chosen and appointed by Jesus for their task of bearing fruit (John 15:16).

Several other New Testament passages describe appointments without reference to ordination. Having been chosen by lot, Matthias was installed as one of the twelve (Acts 1:21–26). Barnabas and Paul appointed elders "in every church" after prayer and fasting (14:23). Titus was left in Crete to perform the same function (Titus 1:5).

Several passages describe ordination accompanied by the laying on of hands. Acts 6:1–6 tells of the appointment of seven men to the daily ministry to widows in the Jerusalem congregation. Barnabas and Paul were set apart for the work to which God had called them (Acts 13:1–3). Timothy was chosen by prophecy, recommended by Paul, and ordained to his task by the laying on of hands by Paul and the assembly of elders (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). References to laying on of hands in 1 Timothy 5:22 and Hebrews 6:2 likely deal with other practices than ordination. See Laying on of Hands.

The lack of a consistent biblical pattern raises questions about ordination today. Who should be ordained? Why? By whom? On the basis of what qualifications? What is received in the act of ordination? Answers to these questions will vary with the biblical model assumed and continue to be debated in various denominations. Michael Fink

OREB AND ZEEB (Ō′ rĕb and Zē′ ĕb) Personal names meaning, "raven" and "wolf." Two Midianite princes captured and executed by the Ephraimites following Gideon's rout of their forces (Judg. 7:24—8:3). The Midianite nobles gave their names to the sites of their deaths, the rock of Oreb near Beth Bareh on the Jordan and the winepress of Zeeb. Israel's deliverance from Midian became proverbial for God's deliverance of His people (Ps. 83:11; Isa. 9:4; 10:26).

OREN (Ō′ rĕn) Personal name meaning, "cedar." Member of the Jerahmeelite clan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:25).

ORGAN KJV term for a musical instrument which modern translations identify as a pipe or shrill flute (Gen. 4:21; Job 21:12; 30:31; Ps. 150:4). At the time of the KJV translation organ designated any wind instrument. The modern pipe organ was not known in the biblical period, though primitive organs were used in the Jerusalem Temple after 100 B.C. and provided music for Roman games and combats. The organ came into the church use after A.D. 600.

ORION (Ō rī′ on) Constellation bearing the name of a giant Greek hunter who, according to myth, was bound and placed in the heavens. Job 38:31 perhaps alludes to this myth. God is consistently portrayed as the creator of the Orion constellation (Job 9:9; Amos 5:8). The plural of the Hebrew term for Orion is rendered constellations at Isaiah 13:10.

ORNAN (Ôr′ năn) Personal name meaning, "prince." Alternate name of Araunah (1 Chron. 21:15,18,20–25,28; 2 Chron. 3:1). See Araunah.

ORONTES (Ō rŏn tēs) The principle river of Syria which originates east of the Lebanon ridge and flows 250 miles north before turning southwest into the Mediterranean south of Antioch-on-the-Orontes (Antakya). The river valley is extremely fertile and strategically significant. Cities of the Orontes valley include Antioch (Acts 11:19; 13:1), Hamath (2 Sam. 8:9; 2 Kings 17:24; 2 Chron. 8:4; Isa. 11:11), Qarqar, where King Ahab of Israel joined a coalition of Syrian kings warring against Shalmaneser III, and Riblah (2 Kings 23:33; 25:6,21). Nahr el-'Asi (rebellious river) is the modern name of the Orontes. See Rivers and Waterways.

ORONTES RIVER The Orontes, modern Asi (Turkish), Nahr el Assi (Arabic), rises near Heliopolis (Bealbek) in the Beka's valley of Lebanon, and flows north some 250 miles through Syria and Turkey before turning southwest through the great city of Antioch to reach the coast just south of ancient Seleucia, the seaport of Antioch. This river is never actually mentioned in the Bible but was famous for its association with Antioch, which owed to the river the fertility of its district. See Antioch. Colin J. Hemer ORPAH (Ôr′ pah) Personal name meaning, "neck," "girl with a full mane," or "rain cloud." Daughter-in-law of Naomi who returned to her people and gods after Naomi twice requested that she go (Ruth 1:4–15). See Ruth.

ORPHANS See Fatherless.

OSHEA (Ō′ shē ȧ) KJV alternate form of Hoshea (Joshua) at Numbers 13:8,16.

OSNAPPAR (Ŏs nap′ ăr) Modern translation form of Osnapper.

OSNAPPER (Ŏs năp′ pēr) Assyrian king who repopulated Samaria with foreigners following its capture in 722 B.C. (Ezra 4:10). Osnappar is most often identified with Ashurbanipal. KJV used the form Asnapper. See Assyria.

OSPRAY, OSPREY (Ŏs′ prēy) Large, flesh-eating hawk included in lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12; KJV, NRSV). The identity of the bird is questionable. Other possibilities include: black vulture (NAS margin, NIV); black eagle, (KJV margin); bearded vulture (REB); and buzzard (NAS).

OSSIFRAGE (Ŏs′ sī frāge) English applies ossifrage to three birds: the bearded vulture; the osprey; and the giant petrel. The KJV included the ossifrage among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12). Other translations identify the bird as a black vulture (REB) or vulture (NAS, NIV, NRSV).

OSTIA (Ŏs tī ȧ) Roman city at the mouth of the Tiber about fifteen miles from Rome which, following construction of an artificial harbor by Claudius (A.D. 41–54), served as the principle harbor for Rome. Before this construction, silt prohibited seagoing vessels from using the port. Such vessels were forced to use the port of Puteoli about 138 miles to the south of Rome (Acts 28:13).

OSTRACA (Ŏs tră că) Potsherds (pottery fragments), especially fragments used as an inexpensive writing material. See Archaeology; Pottery; Writing.

OSTRICH See Birds.

OTHNI (Ŏth′ nī) Personal name perhaps meaning, "force" or "power." Levitic gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:70).

OTHNIEL (Ŏth′ nĭ ĕl) Name meaning, "God is powerful." 1. First of Israel's judges or deliverers. Othniel received Caleb's daughter Achsah as his wife as a reward for his capture of Kiriath-sepher (Debir) (Josh. 15:15–19; Judg. 1:11–15). As the first judge, Othniel rescued Israel from the Mesopotamian king Cushan-rishathaim (Judg. 3:7–11). Othniel was the only judge to come from the southern tribes. See Judges, Book of. 2. Clan name associated with a resident of Netophah (1 Chron. 27:15).

OUCHES KJV term for (filagree) settings for precious stones (Ex. 28:11,13–14,25; 39:6,13,16,18). See Jewels, Jewelry; High Priest.

OUTCAST Scripture never employs outcast in the now common sense of one rejected by society. Outcast rather designates one banished from court (2 Sam. 14:14 RSV) or more often dispersed persons, exiles, or refugees (Deut. 30:4; Ps. 147:2: Isa. 11:12; 56:8; Jer. 30:17; Mic. 4:6–7). Outcasts often has the technical sense of diaspora. NAS employs outcast for one excommunicated from the synagogue (John 16:2).

OUTER TUNIC (Greek chitōn) See Cloth, Clothing.

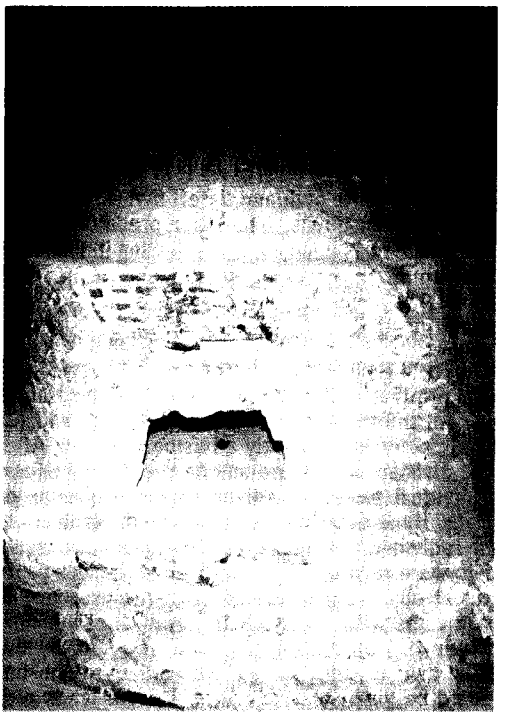
OUTLANDISH KJV term meaning, "foreign" (Neh. 13:26).



OVEN A device used for baking food, especially bread (Lev. 2:4; Ex. 8:3). Ancient ovens were cylindrical structures of burnt clay two to three feet in diameter. A fire was built on pebbles in the oven bottom. Bread was baked by either placing the dough against the oven walls or upon the heated pebbles. Dried grass (Matt. 6:30; Luke 12:28), thorny shrubs, and animal dung were often used as fuels. See Cooking and Heating.

OVENS, TOWER OF THE See Furnaces, Tower of the.

OVERLIVE KJV term meaning, "outlive" (Josh. 24:31).

OVERPASS KJV term (Jer. 5:28) meaning either "surpass" previous limits or bounds (NAS, NIV, RSV, TEV) or else "passover" in the sense of overlook (NAS margin, REB).

OVERRUN KJV term meaning, "outrun" (2 Sam. 18:23).

Large domed oven.

OVERSEER A superintendent or supervisor. Various translations use overseer for a variety of secular positions (household manager, Gen. 39:4–5; prime minister, Gen. 41:34; foreman or supervisor, 2 Chron. 2:18) and ecclesiatical (Acts 20:18) offices. NAS, NIV employ overseer for the bishop of the KJV, NRSV (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:1–2; Tit. 1:7).

OVERSHADOW To cast a shadow over; to envelope. The cloud which overshadowed the mount of transfiguration (Matt. 17:15; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:34) recalls the cloud "overshadowing" the tabernacle (Ex. 40:35 according to earliest Greek translation) when it was filled with God's glory. Luke 1:35 describes the mystery of the virginal conception in terms of Mary's being "overshadowed" by the power of God. Luke's picture does not involve sexual intercourse of a god and human woman as was common in pagan myth. The Spirit is Creator, not consort (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 33:6; and especially Job 33:40; Ps. 104:30 where the Spirit's roll is life-giver). The Spirit which brought power and life to the church at Pentecost (Acts 1:8) and is the source of resurrection life (Ezek. 37:5–14) brought life to Mary's womb.

OWL A bird of prey belonging to the order Strigiformes which are generally nocturnal. Hebrew terms for various bird species cannot be indentified precisely with English terms. NRSV mentions two species of owl, the little and great owls (Deut. 14:16). KJV mentions these as well as the owl of the desert (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16) and screech owl (Isa. 34:14). NIV mentions six species: the horned owl; screech owl (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15); little owl (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:15); great owl; white owl; and desert owl (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16). Owls, like other predatory birds, were classed as unclean. Owls nesting in ruins are a common image of desolation (Ps. 102:6; Isa. 34:11,15; Zeph. 2:14).

OWNERSHIP Possession of property. Two general principles guided Israelite laws of ownership: (1) All things ultimately belong to God, and (2) land possession is purely a business matter. After the division of the land among the twelve tribes, individual plots were given to family groups or clans. If the occasion demanded it, the land could be redivided at a later time. Land sales and transfers were recorded by scribes on leather or papyrus scrolls, on clay tablets, or in the presence of witnesses with the symbolic removal of a sandal (Ruth 4:7) or the stepping onto the land by the new owner. Land passed from father to son but could be given to a daughter. Private lands ultimately reverted to the king if not used for several years (2 Kings 8). The law of the kinsman-redeemer (Lev. 25:25) was developed to assure that land belonging to a particular clan did not pass out of its hands despite the death of an heirless husband. The next-of-kin was required to purchase the land and provide an heir to the name of the deceased. The impoverished widow would not be forced to sell her land to outsiders, thus diminishing the tribal area of the clan.

While it is true that the king did purchase lands from his subjects, private lands were subject to seizure by the ruler. Royal land was given as revenue-producing gifts by the ruler to members of his family or men who gained his favor. Often the land was tenant farmed for the king who continued to hold the ultimate right of its disposal. When economic times were difficult, kings exchanged their lands for other services, such as Solomon's gift of land to Hiram of Tyre for gold and laborers in the building of the Temple (1 Kings 9:11). Priestly families and local shrines also owned land, especially that surrounding the levitical cities, where the priests farmed their own fields (Josh. 21). With the consolidation of worship in the Jerusalem Temple, many of the priestly lands were sold.

Private ownership continued in much the same fashion during the New Testament era. Bills of sale and land deeds written on papyrus scrolls from this period have been discovered, attesting to the exchange of private lands. Often the sale of private land was subject to royal approval. The Romans oversaw the control of lands in Palestine, requiring heavy taxes from owners. The early Christian community existed through the generosity of those members who sold many of their possessions to help poorer believers.

PADAN-ARAM KJV form of Paddan-Aram.

PADDAN-ARAM (Pād′ dan-ā′ răm) Place name perhaps meaning, "way of Syria," "field of Syria," or "plow of Syria." The land from where Abraham journeyed to Canaan. One of the principal cities was Haran. Later, Abraham sent his steward to Paddan-Aram to seek a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:1–9), and Jacob fled there and married into Laban and Rebekah's branch of the patriarchal family (28:2–5). It may be modern tell Feddan near Carrhae. Hosea 12:13 calls it the field or country of Syria.

PADDLE KJV term for a digging tool (Deut. 23:13). Modern translations render the term as something to dig with (NIV), spade (NAS), stick (RSV, TEV), or trowel (NRSV, REB). The Israelites were required to respect God's presence in their camp by burying their excrement.

PADON (Pā′ dŏn) Personal name meaning, "redemption." Ancestor of a family of postexilic Temple servants (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47). See Nethinim.

PAGANS Those who worship a god or gods other than the living God to whom the Bible witnesses. NIV, REB, and RSV sometimes use pagans as the translation of the Greek ethnoi (1 Cor. 5:1; 10:20), which is generally translated Gentiles (so KJV, NAS). In English, Gentile relates to ethnic background while pagan refers to religious affiliation. See Gentiles; Gods, Pagan.

PAGIEL (Pā′ ğī ĕl) Personal name meaning, "fortune of God." "God is entreated," or "God meets." Wilderness leader of the tribe of Asher (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72,77; 10:26).

PAHATH-MOAB (Pā′ hăth-Mō′ ăb) Title meaning, "governor of Moab." A family of returned Exiles likely descended from the Hebrew governor of Moab in the time of David (2 Sam. 8:2; Ezra 2:6; 8:4; 10:30; Neh. 7:11; 10:14).

PAI (Pā′ ī) Place name meaning, "groaning." Alternate form of Pau used at 1 Chronicles 1:50 (compare Gen. 36:39). see Pau.

PAINT A mixture of pigment and liquid used to apply a closely adhering, colorful coat to a surface. Most scriptural references are to painting the eyes. See Cosmetics. The sole exception is Jeremiah 22:14 which refers to Jehoiakim's plans to paint his palace vermilion. The prohibition of making images (Ex. 20:4) perhaps curtailed development of painting in Israel. Archaeologists have uncovered numerous tomb and palace paintings in both Egypt and Mesopotamia.

PALACE The residence of a monarch or noble. KJV often used palace in passages where modern translations have substituted a term more appropriate to the context. Terms designating a strongly fortified section of the king's residence often replaced palace: citadel (1 Kings 16:18; 2 Kings 15:25); tower (Ps. 122:7 NRSV; Song of Sol. 8:9 NIV); stronghold (Isa. 34:13; Amos 1:4 NRSV); fortress (Amos 1:4 NIV); battlement (Song of Sol. 8:9 NRSV; parapet, REB). At Amos 4:3, modern translations replace palace with the proper name Harmon. The KJV used palace twice for the Greek aulē (Matt. 26:3; Luke 11:21). The crowd in Matthew 26 gathered in the courtyard of the high priest's residence. Modern translations rendered aulē variously: palace (NIV, NRSV, TEV); court (NAS); house (REB). The strong man of Luke 11 guarded the open courtyard of his home. Modern translations are again divided on the translation of aulē: castle (NRSV); homestead (NAS); house (NIV, TEV); palace (REB, RSV). The KJV also used palace to translate the Latin loanword praetorium (Phil. 1:13). Modern translations replaced palace with praetorian guard (NAS, RSV) or an equivalent expression (imperial guard, NRSV, REB; palace guard, NIV, TEV).

Palaces served not only as royal residences but as a means of displaying the wealth of a kingdom. Esther 1:6–7 describes the palace of King Ahasuerus (Xerxes I) of Assyria which featured fine curtains, marble pillars, and ornate mosaic floors. David's palace was built by workers sent by King Hiram of Tyre and featured cedar woodwork (2 Sam. 5:11). The palace must have been large to accomodate David's growing number of wives, concubines, and children (2 Sam. 3:2–5; 5:13–16), as well as store booty, such as the golden shields which David seized (2 Sam. 8:7). Solomon's palace complex required thirteen years for completion (1 Kings 7:1). His palace complex included the "house of the forest of Lebanon" (7:2), an immense hall featuring 45 cedar pillars and Solomon's golden shields (10:16–18), the "porch of pillars" (7:6), the "Hall of Justice" (7:7 NRSV), featuring an ivory and gold throne (10:18–20), and private dwellings for both king and Pharoah's daughter (7:8). Builders used costly hewn stone and cedar throughout the palace (7:9,11). Portions of this palace complex survived the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Neh. 3:25). King Ahab's palace in Samaria was decorated with ivory panels, some of which have been recovered by archaeologists (1 Kings 22:39).

The prophets, particularly Amos, condemned the rich for building palaces at the expense of the poor. Amos' announcements of doom refer to summer and winter residences, ivory furniture and palaces, and great houses of hewn stone (Amos 3:15; 5:11; 6:4,11). Jeremiah offered a similar critique of Jeroboam's building program in Jerusalem (22:13–15). Chris Church

PALAL (Pā′ lăl) Personal name meaning, "God comes to judge." One of those assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25).

PALESTINA (Păl ēs tī′ nə) KJV alternate name for Philistia (Ex. 15:14; Isa. 14:29,31). See Philistines.

PALESTINE (Păl′ ēs tīne) Geographical designation for land of Bible, particularly land west of Jordan River God allotted to Israel for an inheritance (Josh. 13—19). Various terms have been used to designate that small but significant land known in the early Old Testament era as "Canaan" (Gen. 12:5) and often referred to as the Promised Land (Deut. 9:28). The area was designated "Israel" and "Judah" at the division of the kingdoms in 931 B.C. By New Testament times the land had been divided into provincial designations, "Judea," "Samaria," "Galilee," and others. Generally, the region was considered to be a part of Syria.

Palestine is derived from the name Pelishtim or "Philistines." See Philistines. The Greeks, familiar primarily with the coastal area, applied the name Palestine to the entire southeastern Mediterranean region. Although the word Palestine (or Palestina) is found four times in the KJV (Ex. 15:14; Isaiah 14:29,31; Joel 3:4), these are references to the territory of the Philistines and so properly designate only the strip of coastland occupied by that people.

For the purposes of this article, Palestine extends to the north ten to fifteen miles beyond the ancient site of Dan and New Testament Caesarea Philippi into the gorges and mountains just south of Mount Hermon. To the east, it extends to the Arabian steppe. To the south, Palestine extends ten to fifteen miles beyond Beer-sheba. On the west is the Mediterranean Sea. It therefore includes western Palestine—between the Jordan River and the Sea, and eastern Palestine—between the Jordan and the Arabian steppe.

Palestine west of the Jordan covers approximately 6,000 square miles. East of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 square miles was included in the land of Israel.

Geographical Features Palestine is naturally divided into four narrow strips of land running north and south. 1. Coastal plain This very fertile plain begins ten to twelve miles south of Gaza, just north of the Egyptian border, and stretches northward to the Sidon-Tyre area. Usually it is divided into three sections: (1) the Plain of Philistia, roughly from south of Gaza to Joppa (Tel Aviv); (2) the Plain of Sharon, from Joppa north to the promontory of the Carmel chain; and (3) the detached Plain of Acco, which merges with the Plain of Esdraelon, the historic gateway inland and to the regions to the north and east. The Plain of Sharon varies from a width of a few hundred yards just south of Carmel to more than twelve miles wide near Joppa. Covered with fertile alluvial soil and well watered by springs, the area was once covered with extensive forests.

Further south is the Plain of Philistia. Here were located the Philistine strongholds of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. Salt marshes—the Serbonian bog—located at the southern end of the Philistine plain have been known as breeding grounds of disease.

Forming the southwestern end of the Fertile Crescent, the coastal plain has been the highway of commerce and conquest for centuries. This was the route followed by the Hittites and the Egyptians, by Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, and Napoleon.

The coastal plain lacked an outstanding natural harbor. Joppa had roughly semicircular reefs that formed a breakwater 300 to 400 feet offshore and, consequently, was used as a port. Entrance from the south was impossible, however, and the north entrance was shallow and treacherous. Herod the Great developed Caesarea Maritima into an artificial port of considerable efficiency. See Caesarea.

2. Central Hill Country The second strip of land is the mountainous ridge beginning just north of Beer-sheba and extending through all of Judea and Samaria into upper Galilee. Actually, the rugged terrain running the length of the land is a continuation of the more clearly defined Lebanon Mountains to the north. The only major break in the mountain range is the Plain of Esdraelon also called the Valley of Jezreel. Three divisions are evident: Judea, Samaria, Galilee.

(1) Judea Rising from the parched Negeb (Negeb means "parched" or "dry land"), the Judean hills reach their highest point, 3,370 feet, near Hebron. See Negeb. Jerusalem is located in the Judean hills at an elevation of 2,600 feet. The eastern slopes form the barren and rugged "wilderness of Judea," then fall abruptly to the floor of the Jordan Valley. The wilderness is treeless and waterless. Deep gorges and canyons cut into the soft sedimentary formations.

The western foothills of Judea are called the "Shephelah," meaning "valley" or "lowland." The name has been inaccurately applied to the Plain of Philistia, but the towns assigned by the Old Testament to the Shephelah are all situated in the low hills rather than the plain. The Shephelah is a belt of gently rolling hills between 500 and 1,000 feet in height. Five valleys divide the region, from the Wadi el Hesy in the south to the Valley of Ajalon in northern Judea. These passes have witnessed the conflicts between Saul and the Philistines, the Maccabees and the Syrians, the Jews and the Romans, Richard I and Saladin. Here Samson grew to manhood. Here David encountered Goliath.

The Shephelah had great military importance. It formed a buffer between Judea and the enemies of the Hebrew people—Philistines, Egyptians, Syrians. Formerly heavily wooded with sycamores, the region served to impede an attack from the west.

(2) Samaria The hills of Samaria descend gently from the Judean mountains, averaging just over 1,000 feet in height. Several notable mountains such as Gerizim (2,890 feet), Ebal (3,083), and Gilboa (1,640 feet) dominate the area. This land of mountains is marked by wide and fertile valleys. Here the majority of the people lived during the Old Testament era, and here significant events of Hebrew history took place. The openness of Samaria is a prominent feature of the land, making movement much easier than in Judea and thus inviting armies and chariots from the north.

The valley between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim was a central location, apparently providing the perfect point from which a united nation could have been governed. Roads went in all directions—to Galilee, the Jordan Valley, south to Jerusalem. Here Shechem was located, important to the patriarchs and in the day of the judges. Shechem, however, had no natural defenses and was consequently rejected by the kings of Israel as their capital.

From this region the main range of mountains sends out an arm to the northwest that reaches the coast at Mount Carmel. Carmel reaches a height of only 1,791 feet, but it seems more lofty because it rises directly from the coastline. It receives abundant rainfall, an average of 28 to 32 inches per year, and consequently is rather densely covered with vegetation, including some woodland.

The Carmel range divides the Plain of Sharon from the narrow coastal plain of Phoenicia. It forms the southern side of the Plain of Esdraelon, with the ancient fortress of Megiddo standing as one of its key cities. This natural barrier caused the passes in the Carmel chain to achieve unusual importance, lying as it does on the historic route between Egypt and Mesopotamia.

(3) Galilee North of the Plain of Esdraelon and south of the Leontes River lies the region called Galilee. The name comes from the Hebrew galil, meaning, literally "circle" or "ring." In Isaiah 9:1, the prophet refers to it as "Galilee of the Gentiles" (NIV). The tribes of Asher, Naphtali, and Zebulun were assigned to this area. There is evidence of mixed population and racial variety from early times. In the day of Jesus, many Gentiles were in Galilee.

The region is divided into Upper Galilee and Lower Galilee. Lower Galilee is a land of limestone hills and fertile valleys. Most of the region is approximately 500 feet above sea level—but with mountains like Tabor reaching a height of 1,929 feet. Grain, grass, olives, and grapes were abundant. Fish, oil, and wine were common exports. Several major international roads crossed the area, and caravan traffic from Damascus through Capernaum to the south was heavy. Josephus spoke of Galilee as "universally rich and fruitful."

Some of the most important cities of Galilee were on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. Those on the northwestern shore, such as Capernaum, were more Jewish than those to the south. Tiberias, built in A.D. 25 by Herod Antipas and named after the reigning caesar, became the capital and the most important city during the New Testament era.

The terrain of Upper Galilee is much more rugged than Lower Galilee, an area of deeply fissured and roughly eroded tableland with high peaks and many wadis. The highest peak is Mount Meron, at 3,963 feet the highest point in Palestine. The basic rock is limestone, in the eastern sections often covered with volcanic rock. In the east, Galilee drops off abruptly to the Jordan, while farther south, near the Sea of Galilee, the slopes become much more gradual and gentle.

3. Jordan Rift Valley As a result of crustal faulting, the hills of Palestine drop into the deepest split on the surface of the earth. The fault is part of a system that extends north to form the valley between the Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon chains, also extending south to form the Dead Sea, the dry Arabah Valley, the Gulf of Aqabah, and, eventually, the chain of lakes on the African continent.

The Jordan River has its source in several springs, primarily on the western and southern slopes of Mount Hermon. Several small streams come together near Dan, then flow into shallow, reedy Lake Hula (Huleh). From its sources to Hula the Jordan drops somewhat less than 1,000 feet over a distance of twelve miles, entering Lake Hula at 230 feet above sea level (not 7 feet, as reported by some older publications). In recent years the Jordan bed has been straightened after it leaves Hula, the swamps of the valley have been drained, and the size of the lake has been greatly reduced. Most of the area is now excellent farmland. Over the eleven miles from Hula to the Sea of Galilee, the Jordan drops 926 feet, flowing in part through a narrow canyon. From Galilee to the Dead Sea there is an additional drop of 600 feet.

The Sea of Galilee is a significant part of the upper Rift Valley and is formed by a widening of it. It has several names—the Lake of Gennesaret, the Sea of Tiberias, Lake Chinnereth—but it is best known as the Sea of Galilee. Around it most of the ministry of Jesus took place. Here He could rest, escape crowds, find cool relief from the heat. Shaped much like a harp, it is thirteen miles long and seven miles wide. The hard basalt environment has given the lake an almost constant level and size. In the New Testament day, the lake was the center of a thriving fishing industry. The towns around the lake testify to this fact: Bethsaida means "fishing place," and Tarichea is from a Greek term meaning "preserved fish."

As the Jordan flows south out of the Sea of Galilee, it enters a gorge called the Ghor, or "depression." The meandering Jordan and its periodic overflows have created the Zor, or "jungle," a thick growth of entangled semitropical plants and trees. Although the distance from the lower end of the Sea of Galilee to the upper end of the Dead Sea is only 65 miles, the winding Jordan twists 200 miles to cover that distance. The Ghor is about twelve miles wide at Jericho.

Seven miles south of Jericho, the Jordan flows into the Dead Sea, one of the world's most unique bodies of water. The surface of the water is 1,296 feet below sea level, the lowest point on the surface of the earth. Forty-seven miles long and eight miles wide, the Dead Sea has no outlet. It has been calculated that an average of 6.5 million tons of water enter the sea each day. The result of centuries of evaporation is that now 25 percent of the weight of the water is mineral salts. Magnesium chloride gives the water a bitter taste, and calcium chloride gives it an oily touch. Fish cannot live in Dead Sea water. Indeed, it destroys almost all organic life in it and around it.

Thirty miles down the eastern side, a peninsula, the Lisan, or the "Tongue," juts into the sea. North of it the sea is deep, reaching a maximum depth of 1,319 feet—2,650 feet below sea level. South of the peninsula the sea is very shallow, with a maximum depth of thirteen feet. It is thought that this area is the location of "the cities of the Plain" (Gen. 13:12), Sodom and Gomorrah.

4. Transjordan Plateau East of the Jordan is an area where the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh settled. In New Testament times, Decapolis and Perea were located there. The ministry of Jesus took Him to limited parts of these provinces. Transjordan is divided into sections by several rivers—the Yarmuk, the Jabbok, the Arnon, and the Zered.

(1) Across from Galilee and north of the Yarmuk River is Bashan (Hauron), an area of rich volcanic soil with rainfall in excess of sixteen inches per year. The plateau averages 1,500 feet above sea level. To the east of Bashan lies only desert that begins to slope toward the Euphrates. In the New Testament era, it was a part of the territory of Philip, the Tetrarch, son of Herod the Great. (2) South of the Yarmuk, reaching to the Jabbok River, was Gilead. During the Persian rule the boundaries were rather rigid. Both before and after Persian domination, Gilead reached as far south as Rabbah (Philadelphia, modern Amman). Formerly heavily wooded, with many springs and with gently rounded hills, Gilead is one of the most picturesque regions of Palestine. Olive groves and vineyards are found on the hillsides. Jerash and Amman, the capital of the Heshemite Kingdom of Jordan, are located here.

(3) South of Gilead lies Moab. Originally, its northern border was the Arnon River, but the Moabites pushed north, giving their name to the plains east of the spot where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea (Ammon attempted to establish herself between Gilead and Moab using Rabbath-Ammon as her stronghold. This succeeded only under the infamous Tobiah during the years of the Exile.) Moab's southern border was the Zered River, Wadi al Hasa.

(4) Still farther south is Edom, with the highest mountains of the region. The area is arid and barren. Fifty miles south of the Dead Sea lies the ancient fortress of Petra, "rose-red . . . half as old as time."

Climate Palestine lies in the semitropical belt between 30° 15′ and 33° 15′ north latitude. Temperatures are normally high in the summer and mild in the winter, but these generalizations are modified by both elevation and distance from the coast. Variety is the necessary word in describing Palestinian weather, for in spite of its relatively small size, the geographical configuration of the area produces a diversity of conditions. Because of the Mediterranean influence, the coastal plain has an average annual temperature of 57° at Joppa. Jerusalem, only 35 miles away, has an annual average of 63°. Its elevation of 2,500 feet above sea level causes the difference. Jericho is only seventeen miles further east, but it is 3,400 feet lower (900 feet below sea level), consequently having a tropical climate and very low humidity. Here bitterly cold desert nights offset rather warm desert days. Similarly, much of the area around the Sea of Galilee experiences temperate conditions, while the Dead Sea region is known for its strings of 100° plus summer days.

Palestine is a land of two seasons, a dry season and a rainy season, with intervening transitional periods. The dry season lasts from mid-May to mid-October. From June through August no rain falls except in the extreme north. Moderate, regular winds blow usually from the west or southwest. The breezes reach Jerusalem by noon, Jericho in early afternoon, and the Transjordan plateau by midafternoon. The air carries much moisture, but atmospheric conditions are such that precipitation does not occur. However, the humidity is evident from the extremely heavy dew that forms five nights out of six in July.

With late October, the "early rain" so often mentioned in Scripture begins to fall. November is punctuated with heavy thunderstorms. The months of December through February are marked by heavy showers, but it is not a time of unrelenting rain. Rainy days alternate with fair days and beautiful sunshine. The cold is not severe, with occasional frost in the higher elevations from December to February. In Jerusalem snow may fall twice during the course of the winter months.

All of Palestine experiences extremely disagreeable warm conditions occasionally. The sirocco wind (the "east wind" of Gen. 41:6 and Ezek. 19:12) blowing from the southeast during the transition months (May—June, September—October) brings dust-laden clouds across the land. It dries vegetation and has a withering effect on people and animals. On occasion the temperature may rise 30°F and the humidity fall to less than 10 percent.

Along the coastal plain, the daily temperature fluctuation is rather limited because of the Mediterranean breezes. In the mountains and in Rift Valley, daily fluctuation is much greater.

PALLET A small, usually straw-filled, mattress light enough to be carried. All biblical references are found in accounts or summaries of the healing of invalids (Mark 2:4–12; John 5:8–12; Acts 5:15). The "bedridden" man of Acts 9:33 was one who had lain on a pallet for eight years.

PALLU (Păl′ lū) Personal name meaning, "conspicuous," "wonder," or "distinguished." Second son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:5,8; 1 Chron. 5:3). KJV used the alternate spelling Phallu in Genesis.

PALLUITES (Păl′ lū ītes) Descendants of Pallu (Nu. 26:5).

PALMERWORM The caterpillar stage of a species of locust (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9). See Insects.

PALMS The date palm (Phoenix dactylifera) was among the earliest cultivated trees. Five thousand-year-old inscriptions from Mesopotamia give instruction for their cultivation. Palms are characteristic of oases and watered places (Ex. 15:27; Num. 33:9). The fruit of the date palm is highly valued by desert travelers since it may be consumed fresh or else dried or made into cakes for a portable and easily storable food. Jericho was known as the city of palms (Deut. 34:3; Judg. 1:16; 3:13). The judge Deborah rendered her decisions under a palm bearing her name (Judg. 4:5). The palm was a symbol of both beauty (Song of Sol. 7:7) and prosperity (Ps. 92:12). Thus, images of palms were used in the decoration of the Temple (1 Kings 6:29,35; 7:36) and were part of Ezekiel's vision of the new Temple (Ezek. 40:16,22,26). Palms were used in the construction of the booths for the festival of booths (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15). In John 12:13, the crowd used palm branches to welcome Jesus to Jerusalem. See Dates; Plants.

PALMS, CITY OF An alternate name for Jericho (Deut. 34:3; Judg. 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chron. 28:15).

PALSY KJV term for paralysis (Matt. 4:24; 9:2; Luke 5:18; Acts 8:7). The descriptions of the Gospel writers do not permit identifications with specific forms of paralysis. The Gospel writers were rather concerned to present Jesus as the One to whom God had entrusted the authority to forgive sins (Matt. 9:6) and whose healing ministry was a cause for glorifying God (Matt. 9:8).

PALTI (Păl′ tī) Personal name meaning, "my deliverance." 1. Benjamin's representative among the twelve spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:9). 2. Second husband of Michal, King Saul's daughter who had previously been given in marriage to David (1 Sam. 25:44; KJV, Phalti). Michal was later returned to David in consequence of Abner's defection from Ishbosheth (2 Sam. 3:15–16). The fuller form Paltiel, meaning, "God delivers," is used in 2 Samuel (KJV, Phaltiel).

PALTIEL (Păl′ tĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God is (my) deliverance." 1. Leader of Issachar whom Moses appointed to assist Joshua and Eliezer in distribution of land to the tribes west of the Jordan (Num. 34:26). 2. Fuller form of the name of Saul's son-in-law (2 Sam. 3:15–16). See Palti.

PALTITE (Păl′ tīte) Title meaning, "resident of Beth-Pelet," given to Helez, one of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:26). The parallels in 1 Chronicles read Pelonite (11:27; 27:10).

PAMPHYLIA (Păm phĭl′ ĭ ə) One of the provinces of Asia Minor. Located in what is now southern Turkey, Pamphylia was a small district on the coast. It measured about eighty miles long and twenty miles wide. One of the chief cities was Perga, where John Mark left Paul and Barnabas during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:13). Other important citites were the ports of Side and Attalia. The New Testament records no other significant events for the early church in Pamphylia, perhaps because of the concentration of non-Hellenized peoples in the region. This would make the spread of the gospel slower and harder to achieve.

PAN A shallow, metal cooking utensil. Pans were used for baking bread for family use (2 Sam. 13:9) or as an offering (Lev. 2:5; 6:21; 1 Chron. 23:29). Deeper pans were used for boiling meat (1 Sam. 2:14). NAS used pans to refer to dishes for incense (Num. 7:14,20,26). NIV mentioned silver pans among Cyrus' gifts for rebuilding the Jerusalem Temple (Ezra 1:9). In the KJV, an iron pan (NRSV plate) serves as symbol of the coming siege of Jerusalem (Ezek. 4:3).

PANNAG Hebrew term perhaps meaning, "pastry," which the KJV took as a place name (Ezek. 27:17). NAS, NIV readings (cakes, confection) are supported by an Akkadian cognate and the Targum. RSV follows variant manuscripts in reading "early figs." REB, NRSV read "millet." TEV reads, "wheat."

A modern variety of the ancient papyrus plant from whose stalks writing material was made.

PAPER, PAPYRUS (Pā pī′ rəs) Popular writing material invented by the Egyptians and used by scribes from 2500 B.C. to A.D. 700.

New Testament manuscripts produced before the fourth century were written exclusively on papyrus; after the fourth century almost all New Testament documents were preserved on parchment. See Bible, Text and Versions; Library; Writing.

PAPHOS (Pā′ phŏs) A town on the southwest side of Cyprus, and capital of the island during New Testament times. Paul, Barnabas, and John Mark came to the city on their first missionary journey and possibly led the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, to Christ (Acts 13:6–12). See Cyprus.

PAPS KJV term used for a woman's breasts (Ezek. 23:21; Luke 11:27) or a man's chest (Rev. 1:13).

PARABLES Stories, especially those of Jesus, told to provide a vision of life, especially life in God's kingdom. Parable means a putting alongside for purposes of comparison and new understanding. Parables utilize pictures such as metaphors or similes and frequently extend them into a brief story to make a point or disclosure.

The difference between a parable and an allegory turns on the number of comparisons. A parable may convey other images and implications, but it has only one main point established by a basic comparison or internal juxtaposition. For example, the parable of the mustard seed (Mark 4:30–32; Matt. 13:31–32; Luke 13:18–19) compares or juxtaposes a microscopically small seed initially with a large bush eventually.

An allegory makes many comparisons through a kind of coded message. It correlates two areas of discourse, providing a series of pictures symbolizing a series of truths in another sphere. Each detail is a separate metaphor or what some call a cryptogram. If you are an insider who knows, you receive the second or intended message. Otherwise, you can follow only the surface story. Jonathan Swift's Guilliver's Travels is an allegory as is John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. In the Old Testament, Ezekiel recounts an incident in nature about great eagles and vines (17:3–8) and then assigns a very allegorical application to each of the details (17:9–18).

The word allegory never appears in the Gospels. Parable is the basic figure Jesus used. Though no parable in the Synoptic Gospels is a pure allegory, some parables contain subordinated allegorical aspects, such as the parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1–12; Matt 21:36–46; Luke 20:9–19). Even in the parable of the Mustard Seed the passing reference to the birds of heaven nesting in the branches (Mark 4:32) may be an allegorical detail, but the distinction of the parable establishing a basic, single comparison remains and aids interpretation. See Allegory.

Parables Prior to Jesus Though Jesus perfected the oral art of telling parables, their background can be found in the Old Testament and in secular sources. The Old Testament employs the broader category of mashal, which refers to all expressions that contain a comparison. A mashal can be a proverb (1 Sam. 10:12), a taunt (Mic. 2:4), a dark riddle (Ps. 78:2), an allegory (Ezek. 24:3–4), or a parable. The stories of Jesus are linked with the heritage of the prophetic parables in the Old Testament (Isa. 28:23–29; 5:1–7; 1 Kings 20:39–43; Eccl. 9:13–16; 2 Sam. 12:1–4).

Perhaps the most interesting antecedent of the parables of Jesus comes from Nathan's word to David. Nathan told the unsuspecting David the seemingly harmless story of a rich man and a poor man living in the same city (2 Sam. 12:1–4). The poor man owned only a single little ewe lamb he loved as a household pet while the rich man possessed large flocks; yet when the wealthy farmer had a guest to serve, he seized the poor man's single lamb for the dinner! The teller of the story was living dangerously as he seized a teachable moment to confront the life of the most famous king of Israel. He sought to get inside David's guard and cut the iron bonds of his self-deception to strike a moral blindness from his eyes. In a sense, it was a well-laid trap since David responded with moral outrage, thus condemning himself. Nathan then applied the parable to the king's affair with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 12:5–14).

The parable was also recognized as a literary type before the time of Jesus in the writings of the Greeks concerning rhetoric. The famous writer Homer included 189 parables in The Illiad and 39 more in The Odyssey. Plato's poetic speech was rich in similitudes interwoven into his speech, but not so much independent unities like those of Jesus. Some of the illustrations of Socrates were parabolic. Aristotle recognized the place of parable in his writings.

Stormy debate rages among Bible students regarding the further question of parables from the rabbis before and during the ministry of Jesus. Scholars like C. A. Bugge and Paul Fiebig pointed to numerous rabbinic parables deriving from the beginning of the first century A.D. Others, such as Jeremias, found almost none until after the days of Jesus. We do know of parables from the rabbis soon after the time of Jesus, and we do recognize that the parables of Jesus are not only far more compelling but center in the coming kingdom of God rather than in exposition of the Law or Torah as the rabbinic parables.

Jesus' Special Use of Parables Many of the parables grew out of the conflict situations when Jesus answered His religious critics. These answering parables, usually for Pharisees and sinners simultaneously, expose and extol. Jesus exposed the self-righteousness of His critics and extolled the kingdom of God. When John the Baptizer was accosted for being too serious and Jesus for being too frivolous, Jesus came back with the parable of the playing children (Matt 11:16–19; Luke 7:31–35) to expose the inconsistency of the criticism. In His most famous parable, He extolled the forgiving love of the father and exposed the hostile criticism of the unforgiving elder brother (Luke 15:11–32).

In fact, Jesus interpreted His ministry and its place in salvation history by means of parable. He addressed different audiences such as the crowds, the disciples, and the critics with definite purposes. Indeed, the Teller as well as the tale is important. That is, the fact that Jesus was the author affects the meaning. As Jesus interpreted His ministry through parables, these sometimes have a "Christological penetration." Jesus Himself appears indirectly in the story (Mark 3:23–27). The parables are not merely clever stories but proclamation of the gospel. The hearer must respond and is invited by the story to make a decision about the kingdom and the King. The parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1–12) represented a blatant confrontation.

These stories got Jesus in trouble as He made veiled claims of kingliness and exposed the hypocrisy regnant in the religious hierarchy. One of the reasons they crucified Jesus was because of His challenging parables and the claims of his Kingdom.

Jesus' Different Kinds of Parables Jesus could turn people's ears into eyes, sometimes with a still picture and then again with a moving picture. He uttered (1) parabolic sayings referring to the salt of the earth (Matt. 5:13) or throwing pearls before swine (Matt. 7:6). These parable germs or incipient parables were generally one liners with a picturesque appeal to the imagination. Remarkably, the Gospel of John has no parables as such; it does include thirteen parabolic sayings.

Jesus also spoke (2) simple parables which represent a picture elaborated into a story. These extended pictures portray a general situation growing out of a typical experience and appealing to common sense. They are often specifically concerning the kingdom of God and are introduced with a saying, "The Kingdom of God is like." Examples are the paired parables of the treasure and the pearl (Matt 13:44–46), the tower builder and the warring king (Luke 14:28–32), and the lost sheep and lost coin (Luke 15:3–10). They are extended similes.

Additionally, Jesus told his famous (3) narrative parables that represent a specific situation and often include in the first sentence reference to a certain person. While Matthew reported a great many parabolic sayings, Luke contains numerous narrative parables, such as the parable of the unjust steward (16:1–8), the compassionate Samaritan (10:30–37), and the rich fool (12:16–21). A narrative parable is a dramatic story composed of one or more scenes, drawn from daily life yet focused on an unusual, decisive circumstance.

Special Literary Considerations Narrative parables and the simple parables total more than forty examples. Certain metaphors recur in the different parables. For example, seed parables such as those of the sower, the seed growing of itself, and the mustard seed in Mark 4 focus on the nature of the coming kingdom. Master/servant parables reflect a time of critical reckoning. Kingly parables, especially in Matthew, portray the sovereignty of the divine judgment and grace. Householder parables feature an authority figure whose purpose is resisted or rejected yet whose will is finally achieved.

This latter category points to the realism of rejection of the will of God fully allowable on the one hand by the divine provision of freedom, yet on the other hand the divine insistence of the eventual triumph of His loving purpose.

Attention to parable form also brings up the prominence of the question format, the refusal parables, and the place of direct discourse. Jesus intended to involve His hearers, and so He constructed many parables that amount to one big question. The parable of the servant and his wages moves by means of two questions (Luke 17:7–10). The parable of the unjust steward (Luke 16:1–8) includes four questions. These interrogatives within parables often define a dilemma (Luke 12:20; Mark 12:9) or call for an agreeing nod in one area of life that carries over to another.

The refusal parables are those that express the intention of a character not to do what is requested: "I do not will." The elder brother refused to enter the festivities in honor of the prodigal son (Luke 15:28), and wedding guests rejected the invitation to attend the festivities of a wedding (Matt. 22:3). These and other examples of the refusal to do the will of God recognize the reality of human pride, stubbornness, hypocrisy, and rejection Jesus encountered during His proclaiming ministry.

Direct discourse is also immensely important in many of the parables because it brings the stories to life. Through the human conversation the parable often makes its point, especially in the last speech. Surely Jesus delivered these lines from each of the parabolic characters in a most animated fashion and even interpreted His parables by the tone of His voice.

Common Theme of Jesus' Parables Jesus' great thesis centers on the kingdom of God (Mark 1:15). Each parable explores and expands the theme. The kingship of God or Yahweh may be found first in the Old Testament (Ps. 24:9–10; Isa. 6:5). Daniel 4 proclaims the divine sovereignty over the secular kingdoms, and the Ten Commandments require full obedience to God.

Jesus lifted the theme to new heights and through His parables portrayed the nature of the kingdom (Mark 4:26–29), the grace of the kingdom (Luke 18:9–17), the crisis of the kingdom (Luke 12:54–56), and the conditions of the kingdom such as commitment (Luke 14:28–30), forgiveness (Matt. 18:23–35), and compassion (Luke 10:25–37).

The parables further proclaim the kingdom as ethical, experiential or existential, eschatological, and evangelistic. Several parables accentuate ethical concerns such as attitude toward one's fellows (Luke 18:9–14; 15:25–32; Matt. 18:23–35). Jesus insisted on being religious through relationships. The rousing call to repentance embodied in many parables requires a moral and spiritual reorientation of life around the kingdom.

Many parables reach the watertable of common experience and illumine existence or life. Jesus could expose a pale or petrified life. He could convey the moving experience of being lost in the far country and then to come to oneself and go home (Luke 15:17). His parables exposed the inauthentic life aggressively self-centered and greedy (Luke 12:13–21; 16:19–31).

As Jesus proclaimed through parables, God was bursting into history, the hinge of history had arrived. He announced it with urgency. He brought an otherwordly perspective to bear in the parable of the rich fool (Luke 12:13–21). He foresaw the full future coming of the kingdom (Matt. 13:8,30,32,39).

The parables are evangelistic because they sought to stimulate a decision and change a life. They invited the audience to repent and believe. The parables intended to awaken faith. The Teller's faith was contagious. The segment about the elder brother (Luke 15:25–32) is unfinished and open-ended. He could choose to swallow his pride, activate his own forgiving spirit, put on his dancing shoes, and join the party.

Unspoken Parables Like the prophets, Jesus enacted some of His intended message. His parabolic acts were boldly done. For example, He chose from His larger following a special group of twelve disciples (Mark 3:13–19), symbolizing His creation of a new Israel. Throughout His ministry, Jesus graciously received spiritual and social outcasts as the Friend of sinners, indicating the Father's loving grace. He cursed the fig tree (Mark 11:12–14,20–21), pointing to the divine judgment on Israel. He rode into Jerusalem in regal humility on the first Palm Sunday, calling forth Zechariah's expectation. He cleansed the Temple (Mark 11:15–19), enacting God's will for Israel to be a light to the nations. At the last supper as He broke the bread and poured the wine, He enacted with miniparables the loving sacrifice of Calvary.

Parables Perspective on Life Some of the stories carry a pastoral and others a prophetic relevance. They have both sugar and steel. The parable of the mustard seed speaks pastorally about ending despair, and the parable of the persistent widow (Luke 18:1–8) encourages to hang in there. The parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6–9) speaks prophetically concerning national priorities; the parable of the wicked tenants accosts arrogant religious leaders; and the parable of the rich fool confronts false confidence in materialism. Through the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, grace peers down on two people praying in the Temple, and appearances take a pounding. Grace shines on worship, and revelation happens!

PARACLETE (Pâ rà clēte) Transliteration of the Greek word Jesus used in John's Gospel for the Holy Spirit. Literally, "One called alongside," Paraclete is translated many ways; "advocate" (applied to Christ, 1 John 2:1) and "Comforter" (John 14:16). See Advocate; Comforter; Counselor.

PARADISE (Păr' ă dīse) Old Persian term which means literally "enclosure" or "wooded park," used in the Old Testament to speak of King Artaxerxes' forest (Neh. 2:8), and twice of orchards (Eccl. 2:5; Song of Sol. 4:13). All three New Testament occurrences (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7) refer to the abode of the righteous dead (heaven). The Greek Old Testament (Septuagint) used "paradise" to translate the Hebrew words for the Garden of Eden in Genesis 2—3. Over the years, the terms became synonymous, and eventually paradise came to refer to heaven. Jewish theology then developed an opposite place for wicked persons, gehenna, a burning furnace. See Future Hope; Heaven.

PARAH (Pā' rah) Place name meaning, "heifer" or "young cow." Village in territory of Benjamin about five miles northeast of Jerusalem, identified with modern khirbet el-Farah (Josh. 18:23). The Hebrew parath, often translated Euphrates (so KJV, NAS, NRSV), may refer to the spring 'Ain Farah at Jeremiah 13:4–7. (Compare NAS, NRSV margin readings, "Parah.") NIV, REB simply transliterate the term.

PARALLELISM See Poetry.

PARALYSIS See Palsy; Disabilities and Deformities.

PARAMOUR An illicit sexual partner (Ezek. 23:20 KJV, NAS, NRSV; Hos. 3:1 RSV). Other translations read: lovers (NIV); male prostitutes (REB); and oversexed men (TEV).

PARAN (Pā' ran) 1. Wilderness area south of Judah, west of Edom, and north of Sinai. Israel camped there after leaving Sinai during the Exodus and sent spies to scout out the Promised Land from Kadesh, a location in Paran (Num. 10:11–12; 13:3,26). Chedorlaomer turned back his military campaign at Padan (Gen. 14:5–7). Ishmael made his home there after Abraham was forced to send Hagar and him away (Gen. 21:21). King Hadad of Edom eluded Joab by going through Padan to Egypt (1 Kings 11:17–18). 2. Mount Paran appears as a poetic parallel to Mount Sinai (Deut. 33:2; compare Hab. 3:3) as the place of revelation. If not the same place as Sinai, the location is not known.

PARBAR (Pär' bär) Hebrew term of uncertain meaning used only at 1 Chronicles 26:18. Some translations (KJV, NAS, RSV) merely transliterate the term. Others offer plausible translations: (western) colonnade (NRSV, REB); western pavilion (TEV); court to the west (NIV). Suggested renderings of the plural of parbar (or a related term) in 2 Kings 23:11 include: precincts (NAS, NRSV), court (NIV), and suburbs (KJV). It was apparently a road, an open area, or a room near the Temple.

PARCHED CORN or GRAIN A common food prepared by roasting grains in a pan or by holding heads of grain over a fire (Lev. 23:14; Josh. 5:11; Ruth 2:14; 1 Sam. 17:17; 25:18; 2 Sam. 17:28). Parched grain served as food for harvest workers, soldiers, and refugees. Mosaic law prohibited the eating of parched grain before the first fruits of the grain had been offered to God. The exact type of grain is not indicated by the Hebrew term; probably barley or wheat was meant.

PARCHED LAND See Scorched Land.

PARCHED PLACES Expression some translations (KJV, NIV, NRSV) use for arid land (Jer. 17:6). Other translations include: stony wastes (NAS) and among the rocks (REB).

covenant love and on the long history of God's acts of forgiveness (Num. 14:19; Mic. 7:18). The Old Testament believers were already aware that the condition for seeking pardon was a repentant heart rather than ritual exactness (1 Chron. 29:18). God's willingness to abundantly pardon serves as an incentive to repentance (Isa. 55:7). See Atonement; Forgiveness; Reconciliation.

PARE To trim or shave off. The paring of nails served as a sign of mourning for lost parents (Deut. 21:12 KJV, REB, NRSV). An Israelite desiring to marry a female prisoner of war was required to allow her to cut her hair and pare her nails first. These actions perhaps symbolized purification on entering the covenant community.

PARENTS See Family.

PARK See Paradise.

PARLOUR British variant of parlor. The KJV used parlour in three passages. In each case, modern translations replace parlor with a term more suitable to the context: (1) inner chambers (NRSV), courts (REB), or rooms (NIV) of the Temple (1 Chron. 28:11); (2) dining hall (REB) or hall (NIV, NRSV) in which Saul shared a sacred meal with Samuel (1 Sam. 9:22); (3) the upper room (NIV) or roof chamber (NRSV, REB) of a palace (Judg. 3:20,23–25).

PARMASHTA (Pär măsh′ tà) Personal name, probably of Persian origin, possibly meaning, "strong-fisted" or "the very first." One of Haman's ten sons (Esth. 9:9).

PARMENAS (Pär′ mĕ năs) Personal name meaning, "faithful" or "constant." One of the seven chosen by the Jerusalem congregation to distribute food to the Greek-speaking widows of that church (Acts 6:5).

PARNACH (Pär′ năch) Persian personal name of uncertain meaning. Father of Elizaphan (Num. 34:25).

PAROSH (Pā′ rŏsh) Personal name meaning, "flea." 1. Ancestor of a postexilic family (Ezra 2:3; 8:3; KJV, Pharosh; 10:25; Neh. 7:8). 2. One of the witnesses to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:14), possibly the father of Pedaiah (Neh. 3:25). This Parosh was likely the chief member of the family above.

PAROUSIA (Pà roū′ sĭ à) Transliteration of Greek word which means "presence" or "coming." In New Testament theology it encompasses the events surrounding the second coming of Christ. See Day of the Lord; Eschatology; Future Hope; Kingdom of God.

PARRI (Pă′ à rî) Personal name meaning, "revelation of Yahweh." One of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:35) designated an Arbite, a resident of Arbah (Josh. 15:52). The parallel list has the name Naarai (1 Chron. 11:37).

PARSHANDATHA (Pär shăn dā′ thà) Personal name, probably of Persian origin, possibly meaning, "inquisitive." One of Haman's ten sons (Esth. 9:7).

PARSIN (Pär′ sĭn) See Mene, Mene, Tekel, Parsin.

PARTHIANS (Pär′ thĭ ans) Tribal people who migrated from Central Asia into what is now Iran. Their homeland was an area southeast of the Caspian Sea. They spoke an Aryan dialect very close to Persian and worshiped the Persian god, Ahura Mazda. The Parthians adopted Greek culture following their fall to Alexander the Great. About 250 B.C. they revolted against the Seleucid rule and reached a height of power under King Mithradates (ruled 171–138 B.C.). In 53 B.C. the Romans invaded but were defeated on several occasions. They did not gain control of Parthia until A.D. 114. Some Parthians were among those in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost who heard the gospel in their own language (Acts 2:9–11).

PARTIALITY Favor shown to one person over another, particularly on the basis of external factors such as economic level or ethnic background. Old Testament law contains frequent warnings to avoid partiality in rendering legal decisions (Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17; 16:19). The theological grounding of this prohibition is God's character, for God shows no partiality (2 Chron. 19:7). God's impartiality served as the basis for the early church's mission to the Gentiles (Acts 10:34–35; Rom. 2:9–11). James warned that showing partiality, particularly that based on economic distinctions, is incompatible with profession of faith in Jesus as Lord (2:1) and is sin (2:9). Ephesians 6:9 warned slaveholders to be fair in treating their slaves, for God is impartial and thus not influenced by human distinctions between master and slave.

PARTIES, JEWISH See Jewish Parties.

PARTITION Something which divides, especially an interior dividing wall. NAS referred to the veil separating the holy place from the holy of holies as a partition (Ex. 26:33). KJV referred to the gold chains separating the same two rooms in the Temple as a partition (1 Kings 6:21; compare NIV). Christ abolished "the middle wall of partition" through His death (Eph. 2:14). Christ abolished not only the hostility between Jews and Gentiles (2:15) but also made possible full fellowship of humanity with God (2:16).

PARTRIDGE A stout-bodied, medium-size game bird with variegated plumage. David likened his life as a fugitive from Saul to a hunted partridge (1 Sam. 26:20). The translation of the proverb of the partridge (Jer. 17:11) is difficult; the Hebrew is extremely terse, and one of the verbs is of uncertain meaning (brood, gather, or lay). Various translations understand the action in the following ways: a partridge sits on eggs which will not hatch (KJV); a partridge gathers chicks it did not hatch (RSV); a partridge sits on eggs it did not lay (REB); a partridge hatches eggs it did not lay (NAS, NIV, NRSV TEV). The KJV interpretation is an apt picture of riches which come to nothing. In other interpretations, the partridge who steals eggs or chicks is no less fortunate than any bird whose chicks grow and leave the nest.

PARUAH (På rū' ah) Personal name meaning, "blossoming," "joyous," or "increase." Father of Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 4:17).

PARVAIM (Pär vā' ĭm) Source of gold for Solomon's decoration of the Temple (2 Chron. 3:6). The place is perhaps el Farwaim (Farwa) in Yemen, or else a general term for the east.

PARZITES (Pär' zītes) KJV alternate form of Perezites (Num. 26:20).

PASACH (Pā' săch) Personal name perhaps meaning "divider." Member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33).

PASCHAL Relating to the Passover. Paul used the sacrifice of the paschal lamb as a picture of the death of Christ (1 Cor. 5:7 NRSV). By dating the crucifixion on the day of preparation for the Passover, John suggested the same image of Christ as the paschal lamb who takes away the sin of the world (John 19:14; compare 1:29).

PASDAMMIN (Păs dăm' mĭn) Place name meaning, "boundary of blood." Scene of David's victory over the Philistines (1 Chron. 11:13). The site is probably between Socoh and Azekah, the same as Ephes-dammin (1 Sam. 17:1).

PASEAH (På sē' ah) Personal name meaning, "lame." 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:12). 2. Ancestor of a family of Temple servants (Neh. 7:51; KJV Phaseah). 3. Father of Joiada (Neh. 3:6).

PASHUR (Păsh' ŭr) Personal name meaning, "son of (the god) Horus." 1. Chief officer in the Jerusalem Temple in the last years before Nebuchadnezzar's victory over the city. He had Jeremiah beaten and imprisoned (Jer. 20:1–2). He or another Pashur was the father of Gedaliah (Jer. 38:1). 2. A man in Zedekiah's court in Jerusalem (Jer. 21:1). As the Babylonian army approached, Pashhur asked Jeremiah for a word from the Lord. Jeremiah prophesied the destruction of the city (21:1–7; compare 38:1–3). 3. Forebear of a priestly family (1 Cor. 9:12) who returned from the Exile (Ezra 2:38) and who later gave up their foreign wives (10:22; compare Neh. 10:3; 11:12).

PASSION 1. Any bodily desire which leads to sin (Rom. 6:12; Gal. 5:24; Eph. 2:3). Passion is especially used for strong sexual desire (Rom. 1:26–27; 1 Cor. 7:9; 1 Thess. 4:5). Unregenerate life is characterized by slavery to passions (Eph. 2:3; Titus 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:14). Those who belong to Christ have crucified fleshly passions (Gal. 5:24; compare Rom. 6:5–14). In their frequent appeals to renounce passions, New Testament letters likely echo charges to baptismal candidates (Col. 3:5; 2 Tim. 2:22; Titus 2:12). 2. KJV twice used the phrase "like passions" (Acts 14:15; Jas. 5:17) to mean "shared human nature." 3. KJV, RSV used passion once (Acts 1:3) to mean the suffering which Christ endured from the night of the last supper until His death. NAS, NIV, NRSV replace passion with suffering, which is the usual translation of the underlying Greek (as in Luke 17:15; 24:26). REB, TEV read, "death."

PASTOR 1. KJV translation of Hebrew term for shepherd in Jeremiah (2:8; 3:15; 10:21; 12:10; 22:22; 23:1,2). Modern translations generally substituted shepherd for pastor except at Jeremiah 2:8 (leader, NIV; ruler, NAS, NRSV). 2. Pastor translates the Greek term poimēn (shepherd) only at Ephesians 4:11. The background of the term lies in the biblical image of the people of God as God's flock (Jer. 23:1–4; Ezek. 34:1–16; Luke 12:32; John 10:16). Pastoral ministry is closely associated with teaching (Eph. 4:11) as God's gift to the church. Such ministry fulfills its God-ordained purpose when it trains church members to be mature in faith and equipped for ministry and unifies the church in Christian faith and knowledge (Eph. 4:12–13). Self-promotion and political divisiveness run counter to the biblical ideal for pastoral ministry. In laying down His life for His sheep (John 10:11,15), Christ set the standard for pastoral ministry that goes beyond words to deeds. His sheep recognize His voice as a trustworthy guide (John 10:3–4). Pastoral ministry is an expression of love for Christ (John 21:15–17).

PASTORALS A convenient designation for First and Second Timothy and Titus. The title, which Anton first applied to these writings in 1753, highlights their concern for proper pastoral authority in the face of heresy. Scholarly debate has centered on the related questions of authorship and setting in the history of the early church. Traditionalists have argued Pauline authorship. Such interpreters generally argue that Paul's two-year imprisonment (Acts 28:16,30) ended, not in Paul's death, but in his release, followed by further missionary work in Achaia (2 Tim. 4:20), Macedonia (1 Tim. 1:3), and Asia Minor (2 Tim. 4:13,20) and a second Roman imprisonment (compare 2 Tim. 3:16). Such critics date the Pastorals after the first imprisonment between A.D. 61 and 68. Other interpreters assign the Pastorals to a disciple of Paul writing about A.D. 100. Such critics appeal to differences in vocabulary and content—missing are Paul's emphases on the union of the believer and Christ, the Spirit as the power of the new life, and freedom from the law. The interpreter's presuppositions concerning the permissibility of pseudonymous writings in the canon and concerning the development of the early church generally determine his or her weighing of the evidence. Whether by Paul or one of his later disciples, these writings reflect a changed agenda for the church. The issue is no longer the missionary concern to incorporate Gentile believers into the church, but the institutional concern to fight heresy within established churches and to present a sober witness to a negative society. See Timothy, First Epistle to; Timothy, Second Epistle to; Titus, Epistle to.

PASTURE Open land surrounding towns and villages, regarded as common property to be freely used by village shepherds and herdsmen (Num. 35:2,7; Josh. 14:4; 21:11). The same Hebrew term designates open space around a city or the sanctuary (Ezek. 27:28; 45:2; 48:17).

PATARA (Păt' ă rà) See Asia Minor, Cities of.

PATH A walkway. Two contrasting paths are a common image for rival ways of life in Hebrew wisdom literature. The path of the wicked (Prov. 4:14) who forget God (Job 8:13) is crooked (Prov. 2:15). This approach to life contrasts with the path of righteousness (Ps. 23:3; Prov. 2:13,20). This alternate path is called the path of God (compare Pss. 17:5; 25:4,10) and of light (Job 24:13). This life-path entails living by the commands or instruction of the Lord (Ps. 119:35,105; Prov. 10:17). The reward for following this path is life (Prov. 10:17; 12:28; compare Ps. 16:11; Prov. 2:19; 5:6). The wise are those who follow this way (Prov. 15:24). The paths of justice (Prov. 2:8; 8:20), peace (Prov. 3:17), and rightenousness refer to the practice of these qualities.

PATHROS (Păth' rŏs) Hebrew transliteration of Egyptian term for Upper (southern) Egypt. Upper Egypt included the territory between modern Cairo and Aswan. The NIV translates the term; other translations transliterate (Isa. 11:11; Jer. 44:1,15; Ezek. 29:14; 30:14).

PATHRUSIM (Păth rū' sĭm) Son of Mizraim (Egypt) and ancestor of the inhabitants of Upper (southern) Egypt who bore his name (1 Chron. 1:12).

PATHRUSITES (Păth rū' sītes) NIV term for Pathrusim.

PATIENCE An active endurance of opposition, not a passive resignation. Patience and patient are used to translate several Hebrew and Greek words. Patience is endurance, steadfastness, long-suffering, and forbearance.

God is patient (Rom. 15:5). He is slow to anger in relation to the Hebrews (Ex. 34:6; Num. 14:18, Neh. 9:17; Ps. 86:15; Isa. 48:9; Hos. 11:8–9). The Hebrews were frequently rebellious, but God patiently dealt with them. Jesus' parable of the tenants depicted God's patience with His people (Mark 12:1–11). God's patience with sinners allows time for them to repent (Rom. 2:4), especially in the apparent delay of the return of Christ (2 Pet. 3:9–10).

God's people are to be patient. The psalmist learned to be patient when confronted with the prosperity of the wicked (Ps. 37:1–3,9–13,34–38). Christians should face adversity patiently (Rom. 5:3–5). Patience is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). Christian love is patient (1 Cor. 13:4,7). Ministers are to be patient (2 Cor. 6:6).

Christians need patient endurance in the face of persecution. Hebrews stressed endurance as the alternative to shrinking back during adversity (Heb. 6:9–15; 10:32–39). Jesus is the great example of endurance (Heb. 12:1–3). Perseverance is part of maturity (Jas. 1:2–4). Job's perseverance is another example for suffering Christians (Jas. 5:11). John frequently highlighted the patient endurance of Christians (Rev. 2:2,19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12). Christian patience is ultimately a gift from God (Rom. 15:5–6; 2 Thess. 3:5).

PATMOS (Păt' mos) A small island (ten miles by six miles) in the Aegean Sea located about thirty-seven miles southwest of Miletus. The Romans used such places for political exiles. John's mention of the island in Revelation 1:9 probably means that he was such a prisoner, having been sent there for preaching the gospel. Eusebius (an early church father) wrote that John was sent to Patmos by Emperor Domitian in A.D. 95 and released after 1 ½ years. See Revelation.

PATRIARCHS, TESTAMENT OF THE TWELVE See Pseudepigrapha.

PATRIARCHS, THE Israel's founding fathers—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and the twelve sons of Jacob (Israel). The word patriarch comes from a combination of the Latin word pater, "father," and the Greek verb archō, "to rule." A patriarch is thus a ruling ancestor who may have been the founding father of a family, a clan, or a nation.

The idea of a binding agreement between God and humankind antedated the patriarchs, being first expressed in the time of Noah (Gen. 6:18; 9:8–17). The growth of the Hebrew nation was promised specifically to Abraham in the patriarchal covenant (Gen. 15; 17), along with the provision of a land in which Abraham's offspring would dwell. Since several generations elapsed before this situation developed, the covenant with Abraham must be regarded as promissory. The promises made to Abraham established the concept of a people descended through Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who would be in a special historical and spiritual relationship with God. See Covenant.

Abraham, or Abram as he was called in the earlier chapters of Genesis, was a ninth-generation descendant of Shem, son of Noah. Abram's father Terah was born in Ur of the Chaldees, as were his brothers Nahor and Haran (Gen. 11:26,28). See Shem; Terah; Ur.

At an early period, Abraham had testified that God was the Most High God (Gen. 14:22), the righteous Judge of humankind (Gen. 15:14), and the Guarantor of the covenant of promise. He experienced close communion with God (Gen. 18:33; 24:40) and worshiped Him consistently to the exclusion of all other gods. His fidelity and obedience were characteristic features of his personality and made this renowned forefather of Israel (compare Rom. 4:1–4) an example of the way in which men and women are justified before God. See Abraham; Nuzi.

The line of descent by which the covenant was to be perpetuated consisted solely of Abraham's son Isaac; through him the covenant promises were continued. Isaac's name is generally thought to mean "laughter," but it possibly also conveys the more subtle sense of "joker." It commemorated the occasion when both Abraham and Sarah laughed at God's promise to provide them with a son in their old age (Gen. 17:17–19; 18:9–15).

We have very little information about the maturing years of Isaac except that he was used as the supreme test of Abraham's faith in the covenant promises. Under the patriarchal system, the father had the power of life or death over every living person and thing in his household. At the very moment that Isaac's life was about to be taken, his position as covenant heir was safeguarded by the provision of an alternative sacrificial offering (Gen. 22:9–13). The circumstances attending his marriage to Rebekah afforded Isaac great comfort after the death of his mother (Gen. 24:67). Isaac prayed earnestly to God for covenant heirs, and in due time Rebekah became pregnant with twins when Isaac was 60 years old. Esau grew up to be a hunter, while Jacob followed the more sedentary life-style of his father by supervising the family's flocks and herds, moving with them when it was necessary to find fresh pasture (Gen. 25:27). Isaac unfortunately provoked sibling rivalry by favoring Esau above Jacob. The former brought his father tasty venison, whereas Jacob's culinary expertise seems only to have extended to preparing lentil soup (Gen. 25:28–29). In a moment of desperate hunger, Esau traded his birthright for some of Jacob's soup, thereby transferring to his brother a double portion of Isaac's estate as well as other rights.

The island of Patmos on which John was probably exiled by the Romans.

In old age, Isaac's sight failed; and, when it became apparent that Esau might inherit the extra birthright provision after all, Rebekah conspired with her favorite son Jacob to deceive Isaac into blessing him rather than Esau. The success of the scheme made Esau extremely angry. To escape his vengeance Jacob fled to Mesopotamia on his father's instructions. Before he arrived he received a revelation from God which confirmed his inheritance in the covenant. Jacob later encountered the family of Laban, son of Nahor, and in due course married two of Laban's daughters. After some years absence Jacob finally returned to Mamre, where his father was living, and along with Esau buried him when he died aged 180 years.

Isaac's life, though less spectacular than Abraham's, was nevertheless marked by divine favor. He was circumcised as a sign of covenant membership, and owed his life to timely divine intervention when a youth (Gen. 22:12–14). He was obedient to God's will (Gen. 22:6,9), a man of devotion and prayer (Gen. 26:25), and a follower of peace (Gen. 26:20–23). He fulfilled his role as a child of promise (Gal. 4:22–23). See Isaac.

The life of Jacob, the last of the three great patriarchs, was marked by migrations, as had been the case with his ancestors. Although he lived successively at Shechem (Gen. 33:18–20), Bethel 35:6–7), and Hebron (Gen. 35:27), Jacob was basically a resident alien who did not have a capital city.

Just before Isaac's death, God appeared again to Jacob (Gen. 35:9) and renewed the promise of his new name. Jacob resided in Canaan thereafter, and only left when a famine overtook the land. Jacob and his sons were invited to live in Egypt by Joseph. As his life drew to a close Jacob, like his father Isaac, became blind; but he blessed his sons by means of a spoken last will and testament, after which he died peacefully. His body was embalmed in the Egyptian manner, and he was buried subsequently in the cave of Machpelah along with his ancestors (Gen. 49:30—50:13). Despite his apparent materialism, Jacob was a person of deep spirituality who, like Abraham, was esteemed highly by his pagan neighbors. Despite his fears, he behaved honorably and correctly in dealing with his avaricious father-in-law Laban and was equally consistent in fulfilling his vow to return to Bethel. Jacob trusted the God whom he had seen at Peniel to implement the covenant promises through him; and when he died, he left behind a clearly burgeoning nation. See Jacob.

The date of the patriarchal period has been much discussed. A time before 2000 B.C. (Early Bronze Age) seems too early and cannot be supported easily by reference to current archaeological evidence. The Middle Bronze period (2000–1500 B.C.) seems more promising because of contemporary archaeological parallels and also because many of the Negeb irrigation systems date from that period. Some scholars have suggested the Amarna period (1500–1300 B.C.) as the one in which the patriarchs lived, but this presents problems for any dating for the Exodus. The same objection applies to a Late Bronze Age (1500–1200 B.C.) period for the patriarchs. The least likely date is in the Judges period or the time of king David. All such dates do not allow time for the patriarchal traditions to have developed and make it impossible for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to be fitted realistically into an already-known chronology. A date in the Middle Bronze Age seems to offer the most suitable solution to a complex problem of dating. R. K. Harrison PATROBAS (Păt′ rō bȧs) Personal name meaning, "life of (or from) father." Member of a Roman house church whom Paul greeted (Rom. 16:14).

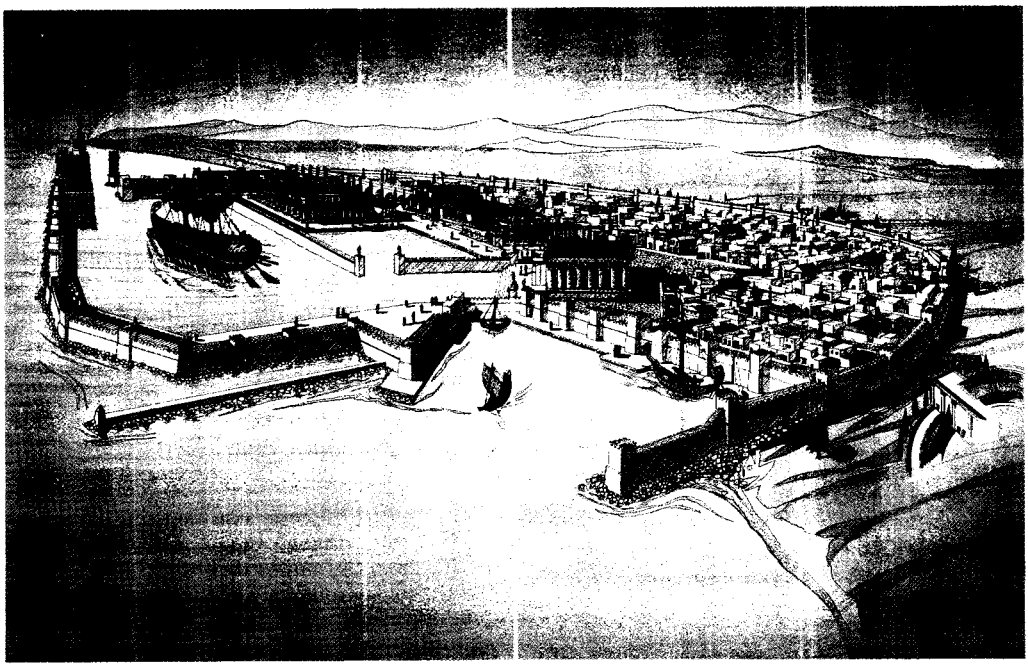
PAU (Pā′ ū) Edomite city meaning, "they cry out." Hadar's (Hadad) capital (Gen. 36:39). The parallel in 1 Chronicles 1:50 gives the name as Pai. It may be Wadi Fai west of the southern end of the Dead Sea.



PAUL The outstanding missionary and writer of the early church. Paul the apostle and his theology are important in the New Testament not only because thirteen Epistles bear his name but also because of the extended biographical information given in the Book of Acts. From the information in these two sources, we piece together a reasonable picture of one of the major personalities of early Christianity. The letters of Paul as listed in the New Testament include Romans through Philemon. (Dates given below are approximate.)

Early Life and Training (A.D. 1–35) Paul's Jewish name was Saul, given at birth after his father or some near kin, or even after the famous Old Testament King Saul, who like Paul was from the tribe of Benjamin. Being born in a Roman city and claiming Roman citizenship, Paul (Paulos) was his official Roman name. Normally, a citizen would have three names similar to our first, middle, and last names. The New Testament records only the name Paul which would have been the middle or last name, since the first name was usually indicated only by the initial. See Rome; Roman Empire; Roman Law.

Tarsus, the place of Paul's birth (Acts 22:3), is still a bustling city a few miles inland from the Mediteranean on Turkey's southern shore. By Paul's day it was a self-governing city, loyal to the Roman Empire. We do not know how Paul's parents or forebearers came to live in Tarsus. Many Jewish families emigrated from their homeland willingly or as a result of foreign intervention in the centuries before Christ. A nonbiblical story says that Paul's parents migrated from a village in Galilee, but this cannot be verified. See Tarsus.

Growing up in a Jewish family meant that Paul was well trained in the Jewish Scriptures and tradition (Acts 26:4–8; Phil. 3:5–6) beginning in the home with the celebration of the Jewish holy days: Passover, Yom Kippur, Hanukkah, and others. At an early age he entered the synagogue day school. Here he learned to read and write by copying select passages of Scripture. He learned the ancient Hebrew language from Old Testament texts. At home his parents probably spoke the current dialect—Aramaic. As Paul related to the larger community, he learned the Greek language. Every Jewish boy also learned a trade. Paul learned the art of tentmaking which he later used as a means of sustenance (Acts 18:3).

Paul eventually went to Jerusalem to study under the famous rabbi, Gamaliel. He was probably 13 to 18 years old. See Gamaliel. Paul had been well trained by the best Jewish teacher of that day (Acts 22:3). Paul became very zealous for the traditions, that is teachings, of his people (Gal. 1:14). He was a Pharisee (Phil. 3:5).

This zealous commitment to the study of the Old Testament laws and traditions is the background of Paul's persecution of his Jewish brothers who believed Jesus was the Messiah. Luke introduced Paul in the Book of Acts at the execution of Stephen. Now Stephen was executed because he placed Jesus (1) superior to the law and (2) superior to the Temple. Furthermore he claimed (3) that the fathers of the Jewish nation had always been rebellious. Paul, from his training, vigorously disagreed with Stephen's point of view. Stephen opposed the very foundations of Judaism since the days of Moses. Stephen's sermon apparently stimulated Paul's persecution of the church (Acts 8:1–3, 9:1–2; 26:9–11; Phil. 3:6; Gal. 1:13). To be an effective persecutor, Paul would need to know as much as possible about Jesus and the church. He knew the message of Christianity: Jesus' resurrection, His messiahship, and His availability to all humankind. He simply rejected the gospel. See Acts of the Apostles; Stephen.

Paul's Conversion (A.D. 35) Three accounts tell of Paul's Damascus Road experience: Acts 9:3–19; 22:6–21; 26:13–23. The variations in details are accounted for by recognizing that each story is told to a different audience on a different occasion. Paul was traveling to Damascus to arrest

Jewish people who had accepted Jesus as the Messiah. This was legally possible since city governments were known to permit the Jewish sector of the city a reasonable degree of self-government. The journey would take at least a week using donkeys or mules to ride and carry provisions.

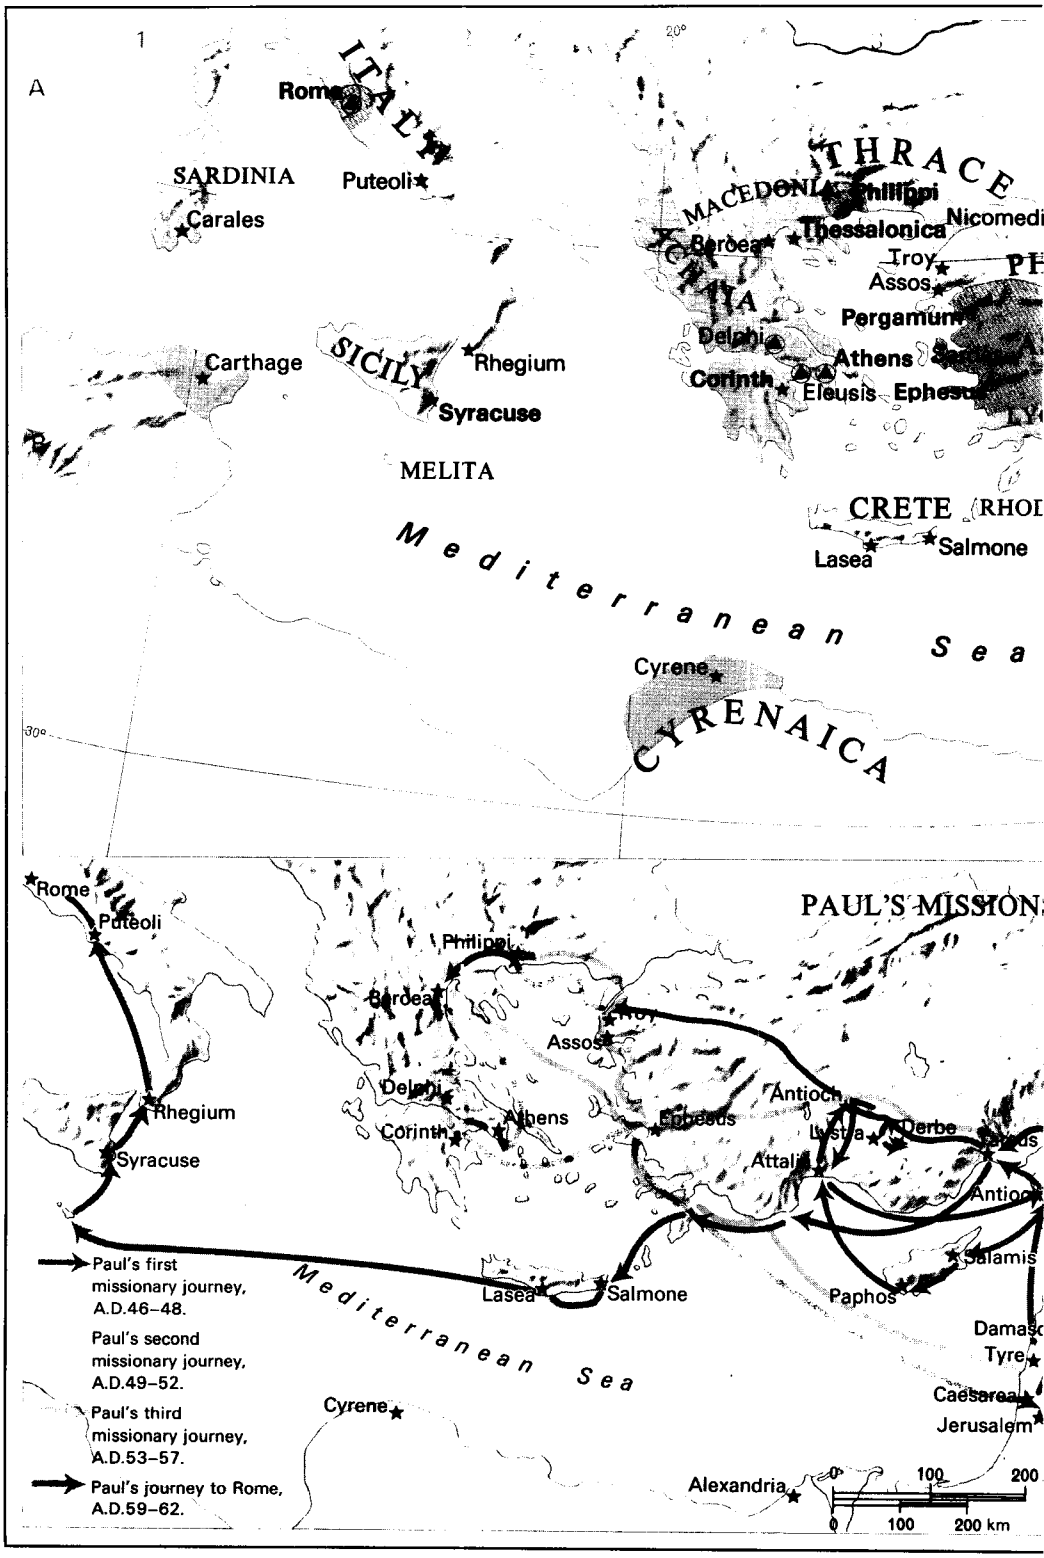
As Paul neared Damascus, a startling light forced him to the ground. The voice asked: "Why persecutest thou me," and identified the speaker as Jesus—the very one whom Stephen had seen at the right hand of God when Paul witnessed Stephen's stoning. Paul was struck blind and was led into the city. Ananias met Paul and told him that he had been chosen by God as a messenger for the Gentiles (9:17). After Paul received his sight, like other believers before him, he was baptized.

In this conversion experience, Paul accepted the claims of Jesus and the church, the very thing he was seeking to destroy. Jesus was truly the Messiah and took priority over the Temple and the law. The experience was also Paul's call to carry the gospel to the Gentile world (9:15; 22:21).

Both his conversion and call are reflected in Paul's letters. He wrote that Jesus had appeared to him (1 Cor. 15:8–10; 9:1); the gospel Paul preached had come by revelation (Gal. 1:12); he had been called by God (Gal. 1:1; Eph. 3:2–12). His conversion brought a complete change in the inner controlling power of his life. It was like dying and receiving a new life (Gal. 2:20) or being created anew (2 Cor. 5:17–20). This experience of radical change and call to the Gentiles provided the motivation to travel throughout the Roman world. See Conversion.

Paul's Missionary Journeys (A.D. 46–61) (1) The first missionary journey (A.D. 46–48) began at Antioch (Acts 13—14). The church at Antioch had been founded by Hellenistic Christian believers like Stephen (Acts 11:19–26). Barnabas became its prominent leader, and Paul was his associate. Acts makes it clear that the entire church was involved in the world mission project, and the church chose Paul and Barnabas to be their representatives. John Mark went along as an important assistant. Their itinerary took them from Antioch (Antakya of modern Turkey) to the seaport of Seleucia. By ship they traveled to Cyprus. They landed at Salamis and traveled the length of the island to Paphos, from whence they set sail to Perga on Turkey's southern shore. Entering the highlands, they came into the province of Galatia where they concentrated their efforts in the southern cities of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Their typical procedure was to enter a new town, seek out the synagogue, and share the gospel on the sabbath day. Usually Paul's message caused a division in the synagogue, and Paul and Barnabas would seek a Gentile audience. From Paul's earliest activities, it became evident that the gospel he preached caused tension between believers and the synagogue. This first journey produced results. In each city many turned to the new way (Acts 13:44,52; 14:1–4,20–28); and a minimal organization was established in each locality (Acts 14:23). He later addressed an epistle to this district—Galatians. See Asia Minor.

(2) Paul's second journey (A.D. 49–52) departed from Antioch with Silas as his associate (Acts 15:36—18:18). They traveled overland through what is now modern Turkey to the Aegean port of Troas. A vision directed Paul to go to Philippi in the province of Macedonia. Philippi was a Roman city with no synagogue and a minimal Jewish population. Paul established a church there as further attested by his letter to the Philippians. From there he traveled to Thessalonica and Berea. His preaching in Athens met with meager results. His work in Corinth (the province of Achaia) was well received and even approved, in an oblique fashion, by the Roman governor, Gallio. From Corinth, Paul returned to Caesarea, visited Jerusalem, and then Antioch (Acts 18:22).



(3) Paul's third missionary venture (A.D. 52–57) centered in the city of Ephesus from which the gospel probably spread into the surrounding cities such as the seven churches in Revelation (Acts 18:23–20:6; Rev. 2—3). From Ephesus he carried on a correspondence with the Corinthian church and possibly other churches. While in Corinth at the end of this journey, he wrote the Epistle to the Romans. See Romans; Corinthians.

When Paul returned to Jerusalem for his last visit (21:17—26:32), he was soon arrested and imprisoned—first in Jerusalem and then later transferred to Caesarea (A.D. 57–59). At first the charges against him were that he had brought a Gentile into the restricted areas of the Temple. Later, he was accused of being a pestilent fellow. The real reasons for his arrest are noted: the crowd was enraged at his mentioning his call to the Gentiles (Acts 22:21–22), and he stated to the Sanhedrin that he was arrested because of his belief in the resurrection. These two reasons, or beliefs, were the controlling motivation of Paul's life from conversion to arrest. See Resurrection; Sanhedrin.

Paul was eventually transferred to Rome (A.D. 60–61) as a prisoner of the emperor. His story in the New Testament ends there. The tradition outside the New Testament that tells of Paul's execution in Rome is reasonable. The tradition that he traveled to Spain is problematic.

Paul and the churches (1) Paul did not hesitate to remind the churches that he possessed apostolic authority from the Lord. Galatians 1—2 is his most intensive statement of this. He blatantly stated that his appointment was from God (1:1), and that he preached the authentic gospel (1:8) because he received it by revelation (1:12).

He had been called by God to carry the gospel to the Gentiles (1:16). This call was recognized by the leaders of the Jerusalem church (2:7–10), the very church in which the most distinguished of the apostles resided—Peter, James, and John. In most of his letters, Paul identified himself from the beginning as an apostle of Christ Jesus. His certainty of the gospel and his relationship to Christ were the grounds of his relation to the churches. The Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians further expresses Paul's commitment to the Gentile mission. Again he insisted that by revelation (3:3) he knew the mystery of Christ which is simply that the gospel is for the Gentiles without any restrictions (3:6–9). He had been given the specific charge to carry the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15). See Galatians, Epistle to; Gentiles.

(2) While Paul was intensely aware of his calling, he also recognized his dependency upon others. When he was criticized for his own willingness to accept Gentiles without their being circumcised, he was willing to enter into dialogue with the Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 15) to resolve the question. Paul must have realized that he, as well as the young Gentile Christians, needed the approval and support of the Christian leaders in Jerusalem, the very place where the crucifixion, burial, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus took place. During his travels, he often returned to Jerusalem to visit the church, and he brought gifts to it on more than one occasion (Acts 11:29–30; 1 Cor. 16:1–4).

The colonnaded Arcadian Way of Ephesus, the city which became Paul's home for over two years.

(3) We must not think of Paul as an established administrator over the churches he founded. His letters give evidence that he did not command or dictate to his churches; rather he persuaded them. The lengthy correspondence with the church at Corinth was Paul's effort to persuade them to adopt the correct attitude toward specific problems as well as toward himself. He could only admonish the churches through the gospel.

Paul's Theology Paul's writings are the major source of Christian theology both because of the amount of material and because of Paul's intensively theological writing style. (1) Human beings are alienated from God. They had the opportunity of recognizing God as Creator and themselves as dependent creatures, but instead they have rejected God and established themselves as the ultimate authority. God permitted humankind to make the choice. The result of such a choice is humankind's immorality, idolatry, and the suffering that human beings impose upon one another. In short, our declaring our independence from God has given sin an opportunity. While Gentiles have made their own abilities absolute, the Jews have made the law absolute. Each group has alienated themselves from God. This is the bondage of sin. Unfortunately, humans do not have the ability to solve this problem. We are hopelessly estranged from God. These ideas are especially described in Romans 1:18–3:8. See Sin; Anthropology.

(2) Paul's answer to humankind's alienation was that "when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his son" (Gal. 4:4). He further described the Son in Colossians 1:15–20. First, Paul told his readers that Christ is the model for all humankind. He is the image of God (1:15). Christ represents what God would like all human beings to be. Second, Christ is bound up with the One who created the universe. Its design and purpose centers in Christ. Whatever our question about our place in the world might be, the ultimate answer is in Christ. Third, based on Christ's relation to God and His place in the universe, He is the appropriate one to reconcile us to God (1:20). Christ is able to reestablish the broken relationship between God and humankind. He shows us how we can realign our proper dependent relationship to God. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor. 5:19). See Conversion; Reconciliation.

(3) The presentation of Christ as God's reconciling gift to humankind is graphically portrayed in the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. This event is the focal point of all that Paul preached and wrote. "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (1 Cor. 2:2). The death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus must be thought of as a unit. "If Christ be not risen, then . . . your faith is also vain" (1 Cor. 15:14). Paul could think of Christ's death as a Passover sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7), as a representative sacrifice (2 Cor. 5:14), or as a ransom (1 Tim. 2:5–6). When Paul stressed the resurrection event, he thought in terms of the doctrine of the future which he had inherited from his Jewish background: (a) Human history has an end which will begin a new world. (b) This will begin with the coming of the Messiah. (c) An intense encounter between good and evil will take place. (d) The dead will be resurrected. Jesus' resurrection is evidence that God has already begun the messianic era. It guarantees the hope that the complete resurrection and the new world is sure to come (1 Cor. 15:20–24). Jesus' death and resurrection was God's way of verifying that Jesus is the One who brings about reconciliation between humankind and God. See Jesus, Life and Ministry of; Christology; Future Hope.

(4) When Paul thought about the person who accepts God's offer of reconciliation in Christ, he described persons of faith, using Abraham as a worthy example (Rom. 4:3). Abraham had a right relation to God because of his response of faith to God's offer. Paul further described Abraham as one who was "fully convinced that God was able to do what he had promised" (Rom. 4:21 NRSV). This is applied to Christians: "It [righteousness] will be reckoned to us who believe [have faith] in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. 4:24 NRSV). Faith is simply accepting as certain the promise of salvation God has made through Christ. This response in faith is so dynamic and vital that it has transforming power and is like creating a new person (Gal. 2:20; 2 Cor. 5:17–19). The person of faith is a new creation with a new motivating, energizing force, the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:9–11). The person of faith is truly "in Christ." See Faith.

(5) The believer does not come into reconciliation in isolation. It happens in a community of faith. Paul began his missionary activities out of a congregation of believers. Wherever people became believers, a community existed known by the word church. Paul never advised a person of faith to live alone but rather to fellowship with the church. This believing community is intimately associated with Christ, who holds a position of dignity and authority over the church—He is its Head (Eph. 1:22–23). At the same time Christ loves the church, and He gave Himself for it; the church is subject to Christ in all matters (Eph. 5:21–33). This new community performs two functions: (a) It nurtures the person of faith so that he or she may mature "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13). (b) It witnesses to God's power to reconcile humankind to Himself by its example of Christian fellowship within its walls and by evangelistic outreach beyond itself (Eph. 3:10). See Church.

(6) The reconciled person has a new life-style. Paul expressed a concern for ethics. He listed vices: Galatians 5:19–21; Colossians 3:5–11; Ephesians 4:17–19; 1 Corinthians 5; 6:9–10; 2 Corinthians 12:20–21, and others. He also listed worthy qualities: Galatians 5:22–23; Colossians 3:12–14; Philippians 4:8. He gave advice to Christian households: Colossians 3:18—4:1; Ephesians 5:21—6:9. He offered guidance in marriage matters: 1 Corinthians 7. Although Paul expected worthy Christian conduct, he was not legalistic. Legalism means keeping rules for rule's sake. Rules are essential for Christian nurture. In an extended discussion about Christian conduct (1 Cor. 8:1—11:1) he emphasized that a believer will be sensitive to the effect his conduct will have on a fellow believer (1 Cor. 8:9–12). The ultimate standard of Christian conduct is Christ Himself. After exhorting believers to be concerned about their actions toward each other, Paul gave one of his most beautiful descriptions of the example of Jesus' giving Himself for others (Phil. 2:1–11). So Christ gives Himself as God's reconciling agent to bring human beings into a right relation with God, living a life motivated by the Spirit. See Ethics.

PAVEMENT See Gabbatha.

PAVILION (Pă vĭl ĭo n) A large, often richly decorated tent. KJV used pavilion seven times: three times in the literal sense of tents used in military campaigns (1 Kings 20:12,16; Jer. 43:10); twice of the thick canopy of clouds surrounding God (2 Sam. 22:12; Ps. 18:11) which illustrates the mystery of God; and twice as an image of God's protection (Pss. 27:5; 31:20). NAS, NIV, and NRSV substituted various terms (booths, canopy, shelter, tabernacle, tent) in each of these passages. The NAS used pavilion in the literal sense of tent in Daniel 11:45. Elsewhere in modern translations, pavilion appears in poetic passages: a pavilion for the sun (Ps. 19:5 NIV); God's pavilion of clouds (Job 36:29 NAS, REB, NIV, NRSV); a pavilion protecting Jerusalem from heat and rain (Isa. 4:5, RSV).

PEACE OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering.

PEACE, SPIRITUAL Sense of well-being and fulfillment that comes from God and is dependent on His presence.

Old Testament The concept of spiritual peace is most often represented by the Hebrew root slm and its derivatives, the most familiar being the noun shalom. Its basic meaning is "wholeness" or "well-being." (See, for example, Gen. 28:20–22; Judg. 6:23; 18:6; 1 Kings 2:33.) The Law, the Prophets, and the Writings of the Old Testament each bear testimony that such peace is the gift of God, for God alone can give peace in all its fullness (Lev. 26:6; 1 Chron. 12:18; 22:9; 1 Kings 2:33; Isa. 26:12; 52:7; Ezek. 34:25; 37:26; Zech. 6:13; Mal. 2:5–6; Job 22:21; 25:2; Pss. 4:8; 29:11; 37:37; 85:8; 122:6–8; 147:14; Prov. 3:17). Spiritual peace may be equated with salvation (Isa. 52:7; Nah. 1:15). Its absence may be equated with judgment (Jer. 12:12; 14:19; 16:5; 25:37; Lam. 3:17; Ezek. 7:15). It is available to all who trust in God (Isa. 26:3) and love His law (Ps. 119:165—note that in vv. 166–168 this love is clearly understood to mean obedience!) This peace is clearly identified with a righteous life apart from which no one is able to find true peace (Isa. 32:17; 48:22; 57:1–2). Thus peace and righteousness are often linked in the Old Testament (Pss. 72:7; 85:10; Isa. 9:7; 32:17; 48:18; 60:17), as are peace and justice (Isa. 59:8). To be at peace is to be upright (Mal. 2:6), to be faithful (2 Sam. 20:19), to be an upholder of the truth (Esth. 9:30; Zech. 8:19), and to practice justice (Isa. 59:8; Zech. 8:16). Throughout the Old Testament spiritual peace is realized in relationship. It is realized when people are rightly related to each other and to God.

New Testament The Greek word eirēnē corresponds to the Hebrew shalom expressing the idea of peace, well-being, restoration, reconciliation with God, and salvation in the fullest sense. God is "the God of peace" (Rom. 15:33; Phil. 4:9; 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 13:20). The Gospel is "the good news of peace" (Eph. 6:15; Acts 10:36) because it announces the reconciliation of believers to God and to one another (Eph. 2:12–18). God has made this peace a reality in Jesus Christ, who is "our peace." We are justified through Him (Rom. 5:1), reconciled through the blood of His cross (Col. 1:20), and made one in Him (Eph. 2:14). In Him we discover that ultimate peace which only God can give (John 14:27). This peace is experienced as an inner spiritual peace by the individual believer (Phil. 4:7; Col. 3:15; Rom. 15:13). It is associated with receptiveness to God's salvation (Matt. 10:13), freedom from distress and fear (John 14:27; 16:33), security (1 Thess. 5:9–10), mercy (Gal. 6:16; 1 Tim. 1:2), joy (Rom. 14:17; 15:13), grace (Phil. 1:2; Rev. 1:4), love (2 Cor. 13:11; Jude 2), life (Rom. 8:6), and righteousness (Rom. 14:17; Heb. 12:11; Jas. 3:18). Such peace is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) that forms part of the "whole armor of God" (Eph. 6:11,13), enabling the Christian to withstand the attacks of the forces of evil. Thus, the New Testament gives more attention to the understanding of spiritual peace as an inner experience of the individual believer than does the Old Testament. In both the Old and the New Testament, spiritual peace is realized in being rightly related—rightly related to God and rightly related to one another. Hulitt Gloer PEACEMAKERS Those who actively work to bring about peace and reconciliation where there is hatred and enmity. God blesses peacemakers and declares them to be His children (Matt. 5:9). Those who work for peace share in Christ's ministry of bringing peace and reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18–19; Eph. 2:14–15; Col. 1:20).

PEACOCK A male of any of several species of large pheasants, native to southeastern Asia and the East Indies, which are raised as ornamental birds. KJV translated two Hebrew words as peacock. Modern translations replaced peacock with ostrich at Job 39:13. NAS, NRSV read peacock with KJV at 1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chronicles 9:21. Other translations read monkey (REB, RSV) or baboon (NIV, NRSV margin).

PEARL See Jewels and Jewelry; Minerals and Metals.

PEASANTRY NAS and RSV translation of an obscure Hebrew term used only in Deborah's song of victory (Judg. 5:7,11). KJV, NIV, TEV followed the Targum (Aramaic paraphrase) and Syriac version in reading villages. REB read champion. Various commentators have suggested leading class, warriors, and strength as possible meanings.

PEDAHEL (Pĕd′ ȧ hĕl) Personal name meaning, "God delivers." Leader of the tribe of Naphtali whom Moses appointed to assist Joshua and Eliezer in the distribution of land to the tribes living west of the Jordan (Num. 34:28).

PEDAHZUR (Pė dăh′ zŭr) Personal name meaning, "(the) Rock redeems." Father of Gamaliel (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54,59; 10:23).

PEDAIAH (Pė dâi′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah redeems." 1. Maternal grandfather of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36). 2. Father (so 1 Chron. 3:18–19) or uncle (so Ezra 3:2,8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Haggai 1:1,12,14; 2:2,23) of Zerubbabel. First Chronicles presents Pedaiah and Shealtiel as brothers. 3. Manassite father of Joel (1 Chron. 27:20). 4. Son of Parosh assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25). 5. Witness to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 8:4), perhaps identical with 4. 6. Benjaminite father of Joed (Neh. 11:7). 7. Levite whom Nehemiah appointed a Temple treasurer (Neh. 13:13).

PEDDLER One who sells goods, usually on the street or door-to-door. Paul denied being a peddler of God's word (2 Cor. 2:17). Here Paul either emphasized that he did not preach for pay (1 Cor. 9:12,15) or that he did not use tricks to gain converts (2 Cor. 4:2; 12:16).

PEDIMENT NRSV term for the stone base upon which Ahab set the bronze sea after removing it from the twelve bronze oxen (2 Kings 16:17). Other translations for pediment include: base (NIV), foundation (TEV), pavement (KJV, NAS). Ahab's changes in the Temple equipment were an attempt to gain favor with the Assyrians.

PEG A small, cylindrical or tapered piece of wood (or some other material). Pegs were used: to secure tents (Judg. 4:21–22; 5:26); to hang articles (Isa. 22:23,25; Ezek. 15:3); to weave cloth (Judg. 16:14); even to dig latrines (Deut. 23:13). Isaiah 22:23–25 used the image of a peg which gives way to picture false security in a leader. Zechariah 10:4 used the peg as one of several images for rulers. In Isaiah 33:22 secure tent pegs symbolize that God keeps Jerusalem secure. The enlarged tent and strengthened tent pegs of Isaiah 54:2 illustrate God's restoration of Jerusalem.

PEKAH (Pē′ kah) A personal name meaning, "open-eyed." Officer in Israel's army who became king in a bloody coup by murdering King Pekahiah (2 Kings 15:25). His reign of twenty years (15:27) probably is the total time he held military control in Gilead and Samaria. Pekah appeared to be the leader in Gilead during Menahem's reign but surrendered control there when Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria confirmed Menahem's rule. Pekah then was given a high office in the army, and the coup followed shortly after Pekahiah succeeded Menahem. Pekah reigned in Samaria 752–732 B.C. and was in turn assassinated by Hoshea (15:30). See Menahem.

PEKAHIAH (Pĕk′ ă hī′ ah) A personal name meaning, "Yah has opened his eyes." King of Israel 742–740 B.C. He succeeded his father, Menahem, as a vassal of the Assyrian throne (2 Kings 15:23). The tense political situation he inherited was very hostile, as the loyalists and rebel zealots vied for control. Pekahiah's uneventful reign ended when he was assassinated by an army officer, Pekah (15:25), who was supported by Syria and opposed to the Assyrian domination. See Pekah.

PEKOD (Pē′ kŏd) Hebrew for "punishment" or "judgment" which plays on the name Puqadu, an Aramean tribe inhabiting the area east of the mouth of the Tigris (Jer. 50:21; Ezek. 23:23). Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) incorporated Pekod into the Assyrian Empire. Pekod formed part of the Babylonian Empire in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

PELAIAH (Pē lai′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is wonderful (or performs wonders)." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:24). 2. Levite assisting in Ezra's public reading of the law (Neh. 8:7). 3. Levite witnessing Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:10), perhaps identical to 2.

PELALIAH (Pĕ lā lī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh intercedes." Ancestor of a priest in Ezra's time (Neh. 11:12).

PELATIAH (Pĕl ā tī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh delivers." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:21). 2. One of the Simeonites destroying the remaining Amalekites at Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 2. Judean prince who offered "wicked counsel," perhaps appealing to Egypt for help in a revolt against the Babylonians (Ezek. 11:1,13; compare Jer. 27:1–3; 37:5,7,11). 4. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:22).

PELEG (Pē′ lĕg) Personal name meaning, "division" or "watercourse." Descendant of Shem (Gen. 10:25), ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:16–19; 1 Chron. 1:19,25) and Jesus (Luke 3:35). Peleg's name is attributed to one of the many firsts recorded in Genesis, the "division" of the earth or land. Tradition associates this division with the confusing of languages and the consequent scattering of peoples from Babel (Gen. 11:8–9). Noting that peleg often refers to a stream of water (Job 29:6; Pss. 1:3; 46:4; 119:136; Prov. 5:16; 21:1; Isa. 30:25; 32:2), some suggest that the "division" of the land refers to irrigation ditches crisscrossing the landscape. According to this interpretation, Peleg's name commemorates the beginnings of organized agriculture. Though Peleg's descendants are only traced through Abraham, Peleg is recognized as the ancestor of all the Semitic peoples of Mesopotamia, while his brother Joktan was ancestor of the Arabian Semites. See Table of Nations.

PELET (Pē′ lĕt) Personal name derived from a root meaning, "escape." 1. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47). 2. Benjaminite warrior who defected from Saul to David (1 Chron. 12:3).

PELETH (Pē′ lĕth) Personal name meaning, "swift." 1. Father of On (Num. 16:1). The name is possibly a textual corruption of Pallu (Gen. 46:9; Num. 26:5,8), whose descendants are also associated with the Korah rebellion (Num. 26:9–10). 2. A Jerahmeelite (1 Chron. 2:33).

PELETHITES (Pē′ lĕth īte) A family name meaning, "courier." Foreign mercenaries King David employed as body guards and special forces. Their leader was Benaiah (2 Sam. 8:18). The Pelethites are mentioned in conjunction with the Cherethites. These two groups probably were sea peoples who formed a loyalty to David during his days in the Philistine country while evading Saul. They remained with him until his death, fighting for him during the rebellions against his throne. Following his death, they helped Solomon purge the kingdom of David's enemies. See Cherethites.

PELICAN Any member of a family of large, web-footed birds with gigantic bills having expandable pouches attached to the lower jaw. Pelicans are found in Palestine. The Hebrew term translated pelican in Leviticus 11:18; Deuteronomy 14:17, however, suggests a bird which regurgitates its food to feed its young. Other passages (Ps. 102:6; Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14) associate the same Hebrew term with deserted ruins, an unlikely habitat for the pelican. Suggested identifications include the jackdaw (NAS margin), owl (NAS margin, NRSV), and vulture (RSV).

PELLA (Pĕl′ là) City just east of the Jordan River and southeast of the Sea of Galilee. It received a large part of the Jerusalem church when they fled there before the Roman destruction of the Holy City in A.D. 66. Pella became an important link in the church structure from that time. The site was inhabited as early as 1900 B.C. and is mentioned in the Egyptian Execration Texts (1850 B.C.) and the Amarna Letters (about 1400 B.C.). Pella was destroyed shortly before the Israelite conquest and not rebuilt until about 350 B.C. Alexander the Great settled the city with Macedonians. In the early years of the first century B.C. it was destroyed again but rebuilt and greatly enhanced by Pompey.

PELONITE (Pē′ lō nīte) Resident of Pelon, an unknown site. The title belongs to two of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:27, 36; 27:10). Pelonite is perhaps a textual corruption for Paltite, the title of Helez in the parallel in 2 Samuel 23:26.

PELUSIUM (Pē′ lü sĭ ŭm) Egyptian military outpost near the mouth of the easternmost branch of the Nile, about eighteen miles west of the Suez Canal, identified with modern el Farama. Some modern translations follow the Vulgate in reading Pelusium at Ezekiel 30:15–16 (NIV, NRSV, TEV; also KJV and NAS margins). Pelusium was the site of the defeat of Pharoah Psammetichus III by Cambyses of Persia in 525 B.C. KJV, NAS follow the Hebrew in reading Sin. Some Greek and Latin witnesses read Sais, the capital of the Twenty-Sixth (Saite) Dynasty (663–525 B.C.), at 30:15. Sais was located on the westernmost branch of the Nile. The REB follows the earliest Greek translation in reading Syene (modern Aswan) at 30:16. See Sin.

PENTATEUCH (Pĕn′ tà teŭch) First five books of Old Testament. The word Pentateuch comes from two Greek words Penta "five" and teuchos meaning "box," "jar," or "scroll." Originally the word was used as an adjective meaning "a five-scrolled (book)." The common Jewish arrangement calls the first five books of the Hebrew Bible Torah, law or teaching. The early church fathers beginning with Tertullian (about A.D. 200) called them the Pentateuch. The fivefold division of the Pentateuch is older than the Septuagint or earliest Greek translation (about 200 B.C.). The Hebrew names of these five scrolls come mainly from the opening word(s) of each scroll. Genesis is called bereshith, "in beginning"; Exodus, we'elleh shemoth, "These are the names"; Leviticus, wayyikra, "and he called"; Numbers, bemidbar, "in the Wilderness"; and Deuteronomy, elleh haddebarim, "These are the words." The names of the books in the English Bible, come through the Latin from the Greek Septuagint and are intended to be descriptive of the contents of each book. Genesis means "generation" or "origin"; Exodus means "going out"; Leviticus refers to the Levitical system; Numbers refers to the numbering of the tribes, Levites, and first born (chs. 1—4,26); and Deuteronomy means "second law" (17:18).

The dividing lines between the individual books of the Pentateuch generally mark a change in the direction of the materials. At the end of Genesis (ch. 50), the stories of the Patriarchs end, and the story of the people of Israel begins in Exodus 1. The division between Exodus and Leviticus marks the change from the building of the tabernacle in Exodus 35—40 to the inauguration of worship (Lev. 1—10). Numbers begins with preparation for leaving Sinai, and Deuteronomy stands out sharply from the end of Numbers in that Deuteronomy 1:1 begins the great speech of Moses which covers thirty chapters (Deut. 1—30). We do not know when the Pentateuch was divided into five books. The division may have taken place only when the whole material now united within it had been incorporated into one unit and this division was aimed at producing sections of approximately equal length, corresponding to the normal length of scrolls.

Contents The division of the Pentateuch into five books does not indicate adequately the richness of the contents nor the variety of the literary forms found in the whole. A division of the Pentateuch based on the contents may be outlined as: Genesis 1—11, Primeval history, from Creation to Abraham; Genesis 12—36, Patriarchal history; Genesis 37—50, Joseph stories; Exodus 1—18, The Exodus; Exodus 19—Numbers 10:10, Israel at Sinai; Numbers 10:11—21:35, Israel in the Wilderness; Numbers 22:1—Deuteronomy 34, Israel in the Plains of Moab. Within each of these larger narrative sections are a number of smaller sections dealing with various themes and subthemes couched in many literary forms.

Themes The first theme in the Pentateuch is God is Creator (Gen. 1—2). This is followed closely by a chapter on the beginning of sin (Gen. 3). Chapters 4—11 tell of the increase of world population and sin, and the judgment of God on the whole world. The themes of electon, covenant, promise, faith, and providence are introduced in the remainder of Genesis (12—50). Divine deliverance is the major theme of Exodus 1—18. Covenant and law are themes of Exodus 19—24. Worship and social ethics are the concerns of Exodus 25—Numbers 10:10. Guidance of a rebellious people through the great and terrible wilderness marks Numbers 10—21; and preparations for going over Jordan and conquering Canaan are the major topics of Numbers 22—Deuteronomy 34.

Literary forms and genres The Pentateuch includes many literary forms and genres: narratives, laws, lists, sayings, sermons, and songs. Narratives describe creation, judgment (flood), travel (wilderness wanderings), buildings (Ark, tabernacle), marriages (Isaac and Rebekah), and births (Moses).

Although the Pentateuch is often referred to as Torah or law, laws comprise only a small percentage of the text. The Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:2–17; Deut. 5:6–21) are frequently called law, but they are not law in the technical sense because no penalties or sanctions are connected with them. Other groups of laws in the Pentateuch are: the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20:22—23:19); the laws of sacrifice (Lev. 1—7); the laws of purity (Lev. 11—15); the Holiness Code (Lev. 17—26); and the Deuteronomy Code (Deut. 12—26). No laws appear in Genesis. Four out of forty chapters in Exodus (chs. 20—23), most of Leviticus and a small portion of Numbers contain laws. Fourteen out of thirty-four chapters of Deuteronomy consist of legal material. See Law; Book of the Covenant; Purity; Sacrifice; Holiness. The 65 laws in the Book of the Covenant (see Ex. 24:7) include rules about images and kinds of altars (Ex. 20:22–26); Hebrew slaves (21:1–11); offences penalized by death (21:12–17); bodily injury (21:18–24); offences against property (21:25—22:17); miscellaneous social and cultic laws (22:18—23:9); a cultic calendar (23:10–19); blessing and curse (23:20–33).

The Holiness Code (Lev. 17—26) is named from the expression, "Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy" (Lev. 19:2; 20:7,26). The Holiness Code stresses moral and ceremonial laws rather than civil and criminal laws. Chapters 18—20; 23—26 are directed to the people; chapters 17; 21—22 are directed to the priests and the house of Aaron. This Code deals with the slaughter of animals and sacrifice (17:1–16); forbidden sexual relations (18:1–30); relationships with neighbors (19:1–37); penalties (stoning, burning); rules for personal life of the priests (20:1—22:16); the quality of sacrifices (22:17–33); a cultic calendar (23:1–44); rules for lights in the sanctuary and the shewbread (24:1–9); blasphemy (24:10–23); the sabbatic year and jubilee (25:1–55); blessings and curses (26:1–46).

The Holiness Code says very little about agriculture. Much more is said in this Code than in the Book of the Covenant about forbidden sexual relations, including homosexuality (compare Lev. 18:1–23; 20:13). All forms of witchcraft, augury, and the occult are forbidden (Lev. 17:7; 19:26,31; 20:2–6,27). Two significant passages in this group of laws are: "For the life . . . is in the blood" (17:14 RSV), and, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (19:18). The expression "I am the Lord your God" and similar expressions occur 46 times in Lev. 18—26.

The Deuteronomic Code (Deut. 12—26) is part of Moses' address to the twelve tribes just before they crossed the Jordan to go into Canaan. These are "preached" laws, full of admonitions and exhortations to heed and obey so that the Lord may bless them and they may live in the land (Deut. 12:1,13,19,28; 13:18; 14; 15:10,18; 16:12; 17:20,29). Many of these 80 laws are new because they are addressed to a new generation. See Deuteronomy. The restriction of worship or sacrifice to one legitimate altar is limited to the Deuteronomic Code as is the expression: "the place where I will make my name to dwell." Permission for private slaughtering and eating animals is given only in Deuteronomy (Deut. 12:15). Laws for judges, prophets, priests, and kings occur only in Deuteronomy. The laws for Hebrew slaves and the calendars of worship are different in Exodus and Deuteronomy. In Deuteronomy the Passover is to be observed only at the one legitimate place and the lamb is to be boiled (Deut. 16:7), but in Exodus, Passover is a family affair and the lambs are to be roasted (Exod. 12:9). The laws for the tithes are different in Deuteronomy 14 from those in Numbers 18:21–32. Laws of holy war are given only in Deuteronomy. Idolatry and the First Commandment are major concerns of all the codes.

Many attempts have been made to classify the laws in the Old Testament according to their types. Some recent scholars have used the terms "apodictic" and "casuistic" to refer to the two main types of laws. Apodictic refers to those authoritative, unconditional laws such as the Ten Commandments which begin, "Thou shalt not," "You shall," or laws calling for the death penalty. Casuistic laws are usually case laws which begin "When a man," or, "If a man." This classification is helpful in identifying the literary form, setting, and perhaps the origin of a law. Christians often speak of Old Testament laws as moral, civil, and ceremonial, but the Old Testament does not use those categories to classify its laws. In the Pentateuch, laws of every kind are jumbled together and interspersed with narrative and descriptive sections. Rather than attempting to isolate certain moral laws, it would be better to try to detect moral and ethical principles in all types of Old Testament laws. Some recent scholars have classified the laws in the various parts of the Old Testament as: criminal law, civil laws, family laws, cultic (worship) laws, and charitable (humanitarian) laws.

Old Testament laws were given in the context of the covenant. The people had experienced deliverance (salvation) at the Exodus. God took the initiative and by grace redeemed Israel from bondage in Egypt. God acted first, then called the people to respond. Old Testament laws were given to redeemed people to tell them how to live as people of God.

The Pentateuch contains many lists: genealogical (Gen. 5; 11; Ex. 5), geographical and ethnographical (Gen. 10; 26), tribal (Gen. 49; Deut. 33); offerings (Ex. 35); census (Num. 1—4; 26), and campsites in the wilderness (Num. 33).

The Old Testament contains many "sayings" of various kinds. Some are poetic. Some are proverbial. Some are prose. These sayings may have been remembered and passed from generation to generation. Some familiar examples are:

This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh (Gen. 2:23 NIV).

For dust you are and to dust you will return (Gen. 3:19 NIV).

Like Nimrod, a mighty hunter before the Lord (Gen. 10:9 NIV).

I . . . will be gracious to whom I will be gracious (Ex. 33:19).

Deuteronomy is the only place in the Old Testament where long sermons are found. Even the laws in Deuteronomy are "preached" laws. The fact that many admonitions and exhortations occur throughout the book may indicate that the book was used as a covenant renewing document.

One other major literary genre is found in the Pentateuch—that of song: Israel was a singing people. They sang in times of victory (Ex. 15), at work (Num 21:17–18), in times of battle (Num. 21:14–15,27–30), and in worship (Num. 6:22–26; Deut. 32:1–43).

Date and Authorship The problem of the date and authorship of the Pentateuch is one of the major critical problems of the Old Testament. Dr. John R. Sampey wrote, > Possibly the higher criticism of the Pentateuch is the most important critical problem confronting students of the Old Testament. Fundamental and difficult it calls for patience, industry and the ability to sift evidence and estimate its value. It requires logical discipline and a well-balanced mind [John R. Sampey, Syllabus For Old Testament Study (Nashville: Broadman Press, 1924), p. 52].

The existence of sources for its writing is not the major issue, but its inspiration and reliability in its present form.

One reason the question of date and authorship of the Pentateuch is difficult is that the books themselves are anonymous. Most English Bibles carry the titles of the first five books as "the books of Moses." These titles are not in the Hebrew manuscripts. They came into England through Tyndale's version and were probably derived from Luther's translation which used only the numerical titles, "First Book of Moses," and so on to the fifth.

Although the books of the Pentateuch as a whole are anonymous, a number of passages refer to Moses writing at least certain things (compare 17:14; 24:4; 24:7; Num. 33:1–2; Deut. 31:9,22). Late in the Old Testament period, the tradition arose which seemingly refers to the Pentateuch as the "Book of Moses" (2 Chron. 35:12). This tradition was carried on by Jews and Christians until after A.D. 1600. Some Jews and Christians raised occasional questions about the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch during all that time, but the Renaissance and the Enlightenment led to the questioning of all things including the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. One passage in the Pentateuch which contributed to the serious questioning of Mosaic authorship is Deuteronomy 34:5–8, describing Moses' death and the following period of mourning. Other post-Mosaic references are to Dan (Gen. 14:14; compare Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:28*b*–29), and the conquest of Canaan (Deut. 2:12). The way the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch is written today is nothing like it might have appeared in Moses' day. For hundreds of years, the Hebrew text was copied by hand. In the process of copying, the shape of the letters was completely changed. Vowel points and accents were added. Words were separated word by word and divided into verses and chapters.

We do not know who wrote the completed Pentateuch. The Pentateuch makes no claim that Moses wrote all of it. Many theories and hypotheses have been advanced to explain its origin. The classical literary critical theory is associated with the name of Julius Wellhausen, a nineteenth century German scholar. He popularized and synthesized the views of many Old Testament scholars and said that the Pentateuch was a compilation of four basic literary documents identified as J, E, D, and P. J stood for Jehovah or Judah and supposedly was written in the Southern Kingdom about 850 B.C. E stood for Elohim, a favorite Hebrew name for God in this document. It was supposedly written about 750 B.C. D stands for Deuteronomy and was written according to this hypothesis about 621 B.C. P stands for the Priestly document and was written about 500 B.C. The Priestly writer might have compiled the whole Pentateuch according to this theory.

Many other theories and modifications of older theories have arisen in the twentieth century. Critical scholarship's earlier agreement on the four sources has disappeared in the 1980s. Some date P early. Some date J very late. Some see D as the dominant author. Many are more interested in the literary art of the Pentateuch than in literary sources. Scholars are thus no closer to a solution to the problem of the authorship of the Pentateuch than they were when they first asked questions about it.

Even the most conservative scholars who defend Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch admit that Moses did not write every word of the Pentateuch. All accept the possibility of later minor alterations and additions to the work of Moses in the Pentateuch. Many discuss some development of the material in the Pentateuch along independent lines, after Mosaic composition. This is especially true linguistically. There is no reason why conservatives cannot often use such symbols as P and H as a convenient shorthand to refer to certain blocks of material. Recent conservative scholars speak of sources Moses may have used.

Conclusions No agreement has been reached as to the final solution to this most difficult problem. However some things are clear: (1) We should avoid the two extreme views that Moses wrote all the Pentateuch or that he wrote none of it. We should take the claims of the Bible concerning itself seriously but keep our minds and hearts open to new and different possible interpretations. (2) We should recognize the legitimacy of certain critical methods. W. T. Conner, who taught Systematic Theology at Southwestern Seminary for almost 40 years (1910–49), said, "There are certain questions of date, authorship, historical reliability and so forth, that must be settled by historical and literary criticism. There is no other way to settle them" [W. T. Conner, Revelation and God (Nashville: Broadman Press, 1943), p. 99]. (3) It is not necessary that we know the date and authorship of a book in the Bible before we can read it with profit. At times we must sacrifice our need for security in certainty to God's nature as sovereign mystery.

PENUEL (Pē nū′ ĕl) Name meaning, "face of God." 1. Descendant of Judah and founder (father) of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:4). 2. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:25). 3. Site on River Jabbok northeast of Succoth where Jacob wrestled with the stranger (Gen. 32:24–32; compare Hos. 12:4). The city was destroyed by Gideon because its inhabitants refused him provisions while he pursued the Midianites (Judg. 8:8–9,17). Jeroboam I built (perhaps rebuilt or fortified) the city (1 Kings 12:25). The site is identified with the easternmost of two mounds called Tulul edh-Dhahab, which commands the entrance to the Jordan Valley from the Jabbok gorge, about seven miles east of the Jordan.

PEOPLE OF GOD Group elected by God and committed to be His covenant people. Scripture repeatedly defines who is included in people of God. The history of revelation shows God electing Israel by grace.

Election and Covenant The election of Israel as people of God may be traced from Abraham (Gen.

12; compare Gal. 3:29; Rom. 9:7–8). However, the relationship between Yahweh and Israel began in the Exodus. Exodus 19 represents a special covenant form with both conditions (v. 5) and promises of the covenant (vv. 5*b*–6). The condition of the covenant was obedience; the promise was that "you shall be my treasured possession out of all the peoples." This promise involves a God-people and people-God relationship which is the center of the Old Testament. This promise was inherited by the church as the true Israel or the new Israel (Rom. 9:6–8; 1 Cor. 10:18–21; Gal. 6:16). Here is the unique position of the church as the people of God in the divine order (Rom. 9:25–26; 1 Cor. 6:14–17; Titus 2:14; Heb. 8:10; 1 Pet. 2:9–10; Rev. 21:3). See Church; Covenant; Election; Israel, Spiritual.

The faith of Israel became more concrete when the remnant idea was developed from corporate salvation out of the divine wrath and judgment. To the remnant fell the status and condition of God's long purpose for His people. The remnant as the chosen one is explained by Jesus in Matthew 22:14. Most of all, Jesus Himself is the remnant. Truly, the church carries the ideas from the Old Testament that the remnant in the figure of the Servant is the witness of universal salvation and the agent of a final revelation. The servant of Yahweh represented by Israel would be a light to the nations. The universal character of Israel's vocation is most clearly expressed here. The idea of God's people in the Old Testament culminates in the person of the Servant who is the idea of the remnant personified as an individual.

Christ claimed His servant-messiahship, for He is the Son of David, fulfilling the promise of God in the Old Testament. Jesus is the King but rejected every political interpretation of His messianic vocation. His kingdom is not of this world (John 18:36). He is the Suffering Servant, who gave His life as a ransom for many and thereby inaugurated the New Covenant.

The role of servant-messiah developed another dimension in its collectivity, that is, church. The servant idea is determinative for an understanding of the priesthood of the whole church. Christology (Christ) is related to ecclesiology (church) (2 Cor. 4:5). Christians are servants sharing that servanthood which the Servant par excellence creates. The call into peoplehood is a call into servanthood. The church is truly the people of God. Samuel Tang

PEOPLE OF THE EAST See Kadmonites.

PEOPLE OF THE LAND Translation of the technical Hebrew term 'am ha'arez, used primarily in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, 2 Kings, and 2 Chronicles (see also Gen. 23:7; Ex. 5:5; Lev. 20:2; Num. 14:9; Hag. 2:4; Zech. 7:5; Dan. 9:6). In most cases, the term apparently refers to the male citizens who lived upon their own land and who had the responsibility as citizens to participate in judicial activities, cultic festivals, and army service. Nonetheless, the references are so diverse that we cannot be sure the same people were in mind each time the term appears. Some scholars think the "people of the land" represented a particular influential element in society such as a national council, influential aristocrats, free citizens and property owners, landless poor, or non-Jerusalemites. Such theories cannot be proven.

In preexilic Judah, the "people of the land" first appear in association with the coronation of Joash (2 Kings 11:4–20). They appear slightly later in the avenging of Amon's murder and the elevation of Josiah to the kingship (2 Kings 21:24). They are depicted as being capable of liberating slaves (Jer. 34, especially vs. 18–20, where the "people of the land" both participated in the covenant making and were held responsible for breaking the same). They could also be agents of oppression (Ezek. 22:29). Second Kings 25:18–21 records that Nebuchadrezzar put to death at Riblah "sixty men of the people of the land," along with others held responsible for the revolt against Babylon resulting in the fall of Jersualem in 587 B.C. Clearly, in these situations these are people who have social, economic, political, and religious significance.

The "people of the land" are also portrayed as "the poor of the land" who remained in Jerusalem during the Babylonian Exile (2 Kings 24:14; 25:12). It is notable that when the exiles returned they distanced themselves from those who had remained in Judah by using "people of Judah" to characterize the returning exiles (Ezra 4:4). Disapproval is expressed in Ezra and Nehemiah for the pagan half-Jew and half-Gentile, essentially nonobservant Jews (see Ezra 10:2,11; Neh. 10:28–31). In Ezra 9:1–2,11 the plural, the "people of those lands," is used to designate the groupings with whom intermarriage had occurred, "the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites" (9:1).

There were considerable bad feelings between the "people of the land" and the Pharisees. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is portrayed as supporting the "people of the land" (Mark 7:1–5; Luke 6:1–5). The later postexilic use as witnessed in Ezra and Nehemiah as well as in the Synoptic Gospels (see also John 7:49) is further reflected in the rabbinical classification of the "people of the land" as those ignorant of the law and nonobservant in their daily lives. Because their condition was not dependent upon birth, however, the deficiencies could be remedied by a greater awareness of and adherence to Torah.

PERDITION Describes the eternal state of death, destruction, annihilation, or ruin.

Old Testament Words of the family from which perdition is derived usually relate to a state of physical rather than moral or religious destruction. Perdition is held in contrast to the blessing of God. It is the penalty for disobedience (Deut. 22:24; 28:20). The Old Testament sometimes links this term to the concept of Sheol (2 Sam. 22:5; Ps. 18:4).

New Testament Perdition is the fate of all who do not come to repentance. The way that leads to this destruction is broad in contrast to the narrow road which leads to life (Matt. 7:13). Perdition, as used in the New Testament, does not convey the idea of simple extinction or annihilation. Set into the context of eternity, the Gospel writers used it to mean an everlasting state of death and judgment. Just as surely as salvation expresses the idea of eternal life, so perdition designates a hopeless eternity of destruction. The phrase "son of perdition" describes the person who has fallen victim to this destruction (compare Judas in John 17:12). The "man of sin" is doomed to perdition (2 Thess. 2:3). A form of this word is used in Revelation 9:11 to describe the ultimate enemy of God—the Destroyer. See Death; Devil; Eternal Life; Everlasting Punishment; Hell; Sheol. Ken Massey

PEREA (Pĕ rē′ ȧ)A Roman district in Transjordan which became a part of Herod the Great's kingdom. The capital was Gadara, where KJV says Jesus healed the demoniac. (Modern translations follow other manuscripts reading Gerasenes.) Other important sites in the province were the fortress of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was beheaded, and Pella, where Christians from Jerusalem fled just before the Roman destruction of the Holy City in A.D. 66. Perea was the area through which the Jews traveled to avoid going through Samaria. Although not referred to by name in the New Testament, it is mentioned as "Judea beyond the Jordan" in several texts (Matt. 19:1; Mark 10:1 RSV). See Gadara; Machaerus; Pella; Transjordan.

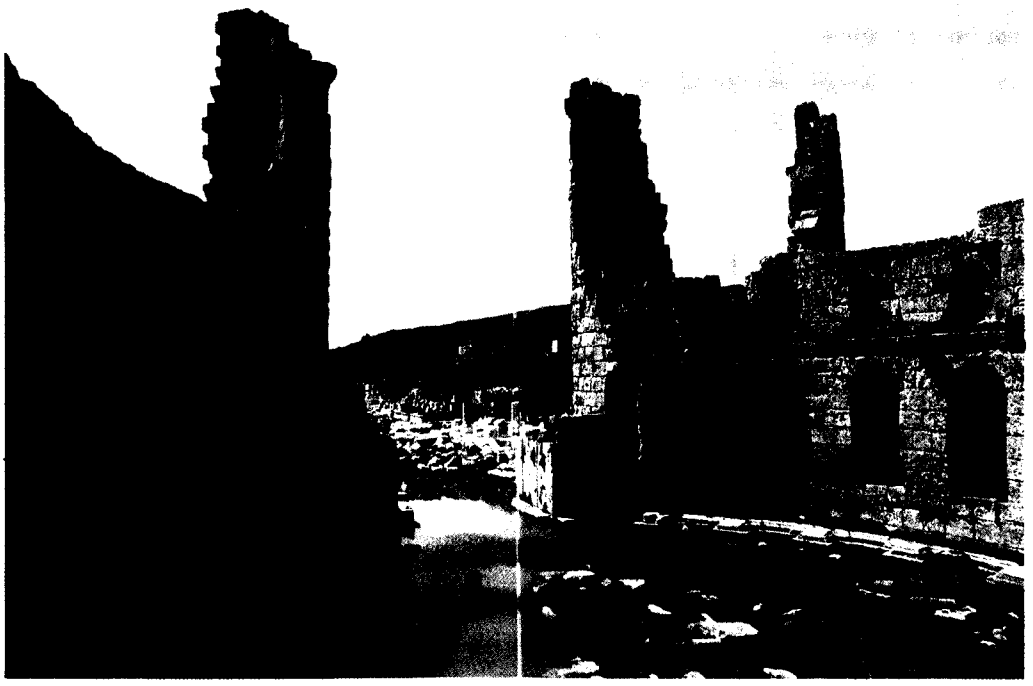
PERESH (Pē′ rĕsh) Personal name meaning, "separate." A Manassite (1 Chron. 7:16).

PEREZ (Pē rĕz) Personal name meaning, "breach." One of the twins born to the illicit affair between Judah and his daughter-in-law, Tamar (Gen. 38). After she was widowed and her brother-in-law, Onan, refused to fulfill his duties in levirate marriage (designed to carry on the name of the deceased through a son), she tricked her father-in-law, Judah, into an affair (vv. 13–30).

PEREZ-UZZA (Pē′ rĕz-ŭz′ zȧ) NAS, RSV alternate form of Perez-Uzzah (1 Chron. 13:11).

PEREZ-UZZAH (Pē′ rĕz-ŭz′ zah) Place name meaning, "breach of Uzzah." Site of the threshing floor of Nacon (or Chidon) west of Jerusalem on the Kiriath-jearim road where the anger of the Lord "broke out" against Uzzah, who touched the ark to steady it (2 Sam. 6:8; 1 Chron. 13:11). The site is perhaps that of khirbet el-Uz about two miles east of Kiriath-jearim.

PERFECT/PERFECTION Reaching an ideal state of spiritual wholeness or completeness. It is not a quality which is achieved by human effort alone, nor is it an end in itself. Christian perfection consists essentially in exercising the divine gift of love (Col. 3:14 NIV), for God, and for other people (Matt. 22:37–39). The basis of perfection lies in God Himself, whose law (Jas. 1:25), works (Deut. 32:4), and way (Ps. 18:30) are perfect. God is free from incompleteness; He can, therefore, demand from believers, and enable them to receive, completeness (Matt. 5:48).



Through a covenant relationship with His people, and by grace, God thus offers to His people the possibility of perfection. In the Old Testament being "perfect" is ascribed to individuals, such as Noah (Gen. 6:9) and Job (1:1), in response to their wholehearted obedience. In other contexts, corporate perfection and being "upright" belong together (Ps. 37:37; Prov. 2:21). In the New Testament, God's relationship with His people is itself fulfilled, as the old covenant is replaced, and through Christ believers can be perfected for ever (Heb. 10:14). Christians are, however, to grow from spiritual infancy to maturity so as to share the full stature of Christ, in whose image they may become renewed and perfected (Col. 3:10).

A tension exists here. Because on earth sin remains a possibility for all, believers (1 John 1:8) need to become perfect even while attaining a relative perfection (Mic. 6:6–8; Phil. 3:16,12–14). For that reason, perfection is not equated in the Bible with sinlessness (but see 1 John 3:6,9 NIV). The New Testament also stops short of deification (becoming God) as an option for believers, even if it allows for their perfect relationship with God (2 Pet. 1:4). The divine gift of perfection will be fully realized only in eternity (Phil. 3:10–14; 1 John 3:2). It is a goal to be sought (2 Cor. 7:1; Heb. 6:1) which, like the complete vision of God, cannot be found this side of heaven (Eph. 4:13; Jas. 3:2).

How, then, may even this limited perfection be achieved? The New Testament locates the means of perfection in Christ. Through His suffering and exaltation, God made Jesus perfect (Heb. 2:10) and fitted Him to win for the church and the individual believer a completeness which echoes His own (Col. 1:28; Heb. 5:9). So we and all the saints of God can be saved, and through the Spirit be given access to God and the daily help we need (Heb. 7:25; 4:14–16). See Holy.

PERFUME, PERFUMER Modern translation of a word translated as apothecary by the KJV (Ex. 30:25,35; 37:29; 2 Chron 16:14; Neh. 3:8; Eccl. 10:1). Perfumes mentioned in the Bible include: aloes, balsam (or balm), bdellium, calamus (or sweet or fragment cane), camel's thorn, cinnamon (or cassia), frankincense, galbanum, gum, henna, myrrh, nard (or spikenard), onycha, saffron, and stacte. See Apothecary; Cosmetics; Oil; Ointment; and separate articles on each for further identification.

PERGA (Pĕr′ gȧ) An ancient city in the province of Pamphylia, about eight miles from the Mediterranean Sea. Settlement at Perga dates to prehistory. Alexander the Great passed through the town during his campaigns and used guides from there. A temple to Artemis was one of the prominent buildings. Paul, Barnabas, and John Mark came to Perga from Paphos (Acts 13:13). There young John left the team to return home.

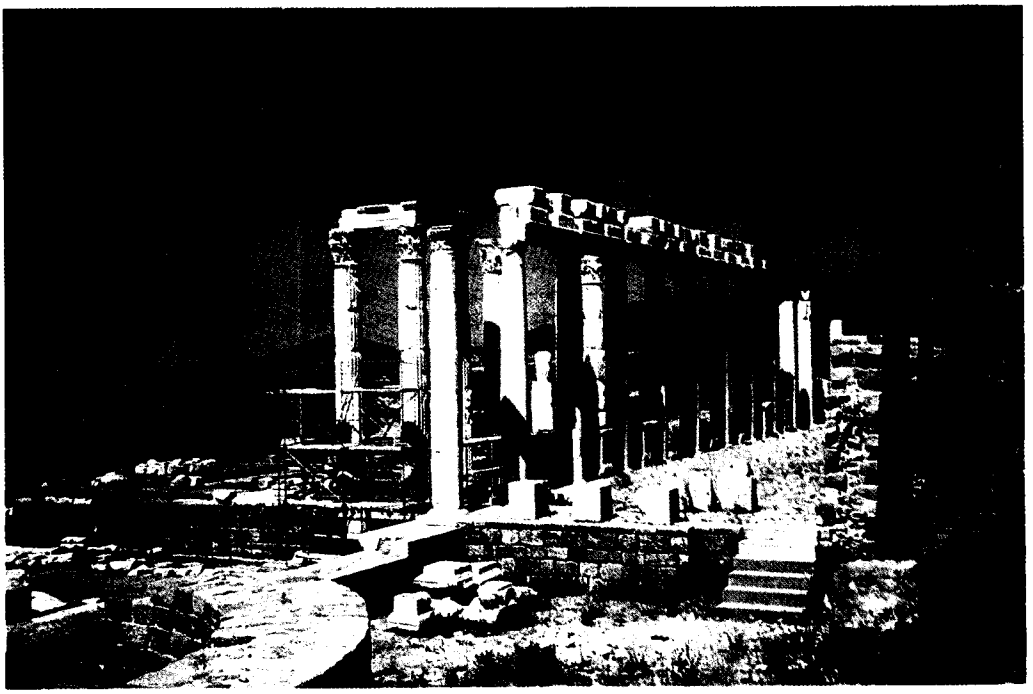
PERGAMOS (Pĕr′ gȧ mŏs) KJV form of Pergamum (Rev. 1:11; 2:12).

PERGAMUM (Pĕr′ gȧ mum) Place name meaning, "citadel." A wealthy ancient city in the district of Mysia in Asia Minor. See Asia Minor.

PERIDA (Pė rī′ dȧ) Personal name meaning, "unique" or "separated." Head of a family of Solomon's servants, some of whom returned from Exile (Neh. 7:57; compare Peruda, Ezra 2:55).



PERISHABLE Term some translations (KJV, REB, NRSV) use to describe the present, mortal body (1 Cor. 15:42,50,53–54), which is subject to death and decay. Other translations render the underlying Greek as corruptible (NAS, NIV) or mortal (TEV). Paul contrasted the perishable reward champion athletes receive with the lasting reward for which Christians compete (1 Cor. 9:25). First Peter 1:7 compares the testing of lasting faith with that of perishable gold.

PERIZZITES (Pĕr′ ĭz zīte) A group name meaning, "rustic." One of the groups of people who opposed the Israelite occupation of Canaan (Josh. 9:1–2). They dwelled in the land as early as Abraham's time (Gen. 13:7). The name implies that the Perizzites probably dwelled in the open country while the Canaanites walled up their encampments.

PERJURY A false statement given voluntarily under oath. Perjury involves either false witness to past facts or the neglect of what has been previously vowed. Mosaic law prohibited false swearing (Lev. 19:12; Ex. 20:7) and giving false witness (Ex. 20:16). False witness was punishable with the sentence which would have gone to the one falsely accused of guilt (Deut. 19:16–21). Vows and oaths to perform an act were to be fulfilled (Num. 30:2). See Oaths.

PERSECUTION IN THE BIBLE Harassment and suffering which people and institutions inflict upon others for being different in their faith, world view, culture, or race. Persecution seeks to intimidate, silence, punish, or even to kill people.

Old Testament Israel was the agent of persecution of nations (Judg. 2:11–23; Lev. 26:7–8). The Bible gives special attention to Israel's fate in Egypt (Ex. 1—3) and in the Exile (Ps. 137). On an individual level, Saul persecuted David (1 Sam. 19:9–12), and Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were persecuted because they refused to worship the image of the king (Dan. 3). Jezebel persecuted the prophets of the Lord, and the prophet Elijah persecuted and killed the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18). Job felt persecuted by God himself (7:11–21). The prophets—Amos (7:10–12), Jeremiah (Jer. 1:19; 15:15; 37—38), and Urijah (Jer. 26:20–23)—suffered persecution because they fleshed out the will of God in adverse circumstances. The Psalms speak of the righteous sufferer who felt persecuted as a result of faith in God, and who prayed to God for deliverance (7; 35; 37; 79; 119:84–87).

Intertestamental period This era is important because it witnessed the concerted attempt to make the Jewish people renounce their faith in God. In this conflict, persecution took place on both sides (1 and 2 Maccabees). See Intertestamental History.

New Testament Jesus was persecuted and finally killed by the religious and political establishments of His day (Mark 3:6; Luke 4:29; John 5:16; Acts 3:13–15; 7:52; passion stories). He fleshed out the liberating passion of God (Luke 4:16–29) and came into conflict with the religious institutions of the cult by healing on the sabbath (Mark 3:1–6), criticizing the Temple activities (Mark 11:15–18), and the law (Matt. 5:21–48).

Jesus pronounced God's salvation upon those who are persecuted for righteousness sake (Matt. 5:10–12). In an evil world, disciples are to expect persecution (Matt. 10:16–23; Mark 4:17; 13:9; John 15:20; 16:2), just as was the case with the prophets in the Old Testament (Matt. 5:12; 23:31; Luke 11:47–51; Acts 7:52; Heb. 11:32–38). Paul (1 Cor. 4:11–13; 2 Cor. 4:8–12; 6:4–10; 11:24–27; Gal. 5:11; 1 Thess. 2:2; 3:4; Acts 17:5–10; 18:12–17; 21:30–36; 23:12–35), as well as Stephen (Acts 6:8—7:60), James (Acts 12:2), and Peter (Acts 12:3–5), together with many anonymous martyrs experienced the truth of the Johannine saying: "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you" (John 15:20; see Acts 4:3; 5:17–42; 8:1; 12:1; Rev. 2:26,9–10,13,19; 3:8–10; 6:9; 16:6; 17:6; 18:24; 20:4).

Whole epistles and books like 1 Peter, Hebrews, and Revelation were written to encourage Christians in a situation of persecution (1 Pet. 3:13–18; 4:12–19; 5:6–14; Heb. 10:32–39; 12:3; Rev. 2—3). Something like a theology of persecution emerged, which emphasized patience, endurance, and steadfastness (Rom. 12:12; 1 Thess. 2:14–16; Jas. 5:7–11); prayer (Matt. 5:44; Rom. 12:14; 1 Cor. 4:12); thanksgiving (2 Thess. 1:4); testing (Mark 4:17) and the strengthening of faith (1 Thess. 3:2–3); experiencing the grace of God (Rom. 8:35; 2 Cor. 4:9, 12:10), and being blessed through suffering (Matt. 5:10–12; 1 Pet. 3:14; 4:12–14). For Paul, persecuting Christians could be a living and visible testimony to the crucified and risen Christ (2 Cor. 4:7–12).

There seems to be an element in religious fanaticism (Paul before his conversion: 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13,23; Phil. 3:6; Acts 8:3; 9:1–2; 22:4) which breeds intolerance and can lead to persecution. Christians should repent of this element in their own history and must be radically committed to the abolition of all persecution.

PERSEVERANCE Maintaining Christian faith through the trying times of life. As a noun the term perseverance occurs in the New Testament only at Ephesians 6:18 (proskarterēsei) and Hebrews 12:1 (hupomonēs). The idea is inherent throughout the New Testament in the great interplay of the themes of assurance and warning.

The background setting for the idea of perseverance blossomed out of the context of persecution and temptation. The believer was expected faithfully to endure and to remain steadfast in the face of opposition, attack, and discouragement. The New Testament writers were forthright in advising believers to be consistent in prayer (Eph. 6:18; Phil. 4:6), and they employed athletic imagery to remind Christians to be effectual as they trained in the ways of God (1 Cor. 9:24–27; Rom. 12:11–12; Heb. 12:1–12). Israel's failure of faithfulness in the Exodus was also a haunting picture for Christians, and the inspired New Testament writers found it to be an important basis for warning (see 1 Cor. 10:1–14; Heb. 3:7–19). They were committed to making absolutely clear that the requirements of Christian living were recognized as an essential element of Christian believing. Authentic life and true belief are both necessary parts of being a Christian.

While the warnings are very stern, especially in Hebrews (2:3; 6:1–8; 10:26–31), the New Testament writers were firmly convinced that those who truly committed themselves to Christ should persevere to the end because they had gained a new perspective and become a people who would not treat lightly the biblical admonitions (compare Heb. 6:9–12; 10:39). They believed Christians would finish the race because Christians would focus their attention on Jesus, the lead runner and model finisher of their faith (Heb. 2:10; 12:1–2).

In the early church Christians wrestled with the problem of the renouncers during and after periods of persecution.

Christians found in the model of Peter's restoration (John 21) an important clue. Restoration for Peter was possible, but restoration still meant his death. Restoration for Christians, therefore, could be possible, but it demanded absolute seriousness for defectors. They would be expected to persevere thereafter even in the face of death. As time passed, however, baptism became regarded by some Christians as a bath which would provide cleansing from all types of sin, including renunciation. Some would thus delay baptism almost to the time of death to guarantee that all sins in life would be expunged. The need was seen by these Christians for a final rite to care for such post-baptismal, unconfessed sins. Others found such views of baptism and extreme unction to be foreign to New Testament perspectives.

But the perseverance of the saints is one of the great theological ideas that needs to be reaffirmed in this era. It is the human side of the salvation equation, and it deals with faithfulness of Christians in matters of God's will (Jas. 1:25). It encompasses the taking seriously of human weakness, without denying the mysterious nature of God's patience with His people. It permits judgment concerning the way people live in this world, but it does not exclude God's abundant graciousness.

Persevering Christians take prayer seriously as a reflection of life. They recognize the way of love and forgiveness because they understand the nature of human weakness and divine help. They know they have experienced grace beyond their human capacities. Persevering Christians recognize that the warnings of the Bible are meant for them to obey and that Christ gave His life to transform their lives. Perseverance is thus a call to faithfulness, but it is also an affirmation that somehow, in spite of our failures, God will bring His committed people through the difficulties and concerns of life to their promised destiny in Christ.

PERSIA (Pĕr′ siȧ) As a nation, Persia corresponds to the modern state of Iran. As an empire, Persia was a vast collection of states and kingdoms reaching from the shores of Asia Minor in the west to the Indus River valley in the east. It reached northward to southern Russia, and in the south included Egypt and the regions bordering the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman. In history, the empire defeated the Babylonians and then fell finally to Alexander the Great.

The nation was named for the southernmost region of the area, called Parsis or Persis. It was a harsh land of deserts, mountains, plateaus, and valleys. The climate was arid and showed extremes of cold and heat. Gold and silver and wheat and barley were native to the area.

The region was settled shortly after 3000 B.C. by people from the north. An Elamite culture developed which, at its peak in 1200 B.C., dominated the whole Tigris River valley. It lasted until 1050 B.C. After its destruction, other northern groups entered the area. Among these groups were tribesmen who formed a small kingdom in the region of Anshan around 700 B.C. It was ruled by Achaemenes, the great great-grandfather of Cyrus II, the Great. (Thus, the period from Achaemenes to Alexander is called the Achaemenid period.) This small kingdom was the seed of the Persian empire.

When Cyrus II came to his father's throne in 559 B.C., his kingdom was part of a larger Median kingdom. The Medes controlled the territory northeast and east of the Babylonians. In 550 B.C. Cyrus rebelled against Astyages, the Median king. His rebellion led to the capture of the king and gave Cyrus control over a kingdom stretching from Media to the Halys river in Asia Minor. Soon Cyrus challenged the king of Lydia. Victory there gave Cyrus the western portion of Asia Minor. Then, in 539 B.C., Babylon fell to Cyrus due to his skill and internal dissension in the Babylonian Empire. See Babylon.

Cyrus died in 530 B.C.; however, the Persian Empire continued to grow. Cambyses II, Cyrus' son, conquered Egypt in 525 B.C. Cambyses' successor Darius I expanded the empire eastward to the Indus and attempted to conquer or control the Greeks. Darius lost to the Greeks at Marathon in 490 B.C. This was the greatest extension of the empire. Later emperors did little to expand the empire. They even had difficulty holding such a far-flung empire together.

The Persian Empire is important to the history and development of civilization. It had major effects on religion, law, politics, and economics. The impact came through the Jews, the Bible, contacts with the Greeks, and through Alexander the Great's incorporation of ideas and architecture from the Persians.

Politically, the Persian Empire was the best organized the world had ever seen. By the time of Darius I, 522–486 B.C., the empire was divided into twenty satrapies (political units of varying size and population). Satrapies were subdivided into provinces. Initially, Judah was a province in the satrapy of Babylon. Later, Judah was in one named "Beyond the River." The satrapies were governed by Persians who were directly responsible to the emperor. Good administration required good communications which called for good roads. These roads did more than speed administration, though. They encouraged contacts between peoples within the empire. Ideas and goods could move hundreds of miles with little restriction. The empire became wealthy and also gave its inhabitants a sense that they were part of a larger world. A kind of "universal awareness" developed. The use of minted coins and the development of a money economy aided this identification with a larger world. The emperor's coins were handy reminders of the power and privileges of being part of the empire. Also, the Persians were committed to rule by law. Instead of imposing an imperial law from above, however, the emperor and his satraps gave their authority and support to local law. For the Jews this meant official support for keeping Jewish law in the land of the Jews.

The Persian Empire affected the Jews and biblical history a great deal. Babylon had conquered Jerusalem and destroyed the Temple in 586 B.C. When Cyrus conquered Babylon, he allowed the Jews to return to Judah and encouraged the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezra 1:1–4). The work was begun but not completed. Then, under Darius I, Zerubabbel and the high priest, Joshua, led the restored community with the support and encouragement of the Persians. (Ezra 3—6 tells of some of the events while Haggai's and Zechariah's prophecies were made during the days of the restoration.) Despite some local opposition, Darius supported the rebuilding of the Temple which was rededicated in his sixth year (Ezra 6:15). Also, both Ezra and Nehemiah were official representatives of the Persian government. Ezra was to teach and to appoint judges (Ezra 7). Nehemiah may have been the first governor of the province of Yehud (Judah). He undoubtedly had official support for his rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem.

The Jews had trouble under Persian rule, too. Although Daniel was taken into Exile by the Babylonians (Dan. 1:1*ff*), his ministry continued through the fall of the Babylonians (Dan. 5) into the time of the Persians (Dan. 6*ff*). His visions projected even further. Daniel 6 shows a stable government but one in which Jews could still be at risk. His visions in a time of tranquility remind readers that human kingdoms come and go. Esther is a story of God's rescue of His people during the rule of the Persian emperor: Ahasuerus (also known as Xerxes I). The story shows an empire where law can be used and misused. Jews are already, apparently, hated by some. Malachi, too, is probably from the Persian period. His book shows an awareness of the world at large and is positive toward the Gentiles and the government.

Throughout the period, the Jews kept looking for the kind of restoration promised by prophets such as Isaiah (chapters 40—66) and Ezekiel (chapters 40—48). Prophets such as Haggai and Zechariah and Malachi helped the Jews to hope, but these men of God also reminded their hearers of the importance of present faithfulness and obedience to God.

PERSIS (Pĕr' sĭs) Personal name meaning, "Persian woman." Leader in the Roman church whom Paul greeted and commended for diligent service (Rom. 16:12).

PERSON OF CHRIST See Christ, Christology; Jesus Christ.

PERSONALITY See Anthropology; Heart; Humanity; Mind.

PERVERSE Translation of one Greek and several Hebrew terms with the literal meaning, "bent," "crooked," or "twisted," applied to persons involved in moral error. Most biblical references are in the Book of Proverbs which mention perverse: persons (Prov. 3:32; 14:14); minds (11:20; 12:8; 23:33); tongues (10:31; 17:20); words or speech (10:32; 19:1); and perverse ways (28:6). Paul urged Christians to be moral "lights" witnessing to their "crooked and perverse generation" (Phil. 2:15; compare Deut. 32:5). Jesus accused His generation of both faithlessness and perversity (Matt. 17:17; Luke 9:41; compare Deut. 32:20).

PESHITTA (Pĕ shĭt' ta) Common Syriac version of the Scriptures. The Old Testament was likely translated between A.D. 100 and 300. The New Testament translation dates from before A.D. 400. The Peshitta lacked those books rejected by the Syriac-speaking churches (2 Peter; 2 and 3 John; Jude; Revelation). See Bible, Text and Versions.

PESTILENCE A devastating epidemic. Old Testament writers understood pestilence to be sent by God (Ex. 9:15; Jer. 15:2; Hab. 3:5; Amos 4:10), sometimes by means of a destroying angel (2 Sam. 24:16; 1 Chron. 21:15). God sent pestilence as punishment for persistent unbelief (Num. 14:12) and failure to fulfill covenant obligations (Deut. 24:24; 28:21) as well as to encourage repentance (Amos 4:10). God withheld pestilence from Egypt to allow for survivors to witness His acts of liberation (Ex. 9:16). Earnest prayer averted pestilence (1 Kings 8:37); fasting and sacrifice without repentance did not (Jer. 14:12). Pestilence is often associated with war and siege conditions (Ex. 5:3; Lev. 26:25; Amos 4:10; Luke 21:11).

PESTLE A small, club-shaped tool used to grind in a mortar (Prov. 27:22).

PETER (Pē' tĕr) Personal name meaning, "Rock." Four names are used in the New Testament to refer to Peter: the Hebrew name Simeon (Acts 15:14); the Greek equivalent Simon (nearly fifty times in the Gospels and Acts); Cephas, most frequently used by Paul (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 1:18; 2:9,11,14) and occurring only once outside his writings (John 1:42). Cephas and Peter both mean rock. Simon is often found in combination with Peter, reminding the reader that Simon was the earlier name and that Peter was a name given later by Jesus. The name Peter dominates the New Testament usage.

Family of Peter The Gospels preserve a surprising amount of information about Peter and his family. Simon is the son of Jona or John (Matt. 16:17; John 1:42). He and his brother, Andrew, came from Bethsaida (John 1:44) and were Galilean fishermen (Mark 1:16; Luke 5:2–3; John 21:3), in partnership with the sons of Zebedee, James and John (Luke 5:10). Peter was married (Mark 1:29–31; 1 Cor. 9:5) and maintained a residence in Capernaum (Mark 1:21,29). Before becoming disciples of Jesus, Peter and Andrew had been influenced by the teaching of John the Baptist (John 1:35–42).

Role of Peter Among the Disciples Peter is credited with being a leader of the twelve disciples whom Jesus called. His name always occurs first in the lists of disciples (Mark 3:16; Luke 6:14; Matt. 10:2). He frequently served as the spokesman for the disciples (compare Mark 8:29) and was usually the one who raised the questions which they all seemed to be asking (Mark 10:28; 11:21; Matt 15:15; 18:21; Luke 12:41). Jesus often singled out Peter for teachings intended for the entire group of disciples (see especially Mark 8:29–33). As a member of the inner circle, Peter was present with Jesus at the raising of the synagogue ruler's daughter (Mark 5:35–41), at the Transfiguration (Mark 9:2–8), and at the arrest of Jesus in Gethsemane (Mark 14:43–50). As representative disciple, Peter frequently typified the disciple of little faith. His inconsistent behavior (see Matt. 14:27–31) reached a climax with his infamous denial scene (Mark 14:66–72). Peter was, however, rehabilitated in the scene where the resurrected Jesus restored Peter to his position of prominence (John 21:15–19; compare Mark 16:7).

Peter's Role in the Early Church Despite Peter's role among the disciples and the promise of his leadership in the early church (see especially Matt. 16:17–19), Peter did not emerge as the leader of either form of primitive Christianity. Though he played an influential role in establishing the Jerusalem church (see the early chapters of Acts), James, the brother of Jesus, assumed the leadership role of the Jewish community. Though Peter was active in the incipient stages of the Gentile mission (see Acts 10—11), Paul became the "apostle to the gentiles."

Peter probably sacrificed his chances to be the leader of either one of these groups because of his commitment to serve as a bridge in the early church, doing more than any other to hold together the diverse strands of primitive Christianity.

The Legacy of Peter Tradition holds that Peter died as a martyr in Rome in the 60s (1 Clem. 5:1—6:1). His legacy, however, lived on long after his death. Both 1 and 2 Peter in the New Testament are traditionally attributed to the apostle Peter. Significant also was the presence of a group of devotees of Peter who produced several writings in the name of the apostle—the Acts of Church of St. Peter in Gallicantu which honors the traditional site of Peter's weeping after his denial.

Peter, the Gospel of Peter (and some would include 2 Peter). To a great extent, subsequent generations of the church rely on the confession, witness, and ministry of Peter, the devoted, but fallible follower of Christ. Mikeal C. Parsons

1 PETER (Pē′ tĕr) Twenty-first book of the New Testament.

Authorship The book was written from Rome (called Babylon in 5:13 for an unknown reason) by the apostle Peter. The opinion that the apostle Peter is the author is sustained by both history and careful investigation. Arguing from presuppositions about the character and background of Peter, some critics have emphatically rejected Petrine authorship. The opinion that the very fine quality of the language cannot be from a Galilean fisherman ignores the long history of Greek language in Galilee and the fact that Peter had preached for some thirty years by the time he wrote this book. Considering both style and church history, there is no compelling reason to reject Peter's authorship.

Canonicity While some modern critics have rejected it, 1 Peter was not among the disputed books by the early church. Its omission in the list of accepted books in the Muratorian Canon is due to the incomplete nature of that text, not because there was any early doubt as to 1 Peter's acceptance.

The Date During Nero's reign there was great persecution of believers, hence the most likely time period for the composition is around A.D. 62–64.

The Destination The address is to churches of the provinces in northern Asia Minor which is modern Turkey (Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bythynia). When this area was evangelized, and what part Peter had in it is unknown unless one believes Paul worked this far north.

The Readers They were converted Jews and Gentiles. Jewishness is implied in the use of the Old Testament and factors cited in 1 Peter 1:10–12; 2:4–9,11–12. That some were Gentiles is supported in 1 Peter 1:14,18–19; 2:10. It is likely that the majority were Gentiles.

The Style The Greek is much more literary in both vocabulary and syntax than one would expect from an ignorant fisherman, but Peter was likely well educated, although not in formal schools (Acts 4:13). His preparation for this task included his background as a tradesman, requiring conversation with Greek-speaking men, training at the feet of Jesus, and the various meetings with the infant church and her leaders (Acts 1:12—2:42; 11:1–18; Gal. 1:18; 2:1–14). The place of the amanuensis in early literary work was greater than a modern secretary, and Silvanus (1 Pet. 5:12) could have been responsible for some of the stylistic sophistication.

The Purpose The persecuted believers in Asia were encouraged to hope in God's ultimate deliverance, and hence remain steadfast in their persecutions.

Theological Contributions The vicarious atonement is stated more clearly in 1 Peter 3:18 (see also 1:18–19; 2:24) than anywhere else in Scripture. This leads to the most difficult passage in the book and one of the most difficult in the entire Scriptures.

First Peter 3:18–22 has the following problems: (1) the meaning of "preached unto the spirits in prison" 3:19; (2) the mention of Noah, 3:20; and (3) "baptism doth also now save us." Two common positions are held regarding Christ preaching to spirits in prison: (1) it is a descent of Christ into Hades to announce that He had died for sinners and victory over Satan is assured; (2) the spirit of Christ was in Noah as he preached to no avail to that hard-hearted generation. Peter was not teaching a second chance for salvation after death. The statement about baptism does not infer that the act of dipping in water accomplishes what Scripture affirms elsewhere is done by grace through faith (Eph. 2:8–9). It is "not a removal of dirt," but the response of a good conscience to God (1 Pet. 3:21 NRSV).

The appeals to holiness and personal Christian living are everywhere apparent (1:14—2:12; 2:24–25; 3:8–13), but it is the biblical theology of suffering which pervades the book (1:6–9; 2:18–25; 3:9–17; 4:1–6; 4:12–19). His advice to family members is typically Jewish, reflecting his background (2:18–20; 3:1–7). The doctrine of eschatology is often mentioned (1:4,7,11,13; 2:12; 4:7,13). It is the basis for the appeal to holy living and patiently suffering unjustly, knowing that God will finally establish His kingdom with justice.

2 PETER (Pē′ tēr) Twenty-second book of the New Testament.

Authorship The book claims to be written by the apostle Peter, but it was questioned in ancient times and is still under a cloud of uncertainty in some quarters. Usually the style and vocabulary are the critical areas of doubt. The two Petrine Letters show great differences which some explain by a change in amanuenses, or suggesting that Peter used Silas in 1 Peter while 2 Peter reflects his own unedited style. Readers can observe that in spite of differences, 2 Peter is more like 1 Peter than any other New Testament book. It was never rejected and met every test successfully, hence it rightly came into the canon.

The Date If we accept Peter's authorship, it must have been written before A.D. 68, probably shortly after 1 Peter was penned. This is the most likely date, although most modern critics place it much later. Eusebius places Peter's death in the fourteenth year of Nero that is variously dated from A.D. 64 to 68.

The Destination The address is too general to be of any help, so other data must be considered. If 2 Peter 3:1 refers to 1 Peter, then the destination must be the same as the previous letter. This is the better view, for all attempts to find another group or groups have failed. See 1 Peter.

The Readers The references to Jewishness are not as clear as 1 Peter, but still are inferred in 2 Peter 1:12; 2:1; 2:4–9; 3:5–8.

The Style If Peter wrote 2 Peter with his own hand, it explains some of the differences with 1 Peter. There are both Hellenistic and Semitic traces of vocabulary and syntax which would also fit the apostle's character. A major question is the literary affinity with Jude. First, affinity does not necessitate or even infer some dependency. It is virtually sure that Peter and Jude had some personal contact, but whether it resulted in both writing a portion of these letters in such similar style by mere conversation, or by viewing the document of the other is incapable of proof. Second, it is only one chapter of 2 Peter that is like Jude, leaving the bulk of the letter Petrine. Third, many have assumed Jude is late and that the writer of 2 Peter depended on it, hence 2 Peter is a late document and cannot be apostolic. This is incapable of proof, and, furthermore, may merely show the early date of Jude! Fourth, there is no way of proving which document relied on the other. Scholars have argued convincingly on both sides of the question.

The Purpose To forestall and defeat the influence of heretics who came in the church to lead the readers into antinomianism or total freedom from the law. This temptation to a sinful life-style so affected Peter that shortly after his first letter, he followed with this one.

Theological Contributions Practical Christian living is emphasized by the motifs of growth by addition in 1:3–8; judgment in 3:11–14; and exhortation to growth in 3:17–18. It is the Word of God that holds the forefront of this short letter: in chapter 1 by emphasizing knowledge (vv. 3,5,6,8,12,20–21) and its divine origin, in chapter 2 by showing its historicity (vv. 4–8), and in chapter 3 by indicating Paul's letters are equal with "the other Scriptures" (vv. 15–16). Peter strongly supported the influence of Scripture as the most important factor in our faith. One who could rely so much on personal experience did not and only appeals to it to further express the truth of Scripture (1:16–21).

The Theme: "Believers must continually give attention to the Word of God."

PETHAHIAH (Pĕ thȧ hī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh opens." 1. Ancestor of a postexilic priestly family (1 Chron. 24:16). 2. Royal advisor to the Persian king, either at his court or as his representative in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:24). 3. Levite participating in Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 9:5). 4. Levite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:23), perhaps identical with 3.

PETHOR (Pē′ thôr) Place name meaning, "soothsayer." City in upper Mesopotamia identified with tell Ahmar, twelve miles south of Carchemish near the confluence of the Sajur and Euphrates rivers. Home of Balaam (Num. 22:5; Deut. 23:4).

PETHUEL (Pė thū′ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "vision of God" or "youth of God." Father of the prophet Joel (1:1).

PETRA (Pē′ tra) Capital city of the Nabatean Arabs located about 60 miles north of the Gulf of Aqabah. Petra is sometimes identified with Sela (Judg. 1:36; 2 Kings 14:7; Isa. 16:1; 42:11), because both names mean, "rock." Lack of archaeological evidence of Edomite settlement in the basin suggests that Sela is better identified with Um el Bayyarah on the mountain plateau overlooking Petra. The Nabatean king Aretas IV (2 Cor. 11:32–33) reigned from Petra.

PEULLETHAI (Pė ŭl' lē thaî) Personal name meaning, "recompense." A Levitical gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:5).

PEULTHAI (Pė ŭl thâî) KJV form of Peullethai (1 Chron. 26:5).

PHALEC (Phā' lĕc) Greek form of Peleg which KJV used at Luke 3:35.

proper to use such powerful names in direct fashion, a polite circumlocution developed; he came to be called Pharaoh.

Egyptians applied "pharaoh" to the royal palace and grounds in the fourth dynasty (about 2500 B.C.). The title Pharaoh came to be applied to the king from about 1500 B.C. until the Persian domination, about 550 B.C.

An ancient pharaoh was an absolute monarch, supreme commander of the armies, chief justice of the royal court, and high priest of all religion. His absolute power may be seen in that justice was defined as "what Pharaoh loves"; wrongdoing as "what Pharaoh hates." An example of his divine power was that he daily conducted "the Rite of the House of the Morning," an early morning ritual in which he broke the seal to the statue of the sun god, waking him up with a prayer. This act brought the sun up and started every day for the people.

References to ten pharaohs can be clearly distinguished in the Old Testament: the Pharaoh of Abraham, Genesis 12:10–20; of Joseph, Genesis 39—50; of the Oppression, Exodus 1; of the Exodus, Exodus 2:23—15:19; of 1 Chronicles 4:18; of Solomon, 1 Kings 3—11; of Rehoboam, called Shishak, king of Egypt, 1 Kings 14:25; of Hezekiah and Isaiah, 2 Kings 18:21; Isaiah 36; of Josiah, 2 Kings 23:29; of Jeremiah 44:30 and Ezekiel 29:1–16.

PHARES (Phā' rēş) KJV, NAS New Testament form of Perez (Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33).

PHAREZ (Phā' rĕz) KJV, NAS alternate form of Perez (Gen. 38:29; 46:12; Num. 26:20–21; Ruth 4:12,18; 1 Chron. 2:4–5; 4:1; 9:4).

PHAROSH (Phā' rŏsh) KJV alternate form of Parosh (Ezra 8:3).

PHARPAR (Phär' pär) A river associated with Damascus (2 Kings 5:12). The river is perhaps the Nahr el 'A'waj which flows from Mount Hermon, passing about ten miles south of Damascus, or else the Nahr Taura.

PHARZITES (Phär' zītes) KJV alternate form of Perezites (Num. 26:20).

PHASEAH (Phā sē' ah) KJV alternate form of Paseah (Neh. 7:51).

PHEBE (Phē' bē) KJV form of Phoebe (Rom. 16:1–2).

PHENICE, PHENICIA (Phē nī' cē, Phē nĭc' ĭ à) KJV alternate forms of Phoenicia (Phenice, Acts 11:19; 15:3; 27:12; Phenicia, Acts 21:2).

PHIBESETH (Phī bē' sĕth) Place name derived from the Egyptian, "house of Bastet," a goddess represented as a cat (Ezek. 30:17). Bastet (Greek Boubastos) was located on the right shore of the old Tanite branch of the Nile about forty-five miles northeast of Cairo. Bastet served as capital of the eighteenth nome (administrative district) and, during the Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third Dynasties (940–745 B.C.), as capital of a fragmented Egyptian Empire. The site is identified with modern tell Basta.

PHICHOL (Phī' chŏl) KJV form of Phicol.

PHICOL (Phī' cŏl) Personal name meaning, "mighty." The chief captain of the Philistine army under King Abimelech (Gen. 21:22). He witnessed covenants between his commander and Abraham (21:32) and Isaac (26:26–28). See Abimelech; Abraham; Covenant; Isaac.

PHILADELPHIA (Phĭl à dĕl' phĭ à) Place name meaning, "love of brother." A hellenistic city in the province of Lydia in western Asia Minor. See Asia Minor; Revelation, Book of.

Temple ruins at the site of the ancient city of Philadelphia in Asia Minor (modern Turkey).

PHILEMON (Phī lē' mon) Personal name meaning, "affectionate" and eighteenth book of the New Testament. Philemon owed his conversion to the Christian faith to the apostle Paul (v.19). This conversion took place during Paul's extended ministry in Ephesus (Acts 19:10). There is no evidence that Paul ever visited Colosse where Philemon lived. Paul and Philemon became devoted friends. Paul referred to Philemon as a "beloved and fellow labourer" (v.1).

Paul's only epistle of a private and personal nature that is included in the New Testament was written to Philemon in A.D. 61. This epistle concerned a runaway slave. This slave, Onesimus, had robbed Philemon and escaped to Rome. There Onesimus found the apostle Paul who was imprisoned. Paul wrote to Philemon concerning Onesimus. Paul sent both the epistle and Onesimus back to Colosse. The epistle states that Onesimus was now a Christian. Paul requested that Philemon forgive and receive Onesimus not as a slave but as a brother (v.16). This request was not made from Paul's apostolic authority but tenderly as a Christian friend. Paul wrote, "Receive him as myself" (v.17).

Paul also stated that he was willing to pay any damages caused by Onesimus. Some scholars indicate that Paul may have been asking subtly that Philemon release Onesimus so that he could return and aid Paul in his evangelistic endeavors. Philemon had a judicial right to punish severely or even kill Onesimus. Paul's short epistle of some three hundred and fifty-five Greek words challenged Philemon to apply Christian love in dealing with Onesimus. Paul's approach eventually caused the end of slavery. PHILETUS (Phī lē' tŭs) Personal name meaning, "beloved." Heretical teacher who asserted that the (general) resurrection had already occurred (2 Tim. 2:17–18), perhaps in a purely spiritual sense.

PHILIP (Phĭl' ĭp) Personal name meaning, "fond of horses." 1. A respected member of the church at Jerusalem who was chosen as one of the seven—first deacons (Acts 6:5). Following Stephen's martyrdom, Philip took the gospel to Samaria, where his ministry was blessed (Acts 8:5–13). Subsequently, he was led south to the Jerusalem-Gaza road where he introduced the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ and baptized him (Acts 8:26–38). He was then transported by the

He is last seen in Scripture when Paul lodged in his home on his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts 21:8). He had four unmarried daughters who were prophetesses (Acts 21:9). See Acts; Deacon; Evangelism.

2. One of twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3). From Bethsaida, he led his brother Nathanael to Jesus (John 1:43–51). Jesus tested Philip concerning how to feed the multitude (John 6:5–7). He and Andrew took inquiring Gentiles to Jesus (John 12:21–22). Philip asked Jesus to show them the father (John 14:8–9), opening the way for Jesus' teaching that to see Him is to see the Father. PHILIPPI (Phĭl ĭp pī′) A city in the Roman province of Macedonia. Paul did missionary work in Philippi (Acts 16:12) and later wrote a letter to the church there (Phil. 1:1).

History In ancient times the site was in a gold mining area. After 400 B.C., Philip II of Macedon seized the mines, fortified the city, and named it for himself. Philippi, along with the rest of Macedonia, came under Roman control after 200 B.C. In 42 B.C., Philippi was the site of a decisive battle that sealed the fate of Rome as a republic and set the stage for the establishment of an empire. The forces of Octavian (later to be Augustus Caesar, the first emperor) and Antony defeated the army of Brutus and Cassius. In honor of the victory, Antony settled some Roman soldiers there and made Philippi a Roman colony. After defeating Antony at the Battle of Actium in 31 B.C., the victorious Octavian dispossessed the supporters of Antony from Italy, but he allowed them to settle in places like Philippi. Octavian refounded Philippi as a Roman colony.

Paul and Philippi Paul first visited Philippi on his second missionary journey in response to his Macedonian vision (Acts 16:9). He and his companions sailed from Troas across the Aegean Sea to Neapolis, on the eastern shore of Macedonia (Acts 16:11). Then they journeyed a few miles inland to "Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony" (Acts 16:12).

On the sabbath, Paul went to a prayer meeting on the river bank. When Paul spoke, Lydia and others opened their hearts to the Lord (Acts 16:13–15). As a rule, Paul first went to the Jewish synagogue when he came to a new city. The fact that he did not do this in Philippi probably shows that Philippi had no synagogue.

An inscription from the Roman period at ancient Philippi.

The Roman character of the city is apparent from Paul's other experiences in Philippi. He healed a possessed slave girl whose owners charged that Jews troubled the city by teaching customs unlawful for Romans to observe (Acts 16:20–21). The city magistrates ordered Paul and Silas to be beaten and turned over to the jailer (Acts 16:20,22–23). After Paul's miraculous deliverance and the jailer's conversion, the magistrates sent the jailer word to release Paul (Acts 16:35–36). Paul informed the messengers that he was a Roman citizen. Since he had been beaten and imprisoned unlawfully, Paul insisted that the magistrates themselves come and release him (Acts 16:37). The very nervous magistrates went to the jail. They pled with Paul not only to leave the jail but also to leave town (Acts 16:38–40). See Paul; Roman Law; Philippians. Robert J. Dean

PHILIPPIANS (Phĭ lĭp′ pĭ ans) Eleventh book of the New Testament written by Paul to the church at Philippi, the first church he established in Europe. It is one of the Prison Epistles (along with Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon). The authenticity of the letter generally is accepted. The terminology and theology are thoroughly Pauline.

In spite of the negative circumstances from which Paul wrote, Philippians is a warm, personal, positive letter (except for chapter 3). Paul wrote to thank the church for a gift it had recently sent to Paul in prison and to inform them of his circumstances and of Timothy's and Epaphroditus' travel plans. The underlying theme which holds the letter together is a call for unity in the church.

The date of the letter depends on which imprisonment Paul was enduring. The traditional date and place of writing is A.D. 61/62 from Rome. If Philippians was written from Caesarea, we would assign a date in the late 50s; if from Ephesus, the mid-50s. See below.

Origin of Philippians Where was Paul when he wrote Philippians? The letter itself reveals only that he was in prison. Acts records Pauline imprisonments in Caesarea and in Rome. Some evidence indicates that Paul was also in prison in Ephesus (Acts 19; 2 Cor. 11:23; 1 Cor. 15:30–32).

Philippians is traditionally assigned to Rome. Reference to Caesar's household (4:22), the praetorium or palace guard (1:13 NIV), as well as the ability to receive visitors (Acts 28:16,30–31) like Epaphroditus and the possibility of execution (1:20–26) seem to mesh well with the imprisonment described in the closing verses of Acts.

An Ephesian origin for Philippians also has much in its favor. Ephesus was the capital of Asia. A provincial governor's guard occupied a "praetorium," and the governor's residence was termed "Caesar's household." An Ephesian imprisonment and origin for Philippians makes sense of Paul's stated intent to visit Philippi upon his release (Phil. 2:24; from Rome Paul intended to go to Spain, Rom. 15:23–24). In addition, Philippians 2:25–30 implies that several trips, bearing news, had been made between Paul's locale and Philippi. A trip from Rome to Philippi took several weeks; from Ephesus to Philippi required only several days. The large number of trips implied in Philippians is difficult to fit into a two-year Roman imprisonment, but is less problematic even in a much shorter Ephesian imprisonment.

A Caesarean origin for Philippians has had fewer supporters over the years. Its detractors point out Paul's intent to go to Rome (not visit Philippi) upon his release and doubt that Paul ever feared execution in Caesarea, as Philippians implies, since he always had the option of appealing to Caesar.

Content of the Letter Philippians is structured much like a typical personal letter of that day. The introduction identifies the sender(s): Paul and Timothy, and the recipients: the saints, overseers, and deacons. This typical letter form, however, is filled with Christian content. The usual secular greeting and wish for good health is transformed into a blessing (v. 2), a thanksgiving for the Philippian church's faithful participation in the work of the gospel (1:3–8), and a prayer that they may be blessed with an ever growing, enlightened, Christian love (1:9–11). See Letter.

The body of the letter begins with Paul explaining his current situation (1:12–26). In vv. 12–18, Paul revealed that his primary concern (the proclamation of the gospel) was being accomplished in spite of his difficult circumstances. His captors were being evangelized (vv. 12–13). His compatriots have gained confidence through his bold example (v. 14). Even the brethren who were working with wrong motives were sharing the good news actively. (There is no hint that these were preaching a false gospel; Paul rejoiced in their work, vv. 15–18). The severity of Paul's imprisonment is reflected in 1:19–26. His death appears to be a real possibility. Death would unite him with Christ. Life would give him the joys of continued productive ministry. He found cause for genuine rejoicing in both. Paul seemed confident, however, that he would eventually be released and reunited with the Philippians.

When Paul returned to Philippi, he hoped to find a church united in Christ. Philippians 1:27—4:9 is a multifaceted call for unity in the church. The great cause of the proclamation of the gospel calls for them to be united in spirit, in task, and in confidence (1:27–30). Their common Christian experience (2:1) and purpose (2:2) should also rule out a self-centered, self-serving attitude (2:3–4). Those who follow Christ must follow him in selfless service to others (2:5–11).

Philippians 2:6–11 is known as the kenosis passage (from the Greek word translated "emptied" in 2:7 RSV). The language and structure of the passage have convinced most commentators that Paul was quoting a hymn which was already in use in the church. The purpose of the pre-Pauline hymn was probably to teach the believer about the nature and work of Christ. Preexistence, incarnation, passion, resurrection, and exaltation are all summarized in a masterful fashion. In the context of Philippians, however, the kenosis passage is used to highlight the humility and selfless service demonstrated by Jesus, whose example the Christian is to follow. See Kenosis.

Paul was concerned that the Philippians demonstrate the reality of their Christian profession in action. Neither the grumbling so characteristic of Israel in the wilderness nor the perversity of a world that does not know God should characterize the church. Paul had sacrificed himself to engender true faith in the Philippians. His desire, for them and for himself, was that he be able to rejoice that his sacrifice was not in vain (2:12–18).

Philippians 2:25–30 explained to the church why Epaphroditus was returning to Philippi. The church has sent him to take a gift to Paul (see Phil. 4:10–20) and minister to him in his imprisonment. Paul probably feared that some would criticize Epaphroditus for returning earlier than planned.

The tone of the letter changes in chapter 3. The encouragement to rejoice (3:1) unexpectedly becomes a stern warning (3:2). (The change is so marked that some scholars think chapter 3 is a later addition to the letter.) A problem was threatening the church at Philippi which had the potential of destroying the foundation of unity and the basis of joy.

The exact nature of the problem is unclear. Jewish legalism (3:2–11), Christian or gnostic perfectionism (3:12–16), and pagan libertinism (3:17–21) are all attacked. Was one heretical system blending all three together? Can one of the above be used to explain the entirety of chapter 3? Were there, in fact, three different threats to the church? Unfortunately, we do not have enough information to answer these questions with confidence. What is clear, however, is that Paul countered the heretical teachings with Christian truths: Jesus Christ is the only avenue to righteousness (3:2–11); the stature of Christ is the goal of Christian maturity (3:12–16); and the nature of Christ and His kingdom is the standard by which the Christian must live (3:17–21).

Chapter 4 returns to a more positive instruction and affirmation of the church. Two women, Euodias and Syntyche (4:2–3), were exhorted to end their conflict, for personal disagreements may be as damaging to the unity of the church as false doctrine.

General exhortations to rejoice and to remain faithful (4:4–9) led to Paul's expression of gratitude for the Philippians' faithful support of him and of the ministry (4:10–20). The letter closes in typical Pauline fashion, with an exchange of greetings and a prayer for grace.

PHILISTIA (Phĭ lĭs′ tĭ ȧ) The coastal plain of southwestern Palestine which was under the control of the Philistines (Ex. 15:14; Pss. 60:8; 87:4; 108:9; Isa. 14:29–31). KJV sometimes referred to Philistia as Palestina (Ex. 15:14; Isa. 14:29–31). See Philistines.

PHILISTIM (Phĭ lĭs′ tĭm) KJV alternate form of Philistines (Gen. 10:14).

PHILISTINES, THE (Phĭl ĭs′ tĭnes) One of the rival groups the Israelites encountered as they settled the land of Canaan. References to the Philistines appear in the Old Testament as well as other ancient Near Eastern writings. Philistine refers to a group of people who occupied and gave their name to the southwest part of Palestine. Ancient Egyptian records from the time of Merneptah and Ramses III referred to them as the"prst." Ancient Assyrian records include references to the Philistines in the terms Philisti and Palastu.

The origin and background of the Philistines has not been completely clarified. Ancient Egyptian records include the "prst" as part of a larger movement of people known as the Sea Peoples, who invaded Egypt about 1188 B.C. by land and by sea, battling the forces of Ramses III, who, according to Egyptian records, defeated them. The Sea Peoples, a massive group that originated in the Aegean area, included the Tjeker, the Skekelesh, the Denyen, the Sherden, and the Weshwesh as well as the "prst" or Pelesti, the biblical Philistines. As they moved eastward from the Aegean region, the Sea Peoples made war with people in their path including the Hittites in Anatolia and the inhabitants at sites in North Syria such as those at the site of Ugarit. According to biblical references, the homeland of the Philistines was Caphtor (Amos 9:7; Jer. 47:4). See Caphtor.

Philistines are first mentioned in the patriarchal stories (Gen. 21:32,34), a reference which some suggest is anachronistic and others suggest refers to the migrations of an Aegean colony in the patriarchal period. The most dramatic phase of Philistine history begins in the period of the Judges when the Philistines were the principal enemy of and the major political threat to Israel. This threat is first seen in the stories of Samson (Judg. 13—16). The threat intensified as the Philistines encroached on the territory of the tribe of Dan ultimately forcing Dan to move north (Judg. 18:11,29). The threat reached crisis proportions in the battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam. 4:1–18), when the Israelites were soundly defeated and the ark of the covenant, brought over from Shiloh (1 Sam. 4:3–4), was captured. During the time of Samuel, the Israelites defeated the Philistines at times (1 Sam. 7:5–11; 14:16–23), but, generally speaking, their advance against the Israelites continued. Saul not only failed to check their intrusion into Israelite territory but in the end lost his life fighting the Philistines at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:1–13). David finally checked the Philistine advance at Baal-perazim (2 Sam. 5:17–25).

Several features of Philistine life and culture are reflected in the Old Testament. Politically, the Philistines had a highly organized city-state system comprised of five towns in southwest Palestine: Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (1 Sam. 6:17). Each of the city-states was ruled by a "lord" (1 Sam. 6:18), a kinglike figure. Gath was perhaps the major city of this Philistine pentapolis, and as such, served as the hub of the city-state system.

The Philistines were experts in metallurgy, the skill of processing metals (1 Sam. 13:19–23). Philistine expertise in this area put the Israelites at a decided disadvantage in their struggles with the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:22). See Minerals and Metals.

The Philistines had a highly trained military organization. Sea and land battles between the Egyptians and Sea Peoples are depicted on large panels at the temple of Ramses III at Medinet Habu in Thebes. The Philistines were in ships designed with a curved keel and the head of a bird on the bow. Philistine warriors wore a plumed or feathered headdress, a feature which added height to their physical appearance. On land, the Philistines were equipped with horses and chariots, numerous foot soldiers, and archers (1 Sam. 13:5; 31:3). The armor of Philistine soldiers included bronze helmets, coats of mail, leg protectors, spears, and shields (1 Sam. 17:5–7). The story of Goliath indicates that at times the Philistines used individual combat (1 Sam. 17). Most likely, the Philistine warrior went through a cursing ritual just prior to the confrontation (1 Sam. 17:43). David, who recognized the military expertise of the Philistines, selected Cherethites (Cretans) and Pelethites (Philistines) (1 Sam. 20:23) for his palace guard or mercenary army. This segment of the army provided protection for David and his family during times of revolt. See Arms and Armor.

While our information on Philistine religion is limited, three Philistine gods are mentioned in the Old Testament—Dagon, Ashtoreth, and Baalzebub. Dagon appears to be the chief god of the Philistines. Temples of Dagon were located at Gaza (Judg. 16:21–30) and Ashdod (1 Sam. 5:1–7). Ashtoreth, the fertility goddess of the Canaanites, was most likely adopted by the Philistines. Apparently, the Philistines had Ashtoreth temples at Beth-shan (1 Sam. 31:10 NIV) and, according to Herodotus, at Ashkelon (Herodotus I. 105). Baalzebub, the Philistine god whose name means "lord of the flies," was the god of Ekron (2 Kings 1:1–16). Most likely the Philistines worshiped Baalzebub as a god who averted pestilence or plagues.

Archaeological excavations have brought to light many features of the material culture of the Philistines. The distinctive Philistine pottery which reflects styles and designs adopted and adapted from other cultures has been found at many sites. The major types of Philistine pottery are the so-called beer jug with a spouted strainer on the side, the crater bowl, the stirrup jar, and the horn-shaped vessel. The pottery was often decorated with red and black painted designs including geometric designs often consisting of circles and cross halving and stylized birds. Clay coffins were used by the Philistines for burials. These distinctive coffins, called "anthropoid coffins" because they were made in the shape of a human body, had lids decorated with the physical features of the upper part of a human being, features such as a head, arms, and hands.

Recent excavations especially at the sites of Ashdod, tel-Qasile, tel Jemmeh, and tel Mor have added significantly to our understanding of the Philistine culture. The excavations at tel Qasile revealed a Philistine iron smeltery, a Philistine temple, offering stands, and other vessels used in religious rituals as well as many other artifacts and installations. A new series of excavations is under way at Ashkelon. The current excavations will add yet a new dimension to our understanding of the Philistines. The political influence of the Philistines was most prominent between 1200 and 1000 B.C., but their influence continues through the use of the name Palestine, a name derived from "Philistine." PHILO JUDAEUS (Phī′ lō Jū dae′ ŭs) Early Jewish interpreter of Scripture known for use of allegory. Also known as Philo of Alexandria, he lived about the same time as Jesus (about 20 B.C. to A.D. 50). A member of a wealthy Jewish family in Alexandria, Egypt, he was well educated in Greek schools and used the Greek Old Testament, the Septuagint, as his Bible.

Philo's writings—particularly his commentaries on the Scriptures—influenced the early church. A literal interpretation was all right for the average scholar, but for the enlightened ones such as himself, he advocated an allegorical interpretation. See Bible, Hermeneutics.

PHILOSOPHY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT Philosophical systems abounded in the first century A.D. Among the most notable were Stoicism, Epicureanism, Platonism, Cynicism, Philonism, and Skepticism. The writers of the New Testament mention philosophy only twice. In Colossians 2:8, Paul warned his readers to beware of philosophy. Paul had in mind no particular philosophy; rather, he condemned any system of thought which denied the full divinity of Christ. The Colossian Christians were threatened by a teaching (probably Gnostic) contrary to the gospel Paul delivered. In Acts 17:18, Luke mentioned that Epicurean and Stoic philosophers engaged Paul in debate. Their motives were clearly a desire for speculation rather than an active pursuit of the truth of the gospel.

There are conceptual points of contact in the New Testament with various philosophies. The early Christians encountered the wide range of philosophies in their missionary activity. These early Christians adapted concepts familiar to their audience in their witness and writings. Paul, as a learned man, reflected a knowledge of the major philosophies in his letters. Paul quoted from Stoic works in his speech at the Areopagus (Acts 17:28). His statement in Philippians 4:11 is similar to Stoic ideas. Paul's question-and-answer style in Romans 3:1–4 and 1 Corinthians 6:2–19 are very similar to Cynic diatribe (a lively semiconversational technique). Philonic or Platonic thought is reflected in Hebrews, for example, where the writer identifies the earthly sanctuary as a copy or shadow of the perfect heavenly sanctuary (see chs. 8—10). The presence of ideas in the New Testament similar to some of the philosophical notions of the day is undeniable. It must be emphasized, however, that the theological presuppositions of a Christian writer and a first century philosopher were vastly different. Terence B. Ellis PHILOLOGUS (Phĭ lŏ′ lō gŭs) Personal name meaning, "lover of words," either in the sense of "talkative" or of "lover of learning." Member, perhaps the head, of a Roman house church whom Paul greeted (Rom. 16:15). Philologus was perhaps the husband of Julia and father of Nereus and Olympas.

PHINEHAS (Phĭn′ ė hăs) Personal name meaning "dark-skinned" or "mouth of brass." 1. Grandson of Aaron and high priest who, on several occasions, aided Moses and Joshua. See High Priest. 2. One of Eli the priest's worthless sons. He engaged in religious prostitution (1 Sam. 2:22) and led the people to follow. He and Hophni died in a battle with the Philistines while attempting to keep the ark from being captured (4:11). When his pregnant wife heard of his death, she immediately delivered, naming the child Ichabod ("the glory has departed").

PHLEGON (Phlē′ gŏn) Personal name meaning, "burning," perhaps in the sense of "zealous." Member of a Roman house church whom Paul greeted (Rom. 16:14).

PHOEBE (Phō̄′ bė) Personal name meaning, "bright." "Servant," "minister" (REB), "deaconess" (NAS, NIV note), or "deacon" (NRSV) of church at Cenchrea whom Paul recommended to church at Rome (Rom. 16:1–2). See Deacon.

PHOENICIA (Phō̄e nī′ cĭ à) Place name meaning, "purple" or "crimson," translation of Hebrew "Canaan, land of purple." The narrow land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Lebanon Mountains between Tyre in the south and Arvad in the north. New Testament Phoenicia reached south to Dor. Great forest land enabled the people to build ships and become the dominant seafaring nation. The forests also provided timber for export, Phoenician cedars being the featured material of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 5:8–10).

Culture Phoenician religion was akin to that of the Canaanites, featuring fertility rites of Baal. See Canaan. Later, Baal's Greek counterpart Adonis ("my lord") was worshiped in similar fashion to Tammuz. See Fertility Cults. The Phoenician princess Jezebel imported devotion to Baal to Israel. See Jezebel; Elijah. Phoenicia introduced the alphabet to the western world, but little of their literature survived.

History City-states rather than central government dominated Phoenicia. Leading cities were Tyre, Sidon, Byblos (Gebal), and Berytos (Beirut). An early Neolithic race disappeared about 3000

A relief depicting a Phoenician shepherd.

B.C., being replaced by Semitic colonizers from the east. Invading armies from north (Hittites), east (Amorites and Assyrians), and south (Egyptians) dominated history until 1000 B.C. when King Hiram of Tyre established local rule (981–947 B.C.). See Hiram. They were able to take advantage of their location on the sea with natural harbors and their forests to establish farflung trade. Compare Ezekiel 27. Their sailors established trading colonies to the west and south all along the Mediterranean coast. The most notable colony was Carthage on the North African coast.

Growth of Assyrian power about 750 B.C. led to Phoenicia's decline. The Persian Empire gave virtual independence to Phoenicia, using the Phoenician fleet against Egypt and Greece. Alexander the Great put an end to Phoenician political power, but the great cities retained economic power.

New Testament Jesus' ministry reached Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 15:21). Persecution beginning with Stephen's death, led the church to spread into Phoenicia (Acts 11:19; compare 15:3; 21:2–3).

PHOENIX (Phō̄e′ nĭx) Place name perhaps meaning, "date palm." Port on the southeast coast of Crete where Paul and the ship's crew hoped to reach for winter harbor (Acts 27:12). Phoenix is often identified with Port Loutro, which, however, faces the wrong direction to offer shelter from winter storms. Phoenix is better identified with some point on Phinika Bay to the west of Loutro.

PHRYGIA (Phrȳg′ ĭa) Place name meaning, "parched." In very ancient times the area immediately west of the Hellespont. Later, the people migrated into Asia Minor. During Roman times, Phrygia was a subregion of Galatia, and her people often were slaves or servants. The area remained relatively undefined but contained Antioch of Pisidia, Laodicea, and at times, Iconium. Some of the Phrygians were present in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost and heard the gospel in their native language (Acts 2:10; compare 16:6; 18:23). See Asia Minor.

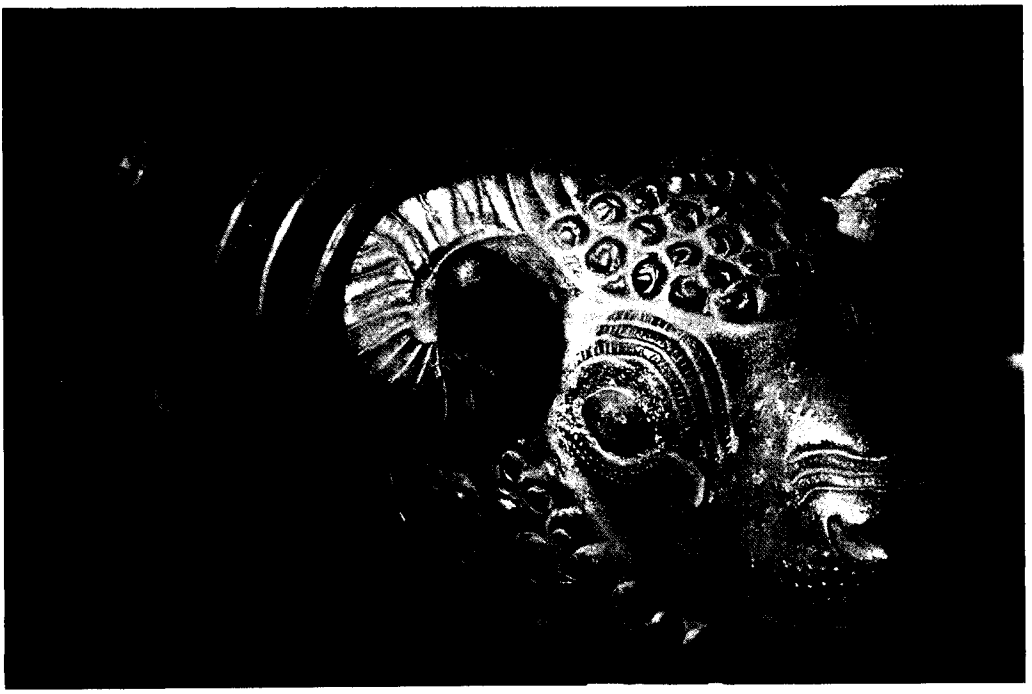
PHUT (Phŭt) KJV alternate form of Put (Gen. 10:6; Ezek. 27:10).

PHUVAH (Phū′ vah) KJV form of Puvah (Gen. 46:13).



PHYGELUS (Phȳ ġĕl′ us) Personal name meaning, "fugitive." Christian who deserted Paul (2 Tim. 1:15). The contrast with Onesiphorus, who was not ashamed of the imprisoned Paul (1:16–17), suggests that Phygelus abandoned Paul in prison.

PHYLACTERIES (Phȳ lăc′ tẽ rīes) See Frontlets.

An orthodox Jewish man wearing the traditional phylactery (frontlet) on his forehead.

PICTURE KJV term in three passages where modern translations use a term better suited to the context. 1. Carved stone figures (Num. 33:52). 2. Settings (NAS, NIV, NRSV) or filigree (REB) (Prov. 25:11). 3. A sailing craft or vessel (Isa. 2:16).

PIECE OF MONEY 1. Translation of the Hebrew qesitah, a coin of uncertain weight and value (Gen. 33:19; Job 42:11 KJV, NAS, NRSV). NIV reads "pieces of silver." 2. KJV translation of the Greek term stater (Matt. 17:27). Modern translations read: stater (NAS); four drachma coin (NIV); shekel (RSV); coin (NRSV, REB). See Coins.

PIETY Translation of a Hebrew expression and several Greek terms. 1. NIV used piety to translate the Hebrew idiom "the fear [or reverence] of the Lord" (Job 4:6; 15:4; 22:4; compare REB). 2. NRSV used piety to translate the Greek term meaning, "righteousness" (Matt. 6:1), where the concern was with an external show of religion (Matt. 6:2–6). 3. Piety translates two Greek terms for fear or reverence for God (Acts 3:12 NAS, NRSV; Heb. 5:7 NAS). 3. Piety represents the religious duty of caring for the physical needs of elderly family members (1 Tim. 5:4 KJV, NAS).

PIHAHIROTH (Pī hȧ hī′ rŏth) Hebrew place name derived from the Egyptian, "house of Hathor" and interpreted in Hebrew as "mouth of canals." Pihahiroth lay in the eastern Nile delta to the east of Baal-zephon. The site is unknown. The Israelites encamped at Pihahiroth in the early days of the Exodus (Ex. 14:2,9; Num. 33:7). The alternate form Hahiroth appears at Numbers 33:8.

PILATE, PONTIUS (Pī′ lȧte, Pŏn′ tiŭs) Roman governor of Judea remembered in history as a notorious anti-Semite and in Christian creeds as the magistrate under whom Jesus Christ "suffered" (1 Tim 6:13). The New Testament refers to him as "governor," while other sources call him "procurator" or "prefect" (an inscription found in Caesarea in 1961). Pilate came to power about A.D. 26, close to the time when two of his contemporaries, Sejanus in Rome and Flaccus in Egypt, were pursuing policies apparently aimed at the destruction of the Jewish people. Pilate's policies were much the same. His procuratorship consisted of one provocation of Jewish sensibilities after another. He broke all precedent by bringing into Jerusalem military insignia bearing the image of Caesar in flagrant defiance of Jewish law. He removed them only when the Jews offered to die at the hands of his soldiers rather than consent to such blasphemy. He brutally suppressed protest by planting armed soldiers, disguised as civilians, among the Jewish crowds. Against such a backdrop, it is not hard to understand the reference in Luke 13:1 to "The Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifice (NIV)." Pilate was finally removed from office as the result of a similar outrage against Samaritan worshipers who had gathered on Mount Gerizim, their holy mountain, to view some sacred vessels which they believed Moses had buried there. When the Samaritans complained to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, Pilate was ordered to Rome to account for his actions to the emperor and is not mentioned again in reliable contemporary sources.

In view of his record, it is surprising that Pilate allowed himself to be pressured by a group of Jewish religious authorities into allowing Jesus to be executed. A possible explanation is that he already felt his position in the empire to be in jeopardy (note the threat implicit in John 19:12). Pilate seems to have had no personal inclination to put Jesus to death, and the New Testament writers are eager to show that he did not (Luke 23:4,14,22; John 18:38; 19:4,6; compare Matt. 17:19). The Gospel writers sought to demonstrate that Jesus was innocent from the standpoint of Roman law and that consequently Christianity in their day was not a threat to the Roman political and social order. The fact that Jesus was brought to Pilate at all probably means that He had not been formally tried and convicted by the Sanhedrin, or Jewish ruling Council (if he had, he would probably have been stoned to death like Stephen, or like James the Just in A.D. 62). Instead, a relatively small group of Jerusalem priests, including the high priest, wanted to forestall any kind of a messianic movement by the people because of the repression it would provoke from the Romans (see John 11:47–50,53). They maneuvered Pilate into doing their work for them (compare Luke 23:2). Pilate is represented in all the Gospels as questioning Jesus especially on the subject of kingship, but he remained unconvinced that Jesus was in any way a serious claimant to Jewish or Roman political power. The inscription he insisted on placing over the cross according to all the Gospels was Pilate's last grim joke at Jewish expense: "This is the King of the Jews." Anti-Jewish to the end, Pilate was telling the world, "What a sorry race this is, with such a pitiful figure for their king!" See Cross. J. Ramsey Michaels

PILDASH (Pĭl′ dăsh) Personal and clan name perhaps meaning, "powerful." Sixth son of Nahor (Gen. 22:22), probably the ancestor of an otherwise unknown north Arabian tribe.

PILEHA (Pī′ lē hă) KJV form of Pilha.

PILFER To steal secretly, usually little by little (John 12:6 NAS, REB; Titus 2:10 NAS, REB, NRSV).

PILGRIMAGE A journey, especially a religious trek to a site at which God has revealed Himself in the past. KJV used pilgrimage in the nontechnical sense of journeys (Ex. 6:4). KJV, NAS, RSV used pilgrimage in a figurative sense for life journey (Gen. 47:9 KJV, only; Ps. 119:54). The only explicit mention of religious pilgrimage occurs in the NIV of Psalm 84:5 (Compare REB).

In Israel's early history, numerous local shrines were the goals of religious pilgrimage: Bethel (Gen. 28:10–22; 31:13; 35:9–15; Amos 4:4; 5:5); Gilgal (Josh. 4:19–24; Hos. 4:15; Amos 4:4; 5:5); Shiloh (Judg. 20:26–27; 1 Sam. 1:3,19); Beersheba (Amos 5:5; 8:14); Gibeon (1 Kings 3:3–5); even Horeb (1 Kings 19:8). Jerusalem was not the goal of religious pilgrims until David relocated the ark there (2 Sam. 6:12–19). Hezekiah's and Josiah's reforms attempted to destroy the pagan sites of pilgrimage and idol worship (2 Kings 18:4; 23:8) and make Jerusalem the exclusive focus of pilgrimage. Mosaic law required adult male Israelites to appear before the Lord (where the ark of the covenant rested) three times a year (Ex. 23:14–17; 34:18–23; Deut. 16:16). Crowds of pilgrims (Pss. 42:4; 55:14; Luke 2:44) sang on the way to Jerusalem (Isa. 30:29). The Psalms of Ascent (Pss. 24; 84; 118; 120–134) were likely sung as pilgrims climbed the ascent to the Temple mount in Jerusalem. The prophets condemned the celebration of religious pilgrimages and feasts when not accompanied by genuine devotion to the Lord expressed in righteous lives (Isa. 1:12–13; Amos 4:4–5; 5:5–6,21–24).

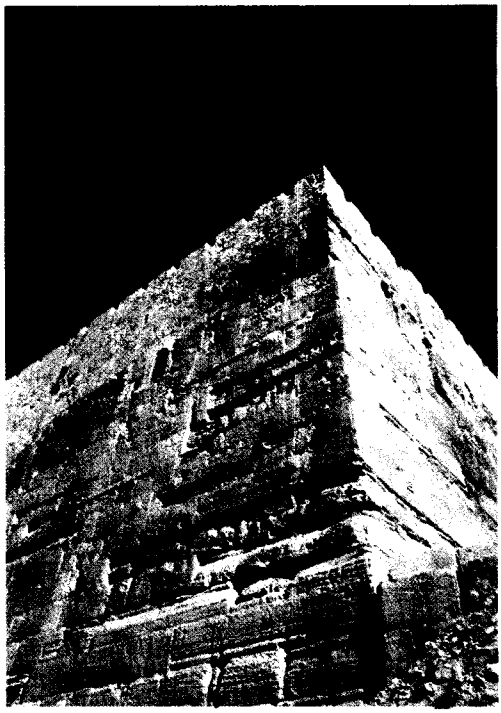
The New Testament witnessed the continuing popularity of pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Matt. 21:8–11; Luke 2:41; John 2:13; 5:1; 7:2,10; 12:12,20; Acts 2:5–10; 20:16). Chris Church

PILHA (Pĭl′ hă) Personal name meaning, "millstone." Lay leader witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:24).

PILLAR Stone monuments (Hebrew matstsebah) or standing architectural structures (Hebrew 'amudim). 1. Stones set up as memorials to persons. Jacob set up a pillar on Rachel's grave as a memorial to her (Gen. 35:20). Because Absalom had no son to carry on his name, he set up a pillar and carved his name in it (2 Sam. 18:18).

2. Shrines both to the Lord and to false gods. Graven images often were pillars set up as gods. God commanded Israel to break down such "images" (Hebrew matstseboth; Ex. 23:24). The Canaanites erected pillars at their places of worship, and probably influenced Israelite practice. Archaeologists found pillars at Gezer. Jacob set up a pillar following his dream (Gen. 28:18) and again when God spoke to him at Bethel (35:9–15) as memorials of God's revelation. Moses set up twelve pillars to commemorate the giving of the law to the tribes of Israel (Ex. 24:4).

3. As structural supports, pillars were used extensively. The tabernacle used pillars for the veil (Ex. 26:31–32), the courts (27:9–15), and the gate (27:16). The Temple in Jerusalem used pillars for its support (1 Kings 7:2–3), and the porch had pillars (7:6). Figuratively, pillars were believed to hold up heaven (Job 26:11) and earth (1 Sam. 2:8).



4. God led Israel through the wilderness with a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex. 13:21; compare 14:19–20). These pillars were symbols of God's presence with Israel as much as signs of where they were to go.

5. Solomon's Temple had two free-standing brass pillars (1 Kings 7:15). See Jachin and Boaz. Mike Mitchell

PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE Visible evidence of God's presence with Israel during the Exodus and wilderness wanderings (Ex. 14:24; 33:9–10; Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:15). As a sign of God's presence, the pillar of cloud and fire was associated with divine actions: salvation (Ex. 14:19–20); revelation (Ex. 33:9–10; Ps. 99:7); judgment (Num. 12:5); commissioning (Deut. 31:15). Nehemiah used the pillar as a sign of God's faithfulness (Neh. 9:12,19). Psalm 99:7 reflects an otherwise unknown tradition that the pillar abided with Israel until the time of Samuel. Jesus' self-presentation as the incarnate Light of the world (John 8:12) recalls the guiding light of the wilderness wanderings. In Jesus' day, the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:2) included the lighting of great, golden lamps in the Temple court as a reminder of the pillar of fire and cloud. Jesus as the living Light challenged persons to follow Him as Israel had followed God's earlier light.

PILLOW A support for the head. KJV and REB described the rock on which Jacob rested his head as a pillow (Gen. 28:11,18). The Hebrew term translated pillow at 1 Samuel 19:13,16 (KJV, RSV, TEV) is of uncertain meaning. Possible translations include quilt (NAS), net (NRSV), and rug (REB). KJV followed the earliest Greek translation in reading pillows at Ezekiel 13:18,20. Modern translations render the underlying Hebrew as magic bands (NAS, REB, NRSV), charms (NIV), or wristbands (TEV). Jesus demonstrated His absolute trust in God by sleeping through a storm with his head on a pillow (Mark 4:38 KJV, TEV) or cushion (NAS, NIV, REB, NRSV).

The traditional "pinnacle of the Temple."

PILOT A helmsman. Ancient pilots steered by positioning a side rudder which was an oversized oar pivoted in a slanting position near the vessel's stern (Jas. 3:4; KJV, governor). Most translations used pilot in Ezekiel 27:8,27–29 in parallel to terms translated mariners, rowers, or sailors. The NIV rendered the underlying Hebrew as a seaman. See Ships.

PILTAI (Pĭl′ taî) Short form of personal name meaning, "(Yah is) my deliverance." Head of a family of postexilic priests (Neh. 12:17).

PIN See Peg.

PINE TREE See Plants in the Bible.

PINNACLE (Pĭn′ nă cle) The highest point of a structure. NRSV referred to the pinnacles of the Temple or the city of Jerusalem (Isa. 54:12). The underlying Hebrew suggests a structure catching the sun's rays. Other translations include battlements (NAS, NIV, REB), towers (TEV), and windows (KJV). The pinnacle (literally, "little wing") of the Temple (Matt. 4:5; Luke 4:9) is not mentioned in the Old Testament, intertestamental literature, or rabbinic sources. Possible identifications include the southeastern corner of the royal colonnade which overlooked the Kidron valley and a lintel or balcony above one of the Temple gates. The account of the martyrdom of James the Lord's brother by Hegesippus relates that James was thrown from the pinnacle of the Temple and then stoned and clubbed. This (likely conflated) account suggests a high structure overlooking the Temple court.

PINON (Pī′ nŏn) Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52), whose descendants perhaps settled Punon (Num. 33:42–43).

PIRAM (Pī′ răm) Personal name perhaps meaning, "wild ass." King of Jarmuth southwest of Jerusalem and member of a coalition of five Amorite kings who battled Joshua unsuccessfully (Josh. 10:3,23).

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE (Pī rā′ thŏn, Pī rā′ thŏn īte) Place name meaning, "princely" or "height, summit" and its inhabitants. The town in the hill country of Ephraim was the home of the judge Abdon (Judg. 12:13,15) and of Benaiah, one of David's elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron.

11:31). The site is identified with Far'ata about five miles southwest of Shechem.

PISGAH (Pĭs' gah) Place name perhaps meaning, "the divided one." Mountain in the Abarim range across the Jordan River from Jericho. Some Bible scholars believe it was part of Mount Nebo; others think it could have been a separate rise, either en-Neba or near modern Khirbet Tsijaga. God allowed Moses to view the Promised Land from the heights of Pisgah (Deut. 34:1) but would not let him cross into Canaan. Israel had camped near Pisgah (Num. 21:20). Balak took Balaam to its height so the prophet could see Israel and curse them (Num. 23:14). It was a limit of Sihon's kingdom (Josh. 12:23; Ashdoth-pisgah in KJV) and also for the tribe of Reuben (13:20).

PISHON (Pī' shŏn) Name meaning, "free-flowing," designating one of the rivers of Eden (Gen. 2:11). The identity of the river is unknown. Some suggest the "river" was a canal connecting the Tigris and Euphrates or another body of water, such as the Persian Gulf.

PISIDIA (Pĭ sĭ dĭ' à) Small area in the province of Galatia in southern Asia Minor bounded by Pamphylia, Phrygia, and Lyconia. The territory lay within the Taurus Mountain range and therefore resisted invasion by ancient peoples. Only in 25 B.C. did the Romans gain control over the region through economic diplomacy. Antioch was made the capital, although some historians contend that the city was not actually in Pisidia. Paul and Barnabas came through Antioch (Acts 13:14) after John Mark left them in Perga (v. 13). The New Testament does not record any missionary activity in Pisidia itself, probably because there were few Jews there with which to start a congregation. See Asia Minor.

PISPA, PISPAH (Pĭs' pà, Pĭs' pah) Personal name of unknown meaning. Member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38).

PISTACHIO NUTS See Plants in the Bible.

PIT Translation of twelve Hebrew and two Greek words in KJV for water reservoir, ditch, or place of destruction. The most common use of "pit" is to refer to a well or cistern (Gen. 37:20–29; Ex. 21:33–34; Pss. 7:15; 55:23; Prov. 26:27; 28:10). See Cistern; Wells.

Sometimes "pit" refers to a ditch or a marsh (Jer. 14:3; Isa. 30:14). Many times the word was used as a synonym for a place of destruction (Ps. 55:23), corruption (Ps. 16:10; 49:9; Isa. 38:17), or death (Isa. 14:15; Jonah 2:6). Three times KJV translated the word Sheol as "pit" (Num. 16:30,33; Job 17:16). One Greek word is translated "bottomless pit" in Revelation 9:1,2 (cf. Ps. 88:6). See Hell; Everlasting Punishment; Sheol.

Ralph L. Smith

PITCH 1. Dark-colored, viscous mixture of hydrocarbons used for waterproofing sailing vessels (Gen. 6:14; compare Ex. 2:3). Mineral pitch occurs naturally and is highly flammable (Isa. 34:9). 2. KJV used pitch as a verb meaning, "to coat or cover with pitch" (Gen. 6:14).

PITCHER A vessel with a handle and either a molded lip or a spout. For literal uses, see Pottery. Clay pitchers served as symbols of mortality (Eccl. 12:6) and of the commonplace (Lam. 4:2).

PITFALL A trap or snare, especially a roughly camouflaged pit. RSV used pitfall four times (Job 18:8; Ps. 119:85; Lam. 3:47; Rom. 11:9; the latter changed by NRSV to stumbling block). All uses are figurative. Pitfall in the Old Testament suggests hidden or unrecognized dangers.

PITHOM (Pī' thŏm) Egyptian place name Per-Atum meaning, "mansion or estate of Atum" (an Egyptian god). The only mention of this city in the Bible relates to the plight of the Israelites in Egypt (Ex. 1:11). Coupled with the city of Rameses, it becomes an important clue to the Exodus chronology. See Exodus.

Some recognize tell el-Retabah as Pithom, but the predominate opinion seems to see tell el-Maskhutah as Pithom, a religious name given Succoth. Papyrus Anastasi mentions Pithom in a report to Merneptah. Gary C. Huckabay PITHON (Pī' thŏn) Personal name of unknown meaning. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

PITY Sympathetic sorrow toward one facing suffering or distress. Pity was expected of friends (Job 19:21), kin (Amos 1:11), and God (Ps. 90:13). Enemies lacked pity (Pss. 17:10; 69:20; Isa. 13:18; Jer. 21:7). Those guilty of idolatry, murder, or false witness were to be denied pity (Deut. 7:16; 13:8; 19:13). The images of the father and shepherd illustrate God's pity (Ps. 103:13; Isa. 49:10). God pities the penitent (Judg. 2:18), the weak and needy (Ps. 72:13), Jerusalem in ruins (Ps. 102:13), those who fear God (Ps. 103:13), and the exiles (Isa. 49:10). In judgment, God withholds pity from God's people (Jer. 13:14; 20:16; Lam. 2:17; 3:43; Ezek. 5:11). Ezekiel pictured Jerusalem as an unpitied child denied the most basic postnatal care (Ezek. 16:5). Hosea illustrated the fate of Israel with Loruhamah, a child's name meaning, "not pitied" (1:6; 2:23).

Pleas for pity are a common feature of healing narratives (Mark 9:22 NAS, NIV, NRSV; Luke 17:13 NIV). Pity moved Jesus to heal (Matt. 20:34 RSV). Jesus used a compassionate Samaritan as an unexpected example of active pity (Luke 10:33 NIV). Such active concern for those in need serves as evidence that one is a child of God (1 John 3:17 NIV).

PLAGUES Disease interpreted as divine judgment, translation of several Hebrew words. The ten plagues in the Book of Exodus were the mighty works of God that gained Israel's release and demonstrated God's sovereignty and were called "plagues" (Ex. 9:14; 11:1), "signs" (Ex. 7:13), and "wonders" (Ex. 7:3; 11:9). They showed the God of Moses was sovereign over the gods of Egypt, including Pharaoh who was considered a god by the Egyptians.

The primary reference to the plagues in the Bible is in Exodus 7:1—13:15 (compare Deut. 4:34; 7:19; 11:3; Jer. 32:20). Two psalms (78; 105) contain detailed accounts of the plagues, but neither includes all ten. Paul used the plagues to stress the sovereignty of God in the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (Rom. 9:17–18). The plagues of the Revelation reflect Old Testament influence (Rev. 8; 16).

Natural or Supernatural Modern distinctions between the natural and the supernatural were not allowable considerations for the Israelites. For them, whatever happened, God did it. Everything was under God's immediate control. For the inspired writer, the plagues were nothing more nor less than the Lord's judgment upon the Egyptians and His saving actions for Israel. Most interpreters point out that the plagues depict events of nature that might occur in Egypt. Clearly, the author of Exodus saw them as the product of a purposive, divine will. Since Egypt's magicians duplicated the first two events, the uniqueness of the plagues may rest in their timing, locale, intensity, and theological interpretation.

Purpose The plagues resulted in Israel's freedom. However, the central purpose was the revelation of God. Pharaoh and the Egyptians, as well as Moses and the Israelites, would come to know the Lord through the events of the plagues (Ex. 7:17; 8:10,22; 9:14,16,29). Paul acknowledged this purpose: "that my name might be declared throughout all the earth" (Rom. 9:17). See Exodus; Miracles. Billy K. Smith

PLAIN See Palestine.

PLAISTER KJV variant form of plaster (Isa. 38:21). Here plaster refers to a fig poultice (compare NIV, REB, NAS, NRSV).

PLAIT KJV term meaning, "to braid" (1 Pet. 3:3). See Hair.

PLANE TREE See Plants in the Bible.

PLANKS Long, flat pieces of timber thicker than boards, used in shipbuilding (Ezek. 27:5; Acts 27:44) and for the flooring of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 6:15 KJV). The "thick planks upon the face of the porch" in Ezekiel's vision of the renewed Temple (Ezek. 41:25 KJV) likely refers to some type of canopy (NRSV; overhang, NIV; covering, TEV; cornice, REB) or to a threshold (NAS).

PLANTATION KJV term (Ezek. 17:7) to designate a bed (NAS, REB, NRSV) or plot (NIV) where plants are planted.

PLANTS IN THE BIBLE By plants we include all plant life such as wild and cultivated trees, shrubs, and herbs.

Lily and Rose Red lips of Song of Solomon 5:13 indicate a red-flowered "lily," such as scarlet tulip or anemone. Other references, such as Song of Solomon 2:1–2, may refer to the actual white madonna lily (Lilium candidum), now very rare in the area, or wild hyacinth (Hyacinthus orientalis) wild crocus (Croccus species), the rose of Isaiah 35:1–2 (see NAS). It is impossible to be sure to which "lilies" Jesus referred (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27): it may have been the anemone or any of the conspicuous wild flowers such as crown daisy (Chrysanthemum coronarium).

The biblical "rose" is similarly difficult to identify. The "rose of Sharon" (Song of Sol. 2:1) has been equated with anemone, rockrose, narcissus, tulip, and crocus.

Reeds Certain water plants may be distinguished from the several Hebrew words used. The following species are likely to be the ones referred to:

Common reed (Phragmites communis) forms great stands in shallow water or wet salty sand. The plumed flower head may have been given to Jesus in mockery (Matt. 27:29). Pens (3 John 13) were made from the bamboolike stems.

Papyrus sedge (Cyperus papyrus) also grows in shallow water in hot places such as in Lake Huleh and along the Nile, but it is now extinct in Egypt except in cultivation. Its tall, triangular, spongy stems were used for rafts (Isa. 18:1–2) and for making baskets (Ex. 2:3) and papyrus paper, on which much of the Bible may have been written.

Cattail or reed mace (Typha domingensis) is often associated with the above-mentioned reeds, and it seems to have been the one among which Moses was hidden (Ex. 2:3). This is often referred to as bulrush, but the tree bulrush (Scirpus lacustris) is a sedge with slender stems, which also occurs in lakes and pools.

Thorns Jesus' crown of thorns has led to two shrubs known as christthorn (Ziziphus spina-christ, Paliurus spina-christi). The former grows near the Dead Sea not far from Jerusalem (Matt. 27:29; Mark 15:17; John 19:5), while the latter does not grow nearer than Syria. However, it may have occurred on the Judean hills in biblical times. Some authors consider the common spiny burnet (Poterium or Sarcopoterium spinosum) to be the species concerned.

Even today nobody can walk far in the Holy Land without seeing prickly weeds. The ground is cursed with them (Gen. 3:18; Num. 33:55). Many different Hebrew words have been used to distinguish them, and some are identifiable. Thorns are usually woody plants, such as Acacia, Lycium, Ononis, Prosopis, Rubus, Sarcopoterium, while thistles are herbaceous, such as Centaurea, Notobasis, Silybum. The latter could have been the 'thorns' that suffocated the grain in Jesus' parable (Matt. 13:7).

Fragrant Plants In biblical times strong smelling plants included the following kinds:

1. Cassia and cinnamon are traditionally identified with the Far Eastern trees Cinnamomum cassia and C. zeylanicum. The ground bark was used in the holy anointing oil for priests (Ex. 30:24), and cinnamon was used for perfumery (Prov. 7:17; Rev. 18:13).

2. Calamus or sweet cane (Acorus calamus) was the dry rhizome of this water plant imported from temperate Asia used for perfume (Isa. 43:24 NRSV).

This large thistle plant is one of many varieties that grow in Israel.

3. Galbanum, a very strong-smelling resin burnt as incense (Ex. 30:34), was obtained from the stem of Ferula galbaniflua, a relative of parsley growing on dry hills in Iran.

4. Henna (Lawsonia inermis) leaves were crushed and used both as a perfume (Song of Sol. 1:14 NIV) and as a yellow dye for skin, nails, and hair. It is a subtropical shrub with white flowers.

5. Hyssop used for ritual cleansing (Lev. 14:4,49) and sprinkling of blood in the tabernacle (Ex.12:22) was the white marjoram (Origanum syriacum or Majorana syriacu) which grows commonly in rocky places and is related to the mint.

6. Myrtle (Myrtus communis) is a shrub with fragrant leaves and white flowers frequent in bushy places. It was especially favored for temporary shelters in the fields at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15).

7. Rue (Ruta chalepensis) grows on the hills of the Holy Land as a low straggling shrub with pungent smelling leaves. Jesus referred to it being tithed (Luke 11:42).

8. Spikenard or nard, an expensive perfumed oil (Song of Sol. 4:13–14; John 12:3), obtained either from the leaves of a desert grass (Cymbopogon schoenanthus) or, traditionally, the valerian relative Nardostachys jatamansi from the Himalayas.

9. Stacte, one of the spices referred to in Exodus 30:34 to be used in the incense, may be the resin of the balm-of-Gilead (Commiphora gileadensis) from southern Arabia.

Culinary Herbs Bitter herbs for Passover are certain wild plants with sharp-tasting leaves. The desert plant wormwood (Artemisia) was also bitter and depicted sorrow and suffering (Prov. 5:4 Lam. 3:15,19).

Coriander (Coriandrum sativum) provides both salad leaves and spicy seeds (Ex. 16:31) which were likened by the Israelites to the manna in the desert.

Cummin (Cuminum cyminum) and dill (Anethum graveolens), like coriander, are members of the parsley family with spicy seeds (Isa. 28:25–27; Matt. 23:23).

Fitches or black cummin (Nigella sativa) is an annual plant with black oily seeds easily damaged in harvesting (Isa. 28:25–27).

Mint (Mentha longifolia), a popular seasoning herb, was tithed by Jewish leaders (Luke 11:42).

Mustard (Brassica nigra) well known for its hot-flavored seeds is referred to by Jesus for having small seeds which grow into a tree (Matt. 13:31–32).

Saffron (Crocus sativus), a yellow powder prepared from the stigmas, is used as a subtle flavor (Song of Sol. 4:14) and also as a food coloring and a medicine.

Frankincense and Myrrh are resins produced by certain trees that grow in dry country in southern Arabia and northern Africa.

Frankincense is a white or colorless resin yielded by several species of Boswellia, chiefly B. sacra, which is a shrub or small tree growing on both sides of the Red Sea. The resin is obtained by cutting the branches and collecting the exuding 'tears' which are burnt as incense in religious rites or as a personal fumigant. In the Bible, frankincense was prescribed for holy incense mixture (Ex. 30:31,34; Luke 1:9). It was also brought by the wise men to the infant Jesus, together with gold and myrrh (Matt. 2:11).

Myrrh is a reddish-colored resin obtained from a spiny shrub, Commiphora myrrha in a similar manner to frankincense. This resin was not usually burnt but dissolved in oil and either eaten or used as a medicine and cosmetically (Ps. 45:8; Matt. 2:11).

Medicinal Plants Many medicinal herbs were gathered from the hills and valleys where the wild plants grew. Local people were well-versed in plant lore, but these common weeds are not specially mentioned in the Bible. Some special imported medicines are referred to. See Frankincense and Myrrh above.

Aloes of the New Testament (Aloe vera) were succulent plants with long swordlike leaves with serrations and erect flower heads up to three feet high imported from Yemen. The bitter pith was used as a medicine and for embalming (John 19:39). In the Old Testament, aloes refers to an expensive fragrant timber obtained from a tropical Indian eaglewood tree (Aquilaria agallocha).

Balm (Gen. 37:25) is a general term for medicinal ointment prepared from resin-bearing plants such as the rockrose Cistus laurifolius, which produces ladanum. The balm of Gilead or opobalsam is yielded by Commiphora gileadensis, a non-spiny shrub of dry country in Southern Arabia and said to have been cultivated by Solomon at En-Gedi near the Dead Sea (Song of Sol. 5:1, "spice"). Gum was imported with balm by the Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25). It is extruded from cut roots of a spiny undershrub (Astragalus tragacanth) grown on dry Iranian hillsides.

Some plants, such as the gourd Citrullus colocynthis, could be medicinal purges in very small quantities but bitter poisons otherwise (2 Kings 4:39–40).

Cereal Grains for Bread Well-to-do citizens made bread primarily from wheat, but the poor man had to make do with coarse barley (2 Kings 4:42; John 6:9). No other cereals were grown, these being the Old Testament "corn." About New Testament times, however, sorghum was introduced. Rice came later still, and maize, not until America was opened up.

Wheat (emmer wheat Triticum dicoccum; bread wheat T. aestivum) is an annual crop which grows about three feet, though the primitive varieties were taller in rich soil, and with bearded ears.

Grains of wheat are hard and dry and easily kept in storehouses as Joseph did in Egypt before the time of famine (Gen. 41:49; KJV "corn"). It was important to retain seed for sowing (Gen. 47:24), but ancient tomb grain will not germinate. See Bread.

Barley (Hordeum vulgare) tolerates poorer soil than wheat, is shorter, has bearded ears, and ripens sooner (Ex. 9:31,32). It was also used for brewing beer and as horse and cattle fodder (1 Kings 4:28). Sometimes barley was eaten roasted as parched grain (Ruth 2:14).

Wheat and barley straw remaining after threshing was used for fuel (Isa. 47:14), and the fine chaff for instant heat in the oven.

Fruits Olive trees (Olea europaea) are small rounded orchard trees with narrow gray-green leaves and small cream-colored flowers in May. The stone fruits ripen toward the end of summer and are pickled in brine either unripe as green olives or ripe as black olives. However, the bulk of the crop was gathered for the sake of the olive oil. See Oil.

Grape vines (Vitis vinifera), grown either in vineyards or singly as shady bowers around houses and courtyards, have long flexible stems with tendrils and lobed leaves. Short flower heads grow among the new leaves in early summer, and the numerous tiny flowers develop into a cluster of round sweet grapes which ripen either as green or black fruits. The fruits are eaten fresh as grapes, or dried and stored as raisins (1 Sam. 30:12). Wine was prepared from the fermented juice. See Wine.

The common fig tree (Ficus carica) has a short stout trunk and thick branches and twigs bearing coarsely lobed rough leaves (Gen. 3:7). Rounded fruits ripen during the summer. These sweet fig fruits have numerous small seeds in their interior cavity. Fresh figs were favored as first fruits (Isa. 28:4; Jer. 24:2). Figs dry very well and were stored as cakes for future use (1 Sam. 25:18; 30:12). Jesus referred to figs and fig trees several times (Matt. 7:16; Luke 21:29–31).

Another kind of fig tree, the sycomore (Ficus sycomorus) grew in Egypt and in the warmer areas of the Holy Land. This large tree usually has low-growing branches such as would have enabled the short Zacchaeus to climb one to see Jesus passing along the streets of Jericho (Luke 19:4).

The juicy fruit of the pomegranate (Punica granatum), about the size of a tennis ball, is full of seeds and sweet pulp. It develops from beautiful scarlet flowers that cover the twiggy bush in spring. Pomegranate bushes were often grown in gardens and beside houses (Deut. 8:8; Song of Sol. 6:11). Moses was instructed to embroider pomegranate fruits on the hem of the priests' robes (Ex. 28:33), and their form ornamented the columns of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 7:18; 2 Chron. 3:16).

Only one palm, the date-palm (Phoenix dactylifera), yielded fruit in biblical times. This very tall tree with a rough unbranched trunk bearing a terminal tuft of huge feather leaves, fruits best in hot conditions of the Dead Sea oases. Hence, Jericho was known as the city of palm trees (Judg. 1:16). The wandering Israelites reached Elim where there were seventy palm trees (Ex. 15:27). The psalmist considered it to be such a fine tree that he compared the righteous flourishing to one (Ps. 92:12). Revelation 7:9 refers to the symbolic use of palm leaves (as "branches") denoting victory, as when Jesus entered Jerusalem and the people strewed the way with leaves (John 12:13).

It is doubtful whether the black mulberry (Morus niger) was present in the Holy Land until New Testament times as it originated in the Caspian Sea region. The only probable reference to it is (as "sycamine") when Jesus spoke of believers having enough faith to destroy one (Luke 17:6)—perhaps because old trees are stout, gnarled, and long-lived.

Another questionable fruit is that referred to as "apple" (Song of Sol. 2:3,5; 7:8), although some versions translate the word as "apricot." Either could be possible, but it is unlikely that fine varieties of apples were available so early.

Nuts Nuts are popularly considered to be hard dry fruits and seeds, as distinct from the more succulent fruits described above.

The most important biblical nut was the almond (Prunus dulcis), which is a small tree with delightful whitish flowers in early spring before the leaves have sprouted. The nuts are well-known today either fresh or as marzipan; the kernel is contained in a very hard thick casing. Almond nuts were carried to Egypt by Joseph's brothers (Gen. 43:11). Aaron's walking stick budded and produced almonds overnight and proved that Aaron was God's man to assist Moses (Num. 17:8). The holy lampstand had cups like almond flowers (Ex. 25:33; 37:19).

The walnut tree (Juglans regia) originated in the Caspian region and may not have been commonly planted in the Eastern Mediterranean region until after the biblical period. However, it is possible that Solomon grew it in his garden (Song of Sol. 6:11). The tree grows to a considerable size. The leaves are compound, and the oily edible nuts look like a miniature brain—hence the ancient name Jovis glans and the scientific adaptation Juglans.

True pistacio nuts (Pistacia vera) also arrived late. The pistache nuts referred to in the Bible (Gen. 43:11 NIV) would be from the native terebinth trees (Pistachia terebinthus, P. atlantica) of the hillsides. One is a small shrubby tree, while the other is as large as an oak. Both yield small round edible fruits.

Vegetables The wandering Israelites longed for vegetables in the desert after they had left Egypt (Num. 11:5). Onions, leeks, and garlic are mentioned, as well as cucumbers and melons. Elsewhere, we read of lentils and other pulses (2 Sam. 17:28; Dan. 1:12).

Onions (Allium cepa) are the bulbs familiar to us nowadays. They are white or purple and grow quickly from seeds in one season. Leeks (Allium porrum) do not form such a distinct bulb. They are cooked, or the leaves were chopped up. Garlic (Allium sativum) is a strongly flavored onion that produces a bulb composed of separate scales.

The cucumbers of biblical Egypt were most likely the snake- or muskmelon Cucumis melo, which has longitudinal lines on its exterior. The melons were the watermelon (Citrullus lanatus) and not the squash or honeydew melon which are of American origin and now widely grown in the Middle East.

Several beans or pulses were grown in biblical times, especially lentils (Lens culinaris) in the more arid areas. The red pottage or soup made of lentils enabled Jacob to obtain Esau's birthright (Gen. 25:29–34). Lentil plants are small and slender with pealike flowers and small flat pods containing two seeds.

Of the other pulses the broad bean (Vicia faba) and the chick pea (Cicer arietinum) were important and may have been the vegetables Daniel and his friends ate in Babylon (Dan. 1:12).

Trees From Genesis to Revelation trees have a special place, both factually and symbolically. We can divide them into groups according to their natural habitats.

1. Trees of dry and desert areas Rainfall is erratic and trees may be restricted to dry water courses where residual water remains.

Several species of acacia (KJV shittim, using the Hebrew word) occur in Sinai. Their timber was used for the construction of the tabernacle, the tent of meeting (Ex. 25). Acacias are usually flat-topped trees which possess strong thorns.

Tamarisk (Tamarix species) is a shrub or small tree with fine branchlets, scale leaves, and pink or white flowers, inhabiting salty places in the desert. Abraham planted one at Beersheba (Gen. 21:33 NIV).

2. Trees of streams, rivers and lakes Water is usually available throughout the year in these habitats.

Oleander (Nerium oleander) is an erect shrub with long, narrow poisonous evergreen leaves and beautiful pink flowers in summer. Although it may be found in stream beds in dry country, it is also in the marshes and streams such as those of Mount Carmel. It may be the "roses" at Jericho and the "roses" planted by the brook (Ecclesiasticus 24:14; 39:13). Even some of the references to willow trees may mean oleanders.

Plane (Platanus orientalis) is a large tree with flaking bark and digitate leaves. Its minute flowers are clustered in several hanging balls. The Plane tree inhabits rocky stream beds. It was one of the rods Jacob peeled (Gen. 30:37; also Ezek. 31:8, KJV, "chesnut").

Poplar (Populus euphratica) is another of the trees Jacob peeled (Gen. 30:37). It grows beside water, especially the rivers Euphrates and Jordan. It is a tall tree with shaking leaves and numerous suckering shoots around its base. The white poplar (P. alba) or the storax (Styrax officinalis) were more likely to be the trees upon the mountains (Hos. 4:13).

Willow (Salix acynophylla) Like poplars, willows root easily in wet places, but they are not as tall and usually have long narrow leaves (Job 40:22; Isa. 44:4; Ezek. 17:5).

3. Trees of hills and plains In biblical times, certainly before the Israelite conquest of Canaan, the hills of the Holy Land were well wooded, while Lebanon was famous for its dense forests. Agriculture, terracing, sheep and goat grazing, and the constant demand for fuel and timber has left little woodland at the present day. Only isolated trees remain in many places. Even the plains between the Mediterranean and the hills were covered with oaks until recent times.

Cypress (Cupressus sempervirens) is a dense coniferous forest tree typically with spreading branches, although often seen as a tall narrow tree planted beside cemeteries. References in the Bible to coniferous trees are confusing, but the cypress is evidently intended in Isaiah 40:20; 60:13, among others.

Cedar (Cedrus libani), the famous cedar of Lebanon, grew in extensive coniferous forests which are now sadly depleted. The stout flat-topped trees provide excellent timber which was used for David's house (2 Sam. 5:11) and Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 5:6–10), as well as the later one (Ezra 3:7).

Oak (Quercus species) trees provide excellent timber for ships (Ezek. 27:6) and other construction, although the evergreen kermes oak often grows no more than a shrub. The deciduous oak still forms woodland on some hills of Palestine, such as Carmel, Naphtali, and Bashan (Isa. 2:13). Oaks were used to mark graves (Gen. 35:8) or as landmarks (1 Sam. 10:3) or for sacrilegious ceremonies (Hos. 4:13).

Pine (Pinus halepensis), especially the Aleppo pine, is a tall coniferous tree with long needle-leaves and cones containing winged seeds. Its timber is workable and used for construction; probably the tree referred to in Isaiah 44:14 (KJV, ash; NRSV, cedar).

Terebinth (Pistacia terebinthus, P. atlantica) produced fruits used as nuts, but the timber of the large oaklike P. atlantica is also useful. The shade of terebinths was used for pagan sacrifices and offerings (Hos. 4:13 NIV).

4. Foreign trees Expeditions brought back rare timbers during the Old Testament period, and, in New Testament times, foreign timbers entered through normal trade routes.

Almug wood, traditionally identified as sandal wood (Pterocarpus santalinus), was imported from Ophir to Judah by Hiram's fleet for Solomon (1 Kings 10:10–11). Whether algum and almug are synonymous is a matter of dispute, since algum is clearly stated to be from Lebanon (2 Chron. 2:8), in which case it could have been the Cilician fir (Abies cilicia) or the Grecian juniper (Juniperus excelsa).

Ezekiel 27:15 links ebony with imported ivory tusks. The black-red ebony of Ancient Egypt was an African leguminous tree Dalbergia melanoxylon, while later the name was transferred to the tropical Asian Diospyros ebenum which has jet black timber.

Thyine wood is timber from the North African sanderac tree (Tetraclinis articulata), a coniferlike cypress, which was used by the Greeks and Romans for cabinetmaking. It is dark, hard, and fragrant (Rev. 18:12). F. Nigel Hepper PLASTER A pasty combination, usually of water, lime, and sand which hardens on drying and is isued for coating walls and ceilings. Mosaic law included regulations for treating homes in which mold or rot appeared in the plaster (Lev. 14:41–

Corner of a room in Pompeii showing the decorative way in which plaster was used in the first century.

48). Writing was easy on a surface of wet plaster (Deut. 27:2–4).

PLATE 1. A shallow vessel from which food is eaten or served. See Pottery. 2. A sheet of metal (Ex. 28:36; Num. 16:38).

PLATTER A large plate. The platter bearing the head of John the Baptist was likely of gold or silver (Matt. 14:8,11 and parallels). Ceramic platters were in common use (Luke 11:39 NAS). See Pottery.

PLAY See Games.

PLEDGE Something given as downpayment on a debt. The Old Testament regulated this practice. An outer garment given in pledge was to be returned before night since it was the only protection the poor had from the cold (Ex. 22:26; Deut. 24:12–13). One was not permitted to take as a pledge what was required for someone to earn a living (Deut. 24:6). Creditors were prohibited from entering a house to seize a pledge (Deut. 24:10). Job denounced abuses in the taking of pledges from family (22:6), from orphans and widows (24:3), as well as the practice of taking children as pledges (24:9). Ezekial warned repeatedly against failing to restore pledges. Amos rebuked those who coupled idolatry with holding garments in pledge (2:8).

PLEIADES (Plēi′ ă dēs) A brilliant grouping of six or seven visible stars located in the shoulder of the constellation Taurus (Job. 9:9; 38:31; Amos 5:8). The derivation of the name has been traced to the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione in Greek mythology, the adjective pleos, suggesting the "fullness" of the cluster, or to the verb pleō (to sail) from the cluster's usefulness in navigation.

PLOW To break up the ground to prepare it for sowing seed. For literal uses of plow, see Agriculture. Biblical writers often appealed to the image of a farmer plowing. Plowing served as an image of sin (Prov. 21:4; Hos. 10:13) and of repentance (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:11). Plowing served as a picture of oppression (Ps. 129:3) and destruction (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12) but also of expectation of reward (1 Cor. 9:10). To plow with another's heifer meant to commit adultery with his wife (Judg. 14:18). To have one's hands on the plow and look back was to have reservations about discipleship (Luke 9:62).

PLUMB LINE A cord with a weight (usually metal or stone) attached to one end. The plumb line would be dangled beside a wall during its construction to assure vertical accuracy. Prophets spoke of the measurement God would use on the nation (Isa. 28:17; Amos 7:7–8). Israel had been built straight, but, because it was out of line, it would be destroyed.

POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM (Pŏch′ ĕ rĕth-Hăz zĕ bā′ ĭm) Personal name signifying an official office, "binder (or hunter) of Gazelles." Head of a family of Solomon's servants included in those returning from Exile (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59). KJV takes "Zebaim" as a place name.

PODS Dry coverings split in the shelling of beans and similar plants. The pods of Luke 15:16 (NAS, NIV, REB, NRSV; husks, KJV; bean pods, TEV) were likely the pods of the carob tree which served as a common feed for livestock. These sweet-tasting pods may reach one foot in length.

POET One who composes poetry or verse. In ancient times, poets passed on the history and wisdom of their cultures. In witnessing to a sophisticated Greek audience at Athens, Paul appealed to poets familiar to his bearers. The line "In him we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17:28) is sometimes attributed to Epimenides of Crete (around 500 B.C.). The line "For we are also his offspring" is traced to the Phaenomena of Arastus (around 310 B.C.) or to Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus.

POETRY "Poetry" calls to mind a Western pattern of balanced lines, regular stress, and rhyme. Hebrew manuscripts do not distinguish poetry from prose in such a clear-cut way. Hebrew poetry has three primary characteristics—parallelism, meter, and the grouping of lines into larger units called stanzas. Parallelism appears as two or three short lines connected in different ways. Meter may be reckoned in various ways. The most straightforward is a word count of the individual parallel lines. Stanzas may be recognized by a change of theme or the presence of a refrain. The distinction in Hebrew between poetry and prose is not so much a difference in kind as a difference in degree. Each of the three elements mentioned may be found to a lesser extent in prose.

One third of the Old Testament is cast in poetry. Poetic sections of the Old Testament are listed below in the order they appear in the Protestant canon.

Parallelism The predominant feature of Hebrew poetry is parallelism. In parallelism, two or three short lines stand in one of three relationships to one another: synonymous, antithetic, or synthetic.

In synonymous parallelism, the succeeding line expresses an identical or nearly identical thought:

My mouth shall speak wisdom;
the meditation of my heart shall be understanding.

Psalm 49:3 (NRSV)

The lines are not synonymous in the sense that they express exactly the same meaning. To the contrary, slight differences color the parallel lines expanding or narrowing the theme brought forward in the first line.

In antithetic parallelism, succeeding lines express opposing thoughts:

The wicked borrow, and do not pay back, but the righteous are generous and keep giving.

Psalm 37:21 (NRSV)

Line two is a positive expression of line one, but the psalmist's choice of words does more than reflect a pair of mirrored images. Each line means something more as it is linked with the other.

In synthetic parallelism, succeeding lines display little or no repetition:

How good and pleasant it is
When brothers live together in unity!

Psalm 133:1 (NIV)

There is no one-to-one correspondence between the word groups. Continuity joins the parallel lines. Synthetic parallel lines may describe an order of events, list characteristics of a person or thing, or simply modify a common theme.

Meter Various methods for determining meter have been developed. Attempts to establish a classical system of meter (iambic feet, for example) have failed. Other theories use letter counts, vowel counts, stress counts, and word counts. The last mentioned is one of the most effective methods. Hebrew word units may be illustrated by the use of hyphens:

As-a-deer longs for-flowing-streams,
So-my-soul longs for-you, God.

Psalm 42:1

This example shows a 3+4 meter. Particles and other words which play minor roles in the syntax of Hebrew are generally excluded from the count. Individual lines range from two to four words each, even though these "words" may be translated as two or three words in English. 3+2 and 2+3 meter is common. Parallel lines may also be 3+3. Groups of three parallel lines may express a 2+2+2 pattern or 3+3+3. Numerous metrical systems are possible. Consequently, Hebrew meter is described in terms of general patterns rather than absolute uniformity. Systems of meter, unlike parallelism, are apparent only in the Hebrew language and not in English translations.

Stanzas Sets of parallel lines are often, but not always, divided into larger units. Such stanzas may be set off by identical lines or by parallel lines expressing similar thoughts. These introductions may take the form of a refrain not unlike a musical refrain. Sections separated in this way may be dissimilar in theme, form, and vocabulary. Psalms 42—43 present a good example of clear-cut stanzas. The two chapters together form a single poem. A refrain is repeated three times: 42:5,11; 43:5. The refrain subdivides the poem into three sections.

Poetry provides imagery and tone for inspired writers to drum God's word home to His people. Awareness of poetic form alerts the reader to listen for the images and moods of a passage.

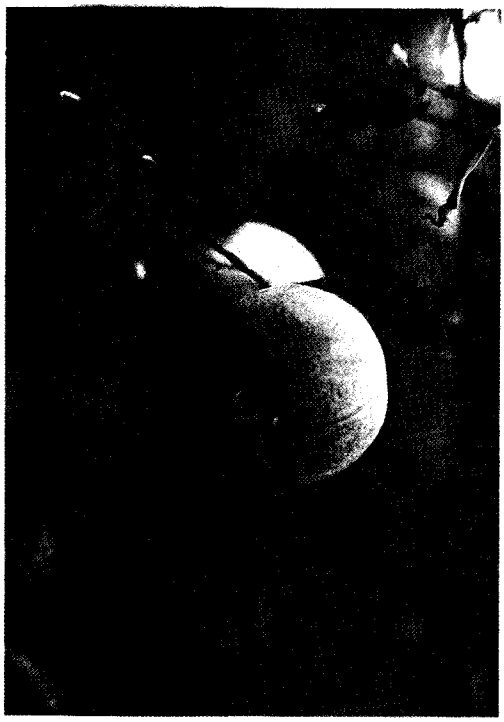
POISON A chemical agent causing ill health or death when in contact with or ingested by an organism. Poison served as a frequent image for wickedness, especially lying speech (Deut. 32:32–33; Job 20:16; Pss. 58:4; 140:3). Poisonous weeds illustrated lawsuits springing up from broken oaths and covenants (Hos. 10:4). In Amos 6:12 poison served as an image of injustice. Poisoned water pictured God's judgment on sin (Jer. 8:14).

POKERETH-HAZZEBAIM (Pō′ kĕ rĕth-Hăz zĕ bā′ ĭm) NIV form of Pochereth-Hazzebaim.

POLICE, POLICEMEN NAS, NRSV used police and policemen to refer to those Roman officials who attended the chief magistrates (Acts 16:35,38). See Lictors.

POLL 1. KJV term for "to cut off" or "to trim" hair (2 Sam. 14:26; Ezek. 44:20; Mic. 1:16). Priests were permitted to poll their hair but not to shave their heads. Polling one's hair could be understood as a sign of mourning. 2. KJV term for "the head," especially that part on which hair grows. To count every male "by their polls" (Num. 1:2; compare 1 Chron. 23:3,24) is to count "heads."



POLL-TAX Tax levied on a person, usually as a prerequisite for voting. NAS used poll-tax sometimes when other translations read either taxes or tribute (Matt. 17:25; 22:17; Mark 12:14). Poll-tax is perhaps misleading. The Roman Empire was not a democracy in which the Jewish people participated by voting. "Head-tax" is the meaning the NAS translators had hoped to convey. See Poll.

POLLUTE See Clean, Cleanness.

POMEGRANATE A small tree, the fruit of which has a thick shell, many seeds, and a red pulp. See Plants in the Bible.

POMMELS KJV term for the bowl-shaped capitals topping the Temple pillars (2 Chron. 4:12–13).

The pomegranate is one of the many fruits found in the Middle East.

POND At Exodus 7:19; 8:5, pond renders the Hebrew agam meaning, "marsh" or "muddy pool." The term is usually translated pool. The Hebrew underlying "ponds for fish" (Isa. 19:10) is rendered grieved (in soul) or sick at heart by modern translations, based on a Hebrew homonym apparently occurring only in this passage.

PONTIUS PILATE See Pilate, Pontius.

PONTUS (Pŏn′ tŭs) A province just south of the Black Sea in Asia Minor. The terrain varies from fertile plains along the shore to rugged mountains farther inland. The Greeks colonized the plains shortly after 700 B.C., but the mountains remained free of their influence. Mithradates founded the kingdom of Pontus in about 302 B.C. and it remained in his dynasty until 63 B.C. when Rome took over. Christianity spread to Pontus early. First Peter was addressed to the elect there (1:2–2). Citizens of Pontus were in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9). See Asia Minor.

POOL A collection of water, natural or artificial. Small pools were commonly seen as a place to collect rain water from the roof which was used for irrigation or drinking. These reservoirs were important sources of water supply in the arid climate of the Middle East.

The following are some of the principal pools

mentioned in Scripture: pool of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:20), upper and lower pools of Gihon (Isa. 7:3; 22:9), old pool (Isa. 22:11), King's pool at Jerusalem (Neh. 2:14), pool of Bethesda (John 5:2,4,7), and pool of Siloam (John 9:7,11). Solomon also made pools to water his nursery (Eccl. 2:6).

Most of the pools near the cities were carved from stone, fed by rainwater channeled into them by channels cut in the rock. Pools were natural meeting places (John 9:7). Pools are also used as an illustration of God's power to transform the barren into something fruitful (Isa. 41:18), judgment (Isa. 42:15), and the beauty of a woman's eyes (Song of Sol. 7:4).

POOR IN SPIRIT Not those who are spiritually poor, that is, lacking in faith or love, but those who have a humble spirit and thus depend on God (Matt. 5:3). Luke's parallel speaks simply of the poor (Luke 6:20). That God has "chosen those who are poor in the eyes of the world to be rich in faith and to possess the kingdom" was regarded as a well-established fact (Jas. 2:5 REB).

POOR, ORPHAN, WIDOW Three groups of people of the lower social classes in need of legal protection from the rich and powerful who sometimes abused them (Job 24:3–4). God's promise of care for the poor, the orphans, and the widows was a tremendous source of hope during times of severe difficulty.

1. Condition and Hope of the Poor The words used to describe the poor have the underlying meaning of "humble, oppressed, needy, weak, dependent." The contexts where these words are used suggest that the poor were those who had been wrongfully oppressed and impoverished (Job 24:14; 29:12; Ps. 10:9; Isa. 3:14); those who begged for food (Deut. 15:7–11; Job 31:16–21); or those who had no economic or social status (2 Sam. 12:1–4; Prov. 14:20; Eccl. 9:13–18). Ideally, there should be no poor people among the covenant people of God because of the blessings of God and the generosity of the people toward those in need (Deut. 15:7–11). In actuality, God's blessings did not always come to His sinful people, and the rich did not always share with the poor. To provide for the poor, God allowed them to glean the remains of the fields and vineyards and harvest the corners (Lev. 19:10; 23:22). If a poor person was forced into slavery, they were to be treated like a hired servant (Lev. 25:39–43). The courts were to see that the poor received just, not favorable or unfavorable treatment (Ex. 23:3,6–7).

The hope of the poor was based on their status before God. Because they were part of the people God redeemed from the slavery of Egypt, they inherited God's blessings of freedom, protection, and a portion of the land (Lev. 25:38,42,55). The Psalms picture God as the refuge and deliverer of the poor (Pss. 12:5; 14:6; 70:5). In some passages, the poor are identified as the righteous (Ps. 14:5–6). The prophets predicted the destruction of Judah and Israel in part because of the oppression of the poor by fellow Israelites (Amos 2:6–8; 4:1–3; 5:10–13; 8:4–6). The prophets encouraged the people to defend the poor and instructed the kings to rule with equity (Prov. 29:7,14; Isa. 1:17; Jer. 22:3). God brought judgment on Sodom (Gen. 18:16—19:29) and on Judah because she did not care for the poor (Ezek. 16:46–50).

Jesus was particularly concerned with the poor. A poor man, He preached a message of good news to the poor (Matt. 11:5; Luke 4:18) and told parables that encouraged generosity toward the poor (Luke 14:13–24). The first Christians provided for the needs of poor widows (Acts 6:1–6), and Paul exerted great effort to collect funds for the poor in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26). This positive attitude toward the poor was not present among all the early believers (Jas. 2:1–6).

2. The Condition and Hope of the Orphan and Widow Among the poor, the orphan and the widow were the most vulnerable. The orphan was a fatherless child (the mother could still be alive), while the widow was husbandless. In both cases, no mature male figure could defend against unscrupulous persons who would wish to defraud these individuals out of their inheritance. Consequently, biblical (and nonbiblical) legal codes provide for the protection of the rights of the orphan and the widow (Ex. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; 24:17–22). The prophets were particularly concerned with the injustice done to the orphan and widow (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 5:28; Mic. 2:9; Mal. 3:5). God declared that He would be a Father to the fatherless and provide justice for the widow (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5).

The New Testament measured true religious character by a person's care for the orphan and the widow (Jas. 1:27). The early Christians cared for the widows (Acts 6:1–8), but Paul limited these provisions because of abuses on the part of some (1 Tim. 5:3–16). Jesus condemned the Pharisees for devouring widows' houses (Matt.

23:40). See Ethics; Family; Fatherless; Humble; Inheritance; Oppressed. Gary V. Smith

PORATHA (Pō rā′ thă) Persian personal name meaning, "bounteous." One of Haman's ten sons (Esth. 9:8).

PORCH In English porch designates a covered entrance to a building, usually having a separate roof. English translations vary greatly in their use of porch for several Hebrew and Greek terms. KJV and NAS used porch freely (41 and 40 times, respectively); NIV and RSV used porch sparingly (2 and 3 times, respectively). The vast majority of Old Testament references concern the "porch" of the Jerusalem Temple as in 1 Kings 6:3,12,19. This reflects a view of a two-room Temple with an attached porch. REB and NRSV translation, "vestibule," reflects a view of a three-room Temple. The terms translated "porch" in Matthew 26:71 and Mark 14:68 can refer to a gateway or forecourt. The "porches" in John 5:2 and Acts 3:11 were likely freestanding porticoes or colonnades. See Arch.

PORPHYRY (Pôr′ phyĭ rĭ) Rock composed of feldspar crystals embedded in a dark red or purple groundmass (Esth. 1:6; KJV, "red marble").

PORPOISE Any of several species of small-toothed whales. See Animals, Badger.

PORTER KJV term for a gate or doorkeeper. Such persons served at city gates (2 Sam. 18:26; 2 Kings 7:10), Temple gates (1 Chron, 9:22,24,26), the doors of private homes (Mark 13:34), and even the gate of a sheepfold (John 10:3). See Doorkeeper.

PORTICO See Arch.

PORTION Allotment, allowance, ration, share. Portion is frequently used in the literal sense of a share in food, clothing, or property as well as in a variety of figurative senses. Wisdom writings often designate one's lot in life as one's portion (Job 20:29; 27:13; Eccl. 9:9). God's chosen people are termed God's portion (Deut. 32:9; Jer. 21:10). The Levites did not receive tribal territory with the other tribes but had the Lord for their special portion (Num. 18:20). To have a portion in the Lord is to share the right of joining the community in worship of God (Josh. 22:25,27; compare Neh. 2:20). The Psalms often speak of the Lord as the portion of the faithful (Pss. 16:5; 73:26; 119:57).

POT See Pottery; Vessels and Utensils.

POTENTATE KJV term in 1 Timothy 6:15 meaning, "ruler" (NIV) or "sovereign" (NAS, NRSV, REB), used as a title for God.

POTIPHAR (Pŏt′ ĭ phär) Personal name meaning, "belonging to the sun." Egyptian captain of the guard who purchased Joseph from the Midianite traders (Gen. 37:36; 39:1). He saw great potential in Joseph's abilities and appointed him as steward over his household. Potiphar's wife tried to seduce Joseph, but he refused her advances. Because of this rejection, she told her husband that Joseph tried to rape her. Potiphar had Joseph thrown in prison.

POTIPHERAH (Pō tĭ phĕr′ ah) A priest in the Egyptian city of On (Heliopolis) where the sun god, Re, was worshiped. Joseph married his daughter, Asenath, at the pharaoh's command (Gen 41:45). Potipherah and Potiphar are the same in Egyptian, leading some to believe that one name was slightly changed in Hebrew to distinguish between the captain of the guard and the priest.

POTSHERD (Pŏt′ shĕrd) Fragment of a baked, clay vessel, "potsherd" (more commonly called a "sherd" by archaeologists) is used in the Old Testament with both a literal and symbolic or figurative meaning. Job used a potsherd (2:8) to scrape the sores that covered his body; the underparts of the mythological monster, Leviathan, are said to be "jagged potsherds" (41:30 NIV). The latter is a particularly arresting image for anyone familiar with the jagged, sharp sherds always encountered in archaeological excavations where clay vessels were in use, as in the Near East.

Isaiah (30:14) used the image of a sherd as a sign of the worthlessness of ancient Judah. The psalmist (22:15) used the image of a dry potsherd as a simile for some physical illness he was experiencing.

Since the Hebrew word translated "potsherd" in the above passages can also mean "earthen vessel" in other contexts (compare Lev. 14:5,50; Num. 5:17), it is not always clear as to which meaning is to be preferred. Such is the case in Proverbs 26:23 where a comparison of the NRSV translation ("earthen vessel") with the KJV ("potsherd") highlights the problem. Elsewhere, textual confusion compounds the problem. In Isaiah 45:9, the Hebrew text literally reads: "a potsherd (or "earthen vessel") with potsherds (or "earthen vessels") of ground." In neither case is the text clear, though the symbolism of the futility of a person striving with God is obviously intended.

Finally, the obscure text in Ezekiel 23:24 assigned Judah the same fate as her sister, Samaria. She would not only drink the cup of wrath but also "gnaw its sherds" (NRSV). See Pottery; Archaeology. John C. H. Laughlin

POTSHERD GATE See East Gate 1.

POTTAGE A thick soup usually made from lentils and vegetables, and spiced with various herbs. Jacob served pottage and bread to the famished Esau in return for the birthright (Gen. 25:29–34). Elisha added meal to a tainted recipe of pottage at Gilgal (2 Kings 4:38–41).

POTTER'S FIELD Tract of land in the Hinnom Valley outside Jerusalem used as a cemetery for pilgrims to the Holy City since the interbiblical era. The field was bought with the money paid for betraying Jesus (Acts 1:18). Matthew 27:3–10 records that the priests bought the field with the money Judas returned. Their reasoning was that the money had been used to bring about bloodshed and could not be returned to the Temple treasury.

POTTERY IN BIBLE TIMES Everyday household utensils whose remains form the basis for modern dating of ancient archaeological remains. Relatively few Bible texts refer to the methods and products of the potter even though the industry formed a vital part of the economic structure of the ancient world. The few statements about the preparation of the clay, "the potter treads clay" (Isa. 41:25), and the potter's failure and success on the wheel (Jer. 18:3–4) hardly hint at the importance and abundance in antiquity of "earthen vessels" (Lev. 6:21; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14), the common collective term for pottery in the Bible. However, the work of the potter in shaping the worthless clay provided the imagery the biblical writers and prophets used in describing God's creative relationship to human beings (Job 10:8,9; Isa. 45:9).

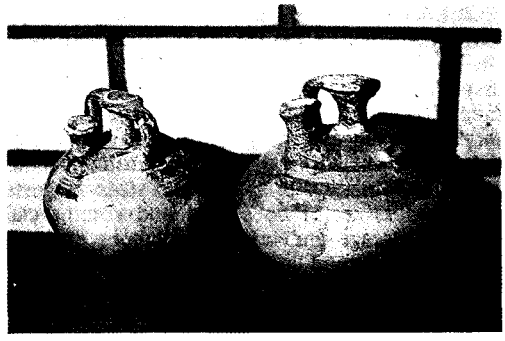
The pottery sherds (Job 2:8), those indestructible remnants of the potters' skill, are recovered in abundance at every archaeological site. They have not only clarified the pottery industries but have also shed light on the migration of peoples, their trade and commerce. They have become the key to establishing a firmer chronological framework for other cultural data, especially in those periods for which few or no written remains are available. This begins in the Neolithic period, before 5000 B.C. when pottery first appeared. See Archaeology; Vessels.

The Bible specifically identifies only two vessels as pottery: earthen pitchers (Lam. 4:2) and earthen bottles (Jer. 19:1), but an additional series of vessels probably came from the potter's workshop: "jar" for water (Gen. 24:14 NRSV); "pot" (Ex. 16:3); "bowl" (Num. 7:85); "bowl" (Judg. 6:38); "vial" (1 Sam. 10:1); "cruse" for oil and "jar" for flour (1 Kings 17:14 NRSV); another type of "jar" (2 Kings 4:2 NRSV); "bowl" and "cup" (Song of Sol. 7:2; Isa. 22:24); "cup" (Isa. 51:17,22); and "cup" and "pitcher" (Jer. 35:5 NRSV). Similar English words represent different Hebrew terms.



Pottery Production Two factors appear to have contributed to the late appearance of fired pottery: (1) early nomads found pottery too cumbersome to transport and (2) a lengthy trial-and-error process in discovering and understanding the firing process.

Clay for the production of pottery may be divided into two types: pure aluminum silicate ("clean" clay) not found in Israel, and aluminum silicate mixed with iron oxides, carbon compounds, and other ingredients (sometimes referred to as "rich" clay). The potter prepared the dry clay by sifting and removing foreign matter, and letting it stand in water to achieve uniform granules. Having achieved the desired texture, the potter mixed it by treading on it or hand-kneading it. Then the potter was ready to shape the vessel.

The earliest pottery from the Neolithic period was handmade. Clay was coiled into the desired shape on a base or stand. These earliest efforts of the potter's trade were coarse and badly fired. Other vessels were hand-shaped from a clay ball. Innovations soon led to refinement of method and technique. During the Chalcolithic and Early Bronze periods (5000–2000 B.C.), turning boards or stones ("tournettes") formed the prototypes of the potter's wheel. A refinement of the wheel came with the production of two horizontal stone disks with corresponding cone and fitting socket lubricated with water or oil. While the lower stone with the socket served as a stationary base, the upper stone allowed for easy, smooth rotation to enhance the quality and productivity of the potter. Extensive use of the wheel came during the Middle Bronze age (about 1900–1550 B.C.), though a few examples have been identified belonging to the Early Bronze age.

The potter rotated the wheel and used both hands to "draw" the moist clay from base to rim into the shape of desired curvature, diameter, and height. The vessel was set aside to dry to a leatherhard consistency. At this point the vessel received its distinctive modifications such as base, handles, projecting decorations, and spout adjustment. Coloration and ornamentation followed with a variety of options such as slips and paint, burnishing, incisions, impressions, and reliefs. A second drying period further reduced water content to about three percent. Then the vessel was fired in an open or closed kiln at temperatures between 450–950 degrees Celsius.

The best wares obviously were achieved at the highest and most consistent temperatures, a result determined by the nature of the kiln. Firing may have begun by accident when people noticed the quality of clay vessels left near or in a fireplace or recovered after a building or town burned. First combustible materials were burned over the pottery in open pits. Later, the pottery appears to have been stacked above the firebox. Ultimately, the need to equalize the distribution of heat led to the closed kiln. The introduction of bellows and forced air firing provided the desirable higher temperatures.

Importance of Pottery Analysis for Historical Studies Each culture produced its own distinctive, durable pottery. That distinctiveness has enabled archaeologists to trace each culture's "fingerprints" through time. The archaeologist can describe the movement of a race from one place to another, the influence of new people in a particular region or area, and the commercial activity of the people. Archaeologists have used changes in pottery forms, shapes, decorations, and materials from one period to the next to establish a relative chronological framework for dating purposes. The type pottery in an excavated layer or strata provides the key for dating, at least in a relative way, all other cultural artifacts and architectural remains within the strata.

Developments in Pottery Production in Palestine The significance of pottery analysis may be highlighted in a general way by recognizing the major developments of pottery production in Palestine throughout biblical history period by period.

1. Neolithic Period (7000–5000 B.C.) Neolithic pottery, the earliest attempts at this important industry, were poorly handmade and badly fired, although some types including bowls and storage jars were decorated elaborately with red slip, burnished, painted (triangular and zigzag lines, herringbone design), and incised (herringbone). Jericho, Sha'ar ha-Golan and other sites in the Jordan Valley have provided the best examples of these early cultural developments.

2. Chalcolithic Period (5000–3000 B.C.) The Ghassulian (in the Jordan Valley) and Beersheba (in the Negev) cultures have provided the best assemblages for this period of pottery advancement. Rope ornamentation on this handmade pottery clearly suggests the practical strengthening of the clay vessels with various rope netting or binding. A wide variety of shapes and sizes suggests the proliferation of household and commercial uses for storage and transport of both dry and liquid products and merchandise.

3. Early Bronze Age (3000–2000 B.C.) This period has been divided into three and possibly four distinct cultural periods on the basis of the distinctive pottery. The first period (EB I) is characterized by grey burnished ware, band-slip ware, and burnished red-slip ware. The second period (EB II) is identified with "Abydos" ware (pitchers and storage jars with burnished red-slips on the lower half and brown-and-black-painted triangles and dots on the upper half), first found in Egyptian royal tombs of the First Dynasty at Abydos in Upper Egypt and most important in the chronological correlation of Egyptian and Palestinian history. The third period (EB III) includes kraters (large storage or mixing bowls), bowls, pitchers, and stands, first identified at khirbet Kerak (Beth Yerak) at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, which has a distinctive combination of highly burnished red and black slip. This culture appears to have originated in eastern Anatolia. The fourth period (EB IV) with innovations may be a cultural continuation of the previous period.

4. Middle Bronze Age (about 2000–1500 B.C.) A transitional phase (first identified MB I, and now mostly EB–MB) resulted from nomadic or seminomadic tribes who destroyed the final phase of EB culture. They produced a distinctive pottery with gobular and cylindrical shapes. These combined hand-shaped bodies and wheel-made necks and out-flared rims. The period introduced the pinching of the rim of a small bowl to produce a four-wicked lamp. The patriarchal period usually is identified with the next period (MB IIa). The pottery reflects the arrival of a highly developed culture that results in a prosperous, urbanized, sedentary population with rich cultural ties to the upper Euphrates region from which Abraham migrated, according to the biblical text. The pottery exhibits excellent workmanship, and in many instances suggests metal prototypes. Possibly the earliest Semitic wheel-made vessels were the beautiful carinated bowls and vessels of this period. Skilled potters, with the advent of the new fast wheel were able to produce elegant new shapes with wide bodies, narrow bases, and flaring rims, all with refined details. During the MB IIb, an unusual group of juglets indicate pottery exchange with Egypt which during this period was politically joined to Syria-Palestine.

5. Late Bronze Age (about 1550–1200 B.C.) This period generally coincides with the vibrant New Kingdom period in Egypt when Palestine primarily was under Egyptian control, a rule that became more concentrated and demanding toward the end of the period. Canaan also maintained extensive trade connections with Aegean and northeastern Mediterranean powers. Cypriot pitchers called "bilbils" and shaped as poppyseed heads (upside-down), were among the most popular Palestinian imports. They may have been used to transport opium in wine or water from Cyprus to other Mediterranean sites.

Clear pottery distinctives again suggest a three period division. The Late Bronze I (about 1550–1400) reflects a continuation of the vitality of the earlier Middle Bronze culture. The pottery of the Late Bronze IIa (about 1400–1300) shows a deterioration of forms and quality during a period of political instability associated with the el-Amarna Period. That deterioration becomes more evident during the Late Bronze IIb (about 1300–1200) as Egypt's Nineteenth Dynasty established a firmer control over the affairs of the economy and urban centers of Canaan. An abundance of Mycenaean and Cypriot pottery throughout the country would seem to suggest a growing commercial interest in the Levant for export and trade.

6. Iron Age (about 1200–587/6 B.C.) The Iron Age basically runs from the conquest of Canaan to the demise of the Judean Kingdom and usually is divided into two distinct periods. The distinguishing elements in pottery and other cultural elements for making the archaeological divisions of this period are not overly clear. Iron Age I (1200–925) pottery from the settlement to the division of the kingdom begins with a continuation of Late Bronze traditions, as Israel borrowed industrial techniques from the local Canaanite population.

The arrival of the Philistines after 1200 B.C. brought a distinctively decorated pottery with Mycenaean shapes and motifs. The deterioration of the quality and design of this pottery tends to reflect the eclectic nature of these "Sea Peoples." By 1000 B.C. the distinctive nature of the pottery in the Philistine plain had basically disappeared.

During the Iron II period (925–587/6), from the division of the United Monarchy to the fall of the Judean Kingdom to the Babylonians, the political separation produced clear distinctions in the regional pottery types, generally known as "Samaria" and "Judean" ware. During most of this period the northern pottery exhibits the higher standard of workmanship. Most prominent in imported ware up to 700 B.C. is the Cypro-Phoenician ware. From 700 to 500 B.C. imports of Assyrian origin resulted in local potters copying Assyrian prototypes.

7. Persian Period (586–330 B.C.) The deterioration of the pottery with inferior clay, firing, and general workmanship appears to reflect the general economy disruption throughout the region, a situation that seems to prevail throughout the Near East. In Palestine a growing number of Greek imports appeared, especially toward the end of the period.

8. Hellenistic Period (330–63 B.C.) While the local pottery was basically crude and uninspired, imported wares include a wide range of luxury items from molded Megarian bowls to impressed and roulette decorated black-glazed and red-glazed ware. The maritime trade connections further are evident, for example, in widespread appearance of Rhodian amorphae.

9. Roman Period (63 B.C.–A.D. 325) Only Herodian pottery is of particular interest for an understanding of the biblical period. Local pottery basically followed earlier traditions with the dominant innovation a ribbing of many vessel surfaces. The most common imported ware is both eastern and western red-glazed terra sigillata, noted for its outstanding finish and general workmanship. The Nabataeans who controlled the trade routes of the Negev/Sinai and the Transjordan produced the finest local varieties, emulating the skills and export products of the Roman potters of the period.

POWER The ability to act or produce an effect; the possession of authority over others. These two aspects of power are often related in Scripture. Because God has revealed His power in the act of creation, He has authority to assign dominion to whomever He wills (Jer. 10:12; 27:5). God revealed His power by miraculously delivering Israel from Egyptian slavery (Ex. 4:21; 9:16; 15:6; 32:11) and in the conquest of Canaan (Ps. 111:6). God's acts are foundational for His claim on Israel. God's power includes not only the power to judge but also the power to forgive sin (Num. 14:15–19; Jer. 32:17–18). 2 Kings 3:15 links the onrush of the power of God with prophecy. Here power approximates God's Spirit (compare Mic. 3:8; Luke 1:35).

Christ's miracles evidenced the power of God at work in His ministry (Matt. 14:2; Mark 5:30; 9:1; Luke 4:36; 5:17). Luke highlighted the role of the Holy Spirit in empowering the ministry of Jesus (Luke 4:14; Acts 10:38) and the ongoing ministry of the church (Acts 1:8; 3:12; 4:7,33; 6:8). Paul stressed the paradox that the cross—what is apparently Jesus' greatest moment of weakness—is the event in which God's power to save is realized (1 Cor. 1:17–18; compare Rom. 1:16). This scandal of God's power revealed in Christ's death continues in God's choice to work through the powerless (1 Cor. 1:26–29; 2:3–4; 2 Cor. 12:9). In some texts, powers refer to angelic powers (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 3:10; Col. 2:15; 1 Pet. 3:22).

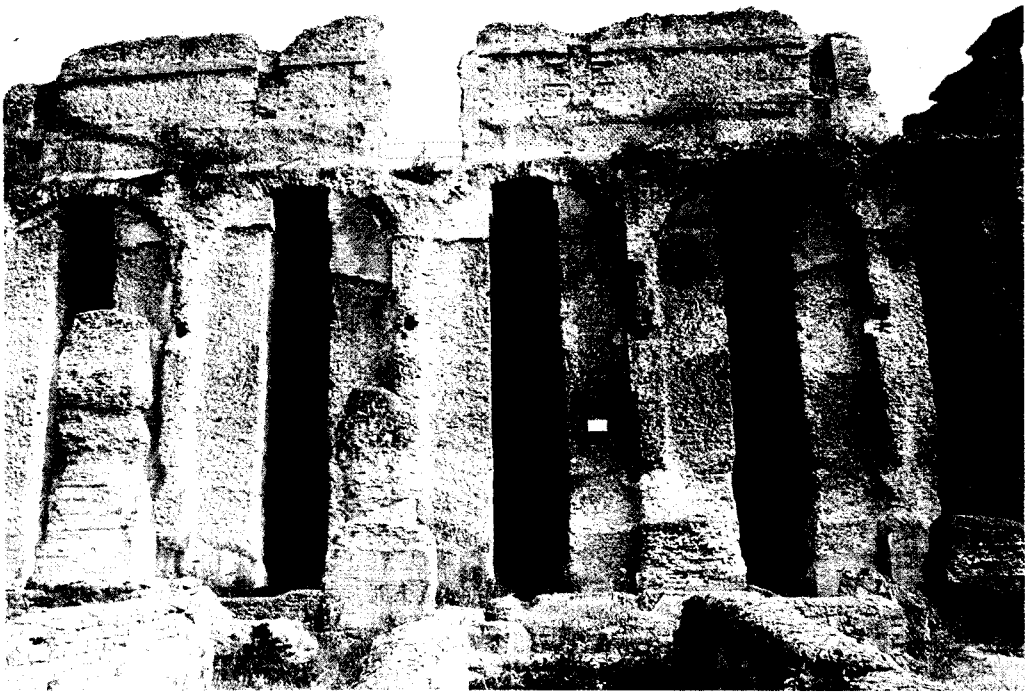
PRAETORIAN GUARD (Prāē tôr' ī an) Roman imperial bodyguard or troops assigned to a Roman provincial governor (Phil. 1:13 NAS, RSV). The underlying Greek (praitōrion) can also refer to the imperial high court. In the Gospels and Acts the term refers to the palace of a provincial governor. See Philippians; Praetorium.

PRAETORIUM (Prae tôr' ĭ um) The barracks where Jesus was taken and mocked by the soldiers before His crucifixion (Mark 15:16). Biblical references allow the building's location next to Herod's palace or beside the Temple complex. It appears that it was the official residence of the Roman governor, which would favor the palace location.

Herod's praetorium in Caesarea (Acts 23:35 NAS, RSV) served as the residence of the Roman govenor Felix. Paul's confidence that his imprisonment had publicized the Christian cause "in the whole praetorium" (Phil. 1:13) can refer to the whole palace (KJV; NAS and RSV margins) or to the praetorian guard. See Praetorian Guard.

PRAISE One of humanity's many responses to God's revelation of Himself. The Bible recognizes that men and women may also be the objects of praise, either from other people (Prov. 27:21; 31:30) or from God Himself (Rom. 2:29), and that angels and the natural world are likewise capable of praising God (Ps. 148). Nevertheless, human praise of God is one of Scripture's major themes.

Praise comes from a Latin word meaning "value" or "price." Thus, to give praise to God is to proclaim His merit or worth. Many terms are used to express this in the Bible, including "glory," "blessing," "thanksgiving," and "hallelujah," the last named being a transliteration of the Hebrew for "Praise the Lord." The Hebrew title of the book of Psalms ("Praises") comes from the same root as "hallelujah" and Psalms 113—118 have been specially designated the "Hallel" ("praise") psalms.



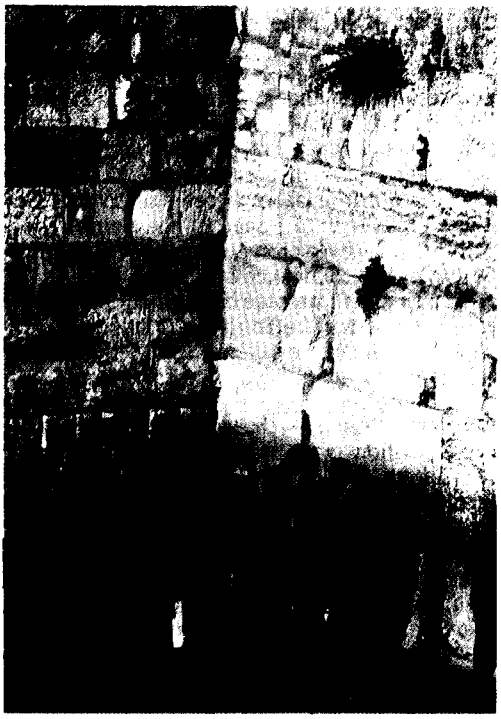
The modes of praise are many, including the offering of sacrifices (Lev. 7:13), physical movement (2 Sam. 6:14), silence and meditation (Ps. 77:11–12), testimony (Ps. 66:16), prayer (Phil. 4:6), and a holy life (1 Pet. 1:3–9). However, praise is almost invariably linked to music, both instrumental (Ps. 150:3–5) and, especially, vocal. Biblical songs of praise range from personal, more or less spontaneous outbursts of thanksgiving for some redemptive act of God (Ex. 15: Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 2; Luke 1:46–55,67–79) to formal psalms and hymns adapted for corporate worship in the Temple (2 Chron. 29:30) and church (Col. 3:16).

While the Bible contains frequent injunctions for people to praise God, there are also occasional warnings about the quality of this praise. Praise is to originate in the heart and not become mere outward show (Matt. 15:8). Corporate praise is to be carried on in an orderly manner (1 Cor. 14:40). Praise is also firmly linked to an individual's everyday life (Amos 5:21–24). See Music; Psalms; Worship. David W. Music

PRAYER in the Bible involves the dialogue between God and people, especially His covenant partners.

Old Testament Israel is a nation born of prayer. Abraham heard God's call (Gen. 12:1–3), and God heard the cries of the Hebrew children (Ex.

A view of the front of the praetorium at the palace of the Roman emperor Hadrian.



3:7). Moses conversed with God (Ex. 3:1—4:17) and interceded for Israel (Ex. 32:11–13; Num. 11:11–15). By prayer Joshua discerned sin in the conquest community (Josh. 7:6–9), but was tricked when he did not discern God's opinion by prayer (Josh. 9). God also spoke to the Judges to deliver His people when the people called out to Him for deliverance. David's spiritual acumen is seen in his prayers of confession (2 Sam. 12:13; Ps. 51). Solomon fulfilled the promises made to David after praying for wisdom (1 Kings 3:5–9) and dedicated the Temple in prayer (1 Kings 8). God worked miracles through the prayers of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:19–22; 18:20–40). The writing prophets noted that genuine prayer calls for accompanying moral and social accountability (Hos. 7:14; Amos 4:4–5). Isaiah's call reflected the intense cleansing and commitment involved in prayer (Isa. 6). Jeremiah's dialogue and intercession frequently voiced reservation and frustration (Jer. 1; 20:7–18), teaching honesty in prayer. The Psalms teach variety and honesty in prayer are permissible; they proclaim praise, ask pardon, seek such things as communion (63), protection (57), vindication (107), and healing (6). Psalm 86 provides an excellent pattern for prayer. Daily patterned prayer becomes very important to exiles denied access to the Temple (Dan. 6:10).

New Testament Jesus' example and teaching inspire prayer. Mark emphasized that Jesus prayed in crucial moments, including the disciples' appointment (3:13), their mission (6:30–32), and the transfiguration (9:2). Jesus displayed a regular and intense prayer life (Matt. 6:5; 14:23; Mark 1:35).Luke taught that Jesus was guided by the Holy Spirit (Luke 3:22; 4:1,14,18; Luke 10:21; Acts 10:38). John reported that Jesus sometimes prayed aloud for the benefit of those present (John 11:41–42). He also reported Jesus' prayer of intercession for the first disciples and future believers (John 17). Both prayers display Jesus' unity with the Father and desire to give Him glory (John 11:4; 17:1).

The Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4) is taught to disciples who realize the kingdom's inbreaking, yet await its full coming. Significantly, the disciples asked Jesus to teach them to pray after watching Him pray (Luke 11:1). The prayer also provides a contrast to hypocritical prayers (Matt. 6:5). Although it is permissible to repeat this prayer, it may be well to remember Jesus was emphasizing how to pray, not what to pray. See Lord's Prayer.

Jesus also corrected some abuses and misunderstandings regarding prayer. (1) Prayer is not to be offered to impress others. Disciples should rather seek a storage closet or a shed and pray in private. Jesus did not reject group prayer, but his warning might apply to a believer who prays to impress a congregation (Matt. 6:5–6). (2) Jesus also prohibited long-winded attempts that try to manipulate Jewish men praying at the Wailing Wall—a point close to the probable site of the ancient Temple.

God. While Jesus prayed for long periods of time (Luke 6:12; Mark 1:35) and repeated Himself (Mark 14:36–42), He called for people to trust their Father and not their own eloquence or fervor.

Jesus' teaching on persistence in prayer is linked to the inbreaking kingdom (Luke 11:5–28; 18:1–8). God is not like the reluctant neighbor, even though Christians may have to wait for answers (Luke 11:13; 18:6–8). The ironies of prayer are evident: God knows our needs, yet we must ask; God is ready to answer, yet we must patiently persist. Children of the kingdom will have their requests heard (Matt. 6:8; 7:7–11; 21:22; John 14:13; 15:7,16; 16:23; compare 1 John 3:22; 5:14; Jas. 1:5), particularly believers gathered in Jesus' name (Matt. 18:19).

In Hebrew thought, the name was mysteriously linked to the person's character and prerogatives. Thus prayer in Jesus' name is prayer that is seeking His will and submissive to His authority (John 14:13; 1 John 5:14).

The church remembered Jesus' teaching regarding the Spirit, prayer, and the kingdom mission. The disciples prayed awaiting the Holy Spirit's outpouring (Acts 1:14). The early church is characterized by prayer (Acts 2:42). They prayed regarding selection of leaders (Acts 1:24; 6:6; 13:3), during persecution (Acts 4:24–30; 12:5,12), and in preparing to heal (Acts 9:40; 28:8). Calling upon God's name—prayer—is the first act and true mark of a believer (Acts 2:21; 9:14,21; 22:16).

Paul's ministry reflected his constant prayer of intercession and thanksgiving (1 Tim. 2:1; Eph 1:16; 5:4; Acts 9:11). The Lord spoke to Paul in prayer (Acts 22:17). Prayer is crucial to continuing in the Christian life (Rom. 12:12). The indwelling Spirit enables a believer to call God "Abba" (Rom. 8:15); that is, the Spirit's work within the believer prompts him or her to address God with the confidence of a child (Rom. 8:14). The Spirit must intercede because our prayers are weak; apart from the Spirit Christians pray without discernment. He takes up our petitions with an earnest pleading beyond words (Rom. 8:26–27; Gal. 4:6).

Answered Prayers—Unanswered Petitions Not every petition is granted. Job's demand for answers from God was eclipsed by the awesome privilege of encountering Him (Job 38—41). Modern believers must also cherish communion with the Father more than their petitions.

Jesus, with His soul sorrowful to the point of death, prayed three times that His cup of suffering might pass, but He was nevertheless submissive to God's will (Matt. 26:38–39,42,45). Both the boldness of the petition to alter God's will and the submission to this "hard" path of suffering are significant.

Paul asked three times for deliverance from his "thorn in the flesh." God's answer to Paul directed him to find comfort in God's sufficient grace. Also God declared that His power is best seen in Paul's weakness (2 Cor. 12:8–9). God gave him the problem to hinder his pride. Ironically, Paul claimed that God gave the problem, and yet he called it a messenger of Satan. Paul learned that petitions are sometimes denied in light of an eventual greater good: God's power displayed in Paul's humility.

Faith is a condition for answered petitions (Mark 11:24). Two extremes must be avoided concerning faith. (1) With Jesus' example in mind we must not think that faith will always cause our wishes to be granted. (2) Also we must not go through the motions of prayer without faith. Believers do not receive what they pray for because they pray from selfish motives (Jas. 4:2–3). Prayers are also hindered by corrupted character (Jas. 4:7) or injured relationships (Matt. 5:23–24).

Theological Insights Dialogue is what is essential to prayer. Prayer makes a difference in what happens (Jas. 4:2). Our understanding of prayer will correspond to our understanding of God. When God is seen as desiring to bless (Jas. 1:5) and sovereignly free to respond to persons (Jonah 3:9), then prayer will be seen as dialogue with God. God will respond when we faithfully pursue this dialogue. Prayer will lead to a greater communion with God and a greater understanding of His will. Randy Hatchett

PREACHING IN THE BIBLE Human presentation through the Holy Spirit's power of God's acts of salvation through Jesus Christ. This proclamation of God's revelation functions as God's chosen instrument for bringing us to salvation by grace, although its message of a crucified Messiah seems to be foolishness to people of worldly wisdom and a scandalous offense to Jews (1 Cor. 1:21–23). True Christian preaching interprets the meaning of God's acts into contemporary contexts. A sermon becomes God's word to us only as God's servant reconstitutes the past realities of the biblical revelation into vital present experience.

Modern orthodox Jews pray in old Jerusalem in similar manner as did the Hebrews of the Old Testament.

Old Testament Traditions The great prophets of the OT heralded God's direct messages against the sins of the people, told of coming judgments, and held out future hope of the great Day of the Lord. God's revelation to families, regularly shared as private instruction (Deut. 11:19), became the foundation of the public reading of the law every seven years to all the people (Deut. 31:9–13). During periods of special revival, natural leaders traveled about sharing the revelation in great assemblies (2 Chron. 15:1–2; 17:7–9; 35:3). Nehemiah 8:7–9 records that Ezra and his associates interpreted the "sense" of what was read in such gatherings.

New Testament Practice Jesus began His ministry in the synagogue by announcing He was the Herald who fulfilled Isaiah's prophecy concerning the preaching of the kingdom and its blessings (Luke 4:16–21). By the time Peter and the other apostles preached, their emphasis focused on the person and work of Christ as the central point of history certifying the presence of God's kingdom on earth today. In the NT, this message concerned a summation of the basic facts about the life, character, death, burial, resurrection, and coming again of Christ. It continues today as the main word of revelation to the world through the church. Although the NT uses some thirty different terms to describe the preaching of John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles, those most commonly used can be grouped under either proclamation (to herald, to evangelize) or doctrine (to teach). Many scholars define these emphases as either gospel preaching (proclaiming salvation in Christ) or pastoral teaching (instructing, admonishing, and exhorting believers in doctrine and life-style). In practice each function melds into the other. Thus, 1 Corinthians 15:1–7 not only represents the "irreducible core" of the gospel message, but it also includes clear doctrinal teaching on the substitutionary atonement and the fulfillment of messianic prophecies. The same passage forms a foundation for the exposition of the extensive doctrine of general resurrection and its Christian dimensions taught in the following verses. Stephen's address in Acts 7:1–53 represents the best of the OT tradition, weaving narrative and historical portions of Scripture together with contemporary interpretation and application to the present situation. Peter's sermon in Acts 2 affirms the atoning nature of Jesus' death and the reality of His resurrection together with a clear call to faith and repentance forming a balanced argument framed around the central proposition that "Jesus Christ is Lord."

Special Perspectives Paul firmly believed that proclaiming the full glory of Christ not only warns men and women of the need for salvation, but that through this preaching believers can grow towards spiritual maturity (Col. 1:28). He wrote that the ministry of God-called leaders equips believers in each local assembly for service through mutual ministries to each other and leads to the healthy upbuilding of Christ's body (Eph. 4:11–16). He defined his content as including "the whole counsel of God" and his practice as being "to Jews and Greeks," and "from house to house," as well as "publicly," and "in all seasons" (Acts 20:17–21).

Homiletics Paul underlined the need for careful attention to principles of communication in preaching. While he refused to adopt some of the cunning word craftiness of the secular rhetoricians of his day (2 Cor. 4:2; 1 Thess. 2:3,5), nevertheless, he adapted his preaching well to a variety of audiences and needs. In the synagogue Paul spoke to Jews about the special dealings God has with His people (Acts 13:16–41); but to the Greek philosophers he presented a living God as a challenge to their love for fresh ideas, quoting from their own writers as he did so (Acts 17:22–31). To Agrippa and Festus, Paul molded the gospel message in lofty and legal terms (Acts 26:2–23). When meeting a charge of apostasy from the Jewish faith, he addressed the people in their own tongue concerning his origins and his experiences in Christ (Acts 21:40—22:21). Paul also counseled young pastor Timothy to work on himself as well as on his doctrine (1 Tim. 4:16). Paul advised the need for diligent practice to improve Timothy's skills in the public reading of the Scriptures and in motivational teaching (1 Tim. 4:13–15). Paul noted that such responsibilities involved "hard labor" (1 Tim. 5:17). Craig Skinner

PREDESTINATION God's work in ordaining salvation for people without their prior knowledge.

Biblical Materials The English noun, predestination, does not occur in the Bible. The Greek verb translated predestinate occurs only four times in two passages of the Bible (Rom. 8:29,30; Eph. 1:5,11). It is used in Acts 4:28 of human determination. The word means to determine before or ordain. On these minimal facts entire systems of doctrine have been built.

The word predestinate (proorizō) is closely related to three other more frequently used biblical words: 1. to determine; 2. to elect; 3. to foreknow. Each of these represents several Greek and Hebrew words. Study of these words shows that for a study of predestination the key passages are Romans 8; Ephesians 1; and 1 Peter 1. One of the appropriate things to notice in this biblical survey is that Acts refers to the purpose of God as determined (Acts 2:23; 11:29; 17:26); refers to Jesus as God's previously chosen One (2:23; 10:41–42); to the early church as those previously taken in hand by God (Acts 22:14). A wise plan is to examine the major passages keeping the verses in Acts in mind.

Romans 8 Although the word predestinate is used only in verses 29 and 30 of this chapter, we must explore the entire chapter to understand the use of the word. Romans 7—8 form Paul's famous battle of the flesh and of the spirit. Romans 7 speaks of the place of law in shaping life. Law makes requirements, but it has no power to help people keep them. Sin is a constant struggle and an overwhelming experience (7:23–24). Romans 8 is life in the Spirit. God's Spirit aids our spirit in the struggles of life and helps us to conquer all things through His Spirit. God purposes for His people a victorious, overcoming life. Such a life is not possible when we go it alone. God chooses and determines that it will be otherwise for His people.

The references to predestination in verses 29 and 30 come in the midst of a section of Scripture on salvation and spiritual struggle. Was Paul saying that all of his experience, before becoming a Christian and after, God decided in such a way that Paul had nothing to do with it and no decision in it? These passages could be seen that way, but they need not be. They also can be seen as the struggle of human willfulness and divine purpose and guidance. I see these passages, especially in the light of Paul's other writings, as a real struggle in which Paul realized that God's purpose for us is good and that God's determination to help us is prior to all of our struggles. In Jesus Christ, God has set the pattern. Believers are to be conformed to the image of Jesus Christ. God's determination is particularly and eternally expressed in what Christ is. He is like what we are supposed to be like. God's Spirit will help us to be like Jesus.

In a discussion of election and predestination, questions about Jacob and Esau (Rom. 9:13) arise, as do questions about God "hardening Pharaoh's heart" (Rom. 9:17–18). These verses could be interpreted to mean that God beforehand had planned things out without any regard for human response. The worst scenario would suggest that God had taken a nice young Egyptian prince and turned him into a monster. Romans 9:13 could mean that God really hated Esau and played favorites among His children. I do not believe this is the proper way to understand these passages. Paul, their human author, is looking back. Interpretations are easier after the fact. Whereas God is no respecter of persons whom He has created, He does not violate the free will He gave to humankind. God works with it. A better interpretation of these passages is to say that God used what Esau and Pharoah had become. Esau, a compulsive man who sought instant gratification of his desires, would not be the kind of person who becomes a patriarch. Pharaoh, a ruthless man, God confirmed and judged as an oppressor; Pharaoh's harsh and cruel acts were punished. In that punishment God received glory to Himself, even out of Pharaoh's disobedience.

Ephesians 1 The first chapter of Ephesians is first and foremost about Jesus Christ. Christ contains, expresses, and effects God's purpose. When people hear the gospel message and believe that message (vv. 13,15), they live on earth under the leadership of Jesus Christ as Head of the body. Such believers are sealed by the Spirit (v. 13); therefore, the power of God working in us can enlarge us, open our eyes, increase our faith, and enable us to believe. Does God do this without our own willing and cooperation, or are we free participants in what God is doing through the believing community under the headship of Christ and in the power of the Spirit? It seems to me that the believers addressed are welcomed to faith and encouraged to believe and enlarge their lives in Christ's church. The specific references in verses 5 and 11 fit in this context if we do not draw them out of place and ask first what it means that we were predestined before the foundation of the world according to God's will. Jesus Christ is first and foremost God's chosen. He is the agent of God's redemptive plan from eternity. Jesus Christ embodies the way, the will, and the good pleasure of God. By Jesus we know the Father; in Him God's will is effected in history. We are included as we are included in Jesus. We are included, predestined, and elected as we believe in Him by the power of the Spirit. God, working His way through us, determines us. Apparently, part of God's determination is that the Ephesians and ourselves should be participants in our limited human way with God in doing God's will. God's will is that people should have a will to exercise toward God. The painful personal experience reflected in Romans 7 and the sinful corporate experiences of human divisions spoken of in the remainder of Ephesians lead us to believe that we can also exercise our wills in refusing to believe in God and in disobeying God. Predestination never eliminates human will.

1 Peter First Peter 1:2 is a part of the greeting of the author to the readers. He greets them and us in the name of the foreknowing Father, the sanctifying Spirit, and the sacrifice of the Son. The greeting is a kind of prelude under which exhortations to Christian living are given. The entire epistle presupposes both the guidance of God and the ability of people to cooperate with God in living the Christian life.

Other Passages Luke 22:22 declares that Jesus died according to the plan of God in which He freely participated. So does Acts 2:23, which adds human wickedness also entered into the betrayal of Jesus. Acts 10:41 assures us that the eyewitness apostles were especially chosen of God. The disciples determined they would provide help to the needy (Acts 11:29). God determined the basic parameters of humanity (Acts 17:26). The gist of these references is that God works according to a plan and purpose and so should we, especially as we determine to do His will.

Two special problems that arise in relation to predestination are the place of Judaism (Rom. 9—11) and of Judas (John 6:70–71) in the determination of God. Paul said that Judaism is God's preparation for the fulness of Christ, that they rejected God's fullest revelation of God in Christ, and that God confronts them with Christ inevitably and ultimately. Meanwhile, the task of the church is to confront all persons with Christ. The purpose of predestination is to be conformed to goodness and to bear witness to God in Christ. Judas was chosen by Jesus as were all of the disciples. As all disciples of Jesus, Judas had the capacity for betrayal—so did Peter. Judas exercised his will to betray. The evil one found in Judas a willing instrument (John 13:27). Jesus had to be betrayed. Judas did not have to do it, but he did.

Later Questions The above basic biblical facts were used to construct later doctrinal systems. Human logic and the desire for systematic conclusions and neat, packaged answers lead to hard solutions about freedom and destiny. Questions which lead to this development were: If God is sovereign, how can humans be free? If God knows about everything in advance, does that mean that He forces things to be the way they are? Does not God give grace to those who are to be saved and withhold it from those who are not? If God decreed that some are to be saved, does this not mean He has predestined others to be damned?

The problem with these later questions is that they go beyond Scripture in their desire to figure everything out. They ignore large portions of Scripture and Christian experience which assume human choice and the integrity of human freedom. In the last analysis, the way in which God's guidance of His creation interfaces with human freedom is unknown to us. I am convinced that God who made us with will and freedom woos us by His grace and condemns people only because of their own willfulness and unbelief. The only alternatives are to suppose that God is going to force all to be saved, whether they want to be or not; or that God, in a choosey way, is going to save some favorites but deliberately withhold salvation from others. I cannot find either of these views consistent with the full range of biblical teaching. Predestination is an assurance of God's redemptive love. There has never been a time, not even before creation, when God has not shown redemptive love for His creation. Whatever else predestination means, it assures us that God takes the initiative in relation to creation and that God pursues us with redemptive love. See Election; Salvation. Bill Hendricks PREEXISTENCE OF SOULS Doctrine that souls exist prior to being joined to a body. Disdain for the material body as evil or disregard for the body as inferior to the soul are common corollaries of this doctrine. Scripture affirms the material body as the good creation of God. Indeed, one does not become a living "soul" apart from the material body (Gen. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:45). Though the Greeks longed to free their souls from the prison of the body, the Hebrews feared separation from the body as the end of personal existence. Thus, Paul hoped not to be an "unclothed" soul, that is, without a body, but one clothed in a spiritual body (2 Cor. 5:41; 1 Cor. 15:44).

Jeremiah 1:5 refers not to the prophet's preexistent soul but to God's foreknowledge of a redemptive plan embracing the ministry of this prophet. The debate in John 9:2 likely concerned the possibility of sins committed in the womb (compare God's choice of Jacob over Esau while they were still in the womb Gen. 25:23; Rom. 9:11–13).

According to Josephus, the Essenes affirmed the preexistence of souls. This claim may stem from Josephus' desire to portray Jewish sects as the counterparts of Greek philosophical schools. Origen (A.D. 185?–254?) derived the doctrine of the preexistence of souls from his understanding of the nature of the soul and held the doctrine to be a necessary corollary of the immortality of souls. The consensus of the early church as evidenced by the Apostle's Creed is that the Christian hope is the resurrection of the body, not the inherent immortality of souls. See Immortality; Resurrection; Soul. Chris Church

PREPARATION DAY Sixth day of week in which Jews prepared life's necessities to avoid work on the sabbath (compare Ex. 20:8–11; Matt. 12:1–14; John 9:14–16). Preparation of food, completing work, and spiritual purification were included. The Hebrew day began and ended at 6 p.m., so the day of preparation extended from 6 p.m. on Thursday until the beginning of the sabbath at 6 p.m. Friday.

The Feast of Passover was immediately followed by the holy convocation of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:1–7). No one worked on either of these holy days, so a day of preparation was set aside to prepare for the holiday period (John 19:14). John explicitly identified the day of preparation as the day of Jesus' execution (John 19:14,31,42) and placed the Last Supper before Passover (John 13:1). The Synoptic Gospels, however, dated the Last Supper on the day of Passover (Matt. 26: 17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7). This apparent contradiction in dating may depend on whether the gospel writers were referring to the preparation day for the sabbath or to the preparation day for the Passover. Steve W. Lemke

PRESENCE OF GOD God's initiative in encountering people. Biblical words for the presence of God usually relate to the "face" of God.

Old Testament Usage During the patriarchal period, God used a variety of means of revelation to communicate with the people (Gen. 15:1; 32:24–30). These are often described as theophanies, appearances of God to humanity. Moses had a close relationship with God. He encountered God in the burning bush and knew God "face to face" (Deut. 34:10). The presence of God was also closely related to the tabernacle, the place for ancient Israel to encounter God in worship. The tabernacle was the place of the Lord's name or glory, a manifestation of God's presence and activity in the world (Ex. 40:34,38). The cloud and fire symbolized the presence of God leading on the journey to Canaan.

Perhaps the primary tangible symbol of God's presence with the people was the ark of the covenant, the container for the tablet of the law and the seat of God's throne. It led the people in the journey to Canaan and into battle (Josh. 3:1–6). The ark was associated with the sanctuary and eventually came to rest in the Temple, the place of the presence of God. Here Isaiah had a powerful vision of the holy God (Isa. 6).

God also manifested Himself in other ways: in fire (1 Kings 18) and in a still small voice (1 Kings 19), both to Elijah. The Psalms speak of God's presence with the worshiping community (Ps. 139) and of the apparent absence of this present God (Ps. 13). In either case, God is still addressed. Ezekiel spoke of the Exile in terms of the glory (presence) of God leaving ancient Israel but then returning at the end of the Exile in Babylon (Ezek. 43:1–5). Much of the Old Testament discussion of the presence of God centers on the fact that God is utterly free to be where God wills but constantly chooses to be with His people to give them life.

New Testament Usage The primary New Testament manifestation of the presence of God is in Jesus Christ, Emmanuel, "God with us" (Matt. 1:23; John 1:14; Heb. 1:1–3). This presence did not end with the death of Christ. The risen Christ appeared to the disciples (John 21:1–14) and to Paul. Through the apostles, Paul and the disciples, Christ's work continued (Acts 1:8; 26:12–18). The Holy Spirit is an important manifestation of the presence of God and continues the redemptive work of God. The return of Christ will bring permanence to the presence of God with His people.

The church is called to be a manifestation of God's presence. That community is fed by the presence of God found in communion between worshiper and God. W. H. Bellinger, Jr.

PRESUMPTION See Pride.

PRICK See Goads.

PRIDE Undue confidence in and attention to one's own skills, accomplishments, state, possessions, or position. Pride is easier to recognize than to define, easier to recognize in others than in oneself. Many biblical words describe this concept, each with its own emphasis. Some of the synonyms for pride include arrogance, presumption, conceit, self-satisfaction, boasting, and high-mindedness. It is the opposite of humility, the proper attitude one should have in relation to God. Pride is rebellion against God because it attributes to self the honor and glory due to God alone. Proud persons do not think it necessary to ask forgiveness because they do not admit their sinful condition. This attitude toward God finds expression in one's attitude toward others, often causing people to have a low estimate of the ability and worth of others and therefore to treat them with either contempt or cruelty. Some have considered pride to be the root and essence of sin. Others consider it to be sin in its final form. In either case, it is a grievous sin.

"Boasting" can be committed only in the presence of other persons (1 John 2:16; Jas. 4:16). "Haughtiness" or "arrogance" measures self as above others (Mark 7:23; Luke 1:51; Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2; Jas. 4:6; 1 Peter 5:5). This word refers primarily to the attitude of one's heart. First Timothy 3:6; 6:4; and 2 Timothy 3:4 use a word literally meaning "to wrap in smoke." It emphasizes the plight of the one who has been blinded by personal pride.

Pride may appear in many forms. Some of the more common are pride of race, spiritual pride, and pride of riches. Jesus denounced pride of race (Luke 3:8). The parable of the Pharisee and the publican was directed at those guilty of spiritual pride, the ones who "trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others" (Luke 18:9). James 1:10 warns the rich against the temptation to be lifted up with pride because of their wealth. Gerald Cowen

PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST That work of Christ in which He offers Himself as the supreme sacrifice for the sins of humankind and continually intercedes on their behalf. See Atonement; Christ; Jesus; High Priest.

PRIESTHOOD OF THE BELIEVER Christian belief that every person has direct access to God without any mediator other than Christ. All religions have developed an intricate system of priesthood, an order of religious professionals who act as mediators between the worshiper and God. The essence of the Christian gospel is that believers have direct access to God because Christ has broken down the barriers (Eph. 2:14–16). This means that the "priesthood of the believer" has become a strong Christian doctrine which developed in two directions: (1) believers can respond directly to the personal activity of God in their lives, through the Holy Spirit and through the written word of Scripture, and do not require a human priest to mediate authoritative communication with God; (2) Christians have become a "holy priesthood" (1 Pet. 2:5) and can minister to one another and to the world. No longer does a professional priesthood have an exclusive channel for holy communication. Any believer can be the channel of God's Spirit and mediate the grace of God in prayer, confession, or witness in particular situations.

The role of Christ as our only priest means that He is the only Mediator between God and the believer (1 Tim. 2:5). The priestly role of Christ is a major theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews (see 4:14–15). Further, this priesthood of Christ is said to be "after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb. 5:6), which means that God appointed Him directly and Jesus did not have to trace His priesthood through the human line of Aaron or Levi. This priestly ministry of Christ is the foundation of the doctrine, because the work of Christ is sufficient for all and His "once for all" sacrifice fulfilled the promise and purpose of the Old Testament priesthood.

Our Gospels record a dramatic event which happened at the very moment Jesus died on the cross. The great veil in the Temple which separated the holy of holies from the rest of the sanctuary was torn asunder from the top to the bottom, suggesting that God Himself opened up the direct access to the holy of holies through the death of Christ.

The priestly ministry of all believers derives directly from Christ, who calls all His followers to share in His priestly ministry. This fulfills Israel's role as a kingdom of priests and a light to the nations. First Peter compares Christian believers to living stones "built into a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (2:5 NIV). Here the emphasis is not upon our coming directly to God without a human priest, but rather upon the priestly function of all believers as they offer "spiritual sacrifices" to God through Jesus Christ. The question immediately arises, "What are these spiritual sacrifices?" Hebrews 13:15–16 lists praise of God in prayer and song, doing good, sharing with others. Any real sacrifice will cost us something; it should be our response in love and gratitude to the One who has given Himself for us.

Romans 12:1 emphasizes another dimension of this priestly ministry of all Christians "I appeal to you therefore, brothers and sisters, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship" (NRSV). The progression in the biblical record of sacrifice is clear. The priests of the old covenant offered the sacrifice of animals upon the altar. Christ, as High Priest, offered His own life upon the altar of the cross. Followers of Christ are called upon to offer their very bodies as a living sacrifice, a day-by-day commitment and service to God, as the truest form of worship. Biblical examples of that ministry include:

(1) We are urged to pray for one another, offering the priestly ministry of intercessory prayer.

(2) We are also urged to confess our sins to one another and to bear one another's burden. The ancient role of the priest was to receive the confession of the people and to convey it to God to receive His forgiveness. All of us have the opportunity at some time to be a special channel of blessing and help to a fellow believer on the journey.

(3) We can bring others to Christ. The ancient role of the priest was to bring people in contact with God. While Christ has come to reveal the Father, it is necessary for us to fulfill the priestly role of bringing people to Jesus in order that they may have access to the Father through Him.

PRIESTS Personnel in charge of sacrifice and offering at worship places, particularly the tabernacle and Temple.

Functions Priesthood in the Old Testament primarily involved sacrificing at the altar and worship in the shrine. Other functions were blessing the people (Num. 6:22–26), determining the will of God (Ex. 28:30), and instructing the people in the law of God (Deut. 31:9–12). This instruction included the application of the laws of cleanness (Lev. 11—15). Some of these functions, like blessing and teaching, would not be reserved for priests alone, but sacrificing and the use of the Urim and Thummim were theirs exclusively. See Urim and Thummim.

If the main characteristic of priesthood was sacrificing, the office is as old as Abel. Noah sacrificed; so did Abraham and the patriarchs. We may say that they were family priests. Jethro, the priest of Midian, brought sacrifices to God and worshiped with Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel (Ex. 18:12). God promised that Israel, if it were faithful, would be a "kingdom of priests, a holy nation" (Ex. 19:6). This may have meant that Israel was called to mediate God's word and work to the world—to be a light to the nations (Isa. 42:6).

Later, when God purposed to establish the nation, He chose Moses to organize the army, to set up a system of judges, to build a house of worship, and to ordain priests to serve therein. The formal priesthood goes with the formal worship of an organized nation of considerable size. On Mount Sinai, God gave Moses instructions to build the tabernacle. On the mount, God told Moses to appoint Aaron and his four sons to serve as priests, that is, to serve at the altar and in the sanctuary (Ex. 28:1,41). Their holy garments are prescribed in detail and their consecration ritual is given in chapters 28 and 29. As to the work of these priests, most of Leviticus and some of Numbers and Deuteronomy give details. Aaron and his descendants of the tribe of Levi served in the tabernacle and Temple as priests. Members of the tribe of Levi not related to Aaron assisted the priests but did not offer sacrifices. Priests were supported by offerings and Levites by tithes (Num. 18:20–24). See Levites; High Priest; Aaron. R. Laird Harris

PRINCE A ruler, one of noble birth and high position; not just the limited sense of a male heir of a sovereign. (Compare Zeph. 1:8 which distinguishes princes and king's sons.) KJV used prince as a title for Israel's king (1 Sam. 13:14), a leading priest (1 Chron. 12:27), a Midianite tribal chief (Num. 25:18), the leading men of a city or province (Gen. 34:2; 1 Kings 20:15; Jer. 34:19), and for rulers in general (Matt. 20:25; 1 Cor. 2:6,8). By extension, prince applies to supernatural beings. "Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9:6), "Prince of life" (Acts 3:15), and "Prince and a Savior" (Acts 5:31) are messianic titles. Daniel 8:25 refers to God as "Prince of princes." Daniel 12:1 gives Michael, the angelic advocate of Israel, the title prince. Satan is often described as "the prince of this world" (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; compare Matt. 9:34; 12:24; Eph. 2:2).

PRINCE OF LIFE The word translated as "prince" (Acts 3:15; 5:31, "author" and "leader" respectively in some modern versions) is also translated as "captain" (Heb. 2:10; "pioneer" or "author" in some modern versions) and "author" (Heb. 12:2; "pioneer" in modern versions). All of these references are to Jesus as the founder of a new life which His followers now share with Him.

PRINCESS Two Hebrew constructions are translated "princess." 1. "Daughter of a king." Solomon's 700 wives were princesses married to seal political ties with their fathers (1 Kings 11:3). Lamentations 1:1 pictures the reversal of Jerusalem's fortune in the image of a princess turned servant. 2. Feminine form of the common word for leader or ruler applied to a king's wife (Ps. 45:13 NIV, NRSV) and to the leading women of Judah (Jer. 43:6 NRSV). See Prince.

PRINCIPALITIES Supernatural spiritual powers, whether good or evil. Principalities were created by and are thus subject to Christ (Col. 1:16). Neither principalities nor any other force can separate a believer from God's love found in Christ (Rom. 8:38).

PRISON GATE KJV designation for a gate in Jerusalem (Neh. 12:39). Modern translations refer to the Gate of the Guard or Guardhouse Gate. The gate is perhaps identical with the Miphkad (Muster) Gate (Neh. 3:31).

PRISON, PRISONERS Any place where persons accused and/or convicted of criminal activity are confined and persons so confined or those captured in war.

Old Testament Imprisonment as a legal punishment is not a feature of ancient law codes. The Mosaic law allowed for a place of custody until the case was decided (Lev. 24:12; Num. 15:34), but beginning only in the Persian period does the Bible mention incarceration as a penalty for breaking the religious law (Ezra. 7:26).

Prisons mentioned in the Old Testament were under the control of the crown. Joseph was put in a royal prison in Egypt (Gen. 39:20), apparently attached to the house of the captain of the guard (40:3). Asa of Judah (2 Chron. 16:10) and Ahab of Israel (1 Kings 22:26–27) made use of prisons, probably associated with the palace. The experience of Jeremiah, however, provides the most interesting glimpses of prisons and prison life. The royal prisons were apparently not large, as the one in which Jeremiah was initially placed was a converted private house (Jer. 37:15). He was confined to an underground dungeon (Jer. 37:16), perhaps a converted cistern. Jeremiah later was placed under house arrest in the "court of the guard" (Jer. 37:20–21). There, he was available for consultation with the king (Jer. 38:14,28), able to conduct business (Jer. 32:2–3,6–12), and able to speak freely (Jer. 38:1–4). Because the latter enraged the princes, Jeremiah was confined for a time to a muddy cistern in the "court of the guard" (Jer. 38:4–13).

Persons were confined in royal prisons for offending the king (Gen. 40:1–3), perhaps by political intrigue. In Israel, prophets were jailed for denouncing royal policy (2 Chron. 16:10), predicting ill of the king (1 Kings 22:26–27), and suspected collaboration with the enemy (Jer. 37:11–15). Political prisoners in Assyrian and Babylonian prisons included former kings of rebellious nations (2 Kings 17:4; 24:15; 25:27; Jer. 52:11). Samson became a prisoner in a Philistine prison (Judg. 16:21). Prisoners of war were usually either killed or enslaved.

The lot of prisoners was pitiable, sometimes consisting of meager rations (1 Kings 22:27) and hard labor (Judg. 16:21). In some cases, prisoners were restrained and tortured by the stocks or collar (2 Chron. 16:10; Jer. 29:26). Jehoiachin was clothed in special prison garments in Babylon (2 Kings 25:29). Prison life became a symbol of oppression and suffering (Ps. 79:11), and release from prison provided a picture of restoration or salvation (Pss. 102:20; 142:7; 146:7; Isa. 61:1; Zech. 9:11–12).

New Testament In New Testament times, persons could be imprisoned for nonpayment of debt (Matt. 5:25–26; Luke 12:58–59), political insurrection and criminal acts (Luke 23:19,25), as well as for certain religious practices (Luke 21:12; Acts 8:3). For some of these offenses, public prisons were also employed (Acts 5:18–19). John the Baptist was arrested for criticizing the king (Luke 3:19–20) and seems to have been held in a royal prison attached to the palace (Mark 6:17–29). Later, Peter was held under heavy security, consisting of chains, multiple guards, and iron doors (Acts 12:5–11).

Paul, who imprisoned others (Acts 8:3; 22:4; 26:10), was often in prison himself (2 Cor. 11:23). His experiences provides the most detail on prisons in the New Testament world. In Philippi, he and Silas were placed under the charge of a lone jailer, who "put them in the innermost cell and fastened their feet in the stocks" (Acts 16:23–24 NRSV). Excavations at Philippi have uncovered a crypt revered by early Christians as the prison and adorned with frescos depicting Paul and Silas in Philippi. If the identification is correct, the crypt's small size eliminates any doubt that when Paul and Silas sang hymns, "the prisoners were listening to them" (Acts 16:25 NRSV). Perhaps the crypt, originally a cistern, served only as the "innermost cell" (Acts 16:24) for maximum security or solitary confinement. In Jerusalem, Paul was held in the barracks of the Roman cohort (Acts 23:16–18). After his transfer to Caesarea, he was confined with some freedom in the headquarters of Roman procurators and was allowed to receive visitors (Acts 23:35; 24:23). As he and other prisoners were transferred to Rome by ship, Paul was again given some freedom (Acts 27:1,3); but when shipwreck became imminent, the soldiers resolved to kill them all lest they should escape (27:42–43). While awaiting trial in Rome, Paul remained under constant guard in a kind of house arrest (28:16–17,30), met his own expenses, and was free to receive visitors and preach the gospel "openly and unhindered" (28:30). Paul considered his imprisonment as for Christ (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; Phil. 1:13–14; Philem. 1, 9).

The situation for prisoners remained dismal in New Testament times, and concern for such persons is a virtue expected by Christ of every disciple (Matt. 25:36,39,43–44). It is Satan who will be imprisoned during the millennium (Rev. 20:1–3,7). Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

PRIZE A prize awarded in an athletic competition. Paul used the image to illustrate the goal of the Christian life (Phil. 3:14; compare 1 Cor. 9:24). The prize is sometimes identified as Paul's heavenly destination. More likely the "upward call" designates the total call to Christian maturity. The larger context uses multiple expressions (know Christ 2:8,10; gain Christ 2:8; know the power of Christ's resurrection; share Christ's suffering and death 2:10) to define the goal of Christian living. Though Paul used a competitive image, he was aware that the righteousness which matters was not the result of his own efforts but is God's gift through faith (3:9).

PROCHORUS (Prŏch′ o rŭs) Personal name meaning, "leader of the chorus (or dance)." One of the seven selected to assist in distribution of food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5).

PROCLAMATION See Kerygma; Preaching in the Bible.

PROCONSUL An office in the Roman system of government. Proconsuls oversaw the administration of civil and military matters in a province. They are responsible to the senate in Rome. The New Testament refers to two proconsuls: Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Acts 13:7 NRSV) and Gallio in Achaia (Acts 18:12 NRSV). Compare Acts 19:38. See Rome.

PROCORUS (Prŏc′ o rŭs) NIV form of Prochorus.

PROCURATOR A Roman military office which developed into a powerful position by New Testament times. They had control over entire countries under the Roman system. The procurator could issue death warrants (a privilege often withheld from subject peoples) and have coins struck in his name. Three procurators are named in the New Testament: Pilate (Matt. 27:2; some question whether Pilate was a procurator), Felix (Acts 23:24), and Festus (Acts 24:27). See Rome.

PRODIGAL SON Popular term used to identify Jesus' parable in Luke 15:11–32. English translations do not use the term prodigal meaning, "reckless" or "wasteful," though they speak of the younger son's wasting or squandering his property (15:13). "The Prodigal Son" is an unfortunate designation for this parable told in defense of Jesus' practice of fellowshipping with sinners (15:1). The parable focuses not on the reckless-then-repentant younger son but on the waiting father who rushes to welcome his child home and calls all, elder brother included, to share the joy of homecoming.

PROFANE To treat that which is holy as common. Profane often approximates defile in meaning. See Clean, Cleanness; Holy.

PROGNOSTICATORS KJV term for those predicting the future by astrology (Isa. 47:13). See Divination and Magic.

PROMISE God's announcement of His plan of salvation and blessing to His people, one of the unifying themes integrating the message and the deeds of the Old and New Testaments.

Promise Embraces Both Declaration and Deed God's promise begins with a declaration by God; it covers God's future plan for not just one race, but all the nations of the earth; and it focuses on the gifts and deeds that God will bestow on a few to benefit the many. We may define God's promise this way: the divine declaration or assurance made at first to Eve, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and then to the whole nation of Israel that: (1) He would be their God, (2) they would be His people, and (3) He would dwell in their midst. The blessing of land and of growth as a nation as well as the call to bless the nations was part of the promise to Abraham. Added to these words of assurance were a series of divine actions in history. These words and deeds of God began to constitute the continuously unfolding divine plan by which all the peoples and nations of the earth would benefit from that day to this.

The Old Testament did not use a specific Hebrew word for promise. It used quite ordinary words to encapsulate the pivotal promise of God: speak, say, swear.

The New Testament, however, does use both the noun promise (51 times) and the verb (11 times).

Promise in these references can denote either the form or the content of those words. They could refer either to the words themselves as promissory notes on which to base one's confidence for the future, or they could refer to the things themselves which were promised. Since God's one promise-plan was made up of many specifications, the plural form of "promises" appears 11 times in the New Testament. Nevertheless, the singular form was greatly predominant.

Varying Formulations of the Promise in the Old Testament In Genesis 1—11, the promise of God is represented by the successive "blessings" announced both in the creative order and on the human family—even in spite of their sin. The promise of blessing therefore, was both introductory to the promise and part of the promise itself.

The Promise and the Patriarchs For the fathers of Israel (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) we may speak of the promise in the singular even though it announced three significant elements. Each of the three elements are incomplete without the support of each other and without being interlocked into one promise-plan.

This triple promise included: (1) the promise of a seed or offspring (an heir; Gen. 12:7; 15:4; 17:16,19; 21:12; 22:16–18; 26:3–4,24; 28:13–14; 35:11–12), (2) the promise of land (an inheritance; Gen. 12:1,7; 13:17; 15:18; 17:8; 24:7; 26:3–5; 28:13,15; 35:12; 48:4; 50:24;) (3) the promise of blessing on all the nations (a heritage of the gospel; Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:17–18; 26:4; 28:14).

To demonstrate the eternality and one-sidedness in the gracious offer of God, only God passed between the pieces in Genesis 15:9–21 thus obligating Himself to fulfill His promises without simultaneously and similarly obligating Abraham and the subsequent beneficiaries of the promise.

The Promise and the Law The promise was eternal, Abraham's descendants had to transmit the promise to subsequent generations until the final Seed, even Jesus the Messiah, came. They had to do more. God expected them to participate personally by faith. Where faith was present, already demands and commands were likewise present. Thus, Abraham obeyed God and left Ur (Gen. 12:1–4) and walked before God in a blameless way (Gen. 17:1). His obedience to God's "requirements," "commands," "decrees," and "laws" (Gen. 26:5 NIV) was exemplary.

The law extended these demands to the entire life of the people all the while presupposing the earlier promises as the very basis, indeed, as the lever by which such demands could be made (Ex. 2:23–25; 6:2–8; 19:3–8; 20:2). The apostle Paul will later ask whether the promises have nullified the law (Rom. 3:31). He answered, "Not at all! Rather, we uphold the law" (Rom. 3:31 NIV).

The Promises and David The monarchy, prematurely founded by the whims of a people who wished to be like the other nations, received a distinctive role through God's promise. A lad taken "from the pasture" (2 Sam. 7:8 NIV) would be given a name equal to "the greatest men of the earth" (2 Sam. 7:9 NIV); indeed, his offspring would be seated at God's "right hand" (Ps. 110:1) and inherit the nations (Ps. 2:8).

The Promise and the New Covenant The new covenant of Jeremiah 31:31–34 both repeats many of the elements and formulas already contained in the previously announced promise-plan of God and adds several new features. The new promise still contains the law of God, only now it will be internalized. It still pledges that God will be their God, and they will be His people. It still declares that He will forgive their sins and remember them no more. However, it also adds that it will no longer be necessary to teach one's neighbor or brother; for everyone, no matter what their station in life, will know the Lord.

In spite of Israel's future loss of its king, its capital, its Temple, and its former glory, God would fulfill His ancient promises by founding new promises on "the former things [foretold] long ago" (Isa. 48:3). He would send His new David, new Temple, new Elijah, new heavens and new earth—but all in continuity with what He had pledged long ago!

The New Testament Enlarges the Ancient Promises The New Testament promises may be gathered into these groups. The first, and most frequent, are the references to God's promises to Abraham about the heir he was to receive, even Jesus Christ (Rom. 4:13–16,20; 9:7–9; 15:8; Gal. 3:16–22; 4:23; Heb. 6:13–17; 7:6; 11:9, 11,17). A second major grouping may be made around David's seed and the sending of Jesus as "a Savior according to promise" (Acts 13:23,32–33; 26:6). Perhaps we should connect with this group the gift of "the promise of life that is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 1:1 NIV), the "promised eternal inheritance" (Heb. 9:15 NIV), and the promise which "he has promised us, eternal life" (1 John 2:25 NRSV). This promise is "what was promised through faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal. 3:22 NRSV).

The third major group is the gift of the Holy Spirit. The promises appear after our Lord's resurrection (Luke 24:49; Acts 2:33,38–39).

There are other subjects related to God's promise: rest (Heb. 4:1); the new covenant with its prospect of an eternal inheritance (Heb. 9:15); the new heavens and new earth (2 Pet. 3:13); the resurrection (Acts 26:6); the blessing of numerous descendants (Heb. 6:14); the emergence of an unshakable kingdom (Heb. 12:28), and Gentiles as recipients of the same promise (Eph. 2:11–13).

The Promise Has Some Notable Differences from Prophecy While much of the promise doctrine is also prophetic in that it relates to the future, there are some notable differences between promise and prophecy. 1. Promises relate to what is good, desirable, and that which blesses and enriches. Prophecy, however, also may contain notes of judgment, destruction, and calamity when people and nations fail to repent. 2. Promises ordinarily implicate the entire human race in their provisions whereas prophecies more typically are aimed at specific nations, cultures, or peoples. 3. Promises deliberately have a continuous fulfillment for generation after generation while prophecies invoke promise when they wish to speak to the distant future. 4. The promise of God is unconditional while most prophecies are conditional and have a suppressed "unless" or "if" you repent attached to their predictions of judgment. Finally, 5. The promise of God embraces many declarations of God ("very great and precious promises," 2 Pet. 1:4), whereas prophecies are usually directed to more specific events and particular individuals.

The promise-plan of God, then, is indeed His own Word and plan, both in His person and His works, to communicate a blessing to Israel and thereby to bless all the nations of the earth.

PROPHECY, PROPHETS Reception and declaration of a word from the Lord through a direct prompting of the Holy Spirit and the human instrument thereof.

Old Testament Three key terms are used of the prophet. Ro'eh and hozeh are translated as "seer." The most important term, nabi, is usually translated "prophet." It probably meant "one who is called to speak."

History Moses, perhaps Israel's greatest leader, was a prophetic prototype (Acts 3:21–24). He appeared with Elijah in the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–8). Israel looked for a prophet like Moses (Deut. 34:10).

Prophets also played a role in the conquest and settlement of the Promised Land. The prophetess Deborah predicted victory, pronounced judgment on doubting Barak, and even identified the right time to attack (Judg. 4:6–7,9,14). Samuel, who led Israel during its transition to monarchy, was a prophet, priest, and judge (1 Sam. 3:20; 7:6,15). He was able to see into the future by vision (3:11–14) and to ask God for thunder and rain (12:18). Samuel led in victory over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7), and God used him to anoint kings. Gad and Nathan served as prophets to the king. Elijah and Elisha offered critique and advice for the kings. The prophets did more than predict the future; their messages called Israel to honor God. Their prophecies were not general principles but specific words corresponding to Israel's historical context.

Similarly the classical or writing prophets were joined to history. Israel's political turmoil provided the context for the writing prophets. The Assyrian rise to power after 750 B.C. furnished the focus of the ministries of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. The Babylonian threat was the background and motive for much of the ministry of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The advent of the Persian Empire in the latter part of the sixth century set the stage for prophets such as Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Thus the prophets spoke for God throughout Israel's history.

The prophets influenced almost every institution of Israel, despite the fact that they were often viewed with contempt: they were locked up (Jer. 37), ignored (Isa. 6:9–13), and persecuted (1 Kings 19:1–2). In addition to serving judges and kings, the prophets also addressed Israel's worship. They criticized vain worship (Amos 5:23–24) and priestly failures (Amos 7:10; Mal. 2). The word of the Lord was also spoken in worship (Pss. 50:5; 60:6; 81:6–10; 91:14–16; 95:8–11). The prophets' call to covenant faithfulness revealed an awareness of the law (Isa. 58:6–9; Ezek. 18; Mic. 6:6–8; Hos. 6:6; Amos 2:4; 5:21–24).

Prophets formed guilds or schools (2 Kings 4:38; 1 Sam. 10:5; 19:20). While most references to prophetic schools belong to the period of the monarchy, there is some evidence to believe the schools continued (Jer. 23:13–14). The mere existence of the books of prophecy is probably due in part to the prophets' helpers (Jer. 36:4). Perhaps their words were recorded because they provided a moral challenge to the entire nation and not merely to a king or individual. Surely once the prophet's words were written, they were not ignored but continually studied and reapplied.

The Experience of the Prophet Prophets generally shared several key experiences and characteristics. (1) An essential mark of a prophet was a call from God. Attempting to prophesy without such a commission was false prophecy (Jer. 14:14). The prophets were at times allowed to see into the throne room or heavenly court (Isa. 6:1–7; 1 Kings 22:19–23; Jer. 23:18–22; compare Amos 3:7; Job 1:6–12; 2:1–6; 2 Cor. 12:1–4; Rev. 1:1–3; 22:18–19). (2) Prophets received a word from God through many means—direct declarations, visions, dreams, or an appearance of God. The great variety in prophetic experience prohibits any oversimplification; ecstatic experiences were not mandatory for receiving God's word. (3) Prophets spoke the word of God. They were primarily spokespersons who called His people to obedience by appealing to Israel's past and future. For example, God's past blessing and future judgment should provoke social justice and mercy for the disadvantaged. (4) Prophets relayed God's message by deed as well as by word. They worked symbolic acts which served as dramatic, living parables. Hosea's marriage taught about God's relationship with Israel (Hos. 2:1–13; see also Isa. 20:1–3; Ezek. 4:1–3; Jer. 19:10–11). (5) The prophets also performed miracles which confirmed their message. While some prophets like Moses (Ex. 4:1–9) and Elijah (1 Kings 17) worked many miracles, virtually all prophets occasionally saw a miraculous fulfillment of God's word (Isa. 38:8). This miracle-working capacity also included healing (1 Kings 17:17–22; 2 Kings 5; Matt. 12:22–29). (6) Prophets also conveyed the word of God by writing (Isa. 8:1; Ezek. 43:11). (7) Prophets were to minister to their people. They were to test God's peoples' lives (Jer. 6:27) and be watchmen for moral compromise (Ezek. 3:17). Particularly important was the role of intercessor—sometimes even for the prophet's enemy (1 Kings 13:6; 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:18–37; Amos 7:2; Jer. 14:17–20,21; Isa. 59:16). (8) Throughout Israel's history genuine prophets had ecstatic experiences.

False Prophets Distinguishing between false and true prophets was very difficult, though several tests of authenticity emerge in the Old Testament. The true prophet must be loyal to the biblical faith directing one to worship Yahweh alone (Deut. 13:1–3). A second test required that the words of a true prophet be fulfilled (Deut. 18:22; Jer. 42:1–6; Ezek. 33:30–33). We must remember that this is a difficult test to apply. There were often long lapses between predictions and fulfillment (Mic. 3:12; Jer. 26:16–19). Some predictions seemed very unlikely, and others were conditional—based upon the hearer's response (Jonah 3:4–5). Furthermore, prophets could behave inappropriately (Num. 12:1–2; 20:1–12; Jer. 15:19–21; 38:24–27). Prophets appeared ambivalent at times when simply delivering the word of God as it was given (2 Kings 20:1–6). Also one could predict correctly while not being loyal to Yahweh (Deut. 13:1–3). Accurate prediction was not a final test. Other tests included agreement with previous prophets' words (Jer. 28:8), good character (Mic. 3:11), and a willingness to suffer because of faithfulness (1 Kings 22:27–28; Jer. 38:3–13). Similarly, the New Testament believers had to distinguish true prophecy (1 John 4:1; 1 Cor. 14:29). See False Prophet.

Hints for Interpretation Prophets intended to evoke faith by proclamation, not merely to predict the future. Thus reading the prophets with a lustful curiosity is inappropriate. Our primary desire must be to know God, not just the facts of the future.

The interpreter must remember the limited perspective of the prophet. The prophets were not all-knowing but all-telling—that is they told what God had told them to tell. Prophecy has a progressive character. One must seek to read prophecy in light of its whole, deriving partial insight from different prophets. Prophecy must also be read in its historical context. Particular attention must be paid to the intention of the prophet. For example, a prophet may rebuke another country to offer assistance to Israel (Isa. 46—47), make Israel examine its own conduct (Amos 1—2), or to bring a nation to repentance (Jonah 3:4,8–9).

Caution must be exercised when reading predictive prophecy because prophecy often has more than one fulfillment. Many prophecies have an immediate application to their own situation and are also applicable to another context. Thus the prediction that Christ is born of a virgin (Matt. 1:23) also had a fulfillment in Isaiah's day (Isa. 8:3). Similarly prophecies of "the day of the Lord" had several fulfillments (partial) which also foreshadowed a final fulfillment (Obad. 15; Joel 1:15; 2:1; Zeph. 1:7,14; Ezek. 30:3; compare 2 Pet. 3:10).

Modern evangelicals understand predictive prophecies in several ways. (1) Some prophecies seem to have a direct, literal fulfillment: the Messiah was to be born in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:5–6; Mic. 5:2). (2) Not all predictions were fulfilled literally. Jesus taught that the prediction about Elijah's return was fulfilled by John the Baptist and not a literal Elijah (Matt. 11:13–15; Mal. 3:1–4). Similarly, Paul applied prophecies about literal, national Israel to the church (Rom. 9:25–26; Hos. 1:9–10, 2:23). The literal father of Israel, Abraham, was seen to be the father of the believing church (Rom. 4:11,16; Gal. 3:7). This distinctively Christian reading was thought to be legitimate because of Christ's fulfillment and interpretation of the Old Testament (Luke 4:17–21). (3) This Christian reading of the Old Testament often takes the form of typological interpretation. The New Testament authors believed Old Testament events, persons, or things foreshadowed the later Christian story. Thus, they used the images of the Old Testament to understand the New Testament realities. Christ can be compared to Adam (1 Cor. 15:22–23; see 10:11). (4) Some readers believe that Old Testament words take on a "fuller sense" or meaning. Old Testament expressions may have a divine significance, unforeseen by the Old Testament author, which comes to light only after God's later word or deed. See Typology.

New Testament The word prophētēs means "to speak before" or "to speak for." Thus it refers to one who speaks for God or Christ. Prophets were also called pneumatics (pneumatikos), "spiritual ones" (1 Cor. 14:37). The prophets played a foundational role in the early church (1 Cor. 12:28–31; Eph. 4:11; 2:20). Due to the presumed prophetic silence in the time between the Testaments, the coming of Jesus is seen as an inbreaking of the Spirit's work especially visible in prophecy. For example, in Luke the angel's visitation and prediction (1:11,26–27) provoked Mary and Zecharias to prophesy (1:46–67; 67–79). After an angelic visitation to the shepherds, the prophet and prophetess declared Jesus to be the redemption Israel awaited (2:10–12,25,36–38). John the Baptist also predicted that Jesus would baptize in the Spirit (Matt. 3:11).

Jesus called Himself a prophet (Luke 13:33). His miracles and discernment were rightly understood as prophetic (John 4:19). He taught not by citing expert rabbis, but with His own prophetic authority (Mark 1:22; Luke 4:24).

The early believers saw the outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2:17) as a fulfillment of Joel's prediction that all God's people, young and old, male and female, would prophesy. These gifts may intensify at the end of time as will evil. While any Christian might occasionally receive a prophecy, some seem to have a special gift of prophecy (1 Cor. 12:29; 13:2). Prophets function primarily in the worship of the church (Acts 13:2). They predict (Acts 11:28; 20:23; 27:22–26), announce judgments (Acts 13:11; 28:25–28), act symbolically (Acts 21:10–11), and receive visions (Acts 9:10–11; 2 Cor. 12:1). Prophetic insights led to missionary efforts (Acts 13:1–3; 10:10–17; 15:28,32). While teaching and prophecy are different, they also can be related (Acts 13:1–2; Rev. 2:20). Some prophets "preached" lengthy messages (Acts 15:32) and gave exposition to biblical texts (Luke 1:67–79; Eph. 3:5; Rom. 11:25–36).

The prophets used phrases such as "the Lord says" or "the Holy Spirit says" as introductory formulas for prophetic insight into the future (Acts 21:11), or for inspired adaptation of an Old Testament text (Heb. 3:7).

New Testament prophecy was limited (1 Cor. 13:9); it was to be evaluated by the congregation (1 Cor. 14:29; 1 Thess. 5:20–21). One may even respond inappropriately to prophecy (Acts 21:12). The supreme test for prophecy is loyalty to Christ (1 Cor. 12:3; Rev. 19:10). Some Christians have the gift of discernment (1 Cor. 12:10). Jesus said prophets could be known by their fruit (Matt. 7:15–20). Paul demanded orderly, Christ-honoring, upbuilding prophecy which submits to apostolic authority (1 Cor. 14:26–40). Thus prophecy is not without restraint. Circumstance may even demand that the dress of men and women prophets be stipulated (1 Cor. 11:5–7). Prophecy outside of apostolic authority can be safely ignored; thus prophecy is not a threat to Scripture's special authority (1 Cor. 14:38–39; 2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20–21). Randy Hatchett

PROPHETESS 1. Female prophet; women serving as God's spokesperson. Five women are explicitly identified as prophetesses: Miriam (Ex. 15:20); Deborah (Judg. 4:4); Huldah (2 Kings 22:14); Noadiah, a "false" prophetess (Neh. 6:14); and Anna (Luke 2:36). Jezebel claimed tc be a prophetess (Rev. 2:20). The ministries of prophetesses varied greatly. Miriam called upon Israel to celebrate God's deliverance. Deborah combined the offices of prophetess and judge, even accompanying Barak into battle. Huldah spoke God's words of judgment (2 Kings 22:16–17) and forgiveness (22:18–20) to King Josiah. Anna shared the good news of Jesus' birth with the Temple crowds. The false prophetess Noadiah sought to frighten Nehemiah. Jezebel attempted to involve the church of Thyatira in idolatry.

The prophet Joel anticipated a time when all God's people, "male servants and female servants," would be filled with God's Spirit and prophesy (Joel 2:28–29). This prophetic hope was fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2:17–18) and in the ongoing life of the early church (Acts 21:9). Paul encouraged all believers to desire to prophesy (1 Cor. 14:1), that is, to offer speech which builds up the church (14:5). First Corinthians 11:5 presumes women were involved in prophesying and prayer in public worship. 2. The wife of a prophet (Isa. 8:3). See Prophet.

PROPITIATION (Prō′ pĭ tĭ ā tĭōn) See Expiation.

PROSELYTES Converts to a religion; non-Jews who accepted the Jewish faith and completed the rituals to become Jews. The New Testament attests to the zeal of the first century Pharisees in proselytizing Gentiles (Matt. 23:15). The success of the Jewish missionary efforts is indicated by synagogue and grave inscriptions referring to proselytes and by Roman and Jewish literary references. Tacitus (History V.5) complains, for example, that proselytes despised the gods, disdained their kindred, and abjured their fatherland.

Gentiles were impressed by three features of Judaism. First, the concept of one God who created, sustains, and rules all things was clearly superior to polytheistic views. Second, Judaism stressed a life-style of moral responsibility with its monotheism; and third, it was a religion of ancient and stable tradition in contrast to the faddish cults of the time.

Proselytes usually embraced Judaism gradually because much needed to be learned, such as the proper observance of the sabbath and the careful following of the dietary rules, before one could win acceptance into the Jewish community. Persons attracted to Judaism and keeping the sabbath and food laws were termed fearers or worshipers of God. These terms appear in the New Testament where Cornelius (Acts 10:1–2), and Lydia (Acts 16:14) are so described (see also John 12:20; Acts 17:4; 18:4).

Many God fearers went on to become proselytes or fully accepted and integrated members of the Jewish community. This involved fulfilling the Jewish demands of circumcision (males) which related one to the covenant (see Gal. 5:3), baptism (males and females) which made one ritually clean, and an offering (males and females) in the Jerusalem Temple which atoned for sin.

PROSTITUTION The trading of sexual services for pay. It is the result of a double standard whereby men insist on the sexual purity of their wives and daughters, while desiring access to other women. This dynamic is seen clearly in Genesis 38. Judah, thinking that his daughter-in-law Tamar was a prostitute, had intercourse with her; but upon hearing that she was pregnant as the result of "playing the harlot," he demanded that she be burned. Hosea criticized the attitude which called for the punishment of prostitutes (and women committing adultery), while tolerating the men with whom these acts were committed (Hos 4:14). Because of this double standard, the prostitute or harlot, as she is also called, has had an ambiguous status in society. She was tolerated in ancient Israel—as long as she was not married—but her profession was not socially acceptable. The children of harlots suffered from social biases against them (Judg. 11:2).

Although the Old Testament records no laws prohibiting men from visiting prostitutes and making use of their services, there are strong counsels against such behavior (Prov. 23:27–28; 29:3). The apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus gives similar warnings (9:3–9; 19:2).

The Holiness Code prohibited Israelite fathers from turning their daughters into prostitutes (Lev. 19:29), which might have been a temptation during times when poverty was widespread. It may be that most prostitutes in Israel were foreign or Canaanite women. That would help explain why the Book of Proverbs speaks of the harlot literally as a "strange" and "foreign" woman (translated in the RSV as "loose woman," "evil woman") (Prov. 2:16; 5:3; 6:24).

Jesus told the religious leaders of His day that harlots would go into the kingdom before they would (Matt. 21:31), not because He condoned prostitution, but because harlots did not have the self-righteousness which kept the religious leaders from repentance. Paul reminded Corinthian Christians that their bodies were the temple of the Holy Spirit; therefore, they should refrain from immorality, including sexual relations with prostitutes (1 Cor. 6:15–20).

The term "cult prostitution" is frequently used to refer to certain practices in Canaanite fertility cults, including the cult of Baal. See Fertility Cult. This practice and the beliefs on which it was based were incompatible with monotheism and with the nature of Israel's God. The terms kadash (masc.) and kedeshah (fem.), from the word meaning "holy," are generally translated "cult prostitute" (or "sodomite"). The masculine term is probably also used in a generic sense to refer to both male and female cult prostitutes. Such prosti-tutes functioned in the Temple in Jerusalem at various times in Israel's history and were removed during periods of religious reform (1 Kings 14:24, 15:12, 22:46; 2 Kings 23:7). Cult prostitution is outlawed by the Deuteronomic law code (Deut. 23:17–18).

The presence of both "secular" and "cult prostitutes" provided the prophets with a powerful metaphor for the unfaithfulness of the people toward God. The covenant was imaged as a marriage between the Lord and the people; their continual interest in other gods, especially Baal, was seen as a form of harlotry. This idea is graphically presented in Ezekiel 16 (compare Ezek. 23). Because the Lord's bride has become a harlot, she will be punished as a harlot. Hosea also attacked the Israelite attraction to the fertility religion of Canaan as harlotry. He felt called of God to marry a harlot (Hos 1:2), a symbolic action (or object lesson) representing God's relationship with Israel. Hosea's love for his unfaithful and harlotrous wife was analogous to God's love for unfaithful Israel.

The Book of Revelation applies the image of harlot to Rome, which is likened to a woman in scarlet and jewels, to whom the kings of the earth go (Rev. 17:1–6). Wilda W. Morris PROVENDER (Prŏv ĕn dĕr) Grains and grasses used as animal feed (Isa. 30:24 KJV, RSV). Other translations use fodder or silage.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF The Book of Proverbs contains the essence of Israel's wisdom. It provides a godly worldview and offers insight for living. Proverbs 1:7 provides the perspective for understanding all the proverbs: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge; fools despise wisdom and instruction." "Fear of the Lord" is biblical shorthand for an entire life in love, worship, and obedience to God.

Date and Composition Though the title of Proverbs (1:1) seems to ascribe the entire book to Solomon, closer inspection reveals that the book is composed of parts and that it was formed over a period of several hundred years. It is difficult to know precisely the role Solomon and his court may have had in starting the process which culminated in the Book of Proverbs. This process may be compared to the way psalms of Davidic authorship eventually led to the Book of Psalms. In Israel, wisdom was considered Solomonic almost by definition (see articles on Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes, as well as the apochryphal work, Wisdom of Solomon). Thus the titles in 1:1 and 10:1 are not strictly statements of authorship in the modern sense.

That Proverbs is a collection of collections which grew over time is best seen from its variety of content and from its titles. These titles introduce the book's major subcollections, and are found in 1:1; 10:1; 22:17 ("words of the wise"); 24:23; 25:1; 30:1; 31:1. For dating, 25:1 places the copying or editing of chapters 25—29 in the court of Hezekiah, thus about 700 B.C., some 250 years after Solomon. The process of compilation probably extended into the postexilic period.

Because wisdom writings have almost no historical references, they are very difficult to date. Most scholars place chapters 10—29 sometime in the period of kings. Chapters 1—9 are in a different genre (see below) from the Solomonic sayings of chapters 10:1—22:16, and their date is disputed. Some say it may be as early as Solomon. Others say it is postexilic, that chapters 1—9 were added to 10—29 to give later readers a context from which to understand the short sayings in the latter chapters. The date of chapters 30—31 is also uncertain. One scholar has argued there is a play on the Greek word for wisdom (sophia) in 31:27. This would date chapter 31 after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C.

Literary Character and Forms The Book of Proverbs uses a variety of wisdom forms or genres. The Hebrew word for proverb (mashal), found in the book's title, can refer to a variety of literary forms beside the proverb: prophetic "discourse" (Num. 23:7,18), "allegory" (Ezek. 17:2; 24:3), "taunt song" (Mic. 2:4). Different sections of the book specialize in characteristic forms. Long wisdom poems, which scholars call "Instructions" after their Egyptian counterpart, dominate 1:8—9:18. These usually begin with a direct address to "son/children" and contain imperatives or prohibitions, motive clauses (reasons for actions), and sometimes narrative development (7:6–23). The setting of these instructions may be a school for young aristocrats. This section also contains public speeches by personified Wisdom (1:20–33; 8:1–36; 9:1–6).

"Sayings" which express wise insights about reality are the primary forms in 10:1—22:16 and 25:1—29:27. Sayings are characterized by extreme brevity. In Hebrew they usually have two lines with only six to eight words, in contrast to their much longer English translations. These sayings may simply "tell it like it is," and let readers draw their own conclusions (11:24; 17:27–28; 18:16). They can also make clear value judgments (10:17; 14:31; 15:33; 19:17). Mostly "antithetical sayings" which contrast opposites appear in 10:1—15:33, but mixed in are a few "better—than" sayings ("Better is a dinner with herbs where love is than a fatted ox and hatred with it," 15:17; compare v. 16) which are also scattered in other sections (16:8,19; 17:1; 19:1; 21:9; 25:24; 27:5,10b; 28:6). The section 25:1—25:27 is especially rich in comparative proverbs which set two things beside one another for comparison: "Like cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country" (25:25; compare 25:12,13,14,26,28; 26:1–3,6–11,14,20 among others). Such sayings also occur elsewhere, "Like a gold ring in a swine's snout is a beautiful woman without discretion" (11:22).

"Admonitions" characterize 22:17—24:22. Borrowing from Egyptian wisdom marks this section. These short wisdom forms contain imperatives or prohibitions, usually followed by a motive clause which gives a reason or two for doing that which is being urged: "Do not remove an ancient landmark or enter the fields of the fatherless; for their Redeemer is strong; he will plead their cause against you" (23:10–11). Admonitions are a shorter relative of the instruction.

The words of Agur (ch. 30) specializes in numerical sayings (30:15–31). The epilogue of the book (31:10–31) presents an alphabetic poem on wisdom embodied in the "valiant woman." This brief sketch of wisdom forms presents only the basic types. Even within the types here presented, a great deal of subtle variation occurs.

Themes and Worldview In spite of being a collection of collections, Proverbs displays a unified, richly complex worldview. Proverbs 1–9 introduces this worldview and lays out its main themes. The short sayings of Proverbs 10—31 are to be understood in light of the first nine chapters.

The beginning and end of wisdom is to fear God and avoid evil (1:7; 8:13; 9:10; 15:33). The world is a battleground between wisdom and folly, righteousness and wickedness, good and evil. This conflict is personified in Lady Wisdom (1:20–33; 4:5–9; 8; 9:1–6) and Harlot Folly (5:1–6; 6:24–35; 7; 9:13–18). Both "women" offer love and invite simple young men (like those in the royal school) to their homes to sample their wares. Wisdom's invitation is to life (8:34–36); the seduction of Folly leads to death (5:4–6; 7:22–27; 9:18).

Mysteriously, Lady Wisdom speaks in public places, offering wisdom to everyone who will listen (1:20–22; 8:1–5; 9:3). Wisdom does not hide, but stands there for all who seek her. Some scholars consider Wisdom to be an attribute of God, especially shown in creation (3:19–20; 8:22–31). More accurately stated, however, Wisdom is "the self-revelation of creation." That is, God has placed in creation a wise order which speaks to humankind of good and evil, urging humans toward good and away from evil. This is not just the "voice of experience," but God's general revelation which speaks to all people with authority. The world is not silent, but speaks of the Creator and His will (Pss. 19:1–2; 97:6; 145:10; 148; Job 12:7–9; Acts 14:15–17; Rom. 1:18–23; 2:14–15).

This perspective eliminates any split between faith and reason, between sacred and secular. The person who knows God also knows that every inch of life is created by God and belongs to Him. Experiences of God come only from experiences in God's world. Experiences in the world point the person of faith to God.

Thus, the wise person "fears God" and also lives in harmony with God's order for creation. The sluggard must learn from the ant because the ant's work is in tune with the order of the seasons (Prov. 6:6–11; compare 10:5).

Thinking Proverbially The short proverbs in chapters 10—29 cover a wealth of topics from wives (11:22; 18:22; 25:24) to friends (14:20; 17:17–18; 18:17; 27:6), strong drink (23:29–35; 31:4–7), wealth and poverty, justice and injustice, table manners and social status (23:1–8; compare 25:6–7; Luke 14:7–11).

One cannot just use any proverb on any topic, for proverbs can be misused: "Like a lame man's legs, which hang useless, is a proverb in the mouth of fools" (Prov. 26:7; compare v. 9). Proverbs are designed to make one wise, but they require wisdom to be used correctly. Proverbs are true, but their truth is realized only when they are fitly applied in the right situation. Job's friends misapplied proverbs about the wicked to righteous Job. Many things have more than one side to them, and the wise person will know which is which. Wives can be a gift from the Lord (18:22), but sometimes singleness seems better (21:9,19). Silence can be a sign of wisdom (17:27) or a cover-up (17:28). A "friend" (Hebrew, rea') can be trusted (17:17), but not always (17:18; "neighbor" = rea')!

Wealth can be a sign of God's blessing (3:9–10), but some saints suffer (3:11–12). Wealth can result from wickedness (13:23; 17:23; 28:11; compare 26:12). It is better to be poor and godly: "Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues with injustice" (16:8; compare 15:16–17; 17:1; 19:1; 28:6). In the end God will judge: "He who closes his ear to the cry of the poor will himself cry out and not be heard" (21:13; compare 3:27–28; 22:16; 24:11–12; 10:2; 11:4).

The problem of fittingness is most sharply put in 26:4–5:

Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest you be like him yourself.
Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own eyes.

Such dilemmas force us to confront the limits of our wisdom (26:12) and to rely upon God (3:5–8).

Proverbs generally operate on the principle that consequences follow acts: you reap what you sow. In a fallen world, however, God's justice is sometimes delayed. The "better—than" proverbs in particular show the disorder of the present world, the "exceptions to the rule." The righteous thus works and prays, like the psalmist, for the day when God will make all things right.

Outline

I. Proverbs Is Designed to Impart Divine Wisdom Concerning Life (1:1–6).

II. Wisdom's Contribution to Life Is to Be Praised (1:7—9:18).

A. The goal of all wisdom is that people "fear . . . the Lord" (1:7).
B. Wisdom identifies sin and calls sinners to repentance (1:8–33).
C. Wisdom enables the sinner to be set free and experience meaningful life (2:1–22).
D. Wisdom produces a sense of divine presence, joy, and peace in the believer (3:1–26).
E. Wisdom admonishes believers to share God's love with others (3:27–35).
F. Wisdom helps a father instruct his son how to obtain a meaningful life (4:1–27).
G. Wisdom calls for purity and honesty in all marriage relationships (5:1–23).
H. Wisdom admonishes the believer to work hard and spend wisely (6:1–19).
I. Wisdom warns against the peril of adultery (6:20—7:27).
J. Through divine wisdom, God offers Himself to humankind (8:1–36).
K. Wisdom presents us with two choices, life or death (9:1–18).

III. One's Response to Wisdom Brings About Earthly Consequences (10:1—22:16).
A. The righteous find blessings, but the wicked suffer greatly (10:1–32).
B. The deceitful pay a terrible price, but the honest find God's favor (11:1–31).
C. The righteous are open to instruction, but the wicked are not (12:1–28).
D. The righteous are obedient to God's will; however, the wicked rebel (13:1–25).
E. The foolish will be judged, but the righteous will be accepted by God (14:1–35).
F. The Lord watches over all humankind and judges each accordingly (15:1–33).
G. The Lord is the fountain of life for the faithful (16:1–33).
H. The foolish thrive on bribery, but the wise are honest yet merciful (17:1–28).
I. The foolish are haughty, but the righteous are humble (18:1–24).
J. The poor are to be pitied, but the wealthy are honored by God (19:1–29).
K. The wise work hard and treat both friend and foe with love (20:1–30).
L. God requires holy lives and not just holy rituals (21:1–31).
M. The wise discipline themselves to follow God in everything (22:1–16).

IV. Wisdom Provides Prudent Counsel for Both the Present and the Future (22:17—24).
A. Wisdom tells one when to speak and when to be silent (22:17–21).
B. The wise ones care for and protect the poor (22:22–29).
C. Wisdom warns one not to fall into the trap of another's craftiness (23:1–11).
D. Youth need instruction and correction to become what they should be (23:12–28).
E. The drunkard destroys his life and that of others (23:29–35).
F. Wisdom leads to a meaningful life, but wickedness leads to destruction (24:1–9).
G. The wise ones steadfastly trust God in both the good and bad times (24:10–22).
H. Wisdom promotes true justice (24:23–34).

V. Wisdom Constantly Reminds People of Their Past Heritage (25:1—29:27).
A. The king shares in the responsibility for promoting wisdom (25:1–14).
B. The righteous exercise self-discipline and love in all of life (25:15–28).
C. The foolish fail the test of life and face God's judgment (26:1–28).
D. Life's quest for meaning is brief and frustrating at times (27:1–22).
E. People should learn to live as responsible stewards (27:23–27).
F. God expects justice from His followers (28:1–28).
G. Discipline is an essential part of life (29:1–27).

VI. The True Source of Meaningful Existence Can Be Found Only in God (30:1—31:31).
A. Human beings cannot fully discover or understand God's wisdom (30:1–33).
B. Humans can practice righteousness and show loving-kindness (31:1–9).
C. The key to meaningful existence is found in one's faith relationship to God (31:10–31). Raymond C. Van Leeuwen

PROVIDENCE God's faithful and effective care and guidance of everything which He has made toward the end which He has chosen.

The opening question of the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) asks: "What is your only comfort in life and death?" Answer: "That I, with body and soul, both in life and in death, am not my own, but belong to my faithful Savior Jesus Christ who . . . so preserves me that without the will of my Father in heaven not a hair can fall from my head; yea, that all things must work together for my salvation." This statement gets at the heart of the biblical doctrine of providence. We can distinguish this understanding of providence from several distortions which have been advanced throughout the history of the church:

• fatalism: the view that all events are determined by an inviolable law of cause and effect. This was a popular doctrine among the Stoics (as in Seneca's treatise, De Providentia) who believed that all history and human life was subject to Fate.

- deism: the idea that God created the world but then withdrew from its day-to-day governance, leaving it to run by itself as a machine. Deism safeguards the transcendence of God at the expense of His immanence.
- pantheism: this is the opposite error of deism, for it virtually identifies God with His creation. God is a kind of World Soul or impersonal force which permeates all the universe.
- dualism: the view that two opposing forces in the universe are locked in struggle with each other for its control. The ancient religions of Zoroaster and Mani posited two coeternal principles, darkness and light. A modern variant of this theory is set forth by process theology which holds that God is limited by the evolving universe, caught in a struggle with forces over against His control.

In the New Testament, the Greek word for providence (pronoia) occurs only once, and that with reference to human rather than divine foresight (Acts 24:2). The verbal form (pronoeō) meaning "to know in advance" is found twice in the New Testament and eleven times in the Greek Old Testament. Yet the theme of God's provident care for the created order is present in all levels of the biblical material. The Psalms are filled with allusions to God's direction and sustenance of the creation. The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament proclaims His handiwork (Ps. 19:1). God directs the seasons (Ps. 104:19); the clouds are His chariot, the winds His messenger (104:3); He stills the storms and girds the mountain ranges (107:29; 65:6); everything that hath breath is exhorted to praise the Lord "for his mighty acts" (150:2,6). The so-called nature Psalms are not dedicated to the glory of nature, but to the God who created and sustains it with His fatherly care.

Providence is related to creation on the one hand and to the history of salvation on the other. Theologians speak of this second aspect as "special" providence. In Nehemiah 9:6–38, God's general and special providence are brought together in the same passage. "Thou, even thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven, . . . the earth, and all things that are therein, . . . and thou preservest them all; . . . Thou art the Lord the God, who didst choose Abram, . . . And madest known unto them thy . . . precepts, . . . by the hand of Moses . . . thou art a gracious and merciful God. . . . who keepest covenant." After the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and during the long period of Exile, confidence in God's providence sustained the children of Israel through all of their doubts and disappointments (compare Isa. 40:21–31; 42:1–6).

Two classic passages in the New Testament direct Christians to focus on God's providential care as a remedy for overanxious concerns. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus commanded His hearers not to worry about tomorrow, since the Heavenly Father cares much more for them than the birds of the air or the lilies of the field (Matt. 6:25–34). The point is not that following Christ will exempt one from trouble or pain. What it does provide is the assurance of God's presence in the midst of the stormy tempests of life. Armed with this assurance we can face whatever may come in the knowledge that God will care for us, as He does daily for the birds and flowers. Romans 8:28 (NIV) says: "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." This does not mean that everything which happens to us is good, nor necessarily the result of a "snap decision" by God. It does mean that nothing can ever happen to us apart from the knowledge, presence, and love of God, and that in the most desperate of circumstances God is always at work towards the good. We are not given to understand how this is so. We are only told that the sufferings of the present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed to us (Rom. 8:18–25).

The doctrine of providence encompasses many other themes in the Bible as well. Scripture presents God working in various ways to accomplish His purpose. Often God works through secondary causes such as natural law or special messengers, such as the angels. Sometimes God effects His will directly through miracles or other supernatural happenings. Frequently enough, as William Cowper put it, "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." Because we are sure that God is for us, not against us, we can afford to live with this mystery which impugns neither God's sovereignty nor His goodness. In our own day, the doctrine of providence has been challenged by the enormity of evil in the world. Some theologians have attempted to devise a theodicy, a rational justification of God's providential rule, as a response to the problem of evil. Yet the Bible itself presents no systematic answer to this dilemma. It affirms only the reality of evil, its vicious, demonic power in the present age, and the certainty of Christ's ultimate victory over its every manifestation (1 Cor. 15:24–28). In the meanwhile, Christians can face the future in the confidence that nothing "in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:39 NRSV). PROVINCE A Roman political region. During New Testament times there were three types of provinces. Imperial districts were governed directly by the emperor. Senatorial provinces answered to the senate. A special type province were those composed of rugged terrain or newly conquered people. These demanded more strict control and were under the control of an imperial procurator. Judea was a special province because the Jews so fiercely hated the Roman domination.

Israel practiced a type of provincial system during Ahab's reign (1 Kings 20:14–15). Later, the Babylonians and Persians used such districts in Palestine (Esth. 4:11). The Romans refined the system dramatically and used it to maintain control over their vast empire. See Government; Rome.

PROVOCATION In Hebrews 3:8,15 that which aroused God's anger. Provocation corresponds to the place name Meribah meaning, "contention" (Ex. 17:1–7; Num. 20:1–13; Ps. 95:7–11 which Heb. 3:7–11 cites). See Massah.

PRUNING HOOK See Tools.

PSALMIST A writer of psalms or hyms. Second Samuel 23:1 calls David the "sweet psalmist of Israel." Superscriptions ascribe about one half of the psalms to David. See David; Psalms.

PSALMS, BOOK OF A collection of songs of praise that are theological statements and poetically represent human dialogue with God. The Psalms is the most complete collection of Hebrew poetry and worship material in the Hebrew Bible. The Psalms give clues for understanding Israelite worship on both a corporate and individual level. The psalms typify different responses to God's actions and word.

The Psalms as a collection is found in the third division of the Hebrew canon known as the Writings (Hebrew, ketubim). In its present canonical form, the Psalter has five divisions in the current Hebrew text. These divisions have been compared with the division of the Pentateuch into five books. Each book concludes with a doxology or closing formula. The books follow this division: (1) Psalms 1—41; (2) 42—71; (3) 73—89; (4) 90—106; and (5) 107—150. Psalm 150 closes off both book five and concludes the collection of psalms; just as Psalm 1 serves as an introduction to the psalter. Other divisions or collections appear in the Psalms. The Elohistic Psalter (Pss. 42—83) regularly uses the Hebrew 'elohim for the divine name (compare Pss. 14; 53). The Songs of Ascent or pilgrimage psalms (Pss. 120—134) make a collection. Two different guild collections are included in the Psalms of the sons of Korah (Pss. 42—49) and the Psalms of Asaph (Pss. 73—83). Psalms has been understood as both the "hymnal" and prayerbook of the postexilic congregation of Israel with its final compilation and its inclusion within the canon.

An important key for reading and interpreting different psalms is to understand the nature of Hebrew poetry. Psalms are poetic in contrast to being narrative. See Poetry.

As the twentieth century began, Hermann Gunkel brought a new approach to the Psalms, seeking to discover the type or form of literary material in each Psalm and the worship situation behind each. Gunkel categorized several main types of psalms and understood that not all psalms fit neatly into one category. They might be a combination of types and thus belong to a category of mixed psalms. Following Gunkel, scholars have proposed several systems to categorize the Psalms. Most include the different types: (1) the hymn; (2) songs of thanksgiving; (3) the community laments; (4) the individual laments; (5) the individual songs of thanksgiving; (6) the royal psalms; and (7) wisdom psalms.

Clear-cut categorization is not possible for every psalm, nor does every psalm fit a particular category. Also, every cultic or original life situation is not discernible. The issue for the reader and interpreter of the psalms is to appreciate the artistry of a poet which created and crafted timeless poetic expressions which fit into many contexts of worship or an individual's life situation in different cultures and traditions.

A reader of the Psalms will find that different psalms can be grouped by similarities of form, content, and pattern. Yet, variations do occur, and each psalm is unique in both message and content. The following is descriptive of the various psalm types.

A lament is expressed both by the community (for example, 44; 74; 79) and by the individual (22; 38; 39; 41; 54). Both types of laments are prayers or cries to God on the occasion of distressful situations. Of the two forms, differences are related to the types of trouble and the experiences of salvation. For the community the trouble may be an enemy; with an individual it may be an illness. The basic pattern includes an invocation of God, a description of the petitioner's complaint(s), a recalling of past salvation experiences (usually community laments), petitions, a divine response (or oracle), and a concluding vow of praise.

The thanksgiving or psalms of narrative praise are also spoken by the community (see 106; 124; 129) and the individual (see 9; 18; 30). These psalms are related to the laments as they are responses to liberation occurring after distress. They are expressions of joy and are fuller forms of the lament's vow of praise.

The hymn (see 8; 19; 29) is closest in form to a song of praise as sung in modern forms of worship. These psalms are uniquely liturgical and could be sung antiphonally, some have repeating refrains (see Ps. 8). The hymn normally includes a call to praise. Then the psalm describes the reasons for praising God. The structure is not as clear-cut as other types of psalms. Creation psalms (usually reflecting a mixed form) include Psalms 8; 19; 104; and 139. These psalms are concerned with praising God and describe Him as Creator. Emphasis may be placed on God as Creator of heaven and earth, as Creator of humanity, or as the Creator of different elements of creation. The psalms affirm God who is Creator as the Lord of history.

Some psalms reflect more specific liturgical events. The liturgical psalms may include antiphonal responses or dialogue. There may be exhortations to listeners to prostrate themselves or to walk in a procession. These psalms include instructions for sacrifice, worship, processionals, or may invoke blessings on the worshipers. These are usually regarded as psalms of mixed type as they share similarities with the hymns. This designation includes those psalms which may have been sung by pilgrims on their way to the sanctuary (see the songs of ascents, 120—134). Songs of Zion (such as 46) call for God's protection of the city of God. Some psalms are considered royal psalms (see 2; 18; 20). These psalms are concerned with the earthly king of Israel. Again, these are usually understood as mixed psalms. They were used to celebrate the king's enthronement. They may have included an oracle for the king. In some cases (such as Ps. 72), prayers were made to intercede on behalf of the king. Another mixed type are the enthronement psalms which celebrate Yahweh's kingship (see Pss. 96—99). They are closely related to the hymns and to the creation psalms. However, the main difference is a celebration of Yahweh as king over all creation.

A final type of psalm (see Ps. 1) is the wisdom psalm. They have poetic form and style but are distinguished because of content and a tendency toward the proverbial. These psalms contemplate questions of theodicy (73), or celebrate God's Word (the Torah, Ps. 119), or deal with two different ways of living—that of the godly person or the evil person (Ps. 1). The psalms are not neatly or easily categorized, as the mixed psalms indicate. However, such identification helps the reader to know that type of psalm is being read, with a possible original context or a fitting present context in worship.

Outline The Book of Psalms is divided into five sections just as the Pentateuch has five books. Each section of the Book of Psalms concludes with a doxology. See 41:13; 72:18–19; 89:52; 106:48; 150. Psalm 1 introduces the book by dividing people into two categories and describing the fate of each. Psalm 150 closes Psalms with a symphony of praise. Otherwise, a way to describe a theological structure for the book as a whole has not been found. What devoted students of God's Word have discovered is the limited number of types of prayer represented in the Psalms. A look at the major types helps us understand how many different functions prayer and praise can serve as we communicate with and worship God.

1. Psalms of lamentation or complaint cry out for help in a situation of distress or frustration. Psalmists protest their innocence or confess their sins. They vow to praise God and give thanks for deliverance. Such psalms show prayer as an honest communication with God in life's worst situations. The following psalms are laments: 3, 4, 6, 7, 12, 13, 17, 22, 25, 26, 28, 35, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42—43, 44, 51, 54, 55, 56, 57, 59,60, 61, 63, 64, 69, 70, 71, 74, 77, 79, 80, 83, 85, 86, 88, 90, 94, 102, 109, 123, 126, 130, 134, 137, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144.

2. Psalms of thanksgiving describe a situation of distress and how God delivered the psalmist. The psalmist promises to fulfill vows made to God during the distress and invites the congregation to join in thanksgiving and praise to God. These psalms show us our need to acknowledge God's work in our times of trouble and to witness to others of what God has done for us. Thanksgiving psalms are 9—10, 18, 30, 31, 32, 34, 66, 92, 107, 116, 118, 120, 124, 129, 138, 139.

3. Hymns lift the congregation's praise to God, describing God's greatness and majesty. In the hymn, worshipers invite one another to praise God and to provide reasons for such praise. These psalms are hymns: 8, 19, 29, 33, 65, 100, 103, 104, 105, 111; 113, 114, 117, 135, 136, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150.

4. Wisdom psalms probe life's mysteries to teach the congregation about itself and God. These include psalms 1, 14, 36, 37, 49, 53, 73, 78, 112, 119, 127, 128, 133.

5. Kingship psalms detail the role of the human king in God's rule over His people. They also point ahead to the Messiah, who would inaugurate God's kingdom. From them we learn to pray for and respect the role of government officials as well as praise God's Messiah. These include psalms 2, 18, 20, 21, 28, 45, 61, 63, 72, 89, 101, 110, 132.

6. Entrance ceremonies provide questions and answers to teach the expectations God has of His worshipers. Psalms 15 and 24 are entrance ceremonies.

7. Enthronement psalms praise Yahweh as the King enthroned over His universe. They include psalms 47, 93, 96, 97, 98, 99.

8. Songs of Zion praise God indirectly by describing the Holy City where He has chosen to live among His people and be worshiped. They show God lives among His people to protect and direct their lives. These are psalms 46, 48, 76, 84, 87, 122, 132.

9. Psalms of confidence express trust in God's care for and leadership of His people. These appear in psalms 4, 11, 16, 23, 27, 62, 125, 131.

10. Prophetic psalms announce God's will to

His worshiping people. These are 50, 52, 58, 81, 82, 91, 95.

11. Liturgical psalms describe activities and responses of God's worshiping congregation. These appear in psalms 67, 68, 75, 106, 108, 115, 121.

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (Sūd ĕ pĭ' gră phà) Intertestamental literature not accepted into the Christian or Jewish canon of Scripture and often attributed to an ancient hero of faith. Ongoing discovery and research provide differing lists of contents. A recent publication listed 52 writings. They give much information about the development of Jewish religion and culture. Pseudepigraphal Books—Pseudepigrapha means, "writings falsely attributed." This is based on those books claiming to be written by Adam, Enoch, Moses, and other famous Old Testament people. Some of the writings are anonymous; thus some scholars prefer the name "outside books" for all of these writings, emphasizing that they did not become part of canon. Some ancient Christians and the Roman church have used the term "Apocrypha," since for them what Protestants call Apocrypha is part of their canon. See Apocrypha.

Both Palestinian and Hellenistic Jews authored books in the Pseudepigrapha. They used a variety of styles and literary types—legend, poetry, history, philosophy—but apocalypse was the dominant literary type. See Apocalyptic. A review of the most important and representative books will show the significance of the Pseudepigrapha in understanding the background of the New Testament.

First Enoch has been preserved in the Ethiopic language. It is a composite work of five sections, written at different times. The first section (chs. 1—36) tells how Enoch was taken up into heaven and shown its secrets. The sons of God of Genesis 6 were seen as angels. They committed sin, and the children born to them were evil giants. Emphasis is placed upon judgment and punishment. Even the realm of the dead is divided into separate places for the righteous and the wicked. The second section (chs. 37—71) is the most important for its relation to the Bible. It is the Parables or Similitudes. These chapters refer to the son of man. Opinions differ as to how such references form part of the background to the New Testament teachings about Jesus as the Son of man. There is uncertainty about the date of this section, of chapters. The rest of the book comes from between 200 and 1 B.C., but the Similitudes may have been written later, shortly before A.D. 100. Fragments of all the other sections have been found in the caves of Qumran, but no fragments of this section have been discovered yet. The third section (chs. 78—82) deals with the heavenly bodies. The author argues for a calendar based on the movement of the sun in distinction to the standard Jewish lunar calendar. The fourth section (chs. 83–90) contains two dream visions dealing with the flood and the history of Israel from Adam to the Maccabean revolt. The final section (chs. 91—108) gives religious instruction concerning the end time. The entire book is apocalyptic.

Second Enoch is also an apocalypse preserved primarily in the Slavonic language. It was written between 100 B.C. and A.D. 100. In it Enoch was taken up into heaven and commanded to write 366 books. He was allowed to return to earth for thirty days to teach his sons, after which he returned to heaven. This writing describes the contents of the seven heavens and divides time into seven one-thousand year periods.

Second Baruch is apocalyptic and shows how some Jews responded to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. It was written shortly before 100 A.D. Three visions seek to console the people by showing that even though destruction has come, God has prepared something better for them. The writings teach that the Messiah will be revealed to bring in a time of great plenty. Emphasis is placed on obedience to the Law.

The Sibylline Oracles were very popular apocalyptic writings in the ancient world. The Jews took over the originally pagan writings and modified them by inserting ideas about monotheism, Mosaic requirements, and Jewish history. Three of the fifteen books in the collection are missing. Book 3, from between 200 and 100 B.C., is the most important and the most Jewish. It traces Jewish history from the time of Abraham to the building of the second Temple. It pronounces God's judgment upon pagan nations, but holds out hope that they may turn to God.

The Testament of Moses (sometimes called the Assumption of Moses) is also apocalyptic. The manuscripts are incomplete, and the missing portion may have contained an account of Moses' death and his being taken to heaven. Early Christian writers state that Jude 9 was to be found in the Assumption of Moses known to them. This book is a rewriting of Deuteronomy 31—34. Moses is the chosen mediator of God, prepared from the beginning of time. The book traces the history of the people from their beginning to the author's own time. Since chapters 6 and 7 seem to refer to Herod the Great, the book was probably written shortly after A.D. 1. It emphasized that God has planned all things and keeps them under His control.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs are patterned after Genesis 49, the closing instructions of Jacob to his sons. Each of the sons of Jacob addressed his descendants, giving a brief survey of his life, with special attention to some sin or failure. For example, Reuben stressed his adultery with Bilhah (Gen. 35:22), and Simeon told of his jealousy of Joseph. Joseph, however, emphasized the maintaining of his purity. Using the confessed sin as a background, patriarchs urged their children to live in an upright manner. Special emphasis is given to love for the neighbor and sexual purity. In most of the testaments, the children are told to give honor to Levi and Judah. The book refers to two messiahs: one from Levi, one from Judah. The earliest portions of the testaments come from after 200 B.C.

The Book of Jubilees is a rewriting of Genesis and the opening chapters of Exodus from after 200 B.C. It traces the history of Israel from creation to the time of Moses, dividing time into jubilee periods, forty-nine years each. The calendar is based on the sun, not the moon. The sabbath was kept by the angels in heaven who were circumcised. The writer strongly opposed the Gentile influences he found coming into Judaism urging Jews to keep separate from the Gentiles. In the Book of Jubilees, Abraham was the ideal righteous man. The book shows how a conservative, priestly Jew about 150 B.C. viewed the world.

The Psalms of Solomon are a collection of eighteen psalms written about 50 B.C. They reflect the situation of the people in Jerusalem following its capture by the Romans under Pompey in 63 B.C. Psalms of Solomon 17 and 18 are of special importance because of their references to the Messiah. According to these Psalms, the Messiah was to be a human figure, a descendant of David, wise and righteous, and without sin. The titles Son of David and Lord Messiah are used of Him.

Third Maccabees, written after 200 B.C., has nothing to do with the Maccabees. It tells about the attempt of Ptolemy IV to kill the Jews in Egypt. God foiled his efforts resulting in the advancement of the Jews. This book shows the vindication of the righteous.

Fourth Maccabees is based to some extent upon material found in 2 Maccabees 6—7. It is a philosophical writing, stressing that pious reason can be the master of the passions. Reason is derived from obedience to the law. In the account of the seven sons who are martyred, the author greatly expanded the account but left out all references to resurrection. The book comes from shortly after A.D. 1.

The Life of Adam and Eve has been preserved in both Latin and Greek. The two versions are different in length and content. Blame for the fall is placed upon Eve. Sin entered human experience through her. This writing refers to Satan being transformed into the brightness of angels (9:1; see 2 Cor. 11:14), and states that paradise is in the third heaven (compare 2 Cor. 12:2–3). The Life of Adam and Eve was written after 1 A.D.

The Letter of Aristeas was composed after 200 B.C., telling how the Old Testament law was translated into Greek. Actually, it is more concerned about the table conversation at banquets in Alexandria than it is about the translation of the Septuagint. It seeks to show that the Jewish law was in conformity with the highest ideals of Greek thought and life. It indicates that it is possible for Jew and Greek to live together in peace. So far as its account of the translation of the Law into Greek is concerned, its only historical validity is that it was at this time (during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285–246 B.C.) that this translation was begun.

PTOLEMIES (Ptŏl′ ĕ mīes) Dynastic powers which emerged in Egypt in the aftermath of the conquests of Alexander the Great.

Ptolemy I Soter (323–383 B.C.) established the dynasty which bears his name and moved the capitol of Egypt from Memphis to Alexandria, the city Alexander founded. He and his successors ruled an empire that included at times Cyrenaica, Palestine, Phoenicia, Cyprus and some parts of western Asia Minor and the Aegean. Ptolemaic policies brought great wealth to the state through taxation and trade. The Ptolemies did not force Hellenization upon native populations, but the obvious commercial, cultural, and social benefits of Ptolemaic policies led to greater acceptance of Hellenistic ideas and customs. Land was farmed out under state control, and the reserves funneled to the central government. Payment of heavy yearly taxes, however, assured a measure of local autonomy. The Ptolemies introduced a ruler cult, but permitted native religions to continue unimpeded. In addition to Ptolemy I, the most energetic of these rulers were Ptolemy II Philadelphus (282–246 B.C.) and Ptolemy III Euergetes (246–221 B.C.).

The Ptolemies made Alexandria a center of learning and commerce. In particular the early Ptolemies supported a large group of scholars at the famous Museum and developed the nucleus of the great library. The Ptolemies founded or refurbished several cities in Palestine and Transjordan giving them Greek names and often endowing them with Greek features. Examples included Acco renamed Ptolemais, Bethshan now termed Scythopolis, and ancient Rabboth-Ammon refounded as Philadelphia.

Ptolemaic rule directly impacted Jews both inside and outside of Palestine. During the campaigns to secure Palestine for Egypt, Ptolemy I transported large numbers of Jews from Palestine to Alexandria for settlement. This was the beginning of a large and influential Jewish community which prospered by maintaining good relations with the Ptolemies, frequently serving as mercenaries and merchants. Soon Alexandria became a major center of world Jewry. The Alexandrian Jews imbibed Hellenism much more deeply than their counterparts in Judea as evidenced by the need to translate the Old Testament writings into Greek. This translation, known as the Septuagint, probably was begun in the reign of Ptolomy II, but was not completed until about 100 B.C.

The Ptolemies treated Judea as a Temple state given over by the king in trust to the high priest at Jerusalem. Authority in religious and most civil matters was granted the high priest in lieu of a yearly tax.

The forecourt of Ptolemy IX in the Temple of Horus, the Egyptian falcon-god, at Edfu in Upper Egypt.

During the reign of Ptolemy II, the first of five wars with the Seleucids over possession of Palestine broke out. Egypt successfully resisted the Seleucid challenge under the first three Ptolemaic rulers. However, Ptolemaic power began to wane under Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–204 B.C.), a notorious womanizer. In 200 B.C., Antiochus III defeated the Egyptian army at Banyas (later Caesarea Philippi) and seized control of Palestine. Subsequently, the Ptolemaic kingdom declined and increasingly came under the influence of Rome. Cleopatra VII was the last Ptolemaic ruler prior to the annexation of Egypt to Rome in 30 B.C.

PUA (Pū′ â) KJV and REB alternate form of Puvah (Num. 26:23).

PUAH (Pū′ ah) 1. Personal name meaning, "girl." Hebrew midwife who disobeyed Pharoah's orders to kill male Hebrew infants (Ex. 1:15). 2. Personal name meaning, "red dye." Father of the judge Tola (Judg. 10:1) and an alternate form of Puvah (1 Chron. 7:1).

PUBLICAN A political office created by the Romans to help collect taxes in the provinces. Actually, the title "tax collector" is more correct than the older term "publican" in referring to the lowest rank in the structure. Zacchaeus is called a "chief among the publicans" (Luke 19:2), probably indicating one who contracted with the government to collect taxes, and who in turn hired others to do the actual work. In New Testament times people bid for the job of chief tax collector and then exacted the tax plus a profit from the citizens. Most of the offices were filled by Romans, although some natives got the bids. Publicans were held in the lowest esteem because of their excessive profits, being placed in the same category as harlots (Matt 21:32). Jesus was accused of eating with and befriending them (Matt. 9:11).

PUBLIUS (Pŭb′ lĭ ŭs) Personal name meaning, "pertaining to the people." The highest official, either Roman or local, on Malta (Acts 28:7–8).

PUDENS (Pū′ dĕnș) Personal name meaning, "modest." Roman Christian who greeted Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21). This Pudens is sometimes identified with the friend of the Roman poet Martial.

PUHITES (Pū′ hītes) KJV form of Puthites.

PUITES (Pū′ ītes) NIV form of Punites.

PUL (Pŭl) 1. Alternate name of the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III (2 Kings 15:19; 1 Chron. 5:26). The name is perhaps a contraction of Pileser. See Assyria. 2. The Hebrew Pul in Isaiah 66:19 is likely a textual corruption of Put.

PULPIT KJV, RSV term for a raised platform (NRSV, REB, NIV, TEV) on which a speaker stood (Neh. 8:4); not a lectern or high reading desk behind which a reader stands.

PULSE General term for peas, beans, and lentils (Dan. 1:12,16). Modern translations read vegetables. The Hebrew is literally "things which have been sown," a designation including grains in addition to vegetables.

PUNITES (Pū′ nītes) Descendants of Puvah (Num. 26:23). Some manuscripts read Puvanites or Puvites.

PUNON (Pū′ nŏn) Place name meaning, "ore pit." Edomite mining center located at the junction of the wadi el-Gheweil and wadi esh-Sheqer on the east side of the Arabah about twenty-five miles south of the Dead Sea. The site was first occupied about 2200 B.C. The second occupation began shortly before the Israelites encamped there about 1200 B.C. (Num. 33:42–43). The site was perhaps home to descendants of the clan chief Pinon (Gen. 36:41). The site is identified with modern Feinan. Two ancient smelting sites, khirbet en-Nahas and khirbet Nqeib Aseimer, lie to the north northeast.

PUR (Pŭr) See Purim.

PURAH (Pū′ rah) Personal name meaning, "beauty" or nickname meaning, "metal container." Gideon's servant (Judg. 7:10–11). KJV used the form Phurah.

PURGE To cleanse from impurity, frequently in the figurative sense of cleansing from evil (Deut. 13:5), guilt (Deut. 19:13), idolatrous worship (2 Chron. 34:3), and sin (Ps. 51:7). See Clean, Cleanness.

PURIM (Pū′ rĭm) See Festivals.

PURITY—PURIFICATION State of being or process of becoming free of inferior elements or ritual uncleanness. A basic goal of religion is to attain purity before the deity.

Old Testament Usage 1. Flawless The primary Hebrew root word for pure (thr) often refers to pure or flawless gold (1 Kings 10:21; Job 28:19; Ps. 12:6). Thr and other Hebrew words for "pure" are used to describe other objects such as salt (Ex. 30:35), oil (Ex. 27:20), and incense (Ex. 37:29). Thus, a basic Old Testament meaning is that of "refined, purified, without flaw, perfect, clean." Note Lamentations 4:7.

2. Ritual Purity To be ritually pure means to be free of some flaw or uncleanness which would bar one from contact with holy objects or places, especially from contact with the holy presence of God in worship. God is the ideal of purity, and those who are to come in contact with God's presence are also to be pure. Habakkuk 1:13 indicates that God's eyes are too pure to look upon evil.

The altar for sacrifice was purified so that it would be prepared for worship (Lev. 8:15; Ezek. 43:26). The objects of gold used in the tabernacle and Temple were also pure in this sense; this would be true of the incense in Exodus 37:29. The Levites were to purify themselves for service in the tabernacle (Num. 8:21). When that which was unclean or impure came into contact with that which was holy, danger resulted and could even lead to death. This is probably the background for the preparation made for the theophany, a manifestation of God's presence, in Exodus 19 and for the death of Uzzah when he was unprepared (not purified) to touch the ark of the covenant, a most holy object (2 Sam. 6:1–11). Malachi 1:11–12 contrasts the pure offerings of Gentiles with blemished offerings given by God's people; such a state necessitated purification (Mal. 3:3–4).

Purity qualified one to participate in worship, an activity central to the life of ancient Israel. Breaking that purity was a serious matter. Ritual impurity came as a result of bodily emissions (Lev. 15), by way of disease or menstrual flow, or discharge of semen. This chapter also shows that such impurity could be spread by contact, for anything coming into contact with the unclean person had to be purified. Leviticus 12 also discusses impurity associated with childbirth, probably because of the discharge of blood. Blood related to the mysterious power of life, and any loss of blood called for purification. Ritual impurity also came as a result of contact with a corpse since death was an enemy of God (Num. 19). Participation in war could thus cause impurity. Impurity, finally, was brought on by contact with foreign gods. This was probably the background of the need for purification when the people returned from Exile in Babylon. The priests and Levites purified themselves first and then the people and then the city gates and wall (Isa. 52:11; Ezra 6:20; Neh. 12:30). This also prepared them for worship.

3. Ethical Purity Thought and behavior befitting the people of God are pure (Pss. 24:4; 73:1; Pro. 15:26; 22:11; 30:12). Such purity of thought is to result in conduct which is appropriate for people (Ps. 119:9; Prov. 16:2; 20:9,11; 21:8). Notice also the pure prayer of Job 16:17.

Since Psalms 15 and 24 speak of qualifications for worship in terms of ethical purity, it is important not to distinguish sharply between ritual and ethical purity in the Old Testament. God expects ethical purity, and sin results in uncleanness. Thus sin and ritual uncleanness stand together in the Old Testament as unacceptable to the Lord. Their counterparts—ethical and ritual purity—also stand together.

Purification Rituals Since the Old Testament assumes that the people would encounter sin and uncleanness, it provides a way to return to cleanness.

The purification ritual usually started with a waiting period beginning when the cause of the impurity stopped. Less serious causes brought a waiting period of one day. Contact with a corpse

(Num. 19:11,14), birth of a male child (Lev. 12:2), the cure of leprosy (Lev. 14:8–9), and other discharges (Lev. 15:13,19,28), brought about a waiting period of seven days. The waiting period after the birth of a girl was fourteen days (Lev. 12:5). The same period applied to the quarantine of a suspected leper (Lev. 13:4–6).

A cleansing agent was required: water, blood, or fire (Num. 31:23). Water, the most common purifying agent, symbolized cleansing and was used in the rituals related to a waiting period. The person was to wash the clothes and bathe the body (Lev. 15:7). Blood was used to cleanse the altar and the holy place (Lev. 16:14–19). It was mixed with other ingredients for cleansing from leprosy (Lev. 14) and contact with the dead (Num. 19).

The final element of the ritual of purification is sacrifice. Purification from discharges required two pigeons or turtledoves, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering (Lev. 15:14–15,29–30). A lamb and pigeon or turtledove were offered after childbirth (Lev. 12:6). Sacrifice in the purification ritual for lepers was quite complicated, indicating the seriousness of leprosy as a cause of impurity (Lev. 14). The priest also touched the person's extremities with blood from the offering and with oil, cleansing and life-renewing agents. The poor were allowed to substitute less valuable animals for use in their sacrifices.

New Testament Usage Most New Testament uses of words for purity relate to cleanness of some type. Old Testament meanings are often reflected. Perfection is the meaning in Mark 14:3; this is mixed with religious purity in Hebrews 10:22; 1 John 3:3.

Ethical purity dominates in the New Testament. The person who is in right relationship with God is to live a life of purity (2 Tim. 2:21–22; Titus 1:15 and references to a pure heart—Matt. 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:5; Heb. 9:14; Jas. 4:8; 1 Peter 1:22). Purity is also listed among virtues (2 Cor. 6:6; Phil. 4:8; 1 Tim. 4:12; compare Mark 7:15).

Purification through sacrifice is also mentioned in the New Testament and applied to the death of Christ, a purification which does not need repeating and thus is on a higher level than Old Testament sacrifices (Heb. 9:13–14). The sacrifice of Christ brings purification; Christ cleansed as a part of the work of the high priest and His blood cleanses from sin (1 John 1:7).

PURLOIN KJV term meaning, "to misappropriate" (Titus 2:10). Modern translations use pilfer or steal. See Pilfer.

PURPLE GARNET REB designation of a precious stone (Ex. 28:18; 39:11) which other translations identify as an emerald or turquoise. See Jewels.

PURSE KJV translation of a Greek term for a belt, girdle, or waistband (Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). Travelers could tuck the loose ends of their garments into such a belt to allow freer movement. The folds of such waistbands were frequently used for storing money. Jesus encouraged His disciples to trust God and depend on the generosity of others as they shared the gospel. See Girdle.

PURSLANE (Pūrs′ lāne) Fleshy-leaved, trailing plant used as a pot herb or in salads, which the RSV of Job 6:6 used as an illustration of tasteless food. Other translations follow the Targum in reading "white of an egg" (KJV, NAS, NIV) or find reference to another plant, the mallow (NRSV, REB).

PUT (Pŭt) Personal name and a geographic designation, perhaps derived from the Egyptian pdty meaning, "foreign bowman." 1. Son of Ham (Gen. 10:6; 1 Chron. 1:8) in "Table of Nations" and thus ancestor of inhabitants of Put. 2. Designation for a region of Africa bordering Egypt (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5; 38:5; Nah. 3:9; and, by emendation, Isa. 66:19). Put is generally identified with Libya, perhaps with the city of Cyrene. All references to the men of Put involve mercenaries, that is, soldiers for hire.

PUTHITES (Pū′ thītes) A family of Judahites (1 Chron. 2:53; KJV, Puhites).

PUTIEL (Pū′ tĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "he whom God gives" or "afflicted by God." Father-in-law of the priest Eliezar (Ex. 6:25).

PUVAH (Pū′ vah) Personal name spelled differently in Hebrew text and in various manuscripts and versions; thus rendered differently by translators. NAS (Num. 26:23) and NRSV (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23) form of the name of a son of Issachar. Other renderings include: Pua (KJV, REB); Puah (NIV, TEV); and Phuvah (KJV).

PUVVAH (Pūv vah) NAS alternate form of Puvah (Gen. 46:13).

PYGARG KJV term for a white-rumped antelope (Deut. 14:5). Most modern translations identify the underlying Hebrew term with the ibex. The REB has "white-rumped deer."

PYRAMIDS (Pyr′ -ĕ-mĭd) Four-sided structures have captivated visitors to Egypt for centuries. The present name apparently originated with some ancient Greek tourists who jokingly called the monuments "wheatcakes." This may describe the first "step pyramid," built by Djoser (Zoser) at Saqqara, but it was an injustice to those erected at Giza which represent one of the seven wonders of the world. The fourth dynasty (about 2520–2480 B.C.) reflected the zenith of pyramid construction.

The step-pyramid of King Djoser (Zoser) of the Third Dynasty located at Saqqara.

The most well known of these artificial mountains rises majestically on the edge of the Nile near Cairo (at Giza). The "Great Pyramid" stands 481 feet high with a base of 755 feet. This was constructed by Cheops (Khufu) c. 2580 B.C. His son, Chephren (Khafre), and grandson, Mycerinus (Menkaure), followed in their father's footsteps literally building in his shadow. Although not as grand, pyramids were constructed at various other places along the Nile including the distinctive "Bent Pyramid" at Dashur.

The purpose of these edifices was to intomb and immortalize the rulers. They actually act as focal points for a whole complex of buildings including a funerary temple, a causeway to a valley building near the Nile, and buried barges to carry the deceased to his eternal abode. They were not meant to be, however, astro-observatories or generators of mystical power.

The smallest of the three pyramids at Giza, built by Mycerinus (Menkaure).

The famous sphinx of Giza, built by Chephren (Khafre), measures 240 feet from front to back.

PYRE Pile of material to be burned, especially that used in burning a body as part of funeral rites (Isa. 30:33 NAS, NRSV; pile, KJV; firepit, NIV, REB). God's preparation of a funeral pyre for the Assyrian king highlights the certainty of God's judgment.

PYRRHUS (Pyr rhus) Personal name meaning, "fiery red." Father of Paul's companion Sopater (Acts 20:4).

Q Abbreviation of the German Quelle, meaning "source," used to designate the hypothetical common source of over 200 verses found in Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. According to the two-document hypothesis, Matthew and Luke inserted sayings material stemming from Q into Mark's narrative framework of the Jesus story (compare Luke 1:1 for evidence of previous sources). Verbatim agreements in the double tradition (material shared by Matthew and Luke but not Mark), common sequence of sayings within blocks of materials, and doublets (repetition) of sayings found but once in Mark point to the common source. A common version of the Q hypothesis regards Q as written in Greek in Palestine, perhaps Caesarea, between A.D. 50–60. Luke is held to have preserved the overall order of the Q sayings better, while Matthew felt free to rearrange much of the shared material to form his five major discourses. Some scholars are so confident in their ability to decipher Q that they have written commentaries and theologies of the alleged source. Others prefer to think of Q as an "oral" source. Still others remove any need for a common source for the double tradition by arguing for the priority of Matthew. See Harmony of the Gospels.

QOHELETH (Qō hĕl′ ĕth) Alternate spelling of Koheleth. See Koheleth.

QUAIL See Birds.

A large stone quarry in the area of Baalbek (in modern Lebanon) on the Orontes River.

QUARRY An area of land where stones were extracted for building various objects and buildings. Good stone lay close to the surface. In most places it was broken out of its bed by cracking the stones along lines of cleavage. Cutting these stones was obviously a dangerous business (Eccl. 10:9). KJV refers to quarries in Judges 3:19–26. The Hebrew term pesalim usually refers to images of gods. Thus most modern translations read: "idols" or "sculpted stones," the latter possibly referring to Joshua's stones of commemoration (Josh. 4).

Modern translations use "quarry" in 1 Kings 6:7 to make explicit the intention of the more literal KJV reading. See Masons.

QUARTERMASTER Officer charged with receipt and distribution of rations and supplies (Jer. 51:59 NAS, NRSV, REB). Quartermaster reflects the Hebrew "tribute-prince." The KJV reading "quiet prince" reflects a different vocalization of the Masoretic text. The NIV reading "staff-officer" likely reflects a slight change in the consonantal text to read "prince of the camp." See Prince.

QUARTUS (Quar' tŭs) Latin personal name meaning, "fourth." Christian, most likely from Corinth, who sent greetings to the Roman church through Paul (Rom. 16:23). Quartus and Tertius, whose name means "third" (Rom. 16:22), were possibly the third and fourth sons of the same family.

Famous bust of Queen Nefertiti (from about 1356 B.C.), wife of Pharaoh Akhenaton of Egypt.

QUATERNION (Qua tĕr' nĭ ŏn) KJV term for a squad composed of four soldiers (Acts 12:4; compare John 19:23). By translating the underlying Greek as simply squad, NAS and RSV failed to convey the size of the guard.

QUEEN The wife or widow of a monarch and the female monarch reigning in her own right. Queen mother refers to the mother of a reigning monarch. Female regents were known in the Ancient Near East (1 Kings 10:1–13, the queen of Sheba; Acts 8:27, the Ethiopian Candace). No queen ruled Israel or Judah in her own right, though Athaliah usurped power (2 Kings 11:1–3). The wives of monarchs varied in their influence. Since marriages often sealed political alliances (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Kings 3:1; 16:31; 2 Kings 8:25–27), daughters of more powerful allies such as the Egyptian pharaoh or king of Tyre enjoyed special privileges (1 Kings 7:8) and influence (1 Kings 16:32–33; 18:19; 21:7–14). The mother of the designated heir also enjoyed special status. Nathan enlisted Bathsheba rather than Solomon in his plan to have Solomon confirmed as king (1 Kings 1:11–40). Queen mother was an official position in Israel and Judah. Great care was taken in preserving the names of the queen mothers (1 Kings 14:21; 15:2,13; 22:42; 2 Kings 8:26). Asa's removal of his mother from the office for idolatry (1 Kings 15:13) points to its official character. On her son's death, Athaliah murdered her own grandsons, the legitimate heirs, in order to retain the power she had enjoyed as queen mother (2 Kings 11:1–2). The queen mother likely served as a trusted counsel for her son (Prov. 31:1). As queen mother, Jezebel continued as a negative force after the death of Ahab (1 Kings 22:52; 2 Kings 3:2,13; 9:22).

QUEEN OF HEAVEN A goddess women in Judah worshiped to ensure fertility and material stability (Jer. 7:18; 44:17). Forms of worship included making cakes (possibly in her image as in molds found at Mari), offering drink offerings, and burning incense (Jer. 44:25). Exactly which goddess was worshiped is not certain. The words could be translated "stars of heaven" or "heavenly host." However, "queen of heaven" appears to be the best rendering. The major influence could have been Ishtar, the Mesopotamian goddess called there the queen of heaven (imported to Israel by Manassseh), or the Canaanite Ashtarte. Archaeologists have uncovered many images of nude goddesses from Israelite sites, showing why Jeremiah protested against such worship.

QUEEN OF SHEBA see Sheba.

QUICK, QUICKEN KJV terms meaning, "living, alive" and "make alive, revive, refresh" (Pss. 55:15; 119:25; John 5:21; Acts 10:42).

QUICKSANDS KJV translation of the Greek syrtis meaning, "sandbar" (Acts 27:17). Modern translations take syrtis as a proper name for the great sandbars off the west coast of Cyrene (modern Libya). NIV and REB paraphrase "sandbars of Syrtis" well conveys the sense.

QUILT NAS translation of a Hebrew term in 1 Samuel 19:13,16. Other possible translations include net (NRSV), pillow (KJV, RSV), and rug (REB).

QUIRINIUS Latin proper name which the KJV transliterated as Cyrenius. Modern versions prefer the Latin spelling. See Cyrenius.

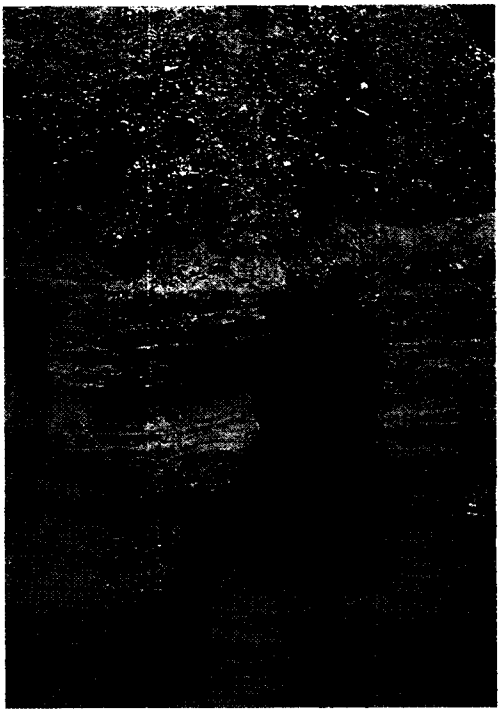
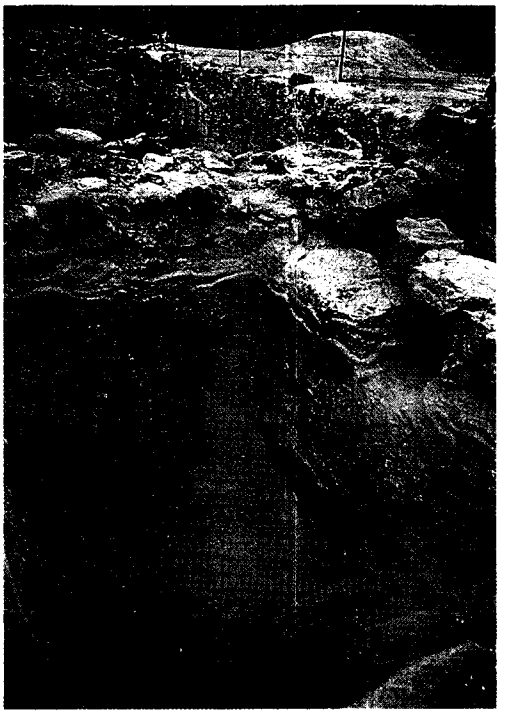
QUMRAN (Qūm′ răn) Archaeological site near the caves where Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered and center of Jewish Essene community.



The Location. The ruins called khirbet Qumran are located eight miles south of Jericho and three-fourths miles west of the northwestern edge of the Dead Sea. After the first discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, Qumran became the focus of archaeological investigation and was thoroughly excavated between 1953 and 1956. Among the areas excavated (a cemetery, extensive water system, refectory, kitchen, and prayer and study rooms), a room was discovered complete with the ruins of plaster benches and inkwells from the Roman period demonstrating that this was probably the "scriptorium" where the scrolls were copied.

The Qumran Community. The Qumran site was inhabited from about 130 B.C. to A.D. 70 by a sect so similar in nature, theology, and practice to a Jewish sect known as Essenes, that most scholars believe it was one variety of this sect. Ritual baptism, monastic life, and manual labor characterized the life of the Qumran Essenes. Although they allowed marriage, they shunned any contact with the outside world. Their main concern in life was complete and strict devotion to God. They expressed this through their scribal activity, the copying and studying of Scripture. In A.D. 70, with the Roman army posing a major threat to their existence, the Essenes of Qumran made a hasty exit, hiding their manuscripts in the surrounding caves as they left.



The Scrolls and Their Value In 1947, a young bedouin shepherd boy found an ancient scroll in a cave on the face of one of the sandstone cliffs in the Qumran area. In the following weeks and months a careful search of the area yielded 40,000 fragments of ancient manuscripts from eleven caves. Some 800 manuscripts are represented, of which 170 are fragments of Old Testament books (including manuscripts of each Old Testament book except Esther). The most important may be a nearly complete text of Isaiah. The rest of the scrolls include commentaries on Habakkuk and Micah, Jewish extrabiblical documents from the interbiblical and New Testament time periods, and extrabiblical writings specifically related to the community at Qumran such as the Genesis Apocryphon, Temple Scroll, and Manual of Discipline. Scrolls were found in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, and the scroll material included both parchment and papyrus. (Two copper scrolls were also discovered.) While the content of many of the scrolls extends to a much earlier date, the scrolls themselves have been dated to about 200 B.C. to A.D. 70.

The value of the Dead Sea Scrolls to biblical studies is twofold. First, they provide Old Testament Hebrew manuscripts which are one thousand years older than any other extant Old Testament manuscripts. Before 1947, the earliest Hebrew Old Testament manuscripts known to exist dated to the late ninth century A.D. With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, biblical scholarship now has access to Old Testament manuscripts dating from about 200–100 B.C. The significance of this is heightened by the fact that these are copies, which presuppose originals, thus offering another verification of an early date for the actual writing of the Old Testament. Second, the scrolls provide a glimpse into the Jewish theological and cultural milieu of the time of Christ and also provide examples of verbal expressions contemporary with the New Testament time period. Colossal statue of Ramses the Great at Karnak in Egypt

RAAMA(H) (Rā' ȧ mȧ) Son of Cush (Gen. 10:7) and ancestor of Sheba and Dedan. Arab tribes occupying southwest and west-central Arabia (1 Chron. 1:9). Raamah and Sheba were trading partners of Tyre (Ezek. 27:22). Raama is likely modern Negram in Yemen, though the earliest Greek translation identified Raamah with Regmah on the Persian Gulf.

RAAMIAH (Rā ȧ mī' ah) Returning Exile (Neh. 7:7). Variant form of Reelaiah (Ezra 2:2).

RAAMSES (Rā ăm' sēs) Alternate form of place name Rameses (Ex. 1:11).

RAB-MAG (Răb-măg) Title of the Babylonian official Nergal-Sharezer (Jer. 39:3,13). The name derives from the Akkadian rab mugi. The first element (rab) means, "chief." Unfortunately, the meaning of the second element is unknown. If associated with the root for magi, the Rab-mag was likely the officer in charge of divination (compare Ezek. 21:21).

RABBAH (Răb' bah) Place name meaning, "greatness." 1. Village near Jerusalem (Josh. 15:60) assigned to tribe of Judah but apparently in territory of Benjamin. Its location is uncertain.

2. Capital of Ammon that Moses apparently did not conquer (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 13:25), located about twenty-three miles east of the Jordan River. Inhabited in prehistoric times and again before 1500 B.C., the city became a fortified settlement early in its history. David besieged the city (2 Sam. 11:1) and captured it (12:28–29). It remained under Israelite control throughout the period of the United Monarchy, but regained its independence shortly after the Israelite division. Rabbah was destroyed during the Babylonian sweep through the area (590–580 B.C.) and not rebuilt for several hundred years. Rabbah was renamed Philadelphia by the Hellenists and later became Amman, the modern capital of Jordan. See Philadelphia.

RABBATH (Răb' bȧth) KJV variant spelling of Rabbah (Deut. 3:11; Ezek. 21:20).

RABBI (Răb' bī) Title meaning, "my master," applied to teachers and others of an exalted and revered position. During the New Testament period, the term rabbi came to be more narrowly applied to one learned in the law of Moses, without signifying an official office.

In the New Testament the title rabbi is used only in three of the gospels. In Matthew 23:7–8 scribes generally are addressed. In John 3:26 John the Baptist is thus called by his disciples. In all other occurrences "rabbi" and an alternate form "rabboni" apply to Jesus in direct address (Mark 9:5; 11:21; Mark 14:45, John 1:49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8; 20:16).

Luke never used the term rabbi, but the word epistata, the equivalent of "school-master," a term more meaningful to his predominantly Greek first readers (Luke 17:13).

A unique relationship existed between Jesus and His disciples, compared to the typical rabbi and his pupils. They were forbidden to call each other "rabbi" (Matt. 23:8), and in Matthew, particularly, Jesus' disciples call Him "Lord" (Kurie). For Matthew, Jesus was not just a teacher to His followers; He was their Lord. Robert Stagg RABBIT (Oractolagus cuniculus) Small, long-eared mammal related to the hare but differing in giving birth to naked young. NAS, NIV, and TEV use rabbit for an unclean animal in Leviticus 11:6; Deuteronomy 14:7 where other English translations use hare.

RABBITH (Răb bĭth) Unidentified site in territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:20). Rabbith is possibly a corruption of Daberath, a site included in other lists of Issachar's territory (Josh. 21:28; 1 Chron. 6:72) but missing in Joshua 19.

RABBONI (Rab bo' ni) Variant spelling of Rabbi.

RABSARIS (Răb' sȧ rĭs) An Assyrian court position with strong military and diplomatic powers. The Hebrew saris means "eunuch," but the term here is a transliteration of Akkadian and should not be taken literally. The title literally means "he who stands by the king." The Old Testament records that the rabsaris was sent on two occasions to deal with the Israelite kings (2 Kings 18:17; Jer. 39:3). Hezekiah and Zedekiah each rebelled against the Assyrian rule and withheld tribute payment. The rabsaris was among the ambassadors who called on the kings to demand payment. See Eunuch.

RABSHAKEH (Răb shȧ' kĕh) Assyrian title, literally, "chief cupbearer." The position probably began as a mere butler but developed into a highly influential post by the time of its mention in the Bible. The official who dealt with Hezekiah spoke for the Assyrian king much as would an ambassador. He urged the people of Jerusalem to consider turning over their king if he refused to pay the tribute demanded by the Assyrian throne (2 Kings 18:17–35). Mike Mitchell

RACA (Rā' cȧ) Word of reproach meaning, "empty" or "ignorant" that the Hebrew writers borrowed from the Aramaic language. Jesus used it in Matthew 5:22 as a strong term of derision, second only to "fool." He placed it in the context of anger and strongly condemned one who would use it of another person.

RACAL (Rā' cal) Unidentified site in southern Judah (1 Sam. 30:29). Most commentators follow the reading of the earliest Greek translation, "Carmel," and regard Racal as a textual corruption.

RACHAB (Rā′ chăb) KJV variant form of Rahab (Matt. 1:5).

RACHAL (Ra′ chăl) KJV and REB form of Racal (1 Sam. 30:29).

RACHEL (Rā′ chĕl) Personal name meaning, "ewe." Younger daughter of Laban, the second wife and cousin of Jacob, and the mother of Joseph and Benjamin.

In flight from his brother, Esau, Jacob met her when Rachel brought the sheep to water. She immediately become the object of his attention. See Jacob.

Two Old Testament passages outside Genesis name Rachel. Ruth 4:11 calls her one who built up the house of Israel. Jeremiah 31:15 refers to her weeping over children being taken in Exile. Matthew (2:18) cited Jeremiah's reference of weeping in connection with Herod's order to kill male children under two.

The traditional location of Rachel's tomb in Bethlehem.

RADDAI (Răd dā ī) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh rules." Son of Jesse and brother of David (1 Chron. 2:14).

RAFT King Hiram's means of transporting timber for the Temple by lashing logs together and floating them down the coast from Tyre to Joppa (1 Kings 5:9; 2 Chron. 2:16).

RAGAU (Rā′ ḡāū) KJV alternate form of Reu (Luke 3:35).

RAGUEL (Rā ḡū′ ĕl) KJV alternate form of Reuel (Num. 10:29).

RAHAB (Ra′ hab) Name meaning, "arrogant, raging, turbulent, afflicter." 1. Primeval sea monster representing the forces of chaos God overcame in creation (Job 9:13; 26:12; Ps. 89:10; Isa. 51:9; compare Ps. 74:12–17). 2. Symbolic name for Egypt (Ps. 87:4). Isaiah 30:7 includes a compound name Rahab-hem-shebeth. Translations vary: "Rahab who sits still" (NRSV); "Rahab who has been exterminated" (NAS); "Rahab the Do-Nothing" (NIV); "Rahab the Subdued" (REB). 3. The plural appears in Psalm 40:4 for the proud, arrogant enemies.

RAHAB (Rā′ hăb) Personal name meaning, "broad." Harlot in Jericho who hid two Hebrew spies Joshua sent there to determine the strength of the city (Josh. 2:1). When the king of Jericho learned of the spies' presence, he sent men to arrest them. Rahab outsmarted the king and hid the men on her roof, sending the arresting officers on a false chase toward the Jordan River. In return for her help Joshua spared her and her clan when the Hebrews destroyed Jericho (Josh. 6:17–25). Matthew named Rahab as Boaz' mother (1:5) in his genealogy of Christ, making her one of the Lord's ancestors. Some interpreters think, however, that the Rahab in Matthew was a different woman. Hebrews 11:31 lists Rahab among the heroes of faith.

RAHAM (Rā′ hăm) Personal name meaning, "mercy, love." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:44).

RAHEL (Rā hĕl) KJV alternate form of Rachel (Jer. 31:15).

RAIL KJV term meaning, "revile," "deride," "cast contempt upon," or "scold using harsh and abusive language" (1 Sam. 25:14; 2 Chron. 32:17; Mark 15:29; Luke 23:39).

RAIN Moisture from heaven providing nourishment for plant and animal life. Palestine was a land dependent upon the yearly rains to ensure an abundant harvest and an ample food supply for the coming year. Thus, the presence or absence of rain became a symbol of God's continued blessing or displeasure with the land and its inhabitants. Rain fell in two seasons: the early rains during October and November, and the later rains in February and March. Rarely did rain of any significance fall outside these two periods. Westerly winds from the Mediterranean Sea brought wet storms during the winter, most of the rain falling along the coastal plain, in the north, and in the central hills. Lower elevations, the Jordan Valley, and the south received less rain during the year. Long droughts often were followed by flash floods that quickly filled the seasonal creeks and riverbeds. The runoff was captured in cisterns for drinking water. In the Negev, farmers plowed during the rains to allow the fine desert dust to absorb the little rain that was available. The coming of the rain was viewed as God's continued pleasure with His people. The lack of rain in spring proclaimed His judgment for sin and disobedience. The Canaanites worshiped Baal as the god of rain and thunder, and sexual orgies were enacted to provoke his presence in the land.

RAINBOW Caused by the reflection and refraction of sunlight by droplets of rain, a rainbow often appears after the passing of thunderstorms, marking its end. The bow is colored by the division of sunlight into its primary colors. The rainbow served to remind Israel and her God of His covenant with Noah to never again destroy the earth by flooding (Gen. 9:8–17). The Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh, another ancient flood account, does not include the sign of the rainbow. The rainbow and its beauty became a symbol of the majesty and beauty of God. While having a vision, Ezekiel compared the brightness of the glory of God with the colors of the rainbow (1:28). Habakkuk also used the bow to describe the scene of God's final deliverance of His people (3:9). The Book of Revelation records John's vision of the throne of Christ as surrounded by the rainbow, "in sight like unto an emerald." (4:3). Later, Revelation 10:1 pictures a descending angel with the rainbow shining upon his head and having a face as the sun.

RAISIN CAKES Food prepared by pressing dried grapes together. David gave raisin cakes ("flagon," KJV) to those who accompanied the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3 NRSV). Hosea 3:1 (NRSV) links raisin cakes with the worship of pagan deities (compare Jer. 7:18).

RAKEM (Rā' kĕm) Personal name meaning, "varigated, multicolored." Grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16).

RAKKATH (Răk' kăth) Place name meaning, "spit," "narrow," or "swamp." Fortified town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), either at Tiberias or else at tell Eqlatiyeh about one and one half miles northwest of Tiberias. Artifacts spanning the Bronze Age have been recovered from the latter site.

RAKKON (Răk kon) Place name possibly meaning, "swamp" or "narrow place." Village in the vicinity of Joppa allotted to Dan (Josh. 19:46). The site is perhaps tell er-Reqqeit two miles north of the mouth of the Jarkon River (Nahr el-'Auja). The omission of the name in the earliest Greek translation suggests that Rakkon may result from a scribe having copied Me-jarkon and then started over in the middle of the word, copying the last half twice.

RAM (Răm) Personal name meaning, "high, exalted." 1. Ancestor of David (Ruth 4:19; 1 Chron. 2:9) and Jesus (Matt. 1:3–4). 2. Jerahmeel's eldest son (1 Chron. 2:25,27), the nephew of 1. 3. Head of the family to which Job's friend Elihu belonged (Job 32:2).

RAMA (Rā' mа) KJV alternate form of Ramah (Matt. 2:18).

RAMAH (Rā' mah) Place name meaning, "high," applied to several cities located on heights, especially military strongholds. 1. Border town in tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:29). The precise location of the city is unknown, although most scholars would place it in the vicinity of Tyre. 2. Fortified city of tribal territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36), this town is probably to be identified with present-day er-Rameh. Ramah of Asher and Ramah of Naphtali could have been the same community since the boundaries of Asher and Naphtali join.

3. Ramah of Gilead usually called Ramoth-Gilead. Compare 2 Kings 8:28–29; 2 Chronicles 22:6. See Ramoth-Gilead.

4. City in the inheritance of Benjamin listed along with Gibeon, Beeroth, Jerusalem, and others (Josh. 18:25). It is to be identified with modern er-Ram five miles north of Jerusalem. In ancient times this location placed the city between the rival kingdoms of Israel and Judah, which led to dire consequences (1 Kings 15:16–22; 2 Chron. 16:1, 5,6).

The traditional site of Rachel's tomb was connected with Ramah (1 Sam. 10:2; Jer. 31:15). Deborah, the prophetess, dwelt and judged Israel from the Ramah vicinity (Judg. 4:4,5). Hosea mentioned Ramah (Hos. 5:8), and Isaiah prophesied that the approaching Assyrian army would march through Ramah (Isa. 10:29).

The Babylonians apparently used Ramah as a prisoner-of-war camp from which captives of Jerusalem were processed and sent into Babylonian Exile. There Jeremiah was released from his chains and allowed to remain in Judah (Jer. 40:1–6). People returning from captivity settled there (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30).

5. A city of the Negev, the arid desert south of Judea, in the tribal inheritance of Simeon (Josh. 19:8). David once gave presents to this town following his successful battle with the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:27).

6. Birthplace, home, and burial place of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:19; 2:11; 7:17; 8:4; 15:34; 25:1). In 1 Samuel 1:1 the long form, Ramathaim-Zophim, is used. Samuel built an altar to the Lord at Ramah. From there he "judged" Israel and went on a yearly circuit to other cities (1 Sam. 7:15–17). Some have argued that Ramathaim-Zophim is identical with Ramah of Benjamin. It may also be the town, Arimathea, hometown of Joseph, in whose tomb Jesus was buried (Matt. 27:57–60).

RAMATH (Rā′ măth) Place name meaning, "height, elevated place." An element of several names: Ramath-lehi meaning, "height of the jawbone," site of Samson's victory over the Philistines (Judg. 15:17); Ramath-Mizpeh (alternately Ramath-Mizpah) meaning, "height of lookout or watchtower" (Josh. 13:26); Ramath-Negeb meaning, "Ramath of the South," (Josh. 19:8; 1 Sam. 30:27). RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM (Rā mȧ thā′ ĭm-Zō′ phĭm) Birthplace of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1). The first element in the name means, "twin peaks." The final element distinguishes this Ramath from others. Zophim is perhaps a corruption of Zuph, the home district of Samuel (1 Sam. 9:5).

RAMATHITE (Rā′ măth ĭte) Resident of Ramah (1 Chron. 27:27).

RAMESES (Răm′ ĕ sēs) Egyptian capital city and royal residence during the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties (about 1320–1085 B.C.). The exact location is uncertain, although it appears to have been in the Nile delta and may be the same as Tanis or Zoan. It was near the area where the Hebrews had settled under Joseph's administration (Gen. 47:11). After the Israelites became slaves, they were forced to help build Rameses and Pithom (Ex. 1:11) as store cities for Pharaoh Rameses II. Rameses accomodated seagoing vessels from the Mediterranean Sea and river traffic from the Nile. Surrounding the city were groves of fruit trees and vineyards. The city was quite propsperous because of the commerce which went through its port. See Egypt; Exodus; Pithom.

RAMOTH-GILEAD (Rā′ mŏth-gĭl′ ė ȧd) Place name meaning, "heights of Gilead." One of the cities of refuge Moses appointed for unintentional killers (Deut. 4:43; compare Josh. 20:8) and Levitical cities (Josh. 21:38). It probably was located in northeastern Gilead, east of the Jordan. Solomon made Ramoth-gilead a district capital (1 Kings 4:13). After the division of the kingdom about 922 B.C., the city fell to Syria (1 Kings 22:3) and remained there for almost seventy years. Ahab attempted to retake the city but was mortally wounded in the battle (1 Kings 22:29–40). Joram did recapture the city (2 Kings 9:14; compare 8:28). In Ramoth-gilead Elisha anointed Jehu as king over Israel (2 Kings 9:1–6). In 722 B.C. the region was taken by Assyria.

RAMPART Outer ring of fortifications, usually earthworks. The underlying Hebrew term is literally, "encirclement," and can be applied to moats and walls as well as earthworks (2 Sam. 20:15; Ps. 122:7; Lam. 2:8). Because Jerusalem was ringed by steep valleys, only its north side had extensive ramparts.

RAPE Crime of engaging in sexual intercourse with another without consent by force and/or deception. Mosaic law required a man who had seduced a virgin to pay the bride price and offer to marry her (Ex. 22:16–17). The forcible rape of an engaged woman was a capital offense (Deut. 22:25–27). In other cases of forcible rape, the offender was required to marry his victim and was not permitted to divorce her (Deut. 22:28–29). Lot's daughter made their father drunk and then raped him (Gen. 19:30–35). Shechem raped Dinah by force (Gen. 34:1–2). The men of Gibeah gang raped a Levite's concubine and so brutalized her that she died (Judg. 19:25). Amnon's rape of his half sister Tamar was a premeditated act involving both deception and force (2 Sam. 13:1–22). This account reveals the mind of the rapist whose uncontrolled desire quickly turned to fierce hatred for his victim (13:15). Rape was one horror associated with the fall of Jerusalem (Lam. 5:11; Zech. 14:2).

Today victims of rape are too frequently made to feel they are on trial. The Mosaic code highlighted the victim's rights, both to monetary compensation and to recovery of dignity. This quest for dignity was a driving force behind acts of retaliatory violence recorded in the narrative texts. These texts, however, suggest the ease with which the victim is forgotten in the spiral of vengeful violence. See Sex, Biblical Teaching On.

RAPHA (Rā′ phȧ) Personal name meaning, "He has healed." 1. Fifth son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:2). The parallel in Genesis 46:21 gives the name Naaman. 2. KJV form of Raphah (1 Chron. 8:37).

RAPHAH (Rā phah) Personal name from a root meaning, "heal." A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:37). Raphah is identified with Rephaiah of 1 Chronicles 9:43.

RAPHU (Rā′ phû) Personal name meaning, "healed." Father of the Benjaminite representative among the twelve spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:9).

RAPTURE The catching up of believers by Christ at the time of His return. The word came into use by way of the Latin rapio used to translate the Greek term of 1 Thessalonians 4:17, harpagēsōmetha. Living believers are said to be "caught up" to meet the Lord at His coming. Those of varying millennial views about end time events all hold firmly to the biblical truth of such a rapture. However, it is within the premillennial view that the teaching of a rapture finds major emphasis.

This view sees a tribulation period immediately before the second coming of Christ. Pretribulationists see the rapture occuring prior to the tribulation. This approach places the church in heaven during the time of tribulation on earth.

Mid-tribulationists place the rapture at the midpoint of a seven-year tribulation period. The church remains on earth for the first half of the tribulation, but escapes the last half which is seen to be the time of intense or great tribulation. This view, along with the previous one, sees the second coming of Christ in two phases. The first phase will be a secret coming in clouds to rapture the church. The second will be His return with the church to reign on earth.

Posttribulationists hold the church will remain on earth during the tribulation period. While that time will be one of wrath upon the world system, the church will be protected from divine wrath although experiencing tribulation. This view avoids dividing the return of Christ into two phases. See Eschatology; Future Hope; Tribulation. Jerry W. Batson

RAVEN, RAVIN KJV term for "prowl for food" or "feed greedily" (Ps. 22:13; Ezek. 22:25,27). KJV used ravin both as a verb meaning, "to prowl for food" (Gen. 49:27), and as a noun meaning, "something taken as prey" (Nah. 2:12).

RAZORS, SHAVING Instruments used in and process of removing facial hair. The customs of ancient nations regarding facial hair varied greatly. The availability of inscriptional and pictorial evidence as to these customs shows that nations had their own individual practices. Egyptians were known for their fastidious attention to personal cleanliness and did not shave the hair of their beard and head only in times of mourning. Their normal custom was to shave both with the motive of cleanliness. The pictures and statues of pharaohs show them with beards which we now know were fake.

The custom of shaving the face and head was less common among the Hebrews. Among them, in parallel with most Western Asiatics including the Assyrians, the beard was considered as an ornament and point of pride, and was not shaven, but only trimmed (2 Sam. 19:24; Ezek. 44:20). The beard was cherished as the badge of dignity of manhood.

Shaving was done with a sharp cutting instrument made from a variety of materials, but usually from either flint, obsidian, or iron (Isa. 7:20; Ezek. 5:1), but only in unusual circumstances. The razor could be a simple knife, probably elongated with a rounded end, or an elaborate instrument, sometimes decorated. Shaving was practiced as a sign of mourning (Job 1:20; Jer. 7:29), as a sign of subservience to a superior (Num. 8:7; Gen. 41:14), and as a treatment for a person with leprosy (Lev. 14:9). Jimmy Albright

REAIA (Rē âi' a) KJV form of Reaiah (1 Chron. 5:5).

REAIAH (Rē âi ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has seen." 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:52). 2. Member of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:5). 3. Head of a family of Temple servants (Nethanim) returning from Exile (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50).

REAP To harvest grain using a sickle (Ruth 2:3–9). Reaping is used as a symbol of recompense for good (Hos. 10:12; Gal. 6:7–10) and evil (Job 4:8; Prov. 22:8; Hos. 8:7; 10:13), of evangelism (Matt. 9:37–38; Luke 10:2; John 4:35–38), and of final judgment (Matt. 13:30,39; Rev. 14:14–16).

REBA (Rē' bȧ) Personal name from a root meaning, "lie down." Midianite king whom Israel defeated in the time of Moses (Num. 31:8). Joshua 13:21 connects the defeat of the Midianite kings with that of the Amorite king Sihon (Num. 21:21–35).

REBECCA (Rē bĕc' cȧ) New Testament form of Rebekah.

REBEKAH (Rē bĕk' ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "cow." Daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew (Gen. 24:15); Isaac's wife (24:67); mother of Jacob and Esau (25:25–26). Rebekah was a complex character. She is introduced as a beautiful virgin (24:16), willing servant (24:19), and as hospitable to strangers (24:25). In obedience to God's will, she left her home in Paddan-aram to be Isaac's wife (24:58). Rebekah comforted Isaac after the death of Sarah (24:67). When distressed by her problem pregnancy, she turned to God for counsel (25:22–23). Less favorable is Rebekah's favoritism towards Jacob (25:28), especially as evidenced in the plan she concocted to enable Jacob to steal Esau's blessing (27:5–17). Rebekah was forced to send her favorite to her brother's household to save Jacob from Esau's vengeance (27:42–46).

RECAB, RECHBITE (Rē' căb) NIV form of Rechab, Rechabite.

RECAH (Rē' cah) Unidentified site in Judah (1 Chron. 4:12). An early Greek manuscript has Rechab in place of Recah.

RECHAB (Rē' chăb) Personal name meaning, "rider" or "charioteer." 1. Leader, together with his brother, of a band of Benjaminite raiders. He and his brother murdered Saul's son Ish-bosheth, thinking to court David's favor. His response was their execution (2 Sam. 4:1–12). 2. Father or ancestor of J[eh]onadab, a supporter of Jehu's purge of the family of Ahab and other worshipers of Baal (2 Kings 10:15,23). 3. Father or ancestor of Malchijah, who assisted in Nehemiah's repair of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:14), possibly identical with 2.

RECHABITES (Rĕ′ chă bītes) Descendants of Jehonadab ben Rechab, who supported Jehu when he overthrew the house of Ahab (2 Kings 10:15–17). About 599 B.C., the Rechabites took refuge from Nebuchadnezazar in Jerusalem (Jer. 35). At that point, the Lord commanded Jeremiah to take them to the Temple and give them wine to drink. When he did so, they refused, saying that their father Jonadab (Jehonadab) had commanded them not to drink wine, nor to live in houses, nor to engage in agriculture. These regulations may have been intended as a protest against Canaanite religion or settled life in general, but more likely they protected the Rechabites' life-style and trade secrets as itinerant metalworkers. Jeremiah contrasted their faithfulness to the commandments of their ancestor with the faithlessness of the people of Judah to the Lord. Ricky L. Johnson

RECHAH (Rē′ chah) KJV form of Recah.

RECONCILIATION (Rĕ cŏn cĭ lĭ ā′ tion) The establishment of friendly relations between parties who are at variance with each other, making peace after an engagement in war, or readmission to the presence and favor of a person after rebellion against the person. In 1525 William Tyndale, in his translation of the New Testament from the Greek text, attempted to discover an English word that would express the true meaning of the Greek katallage as well as the Latin reconciliation. Unable to find the word, he coined one. The word he coined was atonement (at-one-ment), and he used it in Romans 5:11. The King James Version committee followed Tyndale and used atonement. More recent versions and translations have returned to "reconciliation," largely because the word atonement has been encumbered with various theories of atonement.

Old Testament The idea of reconciliation between two people and between Israel and God was dominant in the Old Testament though there was no specific term to express it. The Hebrews viewed sin, whether intentional or unintentional, as a breach of the covenant between God and Israel. Sin brought about an estrangement between God and the nation or God and the individual. Provisions were made for Israel and the individual to be restored in God's favor. The Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) was designated as the day when unintentional sins of the people could be forgiven (Lev. 16:1–31; 23:26–32). For these unknown sins the Hebrews were forgiven by the sacrifices and elaborate ritual of the high priest. What about deliberate sins? These could be forgiven only by prayer and repentence. All the sacrifices in the Old Testament could never complete the act of drawing near to God and bringing a sinner into a right relationship with God (Hebrews 10:1–18). The Jewish rabbis realized this and taught that a person could be reconciled to God only by good deeds, repentance, and confession. Theirs was a self-reconciliation. A person was the subject, and God was the object. Humans took the initiative to make peace with God; God did not reconcile the person to Himself.

New Testament While the concept of reconciliation is prevalent throughout the New Testament, the term is found only in Paul's Epistles (Rom. 5:10–21; 2 Cor. 5:18–20; Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20–21; Rom. 11:15; 1 Cor. 7:11) and in Matthew 5:23–24. However, in Matthew a different preposition is used with the Greek verb. Paul saw the need for reconciliation of humans to oneself, other people, and the environment, but his chief interest was in a person being reconciled to God.

Paul did not hint that the attitudes of God and humanity were mutually antagonistic. Hostility and estrangement had its origin in humans. Mankind through indifference, active enmity, and passive hatred had rebelled against God and stood in need of being reconciled to Him. God's creatures defied the divine purpose for life and destroyed the fellowship for which they were intended. They substituted for the true foundation of fellowship a whole series of relationships which formed a kingdom of evil and promoted estrangement from God. Thus, all mankind came under the wrath of God (the situation that pertains when a person is alienated from God).

The Sovereign of the universe, who could rightfully annihilate us, took the initiative in breaking down the estranging barrier between Himself and us. In the Old Testament humans were the subject of the action in attempting to be restored to favor with God, the object. The New Testament reverses the action. God became the subject, and a person the object. Paul said, "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 5:18). In the same context he affirmed, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor. 5:19). Again he argued, "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life" (Rom. 5:10). Reconciliation for Paul meant that a complete reversal of the relation between God and humans had been accomplished. Through His love manifested to us in the death of Christ on the cross even while we were in the state of being sinners, God delivered us from law, wrath, sin, and death—the tyrannies that hold humanity in check—and brought us by faith in Christ into a peaceful relationship with Himself.

The New Testament not only reveals God's act of reconciliation in Christ, but it also exhorts us to be reconciled to fellow human beings. Since God has taken the initiative in removing our hostility toward Him, it is incumbent on us to take action in overcoming the enmity that exists between us and others. In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus taught that reconciliation with one's brother was essential to genuine worship of God (Matt. 5:23–24). Paul in Ephesians 2:14–18 dramatically proclaimed that through the cross Christ reconciled both Gentile and Jew into one new humanity by terminating the hostility that existed between them. The church is commissioned to perform a ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:12–21). As the body of Christ, we have received the reconciling word, the command and power to be at peace with God and one another.

Paul used other words to express essentially the same concept. When we are reconciled to God, we have peace (Rom. 5:1; 1 Cor. 7:15; Gal. 5:22; Eph. 4:3; Phil. 4:7; Col. 3:15; 2 Thess. 3:16). No longer being alienated from God, we have freedom (Rom. 6:22; 8:2; Gal. 5:1) and sonship (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:5). In Romans 5:8–10 and 2 Corinthians 5:17–21 reconciliation is used in conjunction with righteousness of God (justification). They both demonstrate an activity on the part of God in removing the barrier of sin that alienates people from God. See Atonement; Cross; Jesus; Salvation. T. C. Smith RECORDER Government post with unidentified responsibilities (as in 2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24). The REB identified the recorder as the secretary of state. The TEV identified the recorder as the official in charge of [court] records. The term possibly refers to a court herald. Most translations use recorder, thus leaving the function open.

RED See Colors. KJV used red as the translation of several Hebrew terms where modern translations substitute another meaning: "foaming" (Ps. 75:8); "pleasant" or "delight" (Isa. 27:2); and "porphyry" (Esth. 1:6).

RED HEIFER The function of the red heifer ceremony was production of ash for the water used to remove ritual impurity contracted through contact with a corpse, bones, or a grave (Num. 19). The rite involved: slaughter of a sacrificially acceptable heifer outside the camp; sprinkling blood toward the tent of meeting seven times; burning the entire heifer, including its blood and dung, together with cedarwood, hyssop, and scarlet thread (compare Lev. 14:4); and storing the ash in a clean place outside the camp. The water for removing the impurity contracted through contact with the dead was prepared by mixing running water with the ash. Impure persons and objects were sprinkled on the third and seventh days after contamination to remove uncleanness. Hebrews 9:14 uses the image of the red heifer ceremony to picture Christ's cleansing believers of the effect of "dead works." Dead works refer either to "acts that lead to death" (NIV; "useless rituals" in view of salvation TEV) or works produced prior to being made alive in Christ (compare Heb. 6:1).

RED SEA (REED SEA) Body of water God dried up in the Exodus. Red Sea is a common translation of two Hebrew words yam suph. Yam means "sea," but suph does not normally mean "red." Suph often means "reeds" (Ex. 2:3,5; Isa. 19:6) or "end," "hinder part" (Joel 2:20; 2 Chron. 20:16; Eccl. 3:11). Yam suph could be translated "Sea of Reeds" or "Sea at the end of the world." The earliest known translation of the Hebrew Bible (the Greek Septuagint about 200 B.C.) translated yam suph consistently with Erthra Thalassa "Red Sea." Jerome continued the process in the Latin Vulgate (A.D. 400) by using Mare Rubrum "Red Sea" for yam suph. Most English translations have followed the Vulgate and use "Red Sea" in the text with a footnote indicating the literal translation is "Reed Sea." TEV uses various terms to translate yam suph: "Gulf of Suez (Ex. 10:19); "Red Sea" (see footnote on Ex. 13:18); and "Gulf of Aqaba (1 Kings 9:26).

We do not know who first suggested the translation "Reed Sea." In the eleventh century the French Jewish scholar Rashi spoke of yam suph in terms of a marsh overgrown with weeds. In the twelfth century Ibn Ezra, a Spanish Jew, commented that yam suph in Exodus 13:18 may be so named because reeds grow around it. Martin Luther translated yam suph as Schilfmeer: "Reed Sea." Although the name "Reed Sea" has been widely accepted by many scholars, there have been many recent attempts to prove the term "Sea of Reeds" is not a legitimate reading for yam suph.

The Old Testament uses the term yam suph to refer to more than one location. In Exodus 10:19 it refers to the Gulf of Suez as the place where the locusts were driven and destroyed. In 1 Kings 9:26 it refers to the Gulf of Aqaba where the ships of Solomon's navy were stationed. The same location may be indicated in Jeremiah 49:21 where the cries of Edom could be heard. The "Way of the (yam suph) Red Sea" is part of the name of a highway out of Egypt (Ex. 13:18; Num. 14:45; 21:4; Deut. 1:40; 2:1; Judg. 11:16). The "Red Sea" was the name of a camp along the way from Egypt (Num. 33:10,11). Yam suph marked the ideal southern border of Israel (Ex. 23:31), but the most significant reference of "Red Sea" in the Old Testament was to the place where God delivered Israel from Pharaoh's army (Ex. 15:4,22; Num. 21:14; Duet. 11:4; Josh. 2:10; 4:23; 24:6; Neh. 9:9; Ps. 106:7,9–11,22; 136:13–15).

where Israel crossed the "Red Sea" on their way out of Egypt. Four primary theories have been suggested as to the place of the actual crossing of the isthmus of Suez: (1) the northern edge of the Gulf of Suez; (2) a site in the center of the isthmus near Lake Timsah; (3) a site at the northern edge of the isthmus and the southern edge of Lake Menzaleh; and (4) across a narrow stretch of sandy land which separates Lake Sirbonis from the Mediterranean Sea. Although no one knows the exact site of the crossing, the weight of the biblical evidence is on the side of suggested site number two. See Exodus Event.

REDEEM, REDEMPTION, REDEEMER To pay the required price to secure the release of a convicted criminal, the process therein involved, and the person making the payment. In early use the idea and the words related to legal and commercial activities. They provided biblical writers with one of the most basic and dynamic images for describing God's saving activity toward mankind.

Old Testament Three Hebrew words express the legal and commercial use of the redemptive concept. Padah was used only in relation to the redemption of persons or other living beings. For example, if a person owned an ox which was known to be dangerous but did not keep the ox secured and the ox gored the son or daughter of a neighbor, both the ox and the owner would be stoned to death. If, however, the father of the slain person offered to accept an amount of money, the owner could pay the redemption price and live (Ex. 21:29–30; compare v. 32). Numbers 18:15–17 shows how religious practice adopted such language.

The Hebrew ga'al indicated a redemption price in family members involving the responsibility of a next-of-kin. See Kinsman. God called Jeremiah to demonstrate his confidence in God's promise by going out from Jerusalem to his ancestral village, Anathoth, and acting as next-of-kin to redeem or ransom the family land by paying the redemption price for it (Jer. 32:6–15). Such commercial practices easily passed over into religious concepts. God would redeem Israel from her iniquities.

The third Hebrew word kipper or "cover" came to extensive use in strictly religious concepts and practices. It is the word from which "Kippur" is derived in "Yom Kippur," Day of Atonement, or Day of Covering, perhaps the most sacred of the holy days in Judaism. The verbal form in the Old Testament is always used in a religious sense such as the covering of sin or the making of atonement for sin. See Atonement. The noun form, however, is sometimes used in the secular sense of a bribe (Amos 5:12) or ransom (Ex. 21:30). In Psalm 49:7–8 it is used in the sense of ransom in association with padah (redeem).

The doctrine of redemption in the Old Testament is not derived from abstract philosophical thought but from Hebrew concrete thinking. Religious redemption language grows out of the custom of buying back something which formerly belonged to the purchaser but for some reason had passed into the ownership of another. The original owner could regain ownership by paying a redemption price for it. In the Old Testament the terms and ideas are frequently used symbolically to emphasize dramatically the redemptive or saving activity of God. The basic Old Testament reference is the Exodus. At the sea God redeemed His people from slavery in Egypt (for example, Ex. 6:6; 15:13; Deut. 7:8; Ps. 77:15).

God similarly redeemed Israel from the Babylonian captivity by giving Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba to King Cyrus (Isa. 43:3; compare 48:20; 51:11; 62:12). Job knew that he had a living Redeemer (Job 19:25). Psalmists prayed for redemption from distress (26:11; 49:15) and testified to God's redeeming work (31:5; 71:23; 107:2). The Old Testament witness is that God is "my strength and my redeemer" (Ps. 19:14).

New Testament The New Testament centers redemption in Jesus Christ. He purchased the church with His own blood (Acts 20:28), gave His flesh for the life of the world (John 6:51), as the Good Shepherd laid down His life for His sheep (John 10:11) and demonstrated the greatest love by laying down His life for His friends (John 15:13). The purpose of Jesus in the world was to make a deliberate sacrifice of Himself for human sin. He did something sinful people could not do for themselves. He brought hope to sinners, providing redemption from sin and fellowship with the Eternal Father. As the Suffering Servant, His was a costly sacrifice, the shameful and agonizing death of a Roman cross. New Testament redemption thus speaks of substitutionary sacrifice demonstrating divine love and righteousness. It points to a new relationship to God, the dynamic of a new life, God's leniency in the past, and the call for humility for the future.

In other ways and language the centrality of redemption through the death of Jesus Christ is expressed throughout the New Testament from the Lamb of God who lifts up and carries away the sin of the world (John 1:29) to the redeeming Lamb praised by a multitude because He was slain and by His blood redeemed unto God's people of every kindred, tongue, and nation (Rev. 5:8–14). REGEM (Rē′ ğĕm) Personal name meaning, "friend." Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47).

REGEM-MELECH (Rē′ ğĕm-Mē′ lĕch) Personal name meaning, "friend of the king." Delegate whom the people of Bethel sent to Jerusalem to inquire about continuing to fast in commemoration of the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple (Zech. 7:2). The prophet repeated the word of previous prophets: God desires moral lives rather than fasts (7:9–10).

REGENERATION (Rē′ ğĕn ĕr ā′ tion) The radical spiritual change in which God brings an individual from a condition of spiritual defeat and death to a renewed condition of holiness and life. The biblical doctrine of regeneration emphasizes God's role in making this spiritual change possible.

Biblical Terms The term regeneration (palingenesia) appears in Titus 3:5 as a description of the spiritual change which baptism symbolizes. The idea of regeneration is also conveyed by the use of other terms related to the idea of birth. Jesus referred to regeneration when he told Nicodemus (John 3:3) that he must be "born again" (gennaō anōthen). The term born again may also be translated as "born from above." This translation emphasizes the sovereign role of God in bringing about the experience of regeneration. In John 1:13 the term born (gennaō) refers to the act of regeneration. In 1 Peter 1:23 another Greek word (anagennaō) receives the translation "born again." All of these words describe the complete spiritual change which occurs when Christ enters the life of an individual.

The idea of regeneration also appears in other figures of speech which refer to concepts in addition to birth. When Paul described those in Christ as a "new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17 NIV), he was referring to the act of regeneration. In Ephesians 2:10 Paul referred to Christians as God's "workmanship" made for the purpose of good works. Sometimes the idea of receiving new life is used as a description of regeneration (compare John 5:21; 7:38; 10:10; John 10:28). In 1 Peter 2:2, the apostle described followers of Jesus as "newborn babes."

Whether the figure used involves birth, life, creation, or flowing rivers, the Bible is presenting a new experience of life which is enriching, comprehensive, and thoroughly renewed in holiness.

Need for Regeneration The great need for an experience of regeneration is apparent from the sinful condition of human beings, "dead in trespasess and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Left to themselves, human beings will corrupt God's revelation of Himself and turn to gross forms of disobedience (Rom. 1:18–32). God, however, demands holiness as a condition for having fellowship with Himself (Heb. 12:14). Human beings therefore must have a radical change in the very character of their personality. God promises such a change in the experience of regeneration.

Source of Regeneration Throughout Scripture the source of regeneration is the work of the Holy Spirit. Both Scripture (Rom. 3:10–23) and human experience indicate that people lack the power and will to reform. God works upon the human disposition by the use of truth (Jas. 1:18). This truth is the message of salvation which we find in the gospel of Jesus Christ. The role of the Holy Spirit is to take this truth and commend it to the understanding of each hearer (John 16:8–11). Regeneration occurs when the Holy Spirit takes the truth of the gospel message and allows the individual both to understand it and to commit oneself to it. There is a divine initiative through the Holy Spirit. There is a human responsibility in the response to the Spirit's urging.

Role of Baptism Some churches hold that the experience of regeneration is brought about by the act of baptism. The view which advocates this teaching is known as baptismal regeneration. The Scriptures do not present baptism as the means of regeneration but as the sign of regeneration. Peter's discussion of baptism in 1 Peter 3:21 pictures the experience of baptism as the symbol of a conscientious response to God. In other texts (Acts 2:38; Col. 2:12; Titus 3:5) we can understand the meaning of the biblical writer by distinguishing between regeneration as an inward change and baptism as the outward sign of that change. The actual change of regeneration is an instantaneous experience brought about by the Holy Spirit. Baptism becomes a means of demonstrating publicly and outwardly the nature of this change. See Baptism.

Result of Regeneration Ephesians 4:17–32 makes the result of regeneration apparent. Paul first discussed the nature of the spiritual change in a believer. In regeneration each believer has put off the old way of life, become clothed with a new way of life, and is in the process of having one's mind renewed in its thinking, reasoning, and willing. Because of this experience Paul urged each believer to practice truth, control anger, demonstrate kindness, and submit to the control of the Holy Spirit. The fact of regeneration formed the basis for giving an appeal to live a new life.

The experience of regeneration does not leave an individual content and passive in efforts at Christian growth. Old powers of evil have been broken. The possibility of victory in the constant struggle with sin has become certain.

REGIMENT NIV term for cohort, a tenth of a legion (Acts 10:1; 27:1). See Cohort.

REGISTER KJV term for a record of names, a genealogical registry (Ezra 2:62; Neh. 7:5,64). Modern translations use register more often in the verbal sense, to record in formal records (NAS: Num 1:18; 11:26; 2 Sam. 24:2,4; Neh. 12:22,23; Ps. 87:6). See Census.

REHABIAH (Rē hå bī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has made wide." Son of Eliezer and ancestor of a group of Levites (1 Chron. 23:17; 24:21; 26:25).

REHOB (Rē′ hŏb) Personal and place name meaning, "broad or open place." 1. Father of a king of Zobah, an Aramaean city north of Damascus (2 Sam. 8:3,12). 2. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:11). 3. Town in the vicinity of Laish in upper Galilee (Num. 13:21; see Beth-Rehob). 4. Town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:28,30). Asher was not able to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). Elsewhere, Rehob in Asher is assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:31; 1 Chron. 6:75). The site is perhaps tell el-Gharbi about seven miles east-southeast of Acco.

REHOBOAM (Rē hō bō′ am) Personal name meaning, "he enlarges the people." One of Solomon's sons and his successor to the throne of the united monarchy (1 Kings 11:43). He reigned about 931–913 B.C. While at Shechem for his crowning ceremony as king over Israel (1 Kings 12), the people asked Rehoboam if he would remove some of the tax burden and labor laws which his father had placed on them. Instead of taking the advice of the older men, he acted on the counsel of those who wanted to increase further the burden. The northern tribes revolted and made the rebel Jeroboam their king. Rehoboam was left with only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. He continued the pagan ways which Solomon had allowed (14:21–24) and fought against Jeroboam and Shishak of Egypt. Some of his fortifications may be those at Lachish and Azekah.

REHOBOTH (Rē′ hō bŏth) Place name meaning, "broad places." 1. Rehoboth-Ir, "broad places of the city," likely denotes an open space within Nineveh or its suburbs (Gen. 10:11) rather than a separate city between Nineveh and Calah. 2. Site of a well dug and retained by Isaac's men in the valley of Gerar (Gen. 26:22). The name affirms that God had made room for them following confrontations over rights to two previous wells. 3. Unidentified Edomite city (Gen. 36:37; 1 Chron. 1:48). KJV, NIV, and TEV distinguish this city as Rehoboth by the river. NAS, NRSV, and REB identify the river as the Euphrates. Edomite dominion reaching the Euphrates is improbable. Thus some suggest the Zered Brook, the principal stream in Edom, as the site of Rehoboth.

REHUM (Rē′ hŭm) Personal name meaning, "merciful, compassionate." 1. One returning from Exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2); the parallel (Neh. 7:7) reads Nehum. 2. Persian official with oversight of the Trans-Euphrates territory, including Judah. His protest of the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple and city walls resulted in suspension of the project (Ezra 4:8–24). 3. Levite engaged in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:17). 4. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:25). 5. Priest or priestly clan (Neh. 12:3), perhaps a corruption of Harim.

REI (Rē′ ī) Personal name meaning, "friendly." David's officer who sided with Solomon in his succession struggle with Adonijah (1 Kings 1:8).

REINS KJV term for kidneys, used both in a literal anatomical sense and in a figurative sense for the seat of the emotions. The substitutions made by the NRSV are illustrative of those of other modern translations: literal sense as "kidneys" (Job 16:13), "inward parts" (Ps. 139:13), and "loins" (Isa. 11:5); figurative sense as "heart" (Job 19:27; Pss. 7:9; 16:7; 26:2; 73:21; Jer. 11:20) with the exception of Proverbs 23:16 ("soul").

REKEM (Rē′ kĕm) Personal and place name meaning, "maker of multicolored cloth." 1. One of five Midianite kings whom Israel defeated in Moses' time (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21). See Reba. Rekem was apparently the earlier name of Petra. 2. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43–44). 3. Ancestor of a family living in Gilead (1 Chron. 7:16). 4. Unidentified site in Benjamin (Josh. 18:27).

RELEASE, YEAR OF The Hebrew expression occurs only twice (Deut. 15:9; 31:10 KJV and RSV), both times in reference to the sabbatical year as a year of release from debt. Some confusion results from modern translations using the verb release in connection with both the sabbatical year and the Year of Jubilee. See Jubilee, Year of; Sabbatical Year.

RELIGION A relationship of devotion or fear of God or gods. 1. The cognate terms translated "religious" and "religion" (Acts 17:22; 25:19) can indicate positive reverence for the gods or else negative fear of the gods. The pejorative translations "superstitious" (KJV) and "superstition" (KJV, RSV) is unfortunate. Paul hardly alienated the Athenians at the outset of his speech. He rather pointed to their outward expressions of piety (Acts 17:22). Though a monotheist (believer in one God) would not use "fear of the gods" to describe Judaism, the expression is natural on pagan Roman lips (Acts 25:19). 2. The cognate terms translated "religion" and "religious" in Acts 26:5 and James 1:26–27 point to the "fear of God" as evidenced in religious conduct, particularly ritual practice. In Acts 26:5 Paul referred to Judaism as "our" way of evidencing reverence for God. According to James 1:26–27, one who thinks himself religiously observant but who cannot control the tongue will find religious observance worthless. James continued that the religious observance God cares about is not a cultic matter but an ethical matter, care of the helpless of society. 3. Several terms derived from sebomai (to fear) are translated religious or religion. The term in Acts 13:43 is rendered "religious" (KJV), "devout" (NRSV), and "God-fearing" (NAS). The term RSV translated "religion" in 1 Timothy 2:10 is literally "God-fearing," here in the sense of obedient to God's commands (compare John 9:31). The NIV translation "who profess to worship God" highlights the connection between fear and reverence. The KJV and NAS translation "godliness" accentuates the linkage of fear with an obedient life. The term RSV translated as "religion" (1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 3:5) and "religious duty" in 1 Timothy 5:4 is generally translated "godliness" or "piety." The emphasis is again on conduct. 4. The meaning of the term the NAS translated as "self-made religion" is uncertain (Col. 2:23). The Greek roots suggest freely chosen worship (KJV, "will worship"; NIV, "self-imposed worship"; RSV, "promoting rigor of devotion"). Similar constructions with thelō suggest the meaning, "alleged worship." 5. KJV translated Ioudaïsmō (Judaism) as the "Jews' religion" (Gal. 1:13–14). 6. NIV frequently inserts the adjective religious into its paraphrase to clarify the nature of feasts (Amos 5:21; 8:10; Col. 2:16) or service (Heb. 10:11) when there is no corresponding term in the Greek or Hebrew text.

REMALIAH (Rĕm ā lī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "may Yahweh be exalted" or "Yahweh adorned." Father of Pekah who murdered King Pekahiah of Israel and reigned in his stead (2 Kings 15:25; Isa. 7:1).

REMETH (Rē′ mĕth) Place name meaning, "height." Town in Issachar's territory (Josh. 19:21), likely identical with Ramoth (1 Chron.

R

6:73) and Jarmuth (Josh. 21:29).

REMISSION Release, forgiveness. RSV used remission only in the sense of refraining from exacting a tax (Esth. 2:18). Other modern translations avoided the term. KJV frequently used the expression, "remission of sins," to mean release from the guilt or penalty of sins. Modern translations generally substitute the term forgiveness. With the exception of Romans 3:25, the underlying Greek term is aphesis. Remission of sins is often linked with repentance, both in the preaching of John the Baptist (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3) and the early church (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 5:31). Remission of sins results from Christ's sacrificial death (Matt. 26:28; compare Heb. 10:17–18) and from Christ's exaltation (Acts 5:31). Remission of sins is available to all who believe in the name of Jesus (Acts 10:43; compare Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38). Because Christ's sacrifice has freed believers from the guilt and penalty of sin, no additional sacrifices are needed (Heb. 10:18). The term rendered "remission" in Romans 3:25 (paresis) refers to God's letting sin go unpunished in anticipation of the work of Christ.

REMMON (Rĕm′ mŏn) KJV variant of Rimmon (Josh. 19:7). RSV reads En-rimmon. Other modern translations follow the KJV in understanding two cities: Ain and Rimmon.

REMMON-METHOAR (Rĕm′ mŏn-Mĕ thō′ ăr) KJV took Remmon-Methoar as a proper name (Josh. 19:13). Modern translations take the second element (Methoar) to mean, "bends toward" (NRSV), "stretches to" (NAS), or a similar expression. See Rimmon.

REMNANT Something left over, especially the righteous people of God after divine judgment. Several Hebrew words express the remnant idea: yether, "that which is left over"; she'ar, "that which remains"; she'rith, "residue"; "pelitah, "one who escapes"; sarid, "a survivor"; and, sheruth, "one loosed from bonds." In the New Testament, remnant or left over is the equivalent of the Greek words: kataleimma, leimma, and loipos.

Several activities of everyday life are associated with these words. Objects or people may be separated from a larger group by selection, assignment, consumption (eating food), or by destruction. What is left over is the residue, or, in the case of people, those who remain after an epidemic, famine, drought, or war.

Noah and his family may be understood as survivors, or a remnant, of a divine judgment in the flood (Gen. 6:5–8; 7:1–23). The same could be said of Lot when Sodom was destroyed (Gen. 18:17–33; 19:1–29); Jacob's family in Egypt (Gen. 45:7); Elijah and the 7,000 faithful followers of the Lord (1 Kings 19:17–18); and Israelites going into captivity (Ezek. 12:1–16). They were survivors because the Lord chose to show mercy to those who had believed steadfastly in Him and had been righteous in their lives.

About 750 B.C. Amos found that many people in Israel believed that God would protect all of them and their institutions. With strong language he tore down their mistaken ideas (3:12–15; 5:2–3,18–20; 6:1–7; 9:1–6). Divine judgment would be poured out on all Israel. He corrected the tenet that everyone would live happily and prosper (9:10) with the doctrine that only a few would survive and rebuild the nation (9:8b–9,11–15). This new life could be realized if one and all would repent, turn to the Lord, and be saved (5:4b–6a,14–15).

Hosea's book does not use the remnant terminology, but the concept of the Lord's mercy extended to those experiencing judgment is present in several places (2:14–23; 3:4–5; 6:1–3; 11:8–11; 13:14; 14:1–9) including calls to repentance and descriptions of what the remnant may enjoy in life.

The Book of Micah has much the same emphasis. After announcements of judgment, the Lord proclaimed that people would be assembled like sheep and led by the Lord (2:12–13) as their king (4:6–8). The Messiah would give special attention to them (5:2–5,7–9). The climax of the book is an exaltation of God as the one who pardons and removes sin from their lives after the judgment had passed (7:7–20).

The remnant doctrine was so important to Isaiah that he named one of his sons Shear-Jashub, meaning "A Remnant Shall Return" (7:3). The faithful would survive the onslaughts of the Assyrian army (4:2–6; 12:1–6) as illustrated by the remarkable deliverance of the few people in Jerusalem from the seige of the city by the Assyrians (chs. 36—38).

Many remnant passages are closely tied with the future king, the Messiah, who would be the majestic ruler of those who seek his mercies (9:1–7; 11:1–16; 32:1–8; 33:17–24). These passages have a strong eschatological thrust, expecting future generations to be the remnant. Other passages looked to the generation of Isaiah's day to provide the remnant. Numerous statements in the latter part of the book have an evident futuristic orientation. In that future, there would be a new people, a new community, a new nation, and a strong faith in one God. This remnant would be personified in the Suffering Servant (ch. 53).

Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah thus raised a chorus. Only a few would survive judgment events, basically because they repented and rested their future on the compassion of their Lord. An important segment of the remnant would be those who were afflicted (Isa. 14:32). Later, Zephaniah spoke of the humble and the lowly as the ones who would find refuge among the remnant (2:3; 3:12–13).

Jeremiah announced that Judah would be destroyed for rebelling against the Lord of the covenant. The political, religious, and social institutions of the state would be eliminated; many would lose their lives; others would be taken into Exile for seventy years. In the Exile, those who believed in the one true God would be gathered for a return to the Promised Land. God would create a new community. Statements of hope and promise for the remnant are concentrated in chapters 30—33.

Ezekiel agreed with Jeremiah that the remnant of Judah taken to Babylon would be the source of people fit for the Lord's new community. These few would participate in a new Exodus and settle in the Promised Land around a new Temple (chs. 40—48).

Zechariah spoke in glowing terms of how the remnant, the returned exiles to Jerusalem, would prosper (8:6–17; 9:9–17; 14:1–21). Ezra recognized the people who had returned to Jerusalem as members of the remnant, but in danger of reenacting the sins of the past (9:7–15).

In the New Testament, Paul quoted (Rom 9:25–33) from Hosea and from Isaiah to demonstrate that the saving of a remnant from among the Jewish people was still part of the Lord's method of redeeming His people. There would always be a future for anyone among the covenant people who would truly turn to the Lord for salvation (9—11). George Herbert Livingston

REMPHAN (Rĕm′ phăn) KJV form of Rephan.

RENDING OF GARMENTS Tearing or pulling garments apart, often as a sign of mourning (Gen. 37:34; Lev. 10:6; 21:10; 1 Sam. 4:12; 2 Sam. 3:31), repentance (Gen. 37:29; Josh. 7:6; 2 Chron. 34:27; Joel 2:13), or as a response to the rejection of God's plan (Num. 14:6) or (perceived) blasphemy (Matt. 26:65; Mark 14:63; Acts 14:14). See Blasphemy; Mourning.

REPENTANCE A feeling of regret, a changing of the mind, or a turning from sin to God. As a feeling of regret the term can apply even to God. In the days preceding the flood, God was sorry that He had created the human race (Gen. 6:6–7). He later regretted that he had made Saul the king over Israel (1 Sam. 15:11,35). God also repented in the sense of changing His mind (Ex. 32:14). Most occurrences of the term in the Bible, however, do not refer to God but to people. These also do not indicate mere regret or a change of mind; they mean a reorientation of the sinner to God. In this more common sense, then, God does not repent like humans (1 Sam. 15:29).

Old Testament In ancient Israel repentance was first expressed corporately. When national calamities such as famine, drought, defeat, or a plague of locusts arose, the people did not feel responsible individually for these catastrophes. Rather, they sensed that the incidents were caused by the guilt of the nation. All shared the responsibility and, consequently, the ritual of repentance. Fasting, the wearing of sackcloth (the traditional attire for mourning), the scattering of ashes (Is. 58:5; Neh. 9:1; Dan. 9:3), and the recitation of prayers and psalms in a penitential liturgy characterized this collective experience of worship.

With the use of such outward tokens of repentance, however, the danger of sham or pretense also arose. Ritual not accompanied by a genuine attitude of repentance was empty. Against such misleading and, therefore, futile expressions of remorse, the eighth-century prophets spoke out. Their attacks upon feigned worship and their calls for genuine contrition on the part of the individual gave flower to the characteristic biblical concept of repentance. What was needed was not ritual alone, but the active involvement of the individual in making a radical change within the heart (Ezek. 18:31) and in seeking a new direction for one's life. What was demanded was a turning from sin and at the same time a turning to God. For the prophets, such a turning or conversion was not just simply a change within a person; it was openly manifested in justice, kindness, and humility (Mic. 6:8; Amos 5:24; Hos. 2:19–20).

New Testament A direct connection between the prophets and the New Testament is found in John the Baptist. Appearing in the wilderness, he, like they, issued the call to his own generation for this radical kind of turning. He baptized those who by confessing their sins responded to his invitation (Mark 1:4–5). Likewise, he expected that those who had made this commitment would demonstrate by their actions the change which they had made in their hearts (Luke 3:10–14). He differed, though, from the prophets in that his message of repentance was intricately bound up with his expectation of the imminent coming of the Messiah (Luke 3:15–17; see also Acts 19:4).

The Messiah came also preaching a message of repentance (Mark 1:15). Stressing that all men needed to repent (Luke 13:1–5), Jesus summoned his followers to turn and become like children (Matt. 18:3). He defined His ministry in terms of calling sinners to repentance (Luke 5:32). Moreover, He illustrated His understanding of repentance in the parable of the prodigal who returned to the father (Luke 15:11–32). Like John, he insisted that the life that was changed was obvious by the "fruit" that it bore (Luke 6:20–45).

Jesus also differed from His predecessors in His proclamation of repentance. He related it closely to the arrival of the kingdom of God (Mark 1:14–15) and specifically associated it with one's acceptance of Him. Those who were unrepentant were those who rejected Him (Luke 10:8–15; 11:30–32); those who received Him were the truly repentant. In His name repentance and forgiveness were to be proclaimed to all nations (Luke 24:47).

Acts shows this proclamation was made. Peter (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31) and Paul (Acts 17:30; 20:21) told Jews and Gentiles alike "that they should repent and turn to God, performing deeds appropriate to repentance" (Acts 26:20 NAS). The apostolic preaching virtually identified repentance with belief in Christ: both resulted in the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38; 10:43).

"Repentance" is infrequently found in Paul's writings and never in John. Both speak of faith which entails both a rejection of sin and a positive response to God. Other apostolic writings also note the relationship of faith and repentance (Acts 20:21; Heb. 6:1). In 1 John, moreover, confession of sins is tantamount to repentance from sins (1:9).

Other Usages Not all references refer to turning to God from sin. Judas repented of what he had done (Matt. 27:3). The Greek term differs from the normal word for repentance. In this context the meaning is regret or remorse; Judas' repentance was not the type that leads towards salvation.

Paul described an earlier letter he had sent to the Corinthians which caused them grief, but which eventually led them to repentance. Here Paul described a change in the Corinthians' attitude about him (2 Cor. 7:8–13). Their repentance resulted in their reconciliation with him.

Renewal of commitment or reaffirmation of faith seems to be the meaning of repentance in the letters to the seven churches in Revelation (2:5,16,21–22; 3:3,19). Twice the letters call for the readers to remember and thereby to return to what they had been. The call is for rededication and not initial conversion. See Confession; Conversion; Faith; Kingdom of God; Sackcloth.

REPENTANCE OF GOD Old Testament description of God's reaction to human situations. The Hebrew verb (nhm) expresses a strong emotional content, perhaps with a reference to deep breathing of distress or relief. It should be noted that "repent" is not always the best translation for nicham but was the translation used by the KJV. The scope of possible translations includes "repent" (Jer. 18:8,10 RSV), "grieve" (Gen. 6:7 NIV), "pity" (Judg. 2:18 NAS), "change of mind" (Ps. 110:4 REB), and "relent" (Ps. 106:45 NAS). Therefore, the concept of the repentance of God would also include God's grieving, pitying, changing His mind, and relenting.

The concept of God's repentance is not limited to one section of the Old Testament, but can be found throughout the Law, Prophets, and Writings. The repentance of God became Israel's creed alongside other attributes of God like "gracious," "merciful," "slow to anger," and "great in covenant-love" (Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2).

The repentance of God was usually in response to His creation, such as human disobedience (Gen. 6:6–7), intercessory prayer (Amos 7:1–6), or repentance (Jonah 3:6–10). In many instances God is said to "change his mind" about some evil that he had planned to do (Ex. 32:12,14; Jonah 3:10). In one instance God is said to "change his mind" (Jer. 18:10) about His good intentions.

God's repentance plays an important role in our understanding about the role of prayer and about certain attributes of God, such as immutability, timelessness, and impassibility. The God who repents is free to answer prayer and to interact with people. This freedom is part of His being the same forever.

REPHAEL (Rĕph' ā ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God heals." Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:7).

REPHAH (Rē' phah) Personal name meaning, "overflow." An Ephraimite (1 Chron. 7:25).

REPHAIAH (Rĕ phâi' ah) Personal name meaning, "God healed." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:21). 2. Simeonite living at Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 3. Warrior from the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2). 4. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 9:43). 5. One helping with Nehemiah's repair of the wall who had oversight of one half of the administrative district embracing Jerusalem (Neh. 3:9).

REPHAIM (Rĕph' ā ĭm) 1. Residents of Sheol, often translated, "shades" or the "dead" (Job 26:5 NRSV; Ps. 88:10; Prov. 9:18; 21:16; Isa. 14:9; 26:14,19). See Sheol. 2. Ethnic designation of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine, equivalent to the Anakim, the Moabite term Emim (Deut. 2:10–11), and the Ammonite term Zanzummim (2:20–21). Despite their reputation for might and height, the Rephaim were defeated by a coalition of eastern kings (Gen. 14:5) and were later displaced by the Israelites (Deut. 3:11,13; compare Gen. 15:20) and their distant kin, the Moabites (Deut. 2:10–11) and the Ammonites (2:20–21). KJV regularly translated Rephaim as "giants" (except Gen. 14:5; 15:20 and some references to the valley or land of the Rephaim). NAS and RSV used the translation "giants" only in reference to individual giants in 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles. NIV avoided the translation "giant" completely, using "Rephaim" when referring to the valley or land, "Rephaites" when referring to the pre-Israelite inhabitants, and "descendant of Rapha" for individuals in 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles. The artificial distinction between Rephaites and descendant of Rapha apparently attempts to ease the tension between the designation of King Og of Bashan as the last of the Rephaim (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 12:4) and the mention of later descendants in 2 Samuel 21:16,18,20,22; 1 Chronicles 20:6,8.

REPHAITES (Rĕph′ ā ītes) NIV alternate translation for the Hebrew Rephaim when applied to the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan. See Rephaim.

REPHAN (Rē′ phăn) Term for a foreign, astral diety (Acts 7:43; NAS, Rompha). Acts 7 follows the earliest Greek Old Testament translation reading at Amos 5:26. The Hebrew Masoretic text reads Kaiwan, the Babylonian name for Saturn.

REPHIDIM (Rĕph′ ī dĭm) Site in the wilderness where the Hebrews stopped on their way to Canaan just prior to reaching Sinai (Ex. 17:1; 19:2). There the people complained of thirst, and God commanded Moses to strike the rock out of which would come water. While the Hebrews were encamped at Rephidim, the Amalekites came against them and were defeated by Israel under Joshua's leadership. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, came to Rephidim and helped the leader delegate his authority over the people (18:13–26). The exact location is unknown.

REPROACH KJV term with five related senses: 1. A source of blame, discredit, or disgrace due to barrenness (Gen. 30:23; Luke 1:25); rape by the uncircumcised (Gen. 34:2–5); uncircumcision (Josh. 5:9); forced mutilation (1 Sam. 11:2); Jerusalem in ruins (Neh. 2:17; Ps. 89:41); illness (Ps. 31:11); fasting (Ps. 69:10); military defeat (Ps. 79:4); sin (Prov. 14:34); mistreatment of parents (Prov. 19:26); singleness (Isa. 4:1); widowhood (Isa. 54:4); famine (Ezek. 36:30). 2. A state of shame, disgrace, or humiliation (Neh. 1:3; Job 19:5; 27:6; Ps. 15:3). 3. An object of scorn (Jer. 6:10; 29:18; 42:18; 44:8). 4. An expression of rebuke or disapproval; a taunt (1 Sam. 17:26; 2 Kings 19:4,16; Neh. 4:4; 5:9). 5. To express disappointment or disapproval (Ruth 2:15; Neh. 6:13). Of special interest theologically is reproach suffered for the sake of God (Pss. 69:7,9; 89:51) or Christ (Luke 6:22; 2 Cor. 12:10; Heb. 10:33; 11:26; 1 Pet. 4:14) and the reproach Christ suffered (Rom. 15:3; Heb. 13:13). See Shame and Honor.

REPROBATE KJV term used in two senses: 1. That which fails to meet a test and is thus rejected as unworthy or unacceptable, as impure silver (Jer. 6:30); or persons (2 Cor. 13:5–7; Titus 1:16). 2. That which is depraved or without morals (Rom. 1:28; 2 Tim. 3:8). NAS and RSV used reprobate to mean one rejected by God (Ps. 15:4; compare REB, TEV).

REPTILES See Animals; Creeping Things.

REPUTATION KJV term for high public esteem or regard applied to: Gamaliel (Acts 5:34); Jerusalem apostles (Gal. 2:2); Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:29). The KJV translation, "But made himself of no reputation" (Phil. 2:7) is an interpretation of heauton ekenōsen meaning, he "emptied himself" (NAS, NRSV).

RESEN (Rē′ sĕn) Place name meaning, "fountain head." City Nimrod founded between Nineveh and Calah (Gen. 10:12). Probably modern Salemijeh two and a half miles northwest of Nimrud.

RESERVOIR Place for catching and storing water for later use, either agricultural (2 Chron. 26:10; Eccl. 2:6) or as an urban supply in anticipation of a siege (2 Kings 20:20; Isa. 22:8b–11). Reservoirs were a necessity in most of Palestine where seasonal rains were the major water source.

Large cistern (water reservoir) with column in center at ancient Pergamum.

RESH (Rēsh) Twentieth letter in the Hebrew alphabet, which the KJV used as heading for the eight verses of Psalms 119:153–160 which each begin with the letter.

RESHEPH (Rē′ shĕph) Personal name meaning, "flame." An Ephraimite (1 Chron. 7:25).

RESIN NIV translation of bdellium (Gen. 2:12; compare Num. 11:7). See Bdellium.

RESPECT OF PERSONS Honor and partiality. Respect or honor is to be shown to older men (Lev. 19:32; compare Lam. 5:12), to public officials (Rom. 13:7), to parents (1 Tim. 3:4), masters (1 Pet. 2:18), and Christian leaders (1 Thess. 5:12). Christians are to live in such a way that they command the respect of neighbors and thus serve as effective witnesses (1 Thess. 4:12). Scripture repeatedly affirms that God is no respecter of persons, that is, that God does not show partiality; thus God's people are to refrain from prejudice. See Partiality.

RESTITUTION (Rĕs tĭ tū′ tion) The act of returning what has wrongfully been taken or replacing what has been lost or damaged and the Divine restoration of all things to their original order.

Human Restitution The Law required "trespass offerings" to be made for sins against a neighbor (theft, deception, dishonesty, extortion, keeping lost property, or damaging property). Such crimes involved "unfaithfulness" towards God and disrupted fellowship and peace among the people. They were to be atoned for by a guilt offering to God, and "restitution" to the wronged neighbor. Atonement and forgiveness of the sin were received after restitution had been made to the victim. The sin offering to God always followed the act of restitution. Old Testament law established a principle of "punishment to fit the crime" (life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, wound for wound). Restitution was consistent with this concept of equity. The stolen property was to be returned, or "full" compensation was to be made. The guidelines for making complete restitution also included a provision for punitive damages (up to five times what had been lost), justice that moved beyond "an eye for an eye." Provisions were made for complications in this process (Ex. 22:3). The act of making restitution to a victim was so closely identified with the atoning sacrifice made to God, that the two expressions could be seen as elements of the same command. Neither could stand alone. Specific examples of this law in operation are not found, but the principle in action is found (1 Kings 20:34; 2 Kings 8:6; Neh. 5:10–12). There is no legal or ritual application of this command in the New Testament; however, the principle of restitution is clearly pictured in the story of Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1–10). Jesus implicitly validated the practice when he admonished followers to "be reconciled" to a brother before offering a gift to God (Matt. 5:23–24).

Divine Restitution The New Testament word is found only once (Acts 3:21) and can be translated "restoration." It describes the future work of God that will reestablish all "things" to their pristine order and purpose. The implication here is not the restoration of persons, but of the created order, that is, the universal renewal of the earth. This divine restoration will accompany the return and triumph of Christ (1 Cor. 15:25–28). Ken Massey RESURRECTION The doctrine, event, and act of persons being brought from death to unending life at the close of the age.

Old Testament The preexilic portions of the Old Testament contain no statements which point certainly to a hope of resurrection from the dead even though some of Israel's neighbors had such a belief. Death is the end of human existence, the destruction of life (Gen. 3:19; Job 30:23). In isolated instances revivification occurs (being brought back to life from death but only as a temporary escape from final death; 1 Kings 17:17–22; 2 Kings 4:18–37; 13:21). In addition, God took from the earth two Old Testament figures before their deaths: Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and Elijah (2 Kings 2:9–11). The scarcity of these statements and the lack of reflection on their meanings, however, point to the absence of any consistent doctrinal conception of resurrection from the dead.

Similarly, the Psalms are bereft of clear thought on resurrection. Many of the songs, however, express a hope that communion with God, begun on earth, will have no end (as in Pss. 16:11; 49:15; 73:24). The Song of Moses (Deut. 32) and the Song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2) assert that Yahweh kills and makes alive. These expressions of hope in God may not suggest a doctrine of resurrection from the dead. They at least confess a conviction that the living God is able to intervene in life's darkest hours. They grope for a firm hope in justice and help beyond the grave. They may reflect the beginnings of a doctrine of resurrection.

The prophets proclaimed hope for the future in terms of national renewal (see Hos. 6:1–3; Ezek. 37). So pointed is the prophetic expression of national hope that the New Testament writers sometimes used the language of the prophets to expound the doctrine of resurrection (compare Hos. 13:14; 1 Cor. 15:55). The prophetic statements, however, do not necessarily attest to the hope of individual resurrection from the dead but profess the sovereignty of God over all His subjects, even death.

On the other hand, Isaiah 26:19 and Daniel 12:2 decidedly teach a belief in resurrection. The Old Testament emphasis on the sovereignty of God in all matters easily led to the prophetic statements.

The Old Testament statements about resurrection are scant and do not reveal clear theological reflection. The emphasis upon Yahweh as the God of present life tended to make Judaism a this-worldly religion. The future was generally interpreted as a national future under the sovereign rule of Yahweh. In New Testament times the Saduccees still did not believe in resurrection. The belief, however, in God as sovereign Lord over all, even death, eventually flowered in the brief but salient assertions of the Books of Isaiah and Daniel and possibly in the Psalms. See Eschatology; Future Hope; Sheol.

New Testament Jesus' preaching presupposed a doctrine of resurrection. Opposition by the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, gave Jesus the opportunity to assert His own thought on the matter (Mark 12:18–27; Matt. 22:23–33; Luke 20:27–38; compare Deut. 25:5–10).

John's Gospel presents Jesus as the mediator of resurrection who gives to believers the life given Him by His Father (John 6:53–58). Jesus is the resurrection and the life (11:24–26). Jesus pointed to a resurrection of the righteous to eternal life and of the wicked to eternal punishment (Matt. 8:11– 12; 25:31–34,41–46; John 5:28–29). In His postresurrection appearances Jesus had a body that was both spiritual (John 20:19,26) and physical (John 20:20,27; 21:13,15) in nature.

The greatest biblical exponent of resurrection was Paul. For him, resurrection was the final event which would usher Christians out of the bodily struggle of the present age into the bodily glory which will accompany Jesus' second coming (Phil. 3:20–21). In resurrection, God's new creation will reach completion (2 Cor. 5:17–21). The bedrock of hope for Christian resurrection is the resurrection of Christ, the foundation of gospel preaching (1 Cor. 15:12–20). Those who follow Christ are organically related to Christ in His resurrection from the dead; Christ is the first fruits of an upcoming harvest (1 Cor. 15:20–23). Destruction awaits those who do not follow Christ (Phil. 3:19).

Paul's discourses on the nature of the resurrected body broadens the Old Testament idea of a restored Israel to include the redemption of persons complete with bodies. Paul viewed the human person as a psychosomatic unity. He recognizes no truth in the Greek idea of a separation of body and soul. See Humanity. Persons live beyond time not because of any inherent immortality but because God gives them life (2 Cor. 5:1–10). Those united to Christ in faith become not only one with Him in spirit but also one with Him in body (1 Cor. 6:15). The resurrected body will be a spiritual body, different from the present physical body (1 Cor. 15:35–50); but it will have continuity with the present body because Christ redeems the whole person (Rom. 8:23).

The New Testament unquestionably affirms a doctrine of resurrection of all persons from the dead. Humanity has a corporate destiny to encounter just and divine response to faithfulness and unfaithfulness (Acts 24:15). A resurrection body and life in the consummated kingdom of God will characterize the resurrection of those who follow Christ. William L. Hendricks

RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST The bodily, living appearance of Jesus of Nazareth after He died and was buried, providing certain hope for resurrection of believers. The Greek term for resurrection, anastasis, literally means, "to stand again." In the pagan world it was associated with the cycle of nature and the nature gods, or the survival of a "spiritual part" of a person after death. Because of Jesus Christ and His standing up again from the dead, resurrection has come to mean the restoration of the whole self by God who gave life and creates it anew in the heavenly kingdom. New Testament accounts of the resurrection fall into three categories: the empty tomb, appearances of Jesus before His ascension, and appearances of Jesus after His ascension.

The earliest written account of the resurrection of Jesus is 1 Corinthians 15:3–8. Paul emphasized the appearances of the resurrected Christ to His followers. Paul mentioned an appearance to Cephas (compare Luke 24:34). Then Jesus appeared to the twelve (compare Luke 24:36–43). The appearance to the five hundred, some of whom had died by the time Paul wrote 1 Corinthians, is supposed by some to refer to the ascension (Acts 1:9–11). The appearance of James is nowhere else recorded. Tradition asserts that this was James the brother of Jesus, the author of the Book of James (see Acts 15:13). The second appearance to the disciples may be equated with Jesus' presentation of Himself to Thomas a week after the first appearance to the apostles (John 20:24–29). Paul mentioned last the appearance of the ascended Christ to Paul himself, an obvious reference to Saul's conversion experience (Acts 9:1–9).

Matthew reported that two Marys, Magdalene and the mother of James and Joses (Matt. 28:1–2; see 27:56,61) came to the tomb and witnessed a violent earthquake. The angel who rolled away the stone covering the tomb entrance told the women that Jesus was risen. They were invited to view the empty tomb, then to go and tell the disciples that Jesus was risen and was going to Galilee. Immediately, the resurrected Christ greeted them, urged them not to be afraid, to go and tell the "brothers" that He would meet them in Galilee. The soldiers posted at the tomb reported to their employers, the chief priests, "everything that happened"; and the entire guard was bribed to keep silent. It is not clear whether the soldiers actually saw the resurrected Christ Himself. It is assumed because of the other New Testament accounts that the resurrected Christ appeared only to believers. Matthew's final report of Jesus' resurrection is on a mountain in Galilee to His eleven disciples where He gave them the Great Commission (Matt. 28:16–20).

Mark's account of the resurrection (ch. 16) reports that three women came to the tomb wondering how they would have access to the body in order to use the spices applied to the dead. They discovered the stone rolled away and a young man in white in the tomb. He calmed their fears, told them that Jesus was risen, and that Jesus would meet the disciples in Galilee. The women left bewildered and frightened. The most ancient and reliable manuscripts of Mark end with 16:8. The long ending of Mark records several other appearances of Jesus: to Mary Magdalene (see John 20:11–18); to two walking in the country (see Luke 24:13–32); to the eleven as they were eating (see Luke 24:36–43).

Luke 24 records the visit of three women to the tomb where two angels said that He was risen. The angels reminded the women of Jesus' teachings about His death and resurrection. The women told the unbelieving disciples about the empty tomb, and Peter investigated the empty tomb. Jesus appeared to Cleopas and another disciple on the way to Emmaus and gave them a prophetic overview concerning the Messiah. At supper He was revealed as the risen Christ and disappeared. The two returned to Jerusalem to tell the disciples and heard that Simon had seen the risen Lord. After the report of the two, Jesus appeared to the apostles and assured them He was not a ghost. He showed His hands and feet, and in the most physical act of the resurrection He ate a piece of fish (v. 43). He then reminded them of prophecies of the Messiah and commissioned them on the mission task. Luke's closing paragraph is the account of the ascension. The Lukan narrative is taken up in Acts (1:6–11). Jesus taught for forty days. He told the disciples to await the Spirit in Jerusalem. When the disciples asked questions about the kingdom, He said it was a question beyond their comprehension, repeated His missionary commission, and ascended as they watched and were assured by angels of His return.

John's Gospel adds remarkable details to the other three. In the fourth Gospel another disciple (John?) accompanied Peter to the tomb. Jesus appeared to Mary Magdalene and told her not to detain him—a better translation than "do not touch me." Jesus appeared twice to the disciples in the upper room, the second time a week after the first for the sake of the unbelieving Thomas. His classic confession "my Lord and my God" (John 20:28) became the appropriate response of all believing hearts. In John 21 Jesus appeared to seven disciples in Galilee and prepared their breakfast. The occasion was the commissioning of Peter to his special ministry after Peter's three-time confession of his love for Christ, paralleling his earlier three-time denial of Christ.

The risen Christ appeared to Stephen (Acts 7:55–56), to Saul/Paul (Acts 9:1–6), and to John the Seer (Rev. 1). All of these accounts are not easy to correlate, but a composite picture reveals the following facts. The tomb was empty. Jesus appeared to many believing disciples, women and men, on numerous occasions. Jesus instructed the earliest believers about the prophetic and theological meaning of His death and resurrection. The resurrection of Jesus involved His physical body; but His resurrected life was a new kind of life called into being by God, the Effector of the resurrection (Acts 2:24). Paul, who gave the first account of the resurrection of Christ (1 Cor. 15:3–8), provided the full meaning and importance of the resurrection of Christ. Because of the resurrection of Christ, we have assurance of the resurrection of all persons—some to salvation; some to perdition—vouchsafed in the resurrection of Christ. That is God's ultimate answer to the problem of death (1 Cor. 15:12–58). See Ascension; Christ; Jesus; Resurrection. William L. Hendricks RETINUE NAS, REB, NRSV, REB term for the attendants of the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:2; KJV, train; NIV, caravan).

RETURN OF CHRIST See Eschatology; Future Hope; Millennium; Parousia; Second Coming.

REU (Rē′ ū) Personal name meaning, "friend, companion." Descendant of Shem (Gen. 11:18–21; 1 Chron. 1:25), possibly the ancestor of a Semitic tribe associated with Ra'ilu, an island in the Euphrates below Anat.

REUBEN(ITES) (Reū′ bĕn ītes) Eldest son of Jacob, born to Leah (Gen. 29:32) while the couple was living with her father, Laban, in Paddan-aram, and the clan or tribe descended from him. Among his acts recorded in the Bible, Reuben found mandrakes (out of which a love potion probably was made for his mother to use with Jacob 30:14,16–17), and had sexual relations with one of his father's concubines (35:22), for which he later was chastised (49:4). Reuben felt compassion for young Joseph when his brothers wanted to kill the brash dreamer (37:21–22), and was willing to be responsible to his father for Benjamin's welfare when the unknown Joseph commanded that the youngest brother be brought to Egypt (42:37).

The tribe which was named for Reuben held a place of honor among the other tribes. The territory the tribe inherited was just east of the Dead Sea and was the first parcel of land to be bestowed (Num. 32).

REUEL (Reū′ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "friend of God." 1. Son of Esau and ancestor of several Edomite clans (Gen. 36:4,10,13,17; 1 Chron. 1:35,37). 2. Exodus 2:18 identifies Reuel as the "father" of Zipporah, Moses' wife. Numbers 10:29 presents Reuel as the father of Hobab, Moses' father-in-law. Elsewhere Moses' father-in-law is called Jethro. The tradition is also divided regarding the background of Moses' father-in-law, either Midianite (Ex. 2:16; 3:1) or Kenite (Judg. 1:16; 4:11). See Jethro. 3. A Gadite (Num. 2:14). 4. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 9:8).

REUMAH (Reū′ mah) Personal name meaning, "coral." Nahor's concubine, an ancestress of several Aramaean tribes living northwest of Damascus (Gen. 22:24).

REVELATION OF GOD The content and process of God's making Himself known to people. All knowledge of God comes by way of revelation. Human knowledge of God is revealed knowledge since God, and He alone, gives it. He bridges the gap between Himself and His creatures, disclosing Himself and His will to them. By God alone can God be known.

Modern thought often questions the possibility and/or reality of revelation. Biblical faith affirms revelation is real because the personal Creator God has chosen to let His human creatures know Him. The question remains, "How can a person know God." The Bible appears to distinguish two ways of knowing God, general and special revelation.

Biblical emphasis points to Jesus Christ as God's final revelation. God has provided ongoing generations of believers a source of knowledge about Himself and His Son. That source is the Bible.

Definition The word revelation means an uncovering, a removal of the veil, a disclosure of what was previously unknown. Revelation of God is God's manifestation of Himself to humankind in such a way that men and women can know and fellowship with Him. Jesus explained to Peter: "Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, for this was not revealed to you by man, but by my Father in heaven" (Matt. 16:17 NIV). The knowledge of Jesus' sonship was not attained by human discovery, nor could it have been; it came from God alone.

All Christians recognize that God has acted and spoken in history, revealing Himself to His creatures. Yet, a variety of opinions seek to define what constitutes revelation.

General Revelation The physical world—nature—is not a part of God as my hand is a part of me. Yet, God might reveal Himself through His actions in that world. Besides saying or writing things, persons may reveal facts about themselves in other ways, such as physical gestures or facial expressions. Sometimes persons' actions communicate whether they are selfish or generous, clumsy or skillful. A grimace, a smile, or a frown can often be telling. Transferring these things to a theological context is not simple, because God is not visible. He does not have facial features or bodily parts with which to gesture. To say God reveals Himself through nature means that through the events of the physical world God communicates to us things about Himself that we would otherwise not know.

What sort of things might God tell us in this manner? Paul explained "What can be known about God is plain to them, for God Himself made it plain. Ever since God created the world, his invisible qualities both his eternal power and his divine nature, have been clearly seen; they are perceived in the things that God has made. So those people have no excuse at all" (Rom. 1:20 TEV). The psalmist (Ps. 19:1) saw the glory of God through the spectacles of special revelation. What the psalmist saw was objectively and genuinely there. We can rephrase these observations to say that all that can be known about God in a natural sense has been revealed in nature. This is what we call natural or general revelation. General revelation is universal in the sense that it is God's self-disclosure of Himself in a general way to all people at all times in all places. General revelation occurs through (1) nature, (2) in our experience and in our conscience, and (3) in history.

In the wonders of the heavens and in the beauty of the earth God manifests Himself. Jesus taught that God "causes His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Matt. 5:45 NAS), thus revealing His goodness to all. "The living God, who made the heaven and the earth and the sea and all that is in them . . . has not left himself without a witness in doing good—giving you rains from heaven and fruitful seasons, and filling you with food and your hearts with joy" (Acts 14:15–17 NRSV). God makes Himself known in the continuing care and provision for humankind. The universe as a whole serves the Creator's purposes as a vehicle of God's self-manifestation.

God also reveals himself in men and women. They are made in the "image" and "likeness" of God (Gen. 1:26–27). Humans, as a direct creation of God, are a mirror or reflection of God. People are God's unique workmanship evidenced by their place of dominion over the rest of creation; in their capacity to reason, feel, and imagine; in their freedom to act and respond; and in their sense of right and wrong (Gen. 1:28; Rom. 2:14,15). Especially through this moral sense God reveals Himself in the consciences of men and women. The fact that religious belief and practice is universal confirms the apostle's statements in Romans 2. Yet, the creatures who worship, pray, build temples, idols and shrines, and seek after God in diverse ways do not glorify God as God nor give Him thanks (Rom. 1:21–23). Nevertheless, because each person has been given the capacity for receiving God's general revelation, they are responsible for their actions.

God manifests Himself in the workings of history. All of history, rightly understood, bears the imprint of God's activity and thus has a theological character. Primarily, God is revealed in history through the rise and fall of peoples and nations (compare Acts 17:22–31).

God's general revelation is plain, whether in nature, in human conscience, or in history. Even though it is plain, it is often misinterpreted because sinful and finite humans are trying to understand a perfect and infinite God. What we have seen so far is compatible with the following:

(1) Religious belief is a nearly universal human phenomenon.

(2) Such religious belief is implanted by God.

(3) All people ought to acknowledge God on the basis of what they learned from the world around them.

(4) All people believe in God and show their belief even though they do not admit it.

(5) No one, no matter how seemingly insignificant or weak-minded can be excused for missing God's revelation.

The light of nature is not sufficient to give the knowledge of God necessary for salvation. For God's power (Rom. 1:20), goodness (Matt. 5:45), and righteousness (Rom. 2:14–15) have been revealed, but not His salvific grace. That is revealed only through special revelation. Special revelation is necessary to instruct people how to worship God rightly. God in His general revelation reveals Himself, but because of our sinfulness, humans pervert the reception of His general revelation, a revelation so plain it leaves all without excuse. It is as if a lawyer were offered the information necessary to solve a case, yet chose perversely to ignore it.

In sum, humans lack the willingness to come to a pure and clear knowledge of God. Men and women suppress God's truth because they do not like the truth about God. They do not like the God to which the truth leads them so they invent substitute gods and religions instead. The universality of religion on earth is evidence of truths discussed above. According to Paul, the act of suppressing the awareness of God and His demands warps our reason and conscience. Because of this rejection of God, He righteously reveals His wrath against humankind. God's general revelation does not bring one into a saving relationship with God; it does reveal God to His creatures and they are, therefore, responsible for their response. This view of general revelation can only be accepted through special revelation.

Special Revelation God has revealed Himself in nature, human experience, and history, but sin's entrance into the world has changed the revelation as well as the interpretation of it. What is needed to understand God's self-disclosure fully is His special revelation. Divine truth exists outside of special revelation, but it is consistent with and supplemental to, not a substitute for special revelation.

In contrast to God's general revelation which is available to all people, God's special revelation is available to specific people at specific times in specific places, it is available now only by consultation of sacred Scripture. Special revelation is first of all particular. God reveals Himself with His people. These people of God are the children of Abraham, whether by natural (Gen. 12:1–3) or spiritual descent (Gal. 3:16,29). Does this mean that God confines knowledge of Himself to a particular people? Not necessarily, because God's general revelation has been given to all, though perverted and rejected by the universal wickedness of humankind. He now chooses to whom and through whom He will make Himself known. As with Abraham, God said: "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. 12:3). God manifests Himself in a particular manner to His people so they will be a channel of blessing to all others.

Special revelation is also progressive. Biblical history witnesses to a developing disclosure of God, His will, and His truth in the Old and New Testaments. The development is not contradictory in any fashion. It is complementary and supplementary to what had been previously revealed. We should not think of the progress from untruth to truth, but from a lesser to a fuller revelation (Heb. 1:1–3). The revelation of the law in the Old Testament is not superseded by the gospel, but is fulfilled in it.

Special revelation is primarily redemptive and personal. In recognition of the human predicament God chose at the very beginning to disclose Himself in a more direct way. Within time and space God has acted and spoken to redeem the human race from its own self-imposed evil. Through calling people, miracles, the Exodus, covenant making, and ultimately through Jesus Christ, God has revealed Himself in history.

The ultimate point of God's personal revelation is in Jesus Christ. In Him, the Word became flesh (John. 1:1,14;14:9). The Old Testament promise of salvation as a divine gift to people who cannot save themselves has been fulfilled in the gift of His Son. The redemptive revelation of God is that Jesus Christ has borne the sins of fallen humanity, has died in their place, and has been raised to assure justification. This is the fixed center of special revelation.

Special revelation is also propositional. It includes not only those personal, redemptive acts in history, but also the prophetic-apostolic interpretation of those events. God's self-disclosure is propositional in that it made known truths about Him to His people. Knowledge about someone precedes intimate knowledge of someone. The primary purpose of revelation is not necessarily to enlarge the scope of one's knowledge. Yet, propositional knowledge about is for the purpose of personal knowledge of.

We can thus affirm that special revelation has three stages: (1) redemption in history, ultimately centering in the work of the Lord Jesus Christ; (2) the Bible, written revelation interpreting what He has done for the redemption of men and women; (3) the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals and the corporate life of the church, applying God's revelation to the minds and hearts of His people. As a result, men and women receive Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior and are enabled to follow Him faithfully in a believing, covenant community until life's end.

The content of special revelation is primarily God Himself. Mystery remains even in God's self-revelation. God does not fully reveal Himself to any person. God, does, however, reveal himself to persons to the degree they can receive it. Special revelation is the declaration of truth about God, His character, and His action and relationship with His creation to bring all creation under Christ, the one head (Eph. 1:9–10).

The proper setting of special revelation is Christian faith. God makes Himself known to those who receive His revelation in faith (Heb. 11:1,6). Faith is the glad recognition of truth, the reception of God's revelation without reservation or hesitation (Rom. 10:17).

For today, the Bible is of crucial importance. Through the Bible the Spirit witnesses to individuals of God's grace and the need of faith response. In the Bible we learn of God's redemption of sinners in Christ Jesus. Our faith response to God's Word and acts, recorded and interpreted by the prophets and apostles, calls for us to embrace with humble teachableness, without finding fault, whatever is taught in Holy Scripture.

In sum we can say that God has initiated the revelation of Himself to men and women. This revelation is understandable to humankind and makes it possible to know God and grow in relationship with Him. God's self-manifestation provides information about Himself for the purpose of leading men and women into God's presence. For believers today, the Bible is the source of God's revelation. In the written word we can identify God, know and understand something about Him, His will, and His work, and point others to Him. Special revelation is not generally speculative. The Bible primarily speaks on matters of cosmology and history where these issues touch the nature of faith. God has manifested Himself incarnationally through human language, human thought, and human action as ultimately demonstrated in the incarnation of Jesus Christ.

REVELATION, THE BOOK OF The last book of the Bible, an apocalyptic work pointing to future hope and calling for present faithfulness. Revelation is a work of intensity, forged in the flames of the author's personal tribulation. It employs the language of biblical allusion and apocalyptic symbolism to express the heights and depths of the author's visionary experience.

To encourage Christian faithfulness, the Revelation points to the glorious world to come (a world of "no more death or mourning or crying or pain," 21:4 NIV; compare 7:16) at the reappearing of the crucified and risen Jesus. This now enthroned Lord will return to conclude world history (and the tribulations of the readers) with the destruction of God's enemies, the final salvation of His own people, and the creation of a new heaven and a new earth. The intensity of the prophet's experience is matched only by the richness of the apocalyptic symbolism he employed to warn his readers of the impending disasters and temptations which would require their steadfast allegiance to the risen Lord. To be sure, the Lord will come in power and majesty, but not before His enemies have exercised a terrible (albeit limited by the divine mercy) attack upon those who "hold to the testimony of Jesus."

Author According to early Christian traditions, the Gospel of John, the three Epistles of John, and the Revelation were all written by the apostle John. The Revelation is the only one of these books that claims to be written by someone named John. Though the author does not claim to be the apostle John, it seems unlikely that any other first-century Christian leader was associated closely enough with the churches of Asia Minor to have referred to himself simply as John. There are certainly some differences in style and language between the fourth Gospel and the Revelation, but, regardless of the problems related to the authorship of the fourth Gospel, it is not implausible to assume that the John of the Revelation was in fact John the apostle, son of Zebedee. See John.

Setting The author's situation was one of suffering. He was a "fellow partaker in the tribulation" which is "in Jesus," who, because of his testimony to Jesus, was exiled to the island of Patmos (1:9 NAS). The situation of the recipients seemed not yet so dire. To be sure, a faithful Christian in Pergamum had suffered death (2:13), and the church in Smyrna was warned of a time of impending persecution (2:10); but the persecutions described in the Revelation were still largely anticipated at the time of John's writing.

Date Scholars have traditionally suggested two dates for the writing of the Revelation based upon the repeated references to persecution (1:9; 2:2–3,10,13; 3:9–10; 6:10–11; 7:14–17; 11:7; 12:13—13:17; 14:12–20; 19:2; 21:4). From about A.D. 150, Christian authors usually referred to Domitian's reign (A.D. 81–96) as the time of John's writing, but there is no historical consensus supporting a persecution of Christians under Domitian while hard evidence does exist for a persecution under Nero (A.D. 54–68). In this century, most New Testament scholars have opted for the later date under Domitian (about A.D. 95), though there has been a resurgence of opinion (including this author's) arguing for a setting just following the reign of Nero (about A.D. 68). Whichever date is chosen, however, the setting must be closely related to a time of persecution for the author and an anticipated expansion of persecution for the original audience.

Type of Literature The Revelation has traditionally been called an apocalypse. Although the genre itself was not literarily acknowledged in the first century, what we now call "apocalyptic literature" certainly existed. In any case, John called his work a "prophecy" (1:3; 22:10,19), but also gave it some features of an epistle (1:4–7; 22:21).

Millennial Perspectives On Revelation

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
	Viewpoint that the present age of Christ's rule in the church is the millennium; Holds to one resurrection and judgment marking the end of history as we know it and the beginning of life eternal	Viewpoint that Christ will reign on earth for 1000 years following His Second Coming; Saints will be resurrected at the beginning of the millennium, non-believers at the end, followed by judgment	Viewpoint that after the battle of Armageddon, Christ will rule through the Jews for a literal 1000 years accompanied by two resurrections and at least three judgments
Book of Revelation	Current history written in code to confound enemies and encourage Asian Christians; message applies to all Christians	Immediate application to Asian Christians; applies to all Christians throughout the ages, but the visions also apply to a great future event	"Unveiling" of theme of Christ among churches in present dispensation, also as Judge and King in dispensations to come
Seven candlesticks (1:13)	Churches		Churches, plus end-time application
Seven stars (1:16,20)	Pastors	Symbolizes heavenly or supernatural character of the church (some believe refers to pastors)	Pastors or saints
Churches addressed (chaps. 2-3)	Specific historical situations, truths apply to churches throughout the ages; do not represent periods of church history		Specific historical situations and to all churches throughout the ages; shows progress of churches' spiritual state until end of church age
Twenty-four elders (4:4,10; 5:8,14)	Twelve patriarchs and twelve apostles; together symbolize all the redeemed	Company of angels who help execute God's rule (or elders represent twenty-four priestly and Levitical orders)	The rewarded church; also represents twelve patriarchs and twelve apostles

Sealed book (5:1-9)	Scroll of history; shows God carrying out His redemptive purpose in history	Contains prophecy of end events of chapters 7-22	Title deed to the world
144,000 (7:4-8)	Redeemed on earth who will be protected against God's wrath	Church on threshold of great tribulation	Jewish converts of tribulation period who witness to Gentiles (same as 14:1)
Great Multitude (7:9-10)	Uncountable multitude in heaven praising God for their salvation	Church, having gone through great tribulation, seen in heaven	Gentiles redeemed during tribulation period through witness of 144,000
Great tribulation (first reference in 7:14)	Persecution faced by Asian Christians of John's time; symbolic of tribulation that occurs throughout history	Period at end-time of unexplained trouble, before Christ's return; church will go through it; begins with seventh seal (18:1) which includes trumpets 1-6 (8:2 to 14:20)	Period at end-time of unexplained trouble referred to in 7:14 and described in chapters 11-18; lasts three-and-one-half years, the latter half of seven-year period between rapture and millennium
"Star" (9:4)	Personified evil	Represents an angelic figure divinely commissioned to carry out God's purpose	The leader of apostasy during the great tribulation
Forty-two months (11:2); 1,260 days (11:3)	Indefinite duration of pagan desolation	A symbolic number representing period of evil with reference to last days of age	Half of seven-year tribulation period
Two witnesses (11:3-10)	Spread of gospel in first century	Two actual historical persons at end of time who witness to Israel	A witnessing remnant of Jews in Jerusalem testifying to the coming kingdom and calling Israel to repent

Postmillennialism—Viewpoint that Christ's reign on earth is spiritual not physical. Christ returns after the millennium that is established by gospel preaching.

Millennial Perspectives On Revelation

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
Sodom and Egypt (11:8)	Rome as seat of Empire	Earthly Jerusalem	Earthly Jerusalem
Woman (12:1-6)	True people of God under Old and New Covenants (true Israel)		Indicates Israel, not church; key is comparison with Genesis 37:9
Great red dragon (12:3)	All views identify as Satan
Manchild (12:4-5)	Christ at His birth, life events, and crucifixion, whom Satan sought to kill	Christ, whose work Satan seeks to destroy	Christ but also the church (head and body); caught up on throne indicates rapture of church
1,260 days (12:6)	Indefinite time	Symbolic number representing period of evil with special reference to last days of age	First half of great tribulation after church is raptured
Sea beast (13:1)	Emperor Domitian, personification of Roman Empire (same as in chap. 17)	Antichrist, here shown as embodiment of the four beasts in Daniel 7	A new Rome, satanic federation of nations that come out of old Roman Empire
Seven heads (13:1)	Roman emperors	Great power, shows kinship with dragon	Seven stages of Roman Empire; sixth was imperial Rome (John's day); last will be federation of nations
Ten horns (13:1)	Symbolize power	Kings, represent limited crowns (ten) against Christ's many	Ten powers that will combine to make the federation of nations of new Rome
Earth beast (13:11)	Concilia, Roman body in cities responsible for emperor worship	Organized religion as servant of first beast during great tribulation period; headed by a false prophet	Antichrist, who will head apostate religion, a Jewish leader described in Daniel 11:36-45 (some identify as assistant to the Antichrist)

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
666 (13:18)	Imperfection, evil; personified as Domitian	Symbolic of evil, short of 777; if a personage meant, he is unknown but will be known at the proper time	Not known, but will be known when time comes
144,000 on Mount Zion (14:1)	Total body of redeemed in heaven		Redeemed Jews gathered in earthly Jerusalem during millennial kingdom
River of blood (14:20)	Symbol of infinite punishment for the wicked	Means God's radical judgment crushes evil thoroughly	Scene of wrath and carnage that will occur in Palestine
Babylon (woman—17:5)	Historical Rome	Capital city of future Antichrist	Apostate church of the future
Beast	Domitian	Antichrist	Head of satanic federation of nations of revived Roman Empire; linked with apostate church (seventh head)
Seven mountains (17:9)	Pagan Rome, which was built on seven hills	Indicate power, so here means a succession of empires, last of which is end-time Babylon	Rome, revived at end-time
Seven heads (17:7) and seven kings (17:10)	Roman emperors from Augustus to Titus, excluding three brief rules	Five past godless kingdoms; sixth was Rome; seventh would arise in end-time	Five distinct forms of Roman government prior to John; sixth was imperial Rome; seventh will be revived Roman Empire
Ten horns (17:7) and ten kings (17:12)	Vassal kings who ruled with Rome's permission	Symbolic of earthly powers that will be subservient to Antichrist	Ten kingdoms arising in future out of revived Roman Empire

Millennial Perspectives On Revelation

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
Waters (17:15)	People ruled by Roman Empire	Indicates complex civilization	People dominated by apostate church
Bride, wife (19:7)	Total of all the redeemed		The church; does not include Old Testament saints or tribulation saints
Marriage supper (19:9)	Climax of the age; symbolizes complete union of Christ with His people	Union of Christ with His people at His Coming	Union of Christ with His church accompanied by Old Testament saints and tribulation saints
One on white horse (19:11-16)	Vision of Christ's victory over pagan Rome; return of Christ occurs in connection with events of 20:7-10	Second coming of Christ
Battle of Armageddon (19:19-21; see 16:16)	Not literally at end of time but symbolizes power of God's word overcoming evil; principle applies to all ages	Literal event of some kind at end-time but not literal battle with military weapons; occurs at Christ's return at beginning of millennium	Literal bloody battle at Armageddon (valley of Megiddo) at end of great tribulation between kings of the East and federation of nations of new Rome; they are all defeated by blast from Christ's mouth and then millennium begins
Great supper (19:17)	Stands in contrast to marriage supper		Concludes series of judgments and opens way for kingdom to be established
Binding of Satan (20:2)	Symbolic of Christ's resurrection victory over Satan	Curbing of Satan's power during the millennium

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
Millennium (20:2-6)	Symbolic reference to period from Christ's first coming to His second	A historical event, though length of one thousand years may be symbolic, after Armageddon during which Christ rules with His people	A literal one thousand year period after the church age during which Christ rules with His people but especially through the Jews
Those on thrones (20:4)	Martyrs in heaven, their presence with God is a judgment on those who killed them	Saints and martyrs who rule with Christ in the millennium	The redeemed ruling with Christ, appearing and disappearing on earth at will to oversee life on earth
First resurrection (20:5-6)	The spiritual presence with Christ of the redeemed that occurs after physical death	Resurrection of saints at beginning of millennium when Christ returns	Includes three groups: (1) those raptured with church (4:1); (2) Jewish tribulation saints during tribulation (11:11); (3) other Jewish believers at beginning of millennium (20:5-6)
Second death (20:6)	Spiritual death, eternal separation from God
Second resurrection (implied)	All persons, lost and redeemed, rise when Christ returns in only resurrection that takes place	Nonbelievers, resurrected at end of millennium
New heavens and earth (21:1)	A new order; redeemed earth
New Jerusalem (21:2-5)	God dwelling with His saints (the church) in the new age after all other end-time events
New Jerusalem (21:10-22:5)	Same as 21:2-5		Millennial Jerusalem from which the world will be ruled; the bride as well as the home of the saints.

Series in Revelation

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
Seal 1 (6:1-2)	Earthly conqueror	Proclamation of gospel; others believe is earthly conqueror	Man's last effort to bring order to earth while rejecting Christ
Seals 2-4 (6:3-8)	Also with seal 1, suffering that must be endured throughout history	Constant problems of war, scarcity, and death	Sequence of disasters brought about by evil rule
Seal 5 (6:9-11)	Assurance for faithful (all ages) that God will judge evil		Jewish martyrs of tribulation period
Seal 6 (6:12-17)	End of time; God's final judgment	Real cosmic catastrophe at end of age	Symbolic description of breakup of society as a result of evil
Seal 7 (8:1)	The seven trumpets to follow
Trumpets 1-4 (chap. 8)	Fall of Roman Empire through natural calamities	God's wrath falls on a civilization that gives allegiance to Antichrist when choice is very clear; first four trumpets involve natural catastrophes	(1) Judgment on people who refuse gospel; (2) judgment on great world-church; (3) judgment on apostate church leader of great influence; (4) judgment on people who reject Christ and follow cults
Locusts, fifth trumpet (9:3-4)	Internal decay bringing fall of Roman Empire	Symbolic of actual demonic forces released during great tribulation, inflict torture	Predicts disastrous results that will come through demonically-led people following apostate religious leader during great tribulation
Army from East, sixth trumpet (9:13-19)	External attack bringing fall of Roman Empire	Symbolic of actual divine judgment on corrupt civilization, inflicts death	Literal invasion of West by army from East
Seventh trumpet (11:15)	God will one day claim His victory	Announces victorious outcome	Announces arrival of millennial kingdom

	Amillennial	Historical Premillennial	Dispensational Premillennial
First vial (16:2)	Judgment on adherents of false religion, including Domitian worshipers	Inflicted specifically on followers of Antichrist	Spiritual plague as great an annoyance as physical suffering
Second vial (16:3)	Destruction of sources of physical sustenance	Death of everything in sea	Death and desolation, whether literal or symbolic
Third vial (16:4-7)	Those who shed blood of saints will receive a curse of blood	Affects fresh water	Destroys the sources of life
Fourth vial (16:8-9)	Even when people recognize that source of all life fights against them for God, they blaspheme and refuse to repent	God overrules processes of nature to bring judgment, but people still refuse to repent	The primary source of humanity's comfort becomes a curse instead
Fifth vial (16:10-11)	God's judgment on seat of beast's authority; darkness indicates confused and evil plotting	Directed against the demonic civilization of end-time	Great federation of nations of new Rome is attacked at its center; darkness brought about by demonical delusions; symbolic
Sixth vial (16:12-16)	Forces against God will ultimately be destroyed; here refers specifically to Parthians	Serves as preparation for great battle of end-time; a coalition of demonically-inspired rulers	Refers to great world conflict of many nations at Armageddon in Palestine
Seventh vial (16:17-21)	Poured in the air all must breathe; strikes note of final judgment on Roman Empire	Describes fall of end-time Babylon (dealt with more fully later)	Utter destruction of every spiritual and religious institution built without God; the overthrow of civilization

XI. The Rejoicing of Heaven and the Revelation of the Lamb, Bringing Judgment and the Advent of the Bride, the Holy City (19:1—22:5)
XII. Conclusion (22:6–21)

Introduction (1:1–8) Written to "the seven churches" of the Roman province of Asia, John's work is a "revelation" of "the things which must shortly take place." The theme of John's work is clear: the Lord God Himself has guaranteed the final vindication of the crucified Jesus before all the earth (1:7–8).

John's Vision on the Island of Patmos (1:9–20) While in exile on Patmos, John saw the risen Lord (1:9–20). Appearing in the dress of power and majesty (1:9–20), the Living One revealed Himself as Lord of the churches, to whom He instructed John to send not only the seven letters, but also an account of the things which he both had seen and would see, that is, a revelation of "the things which shall be hereafter" (1:19).

Letters to the Seven Churches (2:1—3:22) The letters to the churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea have a fairly consistent format. First, after designating the recipients, the risen Lord as Sender describes Himself using a portion of the visionary description of Him in 1:9–20. There follows an "I know" section of either commendation or criticism. Next appears typically some form of exhortation: to those who received criticism, the usual exhortation is to repent; however, to the churches of Smyrna and Philadelphia, for whom the Lord had only praise, the exhortation is one of assurance (compare 2:10; 3:10–13). Each letter concludes, though the order may vary, with both an exhortation to "hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (NAS) and a promise of reward to the "overcomer," that is, the one who conquers by persevering in the cause of Christ.

The church at Ephesus (2:1–7) is told to return to her first love; the church at Smyrna (2:8–11), to be faithful unto death; the churches of Pergamum (2:12–17) and Thyatira (2:18–29) must beware of false teaching and the immoral deeds that so often accompany erroneous theology. The church at Sardis (3:1–6) is told to wake up and complete her works of obedience. The church at Philadelphia (3:7–13) is promised, in the face of persecution by the local synagogue, that faith in Jesus will assure access into the eternal kingdom; and the church at Laodicea (3:14–22) is told to turn from her self-deception and repent of her lukewarmness.

The Sovereignty of the Creator God Committed to the Crucified and Now Enthroned Lamb (4:1—5:14) Chapters 4 and 5 represent the pivot point of the book, tying the risen Lord's opening exhortations to the churches (chs. 2—3) to the judgments and final triumph of the Lamb (chs. 6—22). These chapters also provide the historical and theological basis of the risen Lord's authority over both the church and the world by depicting His enthronement and empowering to carry out the judging and saving purposes of God. Chapter 4 asserts the sovereign authority of the Creator God. Chapter 5 depicts the delegation of the divine authority to the risen Lord by introducing a sequence of events reminiscent of Daniel 7. In Daniel 7, the people of God were oppressed by four terrible beasts, symbolic of evil empires and kings; similarly, the Revelation is written to people who either are, or soon will be, experiencing persecution from powers of evil. Similar to Daniel 7, in Revelation 5, we see both a book of judgment—and a glorious, redemptive agent of God. Instead of an unidentified human figure, we learn that the exalted agent of God is none other than the crucified Jesus, the Lamb and Lion of God, now enthroned and therefore worthy to take the book and break the seals.

The events portrayed here are highly symbolic, but are not ahistorical myth. The scene readily suggests an otherwise well-known and important historical and theological moment within biblical history, namely, the ascension of Jesus. His redemptive death, that is, His obedience to the will of God (see also Phil. 2:8–9; Heb. 2:9–10; 5:8–9; 10:9–10), qualified Him for the role of Lord. He has "overcome" (5:5), a word which for John refers to Jesus's triumphal suffering and subsequent enthronement (see 3:21), and may therefore now as the heavenly Lord assume the role of divine agent.

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments Via the Seven Seals (6:1—8:5) The breaking of the first four seals brings forth four differently colored horsemen (6:1–8). These riders, paralleling the chaos predicted in Mark 13, represent God's judgments through the upheavals of war and its devastating social consequences (violence, famine, pestilence, and death). The fifth seal (6:9–11) is the plea of martyred saints for divine justice upon their oppressors. For now, they must wait.

A careful look at the sixth seal is important for understanding the literary structure and episodic sequence of the Revelation. When broken, it brings forth the typical signs of the end: a great earthquake, the blackening of the sun, the ensanguining of the moon, and the falling of the stars of heaven (compare Matt. 24:29). Though the Revelation is but a few chapters old, we are brought to the end of world history. The mighty as well as the lowly of the earth realize that the great day of God's (and the Lamb's) wrath has come, and nothing can save them (6:14–17). The description of the judgments initiated by the first six seals would no doubt tend to overwhelm John's audience, so he interrupted the sequence leading to the seventh seal to remind us that the people of God need not despair, for, as the "bond-servants of God" (7:3 NAS), they have the promise of heaven.

Chapter 7 is actually two visions (7:1–8,9–17), with the second both interpreting and concluding the first. The sealing of the 144,000 (7:1–8) employs Jewish symbols to describe those who know God through Jesus Christ. Clearly, John is referring to Christians as the 144,000 for 7:3 refers to the "bond-servants" of God, a term consistently used throughout the Revelation (1:1; 2:20; 10:7; 11:18; 19:2,5; 22:3,6) to refer either to Christians in general or the Christian prophet, but never to the non-Christian Jew (or Gentile). Language employed in the Old Testament to refer to the Jews is characteristically used in the New Testament to refer to those who know God through Jesus Christ (see 2 Cor. 6:16–18; Gal. 3:29; 1 Peter 2:9–10; and Rev. 1:6). The number 144,000 is an intensification ($12\times12\times10\times10\times10$) of the original number twelve (itself an obvious allusion to the twelve tribes, the Old Testament people of God), which indicates that the 144,000 comprise the full number of God's people, God's people now being all (Jew or Gentile) who are followers of Jesus.

In the second vision (7:9–17), the 144,000 have become "a great multitude, which no one could count" (NAS). Who are they? Using his favorite descriptions of heaven (see 21:3–4,23; 22:1–5), John tells us that they are those who have "come out of the great tribulation" (NAS), now to experience the joys of heaven and relief from the tribulations they have endured (compare 7:14–17 with 21:1–6; 22:1–5). To "come out of the great tribulation" (7:14) does not mean that they have exited the earth before the hour of tribulation. To the contrary, they have indeed experienced the tribulations of this evil age, but now in heaven they enjoy the presence of God (7:15; 21:3). As the true Israel of God, Christians ("the bond-servants of our God," 7:3, NAS) have the seal of God. Refusing the mark of the beast (13:16–17; 14:11), they hold to the testimony of Jesus (14:12) in spite of persecution (12:17; 13:7) and therefore have the promise of final deliverance in heaven from this evil age of great tribulation (7:14).

Revelation 8:1–5 gives us the seventh seal and again the traditional signs of the very end of human history and the coming of the Lord, but the prophet is not yet ready to describe the Lord's return. He still has too much to say about the nature of judgment, the mission of the church, and the persecutions of the beast to bring his prophecy to an end. Therefore, before describing fully the end, John must start over. Now, using the symbolic vehicle of the seven trumpets, he declared that the judgments of God also have a redemptive purpose.

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments Via the Seven Trumpets (8:6—11:19) The first four trumpets describe partial judgments ("one-third") upon the earth's vegetation, the oceans, fresh waters, and the heavenly lights (8:6–13). The last three trumpets are grouped together and also described as three "woes" upon the earth, emphasizing God's judgment upon mankind. All these judgments have no redemptive effect, for the "rest of mankind" who are not killed by these plagues do not repent of their immoralities (9:20–21 NAS).

Just as the interlude between the sixth and seventh seals reminded us that the people of God are safe from the eternally destructive effects of God's wrath, so also between the sixth and seventh trumpets we are reminded of God's protective hand on His people (10:1–11:14). In the trumpet interlude we also learn that God's protection during these days of tribulation does not mean isolation, for the people of God must bear a prophetic witness to the world.

In 10:1–8, John's call (after the pattern of Ezek. 2:1—3:11) is reaffirmed. The note of protection and witness is again struck in 11:1–13 where the measuring of the temple of God (11:1–2) alludes to God's protective hand upon His people during the hour of turmoil (11:2). Persecutions will last for "forty-two months," but His people cannot be destroyed, for the "two witnesses" (11:3–13) must bear witness to the mercy and judgment of God. The "two witnesses" ("two" suggests a confirmed, legal testimony) are also called "two lampstands" (11:4), terminology already interpreted in 1:20 to mean the church. Though engaged in great spiritual warfare, the church, like Moses and Elijah of old, must maintain a faithfully prophetic witness to the world, a witness even unto death. Though the earth rejoices that the testimony of the church is in the end apparently snuffed out, the temporary triumph of evil ("three-and-a-half days," 11:9,11) will turn to heavenly vindication as the two witnesses (the people of God) are raised from the dead (11:11–12).

With the seventh trumpet (and third woe) the end of history has come, the time "for the dead to be judged" and the saints to be rewarded (11:18 NAS). The coming of the reign of God (and Christ), as well as the day of judgment, are past events (11:17–18). John is not yet ready to describe the actual coming of the King of kings and Lord of lords. Sadly, he has more to relate regarding "the beast that comes up out of the abyss" to "make war" with the people of God (11:7, NAS). It is that "42 months," the period of persecution (and protection/witness), that John now unfolds.

The Dragon's Persecution of the Righteous (12:1—13:18) Chapter 12 is crucial for understanding John's view of the sequence of history. The number "three-and-a-half" was associated by Christians and Jews with times of evil and judgment. John variously referred to the three-and-a-half years as either "forty-two months," or "1,260 days," or "a time, times, and half a time." For John, it was the period of time when the powers of evil will do their works. During this time, God will protect His people (12:6,14) while they both bear witness to their faith (11:3) and simultaneously suffer at the hands of these evil powers (11:2,7; 12:13–17; 13:5–7). Commentators agree that this terrible period of tribulation will be brought to an end with the coming of the Lord. The critical question, however, is when the three-and-a-half year period of persecution and witness begins. Though some scholars have relegated the "three-and-a-half years" to some as-yet-unbegun moment in the future, chapter 12 unmistakably pinpoints its beginning with the ascension and enthronement of Christ (12:5). When the woman's (Israel's) offspring is "caught up to God and to His throne" (12:5, NAS, author's italics), there is war in heaven, and the dragon is cast down to the earth.

Heaven rejoices because it has been rescued from Satan, but the earth must now mourn, because the devil has been cast down to earth, and his anger is great. He knows that he has been defeated by the enthronement of Christ and that he has but a short time (12:12). The woman, who (as Israel) brought forth the Christ (12:1–2) and also "other offspring," those who "hold to the testimony of Jesus," now received the brunt of the frustrated dragon's wrath (12:17). As the enraged dragon now seeks to vent his wrath upon the woman, she is nonetheless nourished and protected for "1,260 days" (12:6), for a "time, times, and half a time" (12:14).

The dragon then brings forth two henchmen (ch. 13) to help him in his pursuit of those who believe in Jesus. Satan is thus embodied in a political ruler, the beast from the sea (13:1), who will speak blasphemies for "forty-two months" (13:5). He will "make war with the saints" (13:7 NAS), while the second beast (or false prophet, 19:20), who comes up from the earth (13:11), seeks to deceive the earth so that its inhabitants worship the first beast.

Thus, in chapters 12 and 13, each of the various ways of referring to the three-and-a-half years is a referrence to a single period of time that began with the enthronement of Christ and will conclude with His return. The time period is not a literal three-and-a-half years, but the entire time between the ascension and return of Christ which will be permitted the dragon to execute his evil work upon the earth (compare Gal. 1:4; Eph. 2:2). Almost two thousand years have elapsed since our Lord ascended to the right hand of God, but the "three-and-a-half years" still continues. Satan still rages; but his time is short, and his evil will cease at the return of Christ.

A Summary of Triumph, Warning, and Judgment (14:1–20) After the depressing news of the ongoing persecutions of the unholy trinity, John's readers need another word of encouragement and warning. Chapter 14 therefore employs seven "voices" to relate again the hopes and warnings of heaven. First is another vision of the 144,000, the full number of the people of God (14:4). Faithful in their worship of the one true God through Jesus Christ and not seduced by the satanic deceptions of the first beast and his ally, the false prophet, they will be rescued and taken to heaven's throne (14:1–5).

An angel announces the eternal gospel and warns the earth of coming judgment (14:6–7). The remaining "voices" (or oracles) follow in rapid succession. The fall of "Babylon the Great," an Old Testament symbol for a nation opposed to the people of God, is announced (14:8). The people of God are warned not to follow the beast or else those who follow him suffer separation from God (14:9–12). Finally, two voices call for harvest (14:14–20).

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments Via the Seven Cups (15:1—16:21) Another dimension of His judgment must be revealed. The seven cups of wrath are similar to the seven trumpets and the seven seals, but also different. The wrath of God is no longer partial or temporary, but complete and everlasting, final and irrevocable. The partial judgments ("one-third") of the trumpets suggest that God uses the sufferings and evils of this life to draw mankind toward repentance and faith; but such tribulations also foreshadow the final hour of judgment when God's wrath is finished.

The seven cups have no break between the sixth and seventh outpourings of judgment. Only wrath is left with no more delay. Babylon the Great, the symbol for all who have vaunted themselves against the most high God, will fall. The end has come (16:18).

The Fall and Ruin of the Immoral City of the Beast (17:1—18:24) Chapter 17 retells the sixth cup, the fall of Babylon the Great, and chapter 18 gives a moving lament for the great city.

The Rejoicing of Heaven and the Revelation of the Lamb Bringing Judgment and the Advent of the Bride, the Holy City (19:1—22:25) Although John has withheld a description of the coming of the Lord on at least three earlier occasions (8:5; 11:15–19; 16:17–21; compare also 14:14–16), John is now prepared to describe the glories of the Lord's appearance. All of heaven rejoices over the righteous judgment of God upon evil (19:1–6). The Lamb's bride, the people of God, has made herself ready by her faithfulness to her Lord through the hour of suffering (see 19:7–8).

Heaven is opened, and the One whose coming has been faithfully petitioned from ages past appears to battle the enemies of God, a conflict whose outcome is not in doubt (19:11–16). The first beast and the second beast are thrown into the lake of fire from which there is no return (19:20). The dragon—Satan—is cast into a hellish abyss which is shut and sealed for a thousand years (20:1–3). Since the powers of evil reigned for "three-and-a-half years" (the period of time between the ascension and return of our Lord), Christ will reign for a "thousand years." The dead in Christ are raised to govern with Him (20:4–6), and God's rightful rule over the earth is vindicated.

At the end of Christ's reign, the final disposition of Satan will occur (20:7–10). Though John predicted that Satan will have one last hurrah of deception, his final insurrection will be short-lived. In one final battle, Satan and his followers are overcome, and the devil joins the beast and the false prophet in the lake of fire where "they will be tormented day and night forever and ever" (20:10 NAS). Then the final judment takes place, at which all not included in "the book of life" are thrown into the lake of fire (20:11–15 NAS).

Chapter 21 is often thought to refer to the period following the 1,000-year reign, but it is more probably a retelling of the return of Christ from the viewpoint of the bride. Just as chapter 17 was a recapitulation of the seventh cup and the fall of the harlot, Babylon the Great (compare the language of 17:1–3, which clearly introduces a "retelling," with the language of 21:9–10), so chapter 21 recapitulates the glorification of the bride of the Lamb (21:1—22:5). To be the bride is to be the holy city, the New Jerusalem, to live in the presence of God and the Lamb, and to experience protection, joy, and the everlasting, life-giving light of God (21:9–27). The throne of God and of the Lamb is there, and there His bond servants shall serve Him and reign with Him forever and ever (21:1–5).

Conclusion (22:6–21) John concluded his prophecy by declaring the utter faithfulness of his words. Those who heed his prophecy will receive the blessings of God. Those who ignore the warnings will be left outside the gates of God's presence (22:6–15). Solemnly and hopefully praying for the Lord to come, John closed his book (22:17,20). The churches must have ears to hear what the Spirit has said (22:16). The people of God must, by His grace (22:21), persevere in the hour of tribulation, knowing that their enthroned Lord will return in triumph. Robert B. Sloan

REVELRY Noisy partying or merrymaking. English translations vary greatly in use of revel and its cognates (revelers, reveling, revelry). KJV used "revellings" but twice, as a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:21) and as behavior associated with Gentiles (1 Pet. 4:3). RSV used revelry once, as a characterization of the behavior of the rich of Samaria (Amos 6:7). NAS and NIV used cognates of revel more often (four and eleven times, respectively). In their use revel often means little more than rejoice or exult. Of special interest is the association of revelry and idolatry (Ex. 32:6; 1 Cor. 10:7).

REVENGE, REVENGER See Avenger.

REVERENCE Respect or honor paid to a worthy object. In Scripture, reverence is paid: to father and mother (Lev. 19:3; Heb. 12:9); to God (1 Kings 18:3,12; Heb. 12:28); to God's sanctuary (Lev. 19:30; 26:2); and to God's commandments (Ps. 119:48). The failure to revere God (Deut. 32:51) and the act of revering other gods (Judg. 6:10) have dire consequences. Reverence for Christ is expressed in mutual submission within the Christian community (Eph. 5:21). Christian persecution takes on new meaning as suffering becomes an opportunity for revering Christ (1 Pet. 3:14–15).

REWARD See Divine Retribution.

REZEPH (Rē′ zĕph) Place name meaning, "glowing coal." Town the Assyrians conquered, most likely under Shalmaneser III (about 838 B.C.), and which the Assyrians used as a warning to king Hezekiah of Judah in 701 B.C. against relying on God to deliver him from them (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). The site is possibly Rezzafeh about 100 miles southeast of Aleppo.

REZIA (Rē zī′ à) KJV form of Rizia.

REZIN (Rē′ zĭn) King of Syria about 735 B.C. during the reigns of Pekah in Israel and Ahaz in Judah. When Ahaz refused to join Rezin and Pekah in fighting against Assyria, Rezin pursuaded Pekah to ally with him against the Judean king (2 Kings 15:37; 16:5). Ahaz appealed for help to Tiglath-pileser of Assyria, who came against Rezin and Pekah and destroyed their kingdoms. Rezin died in 732 B.C. when Damascus fell to the Assyrians.

REZON (Rē′ zŏn) Personal name meaning, "prince." An Aramaean leader who led a successful revolt against Solomon and established an independent state with its capital at Damascus (1 Kings 11:23–25). See Damascus.

RHEGIUM (Rhē′ ĝĭ um) Place name either derived from the Greek rhēgnym (rent, torn) or from the Latin regium (royal). Port located at the southwestern tip of the Italian boot about seven miles across the strait of Messina from Sicily. Paul stopped there en route to Rome (Acts 28:13). Rhegium was settled by Greek colonists and retained Greek language and institutions into the first century.

RHESA (Rhē′ sà) Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:27).

RHETORIC The use of language for effective communication, especially the biblical literary techniques used to communicate God's Word. The Bible was written to convince people to respond positively to God's offer of life abundant and eternal. Studying the Bible from a rhetorical perspective helps us better to understand what the Bible actually says and to become better equipped to convince others of its validity through our own rhetoric.

Rhetorical study includes the examination of tropes (literary devices to make langauge more colorful) and consideration of schemes (structural devices which aid memory and persuasion). Tropes include: metaphor, simile, personification, irony, hyperbole, assonance, and paronomasia. Schemes include: acrostic, antithesis, parallelism, rhetorical question, and syllogism.

Metaphor is a word picture which forces a comparison. Jesus' statement that He is the Good Shepherd (John 10:11) is a metaphor because believers are not really sheep. Simile is a word picture using like or as to explain something difficult to understand ("The kingdom of heaven is like a mustard seed" Matt. 13:31). Personification allows inanimate objects to take on human qualities (Judg. 9:7–15). Irony is overturning expectations to underscore a tension which needs to be resolved in action or belief. See Irony. Hyperbole exaggerates in order to make a point. God said He would not accept Israel's offerings or hear their worship. In other words God will not acknowledge worship He is certainly aware of (Amos 5:22–23). Metonymy is when one word substitutes for another which it represents. When Zion is used in Psalms to represent the Temple, God's throne, Jerusalem and/or all of Israel, that is a metonymy.

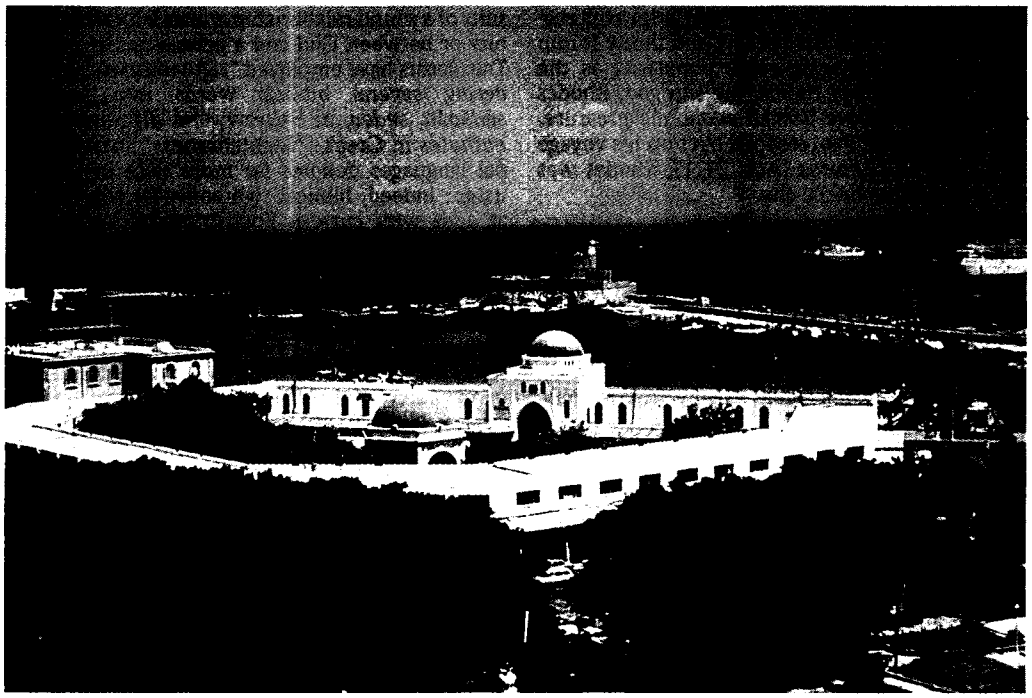
Assonance is the use of sounds to underscore the meaning of a phrase or verse (alliteration is assonance where the initial sounds of words make the emphasis). Such artistry with sound is difficult or impossible to reproduce in translation. REB catches part of the word play in Isaiah 7:9: "Have firm faith or you will fail to stand firm." Repetition of sound catches the reader's attention and underlines the focus on faith. Paronomasia is a more exact assonance, a meaningful pun. In Isaiah 5:7, God looks for righteousness (mishpat) but finds riots (mishpach) instead and for legality (tsedhaqa) but here is lamentation (tse'aqa). These techniques create interest and enhance meaning.

Other techniques involve the way sentences, phrases, and/or verses are structured. Acrostics begin each line of a chapter or poem with a consecutive letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Pss. 111, 112, 119, and others) as both a mnemonic (memory aid) and full expression of one's feeling. Antithesis is the presentation of opposites to express a truth (see Prov. 14 for extensive use of antithesis).

Parallelism is the basic building block of Hebrew poetry. One phrase is balanced by another phrase which says the same thing in slightly different words. See Poetry.

The Bible is full of rhetorical questions, those which do not need to be answered because the hearer/reader already knows the answer. In the Bible, these answers are usually negative. "Who is like unto the Lord our God?" (Ps. 113:5). No one! "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" (Rom. 6:1). Not at all! "Hath God cast away his people?" (Rom. 11:1). Of course not!

Syllogism is the logical advance from one statement to another until a conclusion is derived from the premise. One of the brilliant syllogisms in the Bible is 1 Corinthians 15:12–28 in which Paul argued that the only logical conclusion to the fact of Christ's resurrection is the resurrection of all the dead.



Recognizing these techniques and studying Hebrew poetry will enhance one's ability to study the Bible. Johnny L. Wilson

RHODA (Rhō′ dà) Personal name meaning, "rose." Rhoda's relationship to the household of Mary, the mother of John Mark, is not clear. She was most likely a servant, though it is possible that she was a family member or a guest at the prayer service. In her great joy at finding Peter at the door, Rhoda failed to let him in. Her joy in rushing to tell the disciples and their response accusing her of madness recall details of Luke's resurrection narrative (Acts 12:13; compare Luke 24:9–11).

RHODES (Rhōdes) Island off the southwest coast of Asia Minor in the Mediterranean Sea associated with the Dodanim (Gen. 10:4; Ezek. 27:15). See Dodanim. Rhodes was founded as a Minoan trading colony about 1500 B.C. and came under the control of a single government around 407 B.C. A wealthy shipping center, Rhodes developed navies that controlled the eastern Mediterranean. Standing with one foot on either side of the harbor entrance was the 105-foot-tall brass Colossus, one of the Seven Wonders of the World. Set up in 288 B.C., it fell during an earthquake about 64 years later. Disloyalty to Roman rule met with stiff economic sanctions against the city and threw it into decline. While enjoying some popularity as the center of the cult of Helios, the sun god, Rhodes could not rise above Roman economic pressure. When the apostle Paul stopped over on his voyage from Troas to Caesarea (Acts 21:1), Rhodes was only a minor provincial city.

RIBAI (Rī' bā ī) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh contends." Father of Ittai, one of David's thirty elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 11:31).

RIBBAND KJV form of ribbon (Num. 15:38). Modern translations read "cord" (NAS, NIV, NRSV) or "thread" (REB).

RIBLAH (Rīb' lăh) 1. Syrian town located near Kadesh on the Orontes near the border with Babylonia. There Pharaoh Neco imprisoned King Jehoahaz of Judah after the young monarch had reigned only three months (2 Kings 23:31–33). Later, when Zedekiah rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, he was taken to Riblah as a prisoner and viewed the execution of his sons before having his eyes put out (25:4–7). See Diblah. 2. Otherwise unknown town on eastern border of Canaan (Num. 34:11). Earliest translations read Arbelah.

RICHES See Wealth and Materialism.

RIDDLE An enigmatic or puzzling statement, often based on the clever use of the ambiguities of language. The classic biblical example of a riddle is that posed by Samson to the Philistines. The riddle is in poetic form (Judg. 14:12–14), and the question, "What is it?," is implied. The Philistines reply is in the form of another riddle (v. 18*a*) whose original answer was probably "love." Samson's retort may reflect yet another commonly known, and rather risque, riddle (v. 18*b*).

The Hebrew word for riddle also appears elsewhere in the Old Testament. The Lord spoke with Moses directly, not in "riddles" (Num. 12:8 NIV, REB, NRSV) or "dark speech" (KJV, NAS). The Queen of Sheba tested Solomon with "hard questions" or riddles (1 Kings 10:1–13). Riddles were a form of poetic expression (Ps. 49:4); a mark of wisdom was the ability to solve them (Prov. 1:6). Daniel had such wisdom (Dan. 5:12).

RIGHT MIND Sound mind, mentally healthy (Mark 5:15; Luke 8:35). Elsewhere, the underlying Greek term is rendered "sober judgment" (Rom. 12:3 NRSV) or "self-controlled" (Titus 2:6 NRSV).

RIGHTEOUSNESS The actions and positive results of a sound relationship within a local community or between God and a person or His people. Translators have employed "righteousness" in rendering several biblical words into English: sĕdāqāh, sedeq, in Hebrew; and dikaiosunē and euthutēs in Greek. "Righteousness" in the original languages denotes far more than in English usage; indeed, biblical righteousness is generally at odds with current English usage. We understand righteousness to mean "uprightness" in the sense of "adherence or conformity to an established norm." In biblical usage righteousness is rooted in covenants and relationships. For biblical authors, righteousness is the fulfillment of the terms of a covenant between God and humanity or between humans in the full range of human relationships.

Old Testament The starting point is the Hebrew notion of God's "righteousness." The Hebrew mind did not understand righteousness to be an attribute of the divine, that is a characteristic of God's nature. Rather, God's righteousness is what God does in fulfillment of the terms of the covenant that God established with the chosen people, Israel (2 Chron. 12:6; Ps. 7:9; Jer. 9:24; Dan. 9:14). God's righteousness was not a metaphysical property but that dimension of the divine experienced by those within the covenantal community.

Most especially, God's righteousness was understood in relation to the image of God as the Judge of created order (Ps. 96:13). God's judgments are consistently redemptive in nature, God's judgments protected, delivered, and restored Israel (Isa. 11:4–5). At times God's righteousness was experienced in God's delivering Israel from enemies and oppressors (Ps. 71); at other times, in God's delivering Israel from the nation's own sinfulness (Ps. 51:19). Such deliverance involved God's righteousness of wrath against the persecutor and the wicked (Ps. 106). Salvation and condemnation exist together as the two sides of God's righteousness; the leading side is always deliverance: God condemns only because He also saves (Ps. 97).

Righteousness is a religious concept applied to humans because Israel had entered into a covenantal relationship to God. Because God had chosen Israel, the nation had the covenantal responsibility of fulfilling the terms of the covenant. Precisely here, serious misunderstanding frequently flaws thought about Israel's desire for righteousness. The Old Testament did not call on the people of Israel to attempt to earn God's favor or to strive to merit God's graces (Ps. 18). Indeed, the Old Testament teaches that God's gracious favor had been poured out on the nation in God's choosing of Abraham and his descendants. God acted to establish the covenant and in so doing bestowed salvation on Israel (Ex. 19). The law was given as an act of divine mercy to provide Israel with guidelines for keeping the nation's own portion of the covenant (Lev. 16; Ps. 40). Rather than being a ladder that Israel climbed to get to God, the law was understood to be a divine program for the maintenance of a healthy relationship between Israel and God (Lev. 16). God expected Israel to keep the law not to earn merit but to maintain the status God had already given the nation. As Israel kept the covenant law, the nation was righteous. Thus human righteousness in relation to God was understood as faithful adherence to the law (Lev. 19). Even so, God did not leave humans with the hopelessly impossible task of performing the law perfectly: the law God gave contained provision for atonement through repentance and appropriate acts of contrition (Lev. 19).

The concept of righteousness as faithful fulfillment of the provisions of a covenant was also meaningful in strictly human terms. The person who met the demands of a variety of social relations was thought to be righteous, to have done righteousness, though the requirements of righteousness varied with the covenantal/relational context. Some of the prominent areas were those of family (Gen. 38), friendship (1 Sam. 24), nation (Prov. 14:34), and even in relation to servants and certain foreigners (Job 31).

New Testament Greek philosophy understood righteousness to be one of the cardinal virtues, but New Testament authors show that they understood the word in terms of Old Testament thinking about covenantal relations. Human righteousness in the New Testament is absolute faith in and commitment to God (Matt. 3:15; Rom. 4:5; 1 Pet. 2:24). The one who in faith gives oneself to the doing of God's will is righteous, doing righteousness, and reckoned righteous by God (Jas. 2:23). The focus of faith in God is the saving activity of God in Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:21–26). The human-to-human dimension of righteousness observed in the Old Testament is present in New Testament thought (Phil. 1:3–11), but it seems less prominent, perhaps because of the importance of the New Testament concept of love.

At the heart of New Testament thinking about righteousness is the notion of God's righteousness (Matt. 6:33; Acts 17:31; Rom. 1:17; Eph. 4:24; Jas. 1:20). Interpreters debate whether the phrase "righteousness of God" is a subjective genitive, meaning "God is righteous," or an objective genitive, meaning "God gives righteousness."

This grammatical distinction is more than a point about subtle linguistic nuance. In the New Testament, especially in Paul's letters, "the righteousness of God" is the key to understanding the salvation of humanity.

Interpreters who take "the righteousness of God" to mean "God gives righteousness" see salvation as a God-created human possibility. Righteousness is that which God requires of humanity and which God gives as a gift to the person of faith. In this line of thought, faith is the condition for the reception of the gift of righteousness from God. God acts in Christ, and, in turn, humans react by having faith. Then God gives them righteousness or reckons them, on the basis of their faith, as if they were righteous.

On the other hand, interpreters who understand "the righteousness of God" to mean "God is righteous" contend that salvation is purely the work of God, God's saving activity in keeping the divine side of the covenant of creation. God acts in Christ, and part of that action is the creation of faith on the part of human beings who otherwise have no faith. Thus "the righteousness of God" is the power of God at work saving humanity (and the whole of creation), through the creation of faith in sinful persons.

The line between the camps of scholars holding these different interpretations of "the righteousness of God" is sharply drawn, and the debate over the validity of these interpretive options continues with intensity. See Ethics; Grace; Law; Mercy; Salvation. Marion Soards

RIMMON (Rĭm′ mŏn) Place and divine name meaning, "pomegranate." 1. Chief god of Syria, also called Hadad. Naaman worshiped Rimmon in Damascus (2 Kings 5:18). 2. Town allotted to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:32) but then given to Simeon (19:7; compare 1 Chron. 4:32). Early translations and many modern interpreters read En-rimmon in all occurrences. It is modern Khirbet er-Ramamin two miles south of Lahav. Zechariah 14:10 described it as the southern boundary of God's new exalted kingdom. See En-rimmon. 3. A Levitical city in Zebulun (Josh. 19:13; 1 Chron. 6:77), probably the original reading for present Dimnah (Josh. 21:35). See Dimnah. It is present Rummaneh, six miles northeast of Nazareth. 4. A rock near Gibeah to where the people of Benjamin fled from vengeful Israelites (Judg. 20:45–47), modern Rammun four miles east of Bethel. 5. Father of Rechab and Baanah, who killed Saul's son Ish-Bosheth (2 Sam. 4:2,9).

RIMMON-PAREZ (Rĭm mon-Pā′ rēz) KJV form of Rimmon-Perez.

RIMMON-PEREZ (Rĭm mon-Pē′ rĕz) Place name meaning, "pomegranate of the pass." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33: 19–20).

RIMMONO (Rĭm′ mŏn ō) Place name meaning, "his Rimmon." NIV, NAS, NRSV reading of Rimmon in 1 Chronicles 6:77. Compare Joshua 19:13; 21:25.

RING See Jewelry, Jewels, and Precious Stones; Nose Ring.

RINNAH (Rĭn′ nah) Personal name meaning,

"ringing cry." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

RIPHATH (Rī phăth) Personal name of foreign origin. Son of Gomer, likely the ancestor of an Anatolian tribe (Gen. 10:3). The name is likely a scribal corruption of Diphath (1 Chron. 1:6).

RISHATHAIM See Chushan-Rishathaim. Chushan may relate to Guzana or tell Halaf.

RISSAH (Rĭs' sah) Place name possibly meaning, "dewdrop," "rain," or "ruins." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:21–22), modern Sharma, east of Gulf of Aqaba.

RITHMAH (Rĭth' mah) Place name meaning, "broom plant." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:18–19), possibly valley called er-Retame east of Gulf of Aqaba.

RIVERS AND WATERWAYS IN THE BIBLE From the earliest efforts at permanent settlement in the Ancient Near East, people were attracted to the rivers and streams that ultimately would dictate population distribution between the mountains, deserts, and the seas. The flood plains of many of these rivers originally were inhospitable with thick, tangled jungles, wild beasts, and unpredictable flooding and disease. However, within the areas of plain and lowland that provided a more constant food supply and ease of movement, the need for a permanent water source attracted settlers to the river banks. Thus the early river civilizations of the Nile, the Tigris, and Euphrates starting about 3000 B.C., and the Indus civilization slightly later, resulted in response to the challenges and benefits these important waterways presented. Flood control, social and economic organization, and invention of writing as a means of communication developed. Trade was facilitated by means of navigable waterways. Since roads followed the lines of least resistance, the pattern of early trade routes conformed closely, especially in more rugged terrain, to channels and courses of the rivers and streams, and along the shoreline where the earliest fishing villages developed.

Rivers and Streams Each of the biblical rivers was developed to meet distinct human needs. A study of rivers helps understand the culture near the river. 1. Nile River The name Nile is not explicitly mentioned in KJV, but modern translations most often translated the Hebrew yeor as the Nile. The Nile plays a prominent role in the early events in the life of Moses in Exodus (Moses, Ex. 2:3; the ten plagues, Ex. 7:15,20). The Nile is alluded to in many other passages as "the river" (Gen. 41:1), the "river of Egypt" (Gen. 15:18), the "flood of Egypt" (Amos 8:8), Shihor (Josh. 13:3), river of Cush among other names. The "brook of Egypt" mostly is a reference to Wadi el-Arish, the drainage system of the central Sinai. The prophets Amos (8:8; 9:5) and Jeremiah (46:8) used the Nile as the symbol of Egypt, a concept that is readily understood in terms of the river's historical importance to the survival and well-being of the country.

For the Egyptians the predictable annual flooding of the Nile with the depositing of the fertile black alluvial soil meant the enrichment of the flood plain and the difference between food and famine. From the central highlands of East Africa, the Nile with a watershed of over one million square miles is formed by the union of the White and Blue Niles and flows a distance of nearly 3,500 miles. From its low ebb at the end of May, the flow of the river gradually rises to its maximum flood stage at the beginning of September. Historically, approximately 95 percent of Egypt's population depended upon the productivity of the 5 percent of the country's land area within the flood plain of the Nile. In the Delta at least three major branches facilitated irrigation in the extensive fan north of Memphis, the ancient capital of lower Egypt. See Egypt; Nile.

2. Euphrates First mentioned in Genesis 2:14 as one of the four branches of the river that watered the Garden of Eden, the Euphrates flows 1,700 miles to become the longest river in Western Asia. From the mountainous region of northeastern Turkey (Armenia), it flows southward into northern Syria and turns southeasterly to join the Tigris and flows into the Persian Gulf. On the Middle Euphrates, Carchemish, originally the center of a small city-state, became the important provincial capital of the Mitanni kingdom, later of the Hittite and Assyrian Empires. At Carchemish in 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar II defeated Pharaoh Necho as he began his successful drive to claim the former Assyrian Empire for Babylon (2 Kings 24:7; Jer. 46). Two important tributaries, the Belikh and Khabur, flow into the Euphrates from the north before it continues on to the ancient trade center at Mari. The Lower Euphrates generally formed the western limits of the city-states that made up the early Sumerian civilization. From the river plain to the delta, both the Tigris and Euphrates rivers regularly have formed new branches and changed their courses. About 90 percent of their flow mysteriously is lost to irrigation, evaporation, pools and lakes, and the swamps and never reaches the Persian Gulf. Lost as well in this region are the vast amounts of sediment that the Tigris and Euphrates bring from the mountainous regions. Sediment deposits along the lower courses of these rivers average 16 to 23 feet with 36-foot deposits in some regions. It has been calculated that the Tigris alone removes as much as 3 million tons of eroded highland materials in a single day. In the extreme south the two rivers join in a combined stream that today is known as the Shatt el-Arab.

The flooding of the Mesopotamian rivers in March and April differs from the Nile schedule which during that season is at its low ebb. The melting snows and rains at their sources create sudden, disastrous torrents that, along the Tigris especially, must be controlled by dams during such periods before they can supply a beneficial irrigation system. See Euphrates and Tigris Rivers.

The course of the Upper Euphrates was described as the northern border of the Promised Land (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4). David, in fact, extended his military influence to its banks during the height of his power (2 Sam. 8:3; 10:16–18; 1 Kings 4:24). The terms "the river," "the flood," "the great river," and "beyond the river" (Josh. 24:2–3; Ezra 4:10–13; Neh. 2:7–9) refer to the Euphrates, historically a significant political and geographical boundary.

3. Tigris From its source in a small lake (Hazar Golu), about 100 miles west of Lake Van, in Armenia, the Tigris flows in a southeasterly direction for about 1,150 miles before joining the Euphrates and emptying into the Persian Gulf. It achieves flood stage during March and April from the melting mountain snows and subsides after mid-May. While its upper flow is swift within narrow gorges, from Mosul and Nineveh southward its course was navigable and was extensively used in antiquity for transport. A series of tributaries from the slopes of the Zagros emptied into the Tigris from the east, including the Greater and Lesser Zab and the Diyala. The Diyala flows into the Tigris near Bahgdad. In antiquity its banks were inhabited by a dense population maintained and made prosperous by an excellent irrigation system. The Euphrates, flowing at a level nine meters higher than the Tigris, permitted the construction of a sequence of irrigation canals between the two rivers that resulted in unusual productivity. South of Baghdad where their courses again separated, a more complicated system of canals and diversions were necessary.

The banks of the Tigris were dotted by some of the most important cities of antiquity: Nineveh, the capital of Assyria during the Assyrian Empire; Asshur, the original capital of Assyria; Opis (in the vicinity of Baghdad), the important commercial center of Neo-Babylonian and later times; Ctesiphon, the capital of the Parthians and Sassanians; and Seleucia, capital of the Seleucid rulers of Mesopotamia.

Rivers of Anatolia Several rivers water this part of modern Turkey. See Asia Minor.

1. Halys River From its sources in the Armenian mountains, the Halys begins its 714-mile flow to the southwest only to be diverted by a secondary ridge into a broad loop until its direction is completely reversed into a northeasterly direction through the mountainous regions bordering the southern shore of the Black Sea. As the longest river in Anatolia, the Halys, like the other principal rivers in Turkey, is the result of heavy rainfall in the Pontic zone. Because of their winding courses within the coastal mountain chains, none of these rivers is navigable. Within this loop of the Halys in the northern Anatolian plateau the Hittites established their capital Boghazkoy. The course of the Halys generally formed the borders of the district of Pontus.

2. Rivers of the Aegean Coast The broken Aegean coastline boasted a series of sheltered havens and inlets that prompted Greek colonization and the establishment the great harbor cities of the later Greek and Roman periods. The mouths of the Aegean rivers deemed ideal for maritime centers during colonization ultimately proved disastrous. The lower courses of these rivers, relatively short and following a meandering course over their respective plains, are very shallow and sluggish during the summer months. Their upper courses however, of recent formation, carry enormous quantities of alluvium from the highlands that tended to fill the estuaries and gulfs. Constant dredging was required to maintain the harbor's access to the sea and to avoid the formation of malaria-infested swamps. Thus the Hermus (155 miles) was diverted to prevent the destruction of the harbor of Smyrna (Izmir). To the south at Ephesus, the original town site on the disease-ridden marshlands was abandoned about A.D. 400 for the construction of a new harbor on the Cayster River. During the days of Ephesus' prosperity, the constant dredging was adequately maintained. However, with the decline of the Roman Empire after A.D. 200, the silting of the harbor brought the rapid decline of the city. Miletus, on the alluvial plain of the Maeander River (236 miles), was originally established on a deep gulf well sheltered from the prevailing winds. The great Ionian city had possessed four harbors, but the silting of the harbors by the alluvial deposits of the Maeander ultimately brought about the decline and abandonment of the city. Though these Aegean rivers were not navigable, the alluvial plains that bordered them provided convenient and vital access and communications to the interior.

Rivers of Syro-Palestine In Syria and Palestine rivers often separated peoples rather than providing economic power.

1. Orontes and Litani High within the Beqa valley that forms the rift between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon mountain ranges, a watershed (about 3,770 feet above sea level) forms the headwaters of the Orontes and Litani Rivers. The rains and snow on the mountain summits at heights of over 11,000 feet course down into the 6—10 mile-wide Beqa which is a part of the great Rift ("Valley of Lebanon," Josh. 11:17). From the watershed, the Orontes flows northward and bends westward to empty into the Mediterranean near Antioch. The Litani flows southward and ultimately escapes to the sea north of Tyre. Unfortunately, its lower course has formed such a deep, narrow gorge that it is useless for communication. See Palestine.

2. Jordan River A series of springs and tributaries, resulting from the rains and snows on the heights of Mount Hermon (up to 9,100 feet above sea level) at the southern end of the Anti-Lebanon mountains east of the Rift Valley, converge in Lake Huleh to form the headwaters of the Jordan River. Along the eastern edge of the Huleh Valley, it flows southward into Lake Kinnereth (the Sea of Galilee). Only about eight miles wide and fourteen miles long, the fresh waters of the Galilee and its fishing industry sustained a dense population during most historical periods. At the Galilee's southern end, the Jordan exits and flows 65 miles on to the Dead Sea (about 1,300 feet below sea level). The Jordan flows 127 miles with a drainage area of about 6,380 square miles. The Yarmuk River joins the Jordan five miles south of the Sea of Galilee. The Jabbok River reaches the Jordan from the east twenty-five miles north of the Dead Sea.

At the Jordan's end, the Dead Sea extends another 45 miles between high, rugged cliffs of Nubian sandstone and limestone between the arid wilderness bordering the Judean watershed on the west and the Transjordanian plateau on the east. The sea and the inhospitable terrain along its shoreline discouraged regular travel and transport within the area.

The Jordan appears never to have served as a waterway for travel or transport, but rather as a natural barrier and a political boundary, that because of its steep banks and the densely wooded fringe that lined its devious route ("thickets of the Jordan," Jer. 49:19, NIV; compare 2 Kings 6:4) could be crossed without difficulty only at its fords (Josh. 3). Control of the fords during military confrontations in biblical times constituted a critical advantage (Judg. 3:28; 12:5–6). The Jordan's role as a political boundary appears to have been established already shortly after 2000 B.C. when the eastern frontier of the Egyptian province of Canaan followed the Jordan. Even though Israelite tribes were given special permission to settle in the Transjordan, it was always clear that, beyond the Jordan, they actually were residing outside the Promised Land (Josh. 22). Even in postbiblical times, the eastern boundary of the Persian and Hellenistic province of Judea followed the Jordan. Apart from the fertile oases that dotted the Jordan Valley, agricultural prosperity was assured during the Hellenistic and Roman times when irrigation was developed along the gradual slopes on either side of the Jordan within the Rift Valley. See Jordan.

3. Kishon River The Kishon River forms the drainage system of the Jezreel Plain and the southern portion of the Accho Plain. While a number of its small tributaries have their sources in springs at the base of Mount Tabor, in the southern Galilee, and in the extension of the Carmel in the vicinity of Taanach and Megiddo, the Kishon is rarely more than a brook within relatively shallow and narrow banks except during the heavy rains of the winter months. During those times its course becomes a marshy bog and impassable. From the Jezreel, it passes along the base of Mount Carmel through the narrow pass formed by a spur of the Galilean hills and into the Accho Plain, where some additional tributaries join before it empties into the Mediterranean. Its total length from the springs to the sea is only twenty-three miles. In biblical history it is best known for its role in the Barak-Deborah victory over the Canaanite forces of Sisera (Judg. 4—5) and Elijah's contest with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:40).

4. Yarkon River The Yarkon is formed by the seasonal runoff from the western slopes of the Samaritan and Judean hills that flows into the Brook Kanah, its major tributary, and the rich springs at the base of Aphek about eight miles inland from the Mediterranean shoreline. Though anchorages and small harbors, such as tel Qasile, a Philistine town, were established along its course and the cedar timbers from Lebanon were floated inland to Aphek for transport to Jerusalem for the construction of Solomon's palace and Temple, the Yarkon historically formed a major barrier to north-south traffic because of the extensive swamps that formed along its course. The profuse vegetation that bordered its banks probably suggested its name that was derived from the Hebrew yarok, meaning "green." The Yarkon, in biblical times, formed the border between the tribes of Dan and Ephraim to the north. Farther inland, the Brook Kanah formed the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9).

Major Bodies of Water Two major seas heavily influenced Israel's political, economic, and cultural history.

1. Mediterranean Sea The Mediterranean Sea had a width of 100—600 miles and stretched over 2,000 miles from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Palestinian coast.

Formed by the movement of the European and North African continental plates, the greater Mediterranean consists of a series of basins and extended shoreline that historically contributed to the vitality of maritime commerce and trade. The unusually straight coast along the south portion of its eastern shoreline and the lack of natural coves and harbor facilities limited Israelite opportunities for direct involvement in Mediterranean maritime commerce. While limited port facilities existed at coastal towns such as Joppa, Dor, and Accho, they were hardly adequate to facilitate more than a local fishing fleet and an occasional refuge during a storm for the larger merchant ships that frequented the great harbors established farther to the north along the Phoenician coast. As a result, the treaties established between the Israelite kings and the Phoenicians provided for an exchange of agricultural and horticultural produce in exchange for lumber and imports (2 Chron. 2:16), and a mutually beneficial cooperation in maintaining a monopoly on both land and sea routes of commerce and trade (1 Kings 9:26,27). The Mediterranean became the "Roman" sea when the peaceful conditions of Roman control of land masses along most of the Mediterranean shoreline fostered a dramatic movement of products, merchandise and people to satisfy the diverse needs of the provinces and Roman policy in them. See Mediterranean.

2. Red Sea The Red Sea (Heb. yam suf, lit. "Sea of Reeds") is a long narrow body of water separating the Arabian Peninsula from the northeastern coast of Africa (Egypt, Sudan, and Ethiopia). At its southern end its narrow straits (twenty-one miles wide) open to the Indian Ocean. With a length of about 1,240 miles and a width that varies from 124 to 223 miles, the total surface area is just over 176,000 square miles. While its average depth is about 1,640 feet, as a part of the great rift or fault that runs northward from Lake Victoria to the base of the Caucasus Mountains in southern Russia, the Red Sea plunges to 7,741 feet near Port Sudan. It is the warmest and most saline of all the open seas. Though the shores of the Red Sea historically have been sparsely settled and its ports have been few, its waterway provided access to the distant ports of the Indian Ocean and the eastern shoreline of Africa where the Phoenician merchant fleets under lease to Solomon bartered for the luxury goods that graced the royal courts of the Levant (1 Kings 9:26).

In the north the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Elath (Aqaba) form the western and eastern arms making up the shorelines of the Sinai Peninsula. The Egyptian pharaohs used the Gulf of Suez as the shortest route to the Mediterranean. It was linked with the Bitter Lakes and the Nile by a canal that existed before 600 B.C. and was maintained by the Persians, the Ptolemies, and the Romans.

With the expansion of David's empire, the Gulf of Elath (Aqaba) provided the vital maritime trade outlet that the kings of Israel and Judah and the Phoenician allies exploited to fill the coffers of Jerusalem. After the demise of the Judean kingdom, the Nabataeans established a similar monopoly over the same marine commerce and the overland caravan routes through Petra to Damascus and Gaza for transshipment on the Mediterranean. Again in Hellenistic times, the Indian trade routes were reestablished and maintained throughout Roman times. See Red Sea.

Apart from the significant roles played by the Nile in Egypt and the Tigris and Euphrates in Mesopotamia, the rivers of the biblical world were small and mostly unnavigable. As a result, apart from the alluvial plains that bordered their banks, these rivers played a more meaningful role as barriers and boundaries than as waterways for travel and transport. In terms of early biblical history, the Mediterranean and the Red Seas played the more dominant roles in intercultural and commercial exchange. As the Greek and Roman Empires developed, the western seas—the Aegean, Ionian, Adriatic, and Tyrrhenian—grew in importance. In the north and east, the Black Sea, the Caspian Sea, and the Persian Gulf with the mountain ranges that linked them basically formed the limits of the biblical world.

ROBBERY Taking another person's property without the person's consent. The basic biblical law concerning robbery is the prohibition of the Ten Commandments, "Thou shall not steal" (Ex. 20:15; Deut. 5:19). Such an absolute statement makes it irrelevant whether the robber acquires property by force, duplicity or oppression (see Gen. 31:31; Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14–15; Mal. 3:5; John 10:1). Remarkably little concerning robbery is written in the law of Moses. Unlike Assyrian and Babylonian law, no specific penalty is prescribed. Instead, the emphasis is upon restoration of the stolen property to its lawful owner (Ex. 22:1,4,7,9; Lev. 6:1–7; Num. 5:5–8). If a thief could not return or replace it, the thief could be sold into slavery until restitution was made (Ex. 22:3).

During the New Testament period, robbery was the jurisdiction of Roman law. Captured robbers, on occasion, were crucified (Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). Robbery could be political. Palestine contained various groups called Zealots, famous for zeal in Judaism and opposition to Rome. The more militant groups, such as the Sicarii, resorted to murder and robbery.

First-century robbers frequently operated together in bands, attacking travelers (Luke 10:30). The surprise of such an attack is analogous to the suddeness of Christ's return (Rev. 3:3). Robbery threatens material possessions; therefore, Jesus commanded faith in spiritual things (Matt. 6:19–20). LeBron Matthews

ROBOAM (Rō bō' am) KJV alternate form of Rehoboam (Matt. 1:7).

ROCK The use of rocky sites as places of refuge (Num. 24:21; Judg. 15:8; 20:47) led to the frequent image of God as a rock, that is, a source of protection. Titles of God include: the "Stone of Israel" (Gen. 49:24 NAS); the Rock (Deut. 32:4); the Rock of salvation (32:15); the Rock which begat Israel (32:18); "the rock that is higher than I" (Ps. 61:2). Isaiah 8:13–14 pictures the Lord of hosts as a "stone of stumbling" to the unholy people of Israel and Judah. Paul identified Christ as the spiritual Rock which nourished Israel in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:4). Other texts apply to Christ the Isaiah image of a rock which causes persons to fall (Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:8). Jesus' teaching is the rock-solid foundation for life (Matt. 7:24–25). The identity of the rock upon which Christ promised to build the church (Matt. 16:18) is disputed. Possible identifications include: Peter, whose name means "rock", the larger group of disciples, Christ Himself, and Peter's confession of faith. The different Greek terms employed (Petros and petra) argue against a quick identification of Peter as the foundation. Both Christ (1 Cor. 3:11) and the larger circle of apostles (Eph. 2:20; Rev. 21:14) are pictured as the foundation of the church elsewhere. It seems unlikely that Matthew presents Christ as both Builder and foundation of the church. Application of the foundation image to evangelistic work (Rom. 15:20; 1 Cor. 3:10) suggests that Peter's God-revealed confession of faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God (Matt. 16:16), is the foundation of the church which lays seige to the gates of Hades. ROD, STAFF Rod designates a straight, slender stick growing on (Jer. 1:11) or cut from (Gen. 30:37–41) a tree. Rod is sometimes used interchangeably with staff (Isa. 10:5; Rev. 11:1). Elsewhere, rod designates a shorter, clublike stick (Ps. 23:4). Rods and staffs were used as walking sticks (Gen. 32:10), for defense (Ps. 23:4), for punishment (Ex. 21:20; Num. 22:27; Prov. 13:24; 1 Cor. 4:21), and for measurement (Rev. 11:1). Rods and staffs were also used as symbols of prophetic (Ex. 4:2–4; 7:8–24; Judg. 6:21), priestly (Num. 17:1–10), and royal (Gen. 49:10 NRSV; Judg. 5:14 NRSV; Jer. 48:17; Rev. 2:27) office.

RODANIM (Rŏd ā nĭm) Inhabitants of Rhodes (1 Chron. 1:7 NRSV). The parallel in Genesis 10:4 (KJV) reads "Dodanim" which should be preferred as the more difficult reading. Rhodians, however, fits well in the general geographic context.

ROGELIM (Rō' gĕ lĭm) Place name meaning, "[place of] the fullers." City on the Jabbok River in Gilead (2 Sam. 17:27–29; 19:31). The site is perhaps Zaharet's Soq'ah. Tell Barsina lacks evidence of occupation in David's time.

ROHGAH (Rōh' gah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "cry out." Leader of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34).

ROLL See Scroll.

ROLLER KJV term for something wrapped around the arm (Ezek. 30:21) as a bandage (NAS, REB, NRSV) or splint (NIV).

ROMAMTI-EZER (Rō măm tī-ē' zĕr) Personal name meaning, "I have exalted help." Temple musician (1 Chron. 25:4,31). Some scholars recognize a prayer of praise behind the names of the Temple musicians Hananiah through Mahazioth (25:4).

ROMAN LAW The broad category of Roman law stands behind an adequate understanding of the New Testament and its world. The might of the Roman Empire dominated the Ancient Near East, including Palestine and the Mediterranean world in which Christianity was born. Roman law developed over a period of one thousand years, from the publication of the XII Tables in 451–50 B.C. to Emperor Justinian's codification in A.D. 529–34. The points of major relevance of Roman law for interpreting the New Testament cluster around several categories, particularly Roman citizenship, the influence of Roman law upon family life and roles, and Roman criminal jurisprudence.

Roman Citizenship The Book of Acts depicts Paul as a Roman citizen from birth (22:28) whose citizenship proved advantageous during his missionary travels. Roman citizenship could be obtained by one of several means, the most preferred of which was by inheriting it at birth from parents who were citizens. The New Testament is silent as to how Paul's family had acquired citizenship. The state could grant citizenship for one of several types of service to the empire, either civil or military, particularly the latter. Citizenship could be obtained by purchase (Acts 22:28).

The evidence is unclear as to how citizens were able to document their citizenship. Presumably they carried the ancient equivalent of the modern-day passport, a certificate made either of metal or wood. False claims to citizenship were punishable by death. In Acts 22:27, Paul's merely claiming citizenship seems to have sufficed without having to produce official papers.

Citizenship bestowed certain rights. These included the right to vote for magistrates, the right to be elected as a magistrate, the right to contract a legal marriage, the right to hold property in the Roman community, and the right to appeal to the people, and in later times to the emperor, against the sentences passed by magistrates or other officials of rank.

Paul's citizenship surfaced in several details of his missionary activity in Acts. Acts 16:39 records the consternation of either the lictors or magistrates in Philippi upon discovering that Paul was a Roman citizen. They realized that they had punished him without trial. By law, citizens could not be bound or scourged (compare Acts 22:24–29). Most important of all is the right of "appeal to Caesar" and trial at Rome (Acts 25:10–12).

Roman Law and Family Life The New Testament "House Codes" (Eph. 5:21—6:9; Col. 3:18—4:1; and 1 Pet. 2:18—3:7) should be interpreted against the background of the status of the family and the power of the head of the household in Roman society. If Greek society looked to belonging in one's city as the chief unit of society, Roman society, both legally and culturally, looked to the family as the primary unit of society. In early Roman law, and to a significant though diminishing extent throughout the Roman period, the paterfamilias (head of the household) was the only fully legal person in the family. The "family" included what today would be termed the "extended" family, crossing generational lines and including the wife, all unmarried sons and daughters, married sons and their families, those persons adopted into the family, and slaves. All of these persons lived under the patria potestas, or "absolute power," of the patriarchal head of the household. The patria potestas of the paterfamilias extended even to matters of life and death, limited only by the constraints of the habit of consulting a family council or by the restraints of certain laws. The father, for example, was the person who decided whether or not to allow a newborn infant to die. That such power flourished in the New Testament era is born out by the fact that one father had his son executed for his part in the Catiline Conspiracy of 62 B.C. In early Roman times fathers could sell their children just as they could any other property. This absolute power of the Roman father included not only the persons directly descended from him but also their personal property. Persons living under another's patria potestas in actuality owned nothing. Upon their marriage, daughters passed into the power of another family's patria potestas. Upon the death of the paterfamilias, as many new families were created as there had been sons living under his power (or grandsons, in the event their fathers had died).

Against such a background, Paul's command to be subject to one another (Eph. 5:21) was a revolutionary word spoken to a society in which all were subject to the paterfamilias.

Roman Jurisprudence While Roman civil law relates to the New Testament only in incidental ways, Roman criminal law casts much light upon the trial of Jesus. The representative and executor of Roman law in the Gospels is, of course, Pontius Pilate, who served as the Roman procurator, or governor, of Judea during the years A.D. 26–36. Procurators, while lacking the full status and prestige of a Roman proconsul or imperial legate, were Roman "knights" of nonsenatorial rank and were invested with the same powers of higher officials. In modern-day terminology, Pilate was a "military governor" overseeing a province known as a seedbed of rebellion.

As the chief Roman administrator in the province, Pilate held the imperium, the supreme, administrative life-or-death power over the subjects in a province. The imperium extended particularly over the peregrini, or non-Roman citizens such as Jesus living in an occupied state. While Roman citizens possessed the right of appeal to Caesar, provincial subjects had little to protect them against abuses of the life and death power wielded by proconsuls and lesser governors such as Pilate. Pilate would have held the total power of Roman administration, jurisdiction, defense, and maintenance of law and order in the province of Judea. In the eyes of his superiors, Pilate's first priority was public order, not the execution of justice. They would not have categorized his conduct of the trial of Jesus as irresponsible. If an innocent Galilean peasant was the focal point of a civil disturbance, the quelling of the disturbance, and not justice for the peregrinus involved, was the uppermost concern for Roman officials fearful of revolts in occupied provinces.

Roman governors normally looked to a number of detailed statutes to define major offenses or felonies against persons, society, and government. The entire system, known as the ordo iudiciorum publicoum, perhaps is best translated as "the list of national courts." This ordo contained a list of crimes and punishments with the maximum and minimum penalties that could be exacted against Roman citizens. A Roman citizen who felt that the ordo was misapplied could appeal to Caesar. Common offenses, and rare ones such as arson, were dealt with by magistrates extra ordinem ("outside the list"). In any case involving a peregrinus, a Roman governor such as Pilate would have been free to proceed based upon his imperium and his own good judgment. He functioned as prosecuting attorney, judge, and jury. He would have been free to adopt the rules and guidelines of the ordo if appropriate, but he would also have been free to be as harsh and arbitrary as he preferred. A good first century procurator would, however, have tended more and more to judge a peregrinus by the ordo.

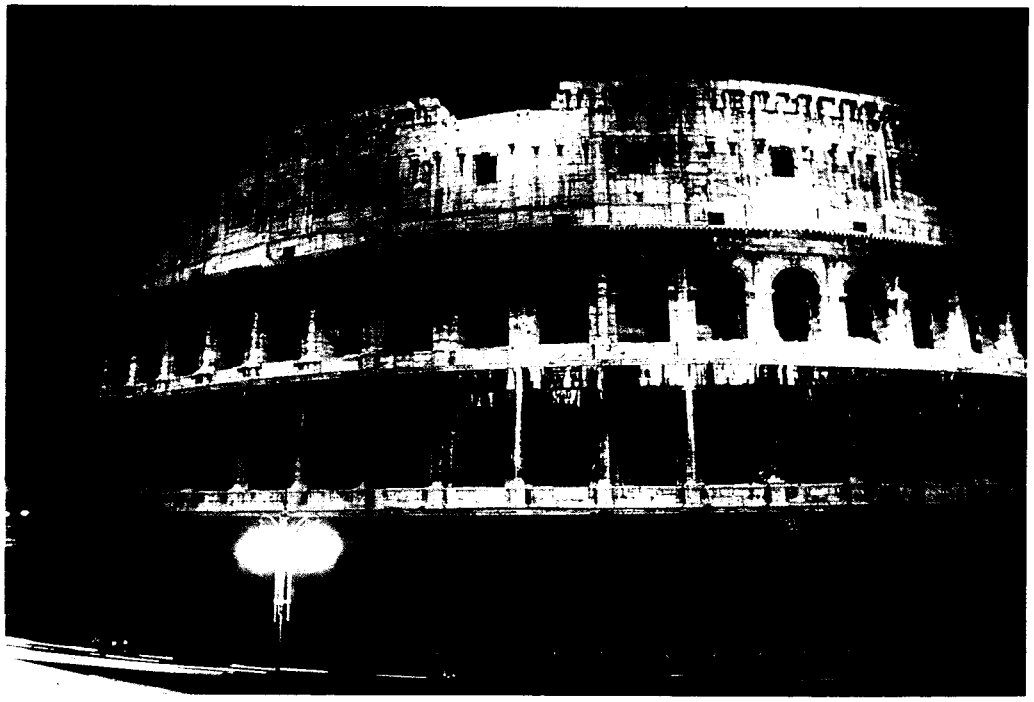
Roman trial proceedings were public, before the tribune (compare Matt. 27:19). Interested parties brought formal charges, which had to be specific (compare Matt. 27:12). In the Gospels, Jesus was charged before Pilate with a political crime. The Romans would never execute someone simply on religious grounds. Roman criminal trials included the cognitio, or the questioning of the accused. After A.D. 50 enlightened officials gave accused persons three opportunities to respond to charges made against them. Interestingly enough, Pilate does this very thing in the trial account as we find it in John (compare John 18:33,35,37), following the most enlightened possible juridical rules of the day. Failure to respond to the charges resulted in conviction by default. When Jesus remained silent and made no defense, under the Roman system, Pilate had no other option but to convict. Following the cognitio, the governor would then render his verdict in the form of a sentence to a particular punishment.

The trial of Jesus in the Gospels conforms in many of its particulars to the fine points of Roman criminal procedure. For example, it was not unknown to transfer jurisdiction to the accused's place of origin (compare Pilate's sending Jesus to Herod in Luke 23:6–7). Similarly, according to John 18:28, the trial of Jesus took place early in the day, an odd hour to modern minds, but precisely at the time when ancient Roman officials were the busiest, ordinarily arising early to work even before breakfast. To modern thought, it might also seem strange that Pilate consulted with his wife (Matt. 27:19) concerning Jesus. Far from some unseemly intrusion by her into official affairs of state, Roman women normally shared the responsibilities of husbands serving as career diplomats. They often were the husband's best advisor.

The Roman system of criminal justice distinguished between public and private penalties. The private penalty consisted of a sum of money paid to the person wronged as a substitute for private retaliation. Public penalties ranged from light beatings to the infliction of the death penalty, which could take various forms, with decapitation, gallows or crucifixion, burning, and drowning in a sack being the most common. Imprisonment as a penalty for a crime was unknown in Roman times. In the later empire, banishment to hard labor in mines or public works projects appeared as a penalty for wrongdoing.



The appearances of Paul before governmental officials and his trials in Acts also accord with what we know elsewhere of Roman trial procedure and custom. Perhaps most notable is the fact that in Acts 24:18–19 Jews make the original charges against Paul, but later disappear from the case. Before Felix (Acts 24:19), Paul objected that his accusers ought to be present. Roman law was strongly inclined against persons who made accusations and then abandoned them. Acts closes (28:30) by giving the tantalizing detail that Paul remained under "house arrest" in Rome for two years awaiting trial. This perplexing delay could be explained by a congested court list, the failure of his accusers to appear to lodge their charges, or the upheaval that characterized Nero's reign. Also noteworthy is the fact that Acts twice links Paul with Roman proconsuls (Sergius Paulus on Cyprus in 13:6–12 and Annius Gallio at Corinth in 18:12–17). ROMANS, BOOK OF The most significant theological letter ever written. Augustine of Hippo (354–430), the most influential of the church fathers, was converted upon reading Romans 13:13–14. Martin Luther, the father of the Protestant Reformation, was studying Romans when he concluded that faith alone justifies a person before God. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was converted on May 24, 1738, upon reading Luther's introduction to Romans.

Where was Paul when he wrote Romans? Paul discussed his situation at the time he wrote Romans in the book itself (15:25–29), indicating that he was about to leave for Jerusalem. He stated that his purpose was to deliver the monies given by the churches in Macedonia and Achaia (the name of the Roman province embracing most of Greece, south of Macedonia) for the "poor among the saints in Jerusalem" (15:26 NIV). This information from the Roman letter corresponds precisely with what Luke reported in the Acts of the Apostles about Paul's deciding to leave Ephesus, travel through Macedonia and Achaia, go to Jerusalem, and then visit Rome (Acts 19:21). Paul spent three months in Achaia (Acts 20:2–3). Scholars generally agree that Paul's close relationship with the Corinthian church would have resulted in his staying there, and this is confirmed by Paul's mentioning that he was staying with Gaius (Rom. 16:23) who was a convert in Corinth (see 1 Cor. 1:14).

That Paul wrote Romans while in Greece and before leaving for Jerusalem establishes the limits for the dating of the letter. The fixed point for dating Paul's stay in Corinth is his appearance (on an earlier visit to Corinth) before Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:12–17), who was in office between A.D. 50–54 and most likely in A.D. 51. Estimating the time from Paul's appearance before Gallio until his return to Corinth is difficult because of Luke's general statements of time—"Paul stayed many days longer" (Acts 18:18 RSV)—but most scholars would date Romans between A.D. 54 to 59, with a date of 55–56 being preferred.

Why did Paul write Romans? Paul mentioned his reasons for writing to the Roman church twice, once at the beginning and again near the end of the letter. He had for a long time had the desire to visit the Christians in Rome that "we may be mutually encouraged by each other's faith" and clearly implied that now at long last he was coming (Rom. 1:8–13). Paul thus wrote the Romans to announce his impending visit. His practice had been to preach in unevangelized areas (15:20), and he had run out of room in the eastern empire (15:23), having preached from Jerusalem to Illyricum (15:19), at the westernmost point of the eastern empire. Paul now planned to continue his ministry to the western limit of the empire and go to Spain (15:24). He shared his plans to stop and visit the Romans on his way and expressed the hope that they would provide support for his journey on to Spain (15:24). He probably looked for support in prayer, some financial assistance, and perhaps the designating of a Roman Christian who knew the western area to travel with Paul.

Finally, Paul urged the church to pray for him as he went to Jerusalem (15:30–31). Paul's concern was twofold. He was concerned about the Jerusalem Christians' reaction to an offering from Gentile churches and hoped that the offering would draw the Jewish and Gentile Christians together (see Gal. 2:11–21; Acts 15:1–35). Paul was also aware of the threat posed by the "unbelievers in Judea" (15:31) or the Jews, loyal to their ancient traditions, who were upset by Paul's proclamation of Jesus as Messiah.

Paul's description of his purpose led earlier students of the Bible to see Romans as an outline of Paul's theology, composed at greater leisure, to acquaint the Romans with his views so they would fully support him in his mission to Spain. Scholars soon realized, however, that this perception of Romans as a summary of Paul's theology was inadequate for three reasons. First, Romans does not contain any discussion or emphasis on some things Paul clearly believed strongly as we know from his other letters—such as the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–34) and the second coming of Christ (1 Thess. 4:13—5:11). Second, Paul stressed matters in Romans he does not give much attention to in his other letters, such as the wrath of God (Rom. 1:18–32) and the Jewish rejection of Jesus as Messiah (Rom. 9—11). Third, Romans includes materials that do not fit into the category of a summary of Paul's theology. The exhortations in 12:1—15:14 are clearly outside this category. Some of them, such as how they should relate to government (Rom. 13:1–7) or those "weak in faith" (Rom. 14:1—15:6) seem to reflect specific problems in the Roman Christian community. Taking these facts seriously, scholars now feel that Paul knew much more about the Roman Christians than earlier scholars realized and wrote to the church with several purposes in mind: (1) to request their prayers as he faced the threatening situation in Jerusalem, (2) to alert them to his intended visit, (3) to acquaint them with some of his understanding of what God had done in Christ, (4) to instruct them in areas where the church faced specific problems, and (5) to enlist their support in his planned missionary venture to Spain.

What is the key concept in Romans? The theme of Romans is generally agreed to be the "righteousness of God" (see 1:16–17), but the meaning of this phrase is disputed. Some interpret it to mean the righteousness which God bestows on persons on the basis of Christ's work, understanding "of God" to mean "from God." Other interpreters hold that "the righteousness of God" is the activity of God, understanding the term primarily from its use in the Greek translation of the Old Testament where it refers to God's acting in His saving power. This seems the better alternative—the righteousness of God is God in action, setting things right through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. See Righteousness.

The pivotal importance of understanding "the righteousness of God" as God in action in Christ will only clearly be seen when it is grasped that the same Greek word root occurs in the terms translated into English as righteousness, just, justification, and justify. Understanding what Paul meant by righteousness is therefore crucial for one's interpretation of Romans because it sets one's perception of justification as well.

Scholars have debated for centuries as to whether justification (God's action in making persons righteous) refers primarily to one's new status in Christ—justification would thus mean the bestowal of a righteous status before God—or to one's new moral character in Christ—justification would then mean God's action in one's life to enable a person to achieve high ethical standards. Protestant, and particularly Lutheran scholars, have argued that justification should be understood in the first sense and indicates God's acquitting or pronouncing the sinner righteous without any reference to moral change. Roman Catholic scholars have argued the opposite, holding that justification means God's making a person righteous or moral regeneration. In the heated debates over this issue, it has become clear that an undue stress on either alternative leads to a distorted view of Christianity. To stress justification as God's declaring the sinner righteous without regard to any subsequent change in the sinner's moral character is as wrong as to stress justification as moral achievement to the point that living by works overshadows living by faith. The best understanding of justification is one which includes both the new status of a person before God and the new life that this status demands. See Justification.

When the "righteousness of God" is understood as God's working in Christ to set things right, then it becomes clear that God declares the sinner righteous (acquits). Persons who experience this declaration at the same time repudiate sin as a way of life, enter into an intense struggle with sin, and look forward to Christ's complete victory over evil. Salvation is thus at one time, according to Paul, God's gift of a righteous status before Him in Christ (6:23) and God's demand to live the new life which Christ makes possible. Scholars refer to this reality as the indicative and imperative aspects in Paul's thought. Paul indicated what God has done in Christ (indicative) and then exhorted his readers to achieve it (imperative). Paul, for example affirmed the gift—"you have been freed from sin" (6:22 NRSV); but in the same context he exhorted his readers to live up to the demand—"Present your members as slaves to righteousness" (6:19 NRSV). Such frequent indicative and imperative statements at first glance seem contradictory. They, however, represent the way Paul understood Christianity—what God has done for us in Christ summons us to what we ought to do for God. See Ethics; Salvation.

The salvation that the power of God brings (1:16) is, therefore, not freedom from struggle. Paul understood the center of the Christian life to be intense struggle with the power of sin in one's life. The new status before God (justification) opens one's eyes to understand reality in a new way. The one who trusts Christ experiences a revelation in understanding. In the experience of faith it is "revealed" (1:17) that God came in Christ to set people free from the enslaving power of sin by enabling guilty sinners to be declared righteous and then to achieve it.

From Paul's perspective, the Christian understands the power of sin and God's action to triumph over it in a way the unbeliever does not. Paul described this new understanding and the arena of conflict it thrusts the Christian into in terms that relate to his Jewish heritage. Paul used the figures of Adam and Christ as representing the only two possibilities for human existence. Adam, the original transgressor (5:12), was the one through whom sin entered; but sin did not come alone—death is inseparably linked to sin in Paul's thought (5:12–14). These two realities—sin and death—have such great force that Paul said sin or death "reigned" (5:14,21). The third reality in his unholy trilogy of powers is the law which Paul felt is in itself holy (7:12). Sin's power demonstrated itself in using the law for its own purposes (7:8–11). This complex of powers, opposed to God and His purpose in creation, stands in unwavering hostility and opposition to another triad of powers (see 5:18–21) in the realm of Christ: righteousness (against sin), grace (against law), and life (against death). Paul's conception is that both of these power fields exist in our present world with unbelievers totally controlled by the evil forces and with believers constantly needing to struggle to free themselves from the hold sin has and tries to gain over them.

Paul also used other vehicles of expression to articulate his view of Christian life as focused in struggle with sin. Many persons in the first century world felt that an unalterable hostility existed between matter and spirit (thought or consciousness) with matter being the source of evil and spirit being the fountain of good. Paul made use of this kind of language but not with the dualism of Greek thought which opposed flesh (matter) to spirit. Flesh, as substance or material, is in itself neutral and has neither evil or good nature; but a person under sin's control is "in the flesh" (8:9), a contrast to to life "in the Spirit" (8:9–11). In this life (in the flesh) believers must rise to the demand of God's gift to us through Christ and walk "according to the Spirit" (8:4–8).

Paul alone in the New Testament explained the transition from the realm of Adam to the realm of Christ as a dying and rising with Christ (6:5–11).

This bas-relief of Rome's symbol of power, the Roman imperial eagle, was found at Jerusalem.

Our death with Christ causes us to be "united with him" (6:5) in death. This union with Christ reveals sin in all its ugliness. Believers follow God as Jesus did, repudiate sin's rule, and realize sin's end is death. Our resurrection with Christ is our rising from death with Him spiritually to live to God. This dying and rising with Christ sets us free from sin in the sense that sin's power is no longer enslaving. The Christian has the resources of God to fight sin victoriously; but intense struggle is necessary (6:11).

Dying and rising with Christ results in a person's being "in Christ." This phrase, used more than one hundred times in Paul's letters and infrequently outside Paul's writings, is Paul's favorite way of describing salvation. To be "in Christ" is to be in the power field of grace, life, and righteousness; it is to live in the strength of our having been raised with Christ; and it is a life of trust in God which struggles with the power of sin in one's life on the basis of God's powerful presence (Holy Spirit). Paul can thus speak of the power that enables Christians to overcome as "the Spirit," "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of Christ," "Christ . . . in you," and "in Christ" (8:1–11).

What is the structure of Romans? Paul's letter to the Romans moves with logical precision as the theme of "the righteousness of God" is developed in its relevance for the Christians in Rome. The expertise of the inspired writer emerges clearly as Paul, although dealing with the problems of a specific group of Christians in Rome, unwaveringly elevated the discussion to a level that also addresses the needs of Christians in all places and at all times.

Paul's introduction to the letter (1:1–15) sets out the apostolic calling which qualifies him (vv. 1–7) and explains his reason for writing the Romans (vv. 8–15). After the introduction, Paul crisply stated the theme of his letter—the righteousness of God, revealed in the gospel and bringing salvation (1:16–17). Paul then supported his theme in the first major section of the letter by demonstrating that all persons need salvation (1:18—3:20), showing first that the power of sin rules the Gentiles (1:18–32) and, second, that the power of sin rules the Jews as well (2:1—3:8). Paul concluded this section with a summary statement that all humanity stands under the power of sin (3:19–20).

The second major section deals with God's provision of righteousness through Jesus Christ on the basis of faith (3:21—4:25). Paul affirmed that God has manifested His righteousness apart from the law in the expiating blood of Jesus Christ and that God justified (declares righteous) persons on the basis of trust (3:21–26). Justification by faith excludes boasting or exulting in one's goodness achieved by works according to the law. The way God justified Abraham by faith demonstrates that trust as a way of relating to God preceded seeking to relate to Him by the works of the law, meeting the Jewish objection that God requires works for justification (3:27—4:25).

After establishing the reality of justification by faith, Paul discussed, in the third section of Romans, the impact and implication of what God does for us in Christ and focuses on how salvation results in a victorious new life (5:1—8:39). The immediate result of justification is a realization of peace with God based on the assurance coming from God's love for us and results in one's ability to rejoice in the face of difficulties because Christ has reversed the results of Adam's disobedience (5:1–21). The very heart of salvation is found in the Christian's continuing, but victorious, struggle with sin (6:1—7:25). This victorious struggle is possible because of the power of the risen Christ, experienced as Holy Spirit, who assists us to do what is right (8:1–39).

The salvation Christ brought raised profound questions among Jewish Christians about the destiny of the Jews who still felt themselves to be God's people even though they had rejected Christ. Paul dealt with this issue in the fourth section (chs. 9—11). He stressed that the righteousness of God is demonstrated in His faithfulness to all His promises—even those to Israel in the Old Testament. Paul confessed his personal grief over Israel's rejection of Christ (9:1–15) and affirmed that God has, as always, displayed His sovereignty in dealing with Israel (9:6–29). Israel's God-given freedom to choose explains the rejection of Jesus as the Christ (9:30—10:21). Paul reminded his readers that God's righteousness is displayed in His mercy on which all—both Jews and Gentiles—are dependent (11:1–36).

The final section is a summons to practical obedience to God (12:1—15:13). Christians should live transformed lives (12:1–2) and demonstrate this in a good stewardship of their spiritual gifts (12:3–21), in fulfilling their obligations to the state (13:1–7), in making love supreme (13:8–14), and in seeking to nurture others in the fellowship of the church, being particularly careful to bear with and edify the weak (14:1—15:13).

In the conclusion to the letter (15:14—16:27), Paul summarized his ministry and his plans for the future, requesting their prayers (15:14–33); then he commended Phoebe (16:1–2), sent greetings to individual Christians (16:3–24), and ended his letter with praise for God—"to the only wise God through Jesus Christ be glory for endless ages! Amen" (16:27 REB).

I. Introduction: Qualifications and Reason for Writing (1:1–15).
  A. Apostolic calling qualifies the author (1:1–7).
  B. Grateful, prayerful concern for the readers motivates the writing (1:8–15).
II. Theme: The Power for Salvation and the Righteousness of God Are Revealed (1:16–17).
III. All People Need Salvation from the Power of Sin (1:18—3:20).
  A. The power of sin rules among the Gentiles (1:18–32).
    1. The Gentiles reject the knowledge of God (1:18–23).
    2. The Gentiles experience the results of rebellion against God (1:24–32).
  B. The power of sin rules among the Jews (2:1—3:8).
    1. The Jews demonstrate their disobedience (2:1–16).
    2. The Jews confuse privilege and responsibility (2:17—3:8).
  C. All humanity—Jews and Gentiles—stand under the power of sin (3:9–20).
IV. God Provides Righteousness through Jesus Christ on the Basis of Faith (3:21—4:25).
  A. God manifests His righteousness (3:21–26).
    1. God's righteousness is through faith (3:21–23).
    2. God's righteousness is through the blood of Christ (3:24–25*a*).
    3. God's righteousness is shown in His passing over former sins (3:25*b*–26).
  B. Justification is by faith for all persons (3:27—4:25).

1. Justifying faith excludes all boasting (3:27–31).
2. The example of Abraham confirms justification by faith (4:1–25).

V. Salvation in Christ Results in Victorious New Life (5:1—8:39).
- A. Justification results in peace and righteousness (5:1–21).
  1. Peace with God results in rejoicing in all circumstances (5:1–11).
  2. Christ reverses the results of Adam's sin (5:12–21).
- B. Christian life is a victorious struggle with sin (6:1—7:25).
  1. Faith unites believers in dying and rising with Christ (6:1–11).
  2. Believers are not slaves of sin, but of righteousness (6:12–23).
  3. Dying with Christ sets us free from law (7:1–6).
  4. Struggle with sin is defeat without Christ (7:7–25).
- C. The Spirit of Christ is the power of the Christian's life (8:1–39).
  1. The Spirit is the power for freedom from sin (8:1–4).
  2. Life in the Spirit is the opposite of life in the flesh (8:5–11).
  3. The Spirit creates and witnesses to our status as God's children (8:12–17).
  4. The Spirit confers victorious life (8:18–39).

VI. God Is Faithful in All His Promises (9:1—11:36).
- A. Paul grieves over Israel's rejection of Christ (9:1–5).
- B. God's sovereignty is displayed in His dealings with Israel (9:6–29).
  1. God's sovereignty is illustrated in His elective choices (9:6–13).
  2. God's sovereignty is seen in His mercy (9:14–18).
  3. God has chosen both Jews and Gentiles (9:19–29).
- C. Israel's freedom to choose explains her rejection of Christ (9:30—10:21).
  1. Israel chose works rather than faith (9:30–33).
  2. Israel rejected righteousness based on faith (10:1–15).
  3. Israel refuses to hear and obey (10:16–21).
- D. God's righteousness is displayed in His mercy (11:1–36).
  1. The saved remnant of Jews shows God's mercy (11:1–6).
  2. The salvation extended to the Gentiles shows God's mercy (11:7–24).
  3. All persons—Jews and Gentiles—are dependent on God's mercy (11:25–32).
  4. God deserves praise for His judgments (11:33–36).

VII. The Saving Mercy of God in Christ Summons Christians to Obedience (12:1—15:13).
- A. Theme of the exhortations: Christians need to be transformed (12:1–2).
- B. Christians must be responsible members of the body of Christ (12:3–21).
  1. Christians need to view themselves and others appropriately (12:3–5).
  2. Christians must express their different gifts in faith (12:6–13).
  3. Christian life demands love in action (12:14–21).
- C. Christians must fulfill their appropriate obligations to the state (13:1–7).
- D. Christians must remember the supremacy of love and the urgency of the times (13:8–14).
  1. Love fulfills the law (13:8–10).
  2. The critical nature of the times calls for radical commitment to Christ (13:11–14).
- E. Christians must seek to edify one another in the fellowship of the church (14:1—15:13).
  1. The strong and the weak in the church must realize that Christ is the Lord of both groups (14:1–12).
  2. Christians should live by their own convictions, pursue harmony, and avoid making others stumble (14:13–23).
  3. Strong Christians are obligated to bear with and live in harmony with the weak (15:1–6).
  4. All Christians are to receive one another as Christ has received them (15:7–13).

VIII. Conclusion (15:14—16:27)

ROME AND THE ROMAN EMPIRE International rule the government in Rome, Italy, exercised after 27 B.C. when the Republic of Rome died and the Roman Empire was born. The reasons for the fall of the republic are not anymore clearly demonstrable than those surrounding the later fall of the empire. They were the product of a complicated interaction of numerous components that included: changes in the values, wealth, and education of the upper classes; innovations in finances, agriculture, and commerce; expansion of the senate; enormous increases in citizenship; unrest among the classes; problems in maintaining order in the districts in and around Rome, and difficulty in recruiting sufficient personnel for the army. The major factor in its demise seems to have been political. The senate lost political control of the state, and into that vacuum Julius

The Egnatian Way, shown here near Neapolis, was part of the extensive Roman road system.

Caesar stepped with ambitions of control that the senate found intolerable. His declaration of himself in early 44 B.C. as perpetual dictator provoked his assassination on the Ides of March by a group of senatorial assassins led by Brutus and Cassius. Caesar's generals, Antony and Lepidus along with Caesar's heir Octavian, formed a temporary ruling triumvirate. They defeated Caesar's assassins in the battle at Philippi in 42 B.C. This finally resulted in the exclusion of Lepidus and the division of the empire into the West, controlled by Octavian, and the East, controlled by Antony. Antony's military failure against the Parthians led to his excessive reliance on Egyptian resources and created a correspondingly inordinate influence of Egypt's Queen Cleopatra on the Roman ruler. Octavian was able to use Antony's reliance on Egypt against him, persuading the senate that Antony wanted to make Alexandria the capital of the empire. The two led their armies against each other in 31 B.C. at Actium in Greece, resulting in the defeat of Antony and the eventual suicide of both Antony and Cleopatra. Octavian became sole ruler and in 27 B.C. took the name: Augustus Caesar. The republic became the empire, and Octavian became what Julius had only dreamed of becoming—the first emperor of Rome.

Augustus was extremely efficient as an administrator and corrected many of the problems that plagued the old republic. He, unlike Julius, treated the senate with respect and gained theirs in return. He, as the adopted son of the previous ruler, inherited the affection of his army. The relationship proved so popular that, after Augustus, every emperor had to be either the real son or the adopted son of the previous emperor to command the allegiance of the army and of the people of the empire. Augustus reduced the senate gradually from 1,000 to 600 and made membership in it hereditary, although he reserved the privilege of nominating new senators.

A major achievement involved sharing power over the empire's provinces. Senatorial provinces were created, over which the senate had jurisdiction and to which they appointed governors or proconsuls. These were peaceful provinces requiring no unusual military presence. Gallio, the brother of Seneca, was made proconsul over the southern Grecian province of Achaia in A.D. 51 during the time Paul was in Corinth (Acts 18:12). Imperial provinces were controlled by the emperor. He appointed procurators over these potentially volatile areas, where the Roman legions or armies were stationed. Pontius Pilate was such a procurator or governor over Judea (Luke 3:1).

Augustus inaugurated an extensive program of social, religious, and moral reform. Special benefits were given to those couples who agreed to have children. Adultery, which previously was widely condoned, was made a public crime entailing severe penalties. Traditional religion was stressed, and 82 pagan temples were renovated. Many ancient cults were revived, further accentuating the time-honored view that the peace and prosperity of the republic was dependent upon the proper observance of religious duty. Augustus became pontifex maximus in 12 B.C., establishing him as both political and religious head of state.

An extensive building program was undertaken. Augustus added another forum to the already existing Roman Forum and Forum of (Julius) Caesar. The forum served as a judicial, religious, and commercial center for the city, containing basilicas, temples, and porticoes. Later, other fora were built by Vespasian, Nerva, and Trajan, all of them just north of the old Roman Forum. The great variety of other new structures included theaters, libraries, temples, baths, basilicas, arches, and warehouses. For entertainment purposes, the first permanent amphitheater in Rome's history was built. Extensive water systems were constructed that included artificial lakes, canals, aqueducts, and flood control. The sewage system was renovated. A police force of 3,000 men was created along with a fire-fighting force that numbered 7,000.

The first several emperors ruled at the time of the beginning of the Christian movement in the Roman Empire. Jesus was born during the reign of Augustus (27 B.C.–A.D. 14) and conducted His ministry during the reign of Augustus's successor, Tiberius (A.D. 14–37; compare Luke 3:1). The latter's image was stamped on a silver denarius that Jesus referred to in a discussion about taxation (Luke 20:20–26). In about A.D. 18, Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great, built his capital on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee and named it Tiberias after the emperor. Tiberius was an extremely able military commander and a good administrator, leaving a large surplus in the treasury when he died. He followed Augustus's example of not expanding the borders of the empire and thus avoiding war. The pax Romana (peace of Rome) which Augustus had inaugurated was preserved, providing easy, safe travel throughout the empire. Paul undoubtedly referred to this in Galatians 4:4 when he wrote: "In the fullness of time God sent forth his Son" (author's italics). Tiberius was never popular with the senate and chose to leave Rome at the first opportunity, choosing after A.D. 26, to rule the empire from his self-imposed seclusion on the Isle of Capri. In this year Pontius Pilate was appointed governor of Judea, a post he held until A.D. 36, just prior to the death of Tiberius in A.D. 37.

Tiberius was succeeded by his mentally unbalanced grandnephew, Gaius (Caligula), who proved to be a disaster. During his reign (A.D. 37–41) and that of his successor, his aging uncle Claudius (A.D. 41–54), most of the ministry of the apostle Paul took place. Claudius is reported to have expelled Jews from Rome who were creating disturbances at the instigation of Christ (compare Acts 18:2). Initially, his contemporaries viewed Claudius as inept, but he proved to have considerable hidden talents of administration and turned out to be one of Rome's more proficient emperors. He was responsible for the conquest of southern Britain in A.D. 43–47, although it took another 30 years to subjugate northern Britain and Wales. His fourth wife, Agrippina, is mentioned on a recently discovered sarcophagus in the Goliath family cemetery on the western edge of Jericho. She poisoned Claudius in A.D. 54 to speed up the succession of Nero, her son by a previous marriage.

Nero (A.D. 54–68) was in some respects worse than Caligula. He was a man without moral scruples or interest in the Roman populace except for exploitation of them. Both Paul and Peter seem to have been martyred during Nero's reign, perhaps in connection with the burning of Rome by Nero in A.D. 64, an event that he blamed on Christians. The Roman historian Tacitus wrote that when the fire subsided, only four of Rome's fourteen districts remained intact. Yet Paul wrote, "All the saints greet you, especially those of the emperor's household" (Phil. 4:22 NRSV). Nero's hedonism and utter irresponsibility led inevitably to his death. The revolt of Galba, one of his generals, led to Nero's suicide.

Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, three successive emperor-generals, died within the year of civil war (A.D. 68–69) that followed Nero's death. Vitellius's successor was Vespasian, one of the commanders who had taken Britain for Claudius and who was in Judea squelching the first Jewish revolt. He was declared emperor by the Syrian and Danube legions and returned to Rome to assume the post, leaving his son Titus to finish the destruction of Jerusalem with its holy Temple in the next year (A.D. 70). This event was prophesied by Jesus toward the end of His life when He said: "When you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near" (Luke 21:20 NRSV).

The aristocratic Julio-Claudian dynasties that had reigned until the death of Nero were happily replaced by the Flavian dynasty, which issued from the rural middle class of Italy and reflected a more modest and responsible approach to the use of power. Vespasian's reign (A.D. 69–79) was succeeded by the brief tenure of his son Titus (A.D. 79–81), who at his death gave way to the rule of his brother Domitian (A.D. 81–96). The fourth century historian Eusebius reported that the apostle John was exiled to Patmos (compare Rev. 1:9) in the reign of Domitian. Eusebius also claimed that in Nerva's reign the senate took away Domitian's honors and freed exiles to return home, thus letting John return to Ephesus.

Nerva's reign was brief, lasting little more than a year (A.D. 96–98). He was succeeded by Trajan (A.D. 98–117), who bathed the empire red in the blood of Christians. His persecution was more severe than that instituted by Domitian. Irenaeus wrote in the second century that John died in Ephesus in the reign of Trajan. The persecution of the church, depicted in the Revelation of John, probably reflects the ones initiated by Trajan and Domitian. Trajan, the adopted son of Nerva, was the first emperor of provincial origin. His family roots were in the area of Seville, Spain. Marcus Aurelius, a later emperor of Spanish descent (A.D. 161–180), also persecuted the church.

Trajan adopted Hadrian, his nephew by marriage, who succeeded him (A.D. 117–138) and quickly abandoned his predecessor's only partially successful attempts to conquer the East. More than half of Hadrian's reign was spent in traveling throughout the empire and involving himself deeply in the administration of the provinces, an activity for which he was especially talented. He left evidence of his propensity for building all over the Mediterranean world including the arch at the entrance to the precincts of the Athenian temple of Jupiter, the Ecce Homo Arch in Jerusalem, his villa near Rome, and the magnificent Pantheon in Rome, whose perfectly preserved construction continually awes the visitor. Hadrian will be best remembered by those of the Judaeo-Christian tradition, however, because of his attempt to hellenize Jerusalem by changing the name of the city to Aelia Capitolina, by erecting a temple to himself and Zeus on the site of the previous Temple of Solomon, and by prohibiting circumcision. The brutal way in which he put down the unavoidable revolt from A.D. 132–135 was consistent with Hadrian's declaration of himself as another Antiochus Ephiphanes (the second century B.C. hellenizer who, while king of Syria, also desecrated the Jewish Temple and precipitated the Maccabean Revolt). See Intertestamental History.

The success of the Roman Empire depended upon the ability of the legions to keep peace throughout the world. Pax Romana was the key to prosperity and success. Greek and Latin were universal languages; nevertheless, most of the conquered countries retained their own languages as well, including Celtic, Germanic, Semitic, Hamitic, and Berber. Not since that time has the world been able to so effectively communicate in common languages. If the Mediterranean Sea is included, the Roman Empire was roughly the size of the continental United States, reaching from Britain to Arabia and from Germany to Morocco. One could go from one end of the Mediterranean to the other by boat in three weeks. Less effectively, one could travel 90 miles a day on the fine network of roads that interlaced the empire, including the Appian Way and the Egnatian Way.

The quality of the Greco-Roman culture disseminated by Rome was strongest in the areas bordering the Mediterranean and weakest in those farthest removed from major routes of communication. The most effective resistance to the culture was, as might be expected, among the eastern countries such as Egypt, Syrian, Mesopotamia, and the Levant (Syria-Palestine) which had the longest history of civilization. Western Europe, with a comparatively recent and uncivilized history, was no opposition and was soon thoroughly and permanently immersed in the phenomenon of western civilization.

Education in the empire was the prerogative of the wealthy. The poor had neither the time, the money, nor the need for an education that was designed to prepare the upper classes for positions of public service. The goal of education was to master the spoken word. Successful civic life was tied to proficiency in the language. Oratory was indispensable. Grammar and rhetoric were the primary subjects of study with emphasis on style over content. Among Latin authors, Virgil, Terence, Sallust, and Cicero were studied most while Homer, Thucydides, Demosthenes, and the Attic tragedians were the favorite Greek writers.

In the beginning of the empire, religion was diverse and almost chaotic. Both politicians and philosophers attempted to bring the same order to religion that they achieved in other aspects of Roman life. The Roman emperor was the head of the state religion, which included worship of the emperor and the traditional gods of Rome. The emperor functioned as semidivine while alive and as a god after his death. John may refer to emperor worship in Pergamum, where the first Asian temple to a Roman emperor was erected, in his references to the place "where Satan's throne is" (perhaps meaning the altar of Zeus; Rev. 2:13 NRSV). Mystery religions such as Mithraism, and the worship of Cybele and Isis were abundant. Philosophical systems, such as Epicureanism and Stoicism, functioned virtually as religions for agnostic intellectuals. Judaism, with its monotheistic emphasis, and Christianity, with its Judaistic origin and equally high code of ethics and morals, were anomalies. The inevitable clash between Judeo-Christians and the Romans was a clash between monotheism and polytheism, between morality and immorality. John McRay

ROOF See Architecture; House.

ROOF CHAMBER See Architecture; Chamber.

ROOSTER See Birds.

ROOT The part of a plant buried in and gaining nourishment through the ground. In Scripture root generally appears in a figurative sense. Root indicates source as when the unrighteous are pictured as a root bearing bitter and poisonous fruit (Deut. 29:18; Heb. 12:15) or when the love of money is described as the root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10). Deep-sinking roots picture stability (Ps. 80:9; Prov. 12:3) and prosperity (Prov. 12:12; compare Ps. 1:3). Exile is termed being uprooted (1 Kings 14:15; Jer. 24:6), while taking root again pictures return from Exile and the renewal of God's blessing (2 Kings 19:30; Isa. 27:6; 37:31).

Seed that fails to take root pictures those whose commitment to Christ is not firm enough to withstand trouble or persecution (Matt. 13:6,21). To be rooted in Christ is to be established in faith (Col. 2:6). Root of Jesse (Isa. 11:10; Rom. 15:12) and root of David (Rev. 5:5; 22:16) serve as titles of the Messiah. In Paul's allegory of the grape vine Israel is the root of the plant, the church the branches (Rom. 11:16–18).

ROSE See Plants in the Bible.

ROSETTA STONE Stone monument engraved with a trilingual text (Egyptian hieroglyphic, Demotic, and Greek), honoring Ptolemy V Epiphanes (196 B.C.), which provided the necessary clues for deciphering the two dead languages (Egyptian hieroglyphic and Demotic). The name stems from the site of the stone's discovery in the Nile delta in 1799. See Archaeology; Egypt.

ROSH (Rōsh) Personal name meaning, "head" or "chief." Seventh son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). The earliest Greek translation regards Rosh as a son of Bela, hence Benjamin's grandson. The name is absent in parallel lists of Benjamin's sons (Num. 26:38–39; 1 Chron. 8:1–5).

ROUND TIRES KJV translation of a Hebrew term which modern translations render as crescent necklaces or ornaments (Isa. 3:18). The KJV rendered the same Hebrew term as ornaments at Judges 8:21,26. See Jewelry, Jewels, Precious Stones.

ROWERS, ROW See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

ROYAL CITY City having a monarchical government. Gibeon (Josh. 10:2) was compared in size and strength to cities with kings, such as Ai and Jericho. Gath (1 Sam. 27:5) was one of five Philistine cities ruled by kings or lords. Rabbah (2 Sam. 12:26) served as capital of the Ammonite kingdom.

RUBY See Jewelry, Jewels, and Precious Stones; Minerals and Metals.

RUDDER See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

RUDDY Having a healthy, reddish color (1 Sam. 16:12; 17:42; Song of Sol. 5:10; Lam. 4:7; compare Gen. 25:25).

RUDE IN SPEECH KJV expression (2 Cor. 11:6) to mean one ignorant or unskilled in speech. Paul perhaps meant that his speech did not meet the standards of Greek oratory.

RUDIMENTS See Elements, Elementary Spirits.

RUE (Ruta graveolens) Strong-smelling shrub used as a condiment, in medicines, and in charms (Luke 11:42). Dill appears in the Matthean parallel (Matt. 23:23).

RUFUS (Rū' fŭs) Personal name meaning, "red haired." 1. Son of Simon of Cyrene and brother of Alexander (Mark 15:21). 2. Recipient of Paul's greetings in Romans 16:13. If Mark was written from Rome, both references likely refer to the same person.

RUHAMAH (Rū hä' mah) Personal name meaning, "pitied." Name Hosea used to symbolize the change in Israel's status before God following God's judgment (2:1; compare 1:6). First Peter 2:10 applies Hosea's image to Christians who have experienced God's mercy in Christ.

RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE See Synagogue.

RUMAH (Rū' mah) Place name meaning, "elevated place." Home of Jehoiakim's mother (2 Kings 23:36), possibly identified with khirbet Rumeh near Rimmon in Galilee or with Arumah.

RUN, RUNNING Running serves as common metaphor for the struggle to live out the Christian life (1 Cor. 9:24–26; Gal. 5:7; Heb. 12:1). At Galatians 2:2 running applies specifically to Paul's struggle to evangelize.

RUNNERS Runners performed two basic functions, as messengers (2 Chron. 30:6,10; Esth. 3:13; Jer. 51:31) and royal body guards (1 Sam. 8:11; 22:17; 2 Sam. 15:1; 1 Kings 1:5; 2 Kings 10:25; 11:4).

RUNNING SORES Running sores disqualified a man from service as a priest (Lev. 21:20 NIV) and animals from serving as sacrifices (Lev. 22:22 NAS, NIV). The curse placed on Joab's descendants included affliction with running sores (2 Sam. 3:29 NIV).

RUSH, RUSHES English terms used to translate several types of reedlike plants. See Plants in the Bible.

RUST Coating produced by the corrosive effects of air and water on a metal, especially iron. Rust on a copper cooking pot symbolized Jerusalem's persistant wickedness in Ezekiel 24:6,12–13. Jesus highlighted the folly of relying on earthly treasures subject to rust (Matt. 6:19–20). In the style of an Old Testament prophet, James outlined God's future judgment on the wealth-reliant rich as if it were already accomplished (Jas. 5:1–6). James' mention of riches, moths, and rust (vv. 2–3) suggests that he was applying Jesus' saying. The scientific observation that gold and silver do not rust should not obscure James' primary emphasis: one is a fool to rely on riches which will not survive God's coming judgment. Ill-gotten riches will serve as evidence and witness for God's prosecution. The very riches relied on for security will provide the corrosive rust effecting God's judgment.

RUTH (Rūth) The woman, an ancestor of David and Jesus, and the biblical book which tells the story of the reversal of fortunes for Ruth and her mother-in-law, Naomi.

Ruth is a self-contained story and is not dependent on other Old Testament narratives for continuity. The story's time is set in the period of Israel's judges. Story place is given as the agrarian world of Moab and the environs of Bethlehem. It can be divided into a series of scenes or episodes with different narrator's comments. The story begins (1:1–5) by telling why Naomi is in Moab and her plight following the deaths of her husband and sons. Episode A (1:6–22) narrates her return to and reception in Bethlehem, and how Ruth came to be with her. Episode B (2:1–16) finds Ruth and Boaz meeting while she gleans grain during harvest. Episode C (2:17–23) shows Naomi and Ruth discussing Ruth's day in the field and identifies Boaz as a kinsman with a certain role to fulfill. Episode D (3:1–5) finds Naomi pressing Boaz's role as kinsman. Episode E (3:6–13) follows a transition in which Ruth and Boaz encounter each other, and Boaz is confronted by his responsibility as kinsman. Episode F (3:14–18) delays the plot's resolution while Naomi assures Ruth that the matter will be settled. Episode G (4:1–6) tells of Boaz at the gate settling the matters of Elimelech's property and Ruth, with another kinsman. A narrative aside (4:7–8) explains the custom of the sandal. Boaz's actions are witnessed, and he is blessed by the people and the elders for his role as kinsman in Episode H (4:9–12). Episode I (4:13–17a) reverses the fortunes of Naomi and Ruth with Obed's birth, who is declared a child of Naomi. This declaration ensures a name and a future for Naomi's family. A coda (4:18–22) ties up the story with a family genealogy.

Ruth is one of the five Megilloth (scrolls read for Jewish festivals), and is read at the Feast of Weeks. See Festivals. Ruth has been understood as a finely crafted historical short story. The literary artistry of Ruth speaks to multiple contexts and is multipurposed. In a social context, Ruth speaks against postexilic particularism by accepting Ruth (a native of Moab) into Israel's genealogical mainstream and the book into the Hebrew canon. See Moab. Ruth is concerned with Israelite family and marriage patterns and obligations. Ruth's plot shows levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–10) as a family obligation at work. See Levirate Law. Religiously, the book tells the story of the faith of Naomi and Ruth and shows the ways of God in one unique family situation. A framework of devotion is deployed in the story and is variously applied to Ruth, Naomi, Boaz, and Yahweh. The text's final form speaks to political concerns by a genealogy (4:17*b*–22) which details David's family background and serves to legitimate him as king on Saul's throne.

Outline

I. Trial and Tragedy Seemed to Offer Little Hope for God's Redeeming Grace (1:1–22).
   A. The trial of famine gave way to the tragedy of death for Naomi (1:1–5).
   B. The hint of blessing was seen in the tearful parting of Naomi from Orpah and the determined love of Ruth for her mother-in-law (1:6–14).
   C. In spite of Naomi's urging, Ruth resisted the injunction of her mother-in-law to remain in Moab and accompanied Naomi as she returned to Judah (1:15–18).
   D. The "emptiness" of Naomi's return to Judah provided the transition to God's grace by means of Ruth (1:19–22).

II. In the Ordinary Actions of a Foreigner, God Began to Prepare the Way of Blessing (2:1–23).
   A. Ruth's initiative provided not only food for the present, but a foundation for the future welfare of her family (2:1–7).
   B. Ruth demonstrated that inclusion into the people of God is not predicated on birth alone (2:8–13).
   C. The encounter of Boaz and Ruth opened the way for God to bless in an unexpected manner (2:14–23).

III. In More Ways Than One, God Took a Potential Scandal and Made It the Way of Grace (3:1–18).
   A. Naomi proposed a daring strategy in her matchmaking effort (3:1–5).
   B. The character of both Boaz and Ruth was demonstrated in the encounter at the threshing floor (3:6–13).
   C. The blessing of God began to be given to Ruth and Naomi through Boaz (3:14–18).

IV. Through Boaz, the "Kinsman Redeemer," God "Filled" the "Emptiness" of Naomi and Demonstrated His Presence Through the Blessing of His People (4:1–22).
   A. Boaz became "kinsman redeemer" (4:1–6).
   B. Before the assembled witnesses, Boaz fulfilled the custom of levirate marriage and received the blessing of witnesses (4:7–12).
   C. God "filled" the "emptiness" of Naomi through a son born to Ruth and Boaz, a son who was none other than the grandfather of the great King David (4:13–22).

RYE (Secale cereale) Hardy grass grown as a cereal (Ex. 9:32 KJV) and cover crop (Isa. 28:25 KJV, NAS). Other translations render the underlying Hebrew as spelt. See Agriculture; Grain; Plants in the Bible.

A young Jewish boy at his Bat Mitzvah with the Torah scroll reverently opened before him.

SABACHTHANI (Sä bäch' thà nī) Transliteration of Aramaic meaning, "he has forsaken me." Word Jesus used in quoting Psalm 22:1, where Hebrew is azabtani. See Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachthani.

SABAOTH (Să Bā' ōth) Transliteration of Hebrew meaning, "hosts, armies, heavenly bodies." Part of a divine title, "Lord of Hosts" variously interpreted as Lord of Israel's armies (compare 1 Sam. 17:45); the deposed Canaanite nature gods whose title Yahweh assumed; the stars; members of Yahweh's heavenly court or council; a comprehensive title for all beings, heavenly and earthly; an intensive title describing God as all powerful. Interestingly, the title does not appear in Genesis through Judges. The earliest Greek translation at times translated Sabaoth as a proper name, sometimes as Almighty, and sometimes not at all. The title was apparently closely tied to Shiloh and the ark of the covenant (1 Sam. 1:3,11; 4:4; 6:2). When David brought the ark to Jerusalem, he also introduced the title Yahweh of Hosts to Jerusalem worship (2 Sam. 6:2). Yahweh Sabaoth seems to have emphasized God's place as divine king enthroned on the cherubim with the ark as His footstool ruling over the nation, the earth, and the heavens (Ps. 24:10). He is the God without equal (Ps. 89:8) who is present with His people (Ps. 46:7,11; compare 2 Sam. 5:10).

SABBATH The day of rest, considered holy to God by His rest on the seventh day after creation and viewed as a sign of the covenant relation between God and His people and of the eternal rest He has promised them.

Old Testament The word sabbath comes from the Hebrew shabbat, meaning "to cease" or "desist." The primary meaning is that of cessation from all work. Some persons have traced the origin of the concept to the Babylonian calendar which contained certain days, corresponding to phases of the moon, in which kings and priests could not perform their official functions. Such days bore an evil connotation, and work performed on them would have harmful effects. The fifteenth of the month, the time of the full moon in their lunar calendar, was shapattu, the "day of pacifying the heart" (of the god) by certain ceremonies.

Although one can show similarities to the Babylonian concept, the Hebrew sabbath did not follow a lunar cycle. It was celebrated every seven days and became basic to the recognition and worship of the God of creation and redemption. Regulations concerning the sabbath are a main feature of the Mosaic laws. Both reports of the Ten Commandments stated that the sabbath belonged to the Lord. On six days the Israelites should work, but on the seventh, they as well as all slaves, foreigners, and beasts must rest. Two reasons are given. The first is that God rested on the seventh day after creation, thereby making the day holy (Ex. 20:8–11). The second was a reminder of their redemption from slavery in Egypt (Deut. 5:12–15).

The day became a time for sacred assembly and worship (Lev. 23:1–3), a token of their covenant with God (Ex. 31:12–17; Ezek. 20:12–20). Death was the penalty for desecration (Ex. 35:1–3). The true observance of not following one's own pursuits on that day would lift a person to God's holy mountain and bring spiritual nourishment (Isa. 56:1–7; 58:13), but failure to keep the sabbath would bring destruction to their earthly kingdom (Neh. 13:15–22; Jer. 17:21–27).

Interbiblical The sabbath became the heart of the law, and the prohibitions were expanded. Thirty-nine tasks were banned, such as tying or untying a knot. These in turn were extended until ingenious evasions were devised that lost the spirit but satisfied the legal requirement.

New Testament The habit of Jesus was to observe the sabbath as a day of worship in the synagogues (Luke 4:16), but His failure to comply with the minute restrictions brought conflict (Mark 2:23–28; 3:1–6; Luke 13:10–17; John 5:1–18). At first, Christians also met on the sabbath with the Jews in the synagogues to proclaim Christ (Acts 13:14). Their holy day, the day that belonged especially to the Lord, was the first day of the week, the day of resurrection (Matt. 28:1; Acts 20:7; Rev. 1:10). They viewed the sabbath and other matters of the law as a shadow of the reality which had now been revealed (Col. 2:16–23), and the sabbath became a symbol of the heavenly rest to come (Heb. 4:1–11). Barbara J. Bruce

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY Distance a Jew in Jesus' day considered ritually legal to walk on the seventh day. This phrase appears only once in the Bible (Acts 1:12), describing the distance from the Mount of Olives to Jerusalem. Scholars have surmised that the expression came from God's instruction to the children of Israel as they prepared to cross the Jordan into Canaan (Josh. 3:4). As they followed the priests bearing the ark of the covenant, they must maintain a distance of 2,000 cubits from it. Earlier, while in the wilderness, they had been told not to leave home on the sabbath (Ex. 16:29). Rabbis eventually interpreted these commands as limiting sabbath travel to 2,000 cubits. That was the farthest that a loyal Jew should be from his center of worship on the sabbath. The length of the cubit depended on who was counting. Greeks said it was 1 foot, 6 inches; but Romans claimed it was 1 foot, 9 inches. Thus, 2,000 cubits could be from 3,000 to 3,600 feet, somewhat more than a half mile. Anyone who wanted to "bend" the rule could carry a lunch sometime before the sabbath to a place about half mile from his home. Then, by eating it on the sabbath, he could claim that place as a "legal"

home and go another sabbath day's journey. See Sabbath. W. J. Fallis

SABBATICAL YEAR Every seventh year when farmers rested their land from bearing crops to renew the land and people of Israel. Mosaic law directed that every seventh year the land would not be planted in crops; food would come from what grew wild (Ex. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:1–7). Just as the the Law reserved the seventh day as holy unto God, so too, was the seventh year set aside as a time of rest and renewal. This not only assured the continued fertility of the land by allowing it to lay fallow, but also protected the rights of the poor. Peasants were allowed to eat from the natural abundance of the untended fields. It may be that only a portion of the land was allowed to rest each sabbath year, the remainder farmed as usual. Hebrews sold into slavery were to be released in that year (Ex. 21:2). Loans and debts to Israelites were also to be forgiven (Deut. 15:1–3). It is doubtful that the sabbath year was celebrated in early Israel. Jeremiah reminded the people that their fathers had ignored the observance of the law (Jer. 34:13–14; compare Lev. 26:35). Although Israel renewed her dedication to practice the sabbath year during Nehemiah's time, it is unclear whether it was carried out (Neh. 10:31). During the intertestamental period an attempt was made by Israel to observe the sabbath year despite the political turmoil of the times (1 Macc. 6:49). The sabbath year laws consistently pointed to helping the poor. David Maltsberger

SABEAN (Så bē' an) Transliteration of two Hebrew national names. 1. Descendants of Seba, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7*a*) expected to bring gifts signifying loyalty to Jerusalem (Ps. 72:10; Isa. 45:14; compare Ezek. 23:42). God could use the Sabeans to "pay for" Israel's ransom from captivity (Isa. 43:3). These are often identified with people of Meroe in Upper Egypt between the white and blue Nile, thus the capital of Ethiopia. Other scholars locate it much further south, the territory east and southeast of Cush bordering on the Red Sea. Other scholars would identify at least some references here as identical with 2. below.

2. Descendants of Sheba, the son of Raamah (Gen. 10:7*b*) or Joktan (Gen. 10:28; compare 25:3). The rich queen of Sheba visited Solomon (1 Kings 10). Sabeans destroyed Job's flocks and herds and servants (Job 1:15). They were known as "travelling merchants" (Job 6:19 REB; compare Ps. 72:10,15; Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; 38:13; Joel 3:8). This is usually equated with the city in southern Arabia, modern Marib in Yemen. Some scholars think this is too far south and seek biblical Sheba in northern Arabia near Medina on the wadi esh-Shaba. Sabeans could have become a general term for foreign or nomadic merchants. Sheba in southern Arabia gained riches through trade with nearby Africa and with India, whose goods they transported and sold to the empires to the north. Sheba produced and traded incense.

SABTA(H) (Săb' tà) Son of Cush and apparently the ancestor of citizens of Sabota, capital of Hadramaut about 270 miles north of Aden. Others identify it with an Ethiopian ruler about 700 B.C. Josephus identified it with Astaboras, modern Abare.

SABTECA(H) (Săb' tē cà) Place name of uncertain meaning. Sometimes equated with Ethiopian ruler Sabataka (700–689 B.C.) but more probably with an Arabian city state such as Ashshabbak near Medina or Sembrachate in northern Yemen.

SABTECHA(H) (Săb' tē chà) KJV, REB spellings of Sabteca.

SACAR (Sā' cär) Personal name meaning, "salary." 1. Man from Harar and father of one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:35), called Sharar in 2 Samuel 23:33. 2. Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:4).

SACHAR (Sā' chär) NRSV, TEV spelling of Sacar.

SACHIA(H) (Så chī' à) NAS, NRSV, (REB) spellings of Shachia.

SACK See Bag 5.

SACKBUT (Săck' bŭt) KJV term for musical instrument (Dan. 3:5), identified in modern translations as zither (TEV), lyre (NIV), trigon (NAS, NRSV), or triangle (REB). It is apparently an instrument of Asian origin, a triangular harp with four or more strings. The related Hebrew and Aramaic term refers to lattice work. Along with the other instruments in the list, it apparently was not used in worship but only in more popular settings, possibly representing a rebuke from the biblical writer for a pagan musical setting for worship.

SACKCLOTH A garment of coarse material fashioned from goat or camel hair worn as a sign of mourning or anguish, also marked by fasting and sitting on an ash heap (Isa. 58:5). Jonah 3:8 notes even animals mourned in sackcloth. The shape of the garment could have been either a loose-fitting sack placed over the shoulders or a loin cloth. The word sack is a transliteration of the Hebrew word rather than a translation.

SACRAMENT (Săc' rà mĕnt) an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. It usually refers to a religious ritual which is believed to carry a special healing or saving power. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the two sacraments almost universally recognized in Christendom, though many evangelical Christians shy away from the word sacrament in favor of "ordinances."

The word comes from the Latin sacramentum, vow, and it especially refers to the vow taken by a Roman soldier upon his induction into the army. This made it particularly appropriate for early Christians to designate their baptism, a confession and induction into the army of Christ. Later, Christians extended the use of the term to preaching, the Lord's Supper, foot washing, blessing, marriage, ordination, and any other rite seen as a channel of divine grace into the heart and life of the believer. The theological issue which most divided Christians was whether the divine grace was conveyed simply by a correct performance of the rite or whether the recipient must have an active faith and make a personal response to the power of God's spirit.

The Latin Bible translated the Greek word mysterion (mystery) in such passages as 1 Corinthians 2:7, Ephesians 3:3, and Colossians 1:26 with the Latin word sacramentum. Although none of these passages uses "mystery" to refer to baptism, Lord's Supper, or any other religious rite, the later church began to make that identification and gave that special meaning to the word.

There is strong biblical support for the theological idea of an outward sign carrying an inward spiritual power. When Paul wrote of being "buried with Christ" in baptism, he certainly meant that this visible rite demonstrates our spiritual union with Christ in His death and resurrection. It is not, however, an automatic or mechanical transmission of divine grace. It depends upon the inward faith and spiritual response of the believer. Since God became flesh in Jesus Christ, it follows that God can use anything He chooses in His created order to convey His truth and saving power to the one who believes in Him. See Ordinances.

SACRIFICE AND OFFERING The physical elements the worshiper brings to the Deity to express devotion, thanksgiving, or the need for forgiveness.

Iron Age sacrificial altar located at the site of ancient Arad.

Sacrifice in the Ancient Near East Israel was not unique among the nations of the Ancient Near East in their use of sacrifices and offerings as a means of religious expression. Some type of sacrificial system characterized the many religious methodologies that the nations employed in their attempts to honor their gods. The presence of sacrifices and offerings in Israel, therefore, was a reflection of the larger culture of which this nation was a part.

Many references to the offering of sacrifices exist in extrabiblical literature. The primary approach to the gods was through the sacrificial system. In Babylon, part of the ritual of purifying the temple of Bel for the new year's festival involved the slaughter of a ram. The animal was decapitated and the priest, in turn, used the body in the purification ceremony. The ram's body then was thrown into the river. The ritual accompanying the replacing of the head of the kettledrum that was used in the temple required that a black bull be selected for sacrifice. After an elaborate ceremony that culminated in the sacrifice of the bull, its hide was dipped in and rubbed with two separate mixtures and then used to cover the kettledrum.

While the above sacrifices were performed on special occasions, a variety of rams, bulls, and birds were offered as meals to the idols on a daily basis. Barley beer, mixed beer, milk, and wine also were placed before the deities, as well as loaves of bread.

The sacrifices and offerings were designed to serve the gods by meeting any physical need that they may have had. The sacrifices were the food and drink of the gods. Faithfulness to the preparation and presentation of them was an act of devotion.

The Sacrificial System in the Old Testament From the earliest times of the Old Testament, sacrifice was practiced. Cain and Abel brought offerings to the Lord from the produce of the land and from the first born of the flock (Gen. 4). Upon embarking from the ark after the great flood, Noah immediately built an altar and offered burnt sacrifices. These were a soothing aroma to the Lord (Gen. 8). Other Ancient Near Eastern flood stories have parallels to this act by Noah. The patriarchal stories in Genesis 12—50 are filled with instances of sacrifice to God. The most famous is that of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. 22).

An organized system of sacrifice does not appear in the Old Testament until after the Exodus of Israel from Egypt. In the instructions given for the building of the tabernacle and the establishment of a priestly organization, sacrifices were to be used in the consecration or ordination of the priests (Ex. 29). A bull was slaughtered as a sin offering. Other sacrifices provided Aaron and his sons a holy meal. These sacrifices were repeated each day for a week as a part of the "ordination" of the priests. The altar itself was consecrated through the offering of two lambs and a grain offering and a libation of wine. This sacrifice also was carried out each day for a week.

The sacrifices that constituted much of the worship of Israel at this time were burned on an altar that was made from accacia wood and overlaid with copper (Ex. 27). In addition to the sacrifices offered on this altar, incense was burned on a smaller altar (Ex. 30). While the sacrificial altar was placed in the courtyard, just before the door of the tabernacle, the incense altar was positioned inside the tabernacle, just before the ark of the covenant. See Altar.

Leviticus 1—7 gives the most detailed description of Israel's sacrificial system, including five types of sacrifices. The sacrifices and offerings that were brought by the people were to be the physical expression of their inward devotion.

1. Burnt offering ('olah). The burnt offering was offered both in the morning and in the evening, as well as on special days such as the sabbath, the new moon, and the yearly feasts (Num. 28—29; 2 Kings 16:15; 2 Chron. 2:4; 31:3; Ezra 3:3–6). Rituals performed after childbirth (Lev. 12:6–8), for an unclean discharge (Lev. 15:14–15) or hemorrhage (Lev. 15:29–30), or after a person who was keeping a Nazirite vow was defiled (Num. 6:10–11) required a burnt offering, as well as a sin offering.

The animal for this sacrifice could be a young bull, lamb, goat, turtledove, or young pigeon; but it had to be a perfect and complete specimen. The type of animal chosen for this sacrifice seems to be dependent on the offerer's financial ability. The one bringing the offering was to lay a hand upon the animal so as to identify that the animal was taking the person's place and then to kill it. The priest then collected the blood and sprinkled it around the altar and the sanctuary, and the worshiper cut up and skinned the animal. If a bird was brought, the priest killed it. After the priest arranged the various parts on the altar, the entire animal was burned as a sacrifice. The only portion that remained was the hide, and the priest received it (Lev. 7:8). The one who made this sacrifice did so to restore the relationship with God and to atone for some sin. When Araunah offered to David his threshing floor, oxen, and wood without cost so that David could sacrifice, David refused. His explanation was that he could not offer burnt offerings that cost him nothing (2 Sam. 24:18–25).

2. Grain offering (minchah; "meat offering" in KJV). An offering from the harvest of the land is the only type that required no bloodshed. It was composed of fine flour mixed with oil and frankincense. Sometimes, this offering was cooked into cakes prior to taking it to the priest. These cakes, however, had to be made without leaven. Every grain offering had to have salt in it (Lev. 2:13), perhaps as a symbol of the covenant. Only a portion of this offering was burned on the altar, with the remainder going to the priests. While no reason is given for the grain offering, it may have symbolized the recognition of God's blessing in the harvest by a society based to a large degree on agriculture. The bringing of a representative portion of the grain harvest was another outward expression of devotion.

3. Peace offering (zebach shelamin; well-being in NRSV; "shared" in REB; "fellowship" in NIV). This consisted of the sacrifice of a bull, cow, lamb, or goat that had no defect. As with the burnt offering, the individual laid a hand on the animal and killed it. The priests, in turn, sprinkled the blood around the altar. Only certain parts of the internal organs were burned. The priest received the breast and the right thigh (Lev. 7:28–36), but the offerer was given much of the meat to have a meal of celebration (Lev. 7:11–21). As part of the meal, various kinds of bread were offered (and ultimately kept by the priest). The idea of thanksgiving was associated with the peace offering. It often accompanied other sacrifices in celebration of events such as the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8:63) or spiritual renewal (2 Chron. 29:31–36).

4. Sin offering (chaṭṭa't; "purification" in REB). This was designed to deal with sin that was committed unintentionally. The sacrifice varied according to who committed the sin. If the priest or the congregation of Israel sinned, then a bull was required. A leader of the people had to bring a male goat, while anyone else sacrificed a female goat or a lamb. The poor were allowed to bring two turtledoves or two young pigeons. The one bringing the offering placed a hand on the animal and then slaughtered it. When the priest or the congregation sinned, the blood was sprinkled seven times before the veil in the sanctuary, and some of it was placed on the horns of the incense altar. The rest of the blood was poured out at the base of the sacrificial altar. For others who sinned, the sprinkling of the blood before the veil was omitted. The same internal organs that were designated for burning in the peace offering were likewise designated in this sacrifice. The rest of the animal was taken outside of the camp to the place where the ashes of the sacrifices were disposed, and there it was burned. These disposal procedures were not followed when the sin offering was made on behalf of a nonpriestly person (Lev. 6:24–30). In this case, the priest was allowed to eat some of the meat.

5. Guilt offering ('asham, trespass in KJV; reparation in REB). This is hard to distinguish from the sin offering (Lev. 4—5). In Leviticus 5:6–7, the guilt offering is called the sin offering. Both offerings also were made for similar types of sin. The guilt offering was concerned supremely with restitution. Someone who took something illegally was expected to repay it in full plus 20 percent of the value and then bring a ram for the guilt offering. Other instances in which the guilt offering was prescribed included the cleansing of a leper (Lev. 14), having sexual relations with the female slave of another person (Lev. 19:20–22), and for the renewing of a Nazirite vow that had been broken (Num. 6:11–12).

The burnt, grain, peace, sin, and guilt offering composed the basic sacrificial system of Israel. These sacrifices were commonly used in conjunction with each other and were carried out on both an individual and a corporate basis. The sacrificial system taught the necessity of dealing with sin and, at the same time, demonstrated that God had provided a way for dealing with sin.

The Prophets' Attitude Toward the Sacrificial System The prophets spoke harshly about the people's concept of sacrifice. They tended to ignore faith, confession, and devotion, thinking the mere act of sacrifice ensured forgiveness. Isaiah contended that the sacrifices were worthless when they were not accompanied by repentance and an obedient life (Isa. 1:10–17). Micah reflected the same sentiments when he proclaimed that God was not interested in the physical act of sacrifice by itself but in the life and heart of the one making the sacrifice (Mic. 6:4–6). Jeremiah condemned the belief that as long as the Temple was in Jerusalem and the people were faithful to perform the sacrifices, then God would protect them. The symbol of the sacrifice must be reflected in the individual's life (Jer. 7:1–26). Malachi chastised the people for offering the lame and sick animals to God instead of the best, as the Levitical law required. In doing this, the people were defiling the altar and despising God (Mal. 1:7–14).

The prophets did not want to abolish the sacrificial system. They, instead, denounced the people's misuse of it. God wanted more than the physical performance of meaningless sacrifices. He desired the offerings to exemplify the heart of the worshiper.

Sacrifice in the New Testament During the time of the New Testament, the people sacrificed according to the guidelines in the Old Testament. In keeping with the Levitical law (Lev. 12), Mary brought the baby Jesus to the Temple and offered a sacrifice for her purification. She sacrificed turtledoves or pigeons, indicating the family's low financial status. When Jesus healed the leper (Luke 5:12–14), He told him to go to the priest and make a sacrifice (compare Lev. 14). The cleansing of the Temple (John 2) came about because people were selling animals and birds for the various sacrifices within the Temple precincts. These people had allowed the "business" of sacrifice to overwhelm the spiritual nature of the offerings. Jesus chided the Pharisees neglecting family responsibilities by claiming that something was "corban," or offered to God, and thus unavailable for the care of their parents (Mark 7). Corban is the Hebrew word for offering (Lev. 1:2). See Corban.

The New Testament consistently describes Christ's death in sacrificial terms. Hebrews portrays Christ as the sinless high priest who offered himself up as a sacrifice for sinners (7:27). The superiority of Christ's sacrifice over the Levitical sacrificial system is seen in that His sacrifice had to be offered only once. The book ends with an encouragement to offer sacrifices of praise to God through Christ. This thought is reflected in 1 Peter 2 where believers are called a holy and royal priesthood who offer up spiritual sacrifices.

Paul used the terminology of the Old Testament sacrifices in teaching about the death of Jesus. His death was an offering and sacrifice to God and, as such, a fragrant aroma (Eph. 5:2). He associated Jesus with the Passover sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7). Paul also spoke of himself as a libation poured out (Phil. 2:18). He called the Philippians' gift a fragrant aroma and an acceptable sacrifice to God (Phil. 4:18).

The first-century church lived in a culture that sacrificed to their gods. Paul and Barnabas at Lystra were thought to be the gods Zeus and Hermes. The priest of Zeus sought to offer sacrifices to them (Acts 14). The church at Corinth was embroiled in a controversy over whether or not it was permissible for Christians to eat meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8—10). Paul's preaching of the gospel at Ephesus disrupted the business and worship of the goddess Artemis (Acts 19).

When the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed in 70 A.D., the Jews' sacrificial system ceased. By this time, however, the church had begun to distance itself from Judaism. The biblical view of sacrifice changed as well. In the Old Testament and in the beginning years of the New Testament, sacrifice was the accepted mode of worship. With the death of Christ, however, physical sacrifice became unnecessary. As the temple and priest of God, the believer now has the responsibility for offering acceptable spiritual sacrifices.

SADDUCEES (Săd' dū cēēs) A religious group which formed during the period between the Testaments when the Maccabees ruled Judah. They took their name from one of David's copriests, Zadok, and claimed descent from him. Their name meant "righteous ones." See Jewish Parties.

SAINTS Holy people, a title for all God's people but applied in some contexts to a small group seen as the most dedicated ones.

Old Testament Two words are used for saints: qaddish and chasid. Qaddish comes from the qadosh and means holy. To be holy is to separate oneself from evil and dedicate oneself to God. This separation and union is seen both with things and people. All the items of worship are separated for the Lord's use: altar (Ex. 29:37), oil (Ex. 30:25), garments (Ex. 31:10), and even the people are to be holy (Ex. 22:31). This separation reflects God's very character, for He is holy (Lev. 19:2). See Holy; God. Holiness is clearly portrayed as an encounter with the living God, which results in a holiness of life-style (Isa. 6). So holiness is more than a one-time separating and uniting activity. It is a way of life. "Ye shall be holy: for I . . . am holy" (Lev. 19:2). Saints are people who try to live holy lives (Dan. 7:18–28).

Chasid means "to be kind or merciful." These are qualities of God. Thus, chasid people are godly people because they reflect His character. Saints praise the Lord for His lifelong favor (Ps. 30:4), rejoice in goodness (2 Chron. 6:41), and know that God keeps their paths (1 Sam. 2:9). God's encounter with His people through the covenant enables them to walk as His saints.

New Testament One word, hagios, is used for saints in the New Testament. This word, like qadosh, means holy. Consequently, saints are the holy ones. There is only one reference to saints in the Gospels (Matt. 27:52). In this verse, dead saints are resurrected at the Lord's crucifixion. The death of the Holy One provides life for those who believe in God. In Acts, three of the four references occur in chapter 9 (vv. 13,32,41). First Ananias and then Peter talks of the saints as simply believers in Christ. Paul continues this use in his Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and Philemon. In each case, saints seem simply to be people who name Jesus as Lord. In the Book of Revelation, however, where the word saints occurs more times than in any other single book (13 times), the meaning is further defined. Saints not only name Jesus as Lord, but they are faithful and true witnesses for Jesus.

Little wonder then that the early church considered witnesses who were martyred for their testimonies to be saints. In fact, soon these saints were accorded special honor and then even worship. Unfortunately, the term saints came to be applied only to such special people.

Biblically, though, the term saint is correctly applied to anyone who believes Jesus Christ is Lord. To believe in Jesus demands obedience and conformity to His will. A saint bears true and faithful witness to Christ in speech and life-style. To be a saint is a present reality when a believer seeks to let the Spirit form Christ within (Rom. 8:29; Gal. 4:19; Eph. 4:13). See Spirit; Witness.

SAKIA (Să kī' ă) NIV spelling of Shachia.

SAKKUTH (Săk' küth) NRSV transliteration of Assyrian divine name applied to god Ninurta (or Ninib), apparently an Assyrian name for Saturn or another astral deity. Some translators take the name as a common noun meaning, "shrine" (REB, NIV), "tabernacle" (KJV), since the Hebrew term resembles the word for "tent." Amos condemned Israel for such false worship (Amos 5:26). See Succoth-benoth.

SALEM (Sā' lĕm) Abbreviated form of Jerusalem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2; Heb. 7:1,2). See Jerusalem; Melchizedek.

SALIM (Sā' lĭm) Place name meaning, "peace." Town near which John the Baptist baptized (John 3:23). Its site is disputed: northeast of Dead Sea near Bethabara; west bank of northern Jordan valley eight miles south of Scythopolis; in Samaria four miles south southeast of Shechem. The third site would identify John as well as Jesus with Samaritan ministry. See Samaria. The second and third sites would have John leaving for the north, allowing Jesus to minister near Jerusalem. See Aenon; John 2.

SALLAI (Săl' lā ī) Personal name perhaps meaning, "the restored one." 1. Benjaminite who lived in Jerusalem after Exile (Neh. 11:8). Commentators often emend the Hebrew text to read, "and his brothers, men of valor." Others read, "Sallu." 2. Priestly family after the Exile (Neh. 12:20), apparently the same as Sallu (v. 7).

SALUTATION (Săl ū tā' tion) Act of greeting, addressing, blessing, or welcoming by gestures or words; a specific form of words serving as a greeting, especially in the opening and closing of letters.

In the Ancient Near East, a salutation covered a wide range of social practices: exchanging a greeting ("Hail"), asking politely about another's welfare, expressing personal regard, and the speaking of a parting blessing ("Go in Peace"). Physical actions, such as kneeling, kissing, and embracing, were also involved. The salutation functioned to maintain close, personal contact and to foster good relations. Though the practice continued into the first century, Jesus and early Christians transformed the act of saluting. Jesus critiqued the Pharisees for practicing long, protracted deferential salutations (Mark 12:37b–40; Luke 20:45–47; compare Matt. 23:1–36) and forbade His disciples from practicing such public displays (Luke 10:4). Instead, Jesus endorsed a salutation when it signified the long-awaited presence of messianic "peace" (Hebrew, shalom), that is the "peace" of the kingdom of God (Luke 10:5–13; 19:42; John 14:27; 20:21; Mark 15:18; compare Luke 2:14,29). Paul, as do other New Testament authors, also transformed the salutation to speak of newness brought on by the cross and resurrection. The typical greeting in Greek letters was the infinitive "to rejoice" (charein). Paul never opened his letters with this greeting; instead, the apostle fused the Greek word for the typical Hebrew blessing, "Peace" (einrēnē), with the noun form of the Greek blessing, "Grace" (charis), to yield the distinctly Christian salutation: "Grace and Peace" (charis kai eirēnē). By such a subtle change in the form of Greek letter writing, Paul was able to invoke the range of apostolic blessings found in Jesus: mercy from God ("grace") and eternal well-being from God's presence ("peace"). See Letter. Carey C. Newman

SALVATION The acutely dynamic act of snatching others by force from serious peril. In its most basic sense, salvation is the saving of a life from death or harm. Scripture, particularly the New Testament, extends salvation to include deliverance from the penalty and power of sin.

Old Testament For Israelite faith, salvation never carried a purely secular sense of deliverance from death or harm. Because God and no other is the source of salvation, any saving act—even when the focus is preservation of life or release from national oppression—is a spiritual event. The primary saving event in the Old Testament is the Exodus (Ex.14:13) which demonstrated both God's power to save and God's concern for His oppressed people (Ex. 34:6–7). Israel recounted God's deliverance from Egyptian slavery in the Passover ritual (Ex. 12:1–13), in sermon (Neh. 9:9–11), and in psalms (for example, Pss. 74:12–13; 78:13,42–54; 105:26–38). The retelling of the Exodus event and of God's provision during the wilderness years (Neh. 9:12–21; Pss. 78:14–29; 105:39–41; 114:8) provided a precedent for sharing other stories of national and even personal deliverance (Pss. 40:10; 71:15).

Some argue that the Old Testament does not link salvation with the forgiveness of sins. The recurring cycle of national sin, foreign oppression, national repentence, and salvation by a God-sent "judge," however, witnesses the linkage (Judg. 3:7–9,12,15; 4:1–4; 6:1,7,12; also Neh. 9:27; Ps. 106:34–46). God's sending of a deliverer is in effect God's act of forgiveness of the penitent (compare Pss. 79:9; 85:4). Psalms 51:12 perhaps provides the best Old Testament case for personal salvation from sin.

In the Old Testament, salvation primarily concerns God's saving acts within human history. The early prophets anticipated God's salvation to be realized in the earth's renewed fruitfulness and the rebuilding of the ruined cities of Israel (Amos 9:13–15). Salvation would extend to all nations who would stream to Zion for instruction in God's ways (Isa. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–4; Zech. 8:20–23). The prophets also hinted of a salvation that lies outside history (for example, Isa. 51:6). The larger context of Isaiah 25:9 reveals that God's salvation embraces abundant life (25:6) and the end of death (25:7), tears, and disgrace (25:8).

Throughout most of the Old Testament, salvation is a corporate or community experience. The Psalms, however, are especially concerned with the salvation of the individual from the threat of enemies (Pss. 13:5; 18:2,35; 24:5). Though the focus is negative—salvation involves foiling the enemies' wrongdoing—there are hints of a positive content of salvation that embraces prosperity (as in Ps. 18:35). The Psalms are especially interested in God's salvation of the "upright in heart" (Ps. 36:10) or righteous (Ps. 37:19–40) who rely on God for deliverance. Psalm 51:12 more than any other Old Testament text associates personal salvation with a conversion experience; renewed joy of salvation accompanies God's creation of a new heart and right spirit and assurance of God's abiding presence.

New Testament For convenience, salvation can be viewed from the two perspectives of Christ's saving work and the believer's experience of salvation.

Christ's saving work involves already completed, on-going, and future saving activity. Jesus' earthly ministry made salvation a present reality for His generation. Jesus' healing ministry effected salvation from disease (Mark 5:34; 10:52; Luke 17:19). Jesus offered God's forgiveness to hurting people (Mark 2:5; Luke 7:50). He assured a repentant Zacchaeus that "Today salvation has come to this house" (Luke 19:9). Through such encounters Jesus fulfilled the goal of His ministry: "to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke 19:10).

The apex of Christ's completed work is His sacrificial death: Christ came to "give his life a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45); Christ "entered once for all into the Holy Place, . . . with his own blood, thus obtaining eternal redemption" (Heb. 9:12 NRSV); "in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them" (2 Cor. 5:19 NRSV). Here ransom, redemption, and reconciliation are synonyms for salvation. With reference to Christ's atoning work, the believer can confess, "I was saved when Jesus died for me."

Christ's present saving work primarily concerns Christ's role as mediator (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1). Christ's future saving work chiefly concerns Christ's coming again "to bring salvation to those who eagerly await him" (Heb. 9:28 REB) and salvation from the wrath of God's final judgment (Rom. 5:9–10).

Though Christ's sacrificial death is central, Christ's saving activity extends to the whole of His life, including His birth (Gal. 4:4–5), resurrection (Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:17), and ascension (Rom. 8:34).

The believer's experience also offers a perspective for viewing salvation. The experience again embraces the past, present, and future. God's initial work in the believer's life breaks down into various scenes: conviction of sin (John 16:8); repentance (turning) from sin to God (Luke 15:7,10; 2 Cor. 7:10); faith which involves commitment of one's whole life to Christ (John 3:16,36); confession of Christ as Lord (Acts 2:21; Rom. 10:9–10). Scripture uses a wealth of images to describe this act: new birth (John 3:3; Titus 3:5); new creation (2 Cor. 5:17); adoption (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:4–5; Eph. 1:5); empowerment to be God's children (John 1:12); the status of "saints" (1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1). This initial work in the believer's life is often termed justification. Justification, however, also embraces God's final judgment (Rom. 2:13; 3:20,30).

God's ongoing work in the believer's life concerns the process of maturing in Christ (Heb. 2:3; 1 Pet. 2:2; 2 Pet. 3:18), growing in Christ's service (1 Cor. 7:20–22), and experiencing victory over sin through the power of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 7—8). Here sin remains a reality in the believer's life (Rom. 7; 1 John 1:8—2:1). The believer is caught in between what God has begun and what God is yet to complete (Phil. 1:6; 2:12).

God's yet to be finished work in the lives of all believers is sometimes called glorification (Rom. 8:17; Heb. 2:10). Scripture, however, uses a wealth of terms for this future saving work: adoption (Rom. 8:23); redemption (Luke 21:28; Rom. 8:23; Eph. 4:30); salvation (Rom. 13:11; Heb. 1:14; 9:28; 1 Pet. 1:5; 2:2); and sanctification (1 Thess. 5:23). God's future work involves more than the individual; God's future work extends to the renewal of heaven and earth.

Some Contested Issues (1) The relationship between faith and works: Scripture repeatedly affirms that salvation is the free gift of God appropriated through faith (Eph. 2:8–9; Rom. 3:28). No individual merits salvation by fulfillment of God's law (Rom. 3:20). Saving faith is, however, obedient faith (Rom. 1:5; 16:26; 1 Pet. 1:2). We are saved for good works (Eph. 2:10). Faith that does not result in acts of Christian love is not salvific but demonic (Jas. 2:14–26, especially v. 19).

(2) The perseverance of the saints: Assurance of salvation is grounded in confidence that God is able to finish the good work begun in us (Phil. 1:6), that God who sacrificed His Son for sinners (Rom. 5:8–9) will not hold back anything necessary to save one of his children (Rom. 8:32), and that nothing can separate us from God's love in Christ (Rom. 8:35–39). Confidence in God's ability to keep those who have entrusted their lives to Christ is not, however, an excuse for any believer's inactivity or moral failure (Rom. 6:12–13; Eph. 2:10).

SAMARIA, SAMARITANS (Sȧ mā′ rĭ ȧ, Sȧ mâr′ ĭ tan) Place name of mountain, city, and region meaning, "mountain of watching," and the residents thereof. Forty-two miles north of Jerusalem and nine miles northwest of Nablus, a hill protrudes from the broad valley which cuts across the central highlands of Israel. There lie ruins of ancient Samaria near a small village called Sebastiya. Samaria was the capital, residence, and burial place of the kings of Israel (1 Kings 16:23–28; 22:37; 2 Kings 6:24–30). Following the Northern Kingdom's fall to Assyria (721 B.C.), exiles from many nations settled Samaria (Ezra 4:9–10). Later, the Greeks conquered the region (331 B.C.) and hellenized the area with Greek inhabitants and culture. Then the Hasmoneans, under John Hyrcanus, destroyed the city (119 B.C.). After a long period without inhabitants, Samaria lived again under Pompey and the Romans (63 B.C.).

Long colonnaded street built by the emperor Severus at N.T. Sebaste (which was the O.T. city of Samaria).

Finally, Herod the Great obtained control of Samaria in 30 B.C. and made it one of the chief cities of his territory. Again, the city was resettled with people from distant places, this time mercenaries from Europe. Herod renamed the city Sebaste, using the Greek word for Augustus, the emperor. When the Jews revolted in 66 A.D., the Romans reconquered the city and destroyed it. The Romans later rebuilt Samaria, but the city never regained the prestige it once had.

Samaria is the only major city founded by Israel, the Northern Kingdom. Omri, the sixth king of Israel (885–874 B.C.), purchased the hill of Samaria for his royal residence. Shechem had been the capital of the Northern Kingdom until Jeroboam relocated it at Tirzah.

When Ahab, Omri's son, became king of Israel, he built an ivory palace at Samaria. Amos denounced him for doing this (Amos 6:1,4; 1 Kings 22:39). Jezebel influenced Ahab, her husband, to make the city the center for Baal worship (1 Kings 16:29–33). Jezebel also had many prophets of Yahweh killed in Samaria (1 Kings 18:2–4).

On two occasions, Benhadad, the king of Syria, besieged the city of Samaria; but both times he was unsuccessful (1 Kings 20; 2 Kings 6). Naaman, a Syrian leper, had come to Samaria to be healed by Elisha a short time prior to Ben hadad's attack (2 Kings 5).

Here Elijah destroyed the messengers of King Ahaziah, who were seeking the consultation of Baalzebub. He, likewise, prophesied of King Ahaziah's death (2 Kings 1). Later, Jehu killed Ahab's seventy sons in Samaria (2 Kings 10). Finally, Samaria fell to Assyria in 721 B.C. after a three years' siege (2 Kings 17:5, 18:9–12). See Assyria. This destruction came after many prophecies concerning its sins and many warnings about its doom (Isa. 8:4; 9:8–14; 10:9; 28:1–13; 36:19; Jer. 23:13; Ezek. 23:1–4; Hos. 7; 13:16; Amos 3:12; Mic. 1:6).

While the term Samaria was first identified with the city founded by Omri, it soon became associated with the entire region surrounding the city, the tribal territory of Manasseh and Ephraim. Finally, the name Samaria became synonymous with the entire Northern Kingdom (1 Kings 13:32; Jer. 31:5). After the Assyrian conquest, Samaria began to shrink in size. By New Testament times, it became identified with the central region of Palestine, with Galilee to the north and Judea to the south.

The name Samaritans originally was identified with the Israelites of the Northern Kingdom (2 Kings 17:29). When the Assyrians conquered Israel and exiled 27,290 Israelites, a "remnant of Israel" remained in the land. Assyrian captives from distant places also settled there (2 Kings 17:24). This led to the intermarriage of some, though not all, Jews with Gentiles and to widespread worship of foreign gods. By the time the Byzantine church at Sebaste (Samaria) built over the traditional site of John the Baptist's burial place.

Jews returned to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple and the walls of Jerusalem, Ezra and Nehemiah refused to let the Samaritans share in the experience (Ezra 4:1–3; Neh. 4:7). The old antagonism between Israel to the north and Judah to the south intensified the quarrel.

The Jewish inhabitants of Samaria identified Mount Gerizim as the chosen place of God and the only center of worship, calling it the "navel of the earth" because of a tradition that Adam sacrificed there. Their scriptures were limited to the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible. Moses was regarded as the only prophet and intercessor in the final judgment. They also believed that 6,000 years after creation, a Restorer would arise and would live on earth for 110 years. On the Judgment Day, the righteous would be resurrected in paradise and the wicked roasted in eternal fire.

In the days of Christ, the relationship between the Jews and the Samaritans was greatly strained (Luke 9:52–54; 10:25–37; 17:11–19; John 8:48). The animosity was so great that the Jews bypassed Samaria as they traveled between Galilee and Judea. They went an extra distance through the barren land of Perea on the eastern side of the Jordan to avoid going through Samaria. Yet Jesus rebuked His disciples for their hostility to the Samaritans (Luke 9:55–56), healed a Samaritan leper (Luke 17:16), honored a Samaritan for his neighborliness (Luke 10:30–37), praised a Samaritan for his gratitude (Luke 17:11–18), asked a drink of a Samaritan woman (John 4:7), and preached to the Samaritans (John 4:40–42). Then in Acts 1:8, Jesus challenged His disciples to witness in Samaria. Philip, a deacon, opened a mission in Samaria (Acts 8:5).

A small Samaritan community continues to this day to follow the traditional worship near Shechem. See Israel; Samballat. Donald R. Potts

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH The canon or "Bible" of the Samaritans, who revere the Torah as God's revelation to Moses on Mount Sinai and do not regard the rest of the Hebrew Bible as canon. The Samaritans regarded themselves as the true heirs (as versus Judahites) to the Mosaic tradition. Their scripture includes Genesis through Deuter-

Samaritans of the twentieth century celebrating their Passover at Mount Gerizim.

SAMGAR-NEBO (Săm' gär-nē' bō) Personal name of Babylonian official who accompanied Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon in capturing Jerusalem in 587 B.C. according to Hebrew text (Jer. 39:3). Many modern scholars seek to reconstruct the original Akkadian name. Such reconstructions relate the name to a city—Simmagir—known from other Babylonian records. This would mean the previous person in the list—Nergal-sharezer—was from the city (REB, compare NIV). Other scholars see Samgar-Nebo as a title describing the position Nergal-sharezer held.

SAMGAR-NEBU (Săm' gär-nē' bū) NAS transliteration of Hebrew for Samgar-nebo.

SAMLAH (Săm' lah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "coat." Ruler of Edom (Gen. 36:36).

SAMOS (Sā' mŏs) Place name meaning, "height." Small island (only 27 miles long) located in the Aegean Sea about a mile off the coast of Asia Minor near the peninsula of Trogyllium. In the strait between Samos and the mainland, the Greeks defeated the Persian fleet about 479 B.C. and turned the tide of power in the Ancient Near East. Traveling from Jerusalem to Rome, Paul's ship either put in at Samos or anchored just offshore (Acts 20:15).

SAMOTHRACE (Săm ō thrāce') Place name perhaps meaning, "height of Thrace." Mountainous island in northern Aegean Sea thirty-eight miles south of coast of Thrace with peaks rising 5,000 feet above sea level. Paul spent a night there on his second missionary journey as he headed to Philippi (Acts 16:11). A famous mystery cult was practiced there.

SAMOTHRACIA (Săm ō thrā' cī à) KJV, TEV spelling of Samothrace.

SAMSON (Săm' son) Personal name meaning, "Of the sun." Last of the major judges over Israel about 1100 B.C. (Judg. 13:1—16:31). The son of Manoah of the tribe of Dan, Samson was a legendary hero who frequently did battle against the Philistines who, at that time, "had dominion over Israel" (14:4).

Before his conception, Samson was dedicated by his parents to be a lifelong Nazirite (13:3–7), a person especially devoted or consecrated. Part of the vow included letting the hair grow and abstaining from wine and strong drink. Samson's legendary strength did not come from his long hair. Rather, it came through the "Spirit of the Lord" who would "come upon" him to enable him to perform amazing feats of physical strength (14:6,19; 15:14; compare 16:28–29). Although a Nazirite, Samson did not live a devoted life. More frequently, he was careless in his vow. He secretly disobeyed the prohibition of approaching a dead body (14:8–9), had immoral relations with a Gaza harlot (16:1), and with Delilah (16:4–20).

Samson is portrayed as a headstrong young man with little or no self-control. None of his exploits show him as a religious enthusiast. In fact, every major crisis in his life resulting in clashes against the Philistines were brought on by his relationships with Philistine women. Samson's fascination with Delilah finally wrought his downfall. The lords of the Philistines offered her eleven hundred pieces of silver from each of them to find out the source of Samson's strength. In her first three attempts, Samson gave her false answers. However, he did not seem to equate the Philistines binding him each time with betrayal by Delilah. Finally, she coaxed the truth from him, and Samson was captured.

Ultimately, Samson proved little more than a thorn in the flesh to the Philistines. He never really freed Israel from the dominion of the Philistines. In his death, he killed more Philistines than the total he had killed during his life (16:30). He is listed with the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11:32, because his strength came from God and because in his dying act, he demonstrated his faith. See Nazirite; Judge; Judges, Book of; Spirit.

SAMUEL (Să' mū ĕl) Personal name in the Ancient Near East meaning, "Sumu is God" but understood in Israel as "The name is God," "God is exalted," or "son of God." The last judge, first king-maker, priest, and prophet who linked the period of the judges with the monachy (about 1066–1000 B.C.). Born in answer to barren Hannah's tearful prayer (1 Sam. 1:10), Samuel was dedicated to the Lord before his birth (1:11) as a "loan" for all his life (1:28; 2:20). Eli raised Samuel at the Shiloh sanctuary (1 Sam. 2:11). As a child, Samuel grew "both in stature and in favor with the Lord and with men" (1 Sam. 2:26 NAS; compare Luke 2:52). Samuel met God and received his first prophetic mission as a young lad (1 Sam. 3:1,11–14). God's initial word to Samuel concerned God's rejection of Eli's family from service as priests as punishment for the sins of Eli's sons.

Samuel was responsible for a revival of the Shiloh sanctuary (1 Sam. 3:21). Psalm 99:6–7 relates that God spoke with Samuel from out of the pillar of cloud as God had previously with Moses and Aaron. God "was with him and let none of his words fall to the ground" (1 Sam. 3:19; also 9:6). Jeremiah regarded Samuel and Moses as the two great intercessors of Israel (Jer. 15:1).

Following the death of Eli and his sons, Israel experienced twenty years (1 Sam. 7:2) of national sin and Philistine oppression. Samuel reemerged in the role of judge, calling Israel to repentance and delivering them from foreign domination. Samuel also exercised the judicial role of judge, administering justice at Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpah, and Ramah (1 Sam. 7:15–17).

Samuel served as the prototype for future prophets in tension with the kings of Israel and Judah. The sins of Samuel's sons and the Philistine threat led the elders of Israel to appeal to Samuel for a king "like all the nations" (1 Sam. 8:3,5,20). Samuel rightly understood this call for a king as rejection of God's rule (1 Sam. 8:7; 10:19). Samuel warned Israel of the dangers of a monarchy—forced labor, seizure of property, taxation (1 Sam. 8:10–18)—before anointing Saul as Israel's first king (1 Sam. 10:1). Samuel's recording of the rights and duties of kingship (1 Sam. 10:25) set the stage for later prophets to call their monarchs to task for disobedience to God's commands and for overstepping God's limits for kingship in Israel. Samuel foreshadowed Elijah in his call for rain during the wheat harvest, the usual dry season, as vindication of his word of judgment concerning Israel's demand for a king (1 Sam. 12:17–18).

Tel Rama (Ramah)—birthplace of Samuel the prophet.

Samuel's relations with Saul highlight the conditional nature of kingship in Israel. Israel's king was designated by God and served at God's pleasure. Saul's presumption in offering burnt sacrifice before battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:8–15) and his disregard of God's command to leave no survivors among the Amalekites or their flocks (1 Sam. 15) occasioned Samuel's declaration of God's rejection of Saul's kingship. Obeying God's call to anoint another king amounted to treason in Saul's eyes, and Samuel had concerns for his life. Samuel was, however, obedient in anointing David as king over Israel (1 Sam. 16:13). Later when Saul sought David's life, David took refuge with Samuel and his band of prophets at Ramah (1 Sam. 19:18–24). Finally, Samuel's death brought national mourning (1 Sam. 25:1; 28:3). It also left Saul without access to God's word. In desperation he acknowledged Samuel's power and influence by seeking to commune with Samuel's spirit (1 Sam. 28). Thus in life and death Samuel cast a long shadow over Israel's history of worship, rule, prophecy, and justice. Chris Church

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF Ninth and tenth books of English Bible following the order of the earliest Greek translation but combined as the eighth book of the Hebrew canon named for the major figure of its opening section. Along with Joshua, Judges, and Kings, the Books of Samuel form the "former prophets" in the Hebrew Bible. Many modern scholars refer to these four books as the Deuteronomistic History, since they show how the teaching of Deuteronomy worked itself out in the history of God's people.

The Bible does not say who wrote these books. Many Bible students think Samuel along with Nathan and Gad had major input, pointing to 1 Chronicles 29:29 as evidence. See Chronicles, Books of. Others think the books had a long history of composition with various narratives or narrative sources being composed from the time of the events until the time of the Exile, when the "former prophets" were gathered into one collection. Such individual narratives would include Shiloh (1 Sam. 1—3), the Ark (1 Sam. 4:1—7:1), the Rise of Kingship (1 Sam. 9:1—11:15), Battles of Saul (1 Sam. 13—15), the History of David's Rise to Power (1 Sam. 16:14—2 Sam. 5:25), and the Succession to the Throne of David (2 Sam. 9—20; 1 Kings 1—2).

The Books of Samuel arose as a reflection upon the nature of human kingship in light of Israel's tradition that Yahweh was their king. See King, Kingship; Kingdom of God. They answered a first generation's burning questions. Had God rejected David as He had rejected Saul? Why was the young Solomon named king rather than his older brothers? Could the violent measures Solomon undertook when he assumed the throne be justified? To answer the questions, the Books tell the narrative of three major figures: Samuel, Saul, and David. See David; Samuel; Saul. The story of each combines tragedy, despair, and direction toward future hope. The dangers of kingship (1 Sam. 8) and the hope for kingship (2 Sam. 7) form the narrative tension for the Books. The final chapter (2 Sam. 24) does not solve the tension. It points further ahead to the building of the Temple, where God's presence and Israel's worship can be at the center of life leading the king to be God's humble, forgiven servant.

The Books of Samuel thus point to several theological themes that can guide God's people through the generations.

Leadership is the guiding theme. Can God's people continue with a loosely knit organization as in the days of the judges, or must they have "a king to judge us like all the nations" (1 Sam. 8:5)? Samuel does not explicitly answer the question. God does not wholeheartedly accept kingship as the only alternative. Kingship means the people have rejected God (1 Sam. 8:7; 10:19). Still, kingship can flourish if the people and the king follow God (1 Sam. 12:14–15, 20–25). Saul showed God's threats could be soon realized (1 Sam. 13:13–14). A new family from a new tribe would rule. This did not mean eternal war among tribes and families. A covenant could bind the two families together (1 Sam. 20; 23:16–18). Anger on one side does not require anger from the other as David's reactions to Saul continually show, summarized in 1 Samuel 24:17: "Thou art more righteous than I: for thou has rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." David neither planned the demise of Saul and his family nor rewarded those who did (2 Sam. 4:9–12). David established his kingdom and sought to establish a house for God (2 Sam. 7:2). The king, however, gave in to God's plan to establish David's house and let his son build the house for God (2 Sam. 7:13). The king's response shows the nature of true leadership. He expresses praise for God not pride in personal achievement (2 Sam. 7:18–29).

Working through His promise to David, God then worked to establish His own kingdom among His people. He could work through an imperfect king who committed the outlandish sin with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 11) because the king was willing to confess his sin (2 Sam. 12:13). The rule of God's king does not promise perfect peace. Even David's own household revolted against him. Human pride and ego did not determine history. God's promise to David could not be overthrown.

Other themes are subordinate to that of leadership for Israel. The call for covenant commitment and obedience, the forgiveness and mercy of God, the sovereignty of God in human history, the significance of prayer and praise, the faithfulness of God to fulfill prophecy, the need for faithfulness to human leaders, the holy presence of God among His people, the nature of human friendship, and the importance of family relationships all echo forth from these books.

Outline

I. God Gives His People an Example of Dedicated Leadership (1:1—7:17).
   - A. A dedicated leader is the answer to parental prayers (1:1–28).
   - B. A dedicated leader comes from grateful, sacrificial parents who worship the incomparable God (2:1–10).
   - C. A dedicated leader is a priest who faithfully serves God rather than seeking selfish interests (2:11–36).
   - D. A dedicated leader is a prophet who is called by the Word of God and who faithfully delivers the Word of God (3:1—4:15).
   - E. Superstitious use of religious relics is not a substitute for dedicated leadership (4:16–22).
   - F. Only a dedicated priest, not foreign gods nor disobedient persons, can stand before God (5:1—7:2).
   - G. A dedicated political leader is a man of prayer (7:3–17).

II. Human Kingship Represents a Compromise with God by a People Who Have Rejected the Kingship of God (8:1—15:35).
   - A. Hereditary kingship is a rejection of God which hurts His people and separates them from God (8:1–22; compare Judg. 8:22—9:57).
   - B. A dedicated king is a humble person from a humble family who knows he owes his position to God's choice (9:1—10:27).
   - C. The dedicated king is a Spirit-filled deliverer (11:1–15).
   - D. The dedicated leader is morally pure and uses the history of God's people to call them to obedience (12:1–25).
   - E. Kingship depends on obedience to God, not human wisdom (13:1–23).
   - F. A dedicated leader is used by God to unify and deliver His people (14:1–23).

F. God's victorious servant deals kindly with those who helped and those who opposed him (19:1–40).
G. Victory cannot remove rivalries among God's people (19:41—20:26).

IV. God's People Learn from the Experience and Example of God's Leader (21:1—24:25).
A. God blesses the leader who is faithful to the tradition of His people (21:1–22).
B. God's leader praises God for His deliverance (22:1–51; compare Ps. 18).
C. God's leader teaches what he has learned—his experiences with God (23:1–7).

D. God's leader depends on brave, faithful associates (23:8–39).
E. The leader's foolish decisions bring punishment even on a repentant leader (24:1–17).
F. Proper worship brings God's mercy for His people (24:18–25).

SANBALLAT (Săn băl' lăt) Akkadian personal name meaning, "Sin (the god) has healed." According to the Elephantine Papyri from the reign of Darius I, Sanballat was governor of Samaria around 407 BC. He had sons whose names included the term Yahweh, for the God of Israel. Although addressed by his Babylonian name (probably acquired during the Exile), Sanballat was a practicing Jew. His daughter was married to the grandson of Jerusalem's high priest (Neh. 13:28), indicating harmonious relations between Judah and Samaria at that time. Nehemiah referred to Sanballat as the "Horonite," suggesting a connection with Upper or Lower Beth-horon. (Neh. 2:10). These cities contolled the major highway between Jerusalem and the Mediterrean Sea. If Sanballat had influence with these towns, he could greatly affect Jerusalem's economy. Sanballat, in league with Tobiah and Shemiah, opposed Nehemiah's rebuilding of Jerusalem. If the Holy City regained prominence, it would erode the powers of the surrounding cities. The struggle appears to have been more political than racial or religious. Papyri from Wadi Daliyeh appear to indicate two later Sanballats also served as governors of Samaria.

S

SANCTIFICATION The process of being made holy resulting in a changed life-style for the believer. The English word sanctification comes from the Latin santificatio, meaning the act/process of making holy, consecrated. In the Greek New Testament, the root hag- is the basis of hagiasmos, "holiness," "consecration," "sanctification"; hagiosyne, "holiness"; hagiotes, "holiness"; hagiazo "to sanctify," "consecrate," "treat as holy," "purify"; and hagios, "holy," "saint." The root idea of the Greek stem is to stand in awe of something or someone. The New Testament usage is greatly dependent upon the Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, for meaning. The hag- words in the Septuagint mostly translated the Hebrew qadosh, "separate, contrasting with the profane." Thus, God is separate; things and people dedicated to Him and to His use are separate. The moral implications of this word came into focus with the prophets and became a major emphasis in the New Testament. See Holy.

Old Testament In Old Testament thought the focus of holiness (qadosh) is upon God. He is holy (Ps. 99:9); His name is holy (Pss. 99:3; 111:9) and may not be profaned (Lev. 20:3). Since God exists in the realm of the holy rather than the profane, all that pertains to Him must come into that same realm of holiness. This involves time, space, objects, and people.

Certain times are sanctified in that they are set apart especially to the Lord: the sabbath (Gen. 2:3), the various festivals (Lev. 23:4–44), the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:12). By strictly observing the regulations governing each, Israel sanctified (or treated as holy) these special times of the year. Also the land of Canaan (Ex. 15:13), as well as Jerusalem (Isa. 11:9), was holy to the Lord and was not to be polluted by sinful conduct (Lev. 18:27–28). The tabernacle/Temple and all the objects related to it were holy (Ex. 25—Num. 10; Ezek. 40—48). The various gifts brought in worship were sanctified. These fall into three groupings: those whose sanctity was inherent (for example, firstborn males of female animals and human beings, Ex. 13:2,11–13; Lev. 27:26); objects whose sanctification was required (for example, tithes of crops and pure animals, Lev. 27:30–33; Deut. 26:13); and gifts whose sanctification was voluntary (see partial list in Lev. 27). The dedication of these objects mostly occurred not at some ritual in the sanctuary but at a prior declaration of dedication (Judg. 17:3; Lev. 27:30–33;).

Of course, the priests and Levites who functioned in the sanctuary, beginning with Aaron, were sanctified to the Lord by the anointing of oil (Ex. 30:30–32; 40:12–15). Additionally, the Nazirite was consecrated (Num. 6:8), although only for a specified period of time. Finally, the nation of Israel was sanctified to the Lord as a holy people (Ex. 19:6; Deut. 7;6; 14:2,21; 26:19). This holiness was closely identified with obedience to the Law of Holiness in Lev. 17—26, which includes both ritual and ethical commands. In the prophets especially, the ethical responsibility of being holy in conduct came to the forefront (Isa. 5; Jer. 5—7; Amos 4—5; Hos. 11).

Sanctification in the New Testament The same range of meanings reflected by the Septuagint usage is preserved in the New Testament but with extension of meaning in certain cases. Objects may be made holy (Matt. 23:17,19; 1 Tim. 4:5) or treated as holy (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2), but, mostly, the word group stresses the personal dimension of holiness. Here, the two streams of Old Testament meaning are significant: the cultic and the ethical. Sanctification is vitally linked to the salvation experience and is concerned with the moral/spiritual obligations assumed in that experience. We were set apart to God in conversion, and we are living out that dedication to God in holiness.

The link of New Testament thought to Old Testament antecedents in the cultic aspect of sanctification is most clearly seen in Hebrews. Christ's crucifixion makes possible the moving of the sinner from the profane to the holy (that is, sanctifies, makes holy) so that the believer can become a part of the temple where God dwells and is worshiped (Heb. 13:11–16; 2:9–11; 10:10,14,29). Paul (Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 1:2; 6:11; Eph. 5:26–27; 2 Thess. 2:13) and Peter (1 Pet. 1:2) both affirmed the work of the Holy Spirit in conversion as a sanctification, a making the believer holy so as to come before God in acceptance. Especially in Paul, justification and sanctification are closely related concepts. See Justification.

Hebrews also emphasizes the ethical aspect of sanctification. Sanctification/holiness is to be pursued as an essential aspect of the believer's life (Heb. 12:14); the blood of sanctification must not be defiled by sinful conduct (10:26–31). Paul stressed both the individual's commitment to holy living (Rom. 6:19–22; 1 Thess. 4:3–8; 2 Cor. 7:1) and the enabling power of God for it (1 Thess. 3:13; 4:8). The summation of the ethical imperative is seen in Peter's use (1 Pet. 1:15–16) of Leviticus 11:44; 19:2; 20:7: "Be ye holy; for I am holy."

SANCTUARY (Sānc' tū ār ȳ) Place set aside as sacred and holy, especially a place of worship. On sites where the patriarchs had erected altars, the people of Israel later built shrines and temples to commemorate the encounters with God. Specifically, the tabernacle and the Temple in Jerusalem were revered as sanctuaries.

SANDALS, SHOES Items worn to protect the feet. Ancient shoes are well known from paintings, sculptures, and carved reliefs. The shoe was considered the humblest article of clothing and could be bought cheaply. Two types of shoes existed: slippers of soft leather and the more popular sandals with a hard leather sole. Thongs secured the sandal across the insole and between the toes. Although shoes could be bought at a low price, they were often repaired by the poor. Shoes were removed at the doorway of the tent or house, or during a period of mourning. Shoes were also removed as evidence of humility in the presence of kings. The removal of the guest's sandals was the job of the lowliest servant who was also required to wash the dusty and soiled feet of the visitor. See Foot Washing. In early Israel, legal contracts and oaths were often sealed with the removal and giving of a shoe by one party (Ruth 4:7). Going barefoot was a sign of poverty and reproach. Isaiah walked barefooted to symbolize the impending poverty of Israel before the judgment of God (Isa. 20:2). During New Testament times, Jewish practice forbade the wearing of sandals with multilayered leather soles nailed together, as this was the shoe worn by Roman soldiers.

SANHEDRIN (Săn hē' drĭn) The highest Jewish council in the first century. The council had 71 members and was presided over by the high priest. The Sanhedrin included both of the main Jewish parties among its membership. Since the high priest presided, the Sadducean priestly party seems to have predominated; but some leading Pharisees also were members (Acts 5:34; 23:1–9).

The word Sanhedrin is usually translated "council" in the English translations of the Bible. Because of the predominance of the chief priests in the Sanhedrin, at times the words chief priests seem to refer to the action of the Sanhedrin, even though the name itself is not used.

According to Jewish tradition, the Sanhedrin began with the 70 elders appointed by Moses in Numbers 11:16 and was reorganized by Ezra after the Exile. However, the Old Testament provides no evidence of a council that functioned like the Sanhedrin of later times. Thus, the Sanhedrin had its origin sometime during the centuries between the Testaments. See Intertestamental History; Jewish Parties.

During the first century, the Sanhedrin exerted authority under the watchful eye of the Romans. Generally, the Roman governor allowed the Sanhedrin considerable autonomy and authority. The trial of Jesus, however, shows that the Sanhedrin did not have the authority to condemn people to death (John 18:31). Later, Stephen was stoned to death after a hearing before the Sanhedrin, but this may have been more a mob action than a legal execution authorized by the Sanhedrin (Acts 6:12–15; 7:54–60).

The Gospels describe the role of the Sanhedrin in the arrest, trials, and condemnation of Jesus. The Sanhedrin, under the leadership of Caiaphas the high priest, plotted to have Jesus killed (John 11:47–53). The chief priests conspired with Judas to betray Jesus (Matt. 26:14–16). After His arrest they brought Jesus into the council (Luke 22:66). They used false witnesses to condemn Jesus (Matt. 26:59–60; Mark 14:55–56). They sent Him to Pilate and pressured Pilate into pronouncing the death sentence (Mark 15:1–15).

The Book of Acts describes how the Sanhedrin harassed and threatened the apostles. The healing of the man at the Temple and Peter's sermon attracted the attention of the chief priests. Peter and John were called before the council and warned not to preach anymore in the name of Jesus (Acts 4:5–21). When the apostles continued to preach, the council had them arrested (Acts 5:21,27). The wise counsel of Gamaliel caused the council to release the apostles with a beating and a warning (Acts 5:34–42). Stephen had to appear before the Sanhedrin on charges that sounded like the false charges against Jesus (Acts 6:12–15).

After Paul was arrested in Jerusalem, the Roman commander asked the council to examine Paul to decide what was Paul's crime (Acts 22:30; 23:28). Paul identified himself as a Pharisee who was on trial for his hope of resurrection. This involved the council in a debate of the divisive issue of the resurrection (Acts 23:1–9). The chief priests and elders were part of a plot to have Paul assassinated as he was led to another hearing before the council (Acts 23:13–15,20).

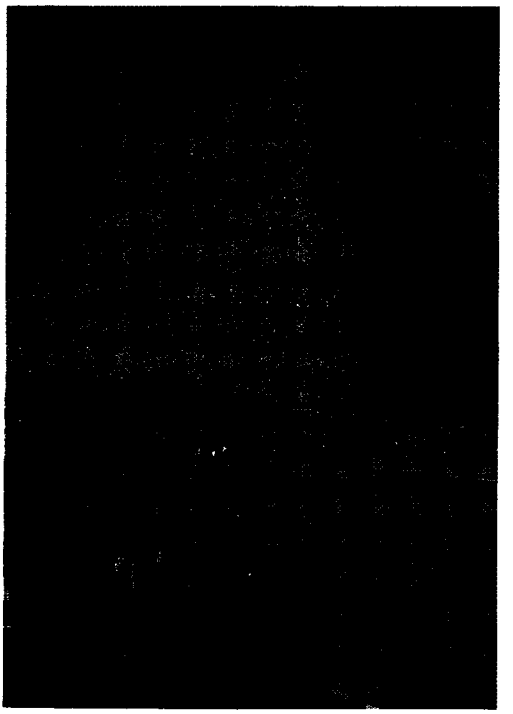
SANSANNAH (Săn săn' nah) Place name perhaps meaning, "branch of the date palm." Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:31). Modern khirbet esh-Shamshaniyat nine miles northwest of Beersheba. Apparently the same as Hazar-susah (Josh. 19:5) and Hazar-susim (1 Chron. 4:31), thus assigned to tribe of Simeon.

SAPH (Săph) Personal name perhaps meaning, "threshold." A giant the men of David killed (2 Sam. 21:18). See Giants; Rapha; Rephaim; Sibbechai.

SAPHIR (Sā' phīr) Place name meaning, "beautiful town." Town Micah lamented over (Mic. 1:11). Location is unknown; suggestions include khirbet el-Kom or tell Eitun. It must be near Lachish.



SAPPHIRA (Săp phī' rà) Personal name meaning, "beautiful" or "sapphire." See Ananias 1.

SAPPHIRE See Minerals and Metals.

SARAI (Sā rah) Personal name meaning, "princess." Wife and half sister of Abraham (Gen. 11:29—25:10). Sarah, first called Sarai, had the same father as Abraham. Marriages with half brothers were not uncommon in her time. Sarah traveled with Abraham from Ur to Haran. Then at the age of 65 she accompanied him to Canaan as Abraham followed God's leadership in moving to the land God had promised. During a famine in Canaan, Abraham and Sarah fled to Egypt. This was Abraham's first attempt to pass off Sarah as his sister rather than wife because he feared that he would be killed when the Egyptians saw Sarah's beauty. Consequently, the Pharaoh thought Sarah was Abraham's sister, took Sarah into court, and treated Abraham well. When the Lord sent serious disease on Pharaoh's household, he saw the deception and sent them away. The second trick about Abraham's relationship with Sarah was in the court of Abimelech, king of Gerar, who also took in Sarah. God intervened in Abimelech's dream and protected Sarah. He sent them away with the right to live there and with a gift for Sarah.

In her grief over her barrenness, Sarah gave her maid Hagar to Abraham in the hope of an heir; but she expressed resentment when Hagar conceived. When Sarah was almost 90 years old, God changed her name and promised her a son. A year later, she bore Isaac.

At the age of 127, Sarah died at Hebron, where she was buried in the cave in the field of Machpelah near Mamre.

In the New Testament, Romans 4:19 refers to Sarah's barrenness as evidence of Abraham's faith; Romans 9:9 cites her conception of Isaac as an example of God's power in fulfilling a promise. Galatians 4:21–31 contrasts her with Hagar without naming her, Hebrews 11:11 lauds her faith, and 1 Peter 3:6 describes her relationship with Abraham. Judith Wooldridge SARAPH (Sā′ răph) Personal name meaning, "burning." Member of tribe of Judah who exercised power in Moab (1 Chron. 4:22).

SARDIS (Sär′ dĭs) City of one of the seven churches addressed in the Revelation (3:1–6). The church was condemned as being "dead," perhaps a reference to its ineffectiveness in the world. However, some of its members were commended (v. 4). The city of the same name was the capital of the province of Lydia and was located in the Hermus River valley northeast of Ephesus. An impressive acropolis overlooks the site. One of the major features there in New Testament times was a temple to Artemis, the goddess of love and fertility. See Asia Minor.

SARDITE (Sär′ dīte) Descendant of or member of clan of Sered (Num. 26:26).

SARDIUS (Sär′ dī ŭs) Precious stone sometimes used to translate Hebrew 'odem, "red," and Greek sardion. Other translators use "carnelian" or "ruby." See "ruby" under Minerals and Metals.

SARDONYX (Sär′ dō nŷx) Precious stone (Rev. 21:20), a form of agate. See "Onyx" under Minerals and Metals.

SARGON (Sär' gŏn) Akkadian royal name meaning, "the king is legitimate." An ancient throne name first taken by the king of Akkad about 2100 B.C. In 722 B.C., Sargon II of Assyria succeeded his brother, Shalmaneser V. His father was the famous king, Tiglath-pileser III. Sargon finished the destruction of Samaria begun by his brother. See Isaiah 20:1. He deported the people of Israel to Media and other parts of the Middle East. Sargon then launched military campaigns against King Midas of Muski in southeast Asia Minor and against the kingdom of Urartu. He conquered both. Sargon was succeeded by his son, Senneracherib. See Assyria; Israel.

SARID (Sā' rĭd) Place name meaning, "survivor." Border town of tribe of Zebulun (Josh. 19:10). Spelled Sedud by some early versions, Sarid is probably modern tell Shadud at the northern edge of the Jezreel Valley about six miles northeast of Megiddo and five miles southeast of Nazareth.

SARON (Sā' rŏn) Greek transliteration of Sharon (Acts 9:35). See Sharon.

SARSECHIM (Sär' sē chĭm) Babylonian personal name or title possibly meaning, "overseer of black slaves" or "overseer of the mercenary troops." Often seen as copyist's change from Nebushasban (Jer. 39:13). A Babylonian leader during capture of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (Jer. 39:3). Compare translations. See Rab-saris.

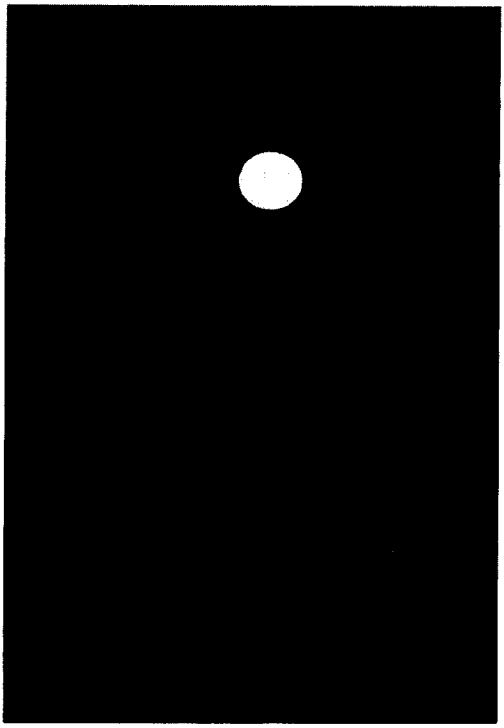
SARUCH (Sā' rŭch) Greek transliteration of Serug (Luke 3:35).



SATAN (Sā' tan) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning, "adversary." The Hebrew term appears in Numbers 22:22,32; 1 Samuel 29:4; 2 Samuel 19:22; 1 Kings 5:4; 11:14,23,25; Psalm 109:6, normally translated in English as adversary or accuser. In Job 1—2; Zechariah 3:2; and 1 Chronicles 21:1 the same term is translated as a proper name. See Devil, Satan, Evil, Demonic.

SATRAP(Y) (Să' trăp ȳ) A political office in the Persian Empire comparable to governor. A satrap's territory was called a satrapy. KJV translated the office, "lieutenants" (Ezra 8:36). These officials aided the people of Israel in rebuilding Jerusalem and the Temple. At the height of the Persian rule, there were at least twenty satrapies. See Persia.

SATYR (Sā' tȳr) A hairy, demonic figure with the appearance of a goat, translating a Hebrew term otherwise translated, "hairy" or "male goat." Bible students differ in interpreting passages as to whether a demonic figure or a normal animal is meant. Israelites apparently sacrificed to such desert-dwelling demons, since they had to have a law forbidding such sacrifice (Lev. 17:7). Some have even interpreted the scapegoat rites (Lev. 16:20–22) as sending Israel's sins back to their author, a desert demon with a different name from that translated, "satyr." Jeroboam I (926–909 B.C.) appointed priests to serve these demons (2 Chron. 11:15). Here idols in the forms of goats may be intended as parallel to the famous calves Jeroboam built. Isaiah promised that Babylon would become so desolate the desert-dwelling demons would live in the ruins (Isa. 13:21; compare 34:14). Some commentators read 2 Kings 23:8 to refer to worship places for these demons at a gate in Jerusalem (compare REB). A similar reality is expressed by a different Hebrew word in Deuteronomy 32:17; Psalm 106:37. Compare Matthew 12:43; Mark 5:13; Luke 11:24; Revelation 18:2. Lilith (Isa. 34:14 NRSV) may also be a name for the desert demons.

SAUL Sāūl) Personal name meaning, "asked for." First king of Israel and the Hebrew name of Paul, the apostle. See Paul.

Old Testament The Hebrew name Sha' ul is used of four persons in the Old Testament. It is usually rendered Shaul for a king of Edom (Gen. 36:37–38), the last son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10), and a Levite of the Kohathites (1 Chron. 6:24). Saul, however, primarily refers to the first king of a united Israel, a tall and handsome son of Kish from the tribe of Benjamin (1 Sam. 9:1–2,21). Chosen by God (1 Sam. 9:15–17) and secretly annointed by Samuel (10:1), Saul was later selected publicly by lot (10:17–24). Despite some people's skepticism (10:27), he proved himself an able leader by delivering the city of Jabesh-gilead and was acclaimed king at Gilgal (11:1–15).

The numbers in 1 Samuel 13:1 are incomplete in the Hebrew text, but Saul's reign is generally dated about 1020–1000 B.C. He made his capital at "Gibeah of Saul" ("Saul's hill," 1 Sam. 11:4), probably tell el-Ful, three miles north of Jerusalem where excavations have uncovered contemporary foundations of a modest fortresslike palace. From Gibeah, Saul drove the Philistines from the hill country (13:19—14:23) and fought other enemies of Israel (14:47–48).

A tragic figure, Saul's heart was initially changed; he had even prophesied (1 Sam. 10:9–13). See Prophets. His presumptuous offering (13:8–14), however, and violation of a holy war ban led to his break with Samuel and rejection by God (15:7–23). The spirit of the Lord left Saul and was replaced by an evil spirit which tormented him. David is introduced as a musician who soothed him by playing the lyre (16:14–23). After the Goliath episode, Saul became jealous and fearful of David (18:7,12), eventually making several spontaneous and indirect attempts on David's life (18:10–11,25; 19:1,9–11). Saul's fits of rage, his obsession with David, and the slaughter of the priests at Nob (22:17–19), make it appear as though he suffered from some sort of psychotic state. His final wretched condition is betrayed by his consultation of the witch at En-dor (28:7–8). The following day, Saul and three sons were killed at the hands of the Philistines on Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31). Saul's body was beheaded and hung on the walls of Beth-shan, from whence it was rescued and buried by the grateful inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead (31:8–13).

The enigma of Saul was sensed by David who refused to lift his hand against "the Lord's annointed" (1 Sam. 26:9–11,23) and at his death provided a fitting elegy (2 Sam. 1:17–27).

New Testament Though the king Saul is mentioned in passing, most occurrances of the name in the New Testament refer to the Hebrew name of the apostle Paul. Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

SAVIOR One who saves, used with various shades of meaning, ranging from deliverer to healer and benefactor. In the Old Testament God Himself and no other is savior (Isa. 43:11; 45:21; Hos. 13:4), though individuals such as Moses and the judges may serve as agents of God's deliverance. God reveals His role as savior primarily through the Exodus from Egypt and provision for Israel during the wilderness years (Hos. 13:4–6). In the New Testament, savior continues as a title of God; indeed, God is the savior in a full third of the New Testament cases (Luke 1:47; 1 Tim. 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 1:3; 2:10; 3:4; Jude 25). The New Testament, however, reveals God as savior primarily in the Christ event. Savior also appears as a title of Christ. The title appears only twice in the Gospels. There Christ is a savior for the outcasts of Israel (Luke 2:11) and the savior of the world (John 4:42; also 1 John 4:14). In Acts Jesus is twice described as the savior of Israel (Acts 5:31; 13:23). Here Jesus' saving role involves giving "repentance . . . and forgiveness of sins" (Acts 5:31; compare Matt. 1:21). Paul anticipated Christ's coming again as savior (Phil. 3:20). Ephesians 5:23 presents Christ as savior of the church. Over one half of the references to Christ as savior occur in the Pastorals and 2 Peter. The increased usage of savior as a Christological title in the later New Testament writings and especially in the postapostolic church perhaps results from the needs of apologetics and evangelism. In a pagan world offering numerous "sav-

iors" such as the pagan gods Zeus and Asclepius, the Roman emperor, and various philosophers, the church witnessed to Christ as the savior who could rescue humanity from the penalty and power of sin. See Salvation. Chris Church

SCALE A skin disease involving flaking of the scalp. See Itch; Scall.

SCALES Instrument for weighing materials. See Balances; Weights and Measures.

SCALL KJV term for a skin disease (Lev. 13:30–37; 14:54). The basic Hebrew term means, "to tear away, pull loose." The disease produced head sores, itching, hair thinning, and hair turning yellow. Modern translations refer to a scale or itch. Some scholars think favus is the disease described; others speak of ringworm or eczema. See Itch.

SCAPEGOAT Animal that carried away the sins of the people into the wilderness on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:8,10,26). On the Day of Atonement, when the high priest went once a year into the holy of holies to offer sacrifices for the sins of his family and for all the people, two goats were brought before him. By lot, one was chosen to be "for the Lord." This goat was slain as a sin offering, and its blood was sprinkled on the cultic objects to help cleanse the altar, the sanctuary, and the tent of meeting from defilements of the past year.

The second goat was said to be "for Azazel." The word Azazel is usually interpreted to mean "the goat of removal," or scapegoat. However, the term may also refer to a rocky place in the desert or to a demon of the desert. By laying his hands on the goat's head, the priest transferred the sins of the people to it and then had the goat led away into the desert, picturing the removal of the sins.

In the Book of Enoch, Azazel is identified as the leader of the fallen angels who lies bound beneath rocks in the desert awaiting judgment. The goat is led to that area and thrown to its death from a cliff. See Intertestamental History; Pseudepigrapha.

Although the scapegoat is not mentioned by name in the New Testament, Hebrews 10:3–17 contrasts sanctification through the sacrifice of Christ with the blood of bulls and goats which can never take away sins. See Sanctification.

SCARLET Color used especially in clothing, often designating royal honor (Dan. 5:7,16,29). See Cloth, Clothing; Colors; Crimson; Dyeing.

SCEPTER (Scĕp′ tĕr) The official staff or baton of a king, symbolic of his authority. It probably was descended from the ancient club carried by the prehistoric rulers. Ancient Middle Eastern scepters were depicted in Scripture as the striking power of the king (Num. 24:17). As part of the royal regalia, the scepter was extended to a visitor or dignitary (Esth. 5:2) to signal approval of the visit and allow the person to approach the throne. Scepters were decorated elaborately with gold and precious stones. The shapes varied from wide short maces to long slender poles, usually with ornate heads. The type of scepter usually differed from one kingdom to the next.

SCEVA (Scē′ vȧ) Jewish "high priest" in Ephesus with seven sons who tried unsuccessfully to exorcise demons in Jesus' name as Paul had done (Acts 19:14). The evil spirit jumped on them instead. No such Jewish high priest is known from other sources, particularly not one living in Ephesus. The title may be the result of a copyist or a title Sceva took upon himself to impress leaders of other religions in Ephesus.

SCHOOL Place and agency for education, particularly of children. The word school is not mentioned in the Old Testament and only once in the New where the reference is to a Greek school (Acts 19:9). Until the Exile in Babylon (586 B.C.), the education of children was like that of all ancient peoples: it was centered in the home. The main concern of the Jewish people was for religious education in the home.

A new stage in Jewish education came about due to the catastrophe of the Babylonian Exile when the upper classes of Judea were transported to Babylon. The Exiles assembled on the sabbath for prayer and worship. As time went by, buildings were erected in which the people could meet. These little gatherings were the origin of the synagogue, which ultimately became the center of Jewish religious life after the Exile. In the synagogue the scribes taught the Law to the people. Children were not taught in the synagogue until much later times. The father was responsible for transmitting what he had learned to his children.

The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to eradicate Judaism by force brought about the fierce nationalistic revolt of the Maccabees (Jewish patriots) in 168 B.C. See Intertestamental History. The Jews who had remained faithful learned a lesson. They saw that they needed schools for the young as well as adult classes for their fathers. Simon ben Shetah, the leader of the Pharisees, founded schools for boys of sixteen and seventeen to promote the study of the Scriptures. A century later, as an inevitable consequence, private schools for younger children appeared. After the destruction of Herod's Temple by Titus in A.D. 70 and the disappearance of the Jewish state after the revolt of Bar-Kochba in A.D. 135, public instruction was instituted for all children.

The elementary school, significantly called

Beth-hasepher, the "house of the book," was originally housed in some easily available room; but by A.D. 200, it had become firmly established in the synagogue. Boys entered at the age of six or seven and continued until thirteen. Here, study was wholly devoted to the written Law. This involved the learning of Hebrew, since Aramaic had long before replaced Hebrew as the everyday language of the people. Knowledge of the written word, in school as in the home, had the religious goal of bringing about obedience to the Law.

The school was not only a place of learning but a house of prayer; its aims were not cultural but religious. A strong sense of community responsibility, evidenced by an education tax on all parents, had by A.D. 200 opened all schools to the children of the poor. However, the Jewish school, like the Greek school, remained an independent fee-paying institution. See Education; Scribes; Synagogue; Torah. Jeff Cranford

SCHOOLMASTER Law's role until coming of Christ (Gal. 3:24–25 KJV). Other translations use "disciplinarian" (NRSV), "supervision" (NIV), "tutor" (NAS), "charge" (REB; TEV; compare NIV); "custodian" (RSV). See Custodian.

SCIENCE KJV term (Dan. 1:4; 1 Tim. 6:20) for knowledge. Scripture describes Daniel's knowledge with admiration and approval but warns against meaningless debate of issues for the sake of human pride not leading to useful knowledge. See Gnosticism.

SCOFFER People who show contempt for others. Habakkuk predicted the Babylonians would be scoffers as they conquered the Near East (Hab. 1:10). 2 Peter 3:3 warns that the last days will see scoffers laughing at the idea of Christ's return (compare Jude 18). The wisdom writers repeatedly warned their students not to become scoffers (Job 11:3; Prov. 9:7–12; 13:1; 14:6; 15:12; 19:25; 21:24; 22:10; 24:9; compare Ps. 1:1; Isa. 28:14,22). Still, God is a scoffer, jeering at the feeble efforts of those who oppose Him (Ps. 2:4; Prov. 3:34). Jesus endured scoffing (Luke 16:14; compare Acts 13:41).

SCORN, SCORNFUL Dislike which turns to contempt and derision. Scorn often appears in some Bible translations where scoff appears in others. See Scoffer. Scorn is often expressed by laughter (2 Kings 19:21; 2 Chron. 30:10). In deep trouble psalmists often felt themselves scorned (Pss. 22:6; 31:11; 39:8; 44:13; 80:6; 89:41; 119:22; 123:4). God scorns the wicked (Prov. 3:34), who, in turn, scorn Him (2 Sam. 12:14). When His people refuse to be faithful, God can scorn them and their worship, expressed in destruction (Lam. 2:7).

SCORPION (Scôr′ pī ŏn) Small invertebrate animal (buthus) known for the venom and sting in its narrow segmented tail. In the wilderness God protected Israel from scorpions (Deut. 8:15) and could protect His prophet from them (Ezek. 2:6). Scorpions gave their names to an insidious instrument of punishment with lashes and spikes. Rehoboam chose to use these to enforce his harsh policies (1 Kings 12:11,14).

SCORPION PASS See Akrabbim.

SCOURGE (Scoŭrge) A severe form of corporal punishment involving whipping and beating, usually was done with the victim tied to a post or bench and administered by a servant of the synagogue (if for religious reasons), or by a slave or soldier. John 19:1 uses this word for the beating given Jesus before His crucifixion. Matthew and Mark use a word meaning "flog" (a lesser punishment), while Luke says that Pilate offered to have Jesus "chastise[d]" (23:16), which was a still lighter punishment. The number of blows was set in Deuteronomy 25:3 at forty, but later reduced to thirty-nine. There were to be thirteen stokes on the chest and twenty-six on the back. Often the victim died from the beating.

SCREECH OWL English translation used for different Hebrew terms by different translations. KJV used for lilith (Isa. 34:14). See Satyr. NIV used it for Hebrew qippod (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14) but simply "owls" at Isaiah 14:23. NRSV used "screech owl" at Zephaniah 2:14. NIV also used "screech owl" for Hebrew tachmas (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). REB used "screech owl" for Hebrew yanshuph (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16; Isa. 34:11). Qippod may be Syrnium aluco or Scops giu. Others suggest the Arabian desert fowl (Ammoperdrix heyi). Tachmas cannot be identified with any certainty. Yanshoph may be the eared owl (Asiootus) or the Merops apiaster. See Owl.

SCRIBE Person trained in writing skills and used to record events and decisions (Jer. 36:26; 1 Chron. 24:6; Esth. 3:12). During the Exile in Babylon educated scribes apparently became the experts in God's written word, copying, preserving, and teaching it. Ezra was a scribe in this sense of expert in teaching God's word (Ezra 7:6). A professional group of such scribes developed by New Testament times, most being Pharisees (Mark 2:16). They interpreted the law, taught it to disciples, and were experts in cases where people were accused of breaking the law of Moses. They led in plans to kill Jesus (Luke 19:47) and heard His stern rebuke (Matt. 23). See Government; Sanhedrin; Jewish Parties; Secretary.

SCRIPTURE (Scrĭp′ tūre) Historic Judaeo-Christian name for the specific literature that the church receives as divine instruction. Scripture means "a writing" rendering the Latin scriptura and the Greek graphe. The term is used some fifty times in the New Testament for some or all of the Old Testament.

In the history of the church, the divine character of Scripture has been the great presupposition for the whole of Christian preaching and theology. This is apparent in the way the New Testament speaks about the Old Testament. New Testament writers often used formulas like "God says" and "the Holy Spirit says" to introduce Old Testament passages. For the New Testament authors, Scripture was the record of God speaking and revealing Himself to His people. Thus Scripture and God are so closely joined together that these writers could speak of Scripture doing what it records God as doing (Gal. 3:8; Rom. 9:17).

Because of their belief in the Scriptures' divine origin and content, the New Testament writers described it as "sure" (2 Pet. 1:19), trustworthy "of all acceptation" (1 Tim. 1:15), and "confirmed" (Heb. 2:3). Its word "endureth forever" (1 Pet. 1:24,25). Those who build their lives on Scripture "will not be disappointed" (Rom. 9:33 NAS). The Bible was written for "instruction" and "encouragement" (Rom. 15:4 NAS), to lead to saving faith (2 Tim. 3:15), to guide people toward godliness (2 Tim. 3:16b), and to equip believers for good works (2 Tim. 3:17).

The purpose of Scripture is to place men and women in a right standing before God and to enable believers to seek God's glory in all of life's activities and efforts. It is above all a book of redemptive history.

Scripture is not only a divine Book, but a divine-human Book. It is important to recognize that the biblical writers employed the linguistic resources available to them as they wrote to specific people with particular needs at particular times. The human authors were not lifted out of their culture or removed from their contexts. They functioned as members of believing communities, aware of God's leadership in their lives.

Scripture, comprised of 66 books, written by over 40 authors spanning almost 1,500 years, reveals to God's people the unifying history of His redeeming words and acts. The ultimate focus of Scripture is the incarnation and redemptive work of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is the center to which everything in Scripture is united and bound together—beginning and end, creation and redemption, humanity, the world, the fall, history, and future. SCURVY A disease of the gums resulting in loosening of and/or loss of teeth. KJV translation of Hebrew term for festering eruption (Lev. 21:20; 22:22), but in Deuteronomy 28:27 KJV used, "scab," while only there did RSV use "scurvy." NIV used, "festering sores." NAS used, "eczema."

SCYTHIANS (Scȳth′ ĭ ans) Nomadic, Indo-European people, speaking an Iranian dialect, who migrated from central Asia into southern Russia between 800 and 600 B.C. They were skilled horsemen who excelled in barbaric attack and plunder. Archaeologists have discovered abundant evidence of Scythian artistry in metalwork. Their forces, in pursuit of the Cimmerians, drove south through or around the Caucasus Mountains to the borders of Assyria. A Scytho-Assyrian alliance was formed about 680–670 B.C.

According to the Greek historian Herodotus, a Scythian attack forced the Medes to withdraw from an assault against Nineveh (apparently 626–620 B.C.). Later, the Scynthians advanced southward along the Palestinian coast to the Egyptian border (611 B.C.), where they were bought off by the Egyptian Pharaoh. They were eventually driven back northward into southern Russia by the Medes.

Scythian power was dominant in the area northwest of the Black Sea until about 350 B.C. Eventually, new invaders, the Sarmatians, having confined them to the Crimean area, destroyed the remaining Scythian remnants after A.D. 100.

The Old Testament refers to Scythians as Ashchenaz (Gen. 10:3; Jer. 51:27). See Ashchenaz. Earlier scholars identified the Scythians as Jeremiah's foe from the north and Zephaniah's threatened invader of Judah, but such theories rest on weak evidence. Colossians 3:11 uses Scythians to represent the most repugnant barbarian and slave, saying they, too, are accepted in Christ, all social and cultural barriers being abolished in His church. Charles Graham

North Syrian and Hittite stamp-type seals.

SEAL A signet containing a distinctive mark which stood for the individual who owned it. The earliest seals found so far date to before 3000 B.C. Seals varied in shapes and sizes. Some were round and were worn around the neck. Others were rings worn on the finger. The mark was made by stamping the seal into soft clay. Many cylinder seals have been found which contain scenes that communicate a message. These were rolled in the clay to form the impression. Tamar asked for Judah's signet as collateral on a pledge he made (Gen. 38:18). Joseph was given pharaoh's ring when he was placed in command of the country (Gen. 41:42), symbolizing Joseph's right to act with the ruler's authority. Jezebel used Ahab's seal to sign letters asking that Naboth be tried and stoned to death (1 Kings 21:8).

SEASON KJV translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms with different meanings. 1. An indefinite but somewhat extended period of time (Gen. 40:4; Josh. 24:7; Luke 4:13). 2. A regularly scheduled, recurring time (Ex. 13:10; Num. 9:2; John 5:4). 3. To add ingredients to food to improve the flavor (Lev. 2:13; Mark 9:50). See Salt; Spices. 4. A particular part of a year (Gen. 1:14; 2 Kings 4:16). 5. An indefinite part of a day (Job 30:17; Ps. 22:2). 6. Time appointed by God (Ps. 104:27; Matt. 24:45). 7. The proper time for an action (Isa. 50:4). See Time.

SEBA, SABEANS (Sē′ bȧ, Să bē′ ănz) A group of people thought to be akin to the Israelites through either Ham (Gen. 10:6–7) or Shem (Gen. 10:28). They settled southwest Arabia (modern Yemen) and became prosperous traders. One of the major caravan routes was in their control. They dealt mainly in rich spices, gold, and precious stones. The Sabeans also were agrarian, developing elaborate irrigation devices to make their region more fertile.

The queen of Saba (Sheba) traveled to Jerusalem (about 1,500 miles) during Solomon's reign to strike trade agreements with the thriving Israelites (1 Kings 10:1–10). The Sabeans are credited with domesticating the camel so that such journeys could be made. Matthew 12:42 promises the "Queen of the South" will condemn the people of Jesus' day in final judgment, indicating she had more faith than they. Some have tried to identify her homeland as Ethiopia. See Sabean.

SEBAM (Sē′ bȧm) Place name probably meaning, "high" or "cold." Town east of the Jordan the tribes of Reuben and Gad wanted to settle after God conquered it for them (Num. 32:3). Early versions agree with verse 38 in reading, "Sibmah," which the tribes rebuilt. Its location is not certain.

SEBAT (Sē′ băt) Eleventh month in Babylonian calendar used to date Zechariah's vision (1:7). This would be February–March. See Calendars.

SECACAH (Sė cā′ cah) Place name meaning, "covered." Town in tribal territory of Judah in the Judean wilderness (Josh. 15:61). It is modern khirbet es-Samrah in the central Buqeia. Some would equate it with the site of Qumran.

SECHU (Sē′ chū) Place name perhaps meaning, "lookout." Otherwise unknown site where Saul searched for David (1 Sam. 19:22). Many commentators follow the earliest Greek translation and change the Hebrew text to read "on the bare height" (NRSV note).

SECOND COMING, THE biblical teaching on the return of Jesus to earth at the end of earthly history. In the latter portion of His ministry, Jesus told His followers that He would be leaving them but would return again to the earth. This message of the second coming is referred to as the Blessed Hope (Titus 2:13). Jesus warned His followers that they should be prepared to welcome Him back (Matt. 24—25; compare Mark 13). In the upper room with His disciples, Jesus told them He was going away but promised that He would come again one day (John 14:3). At His ascension, the two angels declared that He would return (Acts 1:11).

Jesus' Form in His Coming Many who agree about the fact of Jesus's second coming are not sure about the form it will take. Some say He was referring to the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, others that He was referring to His resurrection, others to the fact that He was going to be spiritually present with us (Matt. 28:20), others to an individual's conversion experience (see Rev. 3:20).

All of these are incomplete at best. Jesus warned of misrepresentations (Matt. 24:4–5,11,23–26) and said His appearance would be bodily and unmistakable (Matt. 24:27,30; compare Acts 1:11).

Effects of Christ's Second Coming The second coming is to effect believers in a number of different ways:

Believers are to be watchful. There being no certainty as to the time of Jesus's return, it is important that we be on the alert as to the possibility that it may come at anytime (Matt. 24:42). However, they are not to believe that Christ must return in a given space of time, on a specific date. In His parable of the foolish virgins (Matt. 25:1–13) Jesus told of them sleeping and not being ready when the Bridegroom came (compare Jas. 5:7–8). Peter warned against unbelief that could blunt the expectant spirit and cause people to say, "Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (2 Pet. 3:3–4).

The believers are to use the hope of Christ's second return as a motivation to work. In His parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30), Jesus reserved His condemnation for the man who did nothing, simply taking his talent and hiding it. Convinced that their Lord will return at any moment the believers will give all their energies to serving Him. Because Jesus may return at anytime a believer strives to live a pure and blameless life: "Every man that hath this hope purifieth himself" (1 John 3:3; compare 1 Thess. 3:13; Col. 3:1–17; 1 John 2:28).

The Time of His Return One of the most difficult aspects of the second coming is the time when Jesus will come. There has been much speculation across the years. One sect even claims that Jesus returned in 1914. The emphasis on the exact time and date is mistaken. As one man says it, "I am not on the time and place, but on the welcoming committee." Jesus Himself said, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." (Matt. 24:36; compare 2 Thess. 2; 2 Pet. 3:4–11). This blessed hope is to mark the climax of experience for believers when they shall see Christ (1 John 3:2–3), shall be transformed (Phil. 3:20–21), receive the crown of righteousness (2 Tim. 4:8; 1 Pet. 5:4), and be made like Him (1 John 3:3).

The Meaning of the Second Coming The coming brings believers joy in Christ's presence, particularly as they see people to whom they have ministered (1 Thess. 2:19). The coming is for both those already dead in Christ and for those still alive (1 Thess. 4:15–17; compare 1 Cor. 15:23; Col. 3:4).

SECURITY OF THE BELIEVER Biblical teaching that God protects believers for the completion of their salvation. Contemporary Christianity needs to deal forthrightly with the universal human problem of insecurity. The natural gulf between the invisible, infinite God and finite, fallible humanity makes the quest for assurance and security a very significant theological issue. Slogans such as "once saved, always saved," and "eternal security" often easily gain a reverential status normally reserved only for biblical texts and become symbols of "evangelical orthodoxy." Indeed, it comes as a shock to some when they discover that their symbols are not actually biblical terms.

The Bible does teach that salvation does not depend merely upon human effort. God is the author of salvation (2 Cor. 5:18–19; John 3:16). God justifies or treats as acceptable sinners who receive Christ in faith (Rom. 3:21–26). The great message of the Reformation says, No one can earn assurance or security with God. Assurance of salvation is God's gift! Security does not come by absolutions, church attendance, good works, reciting Scripture, or performances of penance. God who has begun the work of salvation in Christians also provides the necessary assurance to bring His work to its completion in the day of Christ (Phil. 1:6). God in Christ protects and keeps Christians (John 10:27–29; 2 Thess. 3:3) just as Jesus took seriously the task of preserving the disciples while He was on earth (John 17:12–15). We do not possess the strength to secure ourselves.

The biblical view of security, however, is probably best epitomized in the Christian doctrine of perseverance (Eph. 6:18; Heb. 12:1; Jas. 1:25). See Perseverance. Christians must realize that their security does not lie in a fairy-tale approach to life where once a person becomes a Christian everything is a happy bed of roses forever and ever. Such a view fails to take seriously the traumas of human life.

The biblical view of assurance or security is rooted in the conviction that when Jesus departed from the disciples, the Lord did not orphan them or leave them without support. He promised Christians that he would come to them and would provide them with a companion Spirit (the Comforter or Paraclete) who would not only be at their side but would be within them, as much a part of them as their very breath (John 14:16–18). The Spirit would be their sense of peace and security, their witness concerning Jesus, their attorney with the world, and their guide or teacher into all truth (John 14:25–30; 15:26–27; 16:8–15). See Advocate; Comforter; Helper.

Along with great promises of assurance, the Bible contains strong warnings that call Christians to consistent living, even as they have yielded to temptations and sin and capitulated to the hostile forces of evil (for example, 1 Cor. 10:1–12; Heb. 2:1–3; 3:12–19; 6:1–8; 10:26–31; Jas. 5:19–20). These and many other warnings in the Bible are not merely phantom warnings unrelated to Christian life. They are meant to be taken with great seriousness. They are no more a game with God than was the death of Christ.

These warnings appear in the New Testament within clear statements reminding believers that temptation is accompanied by God's presence. Christians are expected to resist temptations and flee ungodly activity (for example, 1 Cor. 10:13–14). Evil patterns of life are inconsistent with Christian transformation. The writers of the New Testament were convinced that Christians would heed these warnings and resist the devil (Jas. 4:7; 1 Pet. 5:8–9). It is virtually unthinkable for a Christian to do otherwise. The Christian is anchored to the person of God. Evil has to be dealt with. The Christian can find in God an enduring security for the soul. Such is the meaning of Hebrews 6:17–20. God's consistency is the basis for a Christian's security in the midst of the world's traumas.

The security of the believer is not merely focused upon this life on earth. It has a dynamic focus on the life-to-come. The New Testament writers are convinced that a Christian will take very seriously the warnings in this life because this life is related to the life with Christ in heaven. The Christian, therefore, is expected to persevere to the end (1 Pet. 1:5; 1 John 5:18; Rev. 3:10).

The confidence or secure sense of the believer with respect to the life hereafter is rooted in the united witness of the New Testament writers that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is the hinge point of the Christian faith. In raising His Son Jesus, God provided Christians with the sign of the destinies and the basis for their security. Without the resurrection, the Christian proclamation would be empty (1 Cor. 15:14). Moreover, in the coming of the Holy Spirit, God provided the guarantee of our marvelous relationship with God (2 Cor. 1:22). In our identity with Adam, humanity experienced lostness and death; but as we identify with the ultimate power of Christ in the resurrection, we, too, shall experience the effective meaning of the security of the believer in the triumph of God (1 Cor. 15:20–28). Gerald L. Borchert

SEDITION Rebellion against lawful authority. Government officials in Persia's province headquartered in Samaria accused the Jews in Jerusalem of a history of rebellion as evidence against allowing Jerusalem and its Temple to be rebuilt (Ezra 4:15). Barabbas had been imprisoned for sedition (Luke 23:19). See Barabbas. Jewish leaders tried to convince Felix, the governor, that Paul had incited sedition (Acts 24:5). KJV used "seditions" in Galatians 5:20 for one of the works of the flesh, but modern translations are more accurate in using "dissensions." Relationships among believers rather than to governments is the apparent meaning.

SEGUB (Sē′ gŭb) Personal name meaning, "He has revealed Himself as exalted" or "He has protected." 1. Second son of Hiel, whose death during rebuilding of Jericho showed power of God's prophecy through the centuries (1 Kings 16:34). 2. Son of Judahite father and Machirite or Manassehite mother (1 Chron. 2:21–22).

SEIR (Sē′ īr) Place name meaning, "hairy" and thus "thicket" or "small forested region." A mountain range which runs the length of biblical Edom, leading at times to an equation of Edom and Seir. Parts of the range are almost impassable. The highest peak is about 5,600 feet about sea level. The region was home to Esau and his descendants (Gen. 32:3; Josh. 24:4). Some documents found in Egypt seem to make Seir and Edom two different tribal habitats, and it is possible that at times in its history the area was ruled over simultaneously by several local clans. The "sons of Seir" represented an early Horite clan from the region. See Edom.

SEIRAH (Sē' ĭ rah) Place name meaning, "toward Seir." Modern translations' reading for KJV Seirath (Judg. 3:26). The name would seem to point to Mount Seir in Edom, but the context seems to make that location impossible. Otherwise, the location is not known. It must be a forested place in the tribal territory of Benjamin.

SEIRATH (Sē ī' răth) KJV transliteration of place name in Judges 3:26. See Seirah.

SELA (Sē' lȧ) Place name meaning, "rock." Major fortified city in Edom. The biblical references lend themselves to varying interpretations, since Sela may also be read as a common noun referring to rocky country or wilderness. Judges 1:36 refers to a border of the Amorites, though some commentators change this to Edomites (REB). Amaziah of Judah (796–767 B.C.) captured Sela and renamed it Joktheel (2 Kings 14:7). Compare 2 Chronicles 25:12 in NRSV. Isaiah's oracle against Moab calls for action from Sela, which many commentators take to be the rocky wilderness bordering Moab rather than the more distant town of Sela (Isa. 16:1). Traditionally from the earliest Greek translation on, Sela has been identified with Petra, the capital of Edom, or the nearby umm-Bayyara in the wadi Musa. More recent study has placed it at es-Sela, two and a half miles northwest of Bozrah and five miles southwest of Tafileh. Modern translations include Sela in Isaiah 42:11, God's call to joy at the coming salvation.

SELAH (Sē' lah) Term of unknown meaning appearing in psalms, outside Psalms only in Habakkuk 3. Scholars have advanced various unproveable theories: a pause either for silence or musical interlude, a signal for the congregation to sing, recite, or fall prostrate on the ground, a cue for the cymbals to crash, a word to be shouted by the congregation, a sign to the choir to sing a higher pitch or louder. The earliest Jewish traditions thought it meant "for ever." Mike Mitchell

SELAH-HAMMAHLEKOTH (Sē' lȧ-hȧm mäh' lė kŏth) Place name meaning, "rock of hiding, haunt, refuge." David's hiding place in the wilderness of Maon while Saul pursued him (1 Sam. 23:28). Modern translations often translate the name rather than transliterate it: "Dividing Rock" (REB), "Rock of Escape" (NRSV, NAS).

SELED (Sē' lĕd) Personal name meaning, "jumping." Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:30).

SELEUCIA (Sė lēu' cĭ ȧ) Syrian city on Mediterranean coast five miles north of the Orontes River and fifteen miles from Antioch. Paul stopped there on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:4). It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, the first Seleucid king, in 301 B.C. See Seleucids.

SELEUCIDS (Sė lēu' cĭds) Descendants of Seleucus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great. Following the death of Alexander, 323 B.C., his kingdom was divided among five of his leading commanders. Seleucus chose for himself the eastern part of the empire around the city of Babylon. During the next several years, much confusion prevailed. Seleucus was forced to leave Babylon for a time and take refuge with his friend Ptolemy, ruler of Egypt. With the help of Ptolemy, he later was able to control Babylon again. The important date is 312 B.C. The Syrian calendar has its beginning at this time.

The overall situation remained unchanged until the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C. In that battle four of the generals, including Seleucus, fought against Antigonus who had become the most powerful of the generals and claimed to be king over much of Asia Minor and northern Syria. Antigonus was slain in the battle, and his territory was given to Seleucus along with title to the land of Palestine. However, Ptolemy took control of Palestine, and his successors retained it for over a hundred years. This was a serious point of contention between the two empires throughout this period of time.

Seleucus was assassinated in 281 B.C. Antiochus I, his son, became ruler and made peace with the Egyptians. He sought throughout his reign to consolidate his rule, but the years were for the most part a time of intense struggle and warfare. At his death in 262 or early 261 B.C., his son Antiochus II became king (261–246 B.C.). During the early years of Antiochus II, conflict continued with Egypt. When peace between the two nations was reached in 253 B.C., Ptolemy offered his daughter to Antiochus as wife with the understanding that he would desert his first wife. The goal was that a son born to this marriage would become the ruler of the Seleucid Empire and cement relations between the two. However, it did not work out in this way, and Antiochus died in 246 B.C., perhaps murdered by his first wife.

The eldest son of Antiochus, Seleucus II, was named king. He ruled until his death in 226 B.C.; however, some Syrians, along with Egypt, supported the infant son of the second wife of Antiochus. The Egyptian army could not reach the area quickly enough to defend the child, and Seleucus was able to regain control of the territory ruled by his father, some of which had been lost at the time of his father's death. In 241 B.C., peace was again reached between the Seleucids and Egypt. When Seleucus died as the result of falling from his horse, his son Alexander became king as Seleucus III. He was assassinated in 223 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Antiochus III, known as Antiochus the Great (223–187 B.C.). See Intertestamental History for Antiochus III, Seleucus IV, and Antiochus IV.

With the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the situation of the Seleucids fell into disarray. From this time on it seems that more than one strong individual was contending for the crown at all times. Lysias had been left with responsibility for the care of the young son of Epiphanes. He assumed that upon the death of the king the son would become king. But before his death the king had evidently appointed Philip, a close friend with him in the East, to be king. Philip returned to Antioch, the capital in Syria, and this forced Lysias to cut off his efforts to quell the Jewish revolt. In his effort to bring peace, he granted religious freedom to the Jews. Lysias was able to thwart the effort of Philip, and the son, Antiochus V, reigned as king for a brief time (164–162 B.C.).

Demetrius, the young son of Seleucus IV, was a hostage in Rome. His desire to return home at the death of his father was denied. When Antiochus IV died, he managed to escape from Rome and fled to Syria, 162 B.C. He had himself proclaimed as king and had Lysias and Antiochus V put to death. He remained as king until 150 B.C. These years were involved in attempts to put down the Jewish revolt and to consolidate and expand his position in the East.

A strong rival appeared—Alexander Balas. He claimed to be the illegitimate son of Antiochus Epiphanes. In 153 B.C., the Roman senate acknowledged him as king of Syria although the senate was probably aware that his claim was false. The two rivals both made extensive offers to the Jews for their support. Jonathan, the Jewish leader, supported Alexander, who, in 150 B.C., gained victory over Demetrius, who was killed in battle. Alexander reigned until 145 B.C., supported at first by the ruler of Egypt, who gave Alexander his daughter in marriage. When Ptolemy learned that Alexander was plotting to kill him, he turned against Alexander, brought his daughter back, and offered her in marriage to the young son of Demetrius. Defeated in battle by Ptolemy, Alexander fled to Arabia, where he was killed. The young son of Demetrius, Demetrius II, was made king (145–139, 129–125 B.C.).

Needing their support, Demetrius granted political freedom to the Jews during the early years of his reign. One of his generals, Tryphon, supported Alexander Balas' young son, who claimed the throne as Antiochus VI (145–142 B.C.). Tryphon had Antiochus murdered and had himself proclaimed as king (142–139 B.C.). Demetrius II was taken prisoner in a campaign against the Parthians, and his brother Antiochus VII (139–128 B.C.) became king. He defeated Tryphon, who then committed suicide. Antiochus made one last effort to interfere in the life of the Jews. In 133 B.C., he invaded Judea and began a siege of Jerusalem that lasted for almost a year. Finally, peace was made between him and John Hyrcanus, guaranteeing the independence of the Jews from Syrian intervention. Antiochus made a campaign against the Parthians where he died.

With the death of Antiochus VII, the Seleucids ceased to be a major factor in the political life of the eastern Mediterranean world. Although Demetrius was released by the Parthians and resumed his role as king, neither he nor any other person was able to gain firm control of the empire. The following years were filled with internal conflict that drained the resources of the empire and saw at least ten persons claim rule in less than fifty years. In 83 B.C., the king of Armenia took possession of Syria, and the rule of the Seleucids came to an end. Clayton Harrop

SELF-CONTROL Modern translations' term for several Greek words indicating a sober, temperate, calm, and dispassionate approach to life, having mastered personal desires and passions. Biblical admonitions expect God's people to exercise self-control (Prov. 25:28; 1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 5:6; 1 Tim. 3:2; 2 Tim. 3:3; Gal. 5:23; 2 Tim. 1:7; Titus 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:6). Freedom in Christ does not give believers liberty to cast off all moral restraint as some members in Galatia and other churches apparently believed. Nor does it call for a withdrawal from life and its temptations. It calls for a self-disciplined life following Christ's example of being in the world but not of the world. See Ethics; Freedom.

SELF-WILLED To do something arbitrarily without divine permission; to act on one's own decision rather than considering the needs of others and the purpose of God. Jacob rebuked Simeon and Levi for wanton, undisciplined actions (Gen. 49:6). Titus 1:7 teaches that a bishop cannot be self-willed, that is stubborn and arrogant. Such activity is presumptuous and marks the fleshly person (2 Pet. 2:10).

SELVEDGE (Sĕl′ vĕdge) KJV translation of Hebrew term for the end, edge, border, or corner (Ex. 26:4; 36:11), apparently referring to the outermost curtain of the tabernacle.

SEM (Sĕm) KJV spelling of Shem, following the Greek (Luke 3:36).

SEMACHIAH (Sĕm ā chī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh supports." Levitical gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:7), described as a valiant man or warrior, possibly a title of honor for public service.

SEMAKIAH (Sĕm â kī' ah) NIV spelling of Semachiah.

SEMEI (Sĕ' mē ī) Greek form of Hebrew personal name, Shimi, among Jesus' ancestors (Luke 3:26).

SEMEIN (Sĕ' mē ĭn) Modern translations' spelling of Semei.

SEMEN See Discharge.

SEMITE (Sĕm' īte) A person who claims descent from Noah's son Shem (Gen. 5:32; 10:21–31) or, more precisely as a linguistic term, those peoples speaking one of the Semitic languages. The racial list of Genesis and the list of linguists do not always include the same peoples.

Genesis 10:21–31 lists five sons and twenty-one descendants/peoples derived from Shem. These people spread geographically from Lydia to Syria, to Assyria, to Persia. Armenia formed the northern boundary while the Red Sea and Persian Gulf formed the southern boundary. The Elamites, Assyrians, Lydians, Arameans, and numerous Arab tribes are said to have been descendants of Shem.

The place of origin for the Semites is difficult to determine. The Fertile Crescent contains evidence of Semitic influence at the dawn of civilization. One unproven theory is that they migrated from northern Arabia in waves of nomadic movements into the Fertile Crescent.

Three major divisions exist in the Semitic family of languages. East Semitic would include Akkadian used in ancient Babylon and Assyria. Northwest Semitic involves Hebrew, Aramaic, Syria, Phoenician, Samaritan, Palmyrene, Nabatean, Canaanite, Moabite. South Semitic includes Arabic, Sabean, Minean, and Ethiopic. Approximately 70 distinct forms of Semitic languages are known. Some have large libraries of literature while others remain entirely unwritten or only small collections of literature exist. SENAAH (Sē nā' ah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, "thorny" or "hatred." Clan head or home town of people who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonian Exile about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:35).

SENEH (Sē' nĕh) Place name meaning, "shiny" or "slippery." A "cliff" (NIV) or "sharp column of rock" (REB) between Michmash and Geba (1 Sam. 14:4). See Bozez.

SENIR (Sē' nĭr) Mountain name meaning, "pointed." Amorite name for Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:9). See Hermon. Song of Solomon 4:8 may indicate that Senir was a different peak than Hermon in the Antilebanon range or that it indicated the entire range (compare 1 Chron. 5:23).

SENNACHERIB (Sĕn năch' ĕr ĭb) Assyrian royal name meaning, "Sin (the god) has replaced my brother." King of Assyria (704–681 BC). See Assyria; Israel.

The site of Sennacherib's palace at ancient Nineveh (near modern Mosul, Iraq).

SENSUAL Activities or appearances characterized by or motivated by physical lust or luxury. God condemned Babylon for their sensual desires for pleasure and luxury (Isa. 47:8). It is part of the evil of the human heart (Mark 7:22; compare Rom. 13:13), calling for repentance (2 Cor. 12:21). See Lasciviousness; Sex, Biblical Teaching On; Wantonness.

SENTRY Government official with responsibility for guarding a prison (Acts 5:23; 12:6) or possibly a captain over such a guard (Jer. 37:13).

SEORIM (Sē ō' rĭm) Personal name perhaps meaning, "the shaggy-haired." Head of fourth division of priests appointed under David (1 Chron. 24:8).

SEPARATION Term used for period when a person is ritually unclean during menstruation (Lev. 12:2,5; 15:20,25–26) or for time of refraining from certain activities because of a vow (Num. 6). KJV term for water used to make one ritually pure or clean (Num. 19).

SEPHAR (Sē' phăr) Place name perhaps meaning, "numbering, census." Eastern border of sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:30). The site is apparently in southern Arabia, perhaps the coastal town of Tsaphar in Oman or Itsphar south of Hadramaut.

SEPHARAD (Sĕ phā' răd) Place name of uncertain meaning. Place where Jerusalem's Exiles lived. Obadiah promised them new possessions in the Negeb (v. 20). The location is disputed: possibly a country south of Lake Urmia and north and west of Media, beyond the Babylonian Empire, but more likely the capital city of the Persian satrapy of Sepharad or Sardis in Lydia near the Aegean Sea. Early Syriac (Peshitta) and Aramaic (Targum) evidence points to Spain, but this is improbable.

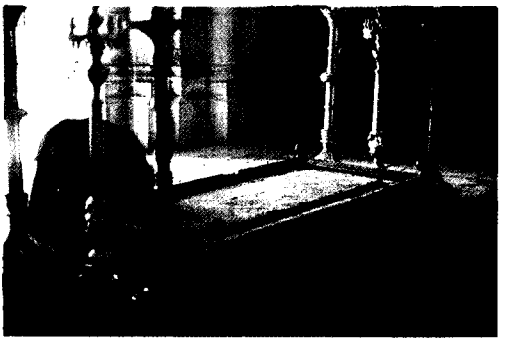
SEPHARVAIM (Sĕ phär vā' ĭm) Racial name of foreign origin. Peoples the Assyrians conquered and resettled in Israel to replace the Israelites they deported in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:24). The name may represent the two Sippars on the Euphrates River or Shabarain in Syria. It may be the same as Sibraim in Syria (Ezek. 47:16), a border in Ezekiel's promised restoration of Israel. Despite Assyria's claims, Sepharvaim's gods could not compare with Yahweh, the God of Israel (2 Kings 19:12–13; compare 17:31).



SEPHARVITES (Sĕ phär' vītes) Citizens of Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:31).

SEPPHORIS (Sĕp phō' rĭs) Town in Galilee that served as the capital of that region during most of Jesus' lifetime. It was near Nazareth and sat on a high ridge. The town was fortified, but suffered a violent history. Although Sepphoris is not mentioned in the Bible, Jesus probably knew it well and walked its streets.

SEPTUAGINT (Sĕp tū' ă gĭnt) Title meaning, "the 70." Oldest Greek translation of the Hebrew Old Testament. It also contains several apocryphal books. Most New Testament quotations of the Old Testament are from the Septuagint. See Apocrypha; Bible, Texts and Versions.

SEPULCHRE (Sĕ pŭl' chre) Tomb or grave (Gen. 23:6). It translates a Hebrew word which refers to a niche hewn out of a rock in which bodies were placed. In ancient Palestine, sepulchres usually were carved out of the walls in existing caves. Families were buried together on the carved slabs of stone. After a body had decayed to the bones, the remains were placed in a hole farther back in the cave so that the next body could be placed in the sepulchre. Jesus was buried in such a cave (Mark 15:46). See Burial.

SERAH (Sē' rah) Personal name meaning, "progress, develop, overflow" or "splendor, pride." Daughter of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:46, where KJV reads Sarah).

SERAIAH (Sĕ râi' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah has proved Himself ruler." 1. David's royal "scribe" and thus probably functioning as a modern secretary of state (2 Sam. 8:17). The Hebrew tradition has various spellings of the name: Sheva, Sheya (2 Sam. 20:25); Shisha (1 Kings 4:3) if this is not a Hebraic spelling of the Egyptian word for scribe; Shavsha (1 Chron. 18:16).

2. Chief priest taken into Babylonian Exile in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:18; 1 Chron. 16:14; Jer. 52:24). 3. "Quiet prince" (KJV), "quartermaster" (REB, NAS, NRSV) Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) sent to Babylon with instructions from himself and from Jeremiah (Jer. 51:59–64). 4. Priest and father of Ezra (Ezra 7:1). 5. Army officer who reported to Gedaliah when he was named governor immediately after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25:23; compare Jer. 40:8). He may have been involved in rebellion Ishmael led. 6. Leader in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:13). 7. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35). 8. Leader of returning Exiles under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2); apparently the same as Azariah (Neh. 7:7). 9. Priestly family (Neh. 10:2; 12:12).

SERAPHIM (Sĕr′ å phĭm) Literally, "the burning ones," seraphim (a plural word) were winged serpents whose images decorated many of the thrones of the Egyptian pharaohs. In some cases, they wore the crowns of the Egyptian kingdoms and were thought to act as guardians over the king. Israel adopted the symbolism for God's throne. Isaiah envisioned the seraphim as agents of God who prepared him to proclaim the Lord's message to Judah (Isa. 6:2). See Angels.

SERAPIS (Sĕ rā′ pĭs) Also known as Sarapis, this Egyptian-Greek sun deity was worshiped first at Memphis along with the bull-god, Apis. Serapis was introduced to Egypt by the Greeks and was worshiped originally as a god of the underworld. The temple to him at Alexandria was the largest and best known among several. Serapis came to be revered also as a god of healing and fertility, and his worship spread throughout the Roman Empire via the trade routes.

SERED (Sē′ rĕd) Personal name meaning, "baggage master." Clan leader in tribe of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

SEREDITE (Sē′ rė dīte) Member of clan of Sered in modern translations (Num. 26:26).

This bronze bust of the Egyptian-Greek god Serapis dates from the first century A.D.

SERGIUS PAULUS (Sĕr′ ġĭ us Pāū′ lŭs) Personal name of proconsul of Cyprus when Paul visited the capital of Paphos on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:6–12). Sergius Paulus was under the influence of a sorcerer named Bar-jesus when Paul and Barnabas arrived. Sergius Paulus asked to hear the gospel that the two missionaries were preaching, but the sorcerer tried to keep him from the appointment. Paul temporarily blinded the sorcerer, and Sergius Paulus was converted to Christ.

SERJEANT KJV term for Roman lictor, a constable or policeman (Acts 16:35).

SERMON ON THE MOUNT The name given to the material found in Matthew 5—7. The Sermon on the Mount represents Jesus' expectations for those who have followed Him as disciples, both ancient and modern. The sermon begins with the beatitudes, explains the place of the law and certain religious practices in the lives of Christians, and gives various other instructions. The theme of the sermon is found in Matthew 5:20, "For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." The Sermon on the Mount is thus a call for Jesus' disciples to observe a greater righteousness.

Approaches to Interpretation Before looking at the contents of the sermon itself, it is helpful to briefly consider the ways in which the Sermon on the Mount has been interpreted. The Sermon on the Mount confronts the reader with uncompromising demands and a lofty ethic. Many throughout the history of the church have sensed a great gap between Jesus' expectations of His disciples and their abilities to live up to those expectations. Indeed, it shocks many to read that Jesus expects us to be perfect as God is perfect (Matt. 5:48). The goal of many interpretations is to alleviate the tension between Jesus' expectations and our abilities.

Some hold that the sermon should be interpreted literally. This is, by and large, the best approach (with some exceptions). Of course, a literal approach to the sermon emphasizes the gap between Jesus' expectations and our abilities more than any other approach.

One obvious question that arises for those holding to a literal interpretation is: What do you do about a passage like 5:29–30 which talks about plucking out the eye and cutting off the hand that is offensive? Some in the history of the church have interpreted this literally. Was Jesus teaching us that we should multilate ourselves in this fashion? That hardly seems likely. Other figurative or poetic elements as well do not lend themselves to a literal interpretation (for example 5:13–16; 6:20; 7:6,13–27). What about Matthew 5:48?

Did Jesus literally mean that His disciples must be perfect as God is perfect?

The approach that attempts to interpret the entire sermon literally, then, is insufficient by itself. This conclusion raises two other questions. First, if a strictly literal interpretation is insufficient, what other methods are acceptable? Second, which passages should be interpreted literally and which should not? Attention will be focused here on the answers given to the first question.

Some interpreters of the Sermon on the Mount have emphasized the poetic and metaphoric nature of Jesus' language (for example, calling His disciples salt and light, 5:13–16) and His use of hyperbole or consciously exaggerated speech designed to make His point vivid and memorable (for example, plucking out the eye and cutting off the hand that offends, 5:29–30). These interpreters claim that Jesus never meant His sermon to be taken literally. Jesus, according to these interpreters, was stating general principles and using exaggerated illustrations to drive home His point.

Bible interpreters have also used a variety of other approaches. Some interpreters of the sermon attempt to temper Jesus' strict ethical demands by quoting other verses from other parts of Scripture that seem to them to be more capable of human fulfillment. During the Roman Catholic church's history in the Middle Ages, only those living within the monastery were held responsible for keeping the ethics of the sermon; everyone else was bound only to keep the Ten Commandments. Martin Luther proposed the doctrine of the two kingdoms: Christians in their private lives were bound to keep the ethical standards of the sermon, but in their public and professional lives were bound only to keep the standards of the Ten Commandments. C. I. Scofield held that the ethics of the sermon were fully valid only for the new dispensation after the return of Christ.

Some interpreters feel it is impossible for us to fulfill the standards of the Sermon on the Mount (especially 5:48). For them, the sermon shows how short of perfection we really are and shows us our need of repentance. In a similar manner, some interpreters believe Jesus fulfilled the demands of the sermon for humanity since humanity was incapable of living up to standards of the sermon.

There may be some truth in all these approaches to the Sermon on the Mount, but it appears that the best approach is to take the sermon at face value (with some obvious exceptions such as 5:29–30) and to do our best to live the life Jesus outlined for us. When we fail while trying our best, we need not despair; God is a God of grace and forgiveness for all who confess and repent of their sins.

God's willingness to forgive us removes the fear and anxiety caused by failure. This will in turn give us more confidence and assurance that we can live lives that today are more godly than they were yesterday.

We must realize also, however, that we cannot live up to the standards of the sermon (being perfect as God is perfect) by our own powers and abilities. Our lives can conform to the standards of the sermon only if we allow God through the power of the Holy Spirit to work in us. Viewed in this way, the sermon becomes a picture of what God desires to make of us if we will offer ourselves to Him as living sacrifices (Rom. 12:1–2).

Contents of the Sermon on the Mount The Sermon on the Mount opens with the beatitudes (5:3–12) and moves on to describe the function of Jesus' disciples (5:13–16). From there Jesus explained His interpretation of the law (5:17–48) and certain acts of righteousness (6:1–18), described the attitudes required of His disciples (6:19—7:12), and invited the listeners to become and continue as His disciples (7:13–27).

Jesus spoke these words directly to His disciples (5:1–2) within the hearing of the crowds who were amazed at both Jesus' teaching and the authority with which Jesus taught (7:28–29). Jesus did not teach by quoting the traditions passed down from generation to generation as other rabbis did. Jesus spoke to His disciples as "the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). Jesus showed His disciples what it meant to be a light that shines before people. The people "saw" Jesus' good works and gave glory to God (see Matt. 5:16). SERUG (Sē′ rŭg) Personal and place name perhaps meaning, "offshoot, descendant." Ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:20) and thus of Jesus (Luke 3:35) and city twenty miles northwest of Harran mentioned in Assyrian texts.

SERVANT OF THE LORD, THE Title Jesus took up from the Old Testament, especially Isaiah 40—55. The term the servant of the Lord (or "My servant" or "His servant" where the pronouns refer to God) is applied to many leaders of God's people: to Moses over 30 times, to David over 70 times, and to Israel as a nation a number of times.

It assumes a special significance in Isaiah 40—55.

The idea is introduced almost incidentally. Chapter 41 pictures a great crisis, as a powerful army moves westward from Persia, conquering many nations and filling all with terror. In contrast, God told Israel not to fear. "But thou, Israel, art my servant, Jacob, whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham my friend. . . . Thou art my servant; I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away" (Isa. 41:8,9b). Israel had to be preserved, because it was God's instrument to perform a task of worldwide importance.

Isaiah 42 gives a remarkable picture of the ideal Servant of the Lord and the great work that God intends Him to accomplish. He is to "bring forth judgment to the Gentiles" (v. 1). He must "set judgment in the earth," and the distant "isles shall wait for his law" (v. 4). The tasks He is destined to accomplish are almost beyond belief. He is to bring God's justice to all the nations (vv. 1,4).

Almost more remarkable than the immensity of the task that the Servant must perform is the description of the way He is to do it. He will move forward with absolute confidence, but nothing indicates strenuous effort will be needed. He will have such an understanding of His overwhelming power that He can be absolutely gentle as He does His work (vv. 2–4) even toward those whose efforts have failed. This first part of chapter 42 pictures the ideal Servant—the goal for which Israel was to be preserved.

As an Israelite read this prediction, he would think: "How can Israel even think of performing this great task that God's Servant must do?" Soon the Lord Himself called attention to the inability of the natural Israelite to fulfill the picture of the ideal Servant. In verse 19 He says, "Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent?" Israel had a responsibility to fulfill this ideal, but to do so was far beyond its power. Still, the Lord says: "Ye are my witnesses, . . . and my servant whom I have chosen" (43:10; compare 44:1–2,21).

Israel had responsibility to do the work of the Servant. Yet not all Israel could be meant, for some were blasphemers and idolaters. Could part of Israel be the real Servant? Or might it really point to One who must come out of Israel—One who could represent Israel in accomplishing the task? Matthew 12:17–21 quotes Isaiah 42:1–4 as fulfilled in Jesus Christ.

Chapter 49 presents the work of the Servant in more detail. The Servant tells the "isles" and the "people, from far;" that God called Him before His birth, even mentioning His name: Israel (Isa. 49:3). Verse 4 describes the godly in Israel who know what God wants but feel their own inadequacy and provides assurance that the work belongs to God, and He will bring it to pass. Verses 5 and 6 distinguish between the One who will fulfill the work of the Servant and the nation of Israel, to which this One belongs and which He represents. Not only is He to bring judgment to all the world—He is "to bring Jacob again to him" (v. 5) and "to restore the preserved of Israel" (v. 6). He is to be "a light to the Gentiles" and "my salvation unto the end of the earth" (v. 6). In 50:4–10, we hear of the sufferings to which He will voluntarily submit.

All this leads up to the triumphal picture in Isaiah 52:13—53:12, showing the sufferings of the Servant (52:14; 53:2–5,7–8,10), their vicarious and redemptive nature (52:15; 53:4–6,8,10–12; compare 1 Pet. 1:1–2). Chapter 54 shows the outreach of the Servant's work, and chapter 55 gives the glorious call to receive the salvation won by the Servant's redemptive work, "without money and without price" (v. 1).

After chapter 53, Isaiah never again used "servant" in the singular; rather he spoke of the blessings that the followers of the Servant will receive, calling them "the servants of the Lord" (54:17); "his servants" (56:6; 65:15; 66;14); and "my servants" (65:8,9,13,14).

The New Testament pictures Jesus as the Suffering Servant fulfilling the glorious descriptions of Isaiah. In refusing to let disciples reveal His true identity, Jesus was the pleasing Servant who did not strive or cry out (Matt. 12:14–21). In the resurrection and ascension, God glorified Jesus the Servant (Acts 3;13; compare verse 26 where the same Greek word for servant appears though KJV translates "Son."). Gentile and Jewish leaders conspired to make Jesus, "your holy servant" suffer as God "had decided beforehand" (Acts 4:27–28 NIV). This led the early church to pray that as God's servants they would speak with boldness and perform miracles through the name of "your holy servant Jesus" (Acts 4:29–30 NIV). Jesus saw His mission as that of the Servant (Luke 4:18–19; compare 22:37) and symbolized it for His disciples, calling on them to serve one another and the world (John 13:4–17). SERVICE Work done for other people or for God and the worship of God. Jacob worked for Laban seven years for each of his wives (Gen. 29:15–30). Service could be slave labor (Ex. 5:11; Lev. 25:39; 1 Kings 12:4; Isa. 14:3; compare Lam. 1:3), farm work (1 Chron. 27:26), or daily labor on the job (Ps. 104:23). It could be service of earthly kingdoms (2 Chron 12:8; compare 1 Chron. 26:30), of God's place of worship (Ex. 30:16; compare Num. 4:47; 1 Chron 23:24), of God's ministers (Ezra 8:20), and of God (Josh. 22:27). Not only people do service; God also does service (Isa. 28:21). Even righteousness has a service (Isa. 32:17).

Service at its best is worship. This involves the service of Temple vessels (1 Chron. 9:28), of worship actions (2 Chron. 35:10; compare Ex.

12:25–26), of bringing offerings (Josh. 22:27), of priestly work (Num. 8:11). Interestingly, the Old Testament never ascribes service to other gods.

The New Testament similarly speaks of forced service (Matt. 27:32), sacrificial living (Rom. 12:1; Phil. 2:17 with a play on words also indicating an offering), slave labor done for Christ's sake (Eph. 6:7; Col. 3:22; compare Phil. 2:30), worship (Rom. 9:4; Heb. 12:28), offerings (Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 9:12), and personal ministry (Rom. 12:7; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 4:11). Hebrews 1:14 talks of the ministry of angels. Being in an army is also service (2 Tim. 2:4), and those who persecute Christ's followers think they do service for God (John 16:2).

SERVITUDE Hard labor done by servants or conscripted workers (Gen. 47:21; 2 Chron. 10:4; Neh. 5:18; Jer. 28:14; Lam. 1:3). The same Hebrew term is also translated, "service."

SETH (Sĕth) Personal name meaning, "He set or appointed" or "replacement." Third son of Adam and Eve born after Cain murdered Abel (Gen. 4:25; 5:3). He was an ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:38).

SETHUR (Sē′ thŭr) Personal name meaning, "hidden." Spy representing tribe of Asher in scouting out the Promised Land (Num. 13:13).

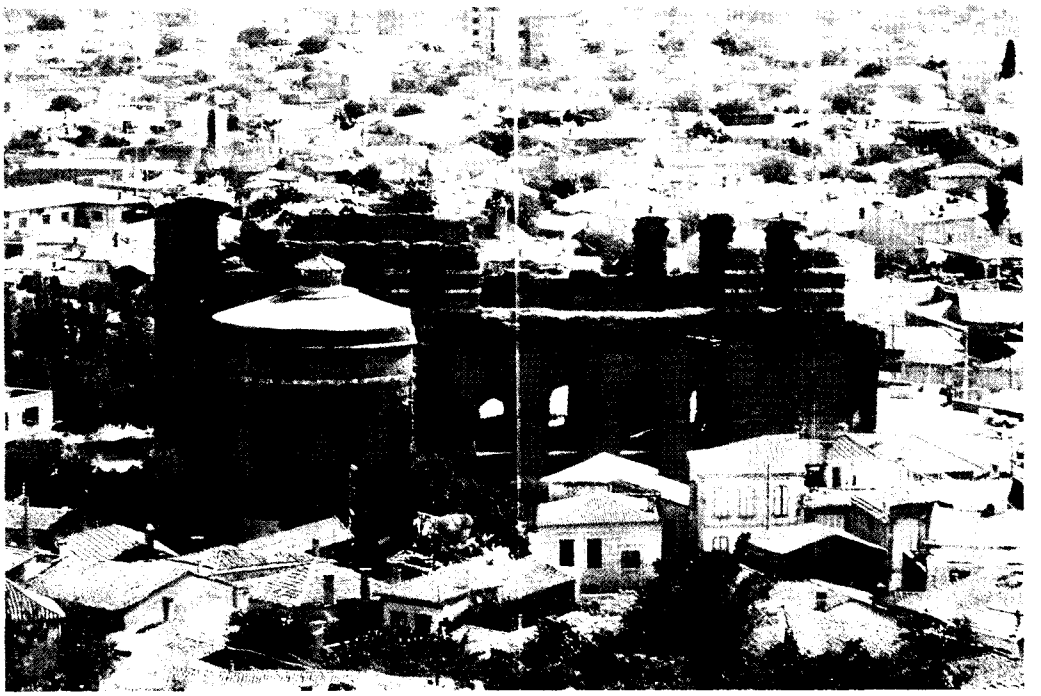
SEVEN WORDS FROM THE CROSS Jesus' statements from the cross as He was crucified for our sin. The seven words from the cross were not a prepared speech but the record of Jesus responding to the events around Him during the six agonizing hours of his crucifixion. Although no single gospel records all seven sayings in order, the order that follows is the most commonly accepted.



The First Three Words Jesus' first three statements from the cross relate primarily to others, and Jesus spoke them between 9:00 a.m. and noon (Mark 15:25). First He asked forgiveness for those who were crucifying Him (Luke 23:34). Then He promised to be with the penitent thief in paradise (Luke 23:43). Jesus' provision for the care of His mother by John comprised His third remarks from the cross (John 19:26–27).

The Last Four Words Jesus' last four statements refer to Himself and were spoken between noon and 3:00 p.m. (Matt. 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44). He uttered the cry of desolation, quoting Psalm 22:1 in the Aramaic language (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34), expressed His thirst, (John 19:28) and issued the cry of victory, "It is finished" (John 19:30). In His final words, Jesus quoted Psalm 31:5 as He committed His spirit to God (Luke 23:46). See Crucifixion.

SEVEN, SEVENTH The number of completeness. See Number Systems and Number Symbolism.

The Church of St. John in Pergamum, a city where one of the seven churches of Asia was located.

SEVENTY WEEKS The time spoken of in Daniel 9:24–27, usually understood as seventy weeks of years or 490 years. The passage groups the weeks in three parts: seven weeks (49 years), sixty-two weeks (434 years), and one week (7 years). The 49 years are associated with rebuilding Jerusalem in "times of trouble" (v. 25 NIV). The 434 years relate to the intervening time before a cutting off of the Anointed One (v. 26). The 7 years are connected with the period of a covenant between a ruler and Jerusalem, which is violated in the middle of the 7 years (v. 27).

The significance of the seventy weeks is variously understood. A historical approach relates these years to the period of history between the fall of Jerusalem and the restoration of the Temple in 164 B.C. following the atrocities of Antiochus Epiphanes. See Intertestamental History.

A prophetic approach sees the reference to reach to the birth of Christ, His subsequent crucifixion (the cutting off of the Anointed One), and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. At that time, sacrifices under the Old Covenant ceased. The same dating without reference to Jesus has been the usual Jewish understanding since Josephus. They focus on the destruction of the Temple.

The dispensational approach makes the 70 weeks a prophetic framework for end time events, rather than a prophecy of what took place in the work of Christ at His first coming. The 69th week is seen as completed at Christ's death, while the 70th week is yet to be fulfilled at a future Great Tribulation period. The interval between the two is seen as a parenthesis in the prophetic pattern which contains the present church age, a period said not to be revealed in Old Testament prophecy.

SEVENTY YEARS Prophetic and apocalyptic figure pointing to time of Israel's Exile in Babylon and to the end of tribulation in Daniel's vision. Seventy years represented an even number of the normal human life span (Ps. 90:10). Isaiah 23:15 and the Babylonian Black Stone of Esarhaddon may indicate that seventy years was an expected time of punishment and desolation for a defeated city. Jeremiah predicted that Judah would serve Babylon 70 years (Jer. 25:11; compare 29:10). Second Chronicles 36:21 saw the completion of the 70 years in the coming of Cyrus (538 B.C.). This apparently sees the years as from the first deporting of Judeans into Babylon (about 605 B.C.) until Cyrus came. Zechariah seems to have seen the 70 years ending in his own day with the rebuilding of the Temple (Zech. 1:12). This would span the period from the destruction of the Temple (586 B.C.) to the dedication in 516 B.C. Some interpreters see in the Chronicler's references to sabbaths an indication of a second meaning for seventy years, that is seventy sabbatical years (Lev. 25:1–7; 26:34–35) or 490 years. By this reckoning Israel had not kept the sabbatical year commandment since the period of the Judges, so God gave the land 70 consecutive sabbatical years during the Exile. See Sabbatical Year.

Daniel meditated on Jeremiah's prophecy (Dan. 9:2) and learned that 70 weeks of years were intended (v. 24). See Seventy Weeks.

SEX, BIBLICAL TEACHING ON God created humans as sexual beings, somehow reflective of His own image (Gen. 1:27), and declared that this reality was "very good" (Gen. 1:31). One will look in vain, however, in the Bible for a single word for sex. The nearest biblical terms are "male" and "female." The biblical language for sexuality is rich with variety as it describes God's will and human behavior regarding this aspect of God's creative power: the power to bring new life into being within the family and the pleasure of companions within marriage.

Attitudes toward sex The biblical writers were somewhat ambivalent about sex. Some passages truly value sex and celebrate it joyously (Gen. 18:12; 26:8; Song of Sol. 4:1–16); others call for times of abstaining from sexual activity (Ex. 19:15; 1 Sam. 21:4–5); still others raise the life without sex above the normal marital relationship (1 Cor. 7:1–9,37–38; Rev. 14:4). Positively, God blesses sex for both companionship and procreation (Gen. 1:28; 2:18–25). Fertility of women was a blessing while barrenness was a curse (Gen. 29:30—30:24; 1 Sam. 1:5–20). Basically, the Bible sees sex as good because God created it.

The interpreter should not ignore negative feelings the Bible expresses toward sex. The sinful nature of man appears to have corrupted God's good gift. Outside the first garden, a negative attitude toward nudity appears (Gen. 3:7,21; Luke 8:27,35). "Uncovering one's nakedness" refers to a shameful, incestual, or otherwise forbidden sex act (Lev. 18:6–19). Sex can be wasteful of one's strength (Prov. 31:3). Euphemisms and circumlocutions are used in referring to the body's private parts (Deut. 28:57, "feet"; Gen. 24:2, "loins" or "thigh"). Similarly, the verb "to know" is sometimes used to refer to having sex relations (Gen. 4:1; Matt. 1:25). Sin has produced a hesitancy and reservation about sex among the biblical characters and writers as compared with the lack of shame in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:25).

Male/Female relationships As sex is both good and bad in the Bible, so also there is a contrast of equality and dominance/submission patterns for male/female relationships in the biblical teachings. This overlording by males is a result of sin distorting God's original plan for humans. A double standard in relationships may be described throughout the Scriptures; yet before the Fall and after the coming of Christ, man and woman are set forth as equals before God.

In the garden, Adam and Eve were created equal (Gen. 1:27–28; 2:18–23). The New Testament teaches that in Christ this Edenic complementariness is restored (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 3:28; Eph. 5:21–33). Mates are equal in possessing one another (1 Cor. 7:4) and are interdependent (1 Cor. 11:11–12). The new creation in Christ makes this possible.

Yet the Fall ruptured God's plan for male/female equality. Sin produced male dominance and female submissiveness (Gen. 3:16). Many scholars believe that this is descriptive rather than prescriptive for all time. Much of the remainder of Scripture, therefore, describes a double standard of male superiority and female inferiority, a kind of "chain of command" of the husband ruling his wife and children. Various passages set forth women being subordinated to men (Num. 30:3–15; 1 Tim 2:11–15). Different standards of fidelity in marriage are found (Num. 5:11–31; Deut. 22:22–29) where unfaithful wives are more severely dealt with than husbands. The New Testament response to this was that of mutual equality and servanthood toward each other with the servanthood of Jesus as the basic criterion (Eph. 5:21–33). Some passages deal with specific problems that appear to be limited to the time and culture of the first-century place (1 Cor. 14:34–35; 1 Tim. 2:11–15; 1 Pet. 3:1–7), though some Bible students see such passages as establishing social orders for all times.

Sexual Deviations Several deviations of sexual behavior are condemned in the biblical teachings: homosexuality (Lev. 18:22; Rom. 1:26–27; 1 Cor. 6:9–10); bestiality (Ex. 22:19; Lev. 18:23); incest (Lev. 18:6–18; 1 Cor. 5); rape (Ex. 22:16–17; Deut. 22:23–29); adultery (Ex. 20:14; Deut. 22:22); prostitution (Prov. 7:1–27; 29:3;); fornication (1 Cor. 6:9–10; compare Matt. 19:9). These are all declared to be outside of the will of God for man and woman who are called to live together in monogamous fidelity within the covenant of marriage. The only other option is the giftedness of celibacy (Matt. 19:12b; 1 Cor. 7:7). Incidentally, the Bible is silent on the subject of masturbation (compare Lev. 15:16). It is silent on physical techniques of sexual intercourse, referring only to marital rights or enjoyment (Ex. 21:10), erotic caresses (Song of Sol. 2:6; 7:1–9), fondling (Gen. 26:8), and pleasure in conceiving (Gen. 18:12). Yet these are set forth in the context of the behavior of married couples. Intimate sexual behavior outside of marriage is considered sexual immorality in the biblical perspective.

Theology of sex The Bible reveals an ethical God who gives humans the gift of sexuality whereby they image God when they join together to complement each other as "one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). All nonmarital sex is outside the boundaries of the will of this ethical God (see Amos 2:6–8 where Israel was to reject sex at the pagan shrines). God's people are expected to exercise self-control, not by asceticism (Col. 2:23; 1 Tim. 4:1–5), but by the power of the Holy Spirit overcoming sexual impulses (Gal. 5:16–25). For the noncelibate, marriage is the only approved outlet for sexual expression (1 Cor. 7:9; Titus 2:5–6). This view equates human wholeness with holiness of life (1 Thess. 4:3–5). One's sexuality is a vital part of Christian holiness and not a necessary evil to be rejected. Within the limits of marriage, sex is for procreation of children, the enhancement of the one-flesh relationship, and the pleasure of the married couple whose love can be nourished thereby. Outside of the limits established by God, sex becomes an evil and destructive force in human life, calling for God's redemptive power to deliver humans trapped therein. Marital sexual love is both a gift and a responsibility from God to be consecrated by the Word and prayer.

SHAALABIN (Shā å lāb′ bĭn) Place name meaning, "place of foxes." Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:42); apparently the same as Shaalbim.

SHAALBIM (Shā ăl′ bĭm) Place name meaning, "place of foxes." Spelled and interpreted differently in different texts and early Greek versions. See Shaalabin. Amorite stronghold eventually controlled by Manasseh and Ephraim (Judg. 1:35). Part of Solomon's second district for supplying provisions for the royal household (1 Kings 4:9). Its location is probably modern Selbit seven miles southeast of Lydda and three miles northwest of Ajalon. David's military hero Eliahba came from Shaalbim (2 Sam. 23:32).

SHAALBON (Shā ăl′ bon) RSV, NRSV, TEV, REB rendering of Shaalbonite, representing an alternative Hebrew spelling of Shaalbim.

SHAALBONITE (Shā ăl′ bō nīte) See Shaalbon.

SHAALIM (Shā′ å lĭm) Place name perhaps meaning, "caves, cavities." Place where Saul sought his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam. 9:4). The place is sometimes equated with Shaalbim or the land of Shual.

SHAAPH (Shā′ ăph) Clan name meaning, "balsam." Apparently two persons in Caleb's line, though some interpreters identify the two (1 Chron. 2:47,49).

SHAARAIM (Shā å rā′ ĭm) Place name meaning, "double doors." 1. City in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:36). Place where David's soldiers pursued Philistine army (1 Sam. 17:52). Some would locate it at khirbet esh-Sharia a mile northeast of Azekah. 2. Town where tribe of Simeon lived

(1 Chron. 4:31), but the parallel texts read Shilhim (Josh. 15:32) and Sharuhen (Josh. 19:6). Many scholars think Sharuhen is meant in Chronicles.

SHAASHGAZ (Shā ăsh' găz) Hebrew transliteration of Persian name of uncertain meaning. Eunuch in charge of Xerxes' harem of which Esther became a member before she was chosen queen (Esth. 2:14).

SHABBETHAI (Shăb' bė thâi) Personal name meaning, "belonging to the sabbath." Levite who explained the law to the people as Ezra read it (Neh. 8:7). He or a namesake opposed Ezra's plan of divorce for foreign wives (Ezra 10:15). He was in charge of "external business of the house of God" (Neh. 11:16 REB): either maintaining outward appearance of the Temple or collecting the tithes.

SHACHIA (Shȧ chī' ȧ) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh fenced in or protected." Clan leader in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:10), following different manuscripts than modern translations which read Sachia. Many manuscripts and early versions read, "Shabia."

SHACKLES See Bond; Fetter.

SHADDAI (Shă' dâi) Transliteration of Hebrew name for God, often translated, "Almighty" following the earliest Greek translation. See Almighty; God of the Fathers; Names of God.

SHADOW A dark image of an object created when the object interrupts rays of light. The Bible uses the term in both literal and figurative senses. Old Testament The Hebrew tsel speaks of shadow as protection and as transitory, short-lived, and changing. The intensive heat, particularly in the summer, made shade and shadows important in the Palestine. Travelers sought rest under a tree (Gen. 18:4; compare Job 40:22) or in a house (Gen. 19:8). Especially at midday when shade virtually vanished, people looked for a shadow (Isa. 16:3; compare Gen. 21:15; Jonah 4; Job 7:2). In the afternoon shadows lengthen (Jer. 6:4; compare Neh. 13:19 NIV). In the evening cool, shadows disappear (Song of Sol. 2:17). In the desert wilderness the traveler found little hope for shade but looked for shade or shadow from hills (Judges 9:36), large rocks (Isa. 32:2), a cave (Ex. 33: 22; 1 Kings 19:9), or a cloud (Isa. 25:5).

Powerful people offer the shadow of protection and security (Song of Sol. 2:3). So does a king (Lam. 4:20; Ezek. 31:6). Still, Israel knew the false claims of kings to provide such protection (Judg. 9:15; compare Isa. 30:2; Ezek. 31). Biblical writers looked to the Messiah for needed shade or shadow (Isa. 32:2; Ezek. 17:23). God was the ultimate shadow of protection for His people (Pss. 36:7; 91:1; 121:5; Isa. 25:4; 49:2; 51:16).

Human life itself is only a brief shadow (Job 8:9; 14:2; Pss. 102:11; 144:4; Eccl. 6:12; 8:13). New Testament The Greek skia can refer to a literal shadow (Mark 4:32; Acts 5:15). More often it refers to death or to an indication of something to come, a foreshadowing. References to death come from Old Testament prophecy—Matthew 4:16 and Luke 1:79 picking up Isaiah 9:2. Dietary laws and religious festivals were only a shadow preparing Israel for the reality made known in Christ (Col. 2:17; Heb. 8:5; 10:1). James used a related Greek word to say that God is not a fleeting, changing shadow (1:17).

SHADRACH (Shăd' răch) Babylonian name meaning, "circuit of the sun." One of Daniel's three friends taken to Babylon during the Exile (Dan. 1:6–7). His Hebrew name was Hananiah. The three were cast into a fiery furnace for refusing to worship a graven image set up by King Nebuchadnezzar. The Lord miraculously delivered them, and they were given places of honor in the kingdom (Dan. 3:30). See Daniel.

SHAGE(E) (Shā gė) Father of one of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:34). The parallel text in 2 Samuel 23 has two similar names: verse 11, Shammah the son of Agee; verse 33, Shammah the Hararite. Shage may represent a combination of the two Hebrew words Shammah and Agee.

SHAHAR (Shā' här) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning, "dawn." Part of title of Psalm 22, translated by most modern translations. NAS transliterates, "Hashshahar," including the Hebrew definite article. See Aijeleth Shahar.

SHAHARAIM (Shā hȧ rā' ĭm) Personal name meaning, "double dawns." Benjaminite who divorced his wives and lived in Moab (1 Chron. 8:8).

SHAHAZIMAH (Shā hȧ zī' mah) Place name meaning, "double peak." Town or mountain marking tribal boundary of Issachar (Josh. 19:22). Its location is not known. Some have suggested it is a combination of two town names: Shahaz and Yammah.

SHAHAZUMAH (Shā hȧ zū' mah) Modern translation spelling of Shahazimah following the written Hebrew text rather than the notes of the earliest Hebrew scribes.

SHALEM (Shā' lēm) Place name meaning, "peace, safety," according to KJV translation (Gen. 33:18; compare NIV text note). Modern translations read, "safely."

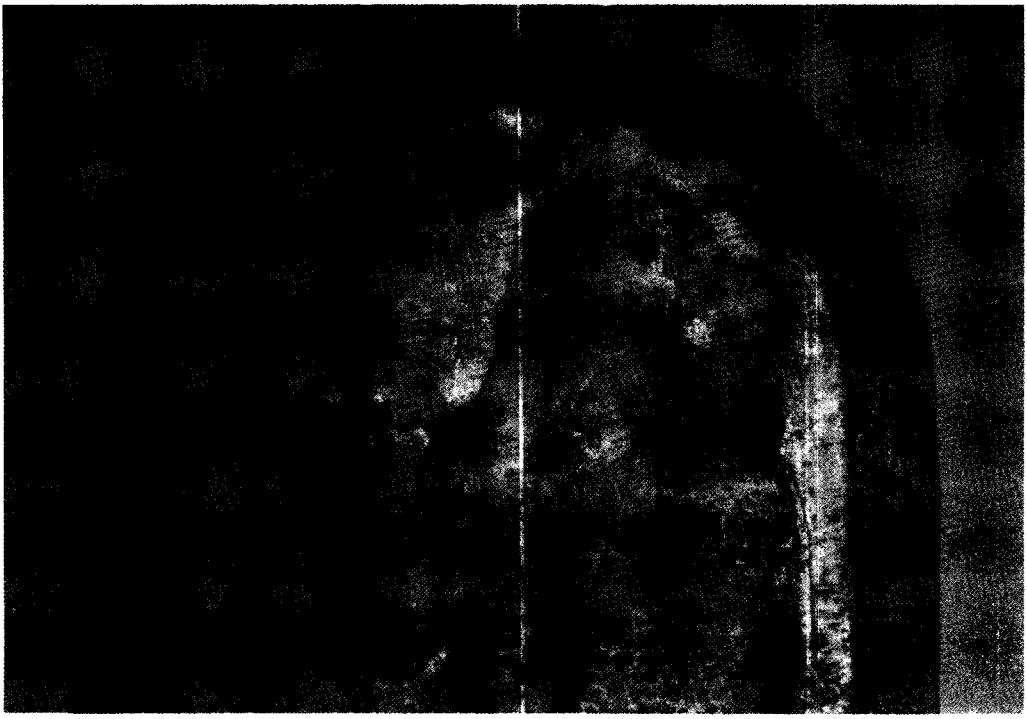
SHALIM (Shā′ līm) KJV spelling of Shaalim.

SHALISHA(H) (Shă lī′ shä) Place name meaning, "the third." Territory where Saul sought his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam. 9:4); probably the same as Baal Shalishah. Its location has recently been questioned. See Baal Shalishah.

SHALLECHETH (Shăl′ lė chĕth) Place name of uncertain meaning, sometimes thought on basis of earliest translations to have resulted from scribe's transposition of first two letters and thus to have read originally, "chamber." Jerusalem gate mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 26:16.

SHALLEKETH (Shăl′ lė kĕth) NIV spelling of Shallecheth.



SHALLUM (Shăl′ lŭm) Personal name meaning, "replacer" or "the replaced." 1. King of Israel (752 B.C.). He assassinated Zechariah and was, in turn, assassinated by Menahem a month later (2 Kings 15:10–15). 2. See 3. Jehoahaz. 3. Husband of Huldah (2 Kings 22:14). 4. A gatekeeper (1 Chron. 9:17,19,31; compare Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45). This may be the same as Shelemiah (1 Chron. 26:14) and Meshelemiah (1 Chron. 9:21; 26:1–14), since these names are closely related in Hebrew. 5. A chief priest (1 Chron. 6:13; Ezra 7:2). 6. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:40). 7. Jeremiah's uncle (Jer. 32:7). 8. Temple doorkeeper (Jer. 35:4). 9. Descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25). 10. Descendant of Naphtali (1 Chron. 7:13). 11. Father of Jehizkiah (2 Chron. 28:12). 12. Porter who agreed to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24). 13. Israelite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:42). 14. Supervisor of half of Jerusalem who helped Nehemiah rebuild the walls (Neh. 3:12).

SHALLUN (Shăl′ lŭn) Personal name perhaps meaning, "peaceful, carefree." Man who helped Nehemiah by repairing the Fountain Gate (Neh. 3:15). NRSV, NAS, TEV follow some early version evidence and read, "Shallum."

SHALMAI (Shăl′ māī) Personal name meaning, "coat." Manuscripts have several variant spellings. Servant (Nethanim) in Temple (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48).

SHALMAN (Shăl′ măn) Personal name meaning, "complete, peace." Mysterious figure in Hosea 10:14, sometimes identified by scholars as an abbreviation of Shalmanezer V of Assyria and sometimes as a ruler of Moab listed by Tiglath-Pileser III among kings paying him tribute. His name became synonymous with violence and ruthlessness.

SHALMANESER (Shăl man ē′ sĕr) Personal name meaning, "Shalmanu (the god) is the highest ranking one." 1. An Assyrian king who ruled

The monolith inscription of Shalmaneser III which records in cuneiform the Battle of Qarqar.

1274–1245 B.C. The records of his military exploits set a precedent which succeeding kings followed. 2. Shalmaneser III ruled Assyria 858–824 B.C. He fought a group of small kingdoms, including Israel, in the battle of Qarqar in 853 B.C. Despite claiming victory, Shalmaneser proceeded no farther.

3. Shalmaneser V ruled Assyria 726–722 B.C. He completed the attack on Samaria begun by his predecessor, Tiglath-pileser III. In 722 Israel fell to Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17:6), thus ending the Northern Kingdom forever. See Assyria; Israel.

SHAMA (Shā′ mȧ) Personal name meaning, "he has heard." Military hero under David (1 Chron. 11:44).

SHAMARIAH (Shȧ mȧ rī′ ah) KJV spelling of Shermariah (2 Chron. 11:19).

SHAME AND HONOR Sociological studies have increased appreciation for shame and honor as two pivotal values in ancient societies. As a noun, honor approximates our ideas of esteem, respect, (high) regard, or (good) reputation. Shame, the opposite of honor, approximates humiliation or loss of standing. Shame is also used as a euphemism for nakedness (Jer. 13:26; Nah. 3:5; Hab. 2:15). In a similar way, to give honor to private parts is to clothe them (1 Cor. 12:23–24). English preserves this connection between shame and nakedness when we speak of someone's guilt being exposed. In Jeremiah 2:26, for example, a thief once caught suffers shame, that is, the loss of esteem in the public eye.

To honor is to recognize the value of someone or thing and to act accordingly. Honoring parents (Ex. 20:12), for example, involves providing for their material needs (Matt. 15:4–5) so that their poverty would not be a source of shame. To honor can mean to reward with tangible signs of respect (2 Chron. 16:14; Esth. 6:8–11). To shame someone is to challenge that one's reputation or to disregard his or her worth. The ancients viewed every human action and interaction as an occasion for either gaining honor, that is, increasing one's value in the public eye, or for being shamed, that is, having one's estimation degraded. The desire to maintain one's honor and to avoid shame or dishonor was a powerful incentive for right action (Job 11:3; Ps. 70:3; Ezek. 43:10). Honor was thought of as a limited good, that is, the amount of available honor was limited. If one lost honor, another had to gain honor (Prov. 5:9).

Those who demonstrate a lack of concern for matters of honor and shame are termed shameless. Having rejected the framework for values, such will do anything (Job. 19:3; Jer. 6:15). Others fail to recognize what is a source of honor and what a source of shame. Those who are ashamed of Christ and His words (Mark 8:32) are shamed by what should give them honor.

The reference to the man and woman in Gen. 2:25 being naked and unashamed likely does not highlight that they were not bashful. Rather, their honor or respect was intact in contrast to the loss of respect they suffered when God made their guilt public (Gen. 3:8–10). Chris Church

SHAMED (Shā′ mĕd) Personal name meaning, "destroyed, ruin." KJV, REB reading following Hebrew of Benjaminite's name (1 Chron. 8:12). Other modern translations read, "Shemed." Many commentators follow early manuscripts and versions in reading, "Shemer."

SHAMER (Shā′ mēr) Variant spelling of Shomer or Shemer (1 Chron. 6:46; 7:34).

SHAMGAR (Shăm′ gär) Hurrian name meaning, "Shimig (the god) has given." A mysterious warrior who slew 600 Philistines with an oxgoad, a long metal-tipped pole (Judg. 3:31). His name is Hurrian, but whether that was his lineage is uncertain. In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5), Shamgar (the "son of Anath") is praised for clearing the highways of robbers, making travel once again possible. See Anath; Judges.

SHAMHUTH (Shăm′ hŭth) Head of fifth division of David's army, serving during the fifth month (1 Chron. 27:8). Many commentators consider the name a scribal combination of Shamman (2 Sam. 23:25) and Shammoth (1 Chron. 11:27).

SHAMIR (Shā′ mīr) Personal and place name meaning, "thorn" or "diamond." 1. A Levite (1 Chron. 24:24), written Shamur in some manuscripts. 2. Town in hill country of Judah assigned to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:48). Located either at modern el-Bireh near khirbet Somera northeast of en-Rimmon or khirbet es-Sumara about twelve miles west-southwest of Hebron. 3. Home of Tola, the judge from the tribe of Issachar, in mount Ephraim (Judg. 10:1). Located possibly at khirbet es-Sumara about seven miles south of Shechem. Some commentators would equate it with Samaria.

SHAMLAI (Shăm′ lâi) Written form of personal name in Hebrew text of Ezra 2:46. Scribal note has Shalmai and is followed by many translations. See Shalmai.

SHAMMA (Shăm′ mȧ) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Leader of clan of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37). 2. Spelling of name of a military hero under David (2 Sam. 23:11; compare vv. 25,33 where Hebrew spelling is "Shammah").

SHAMMAH (Shăm′ mah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, "frightful" or "astonishing" or "he heard." 1. Edomite tribe descended from Esau (Gen. 36:13). 2. Older brother of David (1 Sam. 16:9; 17:13) and father of Jonadab (2 Sam. 13:3,32) and Jonathan (2 Sam. 21:21) if the similar Hebrew spellings in 2 Samuel point to the same person mentioned in 1 Samuel. See Shimeah. 3. David's military heo (2 Sam. 23:25; spelled Shammoth in 1 Chron. 11:27). 4. Another of David's military heroes (2 Sam. 23:33) or, with a slight change of the Hebrew text suggested by many commentators, the father of Jonathan, the military hero (REB, NRSV, NIV). 5. See Shamma 2. 6. See Shamhuth.

SHAMMAI (Shăm' mā ī) Abbreviated form of personal name, perhaps meaning, "He heard." 1. Member of tribe of Judah and clan of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:28,32). 2. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:44). 3. Another descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

SHAMMOTH (Shăm' mŏth) Variant spelling (1 Chron. 11:27) for Shammah (2 Sam. 23:25).

SHAMMUA(H) (Shăm mū à) Personal name meaning, "one who was heard." 1. Spy representing tribe of Reuben (Num. 13:4). 2. Son of David (2 Sam. 5:14; spelled "Shimea" in 1 Chron. 3:5). 3. Father of a Levite (Neh. 11:17; spelled Shemaiah in 1 Chron. 9:16). 4. Priest in days of Joiakim about 600 B.C. (Neh. 12:18).

SHAMSHERAI (Shăm' shĕ râi) Personal name of uncertain meaning; some commentators regard it as a combination of Shimshai and Shimri. Benjaminite living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

SHAPHAM (Shā' phăm) Personal name of unknown meaning. Leader of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12).

SHAPHAN (Shā' phăn) Personal name meaning, "coney." Prominent court official during King Josiah's reign in Judah (2 Kings 22). Shaphan served as scribe and treasurer. During Josiah's religious reforms and refurbishment of the Temple, Shaphan delivered the newfound book of the law (probably Deuteronomy) from Hilkiah the priest to the king's palace. He also was sent to Huldah the prophetess to confer concerning the book (22:14). Shaphan and his sons befriended Jeremiah on several occasions. See Ahikam; Elasah; Gedeliah; Jaazaniah.

SHAPHAT (Shā' phăt) Personal name meaning, "He has established justice." 1. Spy from tribe of Simeon (Num. 13:5). 2. Father of Elisha (2 Kings 6:31). 3. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22). 4. Supervisor of David's cattle herds (1 Chron. 27:29). 5. Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12).

SHAPHER (Shā' phĕr) KJV spelling of Mount Shepher. Place name perhaps meaning, "lovely." Stop on Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 33:23), somewhere on east of the Gulf of Aqaba.

SHAPHIR (Shā' phīr) Modern translations' spelling of Saphir.

SHARAI (Shā' râi) Personal name perhaps meaning, "He loosed or redeemed." Man with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

SHARAIM KJV spelling of Shaaraim in Joshua 15:36.

SHARAR (Shā' rar) Personal name perhaps meaning, "he is healthy." See Sacar.

SHARD Pottery fragment found in archaeological excavations and used for dating. See Archaeology; Chronology; Pottery; Writing.

SHAREZER (Shà rē' zēr) Abbreviated form of Akkadian name meaning, "may (god's name) protect the king." Son of Sennacherib who helped murder his father (2 Kings 19:37). Assyrian records report the death as occurring in 681 B.C. See Assyria. 2. Name open to several interpretations in Zechariah 7:2. The full name may be Bethel-sharezer, meaning, "may the god Bethel protect the king" (see REB). Sharezer may be a man sent to the house of God (beth-el in Hebrew) to pray (KJV). The town of Bethel may have sent Sharezer to pray (NAS, NIV, NRSV, TEV). The name probably indicates the person was born in Babylonian Exile. He may have come with his questions from Babylon and have come as a representative of the people of Bethel.

SHARON, PLAIN OF (Shăr' on) Geographical name meaning, "flat land" or "wetlands." 1. A coastal plain which runs from near modern Tel Aviv to just south of Mount Carmel (about 50 miles). The area had abundant marshes, forests, and sand dunes, but few settlements during biblical days. Because of its fertility and low risk of flooding, the plain was used more by migrant herdsmen than settled farmers. Isaiah 35:2 parallels Sharon with Lebanon, which was known for its trees. Isaiah 65:10 speaks of the area as an excellent pasture for flocks, symbolic of the peace that God would one day grant to His people. See Palestine.

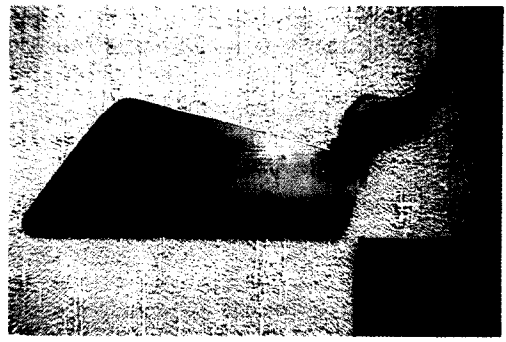
2. Area of uncertain location east of the Jordan inhabited by the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:16) and mentioned by King Mesha of Moab. See Mesha.

SHARONITE (Shâ′ rō nīte) Person who lived in Plain of Sharon.

SHARUHEN (Shâ rū′ hĕn) Place name perhaps meaning, "free pasture land." Town assigned to tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:6) located in the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:32, where spelling is Shilhim; in 1 Chron. 4:31 spelling is Shaaraim; Egyptian spelling is apparently Shurahuna). The Hyksos withdrew there after the Egyptians defeated them about 1540 B.C. See Hyksos. The traditional location is tell el-Farah, but recent study has favored tell el-Ajjul about four miles south of Gaza, though this has often been identified as Beth Eglayim. Excavations have shown this to have been a large, well-fortified, wealthy city.

SHASHAI (Shā′ shâi) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Man married to a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

SHASHAK (Shā′ shăk) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps of Egyptian origin. Leader of tribe of Benjamin living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:14,25).



SHAUL (Shā′ ŭl) Personal name meaning, "asked of." 1. Transliteration of Hebrew name of King Saul. 2. Grandson of Jacob and son of Simeon with a Canaanite mother (Gen. 46:10). 3. Early king of Edom from Rehoboth (Gen. 36:37; 1 Chron. 1:48). 4. Levite (1 Chron. 6:24).

SHAULITE (Shā′ ŭl īte) Member of clan of tribe of Simeon descended from Shaul (Num. 26:13).

SHAVEH (Shā′ vĕh) Place name meaning, "valley, plain" or "ruler." Place where the king of Sodom met Abraham on the latter's return from defeating the coalition of kings (Gen. 14:17). It is also called the king's valley or dale. There Absalom raised a momument to himself (2 Sam. 18:18). The Genesis Apocryphon locates it in Beth-Hakkerem, which is two and a half miles south of Jerusalem where the Kidron and Hinnom valleys join. It has also been located north, east, and west of Jerusalem.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (Shā′ vĕh-kĭr ĭ å thā′ ĭm) Place name meaning, "waste land of Kiriathaim." This valley is the high plain above the Arnon River. There Chedorlaomer and his coalition of kings defeated the Emim (Gen. 14:5). See Chedorlaomer; Emim; Kiriathaim.

SHAVING See Razors.

An ancient shaving razor with a goat's leg handle.

SHAVSHA (Shăv′ shå) spelling of Shisha (1 Kings 4:3) in 1 Chronicles 18:16. See Shisha.

SHEAF Harvested grain bound together into a bundle. English translation of three Hebrew terms. Joseph's dream featured sheaves still in the field (Gen. 37:7). Laws of sacrifice called for the first harvested sheaves to be sacrificed (Lev. 23:10–15). Some sheaves were for gleaners (Deut. 24:19; Ruth 2:7). The prophets used sheaves as figures of judgment (Jer. 9:22; Amos 2:13; Mic. 4:12; Zech. 12:6). See Agriculture; Gleaning; Grain; Harvest; Sacrifice.

SHEAL (Shē′ ăl) Personal name meaning, "ask." Many commentators change the Hebrew text slightly to read, "Yishal" or "Jishal," meaning, "he asks." Israelite who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:29).

SHEALTIEL (Shė ăl′ tĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "I have asked of God." Father of Zerubbabel, the governor of Jerusalem under the Persian regime following the Exile (Ezra 3:2, Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1). First Chronicles 3:17 makes him Zerubbabel's uncle. This could involve the practice of Levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–10). He was included in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27).

SHEARIAH (Shē å rī′ ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "Yah has honored" or "Yah knows." Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:38).

SHEARING HOUSE KJV translation (2 Kings 10:12,14) of what many modern translators take as place name. See Beth-Eked. REB reads, "shepherds' shelter."

S

SHEARJASHUB (Shē′ är jā′ shŭb) Symbolic personal name meaning, "a remnant shall return." First son of the prophet Isaiah, born probably around 737 B.C., near the beginning of his father's ministry in Jerusalem. Isaiah apparently named him (and his brother, Mahershalalhashbaz) as an embodiment of prophecy, that Judah would fall, but a remnant would survive. On one occasion, Shearjashub accompanied his father on a trip to assure King Ahaz that the alliance of Syria and Israel would not be allowed to harm Judah (Isa. 7:3–7). See Isaiah.

SHEATH Protective holder for sword attached to a belt. See Arms and Armor; Sword.

SHEBA (Shē′ bə) 1. See Sabeans. 2. Personal name meaning, "fullness, completeness." Name of a Benjaminite who led a revolt against David (2 Sam. 20) and of a member of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:13). 3. Personal name spelled in Hebrew like the nation of 1. above. The name of a son of Joktan (Gen. 10:28) and of Jokshan (Gen. 25:3).

SHEBA, QUEEN OF Ruler of Sabeans who visited Solomon to test his wisdom, learn of his God, and enhance trade relations. See Sabean.

SHEBAH (Shē′ băh) Place name meaning, "overflow" or "oath." Name Isaac gave Beer-sheba (Gen. 26:33). See Beer-Sheba.

SHEBAM (Shē′ băm) KJV spelling for Sebam.

SHEBANIAH (Shĕ bə nī′ ah) Personal name appearing in short and long form in Hebrew meaning, "Yahweh came near." A clan of Levites in which the name was used for several individuals (1 Chron. 15:24; Neh. 9:4–5; 10:4,10,12; 12:14).

SHEBARIM (Shē′ bə rĭm) Place name meaning, "The Breaking Points." Place with symbolic name and uncertain location near Ai (Josh. 7:5), translated as "stone quarries" (NIV; compare REB). Commentators have suggested, "Breaks" or "Ravines."

SHEBAT (Shē′ băt) Modern translations' spelling for Sebat.

SHEBER (Shē′ bĕr) Personal name perhaps meaning, "foolish one," "lion," or "fracture." Son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:48).

SHEBNA(H) (Shĕb′ nah) Personal name meaning, "He came near." Royal scribe (2 Kings 18:18,37; 19:2; Isa. 36:3,22; 37:2) and "comptroller of the household" (Isa. 22:15 REB) under King Hezekiah about 715 B.C. See Scribe.

SHEBUEL (Shĕ′ bū ĕl) Personal name meaning, "Return, O God." 1. Grandson of Moses and head of a clan of Levites (1 Chron. 23:16; 26:24; sometimes equated with Shubael of 1 Chron. 24:20). 2. Levite, son of Heman (1 Chron. 25:4); apparently the same as Shubael (1 Chron. 25:20).

SHECANIAH (Shĕ cə nī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has taken up dwelling." Both long and short forms appear in the Hebrew text. 1. Clan leader (Ezra 8:3). 2. Leader of another clan (Ezra 8:5). 3. Israelite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:2). 4. Father of man who helped Nehemiah repair Jerusalem wall and keeper of the east gate (Neh. 3:29). 5. Father-in-law of Nehemiah's enemy, Tobiah (Neh. 6:18). 6. Priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Neh. 12:3). 7. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:21). 8. Leader of priestly division under David (1 Chron. 24:11; may be equated with founder of priestly clan of Neh. 10:4; 12:14 where spelling is Shebaniah). 9. Priest in time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:15).

SHECHANIAH (Shĕch ə nī′ ah) Abbreviated Hebrew form of personal name, Shecaniah.

SHECHEM (Shē′ chĕm) Personal and place name meaning, "shoulder, back." 1. District and city in the hill country of Ephraim in north central Palestine. The first capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, the city was built mainly on the slope, or shoulder, of Mount Ebal. Situated where main highways and ancient trade routes converged, Shechem was an important city long before the Israelites occupied Canaan.

The city makes its earliest appearance in biblical history in connection with Abram's arrival in the land (Gen. 12:6–7). When Jacob returned from Paddan Aram, he settled down at Shechem and purchased land from the sons of Hamor (33:18–19). In Genesis 33—34, Shechem was the name of the city and also of the prince of the city. While Jacob was at Shechem, the unfortunate incident of Dinah occurred. Simeon and Levi, her full brothers, destroyed the city (Gen. 34). Later, the brothers of Joseph were herding Jacob's flock at Shechem when Joseph was sent to check on their welfare. Joseph was buried in the plot of ground that his father Jacob had purchased here (Josh. 24:32).

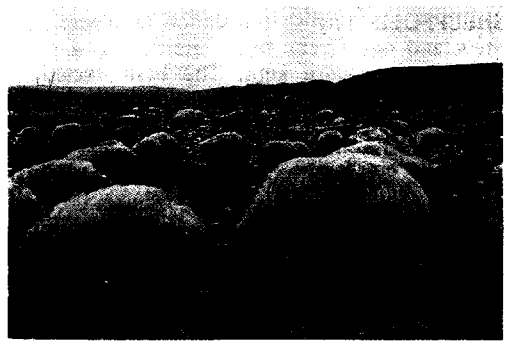
As the Israelites conquered Canaan, they turned unexpectedly to Shechem. Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal and led the people in its building, renewing their commitment to the law of Moses (Josh. 8:30–35; compare Deut. 27:12–13). Shechem lay in the tribal territory of Ephraim near their border with Manasseh (Josh. 17:7). It was a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7) and a Levitical city (21:21). See Cities of Refuge; Levitical Cities. Joshua led Israel to renew its covenant with God there (Josh. 24:1–17). Gideon's son Abimelech fought the leaders of Shechem (Judg. 8:31—9:49).

Rehoboam, successor to King Solomon, went to Shechem to be crowned king over all Israel (1 Kings 12:1). Later, when the nation divided into two kingdoms, Shechem became the first capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 12:25). Samaria eventually became the permanent political capital of the Northern Kingdom, but Shechem retained its religious importance. It apparently was a sanctuary for worship of God in Hosea's time about 750 B.C. (6:9).



The name Shechem occurs in historical records and other sources outside Palestine. It is mentioned as a city captured by Senusert III of Egypt (before 1800 B.C.) and appears in the Egyptian cursing texts of about the same time. "The mountain of Shechem" is referred to in a satirical letter of the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt. Shechem also figures in the Amarna Letters; its ruler, Lab'ayu, and his sons were accused of acting against Egypt, though the ruler protested that he was absolutely loyal to the pharaoh.

At Shechem (sometimes identified with Sychar), Jesus visited with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well (John 4). The Samaritans had built their temple on Mount Gerizim, where they practiced their form of religion. Rich Murrell SHECHEMITE (Shĕ' chĕm īte) Resident of or native of Shechem.

SHEDEUR (Shĕ' dē ŭr) Dialectical spelling (pronunciation) of a personal name meaning, "Shaddai is light." Father of a leader of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30,35; 10:18).

SHEEP Animals important to the economy of ancient Israel and her neighbors. Translation of seven different Hebrew words and expressions. Ts'on is a collective term for small domesticated animals, particularly sheep and goats. Seh is an individual member of the collective ts'on, one sheep or goat. Kebes is a young ram, as is the apparently related word keseb. Kibsah and kisbah are young lambs. Tsoneh is either a variant spelling of or the feminine of Ts'on. Rachel is the mother sheep. The male sheep or ram is 'ayil, which served as a symbol of authority and rule

Asian sheep grazing on the site of what was once a part of the ancient city of Laodicea.

(Ex. 15:15; Ezek. 17:13; 31:11). Sheep symbolized people without leadership and unity, scattered like sheep without a shepherd (1 Kings 22:17), innocent people not deserving of punishment (1 Chron. 21:17), as helpless facing slaughter (Ps. 44:11,22) and death (Ps. 49:14). God's people are His sheep enjoying His protection and listening to His voice (Pss. 78:52; 95:7; 100:3; compare Ps. 23). Sheep represent economic prosperity (Ps. 144:13) or poverty (Isa. 7:21). Straying sheep illustrate human sin (Isa. 53:6), but the silent lamb at the slaughter prepares the way for Christ's sacrifice (Isa. 53:7). Ezekiel 34 uses the life of sheep and shepherds to picture God's relationship with His people and their rulers. Human value is contrasted to that of sheep (Matt. 12:12). The shepherd's separating his ts'on into sheep and goats illustrates the final judgment (Matt. 25). The search for one lost sheep depicts God's love for His people (Luke 15). Jesus contrasted His care for His flock with other religious leaders, especially the Pharisees who behaved as thieves and robbers (John 10). His commission to Peter was to take care of the sheep (John 21). See Agriculture; Cattle; Economic Life. Trent C. Butler

SHEEP BREEDER See Herdsman.

SHEEP GATE Entrance in northeastern corner of Jerusalem's city wall (Neh. 3:1,32; 12:39). Apparently, sheep for Temple sacrifice entered the city through it. It was close to the Pool of Bethesda (John 5:2).

SHEEP MARKET KJV translation of Greek term meaning, "pertaining to sheep" and referring to the Sheep Gate (John 5:2). See Sheep Gate.

SHEEPCOTE KJV translation of Hebrew term meaning, "home." Modern translations usually use "pasture" as the sheep's home (2 Sam. 7:8; 1 Chron. 17:7). In 1 Samuel 24:3 the Hebrew term refers to an enclosure and is usually translated "sheepfolds" or "sheep pens."

SHEEPFOLD English translation of several Hebrew and one Greek term referring to a place where sheep were kept. The basic meanings range from stone wall, to place of confinement, and home. Related words appearing in Genesis 49:14; Judges 5:16; Ezekiel 40:43; and Psalm 68:13 are variously interpreted from the context and translated: "saddlebags," "double-pronged hooks," and "campfires" (NIV), "sheepfolds" and "pegs" (NRSV), "sheepfolds" and "double hooks" (NAS), "cattle pens," "sheepfolds," and "rims" (REB), "burdens," "sheepfolds," "pots," and "hooks" (KJV), "saddlebags," "sheep," "sheep pens," and "ledges" (TEV). The latest Hebrew dictionary completed in 1990 but published in parts over two decades gives differing meanings for the two related terms: "saddlebags" and "sheepfolds," separating the Ezekiel passage out as a meaning unto itself.

SHEEPSHEARERS Persons who cut wool from the sheep. Evidently, these are not professionals but the owners of the sheep (Gen. 31:19) or persons working for the owner (Gen. 38:12). The Hebrew does not distinguish between "sheepshearers" and "sheepshearing," so that both translations are possible in several passages. The time of shearing sheep was a festive time of parties and inviting friends (1 Sam. 25; 2 Sam. 13). The word for shearing sheep was also used for cutting human hair (Jer. 7:29; Mic. 1:16).

SHEERAH (Shē' ē rah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "blood kin." Female member of tribe of Ephraim who established the two cities of Bethhoron as well as Uzzen-sherah (1 Chron. 7:24).

SHEET English translation of Greek word meaning, "a linen cloth" and usually used for ships' sails. Such a cloth held all the clean and unclean animals in the vision that taught Peter that God loved and offered salvation to people who were not Jews (Acts 10:11; 11:5).

SHEHARIAH (Shē hȧ rī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah is the dawn." Leader of tribe of Benjamin who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

SHEKEL (Shĕ' kĕl) Hebrew weight of about four tenths of an ounce. This became the name of a silver coin with that weight. See Coins; Weights and Measures.

SHEKINAH (Shĕ kī' năh) Transliteration of Hebrew word not found in the Bible but used in many of the Jewish writings to speak of God's presence. The term means "that which dwells," and is implied through out the Bible whenever it refers to God's nearness either in a person, object, or His glory. It is often used in combination with glory to speak of the presence of God's shekinah glory. See Glory.

SHELAH (Shē' lah) Personal name meaning, "please" or "be still, rest." Son of Judah and original ancestor of clan in tribe of Judah (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:20; 1 Chron. 2:3; 4:21). At times Shelah is the transliteration for the Hebrew name otherwise transliterated Salah. See Salah.

SHELANITE (Shĕ' lȧ nīte) Member of clan of Shelah.

SHELEMIAH (Shĕ lĕ mī' ah) Personal name appearing in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning, "Yahweh restored, replaced, repaid." 1. Father of a messenger of King Zedekiah about 590 B.C. (Jer. 37:3). 2. Father of the captain of the guard who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. 37:13). 3. Ancestor of an official of King Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14). 4. Court official whom King Jehoiakim (609–597 B.C.) ordered to arrest Jeremiah and from whom God hid Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26). 5. Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:14) and apparently called Meshelemiah in 1 Chronicles 26:1,9. 6. and 7. Two Jews who married foreign women (Ezra 10:39,41). 8. Father of man who helped Nehemiah rebuild Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 3:30). 9. Priest whom Nehemiah made treasurer (Neh. 13:13).

SHELEPH (Shē' lĕph) Tribal name perhaps meaning, "remove, take out of." Son of Joktan and original ancestor of Yemenite tribes living near Aden (Gen. 10:26).

SHELESH (Shē' lĕsh) Personal name perhaps meaning, "triplet." Leader of a clan in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35).

SHELOMI (Shė lō' mī) Personal name meaning, "my peace." Father of a leader of tribe of Asher (Num. 34:27).

SHELOMITH (Shė lō' mĭth) Feminine form of Shelomoth. 1. Head of a family which returned from Babylonian Exile with Ezra about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:10). 2. Son of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:20). 3. Cousin of Moses and head of a Levitical group (1 Chron. 23:18); apparently the same as Shelomoth (1 Chron. 24:22). 4. Priest over the cultic treasury under David (1 Chron. 26:25–28, where Hebrew scribes have interchanged Shelomith and Shelomoth). 5. Woman of tribe of Dan whose son cursed the divine name, thus being guilty of blasphemy. The Israelites followed God's orders and stoned him to death (Lev. 24:10–23). 6. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19).

SHELOMOTH (Shė lō' mōth) Personal name meaning, "peaces." See Shelomith. Levitical leader under David (1 Chron. 23:9; Hebrew scribal note has Shelomith).

SHELUMIEL (Shė lū′ mĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God is my wholeness or health." Leader in tribe of Simeon (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36,41; 10:19).

SHEM (Shĕm) Personal name meaning, "name." Noah's oldest son and original ancestor of Semitic peoples including Israel (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18–27; 10:1,21–22,31; 11:10–11). He carried God's blessing (9:26–27). Through his line came Abraham and the covenant of blessing.

SHEMA (Shē′ mä) Transliteration of Hebrew imperative meaning, "Hear," (Deut 6:4) and applied to 6:4–9, as the basic statement of the Jewish law. The Shema became for the people of God a confession of faith by which they acknowledged the one true God and His commandments for them. Later worship practice combined Deuteronomy 6:4–9; 11:13–21; Numbers 15:37–41 into the larger Shema as the summary of Jewish confession. When Jesus was asked about the "greatest commandment," He answered by quoting the Shema (Mark 12:29).

SHEMA (Shē′ mä) Personal name meaning, "a hearing" and place name perhaps meaning, "hyena." 1. Son of Hebron and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43). 2. Member and clan ancestor of tribe of Reuben(1 Chron. 5:8); possibly the same as Shemaiah (1 Chron. 5:4). 3. Benjaminite clan leader in Aijalon (1 Chron. 8:13); apparently the same as Shimhi (1 Chron. 8:21). 4. Man who helped Ezra teach the law (Neh. 8:4). 5. Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:26) and apparently occupied by Simeon (Josh. 19:2; Sheba may be a scribe's repetition of previous word instead of similar sounding Shema). It may be the same as Jeshua (Neh. 11:26). See Jeshua 9.

SHEMAAH (Shė mā′ ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "a hearing." Father of Benjaminite military leaders who deserted Saul to join David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

SHEMAIAH (Shė māī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh heard," with both long and short forms in Hebrew. 1. A prophet in the days of Rehoboam whose message from God prevented war between Israel and Judah about 930 B.C. (1 Kings 12:22). His preaching humbled Rehoboam and the leaders of Judah, leading God not to permit Shishak of Egypt to destroy Jerusalem (2 Chron. 12). 2. False prophet among Babylonian Exiles who opposed Jeremiah's word (Jer. 29:24–32). 3. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22). 4. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37). 5. Member of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4); perhaps identical with Shema 2. (1 Chron. 5:8). 6. A Levite (Neh. 11:15; compare 1 Chron. 9:14). 7. A Levite (1 Chron. 9:16) probably identical with Shammua 3. (Neh. 11:17). 8. Head of one of the six Levitical families under David (1 Chron. 15:8,11). 9. Levitical scribe who recorded the priestly divisions under David (1 Chron. 24:6). 10. Head of an important family of gatekeepers (1 Chron. 24:4–8). 11. Levite in time of Hezekiah about 715 B.C. (2 Chron. 29:14); possibly identical with the Levite of 2 Chronicles 31:15. 12. Head of a family that returned with Ezra from Babylonian Exile about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:13). He may be the same man Ezra sent to get more ministers for the Temple (Ezra 8:16).

13. Priest married to a foreign woman (Ezra 10:21). 14. Man married to a foreign woman (Ezra 10:31). 15. Keeper of east gate who helped Nehemiah repair Jerusalem's wall about 445 B.C. (Neh. 3:29). 16. Prophet Tobiah and Sanballat hired against Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10–12). 17. Original ancestor of a priestly family (Neh. 10:8; 12:6,18). 18. Leader of Judah who participated with Nehemiah in dedicating the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34). 19. Priest who helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:42). 20. Priest whose grandson helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:35). 21. Levitical musician who helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:36). 22. Father of the prophet Urijah (Jer. 26:20). 23. Father of an official at Jehoikim's court about 600 B.C. (Jer. 36:12). 24. Levite in days of Jehoshaphat (873–848 B.C.) who taught God's law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8). 25. Levite in days of Josiah about 621 B.C. (2 Chron. 35:9).

SHEMARIAH (Shĕ mâ rī′ ah) Personal name in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning, "Yahweh protected." 1. Benjaminite who deserted Saul to join David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5). 2. Son of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:19). 3. and 4. Men with foreign wives under Ezra (Ezra 10:32,41).

SHEMEBER (Shĕ mē′ ber) Royal name meaning, "powerful name." King of Zeboiim who rebelled against Chedorlaomer, leading to Abraham's rescue mission of Lot (Gen. 14:2). The Genesis Apocryphon and Samaritan Pentateuch read his name as Shemiabad, "the name is lost." See Zeboiim.

SHEMED (Shē′ mĕd) Personal name meaning, "destruction." Benjaminite credited with building or rebuilding Ono and Lod (1 Chron. 8:12).

SHEMER (Shē′ mĕr) Personal name meaning, "protection, preservation." 1. Modern translations' spelling of Shamer, the father of a Temple musician under David (1 Chron. 6:46). 2. Head of clan of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34) with variant spelling Shomer (v. 32). 3. Original owner of the mount of Samaria for whom Samaria was named (1 Kings 16:24). See Samaria.

SHEMIDA(H) (Shĕ mī′ da) Personal name meaning, "The Name has known" or "The Name troubles Himself for." Clan head among the Gileadites in tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:32; compare Josh. 17:2; 1 Chron. 7:19). The Samaritan Ostraca lists Shemida as a territorial name in territory of Manasseh.

SHEMIDAITE (Shĕ mī′ dā īte) Member of clan of Shemida.

SHEMINITH (Shĕ′ mĭ nĭth) Musical direction meaning, "the eighth" used in titles of Psalms 6; 12 and in 1 Chronicles 15:21. It may mean on an eight-stringed instrument; on the eighth string of an instrument; on a deeper octave than the Alamoth (1 Chron. 15:20); for the eighth and concluding rite of the fall new year festival; or refer to the tuning of the instrument or the scale of the melody.

SHEMIRAMOTH (Shĕ mīr′ ā mŏth) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Temple Levitical musician in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,20; 16:5). 2. Levite under King Jehoshaphat (873–848 B.C.), who taught the law (2 Chron. 17:8).

SHEMUEL (Shĕ mū′ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "Sumu is god," "The Name is God," "God is exalted," or "Son of God." 1. Precise transliteration of Hebrew for Samuel. See Samuel. 2. Leader of tribe of Simeon (Num. 34:20). 3. Clan chief in tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

SHEN (Shĕn) Place name meaning, "the tooth." Locality used to locate Eben-ezer (1 Sam. 7:12), translated and interpreted variously since the earliest translations. It may refer to a prominent hill or mountain shaped like a tooth. Early translations read it as "Jeshanah" (REB, NRSV), but that appears to be too far east for the context. Some early translators read, "Beth-shan." The exact location is debated and uncertain.

SHENA(Z)ZAR (Shĕ nā′ zär) Babylonian personal name meaning, "Sin (a god) protects" or "may Sin protect." Son of King Jehoiachin (1 Chron. 3:18). He is often identified with Sheshbazzar as an alternate transliteration of a Babylonian name, but this has been denied recently.

SHENIR (Shē′ nĭr) KJV alternate spelling of Senir (Deut. 3:9; Song of Sol. 4:8).

SHEOL The abode of the dead in Hebrew thought. Sheol was thought to be deep within the earth (Ps. 88:6; Ezek. 26:20; 31:14–15; Amos 9:2) and was entered by crossing a river (Job 33:18). Sheol is pictured as a city with gates (Isa. 38:10), a place of ruins (Ezek. 26:20), or a trap (2 Sam. 22:6; Ps. 18:5). Sheol is sometimes personified as a hungry beast (Pr. 27:20; Isa. 5:14; Hab. 2:5) with an open mouth and an insatiable appetite. Sheol is described as a place of dust (Ps. 30:9; Job 17:16) and of gloom and darkness (Job. 10:21).

The Hebrews conceived of the individual as a unity of body and spirit. Thus it was impossible for the dead whose bodies had decayed (Ps. 49:14) to experience more than a marginal existence. Various terms are used by English translators to describe the residents of Sheol (Job 26:5; Isa. 14:9), including shades (NRSV, REB), spirits of the dead (TEV), or simply, the dead (KJV). The dead experience no remembrance (Pss. 6:5; 88:12), no thought (Eccl. 9:10), no speech (Pss. 31:17; 94:17), especially no words of praise (Pss. 6:5; 30:9), and no work (Eccl. 9:10). Such existence is fittingly described as sleep (Isa. 14:9). For the dead Sheol is a place of pain and distress (Ps. 116:3), weakness (Isa. 14:10), helplessness (Ps. 88:4); hopelessness (Isa. 38:10), and destruction (Isa. 38:17).

Sheol was regarded as the abode of all the dead, both righteous and wicked (Job 30:23). It was, in fact, regarded as a consolation that none escaped death (Ps. 49:10–12; Ezek. 31:16). Only once does the Old Testament speak of Sheol specifically as the abode of the wicked (Ps. 9:17). Some earthly distinctions were regarded as continuing in Sheol. Thus kings have thrones (Isa. 14:9); and warriors possess weapons and shields (Ezek. 32:27). Here the biblical writers possibly mocked the views of their neighbors. Ezekiel 32:18–30 pictures the dead as grouped by nation with the crucial distinction between the circumcised and uncircumcised continuing in the grave.

To go to Sheol alive was regarded as a punishment for exceptional wickedness (Ps. 55:15; Num. 16:30,33 where the earth swallowed Korah and his band alive). Job 24:19 speaks of Sheol snatching sinners. The righteous, wise, and well-disciplined could avoid a premature move to Sheol (Pr. 15:24; 23:14).

Though the overall picture of Sheol is grim, the Old Testament nevertheless affirms that God is there (Ps. 139:8; Prov. 15:11) or that it is impossible to hide from God in Sheol (Job 26:6; Amos 9:2). The Old Testament also affirms that God has power over Sheol and is capable of ransoming souls from its depths (Pss. 16:10; 30:3; 49:15; 86:13; Job 33:18,28–30). In the majority of these passages a restoration to physical life is clearly intended, though several (for example Ps. 49:15 with its image of God's receiving the one ransomed from Sheol) point the way toward the Christian understanding of afterlife with God. SHEPHAM (Shē′ phăm) Place name of uncertain meaning and location in northeastern Transjordan forming the northeastern border of the Promised Land (Num. 34:10).

SHEPHATIAH (Shĕ phā tī' ah) Personal name in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning, "Yahweh has created justice." 1. David's fifth son (2 Sam. 3:4). 2. King Zedekiah's (597–586 B.C.) official (Jer. 38:1). 3. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 9:8). 4. Head of a family of Exiles who returned with Ezra about 458 B.C. (Ezra 2:4; 8:8; Neh. 7:9). 5. Ancestor of family included among "Solomon's servants," that is royal officials, perhaps with Temple responsibilities (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59). 6. Member of tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:4). 7. Benjaminite who deserted Saul to join David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5). 8. Leader of tribe of Simeon under David (1 Chron. 27:16). 9. Son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2).

SHEPHELAH (Shĕ' phē läh) Transliteration of Hebrew geographical term meaning, "lowland." Region of low foothills between the Philistine coastal plain and the highlands of Judah farther inland. It served as a battleground for Israel and Philistia during the period of the judges and early monarchy. Joshua 15:33–41 lists about thirty villages and towns located in the region. See Palestine.

SHEPHER, MOUNT (Shē' phēr) Place name perhaps meaning, "beauty." Stop on Israel's wilderness journey whose location is not known (Num. 33:23).

SHEPHERD A keeper of sheep. The first keeper of sheep in the Bible was Adam's son Abel (Gen. 4:2). Shepherding was the chief occupation of the Israelites in the early days of the patriarchs: Abraham (Gen. 12:16); Rachel (Gen. 29:9); Jacob (Gen. 30:31–40); Moses (Ex. 3:1).

As cultivation of crops increased, shepherding fell from favor and was assigned to younger sons, hirelings, and slaves (compare David in 1 Sam. 16:11–13). Farmers such as in Egypt even hated shepherds (Gen. 46:34).

The Bible mentions shepherds and shepherding over 200 times. However, the Hebrew word for shepherding is often translated, "feeding." Shepherds led sheep to pasture and water (Ps. 23) and protected them from wild animals (1 Sam. 17:34–35). Shepherds guarded their flocks at night whether in the open (Luke 2:8) or in sheepfolds (Zeph. 2:6) where they counted the sheep as they entered (Jer. 33:13). They took care of the sheep and even carried weak lambs in their arms (Isa. 40:11).

Shepherd came to designate not only persons who herded sheep but also kings (2 Sam. 5:2) and God Himself (Ps. 23; Isa. 40:11). Later prophets referred to Israel's leaders as shepherds (Jer. 23; Ezek. 34).

In Bible times the sheep cared for by shepherds represented wealth. They provided food (1 Sam. 14:32), milk to drink (Isa. 7:21–22), wool for clothing (Job 31:20), hides for rough clothing (Matt. 7:15), and leather for tents (Ex. 26:14). Furthermore, sheep were major offerings in the sacrificial system (Ex. 20:24). They were offered as burnt offerings (Lev. 1:10), sin offerings (Lev. 4:32), guilt offerings (Lev. 5:15), and peace offerings (Lev. 22:21).

The New Testament mentions shepherds 16 times. They were among the first to visit Jesus at His birth (Luke 2:8–20). Some New Testament references used a shepherd and the sheep to illustrate Christ's relationship to His followers who referred to Him as "our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. 13:20). Jesus spoke of Himself as "the good shepherd" who knew His sheep and would lay down His life for them (John 10:7–18). Jesus commissioned Peter to feed His sheep (John 21). Paul likened the church and its leaders to a flock with shepherds (Acts 20:28). The Latin word transliterated "pastor" means shepherd. Elmer Gray

SHEPHERD'S BAG See Bag 4.

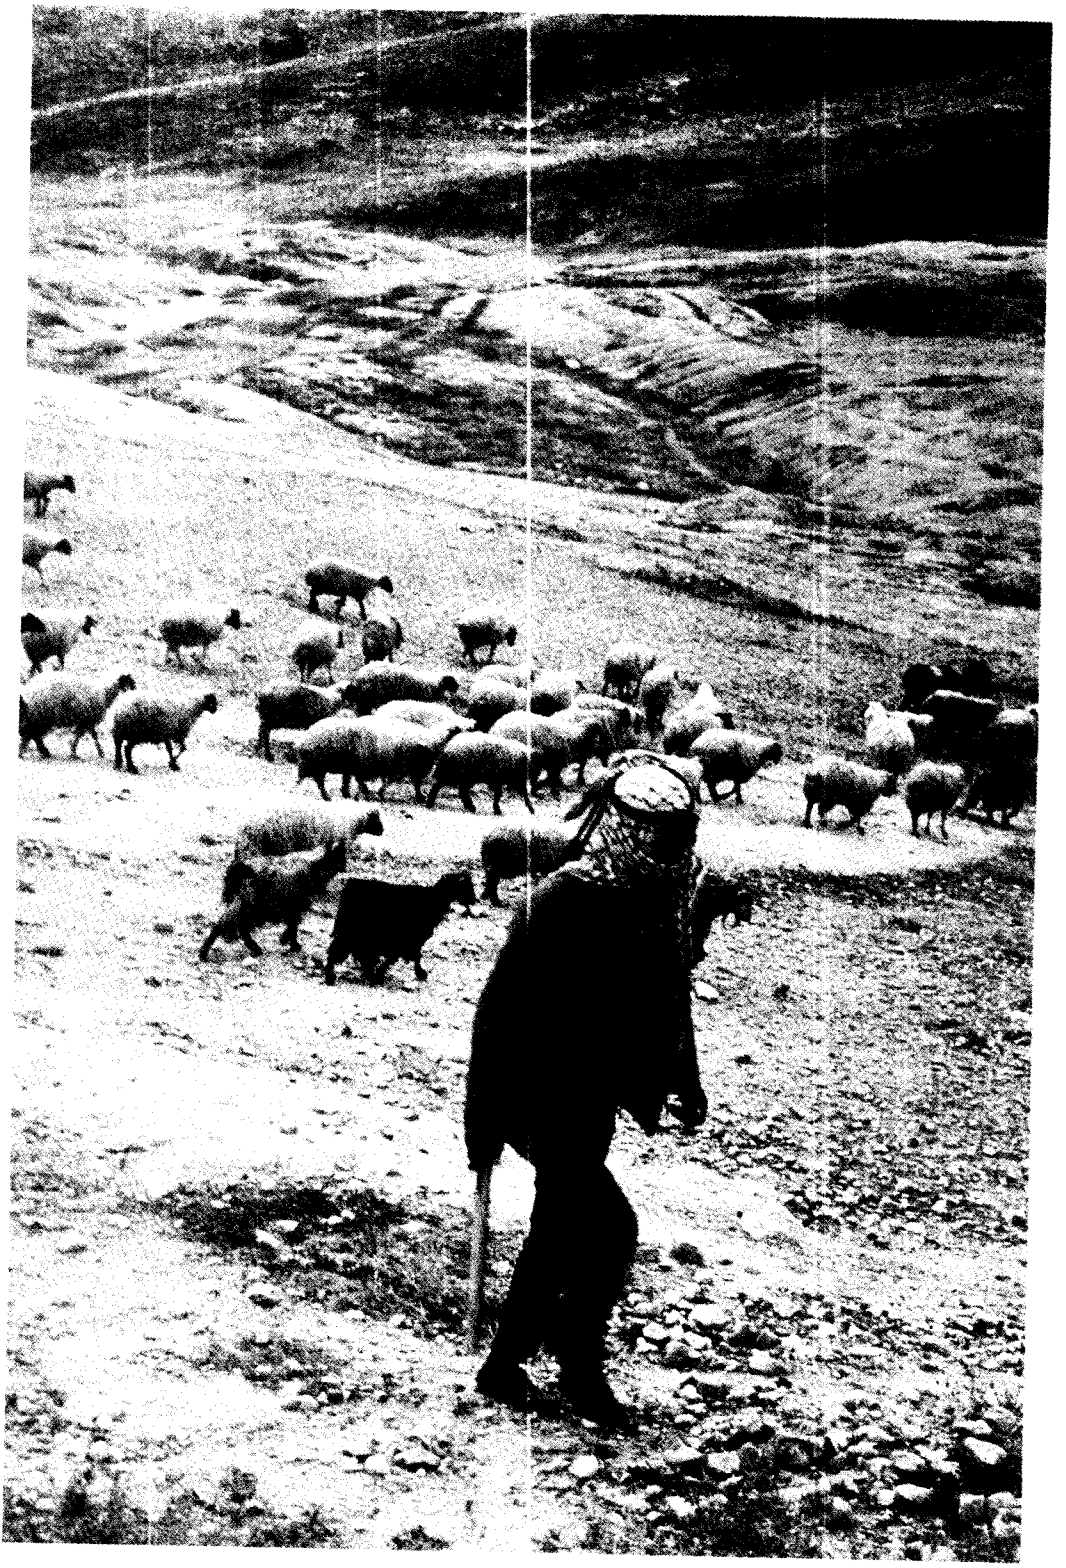
SHEPHI (Shē' phī) Variant spelling of Shepho (1 Chron. 1:40).

SHEPHO (Shē' phō) Tribal name perhaps meaning, "male sheep, ram." Edomite tribe or clan (Gen. 36:23).

SHEPHUPHAM (Shė phū' phăm) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Leader of Benjaminite clan according to Hebrew text (Num. 26:39) but probably a scribe repeated a letter in Shupham (KJV, REB, NIV).

SHEPHUPHAN (Shė phū' phăn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:5). Some commentators read, "Shupham" on basis of early translations.

SHERAH (Shē' rah) REB, KJV spelling of Sheerah.



SHERD Alternate spelling for shard often used by archaeologists. See Shard.

SHEREBIAH (Shĕ rē bī' ah) Personal name of uncertain meaning: "Yah gave a new generation," "Yah understands," or "Yah made it hot." Ancestor of a family of Levites (Ezra 8:18,24; Neh. 8:7; 9:4,5; 10:12; 12:8,24). He had responsibility for the Temple gold Ezra took back to Jerusalem from Exile and helped Ezra teach the people the law.

SHERESH (Shē' rĕsh) Personal name meaning, "sprout" or "sly, clever." Descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16) as well as the name of a city in the kingdom of Ugarit.

SHEREZER (Shė rē' zēr) KJV alternate spelling of Sharezer (Zech. 7:2).

SHESHACH (Shē′ shăch) Code word Jeremiah used to indicate Babylon (25:26; 51:41). The code uses the first word of the alphabet for the last, the second for the next to last, and so on. In English a would stand for z, b for y, and so on.

SHESHAI (Shē′ shâi) Probably a Hurrian name of uncertain meaning. A man or clan living near Hebron descended from the Anakim (Num. 13:22) and driven out by Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:10). See Anak, Anakim. They may have entered Palestine with the Sea Peoples to whom the Philistines are related.

SHESHAK (Shē′ shăk) NAS spelling of Sheshach (Jer. 51:41).

SHESHAN (Shē′ shăn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of clan of Jerahmeel from tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31–35).

SHESHBAZZAR (Shĕsh′ băz′ zȧr) Babylonian name probably meaning, "may Shamash (sun god) protect the father." Jewish leader who accompanied the first group of Exiles from Babylon to Jerusalem in 538 BC (Ezra 1:8). King Cyrus of Persia apparently appointed Sheshbazzar governor of restored Judah and supplied his company of people with provisions and many of the treasures which the Babylonians had taken from Jerusalem. He attempted to rebuild the Temple (Ezra 5:16), but got no farther than the foundation when he was replaced by Zerubbabel. His genealogy is not clear, but some believe the Shenazar of 1 Chronicles 3:17 may be Sheshbazzar. If so, he was a son of Jehoiachin and uncle of Zerubbabel.

SHETH (Shĕth) Personal and tribal name of uncertain meaning. Moabite clan whose destruction Balaam prophesied (Num. 24:17). The Hebrew spelling is the same as Seth (Gen. 4:25). Egyptian and Babylonian texts point to a people called Sutu, semi-nomads in the Syrian and Arabian desert. Rather than a proper name, some commentators think the translation should be, "sons of tumult."

SHETHAR (Shē′ thär) Persian name of uncertain meaning. Advisor of King Ahasuerus of Persia, an expert in the "law and custom" of Persia and possibly in astrology (Esth. 1:13–14 NRSV).

SHETHAR-BOZENAI (Shē′ thär-Bŏz′ ė nâi) Persian name perhaps meaning, "Mithra is deliverer." Persian provincial official who questioned Zerubbabel's right to begin rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 5:3,6) but responded to King Darius' answer by helping the Jews build (Ezra 6:13). The name appears in the Elephantine papyri.

Shepherd in Israel tending his flock of sheep.

SHETHAR-BOZNAI KJV spelling of Shethar-Bozenai.

SHETHITES (Shĕth′ ītes) NRSV reading of "sons of Sheth" (Num. 24:17). See Sheth.

SHEVA (Shē′ vȧ) Personal name meaning, "similarity." 1. Scribe for David (2 Sam. 20:25), perhaps the transliteration of an Egyptian title meaning, "writer of letters." The name is Seraiah in 2 Samuel 8:17; Shavsha in 1 Chronicles 18:16. See Scribe. 2. Descendant of Caleb and original ancestor of a clan (1 Chron. 2:49).

SHEWBREAD A sacred loaf made probably of barley or wheat which was set before the Lord as a continual sacrifice (Ex. 25:30). The old bread was then eaten by the priests (Lev. 24:5–9). David requested the bread for his hungry men as they fled from King Saul (1 Sam. 21:4–6). Jesus used this account to illustrate His teaching on the sabbath, that the day was made to benefit people (Mark 2:23–28). See Bread of the Presence.

SHIBAH (Shī′ bah) Modern translation spelling of Sheba (Gen. 26:33).

SHIBBOLETH (Shĭb′ bō lĕth) Transliteration of Hebrew password meaning, "ears, twigs" or "brook." People of Gilead east of the Jordan used it to detect people of Ephraim from west of the Jordan since the Ephraimite dialect evidently did not include the sh sound, so Ephraimites always said, "sibboleth," a word not used elsewhere in Hebrew (Judg. 12:6).

SHIBMAH (Shĭb′ mah) KJV alternate spelling of Sibmah (Num. 32:38).

SHICRON (Shĭc′ rŏn) Place name meaning, "henbane" (a type of nightshade plant). Border town of tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:11). It may be located at tell el-Ful north of the Soreq River and three and a half miles northwest of Ekron.

SHIELD Protective devise used in battle. See Arms and Armor.

SHIGGAION (Shĭg ḡai′ ŏn) Transliteration of a Hebrew technical term used in psalm titles (Ps. 7; Hab. 3). Suggested translations include, "frenzied" or "emotional." Some think the basic meaning is "to wander" in reference to a wandering style of thought or melody or to the unconnected expressions of a lament.

SHIGIONOTH Hebrew plural of Shiggaion. See Shiggaion.

SHIHON (Shī′ hŏn) Place name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "worthless." Some would locate it at modern Sirim, about thirteen miles southeast of Mount Tabor. It was a border town of Issachar (Josh. 19:19).

SHIHOR (Shī' hôr) Egyptian place name meaning, "pool of Horus (a god)." It formed the border of the Promised Land (Josh. 13:3), marking the widest extent of Israel's territorial claims (1 Chron. 13:5). In Isaiah 23:3; Jeremiah 2:18, the term apparently refers to one of the branches of the Nile River inside Egypt, but the border point places it outside Egypt, identical with the Brook of Egypt or extending Israel's claim to the Nile. See Brook of Egypt; Palestine. The earliest translators did not understand the term in Joshua 13.

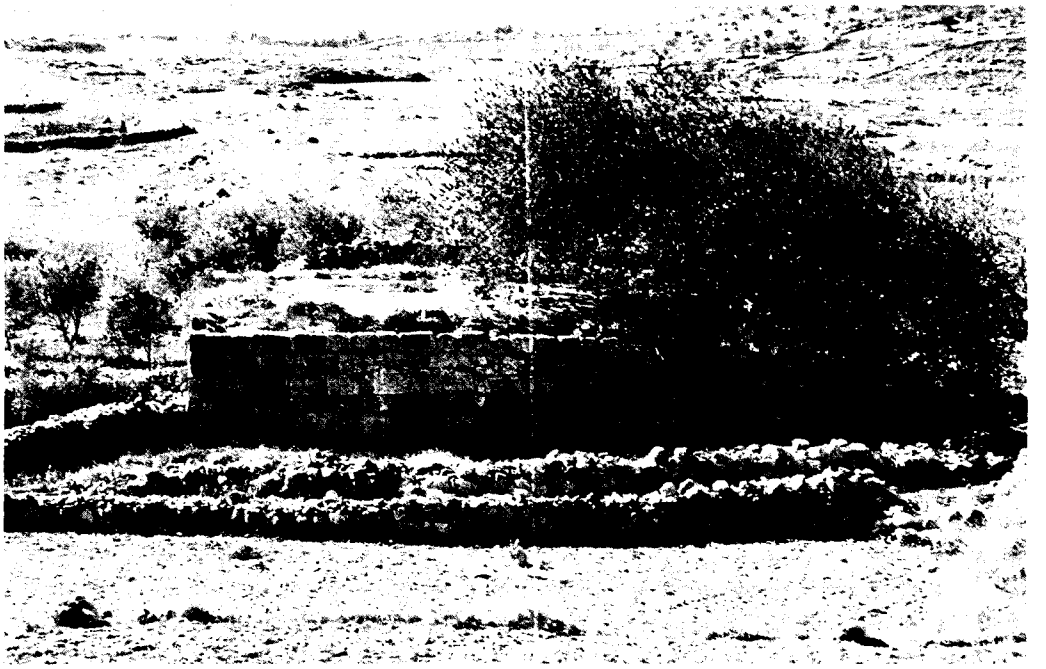
SHIHOR-LIBNATH (Shī' hôr-lĭb' năth) Place name perhaps meaning, "swamp of Libnath." Border of tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26), variously identified as the Nahr ez-Zerqa on the southern border of Asher; the swampy territory between the rivers Nahr ed-Difleh and Nahr ez-Zerqa, and tell Abu Hawam at the mouth of the Kishon.

SHIKKERON (Shĭk' kē rŏn) Modern translations' spelling of Shicron (Josh. 15:11).

SHILHI (Shĭl' hī) Personal name meaning, "He sent me," "Salach (underworld god or river) has me," or "my offshoot." A similar formation has been found at tell Arad. Maternal grandfather of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22:42).

SHILHIM (Shĭl' hĭm) Alternative Hebrew spelling of Sharuhen. See Sharuhen.

SHILLEM (Shĭl' lĕm) Personal name meaning, "he has replaced or repaid." Son of Naphtali and original ancestor of clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:24). First Chronicles 7:13 has "Shallum."



SHILLEMITE (Shĭl' lĕm īte) Member of clan of Shillem (Num. 26:49).

SHILOAH, WATERS OF (Shī lō' ah) Place name meaning, "being sent." Waters supplying Jerusalem diverted from the Gihon spring and representing God's supply making reliance on foreign kings unnecessary (Isa. 8:6). It differs from the Shiloah Tunnel Hezekiah built (2 Kings 20:20). The background may be anointing of kings at the Gihon (1 Kings 1:33–40), thus implying rejection of God's kingship represented through His anointed king.

SHILOH (Shī' lōh) Place name perhaps meaning, "tranquil, secure." About thirty miles north of Jerusalem sat the city which would be Israel's religious center for over a century after the conquest, being the home of Israel's tabernacle (Josh. 18:1). See Tabernacle.

Judges 21:19 described Shiloh's location as "on the north side of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah." Twelve miles south of Shechem, Shiloh was in a fertile plain at 2,000 feet elevation. This is apparently modern Seilun, where archaeologists have unearthed evidence of Canaanite settlement by 1700 B.C. Perhaps when Israel chose a spot for the tabernacle, Shiloh was available for Joshua to use as the place to allot land to the tribes (Josh. 18).

Tribal annual pilgrimages to the tabernacle set the scene for another incident in Shiloh. The tribe of Benjamin had a dilemma in that no other tribe would give them their daughters for wives (Judg. 21). Because of this, the men of Benjamin waited in the vineyards (v. 20) until the dancing women went out of Shiloh where they were then captured and taken as wives.

Samuel's early years provided another connection with Shiloh (1 Sam. 1—4). At the tabernacle, Hannah vowed to the Lord that if He would give her a son she would give him back to God (1 Sam. 1). After the birth of Samuel, Hannah brought him to Shiloh in gratitude to God (1 Sam. 1:24–28). Thus, Shiloh became home for Samuel as he lived under the care of Eli, the high priest, and his two wicked sons, Hophni and Phinehas. Later, Samuel received the Lord's message that the priesthood would be taken from Eli's family (1 Sam. 3). Years later, following a defeat at Aphek, the Israelite army sent for the ark of the covenant from Shiloh. Mistakenly thinking that the ark would bring victory, the Israelites lost the second battle of Aphek to the Philistines. Results included losing the ark; the deaths of Hophni, Phinehas, and Eli; and the apparent conquering of Shiloh (1 Sam. 4).

No explicit biblical reference was made to Shiloh's final fate. According to archaeological evidence, Shiloh apparently was destroyed about 1050 B.C. by the Philistines. Supporting this was the fact that when the Philistines finally returned the ark of the covenant, it was housed at Kiriath-jearim rather than Shiloh (1 Sam. 7:1). Also, Jeremiah warned Jerusalem that it might suffer the same destructive fate as Shiloh (7:12).

Centuries later, Jeremiah used Shiloh and the tabernacle as illustrations to warn Jerusalem that it was not safe merely because it housed the Temple (7:12–14). Hearing the same message again, the people sought to kill Jeremiah (26:6–9). Jeremiah mentioned some men from Shiloh as late as 585 B.C. (41:5), indicating some occupation at that time. See Joshua; Eli; Samuel.

SHILONI (Shī lō′ nī) Transliteration of Hebrew for Shilonite, taken by KJV as personal name (Neh. 11:5).

SHILONITE (Shī′ lō nīte) Resident of or native of Shiloh.

SHILSHAH (Shīl′ shäh) Personal name perhaps meaning, "little triplet." Original ancestor of clan in tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

SHIMEA (Shī mē′ à) Personal name meaning, "hearing." 1. Son of David (1 Chron. 3:5; spelled Shammuah in 2 Sam. 5:14). 2. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:30). 3. A Levite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:39). 4. Older brother of David (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7; spelled Shammah in 1 Sam. 16:9; 17:13). See Shammah 2. 5. See Shimeam.

SHIMEAH (Shī mē′ ah) Alternate Hebrew spelling of Shammah. See Shammah 2.; Shimea 4.

SHIMEAM (Shī mē′ ăm) Personal name perhaps meaning, "their hearing." Benjaminite who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:38; spelled with an abbreviated form of Shimea at 1 Chron. 8:32).

SHIMEATH (Shī mē′ ăth) Personal name meaning, "hearing." Parent of court official who murdered King Joash about 796 B.C. (2 Kings 12:21). Second Chronicles 24:26 takes the apparently feminine form of the Hebrew name and identifies the parent as an Ammonite woman.

SHIMEATHITE (Shī mē′ à thīte) Either a descendant of a person named Shimeath or, more likely, a native of the town of Shema (Josh. 15:26), perhaps settled by the clan of Shema (1 Chron. 2:43). See Shema 1. and 5.

SHIMEI (Shī mē′ ī) Personal name meaning, "my being heard." 1. Grandson of Levi and head of Levitical family (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18; compare 1 Chron. 6:42). 2. A Levite (1 Chron. 23:9 if the text does not represent duplication in copying as some commentators suggest; compare v. 10). 3. Relative of King Saul who cursed and opposed David as he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 16). When David returned after Absalom's death, Shimei met him and pleaded for forgiveness and mercy, which David granted because of the festive occasion (2 Sam. 19). Solomon followed David's advice and had Shimei slain (1 Kings 2).

4. Court personality who refused to support Adonijah against Solomon (1 Kings 1:8). 5. District supervisor in territory of Benjamin responsible for supplying Solomon's court one month each year (1 Kings 4:18); he could be identical with 4. above. 6. Ancestor of Mordecai, the cousin of Esther (Esth. 2:5). 7. Brother of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19). 8. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26). 9. Member of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4). 10. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:29). 11. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:21; apparently identical with Shema in v. 13). 12. Temple musician under David (1 Chron. 25:17; perhaps also in v. 3 with a Hebrew manuscript and some Greek manuscripts as in NRSV, REB, NAS, NIV, TEV . 13. Supervisor of David's vineyards (1 Chron. 27:27).

14. and 15. Two Levites under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14; 31:12–13). 16. Levite married to a foreign woman under Ezra (Ezra 10:23). 17. and 18. Two Jews married to foreign women under Ezra (Ezra 10:33,38).

SHIMEITES (Shĭ′ mē ītes) Members of the clan descending from Shimei (Num. 3:21; Zech. 12:13).

SHIMEON (Shĭ′ mē ŏn) Alternate English transliteration of Hebrew Simeon. Israelite with foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

SHIMHI (Shĭm′ hī) Alternate English transliteration of Shimei (1 Chron. 8:21). See Shimei 11.

SHIMI (Shĭ′ mī) KJV spelling of Shimei (Ex. 6:17). See Shimei 1.

SHIMITE (Shĭ′ mīte) KJV spelling of Shimeites (Num. 3:21).

SHIMMA (Shĭm′ ma) KJV spelling of Shimea (1 Chron. 2:13). See Shimea 4.

SHIMON (Shĭ′ mŏn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Original ancestor of clain in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

SHIMRATH (Shĭm′ răth) Personal name meaning, "protection." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:21).

SHIMRI (Shĭm′ rī) Personal name meaning, "my protection." 1. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37). 2. Father of one of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:45). 3. Levitical gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:10). 4. Levite in time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13).

SHIMRITH (Shĭm′ rĭth) Personal name meaning, "protection." Moabite mother whose son murdered King Joash in 796 B.C. (2 Chron. 24:26). In the parallel passage Shomer is the parent and appears to be the father (2 Kings 12:21).

SHIMROM (Shĭm′ rŏm) KJV spelling of Shimron (1 Chron. 7:1).

SHIMRON (Shĭm′ rŏn) Personal and place name probably meaning, "protection." 1. Son of Issachar and original ancestor of clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:13). 2. Canaanite city-state which joined Hazor's northern coalition against Joshua and met defeat (Josh. 11:1). Some commentators think the original name was Shimon and identify it with modern khirbet Sammuniyeh five miles west of Nazareth in the Esdraelon Valley. Others have suggested Marun er-Ras ten miles northwest of modern Safed above the Sea of Chinnereth, that is the Sea of Galilee. It was allotted to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15).

SHIMRON-MERON (Shĭm′ rŏn-mē′ rŏn) Town in list of cities Joshua defeated (Josh. 12:20). Apparently a longer name of Shimron (11:1), though the earliest Greek translation and some commentators see two separate cities here.

SHIMRONITE (Shĭm′ rŏn īte) Member of clan of Shimron (Num. 26:24).

SHIMSHAI (Shĭm′ shâi) Personal name meaning, "little sunshine." Scribe who penned letter of Samaritan officials opposing rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple about 537 B.C. (Ezra 4).

SHIN (Shĭn) Next to last letter of Hebrew alphabet used as title for Psalm 119:161–168 since each verse of the section begins with that letter.

SHINAB (Shĭ′ năb) Akkadian name meaning, "Sin (a god) is father." King of Admah who joined coalition against Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2) leading eventually to Abraham's rescue of Lot.

SHINAR, PLAIN OF (Shĭ′ năr) Place name of uncertain meaning used in various Ancient Near Eastern documents apparently with somewhat different localities in mind. Some evidence points to a Syrian district cited as Sanhara in the Amarna letters. Some scholars equate Shinar in Assyrian texts with modern Sinjar west of Mosul in Iraq. Others think a Kassite tribe was meant originally. Whatever its meaning outside the Bible, biblical texts use Shinar as a designation for Mesopotamia (Gen. 10:10). See Mesopotamia.

The tower of Babel was built in Shinar (Gen. 11:2–9). The King of Shinar opposed Abraham (Gen. 14:1). Isaiah prophesied that God would bring out a remnant of His people from Shinar (11:11). Daniel 1:1–2 and probably Zechariah 5:11 equate Babylon and Shinar, thus limiting Shinar to its major city in the writers' day.

SHION (Shī′ ŏn) Modern translations' spelling of Shihon.

SHIPBUILDER See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

SHIPHI (Shī′ phī) Personal name meaning, "my overflow." Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37).

SHIPHMITE (Shĭph′ mīte) Noun indicating either the home town, native land, or clan from which Zabdi came. Some have suggested town of Shepham (Num. 34:10), but this is far from certain.

SHIPHRAH (Shĭph′ rah) Personal name meaning, "beauty." Midwife for Israel in Egypt who disobeyed Pharaoh because they feared God (Ex. 1:15–21).

SHIPHTAN (Shĭp' tan) Personal name meaning, "process of justice." Father of a leader from tribe of Ephraim (Num. 34:24).

SHIPMASTER Captain in charge of a ship (Jon. 1:6; Rev. 18:17).

SHIPS, SAILORS, AND NAVIGATION Travel by sea in biblical times. People first went down to the sea in anything that would keep them afloat. The early development of the two major centers of civilization along the major river systems of the Near Eastern world, the Tigris/Euphrates and the Nile, surely was not coincidental. Even though the first boats were punted or towed along the shore, such water-borne transportation and movement of goods facilitated the exchange of local products in more distant markets, first along the river banks and then beyond the open seas. From very basic, crude beginnings before 3000 B.C., ship technology and seamanship persistently developed as people strove to overcome the barriers that rivers and seas imposed. Thus Assyrian reliefs depict fishermen afloat on inflated bladders and soldiers lying on them to paddle across the water. In wooded areas, the single log or bundle of reeds to support one person soon developed into the raft of bound logs that could support additional personnel and produce. Along the marshy stretches of the Nile, Tigris, and Euphrates, rafts of reed bundles were refined into the reed canoe. The special requirements of rapids and swift waters of the Upper Tigris and Euphrates prompted the development of the bouyed raft, a wooden platform supported on inflated skins that continued in use until very recent times. At the destination downstream, the wooden parts could be disassembled and sold; the deflated skins, easily transported upstream for reuse.

True boats, in their earliest forms, probably consisted of sewn leather stretched and sewn over light frames of branches for ease of transport when necessary. Such boats, essential for river travel, are depicted in detail in Assyrian reliefs between 1000 and 600 B.C. In water free from rocks, such as the Nile delta where adequate materials for branch frames were lacking, clay tublike boats made their appearance. Where wood was available, the bark canoe (a troughlike strip of bark with clay ends) was followed by the dugout which required a cutting tool or controlled use of fire in its production. Wherever forests supplied the logs from Europe to India, the dugout has been familiar to waterways from the Stone Age into the Late Roman period. Modified dugouts with heightened sides and interior reinforcements were the prototypes of the planked boats with keel, ribs, and strakes.

Inland Waterways Civilization arose along the two waterways that connected territories in major political units and provided internal transportation.

1. Boats on Egypt's Nile The Nile provided 750 miles of unobstructed waterway with a current that carried boats from Aswan and the First Cataract to its mouth and prevailing north winds that brought those boats under sail back again. Such ideal conditions that obviously contributed to the development of water travel and transport unfortunately were offset by a lack of lumber. Thus, the Egyptians turned to the abundant reeds along the Nile to create simple rafts. Before 3000 B.C., those Nile rafts had become long slender and pointed vessels outfitted with paddles and steering oars. Modifications included cabins and a growing number of oarsmen. The shape was bowed, or sickle-shaped, with squarish prow and stern rising almost vertically from the water. A square sail was set well forward above the reed platform that served its passengers and cargo. The light weight and shallow draft made such craft most useful in the canals and marshes of the Nile River system.

Shortly after 3000 B.C., these fragile reed boats, reinforced with planks, ferried the massive granite and stone blocks used for the impressive stone architecture that began to grace the Nile's banks. These planked reed boats provided the forms for Egypt's first true boats—flat-bottomed and square-ended. Soon, however, relieved of the bulky reed bundles, Egyptian boats were outfitted with rounded bottoms, pointed prow, and rounded stern. Pictorial representations in paintings, reliefs, and models indicate that Nile rivercraft primarily constructed of Asia Minor and Lebanon cedar dramatically grew in size and diversity. Cargo boats 150 feet in length requiring 40 to 50 rowers, and, later, massive 200-by-70-foot barges towed by a fleet of oar-powered tugs, shuttled up and down the Nile to the massive building operations between Aswan and the Delta. Smaller vessels were poled, paddled, or rowed, with some also equipped with a sail.

For international maritime trade, Egypt enjoyed a distinct advantage as the only nation with direct access to both the Mediterranean and the Red Seas. As a result, two long-distance maritime routes to Syria and Punt (East Africa) already were established during the Old Kingdom period. The earliest route to Byblos soon was extended to Cyprus, Crete, and possibly other Aegean sites. The earliest seagoing vessel depicted in a relief dated about 2450 B.C. had a spoon-shaped hull with a long, slender overhanging bow and stern and a rope truss that could be tightened by twisting to compensate for any sagging of bow or stern. The ships of Queen Hatshepsut's fleet trading with the East African coast reflect considerable refinement of the general lines. A two-legged forward mast with a tall, narrow rectangular sail had been replaced by a low, wide sail on a pole mast amidships. A single, massive steering oar had replaced smaller steering oars on each quarter. Fifteen rowers a side (requiring a space of not less than 45 feet) would suggest a vessel about 90 feet in length. By the end of the New Kingdom period, the ships used by Rameses III against the invading Sea Peoples (about 1170 B.C.), as depicted in his reliefs, indicate radical changes in construction. See Egypt.

2. Mesopotamian Shipping Mesopotamian kings and merchants also operated long-distance maritime routes in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean from several inland cities that were accessible along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers. By 3000 B.C., overseas trade was a thriving aspect of regional economy. Maritime ventures included royal and private efforts at supplying metals, timber, and luxury items the Mesopotamian economy lacked.

A clay model of a bowllike boat, with slight evidence of prow and stern, possibly made of skins and dated about 3400 B.C., is our earliest evidence of Mesopotamian vessels. The existence of a mast and use of sails was possible, though firm evidence of sailing boats comes much later. Earliest representations on seals suggest the use of squarish reed crafts similar to Egyptian types. A prevailing north wind and rapids in the Upper Tigris and Euphrates Rivers diminished the development of commercial shipping and the need for larger vessels. As a result, early light craft propelled by paddles or oars gradually evolved into wooden craft with sail as well as oars. The largest vessels appear to carry less than eleven tons with most half that size, usually constructed of edge-joined planks with framing inserted for stability. Square-ended, these boats carried a single sail of cloth or reed matting with the largest powered by eleven oarsmen.

Between 3000 and 2000 B.C. overseas trade with East Africa and India flowed through the Persian Gulf on relatively small seagoing vessels, the largest known with a capacity of only about twenty-eight tons.

International Travel and Trade Sea routes opened opportunities for evolving nations to gain wealth and explore the mysteries of far-off lands.

1. The Eastern Mediterranean: 3000–1000 B.C. Major developments of maritime travel between (2000 and 1500 B.C.) must be attributed to the island world of the Aegean and the coastlines of the eastern Mediterranean. There the Minoans of Crete especially developed an impressive naval fleet and a merchant marine that linked their island world. Ultimately, however, the Mycenaeans—Greeks from the mainland—overpowered Crete, forming an Aegean confederacy. From 1500 to 1200 B.C. they claimed control over the waters of the Eastern Mediterranean.

Cretan ships with their rounded hulls, portrayed on seals about 1500 B.C., were quite distinct from the Aegean straight-lined angular-ended vessels. Though the engravings obviously are stylized, the slender rounded hull, in some cases almost crescent-shaped, supported a pole mast with stays fore and aft and a high square sail. These Cretan vessels with ten or fifteen oars to the side were about 50 and 75 feet in length, respectively. Passenger vessels were outfitted with a cabin or shelter on deck.

An Egyptian wall painting in a 1400 B.C. tomb depicts a Syrian fleet of merchant ships with spoon-shaped hulls, with straight stempost, deck beams through the sides, and a broad square sail very much like Egyptian vessels of the period. (The Egyptian vessels were braced with a rope truss.) The representation of the sailors (their beards, profile, and clothing) clearly suggests their Syrian origin. (It is unlikely, though the evidence comes from Egypt, that these are Egyptian vessels manned by Syrians.) The rounded hulls are best related to Crete from about 1600 B.C. onwards. These merchantmen with their deck and roomy hold grew in size. By about 1200 B.C., an Ugaritic tablet suggests their size in referring to a single shipment of grain of 450 tons.

The war fleets of the Levant in 1200 B.C. were impressive in number and design. The fighting craft lost their spoon-shaped hull which was elongated and rounded. They were undecked with the oarsmen protected behind a high bulwark. The mast with an adjustable sail was crowned with a lookout. The naval battle (depicted on the Medinet Habu temple walls) between Aegean ("Sea Peoples") and Egyptian ships indicates the clear similarity of construction and design apart from ornamental or cultic aspects. The only offensive weapon appears to be the grappling irons for boarding enemy vessels. Aside from the tactical maneuvering of the vessels, sea battles were fought with bow, sword, and pike as on land. The modification of the bow for ramming appears to have been a later development.

2. The Eastern Mediterranean: 1000–500 B.C. During this period the Phoenicians gained a reputation as the ablest of seamen and maritime traders. Their primary challenge came from the Greek world where merchantmen and war vessels controlled the northern Mediterranean shoreline and the Black Sea. The low sleek "hollow" hull, with only a scant deck forward for the outlook and a slightly larger one aft for the captain and passengers, was constructed low and long primarily for speed. Several standard-sized galleys included the 20-oared dispatch and local transport, the 30-oared "triaconter" galley, the 50-oared "penteconter" for troop transport, and the 100-oared large transport. They were constructed of oak, poplar, pine, and fir, with the oars and masts of fir. A single, large-bladed steering car was replaced after 800 B.C. by double steering oars that became standard thereafter. A single square sail on a mast amidships could be raised and lowered. Sails of sewn patches of woven linen were controlled with lines of twisted papyrus and leather. Other equipment included stern mooring lines, stone anchors, punting poles, long pikes for fighting, and bags and jars for holding provisions. Screen along the sides could be closed during heavy weather.

The introduction of the ram was a dramatic innovation that revolutionized ship construction. The pointed cutwater for puncturing the hull of the enemy vessel required construction with heavier materials to withstand contact, especially in the bow area. The open or latticed bow area gave way to a cumbersome superstructure for sustaining the ram. This represented the first period of specialization in the construction and class of vessel: the open galley with a lighter hull for carrying dispatches and personnel and the galley with superstructure, including relatively high platforms as fighting stations at bow and stern, for combat. The invention of the two-banked galley soon followed to increase the number of rowers and the speed of the vessel without increasing the length and reducing the seaworthiness of its hull. The Phoenician shipwrights should be credited with many of these important innovations.

The rigging for most war galleys during this period was standard: a single square sail amidships with a retractable mast. After 600 B.C., single-banked and double-banked galleys appear in all sizes up to 100 oars.

The first Mediterranean merchant ships probably were oar driven. Plagued by calm waters during the summer months when maritime activity probably was at its peak, only oared ships could have provided the reliability and speed required for prompt delivery of merchandise. Later, as the volume of cargo grew, larger seaworthy sailing ships came into use. The merchantman was only slightly modified from the warship design to include a roomier and stronger hull and a sturdier mast for a bigger sail. Ultimately, however, the sailing ship with a rounded hull and a single square sail became the primary cargo ship from Phoenicia to Italy.

3. The Age of the Trireme: 500–323 B.C. The galley rowed by three more or less superimposed banks of oarsmen came into vogue after 500 B.C. and maintained its prominence into the later Roman Empire. The additional power and speed required by the ram seemed to outweigh the relatively unseaworthy hull of this oar arrangement. As a result, sea battles were carefully scheduled near land during the mild summer months to avoid adverse weather conditions. While the first two lines of rowers worked their oars through ports in the hull and on a second line on or just below the gunwale, the third line worked from an outrigger projecting laterally above and beyond the gunwale. Corinth appears to have been the first to launch such a fleet sometime after 700 B.C.; and a century later, it appears to have been accepted generally. Athenian naval records suggest that such ships were built with great care, and, despite their fragile construction, remained in service for an average of twenty years. The Phoenician shipwrights increased the height of their vessels to accommodate three-level rowing.

4. Warships of the Hellenistic Period: 323–31 B.C. In both Phoenician and Greek navies of the period, the primary innovation was the construction of larger and larger vessels, though the exact nature of oaring is not clearly understood. Generally, the greater power and speed was achieved with longer oars and a double banking of the rowers, while the oversized ships relied on a variety of oaring arrangements. Ramming remained a standard naval tactic, though gradually subordinated to the firing of missiles, the heaving of grapnels, and boarding. Darts and grapnels were fired from catapults at longer range, while short-range battles included archers and the slinging of javelins and stones. Shortly after 200 B.C., the Rhodians introduced the fire pot, slung from long poles (extending over the bow) onto the enemy vessel.

To complement these larger ships, light vessels such as skiffs with speed and maneuverability made their appearance for express transport and the carrying of dispatches. Some were equipped with rams, while others were intended to disrupt the tactics and break the oars of the larger vessels. Later, the Roman imperial navy would not only add to the variety of vessels, but their architects would introduce significant defensive innovations.

5. Greek and Roman Shipbuilding The Greco-Roman shipwrights, aware of the ancient Egyptian method of edge-joining planks in the construction of the hull, created their own form of ship carpentry in which they locked the shell of planks together with mortises and then reinforced that hull with interior framing. This method was consistently used in the construction of all vessels from the smallest lake skiff to the largest seaworthy freighters. In larger vessels, massive cables for undergirding the ship during emergencies were kept on board. It was usual to smear seams and sometimes the whole hull with pitch or pitch and wax as a protective coating. Though fir, cedar, and pine appear to have been preferred for planking and frames, local availability of lumbers finally determined the choice.

The ancient Mediterranean sailor knew only the side rudder, an oversized oar pivoted in a slanting position near the stern. The pushing or pulling of a tiller bar socketed into the upper part of the loom adjusted the blade of the oar at an angle to the hull and thus maneuvered the ship. A series of ropes with individual functions fitted the mast and sail. Navigational aids were limited and simple. Handbooks with brief notes on distances, landmarks, harbors, and anchorages were available. There are no historical references to the use of charts. Soundings were taken. Flags and lights were used for signaling. Anchors were large and numerous.

The ideal sailing season in the Mediterranean was from May 27 to September 14 with an extension to outside limits from March 10 to November 10. As a result, sailing during the late fall and winter was reduced to bare essentials such as the carrying of vital dispatches, the transport of essential supplies, and urgent military movement. The severity of winter storms and the poor visibility due to fog and cloudiness made navigation before the compass most difficult.

Mediterranean currents generally are too weak seriously to affect sea travel. However, prevailing wind direction produced a definite pattern with ships traveling in most southerly directions, from Italy or Greece to Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Africa, anticipating a quick and easy voyage with the aid of northerly winds. The return, on the other hand, was difficult against the prevailing winds, and thus a course near the coastline at times provided quieter waters and periodic shelter. The ancient square-riggers were designed for traveling with the wind astern or on the quarters. Roman ships appear to have logged four and a half to six knots with the wind. Tacking, or using the familiar zigzag course, at best was difficult and slow. When rowing was unavoidable, the oarsmen were divided into squads for rotation or given regular short rest periods.

Organizational structure and rank on the earlier, smaller vessels of the Greek and Roman navy was limited to the commanding officer who manned the helm, the rowing officer who maintained the oarsmen's beat, and the bow officer ("lookout") who was responsible for the course and well-being of the ship. Around 400 B.C., when the Athenian trireme had a crew of two hundred, the officers numbered five: the executive officer or captain; the commanding officer; the rowing officer, responsible for the training and morale of the oarsmen; subordinate officer, with important administrative duties such as paymaster, purchasing, and recruiting officer; and officer of the bow. Other personnel included the ship's carpenter, flutist (to time the rowers' stroke) or time beater, side chiefs (to set the stroke), deckhands, oar tenders, and ship's doctor, among others. The number of fighting personnel (marines) varied according to strategy: the Athenian ships that relied primarily on the ram had as few as ten; others intent on boarding tactics had as many as forty. A few archers (four to six) usually were on board, together with some catapult operators.

A seagoing merchantman was controlled by its owner or charter, usually with a hired professional captain with total authority over the vessel and its crew. Under way the "sailing master" was usually in command. Two officers were in charge of operations (first mate) and administration (maintenance). The large merchantmen also had quartermasters, carpenters, guards, rowers to man the ship's boats, and others. The sailors generally wore limited or no clothing when aboard ship and wore a tunic but no sandals when ashore.

A wide variety of smaller craft, usually driven by oars and a small auxiliary sail, were prevalent in every harbor to provide various services. River and coastal craft provided towing services and transfer of cargo and merchandise to harbor warehouses and points inaccessible to the larger ships. Man-made harbors with artificial sea walls to create protected anchorage appear before 700 B.C. Gradually, quays, warehouses, and defensive towers were added to create a secure commercial port. By 400 B.C., the Piraeus harbor was surrounded by an extensive covered emporium to facilitate the handling of import and export merchandise. By Roman times, both sea and river were well endowed with harbors, with smaller ports benefitting from coastal shipping by becoming distribution centers for inland areas removed from major land routes. Unfortunately, the decline of the late Roman Empire and political weakness with a recurrence of piracy on the high seas led to a marked decline of commercial shipping in the Mediterranean. With the ultimate fragmentation of the Roman Empire, barbarian invasions in the east, and the shift of the economic center to the west, the Mediterranean, devoid of large ships, slowly was reduced to small local craft with minimal economic impact beyond the patron port.

SHISHA (Shī′ shà) Personal name or, more likely, an official title borrowed from Egyptian: royal scribe who writes letters. Apparently, "sons of Shisha" (1 Kings 4:3) refers to members of a scribal guild. Sheva (2 Sam. 20:25) and Shavsha (1 Chron. 18:16) may represent other ways to transliterate the Egyptian title into Hebrew.

SHISHAK (Shī′ shăk) Egyptian royal name of unknown meaning. A pharaoh of Egypt known also as Sheshonk I. He ruled about 945–924 B.C. and founded the Twenty-Second Dynasty. Just after Rehoboam began to reign in Judah, Shishak invaded Jerusalem and carted off the Temple treasures (1 Kings 14:25–26). According to inscriptions on the walls of a temple to the god Amon in Karnak, Shishak captured over 150 towns in Palestine including Megiddo, Taanash, and Gibeon. Some equate him with the pharaoh whose daughter married Solomon (3:1) and who later burned Gezer and gave it to his daughter (9:16). See Egypt.

SHITRAI (Shĭt rā′ ī) Personal name perhaps meaning, "minor official." Official in charge of David's grazing animals in Sharon (1 Chron. 27:29). Early Hebrew scribes noted the spelling as Shirtai.

SHITTAH TREE KJV spelling of Shittim tree (Isa. 41:19).

SHITTIM (Shĭt′ tĭm) Transliteration of Hebrew word for accacia trees and name of 1. a large area in Moab directly across the Jordan from Jericho and northeast of the Dead Sea. Israel camped there for a long period before crossing into the Promised Land. While at Shittim, they were blessed by Balaam (whom Balak had hired to curse Israel; Num. 22—24; compare Mic. 6:5), committed sin with the Moabite and Midianite women (Num. 25), and Joshua was announced as Moses' successor (Deut. 34:9). Joshua sent spies out from Shittim (Josh. 2:1; compare 3:1). It is modern tell el-Hammam es Samri about eight miles east of the Jordan.

2. In Joel 3:18 the symbolic meaning of acacias (note NAS) comes to the fore in the messianic picture of fertility for the Kidron Valley with a stream flowing from the Temple.

SHIZA (Shī′ zà) Abbreviated personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Reuben in time of David (1 Chron. 11:42).

SHOA (Shō′ à) National name meaning, "help!" Nation God used to punish His people (Ezek. 23:23). They are usually identified with the Sutu, a nomadic people from the Syrian and Arabian desert known from documents from Mari, Amarna, and Assyria. Some commentators see them mentioned in Isaiah 22:5, where most translate, "crying."

SHOBAB (Shō′ băb) Personal name meaning, "one brought back" or "fallen away, rebel." 1. Son of David (2 Sam. 5:14). 2. Son of Caleb and ancestor of clan in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:18).

SHOBACH (Shō′ băch) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Commander of Syrian army under Hadad-ezer killed by David's troops in battle (2 Sam. 10:16,18). The name appears as Shophak in 1 Chronicles 19:16,18.

SHOBAI (Shō′ bāī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Head of family of gatekeepers (Ezra 2:42).

SHOBAL (Shō′ băl) Personal name probably meaning, "lion." 1. Son of Seir and ruler in Edom (Gen. 36:20,23,29). 2. Son of Caleb and founder of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:50), listed under sons of Judah (1 Chron. 4:1), possibly an indication of "son of" denoting belonging to a tribe.

SHOBEK (Shō′ bĕk) Personal name meaning, "victor." Jewish leader who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:24).

SHOBI (Shō′ bī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Ammonite who helped David as he fled across Jordan from Absalom (2 Sam. 17:27).

See Music. The shophar was to be blown on the Day of Atonement in the jubilee year to signal the release of slaves and debt. It also was used as a trumpet of war as the Israelites were campaigning against their enemies. Mike Mitchell

SHOSHANNIM (Shō shăn′ nĭm) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning, "lotuses." Technical term used in titles of Psalms 45; 60; 69; 80. It may be the title of a melody, a flower used in a ceremony seeking a word from God, designation of a love song later expanded in meaning, or indication of a six-stringed instrument.

SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH (Shō′ shăn′ nĭm-ē′ dūth) See Shoshannim. Term in tiles of Psalms 60; 80. Eduth means, "witness" or "laws." Its implication in the Psalm titles is not clear.

SHOULDERPIECE Translation of Hebrew word meaning, "shoulder, upper arm, side." The straps going over the shoulder so the high priest could wear the ephod (Ex. 28:7).

SHOVEL Instrument used to remove ashes from the altar (Ex. 27:3).

SHRINE A small building devoted to the worship of a particular deity, usually with an image of that god. Sometimes shrines were located in larger temples, set apart by a partition or niche in a wall. An Ephraimite, Micah, had a shrine in Israel during the days of the judges (Judg. 17:5). He hired a Levite to administer worship at the site. Later, shrines were seen as pagan (2 Kings 17:29). King Josiah had them demolished during his reign (2 Kings 23:19). The apostle Paul confronted the silversmith Demitrius with his sin of selling shrines of the goddess Artemis (Acts 19:21–27). See Artemis; High Place.

SHRINE OF HIS OWN IDOL NIV translation in Ezekiel 8:12. See Chambers of Imagery.

SHROUD A linen burial cloth. Shrouds usually were very long pieces of cloth which were wound around the body. As the winding was done, spices were placed within the folds of the shroud. After His crucifixion, Jesus' body was so buried by Joseph of Arimathea and the women disciples (Matt. 27:59–61). In one recorded instance, a shroud was worn as a garment (Mark 14:51–52).

SHUA (Shū′ ȧ) Personal name meaning, "help!" 1. Father-in-law of Judah (Gen. 38:2; 1 Chron. 2:3). 2. Woman descended from Asher (1 Chron. 7:32), with slightly different Hebrew spelling.

SHUAH (Shū′ ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "sunken." 1. Son of Abraham (Gen. 25:2) and possibly thought of as original ancestor of the Suhu mentioned in Assyrian sources as living on the Euphrates River below the mouth of the Chabur. 2. Home of Job's friend Bildad (Job 2:11), possibly to be identified with people mentioned in 1. or with an otherwise unknown tribe in the Syrian and Arabian desert, perhaps an offshoot of 1.

SHUAL (Shū′ ăl) Personal and place name meaning, "jackal." 1. Descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36). 2. Territory biblical writer used to describe path a group of Philistines took against Saul (1 Sam. 13:17). Some would identify it with the land of Shaalim (1 Sam. 9:4). The location is uncertain.

SHUBAEL (Shū′ bā ĕl) See Shebuel.

SHUHAH (Shū′ hăh) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Brother, or according to some manuscript evidence the son, of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:11). Some commentators connect the name to Suchati known from Egyptian sources and think of a forefather of a nomadic clan who lived in the Negeb.

SHUHAM (Shū′ hăm) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Dan (Num. 26:42). See Hushim.

SHUHAMITE (Shū′ hăm īte) Member of clan of Shuham (Num. 26:42).

SHUHITE (Shū′ hīte) Person from Shuah.

SHULAM(M)ITE (Shū′ lăm īte) Description of woman in Song of Solomon 6:13 either as from Shunem through a copying change; from Shulam, an otherwise unknown town; Solomonite, referring to a relationship to Solomon; or a common noun meaning, "the replaced one."

SHUMATHITE (Shū′ măth īte) Clan name of uncertain meaning descended from Caleb (1 Chron. 2:53).

SHUNAMMITE (Shū' năm mīte) Resident of or native from Shunem.

SHUNEM, SHUNAMMITES (Shū' nĕm, Shū' năm mīte) Place name of uncertain meaning. Town in tribe of Issachar located southeast of Mount Carmel. The site was captured by the Egyptian pharaoh Thutmose III about 1450 B.C., again by Labayu of Shechem about 1350 B.C., and rebuilt by Biridya of Megiddo. The Israelites controlled it under Joshua (Josh. 19:18). The Philistines camped at Shunem while fighting with Saul (1 Sam. 28:4). About 920 B.C., the Egyptian pharaoh Shishak captured the town. See Shishak. As David lay dying, Abishag the Shunammite was hired to minister to the king (1 Kings 1:3; compare 2:17). The prophet Elisha stayed often at the home of a Shunammite couple, prophesied that a son would be born to them, and raised the boy from the dead after an accident in the field (2 Kings 4). It is modern Solem, about eight miles north of Jenin and three miles east of Affulah.

SHUNI (Shū' nī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Gad and head of a clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:16).

SHUNITE (Shū' nīte) Member of clan of Shuni (Num. 26:15).

SHUPHAM (Shū' phăm) Personal name of uncertain meaning reconstructed by scholars as son of Benjamin on basis of the clan name Shuphamite (Num. 26:39). The personal name in Hebrew is Muppim in Genesis and Shephupham in Numbers. In 1 Chronicles 7:6 the name is absent, but in 7:12,15 Shupim occurs.

SHUPHAMITE (Shū' phăm īte) Member of Benjaminite clan of Shupham or Shephupham. See Shupham; Shephupham.

SHUPPIM (Shūp' pīm) Personal name of uncertain meaning and plural form in Hebrew. Apparently a son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12) but related to Machir in verse 15. The Chronicles texts apparently have experienced loss of words through copying. REB emends the text so that Shuppim is not included. See Shupham.

SHUR, WILDERNESS OF (Shūr) Place name meaning, "wall." Region on Egypt's northeastern border, perhaps named after wall Egyptians built to protect their border, where Moses made first stop after crossing the Red Sea (Ex. 15:22). Earlier, Sarah's handmaid, Hagar, had come toward Shur after her expulsion from the clan of Abraham (Gen. 16:7). Abraham lived near Shur (Gen. 20:1). Saul smote the Amalekites in that area (1 Sam. 15:7). David and his men made forays as far as Shur while eluding King Saul (1 Sam. 27:8). Shur may be modern tell el-Fara.

The Wilderness of Shur.

SHUSHAN (Shū' shăn) Persian place name transcribed in Hebrew with word borrowed from Egyptian meaning, "lily" or "lotus." City in southwestern Iran which served as the ancient capital of the nation Elam. The site was inhabited as early as 3000 BC. It was located on the caravan routes between Arabia and points north and west, and therefore it became a very rich city. Archaeological evidence indicates that Shushan traded heavily with nations in Mesopotamia. In Esther 1:2, the city is identified as the throne city of Ahasuerus and called Susa by modern translations. The Achaemenean Dynasty between 500 and 300 B.C. took Shushan to its height politically and economically. It served as the king's winter residence; they moved to Ecbatana in summer. During periods of Seleucid and Parthian rule, it declined and finally was destroyed in the fourth century A.D. See Elam; Persia.

SHUTHALHITE (Shū thăl' hīte) Member of clan of Shuthelah (Num. 26:35).

SHUTHELA(H)ITE (Shū thĕ' lă hīte) Modern translations' spelling of Shuthalhite.

SHUTHELAH (Shū' thĕ lăh) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Original ancestor of clan in tribe of Ephraim (Num. 26:35).

SHUTTLE See Loom.

SIA (Sī' a) Personal name meaning, "helper." Family of Temple servants or nethanim (Neh. 7:47).

SIAHA (Sī' ă hă) Personal name meaning, "helpers of God." Temple servants (Ezra 2:44). This is apparently a variant spelling of Sia.

SIBBEC(H)AI (Sib' bĕ caî) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of David's army who killed a giant or, more literally, a descendant of the Rephaim (2 Sam. 21:18 REB). First Chronicles 11:29 lists him among David's military heroes, leading many commentators to see Sibbecai as the original reading for Mebunnai in 2 Samuel 23:27 resulting from a confusion of Hebrew letters by early scribes. Sibbecai commanded David's forces for the eighth month (1 Chron. 27:11).

SIBBOLETH (Sĭb′ bō lĕth) See Shibboleth.

SIBMAH (Sĭb′ mah) Place name meaning, "cold" or "high." City tribe of Reuben rebuilt in Transjordan (Num. 32:38). It became part of their tribal inheritance (Josh. 13:19). Isaiah mentioned it in his lament over Moab (16:8–9; compare Jer. 48:32). Sebam (Num. 32:3) is often seen as a copyist's change from Sibmah. It may be located at khirbet al-qibsh about three miles east northeast of Mount Nebo and three miles southwest of Hesban.

SIBRAIM (Sĭb′ rā ĭm) Place name of uncertain meaning. Apparently the northern border between Damascus and Hamath. Some would identify it with Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:24). The precise location is not known.

SICKLE A curved blade of flint or metal used to cut stalks of grain. Sickles varied in size and handle length, but usually had a short wooden handle which required the user to bend near the ground to harvest the crop. They are among the oldest tools known by humans, dating to 8,500 B.C. Biblical texts often used the sickle symbolically to speak of coming judgment. Revelation 14 uses the analogy of Christ reaping the harvest of humankind at the great judgment. See Agriculture.

SIDDIM (Sĭd' dĭm) Place name perhaps meaning, "flats" or "fields." A variant name for the Dead Sea where the coalition faced Chedorlaomer and his allies, leading to Abraham's rescue of Lot (Gen. 14). The reference is apparently to the land bordering the Dead Sea. Some think the Hebrew should be read Shadim and interpreted as a reference to the Valley of Demons.

SIDON AND TYRE (Sī' dŏn, Tȳre) Phoenician cities located on the coastal plain between the mountains of Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea (Gen. 10:15). Sidon and Tyre were ancient cities, having been founded long before the Israelites entered the land of Canaan. Extrabiblical sources first mention Sidon before 2000 B.C. and Tyre just after 2000 B.C. While Sidon seems to have been the most dominant of the two cities during the early part of their histories, Tyre assumed this role in the latter times. Both cities were known for their maritime exploits and as centers of trade. One of Tyre's most coveted exports was purple dye. Joshua could not conquer the territory (Josh. 13:3–4).

Israel had relations with the two cities, but especially with Tyre. David employed Tyrian stonemasons and carpenters and used cedars from that area in building a palace. (2 Sam. 5:11). The construction of the Temple in Jerusalem during Solomon's reign depended heavily on the materials and craftsmen from Tyre. About 870 B.C., Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of the Phoenician king, bringing Baal worship to Israel's court. Ezekiel 28 characterizes the king of Tyre as the ultimate example of pride. Under Roman rule, the two cities were important ports of trade, but they did not enjoy the dominance they previously held. Jesus spent time in Tyre and Sidon and in contrast to the prophets' attitude toward the cities, He contrasted them with the Jews as examples of faith (Matt. 11:20–22). Paul spent seven days in Tyre after his third missionary journey (Acts 21:3–4). See Phoenicia. Scott Langston SIEGE Battle tactic in which an army surrounds a city and cuts off all supplies so that the enemy army is forced to surrender for lack of food and water. Deuteronomy 28:53–57 described the horrible actions to which siege leads (compare Jer. 19:9). Ezekiel 4 describes the prophet's symbolic act of building a miniature city of Jerusalem under siege. Preparing for siege, a city stored water inside the city walls and repaired the walls (Nah. 3:14). One response was to "gather up your goods and flee the country" (Jer. 10:17 REB). To remain under siege was to "give yourselves over to die by hunger and by thirst" (2 Chron. 32:11 NAS). This was the major tactic used in Near Eastern wars. Judah suffered siege from Sennacherib (2 Kings 18—19) and from Nebuchadrezzar (2 Kings 24—25).

SIEGEWORKS Platforms or towers an army built around and above the city walls of a city under siege. This allowed the besieging army to shoot arrows and throw missiles of war down into the city. Israel's law did not allow fruit trees to be cut down to build such platforms (Deut. 20:19–20). Ramps built up to the city walls allowed soldiers to attack the walls and to shoot fire arrows and other weapons into the city. Scaling ladders lifted armies over the walls into the city. Battering rams destroyed city gates. Fires at the base of the walls weakened the sandstone bricks. Tunnels dug under the walls further weakened them. Thus the population's emotions were drained; its supplies were exhausted; and its defenses destroyed.

SIEVE Instrument used to remove unwanted materials from sand or grain. Pebbles or straw remain in the sieve, while the sand or grain passes through. God warned Israel He would place them in a sieve of judgment and none would fall through, for none of them were good grain (Amos 9:9). Another Hebrew word traditionally translated "sieve" in Isaiah 30:28 refers to a swinging action. Precisely what is swung is not clear, the noun coming from the same root as the verb. In some manner Isaiah proclaimed God's judgment would swing over His people.

SIGN That which points to something else; an object, occurrence, or person through which one recognizes, remembers, or validates something.

Old Testament 'Oth, the usual Hebrew term for sign, appears in a nontheological sense for a military signal in the fourth Lachish letter and Joshua 2:12, and for a military standard in Numbers 2:2 and Psalms 74:4. The other 75 instances of sign carry a theological sense. Three settings predominate: the created order (Gen. 1:14; 9:12–17; Isa. 37:30; 55:13); human history (Ex. 7:3; Deut. 4:34; 6:22); and religious ritual (Gen. 17:11; Ex. 12:13; 13:9,16; 31:13). With signs, the nature of the object or event, whether commonplace, odd, or miraculous, is not the prime focus. Emphasis falls rather on the function of the sign. Old Testament signs may be classed according to seven somewhat overlapping functions: 1. to impart knowledge; 2. to protect; 3. to motivate faith; 4. to recall significant events; 5. to witness to the covenant; 6. to confirm; and 7. to illustrate by means of prophetic action.

1. Signs which impart knowledge typically characterize God as Lord of history and champion of oppressed Israel. The goal of the Exodus signs is the knowledge that "I am the LORD (in the midst of the earth)" (Ex. 7:5; 8:22; 10:2) and that "the LORD is God; there is no other besides him" (Deut. 4:34–35 NRSV). The punishment to befall Pharaoh Hophra was to serve as a sign promoting the knowledge that God's word of judgment would surely stand up against the Judean refugees in Egypt (Jer. 44:29). The knowledge imparted by these signs encouraged acknowledgment of Yahweh as the only God, obedience to God's covenant, and trust in God's word. 2. The mark of Cain (Gen. 4:15) and the blood upon the doorposts at Passover (Ex. 12:13) protected those under the sign. 3. In addition to revealing God, a second goal of the Exodus signs was to motivate faith and worship. Israel's unbelief in spite of signs is often condemned (Num. 14:11,22; Deut. 1:29–33). The signs fulfill their goal when they inspire obedience (Deut. 11:3,8), worship (Deut. 26:8,10), and loyalty to the Lord (Josh. 24:16–17). The signs of pagan prophets similarly serve as a challenge to trust in Yahweh (Deut. 13:1–4). The reality of wonder-working false prophets underscores the truth that signs themselves are ambivalent; the function of the sign, either to evoke or challenge faith in Yahweh, is the deciding factor. 4. Signs serve as reminders of significant events. The eating of unleavened bread at Passover (Ex. 13:9) and the redemption of the first-born (Ex. 13:16) are reminders of God's liberation of Israel. The stones at Gilgal (Josh. 4:6–7) bore similar witness to God's continuing saving presence as Israel embarked on the Conquest. The covering of the altar served as a reminder of the danger of ursurping the role of God's priests (Num. 17:10). 5. Other signs serve as reminders of a covenant or established relationship. The rainbow witnesses God's covenant with Noah, insuring an orderly creation not threatened by flood (Gen. 9:12–17). Circumcision served as a reminder of God's covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17:11). The Sabbath, likewise, served as a reminder of God's covenant with Moses (Ex. 31:13,17; Ezek. 20:12). 6. Still other signs serve as confirmation. Such signs often authenticated God's special call (of Moses, Ex. 3:12; 4:8; of Gideon, Judg. 6:17; of Saul, 1 Sam. 10:2–9). Elsewhere a sign confirms God's word of judgment (1 Sam. 2:34; Jer. 44:29–30) or promise of healing (2 Kings 20:8). 7. Other signs take the form of prophetic acts. The names of Isaiah ("Yahweh is salvation") and his sons Shear-jashub ("A remnant shall return") and Maher-shalal-hash-baz ("The spoil speeds, the prey hastens") illustrate Israel's fate (Isa. 7:3; 8:3). Isaiah's walking naked and barefoot for three years illustrated the coming humiliation of Egypt and Ethiopia (Isa. 20:3). Ezekiel, likewise, illustrated the coming siege of Jerusalem using a brick, earth, and a plate (Ezek. 4:1–3).

New Testament The New Testament employs sign in the full range of Old Testament functions. 1. Signs function simply to identify. Judas' kiss clearly designated Jesus as the One the mob was seeking (Matt. 26:48). The sign of Jesus' coming and the end of the age which the disciples requested is, likewise, an identifying mark (Matt. 24:3; Mark 13:4; Luke 21:7); it is not a matter of evoking faith in Christ's coming but of identifying that event when it occurs. The difficult "sign of the Son of Man" is probably an identifying sign as well (Matt. 24:30). The above uses approximate the nontheological use of sign by the Old Testament. Other uses of sign are distinctly theological. 2. John's signs generally impart knowledge about Jesus and His relation to the Father. Jesus' first sign, the changing of water into wine at Cana, points to Jesus as the source of the abundant, joyful life which characterizes the anticipated Messianic Age (John 2:1–11). The three-fold repetition of the phrase "your son lives" in the healing of the official's son (John 4:46–54) points to Jesus as the life-giver. The healing of the sick man at the Sheep Gate Pool (John 5:2–9) points to Jesus as the One through whom God is still working (John 5:17). Though the just-fed crowd saw Jesus' feeding of the five thousand (John 6:2–13) as a sign that Jesus was a prophet (6:14), the sign points to Jesus as the life-giving bread which alone can satisfy (6:35). The sign of the healing of the man born blind (John 9:1–7) illustrates the ambiguity of signs: some took the sign to mean that Jesus was not from God; others, that God was with Him (9:16). John's conclusion (9:35–41) points to Jesus as both giver of spiritual insight and judge of spiritual blindness. Finally, the raising of Lazarus (John 11) points to Jesus as the resurrection and the life (11:25). 3. Though the term sign is not used, the seal of God upon the foreheads of the redeemed (Rev. 9:4) is a sign of protection. 4. Some signs serve to motivate faith. The signs in the Fourth Gospel were recounted so "that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the God, and that believing you may have life in His name" (John 20:31). John previously noted signs leading to faith (John 2:11; 4:53; 9:38). The sign of the healing of a lame man led to the praise of God in Acts 4:16,21. Philip's signs, likewise, evoked the Samaritans' faith (Acts 8:6). 5. Other signs serve to recall God's past saving acts. The paired expression "signs and wonders" (Acts 2:19,22; 4:30; 7:36–37; 14:3) recalls the foundational saving events of the Exodus. The "signs and wonders" which Jesus and the apostles performed designate the inauguration of God's new saving event. 6. Paul spoke of circumcision as a witness to the covenant (Rom. 4:11). 7. Signs often serve as confirmation or authentication. The humble circumstances of the Christ-child in the manger confirmed the angel's announcement of a Savior to outcast shepherds (Luke 2:12). Jesus offered the difficult "sign of Jonah" as His authentication (Matt. 12:39–43; Luke 11:29–32). God was at work in Jesus' preaching of repentance as God had worked in Jonah. The New Testament often rebukes the demand for a sign to confirm God's work (Matt. 16:1; John 2:18; 4:48; 1 Cor. 1:22). A sign may evoke faith in a receptive heart, but no sign will convince the hard-hearted. 8. Though the term sign is not used, Agabus' action in binding Paul with his belt (Acts 21:11) parallels the acts of the Old Testament prophets. Chris Church

SIGNET A seal, usually a ring with a seal carefully crafted upon it, which an important or rich person used to authenticate a document. It was used much like a signature on a document today. The ring of kings would carry the highest authority in a land and empowered subordinates to act for the king. Examples of such rings in the Bible are: Pharaoh's ring given to Joseph (Gen. 41:42), Ahasuerus' ring given to Haman and then to Mordecai after Haman was hanged (Esth. 3:10,12; 8:2), King Darius' sealing the den of lions after Daniel was thrown into it (Dan. 6:17). The signet could be worn on a chain around the neck (Song of Sol. 8:6). In an unusual use of the word, Zerubbabel is said to be "a signet" because the Lord had chosen him (Hag. 2:23). Zerubbabel was granted Yahweh's authority, and thus completion of the Temple was guaranteed. Another unusual use of the word was the special engraving of the stones on the ephod of the high priest "like the engravings of a signet" (Ex. 28:11). See Seal.

SIHON (Sī′ hŏn) Amorite personal name of unknown meaning. Amorite king whose capital was Heshbon (Deut. 2:26). He opposed Israel's passage through his country as they journeyed toward the Promised Land (Num. 21:23). Although he allied with Og, king of Bashan, neither could withstand the Hebrew migration. The tribes of Reuben and Gad settled in the area formerly held by Sihon, just east of the Jordan River.

SIHOR (Sī′ hōr) KJV spelling of Shihor. See Shihor.

SIKKUTH (Sĭk′ kŭth) NAS spelling of Sakkuth. See Kaiwan; Rephan; Sakkuth.

SILAS, SILVANUS (Sī′ lăs, Sĭl vā′ nŭs) Apparently, the Greek and Latin form of same name, possibly derived from Aramaic or Hebrew name Saul. Leader in the early Jerusalem church. He accompanied both Peter and Paul on separate missionary journeys. One of his first missions was to carry news of the Jerusalem conference to the believers at Antioch (Acts 15:22). He and Paul left Antioch together on a mission to Asia Minor (15:40–41) and later to Macedonia. In Philippi the two were imprisoned (16:19–24), but they later won the jailer and his family to the Lord after God delivered them from prison. Later in his ministry Silas teamed with Peter on missions in Pontus and Cappadocia. He also served as Peter's scribe, writing 1 Peter and perhaps other letters. Many believe that he composed and arranged most of the letter since Peter probably had little education. See Paul; 1 Peter.

SILENCE The absence of sound. The Bible uses silence in several ways: as reverence to God (Hab. 2:20), as a symbol of death (Ps. 94:17), as a symbol of Sheol (Ps. 115:17), and as an expression of despair (Lam. 2:10). It is a way to shut up the opposition (Matt. 22:34). It is also used as a dramatic pause following the opening of the seventh seal in Revelation 8:1.

SILK Cloth made from thread that came from the Chinese silk worm. Very early China and India traded. India also traded with Mesopotamia. Some think that Solomon may have gotten silk from India. Some feel that the Hebrew word translated "silk" should rather be "fine linen" or "expensive material" (see Ezek. 16:10; Prov. 31:22), the Hebrew indicating something glistening white. Revelation 18:12 indicates that the rich in Babylon bought silk from merchants.

SILLA (Sĭl′ la) The house of Millo in which King Joash was murdered by his servants was said to be "on the way that goes down to Silla" (2 Kings 12:20 NRSV). Silla is an unknown place, perhaps near Jerusalem. See Millo.

SILOAM (Sĭ lō′ am) Greek place name possibly derived from Hebrew, "Shiloah," meaning, "sending." Place easily confused with the waters of Shiloah mentioned in Isaiah 8:6, through similarity of spelling. Siloam was the pool created by Hezekiah's tunnel which diverted the waters of Shiloah from the Siloam Spring to a point less vulnerable to the Assyrian enemy. It was located on the southern end of the old Jebusite city of Jerusalem. See Jerusalem. Thus, Siloam is to be distinguished from the King's Pool (Siloah or Shelah) mentioned in Nehemiah 3:15. See King's Pool. Hezekiah's inscription preserved on the tunnel wall describes the meeting of tunnel builders boring through rock from each end of the tunnel.

John 9:7,11 uses the etymological significance of the term Siloam for a play on words to press the point that the blind man was sent to Siloah by one who was Himself the One who was sent. To gain his sight, the blind man went to and obeyed the One who was sent. Luke 13:4 is a reference more to an unknown tower at Siloam than to Siloam. The tower may have been an aborted effort to protect the water supply. The theological issue of Luke 13 does not hinge on the geographical issue of Siloam.

The Pool of Siloam in Jerusalem.

The pool, created by Hezekiah and known by Jesus is still a source of water today.

SILVANUS (Sĭl vā′ nŭs) See Silas, Silvanus.

SILVER A comparatively scarce precious metal with a brilliant white color and remarkably resistant to oxidation. It melts at 960.8°C (1,861°F). Biblical references often refer to the process for refining silver (1 Chron. 29:4; Ps. 12:6; Prov. 17:3; Ezek. 22:20–22). It is so malleable that it is beaten into sheets as thin as 0.00025 mm. Until about 500 B.C., silver was the most valuable metal in the Near East. Thus, in most of the Old Testament it is given a priority over gold. Only in Chronicles and Daniel is gold considered to have more worth. Hence the analogy that in Jerusalem silver was as common as stone (1 Kings 10:27; 2 Chron. 9:27) is reflective of the lavish wealth of Solomon's empire. Coins were first minted after 700 B.C., but weight continued to be the most common standard of determining value. In the New Testament period, the drachma, a silver coin, was required for the Temple tax. Figuratively, refining silver is used in the Bible for testing human hearts (Ps. 66:10; Isa. 48:10; compare 1 Cor. 3:10–15) and the purity of God's word (Ps. 12:6). Wisdom is declared to be of more value than silver (Job 28:10–15; Prov. 3:13–14; 8:10,19; 16:16). See Coins; Gold; Money.

SILVERSMITH A person who works with silver. It could be in refining the silver from the ore or the making of the refined silver into the finished product. Silver was used for money and religious images (Judg. 17:4). Silver was used in making many of the utensils used in the tabernacle and Temple (Num. 7:13). The only mention of silversmiths in the NT was a dispute with Paul where his preaching was threatening their livelihood (Acts 19:23–41). See Occupations and Professions in the Bible.

SIMEON (Sĭm′ ė on) Personal name meaning, "hearing" or possibly, "little hyena beast." 1. One of Jacob's twelve sons, the second by Leah (Gen. 29:33). He joined Levi in avenging Dinah's rape by Shechem (Gen. 34:25–31). Joseph kept Simeon bound in Egypt to ensure that he would see Benjamin (Gen. 42:24). See Jacob; Tribes of Israel.

2. A devout Jew who lived in Jerusalem during the time of Jesus' birth. He was seeking the fulfillment of messianic prophecy when Israel would be restored (Luke 2:25). God promised Simeon that he would not die before seeing the Christ. When Joseph and Mary brought Jesus to the Temple for the purification rites, Simeon announced to them God's plan for the boy (2:34).

3. Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30). 4. Prophet and teacher in church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). 5. Alternate form in Greek for Simon, original Greek name of Peter. See Peter; Simon.

SIMEONITES (Sĭm' ē ō nītes) People of the tribe of Simeon, the second son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:33).

SIMILITUDE "Likeness" or "similarity." 1. The Old Testament used it of things being like God. Three words are translated "similitude" in the Old Testament: demuth (2 Chron. 4:3; Dan. 10:16), tabnith (Pss. 106:20; 144:12), and temunah (Num. 12:8; Deut. 4:12). 2. In the New Testament it is used to translate homoios or its derivative three times (Rom. 5:14; Heb. 7:15; Jas. 3:9, "likeness" NAS).

SIMON (Sī mon) Greek personal name meaning, "flat-nosed." Used in New Testament as Greek alternative for Hebrew, "Simeon." 1. The father of Judas Iscariot (John 6:71). 2. One of Jesus' disciples; a son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17) and brother of Andrew. After he confessed Jesus as the Christ, the Lord changed his name to Peter (v. 18). See Peter; Simeon.

3. A Pharisee who hosted Jesus at a dinner (Luke 7:36–40). Simon learned valuable lessons about love, courtesy, and forgiveness after a sinful woman anointed Jesus at this event. 4. A native of Cyrene who was forced to carry Jesus' cross to Golgotha (Mark 15:21). See Cyrene. 5. A tanner of animal skins who lived in the seaport of Joppa. Peter stayed at his house (Acts 9:43) and there received a visionary message from God declaring all foods to be fit for consumption (10:9–16).

6. Jesus' disciple also called "the Canaanite" (Matt. 10:4) or the Zealot (Luke 6:15). 7. Brother of Jesus (Matt. 13:55). 8. A leper who hosted Jesus and saw a woman anoint Jesus with costly ointment (Matt. 26:6–13; compare 3. above).

9. A magician from Samaria who believed Philip's preaching, was baptized, and then tried to buy the power of laying on hands and giving the Holy Spirit to people (Acts 8:9–24).

SIMPLICITY, SIMPLE Very similar to sincerity. A simple person is one who is open, honest, and direct, without hyprocrisy. Sometimes there is the idea of uneducated, inexperienced, or unsophisticated. Simplicity is associated with ideas like integrity (2 Sam. 15:11), without evil (Rom. 16:18), generosity (Rom. 12:8), a life of devotion to God (2 Cor. 1:12), and simply believing the gospel truth (2 Cor. 11:3). God is said to "preserve" the simple (Ps. 116:6). Proverbs is filled with sayings about the simple, both good and bad (1:22; 14:15,18; 21:11). See Sincerity.

SIMRI (Sĭm' rī) Another spelling of Shimri. See Shimri.

SIN (Sĭn) Actions by which humans rebel against God, miss His purpose for their life, and surrender to the power of evil rather than to God.

Sin as Rebellion One of the central affirmations throughout the Bible is humanity's estrangement from God. The cause for this estrangement is sin, the root cause of all the problems of humanity. The Bible, however, gives no formal definition for sin. It describes sin as an attitude that personifies sin as rebellion against God. Rebellion was at the root of the problem for Adam and Eve (Gen. 3) and has been at the root of humanity's plight ever since.

Sin's Origin in Humanity's Rebellious Nature Human sin is universal—we all sin. All persons without exception are under sin's dominion (Rom. 3:9–23). How did this come about? The Bible has no philosophical argument as such concerning sin's origin. God is in no way responsible for sin. Satan introduced sin when he beguiled Eve, but the Bible does not teach that sin had its origin with him either. Sin's origin is to be found in humanity's rebellious nature. Since Adam and Eve rebelled against the clear command of God, sin has infected humanity like a dread malignancy.

The Bible sets forth no systematic rationale as to how the human race was and is infected by this dread malady. Some passages such as Psalm 51:5; Ephesians 2:3 could be interpreted to mean that this sinful nature is inherited. Other passages seem to affirm that sin is due to human choice (see Ezek. 18:4,19–20; Rom. 1:18–20; 5:12.)

What then is the answer to the dilemma? A possible answer is the fact that the Jewish mind had no problem in admitting two mutually exclusive ideas into the same system of thought. Any idea that humanity inherits a sinful nature must be coupled with the corollary that every person is indeed responsible for his/her choice of sin.

Another possibility for understanding how sin has infected all of humanity may be found in the biblical understanding of the corporateness and solidarity of the human race. This understanding of the human situation would say that when Adam rebelled against God, he incorporated all of his descendants in his action (see Heb. 7:9–10 for a similar analogy). This view certainly does not eliminate the necessity for each individual to accept full responsibility for sinful acts.

Adam and Eve introduced sin into human history by their rebellious actions. The Bible affirms that every person who has lived since has followed their example. Whatever else one may say about sin's origin, this much is surely affirmed throughout the Bible.

The Bible Views Sin from Various Perspectives One concept of sin in the Old Testament is that of transgression of the law. God established the law as a standard of righteousness; any violation of this standard is defined as sin. Deuteronomy 6:24–25 is a statement of this principle from the perspective that a person who keeps the law is righteous. The implication is that the person who does not keep the law is not righteous, that is, sinful.

Another concept of sin in the Old Testament is as breach of the covenant. God made a covenant with the nation Israel; they were bound by this covenant as a people (Ex. 19; 24; Josh. 24). Each year on the Day of Atonement, the nation went through a covenant renewal. When the high priest consecrated the people by sprinkling them with the blood of the atoning sacrifice, they renewed their vows to the Lord to be a covenant-keeping people. Any breach of this covenant was viewed as sin (Deut. 29:19–21.)

S

The Old Testament also pictures sin as a violation of the righteous nature of God. As the righteous and holy God, He sets forth as a criterion for His people a righteousness like His own. (Lev. 11:45.) Any deviation from God's own righteousness is viewed as sin.

The Old Testament has a rich vocabulary for sin.

Chata means "to miss the mark," as does the Greek hamartia. The word could be used to describe a person shooting a bow and arrow and missing the target with the arrow. When it is used to describe sin, it means that the person has missed the mark that God has established for the person's life.

Aven describes the crooked or perverse spirit associated with sin. Sinful persons have perverted their spirits and become crooked rather than straight. Ra describes the violence associated with sin. It also has the connotation of the breaking out of evil. Sin is the opposite of righteousness or moral straightness in the Old Testament.

The New Testament Perspective of Sin The New Testament picture is much like that of the Old Testament. Several of the words used for sin in the New Testament have almost the same meaning as some of the Hebrew words used in the Old Testament. The most notable advancement in the New Testament view of sin is the fact that sin is defined against the backdrop of Jesus as the standard for righteousness. His life exemplifies perfection. The exalted purity of His life creates the norm for judging what is sinful.

In the New Testament, sin also is viewed as a lack of fellowship with God. The ideal life is one of fellowship with God. Anything which disturbs or distorts this fellowship is sin.

The New Testament view of sin is somewhat more subjective than objective. Jesus taught quite forcefully that sin is a condition of the heart. He traced sin directly to inner motives stating that the sinful thought leading to the overt act is the real sin. The outward deed is actually the fruit of sin. Anger in the heart is the same as murder (Matt. 5:21–22). The impure look is tantamount to adultery (Matt. 5:27–28). The real defilement in a person stems from the inner person (heart) which is sinful (Matt. 15:18–20). Sin, therefore, is understood as involving the essential being of a person, that is, the essential essence of human nature.

The New Testament interprets sin as unbelief. However, unbelief is not just the rejection of a dogma or a creed. Rather, it is the rejection of that spiritual light which has been revealed in Jesus Christ. Or, from another perspective, unbelief is the rejection of the supreme revelation as it is found in the person of Jesus Christ. Unbelief is resistance to the truth of God revealed by the Spirit of God and produces moral and spiritual blindness. The outcome of such rejection is judgment. The only criterion for judgment is whether or not one has accepted or rejected the revelation of God as found in Jesus Christ (John 3:18–19; 16:8–16).

The New Testament further pictures sin as being revealed by the law of Moses. The law was preparatory, and its function was to point to Christ. The law revealed sin in its true character, but this only aroused in humanity a desire to experience the forbidden fruit of sin. The law as such is not bad, but humanity simply does not have the ability to keep the law. Therefore, the law offers no means of salvation; rather, it leaves humanity with a deep sense of sin and guilt (Rom. 7). The law, therefore, serves to bring sin into bold relief, so that it is clearly perceptible.

The most common New Testament word for sin is hamartia. See above. Parabasis, "trespass" or "transgression," literally, means to step across the line. One who steps over a property line has trespassed on another person's land; the person who steps across God's standard of righteousness has committed a trespass or transgression.

Anomia means "lawlessness" or "iniquity" and is a rather general description of sinful acts, referring to almost any action in opposition to God's standard of righteousness. Poneria, "evil" or "wickedness," is even a more general term than anomia. Adikia, "unrighteousness," is just the opposite of righteous. In forensic contexts outside the New Testament, it described one who was on the wrong side of the law.

Akatharsia, "uncleanness" or "impurity," was a cultic word used to describe anything which could cause cultic impurity. It was used quite often to describe vicious acts or sexual sins. Apistia, "unbelief," literally refers to a lack of faith. To refuse to accept the truth of God by faith is to sin. Hence any action which can be construed as unfaithful or any disposition which is marked by a lack of faith is sinful.

Epithumia, often translated "lust," is actually a neutral word. Only the context can determine if the desire is good or evil. Jesus said, "I have eagerly desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer" (Luke 22:15 NIV), Paul used this word with a modifier meaning, "evil," in Colossians 3:5, where it is translated "evil concupiscence" or "evil desires." When used in this way, the word could refer to almost any evil desire but was most often used to describe sexual sins (Matt. 5:28).

Sin's Consequences The Bible looks upon sin in any form as the most serious of humanity's problems. Though sinful acts may be directed against another person, ultimately every sin is against God, the Creator of all things. Perfect in righteousness, God cannot tolerate that which violates His righteous character. Therefore, sin creates a barrier between God and persons.

Sin also necessitates God's intervention in human affairs. Since humanity could not extricate itself from the entanglements of sin, it was necessary for God to intervene if humanity was ever to be freed from these entanglements. See Salvation.

The consequences of sin both personally and in society are far reaching. That person who constantly and consistently follows a sinful course will become so enmeshed in sin that for all practical purposes he or she is enslaved to sin (Rom. 6, for example).

Another of the awful consequences of sin is spiritual depravity in society in general as well as in the lives of individuals. Some will argue that depravity is the cause of sin, and this surely is a valid consideration. However, there can be no escaping the fact that a continuance in sin adds to this personal depravity, a moral crookedness or corruption eventually making it impossible to reject sin.

Sin also produces spiritual blindness. Spiritual truths simply are not visible to that person who has been blinded by sin.

Moral ineptitude is another devastating consequence of sin. The more people practice sin, the more inept they become as far as moral and spiritual values are concerned. Eventually, sin blurs the distinction between right and wrong.

Guilt is certainly a consequence of sin. No person can blame another person for a sin problem. Each person must accept responsibility for sin and face the guilt associated with it (Rom. 1—3).

In the Bible sin and death are corrolaries. One of the terrible byproducts of sin is death. Continual, consistent sin will bring spiritual death to that person who has not come under the lordship of Christ through repentance and faith (Rom. 6:23; Rev. 20:14.) For those who have trusted Christ Jesus for salvation, death no longer holds this dread. Christ has negated the power of Satan in making death horrible and has freed the person from slavery to this awful fear (Heb. 2:14–15.) See Death.

Another serious consequence of sin is that it brings separation from God, estrangement, and a lack of fellowship with God. This need not be permanent, but if a person dies not having corrected this problem by trusting Christ, then the separation does become permanent (Rom. 6:23). See Hell.

Sin produces estrangement from other persons just as surely as it produces an estrangement from God. All interpersonal problems have sin as their root cause (Jas. 4:1–3). The only hope for peace to be achieved on either the personal or national level is through the Prince of peace.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (Sĭn) Barren region somewhere west of the Sinai plateau on the Sinai peninsula. The Hebrew people stopped here on their journey from Egypt to the Promised Land (Ex. 16:1). It was here that God first provided manna and quail for them to eat. The place sometimes has been confused with the Wilderness of Zin, which is located on the northeastern side of Sinai. See Zin.

SINAI See Mount Sinai.

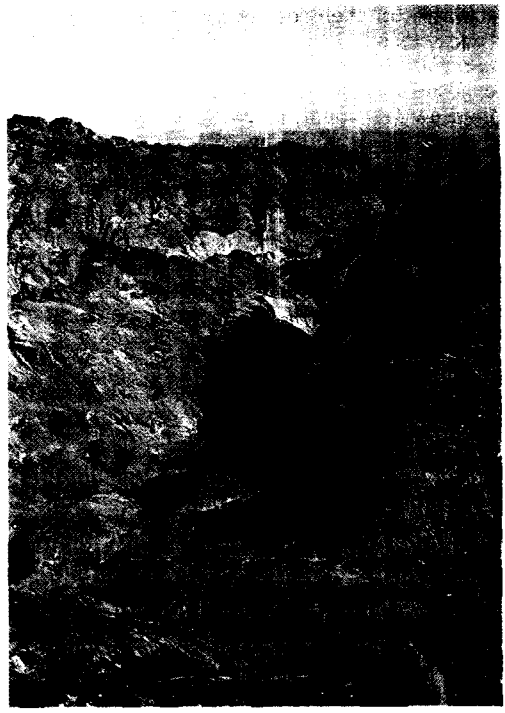
SINCERITY The personal quality of living life from a pure motive without deceit. Associated with words or ideas like "truth" (1 Cor. 5:8), "genuineness" (2 Cor. 8:8), "godliness" (2 Cor.

The desolate country of the Wilderness of Sin (Zin).



1:12), and preaching sincerely the gospel (2 Cor. 2:17). It is also contrasted with words like hypocrisy, deceit, and wickedness. See Holiness, Holy; Truth.

SINEW The tendons and connective tissue that connect muscles to bone in the body. The literal use is seen in Scripture (Job 10:11; 30:17; Ezek. 37:6,8). Isaiah 48:4 uses it in a figurative way to show rebellion against God. Because of Jacob's wrestling with the angel that resulted in the angel's striking the sinew of his thigh, the Jews cut away this sinew and did not eat it (Gen. 32:24–32). See Body.

SINGING, SINGERS See Hymns; Levites; Music.

SINIM (Sī′ nĭm) Land from which God promised to gather the Babylonian Exiles (Isa. 49:12). Traditionally translated as China and treated variously by early translators as Persia or the south, the term received clarification from an Isaiah manuscript among the Dead Sea Scrolls, which reads, "Syenites," a reference to modern Aswan (compare NIV, REB, NRSV). See Syene.

SINITE (Sī′ nīte) People from a city–state controlled by Ugarit, the Hittites, and the Assyrians whose inhabitants descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:17). It is in northern Phoenicia near Arqa, either Siyanu two and a half miles east of Gebala or Shen south southeast of Halba.

S

SINNER A person who has missed God's mark for life, rebelling against Him. The Bible considers every person a sinner (Rom. 3:23). In the Old Testament people who do not live by the law were considered sinners (Ps. 1). The New Testament uses anomia in a similar way (1 Tim 1:9). Jews regarded Gentiles as sinners (Gal. 2:15) as also people who did not keep the tradition of the Pharisees, including Jesus (Matt. 11:19; see Luke 15). Paul spoke of sinners as those separated from God (Rom. 5:8). See Law; Salvation; Sin.

SION (Sī' ŏn) 1. KJV spelling of Sirion (Deut. 4:48). 2. KJV spelling of Zion (Ps. 65:1; Matt. 21:5; Rom. 11:26; Rev. 14:1). See Zion.

SIPHMOTH (Siph' mōth) Town in southern Judah that received booty of war from David for befriending him (1 Sam. 30:26,28). The location of Siphmoth is unknown. A man named Zabdi may have been a resident of the town (1 Chron. 27:27). See Shiphmite.

SIPPAI (Sĭp' pā ī) Alternate rendering (1 Chron. 20:4) of the name "Saph" (2 Sam. 21:18), a son of a giant killed by Sibbechai the Hushathite. See Saph.

SIRAH (Sī' rah) Place name meaning, "thorn." A well ("cistern of Sirah" NRSV) where Joab and Abishai murdered Abner for killing their brother Asahel (2 Sam. 3:26–30). This well is probably the well named 'Ain Sarah, a little over a mile northwest of Hebron. See Wells.

SIRION (Sĭr' ī ŏn) Sidonian name for Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:9). See Hermon, Mount.

SISAMAI (Sĭs' ȧ mâi) KJV spelling of Sismai. See Sismai.

SISERA (Sĭs' ēr ȧ) Personal name meaning, "mediation." 1. Military leader of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. 4:2) who was killed by Heber's wife, Jael (v. 21). 2. A man in a list of Nethinim descendants who returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55). See Jabin; Judges.

SISMAI (Sĭs' mâi) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Eleasah and father of Shallum (1 Chron. 2:40; "Sisamai" KJV).

SISTER Female sibling counterpart to brother (Gen. 29:13; 30:1,8). In patriarchal times it was permissible to marry a sister (Gen. 20:12). Sister was also used of people held in special esteem as a counterpart to brotherly affection (Song of Sol. 4:9; 8:8). Christian women who proved helpful and assisted the church to live like family were called "sister" (Rom. 16:1–2). Martha and Mary, sisters of Lazarus, were well known as friends and supporters of Jesus. Jesus said, "For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother" (Mark 3:35). See Family; Women.

SITHRI (Sĭth' rî) Personal name probably meaning, "He is my protection." A son of Uzziel in the genealogy of Levi (Ex. 6:22; "Zithri" KJV).

SITNAH (Sĭt' nah) A well Isaac's servants dug in the area of Gerar (Gen. 26:21). The well was seized by the servants of Abimelech. Therefore, the name of the well meaning "hatred" or "opponent." See Wells.

SIVAN (Sī' văn) Third month (May–June) of the Hebrew calendar, time of wheat harvest and Pentecost. See Calendars.

SKIN The outer part of the human body and of the body of animals. 1. The mention of human skin is often in relation to disease (see Lev. 13). Human skin is also mentioned in relationship to hairiness (Gen. 27:11–12,16,22–23); to sickness (Job 7:5; Lam. 5:10); and to the color (Jer. 13:23). 2. Genesis 3:21 is the first mention of animal skins in the Bible. Animal skins were used to make containers for various kinds of liquids: water, milk, wine (Judg. 4:19 NIV; Matt. 9:17 NIV). The most used hides probably came from the animals most in use: sheep, goats, oxen, and donkeys, although other animal's skins certainly were used when available. 3. The sacrifice of animals sometimes called for the destruction of the entire animal (Lev. 4:11–12). At other times the skins were the property of the priests for their use (Lev. 7:8). 4. The skin was also used in several proverbial sayings: "Skin for skin" (Job 2:4), "the skin of my teeth" (Job 19:20), and "Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots?" (Jer. 13:23). See Diseases; Leprosy; Vessels and Utensils.

SKIRT An article of clothing. Three Hebrew words are translated "skirt." 1. Kanaph refers to the four loose corners of a garment. David cut off one of these corners of Saul's robe to show he meant Saul no harm (1 Sam. 24:4,11). "To reveal a skirt" (literal reading of Deut. 22:30; 27:20) is a euphemism for sexual relationships, since placing the skirt over a woman of marriageable age was the same as claiming her for marriage (Ruth 3:7–14). 2. Peh, meaning "mouth," is translated "skirts" in Psalm 130:2 ("collar" NIV, NRSV; "edge" NAS). 3. Shul refers to the part of a garment that hangs the closest to the ground. In some passages it refers to the loose garment of a woman. Several references to Jerusalem use this word figuratively to show her sin (Jer. 13:22,26; Lam. 1:9; Nah. 3:5). The lifting of the skirt brought shame because the nakedness of a person was seen (Isa. 47:1–3; Nah. 3:5). See Cloth, Clothing.

SKY See Heaven.

SLANDER To speak critically of another person with the intent to hurt (Lev. 19:16). In a court of law it means to falsely accuse another (Ex. 20:16; Deut. 5:20). Jesus said, "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment" (Matt. 12:36). This should cause each person to be very careful what they say about others (see Eph. 4:31; 1 Pet. 2:1). The Bible shows that slander is a mark of the unregenerate world (Jas. 4:11–12; 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:16). Jesus spoke of Satan as one who "does not stand in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks according to his own nature, for he is a liar and the father of lies" (John 8:44 NRSV). Diabolos can mean "slanderous" or "the slanderer" (the devil). See Devil, Satan, Evil, Demonic; Ethics.

SLAVE/SERVANT Person totally responsible to and dependant upon another person.

Slavery was prevalent and widely accepted in the ancient world. The economy of Egypt, Greece, and Rome was based on slave labor. In the first Christian century, one out of three persons in Italy and one out of five elsewhere was a slave. Huge gangs toiled in the fields and mines and on building projects. Many were domestic and civil servants. Some were temple slaves and others craftsmen. Some were forced to become gladiators. Some were highly intelligent and held responsible positions. Legally, a slave had no rights; but, except for the gangs, most were treated humanely and were better off than many free persons. Domestics were considered part of the family, and some were greatly loved by their masters. Canaan, Aram, Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia had fewer slaves because it proved less expensive to hire free persons. Still, the institution of slavery was unquestioned. The Stoics insisted that slaves were humans and should be treated accordingly; Israel's law protected slaves in various ways; Christian preachers called upon masters to be kind, but only the Essenes opposed slavery. See Essenes; Jewish Parties.

A person could become a slave as a result of capture in war, default on a debt, inability to support and "voluntarily" selling oneself, being sold as a child by destitute parents, birth to slave parents, conviction of a crime, or kidnapping and piracy. Slavery cut across races and nationalities.

Manumission or freeing of slaves was possible and common in Roman times. Masters in their wills often freed their slaves, and sometimes they did so during their lifetimes. Industrious slaves could make and save money and purchase their own freedom. By the first Christian century, a large class of freedmen had developed. There was even a synagogue of the Freedmen in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9).

Slavery in the Old Testament Slavery laws appear in Exodus 21:1–11; Leviticus 25:39–55; and Deuteronomy 15:12–18. Most of these concern humane treatment and manumission. A Hebrew sold to another Hebrew or a resident alien because of insolvency was to be released after six years of service and given provisions to start over. If he had come with a wife, she and any children were also released. If the master had given him a wife, she and the children were to remain. If, however, the slave wanted to stay with his wife and children rather than be free, he could enroll himself as a slave for life. A Hebrew who sold himself to another Hebrew or resident alien was to be released during the Jubilee Year. See Jubilee. A slave could be redeemed at any time by a relative. A Hebrew girl sold by her father to another Hebrew to become his wife was to be released if that man or his son did not marry her. A slave permanently maimed by his or her master was to be freed (Ex. 21:26–27). A fugitive slave—presumably one who had escaped from a foreign owner—was not to be extradited (Deut. 23:15–16). Foreigners could be enslaved permanently, but they had the right to circumcision (Ex. 12:44–48), sabbath rest (Ex. 20:10), and holidays (Deut. 16:11,14). One was to be punished for beating a slave to death (Ex. 21:20–21).

Slavery in the New Testament Paul and Peter insisted that Christian slaves be obedient to their masters (Eph. 6:5–8; Col. 3:22–25; 1 Tim. 6:1–2; 1 Pet. 2:18–21) and not seek freedom just because of conversion (1 Cor. 7:20–22). Masters were urged to be kind (Eph. 6:9; Col. 4:1). Slave trading was condemned (1 Tim. 1:10). Paul claimed that in Christ human status was unimportant (Gal. 3:28). But neither Jesus nor the apostles condemned slavery. Why? Because slavery was so much a part of their society that to call for abolition would have resulted in violence and bloodshed. That is not the Christian way! Rather, Jesus and the apostles set forth principles of human dignity and equality which eventually led to abolition.

Metaphorical Uses of Slavery In most ancient societies, few things were more despicable than to be a slave. In Israel, however, the idea emerged that it was a great privilege to be a servant or slave of God (the various Hebrew and Greek words could be translated either). Many of the heroes of the Old Testament are so called (Ex. 32:13; Deut. 34:5; 2 Sam. 7:5; 2 Kings 21:10). Very significant are the Servant Songs of Isaiah 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; and 52:13—53:12, which originally referred to Israel but were reinterpreted by the early church to refer to Jesus. See Servant of the Lord.

Jesus adopted a servant's role (John 13:4–5; Mark 10:45; compare Phil. 2:7) and indicated that His disciples should also (Matt. 6:24; 10:24; 24:45–46; Luke 17:10; John 13:12–16). Paul referred to himself as a slave or servant of Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; Phil. 1:1), as did James (1:1), Peter (2 Pet. 1:1), and Jude (1).

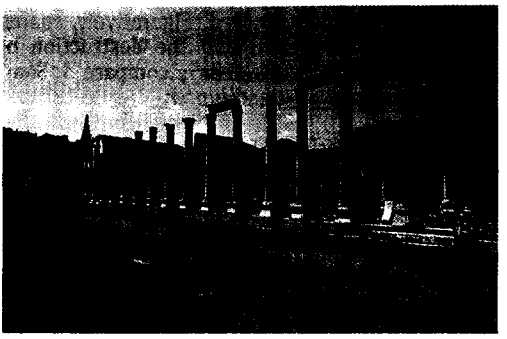
There are three other metaphorical uses of slavery in the New Testament. A life of sin is spoken of as slavery (John 8:34; Rom. 6:6,16–20; Heb. 2:15). Legalism is a kind of slavery (Gal. 4:24–25; 5:1). Paradoxically, however, there is also a blessed slavery to righteousness (Rom. 6:16–22).

James A. Brooks



SLEEP The natural state of rest for human beings and animals (Ps. 4:8). God causes state called "deep sleep," sometimes for revelation (Gen. 2:21; 15:12; Job 4:13), and sometimes to prevent prophetic vision (Isa. 29:10; compare 1 Sam. 26:12). It is also used as a sign of laziness (Prov. 19:15). Sleep is a figure of physical death (John 11:11–14; 1 Cor. 15:51). See Death; Eternal Life.

SLIME See Bitumen.

SLING, SLINGERS, SLINGSTONES Weapon of two long straps with a piece between them at the end to hold the stone. Shepherds and professional soldiers used slings. See Arms and Armor.

SLOTHFUL A loose, undisciplined person. The Hebrew term can refer to a bow not strung or equipped with an arrow for action (Ps. 78:57; Hos. 7:16). A same or related Hebrew root describes a loose tongue or mind as deceitful (Job 13:7; 27:4; Pss. 32:2; 52:4; Mic. 6:12). The slothful person cannot lead but becomes subjected to another's rule (Prov. 12:24; compare 10:4; 19:15). God's work must not be done in such a spirit (Jer. 48:10). See Ethics. A second Hebrew term refers to that which is difficult, heavy, hindered and indicates foolish laziness or sluggishness. The tribe of Dan was encouraged to take the new territory and not be slothful or reluctant (Judg. 18:9). The wise, hardworking ant illustrates the opposite of sloth (Prov. 6:6), while the slothful wants only to sleep (Prov. 6:9; compare 10:26; 13:4; 15:19; 19:24; 20:4; 21:25; 22:13; 24:30; 26:16). The virtuous woman is the opposite of slothful, not having to live with the results of idle sloth (Prov. 31:27). Ecclesiastes apparently coined a word for slothfulness twice over and the resulting decay of present gain (10:18). Jesus condemned a wicked, slothful servant (Matt. 25:26) but praised and rewarded the "good and faithful servant" (Matt. 25:23).

SMYRNA (Smȳr' nȧ) A major city on the West coast of Asia Minor, the modern city of Izmir, Turkey. It had good harbor facilities, was at the end of a major road, and was surrounded by rich farmland. It is the second of the seven churches addressed in Revelation (2:8–11), one of two churches of which the Lord spoke no negative word. (Philadelphia was the other.) Smyrna gave its loyalty to the Romans at an early stage (about 195 B.C.) and never wavered. The Romans often rewarded Smyrna for its loyalty. The city was headquarters for the imperial cult of emperor worship in that area of the empire. Christians were persecuted by Jews and Romans. Polycarp was a famous Christian martyr who was burned at the stake in Smyrna about A.D. 156. See Asia Minor.

Statues found in the ruins of Smyrna (modern Izmir, Turkey).

SNAIL Animal whose name apparently means, "moist one." It illustrates the quick end to life (Ps. 58:8). Attempts to translate "miscarriage" instead of "snail" do not seem to be based on good linguistic evidence. KJV translated the unclean reptile of Leviticus 11:30 as "snail." Other suggestions include "sand reptile" (NAS), "skink" (NIV), "sand lizard" (NRS), and "great lizard" (REB).

SNARE Trap to catch birds and animals. There were basically two kinds of snares. One used rope or cord. Either the animal stepped in the trap and was snared by the feet, or the rope fell from above and caught the animal by the neck. The most common was a trap with a net. The animal would be attracted by the bait. When the baited trigger was released, the net covered the animal and captured it. Also the opening of a pit would be camouflaged with cover. The animal would fall into the pit and be captured. Figuratively, snares spoke of peril or death and the destruction of persons (Job 22:10; Ps. 18:5; compare 1 Sam. 28:9). See Fowler; Hunt/Hunter.

SNOW Being basically in a hot climate, Palestine has snow only rarely. Yet Mount Hermon has a snow cap that can be seen throughout much of Palestine. Snow is used in the Bible figuratively: whiteness (Isa. 1:18), cleanness (Job 9:30), refreshing coolness (Prov. 25:13). See Weather.

SNUFFERS Two different instruments used to tend the lamps in the tabernacle and the Temple. One instrument seems to be a cutting tool used for trimming the wicks of the lamps. The other word is often translated "tongs" (Isa. 6:6), meaning that it consisted in two parts working together. Exodus 25:38 speaks of "tongs" and "snuffdishes." Evidently these instruments were used to trim the wicks of the lamps and dispose of the waste.

SOAP A cleaner made by mixing olive oil and alkali from burning certain salt-producing plants. It was used of washing the body (Jer. 2:22) and of washing clothes (Mal. 3:2). Perhaps the scant references to soap is due to the fact that people in the Near East use oil for cleansing the body and pound clothes on rocks while wet to cleanse them. See Fuller.

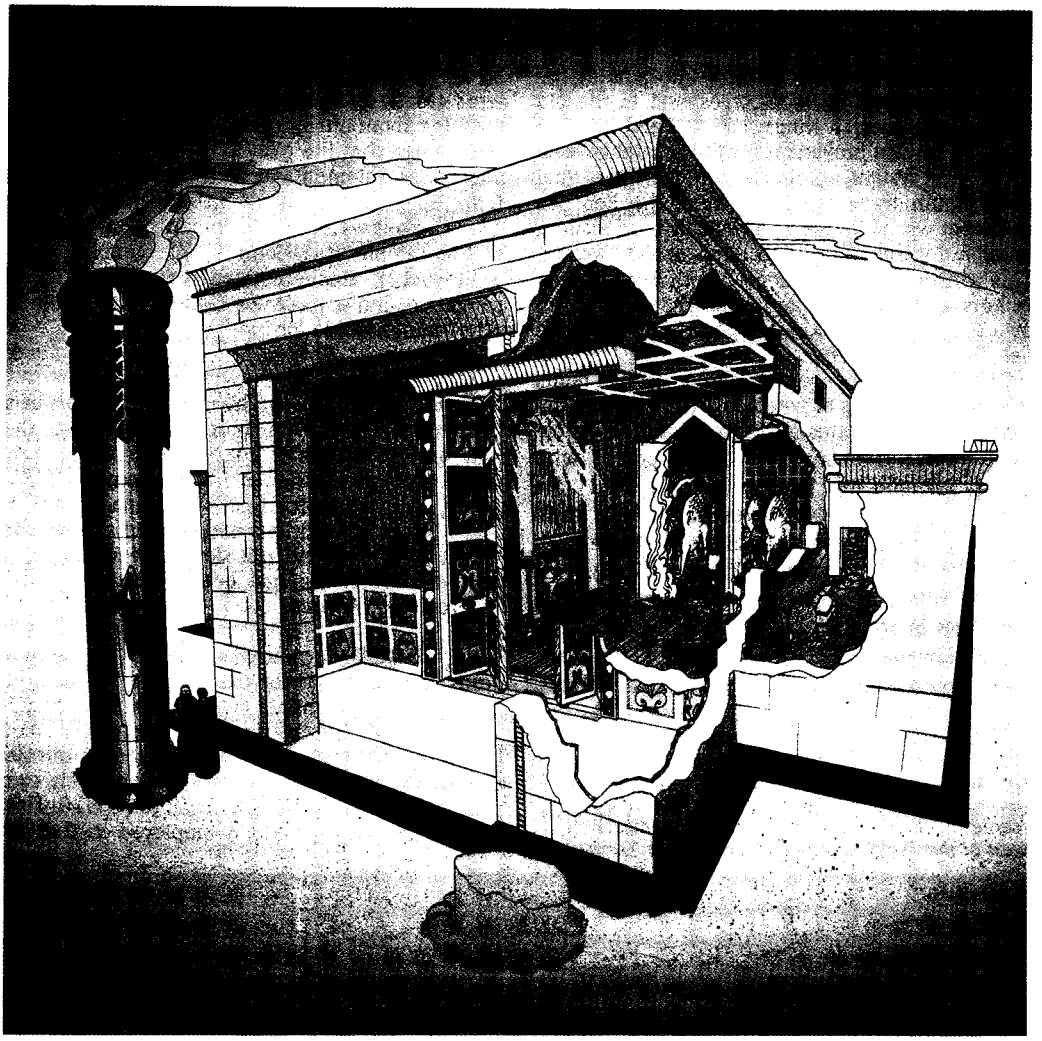
SOBER Characterized by self-control, seriousness, and sound moral judgment (1 Thess. 5:6,8; 1 Tim. 3:2,11; Tit. 1:8; 2:2,6; 1 Pet. 1:13; 5:8). The KJV employed sober to mean in one's right mind at 2 Corinthians 5:13.

SOCOH, SOCO, SHOCHO (Sō′ cōh) Place name meaning, "thorns." 1. Town in southern Judah hill country used as a fortification against people approaching from the south (Josh. 15:35). It is modern Khirbet Abbad. Philistines gathered to battle Saul there (1 Sam. 17:1). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron. 11:7). 2. A town in the southern hill country of Judah about ten miles southwest of Hebron (Josh. 15:48) at khirbet Shuweikeh. 3. A town belonging to Ben-hesed (1 Kings 4:10 NRSV), one of the twelve officials who provided food for Solomon and his household. It is aš-Shuweikeh west of Nablus and two miles north of Tulkarm. 4. A native of Judah, the son of Heber (1 Chron. 4:18). Some interpreters feel that this is a place name rather than personal name. May be the same as 2.

SODI (Sō′ dī) Personal name meaning, "my counsel." Father of Gaddiel of Zebulun, one of the spies Moses sent to spy out Canaan (Num. 13:10).

SODOM AND GOMORRAH (Sŏ′ dŏm, Gŏ mōr′ răh) Place names of uncertain meaning. Two cities in Palestine at the time of Abraham. Sodom and Gomorrah were among the five "cities of the valley" (Gen. 13:12; 19:29; KJV, "plain") of Abraham's time. Exact locations are unknown, but they were probably situated in the Valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:3,8,10–11) near the Dead Sea, perhaps the area now covered by the Sea's shallow southern end. Lot moved to this area, eventually settling in Sodom (Gen. 13:10–12; 14:12; 19:1).

Sodom and Gomorrah were renowned for their wickedness (Gen. 18:20). Despite Abraham's successful plea (18:22–32) not even ten righteous men could be found in Sodom, and the cities were judged by the Lord, then destroyed by "brimstone and fire" (19:24; NIV, "burning sulfur").



The unnatural lusts of the men of Sodom (Gen. 19:4–8; Jude 7) have given us the modern term sodomy, but the city was guilty of a full spectrum of sins including pride, oppression of the poor, haughtiness, and "abominable things" (Ezek. 16:49–50). Together, Sodom and Gomorrah provided a point of comparison for the sinfulness of Israel and other nations (Deut. 32:32; Isa. 1:10; Jer. 23:14). The memory of their destruction provided a picture of God's judgment (Isa. 13:19; Jer. 49:18; Matt. 10:14–15; 11:23–24) and made them an example to be avoided (Deut. 29:23–25; 2 Pet. 2:6). Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

SODOMITE Originally a citizen of the town of Sodom, one of the cities of the plain near the Dead Sea (Gen 13:12). The term came to mean a male who has sexual relations with another male. The wickedness of Sodom became proverbial (see Gen. 19:1–11). See Homosexuality; Sex.

SOLDIER A person trained to fight, usually on active military duty. In early Israelite history every male was called on to fight when the tribes were threatened. David was the first to put together a national army made up of professional soldiers. Kings often had a personal group of soldiers to guard them. The New Testament soldier was usually the Roman soldier. John the Baptist indicated that the average Roman soldier extorted money from civilians by threatening them (Luke 3:14). On the other hand, the centurion (leader of 100 men) is held in esteem in the New Testament (see Acts 10). See Army; Centurion.

SOLOMON (Sŏl′ ō mŏn) Personal name whose meaning is variously interpreted as "his peace," "(God) is peace," "Salem (a god)," "intact," or "his replacement." Tenth son of David and the second son of Bathsheba, Solomon became the third king of Israel and reigned forty years about 1000 B.C.

Cut-away view of Solomon's Temple at Jerusalem, showing the porch, the holy place, and the holy of holies—where giant protecting cherubim and the sacred ark of the covenant were placed.

Old Testament Solomon was born to David and Bathsheba after the death of their first son (2 Sam. 12:24). Although not the oldest living son of David, he was crowned king after his mother and Nathan the prophet intervened with David and secured David's decision to have Solomon succeed him (1 Kings 1—2). Solomon is remembered most for his wisdom, his building program, and his wealth generated through trade and administrative reorganization.

Solomon was remembered as having three thousand proverbs and a thousand and five songs in his repertoire (1 Kings 4:32). Thus, it is not surprising that Proverbs and Song of Solomon in the Bible are attributed to Solomon (Prov. 1:1; Song of Sol. 1:1) as are several apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books. See Apocrypha; Pseudepigrapha. His wisdom is also illustrated in the Bible by the accounts of the two harlots who claimed the single surviving child (1 Kings 3:16) and by the visit of the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10).

While Solomon's Temple was the most famous of his building projects (1 Kings 5—8), it was by no means the only one. Solomon fortified a number of cities that helped provide protection to Jerusalem, built "store-cities" for stockpiling the materials required in his kingdom, and established military bases for contingents of charioteers (1 Kings 9:15–19). The Temple complex in Jerusalem was composed of several buildings including Solomon's palace, the "house of the forest of Lebanon," the "hall or porch of pillars," the "hall or porch of the throne," and a palace for one of his wives, the daughter of the pharaoh of Egypt

(1 Kings 7). See Archaeology; Gezer; Hazor; Megiddo; Temple.

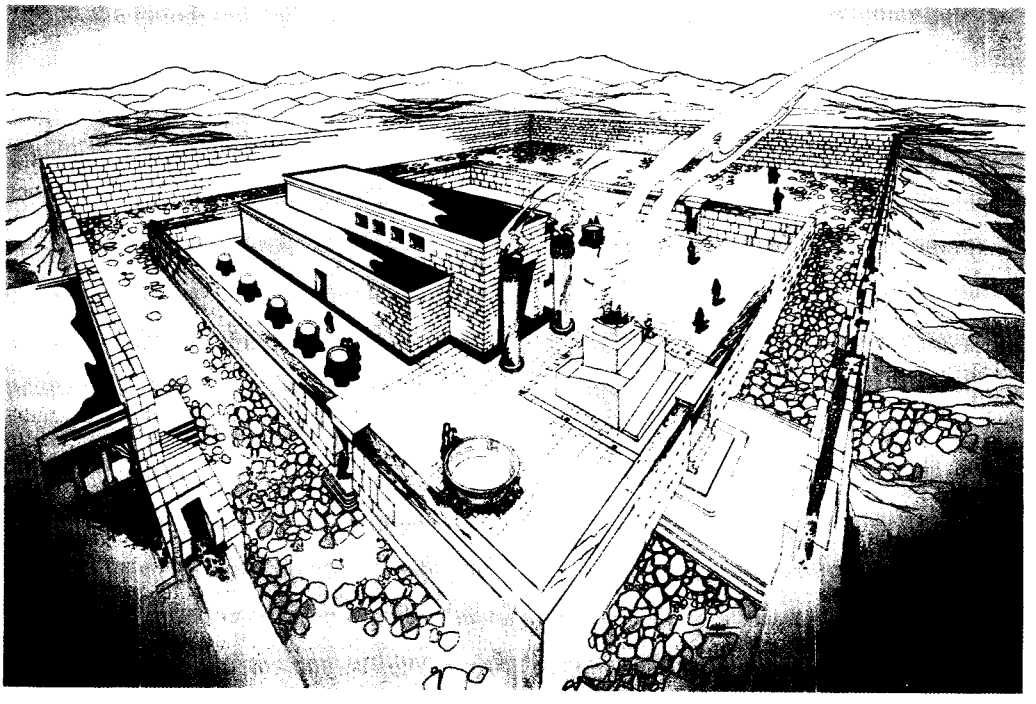
Solomon divided the country into administrative districts that did not correspond to the old tribal boundaries (1 Kings 4:7–19) and had the districts provide provisions for the central government. This system, combined with control of vital north/south trade routes between the Red Sea and what was later known as Asia Minor, made it possible for Solomon to accumulate vast wealth. This wealth was supplemented both from trading in horses and chariots and from trade carried on by a fleet of ships (1 Kings 9:26–28; 10:26–29). See Eloth; Ezion-geber.

The Bible clearly notes that Solomon had faults as well as elements of greatness. The "seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines" came from many of the kingdoms with which Solomon had treaties (1 Kings 11:1). He apparently allowed his wives to worship their native gods and even had altars to these gods constructed in Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:7–8). This kind of compromise indicated to the historian a weakness in Solomon not found in David. Rebellions led by the king of Edom, Rezon of Damascus, and Jeroboam, one of Solomon's own officers, indicates that Solomon's long reign was not without its turmoil.



New Testament Solomon was an ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:6–7) and is mentioned in Jesus' teaching about anxiety (Matt. 6:29; Luke 12:27). Jesus noted that the queen of Sheba came a long way to see Solomon and that "something greater than Solomon is here" (Matt. 12:42; Luke 11:31). Jesus walked in "Solomon's porch," a part of the Temple area (John 10:23; compare Acts 3:11; 5:12). Stephen noted that though David sought to find a place for God, it was Solomon who "built a house for him" (Acts 7:47).

SOLOMON'S PORCH The raised outermost part of Herod's Temple with columns that went all the way around the outer court (John 10:23; Acts 3:11). It is called "the portico of Solomon" (NAS, NRSV, REB) and "Solomon's Colonnade" (NIV), since Solomon's workers constructed at least the oldest portico on the east side. In Jesus' day this part of the Temple had been built by Herod's laborers. See Temple.

SON OF GOD Term used to express the deity of Jesus of Nazareth as the one, unique Son of God. In the Old Testament, certain men and angels (Gen. 6:1–4; Pss. 29:1; 82:6; 89:6) are called "sons of God" (note text notes in modern translations). The people of Israel were corporately considered the son of God (Ex. 4:22; Jer. 31:20; Hos. 11:1). The concept also is employed in the Old Reconstruction of Solomon's Temple (957–587 B.C.) at Jerusalem and its courts. Shown are the ten lavers (five on each side of the Temple), the Molten Sea (lower, center), and the Altar of Burnt Offerings (center). Solomon's palace (left) stood immediately west of the Temple court, overlooking the Temple.

Testament with reference to the king as God's son (Ps. 2:7). The promises found in the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:14) are the source for this special filial relationship. The title can be found occasionally in intertestamental implications (Wisd. of Sol. 2:16,18; 4 Ezra 7:28–29; 13:32,37,52; 14:9; Book of Enoch 105:2).

Jesus' own assertions and intimations indicate that references to Him as Son of God can be traced to Jesus Himself. At the center of Jesus' identity in the Fourth Gospel is His divine sonship (John 10:36). Jesus conceived of His divine sonship as unique as indicated by such assertions as "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30 NIV) and the "Father is in me and I am in the Father" (John 10:38 NRSV). Elsewhere, He frequently referred to God as "my Father" (John 5:17; 6:32; 8:54; 10:18; 15:15; Matt. 7:21; 10:32–33; 20:23; 26:29,53; Mark 8:38; Luke 2:49; 10:21–22).

At Jesus' baptism and transfiguration, God the Father identified Jesus as His son, in passages reflecting Psalm 2:7. He was identified as Son of God by an angel prior to His birth (Luke 1:32,35); by Satan at His temptation (Matt. 4:3,6); by John the Baptist (John 1:34); by the centurion at the crucifixion (Matt. 27:54). Several of His followers ascribed to Him this title in various contexts (Matt. 14:33; 16:16; John 1:49; 11:27).

The term Son of God reveals Jesus' divine sonship and is closely associated with His royal position as Messiah. Gabriel told Mary that her Son would not only be called the Son of God, but would also reign on the messianic (David's) throne (Luke 1:32–33). The connection of Son of God with Jesus' royal office is also found in John (1:49; 11:27; 20:30), in Paul (Rom. 1:3–4; 1 Cor. 15:28; Col. 1:13), and in Luke (Acts 9:20–22).

Primarily, the title Son of God affirms Jesus' deity evidenced by His person and His work. John emphasized Jesus' personal relationship to the Father. Paul stressed the salvation that Jesus provided (Rom. 1:4; 1 Thess. 1:10), and the author of Hebrews focused on Jesus' priesthood (5:5). All of these are vitally related to His position as Son of God. David S. Dockery

SON OF MAN New Testament designation for Jesus as God incarnate in flesh and agent of divine judgment. It occurs some 84 times in the Gospels, all but one being Jesus' self-description.

The Old Testament With the exception of Ezekiel and Daniel, the term Son of man appears in the Old Testament as a synonym for "man," "humankind" (Isa. 56:2; Jer. 50:40; Pss. 8:4; 80:17; 146:3; Job 25:6). In the Aramaic language spoken in Palestine in Jesus' day, the expression Son of man was similarly used to mean "the man," "a man," or simply "someone." The term appears in the rabbinic writings with the meaning, "a certain person."

1. Ezekiel In Ezekiel, God uses the term 90 times to address the prophet. The exact nuance of this usage is widely debated. Is the emphasis on the humanity and frailty of the prophet? It is used, perhaps, as a title to distinguish him from other men. Or, it may reveal the prophet's sense of identity with his people. In any event, the emphasis seems to be on the humanity of the prophet, a meaning which Christians also came to attach to the term when applied to Jesus.

2. Daniel The most distinctive Old Testament use of "Son of man" is in Daniel 7:13. In one of his night visions, the prophet saw "one like a son of man" (NAS) come on the clouds of heaven to appear before the throne of God. He was given dominion over all peoples and an everlasting kingdom. Scholars are divided over whether the Son of man of Daniel's vision should be seen as an angel, as the Messiah, or as all of Israel. (The latter conclusion is drawn from the fact that in Dan. 7:27 the "saints of the most High" were granted dominion over an everlasting kingdom.) Later, Jewish interpretation of Daniel 7:13, however, is at one in seeing the reference as messianic. This is true of the later apocalyptic writings such as Enoch and 2 Esdras as well as the rabbinic writings.

The New Testament The "Son of man" sayings of Jesus fall into three distinct types.

1. Apocalyptic Sayings The largest number of Son of man sayings deal with the final times when the Son of man will descend to earth to gather the elect and to judge. The picture of the Son of man in these passages is strongly reminiscent of Daniel 7:13 (quoted in Matt. 24:30; 26:64; Mark 13:26; 14:62; Luke 21:27; 22:69). The Son of man will come in glory with His angels and take His seat on His throne (Matt. 25:31). His coming will be sudden and unexpected (Matt. 10:23; 16:28; 24:27, 38–39; 24:44; Luke 17:22–27). He will come as judge to condemn the unrighteous (Matt. 13:41; 16:27; John 5:27) and to take as His own those who have faith and confess Him (Luke 12:8; 18:8; 21:36). Faithful disciples are to join the Son of man in this judgment (Matt. 19:28), which perhaps reflects the dual role of the Son of man and saints of the Most High found in Daniel 7:13,27. These sayings could be taken as referring to another than Jesus, but the Gospel writers unquestionably saw Jesus as referring to Himself and connected these events with His second coming.

2. Passion Sayings The second largest group of Son of man sayings are connected with the suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Three times Jesus predicted that the Son of man would be rejected and killed by the priests and scribes but would rise on the third day (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34; Luke 24:7). Just like John the Baptist, the Son of man would be treated with contempt (Mark 9:12–13; Matt. 17:12–13). He will be betrayed (Matt. 26:24,45; Luke 22:48). Death would be followed by victory, the resurrection from the dead (Matt. 17:9).

In his own way, John highlighted this dual emphasis on the humiliation of the cross and the glory of the resurrection. The Son of man is to be "lifted up" on the cross, but this "lifting up" is in reality His exaltation, leading to His ascension to the Father (John 3:14; 8:28; 12:34). As with a seed, death must first come for there to be new life, and thus Jesus' death became His hour of greatest glory (John 12:23–4; 13:31).

Nothing in Jewish messianic expectation connected the Son of man with suffering and death. In the Old Testament, one finds that only with the Servant of Isaiah 53. That connection is clearly made in this group of Son of man sayings, and it is explicitly made in Mark 10:45 (Matt. 20:28). The Son of man, the messianic Judge of the final time, is also the Suffering Servant of God. That connection is unique to the teaching and ministry of Jesus.

3. Sayings Connected with Jesus' Ministry The third group of Son of man sayings is the most heterogeneous, but all refer to some aspect of Jesus' earthly ministry. Many could be understood in the sense of the Hebrew idiom—"a man, this man." Yet, all have a deeper implication than any human I, for all point to some unique quality about Jesus' ministry. Even in these sayings, "Son of man" should be seen as a title pointing to Jesus' special role. He is the One who has authority to forgive sins (Matt. 9:6; Mark 2:10; Luke 5:24) and to interpret the meaning of the sabbath (Matt. 12:8; Mark 2:28; Luke 6:5). In His preaching, He sowed the seed of God's kingdom (Matt. 13:37), for He came to seek and to save the lost (Luke 19:10). Blessed is the disciple who suffers for His sake (Luke 6:22).

Some of these sayings reflect an incarnational emphasis. The Son of man in His earthly humiliation had no place to lay His head (Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58). He was misunderstood and rejected (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34), but such personal rejection is forgivable—it is only the rejection of the work of the Spirit that is beyond forgiveness (Matt. 12:32; Luke 12:10). John's Gospel especially highlights this incarnational emphasis. The Son of man is true flesh and blood. One must accept that humanity to find true life (John 6:53). The Son of man is also Son of God, the One who came from above, the Ladder which links all humanity with God (John 1:51).

4. The Rest of the New Testament "Son of man" occurs only four times in the New Testament outside the Gospels. All four reflect understandings of the title already found in the Gospels. In Acts 7:56, Stephen beheld the ascended Son of man standing beside the throne of God to receive him. In Revelation 1:13; 14:14–16, the Son of man appears as Judge. In Hebrews 2:6, the reference to Son of man in Psalm 8:4 which originally applied to humanity in general is specifically applied to Jesus as the unique Son of man and representative of humanity. In the context of Hebrews 2, all the Gospel emphases on Son of man coalesce—a strong incarnational emphasis on His real flesh and blood, a vivid depiction of His representative suffering, and the note that by that suffering He acquires His glory and honor and leads many to glory.

Conclusion Why are there so few references to Son of man outside the Gospels? Perhaps it was not a familiar term in the Gentile churches to which most of the New Testament writings were addressed. In any event, the significance of the term was not lost, for the New Testament writers all attest to the profound teachings which this term embodies—the true humanity of the Word made flesh, the necessity of His suffering and death for salvation, the glory of His reign over an everlasting kingdom, and His final coming to judge the just and the unjust. John Polhill

SONG OF SOLOMON Collection of romantic poetry comprising the twenty-second book of the English Old Testament. The Hebrew title, "Solomon's Song of Songs," means that this is the best of songs and that it in some way concerns Solomon.

Author and Date While the title appears to name Solomon as the author, the Hebrew phrase can also mean for or about Solomon. Solomon or "king" is mentioned in the book several times (1:1,4,5,12; 3:7,9,11; 7:5; 8:11,12), but scholars remain uncertain about its author. An ancient rabbinic tradition (Baba Bathra 15a) attributes the Song to Hezekiah and his scribes (compare Prov. 25:1).

Similarly, it is hard to establish the date of the book from internal evidence. Some scholars argue on linguistic grounds for authorship much later than Solomon. Such grounds include the use of expressions akin to Aramaic and the presence of certain foreign loanwords (Persian: pardes = "orchard," 4:13; 'appiryon from Greek phoreion = "carriage" or [by way of Aramaic] "canopied bed," 3:9). Others argue that such linguistic usages and borrowings can go back to the time of Solomon or merely reflect the date of the book's final editing.

Canon and Interpretation Because of its erotic language and the difficulty of its interpretation, the rabbis questioned the place of the Song of Solomon in the canon. The positive resolution of that debate is reflected in the famous declaration of Rabbi Akiva, "The whole world is not worth the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel; all the Writings are holy, but the Song of Songs is the holy of holies."

The problems of the book's place in the canon and its interpretation are closely related. Under the influence of Greek views, which denigrated the body, and with the loss of a biblical view of the created goodness of the body and human love, many interpreters felt compelled to find in the Song an allegory of sacred love between God and Israel, Christ and the church, or Christ and the soul. With few exceptions, allegorical readings of the Song have prevailed for most of church history.

In the modern period, most scholars have returned to a literal reading of the Song. Conflict remains even about the literal sense of the text. Some compare Egyptian and Mesopotamian poems and see the Song as a mere collection of secular love ditties. Another view tries to see it as an adaptation of pagan fertility rituals. (This view is in reality a modern allegorical reading.) Others see the Song as a drama in which the pure love of the Shulammite maid and her shepherd prevails over Solomon's callous attempt to bring the girl into his harem. This view tries to do justice to the alteration of speakers in the Song in its various dialogues. (These shifts are indicated in Hebrew by shifts in grammatical person and number.)

A recent, promising approach is aware of parallels to Egyptian love poetry but shows that the Song itself gives expression to a uniquely biblical perspective on sexual love. While containing a number of smaller love poems, the Song is unified by patterns of dialogue, repetition, the use of catch words, and above all, a consistent vision of love. Like Genesis 2:23–25, the Song celebrates God's gift of bodily love between man and woman. Here the Creator's wisdom and bounty are displayed. Thus, the Song is best taken as an example of Israel's wisdom poetry (compare Prov. 5:15–20; 6:24–29; 7:6–27; 30:18–20). Like many Psalms which praise God and also teach, the Song's main purpose is to celebrate rather than to instruct. Like music, it tends to joy rather than learning. Yet one can overhear in it biblical wisdom on love. "Love is as strong as death. . . . Many waters cannot quench love. . . . If one were to give all the wealth of his house for love, it would be utterly scorned" (8:6–7 NIV). Moreover, there is a right time and place for love: "Daughters of Jerusalem, I charge you. . . Do not arouse or awaken love until it so desires" (3:5 NIV). In these poems love is portrayed in its power and splendor, its freshness and devotion to the beloved. Love in all its variety parades before us: moments of union and separation, ecstacy and anguish, longing and fulfillment.

Finally, a certain validity remains in the long history of interpretation, which saw in the pure love of the Song a reflection of divine-human love (compare Eph. 5:21–32; Song of Sol. 3:6–11; and the messianic typology of Psalm 45.) Nonetheless, this parallel should not be pushed to the point of allegorizing details of the poem.

SONS OF GOD Divine beings associated with God in the heavens in what can be called the "divine council" (Ps. 82:1 NRSV) or the "council of the holy ones" (Ps. 89:7 NAS). In Job, the earliest Greek translation translated "sons of God" as "angels of God" (Job 1:6; 2:1) and "my angels" (Job 38:7). The phrase "sons of the living God" in Hosea 1:10, however, refers to Israel.

The expression sons of God employs a Hebrew idiom in which "son(s)" refers to participants in a class or in a state of being, and the second word describes the class or state of being. Thus, in Genesis 5:32, Noah is said to be a "son of five hundred years," meaning he was 500 years old. In English an adjective often best translates the second term, so that "divine beings" rather than "sons of God" would be a better rendition of the Hebrew. This accords with the NRSV's translation "heavenly beings" for "sons of gods" in Psalms 29:1; 89:6.

In the New Testament, "sons of God" always refers to human beings who do God's will (Matt. 5:9; Rom. 8:14,19). Similar expressions with the same meaning are to be found in Matthew 5:45; John 1:12; Romans 9:26 (= Hos. 1:10), and 2 Corinthians 6:18. The usual designation of the heavenly beings in the New Testament is "angels."

SONS OF THE PROPHETS Members of a band or guild of prophets. "Sons of" refers to membership in a group or class and does not imply a family relationship. "Sons of the prophets" suggests a community or guild of prophets. The most extensive use of the expression occurs in the Elisha stories where the prophet is portrayed as the leader of the prophetic guild. In that capacity, Elisha cared for the needs of a prophet's widow (2 Kings 4:1–7), agreed to the building of a common dwelling (2 Kings 6:1–7), and presided at a common meal (2 kings 4:38–44). The sons of the prophets functioned either as witnesses (2 Kings 2:3,5,7,15) or as agents of Elisha's ministry (2 Kings 9:1–3).

The single reference outside the Elisha cycle to the sons of the prophets is to someone identified as "a certain man of the sons of the prophets" who condemned Ahab's release of Ben-Hadad (1 Kings 20:35–42). The "company of prophets" (1 Sam. 10:5,10; 19:20) are groups of prophets whose charismatic spirit involved Saul in prophecy (1 Sam. 10:10) and, later, both Saul and his messengers (1 Sam. 19:20).

Amos' famous declaration, "I am not a prophet, nor am I the son of a prophet" (7:14 NAS) is probably a declaration of independence from the prophetic guilds of his day. Similarly, Jeremiah's claim that God made him a prophet even before conception (Jer. 1:5) may obliquely represent a rejection of association with the prophetic schools of Judah. See Prophet. Fred L. Horton, Jr.

SOP KJV translation of psōmion meaning a small piece of bread that could be dipped in a dish or wine. It appears only in John 13:26–30 (compare Ruth 2:14). Most translators today use "morsel" (NAS) or "piece of bread" (NIV, NRSV). Today in Bible lands a host honors a guest by dipping a piece of bread into the sauce of the main dish and handing it to the guest. Most interpreters feel that Jesus was making his last appeal to Judas to change his mind. Then Jesus would accept him. Although Judas accepted the bread signifying friendship, John said, "Satan entered into him" (v. 27). At that moment Judas gave himself over to the will of Satan and left to betray Jesus. See Judas.

SOPATER (Sŏp′ ă tĕr) A personal name meaning "sound parentage." This man accompanied Paul on his final trip to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Some feel he is the same as "Sosipater" in Romans 16:21.

SOPHERETH (Sōph′ ĕ reth) Personal name meaning "learning." One of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57). Modern translations translate it "Hassophereth" in Ezra 2:55 and "Sophereth" in Nehemiah 7:57 (NAS, NIV, NRSV).

SORCERER A person who practices sorcery or divination. See Divination and Magic.

SORE Translation of six Hebrew words and a Greek word in RSV and of at least ten Hebrew and ten Greek words in KJV. 1. An adverb meaning, "very, extremely" as in "sore afraid" (Gen. 20:8). 2. An adverb meaning, "severely, insistently, with urgent pressure" as in "they pressed sore" (Gen. 19:9). 3. To experience pain (Gen. 34:25). 4. "Strong, severe" as in "the famine was sore" (Gen. 43:1). 5. A wounded or diseased spot or a plague (Lev. 13:42). 6. Something evil or bad (Deut. 6:22; 28:35). 7. A great amount as in "wept sore" (Judg. 21:2). 8. With vexation or anger (1 Sam. 1:6). 9. Cruel, tough, obstinate (1 Sam. 5:7). 10. Fully, greatly (Neh. 2:2). 11. Hand (Ps. 77:2). 12. Weakness or sickness (Eccl. 5:13). 13. Horrible, terrible (Ezek. 27:35). 14. Large, exceeding (Dan. 6:14). 15. Pressing, irritating (Mic. 2:10). 16. An ulcer (Rev. 16:2). 17. Blisters or boils (Ex. 9:9). See Boils. 18. An inflamed spot sometimes interpreted as smallpox or a skin disease akin to leprosy (Ex. 9:9–11; Lev. 13:18–20; 2 Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). 19. A wound (Gen. 4:23; Isa. 53:5).

SOREK (Sō′ rĕk) Place name meaning, "red grape." A valley on the western side of Palestine. It runs from near Jerusalem toward the Mediterranean Sea. Beth-shemesh guarded the eastern end, while the Philistines controlled the western portion during the era of the judges. Delilah, Samson's mistress, lived in the valley of Sorek (Judg. 16:4). See Palestine.

SORROW Emotional, mental, or physical pain or stress. Hebrew does not have a general word for sorrow. Rather it uses about fifteen different words to express the different dimensions of sorrow. Some speak to emotional pain (Ps. 13:2). Trouble and sorrow were not meant to be part of the human experience. Humanity's sin brought sorrow to them (Gen 3:16–19). Sometimes God was seen as chastising His people for their sin (Amos 4:6–12). To remove sorrow, the prophets urged repentance that led to obedience (Joel 2:12–13; Hos. 6:6).

The Greek word for sorrow is usually lupē. It means "grief, sorrow, pain of mind or spirit, affliction." Paul distinguished between godly and worldly sorrow (2 Cor. 7:8–11). Sorrow can lead a person to a deeper faith in God; or it can cause a person to live with regret, centered on the experience that caused the sorrow. Jesus gave believers words of hope to overcome trouble, distress, and sorrow: "I have told you these things, so that in me you may have peace. In this world you will have trouble. But take heart! I have overcome the world" (John 16:33 NIV).

SOSIPATER (Sō sĭp′ ă tĕr) Personal name meaning, "to save one's father." He is said to be a kinsman (a Jew) of Paul who sent greetings to Rome (Rom. 16:21). "Sopater of Berea" (Acts 20:4) may be the same.

SOSTHENES (Sŏs′ thĕ nēs) Personal name meaning, "of safe strength." A ruler of a synagogue in Corinth (Acts 18:17). He apparently assumed the post after Crispus, the former chief ruler, became a Christian under Paul's preaching (18:8). When an attempt to prosecute Paul legally failed, the citizens of the city took revenge and beat Sosthenes. Tradition holds that Sosthenes later was converted and became one of Paul's helpers (1 Cor. 1:1). Whether the two are one person cannot be determined from existing evidence.

SOTAI (Sō′ tai) One of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

SOUL The vital existence of a human being. The Hebrew word nephesh is a key Old Testament term (755 times) referring to human beings. In the New Testament, the term psyche retreats behind the ideas of body, flesh, spirit to characterize human existence. In the Bible, a person is a unity. Body and soul or spirit are not opposite terms, but rather terms which supplement one another to describe aspects of the inseparable whole person. See Anthropology; Humanity.

Such a holistic image of a person is maintained also in the New Testament even over against the Greek culture which, since Plato, sharply separated body and soul with an analytic exactness and which saw the soul as the valuable, immortal, undying part of human beings. In the Old Testament, the use and variety of the word is much greater while in the New Testament its theological meaning appears much stronger.

The soul designates the physical life. Vitality in all of its breadth and width of meaning is meant by the soul. The basic meaning of nephesh is throat. Thus, the Bible refers to the hungry, thirsty, satisfied, soul (Ps. 107:5,9; Prov. 27:7; Jer. 31:12,25). The soul means the entire human being in its physical life needing food and clothing (Matt. 6:25). The breathing organs and the breath blown out from them also express individual life in animals as well as human beings (Job 11:20; 41:21; Acts 20:10). At times, then, soul can be interchanged with life (Prov. 7:23; 8:35–36) and can be identical with blood (Deut. 12:23). A person does not have a soul. A person is a living soul (Gen. 2:7). That means a living being that owes life itself to the Creator just as does the animal (Gen. 2:19). For this life or soul, one gives all one has (Job 2:4). Satan is permitted by God to take health, that is flesh and blood, but Satan cannot take the bare life of a person (Job 2:5–6).

Soul designates the feelings, the wishes, and the will of humans. The work of the throat, its hunger and appetite, stands for the desire and the longing of the human being after power and sex, after satisfaction, and after even the evil (Prov. 21:10), but also after God (Ps. 42:2–3). The soul can be incited, embittered, confirmed, unsettled, or kept in suspense (Acts 14:2,22; 15:24; John 10:24). The word mirrors the entire scale of feelings under the influence of the human being, even the psychological. The bitter soul of the childless, the sick, or the threatened (1 Sam. 1:10; 2 Kings 4:27; 2 Sam. 17:8) reminds us of the nephesh as the organ of taste that also stands for the entire embittered person.

The soul also knows positive emotions. The soul rejoices, praises, hopes, and is patient. Never in these cases is only one part of the human being meant. It is always the powerful soul as an expression of the entire personality (Ps. 33:20). In the command to love (Deut. 6:5; Mark 12:30), the soul stands next to other expressions for the human being to emphasize the emotional energy and willpower of the human being all rolled into one.

The soul designates the human person. Soul is not only a synoymn with life. One can also speak of the life of the soul (Prov. 3:22). Every human soul (Acts 2:43; Rom. 2:9) means each individual person. The popular expression used today "to save our souls" goes back to this biblical way of thinking (1 Pet. 3:20). It means to save the entire person. In legal texts, the soul is the individual person with juristic responsibilities (Lev. 17:10, a blood-eating soul). Connected with a figure showing statistics or numbers of people, soul becomes an idea in the arena of the statistician (Gen. 46:26–27; Acts 2:41). At times, soul simply replaces a pronoun such as the expression "let my soul live," which means "let me live" (1 Kings 20:32). It is even possible for all the nuances of meaning to sound forth together in the same expression. For instance, in Psalm 103:1, we read, "Bless, Yahweh, O my soul." This includes the throat as the organ of life, the soul as the totality of capabilities; my own personal life which experiences the saving actions of Yahweh our God; my person; my own "I"; and the vital, emotional self.

Soul designates the essential life. Physical life is given and maintained by God (Matt. 6:25–34). Meaningful and fulfilled life comes only when it is free to give itself to God as a disciple of Jesus Christ. Life is the highest good when it is lived according to God's intentions and not used up in search for material and cultural goods (Mark 8:34–37). This life is stronger than death and cannot be destroyed by human beings (Matt. 10:28). The soul does not, however, represent a divine, immortal, undying part of the human being after death as the Greeks often thought. Paul, thus, avoids the word soul in connection with eternal life. There is a continuity between the earthly and the resurrected life that does not lie in the capabilities or nature of mortal humans. It lies alone in the power of the Spirit of God (1 Cor. 15:44). According to the Bible, a human being exists as a whole unit and remains also as a whole person in the hand of God after death. A person is not at any time viewed as a bodyless soul.

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD The biblical teaching that God is the source of all creation and that all things come from and depend upon God (Ps. 24:1). Sovereignty means that God is in all and over all.

Creative Sovereignty God is the Lord of creation, the source of all things, who brought the world into being and who guides His creation toward a meaningful end. God's creativity is not the result of chance or randomness. It holds promise and purpose which God intends.

Moral Sovereignty God's sovereignty, His authority over creation, is grounded in God's essential nature which is moral. God is to be obeyed not simply because He is mighty but because He is righteous (Ps. 50:6). God judges His creation on the basis of His profound moral character. He is both the source of all creation and the source of all goodness.

Transcendent Sovereignty God's sovereignty is transcendent, beyond our complete comprehension (Isa. 6:1). God is separate from His creation and works in ways that human beings do not always understand. Transcendence is closely related to God's holiness, His surpassing moral purity and essential otherness. See Holy.

Purposeful Sovereignty God's sovereignty moves toward a particular end, a specific purpose (Phil. 2:13). God's purpose is to bring His creation—His whole creation—to fulness and completion, to fellowship with Him: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor. 5:19). The kingdom of God is the end toward which God moves His creation.

Sovereignty and Freedom Divine sovereignty does not mean that everything which occurs in the world is God's will. God has created a world in which freedom is a real possibility. His permissive will provides for human freedom and the laws of nature. This freedom means that sovereignty must always be distinguished from "fate" or "destiny," the belief that everything which occurs in the world has been predetermined, scheduled in advance, by God. That view, carried to extremes, makes human beings pawns or puppets of a mechanical universe in which all choices are made in advance and where freedom is not possible. Yet the gospel suggests that human beings find genuine freedom, not in doing everything they wish, but in submitting themselves to the sovereign will of God, the rule and reign of God in their individual and collective lives. The sovereignty of God involves God's self-limitation in order that His creation might also choose freedom in Him.

Sovereignty and Providence God guides, sustains, loves, and longs to have fellowship with His creation. He reveals himself as a parent in love and in relationship with humanity. He "has borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows" (Isa. 53:4). God has chosen to participate in human history to care for human beings in their strengths and their weaknesses. "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28 NIV). Those who belong to God will not be immune from suffering; they will not be spared the brokenness which life brings to all persons. The people of God may, however, find spiritual resources and strength to persevere in time of trouble. The sovereign God of the universe chose to identify with His creation in the cross of Christ. There is no greater example of his care for His creation. See God; Providence. William Leonard SOW 1. To scatter seeds on the ground (field). 2. The female counterpart of the boar. The mature female swine. See Animals; Swine.

SOWER A person who held a vessel filled with seed in the left hand and scattered the seed with a practiced motion with the right hand. The seed was usually scattered on untilled ground. Then with a plow or harrow, the ground would be scratched or turned to cover the seed. It seems that any seed to be sowed had to be ceremonially clean (Lev. 11:37). Mixed seed could not be sowed together (Lev. 19:19). Purity reached into the far corners of Hebrew life. Jesus used the sower for a parable about life and illustrated the everyday hardships farmers faced (Matt. 13:3–9; Mark 4:3–9; Luke 8:4–8). See Agriculture; Plow.

An Arab farmer near Bethlehem sowing seeds on his land.

SPAIN The country still known by that name in the southwest corner of Europe. It was opened to the Romans just before 200 B.C. Paul wanted to go to Spain (Rom. 15:24,28). According to Clement (about A.D. 95–96) and the Muratorian Fragment (about A.D. 195–196), he did just that. See Tarshish.

SPAN Half a cubit. A cubit is the length of the forearm, about 18 inches. The span is measured from the thumb to the little finger both extended, about 8 or 9 inches. See Cubit; Weights and Measures.

SPARK A literal flame of fire (Job 18:5) used in a figurative sense of a person's dying. Also used figuratively to show that humanity lives a troubled life (Job 5:7). Leviathan is pictured with a flaming mouth (Job 41:19–21). It is used of sparks from a fire (or "torches" NIV) in Isaiah 50:11. See Fire.

SPARROW Often translated "bird" (Ps. 8:8; Ezek. 17:23 NAS, NIV, NRSV) as representative of all birds. It was ceremonially clean as sometimes eaten as food by the poor. Jesus used the sparrows (Matt. 10:31; Luke 12:7) to show their lack of worth as contrasted with human beings. See Birds.

SPECK Modern translation of KJV, "mote." See Mote.

SPECTACLE Theatre or play. Paul felt that he was on display before the world. The world did not appreciate the commitment of Paul to Christ but saw Paul as a spectacle, one to watch and perhaps laugh at (1 Cor. 4:9).

SPELT Wheat of an inferior quality (Triticum satiuum). Egyptians made bread from it. It had not sprouted when the plagues struck Egypt (Ex. 9:32). Spelt illustrates the farmer's planning, placing it on the outer edge of the field to retard the intrusion of weeds (Isa. 28:25). Compare Ezekiel 4:9. See Agriculture.

SPICES Aromatic, pungent substances used in the preparation of foods, sacred oils for anointings, incense, perfumes, and ointments used for personal hygiene and for burial of the dead.

Spices were very expensive and highly prized in antiquity. They were brought into Palestine from India, Arabia, Persia, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. Solomon had an extensive commercial venture with Hiram, king of Tyre, dealing in spices and other commodities. His fleet of ships brought much needed revenue into the Israelite economy (1 Kings 10:15). Solomon also taxed the caravan groups that passed through his lands. The land of Sheba, present day Yemen, had an extensive commerce in spices. The queen of Sheba made a long journey of 1,200 miles because she was afraid that her caravan spice business would be hurt by Solomon's merchant fleet. In her visit she gave to Solomon "a very great quantity of spices" (2 Chron. 9:9).

Spices were widely used in the worship service of the Temple and in the lives of the people. See Ointment. Several spices, which the Talmud called "food improvers," were used in the preparation of foods. These included cummin, dill, cinnamon, and mint. Frankincense, stacte, galbanum, and onycha were used in the preparation of the incense to be used in the worship of Israel (Ex. 30:34–35). Balsam, myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, and calamus were used in the preparation of the holy anointing oil (Ex. 30:23–25). Cassia, aloes, and spikenard were some of the spices used in the preparation of cosmetics (Song of Sol. 4:14; Mark 14:3; John 12:3). Myrrh and aloes were used in ointments for burial (Luke 23:56; John 19:39).

Some of the most important spices were:

1. Aloe (Aloexyllon agallochum and Aquilaria agallocha) A spice used to perfume garments and beds (Prov. 7:17; Ps. 45:8;). The aloe mentioned in John 19:39 was a different plant. The extract from its leaves was mixed with water and other spices to make ointment for the anointing of the dead.

2. Balsam (Pistacia lentiscus) This product of Gilead was exported to Egypt and to Tyre. The resin from this desert plant was used for medicinal and cosmetic purposes (Jer. 46:11).

3. Cummin (Cuminum cyminum) This seed was used as a spice in bread. Its dry seed was beaten with a stick, for it was too soft to be threshed with a sledge (Isa. 28:23–28).

4. Cassia (Flores cassiae) Two Hebrew words are used to translate cassia (Ex. 30:24; Ps. 45:8). The dried bark or blooms were used in the preparation of the anointing oil; the pods and leaves were used as medicine.

5. Cinnamon A highly prized plant, cinnamon was used as a condiment, in the preparation of perfumes (Prov. 7:17), and in the holy oil for anointing (Ex. 30:23). The New Testament lists cinnamon as one of the commodities found in Babylon (Rev. 18:13).

6. Coriander (Coriandrum sativum) An aromatic seed used as a spice in food; its oil was used in the manufacture of perfume. The Israelites compared the manna to the coriander seed (Ex. 16:31; Num. 11:7).

7. Dill The seed and the leaves were used to flavor foods and as medicine to wash skin wounds (Matt. 23:23; KJV, "anise").

8. Frankincense (Boswellia carteri and Frereana) A resin of a tree which, when burned, produced a strong aromatic scent. Frankincense was used in the preparation of the sacred oil for anointing of kings and priests and for the sacrifices in the Temple. The men from the East brought frankincense to Jesus (Matt. 2:11).

9. Galbanum A fragrant resin which gave a pleasant scent when burned; it was one of the ingredients of the holy incense (Ex. 30:34).

10. Henna A plant used as a cosmetic; its leaves produced a dye women used (Song of Sol. 1:14; 4:13). KJV translates the word as "camphire," but camphire was not native to Palestine and may not have been known in biblical times.

11. Mint Mint leaves were used as a condiment (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42).

12. Myrrh (Commiphora abessinica) The resinous gum of a plant which was included in the preparation of the holy anointing oil (Ex. 30:23). It was also used for its aromatic properties (Ps. 45:8) and used for female purification (Esth. 2:12). Myrrh was given to Jesus at His birth as a gift (Matt. 2:11) and as a drink when He was on the cross (Mark 15:23).

13. Onycha Traditionally taken as the aromatic crushed shell of a mollusc but in light of Ugaritic plant lists probably a type of cress (Lepidium sativum). It was used in holy incense (Ex. 30:34).

14. Rue (Ruta graveolens) An herb used as a condiment. It was valued for its medicinal properties. Its leaves were used in the healing of insect bites (Luke 11:42).

15. Saffron (Curcuma longa, Crocus sativus) A substance of a plant which produced a yellow dye and was used to color foods. When mixed with oil, it was used as medicine and perfume (Song of Sol. 4:14).

16. Spices The Hebrew word should be translated "balsam" (Balsamodendrium opolbalsamum). A shrub with a resin that gave a pleasant odor. Balsam was used as perfume and as medicine. The balsam was one of the ingredients of the anointing oil (Ex. 30:23).

17. Spikenard (Nardos tachys jatamansi) A very expensive fragrant oil used in the manufacture of perfumes and ointments (Song of Sol. 1:12; 4:13; Mark 14:3; John 12:3).

18. Stacte (Pistacia lentiscus) A small tree which produced a resin used in the sacred incense (Ex. 30:34). Claude F. Mariottini

S

SPIDER An animal in Palestine known in the Bible for spinning a web (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5). The spider's web is usually used as a sign of frailty. See Animals.

SPIKENARD A very expensive spice used in making perfume. It is also translated "perfume" (Song of Sol. 1:12 NAS, NIV) and "nard" (Song of Sol. 1:12 NRSV). Jesus was anointed by a woman with this expensive perfume (Mark 14:3; John 12:3). See Spices.

SPINDLE Used only in Proverbs 31:19, KJV translates "spindle" in the first line and "distaff" in the second line. Modern translations (NAS, NIV, NRSV) reverse the words in their translations. The distaff was a stick which held the fibers from which thread was spun. The spindle was a round stick with a round disk fastened closer to one end. The spun thread was wound around the spindle. See Cloth, Clothing.

SPINNING AND WEAVING Major elements involved in making cloth that were familiar processes in biblical times.

A Bedouin woman spinning wool into yarn.

Spinning The threads woven into cloth were produced from raw fibers by spinning (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27). Flax, or linen (Lev. 13:47–48; Prov. 31:13; Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 40:3; 44:17; Hos. 2:5), and wool (Lev. 13:47) were the major fibers used in the biblical world.

In spinning, raw fibers were pulled into a loose strand and twisted to form a continuous thread. A spindle (2 Sam. 3:29; Prov. 31:19 NRSV) was a slender stick which could be twirled to twist drawn out fibers caught in a hook or slot at the top. A spindle whorl acted as a flywheel for more efficient twisting. Spun thread was wound onto the stick. Sometimes, it was plyed or twined, two or three threads being twisted together (Ex. 26:1; 36:8,35). The finished product could then be used for weaving (Ex. 35:25–26).

Weaving Weaving is the interlacing of threads to form fabric. Weaving was conducted on looms, devices designed to create openings (sheds) between alternating vertical warp threads through which the horizontal weft threads were passed. After each weft thread was placed, it was beaten against the previous one with a flat stick, thus firming up the fabric.

Three main loom designs were used in the biblical world. On a horizontal ground loom, the warp threads were stretched between beams pegged to the ground. This type is apparently referred to in the Samson story (Judg. 16:13–14), as it would have enabled Delilah to weave his locks while he slept. When Samson jumped up, he pulled away the pin(s) of the loom (v. 14b) which secured the beams to the ground. In some vertical looms, the warp was stretched between two beams fixed in a rectangular frame. Work proceeded from the bottom of the loom, and the woven cloth could be rolled onto the bottom beam (Isa. 38:12). This permitted the weaver to remain seated and to produce much longer finished products. Another type of vertical loom had the warp threads attached to an upper beam and held taut in groups by a series of stone or clay weights. Weaving was done from the top to the bottom, and the weft beaten upwards. Large numbers of excavated loom weights testify to the popularity of warp weighted looms in Old Testament Israel.

Stripes or bands of color were made by using dyed threads for portions of the warp or weft threads. Warp weighted looms allowed portions of the shed to be opened at a time, so intricate patterns could be made in the weft by covering small areas with different colors. It was forbidden, however, to wear clothes made of linen and wool woven together (Deut. 22:11). Weavers apparently were professionals who specialized in particular types of work. The Old Testament differentiates between ordinary weavers, designers, and embroiderers (Ex. 35:35). Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

SPIRIT The empowering perspective of human life and the Holy Spirit bringing God's presence and power to bear in the world. A translation of the Hebrew word ruach and the Greek word pneuma which can be translated as "wind," "breath," or "spirit" depending upon the context.

In both Testaments, spirit is used of both God and human beings. Spirit, whether used of God or of human beings, is difficult to define. The kinship of spirit, breath, and wind is a helpful clue in beginning to understand spirit. In His conversation with Nicodemus (John 3), Jesus said that the Spirit is like the wind in that one cannot see it but one can see its effects. This is true of both the Spirit of God and the spirit of a human being.

Spirit of God At the beginning of creation, the Spirit of God hovered over the waters (Gen. 1:3). Elihu acknowledged to Job that the Spirit of God had made him and was the source of his life (Job 33:4). The animals were created when God sent out His "breath" (Ps. 104:30 NRSV note).

The Spirit of God is present everywhere. The psalmist sensed that no matter where he was, God's Spirit was there (Ps. 139:7). The Pharaoh saw the Spirit of God in Joseph (Gen. 41:38). Moses realized that the Spirit of God was on him, and he desired that God's Spirit be on all of His people (Num 11:29). During the period of the Judges, the Spirit of the Lord came to individuals and empowered them to accomplish specific tasks (Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25; 14:6; 14:19). When Samuel, the last of the judges, annointed Saul, Israel's first king, he told Saul that the Spirit of the Lord would come upon him. The result was that Saul prophesied and was changed into a different person (1 Sam. 10:6). Later, the Spirit departed from Saul (1 Sam. 16:14). Likewise, the Spirit came upon David when Samuel annointed him (1 Sam. 16:13). In his last words, David said that the Spirit of the Lord had spoken through him (2 Sam. 23:2).

Isaiah spoke of one who is to come from the line of Jesse, one on whom the Spirit of the Lord would rest. This person would have the Spirit of wisdom, understanding, counsel, power, knowledge, and the fear of the Lord (Isa. 11:1–3). Ezekiel prophesied that God would put His Spirit within His people, removing from them hearts of stone and putting within them hearts of flesh that would be obedient to God's way (Ezek. 36:26–27).

New Testament Teaching Each of the four Gospels has numerous references to the Spirit of God or the Holy Spirit. The Spirit was the agent of Jesus' miraculous conception (Matt. 1:18,20), came down on Jesus at His baptism (Matt. 3:16), led Him into the wilderness where He was tempted by the devil (Matt. 4:1), and enabled Him to heal diseases and cast out demons (Matt. 12:28). Jesus promised the Spirit to His followers as He prepared to leave the world. The Spirit would serve as Comforter and Counselor, continuing to teach Jesus' followers and reminding them of what He had said to them (John 14:25–26). Not many days after Jesus' ascension, the promised Spirit came upon His followers during the Feast of Pentecost. The advent of the Spirit was accompanied by a sound that was like a mighty wind. Those who witnessed this event saw what seemed to be tongues of fire resting on the believers. Moreover, these disciples were empowered to speak in tongues other than their native language (Acts 2:1–3). Throughout Luke's account of the early church, the Holy Spirit empowered and guided the followers of Jesus in their mission to the world surrounding the Mediterranean (Acts 11:12; 13:2; 15:28; 16:6–7; 20:22; 21:11).

The Spirit is important in Paul's understanding of the believer's relationship to God. The Spirit is a gracious personal presence who lives in one who has confessed that Jesus Christ is Lord. Relationship to God through Christ by the Spirit is revolutionary. In Galatians, Paul argued that legalism and the way of faith are incompatible. God's Spirit comes to us as a gift based on our faith in Christ and His grace (Gal. 3:1–5). God's Spirit comes into a believer's life, with assurance that we are God's children (Rom. 8:16). The Spirit is God's pledge to us that we shall be fully transformed and conformed to the image of Christ. (Rom. 8:1–29; 2 Cor. 1:22). Paul identified the Spirit with the Lord (the risen Christ) and asserted that where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom, a growing freedom from the law of sin and death (2 Cor. 3:18; compare Rom. 8:2).

The Spirit distributes gifts in the church which are designed to equip God's people for serving and building up the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:7–13). Evidence that the Spirit of God is at work in a person or group of persons is love, joy, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control (Gal. 5:22–23).

At the beginning of Scripture we see the Spirit at work in creation. As Scripture closes, the Spirit and the Bride, the church, issue an invitation for all who are thirsty to come and drink of the water of life (Rev. 22:17).

Human Spirits In both the Old and New Testaments, spirit is used of humans and of other beings. When used of humans, spirit is associated with a wide range of functions including thinking and understanding, emotions, attitudes, and intentions. Elihu told Job it was spirit in a person, the breath of God, which gave understanding (Job 32:8). When Jesus healed the paralytic, He perceived in His "spirit" that the religious leaders present were questioning His forgiving the man's sins (Mark 2:8).

Spirit is used extensively with human emotions including sorrow (Prov. 15:4,13), anguish (Ex. 6:9; John 13:21), anger (Prov. 14:29; 16:32), vexation (Eccl. 1:14), fear (2 Tim. 1:7), and joy (Luke 1:47).

A variety of attitudes and intentions are associated with spirit. Caleb had a different spirit than most of his contemporaries in that he followed the Lord wholeheartedly (Num. 14:24). Sihon, king of Heshbon, had a stubborn spirit (Deut. 2:30). First Kings 22 refers to a lying spirit. The psalmist called persons who have no deceit in their spirits, "blessed" (Ps. 32:2). A person's spirit can be contrite (Ps. 34:18), steadfast (Ps. 51:10), willing (Ps. 51:12), broken (Ps. 51:17), and haughty (Prov. 16:18). The Gospel of Mark has numerous references to Jesus healing persons with unclean or foul spirits.

Spirit is used of nonphysical beings, both good and evil. Satan is called the ruler of the kingdom of the air, the spirit who is at work in those who are disobedient (Eph. 2:2).

One of the perennial points of conflict between the Sadducees and the Pharisees was over whether there are angels and spirits. The latter believed that there were such while the former denied that such existed. When the risen Christ appeared to the disciples, they were startled and frightened, thinking they were seeing a spirit. Jesus invited them to touch Him. He then reminded them that a spirit does not have flesh and bones (Luke 24:37–39). Steve Bond SPIRITS IN PRISON A much discussed phrase in 1 Peter 3:19. Christ went and preached to the spirits in prison "who in former times did not obey, when God waited patiently in the days of Noah" (1 Pet. 3:20a, NRSV). This event, unmentioned elsewhere in the Bible, is closely associated with the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (vv. 18,21).

The framework for this depiction of Christ's work is the notion, attributed to Jesus Himself, that "As it was in the days of Noah, so too it will be in the days of the Son of Man" (Luke 17:26 NRSV; compare Matt. 24:37). The immediate focus of the statement in 1 Peter is not the flood as such. The flood becomes the center of attention in verses 20b–21. Verse 19 focuses on the situation that necessitated the flood (see Gen. 6:1–8). The disobedient "spirits," accordingly, are not the people who died in the flood, but the evil spirits, or demons, whose influence brought divine judgment on the world. Peter probably viewed these evil spirits as the offspring of the strange union mentioned in Genesis 6:1–4 between the "sons of God" (that is, angelic or superhuman beings of some kind) and the "daughters of men." (Compare the Jewish apocalyptic book of 1 Enoch 15.8–10: "But now the giants who are born from (the union of) spirits and the flesh shall be called evil spirits upon the earth.") It is also likely that Peter identified them with the "unclean spirits" over which Jesus had triumphed again and again during His earthly ministry. Jesus' proclamation to these "spirits" must therefore be understood not as redemptive "good news," but as judgment and defeat at the hands of God (see their anxious question in Matthew 8:29, "Have you come here to torment us before the time?" NRSV).

That the outcome of this proclamation was the subjection of the disobedient spirits is seen from 1 Peter 3:22, where Christ is glimpsed "at the right hand of God, with angels, authorities, and powers made subject to him" (NRSV). Yet if they were already "in prison," what precisely could further defeat and subjection mean? A possible answer to this question is provided by Revelation 18:2, where "Babylon the great" (or Rome) is seen under God's final judgment as "a haunt for every unclean spirit" (REB). The word translated "haunt" in the RSV is the same word translated "prison" in 1 Peter 3:19. Peter's point is not that the disobedient spirits were "imprisoned" in the sense of being inactive when Christ came to them, but that He came to them in their "haunts" or "havens" to notify them that their power over humanity was finally broken and that now they must surrender to His universal dominion.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS The skills and abilities which God gives through His Spirit to all Christians, which equip Christians to serve God in the Christian community.

In the Old Testament, the Spirit of the Lord was given to selected leaders rather than to all of God's people. When the Spirit came to an individual, He brought with Him one or more gifts which equipped the individual to serve God by serving Israel. Examples of this are: Bezaleel, who was given the gift of craftsmanship (Ex. 31:2–3); Othniel, who was equipped to be a judge (Judg. 3:9–10); Gideon, who was given military skills (Judg. 6:34); Samson, who was given physical strength (Judg. 14:6,19); Saul, who was given political skills (1 Sam. 10:6); and Micah, who was given prophetic gifts (Mic. 3:8).

These Old Testament stories are the background for the Christian understanding of spiritual gifts. The Christian view of spiritual gifts begins with Jesus. He was the unique bearer of the Spirit (Mark 1:10). The Spirit directed and empowered Him for His ministry (Luke 4:14–18). Jesus promised His disciples that they, too, would receive the Spirit one day and that the Spirit would guide them (see Mark 13:11; Luke 11:13).

These promises were fulfilled on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:1–47). The Spirit was given to all Christians, not just to selected leaders (2:3–4,17–18). Peter made it quite clear that the Spirit would continue to be given to all who accepted the Christian gospel (v. 38).

Paul's letters reveal that this continued to be true in all the churches; every Christian was given the gift of the Spirit, so that Paul could write: "Whoever does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him" (Rom. 8:9 TEV). When the Spirit came into a person's life, He brought with Him a gift, or gifts, which that person could use to serve God. "Each one, as a good manager of God's different gifts, must use for the good of others the special gift he has received from God" (1 Pet. 4:10 TEV).

Like Peter, Paul believed that every Christian had a spiritual gift (1 Cor. 12:4–7). Neither Paul nor any other New Testament writer suggested that some Christians might be without gifts; all Christians are given gifts. Paul always set his discussion of gifts in the context of the church. In our day many people tend to think individualistically; it is easy to do this with reference to spiritual gifts. This can lead us to become arrogant about our gifts ("I have the gift of evangelism"), or else to be ashamed of our gifts ("My gift is only working with children"). Paul spoke of gifts in terms of the whole church, not in terms of individuals only. The church, he said, is the body of Christ; each Christian is a member (eye, ear, leg); and each member has its appropriate ability (to see, or hear, or walk). This understanding leaves no room for arrogance or shame concerning our gifts.

In his writings Paul referred to about twenty different gifts, including such things as preaching, teaching, and leadership. Some interpreters have suggested that by putting Paul's lists of gifts together, we get a comprehensive list of spiritual gifts. This seems unlikely, as we today can recognize some gifts which Paul did not mention, such as the gifts of music, of working with youth, and of counseling.

Some Christians today tend to want to distinguish spiritual gifts from natural abilities, but this distinction seems not to have occurred to Paul, for he included both in his lists (see, for example, Rom. 12:6–8). His assumption seems to have been that whatever skills a Christian has are given to him by God and are to be used in God's service. What matters, then, is that Christians discover what their gifts are and then develop them.

Which specific gift is the most valuable one? Paul's answer to this is clear and emphatic: the one gift all Christians should have, love (1 Cor. 12:31—13:1). Love is the ultimate spiritual gift. If we have all other gifts and lack love, we have nothing; if we have love and nothing else, we have everything. Paul said that love fulfills the entire law (Rom. 13:10; compare Matt. 22:39–40). Love makes possible the fellowship of the church and guarantees that gifts will be used unselfishly. Love is the greatest gift given to us by the God who is love.

SPIT, SPITTLE Spitting at or on someone is the strongest sign of contempt. The brother who refused to perform levirate marriage (have a child by his brother's wife to carry on the name of the brother, Deut. 25:5–6) would have his face spit in by the spurned wife of the brother (Deut. 25:7–9). The soldiers that mocked Jesus before His crucifixion spat on Him (Matt. 27:30). The religious leaders who tried Jesus before taking Him to Pilate spat in His face (Matt. 26:67). Spittle was used to heal (Mark 8:23; John 9:6). Mixing spittle with clay (John 9:6) may have been to deliberately break the sabbath laws of the Jewish religious leaders.

SPOIL Anything taken by a victorious soldier. In ancient warfare a soldier could take anything he could carry that had belonged to a foe. This plunder could be precious metals, clothes, cattle, or the vanquished people themselves. Holy war laws dedicated all such booty to God (Deut. 20). The battles of Joshua illustrated this.

SPONGE The skeleton of marine animals whose structure retains water. It was especially useful in bathing. The only instances of its use in the Bible center around giving Jesus a drink while upon the cross (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36; John 19:29). See Cross.

SPOON KJV translation for the dish in which incense was burned in the tabernacle and Temple (Num. 7:14). Other translations are "gold pan" (NAS), "golden dish" (NRSV), and "gold dish" (NIV). The twelve dishes were made of ten shekels of gold (vv. 84–86). See Incense; Vessels and Utensils.

SPORT To laugh at, to mock, to play with, and in one place to live in luxury. The versions do not agree on how to translate this word. For instance, Isaiah 57:4 is translated, "Against whom do ye sport yourselves?" ("jest" NAS; "mocking" NIV, NRSV). Samson is said to have made sport for the Philistines (Judg. 16:25). Modern translations use "perform" and "entertain." 2 Peter 2:13 speaks of the unrighteous as "sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you." Modern translations translate "reveling."

SPOT Skin blemishes of differing kinds indicating sickness that made a person ceremonially unclean (Lev. 13:1–8). The priest declared such persons clean or unclean. Only animals "without spot" (Num. 28:3) could be used for an offering to Yahweh. Jesus Himself was spoken of by Peter as "a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Pet. 1:19). The faithful are urged to obey "without spot" (1 Tim. 6:14). In this sense it means to be morally pure and obedient to God's will. See Sacrifice and Offering.

SPRING A place where water bubbles up freely from the ground (NAS, NIV, NRSV). KJV usually translates, "fountain." See Fountain; Water; Well.

SQUAD Modern translation of quaternion (Acts 12:1–11). See Quaternion.

STABLE A place where animals are kept either by enclosing them or tying them. Animals were usually kept in numbers rather than one animal in a stable or stall, as is often the case today. It could be a simple enclosure, a cave, or a building. Solomon kept large numbers of horses in stalls (1 Kings 4:26). Most people just kept their animals together. Some kept them in a lower part of their homes. Jesus was born in a stable possibly belonging to an inn for He was put in a manger (trough where animals were fed) after being wrapped in swaddling cloths. See Manger; Solomon.

An area at Megiddo thought to be a stable complex (or possibly storehouses) from the time of Ahab.

STACHYS (Stā' chȳs) A personal name meaning, "head of grain." Man Paul called, "my beloved" (Rom. 16:9).

STACTE The gum of the storax tree which was combined with onycha, galbanum, and frankincense to make the incense to be burned in the tabernacle (Ex. 30:34). It is a small tree plentiful in rocky places in most of Palestine. See Incense.

STAFF See Rod.

STAG Modern translation of hart. See Animals, Wild, 9. Deer.

STAIRS A series of steps whereby a person can climb easily to another level. Houses in Palestine usually had stairs on the outside going up to the roof. Many activities were on the roof of the average house. Sometimes the steepness of city streets would make stairs from one level to another necessary. Also wells and cisterns in many cities in Palestine would have stairs leading down to the water. There were stairs in two visions in the Old Testament: Jacob's ladder may have been stairs (Gen. 28:12); Ezekiel's temple had stairs (43:17). See Architecture; House.

STAKE An instrument used with cords to anchor a tent. It was used figuratively of Jerusalem (Isa. 33:20; 54:2).

STALL A place where animals were kept and fed. See Stable.

STANDARD A flag or banner usually used by the military to identify groups of soldiers or a central flag to rally all the soldiers at one time (Num. 1:52; 2:2; 10:14,18). It is also used figuratively of God (Isa. 59:19). See Banner.

STARGAZER See Astrologer.

STARS Constellations, planets, and all heavenly bodies except the sun and the moon. God is acknowledged to be the Creator of all such (Gen. 1:16) as well as the One who knows their names and numbers (Ps. 147:4). Biblical writers knew many of the constellations. The Lord asked Job, "Can you bind the chains of Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion?" (Job 38:31 NAS).

Individual stars are mentioned (Amos 5:26; Acts 7:43). Probably the most famous and intriguing of all the stars mentioned in Scripture is the star of Bethlehem, (Matt. 2). Many theories have been posited regarding its identity. Suffice it to say that Scripture does not name the star. It is one of many miracles that attest to the power of our God and is similar to the pillar of fire used to demonstrate God's presence and might to the children of Israel as they made their way to the land of Canaan. In the final book of the Bible the Lord Jesus is called "the bright and morning star" (Rev. 22:16). C. Dale Hill

STATURE Usually refers to the height of a person, sometimes used figuratively (Ezek. 17:6; 19:11). Jesus "increased in wisdom and stature" (Luke 2:52). It was used to show the weakness of humanity and the need to rely on God (Matt. 6:27; Luke 12:25). It was also used as a measure of the maturity of the Christian (Eph. 4:13).

STATUTE A law or commandment. It could be from God or an earthly ruler. Different statutes of God were given by Moses to God's people (Ex. 15:25–26). Joseph was able to create laws as a ruler in Egypt (Gen. 47:26).

STEADFASTNESS A word meaning to endure patiently. A steadfast person is one who is reliable, faithful, and true to the end. Paul said Jesus was a person of steadfastness (Rom. 15:3–4). The NAS translates steadfastness with "perseverance" (2 Thess. 1:4). James said that trials that test our faith produce steadfastness (1:3 KJV "patience"; NAS "endurance"; NIV "perseverance").

STEEL KJV translation of a word that most modern versions translate "bronze" (2 Sam. 22:35). See Minerals and Metals.

STEPHANAS (Stĕph' ă năs) Personal name meaning, "crown." A believer who, along with his family, was baptized by Paul (1 Cor. 1:16). He lived in Achaia and apparently was among the first converts of Paul's ministry there. Stephanas may have delivered a letter from the Corinthian church to Paul while the apostle was in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:17). From existing evidence it is uncertain whether these two are the same man.

STEPHEN (Stē' phĕn) Personal name meaning, "crown." The first Christian martyr; foremost of those chosen to bring peace to the quarreling church (Acts 6:1–7) and so mighty in the Scriptures that his Jewish opponents in debate could not refute him (Acts 6:10) as he argued that Jesus was the Messiah. Saul of Tarsus heard Stephen's speech to the Jewish Sanhedrin accusing the Jewish leaders of rejecting God's way as their forefathers had (Acts 6:12—7:53). Saul held the clothes of those who stoned Stephen to death; he saw him die a victorious death. Stephen may well have been the human agency that God used to conquer him who would become the great Christian missionary.

St. Stephen's Gate (Lion's Gate) at Jerusalem.

Stephen was in the forefront of those who saw Christianity as much more than a Jewish sect. They took seriously the commission of Jesus to carry the gospel to the whole world and led to the founding of the world mission movement that took the gospel to the whole Roman Empire in the first century. The believers had to flee Jerusalem after Stephen's death while the apostles alone remained there (Acts 8:1). Fred L. Fisher

STEWARDSHIP Utilizing and managing all resources God provides for the glory of God and the betterment of His creation.

Old Testament Stewardship Stewardship permeates the pages of the Bible because how we respond to God is at the heart of the Book. Often, stewardship is thought of only in terms of finances, but the Bible teaches that stewardship is a far greater concept, involving how we respond with all of our life to Him who is the giver and sustainer of life?

When God created humans, He made them to have "dominion" over all of the earth (Gen. 1:26). Dominion was not intended to be domination or exploitation. Dominion was God's call for human beings to be good and gracious managers of God's creation. Unfortunately, the sin of humanity interrupted God's plans for His world. Humankind became selfish, seeing the world as a means to its own self-centered ends. The things of the world were now seen as possessions with humans as owners, not as God's stewards. God's intention for His world did not change. He still desired that people see God as the Lord of everything and themselves as the managers of God's creation.

New Testament Stewardship The call to absolute commitment to Christ is the central theme of the New Testament (Mark 8:34–36). Jesus asked for obedience to God's original intention for the world. Jesus was calling for a radical reversal of the world's values (profit) and a revolutionary return to God's purpose (lose life for My sake).

Jesus never seemed to be satisfied with a slice of the pie of our obedience. He did not rejoice in the tithe or a big offering as much as He did in the sacrificial, complete giving of a widow. but Jesus called all disciples to absolute surrender of ourselves and our substance to Him.

The early church certainly saw all that it had as a gift from God for the good of each other. "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common" (Acts 4:32).

Of course, our economic system and sheer numbers of people today prevent this kind of complete sharing, but the amazing thing was the attitude of the church members to what they possessed. They saw none of it as their own. All of it came from the loving heart of God. That is why the sin of selfishness of Ananias and Sapphira was so serious (Acts 5).

The apostle Paul preached and taught a single-minded commitment to Christ. He reminded the Philippians that the source of thanksgiving was not in things but in our relationship to God in Christ (Phil. 3:13–14).

Thus, the New Testament concept of stewardship centers in our commitment to Jesus Christ. When He becomes our Lord, He becomes Lord of our time, talents, finances, and everything. We realize that we are not our own, but we are bought with a price. Charles Bugg

STOCKS An instrument that secured the feet (and sometimes the neck and hands) of a prisoner (Job 13:27; Jer. 29:26; Acts 16:24). They were usually made of wood with holes to secure the feet. They could also be an instrument of torture by stretching the legs apart and causing the prisoner to sit in unnatural positions. The Romans often added chains along with the stocks.

STONE Hardened mineral matter comprising much of the earth. Palestine is a stony country. Often it was necessary to clear a field of stone preparatory to its cultivation (Isa. 5:2). An enemy's fields were marred by throwing stones on them, and his wells were choked with stones (2 Kings 3:19,25). Stones were used for various purposes: city walls (Neh. 4:3), dwellings (Lev. 14:38–40), palaces (1 Kings 7:1,9), temples (1 Kings 6:7), pavement in courtyards and columns (Esth. 1:6), and in Herodian times, at least, for paving streets. The Israelites used unhewn stones for building their altars. They often heaped stones to commemorate some great spiritual event or encounter with God (Gen. 31:46; Josh. 4). They marked the grave of notorious offenders with stones (Josh. 7:26). One of the most popular uses of stone was the building of the walls of the Temple and the building of the walls of the city of Jerusalem (1 Kings 7:9–12).

Single stones were used to close the mouth of cisterns, wells, and tombs (Gen. 29:2; Matt. 27:60; John 11:38). They were also used to mark boundaries (Deut. 19:14). The Israelites sometimes consecrated a single stone as a memorial to God (Gen. 28:18–22; 1 Sam. 7:12).

The Old Testament and the New Testament refer to stones being used as lethal weapons. See Arms and Armor. Two popular stories about the use of stones for weapons are those about David killing Goliath (1 Sam. 17:49) and about the enemies of the Christian faith stoning Stephen (Acts 7:58).

Stones were often used for weights on scales. They were employed for writing documents. The most obvious example is the writing of the Ten Commandments on stone by the Spirit of God when Moses went up on Mount Sinai.

Symbolically, a stone denotes hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. 25:37; Ezek. 36:26). It could also mean firmness and strength. The followers of Christ were called living stones who were built up into the spiritual temple of Christ. Christ himself became the chief cornerstone (Eph. 2:20–22; 1 Pet. 2:4–8). STOOL A simply made object for a person to sit on (2 Kings 4:10). Some translate "chair" (NAS, NRSV, NIV). It is also mentioned in Exodus 1:16 (birthstool NAS, NRSV; delivery stool NIV). God is said to have a footstool where the faithful worship Him (Ps. 99:5). James speaks of a footstool being in the assembly of the early church (2:3).

STOREHOUSE, STORAGE CITY Storehouses were built early in human history to protect harvested crops from vermin and extreme weather. The typical storehouse during the Israelite period was a rectangular building with a double row of columns which divided the building into three narrow aisles. Large, thick walls supported the roof, and small side rooms led off of the main hall. Storerooms at Herod's fortress of Masada had walls eleven feet high constructed of stones weighing over 400 pounds. Community storehouses could also be used as public markets. In large cities, certain sections of the town were designated as storage areas, with several storehouses lining the streets. During the Divided Kingdom period, royal storage facilities were established in regional capitals to collect tax payments made in flour, oil, grain, or wine. Specially marked jars held these royal stores which later could be distributed to the army or royal palaces. The Temple complex included special storage areas, both for the utensils of worship and to serve as a sort of bank where valuables might be placed. The picture of a full storehouse served as an image of God's blessing and was often used by the prophets. David Maltsberger

STORK One of a number of large, long-legged birds that usually wade for their food. They eat fish and an assortment of animals that live around water. They are known for the care they take of their young and for returning each year to the same nesting area. The stork migrates from Africa in the winter to Europe in the spring. It stops in Palestine during its migration. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:19). It is related to the heron. See Birds.

STREETS Pathways established and constructed for transportation via animals and vehicles. The layout of city streets often was established by the shape of the outer city walls. In some cities a wide street encircled the city, following the line of the outer wall. In other towns, streets radiated from a main plaza or thoroughfare. The doors of shops, storehouses, and private homes opened onto the street. Often, household wastes were thrown out into the street. Small, crooked lanes and alleyways led off from main streets, ending at a central courtyard serving several homes or shops. Streets were often paved with large, flat stones, although dirt paths were not uncommon. Larger towns constructed drainage canals beneath city streets, some to carry away waste water and others to trap the run off from winter rains which was channeled into cisterns. During the New Testament era, Roman engineers designed cities throughout the empire with wide, straight, and well-constructed streets, usually leading to a central plaza or temple. Sidewalks with raised curbs bordered streets set with large polyagonal paving stones. Drains below the pavement carried away sewage and rain water. The constant traffic of carts and pedestrians often wore ruts into the streets, necessitating repair. David Maltsberger

STRONG DRINK An intoxicating drink made from grain. It may have at first been used of beer made from barley. Wine is usually included along with strong drink but is separate from it (1 Sam. 1:15; Judg. 13:4,7,14; Luke 1:15). It was usually denied to priests (Lev. 10:8–9) and those who took the Nazirite vow (Num. 6:3). Isaiah warned against drinking too much (5:11). The Bible warns against drunkenness. The New Testament says that the drunkard will have no place in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9–10). See Drunkenness; Wine.

STUBBLE Stalks of grain dried out in the field or left on the threshing floor. It is sometimes translated straw or chaff. Stubble burns quickly and can be blown away by the wind. Figuratively it is used of God's judgment (Joel 2:5; Isa. 5:24). Stubble was used by God's people to make bricks while they were slaves in Egypt (Ex. 5:12).

STUFF, STUFF FOR REMOVING, STUFF FOR CAPTIVITY See Carriage.

STUMBLING BLOCK Anything that causes a person to stumble or to fall. It is used literally (Lev. 19:14), but most often it is used as a metaphor. It is used of idols (Ezek. 7:19), of God's work with faithless people (Jer. 6:21), and of God Himself in relation to His people (Isa. 8:14). Paul warned Christians not to let their freedom result in a stumbling block to other believers (Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 8:9). The disobedient are warned that Jesus Himself could be a stumbling block (Rom. 9:32–33; 1 Cor. 1:23; 1 Pet. 2:8). The Greek word, skandalon, was the bait stick in a trap. It was also used symbolically for the trap itself. It came to mean a temptation to sin or to have false faith.

SUAH (Sū' ah) Personal name meaning, "sweepings." Son of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

SUBURBS Pastureland around cities that were used in common for the feeding of sheep, cattle, and other animals (Lev. 25:34). Other versions translate, "open land" (NRSV); "pastureland" (NIV); and "pasture fields" (NAS). See Cities and Urban Life.

SUCATHITE (Sū' ca thite) A people who claimed ancestry from the Kenites and the Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55). KJV has Suchathites.

SUCCOTH (Sūc' cōth) 1. A place name meaning, "booths." A city east of the Jordan in the tribal territory of Gad. Jacob dwelt there upon his return to Canaan (Gen. 33:17). It was an important town during the time of Gideon. Its leaders were punished by Gideon for not helping him in a campaign against the Midianites (Judg. 8:5–7,13–16). Near Succoth Hiram made vessels for Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7:45–46). It is usually located at tell Deir Alla, but some excavation results have called this into question. 2. A place where the Israelites camped upon leaving Egypt (Ex. 12:37; 13:20; Num. 33:5–6). It was near Pithom and is usually identified with tell el-Maskhutah or tell er-Retabah.

SUCCOTH BENOTH (Sūc' cōth-bē' nōth) Divine name meaning, "booths of daughters." A pagan deity which people from Babylon brought with them to Israel when it was resettled by the Assyrians after the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:30). Interpreters disagree concerning the identification of this idol. Many feel that it is likely Sarpanitu, the consort of Marduk. See Gods, Pagan; Sakkuth.

SUFFERING Enduring undesirable pains and experiences. The Bible does not treat suffering systematically nor philosophically. It relates how people and nations experience suffering in various ways for a variety of reasons. Clearly an understanding of suffering introduces the problem of evil. Suffering follows the entrance of evil into the universe. The Bible does not attempt to explain the origin of evil. It accepts evil and suffering as givens in a fallen and sinful world. The various writers present multiple perspectives on the causes of suffering and how it can be endured.

Old Testament The Semitic mind dealt with concrete situations rather than abstract forms. Their perspective was not to treat the issue of suffering as an intellectual one. The Old Testament writers, accordingly, sought to identify the causes and purposes of suffering when it happened.

The Hebrews regarded suffering as punishment for sin against the divine moral order. The wicked would surely suffer for their evil ways (Pss. 7:15,16; 37:1–3; 73:12–20; 139:19), even though they might prosper for a time (Job 21:28–33). Some writers expressed consternation that God stayed His hand of judgment against the offenders of His will (Jer. 12:1–4; Hab. 1:2–4; Mal. 3:7–15). They often interpreted their own suffering as a sign of God's wrath and punishment for sin in their lives. The highly developed sense of corporate identity in Hebrew thought meant that suffering could come as a result of parents' sin (1 Kings 21:20,22,29; an idea reflected by Jesus' disciples in John 9:2, the story of the healing of the man born blind) or the wickedness of the king (2 Kings 21:10,11).

The suffering of the righteous posed a problem. It was explained variously as a way for God to gain peoples' attention (Job 33:14; 36:15), to correct sin into obedience (2 Chron. 20:9,10; Mal. 3:3), to develop or refine character (Job 23:10; Ps. 66:10). Ultimately, the writers consigned themselves to trust in God's sometimes hidden wisdom (Job 42:2,3; Ps. 135:6).

The prophet gained a vision of a greater purpose in suffering—carrying the sins of others (Isa. 53). As eschatological hopes matured in late Old Testament and intertestamental times, the righteous looked forward to the Day of the Lord when they would be vindicated and justice would reign (Dan. 12:1).

New Testament Into an evil world God sent His only Son. God is Himself touched by the suffering of Christ on the cross. Christian writers in the New Testament incorporated the trials of Christ into their existing Old Testament understanding of suffering. The purposefulness and necessity of suffering in the life of the Son of God (Matt. 16:21; Mark 8:31; Luke 9:22) aided them in coping with their own.

The early Christians recognized the inevitability of their suffering. As Christ suffered, so would they (John 16:33; Acts 14:22; Rom. 8:31–39; 1 Cor. 12:26; 1 Thess. 2:14; 2 Tim. 3:12; 1 Pet. 4:12,13). Continuing His mission, they would incur tribulation (Mark 13:12,13; Rev. 17:6; 20:14) because the world hates the disciples as much as it did their Lord (see John 15:18; 1 Cor. 2:8; 1 John 3:11,12). Suffering for His sake was counted a privilege (Acts 5:41; 1 Cor. 11:32; 1 Thess. 1:4–8).

New Testament writers realized there were other types of suffering than that incurred as they lived on Christian mission. These are to be endured patiently rather than rebelliously (1 Thess. 3:3; Jas. 1:2–4) because God is working His purpose out in His children's lives (Rom. 8:28–29). Satan would tempt believers to be defeated in their suffering (2 Cor. 4:8–12; Rev. 2:10). Instead, Christians can grow stronger spiritually through trials (Rom. 6:4–8; 1 Pet. 4:1; Heb. 12:11) and share Christ's ultimate triumph (Mark 13:9; John 16:33; 2 Thess. 1:5; Rev. 5:5; 20:9,14,15) even now as they experience daily victories (Rom. 8:37; 1 John 2:13–14; 1 Pet. 5:10). Therefore, sufferings give rise to hope (Rom. 12:12; 1 Thess. 1:3), for no present suffering compares with the rewards that await the faithful follower of Christ (Rom. 8:17–18).

SUKKIIMS (Sūk' kīims) Mentioned only in 2 Chronicles 12:3, these people were part of Shishak's (king of Egypt) army when he fought against Rehoboam of Judah. They may have been desert-dwelling mercenaries out of Libya, known in Egyptian sources as Tjukten from 1300 to 1100 B.C.

SULFUR NRSV, NIV, REB translate Revelation 9:17–18 "sulfur" rather than the usual "brimstone." The Near East has large deposits of this mineral. See Brimstone; Minerals and Metals.

SUMER (Sū' mĕr) One of the two political divisions originally comprising what came to be Babylonia. Its principal cities were Nippur, Adab, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Erech, Ur, and Eridu, most of which were on or near the Euphrates. The area consists primarily of the fertile plain between the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers and is now the southern part of modern Iraq.

In the Old Testament, Sumer is the territory referred to as Shinar (Gen. 10:10) or Chaldea (Jer. ⌜⌝:10). See Shinar.

Archaeologists believe the inhabitants of ancient Sumer developed humanity's first high civilization about 3000 B.C. Perhaps the most important Sumerian contribution to civilization was the invention of cuneiform writing, a wedge-shaped script formed by pressing a reed stylus into wet clay tablets, which were later dried, baked, and stored in libraries. The Babylonians and other surrounding peoples adapted the cuneiform script to their own languages so that for centuries, cuneiform was the dominant mode of writing in ancient Mesopotamia. Most Sumerian tablets contain economic and administrative records, but others include mythology, history, hymns, wisdom texts, law, and much more. Of special interest to biblical scholars are: the law code of Ur-nammu, the Sumerian king list, the flood story of Zuisudra, the paradise myth of Enki and Ninhursag, early forms of the Gilgamesh epic, and the descent of Inanna to the underworld.

Originally, Sumer consisted of a number of city-states, each with its own protective god. Political power was held by the free citizens of the city and a governor, called ensi. As the city-states vied with one another for power and as pressures from outside invaders increased, the institution of kingship emerged, whereby the ruler of one city-state dominated others.

About 2100 B.C., Sumer was conquered by invading tribesmen from the west and north. A mighty warrior named Sargon (later known as Sargon I, Sargon the Great, and Sargon of Akkad), conquered this area and extended his empire from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean Sea. He founded a new capital city, Agade, which was, for more than half a century, the richest and most powerful capital in the world.

Sumer enjoyed a brief revival at Ur (about 2050 B.C.) only to decline before the rise of the Elamites, a people to their east. Finally, in about 1720 B.C., Hammurabi of Babylon united Sumer (the southern division of ancient Babylon) into one empire. This conquest by Hammurabi marked the end of ancient Sumer, but the cultural and intellectual impact of the Sumerians continued until after the Persians became the dominant force in this part of the ancient world. Rich Murrell

SUN The source of light for earth. Ancient people considered the sun as a necessary part of the cycle of the seasons. Thus, it was often viewed as a god. Ancient Egyptians worshiped the sun as the god Ra, and the Greeks as Helios. The Canaanite city of Beth-Shemesh, "House of the Sun," probably referred to a temple in the city. The Bible simply views the sun as the "greater light" God created to rule the day (Gen. 1:16). In Israel, the new day began with sunset. The Psalms compared the sun's brightness to God's glory by which it will one day be replaced (Ps. 84:11). Zacharias described Christ's coming as a new sunrise for humankind (Luke 1:78). The darkening or eclipse of the sun was often interpreted as a sign of God's displeasure with humans. See Gods, Pagan.

SUNDAY See Lord's Day.

SUNDIAL A device, generally a flat disk with numbers around its edge, used to measure time by the position of a shadow cast by the sun. The root of the Hebrew word translated, "dial," (2 Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8) means, "to go up," and usually refers to stairs. Most interpreters thus understand Ahab's dial to be a staircase on which a shadow went up as the day progressed. The sign involved the shadow's moving back down ten steps.

SUPERSCRIPTION Usually the Romans identified a person's crime by writing it on a wooden sign, carrying it before the condemned person, and finally nailing it to their cross. All four Gospels mention such a superscription (Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19) being nailed over Jesus' head. However, they do not speak of the sign being carried before Jesus as He walked to the place of crucifixion. Superscription is also used for the titles of some psalms giving information concerning the writer and the context of the psalm. See Cross, Crucifixion; Psalms; Trial of Jesus.

SUPERSTITIOUS KJV translation of Greek word indicating fear of or reverence for the gods. The term can be used in a good sense or in a derogatory sense. Modern translations usually take the term in the sense of "very religious" (NAS, NIV) or "uncommonly scrupulous" concerning religion (REB). Paul described the men of Athens (Acts 17:22), and Festus characterized Paul as he stood before King Agrippa (Acts 25:19) with the term.

SUPH (Sūph) Place name meaning, "reed." 1. Hebrew name for Red Sea. See Red Sea. 2. Place helping locate where Moses delivered the speech behind the Book of Deuteronomy (Deut. 1:1). It may be khirbet Safe just southeast of Medeba in the mountains of Moab, but this is uncertain.

SUPHAH (Suph' ah) Apparently a place name perhaps meaning, "toward the reeds." The Hebrew text of Numbers 21:14 has no verb and has been translated and emended in many ways to achieve one. Compare translations. KJV created "Yam-Suph," or "Red Sea." Others find a compound place name, "Waheb in Suphah," indicating two locations in Moab.

SUR, GATE OF A gate in Jerusalem. Some feel that it may be the gate leading from the king's palace to the Temple spoken of in the account of the murder of Queen Athaliah (2 Kings 11). In the parallel account (2 Chron. 23) the gate is called "the gate of the foundation" (v. 5).

SURETY A person who is legally responsible for the debt of another or the money or thing of value put down to guarantee the debt. Should there be a default, the surety would have to pay the debt or even be enslaved until the debt was paid. Judah became surety for Benjamin to Joseph (Gen. 43:9; 44:32). God was asked by a faithful psalmist to be his surety (119:121–122). Proverbs warns against being surety for someone you do not know well (11:15). In a positive sense Jesus is said to be surety for the faithful under the new covenant (Heb. 7:22). See Loan; Pledge; Slavery.

SUSA (Sü' sà)The winter capital of the ancient Persian Empire. The territory is now in the modern Iran. Cyrus made Susa a capital city along with Ecbatana and Babylon. When Alexander the Great captured Susa, he found a large treasure which he confiscated. Archaeologists have excavated Susa largely around four areas: the royal palace, the acropolis, the royal city, and an artisan tell. Some believe Susa to be the place where Queen Esther and King Ahasuerus ruled. See Esther; Nehemiah; Persia.

SUSANCHITES (Sü' săn chītes) Citizens of the city of Susa. See Susa.

SUSANNA (Sü săn' nà) A personal name meaning, "lily." One of several women who followed Jesus and supported Him financially (Luke 8:2–3).

SUSI (Sü' sī) A personal name meaning, "my horse." The father of Gaddi, one of the spies Moses sent from the wilderness of Paran to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:11).

SWADDLE BAND The cloth in which an infant was wrapped and secured by bands which were wrapped around the outside (Luke 2:7,12). See Swaddling Clothes.

SWADDLING CLOTHES A long piece of linen used in ancient times to wrap babies and broken limbs. The cloth was wrapped tightly around the body to prohibit movement. Mary wrapped Jesus in swaddling clothes just after His birth (Luke 2:7).

An Arab mother watches her baby who is wrapped in swaddling clothes.

SWALLOW A bird that migrates to Palestine from March until winter. It made nests in the Temple (Ps. 84:3) and was often seen with the common sparrow. It was sometimes confused with the swift. See Birds.

SWAN KJV rendering of the Hebrew tinshemet (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16). Other versions translate, "the desert owl" or "pelican" (NRSV) or "the white owl" (NIV, NAS). See Birds; Owl.

SWEAR See Oaths.

SWEAT Perspiration. Sweat usually comes from physical exertion, sickness, or mental or emotional excitement (Gen. 3:19; Ezek. 44:18; Luke 22:44).

SWEET CANE See Calamus.

SWIFT A bird similar to a swallow but unrelated to swallows. Jeremiah mentions the swift (8:7 NAS, NIV). Other versions translate "swallow" (KJV, NRSV). Some commentators think a bulbul or wryneck is meant. Perhaps bulbul (Pycnonotus Reichenovi) is the best linguistic guess. See Birds.

SWINE Israelites were forbidden to eat swine (Lev. 11:7; Deut. 14:8). Swine were considered ceremonially unclean and were used as metaphors for uncleanness. (Prov. 11:22; Matt. 7:6; 2 Pet. 2:22). Mark 5:11–17 speaks of a large herd of swine in the Decapolis area where Jesus saw them as fit bearers of demons. Many ancient people ate swine and used swine for sacrifice to idols. See Animals.

SWORD Close-range weapon. The Hebrew word chereb and the Greek word machaira designate either a dagger or a sword. The Hebrew word also designates an iron tool ("axes," Ezek. 26:9) or a chisel ("tool," Ex. 20:25). In Joshua 5:2, the word designates stone knives used in the circumcision of the people of Israel.

Archaeology has shown that different kinds of swords were used in the Ancient Near East. The sickle or curved sword was used throughout Mesopotamia, Egypt, and in Palestine. The earlier swords were straight, relatively short, and made of bronze. Ehud's sword was the two-edged short dagger; it measured about 18 inches (Judg. 3:16). The sword used by the Israelites in the conquest of Canaan probably was the long-bladed, curved sword (Josh. 6:21).

The Sea Peoples introduced to Canaan the two-edged long sword made of iron. This type of iron sword was kept out of the hands of the Israelites by the Philistines for military and economic reasons until the times of David (1 Sam. 13:19). The Old Testament gives witness that in the wars between the Israelites and the Philistines, the Israelites did not possess this new weapon (1 Sam. 13:22). The sword was kept in a sheath (1 Sam. 17:51; Matt. 26:52). It hung from a belt (1 Sam 25:13) and was generally put on the left hip (2 Sam. 20:8).

There are many symbolic uses for the word sword in the Bible. The word was used as a metaphor for war (Jer. 14:15; Matt. 10:34); the sword was an instrument of divine justice (Ezek. 21:3; Rev. 1:16). Rash words are compared to a sword that pierces (Prov. 12:18); the tongue is like a sharp sword (Ps. 57:4); malicious words are "drawn swords" (Ps. 55:21). The Word of God is sharper than a "two-edged sword" (Heb. 4:12); the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, is part of the Christian's armament in the fight against evil (Eph. 6:17). See Arms and Armor.

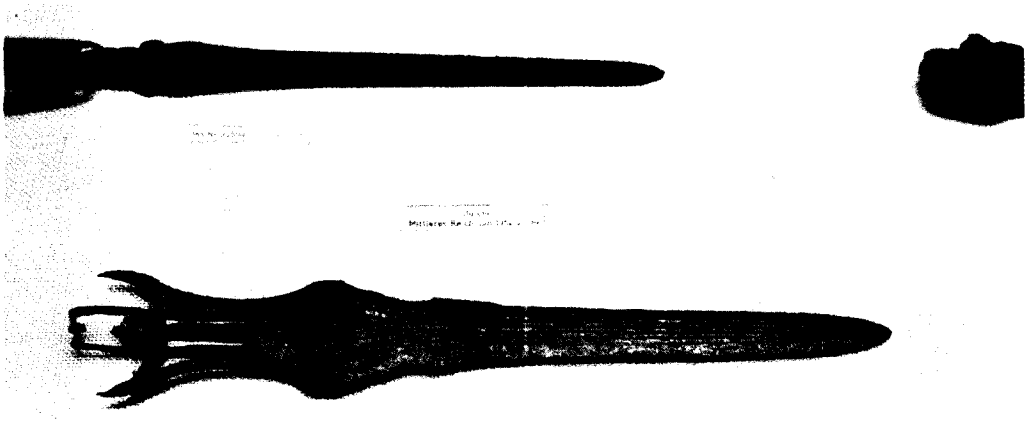
SYCAMORE (Sŷc′ å mōre) A combination "fig" and "mulberry" tree (Ficus sycomorus) indicating the fig tree in the Jordan valley that had leaves like our mulberry tree. Its fruit was inferior to the fig tree and had to be punctured to make the fruit edible. Amos was employed as "one who took care of sycamore-fig trees" (7:14 NIV; compare Ps. 78:47). This tree has no relation to the American sycamore tree. It was used as food for the poor and bore fruit several times a year. See 1 Kings 10:27; 2 Chronicles 1:15; 9:27. It was often planted along roadways for its shade (see Luke 19:4). Poor people used its wood rather than expensive cedar (Isa. 9:10).



SYCHAR (Sŷ′ chär) Place name intended to note "falsehood," though perhaps originally derived from "Shechem." A village in Samaria where Jacob's well is located (John 4:5–6). Jesus rested by the well and there ministered to a Samaritan woman. Jacob bought the parcel of land from "the children of Hamor, Shechem's father" (Gen. 33:19). The site has been identified variously with Shechem and a village just north of there called 'Askar. Archaeological excavations have revealed that Sychar and Shechem are part of the same ancient settlement.

SYMBOL A token or sign. While the word symbol does not appear in the Bible, both the Old and New Testaments are rich in symbolism and symbolic language.

Symbols, whether objects, gestures, or rituals convey meaning to the rational, emotional, and intuitive dimensions of human beings. The universal and supreme symbol of Christian faith is the cross, an instrument of execution. For Christians, this hideous object comes to be a sign of God's love for human beings.

The meaning of symbols grows and even changes over time. For the apostle Paul, the meaning conveyed by the cross changed radically as did his view of Jesus of Nazareth. As a rabbi, zealous to keep the Mosaic law and to bring others to do so, Paul believed that anyone hung on a tree was cursed by God (Deut. 21:23). For this reason and others, he strongly resisted the claims that Jesus was Messiah. How could one obviously under a divine curse possibly be Messiah? Only when the risen Lord appeared to Saul did he realize that what appeared to be a curse had been transformed into a source of the greatest blessing. Christ's death seen through the resurrection is at the center of the two major symbolic rituals of Christian faith—baptism and the Lord's Supper or the Eucharist. See Ordinances; Sacrament.

Baptism is a picture of the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. In being baptized, a person says to the world that the baptismal candidate is identifying with the saving act being pictured. That means the new believer is dying to sin and is rising to walk in new life, living now for God and with God as the center of life.

The Lord's Supper employs the ordinary elements of bread and wine to picture Christ's broken body and His blood shed for humanity's sin.

While the cross, the water, the bread, and wine are symbols at the center of Christian faith and practice, they are not the only symbols. Symbols in the Old Testament are related to symbols of the New Testament in important ways. Many of the events of the Old Testament foreshadow events of the New Testament. For example, the sacrificial lamb in the Old Testament points to the sacrificial death of Christ. The parables of Jesus are rich in symbols: grain, weeds, various kinds of soil, a lost sheep, a lost coin, and a lost son. Jesus used symbolic language in talking about Himself and His relationship to persons: Bread of life, Light of the world, Good Shepherd, Water of life, and the Door.

The apocalyptic writings of the Bible, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Revelation are rich in symbolic language. A person reading and interpreting these books is required to come to know the symbolic meaning of the terms being used in almost the same way as a person trying to break a code. See Apocalyptic. Steve Bond

SYNAGOGUE (Sĭn′ ȧ gŏgue) The local meeting place and assembly of the Jewish people during New Testament times.

Origin Some Jewish traditions say that the synagogue was begun by Moses, but the Old Testament does not support this claim. Local worship was discouraged during most of the Old Testament because it often was associated with pagan practices. Worship centered around the Temple in Jerusalem. Psalm 74:8, written late in Old Testament times, seems to refer to local places of worship destroyed when the Temple was destroyed. Some English translations use the word synagogues for these local places of worship, but we know nothing else about them.

The synagogue, as we find it in the New Testament, had its roots in the time after Solomon's Temple was destroyed and many of the people were carried into Exile. Local worship and instruction became necessary. Even after many of the Jews returned to Jerusalem and rebuilt the Temple, places of local worship continued. By the time of Jesus these places and assemblies were called synagogues.

Facts about synagogues Synagogues existed not only among the many Jews who lived outside Palestine but also among those who lived in Palestine. While the Temple stood until A.D. 70, it continued to be the center for sacrificial worship. Faithful Jews continued to go to the Temple for the appointed feasts. They also participated in their local synagogues. During Jesus' time, there was even a synagogue within the Temple itself. This was probably the part of the Temple where the twelve-year-old Jesus was talking with the teachers (Luke 2:46).

Most communities of any size had at least one synagogue; some had several. Jewish sources indicate that a synagogue was to be established wherever there were as many as ten Jewish men. The principal meeting was on the sabbath. A typical service consisted of the recitation of the Shema (confession of faith in the one God), prayers, Scripture readings from the Law and the Prophets, a sermon, and a benediction. Luke 4:16–21 is the best biblical passage on what happened in a synagogue service in first-century Palestine. See Shema.

Local elders had general oversight of the synagogue. They often appointed a ruler of the synagogue. The ruler was a layman who cared for the building and selected those who participated in the service. The ruler was assisted by an attendant. One of his duties was to deliver the sacred scrolls to those who read and return them to the special place where they were kept (Luke 4:17,20).

Jesus and Synagogues Jesus customarily went to the synagogue in His hometown of Nazareth on the sabbath (Luke 4:16). After Jesus began His public ministry, He frequently taught and preached in synagogues throughout the land (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mark 1:39; Luke 4:44). Early in His ministry, Jesus healed a man in the synagogue in Capernaum (Mark 1:21–28; Luke 4:31–37).

Jesus often encountered opposition in synagogues. Luke 4:16–30 tells what happened in His home synagogue of Nazareth (see also Matt. 13:54–58; Mark 6:1–6). It shows how Jesus' preaching and teaching aroused strong negative reactions. Luke 13:10–16 tells of Jesus healing a woman in a synagogue on the sabbath. This brought an angry reaction from the ruler of the synagogue. Jesus, in turn, rebuked the man for his hypocrisy.

Jesus warned against the hypocrisy of those who paraded their righteousness in the synagogue. He warned against giving and praying in order to be seen and praised (Matt. 6:2,5). He also rebuked those who sought the chief seats (Matt. 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46).

As opposition to Jesus increased, He warned His disciples of a future time when they would be persecuted in the synagogues of their people (Matt. 10:17; 23:34; Mark 13:9; Luke 12:11;

The excavated remains of a third-century synagogue at the site of ancient Chorazin (Korazin), Israel.

Synagogues in Acts The early part of the Book of Acts seems to reflect a period when some Jewish believers continued to worship in the synagogues. Saul went into the synagogues to find and persecute believers in Christ (Acts 9:2; 22:19; 26:11). This shows that Christian Jews were still in some synagogues, especially those outside Palestine. As persecution developed, the believers were forced out of the synagogues.

After Saul's conversion, he immediately preached Christ in the synagogues in Damascus (Acts 9:20). During Paul's missionary journeys, he customarily began his work in a new city by going into the synagogue (Acts 13:5,14; 14:1; 17:1,10,17; 18:4; 19:8). The exception in Philippi was probably because there were not enough Jews there to have a synagogue. Paul, therefore, went to a place where faithful Jews met to pray on the sabbath (Acts 16:13).

Generally, Paul was welcomed and given the opportunity to present his views. He found special interest among the Gentiles who attended the synagogue, but some Jews also believed (Acts 13:42–43). Others strongly opposed Paul. Usually, he was forced to leave the synagogue and go elsewhere with the band of believers (Acts 18:6–8; 19:8–10). Thus did the church and synagogue go their separate ways.

Influence of the Synagogue The synagogue was the means of preserving Jewish faith and worship. Jews all over the ancient world continued to maintain their distinctive faith. These synagogues became the seedbed for Christian faith as missionaries took the message of Christ to new places. Nearly everywhere the missionaries went, they found a Jewish synagogue. The first-century synagogue worshipers believed in the one true God, studied the Scriptures, and looked for the coming Messiah. What better place for Paul and others to go first with the message of Jesus Christ!

SYNTYCHE (Sŷn′ tŷ chē) Personal name meaning, "pleasant acquaintance" or "good luck." Woman in the church at Philippi addressed by Paul concerning an argument with Euodia (Phil. 4:2).

SYRACUSE (Sŷr′ ă cūse) Major city on the island of Sicily. Paul stayed in the Syracuse harbor three days on his way to Rome (Acts 28:12). It was strong enough to defeat an attack from Athens in 413 B.C. but was defeated by Rome in 212 B.C. It became the residence of the governor of Sicily under Roman government. It enjoyed great prosperity during the Roman years.

SYRIA (Sŷr′ ĭ ă) The region or nation directly north of Palestine in the northwest corner of the Mediterranean Sea.

Name and Geography Syria is most properly a geographical term for the northwestern Mediterranean region situated between Palestine and Mesopotamia, roughly equal to the modern states of Syria and Lebanon with small portions of Turkey and Iraq. The name may come from a Greek shortening of Assyria and was only accidentally applied to the area. There is no geographical connection between Assyria and Syria.

Syria, like Palestine, has four basic geographical features as one moves from the Mediterranean eastward: (1) a narrow coastal plain; (2) a line of mountains; (3) the rift valley; and (4) fertile steppe fading into desert. The two main rivers rise near one another in the rift valley. The Orontes flows north before abruptly turning west to the sea in the plain of Antioch, while the Leontes flows south then turns west through a narrow gorge and empties into the sea. See Palestine; Rivers.

Old Testament Early History During the Early Bronze Age (about 3200–2200 B.C.), Syria was home to large city states similar to those found in Mesopotamia. The latter part of this period has been illuminated by the recent discovery of cuneiform tablets in the state archive at Ebla, the capital of a small empire in northern Syria. Many of these tablets are in Eblaite, an ancient language similar to Hebrew and promise to aid in biblical study. See Ebla.

In the Middle Bronze Age (2200–1550 B.C.), the time of the Hebrew patriarchs, north Syria was home to the kingdoms of Yamhad, with its capital at Aleppo, and Qatna. The area south of Qatna was known as Amurru (the Akkadian word for Amorite). Further south, Damascus was probably in existence (Gen. 15:2), though it is unknown from contemporary records. In the Late Bronze Age (about 1550–1200 B.C.), Syria became the frontier and sometimes battlefield between the empires of the new kingdom Egypt in the south and initially Mitanni, then the Hittites to the north. Important cities in this period included Qadesh and Ugarit. The former led a number of rebellions against Egyptian authority. Excavations at the latter yielded alphabetic cuneiform tablets in Ugaritic (a language similar to Hebrew) which have shed much light on the nature of Canaanite religion. See Archaeology; Canaan; Ugarit.

Aramean Kingdoms In most English versions of the Old Testament (KJV, NRSV, NAS) "Syria" and "Syrian" (NIV, NRSV "Aram" or "Aramean") translate the Hebrew word Aram, which refers to the nations or territories of the Arameans, a group akin to Israel (Deut. 26:5). The Arameans began to settle in Syria and northern Mesopotamia around the beginning of the Iron Age (about 1200 B.C.), establishing a number of independent states. The Old Testament mentions the Aramean kingdoms of Beth-eden in north Syria, Zobah in south-central Syria, and Damascus in the south.

By the beginning of Israel's monarchy, the kingdom of Zobah held sway in Syria and was encountered by Saul (1 Sam. 14:47). David decisively defeated Aram-Zobah (2 Sam. 10:6–19) whose king, Hadadezer, had enlisted help from his Aramean subject states (10:16,19). As a result Zobah and its vassals, apparently including Damascus, became subject to David (2 Sam. 8:3–8; 10:19). Hamath, a neo-Hittite state in north Syria which had been at war with Zobah, also established friendly relations with David (2 Sam. 8:9–10). Meanwhile, a certain Rezon broke from Hadadezer of Zobah following David's victory and became the leader of a marauding band. Late in Solomon's reign, he established himself as king in Damascus (1 Kings 11:23–25), taking southern Syria out of Israelite control. Subsequent occurrences of "Aram" or "Arameans" ("Syria" or "Syrians") in the Old Testament refer to this Aramean kingdom of Damascus.

The rise of Aram-Damascus' power was facilitated by the division of Israel following the death of Solomon. When Baasha of Israel built a fort at Ramah threatening Jerusalem, Asa of Judah enticed the king of Damascus, "Ben-hadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion," to break his league with Israel and come to Judah's aid (1 Kings 15:18–19). Ben-hadad responded by conquering a number of cities and territory in the north of Israel (v. 20). The genealogy given in this passage has been confirmed by a stele, found near Aleppo, dedicated to the god Melqart by Ben-hadad. Rezon is not mentioned, however, and it has been suggested that he is identical to Hezion. See Damascus.

Syrian Culture Aramean culture was essentially borrowed from their neighbors. Typical Semitic gods were worshiped, the most important of which was the storm god, Hadad, often called by the epithet Rimmon (2 Kings 5:18; Zech. 12:11), meaning "thunder." See Canaan; Gods, Pagan. The most enduring contribution of the Arameans was their language which became the language of commerce and diplomacy by the Persian period. Portions of Daniel and Ezra are written in Aramaic, which is similar to Hebrew. By New Testament times, Aramaic was the language commonly spoken in Palestine and probably used by Jesus. The Aramaic script was adopted and slightly modified for writing Hebrew. See Aramaic.

The Intertestamental Period In 331 B.C. Syria, with the rest of the Persian Empire, fell to the advances of Alexander the Great. At his death, the area formed the nucleus of the Hellenistic Seleucid kingdom with its capital at Antioch. It is in this period that the term Syria became widespread. The Seleucid kingdom oppressed Judaism, causing the Maccabean Revolt in 167 B.C. which resulted in Jewish independence. Syria continued to decline until the arrival of the Romans who made it a province in 64 B.C. See Intertestamental History; Seleucids.

New Testament In New Testament times, Judea was made part of a procuratorship within the larger Roman province of Syria (Matt. 4:24), the latter being ruled by a governor (Luke 2:2). Syria played an important role in the early spread of Christianity. Paul was converted on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1–9) and subsequently evangelized in the province (Acts 15:41; Gal. 1:21). Antioch, where believers were first called "Christians" (Acts 11:26), became the base for his missionary journeys (Acts 13:1–3).

SYROPHENICIAN KJV spelling of Syrophoenician.

SYROPHOENICIAN (Sȳ rō phoė nī′ cian) A combination of Syria and Phoenicia. The word reflects the joining of the two areas into one district under Roman rule. Prior to this era, Phoenicia was the coastal area of northern Palestine, and Syria was a separate country located farther inland. Jesus encountered in the Syrophoenician district a woman whose daughter was possessed by a devil (Mark 7:26). After she prayed for her daughter's healing, the Lord granted her request.

SYRTIS (Sȳr′ tīs) Translated "quicksands" in Acts 27:17 (KJV). Probably what is now known as the Gulf of Sidra, a place of shallow water with hidden rocks, sandbanks, and quicksands off the African coast west of Cyrene.

TAANACH (Tā′ ȧ năch) Place name of uncertain meaning. One of the sites along the northern slope of the Mount Carmel range protecting the accesses from the Plain of Esdraelon to the region of Samaria. Irbid, Megiddo, and Taanach each protect strategic passes through the Carmel range. Taanach thus sat along one fork of the major north-south road of antiquity that went through Palestine, usually called the Via Maris. It also sat on an east-west road that led from the Jordan Valley to the Mediterranean Sea near modern Haifa.

In the Bible, Taanach is only mentioned seven times, usually in lists such as tribal allotments (Josh. 17:11; 1 Chron. 7:29), administrative districts (1 Kings 4:12), Levitical towns (Josh. 21:25), or conquered cities (Josh. 12:21; Judg. 1:27). The most famous biblical reference to Taanach is that of the battle fought at "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo" where the Hebrew forces under Deborah and Barak defeated the Canaanites under Sisera (Judg. 5:19).

Taanach was a town of about 13 acres, about the same size as the better known Megiddo. Its history runs through the Bronze Ages and into the Iron Age, from about 2700 B.C. to about 918 B.C. when it was destroyed by the Egyptian Pharaoh Shishak. A large fortress was built on the site during the early Islamic period, and that fortress may well have continued in use during the Crusades.

While Megiddo was apparently a major Canaanite administrative center, Taanach seems to have been less heavily populated and perhaps the home for the farmers of the surrounding area and their tenants. Excavations have shown a number of cultic objects and installations at Taanach, suggesting that it was a religious center as well.

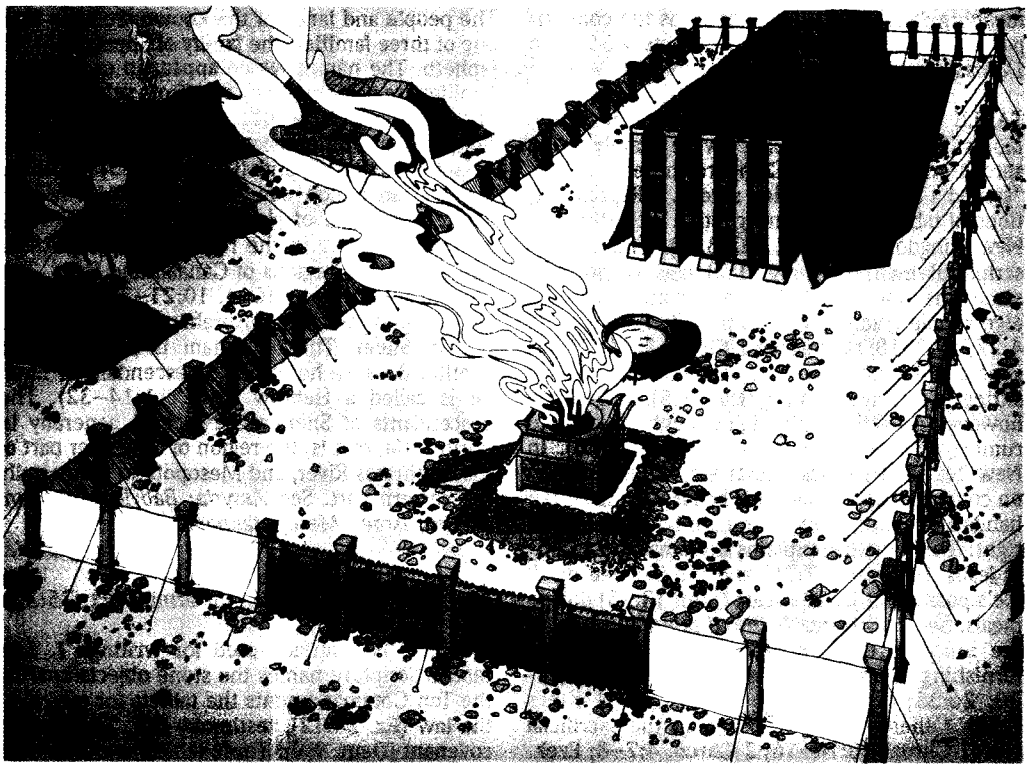
TAANATH-SHILOH (Tā′ ȧ năth-Shī′ lōh) Place name likely meaning, "approach to Shiloh." village located about seven miles southeast of Shechem between Michmethath and Janoah (Josh. 16:6), identified with the modern khirbet Ta'nah el Foqa.

TABBAOTH (Tăb′ bā ŏth) Personal name meaning, "signet ring." Head of a family of Temple servants (Nethinim) returning from Exile (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

TABBATH (Tăb′ băth) Place name perhaps meaning, "sunken." Site in the mountains of Gilead east of the Jordan where Gideon ended his pursuit of the Midianites (Judg. 7:22), identified with modern Ras Abu Tabat northwest of Pakoris.

TABEEL (Tā′ beēl) Aramaic personal name meaning, "God is good." 1. Father of a man whom king Rezin of Damascus and king Pekah of Israel hoped to install as puppet king of Judah rather than Ahaz (Isa. 7:6). Alternately, Tabeel designates a region in northern Transjordan and home of the potential puppet. Spelling has been slightly changed in Hebrew to mean, "good for nothing." 2. Persian official in Samaria who joined in a letter protesting the reconstruction of the Jerusalem Temple (Ezra 4:7).



TABERAH (Tăb′ ĕ rah) Place name meaning, "burning." Unidentified site in the wilderness wandering. The name commemorates God's "burning anger" which broke out in fire against the ever-complaining Israelites (Num. 11:3; Deut. 9:22). The name does not appear in the itinerary of Numbers 33.

TABERING KJV term meaning, "beating" (Nah. 2:7). See Grief and Mourning.

TABERNACLE (Tă bĕr nă cle), TENT OF MEETING A sacred tent, a portable and provisional sanctuary, where God met His people (Ex. 33:7–10). A tent was the dwelling place of a nomadic person. When the sacred tent was meant, it was usually used with some distinguishing epithet. Two compound phrases ('ohel moed and ohel haeduth are used in the Bible to designate this tent: "the tabernacle of the congregation" (Ex. 29:42,44), literally the "tent of meeting" (NRSV, NIV, NAS, REB) and "the tabernacle of witness" (Num. 17:7) or "tent of witness." In both cases it was the place where the God of Israel revealed Himself to and dwelled among His people. The basic Hebrew term (mishkan) translated as "tabernacle" (Ex. 25:9) comes from a verb which means "to dwell." In this sense it is correctly translated in some instances as "dwelling," "dwelling place," "habitation," and "abode."

The Old Testament mentions three tents or tabernacles. First, after the sin of the golden calf at Mount Sinai the "provisional" tabernacle was established outside the camp and called the "tent of meeting" (Ex. 33:7). Second, the "Sinaitic" tabernacle was built in accordance with directions given to Moses by God (Ex. 25—40). Unlike the tent of meeting, it stood at the center of the camp (Num. 2). Third, the "Davidic" tabernacle was erected in Jerusalem for the reception of the ark (2 Sam. 6:17).

The original "tent of meeting" was a provisional edifice where God met with His people (Ex. 33:7–11; 34:34–35). Apparently, only Moses actually entered the tent to meet God. Joshua, Moses' "servant" (Ex. 33:11), protected and cared for the tent. After the golden calf was made, God refused any longer to acknowledge Israel as His people and to dwell in their midst. Estrangement brought distance between God and the people because of their sin. Because of this situation and to symbolize it, Moses pitched this "tent of meeting" outside the camp (Ex. 33:7). Ultimately, God promised again to go into the midst of Israel (Ex. 34:9).

The exact nature of this tent is uncertain. It apparently formed the headquarters of the camp until the building of the "Sinaitic" tabernacle. Joshua guarded the tent in Moses' absence (Ex. 33:11). Since the earliest Greek translation, some would equate Moses' tent in Exodus 18:7 with the tent of meeting, but Scripture does not explicitly make this connection. The people could all go to the tent of meeting to seek the Lord (Ex. 33:7) either in looking for God's answer to a judicial case, in petition, in worship, or for a prophetic word. Apparently, Moses acted as the prophet who took the people's questions to God and received an answer, since "to seek Yahweh" usually appears in prophetic contexts. Prophetic content appears with the tent also in Numbers 11:16–29. Moses installed Joshua as his successor at the tent (Deut. 31:14–15).

Moses called it the tent of meeting because it was the place of revelation. There God met His people when the pillar of cloud descended to the door of the tent (Ex. 33:9). It may have borne its appropriate name from the first, or perhaps Moses used the name from the instructions which he received regarding the permanent tabernacle (Ex. 27:21).

Apparently, the tent did not become a national sanctuary. It did not contain an ark or those items necessary for worship, nor did it possess a priesthood. This tent was cared for by Joshua (Ex. 33:11), while Aaron was responsible for the tabernacle (Lev. 10:7). The cloud descended on this tent when Moses came to inquire of God, but the cloud stayed on the permanent tabernacle and the glory of the Lord filled it so Moses could not enter it (Ex. 40:34,35,38).

The center of attention in the wilderness narratives is the tabernacle with rich decorations, curtains, bread of the presence, ark, lights, and altar. This is the portable sanctuary Israel carefully delegates to the priests and Levites for transportation (Num. 3). The camp of Israel has this tabernacle as its center (Num. 2). This, too, is the tent of meeting (Ex. 27:21), where holy God comes to sinful people. Here the sacrifices and atonement procedures of Leviticus were carried out (Book of Leviticus). "There will I meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory. . . . And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God" (Ex. 29:43, 45).

meaning, "gazelle," which serves as the counterpart to the Greek name Dorcas (Acts 9:36). See Dorcas.

TABLE Flat surface supported by legs. 1. Dinner tables The earliest "tables" were simply skins spread on the ground (Compare the expressions "spread a table" and "a fine spread.") Representations of tables are rare in Egyptian art before the New Kingdom (1300–1100 B.C.). The earliest scriptural mention (Judg. 1:7) falls within this same time frame. Most references concern a sovereign's table (Judg. 1:7; 2 Sam. 9:7; 1 Kings 2:7; 4:27; 10:5; 18:19; but see 1 Kings 13:20). Tables generally sat on short legs, allowing one to eat sitting or reclined on a rug (Isa. 21:5). Judges 1:7, however, reflects a table high enough for kings to rummage underneath (compare Mark 7:28). In New Testament times guests ate while reclining on couches, supporting their heads with their left hands and eating from a common bowl with their right. This practice explains a woman's standing at Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38) and the beloved disciple's position at Jesus' breast (John 13:23) during meals. See Furniture. 2. Ritual tables A table for the bread of the presence formed part of the furnishings for both the tabernacle (Ex. 25:23–30; 26:35; Lev. 24:5–7) and Temple (1 Kings 7:48). Other tables were used in the sacrificial cult (1 Chron. 28:14–16; 2 Chron. 4:7–8; Ezek. 40:38–43). Malachi 1:7,12 describes the altar itself as a table. To share in a god's table was an act of worship. Isaiah 65:11 and 1 Corinthians 10:21 refer to idolatrous worship. The "Lord's table" (1 Cor. 10:21) refers to the observance of the Lord's Supper. 3. Money tables The money changers' tables were likely small trays on stands (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15). 4. Tables of law Some translations use table in the sense of a tablet (Ex. 24:12; 31:18; Deut. 9:9). See Tablet.

TABLE OF NATIONS The Genesis 10 listing of the descendants of Noah's sons to explain the origin of the nations and peoples of the known world. The account is unique for several reasons. First, a new chapter begins in biblical history at this point; humanity has a new beginning through Noah and his three sons. Second, the account highlights the ethnic makeup of the ancient world, listing some seventy different ethnic groups that formed the basis of the known world. Third, despite our lack of knowledge about many of the groups listed in the chapter, Genesis 10 underlines the fact that the Bible is based on historical events. Fourth, Genesis 10 provides the basis for understanding Abraham, introducing his world and his relationship to that world. The account of the Table of Nations, with a few variations, also appears in 1 Chronicles 1:5–23.

The Table of Nations has three basic divisions. The people and lands of the known world fit into one of three families, the family of Shem, Ham, or Japheth. The names which appear in each of the families are names which come from several different categories: racial descent, geographical location, language differences, or political units.

Japheth's descendants (Gen. 10:2–5) inhabited the Aegean region and Anatolia or Aisa Minor. The descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:6–20) were located especially in the regions of North Africa and the coastal regions of Canaan and Syria. The descendants of Shem (Gen. 10:21–31) are especially important because Abraham comes from the line of Shem. Thus Abraham is a Shemite or Semite. Because he is also a descendant of Eber, he is called a Hebrew (Gen. 11:14–32). The descendants of Shem were located generally in north Syria, that is, the region of the upper part of the Euphrates River, and Mesopotamia, especially the eastern part. See Assyria; Babylon; Canaan; Habiru; Israel; Mesopotamia; Semites.

TABLET KJV translation for armlet (Ex. 35:22).

TABLET Flat surface used for writing. 1. Law tablets Scripture names the stone objects bearing the Ten Commandments the tablets (or tables) of the law (Ex. 24:12), testimony (Ex. 31:18), and covenant (Deut. 9:9). These tablets were perhaps small steles such as those other nations used to publicize their laws. 2. Writing tablets Writing was often done on clay tablets (Ezek. 4:1) or wood tablets covered with wax (Luke 1:63). The heart is often described as a tablet upon which God writes His law (Prov. 3:3; Jer. 17:1; 2 Cor. 3:3).

TABOR (Tā′ bôr) Place name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, "height." 1. A mountain in the valley of Jezreel. About six miles east of Nazareth, it has played an important role in Israel's history since the period of the conquest. It served as a boundary point for the tribes of Naphtali, Issachar, and Zebulun (Josh. 19:12,22), where the tribes worshiped early (Deut. 33:18–19). Barak gathered an army at Tabor to defend against Sisera (Judg. 4:6). Apparently, it was the site of false worship (Hos. 5:1). Tradition holds that Tabor was the site of Jesus' transfiguration (Mark 9:2), although no evidence exists to validate the claim.

2. Levitical city (1 Chron. 6:77), apparently replacing Nahalal in the earlier list (Josh. 21:35). It may be khirbet Dabura.

3. The "Plain of Tabor" (1 Sam. 10:3) was apparently near Gibea.

TABOR, OAK OF NAS, NRSV designation of a site between Rachel's tomb (near Bethlehem) and Gibeah of Saul (1 Sam. 10:3). Other translations read plain (KJV), great tree (NIV), or terebinth (REB) of Tabor.

Mt. Tabor, located a few miles southeast of Nazareth.

TABRET KJV term for tambourine. Scripture associates the tambourine with occasions of strong emotion: farewells (Gen. 31:27); prophetic ecstasy (1 Sam. 10:5); a victory procession (1 Sam. 18:6); the procession of the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:5). Tambourine music often accompanied festive occasions of drinking and merrymaking (Isa. 5:12; 24:8; 30:32; Jer. 31:4). Often women were the musicians (1 Sam. 18:6; 2 Sam. 6:5; Ps. 68:25). See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

TABRI(M)MON (Tăb rĭm′ mon) Personal name meaning, "Rimmon is good." Father of king Ben-Hadad of Damascus (1 Kings 15:18). Rimmon was the Akkadian god of thunder. See Hadad; Hadad-Rimmon; Rimmon.

TACHES KJV term meaning, "hooks" or "clasps" (Ex. 26:6,11,33) used to connect the individual curtains of the tabernacle into one tent.

TACHMONITE (Tăch mo nīte) KJV, TEV form of Tahchemonite.

TACKLING KJV form of tackle, that is, gear used to handle cargo and rigging to work a ship's sails (Isa. 33:23; Acts 27:19). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

TADMOR (Tăd′ môr) Place name of uncertain meaning. A city in northern Palestine built by Solomon (2 Chron. 8:4), probably to control a caravan route. Early Hebrew scribes read Tadmor as the city instead of Tamar of the written text in 1 Kings 9:18. The city enjoyed prosperity at various periods, but especially so during Solomon's reign and again in the third century A.D., shortly before it was destroyed. The site has been identified with Palmyra, a great Arabian city, located about 120 miles northeast of Damascus.

TAHAN (Tā′ hăn) Personal name meaning, "graciousness." 1. Third son of Ephraim (Num. 26:35). The parallel list gives Tahath as Ephraim's third son (1 Chron. 7:20). 2. Ephraimite ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25).

TAHANITES (Tā′ hăn ītes) Member of the Ephraimite clan descended from Tahan (Num. 26:35).

TAHAPANES (Tȧ hă′ pȧ nēṣ) KJV alternate form of Tahpanhes (Jer. 2:16).

TAHASH (Tā′ hăsh) Personal name meaning, "porpoise" or "dugong." Third son of Nahor and Reumah (Gen. 22:24) and ancestor of an Arab tribe, perhaps associated with Tahshi north of Damascus. The tell-el-Amarna letters and the records of Thutmose III mention Tahash.

TAHATH (Tā′ hăth) Personal and place name meaning, "beneath, low" or "substitute, compensation." 1. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:24,37). 2. Two descendants of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20). See Ta- han. 3. Stopping place during the wilderness wandering (Num. 33:26–27).

TAHCHEMONITE (Täh chē′ mōn īte) Title of one of David's thirty elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:8), likely a scribal altering of the Hebrew (ha) Hachmonite (REB), which occurs in the parallel list (1 Chron. 11:11).

TAHKEMONITE (Täh kē′ mōn ite) NIV spelling of Tahchemonite.

TAHPANHES (Täh′ pan hēṣ) Hebrew transliteration of an Egyptian place name meaning, "fortress of Penhase" or "house of the Nubian." City in the Nile Delta near the eastern border of Egypt (Jer. 2:16). The site, identified with Daphnai (tell Defneh), shows little evidence of heavy occupation before the Saite dynasty (663 B.C.), which garrisoned Greek mercenaries there to hedge against Assyrian advances. In 605 B.C. then crown prince Nebuchadrezzar defeated the Egyptian forces at Carchemish on the northern Euphrates and pursued them to the border of Egypt. In 601 B.C. Nebuchadrezzar and Pharoah Neco again fought to a stalemate at the Egyptian border. Jeremiah 46:14 perhaps relates to one of these incidents. Following the destruction of Jerusalem and continuing unrest in Judah, a large group of Jews took Jeremiah with them and fled to Tahpanhes (Jer. 43:7; 44:1). Jeremiah argued against the move (Jer. 42:19), warning that Nebuchadrezzar would again reach Tahpanhes (Jer. 46:14).

TAHPENES (Täh′ pē nēṣ) Egyptian royal consort; title for queen of Egypt in 1 Kings 11:19–20. Her sister was given in marriage to Hadad the Edomite, an enemy of David, and later of Solomon.

TAHREA (Täh rē′ à) Alternate form of Tarea (1 Chron. 9:41).

TAHTIM-HODSHI (Täh′ tĭm-Hŏd′ shī) Site in northern Israel which David's census takers visited (2 Sam. 24:6). The name is not attested elsewhere, prompting various emendations: Kadesh in the land of the Hittites (REB, NRSV, TEV); and the land below Hermon.

TALENT See Weights and Measures.

TALITHA CUMI (Tăl′ ĭ thȧ-cū′ mī) Transliteration of Aramaic phrase meaning, "damsel, arise." Jesus' words to Jarius' daughter (Mark 5:41). The girl's relatives thought she was dead by the time the Lord arrived, but He pronounced it only as sleep (5:39). The Aramaic reflects Mark's attempt to preserve the actual words of Jesus, who probably spoke Aramaic rather than Greek in which most of the New Testament is written. See Jairus.

TALMAI (Tăl′ mâi) Personal name meaning, "plowman," or else derived from the Hurrian word for big. 1. One of three Anakim (giant, pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan) residing in Hebron (Num. 13:22). Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and Judah (Judg. 1:10) are credited with driving the Anakim from Hebron. 2. King of Geshur, father of David's wife Maacah and grandfather of Absalom (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chron. 3:2). After Absalom murdered his half brother Amnon, he took refuge with his grandfather (2 Sam. 13:37).

TALMON (Tăl′ mŏn) Personal name meaning, "brightness." 1. Levite whom David and Samuel appointed a gatekeeper (1 Chron. 9:17), ancestor of a family of Temple gatekeepers who returned from Exile (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45); 2. Leader of the postexilic gatekeepers (Neh. 11:19; 12:25).

TALMUD Jewish commentaries. Talmud means, "study" or "learning" and refers in rabbinic Judaism to the opinions and teachings that disciples learn from their predecessors particularly with regard to the development of oral legal teachings (halakah). The word Talmud is most commonly used in Judaism to refer specifically to the digest of commentary on the Mishnah. The Mishnah (a codification of oral legal teachings on the written law of Moses) was probably written down at Javneh in Galilee at about 220 A.D. Between A.D. 220 and 500 the rabbinic schools in Palestine and Babylonia amplified and applied the teachings of the Mishnah for their Jewish communities. Two documents came to embody a large part of this teaching: The Jerusalem Talmud and the Babylonian Talmud.

Those scholars represented in the Mishnah are referred to as the Tannaim. Generally, they lived from the first through the second centuries A.D. The Talmud gives the opinions of a new generation of scholars referred to as the Amoraim (A.D. 200–500). Various teachers became famous and attracted students from a variety of locales in the ancient world. By this means, the decisions of rabbis resident in Babylon became normative for a broad cross section of ancient Jewish life. How strongly rabbinic decisions influenced the average Jew we cannot know. Passages from the Talmud reflect the great concern of some rabbis that their advice was not being followed by the people.

The Talmud represents a continuation of the application of the oral law (halakah) to every sphere of Jewish life. This process probably began with the early Jewish sect known as the Pharisees. Many of the discussions in the Talmud, however, seem to have no direct practical application, but are theoretical in nature.

The passing on of the tradition and the remembering of the specific decisions and reasoning of the teachers by their disciples was apparently emphasized in the rabbinic schools. There is some evidence that both Mishnah and Talmud were remembered according to chants or musical melodies.

The Babylonian Talmud became the most authoritative of the two written Talmuds due both to the political fortunes of the Jewish communities in Palestine and Babylon in the first four centuries A.D. and also to its more sophisticated style. Later generations of Jewish scholars also recognized that the Babylonian Talmud was completed later and so supposed that it absorbed or superseded the Jerusalem one.

Apart from haggadic passages that are mostly Hebrew, it was written in Eastern Aramaic, the language of Babylon at the time. The Babylonian Talmud reflects a highly developed system for settling disputed questions of halakah (oral law). It includes commentary on all six major divisions of the Mishnah, but deletes certain subsections. For example, discussion of the segments of Mishnah that deal with the Temple service are omitted, presumably because the Jewish community in Babylon did not anticipate the rebuilding of the Temple in the near future (interestingly, the Jerusalem Talmud does discuss these sections).

The Babylonian Talmud also contains theoretical legal discussion as well as information on the daily life of Jewish people in the first six centuries, history, medicine, astronomy, commerce, agriculture, demonology, magic, botany, zoology, and other sciences. It also incorporates a large measure of Haggadah (illustrative stories and poetry) in addition to legal discussion.

The Jerusalem Talmud was not compiled in Jerusalem but in the centers of Tiberias, Caesarea, and Sepphoris in Palestine, since Jerusalem ceased to be a major center of Jewish learning after the destruction of the second Temple in A.D. 70. It uses Western Aramaic, the dialect of Palestine. It is succinct and concise in its presentation of legal arguments, and does not contain the considerable body of Haggadah included in the Babylonian Talmud. The Jerusalem Talmud was completed about 400 A.D. approximately a century before the Babylonian Talmud.

The importance of the Talmud to Jewish life until the modern period can hardly be overestimated. Talmud and commentary upon it become a major focus of religious action in the medieval period. The Talmud became the central document for Jewish education during the medieval period.

New Testament scholars are especially interested in the Talmud. Some of the halakah embodied in the Talmud is attributed to early rabbis and may reflect Jewish practice in the time of the writers of the New Testament or of Jesus. This material must be used judiciously in historical reconstruction, however, since it was compiled five centuries after the fact. See Haggadah and Halakah; Mishnah.

TAMAH (Tā′ mah) KJV form of Temah (Neh. 7:55).

TAMAR (Tā′ mär) Personal name meaning, "date palm." 1. Daughter-in-law of Judah, wife of his eldest son, Er (Gen. 38:6). After her wicked husband died without fathering a child, Tamar was given to Er's brother, Onan, for the purpose of bearing a child in the name of the dead man. Onan refused to impregnate Tamar, for which God killed him. She then tricked her father-in-law into fathering her child (38:18). See Levirate Marriage.

2. A daughter of David raped by her half brother, Amnon (2 Sam. 13:14). The act was avenged by her full brother, Absalom, when he had Amnon murdered (13:28–29). These acts were part of Nathan's property that the sword would never depart from David's house (2 Sam. 12:10).

3. Absalom named his only daughter Tamar. She is called "a beautiful woman" (2 Sam. 14:27).

4. City built by Solomon "in the wilderness" (1 Kings 9:18). The text should perhaps read Tadmor (2 Chron. 8:4), since the Hebrew lacks the qualifying phrase "of Judah" and the Masoretic vowel points correspond to Tadmor. See Tadmor.

5. Fortified city at the southern end of the Dead Sea, marking the ideal limit of Israel (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). If identical with 4, this Tamar likely served as a supply depot for Solomon's mines in the Arabah and as a frontier post to guard the border with Edom.

TAMARISK (Tă′ mą rĭsk)A shrublike tree (Tamarix syriaca) common to the Sinai and southern Palestine with small white or pink flowers. Many varieties of the tree exist. Abraham planted a tamarisk at Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:33), and Saul was buried beneath one at Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. 31:13). Saul convened his court under one (1 Sam. 22:6). KJV translated, "grave" and "tree." Some believe the resin which the tamarisk produces may have been the manna eaten by the Hebrews during the wilderness wanderings.

TAMBOURINE See Music, Instruments, Dancing; Tabret.

TAMMUZ (Tăm′ mŭz)A Sumerian god of vegetation. The worship of Tammuz by women in Jerusalem was revealed as one of the abominations in Ezekiel (8:14–15). According to the pagan religion, Tammuz was betrayed by his lover, Ishtar, and as a result dies each autumn. The wilting of the vegetation at that time of year is seen as a sign of his death. This caused great mourning in the ancient world, and was why the women in Jerusalem wept. See Fertility Cults.

TANACH (Tā′ năch) KJV form of Taanach (Josh. 21:25).

TANHUMETH (Tăn hū′ měth) Personal name meaning, "comforting." Father of Seraiah, a captain of forces remaining with Gedaliah in Judah following the deportation of Babylon (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). A Lachish stamp witnesses to the name as does an Arad inscription.

TAPHATH (Tā′ phăth) Personal name meaning, "droplet." Daughter of Solomon and wife of Benabinadab, a Solomonic official (1 Kings 4:11).

TAPPUAH (Tăp pūăh) Personal name meaning, "apple" or "quince." 1. A Calebite, likely a resident of a town near Hebron (1 Chron. 2:43). 2. City in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:34), possibly Beit Nettif about twelve miles west of Bethlehem. 3. City of the north border of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8) whose environs were allotted to Manasseh (17:7–8), likely the Tappuah of Joshua 12:17 and 2 Kings 15:16. The site is perhaps Sheikh Abu Zarod about eight miles southwest of Shechem. Some scholars read, "Tappuah" for "Tiphsah" in 2 Kings 15:16 (REB). See Beth-Tappuah; En-Tappuah.

TAR See Bitumen.

TARAH (Tā′ rah) KJV form of Terah, the wilderness campsite (Num. 33:27–28).

TARALAH (Tā′ rà lah) Place name meaning, "strength." Unidentified site in Benjamin, likely northwest of Jerusalem (Josh. 18:27).

TAREA (Tā′ rē à) Personal name of unknown derivation. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; Tahrea 1 Chron. 9:41).

TARES KJV term for grassy weeds resembling wheat, generally identified as darnel (genus Lolium). See Matthew 13:25–30,36–40.

TARGUM (Tăr′ gŭm) Early translations of the Bible into Aramaic, the native language of Palestine and Babylon in the first century A.D. Targum, in its verbal Hebrew form, means "to explain, to translate." The most important of these translations still in existence is Targum Onkelos which was probably read weekly in synagogue services from a relatively early date. The targums are not simply translations but seem to include a large amount of biblical commentary that perhaps reflects sermons in Jewish Palestinian synagogues. Therefore, the material is of interest to New Testament scholars who attempt to understand the Judaism of which Jesus was a part. See Aramaic.

TARPELITES (Tăr′ pĕ līites) KJV transliteration of an Aramaic title in Ezra 4:9. Most modern translations render the term, "officials" (NIV, "men of Tripolis").

TARSHISH (Tär′shīsh) Personal and place name of uncertain derivation, either meaning, "yellow jasper," as in the Hebrew of Exodus 28:20; Ezekiel 28:13, or else derived from an Akkadian term meaning, "smelting plant." 1. Son of Javan (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7) and ancestor of an Aegean people. 2. Benjaminite warrior (1 Chron. 7:10). 3. One of seven leading officials of King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esth. 1:14). This name possibly means "greedy one" in Old Persian. 4. Geographic designation, most likely of Tartessus at the southern tip of Spain but possibly of Tarsus in Cilisia. Jonah sailed for Tarshish, the far limit of the western world from the Mediterranean port of Joppa in his futile attempt to escape God's call (Jonah 1:3). Tarshish traded in precious metals with Tyre, another Mediterranean port (Isa. 23:1; Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:12). 5. References to Tarshish in 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles suggest a non-geographic meaning. Solomon's (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron. 9:21) and Jehoshaphat's (1 Kings 22:48; 2 Chron. 20:36) fleets were based at Ezion-Geber on the Red Sea. Solomon's cargo suggests east African trading partners. Thus "ships of Tarshish" may designate seagoing vessels like those of Tarshish or else ships bearing metal cargo like those of Tarshish (compare Isa. 2:16 where ships of Tarshish parallels beautiful crafts).

TARSUS (Tär′ sŭs) Birthplace of Paul (Acts 9:11) and capital of Roman province of Cilicia. See Asia Minor; Paul.

TARTAK (Tär′ tăk) Deity worshiped by the Arvvites whom the Assyrians settled in Samaria after 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:31). The name is otherwise unattested and is likely a deliberate corruption of Atargatis, the Syrian high goddess and wife of Hadad.

TARTAN (Tär′ tăn) Title of the highest ranking Assyrian officer under the king; commander in chief; supreme commander (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 20:1). First mention of the office occurred under Adadnirari II (911–891 B.C.).

TASKMASTER Oppressive overseers of forced labor gangs employed by monarchies for large public works projects (Egyptian: Ex. 1:11; 3:7; 5:6–14; Israelite: 2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6; 5:16; 12:18; 2 Chron. 10:18).

TATNAI (Tăt′ nâi) KJV form of Tattenai.

TATTENAI (Tăt′ tĕ nâi) Contemporary of Zerubbabel, governor of the Persian province "across the (Euphrates) River," which included Palestine (Ezra 5:3,6; 6:6,13).

TAU Twenty-second and final letter of the Hebrew alphabet which the KJV used as a heading for Psalm 119:169–176, each verse of which begins with the letter.

TAX COLLECTOR See Publican.

TAXES Regular payments to rulers. Early Israel only paid taxes to support the tabernacle and the priests.

Terms in the Old Testament that refer to taxes were: "assessment," "forced labor," "tribute," and "toll." Before Israel established a king, worship taxes were the only ones levied from within the nation. Tribute has to be paid, of course, to invaders such as the Philistines. During David's reign, an army was maintained by tribute paid by conquered tribes. Taxes increased under Solomon's rule. Tradesmen and merchants paid duties; subject peoples paid tribute; farmers paid taxes in kind of oil and wine; and many Israelites did forced labor on the Temple. The burden of taxation contributed to the rebellion following Solomon's death (1 Kings 12). Soon, Israel became a vassal state, paying tribute—a compulsory tax—to Assyria, and, eventually, to Rome.

In the New Testament era, Herod the Great levied a tax on the produce of the field and a tax on items bought and sold. Other duties owed to foreign powers were: a land tax, a poll tax, a kind of progressive income tax (about which the Pharisees tested Jesus, Matt. 22:17), and a tax on personal property. In Jerusalem a house tax was levied. These taxes were paid directly to Roman officials.

Export and import customs paid at seaports and city gates were farmed out to private contractors who paid a sum in advance for the right to collect taxes in a certain area. Such were Zacchaeus (Luke 19) and Matthew (Matt. 9). Rome apparently placed little restriction on how much profit the collector could take. An enrollment for the purposes of taxation under the Roman emperor brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, where Jesus was born (Luke 2:1–7). In addition to the taxes owed occupying powers, the Jewish people also had to pay religious duties: A didrachma (half shekel) was owed to the Temple by all Jewish males throughout the world (Matt. 17:24). The second tax was a tithe, 10 percent of everything the soil produced, collected by the Levites.

The Israelites resented most deeply the duties paid to the occupying powers. Many zealous Jews considered it treason to God to pay taxes to Rome. When questioned about paying the poll tax, Jesus surprised His questioners by saying that the law should be obeyed (Mark 12:13). Gary K. Halbrook

TEARS See Mourn.

TEBAH (Tē′ bah) Personal name meaning, "slaughter." Son of Nahor and ancestor of an Aramaean tribe (Gen. 22:24). Tebah is perhaps associated with tubihi, a site somewhere between Damascus and Kadesh.

TEBALIAH (Tĕb ā lī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has dipped, that is, purified," or "loved by Yahweh," or "good for Yahweh." Postexilic Levitic gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:11).

TEBETH (Tē′ bĕth) Tenth month (December–January) of the Hebrew calendar (Esth. 2:16). The name derives from an Akkadian term meaning, "sinking," and refers to the rainy month. See Calendars.

TEETH Hard bony structures in the jaws of persons and animals used to cut and grind food. In Old Testament thinking, the loss of a tooth was a serious matter subject to the law of retaliation (Ex. 21:23–25; Lev. 24:19–20; Deut. 19:21; compare Matt. 5:38–42). Teeth set on edge, that is made dull or insensitive, illustrates the concept of corporate or inherited guilt challenged by the prophets (Jer. 31:29–30; Ezek. 18:2–3). Gnashing of teeth displays the raging despair of those excluded from Christ's kingdom (Matt. 8:12; 13:42).

TEHAPHNEHES (tē hăph′ nēhēs) Alternate form of Tahpanhes (Ezek. 30:18).

TEHINNAH (Tē hĭn′ nah) Personal name meaning, "supplication" or "graciousness." Descendant of Judah responsible for founding Ir-nahash (1 Chron. 4:12).

TEIL TREE KJV term meaning, "lime" or "linden tree," used to translate a Hebrew term generally rendered oak or terebinth (Isa. 6:13). See Plants in the Bible; Terebinth.

Excavations at the site of ancient Tekoa, hometown of Amos the prophet.

TEKOA (Tė kō′ à) Place name meaning, "place of setting up a tent." A city in the highlands of Judah six miles south of Bethlehem and ten miles south of Jerusalem; home of the prophet Amos. God called Amos from among the shepherds of Tekoa to preach to the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Amos 1:1). The priest tried to send him back to Tekoa (7:12).

One of David's chief fighting men was Ira, the son of Ikkesh from Tekoa (2 Sam. 23:26). Sometime between 922 B.C. and 915 B.C., Rehoboam cited Tekoa as one of the cities whose fortifications were to be strengthened (2 Chron. 11:5–6). Approximately fifty years later, Jehoshaphat defeated a force of Ammonite, Meunite, and Moabite invaders in the wilderness between Tekoa and En-gedi (2 Chron. 20:20–22). After the return from Exile, Tekoa remained occupied (Neh. 3:5).

TEL-ABIB (Tĕl-Ā′ bĭb) Place name meaning, "mound of the flood" or "mound of grain." Tel-Abib on the Chebar Canal near Nippur in Babylon was home to Ezekiel and other Exiles (Ezek. 3:15). The Babylonians may have thought it was the ruined site of the original flood.

TEL-ASSAR (Tĕl-Ăs′ sàr) Place name meaning, "mound of Asshur." City in northern Mesopotamia which the Assyrians conquered (2 Kings 19:12 KJV, Thelasar; Isa. 37:12). Its location is not known.

TEL-HARSHA (Tĕl-här′ shà) Place name meaning, "mound of the forest" or "mound of magic." Home of Babylonian Jews unable to demonstrate their lineage (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). Tel-harsha was likely located in the flatlands near the Persian Gulf.

TEL-MELAH (Tĕl-Mē′ lah) Place name meaning, "mound of salt." Babylonian home of a group of Jews unable to demonstrate their lineage (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). Tel-Melah is perhaps Thelma of Ptolemy in the low salt tracts near the Persian Gulf.

TELAH (Tē′ lah) Personal name meaning, "breach" or "fracture." An ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25).

TELAIM (Tė lā′ ĭm) Place name meaning, "young speckled lambs." City in southern Judah where Saul gathered forces to battle the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15:4). Suggested sites include khirbet Umm es-Salafeh southwest of Kurnub and khirbet Abu Tulul twelve miles southeast of Beer-Sheba. The earliest Greek translation of 1 Samuel 27:8 reads "from Telem" rather than "from old." See Telem.

TELEM (Tē′ lĕm) Personal and place name meaning, "brightness" or "lamb." 1. Levite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:24). 2. City in southern Judah (Josh. 15:24), a variant form of Telaim.

TEMA (Tē′ mà) Personal and place name meaning, "south country." Tema, a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:30), is associated with Tema (modern Teima), a strategic oasis located on the Arabian penisula 250 miles southeast of Aqaba and 200 miles north-northeast of Medina. Job 6:19 alludes to Tema's importance as a caravan stop. Isaiah 21:14 likely refers to the campaign of the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III (738 B.C.) when Tema escaped destruction by paying tribute. Jeremiah 25:23 perhaps refers to a campaign of Nebuchadnezzar. Having conquered and rebuilt Tema, Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, remained there ten years, leaving his son Belshazzar as vice-regent in Babylon (Dan. 5).

TEMAH (Tē′ mah) A family of Temple servants (Nethinim) returning from Exile (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

TEMAN (Tē′ măn) Personal and place name meaning, "right side," that is, "southern." 1. Edomite clan descended from Esau (Gen. 36:11, 15; 1 Chron. 1:36). 2. City of area associated with this clan (Jer. 49:7,20; Ezek. 25:13; Amos 1:12; Obad. 1:9; Hab. 3:3). Teman has often been identified with Tawilan, fifty miles south of the Dead Sea just east of Petra, though archaeological evidence does not confirm the site as the principal city of southern Edom. Others understand Teman to designate southern Edom in general. To others the linkage with Dedan (Jer. 49:7; Ezek. 25:13) suggests Tema on the Arabian peninsula. See Tema.

TEMANI (Tē′ măn ī) KJV transliteration for Temanites (Gen. 36:34).

TEMANITES (Tē′ măn ītes) Descendants of Teman or residents of Teman, the southern area of Edom. The land of the Temanites designates (southern) Edom (Gen. 36:34; 1 Chron. 1:45). The Temanites were renowned for their wisdom (Job 2:11; compare Jer. 49:7).

TEMENI (Tē′ mĕ nī) Personal name perhaps meaning, "on the right hand," that is, "to the south." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6).

TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM A place of worship, especially the Temple of Solomon built in Jerusalem for national worship of Yahweh. Sacred or holy space is the meaning of our word temple, very like the two Greek words, hieron (temple area) and naos (sanctuary itself) which are translated "temple" in the New Testament. In the Old Testament, the language is usually beth Yahweh or beth Elohim, "house of the Yahweh" or "house of God" because He is said to have dwelt there. The other Hebrew expression for temple is hekal, "palace, great house" deriving from the Sumerian word for "great house," whether meant for God or the earthly king. So David, when he had built for himself a cedar palace, thought it only proper he should build one for Yahweh, too (2 Sam. 7:1–2). Nathan at first approved his plan, but the Lord Himself said He had been used to living in a tent since the Exodus from Egypt. He would allow David's son to build Him a house (Temple), but He would build for David a house (dynasty, 2 Sam. 7:3–16). This covenant promise became exceedingly significant to the messianic hope fulfilled in the coming of the ideal king of the line of David. See Tabernacle, Tent of Meeting.

Chronicles makes it clear that David planned the Temple and accumulated great wealth and gifts for it, though Solomon was the one who actually built it. Solomon's Temple may not have actually been the first temple which housed the ark of the covenant, since there was a house of Yahweh, also called a temple, at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:7,9,24; 3:3) but in 1 Samuel 2:22 (NIV) it is called "tent of meeting," whether the wilderness tabernacle or not. Jeremiah in his great Temple sermon warned all who came into the Lord's house in Jerusalem that if they trusted primarily in the Temple, instead of the Lord, He could destroy Solomon's Temple just as He had the previous one at Shiloh (Jer. 7:1–15; 26:1–6).

Herod's Temple (20 B.C.–A.D. 70) was begun in the eighteenth year of King Herod the Great's reign (37–4 B.C.). According to Josephus, first-century Jewish historian, Herod's Temple was constructed after removing the old foundations. The old edifice, Zerubbabel's Temple, was a modest restoration of the Temple of Solomon destroyed by the Babylonian conquest. The central building was completed in just two years—without any interruption of the Temple services. The surrounding buildings and spacious courts, considerably enlarged, were not completed until A.D. 64. The Temple was destroyed by the Romans under the command of Titus during the second Jewish revolt in A.D. 70.

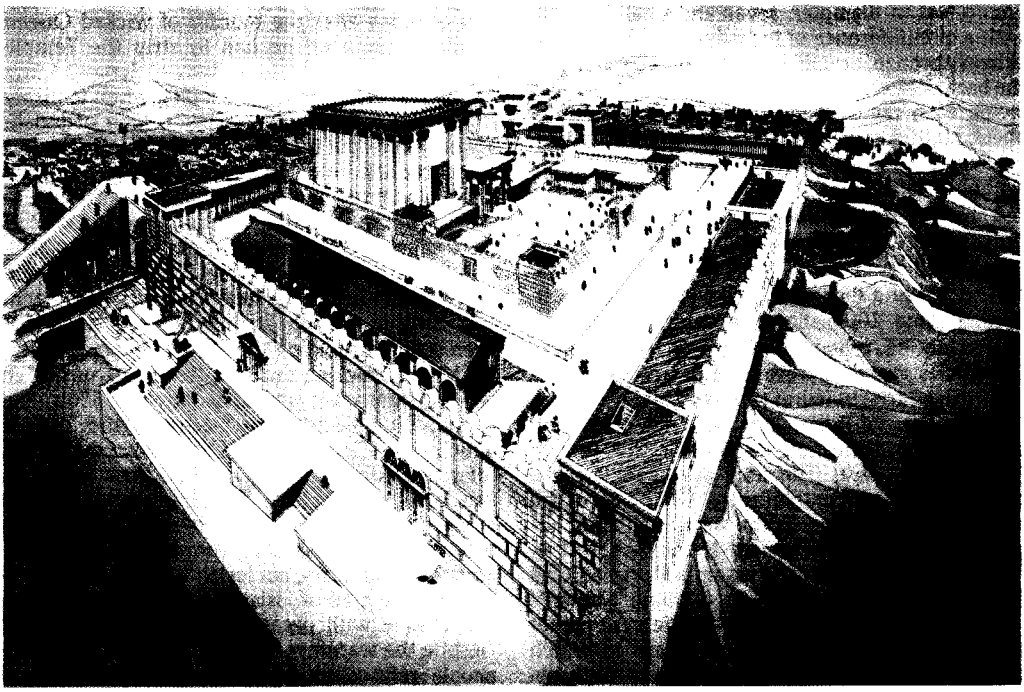
temples. It cannot be determined what kind of sanctuaries were at Ophrah, Gilgal, Nob, Mizpah, Ramah, or other "high places" where Yahweh was worshiped, but "the Temple" is the one at Jerusalem from Solomon's time.

Solomon's Temple There were three historical Temples in succession, those of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod in the preexilic, postexilic, and New Testament periods. Herod's Temple was really a massive rebuilding of the Zerubbabel Temple, so both are called the "second Temple" by Judaism. All three were located on a prominent hill north of David's capital city, which he conquered from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:6–7). David had acquired the Temple hill from Araunah the Jebusite at the advice of the prophet Gad to stay a pestilence from the Lord by building an altar and offering sacrifices on the threshing floor (2 Sam. 24:18–25). Chronicles identifies this hill with Mount Moriah, where Abraham had been willing to offer Isaac (2 Chron. 3:1; Gen. 22:1–14). So the Temple mount today in Jerusalem is called Mount Moriah, and the threshing floor of Araunah is undoubtedly the large rock enshrined within the Dome of the Rock, center of the Muslim enclosure called Haram es-Sharif (the third holiest place in Islam, after Mecca and Medina). This enclosure is basically what is left of Herod's enlarged Temple platform, the masonry of which may best be seen in its Western Wall, the holiest place within Judaism since the Roman destruction of Herod's Temple.

Notes containing prayer requests are still placed between the massive stones of the Wailing Wall.

The Moslem Dome of the Rock on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem with the Wailing Wall in the foreground.

No stone is left that archaeologists can confidently say belonged to the Solomonic Temple. We do have the detailed literary account of its building preserved in Kings (1 Kings 5:1—9:10) and Chronicles (2 Chron. 2—7). Ezekiel's vision of the new Jerusalem Temple after the Exile (Ezek. 40—43) is idealistic and was perhaps never realized in Zerubbabel's rebuilding of the Temple, but many of its details would have reflected Solomon's Temple in which Ezekiel probably ministered as a priest before being deported to Babylon in 597 B.C. The treaty with Hiram, the king of Tyre, and the employment of the metalworker Hiram (or Huram-abi, a different person from the king) whom he provided show that considerable Phoenician influence, expertise, craftmanship, and artistic design went into the building of the Temple.



The primary meaning of the Temple was the same as that of the ark it was constructed to enshrine: a symbol of God's presence in the midst of His people (Ex. 25:21–22). Because it was God's house, the worshipers could not enter the holy place, reserved only for priests and other worship leaders, much less the holiest place (holy of holies) to be entered by the high priest only once a year (Lev. 16). The worshipers could gather for prayer and sacrifice in the Temple courtyard(s) where they could sing psalms as they saw their offerings presented to Yahweh on His great altar. The spirit of Israel's prayer and praise is to be found in the Psalms and in the worship experiences such as that of Isaiah when he surrendered to his prophetic call experience in the forecourt of the Temple (Isa. 6:1–8).

The account of Isaiah's experience makes it clear that the earthly Temple was viewed as a microcosm of the heavenly Temple where the King of the universe really dwelt. The quaking and smoke of the Lord's presence at Sinai were now manifested in Zion (Isa. 6:4). Israel understood that it was only by God's grace that He consented to dwell with His people; and so Deuteronomy understood the central sanctuary as the place where Yahweh caused His name to dwell (Deut. 12:5; compare 1 Kings 8:13), and priestly thinkers viewed it as filled with His glory (compares the tabernacle, Ex. 40:34). Obviously, no one can house God: "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Even heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain you; much less this house that I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27 NRSV).

Solomon's Temple was shaped as a "long house" of three successive rooms from east to west, a vestibule of only 15-feet depth, a nave (the holy place) of 60 feet and an inner sanctuary (the most holy place) of 30 feet (1 Kings 6:2–3; 16–17). It was approximately 30-feet wide and 45-feet high by its interior measurements for the "house" proper, not counting the porch, which was sort of an open entryway. This is similar to, though not precisely the same as, the shape of several Syrian and Canaanite temples excavated in the past few decades (at Hazor, Lachish, tell Tainat). There is even one Israelite "temple" at the southeast border of Judah in the iron age fortress of Arad which some have compared with Solomon's Temple. None was so symmetrical or ornately decorated, nor even as large as the Jerusalem Temple, even though Solomon's palace complex of which the Temple was only a part (1 Kings 7:1–12) was much larger and took longer to build (tell Tainat, in northern Syria, is the closest analogy). Around the outside of the house proper was constructed three stories of side chambers for Temple storehouses, above which were recessed windows in the walls of the holy place (1 Kings 6:4–6,8–10).

The inside of the house proper was paneled with cedar, floored with cypress, and inlaid with gold throughout. It was decorated with well-known Phoenician artistic ornamentation, floral designs with cherubim, flowers, and palm trees. The most holy place, a windowless cube of about 30 feet, housed the ark of the covenant and was dominated by two guardian cherubim 15-feet tall with outstretched wings spanning fifteen feet to touch in the middle and at each side wall (1 Kings 6:15–28). One of the interesting results of archaeological research is the recovery of the form of these ancient cherubim. They are Egyptian-type sphinxes (human-headed winged lions) such as are pictured as the arms of a throne chair of a Canaanite king on one of the Megiddo ivories. The ark, the mercy-seat lid of which had its own guardian cherubim (Ex. 25:18–20), was Yahweh's "footstool." Beneath these awesome cheru-bim, God was invisibly enthroned.

The double doors of the inner sanctuary and the nave were similarly carved and inlaid of finest wood and gold (1 Kings 6:31–35). The arrangement prescribed for the wall of the inner court, "three courses of hewn stone and one course of cedar beams" was followed in Solomonic buildings excavated at Megiddo (1 Kings 6:36; 7:12). This arrangement is also known from the tell Tainat temple. This exquisite sanctuary took seven years to build (about 960 B.C.; 1 Kings 6:37–38). The marvelous furnishings of the holy place and the courtyard require another chapter to describe (1 Kings 7:9–51).

The most mysterious creations were two huge free-standing bronze pillars about thirty-five-feet tall, including their beautifully ornamented capitals of lily-work netting and rows of pomegranates (1 Kings 7:15–20). They were nearly six feet in diameter, hollow, with a thickness of bronze about three inches. The pillars were named Jachin ("He shall establish") and Boaz ("In the strength of"), perhaps to signify the visible symbolism of the Temple as a testimony to the stability of the Davidic dynasty to which it was intimately related.

The reader at this point expects an account of the bronze altar, included in Chronicles (2 Chron. 4:1), but only presumed in Kings (1 Kings 8:22,54,64; 9:25). This altar is large, thirty-feet square and fifteen-feet tall, presumably with steps.

The molten sea, which may have had some kind of cosmic symbolism, stood in the south-central quadrant of the inner courtyard opposite the bronze altar. It was round with a cup-shaped brim, fifteen feet in diameter, seven-and-a-half-feet tall, with a circumference of forty-five feet. It was cast of heavy bronze, ornately decorated, and resting on the back of twelve bronze oxen in four sets of three facing each point of the compass. Since it held about 10,000 gallons of water, it must have been for supplying water to the lavers by some sort of syphon mechanism.

The third great engineering feat was the crafting of ten ornate, rolling stands for ten lavers, five on either side of the courtyard. These were six-feet square and four-and-a-half-feet tall, each containing some 200 gallons of water, quite heavy objects to be rolled about on chariot wheels. Chronicles says they were used to wash the utensils for sacrificial worship (2 Chron. 4:6).

At the Feast of Tabernacles, Solomon conducted an elaborate dedication festival for the Temple (1 Kings 8:1—9:9). The story begins with a procession of the ark containing the two tables of the decalogue, God's glory in the shining cloud of His presence filled the sanctuary (1 Kings 8:1–11). Then the king blessed the assembly, praised God for His covenant mercies in fulfilling Nathan's promise to David, and gave a long, fervent prayer on behalf of seven different situations in which the prayers of his people should arise to the heavenly throne of God from His earthly temple, closing with a benediction. Solomon provided myriads of sacrifices for the seven days of the great dedication festival. God had consecrated this house of prayer, but He required covenant obedience of Solomon and each of his successors, lest He have to destroy this magnificent sanctuary because of the apostasy of His people (1 Kings 9:1–9). The consistent emphasis of Solomon's prayer and God's answer is the awareness of sin and the necessity for wholehearted repentance to keep the Temple ceremonial a meaningful symbol of worship and devotion (2 Chron. 7:13–14). The great prophets preached that, in their Temple worship, Israel was not able to avoid syncretism with pagan religious impulses or the hypocritical irrelevance of meaningless overemphasis upon ritual without righteous obedience to their sovereign Overlord (Isa. 1:10–17; Mic. 6:6–8; Jer. 7:1–26).

The history of Solomon's Temple has many ups and downs through its almost four hundred years of existence. Its treasures of gold were often plundered by foreign invaders like Shishak of Egypt (1 Kings 14:25–26). At the division of the kingdoms, Jeroboam set up rival sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan which drew worshipers away from Jerusalem for two hundred years. King Asa plundered his own Temple treasuries to buy a military ally, Ben-Hadad of Syria against Baasha, king of North Israel (1 Kings 15:18–19), though he had previously repaired the Temple altar and carried out limited worship reforms (2 Chron. 15:8–18). Temple repairs were carried out by Jehoash (Joash) of Judah after the murder of wicked Queen Athaliah, but even he had to strip the Temple treasuries to buy off Hazael, king of Syria (2 Kings 12). Jehoash (Joash), king of Israel, when foolishly challenged to battle by Amaziah, king of Judah, not only defeated him, but came to Jerusalem and plundered the Temple (1 Kings 14:12–14). King Ahaz plundered his own Temple for tribute to Assyria during the Syro-Ephraimitic war of 735 B.C., even stripping some of the bronze furnishings in the courtyard (2 Kings 16:8–9,17). Good King Hezekiah raised a hugh tribute for Sennacherib, king of Assyria, in his 701 B.C. invasion, even stripping gold off the Temple doors (2 Kings 18:13–16). During the long and disastrous reign of King Manasseh many abominable idols and pagan cult objects were placed in the Temple which good King Josiah had to remove during his reform (2 Kings 23:4–6,11–12). Both Hezekiah and Josiah were able to centralize worship in the Jerusalem Temple during their reforms and even recover some worshipers from the north for the Jerusalem sanctuary, but Josiah's successor, Jehoiakim, reversed all of Josiah's reforms and filled up the Temple with pagan abominations (Ezek. 8). Despite the warnings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the people refused to repent of their political and religious folly, and their Temple and holy city were first plundered by Nebuchadnezzer in 597 B.C., then burned by Nebuzaradan, his general, in 587/586 B.C.

For both groups of Judah, those in Babylon, and those still in Jerusalem, the loss of the Temple and city were a grievous blow (Ps. 137; Lam. 1—5). But Jeremiah and Ezekiel had prepared a remnant in their prophecies of hope beyond the catastrophe for a return and rebuilding.

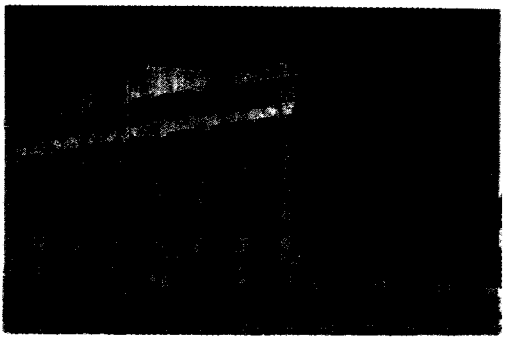
Zerubbabel's Temple The decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C. permitted the Jews to return from the Babylonian Exile with the Temple vessels which had been taken. It charged them to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem with Persian financial aid and free-will offerings from Jews who remained in Babylon (Ezra 1:1–4). Sheshbazzar, the governor, laid the foundation. The project was halted when the people of the land discouraged the builders (Ezra 1:8,11; 4:1–5). Then in the second year of Darius, 520 B.C., the work was renewed by the new governor Zerubbabel and Jeshua the high priest at the urging of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra 5:1–2).

When local Persian officials tried to stop the rebuilding, Darius found a record of Cyrus' decree which included the overall dimensions (Ezra 6:1–6). The size seems to have been approximately that of Solomon's Temple. Ezekiel's temple vision had considerable influence on the new Temple (Ezek. 40—42), so that Zerubbabel's Temple perhaps was mounted on a platform and measured about 100 feet by 100 feet with the interior dimensions being virtually the same as those of Solomon's Temple. It was probably not as ornately decorated (Ezra 3:12–13; Hag. 2:3).

The differences between the two sanctuaries have to do with furniture and courtyard arrangements or gates. As Jeremiah had foreseen, the ark of the covenant was never replaced (Jer. 3:16). Jospehus said the holy of holies was empty. It was now separated from the holy place by a veil instead of a door. There was only one seven-branched lampstand, as had been true of the tabernacle, probably the one pictured by Titus in his triumphal arch at Rome as having been carried off when Herod's Temple was plundered. The importance of the new Temple was that it became a symbol of the Lord's holiness and the religious center of life for the new community. It was completed in 515 B.C. and dedicated with great joy (Ezra 6:14–16). Priesthood had replaced kingship as the authority of the postexilic community.

The Maccabean revolt changed this, and Judas Maccabeus rededicated the Temple in 167 B.C. after Antiochus had profaned it in December, 164 B.C. This joyous event is still remembered in the Jewish celebration of Hannukah. Judas' successors appointed themselves as high priests, and the Temple became more a political institution. Pompey captured the Temple in 63 B.C. but did not plunder it. See Intertestamental History.

Herod's Temple Herod the Great came to power in 37 B.C. and determined that he would please his Jewish subjects and show off his style of kingship to the Romans by making the Jerusalem Temple bigger and better than it had ever been. His most notable contribution was the magnificent stonework of the Temple platform which was greatly enlarged. The descriptions in Josephus and the Mishnah have been fleshed out by recent archaeological discoveries.



Herod surrounded the whole enclosure with magnificent porches, particularly the royal stoa along the southern wall. Through the Huldah gates, double and triple arches of which can still be seen, worshipers went up through enclosed passageways into the court of the Gentiles. Greek inscriptions separating this court from the court of the women and the holier inner courts of Israel (men) and the priests have been found. The steps south of the Temple, where Jesus may have taught on several occasions, have been excavated and reconstructed. An inscription: "To the place of trumpeting" was found below the southwest corner where there was a monumental staircase ascending into the Temple from the main street below. Perhaps this was the "Temple pinnacle" from which Satan tempted Jesus to throw Himself.

The Jerusalem Temple is the focus of many New Testament events. The birth of John the Baptist was announced there (Luke 1:11–20). The offering by Joseph and Mary at the circumcision of baby Jesus was brought there. Simeon and Anna greeted Jesus there (2:22–38). Jesus came there as a boy of twelve (2:42–51) and later taught there during His ministry (John 7:14). His cleansing of the Temple was instrumental in precipitating His death. He knew no earthly temple was necessary to the worship of God (4:21–24). He predicted the Temple's destruction by the Romans, and His warnings to His followers to flee when this happened actually saved many Christians' lives (Mark 13:2,14–23). Early Christians continued to worship there, and Paul was arrested there (Acts 3; 21:27–33).

After the Jewish revolt in 66 A.D., Vespasian and then his son Titus crushed all resistance. The Temple was destroyed in 70 A.D. Stephen's preaching tended to liberate Christian thinking from the necessity of a temple (Acts 7:46–50), and Paul thought of the church and Christians as the new temple (1 Cor. 3:16–17; 6:19–20). For John, the ideal which the temple represented will ultimately be realized in a "new Jerusalem."

TEMPTATION Used in KJV to refer to testing, trying, and enticing to evil. When the KJV was translated in 1611, "temptation" meant all of these, but the word has narrowed in meaning in modern times. Modern translations use "testing," "proving," "trying," and "tempting." Four distinct uses of the Hebrew (nsh) and Greek (peirazō) words for trying or tempting are:

God tests the loyalty or disloyalty of persons. "God did tempt (nsh) Abraham" (Gen. 22:1). God "tested" Abraham's loyalty to God when He told Abraham to sacrifice Isaac. Hebrews 11:17 says: "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac." In Deuteronomy 8:2 Moses said: "God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove (nsh) thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no." (Compare Ex. 20:20; Judg. 2:22.) Christ also tested the loyalty of persons. Jesus asked Philip a question "to prove (peirazō) him: for he himself knew what he would do (John 6:6)."

Jesus' enemies tried Him to get something to use against him. "The Pharisees also with the Sadducees came, and tempting (peirazō) desired him that he would show them a sign from heaven" (Matt 16:1). (Compare Matt. 19:3; 22:18,35; Mark 8:11; 10:2; 12:15; Luke 11:16; 20:23; John 8:6.)

Persons are tempted or enticed to sin. James 1:13 says, "Let no man say when he is tempted (peirazō), I am tempted by God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man." Both the Old Testament and New Testament make it clear that God does not entice persons to sin, but both indicate that God allows human beings to be tempted. (Compare 1 Chron. 21:1; Matt. 4:1,3; Mark 1:13; Luke 4:2,13; 1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 3:5; Rev. 2:10.) These passages refer to the temptation as coming from the "tempter," "devil," or "Satan." In 1 Corinthians 10:13 Paul said: "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." James 1:14 says that "every man is tempted, when he drawn away of his own lust, and enticed." Persons are thus tempted from without by the tempter or from within themselves. Jesus taught His disciples to pray: "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil" (Matt 6:13). Since God does not entice to sin, this is a cry of the soul for help in the midst of temptation.

Persons are not to test God. Jesus quoted Deuteronomy 6:16 when He said: "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God" (Matt. 4:7). People did put God to the test. (Compare Ex. 17:2,7; Deut. 6:16; 9:22; Num. 14:22; Acts 5:9; 15:10; 1 Cor. 10:9; Heb. 3:8–9.) When the apostles and elders from the Jerusalem church came to Antioch and questioned the admission of the Gentiles into the church, Peter said that the Holy Spirit had been given to the Gentiles: "Why tempt ye God?" (Acts 15:6–11). See Devil, Satan, Eve, Demonic; Temptation of Jesus.

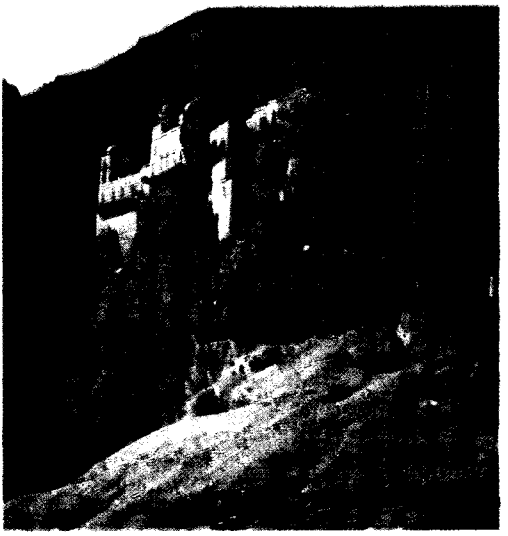
TEMPTATION OF JESUS Satan's attempts at the beginning of Jesus' ministry to divert Jesus from God's way of accomplishing His mission (Matt. 4:1; Mark 1:12; Luke 4:3).



Mark (1:13–14) recorded that the Spirit drove Jesus into the wilderness where He remained 40 days, was tempted by Satan, was with the wild beasts, and was ministered to by angels. This reenforces the Old Testament ideas that the wilderness, the place of wild beasts, was the appropriate place for sin (Lev. 16) and that when one was in distress in the desert, the angels of God ministered to the afflicted.

Matthew (4:1–11) spoke of the Spirit leading Jesus into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil. The temptation was preceeded by a fast of 40 days and 40 nights. Then Jesus was hungry. Before the first two temptations, the tempter mocked Jesus with the insinuating phrase "If you are the Son of God." The Greek also permits the translation, "Since you are the Son of God."

The first temptation was to turn into bread the flat stones of the desert, which looked much like the flat round loaves of Middle Eastern bread. Jesus replied in the words of Deuteronomy 8:3 that "man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the Lord" (NIV).

Matthew's setting for the second form of Jesus' temptation is the pinnacle of the Temple in Jerusalem where Jesus was challenged to jump off. The dare was accompanied by the quotation of Psalm 91:11–12 that God's angels will rescue and bear up God's anointed. The Rabbis taught that there was a specific pinnacle of the Temple where the Messiah would suddenly appear and jump off, floating down to earth sustained by angels. Jesus responded by quoting Deuteronomy 6:16 that one should not tempt "the Lord your God."

Matthew's third setting for Jesus' temptation was a high mountain from which worldly kingdoms could be seen. The taunt is missing, but Satan promised to deliver the kingdoms of this world to Jesus. Jesus concluded this temptation by quoting Deuteronomy 6:13 and by commanding Satan to leave. The devil left, and angels ministered to Jesus.

The force of the temptation experiences in Matthew is to be a bread messiah, a spectacular messiah, and a compromising messiah. Jesus was to be faced with these challenges all through His ministry and to the end of His life. When Jesus refused to continue to be a bread messiah, the crowds left Him (John 6:25–68). When Jesus came to the Temple, it was not to perform miracles but to cleanse it (Matt. 21:12–17). When the people came to make Him king, He eluded them, choosing instead to be exalted ("lifted up" in Greek) on the cross.

In Luke the second setting of the temptation is the high mountain, and the third is the Temple. This difference in arrangement may reflect Luke's Gentile/cosmopolitan interests to put the kingdoms of all people second. Luke's final phrase is that the devil left Jesus "for a time" or until an opportune time for further temptation. There is no account of the wilderness temptation in John. In the Fourth Gospel the temptation seems to be the confrontation with the religious authorities and His critics (see John 7–8) In John the devil comes to Jesus through the treachery of Judas, His friend and follower (John 6:71; 13:27). The culmination of Jesus' temptation in John's Gospel occurs where Jesus sought release from His suffering (John 17). Hebrews 4:15 says that Jesus was thoroughly and completely tempted. The evil one has nothing in which to find Him guilty (John 14:30).

The major temptation of Jesus was to do God's will the devil's way. The great purpose of Jesus was to follow the will of God. The evil one sought to have Jesus be a Messiah some other way than the way of suffering God had appointed. Jesus did not yield to this great temptation, nor did He yield to temptation at any point.

Orthodox Christology insists that Jesus was sinless. Later theologians had trouble in reconciling the reality of Jesus' divinity with the possibility of being able to sin and the reality of Jesus' humanity with His not having sinned. Was He able to sin or not able to sin. The New Testament does not answer these questions posed by the latter "two-natures-in-one-person" theory. The New Testament affirms both that He was tempted, but He did not sin; that He was divine and that He also was thoroughly human. See Devil; Jesus, Life and Ministry. William L. Hendricks

TEN See Numbers, Systems, Symbolism.

TEN COMMANDMENTS See Law, Ten Commandments, Torah.

TENDERHEARTED KJV used tenderhearted in two senses: of timidity (2 Chron. 13:7) and of compassion (Eph. 4:32). See Bowels; Compassion.

TENON KJV, NAS, REB RSV translation of a Hebrew term meaning, "hands," applied to projections designed to fit into a mortice or socket to form a joint (Ex. 26:17,19; 36:22,24). Other translations employ, "projections" (NIV, TEV) or "pegs" (NRSV).

TERAH (Tē′ rah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "ibex." The father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (Gen. 11:26). Along with a migration of people from Ur of the Chaldees, Terah moved his family, following the Euphrates River to Haran (11:31). He intended to continue from Haran into Canaan, but died in Mesopotamia at the age of 205 (11:32). A debate has centered on Terah's religious practices, for Joshua 24:2 apparently points to his family when it claims records that the father worshiped gods other than Yahweh.

TERAPHIM (Tĕ′ rȧ phĭm) Transliteration idols used as household gods or for divination. They are idols of indeterminate size and shape (compare Gen. 31; 1 Sam. 19:13). Some scholars have understood Ancient Near Eastern rights of inheritance as being based on the possession of these images as shown in Nuzi inheritance documents. However, the evidence is ambiguous in determining the motive of Rachel's theft or their overall meaning. Jacob (Gen. 35:2) disposed of such religious artifacts before returning to Bethel. Teraphim are related to divination (Judg. 17:5; 18:14–20; 1 Sam. 15:23; 2 Kings 23:24; Hos. 3:4; Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2). Prophetic literature and the Josianic reformation condemned the possession and use of teraphim. Translations used different words in different passages to translate teraphim. See Divination. David M. Fleming TEREBINTH (Tĕ′ rĕ bĭnth) A large, spreading tree whose species is uncertain so that translations vary in reading the Hebrew 'elah into English (compare 2 Sam. 18:9; Isa. 1:30; 6:13). The tree had religious connections as a place under which pagan gods were worshiped (Hos. 4:13; Ezek. 6:13) which were at times taken up in Israel's religion (Gen. 35:4; Josh. 24:26; Judg. 6:11; 1 Kings 13:14).

TERESH (Tē′ rĕsh) Personal name meaning, "firm, solid," or derived from an Old Persian term meaning, "desire." One of two royal eunuchs who plotted an unsuccessful assassination of the Persian king Ahasuerus. Following their exposure by Mordecai, the two were hung (Esth. 2:21–23).

TERRACE KJV translation of a Hebrew term of uncertain meaning (2 Chron. 9:11). Most modern translations follow the earliest Greek and Latin versions in reading, "steps" (NAS, NIV, RSV) or "stairs" (TEV). REB reads, "stands."

TERROR See Fear; Fear of Isaac.

TERTIUS (Tĕr′ tî ŭs) Latin personal name meaning, "third [son]." Paul's amanuensis (secretary) for the writing of Romans who included his own greeting at Romans 16:22. Some suggest that Quartus, whose name means, "fourth," is perhaps Tertius' younger brother (Rom. 16:23).

TERTULLUS (Tĕr tŭl′ lŭs) Diminutive of the personal name Tertius meaning, "third" (Acts 24:1–8). Tertullus was the prosecutor opposing Paul before Felix, the Roman governor of Judea. Tertullus accused Paul of being a political agitator and of attempting to defile the Temple. According to the longer Western text (24:7), Tertullus was a Jew. The shorter text allows for his being a Roman. Whatever his ethnic origin, he was skilled in judicial oratory and was familiar with Roman legal conventions.

TETH Ninth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which KJV used as a heading for Psalm 119:65–72, each verse of which begins with the letter.

TETRARCH A political position in the early Roman Empire. It designated the size of the territory ruled (literally the "fourth part") and the amount of dependence on Roman authority. Luke 3:1 names one of the tetrarchs who served in the year of Jesus' birth. The position became less powerful with time, and the limits of authority narrowed. When Herod the Great died, his kingdom was THADDAEUS Personal name perhaps meaning, "gift of God" in Greek but derived from Hebrew or Aramaic meaning, "breast." See Disciples, Judas 6; Lebbaeus.

THAHASH (Thā' hăsh) KJV form of Tahash.

THAMAH (Thā' mah) KJV alternate form of Temah (Ezra 2:53).

THAMAR (Thā' mär) KJV alternate form of Tamar (Matt. 1:3).

THANKSGIVING 1. Gratitude directed towards God (except Luke 17:9; Acts 24:3; Rom. 16:4), generally in response to God's concrete acts in history. Thanksgiving was central to Old Testament worship. Sacrifice and offerings were to be made not grudgingly but with thanksgiving (Ps. 54:6; Jonah 2:9). The psalmist valued a song of thanksgiving more than sacrifice (Ps. 69:30–31). David employed Levites "to invoke, to thank, and to praise the Lord" (1 Chron. 16:4; also 23:30; Neh. 12:46). Pilgrimage to the Temple and Temple worship were characterized by thanksgiving (Pss. 42:4; 95:2; 100:4; 122:4). Thankfulness was expressed: for personal (Ps. 35:18) and national deliverance (Ps. 44:7–8); for God's faithfulness to the covenant (Ps. 100:5); and for forgiveness (Ps. 30:4–5; Isa. 12:1). All creation joins in offering thanks to God (Ps. 145:10). See Psalms.

Thanksgiving is a natural element of Christian worship (1 Cor. 14:16–17) and is to characterize all of Christian life (Col. 2:7; 4:2). Early Christians expressed thanks: for Christ's healing ministry (Luke 17:16); for Christ's deliverance of the believer from sin (Rom. 6:17–18; 7:25); for God's indescribable gift of grace in Christ (2 Cor. 9:14–15; 1 Cor. 15:57; compare Rom. 1:21); and for the faith of fellow Christians (Rom. 1:8).

2. Epistolary thanksgiving: An element in the opening of a typical Greek letter. All of the Pauline Letters with the exception of Galatians begin with a thanksgiving. See Letters.

THARA (Thā' rȧ) KJV alternate form of Terah (Luke 3:34).

THARSHISH (Thär' shĭsh) KJV alternate form of Tarshish (1 Kings 10:22; 22:48; 1 Chron. 7:10).

THEATER Public drama was apparently unknown in Old Testament Israel except for possible worship activities and only arrived with the Greeks after 400 B.C. As a symbol of Greco-Roman culture, the presence of theaters in Palestine was a constant reminder of Greek and Roman control of the Jewish state. Herod I built numerous theaters in the Greek cities during his reign in Palestine (37—4 B.C.). Their presence, especially near the Temple in Jerusalem, continually infuriated the Jews. Outside of Israel and across the Roman Empire, theaters flourished. Public performances began with a sacrifice to a pagan deity, usually the patron god of the city. Dramas and comedies included historical or political themes and were often lewd and suggestive. The semicircular seats of the theater rose step fashion either up a natural hillside or on artificial tiers. A facade of several stories (as high as the uppermost seats) was decorated with sculptures and stood behind the stage. The general public sat in the higher seats, farther back, but wealthier patrons were given seats lower and closer to the stage. A large central area was reserved for the local governor or ruler. Theaters varied in size. Those in small towns held approximately 4,000 persons, while larger theaters, such as that in Ephesus where Paul was denounced (Acts 19:29), were capable of holding 25,000 or more. See Greece; Rome. David Maltsberger

THEBES (Thēbes) The capital of Egypt's Upper Kingdom for most of its history (about 2000–661 B.C.). The city waned only during the brief Hyksos period (about 1750–1550 B.C.). Thebes

THEBEZ (Thē′ bĕz) Likely Tubas, thirteen miles northeast of Shechem where the roads from Shechem and Dothan converge to lead down to the Jordan Valley. THELASAR (Thḗ lā′ sȧr) KJV form of Tel-assar.

THEOCRACY (Thē ŏ′ cră cȳ) Term not found in the Hebrew Bible, yet descriptive of a type of government in which Yahweh was king over Israel. In Israel, Yahweh was viewed as the sole Sovereign from which other authorities derived legitimacy. Passages of hope envision God's rule as one outcome in the consummation of history. See Eschatology; Final Hope.

Such a rule could be unmediated or mediated through a messianic ruler. Theocracy is shown in action as Yahweh is portrayed as the Heavenly King in His divine council, as He governs the affairs of humanity and His court. The divine will is expressed in decrees that are implemented by members of Yahweh's court (see 1 Kings 22; Isa.

6; Job 1—2; Zech. 3). Typically, three kinds of theocracy have been outlined. 1. A premonarchic form was based on the Sinaitic covenant (Ex. 19) and on the charismatic leadership of the judges and the prophets. The experience was more religious, less political. 2. The monarchic form brought a compromise between anti- and promonarchic forces in Israel. The king was Yahweh's representative and was called Yahweh's anointed or prince. He was a king, yet he was Yahweh's subordinate. God worked or ruled through the monarchy. 3. A postexilic priestly form saw both the prince and the priest as Yahweh's representative. This move reflected the rising political importance of the priest. In postexilic Israel, theocracy becomes more idealized and future looking. Throughout Israel's history theocracy was often more an ideal God's messengers proclaimed rather than a reality Israel lived out.

THEOPHANY (Thē ŏ′ phå nȳ) Physical appearance or personal manifestation of a god to a person.

Need for a theophany. The basic postulate here is that to see God could be fatal. "He said, 'You cannot see My face, for no man can see Me and live!' " (Ex. 33:20 NAS; compare Gen. 16:13; Ex. 3:2–6; 19:20–21; Judg. 6:22–23; 13:20–22. Yet the record is unmistakable that people did see God, such as Moses and others at Sinai (Ex. 24:9–10); the Lord's rebuke of Aaron and Miriam (Num. 12:4–8); and the majestic vision to Isaiah (Isa. 6:1,5). Customarily, God is not revealed to ordinary sight, God at times chooses to reveal Himself in theophanies.

Kinds of theophanies. There are some five forms of theophanies.

1. In human form Without question the theophany in Exodus 24:10 involved the appearance of a human being, for the text clearly states that a pavement of sapphire appeared "under His feet." At Peniel, Jacob testified that he had seen God face-to-face (Gen. 32:30). On Mount Horeb it was the experience of Moses to speak to God "face to face, just as a man speaks to his friend" (Ex. 33:11 NAS). In the same passage when Moses begged God to show him His glory (v. 18), the Lord graciously granted Moses a vision of Himself, saying, "I will take My hand away and you shall see My back, but My face shall not be seen" (v. 23 NAS). If it is protested that the subject is enveloped in mystery, it needs to be remembered that theology without mystery is sheer nonsense. God in His wisdom does not restrict Himself to one method of self-revelation. Notice God's pronouncement in Numbers 12:6–8, which was quite unlike that of Deuteronomy 4:12–15 where only a voice was granted.

2. In vision Even self-seeking Balaam was allowed of God to see the Lord in vision (Num. 24:3–4). Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, giants among the prophets, saw God in visions (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1; Dan. 7:9). Jacob, sent off by Isaac to Paddan-aram, was granted a dream in which he saw the Lord (Gen. 28:12–13).

3. By the "Angel of the Lord" This is the most usual form of theophany, called the "Angel of the Lord" or "Angel of God." Observe it is not an "Angel of God," which could include any of the angelic hosts created by God. The "Angel of the Lord" is identified in the accounts with Yahweh Himself. He appears only occasionally in human form. The encounter of the Angel of the Lord with Hagar is of significance in this connection (Gen. 16:7–13). See Angels.

4. Not in human form In some instances the theophany came as at the burning bush (Ex. 3:2—4:17) and in the guidance through the wilderness (13:21; compare Acts 7:30). The glory of the Lord appears to people in numerous passages. See Glory. God's presence is in a cloud (Ex. 16:10; 33:9–10; Ezek. 10:4). God was also manifest in nature and history (Isa. 6:3; Ezek. 1:28; 43:2).

5. As the name of the Lord God's sacred name represented His presence (Deut. 12:5; 102:15; Isa. 30:27; 59:19).

Contrast with the incarnation The incarnate Christ was not, and indeed is not, a theophany. The phenomena of theophanies were temporary, for the occasion that required them and then disappeared. On the other hand, in the incarnate Christ His deity and humanity were joined, not for time alone, but for eternity. See Incarnation; Jesus Christ.

The time factor Only in the Old Testament economy did God's people need a theophany; since the incarnation, there is no such necessity. The New Testament doctrine of God is final and complete. God is always present in the risen Christ and the Holy Spirit. Still, at times, God's people are more aware of that Presence than at others.

THEOPHILUS (Thė ŏph′ ĭ lŭs) Personal name meaning, "friend of God." The person to whom the Books of Luke and Acts were written (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). However, his exact identity is unknown. Speculation has ranged from the generic "friend of God" intended to all Christians to a specific benefactor, perhaps in high social and/or political standing. If the latter is true, the name may be a pseudonym to protect the individual from persecution. One conjecture holds that Theophilus was unsaved and that Luke wrote the letter to persuade his belief in Christ.

1 THESSALONIANS (Thĕs så lō′ nĭ ans) Thessalonica was the largest city in first century Macedonia and the capital of the province. It was a free city. See Macedonia. Paul, Silas, and Timothy evangelized the city against the strong opposition of the Jews; but, though their stay was short, they were successful in establishing a church (Acts 17:4). There was not time to give much instruction to the new converts, so it is not surprising that questions arose as to the meaning of some aspects of the Christian faith and of the conduct demanded of believers.

To help the new church, Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians not long after Timothy came to him (1 Thess. 3:6). This probably means not long after Timothy's arrival at Corinth (Acts 18:5) rather than his being with Paul in Athens (1 Thess. 3:1–2), for the shorter period scarcely allows enough time for the problems with which the apostle deals in the letter to have arisen. An inscription referring to Gallio (Acts 18:12) enables us to date that proconsul's time in Corinth as the early fifties. Scholars reason from this that Paul probably wrote 1 Thessalonians early in A.D. 50 (though in view of the uncertainties this must be regarded as no more than approximate). Plainly, this is one of the earliest of Paul's letters and one of the earliest Christian documents surviving.

The authenticity of 1 Thessalonians is almost universally accepted. It is Pauline in style and is mentioned in early Christian writings such as the lists of New Testament books given by Marcion in the first half of the second century and by the Muratorian Canon a little later. Some of the problems with which it deals must have arisen quite early in the life of the church (for instance, what will happen to believers who die before Christ returns?).

Among the problems the Thessalonian church faced was persecution by pagans (2:14) and a temptation for believers to accept pagan sexual standards (4:4–8). Some of the Christians seem to have given up working and to have relied on the others to supply their needs (4:11–12). There was uncertainty about the fate of believers who had died, and some of the Thessalonians appear to have thought that Christ would come back soon and take them all to be with Him. What would happen to those who had died before the great event (4:13–18)? Paul's reply to this gives us information about Christ's return that we find nowhere else. Again, some of the believers seem to have been concerned about the time of Jesus' return (5:1–11). So Paul wrote this pastoral letter to meet the needs of inexperienced Christians and to bring them closer to Christ. See Paul.

Outline

I. The Church Is Founded on Past Faithfulness (1:1–10).
  A. Signature, address, and greeting (1:1).
  B. Past faith, love, and hope inspire thanksgiving (1:2–3).
  C. Election, power, conviction, and the Spirit brought the gospel (1:4–5).
  D. Model Christian living resulted from the gospel (1:6–7).
  E. Zealous witness and far-reaching Christian influence spread the gospel (1:8–9).
  F. Earnest hope in the resurrection marked the church's life (1:10).

II. Opposition and Persecution Cannot Halt the Gospel (2:1–20).
  A. Suffering and insult do not deter Christian witness (2:1–2).
  B. Sincerity of method and purpose stand behind gospel witness (2:3–6*a*).
  C. Love, not personal greed, motivates witness (2:6*b*–12).
  D. Steadfastness and endurance mark Christian converts (2:13–16).
  E. The gospel creates enduring fellowship and love (2:17–18).
  F. A new church becomes the reward for a Christian witness (2:19–20).

III. Concern for the Church Dominates the Minister's Heart (3:1—4:12).
  A. Sacrificial love leads the minister to show concern even under personal persecution (3:1–5).
  B. The church's faithfulness gives the minister encouragement and joy (3:6–10).
  C. The concerned minister prays for the church's future (3:11–13).
  D. The concerned minister teaches the church righteous living (4:1–8).
  E. The concerned minister leads the church to grow in brotherly love (4:9–12).

IV. Problems Related to the Lord's Return (4:13—5:11)
  A. Living and deceased believers have equal hope (4:13–18).
  B. The time is uncertain (5:1–3).
  C. The church needs to be alert (5:4–8).
  D. Believers have assurance (5:9–11).

V. Concluding Exhortations (5:12–28)
  A. Respect Christian leaders (5:12–13).
  B. Care for fellow Christians (5:14–15).
  C. Always be thankful (5:16–18).
  D. Test prophetic utterances to God (5:19–22).
  E. Commit yourself to God, who is faithful (5:23–24).
  F. Closing requests and benediction (5:25–28).

2 THESSALONIANS (Thĕs sa lō′ nī ans) This letter claims to have been written by Paul (1:1), and the style, the language, and the theology fit in with this claim. Early writers like Polycarp and Ignatius seem to have known it, and it is included in the lists of New Testament books given by Marcion and the Muratorian Canon. The letter claims to have Paul's signature (3:17). Most scholars agree that this is a genuine letter of Paul written to the Thessalonian church not long after the first letter. The situation presupposed by this writing is so similar that there cannot have been a long time between the two writings, perhaps only a matter of weeks.

In recent times some have argued that this is not a genuine letter of Paul. They argue that in 1 Thessalonians the second coming of Christ is seen as very near, whereas here it is to be preceded by the appearance of the man of lawlessness and other signs. This is not a serious objection, for Christians have often held both these points of view; there is no reason why Paul should not have done so. That the teaching about the man of lawlessness is unlike anything else in Paul is of no greater force, for nowhere else does Paul face the contention that "the day of the Lord has already come" (2 Thess. 2:2 NIV).

The exact date of Paul's mission to Thessalonica is not known, and the same is true of his letters to the very young church there. Most scholars agree that 2 Thessalonians must have been written not more than a year or two after Paul and Silas left the city. The church was apparently enthusiastic, but clearly the believers had not as yet matured in their faith. Paul wrote to committed Christians who had not progressed very far in the Christian life.

The Greeks of the first century were not a stolid race. We see their enthusiasm and excitement expressed in the riots when the first Christian preachers visited them. Such a riot broke out in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5–8,13). Those who became Christians during this time did so with verve and enthusiasm. However, they had not yet had the time to come to grips with all that being a Christian meant.

The opening salutation spoke of grace and peace as coming from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (1:2). Throughout the whole letter Christ is seen as in the closest relationship to the Father. This is indicated by the fact that we are sometimes uncertain whether "Lord" means the Father or the Son, as in the expression "the Lord of peace" (3:16). The greatness of Christ is seen in the description of His majestic return with the angels when He comes in judgment (1:7–10). There is not a great deal in this letter about the salvation Christ has wrought, though there are references to the gospel (1:8, 2:14), to salvation (2:13), and to the "testimony" of the preachers (1:10). It is plain enough that Paul had preached the good news of the salvation Christ had brought about by His death for sinners, and that the Thessalonians were so clear on this that Paul had no need to go over it again.

They were not allowed to study the meaning of their new faith in peace and quietness (1:4). While they exulted in what the new relationship to God meant, they apparently did not take seriously enough the demands of Christian teaching, particularly in two areas. These areas included the second coming of our Lord and that of daily living. Some of them had come to believe that "the coming of our Lord" was at hand, or had even begun (2:2). Some of them had given up working for their living (3:6–13), perhaps because they held the view that the Lord's coming was so close that there was no point in it. Paul wrote to settle them down a little, while not restraining their enthusiasm.

The letter is not a long one and does not give us a definitive outline of the whole Christian faith. Paul wrote to meet a present need, and the arrangement of his letter focuses on local circumstances.

Perhaps we can say that there are four great teachings in this letter:

1. the greatness of God,
2. the wonder of salvation in Christ,
3. the second coming, and
4. the importance of life and work each day.

God loves people like the Thessalonians and has brought them into the church (1:4). He has elected them (2:13), called them (1:11, 2:14), and saved them. His purposes last through to the end when they will be brought to their climax with the return of Christ and judgment of all. It is interesting to see so clearly expressed in this early letter these great doctrines of election and call, which meant so much to Paul. We may see also his doctrine of justification behind the references to God counting the believers worthy (1:5,11) and, of course, in his teaching on faith (1:3; 4:11; 2:13; 3:2).

Salvation in Christ is proclaimed in the gospel and will be consummated when Christ comes again to overthrow all evil and bring rest and glory to His own. This great God loves His people and has given them comfort and hope, two important qualities for persecuted people (2:16). The apostle prayed that the hearts of his converts would be directed into "the love of God" (3:5), which may mean God's love for them or their love for God. Probably it is God's love for them that is the primary thought, but Paul also notes an answering love from the new believers. There are repeated references to revelation (1:7; 2:6,8). While the term is not used in quite the same way as in some other places, it reminds us that God has not left us to our own devices. He has revealed what is necessary and has further revelations for the last days.

The second coming is seen here in terms of the overthrow of all evil, especially the man of lawlessness. Paul made it clear that Christ's coming will be majestic, that it will mean punishment for people who refuse to know God and who reject the gospel, and that it will bring rest and glory to believers (1:7–10). In the end it is God and good that will be triumphant, not evil.

In view of God's love issuing in election and call, it is interesting to see Paul's stress on God's judgment. He spoke of God's righteous judgment (1:5) and felt that God will in due course punish those who persecute the believers and will give the believers rest (1:6–7). But others than the persecutors will suffer in the judgment. Those who refuse to know God and those who reject the gospel will receive the consequences of their actions (1:8–9). Eternal issues are involved when the gospel is preached, and Paul would not allow the Thessalonians to miss these.

But when would it all take place? From 2:2 we see that some of the converts had misunderstood either a "spirit" (i.e., a prophecy or a revelation) or a "word" (oral communication) or a letter (which may mean a genuine letter from Paul that was not understood correctly, or a letter that claimed to be from Paul and was not), with the result that they thought it would all take place very soon. In fact, they thought Christ had already returned. Of course, the glorious appearing of Christ had not taken place yet, but "the day of the Lord" was a complex event, with quite a number of features. They evidently felt "the day" had dawned, the events had begun to unfold, and all that the coming of Christ involved would very soon be accomplished.

Paul made it clear that this was not so. There were several things that must happen first; for example, "the rebellion" that occurs and the revelation of "the man of lawlessness" (2:3). He did not explain either. He was probably referring to what he had told the Thessalonians while he had been among them. Unfortunately, we do not know what he said then, so we are left to do some guessing. That a rebellion against the faith will precede the Lord's return is clearly a well-known part of Christian teaching (Matt. 24:10ff.; 1 Tim. 4:1–3; 2 Tim. 3:1–9; 4:3–4). Some manuscripts read "man of sin"(instead of "lawlessness"), but there is no real difference in meaning for "sin is lawlessness" (1 John 3:4). The Bible does not use the term man of lawlessness elsewhere, but clearly he is the same as the one called "antichrist" (1 John 2:18). Paul was saying that in the end time one will appear who will do the work of Satan in a special way. He will oppose the true God and claim divine honors for himself (2:4).

Paul spoke of that which remains (2:6) and He who restrains (2:7), and that which will be removed before the man of lawlessness is revealed. We do not have enough information to know precisely what is meant, and many suggestions have been made. Perhaps the best is the rule of law which may be personified in the ruler. It could be illustrated in the Roman Empire (personified in its emperor) and in other states. When this is finally removed, the time of the lawless one will come. But Paul's important point is that believers should not be rushing into premature expectations. In due course these things will take place, and God will do away with all the forces of evil (2:8–10).

Paul had a good deal to say about people he calls "disorderly" and who appear to be idle, not working at all (3:6–12). This may have been because they thought the Lord's coming was so close there was no point in it, or perhaps they were so "spiritual minded" that they concentrated on higher things and let other people provide for their needs. Paul counseled all to work for their living (3:12). No doctrinal emphasis, not even that of Christ's return, should lead Christians away from work. People able to work should earn their daily bread. Believers are to work for their living and not grow weary in doing good.

Timothy had just come to Paul from Thessalonica with fresh news (1 Thess. 3:2). Paul saw that the troubles he dealt with in the first letter were still present. So he wrote once more to rebuke the lazy (3:10) and to encourage the downhearted. There was a new error about the second coming, with some saying that the day of the Lord had already come. Paul set these people right, teaching them that evil will flourish when the man of lawlessness appears, but that they should look beyond that to the certainty that in due time Christ will return and defeat every force of evil. Christians have been heartened by such teaching from that day to this.

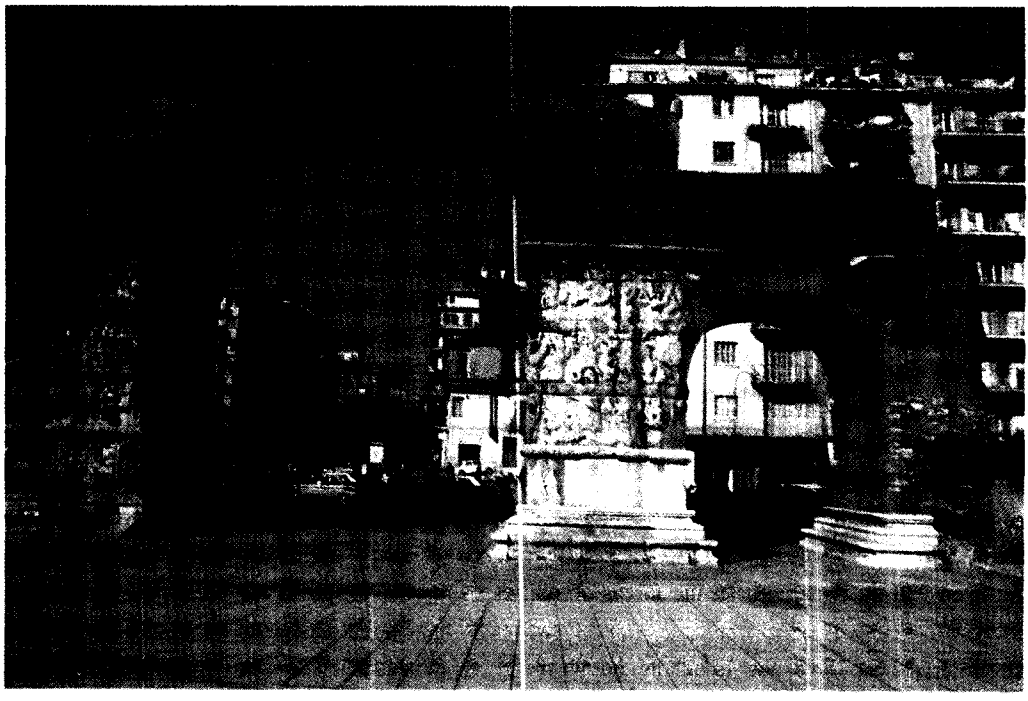
THESSALONICA (Thĕs să lō nī′ că) The name of modern Thessaloniki, given to the city about 315 B.C. by Cassander, a general of Alexander the Great. He founded the city in that year, naming it after his wife who was the daughter of Philip II and half sister of Alexander. Located on the Thermaic Gulf (Gulf of Salonika) with an excellent harbor—and at the termination of a major trade route from the Danube—it became, with Corinth, one of the two most important commercial centers in Greece. In the Roman period, it retained its Greek cultural orientation and functioned as the capital of Macedonia after 146 B.C. See Macedonia.

When the apostle Paul visited the city, it was larger than Philippi which reflected a predominantly Roman culture. Thessalonica was a free city, having no Roman garrison within its walls and maintaining the privilege of minting its own coins. Like Corinth, it had a cosmopolitan population due to the commercial prowess of the city. The recent discovery of a marble inscription, written partly in Greek and partly in a Samaritan form of Hebrew and Aramaic, testifies to the presence of Samaritans in Thessalonica. The Book of Acts testifies to the presence of a Jewish synagogue there (17:1).



Since most of the ancient city still lies under modern Thessaloniki, it has been impossible to excavate it. However, in the center of town a large open area has been excavated revealing a Roman forum (marketplace), about 70 by 110 yards, which dates to about A.D. 100 to 300. An inscription found in the general area, dating to 60 B.C., mentions an agora (Greek for the Roman "forum") and opens the possibility that a Hellenistic marketplace was located here just prior to the construction of this Roman one. In Hellenistic times there were a stadium, a gymnasium, and a temple of Serapis in the city. A third-century odeum (small theater) is preserved on the east side of the forum.

The authenticity of Acts has been questioned due to Luke's mention of Roman officials in Thessalonica by the name of politarchs (Acts 17:6), who are otherwise unknown in extant Greek literature. However, a Roman arch at the western end of ancient Vardar Street contained an inscription from before A.D. 100 which began, "In the time of the Politarchs." Several other inscriptions from Thessalonica, one of them dating from the reign of Augustus Caesar, mention politarchs. See 1 Thessalonians; 2 Thessalonians. John McRay

THEUDAS (Thēu dăs) Personal name meaning, "gift of God." Acts 5:36 refers to a Theudas who was slain after leading an unsuccessful rebellion of 400 men prior to the census (A.D. 6). Josephus knew a Theudas who led an unsuccessful rebellion during the consulate of Cuspius Fadus (about A.D. 44). Either two rebels are involved, or one of the historians incorporated an inaccurate source into his narrative.

THIEF See Crimes and Punishment; Law, Ten Commandments, Torah.

THIGH The side of the lower torso and the upper part of the leg. Sometimes the reference is simply physical (Judg. 3:16; Ps. 45:3; Song of Sol. 3:8; 7:1). More often Scripture regards the thigh as the seat of vital functions, especially procreation. English translations often obscure this connection. The Hebrew text of Genesis 46:26; Exodus 1:5; and Judges 8:30 gives the thighs (KJV loins) as the source of offspring. Marital infidelity was punishable by "the falling away of the thigh," that is, by failure of the reproductive system (Num. 5:16–21). In the Patriarchal period, oaths were taken by placing a hand "under the thigh," a veiled reference to the reproductive organs. (The English terms testify and testes witness a similar relation.) The action perhaps represents the calling of one's descendants as witnesses of the oath. When the "stranger" at Peniel did not prevail against Jacob, he touched Jacob in the hollow of his thigh, leaving him limping (Gen. 32:25–32). Jacob escaped the struggle broken but unbowed. Slapping the thigh indicated sorrow, shame, or remorse (Jer. 31:19; Ezek. 21:12). The thigh was among the portions of the sacrifice going to the priests (Lev. 7:32–34; 10:14; compare 1 Sam. 9:24 where Samuel honored Saul with this portion.)

THIMNATHAH (Thĭm′ nā thăh) KJV alternate form of Timnah (Josh. 19:43).

THIN WORK See Beveled Work.

THOMAS (Thŏm′ ăs) Personal name from Hebrew meaning, "a twin." One of the first twelve disciples of Jesus (Mark 3:18). The apocryphal book, The Acts of Thomas, uses the literal meaning of his name ("twin") in making him the twin of Jesus Himself! His personality was complex, revealing a pessimism mixed with loyalty and faith (John 11:16). Thomas sought evidence of Jesus' resurrection (John 20:25), but when convinced of the miracle made an historic confession of faith (20:28). See Apocrypha, New Testament; Didymus; Disciples.

THORN IN THE FLESH In 2 Corinthians 12:7 Paul referred to "a thorn in the flesh," "a messenger of Satan," given him by God to ensure his humility following a profound experience of "visions," "revelations," and "ascent into the third heaven." The nature of the "thorn in the flesh" has been the subject of many speculations. Guesses ranging from epilepsy (a popular conjecture of classical liberalism, which sought to offer rational explanations for Paul's visionary experiences, especially his conversion), malaria (because of its prevalence in some of the regions of Paul's ministry), and eye disease (because of the unusual metaphorical expression in Gal. 4:15) have been suggested.

A more acceptable solution, however, relates to the context of 2 Corinthians 12:1–10 where "thorn in the flesh" parallels both "messenger of Satan" in verse 7 and the "weaknesses," "insults," "distresses," "persecutions," and "difficulties" of verse 10. The Old Testament use of the term thorn also offers some help. In Numbers 33:55; Ezekiel 28:24 we read of enemies who are "thorns" in Israel's side, a constant harrassment to Israel as the agent of the Lord's redemptive judgments (compare Josh. 23:13; Hos. 2:6).

Therefore, in 2 Corinthians 12:7, "thorn in the flesh" refers more to the enemy, the "messenger of Satan," than to any specific physical ailment. The "messenger of Satan" was a redemptive judgment (as Israel's enemies were also used) of God upon Paul "to keep me from exalting myself." Thus Paul's entire apostolic experience of suffering (compare 2 Cor. 1:3–11; 4:7—5:10; 6:1–10; 7:2–7; 11:16–33), abetted by Satan and operative through the evils of this world, was the "messenger of Satan," a "thorn in the flesh," which God gave and used to keep the great apostle humbly obedient. Paul could truly say that he was an earthen vessel (4:7), one who shared the sufferings of Christ (1:5), so that the life of Jesus might be manifested through his very mortality (4:11); "for when I am weak, then I am strong" (12:10 NIV). Robert Sloan

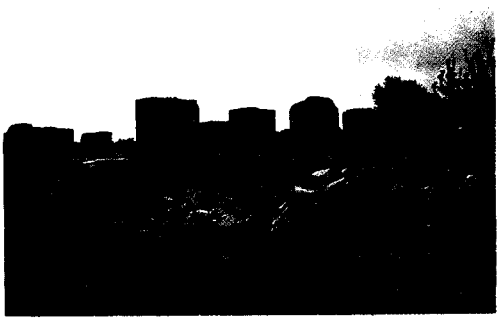
THUTMOSE (Thŭt′ mōse) Egyptian royal name meaning, "Thoth the moon god is born." Four pharaohs of the Egyptian Eighteenth Dynasty (about 1550–1310 B.C.). Their combined efforts, especially those of Thutmose I and III, did much to expand Egyptian wealth and influence.

Thutmose I rose to power through his skills as a general and by marrying the daughter of his predecessor, Amenhotep I. His military exploits expanded Egypt to include Nubia to the south and Syria, north to the Euphrates River. The tribute from his conquests allowed Eneni, his architect, to restore and add to the temples of Thebes. Eneni was also instructed to initiate the work at Biban el-Moluk (gates of the kings) known today as the Valley of the Kings. Thutmosis I had no clear heir to the throne when he died.

Thutmose II succeeded in gaining the throne by marrying his ambitious half sister Hatshepsut. His reign lasted only a few years and was obscured by the shadow of this queen.

Thutmose III marched in the steps of his grandfather Thutmose I but only after about twenty years of "co-rule" with Hatshepsut. His hatred of her must have smoldered all those years, for he removed much of the evidence of her reign as soon as she was dead. Thutmose III conducted fourteen military campaigns in seventeen years, continuing his rule another fifteen years. The Theban temple of Karnak contains displays of his exploits. He especially enjoyed hunting and was devoted to the god Amun. Some scholars believe him to be the pharaoh of the Israelite oppression, but this is not the predominate view. Amenhotep II became coregent with his father for about three years at the conclusion of his reign.



Thutmose IV, like Thutmose II, seized his position by marriage. He seemed content to maintain the status quo and clear the sand from the Sphinx where he had dreamed of becoming Pharoah according to a stela. See Egypt; Thebes.

THYATIRA (Thȳ ā tī′ rə) A city in the Lycus River valley. Although never a magnificent city, Thyatira was the center of a number of trade guilds which used the natural resources of the area to make it a very profitable site. Thyatira had a Jewish contingent out of which grew a New Testament church. One of Paul's first converts from the European continent, Lydia, was a native of Thyatira (Acts 16:14). She probably was a member of a guild there which dealt in purple dye. The church at Thyatira was praised for its works of charity, service, and faith (Rev. 2:19), but criticized for allowing the followers of Jezebel to prosper in its midst (2:20). See Asia Minor; Revelation, Book of.

TIAMAT (Tī′ ə măt) A Sumerian-Akkadian goddess viewed by the Babylonians as one of the major gods of their pantheon. She controlled the salt waters and was seen as a capricious goddess because of the destructive yet beneficial nature of the rivers and seas. In the creation epic, Enuma Elish, Tiamat and her consort, Apsu, gave birth to Anshar and Kishar, the universe above and below. According to the epic, the creation of the earth was the result of Tiamat's defeat by the god Marduk, who split Tiamat in two to form heaven and earth, a picture of the primordial sea being driven back and giving way to the land.

TIBERIAS (Tī bĕr′ ĭ əs) Mentioned only in John 6:23 (compare 6:1; 21:1), Tiberias is a city located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee encompassing today what was in ancient times two separate cities, Tiberias and Hammath, each surrounded by its own wall. Once a mile apart (Palestinian Talmud, Megillah 2.2), they were combined into a single city, apparently in the first century after Christ (Tosefta, 'Erubin 7.2,146). At this time, about A.D. 18, Herod Antipas (Luke 3:1) built the larger city on a major trade route connecting Egypt with Syria, to replace Sepphoris as the capital of Galilee (Josephus, Antiquities 18.36). It remained the capital until A.D. 61 when it was given to Agrippa II by Nero (Antiquities 20.159). It was paganized by Hadrian after the second Jewish revolt in A.D. 132–135, but became the center of Jewish learning after A.D. 200. The Mishnah, which was compiled in Sepphoris by Judah haNasi, took its final shape in Tiberias as did the Talmud and the Massoretic Text of the Hebrew Bible.

Excavations by N. Slouschz in 1921 and M. Dothan in 1961 at Hammath-Tiberias, near the warm baths, revealed several superimposed synagogues dating from about 300 to 800, some having beautiful mosaic floors. In 1973 and 1974 G. Foerster, digging just south of this area, found the southern gate of the city, having two round towers and dating to the founding of Tiberias before A.D. 100.

TIBERIUS CAESAR (Tī bĕr′ ĭ ŭs Çae̅′ sər) The person who had the unenviable task of following Augustus as Roman emperor. He ruled the empire from A.D. 14–37. Tiberius was especially ill suited to follow Augustus. A solid, taciturn man, he lacked the public relations ability of Augustus.

Tiberius was 54 when he ascended to the throne. He was a republican at heart, so he must have felt very uncomfortable with the system of government which Augustus left him. He had a deep respect for the Senate, and he took great pains to preserve the dignity of that body. Yet even Tiberius came to realize that it was too late to make the Senate an equal partner in government.

During the reign of Tiberius, Jesus began His ministry; and He was crucified. This event was probably not noted at the emperor's court. Tiberius died in A.D. 37. He was 79 years old. See Rome.

TIME, MEANING OF The chronological sequence of life and its significance in biblical teaching.

God and Time The biblical God is not governed by time because He is the Lord of time. God is in time in the sense that He is sovereignly present in all the events of time, confronting His people with His warnings and His promises. However, this is not the same as saying that God is caught up in time or governed by it. Humankind cannot bind Him to special sacred times; rather, He encounters humankind in each moment of their temporal existence, offering each new day as an opportunity for judgment in the event of their willful stubbornness or for redemption in the event of their repentance.

Both the Old and New Testaments speak of God as everlasting, but they do not participate in the abstract, philosophical notion that He lives in an eternity of splendid isolation. Western thinking borrowed that from the ancient Greeks. To the people of the Bible—Israelites and Jewish Christians living out of the Hebraic heritage—it would have been impossible to even think of eternity as a timelessness before and after time. The Hebrew words that are translated "eternal" and "eternity," along with the New Testament Greek equivalents, conceive only of endlessness or perpetuity, that is the absence of the temporal conditionedness marking every finite creature.

To say God is eternal from the biblical standpoint means that His existence brackets cosmic time. He was there at the beginning of all created things; He will be there when temporal reality ends; and He is present at every moment in between. This is the true meaning of eternity. Before, above, and beyond all creaturely existence, God is; yet He is intimately close in every temporal experience—not passively but actively—governing all His creatures and calling each person, to whom He has given the power of free choice, to obey and believe.

Because the Bible is no theological treatise, it never speculates about these facts. Rather, it presents them in passages whose immediate purpose is to call for true obedience and trusting faith. The poems in Isaiah 40—55 directly state God's creative presence at the beginning of all things (48:12–13; compare 41:4; 44:6). These words are addressed to a people in Exile, despairing that their God has abandoned them. The prophet assured them that the God who created in the beginning can create redemption for them.

Temporality, on the other hand, is an inescapable aspect of mankind's creaturely existence. Created of dust (Gen. 2:7), human beings must sometime die. As there is no limit to the Creator's existence, there is a necessary and inescapable limit to human existence. Genesis teaches that this is intended to keep people from seizing immortality and becoming like God (Gen. 3:22), to limit a person's lifetime in order to restrain and order the penchant for self-exaltation and violence (Gen. 6:3; 11:6). The human creature may not lay hold on the unending existence that belongs only to the Creator. Rather than attempting to seize immortality, humanity is advised to "remember your creator in the days of your youth, before the days of trouble come" (Eccl. 12: 1 NRSV; compare 11:8).

Measuring and qualifying time Like all ancient peoples, the people of the Bible were aware of the passage of time. They learned to mark seasons and measure durations. To be sure, they knew nothing of modern man's clock-watching and tight scheduling. They experienced time much more holistically. No evidence indicates that the Israelites counted seconds, minutes, or even hours (the Jews of the New Testament learned to count hours from the Romans). All their time units were based on observation and experience. Thus the day was divided up into "watches" (compare Ex. 14:24; 1 Sam. 11:11), measured by observation of the sun's position in the sky. They counted years by the cycle of the seasons, but especially by observation of the sun's return in its annual orbit. Their months were not based on an arbitrary number like our 30 days but were counted from one new moon to the next, making it necessary to add extra "intercalary" days after twelve months to make the new year (365+ days) begin on a new moon = month. (Because the Jews have continued this method, their years have a variable new beginning from September into October.) By far the most important unit of time was the day, the most basic unit of intuitive experience. Early on, the Israelites counted the day from morning till evening, or, counting the night in between, from one morning to the next. Because of the growing importance of the rising moon for festival observance, they later came to count the day from the evening, and this is the Jewish custom today. What is important for understanding the biblical view of time is the fact that days were not just counted, but were identified by their most significant event. Throughout the Scriptures we read of "day of rejoicing," "day of trouble," "day of salvation," expressions that commemorate a given day's experiential quality. As a matter of fact, the Hebrew word yôm, meaning "day," is the fifth most frequently used word in the Old Testament. Though used for all sorts of common experiences, it came to be used for marking special days of God's revelatory appearance, whether to individual persons or to the nation. Most notably, there was a "day" of Israel's election (Deut. 9:24; compare Ezek. 16:4–5), a "day" when God brought His people out of Egypt (Judg. 19:30; 1 Sam. 8:8; 2 Sam. 7:6; Isa. 11:16; Jer. 7:22,25), but also a "day" of restoration (Zech. 8:9–12). There was also a "day" of judgment (Lam. 1:12). A final day when God would judge the world was "the day of the Lord" (Amos 5:18–19; Isa. 13:6; Zeph. 1:7).

When the plural of yôm (day) is used, it may measure a significant period or sequence of days, such as the length of a king's reign (2 Sam. 2:11 NAS margin). Often the plural is synonymous with the word 'ēt, which means "time" or "situation" and refers to an ongoing period identified by its experiential quality. There were good and evil days or times; Ecclesiastes 3:1–8 provides a list of such times while warning that mankind is unable to discern God's intent in sending them. Usually a person's "days" weigh more heavily with evil than with good (compare Gen. 47:9; Job 7:1,16; Ps. 144:4, Eccl. 2:23). Psalm 90, which measures mankind's brief life (vv. 9–10) against God's eternity (vv. 2,4), prays that God will do two things: (1) "teach us to count our days that we may gain a wise heart" (Ps. 90:12 NRSV) and (2) "make us glad as many days as you have afflicted us, and as many years as we have seen evil" (v. 15 NRSV).

Time and history The habit of the people of the Bible to identify certain days by their dominant quality is not to be compared with the ancient Babylonian notion that the quality of every day and time is set by heavenly decree, fixed so firmly that even the gods are forced to submit to it. The Babylonians observed the heavenly constellations and made them the clock that brought good or evil. If a memorable calamity had occurred under a given constellation and when the planets were in a certain convergence, the recurrence of this heavenly configuration would be the inevitable omen of evil. Thus the Babylonians saw no organic, cause and effect, interconnection between human events. Because of their fatalism, they developed no true understanding of history and saw no ultimate purpose in human striving.

Egypt, another ancient neighbor to Israel, had little of this cosmic determinism; yet the Egyptian civilization was equally unable to understand and deal with history. Time in Egyptian thought was an endless, meaningless cycle of death and rebirth, a continual return to primordial reality. Everything new was only a new incarnation of its eternal model, just as each Pharaoh was a reincarnation of the divine. Here one finds no sharp delimitation of times, as in Babylonian civilization, yet historical event remained meaningless because only the eternal order was real.

This description, little understood by Bible readers, is an illuminating preface to the biblical understanding of time and history. The Bible teaches that people are free to act—but always they are called to act in accordance with God's revealed law. Preceding all responsible human acts, however, is God's saving act within history. The Israelites were unique in the ancient world in their belief that God had not made them with the land of Canaan, like the Egyptians with the Nile, but had brought them as strangers to settle in a land that was not theirs (Gen. 12:1–3) through a mighty act at the commencement of their existence as a people. Later, Israel became a people in the deliverance from Egypt.

God gave them His law from Sinai, and ever thereafter they strove imperfectly to be God's people and to keep His law. Because of their vacillating and backsliding, they lived constantly between the promise and the fulfillment. Their striving had historical significance because their God was present to blame their failure while urging them forward to a more perfect obedience. The people of the Bible were different because they were free in the presence of the eternal God to obey or disobey; and, in the event of their disobedience, they were free to repent and be saved (Ezek. 33:11).

Biblical humanity saw themselves standing in a present moment of critical decision making, looking back upon the records of an imperfect obedience that spoke also of God's grace and forbearance, interpreting this as a warning and a renewed promise of grace for the future. Thus the past is a mirror of the future, showing the perils and opportunities that are yet to be. This arms mankind for a commitment here and now, once and again, to decide for God.

Christ's new time After a long age of waiting and sometimes of despair, the Jewish people who were heirs of the Old Testament promises heard the announcement that God had brought history to its fulfillment in His Messiah (Mark 1:15). This Messiah eventually died a cruel death on the cross, but when He arose to everlasting life, His followers went into all the world to announce, "See, now is the acceptable time; see, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2 NRSV; compare 3:7–18). Just as Jesus had declined at the moment of His ascension to give His followers a clue to times and seasons (Acts 1:7), Paul refused to tell the church when the end would come, except to tell them that it would come suddenly and unexpectedly, like a thief in the night (1 Thess. 5:1–11), and that God was presently acting to overcome the mystery of "the man of lawlessness," which must first be destroyed. (2 Thess. 2:1–12)

Some are troubled that the mystery of lawlessness is still at work and has delayed the "day of the Lord" for another two thousand years. In spite of this, we must affirm with Paul and with Christ Himself that God's new age has most certainly arrived. Mankind is still lost, but only insofar as the gospel, widely proclaimed to all the world, is ignored. We too should be warned off from calculating days and seasons, for the fullness of time has already appeared. In His Son God gave mankind the most perfect revelation of Himself (John 14:5–11). For each human person, nothing counts but the present moment—the moment of decision for Christ—which brings the history of divine salvation to a climax of meaning in the life of peoples and individuals. Deciding for Christ in the present moment is the decisive act in waiting for Him.

Sacred time Israel's neighbors were very religious. They believed that their gods could be contacted at holy places (the shrines) and at holy times (the religious festivals). The biblical God, as Creator of the world and Lord of history, cannot be tied down to special places and special times. Nevertheless, His ancient people did right when they built the Temple and set aside holy seasons for His worship. This was not intended to coerce God but to hallow His holy presence for prayer and thanksgiving. Every time that Israel met for worship, it praised God for that great day at the beginning of their history, when He delivered them from Egypt; it praised Him also for every day of divine intervention. To keep His sabbaths and holy festivals and to gather in His temple, was an act of celebration and recommitment.

The Temple is long since destroyed, yet Jews and Christians gather in holy places and at holy seasons to continue their praise and renew their prayers. There is nothing sacrosanct about our church buildings or about our holy days. They are made holy by our intention. It seems a departure from biblical religion when the liturgy designs to recreate the real, bodily presence of Christ. Yet Christ must be present if worship is to be valid. It is God's greatest saving deed on our behalf, the death and resurrection of Christ, that must come to pass in our hearts anew. Then we will speak and testify in "the great congregation" (see Ps. 22:25 NRSV), recreating in our worship the reality of Christ. All time belongs to God (Gen. 1), but sacred times, especially set aside and devoutly observed, serve to show once again our participation in the great events of God's appearance. TIMNA (Tĭm′ nȧ) Personal name meaning, "holding in check" or "she protects." 1. Sister of the Horite clan chief Lotan (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39), concubine of Esau's son Eliphaz, and mother of Amalek (Gen. 36:12). 2. Son of Eliphaz (1 Chron. 1:36; Gen. 36:16, Teman) and Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chron. 1:51). Timna is associated with either Timna in southern Arabia or, following Genesis 36:16, Teman in southern Edom. It is the name of the capitol of Qataban. 3. A modern name for an ancient copper-mining site fourteen miles north of Elath.

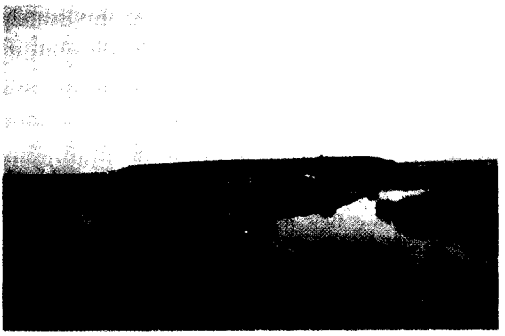
TIMNAH (Tĭm′ nah) Place name meaning, "allotted portion." 1. Town assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:43), located on the southern border with Judah (Josh. 15:10). The site is likely tell el-Batashi about four miles northwest of Beth-shemesh in Judah. Philistines occupied the site at the time of Samson (Judg. 14:1–5). Uzziah likely took the site as part of his conquest of Philistine cities (2 Chron. 26:6). His grandson Ahaz lost the city to the Philistines again (2 Chron. 28:18). The city fell to the Assyrian king Sennacherib in 701 B.C. 2. Village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57). This Timnah was the likely scene of Judah's encounter with Tamar (Gen. 38:12–14). The probable site lies south of Hebron about four miles east of Beit Nettif.



The modern name "Timna" refers to a large copper-mining area north of the Gulf of Aqaba.

TIMNATH (Tĭm′ năth) KJV alternate form of Timnah (Gen. 38:12–14.

TIMNATH-HERES; TIMNATH-SERAH (Tĭm′ năth-Hē′ rēș, Tĭm′ năth-Sē′ rah) Place of Joshua's inheritance and burial (Judg. 2:9; Josh 19:50; 24:30). Timnath-Heres means, "portion of the sun," suggesting a site dedicated to sun worship (Judg. 2:9). Timnath-Serah means, "remaining portion," pointing to land given to Joshua following distribution of land to the tribes (Josh. 19:50; 24:30). The site is identified with khirbet Tibneh about seventeen miles southwest of Shechem.

TIMNITE (Tĭm nīte) Resident of Timnah (Judg. 15:6).

An overview of Tell Batash (site of the ancient city of Timnah).

TIMON (Tī′ mŏn) Personal name meaning, "honorable." One of seven chosen to supervise distribution of food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5).

TIMOTHY (Tĭm′ ō thȳ) Personal name meaning, "honoring God." Friend and trusted coworker of Paul. When Timothy was a child, his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois taught him the Scriptures (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15). A native of Lystra, he may have been converted on Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 14:6–23). Paul referred to Timothy as his child in the faith (1 Cor. 4:17; 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2). This probably means that Paul was instrumental in Timothy's conversion. When Paul came to Lystra on his second journey, Timothy was a disciple who was well-respected by the believers (Acts 16:1–2). Paul asked Timothy to accompany him. Timothy's father was a Greek, and Timothy had not been circumcised. Because they would be ministering to many Jews and because Timothy's mother was Jewish, Paul had Timothy circumcised (Acts 16:3).

Timothy not only accompanied Paul but also was sent on many crucial missions by Paul (Acts 17:14–15; 18:5; 19:22; 20:4; Rom. 16:21; 1 Cor. 16:10; 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 3:2,6). For example, when Paul was unable to go to Corinth, he sent Timothy to represent Paul and his teachings (1 Cor. 4:17). Later when Paul was in prison, he sent Timothy to Philippi (Phil. 2:19). Paul felt that no one had any more compassion and commitment than Timothy (Phil. 2:20–22).

So close were Paul and Timothy that both names are listed as the authors of six of Paul's letters (2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1; Philem. 1). In addition, Paul wrote two letters to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2). As Paul's ministry neared the end, he challenged Timothy to remain true to his calling (1 Tim. 1:18). As Paul faced death, he asked Timothy to come to be with him (2 Tim. 4:9). At some point in his life, Timothy was imprisoned; but he was released (Heb. 13:23). See Paul; 1 Timothy; 2 Timothy. Robert J. Dean

1 TIMOTHY First of two epistles Paul wrote to Timothy. See Letters; Paul; Timothy.

Date The letter was written in approximately A.D. 63, following Paul's first imprisonment in Rome. It is likely that Paul left Rome and traveled to Ephesus. There is some debate concerning the place of writing. Rome and Macedonia have been offered as possibilities. Perhaps, in light of 1 Timothy 1:3, Macedonia could be the better choice.

Recipient The letter was addressed to Timothy in Ephesus. Paul had urged Timothy to remain in Ephesus and lead this important church as its pastor (1:3).

Purpose Paul had hoped to visit Timothy in Ephesus but was fearful of a delay. If he were delayed, he wanted Timothy to "know what is proper conduct in God's household" (3:14–15 REB). The epistle contains instructions concerning order and structure in the church and practical advice for the young pastor.

One important theme in this and the other two Pastoral Epistles (2 Tim. and Titus) is "sound doctrine." Paul urged Timothy and Titus to confront the false teaching by sound or healthy teaching. This word occurs eight times in these three letters (1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Titus 1:9,13; 2:1–2).

VI. The Ministry of the Church (4:1—6:10)
VII. Concluding Remarks (6:11–21)

Overview, Chapter One: Paul wrote as an apostle of Jesus Christ. He was writing with the authority of Jesus Himself. The error described in verses 3–4 was Jewish in nature. Some were falsely teaching a mythological treatment of Old Testament genealogies. This teaching was both meaningless and controversial. Timothy was urged to teach "sound doctrine" in its place (1:10–11). Two leaders among the false teachers were Hymenaeus and Alexander, whom Paul "consigned to Satan, in the hope that through this discipline they might learn not to be taught, not to be blasphemous" (1:20 REB; compare 1 Cor. 5:5). The purpose of this and all Christian discipline was the eventual restoration of the offender.

Chapter Two: Prayer is given priority in the worship services in the church. Seven different Greek words appear in the New Testament for prayer, and four of them occur in verse 1. One of the most significant statements in the entire New Testament is found in verse 5. Paul wrote there is "one God" and "one mediator between God and men, Christ Jesus, himself man" (REB). Monotheism is clearly taught as opposed to the polytheism of the first century religious world. Mediator is a word that means "go-between." Jesus is humanity's "go-between" to God. He is also called our "ransom" in verse 6. A ransom was paid to a slave owner to purchase the freedom of the slave. Jesus paid for our redemption with His death on the cross.

Chapter Three: Qualifications for church leadership are discussed in this chapter. Fifteen moral and ethical requirements are mentioned in verses 2–7. See Offices.

Chapter Four: Paul affirmed that "everything God created is good" (4:4 NIV). Some false teachers maintained that marriage and certain foods were wrong. Paul drew from the message of Genesis in which God affirmed everything He created was good! Mankind takes God's good creation and corrupts it. The apostle reminded Timothy to be a "good minister of Christ Jesus" (4:6 NIV) and to "set an example for the believers in speech, in life, in love, in faith and in purity" (4:12 NIV).

Chapter Five: Paul gave practical instructions concerning the ministry of the church to various groups that comprise its membership.

Chapter Six: The teachers of false doctrine were motivated by "financial gain" (6:5 NIV). Paul warned in light of this fact and others that "the love of money is the root of all kinds of evil" (6:10 NIV). Mark E. Matheson

2 TIMOTHY The second of Paul's Epistles to Timothy, pastor of the church in Ephesus. See Letters; Paul; Timothy.

Authorship The letter was the last letter of which we have a record written by Paul.

Date Paul wrote this letter from his jail cell during his second imprisonment in Rome. He was awaiting trial for his faith. It is clear that he felt he would not be released (4:6). If Paul was executed by Nero and if Nero was killed in A.D. 68, then Paul had to have been executed sometime before. The letter can be dated between A.D. 63–67.

Recipient Timothy was the recipient of Paul's letter. He had been the apostle's representative in the city of Ephesus for sometime.

Purpose The letter contains Paul's stirring words of encouragement and instruction to his young disciple. Paul longed to see Timothy (1:4) and asked him to come to Rome for a visit. It is generally believed that Timothy went. Paul asked him to come before winter (4:21) and bring the winter coat Paul left in Troas (4:13). Timothy was also asked to bring the scrolls and the parchments so Paul could read and study (4:13).

VII. Paul's Instructions to Timothy (3:10—4:5)
VIII. Paul's Testimony (4:6–8)
IX. Conclusion (4:9–22)

Overview, Chapter One: Paul was reminded that Timothy's faith first lived in his grandmother Lois and in his mother Eunice (1:5). Paul had in reality become Timothy's father (1:2). Timothy may have been a naturally timid person. Because of this, Paul told him to minister with "a spirit of power" (1:7 NIV). The Holy Spirit empowers believers, but we should be careful to exercise this power in a "spirit . . . of love and of self-discipline" (1:7 NIV). Two men, Phygelus and Hermogenes, deserted Paul (1:15). Onesiphorus was a refreshing friend and not ashamed of Paul's chains (1:16).

Chapter Two: Paul urged Timothy to be strong in Jesus Christ. Paul used the metaphors of a good soldier, athlete, and a hard-working farmer when describing the Christian's calling. The purpose of that calling is so all "may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus" (2:10 NIV). Timothy was to be one who "correctly handles the word of truth" (2:15 NIV) in the face of those who mishandled it. Hymenaeus (1 Tim. 1:20) and Philetus were singled out. They were teaching that the resurrection had already taken place and were destroying the faith of some (2:18).

Chapter Three: "The last days" are a reference to the second coming of Jesus. The days preceding His return will be "terrible." Characteristics of these last days have appeared in many different ages, but the times before Jesus' actual return will be even more intense. Paul listed eighteen characteristics of evil men in verses 2–5. He compared them to Jannes and Jambres who opposed Moses (3:8). Although these two individuals are not mentioned in the Old Testament, Jewish tradition maintains that these men were two Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses and Aaron. The evil and false teaching is to be overcome by the Holy Scripture (3:16–17).

Chapter Four: Paul further instructed Timothy to be prepared to "preach the Word" at all times. The need is paramount, for people will not always adhere to "sound doctrine" (4:3). Paul, drawing on the imagery of Numbers 28:24, compared his life to that of a "drink offering." This was poured on a sacrifice before it was offered. He was ready to depart this life and go to be with the Lord. He anticipated the "crown of righteousness" that awaited him (4:8). The letter closes with practical instructions and pastoral remarks for Timothy. Mark E. Matheson

TINKLING ORNAMENTS Anklets making a tinkling noise as one walked. Part of the finery of the affluent women of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:16,18).

TIPHSAH (Tĭph′ sah) Place name meaning, "passage, ford." 1. City on the west bank of the Euphrates about 75 miles south of Carchemish, representing the northeastern limit of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4:24). 2. Site near Tirzah in Samaria (2 Kings 15:16), possibly a corruption of Tappuah, the reading of the earliest Greek translation which REB, RSV, TEV follow.

TIRAS (Tī răs) Division of the descendants of Japheth who are all seagoing peoples (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). Traditionally, they have been related to Turscha, part of the sea peoples Rameses III (1198–1166 B.C.) fought. Some have identified them with the Etruscans of Italy.

TIRATHITES (Tī′ răth ītes) Family of Kenite scribes (1 Chron. 2:55).

TIRE KJV term meaning, "turban" (Ezek. 24:17,23).

TIRHAKAH (Tīr hā′ kah) Egyptian pharaoh of the twenty-fifth dynasty (689–664 B.C.) who supported Hezekiah's revolt against the Assyrian king Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:8–9; Isa. 37:9).

TIRHANAH (Tīr hā′ nah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Caleb and Maacah (1 Chron. 2:48).

TIRIA (Tīr ĭ à) Personal name meaning, "fear." Descendant and family of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

TIRSHATHA (Tīr shà′ tha) A title of honor designating respect for an official, sometimes translated, "your excellence" (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65,70; 8:9; 10:1).

TIRZAH (Tīr′ zah) Personal and place name meaning, "she is friendly." 1. Daughter of Zelophehad who inherited part of tribal land allotment of Manasseh since her father had no sons.

2. Originally a Canaanite city noted for its beauty (Song of Sol. 6:4) but captured in the conquest of the Promised Land (Josh. 12:24). It became one of the early capitals of Israel when Jeroboam I established his residence there (1 Kings 14:17) and continued as the capital until Omri built Samaria (1 Kings 16:23–24). Archaeological discoveries, coupled with biblical references, suggest that Tirzah is to be identified with modern tell el-Fara, a tell of extraordinary size about seven miles northeast of Shechem. The area evidently was first occupied before 3000 B.C. and flourished, off and on, as a Canaanite city until its capture by Joshua between 1550 and 1200 B.C. It remained an Israelite city until the Assyrian conquest of 722 B.C. By 600 B.C., Tirzah was completely abandoned.

TISHBITE (Tĭsh′ bīte) Resident of an unidentified village, Tishbe, used as a title of Elijah (1 Kings 17:1; 21:17,28; 2 Kings 1:3,8; 9:36). Tishbite is possibly a corruption of Jabeshite or a class designation (compare the Hebrew toshab which designates a resident alien, Lev. 25:6). See Elijah.

TITHE A tenth part, especially as offered to God. Abraham presented a tithe of war booty to the priest-king of Jerusalem, Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18–20). Jacob pledged to offer God a tithe of all his possessions upon his safe return (Gen. 28:22). The tithe was subject to a variety of legislation. Numbers 18:20–32 provides for support of the Levites and the priests through the tithe. The Deuteronomic code stipulated that the tithe of agricultural produce be used for a family feast at the sanctuary celebrating God's provision (Deut. 14:22–27). The same code stipulated the third year's tithe for care of the Levites, orphans, widows, and foreigners (Deut. 14:28–29). Some scholars think the differences in legislation reflect different uses of the tithe at various stages of Israel's history. The rabbis of the New Testament period, however, understood the laws as referring to three separate tithes: a Levitical tithe, a tithe spent celebrating in Jerusalem, and a charity tithe. Malachi 3:8 equates neglect of the tithe with robbing God. Jesus, however, warned that strict tithing must accompany concern for the more important demands of the law, namely, for just and merciful living (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). See Stewardship.

TITIUS JUSTUS See Justus.

TITTLE See Dot.

TITUS (Tī′ tŭs) Gentile companion of Paul (Gal. 2:3) and recipient of the New Testament letter bearing his name.

Titus may have been converted by Paul who called him "my true son in our common faith" (Titus 1:4 NIV). As one of Paul's early associates, Titus accompanied the apostle and Barnabas to Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1), probably on the famine relief visit (Acts 11:28–30).

Though Acts does not mention Titus, he was quite involved in Paul's missionary activities as shown in the Pauline letters. He was evidently known to the Galatians (Gal. 2:1,3), possibly from the first missionary journey to that region. Titus also seems to have been a very capable person, called by Paul "my partner and fellow worker" (2 Cor. 8:23 NIV). He was entrusted with the delicate task of delivering Paul's severe letter (2 Cor. 2:1–4) to Corinth and correcting problems within the church there (2 Cor. 7:13–15). Titus' genuine concern for and evenhanded dealing with the Corinthians (2 Cor. 8:16–17; 12:18) no doubt contributed to his success which he reported in person to Paul, anxiously awaiting word in Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:5–6,13–15). Paul responded by writing 2 Corinthians which Titus probably delivered (2 Cor. 8:6,16–18,23).

Paul apparently was released after his first Roman imprisonment and made additional journeys, unrecorded in Acts. One of these took him and Titus to Crete, where Titus remained behind to oversee and administer the church (Titus 1:5). It was to Crete that Paul wrote his letter, asking Titus to join him in Nicopolis on the west coast of Greece (Titus 3:12). Following Paul's subsequent reimprisonment, Titus was sent to Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10). According to church tradition, Titus was the first bishop of Crete. See Crete.

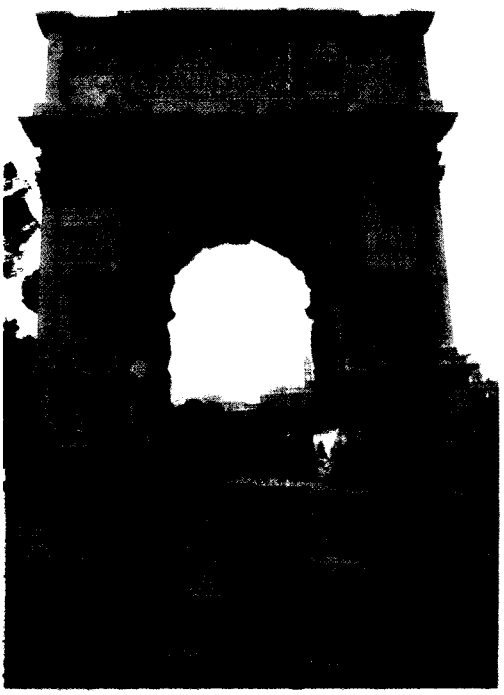
TITUS, CAESAR (Tī′ tŭs) Roman emperor A.D. 79–81, eldest son of Vespasian.



Titus, like his father, was a soldier. He served in Germany and Britain and later in the Middle East. When Vespasian left his Middle East command to become emperor in A.D. 69, he left Titus in charge of crushing the Jewish revolt. In A.D. 70, his troops captured the Temple in Jerusalem. They took the last stronghold, Masada, in A.D. 73. His victory over the Jews was vividly depicted on the Triumphal Arch erected in Rome which still stands today.

Titus was deeply admired by his soldiers; when he later became emperor, the populace loved him. He was considered an honest ruler and an efficient administrator. An adherent of Stoic philosophy, he believed that the Roman emperor was the servant of the people. He and his father before him (the so-called Flavian emperors) struggled after the excesses of Nero to reestablish stability in the empire and in the government. They managed to return the empire to sound financial footing.

Titus was constantly plagued by the activities of his younger brother, Domitian. Even though he did not believe that Domitian was worthy to be his successor, he would not dispose of him. See Jerusalem; Rome.

The Arch of Titus, emperor of the Roman Empire and son of Vespasian, in the city of Rome, Italy.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO Paul's letter to Titus, who was pastor of the church on the island of Crete.

Authorship Paul, "a servant of God and an apostle of Jesus Christ," (1:1 NIV) wrote this epistle to Titus, whom he described as "my true son in our common faith" (1:4 NIV).

Date The Epistle to Titus was written after Paul's first imprisonment in Rome. The approximate date is A.D. 63. It was written after Paul left Crete, but before he reached Nicopolis (3:12). It is difficult to determine the actual place where Paul wrote, though Rome and Corinth have been mentioned by various scholars. See Titus.

Purpose Paul wrote to encourage and instruct Titus in the face of opposition. This letter from the apostle would strengthen Titus' ability to minister because it would be received with the authority of Paul (2:15). Titus was to admonish the people to hold "sound doctrine" and to be "sound in faith" (1:9,13; 2:1–2). This theme of sound or healthy doctrine was also prominent in 1 and 2 Timothy. See 1 Timothy.

Outline

I. Salutation (1:1–4)
II. Instructions Concerning Elders and False Teachers (1:5–16)
III. Instructions Concerning Christian Conduct (2:1–15)
IV. Instructions Concerning Believers in the World (3:1–8)
V. Concluding Instructions (3:9–15)

Overview, Chapter One: Paul wrote that a genuine knowledge of the truth leads to godliness in the life of the believer (1:1). Titus was to "straighten out" what was left unfinished. His first duty was to appoint elders. The qualifications listed in verses 6–9 are similar to those mentioned in 1 Timothy 3:1–7. False teachers threatened the church. He mentioned the "circumcision group" (1:10 NIV), a reference to converts to the Christian faith from Judaism who apparently taught that the rite of circumcision was necessary to be a complete Christian. This group of teachers and all who sought to lead the people astray were corrupt in their minds and detestable in their actions (1:15–16).

Chapter Two: Paul urged Titus to teach "sound doctrine" to correct the false teaching. Proper teaching would lead to proper conduct in the lives of believers. Titus was to be an example to all (2:7). His teaching was to be characterized by "integrity," "seriousness," and a "soundness of speech" (2:7–8 NIV), so that the false teachers could "have nothing bad to say about us" (2:8 NIV). The basis of godly living is "the grace of God that brings salvation" (2:11 NIV). Evidence of receiving God's grace and salvation is a transformation of one's life. The anticipation of the return of Christ is called "the blessed hope" (2:13 NIV). The hope of His return should motivate us to godly living.

Chapter Three: Paul reminded the believers "to be subject to rulers and authorities" (3:1 NIV). The subjection is to be voluntary because the institution of government was created by God. The believers were to treat all persons with consideration and humility. Paul reminded them of their past and of God's kindness and love. His kindness and love were "supremely manifested in the appearance of our Savior" (3:4 NIV).

Our salvation is not because of "righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (3:5 NIV). Salvation is likened to the "washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit" (3:5 NIV). The washing of rebirth is a metaphor of a divine inner act. This act is symbolized by believers' baptism. Renewal refers to the "making new" by the Holy Spirit. Rebirth takes place at salvation, and that renewal is a lifetime process. All of this results in our justification or being declared righteous and in making us heirs with Christ of eternal life.

The letter concludes with some practical instructions for Titus. Zenas, the lawyer, and Apollos probably delivered the letter to Titus (3:13). See Apollos; Circumcision; Holy Spirit; Paul; Salvation. Mark E. Matheson TIZITE (Tī′ zīte) Title of Joha, one of David's thirty elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:45), designating his hometown or home region which is otherwise unknown.

TOAH (Tō′ ah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "humility." A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. 6:34). The parallel lists read Nahath (1 Chron. 6:26) and Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1).

TOB (Tŏb) Place name meaning, "good." Syrian city in southern Hauran to which Jephthah fled from his brothers (Judg. 11:3–5). Tob contributed troops to an unsuccessful alliance against David (2 Sam. 10:6–13). Tob is perhaps identical with Tabeel (Isa. 7:6). The site is perhaps et-Taiyibeh about twelve miles east of Ramoth-gilead near the source of the Yarmuk River.

TOBADONIJAH (Tŏb ăd o nī′ jah) Personal name meaning, "Yah, my Lord, is good." Levite whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8). The name is perhaps a combination of the two preceding names in the list.

TOBIAH (Tō bī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah is good." 1. One of the major adversaries to Nehemiah's rebuilding efforts at Jerusalem, Tobiah was a practicing Jew who lived in a residence chamber in the Temple. He is called an "Ammonite" (Neh. 2:10,19) probably because his family fled to that territory at the destruction of Jerusalem. He enjoyed aristocratic favor and had the title "servant" bestowed on him by the Persian ruler. He opposed the rebuilding of Jerusalem because it would weaken his political authority in the area. Tobiah allied with Sanballat and Geshem in trying to thwart Nehemiah.

2. A returned exile who apparently brought a gift of gold from Babylon for the Jerusalem community. Zechariah used him as a witness for his crowning of Joshua, the high priest, and to preserve the crowns in the Temple (Zech. 6:9–14).

3. Ancestor of clan who returned from Exile but could not show they were Israelites (Ezra 2:60).

TOBIJAH (Tō bī′ jah) Alternate form of Tobiah. Levite whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people (2 Chron. 17:8).

TOCHEN (Tō′ chĕn) Place name meaning, "measure." An unidentified village in Simeon (1 Chron. 4:32). The parallel lists in Joshua 15:42; 19:7 have Ether.

TOGARMAH Son of Gomer and name of a region of Asia Minor (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chron. 1:6; compare Beth-togarmah, Ezek. 38:6) inhabited by his descendants. Togarmah was famed for its horses (Ezek. 27:14). This site is likely modern Gürün 70 miles west of Malatya or an area in Armenia.

TOHU (Tō′ hū) Ancestor of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1). Parallel lists read Nahath (1 Chron. 6:26) and Toah (6:34) in the corresponding position.

TOI (Tō′ ī) Personal name meaning, "error." King of Hammath on the Orontes who sent tribute to David following his defeat of their mutual foe, Hadadezer of Zobah (2 Sam. 8:9–11; Tou, 1 Chron. 18:9–10).

TOKEN KJV term meaning, "sign" (Gen. 9:12–17; Pss. 65:8; 135:9). See Sign.

TOKHATH (Tŏk′ hăth) Alternate form of Tikvah (2 Chron. 34:22).

TOLA (Tō′ là) Personal name meaning, "crimson worm." 1. Issachar's firstborn son (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23; 1 Chron. 7:1–2). 2. Judge who governed Israel for twenty-three years from Shamir, likely at or near Samaria (Judg. 10:1).

TOLAD (Tō′ lăd) Alternate form of Eltolad (1 Chron. 4:29).

TOLAITE (Tō′ lā īte) Division of Issachar descended from Tola (Num. 26:23–25).

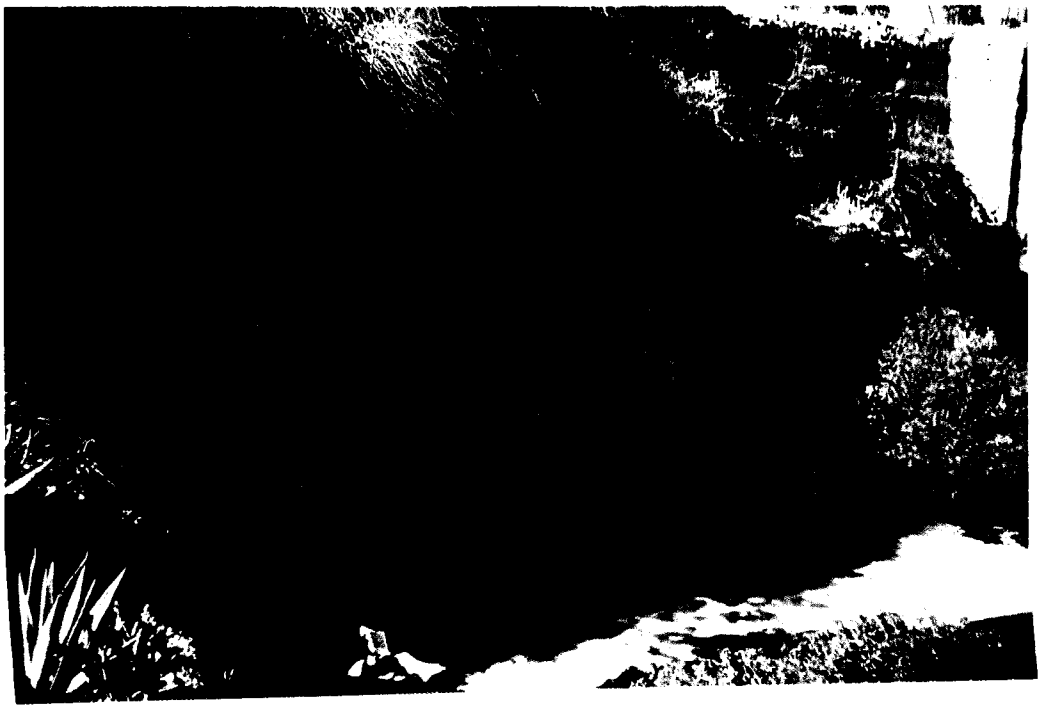
TOMB OF JESUS According to the New Testament accounts, the tomb of Jesus was located in a garden in the place where Jesus was crucified

(John 19:41) outside the city walls of Jerusalem (John 19:20). It was a "new tomb" which had been "hewn out in the rock" by Joseph of Arimathea (Matt. 27:60; compare Luke 23:50–56) who had apparently prepared it for his own family's use. It was not uncommon for the well-to-do to prepare such a tomb in advance because of the difficulty of digging graves in the rocky ground around Jerusalem. The tomb was large enough for someone to sit inside (Mark 16:5; compare John 20:11–12) and required that one stoop to look inside and enter (John 20:5–6,11; compare Luke 24:12). A great rolling stone sealed the entrance (Matt. 27:60; Mark 15:46; 16:3).



This description suggests a typical Jewish tomb of the Herodian period consisting of (1) an antechamber, (2) a slow doorway which could be sealed with a stone (in many cases a rolling stone fitted into a groove or track so that the tomb could be opened and closed by rolling the stone back and forth in front of the doorway), and (3) a passageway leading to a rectangular-shaped tomb chamber. Here the body (having been wrapped in a linen cloth) could be laid lengthwise in either a rectangular, horizontal, oven-shaped shaft driven back into the vertical rock face measuring 78 × 25 × 20 inches or laid on a simple rock shelf cut laterally into the rock with a vaulted arch over it. The sequence of events narrated in the Gospel accounts (especially John 20:5–6) would seem to indicate that Jesus' tomb had this vaulted arch.

The traditional site of the tomb of Jesus is marked by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre which stands over the site of a first-century rock quarry which in Jesus' day was outside the city walls of Jerusalem and in which other typical first century tombs have been discovered. An alternative site known as the "the garden tomb" (adjacent to "Gordon's Calvary") and containing a tomb of the type common to the Byzantine period (A.D. 324–640) was identified in 1883.

TONGS Pinchers for holding coals (1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:21; Isa. 6:6). KJV used tongs at Exodus 25:38; Numbers 4:9 where modern translations read snuffers (NAS, NRSV) or wicktrimmers (NIV).

TONGUE The organ of speech and then the language spoken (Jer. 5:15) and the people or nation speaking (Isa. 66:18). The tongue was seen to express the true nature since speech was viewed as more than just a verbal phenomenon. It was seen as the expression of a person's true nature (Pss. 64:2–3; 45:1; Prov. 10:20; 17:20). The wisdom writings of the Old Testament stressed the practical results of the use of the tongue for the individual's life (Prov. 12:18; 18:21; 21:6; 21:23; 25:23; 26:28; 28:23). Like a bit in a horse's mouth or the rudder of a ship, the tongue could control the direction of a person's life (Jas. 3:3–8). Since the tongue reveals what is in one's heart, its use had ethical consequences whether for good or bad (Pss. 34:13; 37:30; 109:2; 120:2; 140:2–3; Isa. 59:3).

The tongue was seen to play a central role in the expression of a person's religious commitment. The tongue could be used to praise God (Pss. 35:28; 51:14; 71:24; Rom. 14:11; Phil. 2:11). On the other hand, the tongue could cause separation from God (Job 15:4–5; Pss. 39:1; 78:35–37). The potential for good or bad which is part of human nature is actualized through the tongue (Jas. 3:9–10).

The word tongue is used, of course, in the basic sense of the term to refer to the organ of eating and drinking (Judg. 7:5; Isa. 41:17). Tongue is, also, used figuratively to refer to objects in the material world which resemble the tongue in shape (Isa. 11:15).

TONGUES, GIFT OF Spiritual gift involving ability to speak in foreign language(s) not previously studied or to respond to experience of the Holy Spirit by uttering sounds which those whithout the gift of interpretation could not understand. At Pentecost the church received the gift to communicate the gospel in foreign languages (Acts 2; compare 10:44–46; 19:6). God gave His Spirit to all His people to witness and prophesy. See Pentecost. In Corinth some members of the church uttered sounds the rest of the congregation did not understand (1 Cor. 12–14). This led to controversy and division. Paul tried to unite the church, assuring the church that there are different gifts but only one Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4–11).

TOOLS Implements or instruments used with the hands for agricultural, construction, commercial, or craft purposes.

Materials In the earliest periods, tools were made of stone, especially flint. An effective cutting surface was achieved by chipping off flakes along the edge of the shaped stone. The first metal tools were of copper, which proved to be too soft for most applications. It was soon found that much harder tools could be made from bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. Bronze, like copper, could be melted and poured into molds before final shaping by a smith. The hardest tools were made of iron (Deut. 27:5; 1 Kings 6:5–7), which required much higher temperatures to smelt. Iron only came into use in Canaan around 1200 B.C., about the time of the Israelite settlement. Handles and other parts of certain tools were made of wood, leather, bone, or ivory. See Minerals and Metals.

Knives One of the most common of tools is the knife. The flint knives of earlier periods continued in use even after metal became widespread. It has been suggested that the command to use flint knives for circumcision (Josh. 5:2 NIV) reflects a taboo on using new technology for ancient rites.

The winnowing fork was a tool to aid the farmer in separating chaff from the grains of wheat.

The real reason, however, is probably more practical: flint knives kept a sharp edge longer than metal blades. Nevertheless, bronze knives became the standard for general use prior to the Israelite monarchy. The blade was cast in a stone mold, and handles of wood were usually attached by a tang or rivets. Iron knives, which became popular during the Israelite monarchy, were made in a similar fashion.

The knife served various purposes and was known in different forms. The average knife in Palestine was between 6 and 10 inches, but a mold has been found to produce 16-inch blades. These would have been used for general cutting and butchering (Gen. 22:6; Judg. 19:29). A smaller version used by Jehoiakim to cut up Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36:23; KJV, NRSV, "penknife"; NIV, "scribe's knife") is represented by a Hebrew word elsewhere used for razors (Num. 6:5; Ezek. 5:1). The latter (Judg. 13:5; 16:17; 1 Sam. 1:11) were evidently quite sharp, as they are used as symbols of God's judgment (Isa. 7:20) and the cutting power of the tongue (Ps. 52:2).

Agricultural Tools Plows had basically the same design from the earliest models known down to those used in the present day in the Near East. The handles, crossbar, and other structural parts were of wood, while the plow point, or plowshare, needed to be of harder material to penetrate the ground. The earliest plowshares were of bronze which was only slowly replaced by iron following the Israelite settlement of Canaan. Early Iron Age levels at several archaeological sites in Palestine have produced examples of both types. Plowshares were elongated blades with a pointed end for cutting into the ground and the other end rolled like a pipe to fit on the wooden shaft. Plows were pulled by animals which were prodded with a goad, a wooden stick fitted with a metal tip (Judg. 3:31; 1 Sam. 13:21; Eccl. 12:11). On hilly or rocky terrain which was difficult to plow, the ground was broken using a hoe (Isa. 7:25 NIV; KJV, "mattock"). A similar tool, the mattock (1 Sam. 13:21), was also used for digging chores. It is probably incorrectly translated as "plowshares" in the famous prophetic passages about the tools of war and peace (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10). Just prior to the monarchy, the Philistines, perhaps holding a monopoly on iron technology, forced the Israelites to come to them for sharpening of agricultural tools. The charge in silver was a pim, two-thirds of a shekel, for sharpening plowshares and mattocks and one-third of a shekel for smaller tools (1 Sam. 13:19–22). See Weights and Measures.

The reaping of standing grain was done with a sickle (Deut. 16:9; 23:25; Jer. 50:16), a small tool with a handle and curved blade. Sickles consisting of several serrated flint segments fitted into a shaft of bone or hollowed out wood were typical of the Canaanite culture. In Israelite and New Testament times, sickles had metal blades and short wooden handles. The sickle is used as a symbol of God's judgment (Joel 3:13) and the ingathering of the saints (Mark 4:29; Rev. 14:14–19). A tool which resembled the sickle, but with a broader and shorter blade, was the "pruning hook" (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10). It was a type of knife used for pruning and harvesting grape vines (Isa. 18:5).

Building Tools The Old Testament mentions several different types of axes used in various hewing chores. The largest ax (Isa. 10:15) was used for felling trees (Deut. 19:5; 20:19) and quarrying stone (1 Kings 6:7). This type of ax was mentioned as a stone cutting tool in the Siloam Tunnel inscription in Jerusalem. See Siloam. A smaller ax was used for lighter jobs (Judg. 9:48; 1 Sam. 13:20–21; Ps. 74:5; Jer. 46:22). The Hebrew word used for axehead literally means "iron," indicating its material (Deut. 19:5; 2 Kings 6:5; Isa. 10:34). Trimming was done with a different tool (Jer. 10:3 REB; NIV, "chisel"), perhaps an adze with its cutting edge perpendicular to the handle. Small hand axes or hatchets were also known (Ps. 74:6 KJV; NRSV, "hammers"; REB, "pick"). A single word is used for axes in the New Testament (Matt. 3:10; Luke 3:9).

Wood and stone were also cut using saws (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Kings 7:9; 1 Chron. 20:3; Isa. 10:15). Single and double-handled varieties are pictured in Egyptian tomb paintings. Bronze was used for the blades in the earlier periods, and iron, in the later. According to an apocryphal work (the Ascension of Isaiah), the prophet Isaiah was martyred by being sawn in two (compare Heb. 11:37).

Detail work was marked out using a "line" and "compass" (Isa. 44:13; NIV, "chisels" and "compasses"). Various types of measuring tools, lines, and chisels have been found in Egyptian tombs. Plumb lines were used quite early in Egypt and Palestine for determining verticality and levels in construction. The true levels determined by the measuring line and the plumb line are compared to the justice and righteousness God required of Israel and Judah (2 Kings 21:13; KJV, "plummet"; Isa. 28:17; Amos 7:7–8).

Hammers (Isa. 44:12; Jer. 10:4) were originally stone pounders, but in the Bronze Age holes were often bored for the insertion of a handle. Egyptian paintings show the use of broad wooden mallets not unlike those still used today in sculpture work. The "planes" used in shaping (Isa. 44:13) were probably chisels (as in the NIV). Chisels were used for rough and detail work in both wood and stone. Holes were made with awls (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15:17) or drills.

Industrial Tools Special tools were used in the work of various industries. Early potters used wooden tools to help shape their handmade vessels. A considerable advance came with the invention of the pottery wheel (Jer. 18:3). See Pottery.

Weavers conducted their craft on devices called looms. A number of tools were used to assist in the weaving process. In some types of weaving, the horizontal weft threads were "beaten" in with a flat wooden stick. The weaving of patterns required picks and combs to manipulate and press up the threads. These were usually made of bone, less often of ivory or wood. See Spinning and Weaving.

Metalworking required unique tools as well. A bellows was needed to bring a fire to the high temperatures required for smelting ore. Hand operated bellows are shown in an Egyptian tomb painting of Semitic nomads from about the time of Abraham. These were used in small furnaces equipped with nozzles of clay to withstand the extreme heat. Molds were used to shape molten metal into tools, weapons, and other items. Metal smiths also used a variety of tongs, clamps, and hammers (Isa. 44:12), and the like.

TOPAZ See Minerals and Metals.

TOPHEL (Tō′ phĕl) Place near the site of Moses' farewell speech to Israel (Deut. 1:1), identified with et-Tafileh about fifteen miles southeast of the Dead Sea between Kerak and Petra. It may represent the name of a territory rather than a city.

TOPHET (Tō′ phĕt) Name for a place in the Hinnom Valley outside Jerusalem derived from Aramaic or Hebrew meaning, "fireplace," but altered by Hebrew scribes to mean "shameful thing" because of the illicit worship carried on there (Jer. 7:31–32; KJV, "Tophet"). Child sacrifice was practiced at Tophet, leading the prophet to declare a slaughter of people there when God would come in vengeance (Jer. 19:6–11). See Hinnom, Valley of.

TOPHETH (Tō′ pheth) Modern translations' spelling of Tophet.

TORAH (Tō′ rah) Hebrew word normally translated "law" which eventually became a title for the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Old Testament.

Old Testament Though universally translated "law" in the KJV, torah also carries the sense of "teaching" or "instruction," as reflected in more recent translations (Job 22:22; Ps. 78:1; Prov. 1:8; 4:2; 13:14; Isa. 30:9). The meaning, law, is certainly present in the Old Testament. Torah, for example, is used in connection with terms for requirements, commands, and decrees (Gen. 26:5; Ex. 18:16). The Torah was given to Moses (Ex. 24:12) and commanded to be kept (Ex. 16:28; Deut. 17:19; Ezek. 44:24).

Within the Book of Deuteronomy, torah is used to represent the body of the Deuteronomic code (Deut. 4:8; 30:10; 32:46), that is, the essence of Israel's responsibilities under the covenant. Subsequent Old Testament writings continue to speak of Torah as "The Law" in this sense (Isa. 5:24; Jer. 32:23; 44:10; Dan. 9:11), often as "the book of the law," the "law of Moses," or a combination (Josh. 1:8; 8:31–32,34; 2 Kings 14:6). The "book of the law" found in the Temple which fueled Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 22:8–13) is often regarded to be roughly equivalent to the Book of Deuteronomy. By the time of Ezra and Nehemiah "the book of the law of Moses" (Neh. 8:1) included more material than the Deuteronomic code. Ezra cited the "law which the Lord had commanded by Moses" concerning the feast of booths, which is prescribed in Leviticus (22:33–43). Eventually the name Torah came to be applied to the entire Pentateuch, the five books traditionally ascribed to Moses: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. In rabbinical Judaism, the scope of Torah is sometimes expanded to include all of the Scriptures or even the entirety of God's revelation.

Jewish rabbis conversing before a reverently opened and elaborately decorated scroll of the Torah.

New Testament During New Testament times the limits on the Old Testament canon were being finalized. The Jews began to think of their Scriptures as consisting of three sections: the Torah (Law), the Prophets, and the Writings (compare Luke 24:44). The books of Moses were considered "law" despite the fact that a considerable amount of their material is not legalistic in nature. The Torah was unquestionably considered the most important division of the Scriptures. The Sadducees, in fact, accepted only the Torah as inspired Scripture. The same is true of the Samaritans who considered themselves God's true chosen people.

In the New Testament period, Torah was more than merely a section of the Scriptures; it became central to Judaism. The will of God was seen as embodied in the observance of the law. Pious Jews, therefore, needed some elaboration on the commands contained in the Torah to determine more precisely their obligation, and the interpretation of various passages became the subject of much debate. The traditions of the Pharisees went far beyond the bounds of the law as spelled out in the Torah. These traditions became for them the oral Torah, considered given to Moses at Mount Sinai to accompany the written law. Jesus scathingly denounced the Pharisees' placing their tradition above the intent of the law (Mark 7:8–13). Jesus never denied the authority of the Torah, but denounced the elevation of ritual concerns above "weightier matters of the law: justice and mercy and faith" (Matt. 23:23 NRSV). Some of the precepts of the law, according to Jesus, were provided because of humanity's nature and fall short of God's perfect will (Matt. 5:33–37; 19:8–9). For true believers, Jesus demanded a commitment which went far beyond the supposed righteousness gained by keeping the law (Luke 18:18–23).

The apostle Paul preached justification by faith rather than by the keeping of the law. Thus, he had much to say about Torah. Torah, according to Paul, would lead to life if it were actually practiced (Rom. 10:5), but such practice is impossible (Rom. 3:20). The effect of the law has been to manifest a knowledge of sin and bring about its increase (Rom. 3:20; 5:20; 7:5,7–11; 1 Cor. 15:56). Mankind was thus consigned to sin and God's resulting wrath (Rom. 4:14; Gal. 3:22) which set the stage for the revelation of God's grace through Christ (Rom. 3:21–26; Gal. 3:22–25). For Paul, Torah epitomized the old covenant, with the law written on stone (2 Cor. 3:7). In the superior new covenant, the law is in the Spirit (2 Cor. 3:6), written on the hearts of believers (compare Jer. 31:33). Believers are not subject to the Torah (Gal. 5:18), but by walking "in the Spirit" (Rom. 8:4; Gal. 5:16) they produce fruits which transcend (Gal. 5:22–25) and fulfill the essence of the law (Rom. 13:8–10; Gal. 5:14; compare Matt. 22:37–40). See Law; Pentateuch.

TORCH Long pole with cloths dipped in oil wrapped around one end used as a light. The Greek lampas is generally rendered torch (John 18:3; Rev. 4:5; 8:10), unless the context suggests the translation "lamp" (Acts 20:8). The lamps of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt. 25:1–8) were perhaps torches.

TORTOISE See Animals.

TOSEPHTA The Hebrew term tosafah and its Aramaic parallel tosephta denote a collection of additional rabbinic opinion arranged in the order of the Mishnah of Judah ha-Nasi. It may be regarded as a collected appendix to the Mishnah. In its current form, the Tosephta was probably edited about the end of the fourth century A.D. It was compiled in Palestine at about the same time as the Jerusalem Talmud. The intent of the editor seems to have been to "update" or further supplement the Mishnah with reference to new case law developed over the two centuries that separated the two works. Its existence shows the development in the legal system of the rabbis of Palestine as they sought to adapt the law orally to new and changing social and religious conditions. See Mishnah; Talmud.

TOU (Tō′ ū) Alternate form of Toi (1 Chron. 18:9–10).

TOW Short, broken fibers of flax, known to be easily broken and highly flammable, used as a figure for weakness and transience (Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31; 43:17).

TOWER A tall edifice erected so watchmen could guard pastures, vineyards, and cities. Towers ranged from small one-room structures to entire fortresses. Archaeological remains confirm the wide usage of towers from the earliest times. Most were made of stones, although some wooden towers have been unearthed. The word is used figuratively of God's salvation in 2 Samuel 22:51, indicating the strength of the Lord's action. For references in Jeremiah 6:27, see Assayer.

TRACHONITIS (Trăch o nī′ tĭs) Place name

Ruins of the city walls of the ancient city of Perga showing the remains of a defense tower.

meaning "heap of stones." A political and geographic district in northern Palestine on the east side of the Jordan River (Luke 3:1). Its terrain was rugged and best suited to raising sheep and goats. The area was almost totally devoid of timber. During John the Baptist's ministry Trachonitis was ruled by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas. Known as Bashan in the Old Testament (Amos 4:1), it was just south of Damascus. See Bashan; Herods; Philip.

TRADITION Little thought is generally given by the beginning Bible student to the consideration of how the written text of the Bible came to us. If any thought is given at all, it is generally assumed that God handed the text to an individual (or group of individuals), and it has thus been passed on to us. A more thorough study of the biblical text, however, has led to the conclusion that behind a great deal of the written text of the Bible stands a long stream of tradition. Jeremiah admonished his people to look for the ancient ways in order to find the way of properly living with God (Jer. 6:16). His proclamation was that their long-standing tradition should have offered a proper guide for life.

Oral tradition appears to be the foundation of many written texts. A study of the New Testament helps us to realize that it was at least ten to twenty years after the death of Jesus before any of the Gospels were written. Prior to the writing of the first Gospel, the sermons of the apostles and many of the letters of Paul had been written. Yet during that time, the early Christians clearly knew a great deal about the life and ministry of Jesus. This information was passed on by word of mouth, becoming the traditions upon which the writers of the Gospels ultimately drew. Paul frequently referred to the traditions which he had received and which he passed on to the churches (1 Cor. 11:23–25; 15:3–7). He also pointed out some things which he had not received from tradition (compare Gal. 1:11–12.)

The evidence for ancient oral traditions is even stronger in the Old Testament. The entire collection of the books of the prophets is made up of material which was originally spoken (preached). It generally appears that their sermons were passed on and remembered orally for a considerable period of time before they were ever written. Jeremiah had obviously preached for many years before his sermons were first written. At that time, he employed Baruch the scribe to record his sermons as the prophet dictated them (Jer. 36:1–4). Isaiah also appeared to have ordered his disciples to collect his messages for some future time (Isa. 8:16). This evidence can be multiplied many times.

Since the work of Herman Gunkel in the early part of the twentieth century, most Old Testament scholars have almost universally accepted the idea that many Old Testament texts had a long history of oral transmission before they were ever written. To a contemporary student, such a thought often appears to make such texts suspect. However, anyone who has tried to hurry through a favorite bedtime story with a child will recognize that audiences familiar with a story ensure its accurate transmission.

It appears that the narratives were first used around campfires or in religious rituals. Either type of use is highly structured and deeply tinged with emotions which would guard the accuracy of their use. At the same time, even as a contemporary interpreter will take an old text and apply it to a new situation, these old traditions apparently were frequently retold to apply to the new situations which the people of Israel faced. (A comparative study of 1 and 2 Kings and 1 and 2 Chronicles makes it appear that such may also have been done with written texts as well.)

Oral traditions appear to have had their origin in the life needs of the community of faith. The German term Sitz im Leben (life situation) is normally applied to this. The point is simply that oral traditions arose, were preserved, and were passed on because the life needs of the community were being met. This recognizes that people hold on to those things which are meaningful and meet their life needs. (God used processes which met human needs to preserve His inspired Word.) The verses of Scripture which a person memorizes and treasures are held onto for precisely the same reasons.

Such traditions, then, clearly had their origin in historical situations. The children of Abraham held onto the stories of their ancestors because they heard God speak to them through those events, guiding them in facing similar situations. They also held on to other parts of the story as the basis for their faith that God's promised blessings were ultimately going to be fulfilled for them.

On the other hand, other types of materials were preserved because they aided in the human approach to God in worship. Here again, it was the human need to worship and serve which gave the basis for preserving and passing on material which helped them meet those needs.

These ancient traditions, then, were inspired by God to meet human need in real life experiences. They were preserved and passed on precisely because they had a very specific life setting, helping people to face life as it was with the strength of God to sustain them every day. Such traditions made it easier to understand what God was doing because they could hear Him speak through what He had done in other life situations.

Furthermore, study of these ancient traditions makes it obvious that materials which were used in similar life situations were generally preserved and passed on in similar "literary" forms. The use of common forms or outlines for similar kinds of material made it even easier to maintain the accuracy of transmitting the traditions.

The traditions of Israel and of the early Christians were obviously used by the worshiping communities as a means of maintaining and transmitting their faith. In the Old Testament these were apparently collected and preserved at the various shrines where Israel worshiped. In the New Testament, this was done among the many scattered congregations.

A comparison of Psalms 14 and 53 can be seen to illustrate this process. The two psalms are almost wholly identical. Yet the name for God in Psalm 14 is Lord (Hebrew, Yahweh) and in Psalm 53, God (Hebrew, Elohim; compare NAS). It appears from other studies that Yahweh was preferred in Judah and at the Jerusalem Temple while Elohim was preferred in the Northern Kingdom of Israel, possibly at Bethel. It appears that this particular psalm was a favorite among Hebrew worshipers. However, when the kingdom divided, one nation preserved it with one divine name while the other used the tradition to meet their own particular needs with the other name for God. Each worshiping community was inspired to use the same hymn to worship God, but they used it with their own particular name for God. The same types of processes appear to be demonstrable in other instances.

Further, such worshiping communities also appear to have preserved those particular traditions which were most meaningful to them. Thus Jerusalem, the City of David, appears to have had major interests in the Davidic traditions. Bethel, on the other hand, was significantly involved in the life of Jacob. It appears that traditions concerning Jacob had a very special meaning to those who worshiped at Bethel. Paul clearly referred to conflicting traditions and allegiances at Corinth (1 Cor. 1:10–12). Such conflicts arose as the worshiping community sought to assimilate a variety of traditions into one tradition.

Obviously, in the Old Testament all the traditions of the various worship centers and worshiping communities ultimately were assimilated in Jerusalem. In the ongoing history of the nation, all other shrines ultimately passed away as the nation finally centered its entire worship experience upon the Jerusalem Temple. The New Testament experience was different in that the Christians' worship did not shrink inward to one place but spread outward to many. It was the New Testament itself which became the focal point of New Testament traditions rather than any specific worship center.

Oral traditions were recorded as written traditions at certain critical points in history. This is particularly true in the Old Testament era. It appears that the worshiping communities were generally quite content to use their traditions in predominantly oral form until a crisis arose which threatened their continuity. This contentment with things as they were was probably bolstered by the fact that reading and writing were skills limited primarily to the professional scribes in Old Testament times. Everyone could handle oral tradition, only a few could handle written traditions.

However, when historical crises arose which threatened the continued stability or existence of a worship center or of a worshiping community, then it appears that the traditions were committed to writing lest they be lost. Such situations arose when the nation divided following the reign of Solomon, when the Northern Kingdom fell before Assyria, and when Jerusalem fell under the onslaught of Babylon. At such times, there appear to have been large scale writings of traditions.

It appears that the New Testament traditions were written under the impetus of historical crises, but these were of a different nature. The Gospels were apparently written when those who had known Jesus in person began to die. There appears to have been a fear that the traditions would be lost unless they were recorded for future believers. Other New Testament materials were written to meet the crises of missions and evangelism. More people could read and write by this time. The written materials allowed people to receive the good news who had never heard a Christian preacher. As always, the handling of these materials was done under the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit.

The study of the transmission of these ancient traditions allows us to perceive the human dimension of the transmission of biblical materials as well as come to a deeper understanding of the nature of God's inspiration. The common characteristics of material preserved at specific worship centers allow us to identify many of their interests, concerns, and historical roots. On the other hand, the differences between traditions sometimes give an even greater insight into the basic human issues with which those who transmitted particular traditions were concerned. As an illustration, note that Mark says of the woman who had been plagued by the issue of blood that she had spent all her money on physicians yet had steadily gotten worse (Mark 5:25–26). Luke, on the other hand, left out that bit of a sarcastic criticism of doctors (Luke 8:43). The difference in the way these two writers handled the same tradition reveals Luke's human sympathetic concern with doctors. This adds depth to our understanding of the man who was himself a physician.

This kind of study has left us with both a deeper understanding of the practices by which God has inspired, recorded, and preserved His Word and a greater awareness of the fact that God worked with human beings who had all of the feelings and concerns to which humanity is heir. The biblical traditions are rooted and grounded in the divine meeting of human need. They have their basis in real-life situations and were preserved by a living, worshiping community. This allows these same traditions better to meet present human need in the real-life situations of contemporary communities of faith. TRAIN KJV used train to refer to the part of a robe that trails behind the wearer (Isa. 6:1).

TRANCE Translation of the Greek term which literally means a change of place. The term came to mean a mental state of a person who experienced an intense emotional reaction to stimuli that were perceived as originating outside the person, the results of which were visual or auditory sensations or other impressions of the senses.

Trance is descriptive of an experience in which a person received a revelation by supernatural means (Acts 10:10; 11:5; 22:17). In these instances, the author of Acts, in reference to the experiences of Peter and Paul, seemed to be interested in showing that the trance was only a vehicle for a revelation from God. Luke illustrated that the trances that Peter and Paul experienced "happened" to them and were not self induced. The distinctions between "trance," "dream" and "vision" are not always clear. TRANSFIGURATION, THE The transformation of Jesus in His appearance with Moses and Elijah before Peter, James, and John (Matt. 17:1–13; Mark 9:1–13; Luke 9:28–36; compare 2 Peter 1:16–18).

The Accounts The event took place shortly after the confession at Caesarea Philippi, the first passion prediction, and a discourse on the cost of discipleship. Jesus took Peter, James, and John to a mountain where the event took place. Jesus' personal appearance and that of His garments were changed. Moses and Elijah appeared and talked with Jesus. Peter said it was good to be there, and they should build three booths. A cloud came over them, and God spoke from the cloud identifying Jesus as His Son (compare the voice at the baptism) and commanding the disciples to hear Him. When the cloud lifted, Jesus was alone with the disciples, who were afraid. Jesus told the disciples to tell no one.

Aside from minor differences in wording, Mark alone states that Jesus' garments became so white that no bleacher could brighten them and that Peter did not know what to say. Also Mark alone has no reference to a change in Jesus' face. Matthew alone indicates that God expressed His pleasure with Jesus, that the disciples fell on their faces, and that Jesus touched them to get them up. Instead of the six days of Matthew and Mark, Luke has about eight days. He alone indicated that Jesus and the disciples were praying, that Moses and Elijah conversed with Jesus about His coming death, that the disciples were sleepy, and that they saw Jesus' glory. Luke alone has "chosen" rather than "beloved Son." In Matthew, Jesus is addressed as Lord, in Mark as Rabbi, and in Luke as Master.

The Nature of the Event It has often been claimed that the story is a misplaced resurrection appearance; but it is Moses and Elijah, not Jesus, who appear, and there is no reference to them or a voice from heaven in any other resurrection account. Others have claimed that the transfiguration was not an objective but a visionary experience. This is possible, but there is no more of the miraculous in three different disciples actually having similar visions than in a historical event, which is certainly what the writers described.

The Place The traditional site is Mount Tabor in lower Galilee, but it is not a high mountain (only 1,850 feet) and was probably fortified and inaccessible in Jesus' day. Much more likely is Mount Hermon (9,100 feet) to the north of Caesarea Philippi. See Hermon.

Meaning A mountain in the Bible is often a place of revelation. Moses and Elijah represented the law and the prophets respectively, which testify to but must give way to Jesus. (The latter is the reason why Peter's suggestion was improper.) Moses and Elijah themselves were heralds of the Messiah (Deut. 18:15; Mal. 4:5–6). The three booths suggest the Feast of the Tabernacles which symbolizes a new situation, a new age. Clouds represent divine presence. The close connection of the transfiguration with the confession and passion prediction is significant. The Messiah must suffer; but glorification and enthronement, not suffering, is His ultimate fate. These involve resurrection, ascension, and return in glory. The disciples needed the reassurance of the transfiguration as they contemplated Jesus' death and their future sufferings. See Jesus, Life and Ministry.

TRANSJORDAN Area immediately east of Jordan River settled by Reuben, Gad, half of Manasseh, Edom, Moab, and Amon. The most prominent topographical feature of Palestine is the Jordan River Valley, referred to in the Old Testament as the "Arabah" and called today, in Arabic, the Ghōr. This valley represents a huge geographical fault line which is prominent also in Lebanon, where it creates the Beqa'a Valley, continues southward from Palestine to form the Red Sea, and extends even as far as Mozambique in east Africa. Center stage of the biblical narrative is the hill country west of the Jordan where most of the Israelite tribes were settled and where the famous cities of Samaria, Shechem, Jerusalem, and Hebron were sited. See Jordan, Palestine.

The highlands east of the Jordan also played a significant role, especially during Old Testament times. Transjordan included: The River Jabbok, scene of the account of Jacob's wrestling on his return from Aram (Gen. 32:22–32); the Plains of Moab, where the Israelites are said to have camped following their Exodus from Egypt and where Baalam prophesied, and Mount Nebo, from which Moses viewed the Promised Land, (Num. 22:1—24:25; Deut. 34). Three Transjordanian kingoms (Ammon, Moab, and Edom) were contemporary with the two Hebrew kingdoms (Israel and Judah) sometimes as allies, sometimes as enemies (1 Sam. 11; 14:47; 2 Sam. 8:12; 10; 2 Kings 3; Amos 1:11—2:3). The prophet Elijah was from Tishbi, a town in the Transjordanian territory of Gilead (1 Kings 17:1). Other Israelite prophets and poets often referred to the territories and peoples of the Transjordan. See, for example, the allusions in Amos 4:1 and Psalm 22:12 to the cows and bulls of Bashan.

The vast Arabian Desert stretches southeastward from the geological fault line described above. The Transjordan which figures in the biblical narratives is not the whole desert expanse, but rather the north-south strip of highlands sandwiched between the Jordan Valley and the desert. This strip of highlands receives abundant rainfall from the Mediterranean winds during the winter months, which allows farming and cattle grazing. The rainfall fades rapidly as one moves eastward, however, so that the generally rugged and cultivable land gives way to rocky desert approximately thirty to thirty-five miles east of the Jordan.

Four major rivers, along with numerous smaller and intermittently active stream beds, drain the Transjordanian highlands into the Jordan Valley. (1) The Yarmuk River, not mentioned in the Bible, drains the area known in Old Testament times as Bashan. Bashan, good cattle country as indicated above, was situated roughly east of the Sea of Galilee. Main biblical cities in the Bashan region were Ashtoroth and Karnaim (Josh. 9:10; 12:4; Amos 6:13). (2) Nahr ex-Zerqa, the Jabbok River of Old Testament times, drains the area known then as Gilead. Gilead, situated east of that portion of the Jordan which connects the Sea of Galilee with the Dead Sea, produces grapes, olives, vegetables, cereals, and also is mentioned in the Bible as a source of balm (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22). Among Gileadite cities which appear in the biblical narratives were Mizpah, Jabesh, and Ramath (Judg. 10:17; 1 Sam. 11:1; 31:12; 1 Kings 22:3, 2 Kings 8:28). (3) Wady el-Mujib, the Arnon River of ancient times, bisected the ancient land of Moab and enters the Dead Sea approximately midway along its eastern shore. (4) Wady Hesa—probably the ancient Zered but not absolutely certain—would have separated Moab from Edom and enters the Arabah at the southern end of the Dead Sea.

An important trade route passed through the Transjordan during biblical times, connecting Damascus and Bostra of Syria with the Gulf of Aqabah and western Arabia. Some scholars prefer to translate the term derek hamelek (Num. 20:17; 21:22) as a proper noun ("The King's Highway") and identify it with this ancient route. Others interpret the term as a common, appellative noun ("royal road") and doubt that it referred to a specific route—in the same sense that present-day terms such as "freeway" or "state road" refer to categories of roads rather than to specific highways. In either case, we know that the old trade route which traversed the Transjordan would have played an important role in the economy of ancient Palestine and was refurbished by the Romans who named it the Via Nova Traiana.

The Israelite tribes of Reuben and Gad along with certain Manassite clans settled in the Transjordan—primarily in Gilead, it seems, although with some spillover into Bashan and into the traditionally Moabite territory immediately north of the Arnon (see especially Num. 32). Later, after the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy, several Israelite and Judean kings attempted, some more successfully than others, to rule this portion of the Transjordan with which Israelite tribes were associated. David, Omri, Ahab, and Jeroboam II were the more successful ones. Weaker kings, such as Rehoboam and Jehoash of Judah for example, will have had little or no influence in the Transjordan. Also, of course, one reads of occasional Moabite and Edomite military campaigns which threatened even Jerusalem (2 Chron. 20).

With the rise of Assyria, especially during and following the reign of Tiglath-pileser III (744–727 B.C.), the various regions of Syria-Palestine fell under Assyrian domination. The Transjordan was no different. Several of the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom are mentioned in Assyrian records—usually listed among those paying tribute or providing other forms of involuntary support to the Assyrian monarch. When the Assyrian Empire collapsed and was superceded by the Babylonian Empire, presumably the Babylonians also controlled the Transjordan.

By New Testament times, a cluster of Greco-Roman-oriented cities with primarily Gentile populations (the so-called "Decapolis" cities) had emerged in the northern Transjordan (earlier Bashan, Gilead, and Ammon). The southern Transjordan (earlier Moab and Edom) was dominated, on the other hand, by the Nabateans, a people of Arab origin who established a commercial empire along the desert fringe with its capital at Petra. Eventually, the whole of the Transjordan was incorporated into the Roman Empire. Domitian annexed the northern Transjordan in A.D. 90, forming the administrative province of Arabia. Trajan added the Nabatean territory in A.D. 106 and renamed the province Arabia Petraea. See Ammon; Arnon; Bashan; Decapolis; Edom; Gilead; Jabbok; Moab; Tribes of Israel. J. Maxwell Miller

TRANSPORTATION AND TRAVEL Means and ways of commercial and private movement among towns and nations in the biblical period. Travel in the ancient, as well as the modern world, is the result of economic, political, social, and religious factors. For the most part, transportation and travel in the biblical world was on foot (Judg. 16:3; Josh. 9:3–5; 1 Kings 18:46). At first this meant following the paths animals made through the hills and valleys of Palestine. However, as the economic and political demands of the region increased, so did the traffic. Better marked and smoother roads were needed for travelers and for the transport of larger amounts of goods from place to place. Large draft animals of various types also had to be domesticated and harnessed to this work (Ex. 23:5).

As trade began to expand beyond the local area, international highways and trade routes, like the coastal road, the Via Maris, and the Transjordanian king's highway were developed. Heavily traveled routes such as these were a factor in the founding of many cities. They also functioned as the principle link from which branched lesser roads connecting cities and towns in Palestine to the rest of the Near East (Prov. 8:2–3). These highways promoted the movement of businessmen, religious pilgrims, government officials, and armies between regions of the country and foreign nations. The resulting blend of cultures and economies created the society described in biblical and extrabiblical texts.

Geographical Factors in Travel Perhaps the greatest obstacle that travelers and road builders had to overcome was the rugged geographical character of Palestine. The desert regions of the Negev and Judean highlands in the south required the identification of wells and pasturage for the draft animals. The hilly spine of central Palestine forced the traveler to zigzag around steep ascents (such as that between Jericho and Jerusalem), or follow ridges along the hill tops (the Beth Horon route northwest of Jerusalem), or go along watersheds (Bethlehem to Mizpah). Numerous streams as well as the Jordan River had to be forded by travelers (2 Sam. 19:18), sometimes at the expense of baggage and animals.

Where valleys, such as the Jezreel, had to be traversed, roads generally followed the higher ground along the base of the hills so as to bypass marshy areas and stay away from the raging torrents which sometimes filled stream beds in the rainy season. Narrow, twisting valleys, as in the Judean desert, often provided perfect areas for ambushes by bandits. Along the coastal plain, sandy dunes required a detour further inland into the foothills of the Shephelah plateau.

The rough coastline of Palestine lacked a good, deep-water port for shipping. As a result, an additional journey overland was required to transport agricultural and other trade goods to and from the ports of Ezion-geber (1 Kings 9:26–28) on the Red Sea and the Phoenician ports of Tyre and Sidon to the cities of Israel. Solomon kept a fleet of ships operating in the Red Sea to ply the African trade. Another group of Solomon's ocean-going vessels (Hebrew, "ships of Tarshish") joined forces with the fleets of Hiram of Tyre in the Mediterranean (1 Kings 10:22). Despite this activity, Israel's kings had a general lack of experience with the sea. This sometimes made them reluctant to rely on shipping. For instance, king Jehoshaphat of Judah rejected further attempts to obtain gold from Ophir after his first fleet of ships was sunk off Ezion-geber (1 Kings 22:48–49). See Ships, Sailors.

A traveler along the Jericho road to Jerusalem riding one donkey while his other donkey leads the way.

Despite these difficulties, the desire to travel and the commercial needs of nations motivated the identification of routes that were relatively safe from attack by bandits and allowed free transport of goods by pack animals and carts to every region in the land. The roads that carried this traffic varied in size from two lane thoroughfares about ten feet wide to simple tracks through fields barely wide enough for a man and donkey to pass single file. The determining factor in each case was the usage each received. Roads carrying two- and four-wheeled carts and wagons pulled by oxen required more room and a smoother road bed (Isa. 62:10) than a lane crossing a vineyard.

Kings of the ancient Near East (Shulgi of Ur III, Mesopotamia, and Mesha, king of Moab) often boasted in their official inscriptions of their road-building activities. These roadways, so important to the maintenance of political and economic control of the nation, were probably kept in shape by government-sponsored corvee workers (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 9:15) or by the army. Since bridges were unknown in the biblical period, fords were identified (Judg. 12:5–6, NIV) for general use, and, in the Roman period, were smoothed by the placement of flat stones in the river bed. Where no river crossing could be found, boats were lashed together to form temporary ferries or large transports.

Political and Military Factors in Transportation While terrain had a great deal to do with the building of roads, another important factor was the political situation in the region. In ancient Israel, roads not only linked trading and religious centers, they also protected population centers and speeded the nation's armies to war. The vast network of roads in the difficult area of the Judean hill country speaks eloquently of the importance of Jerusalem which was the hub of activities in that region. It functioned as the political center of the Davidic monarchy as well as the religious focus of the nation with many pilgrims making the ascent to Zion (Ps 122:1). An even more elaborate system of highways was built by the Roman legions to help them dominate the country and forestall organized rebellion after the revolts of A.D. 69–70, 135.

Throughout the monarchy, military campaigns required well-kept roadways to facilitate the movement of troops about the country. Protecting the valleys and highways which led to the capital at Jerusalem were a series of fortresses including Gezer, Beth Horon, Baalath, and Tadmor (1 Kings 9:17–19, NIV). Royal entourages also traveled these guarded roads in peacetime to conduct governmental business (1 Kings 12:1; 18:16).

To help with the constant flow of government travelers, way stations (every ten to fifteen miles in the Persian Empire) and administrative outposts were constructed. In a time before inns, these stations provided supplies to traveling officials and fresh mounts to couriers. The private traveler had to rely on the hospitality of towns or friends along the way (Judg. 19:10–15; 2 Kings 4:8).

The road systems and port facilities of the kings of Israel and Judah were expanded in times of prosperity and contested for in times of war (2 Kings 16:6). Megiddo, which commanded the western entrance into the Jezreel Valley, controlled the traffic along the Via Maris as it moved inland and then north to Damascus. Solomon demonstrated his awareness of its strategic importance for fortifying the site, along with Hazor and Gezer, to protect the borders of Israel (1 Kings 9:15). Foreign rulers also fought to hold the city (which was destroyed over a dozen times during its period of occupation), and king Josiah of Judah died here defending the pass against the army of Pharaoh Necho II in 609 B.C. (2 Kings 23:29).

Religious Factors in Travel One of the chief reasons given for travel in the biblical text was to visit a religious shrine and make sacrifices. Throughout much of Israel's history the people are described as making journeys to places like Shechem (Josh. 24), Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3), Ophrah (Judg. 8:27), Dan (Judg. 18:30), and Bethel (1 Kings 12:26–33). Here they would make their devotions before a sacred image or the ark of the covenant. High places (bamoth) were also popular sites for religious pilgrims. In the period before Jerusalem's ascendancy as the religious focal point of the nation, prophets like Samuel regularly visited these local shrines to officiate at sacrifices (1 Sam. 9:12). Local religious rites sometimes also included an ingathering of family from across the nation as well as part of the yearly celebration (1 Sam. 20:6).

Animals Used in Travel Most of what is known about the animals used to transport people and materials in the ancient world is based on textual evidence and art. The Bible mentions several different types of draft animals: donkeys, mules, camels, and oxen. Among these, donkeys appear to have been the most popular means of transport in the Near East. They are described in Old Assyrian texts (about 2100 B.C.) transporting copper ingots from Cappadocia in Turkey. The Beni-Hasan tomb paintings from Egypt dating to 1900 B.C. graphically portray Semitic caravaneers with their donkeys laden with baggage and trade goods.

In the biblical narrative the donkey was the chief means of private and commercial transport throughout the history of the nation of Israel. Jacob's sons carried their grain purchases from Egypt to Canaan on donkey back (Gen. 42:26); Jesse sent David and a donkey loaded with provisions to Saul's court (1 Sam. 16:20); and Nehemiah became incensed when he saw Judeans transporting grain on donkeys during the sabbath (Neh. 13:15).

Mules are less commonly mentioned. This may be due to a shortage of horses for breeding or to a custom restricting the use of mules to the upper classes (2 Sam. 13:29). For instance, David's sons Absalom (2 Sam. 18:9) and Solomon (1 Kings 1:33) are described as riding mules. One passage (Isa. 66:20) pictures the caravan of returning exiles riding on horses, mules, and dromedaries, as well as in chariots and litters. Each of these means of transport, however, fits the prophet's vision of a glorious procession on its way to Jerusalem rather than the normal groupings of travelers along the international route.

Camels appear several times in the text carrying huge loads (five times that of a donkey). One clear example of this is found in 2 Kings 8:9 (NIV). Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, sent "forty camel-loads" of goods to Elisha in an attempt to learn if he would recover from an illness. In another case Isaiah denounced the leaders of Judah for sending camel loads of gifts to Egypt to buy their aid against Assyria (30:6). Because of their broad, but tender hoofs, best fit for desert travel, the camel was of little use in the hill country. These beasts were probably used only on the major routes such as the Via Maris, along the coast, or on the smoother valley roads of the Shephelah and the Negev.

Oxen are exclusively associated with travel by wheeled vehicle and will be discussed below in that context. Israelite use of horses does not appear in the text before the 1000 B.C. when David began to incorporate them into his forces (2 Sam. 8:3–4). They are mentioned primarily in military contexts: ridden into battle (Job 39:18–25) and harnessed to chariots (1 Kings 12:18). Official messengers also rode horses (2 Kings 9:18–19), as did scouts for the army (2 Kings 7:13–15).

Wheeled Vehicles The most commonly mentioned wheeled vehicle in the biblical narrative is the chariot. It was used first by Israel's enemies during the conquest period (Judg. 1:19; 4:3). However, it could not be used effectively in the rough hill country where the tribes first settled (Josh. 17:16). Once the monarchy was established, chariots became an integral part of the kings' battle strategy (1 Kings 10:26; 22:31–34). They were also used as a standard means of travel by kings (2 Kings 9:16) and nobles (2 Kings 5:9). Private ownership of chariots is found in Isaiah 22:18. In this passage the prophet condemns Shebna, the king's household steward for his extravagance and pride. His chariots, like his rock-cut tomb were status symbols for high-ranking members of the royal bureaucracy in Hezekiah's time (see Acts 8:26–38 for a similar case).

No physical remains of chariots have been found in Palestine, although a magnificent example of a royal Egyptian chariot was discovered in the tomb of Pharaoh Tutankhamon (about 1300 B.C.). A three-man Judean battle chariot is depicted in the Assyrian relief (about 701 B.C.) of Sennacherib's siege of Lachish. It was fitted with a yoke for four horses. Estimates of the chariot's size in this period are based on the width of ruts in the roadways in Mesopotamian and Roman cities. If these are used, the standard width of chariots was 1.23 meters between the wheels and 1.53 meters overall.

The use of large-wheeled vehicles apparently originated in Sumer where models, dating to 2500 B.C., of large covered wagons drawn by oxen have been found. These bulky vehicles, carrying heavy loads, required well-kept, broad roadways. Neglected paths could become overgrown (Prov. 15:19) or filled with stones from eroded hillsides. Thus, for traffic to be maintained, teams of workmen must have traveled the roads making necessary repairs. Gateways also had to be widened to permit the entrance of wheeled vehicles. Those excavated in Israel range in width from 2.5 to 4.5 meters. Some, like those at Gezer and Megiddo, had a cobblestone or crushed-stone roadbed within the heavily traveled gate complex.

Large two- and four-wheeled carts and wagons were also commonly used in biblical times for transporting heavy loads and people. In the patriarchal period, Joseph sent carts to Canaan to carry his father and the households of his brothers to Goshen (Gen. 45:19–27). After the completion of the wilderness tabernacle, six covered wagons, each pulled by two oxen, were donated by the tribal leaders to the Levites to transport holy items along the line of march (Num. 7:1–8).

Once the people had settled into Canaan, carts became an everyday aid to farmers who had to transport sheaves of grain to the threshing floor (Amos 2:13). A similar two-wheeled cart was used by David to carry the ark of the covenant from Kiriath-jearim (also called Baale of Judah) to his new capital in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2–17). The somewhat clumsy nature of these carts can be seen in its almost over turning as it came to the threshing floor of Nacon. Several men walked beside the cart to guide the oxen and prevent the cargo from shifting.

The broader roads and heavy wheeled vehicles of Palestine were also used, in the period of the Assyrian conquest, to transport the people into Exile. Sennacherib's stone relief of his siege of Lachish includes a picture of Judeans being taken away in two-wheeled carts drawn by a team of oxen. The new exiles sit atop bundles containing their belongings while a man walks alongside the left-hand ox guiding it with a sharpened stick. Isaiah's vision of the return (66:20) must have struck a poignant note for the exiles who had seen their ancestors depicted in the Assyrian relief. See Animals; Economic Life. Victor H. Matthews TREASURE, TREASURY What one values whether silver and gold or something intangible and the storage place of what is valuable.

In Old Testament times treasure might be stored in the king's palace (2 Kings 20:13) or in the Temple (1 Kings 7:51). In Jesus' day the term also applied to thirteen trumpet-shaped offering receptacles in the Temple court of the women where Jesus watched people make their offerings (Mark 12:41). "Treasure" and "treasury" are also used as illustrations or figures of speech. Israel was God's treasure (Ex. 19:5). This is reflected in the idea of Christians as God's own people (1 Pet. 2:9). A person's memory is a treasure (Prov. 2:1; 7:1). Fear (awe) of the Lord was Israel's treasure (Isa. 33:6).

Jesus Himself used the term frequently. He contrasted earthly treasures to those of heaven (Matt. 6:19–20). What a person treasures or values determines one's loyalty and priorities (Matt. 6:21). Paul marveled that the treasure of God's revelation of Himself in Christ had been deposited in an earthen vessel such as Paul himself (2 Cor. 4:7). See Temple. Elmer Gray

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE Plant in midst of Garden of Eden used to prove the first couple's loyalty to the Creator (Gen. 2—3). Reference to "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil" is in a context concerned with the fall. In Genesis 3:3 the tree is designated as "the tree which is in the midst of the garden." Eating from the tree brought the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3:5,22). One of many trees in the garden, this tree alone was forbidden to mankind under the penalty of death (Gen. 2:17).

The tree of knowledge was Adam and Eve's opportunity to demonstrate obedience and loyalty to God, but the serpent used it to tempt Eve to eat and to become like God "knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). When Adam joined Eve in eating the forbidden fruit, the result was shame, guilt, exclusion from the garden, and separation from the tree of life and from God. The Bible's primary interest about the tree of knowledge is not what kind of knowledge it represented—moral judgment, secular knowledge, sexual knowledge, universal knowledge, or some other kind—but how it served as God's test and Satan's temptation. The result for mankind was disaster as they failed the test and fell to the temptation.

TREE OF LIFE Plant in Garden of Eden symbolizing access to eternal life and metaphor used in Proverbs. For the biblical writer the tree of life was an important consideration only after Adam and Eve disobeyed. Sin interrupted the quality of life God intended for them. They were to obey God (Gen 2:17) in a family setting (Gen. 2:18–25) and perform their assigned tasks (Gen. 2:15). The implication is that they had access to all the trees in the garden, including the tree of life, but God gave an explicit command not to eat of the tree of knowledge. Their relationship to God changed radically when they disobeyed that command. Chief among the radical changes was that they no longer had access to the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–24).

The "tree of life" appears in Proverbs four times (Prov. 3:18; 11:30; 13:12; 15:4) and in Revelation 2:7; 22:2,14. To lay hold of wisdom is to lay hold on "a tree of life" (Prov. 3:18). "The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life" (11:30 NIV). Yet another proverb has this comparison: "a longing fulfilled is a tree of life" (13:12 NIV). The author of another proverb wrote, "The tongue that brings healing is a tree of life" (15:4 NIV). None of these proverbs seems to refer to "the tree of life" mentioned in Genesis. All of the references in Revelation do.

TRIAL OF JESUS Two systems of justice combined to produce a sentence of death for Jesus. Jewish religious leaders accused Jesus of blasphemy, a capital offense under Jewish law (see Lev. 24:16). The Jewish leaders at Jesus' trial manipulated procedures to coerce Jesus into an admission that He was God's Son (see Luke 22:66–71). For them this constituted blasphemy.

Roman leaders allowed conquered people such as the Jews to follow their own legal system so long as they did not abuse their privileges. The Romans did not give the Jews the right of capital punishment for the accusation of blasphemy. The Jews had to convince a Roman judge that their demand for capital punishment was justified.

The Jewish Trial Jewish leaders were determined to seek Jesus' death when they put Him on trial (see Luke 22:2; Mark 14:1). They held the Jewish trial at night hoping that Jesus' supporters would be asleep and unable to protest his arrest. The Jewish portion of the trial had three separate phases: (1) an appearance before Annas; (2) an informal investigation by Caiaphas and (3) a condemnation by the Sanhedrin. Annas was father-in-law of the high priest Caiaphas. He had been high priest himself from A.D. 7–15. He was the most influential member of the Sanhedrin. The details of the interview before Annas are meager (John 18:12–14,19–24). The high priest mentioned in John 18:19 may have been Annas. If so, he held a brief interrogation of Jesus and sent Him to his son-in-law Caiaphas (John 18:24).

The meeting with Caiaphas took place in his residence (Luke 22:54). Some members of the Sanhedrin worked frantically to locate and train witnesses against Jesus (Matt. 26:59–60). The carefully prepared witnesses could not agree in their testimony (see Mark 14:56; compare Deut. 19:15).

During this circuslike activity Caiaphas talked with Jesus and put Him under oath (Matt. 26:63–64). He charged Jesus to tell if He were God's Son. Perhaps Jesus felt that silence under this oath would be a denial of His divine origin. He affirmed that He was God's Son (Mark 14:62), knowing that this would lead to death. The Sanhedrin condemned Him but did not pronounce a sentence (Mark 14:64). After the condemnation the group broke up into wild disorder. Some began to slap and spit upon Jesus (Mark 14:65).

Shortly after dawn, the Sanhedrin convened again to bring a formal condemnation against Jesus (Luke 22:66). Jewish law stipulated that a guilty verdict in a capital crime had to be delayed until the next day. The vote for condemnation after dawn gave the semblance of following this requirement.

The procedure at this session was similar to that of the night trial. No witnesses came forward to accuse Christ. Jesus again claimed that He was God's Son (Luke 22:66–71). The Sanhedrin again approved the death sentence and took Jesus to Pilate for sentencing (Luke 23:1).

The procedures of the Jewish leaders during Jesus' trial were illegal. Jewish law required that trial for a capital crime begin during the daytime and adjourn by nightfall if incomplete. Sanhedrin members were supposed to be impartial judges. Jewish rules prohibited convicting the accused on His own testimony.

The Roman Trial The Roman trial of Jesus also had three phases: (1) first appearance before Pilate; (2) appearance before Herod Antipas; (3) second appearance before Pilate. The Jews asked Pilate to accept their verdict against Jesus without investigation (John 18:29–31). Pilate refused this, but he offered to let them carry out the maximum punishment under their law, probably beating with rods or imprisonment. They insisted that they wanted death.

The Jews knew that Pilate would laugh at their charge of blasphemy. They fabricated three additional charges against Jesus which would be of concern to a Roman governor (Luke 23:2). Pilate concerned himself only with the charge that Jesus had claimed to be a king. This charge sounded like treason. The Romans knew no greater crime than treason.

Pilate interrogated Jesus long enough to be convinced that He was no political rival to Caesar (John 18:33–37). He returned to the Jews to announce that he found Jesus no threat to Rome and hence not deserving of death (John 18:38). The Jews responded with vehement accusations against Jesus' actions in Judea and Galilee (Luke 23:5). When Pilate learned that Jesus was from Galilee, he sent Jesus to Herod Antipas of Galilee who was then in Jersusalem (Luke 23:6–12). Herod wanted Jesus to entertain him with a miracle. Jesus did not even speak a word to Herod. The king and his soldiers mocked and ridiculed Jesus, finally sending Him back to Pilate.

When Herod returned Jesus to Pilate, the Roman governor announced that he still found Jesus innocent of charges of treason. Three times Pilate tried to release Jesus. First, Pilate offered to chastise or beat Jesus and then to release him (Luke 23:16). Second, he offered to release either Jesus or Barabbas, a radical revolutionary. To Pilate's surprise the crowd chanted for Barabbas' release (Luke 23:17–19). Third, he scourged Jesus. Soldiers flailed at Jesus' bare back with a leather whip. The whip had pieces of iron or bone tied to the ends of the thongs. Pilate then presented the bleeding Jesus with a crown of thorns and a mock purple robe to the crowd as their king. He hoped that this spectacle would lead them to release Jesus out of pity. Again they chanted for crucifixion (John 19:4–6).

When Pilate seemed to waver one more time concerning crucifixion, the Jews threatened to report his conduct to Caesar (John 19:12). That threat triggered Pilate's action. After symbolically washing his hands of the entire affair (Matt. 27:24), he delivered Jesus for crucifixion (John 19:16). See Annas; Caiaphas; Pontius Pilate; Roman Law; Sanhedrin. Tommy Lea TRIBES OF ISRAEL, THE Social and political groups in Israel claiming descent from one of the twelve sons of Jacob.

The Tribal Unit The tribal unit played an important role in the history of the formation of the nation Israel. In ancient times a nation was referred to as "a people," an 'am; in Israel's case it was the "people of Israel." The nation in turn was made up of "tribes." The "tribe," a shebet or matteh, was the major social unit that comprised the makeup of the nation. The tribe was comprised of "clans." The "clan," a mishpachah, was a family of families or a cluster of households that had a common ancestry. The clan was comprised then of the individual households or families referred to as the "father's house" the beth ab. Actually, the family in ancient times might be made up of several families living together and forming one household (Num. 3:24). See Family.

Tribal Origins The ancestral background of "the tribes of Israel" went back to the patriarch Jacob, whose name was changed to Israel. The nation Israel was identified as "the children of Israel, or more literally "the sons of Israel." According to the biblical account, the family of Jacob, from which the tribes came, originated in north Syria during Jacob's stay at Haran with Laban his uncle. Eleven of the twelve sons were born at Haran, while the twelfth, Benjamin was born after Jacob returned to Canaan. The birth of the sons came through Jacob's wives Leah and Rachel and their maids Zilpah and Bilhah. The sons of Leah included Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (Gen. 29:31–35), Issachar and Zebulun, as well as one daughter named Dinah (Gen. 30:19–21). Rachel's sons were Joseph (Gen. 30:22–24), who became the father of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 41:50–52), and Benjamin (Gen. 35:16–18). Jacob's sons through Zilpah, Leah's maid, were Gad and Asher (Gen. 30:9–13), while Bilhah, the maid of Rachel, bore Dan and Naphtali (Gen. 30:1–8).

This family of families or family of tribes occupied the focal point in the history of the development of Israel as a nation. While there are details of that history that we do not clearly understand and other groups simply referred to as "a mixed multitude" (Ex. 12:38) that were perhaps incorporated into the nation, the central focus is always on the "tribes of Israel," the descendants of Jacob. For that reason lists of the twelve sons of Jacob or of the tribes appear in several places in the Old Testament, though the lists vary somewhat. Some of the major lists include that of Jacob's blessing of the twelve (Gen. 49), the review of the households as the period of oppression in Egypt is introduced (Ex. 1:1–10), Moses' blessing of the tribes (Deut. 33), and the song of Deborah (Judg. 5).

The Tribes of Israel Each tribe had its own history in its allotment of land. We know few details about the individual tribes.

1. Reuben, the firstborn son of Jacob by his wife Leah, was in line to assume a leadership role in the family, but he forfeited that right because of an illicit affair he had with his father's concubine Bilhah (Gen. 35:22). The impact of this reflected in Jacob's blessing where Reuben is addressed as "unstable as water, you shall no longer excel because you went up on to your father's bed" (Gen. 49:4 NRSV). At the time of the migration of Jacob's family to Egypt, Reuben had four sons (Gen. 46:8–9).

In some of the lists of the tribes of Israel, Reuben is mentioned first (Ex. 1:1–4; Num. 1:5), while in other lists Reuben appears further down (Num. 2:1–11). During the journey through the wilderness, the tribes of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad formed the second unit of the procession with the tribe of Reuben in the lead position (Num. 10:17–20). This cluster of tribes headed by the tribe of Reuben was next in line after the tabernacle (Num. 10:17). As the tribes approached the land of Canaan and allotments were made to each tribe, the tribe of Reuben along with Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh occupied the Transjordan, that is the highland plateau region east of the Jordan River (Josh. 13:8–31; compare Num. 32: 1–5,33–42). The tribe of Reuben occupied the southern region extending roughly from the Arnon river to the site of Heshbon (Josh. 13:15–23). Formerly, this territory was the homeland of the kingdom of Sihon. While we know little about the tribe of Reuben during the period of the settlement, the song of Deborah suggests that the tribe was criticized by some of the other tribes for not taking a more active role in the conquest (Judg. 5:15–16). See Transjordan.

2. Simeon was Jacob's second son by Leah and played a key role in the encounter Dinah had with Shechem. Because Simeon and Levi were full brothers of Dinah, they sought to avenge her (Gen. 34:25–26) for Shechem's actions (Gen. 34:1–4). The radical response of the two brothers, in which they "took their swords and came against the city unawares, and killed all the males" (Gen. 34:25), is reflected in Jacob's blessing of the two: "Weapons of violence are their swords. . . . cursed be their anger, for it is fierce, and their wrath, for it is cruel! I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel" (Gen. 49:5–7 NRSV). During the years of famine as the sons of Jacob traveled back and forth between Egypt and Canaan, Simeon was held hostage by Joseph at one point (Gen. 42:24).

In the lists of the tribes, Simeon is listed in second place, that is, next after Reuben (Ex. 1:2; 6:15; Num. 1:6,22–23; 13:5; 26:12–14). Generally, the tribe of Simeon seems to be characterized by weakness. Its status is best reflected in the final statement of Jacob's blessing of Simeon and Levi: "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel" (Gen. 49:7). Perhaps because of its weak status, the tribe of Simeon apparently was not given a separate inheritance in the land (Josh. 19:1–9). Rather, "its inheritance lay within the inheritance of the tribe of Judah" (Josh. 19:1), in the southern Negeb.

3. Levi was the third son of Jacob and Leah. See Simeon above. During the journey from Egypt to Canaan, the sons of Levi slaughtered 3,000 rebellious Hebrew males (Ex. 32:25–29). They became the landless priestly tribe. See Levites; Levitical Cities; Priests.

4. Judah, the fourth son of Jacob by his wife Leah (Gen. 29:35), appears as a leader and a spokesman among his brothers (Gen. 37:26; 43:3; 44:16; compare 46:28). Judah was promised preeminence over the other tribes in Jacob's blessing (Gen. 49:8–12).

In the journey from Egypt to Canaan, Judah has the lead position (Num. 2:9). As the tribes entered the land, it was Achan of the tribe of Judah who was guilty of taking some of the forbidden booty or loot from Jericho (Josh. 7). The tribe of Judah occupied the southern part of Palestine, basically the territory between the Dead Sea on the east to the Mediterranean on the west (Josh. 15). The northern boundary of Judah was marked by the territories of Benjamin and Dan. The territory of Jerusalem may have formed something of a barrier between Judah and the tribes of the north because it was not finally secured until the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6–10). The capture of Jerusalem by David paved the way for the tribes to have a kind of unity they had not previously experienced. The territory of the tribe of Judah constituted the major portion of the Southern Kingdom, thus forming the kingdom of Judah with its capital Jerusalem.

5. Issachar was the ninth son born to Jacob, but the first of a second family he had by Leah (Gen. 30:18). Beyond his birth, little else is known about his life or that of the tribe. During the journey from Mount Sinai to Canaan the tribe of Issachar followed the tribe of Judah, that is, it was a part of the first cluster of tribes located on the east side of the tabernacle (Num. 2:5). The territory occupied by the tribe of Issachar is difficult to outline precisely (Josh. 19:17–23). They were located west of the Jordan in the region just south of the Sea of Galilee stretching on down to the Valley of Jezreel. Because the blessing of Moses says that Zebulun and Issachar "call peoples to the mountain; / there they offer the right sacrifices" (Deut. 33:19 NRSV), some have speculated that the two tribes perhaps had a center of worship on Mount Tabor, a mountain located on the border between the two tribes. Because the blessing of Jacob speaks of Issachar as a beast of burden and as "a slave at forced labor" (Gen. 49:14–15 NRSV), the tribe of Issachar may have faced a variety of hardships. For instance there may have been a time during the tribal period when the people of Issachar served as slaves in the forced labor projects of their neighbors, the Canaanites.

6. Zebulun was the tenth son of Jacob and the sixth and final son by his wife Leah (Gen. 30:19–20). Little else is known about Zebulun's life. The territory allotted to the tribe of Zebulun was in the north in the region of southern Galilee bounded by Issachar on the south southeast, Naphtali on the east, and Asher on the west (Josh. 19:10–16). The blessing of Jacob speaks of Zebulun's territory including "the shore of the sea," presumably the Mediterranean Sea, and "his border shall be at Sidon," (Gen. 49:13 NRSV) a city on the coast north of Mount Carmel. While this territory was traditionally occupied by the tribe of Asher, it is quite possible that at some point Zebulun occupied a part of this region and, therefore, would have had access to the sea. The blessing of Moses further states that Zebulum along with Issachar would benefit from "the affluence of the seas and the hidden treasures of the sand" (Deut. 33:19 NRSV). During the period that the tribes were settling in the land of Canaan, Zebulun apparently went beyond the call of duty in providing support. It is the only tribe in the Song of Deborah to be mentioned twice (Judg. 5:14,18).

7. Joseph was the first son born to Jacob by Rachel, Jacob's favorite wife (Gen. 30:22–24). Two of the tribes of Israel came from Joseph, namely, Ephraim and Manasseh.

The story of Joseph is the most eventful of the sons of Jacob. See Joseph. Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. 41:50–52), who were born in Egypt. Ephraim and Manasseh were adopted by Jacob and therefore each became the father of a tribe in Israel (Gen. 48:8–20). While Manasseh was the older of the two, Jacob gave preference to Ephraim (v. 14; compare Deut. 33:17). The Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:22–26) mentions only Joseph; the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:13–17) begins with Joseph and notes Ephriam and Manasseh, the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:14) speaks of Ephraim and Machir. See Machir.

a. Ephraim occupied a major portion of the central hill country with Manasseh during the tribal period. Ephraim's territory consisted of the region just north of Dan and Benjamin and ran from the Jordan River on the east to the Mediterranean Sea on the west. That Ephraim played a major leadership role among the tribes is reflected in the tribal history. Joshua, one of the twelve spies and a member of the tribe of Ephraim, became the successor of Moses (Num. 13:8,16; Josh. 1:1–11). Ephraim demanded leadership in the period of the judges (Judg. 3:27; 4:5; 7:24; 8:1; 10:1; 12:1–6; 17:1; 18:2,13; 19:1). Shiloh, located in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim, became the major center of worship during the tribal period (Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:1–18). Samuel, the leader of the tribes (1 Sam 7:15–17) near the end of the period of the Judges and just prior to the beginning of the kinship, came from Ephraim (1 Sam. 1:1–20).

Ephraim's influence is seen not only during the tribal period, but in Israel's later history as well. For instance, as the nation Israel divided into two kingdoms following the death of Solomon in 922 B.C., it was an Ephraimite named Jeroboam who led the northern tribes in their plea for leniency (1 Kings 12:1–5). When Rehoboam rejected their plea, the northern tribes broke their ties with the south, formed a separate kingdom (1 Kings 12:16–19), and selected Jeroboam as their king (1 Kings 12:20). Ephraim's influence is seen also during the time of the prophets. For instance, Hosea refers to Israel some three dozen times using the name Ephraim as being synonymous with Israel.

b. Manasseh was the oldest son of Joseph and Asenath. The tribe of Manasseh occupied territory both east and west of the Jordan River. Manasseh's terrotory east of the Jordan included the regions of Gilead and Bashan and most likely extended from the Jabbok River to near Mount Hermon. Manasseh's territory west of the Jordan was located north of Ephraim. Apparently, the tribe of Manasseh played an important role in the conquest. For instance the sons of Machir, Manasseh's son took the land of Gilead and drove out the Amorites who occupied it (Num. 32:39; compare Judg. 5:14); while other descendants of Manasseh engaged in the activities of the conquest elsewhere (Num. 32:41–42). Perhaps Gideon is the most familiar of the descendants of Manasseh (Judg. 6:12–15). Gideon defeated the Midianites with a small band of men (Judg. 6—7).

8. Benjamin was Jacob's youngest son, born to him by Rachel, and the only son born after returning to Palestine from Haran (Gen. 35:16–20). He was the only full-blooded brother of Joseph. Therefore, the tribes of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh formed a special group. Benjamin's tribal territory was a small area west of the Jordan, sandwiched between Ephraim to the north and Judah to the south (Josh. 18:11–28). The Benjaminites had a reputation as men of war. The blessing of Jacob refers to them as a "ravenous wolf" (Gen. 49:27 NRSV). The Book of Judges notes their activities as warriors during the tribal period (Judg. 5:14; 20:12–16). They were referred to as those "who were left-handed" and experts with the sling (Judg. 20:16 NRSV). The story of the Levite and his concubine reflects the inhumane acts for which the Benjaminites were responsible (Judg. 19). The second judge, Ehud (Judg. 3:12–30), and the first king, Saul (1 Sam. 9:15–17; 10:1), came from the tribe of Benjamin.

9. Dan was the fifth son of Jacob and the first of two sons by Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gen. 30:5–8). Therefore, Dan and Naphtali were full-blooded brothers and are often mentioned together (Gen. 46:23–24; Ex. 1:4). The tribe of Dan originally occupied the territory just west of Benjamin with Ephraim on the north and Judah and the Philistines on the south (Josh. 19:40–48). Shortly after settling in this area, the Amorites and the Philistines apparently attempted to drive them out of the region (Judg. 1:34–36). The pressure and harassment the people of Dan experienced from the Philistines is reflected in the stories of Samson, the Danite, and his encounters with them (Judg. 13—16). The Philistine pressure resulted in the migration of the tribe to an area north of Lake Hula, to the city of Laish and its territory (Judg. 18:14–27). The people of Dan captured the city and renamed it Dan (Judg. 18:29). See Dan.

10. Naphtali was the sixth son of Jacob and younger full-blooded brother of Dan (Gen. 30:6–8). The name, Naphtali, which conveys the idea of "wrestling" was selected because of the personal struggles between Rachel and Leah (Gen. 30:7–8). The Bible provides little information concerning Naphtali the person or tribe. During the tribal period the tribe of Naphtali occupied the broad strip of land west of the Jordan in the area of Lake Hula and the Sea of Chinnereth (Galilee). This band of land ran from Issachar and Zebulun in the south to near Dan in the north (Josh. 19:32–39). Apparently, the tribe of Naphtali provided forces during the conquest of the land (Judg. 5:18) and during the Midianite threat (Judg. 6:35; 7:23).

11. Gad was the seventh son of Jacob and the first of two sons by Zilpah, the maid of Leah (Gen. 30:9–11). Because Leah saw this birth as a sign of "good fortune," especially in the light of the fact that she had ceased having children, she named him "Gad" which means "fortune" (Gen. 30:11 NRSV). We know very little about Gad the patriarch beyond the brief details about his birth. The tribe's territory was the east side of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, including a part of the region called Gilead (Num. 32:34–36; Josh. 13:24–28), extending from the region of the Jabbok River in the north to the region of the Arnon River in the south. According to the blessing of Jacob the tribe of Gad perhaps experienced numerous raids (Gen. 49:19) especially from groups like the Ammonites as reflected in the story of Jephthah (Judg. 11). Perhaps such raids were prompted by the fact that Gad occupied some of the best land in the Transjordan (Deut. 33:20–21). Apparently the men of Gad achieved great expertise as warriors (1 Chron. 12:8).

12. Asher was the eighth son of Jacob, the second son by Zilpah and the younger full-blooded brother of Gad (Gen. 30:9–13). Like Gad, little information is shared about the patriarch Asher. The tribe of Asher occupied the region west of Zebulun and Naphtali, that is, the northern coastal region of Palestine. The territory extended from near Mount Carmel in the south to near Tyre in the north (Josh. 19:24–31). Asher is the only tribe not recognized as providing a judge during the tribal period. While Asher occupied choice territory (Gen. 49:20), it apparently was reproached and perhaps failed to gain the respect of some of the other tribes (Judg. 5:17b).

Conclusion While discussion and research will continue concerning the history of the tribes and the territory they occupied, the tribal period will always be recognized as an important though enigmatic period in the development of the history of Israel. With the development of the monarchy the tribal period came to an end; however, tribal ties and traditions may have continued to be quite strong. Many scholars suggest that tribal jealousies and traditions played a major role in bringing about the division of the kingdom and the formation of two kingdoms, the Northern Kindgom and the Southern Kingdom in 922 B.C.

TRIBULATION Trouble or pressure of a general sort; in some passages a particular time of suffering associated with events of the end time. In this sense it is described as tribulation surpassing any trouble yet experienced in human history (Matt. 24:21).

Such a reference to "the great tribulation" as Revelation 7:14 (NIV) is seen by some (amillennialism) to refer historically to persecution faced by Christians of the latter part of the first century, but also symbolic of tribulation that occurs periodically throughout history. Others (premillennialism) take such a reference to the great tribulation to refer to an end time period. Dispensational premillennialism connects such a seven-year tribulation with the seventieth week of a prophetic framework taken from Daniel 9:24–27. A distinction is usually made between the two halves of the seven years. The last half, often called the Great Tribulation, is measured variously as three and a half years (Dan. 9:27), forty-two months (Rev. 11:2; 13:5), 1,260 days (Rev. 11:3; 12:6), or "a time, and times, and half a time" (Rev. 12:14). Distinctive to this view is the teaching the church will be raptured at the beginning of the tribulation period.

Historic premillennialism sees the period as a future time of intense trouble on earth prior to Christ's return, but holds the church will go through the tribulation. The church must endure the tribulation, but not God's wrath.

TRIBUTE Any payment exacted by a superior power, usually a state, from an inferior one. The weaker state, called a vassal state, normally contributed a specified amount of gold, silver, or other commodities on a yearly basis. The imposition of tribute demonstrated the subservient status of the vassal state, thus undermining political autonomy and often causing financial weakness. Powerful nations collected tribute from both hostile states and allies. Refusal to render tribute by either was regarded as rebellion and normally resulted in military reprisals.

Imposing tribute was practiced widely and can be tracked back to before 2000 B.C. The tell el Amarna Letters from Canaanite kings after 1400

B.C. clearly reveal their vassal status to Egypt. During a few periods of strength Israel took tribute from neighboring peoples. David and Solomon exacted tribute from several smaller states (2 Sam. 8:14; 1 Kings 4:21). Later, Moab payed a tribute of 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams to Ahab of Israel (2 Kings 3:3–4).

After the division of Solomon's Kingdom in 922 B.C., the relatively weaker states of Judah and Israel more often were forced to pay tribute to the large powers which increasingly dominated the Near East. This was especially true of the Assyrian Period (850–600 B.C.) as both biblical and archaeological evidence attests. The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (about 841 B.C.) shows Jehu of Israel paying tribute prostrate before the Assyrian king. Menahem of Israel (2 Kings 15:19) and Ahaz of Judah (2 Kings 16:7–9) rendered tribute to Tiglath-pileser III (Pul) for different reasons. The heavy tribute paid by Hezekiah to Sennacherib about 701 B.C. was recorded in both biblical and Assyrian texts (2 Kings 18:13–16).

The Jews later paid tribute in one form or another to Babylon, Persia, the Ptolemies and Seleucids, and Rome. The Roman tributum was a form of taxes. In effect the famous question posed to Jesus by the Pharisees about taxes (Matt. 22:15–22) was about tribute. See Assyria; Babylon; Egypt; Roman Empire. Tommy Brisco TRIGON (Trī' gŏn) Small, three-cornered harp with four strings (Dan. 3:5,7,10; KJV, sackbut).

TRINITY Theological term used to define God as an undivided unity expressed in the threefold nature of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit. As a distinctive Christian doctrine, the Trinity is considered as a divine mystery beyond human comprehension to be reflected upon only through scriptual revelation. The Trinity is a biblical concept that expresses the dynamic character of God, not a Greek idea pressed into Scripture from philosophical or religious speculation. While the term trinity does not appear in Scripture, the trinitarian structure appears throughout the New Testament to affirm that God Himself is manifested through Jesus Christ by means of the Spirit.

A proper biblical view of the Trinity balances the concepts of unity and distinctiveness. Two errors that appear in the history of the consideration of the doctrine are tritheism and unitarianism. In tritheism, error is made in emphasizing the distinctiveness of the Godhead to the point that the Trinity is seen as three separate Gods, or a Christian polytheism. On the other hand, unitarianism excludes the concept of distinctiveness while focusing solely on the aspect of God the Father. In this way, Christ and the Holy Spirit are placed in lower categories and made less than divine. Both errors compromise the effectiveness and contribution of the activity of God in redemptive history.

The biblical concept of the Trinity developed through progressive revelation. See Revelation. The Old Testament consistently affirms the unity of God through such statements as, "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. 6:4). See Shema. God's oneness is stressed to caution the Israelites against the polytheism and practical atheism of their heathen neighbors.

The Old Testament does feature implications of the trinitarian idea. This does not mean that the Trinity was fully knowable from the Old Testament, but that a vocabulary was established through the events of God's nearness and creativity; both receive developed meaning from New Testament writers. For example, the word of God is recognized as the agent of creation (Ps. 33:6,9; compare Prov. 3:19; 8:27), revelation, and salvation (Ps. 107:20). This same vocabulary is given distinct personality in John's prologue (John 1:1–4) in the person of Jesus Christ. Other vocabulary categories include the wisdom of God (Prov. 8) and the Spirit of God (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 104:30; Zech. 4:6).

A distinguishing feature of the New Testament is the doctrine of the Trinity. It is remarkable that New Testament writers present the doctrine in such a manner that it does not violate the Old Testament concept of the oneness of God. In fact, they unanimously affirm the Hebrew monothestic faith, but they extend it to include the coming of Jesus and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The early Christian church experienced the God of Abraham in a new and dramatic way without abandoning the oneness of God that permeates the Old Testament. As a fresh expression of God, the concept of the Trinity—rooted in the God of the past and consistent with the God of the past—absorbs the idea of the God of the past, but goes beyond the God of the past in a more personal encounter.

The New Testament does not present a systematic presentation of the Trinity. The scattered segments from various writers that appear throughout the New Testament reflect a seemingly accepted understanding that exists without a full-length discussion. It is embedded in the framework of the Christian experience and simply assumed as true. The New Testament writers focus on statements drawn from the obvious existence of the trinitarian experience as opposed to a detailed exposition.

The New Testament evidence for the Trinity can be grouped into four types of passages. The first is the trinitarian formula of Matthew 28:19; 2 Corinthians 13:14; 1 Peter 1:2; Revelation 1:4. In each passage a trinitarian formula, repeated in summation fashion, registers a distinctive contribution of each person of the Godhead. Matthew 28:19, for example, follows the triple formula of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit that distinguishes Christian baptism. The risen Lord commissioned the disciples to baptize converts with a trinitarian emphasis that carries the distinctiveness of each person of the Godhead while associating their inner relationship. This passage is the clearest scriptural reference to a systematic presentation of the doctrine of the Trinity.

Paul, in 2 Corinthians 13:14, finalized his thoughts to the Corinthian church with a pastoral appeal that is grounded in "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit" (NIV). The formulation is designed to have the practical impact of bringing that divided church together through their personal experinece of the Trinity in their daily lives. Significantly, in the trinitarian order Christ is mentioned first. This reflects the actual process of Christian salvation, since Christ is the key to opening insight into the work of the Godhead. Paul was calling attention to the trinitarian consciousness, not in the initial work of salvation which has already been accomplished at Corinth, but in the sustaining work that enables divisive Christians to achieve unity.

In 1 Peter 1:2, the trinitarian formula is followed with reference to each person of the Godhead. The scattered Christians are reminded through reference to the Trinity that their election (foreknowledge of the Father) and redemption (the sanctifying work of the Spirit) should lead to holy living obedience to the Son.

John addressed the readers of Revelation with an expanded trinitarian formula that includes references to the persons of the Godhead (Rev. 1:4–6). The focus on the triumph of Christianity crystallizes the trinitarian greeting into a doxology that acknowledges the accomplished work and the future return of Christ. This elongated presentation serves as an encouragement to churches facing persecution.

A second type of New Testament passage is the triadic form. Two passages cast in this structure are Ephesians 4:4–6 and 1 Corinthians 12:3–6. Both passages refer to the three Persons, but not in the definitive formula of the previous passage. Each Scripture balances the unity of the church. Emphasis is placed on the administration of gifts by the Godhead.

A third category of passages mentions the three persons of the Godhead, but without a clear triadic structure. In the accounts of the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:3–17; Mark 1:9–11; and Luke 3:21–22), the three synoptic writers recorded the presence of the Trinity when the Son was baptized, the Spirit descended, and the Father spoke with approval. Paul, in Galatians 4:4–6, outlined the work of the Trinity in the aspect of the sending Father. Other representative passages in this category (2 Thess. 2:13–15; Titus 3:4–6; and Jude 20–21) portray each member of the Trinity in relation to a particular redemptive function.

The fourth category of trinitarian passages includes those presented in the farewell discourse of Jesus to His disciples (John 14:16; 15:26; 16:13–15). In the context of these passages, Jesus expounded the work and ministry of the third person of the Godhead as the Agent of God in the continuing ministry of the Son. The Spirit is a Teacher who facilitates understanding on the disciples' part and, in being sent from the Father and the Son, is one in nature with the other Persons of the Trinity. He makes known the Son and "at the same time makes known the Father who is revealed in the Son" (16:15). The discourse emphasizes the interrelatedness of the Trinity in equality and operational significance.

All of these passages are embryonic efforts by the early church to express its awareness of the Trinity. The New Testament is Christological in its approach, but it involves the fullness of God being made available to the individual believer through Jesus and by the Spirit. The consistent trinitarian expression is not a formulation of the doctrine, as such, but reveals an experiencing of God's persistent self-revelation.

In the postbiblical era, the Christian church tried to express its doctrine in terms that were philosophically acceptable and logically coherent. Greek categories of understanding began to appear in explanation efforts. Discussion shifted from the New Testament emphasis on the function of the Trinity in redemptive history to an analysis of the unity of essence of the Godhead.

A major question during those early centuries focused on the oneness of God. The Sabelians described the Godhead in terms of modes that existed only one at a time. This theory upheld the unity of God, but excluded His permanent distinctiveness. The Docetists understood Christ as an appearance of God in human form, while Ebonites described Jesus as an ordinary man indwelt with God's power at baptism. Arius was also an influential theologian who viewed Jesus as subordinate to God. To Arius, Jesus was a being created by God, higher than man, but less than God. This idea, as well as the others, was challenged by Athanasius at Nicea (A.D. 325), and the council decided for the position of Jesus as "of the exact same substance as the Father."

Probably the most outstanding thinker of the early centuries was Augustine of Hippo (A.D. 354–430). He began with the idea of God as one substance and sought explanation of the Godhead in psychological analogy: a person eixsts as one being with three dimensions of memory, understanding, and will; so also the Godhead exists as a unity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. While this explanation is helpful and contains the concept of three persons in one, it does not resolve the complex nature of God.

Perhaps four statements can summarize and clarify this study. 1. God is One. The God of the Old Testament is the same God of the New Testament. His offer of salvation in the Old Testament receives a fuller revelation in the New Testament in a way that is not different, but more complete. The doctrine of the Trinity does not abandon the monotheistic faith of Israel.

2. God has three distinct ways of being in the redemptive event, yet He remains an undivided unity. That God the Father imparts Himself to mankind through Son and Spirit without ceasing to be Himself is at the very heart of the Christian faith. A compromise in either the absolute sameness of the Godhead or the true diversity reduces the reality of salvation.

3. The primary way of grasping the concept of the Trinity is through the threefold participation in salvation. The approach of the New Testament is not to discuss the essence of the Godhead, but the particular aspects of the revelatory event that includes the definitive presence of the Father in the person of Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit.

4. The doctrine of the Trinity is an absolute mystery. It is primarily known, not through speculation, but through experiencing the act of grace through personal faith. See God; Jesus Christ; Holy Spirit. Jerry M. Henry

TRIUMPHAL ENTRY The entry of Jesus into the city of Jerusalem on the Sunday prior to His crucifixion. Due to the fact that palm branches were placed before Him, this day is often called "Palm Sunday." The event is recorded in Matthew 21:1–9; Mark 11:1–10; Luke 19:29–38; John 12:12–15. All accounts agree in substance with each adding certain detail. Whether by prearrangement or by divine foreknowledge, the disciples found a colt in Bethphage as Jesus had described (Matthew ties the account closely to Zechariah's prophecy (9:9), mentioning the colt and its mother.) It is likely that Christ rode the donkey for the more difficult part of the journey, transferring to the colt upon actually entering Jerusalem. There a large crowd applauded Him, spreading the road with their garments and with branches. They acknowledged Him as the son of David.

The triumphal entry is of vital significance in understanding the messianic mission of Jesus. Prior to this moment, Jesus had refused to allow any public acknowledgement of His being the Messiah. By conducting His ministry outside Jerusalem, He had avoided further intensification of conflict with the Jewish religious leaders. Now, however, the time was at hand. The opponents of Jesus understood the strong messianic implications of the manner of His entry into Jerusalem. The riding upon the colt, the garments and palm branches in the road, and the shouts of the multitude—all of this pointed to Jesus as the Messiah. When He was urged to quiet the people, Jesus replied, "If these become silent, the stones will cry out!" (Luke 19:40 NAS).

Ironically, though the triumphal entry was a public acceptance of being the Messiah and presented a direct challenge to His enemies, it must have been a disappointment to many of His followers. Christ did not enter Jerusalem upon a war horse of conquest but upon a colt representing humility. As a result, the religious leaders demanded His crucifixion, while the multitudes ultimately turned away with indifference. See Jesus, Life and Ministry; Messiah. Steve Echols

TROAS (Trō ăs) A city in northwest Asia Minor visited by Paul during his second and third missionary journeys (Acts 16:8,11; 20:5–6; 2 Cor. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:13). Troas was founded before 300 B.C. by Antigonus, a successor of Alexander the Great and was located about ten miles south of the city of Troy. The emperor Augustus (31 B.C.—14 A.D.) made it a Roman colony. It served as an important seaport in the Roman Empire for those traveling between Asia Minor and Macedonia. Today, ruins of the city wall (about six miles in circumference), a theater, and an aqueduct remain. See Asia Minor; Paul. Scott Langston TROGYLLIUM (Trō ġȳl′ lĭ ŭm) Promontory on the west coast of Asia Minor less than one mile across the strait from Samos, a stopping place on Paul's return to Jerusalem according to the Western text of Acts 20:15.

TROPHIMUS (Trŏph′ ĭ mŭs) Personal name meaning, "nutritious." Gentile Christian from Ephesus who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem for the presentation of the collection (Acts 20:4–5; 21:29). Paul's free association with Trophimus led to the false charge that Paul had defiled the Temple by bringing a Gentile within the Court of Israel (Acts 21:19). The Trophimus whom Paul left in Miletus (2 Tim. 4:20) is either another Trophimus or else evidence for a second Roman imprisonment. (According to Acts, Paul did not pass by Miletus on his way to Rome).

TRUTH That which is reliable and can be trusted. The Bible uses truth in the general "factual" sense. Truth may designate the actual fact over against appearance, pretense, or assertion. In Zechariah 8:16 (NRSV) the Lord of hosts declared: "These are the things that you shall do: Speak the truth to one another, render in your gates judgments that are true and make for peace." When Jesus asked, "Who touched my garments?" the woman who had been healed through touching Jesus' garments "fell down before him, and told him all the truth" (Mark 5:32– 33). In 1 and 2 Timothy, truth is correct knowledge or doctrine. Certain individuals had departed from proper doctrine. Some "forbid marriage and demand abstinence from foods, which God created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and know the truth" (1 Tim. 4:3 NRSV.) Some have "swerved from the truth by claiming that the resurrection has already taken place (2 Tim. 2:18 NRSV.)

God and the Biblical Use of Truth The essential idea of truth in the Bible is not conformity to some external standard but faithfulness or reliability. In the case of God, of course, faithfulness or reliability is not measured by any external standard. God is the standard. God's truth (faithfulness or reliability) is the truth that is basic for all other truth, (Deut. 7:9–10). He maintains covenant and steadfast love. When God is spoken of as the true God or the God of truth (Deut. 32:4; 2 Chron. 15:3; Isa. 65:16; Jer. 10:10) the idea is that God is reliable. God "keepth truth for ever" (Ps. 146:6).

The "truth" of God's commandments grows out of the fact of God and His truth (faithfulness or reliability). The Word of God and His law are not true simply in the sense that they are in accord with science, human nature, or some abstract ethical principle. The great confession given by Ezra after the Jews returned from bondage in Babylon emphasized God's nature as truth (faithfulness) in what He did in creation, election, redemption, and the giving of the law: "You came down also upon Mount Sinai, and spoke with them from heaven and gave them right ordinances and true laws, good statutes and commandments, and you made known your holy sabbath to them and gave them commandments and statutes and a law through your servant Moses" (Neh. 9:13–14 NRSV).

The truth of God is reflected not only in His commandments; it is to be reflected in human life generally. "Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart: for consider how great things he hath done for you" (1 Sam. 12:24).

Important New Testament Concepts of Truth The most important uses of the word truth are to be found in Paul and writings of John. Paul's acceptance of the Old Testament concept of truth is seen in Romans 3:1–7. The truth of God is described in the words "faithfulness" (3:3) and "justice" (3:5). In 3:4, Paul declared, "Although everyone is a liar, let God be proved true" (NRSV).

In Paul's discussion of the relationship of Christians to truth, we find the same Old Testament emphasis: "Therefore, let us celebrate the festival, not with the old yeast, the yeast of malice and evil, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5:8 NRSV). Truth and sincerity are associated, and both are opposed to malice and evil. Truth is not simply a matter of propositional accuracy. Paul spoke of truth as something that is to be obeyed (Rom. 2:8; Gal. 5:7). Paul spoke of the truth of God as being revealed not so much in the law as in Christ (Rom. 15:8–9). In Christ, God's kingdom has become manifested

(Rom. 1:1–6; 16:25–26; 2 Cor. 4:6). The truth and the gospel are related in the phrase "the truth of the gospel" (Gal. 2:5,14). One hears and believes the truth and is in Christ (Eph. 1:13).

The Johannine writings identify Christ with the truth: "The law indeed was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. No one has ever seen God. It is God the only Son, who is close to the Father's heart, who has made him known" (John 1:17–18 NRSV). In testimony before Pilate, Jesus declared: "For this I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone who belongs to the truth listens to my voice" (John 18:37 NRSV). God is the truth; and since Christ shares in the truth of God, He is full of grace and truth. He is "the way, the truth, and the life" (John 14:6); He is the true Light and the true Vine (John 1:9; 15:1). In the Gospel of John, the activity of the Holy Spirit is associated with the activity of Jesus in so far as truth is concerned. When the Advocate comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, who comes from the Father, he will testify on my behalf. You also are to testify because you have been with me from the beginning" (John 15:26–27 NRSV).

John emphasized the appropriation of the truth by disciples. In Jesus' high priestly prayer, He prayed: "Sanctify them in the truth; your word is truth. As you have sent me into the world, so I have sent them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in truth" (John 17:17–19 NRSV). Followers of Christ are of "the truth" (John 18:37 NRSV). This knowledge of truth is not simply "head knowledge." It is a matter of receiving Christ (John 1:11–13). This acceptance of Jesus and receiving of the truth is accompanied by walking in the truth or in the light (2 John 4; 3 John 3–4; 1 John 1:7). It is in light of this understanding of truth that John can speak of doing the truth (John 3:21; 1 John 1:6). Edgar V. McKnight

TRYPHAENA; TRYPHOSA (Trȳ phāe′ nȧ; Trȳ phō′ sȧ) Personal names meaning, "dainty" and "delicate." Two women whom Paul greeted as "workers in the Lord" (Rom. 16:12). The two were perhaps deacons serving the Roman church (compare Phoebe in Rom. 16:1 NRSV) or else "marketplace" evangelists like Priscilla (Acts 18:26; Rom. 16:3). The similarity of their names suggests the two were perhaps (twin) sisters.

TUBAL (Tū′ bȧl) Son of Jepheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5) and ancestor of a people, known for their metalworking ability, likely of Cappadocia or Cilicia in Asia Minor (Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:13; 32:26; 38:2–3; 39:1).

TUBAL-CAIN (Tū′ bȧl-Cain) Son of Lamech, associated with the origin of metalworking (Gen. 4:22). The two elements in his name mean, "producer" and "smith."

TUNIC Loose-fitting, knee length garment worn next to the skin (Matt. 10:10; Mark 6:9). See Cloth, Clothing.

Relief of two Roman men wearing tunics partially visible beneath their outer togas.

TURBAN Headdress formed by wrapping long strips of cloth around the head. A distinctive headdress formed part of the garb of the high priest (Ex. 28:4,37,39; 29:6; 39:28,31; Lev. 8:9; 16:4). Removal of one's turban was a sign of mourning or shame (Isa. 3:18–23; Ezek. 24:17,23). See Cloth, Clothing; Headband; Headdress.

TURNING OF THE WALL The expression used in the KJV elsewhere translated as "the corner butress" (NAS), "the Angle" (NRSV), "the escarpment" (REB), and "the angle of the wall" (NIV). One segment of the Jerusalem ramparts probably located near the palace. It was fortified by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:9) and rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:19–20,24). Not to be confused with "the corner" (Neh. 3:31) nor associated with the corner gate.

TYCHICUS (Tȳch′ ĭ cŭs) Personal name meaning, "fortunate." One of Paul's fellow workers in the ministry. A native of Asia Minor (Acts 20:4), he traveled with the apostle on the third missionary journey. Tychicus and Onesimus carried the Colossian letter from Paul (Col. 4:7–9), and were to relate to the church Paul's condition. Paul also sent Tychicus to Ephesus on one occasion (2 Tim. 4:12) and possibly to Crete on another (Titus 3:12). Tradition holds that he died a martyr.

TYPOLOGY A method of interpreting some parts of Scripture by seeing a pattern which an earlier statement sets up by which a later is explained. The Creek words that help us understand typology come under a verbal root that means "to beat, strike, or smite." In building construction, what is "beaten out" can become a pattern. This article will examine how various words in the family are used and how typology functions in interpreting the Old Testament.

Foundational Words and Meanings All of these related words show the effects of an imprint. (Translations in this article are the author's.)

1. Blow, strike, mark A literal meaning tupos is found in the narrative about Thomas' skepticism: "If I do not see in his hands the mark (tupos) of the nails and place my finger into the mark of the nails and place my hand into his side, I will not believe" (John 20:25). Jesus invited Thomas to examine His hands and side. Then Jesus urged: "Stop becoming an unbeliever, but rather become a believer" (John 20:27). Thomas showed he did just that when he exclaimed, "My Lord and My God" (John 20:28).

2. Technical model or pattern Both Hebrews 8:5 and Acts 7:44 use tupos to refer to Exodus 25:40, where the Lord commanded Moses to make the furniture and utensils of the tabernacle "by the pattern which you were seeing in the mountain." The Hebrew word for pattern is tabniyth, from a Hebrew root meaning "to build." The noun means "construction, pattern, or figure." The writer of Hebrews stressed that Christ could not be an earthly priest, for such priests served in the copy and shadow of heavenly things. Moses saw an earthly copy of the heavenly reality. Jesus became a high priest and a minister of the holy places and true tent, which the Lord pitched (Heb. 8:2). Even this earthly language shows the superiority of Christ's heavenly priesthood to that of the earthly priests.

In Acts 7:44, Stephen said that the whole tabernacle, which he called "the Tent of the Testimony" (REB), was made according to "the pattern" that Moses had seen. But did Moses see the "heavenly tabernacle" that is called the pattern? Or did God grant to Moses to see a pattern from which a rough earthly counterpart of the heavenly reality could be constructed? I think it was the latter. The word tupos means a model or pattern.

3. Image or Status In Acts 7, Stephen said that Israel took up "the tent of Moloch and the constellation of the god Rephan—images, statues, which you made to worship them" (Acts 7:43). Here what is "stamped or beaten out" is an idol. The imprint became an object of worship.

4. Pattern as a mold or norm While Stephen pointed out a bad pattern in the case of idolatry, Paul emphasized a good pattern in Romans 6:17. Paul thanked God that, although the Romans were once slaves of sin, they became subject to the gospel. He described the gospel as "the pattern or norm of teaching for the learning of which you were given over [by God]." The gospel is a norm or pattern showing how we should live (compare Rom. 1:16–17).

5. Persons as examples or patterns When people internalize the gospel, their lives begin a process of transformation. Paul spoke of himself and his fellow workers as examples or patterns. He urged the Philippians to become imitators of himself: "you have us as an example or pattern" (3:17). He said to the Thessalonians, "But we gave ourselves to you as a model or pattern that you should imitate us" (2 Thess. 3:9). Paul obtained mercy and God showed His forbearance to Paul "for a model, pattern, example for those who were about to believe in Christ" (1 Tim. 1:16).

The Thessalonians, by their faith during tribulation, became models or patterns for believers in Macedonia and Achaia. "In every place their faith had gone forth" (1 Thess. 1:7–8). Paul commanded Timothy to be a pattern or model for believers in "message, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. 4:12). At the same time, Timothy had his own standard to guide him: "constantly have a standard of sound words which you heard from me in the sphere of faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 1:13). Titus likewise was to be a model or pattern of good works, soundness in teaching, respectfulness, sound preaching that is beyond reproach (Titus 2:7–8). Peter urged all the elders to become examples or patterns for the flock rather than "lording it over" the flock (1 Pet. 5:3). Christians, and especially Christian leaders, are being watched and often imitated. The pattern or model they exhibit is crucial.

Typology as a Method of Interpreting the Old Testament Sometimes the New Testament explicitly refers to its method of interpreting the Old Testament as "type," or "typically." Usually, however, the New Testament uses typology as a method of interpreting the Old Testament without explicitly saying so. Typology involves a correspondence, usually in one particular matter between a person, event, or thing in the Old Testament with a person, event, or thing, in the New Testament. All elements except this one may be quite different, but the one element selected for comparison has a genuine similiarity in the two different historical contexts.

1. Old Testament warnings Paul used this kind of typology in 1 Corinthians 10:1–11. He rehearsed the experiences of the people of Israel in the Exodus and in their forty years years in the desert: the destruction of Pharaoh's army in the sea (Ex. 14—15); the eating of manna (Ex. 16); their conduct when thirsty—Rephidim—striking the rock (Ex. 17); Kadesh—speaking to the rock (Num. 20); sin of the gold calf (Ex. 32); fornication with the daughters of Moab at Baal of Peor (Num. 25); murmuring when going from Mount Hor around the land of Edom (Num. 21). Paul stressed one point of correspondence between the Old Testament events and the New Testament message: All the people participated in these experiences, but God was not pleased with most of them; the majority died in the desert and could not enter the Promised Land (1 Cor. 10:5). Paul pointed to this conduct of the majority who angered God as types or warning patterns, models, examples for Christians (1 Cor. 10:6). Christians are not to desire evil things, as in the golden calf incident, and as at Baal-Peor (1 Cor. 10:7–8). They were not to complain or murmur as the Israelites did when they were bitten by fiery serpents or in the judgment of the sons of Korah (1 Cor. 10:9–10; compare Num. 16; 21). Paul concluded, "Indeed, these things happened to them as a typological warning, but they were written for our admonition unto whom the end of the ages has arrived" (1 Cor. 10:11).

2. Adam as a type of Christ Paul compared Adam and Christ in Romans 5:12–21. He argued that Christ's deed is much more powerful than Adam's transgression. Paul said specifically that Adam "is a type of the one who was to come" (v. 14). Certainly, huge differences separate Adam and Christ. The one point of correspondence in the passage is the effect of influence upon humankind. Adam affected humankind adversely; Christ affects the same humankind for the good. Adam's trespass brought a verdict of condemnation of all people; Christ's righteous deed brought the gracious benefit to all people for the acquittal that brings life (vv. 16,18). Where sin abounded, grace was overflowing in greater abundance (v. 20). To make Christ's deed effective, people must receive the abundance of God's grace and the gift of righteousness (v. 17).

3. Baptism as a fulfillment of the type Peter, after discussing Christ's work in preaching in the spiritual realm to spirits in prison, mentioned Noah's ark and the flood: "Into which ark a few [eight persons] were saved through water, which water [baptism] as a fulfullment of the type now saves you through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, not through removing of dirt from the body but as a pledge of a good conscience towards God" (1 Pet. 3:20–21). Baptism is a drama of faith. Here it is called a pledge—an acted-out pledge of a good conscience. We are saved by faith expressed in water baptism. What is the one point of correspondence with the flood? The flood was a type of baptism because people of faith (and recipients of God's favor) experienced deliverance. Noah and his family were delivered by the ark and the water; Christians expressing in baptism genuine faith are delivered from bondage to sin.

One point of correspondence between an Old Testament event and a New Testament event shows the same God at work in both covenants. Typology, a comparison stressing one point of similarity, helps us see the New Testament person, event, or institution as the fulfillment of that which was only hinted at in the Old Testament.

TYRANNUS (Tȳ răn′ nŭs) Latin form of the Greek term tyrant, a ruler with absolute authority. After Paul withdrew from the synagogue in Ephesus, he preached for two years at the lecture hall of Tyrannus (Acts 19:9). Tyrannus was either the owner of the hall or a prominent philosopher associated with it. According to some Western texts, Paul preached from 11:00 until 4:00 p.m., the time of the afternoon break from work. If accurate, this tradition explains the availability of the hall (schools generally met in the morning) and the freedom of "all Asia" to hear Paul during their "siesta."

TYRIAN (Tȳr′ ĭ an) Person from Tyre.

TYROPOEON VALLEY A narrow depression between Jerusalem's Ophel (Hill of David) and the western or upper hill of the city. It was much deeper in ancient times but has been filled up with debris through the centuries, especially since the destruction of the city by the Romans in A.D. 70. When David captured the city, the valley served as one of the natural defensive barriers. During Hellenistic times it was included within the city walls. During Herod's building campaign, he constructed bridges across the valley to connect the palace area with the Temple complex.

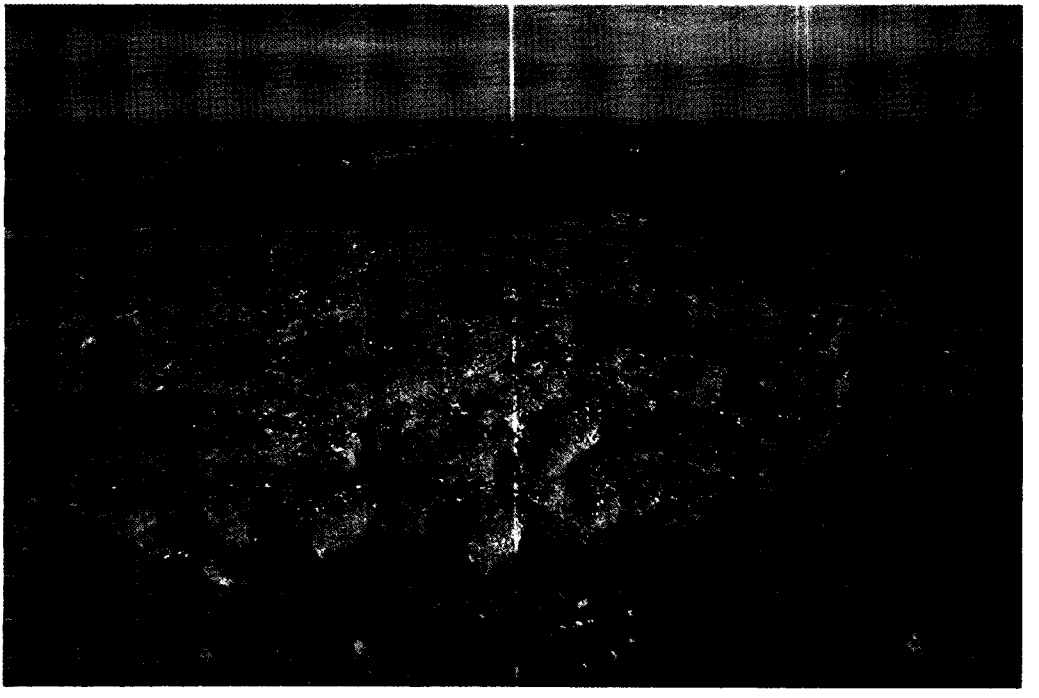
UCAL (Ū′ căl) Personal name meaning, "I am strong" or "I am consumed." A pupil of Agur, the wisdom teacher responsible for Proverbs 30 (Prov. 30:1). REB followed the earliest Greek translation in rendering the proper names Ithiel and Ucal as "I am weary, God, I am weary and worn out" (compare NRSV).

UEL (Ū′ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "will of God," or a contraction of Abiel, meaning, "God is father." Contemporary of Ezra with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:34; KJV, Juel).

UGARIT An important city in Syria whose excavation has provided tablets giving the closest primary evidence available for reconstructing the Canaanite religion Israel faced.



Location The ruins of the ancient city of Ugarit lie on the Mediterranean coast about nine miles north of Latakia. The contemporary name is Ras Shamra, "head [land] of fennel." Located at the juncture of major trade routes from Anatolia, northwest Mesopotamia, and Egypt and possessing a harbor (modern Minet el-Beida) which accommodated vessels from Cyprus, the Aegean, and Egypt, Ugarit was an important commercial center in most periods until the Sea People destroyed it in 1180 B.C. Its culture was cosmopolitan, so much so that it is difficult to identify those elements which were uniquely Ugaritic. Although it was the capital of a city-state, it was most often under the power or dominating influence of larger states.

The Excavations Although the existence of Ugarit had been known from Mesopotamian and Egyptian documents, its location was uncertain. In 1928, a farmer's discovery of what turned out to be an extensive cemetery just north of Minet el-Beida led in 1929 to excavations in the cemetery and on the tell nearby (Ras Shamra). In that first season of excavations, important texts written in a previously unknown cuneiform script were discovered, one of which mentioned that the document was written during the time of Niqmaddu, king of Ugarit. This was the first indication that the site was indeed ancient Ugarit.

Excavations were carried out annually, 1929–1939, under the direction of C. F. A. Schaeffer. After the hiatus caused by World War II, excavations were resumed and continued on a regular basis through 1976. In addition, adjacent sites have either been surveyed or excavated. The history of the city may now be traced from its earliest beginnings in the prepottery Neolithic period (about 6500 B.C.), through the Chalcolithic, Early Bronze, and Middle Bronze periods, to its complete and final destruction in the Late Bronze period soon after 1200 by the Sea Peoples. We have no evidence that the site of Ugarit was ever occupied again, although artifacts from as late as Roman times have been found.

The Late Bronze city of Ugarit, covering about seventy acres, contained the remains of palaces, temples, private dwellings, workshops, storage areas, and fortifications. There were found temples dedicated to Baal and to El; between these buildings was located the house of the high priest and scriptorium. On the northwestern side of the tell were located the palaces. The material culture of Late Bronze Ugarit was of the highest order, showing cultural influences from all the surrounding areas.

The most significant discoveries at Ugarit for the study of both history and religion are the discoveries of the epigraphic materials. Clay tablets and other inscriptions representing eight languages have come to light. The majority of these documents consist of economic and administrative texts, private correspondence, and liturgical-religious texts which represent major mythological themes.

From the first season of excavation there began to emerge a large number of clay tablets written in an unknown script. The new script, used to inscribe texts in the Ugaritic language, was in alphabetic cuneiform consisting of thirty-one signs, twenty-eight of which were consonants and three of which indicated the letter 'aleph as used with three different vowels. For the student of the Bible, the religious and mythological texts present a rather full picture of Canaanite religious practice and belief already known from the Bible. See Canaan.

The study and evaluation of all the material remains from Ugarit and contiguous sites will continue until the archaeological history can be clarified, until the fullest possible social and political history can be written, and until the full yield of information from the Ugaritic texts has been achieved.

The Religious Texts The poetic mythological texts and poetic legends have elicited the greatest interest because of the information they provide about Canaanite religion. Foremost is the Baal-Anath cycle which has survived in a number of large tablets and smaller fragments. It is difficult to determine the exact story line because there is little agreement on the order of the tablets. The central figure was Baal, the god of storm cloud and rain or the giver of life and fertility, who struggled against his foes in order to gain a dominant position in the pantheon. The head of the pantheon was El who appears in the epic as far removed, almost a god emeritus, although nothing could be accomplished without his approval. Asherah and Anath were the consorts of El and Baal, respectively. Baal's antagonists were Prince Sea (Yam) and Mot (god of the dry season and underworld). Having received permission to build a house (temple), Prince Sea struck fear into the hearts of the gods by demanding that Baal be surrendered to him. But Baal defeated Prince Sea in an episode reminiscent of Marduk's defeat of the sea monster, Tiamat, in the enuma elish. See Babylon. Then Baal was permitted to build a palace (temple) as symbol of his new status among the gods. However, Baal's mightiest foe, Mot, defeated Baal, crushing him like a kid in his gullet, and taking him down to the netherworld. The world went into mourning. El wept piteously at the news, gashing his back, chest, and arms, while Anath, having found Baal's corpse, put on sackcloth and bewailed the death of the lord of life. Mot boasted of his victory to Anath, whereupon she slew Mot, ground him up and scattered his remains over the fields. Then came the joyous cry that Baal was alive; the rains came, and the world returned to life.

The myth was closely related to the cycle of the year and described the ongoing struggles between life and death. While Baal ruled half the year, giving rain and crops, Mot held dominion over the other half: the dry season. Fertility religion consisted in part of various magical and ritual practices designed to bring Baal back to life. Hints of these practices are given in the Baal-Anath cycle. El, upon hearing that Baal was dead, gashed his body: "He harrows the roll of his arm, he plows his chest like a garden, harrows his back like a plain." Like the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18), he was practicing imitative magic as though preparing the fields to receive the rain. For her part, Anath wept for Baal, the falling tears intended to encourage the rain to fall. In addition to these acts, in actual practice the Canaanites employed sacred prostitution and other imitative practices to restore fertility to the world. See Fertility Cults.

The Legend of King Keret and the Legend of Aqhat are also related in some way to the fertility cycle. King Keret, having lost his seven wives to various tragedies before they could give him an heir, bewailed his fate. In a dream, El told him to attack another kingdom to obtain another wife who could produce an heir. Keret succeeded in this, and eight sons and eight daughters were born to him. However, apparently because of an unfulfilled vow, Keret fell sick; his impending death seemed to affect the fertility of the land. El intervened, death was shattered, and Keret returned to normal life. The full significance of the Keret legend is difficult to determine, whether it is a cultic myth or a social myth with a historical basis, but it does seem to affirm the central role of the king in the fertility of land and people.

The legend of Aqhat also treats the typical elements of the birth of a long-awaited son, the tragedy of death, and the possibility of immortality. Danel's son, Aqhat, was given a composite bow which the goddess Anath coveted. Anath promised Aqhat immortality if he would give her the bow, but Aqhat refused and was killed. The rains then failed for seven years. Aqhat's sister was sent to avenge his death, but the text broke off before the story was completed, leaving unanswered the question whether Aqhat was restored to life and the drought ended. While the connection of the legend with fertility is clear enough, there is no clear consensus on how to interpret the legend.

These myths and legends, together with others like Shachar and Shalim and Nikkal and the Kathirat, may have been used as the spoken parts of annual or periodic rituals. In any case these texts, together with other artifacts, provide a more complete picture of Canaanite religious practice which proved such a temptation to the Israelites (compare the Book of Judges) and against which the prophets protested.

Importance for Old Testament Study The Ugaritic texts and material remains offer Old Testament scholars primary resources for much of their study.

1. Lexicography. The Ugaritic texts have provided a welcome resource for clarifying the meanings and nuances of unknown and obscure words and phrases in the Old Testament. Although we must use due caution because of the chronological, geographical, and cultural factors which separate the Ugaritic texts from the Old Testament texts, no scholar today would neglect the linguistic data provided by Ugarit. New readings of biblical texts in the light of Ugaritic grammar, syntax, and lexicon open up innumerable possibilities for new or revised interpretations and translations. Translators now do not hasten so quickly to emend the Hebrew text on the basis of early translations. They look first to Ugaritic evidence.

2. Poetic studies. Poetic parallelism, the chief characteristic of Hebrew poetry, is characteristic of Ugaritic poetry as well. Indeed, the study of Ugaritic poetic texts makes one more sensitive to the sophisticated techniques of the psalmists and other poets. Clear Ugaritic cases of chiastic construction, composite divine names separated within a verse, nouns and verbs serving a double-duty function, characteristic word-pairs, and the analysis of meter by the counting of syllables are helpful in the analysis of Hebrew poetry, especially the Psalms.

3. Religion. While about 250 deity names occur in the texts from Ugarit, a much smaller number actually comprised the pantheon. Many of these names are known in the Old Testament: El, Baal, Asherah, Anath, Yarih (moon), Shahar, Shalim, Mot, Dagon, for example. The existence of the divine assembly (Ps. 82; Job 1—2) is attested at Ugarit, especially in the Baal-Anath cycle. The practice of imitative magic in order to manipulate deity and the natural order is mentioned often (compare 1 Kings 18:28; Jer. 41:5). So too was religious prostitution (compare Deut. 23:18; Hos. 4:14). All in all, the texts from Ugarit give a rather full picture of the type of fertility religion, characteristic of an agricultural people, which many Israelites adopted in most periods of Israelite history. A comparative study of Hebrew and Ugaritic texts allows one to see the common cultural and religious possessions as well as the distinctive characteristics of each. Thomas Smothers

ULAI (Ū′ lâi) Canal connecting the Kerkha and Abdizful rivers just north of Susa (Dan. 8:2,16).

ULAM (Ū′ lăm) Personal name meaning, "first" or "leader." 1. Descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16–17). 2. Leader of a family of Benjaminite archers (1 Chron. 8:39–40).

UNITY State of being undivided; oneness.

Old Testament Central to the faith of Israel is the confession of the unity of God: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord Your God is one Lord" (Deut. 6:4). Because God is one, one set of laws was to apply to both Israelites and foreigners (Num. 15:16). Human history is a story of sin's disruption of God's ordained unity. God's ideal for marriage is for husband and wife to experience unity of life, "one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). Sin in the garden bred mistrust and accusation (3:12). Stubbornness of will ("hardness" of heart, Mark 10:5) continues to disrupt God's desired unity in marriage. God's ideal for the larger human family is again unity. The primeval unity of humanity ("one language" Gen. 11:1) was likewise disrupted as a result of sinful pride (11:4–8). The prophetic vision of God's future anticipates the day when God will reunite the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah, bringing back all the scattered exiles (Ezek. 37:15–23). Indeed, the prophetic hope includes the reuniting of all the peoples of the world under the sovereignty of the one Lord (Zech. 14:9).

U

New Testament Jesus prayed that His disciples would experience unity modeled on the unity Jesus experienced with the Father (John 17:11, 21–23). Such unity verifies Jesus' God-sent mission and the Father's love for the world. Jesus' prayer for unity was realized in the life of the earliest church. The first believers were together in one place; they shared their possessions and were of one heart and soul (Acts 2:1,43; 4:32). As in the Old Testament, sin threatened the God-ordained unity. The selfishness of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11), the prejudice of those who neglected the Greek-speaking widows (6:1), the rigidness of those who demanded that Gentiles become Jews before becoming disciples (15:1)—all threatened the unity of the church. In every circumstance, however, the Holy Spirit led the church in working out creative solutions that challenged the church to go beyond dissension to ministry (Acts 6:2–7; 15:6–35). Paul spoke repeatedly of believers as "one body in Christ" which transcends varieties of giftedness (Rom. 12:5–8; 1 Cor. 12:13,27–30) and human labels (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14–15; 3:6). For Paul, the unity of the church reflects the unity of the Godhead: one God (1 Cor. 12:6); one Lord (Rom. 10:12; 1 Cor. 12:5; Eph. 4:5); and one Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4,11; also Acts 11:17). Christian unity has various aspects: the shared experience of Christ as Lord and confession of Christ in baptism (Eph. 4:5,13); the shared sense of mission ("one mind," Phil. 2:2); the shared concern for one another (1 Cor. 12:25; "same love," Phil. 2:2; 1 Pet. 3:8); and the shared experience of suffering for Jesus' sake (2 Cor. 1:6; Phil. 1:29–30; 1 Thess. 2:14; 1 Pet. 5:9). Chris Church

UNLEAVENED BREAD Bread baked without using leaven, a substance such as yeast which produces fermentation in dough. Unleavened bread was often served to guests (Gen. 19:3; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24). The eating of unleavened bread took on special significance through the Feast of Unleavened Bread celebrated in connection with Passover (Ex. 12:8,15,20; 13:3,6–7). See Exodus; Festivals; Passover.

UNNI (Ŭn′ ni) Personal name perhaps meaning, "afflicted" or "answered." 1. Levitical harpist in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,20). 2. Levite returning from Exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:9). The Hebrew Masoretic text reads Unno; the scribal marginal notes (Qere) read Unni.

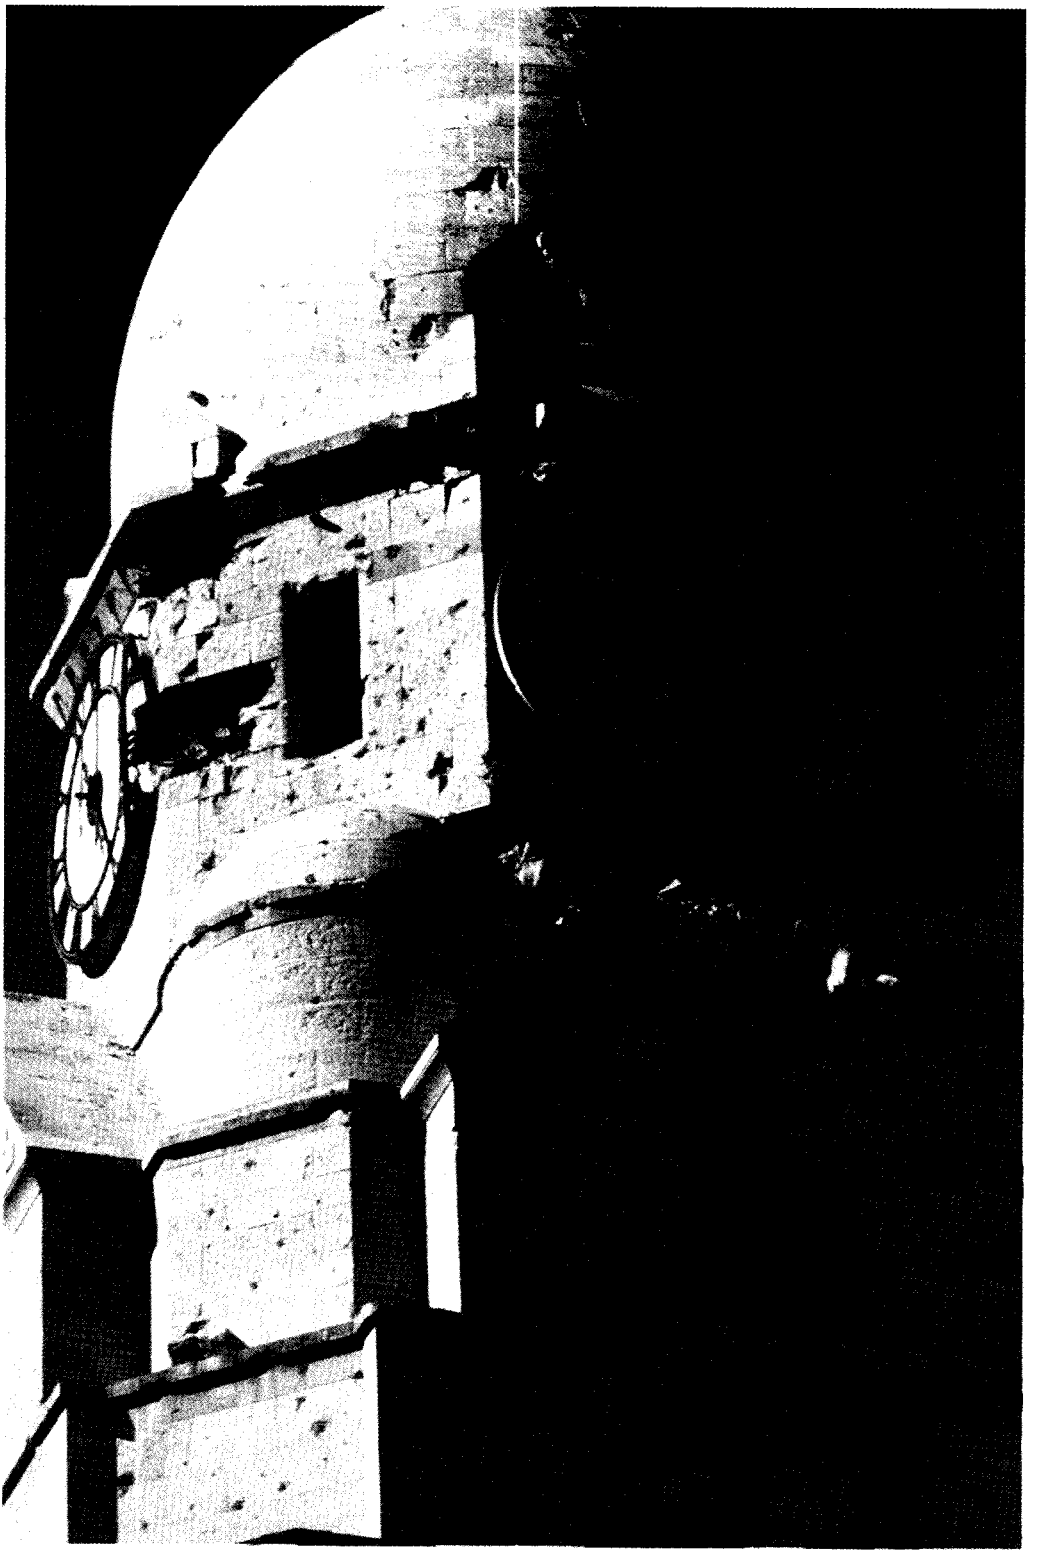
UNPARDONABLE SIN, THE Setting one's mind against the Holy Spirit and crediting Satan with what is obviously God's work. To understand the unpardonable sin referred to in Matthew 12:31–32, is to understand what it is not.

It is not: murder, lying, stealing, suicide, adultery, taking the Lord's name in vain, a sin committed in ignorance, a sin that a Christian can commit, or a sin that a person may feel he or she has committed.

It is: to blaspheme against the Holy Spirit. To blaspheme means to speak an insult against someone so as to defame the person's reputation and character. The unpardonable sin is a persistent and deliberate sin against light, maintained in the face of the positive work of the Holy Spirit. This can happen to people today. Jesus was not talking about a sin of His day only; it can happen anytime. It happens when a person sees a work that is without question God's work and not human work, but says it is Satan's work!

What is the Holy Spirit's work? To point one to Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord. The unpardonable sin is committed today when one sets mind and will and spirit against the Holy Spirit. This is telling the Spirit that He is trying to do something evil in the person's life by pointing one to Jesus. When do people reach that point? No one knows for sure, but each time people reject the movement of the Holy Spirit and Jesus' claim upon their lives, that sense of urgency and conviction gets weaker until, finally, it is too late.



Two points occur in a person's life when salvation may not be possible. Salvation cannot come before the Holy Spirit convicts a person; and salvation cannot come after the person no longer feels conviction, because rejection has hardened the heart. That is why the invitation to trust Jesus Christ is always now. See Blasphemy; Devil; Holy Spirit; Sin. Jim Henry

UR (Ûr) Place name meaning, "fire oven." An ancient city in lower Mesopotamia that is mentioned in the Bible as Abraham's birthplace. Ur, Kish, and Uruk were three important population centers in Sumerian and Babylonian civilization. Abraham's family home is alluded to in Genesis 12:1 and Acts 7:2. The site associated with Ur is located in present-day Iraq, in the lower eastern portion of the Fertile Crescent. It is identified with tell el-Muqayyar some 350 km (220 mi) southeast of Baghdad. The site is an oval shape and had harbor facilities on the Euphrates River, until its course shifted twelve miles east from the city's western limit. With the river's shift, the city lost both its population and prominence. Other sites have been proposed for the biblical Ur, such as Urartu (Turkey) or Urfa (northwest of Haran). Occupation of tell el-Muqayyar began about 4000 B.C. and was important in Sumerian, Babylonian, and neo-Babylonian cultures. The third dynasty of Ur was its most prosperous and highly developed period. Important remains discovered were a ziggurat (a three stage, stepped pyramid) and royal tombs. This Sumerian site is most probably to be identified as Abraham's city of origin. Yet, as with most identifications, such can be questioned. URBANE (Ûr′ bāne) KJV spelling of Urbanus.

URBANUS (Ûr bā′ nŭs) Personal name meaning, "of the city," that is, "elegant, refined." Roman Christian whom Paul greeted as a "helper in Christ" (Rom. 16:9).

URI (Ū′ rī) Personal name meaning, "fiery." 1. Father of the tabernacle artisan Bezalel (Ex. 31:2; 35:30). 2. Father of Geber, one of Solomon's officers charged with providing the royal household food for a month (1 Kings 4:19). 3. Postexilic, Levitic singer with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

URIAH (Ū rī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "fire of Yah." 1. A Hittite mercenary, or a native, perhaps noble Israelite of Hittite ancestry, in David's army (2 Sam. 11), a member of David's elite warriors (23:39). He was the husband of Bathsheba, the woman with whom David committed adultery. The sin led to the eventual murder of Uriah after the king could cover the affair no longer. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Josephus report that Uriah was Joab's weapon-bearer. Uriah displayed more character and morality than did the king. See Bathsheba; David.

2. High priest in Jerusalem Temple under King Ahaz who followed the king's instructions in setting up an altar in the Temple according to a Syrian pattern (2 Kings 16:10–16). He apparently served as a witness for Isaiah (8:2).

3. Priest in time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4,21). 4. Person who helped Ezra in informing the people of God's word (Neh. 8:4).

URIEL (Ū′ rĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God is light" or "flame of God." 1. Chief of the Levites assisting in David's transport of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 6:24; 15:5,11); 2. Grandfather of King Abijah of Judah (2 Chron. 13:2).

URIJAH (Ū rī′ jah) Personal name meaning, "flame of Yahweh." Variant spelling of Uriah. 1. Chief priest who complied with Ahab's order to build an Assyrian-style altar for the Jerusalem Temple (2 Kings 16:10–16). Ahab likely hoped the incorporation of foreign elements into Israel's worship would impress the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser with his loyalty. 2. Prophet who joined Jeremiah in preaching against Jerusalem. When king Jehoiakim ordered his execution, Urijah fled to Egypt. He was, however, captured, returned to Jerusalem, and executed (Jer. 26:20–23).

URIM AND THUMMIM (Ū′ rĭm and Thŭm′ mĭm) Objects Israel, and especially the high priest, used to determine God's will. Little is known about the Urim and Thummim. They are first mentioned in Exodus as being kept by the high priest in a "breastplate of judgment" (Ex. 28:15–30). Later, Moses gave the tribe of Levi special responsibility for their care (Deut. 33:8). After Aaron's and Moses' death, Eleazar was to carry and to use the lots to inquire of the Lord (Num. 27:18–23). They apparently were two objects that served as sacred lots. See Lots. That is, they were used to determine God's will or to receive a divine answer to a question. Saul called for their use, for instance, in determining who had broken Saul's vow in a battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 14:41–45). This text also hints as to how the objects were used. They were "given," perhaps drawn or shaken from a bag. One object gave one answer. The other lot gave another answer. Probably, whichever lot came out first, that was understood to be God's answer. The Urim and Thummim were not, however, automatic or mechanical. God could refuse to answer. Saul sought the spirit of Samuel through a witch because God would not answer Saul through Urim or dreams or prophets (1 Sam. 28:6–25).

The ultimate fate of the Urim and Thummim is unknown. In Nehemiah's time, expectation continued that someday a priest would arise with Urim and Thummim (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65). This probably refers to the ability to receive an answer from the Lord, however, rather than a return of the lots given to Aaron. See Oracles; Lots; High Priest. Albert Bean

USURY (Ūs′ ŭ rȳ) A sum of money charged for a loan. The Old Testament laws prohibited a Jew from charging another Jew usury but permitted it when money was loaned to a Gentile (Deut. 23:19–20). Although the word has negative connotations today, it was not so in biblical days when usury simply was the interest charged for a loan. Excessive usury was condemned.

UTHAI (Ū thâi) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is help" or "He has shown Himself supreme." 1. Postexilic descendant of Judah

(1 Chron. 9:4). 2. Head of a family of those returning from Exile (Ezra 8:14).

UZ (ŭz) Personal and place name perhaps meaning, "replacement." 1. Unspecified territory, most likely in Hauran south of Damascus (Jer. 25:20) or else between Edom and northern Arabia (Job 1:1; Lam. 4:21). 2. Descendant of Shem's son Aram (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17) and progenitor of an Aramaean tribe. 3. Descendant of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:21). 4. Descendant of Esau (Gen. 36:28) and member of the Horite branch of Edomites.

UZAI (ū′ zâi) Personal name meaning, "hoped for" or "He has heard." Father of one helping with Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25).

UZAL (ū′ zăl) Son of Joktan and ancestor of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). Scholars have linked the tribe with Izalla in northeastern Syria and Azalla near Medina. Ezekiel 27:19 includes them among Tyre's trading partners.

UZZA (ŭz′ zȧ) Personal name meaning, "strength." 1. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7). 2. Descendant of Levi (1 Chron. 6:29). 3. Head of a family of postexilic Temple servants or nethinim (Ezra 2:49). 4. Owner of the garden in which Manasseh and Amon were buried (2 Kings 21:18,26).

UZZA Variant English spelling of Uzzah.

UZZAH (ŭz′ zah) Personal name meaning, "He is strong." 1. One of the drivers of the cart carrying the ark of the covenant when David began moving it from the house of Abinadab in Gibeah to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:3). When the ark started to slip from the cart, Uzzah put out his hand to steady it, and God struck him dead for touching the holy object (6:6–7). 2. Ancestor of exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 2:49). 3. Name of garden in which kings Manasseh and Ammon were buried. This distinguished them from other kings who "slept with their fathers," that is, were buried in the royal tomb. Uzzah may have been a noble who owned the garden burial plot or may have been a variant spelling of the Canaanite god Attar-melek. 4. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7). 5. Family of Temple servants who returned from Exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49). 6. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:29).

UZZEN-SHEERAH (ŭz′ zĕn-Shē′ ė rah) Place name meaning, "ear of Sheerah." Village which Ephraim's daughter, Sheerah, founded (1 Chron. 7:24). The site is perhaps Beit Sira three miles south of lower Beth-horon.

UZZI (ŭz′ zī) Personal name; an abbreviated form of "Yahweh is my strength." 1. Aaronic priest (1 Chron. 6:5–6,51; Ezra 7:4). 2. Family of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2–3). 3. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7; 9:8). 4. Overseer of Jerusalem Levites after the Exile (Neh. 11:22). 5. Postexilic priest (Neh. 12:19). 6. Musician involved in Nehemiah's dedication of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 12:42).

UZZIA (ŭz zī′ ȧ) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is strong." One of sixteen whom the Chronicler added to the list of David's "thirty" elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:44).

UZZIA(H) (ŭz zī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is might." 1. Descendant of Levi (1 Chron. 6:24). 2. Father of one of David's treasurers (1 Chron. 27:25).

3. Also known as Azariah (2 Kings 15:1,6–8,17,23,27); son and successor of King Amaziah of Judah. "All the people of Judah" declared Uzziah king when he was sixteen (2 Kings 14:21; 2 Chron. 26:1). Some conjecture that the Judeans, rather than have King Joash of Israel install a puppet king, put Uzziah forward as king following Amaziah's defeat and subsequent imprisonment by Joash (2 Chron. 25:21–24). According to this reconstruction, Uzziah began his reign about 792 B.C. and continued as joint regent after his father's release upon the death of Joash (2 Chron. 25:25).

Uzziah's reign was a time of great material prosperity for Judah. Uzziah mounted a successful campaign against the Philistines, destroying the walls of some of their chief cities, Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod. To secure the caravan route along the Mediterranean coast (Via Maris), Uzziah built cities, perhaps military outposts, in the vicinity of Ashdod and at other sites on the Philistine plain (2 Chron. 26:6). To secure the eastern caravan route (the King's Highway), Uzziah rebuilt Elat (Eloth), the strategic port on the gulf of Aqaba (26:2) and campaigned against the Arabs of Gurbaal (possibly Gur east of Beersheba), the Meunites (a branch of Edomites), and the Ammonites (2 Chron. 26:7–8). Uzziah refortified the walls of Jerusalem with towers (2 Chron. 26:9; compare 25:23). His construction of numerous cisterns and military outposts in the wilderness (the Arad Negeb) made widespread settlement possible. Archaeological evidence confirms that construction in the Negeb flourished during Uzziah's reign. Uzziah was a lover of the soil who promoted agriculture (2 Chron. 26:10). Unlike his predecessors who relied on the troops to supply their own arms, Uzziah armed his troops with the most advanced weapons (2 Chron. 26:11–15).

Uzziah is not so much remembered as the leader who brought Judah to a golden age rivaling David's and Solomon's empires, but as the "leper king." The brief account of Uzziah's reign in 2 Kings 15:1–7 portrays the king as one who did what "was right in the sight of the Lord" (15:3). No explanation for the king's affliction is given in Kings other than "the Lord struck the king" (15:5 NRSV). The Chronicler traced Uzziah's leprosy to his prideful attempt to ursurp the priestly prerogative of offering incense in the Temple (2 Chron. 26:16–20; compare Num. 16:1–40; 1 Sam. 13:8–15). Thereafter, his son Jotham reigned in his stead, though Uzziah likely remained the power behind the throne (26:21). As a leper, Uzziah was denied burial in the royal tombs at Jerusalem. Rather, he was buried in a field (26:23).

4. Postexilic priest with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21). 5. Descendant of Judah and father of a postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4).

UZZIEL (Ŭz' zī ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God is strength." 1. Descendant of Levi (Ex. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:2,18) and ancestor of a subdivision of Levites, the Uzzielites (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 15:10; 26:23). 2. One captain in the successful Simeonite attack on the Amalekites of Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 3. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7). 4. Levitical musician (1 Chron. 25:4). 5. Levite involved in Hezekiah's reform (2 Chron. 29:14). 6. Goldsmith assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the Jerusalem walls (Neh. 3:8).

UZZIELITE (Ŭz zī e' līte) Member of Levitical clan of Uzziel.

VAIN Self-conceit, usually a translation of a number of words that mean, "nothingness" or "unreliability." In relation to God, trying to thwart His will is vain (Ps. 2:1; see Acts 4:25). Trying to do things without God's help is vain (Ps. 127:1). We are warned not to take God's name in vain (as though it were nothing) in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20: 7; Deut. 5:11). Mark warned that believers are not to give God vain lip service but obedience from the heart (7:6–7; see Isa. 1:13; 29:13; Jas. 1:26).

VAIZATHA (Vai' za tha) Modern translations' spelling of Vajezatha.

VAJEZATHA (Va jez' a tha) Persian personal name perhaps meaning, "the son of the atmosphere." One of Haman's ten sons the Jews killed after Esther gained permission to retaliate against Haman's deadly plan (Esth. 9:9).

VALLEY Depression between mountains, a broad plain or plateau, a narrow ravine, or a low terrain. "Valleys" of varying shapes and sizes mark Palestine's landscape.

Five Hebrew terms are designated "valley" in the Old Testament. Bikeah is a broad plain (Gen. 11:2; Isa. 41:8). Gaye is a deep ravine, gorge, or valley (Isa. 40:4; Zech. 14:4). Nahal is a wadi, that is the bed of a stream which is often dry (Num. 34:5; Ps. 124:4; Ezek. 48:28). Emech is a long, broad sweep between parallel ranges of hills (Num. 14:25; Josh. 8:13; Jer. 21:13). Shephelah is the low land, plain, or slope sweeping gently down from mountains (Deut. 10:1; Josh. 9:1; Jer. 17:26). One Greek term, pharanx, is used in the New Testament for each of these.

Valley is often used symbolically to refer to the difficulties of life. The classic example of this is Psalm 23:4. All people go through these trials, but God is present with His people, protecting them during these times. See Palestine.

VANIAH (Vå nī' ah) Personal name possibly meaning, "worthy of love." Man who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

VASHNI (Vash' ni) Personal name perhaps meaning, "weak." Samuel's son according to Hebrew text of 2 Chronicles 6:28 (KJV), which reads literally, "And sons of Samuel the firstborn Vashni and Abiah." Modern translations and commentators follow 1 Samuel 8:2 and manuscripts of early versions, taking Vashni as a copyist's change from the similar Hebrew word for "the second" and inserting Joel.

VASHTI (Văsh' tī) Personal name meaning, "the once desired, the beloved." Wife of King Ahasuerus and queen of Persia and Media (Esth. 1:9). The king called for her to show off her beauty to a group he was entertaining, but she refused. Vashti was deposed as queen (1:19), and a beauty contest was arranged to select a new queen. Esther was chosen as the new queen (2:16). No records yet have been recovered which name Vashti as the queen of any king of the Medo-Persian Empire, leading some to speculate whether she was a historical person. The only other queen with Ahasuerus (also called Xerxes) was named Amestris. See Ahasuerus; Esther; Persia; Xerxes.

VEIL (KJV "vail") Cloth covering. 1. Womens' veils. Rebecca veiled herself before meeting Isaac (Gen. 24:65). Her veil was perhaps the sign that she was a marriageable maiden. Tamar used her veil to conceal her identity from Judah (Gen. 38:14,19). Another Hebrew term renders veil at Isaiah 3:23. Here veils are but one of the items of finery which the elite women of Jerusalem would lose in the coming seige. The same Hebrew term is rendered, "shawl" (NAS), "cloak" (NIV, REB), and "mantle" (KJV, NRSV) at Song of Solomon 5:7. There, removal of the shawl was part of a humiliating assault on the king's beloved. At Isaiah 47:2, the removal of one's veil is again a sign of shamelessness. Paul regarded the wearing of veils as necessary for women praying or preaching ("prophesying") in public (1 Cor. 11:4–16). 2. Moses' veil. Moses spoke to God with his face unveiled and then delivered God's message to the people with his face still unveiled. Afterwards, Moses veiled his face (Ex. 34:33–35). For Paul, Moses' practice illustrated the superiority of the new covenant: Christians see the abiding splendor of the era of the Spirit and God-given righteousness; Israel saw the fading splendor of the era of death reflected in Moses' face (2 Cor. 3:7–11). Moses' veil further illustrated the mental barrier preventing Israel from recognizing Christ in the Old Testament (3:12–15). Through faith in Christ the veil is removed, and believers enjoy free access to God which transforms life (3:15–18). 3. Imagery. The "veil which is stretched over the nations" (Isa. 25:7 NAS) is likely an image for death which is also swallowed up (25:8). The veil possibly includes reproach as well. 4. Temple veil. This curtain separated the most holy place from the holy place (2 Chron. 3:14). Only the high priest was allowed to pass through the veil and then only on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:2). At Jesus' death the Temple veil was ripped from top to bottom, illustrating that in Christ God had abolished the barrier separating humanity from the presence of God (Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; compare Luke 23:45). Hebrews 10:20 uses the tabernacle veil, not as the image of a barrier, but of access: Access to God is gained through the flesh of the historical Jesus (compare John 10:7).

VEILS See Kerchiefs for the reference to veils in Ezekiel 13:18,20.

VENGEANCE The English word vengeance is a principal translation of several Hebrew words related to the stem nqm and of ekdikeō (and cognates) in the Septuagint (or earliest Greek Old Testament) and in the New Testament. Behind the Hebrew usage of nqm stands a sense of the solidarity and integrity of the community which, having been damaged by an offense, must be restored by some deed of retaliation or punishment. The range of meaning of the motif, however, extends beyond "vengeance" and/or "punishment" to a sense of "deliverance."

Human revenge against an enemy or enemies is demonstrated in a broad range of circumstances in the Old Testament documents (Gen. 4:23–24; Jer. 20:10). Samson's reaction to his enemies (Judg. 15:7) is so described. Vengeance might be punishment directed toward another who has committed adultery with one's wife (Prov. 6:32–34) or toward a whole ethnic group such as the Philistines (1 Sam. 18:25). On occasion, the enemies of the people of God are described as acting vengefully (Ezek. 25:12,15,17). In the context of loving one's neighbor, human revenge toward fellow Hebrews was forbidden (Lev. 19:17–18; compare Deut. 32:35), but nqm may be used of legitimate punishment for a wrong (Ex. 21:20; compare Ex. 21:23–25; Lev. 24:19; Deut. 19:21).

As an activity of God on behalf of His people, nqm is sometimes best understood as retribution (Judg. 11:36). David was often the recipient of such favor (2 Sam. 4:48; 22:48; Ps. 18:47). The motif occurs in this sense in the prayers of Jeremiah (Jer. 11:20; 15:15; 20:12) and of the psalmist (Pss. 58:10; 79:10; 94:1). Note that deliverance is involved in several of these instances. The wrath of God was exhibited toward Babylon (Jer. 51:6,11,36; Isa. 47:3; Ezek. 24:7–9). In the song of Moses, such retribution is attributed to God alone (Deut. 32:35,41,43). Yet, the wrath of God might be extended toward the people of Israel because of their sin (Lev. 26:25).

Nqm has a sense of eschatological deliverance. This can be combined with an expression of God's wrath against Israel's enemies (Isa. 34:8). The parallel Isaianic phrases "day of vengeance" and "year of my redemption" have the same import (63:4; compare 61:1–3).

In the New Testament, the motif of "vengeance" (ekdikeō and cognates) occurs on relatively few occasions. Of the evangelists, Luke alone uses both the verb and the noun. In Jesus' parable of the unjust judge, a widow's persistent request for vendication from her enemy is grudgingly granted. Luke displayed the parable as a worst-case model of God's vendication ("deliverance") of His people (Luke 18:1–8). In another teaching of Jesus, "vengeance" has an eschatological dimension which is reflective of Isaiah 63:4 (Luke 21:22). A further Lukan example is found in Stephen's speech—this time retribution (Acts 7:24).

Paul forbade human vengeance much in the way of Deuteronomy 32:35 (compare Lev. 19:18), asserting that the Lord is the Avenger of wrong (Rom. 12:19; 1 Thess. 4:6–7). In the Corinthian correspondence, Paul used both noun and verb in the sense of "punishment." The usage seems designed to bring about repentance (2 Cor. 7:10–11; 10:5–6). On one occasion, Paul wrote of the ruler of a state as a servant of God, "a revenger to execute wrath upon him who doeth evil" (Rom. 13:4). Once, he wrote of the eschatological wrath (judgment) of God (2 Thess. 1:7–8; compare Isa. 66:15; Ps. 79:6).

The author of Hebrews also cited the Deuteronomic prohibition against human vengeance (Heb. 10:30; Deut. 32:35; compare Rom. 12:19; Lev. 19:18), and the author of 1 Peter referred to human governors as persons sent by God to punish evildoers (1 Pet. 2:14; compare Rom. 13:4).

In Hebraic fashion, the author of Revelation viewed God as the Avenger who vindicates His people against their enemies (Rev. 6:10; 19:2). Both of these usages have eschatological overtones (compare Isa. 63:1–6).

VENISON The flesh of a wild animal taken by hunting (Gen. 25:28; "game," NAS, NRSV; "wild game," NIV). The word is only used in the narrative of Jacob's stealing Esau's birthright. Isaac preferred Esau because of his love of wild game.

VENOM A poisonous secretion from an animal such as a snake, spider, or scorpion that is released into its victim by a bite or sting. Venom is a translation of rosh (Deut. 32:33; Job 20:16). The same Hebrew term is used for a dangerous, poisonous plant (Deut. 29:18; Hos. 10:4 among others). See Poison.

VESPASIAN (Vĕs pā′ sī ăn) Emperor of Rome A.D. 69–79. He was born into a wealthy family and became a military hero as commander of a legion under Emperor Claudius. After becoming commander of three legions, he was ordered to quell the Jewish revolt in Palestine in A.D. 66. Three years into the war, he answered the call of the army to become emperor. Vespasian left his command to his son, Titus, and went to Rome. He sought to establish a dynasty, but it lasted only through his two sons, Titus and Domitian. See Caesar; Rome; Titus Caesar.

VESSELS AND UTENSILS Implements or containers ordinarily used as in, for example, the Temple service or household activities. Vessels are utensils designed for holding dry or liquid products. A number of vessels and other utensils are mentioned in the Bible.

Vessel Materials Vessels in biblical times were made of a variety of materials. As early as 3000 B.C., cups and goblets of precious metals were made by silversmiths and goldsmiths throughout the Near East. These were used for religious service (Num. 7:13,19; 1 Chron. 28:17; 2 Chron. 4:8; Ezra 1:9–10; 8:27) or by persons of great wealth or authority (Gen. 44:2). Copper and bronze (Ex. 27:3; Lev. 6:28) vessels were also known.

Many containers, both large and small, were made of stone. Alabaster was easily carved and polished. It was especially prized for storage of perfumes (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3–4; Luke 7:37). According to rabbinical writings, stone containers were not susceptible to ritual uncleaness. Thus, a sizable industry existed in Jerusalem of New Testament times for making a variety of stone vessels. Excavations there have produced examples of all sizes and types, from large stone jars (John 2:6) turned on a lathe to cups carved by hand. By New Testament times, glass was becoming widely used for juglets and bottles. See Glass.

Baskets, made from reeds, were inexpensive containers which could be used for transportation and sometimes storage. Water or wine bottles were frequently made from animal skins (Josh. 9:4,13; Judg. 4:19; 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 2 Sam. 16:1; Neh. 5:18; Job 32:19; Ps. 119:83; Matt. 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37). Such leather vessels were popular among nomadic peoples for their durability.

By far the most widely used material for vessels was clay which was cheap and readily available. Indeed, pottery or "earthenware vessels" (Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14) were among the most common objects made in antiquity. The earliest ceramics, beginning before 5000 B.C., were handmade and somewhat crude. Though making pottery by hand continued, wheel-made pottery was predominant by Israelite times. See Pottery.

The abundance of pottery and widespread familiarity with the process of its manufacture provided object lessons for understanding spiritual truths. Isaiah refered several time to potters and their products. He likened the fury of God's chosen instruments to a potter treading clay (Isa. 41:25). Israel is compared to a potter's vessel which, when broken, will not yield a single useful fragment (Isa. 30:14). For Isaiah, the potter's work demonstrated the sovereignty of the Creator (Isa. 45:9). Paul took up the same analogy to make a point about election (Rom. 9:20–21): the potter can make any sort of vessel he chooses. Jeremiah also allegorically related a potter and his work to God, who molded His people Israel (the clay) and is able to rework a spoiled produce (Jer. 18:1–6). A completed clay vessel was used by the prophet to announce the fate of Jerusalem, which like the vessel would be irreparably smashed (Jer. 19:1–2,10–11).

The fragments, or sherds, of a broken pottery vessel are extremely hard (compare Job 41:30) and thus remain forever. They are found in enormous quantities at every Near Eastern archaeological mound or tell and were quite familiar to biblical persons. Job, for example, used a handy potsherd to scrape his sores (2:8). The ubiquitous sherds served as symbols of dryness (Ps. 22:15) and useless remnants (Isa. 30:14). See Potsherd.

Types of Vessels The Old Testament sometimes refers to pottery by a generic term translated, "earthen(ware) vessel" (Lev. 6:28; 11:33; 14:5,50; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14; NIV, "clay jar"). Only two types of vessels are specifically designated as pottery, "earthen pitchers" (Lam. 4:2) and "earthen bottle" (Jer. 19:1). Nevertheless, other common vessels mentioned in the Bible were presumably made of clay as well. The terms, especially for the Old Testament, are not entirely clear and are variously rendered even within the same English translation.

One of the most common and basic pottery forms was the bowl. Large mixing and serving bowls or basins (Ex. 24:6 NRSV, "basins"; Song of Sol. 7:2 NIV, "goblet"; Isa. 22:24 NRSV, "cups"), called kraters by archaeologists, generally had handles in the Israelite period. A different Hebrew word identifies similar, perhaps smaller, serving bowls (Judg. 5:25; 6:38). Sprinkling bowls (Num. 7:84–85 NRSV, "basins") were usually of metal. A generic word for bowl designates the silver vessels used in the dedication of the altar (Num. 7:84; NAS, "dishes"; NRSV, NIV, "plates"). The main "dish" (2 Kings 21:13; Prov. 19:24 NRSV; 26:15 NRSV; Matt. 26:23) at meals was actually a medium-sized handleless bowl. It was evidently large enough to use for boiling (2 Chron. 35:13; NRSV, NIV, "pans"). Smaller versions were used for other purposes (2 Kings 2:20). Plates did not become common until New Testament times. Cups in the modern sense also were virtually unknown in Old Testament times. Three Hebrew words so translated (Gen. 40:11; Isa. 51:17,22; Jer. 35:5; Zech. 12:2) refer to small bowls. Joseph's silver "cup" (Gen. 44:2,12,16–17) was probably a goblet or chalice. New Testament cups (Luke 11:39) remained bowl-like and varied in size.

A special bowl-like trough was used for kneading dough in bread making (Ex. 8:3; 12:34; Deut. 28:5,17). Other special bowls served as fireports for holding coals (Zech. 12:6). Lamps in the Old Testament were essentially bowls for oil whose rims were pinched in to hold a wick. By New Testament times, lamps (Matt. 25:1; Mark 4:21) were molded in two parts forming a covered bowl with central opening to which a handmade spout was added. See Lamps.

"Pot" in the Old Testament (Ex. 16:3; Num. 11:8; 2 Kings 4:38–41; Job 41:20,31 NIV, "caldron") generally translates several Hebrew words which designate cooking pots. In pre-Israelite times, these were similar to deep bowls without handles. Israelite cooking pots of the monarchy period usually had two handles and were more closed. A more globular shape with a short neck and smaller mouth also developed. New Testament cooking pots were similar, but smaller and more delicate with thin straplike handles. Cooking pots required a clay tempered with various grit materials to withstand the expansion of extreme heating and cooling. They were produced in graduated sizes much like their modern counterparts.

Another basic vessel type in antiquity was the storejar, tall oval or pear-shaped jars usually having two or four handles. The tops were closed with an appropriately shaped potsherd or by a clay stopper. Jars were used for storage of flour or meal (1 Kings 17:14) or for transport and storage of liquid rations such as water (Mark 14:13 KJV, "pitcher"; John 4:28 KJV, "waterpot"). A smaller jar was used for storing oil (2 Kings 4:2; KJV, "pot;" NIV, "a little"). Storejars were often designed to hold standard measures, a common size in the Old Testament period being two baths, averaging twenty-five inches high and sixteen in diameter. Typical storejars had rounded, almost pointed, bases and were placed in stands, holes in wood planks, or pressed into soft ground. A special type was shaped like a cylinder with no handles and a ribbed rim.

Jugs or pitchers (1 Kings 14:3 KJV, "cruse"; Jer. 19:1,10 KJV, "bottle;" Jer. 35:5 KJV, "pots") were smaller than storejars and generally had a single handle attached to the neck and shoulder. There were wide and narrow-necked varieties, the former being more likely to have a pinched rim forming a slight spout. A variation on the jug was the pilgrim flask, a flattened bottle with twin handles around a thin neck which functioned like a canteen. Saul may have used one of these (1 Sam. 26:11–12 NRSV, "jar"), but the same Hebrew word (1 Kings 17:14) can refer to the smaller juglet. Juglets with round or oblong bodies, a single handle, and small necks and openings, are well known to archaeologists who work in the Holy Land. They were used for dipping liquids out of large jars and keeping oil (1 Sam. 10:1 NRSV, "vial"; NIV, "flask"; 2 Kings 9:3 NRSV, NIV, "flask"). New Testament versions (variously translated) are mentioned as containers for oil (Matt. 25:4) and, in alabaster, for perfume (Matt. 26:7).

Utensils A general word for utensils (KJV, "vessels" or "furniture") is often used in the Old Testament as a collective term for the gold and bronze articles used in the tabernacle service (Ex. 25:39; 27:3,19; 30:27–28; NIV, "accessories," "utensils," or "articles"). These included snuffers, trays, shovels, pots, basins, forks, firepans, hooks, and the like. The same word is used of utensils used in the Temple service (1 Chron. 9:28–29; 2 Chron. 24:14–19; Jer. 27:18–21; NIV, "articles" or "furnishings") and for household articles (1 Kings 10:21; 2 Chron. 9:20; NRSV, "vessels").

Common household utensils included items for cooking. In Old Testament times, grain was ground by hand (Ex. 11:5; Isa. 47:2) using grindstones usually made of basalt, a hard volcanic stone with many cavities which made natural cutting edges. See Cooking and Heating. In the Roman world of the New Testament, large examples of millstones were common, the heavy upper stones (Matt. 18:6; Mark 9:42; Luke 17:2; Rev. 18:21) of which required animals or two persons (Matt. 24:41) to operate. Smaller grinding and crushing chores were done with a mortar and pestle (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22).

Eating utensils are not usually found in excavations and were probably made of wood. Knives (Gen. 22:6; Judg. 19:29; Prov. 30:14) for various purposes were made of flint (Josh. 5:2–3), copper, bronze, or iron. See Archaeology; Tools.

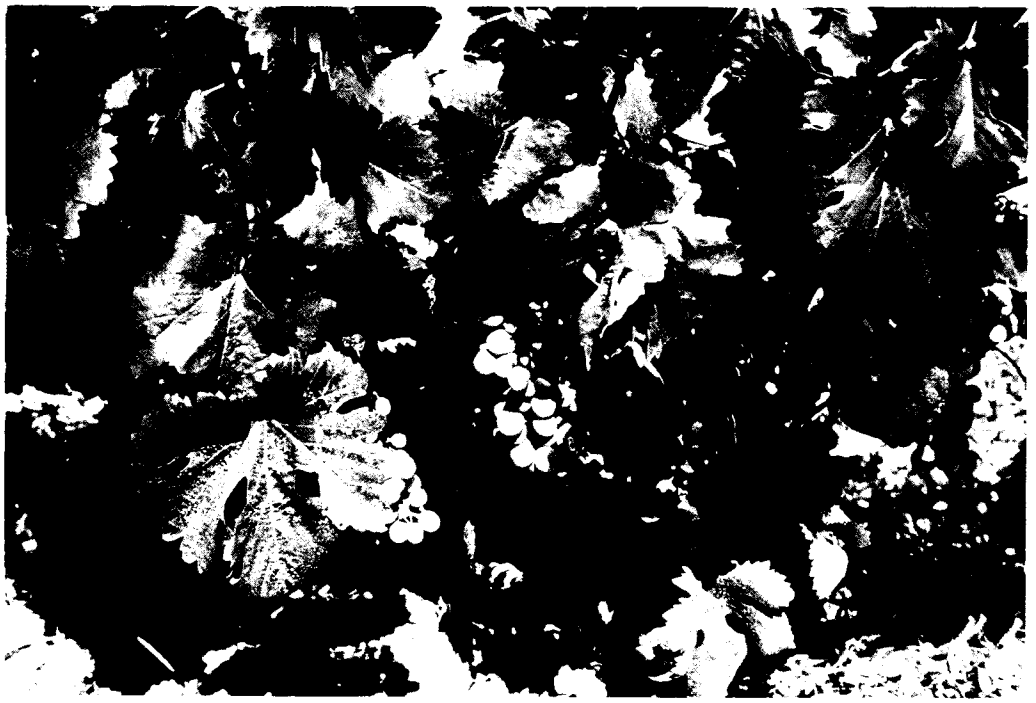
VIA DOLOROSA (Vī' ă Dō lŏ rō' să) Literally, "the way of suffering," the Via Dolorosa was marked after A.D. 1300 as the route over which Christ was led to His crucifixion. Fourteen places along the streets of Old Jerusalem have been revered as "stations" of the cross. Nine of these spots are marked by churches and shrines. The exact route is disputed among believers, just as is the place of crucifixion.



One of the stations on the Via Dolorosa ("the Way of Suffering," or "the Way of the Cross") in Jerusalem.

VIAL Vessel that held oil, usually for annointing purposes (1 Sam. 10:1 KJV, NRSV; "flask" NAS, NIV). The same word is used a number of times in the Book of Revelation (5:8; 15:7; 16:1–4,8,10,12,17; 17:1; 21:9; "bowls," NAS, NIV, NRSV). See Anoint; Oil; Vessels and Utensils.

VILLAGE The Old Testament distinguishes between the city and the village. The city was usually walled and much larger. The village was characterized by no wall and usually homes consisting of one room (Lev. 25:29,31). The village had little or no organized government. Archaeology shows Israelite villages built around the circumference, house walls joining to form the only defense system, and open community space left in the middle. Many villages had twenty to thirty houses. The cattle were kept in the inner open space, where grain was stored. The main job in the villages was farming. Small craft manufacturing was practiced. Usually a common threshing floor was available. Shepherds often gathered around villages. The pastureland was seen as the possession of the village (see 1 Chron. 6:54–60). VINE Any plant having a flexible stem supported by creeping along a surface or by climbing a natural or artificial support. While ancient Israel grew different types of plants that produced vines, such as cucumbers and melons (Num. 11:5; Isa. 1:8), the word vine in the Bible almost always refers to the grapevine or vineyard. The climate of Palestine was well suited for growing vineyards. Along with the olive and fig trees, the grapevine is used throughout the Old Testament to symbolize the fertility of the land (Deut. 6:11; Josh. 24:13; 1 Sam. 8:14; 2 Kings 5:26; Jer. 5:17; 40:10; Hos. 2:12).

The origin of viticulture lies in the antiquity of the unknown past. The Bible traces the origin of caring for vineyards to the time of Noah (Gen. 9:20–21). Such knowledge seems to have been an indigenous undertaking known in many regions of the ancient world. References to vineyards appear from the time of Gudea (a ruler in ancient Sumer before 2100 B.C.). A wall painting found in a tomb at Thebes in Egypt, dating from before 1400 B.C., depicts the entire process of wine making from the gathering and treading of the grapes to the storing of the wine in jars.

The planting and care of a vineyard required constant and intensive care. The most detailed description of the work involved is found in Isaiah 5:1–6. Hillsides are frequently mentioned as the most desirable locations for the vines, especially since they were less suitable for other forms of agriculture (compare Ps. 80:8–10; Jer. 31:5; Amos 9:13). However, vineyards were also grown in the plains and valleys; the Hebron area was particularly noted for its grapes (Num. 13:22–24).

Stone walls and/or hedges were usually built around the vineyard to protect the grapes from thirsty animals and from thieves (Song of Sol. 2:15; Jer. 49:9). Watchtowers were also built to provide further protection. The hewing out of a winepress or vat completed the vineyard installation (Isa. 5:2). During the harvesting season, the owner of the vineyard might live in a booth to stay close to his valuable crop (Isa. 1:8).

After the grapes had set on the branches, the vines were pruned (Lev. 25:4; Isa. 18:5; John 15:1–2). This process produced stronger branches and a greater fruit yield. The pruned branches were useless except to be used as fuel (Ezek. 15:2–8). The vines for the most past were allowed to run on the ground, though occasionally they might climb a nearby tree (compare Ps. 80:8–10; Ezek. 15:2; 19:11). Perhaps it was this latter occurrence that made it possible for a man to "sit under" his vine (1 Kings 4:25). Only in the Roman period were artificial trellises introduced.

The harvest of the grapes took place in August or September. How many grapes an average vineyard produced is unknown (compare Isa. 5:10), but a vineyard was considered so important that a man who had planted one was exempt from military service (Deut. 20:6). Some of the harvested grapes were eaten fresh (Jer. 31:29), and others dried into raisins (1 Sam. 25:18). Most were squeezed for their juice to make wine.

Several laws governed the use of vineyards in Old Testament times. Vineyards could not be stripped totally of their grapes; the owner was to allow gleanings for the poor and the sojourner (Lev. 19:10), and the fatherless and the widow (Deut. 24:21). See Gleaning. Vineyards were to lie fallow every seventh year (Ex. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:3–5), and other plants could not be sown in them (Deut. 22:9). This latter law apparently was not followed by New Testament times (compare Luke 13:6). Vineyards were cultivated by their owners, hired laborers (Matt. 20:1–16), or rented out to others (Song of Sol. 8:11; Matt. 21:33–43).

The Bible frequently uses vine or vineyard as symbols. Vine is often used in speaking of Israel. Thus Israel is said to have been brought out of Egypt and planted as a vine on the land but was forsaken (Ps. 80:8–13; compare Isa. 5:1–7). Israel was planted a "choice vine" but became a "wild vine" (Jer. 2:21; compare Hos. 10:1). As the dead wood of a vine is good for nothing but fuel, so the inhabitants of Jerusalem would be consumed (Ezek. 15:1–8; 19:10–14).

On the other hand, the abundance of vines and vineyards were seen as expressions of God's favor. The fruit of the vine gladdens the heart of humankind (Ps. 104:15; Eccl. 10:19) and suppresses pain and misery (Prov. 31:6–7). Israel was "like grapes in the wilderness" when God found them (Hos. 9:10), and the remnant surviving the Exile is compared to a cluster of grapes (Isa. 65:8). Finally, an abundance of the vine symbolizes the glorious age to come when the treader of the grapes will overtake the one who sows the seed (Amos 9:13–15; compare Gen. 49:10–12).

In the New Testament, Jesus often used the vineyard as an analogy for the kingdom of God (Matt. 20:1–16). Those who hope to enter the kingdom must be like the son who at first refused to work in his father's vineyard but later repented and went (Matt. 21:28–32 and parallels). Ultimately, Jesus Himself is described as the "true vine" and His disciples (Christians) as the branches (John 15:1–11). See Agriculture; Eschatology; Israel; Wine; Winepress.

VINEGAR Literally, "that which is soured," related to Hebrew term for "that which is leavened" and referring to a drink that has soured, either wine or beer from barley (Num. 6:3). In biblical times vinegar was most commonly produced by pouring water over the skins and stalks of grapes after the juice had been pressed out and allowing the whole to ferment. However, any fruit could be used for making wine or vinegar. Vinegar in two forms was forbidden to the Nazirite because of its association with strong drink (Num. 6:3). It irritates the teeth (Prov. 10:26) and neutralizes soda (Prov. 25:20). It was an unpleasant drink (Ps. 69:21), though some sopped bread in it (Ruth 2:14); some see this as the common Near Eastern chick-pea paste called chimmuts. In the New Testament it is mentioned only in connection with the crucifixion. The first instance, which Jesus refused, was a mixture used to deaden the sense of the victim and nullify the pain. Possibly the vinegar mentioned in the second instance, which Christ accepted, was the customary drink of a peasant or soldier called posca, a mixture of vinegar, water, and eggs.

Vinegar was most commonly used as a seasoning for food or as a condiment on bread (Ruth 2:14). Solomon figuratively used vinegar to describe the irritation caused by a lazy man's attitude.

VIOLENCE Use of force to injure or wrong. The Old Testament affirms that God hates violence (Mal. 2:16). The flood was God's response to a world filled and corrupted by violence (Gen. 6:11,13). The Exile was likewise God's response to a Jerusalem filled with violence (Ezek. 7:23). The Wisdom Literature often warns that those who live lives of violence will meet violent ends (Ps. 7:16; Prov. 1:18–19; 21:7; compare Matt. 26:52). Through the prophets God demanded an end to violence (Jer. 22:3; Ezek. 45:9). Such violence was especially evidenced in the oppression of the poor by the rich (Ps. 55:9,11; 73:6; Jer. 22:17; Mic. 6:12; Jas. 5:1–6). The servant of the Lord models a nonviolent response to violence (Isa. 53:9; compare 1 Pet. 2:23; Jas. 5:6). Isaiah anticipated the end of violence in the Messianic age (60:18).

Matthew 11:12 is one of the most difficult texts in the New Testament. Does the kingdom of heaven suffer violence (KJV, NAS, REB, NRSV), or does the kingdom come "forcefully" (NIV)? The violence which John the Baptist (Matt. 14:3–10) and believers (Matt. 5:10–11; 10:17; 23:34) suffer argues for the former. Other "violent" images of the kingdom's coming (Matt. 10:34–36; Luke 14:26–27) support the latter. Likewise, do violent men lay seige to the kingdom, or do "forceful men lay hold of it" (NIV)? Though the NIV interpretation fits well with Luke's parallel (16:16), it appears too much like an effort to tone down the real harshness of Matthew's language. Candidates for church leadership should be nonviolent persons (1 Tim. 3:3; Titus 1:7).

VIPER A poisonous snake. Several species of snakes are called vipers, and the various words used in the Bible for them probably do not designate specific types. Some scholars take the Old Testament references to refer to the Echis Colorata. Jesus spoke of the wicked religious leaders as vipers (Matt. 3:7) because of their venomous attacks on Him and their evil character in leading the people astray. Paul was bitten by a viper (Acts 28:3) but suffered no ill effect from it.

reference to the belief that Jesus was conceived in the womb of Mary by the miraculous action of God without a human father.

In the Old Testament two words are generally translated virgin or maiden. The more common word, bethulah, (used about 60 times) is used in a literal way to refer to such virgins as Rebekah (Gen. 24:16), the daughter of Jephthah (Judg. 11:37–38), and Tamar (2 Sam. 13:2). Specific command was given that the high priest must marry a virgin (Lev. 21:13–14). The word was also used in a spiritual sense to refer to the nation, especially in the prophets (Isa. 23:12; 37:22; Jer. 14:17). In other places the word is often translated maid or maiden (Ps. 78:63; 148:12; Ezek. 9:6). In these instances the word means girl, although the idea of chastity may still be involved.

The other word in the Old Testament, almah, sometimes translated "virgin" occurs only seven times. Translators differ in their treatment of it. It is translated virgin four times in KJV (Gen. 24:43; Song of Sol. 1:3; 6:8; Isa. 7:14). Only one of these is translated virgin (Isa 7:14) in NAS, and two, in NIV (Song of Sol. 6:8; Isa. 7:14). Some versions like REB do not translate this word as virgin in any passage. Isaiah 7:14 is of special interest because of its use in the Gospel of Matthew. Some believe the prophet wrote of a son to be born to his wife or to some other woman of the day and only then with a further reference to the birth of the Messiah. Others claim that the prophet had no reference to anyone in his day but only spoke of the coming Messiah. However, in its context in Isaiah, it seemingly was a message for King Ahaz. The word itself referred to a young woman, usually of marriageable age. God inspired Matthew to interpret Isaiah 7:14 for his day and ours in light of God's miraculous new work in Christ.

The word for virgin occurs fourteen times in the New Testament. It could refer to unmarried maidens (Matt. 25:1; Acts 21:9; 1 Cor. 7:34,36,37) or to the unmarried in general (1 Cor. 7:25). In these passages, the virginity of the unmarried is assumed. The word is also used in a spiritual sense (2 Cor. 11:2). The word is used of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt. 1:23; Luke 1:27). Mary was a young woman betrothed (engaged) to Joseph. From these passages the doctrine of the virgin birth is derived.

Matthew gave the account from the viewpoint of Joseph. He was betrothed to Mary. Before they were married, she was discovered to be pregnant. Joseph planned to divorce her without public scandal. Only then did God reveal to Joseph that the child was conceived through the Holy Spirit. This was seen as the fulfillment of the prophecy that a virgin would conceive and bear a son who would be named Emmanuel (Isa. 7:14). Luke gave the events from the viewpoint of Mary. An angel appeared to her while she was still a virgin betrothed to Joseph. It was revealed to her that she would bear a son who would be called "the Son of the Highest" (Luke 1:32). As in Matthew, no room is left in the account for human agency in the conception of Jesus.

Belief in the virgin birth is a central doctrine of Christian thought. Its basis lies in the two passages in Matthew 1 and Luke 1. The writers stated that Mary was a virgin when Jesus was conceived and when He was born. However, the real emphasis is upon the miraculous conception of Jesus. There was no human father. He was the Child of God. The new creative act of God is seen in His bringing His Son into the world.

One must not look upon this in a crude materialistic way. There is no thought of sexual relations between God and Mary, an idea which can be found in some pagan religions where the deities were thought of as engaging in such practices. Rather, God worked in a hidden, secret way which is beyond our ability to understand or explain.

Some believe the New Testament teaches that Mary remained a virgin, but it appears that she and Joseph had several children after the birth of Jesus: James, Joses, Judas, Simon, and sisters (Mark 6:3). Adherents of Mary's perpetual virginity believe Mark was referring to children of Joseph by a first marriage.

The virgin birth is not an explanation of the incarnation, that God became man in Jesus. The Gospels teach that it is the way that God chose to bring about the incarnation. It cannot be proved or disproved by human reason.

VISION An experience in the life of a person, whereby a special revelation from God was received. The revelation from God had two purposes. First, a vision was given for immediate direction, as with Abram in Genesis 12:1–3; Lot, Genesis 19:15; Balaam, Numbers 22:22–40; and Peter, Acts 12:7. Second, a vision was given to develop the kingdom of God by revealing the moral and spiritual deficiencies of the people of God in light of God's requirements for maintaining a proper relationship with Him. The vision of prophets such as Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, Micah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and John are representative of this aspect of revelation.

Several Greek and Hebrew terms are translated by the English word vision. In some references, the literal sense of perception with the physical organs of sight is the intended meaning of the word (Job 27:11–12; Prov. 22:29). In 2 Samuel 7:17; Isaiah 22:1,5; Joel 3:1; and Zechariah 13:4, the Hebrew word refers to the prophetic function of receiving and delivering the word of God by the prophet.

Vision in varying forms occurs approximately thirty times in the Book of Daniel. The term denotes the mysterious revelation of that which the prophet described as knowledge of the future. In Ezekiel, the words are used literally and metaphorically.

Among the classical prophets (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Obadiah, etc.) the vision was the primary means of communication between God and the prophet. By this avenue, the prophets interpreted the meaning of immediate events in the history of Israel. "Vision" and "Word of Yahweh" became synonymous in these prophetic writings (see Obad. 1:1). VOPHSI (Vŏph' sī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Father of Nahbi of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 13:14). Nahbi was one of the spies Moses sent into Canaan.

VOWS Voluntary expressions of devotion usually fulfilled after some condition had been met. Vows in the Old Testament usually were conditional. A common formula for vows was the "if . . . then . . ." phrase (Gen. 28:20; Num. 21:2; Judg. 11:30). The one making the religious vow proposed that if God did something (such as give protection or victory), then he or she in return would make some act of devotion. Not all vows, however, were conditional. Some, such as the Nazirite vow (Num. 6), were made out of devotion to God with no request placed upon God. Whether conditional or not, the emphasis in the Bible is on keeping the vow. A vow unfulfilled is worse than a vow never made. While vows do not appear often in the New Testament, Paul made one that involved shaving his head (Acts 18:18).

WAGES The terms of employment or compensation for services rendered encompass the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words. Their usage in the text applies to commercial activities and labor service, as well as judgmental recompense for one's actions in life.

In a mixed economy of agriculture and pastoralism without coined money, wages often included little more than meals and a place of employment (Compare Job 7:2; John 10:12). Still, a skilled shepherd, like Jacob, might receive a portion of the flock and thus begin his own herd (Gen. 30:32–33; 31:8; and legal texts from both Assyria and Babylonia). No fixed wage was set for farm laborers. They may have received a portion of the harvest (John 4:36), or, as in Matthew 20:1–8 an agreed upon daily wage. By law, these landless workers were to be paid at the end of each day for their efforts (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14–15). Texts mention enough instances of fraud, however, to suggest that this group was often cheated out of their wages (Jer. 22:13; Mal. 3:5; Jas. 5:4).

Kings hired mercenary troops to fight their wars (Judg. 9:4; 2 Sam. 10:6) and employed skilled laborers, along with slaves and unpaid draftees, to build and decorate their palaces and temples (1 Kings 5:6–17; Isa. 46:6; 2 Chron. 24:11–12). The services of priests (Judg 18:4; Mal. 1:10) and the advice of elders (Ezra 4:5; 1 Tim. 5:17–18) were obtained for gold or silver at fees to match their abilities. The authority of prophets could also be purchased. Balaam, for example, was paid "fees for divination" in exchange for his cursing of Israel (Num. 22:7), and Shemaiah was hired by Sanballat to trap Nehemiah with a false prophecy (Neh. 6:10–13).

Theological usage of these terms promises God's reward for the faithful (Gen. 15:1) and proper recompense for His people Israel (Isa. 40:10; 62:11). His justice also ensured that the reward of the unrighteous was equal to their crimes (Ps. 109:20; Rom. 6:23; 2 Pet. 2:15). See Commerce; Economic Life; Slavery.

WAGON A vehicle of transportation with two or four wooden wheels. The two wheeler was usually called a cart. Wagons were used to transport people and goods (Gen. 45:17–21). Sometimes, wagons were used as instruments of war (Ezek. 23:24). Wagons were usually pulled by oxen. The use of the wagon was quite different than that of the chariot. WAIL See Grief and Mourning; Repentance.

WALK A slower pace contrasted with running. It is used literally in the Bible (Ex. 2:5; Matt. 4:18). It is also used figuratively to mean a person's conduct or way of life (Gen. 5:24; Rom. 8:4; 1 John 1:6–7).

WALK TO AND FRO KJV translation (Zech. 1:10–11) of a military term meaning, "patrol" (NAS, NRSV) or "go and inspect" (TEV).

WALLS The outside vertical structures of houses and the fortifications surrounding cities. In ancient times, the walls of cities and houses were constructed of bricks made of clay mixed with reed and hardened in the sun. Archaeologists estimate that the walls of Nineveh were wide enough to drive three chariots abreast and the walls of Babylon were wide enough to drive six chariots abreast on the top. See Architecture; Fortifications.

In scriptural language a wall is a symbol of salvation (Isa. 26:1; Isa, 60:18), of the protection of God (Zech. 2:5), of those who afford protection (1 Sam. 25:16; Isa. 2:15), and of wealth of the rich in their own conceit (Prov. 18:11). A "brazen wall" is symbolic of prophets and their testimony against the wicked (Jer. 15:20). The "wall of partition" (Eph. 2:14) represented Temple worship and Jewish practice separating Jew from Gentile.

WANDERINGS IN THE WILDERNESS Israel's movements from Egypt to the Promised Land under Moses, including the place names along the routes. A reconstruction of the Israelites' wilderness wanderings is more complex than a casual reading of the biblical account at first would seem to indicate. The "wanderings" refer to that difficult period in Israel's history between their departure from the area of Egyptian enslavement in the land of Goshen and arrival in the Jordan Valley to claim their long-standing inheritance of the Promised Land (Ex. 12:31—Num. 33:49). The sequence of that extended event is complicated by the nature of the biblical data.

The itinerary from the border of Egypt to the oasis of Kadesh-barnea is relatively clear. Only three established trade routes across the northern Sinai were viable options for the movement of such a large contingent of people and livestock. Decisions in Egypt during the early stages of their migration reduced those options to only one. The shortest, most northerly, route along the Mediterranean shoreline was not taken because of a possible encounter with Egyptian military guarding oasis forts or returning from regular incursions and punitive raids in Canaan (Ex. 13:17). A second relatively direct route to Kadesh-barnea appears to have been avoided by divine plan when they approached the border at Etham and then were instructed to turn back to the seeming impossible situation "by the Sea" where God miraculously delivered them from the pharaoh's forces (Ex. 13:20—14:2). This route is identified with Marah (15:23), Elim (15:27), the Wilderness of Sin (16:1), Rephidim (17:1), the Wilderness of Sinai (18:5; 19:1), Sinai (19:2), the wilderness of Paran (Num. 10:12), Taberah (11:3) or Kibroth-hattaavah ("the cemetery of the lusters," 11:34), Hazeroth ("corrals," 11:35; 12:16) where the mention of enclosures for the livestock and a series of events in the biblical account suggest an extended stay, and, ultimately, Kadesh (Num. 20:1). A later reference to the distance between Mount Sinai (Horeb) and Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 1:2) seems to suggest that the early itinerary took them basically along the major trade route used by the Amalekites between modern Suez at the northern end of the Gulf of Suez and the northern end of the Gulf of Aqaba (Elath and Ezion-geber) and then northward into the extensive clustering of oases at Kadesh that would become their tribal center and the location of the tabernacle during the next 38 years.

The negative response to an immediate conquest following the spies' report resulted in the additional 38 years in the Sinai wilderness. When that generation of military died, the camp of Israel again was mobilized for the assault on Canaan. Their request to pass through Edomite territory and to proceed along the King's Highway through Moab and into the Jordan Valley opposite Jericho was blocked by a show of military force by the king of Edom. Their attempt to enter Canaan from the south was stopped by the king of Arad, and so a very difficult detour southward to the head of the Gulf of Aqaba and northeastward around Edomite and Moabite lands (Num. 20:14; Deut. 2) brought them finally to Mount Nebo overlooking the Jordan Valley north of the Dead Sea.

This itinerary is complicated by a comprehensive list of place names in Numbers 33 related to the Exodus and wanderings that includes many more locations seemingly playing a part in this extended event. Obviously, many of these places naturally may be related to the 38 years of the wanderings. More important is the fact that Numbers 33 indicates that in fact the Israelite itinerary from Egypt to the Jordan Valley did include passage through Edomite and Moabite territory along the King's Highway. This route cannot be associated with the Moses/Joshua-led Exodus because of the specific statements in Numbers 20—21. Many scholars therefore conclude that Numbers 33 is a combined compilation of place names that are related to pre-Mosaic infiltration from Egypt to Canaan by way of the King's Highway, the place along the second route around Edomite-Moabite territory followed by the Moses/Joshua-led contingent and all those places visited by the Israelites during those 38 punitive years of desert wanderings when like the nomads of every generation they sought water and pasturage for their flocks within that hostile arid environment of the Sinai. WATCH A division of time in which soldiers or others were on duty to guard something. They are listed as "evening," "midnight," "cockcrowing," and "morning" (Mark 13:35 NAS). Nehemiah set watches which may mean armed persons or just citizens on guard (4:9; 7:3). The Old Testament seems to have had three watches rather than four. There was the "beginning of the watches" (Lam. 2:19), the "middle watch" (Judg. 7:19), and the "morning watch" (Ex. 14:24). See Time.

WATCHMAN One who stands guard. Ancient cities had watchmen stationed on the walls. Their responsibility was to sound a warning if an enemy approached (2 Kings 9:17; Ezek. 33:2–3). Israel's prophets saw themselves as watchmen warning the nation of God's approaching judgment if the people did not repent. Vineyards and fields also had watchmen, especially during harvest. Their responsibility was to guard the produce from animals and thieves.

WATCHTOWER A tower on a high place or built high enough to afford a person to be able to see for some distance. The person doing the watching may be a soldier or a servant (2 Kings 9:17; Isa. 5:2; Mark 12:1). See Tower.

WATER The Bible speaks of water in three different ways: as a material resource, as a symbol, and as a metaphor.

A Material Necessity which God Provides Water as a material resource is necessary for life. The Bible states that God made water a part of His good creation and that He exercises sovereignty over it (Gen. 1—2; Isa. 40:12). He controls the natural processes of precipitation and evaporation, as well as the courses of bodies of water (Job 5:10; 36:27; 37:10; Pss. 33:7; 107:33; Prov. 8:29). God normally assures the provision of water for human needs (Deut. 11:14). However, water is sometimes used in punishment for sin, as with the flood of Noah's day (Gen. 6:17) or the drought proclaimed by Elijah (1 Kings 17:1). The divine control of water teaches people obedience to and dependency upon God.

Many of the great acts of God in history have involved water, such as the parting of the sea (Ex. 14:21), the provision of water for the Israelites in the wilderness (Ex. 15:25; 17:6), and the crossing of the Jordan River (Josh. 3:14–17). Water was also involved in several of Jesus' miracles (Matt. 14:25; Luke 8:24–25; John 2:1–11).

Water was a crucial element in God's gift of the Promised Land to Israel (Deut. 8:7). Palestine contains several natural sources of water: rain, springs, wells, and a few short, perennial streams. The average annual rainfall in Palestine is about 25 inches, all of which normally falls between November and April. The dry months of May to October made necessary the use of cisterns and pools for water storage. Several famous biblical cities had pools, such as Gibeon (2 Sam. 2:13), Hebron (2 Sam. 4:12), Samaria (1 Kings 22:38), and Jerusalem (2 Kings 20:20).

An Arab man drinks from the spout of a multi-spouted waterpot as he would have done in biblical times.

A Theological Symbol and Metaphor The Old Testament contains laws for the use of water in rituals as a symbol of purification. Priests, sacrificial meat, and ritual utensils were washed before involvement in rituals (Lev. 1:9; 6:28; 8:6). Unclean people and things were also washed as a symbol of ritual cleansing (Lev. 11:32–38; 14:1–9; 15:1–30; Num. 31:23). The Book of Genesis uses water as a symbol of instability before the completion of creation (1:2), and Ezekiel spoke of water as a symbol of renewal in the age to come (47:1–12).

The Bible contains dozens of metaphorical usages of water. For example, in the Old Testament water is a metaphor or simile for fear (Josh. 7:5), death (2 Sam. 14:14), sin (Job 15:16), God's presence (Ps. 72:6), marital fidelity (Prov. 5:15–16), the knowledge of God (Isa. 11:9), salvation (Isa. 12:3), the Spirit (Isa. 44:3–4), God's blessings (Isa. 58:11), God's voice (Ezek. 43:2), God's wrath (Hos. 5:10), and justice (Amos 5:24). Among the metaphorical uses of water in the New Testament are references to birth (John 3:5), the Spirit (John 4:10), spiritual training (1 Cor. 3:6), and life (Rev. 7:17). See Creation; Famine and Drought; Flood; Rain. Bob R. Ellis WATERPOT A vessel made for carrying water, usually made of clay although some were made of stone (John 2:6). Large pots stored water (1 Kings 18:33; John 2:6); smaller pots a woman could carry on her shoulder (John 4:28). Small pitchers were used for pouring water (Luke 22:10; see Jer. 19). Water was also carried in animal skins. See Pottery; Skin; Vessels and Utensils.

WAW The sixth letter in the Hebrew alphabet. Heading of Psalm 119:41–48 (KJV, Vau) in which each verse begins with the letter.

WEALTH AND MATERIALISM Physical resources God gives humans to control and the human tendency to lift those resources to replace God as the center of life.

The Bible and Wealth The Bible has two basic attitudes toward wealth. In the first place, wealth is acknowledged to be a blessing from God. This can be seen from the witness of the Old Testament. God chose Abram and promised to bless him and make his name great (Gen. 12:1–3). In the process, Abram became rich (Gen. 13:2). Further, we are told that God blessed Isaac; and he became very rich (Gen. 26:12–14). Solomon's wealth was seen as a sign of God's favor (1 Kings 3:13; 10:23). Job, too, was blessed by God, and his wealth increased greatly (Job. 42:12).

These few examples do not allow us to assume that poverty is a sign of God's disfavor. The Bible does not say that. Jesus' references to money in the New Testament consist mainly of stories or parables which show the dangers of wealth. In the parable of the seed and the sower Jesus warned that riches and the pursuit of pleasure may keep some from maturing in the faith (Luke 8:14). A harsh warning against the destructive nature of wealth is sounded in the story of the rich farmer (Luke 12:16–21). In Jesus' words, the person is a fool who labors to lay up treasures on earth rather than treasures in heaven. Of greater importance is Jesus' statement that life does not consist of one's possessions (Luke 12:15). Personal worth and success are not to be measured in terms of material wealth or possessions. This is different from the way that the world views possessions.

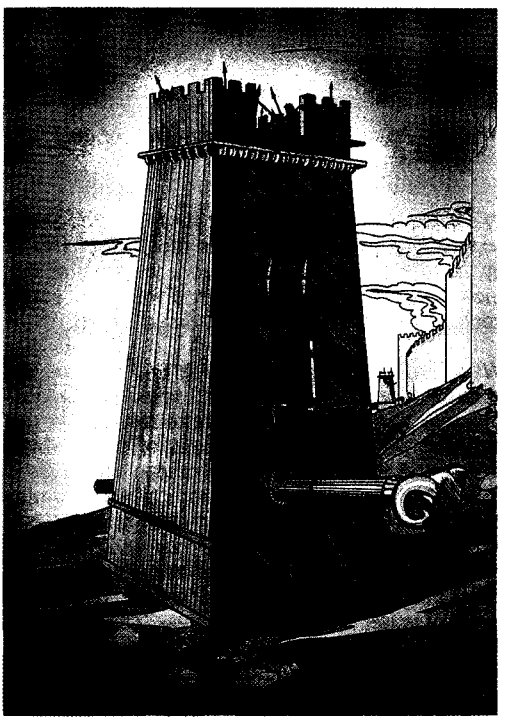
Jesus viewed money or wealth as a spiritual power (Matt. 6:24), identifying wealth as an object of worship, a rival to God. For this reason Jesus often asked people to turn away from it (Matt. 19:21; Luke 12:33–34). Zacchaeus offered to give half of his possessions to the poor and restore four times to any one that he had cheated (Luke 19:8). This was a sign of his desire to follow Christ. The only way to defeat the power of mammon is to give it away (Acts 20:35). See Stewardship.

For a while members of the Jerusalem church pooled their resources for the common good (Acts 2:44–45). To provide for the needs of those in their midst, owners of land and property sold it and gave it to the apostles (Acts 4:34–35). While this kind of sharing may not be a requirement, it provides a model for the responsibility that Christians have for one another.

Paul likewise warned against the power of money. One of the qualifications of a church officer is to be free from the love of money (1 Tim. 3:3). Deacons likewise must not be "greedy for money" (1 Tim. 3:8 NRSV). The strongest warning is found in 1 Timothy 6:10 (NRSV): "For the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil, and in their eagerness to be rich some have wandered away from the faith." Paul may be implying that people who love money will resort to all kinds of things to get it. The desire for money has a way of enslaving the person seeking it.

The answer to the wrong use of money is to use it for kingdom purposes. Money can be used to enhance our relationship to God and bless others. Paul commended the liberal giving of the Macedonian Christians (2 Cor. 8:1–4; compare 2 Cor. 9:7).



Hebrews encourages us to "Keep your lives free from the love of money, and be content with what you have (Heb. 13:5 NRSV). Jesus admonished us not to be anxious over material things, but to trust the Heavenly Father to care for our needs (Matt. 6:25–26). Christians are to recognize that God's kingdom is more important than money (Matt. 6:33). Material wealth is given to human beings as a stewardship. God is the owner of all things, and we are given a portion to use. At all times we are to keep in mind that we will one day give account to God for the use of our wealth.

The Bible and Materialism Philosophically, materialism refers to a view of life that sees physical matter as the only reality in the universe. According to this view, everything, including thought, feelings, and will can be explained according to physical laws. There is obviously no room for God in this view. Another kind of materialism tempts Christians. This is the view that values life in terms of the accumulation and consumption of goods, measuring success or worth in terms of wealth or possessions. Materialism leads us to justify spending on ourselves all that our income will bear.

Christians are to learn to possess money and not be possessed by it. Wealth is to be channeled into ministries that serve people and spread the gospel. The pursuit of wealth as an end in itself, or the desire for luxury and personal indulgence are evidences of materialism. Christians must take a stand against the persistent idolatry of materialism that focuses on the material stuff of this world and not God. D. Glenn Saul WEAPONS Since mankind's beginnings, the desire to impose one's will upon another person(s) or being has led to active conflict using many types of weapons. Human history shows marked means by which the implements were advanced technologically through the past six millennia.

Reconstruction of a Roman siege tower with battering ram of the first century A.D.

The implements of warfare and defense are known from three sources: excavations; pictorial representations in murals, reliefs, and models; and written documents. Tombs of Egypt contained actual weapons and models. Assyrian reliefs depicted great battles in detail. Excavations have uncovered numerous examples of stone and metal weapons; and biblical and inscriptional sources provide names of objects, strategy and tactics, and methods of construction.

Military action has been defined in terms of ability to achieve supremacy over the enemy in three fields: mobility, firepower, and security. Mobility is exemplified by the chariot and cavalry; firepower by bow, sling, spear, axe and sword; and security by shield, armor, and helmet. See Arms and Armor; Chariots; Horse. Dennis Cole

WEASEL An unclean animal (Lev. 11:29). Some translations see this animal as the "mole" (NAS) or "mole-rat" (REB). It may be a member of the mole family (palax Sehrenberg) found in many countries, including Palestine. See Animals.

WEATHER Climatic conditions in Palestine, including geographical factors and seasonal changes. The weather patterns of Palestine result from the clash between the extreme heat of the Arabian desert and the cooler Mediterranean winds from the west. The climate is subtropical with humid, cold winters and hot, dry summers. From October to April the days range from cool and sunny to overcast, cold, and rainy. The rains fill the seasonal brooks and streams, which provide the majority of water for the coming year. The elevation of the land, dropping from 3,900 feet in upper Galilee to 1,296 feet below sea level at the Dead Sea, provides natural barriers which influence the weather. Rain generally diminishes as one travels farther south and inland. Thus, the coastal plain and Galilee receive more rain than the central hill country and Negev desert. Snow covers the higher elevations of Mount Hermon throughout most of the winter and occasionally falls on Jerusalem and the surrounding hills. The Jordan Valley, particularly in the area of the Dead Sea, remains mild in the winter, making it the traditional site of the winter palaces of kings and rulers. The Mediterranean Sea becomes windy and cold, making travel dangerous.

In April and May the climate changes dramatically. Hot desert winds blow across the land from the east in the early morning hours. The land and seasonal rivers begin to dry, and the vegetation turns brown. Near noon each day, the air turns to the west, bringing with it slightly cooler air from the sea. The difference is minimal, however, and the heat remains intense. The central hill country is cooler than the foothills and coastal areas, but the Judaean wilderness and Negev become fiercely hot. Temperatures along the Dead Sea and Arabah remain above 90 degrees Farenheit for weeks on end. Once across the Jordan Valley atop the Transjordan plateau to the east, the temperature moderates once more. Rain is uncommon in the summer months, usually falling in October, November, February, and March.

The Bible hints at the influence which the weather imposed on life in Palestine. The winds and rain were considered to be under God's personal direction. Thus, Christ's control of the elements demonstrated to the disciples His heavenly calling. The hot east wind was often viewed as the wrath of God, bringing infertility and death. Rain signified the continued blessings of God; its absence, His judgment. See Fertility Cults; Palestine; Rain; Wind. David Maltsberger

WEEK For the Jews, any seven consecutive days ending with the sabbath (Gen. 2:1–3). The sabbath began at sunset Friday and lasted until sunset Saturday. The Christians moved their day of worship to Sunday, the first day of the week. In this way they called attention to the resurrection of their Lord Jesus Christ (Luke 24:1–7). The week is of ancient Semitic origin. It was shared with the ancient world through the Bible and the religious practice of both Jews and Christians. See Calendars; Time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES Systems of measurement in the Bible. In the Ancient Near East, weights and measure varied. The prophets spoke against merchants who used deceitful weights (Mic. 6:11).

Weights Considering first the Old Testament evidence, Hebrew weights were never an exact system. An abundance of archaeological evidence demonstrates that not even inscribed weights of the same inscription weighed the same. Weights were used in a balance to weigh out silver and gold, since there was no coinage until the Persian period after 500 B.C. This medium of exchange replaced bartering early in the biblical period.

The shekel is the basic unit of weight in the Hebrew as well as the Babylonian and Canaanite systems, though the exact weight varied from region to region and sometimes also according to the kind of goods for sale. The Mesopotamian system was sexagesimal, based on sixes and sixties. So, for example, the Babylonian system used a talent of sixty minas, a mina of sixty shekels, and a shekel of twenty-four gerahs.

The Hebrew system was decimal like the Egyptian, though the weights were not the same. Variations in the weights of the shekel may be attributed to several factors other than the dishonesty condemned in the law (Deut. 25:13–16) and the prophets (Amos 8:5; Mic. 6:11). There could have been variation between official and unofficial weights, including the setting of new standards by reform administrations such as that of good King Josiah. There might have been a depreciation of standards with passage of time, or a use of different standards to weigh different goods (a heavy standard was used at Ugarit to weigh purple linen), or the influence of foreign systems. There seems to have been three kinds of shekel current in Israel: (1) a temple shekel of about ten grams (.351 ounces) which depreciated to about 9.8 grams (.345 ounces); (2) the common shekel of about 11.7 grams (.408 ounces) which depreciated to about 11.4 grams (.401 ounces); and (3) the heavy ("royal"?) shekel of about thirteen grams (.457 ounces).

The smallest portion of the shekel was the gerah, which was 1/20 of a shekel (Ex. 30:13; Ezek. 45:12). The gerah has been estimated to weigh .571 grams. There were larger portions of the shekel, the most familiar of which was the beka or half shekel (Ex. 38:26), known also from Egypt. Inscribed examples recovered by archaeologists average over six grams and may have been half of the heavy shekel mentioned above. The pim, if it is 2/3 of a shekel as most scholars suppose, is also related to the heavy shekel and weighs about eight grams. It may have been a Philistine weight, since it is mentioned as the price the Philistines charged Israelite farmers to sharpen their agricultural tools when the Philistines enjoyed an iron monopoly over Israel (1 Sam. 13:19–21).

Multiples of the shekel were the mina and the talent. According to the account of the sanctuary tax (Ex. 38:25–26), three thousand shekels were in a talent, probably sixty minas of fifty shekels each. This talent may have been the same as the Assyrian weight, since both 2 Kings 18:14 and Sennacherib's inscriptions mention the tribute of King Hezekiah as thirty talents of silver and of gold. This was 28.38 to 30.27 kilograms (about seventy pounds). The mina was probably fifty shekels (as the Canaanite system), though Ezekiel 45:12 calls for a mina of sixty shekels, and the early Greek translation reads, "fifty." The mina has been estimated at 550 to 600 grams (1.213 to 1.323 lbs.). One table of Old Testament weights, estimated on a shekel of 11.424 grams is as follows:

1 talent (3000 shekels)	34.272 Kilograms	75.6 lbs.
1 mina (50 shekels)	571.2 grams	1.26 lbs.
1 shekel	11.424 grams	.403 oz.
1 pim (2/3 shekel?)	7.616 grams	.258 oz.
1 beka (1/2 shekel)	5.712 grams	.201 oz.
1 gerah (1/20 shekel)	.571 grams	.02 oz.

We should remember however, that this is misleading, for Old Testament weights were never so precise as this. The Lord's ideal was just weights and measures (Lev. 19:36; Prov. 16:11; Ezek. 45:10); but dishonest manipulations were all too common (Prov. 11:1; 20:23; Hos. 12:7), and archaeologists have discovered weights that have been altered by chiseling the bottom. Interesting things weighed in the Old Testament were Goliath's armor (1 Sam. 17:5–7) and Absolom's annual haircut (2 Sam. 14:26). In the New Testament, the talent and mina were large sums of money (Matt. 25:15–28; compare Luke 19:13–25), and the pound of precious ointment (John 12:3) is probably the Roman standard of twelve ounces.

Measures Measures of capacity, like the weights, were used from earliest times in the market place. These were also only approximate and varied from time to time and place to place. Sometimes different names were used to designate the same unit. Some names were used to describe both liquid and dry measures as the modern liter. The basic unit of dry measure was the ephah which means basket. The homer, "ass's load," was a dry measure, the same size as the cor, both a dry and a liquid measure. Each contained ten ephahs or baths, an equivalent liquid measure (Ezek. 45:10–14). The ephah is estimated at 1.52 to 2.42 pecks, about ⅜ to ⅔ of a bushel.

The bath is estimated from two fragments of vessels so labeled from tell Beit Mirsim and Lachish to have contained 21 to 23 liters or about 5½ gallons, which would correspond roughly to an ephah of ⅜ to ⅔ of a bushel. Lethech, which may mean half a homer (or cor) would be five ephahs. Seah was a dry measure which may be a third of a ephah. Hin, an Egyptian liquid measure, which means "jar" was approximately a sixth of a bath. The omer, used only in the manna story (Ex. 16:13–36) was a daily ration and is calculated as a tenth of an ephah (also called issaron, "tenth"). A little less than half an omer is the kab (only 2 Kings 6:25 NRSV), which was four times the smallest unit, log (only Lev. 14:10–20 NRSV) which is variously estimated, according to its Greek or Latin translation as a half pint or ⅔ pint.

Although Old Testament measures of capacity varied as much as the difference between the American and English gallon, the following table at least represents the assumptions of the above discussion:

Dry Measures
kab	1.16 quarts
omer, issaron ⅒ ephah	2.09 quarts
seah, ⅓ ephah	⅔ peck
ephah	½ bushel
lethech, ½ homer	2.58 bushels
homer, cor	5.16 bushels
Liquid Measures
log	0.67 pint
hin	1 gallon
bath	5½ gallons
cor, homer	55 gallons

In the New Testament, measures of capacity are Greek or Roman measures. The sextarius or "pot" (Mark 7:4) was about a pint. The measure of John 2:6 (metrētas) is perhaps ten gallons. The bushel (modios) of Matthew 5:15 and parallels is a vessel large enough to cover a light, perhaps about a fourth of an American bushel. As remarked before, the amount of ointment Mary used to anoint Jesus (John 12:3) was a Roman pound of twelve ounces (a measure of both weight and capacity), and Nicodemus brought a hundred such pounds of mixed spices to anoint Jesus' body (John 19:39).

In measures of length, all over the Ancient Near East, the standard was the cubit, the length of the forearm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger. Israel knew two different lengths for the cubit just as did Egypt. The common cubit, mentioned in connection with the description of the bed of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. 3:11), was about seventeen and a half inches. This may be deduced from the 1,200 cubit length mentioned in the Siloam, inscription for King Hezekiah's tunnel which has been measured to yield a cubit of this length. Ezekiel (40:5) mentions a long cubit consisting of a common cubit plus a handbreadth which would yield a "royal" cubit of about twenty and a half inches, similar to the Egyptian short and long cubits.

Even figuring with the common cubit, Goliath's height was truly gigantic at six cubits and a span (1 Sam. 17:4), about nine and a half feet tall. If Solomon's Temple is figured with the common cubit, it was about ninety-feet long, thirty-feet wide, and forty-five-feet high (1 Kings 6:2). The span is half a cubit (Ezek. 43:13,17), or the distance between the extended thumb and little finger. If it is half the long cubit, the span would be about ten and one-fifth inches; if half, the common cubit was about eight and three-fourths inches.

The handbreadth or palm is a sixth of a cubit, consisting of the breadth of the hand at the base of the four fingers. This measure is a little less than three inches. The smallest Israelite measure of length was the finger, a fourth of a handbreadth (Jer. 52:21) and was about three-fourths inch. Larger than a cubit was the reed, probably consisting of six common cubits. Archaeologists have noticed several monumental buildings whose size can be calculated in round numbers of such cubits or reeds. Summarizing on the basis of the common cubit, linear measurements of the Old Testament were:

Common Cubit
1 reed	6 cubits	8 ft. 9 in.
1 cubit	6 handbreadths	17.5 in.
1 handbreadth	4 fingers	2.9 in.
1 finger		.73 in.
Ezekiel's Cubit
1 reed	6 cubits	10 ft. 24 in.
1 cubit	7 handbreadths	20.4 in.

There were indefinite measures of great length, such as a day's journey or three day's journey or seven day's journey, the calculation of which would depend on the mode of transportation and the kind of terrain. Shorter indefinite distances were the bowshot (Gen. 21:16) and the furrow's length (1 Sam. 14:14 NRSV).

In the New Testament measures of length were Greek or Roman units. The cubit was probably the same as the common cubit, since the Romans reckoned it as one and a half times the Roman foot. The fathom (Acts 27:28) was about six feet of water in depth. The stadion or furlong was a Roman measure of 400 cubits or one eighth Roman mile. The Roman mile (Matt. 5:41) was 1,620 yards. Josephus calculated this as six stadia or 1,237.8 yards.

Measures of area were indefinite in the Old Testament. An "acre" was roughly what a yoke of oxen could plow in one day. Land could be measured by the amount of grain required to sow it. In New Testament times a Roman measure of land was the Latin jugerum, related to what a yoke of oxen could plow, figured at 28,000 square feet or five-eighths of an acre. Another was the furrow, 120 Roman feet in length.

In conclusion weights and measures in biblical times are seldom precise enough to enable one to calculate exact metric equivalents, but the Lord set forth an ideal for just balances, weights, and measures. Different standards in surrounding Near Eastern countries affected biblical standards. Sometimes there were two standards operating at the same time, such as short and long, light and heavy, common and royal. There is enough evidence to figure approximate metrological values for the biblical weights and measures.

WELL A source of water created by digging in the earth to find available water. In the semiarid climate of ancient Israel, the availability of water was a constant concern, the Bible contains many references to the sources used for obtaining it. Several Hebrew words are used in different contexts to denote these sources, making it sometimes difficult to know which English word to use in translation. See Cistern; Fountain; Pit; Spring; Water.

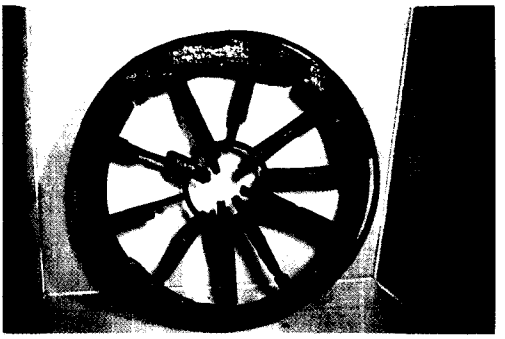
A chaduf for raising well water near ancient Lystra in south central Asia Minor (modern Turkey).

The Hebrew word most commonly translated "well" is beer (Gen. 21:30–31; Num. 21:16–18). Beer also occurs in several place names indicating the location of important wells: Beer (Num. 21:16); Beer-elim (Isa. 15:8); Beeroth (Deut. 10:6); Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. 16:14); Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:31).

The digging of a well could be a time for celebration (Num. 21:17–18), but wells were also fought over as different people tried to control the precious resource (Gen. 21:25–26; 26:15–22; Ex. 2:16–17). Wells were located wherever a water source could be found. This included fields (Gen. 29:2), towns (2 Sam. 23:15), and the wilderness (Gen. 16:7,14).

"Well" is also used figuratively of a harlot (Prov. 23:27 NRSV) and of a wicked city (Jer. 6:7). Elsewhere it is used as a metaphor for sexual pleasure (Prov. 5:15; see Song of Sol. 4:15).

John C. H. Laughlin



WHALE KJV translation (Gen. 1:21; Job 7:12; Ezek. 32:2; and in Matt. 12:40 with reference to Jonah) for Hebrew tan. The Hebrew term can refer to a primeval sea monster or dragon (Isa. 27:1; 51:9 among others), to a serpent (Ex. 7:9; Ps. 91:13), or possibly a crocodile (Ezek. 29:3; 32:2). The Book of Jonah refers simply to a "great fish" (Jonah 1:17). Matthew used the Greek ketos, indicating a great sea monster rather than indicating a particular species. All references show that God is in sovereign control over all that humans fear might threaten life and the created order.

WHEAT The staple grain of the Ancient Near East (Num. 18:12). Wheat has been raised in this region since at least neolithic times (8300–4500 B.C.) Many species exist, and exact types cannot be determined from the biblical words. It became the major crop after the nomads began settling into agrarian societies. It is used as an analogy to speak of God's judgment (Matt. 3:12) and His care (Ps. 81:16). Wheat was used to make bread and was also parched (Lev. 23:14). KJV often translated wheat by the word corn (Mark 4:28). Wheat harvest was an ancient time reference (Ex. 34:22) and was celebrated by the Feast of Weeks. Wheat is said to have been harvested (1 Sam. 6:13), threshed (Judg. 6:11), and winnowed (Matt. 3:12). See Agriculture; Bread; Harvest; Plants in the Bible.

WHEEL A disk or circular object capable of turning on a central axis. Archaeologists and historians believe that the wheel was probably invented in Mesapotamia before 3000 B.C.

The Bible describes both a functional use and symbolic meaning for the wheel. The wheel was indispensable for transportation. It was used on wagons, carts, and chariots, and the word wheel could be a synonym for any of these vehicles (Ezek. 23:24; 26:10; Nah. 3:2). In Solomon's Temple, there were ten stands upon which rested ten lavers. Each of the stands were adorned with four wheels each (1 Kings 7:30–33).

Ezekiel's vision of the great wheel in the sky (1:4–28; ch. 10) was a symbol of God's presence. There were four cherubim around the throne. Beside each, there was a wheel which "sparkled like chrysolite" (1:16 NIV). Ezekiel described the rims of the wheel as "high and awesome," and "full of eyes" (v. 18 NIV). The exact meaning of these mysterious images is unknown. Perhaps they represented the wheels of God's invisible chariot moving across the sky ("chariots of the sun," see 2 Kings 23:11) or the wheels of God's throne (Dan. 7:9).

Other symbolic uses of the wheel are a whirlwind (Ps. 77:18 NIV) and God's judgment, as a wheel is driven over the wicked (Prov. 20:26). Jeremiah described God's redemption as the reshaping of marred clay on a potter's wheel (18:13). See Chariots. Brad Creed

WHELP A lion's cub, used figuratively in the Old Testament (see Gen. 49:9; Jer. 51:38; Nah. 2:11). See Animals.

WHIRLWIND English translation of four Hebrew words that designate any windstorm that is destructive. Only Psalm 77:18 uses a term indicating circular motion. True whirlwinds and tornados are rare in Palestine. They usually occur near the coast where the cool breezes of the Mediterranean Sea collide with the hot wind from the desert. Lesser whirlwinds are seen as whirling dust is thrown up into the air. The Lord used the raging wind to take Elijah to heaven (2 Kings 2:1,11) and to talk with Job (38:1; 40:6). The prophets used the stormwind as a figure for judgment (Isa. 5:28; Jer. 4:13; Hos. 8:7; Amos 1:14; Zech. 7:14). God comes to deliver His people riding the stormy winds (Zech. 9:14).

WILD ASS See Ass.

WILD BEASTS A designation of any wild animal in contrast to domesticated animals, translating different Hebrew words. Most often the Hebrew is chayyah indicating living creatures (Gen. 1:24) including wild animals (Gen. 1:25). The same Hebrew form indicates humans as "living" beings (Gen. 2:7). The context shows the precise type creature meant. See Animals.

WILDERNESS Holy Land areas, particularly in the southern part, with little rainfall and few people. The words for wilderness in the Old Testament comes close to our word desert, because they usually mean a rocky, dry wasteland. Desert in the lands of the Bible is usually rocks instead of sand dunes. These have been called "tame" deserts, because they have infrequent rainfall and wells or oases enough to accommodate some nomadic or seminomadic human occupancy. It was the land that neighbored inhabited land to which shepherds could drive their sheep and goats for pasture. David's older brother Eliab taunted him: "With whom have you left those few sheep in the wilderness?" (1 Sam. 17:28 NRSV). The wilderness could also have the forboding sense of uninhabitable land "of deserts and pits . . . a land of drought and deep darkness . . . a land that no one passes through, where no one dwells" (Jer. 2:6 NRSV). It was a fearful place in which to get lost (Ps. 107:4–9).

Geographically, the wilderness lay south, east, and southwest of the inhabited land of Israel in the Negeb, Transjordan, and the Sinai. A particular wilderness, closer to home, lay on the eastern slopes of the Judean mountains in the rain shadow leading down to the Dead Sea. This particular wilderness, sometimes called Jeshimon, became a refuge for David when he fled from Saul, and was the locale of the temptation of Jesus.

Historically, the wilderness was particularly connected with the wandering of the escaping Hebrews after their miraculous escape from Egypt and just prior to the conquest of Transjordan. This was remembered in their retelling of the story as "that great and terrible wilderness" (Deut. 1:19; 8:15). There was good news and bad news about this period of the nation's existence. The good news was that God had provided manna, quail, and water from the rock. He had led them in the wilderness, and revealed Himself and His covenant laws to them at Sinai/Horeb, the mountain of revelation. The bad news was they had rebelled against the Lord and murmured against Moses again and again in the wilderness. The Book of Numbers is called in the Hebrew Bible, bemidbar, "In the desert." It tells the tragic story of Kadesh-barnea in the wilderness of Paran and the spy committee who persuaded the people not to attack the Promised Land from the south, so that a whole generation died in the desert (Num. 13—14). In the Psalms, the worshiping Israelites confessed these ancient sins (78:40; 106:26), and New Testament preachers used them as a warning to "wilderness Christians" not to make the same mistakes (1 Cor. 10:1–13; Heb. 3:16–19). There were several specific wilderness areas mentioned, such as those of Sin, Shur, Sinai, Paran, and Zin on the way of wilderness wanderings. Some specific locales were connected with David's outlaw years, such as wilderness of En-Gedi, of Judah, of Maon, of Ziph. Jeremiah once yearned for a desert lodge as a place of escape from his rebellious audience (9:2). People in biblical times mostly feared the desert as a place inhabited by beasts of prey, snakes, and scorpions (even demons) to which one might drive out the scapegoat (Lev. 16:10, 22,26; Isa. 13:21–22; 34:13–14). So it was appropriate as a place for Jesus' temptation (Matt. 4:1–11; Mark 1:12–13; Luke 4:1–13).

The prophets felt that most of Israel's religious troubles began with the settlement of Canaan and apostasy to Canaanite idolatry, but they also looked forward to a renewed pilgrimage in the wilderness (Hos. 2:14–15; 9:10, compare Deut. 32:10; Jer. 2:2–3; 31:2–3). There would be a new Exodus after the Babylonian Exile through the north Syrian desert to make the Lord their king and "prepare his way" (Ezek. 20:30–38; Isa. 40:3–5). John the Baptist appeared in the wilderness of Judea as the promised prophetic forerunner (Matt. 3:1–3; Mark 1:2–4; Luke 3:2–6; John 1:23). Not only did Jesus overcome the tempter in the wilderness, but He fed the four thousand in a desolate place east of Lake Galilee (Mark 8:1–9).

WILLOW A tree usually found where water is plentiful, particularly along the Jordan River. Often the willow and the poplar are found together. The willow can grow up to forty feet high. Willow branches were used to make the booths for the feast of tabernacles (Lev. 23:40). In Babylonian captivity the Jews hung their harps on willow trees because they did not feel like singing about Jerusalem in a foreign land (Ps. 137:1–4). NIV often translated willow as "poplar." WIMPLE Covering women wore around their head and neck (Isa. 3:22). Other translations use "cloaks." See Cloth, Clothing.

WIND The natural force which represents in its extended meaning the breath of life in human beings and the creative, infilling power of God and His Spirit.

Early Concepts Two words in the Bible—the Hebrew ruah and the Greek pneuma—bear the basic meaning of wind but are often translated as spirit. Some understanding of the development of the latter word clarifies this transfer in meaning and enriches the concept.

Pneuma originally represented an elemental, vital, dynamic wind or breath. It was an effective power, but it belonged wholly to the realm of nature. This force denoted any type of wind and ranged from a soft breeze to a raging storm or fatal vapor. It was the wind in persons and animals as the breath they inhaled and exhaled. It was life, since breath was the sign of life; and it was soul, since the animating force left when breathing ceased.

Metaphorically speaking, pneuma could be extended to mean a kind of breath that blew from the invisible realms; thus, it could designate spirit, a sign of the influence of the gods upon persons, and the source of a relationship between humankind and the divine. In primitive mythology, this cosmic wind possessed a life-creating power, and a god could beget a son by his breath. The divine breath also inspired poets and granted ecstatic speech to prophets.

In all of these reflections, wind remained an impersonal, natural force. When we come to the Judeo-Christian understanding, however, the concept and terms retain their dynamic characteristics, but rise from cosmic power to personal being.

Old Testament In the Old Testament, the primary meaning of the word ruah is wind. There is the slight breeze (Ps. 78:39), the storm wind (Isa. 32:2), the whirlwind (2 Kings 2:11), and the scorching wind (Ps. 11:6 NRSV). Winds from the mountains and sea to the north and west brought rain and storm (1 Kings 18:43–45; see Ex. 10:19; Ezek. 1:4); those coming from the deserts of the south and east could at times be balmy but more often would sear the land and dry up the vegetation (Gen. 41:6; Job 37:1–2). Coming from different directions, wind was identified with those directions, referring to the four corners or quarters of the earth or of heaven (Jer. 49:36; Ezek. 37:9).

Theophanies, or manifestations of God, were often associated with the wind. God answered Job out of the whirlwind (Job 38:1), and the four living creatures appeared to Ezekiel in a strong wind from the north (1:4).

Wind was a symbol of transience (Ps. 78:39), fruitless striving (Eccl. 1:14 NRSV), and desperateness (Job 6:26). More importantly, it was a mighty force which only God could command (Jer. 10:13). The wind did God's bidding (Ps. 104:4 NRSV). So closely is the wind connected with God's will that it is called His breath which He blew on the sea to cover the chariots of Pharaoh (Ex. 15:10), or by which He froze rivers (Job 37:10) and withered grass (Isa. 40:7).

The wind is also breath in humans as the breath of life (Gen. 6:17). The entry of breath gives life (Ezek. 37:5–7); and, when it is taken away, the person dies (Ps. 104:29). The breath which brings death when it is withdrawn is identified as God's breath (Job 34:14–15). This same breath of the Almighty is the spirit of wisdom and understanding in a person (Job 32:8 NRSV). When ruah is used of the will, intellect, and emotions, or related to God, the meaning often expands from the wind to spirit (Isa. 40:13). Thus Psalm 51 uses ruah three times when referring to the steadfast, willing, and broken spirit of the psalmist and once when speaking of God's Holy Spirit (verses 10–12,17). Sometimes opinions differ whether the meaning is best served by translating the word as "wind" (breath) or "spirit" when it is specifically designated the ruah of God. Thus NRSV translates Genesis 1:2, "a wind from God," to meaning that a wind was moving over the primordial waters; other translations speak of God's Spirit hovering there. See Spirit.

New Testament God makes His angels winds (Heb. 1:7 NIV), and "with the breath of His mouth" the Lord Jesus will destroy the wicked one (2 Thess. 2:8 NIV).

The extended meaning, after the experience of Pentecost, has become dominant, and pneuma usually refers to a person's inner being (in distinctions from the body) with which the personal Spirit of God communicates and blends as it generates and sanctifies Christians and forms them into the body of Christ (John 3:5–8; Rom. 8:14–16; 1 Cor. 12:7–13; Gal. 5:16–23). In each of these extended meanings, we can still detect in their foundation the image of the wind (pneuma) which blows where it wills (John 3:8).

WINDOW English translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms indicating holes in a house. Such holes served several purposes: as a chimney for smoke to escape (Hos. 13:3); holes in places were doves live (Isa. 60:8); holes in heaven through which rain falls (Gen. 7:11; 8:2; Mal. 3:10; compare 2 Kings 7:2). The Hebrew term indicates holes in the wall for air and light (Gen. 8:6; Josh. 2:15; Judg. 5:28 among others). Recessed widows with lattice work marked elaborate public buildings such as the Temple (1 Kings 6:4) and the royal palace (2 Kings 9:30). WINE Beverage made from fermented grapes. Grapes grew throughout ancient Palestine. Even in areas with limited rainfall, enough dew fell at night to support thriving vineyards. Wine was produced by pressing the juice from the grapes in large stone vats with a small drain at one end. The juice was collected in troughs, poured into large jars, and allowed to ferment while stored in cool, rock cisterns. In New Testament times, wine was kept in skin flasks and often diluted with water. It was also used as a medicine and disinfectant. Scripture condemns drunkenness and overindulgence, but pictured wine as a part of the typical ancient meal. See Drink; Vine. David Maltsberger

Egyptian story of Sinuhe, dating from the time of the Middle Bronze Age (about 2200–1550 B.C.), describes this land as having "more wine than water."

In Old Testament times the presses for making wine were usually cut or hewed out of rock (Isa. 5:2) and were connected by channels to lower rock-cut vats where the juice was allowed to collect and ferment. The juice was squeezed from the grapes by treading over them with the feet (Job 24:11; Amos 9:13). Recent excavations at tel Aphek have uncovered two unusually large plastered wine presses dating from the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 B.C.). The presses were connected to large collection pits which still contained the Canaanite jars for the storage of the wine.

After the juice had fermented, it was collected into jars or wineskins (Matt. 9:17, and parallels). At ancient Gibeon, archaeologists discovered a major wine-producing installation dating from about 700 B.C. In addition to the presses and fermentation tanks, 63 rock-cut cellars were found with a storage capacity of 25,000 gallons of wine. In these cellars the wine could be kept at a constant cool temperature of 65 degrees Fahrenheit. Both royal presses and cellars are mentioned in the Bible (1 Chron. 27:27; Zech. 14:10). Other activities besides the making of wine could go on at a press site (Judg. 6:11; 7:25). By the New Testament period, both beam presses and presses with mosaic pavements were in use.

The harvesting and treading of the grapes was a time of joy and celebration (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33; Deut. 16:13–15); and the image of the abundance of wine is used in the Bible to speak of God's salvation and blessing (Prov. 3:10; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13). But God's judgment is also vividly portrayed as the treading of the wine press (Isa. 63:2–3; Rev. 14:19–20). See Agriculture; Vine; Wine. John C. H. Laughlin

WING The specialized part of the bird that allows flight (Gen. 1:21). The word is most often used figuratively: of God's help (Ruth 2:12), of God's judgment (Jer. 48:40), of strength to return from Exile (Isa. 40:31).

WINNOWING A step in the processing of grain whereby the grain is separated from the inedible parts. The stalks are thrown into the air, and the wind blows away the chaff and the straw, letting the heavier pure grain fall back to the ground (Isa. 30:24). John the Baptist used winnowing as an analogy of God's judgment, when the Lord would separate the sinful from the righteous (Matt. 3:12).

WISDOM AND WISE MEN An educated class of people responsible for preserving and transmitting the culture and learning of the society. Though wisdom and the wise men who perpetuated it have been around almost as long as have people, the study of wisdom in the Ancient Near East is a relatively new endeavor. This has been due, in part, to a lack of a clear definition of the term wisdom, as well as the difficult nature of the poetic language within which most of the wisdom material has been found. Sad to say, neither of these issues is completely solved today though much has been learned in recent years.

Real Wisdom Is the Fear of God Three basic definitions of wisdom summarize the status of the field of study very well. Note that the first two of these definitions are quite secular in nature while the third is religious.

First, wisdom is considered by many to be simply the art of learning how to succeed in life. Apparently, ancient persons learned very early that there was an orderliness to the world in which they lived. They also learned that success and happiness came from living in accordance with that orderliness (Prov. 22:17—24:22). Second, wisdom is considered by some to be a philosophical study of the essence of life. Certainly, much of the Books of Job and Ecclesiastes seem to deal with just such existential issues of life (see particularly Job 29–31). Third, though the other definitions might include this, it seems that the real essence of wisdom is spiritual, for life is more than just living by a set of rules and being rewarded in some physical manner. Undoubtedly, in this sense wisdom comes from God (Prov. 2:6). Thus, though it will involve observation and instruction, it really begins with God and one's faith in Him as Lord and Savior (Prov. 1:7; Job 28:28).

The Wise Men Preserved This Wisdom Though

at first such wisdom was probably the responsibility of the patriarch or head of the clan, it appears that every ancient culture developed a distinct class of people, the ḥakam or sages, who were responsible for the creating and preserving of their wisdom. No doubt these people were part of the more educated group of their societies who could read and write and had the economic freedom to do so.

Certainly Israel was no exception. The first clear reference to wise men in the biblical text is the one about Ahithophel and Hushai during the reign of David (2 Sam. 16:15—17:23). However, during Solomon's day, the wisdom movement took on a whole new significance, for Solomon and his court became world renowned for their wisdom (1 Kings 4:29–34; 10). Certainly his reign became known as the "golden age" of Israelite culture (Luke 12:27).

Though the movement became less visible during the early part of the divided monarchy, it was still quite active, for Hezekiah's wise men were very concerned about preserving the wisdom tradition for future generations (Prov. 25:1). Later still, Jeremiah's enemies even confronted him regarding his prophecy that the Law would perish from the priests, the prophets, and the sages (Jer. 18:18). Thus, clearly by the fall of Judah, the sage had taken his place as one of the key leaders in Israelite society.

No doubt, as the role of the prophet became less visible during the intertestamental period, the role of the sage and the priest became more prominent (see particularly Ecclesiasticus 38:24—39:11). Apparently, this development continued right on into the New Testament era where the magi (or sage) announced the birth of Christ (Matt. 2:1–12) who became the greatest of all wisdom teachers (Matt. 12:42; 13:54; Mark 6:2).

Most Wisdom Is in Poetic Form Most of the Ancient Near Eastern wisdom material has been found in some type of poetic structure. Until recent years these structures have been a mystery because they did not seem to rhyme either in meter or sound as modern languages do. However, in A.D. 1753 Bishop Robert Lowth unlocked the key to such poetic writing when he discovered that Hebrew poetry rhymed in thought. Moreover, he surmised that such thoughts were most commonly expressed in parallel patterns. Some of these patterns expressed the same thoughts (Prov. 20:1), while others expressed opposing thoughts (Prov. 10:1), or developed a given thought (Prov. 31:10–31). In time, these parallel patterns were structured into specific forms such as the proverb, riddle, allegory, hymn, disputation, autobiographical narrative, didactic narrative, and lists. No doubt, such beautiful and intricate poetic structure was clearly a mark of the sage and the wisdom schools of his day and age. See Poetry.

Wisdom Became the Guide for Daily Living Though in recent years many parts of the sacred Scripture have been considered under wisdom's umbrella, no doubt the greatest contribution of Israel's sages has been the three books found in the "writings" (Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes). However, certain of the other "writings" such as the Psalms, the Song of Solomon, and Lamentations contain figures of speech and stylized forms reflective of the wisdom tradition. In addition to these, the intertestamental works of Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon continued the tradition and laid an excellent foundation for the ultimate revelation of wisdom in Christ Jesus (Matt. 11:19; Luke 11:49–51; Col. 1:15–20; 1 Cor. 1:24,30; Rev. 5:12). See Intertestamental History; Apocrypha; Pseudepigrapha.

Certainly, biblical wisdom like that of other cultures emphasizes the success and well-being of the individual. This is visible not only in the topics it chooses to deal with, but also in the way it deals with them. Some of its major topics are: knowledge, the world, justice, virtue, family, and faith. The greatest of these may be faith which is constantly watching over wisdom and really all of life (Prov. 1:7). See Ecclesiastes; Job; Proverbs.

WITNESS, MARTYR The testimony of a person, or something which bears testimony to a person or an event. In the Old Testament the Hebrew word moed is used to refer to the "meeting" place of God and His people. This meeting is testimony to a particular person or event, such as God or the giving of the covenant, and provides a place of testimony. See Tent of Meeting.

The second Hebrew word, ed refers to the legal element of witness. One rendered testimony based on observation which was to be true and faithful. This is beautifully illustrated in Ruth 4:9–11 where Boaz called on the elders of the city to be witnesses to his act of redemption. Witnesses were also expected to be involved in the judgment. Thus, in Deuteronomy 17:7 the witness is the first to throw a stone. Joshua (24:22) called the people to awareness of their vow to serve the Lord their God by reminding them they were witnesses and thus accountable.

In this last chapter of Joshua, Joshua also set up a memorial, edah, to the commitment. This act of memorializing is also a witness and is commonly practiced in the Old Testament. See Stone. The memorial is a witness response to both present and future generations of God's activity. In Psalm 119, the law is the supreme "testimony" or monument to God. God established the law and gave it to people as a true and faithful witness for righteous living.

The legal concept of witness found in the Old Testament is continued in the New Testament. This aspect of witness, as well as new ones, is covered by only one Greek word, martureō, and its many derivatives. The legal sense of witness/testimony occurs in the synoptics during the trial of Jesus (Matt. 26:65; Mark 14:63; Luke 22:71). Paul employed this legal concept when he bore witness to the Galatians of their care for him (Gal. 4:15). In a more technical sense of witness, he reminded Timothy not to act too hastily in accusing an elder without at least two or three witnesses (1 Tim. 5:19). Nowhere is this sense of witness more developed than in John's writings. Jesus is the supreme witness to God and His love. In John 1, John the Baptist bore testimony to the truth of Jesus' witness. In John 5, Jesus argued pointedly that John the Baptist, the Father, and the Scripture all bear witness to Him. In John 8, Jesus reminded His hearers that according to the law the testimony of two people is true. Thus His hearers needed to respond to the truth of His witness. For John, Jesus's message as witness was inseparable from His very personhood. Jesus is true and faithful, and so is His message. A response is demanded.

This concept of one's person being involved in the witness informs the way witness is used to described the early believers. Believers were challenged by Christ Himself to be His witnesses throughout the world (Acts 1:8). As Jesus had indicated earlier, this witness is informed and empowered by the Holy Spirit (John 15:26–27). Throughout the New Testament, believers are instructed that their witness is to be true and faithful, reflected both in speech and life-style (Acts 4:33; 14:3; Heb. 10:15–17; 1 Thess. 2:10).

This high commitment to witness/testify exemplified by Christ resulted in His persecution and death. Likewise, with His followers there would be persecution for their witness (John 15:20). Thus, early in the Book of Acts (ch. 7), Stephen became the first martyr. That very word comes from martureō and really states that Stephen was first and foremost a witness, giving testimony. Ironically, the witness was put to death by witnesses to his testimony (7:58).

The death of Stephen serves as a stark reminder that true and faithful testimony to Christ requires total commitment, even one's life. As Christ is the faithful and true witness (Rev. 3:14) who clearly presented God to the world, so may believers be. See Acts; Covenant; Evangelism; Martyr.

WOLF The largest of wild carnivorous animals (Canis lupus; Canis pallipes) that include dogs, foxes, and jackals. The wolf is known for its boldness and fierceness of attack. It often killed more than it could eat because the taste of blood put it into a frenzy. Shepherds knew the wolf as the greatest enemy of sheep. The wolf was well known in biblical days (John 10:12), yet nearly every reference to wolves is in a figurative sense (Gen. 49:27; Jer. 5:6; Ezek. 22:27). Jesus used the figure of the false prophet as a wolf in sheep's clothing (Matt. 7:15). One of the signs of the messianic age is that the "wolf and the lamb shall feed together" (Isa. 65:25). See Animals.

WOMAN A female human. The picture of woman revealed in the Bible is far from one-dimensional. Frequently subjected to the rule of her male counterpart, often adored for her beauty and purity, and occasionally praised for her leadership in times of crisis, woman emerges from the pages of the Bible with as much complexity as man.

Woman in Bible times lived in a patriarchal society. Both the Old and New Testament worlds normally restricted the role of woman primarily to the sphere of home and family, although a few strong women emerged as leaders. In religious life she was subordinate to man. Father and then husband or other male relatives gave protection and direction to woman. Jesus raised the window for women. He paid attention to them. His manner was inclusive and acknowledged their place in the kingdom He proclaimed. By what He did and what He said He elevated the status of woman. Paul also caught Jesus' vision. Although Paul faced the need to preserve order in the early church, he exclaimed in Galatians 3:28: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." The final barrier preventing woman from fully participating in the kingdom of God toppled under Jesus' influence.

What the Old Testament Teaches About Woman

The Old Testament shows woman in at least two lights. The predominant view is one of woman in subjection to man. However, at times, woman is also the object of adoration and admiration. The creation narratives in Genesis foreshadow two different perspectives regarding woman. In the account in Genesis 1:26–30, man and woman are created simultaneously (Gen. 1:27). Woman, like man, is made in the image of God. Together, man and woman reflect the image of God. Woman is not in an inferior place in creation. In Genesis 2:7–25, man is created before woman. In this second account woman is viewed as being created for man as his helper. This account is often cited as supportive of the view that woman should remain subject to man since she has a subordinate position in creation, but the narrative describes woman as a "suitable partner" (v. 20 REB) for whom man leaves his family.

The subordination of woman appears more clearly in close reading the Ten Commandments. The Commandments are addressed to men, a fact evidenced by the use of masculine pronouns. A major of evidence of women's subordination is the reference to man not coveting any of his neighbor's property. His wife is included in the list of possessions (Ex. 20:17). Marriage and divorce are areas in which woman's rights were subordinate to those of man. If a woman about to be married was suspected of not being a virgin, she was required to submit to a test. If her virginity was not established, she could be stoned to death at her father's door (Deut. 22:13–21). No such requirement was made for a man. Adultery was seen as a crime against a husband's rights. Both male and female caught in the act of adultery were stoned, but it was the husband's rights which were being vindicated (Deut. 22:22). A husband who was jealous of his wife and had some fears about her faithfulness could take her to the priest and have her submit to an intricate test to determine her innocence or guilt (Num. 5:11–31). No such avenue was open for a woman who suspected her husband of being unfaithful.

Divorce was also slanted toward the husband. He could obtain a divorce from his wife "because he finds something objectionable about her" (Deut. 24:1 NRSV). The phrase "something objectionable" was variously interpreted by the Jews and ran the gamut from adultery to burned toast!

Inequity between boy and girl babies existed from the very beginning of life. A mother who bore a girl baby was considered unclean for twice as long as a mother who bore a male child. During her "purifying" time after the birth of a baby, a mother was not to "touch any holy thing, or come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purification are completed" (Lev. 12:2–5).

Aside from specific inequities in the way men and women were treated, the Old Testament, praticularly the Book of Proverbs, warned of tempting, "loose" (2:16 NRSV), "loud," "ignorant" (9:13 NRSV), and "contentious" (21:9 NRSV) women. Women were also seen as fearful (Isa. 19:16). Proverbs 31 also pictured the hardworking, praiseworthy, "virtuous" woman.

Woman's most positive image was wife and mother. Against the predominant pattern of women in subordinate roles, several positive images of women emerged from the Old Testament. Undoubtedly, woman was venerated in her role as wife and mother. The Ten Commandments cite a son's duty to honor both his father and mother (Ex. 20:12). The ideal woman, eulogized in Proverbs 31, is a wife and mother who fulfills well both roles in addition to engaging profitably in the business world.

The birth of children was a sign of God's favor bestowed upon a good woman. A particular sign of God's favor was the birth of male children (Gen. 29:31—30:24). The story of Ruth is a good example of a traditional woman who was admired for her role as a good daughter-in-law. Ruth and Naomi, whose husbands died, were women of worth whom God aided by sending Boaz as their protector (Ruth 1—4).

A thread which crosses the dominant pattern of the subjection of women is one which depicts women positively. Wisdom, which held high value for the Hebrew people, was personified as "she" (Prov. 1:20; 7:4). The prophet Isaiah used a mother's love for her child as a model for God's love for His people (Isa. 49:15: 66:13). Several women—including Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, and Esther—earned the respect and admiration of the Israelite nation by playing a significant role in times of national crisis. See Deborah; Esther; Huldah; Miriam.

What the New Testament Teaches About Woman Jesus was able to retain the best in the Hebrew tradition and yet cut away some of the rigid structure that restricted it. He was able to do the same for woman. Without radically changing her roles, Jesus enlarged and transformed women's possibilities for a full life. His manner and teachings elevated her status and gave her an identity and a cause. Jesus' manner in His interactions with women is at least as significant as His teachings about woman. At the risk of censure from a male-oriented society, Jesus talked to women, responded to their touch, healed them, received their emotional and financial support, and used them as main characters in His stories. Jesus saw women as persons. Martha wanted Jesus to make Mary help with the serving duties, but Jesus affirmed Mary's choice to learn as a disciple. Women of that day could not be disciples of rabbis, but Jesus recognized women's potential for intelligent thought and commitment (Luke 10:38–42).

On another occasion, Jesus welcomed a woman's anointing His head as indicative of her understanding of His real mission. Instead of rejecting her public display or chiding her for extravagance, He commended her for her act of love. He treated her as a person of insight and feeling (Mark 14:3–9). The woman at the well in Samaria is another example of Jesus seeing women as persons. Jesus would not have talked theology to her if

He had related to her primarily as a woman or as a Samaritan. However, He saw her as a person, so He was not restricted in His interaction by her sex or race (John 4:1–42). The woman caught in adultery was treated as a person. Her action was not condoned by Jesus, but neither did He allow her to be subjected to a double standard by her male accusers. Jesus offered her new possibilities of living with His directive: "Neither do I condemn you. Go your way, and from now on do not sin again" (John 7:53—8:11 NRSV).

Besides seeing women as persons, Jesus involved them in His earthly ministry. Luke mentioned a group of women who traveled with Jesus as He journeyed from town to town (Luke 8:1–3). Among them were Mary of Magdala, Joanna, and Susanna. These women provided financial support for Jesus and the twelve apostles. Women also proclaimed the gospel. In His encounter with the Samaritan woman, Jesus revealed Himself as the Messiah. She immediately left and began telling people, "He told me everything I have ever done" (John 4:39 NRSV). Many Samaritans believed in Jesus because of the woman's testimony.

Women were the first at the tomb after the resurrection; and, as such, they were the first to broadcast His victory over death (Luke 23:55—24:11). Matthew, Mark, and Luke all called attention to the loyal women who participated in Jesus' Galilean ministry and followed Him all the way to the cross and the grave. They shared the greatest news: "He is not here, but has risen" (Luke 24:5 NRSV).

As a master teacher, Jesus used parables to teach about the kingdom of God. He reached out to the women in His audience by telling stories about their life experiences. By capturing their attention and commitment through parables, He offered them a place in the kingdom.

God's seeking activity is the theme of two parables, the lost sheep begins, "What man of you" and the parable of the lost coin, "What woman." The woman looking for the lost coin represented God's activity in seeking the lost, just as the man represented God's seeking activity. Jesus appealed to women through their housekeeping experiences. He elevated their experiences by likening them to God's activity.

The twin parables in Luke 13:18–20 point to the way the kingdom of God grows. Again Jesus used the life experience of woman to illuminate an eternal truth. Jesus meant for women to identify with His mission. He meant to involve them in spreading the gospel. His parables taught that both women and men would be involved in the kingdom work.

Jesus spoke directly to the matter of treating a woman as a sex object. In the Sermon on the Mount, He redefined adultery to include a lustful look (Matt. 5:28). While making religion a matter of the heart instead of the law, Jesus elevated women to the level of full personhood, from the level of sexual exploitation. Marriage and divorce were issues of great importance to women, since their lives were lived mainly in the roles of wife and mother. Their emotional, social, and financial security was dependent on their marriages. Jesus said that divorce is a testimony to the hardness of the human heart, not God's will (Matt. 19:1–9). To those who were casually divorcing their wives, Jesus stated plainly that they were committing adultery. Responsive to the plight of women, He offset the male bias toward divorce and strengthened marriage as a permanent union. (See Matt. 5:31–32; 19:1–12; Mark 10:1–12; Luke 16:18.)

Jesus' parable of the ten maidens, five foolish and five wise, hints at the way Jesus saw and dealt with woman (Matt. 25:1–13). He saw women as neither inferior nor superior, but simply as persons. He saw their potential, their sinfulness, their strengths and weaknesses, and He dealt with them directly. As a group, He elevated their status and strengthened their participation and influence in their world. But as individuals, He treated them as friends and disciples.

Paul's theological vision (Gal. 3:28) was that there was no partiality among persons with God. Yet Paul felt the tension of maintaining order in the New Testament church. He often fell back on Jewish social customs of the day to ensure that the fledgling church would not be seen unfavorably by the rest of the world. A man of his time, he still had a vision toward which he strove.

Paul moved ahead of his Jewish background when he called for mutual submission between husbands and wives (Eph. 5:21–33). The prevailing custom was for wives to be submissive. However, Paul reflected Jesus' concern that all relationships reflect the grace extended by God. Responsibilities of both husbands and wives to love each other follow the initial exhortation to submit to each other in love. In other passages Paul implied a hierarchy of submission from God, to Christ, to man, to woman, to child as the sequence. However, the tone of this hierarchy was not military, but voluntary and self-sacrificing. Here again was a concession to order and not the ideal (1 Cor. 11:2–16; 14:33–40; 1 Tim. 2:8–15).

Paul wrote in response to problems in churches. Paul was concerned that the Christians should "give no offense to Jews or to Greeks or to the church of God" (1 Cor. 10:32 NRSV). Therefore, he wrote responses to the way specific problems should be handled in different churches. Some of his remarks do not have direct relevance to our day. For example, he spoke of meat offered to idols (Rom. 14), and women wearing jewelry and braiding their hair (1 Tim. 2:8–12). In contrast to these specific problems, Paul espoused basic principles which have relevance to every age: (1) A Christian should take into account how his or her actions may influence others (1 Cor. 8:13) and (2) A Christian should do all things to to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31).

Of equal weight with what Paul said regarding women is how he related to them. Paul welcomed women as colaborers in the churches and commended them for their gifts and faithfulness (Rom. 16:1,3–5). Phoebe, Prisca, Lydia, and others were seen as partners in the gospel. To the Roman church Paul said, "I commend to you our sister Phoebe, a deacon of the church at Cenchreae" (Rom. 16:1 NRSV). He called Phoebe a "benefactor of many and of myself as well" (v. 2 NRSV). Evidently Paul relied on women to exercise their gifts (1 Cor. 12) as a part of the body of Christ. See Deacon; Offices; Phoebe; Prisca.

Summary Woman is the subject of many questions and controversies in the church today. Is she equal to man? Can she exercise the same spiritual gifts as man in the church? Should she be subject to her husband in all matters? As Christians turn to the Bible for guidance in responding to these questions, they must be careful not to focus on one verse or passage. The total impact and message of the Bible should become the guiding spirit in answering these and other questions.

The Old Testament clearly subjected woman to the will and protection of her husband. She was extolled for performing her important roles as wife and mother. On occasion she rose above those roles and led the Jewish nation in times of crisis.

The New Testament brings a different picture of woman into focus. Jesus, and later Paul, elevated the status of woman so that she could be a full participant in the kingdom of God. However, she is urged to use her responsibility as well as her freedom to find her place in the body of Christ. The spirit of freedom and love in Christ is woman's as well as man's.

WOODWORKER Person who worked with wood in some sense—cutting trees in a forest (1 Kings 5:6); bringing the logs to where they were needed (v. 9); building the house and the furniture needed for it (2 Kings 22:6); and making beautiful objects of art from wood. See Occupations and Professions in the Bible.

WOOL The thick hair forming the coat especially of sheep and some other animals. It was made into thread and used to make clothing, blankets, and other articles. It was one of the major economic factors in Israel and the surrouding countries. Gideon used a piece of wool to determine God's will for his life (Judg. 6:35–40). Wool was also used as a symbol of whiteness and purity (Isa. 1:18). See Cloth, Clothing; Sheep.

WORD Utterance or saying that may refer to a single work, the entire law, the gospel message, or even Christ.

Old Testament Dabar is the primary Hebrew expression for word. It has various meanings. It can refer to a spoken utterance, a saying, a command, a speech, a story—linguistic communication in general. Dabar can also mean a thing, event, or action (Gen. 18:14). Occasionally, difficulty arises in distinguishing between these meanings (Ps. 35:20 NRSV, "deceitful words"; KJV, "deceitful matters"; REB, "intrigues"; NIV, "false accusations"). The frequent construction "the word of the Lord" or "the word of Yahweh" refers to communication made by God to people. The means of this communication are seldom related, nor must the phrase refer to a particular set of words. Three aspects of this word demand special attention.

1. A prophetic word. The prophets claimed to deliver the "word of God" (Jer. 1:9). For this purpose they were commissioned (Isa. 6:8). This word of God addressed human beings and demanded a response. Thus God's word may be visualized as a great salvation (Isa. 2:2–5) or a great judgment (Jer. 26:4–6).

2. A legal word. In the covenant law God spoke the words of the law to Moses (Ex. 20:1; 24:3–8). The heart of the law is called the ten words (Ex. 34:28; Deut. 4:13). The entire law represents the will of God and so can be called a single "word" (Deut. 4:2 KJV). This word also demands response: faithful obedience will bring God's blessing while disobedience will lead to a curse (Deut. 30:15–20).

3. Creative word. God created the world by His word (Gen. 1; Isa. 48:13; Ps. 33:9). This world reveals God's majesty (Ps. 19:1) and thus extends the sphere of His revelation beyond His work with covenant Israel to all people. The word is spoken of as if it were a person who directs the events of nature (Ps. 147:15–18; 148:8), saves (107:20), and gives life (Ezek. 37:1–4).

New Testament Logos and Rhēma are the two primary Greek words meaning "word." They are used interchangeably and variously as with the Old Testament dabar. The New Testament can use these words to apply to Jesus' message, the message about Jesus, and Jesus Himself.

Jesus' message of the coming kingdom can be called a "word" (Mark 2:2; 4:33; Luke 5:1) as can His individual sayings (Matt. 26:75; Luke 22:61; John 7:36). Significantly, Jesus avoided citing rabbinic authorities or using the traditional language of a prophet who would claim "that the word of the Lord came to me" or declare "thus says the Lord." Perhaps these phrases did not significantly honor His special relationship with the Father and His own authority (Matt. 11:27; compare 5:21–26; Mark 3:28–29). As in the Old Testament, so also Jesus' word demanded decision on the part of the hearers (John 8:51; 12:47).

The message concerning Jesus can also be called "a word." Paul spoke of "the word of God that you heard from us" that is mediated by his human words (1 Thess. 2:13 NRSV). The content of this word is certainly the good news story concerning Jesus' death and resurrection—the heart of the gospel (1 Cor. 15:3–5). This message is the word of the cross (Gal. 3:1) and is the core content of Paul's preaching (1 Cor. 2:2). Because of His sacrifice and resurrection, the gospel message is a "word of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5:19) and a "word of life" (Phil. 2:16). The word is witnessed and proclaimed by Jesus' followers (Luke 1:2; Acts 4:2; 6:7). The word revealed through His son (Heb. 1:1–4) brings illumination and judgment.

Jesus Himself is the Word—the living Word. The preexistent Word who was with God "in the beginning" has now become flesh (John 1:1–18). Scholars have frequently claimed that John used logos in a philosophical sense to refer to the world's controlling rational principle (Stoicism) or to the created intermediary between God and His world (Philo). However, John's word is not a principle or divine characteristic. It is a preexistent, life-giving person. John opposed Greek philosophy by arguing that salvation comes not by mankind's escape from this world but by God entering and redeeming creation. More probably logos was chosen because of its meaning in the Old Testament, its Greek translation, and contemporary Hebrew literature, where the concepts of wisdom and word were being spoken of as a distinct manifestation of God. John saw that the same agent of God who gave life in the first creation was also giving life in the new creation inaugurated by Jesus' coming. The creative Word of God became flesh; being divine He embodied divine communication. Now the Word dwells among us revealing the glory of God (John 1:14).

Power of the Word It is often assumed that in Hebrew thought words had a mysterious binding authority. For example, when Isaac discovered he had been deceived and wrongly gave his blessing to Jacob, he declared that his blessing had been given and Jacob "shall be blessed" (Gen. 27:33). Isaac's word seems magical—like an arrow once shot, it could not be recalled. Caution must be exercised here. Actually, only God's word has this type of irresistible potency (Isa. 55:11) and absolute creative power (Gen. 1:3–31; Luke 1:32–35; compare Isa. 9:8; 31:2; 45:23). Most occurrences like Isaac's may be explained in terms of their social custom. Following a prescribed social custom, a person may form a bond, or a will, by speaking a word. Even today a couple can make or create a marriage by saying "I do." We must also note that Scripture teaches that a person's word is often powerless (1 Cor. 2:4; 4:19–20) and frequently fails (Matt. 21:28–32).

Words are capable of great good and evil (Matt. 12:36; Jas. 3:5–6,8). Words can deeply injure (Prov. 12:18; 18:14), and revive (Prov. 12:18,25; 16:24). Words can have a widespread influence; words from the wicked are like a fire-spreading torch (Prov. 16:27–28); words from the good bring good fruit (Prov. 12:14; 10:11).

WORK, THEOLOGY OF Meaning and value God places on human labor.

God's People Work Because They Are Made in His Image The Bible opens with a picture of a working God. God worked in creating a universe. He has been at the job of sustaining creation since He fashioned it. To be created in God's image means, in part, that people have the capacity to work, to fashion, to create. The notion that labor came into being as a result of humanity's fall does not reflect biblical truth. Sinless humanity was placed in the garden to cultivate it. The opportunity to labor was part of God's original commission to mankind to subdue the earth. Adam and Eve were given a situation that needed tending. Paradise had its chores.

Whereas the entrance of sin did not precipitate humanity's need to labor, it has affected the original circumstances of people's work. As He expelled them from the garden, God told Adam and Eve they would have to labor hard to carve out a living. Sin hinders the progress of men's and women's efforts and thwarts their genius. Nature does not cooperate like it would without the curse. People's physical ability has been limited by the effect of sin. A person's mental capacity has been drastically reduced by the ravages of sin.

However, the primal commission for humanity to subdue the earth remains in force. In the garden imagery, cultivation was the scope of the original pair's labor. Today the range would be broadened to include every pursuit of people—cultural, physical, social, and spiritual.

God's People Reflect Him Through Practicing Integrity in Their Work Christianity that is real shows up in the marketplace. It affects the work of employees and the attitude of employers. Christian employees are conscious of their responsibilities to their employers. Followers of Christ know they owe their employers an honest day's work. Those representing Christ should strive to be the most productive and conscientious workers in the company. Christians view their service to their employer as ultimately rendered to God, knowing He is the ultimate judge of their efforts (Eph. 6:5–8). Those in authority over others in the workplace have special responsibility. Christian supervisors or employers know they are accountable to God for how they treat those under them (Eph. 5:9). Managers' testimony for Christ is on the line in their dealings with subordinates. Fairness, reasonableness, and generosity can be maintained even when a standard of excellence is upheld.

God's People Realize His Plan for Work Also Includes a Plan for Rest After six days of creation God rested. He reflected on the worth and meaning of His work. Later He prescribed a day of rest for His people each week to do the same (Ex. 20:8–11). God knows people have physical, emotional, mental, and spiritual limits. These must be guarded by a proper balance of work and rest.

God's People See Their Primary Vocation as Serving Him For Christians, life's primary vocation is ministry. Christians view their workplace as a ministry post. Their pulpits are their desks, their cars, their classrooms, their kitchens. Seeing oneself as a mine worker, homemaker, school teacher, or professional person who happens to be a Christian is fundamentally different from seeing oneself primarily as a Christian who happens to be a secretary, salesperson, or accountant. A proper theology of work operating in the lives of believers would see many people positively influenced toward Christ in every setting where Christians are found working. T. R. McNeal WORKS Deeds leading to planned results, both by God and people. God's works are His acts and deeds in creating, saving, and sustaining (Judg. 2:7; Pss. 8:6; 103:22; 104:24; Isa. 64:8; Eph. 2:10; Phil. 1:6). Jesus Christ came to do the work of God (John 4:34; 5:17; 9:4.) The miraculous works of Christ testify to His divine nature and mission (John 5:36; 6:28–29; 10:37–38). Christ calls and enables His followers to continue His works (John 14:12; 1 Cor. 15:58; 16:10).

The works of people testify to their faith or lack of it. Those who do the works of the devil show that they are of the devil (John 8:34–44; 2 Cor. 11:14–15). Sinners are called to cast off the works of darkness (Rom. 13:12; Eph. 5:11), sometimes called wicked works (Col. 1:21) or the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:19). Because sinners cannot save themselves, they must rely on the grace of God, not on their own works (Eph. 2:8–9; Titus 3:4–7).

Paul warned against relying on the works of the law as a basis for acceptance by God (Rom. 9:32; Gal. 2:16; 3:2,5,10). Sinners are accepted as righteous before God on the basis of God's grace through faith in Christ, not on the basis of their own works (Rom. 3:27; 4:2–6). One evidence of saving faith, however, is the existence of good works in the lives of believers (Matt. 5:16; Acts 9:36; Eph. 2:10; Col. 1:10; 2 Thess. 2:17; 1 Tim. 2:10; 5:10,25; Titus. 2:7,14; Heb. 10:24; 1 Pet. 2:12).

Some people think that Paul and James contradict each other in their teachings about works. James 2:14–26 says that people are justified by faith and works, not by faith alone. However, closer examination shows that James used the word "works" to refer to what Paul meant by "good works." James and Paul were dealing with people who wanted to rely on works of the law for their salvation. James was dealing with people who professed to believe but whose lives did not show it. Paul, therefore, emphasized that sinners cannot make themselves acceptable to God by keeping the works of the law. Dealing with a different situation, James emphasized that true faith shows itself in good works, a point Paul that also made.

The Lord knows the works of His people. He commends His churches for their good works and rebukes them for the works that are not worthy of His people (Rev. 2:2,5,9,13,19,23,26; 3:1,2,8,15). God does not judge according to outward appearances but according to works (1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 20:12–13; 22:12). Although true believers are accepted into God's eternal kingdom by grace through faith, God will condemn those whose profession is proved false by their evil works (Matt. 7:21–23). True believers are saved because their lives are built on the solid foundation of Christ Himself. They will be rewarded for good works but any unworthy works will not survive God's judgment (1 Cor. 3:10–15). See Faith; Salvation. Robert J. Dean WORLD, THE The created order in the totality of its space and time. The development of the biblical concept and the varieties of ways in which the term is used become evident when the Old Testament uses, Greek concept, and New Testament uses are considered in sequence.

The Old Testament The ancient Hebrews had no word for the "universe." When speaking of the totality of creation, they used descriptive phrases like "the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1 NIV), "heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them" (Ex. 20:11; compare Phil. 2:10 NIV), or "the heavens, even the highest heavens, and all their starry host, the earth and all that is on it, the seas and all that is in them" (Neh. 9:6 NIV). Evident in these more extended descriptions is the view that the world consisted of an expanse of land ("the earth") that was surrounded by water and set under the canopy of the heavens. More simply, they could use the inclusive "all" (Isa. 44:24; Jer. 10:16; 51:19).

Basic to Hebrew thought was the affirmation that God created everything above the earth, on the earth, and under it (Gen. 1:1—2:3; Job 38). The doctrine of creation asserted the sovereignty of God—and the superiority of the God of the Hebrews over the idols worshiped by other peoples. Four Hebrew words have been translated by "world." The word eretz (2,047 times) normally means "earth" or "land." It is translated as "world" four times in the KJV and twice in the RSV (Isa. 23:17; Jer. 25:26). Olam is translated as "world" twice in the KJV (Ps. 73:12; Eccl. 3:11).

Its general sense is age, or long duration. Two other rarer words appear predominantly in the poetic writings (tebel, which is synonymous with eretz, 36 times, for instance, Ps. 18:15; Job 37:12; and cheled, which is synonymous with olam, 5 times, for instance, Pss. 17:14; 49:1). The Hebrews, therefore, did not have a single concept of the world but thought of the creation in terms of its geographical and temporal extent.

Greek Thought The word kosmos (from which we get the English words "cosmic" and "cosmology") originally described anything that was constructed or built, then its order, or by extension its ordered beauty. The world was a perfect unity, beautiful in its order. From the time of the use of kosmos to describe the world, therefore, the order of the world was primary. Precisely this concept of the world as an ordered system is absent from Hebrew thought.

The order of the world was explained variously by the leading schools of philosophy. Plato held that the kosmos included both the visible world and all that could be known by reason. The concepts of world, heaven, and space began to merge. Heraclitus and later Aristotle rejected any notion of a beginning of the world. The world was infinite, without beginning or end. For the Stoics, the logos was the rational principle that gave order to the world. The idea of God as Creator and the world as God's creation was foreign to the Greeks. The world was an extension of the logos that gave it order. Plato considered that a demiurge formed the world in a manner consistent with perfect being. Even for Plato, however, neither was the demiurge fully God nor was the world a creation. It was an extension or emanation of the demiurge.

The use of kosmos in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, marked the beginning of a biblical concept of world. The merging of Hebrew and Greek thought later found its fullest expression in the works of Philo of Alexandria, who used the word more than any other writer in antiquity.

In the New Testament Three words are translated as "world" in the New Testament: oikoumenē (15 times, "the inhabited earth"), aiōn (over 30 times, similar to the Hebrew olam meaning "long duration," "age," or "world"), and kosmos (188 times). World can carry various nuances.

W

1. The whole created order Paul before the Areopagus in Athens spoke of "the God who made the world and everything in it" (Acts 17:24 NIV). The doctrine of creation was still fundamental to the New Testament writers. The early Christians in Jerusalem addressed God as "Sovereign Lord, . . . you made the heaven and the earth and the sea, and everything in them" (Acts 4:24 NIV). The biblical writers could therefore refer to "the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25:34; Luke 11:50; John 17:24; Eph. 1:4; Heb. 4:3; 9:26; 1 Pet. 1:20; Rev. 13:8; 17:8) or the creation of the world (see Rom. 1:20; compare John 17:5).

2. The earth and its inhabitants John 1:9 refers to "the true light which enlightens everyone was coming into the world" (NRSV). Similarly, in the farewell discourse in John, Jesus spoke of His departure from the world (13:1; 16:28). The authorities complained that "the world"—meaning all people—had "gone after him" (John 12:19). Satan offered Jesus "all the kingdoms of the world" (Matt. 4:8 NIV), and Paul saluted the Christians in Rome, saying, "Your faith is proclaimed throughout the world" (Rom. 1:8 NRSV). The meaning of "the world" in John 3:16 should probably be understood in this sense.

3. The arena of human activity. This especially pertains to wealth and material goods. "The cares of this world" can choke out the word (Mark 4:19). Married persons may be especially troubled over worldly affairs (1 Cor. 7:33–34). In this sense, the elder admonished the Johannine community, "Do not love the world or anything in the world" (1 John 2:15 NIV; compare 2:16–17).

"The world" can also designate all that is hostile, rebellious, and opposed to God. Paul referred to the effects of the fall on the whole cosmic order: "The creation was subjected to frustration . . . [but] the creation itself will be liberated from its bondage" (Rom 8:19–25 NIV; compare 2 Pet. 1:4). The world, therefore, is under the power of "the prince of this world" (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2:2), the "god of this world" (2 Cor. 4:4); "the whole world is under the control of the evil one" (1 John 5:19 NIV).

Paul contrasted the wisdom of this world with the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:20–21,26–28; 3:19). "The rulers of this age" cannot understand God's wisdom hidden in Christ (1 Cor. 2:7–8 NIV). Through the cross, Christ triumphed over all the powers of this world (Col. 2:15). Indeed, God was in Christ "reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor. 5:19; Col. 1:20).

The hostile sense of "the world" is especially pronounced in the Johannine writings. Nevertheless, it is important to note that the world is not inherently evil. John still affirmed the creation of the world through the logos (John 1:3–4). Jesus, "the lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29 NIV), was sent to save the world (3:17; 10:36; 12:47). He is, therefore, "the light of the world" (8:12); the Samaritans acclaimed Him as "the Savior of the world" (4:42).

The coming of Jesus, however, brought judgment to the world (9:39; 12:31). The world will hate the disciples as it hated Jesus (15:18) because they are not of the world (15:19). Jesus called His disciples to show love for one another that all may recognize them through this love (13:35) The disciples are to be in the world but not "of the world" (17:14–16). Victory over the hostility of the world is assured through the cross of Jesus (16:33) and through faith (1 John 5:4–5). The world, in fact, is already passing away (1 John 2:17).

In the new Testament, therefore, world is influenced by both Hebrew and Greek thought and may be considered primarily in its natural order, its human order, its fallenness, or its place in God's redemptive order.

WORM A small, slender, softbodied animal without a backbone, legs, or eyes. They often improve the soil by working decaying matter into the soil while aerating it by their movements. There are many examples in the Bible where insect larvae are called worms. The earthworm is the most representative of the worms of Palestine. It is also used in the Bible as a figure of lowliness or weakness (Ps. 22:6; Job 17:14; Isa. 41:14). Both the Old Testament and the New Testament speak of the place of the ungodly and unbeliever as being that where the worm is always alive and working (Isa. 66:24: Mark 9:44,48). See Animals.

WORMWOOD A nonpoisonous but bitter plant common to the Middle East. Wormwood often is used in analogy to speak of bitterness and sorrow. The Old Testament prophets pictured wormwood as the opposite of justice and righteousness (Amos 5:7; Jer. 23:15). Revelation describes as wormwood one of the blazing stars which brings destruction (8:10–11).

WORSHIP Human response to the perceived presence of the divine, a presence which transcends normal human activity and is holy. Thus, Jacob, fleeing away to Haran, perceived the presence of the Lord in a dream while sleeping at "a certain place," and when he woke from his sleep, he said:

> Surely the Lord is in this place—and I did not know it! . . . How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven (Gen. 28:16–17 NRSV).

Before the dream, the place had only been a stopping place reached by sunset (18:11), but when he awoke it had become a holy place. The holy presence of God had penetrated into ordinary (profane) space in a way which had aroused acute awareness on the part of a human being. The sacred (holy) and profane are united in an experience of worship.

The consciousness of holy presence brings forth a response from those who perceived it. The response is worship and may take many forms. The response may be private and intensely personal, in the form of prayers, confessions, silence, and meditative experiences of various sorts. Jesus, leaving the disciples behind in a place called Gethsemane, went a ways from them to fall on the ground and pray alone to the Father (Mark 14:32–35). According to Matthew 26:39 (NRSV), he "threw himself on the ground and prayed"; according to Luke 22:41, he "knelt down, and prayed" (NRSV). Each of these is a physical posture considered appropriate for worship in prayer.

Jacob's response was to take the stone he had used for a pillow and to set it up as a pillar, declaring that the stone pillar would be a house of God, apparently meaning that a temple/sanctuary would be built there. This would be a place where communication could occur between the divine-heavenly realm and the human-earthly realm. The messengers of God would be continually going up and down bearing the petitions of worshipers and the responses of God. Thus Jacob proposed that his personal experience of the presence of God be made available to others.

Worship in the Bible moves back and forth between personal experience and corporate experience. Personal worship may occur in very private circumstances or may be related to public worship. This is illustrated by the shifting back and forth from plural speakers to a singular speaker in the Psalms (for instance, Ps. 44). Personal worship and corporate worship are mutually interactive. Corporate worship is empowered by personal experience, but personal experience needs affirmation and interpretation in corporate worship. Thus, early Christians were warned not to neglect meeting together in worship, "as is the habit of some," in order to encourage one another in the faith and in the spiritual life (Heb. 10:25 NRSV). Assembling together in worship is an affirmation of what the worshipers believe and an opportunity for mutual response to the gracious actions of God.

Worship in the Bible appears in varied forms and types. Times and places are among the major factors. Worship, especially of the corporate type, normally takes place according to some sort of schedule and/or calendar. There are times and seasons for worship, even though in the Bible God is present with His people at anytime. Sharpened awareness of the divine presence may result from intensive exercises of worship during special times and at special places. These occasions and places are also the contexts for religious education and the development and enjoyment of fellowship among the worshipers. Thus in ancient Israel there was the divine comand that "Three times in the year all your males shall appear before the Lord God," and "Three times in the year you shall hold a festival for me" (Ex. 23:14–17 NRSV). See Day of Atonement; Festivals; Sabbath.

The Psalms with expressions of lament, confession, thanksgiving, praise, teaching, and celebration show the breadth of Old Testament worship. See Music; Psalms.

The followers of Jesus, who became known as Christians, received a rich heritage of worship from Judaism, but the new dynamics of their experience with Christ brought about major changes. The festivals of Passover and Pentecost were retained but in different forms. The Lord's Supper, the crucifixion, and the resurrection of Jesus are all closely related to the Passover celebration (1 Cor. 11:23–26; Matt. 26:17,26–28 and parallels). The Christian Easter is a form of the Passover. According to Acts 2:1–42, Pentecost was the occasion of a great filling and empowering of the disciples of Jesus by the Holy Spirit (interpreted as a fulfillment of Joel 2:28–32). Scattered references in the New Testament (1 Cor. 16:8; Acts 20:16) indicate that the early Christians converted Pentecost into a Christian observance. It has continued to be observed as a part of the Christian calendar by many churches (seventh Sunday after Easter). Tabernacles/Booths has not been continued in Christian worship except in the related forms of thanksgiving observances and harvest festivals. The Day of Atonement is used theologically to interpret Christ's sacrifice in Hebrews 8—9, but does not seem to have been a regular part of Christian worship, except in the form of penitential periods like Lent. For Christians the whole complex of Temple activities, priesthood, sacrifice, and sin-cleansing rituals either became obsolete or were reinterpreted in major ways (for instance, the church itself becomes the temple 1 Cor. 6:19; Eph. 2:21–22; 1 Pet. 2:9). See Church Year.

Sabbath has been a major problem for Christian worship. The early Christians are said to have met on the first day of the week (Acts 20:7; compare 1 Cor. 16:2; John 20:19,26)—though attending the Temple together on a daily basis (Acts 2:46). The early Christian meetings seem to have been joyful occasions for teaching, prophesying, singing, praying, reading apostolic letters, and the "breaking of bread" in the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:42,46; 1 Cor. 14:26; Eph. 5:19–20; Col. 3:16; 1 Thess. 5:16–18). The explanation of the emergence of the Christian Sunday from these beginnings is plagued by a lack of precise information and by doctrinal disputes. It seems clear that the first-day-of-the-week meetings of the early Christians were not sabbaths. The first-day celebration became "the Lord's day" (Rev. 1:10) with emphasis on the resurrection. In time, the Christian Sunday became the Christian sabbath for most Christians; though non-Sunday, sabbatarian groups have been very persistent in Christian history. It seems logical for Christians to observe both sabbath and Sunday, but in most cases this has been judged both impractical and unnecessary. The extent to which Sunday should be considered as sabbath is debated by Christians both in theory and in practice. One polar position is represented by a long tradition of puritanical sabbath observance on Sunday, with no works and a minimum of other activities apart from worship. The other pole gathers around it the conviction that sabbath was annulled by the work and teaching of Jesus (compare Gal. 4:10–11; Rom. 14:5; Col. 2:16–17) and that Christians are free from any sabbath observance on Sunday. Most Christians maintain a middle position of sabbath/Sunday observance, taking Sunday as a messianic continuation of the Jewish sabbath and believing that the loss of the sabbath theology of the Old Testament would be serious and unnecessary. The sabbath theology includes the archetypal testimonies of God's saving action in creation from chaos and in Exodus from slavery. Such fundamental aspects are essential for a life of faith and merge without conflict with the celebration of the resurrection and the lordship of Christ.

The discussion above indicates that worship in the biblical context is multifaceted and complex. Some elements seem to be of vital importance. Time and places have been referred to already. The New Testament and much Christian experience move away from rigid adherence to calendars and places, but they are still important in Christian practice. The awareness of divine presence, however symbolized and realized, is absolutely essential for worship. Like Jacob, every true worshiper becomes aware that "The Lord is in this place!" As in the case of Jacob, the sense of presence may come in private and personal experience. However, the most basic pattern is found in the promise of Jesus, according to Matthew 18:20 (NRSV): "For where two or three are gathered in my name, I am there among them." The heart of Christian worship is the power of Christ's presence in a gathered community of disciples (see John 14:12–14; Acts 2:43–47; 4:9–12,32–37; 1 Cor. 5:3–4; Rev. 2:1). According to the New Testament, the presence of Christ is especially manifest in the breaking of the bread at the Lord's Supper (compare Luke 24:28–32,35). However, the Presence is not limited to the Supper and may occur wherever and whenever "two or three are gathered" in the name of Jesus Christ.

WRATH, WRATH OF GOD The emotional response to perceived wrong and injustice, often translated "anger," "indignation," "vexation," and "irritation." Both humans and God express wrath.

Old Testament The wrath of God appears in the Old Testament as a divine response to human sin and injustice. When the Israelites complained to God at Taberah, "the anger of the Lord blazed hotly" (Num. 11:10 RSV) Later, God reminded the people of various such experiences and warned, "Remember and do not forget how you provoked the Lord your God to wrath in the wilderness." (Deut. 9:7 NRSV) Idolatry became the occasion for divine wrath also. Psalm 78:56–66 describes Israel's idolatry: God was "full of wrath," "utterly rejected Israel," and "gave his people to the sword." The wrath of God is consistently directed towards those who do not follow His will. (Deut. 1:26–46; Josh. 7:1; Ps. 2:1–6) Historical calamity and disaster were to be expected when God was stirred to anger. God was wrathful over Saul's disobedience: "Because you did not obey the voice of the Lord, and did not carry out his fierce wrath against Amalek, . . . the Lord will also give the army of Israel into the hands of the Philistines" (1 Sam. 28:18–19 NRSV).

The Old Testament often speaks of a "day" coming in the future which will be "The great day of the Lord . . . a day of wrath" (Zeph. 1:14–15 NRSV). Isaiah spoke of "the day of the Lord" as "cruel, with wrath and fierce anger" (Isa. 13:9 NRSV) This day referred to the present day of judgment in history, as when the Assyrians conquered Israel; but it also calls to mind a future day of final judgment at the end time when all will be called to give account to God.

The wrath of God was viewed in fear and awe. Yet God provided a way to gain divine favor. Repentance turns God's wrath away from the sinner. The psalmist reminded God that He had in times past forgiven the iniquity of His people and withdrawn all of His wrath (Ps. 85:1–3). Jesus affirmed the Old Testament teaching about such a day. He predicted a day that will come at an unknown time when "the earth will pass away" (Mark 13:31; compare the entire chapter).

New Testament Jesus' teaching supports the concept of God the Father as a God of wrath who judges sin and justice. The story of the rich man and Lazarus shows the rich man in hades in torment and anguish (Luke 16:19–31). The story definitely speaks of the judgment of God and implies that there are serious consequences for the sinner. In Luke 13:3,5 (NRSV) Jesus said, "Unless you repent, you will all perish." John 15:1–11 warns that the unfruitful branches are to be "gathered, thrown into the fire, and burned" (John 15:6 NRSV; compare Matt. 3:7).

God's wrath is restrained, held back from its full and final effect. John 3:36 (NRSV) records Jesus' saying "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life; whoever disobeys the Son will not see life, but must endure God's wrath." The grace of God, His unmerited favour, holds the full effect of wrath back at the same time that wrath "rests upon" the sinner.

In Romans 2:5 (NRSV), Paul spoke to those who do not repent of their sin, warning that "by your hard and impenitent heart you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath, when God's righteous judgment will be revealed." The image of wrath being restrained for some future release is truly awe inspiring. However, the Christian has no fear of this day, since 1 Thessalonians says that Jesus "rescues us from the wrath that is coming." (1 Thess. 1:10 NRSV). The instruments of God's wrath may be angels (Rev. 15:1,7), nations, kings, and rulers as well as natural catastrophes.

Human wrath is always suspect. We are instructed by Paul not to take revenge (Rom. 12:19), nor to "let the sun go down on your anger" (Eph. 4:26 NRSV). Fathers should not provoke children to wrath (Eph. 6:4). We must rid ourselves of "all such things—anger, wrath, malice" (Col. 3:8 NRSV). The Old Testament psalms of lament such as Psalms 53; 137 show how humans can freely express their anger to God.

To realize this freedom from the domination of wrath, the gracious work of the Holy Spirit is needed to sanctify and cleanse the heart of the attitudes and feelings of wrath and anger. Romans 8 pictures the mind filled by the Spirit which is "life and peace" (Rom. 8:6 NRSV). Such a spirit is no longer a slave of anger and wrath but is yielded "to righteousness for sanctification" (Rom. 6:19 NRSV). There is no need to continue in the fleshly spirit of wrath for the Holy Spirit provides inner peace (Phil. 4:4–8). W. Stanley Johnson

WRITING The human ability to record and communicate information through etching signs on stone or drawing them on skins or papyrus. Present knowledge shows that writing began in the Ancient Near East about 3500 B.C. The increasing complexity of commercial and civil life made some system of writing necessary. The development of writing, in turn, made possible the development of increasingly sophisticated civilizations.

Mesopotamia About 3500 B.C. the earliest documents appeared in Mesopotamia. These were business documents used for accounting purposes. Prior to this, accounts were kept by enclosing counters or tokens of various shapes in clay or mud balls over which a cylinder seal would be rolled identifying the owner or sender. The early tablets typically were inscribed with a picture or pictures identifying the commodity, numbers, and personal names. The language used by the writers of these early tablets is not known. The Sumerians were the first to write different words having the same sound with the same picture. Soon after, the Sumerians began to use stylized pictures composed of wedges impressed in the clay tablet with a stylus. So there began to be developed the hundreds of wedge-shaped signs which comprise the cuneiform script.

The early pictographic writing, which depicted an object, developed into logographic writing in which a picture could stand for a word associated with the idea of the object. Several pictures could be combined to present a concept or a phrase. Rebus writing occurred when a picture or sign was associated with another word of the same sound. In logo-syllabic writing, a sign came to represent a sound rather than a word; this is commonly regarded as the emergence of true writing. The correct reading of signs could be indicated by the addition of phonetic complements or by prefixing determinatives which could indicate "wood," "city," "male," "mountain," and so forth. The rapid development of the cuneiform script made it suitable not only for the mundane task of keeping business accounts but also for legal documents, letters, and literary and religious documents.

The Sumerians established the scribal school in which the student spent several years learning how to write documents of all kinds. The teacher would write a text on one side of the tablet, and the student would copy the text on the other side for the teacher's evaluation. Grammars and verb charts were compiled. Trained scribes were in heavy demand for service at the temple, the court, and at trading firms.

The cuneiform script of the Sumerians was adopted by the Semitic speaking Akkadians, the Elamites, and Hurrians. Cuneiform continued to be expanded and adapted to meet the demands of the various languages. Excavations have yielded thousands of documents in Sumerian and Akkadian showing the progress of civilization, the arts, and sciences. So successful did Akkadian become that it was used as the international language of trade and diplomacy for several centuries. The modern historian is indebted most of all to king Assurbanipal of Assyria (668–626 B.C.) who founded a library at Nineveh. Assurbanipal sent his scribes all over Mesopotamia to make copies of thousands of important documents, especially literary and religious texts. The discovery of this library provided a corpus of texts coming from all periods of Mesopotamian history.

Egypt By about 3000 B.C. the Egyptians had developed a hieroglyphic system of writing, the so-called "sacred picture writing." used chiefly for inscriptions on public monuments. In a manner similar to Sumerian, hieroglyphic signs could be read as signs for words or ideas, as phonetic signs, and as determinatives. Vowels were not indicated in the script, but the debate about whether the logographic script became a syllabic script apparently continues. The decipherment of hieroglyphics was accomplished by Champollion in 1822 after several years of rigorous study.

The Egyptians developed a cursive script, called hieratic, to meet the needs of everyday life, such as record keeping, inventories of goods, and so forth. Hieratic, simplified hieroglyphics, was written with brush and ink on the smooth surfaces of stone and papyrus. About 700 B.C. hieratic was further simplified into another cursive script, demotic. By A.D. 200 Greek letters were used for the writing of the Egyptian language, then in use, called Coptic.

Asia Minor The Hittites of Anatolia, who spoke an Indo-European language, adopted the Mesopotamian cuneiform system of writing. The Hittite cuneiform texts are known mainly from the archives of Bogazkoy discovered in 1906. The pioneering work in the interpretation of the texts was done by F. Hrozny who recognized that the texts were characteristically written with a mixture of Sumerian logograms, Akkadian words and phrases, and phonetically written Hittite words and phrases. Variant copies of the same or similar texts often contain the phonetically written equivalents of the Sumerian and Akkadian elements. The Hittites, like the Elamites and Hurrians, also used Akkadian for documents dealing with international relations.

About 1500 B.C. a hieroglyphic system known as Hittite hieroglyphics began to appear. This system of writing was not influenced by the older Egyptian hieroglyphics. Students of the texts have determined that the language is related to but not identical with the Hittite known from the cuneiform texts. The Karatepe bilingual inscription, composed of a text in hieroglyphics and Phoenician, came to light in 1947 and confirmed not only the meanings of some words but also that the previous research, done without the aid of bilingual texts, had been on the correct course.

Syria-Palestine The first-known attempts to produce an alphabet were made in Syria-Palestine. The texts from Ugarit (Ras Shamra) date from 1500–1200 B.C. and were written in an alphabetic cuneiform. The alphabet consists of thirty-one characters, twenty-eight of which are consonants and three of which indicate the vowel accompanying the letter 'aleph.

In work carried out in 1904–1905 at Serabit el-Khadem in the Sinai, Flinders Petrie discovered inscriptions written in a script reminiscent of Egyptian hieroglyphics but consisting of only about thirty signs. Although not all the signs have been deciphered conclusively, it is possible to see the relationship of some of the characters to letters in the Phoenician alphabet from about 1000 B.C. The script of the Sinaitic inscriptions is the earliest stage in the development of the Canannite linear script.

The sources available for the study of the development of the Hebrew script are of several kinds: monumental inscriptions (incised in stone), ostraca (inscribed potshreds), inscriptions incised on seals, weights, jar handles, ossuaries, and documents written in ink on papyrus and leather. The monumental inscriptions include the Gezer Calendar (950 B.C.), the Moabite Stone (850 B.C.), the Siloam tunnel inscription and the Siloam tomb inscription (700 B.C.). The ostraca include those from Samaria (800 B.C.), Hazor (800 B.C.), Yavneh-yam (550 B.C.), and Lachish (500 B.C.). After the Exile the "square" script of Aramaic origin began to replace the cursive script, as the Elephantine papyri show. The documents from the Qumran and Wadi Murabba'at areas (200 B.C. to A.D. 150) complete the data. These source materials make it possible to trace the development of the Hebrew-Aramaic scripts for more than a thousand years and, therefore, to date with greater precision the documents which continue to come to light in the course of excavations.

Biblical References to Writing Several writing systems were in use in Syria-Palestine by the time of Moses and Joshua. Many Bible texts refer to Moses being directed to write down accounts of historical events (Ex. 17:14), laws and statutes (Ex. 34:1–9), and the words of the Lord (Ex. 24:4). Joshua wrote on stones a copy of the law of Moses (Josh. 8:32) and later wrote down statutes and ordinances in the book of the law of God (Josh. 24:26). Gideon had a young man of Succoth to write down the names of the 77 officials and elders of that town (Judg. 8:14). Samuel wrote down the rights and duties of kingship (1Sam. 10:25). David could write his own letter to his general (2 Sam. 11:14). Kings engaged in international correspondence (2 Chron. 2:11). Many references to the "chronicles of the kings of Israel" and Judah perhaps indicate court diaries or annals (1 Kings 14:19). The prophets wrote, or dictated, their oracles (Isa. 8:1,16; 30:8; Jer. 30:1–2; 36:27–28). By at least 800 B.C., court scribes were tallying the payment of taxes (compare the Samaria Ostraca). Commemorative and memorial inscriptions were in use (compare the Siloam inscription and the Siloam tomb inscription). Nehemiah as an official under Persian appointment wrote down the covenant to keep the law of God (Neh. 9:38), to which several men set their seals as witnesses (Neh. 10:1–27).

Similarly, in the New Testament period literacy was widespread. Jesus could both read (Luke 4:16–21) and write (John 8:6). The writers of the Gospels and Paul wrote in excellent Greek, with Paul regularly using an amenuensis or scribe.

The various kinds of documents and writings mentioned in the Bible were letters (personal and official), decrees (religious and civil), legal documents, deeds of sale, certificates of divorce, family registers, topographical descriptions, and books of scrolls containing laws, court records, and poetic works (see Jashar, The Book of).

It is difficult to determine how widespread literacy may have been in Old Testament times. Most of the persons listed as writers are those in professional capacities or in positions of leadership which required writing, such as kings, religious leaders, prophets, and governors. Even then, scribes or secretaries were most often used. One of the cabinet officials was the secretary (sōphēr) who handled official correspondence, including international communications (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25). Jeremiah dictated his oracles to his scribe, Baruch (Jer. 30:2; 36:27). In addition the Hebrew inscriptions provide no firm evidence that the general populace could read or write, or even that they had much need to do so.

Writing Materials and Implements Stone was used in all periods in the Ancient Near East as a writing surface, especially for monumental and memorial inscriptions. In Egypt the wall of temples were covered with historical inscriptions chiseled into the stone. In Mesopotamia and Anatolia inscriptions were cut into the faces of mountains (compare the Behistun Rock) or into stones of various sizes for monuments on public display (compare the Code of Hammurabi and boundary markers) or for small inscriptions to be included in foundation deposits. In Syria-Palestine several monumental inscriptions were cut into stone, including the Moabite Stone, the Siloam inscription, and the inscriptions of Aramaean and Phoenician rulers from 1000 B.C. onward. In the Old Testament the law was written on stone (Ex. 24:12) and written on stones covered with plaster (Deut. 27:1–10).

Clay was the main writing medium for those cultures which used cuneiform scripts. Impressions were made on the soft clay by the use of a stylus. Often legal documents and letters would be encased in a clay envelope on which a summary of the text was written and over which cylinder seals would be rolled to identify witnesses. Although clay documents written in cuneiform scripts have been found in Palestine, there is no clear Old Testament reference to clay tablets used by Israelites.

Wooden tablets, covered by clay or wax, were used as writing surfaces in both Egypt and Mesopotamia. In the Bible there is the mention of writing on wooden staffs (Num. 17:2–3) and on wooden staves (Ezek. 37:16). The references in Isaiah 30:8 and Habakkuk 2:2 may be to writing on wooden tablets. In Luke 1:63, Zechariah wrote on a tablet of wood with a wax surface.

In several periods metal was used as a writing medium, especially bronze or copper. Inscriptions in a poorly understood syllabic script from Byblos were written on bronze sheets. Especially well known are the two copper scrolls from Qumran which contained a list of the treasures of the community.

The potsherd provided a cheap and highly useful surface for letters, economic records, and school copy texts. Inscribed potsherds (ostraca) were commonly used in Egypt in all periods and in Palestine. They were inscribed with pen (or brush) and ink. Ostraca form a major part of the corpus of Hebrew inscriptions, such as the Samaria and Lachish ostraca.

Papyrus was used very early in Egypt and continued in use through the early centuries of our era. The papyrus reed was split into thin strips which were arranged in two layers at right angles and then pressed together and polished to form a smooth surface. Sheets of papyrus could be glued together to form long scrolls. As Aramaic began to be accepted as the international language, papyrus became more widely used in Mesopotamia and Syria-Palestine. It is likely that the first edition of Jeremiah's book was written on papyrus (Jer. 36). The documents of the Jewish community at Elephantine were written on papyrus. Several works on papyrus were among the literary remains from Qumran. Large collections of papyri from Egypt written in Koine Greek helped to elucidate the New Testament writings.

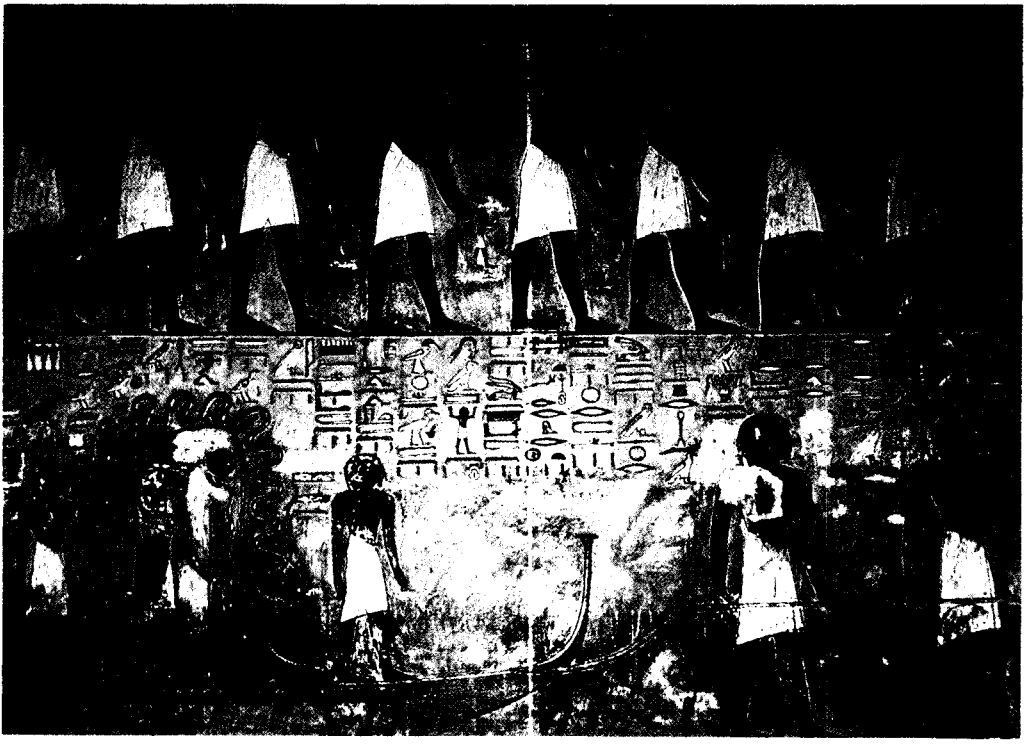
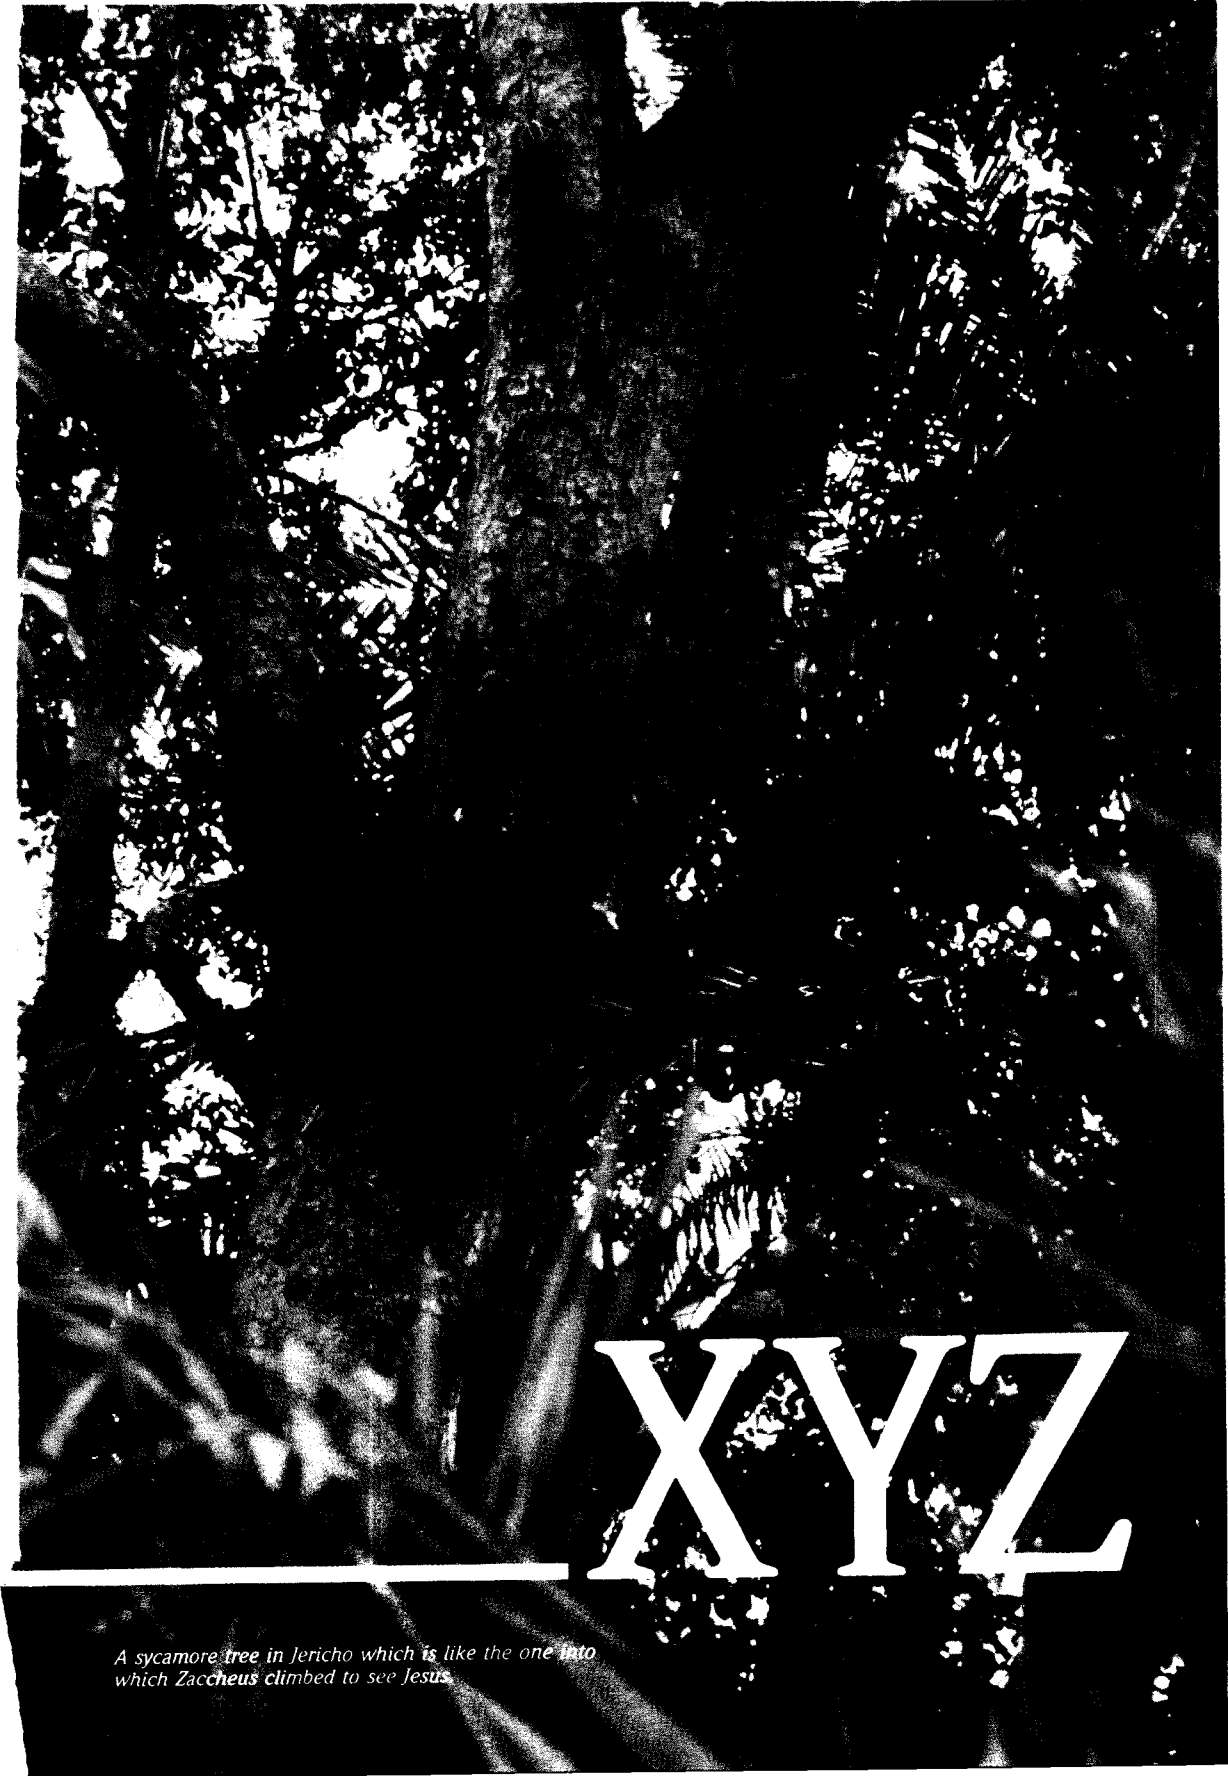
Carefully prepared leather was used for most of the biblical scrolls at Qumran. Torah scrolls are still written on leather. Sections of leather would be sewn together to form scrolls of lengths appropriate for the book or work. Horizontal lines were often pressed into the leather to act as guides for the scribe. The codex, or book, was made only from parchment.



Two words are used in the Old Testament for writing implements 'et and ḥereṭ. The first term is usually rendered "pen." Psalm 45:1 (NRSV) speaks of the "pen of a ready scribe," and thus it is probably a reference to a reed pen whose end fibers were separated to form a brush. Jeremiah 17:1 and Job 19:24 refer to an iron pen designed to make inscriptions on rock. The second term, ḥereṭ, is mentioned as both a graving tool (Ex. 32:4) and as a stylus (Isa. 8:1; "pen," KJV). Since Isaiah 8:1 mentions a tablet (NRSV) as the writing surface, it is possible that the stylus was used to carve or scratch the inscription into the wood or its covering of wax.

Ink was made from carbon black and gum resin and could be washed from a writing surface such as papyrus. Papyrus could thus be used more than once. A sheet of papyrus which was used more than once, with the original writing having been rinsed away, is called a palimpsest. Paleographers have often found palimpsests to be valuable because the original writing, incompletely expunged, may be more significant than the later writing.



Ezekiel 9:2–3,11 mention the equipment of the scribe, the qeset ha-sōphēr, The man clothed in linen who appeared to Ezekiel had a "writing case" or "inkhorn" upon his loins (at his side). Writing cases are known in both Egyptian and Mesopotamian literature and art work. They provided containers for pens, brushes, styluses, and ink.

The last implement to be mentioned is the scribe's knife in Jeremiah 36:23. As Jeremiah's scroll was being read, the king took a scribe's knife and cut off the columns of the scroll and burned them. The knife was probably used by the scribe to size and trim papyrus, leather, or parchment. That Jeremiah's scroll was made of papyrus and not leather is indicated by the fact that the king was in his winter quarters seeking warmth from a charcoal brazier. The odor of burning leather in an enclosed space would have been obnoxious. See Akkadian; Aramaic; Archaeology; Cuneiform; Hebrew; Pottery. Thomas Smothers

YEAR OF JUBILEE The fiftieth year after seven cycles of seven years (Lev. 25:10) in which Israel's land and people gained freedom. It was begun with a blast from a ram's horn on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 25:9). During this year of joy and liberation, the law stipulated three respects in which the land and people were to be sanctified: (1) It was to be a time of rest for the soil as well as people (Lev. 25:11). The unattended growth of the field was for the poor to glean and for the beasts of the field (Ex. 23:11). (2) All land was to revert back to the original owner (Lev. 25:10–34; 27:16–24). The original distribution of land was to remain intact. All property which the original owner had been obligated to sell (and had not yet been redeemed) was to revert (without payment) to the original owner or his lawful heirs. Some exceptions to this pattern are noted in Leviticus 25:29–30; 27:17–21. (3) Every Israelite who had sold himself—either to his fellow countryman or to a foreigner settled in the land—because of poverty and remained unredeemed was to be freed along with his children (Lev. 25:39–46).

The Year of Jubilee prevented the Israelites from oppression of one another (Lev. 25:17). It had a leveling effect of Israel's culture by giving everyone a chance for a new start. It discouraged excessive, permanent accumulations of wealth and the deprevation of an Israelite of his inheritance in the land. Families and tribes were preserved by the return of freed bondservants to their own families. Permanent slavery in Israel was rendered impossible.

The tomb of Xerxes located in the modern country of Iran.

This year was a constant reminder of God's interest in economic freedom (Ezek. 46:17). Purchase of property was actually tantamount to assuming a lease for a maximum of forty-nine years, and the seller always retained the right to cancel the purchase by settling with the buyer on the amount of money that was still payable, taking into account the number of years that the buyer had made use of the property. If the seller was either incapable or not desirous of making use of this right of redemption, the property nevertheless returned to his possession automatically in the next Year of Jubilee. So the sale of a house, for example, was equivalent to renting it for a specified period of time (Lev. 25:29–34). This made it difficult to accumulate vast permanent holdings of wealth (compare Isa. 5:8; Mic. 2:2). God's designed arrangement was against both large estates and pauperism. The Israelites were repeatedly given the opportunity to begin anew, and the impoverished were enabled to maintain themselves in society.

This year also reflected God's provision for the soil's conservation (Lev. 25:11–12,18–21). During the Year of Jubilee, the Israelites were once again taught that they were to live in faith that the Lord would satisfy their needs (compare Ex. 16:17–18).

YELLOW Two Hebrew words are translated "yellow." Yeraqraq (Ps. 68:13) refers to gold strongly alloyed with silver or the sallow color of sick skin (Lev. 13:49). Tsahob (Lev. 13:30,32,36) refers to the color of hair in a patch of skin that lets the priest know it is leperous. The basic meaning of tsahob is "shining" and represents bright red or gold. See Colors.

YHWH God's name in Hebrew known by the technical term "Tetragrammaton" (Greek, meaning four letters), these are the four consonants which make up the divine name (Ex. 3:15; found more than 6,000 times in the Old Testament). The written Hebrew language did not include vowels, only the consonants were used; thus readers supplied the vowels as they read (this is true even today in Hebrew newspapers). Reverence for the divine name led to the practice of avoiding its use lest one run afoul of Commandments such as Exodus 20:7 or Leviticus 24:16. In time it was thought that the divine name was too holy to pronounce at all. Thus the practice arose of using the word Adonai: "Lord." Many translations of the Bible followed this practice. In most English translations YHWH is recognizable where the word LORD appears in all caps. See God; I Am; Jehovah; Lord.

In the course of the centuries the actual pronunciation of YHWH was lost. In the Middle Ages Jewish scholars developed a system of symbols placed under and beside the consonants to indicate the vowels. YHWH appeared with the vowels from "Adonai" as a device to remind them to say "Adonai" in their reading of the text. A latinized form of this was pronounced "Jehovah," but it was actually not a real word at all. From the study of the structure of the Hebrew language most scholars today believe that YHWH was probably pronounced Yahweh (Yah ´ weh). Mark Fountain

YIRON (Yī' ron) NAS spelling of Iron (Josh. 19:38). See Iron.

YOD Tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet used as title of Psalm 119:73–80 (KJV, Jod) in which all verses begin with the letter.

YOKE A wooden frame placed on the backs of draft animals to make them pull in tandem. The simple yokes consisted of a bar with two loops either of rope or wood which went around the animals' necks. More elaborate yokes had shafts connected to the middle with which the animals pulled plows or other implements. The word is used most often in the Bible to speak of slavery, bondage, and hardship (1 Kings 12:4, Jer. 27:8). Positive usages include the yoke of Christ (Matt. 11:29–30) and the joint nature of the church's work (Phil. 4:3).

ZAANAIM (Zā ā nā' îm) KJV, TEV spelling of Zaanannim (Judg. 4:11) following written Hebrew text rather than scribal note and Joshua 19:33.

ZAANAN (Zā' ā năn) Place name possibly meaning, "sheep country" or "outback." Unidentified city in southermost Judah (Mic. 1:11), probably identical with Zenan (Josh. 15:37).

ZAANANNIM (Zā' ā năn nîm) Place name of uncertain meaning. Town on northeastern corner of tribal allotment of Naphtali near Kadesh (Josh. 19:33; Judg. 4:11). The "plain of Zaanaim" (Judg. 4:11 KJV) is literally translated, "great tree in Zaanannim" (NIV) or "oak in Zaanannim" (NAS; note transliterations of REB, NRSV). This probably indicates a "sacred tree" associated with a worship center. See Elon; Terebinth.

ZAAVAN (Zā' ā văn) Personal name meaning, "tremble or quake." Son of Ezer (Gen. 36:27).

ZABAD (Zā' băd) Place name meaning, "He has given" or "gift." 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:36–37). 2. An Ephramite (1 Chron. 7:21). 3. One of David's "thirty" elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:41); the first of twenty-one names which the Chronicler appended to a list paralleling that of 2 Samuel 23:24–39. 4. Assassin of King Joash (2 Chron. 24:26), called Jozacar in 2 Kings 12:21. 5. Three postexilic laymen ordered to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27,33,43).

ZABBAI (Zăb' baî) An abbreviated personal name perhaps meaning, "pure." 1. A son of Bebai who promised Ezra he would put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28). 2. The father of Baruch who worked on the wall of Jerusalem with Nehemiah (3:20). Some say that 1. and 2. may be the same person. The early scribal note (qere) in Nehemiah writes the name, Zaccai.

ZABBUD (Zăb′ bŭd) Personal name meaning, "gift." Descendant of Bigvai who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra after the Exile (Ezra 8:14) according to written Hebrew text. Scribal note (qere) has Zaccur. See Zabud.

ZABDI (Zăb′ dī) Personal name meaning, "my gift" or short form of "Yah gives." 1. Son of Zerah of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 7:1). 2. Man of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:19). 3. Man in charge of the wine cellars of David (1 Chron. 27:27). 4. Son of Asaph who led in thanksgiving and prayer (Neh. 11:17).

ZABDIEL (Zăb′ dĭ ĕl) Personal name meaning, "God gives gifts" or "My gift is God." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 27:2). 2. An overseer in Jerusalem during the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:14).

ZABUD (Zā′ bŭd) Personal name meaning, "endowed." Son of Nathan, a priest and Solomon's friend (1 Kings 4:5).

ZABULON (Zăb′ ū lŏn) KJV spelling of Zebulun in New Testament. See Zebulun.

ZACCAI (Zăc′ cā ī) Personal name meaning "pure" or "innocent." One whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:9; Neh. 7:14).

ZACCHEUS (Zăc chāē′ ŭs) Greek form of Hebrew name meaning, "innocent." A corrupt tax collector in first-century Jericho (Luke 19:2–9). Out of curiosity he went to hear Jesus. Because of his short stature he had to climb a tree to catch a glimpse of the Lord. To his surprise Jesus called him by name to come down and went home with Zacchaeus. There the official believed and was converted. As a result of his newfound faith, he restored with interest the money he had taken illegally.

ZACC(H)UR (Zăc′ chŭr) Personal name meaning, "well remembered." 1. Father of Shammua of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 13:4). 2. Descendant of Mishma of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26). 3. Descendant of Merari among the Levites (1 Chron. 24:27). 4. Son of Asaph (1 Chron. 25:2; Neh. 12:35). 5. Son of Imri who helped Nehemiah rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (3:2). 6. One who sealed the covenant of reform during the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (10:12). Father of Hanan, one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (13:13).

ZACHARIAH (Zăch ă rī′ ah) KJV alternate spelling of Zechariah. See Zechariah 1.

ZACHARIAS (Zăch ăr ī′ ăs) Greek form of Hebrew personal name Zechariah, meaning, "Yah remembered." A priest in Jerusalem and the father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5–64). As he was burning incense in the Temple as part of his duties, the angel Gabriel appeared to Zacharias and announced that he and his elderly wife, Elisabeth, would have a son. Since both were past the age of childbearing, Zacharias asked for a sign that the birth would occur. Because of his lack of faith, the angel struck him dumb. When John was born, the people assumed that he would be named after his father despite Elisabeth's objections that the boy be called "John." When Zacharias confirmed the name by writing it on a tablet, his speech returned. See Zechariah.

ZACHER (Zā′ chēr) KJV alternate form of Zechariah (1 Chron. 8:31).

ZADOK (Zā′ dŏk) Personal name meaning, "righteous," a short form of Zedekiah, "the Lord is righteous." See Zedekiah.

1. Son of Ahitub and father of Ahimaaz, descended from Aaron through Eleazar and was a priest in the time of David (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 6:3–8). He is named in company with Abiathar, who was descended from Aaron through Ithamar (1 Chron. 24:3). See Abiathar. Zadok was loyal to David when Adonijah rebelled in his father's old age (1 Kings 1). As a consequence, he continued as a priest in Solomon's day. Abiathar was soon removed in accordance with the prophecy to Eli (1 Sam. 2:31–33; 1 Kings 2:26–27). The genealogy of Zadok is given in 1 Chronicles 6:3–15 from Aaron through Eleazar on down to Jehozadak of postexilic times (compare Zech. 6:11). The genealogy mentions a second Zadok seven generations later of whom we know little, but his name emphasizes the fact that standard names do reappear in genealogical lists.

In a touching scene Zadok with Abiathar carried the ark to go with David in his flight from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:24). David sent them back to carry on their worship in Jerusalem and be spies for him. Zadok's son Ahimaaz was the go-between and was also the first to bring David news of Absalom's defeat (2 Sam 18:27). David then appealed to Zadok and Abiathar to arrange a welcome for him to come back to Jerusalem.

In later days Ezekiel declared that the priests who were sons of Zadok were the only faithful ones at the time of the Exile, and that they only would be allowed to serve in the ideal future Temple. This statement agrees with the genealogies of Chronicles which list only two families as far as the captivity—David of Judah and Zadok the descendant of Aaron through Eleazar. The returning priests, including Joshua son of Jehozadak (1 Chron. 6:15) and Ezra (7:1–7), were of the line of Zadok which lasted long into the intertestamental period. The line of Ithamar after the removal of Eli's family was of less importance. The Zadokites to a degree lived up to their name as righteous priests of the Lord.

2. Grandfather of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:33). 3.–4. Men who helped Nehemiah rebuild the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:4,29). 5. Leader who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:21). 6. A faithful scribe whom Nehemiah appointed as a treasurer (Neh. 13:13). R. Laird Harris

ZADOKITES (Zā′ dŏk ītes) Descendants of Zadok, a chief priest with David and Solomon. As a reward for Zadok's loyalty to Solomon and as punishment for the sins of Eli's sons, Zadok's descendants (the line of Eliezer) replaced the descendants of Ithamar as the leading priests. The developing role of Jerusalem as the exclusive center of Israel's worship furthered the position of the Zadokites. See High Priest; Priests and Levites; Zadok.

ZAHAM (Za′ ham) Personal name meaning, "fatness" or "loathing." Son of King Rehoboam by Abihail (2 Chron. 11:18–19).

ZAHAR (Zā′ här) Source of wool traded with Tyre (Ezek. 27:18 NIV; "Sahar," TEV; "Suhar," REB). KJV, NAS, and RSV translate the Hebrew as "white wool." If the Hebrew refers to a place, the association with Damascus and Helbon suggests a Syrian site, perhaps modern as-Sahra northwest of Damascus.

ZAIR (Zā′ ĭr) Place name that means, "small." Place where Joram, king of Judah (853–841 B.C.), fought with Edom (2 Kings 8:20–21). The location of Zair is still in dispute. Some place it south of the Dead Sea near Edom. Others equate it with Zoar (Gen. 13:10) or Zior (Josh. 15:54). Compare 2 Chronicles 21:9.

ZALAPH (Zā′ lăph) A personal name meaning, "caper plant." Father of Hanun, who helped Nehemiah repair the walls of Jerusalem (3:30).

ZALMON (Zăl′ mŏn) Place and personal name meaning, "little dark one" or "small image." 1. Mountain near Shechem where Abimelech and his men cut brush with which to burn the tower of Shechem (Judg. 9:48–49). 2. One of David's "thirty" mighty men (2 Sam. 23:28). He is also known as Ilai (1 Chron. 11:29). 3. Psalm 68:14 mentions a "hill of Bashan" named Zalmon (KJV, "Salmon). This may refer to the Golan Heights.

ZALMONAH (Zăl mō′ nah) Place name meaning, "dark" or "shady." Israel's first stop after leaving Mount Hor (Num. 33:41–42). The place cannot be identified.

X Y Z

ZALMUNNA (Zăl mŭn′ nà) Personal name meaning, "Protection is withdrawn" or "Zelem (god) rules." King of Midian captured and killed by Gideon (Judg. 8:1–21; Ps. 83:11).

ZAMZUMMIM (Zăm zŭm′ mĭm) Name the Ammonites gave to the Rephaim. They lived east of the Jordan River until the Ammonites drove them out (Deut. 2:20). See Rephaim.

ZAMZUMMITES (Zăm zŭm′ mītes) NIV form of Zamzummin.

ZANOAH (Zā nō′ ah) Place name meaning, "broken district" or "stinking." 1. Village in Judah identified with khirbet Zanu about three miles south southeast of Beth-Shemesh (Josh. 15:34). 2. City in the highlands of Judah (Josh. 15:56), whose identification with khirbet Zanuta, ten miles southwest of Hebron or khirbet Beit Amra is disputed.

ZAPH(E)NATH-P(A)ANEAH (Zăph ē′ năth-păn ē′ ăh) Personal name meaning, "the god has said, he will live." Pharaoh's name for Joseph when he made Joseph second only to himself in Egypt (Gen. 41:45). See Joseph.

ZAPHON (Zā′ phŏn) Place name meaning, "north." 1. City east of the Jordan River in Gad's territory (Josh. 13:27). It was probably a center of worship of the god Baal-zaphon in the days of Canaanite supremacy before the Gadites took over. It is identified with tell el-Qos, tell es-Saidiye, or tell el-Mazar. Shophan (Num. 32:35) may be another spelling of the same city. 2. Mountain viewed as home of the gods in Canaanite thought, perhaps referred to in Psalm 48:2 (NIV), Isaiah 14:13 (NRSV), and Job 26:7 (NRSV), showing Yahweh controls what Canaan thought their gods possessed.

ZAREAH (Zā′ rē ah) KJV form of Zorah (Neh. 11:29).

ZAREATHITE (Zā′ rē ăth īte) KJV form of Zorathite in 1 Chronicles 2:53.

ZARED (Zā rĕd) KJV form of Zered in Numbers 21:12.

ZAREPHATH (Zăr′ a phăth) Place name possibly meaning, "smelting, refining." A town on the Mediterranean seacoast just south of Sidon. At the God's command Elijah fled there after prophesying a drought in Israel (1 Kings 17:2–9). While in Zarepath, he was hosted by a widow and her son. Although the drought affected the widow's income, too, her supply of meal and oil were miraculously sustained (17:12–16). Elijah also restored her son to life and health (17:17–23).

ZARETAN (Zâr′ ĕ tăn) KJV form of Zarethan in Joshua 3:16.

ZARETH-SHAHAR (Zā′ rĕth-Shā hăr) KJV form of Zereth-Shahar.

ZARETHAN (Zăr′ ĕ thăn) Place name perhaps meaning, "cooling." The River Jordan backed up and Israel passed over into Canaan on dry ground near there (Josh. 3:16). It was near Beth-shean (1 Kings 4:12). Hiram of Tyre cast bronze Temple vessels near there (1 Kings 7:46; the parallel in 2 Chron. 4:17 reads Zeredah). Zarethan is most often identified with the two mounds of tell es-Sa′idiyah on the east bank of the Jordan about fourteen miles north of Adam (tell ed-Damiyeh). Archaeologists have uncovered numerous bronze artifacts from the vicinity of Succoth and Zarethan, confirming activity like that attributed to Hiram. Alternate sites include tell Umm Hamad, Sleihat, and tell el-Merkbere.

ZARHITE (Zăr′ hīte) KJV form of Zerahites, descendants of Zerah, one of the two twins born to Judah by Tamar (Num. 26:20; compare 1 Chron. 9:6; Neh. 11:24). See Zerahites.

ZARTANAH (Zăr′ tà nah) KJV form of Zarethan (1 Kings 4:12).

ZARTHAN (Zăr′ thăn) KJV form of Zarethan (1 Kings 7:46).

ZATTHU (Zăt′ thū) KJV form of Zattu (Neh. 10:14).

ZATTU (Zăt′ tū) Head of family who returned to Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 2:8; Neh. 7:13). Some of the sons of Zattu put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27). He seems to be the same as the "Zatthu" who signed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (10:14).

ZAVAN (Zā′ văn) KJV form of Zaavah (1 Chron. 1:42).

ZAYIN Seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Title of Psalm 119:49–56 where each verse begins with the letter.

ZAZA (Zā′ zà) A son of Jonathan and descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:33).

ZEALOT (Zā′ ə lot) A militant radical; one who acts with great zeal for a cause. The term came to designate a particular segment of the Jewish population who continually tried to overthrow foreign oppression, especially the Roman rule in Palestine. Jesus called a zealot, Simon, as one of His twelve disciples (Luke 6:15). See Jewish Parties.

ZEBADIAH (Zĕb ȧ dī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has given." 1. Son of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:15). 2. Son of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17). 3. Son of Jehoram of Gedor (1 Chron. 12:7). 4. A gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:2). 5. Fourth captain in David's army (1 Chron. 27:7). 6. One of nine Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the towns of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8). 7. Son of Ishmael who ruled civil cases in a court system Jehoshaphat set up (2 Chron. 19:11). 8. Son of Shephatiah who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:8). 9. Priest who put away his foreign wife in Ezra's time (10:20).

ZEBAH (Zē' bah) Personal name meaning "slaughter" or "sacifice." He and Zalmunna were Midianite kings that Gideon captured and killed because they had killed Gideon's brothers (Judg. 8:4–21; see Ps. 83:11; Isa. 9:4; 10:26). This account shows the act of blood revenge that often prevailed in that day and marks a turning point in Israel's struggles against Midian.

ZEBAIM (Zė bā' ĭm) Home of the children of Pochereth (Ezra 2:57) who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian capitivity (KJV). See Pochereth-hazzebaim.

ZEBEDEE (Zĕb' e dēē) Greek form of Hebrew personal name meaning, "gift." See Zabdi. A fisherman on the Sea of Galilee and father of James and John, two of Jesus' first disciples (Mark 1:19–20). Based at Capernaum on the north shore of the sea, Zebedee ran a considerable fishing business which included several hired servants, Simon Peter, and Andrew (Luke 5:10). His wife, Mary, also followed Jesus and ministered to Him (Mark 15:40–41). The Bible does not say if Zebedee ever became a believer, but he did not stand in the way of his sons or wife becoming Jesus' disciples.

ZEBIDAH (Zė bī' dah) Personal name meaning, "gift." Daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah and the mother of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36; "Zebudah," KJV).

ZEBINA (Zė bī' na) Personal name meaning, "purchased." One who had a foreign wife during Ezra's time (Ezra 10:43).

ZEBOIIM (Zė boi' ĭm) Place name possibly meaning, "hyenas." One of the cities in the valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:2–3) at the southern end of the Dead Sea. The site probably is under water now. Zeboiim was ruled by King Shemeber but under the control of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. When Shemeber rebelled, Chedorlaomer came to suppress the rebellion. Although the text is not clear, it appears the city was delivered when Abram defeated Chedorlaomer (14:16–17). Zeboiim was destroyed when God sent fire and brimstone on Sodom and Gomorrah (Deut. 29:23; compare Hos. 11:8). Recent attempts to identify Zeboiim in the Ebla tablets have been hotly debated.

ZEBOIM (Zė bō' ĭm) Place name meaning, "hyenas" or "a wild place." Not to be confused with Zeboiim. 1. One of the towns the Benjamites occupied upon returning to Palestine from Exile (Neh. 11:34). It may be khirbet Sabije. 2. A valley in Benjamin between Michmash and the wilderness overlooking the Jordan River (1 Sam. 13:17–18). It may be wadi el-Oelt or wadi Fara.

ZEBUDAH (Zĕ bū' dah) KJV spelling of Zebidah.

ZEBUL (Zē' bŭl) Personal name meaning, "prince" or "captain." Resident of Shechem who was a follower of Abimelech, son of Gideon. When Gaal plotted against Abimelech in Shechem, Zebul sent word to Abimelech who came to Shechem and defeated Gaal (Judg. 9:30–41).

ZEBULUN (Zĕb' ū lŭn) Personal and tribal name probably meaning, "elevated dwelling." Jacob's tenth son and sixth by Leah (Gen. 30:20). The tribe named for him settled in the area between the Sea of Galilee and Mount Carmel (Josh. 19:10–16). The tribe hosted the other tribes with religious festivals at Mount Tabor (Deut. 33:18–19). Their menu included the delicacies fished from the Sea of Galilee. Militarily, the tribe distinguished itself in the struggles to possess the land, fighting faithfully in the armies of Deborah and Barak, and Gideon (Judg. 4:6; 6:35). See Israel; Palestine; Tribes.

ZECHARIAH (Zĕch ȧ rī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yah (in long form Yahweh) remembered." 1. Son of Jeroboam II, who reigned over Israel for six months in the year 746 B.C. until he was assassinated by Shallum (2 Kings 15:8–12). See Israel. 2. The prophet Zechariah, who flourished immediately after the Exile in 520–518 B.C. and urged the people of Judah to rebuild the Temple.

3. Grandfather of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:2). 4. Priest and prophet whom the people stoned and Joash, the king, killed (2 Chron. 24:20–22). 5. Postexilic gatekeeper of Temple (1 Chron. 9:21). 6. Member of family who lived in Gibeon (1 Chron. 9:37). 7. Temple musician (1 Chron. 15:20). 8. Community leader Jehoshaphat the king sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7). 9. One of Josiah's overseers in repairing the Temple (2 Chron. 34:12).

10.–11. Men who accompanied Ezra on return from Babylon (Ezra 8:3,11). 12. Man Ezra sent to get Levites to return from Babylon (Ezra 8:16). 13. Israelite with foreign wife (Ezra 10:26). 14. Man who helped Ezra as he taught the law (Neh. 8:4), perhaps identical with 12. or other one above. 15. Ancestor of postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4). 16. Ancestor of postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:5). 17. Ancestor of priest in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 11:12). 18. Leading priest in time of Joiakim's high priesthood, possibly the same as the prophet (Neh. 12:16). 19.–20. Priestly musicians who helped Nehemiah celebrate (Neh. 12:35,41).

21. High official Isaiah used as witness, perhaps the same as 3. above. 22. Son of Jehoshaphat the king whom his brother Jehoram killed upon becoming king (2 Chron. 21:2–4). 23. Godly advisor of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:5). 24. Descendant of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:7). 25. Father of leader of eastern half of tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 27:21). 26.–34. Levites (1 Chron. 15:18,24; 24:25; 26:2,14; 26:11; 2 Chron. 20:14; 29:13; 35:8). Paul L. Redditt

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF The Book of Zechariah is the eleventh of the so-called Minor Prophets.

When the book was written In 538, Cyrus the Great, emperor of the Persian Empire, issued an edict (Ezra 1:2–4; 6:3–5) allowing the Jews in Exile in Babylon to return to Jerusalem. Over the next two decades, many Exiles took advantage of Persian leniency, returned home, and began to reestablish life in Jerusalem or Judah. Apparently, an effort was made to begin rebuilding the Temple under an official named Sheshbazzar (Ezra 5:14–16) and perhaps Zerubabel (Ezra 3:1–13; Zech. 4:9), but the work stopped due to opposition from persons who had not been in Exile and local officials. Cyrus was succeeded by his son Cambysees, who died in 521 B.C. with no heir. The empire was thrown into disarray as two men, Darius I and Gautama, fought for the crown. In the midst of that turmoil, God raised two prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, to urge finishing the Temple.

What Zechariah preached The message of Zechariah may be summarized under two headings: prosperity and purification. Simply put, God promised the people of Judah and Jerusalem prosperity if they purified themselves from sin. This message is found in the first six chapters of the Book of Zechariah. Those chapters are writtin in the form of eight visions, with two messages of exhortation. The structure of the book anticipates the structure of later books called apocalypses, books like Daniel and Revelation; the Book of Zechariah itself is not, however, an apocalypse.

The opening message (1:1–6) reminds the audience that God had warned their forefathers not to sin, but they had not listened or repented. They had brought the Exile upon themselves. This message served to validate prophecy, after which Zechariah related his visions. The first three visions predict prosperity for Judah and Jerusalem. Four horsemen ride forth in 1:7–17 to announce God's return to Zion, a new day when prosperity would come. In the second vision (1:18–21), four smiths (agents of God's deliverance) overcome four horns (symbols of the nations that ruled over Jerusalem). This reversal of fortunes would bring about the coming prosperity. In the third vision a man measures Jerusalem, only to find that it is too small to accommodate all those God would return to live there in glory. The visions conclude with a call to Exiles to return home from Babylon.

The last five visions deal with purification. In vision four (3:1–10) the high priest Joshua is symbolically cleansed for his work. The fifth vision (4:1–14) pictures God as a lampstand with two olive trees standing beside Him: Joshua and Zerubbabel. Zerubbabel is named to finish building the Temple, worship and sacrifice at which would be the means of purification. Vision six (5:1–4) involves a scroll flying through the air. The scroll and a voice condemn stealing and lying to cover up one's theft. (Was theft an especially acute problem in the poor, reduced state of Judah after the Exile?) In the seventh vision (5:5–11), Zechariah saw an ephah, in this case a container with a heavy, lead cover. Usually an ephah would hold about two-thirds of a bushel of grain. This ephah instead held a woman, who symbolizes impurity. Two women with wings came to take the iniquity back to Babylon, from which it had come. In the last vision (6:1–8), four charioteers head out in all directions to patrol the earth (and presumably to punish evil). Chapters 7 and 8 contain additional messages from Zechariah, but add no new insights.

The last six chapters of the Book of Zechariah do not seem to have been composed at the same time as the first eight chapters. For one thing, they presuppose that the Temple exists and so at least must have been written after 515, when the Temple was finished. In addition, 11:12–13 is quoted in Matthew 27:9–10 as a saying of Jeremiah. In some Old Testament manuscripts, then, the verses (and presumably their context) probably were attached to the Book of Jeremiah, while in the manuscripts preserved in our Hebrew Bibles they were attached to Zechariah. Since the chapters differ in style and contents from both Jeremiah and Zechariah, some scholars think they were prophecies from an unknown prophet either from the time of the Persian Empire (down to 332) or the Greek Empire. Others think they are the later work of Zechariah.

Whether written by Jeremiah, Zechariah, or an anonymous prophet, it is the contents of the chapters that are important. Chapters 9 through 11 depict God's deliverance of His people in terms of the victory of God and His Messiah over the neighboring peoples, including the Greeks (9:1—10:7), the return of the Exiles (10:6–12), and the punishment of the wicked leaders of Judah (11:4–17). Chapters 12—14 depict an end-time attack upon Jerusalem and the cities of Judah (12:1–3; 14:1–3), an attack in which many people would be killed as God purifies His people (13:7–9). God Himself would rescue His people (12:4–9; 14:4–5,12–15), cleanse the people from idolatry, rid the land of prophecy (which had become synonymous with false prophecy, 13:1–6), and turn Jerusalem into a paradise to which the nations of the world would come to worship. Zechariah 14 envisions the Mount of Olives splitting in two, with fresh water (representing the blessings of God) flowing east and west watering the world. Cold and nighttime, representing threats to God's control, would be eliminated as He came to reign over all the world from Jerusalem.

Outline

I. God Is Just (1:1—2:13)
   A. God's anger with His sinful people is justified (1:1–2).
   B. God will return to His people if they return to Him (1:3).
   C. History shows the justice of God and the sinfulness of His people (1:4–6).

ZECHER (Zē′ chĕr) Form of Zechariah (1 Chron. 9:37) used in 1 Chronicles 8:31.

ZEDAD (Zē′ dăd) Place name meaning, "a sloping place" or "mountainous." It is Sadad, 62 miles north of Damascus. The northern border of Canaan (Num. 34:8; Ezek. 47:15).

ZEDEKIAH (Zĕd ĕ kī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh is my righteousness" or "Yahweh is my salvation." 1. False prophet who advised King Ahab to fight against Ramoth-gilead, assuring the king of victory (1 Kings 22). His prophecy conflicted with that of Micaiah, who predicted defeat. When Micaiah stated that God had put a lying spirit in the mouths of Zedekiah and his band of prophets, Zedekiah struck Micaiah on the cheek. Micaiah forecast that Zedekiah would feel the brunt of God's Spirit, but the text does not tell what became of the false prophet. See Micaiah; Prophet, False.

2. Last king of Judah (596–586 B.C.). Zedekiah was made king in Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (2 Kings 24:17). When he rebelled, the Babylonian army besieged Jerusalem and destroyed it. Zedekiah was taken to Riblah along with his family. At Riblah he witnessed the executions of his sons before his own eyes were blinded

(25:7). Then Zedekiah was taken to Babylon. He apparently died in captivity. See Israel.

3. Son either of Jehoiakim or Jeconiah (1 Chron. 3:16), the Hebrew text being unclear at this point. 4. Signer of Nehemiah's covenant (10:1), spelled Zidkijah by KJV. 5. Prophet who promised quick hope to Exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:21). Jeremiah pronounced God's judgment on him. 6. Royal official in Jeremiah's day (36:12).

ZEEB (Zē′ ĕb) See Oreb and Zeeb.

ZEKER (Zē′ kĕr) NIV form of Zecher (1 Chron. 8:31).

ZELA (Zē′ lȧ) Form of Zelah in NRSV, REB, RSV, TEV.

ZELAH (Zē′ lah) Place name meaning, "rib, side, slope." Town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28), in which the bones of Saul and Jonathan were buried (2 Sam. 21:14). The site is probably khirbet Salah between Jerusalem and Gibeon or else another site in the hills north and west of Jerusalem.

ZELEK (Zē′ lĕk) Personal name meaning, "cleft, fissure." One of David's thirty elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39).

ZELOPHEHAD (Zė lō′ phė hăd) Personal name meaning, "protection from terror" or the kinsman is my protector." A Hebrew who wandered in the wilderness with Moses. He had no sons to receive his property and carry on his name, so his daughters pled with Moses to receive a share of inheritance following his death (Num. 26:33; 27:1–4). Despite the inheritance customs which allowed only men to own property, God led Moses to declare the daughters eligible (27:6–7). The only stipulation was that the women had to marry within their own tribe (36:5–9).

ZELOTES (Zė lō′ tēs) KJV transliteration of name for Simon, Jesus' disciple. Modern translations translate as "Zealot." See Simon; Zealot.

ZELZAH (Zĕl′ zah) Unidentified site near Rachel's tomb in the territory of Benjamin, site of the first of three signs which Samuel promised Saul as confirmation of his kingship (1 Sam. 10:1–2). Many commentators use Greek manuscript evidence to emend the Hebrew text to something other than a place name.

ZEMARAIM (Zĕm ȧ rā′ ĭm) Place name meaning, "twin peaks." 1. Town allotted to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:22), likely Ras ex-Zeimara about five miles northeast of Bethel. 2. Mountain in the territory of Ephraim where Abijah rebuked Jeroboam (2 Chron. 13:4). The parallel text in 1 Kings 15:7 mentions hostilities between Abijam and Jereboam but not the speech at Zemaraim. The town and mountain may be located in the same place. Some would place the town at khirbet es-Samra four miles north of Jericho.

ZEMARITES (Zĕm′ ȧ rītes) Canaanites inhabiting the area north of Lebanon between Arvad and Tripolis (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16). The Zemarites possibly gave their name to the town Sumra in this region. The town figures in the tell Amarna letters and in Assyrian records. NRSV emended the text of Ezekiel 27:8 to read "men of Zemer" (KJV, "thy wise men, O Tyrus").

ZEMER (Zē′ mėr) Place name meaning, "wool." See Zemarites.

ZEMIRA(H) (Zė mī′ rah) Personal name meaning, "song." Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ZENAN (Zē′ năn) Place name meaning, "flocks." Village in the Shephelah (wilderness) district of Judah (Josh. 15:37), likely identified with 'Araq el-Kharba. Zenan is perhaps identical to Zaanan (Mic. 1:11).

ZENAS (Zē′ năs) Abbreviated form of the personal name Zenodoros meaning, "gift of Zeus." Christian lawyer whom Paul asked Titus to send, together with Apollos, on his way, lacking nothing (Titus 3:13). Paul had in mind, no doubt, material provisions for itinerant evangelistic work. Zenas and Apollos perhaps delivered Paul's letter to Titus.

ZEPHANIAH (Zĕph ȧ nī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh sheltered or stored up" or "Zaphon (god) is Yahweh." 1. A prophet in the Old Testament whose preaching produced the thirty-sixth book of the Old Testament.

2. Priest whom King Zedekiah sent asking Jeremiah to pray for the nation threatened by Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon (Jer. 21:1–7; 37:3). He reported false prophecy from Babylon to Jeremiah (29:24–32). When Jerusalem fell, the priest was executed (52:24–27).

3. Father of Josiah and Hen (Zech. 6:10,14), possibly identical with 2. above. 4. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:36), perhaps the same as Uriel (1 Chron. 6:24). Paul L. Redditt

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF The Book of Zephaniah, only three chapters in length, looks toward the punishment of all sinful nations, including Judah, followed by the restoration of Judah and the nations as well.

The Prophet Zephaniah The first verse tells all we really know about the prophet. His ancestry is traced back four generations to a man named Hezekiah. Some scholars think Hezekiah was the king of Judah by that name who reigned in the late eighth century during the ministry of Isaiah (2 Kings 18—20). If so, Zephaniah would have belonged to the royal line. That would perhaps explain why he did not condemn the king in 1:8; 3:3–5, where he blames most of Judah's upper classes for their sins. Other scholars note that the name Hezekiah was quite common and that the ancestor is not identified as king. Further, Zephaniah's father was named Cushi, which could mean "Cushite" or "Ethiopian." They suggest that Zephaniah's ancestry was traced four generations to demonstrate that he was indeed Israelite.

The Date of Zephaniah According to 1:1 Zephaniah's ministry occurred during the reign of Josiah (640–609 B.C.). Most scholars date the book in 630 or between 630 and 621. In 621 King Josiah instituted a sweeping reformation of worship in Judah (see 2 Kings 22:3—23:25), which officially abolished the worship of Baal and the stars mentioned in Zephaniah 1:4–6. Jeremiah also condemned those practices (Jer. 2:20–28; 8:1–3). Jeremiah 26:1 shows that the practices flourished again as early as the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim (609 B.C.); it might be the case that such worship continued secretly between 621 and 609. If that were so, Zephaniah might have prophesied during those years. In short, it is a good guess that he preached between 630 and 621, but he might have flourished anytime during the reign of Josiah.

Contents of the Book Zephaniah looked toward a future punishment. In 1:2–6 he predicted punishment upon the whole world, including Jerusalem. Verses 17–18 depict the inability of sinful humanity to escape God's punishment. The intervening verses further describe the punishment as the Day of the Lord. Verses 14–16 describe the time of God's approaching wrath. Punishment would come upon the nobles at the king's court, those who gained materially through violence, the merchants, and those who denied the power of God to reward good or punish evil.

The second chapter contains a series of threats against the Philistines (vv. 4–7), the Moabites and Ammonites (vv. 8–11), the Ethiopians (v. 12), and the Assyrians (vv. 13–15). Zephaniah called all nations to repent and become righteous and meek. Zephaniah would not presume on God's grace by promising forgiveness, but he counseled turning to righteousness and meekness as the means for possibly avoiding punishment on the Day of the Lord.

The third chapter is marked by a change in perspective between versus 7 and 8. The first seven verses pronounce a woe upon Jerusalem for oppression within her walls. Her princes preyed like lions upon their people; her prophets committed treachery, and her priests polluted the Temple. God indicted the people not only for their sins, but also for their failure to receive instruction from his dealings with other nations.

Beginning with verse 8, however, the tone is quite positive toward Israel. Many scholars think part or all of verses 8–20 was appended to the book by a later author. Whether written by Zephaniah or a later prophet, the verses complete the message of chapter 3. Verses 8 and 14 admonish the people to wait for God to act and to rejoice for what He will do, respectively. Verses 8–13 promise that God will punish the nations and convert them from idolatry. What is more, He promises to remove the haughty from Mount Zion, leaving behind a meek and humble people. Verses 14–20 predict the cessation of punishment and oppression and the return of exiles. God Himself is called the king of Israel (v. 15). His presence alleviates any reason to fear the nations. God will punish the oppressors and bring home the exiles. Thus the book ends with a message of hope, based on God's mercy.

Outline

I. Identification of the Messenger of God's Word (1:1)
II. God's Warning of Worldwide Judgment (1:2—3:8)
  A. God's day of judgment is coming (1:2—2:3).
    1. His judgment will include all mankind (1:2–3).
    2. His judgment will include His own sinful people who forsake Him (1:4–6).
    3. The day of the Lord calls for awesome silence in the face of God's judgment (1:7–11).
    4. God's skeptics will see Him in action on His day (1:12–13).
    5. God's wrath will be poured out against sin on that day (1:14–17).
    6. Wealth is good for nothing on His day (1:18).
    7. God calls His humble people to seek Him before it is too late (2:1–3).
  B. God's judgment will subject His enemies and bless the remnant of His people (2:4–15).
  C. God's righteous justice will be impartial (3:1–8).
III. God Promises to Form a New People (3:9–20).
  A. The nations will call on God (3:9–10).
  B. A purified remnant will worship Him in humility and with joy (3:11–13).
  C. God will reign as King to remove His people's fears (3:14–17).
  D. His oppressed people will be exalted (3:18–20).

ZEPHATH (Zē′ phăth) Place name meaning, "watchtower." City in southwestern Judah in the vicinity of Arvad. Following their destruction of the city, the tribes of Judah and Simeon renamed the site Hormah (Judg. 1:17). The site is identified with khirbet Masas on the main road from Beer-sheba to the Arabah valley.

ZEPHATHAH (Zĕ phā' thah) Place name meaning, "watchtower." Asa met Zerah, the Ethiopian king, in battle "in the valley of Zephathah at Mareshah" (2 Chron. 14:10). The earliest Greek translation translated Zaphon, "north" instead of Zephathah. If Zephathah is identified with Safiyah, less than two miles northeast of Beit Jibrin, the "valley of Zephathah" is the wadi Safiyah. See Mareshah.

ZEPHI (Zē' phī) Short form of personal name meaning, "purity" or "good fortune." Descendant of Esau (1 Chron. 1:36) called Zepho in the parallel passage (Gen. 36:11,15).

ZEPHO (Zē' phō) See Zephi.

ZEPHON (Zē' phŏn) Personal name perhaps meaning, "north." Eldest son of Gad and ancestor of the Zephonites (Num. 26:15). The Samaritan Pentateuch and the earliest Greek translation support the identification with Ziphion (Gen. 46:16).

ZEPHONITE (Zē' phŏ nīte) Member of clan of Zephon.

ZER (Zĕr) Place name meaning, "narrow" or "enemy." Fortified town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), possibly identified with Madon which is conspicuously absent from this list. Commentators often take Zer as a copyist's modification, repeating the Hebrew for "fenced cities." See Ziddin.

ZERAH (Zē' rah) Personal name meaning, "sunrise." 1. A twin born to Tamar and her father-in-law, Judah (Gen. 38:30, Zarah KJV). One of his descendants was Achan, who was executed for taking forbidden booty (Josh. 7:1,25). Zerah is included in Matthew's genealogy of Christ, although Perez was the direct ancestor (1:3). 2. Descendant of Esau and thus clan leader of Edomites (Gen. 36:13,17). 3. Ancestor of Edomite ruler (Gen. 36:33). 4. Clan leader in tribe of Simeon (Num. 26:13), apparently same as Zohar (Gen. 46:10): 5. Levite (1 Chron. 6:21,41). 6. Cushite general God defeated in answer to Asa's prayer about 900 B.C. (2 Chron. 14:8–13). See Cush; Ethiopia.

ZERAHIAH (Zē rà hī' ah) Personal name meaning, "Yahweh has dawned." 1. Priest descended from Phinehas (1 Chron. 6:6,51; Ezra 7:4). 2. Descendant of Pahath-Moab ("governor of Moab") and father of Eliehoenai (Ezra 8:4). See Izrahiah.

ZERAHITES (Zĕr' à hītes) Name of two families, one from the tribe of Simeon (Num. 26:13), the other from the tribe of Judah (Num. 26:20; Josh. 7:17), descended from men named Zerah. Two of David's thirty elite warriors, Sibbecai and Maharai, were Zerahites (1 Chron. 27:11,13).

ZERED (Zē' rĕd) River name perhaps meaning, "white thorn." A stream which empties into the southern end of the Dead Sea. Its entire length is only about thirty-eight miles, but it drains a large area of land. Israel crossed the Zered after wandering in the wilderness for thirty-eight years (Deut. 2:13–14). See Palestine; Rivers.

ZEREDA(H) (Zĕr ė dah) Place name of uncertain meaning. 1. Site in Ephraim of the home of Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:26), possibly identified as Ain Seridah iin the wadi Deir Ballut in western Samaria. 2. City in the Jordan Valley (2 Chron. 4:17). The parallel text in 1 Kings 7:46 reads Zerethan.

ZEREDATHAH (Zĕ rĕ dà' thah) KJV spelling of Zeredah (2 Chron. 4:17).

ZERERAH (Zĕr' ĕ rah) Site on the route by which the defeated Midianites fled from Gideon (Judg. 7:22; KJV, Zereath); possibly a variant rendering of Zarethan (Josh. 3:16; 1 Kings 4:12; 7:46) or of Zeredah (2 Chron. 4:17). See Zarethan.

ZERERATH (Zĕr' ė răth) KJV form of Zererah.

ZERESH (Zē' rĕsh) Personal name meaning, "shaggy head, disheveled." Haman's wife and counselor (Esth. 5:10,14; 6:13).

ZERETH (Zē' rĕth) Personal name perhaps meaning, "splendor." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:7).

ZERETH-SHAHAR (Zē' rĕth-Shā' hăr) Place name meaning, "splendor of the dawn." The city located "on the hill of the [Dead Sea] valley" was allotted to Reuben (Josh. 13:19). The site is perhaps modern Zarat near Machaerus on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Others suggest khirbet el-Libb seven miles south of Medeba or khirbet qurn el-Kibsh six miles northwest of Medeba.

ZERI (Zē' rī) Personal name meaning, "balsam." Levitical harpist (1 Chron. 25:3). Zeri is possibly a copying variant of Izri (25:11).

ZEROR (Zē' rôr) Personal name meaning, "bundle, pouch" or "particle of stone." Ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1).

ZERUAH (Zĕ rū' ah) Personal name meaning, "stricken" or "leprous." Mother of King Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:26).

ZERUBBABEL (Zĕ rŭb′ bà bĕl) Personal name meaning, "descendant of Babel." The grandson of King Jehoiachin (taken to Babylon in the first Exile in 597 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar; 2 Kings 24:10–17) and the son of Shealtiel (Ezra 3:2), second son of Jehoiachin (1 Chron. 3:16–17). He is named in Ezra 2:2 among the leaders of those who returned from Exile. The list in Ezra 2:1–67 (compare Neh. 7:6–73a) probably names people who returned in 539, the first year of the reign of Cyrus the Great, ruler of the Persian Empire (Ezra 1:1), or between 539 and 529, despite the contention of many American scholars that the list belongs to an unmentioned second return led by Zerubbabel in 521/20.

According to Ezra 3, Zerubbabel and Jeshua (or Joshua, the high priest) rebuilt the altar and in their second year (538?) laid the foundation of the Temple, but their work was halted by opposition from persons who had remained in Palestine during the Exile (4:1–6,24). Darius (Persian emperor from 522—486 B.C.) granted the Jews permission to continue rebuilding the Temple (6:1–12). Under the urging of Haggai (1:1,12–15; 2:1,20) and Zechariah (4:6–10a), Zerubabel, now governor (Hag. 1:1) in place of Sheshbazzar (Ezra 5:14), resume the task (Ezra 5:1–2), completed in 515 B.C.

Zerubbabel himself, however, disappeared from view. He was a Davidic prince, so it is possible that the Jews tried to crown him king during the civil war surrounding the rise of Darius as emperor (522/21). Zechariah 6:9–14 may reflect the wish to crown Zerubbabel, but his fate remains unknown. See Babylon; Israel; Zechariah.

Paul L. Redditt

ZERUIAH (Zĕ rŭ ī′ ah) Personal name meaning, "perfumed with mastix" or "bleed." Mother of three of David's generals, Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (2 Sam. 2:18). According to 1 Chronicles 2:16, Zeruiah was David's (half-)sister. According to 2 Samuel 17:25, her sister, Abigail, was the (grand)daughter of Nahash rather than of Jesse, David's father. Kinship with David accounts for the positions of trust enjoyed by Zeruiah's sons.

ZETHAM (Zē′ thăm) Personal name meaning, "olive tree." Levite who served as a Temple treasurer (1 Chron. 23:8; 26:22).

ZETHAN (Zē′ thăn) Personal name meaning, "olive tree" or "olive merchant." Member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10).

ZETHAR Zē′ thär) Personal name perhaps meaning, "slayer," "kingdom," or "victor." One of seven eunuchs who served king Ahasuerus of Persia (Esth. 1:10).

ZEUS (Zeūs) The Greek god of the sky and chief of the pantheon; ruler over all the gods. His devotees believed all the elements of weather were under his control. The worship of Zeus was very prevalent throughout the Roman Empire during the first century. Barnabas was mistaken for Zeus (equivalent of the Roman god, Jupiter) by the people of Lystra after Paul healed a cripple (Acts 14:8–12). See Greece; Gods, Pagan.

ZIA (Zī′ à) Personal name meaning, "trembling." Head of a family of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:13).

ZIBA (Zī′ bà) Personal name, perhaps Aramaic for "branch." Servant of Saul. When David desired to show kindness to surviving members of Jonathan's family, Ziba directed David to Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:1–8). David placed Ziba in charge of Mephibosheth's restored property (9:9–13). During Absalom's rebellion, Ziba assisted David with supplies and (falsely) accused Mephibosheth of treason (2 Sam. 16:1–4). David rewarded Ziba with Mephibosheth's property. Mephibosheth met David on his return to power in Jerusalem and accused Ziba of deception (2 Sam. 19:24–29). David, either uncertain whom to believe or else desiring to leave no strong rivals, divided Saul's property between Ziba and Mephibosheth.

ZIBEON (Zī′ bē on) Personal name meaning, "little hyena." Horite chieftan (Gen. 36:29) and ancestor of one of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2). Zibeon established kinship between the Horites and Edomites (Gen. 36:20,24,29; 1 Chron. 1:38,40).

ZIBIA (Zīb′ ĭ à) Personal name meaning, "gazelle." Head of a family of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:9).

ZIBIAH (Zīb′ ĭ ah) Personal name meaning, "female gazelle." Mother of king Jehoash (Joash) of Judah (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1).

ZICHRI (Zīch′ rī) Personal name meaning, "remembrance, mindful." 1. Levite in Moses' time (Ex. 6:21). 2. Heads of three families of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:19,23,27). 3. Levite (1 Chron. 9:15), perhaps identical to Zaccur (1 Chron. 25:2,10; Neh. 12:35) and Zabdi (Neh. 11:17). 4. Descendant of Moses assisting with David's treasury (1 Chron. 26:25); 5. Reubenite (1 Chron. 27:16). 6. Father of one of Jehosaphat's army commanders (2 Chron. 17:16). 7. Father of one of Jehoiada's generals (2 Chron. 23:1). 8. Ephraimite warrior assisting Pekah in the elimination of Ahab's family and advisors (2 Chron. 28:7). 9. Father of the leading Benjaminite in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9). 10. Postexilic priest (Neh. 12:17).

ZICRI (Zīc′ rī) NIV form of Zichri.

ZIDDIM (Zĭd' dĭm) Place name meaning, "sides." Fortified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), perhaps identifical with Hattin el-Qadim about eight miles west northwest of Tiberias. Some commentators see it as copyist's repetition of "fenced cities." See Zer.

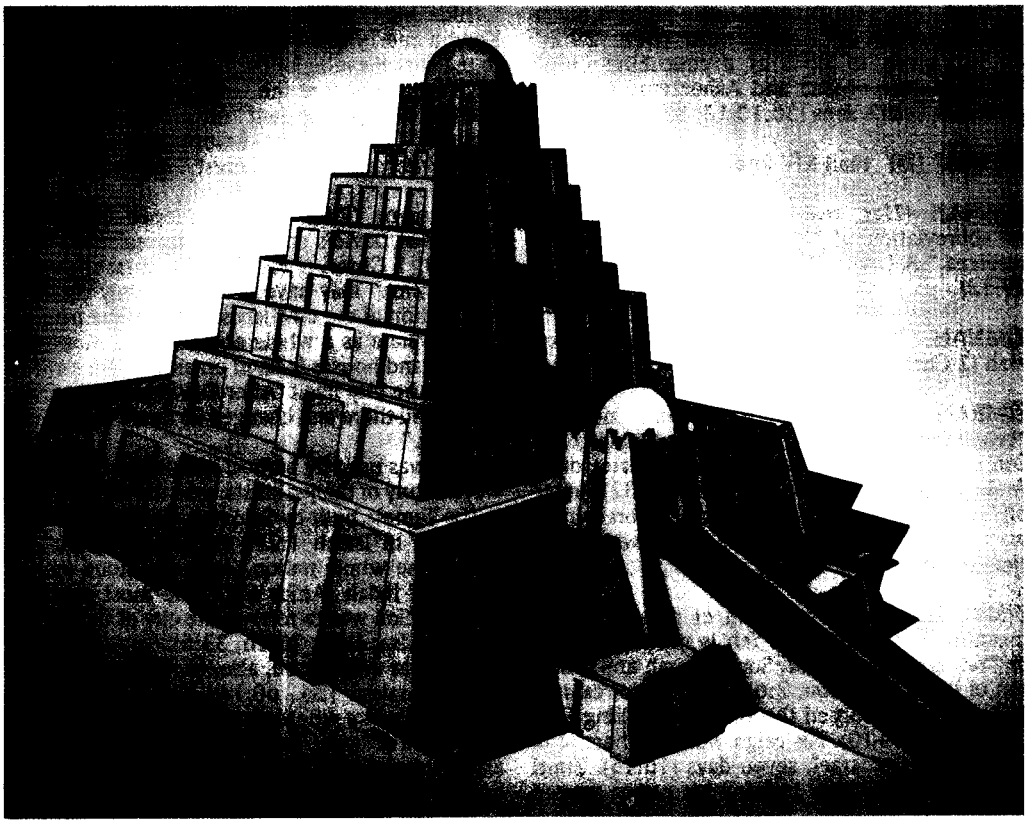
ZIDKIJAH (Zĭd kī' jah) KJV alternate form of Zedekiah (Neh. 10:1).

ZIDON, ZIDONIANS (Zī' don, Zī dō' nĭ ans) KJV alternate forms of Sidon and Sidonians.

ZIF (Zĭf) KJV form of Ziv.

ZIGGURAT (Zĭg' gŭ răt) A stepped building, usually capped by a temple. The architecture was made popular by the Babylonians. The design consisted of placing smaller levels of brick on top of larger layers. Those so far excavated reveal advanced building techniques used by ancient civilizations. Most biblical scholars believe the tower of Babel was a ziggurat (Gen. 11:3–9).

ZIHA (Zī' hà) Egyptian personal name meaning, "the face of Horus (god) has spoken." 1. Family of Temple servants (nethinim) (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46). 2. Overseer of postexilic Temple servants (Neh. 11:21).



The ziggurat, or temple tower, located at Ur in ancient Mesopotamia (modern Iraq).

ZIKLAG (Zĭk' lăg) A village in the southern Judean plain; variously identified either as tell el-Khuweilifeh, 10 miles north northeast of Beersheba, tell esh-Shariah, 9 miles north northwest of Beersheba, or khirbet el-Mashash. City in tribal inheritance of Judah given to Simeon (Josh. 15:31; 19:5).

Ziklag appears to have belonged to the Philistines, taken during a period of rapid expansion in the time of Israel's judges (1 Sam. 27:6). The town was given to David by Achish, king of Gath, during David's "outlaw" period. The gift may have been a means of shortening Philistia's overextended borders. Ziklag appears never to have been a part of Philistia proper.

David made the town his headquarters as he gathered his private army and made raids against the Amalekites. On returning to his base following Philistia's refusal to allow him to fight with them against Saul, David found the town had been raided and burned by the Amalekites and his family taken hostage. A daring night raid on the base of the enemy resulted in the rescue of his people and their return to Ziklag (1 Sam. 30). Jews returning from Babylonian Exile inhabited Ziklag (Neh. 11:28).

ZILLAH (Zĭl′ lah) Personal name meaning, "shadow." Second wife of Lamech and mother of Tubal-Cain and Naamah (Gen. 4:19,22–23).

ZILLETHAI (Zĭl′ lĕ thâi) Personal name; an abbreviated form of "Yahweh is a shadow," that is, a protector. 1. Family of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:20). 2. Manassite supporter of David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20).

ZILPAH (Zĭl′ pah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "short-nosed." Leah's maid (Gen. 29:24; 46:18), given to Jacob as a concubine (30:9; 37:2); mother of Gad and Asher who were regarded as Leah's sons (30:10,12; 35:26).

ZILTHAI (Zĭl′ thâi) KJV form of Zillethai.

ZIMMAH (Zĭm′ mah) Personal name; perhaps an abbreviation of "Yahweh has considered or resolved." A Levite (1 Chron. 6:20,42; 2 Chron. 29:12).

ZIMNAH (Zĭm′ nah) TEV alternate form of Zimmah (2 Chron. 29:12).

ZIMRAN (Zĭm′ răn) Personal name meaning, "celebrated in song, famous" or "mountain goat." Son of Abraham and Keturah and ancestor of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32), possibly identified with Zabram, located somewhere west of Mecca on the Red Sea, and with Zimri (Jer. 25:25).

ZIMRI (Zĭm′ rī) Short form of personal name meaning, "Yah helped," "Yah is my protection," or "Yah is my praise." 1. Son of Zerah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6). 2. A chariot captain in Israel who usurped the throne by killing Elah (1 Kings 16:9–10). His reign was the shortest of all the kings of Israel, seven days (16:15). Zimri committed suicide by burning his palace around him after Omri besieged Tirzah. His name became a byword for king killers (2 Kings 9:31). 3. Leader of tribe of Simeon slain by Phinehas for bringing Midianite woman into the wilderness camp (Num. 25). 4. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36). 5. A difficult name of a nation God judged (Jer. 25:25), often taken as a copying change from the Hebrew for Cimmerians or a coded designation for Elam clarified by the immediate mention of Elam. Nothing is known of a nation of Zimri.

ZIN (Zĭn) Rocky desert area through which Israel passed en route from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 20:1; 27:14; 33:36). The wilderness of Zin, stretching from Kadesh-barnea to the Dead Sea, formed part of the southern border of Canaan and later Judah (Num. 34:3–4; Josh. 15:1,3). "From the wilderness of Zin to Rehob" in Galilee encompasses almost the whole Promised Land (Num. 13:21). The wilderness of Zin should be distinguished from the wilderness of Sin which embraces the western Sinai plateau. See Negeb; Palestine; Sin, Wilderness of; Wilderness.

ZINA (Zī′ nä) Alternate form of Zizah (1 Chron. 23:10).

ZION (Zī′ on) The transliteration of the Hebrew and Greek words that originally referred to the fortified hill of pre-Israelite Jerusalem between the Kedron and Tyropean valleys. Scholars disagree as to the root meaning of the term. Some authorities have suggested that the word was related to the Hebrew word that meant "dry place" or "parched ground." Others relate the word to an Arabic term that is interpreted as "hillcrest," or "mountainous ridge."

The name "Zion" was mentioned first in the account of David's conquest of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–10; 1 Chron. 11:4–9). The phrase "stronghold of Zion" may have referred to only the fortified section of the city. Jerusalem was the name of the city state as a whole and included numerous villages and houses located outside of the fortified area of the city itself. After David captured Zion, he resided there and changed its name to the "city of David."

Zion was used by biblical writers in a variety of ways. Many of the psalmists used the term to refer to the Temple built by Solomon (2:6; 48:2; 84:7; 132:13). In Isaiah 1:27, the idea of "Zion" included the whole nation. Zion also stood for the capital of Judah (Amos 6:1). The most common usage of Zion was to refer to the city of God in the new age (Isa. 1:27; 28:16; 33:5).

Zion was understood, also, to refer to the heavenly Jerusalem (Isa. 60:14; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 14:1), the place where the Messiah would appear at the end of time. The glorification of the messianic community will take place on the holy mountain of "Zion." See Jerusalem. James Newell

ZIOR (Zī' ôr) Place name meaning, "smallness." Village allotted to Judah, located in the hill country near Hebron (Josh. 15:54). Archaeological research indicates that the frequently suggested site Si'ir about five miles north northeast of Hebron was uninhabited before A.D. 400.

ZIPH (Zīph) Place and personal name perhaps meaning, "flowing." 1. Son of Mareshah and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42). The text perhaps means Mareshah was the founder of Ziph near Hebron. 2. Family of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16). 3. Town in the Judean hill country (Josh. 15:24), likely tell Zif about three miles southeast of Hebron. Mereshah likely founded the town (1 Chron. 2:42). David hid from Saul in the surrounding wilderness (1 Sam. 23:14–15); 26:2). Ziphites, residents of Ziph, twice revealed David's hideouts to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1). Rehoboam fortified the site (2 Chron. 11:8). 4. Town in the Negeb (Josh. 15:24), likely khirbet ez-Zeifeh sothwest of Kurnub.

ZIPHAH (Zī' phah) Clan name perhaps meaning, "flowing." Family of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

ZIPHIMS (Zīph' īms) KJV alternate form of Ziphites (superscription of Ps. 54). "Ziphims" was formed by adding s to the already plural Ziphim. See Ziph.

ZIPHION (Zīph' ī' ŏn) See Zephon.

ZIPHITES (Zīph' ītes) See Ziph.

ZIPHRON (Zīph' rŏn) Place name perhaps meaning, "fragrance." Site on the northern border of Canaan, near Hazar-enan (Num. 34:9). It may be modern Zapherani southeast of Restan between Hamath and Homs.

ZIPPOR (Zīp' pôr) Personal name meaning, "(little) bird." Father of King Balak of Moab (Num. 22:2,4,10).

ZIPPORAH (Zīp pō' rah) Personal name meaning, "small bird" or "sparrow." Moses' first wife (some believe the woman named in Numbers 12:1 may be a reference to Zipporah, too) and mother of his children, Gershom and Eliezer (Ex. 2:21–22; 18:4). She was one of the daughters of Reuel, a priest of Midian. She saved Moses' life when the Lord sought to kill him by circumcising Gershom (4:24–25). It appears that Zipporah stayed with her father until Moses had led the people out of Egypt (18:2–6).

ZITHER (Zīth' ēr) Stringed instrument composed of thirty to forty strings placed over a shallow soundboard and played with a pick and fingers (Dan. 3:5,7,10,15 NAS margin). See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

ZITHRI (Zīth' rī) KJV form of Sithri.

ZIV (Zīv) Second month of calendar (1 Kings 6:1). See Calendar.

ZIZ (Zīz) Place name meaning, "blossom." Site involved in Judah's battle plans with Ammon and Moab (2 Chron. 20:16). A pass through a steep place where the people of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir were going to enter Judah to attack King Jehoshaphat. It is often located at wadi Hasasa, southeast of Tekoa near the Dead Sea. The Lord won this battle for His people without their fighting (see vv. 22-30), causing surrounding nations to fear God.

ZIZA (Zī' zà) Personal name meaning, "shining" or "brightness." 1. Son of Shiphi who was a part of the expansion of the tribe of Simeon into Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37). 2. Son of Shimei, a Levite from Gershon, following some manuscript and early translation evidence (1 Chron. 23:10). "Zina" is the reading of KJV, NAS, REB following Hebrew text. 3. One of Rehoboam's sons by Maachah (2 Chron. 11:20).

ZIZAH (Zī' zah) Alternate Hebrew spelling for Ziza. A Levite (1 Chron. 23:11).

ZOAN (Zōan) Hebrew name for Egyptian city of Tanis located at San el-Hagar on the Tanitic arm of the Nile. Zoan became capital of Egypt about 1070 B.C. under Smendes I and remained so until 655 B.C. Numbers 13:22 notes that Hebron was seven years older than Zoan, but the exact date when either was built is not known. The prophets used Zoan to refer to the Egyptian government and its activities (Isa. 19:11,13; 30:4; Ezek. 30:14). The psalmist praised God for Exodus miracles near there (Ps. 78:12,43).

ZOAR (Zō' ar) Place name meaning, "small." One of the cities in the valley of Siddim, also known as Bela (Gen. 14:2). It was attacked by Chedolaomer, but apparently delivered by Abraham (14:17). Lot fled to Zoar with his family just before God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah (19:23–24). He was afraid to remain there with his two daughters, so he went up to a mountain above the city (19:30). Isaiah prophesied that the citizens of Moab would flee to Zoar when destruction would come upon their nation (Isa. 15:5; compare Jer. 48:34). It was apparently a Moabite city, perhaps Safi on the river Zered.

ZOBA(H) (Zō' bah) City-state name perhaps meaning, "battle." First Saul (1 Sam. 14:47), then David (2 Sam. 8:3) fought the kings of Zobah. Compare title of Psalm 60. Zobah seems to be roughly where Syria later became a nation, northeast of Damascus. It was the leading Syrian power before the rise of Damascus. At one time, the Ammonites hired mercenaries from Zoba (2 Sam. 10:6) to help them fight David. The Ammonites came from the South while the Zobaites came from the North causing David to fight on two fronts. David won, and the people of Zobah served him (vv. 13-19). See David; Syria.

ZOBEBAH (Zō bē′ bah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8; NIV, "Hazzobebah").

ZOHAR (Zō′ här) Personal name perhaps meaning, "witness." 1. Hittite (Gen. 23:8; 25:9). 2. Son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15), also called Zerah (Num. 26:13; 1 Chron. 4:24). 3. Descendant of Judah according to the traditional marginal correction (Qere) at 1 Chronicles 4:24. The Hebrew text reads Izhar.

ZOHELETH (Zō′ hē lĕth) Place name meaning, "creeping one," "sliding," or "serpent stone." Stone of sacrifice where Adonijah offered sacrifices in light of his coming coronation as king (1 Kings 1:9). This place was near En-rogel, a spring or well near Jerusalem where the Kidron Valley and the Valley of Hinnom meet. Adonijah's bid for the throne was short lived. David named Solomon to follow him on the throne (vv. 29–30).

ZOHETH (Zō′ hĕth) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Ishi (1 Chron. 4:20) and the head of one of the families in Judah.

ZOPHAH (Zō′ phah) Personal name perhaps meaning, "jug." Family in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35–36).

ZOPHAI (Zō′ phâi) Personal name perhaps meaning, "honeycomb." Son of Elkanah (1 Chron. 6:26). See Zuph.

ZOPHAR (Zō′ phär) Personal name of uncertain meaning. One of Job's three friends who came to sit with him in his misery (2:11). Zophar probably was the youngest of the three since he is mentioned last. He was the sharpest critic of the three men and was more philosophical in his criticism of Job. His words were more coarse and his dogmatism more emphatic. Although there was a place called Naamah in Judah (Josh. 15:41), doubt remains that it was Zophar's home. The exact location is unknown.

ZOPHIM (Zō′ phĭm) Place name meaning, "watchers" or common noun meaning, "the Field of the Watchers" (REB) or lookout post. It was a high place at "the top of Pisgah," near the northeastern end of the Dead Sea. Balak took Baalim there to curse the Israelites (Num. 23:14).

ZORAH (Zō′ rah) Place name meaning, "wasps" or "hornets." City of Dan (Josh. 19:41) about thirteen miles west of Jerusalem on the border with Judah (Josh. 15:33; "Zoreah," KJV). It was the home of Manoah, Samson's father (Judg. 13:2). Rehoboam, king of Judah, strengthened Zorah in case of war (2 Chron. 11:5–12). It is modern Sarah.

ZORATHITES (Zō′ rā thītes) Descendants of Shobal who lived in Zorah (1 Chron. 2:52–53). See Zorah.

ZOREAH (Zō′ rē ah) KJV alternate spelling of Zorah.

ZORITES (Zō′ rītes) People from Zorah (1 Chron. 2:54). See Zorah.

ZOROASTER An ancient Iranian prophet after whom a religion called Zoroastrianism was named. See Persia.

ZOROBABEL (Zō rŏb′ ȧ bĕl) KJV alternate form of Zerubbabel (Matt. 1:12–13; Luke 3:27).

ZUAR (Zū′ ȧr) Personal name meaning, "young" or "small." Member of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18,23; 10:15).

ZUPH (Zŭph) Personal and place name meaning, "honeycomb." 1. Levitic ancestor of Elkanah and Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:16,26,35) from Ephraim. He is called a Levite in another passage (see 1 Chron. 6:16,26,35). Ephraim may be geographical rather than tribal. Others argue that late sources incorporated Samuel into the tribe of Levi because he performed priestly duties. 2. "Land of Zuph" where Saul was looking for some donkeys (1 Sam. 9:5). Its exact location is not known.

ZUPHITE (Zū′ phīte) NIV term for a resident or descendant of Zuph (1 Sam. 1:1).

ZUR (Zŭr) Personal name meaning, "rock." 1. Midianite tribal chief (Num. 25:15 NIV) whose daughter, Cozbi, was killed along with an Israelite man by Phinehas. Zur was later killed in a battle Moses led (Num. 31:7–8). 2. King Saul's uncle (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

ZURIEL (Zū′ rī ĕl) Personal name that may mean, "God is a rock." Son of Abihail and head of the Merari family of Levites (Num. 3:35).

ZURISHADDAI (Zū′ rī shăd′ dā ī) Personal name meaning, "shaddai is a rock." The father of Shelumiel, a leader of the tribe of Simeon, in the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:6).

ZUZIM (Zū′ zĭm) National name of uncertain meaning. A people who lived in Ham and were defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:5). They are apparently called the Zamzummin in Deuteronomy 2:20.

ZUZITE (Zū′ zīte) NIV term for Zuzim (Gen. 14:5).
