From 1878 onward, private individuals, mostly wealthy Jews; local and national organizations; and international societies were involved in establishing settlements in the Land of Israel (Hebrew, Eretz Israel). The first attempts were made by Jews already in *Ottoman Palestine who left urban life in Safed and Jerusalem and tried to live in new agricultural villages. In 1878 Jews from Safed established Gei Oni (Valley of my Strength), and Jerusalem Jews established Petach Tikva (Opening of Hope), east of Jaffa. Both settlements were abandoned after a short period, but they indicated the direction that some future settlers would follow. At the same time, local associations of the Lovers of Zion (Hovevei Zion) groups were formed among Jews in *Eastern Europe with the aim of establishing new agriculture settlements in Eretz Israel. Beginning in 1882, a wave of Jewish immigrants, known as the First Aliyah (*ISRAEL, STATE OF: IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948) began to arrive in the Land of Israel. Settlers from among these immigrants established four agricultural settlements in 1882. Two of these were built on the sites of the former Jewish settlements – Petach Tikva and Rosh Pinna (Head of the Corner), the location of Gei Oni. The settlers also built the settlements of Zamarin, later Zichron Yaakov (Jacob's Memorial), and Rishon LeZion (First in Zion). Those new villages were not initially successful, and only the financial support of Baron Edmond James de *Rothschild (1845–1934) enabled them to survive. Rothschild changed the structure of these settlements by introducing viniculture; he sent agronomists who helped the settlers plant vineyards. He also built two great vineyards in Rishon LeZion and Zichron Yaakov, and a glass factory and a small settlement in Tantura to produce the bottles needed for marketing the wine. With the help of Rothschild, other settlements were built including Givat Ada', Metula' Meir Shpheya, and Mahanayim. At the same time, BILU (Beit Ya'akov Lekhu V'nelkha ["House of Jacob, Let us go up" (Isaiah 2:5)]), a Jewish student association, established Gadera in the south.

The Jewish settlers looked for large plots of land to establish villages, rather than farms. The deserted coastal plain and the valleys of Eretz Israel including the Jezreel, Jordan, and Harod valleys, were not occupied by the local Arabs. From the late nineteenth century through the mid-1930s, most Jewish settlements were established on those plains in which heavy machinery could be used, rather than in more hilly regions that were not suitable for modern agriculture.

In the 1890s, private individuals established two more villages, Rehovot and Hadera. Other villages were subsequently established, but in 1900 Baron de Rothschild halted his activities in Eretz Israel and transferred his authority to the Jewish Colonization Association (JCA). The JCA established several more settlements in the lower Galilee area (Kfar Tavor, Ilaniya, Yavne'el, Menahamiya, and Mizpe) and reorganized the older settlements to enable more efficient agricultural activities. Thus, by 1900, there were twenty Jewish agriculture settlements, from Metulla in the north to Beer Tuvia in the south, and from Tantura in the west to Yesud Hamala in the east, with a total of 5,500 occupants. They had about 221,000 dunams of cultivated land; of these, about 24,000 dunams were planted in grapes, 2,200 dunams in citrus, 3,300 dunams in olives, and 60,000 dunams in cereals, mainly wheat; about 700 dunams were in populated areas.

In 1897 Theodor *Herzl founded the World Zionist Organization (WZO). In the years before World War I, the WZO established the model of future agriculture activities in the Land of Israel by introducing the idea of “national land”; Jews from all over the *Diaspora would donate money to the Jewish National Fund (Keren Kayemet Le-Yisrael) for the purchase of land, which would be leased to Jews for the establishment of new villages on the national land. Thus, the first *kibbutz (collective settlement), Degania, was established on the shores of the Sea of Galilee in 1909, and the prototype of the moshav (cooperative settlement), Ein Ganim, was established in 1908 near Petach Tikva. Other villages were established in Ben Shemen, Hulda, and Merhaviah, all supported by the WZO.

The Second Aliyah, a new wave of Jewish immigrants, entered Eretz Israel between 1905 and 1914. Although many settled in the cities (especially Jerusalem and Jaffa), some established new villages. In the years immediately before World War I, there were about forty-four Jewish agricultural settlements with 12,000 inhabitants. Of the 400,000 dunams in Jewish hands, 230,000 were cultivated land; of these, 142,000 dunams were in grains and 68,000 dunam were plantations – about 10,000 dunams of citrus groves, 14,000 dunam of grapes, and 45,000 dunams of almonds and olives.

After the 1920 establishment of the *British Mandate, Jewish immigration increased, with approximately 350,000 Jewish immigrants arriving between 1918 and 1947; the result was a Jewish population of 600,000 by 1947. During those years, the WZO, together with the private Jewish sector, established more than 250 new villages. The first priority was for Jews to settle on the ground according to the ideals of “the national land”; thus, Jews established new kibbutzim and moshavim where they worked the land through their own physical labor, creating the “new modern Jew.” The private sector also established new settlements, mainly based on citrus planting (Netanya, Raanana, Tel Mond). Up to 1936 most of the new villages, national and private, were established in the plains. When a British Royal Commission recommended the partition of Eretz Israel between Jews and Arabs according to the population dispersion, the WZO established, from 1937 onward, new settlements that were designed to hold areas needed for the future Jewish state. Thus, settlements were established in the Upper Galilee (Hanita, Eylon, Mazuba), in the northern Negev (Negba, Revivim), the Hebron mountains (Etzion Bloc), and on Mount Carmel. By 1947 a chain of Jewish settlements marked the limit of the settled area in Eretz Israel, from Metulla in the north to Mashabei Sadeh in the south and from Kfar Darom in the southwest to Beit Ha’arava and Ein Gev in the east. On this topic, see G. Biger, The Boundaries of Modern Palestine: 1840–1947 (1980); and I. Troen, Imagining Zion: Dreams, Designs, and Realities in a Century of Jewish Settlement (2003).

GIDEON BIGER

Israel, State of: Arab–Israeli Conflict, 1948–2010.

Between 1948 (see also ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1948]) and 1967, the year of the *Six Day War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–1967]), Egypt controlled Gaza, and Jordan ruled East Jerusalem and the West Bank. Jordan allowed Arabs living in the West Bank to become Jordanian citizens; a majority of today’s Jordanians are of Palestinian stock. Egypt did not allow the Gazans to become Egyptians or work in Egypt. It was only after Israel conquered these territories in June 1967 that Arabs, Muslims, and the world at large began calling for Palestinian independence. It was after that conquest as well that the Israeli religious and political right began agitating for “Greater Israel,” an allusion to the imagined boundaries of biblical Israel and a euphemism for permanent control of the conquered territories by modern Israel.

In September 1967, at a meeting in Khartoum, the Arab states proclaimed the famous “Three Nos”: “No peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with it.” The United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 242 in November 1967, which coupled “withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict” with “respect for and acknowledgment of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries.” The Arabs interpret Resolution 242 to mean that Israel must unconditionally leave all the land it captured. The Israelis counter that, if the UN wanted them to do that, it would have called for their withdrawal “from all the territories” or “from the territories,” rather than “from territories.” In addition, they note, except for Egypt and Jordan, the Palestinians and other Arabs have rejected their right to a sovereign and serene existence in the Middle East.

Next to the 1967 Six Day War, and, before that, Israel’s War of Independence, the most cataclysmic event in the history of the Arab–Israel conflict was the outbreak of the 1973 Yom Kippur War. In a surprise attack, Egyptian forces crossed the Suez Canal, broke through Israel’s supposedly impregnable Bar Lev Line, and for a time threatened to overwhelm and defeat Israel’s fabled army. After many deaths and casualties, as well as huge equipment losses, the Israelis counterattacked and restored the political and military status quo ante. However, this return to the pre-1973 situation did not last long. President Anwar el Sadat of Egypt converted military defeat into political victory. Expelling the Soviet presence from Egypt, he flew to Jerusalem in 1977, met with Prime Minister Menahem Begin, addressed the Israeli Knesset (parliament), and offered to make peace with Israel. The result was the Egyptian–Israeli peace treaty of 1979, according to which Israel returned the Sinai Peninsula, which it had acquired in the Six Day War. President Sadat, who shared the Nobel Prize for Peace with Prime Minister Menahem *Begin, was assassinated in 1981 by Egyptians opposed to his accommodation with Israel. However, the peace between Egypt and Israel has continued to hold.

Realizing that conventional military confrontations were doing nothing to end the occupation of captured territories, the Palestinians escalated terrorist attacks within Israel in what is known as the “First Intifada” (1987–93). In 1993 Yasser Arafat, the first chairman of the Palestinian Authority, shook hands with Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin on the White House lawn and, as part of the Oslo Accords, declared his readiness to make peace with the State of Israel. Arafat, who died in 2004, never made good on his pledge, but in 1994 King Hussein of Jordan became the second Arab ruler to make peace with Israel. This peace, too, has continued to hold.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Israeli accommodation with the Palestinians in Gaza and the occupied West Bank remains elusive. In 2000, at a meeting hosted by U.S. President Bill Clinton in Camp David, Maryland, Arafat rejected Israeli Prime Minister Ehud *Barak's offer to return 95% of the occupied territories, including a portion of Jerusalem to be used, if Arafat wished, as the capital of the state of Palestine. Arafat responded by launching the Second Intifada, which still continues. In 2006, a year after Prime Minister Ariel *Sharon ordered Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and after the Palestinian radical group Hamas won elections in Gaza, one of its leaders, Khalid Mish'al, said, "We shall never recognize the legitimacy of a Zionist state."

The elimination of Israel resonates powerfully with many Palestinians, as well as Arabs and non-Arab Muslims elsewhere. For them Israel is illegitimate – not only because its nationalism conflicts with theirs but also because Israel's existence contradicts a prime geopolitical precept of Islam. Although most Muslims acknowledge that Jews held sovereignty in the area in antiquity, they believe that once a non-Muslim land is conquered, it forever belongs to the ummah, the universal community of Islam. Should the non-Muslim regain the land, this reconquest is temporary and will last only until Muslims have the strength to reconquer the territory. A signal example is the kingdom of Jerusalem, which the Christian Crusaders established in 1099 and the Muslims recaptured in its totality in 1291.

A 2003 Pew Research Center poll found that "by wide margins, Muslim populations [throughout the world] doubt that a way can be found for the State of Israel to exist so that the rights and needs of the Palestinian people are met. Eight out of ten residents of the Palestinian Authority express this opinion." In 2008 the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research found that, by majorities ranging from two-thirds to more than three-fourths, Palestinians favored continued attacks on Israel, as well as the termination of peace negotiations.

There have been eight Arab–Israeli wars in seven decades: the 1948–49 War of Liberation (in which Israel won its renaissance independence); the 1956 Suez Campaign (in which Britain and France sought to prevent Egypt from nationalizing the Suez Canal, Israel captured the Sinai peninsula, and then returned it to Egypt in response to American and UN pressure); the 1967 Six Day War (in which Syria lost the Golan Heights, Egypt lost the Gaza Strip and Sinai, and Jordan lost the West Bank); the 1968–70 War of Attrition (a limited conflict begun by Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser, the Soviet Air Force, and the Palestine Liberation Organization to recapture the Sinai peninsula); the 1973 Yom Kippur War (which Israel won, but which laid the foundation for President Anwar El Sadat's visit to Jerusalem, the return of the Sinai, and the Israeli–Egyptian peace treaty); the 1982 First Lebanon War (in which Israel tried without success to seal off its northern border); the 2006 Second Lebanon War, a conflict in which a few thousand Hizbollah militants fought the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) to a draw; and the Israeli incursion into Gaza in 2008. During its sixty years of statehood, Israel's paramilitary enemies in the Arab world have also mounted countless attacks against Israel and its citizens. Despite repeated IDF strikes, the severity of which are limited by Israel's fear of incurring negative world opinion and of causing huge civilian casualties, these enemies, most recently militants in Gaza, have continued to lob rockets and missiles into Israel at will.

On the eve of the 2007 Middle East conference in Annapolis, Maryland, Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator, said, "One of the more pressing problems is the Zionist regime's insistence on being recognized as a Jewish State, but the Palestinian Authority would never acknowledge Israel's Jewish identity." This is the nub of the Israeli–Arab conflict. Except for Egypt and Jordan, the Arab states do not recognize the right of Israel to exist as a sovereign entity in the Middle East. Until they alter that stance or, in the 2005 words of Iran president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "wipe the Zionist entity off the face of the earth," a resolution of the Israeli–Arab conflict remains elusive.

For further reading, see J. G. Granados, The Birth of Israel: The Drama as I Saw It (1948); E. B. Glick, Between Israel and Death (1974); J. B. Glubb, A Soldier with the Arabs (1957); M. B. Oren, Six Days of War (2002); and B. M. Rubin and J. C. Rubin, Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography (2003); see also BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS. Maps 12, 13, 14 EDWARD BERNARD GLICK

Israel, State of: Diaspora Relations. Most of the thirteen million Jews in the world at the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century live in Israel and North America. Thus, although the smaller Jewish communities in Europe and *Latin America play some role, Israeli Jews and North American Jews are the central players in the perpetual effort to define the parameters of Jewish partnership and Jewish peoplehood (see DEMOGRAPHY; and DIASPORA).

Menachem *Begin, Israel's most nationalistic prime minister, once wrote to an American Jew, "I believe with all my heart that Eretz Yisrael (the land of Israel) belongs to the whole Jewish people and not only to those who live in it." Mordecai M. *Kaplan, founder of *Reconstructionist Judaism, wrote constantly of the centrality of Israel, which he called "the hub of the Jewish people throughout the world." In the days of the *Yishuv, Eliezer Rieger, a Hebrew educator, wrote, "Eretz Yisrael and the golah (Diaspora Jewry) are mutually indispensable. Without the golah to encompass it, Eretz Yisrael will become parochial, and without Eretz Yisrael as its center, the golah is apt to deteriorate. The Jewish settlement in Eretz Yisrael will be the avant garde of the Jewish people and it will have to bear the responsibility for world Judaism."

These references to the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora denote the transnational, multilingual, historical, cultural, and religious interconnections of the Jewish people, no matter where they live. They express a unity and a partnership that pre-date the rebirth of Israel as a sovereign state. With the exception of the links that Muslims have forged to the cities of Mecca and Medina in Saudi Arabia, Judaism is the world's most geocentric religion. Its belief system has always been tied to the Land of *Israel.

In its relationship with the Diaspora, Israel receives material, moral, and political support, whereas the Diaspora gains psychological, ethnic, and religious pride. On the personal level of Diaspora–Israel relations, there is aliyah (Jewish immigration to Israel). On the group level, there are AIPAC (the American Israel Public Affairs Committee), which is the preeminent foreign lobbying group for Israel, and the World Jewish Congress (WJC), which, under the leadership of its late president Nahum Goldmann, laid the groundwork for what later became the *reparations agreement between Israel and post-war *Germany. Both Israel and the Diaspora carry a shared memory of the *Holocaust, encompassing a shared guilt that they survived, a shared fear of its repetition, and a shared determination that they must do everything in their combined power to prevent its ever happening again.

Nevertheless, there is sometimes tension in the Israeli-Diaspora relationship. Most foreign Jews realize that, in matters like security, Israel must always be the senior partner. Yet even junior partners prefer to be consulted beforehand rather than merely being informed afterward, nor do they like the downgrading of their contribution to the common cause. It can be harmful to both partners when older Israelis forget and younger Israelis are not taught the vital role played by North America's Jews in Israel's birth and ascension into statehood. Many North American Jews, most of whom are non-*Orthodox or unaffiliated, are concerned about the absence of Jewish religious pluralism in Israel and with the "Who is a Jew?" and "Who is a rabbi?" debates. Criticism by North American Jews is often resented by Israelis, who reject censure by those not living in the Jewish state and not serving in its army. American Jews have been nurtured by the constitutional principle of separation of church and state and by the ability of congregants in all branches of *Judaism to live Jewishly in the United States in any way they wish. By contrast, Israelis, regardless of their secular or religious bent, live under a semi-fusion of synagogue and state, where Orthodoxy is the only legally recognized and government-funded branch of Judaism. This presents problems, for example, when a would-be Jewish oleh (immigrant to Israel) is married to a Gentile, has a non-Jewish mother, or belongs to one of Judaism's non-Orthodox branches.

Perhaps the greatest Israeli resentment is of avowed Zionists in the Diaspora who refuse to make *aliyah. The "ingathering of the exiles" is a sacred tenet of Zionism, but it has not been significantly heeded by Jews living in the affluent and democratic West. This raises the subsidiary question of who is the better, more Jewish, partner – the one who lives in Israel or the one who does not? Relatively few American Jews become Israelis; however, significant numbers worry about Israel, demonstrate for it, speak up for it, send money to it, visit it, and send their children for sojourns under organized programs like Taglit, also known as Birthright Israel. Some even fought for it and died for it in the War of Independence.

This Diaspora pattern has existed since antiquity. From the beginning of the Babylonian *Exile in 586 BCE to the Roman destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 BCE, most Jews, even when given an opportunity, did not return to the Holy Land. When King Cyrus of *Persia allowed *Ezra and *Nehemiah to lead exiles to rebuild the Jerusalem Temple, those who stayed behind vastly outnumbered those who went along – and the numerical importance of the ancient Diaspora was matched by its intellectual vigor.

If for no other reason than the demographic imbalance between itself and its neighbors, Israel wants immigrants from North America. However, Israel fails to fathom that human migration is generally not a pull but a push phenomenon; most people who are satisfied with their lot do not exchange their native land for another. Except for idealists, people do not move from a country with a higher living standard to one with a lower living standard. Those who did emigrate, such as the *North African Jews who came in 1948 and the *Russian Jews who came from the 1970s through the 1990s, were usually driven by economic necessity or political, racial, or religious persecution.

Until quite recently, conventional wisdom held that as memories of the Holocaust faded, as the reasons for Israel's multiple wars became obscure, and as issues like universalism, *environmentalism, and nuclear proliferation took their place, more and more contemporary American Jews would alter attitudes toward Israel and its policies. However, a 2008 Brandeis University study concluded that a large majority of American Jews continue to feel that "Israel is a 'very important' aspect of their Jewish identity." Although earlier surveys had reported that younger *Reform and unaffiliated Jews were less attached to Israel, the Brandeis study found "no significant decline...for the period extending from the early 1990s to the most recent years." Only time will tell whether programs like Birthright Israel will have an enduring effect in establishing long-lasting positive attitudes toward Israel among young Diaspora Jews.

For further reading, see M. Davis, ed., With Eyes toward Zion (1977); E. B. Glick, The Triangular Connection: America, Israel, and American Jews (1982); T. Sasson, C. Kadushin, and L. Saxe, American Jewish Attachment to Israel (2008); and E. Stock, Partners & Pursestrings: A History of the United Israel Appeal (1987).

EDWARD BERNARD GLICK

Israel, State of: Ecology. The view that nature can be a resource for the revival of the Jewish people is a cornerstone of *Zionism. This Jewish secular nationalist movement rejected the mostly *urban Jewish lifestyles of the *Diaspora and called on Jews to return to the Land of Israel to establish a new relationship with nature through agriculture and secular reinterpretations of Jewish religious practices. Zionism generated very rich ecological thought about the creative power of nature and the organic ties of the Jewish people to the Land of Israel. The most ecologically interesting Zionist thinker was Aharon David *Gordon (1856–1922), the spiritual leader of Labor Zionism. He was keenly aware of the crisis of modernity and the causal connection between technology and human alienation from nature. Gordon settled in *Palestine in 1904 and joined an agricultural settlement. He viewed human beings as creatures of nature, but warned that people are in constant danger of losing contact with the natural world. Thus, his goal was to create a new kind of Jewish life and Jewish person. For Gordon, the regeneration of humanity and the regeneration of the Jewish people would not come through *Torah study, but rather through physical productive labor.

Despite Gordon's warnings, Jewish settlement in *Palestine and the establishment of *Israel created significant environmental degradation due to intensive agriculture, massive urbanization, rapid population growth, industrialization, and the perpetual state of war. Recognition of the severity of the situation in early-twenty-first-century Israel has generated new ecological awareness and extensive environmental legislation to address the price nature has paid for Israel's success in "making the desert bloom." Israeli environmentalism is largely secular, although there are small groups that attempt to link environmental activism with Jewish sources. About ten major nonprofit Israeli organizations provide information about the environmental crisis, engage in legal action, create educational materials, and even sustain two political parties. The Heschel Center for Environmental Learning and Leadership sponsors educational programs and a forum called Le-Ovdah U'Le-Shomrah (To Till and to Tend [Gen 2:15]), devoted to integrating religious nationalism with an environmentalism grounded in Jewish tradition.

A closer look at environmentalism in Israel sheds light on the uneasy relationship between Judaism and ecology. In Israel the concern for the physical landscape and support of action in regard to air and water pollution, treatment of waste products, and conservation of coastal lines are most popular among secular Israelis who wish to improve their quality of life and create a healthy lifestyle. This popularity reflects contact with environmental movements in Europe and North America rather than with the Jewish tradition. Conversely, Israeli Jews who are anchored in the Jewish tradition tend to link their love of the Land of Israel to a certain religious nationalist vision – the so-called Greater Israel vision – rather than the preservation of nature. Even though the religious nationalist parties now promote outdoor activities for their constituents, these activities are not grounded in the values and sensibilities of the environmental movement and are sometimes inimical to it.

For further reading, see L. A. Hoffman, ed., The Land of Israel: Jewish Perspectives (1986); A. Tal, Pollution in the Promised Land: An Environmental History of Israel (2002); E. Schweid, The Land of Israel: National Home or Land of Destiny, trans. D. Greniman (1985); and Y. Zerubavel, "The Forest as National Icon: Literature, Politics, and the Archeology of Memory," Israel Studies 1 (Spring 1996): 60–99; see also ECOLOGY; ETHICS: ENVIRONMENTAL.

HAVA TIROSH-SAMUELSON

Israel, State of: Founding of the Modern State. From late antiquity through the nineteenth century, there was always a Jewish presence in the Land of Israel. However, it was only with the growth of Jewish nationalist movements and European antisemitism in the 1880s that Jews began to return in visible numbers and establish a Jewish entity in Palestine that came to be known as the Yishuv* (settlement). In 1894 Alfred Dreyfus, a French Jewish army officer falsely charged with spying for Germany, was convicted of treason. Theodor Herzl, a Viennese Jewish journalist, covered the trial. Incensed by the antisemitism manifested at the proceedings and in France at large, he published Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State) in 1896. This book put a political face on the Jewish longing for a homeland and urged the creation of a Jewish state, although not necessarily in Palestine. The following year, at a congress in Basel, Switzerland, Herzl and other Jewish leaders created the World Zionist Organization, which proclaimed that "Zionism seeks a publicly recognized, legally secured home . . . in Palestine for the Jewish people."

The first of the "Great Powers" to recognize Zionism as a political movement was Britain. On November 2, 1917, its Foreign Secretary, Arthur Balfour, without the acquiescence of the Arabs of either Palestine or the rest of the Middle East, declared, "His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country." Later, France, Italy, the United States, and other nations accepted what is known as the Balfour Declaration. In 1922 the League of Nations recognized "the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine" and incorporated the Balfour Declaration into the League's "Mandate for Palestine," which it awarded to Britain. This mandate gave Britain the right to govern Palestine, which Britain had conquered in 1917 from the Turks in the course of World War I, as well as the responsibility "for placing the country under such political, administrative, and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish national home."

Palestine under the British Mandate originally comprised all of what is now Israel, Jordan, and the West Bank. In 1922, however, the British detached all the territory lying to the east of the River Jordan and created the semi-autonomous Emirate of Trans-Jordan for the Hashemite prince Abdullah I (the great-grandfather of the current Jordanian monarch, whose name is also Abdullah).

Palestine's Arabs and Arabs elsewhere rejected Britain's support of a Jewish home, but Palestine's Jews accepted it eagerly. As time passed, the Jews stopped calling for a Jewish homeland and instead demanded a Jewish state. They wanted increasing immigration into Palestine so that Jews could become the majority in the country. This prospect galvanized Palestinian nationalism. In a violent effort to force the British to convert Palestine into an Arab entity, Arabs engaged in massacres of Jews, the most notorious of which occurred in 1929 and between 1936 and 1939.

The contradictions within the Balfour Declaration and the irreconcilability of Arab and Jewish nationalisms were obvious from the very start of British mandatory governance. Nevertheless, London tried to achieve some reconciliation. In 1936 it sent to Jerusalem the Peel Commission, named after its chairman, Earl Peel. It reported that "there is no common ground between . . . [the two communities]. . . . Neither Arab nor Jew has any sense of service to a single state"; it concluded that "the disease is so deep rooted that, in our firm conviction, the only hope of a cure lies in a surgical operation." The recommended surgery was a three-way partition of the territory into an Arab state, a Jewish state, and a British-controlled area. Nothing came of this proposal, however, because the Arabs responded with riots and new attacks on Palestine's Jews.

Shortly before the outbreak of World War II, Britain jettisoned the last vestiges of its support for Zionism. In May 1939, the British government issued a White Paper (a policy document) stating first that its objective was now "the establishment within ten years of an independent Palestine state." To accomplish this goal, Arabs were to be given "an increasing part in the government of their country." Second, between 1939 and 1944 Jewish immigration into Palestine was to be limited to a total of 75,000 persons. After that date,

"no further Jewish immigration will be permitted unless the Arabs of Palestine are prepared to acquiesce in it." Third, the Palestine government would be granted "powers to prohibit and regulate [further private] transfer of land [from Palestinian Arabs to Palestinian Jews]."

The war forced Britain to postpone most of its announced reforms, but it strictly enforced the restrictions on Jewish immigration and land purchase detailed in the 1939 White Paper. Once the war was over, the struggle between the British, the Jews, and the Arabs resumed and accelerated. To their earlier demand for a Jewish state, the Zionists added the demand that the survivors of the *Holocaust be allowed to come to Palestine immediately. When the British balked, Jews sought to bring the refugees in illegally. The Royal Navy stopped the refugees whenever it could, sending them either back to Europe or to internment camps in Cyprus.

In 1946 Britain proposed to the United States the formation of an Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on the Palestine Problem. Its report recommended "that 100,000 certificates be authorized immediately for the admission into Palestine of Jews who have been the victims of *Nazi and Fascist persecution . . . and that those certificates be awarded as far as possible in 1946." It also recommended that "Palestine be neither a Jewish state nor an Arab state." The Anglo-American report satisfied no one. The immigration certificates were never issued because London made their issuance contingent on the disarmament of both Jews and Arabs, as well as on Washington's sharing of the "additional military and financial responsibilities" involved in bringing the Jewish immigrants to Palestine. President Harry S. Truman refused to accept these conditions. Consequently, London continued to curb Jewish immigration into Palestine. In February 1947 the British proposed that "His Majesty's Government should administer a five-year trusteeship over Palestine, with the declared object of preparing the country for [bi-national] independence." This, too, was rejected by the Palestinian Arab and Palestinian Jewish communities.

On April 2, 1947, after thirty years of governing Palestine, Britain brought the problem to the United Nations. On November 29, 1947, the General Assembly recommended the partition of Palestine into a Jewish state, an Arab state, and a UN-administered corpus separatum for Jerusalem. The Jews of the Yishuv accepted the partition, even though it did not grant them sovereignty over Jerusalem. As David *Ben-Gurion, Israel's founding prime minister, put it, "Better a Jewish State without Jerusalem than Jerusalem without a Jewish State."

General Sir Alan Gordon Cunningham, the last British High Commissioner, departed on May 14, 1948. On the same day, David Ben-Gurion declared Israel's independence as a Jewish and democratic state and appealed for peace: "We extend our hand to all neighboring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighborliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of cooperation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East." As one of its first acts, the temporary National Council of State unanimously passed an ordinance voiding the restrictions on Jewish immigration and land purchases contained in the 1939 British White Paper.

The Arabs rejected the partition plan and went to war against Palestine's Jews, who had by then become one-third of the population of the country. Although the Jews of the Yishuv, now called Israelis, beat back seven invading Arab armies, they were unable to seize the Old City of Jerusalem or the lands that later came to be known as the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. The present boundaries between Israel and the Palestinian territories are not international frontiers. They are the ceasefire lines delineating where the opposing armies stopped fighting in 1948 and 1949. Maps 12, 13

BERNARD EDWARD GLICK

Israel, State of: Immigration Before 1948. *Palestine in the nineteenth century was essentially a poor and rural society that had long been a backwater of the *Ottoman Empire. The population was overwhelmingly Muslim Arab with a primarily urban Christian Arab merchant and professional class. There were fewer than 25,000 Jews in Palestine before 1880; some two-thirds lived in *Jerusalem, where they constituted a majority of the population. This community, which came to be called the "Old Yishuv," consisted of descendants of Jews who had remained in the area since earliest times, as well as a small stream of new immigrants, mainly *Orthodox Jews who sought to live a religious life and die in the Holy Land.

In the late nineteenth century, in response to the nascent political Zionist movement (see ZIONISM), there was a wave of immigration of Jews from *Russia and *Eastern Europe. This First *Aliyah (from the Hebrew word "to ascend") took place between 1882 and 1903 and brought 20,000 to 30,000 individuals to Palestine. Many arrived in groups organized by the Hovevei Zion (Lovers of Zion) and BILU (Beit Ya'akov Lekhu V'nelkha; "House of Jacob, Let us go up" [Isa 2:5]) – Zionist movements in *Russia and *Romania; others, mostly from *Galicia, arrived on their own. The new Jewish migration was diverse. Some people came primarily for religious reasons and joined existing Jewish communities, mainly in Jerusalem, but also in other "holy" cities such as *Safed, Tiberias (see GALILEE), and *Hebron. Others were drawn by Zionist ideology that sought the creation of a Jewish state as a response to *antisemitism in their native lands; some were motivated by socialist ideas and concepts. These new immigrants joined farm villages or established new *agricultural settlements, such as Rishon LeZion, Zichron Yaakov, and Rosh Pinna. In 1878, a group of Jews from Jerusalem founded a new town, Petach Tikva; the initial settlement was abandoned but was reestablished in 1882. The immigrants of the First Aliyah, which also included Middle Eastern (*Mizrahi) Jews from *Yemen, faced many obstacles. Yet it was this immigration and the agricultural settlements they founded that revived modern Jewish life in the *Land of Israel.

As the movement of Jews from Europe to Palestine continued in the earliest years of the twentieth century, the Jewish population of the Holy Land grew in urban and rural areas. The Second Aliyah (1904–14) involved some 35,000 to 40,000 young pioneers, mostly from Russia. By *World War I (1914) there were some 85,000 Jews and 600,000 Arabs in Palestine. Successive waves of immigration to Palestine between 1919 and 1939 contributed to different aspects of the developing Jewish community and economy. The Third Aliyah, comprising some 35,000 immigrants who arrived between 1919 and 1923, mainly from Russia, strongly influenced the character and structure of the “New Yishuv.” These pioneers laid the foundations for a comprehensive social and economic infrastructure; developed agriculture by establishing collective agricultural settlements, kibbutzim and moshavim (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS, 1878 TO 1948; ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT); and provided the labor for the construction of housing and roads.

The influx between 1924 and 1932 of some 80,000 mainly middle-class immigrants from Poland, the Fourth Aliyah, was instrumental in developing and enriching urban life. These immigrants mostly settled in *Tel Aviv, Haifa, and Jerusalem, where they established small businesses, construction firms, and light industry. The Fifth Aliyah (1932–38) consisted of some 215,000 urban professionals and businesspeople from *Central Europe who were fleeing the *Nazi regime. During World War II (1939–45), immigration to Palestine continued both legally and illegally and totaled some 82,000. Between the end of World War II (1945) and the declaration of the State of Israel in May 1948, there were severe British restrictions on Jewish immigration (see BRITISH MANDATE; WHITE PAPER); nevertheless some 57,000 Jews arrived. After independence in 1948, the State of Israel allowed free immigration, and the flow of immigrants grew dramatically, including entire communities from some Muslim countries.

For further reading, see B. Reich, A Brief History of Israel (2008); idem, “The Founding of Modern Israel and the Arab-Israeli Conflict,” in The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture, ed. J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin (2010); and H. M. Sachar, A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 3rd ed. (2007); see also related entries under ISRAEL, STATE OF.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Israel, State of: Immigration Post-1948. Israel is a special case of a country built on immigration. The influx of a sizable Jewish population from other places has been a crucial element in fulfilling *Zionist aspirations and a major factor in ensuring the Jewishness of the state. Organizing the emigration of Jews from other countries and moving them to Israel, as well as struggling for the independence of the Jewish State, have been one of the main activities of Zionism as the national movement of the Jewish people.

Israel’s 1948 Declaration of Independence states, “The State of Israel will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles,” and this clause constitutes the underpinnings of Israeli immigration policy. Two main laws govern implementation of this policy: the Law of Return and the Citizenship Law. According to the Law of Return (July 5, 1950), every Jew is entitled to move to Israel and receive an “immigrant’s certificate”; this certificate gives him or her the right to Israeli citizenship. These laws resulted in a unique immigration policy based on ethnic-religious classifications, rather than the demographic, economic, and social criteria that are standard in other countries. In keeping with this conception, Israel refers to immigrating Jews as olim (“ascenders” [singular: oleh, olah]) and to Jewish immigration to Israel as aliyah (“ascent”); these biblical terms, which are used in connection with the ancient returns from *Egypt and *Babylonia to the Land of Israel and the pilgrimage to the *Temple in *Jerusalem, imply elevation, exaltation, and sanctity. Thus, olim are portrayed as ideological immigrants fulfilling their national purpose, even though most of the newcomers in the large waves of aliyah were in fact motivated by various push and pull factors and lacked more attractive migration options.

*Aliyah has been an ongoing process. From the establishment of the state (1948) until 2007, more than 3 million olim (3,090,000) arrived in Israel, especially in two huge waves: 700,000 between 1948 and 1951, and more than 950,000 between 1990 and 2000. There were smaller waves in 1955–57 (165,000 immigrants), 1961–64 (230,000), and 1972–73 (110,000). Most of the olim came from four regions: *Eastern Europe, the Middle East, *North Africa, and the former *Soviet Union.

Aliyah from Eastern Europe was part of the first mass wave in the early years of the state (1948–51), with some 330,000 Jewish immigrants; another 225,000 came in the 1960s and 1970s. The main wave of immigrants from the Middle East, some 240,000, also arrived in the early years. They were followed in the 1960s and 1970s by another 70,000 immigrants. The first wave included almost all the Jews of *Yemen and *Iraq, as well as Jews from *Iran, *Turkey, and *Egypt. Immigration from *North Africa (the Maghreb) was spread over three decades, during which some 400,000 olim came to Israel. The *Ethiopian olim, who numbered more than 60,000, came mainly in the early 1980s and early 1990s. The greatest number of immigrants in Israel are from the former Soviet Union and total 1.1 million; 150,000 arrived in the early 1970s, whereas 970,000 came in the 1990s and later.

CHRONOLOGICAL OVERVIEW OF ALIYAH: The first wave of mass aliyah started as soon as Israel gained its independence in May 1948 and ended in late 1951. During this time the population doubled, as some 700,000 Jews, half from Europe and half from Islamic countries, were added to the 650,000 Jewish residents of the state.

First came *Holocaust survivors, from the detention camps in Cyprus, from *displaced persons camps in *Germany, and from *Bulgaria (37,000), the *Balkans, *Poland (106,000), and *Romania (118,000). In 1949 and 1950, Jews arrived from Libya (31,000), from Yemen and Aden (50,000), and then from Iraq (125,000). In addition, some 45,000 olim came from French North Africa and more than 20,000 from Iran, along with thousands from dozens of other countries. In this wave of aliyah, four communities immigrated to Israel almost in their entirety: the Jews of Libya, Bulgaria, Yemen, and Iraq.

Unlike immigration to other countries, this wave of aliyah included a large number of children and elderly persons, as well as people who were ill, disabled, or in need of public support. Most of the immigrants had fairly little education, and few had Zionist backgrounds. Some came to Israel for ideological reasons, including those who had struggled against the *British Mandate authorities for the right to move to *Palestine, but the vast majority left their countries of origin because they no longer felt physically and economically secure. European immigrants comprised both refugees who did not want to or could not return to their countries of origin and Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe who were worried about the rise of *communism and the nationalization of the private economy. Those from the Middle East and North Africa were escaping the physical threat of *pogroms, discriminatory economic and social policies, and the ramifications of the ongoing *Arab-Israeli conflict. They were drawn, too, by the hope of full equality in the Jewish state. At the time Israel was almost the only immigration option these Jews had, and its sophisticated immigration system facilitated the process. In Israel, various ideological explanations were given for aliyah from these two regions: The European olim were described as “remnants” and survivors, and their experience of the Holocaust proved that the Zionist solution was correct. The Jews of Islamic countries were said to have immigrated because of persecution and a religious-*messianic conception that identified the State of Israel with the messianic redemption.

Israel suffered from severe housing shortages while absorbing these olim, and for many months and sometimes years, tens of thousands of people, most of them from Islamic countries, lived in tents and shacks in temporary camps known as ma'abarot. This experience left severe scars on Israeli society. Despite these hardships, this wave of aliyah played a formative role in shaping Israeli society: It doubled the population; broadened the distribution of Jewish settlement by boosting the population of preexisting localities and establishing new localities throughout the country, including some three hundred *agricultural settlements; and determined the main outlines of Israeli society for decades to come.

The social and cultural traits of different immigrant groups, especially those from Islamic countries, evoked anxiety for the future development of a unified Israel's culture. For this reason the country adopted what was later termed a “melting pot” policy: Immigrants were strongly encouraged to drop the unique elements of their traditions and to adopt the *Ashkenazi culture that prevailed at the time. The melting pot policy applied to all olim, but especially those from Islamic countries, because their Arab culture was perceived as inferior and antiquated and was also identified with the Arab enemy. The policy extended to all aspects of the immigrants' lives: from forms of settlement and employment to personal hygiene, family planning, and education. The most dramatic fight in the history of immigrant absorption in Israel was waged in the 1950s over the education of immigrant children, particularly the Yemenites. What made this policy unique was its intensity and its all-encompassing nature. Criticism of the negative effects of this policy ultimately brought about its replacement by a more pluralistic absorption policy that recognized the rights of the various groups of olim to cultural autonomy. Demands for immediate change were dropped in favor of an expectation of slower change, gradual adoption of the values of Israeli society, and eventual integration into Israeli society.

The second wave of aliyah lasted two decades. It included the arrival of more than 400,000 Jews from North Africa, especially Morocco and Tunisia, and peaked in 1954–56 and 1961–64. The olim were motivated by apprehension regarding the French withdrawal from North Africa and the transfer of rule to Muslims belonging to nationalist movements, as well as by hopes of full equality and an improved financial status in Israel. During those years 150,000 Jews who had left Eastern Europe due to communist regimes also arrived in Israel. For about a decade (1951–61), Israel instituted a selective policy regarding aliyah from North Africa, which gave preference to young, healthy people and kept out families with elderly or ill members or large numbers of children. The rationale for this policy was the country's severe economic plight and a desire to have the North African olim carry out the national task of settling the periphery. Another explanation claims that the selective policy also reflected fear of the influence of North African Jews on Israeli society and culture, as well as a desire to absorb them gradually and perhaps even to keep them away from influential positions in central Israel.

Indeed, North African immigrants played a crucial role in building up the Israeli periphery. Some 70% were placed in moshavim and new towns (“development towns”) established in the north and south in a policy known as “ship to village”; meanwhile, the olim from Eastern Europe settled mainly in preexisting localities in central Israel. For the first time in the history of Zionist settlement, olim were forced to live in certain places, and the new system of administration made it hard for them to move elsewhere, even though this effort ran counter to the Israeli policy of “blending the exiles.”

The third wave of aliyah started in the 1970s with immigration from the *Soviet Union (150,000 olim) and peaked in the 1990s with the disintegration of the Soviet Union and the arrival of close to a million immigrants, most from the European republics (Russia and *Ukraine), with a minority from the Asian republics, especially Uzbekistan. The main motivation was the collapse of the regime and the crisis in the socioeconomic order of the former Soviet Union. Additional factors were entry restrictions imposed by destination countries in the western world and Israel's open-door policy. This wave was characterized by small families and relatively few children, as well as a high proportion of single-parent families. The newcomers' level of education was high compared with the receiving society in Israel; a sizable percentage of the olim were scientists, academics, and members of the liberal professions. For the first time in the history of aliyah, a significant percentage of the immigrants were non-Jews entitled to immigrate under the 1970 amendment to the Law of Return, which extended citizenship rights and benefits to non-Jewish family members of persons eligible for immigration. In the early 1990s, non-Jews accounted for about one-tenth of olim; by the late 1990s they accounted for around 40%.

In terms of culture, these immigrants proved thoroughly secular, with a strong and solid Russian identity and only a weak affinity for the Jewish collective. They were not willing to give up their Russian culture and were in no rush to adopt the local Israeli mores. For its part, Israeli society turned out to be less cohesive and more pluralistic than earlier. These circumstances led to tolerance for and legitimation of the sectorial political parties founded by the immigrants. After a decade, it was clear that the Russian-speaking olim had developed an Israeli identity based on a sense of belonging to the Jewish people, while also preserving Russian culture and forming a Russian community in Israel.

The Russian-speaking olim underwent “direct absorption,” which included economic grants and limited intervention by the government. The geographical distribution of the immigrants was correlated with their educational and employment capital. Young people with needed professions settled on the outskirts of the metropolitan areas and in the leading peripheral cities; older and less educated segments of this population settled in poor neighborhoods and peripheral localities, where they found readily available and relatively cheap housing, as the Israeli government increased the construction of public housing in the periphery. This immigration boosted the Jewish population by about 20%, contributed to substantial economic growth, and even influenced local culture.

Concurrently with the Russian-speaking aliyah, close to 60,000 olim came from *Ethiopia, forming a relatively small but unique community within Israeli society. Some 16,000 arrived in the 1980s, and more than 40,000 came in the 1990s and later. Most arrived in two waves that are known as "Operation Moses" and "Operation Solomon." The Ethiopian immigration was delayed for many years, mainly because of doubt as to the Jewishness of the community members. Until they moved to Israel, most Ethiopian Jews were villagers in transition from the country to the city; most adults lacked even an elementary education. The Ethiopian Israelis are an especially young population group because of their high rate of fertility. Community members settled mainly in medium-sized cities in the central and southern regions, where they tend to be concentrated in certain neighborhoods.

A retrospective examination of the settlement patterns of immigrants in Israel shows substantial consistency over the sixty-year history of the state. A strong population with high human capital, generally of European origin, settled in the large and medium-sized cities of central Israel, especially on the coastal plain, whereas the less educated population, mainly from Asia and North Africa, was concentrated in the geographical and social periphery. The advantages of living in the central region rather than the periphery are manifested in a growing socioeconomic gap that typifies Israeli society in its sixth decade. ESTHER MEIR-GLITZENSTEIN

Israel, State of: Judicial System. The judicial system of Israel plays a prominent role in the life of the country, which is reflected in both legal and nonlegal discourse. Formally, the judiciary is one of Israel's three branches of government, together with the legislative (the *Knesset, the Israeli parliament) and the executive (the Israeli government) branches. The main principles regarding the powers and functions of the judiciary are stated in "Basic Law: Judiciary," which establishes the judicial system's magistrate courts, district courts, and the Supreme Court. In addition, there are specialized tribunals vested with judicial power, such as religious courts, military courts, and labor courts. Judges are elected by a special committee comprising two ministers, one of whom is the Minister of Justice; two Knesset members; two representatives of the Bar Association; and three Justices of the Supreme Court; this committee enjoys substantive independence. The general structure and powers of the judicial system originate from laws enacted during the time of the *British Mandate in Palestine. When Israel was established, it decided to adopt a principle of continuity regarding the legal system that existed in Mandatory Palestine, subject to necessary changes. This principle was also applied to the judicial system (which from this point in time was no longer subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the British Privy Council).

The most important judicial institution in the country is the Supreme Court. Formally speaking, it is the last and final appellate instance in both criminal and civil affairs. In addition, it acts also as a court of first instance when it hears public law petitions in its capacity as the High Court of Justice. Over the years, the precedents of the Israeli Supreme Court have defined fundamental principles of the Israeli legal system, including a judicial-based unwritten bill of rights. This tradition owes much to justices with profound awareness of the importance of rights and democratic values (particularly, Simon Agranat, Haim Cohn, and Aharon Barak). These precedents have proved very important because Israel did not adopt a formal written constitution in its formative years, due to political disagreements. To fill this void, the Knesset decided to enact a series of basic laws, which would eventually be consolidated into a formal constitution. Gradually, the Supreme Court has abandoned, by way of interpretation, the legal tradition of legislative sovereignty and adopted the view that the basic laws can also serve as a basis for judicial review of legislation contradicting them. This move, as well as the Supreme Court's general activist policy of judicial review of government decisions, is controversial. In general, the Supreme Court is both valued for its contribution to public life in Israel and highly criticized as operating outside the legitimate boundaries of judicial decision making. The critics of the Supreme Court argue that, as an unelected institution, it should not interfere in decisions that reflect policymaking and democratic choices of the political majority. In contrast, supporters of the Court's legacy argue that its contribution is indispensable to the protection of human rights and the struggle against government corruption. DAPHNE BARAK-EREZ

Israel, State of: Kibbutz Movement. There are 267 kibbutz communities scattered throughout Israel, from the Lebanon border in the north to the Red Sea in the south. Kibbutzim (plural of kibbutz) members constitute 2.1% (120,000) of the Jewish population in Israel, yet their contribution to the national economy amounts to 40% in agriculture, 7% in industrial output, 9% in industrial export, and 10% in tourism.

The first kibbutz, Degania, was built by a communal *agricultural group in 1910. By 1930, there were 29 kibbutz communities; their number rose to 82 in 1940, 229 in 1960, and 267 in 2009. Their population sizes range from thirty to two thousand residents; the average is about four hundred. Most kibbutzim were formed by members of *Zionist *youth movements, from abroad or in Israel. A large proportion of kibbutz communities are located on or near Israel's borders.

Kibbutz ideology drew on Zionist, socialist, and humanist values. The founders' stated goals were to cultivate the land from the wild, to build a Jewish national entity in the Land of Israel, and to create a just society. The ideology and goals led to three formative principles: (1) equality among kibbutz members as well as among kibbutzim, from which stemmed other values, such as giving equal worth to all work and providing assistance within the kibbutz and among kibbutzim; (2) direct democracy, which meant that all members participate in decision making and there is rotation of officeholders; and (3) self-labor, which ensured there was no exploitation of cheap paid labor. This principle of not using outside labor has been preserved, on the whole, in the education branches of the movement but less so in areas of production.

Because of differences in their ideals, kibbutz communities formed different umbrella organizations. The first two, Ha-Kibbutz ha-Meuḥad and Ha-Kibbutz ha-Artzi, were established in 1927 and a third, Hever ha-Kevutzot, in 1929. A fourth movement, of religious kibbutzim, was formed in 1935. In 1951 from an ideological split in Ha-Kibbutz ha-Meuḥad and a merger with Hever ha-Kevutzot came a new movement, Ihud ha-Kevutzot Veba-Kibbutzim. These movements reunited in 1980 to form the United Kibbutz Movement. Later, in 1999, they were joined by the Artzi movement to constitute the Kibbutz Movement, with 251 kibbutzim; the religious kibbutz movement, with 16 kibbutzim, remains separate.

KIBBUTZ ECONOMY: The kibbutz economy in the first half of the twentieth century was based primarily on agriculture. Not until the 1960s did the tempo of industrialization increase because of economic and demographic conditions that hampered agricultural development. This industrial growth produced debate about the way in which industry should be organized to preserve kibbutz values, leading to a unique organizational structure. By 1981, there were 320 kibbutz industrial plants, only 34% of which had been established before 1960. In the mid-1980s, Israel's economic crisis affected the kibbutzim, and many required governmental help to survive. This move, criticized by the Israeli public, had a demoralizing effect on kibbutz members. The kibbutzim began recovering economically only in the twenty-first century.

FAMILY AND EDUCATION: The traditional kibbutz community provided all major household services. Meals were cooked and served in the communal dining hall; clothes were cleaned, ironed, and mended in the communal laundry. Women and men were economically independent of each other and almost all women belonged to the work force, although there tended to be a gendered division of labor. Economic rewards were equally distributed, regardless of the nature of one's occupation. Yet these structural changes did not solve "the problem of the woman member" (meaning her inferior status).

Until the 1980s, children in most kibbutzim slept in children's houses, situated in the center of the kibbutz, where they led their own autonomous lives, had better living conditions than did the adults, and could be protected from outside attacks. Parents had a minimal role in their children's education, which was mostly overseen by carefully selected kibbutz educators. This revolutionary approach to child rearing, originally designed to liberate women from the major responsibilities of child care and to circumvent what was perceived as the damaging impact of traditional family structures, has now been abandoned in all kibbutzim. Children live with their parents, and increasingly family units have assumed many communal services and activities, preferring to prepare their own meals, purchase and launder their own clothing, and pursue independent social and leisure activities.

CULTURAL CONTRIBUTIONS: The kibbutzim had a great impact on the formation of Israeli culture. In 1937, the first art museum was opened at Kibbutz Ein-Harod, and forty museums and galleries have been opened in kibbutzim since then. In 1939, the kibbutz movement inaugurated two publishing houses (Sifriat Ha-Poalim and Ha-Kibbutz Ha-Meuḥad). Merged in 1999, the new press publishes Israeli literature, children's books, poetry, encyclopedias, and philosophy. Two teachers colleges were opened, the first in 1940 (Seminar ha-Kibbutzim), and the second in 1950 (Oranim), initially for kibbutz educators and later for any student. The kibbutz movement has its own choir (since 1957), orchestra (since 1970), theater (since 1964), and *dance group (since 1964); all of them perform in Israel and abroad. The kibbutz movement's contribution to Israeli folk dancing was enhanced by the inauguration in 1944 of the yearly folk dance convention at Kibbutz Dalia.

Kibbutz writers (like Amos *Oz), poets (like Nathan Yonatan), composers (like David Zehavi, Michael Wolpe), and painters and sculptors (like Shmulik Katz) are well known (see LITERATURE, POETRY, and ART entries).

CHANGES: Over the years, many changes have been introduced in the kibbutz way of life, stemming mainly from the combination of a weakening collective ideology, changes in the economic situation of kibbutzim, and transformations in Israeli society. Kibbutzim have adjusted, but at a cost. One area of change, which might be considered a form of integration with the surrounding society, is the use of paid labor in kibbutz production and education. This practice has undermined the important kibbutz value of self-labor. Similar in consequences was the decision to open the children's houses to nonkibbutz children, which weakened one of the most important channels for passing on kibbutz values to the next generation. The kibbutz movement has also legitimated and encouraged members' work outside the kibbutz, partnered with nonkibbutz investors in kibbutz enterprises, rented apartments to nonmembers, and built adjacent neighborhoods for people who did not follow its way of life. The kibbutz also has experienced a transition from direct to representative democracy. The main body representing direct democracy in the kibbutz is the general assembly of all members, which now meets less frequently and has been partially replaced by a council of elected members and board of directors.

Another major area of transformation has been the privatization of aspects of kibbutz life. The process actually started in the 1950s with a slow change from the distribution of consumption services according to need to an equal distribution of money to pay for these services, with little consideration of different individual needs (privatization in kibbutz jargon). A bigger step came at the end of the 1990s, when some kibbutzim started to privatize members' earnings; by 2009, about two-thirds of the kibbutzim did so. They are the "differential" or "new" kibbutzim; the other third remain "collective" kibbutzim. A few kibbutzim transferred ownership of houses to their members.

In the 1970s, groups of young people who thought the kibbutz should be more integrated into outside society began to found urban kibbutzim. Kibbutz Reshit was formed in Jerusalem in 1979, Kibbutz Migvan in Sderot and Kibbutz Tamuz in Bet-Shemesh in 1987, and Kibbutz Beit Israel also in Jerusalem in 1992. In addition, several communal groups have been formed. These communities are small, totaling 1,500–2,000 members, and earn their livelihood mainly from educational community activities.

FUTURE OF THE KIBBUTZ: Kibbutzim are slowly moving from a welfare to a market society. Members are more independent economically, and there are new forms of membership for their adult children, such as "a member with economic independence." This status allows full participation in kibbutz life but also economic independence with no rights over kibbutz property. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, mutual aid in the kibbutz is more limited, and trends of privatization of property are evident.

The future of the kibbutz movement will depend on the vision of its members, as well as on local and global economic and political processes that will affect strategic decisions that kibbutzim will have to make. Contemporary concerns include the need to find a new meaning and mission, the degree of commitment required of new members, and whether to limit the nonmember population so that members remain the majority. Observers wonder whether kibbutzim will be able to attract entrepreneurs who can develop new ventures that accord with the movement's meaning and mission. Will kibbutzim preserve the community's small size and maintain and develop a rural ecological environment? Will they be able to unite and formulate a common action program that will have a continuing impact on the larger society, or will they merge into neighboring towns (as some government officials have proposed)? These are only a few of the issues that will determine whether twenty-first-century kibbutzim will develop their own unique social economy by updating their communal social and economic way of life or whether they will become ordinary dormitory villages or suburban residential communities.

For further reading, see M. Palgi, "Social Dilemmas and their Solution," in Wirtschaft, Demokratie und soziale Verantwortung, ed. G. W. Wolfgang, P. Pasqualoni, and C. Burtscher (2004), 317–32; and H. Near, The Kibbutz Movement: A History, 2 vols. (1992, 1997).

MICHAL PALGI

Israel, State of: Landscape Architecture. The key to understanding landscape architecture in Israel is its location as an environmental crossroads. Located at the periphery of three continents, it is simultaneously a meeting place of civilizations. The physical environment is small, but of great diversity. *Garden designs of the Mediterranean, desert oasis gardens, and the Middle Eastern bustan all have exerted their influence, as well as garden types and landscape ideals brought by immigrants from more than eighty nations, especially those from *Central and *Eastern Europe. A language of distinct Israeli landscape design is evolving that speaks eloquently in stone, is frugal with water, uses indigenous and naturalized vegetation, is intimate in scale, and creates places that are intensively used. Landscape design has oscillated between an appreciation and preservation of the indigenous landscape and the desire for transformation and a "greening of the desert."

A professional tradition of landscape design began in the 1920s and 1930s with a wave of immigrant designers, largely from *Germany. These pioneers included Shlomo Oren-Weinberg, Itzhak Kutner, Meir Victor, Avraham Karavan, Yechiel Segal, and Haim Latte. Their designs were distinguished by social idealism, and they engaged in ideological debates over design principles, the nature of community, and the creation of a symbolic landscape. Their work set a tone and standard for subsequent design. Landmark projects included Haifa's Gan Benjamin by Yechiel Segal, Gan Ha'atzmaut in Tel Aviv by Avraham Karavan, and Ramat ha-Nadiv by Shlomo Oren-Weinberg. A gardeners' association was formed in the 1930s, followed by the Israel

Association of Landscape Architects in 1951; professional education for landscape architects was inaugurated at the Technion in Haifa in 1975.

The next era was dominated by the partnerships of Lippa Yahalom and Dan Zur, Zvi Miller and Moshe Blum, and Joseph Segal (son of Yechiel) and Zvi Dekal. Their collective work paralleled the establishment of the state and its accompanying mass immigration and construction. Most modern landscape design has been sponsored by the public sector, and there is little private garden tradition. The unique Israeli communal models of the *kibbutz and moshav evolved distinct garden forms, as did new development towns. In addition, landscape architects were instrumental in the design of national parks, college and university campuses, roads, landscape preservation, afforestation, and regional planning.

Yahalom and Zur, the 1998 winners of the Israel Prize, designed projects that became national icons, including the grave of David *Ben-Gurion in the Negev desert at S'de Boker and *Yad Vashem's Valley of the Destroyed Communities. After the Six Day War in 1967, attention turned to *Jerusalem, and the Jerusalem National Park, a greenbelt of open spaces encircling the Old City, was designed. In the 1970s, a younger generation, including Gideon Sarig and Shlomo Aronson, established their landscape architectural practices. Jerusalem's Haas-Sherover promenade is Aronson's signature work.

In sixty years, Israel transformed itself from a developing to a prosperous nation. Landscape designers now confront problems of density, affluence, and the preservation of a rapidly disappearing traditional agricultural and rural landscape. For further reading, see K. Helphand, Dreaming Gardens: Landscape Architecture and the Making of Modern Israel (2002).

KENNETH HELPHAND

Israel, State of: Military and Paramilitary Bodies. The modern *Zionist nationalist experience that emerged in Europe in the late nineteenth century resulted in various phenomena that had hitherto been foreign to contemporary Jewish culture. A prominent example was the use of force to achieve goals of the collective, in this case the new Jewish national community.

Zionism sought an organized military entity. At the same time, as a result of the many centuries during which Jews abstained from such activities, movement leaders had doubts about military and paramilitary projects and feared those engaged in them. During the first six decades of Zionism (1880s–1940s), the intensifying Jewish–Arab struggle in *Palestine, the *Holocaust, and the 1947–49 war over Palestine brought about a complete transformation in attitudes toward the use of force. This process continued into Israeli statehood as well. After a series of wars that Israel regarded as successful (the War of Independence, the Sinai campaign, and the Six Day War), the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) emerged as one of the country's leading social and cultural forces (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1948); (1956–1967)).

EARLY HISTORY: During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Jewish "self-defense" organizations emerged in *Russia, foreshadowing the formation of such groups in Palestine during the last years of *Ottoman rule. In September 1907, young Eastern European immigrants who had recently arrived in Palestine established a clandestine group that aimed to replace the Palestinian Arabs working as guards in Jewish settlements with Jews and to contribute to Jewish security in the country as a whole. Group members gave themselves the name Bar Giora, after one of the most extreme *Zealots active during the end of the *Second Temple period. The group, which was limited to some twenty members, was led by Israel Shochat and Alexander Zaid. Its commitment to the security of the Jewish collective was unprecedented in Palestine at that time, as were the criteria for new members, which included physical fitness, height, horsemanship, gunmanship, and agricultural capabilities.

Also in 1907, members of Bar Giora joined a group of women who had begun an agricultural collective farm at Sejera in the Lower Galilee, led by Mania Wilbushewicz. The meeting between Shochat and Wilbushewicz resulted in marriage, as well as the establishment of Ha-Shomer in April 1909. As a clandestine paramilitary organization, Ha-Shomer was a community of families engaged in guarding and livestock herding. Its members were also connected to the political platform of the radical Zionist socialist party Poalei Tziyon (Workers of Zion). This connection and the organization's political subordination to the party were hallmarks of paramilitary organizations in Palestine's Jewish Yishuv*. In fact, Ha-Shomer intensified what had been Bar Giora's linkage of agriculture and Jewish settlement; this connection became a major practical and symbolic motif of the paramilitary security organizations of the organized Jewish community in Palestine until 1948 and, to some degree, after 1948 as well.

Even so, Israel Shochat had difficulty relinquishing his personal control of the organization, which, in conjunction with the dramatic changes in Palestine after World War I, made Ha-Shomer irrelevant. The organization's golden age between 1909 and 1914 came to an end with the general paralysis that gripped Palestine during the war and Shochat's expulsion from the country by the Turks, ostensibly because he was a Russian citizen. Moreover, the Jewish leadership feared the influence of Shochat and his associates, who did not conceal their arrogance as the Yishuv's exclusive bearers of arms before WWI and the British conquest of Palestine.

*BRITISH MANDATE PERIOD: The legalization of the Yishuv reflected in the *Balfour Declaration (November 1917) and the establishment of the Zionist Commission (April 1918) as the Yishuv's representative to the British authorities in Palestine resulted in a major change in the self-perception of Palestine's Jewish community. The focal points of Zionism's alliance with Great Britain and the concrete political goal of a Jewish state were institutionalized in the Mandate over Palestine, which *Britain received from the League of Nations in 1922. A clear sign of Zionist-British cooperation was the enlistment of Jews in general, and Zionists in particular, in the British army. For the first time ever, Jewish soldiers serving in a modern formal military framework bore Jewish symbols and a Jewish flag. This initiative was devised by a rising Zionist leader, Ze'ev (Vladimir) Jabotinsky. After the establishment of the Zion Mule Corps Battalion in the spring of 1915, in which Yosef Trumpeldor served as a deputy battalion commander, the British established an additional three battalions: the 38th (Jewish immigrants from Russia), the 39th (Jewish immigrants from North America), the 40th (volunteers from Palestine), and the 42nd (reserves). The soldiers of these battalions, which collectively were known as the "Jewish" or the "Hebrew" Legion, took part in the fighting during WWI in Palestine and its surroundings.

The British dismantled the battalions after the war, leaving only the 40th battalion. In 1920, the battalion was referred to as the "First Battalion of Judea" and was commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Eliezer Margolin. In May 1921, after a new wave of Jewish-Arab violence, the British dismantled the battalion out of concern that it might lose control over it. For many future leaders of the Yishuv, the *Jewish Legion provided a military training framework that enabled them to consolidate political strength and return to Palestine, from which some had been expelled during the war. This was true of David *Ben-Gurion, Itzhak Ben Zvi, Eliyahu Golomb, Dov Hoz, and many others.

Against this background, the newly formed workers' party Ah'dut ha-Avodah (Labor Unity), which resulted from the merger of Poalei Tziyon and a group of nonpartisan workers, established a new paramilitary body, the Haganah. The party's 1920 congress at Kinneret decided to take a different approach from the two earlier groups, Bar Giora and Ha-Shomer. The Haganah would not be a closed, elitist group but rather a national militia open to all Jews in Palestine, under the authority of the Zionist movement and the Jewish Yishuv. As early as December 1920, with the establishment of the General Federation of Jewish Workers in Palestine, Ah'dut ha-Avodah placed the Haganah under General Federation's authority. In August 1929, this authority was transferred to the newly established Jewish Agency for Palestine. All of these supervisory organizations were legal, and the Haganah was directed through a conscious political process by a national command that, from the 1930s onward, represented the political left and right wings of the Jewish Yishuv. Beginning in 1937, the national command was headed by a member of Mapai (Mifletet Poalei Eretz Israel [Palestine Workers Party], a merger of Ah'dut ha-Avodah and Ha-Poel ha-Tzair), which controlled the politics of the Zionist movement, the Jewish Agency, the organized Jewish Yishuv, and the State of Israel until the late 1970s. This structure ensured that the Haganah had no independent policy; rather, its policy was dictated by the civilian political institutions controlling it.

From the time the Haganah was established, some thought the organization should be run in cooperation with the Mandate authorities. Commanders in the field rejected this approach, warning that the Yishuv could not risk losing control of the organization if situations arose where British and Zionist interests were at odds. In the 1920s, the Haganah was a federation of local cells, each engaged in local security; however, when violence erupted in the summer of 1929, the Haganah failed to address it effectively. This failure, along with the widening schism between Jews and Arabs and the feeling that the establishment of a Jewish state was just around the corner (with the Peel Commission's partition plan of 1937), led Yishuv leaders to transfer the responsibility for regular security to the British. They then began to transform the Haganah into an organization capable of providing solutions to a wide variety of situations – ranging from opposing outbreaks of Arab violence to fighting against British operations that were not in Zionist interests. At the same time, the Haganah began preparing to become the conventional army of the soon-to-be established Jewish state.

The Yishuv took a disastrous detour from this course with its rebellion against the British *White Paper policy, from October 1945 through August 1946. During this period the Haganah engaged in guerilla actions and terrorist attacks, which were entrusted to the Palmakh (Plugot Makhatz [shock forces]), the organization's standing army since May 1941. These activities came at the expense of investment of resources and training in other Haganah forces, which were organized as field forces and other groupings. This emphasis caused some of the organizational and equipment difficulties faced by the Haganah at the outbreak of Israel's War of Independence in late 1947.

The error of the rebellion was counterbalanced by the well-organized enlistment of some 30,000 men and women of the Yishuv in the British army between 1939 and 1946. As a result of this mobilization, driven by the Jewish Agency in general and the director of its Political Department, Moshe Shertok (Sharett), in particular, recruits served in all branches of the imperial army. The high point of this process was reached in September 1944 with the establishment of the Jewish Fighting Brigade, all of whose soldiers and most of whose commanders were Jews, and which carried a Hebrew flag and symbols. Mass enlistment had three goals: to assist Britain in defending itself and defending Palestine, to provide direct and indirect assistance to European Jewry, and to ensure future political and military profit when the recruits returned to Palestine. Indeed, these veterans of the British army subsequently made a decisive contribution to the Haganah and the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF).

1948 AND AFTER: By the winter of 1947–48, the Haganah had an impressive military-organizational foundation. Even before the end of the Mandate and the establishment of the State of Israel, the organization had transformed itself from a semi-legal militia into a modern army. By April 1948, the Haganah was operating a framework of brigades that succeeded in defeating the Palestinians before Israel was even established (May 15, 1948). In accordance with the "National Structure Order" of November 1947, the Haganah built an army that was based on the field forces, which were organized in regional units; the Palmakh; and new recruits. By May 1948, this army had twelve brigades, a nucleus of assisting forces (air, naval, and artillery), second-line guard brigades, and service forces. The army was centrally controlled by the General Staff (which was established in 1939) headed by Yaakov Dostrovski (Dori), which itself worked directly with the Jewish Agency Executive and the People's Administration (established in April 1948), which soon became the Provisional Government of Israel. As a result the national command was neutralized and finally dismantled in May 1948.

The IDF was officially established on May 30, 1948, two weeks after the establishment of the state. In late 1948, the IDF consisted of close to one-sixth of all Jews in the country.

Ben-Gurion regarded the army's subordination to the elected government as a necessity. In his opinion, the primary danger came from the political left wing; he and his government were greatly troubled by the security activism of Mapam (Mifleget ha-Poalim ha-Meukhedet [United Workers Party]), which included the United Kibbutz Movement and Ha-Shomer ha-Tzair, and the party's decisive political influence on the Palmakh. However, it was the attempt of the Etzel (Irgun Tzvai Leumi [National Military Organization]) to bring a shipment of weapons into Jerusalem in June 1948 that gave Ben-Gurion the opportunity he was waiting for to assert the government's authority over the military. The IDF's sinking of the Altalena, an Etzel weapons' ship, off the coast of Tel Aviv on June 22, 1948, ended attempts to carry out independent military or semi-military action within the borders of Israel.

From its inception, the IDF was also seen as a cultural tool central to the integration of immigrant soldiers into Israeli society. The army experience was conceived of as a "melting pot" that ensured acceptance into Israeli society and provided the necessary common denominator for all Jewish citizens. The IDF even engaged in typically civilian endeavors such as education, immigrant absorption, settlement, and agriculture. If Israel had not also possessed counterbalancing social forces, the army could have easily become a threat to Israeli democracy. One example that demonstrates this potential was the government's failed attempt to use the army to break the seamen's strike of 1951. Another was the General Staff's uncompromising position toward Levi Eshkol's government, which, in May–June 1967, was hesitant about accepting the generals' calls to go to war.

Israel's frequent wars have ensured that defense has remained the dominant line item in the government budget. This reality, in conjunction with other factors outlined earlier, has made the Chief of General Staff a major figure with significant political power. This has been especially true when the position has been filled by officers of exceptional charisma who are associated with particular political ideologies. The most prominent Chiefs of General Staff have been Moshe Dayan (1953–58) and Yitzhak *Rabin (1964–68). Israel's military success in the Sinai War (October–November 1956), the war for water sources in northern Israel (1964–67), and the Six Day War (June 1967) improved the prestige of the army in general and of its senior commanders in particular, often paving their way from the high command to the country's political leadership.

The Yom Kippur War in October 1973 decreased the prestige of the IDF, but did not affect its central place in Israeli society. The reemergence of the conflict within historic Palestine/ Eretz Israel (the First Lebanon War, in which the IDF invaded Lebanon in June 1982 to fight the Palestine Liberation Organization, and the two Intifadas of 1987 and 2000) intensified the army's policing duties. This resulted in an increase in criticism within Israel regarding the manner in which the army dealt with the civil uprising in the occupied territories. Still, the Second Lebanon War of July–August 2006 demonstrated that, despite such criticism, there is still a great willingness to serve in the IDF. It is clear that Israeli citizens across the political spectrum continue to regard it as the cornerstone of Israel's national existence.

THREAT OF SECESSIONISM: From the outset, the Jewish Yishuv regarded secessionism in general and independent military action in particular as an existential threat. That is why Ha-Shomer disappeared, and why separatism henceforth existed only on society's margins. Thus, Ha-Shomer veterans' "Secret Kibbutz" was suppressed in the 1920s, and Haganah-B (1931–37), led by Avraham Tehomi, was eventually reabsorbed into the Haganah. The same was true of the two separatist organizations Etzel and Lehi (Loḥamei Herut Israel [Fighters for the Freedom of Israel]).

The emergence of these last two groups stemmed from the secession of the large revisionist party from the Zionist movement in 1935. Young party members of the Betar movement (Brit Yosef Trumpeldor [Yosef Trumpeldor Covenant]) found their place in Haganah-B, and when this body was dismantled in 1937 they established Etzel. In 1940, Avraham Stern (Yair) and his supporters left this group to establish Etzel b'Israel, which later came to be known as Lehi. Unlike the Haganah, which was militia-like in nature and semi-legal, Etzel and Lehi operated as underground groups. They were characterized by deep secrecy, a small number of members who engaged in acts of terrorism against a strong central government (British), and a commander who also functioned as an independent military leader. Prominent commanders of Etzel included David Raziel (1937–41); Avraham Stern, who established and commanded Lehi (1940–42); and Menahem Begin (1943–48).

Beyond their independent military actions, which Yishuv leaders viewed as dangerous, their primary struggle was aimed at the British, whom the Yishuv had not defined as enemies. During two high points of Zionist–British cooperation, the Arab Revolt (1936–39) and World War II, the secessionist groups operated against the British. Etzel ceased operations against the British at the outbreak of the war but resumed them in 1944, when Begin concluded that the group had no purpose without an independent policy. They took this approach even as the Jewish–Arab war intensified in the winter of 1947–48; subsequently they refused to accept state authority in Jerusalem, which had not yet been incorporated into Israel. From its perspective, the organized Yishuv had good reason to use force against these groups during and after WWII. The State of Israel continued this policy, and those who did not agree to be disarmed willingly (like Begin and his followers) were later disarmed by force.

The Israeli government implemented the same policy against a number of other attempts at paramilitary secessionism during the 1950s (the “Tzrifin Underground” and the Lehi veterans who assassinated Israel Kastner in 1957). Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, who had helped lead Lehi (with Nathan Yelin-Mor and Israel Eldad) after Stern’s death, decisively suppressed the Israeli settlers’ Jewish underground in the occupied territories in 1984. In the summer of 2005, during Israel’s unilateral disengagement from the Gaza Strip, it was also made clear that independent military action outside the framework of the IDF would not be tolerated. Contemporary observers wonder if Israeli society will continue to pass this test in the future. For further reading, see N. Bethell, The Palestine Triangle (1979); J. Haller, The Birth of Israel, 1945–1949 (2003); E. Luttwak, The Israeli Army (1974); B. Morris, Righteous Victims, A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–1999 (1999); and P. A. Pentland, Zionist Military Preparations for Statehood Strategies, 1920–1948 (1976).

MOTTI GOLANI

Israel, State of: Military Roles of Women. Israel is one of the few countries with a mandatory military draft for women. The 1949 Defense Service Law mandated the conscription of women to maximize available human resources for protecting the recently founded State of Israel and to take advantage of the army’s role as a melting pot in which diverse individuals would be integrated into a united society.

The presence of women also strengthened the image of the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) as an army of the people.

Women had served in Jewish defensive forces in the Yishuv*. They were members of Ha-Shomer (1909); participated in the Haganah (1920); were conscripted into the British army during World War II; and volunteered in the Palmakh (1941), where they trained in battle and fought in the *War of Independence (1948). Such activities fed a myth of gender equality in pre-Israel society. In fact, most women took on gender-related roles, and during the War of Independence, all women, including female fighters, were given jobs on the home front. Nevertheless, women’s defense activities and the mandatory integration of women in the IDF contributed to the image of Israel as an egalitarian society.

The IDF, like all armies, is essentially a masculine institution, and its hierarchy and organizational structure create marked gender differences. In Israel, as elsewhere, the army is a central force in building a male-dominant society and in reproducing such hierarchy in civilian society. It is unclear, therefore, whether women’s army service constitutes the implementation of gender equality or whether it actually intensifies gender inequality. For one thing, there are significant differences between male and female military obligations: Women serve two years, whereas men must serve for three years; most women are free from reserve duty; and it is relatively easy for women to receive exemption from service for religious reasons.

The IDF, established in May 1948, was modeled after the British military. Thus, the IDF Women’s Corps was modeled after the Auxiliary Territorial Service (ATS), the women’s branch of the British army. Since there is no Men’s Corps in the IDF (the different corps are determined according to soldiers’ training and responsibilities), the Women’s Corps defined female soldiers by gender rather than military role. Furthermore, army policies from the 1950s until the 1980s prohibited female soldiers from combat roles and assigned them primarily to support positions or jobs perceived as feminine, such as clerical work, instruction, and social work. Women’s lesser roles restricted their ability to advance to senior army ranks, reduced their presence among the people who make decisions and determine priorities, and relegated them to second-class membership in a male organization under male governance.

After the *Yom Kippur War (1973), because of a serious shortage in human resources, new professions became open to women, thereby freeing men for combat roles. Beginning in the mid-1970s, female soldiers demanded additional opportunities. Social changes in Israel during the 1980s affected the IDF as well, and the army allowed women access to various technical and instructional positions relating to combat professions (such as serving as instructors in the Military Infantry Corps).

In November 1995, Israel’s Supreme Court made a precedent-setting and highly publicized ruling regarding the petition submitted by Alice Miller. In that decision, the High Court ruled that the IDF must allow women to volunteer for the Israeli Air Force Flight School. This paved the way for conscription of women for combat roles in the border police, the Cannon Corps, and the anti-aircraft division and opened the prestigious naval course to women, among other changes. In 2001 the Women’s Corps was dissolved and the Women's Affairs Advisory established. In January 2000 the Knesset amended the Defense Service Law, opening all army positions to women, including combat positions. From a practical perspective, however, this amendment has had complex repercussions. Only a small percentage of women in the IDF serve in positions that were once only open to men. These female soldiers sometimes adopt masculine behavior, and men sometimes tend to see these jobs as women's work.

Masculinity therefore remains an identifying mark of the IDF. Women are a minority in the army (they comprise one-third of soldiers in basic training and between one-fifth and one-third of junior officers); they can be excused from army duty for reasons including marriage, motherhood, conscience, and religion. The opposition of Israel's religious parties to religious women serving in the IDF is surprising because religious groups in the Yishuv encouraged female participation in defense activities and religious female fighters were integral in the War of Independence.

Women's military roles in Israel in the first decade of the twenty-first century reflect a two-sided phenomenon. On the one hand, there are female soldiers in the IDF who fulfill combat roles; on the other hand, the number of women who are excused from army service for religious reasons is growing. Is the IDF therefore an egalitarian army of the people? From the perspective of women and gender, the answer is complex. Not all Israeli Jewish women serve in the IDF, and most who do are in positions that support men.

The IDF is a central element in Israeli society, and it is a place where many men make valuable connections that enhance their roles in civilian life. Thus, women's mostly subordinate positions in the army have a negative impact on their post-military opportunities. As gender-related changes in Israeli society and public discourse penetrate the IDF, there may be a greater effort to implement egalitarian values in the military; such transformations would ultimately have an impact on Israeli civilian society as well.

For further reading, see D. Izraeli, "Gendering Military Service in the Israel Defense Forces," Israel Social Science Research, 12(1) (1997): 129–66; S. Cohen, Israel and Its Army: From Cohesion to Confusion (2008); O. Sasson-Levy, Identities in Uniform: Masculinities and Femininities in the Israeli Military (2006); L. Rosenberg-Friedman, "The Religious Women Fighters in Israel's War of Independence," Nashim 6 (2003): 119–47.

LILACH ROSENBERG-FRIEDMAN

Israel, State of: Peace Movement. The Israeli peace movement, a small, decentralized alliance of individuals and groups who represent diverse worldviews, goals, and approaches, is committed to a peaceful resolution of the conflict with the Arab nations and especially the *Palestinians. The movement originated among Jews and Palestinians in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; participants included businessman Yosef Eliyahu Chelouche, who wrote in the Jewish and Arab press about mutual respect, truth and compassion, and a shared destiny. Farmers, workers, and intellectuals took up the call, notably thinker *Aḥad Ha-Am and educator Yitzhak Epstein, who warned Jews against mistreating their Palestinian neighbors. Meetings followed, as well as small joint organizations to encourage mutual understanding.

During the *British Mandate, Jews and Arabs played together in sports clubs; worked together on railroads, at post offices and bakeries, and as civil servants; in Jaffa's citrus orchards, they went on strike together against their common bosses. Several groups, such as the Palestinian Communist party, with Arab and Jewish members, and Ha-Shomer ha-Tzair (The Young Guard), encouraged class solidarity. The latter opposed the creation of an exclusively Jewish state and formed, in the midst of riots and rebellion in 1939, the Jewish-Arab Rapprochement and Co-operation Group, which shared a *Marxist internationalist perspective.

Berit Shalom (Covenant of Peace), founded in 1925, never included more than several dozen activists, but because it was composed of leading intellectuals and high-level government administrators, including Martin *Buber, Judah *Magnes, Arthur Rupin, Gershom *Scholem, and Henrietta *Szold, it exerted influence in the *Yishuv. The group, based on universal and Jewish *ethics with a strong pacifist influence, proposed a binational state in which Jews and Arabs would have identical political representation, despite accusations that it was unrealistic and defeatist. Kedma Mizraḥa (Forward to the East), led by educator David Yellin, emphasized the necessity of Israel's integration into the region, and Ihud (Unity) urged the creation of a Jewish spiritual center in the land. Both warned of the dangers of nationalism. Ihud's publication, Ner (Candle), was a clear voice for reconciliation for more than two decades. All three organizations formed ties with Palestinian individuals and groups.

Another early peace advocate was Uri Avneri, a young soldier. Before the United Nations' partition plan, he called, with Jewish and Palestinian comrades, for the two national movements to form a progressive "Semitic federation" to join in the global anticolonial struggle. As editor of the muckraking Ha-Olam ha-Zeh weekly and as a Knesset member, Avneri has remained, for more than sixty years, a tireless worker for peace.

Even in the midst of the 1948 War of Independence, activists decried the treatment of the Palestinians. Afterward, peace groups focused on the injustices imposed on Arab citizens by the military rule in their townships (which lasted until 1966), called for the return of Palestinian refugees to their homes, and opposed military solutions, including the 1956 Sinai campaign. In the new state's patriotic atmosphere, several pacifists refused military service and were imprisoned. In the early 1950s, Va'ad ha-Shalom ha-Yisraeli (Israeli Peace Committee) advocated neutrality and collected a half-million signatures (one-third of the country's population) against nuclear armaments, but its ties with the USSR limited its impact and within three years it had disbanded. An important new project was founded in 1949 at Kibbutz Givat Haviva, which included educational programs for children and adults, research and curriculum development, and dialogue groups. In 1963 it became the Jewish-Arab Center for Peace and is still active today. The journal New Outlook, founded in 1957 by Simha Flapan, reached the Arab world with its English-language message of cooperation with the Palestinian people. During the late 1950s and early 1960s, activists and intellectuals, including Buber, World Jewish Congress President Nahum Goldmann, and, briefly, high-ranking officials, met with their Arab counterparts in Europe. In 1966, Abie Nathan, a former bombardier, flew a small, white-painted Piper plane, "Peace 1," to Egypt.

His request to meet with President Nasser was denied, but his courage captured the public's imagination. Just before the Yom Kippur War, Nathan's pirate radio station, "Voice of Peace," broadcast popular music and calls for peace from "somewhere in the Mediterranean." Nathan persisted for 20 years and brought toys and medical supplies to the children of Gaza and other war zones.

The Six Day War of 1967 (see ISRAEL: WARS) ushered in a national euphoria, but within days voices were raised against the immorality of the occupation. These came from the New Left group Matzpen (Compass), writer S. Yizhar, playwright Hanoah Levin, and philosopher and scientist Yeshayahu Leibowitz. Leibowitz's sharp tongue and warnings of the dangers of a continued occupation earned him many adherents. During the late 1960s, several peace groups arose from the global student revolt movement, including a group of high school students who refused to serve in the army. At a time when Israeli leaders denied the existence of a Palestinian nation, members of Matzpen, Siah (Dialogue) and the Israeli Black Panthers met with Palestinian radicals. The Panthers connected the treatment of the Palestinians with the lot of Mizrahi Jews, proposing that peace and equality for both groups must go together.

Soon, even members of the Zionist establishment advocated recognizing the Palestinians' right to self-determination. Prominent among them was Lova Eliav, former Secretary General of the Labor Party, who spoke of both Israelis' moral obligation and self-interest in bringing peace in his book, Land of the Hart (1970). Yaakov Arnon, former director of the Finance Ministry; retired generals Mati Peled and Meir Pa'il; and the historians Yaakov Talmon and Yehoshua Arieli joined Eliav and hundreds of activists in new groups such as the Tenua Leshalom Vebithahon (Movement for Peace and Security) to oppose the annexation of territories and to demand direct negotiation with any willing Arab leader or group.

The heavy casualties of the 1973 Yom Kippur War underlined the value of peace, and grassroots groups such as the Israeli Council for Israeli-Palestinian Peace emerged. The council's founders included respected military and political leaders, giving legitimacy to its call to recognize the PLO. They held secret meetings (described in Uri Avneri's memoir, My Friend, the Enemy [1986]) abroad with Palestinian officials, several of whom were assassinated. In 1986, the Knesset barred contact with "terrorists," leading to the imprisonment of several Israelis, including the peace pilot Nathan. Still, the meetings signaled that each side could be a partner for peace, and they established trust and respect that proved important in the coming years.

The peace movement gained force and numbers after the 1977 Likud election victory and Sadat's visit to Israel the same year. A letter signed by 348 combat soldiers and officers demanded that the government seize the opportunity for peace. Tens of thousands joined them, and Shalom Achshav (Peace Now) was born. Concentrating initially on peace with Egypt, the group gradually shifted focus, opposing the spread of settlements and encouraging negotiations with Palestinian leaders. Shalom Achshav grew rapidly because of its humanist Zionist ideology and adherence to the mainstream. Although it was slower to act (it took the group ten days to respond to the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacres) than smaller, more radical groups, it was instrumental in the mass demonstrations (the largest of which drew 400,000 in Tel Aviv) against the Israeli army's complicity. These demonstrations led to the forming of the Kahan committee and the censure of Defense Minister *Sharon. During a 1983 march in Jerusalem, member Emil Grunzweig was murdered by a right-wing activist. In the years of the First Intifada (1987–89,) Shalom Achshav staged protests involving more than 100,000 people and promoted educational activities.

Among the more active groups established at the time, Yesh Gevul (There Is a Limit) comprised hundreds of soldiers who were jailed for their refusal to serve in Lebanon and, later, in the territories. Their actions broadened the public debate about individual obedience and responsibility and influenced the government's withdrawal from Lebanon in 1987 and 2000. Protests were accompanied by Israeli-Palestinian cooperative efforts, including the establishment of the Jewish-Arab village Neve Shalom/Wahat Al-Salam (Oasis of Peace) and its School of Peace, co-publishing by New Outlook and the East Jerusalem paper Al Fajr, conferences on the sources of the conflict and possible solutions, the co-founding of the Alternative Information Center by Israeli and Palestinian activists, and the "Hands around Jerusalem" action by 30,000 Israelis and Palestinians.

During the 1980s groups from specific constituencies emerged, such as women agitating to bring the troops home from Lebanon (Arba Imahot [Four Mothers]). Although many women had important roles in Peace Now and other organizations, they had rarely been involved in the decision-making process of those groups. Activists such as Gila Svirsky and Yehudit Kirstein Keshet and Nashim Beshahor (Women in Black) challenged this exclusion. From the outbreak of the First Intifada, members of Nashim Beshahor, Jewish and Palestinian citizens of Israel, held weekly vigils dressed in black in dozens of locations. They demanded an end to the occupation and showed the importance of Jewish and Palestinian women working together. Although the group has gone through transformations, it has withstood continued harassment and is still active.

In the 1990s, other women's groups such as Bat Shalom (Daughter of Peace) and Reshet (Net) emerged and, in the following decade, the Coalition of Women for Peace and Mahsom Watch (Checkpoint Watch). Integrating feminist and pacifist concerns and practices, empowering women, challenging the "security" ideology, and demanding participation in peace negotiations, women's groups tended to be less hierarchical than the mixed groups and more flexible in their approach. Bat Shalom's close work with a Palestinian women's peace group resulted in the Jerusalem Link. Established in 1994, the Jerusalem Link comprises two women's organizations: Bat Shalom on the Israeli side and the Jerusalem Center for Women on the Palestinian side. The two organizations share a set of political principles, which serve as the foundation for a cooperative model of coexistence. In the 1980s and '90s, Mizrahi activists, also feeling marginalized, formed their own groups: Hamizrah leshalom (East toward Peace) and Hakeshet Ha-Democratit Ha-Mizrahit (Mizrahi Democratic Rainbow) criticized Israeli society and pledged to form a bridge of peace.

The 1993 Oslo peace agreements and *Rabin's and Arafat's handshake ignited disagreements among activists about governmental actions and the peace accords. Paradoxically, at the time of its greatest success, the peace camp faltered and lost credibility. After Rabin's assassination at a 1995 peace rally and the escalating violence, new groups sought a broader approach and outreach. Victor Cygielman and Ziad Abu Zayyad formed The Palestine-Israel Journal, and the women's group Profil Hādash (New Profile) opposed the occupation and military ethos by supporting the "refuseniks," mounting art shows that questioned media and cultural images, and lobbying to stop military training in schools.

With the outbreak of the Second Intifada in 2000 and the collapse of the peace talks, many in the movement despaired, but large numbers of high school students as well as active and reserve soldiers joined Yesh Gevul and the newly formed Haometz Lesarev (Courage to Refuse) to oppose military service. Backed by members of an elite commando unit and pilots, the movement had popular support. Many of the soldiers were women, often arguing against serving in a patriarchal institution; others were Druze. Gradually, new groups focused on direct aid to Palestinians. Money, food, medical and legal assistance, and work harvesting olives and rebuilding demolished homes came from groups such as Ta'ayush (Life in Common) and Yesh Din (There is Justice), which petitioned the Israeli courts. Help standing up to bulldozers and bullets came from groups such as Havad ha-Tziburi Neged Harisat Batim (Israeli Committee against House Demolitions) and the mostly young Anarchistim Neged Hacohma (Anarchists against the Wall), whose protests with the villagers of Bil'in and Ni'ilin lasted several years. The Coalition of Women for a Just Peace, composed of Jewish and Arab women, waged civil disobedience against closures and checkpoints. Other activists broke through a Bethlehem checkpoint, performed street theater, and organized the children's journal Halonot (Windows,) the Hand in Hand bicultural schools, the radio station "All for Peace," the Sulha dialogue groups, and the Bereaved Parents Circle, which brought together family members on both sides who had lost loved ones in the violence.

The Geneva Accords and Hamifkad ha-Leumi (People's Voice), efforts to revive the peace process by Israeli and Palestinian politicians and activists – including former Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, former head of the Shin Bet Ami Ayalon, and Palestinian academic Sari Nusseibeh – proposed two states within the June 4, 1967 borders, with Jerusalem as a common capital. More than a quarter-million Israelis and 150,000 Palestinians signed on.

It is difficult to measure the direct impact of the peace movement, but its mass demonstrations and continuing dialogue and cooperation with the "enemy" have laid the foundation for the peace process and helped change perceptions on both sides. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century a majority of the Israeli public believes that a political settlement is necessary, and many support a two-state solution. This belief, however, has not been translated into political action. In its persistent work for a peaceful and just resolution, the movement has remained a counterbalance to violence and extremism and a beacon of hope.

For further reading, see M. Bar-On, In Pursuit of Peace: A History of the Israeli Peace Movement (1996); G. Feuerverger, Oasis of Dreams (2001); D. Gavron, Holy Land Mosaic (2008); T. Hermann, "The Israeli Peace Movement 1967–1998," in Mobilizing for Peace, ed. B. Kidron (2002); E. Kaufman et al., eds., Bridging the Divide (2006); D. Schulman, Dark Hope: Working for Peace in Israel and Palestine (2007); and G. Svirskey, "The Israeli Peace Movement since the Al-Aqsa Intifada," in The New Intifada, ed. R. Carey (2001). Recent film documentaries include Citizen Nawi (dir. N. Mossek, 2007); Encounter Point (dir. R. Avni and J. Bacha, 2006); and My Terrorist (dir. Y. Cohen, 2002).

ALON RAAB

Israel, State of: Political Institutions. Following the terms of the 1947 United Nations partition resolution, the Jewish community in Palestine (Yishuv*) established the State of Israel on May 14, 1948. Simultaneous with the Declaration of Independence, a Provisional Government was established. It was to remain in office "pending the setting up of duly elected bodies of the State in accordance with a Constitution to be drawn up by a Constituent Assembly."

Nonetheless a written constitution did not emerge. The Constituent Assembly was elected immediately after implementation of the various cease-fire agreements that ended the War of Independence. Because of internal divisions among the delegates, especially on the role that Jewish religious law (halakhah) would play in the new state, the Constituent Assembly never undertook the task for which it was called into existence. Yet, because its members derived their authority directly from the people, the Constituent Assembly was more representative than the Provisional Government, whose members were largely self-selected. The Provisional Government therefore dissolved itself and transferred its powers to the newly elected Constituent Assembly. That body in turn enacted the Transition Law under which it became the first *Knesset (parliament).

ISRAELI POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS: To this day, Israel functions without a formal, integrated written constitution. Its governing arrangements are an outgrowth of the political arrangements that have emerged since independence. At the formal level, the operative governmental structure of Israel can be described easily: Israel is a secular democracy, with a theoretically supreme parliament (the Knesset), a powerful cabinet (the government), a strong independent *judiciary, and a weak, largely ceremonial, president. The operational reality, however, is much more complex.

ISRAELI ELECTORAL SYSTEM: Israel is a parliamentary democracy whose single chamber assembly is elected every four years unless a Knesset majority calls for earlier elections. The 120 members of the Knesset are selected via a nationwide, proportional system. An Israeli votes for a list of candidates, not an individual representative. The voter cannot alter the list prepared by a political party (or the joint list of a group of parties) in any way: The list must be accepted or rejected as a whole. The entire country is treated as a single electoral district, and Knesset seats are allocated in proportion to the strength of the lists at the polls. Any list that receives 2% of the vote is guaranteed some representation in the Knesset. This 2% requirement is the lowest threshold of any democracy using a proportional election system. Moreover, it is easier to form a political party and submit an electoral list in Israel than in any other democratic nation. Only the signatures of 100 citizens and $10,000 are needed to register a new party. The signatures of 1,500 supporters are needed for a new party to submit a list of candidates to compete in a Knesset election.

The combination of electoral rules that facilitate the creation of new parties and electoral lists with the rule guaranteeing at least one seat in the Knesset to any list that receives 2% of the national vote means that Israeli citizens have an extremely wide choice at the polls. In the 2003 elections, for example, there were twenty-seven electoral lists on the ballot, and fifteen parties gained representation in the Knesset.

Citizen participation in Israeli elections is among the highest in the world. About 80% of the eligible voters typically cast ballots. This high turnout is probably due to the fact that the "security issue" has always been an important, salient factor to all Israelis. What the government does has a direct, immediate impact on their lives. Most Israelis are constantly discussing politics in their homes, their workplaces, their schools, and their cafes. Therefore, Israeli elections function in an environment in which an almost bewildering range of policy alternatives are part of a robust, wide-open debate.

THE KNESSET AND THE GOVERNMENT: In a parliamentary democracy like Israel, the people elect their representatives, and the parliament selects the cabinet, which functions as the executive agency. For a cabinet to be installed, the support of at least sixty-one members of the Knesset (a majority of the parliament) is required. Once selected by a Knesset majority, the government remains in office until the next election unless it loses its Knesset support.

Because the Israeli electoral system facilitates a multiparty system, no single party (or party list) has ever achieved a Knesset majority. Therefore, all Israeli governments have been coalitions comprising several parties. Most usually, the government coalition is cobbled together by the leader of the largest single Knesset party (the prime minister-designate) from among the eight to fifteen parties represented in that chamber. To form this coalition, the prime minister-designate must agree to support some of the programs favored by the smaller parties and to assign the administration of certain government ministries to the leaders of those parties. Forming a government involves intense bargaining, much compromise, and considerable skill.

Real, effective power resides in the government, not in the theoretically sovereign Knesset. As is all parliamentary democracies, as long as the government retains its Knesset majority, the cabinet makes all significant policies. The politics of coalition formation explains why governmental policy in Israel is invariably based on bargaining and compromise rather than on the dictates of a single individual or group. The opposition, the parties comprising the minority of the 120 Knesset members, can only criticize; they have no role in the actual policymaking process.

Within the government, all significant decisions require the support of a majority of the ministers comprising the cabinet. The prime minister sets the cabinet's agenda. Because the government's policies are themselves the product of internal bargaining among the coalition parties, the authority of a prime minister is determined by his or her effectiveness in dominating the cabinet and by the ultimate success of the government's policies. Still, on any given issue, the prime minister of the day can lose the support of the coalition partners and of the Knesset majority and be forced to resign or to call new elections.

In September 2000, for example, the Labor Party-led government of Ehud *Barak fell apart over the "security issue" when he failed to reach a comprehensive peace arrangement with the Palestinians. Prime Minister Barak lost his Knesset majority and was forced to call new elections in 2001. He lost that election to the leader of the Likud Party, Ariel *Sharon, who became prime minister when he formed a government based on a Likud-led majority coalition of parties in the Knesset.

THE PRESIDENT: Whereas the prime minister is the most important single policymaker in Israel, the president's role is largely honorific and symbolic. The president symbolizes the sovereign independence of the state, receives the credentials of foreign ambassadors, and makes annual speeches at state holidays. The president does wield some political power because he or she can grant pardons (although that is usually done only with the advice of the prime minister and the minister of justice); in addition, after a national election he or she can select the prime minister-designate (although Israeli law requires the president to go first to the leader of the political party with the most Knesset seats). In the highly politicized Israeli political culture, even these tasks turn the decision of who will be president into a political event.

The Knesset elects the president, by secret ballot, for a period of five years, and he or she may serve no more than two terms. The party that formed the government coalition seeks to control that election as an indication of its leading role in Israel. However, the secret ballot requires it to support an individual widely recognized as embodying the values of Israeli society, even if he or she is not a member of that party. For example, the first president of Israel, Chaim *Weizmann, was selected because of his long leadership of the Zionist movement, even though he was not a member of the then-dominant Mapai (Labor) Party. In 2007, Shimon *Peres, a former prime minister and a Noble Peace Prize laureate, was elected president of Israel.

THE CIVIL COURTS (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: JUDICIAL SYSTEM): Because overt partisan considerations are an inseparable element in the workings of the Knesset, the potential for arbitrary governmental policies is obvious. Given the rampant partisanship of their political system, Israelis value the utility of independent objective and impartial decisions. The civil judiciary is seen as the institutional repository of those values. The authority that accompanies such an assessment gives the Israeli civil judiciary, particularly the Supreme Court, considerable power.

The nonpolitical conception of the civil judiciary is evident in the judicial selection procedures. All members of the Israeli civil judiciary are selected by a nine-member Nominations Committee. The Nominations Committee is chaired by the minister of justice, and it contains one other minister selected by the government of the day, the chief justice of the Supreme Court and two other justices selected by members of that Court, two members of the Knesset selected by secret ballot, and two practicing advocates (lawyers) elected by the Israeli Chamber of Advocates (Bar Association). The Nominations Committee's decisions are by majority vote, and its selections are binding on the president of Israel, who makes the actual appointments. Once appointed, the judges both of the Supreme Court and the lower civil courts hold their offices until the mandatory retirement age of seventy.

The civil court system for handling general legal conflicts is three-tiered. The 29 Magistrates' Courts (with 357 judges) deal with minor criminal offenses and small monetary claims. The 5 District Courts (with 121 judges) hear appeals from the Magistrates' Courts and deal with serious criminal offenses and major civil law suits. The Supreme Court (with fourteen justices) hears appeals from the District Courts and from specialized tribunals like the Labor Court and Housing Court. Sitting as the High Court of Justice, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction over petitions alleging that a governmental action exceeds its legal authority.

It is largely in its capacity as the High Court of Justice that the Supreme Court has assumed the role of protecting the rule of law. From the beginning of the state, the civil courts emphasized the importance of the rule of law and their adherence to those rules. Gradually they expanded their conception of the rule of law. By 1974, it was clear that the Israeli civil courts, especially the Supreme Court, were extending the rule of law to protect human rights.

ISRAEL'S PIECEMEAL CONSTITUTION: This judicial trend dovetailed with an increasing public concern for protecting individual rights against potential arbitrary governmental actions. The public's reaction was reflected in a sustained demand that Israel adopt a formal written constitution to regulate governmental procedures and powers and to enumerate individual rights. The Knesset responded by enacting "Basic Laws" that have codified existing practices and symbols. By 2007, eleven Basic Laws had been enacted: The Knesset (1958); Israel Lands (1960); President of the State (1974); Government (1968); State Economy (1976); Armed Forces (1976); Jerusalem, the Capital of Israel (1980); Judiciary (1984); State Comptroller (1988); Freedom of Occupation (1992); and Human Dignity and Freedom (1992). These Basic Laws do not yet comprise a complete, integrated modern constitution, because they do not specifically mention such vital individual freedoms as free speech, the freedom of religion, and the equal protection of the law. Although Supreme Court decisions have generally protected those vital rights, the Court itself lacks the explicit authority to declare laws unconstitutional (despite a famous 1995 decision claiming that power), so both the nature of those rights and the scope of the courts' authority are not yet legally entrenched.

MARTIN EDELMAN

Israel, State of: Political Parties. Political parties in Israel, as in all democracies, are the key mechanisms linking the public to the governmental policymaking institutions. They help translate popular needs and demands into actual policies and programs and help hold elected rulers accountable to the people they govern. The combination of Israeli electoral and parliamentary rules (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS) has produced a robust democracy: Groups representing all shades of political opinion are encouraged to seek representation in the Knesset, Israel's parliament. A bewildering array of political parties compete for popular support. This complicated situation, however, can be simplified because Israeli parties are highly centralized and disciplined entities. Therefore, Israeli political parties can be discussed in terms of four perennial ideological blocs: center-left; center-right; Jewish Orthodox; and Palestinian (Arab).

CENTER-LEFT POLITICAL PARTIES: Center-left political parties in Israel grew out of the Labor Zionist movement that dominated the politics of the country in the first quarter-century after independence. At that time, Labor Zionist politics was organized around the Histadrut labor union federation and led by the Mapai political party. Mapai's principal rival within Histadrut and Labor Zionist politics generally was Mapam, a more Marxist socialist party. The Israeli polity that emerged after independence was shaped by Mapai's leaders – David *Ben-Gurion, Moshe Sharett, Levi Eshkol, and Golda *Meir – and reflected the party's ideology: Israel developed a democratic socialist political economy and a foreign policy aligned with the western world. By 1968, Mapai had incorporated several of the smaller Histadrut parties into the Labor Party, while Mapam continued its separate existence (see GORDON, AHARON DAVID; and ZIONISM).

In the early-twenty-first century, the largest political party in the center-left bloc remains the Labor Party. Its original socialist ideology has evolved into a political program that supports a capitalist economy with strong social welfare programs. In the post-Cold War era, this party's foreign policy retains a strong orientation toward the United States, and its security policy emphasizes that a permanent peace with the Palestinians can only be based on enforceable agreements.

Mapam was frequently a junior partner in Mapai/Labor government coalitions and gradually modulated its Marxist ideology. In 1992, Mapam joined other center-left parties to form Meretz. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Meretz emphasizes the need for social economic policies that benefit the lower classes, including Palestinian Israelis, and a security policy that recognizes that a permanent peace with Israel's Arab neighbors can only come about through political means. Therefore, Meretz always urges Israel to take the initiative in proposing such arrangements without in any way neglecting the importance of maintaining a strong Israeli defense.

During the last half of the twentieth century, Israel made the transition from a developing nation into an economically prosperous player in the global economy. A highly educated middle class emerged that traced its political orientation to their parents' membership in Labor Zionism. Many of these Israelis coalesced around Shinui. In the twenty-first century, this party's ideology is similar to the Labor Party's social welfare program and to Meretz's approach to national security issues. Shinui is distinguished by its insistence that Israeli governmental policy be based on a complete separation of religion and the state.

Every national election has been contested by small center-left parties that have split off from one of the larger entities or have formed to reflect a newly perceived neglected interest. In the 2006 elections the Pensioners Party won seven seats in the Knesset.

All center-left political parties are committed to the continued existence of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. The former commitment, they believe, requires Israel to maintain a strong defense force. The latter commitment makes them strong proponents of the need to promote and protect individual human rights; they support the general thrust of Israeli Supreme Court opinions on these matters and favor efforts to adopt a written constitution that would entrench *human rights.

CENTER-RIGHT POLITICAL PARTIES: Center-right political parties have evolved from the General Zionist and Revisionist movements in the World Zionist Organization and the Yishuv. The General Zionists advocated free-market economic policies; the Revisionists favored a more nationalist, militant program for establishing a Jewish state in Palestine. After independence, these movements formed the core opposition to the socialist-labor policies advanced by Mapai/Labor governments. To overcome Labor Party dominance, the bulk of the center-right parties formed Likud, and under the leadership of Menachem Begin formed the government after the 1977 elections. Since then, the parties of the center-right have led most Israeli government coalitions.

In the early twenty-first century, Likud remains a major factor in the center-right political bloc. It emphasizes a national security policy based on a strong Israeli military force in the face of continued Arab enmity to the Jewish state's very existence. Likud's suspicions of Arab intentions, however, have not prevented it from reaching agreements with the Arabs, such as the 1979 peace treaty with Egypt.

Precisely because Likud has been willing to reach mutually acceptable agreements with the Arabs, other right-wing parties have formed. Their core belief is that the Jewish people are historically entitled to all of Eretz Yisrael (the Land of Israel) and that the territory Israel occupied after the 1967 Six Day War is necessary for the security of the state. That is why they opposed the Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai required by the Israel-Egypt treaty. Similarly, they continue to oppose any agreement that would require further Israeli withdrawals. Moreover, these Israelis believe that the Arabs continue to seek the destruction of the Jewish state and that therefore no viable peace arrangements are possible. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the National Union Party speaks for most of these Israeli Jews. In the 2006 elections, a subset of these right-wing Israelis representing recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union formed the Yisrael Beiteinu (Israel Is Our Home) party and won twelve seats in the Knesset.

In 2005, Likud Prime Minister Ariel Sharon concluded that the nation's security could best be secured by unilaterally relinquishing Israel's control of the Gaza Strip. Because most center-right Israelis, including a majority of Likud, adamantly opposed this policy, Sharon formed a new party, Kadima. Despite Sharon's incapacitating stroke in early 2006, Kadima won the most seats in that year's Knesset election. Kadima, under the leadership of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, formed a coalition government with Labor and other smaller parties, which turned the Gaza Strip over to the Palestinian National Authority.

All center-right Israeli political parties believe that only a strong military can sustain the continued existence of Israel as a Jewish state. They share a reluctance to negotiate with Israel's Arab neighbors whom they believe continue to seek the destruction of the Jewish state. Although these parties have frequently criticized particular Supreme Court decisions, they remain committed to rule of law principles that they seek to entrench in a written constitution.

RELIGIOUS PARTIES: The Zionist movement was predominantly secular, but a small minority of religious Jews came to believe that the human struggle to re-create a Jewish state in the biblical homeland was not incompatible with the commands of Jewish religious law (halakhah*). This was the origin of the National Religious Party (NRP).

Orthodox Jews believe that divine commands are embodied in halakhah, and therefore its rules cannot be subordinated to secular law. They also believe that Israel, as the Jewish state, must be based on halakhah, for that is what it means (to them) to be Jewish. Now, as in the past, the NRP is willing to cooperate with non-Orthodox Israelis in governing the state, but it is never willing to forego its ultimate objective of creating a polity governed by halakhah. The NRP invariably objects to any policy that it believes violates halakhah.

In the twenty-first century, the NRP adheres to the belief that Jews are divinely commanded to retain control of all of Eretz Yisrael. Members of this party have taken the lead in establishing Israeli settlements in the territory occupied by Israel since 1967. This position has made it impossible for the NRP to join any government coalition formed by the center-left bloc or even Kadima. Instead, in the 2006 elections, the NRP formed a joint list with the right-wing National Union Party that won nine seats in the Knesset.

When the political Zionist movement emerged in the 1890s and began recruiting supporters in Europe and America it was opposed by the vast bulk of Orthodox Jews. They continued to believe that a Jewish state would emerge only from divine intervention. To counter the efforts of the Religious Zionists, these Jews organized the Agudat Israel* movement. In the wake of the Holocaust, the anti-Zionist rabbis who led Agudat Israel recognized the great utility of a Jewish state as a haven and the organization became non-Zionist, rather than anti-Zionist: While not actively participating in the creation of Israel, it ceased its opposition. Over time Agudat Israel realized the benefits of more active participation in Israeli politics and agreed to become a coalition partner in several Israeli governments. However, Agudat Israel's original reservations about an essentially secular government for the Jewish state mean that it continues to refuse a cabinet position.

Before the 1984 elections, Ovadia Yosef, the former Sephardic Chief Rabbi of Israel, formed Shas to represent Orthodox Jews from Arabic-speaking lands. Approximately half of Jewish Israelis are from such areas. Rabbi Yosef claimed they faced discrimination from both the secular parties and the Ashkenazi (European) religious parties. Shas was successful in using the political process to obtain resources for this population, and by 1992 it was the largest religious party in Israel.

Shas has always sought to participate fully in the political process. Its position on security matters – particularly Israeli retention of the occupied territories – has been more ambiguous than that of the NRP. That ideological position, plus the size of its Knesset delegation, has made Shas a key player in the cabinet coalition process. As an Orthodox party, Shas has sought to use its political power to expand the role of halakhah in government policy, and it has frequently taken the lead in opposing Supreme Court decisions to the contrary.

The religious parties are committed to the continued existence of Israel as a Jewish state. They are united in the belief that such a state, to be truly Jewish, must be governed by halakhah. They seek to increase the role of Orthodox Jewish religious practices in the laws and policies of the state. That is why they remain adamantly opposed to a written constitution. They fear that having a human-made document as the supreme law of the land would undermine the authority of halakhah in Israel.

PALESTINIAN PARTIES: Palestinian Israelis comprise approximately 20% of the Israeli population. They exercise the franchise at only a slightly lower rate than their fellow citizens. Yet, Arabs are isolated from the mainstream of Israeli life; their political effectiveness is limited by the Jewish nature of the state and by the state's omnipresent security concerns. Only one Palestinian Israeli has been appointed as a Supreme Court justice, and the first Arab cabinet minister (a member of the Labor Party) was appointed in 2007.

Although Palestinian Israelis vote for and are members of mainline parties like Kadima, Labor, Likud, and Meretz, most support Palestinian parties. The names of these organizations have changed over time, but they still represent four persistent orientations: the Israeli Arab, communist, nationalist, and Islamist streams. The members of the Israeli Arab stream accept their status as a minority group in the Jewish state. Their core demand is for full equal citizenship. Because Palestinian Israelis have never been accorded such treatment, their politics are frequently difficult to distinguish from that of the Arab parties. In the 2006 national elections, the United Arab/Ta'al joint list reflected this outlook; it won six seats in the Knesset. The members of the communist stream emphasize a class orientation to politics. They do not accept the ethnic (Jewish) character of Israel and seek its transformation into a completely secular democratic state. In the 2006 national election, this outlook was represented by Hadash; it won three seats in the Knesset. Hadash, which literally means "new" in Hebrew, is an acronym for The Democratic Front for Peace and Equality.

The members of the nationalist stream see themselves as sharing a common identity with the Palestinians in the West Bank, Gaza Strip, and abroad. Their core objective is the transformation of Israeli into a binational (Jewish/Palestinian) state. In the short term, they seek policies that would grant Palestinians autonomy within Israel. In the 2006 national election, this outlook was represented by Balad (its name is an acronym for National Democratic Assembly); it won three seats in the Knesset.

The members of the Islamist stream derive their values from the tenets of that religion. Their ultimate goal is to establish an Islamist society in what they perceive as an Arab land. To date, no party representing this stream has competed in an Israeli national election, although such parties have had some success in local elections in Palestinian towns and cities.

The Palestinian parties are marginalized by the operation of the Israeli political system. Obviously the goals of the parties representing the communist, nationalist, and Islamist streams make them impossible coalition partners for any mainline Israeli party. Yet, even the more moderate parties of the Israeli Arab stream have yet to be included in a coalition. Given Israel's security situation, the mainline parties have been unwilling to include parties representing the same national group as their country's enemies. Political marginalization has increased the anger of the Palestinian Israeli population.

The reality of Palestinian marginalization is a serious issue but it should be seen as part of a larger political context. Israel has been a vibrant democracy for more than sixty years but as with most democratic nations, it has its flaws.

MARTIN EDELMAN

Israel, State of: Sports: See SPORTS: ISRAEL

Israel, State of: Wars (1948). Israel has fought seven wars since its declaration of independence on May 14, 1948: the 1948 War of Liberation, the 1956 Suez War, the 1967 Six Day War, the 1968–70 War of Attrition, the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the 1982 First Lebanon War, and the 2006 Second Lebanon War. In these wars and in the terrorist attacks that have occurred in between and after them, 22,000 Israelis have died.

WAR OF INDEPENDENCE (also War of Liberation): Of these wars, the War of Independence is the most significant because it not only established Israel's sovereignty but it also expanded Israel's boundaries beyond those suggested by the November 29, 1947, United Nations partition resolution. This war is known in Israel as the War of Independence and in the Arab world as al-Nakba (the disaster or catastrophe). It began in May 1948 after the withdrawal of British forces and Israel's declaration of sovereignty, when armies of the Arab states of Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, and Lebanon, with assistance from other Arab quarters, entered Palestine and engaged in open warfare with the defense forces of the new state.

Palestine's 650,000 Jews (who constituted themselves as the Yishuv*) accepted the 1947 UN partition resolution recommending the partition of Palestine into a Jewish state, an Arab state, and an internationalized Jerusalem* enclave, to be governed by the world organization itself (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE). Palestine's Arabs, who numbered approximately 1.3 million, did not; nor did the neighboring Arab states. Convinced that they would prevail, the Arab Higher Committee urged Palestine's Arabs to "fight for every inch of their country." The religious leaders of Cairo's Al-Azhar University called for a jihad against the Jews. The emir of Trans-Jordan, a country carved out of the League of Nations Mandate by the British in 1922, announced, "I will have the pleasure and honor to save Palestine." The Arabs of Palestine took up arms against the Jews of Palestine even before the expiration of the British Mandate* on May 15, 1948, and Trans-Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, and Egypt sent their armies into Palestine.

Only after the newly declared State of Israel had lost 1% of its population of approximately 600,000 did it beat back the Palestinians and the foreign armies. The war ended in 1949 not with treaties of peace and of mutual recognition, but with UN-brokered armistice agreements, which merely took note of the lines on which the opposing military forces had stopped fighting each other. Although the Jews of the Yishuv, now called Israelis, beat back seven invading Arab armies, they were unable to seize the Old City of Jerusalem or the lands that later came to be known as the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. The present boundaries between Israel and the Palestinian territories are not international frontiers: They are the cease-fire lines delineating where fighting stopped in 1948 and 1949 (see JERUSALEM, 1948–1967).

In the armistices signed between Israel, Egypt, Lebanon, and Jordan (Iraq did not sign an armistice), Israel ceded the eastern portion of Jerusalem, as well as territory that had been allocated to the Palestinian state, to the control of Trans-Jordan, which changed its name to Jordan to signify that it was now on both sides of the Jordan River. The world began to refer to Jordanian Palestine as the West Bank. The area of Palestine extending out from the city of Gaza became a new entity known as the Gaza Strip. This geopolitical reality remained until the 1967 Six Day War, when Israel captured East Jerusalem and the West Bank from Jordan, the Gaza Strip from Egypt, and the Golan Heights from Syria.

What would the geopolitical reality be today if the Arabs had accepted partition? There would be no Palestinian refugees and no refugee camps. The original 400,000 Arabs and their progeny in the area assigned to Israel by the United Nations would be there today, unless they balked at being citizens of the Jewish state and moved to neighboring countries or emigrated from the region entirely. There would be no Gaza Strip, and Jerusalem would be a corpus separatum. Part of the *Galilee in the north of Israel, as well as the Mediterranean coast of the Negev region in the south, would be part of the post-partition Arab state.

Although there are no doubts about these facts, questions have been raised about whether and the extent to which the Israelis forced Arab Palestinians to flee. The principal proponents of the view that the Israelis did so are a group of Israelis known as the “New Historians.” They include Professors Avi Shlaim, Uri Milstein, Ilan Pappé, and Benny Morris. Certainly, there were some expulsions and also killings of Palestinian Arabs during the 1948 war, but such actions were not official Israeli policy. Otherwise, the Near East Arabic Radio would not have made this broadcast: “It must not be forgotten that the Arab Higher Committee encouraged the refugees to flee from their homes in Jaffa, Haifa, and Jerusalem and that certain leaders have tried to make political capital out of their miserable situation.” Nor would Great Britain’s Sir Alexander Cadogan have told the United Nations Security Council that “the Arabs are those responsible for the latest developments [of Arab flight] in Haifa.” Nor would the American Lebanese daily Al-Hoda have written, “Brotherly advice was given to the Arabs of Palestine urging them to leave their lands, homes, and property and to stay temporarily in neighboring, brotherly states, lest the guns of the invading Arab armies mow them down. The Palestine Arabs had no choice but to obey the ‘advice’ of the [Arab] League and to believe what Azzam Pasha and other responsible men in the League told them – that their withdrawal from their lands was only temporary and would end in a few days with the successful termination of the Arab ‘punishment’ action against Israel.” Nor did all Palestinian Arabs leave; at the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, one-fifth of Israel’s 7.2 million citizens and one-tenth of the 120 members of its parliament are Arabs. It should also be noted that another consequence of the 1948 war was that some 500,000 Jews who lived in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and North Africa were forced from their homes and places of employment. Most of them were absorbed into Israel (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: IMMIGRATION POST-1948).

For further reading, see T. N. Dupuy, Elusive Victory: The Arab-Israeli Wars, 1947–1974; J. C. Hurewitz, The Struggle for Palestine (1950); D. Joseph, The Faithful City: The Siege of Jerusalem, 1948 (1960); E. Karsh, “1948, Israel, and the Palestinians – The True Story,” Commentary (May 2008); B. Morris, 1948: A History of the First Arab-Israeli War (2008); and idem, 1948 and After: Israel and the Palestinians (1994).

EDWARD BERNARD GLICK

Israel, State of: Wars (1956–1967). In the mid-1950s, Egypt, under the nationalist leadership of President Gamal

Abdul Nasser, sought the ouster of Great Britain from the Suez Canal Zone and supported Arab independence movements in *North Africa, particularly Algeria’s efforts to put an end to French colonial rule. In July 1956, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal and other British and French properties in Egypt and supported anti-French rebels in North Africa, creating a congruence of interests between Israel and these two European countries. By late October 1956, Britain and France had agreed with Israel to launch a coordinated action against Nasser’s Egypt. The arrangement, known as the Sinai Campaign, was that Israeli forces would invade the Sinai Peninsula, to be followed by an Anglo-French ultimatum to both Israel and Egypt to cease fire while Anglo-French troops seized the Canal, ostensibly to protect it. It was anticipated that this action would ensure the safety of the Suez Canal, lead to the ouster of Nasser, and reduce the threat to Israel from the most populous Arab state. On October 29, 1956, Israel invaded the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula to destroy hostile Egyptian military positions and, in a brief war, captured the Gaza Strip and much of the Sinai Peninsula. After a British and French ultimatum, British and French forces were interposed between Israel and Egypt along the Suez Canal, ostensibly to separate the combatants and provide security for the Canal.

Eventually Israel withdrew from all of the captured territory to the pre-war frontiers under the weight of United Nations resolutions, but especially because of pressure from the Eisenhower administration. The United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF) was created to patrol the Egyptian side of the Egypt–Israel armistice line, and it helped ensure quiet. The sea lanes through the Strait of Tiran from the Red Sea to the Israeli port of Eilat were opened to Israeli shipping.

The next decade was characterized by relative tranquility, especially along the Israel–Egypt border, although no appreciable progress was made toward resolving the issues of the Arab–Israeli conflict. In the mid-1960s a growing number of terrorist raids into Israel, together with Syrian artillery attacks into agricultural settlements in northern Israel, altered the situation. Tensions between Israel and the Arabs grew throughout the spring of 1967 and escalated rapidly during the month of May. On May 26, Nasser said that, if war with Israel should come, the battle would be a general one and “our basic objective will be to destroy Israel.”

SIX DAY WAR: In mid-May 1967, Egypt proclaimed a state of emergency, mobilized its army, and moved troops across Sinai toward the border with Israel. The UN complied with Nasser’s request that the UNEF be removed from the Egypt–Israel border, and contingents of the Egyptian armed forces and of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO or Fatah) took over the UNEF’s positions. Thus, Egypt and Israel faced each other with no buffer, and Nasser then announced that the Strait of Tiran would be closed to Israeli shipping and to strategic cargoes bound for Eilat. Israel regarded these actions as acts of war. On May 30, Jordan entered into a defense pact with Syria and Egypt, and Iraqi troops were stationed along the Israel–Jordan border.

On June 5, 1967, Israel launched a preemptive strike against the Egyptian air force, destroying 286 of Egypt’s 420 combat aircraft and killing one-third of Egypt’s pilots. Later that morning, the ground war began. Columns of tanks and artillery blasted into the Sinai, and Egypt’s army soon crumbled. Despite Egypt's reverses, Nasser convinced King Hussein of Jordan to join in the defense of Arab allies. Jordanian forces began shelling Israeli positions in Jerusalem. Israel responded by seizing the Old City of Jerusalem and making gains elsewhere in the West Bank. The next day Syria began shelling northern Israel. On June 10, 1967, Israel captured the Golan Heights. In six days, Israel had decisively defeated Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and their allies and had radically transformed the situation in the Middle East. Israel was now in control of territories stretching from the Golan Heights in the north to Sharm el-Sheikh in the Sinai Peninsula and from the Suez Canal to the Jordan River. The occupied territories included the Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the West Bank (referred to by Israel as Judea and Samaria), the Golan Heights, and East Jerusalem.

The Six Day War of June 1967 was a major watershed in the history of Israel, of the Arab–Israeli conflict, and of the Middle East. It altered the geography of the region, changed military and political perceptions, and brought an intensified international effort to resolve the conflict. Israel's victory also inaugurated a period of security, euphoria, and economic growth. Initially there were hopes that the magnitude of the victory might contribute to the prospects for peace and concord with the Arabs. Israel adopted the position that it would not withdraw from those territories until there were negotiations with the Arab states leading to peace agreements that recognized Israel's right to exist and accepted Israel's permanent borders. Between 1949 and 1967, Israel had been prepared for peace with the Arab states on the basis of the 1949 armistice lines with minor modifications, but after the events of May and June 1967, stark new realities entered into these considerations, including religious and ideological claims to territory. The status of these territories has been the focus of the peace process ever since.

Israeli hopes for a change in Arab attitudes waned as a result of the Khartoum Arab Summit at the end of the summer of 1967. The Arab states agreed to unite their efforts "to eliminate the effects of the aggression" and to secure Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories within the framework of "the main principles" to which they adhered: "No peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiation with it, and adherence to the rights of the Palestinian people in their country." This agreement appeared to rule out any peaceful settlement of the Arab–Israeli conflict. The United Nations Security Council, on November 22, 1967, adopted a British-sponsored resolution (Resolution 242) that emphasized "the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war and the need to work for a just and lasting peace in which every state in the area can live in security." Although wording of the resolution was deliberately ambiguous, it emphasized an exchange of territory for peace.

In the first decade after the 1967 war there were various efforts but little significant progress toward the achievement of peace. The Palestinians became more active in the conflict – initially gaining publicity and attention through terrorist acts against Israel, some of which were spectacular in nature. Map 14

BERNARD REICH

Israel, State of: Women. See WOMEN, MODERN: PALESTINE AND ISRAEL

Israel, State of: Youth Movements. About a dozen Jewish youth movements (YMs) functioned in the Yishuv*; the most prominent were Ha-Tzofim (Hebrew Scouts Federation), Ha-Shomer ha-Tzair; Ha-Maḥanot ha-Olim, Ha-Noar ha-Oved, Benei Akiva, Betar, Ha-Tenua ha-Meuhedet (The United Movement), Ezra, and Maccabi ha-Tzair (Young Maccabi). Some YMs merged and split following changes in the political map.

All of these YMs, except for Ha-Tzofim (founded in Palestine in 1919 in accordance with the views of Baden-Powell, the founder of the world scout movement), were affiliated with political entities. They presented a blend, in various degrees, of the three archetypes of YMs: the German Free Movement (Wandervogel), the British Scouts, and the Soviet Komsomol. These groups were all inspired by the belief that youth activities play a central role in the personality development of the individual and that youth culture should be supported for its own sake. However, these movements also considered adolescence as preparing members for their adult lives, preferably on a kibbutz*.

YMs adhered to *Zionist ideology, in most cases to its socialist-Zionist versions. Thus, they conformed to the values of the Yishuv and the young state, including the negation of exile (shelilat ha-galut), striving to create a new Jew, and the love of Eretz Yisrael (the Land of *Israel). Re-creation of the Jewish past, with an emphasis on the heroic stories of Tel Hai and *Masada, also played an important role.

YM members were involved in outdoor activities such as scouting, sports, excursions, and camping, in addition to intellectual discourse (such as study of Jewish and world history, Zionism, and the history and geography of *Palestine). They held discussions on personal and intimate issues; worked to implement moral values and develop social identities; and were involved in various degrees of political activity.

Although great emphasis was put on ideology, young people were attracted to YMs primarily by the social framework they offered of togetherness, shared social adventures, and a sense of emotional closeness. These activities and feelings, and the experience of being leaders (madrikhim) of younger groups, left a long-lasting impression on YM members. All in all, the impact of the YMs on their members, both as young participants and continuing into adult life, was immense; their imprint on Israeli society as a whole far exceeds their numerical size.

After the *Holocaust, with the loss of European Jewry, Israel became the center of all the Zionist youth movements. However, as most of them were mission-oriented, the establishment of the state stripped them of many of their unique features, a change from which they never fully recovered. YM members considered themselves a self-recruited leadership and cohort. This attitude led to a special arrangement concluded in the 1940s that enabled YM graduates to keep their social framework intact when they joined the Palmakh so that, after completing military service, specific groups could settle together on a kibbutz. This arrangement was adopted, with the necessary adjustments, after the 1948 establishment of Israel within the framework of the NAḤAL (Noar Ḥalutzi Loḥem [Fighting Pioneering Youth]). This system also guaranteed a continuous supply of leaders to the YMs.

Ha-Shomer ha-Tzair (HH [The Young Guard]), the oldest and the archetype of Jewish YMs, was founded in the second decade of the twentieth century in *Galicia, *Poland; the first branches of HH in Palestine were established in 1929. From its inception, HH in Palestine was intended to be a reservoir of manpower for the Kibbutz Artzi, the umbrella organization of communal agricultural settlements established by HH graduates in 1927. HH had a singular educational ideology and principles that combined scouting, personal example, training of the individual, development of the personality, political education and involvement, and socialist Zionist fulfillment through kibbutz life.

The movement had a very clear structure, from the nuclear group to the local branch (ken [nest]). The educational process advanced through three levels, each with its own program adapted to the emotional needs and intellectual capacity of the age group. Each level had its emblem and badge; the Mature Emblem (at the age of seventeen) was awarded only after considerable deliberations to those who declared an intention to live on a kibbutz. HH had a slogan, "Be strong and of good courage"; "ten commandments" covering all spheres of the members' lives; a uniform – blue shirt secured with white laces rather than buttons; and military-like rituals including a flag, formal ceremonies of opening and closing each meeting, and a salute.

Until 1947, HH supported a binational state, and it had a strong Soviet orientation until the late 1950s. From 1948, HH was affiliated with Mapam (United Workers Party) and shared its triple slogan: "For Zionism, Socialism, and the Brotherhood of Nations." HH served as a point of reference for all Zionist YMs, either as a model for imitation or as a model against which alternative groups were formed.

Ha-Mahanot ha-Olim (HHO [The Rising Camps]) was founded by groups of students at the Herzliya Gymnasium in Tel Aviv in 1926. In 1930, this youth movement adopted the name HHO. HHO's slogan was "We will rise and ascend," and its uniform was a blue shirt with buttons instead of laces. Affiliated with the Kibbutz ha-Meuḥad, HHO viewed the kibbutz as the sole way to fulfill its values, which included an activist approach in security matters, a readiness to serve the country's needs, and objection to the partitioning of Palestine. After the split within the political party Mapai (1944), some HHO members united with the Gordonia movement to form Ha-Tenua ha-Meuḥedet, affiliated with Mapai and Ḥever ha-Kevutzot. HHO itself was affiliated with Ha-Tenua l'Ahdut ha-Avodah.

Ha-Noar ha-Oved (Working Youth), a movement for working teenagers, was established in 1926 by the Histadrut (General Federation of Jewish Labor) with the aim of meeting the cultural, social, and economic needs of working youth. The movement's slogan was "For work, defense, and peace," and its uniform was a blue shirt with red laces. Although most of its instructors came from kibbutzim, the movement did not insist that kibbutz life was the sole means to Zionist fulfillment.

Ha-Noar ha-Oved merged with Habonim-Ha-Tenua ha-Meuḥedet in 1959 to form Ha-Noar ha-Oved veka-Lomed (Working and Studying Youth). Although it had no formal party affiliation, the movement was known to have ties with Mapai and then the Israel Labor Party.

Benei Akiva (BA [Sons of (Rabbi) *Akiva]), a religious Zionist youth movement, was founded in Jerusalem in 1929 and affiliated with Ha-Poel ha-Mizrahi. BA's slogan "Torah va-Avodah" (Torah and Labor), reflected the fusion of *Orthodox observance of religious commandments and Zionist pioneering, to be best fulfilled in the kibbutz. The basic educational units of BA are separate for boys and girls but groups for older teenagers are mixed, with full and equal participation of girls, including military service in the NAḤAL.

Betar (acronym for Berit [Alliance] Yosef Trumpeldor), was founded in 1923 in Riga, *Latvia, and began its activity in Palestine in 1926. Betar adopted the ideology of the Revisionist Party (and after 1948 of the Ḥerut movement) of monistic Zionism and rejected any fusion with "alien" creeds (meaning mainly socialism, with a deep negation of class struggle). The movement's aim was the creation of a Jewish state with a Jewish majority on both sides of the Jordan River. Betar held to a strong emphasis of discipline, with pre-eminence of the nation over the individual, and had a hierarchical structure resembling a military organization. Betar's brown uniform, adopted in the early 1920s to symbolize the earth of Eretz Israel, was constructed by its rivals after 1933 as tangible proof of its "fascist character." AVIVA HALAMISH Israelites: Kingship. Kingship, or rule by a single person atop a hierarchy with near-exclusive control of legitimated violence in a delimited territory, began in the Near East toward the end of the fourth millennium BCE. Over the next two millennia, polities of varying sizes and power developed a set of governmental practices, including control of key cult offices, the use of the state military and taxation system, gift giving for controlling subordinates and foreign rivals, and the writing of chronicles, hymns, and other literary forms celebrating the king's successes. In visual and auditory media, kings presented themselves as builders, worshipers pleasing to the high gods, conquerors, sexually potent founders of dynasties, and guarantors of order and prosperity.

During the early first millennium BCE, Israelites adopted these practices. Their earliest known monarchs, *Saul and especially *David and *Solomon, self-consciously took on the trappings of contemporary rulers. Israelite monarchy developed through five discernible stages: (1) a pre-monarchic stage of tribal chieftains/*judges and the *Canaanite city-state kings left over from the Amarna period of the Late Bronze Age; (2) early monarchs; (3) consolidation, in the north by the dynasty founded by Omri, and in the south by *Hezekiah; (4) a period of vassalage to foreign powers; and (5) the end of the monarchy and substitution of hereditary governors (at first of the Davidic house in *Judah). The stages occurred as much as a century earlier in the northern kingdom of *Israel than in Judah. Although the Israelite monarchies lasted only about four centuries (ca. 1000–586 BCE), with a brief revival in the second century under the *Hasmoneans, the kings' careers stimulated the production of much of the *Bible, through which they have exerted continued influence.

In particular, 1 and 2 *Samuel, 1 and 2 *Kings, and 1 and 2 *Chronicles contain stories of the Israelite monarchs, sometimes reporting legends, but often drawing on authentic royal archives or chronicles. Several monarchs also appear in inscriptions from Israel, *Moab, *Egypt, and *Mesopotamia. Thus the Tel Dan inscription refers to the "king of the house of David" (i.e., a ninth-century ruler of Judah), while *Assyrian texts refer to the "house of Omri," or the northern kingdom of Israel (see ARCHEOLOGY: ANCIENT TIMES THROUGH THE PERSIAN PERIOD). Other Assyrian texts mention Jehu (by Shalmaneser III), Hezekiah (by Sennacherib), and Menahem (by Tiglath-Pileser III). More than 1,500 seal impressions on jars from eighth-century Judah designate the jars' contents as belonging "to the king." Remains of palaces and other monumental architecture survive from *Samaria, Jezreel, Ramat Rahel, and arguably *Jerusalem, indicating that Israelite rulers enjoyed revenues that allowed displays of power and artistic sensibility.

The Bible displays different attitudes toward kingship. The Deuteronomistic History (DH) contains stories warning of royal tyranny (Judg 9:8–15; 1 Sam 8; 1 Kgs 11–12, 21) and conflicts between kings and *prophets (1 Kgs 17; 2 Kgs 1). *Deuteronomy 17:14–20, apparently a late pre-exilic reflection on the history of the monarchy, allows for kingship but restricts the crown's control of the military, treasury, and diplomatic service (by limiting the king's harem). The DH judges all rulers of the northern kingdom deficient by definition because of their patronage of religious shrines in Dan and *Beth El, and most kings of Judah as equally unworthy. It does allow that Hezekiah and *Josiah were successful, on account of their support of cult centralization in Jerusalem. The Deuteronomists' view of kingship and cult, however, created a serious problem of theodicy, leading them to blame the death of the good king Josiah on his evil grandfather, Manasseh (2 Kgs 23:26–27).

The chronicler addresses the untimely death of Josiah, blaming Josiah himself for his death (2 Chron 35:22) and recasting Manasseh as a penitent king. He also revises the Deuteronomistic portrayal of Israelite kingship in other ways. Chronicles largely omits stories of the northern kingdom, together with tales of David's sexual predations and Solomon's tyrannies (compare 1 Chron 9 with 1 Kgs 11). Chronicles augments its source in Samuel–Kings with stories of the building and remodeling of the Jerusalem *Temple and the celebration of major *festivals by David (1 Chron 22–29), Hezekiah (2 Chron 29–31), and Josiah (2 Chron 35). These additions may draw on older sources, although interpretive processes also play a role.

The prophetic texts include stories of conflict between prophets and Israelite kings (e.g., *Isa 7; *Jer 36; cf. *Amos 7), as well as criticisms of foreign rulers (e.g., Isa 14; *Ezek 28–29, 31–32). Although the prophets do not condemn kingship per se, the post-exilic redactors of the prophetic books rarely envision the restoration of the monarchy (but see Amos 9:10–15; *Hag 2:20–23). Similarly, texts in the wisdom tradition (see BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE) are skeptical about royal power (see *Prov 23:1–3; *Ecc 4:13–16; 5:8–9), although they also help potential courtiers manage themselves in the palace and hope for royal diligence (Prov 31:1–9; cf. Ps 101).

Texts from the *Second Temple period, an era when most Jews lived under foreign occupation, deal with kingship in four ways. First, David and Solomon become models of piety and inspirations for potential rulers. David was the prophet and psalmist, to whom a *Dead Sea Scroll, 11QPs^a, attributed 4,050 hymns. Solomon's reputation for wisdom led to the pseudonymous ascriptions of Wisdom of Solomon and Psalms of Solomon to him. Second, texts from the second century BCE, such as Pseudo-Aristeas and the Temple Scroll (one of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which includes an extensive *midrash on Deut 17:14–20), reflected on the duties and limits of the monarchy (cf. 1 *Macc 14:4–15; Testament of Job). Third, the foreign monarch becomes an object of mockery (as in *Esther or *Daniel 1–6) or obloquy (as in Dan 7–12, 2 Macc, and the *Qumran Serekh texts). Fourth, biblical texts about kings, especially David, become models for a coming messiah (especially in early *Christianity). Although *messianism in the Second Temple period took several forms and not all Jews expected a royal messiah, still the biblical traditions about kings developed into a major aspect of messianism during this period. In the near absence of a human Israelite king whom everyone thought legitimate, the biblical kings took on new life as models for what might yet be. Thus, the royal traditions of Israel did not disappear; instead they were transformed.

For further reading, see M. W. Hamilton, The Body Royal: The Social Poetics of Kingship in Ancient Israel (2005); and M. Bockmuehl and J. C. Paget, eds., Redemption and Resistance: The Messianic Hopes of Jews and Christians in Antiquity (2007).
MARK W. HAMILTON

Israelites: Marriage and Family. The Hebrew *Bible focuses more on national concerns than on the lives of ordinary individuals, and it originated largely from the urban center of *Jerusalem, removed from the agrarian settlements in which most people lived. Consequently, it is an inadequate source of information about Israelite marriage and family life. Indeed, biblical evidence alone gives a skewed notion of people's daily lives and interactions, especially with respect to gender dynamics. However, the data produced by archeology, along with ethnographic information, allow for a better understanding of Israelite domestic life (see also ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; and WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE).

*MARRIAGE: The Hebrew Bible does not define marriage nor does it even have a specific term for it. The union of a woman and man to form a family unit is typically expressed by saying that a man "takes a woman" as a wife (e.g., Gen 24:67, 25:1, 28:2). This phrase reflects the dominant patrilineal pattern in ancient Israel whereby a woman would leave her natal family and join that of her spouse, who literally took her into his domain, usually his parent's household (see later discussion). Marriage within one's kinship group (endogamy) helped maintain patrilineages and was preferred, although marriage between unrelated groups (exogamy) sometimes occurred, especially to secure alliances.

Most marriages, at least those of people with property, were likely arranged by one or both parents. Shechem's passion for *Dinah led him to ask his father to negotiate with *Jacob about marrying her (Gen 34:4, 8), and Samson's mother and father, despite their misgivings, secured a certain *Philistine woman for their son (Judg 14:1–4). The desires of marriageable offspring may have affected their parents' choices of mates for them, judging from the Samson narrative and the assertiveness of the Shunammite in the *Song of Songs. Yet love was hardly a prerequisite for marriage, especially if a bride was acquired sight unseen, although it sometimes followed (Gen 24:67). In most cases romantic considerations were probably secondary to concerns about family alliances and property exchanges, especially because the marital relationship focused on procreation and the carrying out of household tasks rather than on companionship.

The Hebrew Bible contains no hints about the average age of first marriage, but ethnographic data suggest an early age, corresponding to the onset of puberty. Pre-modern societies like ancient Israel had high infant mortality rates and short life-spans (an average of thirty to forty years), and a young marriage age was necessary to maintain if not increase the population. The need for the labor provided by offspring was of paramount importance. Israelite demographic concerns are expressed in biblical language mandating population growth (e.g., “Be fertile and increase” in Gen 1:28 and 9:1), which likely reflects early marriages. Even for elites, whose interests in arranging marriages lay in the preservation of family land holdings, early marriages would have been more effective in ensuring the production of heirs. Very little is known about the arrangements leading up to and culminating in the formation of a marital pair, with only a few biblical narratives providing clues. The so-called Courtship of Rebekah in Genesis 24 provides considerable information, but should be used cautiously, for Rebekah and her spouse-to-be *Isaac are hardly ordinary folk. They are part of the exalted origins, according to the biblical construction, of the people of Israel, and their families control substantial resources. It is uncertain that the elaborate exchange of goods preceding their marriage would have taken place for individuals with fewer possessions. Nonetheless, as for the elite families whose marital arrangements appear in many ancient *Near Eastern *law codes, financial matters were integral to the formation of most marital liaisons, with pre-marital transactions serving a variety of economic, legal, and social functions.

The family of the bride would have provided a dowry, which ordinarily comprised movable property such as clothing, jewelry, and household items or furnishings; brides from wealthier families might also bring animals and servants (Gen 24:59, 29:24, 29). The groom or his family could even supplement the dowry (Gen 24:53). Although sometimes husbands had access to it, the dowry theoretically belonged to the woman for the duration of the marriage and would have been her chief resource in the event of widowhood or divorce, especially if she had no sons or parents. The groom’s family in turn provided a payment or betrothal gift (mohar) to the bride’s family (Gen 34:12; Exod 22:16; 1 Sam 18:25). Sometimes called the “bride-price,” it has been interpreted as evidence that women were purchased by men. The notion that women were thus “property” of their husbands is also suggested by the fact that the taking of a wife is sometimes, as is Boaz’ union with *Ruth, indicated by the verb kāna (Ruth 4:10), which can mean “to buy” but also, more generally, “to acquire.” Similarly, the word for “husband” (baʿal) often, but not always, means “master.” However, the notion of buying a bride is now understood to be flawed. Rather, the betrothal gift provided partial compensation to a family for the loss of a daughter’s labor. In addition, betrothal gifts and dowries together constituted exchanges of payments that helped ensure the viability of a new family unit. They created or intensified alliances between a woman’s natal and marital families, thus increasing the likelihood that those families would assist each other in the event of illness or economic difficulties; such assistance would otherwise have been unusual for a pre-modern society living in a marginal ecological zone.

Men may not have owned their wives, but they did have exclusive rights to their sexuality. This imbalance in favor of the male must be understood against the backdrop of the great importance of immovable property for Israelites as an agrarian people. The ownership of land was essential for survival, and the transmission of property across generations along the male line was a highly charged process. Embedded in the patrilineal principle was a deep concern that men be certain about the paternity of their offspring. A preponderance of the legal texts in the *Pentateuch dealing with sexuality and exhibiting what might be called a “double standard” are in fact ways of assuring that a man will not leave his land to someone else’s child. For example, women are treated differentially in adultery texts depending on their marital status (Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22–28), and sex between an unmarried woman and a married man is not forbidden. Similarly, a bride’s virginity is valued as an assurance that the groom will be the father of her first child (e.g., Deut 22:13–21). The institution known as *levirate marriage, in which a childless widow marries her deceased husband’s brother, was also a product of the concern for inheritance in that the first son born of that liaison was considered the dead man’s heir (Deut 25:5–10; cf. Gen 38 and Ruth). The instance in which Zelophehad’s daughters are heirs in the absence of sons (Num 26:33, 27:1–11, 36:1–12) seems contrary to absolute principles of patrilineality, but the daughters are enjoined to marry within the clan and thus retain the property within their kinship group.

A woman’s *infertility had a negative impact on the labor productivity of a farm family and the ability of offspring to care for aging adults; it also affected a man’s strong concern for transmitting land to his biological heirs. Taking a second wife, a slave wife, or a concubine was a possible solution, although polygamy was probably uncommon given the demographic reality of a shorter life-span for women. However, affluent or important people (such as the patriarchs) had multiple wives as a sign of their significance. Similarly, the sizable and perhaps legendary harems reported for some biblical monarchs (e.g., 2 Sam 3:2–5, 5:13, 12:8, 19:6; 1 Kgs 11:1–3, 20:1–5; 2 Chron 11:18–21) indicate the kings’ high status and political power; they also reflect the practice of taking foreign brides to secure political alliances. However, for most people, monogamy was the norm if not the ideal.

The dissolution of marriage, like its establishment, is not laid out in any biblical text. The one legal passage (Deut 24:1–4) dealing with *divorce addresses only the particular circumstances, probably reflecting concerns about paternity, in which a man seeks to remarry someone to whom he had once been married. This case, as well as indirect information from biblical texts (e.g., the departure of the Levite’s wife in Judg 19:2), suggests that women as well as men could terminate a marriage. One passage (Isa 50:1) mentions a bill of divorce (sēper kēritut), which indicates that, although not mentioned in the Bible, a written document (ketubbah) may have accompanied some marriages, especially those of the well-to-do (cf. Mal 2:14).

FAMILY LIFE: For most Israelite women and men daily life was centered in the family household. Known in the Bible as the “father’s house” (beit ʾāv), in accordance with the organization of society according to male lineages, the family household is designated “mother’s house” (beit ’ēm) in several female-oriented texts (Gen 24:28; Ruth 1:8; Song 3:4, 8:2; cf. Prov 14:1), probably a consequence of the role of the senior woman of the household in managing most of its daily activities. The family household consisted of a senior marital pair, their sons and the spouses of married sons, any children born to those young couples, and unmarried daughters, although this exact configuration shifted as older members died and younger ones married. The Bible’s ancestor narratives give the impression that families had numerous offspring (see BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES), but the reality as calculated from the size of excavated dwellings is that the average nuclear family had about four children. Sometimes displaced kin from other families, indentured servants, or other workers would be part of the household. The family household also included its material components, the most important one being its immovable property. A family’s land, on which were situated its fields, orchards, vineyards, and gardens, was the patrimony (naḥālā) of the senior male and also the source of the entire family’s livelihood. The family’s dwellings (two or three buildings, one for each of the marital pairs, sharing a courtyard), its tools and implements for growing crops and producing food and clothing, and even its animals further comprised the household. The family tomb or grave site was also considered part of its patrimony.

As the primary social unit of the Israelites, the household was the chief economic as well as reproductive unit. The various productive activities of family members were generally divided along gender lines, with certain tasks performed mainly by males and others carried out largely by females. This complementary and interdependent arrangement is the most efficient way for people to master the many requirements of a largely self-sufficient household. However, extenuating circumstances such as death or illness might mean that members of one gender would sometimes perform the other’s work (see ILLNESS AND DISEASE: BIBLE AND ANCIENT NEAR EAST); periods of intensive labor, such as the need to harvest a crop quickly, might also mean transgressing gendered work patterns (see Ruth 2:2–9). In general, males were responsible for clearing fields and then carrying out the subsequent plowing, seeding, and harvesting. The major horticultural and viticultural procedures were largely male activities, with vegetable and herb gardens likely planted and tended by women. Various family members, especially older children, cared for animals; indeed, from an early age children became involved in the economic activities of their parents – girls with their mothers and boys with their fathers.

Women carried out most of the arduous and time-consuming procedures for transforming crops into edible and preservable form. The most important food source was grain, with bread or cereals providing about half of a person’s daily caloric needs. Because the outer husks of grains are inedible and grain’s nutritional components cannot be digested in raw form, a series of procedures – soaking or parching, grinding, and cooking (which involved collecting fuel and starting and maintaining fires) – were required to transform harvested and winnowed grains into food. It took a woman about three hours a day to process enough grain to feed the six members of a nuclear family unit. Additional work was required to prepare many other components of a largely vegetarian diet. Some of the fruits, vegetables, legumes, and dairy products were consumed raw, but many were processed by churning, pickling, fermenting, drying, pressing, or roasting to produce cheese, capers, dates, olives, nuts, raisins, herbs, oil, and wine. Such foods could be kept for extended periods and thus provide sustenance long past the growing seasons. Because they were costly and also had to be consumed all at once, animals were rarely slaughtered for food except for special occasions or festivals in which several families might share the meat.

In addition to the work required for making edible foods, women also carried out a similarly tedious sequence of tasks – perhaps in the winter months when less time was required for food processing – to produce clothing and other textiles. Wool shorn from the animals had to be carded, spun, occasionally dyed, woven into cloth, and then sewn into garments. It is not clear, however, whether women or men or both fashioned leather goods, baskets, and other household implements, although it is likely that each gender made the items associated with their particular productive responsibilities.

Certain benefits accrued to the women who performed these onerous tasks. Considerable technological expertise was necessary for many household procedures, and mastering the requisite skills could be gratifying, as was the satisfaction of feeding and clothing one’s family. Men would have experienced similar gratification from their productive labors, although the periodic failure of crops due to drought or pestilence all too often diminished that reward. Another positive feature of women’s work was that, because many of the tasks (such as grinding or spinning) were done by neighboring women working together, it involved pleasurable social interaction; in contrast, male labor to produce field crops was more solitary. Women’s daily social interaction also served the larger community in that it meant the formation of informal women’s networks that aided communication among household units and fostered the mutual aid necessary for dealing with illness, death, and other family problems.

In addition to its economic functions, the family household was also the place where offspring were socialized and educated. For most children, education consisted of learning the technologies they would need as adults and also the values and stories of their families and their larger communities. Some of this information was instilled in children in the course of routine daily activities through the instructions and admonitions of their parents; other information was absorbed as children observed or participated in family and community religious and social events, which were often intertwined.

The discovery in domestic contexts of “cult corners” and objects known to have been used in religious rituals indicates that religion was another aspect of family life (see also ISRAELITES: RELIGION). Community or national shrines may have been the locus of seasonal festivals and periodic sacrificial events, as set forth in the Bible, but other practices took place in the household, perhaps even on a daily basis. Men probably placed small-scale food or drink offerings in miniature vessels in household shrines in the hopes of securing plentiful agricultural yields. Women used amulets and figurines as well as apotropaic lamps and shiny jewelry, and perhaps also made offerings, all to the end of protecting themselves and their families from evil spirits, securing their own fertility, and achieving safe childbirth, adequate lactation, and the viability of newborns (see MAGIC and Plate 1). Chants and prayers likely accompanied the ritual acts of both women and men, enhancing the household religious culture and helping family members feel they had some control over the vagaries of existence in ancient Israel (see BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE).

For further reading, see D. Bloch, "Marriage and Family in Ancient Israel," in Marriage and Family in the Biblical World, ed. K. M. Campbell (2003); C. Meyers, Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite Women in Context (1988); idem, Households and Holiness: The Religious Culture of Israelite Women (2005); L. G. Perdue, J. Blenkinsopp, J. J. Collins, and C. Meyers, Families in Ancient Israel (1997); and L. E. Stager, "The Archaeology of the Family in Ancient Israel," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 260 (1985): 1–35. CAROL MEYERS Israelites: Religion. The term "Israelite religion" refers to the system of beliefs, practices, liturgical rites, and social institutions that characterized the life of ancient Israel from roughly 1200–450 BCE (after which time most scholars see Israelite religion developing into early *Judaism). Israelite religion is characterized by a binding relationship between the Israelite tribal league and its common deity, intermediaries such as *priests and *prophets who supervised and guided the ethical and cultic life of the people, and the sanctity of the *family/clan culture and its traditions of leadership. Despite these persistent features, Israelite religion was constantly evolving in response to events, the needs of a growing and shifting populace, disagreements concerning the proper identity of Israel's deity, and disputes between the leaders of disparate religious groups regarding the nature of divine will.

PRE-MONARCHIC PERIOD: The religion of early Israel in the pre-monarchic period (ca. 1200–1020 BCE) involved diverse groups of people forming larger clans and *tribes who lived in geographical proximity to each other and shared the same agricultural resources. They worshiped at religious shrines associated with their common ancestors that were staffed with regional priests who possessed family ties to the surrounding clans. Israelite villagers would regularly visit shrines to sacrifice and pray, to receive legal/ritual instruction, and to divine the will of the deity. The major deity of early Israel was El, as indicated by the very name of the nation, yisra-el (he who strives with El), but was also known as YHWH. Many scholars believe that the two names derive from two originally different deities in Israel's earliest period. El was the name of the father-head of the *Canaanite pantheon, and most scholars agree that there was very strong cultural and ideological interchange between early Israel and their Canaanite neighbors. YHWH, by contrast, was a deity worshiped in northwest *Arabia and was viewed as a warrior-storm deity, a feature that survives in early Israel's poetic and narrative traditions (Exod 15:3, 19:16–19; Ps 29, 68, 77:16–20; Hab 3). The YHWH cult in Israel traces its origins to *Moses (Exod 3), a figure revered in a variety of biblical texts as the founder of the national religion. The introduction of YHWH worship likely accompanied the integration of groups with ties to Moses' leadership into the Israelite social matrix, and the two deities were identified with each other at an early stage (Exod 6:3).

As the various clans came together over time to form a tribal league, YHWH emerged as the nation's primary deity. Diverse concepts of YHWH are evident in biblical *poetic and *narrative traditions, suggesting the spectrum of ideas concerning the role of this high deity in the religious life of Israel. In addition, both *archeology and biblical evidence indicate that other, lesser deities were worshiped alongside the primary ancestral deity. Clan-based Israelite religion included ritual communion with departed ancestors and agricultural and livestock seasonal festivals with mythic overtones; it boasted a vibrant fertility cult, replete with devotees to a variety of goddesses. The most prominent of these goddesses were apparently Asherah (the consort of El and, later, YHWH) and "Queen of Heaven." The identity of the "Queen of Heaven" is uncertain, but the cult of this deity was fostered in a family context in which women played a prominent role (see Jer 7:16–20, 44:15–19). The central position of women in early narrative and poetic traditions, such as *Miriam (Exod–Num) *Deborah and Jael (Judg 4–5), and *Hannah (1 Sam 1–2), point to the sacral female dimensions of early Israelite religion that survived for several centuries (Plate 1).

ROLE OF THE MONARCH: The transition to a monarchic society (ca. 1020–587 BCE) introduced dramatic changes in the fabric of Israelite religion. Kings in ancient *Near Eastern culture very often headed the religion of their kingdoms as chief priests; in some cases they were viewed as divine or pseudo-divine. Biblical texts reflecting this shift place limits on a king's ability to serve as the ultimate religious authority of his kingdom (Deut 17:14–20) or condemn kingship outright (1 Sam 8:11–18). However, for much of the monarchic period, kingship was conceived in terms of the establishment of a *covenantal tradition between YHWH and King *David (2 Sam 7). The establishment of a central *Temple and Temple cult in *Jerusalem under David's son *Solomon (1 Kgs 5–8) firmly bound religion to the royal line. Much of the poetry in the book of *Psalms derives from the religious world of the Jerusalem Temple, which was understood as the center of the sacred cosmos and the portal between the human and divine realms. Israel's kings were thus imbued with a sacred status and held important cultic responsibilities. After the schism between north and south in 922 BCE, similar characteristics are to be found among the kings of *Israel, the northern kingdom (Amos 7:12–13; see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP).

ROLE OF PROPHETS: With the shift to monarchy, prophets emerge more distinctly as YHWH's human spokespersons, perhaps to keep the king in check and to maintain religious and ethical standards. Many biblical passages suggest that the prophetic role was primarily to inaugurate or legitimize kings when they came to power and chastise them if they fell short of their duties as a representative of the people. Prophets thus provided independent and direct access to divine will in response to royal and priestly practices; they mediated between the king and his royal court on the one hand and YHWH and his heavenly court on the other. Much of the Bible's prophetic tradition constitutes sharp criticism of abuses of power. A significant number of prophets also appear to have strong connections to the priests who had ties to the clan system of the pre-monarchic period; these were the rural Levites whose socio-religious influence had been challenged by the elite royal institutions. The prophetic critiques of the royal court and the Temple priesthood may have been spearheaded by these Levites (see, for example, the oracles of *Hosea), who argued that the influence of the monarchy had compromised the integrity of the nation's fidelity to YHWH and corrupted its venerable ritual and ethical institutions (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY).

After the conquest and destruction of the northern kingdom between 734–721 BCE by the *Assyrian Empire, the prophetic critique became a central part of Israelite religion, adopted by the surviving royal court in Jerusalem and worked by its scribes into a system of state-sponsored religious and ethical instruction during the second half of the reign of King *Hezekiah (715–685 BCE). The fall of Israel demonstrated what YHWH required: allegiance to the ruling family in Jerusalem and deference to its Temple cult. Partly as a result of Jerusalem's survival against an Assyrian military campaign that devastated the surrounding Judean countryside in the year 701 BCE, the belief in Jerusalem's special divine status was amplified at this time. Nevertheless, the kingdom of *Judah remained under the political domination of Assyria for almost a century, and Assyrian culture invariably influenced state religion.

As Assyrian power waned in 627 BCE, the Deuteronomistic movement surfaced in Jerusalem to purge Assyrian influence and outdated clan-based practices from Israelite religion. This group was an amalgam of royal administrators and Levites active during the reign of King *Josiah (640–609 BCE); they likely produced the book of *Deuteronomy (presented as the farewell address of Moses from centuries earlier) and attempted to reform Israelite society according to its ideology and laws. This reform involved the elimination of the ancestral cult and the suppression of the worship of fertility goddesses, the centralization of all ritual activity in Jerusalem, and the uncompromised adherence of every Israelite to the laws in Deuteronomy, all of which were apparently sponsored by King Josiah himself. According to 2 Kings 22, the king's agents discovered a version of Deuteronomy in 622 BCE while cleaning the *Temple of foreign influence, and it is indeed at this time that a more literary and intellectual form of dedication surfaces in Israelite religion. Deuteronomy constantly stresses its status as a sacred book and intellectual curriculum for all Israelites (6:5–9, 31:9–13). During this time, written texts began to eclipse sacrifice and Temple ritual as the focus of Israelite religion and many earlier and contemporaneous prophetic works and historical traditions were redacted and published (see also TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; and WORSHIP).

After Josiah's untimely death in 609 BCE, the radical nature of the Deuteronomic reform became the center of religious debate between the Levites and scribal administrators who supported it and the royal sages and Jerusalem priests who advocated a return to older ideas regarding sacred kingship and the mythic status of the Jerusalem Temple. The destruction of Jerusalem and the exile of its population into *Babylon in 587 BCE, however, ended this disagreement (see BABYLONIAN EXILE). Although a large number of people were taken captive into Mesopotamia, many more remained behind in the land, fleeing for the most part to the region immediately north of Judah to avoid military confrontation with the Babylonian army. These survivors continued to worship YHWH at traditional shrines and at the ruins of the Jerusalem Temple (Jer 41); by contrast, the exiled population faced different challenges.

During the exilic period (587–538 BCE), many religious changes emerged, including the understanding that YHWH was not just Israel's deity but the only existing deity (see Isa 44:6). Furthermore, the institution of the Temple, physically destroyed in 587 BCE, was developed by exilic writers such as the prophet *Ezekiel into the basis for a complex cosmology. Ezekiel wrote that the metaphysical, holy divine presence evacuated the physical shell of the Temple even before the Babylonians destroyed it, but that it would return from the heavens when the exile was over and reestablish itself in a rebuilt Jerusalem (Ezek 1; 40–48). Since geographical location no longer defined Jewish identity, many scholars view the exilic and post-exilic periods as the time when many behavioral norms such as *Sabbath observance and *dietary laws received greater attention as markers of communal/national identity. Finally, although members of the Davidic royal house survived into the exilic and post-exilic periods, none managed to reclaim a position of significant religious and political authority. Hence, the concept of a powerful, divinely sponsored king ruling from his throne in Jerusalem became an eschatological *messianic idea: a descendant of David who would eventually appear and restore the fortunes of the nation at some time in the distant future.

POST-EXILIC PERIOD: In the place of an autonomous king ruling from Jerusalem, the Jerusalem priesthood emerged in the post-exilic period as the major religious authorities for Jews throughout the *Persian world – restored to their rebuilt Temple (completed in 516 BCE) and promulgating a systematized collection of sacred Scripture as the highest code of Jewish law, with the support of the Persian empire (Ezra 7:25–26; Neh 8). This is when Israelite religion develops into early Judaism, characterized by a decline in prophecy, dominated by the Jerusalem priesthood and its ritual/liturgical system, and practiced by a variety of dissident sects that would debate the meaning of their common Israelite religious heritage for several centuries to come.

For further reading, see F. M. Cross Jr., Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (1973); J. D. Levenson, Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (1985); Z. Zevit, The Religions of Ancient Israel: A Synthesis of Parallactic Approaches (2001); S. Ackerman, Warrior, Dancer, Seductress, Queen: Women in Judges and Biblical Israel (1998); and M. S. Smith, The Early History of God: Yahweh and the Other Deities in Ancient Israel (2nd ed., 2002).

MARK LEUCHTER

Israelites: Tribes. According to the *Torah, the twelve tribes of Israel stem from *Jacob's twelve sons: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, Joseph, and Benjamin. The fact that the twelve are conceived amidst a competition between two sisters, *Rachel and *Leah, works etiologically to explain why conflict sometimes arises among the tribes. Leah gives birth to Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, as well as to a daughter, *Dinah. Leah also claims Gad and Asher, the sons of Zilpah, her servant and surrogate, as her descendants. Rachel similarly absorbs Dan and Naphtali, born to her servant Bilhah. After contending with prolonged barrenness, Rachel gives birth to Joseph and Benjamin. However, a dozen sons and one daughter may not be the extent of Jacob's family because he is recorded immigrating to *Egypt with sons and daughters (Gen 46:7, 46:15).

The notion of twelve tribes informs the organization of Israel's camp during the period of wandering in the wilderness. Clustered according to their ancestral mothers, the Leah tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun set up camp on the east end of the *Tabernacle (mishkan) and the Rachel tribes of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh camp on the west. To the south, the Leah tribes of Reuben and Simeon reside with Gad, a Zilpah tribe, and to the north the Zilpah tribe of Asher camps alongside the Bilhah tribes of Naphtali and Dan (Num 2). The tribe of Levi does not figure among the cardinal directions, but rather assumes a central position along the peripheries of the Tabernacle. The number twelve is maintained by the splitting of Joseph into the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, named for Joseph's sons.

The tribal structure determines the territorial allotments meted out by *Joshua after the conquest of the land (Josh 13–19). The tribal schisms mentioned in the book of *Judges are more or less bridged during the duration of the United Monarchy (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP), but after King *Solomon's death the country splits into the northern kingdom of *Israel and the southern kingdom of *Judah. When the northern kingdom falls to *Assyria, its constitutive tribes are lost. Judah withstands Assyrian incursion, but eventually falls at the hands of the *Babylonian Empire. A significant number of those exiled by the Babylonians return, rebuild the *Temple in *Jerusalem, and reconstitute the state of Judah under *Persian rule.

Despite the coherence of the biblical account, scholars doubt its historicity. The story of twelve sons born to rival wives was likely formulated to account for the social organization of the tribes. How then did the tribal structure come into being? The question can be approached through various development models proposed by scholars, as well as by examining biblical texts that represent a tribal confederation. The archeological record does not comport with the account of the Israelites coming from a distance to invade the east and west banks of the Jordan. Some suggest that the tribes formed during the Late Bronze Age when Egyptian power diminished, leaving a power vacuum in *Canaan (see ARCHEOLOGY: ANCIENT TIMES THROUGH THE PERSIAN PERIOD). A theory popularized by Norman Gottwald proposes that an egalitarian tribal system resulted from a peasant revolt that shook the Judean highlands. The archeologist and *Bible scholar Carol Meyers suggests that the Hebrew word shevet, commonly translated as tribe, more likely indicates a complex chiefdom that enabled equality in some spheres of life while operating hierarchically in others. Martin Noth analogizes the twelve tribes of Israel to the Greek league of twelve peoples that rallied around the sanctuary of Apollo at Delphi. He accounts for the number twelve as an attempt to have the social order mirror the cosmic order of a year, which is both a unit onto itself and a conglomerate of twelve months.

Most contemporary theories acknowledge a process in which families ensured their survival by banding together as a clan that in turn consolidated with other clans to form a tribe for purposes of self-protection (see ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY). The tribe's founding is then often attributed to an eponymous ancestor as a means of conferring historical legitimacy. Based on the repeated acknowledgment of the families that comprise the tribes (Num 1:26), it seems that such a process led to both the rise of individual tribes and the stories of the twelve brothers. Tribal leadership, however, proved an insufficient bulwark against the encroachments of enemies such as the *Philistines. This prompted the institution of chieftains or judges. *Saul may well have begun as a chieftain whose early military successes led him to constitute a monarchical system. Although tribal affiliations competed with fealty to the king, the monarchy seems to have contributed to the erosion of tribal identity in favor of regional identity (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP).

The image of twelve tribes recurs in biblical poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY) such as Genesis 49, where Jacob's blessing of his sons provides glimpses into the unique characteristics of each tribe. Whereas in Genesis 49 the recipients of blessing are the twelve sons, even though the content of the blessings speaks to tribal realities, in Deuteronomy 33 Moses gathers the tribes around him before he dies to bless them like sons. Levi appears in the roster of Deuteronomy 33, and Joseph figures as a singular tribe while Simeon is omitted. Scholars suggest that the omission of Simeon reflects the historical absorption of the tribe of Simeon by Judah. *Deborah, the judge and *prophet, addresses ten groups in the victory song of Judges 5. Some are familiar tribes such as Ephraim, Benjamin, Zebulun, Issachar, Naphtali, Reuben, Dan, and Asher, and others are alternately named Machir and Gilead. Machir and Gilead are figures associated with the eastern half of the tribe of Manasseh (Num 26:29, 32:39–40; Deut 3:15; Josh 13:29–31 [where Machir is a synonym for the tribe of Manasseh]; Josh 17:1). The omission of Simeon, Judah, and Levi in Judges 5 is noteworthy because it implies a northern provenance, perhaps before the rise of the tribe of Judah or the unification of northern and southern tribes.

Biblical narrative records ritual acts in which the number twelve symbolically represents the tribes. Moses builds an altar with twelve pillars during the *revelation at Sinai (Exod 24:4), and Joshua sets up a twelve-stone memorial after the national crossing of the Jordan (Josh 4:5–8). Twelve precious stones are inlaid in four rows on the breastplate worn by the High Priest (Exod 28:15–21, 39:8–14). In his vision of a restored Israel, the prophet *Ezekiel sees the land parceled out in twelve equal portions for the tribes of Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, Judah, Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, and Gad, with the *priests and Levites situated at a sacred center and the strangers among Israel enjoying equal citizenship and property rights (Ezek 47–48).

For further reading, see N. Gottwald, The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel 1250–1050 B.C.E (1979); Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible: The Tribal Territories of Israel (1986); and C. Meyers, "Tribes and Tribulations: Rethorizing Earliest 'Israel,'" in Tracking the Tribes of Yahweh: On the Trail of a Classic, ed. R. Boer (2002).

RACHEL HAVRELOCK

Isserles, Moses (1520–1572), known as the Rema, was a prominent rabbi and halakhic scholar in Kraków, *Poland. His major works include Darkhei Moshe (Ways of Moses), a commentary on the fourteenth-century Arba'ah Turim of *Jacob ben Asher. Isserles admired the Shulhan Arukh (Set Table) of his contemporary Joseph *Karo, but realized that because this code privileged *Sephardic practice it would not be useful for *Ashkenazic Jews. He remedied this problem by preparing a comprehensive commentary he called the Mappah (Tablecloth), which consisted of notes (haggahot) inserted in Karo's text indicating where Ashkenazic rulings differed from Sephardic ones and including Ashkenazic *customs (minhagim). These notes first appeared in print in the Kraków edition of the Shulhan Arukh (1571), in Rashi type to distinguish them from Karo's text. Isserles' Mappah defended both the notion of codification, which had been resisted by Ashkenazic scholars, and Karo's arrangement of Jewish law, enabling the Shulhan Arukh to become a standard work of Jewish law up to the present. For further reading, see M. Berger, "The Centrality of Talmud," in The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture, ed. J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin (2010); see also HALAKHAH.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Italy. Jews have lived in Italy for more than two thousand years. The first-century-CE statesman and writer Cicero blamed them for favoring Julius Caesar in factional Roman politics. Italian Jews, unlike Jews elsewhere in Europe, cannot be viewed as newcomers who settled among an already existing population. Indeed, Italian Jews have always spoken and written the vernacular, eaten local foods, and dressed as others, as artistic evidence reveals. The roots of Italian Jewish acculturation are deep, and one may ask who actually acculturated to whom. Roman Jews, for example, today maintain a cuisine dating back to the fifteenth century, if not earlier, and this food is commonly considered Rome's authentic fare. However, Jews did differ from their Italian neighbors in religion. This created friction, including socially, but it did not lead to attacks as occurred north of the Alps. The single notable massacre was a judicial one, at Trent in 1475, following a *ritual murder accusation. This was in territory that was part of the German Empire, where both Jews and others spoke a German dialect. Tensions as a rule were acted out in organized, even negotiated, annual "ritual stonings." The aim was to hurt no one or no thing, while proclaiming the "proper" social order of Christian dominance.

Rome has always been the site of a large Jewish community, and so was the south of the Italian peninsula until about 1500. *Ashkenazi (German) Jews, who lived in the medieval Rhineland, traced the roots of their culture to Apulia (southwest Italy through the heel of the boot) and to a mystical figure named Abu Aaron, who lived in the ninth century. Jewish communities stretched out along the Via Appia, which runs from Rome to Brindisi (in Apulia); this road was built by the ancient Romans and is still in use. There were numerous Jews in *Sicily. Southern Jewish communities were expelled in 1492, 1511, and (a remnant in Naples) in 1541; these areas were then under Spanish rule, and their fate was sealed by the expulsion order from *Spain of 1492. North of Rome, Jews are rarely mentioned until about the thirteenth century, when Jews were invited to open small loan banks, whose condotta (permits) required them to operate for periods of five to ten years. By the sixteenth century, Jewish communities were found throughout the north. Perhaps the best known northern community was in *Venice, where Jews settled formally only in 1516. The preexisting name of the island where Jews lived provided the word "ghetto," referring to an area restricted to Jewish habitation.

At the end of the sixteenth century, Jews were expelled from the Duchy of Lombardy (Milan), also a Spanish dependency, but important communities remained in Ferrara and Modena. The 1492 expulsion of Jews from Spain led to significant Jewish immigration to parts of Italy not under Spanish influence. Many of these Jews came to Italy after first stopping in the *Ottoman Empire. Ashkenazi Jews also emigrated from German-speaking Europe to northern Italy, beginning in the sixteenth century. Many who settled in Venice Italianized their names; for example, Lausitz became Luzzatti, Esslingen became Ottolenghi, and Marburg, Morpurgo.

Newer Jews seem to have integrated rapidly into the native Jewish population, certainly in Rome. Marriage between Jewish groups of differing ethnic backgrounds was frequent; religious laws, both Jewish and Christian, made marriage between Jews and Christians legally impossible. Sicilian Jews, for instance, who arrived in Rome after 1492, seem to have had an active strategy of marrying into Italian and *Sephardi families. Other groups emulated them. By 1571, the Burial Society instructed people to choose the 'edah (ethnic identity group) with which they wished to be formally associated. In Venice, where the 'edah division was more rigid, the ghetto itself was divided into ethnic districts, based on the time of their founding; thus, there is an old, new, and most recent ghetto, whose borders are still clearly marked. Similarly, the various ethnic Jewish communities in the Venetian ghetto each had their own *synagogues. In Rome, the actual dimensions of the historic ghetto are no longer known because 95% of its buildings and roads were demolished in the late nineteenth century. The site, where 3,000 to 4,000 people had been crowded into about two city blocks, was considered unsanitary.

In the early Middle Ages, Oria in Apulia hosted a flourishing talmudic culture, as testified to by the eleventh century liturgical poet Ahimaaz ben Paltiel (see POETRY, LITURGICAL). Italian Jewish intellectual flowering came in waves, notably in Rome in the twelfth through fourteenth centuries and in places like Ferrara, Mantua, and Venice during the later Renaissance. Zerachiah Hen (thirteenth century), Hillel of Verona (ca. 1220-c.1295), and Judah Romano (c. 1293-after 1330) wrote philosophical and mystical works; Joseph ha-Kohen, Solomon ibn Verga (fifteenth and sixteenth centuries), and Azariah dei *Rossi (1513-1578) are known for their historical writings. Other important writers include Leon *Modena, the belle lettrist Immanuel of Rome (ca. 1261-ca.1328), and Simone Luzzatto (1583-1663). The baroque music of Salamone Rossi continues to be played today. During the later ghetto period, about the eighteenth century, intellectual life reached its nadir. So did the status of women, the various rights Jewish law accorded them having been reduced by the force of local Roman law, known as ius commune. Family size was generally small, with two to four surviving children.

Italian Jews, loazim, as they are known in Hebrew, are Italians, neither *Ashkenazim nor *Sephardim. Their culture has undergone successive modifications influenced by various immigrant waves. Special Italian synagogue music has a Sephardi influence, alongside that from Gregorian chant. The *shofar is blown in continuous undulating notes, and at the end of *Yom Kippur, the *Torah scrolls are removed from the ark, just as at kol nidrei. A mizmarah, an evening of song and study, is celebrated to honor the birth of daughters in lieu of the *circumcision party for the birth of a son. Roman Jews in the Middle Ages perfected Judeo-Italiano, a mode of Italian mixed with many Hebrew words. Centuries later, they developed Judeo-Romanesco, a more local meld of Roman speech and Hebrew. Neither of these two became a real language like *Yiddish. Jewish family names are often after small Italian towns, like di Segni and di Tivoli. These mostly distinctive names are easily recognized by all Italians.

The end of the Italian ghettos, which occurred at various moments during the nineteenth century depending on locale, signaled a rush to strong acculturation and assimilation, and sometimes baptism. Ironically, baptism rates were much higher than during the ghetto era, when the Catholic Church had applied significant conversionary pressures, virtually kidnapping potential converts. However, when racial laws were announced by Mussolini in 1938, few Christians protested. Later, Italian Fascists sometimes outdid the *Nazi SS in cruelty. This is not to lessen the importance of the enormous aid furnished by the many Italian Christians who hid or otherwise assisted Jews during the German occupation in 1943 and 1944. Of the approximately 50,000 Jews in Italy before the war, about 7,000 to 8,000 perished, mostly at *Auschwitz. While this is a high number, it is a low percentage compared to the devastation in countries like Holland (see AMSTERDAM; and HOLOCAUST). On October 16, 1943, the Germans raided the area of Jewish residence in Rome, mostly where the ghetto had stood, and arrested more than two thousand Jews. Despite continuing denials, the truth is that Pope Pius did little to save these people, who were detained in (what is still) the army's military college, which can be seen from the windows of the papal apartments in the nearby Vatican.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Italian Jewry numbers about 30,000, half of whom live in Rome; this community is mostly of Italian origin. The community in Milan, also large, has a large component of immigrants from the rest of Europe and also from *North Africa, *Iraq, and *Iran. Communities like Venice, Bologna, Pisa, Livorno (Leghorn), and Naples number in the hundreds or one or two thousand. As elsewhere in the West, *intermarriage is common.

For further reading, see D. Ruderman, Essential Papers on Jewish Culture in Renaissance and Baroque Italy (1992); idem, Kabbalah, Magic, and Science: The Cultural Universe of a Sixteenth Century Jewish Physician (1988); A. Stille, Benevolence and Betrayal: Five Italian Families under Fascism; and A. Sacerdoti, The Guide to Jewish Italy (2004). Maps 4, 8, 10

KENNETH STOW

Iyar is the second month of the Jewish calendar, equivalent to April and/or May of the Gregorian calendar. Special days in Iyar include Lag B'Omer (Iyar 18; see OMER) and *Yom Ha-Atzma'ut (Israel's Independence Day; Iyar 5). see also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Jacob (also known as Israel) is the younger son of *Isaac and *Rebekah and the father of sons who would become the eponymous founders of the *Israelite tribes. Jacob is a central character of *Genesis 25:19–35:29; he plays a smaller role in *Joseph's story, primarily with his deathbed testament (Gen 49). A subversive, trickster figure, Jacob struggles with his twin brother *Esau in their mother's womb, and God tells Rebekah that "the elder shall serve the younger" (25:23). At birth, Jacob attempts to supplant his older brother by gripping Esau's heel (Hebrew, akev, a folk etymology for ya'akov) and later dupes him into selling his birthright (Hebrew, berakhah). Rebekah helps Jacob trick his elderly father into offering him the blessing due to Esau. When a devastated Esau responds with anger, Jacob flees to Haran in *Mesopotamia. En route, Jacob encounters God in a vision of angels at a place he names *Beth El (28:10–22). In Haran, his relationship with his uncle Laban is characterized by duplicity and struggle. Jacob seeks to marry Laban's younger daughter *Rachel, but after seven years of labor, Laban tricks Jacob by sending his older daughter *Leah into Jacob's marital tent. Jacob marries Rachel shortly thereafter, but must pay for her with another seven years of labor. Jacob has seven children with Leah, two each with his wives' maidservants Bilhah and Zilpah, and two with Rachel after a long period of infertility. When Jacob and his family set out to return to his homeland, they spend a night at the Jabbok River, where Jacob wrestles with a "man" (in other traditions, an "angel"; cf. Hosea 12:5). In this climactic scene, literally a crossing, Jacob is transformed. He prevails through direct struggle, not trickery, and the man renames him "Israel" (perhaps, "one who strives with God"). Afterward, Jacob reunites with Esau and offers him not deception but a "gift" (Hebrew, berakhah [33:11]) as reconciliation.

Jacob's narrative is a structured literary creation that makes use of folkloric motifs but is not a folktale itself; it exhibits thematic and symbolic links with its literary context in Genesis and beyond. Thus Jacob's exile and return offer a microcosm of the entire *Pentateuch, indeed of the entire Hebrew *Bible. Further, Jacob's tale illustrates a significant motif in Genesis – the election of the younger son over the older – which is an indication of the divine role in human events (Abel over Cain, Isaac over Ishmael, Joseph over his brothers, Ephraim over Manasseh). The conflict between brothers stands in for the uneasy relationship between Israel and *Edom (cf. Gen 36). Most important, Jacob represents the familial unity of all Israel, particularly insofar as his narrative role as the father of twelve sons parallels his symbolic role as the parent of the twelve tribes (Gen 49). These dual roles are in evidence in the frequent references to Jacob outside of Genesis. In poetic texts (e.g., Deut 32 and *Psalms) and the *Prophets (most frequently Deutero-*Isaiah), the name "Jacob" (to the exclusion of the other two patriarchs) becomes a poetic term for the nation or people of Israel. For further reading, see S. Niditch, A Prelude to Biblical Folklore:

Underdogs and Tricksters (2nd ed., 2000); and M. Fishbane, Text and Texture: Close Readings of Selected Biblical Texts (1979).

SEAN BURT

Jacob ben Asher (ca. 1270–ca. 1340) was a halakhic authority. Born in *Germany, he accompanied his father, *Asher ben Jehiel (the Rosh), to Toledo, Spain (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN), at the beginning of the fourteenth century. He is known as Baal ha-Turim (master of the rows) after his major halakhic work, Arba'ah Turim (The Four Rows). In this volume Jacob ben Asher arranged *halakhah and *customs pertinent to interpersonal relationships and communal conduct in four sections. Orah Hayyim is concerned with blessings, prayers, the Sabbath, festivals, and fasts; Yoreh De'ah covers dietary and ritual slaughter laws, among others; Even ha-Ezer deals with family law; and Hoshen Mishpat addresses civil law and ethical prescriptions. The Arba'ah Turim, which includes Franco-German legal decisions along with those of Spain, was widely accepted throughout the *Diaspora and remains a standard code of Jewish law (see Halakhah). He was also the author/editor of a Torah commentary focusing on peshat interpretation (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: FROM THE MIDDLE AGES TO 1800); he left an *ethical will for his children, an excerpt of which appears in I. Abrahams' classic collection, Hebrew Ethical Wills (1926, 2006).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Jamaica. When *Columbus arrived at the Caribbean island of Jamaica in 1494, on his second voyage to the new world, his crew included at least three conversos: Marco, the surgeon; Luis de Torres, the interpreter; and Mestre Bernal, the physician. From 1594 to 1655 (when the island was conquered by *Britain), a few Jews of Iberian origin lived in Jamaica, calling themselves Portuguese merchants. Because Jamaica did not fall under the bishopric of Cuba, they were safe from the *Inquisition. After the British conquest, these Jews were permitted to stay; they built a *synagogue in Port Royal that was destroyed in the earthquake of 1692. The Jewish community then moved to Kingston and later to Spanish Town.

Jamaica's Jewish presence increased beginning in the 1660s; by 1769 Spanish Town's Jewish population included three hundred individuals, making it the third-largest Jewish community in the English-speaking world, exceeded only by London and Charleston, South Carolina. *Ashkenazim arrived in Jamaica by 1780, and they then built their own synagogues. There have been at least nine synagogues in Jamaica at various times and perhaps a tenth one in Port Royal, replacing the synagogue destroyed in 1692 (J. A. P. M. Andrade, A Record of the Jews in Jamaica [1941]); a number of cemeteries survive (R. D. Barnett and P. Wright, The Jews of Jamaica – Tombstone Inscriptions 1663–1880 [1997]). Most Jamaican Jews were urban merchants who owned a few slaves; a few Jews played minor roles in the slave trade as consignees; that is, agents responsible for auctioning off newly arrived Africans and transporting them to their new masters (Faber).

In 1831, Jamaican Jews achieved full political rights, and all discriminatory laws and taxes were rescinded; over the next decades, significant numbers of Jews held political office. After emancipation in 1838, a shortage of labor and a decline in sugar production resulted in many Jews leaving the island. A major fire in Kingston in 1882 destroyed two newly built synagogues (one *Sephardic and the other Ashkenazic). An amalgamation of both congregations, henceforth known as the United Congregation of Israelites, occurred in 1921. The community's remaining synagogue, Shaarei Shalom, on Duke Street in Kingston, was originally built in 1885; that edifice was destroyed in the earthquake and fire of 1907 and rebuilt in 1912. At the beginning of the twenty-first century the community remains active with approximately two hundred members. It uses the Spanish/Portuguese ritual, although blessings recited before reading from the *Torah and the birkhat kohanim on the afternoon of *Yom Kippur follow Ashkenazic tradition. The orientation of the congregation has changed from *Orthodox to Liberal, and it is affiliated with the Liberal Jewish Congregations of the Caribbean and Latin America. The Torah scrolls and communal silver remain at the synagogue.

Jamaican Jews who have been active in the arts include the early-nineteenth-century artist, Isaac Mendes Belisario; musician Sir Frederic Hyman Cowen; and the nineteenth-century actor, Morton Tavares. For further reading, see E. Faber, Jews, Slaves and the Slave Trade (1998); M. Arbell, The Portuguese Jews of Jamaica (2000); and M. Delevante and A. Alberga, The Island of One People: A History of the Jews in Jamaica (2006).

ANTHONY MACFARLANE

Jeremiah is the second of the major prophetic books (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]). According to Jeremiah 1:1–3, the prophet was active from the thirteenth year of the reign of *Josiah (627 BCE) until the fall of *Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE. References to Josiah in the book are scant, however, and the prophet's flourishing seems to have been subsequent to the king's death at Megiddo in 609 BCE until just after Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Jerusalem. Jeremiah is also identified as descended from priests of Anathoth (1:1), a village in the northeastern environs of Jerusalem. Narrative passages recall his patronage by Jerusalemite scribes, particularly the house of Shaphan (26:24, 36:10–12), who were involved in the discovery of the *Deuteronomic code (2 Kgs 22). Jeremiah's mixed priestly and scribal background is reflected in his poetry where he appears conversant with priestly traditions (Jer 2:3/Lev 22:14–16; Jer 4:23–26/Gen 1), as well as with the poetic and legal corpora that were influential for the Deuteronomists (e.g., Jer 8:19/Deut 32:21; Jer 3:1/Deut 24:1–4).

The book contains *poetry purporting to be the words of Jeremiah himself, as well as prose stories and legends about the prophet. Several sections of poetry are organized topically. These include statements delivered on the occasion of a drought (14:1–15:9), an anthology of oracles related to the topic of kingship (21:11–23:8; see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP), and various statements on prophecy (23:9–40). Chapters 46–51 are a discrete collection of oracles against foreign nations. Other subsections are more difficult to isolate. Jeremiah 2–6 has some internal cohesion, relating a sequence of prophecies of judgment against the kingdoms of *Israel and *Judah using the language of the *covenantal lawsuit (riv). Chapters 30–31 are similarly cohesive, preserving a series of restoration oracles. Chapters 37–45 are predominantly biographical prose with brief poetic sections interspersed.

Other layers of the book are not so well integrated. Personal laments relating the prophet's emotional distress are distributed throughout Jeremiah 11–20 (11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–14, 15–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–13, 14–18). A loose collection of stories describing symbolic actions performed by the prophet or his proxy are also present (e.g., 13:1–11, 16:1–4, 18:1–12, 19:1–15, 27:1–28:17, 32:6–15, 35:1–19, 36:1–32, 43:8–13; cf. 51:59–64). Two epistles supposedly written by the prophet appear in Jeremiah 29 and 45, and Jeremiah 52 concludes the book with a historical appendix (ch. 52), which is duplicated in 2 *Kings 24:18–25:30.

Given this literary diversity, the book is best regarded as a compendium of materials by and about Jeremiah. Although Jeremiah 36 describes how the prophet's collected sayings were written down, the story has been influenced by important Deuteronomic texts such as 2 Kings 22 and Deuteronomy 17, and its historical value is suspect. Baruch ben Neriah is mentioned as a scribe attending the prophet (32:9–15, 36:4–19, 43:1–7, 45:1–5), but his role is controversial, and the texts mentioning him cannot be used as historical data. The presence of both thematic and terminological doublets (e.g., 7:3–15/ 26:2–6; 23:5–6/ 33:14–16) suggests the book's complex literary pre-history. Possibly, Judean refugees in *Egypt and *Babylon separately preserved recollections of Jeremiah, and their literary traditions were combined over a protracted period, in part under the influence of Deuteronomic thinkers.

Despite its complicated formation process and the unevenness of its contents, a clear and coherent voice speaks from the text. Jeremiah's poetic style favors concise, cadenced wordplays (1:10, 20:3, among others), often playing creatively on a single verb (2:5, 17:14). Such structures are frequently built into more elaborate oracles that suggest complex logical relationships (8:4–12). Jeremiah presents vivid images (4:3–4) and sometimes develops more elaborate poems around them (10:1–16, 20:7–12). A master rhetorician, he cites the positions of his interlocutors and attempts to answer the objections of his audience (e.g., 13:20–27). Only *Amos (ch. 3) compares to Jeremiah in his degree of intellectual engagement with his audience.

Jeremiah's literary style reflects his situation in the final days of the Judean monarchy, after the initial deportation of 597 BCE. He sought to prepare Judeans for a new way of living as a community without the mediating institutions of *Temple (3:16–18, 7:21–23) and palace (23:1–4). He drew on *Hosea's language (e.g., Hosea 2) to describe *God in patriarchal terms (Jer 2–3), even as he criticized traditional patriarchal authority (30:4–7, 31:18–22). In the process, Jeremiah overturned well-established ideas of collective guilt and trans-generational punishment (31:29–20; cf. Ezek 18:1–32). For Jeremiah each person was an ethically responsible individual. The prophet imagined a radically new sort of covenantal relationship between God and Israel that did not depend on written laws, but was realized as an internal ethical ideal within each person (31:31–34).

Jeremiah had a profound impact on Israelite cultural life and on the formation of the Hebrew *Bible. *Ezra 1:1 attributes to Jeremiah a prediction of restoration based on statements such as 25:11 and 29:10. The prophet's assurances that God would one day restore Israel and Judah (e.g., 31:7–14) were probably a source of comfort to Judean refugees in *Babylonian exile. This influence is evident in the development of Deutero-*Isaiah in which poems like Jeremiah 20:7–12 were adapted to give voice to the exiles' own suffering (e.g., Isa 50:4–9; cf., Jer 11:19/Isa 53:7–8). This community also preserved legends that Jeremiah had hidden the accoutrements of the Temple before Nebuchadnezzar's conquest (2 *Macc 2:1–8; cf. Jer 31:33). Further, the author of *Job drew extensively on Jeremiah's biography and his poetry to construct the figure of the righteous sufferer (see Job 3/Jer 20:14–18).

Important research includes W. L. Holladay, Jeremiah 2: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah, Chapters 26–52 (1989); B. D. Sommer, A Prophet Reads Scripture: Allusion in Isaiah 40–66 (1998); and E. L. Greenstein, "Jeremiah as an Inspiration to the Poet of Job," in Inspired Speech: Prophecy in the Ancient Near East, ed. J. Kaltner and L. Stuhlman (2004), 98–110.

EDWARD SILVER

Jericho, located just north of the Dead Sea, is mentioned often in the Hebrew *Bible. Located on an ancient trade route, Jericho, which has abundant water and a temperate climate, is considered one of the oldest cities in the world, extending back at least ten thousand years. Archeologists have uncovered more than twenty settlement layers (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD). Jericho figures in the biblical account of Israelite conquest and settlement. *Joshua's spies, who are sent to reconnoiter Jericho, are saved from capture by the harlot Rahab, who states her belief in the power and uniqueness of Israel's God (Josh 2). Joshua 6 describes the Israelite conquest of the city, in which all living creatures in Jericho, except for Rahab and her family, were destroyed (Josh 6). However, archeological evidence does not support the biblical account; the city walls appear to have been destroyed at some time around 1550 BCE, several centuries earlier than any likely Israelite settlement. Two *synagogues from the *Byzantine period have been found near Jericho, both with mosaic floors with Jewish symbols. Contemporary Jericho is a *Palestinian city on the occupied West Bank, with a population of 25,000. Map 2

KATE FRIEDMAN

Jeroboam challenged the leadership of *Rehoboam, the son of King *Solomon, at *Shechem after Solomon's death. When Rehoboam refused to lessen the heavy taxes that Solomon had imposed, Jeroboam led the secession of ten of the Israelite tribes from the *United Monarchy and founded the kingdom of *Israel (1 Kgs 12:4, 16–20; 2 Chron 10:4). Jeroboam went on to reign for twenty-two years, first from Shechem and then from Tirzah. According to biblical sources, Jeroboam established shrines at Dan and *Beth El where golden calves were worshiped (1 Kgs 12:28–29).

Jerusalem: Biblical and Rabbinic Sources. Biblical sources largely focus on Jerusalem's history from *David's time forward (ca. 1000 BCE). However, extrabiblical literary and archeological data, as well as a few biblical references, provide scattered details about the city's pre-Israelite history. Remnants of houses from the third millennium have been found, although even in the second millennium the city's population was not large. Situated on a mount atop two hills and surrounded by valleys, the city was well protected and long had defensive walls and secure access to water (through the Gihon Spring). This made it an attractive location even though it was not directly on major trade routes.

*Egyptian texts from the second millennium call the city "Rushalimum" or "Urusalim." These names may refer to the god Salem, suggesting that the name may have originally meant "city of Salem." Enigmatic biblical references support this identification: *Abraham met Melchizedek of Salem after a battle (Gen 14:18), and Psalm 76:2 links "Salem" with "Zion" (see later discussion). Although Jerusalem sounds like ir-shalom, Hebrew for "city of peace," this appealing association has no etymological basis.

The name "Jerusalem" does not appear in the *Torah, although forward-looking hints are found in *Deuteronomy 12:5. Biblical references first appear in *Joshua 10:1 and 15:8 and in *Judges 1:8. After David's capture of the city around 1000 BCE, he made it his capital (2 Sam 5), settling an area on the southeastern part of the mount as the "City of David" (alternately called "Zion," a pre-Israelite name for the extant fortress). Jerusalem's central location, between the northern and southern *Israelite tribes, in the territory of the minor tribe Benjamin, made it a wise choice for a capital. David elevated its status by situating the *Ark of the Covenant there (2 Sam 6). His son *Solomon famously built the *Temple, which became a center for *Israelite religion and was meant to replace all the other holy places throughout the land (1 Kgs 5–8). As the location of the Temple and kingship (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP), Jerusalem's preeminence in subsequent Jewish thought was secured.

Jerusalem was only briefly the capital of all the Israelite tribes. With the division of the unified kingdom around 930 BCE, Jerusalem became the capital city of *Judah, the southern kingdom. The city was repeatedly attacked: by Egyptians around 925 (1 Kgs 14); Arameans in the late ninth century (2 Kgs 12); and even by *Israel, the northern kingdom, in the early eighth century (2 Kgs 14). Some attacks were repulsed through the payment of tribute, although an *Assyrian conquest in 701 under Sennacherib was only barely averted by a plague. To *Hezekiah, the king, and the residents of Jerusalem this was a miracle (2 Kgs 19; Isa 36–37). Despite these vicissitudes, throughout the First Temple period the city remained the center of religious and political life in the south. It grew in population and size, especially under Hezekiah in the late eighth century, who built up its defensive walls and famously constructed a tunnel (discovered in 1838) to bring water into the city (2 Kgs 20:20).

The Bible describes widespread religious syncretism in the First Temple period. *Prophets condemned the worship of foreign gods, with minimal success (Isa 10:11; Jer 44:17). The Deuteronomistic history indicts nearly all the kings for promoting child sacrifice (2 Kgs 23:10) and worship of *Baal and *Asherah in the city (1 Kgs 16:32–33). Even the Temple itself was filled with idolatrous statues (2 Kgs 23:4; Ezek 8:6). A few kings attempted to purify the Temple and city (2 Kgs 18:4, 23:4–20), but their reforms were short-lived. *Babylonian invaders in 586 BCE sacked the city, and the Temple burnt to the ground; biblical authors explain this devastation as divine punishment for idolatry (2 Kgs 24–25; Lam 1–5).

After the city was sacked, the Jerusalem elite were taken into *exile in Babylonia, although most residents were left behind. Presumably, no sacrifices were made on the ruined Temple Mount during the half-century of exile. With the fall of Babylonia to the *Persians in 539 BCE, this policy of forced exile was reversed, and (descendants of) the exiles were allowed to return. After a few decades, a modest new Temple was erected on the mount (Haggai 2:3). Only with the arrival of *Nehemiah, in the mid-fifth century, did major reconstruction and reorganization begin (Neh 2–6).

Jerusalem submitted to *Alexander the Great in 332 BCE to avoid destruction. After his death, control of Judea and Jerusalem passed first to the *Ptolemies (323–198 BCE) and then the *Seleucids (198–ca. 164 BCE). Both were generally tolerant, interfering minimally in internal affairs of subject peoples. They empowered Zadokite priests for religious and political leadership, in conformity with a biblical model favored by Jews as well. After the ascension of Antiochus IV in 175 this stability was upset. A *Hellenized Jewish elite, eager to join in Greek culture, rejected traditional religious rituals. They also constructed a gymnasium, the classic Greek educational institution, in Jerusalem (1 Macc 1:13–15). Antiochus, perhaps with their encouragement, banned observance of the laws in the *Torah (1 Macc 1:44–64) and interfered with priestly appointments (1 Macc 7:5; 2 Macc 4:7). He then sacked the city, desecrated the Temple, and constructed a garrison for troops. The *Hasmonean family led a revolt and retook the Temple in 164, eventually gaining control over Judea, although foreign troops were not completely removed from Jerusalem until ca. 141 BCE. The Hasmoneans remained in power through 63 BCE, fortifying Jerusalem, extending its walls, and building a palace (the *Letter of Aristeas 83–120 may be a contemporary description).

Jewish sovereignty ended in 63 BCE, with the arrival of the *Romans under Pompey. To the dismay of the Jews, who permitted the High Priest alone to enter the Temple's Holy of Holies one day a year, Pompey freely walked in, vividly symbolizing Jerusalem's subjugation. The land was placed under Roman administrators, who also appointed puppet rulers, most famously *Herod the Great (reigned from 37–4 BCE); Herod dramatically increased the size and grandeur of the city, constructing a new palace, massive towers, and aqueducts. According to *Josephus, he replaced the existing Temple with a new structure of monumental proportions on an enlarged mount (Jewish Antiquities 15:380–425) and also constructed pools and tombs outside the city and theaters for pagan-style games, despite widespread Jewish opposition.

Not long after Herod's rebuilding project was finished, the city and Temple were razed during the First *Jewish War against Rome (66–70 CE). The Temple was leveled; only a retaining wall of the mount ("the Western Wall") remained. The destruction of the altar at the one authorized cult site meant that sacrifices could no longer be offered, a prohibition observed to this day. The three perimeter walls around the city were destroyed, and much of the city was burned down (*Josephus, Jewish War 6:149–266). Under Emperor Hadrian, a second revolt, led by *Bar Kokhba, broke out (132–35 CE), possibly fired by a desire to reconstruct the Temple. It, too, was ultimately repressed by Rome, with further destruction to the city. The city was renamed Aelia Capitolina, in honor of Hadrian (whose family name was Aelius) and the Capitoline gods. As punishment, Jews may have been banned from entering the city after the war for decades (Justin, Dialogue 16). The city was rebuilt in Roman style, with pagan temples, forums, baths, and a grid system of streets. Eventually, Jews trickled back into the city, and we learn from fourth-century *Christian sources of regular visitors and a few synagogues (Jerome; the Bordeaux pilgrim; see also JT Pesahim 7:11). The Temple was not rebuilt, and the mount remained in ruins until the advent of *Islam in the seventh century. The emerging rabbinic movement was mostly centered north of the city, in the *Galilee.

JERUSALEM IN JEWISH TRADITION: Veneration of Jerusalem goes back to its early association with David, as the "city of the great king" (Ps 48:2). Its political significance was augmented by the presence of the Temple, which made it the religious center as well. Although Jewish tradition never limited God's presence to any one place, Jerusalem nonetheless was unique, for it was there that "the glory of the Lord" (1 Kgs 8:11) and the "name" of God dwelled (Deut 12:5). It was a city "chosen" by God (Zech 3:2; Ps 132:13) and "the holy city" (Dan 9:24; Neh 11:1). Residents trusted that they would be protected from military and natural threats (Isa 31:5, 37:35). The faithful made regular pilgrimages to the city to offer sacrifices during the *festivals (Deut 16:16; cf. Luke 2:41). Many *psalms celebrate travel to Jerusalem. The "Psalms of Ascent" (120–134), likely recited by those entering the city, refer to the rituals of the *priests and the royal throne. Those living outside the land yearned to be in Jerusalem (Isa 27:13; Ps 137). *Diaspora Jews revered the city and Temple, sending regular contributions for its upkeep and making *pilgrimages (*Philo, Gaius 281; Acts 2:5–11).

Jews described Jerusalem in cosmic and fanciful language. It was the "navel of the earth," from which the world was created (Ezek 38:12; Jubilees 8:19; *Sibylline Oracles 5:247). Solomon's Temple is said to have been constructed on the same spot where *Abraham nearly sacrificed *Isaac (2 Chron 3:1). *Garden of Eden imagery is applied to the city (1 Enoch 26), and basic geography was ignored: Although Jerusalem was not the highest spot in the region, it was said to be "up in the heights" (Ps 68:19). Regardless of where one began one's voyage, when traveling to the city, one was said to "ascend" (Ezra 1:3). Although it was not the largest or most significant city in the region, Jerusalem was said to be "in the midst of nations, with countries round about her" (Ezek 5:5). It was in Jerusalem that the great events of the final days would occur and the dispersed would be gathered together in a city purged of idolatry and wrongdoing (Jer 31; Joel 4). *Ezekiel predicted a new Temple, of incomparably greater glory and size, to be built on the spot of the destroyed Temple (40–48). Not only Israel but all the nations would go up to Jerusalem to worship the one true *God (Isa 2:3; Zech 8:22, 14:16; Tobit 13:11; Sibylline Oracles 3:710–23).

Rabbinic views on Jerusalem reveal complex attitudes toward a revered city that had long been under foreign sovereignty and whose great Temple still lay in ruin. The Rabbis felt a deep, continuing attachment to the city, while also accommodating themselves to the loss of the Temple rituals, regular pilgrimages, and ancient institutions of priesthood and kingship. They vividly praised the city whose air was always fragrant and whose beauty surpassed all other cities (Avot de Rabbi Natan version A, ch. 28; BT Yoma 39b; BT Bava Batra 4a); the creation of the world began in Jerusalem (BT Yoma 53b–54b), and the city was of unequalled height (Sifre Deuteronomy 37). Rabbinic teachings recognized the need to mourn Jerusalem's destruction, but cautioned against excessive sadness (BT Bava Batra 60b). They prescribed rituals for visitors to the ruins (BT Mo'ed Katan 26a) and ordained fast days to commemorate the city's disasters (BT Rosh Hashanah 18a–19b). Through *worship, God's gracious acts in Jerusalem were recalled, and the hope that God would once again elevate a Davidic king over a rebuilt city was expressed. The Rabbis ordained the recitation of the laws of sacrifice, reenacting through *prayer rituals what could no longer literally be performed. Their devotion to Jerusalem was emphasized with the exclamation, "Next year in Jerusalem," that ended the *Passover sefer. The halakhic regulations for the city and Temple (such as tithes, sacrifices, and pilgrimage) remained central to rabbinic study. In Jewish life and liturgy, evocation of Jerusalem brightened a diminished present as a symbol of a glorious past and a yearned for and idealized future.

For further reading, see A. Halkin, ed., Zion in Jewish Literature (1961); J. Levenson, Sinai and Zion (1985); L. Levine, ed., Jerusalem: Its Sanctity and Centrality to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (1999); idem, Jerusalem: Portrait of the City in the Second Temple Period (2002); Y. Eliav, God's Mountain (2005); and ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; and ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; Maps 1–5 ADAM GREGERMAN

Jerusalem: 1948–1967. Between 1948 and 1967, Jerusalem was divided between Israel, which controlled the western portion of the city, and Jordan, which controlled the eastern portion. Contrary to UN General Assembly Resolution 181 of November 29, 1947, which still remains in force, both Israel and Jordan refused to accept the city as an international entity and instead preferred its partition. Jordan and Israel regarded this arrangement as a pragmatic alternative to an all-or-nothing approach. It is no coincidence that, except for odd days here and there, the administration of urban concerns shared by both parts of the city, such as water, sewage, pest control, and legal and illegal civilian movement, was undertaken in an atmosphere of calm and characterized by a degree of cooperation. A good example of such cooperation was the convoy of Israeli soldiers disguised as policemen (with Jordanian knowledge) that was escorted by the Jordanian Legion to the Israeli enclave of Mt. Scopus every two weeks. Tourists and Arabs (usually Christian) were also allowed to move between the two parts of the city via the Mandelbaum Gate. As time passed, the joint Israeli-Jordanian Ceasefire Committee also evolved into a civilian forum for city administration and the solving of problems that arose from time to time in a city where the border passed through residential neighborhoods and, in some places, private homes.

Notwithstanding this cooperation, Israel encouraged the construction of civilian residences in demilitarized zones and no-man's land, and Jordan prevented Israeli access to the holy places, even though all of these acts ran counter to the Israeli-Jordanian cease-fire agreement of April 1948. Such actions, and the fact that a border fence ran through the heart of the city, detracted from the city's appearance and quality of life.

Although there was no weakening of the religious bond that many Israelis felt for the Jewish holy places, most of which were located in East Jerusalem (except for Mount Zion), Israel appeared to have come to terms with the partition of the city. This approach was based on a *Zionist tradition, passed down from *Herzl to *Weizmann to *Ben-Gurion, which was hesitant about the prospect of future Israeli control of Jerusalem's Christian and Muslim holy places. For this reason, Herzl viewed the holy places as an extraterritorial area, and it was actually the Jewish Agency that was responsible in 1937 for the idea of dividing the city. In response to the Peel Commission's plan to partition Palestine into Jewish and Arab states and to continue *British Mandate rule in Jerusalem, Jewish Agency leaders proposed separating the eastern section of the city, which would remain under Mandate rule, from the western portion of the city that was devoid of holy places and would serve as the capital of the Jewish state. This proposal was also based on demography; even before 1948 most Arabs lived in the eastern portion of the city, and most Jews lived in west Jerusalem.

After the partition of the city (which took place on the ground in May–June 1948, but only officially in April–May 1949) and the annexation of its western portion by Israel in December 1949, Israel began working to transform West Jerusalem into a capital city in its own right. Through a relatively quick process that lasted less than twenty years, Israel established three centers in West Jerusalem: a government center in Givat Ram (including a parliament, government offices, and subsequently the central bank and the Supreme Court); a national cultural center (including the Hebrew University and the Israel Museum), located adjacent to the government center; and on Mount Herzl, to the west of these centers, a national memorial center (including the national and military cemetery and the Holocaust memorial museum *Yad Vashem). These centers created a Jewish Zionist presence to counterbalance the inaccessible holy places located in East Jerusalem.

For their part, King Abdullah of Jordan and his successor, King Hussein, were certainly interested in maintaining the eastern portion of the city as primarily Palestinian. After all, it contained the holy places and most importantly the al-Aqsa mosque compound, which was centered around Haram al-Sharif. However, in contrast to Israel, Jordan failed to develop East Jerusalem, primarily because of the constant tension between the Hashemites and the Palestinian population of the city. In July 1951, King Abdullah was assassinated by a Palestinian near Haram al-Sharif in the Old City in East Jerusalem.

Jerusalem's location on the border of two countries without diplomatic relations and, in the case of Israel, at the end of a long and narrow geographical corridor, hampered the city's development. West Jerusalem became a city with a population composed mostly of government employees, academics, and Ultra-Orthodox Jews, with only a small percentage of merchants and small industrialists. East Jerusalem remained a medium-sized town. Nonetheless, both sides came to terms with the partition of the city, and neither side took any significant action to change the situation. That Israel also supported the status quo was evident in the fall of 1956, when the Sinai War created political and military conditions that could have allowed Israel to unite the city if it wished to do so. The Arab–Israeli war (Six Day War) of June 1967 in which Israel captured East Jerusalem surprised both parts of the city (See also ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–1967]). Maps 12, 13

For further reading, see M. Golani, “Jerusalem’s Hope Lies Only in Partition: Israeli Policy on the Jerusalem Question, 1948–67,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 31 (1999): 577–604; M. Gilbert, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century (1996); and B. Wasserstein, Divided Jerusalem (2001).

MOTTI GOLANI

Jerusalem: Since 1967. The Six Day War broke out on June 5, 1967 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–1967]). Despite Israeli warnings, the Jordanians joined the war, shelling along the city line and capturing the British governor’s palace from the UN observers residing there. On June 7, once Israel had surrounded the Old City, Israeli paratroopers broke through the Lions’ Gate and took over the walled part of the city. After two and a half days of fighting, the war ended with the entire city under Israeli control.

On June 27, 1967, the *Knesset passed the Law and Administration Ordinance (Amendment No. 11), authorizing the government to apply the law, jurisdiction, and administration of Israel to areas formerly part of Mandatory *Palestine. Similarly, the Municipal Ordinance was amended to permit the extension of the city’s municipal boundaries. The following day the government issued an order to apply Israeli law to East Jerusalem, which was now included within the jurisdiction of the Jerusalem municipality, with Teddy Kollek at its head. The legal changes indicated the de facto annexation of East Jerusalem to the State of Israel. A law was also passed guaranteeing the safety of holy places and free access to them, an attempt to soften the anticipated international opposition to Israel’s actions.

Many of the annexed areas of East Jerusalem had not been part of the Jordanian municipality. Approximately 70 square kilometers were added, including twenty-eight neighborhoods and villages that had either been independent or had been part of neighboring towns. Jerusalem became Israel’s biggest city, now covering 126 square kilometers, three times its pre-war size. The new borders of the city were drawn hastily and according to political and military considerations. The aim was to annex as much territory as possible with as little Arab population as possible, thereby providing locations for numerous Jewish neighborhoods that would guarantee a Jewish majority within the city. There was also concern that the new city include many of the highest topographical ranges. The northern boundaries were set to enable the incorporation of Atarot (Kalandia) airport. The tombs of Rachel and Nebi Samuel were left outside the city limits (Map 14).

These principles and other political developments also dictated the location of the new Jewish residential areas, for which 50,023 dunams of land were expropriated from Jerusalem’s new territory. During the first stage (1968–70), a series of contiguous Jewish neighborhoods reaching to Mount Scopus were built in the north. Within the Old City, work was begun to reconstruct the Jewish Quarter, which had been in ruins since 1948. In the second stage (1970–80), four huge new neighborhoods were built in the north, east, and south of the city. In the largest new neighborhoods, Gilo and Ramot Alon, there are now around 30,000 residents, more than in an average Israeli town. During the late 1980s, the third stage focused on filling in the area between Neve Ya’akov and French Hill with the construction of Pisgat Ze’ev, which comprised 12,000 housing units. Ramat Shlomo was built along the Shoafat range, and the neighborhood of Har Homa was constructed south of the Mar Elias Monastery in the fourth stage, from the beginning of the 1990s. In addition, a number of Israeli governmental institutions were erected in the eastern parts of the city, including the small government center in Sheikh Jarach and the campuses of the Hebrew University and the Hadassah Hospital, which were rebuilt and expanded on Mt. Scopus.

The push for development that began in 1967 also affected the western part of the city: Older sections were expanded, and new neighborhoods were built there as well. Industrial areas (especially high-tech centers) were established. A large new shopping mall in Malcha even managed to erode the popularity of the traditional shopping district at “the triangle” in the center of town, and a new highway was paved in response to development needs.

In contrast to the great momentum for development in the Jewish sectors of the city, largely due to governmental initiatives, the lack of momentum for development of the Arab sector is striking. The Israeli establishment hardly initiated any public building for the Arab population and limited private building. There is also a gap between what is provided to the Jewish and to the Arab sectors in municipal services; basic services, such as sewage, roads, and garbage removal, are sorely deficient in Arab neighborhoods. These deficiencies are tied to the special anomalies that characterize the status of East Jerusalem’s Arabs, who received the standing of permanent residents in Israel in 1967 (but not full citizenship). This status gave them rights and responsibilities similar to those of the country’s citizens, apart from the right to elect members of the Israeli Parliament and the right to carry an Israeli passport. However, although East Jerusalem’s Arabs have the right to receive Israeli citizenship if they request it, most have chosen not to do so and maintain Jordanian citizenship.

The gradual disassociation of Jordan from the West Bank and from East Jerusalem (in the late 1980s) and the creation of the Palestinian Authority as a result of the Oslo agreements in the 1990s brought about an increase in Palestinian involvement in East Jerusalem. Israel acknowledged the ties between the Palestinian residents and recognized their right to elect and be elected (under certain conditions) to the institutions of the Palestinian Authority. Israel also permitted significant Palestinian autonomy in certain areas, such as education. The decision of Arab residents of East Jerusalem not to take advantage of their right to vote in elections for the city council (as part of their unwillingness to recognize the legitimacy of Israeli rule) is one of the principal factors that explains the discrimination in municipal services.

Despite Israeli policy, the percentage of Arab residents as a proportion of the city’s residents is growing; 2007 statistics show 245,000 Arab residents of Jerusalem, 34% of the city population of 720,000, as compared to 26% in 1967. The reality that one-third of the city’s residents identify themselves, one way or another, with the Palestinian people and the growing influence of the Palestinian Authority in the city are among the main reasons why Jerusalem is a major point of contention in the ongoing peace process. A number of proposals for arrangements in the city, as well as the negotiations at Camp David (July 2000), have created a split in the Israeli consensus regarding Jerusalem as a united city under Israeli sovereignty. However, the outbreak of the Second Intifada at the end of 2000, the violent events that followed, and the erection of the Separation Wall between East Jerusalem and the West Bank brought about a return by Jewish hawks to an unyielding position on the question of Jerusalem.

The growing tension within the Jewish sector between the nonreligious and the Ultra-Orthodox, the growing demographic strength of the Ultra-Orthodox (making up 30% of the Jewish population of Jerusalem), and economic and social factors (unemployment and the high cost of housing) have resulted in a growing outward migration of the economically strong nonreligious population. These frictions, combined with the difficulties in Arab-Jewish relations, have lowered the city's status and centrality in the Israeli consciousness, especially among the nonreligious. These complexities have had a major impact on Jerusalem's status as the capital of Israel and will pose continuing dilemmas and new challenges for Israeli society and its leaders.

For further reading, see M. Benvenisti, City of Stone: The Hidden History of Jerusalem (1998); M. J. Breger and O. Ahimeir, eds., Jerusalem: A City and Its Future (2002); M. Gilbert, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century (1996); and B. Wasserstein, Divided Jerusalem (2001). AMNON RAMON

Jerusalem Talmud. See TALMUD, JERUSALEM

Jesus: See CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; NEW TESTAMENT

Jethro is a priest of Midian and the father-in-law of Moses. Moses encounters and aids seven sisters at a well when he flees to Midian to escape Pharaoh's wrath. Their father, called Reuel in Exodus 2:18, shelters Moses and gives him his daughter Zipporah in marriage. Moses' father-in-law is called Jethro in Exodus 3:1 and Exodus 18; in Exodus 4:18, he is Jether and Jethro. In Numbers 10:29, Moses invites Hobab, "son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law," to guide the Israelites in the wilderness. Judges 4:11 refers to a group known as the Kenites and describes them as "descendants of Hobab, father-in-law of Moses." There is no scholarly consensus on this variety of designations, apparently indicative of diverse Israelite traditions.

In Exodus 18, Jethro brings his daughter and two grandsons to Moses in the wilderness where he was encamped at the "mountain of God" (18:6). Jethro praises YHWH as "greater than all gods" (18:11). He also advises Moses to appoint judges to hear minor cases so that Moses could concentrate on important disputes (18:22). Moses follows this counsel, and the chapter ends with Jethro's return to Midian. The account of these judicial reforms in Deuteronomy 1:9–17 does not mention Jethro.

Rabbinic traditions linked Jethro to Job and Balaam as Pharaoh's counselors before the Exodus (BT Sotah 11a; Exodus Rabbah 27:6); appalled by Pharaoh's plan to murder Israelite infants, Jethro fled to Midian and converted to Judaism. Rabbinic championing of Jethro as a model proselyte also rests on his praise of God (Exod 18:11) and biblical links between Israelites and Kenites, seen as Jethro's descendants (Judg 1:16; I Chron 2:55). To the four biblical names associated with Moses' father-in-law, the Rabbis added Keni, Heber, and Putiel (Mekhilta Yitro 1; Sifre Numbers 78) and expounded each to his credit. See J. R. Baskin, Pharaoh's Counsellors: Job, Jethro, and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1983). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Jewish Agency: See BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE

Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee. In early 1942, Joseph Stalin created five anti-fascist committees: for women, scientists, young people, ethnic Slavs, and Jews. Each encouraged support in the West for the alliance between the Soviet Union and the western democracies. The Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC) was chaired by the Yiddish theater director and actor, Solomon Mikhoels; its members included the Yiddish writers Dovid Bergelson, Peretz Markish, and Itsik Fefer, along with the journalists Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman. Mikhoels and Fefer came to the United States in 1943 where they raised millions of dollars for the Soviet war effort. On July 8, fifty thousand people greeted them at the Polo Grounds in New York City.

By the close of 1943, the Red Army was forcing the Wehrmacht out of Soviet territory, and it soon discovered massacre sites. Members of the JAC learned of the murder of many relatives. Deeply affected by the news, they looked for ways to help survivors and appealed for assistance to western Jewish organizations. Ehrenburg and Grossman compiled and edited The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland during the War 1941–1945, also known as The Black Book, a collection of documents and testimony about the Holocaust and Jewish resistance against the Nazis (see HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION; and HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE). With the advent of the Cold War, contact with the West was virtually forbidden. The committee's wartime activities were held against it, and Mikhoels was killed in January 1948. In September, Golda Meir came to Moscow as Israel's first ambassador. She was greeted by crowds at the main synagogue. The JAC was held responsible for organizing this outpouring of enthusiasm, and within a year, fifteen JAC members were targeted for a political trial and almost all "confessed" under torture to espionage, treason, and "bourgeois nationalism." Convicted in secret, thirteen of the fifteen defendants, including Yiddish writers and poets Dovid Bergelson, Itsik Fefer, David Hofshateyn, Leib Kvitko, and Peretz Markish, were executed on August 12, 1952, an event known as the "Night of the Murdered Poets" (see also, POETRY: YIDDISH). For recent research, see J. Rubenstein, Stalin's Secret Pogrom: The Postwar Inquisition of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (2005). JOSHUA RUBENSTEIN

Jewish Community Center: See UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTER MOVEMENT

Jewish Publication Society. Founded in Philadelphia in 1888 as a membership organization and publisher, the non-profit, nondenominational Jewish Publication Society (JPS) of America, as it was then called, marked American Jewry's third effort to establish a society for the publication of Jewish books. Earlier attempts in 1845 and 1871 ended in failure. The rapid growth of America's Jewish population, the desire to forge a new Jewish cultural center in the United States, and the hope that books would help bind together a fractured Jewish community underlay the society's establishment. JPS was one of a series of Jewish cultural and educational institutions, founded during an era of communal renaissance, that promoted Jewish unity, sought to counter *antisemitism, and aimed to "inspire our youth."

The JPS published its first book in 1890 and has since published well over 1,000 titles, covering every aspect of Jewish history and life. Its list includes books by the foremost scholars and writers of the times, all carefully vetted by an editorial (formerly "publications") committee charged with maintaining JPS standards. The committee, through the years, has tended to favor scholarly and timeless volumes over popular and timely ones, and books reflecting community consensus over controversial topics. The goal has been to publish and disseminate Jewish books, not to make money, and as a result the JPS has rarely enjoyed robust financial health.

Henrietta *Szold served as the first full-time salaried officer of JPS, its editor in everything but name. Under her leadership (1893–1916), it completed publication of Heinrich *Graetz's History of the Jews, translated from the German, which established its reputation as a publisher of the first rank. It also published numerous other works of cultural significance by such luminaries as Solomon *Schechter, Louis Ginzberg, and Israel *Zangwill. In 1917, it issued a new Jewish translation of the *Bible into English and launched the Schiff Library of Jewish Classics, a series designed to make available "in the original and in the vernacular" the best of post-biblical Jewish literature before the modern era. Together, these books did much to establish the United States as a cultural center for world Jewry.

Subsequently, JPS experienced ups and downs in response to competition, the vicissitudes of the book trade, world Jewish events, and its own business strategy. At different times, scholarly books, popular books, children's books, fiction, co-publications, and translations all moved in and out of favor. Books on the Bible proved perennially popular, and in the post-war years, the society undertook both a new translation of the Bible, completed with the publication of the JPS Tanakh in 1985, and a new Bible commentary. It also published The Jewish Catalog (1973), later expanded to three volumes, which helped define the Jewish counterculture of the 1970s.

Under the editorship of Ellen Frankel (1991–2010), JPS reshaped its business plan and mission. It altered its membership program and focused its publishing energies on Bible and Bible commentary, classic texts in translation, reference and resource books for adult Jewish learners and lay readers, books by women authors, and children's books. On the history of the first century of JPS, see J. D. Sarna, JPS: The Americanization of Jewish Culture 1888–1988 (1989).

JONATHAN D. SARNA

Jewish Renewal Movement: See JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT

Jewish Science is a philosophy of Judaism that developed into a movement in 1922 with the establishment of the Society of Jewish Science in *New York City. The term was coined by Reform Rabbi Alfred Geiger Moses of Mobile, Alabama, in his Jewish Science: Divine Healing in Judaism (1916). He sought to stem the tide of American Jewish attraction to Christian Science by labeling the latter's denial of the reality of sickness and death as irrational and by equating divine healing with the universally available power of autosuggestion. Although later formulators similarly acknowledged the significance of modern psychology, they viewed the theological insights of Jewish Science as most important.

To Reform Rabbi Morris Lichtenstein and his wife, Tehilla, leaders of the Society of Jewish Science, Jewish Science was grounded in belief in *God as a nonsupernatural power, or divine mind, on which one could draw to overcome physical and psychological ailments and to achieve happiness, health, calm, and other states of personal well-being. Drawing on Jewish literature and liturgy in their sermons and published writings, they made the Jewish context of Jewish Science clear. In addition to Sunday school classes and worship services in Manhattan, from 1956–77, the society held similar activities at its synagogue in Old Bethpage, Long Island.

Although Reform Rabbi Clifton Harby Levy, who helped establish and led the Manhattan-based Centre of Jewish Science from 1924 until his death in 1962, also focused on God as healer, he drew on more traditional images of divinity, describing prayer as a feeling of closeness to God rather than of one's own internal power. He helped popularize Jewish Science ideas within the Reform movement, created educational programs for use by Reform congregations, and kept alive issues concerning medical and religious cooperation within the Central Conference of American Rabbis. In 1937, thanks to the efforts of Levy and others, *Hebrew Union College offered as part of the rabbinical school curriculum its first elective course in pastoral psychology. A course in pastoral counseling has long since become a requirement in the rabbinic program of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, and similar courses are now offered at other rabbinic institutions (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA).

The Society of Jewish Science, the largest of the Jewish Science groups, reached a membership peak of one thousand during Morris Lichtenstein's tenure as leader (1922–38). As of 2007 its membership was less than one hundred and fifty. Yet, although Jewish Science never grew significantly as a movement, the teachings of Moses, the Lichtensteins, and Levy had a direct impact on thousands of American Jews. The works of the Lichtensteins are particularly accessible. Pre-dating the current Jewish interest in spiritual healing by more than seventy years, Jewish Science's emphasis on the connection between the mind and the body; its belief that illness cannot be overcome by medicine alone; the use of visualization, affirmation, and meditation to discover and draw on one's inner divine powers; and its overriding message that to do well one must be well remain Jewish Science's greatest legacies.

ELLEN M. UMANSKY

Jewish Studies. Academic Jewish studies refers to the analytical study of the Jewish experience using modern research tools and methodologies. Scholars of academic Jewish studies use a range of disciplinary approaches from the humanities and social studies to investigate and teach aspects of Jewish religion, history, thought, and culture, as well as associated languages and literatures. Academic Jewish studies research and teaching are nondoctrinal, nonparochial, and nondenominational; they take place in secular institutions of higher education and at some seminaries, both Jewish and Christian, that offer graduate degrees in academic fields. Scholars specializing in Jewish studies in these settings are not necessarily Jews nor are they advocates for Jewish students or Jewish concerns. Similarly, their students fit no particular profile: Academic Jewish studies instruction offers access to a body of knowledge and potential for intellectual growth to all interested students, regardless of their religious or ethnic backgrounds.

The significant expansion of Jewish studies in American universities is a relatively recent phenomenon. Although the Hebrew language was included in the curriculum of several of the earliest colleges to be established on the North American continent in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, it was taught as part of a theologically oriented curriculum designed to assist potential Christian clergymen in understanding their own religious heritage. Some instructors of Hebrew, such as Judah Monis who taught at Harvard University between 1722 and 1760, were Jews or of Jewish heritage. Jewish studies at American universities were truly established in the 1890s under the influence of German Jewish scholarship, specifically the Wissenschaft des Judentums* (Scientific Study of Judaism). In the late-nineteenth-century United States, academic Jewish learning was established at secular universities, most often with the active communal and financial support of members of the American Jewish community. In the early twentieth century, Jewish scholars held at least sixteen subsidized positions in Semitic studies at major universities. Many of the donors for these positions hoped that recognition of the centrality of Jewish knowledge and scholarship in the development of western thought would also hasten acceptance and appreciation of Jews in the United States. Certainly, the establishment of positions in Semitic languages and literatures played a role in legitimizing the Jewish and Judaic presence in the American university at a time when being a Jew could still disqualify a candidate for an academic post. Most of the courses in Semitics that these scholars offered appealed to advanced students, both Jewish and non-Jewish, in biblical and related subjects; the courses were generally beyond the interests and ability levels of most undergraduates. Still, their very existence delivered the message that the Jewish literary and cultural heritage belonged in the university curriculum.

In the second decade of the twentieth century, communal support for university positions diminished as Jewish philanthropists focused on the multiple needs of the large hosts of immigrants from *Eastern Europe. In the period between the world wars, American academic Jewish studies took a new direction as an emphasis on the breadth and diversity of the Jewish experience replaced the focus on Semitics. During this era several elite institutions, again with the financial support of generous endowments from American Jews and Jewish communities, established positions in areas such as Jewish history and Modern Hebrew language and literature. These institutions integrated the faculty members holding these positions into appropriate university departments, whether History, English, Near Eastern Languages, or Religious Studies, where their courses became part of the mainstream undergraduate academic curriculum. Such scholars include the historian Dr. Salo Baron at Columbia University.

A third phase in the development of academic Jewish studies in North American colleges and universities began in the last third of the twentieth century. The impact of the Six Day War in 1967 and the Yom Kippur War of 1973 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS), as well as increasing discussion of the *Holocaust, inspired many Jewish young people to learn more about their identities and heritage on the university level. The unprecedented number of Jewish “baby boomers” who descended on college campuses beginning in the mid-1960s, particularly in the Northeast, played a role as well, as did the expanding number of Jews in the professoriate. The emphasis in the 1960s and 1970s on concentrating Jewish learning in one academic program that transcended disciplinary agendas was a decisive move away from the earlier “cultural pluralism” approach that had encouraged the location of Jewish studies scholars within larger departments. The arguments for establishing separate Jewish studies units were similar to those for other particularistic area studies, such as African American studies and women’s studies. For one thing, such academic endeavors were essentially interdisciplinary. For another, without dedicated outside funding it was unlikely that more traditional disciplines would direct limited and highly contested resources to what many faculty members regarded as marginal and intellectually problematic areas of discourse.

There are no absolute data on the number of positions, programs, and departments in Jewish studies. However, in 2010, the website of the Association of Jewish Studies (www.ajsnet.org) listed more than 230 endowed chairs in Jewish studies at 80 colleges and universities, including several in Israel, Canada, and Australia. Many other positions and programs in Jewish studies at North American institutions of higher learning and elsewhere are not dependent on outside funding.

A major change in Jewish studies in North America in the decades between 1975 and 2011 is the increased number of women who have entered the field and climbed the academic ladder from graduate students to professors in every area of Jewish studies scholarship. This sudden appearance of females in the world of academic Jewish scholarship is, of course, the result of the overwhelming changes in the domestic, religious, and communal roles of Jewish women in recent decades (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). The presence of women has transformed the content and methodological approaches of Jewish studies teaching and research. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, virtually all female and male academics involved in Jewish studies teaching and scholarship take for granted the importance of gender as an intellectual category of analysis and consider the constructions and consequences of gender in explicating many facets of the Jewish experience (see WOMEN entries).

The 1969 establishment of the Association for Jewish Studies (AJS) was a signal indication of the growth of academic Jewish studies in late-twentieth-century North America. Initially founded to facilitate communication among a relative handful of Jewish studies scholars, by 2009 the AJS had more than 1,800 members, most of whom were PhDs teaching in an institution of higher education. One-fifth of the membership consisted of graduate students, representing the future of Jewish studies in North America and abroad. The Women’s Caucus of the AJS was founded in 1986; in 2009, more than 47% of AJS members were women as compared to just over 10% in the late 1970s. In 1985, the AJS became a constituent member of the American Council of Learned Societies. This acceptance, after several unsuccessful applications, served as final validation that the academic world recognized Jewish studies as “an important and well-populated field of study” with a “unique intellectual focus and interdisciplinary concerns.” This acceptance was crucial in legitimizing the field in the larger scholarly arena, and it was also significant for the organization’s continued professionalization. With offices at the *Center for Jewish History in *New York City, the AJS convenes an annual conference; administers several book prizes, publishing subsidies, and travel grants; and publishes an academic journal, The AJS Review, and a twice-yearly magazine, AJS Perspectives.

Jewish studies programs and departments in North America have consistently encouraged their students, undergraduate and graduate, to study in Israel. Many programs have also welcomed academic colleagues from Israel into their midst as speakers and visiting scholars. These ties have been strengthened for many by participation in the World Union of Jewish Studies (centered at Hebrew University), which holds conferences every four years in Jerusalem. Recent decades have also seen the growth of Jewish studies organizations in Western and Eastern Europe and the former *Soviet Union. Among these are the European Association for Jewish Studies (EAJS), founded in 1981, with offices in Oxford, UK, which encourages and supports the teaching of Jewish studies at the university level in Europe and furthers an understanding of the importance of Jewish culture and civilization and of the impact it has had on European cultures over many centuries. In Russia, SEFER, housed at the Moscow Center for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization, is an umbrella organization for university Jewish studies in the CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States) and the *Baltic states. It seems likely that, in the future, Jewish studies professionals from North America will play a growing role in an increasingly vibrant and active international community of students and scholars.

Changing demographics in the early-twenty-first century indicate that the absolute number of Jews in the larger population, including student populations, is in steady decline (see UNITED STATES: DEMOGRAPHY). The future of Jewish studies in North American universities will therefore depend on the field’s continuing appeal to a larger constituency. Most Jewish studies programs design their curriculum and courses to appeal to the broadest possible student audiences; in part this is accomplished by ensuring that their courses fulfill university “general education” and “diversity” requirements. At the end of the twenty-first century, more and more students who take courses and choose undergraduate majors and graduate training in Jewish studies are non-Jews who have come to the field out of intellectual curiosity, not out of interest in their own religious or ethnic heritage. Similarly, many scholars and faculty members who work in Jewish studies in North America and abroad are not themselves Jews. This phenomenon is indicative of the increasing integration of Jewish studies into higher education. This “normalization” of Jewish studies within the university is desirable from a scholarly point of view but it also points to potential future conflicts between academic Jewish studies programs and the concerns of the Jewish communities and donors who have thus far been essential to the presence and success of Jewish studies at many North American institutions.

For further reading, see P. Ritterband and H. S. Wechsler, Jewish Learning in American Universities: The First Century (1994).
JUDITH R. BASKIN

Jewish Studies: France (Nineteenth Century). As a result of the *emancipation and reorganization of French Jewry, traditional talmudic studies in France ceased early in the nineteenth century. They were replaced by mid-century with the modern scientific study of Judaism under the leadership of scholars like Adolphe Franck (1809–1893) and Salomon Munk (1803–1867). Franck, the first Jew to pass the “aggregation” examination in philosophy in France (1832), was elected to the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques in 1844 and became the first Jewish professor at the Collège de France. At the same time he was president of the Central *Consistory, where he took an active role in the modernization of Judaism and the rabbinate. Franck was vigorously anti-atheist and wrote extensively on Judaism for the Jewish press. In 1843 he produced a scholarly study of the *Kabbalah that paved the way for the scientific study of Jewish *mysticism.

Munk, who was born in Germany, had known or studied with Leopold *Zunz and Eduard Gans, (1798–1839) as well as with Hegel, and Goethe. In Paris he became cataloguer of Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, and Arabic manuscripts in the Bibliothèque Nationale de Paris. Later in life he was appointed professor of Hebrew at the Collège de France. Munk’s scholarly work was devoted mainly to medieval *Judeo-Arabic literature, especially the works of *Maimonides. Between 1856 and 1856 he published a three volume edition of the Arabic text of Maimonides’ Guide of the Perplexed (Moreh Nebukim) with French translation and annotations. In addition to his scholarship, Munk was active in the community as secretary of the Central Consistory, where he aided the effort to modernize the French rabbinate. He traveled with Moses *Montefiore and Adolphe Crémieux to Egypt in connection with the *Damascus Affair, and his knowledge of Arabic was critical to the enterprise. In *Egypt he promoted the establishment of schools modeled on European methods of instruction.

Other Jewish scholars, such as Arsène and James Darmesteter, Joseph and Hartwig Derenbourg, Théodore and Salomon Reinach, Joseph Halévy, Jules Oppert, and Moïse Schwab, although often appointed to positions in non-Jewish subjects in the humanities in various institutions of higher education, all wrote extensively on Judaism and made important contributions to Jewish studies. It was in France that the first secular academic position in the world was created for the study of rabbinic culture, with Joseph Derenbourg appointed in 1877 to a post in rabbinical Hebrew at the École Pratique des Hautes Études in Paris. The same institution also created the first chair in Rabbinics in France in 1896, appointing Israël Lévi, who later became the Chief Rabbi of France. Isidore Loeb and Israël Lévi were the first of a series of scholars who directed the creation of the great Jewish research library of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle.

Beginning in the middle of the nineteenth century many Jewish university professors and scholars, including James Darmesteter, Hartwig Derenbourg, Robert Hertz, Sylvain Lévi, and Salomon Reinach, made significant contributions in the developing field of Oriental studies. They produced works in the general fields of comparative linguistics, mythology, and ancient religions, laying foundations for the disciplines of religious studies and the sociology of religion. The founder of the field of sociology, Emile Durkheim, was the son of an Alsatian rabbi. By 1895 Jews were disproportionately represented in the Institut de France, constituting 7 of its 260 members. Among important Jewish philosophers were Henri Bergson (Nobel Prize for Literature, 1927), Léon Brunschwig, and Lucien Lévy-Bruhl.

The Société des Etudes Juives, founded in 1880, largely under the impetus of Chief Rabbi of Paris, Zadoc Kahn (a future Chief Rabbi of France), with the help of Baron James Edouard de Rothschild, Isidore Loeb, Arsène Darmesteter, and Charles Netter, published scientific books by scholars of Judaism and Jewish history. Its journal, La Revue des Études Juives, edited initially by Isidore Loeb and then by Israël Lévi, provided an ongoing forum for French Jewish scholarship. The French rabbinate, under the direction of Zadoc Kahn, produced a respected translation of the Bible. For more on this topic, see P. C. Albert, The Modernization of French Jewry: Consistory and Community in the Nineteenth Century (1977); J. R. Berkovitz, Rites and Passages: The Beginnings of Modern Jewish Culture in France, 1650–1860 (2004); and I. Strenski, Durkheim and the Jews of France (1997). PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS) was established in New York City in 1887 in response to the radical direction of American Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA), outlined in its 1885 Pittsburgh Platform. Moderate Jewish communal leaders, principally Sabato Morais, Henry Pereira Mendes, Alexander Kohut, and Cyrus Adler organized support for a rabbinical seminary more traditional than Hebrew Union College, but also reflective of the nineteenth-century Positive-Historical school's conception of Judaism as an evolving religion. The JTS curriculum was modeled after that of the seminary in Breslau founded by Zacharias Frankel; it stressed biblical, historical, and philosophical subjects in addition to the traditional focus on rabbinic literature and Judaism.

Despite community outreach and organizing efforts, JTS did not successfully create a congregational base, leading to financial struggles during the school's first fifteen years. In 1902, when JTS was on the brink of closing, Solomon Schechter was recruited from Cambridge University to assume the presidency. Schechter transformed JTS into a center of Jewish scholarship, significantly expanding the library, bringing scholars from Europe, and establishing a Teacher's Institute. It was Schechter who selected the school symbol – the burning bush that was not consumed – representing the reinvigoration of American Judaism at the seminary.

In 1929, the seminary opened its Museum of Jewish Ceremonial Objects; thanks to a bequest from Mrs. Felix Warburg (Frieda Schiff Warburg), it is now the Jewish Museum, located on Fifth Avenue in New York City. Under the leadership of Louis Finkelstein (d. 1991), the role of JTS was dramatically revised to include educating society at large about Judaism and its connections to democracy and religious toleration. In 1947, JTS founded Camp Ramah, the first in a network of summer camps of that name, and in recent decades has established a number of summer travel programs for young people.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, issues of religious observance, denominational unity, feminism, and homosexuality became sources of tension within the seminary. After much debate, JTS admitted women to rabbinic studies in 1983. A 2007 decision by the law committee permitted self-identified gay and lesbian individuals, given the assent of the faculty, to enter JTS and the Ziegler Rabbinical School in California, but not the Jerusalem-based Schechter Seminary.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, JTS consists of five schools: List College (an undergraduate division offering dual degrees with Columbia University and Barnard College), the Rabbinical School, Cantors Institute, Graduate School, and the William Davidson Graduate School of Jewish Education. The most recent chancellor, Dr. Arnold M. Eisen, was installed in 2007. RACHEL GORDAN

Jewish War, First. The First Jewish War against Rome, sometimes referred to as the “Great Jewish Revolt,” began in 66 CE and ended officially with the capture of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE. According to Josephus, whose Jewish War is the major source of information, the war was sparked by a riot in Caesarea that began over a dispute between a synagogue congregation and the Gentile owner of the neighboring buildings. The riot triggered a series of events, culminating in the termination of the loyalty sacrifice offered in the Jerusalem Temple to the God of Israel on behalf of Caesar and Rome. According to Josephus, this affront “laid the foundation” for the revolt. However, it is clear from Josephus' writings and modern scholarship that the real causes were more complex.

The most obvious cause was the poor and sometimes corrupt administrations of the prefects and procurators appointed by Rome. These relatively low-level short-term officials frequently exercised poor judgment, offending the religious sensitivities of the Jews, particularly with regard to the Temple. After the death of Herod the Great in 4 BCE, the Jewish leadership was equally ineffective. Another key factor was the highly factionalized nature of the country's population; religious sectarianism, socioeconomic divisions, and regionalism created a volatile environment, as did long-standing strife between Jews and non-Jews. Scholars have also pointed to economic downturn and power struggles among the elite as causes of the war (M. Goodman, The Ruling Class of Judaea: The Origins of the Jewish Revolt against Rome A.D. 66–70 [1987]).

Although the war technically lasted four years, it was largely a one-sided fight. After a successful initial defense of Jerusalem, the Jews were unable to regain the upper hand. The war lasted so long partly because of the cautious military tactics of Vespasian, as well as the internal political turmoil of the Roman Empire after the suicide of Nero in 68; the rapid succession of general-emperors during the following year put the war on hold. By the time the war resumed, the Jewish forces had shrunk back to the capital city and a few strongholds in the Judean Desert, the most famous of which is Masada. The siege of Jerusalem, led by Vespasian's son Titus in the year 70, marks the climax of the war. The rebels' factional infighting continued within the city walls during the siege. Although a unified front was finally achieved, Roman military power was overwhelming and in the ensuing battle the Jerusalem Temple was destroyed. The revolt's failure and the destruction of the Temple make this one of the most historically important and theologically significant events in Jewish history. With Jerusalem in ruins and the Temple destroyed, the Jews found themselves in a crisis since so much of public religious life had revolved around the Temple and the offering of sacrifices (see TEMPLE, SECOND; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). This theological dilemma would ultimately be resolved by the rise of rabbinic Judaism in the late ancient and medieval periods (see JUDAISM).

STEVEN H. WERLIN

Jewish War, Second. The second Jewish revolt against Rome, also known as the *Bar Kokhba Revolt, began in 132 CE and ended with the fall of Beitar in 136 CE. While the First *Jewish War was documented by *Josephus, no similar historical account exists for this rebellion. Therefore, scholars have had to rely on a variety of sources, some of them badly truncated and others much later in date than the events themselves. Some Roman sources mention isolated details about the course of the revolt; the fullest account is that of Dio Cassius in his history of Rome. However, the chapter that describes the events of the war seems to have been composed by the abridger of the book, Xiphilinus, an eleventh-century monk whose words are suffused with hatred for the Jews. Other Christian sources also have a negative tone. Important information comes from *archeological finds at the central sites of the revolt, such as Beitar, Tel Shalem, and underground hideouts; coins that were minted during its course; and papyri that include correspondence between the leader of the revolt and various rebels. These finds establish that the revolt was led by Simon bar Koseva (known by the messianic *Aramaic epithet, Bar Kokhba ["son of the star" based on *Balaam's prophecy in Num 24]; see MESSIANISM: BIBLICAL, SECOND TEMPLE ERAS).

The main question is why Jews would have revolted against Rome given the bitter defeats that had previously led to the destruction of the *Temple and the city of *Jerusalem in 70 CE. Perhaps economic distress among evicted farmers led to agitations against foreign rule. In response, Rome increased its military presence to two legions and auxiliary units that were encamped in a number of stations throughout the country. According to Dio Cassius, the Jews were goaded to revolt when the Emperor Hadrian set up the colony of Aelia Capitolina and built a temple to Jupiter during a visit to Jerusalem in 130 CE. In fact, it is unlikely that the founding of Aelia Capitolina was a significant factor. The Second War was not connected with Jerusalem; had the change in the city's status been a major concern, the rebels would probably have attempted to conquer the city. According to the "Life of Hadrian," included with other emperors' biographies in the Roman Historia Augusta, the cause of the war was a general prohibition against *circumcision imposed by Hadrian. This assumption is apparently supported by an edict published in 139 CE by Antoninus Pius, Hadrian's heir, which permitted circumcision for Jews only. However, the sources indicate that the decree against circumcision was not imposed before the revolt nor was it generally imposed against all Jews. Rather, most of the Jewish sources imply that the circumcision decree was a punitive measure against rebels in the regions where the revolt had spread.

A final explanation attributes the cause to the pretensions of Bar Kokhba, the rebellion's leader, and those who supported him as fulfilling expectations of *messianic redemption, political independence, and freedom from Rome. Coins struck during the war indicate that Bar Kokhba was joined by a priest (kohen) called Eleazar, who may have filled the role of religious authority; the mottos "For Jerusalem" and "For the Freedom of Jerusalem" also appear on the coins. Some scholars have interpreted these inscriptions as evidence that the rebels conquered and controlled Jerusalem between 132 and 134 CE, when it was reconquered by the Romans. However, this seems unlikely because very few of these inscribed coins have been found in Jerusalem and there are no indications that the city was conquered and held by the rebels. Modern scholarship is divided on whether the war took place throughout the Land of Israel or if it was confined to the region of Judea. From archeological evidence it appears that the revolt was limited to regions around Hebron, Jerusalem, and Ramallah in the north; Beitar in the west; and the western shores of the Dead Sea in the east. Widespread evidence of coins from the rebellion and a system of hideouts and places of refuge have been found there, but not in other parts of the country.

The initial success of the revolt brought about a sharp reversal in Hadrian's original low-key response. In the spring of 134 CE, he dispatched senior officers to Judea, headed by Julius Severus, who gathered four legions and secondary units from six other legions. According to Dio Cassius, Severus razed 50 main forts and 985 villages. Although these numbers are probably exaggerated, Severus undoubtedly eradicated the main opposition. Some of the remaining rebels fled to cave refuges in the Judean desert, where the Bar Kokhba letters were later found; others escaped to Beitar, which was besieged by the Romans in the spring of 135 CE. The siege of Beitar, about 11 kilometers southwest of Jerusalem, ended the war. Well fortified by the rebels, Beitar was situated on a steep-sided mountain surrounded on three sides by valleys. The Romans constructed a dike 4,000 meters long around the town, including towers and artillery positions. They also filled in the moat that protected the southern side, set up battery ramps, and with the help of siege towers breached the walls of the city.

The fall of Beitar left a deep impression in Jewish sources, which also preserve various versions of the death of Bar Kokhba. Among the immediate results of the revolt's failure were loss of life, sale into slavery of captured rebels, and a decrease in the Jewish population in regions where the revolt occurred. The province of Judea was renamed Syria *Palestina, an indication that Jews were no longer the dominant factor in the population. One of the Romans' punitive acts was a prohibition not only of Jewish residence in Jerusalem but even of entry into the city, which then became a place of foreign residents.

After the revolt was suppressed, the Romans prohibited public Jewish ritual observances in an attempt to undermine the independent leadership of the Jewish people by preventing communal gatherings. Some Jews observed the commandments secretly, and others transgressed publicly to demonstrate that they were prepared to die as *martyrs for the sake of observing the commandments. Antoninus Pius later canceled the decrees. Another outcome of the revolt was that the center of Jewish life in the Land of Israel was transferred to the *Galilee, whose residents had not taken part in the rebellion. Many Jews resettled there, and the Jewish leadership institutions of the *Patriarchate and the *Sanhedrin were reinstated.

For further reading, see R. G. Marks, The Image of Bar Kokhba in Traditional Jewish Literature: National Hero or False Messiah (1994); Y. Yadin, Bar-Kokhba: The Rediscovery of the Legendary Hero of the Last Jewish Revolt against Imperial Rome (1971); and idem, The Documents from the Bar Kokhba Period in the Cave of Letters, with H. Cotton and J. Naveh (2002).

MENAHEN MOR

Jewish Welfare Board: See ADLER, CYRUS; ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA; UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY

Jezebel: See AHAB

Job is a book in the “*Writings” section of the Hebrew *Bible; it is usually found following *Proverbs, although in some manuscripts Job comes first. With Proverbs and *Ecclesiastes, it comprises the biblical wisdom literature. The book presents itself as the story of a wealthy and God-fearing man from the land of Uz who is made the subject of a wager between the Lord and a character known as “the satan”; that is, “the adversary.” The satan is certain that Job’s good fortune is the cause of his upright behavior; if this can be removed, Job will “bless” (euphemistically, curse) God to His face. God gives permission to the satan first to destroy Job’s wealth and kill his children and then to afflict him physically, sparing only his life. Three friends come to comfort Job, and he sits silently with them for seven days and nights (a source for the Jewish mourning custom of shivah*) before bursting out with a blistering curse – not against God, but against his own birth. With this, the prose, folktale-like beginning to the book is suspended, and the longest, most remarkable, and most difficult poetry in the Bible begins.

The long first section of this poem (Job 3–26) is a debate between Job and each of his three friends in turn about why Job’s afflictions have come upon him. Job insists on his innocence while the friends argue that evil comes as a punishment for wrongdoing. This section is followed by an interlude (Job 27–31) in which Job insists angrily that he has not deserved his affliction; in the midst of this interlude comes chapter 28, which asks, “Where Can Wisdom Be Found?” This meditation functions as the eye at the center of the hurricane that is the book of Job.

In Job 32–37, a new character, Elihu, suddenly appears; he also tries but fails to convince Job of his misdeeds. All that Job himself wishes to do is to confront God to fight the charges against him. When God does at last appear out of a whirlwind in Job 38–42, there are no explanations. Rather, after an extraordinary and highly detailed excursus through the wonders of the natural world, God demands that Job prove himself of equal power or fall silent and accept what God has done. The book’s final chapter returns to the folktale style of the beginning of the book, restoring Job’s riches, giving him more children, and letting him die “old and contented.” The key to whether this ending is meant to be satisfying or ironic lies in understanding Job’s words in 42:6, but there is no agreement on the correct translation of this verse.

Job is also mentioned in Ezekiel 14:13–21, where he is linked with *Noah and *Daniel as one of the three most righteous men who ever lived. It seems likely, however, that the biblical Job (in the famous expression from BT Bava Batra 15a) lo hayah ve-lo nivra; that is, “he never existed at all.” Rather he is a fictional character who is used to explore the problem that later *Judaism would refer to as tzaddik ve-ra lo, or why bad things happen to good people (see EVIL AND SUFFERING). Due to the book’s difficult language and challenging theology, it plays a minor role in Jewish worship. However, the morning blessings begin with a phrase from Job 38:36, praising God for “giving wisdom to the rooster”; in addition, a phrase taken from Job 25:2, describing God as “making peace in His heights,” begins the last line of the full kaddish or prayer of sanctification. For further reading, see The Book of Job, translation, introduction, and notes by Raymond P. Scheindlin.

MICHAEL CARASIK

Job: Rabbinic Traditions. The Rabbis were fascinated and troubled by Job, as is evident in the large number of aggadot* about him. A primary concern is when Job lived. Opinions expressed in BT Bava Batra 14b–16b include the time of *Abraham, the time of the tribes (when he is said to have married *Jacob’s daughter *Dinah), the time of the *Exodus, the period of the *Judges, and the return of the exiles from *Babylon. He was said to have been contemporaneous with both the *Queen of Sheba and Ahasuerus (see ESTHER, BOOK OF). Some said Job never existed and his story is an allegory. The most widespread view was that Job lived in the time of *Moses and served as an advisor to Pharaoh (see later discussion).

A closely linked question is whether Job was a Jew or a Gentile. Although some Rabbis maintained that “he was an Israelite” and that halakhah* can be deduced from his words, the predominant rabbinic opinion teaches that Job was a righteous Gentile and “one of the seven Gentile prophets.” The sages praised his positive qualities, including modesty and hospitality. Nevertheless, this admirable non-Jew is said to fall short in comparisons to Abraham (ADRNA 2, 7; BT Bava Batra 16a), since Abraham served God out of love, but Job served God only out of fear of losing his reward (JT Berakhot 14b), although others disagreed (M. Sotah 5:5 and JT Sotah 20c). Resolution is achieved in BT Sotah 31a, where a tradition attributed to R. Meir equated “fearing God” with “loving God” for both Abraham and Job.

Job’s sufferings were explained variously. According to BT Sotah 11a, Job joined *Balaam and *Jethro in advising Pharaoh on how to deal with the enslaved children of Israel. Balaam, who advised slaying male children, was himself slain. Job, who remained silent, was sentenced to suffering. Jethro, who fled, became a proselyte to Judaism (similarly BT Sanhedrin 106a; Exodus Rabbah 27:3). Job was also accused of questioning divine justice in his heart, even before his actual afflictions began (BT Bava Batra 16a–b).

Rabbinic ambivalence toward Job was based not only on the difficulties of the book of Job itself, but also on the predominant identification of Job as a Gentile. Job’s complaints during his suffering were frequently compared unfavorably to the endurance of the patriarchs, kings, and prophets of Israel who faced far greater trials (Deuteronomy Rabbah 2:4; Pesikta Rabbati 47). Some sages explained Job’s restoration with the claim that “the Holy One doubled his reward in this world in order to banish him from the world to come" (BT Bava Batra 15b). Conversely, Pesikta Rabboti links Job's punishments and redemption with the chastisements and ultimate consolation of the Jewish people (26:7, 29/30).

There may be an element of anti-Christian polemic in rabbinic efforts to denigrate Job, or in contrast, to claim him as a Jew. Such approaches, already evident in tannaitic sources (see TANNA, TANNAIM), may be responding to Christian portrayals of Job as a patient sufferer and to Job's inclusion in Christian constructions of a preexistent community of Gentile priests outside the nation of Israel. Mention of disputes over Job's identity appears in one of the letters of the *Church Father Jerome, where he identifies Job as descended from *Esau and not Levi, "although the Hebrews declare the contrary" (Lt. 73). For more on this topic, see J. R. Baskin, Pharaoh's Counsellors: Job, Jethro and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1983). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Joel is the second book of the twelve minor prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]). One of the few prophetic books without a date, Joel was probably written after the *Babylonian Exile. Its first two chapters describe a vague and terrifying threat to *Jerusalem (1:1–2:11) that culminates in a call to collective *repentance (2:12–17) and a divine response (2:18–32). Chapters 3 and 4 describe *God's intervention on *Judah's behalf, the restoration of its fortunes, and its engagement in a cosmic battle against national foes. Joel marks an important transition from the language of earlier prophecy to the *apocalyptic eschatological ideas that become prominent in post-biblical Judaism and early *Christianity.

Joel frequently refers to prior scripture, transforming its meaning in the process. For example, Joel 3:10 reverses the call to beat swords into plowshares found in *Micah 4:3 and *Isaiah 2:4. Joel also reimagines the "Day of YHWH," an important theological concept in early Israel. Originally, it referred to the belief in God's climactic intervention in history to defend the nation (Isaiah 34). *Amos had mocked naïve faith in YHWH's uncritical support of Israel, suggesting instead that the Day of YHWH meant judgment and not salvation (Amos 5:18–20). For Joel, the Day of YHWH retains this ambivalent character (1:15–18), but the conflict swiftly escalates from an earthly battle (2:1, 11) to a cosmic war (4:14–16). In this new understanding, the Day of YHWH also describes the nation's ultimate restoration (4:17–18).

EDWARD SILVER

Johanan ben Zakkai was a Pharisaic leader at the time of the First *Jewish War (66–70 CE) against *Rome (see PHARISEES). In many ways the founder of rabbinic Judaism (see JUDAISM; RABBINIC LITERATURE entries), Johanan is said to have obtained permission from the Roman authorities to leave the besieged city of *Jerusalem with his followers and to establish a center of learning at Yavneh (Jabneh, Jamnia). He is also credited with urging the substitution of ethical behavior (acts of lovingkindness) for the sacrificial cult that was no longer possible after the destruction of the *Temple in 70 CE (see JUDAISM; TANNAIM; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP).

Joint Distribution Committee (full title: the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, also known as the JDC or the Joint), is the largest Jewish relief and welfare organization granting assistance to Jews outside North America. It was founded in 1914, under the chairmanship of Felix M. Warburg, when American *Orthodox, *Reform, and socialist Jews joined forces to provide emergency aid to suffering Jewish populations in *Eastern Europe and *Palestine during World War I. JDC focused on child care and the distribution of food, clothes, and medical and sanitary aid. Beginning in 1923, JDC undertook rehabilitation and reconstruction of Jewish communities by founding a network of cooperative credit institutions for craftsmen and small businessmen, establishing courses for vocational training, and encouraging Jewish engagement in *agriculture throughout Eastern Europe. In 1924, in cooperation with the Soviet government, JDC launched a large-scale project for the agrarization of Soviet Jews left without a livelihood (Agro-Joint). As a result, more than 150,000 Jews settled on land in the Crimea and *Ukraine.

With Hitler's 1933 rise to power, through the *Holocaust period, JDC made efforts to provide relief and to rescue European Jews. Until December 1941, when the United States entered World War II, JDC legally supported the increasingly impoverished *German Jewish community and aided *Polish Jewish communal organizations. Subsequently, through its European headquarters in Lisbon, JDC supported illegal *Holocaust rescue and *resistance activities in German-occupied Europe, including armed resistance in *France and Poland. It sent parcels to Polish Jews in the *Soviet Union via Teheran, and it financially assisted Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg's efforts to rescue tens of thousands of Jews in *Hungary (see HOLOCAUST RESCUERS).

During the first post-war years, JDC cared for more than 200,000 Jews in *displaced persons camps in Europe and supported the illegal movement of Jews from Europe to *Palestine. JDC also invested heavily in the reconstruction of European Jewish communities. After the founding of *Israel in 1948, JDC subsidized the immigration of hundreds of thousands of Jews, first from Europe, *North Africa, and the Middle East and later from *Romania, *Ethiopia, and the *Soviet Union. In cooperation with the Israeli government, JDC established and fostered institutional care and social services for aged, handicapped, and chronically ill people in Israel (MALBEN) and aided in creating community centers and programs for weak and disadvantaged populations, including children and youth at risk. In 1976 it established JDC-Israel, moving its headquarters from *Tel Aviv to *Jerusalem.

Beginning in the 1950s when JDC was unable to operate openly in the Eastern Bloc countries (except in Poland between 1957 and 1967, and Romania since 1967), it financially supported the massive dispatch of individual clothing and food parcels, matzah for *Passover observance, and financial remittances, directed mostly by the Israeli governmental organization Nativ. JDC renewed its operations in Hungary, *Czechoslovakia, and Poland in the early 1980s and in the USSR in 1988. Dedicated to reviving Jewish communal life in the Soviet Union and its successor countries, JDC has set up more than 170 welfare centers (hasadim), which provide elderly and needy Jewish survivors with food, medical assistance, home care, and cultural activities, and 180 Jewish libraries. JDC supports the local Jewish press and fosters religious and cultural activity; it also builds new Jewish community centers. In addition, JDC strengthens Jewish education throughout Europe, trains young community leadership, and supports the European Council of Jewish Communities.

JDC continues to be involved in emergency operations, as during the 2000 economic crisis in *Argentina, which affected the well-being of tens of thousands of Argentine Jews. It also provides nonsectarian emergency aid, for example, to Armenia (1989) and Georgia (1992) after earthquakes, and to the tsunami victims in South Asia in 2004. At present JDC operates in more than fifty countries.

MICHAEL BEIZER

Jonah, the fifth book of the minor prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]), differs from other prophetic writings in that it is a narrative containing only one short oracle: "yet five days and Nineveh will be overturned" [or "will turn"; the Hebrew nehpakhet is ambiguous] (3:4). At the outset, Jonah ben Amittai flees aboard a ship rather than obey *God's command to prophesy destruction against Nineveh. When God responds by blasting the sea with storms, blame falls on Jonah and he is thrown overboard by the sailors. The storm ceases, but God sends a large fish to swallow Jonah; inside the fish, Jonah recites a *psalm-like prayer. After three days, the fish vomits Jonah up on the land (ch. 2). God repeats the call to prophesy and Jonah obeys, travels to Nineveh, and utters his oracle. All the inhabitants of the city, human and animal, repent, and God relents (ch. 3). When Jonah is enraged that his prophecy was not fulfilled, God teaches him a lesson about divine compassion by sending a plant to shade Jonah and then killing the plant with a worm. When Jonah laments the destruction of the plant, which he had neither planted nor tended, God responds, "And should I not care about Nineveh . . . ?" (4:11).

Some have understood the story as historical (a prophet of the same name appears in 1 Kgs 14:25). However, the book's fantastical, humorous, and exaggerated language has led most commentators to take it as a literary creation. Many read Jonah as a straightforwardly didactic narrative, although its fundamental playfulness and ambiguity stubbornly resist definitive interpretation. Presumably because of its emphasis on repentance, Jonah has traditionally been the haftarah (prophetic reading) during the afternoon service on *Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Recent research includes Y. Sherwood, A Biblical Text and Its Afterlives: The Survival of Jonah in Western Culture (2000).

SEAN BURT

Jonah ben Abraham Gerondi (1200–1263) was a *Spanish rabbi, writer, and moralist who studied in *France and lived at various times in Gerona, Barcelona, and Toledo, where he died. As a young man, he joined his teacher Solomon ben Abraham in attacking the philosophical writings of *Maimonides; later in life he repented and studied Maimonides' writings. His most important contribution was in *ethics (torat ha-musar). In his writings and sermons he preached against disregard of the *commandments, sexual immorality, and neglect and exploitation of the poor; he demanded that Jews of all social levels take a role in communal leadership and responsibility, even if only at the level of regular prayer. His works included commentaries on

*Proverbs and M. *Avot, a compilation on the laws of slaughter, and a number of other ethical and halakhic writings. Recent research includes, I. Ta-Shma, "Rabbi Yonah Gironi: Spirituality and Leadership," in M. Idel and M. Ostow, eds., Jewish Mystical Leaders and Leadership in the Thirteenth Century (1998).

Jonas, Regina (1902–1944), born in *Berlin, was the first woman to receive rabbinic ordination. Although she completed rabbinic studies at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, her teachers refused her ordination to avoid conflict with the German *Orthodox community. Instead, she was ordained privately in Berlin in 1935 by Max Diene-mann, a Liberal rabbi. Henceforth, her title was Fraülein Rabbiner Jonas. Jonas did not find a congregational pulpit, but served as a teacher and chaplain in Berlin. She published articles about Judaism and about her own experiences and lectured widely in Germany, taking on increasing communal responsibilities in Berlin when the *Nazi regime came to power. In November 1942, Jonas was deported to the ghetto of *Theresienstadt where she continued her pastoral and pedagogical work. Like other incarcerated Jewish leaders, she delivered many lectures for her fellow prisoners; five of these focused on the history of Jewish women. Jonas was sent to *Auschwitz where she was murdered on December 12, 1944. Recent scholarship includes K. Von Kellenbach, "'God Does Not Oppress Any Human Being': The Life and Thought of Rabbi Regina Jonas," Leo Baeck Year Book (1994); idem "Denial and Defiance in the Work of Rabbi Regina Jonas," in In God's Name: Genocide and Religion in the 20th Century, ed. P. Mack and O. Bartov (2000); and E. Klapheck, Fraülein Rabbiner Jonas: The Story of the First Woman Rabbi (2004); see also RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Joseph (Gen 37, 39–50) is the eleventh son of *Jacob and firstborn son of *Rachel, father of Manasseh and Ephraim (ISRAELITES: TRIBES), and the central figure in an extended *narrative in *Genesis 37–50. Joseph is Jacob's favorite son for whom he made "a coat of many colors" (37:3). Joseph's envious brothers sell him to Midianite merchants (37:28), who in turn sell him to the Egyptian Potiphar (39:1). Potiphar's wife falsely accuses Joseph of attempted rape and Joseph is imprisoned (39:20). In prison, Joseph explains the dreams of other inmates, and when Pharaoh needs a dream interpreter Joseph is summoned (41:14). When Joseph explains Pharaoh's dreams as predictions of seven fertile years followed by seven years of famine, Pharaoh appoints Joseph to be his viceroy over *Egypt (41:40). Under Joseph's management, the Egyptians build grain depots to prepare for the lean years. When famine comes, Jacob's sons go to Egypt to buy grain and eventually encounter Joseph but do not recognize him. After a period of testing, Joseph forgives his brothers and explains that their actions had been part of the divine plan (45:5). Jacob and his family settle in Egypt where the Israelites stay until the Exodus. During their departure from Egypt, the Israelites take Joseph's bones with them, as they had promised (Exod 13:19). According to tradition, Joseph is buried in *Shechem, a city in the territory of the tribe of Manasseh. There is no tribe of Joseph; rather, Joseph's two sons each became the father of a half-tribe.

MOSHE RACHMUTH

Josephus, Flavius (37–ca. 100 CE), was a nobleman, *priest, general of Jewish troops in the *Galilee during the First *Jewish War against *Rome, and later a writer in Rome under the protection of the Flavian Dynasty. The importance of Josephus' works, all written in Greek, can hardly be overstated. Four complete works survive: The Jewish War (events of 66–73 CE, with a lengthy pre-history), Jewish Antiquities (from creation to the eve of war, with extensive biblical paraphrase), Life of Josephus (his brief career as a Galilean commander), and the work known as Against Apion (a vigorous defense of Jewish law and custom). These volumes tell us most of what we claim to know about Judean society in the later *Second Temple period, including the later *Hasmoneans, King *Herod and his descendants, Roman administration of Judea and the first revolt (66–73 CE), Galilean society, the high priesthood and the *Temple regimen, *Pharisees, *Sadducees, *Essenes, and other pietistic and insurgent groups.

The traditional scholarly approach to Josephus downplayed his importance as a writer and thinker – partly because of the presumed character flaws of this “general” who surrendered to the Roman enemy and lived the latter half of his life comfortably in Rome; partly because the Church preserved his works for Christian apologetic purposes; partly because he was thought to have strung together sources without much original input; and partly because, where his narratives overlap, contradictions abound. Scholars tended to evaluate his writings in terms of historical realities, which were increasingly being illuminated by *archeology. Because his descriptions of Judean sites proved generally correct, Josephus was often declared an accurate historian.

Since the 1980s, scholarship on both the literary and historical fronts has changed its assumptions and methods. On the one hand, new tools have facilitated careful investigation of Josephus' writings as artful compositions. This analysis, illustrated by several translation and commentary projects, has led to a new appreciation of his intelligence and skill. When we read Josephus' writings as structured narratives, against a Roman context in which the ruling Flavians were elaborately celebrating the recent defeat of the Judeans (81–96 CE), we recognize their power as coherent assertions of the Judean character. On the other hand, this very recognition of Josephus' artistry complicates the practice of co-opting passages thought to be “unbiased,” as if they were neutral statements of fact. Josephus' biases, which color every phrase, turn out to be historically important, for they bring to life in abundant detail the situation of a Judean nobleman in post-70 Rome. For further reading, see P. Bilde, Flavius Josephus between Jerusalem and Rome (1988); and S. Mason, Josephus, Judea, and Christian Origins: Methods and Categories (2009).

STEVE MASON

Joshua is the book that inaugurates the *Prophets (Nevi'im), the middle section of the Hebrew *Bible. Joshua introduces a new era marked by the rise of a generation that did not know slavery in *Egypt, and it begins the story of the Israelites' return to their ancestral homeland. At the same time, Joshua emphasizes fidelity to the *God of Israel and adherence to the *Torah in the same language as *Deuteronomy. Scholars recognize the book of Joshua as part of a collection of historically oriented writings known as the “Deuteronomistic History” that includes Deuteronomy, Joshua, *Judges, 1 and 2 *Samuel, and 1 and 2 *Kings. Joshua's leadership is contingent on the degree to which he resembles *Moses and upholds the *Torah.

The book of Joshua can be divided into two parts: Israel's battles of conquest and the redistricting of the land to accommodate the tribes of Israel. The book begins east of the Jordan River and describes the miraculous crossing: The river stops flowing when the feet of the *priests carrying the *Ark of the Covenant touch the water, and all Israel crosses on dry land (3–4). The ritual dimension of this event is emphasized when the men of Israel undergo mass *circumcision, the people celebrate *Passover, and Joshua encounters the Divine in the form of the captain of a heavenly army (5). In 8:30–35, after a victorious battle, the people of Israel stand between the mountains of Gerizim and Ebal as Joshua publicly recites the Torah to the people. Joshua 11 concludes with the declaration that “Joshua conquered all of the land.”

The second portion of the book focuses on the territorial claims of individual *Israelite tribes. These boundary lists reflect the territorial divisions that existed in the period of the Divided Monarchy (ca. 931–722 BCE; see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP) when regional and tribal affiliations coexisted with national and religious affiliations. Joshua 21 addresses the situation of the tribe of Levi that inherits sacred duties rather than territory; because they still require a place to live and to pasture their flocks, the other tribes must relinquish certain towns and fields to sustain them. The book concludes with Joshua's preparations for his death (23) and the renewal of the national *covenant at *Shechem (24). The importance of the Jordan crossing and conquest of the land in the larger narrative of Israel's founding, exile, and return has led some scholars to propose the idea of a Hexateuch, a six-book canon spanning *Genesis to Joshua, rather than a five-book *Pentateuch.

Although Joshua is represented as a focused general, he is something of a flat character, lacking the pathos associated with such figures as *Moses or *David. Some have suggested that Joshua is intended as a model of a good king whose attributes are reflected in the Judean kings *Hezekiah and *Josiah.

Jews and Christians have understood the book of Joshua as demonstrating the ideology that homeland entails warfare. Joshua espouses the notion of “holy war” insofar as battles and the displacement of resident populations are sanctioned by God and the spoils of war are placed under a ban called *herem. Because of its explicit military theme, Joshua has also been subject to critical readings. The Rabbis who wrote and compiled the *Talmud and *midrash excised the notion of holy war from Judaism, in part by commenting very little on the book of Joshua. Contemporary readings have observed counter traditions, arguing that rather than exterminating their neighbors, the tribes of Israel lived alongside them (6:25, 9:26–27, 11:22, 13:13, 16:10, 17:11–13) and that “the Jebusites dwell with the people of Judah in Jerusalem until today” (15:63).

For further reading, see G. Mitchell, Together in the Land: A Reading of the Book of Joshua (1993); and M. Weinfeld, The Promise of the Land: The Inheritance of the Land of Canaan by the Israelites (1993); see also BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE.

RACHEL HAVRELOCK

Josiah, king of *Judah (687–608 BCE), is praised highly for his devotion to “the ways of his ancestor *David” (2 Kgs 22:1–2). During Josiah’s thirty-three-year reign, a “book of teaching,” probably *Deuteronomy, was “discovered” while the *Temple was being repaired (2 Kgs 22:8–10). On the basis of this scroll, whose authenticity was validated by the female *prophet Huldah (2 Kgs 22: 14–20; 2 Chron 34:22–28) and that was publicly read before the elders (2 Kgs 23:1–3; 2 Chron 34:29–33), Josiah reestablished the Mosaic *covenant with the people. He introduced successful, if short-lived, religious reforms that centralized worship in the *Jerusalem Temple, eradicated pagan shrines and religious objects from the land (2 Kgs 23:4–20; 2 Chron 34:1–7), and returned the people to the commandments, injunctions, and laws of the “Lord, God of their fathers” (2 Chron 34: 31–33). Josiah was killed in battle against Neco, Pharaoh of *Egypt (2 Kgs 23:29–30), and succeeded by his son Jehoahaz.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Josippon, Book of (Sefer Yosippon). This *Hebrew book derives from the Hegessipus, a Latin manuscript based on *Josephus’ The Jewish War and Antiquities of the Jews. Written in southern *Italy by an anonymous author in the tenth century CE, this work chronicles Jewish history from creation to the end of the First *Jewish War against *Rome. The first printed edition was published in Mantua in 1480; an illustrated *Yiddish version was printed in Zurich in 1546. See also MARTYRDOM.

Journalism: Israel. A lack of formal training has characterized journalism in Israel since the first *Hebrew newspaper in *Palestine, Ha-Levanon, appeared in 1863. Although the press has nurtured the growth of numerous political leaders and even produced recipients of the country’s most prestigious national award, the Israel Prize, Israel had no institutionalized journalism education program until the beginning of the 1990s. In fact, the academic world and the media were often at loggerheads, expressing mutual alienation and mistrust.

The birth of Israel as a democratic state ostensibly guaranteed freedom of the press, after many decades of tight official supervision during the *Ottoman era and the *British Mandate period. Since its establishment in 1963, the Israel Press Council has played an important role in protecting this freedom and the independence of journalists. The Press Council, whose members include representatives of the public (including the Council’s president), publishers, editors, and members of the National Journalists’ Union, has succeeded in blocking legislative initiatives liable to diminish press independence. The Press Council formulated the Code of Ethics that serves as a guideline for Israeli journalists. Local journalists’ associations are active in Israel’s three largest cities: in *Jerusalem since 1933 and in *Tel Aviv and Haifa since 1935; these are linked to the National Journalists’ Union. For decades, the power of the national union, established in 1948, was derived from its status as the representative organization in negotiations over wage agreements, all of which were collective. Over the years, the union’s representative status has decreased considerably, primarily as the result of the shift from collective work agreements to individual contracts. As a result, many contemporary Israeli journalists are not members of the journalists’ associations or the union.

The Israeli press originated from various sources. During the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the first journalists arrived from Eastern and Western Europe. Some were influenced by the writing styles of Jewish periodicals published in *Poland and *Russia; others adhered to Western European press norms. Subsequently, Israeli journalists assigned to the United States returned with a clear preference for American reporting styles and procedures. This covert struggle between East and West has characterized Israeli journalism for decades.

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem was the first to offer studies in communications, but the concentration was on theory, with no substantive professional training except for a few rather eclectic workshops. Other universities followed that pattern. The gap was partially filled by private enterprises offering semi-professional courses. Many journalists began their careers by performing their compulsory military service in the Israeli Defense Forces media (a radio station and some periodicals). Others found their way to the profession by chance or employee referral. Training itself took place primarily on the job. In the early 1990s some colleges began to offer journalism courses taught by experienced professionals as part of the communications curriculum. Nevertheless, at the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century no Israeli academic institution offers a degree in journalism. For further reading, see D. Caspi and Y. Limor, The In/Outsiders: The Mass Media in Israel (1999); and Y. Limor, “The Media in Israel,” in Trends in Israeli Society, ed. E. Ya’ar and Z. Shavit (2003), 1017–1103. YEHIEL LIMOR Journalism, Ladino (Ottoman Empire). The *Ladino press in the *Ottoman Empire, the first and most influential genre of modern Ladino print culture, played a central role in westernizing Ottoman Jewry. It emerged in the aftermath of the *Damascus Affair (the *ritual murder accusation of 1840), which directed the attention of western Jews to the plight of their eastern co-religionists and demonstrated the importance of disseminating information for building international Jewish solidarity. The first Ladino newspaper, La Buena Esperansa (The Good Hope), appeared in Izmir in 1842. Between 1842 and 1939, approximately 275 Ladino periodicals were published in the Ottoman Empire and its former territories, although only some survived. The majority appeared in Salonika (105), Istanbul (45), Sofia (30), and Izmir (23). The Ladino press consisted of annual, monthly, weekly, and daily publications (with some variations). The publications varied in format and length, ranging from four to more than thirty-two pages, and some had supplements.

These periodicals fundamentally transformed Ladino as a language and made print culture accessible to the masses. *Sephardic journalists achieved this transformation by replacing Hebrew and Turkish words with Romance equivalents often glossed in parentheses. Although the first Ladino newspapers presupposed a knowledge of Hebrew, thus addressing only educated men, by the 1870s most periodicals were intended for mass readerships of both sexes. There are no reliable figures for the circulation of Ladino periodicals. An analysis of available data suggests that even the most popular Ladino newspapers sold in the hundreds. Yet, their actual circulation significantly surpassed these numbers, because each issue was shared by relatives and neighbors and was read aloud to the illiterate. Thus one subscription sufficed for ten or more people. By the 1900s, both men and women could read newspapers in cafes and at the libraries of some clubs (e.g., the Salonikan Kadima).

Some Ladino periodicals were subsidized by *Zionist organizations, *B'nai B'rith, or rarely, the *Alliance Israélite Universelle; others fully depended on subscriptions, sales, and advertisements. To attract more readers, they published serialized novels, often sold later as chapbooks alongside other books produced by the same publisher. Many periodicals closed for lack of funds and others were understaffed and barely survived.

After 1878, all Ottoman publications were subject to censorship, which became especially severe in the 1890s. Official authorization was required to found a periodical, and all periodicals were obliged to defend Ottoman interests and discredit the sultan's enemies. Periodicals were prohibited from indicating their circulation, reporting on assassinations and rebellions, and using such words as "massacre," "dynamite," and "constitution." Thus, in July 1908, El Tiempo (Istanbul, 1872–1930) was closed by censorship for an "indefinite period." After the Young Turk revolution (1908) when censorship was abolished and Zionist organizations were legalized, the Sephardi press experienced an unprecedented boom that resulted in the appearance of dozens of new periodicals, particularly Zionist, socialist, and humorous ones.

The founders of the early Ladino newspapers (e.g., Betzalel Saadi Halévy, Yehuda Nehama) were maskilim (adherents of the Haskalah*) who had not received a secular education but shared liberal views and a concern for what they perceived as the ignorance and fanaticism of their co-religionists. Most of the journalists whose careers began in the 1880s and later (e.g., Elia Carmona, Alexander Ben Ghiat, Shmuel Saadi Halévy) were graduates of the Alliance Israélite Universelle schools, fluent in a few languages, and knowledgeable in Jewish history and tradition. Some (e.g., David Fresco, Joseph Romano, Abraham Galante) were persecuted and even excommunicated by rabbinical authorities, who felt threatened by their publications. Despite the differences in their ideological stances, all Ladino periodicals endeavored to disseminate progressive ideas, offer objective coverage of local and international developments, enlighten their readers, and provide them with appropriate entertainment.

The impact of the Ladino press, which was both a tool and a product of westernization, on the Ottoman Jews exceeded the most ambitious aspirations of its creators. It connected generations of Sephardim to the larger world, increased literacy, developed reading habits of men and women, supported modern Ladino fiction, and created a sphere of public discussions inside and between Ottoman Jewish communities. For further reading, see G. Nassi, ed., Jewish Journalism and Printing Houses in the Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey (2001); and S. A. Stein, Making Jews Modern: The Yiddish and Ladino Press in the Russian and Ottoman Empires (2003).

OLGA BOROVAYA

newspapers of the Early Republic such as the National Advocate and the New York Evening Star. A Democrat and a proto-*Zionist or "restorationist," Noah personified the slash-and-burn style of early American newspapers that would later be discredited by Adolph S. Ochs (1855–1935), the most important Jew in the history of U.S. journalism. In 1896, this young publisher of the Chattanooga Times purchased a financially failing daily, the New York Times. Without disavowing a preference for the Democratic Party, he upheld an ideal of objectivity that would become the twentieth-century standard against which the best of newspaper journalism was henceforth measured.

Ochs insisted on news gathering that would accumulate facts to be presented impartially in the Times. He was reluctant to interfere in the editorial decisions of the newspaper that he and his family owned, and he maintained strict separation between the news columns and the editorial page. Ochs' values were conveyed to his descendants as well. His son-in-law, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, published the Times from 1935 until 1961; another son-in-law, Orvil Dryfoos, from 1961 until 1963; and then Ochs' son Arthur Ochs (Punch) Sulzberger from 1963 until 1992. Punch Sulzberger's son, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger Jr., became the first non-Jew in the family to run the newspaper. The fidelity to the Ochs tradition is traced in S. E. Tift and A. S. Jones's The Trust (1999).

In the tenacity with which editors and reporters pursued and presented stories, the Times dwarfed all other newspapers in the world. No other newspaper was ever so comprehensive; its news room covered 1.3 acres. Although the newspaper was generally deferential to Washington until the 1960s, the Times very often deserved its reputation for making a serious stab at impartiality. Its Jewish ownership was not irrelevant, however, to the history of the Times. Ochs' own admiration for German Kultur may have slowed the newspaper's recognition of Germany's descent into *Nazi barbarism. During World War II, coverage of the *Holocaust was shockingly inadequate (a failure that was hardly unique). The family's opposition to *Zionism was patent. Anxieties about *antisemitism also stunted the careers of some Jewish reporters and editors. Because the Times was known as a "Jewish newspaper," it was not until 1977 that a Jew (A. M. Rosenthal) became its executive editor; it was another seven years before Thomas L. Friedman became the first Jewish bureau chief assigned to cover *Israel and its neighbors.

Similar concerns haunted the career and the reputation of Walter Lippmann (1889–1974), the ablest intellectual of the twentieth century to work within the field of American journalism. He co-founded and co-edited the leading liberal weekly magazine, The New Republic, in 1914 and in the following decade presided over the editorial page of the Pulitzer family's fabled New York World. By the end of the 1920s, Lippmann had invented the syndicated column of political opinion, and from his perch at the New York Herald-Tribune, he was able to hover above the rest of the media and indeed above diplomacy. Until the 1960s, foreign governments were said to formally accredit their ambassadors to the president and by private letter to Lippmann. Ronald Steel's biography, Walter Lippmann and the American Century (1980), also exposes the private shame that this brilliant political analyst and gifted prose stylist harbored because of Journalism: United States (English Language). The first significant journalist of Jewish origin in the United States was Mordecai M. Noah (1785–1851), an editor of partisan his Jewish origins, as well as his psychic struggle to sustain an Olympian stance of disinterestedness.

Lippmann's approach to journalism was interpretive. Yet if the gathering of news, rather than the formation of opinion, is what distinguished American journalism after Ochs, then no one more fully exemplified the pursuit of scoops than Herbert Bayard Swope (1882–1958). He won the first Pulitzer Prize for reporting (1917) and beat out all other reporters at the Versailles Peace Conference, getting a front-row seat by dressing as a diplomat. From a campaign speech by Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, Swope singled out the phrase "new deal"; fifteen years later, he coined the phrase "cold war."

Such figures as Lippmann and Swope did not alter the perception of daily journalism as devoid of prestige, at least in the first half of the twentieth century; the absence of snobbery gave vocational opportunities to the ambitious and the reckless. Ben Hecht (1894–1964) not only lived the myth of a flamboyant press but he also largely created that myth, especially in The Front Page, the 1928 play that he co-authored. Covering *Chicago during an era that was scandalous for the extent of its corruption, criminality, and raunchiness, Hecht more than anyone else drew the profile of the archetypal newspaperman: a cynical drunkard indifferent to the Victorian moral code and defiant of genteel notions of privacy. Nothing could have been less predictable than the political turn that Hecht took in the 1940s, when Nazism turned him into an ardent Jewish nationalist and the battle for *Palestine turned him into a right-wing Zionist, although by then he had abandoned his newspaper career for Hollywood (see FILM: UNITED STATES; ZIONISM).

The impact of Jews on American journalism has been so huge that bigots from Henry Ford (in The International Jew) to Richard Nixon (on the Oval Office tapes) took notice. Yet, Jewish ownership of newspapers has been statistically insignificant. Here the Times has loomed large, although it is quite atypical. What is striking about the chain begun by Samuel I. Newhouse (1895–1979) is the sheer variety of its media outlets, rather than any political or ethnic perspective that the family has sought to impose; the chief interest has been profit, not policy. Jews have certainly been prominent as editors, columnists, and pundits – especially in recent decades and when only three *television networks flourished. At one time or another, CBS, NBC and ABC each had Jewish presidents (appointed by boards of directors; see BROADCASTING INDUSTRY: RADIO AND TELEVISION). Yet, the polyvocal character of the American media mitigates against anything so simplistic as a clear and coherent Jewish interest, much less Jewish domination (see also PERIODICALS: CANADA; PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES [ENGLISH LANGUAGE]).

STEPHEN J. WHITFIELD

Journalism, Yiddish (Eastern Europe). The *Yiddish press in Eastern Europe before the 1880s was shaped by the ideology of the Haskalah, which typically held Yiddish in low esteem but used it to communicate with the largest number of Jewish readers. The first "Yiddish" newspaper was the *Warsaw weekly, Der Beobachter an der Weykhsel (1823–24), which promoted the ideal of cultural integration into Polish society. However, it actually appeared in German transliterated into Hebrew letters with an admixture of Hebrew words. Kol mevaser (1862–73) reflected the *Ukrainian Yiddish of its editor Alexander Zederbaum, despite bearing a Hebrew title for reasons of prestige. Ostensibly aimed at female readers, it began its career as a profit-generating supplement to the entrepreneur's Hebrew newspaper Ha-Melitz. It played a pioneering role in Yiddish journalism, helping bring news of events and ideas from the wider world to still largely traditional readers and popularizing the serialized works of a new generation of important Yiddish writers.

After the closing of Dos yidishe folksblat (1881–90), Zederbaum's second Yiddish newspaper, Russian officials routinely rejected tens of requests for concessions to found a new Yiddish newspaper on the grounds that censors were ignorant of zhargon and that the applicants were politically unreliable. The government was far more lenient in granting permission for Hebrew publications, possibly because it considered Hebrew a classical language whose audience was a relatively small and conservative elite and whose use did not conflict with the goal of linguistically Russifying Jews. The government nonetheless permitted the appearance of a number of Yiddish periodicals of significant literary and intellectual caliber, such as the annuals Yudishe folksbibliotek (Kiev, 1888 and 1889) and Yudishe bibliotek (1891, 1892, 1895) and the *Zionist Der yud (printed in Kraków but edited in *Warsaw, 1899–1903). Expressing an emerging Jewish nationalist sensibility, these journals printed essays of historical, sociological, and scientific character as well as works of belles lettres, helping standardize Yiddish and increasing its prestige as a literary language.

With a Yiddish daily press that was effectively illegal in tsarist *Russia, newspapers were legally imported from neighboring countries. Publications appearing in the politically more liberal *Habsburg *Galicia included the monthly Tsaytung, published in Lemberg during the revolutionary year 1848, the bimonthly Der izraelit (1869–72); and the daily Togblat (Lemberg, 1904–39). Until World War I, Yiddish newspaper publication in *Romania was concentrated in Jassy (Koyroys hoitim, weekly, 1855–56, 1867–71) and Bucharest (Hayoets lebeys yisroel berumenye, biweekly, 1874–1913, an early supporter of the Hivat Tzion movement). A number of clandestine Yiddish publications, the work of socialist and revolutionary parties such as the *Bund's Der yidisher arbayter (1896–97), were also either printed illegally in Russia or smuggled in from abroad. The first full-fledged Yiddish daily in Russia, Der fraynd (1903–13), appeared in *Saint Petersburg, far away from the millions of Yiddish speakers in the *Pale of Settlement and Congress Poland, until transferring its offices in late 1909 to Warsaw. The liberalization of tsarist press policies allowed for a virtual explosion of dailies around 1905. In the wake of the first Russian Revolution, Warsaw became the "metropolis of the Yiddish press" in Eastern Europe.

In independent *Poland, Yiddish periodicals and newspapers spanned the ideological and cultural spectrum, including sports, political satire, literature and criticism, scholarship, and children's interests. Among the most widely read dailies in the interwar period were the bitter rivals Haynt (left-leaning Zionist) and Der moment (nonpartisan and later Revisionist Zionist), the Warsaw Bundist organ Folktsaytung, Agudat Israel's Der yud*, and the *Vilna Tog. As linguistic Polonization intensified in this period, however, Yiddish periodicals faced increasing competition from both the Polish and the growing Polish Jewish presses. Just as Hebrew writers and editors were often also active in Yiddish publishing, many of those active in Yiddish worked simultaneously for Polish Jewish publications.

In the *Soviet Union, where Yiddish was recognized as the national language of the Jews while Hebrew- and Russian-language Jewish presses were eliminated, the state-supported Yiddish press encouraged many new and amateur writers, often of inferior caliber. Conforming to the dictate, “socialist in content, national in form,” it was constrained by official ideology and its Jewish content was generally weak; Jews often preferred to read the dominant Russian press instead. The largest dailies Der emes (Moscow, 1920–38, earlier called Di varhayt), Der shtern (Kharkov, 1925–41), and Oktyaber (Minsk, 1925–41) appeared alongside smaller local papers. However, many political, literary, and scholarly journals (among them Di royte velt, Di yidishe shprakh, and Der prolit) were often of excellent quality. Their numbers and frequency declined by the late 1930s because of the increasingly severe repression of Yiddish culture and growing linguistic assimilation.

The annexation of Bessarabia and Bukovina by Romania, areas with large numbers of unacculturated Jews, significantly increased its Jewish population and reinforced Yiddish cultural life in the interwar years. A variety of publications of an ideological, literary, and humorous character appeared, including the literary-political journal Tshernovitsker bleter (1928–38). Severed from the larger Jewish communities of Poland and the USSR, Jews in the *Baltic states had difficulty sustaining a Yiddish press because of their limited numbers, but they managed to publish dailies in Lithuania and Latvia for much of this period. Although even traditional Jews in *Hungary tended to speak Hungarian, a Yiddish press also existed in Subcarpathian Ruthenia, which was Hungarian before World War I and Czechoslovakian thereafter.

After the *Holocaust, a number of weekly and semi-weekly Yiddish publications representing different political views appeared between 1945 and 1949 in Poland. However, the post-WW II *communist regime permitted only a single Yiddish newspaper, Di folks-shtime (1945–91). It was considered more liberal than the Soviet Yiddish press and explored a greater number of Jewish issues after the period of liberalization in 1956. Little was published in Yiddish in the USSR after Stalin’s suppression of Yiddish culture (1948–52), with the exception of the newspaper Birobidzhaner shtern (1930–present) in the Jewish autonomous region of *Birobidjan. The Moscow literary monthly Sovetish heymland (1961–91) appeared after Stalin’s death, largely to appease voices in the West who complained about the suppression of Jewish culture and to disseminate Soviet propaganda at home and especially abroad. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Sovetish heymland continued as Di yidishe gas (1993–97).

For further reading, see G. Estrikh, “The Yiddish-Language Communist Press,” Studies in Contemporary Jewry 20 (2004): 62–82; A. Greenbaum, “Newspapers and Periodicals,” in The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe (2005); A. Orbach, New Voices of Russian Jewry (1980); and S. A. Stein, Making Jews Modern: The Yiddish and Ladino Press in the Russian and Ottoman Empires (2004).

KALMAN WEISER

Journalism, Yiddish (North America). The North American *Yiddish press first arose in the 1870s and 1880s at the start of the mass migration of Yiddish-speaking Jews from *Eastern Europe to the *United States. The immigrants brought with them no tradition of newspaper reading, so the American Yiddish press helped pioneer the development of modern Yiddish journalism. Thus, journalists played an important role in the emergence of Yiddish as a modern public language in which it was possible to discuss a wide range of political and cultural subjects. The Yiddish press cemented ethnic communal ties and brought news from the “old home,” but it also Americanized the immigrants by translating the life of their new country into a language they understood.

In its heyday, the Yiddish press included hundreds of dailies, weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies covering a wide spectrum of ideological outlooks and special interests. However, it started slowly, with the earliest publications, the Yidishe tsaytung and the Yidishe post (both 1870), culling much of their content from European Hebrew and German sources. Over the next three decades many publications came and went, often after just a few issues. Most were weeklies, with an occasional attempt to publish a daily newspaper. Kasriel Sarasohn (1835–1905), an immigrant from near Suwalki, Russian Poland, published the first Yiddish daily newspaper. He settled in *New York City in 1871 and, after one false start, began in 1874 to publish the weekly Yidishe gazetn (1874–1928), which became the first Yiddish daily for two brief stints in 1881 and 1883. In 1885, Sarasohn began to issue the Yidishes tageblat, a daily that was *Orthodox in religious orientation, conservative in politics, and sensationalistic in its approach to news. This proved a successful combination, and the Tageblat maintained its status as the most widely read Yiddish newspaper for two decades, until it was absorbed by the Morgn zhurnal in 1928.

The formula of combining high-mindedness with sensationalist reporting was perfected by Abraham Cahan (1860–1951), the long-time editor of the Forverts (Jewish Daily Forward). The Forverts was established in 1897 under Cahan’s editorship as the organ of a dissident faction of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). After several months at the helm of the Forverts, Cahan, who hailed from near *Vilna and who wrote in Yiddish, Russian, and English, joined the staff of the Commercial Advertiser. When he returned to the Forverts for good in 1901, he transformed it into a lively and popular newspaper. On any given day, the front page might include news of local murders and suicides along with stories on socialist advances in Europe or strikes in New York. Inside were didactic articles on socialist theory and drama criticism along with trashy serialized novels. Cahan’s most famous innovations were the “Gallery of Missing Husbands,” which featured photographs of men who had deserted their families, and the Bintl brif (Bundle of Letters), in which readers wrote to the editors seeking advice on personal problems. Soon, the Forverts overtook the Tageblat to become the most popular Yiddish daily in the world, as well as the most widely read socialist daily in the country.

By 1901, there were six Yiddish dailies in New York City: the Tageblat; the Forverts; the Abenblat (1894–1902), an organ of the SLP; the Teglikher Herold (1891–1904); the Yidisher Abendpost (1899–1905); and the Morgn Zhurnal (1901–53), Plate 1. ASTARTE FIGURINES. Judah, Israelite period, 8th century–early 6th century BCE. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession numbers: 68.32.4, 64.67/3, 64.67/4 IAA 60–725, 80–2. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Slapak. See ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; CANAAN, CANAANITES; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; and WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS.

Plate 2. DEAD SEA SCROLL: The Community Rule (detail). Qumran, 1st century BCE–1st century CE. Parchment. The Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession number: 96.83/208A. Photo © The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. See ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; and QUMRAN.

Plate 3. SYNAGOGUE MOSAIC FLOOR (detail): The central shrine (possibly a Torah ark) and the menorahs, shofars, and incense shovels symbolize the Jerusalem Temple and expectation of messianic redemption. Beth Shean, Byzantine period, 6th century CE. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. IAA Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BYZANTINE EMPIRE; DECAPOLIS CITIES; MENORAH; MESSIANISM: BIBLICAL AND SECOND TEMPLE ERAS; SHOFAR; and SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT.

Plate 4. THE REGENSBURG PENTATEUCH: This depiction of Aaron the High Priest lighting the Tabernacle menorah, with Tabernacle implements, invokes a rebuilt Temple and future redemption. Regensburg, Bavaria, Germany, ca. 1300 CE. Pen and ink, tempera and gold leaf on vellum. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession number: B05.0009; 180/05. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by David Harris. See AARON; ART: MEDIEVAL MANUSCRIPT ILLUSTRATION; MENORAH; TABERNACLE; and TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT.

Plate 5. PASSOVER PLATE. Spain, ca. 1480. Earthenware. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Jakob Michael, New York, in memory of his wife, Erna Sondheimer-Michael. Accession number: B65.12.0483; 134/057. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Slapak. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; PASSOVER; and SPAIN, CHRISTIAN.

Plate 6. BRIDAL CASKET (cofanetto) represents from right to left the three duties incumbent on Jewish women: hallah (putting aside a portion of the Sabbath dough); niddah; and hadlakat ha-ner (kindling Sabbath lights). North Italy, late 15th century. Cast and engraved silver, niello, partly gilt. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Astorre Mayer, Milan Accession number: B51.04.0207; 131/030. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See NIDDAH; SABBATH; IMMERSION, RITUAL: WOMEN; MIKVEH; and WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM.

Plate 7. MAHZOR CORFU: Elijah sounding a shofar while leading the Messiah into Jerusalem. Corfu, Greece, 1709. Courtesy of The Library of The Jewish Theological Seminary. See ELIJAH: BIBLICAL AND POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; GREECE; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; PRAYER BOOKS; SHOFAR; and WORSHIP.

Plate 8. TORAH FINIALS (rimonim). Cochin, India, 18th century–19th century. Gold: repoussé, cutout and engraved; tin backing. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART64627. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; COCHIN JEWS; INDIA; and TORAH.

Plate 9. Israel Dov Rosenbaum, MIZRAH (an ornamental plaque on the wall of a synagogue or home indicating east [mizrah], the direction of prayer). Podkamen, Ukraine, 1877. Paint, ink, and pencil on cut-out paper. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Helen W. Finkel in memory of Israel Dov Rosenbaum and Bessie Rosenbaum Finkel. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NYART312632. See SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY; SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN; and WORSHIP.

Plate 10. ḤANUKKAH LAMP. Central Anti-Atlas Mountains (?) (Morocco), 19th–early 20th century. Copper alloy; cast and enameled. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Dr. Harry G. Friedman Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART392475. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; CEREMONIAL OBJECTS: ISLAMIC LANDS; ḤANUKKAH; and NORTH AFRICA.

Plate 11. Ze'ev Raban (1890–1970), HANUKKAH LAMP. Bezalel School, Jerusalem, early 1920s. Copper alloy: die-stamped. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Dr. Harry G. Friedman, F 5455. Location: NY, U.S.A. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART392476. See ART: ISRAELI; CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; and HANUKKAH.

Plate 12. Isidor Kaufmann (1853–1921), FRIDAY EVENING, ca. 1920. Oil on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Schweitzer, JM 4–63. Photo: John Parnell. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART58316. See ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; SABBATH; and WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE.

Plate 13. El (Eleazar) Lissitzky (1890–1941), HAD GADYA SUITE (Tale of a Goat): Depiction of “Father bought a kid for two zuzim,” 1919. Lithograph on paper. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Leonard E. and Phyllis S. Greenberg, 1986–121c. Location: NY, U.S.A. © Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART154902. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS: “Modern Era”; and PASSOVER.

Plate 14. Marc Chagall (1887–1985), WHITE CRUCIFIXION, 1938. Oil on canvas. The Art Institute of Chicago. Gift of Alfred S. Alschuler, 1946.925. Photography © The Art Institute of Chicago. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; POGROM; RUSSIA; and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.

Plate 15. Jacques Lipchitz (1891–1973), THE SACRIFICE, 1949–57. Bronze. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Albert A. List, JM 16–65. Photo by Richard Goodbody, Inc. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART312382. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.

Plate 16. Max Weber (1881–1961), STILL LIFE WITH CHALLAH, ca. 1930. Oil on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Joy S. Weber, 1994–59. Photo Credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY Art392477. See ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; and SABBATH.

Plate 17. Lee Krasner (1908–1984), SELF-PORTRAIT, ca. 1930. Oil on linen. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Purchase: Esther Leah Ritz Bequest; B. Gerald Cantor, Lady Kathleen Epstein, and Louis E. and Rosalyn M. Schechter Gifts. Location: NY, U.S.A. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART379662. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940.

Plate 18. Ben Shahn (1898–1969), NEW YORK, 1947. Tempera on paper mounted on panel. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Purchase: Oscar and Regina Gruss Charitable and Educational Foundation Fund, 1996–23. Photo: John Parnell. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART132848. See ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; and ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and NEW YORK CITY.

Plate 19. Leonard Baskin (1922–2000), THE ALTAR, 1977. Lindenwood: carved and laminated. Location: The Jewish Museum, New York City. Photo credit: © Estate of the artist. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.

Plate 20. Deborah Kass (b. 1952), SIX BLUE BARBRAS (THE JEWISH JACKIE SERIES), 1992. Screen print and acrylic on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Seth Cohen, 2004–10. Photo by Richard Goodbody, Inc. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY / Art Resource, NY ART334071. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and CELEBRITIES.

Plate 21. Ephraim Moses Lilien (1874–1925), SKETCH FOR A CARPET (triptych; dedicated to Mr. and Mrs. David Wolffson): right: GALUT [exile], center: ALLEGORICAL WEDDING, left: LIBERATION, 1906. Oil and pencil on canvas. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. Accession number: B88.0279. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; and ART: ISRAELI.

Plate 22. Reuven Rubin, FIRST FRUITS (triptych): right: SERENITY (THE BEDOUINE); center: FRUIT OF THE LAND; left: THE SHEPHERD, 1923. Oil on canvas. Rubin Museum Collection, Tel Aviv. See ART: ISRAELI.

Plate 23. Itzhak Danziger (1916–1977), NIMROD, 1939. Nubian sandstone. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Dr. H. David Orgler, Zurich and Jerusalem. © Estate of the artist. Accession number: B81.0600. Photo (c) The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Salpak. See ART: ISRAELI.

Plate 24. Mordecai Ardon (1896–1992), AT THE GATES OF JERUSALEM (triptych): right: SIGN; center: LADDERS; left: ROCK, 1967. Oil on canvas. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of the artist in honor of Israel's twentieth anniversary and the reunification of Jerusalem. © Estate of the artist. Accession number: B67.0546. Photo (c) The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See ART: ISRAELI.

a morning newspaper famous for its classifieds as well as its pro-Orthodox (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX) and *Zionist views. Other important newspapers included the Varhayt (1905–18), begun by Louis Miller, a defector from the Forverts; the Tog (Day; 1914–53), a daily that aimed for a higher class of reader, had a liberal Zionist editorial line, and offered a wide range of columnists; and the communist Frayhayt (1922–88). The circulation of the Yiddish press peaked in 1916, with 717,146 readers daily.

The New York dailies were just the tip of the Yiddish journalistic iceberg. Not only did they publish local editions in a number of other cities but local newspapers also existed in places such as *Philadelphia, *Chicago, Cleveland, and Montreal. Moreover, weeklies and monthlies were published for a variety of constituencies and interests, including businessmen, women, members of fraternal orders and trade unions, people with common regional origins in the old country, theatergoers, health devotees, literary enthusiasts, and chess players. Among the most significant and long-lasting journals were the anarchist Fraye arbeter shtime (Free Voice of Labor; 1890–93, 1899–1977), which was known for its high literary standards; Di Tsukunft (The Future; 1892–present), which devoted itself to “science, literature, socialism”; the Labor Zionist Der Yidisher kemfer (The Jewish Fighter) first appeared in 1906. The most important humor magazine was Groyser kundes (The Big Wag; 1909–27).

In the 1920s, the Yiddish press was at the height of its journalistic prowess, but a decline in readership was already evident. Restrictive laws all but ended the mass immigration, and by 1930 a majority of American Jews were native born. The American-born generation preferred to read English newspapers and magazines, as did the immigrants in increasing numbers. The Varhayt had already closed, and in 1928 the Tageblatt was absorbed by the Morgn Zhurnal. By 1927, daily circulation was down to 536,346. Still, the Yiddish press retained a mass readership and exerted significant influence, especially in New York. The decline accelerated after World War II. A small cohort of Yiddish-speaking *Holocaust survivors helped maintain circulations for a while, but they could not make up for the disappearance of the older immigrant readership. The Tog and the Morgn Zhurnal merged in 1953, and the combined newspaper folded in 1971. The Frayhayt closed up shop in 1988. The Forverts became a weekly in 1983. Most other magazines and journals also ceased publication. Only the *Hasidic community bucked the trend and founded new publications: The Algemeyner Zhurnal (1972–) was close to the Lubavitcher Hasidic community and represented the most continuity with the older Yiddish press, because its founder and editor, Gershon Jacobson (1933–2005), had worked for the Tog-Morgn zhurnal (see HĀBAD). Satmarer Hasidim published Der Yid (ca. 1951–) and the rival Der Blat (2000–). For further reading, see M. Rischin, The Promised City: New York's Jews, 1870–1914 (1962); I. Howe, World of Our Fathers (1976); and I. Metzker, ed., A Bintel Brief: Sixty Years of Letters From the Lower East Side to the Jewish Daily Forward (1990).

DANIEL SOYER

Judah, Kingdom of. Judah was one of the twelve Israelite tribes (see TRIBES, TWELVE) and was also the name of the southern kingdom of the Divided Monarchy, established after the death of *Solomon. The tribe of Judah traced its ancestry to the fourth son of *Jacob and *Leah (Gen 29:35).

When *Joshua allocated the land of *Canaan, Judah was assigned a large region west of the Dead Sea containing Bethlehem and *Hebron. Jacob's blessing of Judah in Genesis 49:8–12, assigning the tribe preeminence and promising that “the scepter shall not depart from Judah,” is a reflection of the tribal roots of the Davidic dynasty that succeeded King *Saul and provided more than a half-century of successful united rule of all the tribes under *David and *Solomon. In 930 BCE, with the accession of Solomon's son *Rehoboam, the northern tribes rejected the hegemony of Judah and formed the kingdom of *Israel. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin henceforth constituted the kingdom of Judah with *Jerusalem as its capital and religious center (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). Judah was conquered by *Babylon in 586 BCE, and a significant part of the population was exiled to *Mesopotamia. Map 2

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Judah ben Asher (1270–1349) was a rabbi and halakhic scholar. The son of *Asher ben Jehiel (the Rosh) and brother of *Jacob ben Asher, Judah was born in Cologne, *Germany, and immigrated to Toledo, *Spain, where his parents and brother later joined him. In 1321, he succeeded his father as Toledo's rabbi and then assumed the position as head of the Jewish *court (*beit din) and Toledo yeshivah after his father's death in 1327. Judah had limited vision from an infection he acquired in childhood; he describes his treatment by a female eye specialist in his *ethical will (I. Abrahams, Hebrew Ethical Wills [1926, 2006]). Judah ben Asher maintained positive relations with the Castilian government, which apparently consulted him in some judicial cases involving non-Jews. His writings include Zikhron Yehudah, a collection of his responsa, as well as his ethical will. KATE FRIEDMAN

Judah ha-Nasi (or Judah the *Patriarch) was a *Tanna of the late second and early third century CE and the leader of the rabbinic community. He is credited with compiling the *Mishnah around 200 CE; in the Mishnah, he is referred to simply as Rabbi.

Judah the Pious. See BAAL SHEM; MIDDLE AGES: HĀSIDEI ASHKENAZ.

Judaism in virtually all of its present-day forms has its origins in rabbinic Judaism (ca. 50–600 CE), an intellectual and religious movement that developed in the aftermath of the destruction of the Second *Temple in *Jerusalem in 70 CE. Through its most important literary achievement, the Babylonian *Talmud, the ongoing literary and legal endeavor (see HALAKHAH) of rabbinic Judaism shaped and determined virtually all forms of Jewish life and practice before 1800. Moreover, all contemporary forms of Judaism are built on its foundations. The destruction of the Temple, the cessation of sacrificial offerings, and the disempowerment of the hereditary priesthood ended Israelite religion, the religious practice that informs most biblical books (see ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). Judaism as invented by the Rabbis represented a new and enduring development in the life of the Jewish people.

Even before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, the founders of the rabbinic movement, the *Pharisees, created a way of life that valued personal piety and devotion to *Torah study. Authority in this movement was based on depth of learning and obedience to divine *commandments, rather than on wealth and birth. When the Pharisee leader *Johanan ben Zakkai obtained permission from *Rome to leave the besieged city of Jerusalem with his students to establish a study center in Yavneh, the nascent rabbinic movement constructed a Judaism that could survive and flourish without the Temple cult. Rabbinic tradition relates that when Johanan contemplated the ruins of the Temple, he told his grieving students that the appropriate substitute for Temple sacrifices was acts of lovingkindness (Avot de-Rabbi Natan version A, ch. 11a; and Avot de-Rabbi Natan B, ch. 7), an indication that rabbinic Judaism, echoing many of the biblical prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY), placed ethical behavior at the center of the relationship between *God and human beings (see ETHICS entries).

Rabbinic Judaism evolved over a long sweep of time and reflects influences from a variety of cultural settings. It is distinguished by a focus on the role of multivocal interpretation of divine *revelation – the conviction that the divine will emerges through discussion and debate rather than prophetic pronouncement. The Oral *Torah that constitutes rabbinic literature is an expansion and adumbration of the Written Torah; in fact, for the Rabbis both sources of Torah were received at Sinai. Oral Torah is an extensive body of writings that encompass a range of competing interpretations and opinions; although majority views are privileged, minority opinions are preserved as well. All are honored as sincere efforts to understand Written Torah and apply its insights and commandments to the human condition. Jews believe that this effort, the rabbinic endeavor, is continuous and always evolving.

At the conclusion of one of his talmudic readings, the twentieth-century French philosopher Emmanuel *Levinas declared that the most glorious title for *God is “Parent of orphans and Champion of widows” (Ps 68:6). He suggested that the encounter with this exemplar of compassion is best achieved in engagement with divine revelation: “Consecration to God: his epiphany, beyond all theology and any visible image, however complete, is repeated in the daily Sinai of [human beings] sitting before an astonishing book, ever again in progress because of its very completeness” (1994, 108). In this statement Levinas encapsulates the essential rabbinic components of Judaism: the ongoing engagement with Torah in all of its diverse forms and the ethical treatment of the other as the way to human *redemption.

See E. Levinas, “The Nations and the Presence of Israel: From the Tractate Pesahim 118b,” in In the Time of the Nations, ed. E. Levinas and M. Smith (1994), 108; see also RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS; RABBINIC LITERATURE entries.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Judaism, Conservative. The seeds of the Conservative movement were planted in *Germany in the Positive-Historical approach to Judaism originated by Zacharias Frankel in 1845. Adherents of this movement believed that halakhah had always undergone a process of development, and they used the critical study of texts in the academic manner of university scholarship. However, they rejected what they saw as radical and historically unjustified innovations of Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM), including abrogation of *dietary laws, curtailment of traditional *Sabbath and *festival observances, and the removal of most Hebrew *prayers from *worship.

Leaders of the American Conservative movement, which began with the founding of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS) in *New York City in 1887, proclaimed their belief in “the preservation in the United States of the knowledge and practice of historical Judaism, as ordained in the law of Moses and expounded by the Prophets and Sages of Israel in Biblical and Talmudical writings.” This ethos was later reflected in the motto, “Tradition and Change.” Thus, the platform of Conservative Judaism stressed fidelity to Jewish law and practice while at the same time acknowledging that Judaism had always been influenced by the societies within which Jews had lived. Although the movement’s leaders developed a complex rationale for the positions taken by Conservative Judaism, for many decades most Conservative Jews simply saw themselves as taking a moderate middle position between Reform and Orthodox (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX) adherents.

At the time of the establishment of JTS, Reform Judaism was the dominant affiliation among Jews in the United States; in 1880, 188 of 200 American synagogues identified as Reform. However, the immigration of several million Jews from *Eastern Europe to America between 1880 and 1920 drastically changed the Jewish religious landscape. JTS was founded by a coalition of German Reform and *Sephardic Jews to train Americanized rabbis to serve the new immigrants, most of whom had never been exposed to modernized forms of Judaism. Headed by Solomon *Schechter, who was brought from a British teaching post at Cambridge to lead the new seminary, the school combined the scientific study of Jewish texts with traditional practice. Graduates founded congregations where the language of prayer was *Hebrew and the liturgy was traditional, but the *sermon was delivered in English and often addressed events of the day as well as traditional explications of the *Torah and *Haftarah readings.

One deviation from tradition that characterized the Conservative movement almost from its inception was a somewhat more egalitarian approach to the status and role of *women. This approach was symbolized for many decades by the installation of mixed-gender seating for worship (known colloquially as family pews) in most Conservative synagogues, the inclusion of girls in afterschool and Sunday morning formal religious education, and the institution of the *confirmation ceremony. After World War II this egalitarianism was expressed in the broader inclusion of women in public organizational and liturgical roles and participation in *life-cycle rituals such as the *Bat Mitzvah.

By the middle of the twentieth century, Conservative Judaism had taken hold among the second and third generation of Eastern European Jewish immigrants, especially in the suburbs of big cities around the United States. Synagogue centers formed the core of the grassroots movement, along with youth, men’s and women’s *organizations, and overnight *summer camping. In 1975, more American Jews were affiliated with Conservative synagogues than with those of any other movement within Judaism. By the 1990s, however, there was a growing decline in the number of Conservative adherents and an aging of the population in Conservative synagogues. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, the movement has a worldwide membership but is still overwhelmingly American in numbers and character. Today there are more than a million Conservative Jews in the United States and another 100,000 in *Canada, Europe, *Latin America, and *Israel (in the *Masorti [Hebrew for “traditional”] movement).

Fundamental to Conservative Judaism is fidelity to the rabbinic interpretation of Jewish law, which is assumed to have developed over time and continues to develop today. Only those who believe in the sanctity of tradition, adhere to its precepts, and are learned in Halakhah* are considered qualified to interpret these legal traditions. Conservative Jews accept the notion of *revelation without delineating a specific version that must be accepted. Thus, the mitzvot (*commandments) are binding, along with ethical precepts and practices including dietary laws (kashrut), observance of the Sabbath and festivals, and life-cycle rituals. Jewish peoplehood has always been a central tenet of Conservative Judaism along with a commitment to rebuilding a Jewish state in the land of *Israel (“Emet veEmunah”: Statement of Principles of Conservative Judaism [1988]).

Rabbis are central to the functioning of the Conservative movement. A Committee on Jewish Law and Practice, which includes members from the faculty of JTS, the Rabbinical Assembly (the organization of Conservative rabbis), and some lay observers, rules on matters of Jewish law; only rabbis may submit queries. At the local level, the congregational rabbi is the mara d'atra (*Aramaic for teacher/decisor of this place). If the law committee has permitted a range of practice in a given area, then the rabbi of the individual congregation may choose any of the approved practices for her or his *synagogue. The only recourse of the congregation, if a significant number of members disagree with that choice, is not to renew the rabbi's contract. If the law committee has ruled unanimously on a topic (such as the prohibition on officiating at an interfaith marriage), then a Conservative rabbi who deviates from this practice may be asked to resign from the Rabbinical Assembly.

In addition to Solomon Schechter, all of the presidents and chancellors of JTS have been important shapers of the movement. Certain professors have also played central roles, including rabbinics scholars Louis Ginzberg and Saul Lieberman, historian Alexander Marx, and biblical scholar H. L. Ginzberg. Other influential faculty members have included Mordecai M. *Kaplan, founder of the *Reconstructionist movement, and the theologian Abraham Joshua *Heschel. The present chancellor, Dr. Arnold M. Eisen, was appointed in 2007.

The Conservative movement has three major organizational structures, with the Jewish Theological Seminary at the center. The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) is the organization of the more than seven hundred synagogues. The Rabbinical Assembly (RA), the organization of Conservative rabbis, began as an alumni association of JTS, but currently has many members who were trained elsewhere and were later admitted to the RA. There is an international women's organization called the Women's League of Conservative Judaism, as well as the International Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs. The movement's youth organization, with 25,000 members, is called United Synagogue Youth. The movement also sponsors seven overnight Ramah summer camps and several day camps and organizes trips to Israel for youth and adults. During the last quarter of the twentieth century the Solomon Schechter Day School movement, particularly for the elementary grades, grew rapidly to include more than seventy schools. In recent decades a growing number of Conservative high schools have been founded in the United States. There is a Conservative Zionist movement called Mercaz and a growing number of Masorti synagogues, as well as youth groups, summer camps, elementary and high schools, and a branch of JTS in Israel (see JUDAISM, ISRAELI FORMS OF).

The Conservative movement has faced many controversies. In the mid-twentieth century, controversial issues concerned driving to the synagogue in automobiles on the Sabbath and using the organ or other live *music in the synagogue on the Sabbath and festivals. Today the vast majority of Conservative synagogues do not have organs, but they all have parking lots, and most Conservative Jews drive to services on the Sabbath and festivals. *Gender equality was the most pervasive long-term controversial issue; it was settled in the mid-1980s, when the *ordination of women as rabbis and, subsequently, as *cantors was approved. At that time the prevailing movement slogan was “Traditional-Egalitarian.”

In the late 1980s the institution of patrilineal descent was hotly debated. As the incidence of interfaith marriages among Jews and non-Jews rose in America to its present level of 47% of new marriages, the number of members of Conservative synagogues with grandchildren who were not born Jewish increased (see INTERMARRIAGE). This led to great pressure on the law committee to follow the Reform and Reconstructionist movements in approving patrilineal as well as matrilineal Jewish descent as the basis of Jewish identity. However, this change was resisted. Thus, by the 1990s, there were clear “lines in the sand” that differentiated Conservative from *Orthodox Jews (ordination of women) and Conservative and Orthodox Jews (who accepted only matrilineal descent) from Reform and Reconstructionist Judaism. These divisive decisions caused some Conservative Jews to leave the movement both from the right and the left, but they had the positive effect of more clearly defining the Conservative ideology for members.

The most controversial issue in the first decade of the twenty-first century was the status of openly identified gay and lesbian Jews as candidates for ordination. A 2007 decision by the law committee permitted such gay and lesbian individuals, given the assent of the faculty, to enter JTS and the Ziegler Rabbinical School in California, but not the Jerusalem-based Schechter Seminary.

For further reading, see M. Davis, The Emergence of Conservative Judaism (1963); D. J. Elazar and R. M. Geffen, The Conservative Movement in Judaism: Challenges and Opportunities (2000); and N. Gillman, Conservative Judaism: The New Century (1993).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Judaism, Feminist. This term refers to the transformation of Jewish religious and communal life either through the incorporation of feminist perspectives, values, and practices into mainstream synagogues and other Jewish organizations, or the creation of new formally or informally organized Jewish groups that self-identify as feminist. Although one might argue that patriarchy is too deeply embedded within Judaism and Jewish life to be ignored or overcome, many contemporary Jewish feminists, especially in North America, maintain that the creation of a feminist Judaism is both possible and imperative. It is possible because the central Jewish concept of covenant is one that includes men and women, and it is imperative if Judaism is to remain an ongoing, meaningful religious tradition (see also LIFE-CYCLE RITUALS; PRAYER; WORSHIP).

Those attempting to create a feminist Judaism within existing Jewish institutions and organizations place major emphasis on creating inclusive communities that welcome heterosexual, gay, bisexual, and transgendered Jews; traditional and nontraditional Jewish families; Jews who are physically challenged and have other differences – and that provide rituals (such as gay commitment ceremonies performed by a leader of the congregation) that make each of its members feel at home. Egalitarian worship is often equated with feminist Judaism, but most feminists insist that egalitarianism, although important, is insufficient. Also needed are a more just distribution of power within the Jewish community and linguistic changes during public worship that make women's role as covenantal partners clear. These liturgical changes include a deemphasis or elimination of divine images of hierarchical domination, such as Lord and King, and the addition of other gender-neutral* ways of characterizing the deity. Suggestions for alternate terms include Elah, the grammatically feminine form of El (God), and Shekhinah*, a grammatically feminine noun referring to God's indwelling presence that medieval Jewish mystics viewed as female by nature. Identifying Shekhinah as "She-Who-Dwells-Within," Rabbi Lynn Gottlieb envisions God as a being who connects all of life, expresses our longing for wholeness, and ultimately calls us to justice (She Who Dwells Within: A Feminist Vision of a Renewed Judaism [1995]).

In Standing Again at Sinai: Judaism from a Feminist Perspective (1990), feminist theologian Judith Plaskow proposes such anthropomorphic images of God as lover, companion, co-creator, and friend, while also endorsing the nonanthropomorphic "richly ambiguous" image of God as makom (place) – an image that points "to community as a special place of God's self-manifestation" (165). Poet and theologian Marcia Falk further suggests images composed of the basic elements of creation – earth, water, wind, and fire – such as eyn ha-hayyim, "wellspring or source of life"; nishmat kol hai, "breath of all living things"; and nitzotzot ha-nefesh, "sparks of the inner, unseen self" – to "help construct a theology of immanence that will both affirm the sanctity of the world and shatter the idolatrous reign of the lord/God/king" ("Toward a Feminist Jewish Reconstruction of Monotheism," Tikkun 4 [1989]: 53, 56).

Do such changes, however, in and of themselves constitute a feminist Judaism? For the theologians cited earlier, as well as for many others, the answer is "no." As Judith Plaskow has written, all three basic elements of Judaism – God, Torah, and Israel – need to be reenvisioned before a feminist Judaism can truly be created. This new vision includes constructing a new concept of Israel (or community) that recognizes women as fully Jewish while also taking women's experiences seriously, including the feminist experience of personal empowerment (Standing Again at Sinai, 86). Although Plaskow points to halakhah* (rabbinic law) as negative when it "submerges women in the covenant community" (85), feminist ethicist and theologian Rachel Adler proposes the re-creation and renewal of liberal or progressive Judaism by reappropriating halakhah as a source of meaning. Drawing on the work of ethicist Robert Cover, envisioning law as a bridge between what a community is and what it hopes to be, Adler advocates retaining traditional laws that are grounded in the practice of the progressive Jewish community while adding new laws, which are grounded in new stories, that reflect new communal practices (Engendering Judaism: An Inclusive Theology and Ethics [1998]).

The feminist Judaism that Gottlieb, Falk, and Adler envision is a transformed progressive Jewish community composed of women and men. Without rejecting the possibility of transforming mainstream progressive Jewish communities, Plaskow uses the term "feminist community" to refer to "women discovering in community [that] the power of our individual and collective voices... is connected to a greater [power] that grounds and sustains it" (Standing Again at Sinai, 86). Although she does not invoke the term "feminist Judaism," Reconstructionist Rabbi Rebecca Alpert attempts to transform Judaism according to a lesbian perspective that is clearly feminist. She seeks to create a balance between individual and communal needs by envisioning lesbian Jews as part of a broad coalition involved in the transformation of Jewish life. This coalition includes heterosexual feminists working with lesbians to change women's roles and places in Judaism; gay Jewish men with whom lesbian Jews have created "alternative structures for community and worship"; and heterosexual intermarried couples who, like lesbian Jews, are concerned "about the importance of differences in loving relationships, and about ways of making relationships across differences holy." It also includes progressive Jewish educators seeking to find ways of teaching children a Jewish history that includes the stories of lesbian Jews and Jews "discouraged by the values of some in the Jewish community" who, together with lesbian Jews, are trying to forge new coalitions "with other [non-Jewish] groups who want to bring justice and peace to a troubled world" (Like Bread on the Seder Plate: Jewish Lesbians and the Transformation of Tradition [1997], 165–66).

One must ask, however, whether a feminist Judaism necessitates the creation of a new, trans-denominational movement that views Judaism through the lens of women's experiences. Some would argue that the currently existing trans-denominational Jewish Renewal* movement, which includes a number of small autonomous Jewish groups affiliated with ALEPH (Alliance for Jewish Renewal), is already committed to the creation of a feminist Judaism. Others might claim that feminist rituals, such as women's celebration of Rosh Hodesh* (New Moon) and women's Passover seders*, which tell the story of Jewish women's oppression – as well as the use of new Passover seder ritual objects, including a "Miriam's Cup" filled with water and an orange added to the seder plate or decorated on matzah covers to symbolize the ever-expanding roles of women in Judaism – are indications that it is possible to create a feminist Judaism without abandoning mainstream communal affiliation. Susanah Heschel, however, has written that working for change within particular denominations may be a misdirection of feminist efforts; she suggests, "Judaism is not an edifice lying behind doors and guards and we should not have to go through a denomination to reach it" ("Introduction," On Being a Jewish Feminist: A Reader, ed. S. Heschel, [1983], xxiii).

The creation of a feminist Judaism need not imply female separatism.

Nonetheless, as Judith Plaskow maintains, it is the “crucial contradiction between the increased participation of women in all aspects of Jewish life and the content of the tradition that . . . provides the warrant and necessity for women-only spaces” (“The Continuing Value of Separatism,” [2000], in The Coming of Lilith: Essays on Feminism, Judaism, and Sexual Ethics, 1972–2003, ed. with D. Berman [2005], 160). The size and nature of these spaces may differ. Yet what they share in common is the goal of creating Jewish communities that not only welcome and honor difference but also take seriously the lived experiences, voices, and visions of Jewish women.

ELLEN M. UMANSKY

Judaism, Humanistic. Humanistic Judaism maintains that Judaism is an ethnic culture created by the Jewish people and molded by Jewish experience. Established by Rabbi Sherwin Wine in 1963 in Detroit, Michigan, Humanistic Judaism eschews theological-religious terms and instead defines Jews as those who identify with the history, culture, and future of the Jewish people. The roots of Humanistic Judaism lie in the Haskalah*, the secular nationalism of the past hundred years, the democratic revolution of modern times, and the Holocaust* experience, all of which have taught Humanistic Jews to value pluralism, ethics, and human responsibility. Humanistic Judaism was also developed as a solution to the problem of retaining Jewish identity among nonreligious secular North American Jews at a time when other forms of secular Jewish identity were declining.

According to Humanistic Judaism, reason* is the best method for the discovery of truth. Thus, people have the power to solve human problems, and ethical guidelines derive from the human quest for renewal, justice, and happiness. Because Humanistic Judaism’s worldview centers around the autonomous human and not a god figure, god-language and worship* are inappropriate to a humanistic style of life, and neither the shema* nor the kaddish* prayers are recited.

Humanistic Jews study Jewish history and culture from a naturalistic perspective; they cultivate Jewish languages, celebrate holidays in a humanistic spirit, mark life-cycle events with secular poetry and music, respond ethically to personal needs and social issues, and organize communities in which goals are accomplished cooperatively. The kibbutz* movement in Israel* formulated an ideology, ethic, and practice based on humanistic values and Jewish cultural traditions, and Humanistic Judaism also shares much in common with Reconstructionist Judaism, with its emphasis on retaining Jewish identity while accepting a scientific worldview and a humanistic ethical outlook. However, Humanistic Judaism presents a more radical departure from traditional Judaism than does Reconstructionism, because it has created nontheistic rituals and ceremonies. Many Humanistic Jewish communities are served by certified leaders. In ascending order of training, the titles of these leaders are madrikh (guide), senior leader, and rabbi, all trained by the International Institute for Secular Humanistic Judaism.

RACHEL GORDAN

Judaism, Israeli Forms of. The practice of Judaism and the development of Jewish culture in Israel have been profoundly influenced by Zionism*’s complicated attitude toward Jewish tradition. A secular movement of Jewish national revival, Zionism was an effort to renew Judaism and the Jewish people, in part through radical changes in the observance and practices of Jewish tradition.

For its proponents, Zionism served as a kind of ethno-national substitute for traditional Judaism, which was conceived as archaic, “exilic,” and degenerative. Instead of this “old” Judaism, Zionist ideology constructed an image of the “new Jew,” who was represented as embodying an authentic national Jewish identity rooted in the independent existence of a Hebrew-speaking* society in the Land of Israel. This transformation of Judaism and Jewishness allowed the Israeli Jew to identify Israeliness with Judaism/Jewishness. Indeed, many contemporary Israeli Jews, including those who do not identify themselves as “religious,” continue to observe some traditional religious rituals, even though the dominant Zionist culture has been indifferent and sometimes hostile to such observance.

The creation of the State of Israel, along with the influx of new immigrants still closely tied to traditional practice, breathed new life into Jewish religious tradition. Jewish symbols were adapted to build and to strengthen national identity and loyalty. The first and second generations of native-born Israelis, whose Israeli identity was constructed under the inspiration of Zionist ideology, resolved the paradox of being a secular Jew by redefining Judaism in Israeli-Zionist terms. The civil religion of the state provided a coherent system of holidays, rituals, symbols, myths, values, and beliefs that were interpreted as Jewish without the stain of the Diaspora*, through an identification of Israeli-Zionist identity and Jewishness. Traditional rituals that did not embody these Zionist ideals were considered culturally trivial.

The most significant change in this regard in the last decades of the twentieth century has been the dramatic weakening of Zionism’s grip on Israeli political culture. This process began with the Yom Kippur War (1973), when the basic beliefs on which Israeli-Zionist identity was built began to be questioned. Without the Zionist meta-narrative, Israeli Jews were left without an unmediated tie to Judaism and Jewishness and without a foundation for the Jewish component of their Israeli identity. At a cultural level, the dissociation of Judaism and Israeliness left Judaism as the property of the Orthodox* and the rabbinical establishment, allowing the latter a practical monopoly on the definition of Jewishness.

As the Zionist meta-narrative gradually lost its hold during the 1970s and 1980s, it was replaced, at least in the dominant realm of the public sphere, by a post-national narrative, built around the values of universalism and humanism. In the framework of this narrative, both Jewish-religious identity and Israeli-Zionist ethno-national identity (with its accompanying Jewish component) were perceived as anachronistic identities that only served to isolate Israelis from the rest of the world. The new narrative emphasized the motif of peace, and the consequences of peace contained messianic and eschatological elements. Indeed, some interpreted this approach as a reinterpretation of Jewish messianism*. There were also those who, under the cry for a “return to the Jewish book shelf,” sought new interpretations of Judaism in which the values of universalism and humanism became the major values of the Jewish tradition. However, these voices were a minority among the wide range of voices that emphasized the ties among Judaism/Jewishness, religion, and the Orthodox establishment, which were often portrayed as obstacles to truth and peace. Indeed, for many Israelis, Judaism (or Orthodoxy) became a symbol of extremism, violence, and ultranationalism. In their private lives Jews continued to observe some Jewish ritual, and in their minds and hearts continued to harbor feelings of association with Jewishness and the Jewish people, but the public culture provided neither a language nor a symbol system for its expression. This is the paradox of religion in Israel: Although practically all surveys of Israeli Jews suggest that the overwhelming majority, even among those who do not define themselves as “religious,” observe many Jewish rituals and report that Judaism and the Jewish people are important to them, Judaism and Jewishness play a decidedly secondary role in mainstream Israeli culture.

Common public discourse divides Israeli Jews into three categories of Jewish identity, based on level of observance: “secular” (hiloni), “traditionalist” (masorti*), and “religious” (dati). These categories are usually further divided, as religious identification has developed into a socio-political mark of identity. According to the most recent surveys, people who identify as secular (or “not religious”) constitute about half of Israeli Jews. Around one-third of Israeli Jews identify as “traditionalist,” and one-fifth as “religious.” Nevertheless, as research into the meaning associated with these labels shows, they tend to confuse more than explain. Thus, for example, although the term “secular” is usually understood to denote nonobservance, secular Israeli Jews report a rather high level of observance of Jewish rituals and practices. It seems instead that “secular” is used to denote a “neutral” religious identity that provides a “default” identity for those who do not wish to be identified by their observance.

Ethnicity – that is, country of origin – plays a decisive role in the practice of Jewish tradition in Israel. Mizrahim, those born in Arabic-speaking or predominantly Muslim countries, or those whose parents came from such countries, tend to have a high level of observance and strong commitment to Jewish, as well as Israeli, identities. This is far less the case for *Ashkenazim, those born in European or predominantly Christian countries, or those whose forebears were born in these countries. In addition, Mizrahim tend to maintain a more moderate attitude toward Jewish tradition, identifying mostly as “traditionalists,” whereas Ashkenazim tend to present more extreme attitudes and usually choose either “secular” or “religious” as the labels of their Jewish identity (see also various entries under ISRAEL, STATE OF).

Research on this topic includes C. S. Liebman and E. Don-Yehiya, Civil Religion in Israel: Traditional Judaism and Political Culture in the Jewish State (1983); S. Deshen, C. S. Liebman, and M. Shokeid, eds., Israeli Judaism (Studies of Israeli Society vol. VII) (1995); and C. S. Liebman and E. Katz, eds., The Jewishness of Israelis: Responses to the Guttman Report (1997).

YAACOV YADGAR

Judaism: Jewish Renewal Movement. This loosely defined movement within contemporary non-*Orthodox American Judaism emphasizes intense personal spirituality, serious and creative text study, and social justice. It also privileges

Jewish experiences that are intimate, participatory, and egalitarian, promoting the spiritual growth and healing of individuals, communities, and society as a whole. It draws heavily from *rabbinic teachings and *mysticism, as well as *Hasidic wisdom, combining them with the insights of contemporary *ecology, *feminism, and psychology. Jewish Renewal emerged in the 1980s and 1990s as a successor to the havurah movement, which fostered small, mostly non-synagogue-based worship and study communities and alternative communal prayer groups (minyanim). In this sense, its most important intellectual “ancestor” would have been Abraham Joshua *Heschel, who as early as the 1950s noted a spiritual ache and lack of emotive warmth within post-war American Jewry. Although not anticlerical in the formal sense (it does, in fact, ordain its own rabbis), Jewish Renewal fosters a “do it yourself” Judaism that encourages the participant to “own” Judaism and to become an active worshiper, rather than being dependent on professionals. Therefore, it is not surprising to note that Jewish Renewal’s unique *worship style embraces the use of “New Age” techniques, such as chant, meditation, and even yoga, as well as new artistic expressions, in its efforts to create a modern intensity in worship. It has reimagined the study and teaching of *Torah, preferring interactive techniques over “frontal” lectures and seminars. It has boldly reclaimed previously ignored or disinherited Jewish theological options by fostering interests in mysticism, angels, the *afterlife, and the healing potential of prayer. Jewish Renewal has a broad social vision. It is unstintingly egalitarian regarding issues of *gender, sexuality, and the family. Its politics are unfailingly liberal, even leftist. Its liberalism manifests itself in its openness to the teachings and influences of other religious traditions; this is most manifest in the Jewish Buddhist (“JuBu”) phenomenon, but is also found in thoughtful encounters with Hinduism and Sufism (Muslim mysticism). Jewish Renewal often teaches the implicit message that all spiritual paths are similar and that all spiritual wisdom is interchangeable, even to the point of flirting with syncretism.

To be sure, Jewish Renewal struggles with critical issues. How does one construct a Jewish identity that is rooted in tradition and yet trumpets creativity (often radical) and individualism? How can a movement be authentically Jewish and yet be influenced by a plethora of non-Jewish intellectual and theological streams? And will this movement prove to be fertile, replicating itself into the next generation?

The principal exponents of Jewish Renewal have been “Reb Zalman” Schachter-Shalomi (born 1924, Poland), who first translated Jewish mysticism into a popular, practical idiom; Arthur Waskow (born 1933), who has combined leftist politics with Jewish spirituality; Arthur Green (born 1941), a scholar of Hasidism and mysticism; Lawrence Kushner (born 1943), a major popularizer of Jewish mystical texts; Michael Lerner (born 1943), editor of the leftist TIKKUN magazine and proponent of the “politics of meaning,” the notion that politics and public life should speak to the inner anguish of the contemporary individual; and Rabbi Marcia Prager, a prayer leader, storyteller, and musician.

JEFFREY K. SALKIN

Judaism, Liberal. Liberal Judaism is one of the forms of Progressive Judaism in *Britain, together with Reform Judaism. Liberal Judaism is to the left of British Reform

Judaism and sees itself as similar in practice, attitudes, and definition to Reform Judaism in North America.

Judaism, Masorti. Because Israel has an official chief rabbinate that is *Orthodox, Conservative Judaism, as do other forms of non-Orthodox Judaism, suffers a number of limitations in Israel. This situation is particularly problematic because, by the end of the second decade of the twenty-first century, populations will likely have shifted such that for the first time more Jews will live in Israel than in the United States. Non-Orthodox rabbis are not recognized to officiate at *marriages or Jewish *divorce proceedings. The thorniest issue has been *conversion to Judaism, particularly in the case of tens of thousands of immigrants to Israel from the former *Soviet Union who want to convert to Judaism but do not want to become Orthodox. There have also been problems in obtaining land and funds to build synagogues and schools. Despite these obstacles, and particularly in the last twenty years, the Masorti movement has created and maintained institutions in Israel, trained native-born rabbis and teachers, and nurtured synagogues and a youth movement, Noar Masorti (NOAM). The growth of an Israeli brand of Masorti Judaism, as well as branches in Europe and *Latin America, will be important to watch in the coming decades. For further reading, see J. Ruskay and D. Szioni, eds., Deepening the Commitment: Zionism and the Masorti Movement (1990).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Judaism, Neolog. Neolog Judaism is a moderate reform movement that developed in mid-nineteenth-century *Hungary. It modernized the style of Jewish worship and introduced organ music, but retained the traditional liturgy and gender separation. Orthodox Hungarian Jews, *Ḥasidim and non-Ḥasidim alike, denounced the Neolog movement as apostasy. In 1868 the Hungarian government sanctioned the division of Hungarian Jews into three separate communities: Neolog, Orthodox, and status quo ante (also Orthodox). In the peace agreements that followed World War I, Hungary lost significant territories and population, including almost half of its Jews. The most religious and least assimilated Jewish communities lived in the areas that were lost. After 1920, the majority of Hungary's remaining Jews, almost half of whom lived in Budapest, affiliated with Neolog. Neolog continues to be the most prominent form of Jewish practice in present-day Hungary.

Judaism, Orthodox: Modern Orthodox refers to an interpretation of Orthodox Judaism that arose in the nineteenth century to affirm the authority of the intellectual and communal heritage of pre-modern rabbinic *Judaism and to oppose advocates of a conscious alteration or reform of Judaism "in the spirit of the times." Ideologically, many Modern Orthodox Jews see themselves in continuity with the teachings of such nineteenth-century Orthodox rabbis as Samson Raphael Hirsch and Esriel Hildesheimer, who, in differing ways, advocated a stringent observance of halakhah (the rabbinic legal system) coupled with a positive engagement with aspects of modern western culture. Overwhelmingly *Zionist and pro-Israel in their orientation, Modern Orthodox Jews tend to support ideologies of the Religious Zionist [*Mizrachi] movement as it developed in Israel and to connect with the teachings of Rabbi Abraham Isaac ha-Kohen *Kook. They often look to *Yeshiva University for education and guidance, and many of them think of its long-time rabbinic leader, Rabbi Joseph Baer *Soloveitchik, as their intellectual and spiritual mentor. For the most part, Modern Orthodoxy flourishes in North America, although Modern Orthodox Jews constitute an important part of the anglophone immigrant community in Israel.

In North America, Modern Orthodoxy developed before World War II as a reaction to the Orthodoxy of the *Yiddish-speaking immigrant generation. A key dividing line between "immigrant" and "modern" Orthodoxy was use of the English language in sermons and publications. On the other side, a key concern was differentiating Modern Orthodoxy from *Conservative Judaism, whose right wing espoused positions that were often almost indistinguishable from those of the Modern Orthodox. In that era, the overwhelming majority of Modern Orthodox Jews sent their children to public schools, giving them a supplementary Judaic education.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, Modern Orthodox Jews have expressed themselves to a large extent in terms of their educational choices. Like nearly all contemporary Orthodox Jews, they overwhelmingly give their children an intensive Jewish education in day schools where they also receive their secular education and socialize with children from similar backgrounds. This day school education is commonly supplemented with a year or more of study in an Israeli yeshivah* or seminary. However, the Modern Orthodox differ from *Ultra-Orthodox (Ḥaredi) Jews in their attitude toward secular education and engagement with contemporary society as a whole. Whereas Ultra-Orthodox Jews seek to limit secular education to the minimum possible under the law, even at the cost of limiting their children's economic prospects, Modern Orthodox Jews see at least an instrumental value to secular studies in general, and to higher education in particular, in terms of making a living in contemporary society and engaging in the professions. Moreover, some Modern Orthodox Jews perceive a positive good to be derived from secular studies through the broadening and enriching of Torah study. In cases where the teachings of Torah seem to be in conflict with current scientific theory, such as the age of the universe, Modern Orthodox Jews are likelier than Ultra-Orthodox Jews to accept the findings of science and to reinterpret biblical and rabbinic sources accordingly.

Ultra-Orthodox Jews seek to minimize formal contact between their communities and those of non-Orthodox Jews and certainly do not wish to accord to non-Orthodox religious leaders or organizations any de jure recognition. Modern Orthodox Jews are somewhat divided on this issue: Some advocate organizational separation from non-Orthodox Jews, whereas others see positive results in Orthodox engagement with non-Orthodox organizations.

Sociologically, Modern Orthodox Jews have been often characterized by a reputation for laxness in halakhic observance. This has placed Modern Orthodoxy at a distinct disadvantage because the global trend within Orthodox Judaism in the last decades of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first century has been a move toward greater exactitude in halakhic observance, often characterized as a "shift to the right." This phenomenon has been facilitated by the trend among Modern Orthodox day schools to hire Ultra-Orthodox teachers, as well as the exposure to the viewpoint of right-wing Orthodoxy that is often part of the study experience in Israel.

Modern Orthodox Jews, in contrast to their Ultra-Orthodox counterparts, are not often characterized by firm and clear ideological stances. Indeed, it has been argued that the “modernity” of Modern Orthodox Jews is largely behavioral and not ideological. Thus, in contrast to Ultra-Orthodox Jews, who can point to a strong authority structure in the persons of the heads of major Haredi yeshivot and Hasidic *rebbe*s, Modern Orthodox Jews have no real functioning central authority. The authority of rabbis identified with Modern Orthodoxy, like Shlomo Riskin, is personal and does not begin to compare with that of prominent rabbis in the Haredi communities. The former president of *Yeshiva University, Rabbi Norman Lamm, has suggested replacing the label “Modern Orthodoxy” with “Centrist Orthodoxy.” In terms of publications, Modern Orthodox Jews have nothing to compare with the impact created by Artscroll and other anglophone Haredi publishers and often use the books these publishers produce.

Ideological proponents of Modern Orthodoxy, led by Rabbi Saul Berman, organized themselves in 1999 in a group called Edah, with the slogan, “The Courage to Be Modern and Orthodox.” Among other things, Edah articulated positions that affirmed the equality of women in Judaism while preserving the halakhic process. The demise of Edah in 2005 demonstrates the organizational weakness of ideological Modern Orthodoxy. The liberal Orthodox yeshiva Chovevei Torah has taken up some of the void left by Edah.

One of the pioneers of research into Modern Orthodoxy was Charles Liebman, whose 1966 study, Orthodoxy in American Jewish Life, was highly influential; also important are the articles of sociologist C. I. Waxman, especially “Dilemmas of Modern Orthodoxy: Sociological and Philosophical,” Judaism (Winter, 1993). Also useful are S. C. Heilman and S. M. Cohen, Cosmopolitans & Parochials: Modern Orthodox Jews in America (1989); and Heilman, Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewish Orthodoxy (2006).

IRA ROBINSON

Judaism, Orthodox: Ultra-Orthodox. This term refers to fervently religious Jews who adhere to the strictest interpretations of halakhah* (Jewish legal tradition), in particular those that prohibit compromises with modern culture and secular studies. Ultra-Orthodox Jews minimize social contact and intellectual engagement with those outside their community, except in cases of economic necessity. Members of these communities prefer the Hebrew designation Haredim (literally “tremblers,” from “those who tremble before God’s word” [Isaiah 66:2 and also 66:5]).

This isolationist, anti-modernist ideology developed in late-eighteenth-century Central Europe, where Jewish Orthodoxy emerged in response to the modernization agenda of the Haskalah, or Jewish Enlightenment. As Orthodoxy coalesced into a distinct denomination of Judaism in direct opposition to the emergence of the *Reform movement, its proponents debated the appropriate attitude toward non-Jewish culture and the proper posture toward non-observant Jews. Orthodox Jews who advocated minimal contact with Gentile culture and prohibited secular studies became known as the Ultra-Orthodox.

An official Ultra-Orthodox community first emerged as one of three *Hungarian Jewish denominations at the Hungarian Jewish Congress of 1868–69. This convocation took place in response to Hungary’s 1867 “Jewish Emancipation Law.” The other two denominations were the *Neolog (Reform) and the Status Quo, which today might be called Modern Orthodox. In 1876, the Orthodox community in *Germany, where the Reform movement was the largest Jewish denomination, became bitterly split. Those favoring a modern form of traditionally observant Judaism that remained an integral part of the larger community were championed by Rabbi Dov Bamberger. Rabbi Isaac Breuer led those who insisted on complete separation from non-Orthodox Jews and Jewish movements, especially the Reformers and *Zionists. Breuer’s influential work, Der Neue Kusari, articulated an uncompromising Ultra-Orthodox theology that even categorized collaboration with Reform Jews as a modern form of idolatry. His supporters advocated Trennungsorthodoxie, or separatist Orthodoxy, although Breuer and his followers did not ban all secular studies. They followed the prescription of Rabbi Samson Raphael *Hirsch, “Torah im derekh eretz” (Torah with worldly culture), which encouraged engagement with those aspects of German culture that did not directly threaten religious observance.

The most extreme form of Ultra-Orthodoxy, insisting on intellectual and cultural isolationism and rejecting any innovations in Jewish life, was found in southern Hungary and *Romania where Rabbi Moses Sofer of Pressburg (1762–1839) had established an extreme approach. Strictly Orthodox Jews in the *Russian Empire, including today’s *Poland, *Ukraine, and *Baltic states, never developed an official theology of separation because the Reform movement, which had triggered such separatism in the West, was almost nonexistent in these regions. However, in response to secular Jewish ideologies, like *Zionism and *socialism, there was a discernible movement toward increased piety and religious conservatism among both *Hasidim and *mitnaggedim (non-Hasidic Orthodox) and within the major rabbinical academies (yeshivot), most of which banned the study of secular subjects, unless required to include them in their curricula by Russian law.

In addition, there was a discernible rise in vigilance regarding the observance of certain aspects of Jewish law; there was also a renewed emphasis on practices that had previously been treated with a certain degree of latitude, such as the use of traditional Jewish language, ethnic customs, appearance, and dress. For men this change involved an intensified rejection of western clothing, in favor of the traditional kapotehs or long black coats and black hats, and an insistence on not trimming beards or peyot (side curls). For women, there was a renewed emphasis on the laws of modesty including completely *covering the hair with hats, tikkels (head scarves), or sheitels (wigs) and wearing understated dresses that concealed the arms and legs. Because language was perceived as a conduit to social assimilation, Ultra-Orthodox Jews in northern Hungary, Romania, Poland, and Lithuania insisted on maintaining *Yiddish as the vernacular of Jewish daily life. Only in Germany and the large cities of central Hungary, such as Budapest, Szeged, and Miskolcz, did Ultra-Orthodox Jews speak German or Hungarian among themselves.

Ultra-Orthodoxy vehemently rejected Zionism, not only as a modern, secular nationalist ideology modeled after European nationalisms but also as a usurpation of the traditional insistence on passively awaiting the messiah's appearance. Many of the leading rabbis of Central and Eastern Europe issued bans on any cooperation with Zionists, condemning them as heretics. At the same time, the Agudat Israel party, founded at a conference in Kattowitz, Poland, in 1912, supported the renewal of immigration of Jews to Palestine but rejected Zionist ideology. Its neo-socialist branch, Poalei Agudat Israel, led by Isaac Breuer, established religious moshavim (collective farms) in *Palestine during the years of the *British Mandate (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS, 1878-1948). The emergence of Agudat Israel further divided the Ultra-Orthodox community because numerous Ḥasidic *rebbe*s, most notably Ḥayyim Elazar Shapira of Munkatch, condemned the organization as a modern, neo-Zionist, and hence heretical political movement. This uncompromising opposition to even the slightest compromise with Zionism or any other modern political organizations was taken up after the *Holocaust by Rabbi Joel Teitelbaum, the Satmar rebbe, whose followers in New York constitute the largest Ḥasidic community outside of Israel, and by the Ultra-Orthodox group, Neturei Karta, in *Jerusalem.

The Ultra-Orthodox communities of Europe were entirely destroyed during the *Holocaust, along with more than 90% of their members. After *World War II, however, against most expectations, Ultra-Orthodoxy reconstituted itself, establishing communities, consisting mainly of Holocaust survivors, in Israel, the United States, *Belgium, *Canada, *Britain, and *France. These Ultra-Orthodox communities have experienced remarkable growth, unanticipated by the large majority of Jewish social scientists. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, they are the fastest growing segment of the Jewish community worldwide, a result of high birthrates and minute attrition. In large cities, such as Antwerp, B'nai B'rak, Brooklyn (New York), Jerusalem, Lakewood, (New Jersey), London, Los Angeles, Montreal, and Paris, Ultra-Orthodox Jews live apart from the non-Orthodox and maintain autonomous communal and religious institutions. In addition to Agudat Israel, which continues to operate as a worldwide federation representing the majority of Ḥaredi Jews (except the ardently anti-Zionist), the Ultra-Orthodox maintain their own rabbinical and community councils. In Israel, they are represented by the Edah ha-Ḥaredit as well as by several political parties, such as Agudat Israel and Degel ha-Torah. In North America, the rabbinic leadership group is Agudas ha-Rabonim of the United States and Canada. The highest and final arbitrator of political and halakhic issues of contention is the international tribunal, Mo'etset Gedolay ha-Torah (Council of Torah Sages).

An interesting recent development is the attraction of many *Sephardic Jews in Israel and the United States to the Ḥaredi ideology and way of life, including adoption of Eastern European Ḥaredi dress and halakhic stringencies that were entirely unknown in their Muslim lands of origin. Although there is little exact information, the number of Ultra-Orthodox Jews is estimated at 300,000 in North America, 500,000 in Israel, and another 75,000 in Canada, Europe, and *Latin America. For further reading, see J. Katz,

A House Divided: Orthodoxy and Schism in Nineteenth-Century Central European Jewry (1998); and A. Mittleman, The Politics of Torah: The Jewish Political Tradition and the Founding of Agudat Israel (1996).
ALLAN NADLER

Judaism, Progressive. Progressive Judaism refers to contemporary forms of Judaism that are rooted in the teachings of the biblical *prophets, particularly those that stress inwardness and a desire to enact the values of justice, equality, democracy, peace, personal fulfillment, and collective obligations. Although its practices are anchored in Jewish thought and tradition, Progressive Judaism grants full equality to all Jews in Jewish life and religious practice, regardless of *gender and sexual orientation. Moreover, the denominations that are part of the movement challenge laws and practices that are contrary to fundamental Jewish principles of justice and ethical behavior. See WORLD UNION FOR PROGRESSIVE JUDAISM.
RACHEL GORDAN

Judaism, Reconstructionist. This movement, which originated in the philosophy of Mordecai *Kaplan (1881–1983), is now considered the fourth religious denomination of American *Judaism, along with *Reform, *Conservative, and *Orthodox (see JUDAISM entries).

Kaplan defined Judaism as the evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people, and his main ideas are presented in his seminal 1934 work, Judaism as a Civilization. He understood Jewish civilization to encompass a way of life that includes not only beliefs but also values, language, law, literature, customs, art, food, and music. Kaplan espoused a utopian vision of an organic Jewish community that would function democratically. He was also an avid cultural *Zionist and believed that a Jewish state in *Palestine would be the center that would hold these organic communities together in a worldwide, democratic Jewish structure of governance.

THEOLOGY, OBSERVANCE, AND LITURGY: Kaplan was best known for his radical religious vision. He defined *God as “the Power that makes for salvation” and rejected anthropomorphic and supernatural views of God; rather, he understood God as an impersonal force that acts through and not beyond the natural world and inspires human beings to aspire to do good in the world. Although Kaplan's position has been thought by many to be atheistic, he was a passionate believer in the existence of this impersonal force. Kaplan also rejected the idea that the Jews were in any way chosen. A God that did not act in history could not single out one people for any special role. Kaplan taught that all peoples have a unique function to fulfill in the world and that each group could, through what he called “ethical nationhood,” serve a divine purpose.

Kaplan did not approach Jewish observance from the perspective of halakhah*. Instead he encouraged observance of the *Sabbath and *dietary laws because they bind the Jewish people together. Kaplan expressed these new approaches through liturgical change. He published a haggadah in 1941 that told the *Passover story as the triumphs of Moses and Israel, rather than God. A Sabbath *prayer book, published in 1945, changed the wording of key prayers to eliminate the concept of *chosenness, reward and punishment, and references to *Temple sacrifice; it also removed special status for the descendants of *priests and *levites because that did not reflect a democratic vision. Orthodox rabbis publicly burned the Sabbath prayer book in 1945, and Kaplan was excommunicated.

THE SPREAD OF RECONSTRUCTIONISM: Kaplan hoped that his ideas would influence the leadership of the American Jewish community, but he did not wish to start a new movement. He was a rabbi of a synagogue that he founded in 1922, the Society for the Advancement of Judaism (SAJ), in *New York City. At the SAJ he carried out his experiments in liturgy. The SAJ is also famous as the location of the first modern *Bat Mitzvah, held rather unceremoniously for Kaplan's eldest daughter Judith in 1922.

Kaplan's primary vocation was as Professor of Homiletics at the *Jewish Theological Seminary, a position he held from 1909–63. There he influenced several generations of rabbis, some of whom were intent on turning his vision into a program. The task of movement building fell to Kaplan's son-in-law, Ira Eisenstein (1906–2001). Eisenstein slowly built an organizational structure that began with the Reconstructionist Foundation in 1940. In 1954 he organized the Reconstructionist Federation of Congregations. Through the next few decades these institutions grew gradually, adding a few dozen or more Reconstructionist groups around the United States and *Canada.

The slow growth of the movement can be attributed to several factors in addition to Kaplan's own reticence. Many of his followers were institutionally loyal to the Reform and Conservative movements. In addition, Kaplan's ideology was intellectually challenging and rigorous, attracting a small number of Jews who were dissatisfied with traditional *synagogue life. As sociologist Charles Liebman pointed out in an influential study in the 1970s, Reconstructionism functioned as the folk religion of American Jewry. Kaplan's work accurately depicted what American Jews believed and practiced, but not necessarily how they wanted Jewish institutions to look.

For Reconstructionism to grow as a movement, it was necessary to start a school for training rabbis. The *Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC) was founded in 1968 in *Philadelphia. The school reflected the Reconstructionist ideology; thus, the *ordination of women followed Kaplan's belief in women's equality. The curriculum traced Jewish civilization through its historical stages. Living in two civilizations meant that graduates of the RRC would also obtain doctoral degrees in religious studies from a secular institution. The first graduates organized the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association (RRA) in 1974. The RRA welcomed not only graduates of the RRC but also rabbis who were supportive of the Reconstructionist philosophy and movement. The addition of an organization of Reconstructionist rabbis enabled the Reconstructionist movement to mirror the tripartite organizational structure of the Reform and Conservative movements and gain legitimacy on the national level. Changes followed Kaplan's death and Eisenstein's retirement in the early 1980s. In 1981 Ira Silverman was chosen to succeed Eisenstein as president of the RRC, and Arthur Green, David Teutsch, and Dan Ehrenkrantz have served subsequently. Their leadership has emphasized peoplehood, community, democracy, women's equality, the creation of new rituals, and an informal style of *worship.

SHIFTS IN EMPHASIS: Ultimately Kaplan's theology and his unbridled enthusiasm for America would become a source of tension, as spirituality became a dominant feature of the next generation of Reconstructionism. Reconstructionist Judaism has followed the contemporary Jewish trend toward a focus on the human–divine encounter that is predicated on a more traditional view of God as a partner in conversation. Although Reconstructionist Jews in the early twenty-first century are not likely to believe that God responds directly to supplication or acts to reward or punish them in their lives, they are likely to seek a relationship with God through prayer and meditation.

The emphasis on inclusive community is the other defining characteristic of Reconstructionist Judaism. Reconstructionists welcome Jews who see themselves as unwelcome in the rest of the Jewish community, particularly gay men and lesbians and the intermarried. The Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association adopted patrilineal descent (accepting as Jews those who are the child of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother) and developed guidelines for welcoming intermarried couples in 1978. The Reconstructionist Rabbinical College was the first seminary to admit openly gay and lesbian students in 1984. Contemporary Reconstructionism is best described in R. Alpert and J. Staub's primer, Exploring Judaism: A Reconstructionist Approach (2nd ed., 2001).

REBECCA T. ALPERT

Judaism, Reform: France. From early in the nineteenth century there were reform-minded French Jews, but unlike in Germany (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY), they were not rabbis, but well-educated and scholarly laymen. Michel Berr (the first Jewish lawyer in France) and Olry Terquem (a mathematician) were early exponents of radical reform; they advocated switching the Sabbath to Sunday, using French in prayers, and abbreviating the service. Although the *Consistories never accepted radical change, they gradually modernized *synagogue *worship through a number of measures that created an outwardly more decorous appearance.

Under pressure from lay members of the Consistories, a conference of chief rabbis was convened in Paris in May 1856 to suggest changes that would reduce deflections from the synagogues. The rabbis at the conference decided to improve and modernize rabbinical education by transferring the rabbinical seminary, founded in 1829 in Metz, a city without a university, to Paris. The goal was to encourage rabbinic students to pursue a secular post-secondary education alongside their religious studies. The conference adopted a dress code for rabbis that resembled that of the Catholic clergy. In regard to synagogue services, the representatives approved shortening services, instituting more decorum, and making greater use of *sermons. They endorsed synagogue blessings for newborn girls and a ceremony of "religious initiation" (*confirmation) for both boys and girls, which would be based on an examination of the candidates' achievement in religious studies. The rabbis urged that funeral services be conducted with more pomp and ruled that organs were permitted to be used in synagogues on the *Sabbath and *festivals, provided that they were played by non-Jews.

Ceremonial changes were instituted unevenly. To avoid a breach within French Judaism, it had been agreed that implementation should be left to the discretion of individual rabbis, rather than forced on the more traditional communities. Paris had already taken the lead with the introduction in the Paris synagogue of four-part music as early as 1820 and a choir a decade later. In 1852 an organ was installed. The confirmation ceremony was introduced in Paris in 1840 and became almost universal by the 1850s. By that time, too, burial practices and *circumcision were modernized, and ritual ceremonies for newborn girls were in use. There were occasional attempts by small groups to create more radically reform synagogues, but the consistorial system had no provision for alternative synagogue movements, and therefore no Reform movement emerged. Only at the end of the century was a durable Reform congregation established, in response to the suggestion by Chief Rabbi Zadoc Kahn in 1896 that Sunday services might stem the tide of defections by making Judaism available to the many who were required to work on Saturdays. Kahn then instituted a series of popular Sunday lectures that included liturgical elements, and in 1899 his son-in-law, Rabbi Israel Lévi, took over the project.

With Kahn's blessing, a group of reform-minded Jews constituted itself under the name L'Union Libérale Israélite and used space in the main consistorial synagogue building for Sunday Reform services. The 1905 law on separation of religion and state made it possible for these reformers to disconnect from the Consistory and establish an independent congregation, which they did in 1907. Limited for a long time to one synagogue in Paris, it was only after World War II that additional Reform synagogues were established in France. For more on this topic, see P. C. Albert, The Modernization of French Jewry: Consistory and Community in the Nineteenth Century (1977); and P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (1998).

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Judaism, Reform: Germany. Although the first congregation with a revised ritual was established in *Amsterdam in 1797, the Reform movement in Judaism had its greatest European success in *Germany where, by the last decades of the nineteenth century, the majority of Jews adhered to a moderately reformed Liberal Judaism. Ritual reform first appeared in Germany during the period of French dominance in Westphalia (1808–14) and then briefly in Prussia until it was prohibited there during the period of Napoleonic reaction in 1823. It established itself permanently in Hamburg with the formation of the Hamburg Temple in 1817. Among early *worship reforms were use of the vernacular alongside *Hebrew, organ accompaniment, a weekly edifying *sermon in German, a higher degree of decorum, and the removal of passages from the liturgy that were vengeful or expressed hopes for return to *Zion and the reestablishment of the sacrificial *Temple cult. These changes aroused opposition on the part of traditionalists, but they did not succeed in stifling the movement.

By the mid-1840s, a new rabbinate had emerged in Germany that was university educated and committed to religious reform. Its members participated in rabbinical conferences (1844–46) that dealt with such matters as liturgical reform, the role of the Hebrew language, the observance of the *Sabbath under conditions of occupational integration, and the religious equality of *women. In Germany the Reform movement was closely related to the struggle of German Jews for political *emancipation and was dependent on the progress of political liberalism. However, leaders of the movement stressed repeatedly that they would not sacrifice their beliefs to gain political ends. By mid-century the rabbinical leadership held a broad spectrum of opinions – from those like Zacharias *Frankel (1801–1875), who favored only a moderate reform based on Jewish law and the will of observant Jews, to Samuel Holdheim (1806–1860), who distinguished sharply between an eternal moral and theological essence and changeable forms that could be adjusted to contemporary circumstances. Holdheim became the rabbi of a radical independent congregation in *Berlin, which was unique in the German movement in that it called itself Reform rather than Liberal. Abraham *Geiger (1810–1874) occupied a position between Frankel and Holdheim; like the former, he stressed historical continuity, but like the latter, he based Judaism on prophetic morality rather than Jewish law (halakhah). During the second half of the nineteenth century the German Reform movement stagnated as idealism gave way to materialism. German Protestantism, which in some respects had served as a model for Reform, turned from liberalism to reaction. Only toward the end of the century did a new generation of liberal religious thinkers, especially Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918) and Leo Baeck (1873–1956), breathe new life into the movement.

Under the *Nazi regime, Liberal Judaism in Germany experienced a brief revival as the synagogue became an emotional refuge and Liberal rabbis like Baeck and Joachim Prinz (1902–1988) offered spiritual resistance in the face of degradation. In recent years Liberal Judaism has reappeared in Germany; a number of congregations have been established as well as a rabbinical seminary, the Abraham Geiger College, in Berlin.

MICHAEL A. MEYER

Judaism, Reform: North America. There are approximately 1.5 million Reform Jews belonging to slightly more than nine hundred Reform congregations in the *United States and *Canada. In addition, many others identify as Reform Jews without belonging to or participating in a Reform congregation. The Reform movement has grown dramatically relative to the other Jewish religious streams and in particular the *Conservative movement. Reform Jews form a plurality of those affiliated with one of the Jewish denominational groups in the United States, which in turn is less than half of all American Jews. The Reform movement has been regarded as the trendsetter among the large American Jewish denominations. Although the *Reconstructionist movement has frequently embraced various reforms slightly earlier and *Jewish Renewal and others have embraced spiritual innovations much more vigorously, the Reform movement has nevertheless been seen as the most influential progressive voice because of its numbers (see JUDAISM entries).

The earliest synagogues in colonial America were *Sephardic Orthodox, and the Reform movement began to develop in the United States in the 1820s and 1830s with the growing *immigration of Jews from *Central Europe. The first attempt at building a Reform temple in the United States began in 1824 in the Sephardic community of *Charleston, South Carolina, when forty-seven members of Congregation Beth Elohim signed a petition to the board of directors requesting that they consider a number of minor ritual reforms, including the introduction of a small number of prayers in English.

In the period between 1836 and 1881, American Reform Judaism grew steadily with the arrival of about 250,000 Jews from Central Europe, many of whom were already sympathetic to the movement. On the eve of the large-scale immigration of *Eastern European Jewry that began in the 1880s, the Reform movement dominated American Judaism. It appealed to people who wanted to maintain a Jewish identity and various Jewish practices without a system of compulsory ritual adherence. No longer obligated to observe all the laws and customs of Orthodox Judaism, members of Reform synagogues could maintain forms of practice that remained distinctive and meaningful in a modern Christian-dominated society and yet did not separate Jews significantly from their Christian neighbors.

The first leader of American Reform Judaism was Isaac Mayer *Wise (1819–1900), who arrived in the United States from Bohemia in 1846. He was the main influence behind the establishment of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) in 1873, and he founded the *Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1875 (the first seminary for rabbinic training in North America) and the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) in 1889. He was regarded as the leader of the moderate wing of the Reform movement, which battled with the radical reformers, most of whom lived along the East Coast. Led by David *Einhorn (1808–1879), the radical reformers eventually succeeded in creating a deritualized form of Liberal Judaism, which became known as Classical Reform. Classical Reform was defined by the 1885 Declaration of Principles, which became known as the Pittsburgh Platform. It minimized ritual and emphasized ethical behavior in a universalistic context as the central message of the biblical prophets.

An important feature of American Reform Judaism was its stated commitment to the equality of women; it was expressed in various ways, including mixed seating during worship. Family pews were first introduced in Albany, New York, in 1851, and then in 1854 in *New York City; by the 1870s, they were the norm in most American synagogues. Girls and boys were educated together, and American Reform congregations initially replaced *Bar Mitzvah with *confirmation, a group ceremony for young people in their mid-teens. *Ordination of women as rabbis and cantors, however, did not occur until late in the twentieth century. The first synagogue sisterhood groups emerged in the 1890s; these local groups were linked when the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods (now Women of Reform Judaism [WRJ]; see SYNAGOGUE SISTERHOODS) was established in 1913. In 2005, WRJ had 75,000 members in five hundred local affiliates in the United States, Canada, and twelve other countries. Organization membership independently financed the publication of The Torah: A Women's Commentary (ed. T. Eshkenzi and A. Weiss [2008]), with contributions from more than 250 female scholars and rabbis.

Reform theologians were influenced by the modern biblical criticism of their time and were involved as well in the academic study of religion. They fostered a Reform Judaism that did not interpret the *Bible in a literal manner and saw no conflict between religion and science. Most believed that *God created the world in some form or manner and continued to be involved as part of an ongoing process of progressive *revelation. Late-nineteenth-century and early-twentieth-century reformers stressed the importance of ethical monotheism. They believed that the ethical message of Judaism derived from one beneficent creator God who exists as the source and goal of all humanity. Without the existence of God, any attempt to aspire to high ethical standards of behavior would be useless. The mission of Israel was to spread the concept of ethical monotheism, serving as God's messengers in an age without *prophets.

As a corollary to this idea of the mission of Israel in the *Diaspora, most but not all Reform leaders rejected *Zionism. Judaism was a portable sanctuary, and Jews could practice their religion wherever they lived. As Minister Gustavus Posnanski famously declared at the dedication of the new building of the newly Reform congregation in *Charleston, South Carolina, "this country is our Palestine, this city our Jerusalem, this house of God our Temple." These Reform leaders believed that because Jews were fully accepted as equal citizens in the United States of America, they had no need and no inclination to leave what they regarded as their homeland. Various American Reform statements of principles confirmed that they no longer believed in the religious concept of the ingathering of the exiles. For example, rabbinical leaders at the Philadelphia Conference of 1869 wrote, "The Messianic aim of Israel is not the restoration of the old Jewish state under a descendant of David, involving a second separation from the nations of the earth, but the union of all the children of God in the confession of the unity of God, so as to realize the unity of all rational creatures, and their call to moral sanctification."

Although a number of Reform rabbis, such as Max Heller and Bernhard Felsenthal, supported Zionism, the majority undoubtedly agreed with these words of the Pittsburgh Platform of 1885: "We consider ourselves no longer a nation, but a religious community; and we therefore expect neither a return to Palestine, nor a sacrificial worship under the sons of Aaron, nor the restoration of any of the laws concerning a Jewish state." This majority sentiment in the late nineteenth and very early twentieth century began to change after future Supreme Court Justice Louis Dembitz *Brandeis became a Zionist in 1912. After the *Nazi advent to power in Germany in 1933, increasing numbers of Reform Jews understood that, regardless of religious theory, there was a dire need for a place of refuge for European Jews. By the early 1940s, only a handful of Reform Jews remained staunchly anti-Zionist. They organized the American Council for Judaism, which exists in attenuated form to the present.

The American religious environment changed in the years immediately after *World War II, and the Reform movement adjusted accordingly. Jews of every persuasion were moving in ever larger numbers to the suburbs, and it was important for the religious denominations to organize new congregations that would in turn contribute to the development of their movements. Much of the credit for the relatively successful adaptation of Reform Judaism to the post-World War II environment goes to Maurice Eisendrath (1902–1973), who became executive director of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (renamed the Union for Reform Judaism in 2003) in 1943 and its president in 1946. Eisendrath increased the profile of the movement by moving the national headquarters from Cincinnati to New York City in 1948. The "House of Living Judaism" was built on Fifth Avenue and 65th Street in Manhattan, next to the major New York City Reform synagogue, Temple Emanuel. Although there had originally been one rabbinical seminary, the Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati, by the end of the twentieth century, there were four separate centers. The 1950 merger of the Jewish Institute of Religion (JIR), which had been established by Rabbi Stephen Wise, with the Hebrew Union College provided a *New York City location. HUC-JIR then established additional campuses in *Los Angeles and *Jerusalem, making it the largest and most prestigious Reform rabbinical seminary in the world.

One of the central issues facing the Reform movement was how to provide its members with guidance on ceremonial observance without creating another legal structure. Any obligatory system of religious laws would have been anathema to most Reform Jews. Nevertheless, many religious leaders felt that Reform Judaism allowed too much freedom and that most lay people interpreted this freedom as meaning that they did not have to observe any ritual whatsoever. Reform “*covenant” theologians believed that one of the solutions to this problem was to reemphasize the centrality of the berit, the covenant between God and the children of Israel. The covenant was presented as an organic historical relationship that was reciprocal and continued from generation to generation. Emphasis on this covenant provided a liberal framework for helping people understand that incorporating religious practices into their lives could be an expression of commitment to this relationship with the divine.

The HUC-JIR began ordaining women in 1972; in recent decades, female rabbis have brought an energy and dynamism that have enlivened Reform worship and education. The first woman to be ordained was Sally Jane *Priesand. HUC-JIR established the Sally J. Priesand Visiting Professorship in her honor in the fall of 1999 at its New York campus. By the early twenty-first century, women rabbis, as well as cantors, synagogue presidents, and other religious leaders, have become increasingly numerous, not only in Reform Judaism but also in Reconstructionist and Conservative Judaism (see RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN).

Another area where Reform Judaism has changed dramatically is in the realm of *worship. The Union Prayer Book had been a ubiquitous presence since the closing years of the 1800s; by the 1960s, many younger people found its ponderous language excessively formal and its theological conceptions outdated. There was, however, no consensus on what a new prayer book might look like. The CCAR Liturgy Committee decided that it was not possible to create a single service that would be satisfactory to the different theological positions within the movement, and so they decided to include multiple services in the new prayer book, thus allowing for considerable theological diversity. When Gates of Prayer: The New Union Prayer Book was published in 1975, it included ten Sabbath evening and six Sabbath morning services that differed in theological focus. Unfortunately, Gates of Prayer was published in a non-gender-sensitive format and was also awkward to use. After many years of work and numerous drafts, the CCAR published a new prayer book, Mishkan T’filah (Tabernacle of Prayer) in 2007. This was the first Reform prayer book in memory to have a Hebrew name, and unlike previous prayer books published by the CCAR, it only opened from the Hebrew side. It incorporated many traditional elements that had been excised from the original Union Prayer Book, although there were still places where the liturgy differed from the Orthodox prayer book, either because of theological differences or for purposes of brevity (see PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES).

Outreach was another revolutionary development in American Judaism that was pioneered by the Reform movement. In December 1978, UAHC President Alexander Schindler called for a sustained effort to reach out to the unaffiliated, particularly the growing number of Jews who had intermarried. Arguing against the norms of the times, Schindler said that *intermarriage did not necessarily mean that a couple was lost to the Jewish community. This call led to an extensive effort to welcome interfaith couples as well as converts, now referred to as “Jews by choice.” As more intermarried couples began raising children, the question of how to treat the offspring of Jewish fathers and Gentile mothers became more acute. On March 15, 1983, the CCAR passed a resolution prepared by the CCAR Committee on Patrilineal Descent entitled “The Status of Children of Mixed Marriages.” Jewish tradition had generally held to matrilineal descent, teaching that the religion of the mother determined the religion of her child. However, this resolution declared that the child of one Jewish parent, whether female or male, is presumed to be of Jewish descent; it went on to say: “This presumption of the Jewish status of the offspring of any mixed marriage is to be established through appropriate and timely public and formal acts of identification with the Jewish faith and people. The performance of these *mitzvot serves to commit those who participate in them, both parent and child, to Jewish life.” This resolution generated a great deal of controversy, both before and after its adaptation. Some saw it as a radical and unwarranted departure from tradition, whereas others hailed it as a revolutionary breakthrough. The sheer numbers of children of such unions make patrilineal descent an essential element of Reform outreach, and many within the Conservative movement believe that they need to adopt a similar approach as soon as possible.

The Reform movement also moved toward the full acceptance of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and transgendered individuals. In 1990, the Hebrew Union College began admitting openly gay and lesbian students to their rabbinic program. In 1996, the CCAR passed a resolution supporting the rights of homosexual couples to a civil marriage, and in 2002 it supported the rights of rabbis to officiate at same-sex commitment ceremonies (see also ETHICS, SEXUAL).

A new theological platform for Reform Judaism was approved in 1999 at the CCAR annual conference in Pittsburgh, where the original Classical Reform Pittsburgh Platform had been endorsed in 1885. The new platform reintroduced many traditional religious concepts and rituals. Although these were presented as options that could be evaluated rather than as *commandments that had to be observed, their inclusion was a clear indication of the Reform movement’s increasing return to many traditional Jewish practices. Yet, the Reform movement has also accepted new definitions of Jewish identity and religious fidelity, such as patrilineal descent. In the first decade of the twenty-first century Reform Judaism is, as a number of observers have pointed out, moving in two directions at the same time.

For further reading, see M. A. Meyer, Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism (1988); A. M. Schindler, “Not by Birth Alone: The Case for a Missionary Judaism,” in Contemporary Debates in American Reform Judaism: Conflicting Visions, ed. D. E. Kaplan (2001); R. N. Levy, A Vision of Holiness: The Future of Reform Judaism (2005); M. Washofsky, Jewish Living: A Guide to Contemporary Reform Practice (2001); and D. E. Kaplan, American Reform Judaism: An Introduction (2003).

DANA EVAN KAPLAN

Judea was the Greek and Roman designation for the southern area of the *Land of Israel; it derived from *Yehud, the Persian name for the province including *Jerusalem and the surrounding region (see PERSIA, ANCIENT).

Judeo-Arabic Language and Literature. Judeo-Arabic is one of the spoken and written languages used by Jews in Arabic-speaking lands. Like other Jewish languages it is characterized by the use of Hebrew script and a large quantity of *Hebrew and *Aramaic vocabulary, as well as pronunciation, grammar, and idiomatic expressions that differ from the dominant language. Judeo-Arabic originated in the Arabic dialect spoken by Jews living in *Arabia in the pre-Islamic period. Unfortunately, no Judeo-Arabic written documents survive from that time. As *Islam expanded into the Middle East and *North Africa, Judeo-Arabic became the dominant language of medieval Jewish communities under Muslim rule. Important works written in Judeo-Arabic include *Saadia Gaon's (882–942) Book of Doctrines and Opinions, Judah *Halevi's (1086–1167) Kuzari, and *Maimonides' (1135–1204) Guide of the Perplexed.

After the fifteenth century, as a result of increased segregation of Jews and Muslims and the establishment of separate Jewish neighborhoods, Jewish knowledge of Classical Arabic diminished. At the same time the level of education throughout the Muslim world also declined, and written texts in both communities became more colloquialized. These changes can be seen in the genre of ṣarḥ, colloquial Judeo-Arabic translations of the Bible that were more accessible than Saadia Gaon's tenth-century translation. This genre also grew in importance with the eclipse of scientific writing in Arabic in general and in Judeo-Arabic in particular. After the 1492 expulsion from *Spain, Judeo-Arabic writing was devoted almost exclusively to Jewish subjects, including ṣarḥ, legal texts, liturgy, and poetry. Characterized by local dialects and regional literary forms, Judeo-Arabic had a broad geographic distribution, expanding from the Middle East to Europe, the Americas, India, and East Asia through Jewish immigrations to these areas from *North Africa, *Iraq, and *Yemen.

Secular themes returned in the second half of the nineteenth century with the establishment of Judeo-Arabic newspapers, particularly in Tunisia. This press functioned in the same way as its Yiddish and Ladino counterparts (see JOURNALISM entries) providing news of interest to the Jewish community. Judeo-Arabic periodicals served as an agent of modernization by informing their readers of developments in science and technology and translating world literature into the local dialects. However, with the establishment of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle network of schools in the Middle East and North Africa, Judeo-Arabic began to be eclipsed by French, and the Judeo-Arabic press disappeared. Judeo-Arabic did continue to flourish in the folklore and oral traditions of Jewish communities, even among the first generation of immigrants to *Israel. However, the children of immigrants were subject to the Israeli government's emphasis on Hebrew language, and as a result Judeo-Arabic dialects began dying out. In the early twenty-first century, significant research is focused on documenting the language, literature, and oral traditions of these communities.

For further reading see J. Blau, The Emergence and Linguistic Background of Judeo-Arabic: A Study of the Origins of Middle Arabic (1965); and N. Stillman, The Language and Culture of the Jews of Sefrou, Morocco: An Ethnolinguistic Study (1988).

SHARON VANCE

Judeo-German: See YIDDISH

Judeo-Persian Language and Literature. Jews were living in *Iran (*Persia) for some two thousand years before the Arab Islamic conquest in the seventh century, but the cultural life of the community in those times is largely unknown. Some Jewish works date from the early centuries of Islamic Iran, but most surviving manuscripts date from later centuries. The literature of the Jews of Iran is written in the Judeo-Persian language, the classical Persian language using *Hebrew script. Old Jewish Persian texts have features of the local dialect (Farsi) of southern Iran just before and after the Islamic conquest. Works in Judeo-Persian include Bible translations and commentaries, religious and secular poetry, chronicles, rabbinical works, grammatical treatises, didactic poetry, historical texts, and translations of medieval Hebrew *poetry, as well as transcriptions of classical Persian poetry. For examples, see V. B. Moreen, ed., In Queen Esther's Garden: An Anthology of Judeo-Persian Literature (2000).

A demonstrably close connection exists between Jewish literary culture and classical Muslim Persian literature. Judeo-Persian poets incorporated stylistic devices, names, words, and expressions from Muslim Persian poetry. Shahin, a highly influential fourteenth-century Judeo-Persian poet, used Persian and Islamic elements to present biblical narratives in the Persian epic mode. Imrani of Shiraz (1454–1536) translated and poeticized a tractate of the *Mishnah using Persian motifs and a Persian setting. His 1523 versified Fathnameh (Book of Conquest) retells narratives from the books of *Joshua, *Ruth, and *Samuel. A seventeenth-century Judeo-Persian manuscript of this work, with colored illustrations in the Persian (Isfahan) style, now in the British Museum, exhibits the close connection between Judeo-Persian and Muslim Persian texts. Imrani's works combine Jewish and Muslim legends and elements from Persian poetry. His Ganjnameh (Book of Treasure), a versified discourse on religious topics composed in 1536, has Jewish content and Hebrew words and expressions, as well as ideas and expressions common to Muslim Persian poetry. Binyamin ben Misha'el (pen-name Amina), born in Kashan in 1672, wrote lyrical poems. Other Judeo-Persian writers used Persian motifs and settings, proverbs, and moral tales; there are also Judeo-Persian translations of the great secular classical poets of Iran, including Ferdowsi (tenth century), Sa'di (thirteenth century), and Hafez (fourteenth century). Siman Tov Melammed (d. 1823 or 1828) wrote a mystical-philosophical work that expressed Jewish concepts in Muslim mystical (Sufi) terminology.

The works of Judeo-Persian poets, especially those of Shahin, brought delight and comfort to Jewish audiences. These works figured in the everyday life of the community and were read and sung on the *Sabbath and other special occasions, using traditional Persian melodies. Jews could often recite from memory works by well-known Judeo-Persian and Muslim poets, which were copied into the Hebrew script. Muslim traditions and texts that have disappeared are often preserved in Judeo-Persian texts and oral traditions. However, few Judeo-Persian works have been translated into western languages, and the full extent of the Judeo-Persian cultural contribution remains largely unknown. Recent research includes G. Lazard, The Origins of Literary Persian (1993); and A. Netzer, "Persian Jewry and Literature. A Sociocultural View," in Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewries: History and Culture in the Modern Era, ed. H. Goldberg (1996).

RIVANNE SANDLER

Judeo-Spanish: See LADINO

Judges, Book of. (Hebrew, Shoftim). Although the historical chronology is difficult to reconstruct, the book of Judges purports to document an intermediate period between the unity of Israel under the leadership of *Joshua (2:6–10) and the institution of a monarchy (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP). The book's narrators emphasize several problems during this era, beginning with the fact that the *Israelite tribes live among other nations, mix with them, and adopt their customs (2:10b–15, 3:5–8, 10:6). Furthermore, the Israelites repeatedly neglect their covenantal duties and are subsequently punished by *God (2:1–5, 3, 10:10–16). The Israelites also lack a king, and therefore "every person does as he sees fit" (17:6, 18:1, 19:1, 21:25). Although the book proposes both short- and long-term solutions to these problems, the conundrum of *covenant persists. Each time the Israelites neglect the fidelity due to God, they lose God's protection and are defeated by their enemies. The short-term solution is for a leader or "judge" (shofet) to arise, enlist God's support, and deliver Israel from oppression (2:16). If the leader further inspires Israelite repentance, then a halcyon period ensues. These judges or charismatic leaders, however, often preside over a specific tribe or cluster of tribes; thus, they promote factionalism rather than unity. In the most egregious example, the book of Judges ends with most of the other tribes attacking the tribe of Benjamin. The book's underlying message appears to be that Israel needs a king, yet the subsequent books of *Samuel and *Kings describe the shortcomings of kingship and hint at the superiority of *prophecy. Although adherence to the covenant appears to be the key to stability, Judges, like most biblical books, speaks to the impossibility of achieving flawless collective obedience to divine *commandments. This implies that the covenant is a constantly shifting relationship between Israel and God; like human relationships it presents challenges as well as security. Nevertheless, Judges conveys an enduring sense of the past (6:7–10); the covenant transcends human institutions and survives them.

The judges themselves display martial qualities rather than juridical ones and rescue Israel through force of arms. Several are described as heroes, gibborim, a word from the same Hebrew root as gever (man; 6:12, 11:1). Women's bodies often operate as symbols of the disunity or unity of the tribes (see chapters 19–21); foreign women ensnare Samson (13–16), and anxiety concerning mothers with low status permeates the stories of Abimelech (8:29–9:57) and Jephthah (11–12). The book's daughters, all of whom seem to lack mothers, suffer bleak fates (1:14–15, 11:34–40, 19, 21:20–24). *Deborah the prophetess, a "mother in Israel" (5:7), is an exception: She foresees and enables a battle (4:6–9) and memorializes it in a victory song. The stories of Jephthah's daughter (11:34–40), the woman raped and battered at Gibeah (19), and the young women apprehended at *Shiloh (21:20–24) suggest that national cohesion is built on the abuse of women, whereas the narratives about Deborah (4:9), Jael (4:17–21), and Delilah (16:4–20) show that women with insight into human character can have a strong impact on national events. For further reading, see S. Ackerman, Warrior, Dancer, Seductress, Queen: Women in Judges and Biblical Israel (1999); and M. Bal, Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges (1988).

RACHEL HAVRELOCK

Jüdischer Frauenbund (JFB; League of Jewish Women) was an organization founded in Germany in 1904 by Bertha *Pappenheim. The JFB combined feminist and social welfare goals with a strong sense of Jewish identity. Among its concerns were fighting for women's suffrage, expanding women's roles in the Jewish community, providing women with career training, and fighting the traffic in women (see PROSTITUTION: MODERN TIMES).

Judith, Book of. See APOCRYPHA; HANUKKAH AND WOMEN

K

Kabbalah is the traditional appellation of the major Jewish esoteric-mystical group of schools that appeared in the late twelfth century and continue to this day. The term in Hebrew simply means “tradition.” In this context, however, it refers to the “secret tradition” given to *Moses on Mount Sinai. Scores of kabbalistic circles have operated in Judaism during the past eight centuries, producing hundreds of original spiritual worldviews that differ considerably from each other. There is hardly any idea or trend in kabbalistic literature whose opposite cannot also be found in this vast treasury of esoteric speculations. In addition, there are very few elements that are common to most kabbalistic systems because each school and each writer had particular emphases and original ideas.

Although it is nearly impossible to present general characteristics of the whole vast range of kabbalistic spirituality, most kabbalists shared the view of a series of divine emanations, the sefirot*, which serve as a ladder from the unreachable supreme godhead to the created universe. Many kabbalists tended to a dualistic worldview (see DUALISM), believing that the universe is a battleground between divine and satanic powers and that this struggle is reflected within every person. A significant number placed *messianic expectations, and sometimes messianic activity, at the center of their teachings. One of the unique characteristic of many kabbalistic systems, an element that separates the Kabbalah from other esoteric and mystical systems, is the belief in the cosmic consequences of individual actions. Fulfillment of *commandments and ethical behavior can have a positive impact on the divine powers while evil deeds can have a contrary effect. The term “theurgy” is often used to describe this phenomenon that insists that the divine presence in the world and the fate of the universe are actually decided by human actions, good and evil.

Some kabbalists were interested in *magic and included such elements in their works; others were not. Some kabbalists used *numerology extensively; many others did not. The Kabbalah, as such, is not mysticism but rather the opposite: It claims to be based on ancient tradition rather than on direct individual experience of the divine realm; yet some kabbalists like Abraham *Abulafia and Moses Ḥayyim *Luzzatto, among others, described such personal experiences of the divine.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT: In the last decades of the twelfth century and the first part of the thirteenth, several circles of Jewish esoterics produced visions of the world that included a new concept. They suggested that within *God there are different layers of divine powers with different functions. Three such circles appeared in *Germany and northern France: the circle of the Kalonymus family in the Rhineland; the Unique Cherub Circle, which based its traditions on a fictional baraita attributed to Joseph ben Uziel; and the anonymous author of the Sefer ha-Ḥayyim (Book of Life). It seems that each of these groups produced its teachings independently. Three other groups existed in southern Europe: the Iyyun circle, named after its central text, Sefer ha-Iyyun (Book of Contemplation), which flourished in southern *France or northern Spain in the late twelfth century and the beginning of the thirteenth; the Bahir (Book of Brilliance), which was identified by Gershom *Scholem as the earliest text of the Kabbalah; and the circle of kabbalists in Provence, headed by Isaac ben Abraham (known as *Isaac the Blind). The Iyyun circle presented a mostly independent system concerning the structure of the divine world. It is unclear whether there was any connection between the Bahir and the southern France circle. Scholem viewed the Iyyun circle as following the teachings of the Bahir, yet there are meaningful differences between them that are difficult to explain if they were in close connection.

The direct history of kabbalist schools begins with the Iyyun circle in southern France, which was the main inspiration for the center that emerged in the Catalan town of Gerona in the first half of the thirteenth century. Two kabbalists, Ezra ben Solomon and Azriel, produced their writings there, unifying and developing the teachings of the Bahir and their predecessors. The next generation of kabbalists in Gerona was headed by Moses ben Naḥman (*Naḥmanides), who was one of the most influential leaders of Spanish Jewry in that period; he and several members of this circle took part in the great controversy over the writings of *Maimonides that divided Spanish Jewry in 1232–35 and later. From the center in Gerona, the Kabbalah spread, and several circles were active in the second half of the thirteenth century. These included the Cohen brothers, Jacob and Isaac, in Castile, and Abraham Abulafia, a wandering teacher with his own unique mystical system. The Kabbalah reached *Italy at that time, but its main center was the Spanish school headed by Moses de Leon and Joseph Gikatilla, who wrote numerous kabbalistic works in Hebrew. The Zohar, the most important and influential work of the Kabbalah, emerged from this circle at the end of the thirteenth century. This was the “golden age” of the medieval Kabbalah, but its teachings were known only to the few people interested in this esoteric tradition and had minimal impact on Jewish culture as a whole.

The age of the Zohar was followed by a period of relative decline when kabbalistic circles were few and far between; one probably flourished in *Byzantium in the fourteenth century, producing the works of Sefer ha-Peliah (The Wondrous Book) and Sefer ha-Kanah (The Book of the Kanah Family). In the last decades before the 1492 expulsion from Spain, there was a surge of kabbalistic writings, many of them expressing intense messianic expectations. After the expulsion, kabbalists spread to other countries, mainly Italy, as well as *Greece and Turkey in the flourishing *Ottoman Empire. In this era the Kabbalah emerged from esoteric circles and became increasingly a part of general Jewish intellectual discourse. The Zohar was quoted by many, especially in Italy, and was printed in the sixteenth century. Kabbalah replaced the tradition of Jewish rationalistic philosophy, which was discredited after the expulsion, because it was blamed for the mass conversion of Spanish Jewish intellectuals to Christianity (see *Spain, Christian).

In the late fifteenth century, the Kabbalah began to spread beyond the boundaries of Judaism when some humanists in Florence, led by Count Pico della Mirandola, became interested in its teachings. Pico – following in the path of his teacher, Marsilio Ficino, who had translated the Hermetic library from Greek to Latin – studied Hebrew, had Jewish teachers, and employed translators who knew Hebrew and Latin. Under Pico's direction, Flavius Mithredates, a Jewish convert to Christianity, translated several kabbalistic works into Latin. One of Pico's disciples, Johannes Reuchlin, a German, became expert in Hebrew and wrote several works; the most important among them is De arte kabbalistica (1517), a highly detailed exposition of Kabbalah. In the sixteenth century, Christian Kabbalah appeared in Germany, France, and later the Netherlands, becoming a part of European scholarly discourse for the next two hundred years. It was, however, a Christian phenomenon, addressing Christian theological problems. Pico declared that the veracity of Christianity is best demonstrated by the disciplines of magic and Kabbalah. The Kabbalah, interpreted as testimony to Christian concepts, proved the antiquity of the Christian message, as these humanists understood it (see CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM).

In the first decades of the sixteenth century, kabbalists began to congregate in the town of *Safed, in the *Galilee, attracted by the belief that the tomb of the talmudic sage, R. Simon bar Yohai, the supposed author of the Zohar, was located in the nearby town of Miron. These kabbalists included several scholars who were exiles from Spain. Prominent among them was Moses *Cordovero, the author of numerous kabbalistic treatises and a monumental commentary on the Zohar (Or Yakar [Precious Light]). His most influential work was Pardes Rimonim (Orchard of Pomegranates), a systematic presentation of the main subjects of classical Spanish Kabbalah. By the middle of the century Safed was a vibrant center of kabbalistic creativity.

In 1570 Isaac *Luria Ashkenazi, known by the acronym "Ari," returned to Safed (he was born there but had migrated to *Egypt) and began to present a new, revolutionary, and intensely mythological interpretation of kabbalistic tradition. His teachings were radically eschatological; like many other kabbalists in Safed he believed that the messianic era was imminent. Lurianic Kabbalah demanded that every Jew participate in a spiritual process of strengthening the powers of goodness and rejecting evil forces, thus speeding and enabling the coming of the *messiah. In fact, Lurianic Kabbalah may be regarded as a national ideology, uniting all Jews in the endeavor to bring forth *redemption. Luria died in 1572, in a plague, when he was thirty-eight years old. The group of disciples that had surrounded him continued to develop his teachings; they were led by Hayyim Vital, who wrote numerous volumes presenting Luria's Kabbalah. In the seventeenth century this new school gradually replaced all others, including Cordovero's, and became the dominant *theology of Judaism.

One of the adherents of Lurianic Kabbalah was Nathan, a young mystic from Gaza, who met the messianic pretender *Shabbatai Zevi in 1665 and became convinced that he was indeed the messiah. In many letters, pamphlets, and treatises, Nathan presented himself as the prophet of the messiah, and his message spread quickly throughout *Turkey, the Middle East, and Europe. By the summer of 1666 it had engulfed almost all major Jewish communities, and thus began the greatest Jewish messianic movement since ancient times. Shabbatai Zevi ultimately converted to Islam at the order of the Ottoman Sultan, but the movement continued unabated, mostly in "underground" circles, until the beginning of the nineteenth century. A group of *Sabbateans converted to Islam following Shabbatai Zevi, and their descendants, known as the Dönme ("foreigners" in Turkish), survive as a sect to the present. Another group followed Jacob *Frank and converted to Christianity in *Poland in 1760; they remained a separate sect (Frankists) for two generations. Most Sabbateans, however, remained within Judaism, and some developed new kabbalistic-messianic systems. The most prominent example is Moses Hayyim *Luzzatto (Ramhal), who lived in Padua in the first half of the eighteenth century.

The founders of the *Hasidic movement in the middle and second half of the eighteenth century were kabbalistic preachers. The Kabbalah served as a theological foundation for the traditions and writings of the founder of Hasidism, the Besht (Israel *Baal Shem Tov), and his disciples, Jacob Joseph of Polonoï and *Dov Ber of Międzyrzec. Some of the third-generation leaders of Hasidism, the disciples of Dov Ber, were prominent kabbalists, most notably Schneur *Zalman of Liady, the founder of *Habad (Lubavitch) Hasidism, and Naḥman of Bratzlav, a great-grandson of the Besht, who founded Bratzlav Hasidism. The opponents of Hasidism (mitnaggedim, literally "opponents") were kabbalists as well. Elijah, the *Vilna Gaon, the leader of the opposition to Hasidism, was an authority on the Kabbalah. A kabbalistic center flourished in *Jerusalem in the eighteenth century, and kabbalists immigrated there, as well as to *Hebron and Safed in the nineteenth century. In the first half of the twentieth century Rav Judah Ashlag wrote an extensive, multivolume commentary on the Zohar, adapting it to conform to the Lurianic worldview.

In the last decades of the twentieth century and the first decade of the twenty-first, several groups in North America, Israel, and Europe have developed various integrations of some kabbalistic traditions with New Age ideas and trends, producing mixtures with astrology, *numerology, occultism, *magic, Buddhism, and other elements. These became very popular and attracted Jews and non-Jews alike. One of the most influential, the Center for the Study of Kabbalah, derived material from the teachings of Rav Ashlag and counted popular culture celebrities among its adherents. In Israel the term "kabbalist" has been adopted by various kinds of magicians and healers. The authentic Kabbalah survives in the early twenty-first century mainly in some Hasidic circles.

Among important studies are J. Dan, Kabbalah: A Very Short Introduction (2004); idem, Jewish Mysticism, vols. 1–4 (1998–99); G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1941); idem, Kabbalah (1974); M. Idel, Kabbalah: New Perspectives (1988); I. Tishby, The Wisdom of the Zohar (1989); D. Matt, The Zohar, Pritzker Edition, 5 vols. to date (2004–09).

JOSEPH DAN

Kabbalah, Lurianic is the mystical system devised by Isaac *Luria (1534–1572). The revolutionary aspect of Lurianic

*Kabbalah is the basic concept that perfection, even divine perfection, has never existed, even in the eternal godhead before creation, but will come into being in the future. The achievement of perfection is the reason for the existence of everything, including the divine realm. Thus, Luria addressed the problem of the purpose of existence in the most radical manner, one adopted by very few philosophers and theologians. According to Luria, creation was not a departure from divine perfection but rather a means for achieving it. A teleological backbone runs through Lurianic teaching and transforms the Kabbalah into a historically oriented concept, directing human participation in the achievement of the divine goal behind creation. Mysticism usually is ahistorical or even anti-historical, directing the mystic away from history and into the perfection of divine existence (which is usually in the past). The early Kabbalah was concerned mainly with the individual mystic's spiritual achievements. Lurianism teaches the community and its members their role in the historical achievement of redemption; it is therefore an intensely redemptive and probably messianic phenomenon (see REDEMPTION; MESSIANISM; EARLY MODERN).

Luria used an ancient Hebrew term, tzimtzum*, as a cornerstone for a vast theological mythology, in which the eternal godhead, Ein Sof*, contracted itself away from the space in which creation was to proceed to bring forward an "empty" space (tehiru). This process is conceived as a cathartic one, in which the Ein Sof separated itself from some potential elements within it that remained within the "empty" space as residues (reshimu). These elements incorporated the roots of what later developed into the powers of evil. According to this myth, God then proceeded to try and create the specific divine powers, the sefirot* as conceived in early Kabbalah, by pouring divine light in the form of a "straight line" into the tehiru. The sefirot comprised, according to previous formulations (mainly by Moses *Cordovero in *Safed) a duality of elements: the divine essence (atzmut) and the vessels in which it is contained (kelim). Lurianic myth describes the ensuing catastrophe, the "breaking of the vessels"* (shevirat ha-kelim), which occurred when the reshimu rebelled against its role in the construction of the vessels and caused them to shatter. If it were not for this catastrophe, the divine purpose would have been achieved by the transformation of the reshimu into a constructive element in creation. Instead, the shevirah established an independent realm of the broken vessels in the lower part of the tehiru, where many divine lights and sparks (nitzot) are held captive by the evil powers that derive their sustenance from them.

The process of creation that followed the shevirat ha-kelim was therefore an imperfect one. The unification of the divine realm and the overcoming of the evil element became the supreme purposes of existence. This "correction" underlies the most potent and influential Lurianic term, tikkun olam* ("mending" or "correcting the world"). All aspects of creation, human existence, and human deeds are directed toward the achievement of tikkun. All phases of history, from the creation of *Adam and his sin in the Garden of Eden to the theophany on Mount Sinai and the sin of the *golden calf (*Exod 32–34), were interpreted as failed attempts to achieve tikkun. Luria and his school were certain that they lived in the period when the final tikkun would be achieved. They believed it likely that 1575, the year shilo, according to Genesis 49:10, would begin a messianic age in which Isaac Luria and his disciple Hayyim Vital would play a personal and central role.

Large sections of the Lurianic corpus are dedicated to the elaborate depiction of the way in which traditional Jewish rituals, prayers, and actions contribute to the achievement of tikkun. The "uplifting of the sparks" is the hidden meaning and purpose of every aspect of religious life. A detailed systematic psychology was developed, describing the origins of the various parts of the human soul and its functions in this process, and Luria and his disciples reedited the Jewish prayer book to include texts and "intentions" (kavannot*) that direct every word toward the achievement of this universal purpose. Lurianic Kabbalah also initiated several rituals and "customs," many of which are called tikkunim, dedicated to the fulfillment of this mythological endeavor. The idea of the tikkun gives a core to all Jewish precepts and demands, uniting them in the great effort of achieving the divine purpose of existence.

Some aspects of the Lurianic corpus are not directly related to this myth. One of the best-known works by Hayyim Vital, Sha'arei Kedushah (Gates of Holiness), is an ethical work teaching the reader, even a sinner and an ignoramus, how to achieve the highest mystical stage of "the holy spirit." This is a classical work of individual mystical direction, via mystica, which can be read independently of the vast Lurianic myth, even though the terminology used is clearly Lurianic (the fourth and last chapter of this work was not printed in the many traditional editions because it was regarded as too radically mystical).

Another intriguing aspect of Lurianic teachings is the new conception of the sefirot. They are no longer understood as divine entities with individual characteristics, as in the early Kabbalah, but as structural aspects of everything. Vital's works abound with descriptions of every entity, from the most highly divine to the basest material artifact, as comprised of elements reflecting the structure of the divine realm. Each sefirah itself comprises the ten sefirot (Luria preferred a system of five "faces" to that of the ten sefirot, but it is essentially the same structure; the six sefirot from four to nine are united in "the small face," ze'er anpin, reducing the number to five). Each such aspect also includes ten sefirot, and so on, ad infinitum. Previous kabbalists, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, who followed some Zoharic statements, also used the concept of "sefirot within the sefirot," but in Vital's writings this idea has been developed into a central system encompassing the structure of everything within the human being, the universe, and the divine realms. It can be viewed as a scientific attitude, describing a principal structure that governs all existence. This is a conception very similar to that of harmonia mundi, the parallel structure of the divine realm, the created universe, and the soul of human beings, which dominated European scientific and theological thought in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Luria and his direct disciples, especially Hayyim Vital, insisted on keeping the Lurianic message a complete secret. The radical nature of this mythology was conceived as an esoteric truth, which should not be revealed to the public. Luria's early death was explained by some as a divine punishment for revealing these secrets to people on earth. Even Solomon Shlumil's letters, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, present no details of this myth. The fame of Luria as a great and saintly person, based on the hagiographical stories of Shivhei ha-Ari and Toledot ha-Ari, preceded the spreading of his ideas. Yet in the first half of the seventeenth century the central concepts spread via the works of Saruk, some writings of Vital, and ethical works that used Lurianic concepts, like the Shnei Luhot ha-Berit (Two Tables of the Covenant) by Isaiah Halevi Horowitz and many others. The teachings of Luria gradually replaced those of *Cordovero.

Gershom *Scholem's studies presented Lurianic Kabbalah, both before its emergence in Safed and after its dissemination in the seventeenth century, in close connection with two major historical events in Judaism: the 1492 expulsion from *Spain and the messianic movement around *Shabbetai Zevi in the 1600s. Scholem saw in Luria's teachings an expression of the new awareness of exile that characterized Jewish perceptions of the community's fate after the expulsion. Luria placed the experience of exile within the godhead, in the zimtzum, and in the captivity of the sparks; the redemption of God from its exile is the essence of the human endeavor for *redemption. The spreading of Lurianic concepts, even in a most basic form, paved the way for the *Sabbatean message, which used, especially in the writings of Nathan of Gaza, Shabbatai Zevi's "prophet," Lurianic symbolism to explain the role of the messiah in redeeming the last sparks and destroying the powers of evil. In various forms, Lurianic symbols continued to be among the most potent and influential elements of Jewish spirituality in *Hasidic and other Jewish sects and circles of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and in many respects even today. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954), 244–86; and idem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1965), 87–117. JOSEPH DAN Kaddish is an *Aramaic *prayer (with some Hebrew additions) expressing ten praises of the divine name; it may have originated as a doxology (a brief hymn praising *God) used to conclude study sessions in rabbinic times. This function is preserved because the kaddish, in one form or another, concludes each segment of communal *worship. The forms include the kaddish shalem (full kaddish), the hatzi kaddish (half kaddish), the mourners' kaddish (kaddish yatom, literally orphan's kaddish), and the kaddish de-rabbanan (Rabbi's kaddish). The kaddish shalem is recited after the amidah* (see WORSHIP) by the leader of the *synagogue service, and the congregation responds at appropriate points. The hatzi kaddish contains only the first two major paragraphs of the kaddish shalem and is recited before the blessings of the shema* (see WORSHIP) and at the end of certain sections of the service, such as the reading of the weekly *Torah portion. The kaddish de-rabbanan contains the kaddish shalem with an additional paragraph after the first two that consists of a prayer for students. It is recited after study sessions and may be read in the synagogue after passages from *rabbinic literature.

The origins of the mourners' kaddish are obscure; the practice of reciting it while mourning may have originated in thirteenth-century *Ashkenaz.

The mourner's kaddish, which includes the kaddish shalem with the exception of the third paragraph, is recited by mourners at the burial of a close relative (parent, sibling, spouse, child), at the graves of close relatives, and at the conclusion of each of the three daily synagogue services (see WORSHIP) during the first eleven months that follow the death of a parent or the thirty days following the death of another close family member (see DEATH AND MOURNING). Although the kaddish makes no explicit reference to death, it may have been deemed appropriate for mourners because of its emphasis on faith in divine justice and dominion over the universe and its request for present and future peace for all Israel. At some burials mourners recite a somewhat extended kaddish shalem that includes a reference to *resurrection and the rebuilding of the *Temple in Jerusalem in the first paragraph. The kaddish is always recited while standing and facing Jerusalem and only in the presence of a minyan* (a quorum of ten, whose make-up will depend on how the worshiping community defines eligibility [see WORSHIP]). In some contemporary synagogue prayer, mourners rise and recite the mourners' kaddish together. For further reading, see R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004); and L. Wieseltier, Kaddish (2000). ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Kafka, Franz (1883–1924), one of the most influential fiction writers of the twentieth century, was born in Bohemia into a middle-class, German-speaking Jewish family; he spent most of his life in *Prague. Kafka took a law degree from the Charles-Ferdinand University and afterward worked for an insurance company while devoting his free time to literature. Although he was also fluent in Czech, his major works were written in German. His novels include The Trial (1925), The Castle (1926), and Amerika (1927). Important short stories are "The Judgment" (1913), "The Metamorphosis" (1915), "A Country Doctor" (1919), "In the Penal Colony" (1920), and "A Hunger Artist" (1922). Kafka's writings, influenced by authors such as Kleist, Flaubert, and Dostoyevsky, are generally devoid of sentimentality and reflect the anxiety and alienation of modern human beings. His main characters tend to fail in their objectives because of anonymous opposing forces or are punished even before they have formally offended the law.

Kafka's diaries and letters shed light on the personal background and genesis of his literary oeuvre. They portray the writer's relationships with Felice Bauer, Milena Jesenská, and later on Dora Diamant, and they often address the question of his Jewish heritage. Although Kafka was not directly involved in Jewish religious life and never explicitly made it a theme in his literary texts, *Judaism nevertheless represents an important undercurrent in his work. After his encounter with *Hasidic culture, whose authenticity and spiritual depth he admired, he gradually began to consider the precariousness of western Jewish identity. During the last few years of his life he was increasingly drawn to *Zionism. After his death from tuberculosis, his friend and publisher Max Brod rescued most of his writings and edited and published them posthumously. These enigmatic, multilayered texts have fascinated generations of readers and continue to prompt an array of literary and philosophical interpretations and theories.

Recent research includes R. Robertson, Kafka: Judaism, Politics and Literature (1985); K.-E. Grözinger, S. Mosès, and H. D. Zimmermann, eds., Franz Kafka und das Judentum (1987); I. Bruce, Kafka and Cultural Zionism: Dates in Palestine (2007); M. Gelber, ed., Kafka, Zionism and Beyond (2004); and V. Liska: When Kafka Says We: Uncommon Communities in German-Jewish Literature (2009); see also LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE.

VIVIAN LISKA AND ARVI SEPP

Kahal, Kehillah: See COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN ERAS

Kallah Months (yarḥei kallah) were month-long intensive study sessions convened twice each year by the Babylonian academies during the *amoraic and *geonic eras. They took place during the agriculturally slack months of Adar (February/March) and Elul (August/September) and were open to interested individuals who were unable to commit themselves to year-long studies. Each month-long period was apparently devoted to a specific tractate of the *Mishnah. In contemporary times, this phrase refers to organized study sessions of specific length, generally convened during vacation periods.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Kaplan, Mordecai M. (1881–1983) is the founder of the Reconstructionist trend in American *Judaism. *Reconstructionism became a separate denomination in the late 1960s, one of the few movements in modern Judaism that resulted from the vision of a single personality. Born in Svenciony, *Lithuania (then part of the Russian *Pale of Settlement), Kaplan was brought to the United States in 1889; he graduated in 1900 from the City College of New York and in 1902 received an M.A. from Columbia University and rabbinic ordination from the *Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) of America. Kaplan served as rabbi of several Orthodox synagogues before becoming a faculty member at JTS, head of its Teachers Institute, and later Professor of Homiletics and Philosophies of Religion. For many years he led the Society for the Advancement of Judaism, a *synagogue on the Upper West Side of Manhattan that he established in 1922 to exemplify his approach to the revitalization of American Judaism (see JUDAISM: RECONSTRUCTIONIST).

Kaplan's first and seminal book, Judaism as a Civilization: Towards a Reconstruction of American Jewish Life (1934), criticized all Jewish religious movements of his time for their inability to grasp that Judaism was the "evolving religious civilization" of the Jewish people. Informed by the findings of modern biblical and historical scholarship, Kaplan emphasized the social nature of Jewish identity along with the essential roles of Jewish ethical teachings and religious practices in constructing group cohesion. In his many essays and books he addressed a wide range of Jewish issues from a perspective influenced by sociology and religious naturalism, drawing on the writings of Matthew Arnold, William James, John Dewey, Emile Durkheim, and *Aḥad Ha-Am. Kaplan understood religion as a collective phenomenon and Judaism as far more than a "church." Early on he was associated with the Jewish Center movement that expanded the program of synagogues to include social and artistic activities in addition to formal worship and study. Supportive of cultural *Zionism, Kaplan saw Jews as an international people who should fully accept democratic forms of government (see US: COMMUNITY CENTER MOVEMENT).

Kaplan's view of religion was pragmatic and functional, rather than metaphysical or existential. Religion was a form of group consciousness; suitably modernized, it made possible a this-worldly form of salvation; that is, self-fulfillment. He understood Jewish religious practice as an agglomeration of folkways sanctified by tradition, rather than *commandments (mitzvot) in the traditional sense. Among his innovations were *Bat Mitzvah and changes in *liturgy (the latter triggered his formal excommunication [see HEREM] by a group of *Orthodox rabbis in 1945). One of his most controversial views was the rejection of the concept of the Jews as the "chosen people"; he believed that every people could have a vocation to contribute special insights to humanity. Kaplan had a considerable, if often unacknowledged influence on Reform and Conservative rabbis (see JUDAISM, REFORM: UNITED STATES; and JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE). Soon after his 1963 retirement from JTS, his supporters constituted Reconstructionism as a separate Jewish denomination. Kaplan's journals from 1913 to 1934 were published as Communings of the Spirit, ed. M. Scult (2002). Recent research includes R. M. Seltzer, "Which Wissenschaft? Reconstructionism's Theological Appropriation of Sociology and Religious Naturalism," in Modern Judaism and Historical Consciousness, ed. A. Gotzmann and C. Wiese (2007), 415–44.

ROBERT M. SELTZER

Karaism, the longest surviving form of sectarian Judaism, apparently took its name from the Hebrew word mikra (scripture). Karaites rejected the rabbinic concept of an Oral *Torah; they believed that the details of divine *revelation could be found through close reading of the Written Torah (Hebrew *Bible) alone. The Karaites' reading of the Bible, conducted independently of *rabbinic literature, led to religious practices that distinguish their communities from those of the majority of Jews (known, in the context of Karaism, as *Rabbanites). Areas of Karaite difference include (a) methods of calculating the *calendar (leading to the observance of *Shavuot always on a Sunday and no observance of a second day of the holidays, even on *Rosh Ha-Shanah); (b) *dietary laws: no blanket prohibition of meat and milk together and different regulations concerning ritual slaughter (sheḥitah); (c) *synagogue and *festival practices: no *tefillin, no chairs in the synagogues, no blowing a *shofar on *Rosh Ha-Shanah, and no observance of *Ḥanukkah; (d) *prayer liturgy: based mainly on *Psalms; (e) different laws of prohibited sexual relations; (f) *Sabbath practices: no hot food or sexual relations, but the use of Sabbath lamps, without a blessing, since the fifteenth century; and (g) different ritual *purity laws.

Karaite origins remain a mystery. The Rabbanites generally attribute the movement's founding to Anan ben David (mid-eighth century CE), a disappointed candidate to be *Exilarch (head of the Babylonian community) whose anger caused him to secede from normative Judaism. Karaites claim that their form of Judaism is the original one and that the schism between the two groups of Jews has its origins in the *Second Temple period when, they assert, the Rabbanite concept of the Oral Torah was invented. Modern research has demonstrated that Anan was most certainly not the founder of Karaism (he founded a group called Ananites; only later was Anan appropriated by the Karaites). Opinion remains divided as to how much, if any, connection there is to Second Temple groups (such as the *Dead Sea covenants) or whether Karaism is purely a medieval movement.

No matter what their origins, by the tenth century the Karaites were a well-organized alternative to rabbinic Judaism. They enjoyed a "golden age" in the Land of Israel between the tenth and eleventh centuries, creating institutions parallel to those of rabbinic Judaism and developing their own form of law, exegesis, linguistic studies, polemics, and historiography. Their religiosity was characterized as well by "mourning for Zion," adopting ascetic practices in the hope of bringing the *messiah. Important early Karaites include Benjamin al-Nahawendi; Daniel al-Kumisi, who called for Jewish immigration to the Land of Israel; Jefet ben Eli, the chief Karaite exegete who composed commentaries on all books of the Bible (in *Judeo-Arabic, which was the literary language of most early Karaites); Abu'l Harun al-Faraj, grammarian; Joseph al-Basir, theologian and legalist; and Jeshua ben Judah, theologian and exegete. Jacob al-Kirkisani, one of the few Karaites of the period who lived outside the Land of Israel and was not a Mourner of Zion, was a legalist, theologian, and exegete.

In the tenth century, Karaites began making their way into *Byzantium, which became the center of Karaite creativity in the twelfth century after the demise of the community in the Land of Israel. Byzantine Karaites succeeded in adapting classical Karaism to the needs of the *Diaspora. The outstanding figures of this period were Judah Hadassi (fl. 1148), whose summa of law and lore serves as a digest of classical Karaism; Aaron ben Joseph (fl. 1294), exegete; Aaron ben Elijah (d. 1369), author of books of law, exegesis, and philosophy; and Elijah Bashyatchi (d. 1490), the final decisor of Karaite Judaism. The Byzantine period of Karaism is marked by constant Karaite attempts to narrow the differences between themselves and Rabbanite Jews.

Karaites had moved into the Crimea by the thirteenth century and into parts of *Eastern Europe by the fifteenth century. These communities were marked by increased intellectual rapprochement with Rabbanism, while, at the same time, the social distance between the groups grew. Unlike the communities in Arabic-speaking countries (such as *Egypt, which has had a continuous Karaite presence from the Middle Ages to the present), Karaites of Eastern Europe spoke a different language from the Rabbanites (a Turkic dialect usually called Karaim, rather than the Rabbanite *Yiddish), and intermarriage was rare. Yet, early modern Karaite intellectuals were very knowledgeable about Rabbanite literature, which was decisive in forming their worldview. One of the early modern Karaite thinkers was Isaac ben Abraham of Troki (d. 1594), best known for his anti-Christian polemic that was used extensively by Rabbanites; another notable figure was Simḥah Isaac Lutski (d. 1760), the author of twenty-four books. The last well-known Karaite was Abraham Firkovitch (d. 1874), whose collections of manuscripts, held today in the Russian National Library of *Saint Petersburg, are a major resource for the study of Karaism and Rabbanism alike.

When tsarist expansionism in the late eighteenth century brought Eastern European Karaites under Russian control, the Karaites looked for ways to avoid the legal disabilities (e.g., taxes and conscription) legislated against Jews. They avoided these laws by convincing the Russian authorities that they were not Jews; by the early twentieth century, some Karaites theorized that they were of Turkish origin with no relation to the Jewish people. This identification was generally accepted by the *Nazis and led to the survival of most Karaites in World War II.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century there are approximately 30,000 Karaites worldwide; most are located in Israel, concentrated in the cities of Ramla, Ashdod, Ofakim, and Beer Sheva and the agricultural villages of Mazliah and Ranen. Small communities of Karaites also exist today in the San Francisco area of *California, Western Europe, *Turkey, *Lithuania, and Crimea. Israeli Karaites, most of whom immigrated from Egypt, have their own religious institutions that are generally accepted de facto, if not de jure, by Israeli law. Some Israeli rabbinical authorities permit intermarriage between Karaites and Rabbanites if the Karaite partner is willing to accept rabbinic Judaism. Maintaining their own separate Jewish identity and avoiding secularization and assimilation into the broader Jewish society are two of the major challenges facing contemporary Karaites.

DANIEL J. LASKER

Karo, Joseph Ben Ephraim (1488–1575) is best known today as the author of the last comprehensive code of Jewish law, the Shulḥan Arukh*. Karo was born, most probably, in Faro, on the southern coast of *Portugal. After the forced conversion of Portuguese Jewry in 1497, Karo and his family lived in various places in the eastern Mediterranean basin, including *Cairo and Adrianople (today Edirne, *Turkey). Subsequently, he lived in Nikopol, *Bulgaria, and, most probably at one point, Salonika (see BALKANS). In 1536, Karo moved to *Palestine and settled in *Safed, where he became a central spiritual and intellectual force in that famous community. Among his associates in Safed were his close friend, Solomon Alkabetz, a kabbalist and author of the *Sabbath poem, "Lekha dod" ("Come, My Beloved"), and the charismatic messianic propagandist Solomon Molkho, whose meteoric career and execution at the stake profoundly affected Karo. Karo discusses Alkabetz and Molkho in a mystical diary, never intended for publication. The surviving portions, which have been analyzed by R. J. Z. Werblowsky in Josef Karo, Lawyer and Mystic (1977), reveal Karo as a deeply committed *kabbalist.

Karo's fame and influence rest on his *halakhic writings. He worked on the Beit Yosef, an encyclopedic work on Jewish law, for thirty-two years, and it assured him an international reputation. His code, the Shulḥan Arukh, which was intended as a summary of conclusions of the Beit Yosef for popular use, became authoritative both in the *Sephardic world and, with modifications, in the *Ashkenazic world as well. Karo also composed a commentary on parts of *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, called Kesef Mishneh, and wrote numerous *responsa, selections of which have survived in two published volumes. Also extant is a small work on talmudic methodology, Kelalei ha-Talmud.

SAMUEL MORELL

Kashrut: See DIETARY LAWS

Kavannah is the correct attitude or intention required to pray or perform a religious ritual with sincerity.

Kehillah: See COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION

Ketubbah refers to the *Aramaic contract presented by a husband to his wife at their *marriage; this contract delineates the legal and financial terms of their union. Among other requirements, a husband promises to provide his wife with food, appropriate clothing, and conjugal rights, and he pledges that her property will pass to her heirs. The ketubbah, which developed in *rabbinic times, protected a woman financially; should the marriage end through death or divorce, she would receive the dowry she brought into the marriage as well as an additional stipulated amount from her spouse. The ketubbah enhanced women's status, prevented rash divorces, and limited the numbers of indigent widows and divorcees dependent on community support. The medieval ketubbah could also contain added stipulations such as assurances that a husband would not take a second wife; that he would not beat his wife; and that before traveling he would prepare a conditional bill of divorce and deposit his marriage gift so that his wife would be able to remarry if he perished on his journey. As dated legal documents identifying specific individuals and communities, ketubbot are an important historical source. Some ketubbot inventoried the contents of the dowry, an indication of local material culture, while decorated ketubbot reflect Jewish art of various times and places. For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, "Medieval Jewish Models of Marriage," in The Medieval Marriage Scene: Prudence, Passion, Policy, ed. S. Roush and C. Baskins (2005), 1–22; and S. Sabar, Ketubbah: The Art of the Jewish Marriage Contract (2001).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Ketuvim: See BIBLE; and WRITINGS

Khazars. The Khazar Empire (ca. 630s/650s–ca. 965–969 CE) was the largest political entity of Eastern Europe of its day, ruling over a variety of Turkic, Iranian, Slavic, Finno-Ugric, and north Caucasian peoples in an area extending from the borders of modern Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan in the east to Kiev in the west, and from the Middle Volga zone in the north to the north Caucasus and Crimea in the south. At the height of its power in the ninth century, Khazaria was a major element in international commerce (north–south and east–west) and derived considerable revenue from the tithe it took on goods passing through its realm.

The Khazars Empire derived from the Türk Empire (552–630, 682–742) – in eastern Inner Asia, 552–659; in western Inner Asia, ca. 690s–766. When Türk power faded, the Khazars emerged as an independent power. In the course of wars with the Arabs for control of the Caucasus (beginning in the mid-seventh century and slackening after 737), the Khazars continued the entente that the Türks had with Byzantium, both sharing a common foe in the Arabian Caliphate. Khazaria was Constantinople's first line of defense against nomadic incursions from the steppe.

The Khazars had been typical Turkic shamanists. After an Arab invasion of Khazaria in 737, the ruler, the Qaghan, had been forced to convert to Islam, which he soon abjured. During the reign of the 'Abbâsid Caliph Hârûn al-Rashîd (786–809), the Qaghan, increasingly a sacralized, ceremonial figure, or his deputy, the Qaghan-Beg, the de facto ruler, converted to Judaism. This dating is confirmed by Khazar imitation Arab dirhams (units of currency) dating to 837/838, which substitute the statement Mûsâ rasûl Allâh ("Moses is the Messenger of God"), for the Muslim profession of faith. Thereafter, Judaism, in its Rabbanite form, spread within the Khazar core tribes, and Khazaria attracted Jews fleeing persecution in Byzantium and elsewhere. Khazar Hebrew sources dating from the mid-tenth century give several accounts of the conversion, presenting it as a return to an ancestral faith. Muslim sources also mention Khazar Judaism; the Byzantines are noticeably silent. The Khazar–Byzantine alliance turned to open hostility in the tenth century.

Weakened by the shifting trade patterns favoring its vassal, Volga Bulgharia, and by growing difficulties with the Slavo-Scandinavian Rus' and the Turkic Pechenegs and Oghuz, the Khazar state succumbed to Rus' and Oghuz attacks in 965–69. The Khazar element in the shaping of Eastern European Jewry remains the subject of speculation.

For further reading, see P. B. Golden, "The Conversion of the Khazars to Judaism," in The World of the Khazars: New Perspectives (2007), ed. P. B. Golden, H. Ben-Shammai, and A. Róna-Tas, 123–62; D. M. Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars (1954); and N. Golb and O. Pritsak, Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century (1982).

PETER B. GOLDEN

Kibbutz Movement: See ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT

Kiddush, literally, "sanctification," is a blessing over wine recited in the home before the evening meal on the eve of the Sabbath and festivals (BT Pesahim 101a). The custom of also reciting the kiddush in the synagogue at the end of Friday evening synagogue services developed in Babylonia in rabbinic times for the benefit of travelers (BT Pesahim 101a). A shorter kiddush, known as the Kiddush Rabbah (great kiddush) is recited before the afternoon meal on the Sabbath and festivals (BT Pesahim 106a). In contemporary times, this kiddush is usually recited in the synagogue after morning worship, as part of a light meal and social gathering. Women are included in the obligation to hear or recite the kiddush, even though it is a time-bound positive commandment, because they are also obligated to "remember" (Exod 2:8) and "observe" (Deut 5:12) the Sabbath day (BT Berakhot 20b).

The Friday evening kiddush is introduced with readings from Genesis 1:31 and 2:1–3 that describe the culminating day of creation. The kiddush itself includes the short blessing over wine and a longer blessing sanctifying the Sabbath as Israel's inheritance as a commemoration of creation (Exod 20:11) and redemption from slavery in Egypt (Deut 5:15; see TEN COMMANDMENTS). It is generally customary to stand during the biblical introduction to the Friday evening kiddush; various communities have different customs regarding whether one should sit or stand for the entire prayer. The Friday evening kiddush may also be recited over grape juice or over the Sabbath loaves (hallah). The Kiddush Rabbah usually consists of the short blessing over wine and may be recited over grape juice, wine, or another alcoholic drink. The festival kiddush omits the introductory biblical passage and concludes with a reference to God, "who hallows Israel and the festive seasons." For further reading, see R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Kimḥi Family were influential Jewish grammarians and Bible exegetes in Provence (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN) during the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. JOSEPH KIMḤI (ca. 1105–ca. 1170) immigrated to Narbonne from Muslim Spain (ca. 1150) in the wake of Almohad invasions. He and several other prominent Spanish émigrés, most notably Judah ibn Tibbon and Abraham ibn Ezra, introduced the accomplishments of Spanish Jewry to Provence and other parts of Christian Europe. Joseph's Sefer ha-Berit (Book of the Covenant) was one of the first Jewish polemics against Christianity (see MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS). His grammatical and exegetical works, as well as his translations and teachings, influenced his sons, Moses and David, and other students.

The writings of MOSES KIMḤI (d. c. 1190), known as Remak, were better preserved than those of his father, although his interests were narrower. His Hebrew grammatical work, Mahalkh Shevilei ha-Da'at (Journey on the Paths of Knowledge), was translated into Latin by Sebastian Muenster (d. 1552) as Liber Viarum Linguae Sacrae and was popular among sixteenth-century *Christian Hebraists. His commentaries on *Proverbs, *Ezra, and *Nehemiah, mistakenly attributed to Abraham ibn Ezra, were printed in rabbinic Bibles. Moses passed on their father's teachings to his younger brother, David, who was only ten years old when Joseph died.

DAVID KIMḤI (ca. 1160–1235), known by the acronym Radak and the most prominent family member, was strongly influenced by his father and brother. As a staunch defender of *Maimonides' *rationalism, he played a key role in the Maimonidean controversy. Radak's first work was a Hebrew philological treatise that reviewed and adapted the linguistic discoveries of the great Spanish Jewish grammarians. The grammatical and lexical parts of this treatise became known separately as Sefer Mikhlol (Book of Completeness) and Sefer ha-Shorashim (Book of Roots). Although he included a few of his own Hebrew grammatical discoveries, Radak realized that little creative work remained to be done in the field. His arrangement of the material was so successful that his linguistic works overshadowed the prior works they summarized, which were mostly written in Arabic.

Radak then wrote Hebrew commentaries on *Chronicles, *Psalms, Former and Latter *Prophets, and *Genesis (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800). His biblical exegesis synthesized the comments and explanatory approaches of his predecessors, arranging them in an exegetical context for the reader and supplementing them with many of his own incisive interpretations; their readable style obviated the need for supercommentaries. Although clearly a beneficiary of Spanish Jewish culture, Radak was profoundly influenced by Provençal and *midrashic traditions from northern France (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES), as is evident from his heavy reliance on rabbinic interpretation. His commentaries also included philosophical and polemical discussions; this tension between the Spanish and rabbinic modes of exegesis is a hallmark of Radak's commentaries and contributed to their popularity and relevance over the centuries. Both the commentaries and grammatical works survive in many manuscripts and editions. They also strongly influenced *Christian Hebraists from the sixteenth to nineteenth centuries. For further reading, see F. Talmage, David Kimhi: The Man and the Commentaries (1975).

NAOMI GRUNHAUS

Kindertransport (also known as the Refugee Children Movement). In the aftermath of the *Nazi *Kristallnacht pogrom, the British Jewish Refugee Committee was successful in appeals to British political leaders to approve the admission to *Britain of unaccompanied children up to the age of seventeen from *Germany, *Austria, *Czechoslovakia, Danzig, and *Poland. The equivalent of $250 (50 pounds sterling) had to be guaranteed for each child to pay for their eventual return to their own countries. Members of a number of organizations, Jewish and non-Jewish, helped usher the children through Europe and found shelter for the refugees, who were mostly Jews, throughout the United Kingdom with private families, on farms, and in group homes, hostels, and boarding schools. Some older children were placed as domestics and agricultural workers, and more than one thousand served with British or Australian military forces. Between December 1938 and September 1939, the Kindertransport saved approximately ten thousand children. Although perhaps 20% were reunited with family members after the war, most found that their parents had not survived.

Film documentaries describing the Kindertransport experience include My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports, directed by Melissa Hacker (1996), and Into the Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransports, directed by Mark Jonathan Harris (2000), which won the 2001 Academy Award for best documentary feature. Among many literary works are Lore Segal's autobiographical novel, Other People's Houses (1964); W. G. Sebald's novel, Austerlitz (2002); and Diane Samuels' 1993 play, Kindertransport. British poet and novelist Karen Gershon (born Käthe Löwenthal [1923–1993]), herself a Kindertransport child, published We Came As Children (1966), a collective biography of Kindertransport participants. See also BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; LITERATURE: BRITAIN. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Kings, Books of. Kings 1 and 2 are biblical books in the *Prophets division of the Hebrew *Bible; contemporary scholars understand them as part of a larger work embracing *Deuteronomy through 2 Kings. This *biblical narrative was created in the seventh or sixth century BCE to explain the destruction of *Israel and *Judah by the *Mesopotamian powers of *Assyria and *Babylon and to offer hope for a revival of fortunes. This "Deuteronomistic History" (DH), as Martin Noth named it in 1943, has profoundly shaped our understanding of both the history of Israel and of history writing in general. The two books of Kings assumed separate identities because the entire DH could not fit on a single scroll. Early manuscripts of the *Septuagint name them 3–4 Reigns, as separate works, but medieval Hebrew manuscripts such as Codex Leningrad treat 1–2 Kings as a single work. The *Dead Sea Scrolls include three fragmentary manuscripts of 1–2 Kings (4Q54, 5Q2, and 6Q4). The Septuagint (in the Lucianic recension) and Masoretic text differ widely, with the former repeating material and making several additions (e.g., 1 Kgs 2:35^{a-0} and 2:46^{a-1}).

Kings 1 and 2 recount the history of Israel and Judah from the mid-tenth to the early sixth centuries BCE. Beginning with the death of *David (1 Kgs 1–2), they report the reign of *Solomon (1 Kgs 3–11), including the building of the *Temple in *Jerusalem and his creation of the basic structures of a state. After the break-up of the so-called *United Monarchy, in the late tenth century BCE, the narrative alternates stories of kings of Israel and Judah and ends with the fall of *Samaria to Assyria in 722 BCE (1 Kgs 12–2 Kgs 17). The work concludes with a single narrative strand about the last kings of Judah (2 Kgs 18:1–25:26) and a brief epilogue about the release of the exiled king Jehoiachin ca. 562 BCE (2 Kgs 25:27–30). The basic historical framework of the books can be corroborated at several points, with the raid of Shishak/Shoshenk (1 Kgs 14:25–26) appearing in *Egyptian texts, and the reigns of Omri, *Ahab, Jehu, Ahaz, *Hezekiah, and *Josiah all being attested in Mesopotamian texts. Legendary material about both kings (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP) and prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY) appears in the books; both the sequence of kings and the stories about them from the mid-ninth century on seem to be relatively reliable.

The Deuteronomistic editor(s) of the books may have worked over a period of several decades. Some scholars have argued for a two-stage redactional history, with most of the material having been worked up during the reign of *Josiah (ca. 640–609 BCE) as a response to the religious reforms of that period. According to this approach, a more pessimistic reworking of the material occurred during the *Babylonian Exile, probably soon after the latest recorded event of the work (ca. 562–560 BCE). Others have posited a three-stage redactional history. More recent scholars have proposed even more elaborate models, with editing occurring well into the *Persian period (539–334 BCE). Those who assign a late date to the last layers run into the difficulty that, unlike 1 and 2 Chronicles, 1 and 2 Kings lack obvious anachronisms or late linguistic features, at least in the Masoretic text (see MASORETES).

However one understands the evolution of these books, two things are clear. First, those responsible for them used older material of widely varying provenances. These sources include royal chronicles, court legends, poems, tales of prophets (circulating in prophetic “schools”), and perhaps royal inscriptions. Second, the Deuteronomists imposed on this material a chronological order and theological aim that, while respecting traditional understandings, imparted a new coherence. The Deuteronomistic theology is most visible in Solomon’s prayer in 1 Kings 8, the summaries at the end of each reign (which evaluate each king’s relationship to the Jerusalem sanctuary and basic moral laws), and the summary of Israel’s history in 2 Kings 17. In that summary the belief in divine retribution for injustice and idolatry, along with a conviction of God’s readiness to forgive the penitent, comes to the fore. The Deuteronomists’ unease with, though not rejection of, kingship also plays a prominent role throughout the work.

Although Mesopotamians invented historiography in the late third millennium, the Deuteronomists were innovators in both the scale and the aims of their work. Far from offering propaganda for a monarch or a mere listing of events, they sought to create a meaningful account of the past that would also serve the future. For further reading, see M. Cogan, I Kings (2000); M. Cogan and H. Tadmor, II Kings (1988); and A. K. Grayson, Assyrian and Babylonian Chronicles (2000).

MARK W. HAMILTON

Kislev is the ninth month of the Jewish calendar, usually equivalent to November and/or December of the Gregorian calendar. The festival of *Hanukkah takes place from Kislev 25 to Tevet 2. See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Kittel is a simple long-sleeved, belted, calf-length white robe traditionally worn by Jewish men on a number of important ceremonial occasions. It may be made of linen, cotton, or silk. Although it is reminiscent of a shroud, it is worn during both joyous and solemn ritual moments. The kittel was traditionally donned by a groom on his wedding day and by married men on *Rosh Ha-Shanah (the Jewish New Year), *Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), and when leading the *Passover seder. The white color is a symbol of purity and solemnity and the style reflects simplicity, humility, and the equality of all human beings before *God.

RELA MINTZ GEFEN

Knesset: Israel’s parliament. See ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS.

Kook, Rabbi Abraham Isaac (1865–1935) was born in Grieva, *Latvia, and immigrated to *Ottoman Empire *Palestine in 1904 where he served as the Chief Rabbi of Jaffa and its environs. He later became Palestine’s first elected Chief Rabbi in 1921 and served in that role until his death in 1935. He was an inspirational and visionary leader, mystic, and halakhist (legal decisor) to generations of followers and admirers. His father was of Lithuanian descent, and his mother came from the *Hasidic lineage of Lubavitch. As a young man, Kook briefly served as the rabbi of Zamuel and Boisk before immigrating to Palestine.

During his tenure as Chief Rabbi, Kook wrote extensively, producing numerous volumes of *responsa (halakhic decisions), many of which were collected and published after his death by his son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook (1891–1982). Many of his speculative, mystical, and autobiographical musings were published posthumously by various disciples, in addition to his son, most prominently Rabbi David Cohen (known as the “Nazir”). Three of Kook’s major works were published during his lifetime; Arpelei Tohar (1914), Orot (1920), and Orot ha-Teshuvah (1925). Arpelei Tohar was quite controversial as it presented a spiritual *Zionist vision from the Ultra-Orthodox (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX) camp that affirmed the viability, and even necessity, of the secular Zionist project. His more personal writings were collected by the Nazir and published in the three-volume Orot ha-Kodesh, which reads like a mystical diary (see KABBALAH). Orot contains Kook’s more nationalistic writings and was edited by his son Rabbi Zvi Yehuda, who later became the spiritual guide for the settler movement known as Gush Emunim. Orot and Orot ha-Teshuvah are both in English translation.

Arguably his most comprehensive works, Orot and Orot ha-Kodesh were often censored to soften the radical tendencies of this idiosyncratic and mystically inspired thinker. In 1999, uncensored versions of these and other texts were published in three volumes, Shemoneh Kevatzim (The Eight Notebooks), and a smaller volume Haderav (His Room; 1998, 2nd expanded ed., 2002), which also contains some previously unpublished material.

These new uncensored texts taken from Kook’s original notebooks sparked a renewed interest in Kook as a religious thinker, although Kook’s radical tendencies were well known in his lifetime. For example, his laudatory eulogy for the staunchly secular Theodor *Herzl, in which Kook referred to him as Messiah ben Joseph (a pre-Davidic *messiah in classical Judaism), was viewed by many in his traditional camp as offensive and even blasphemous. Kook’s support of *Hebrew-language education in place of the *Yiddish schools of the “old Yishuv (settlement)” community was another point of contention between him and many in his constituency.

The three major motifs of Kook’s thinking are *repentance, light, and holiness. Kook posited that repentance is part of the nature of the cosmos – that the cosmos returns on itself and, in doing so, reveals the innate holiness of creation in nature, history, and culture. He believed that Israel’s return to the Holy Land is part of a larger act of cosmic return, or “repentance,” a sign of the impending disclosure of divine will and the light of *redemption. The secular Zionists who abandoned their homes in the *Diaspora to dwell in the land and build a Jewish society there were, in Kook’s mind, unconsciously a part of this trajectory of cosmic return. Light is a theme that permeates all of Kook’s writings. He was a highly optimistic thinker living in an optimistic time for the Jewish people, although his personal writings exhibit a surprisingly dark soul pained by feelings of alienation and anguish at being unable to express its love for God. Yet he firmly believed that the power of the holy, embedded in the human soul, could overcome the forces of evil and destruction and bring about redemption. Although an ultra-traditionalist in behavior and practice, Kook embraced a kind of cosmic positivism based on the conviction that history (in this case, the return of the Jewish people to their land) was a sign of progress and should be embraced as an act of divine will, even though it was being channeled through the profane nature of secularity.

Kook’s writings, many of which have been filtered through his more activist and militant son Rabbi Zvi Yehuda, have become the major resource for Gush Emunim and the settler movement in contemporary Israel. They have also become a resource for Israel’s liberal religious peace movement (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT). The fact that these opposing sides could both claim Kook as their inspiration highlights the ambiguous and enigmatic nature of his writings (most of which were not meant for publication). Kook’s thinking draws from the entire body of classical Judaism: the *Bible, *Talmud and *midrash, Maimonides, the *Zohar, Cordoverian (see CORDOVERO, MOSES) and *Lurianic *Kabbalah, *musar literature, and *Hasidism. His romantic perspective is reminiscent of thinkers such as Hegel, Tolstoy, and the secular Zionist ideologue Aharon David *Gordon. His larger-than-life persona and the radical, innovative, and often obscure message of his writings make him one of the most important, yet difficult, figures in twentieth-century Jewish thought. SHAUL MAGID Kosher: Food that is fit for eating according to Jewish law (halakhah). See DIETARY LAWS.

Kristallnacht (“crystal night” or “night of broken glass”) refers to a series of *Nazi-sponsored *pogroms launched across *Germany on November 9–10, 1938, that destroyed or damaged 1,500 *synagogues and thousands of Jewish businesses and homes. Scores of Jews were murdered, and on November 16, the Gestapo rounded up 30,000 Jewish men and sent them to the *Dachau concentration camp outside of Munich. Kristallnacht, which was ostensibly prompted by the Paris murder of a low-level German diplomat, Ernst vom Rath, by a young Jew, Herschel Grynszpan, in early November, was controversial in and outside of Germany.

It infuriated some of Hitler’s closest associates who were concerned about its impact on the German economy and the country’s image abroad. Regardless, Nazi leaders were in agreement when it came to blaming Jews for the violence, and they required Germany’s Jewish community to pay 1 billion Reichsmarks ($401 million) for the murder of vom Rath and the damages caused by the riot. Kristallnacht also represented a major turning point in German policy toward its Jews. Many Jews who still remained in Germany and *Austria were convinced by Kristallnacht that they should find any means possible to leave. On January 30, 1939, Hitler told the Reichstag that if Jewish financiers “once again” plunged Europe into war, the result would not be the bolshevization of the world, but the “annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe.” See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: ROLE OF GENDER, etc. DAVID M. CROWE Krochmal, Nachman (1785–1840), was a self-taught philosopher, historian, and Haskalah* figure in *Habsburg Galicia who brought a Wissenschaft sensibility to his theory of the history of Judaism. Born in Brody to a prosperous family, Krochmal received a good Jewish education and benefited from his father’s contacts with Jewish intellectuals in Prussia. At fourteen, he married Sara Haberman, moved to Zolkiev, and was further supported in his studies by his father-in-law.

Krochmal studied Moses *Mendelssohn and Salomon *Maimon as well as *Maimonides (using Maimon’s Hebrew commentary), *Ibn Ezra, and *Naḥmanides. He taught himself German, Latin, French, Arabic, and Syriac and then immersed himself in the works of Immanuel Kant. His intensive study brought on a physical breakdown in 1808, and he received medical treatment in Lemberg. On returning to Zolkiev he read Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. He was particularly influenced by Hegelian Idealism and used it to create his own theories on the nature of *Judaism as a religion and Jewish history as an expression of a unique connection between *God and the Jews. After his in-laws’ deaths in 1814, he became responsible for his family’s financial welfare, and he worked first as a merchant and then as a bookkeeper.

Krochmal, a gifted teacher who preferred discussion and discourse, did not publish widely; however, his insistence on teaching Haskalah ideas and texts made him a potentially threatening intellectual force. A dispute with *Hasidim in Galicia about his relationship to a *Karaites community led to a debate by correspondence. At the urging of friends and students, he collected his ideas in writing, but illness and severe poverty kept him from completing a systematic book. In 1851, a decade after his death, Krochmal’s most well-known work, Moreh Nevukhei Ha-Zeman (Guide of the Perplexed of the Time), was published posthumously by his friend Leopold Zunz. Edited, organized, and titled by Zunz, the book outlines Krochmal’s philosophies of religion and history, presents an analysis of halakhah and aggadah*, and sketches his adaptation of Hegelian thought in a philosophy of Jewish history.

Krochmal followed Maimonides in elevating philosophy to the level of religion itself; his rejection of a competition between philosophical and theological knowledge allowed him to articulate a theory of creation emanating from the Absolute Spirit (synonymous with God). He presented

Judaism and Jewish history as occurring in a series of three stages (each corresponding directly with the relationship of Israel to God). By delineating a progressive and unique unfolding of Jewish experience and development that responded to the historical contexts in which Jews lived, Krochmal moved beyond both contemporary Jewish views of an eternal, unchanging Judaism and Hegel's relegation of Judaism to an archaic history. For further reading see Y. Amir, "The Perplexity of Our Time: Rabbi Nachman Krochmal and Modern Jewish Existence," Modern Judaism 23(3) (2003); and J. Harris, Nachman Krochmal: Guiding the Perplexed of the Modern Age (1991). LEAH HOCHMAN

Kurdistan is a cultural-ethnic-geographic term referring to an area split among five states: *Turkey, *Iran, *Iraq, *Syria, and Armenia. Kurdish Jews were a tiny minority among several minorities who lived among the Kurdish majority, which itself was a minority in each state. The Jews lived in about two hundred villages and towns throughout Kurdistan, but mostly in Iraq and Iran. In 1950 their total number was estimated to be at most 25,000, a very small number relative to other Jewries. Kurdish Jews originally spoke *Aramaic; with the Islamic conquests in the seventh century, Aramaic was gradually superseded by *Arabic and survived only in the remote mountainous areas of Kurdistan. Judaism in Kurdistan was very rudimentary, based mostly on oral transmission of inherited Judaic practices, customs, and lore. Yet Kurdish Jews, like other conservative rural-farming societies, were quite traditional in practice. Practically all Jews kept *dietary laws very strictly (called Halala, from the Arabic Halal); men prayed in *synagogues twice daily, morning and evening; on *Sabbaths and *festivals, all men and boys, almost without exception, attended services. Yet, literacy or deep knowledge of Jewish sources was not common among men and almost nonexistent among women.

Amazingly, Kurdistan had one female rabbi, named Asnat Barzani, who headed a *yeshivah ca. 1680. She explains that this came about because her father did not have any sons; therefore, he taught her to study and teach *Torah. Even when he gave her in *marriage, he made her husband take a pre-nuptial oath not to make her do any routine housework (U. Melammed and R. L. Melammed, "Rabbi Asenath: A Female Yeshiva Director in Kurdistan," [Hebrew] Pe'amim 82 [2000]: 163–78).

Jews were weavers, farmers, shopkeepers, shoemakers, tailors, dyers, and gold and silversmiths. Many were loggers who transported wood and other material by rafts on the river. In general, Kurdish Jews were intermediaries between the rural countryside and the larger urban areas. They would sell urban merchandise, such as tea, sugar, textiles, and buttons, to the villagers and, in return, sell village products, such as wool, furs, and wood for construction, to city people. There was a saying that these Jewish merchants never died in their own beds but rather on the road, whether through natural death or misadventure, by being robbed and killed by brigands.

There were several religious minorities in Kurdistan and a measure of pluralism, so Jews were not discriminated against in particular. Actually, other minorities suffered more because they had local political aspirations, whereas the Jews did not. Kurdish Jews were *Zionists in the traditional sense that they loved the Land of Israel and expressed this love in their prayers and customs. Many individuals immigrated to *Palestine after World War I. After 1948, practically all Kurdish Jews made *aliyah to Israel. On Kurdish Jewry, see Y. Sabar, Folk Literature of Kurdistani Jews (1982).

YONA SABAR

Lachish was a *Canaanite and later *Israelite city, destroyed by *Assyria in 701 BCE. The site of Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir) is strategically located in the lowlands (shephelah) at the juncture of the Judean hills, some 15 miles (24 km) west of *Hebron. It was a vital city in both the Bronze and Iron Ages. According to the *Bible, *Joshua and his troops completely destroyed Canaanite Lachish (Josh 10:31–32), after which the city was incorporated into the territory of *Judah (Josh 15:39). Later fortified by *Rehoboam, (2 Chron 11:5–12), Lachish was second in importance only to *Jerusalem.

The Assyrian destruction of Lachish is well documented through the excavation of the site. In addition, it is noted in the Bible (2 Kgs 18:13–14, 17; 19:8; cf. Isa 36:1–2, 37:8), represented in reliefs on the walls of Sennacherib's palace in Nineveh, now in the British Museum in London, and implied on Sennacherib's prism. Its subsequent destruction in the early sixth century BCE by *Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar has been revealed *archeologically (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD). In addition, letters written in ink on clay ostraca, found at Lachish, support the story of the city's destruction as described by *Jeremiah (34:6–7). The site was reoccupied during the *Persian period (Neh 11:30), at which time new construction included an administrative building and a temple.

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Ladino, also commonly known as Judeo-Spanish or Judezmo, is the language used by the *Sephardic Jews expelled from Spain in 1492 (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN) who subsequently settled throughout the *Ottoman Empire in the eastern Mediterranean. The Jews who settled in *North Africa spoke a variety of the language known as hakitía.

It is not entirely clear whether Ladino existed in Spain before the expulsion (see LITERATURE, LADINO). Dialectal variations of medieval Spanish were transferred to the various locations in which the exiled Jews settled. Over time, regional Ladino dialects began to unify as a result of constant communication among these various communities and close contact with local languages. The main centers of Ladino ultimately became Istanbul and Thessalonika (Salonika; see BALKANS; GREECE). It appears that Ladino only started to develop as a unique Jewish language with some dialectal variations at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Ladino was traditionally written in the Sephardic Hebrew alphabet, later known as Rashi script. Printed materials were written in either Rashi script or in square Hebrew letters. Ladino-speaking communities began using the Latin alphabet in the middle of the twentieth century.

Ladino uses the same grammar as Spanish with some variations that stem from substandard medieval Spanish. Verbs are conjugated similarly to Spanish with some modifications. The Ladino tense system is less elaborate than the Spanish equivalent, and compound verbs are frequently formed using the verb tener, "have, own," rather than haber, "have,"

(e.g., tengo avlado, "I have been talking"). The Spanish ustedes polite form of second-person address does not exist in Ladino. The diminutive in Ladino is -iko/-ika rather than the Spanish -ito/-ita. *Hebrew influence on the language can also be seen in syntactic structures. Ladino has retained much medieval Spanish vocabulary, and a considerable number of Hebrew-*Aramaic words have become fused and integrated into the language. Over the course of the centuries, many loanwords have also been added to the language from Turkish, Arabic, and Greek.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Ladino is fast becoming an endangered language because of the lack of new native speakers. The main reasons are the Haskalah* movement in Europe, the dispersion of Sephardic Jews around the world, the murder of most Greek Jews during the *Holocaust, and the growing influences of secularism and modernism. Nevertheless, there is growing academic interest in the language and its literature, and several grammar books and dictionaries have recently been published for the use of both Ladino speakers and academic researchers, including E. Kohen and D. Kohen-Gordon, Ladino-English, English-Ladino: Concise Encyclopedic Dictionary (2000); see also LITERATURE: LADINO.

ORA RODRIGUE SCHWARZWALD

Lag B'Omer: See OMER

Lamentations, Book of ('Eikha). Consisting of five separate poems, this biblical book, found in the *Writings section of the *Bible, bewails the *Babylonian destruction of *Jerusalem and the obliteration of the First *Temple (586 BCE). Traditionally attributed to the prophet *Jeremiah, many of the laments directly contradict his prophecies, leading modern scholarship to question that attribution. One of the *Five Scrolls, Lamentations is read during worship for *Tisha B'Av, which commemorates the destruction of both of the Jerusalem Temples.

Each poem is structured on the Hebrew alphabet in a generalized acrostic form. No single poetic voice predominates; rather, the chapters reveal a variety of speakers. Whether the book was to be read as separate lament poems, one continuous poem, or as a related cycle of poems is unclear. The laments describe Jerusalem's ruin, focusing on the devastation of the Temple: "He has laid waste His dwelling like a garden; He has destroyed His place of meeting" (2:6). The destruction fulfills prophetic warnings against Israel's idolatry: "As He ordained long ago, He has demolished [Jerusalem] without pity; He has made the enemy rejoice over you, and exalted the might of your foes" (2:17). The people seek God's help, blame God for their suffering, and accuse God of hiding from Israel. However, unlike in the book of *Job, God never responds. The obvious questions – Is suffering part of God's divine economy? Is suffering something that humanity brings on itself? Or is suffering more powerful than God? – are mostly left unanswered (see EVIL AND SUFFERING).

Chapter 3, the theological heart of Lamentations, provides the closest thing to a response. The triumph of hope over suffering will provide sustenance to the exiled community: "Yet this I call to mind and therefore I have hope: Because of the Lord's great love we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail. They are new every morning; great is your faithfulness. I say to myself, 'The Lord is my portion; therefore I will wait for him'" (3:21–24). For further reading, see T. Linafelt, Surviving Lamentations: Catastrophe, Lament, and Protest in the Afterlife of a Biblical Book (2000); and F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (1993).

SANDRA COLLINS

Land of Israel: See ISRAEL, LAND OF

Landsmanschaftn: See UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES

Lasker-Schüler, Else (1869–1945) came from a well-to-do assimilated family in the industrial city of Elberfeld in the Rhineland region of *Germany. After marrying the physician Berthold Lasker in 1894, she moved to *Berlin where she took art lessons and published her first poems in 1901. Her fascination with the countries and cultures of the Middle East, evident in the poems and prose of Die Nächte Tino von Bagdads (The Nights of Tino of Baghdad [Berlin, 1907]), was integrated into her life-long occupation with Jewish themes. It found its first expression in the powerful "Hebräische Balladen" (Hebrew Ballads [Berlin, 1912]). With her second husband Herwarth Walden, promoter of Expressionism in his journal Der Sturm (The Storm), she fought for the acceptance of modern art and literature. She described the Berlin bohème in Mein Herz (My Heart [Berlin, 1914]) a "novel in letters." In her drawings and writings she created an artistic realm, Thebes, ruled by her alter ego, Prince Jussuf.

*World War I, which she passionately opposed, destroyed her vision of a Europe, if not the world, united by art. A ten-volume edition of her works with her cover designs was published in 1919/20. Her play Die Wupper, named for the river of her home town, was first performed in 1919. After her second divorce she supported herself with her graphic art. Her only son Paul, a gifted artist himself, died in 1926 at the age of twenty-seven of tuberculosis. She responded to the rise of *antisemitism in the early 1930s with her 1932 play Arthur Aronymus und seine Väter (Arthur Aronymus and his Fathers), first performed in Zürich in 1936. The collection of essays and poems, Konzert (Concert [Berlin, 1932]), was published when she received the Kleist prize, the highest literary award at the time. Four months later she fled to Switzerland. After her first journey to *Palestine in 1934 she wrote Hebräerland (Land of the Hebrews [Zürich, 1937]). In 1939, unable to return to Europe, she remained in *Jerusalem. She founded a lecture circle, wrote a play, Ich und ich (I and I), the sum of her life and times, and magnificent poems in Mein blaues Klavier (My Blue Piano [Jerusalem, 1943]). Her works and letters are published in an eleven-volume critical edition (Frankfurt am Main, 1996–2010). Recent research includes B. Falkenberg, Else Lasker-Schüler. A Life (2003); and S. Bauschinger, Else Lasker-Schüler. Biographie (2004).

SIGRID BAUSCHINGER

Latin America. The beginnings of Jewish life in Latin America are difficult to trace. During the years that *Spain and *Portugal established their New World empires, all Spanish and Portuguese subjects were required to be Catholic. Spain, the stricter of the two, even forbade Jews who had converted to Christianity to immigrate to its colonies, although the ban proved impossible to enforce. No doubt some Spanish and Portuguese colonists maintained Jewish observances, aided by the proximity of Dutch and British colonies, such as Surinam and several *Caribbean islands, where Judaism was tolerated. The community in Recife, *Brazil, under Dutch control from 1630 to 1654, had a *synagogue and attracted Jewish immigrants from Europe. However, the clandestine nature of Jewish life in Spanish and Portuguese colonies makes it an elusive topic of study.

Some have argued that Monterrey, *Mexico, was founded as a crypto-Jewish refuge and that Cuba's mountains once sheltered villages of openly observant Jews (see CARIBBEAN). The *Inquisition had offices in Mexico City and Lima, and inquisitors' records provide written sources of information about hidden Jews during the colonial period. However, this documentation is flawed by the outlook of the inquisitors who were zealously determined to discover secret practitioners of Judaism. J. L. Elkin's survey of the shaky information on colonial-era Jews suggests that the true history of Jewish life in Latin America starts in the nineteenth century, not long after the end of the wars that established independence in Latin American countries (1810–24).

During the middle years of the nineteenth century, from the 1830s to the late 1880s, small numbers of openly Jewish immigrants arrived sporadically in Latin America. Many of the new arrivals were *Ashkenazic Jews from Western Europe, displaced by the Franco-Prussian wars. *Sephardic Jews from *North Africa also arrived, settling in Brazil and *Argentina. Venezuela, Colombia, and Costa Rica received Sephardic immigrants from Caribbean islands. In particular, Curaçao, the island off Venezuela colonized by the Dutch, had a long-established Jewish community that fostered communities on the mainland. *Jamaican Jews immigrated as well; Jorge Isaacs, the nineteenth-century Colombian writer, son of a Jewish Jamaican father, made this background a theme of his hugely popular 1867 novel María. Even after the Inquisition officially ended, the idea that everyone should be Catholic persisted; in many countries, only the Catholic Church performed marriages and registered births and deaths. Because of these obstacles and because the dispersed Jewish immigrants had difficulty forming communities, many individuals abandoned Jewish life.

Larger scale immigration, from the 1880s to the end of *World War I, created the modern Latin American Jewish communities. In this period, the bulk of the immigrants were *Eastern Europeans, fleeing *pogroms and regulations designed to crowd Jews into a restricted area where there were little means of livelihood. Certain Latin American countries, most notably Argentina and Brazil, sought European immigrants to accelerate growth and modernization. The Jewish Colonization Association, established by the philanthropist *Baron Maurice de Hirsch, recruited principally Eastern European Jews to settle in agricultural colonies in Argentina and, unsuccessfully, in Brazil. Other Jewish farming settlements were created in Uruguay, the Dominican Republic, and later in Bolivia. The settlement of Jewish immigrants on farms was intended not only to provide a safe home and a livelihood but also to promote Jewish self-renewal through working the soil, one theme of *Zionist thought. However, the colonies gradually lost population owing to the greater appeal of urban culture.

A massive *agricultural colonization effort accounts for the predominantly *Ashkenazic origin and size of today's Argentine Jewish population. By 1917, Argentina had some 110,000 Jews (the contemporary population is somewhat under 200,000 and declining). Some of the immigrants to Argentina moved on to Chile, whose Jewish population today is more than 20,000. Uruguay's Jewish population, currently around 20,000, grew quickly during the early twentieth century. Brazil, which also recruited immigrants, attracted a diverse Jewish population; currently there are just under 100,000 Jewish Brazilians. Mexico's Jewish population, now more than 40,000, grew gradually and continues to be divided into distinct communities by geographical origin. In 1938 the Central Committee of the Jewish Community of Mexico was formed to coordinate these communities. Cuba hosted a settled, mostly Sephardic, population and various Jewish groups in transit to other countries. Refugees from *Nazi persecution and post-war *displaced persons were admitted to various Latin American countries; some, like Bolivia and Paraguay, previously had few European immigrants. This was the last growth spurt for Latin American Jewish communities, many of which now face declining numbers owing to *intermarriage and emigration.

As the Jewish population increased, *antisemitism became more evident. The 1919 Tragic Week in Buenos Aires brought attacks on the Jewish neighborhood. Antisemitism has persisted, both the conservative variety, associated with traditional Catholicism and the military, and the anti-Jewish tendencies of some sectors of the left. Ex-*Nazis, including the hunted criminals Adolf Eichmann, Josef Mengele, and Klaus Barbie, were harbored by Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, and Paraguay. In 1960, Israeli intelligence agents, without informing Argentine authorities, captured Adolf Eichmann in Buenos Aires and spirited him to *Israel for trial (see HOLOCAUST TRIALS). Accusations that Israel had violated Argentine sovereignty led to renewed expressions of antisemitism.

Even scattered communities created burial societies and relief services, but denser population allowed the formation of large and complex Jewish social and cultural associations. The best known in Latin America is the Buenos Aires AMIA (Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina), an umbrella organization that provides social services, community affairs, educational programs, research archives, cultural events, and a publications program. The AMIA drew international attention when its building, since rebuilt, was destroyed in a 1994 terrorist bombing that caused significant loss of life. Other sizable organizations, such as the Comunidad Ashkenazí of Mexico City, also sponsor cultural activities and house research collections.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the many Eastern European immigrants provided an audience for *Yiddish culture. Buenos Aires was home to Yiddish *theaters, the newspapers Di Presse and Di Yidishe Zaitung, and Yiddish writers such as José Rabinovich. Yiddish culture at one time thrived in Mexico City, home of the poet Jacobo Glantz. Although the first generation of Eastern Europeans maintained Yiddish, their descendants often did not. By the 1920s Spanish was increasingly favored as the language of cultural activities. Jewish participation in national intellectual life also began early in the twentieth century. The Argentine Alberto Gerchunoff, best remembered for his 1910 novel Los gauchos judíos (The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas), was the first Latin American Jewish intellectual to attain national visibility. Gerchunoff addressed a largely non-Jewish readership via the mainstream La Nación newspaper, there were also Spanish-language publications for a Jewish audience. The magazine Judaica (Buenos Aires) was perhaps the most noted of many publications featuring Jewish topics. Many Jewish immigrants and their children were in the publishing industry, where their knowledge of languages and of European literatures made them especially useful as editors and translators. By the mid-twentieth century, a number of Jewish creative writers had become well known, including the Argentines César Tiempo (real name, Israel Zeitlin), Samuel Eichelbaum, and Bernardo Verbitsky and the Brazilians Pedro Bloch and Clarice Lispector; Lispector would eventually earn international recognition and provoke debate over the "Jewishness" of her writing (see LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA). The Lithuanian-born Brazilian painter Lasar Segall created images of immigrant life.

The military regimes of the 1970s and 1980s in Argentina, Chile, and Uruguay brought antisemitism to the fore. In his 1981 Prisoner without a Name, Cell without a Number, the Argentine newspaperman Jacobo Timerman recounts that, while he was detained and tortured by the military, he discovered that belief in a Jewish plan for world domination was widespread among his captors. Jewish Argentines were disproportionately represented among those "disappeared" by the armed forces. Consequently, many Jews left the country, accelerating the population decline of the community. Since the 1959 Cuban revolution, Cuba's Jewish population, estimated at 15,000 in 1950, has also declined; present-day estimates range from 600 to 1,500. Many Cuban Jews settled in Puerto Rico, and many others moved to the U.S. mainland. Cuban-born U.S. *anthropologist Ruth Behar discusses Jews remaining in Cuba in An Island Called Home: Returning to Jewish Cuba (2007). Recent research includes J. L. Elkin, The Jews of Latin America (rev. ed., 1998).

NAOMI LINDSTROM

Latvia: See BALTIC STATES

Law: Ancient *Near East and Hebrew *Bible. The law collections of the Hebrew Bible belong to an ancient Near Eastern legal tradition that includes the well-known Code of *Hammurabi (Babylonia, ca. 1750 BCE), discovered on a stele (stone monument) in 1901–02, as well as other important law collections discovered in the twentieth century, including the Laws of Ur-Nammu (Sumer, ca. 2100 BCE), Laws of Lipit-Ishtar (Sumer, ca. 1930 BCE), and Laws of Eshnunna (Sumer, ca. 1800 BCE); the Hittite Laws (ca. 1500 BCE); and the Middle Assyrian Laws (1075 BCE). Ancient Near Eastern law collections were often framed by a narrative prologue and epilogue that laud the greatness of the king and invoke his divine mandate. For example, the Code of Hammurabi declares that the gods have invested Hammurabi with the task of "bring[ing] about the rule of righteousness in the land, [and] destroy[ing] the wicked and the evil-doers." Depicted on the stele is an image of what appears to be Hammurabi receiving the laws from the sun god Shamash; beneath this bas-relief are inscribed the narrative prologue and more than 280 laws that comprise Hammurabi's collection.

The legal collections of the Bible are found in the Torah (*Pentateuch), embedded in the story of the Israelites' miraculous Exodus from *Egypt and the divine *revelation at Mount Sinai. Contrary to other ancient Near Eastern law codes, no human king is credited with responsibility for disseminating the law. According to *Deuteronomy (5:20–30), *God proclaimed some or all of the *Ten Commandments directly to the Israelites, but revealed the rest of the "laws and the ordinances" to *Moses who would act as an intermediary. The divine law was to be understood as the stipulations to the *covenant between God and Israel. The law, known in Hebrew simply as torah or "instruction," consists of the Ten Commandments (Exod 20:1–17 and Deut 5:6–21) and three legal collections: the Covenant Code (Exod 20:23–23:19), the Holiness Code (Lev 17–26), and the laws of Deuteronomy (Deut 12–28). Scholars debate the relative chronology of these codes but there seems to be general consensus that the Covenant Code is the oldest. In addition to these collections, many laws can be found scattered throughout the entirety of the Pentateuch, especially *Exodus through Deuteronomy. These biblical law codes contain much shared material, and many laws are repeated two or more times in the Bible. There are also significant differences among the biblical law codes that often reveal diverging social settings or distinct ideological assumptions.

In an influential essay, "The Origins of Israelite Law" (1967), Albrecht Alt distinguished between two forms of law found in the Hebrew Bible. "Apodictic" law issues its rules in absolute terms: "You shall not steal" (Exod 20:13). "Casuistic" law, in contrast, is expressed through the use of a hypothetical case and an "if / when . . . , then . . ." structure, as in, "When a man steals an ox or a sheep, and slaughters it or sells it, [then] he shall pay five oxen for the ox, and four sheep for the sheep" (Exod 21:37). The Ten Commandments are composed of apodictic law, whereas the other law collections predominantly contain casuistic law. Alt maintained that apodictic law was entirely native to Israel, although later scholarship has cast some doubt on this assertion. Casuistic law, however, is the main form of law used in all ancient Near Eastern law codes.

There is much overlap in content among biblical and ancient Near Eastern civil and criminal legislation. The lex talionis, or law of retaliation ("an eye for an eye"), is a common feature of the Code of Hammurabi, other ancient Near Eastern law codes, and biblical law. However, biblical law codes apply the lex talionis far more universally than other codes, which make numerous distinctions based on the social statuses of the injured and injuring parties. In addition, biblical law codes, unlike the ancient Near Eastern collections, do not allow for vicarious talionic punishment, as in the execution of the minor son of a free man who murdered the minor son of another free man. Although all ancient Near Eastern law calls for the death penalty for murder, biblical law codes allow for less flexibility in this regard. As opposed to many ancient Near Eastern law codes that give the victim's next-of-kin a choice between implementing the death penalty or accepting ransom from the murderer, biblical laws demand that no ransom be substituted for the life of the innocent victim. This divergence from other Near Eastern practice can be attributed either to the Israelite notion that innocent blood "pollutes" the land, an impurity that can only be purged by shedding the blood of the murderer, or the notion that the crime of murder is an offense against God, who cannot be repaid monetarily. Finally, biblical law codes differ from the major ancient Near Eastern law codes in including cultic ("religious") law amid civil and criminal statutes.

The function of the ancient Near Eastern and biblical law codes is much debated. The term "code" is most probably a misnomer, because the law collections are not nearly comprehensive, organized, or practical enough to have functioned as an authoritative code of law for governing of a society. The law "collections," then, may have had one or more of several alternative purposes, as follows: (1) They may have provided a guide for judicial decision making, offering a judge a nonbinding list of precedents that he could consult; (2) they may have been used as pedagogical tools for training either citizens or jurists; or (3) they may have been promulgated primarily as royal public relations exercises, displaying the greatness and wisdom of the king / God as evidenced through his fair and perfect laws. Biblical and ancient Near Eastern law, as recorded and inscribed for perpetuity, ought to be seen on the whole as ideal norms toward which individuals, communities, and courts sought to strive.

For further reading, see M. Walzer, "The Legal Codes of Ancient Israel," Yale Journal of Law and the Humanities 335 (1992); and V. Matthews, B. Levinson, and T. Frymer-Kensky, eds., Gender and Law in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (1998).

CHAYA T. HALBERSTAM

Leah (Gen 29–35) and her younger sister *Rachel are *Jacob's wives. Leah is the elder daughter of Laban, the brother of Jacob's mother *Rebekah. Leah marries Jacob through sororal polygyny (a system of marriage that allows a man to marry sisters, who are considered equal in status to each other in their relationship with their husband). Jacob only wanted to marry Rachel, but their father Laban argued that the younger Rachel could not marry before the elder Leah. In a social system where women validated their position in their husband's household through bearing children, particularly sons, Leah competed with Rachel, Rachel's slave (often translated "handmaid") Zilpah, and her own slave Bilhah. Leah bears six of Jacob's sons, who later become six of the *Israelite tribes – Reuben, Simeon, Levi, *Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun – and one daughter, *Dinah. No other daughters are named in the text. *Genesis 29:31 indicates that Leah was blessed with fecundity because she was unloved by Jacob.

NAOMI STEINBERG

Leeser, Isaac (1806–1868) was born in Prussia and emigrated to the *United States in 1824; he was a prolific author who served as the reader/*cantor of Mikve Israel Congregation in *Philadelphia. A traditionalist who pioneered English-language *sermons and founded a short-lived rabbinical seminary, Leeser published The Occident and American Jewish Advocate, the first important U.S. Jewish *periodical to achieve widespread circulation. In its pages he instructed American Jews about religious practices, advocated for charitable and religious endeavors, and provided a forum for spiritual writing by men and women. He also established a publishing company for Jewish works, translated the *Bible into English, and served as advisor to numerous Jewish ventures, including the first Jewish Sunday school (1838), led by Rebecca *Gratz. Recent research includes L. Sussman, Isaac Leeser and the Making of American Judaism (1995).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Leibowitz, Yeshayahu: See EVIL AND SUFFERING; THOUGHT, MODERN

Leo Baeck Institute (LBI) is a research, exhibition, and lecture center that is devoted to the study, preservation, and comprehensive documentation of German-speaking Jewry from its origins to the post-war period. It was established by German Jews in 1955 and named after German rabbi, Jewish historian, and *Holocaust survivor Leo Baeck (1873–1956), who became the institute's first international president. The LBI is a constituent of the *Center for Jewish History in *New York City and also has centers in *Jerusalem and London (see *Britain). All the centers regularly hold local and international conferences on a variety of themes. Since 1956, the LBI has published a yearbook containing scholarship on the history and culture of the Jews of *Central Europe. The LBI archives contain items from nearly every phase of German Jewish history, including family papers, artwork, photographs, community histories, business and public records, and more than 1,500 memoirs (see MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING); along with the LBI library, the archives are recognized as the most comprehensive collection of written works and works on paper documenting the Jewish community of *Germany.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Levi, Primo (1919–1987), writer and chemist, was born in Turin, *Italy; except for two brief periods, he resided in the same apartment in that city his whole life. Strongly linked to the Piedmont Jewish community, Levi's family was secular in its culture, as were most other members of Turin's Jewish upper middle class. Levi's interest in science began as a schoolboy, and in 1937 he enrolled in the chemistry faculty of the University of Turin. The 1938 racial laws forbidding Jews admission to universities posed difficulties even for students who were already enrolled, but Levi managed to complete his doctorate in 1942 and found work as a chemist. In October 1943, after Mussolini's deposal and reinstatement in the *Nazi-ruled Salò government, Levi joined a partisan group in the mountains. His group, however, was ill prepared for guerilla fighting. After two months it was betrayed, and Levi was captured by an Italian militia. Levi, who identified himself as a Jew rather than a partisan, was sent to the Fossoli camp from which, in a group of 650 Italian Jews, he was deported to *Auschwitz (a name then still unknown to him), arriving at the end of February 1944. Levi was among only twenty-four members of this group to survive the eleven months before Auschwitz's liberation by Soviet troops, and he repeatedly attributed his survival mainly to chance and luck. In the post-liberation chaos, Levi's return to Turin took nine months. Between 1945 and 1948, Levi married Lucia Morpurgo, with whom he had a son and daughter, found employment in a paint factory where he would work for thirty years as a chemist and administrator, and published his first book, If This Is a Man (American title: Survival in Auschwitz).

Levi viewed his experience of Auschwitz as initiating his literary career and transforming his Jewish identity (among other things, it brought his first encounter with *Eastern European Jews and *Yiddish). Few copies were published of his first book, but its reprinting in 1958 drew broader attention to Levi as both *Holocaust survivor and writer. In 1963, The Truce, recounting his homeward journey from Auschwitz, won immediate acclaim (American title, The Reawakening). After that, Levi pursued dual careers as chemist/administrator and writer, claiming that his memoirs and fiction reflected the discipline and inventive reach of science. The Periodic Table (1984) is an unusual synthesis of that training and the literary imagination. Other major works include The Wrench (1978), If Not Now, When? (1982), and his last completed book, The Drowned and the Saved (1986), in which, returning to the Holocaust, he identifies a "gray zone" of morality among both perpetrators and victims. Levi's reflective analysis of Nazi actions is sometimes interpreted as an expression of forgiveness, but he himself rejected that view. His many writings covered a wide range of subjects, but the Holocaust and the Jewish experience were never far removed. Levi, who had long suffered from bouts of depression, died in 1987, probably by suicide. His achievement as writer and thinker brought him international renown that has continued to grow.

BEREL LANG

Levi ben Gershon: See GERSONIDES

Levinas, Emmanuel (1906–1995) was a twentieth-century Jewish philosopher born in Kovno, *Lithuania (see THOUGHT, MODERN). In 1923, Levinas enrolled in the University of Strasbourg; during 1928–29 he studied in Freiburg with both Husserl and Heidegger. Levinas became a naturalized citizen of France in 1930 and also began his relationship of more than fifty years with the *Alliance Israélite Universelle du Bassin Méditerranéen. After *World War II, in which he served as a Russian translator and eventually was interned in a POW camp, Levinas worked for the Ecole Normale Israélite Orientale, a branch of the Alliance that trained male teachers; he was appointed director in 1947. Between 1947 and 1951 he studied Talmud with Mordecai Shoshani, whom Levinas referred to as "prestigious and merciless." In 1957 Levinas was a founding member of the Colloquia of the French Jewish Intellectuals, which met annually for the next three decades. He earned his Doctor of Letters in 1961; Totality and Infinity was his thesis. He held positions at the University of Poitiers, the University of Paris-Nanterre (1967), and the Sorbonne (1973).

Levinas's scholarly corpus falls into two categories: philosophical writings and writings on Judaism. Until recently, the philosophical community resisted the view that Levinas was a Jewish thinker, preferring to see him as a philosopher who was Jewish; his bodies of writing on Judaism were seen as parallel but not significantly connected. More recent scholarship assumes that Levinas's Jewish background was a powerful influence on his thought and that his Jewish writings reflected a philosophical emphasis.

Levinas's philosophical project is focused on the ethical response to the "other." In Time and the Other (1947) and Totality and Infinity (1961), he emphasized the characterization of subjectivity as ethical subjectivity. Significantly influenced by Franz *Rosenzweig's The Star of Redemption, Levinas radically altered the modern philosophical view that subjectivity is defined by freedom and *autonomy (i.e., the ability to make choices). Motivated by his own concern that western ontology was too “neutral” and that even Jewish philosophy, such as Martin Buber’s I–Thou structure was not radical enough as a foundation for an ethical system, Levinas reconceived subjectivity in terms of its relationship to an other. Subjectivity is founded on our asymmetrical and irrecusable ethical responsibility for the other.

This radical conception of subjectivity as essentially not free originated in Levinas’s 1935 book, De l’évasion, translated and published in English as On Escape (2003), which developed the theme of his 1934 essay, “Philosophical reflections on Hitlerism.” This early essay not only presciently foresaw the potential horror of Hitler’s power but also traced the philosophical underpinnings of Nazism, demonstrating an underlying logic to “Hitlerism.” Although his interest in the other did not emerge until after World War II, these early writings revealed the ethical concerns that continued to characterize his philosophical and Jewish writings. Levinas’s magnum opus, Otherwise than Being, or beyond Essence (1974), shifted the earlier emphasis on a response to the other to a focus on the ethical subject. Notable in this later work is Levinas’s exchange of Torah citations for citations from the prophetic writings.

Levinas’s talmudic readings emerged from his participation in the Colloquia of the French Jewish Intellectuals. These lectures aimed to draw French Jewish intellectuals back into Judaism and Jewish life by demonstrating the contemporary relevance of the Jewish sacred texts from which Levinas drew illustrations of the ethical responsibility to others. Translations of some of these readings include Nine Talmudic Readings (1994) and New Talmudic Readings (1999). Levinas’s writings have influenced scholarship in aesthetics, education, feminist theory, Jewish studies, literary theory, philosophy, political science, and religious studies.

CLAIRE KATZ

Levinsohn, Isaac Baer (1788–1860). Born in Kremenets, Russia, Levinsohn was a writer, a scholar, and a highly influential proponent of Haskalah in Russia; he is also known by the acronym Ribal. A brilliant Talmud student, Levinsohn mastered Russian and other European languages and worked as a translator for Russian forces during the 1812 French invasion. Levinsohn subsequently spent some time in Austro-Hungarian Galicia, where he was influenced by various Haskalah figures including Nachman Krochmal. Levinsohn returned to Kremenets in 1823 because of poor health. He devoted himself to writing and worked with the Russian government to mitigate various aspects of Jewish life.

Levinsohn was a polemicist for Haskalah; his writings satirized not only Hasidism but also corrupt leaders of Jewish communities and those who condoned the kidnapping of Jewish children to meet Russian military quotas. His most influential work was Teudah be-Yisrael (Testimony in Israel), published in 1823 and strongly influenced by Mendelssohn’s Jerusalem. In it, Levinsohn champions Hebrew as the language of the Jewish people, “the bond of religion and national survival”; scathingly criticizes traditional Jewish forms of education; and advocates that Jews study Russian and German. Beit Yehudah (House of Judah), which appeared in 1838 despite considerable rabbinic opposition, is presented as an explanation of Jewish beliefs, practices, and history to an educated Christian.

The book also sets out a program for how Jewish life in Russia should be reformed according to Haskalah values. Efes Damim (No Blood), a refutation of the ritual murder accusation, appeared in 1837 and was later translated into English, German, and Russian in response to the Damascus Affair of 1840. Levinsohn’s recommendations in Teudah be-Yisrael that Jews return to a life of agricultural labor had an impact on early Zionist groups and ideologies (see GORDON, AHARON DAVID). KATE FRIEDMAN

Levirate Marriage: See MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE

Leviticus, Book of, in Hebrew vayikra (“and he [God] called,” after the initial Hebrew word of the book), is the third book of the Torah. The book is also known as torat kohanim, “Torah (instruction) of the priests,” in rabbinic literature. The name “Leviticus” is derived from the Greek title for the book, Levitikon, “pertaining to the Levites.” Leviticus presents the basic laws of holy service, purity, ethics, and atonement for the levitical priesthood. Young children in traditional Jewish circles customarily begin their study of the Torah with Leviticus because the pure should begin with the laws of purity and atonement.

Following the narratives concerning the construction of the Tabernacle at Mount Sinai in Exodus 35–40, Leviticus focuses on the divine revelation of Torah from the Tabernacle itself. It asserts the holy character of God and calls on Israel to sanctify itself so that the nation will be able to relate to God and observe the divine will. Although the tribe of Levi (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES; TRIBES, TWELVE) is not formally designated as the priestly tribe until Numbers 17–18, Leviticus presumes that the Levites will serve as Israel’s holy priests before God. Consequently, Leviticus focuses on the role of the priests in sanctifying the people.

The book includes three major literary units. Leviticus 1–7 presents instruction concerning the presentation of holy offerings in the sanctuary, including the olah, “the whole burnt offering,” presented regularly in the Temple; the minhah, “the gift or grain offering,” which normally accompanies the olah; the zebah shelamim, “the sacrifice of well-being,” normally presented to give thanks to God; the hata’at, “the sin or purification offering,” presented to atone for a transgression committed against divine Torah; and the asham, “the guilt or reparation offering,” presented when restitution is made for a transgression. Leviticus 8–10 describes the ordination of Aaron and his sons as the priests of the sanctuary; the deaths of Aaron’s sons Nadab and Abihu (10:1–3) illustrate the importance of observing divine commandments when serving in the sanctuary. Leviticus 11–27 includes numerous ordinances concerning the sanctification of the people; these regulations concern the human consumption of meat, childbirth, skin diseases, bodily discharges, sanctification of the sanctuary, proper slaughter of animals and treatment of blood, improper sexual relations, ethical and ritual laws of holiness, improper religious practice, proper conduct and status of the priests, priestly handling of offerings, observance of sacred times, the burning of lamps and presentation of bread in the sanctuary, blasphemy, disposition of land, and the Temple tax, vows, and tithes (see COMMANDMENTS; and LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND HEBREW BIBLE).

Modern biblical scholarship (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP) generally views Leviticus as part of the priestly stratum or source of the *Pentateuch, which was composed in the post-exilic period beginning in the late sixth century BCE when the *Jerusalem *Temple was rebuilt and the priesthood emerged as the leading body in ancient Judaism (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). A number of scholars maintain, however, that the Priestly Code of Leviticus 1–16 may date as early as the reign of King *Hezekiah of *Judah (715–687 BCE), whereas the so-called Holiness Code of Leviticus 17–27 may date to the post-exilic era. Recent scholarship includes B. Schwartz, “Leviticus,” in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Brettler (2003); B. A. Levine, Leviticus: Jewish Publication Society Torah Commentary (1989); and J. Milgrom, Leviticus, 3 vols. (1991–2001).

MARVIN A. SWEENEY

Libya: See NORTH AFRICA

Life-Cycle Rituals. Passages from one stage of life to another, and rites to mark them, are universal characteristics of human civilization. Public Jewish life-cycle rituals link participants to other Jews across space and time. The familiarity of the ritual enhances its power, infusing it with communal and historical meaning for the celebrants and reinforcing memories of similar moments in the lives of the onlookers. The Rabbis, who understood this ritual aspect of human nature, ordained that many of life’s passages be marked in the presence of a quorum, the minimum definition of community. For this reason, marriage and the recitation of kaddish (the prayer for mourners) traditionally require the presence of a minyan* (ten male Jews over *Bar Mitzvah age in *Orthodox Jewish practice but ten adult Jews in most non-Orthodox forms of *Judaism).

The communal context of ritual performance is further reinforced through the prescription of a seudah shel mitzvah (commanded feast) at *circumcisions and *marriages; at these festive occasions, special introductions and interpolations are added to the *blessing after meals (birkat ha-mazon). Some life-cycle events such as birth, puberty, illness, and death are biologically determined, whereas others, including adolescence, marriage, divorce, and midlife, owe more of their identities to social construction. Over time these differentiations tended to blur and even disappear in Judaism, as social convention gained precedence over biological determinism. For example, the fact that the celebration of Bar and *Bat Mitzvah originally marked the onset of puberty has become irrelevant to their celebration in the present day. Yet, the celebrants are still within an age range close to puberty, maintaining the legal fiction of the biological connection.

As a result of a confluence of factors internal to Jewish life and community, and of contextual trends in American society more generally, rites of passage have become an important vehicle for exploring and evoking religious community, identity, and spirituality in contemporary American Judaism. One reason for this is the increased level of Jewish *education among American Jewish adults and their consequent familiarity with existing life-cycle rituals; this has led to a lessening of clericalism and the enfranchisement of the laity as ritual performers. Another factor is increased knowledge and acceptance of home rituals in Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA), including increasing openness to such practices as the *dietary laws and *mikveh (ritual *immersion).

RITUALS FOR WOMEN: Jewish *feminist efforts to include women in traditional rituals and to create new ones marking moments of significance in women’s lives have also promoted a growth in interest and innovation. Although the *Bat Mitzvah ceremony was created in the first half of the twentieth century, it was with the surge of the Jewish *feminist movement that more intensive reworking of life-cycle rituals began. The traditional liturgy has been expanded to include mothers’ names in *circumcision and naming ceremonies and to create covenantal ceremonies to welcome baby girls to the world (Simḥat Bat, discussed in more detail later). Sometimes the focus was on bringing women into practices from which they had customarily been excluded, such as mourning rituals and especially the obligation to recite the kaddish prayer. In other instances (the creation of childbirth or menopause rituals), the aim was to enable women to give expression to their experience when Judaism had failed to recognize passages central to women’s lives.

One of the first active steps taken by the burgeoning Jewish feminist movement in the mid-1970s was to write ceremonies to sanctify publicly the entry of Jewish baby girls into the *covenant. Male infants had benefited from multiple ceremonies for generations. These include the ben or shalom zachor on the Friday night after birth – a party that included Torah study and special foods meant to protect the infant before his naming in the synagogue on *Sabbath morning; the actual covenantal circumcision ceremony, berit milah; and, for firstborn sons of mothers without priestly backgrounds, the rite of pidyon ha-ben, the *redemption of the firstborn son from sacred service, on the thirtieth day after birth. Over the last thirty years parents and rabbis have developed numerous versions of Berit Bat (the covenant of a daughter) or Simḥat Bat (the joy of a daughter) ceremonies for home and synagogue use.

The development of printed scripts for birth ceremonies for baby girls has had ramifications for other life-cycle rituals. These often homemade manuals serve as vehicles for innovation and as educational tools to enable assimilated Jews and the growing number of non-Jews who attend Jewish life-cycle events to understand and follow the ritual process. Booklets detailing ceremonies for baby girls have led to similar materials for the berit milah (circumcision) ritual. These, in turn, led to wedding manuals that explain the nuances of all aspects of the traditional Jewish wedding ceremony along with any special prayers or props unique to a particular wedding, as well as identifications of the participants. The personalized booklet is also now found frequently at Bar and Bat Mitzvah ceremonies. Finally, the first generations of booklets for funerals are now appearing.

MARRIAGE: The last quarter of the twentieth century saw the reinstitution of many traditional wedding rituals, albeit with an egalitarian emphasis (e.g., brides circled grooms, but then the grooms circled the brides). Brides and grooms from the more traditional and liberal movements in Judaism immersed themselves in the *mikveh (ritual bath), fasted, and read the confessional the morning before the wedding, all in a spirit of renewal before beginning a new life. Some couples wrote the words of their own marriage documents and spoke to each other under the huppah (wedding canopy). In contrast to the traditional ceremony where the bride was passive, it has become normative for the bride and groom to exchange rings and for the ceremony to be more reciprocal. Finally, at some interfaith weddings and gay and lesbian commitment ceremonies, Jewish traditions were adapted to the new situations. Interfaith couples were wed under canopies and broke glasses at the close of the ceremony, often in syncretistic rites that included Christian clergy, ceremonial readings, and Jewish ritual objects.

MOURNING RITUALS: Jewish mourning customs are very compelling, even to those who do not practice many other rituals. The cycle of seven days of intense mourning at home (sitting shivah), within thirty days of semi-mourning (for parents, spouses, children, and siblings), and a full eleven months of saying the kaddish (special mourner's prayer) for parents, enables the bereaved to gradually return to normal life in a structured progression. Traditionally, women were not expected to participate in the recitation of the mourner's kaddish because they were not counted as members of the minyan required for communal prayer. However, women are part of the minyan in Reform, Reconstructionist, and most Conservative practice, and they recite the mourner's kaddish as a matter of course. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, many *Modern Orthodox women recite the kaddish (see DEATH AND MOURNING).

Valuable sources include R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004); R. M. Geffen, Celebration and Renewal: Rites of Passage in Judaism (1993); H. E. Goldberg, Jewish Passages: Cycles of Life (2003); I. G. Marcus, The Jewish Life Cycle: Rites of Passage from Biblical to Modern Times (2004); R. L. Millen, Women, Birth, and Death in Jewish Law and Practice (2004); V. L. Ochs, Inventing Jewish Ritual: New American Traditions (2007); D. Sperber, On Changes in Jewish Liturgy: Options and Limitations (2010). RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Lilienthal, Max (1815–1882), was an educator and rabbi, born and educated in Munich, *Germany. While serving as director of a Jewish school in Riga, *Latvia, Lilienthal became acquainted with S. S. Uvarov, Russia's minister of education. In 1841, Uvarov enlisted him to draw up plans to persuade Russian Jews to accept state schools that would combine secular studies with a traditional Jewish education. His first audiences were the Orthodox leadership and chief proponents of Haskalah in the *Pale of Settlement. However, Lilienthal succeeded in alienating both groups who became distrustful of both the foreign envoy and the government's motives, suspecting a tsarist plan to convert Jews and jeopardize traditional Jewish education. Lilienthal tried again in 1843, after Uvarov appointed a Commission for the Education of the Jews, made up of Jewish leaders, to study government proposals for educational reform. Lilienthal visited a number of major Jewish centers and was successful in gaining some support. In 1844 the Russian law establishing state-run Jewish schools was enacted, accompanied by several anti-Jewish statutes. These included the exclusion of *Talmud study from the curriculum.

Lilienthal immigrated to the *United States in 1845, apparently having come to believe that the Russian government intended to exploit the Jewish school network as a vehicle for conversion. In *New York City he ran a Jewish school and served as a rabbi. In 1855, Lilienthal became rabbi of Bene Israel, a Reform congregation in Cincinnati; he was a strong advocate for Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA) and a prominent civic leader who was particularly energetic in fighting for the exclusion of all religious education from public schools.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Lilith is a major figure in Jewish demonology with roots in ancient *Near Eastern folklore. Mentioned in *Isaiah among the wild beasts and demons who will devastate the world on the day of divine retribution (34:14), Lilith appears in *rabbinic literature as a female night spirit with a woman's face, long hair, and wings (BT Eruvin 100b, Niddah 24b, Shabbat 151b, and Bava Batra 73b). The medieval Alphabet of Ben Sira*, a midrashic work of the *geonic period, conflated the demonic Lilith with rabbinic traditions about the "first *Eve," a being believed to have been created simultaneously with *Adam and subsequently rejected by him in favor of a more subservient partner (Genesis Rabbah 17:7, 18:4, and 22:7). This exegetical fiction reconciled the contradictions in the two biblical accounts of female creation (Gen 1 and Gen 2:4ff.). According to the Alphabet, Lilith was the "first Eve," who would not give up her equality with Adam, refused a subordinate position in sexual intercourse, and ultimately fled her husband, pronouncing the divine name and flying away. Despite being pursued and captured by angels, Lilith refused to return to Adam, asserting her demon status and her intention to harm women in childbirth and kill newborn infants. The Alphabet advises that Lilith is powerless to injure mothers and infants wearing protective amulets. Many Jewish amulets with preventive inscriptions against Lilith survive, indicating both the tenacity of this legend and the perils of childbirth before the modern era.

In the *Kabbalah, Lilith is said to rule over the world of evil (the sitra aḥra) with her partner, Samael. In this mystical construction of reality, Lilith mirrors the role of the Shekhinah ("Divine Presence") in the world of sanctity. Just as the Shekhinah is said to be the mother of the house of Israel, so Lilith is the mother of the unholy beings who constitute the "mixed multitude" (the erev-rav) of the world of impurity.

See J. Dan, "Samael, Lilith, and the Concept of Evil," Association for Jewish Studies Review 5 (1980): 17–40. A. Cantor, "The Lilith Question," in On Being A Jewish Feminist: A Reader, ed. Susannah Heschel (1983; rev. ed. 1995), offers a contemporary feminist reading of legends connected to Lilith; T. Schrire, Hebrew Magic Amulets: Their Decipherment and Interpretation (1966; rep. 1982) presents information about amulets used by Jewish women for protection against her.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Literature: See also AGGADAH; BIBLE; BIBLE: POETRY, and other BIBLE entries; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING entries; POETRY entries; THEATER entries; and TRAVEL WRITING

Literature: Britain. Anglo-Jewish literature begins in the nineteenth century with sentimental domestic romances by middle-class Jewish women who wished to instill in their readers Victorian values and patriotism, while promoting the moral precepts of Judaism and identification with the plight of *Diaspora Jews under the *Inquisition or in tsarist

*Russia. Most of these women have passed into obscurity, but as Michael Galchinsky has written, they understood their choice of a dominant cultural form as an entry ticket into full cultural participation in the Victorian world. The best known of these Victorian writers is Grace Aguilar (1816–1847), daughter of a *Sephardic businessman, who wrote poetry and novels that ranged from historical to domestic romance, including Vale of Cedars (1831–35; published posthumously, 1850), Home Influence (1836), and its sequel, A Mother's Recompense (1837). In her religious and historical writings (including Spirit of Judaism [1842], The Jewish Faith [1845], and Women of Israel [1845]), as well as in her fiction, Aguilar extols the benefits of successful acculturation to English life and compares the spirit of Judaism with that of Christianity. At the same time, she combats conversionist arguments and assigns to women the role of transmitting in the domestic sphere the heritage of the exiled Jewish nation (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN).

The first Anglo-Jewish novel that can be said to be a full social critique of the Jewish community is Reuben Sachs (1889), by the poet Amy Levy (1861–1888), who committed suicide at twenty-seven. This novel is a study of the wealthy Jews of Bayswater, in West London, at a time when London's East End was teeming with penniless Jewish immigrants from *Eastern Europe. Another realist novel of revolt is Dr Phillips: A Maida Vale Idyll (1887) by Frank Danby (pseudonym of Julia Frankau, 1859–1916), a tale of a man who murders his German Jewish wife and elopes with a Christian mistress. Some scholars regard this work as a self-hating discourse of Jewish racial and cultural inferiority. By contrast, Benjamin Farjeon (1838–1903) was a prolific novelist who emulated Charles Dickens; in the few novels he devoted to Jewish subjects, such as Solomon Isaacs (1877), Aaron the Jew (1894), and Pride of Race (1901), he represents Jews as a valuable model of economic success.

Israel *Zangwill (1864–1926) is the acknowledged chronicler of East End Jewry. His Children of the Ghetto (1892) is a critical appraisal of the old ways lost to Anglicization, yet Zangwill senses a poetic idealism in these destitute paupers. His heroine, Esther Ansell, and other protagonists must choose between apostasy and a return to the *ghetto. Esther writes a novel under a pseudonym in which she castigates the hypocrisy of the wealthy assimilated community of her benefactors, who do not suspect the true identity of the author. The response of these benefactors, who regard themselves as having rescued Esther from the gutter, was to become a recurrent refrain of critics of the Anglo-Jewish novel: What will the Gentiles say? At the end of the novel, Esther sails to America, that melting pot in the title of Zangwill's play (1908), where, presumably, she will be better able to reconcile her yearnings for independence and her instinctive loyalty to the Jewish people. Zangwill promoted his brand of *Zionism through the Jewish Territorial Organization, which sought to settle Jews in Uganda and elsewhere, and was a sometimes controversial, misunderstood spokesman for English Jewry.

Zangwill's The King of Schnorrers (1894) is a picaresque satire that shows his comic talent but also internalizes anti-semitic stereotypes. Two other collections of stories, Ghetto Tragedies (1893) and Ghetto Comedies (1907), also demonstrate his skillful depiction of his fellow Jews.

The Jewish readership in England, emancipated in 1858 and well on the way to assimilation and prosperity, generally preferred not to be reminded of the squalor of the East End that was depicted in Zangwill's Children of the Ghetto or Samuel Gordon's Sons of the Covenant (1900). Full assimilation was the hope of the interwar generation of Jewish writers, for whom the East End represented all they hated in their origins. Suburbanization took its toll on religious and ethnic affiliation, as we see in Magnolia Street (1932) by the popular novelist and essayist, Louis Golding (1895–1958). Set in Manchester (the fictional Doomington), Golding's novel attempts to bridge the Jewish and Gentile sides of the street, mainly through romance. A different, more polemical view of the Jew's assimilation in English society is presented by the novel, The Five Books of Mr. Moses (1929), by the Liverpool preacher and poet, Izak Goller (1891–1939).

After World War II, the disappearing Jewish East End became a source of bittersweet nostalgia in the plays of Arnold Wesker (b. 1932; knighted 2006), particularly Chicken Soup with Barley (1959), and of Bernard Kops (b. 1926), who adapts Shakespeare to a Jewish family situation in The Hamlet of Stepney Green (1957); the sentimental tales, Make Me an Offer (1952) and A Kid for Two Farthings (1953), by Wolf Mankowitz (1924–1998); and the historical novels of Emmanuel Litvinoff (b. 1915), as well as his autobiographical Journey through a Small Planet (1972). Beginning with The Birthday Party in 1957, Harold Pinter (1930–2008; Nobel Prize Laureate 2006) dealt in existential terms with questions of identity and language, but the unmistakable situation of the Jew after the *Holocaust is always present in his absurd comedy of menace. Because Pinter came from Hackney, a working-class district outside the East End, he had an ear for social displacement and alienation.

The new generation of Jews who became writers in the decade of the "Angry Young Men" owed little allegiance to the *synagogue and could write equally about Jewish and non-Jewish themes. Jews were now prominent in literature and the arts, and Jewish themes were no longer considered exotic or regional. The consciousness of living after the Holocaust was particularly strong in the writing of German Jewish refugees, such as Karen Gershon (born Käthe Löwenthal [1923–1993]), who came to Britain as a *Kindertransport child. Gershon's best known poem, "I Was Not There" (1966), sums up the feeling of abandonment by parents, as well as guilt for not being with the victims when they were deported to their deaths. Her novel, The Bread of Exile (1985), describes the humiliating refugee experience of the war years; in The Fifth Generation (1987), another *Kindertransport survivor, Barbara, marries a Gentile and adopts a child who may be a Holocaust victim or the son of Hitler. The return to *Germany in search of the lost home, family, and childhood is a claim to reparations that would somehow exorcise the haunting past that bequeaths the guilt of survival "to the fifth generation." Gershon also published a collective biography of the children who escaped to Britain on the Kindertransport in 1938–39, We Came As Children (1966). The legacy of the refugee children is also the subject of a successful play by Diane Samuels (b. 1960), Kindertransport (1993). The Jew's status as a refugee is reflected, too, in some of the work of Eva Figs (b. 1932), herself a refugee from Germany; Anita Brookner (b. 1928); and Ruth Praver Jhabvala (b. 1927), who also came to Britain from Germany but left for India with her husband in 1951 and in the 1970s relocated to the United States.

In general, from the 1960s on, Jewish writers found themselves, to use the title of Efraim Sicher's study of Jewish writing in Britain, "beyond marginality." Rapid social mobilization had eased their way out of the poverty of the East End, and now Anglo-Jewry's disaffected young writers could critique the wall-to-wall carpeted superficiality of a complacent Jewish bourgeoisie who were as hypocritical as the Bayswater Jews in Reuben Sachs. In the category of what Anglo-Jewish novelist and Jewish Chronicle columnist Chaim Bermant (1929–1998) called the "Golders Green novel" may be included The Bankrupts (1958) by soccer columnist Brian Glanville (b. 1931); The Crossing Point (1960) by Gerda Charles (pseudonym of Edna Lipson, 1914–1996); The Limits of Love (1960) by American-born screenwriter Frederic Raphael (b. 1931); and Bermant's own Jericho Sleep Alone (1964). The Elected Member (U.S. title, Chosen People, 1969; Booker Prize, 1970) by Bernice Rubens (1928–2004) is another novel in this genre that brilliantly describes the disturbed mind of a young Jew overattached to his dead mother and addicted to hallucinogens.

The translator, poet, and biographer Elaine Feinstein (b. 1930) made her mark as an English novelist with The Amberstone Exit (1972) and The Glass Alembic (1973); her The Shadow Master (1978) reflects a historical reassessment of secular *Diaspora identity as *Israel became a focus of Jewish culture and solidarity after the *Six Day War. The Shadow Master spans the centuries and countries of Jewish dispersion in a plot that revolves around the seventeenth-century false messiah *Shabbetai Zevi. The precariousness of Jewish history in the Diaspora lurks behind the comfort of assimilation in several of Feinstein's novels (Children of the Rose, 1975; The Survivors, 1982; The Border, 1984). Feinstein's Russian Jewish parentage may explain her interest in such Russian poets as Marina Tsvetaeva and Anna Akhmatova, who have been formative influences on her work. Among the dead writers with whom she converses in her imagination in Russian Jerusalem (2008) is Isaac Babel (1894–1940; see LITERATURE: *RUSSIA AND *SOVIET UNION [IN RUSSIAN]).

The women's movement of the 1970s influenced Guardian columnist Linda Grant (b. 1951), who, like Eva Figes, has written important works on feminist issues. Grant's novel, When I Lived in Modern Times (2000), winner of the Orange Prize, is set in *Tel Aviv in the days before the 1948 War of Independence and the establishment of the State of Israel. It explores gender, sexuality, and identity in the retrospect of disillusioned idealism through the story of Evelyn Sert, a Jewish woman who escapes a vacuous post-war existence in England and becomes involved with a fighter in the Jewish underground. Grant's reportage, The People on the Streets (2006), is a ground-level view of Israelis coping with their complex political and security situation. The vantage point of a child of immigrants affords Grant an empathic position in The Clothes on Their Backs (2008), a novel about survival and betrayal, as well as about how clothes define personalities, whereas Remind Me Who I Am Again (1998) is an account of her mother's decline into dementia that explores the role of memory in forming family history. Grant's novel Still Here (2002) is also about repressed memory, set in her native Liverpool, in the debris of middle age after the sexual revolution.

The unembarrassed unearthing of a family's past is represented in a narrative about the discovery of a sealed room at 19 Princelet Street, in London's East End. Ian Sinclair and Rachel Lichtenstein's exploration of that lost Jewish history in Rodinsky's Room (2000) opens up a post-modern palimpsest of time and space, as Jewish memory enters a multicultural and multiethnic world inhabited by children of Asian immigrants. Jeremy Gavron (b. 1961) taps similar veins of fact, fantasy, and cultural archeology of the East End in his novel, An Acre of Barren Ground (2005), subtitled "The History of Everyone Who Ever Lived in Brick Lane."

Prominent in contemporary British Jewish writing are irreverent satires about a generation that is aware of its Jewish heritage and of antisemitism, but sees no contradiction in enjoying the hedonism of a promiscuous post-modernism. These types appear in the short-story collection Hearts of Gold (1979) and the novels Bedbugs (1982) and Blood Libels (1986) by Clive Sinclair (b. 1945), whose fantasies owe much to Isaac Bashevis Singer. They are also evident in the comic novels by Howard Jacobson (b. 1942), such as The Mighty Walzer (1999) or Kalooki Nights (2006), fictional memoirs of coming of age in Manchester. His satire of self-hating Jewish anti-Zionists, The Finkler Question (2010), won the prestigious Booker prize. Although he sees himself as a Jewish Jane Austen, Jacobson is more like a British Philip Roth who celebrates Jewish humor and the disputatious Jewish mind; he has offered his own zany view of Anglo-Jewry in Roots Schmoots (1993). Like Sinclair in Blood Libels and Jeremy Gavron in The Book of Israel (2002), Jacobson writes back to antisemitism, past and present, just as post-colonial authors write back to Empire.

Elena Lappin (born Moscow, 1954), sister of German Jewish humorist Max Biller (see LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE), has explored the comic situations of women who marry into the Anglo-Jewish community, as in the title piece of Foreign Brides (1999), in which an Israeli woman vents her frustration at her football crazy, outwardly religious husband by feeding the family meat that is not kosher and seducing the pork butcher. Lappin's novel The Nose (2001) is a satire of the Anglo-Jewish literary scene, based on her own experience as editor of The Jewish Quarterly (founded by Jacob Sonntag in 1953). Another insider's view is a controversial prize-winning first novel by Naomi Alderman (b. 1974), Disobedience (2006), about a lesbian daughter of a rabbi in the north London suburb of Hendon, whereas a third novel, When We Were Bad (2007) by Charlotte Mendelson (b. 1972), shows a north London Jewish family spiraling out of control. These novelists use unashamedly Jewish language and situations, and their voices blend into the multiethnic diversity of post-modern British fiction. Alderman's Orthodox feminist persona recalls American author Pearl Abrahams' The Romance Reader, and indeed, the preoccupation with sexual, spiritual, and personal identity in these novels is shared with a number of contemporary Jewish American authors.

For further reading, see B. Cheyette, ed., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Britain and Ireland: An Anthology (1998); M. Galchinsky, The Origin of the Modern Jewish Woman Writer: Romance and Reform in Victorian England (1996); and E. Sicher, Beyond Marginality: Anglo-Jewish Writing after the Holocaust (1985).

EFRAIM SICHER

Literature: Canada. A. M. Klein (1909–1972), the founding father of Canadian Jewish literature, spent most of his life in Montreal, Canada's cultural Jewish center throughout the twentieth century. In 1927 he published some of his early poetry in the Menorah Journal, and in 1938 he became the editor of the Canadian Jewish Chronicle. An early collection of his poetry, Hath Not a Jew (1940), contains a preface by Ludwig Lewisohn, who describes Klein as "the first contributor of authentic Jewish poetry to the English language." From his traditional background, the poet draws on biblical and talmudic sources as well as medieval *Yiddish and *Hebrew *folktales. In a poem about *Spinoza, Klein identifies with the philosopher's skepticism: "From glass and dust of glass he brought to light, out of the pulver and the polished lens . . . and hence the infinitesimal and infinite."

The poet's transformational powers recur in a later poem, "Autobiographical," which begins "Out of the ghetto streets where a Jewboy / Dreamed pavement into pleasant Bible-land," and ends with the same "Jewboy" hearing "The Hebrew violins, / Delighting in the sobbed Oriental note." Klein appended this poem to his novel, The Second Scroll (1951), as "Gloss Aleph." (Other "glosses" include a polemical essay on the Sistine Chapel and a play that demonstrates the injustices of Muslim society toward Jews.) Loosely structured on the *Pentateuch, The Second Scroll follows the life of a messianic figure, Melech Davidson, from surviving the *Holocaust to his *aliyah (emigration) to the newly established State of Israel. His nameless nephew leaves Montreal to track Uncle Melech from Rome to Casablanca to Israel, but never succeeds in meeting his mysterious relative, either in the *Diaspora or in Zion. This failed encounter represents a motif not only in Klein's life and writing but also in the rest of Canadian Jewish literature. After The Second Scroll Klein became increasingly reclusive and spent his last years in silence.

As if responding to his mentor's withdrawal, Montreal poet Irving Layton (1912–2006) developed an outspoken persona. In the prophetic tradition, Layton excoriated *antisemitism in Canada and around the world, at the same time condemning his fellow Jews for their materialist, bourgeois values. In turn, Klein and Layton influenced Leonard Cohen (b. 1934), who assumed the mantle of prophet and priest in his poetry and fiction, beginning with Let Us Compare Mythologies (1956) and The Spice-Box of Earth (1961). The black romanticism of his third collection, Flowers for Hitler (1964), differs from Klein's satiric poem, "The Hitleriad" (1944). Whereas Klein was historically too close to his subject matter and flawed in his use of the neoclassical mock-epic form, Cohen seems more remote and his surrealist mode borders on the absurd. Cohen's two novels move from his autobiographical The Favorite Game (1963) to the mythological, post-modernist Beautiful Losers (1966). The former novel deals harshly with his affluent family in Montreal, whereas the latter explores the historical terrain of an Indian tribe that serves as a substitute for his own Jewish tribe.

Mordecai Richler (1931–2001) is by far the most significant novelist to capture Montreal's Jewish community. Most interesting among his many works are The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1959), St. Urbain's Horseman (1971), and Solomon Gursky Was Here (1989). Predominantly a satirist railing against both the injustices done to Jews and the follies within Jewish society, Richler used cinematic techniques to critique the newly rich. Duddy's apprenticeship represents the comic coming of age of Montreal's Jewry. St. Urbain's Horseman copies the quest motif in Klein's The Second Scroll, with Cousin Joey as a messianic *golem who roams the Diaspora to avenge Nazi crimes. Solomon Gursky is even more explicit in its backhanded tribute to Klein's close personal and professional relationship to the Bronfman family of Montreal, as Richler visits remote Canadian territories where the Gurskys interact with native peoples.

If Yiddish influences may be found in Montreal's literature from Klein to Richler, then the novels of Chava Rosenfarb (b. 1923) explore her *Polish heritage in the greatest detail, most notably her trilogy, The Tree of Life (1972), which chronicles the Łódź *ghetto.

Three francophone writers differentiate Montreal from other cities in North America. Naim Kattan (b. 1928) writes extensively about his *Iraqi past and his migration to North America, with *France as an intermediate stage. Biblical allusions fill his work, as they also inform the poetry and prose of Monique Bosco (b. 1927), who immigrated to Montreal after World War II. Her writing is marked by a *feminist critique of patriarchal patterns in *Judaism. A Yiddish and French sensibility informs the post-modern writing of Régine Robin, who relies on Jewish legends to invigorate contemporary Montreal and Paris. Robert Majzels (b. 1950), who writes in English, is the most experimental Jewish writer in Montreal: Like Robin and others, he employs post-modern pastiche and translation of languages to come to terms with post-Holocaust identity in his unique city.

If Montreal has been the primary center of Jewish Canadian literature, then Winnipeg is a second pole, combining its Yiddish-socialist ethos with a northern and western Canadian sensibility. Adele Wiseman (1928–1992), Miriam Waddington (1917–2004), and Jack Ludwig (b. 1922) constitute a troika of Winnipeg's Jewish writers. Wiseman's first novel, The Sacrifice (1956), charts three generations of an immigrant family, each member possessing a biblical name. A tragic novel in which Abraham the butcher commits murder, it depicts the hardships of this poor family's adjustment to the New World. By contrast, her second novel, Crackpot (1974), focuses on the comic aspects of its heroine Hoda, who transcends her immigrant roots. Indebted to A. M. Klein, Peretz, Mendelev, and Sholem Aleichem (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY), Miriam Waddington's lyrical poetry demonstrates a strong social commitment. Jack Ludwig's novels show the influence of James Joyce, as his protagonists celebrate the joys of Jewish life across North America.

Further west, Henry Kreisel's (1922–1991) fiction also exhibits Klein's influence. In one of his short stories, "The Almost Meeting" (1981), Kreisel describes his failed encounter with Klein. Both of Kreisel's novels focus on the Holocaust: In The Rich Man (1947) the protagonist Jacob Grossman returns to *Vienna from Canada to visit his family just before World War II, and in The Betrayal (1964), the author examines the psychological dimensions of the Holocaust as it impinges on the lives of survivors in Edmonton.

Also on the prairies, and influenced by Klein, Eli Mandel (1922–1990) returns to his Jewish roots in a post-modern quest for meaning and identity among the Jewish graves in Estevan, Saskatchewan. He combines pastiche and palimpsests extensively in his long Holocaust poem, "On the 25th Anniversary of the Liberation of Auschwitz: Memorial Services, Toronto, January 25, 1970 YMHA Bloor & Spadina." Through running commentary he re-creates the tragic and eerie feeling of participating in the Shoah. Similarly, J. J. Steinfeld's short stories are obsessed with the Shoah through the lens of a second-generation survivor. The short stories of Norman Levine (1923–2005) depict the isolated lives of Jewish characters from the immigrant district of Ottawa to down-and-out artists in rural England. Levine uses a minimalist painterly style in all of his naturalist writing.

In recent years Canada has witnessed a shift away from Jewish Montreal to Toronto, where Matt Cohen (1942–1999), Anne Michaels (b. 1958), and David Bezmozgis (b. 1973) exemplify a new sensibility embodying the changes from a conservative white Anglo-Saxon Protestant dominated Ontario to a multicultural metropolis in Toronto. Also noteworthy among the contemporary poets are Seymour Mayne (b. 1944) and Kenneth Sherman (b. 1950), the former for carrying on Klein's tradition in a Zionist fashion, the latter for combining nostalgia, lyricism, and a subtle Jewish spirit that transcends ordinary experience. Yet another follower of Klein, Phyllis Gotlieb (b. 1926) yokes together children's verse, Hasidism, and science fiction. In fiction, Lilian Nattel returns to Yiddish roots in historic novels, and Susan Glickman's The Violin Lover (2006) captures Jewish musical activities in London just before World War II. Aryeh Lev Stollman blends science and fantasy with Jewish learning in his fiction, Norman Ravvin grapples with a neo-Yiddish sensibility across the Canadian landscape, and Cary Fagan's (b. 1957) novels carry on where Matt Cohen's leave off. Edeet Ravel uses political allegory in her novels set in Israel, whereas the leftist plays of Jason Sherman are critical of Israeli military policies. This polyphony of voices suggests that no single direction has clearly emerged for the future of Canadian Jewish literature, but the pull of the past informs all of this writing.

MICHAEL GREENSTEIN

Literature: Central Europe. Numerous Central European Jewish writers who wrote in German, as well as other languages, have had a significant impact on western culture. Moreover, numerous aspects of the particular cultural milieu of Central Europe are evident in the literary and artistic productivity of Jews who lived or live in this part of the world.

In 1929, literary critic and writer Walter Benjamin wrote an article entitled "Jews in German Culture." In the first of two parts, Benjamin surveys the Jewish presence within German culture from Moses Mendelssohn to Karl Marx and Moses Hess, and from Hermann Cohen to Otto Weininger and Sigmund Freud. In the second section of his essay, Benjamin considers Jews as participants in creating German national literature, from the time of Süsskind von Trimberg, the thirteenth-century Jewish Minnesänger (troubadour), to the outstanding Jewish writers and Expressionist poets of the 1920s, including Franz Kafka, Else Lasker-Schüler, Alfred Döblin (1978–1957), Arnold Zweig (1887–1968), and Lion Feuchtwanger (1884–1958). Whereas Benjamin tends to view Jewish writers as being heavily dependent on German models, he also sometimes considers them as full and independent partners in the literary and cultural endeavors that comprised German culture. For example, Benjamin credits Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) and Ludwig Börne (1786–1937) with importing the French feuilleton (topical supplement) into German literary journalism. Also, Benjamin cites Berthold Auerbach, Leopold Kompert, and Karl Emil Franzos as the initiators of the German literary genre known as "Ghetto Literature."

There is no overarching thesis in Benjamin's article about the relationship of the Jewish to the Germanic component in Central European Jewish literature and culture. If there is one unifying aspect to the productivity of the figures Benjamin presents, it is the implicit criterion of German-language productivity by Jews. However, this criterion is not necessarily applicable to Central European Jewish literature. A recent anthology, Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture (1096–1996), edited by S. Gilman and J. Zipes (1997), includes, in addition to Central European writers who wrote in German, several Central European Jewish writers who produced texts in Hebrew, Judeo-German (Judendeutsch), or Yiddish. Jewish literary and cultural projects that were generated in languages other than German also fit within the purview of Central European Jewish literature if they were carried out or came to fruition within Central Europe. For example, Gilman and Zipes include commentary on Glückel of Hameln's seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century memoir written in Western Yiddish and on a seventeenth-century Yiddish purimspil (Purim play) written in Leipzig (see entries under LITERATURE: YIDDISH). An essay on the Hebrew-language periodical Ha-Me'assef is also included in the compendium; among the centerpieces of the Jewish Enlightenment movement (Haskalah) in German-speaking lands from the 1790s, this periodical published odes in Hebrew in honor of political leaders like Frederick the Great of Prussia or Joseph II of Austria alongside Hebrew translations of important eighteenth-century German literature. The impact and adoption of German literary models such as the ode, as well as the Jewish fascination with Central European writers and political leaders, are important aspects of this Jewish literary production. Yiddish and Hebrew literature and culture, especially in Berlin and Vienna, but also elsewhere in Central Europe, were important aspects of Central European Jewish creative activity up through the twentieth century, until they were largely erased by Nazism.

Walter Benjamin and others have viewed Moses Mendelssohn's translation of the Torah into German in the late eighteenth century as the gateway through which Central European Jewry entered German cultural space. In fact, mastering German was a revolutionary act within the Jewish community with far-reaching consequences regarding Jewish integration into German culture. Despite a scurrilous refrain in German antisemitic writing defining Jews as "others" (that is, other than truly German) who were inherently incapable of writing "pure" or paradigmatic German, Jewish writers consistently refuted this claim by their stylistic virtuosity and significant literary achievements. In 1939, the popular German Jewish novelist and art critic Georg Hermann (1871–1943) claimed that it was precisely the German-language authors of Jewish origin who had become the towering figures in modern German literature. In this regard he mentioned Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929), Richard Beer-Hofmann (1866–1945), Arthur Schnitzler (1862–1931), Peter Altenberg (1859–1919), Rudolf Borchardt (1957–1945), and others. He argued that the German literature that was renowned internationally was primarily produced by German and Austrian Jews, especially Schnitzler, Franz Werfel (1890–1945), Lion Feuchtwanger, Jakob Wassermann (1873–1934), Stefan Zweig (1881–1942), and Arnold Zweig. Hermann emphasized that Central European theater was deeply indebted to talented dramatists, directors, and actors of Jewish origin; theater criticism, especially, was dominated by Jews. According to Hermann, the same was true of literary scholarship and criticism.

This viewpoint was part of a famous and controversial debate about the Jewish role in German culture initiated by Moritz Goldstein (1880–1977) in a provocative polemic entitled “Deutsch-jüdischer Parnass” (German Jewish Parnassus, 1912). Goldstein claimed that the Jews in Germany had become the custodians and arbiters of the spiritual – specifically, the literary and cultural – treasures of German society, while German society denied Jews the right and the capability to fulfill this role. Goldstein cited the strong presence of Jews in the German press, and he celebrated their high visibility in the world of music and public concerts, also noting their important presence in German theater. He opined that, because many Jews were to be found among the ranks of Germany’s best poets, writers, and academicians, Jews were on the verge of taking undisputed control of German literature and literary studies. This claim of a Jewish domination in Central European literary and cultural life appears to have established itself in diverse quarters. Stefan Zweig, the popular Austrian Jewish cultural mediator, translator, writer, and poet of the first half of the twentieth century, declared in his memoirs, written shortly before his suicide in exile in 1942, that “nine-tenths of what the world celebrated as Viennese culture . . . was either promoted, nourished, or even created by Viennese Jewry.” Another important writer from this milieu was Joseph Roth (1894–1939), whose Radetzky March (1932) expressed the complex emotions Jews retained toward the *Habsburg Empire.

Goldstein’s thesis that Central European literature and culture were largely Jewish, however, had little impact in stemming the various strains of antisemitic writings that continued to emphasize the supposedly unbridgeable incompatibility between Germanic and Jewish cultures. On the Jewish side, the growth of cultural *Zionism in the early twentieth century encouraged the idea of a German-language Jewish national literature and culture. Supporters of this “Jewish cultural renaissance” furthered a new cultural orientation in the German-language Zionist press and founded a Jewish national publishing company in Berlin, the Jüdischer Verlag, which sought to establish itself as the center of the Jewish national literary cultural enterprise in German. They also published a series of ambitiously conceived literary and artistic anthologies, like the Jüdischer Almanach (1902) or Jüdische Kunstler (1903), which attempted to delineate a Jewish national canon in literature and the arts, while focusing on German-language authors and emphasizing the role of Central European Jewry in Jewish national literary and artistic productions.

Dynamic intellectuals and artists, including Nathan Birnbaum (1864–1937), Martin *Buber, Berthold Feiwel (1875–1937), and Ephraim Moses Lilien (see ART, EUROPE:

TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ISRAEL) spearheaded this movement, and a long list of German Jewish and Austrian Jewish writers and poets also were part of its orbit. The German cultural Zionists saw the production of significant Jewish literature and art in the German-speaking Diaspora as a prelude to the renaissance that would eventually take place in Hebrew in the Land of Israel. They encouraged literature and art that focused on Jewish figures and themes from the *Bible or *Talmud or gave expression to Jewish spiritual and religious experiences, as well as to Jewish identity concerns in the Diaspora. This movement, therefore, argued both explicitly and implicitly for Jewish difference and separateness from the Central European, Germanic cultural milieu. Some names not normally associated with a Jewish national literature in German or with Jewish art in Germany and Austria appear in cultural Zionist anthologies and related publications; they include Karl Wolfskehl (1869–1948), Efraim Frisch (1873–1942), Max Liebermann (1848–1935), and Stefan Zweig. It is fair to say that each changed his views over time concerning *Zionism and his own relationships to Jewish culture and to Central European culture. Eventually, they all experienced the rise of Nazism firsthand. Wolfskehl, Frisch, and Zweig sought to escape Europe. Liebermann, who served as president of the Prussian Academy of the Arts, had to resign from his position in 1933 after the Nazis came to power. He died in Berlin in 1935.

Central European Jewish literature and culture do not end with the Nazi period, despite the deep ruptures it caused. Whereas the majority of Jewish writers who managed to survive in exile continued to live and write (mostly in German) outside of Germany and Austria after World War II, some, including Alfred Döblin and Hilda Domin (1909–2006), returned to Central Europe. Some very prominent Jewish writers, including Arnold Zweig, Stephan Hermlin (1915–1997), and Anna Seghers (1900–1983), returned to communist East Germany or grew up there (Jurek Becker [1937–1997]; Chaim Noll [b. 1954]). Their writings and careers need to be evaluated in terms of how they provided continuity or commentary on Jewish-related issues in Central Europe after the war.

Some observers have claimed that a resurgence in German Jewish and Austrian Jewish letters has been under way at least since the 1990s. Writers, journalists, and cultural critics, such as Marcel Reich-Ranicki, Ralph Giordano, and Henryk Broder, have raised questions about the Jewish relationship to German culture and have encouraged younger Jewish writers in German to probe issues of Jewish identity in post-Holocaust Central Europe. German writers and poets, including Rafael Seligmann (b. 1947), Maxim Biller (b. 1960), and Barbara Honigmann (b. 1949), and an Austrian contingent composed of Robert Menasse (b. 1954), Robert Schindel (b. 1944), and Doron Rabinovici (b. 1961), may be considered to belong to this group. Recent immigrants to Central Europe from the former *Soviet Union who write in German, including Vladimir Vertlib (1966) and Vladimir Kaminer (b. 1967), are also part of this cohort. Their works suggest that Central Europe continues to provide an important location for Jewish identity construction in the German language and for dialogue about it, despite the *Holocaust and despite Zionism, or even in the face of both.

MARK H. GELBER

Literature: Contemporary Europe. European and Jewish identity and history are mutually and intimately intertwined. In the literary realm Jewish authors continue to be creative participants in an ongoing debate on the continent's past and future while also renegotiating relationships between Jewish and non-Jewish cultures. Despite the minority position of present-day European Jewish authors, a vigorous resurgence of Jewish culture can be observed as many Jewish writers have turned to their own origins, reflecting on their identity and position in a Gentile society.

Jewish authors express a variety of possible relationships to Judaism, as well as to the cultural, literary, and historical contexts of the countries where they are citizens. Although most contemporary Jewish writers did not personally experience the tragedy of the Holocaust, its traces occupy a central position in their literature and play an important role in Jewish self-awareness. Their literary aesthetics reflects the secondary trauma of growing up within families shattered by the Holocaust, and their writing has been shaped by the legacy of the victims and the testimonies of the survivors.

Holocaust writing by first-generation survivors encompasses a variety of primarily semi-autobiographical genres like the memoir, the bildungsroman, and the family saga, in which history and fiction, testimony and poetry go hand in hand without excluding one another. The Hungarian Imre Kertész (b. 1929) was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 2002 for works such as Fateless (1975) that draw on his experiences in Auschwitz and Buchenwald. Autobiography is often the literary form chosen to render the history of the self after the catastrophe, paradigmatically adopted in Primo Levi's memoir, If This Is a Man (1959; also published as Survival in Auschwitz), or Elie Wiesel's testimony, Night (1960).

The remembrance of the lost world of the shtetl is an important element in much of the European Jewish literature written in the last half of the twentieth century. In the tradition of the Jewish Holocaust memorial books, yizker bikher (see YIZKOR BOOKS), many authors aim to preserve the lost communities of Eastern Europe. Accordingly, the second and third generation give a concrete literary voice to the persecution and displacement of their forebears. This writing is generated by the need to re-create a picture of the past as experienced by their families. It illustrates the vicissitudes of the modern Jewish experience at large by rendering multigenerational stories that feature ancestors enjoying emancipation or struggling to achieve it, tempted by secularization, pressured into assimilation, displaced by pogroms, haunted by persecution, or blinded by ideologies. In her novel In Memory's Garden (2002), the Polish author Joanna Olczak-Ronikier (b. 1934) reflects the imperative of zakhor, the Jewish command to remember, for many of her peers. However, even though a number of common dynamics can be identified, European Jewish literature displays a diversity that is embedded in various national contexts.

In Italy, Jewish writers often consider italianità and ebrei-cità to be components of one single identity. Apart from authors such as Primo Levi and Giorgio Bassani (1916–2000), who transformed their personal experiences as Jews under Nazism into literature, the Italian literary tradition shows very little interest in cultural particularism. Indeed, contemporary Italian Jewish writers, such as Clara Sereni (b. 1946; Keeping House, 2005), Stefano Jesurum (Soltanto per amore [Only for Love], 1996), and Giorgio Pressburger (b. 1937; Teeth and Spies, 1999; Snow and Guilt, 2000), demonstrate a spirit of universality and sense of being part of the Italian nation.

In Austria, Jewish authors such as Robert Schindel (b. 1944; Born-Where, 1995), Doron Rabinovici (b. 1961; The Search for M., 2000), or Robert Menasse (b. 1954; Meaningful Certainty, 2000; Vertreibung aus der Hölle [Expulsion from Hell], 2001) reject a closed and unified concept of Jewish identity and distance themselves from the previous generation of Jewish writers like Paul Celan (see HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY). Conversely, contemporary German Jewish literature, while rejecting the shame of living in Germany as the country of Nazi perpetrators – a feeling predominant among the survivor generation – is more confrontational about the German past and more explicit and conscious of its Jewish heritage. After the student revolts at the end of the 1960s, Jewish writers in Germany participated in exposing the crimes of the previous generation of Germans or their attitude as indifferent bystanders. German novelists such as Barbara Honigmann (b. 1949; A Love Made out of Nothing & Zohara's Journey, 2003), Esther Dischereit (b. 1952; Joëmis Tisch [Joëmi's Table], 1988), Maxim Biller (b. 1960; Land der Väter und Verräter [Land of the Fathers and Betrayers], 1994), Ulla Berkéwicz (b. 1948; Engel sind schwarz und weiß [Angels are Black and White], 1992), and Rafael Seligmann (b. 1947; Rubinsteins Versteigerung [Rubinstein's Auction], 1989) are on the whole more explicitly and antagonistically Jewish than writers in other European Jewish literatures. Yet, Russian-born Vladimir Kaminer (b. 1967; Russian Disco, 2002), an important young author in the pop literature scene, observes German society as an immigrant outsider in present-day Berlin without consciously foregrounding his narrative position as a Jew.

In France, home to the largest Jewish community in Europe, a reversal of the assimilationist tendency began in the 1980s. Recent French Jewish literature, self-confidently and assertively articulating Jewish particularity, can roughly be divided into two major groups made up of Sephardic and Ashkenazi authors. On the one hand, immigrant Maghrebi (*North African) novelists display a cultural, national, historical, and linguistic distance from the geographic regions in which their parents grew up, but on the other, they relate to France as a former colonial power. Notions of exile and diasporic existence are particularly present in the writings of Marlène Amar (b. 1949; Des gens infréquentables [Bad Company], 1996), Ami Bouganim (Le fils du serpent [The Son of the Snake], 1981), Marcel Bénabou (b. 1939; Jacob, Menahem and Mimoun, 1998), and Gil Ben Aych (Le livre d'Étoile [Étoile's Book], 1986). In contrast, French-born Ashkenazi novelists, often writing family portraits, articulate the pain of their ancestors who faced discrimination and persecution or portray their country as a society that came to terms with its collaborationist past quite late. In this context, important authors include Eliette Abécassis (b. 1969; L'or et la cendre [Gold and Ashes], 1998), Annette Kahn (Why My Father Died, 1991), Alain Glückstein (Nos grands Hommes [Our Great Men], 1997), Myriam Anissimov (b. 1943; Sa majesté la Mort [Her Majesty, Death], 1999), Patrick Modiani (b. 1945; Missing Person, 2005), Georges Perec (1936–1982; Ellis Island, 1995), and Cécile Wajsbrot (b. 1954; La trahison [The Betrayal], 1997).

Similar to the situation in Italy, younger Jewish authors in the Netherlands are largely unconcerned with the traditions of Jewish literature in their country. This is because Dutch Jewish authors never explicitly considered themselves a minority group. They were part of mainstream culture and enjoyed a status free from the pressures of cultural assimilation or of self-justification. To a great extent, this is still the case. Leading figures of the younger generation include Arnon Grunberg (Blue Mondays, 1997), Marcel Möring (In Babylon, 2000), Leon de Winter (Hoffman's Hunger, 1995), Carl Friedman (Nightfather, 1995), Gerhard L. Durlacher (The Search, 1988), and Abel Herzberg (Between Two Streams, 1997).

In contrast to the situation in capitalist Western Europe before the 1989 fall of the Berlin Wall, in communist Eastern Europe the exploration of Jewish religious, cultural, or ethnic identity was discarded as a remnant of bourgeois ideology; this position fostered state censorship of Jewish authors, who were consequently forced to emigrate or publish abroad. Thus, for certain contemporary Jewish writers, primarily in Hungary, Poland, and Russia, Stalinist terror and Soviet tyranny play an important role in their conception of Europe as a space of democratic values. Jewish writing in today's Russia holds a decentered position not only at Europe's periphery but also between Jewish tradition and dominant Russian culture. As such it distances itself from Russia's highly centralized structure and its antisemitism, which is still present in large parts of society. In the works of present-day Russian authors, such as Alexandr Melikhov (Ljubov' k otecheskim grobom [Love with Fatherly Graves], 2001), Dina Rubina (Here Comes the Messiah!, 2000), Sergei Kaledin (The Humble Cemetery and Gleb Bogdyshev Goes Moonlighting, 1990), Asar Eppel (The Grassy Street, 1998), Ljudmila Ulitskaya (The Funeral Party, 2002), Semyon Lipkin (Zapiski zhil'ca [Notes of a Tenant], 1991), or Nobel Prize winner Joseph Brodsky (To Urania [1998]), explicit Jewish themes, like the representation of Jewish suffering during the Holocaust, are rarely central.

Jewish authors consider themselves to be part of European society, yet simultaneously, in varying degrees and different aspects, they are also distinct from it. In their respective mother tongues, they continue to create a complex and engaging body of literary texts that eloquently express the pressures between the past and the present and between mainstream and minority populations. Although the relationship of these writers to Judaism varies with each individual, from maintaining distance to passionate rediscovery and assertive commitment, the often uneasy, singular, and decentered position of Jews and Jewish culture in modern European nation-states lies at the heart of all of their narratives.

For further reading, see V. Liska and T. Nolden, eds., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Europe: A Guide (2007); D. C. Lorenz, ed., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Austria: An Anthology (1999); L. Morris and K. Remmler, eds., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Germany: An Anthology (2002); T. Nolden, In Lieu of Memory: Contemporary Jewish Writing in France (2006); idem and F. Malino, eds., Voices of the Diaspora: Jewish Women Writing in Contemporary Europe (2005); A. Polonsky and M. Adamczyk-Garbowska, eds., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Poland: An Anthology (2001); and S. Rubin Suleiman and

E. Forgacs, eds., Contemporary Jewish Writing in Hungary: An Anthology (2003).
VIVIAN LISKA and ARVI SEPP

Literature: France. Armand Lunel (1892–1977), prominent writer and historian of French Jewry, rightly suggested that the *Dreyfus Affair led to an awakening of Jewish consciousness in French letters, interrupting a long-standing commitment to acculturation that had affected literature as well. The authors who took decidedly Jewish positions, often expressing Zionist predilections, included Bernard Lazare (1865–1930); Edmond Fleg (1874–1964), whose seminal Anthologie juive appeared in 1923; André Spire (1868–1966); Jean-Richard Bloch (1884–1947); Max Jacob (1874–1944); and Henri Franck (1888–1912). The journal La Revue juive, edited in Geneva by the Corfu-born Albert Cohen (1895–1981), became a popular forum of discussion, critiquing positions that (à la Marcel Proust's) were now deemed lacking in Jewish self-awareness or self-assertiveness. Albert Cohen's own literary career was marked both at its beginning and its end with important examples of Jewish writing that spoke out against *antisemitism and racial prejudice.

The next phase of Jewish writing in France has been called a "literature of the *Shoah" (see HOLOCAUST LITERATURE) and encompasses authors such as Anna Langfus (1920–1966), Elie *Wiesel (b. 1928), Arnold Mandel (1913–87), Piotr Rawicz (1919–82), and André Schwarz-Bart (1928–2006). It is worth noting that many of them were émigrés from Eastern Europe whose native tongue was not French: Elie Wiesel, for example, was born in Sighet (now *Romania). The reception history of Wiesel's famed autobiographical narrative La nuit (Night [1958]) also shows the delay in the public reception of survivor memoirs, a genre that eventually would become part of world literature (see HOLOCAUST DIARIES; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING entries). Wiesel's memoir was based on a 900-page narrative originally written in *Yiddish and published in Buenos Aires, *Argentina, before it was condensed into the short version that appeared in French in 1958. Wiesel shared this kind of delayed acclaim with other authors who addressed the *Shoah: Schwarz-Bart won the prestigious prix Goncourt for his 1959 seminal family saga, Le dernier des justes (The Last of the Just), and Polish-born Anna Langfus received the award in 1962 for her novel Les bagages de sable (Bags of Sand), which is part of a series of works chronicling the persecution of a Jewish family from *Poland.

Of exceptional status among his peers is the *Vilna-born author and resistance fighter Romain Gary (1914–1980), whose enormous oeuvre (also published under the pseudonym Emile Ajar) includes biting satires (La danse de Gengis Cohn, 1967) and narrative accounts of post-war Europe (Education européenne, 1945). In 2004 Jewish writer Myriam Anissimov published a perceptive biography of this prolific writer and diplomat (Romain Gary, le caméléon).

Albert Memmi (born in Tunisia in 1921 and trained at the Sorbonne) is one of the first representatives of the *Sephardic influence in French Jewish life and letters. His 1953 autobiographical novel La statue de sel (Pillar of Salt) created a format followed by many *Maghreb-born writers who began to publish in France in the wake of decolonialization. Memmi also became an influential advocate for the colonized subject, rather than limiting his critical analysis to the marginalized position of the Jew in a culturally homogeneous Christian society.

The critic Clara Lévy in her study Ecritures de l'identité: Les écrivains juifs après la Shoah (Writings of Identity: Jewish Writers After the Shoah; 1998) suggested that the omnipresence of the past represents the crucial distinction of French survivor literature; the role of the past changes with the authors who began to write in the 1970s and 1980s and whose writings have been characterized as a literature "in lieu of memory" (Nolden). The arrival of *Sephardic Jews from France's former territories and colonies in the Maghreb (but also from *Egypt) added new thematic and stylistic features, whereas French-born authors of *Ashkenazic background began to turn away from Marxist denials of ethnic and religious identities and set out to rediscover their Jewish roots. In many of his works Georges Perec (1936–1982) addressed the situation of the Jew and the "l'univers concentrationnaire" (The Concentration Camp Universe; title of a 1946 book by David Rousset, b. 1912) in intriguingly post-modern fashion. Alain Finkielkraut (b. 1949), in his seminal 1980 essay "Le Juif imaginaire" ("The Imaginary Jew"), programmatically challenged members of his generation to find an appropriate voice through which to articulate their unique situation of having been born after the Shoah. Eschewing the literary practices of Jewish invisibility and acculturation, second- and third-generation writers like Henri Raczymow (b. 1948), Patrick Modiano (b. 1945), Myriam Anissimov (b. 1943), Antoine Spire, Norbert Czarny, and Cécile Wajsbrot, openly address French society's complicity in the persecution of French Jews during the so-called années noires (black years).

Some of these writers also render self-critical portrayals of Jewish life in present-day France by using literary forms ranging from conventional memoirs (Serge Kostar, Claude Gutman, Anne Rabinovitch) and multigenerational genealogies (Anissimov) to avant-garde narratives (Patrick Modiano, Gérard Wajcman, Georges Perec) and sensationalist police thrillers (Eliette Abécassis, Clément Weill Raynal). Henri Raczymow has emerged as one of the literary historians of this contemporary era of French Jewish writing.

North African women writers like Katia Rubinstein, Nelly Delanoë, Chochana Boukhobza, Paule Darmon, and Marlène Amar joined Annie Goldmann (Les filles de Mordechaï [The Daughters of Mordechai], 1979) in her attempt to create a literary space suitable for negotiating a female identity as a post-colonial French Sephardic Jew without succumbing to the temptations of acculturation or of nostalgia for the lost world of North African Jewish life.

Their male counterparts as well, among them most prominently Marcel Bénabou, Jean Luc Allouche, Gil Ben Aych, and Marcos Koskas, have found unique ways of integrating the idioms of the hallas and mellah, the centers of Jewish life and learning in North Africa, into their narratives. The term "couscous literature" has been coined to point to the unique mixing of languages (among them *Arabic and *Ladino), literary styles, and narrative conventions that is characteristic of some of these authors' work. Eschewing traditional demands for concise and stylistically pure literary diction, they create a vivacious literature in which, however, a religious dimension is hardly present. For further reading, see T. Nolden, In Lieu of Memory: Contemporary Jewish Writing in France (2006).

THOMAS NOLDEN

Literature: Graphic Novels. The graphic novel, a genre that integrates complex literary narratives with continuous visual images characteristic of comic books, has received considerable attention as an explosive cultural phenomenon that effectively blurs the boundaries between popular culture and high art. Beginning in 1992 when Art Spiegelman won the Pulitzer Prize for Maus, this genre has attracted both critical acclaim and a rapidly expanding readership. Jewish writers and artists are a dynamic presence both in the origins and the latest trends in the graphic novel. Indeed, most scholars credit Will Eisner (1917–2005), the son of a Jewish Austrian immigrant to the United States, as the essential figure with which any discussion of the graphic novel's development (Jewish or otherwise) must begin.

Astonishingly, Eisner's career encompassed eight decades, from the "golden age" of the comic book to the critical and popular embrace of the graphic novel. Long recognized as a profound innovator in the development of visual narrative and the language of comics, Eisner created numerous comic icons such as "the Spirit." His narrative and visual style are consistently informed by a hard-edged realism, indelibly influenced by his early life in *New York City tenements. That perspective is especially visible in his four stories of struggling immigrants entitled A Contract with God and Other Stories (1978), widely acknowledged as the first graphic fiction. To the Heart of the Storm (1991), considered the most successful of Eisner's frequent ventures into autobiography, presents a series of compelling flashbacks, the peripatetic reveries of a young inductee on a troop train on his way to basic training in 1942. "Willie's" wide-ranging family history encompasses the settlement of his mother's family in 1880s America, his father's exploits in early-twentieth-century *Vienna, and *World War II. At times reminiscent of Studs Terkel's oral histories, this work counters the American myth of progress and opportunity by demonstrating the character's and his family's unending battles with *antisemitism.

Eisner always recognized that visual art could be a potent weapon in combating stereotypes of the Jew, just as it had once proven effective in circulating hostile images. Describing the process that influenced Fagin the Jew (2003), he remarks how, in "examining the illustrations of the original editions of Charles Dickens' 1838 novel Oliver Twist, I found an unquestionable example of visual defamation in classic literature. The memory of their awful use by the Nazis... one hundred years later, added evidence to the persistence of evil stereotyping. Combating it became an obsessive pursuit" (Fagin the Jew, 4). His final work, The Plot, completed just before his death, tells the story behind The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the fraudulent antisemitic screed that describes the supposed Jewish plan for global influence and domination (see RUSSIA). Eisner also wrote the influential study, Comics & Sequential Art (1985). Michael Chabon's Pulitzer-prize-winning novel, Kavalier and Clay (2000), is based in part on Eisner's early years. In 2002, Eisner received a Lifetime Achievement Award from the National Federation for Jewish Culture (presented by Art Spiegelman). The highest recognition of achievement in the graphic novel, the Eisner Award, is named after him.

Despite Eisner's strong early efforts, it was not until the publication of Spiegelman's Maus: A Survivor's Tale (the first volume was published in 1986; earlier drafts appeared in Spiegelman's self-published magazine, Raw) that the graphic novel's potential received critical appreciation. Originally published in two volumes (My Father Bleeds History and Here My Troubles Began), Maus juxtaposes Spiegelman's tumultuous relationship with his survivor father, Vladek, with a narrative based on the latter's harrowing recollections of his life before and during the "Holocaust." In "Art's" retelling of events, the reader is introduced to an analogous world of hatred and atrocity wherein Jews are translated as mice along with corresponding representations of Poles as pigs, Germans as cats, and Americans as dogs. Much of the remarkable power of Maus derives from its historical verisimilitude as well as its urgent force, exercised through both textual and illustrative clues, in demonstrating the limits and misuses of "identity."

Ultimately, Maus bears witness to the once-suppressed story of Anja, Art's mother, who killed herself without leaving a farewell note. Vladek destroyed Anja's journals, and her absence ensured that Art (who suffered a psychic breakdown) and Vladek would be forever connected through their shared incapacity to transcend Holocaust trauma and grief. Spiegelman's subsequent works include a complex political and personal response to the horror of 9/11: In the Shadow of No Towers (2004). Here Spiegelman (who still lives not far from Ground Zero), ingathers a range of famous ("Little Nemo in Slumberland") as well as obscure newspaper comic strips of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century to mediate between his family's intimate story and a critique of the Bush administration's disastrous exploitation of tragedy.

Spiegelman's success with Maus inspired other graphic memoirs and novels with Holocaust themes, including Joe Kubert's Yossel, April 19, 1943 (2003), a "counter-history" of what might have been his family's fate had they remained in Poland; Pascal Croci's Auschwitz, based on interviews with concentration camp survivors (2004); Bernice Eisenstein's second-generation memoir, I Was the Child of Holocaust Survivors (2006); and Miriam Katin's critically acclaimed account of her and her mother's flight from the Nazis, We Are on Our Own (2006). The recent emergence of these sophisticated works suggests that the creative possibilities for second-generation graphic forms of commemoration are far from exhausted.

In his series, Julius Knipl: Real Estate Photographer (1996), Brooklyn-born Ben Katchor (b. 1951) offers up what appears to be New York City's Lower East Side as a Yiddish landscape of wandering Jews nostalgic for the ephemeral artifacts of their (not necessarily reliable) memories. Katchor delights in converting the everyday and the known into the strange and unfamiliar (and the reverse). Although his city remains nameless, it is instantly recognizable in its intense strangeness and aching loneliness. Katchor's The Jew of New York (2000) is a complex exploration of ethnicity and belonging in early-nineteenth-century America; it is based on the utterly fantastical and yet entirely historical figure of Major Mordecai Noah who sought to create a Jewish homeland in upstate New York. Although often whimsical, this work's multiple story lines, uncanny characters, and striking imagery illuminate historical matters such as the racial obsession that the Native Americans were one of the Lost Tribes of Israel or the Jewish-American community's reluctance to identify with a proto-Zionist movement that would effectively disavow their American identity. Katchor began his career as a contributor to Art Spiegelman's legendary underground magazine Raw and has been the recipient of a Guggenheim and other prestigious awards. His reimagined Jewish pasts and interrogations of "authenticity" warrant careful consideration alongside other Jewish American voices such as Philip Roth and Michael Chabon.

In Europe, few emerging graphic novelists in recent years have generated more excitement than the staggeringly prolific Joann Sfar; his Le Chat du rabbin (The Rabbi's Cat, 2005) and Klezmer (2006) series portray the disparate histories and cultural worlds of Sephardic and Ashkenazic Jews with manic energy and astonishing invention. In France, Sfar's works have frequently appeared on the best-selling lists compiled by L'Express. In The Rabbi's Cat, set in 1930s Algeria, the titular feline gains the power of speech and challenges his rabbinic master to instruct him in the Jewish faith so that he might have a proper Bar Mitzvah. Sfar's exuberant imagery and absurdly humorous episodes present profoundly serious meditations on the complex relation between Jewish tradition and modernity, celebrating the rich contact zones of North African and Ashkenazi Jewry (in The Rabbi's Cat) and the cultural exchanges of gypsies, Jews, and others in early-twentieth-century Ukraine (in Klezmer).

Italian cartoonist Vittorio Giardino bears witness to the darker aspects of the modern Jewish encounter with Europe through his elegantly drawn multivolume series, A Jew in Communist Prague, which many critics have praised as a masterpiece. Visually, Giardino's meticulously detailed full-color panels capture the atmosphere and architecture of post-war Prague, while his narrative poignantly traces the precarious coming-of-age of the young protagonist, Jonas, during the years of his father's imprisonment – officially for being a "counterrevolutionary," although the narrative makes abundantly clear that he is the victim of unofficial state antisemitism.

In Israel, the graphic novel has taken a little longer to catch on as a cultural phenomenon, but its artists and writers have long produced innovative and often startling work. The internationally acclaimed Actus Tragicus, a collective of five comic artists (Mira Friedmann, Yirmi Pinkus, Itzik Rennert, Rutu Modan, and Batia Kolton), have based many of the stories included in their annual collections on the irreverent fiction of Etgar Keret. Rutu Modan also created an Israel-based serial for the Sunday New York Times (2008), and her Exit Wounds (2007) is a gripping examination of the fraught nexus of terrorism and the quotidian in Israeli society. Eli Eshed's and Uri Fink's subversive approaches to Zionist historiography and Israeli icons in Ha-golem: Sipuro shel comics Israeli (The Golem: The Story of an Israeli Comic) present an inventive recasting of the golem figure as a troubling symbol of the excesses of Jewish power, whereas Ilana Zeffren's personal and political chronicle, Sipur varod (Pink Story), is a stirring examination of gay life in Israel. Another illuminating portrait of Israeli life is presented in Miriam Libicki's autobiographical comic Jobnik (2008), an acerbic and candid examination of her challenging years as an immigrant soldier. Libicki is also the author of "Towards a Hot Jew: The Israeli Soldier as a Fetish Object," a remarkable pictorial essay that interrogates the popular culture image of the Jewish body in the Diaspora versus Israel. Most recently, Ari Folman transformed his Waltz With Bashir: A Lebanon War Story (2008), a critically acclaimed animated film exploring Folman's long-suppressed recollections (and those of his fellow veterans) of serving in Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, into an equally powerful graphic novel (2009). In addition to their surreal, hallucinogenic explorations of the unreliable nature of memory, both versions of Bashir are extraordinary works of wartime testimony, culminating in an unsparing portrayal of the Sabra and Shatila massacres.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, it is clear that the graphic novel has triumphantly emerged as a remarkable conduit for presenting the great narrative themes of the Jewish visual and textual imagination (mobility, flight, adaptation, transformation, disguise, metamorphosis), and it is even beginning to contribute to the ancient tradition of *midrashic interpretation. J. T. Waldman's Megillat Esther (2006), a visually opulent and voluptuous rendering of the book of *Esther (featuring the Hebrew text with an original English translation), has been praised by biblical scholars and aficionados of the graphic novel alike. Waldman's luminous black-and-white drawings, inspired by an eclectic range of influences including ancient Persian art, produce intriguing new layers of meaning.

Recent research addressing either the Jewish contribution to the graphic novel or the history and evolution of the comics includes S. Baskind and R. Omer-Sherman, eds., The Jewish Graphic Novel: Critical Approaches (2008); P. Buhle, Jews and American Comics (2008); D. Fingerioth, Disguised as Clark Kent: Jews, Comics, and the Creation of the Superhero (2007); D. Geis, ed., Considering Maus: Approaches to Art Spiegelman's "Survivor's Tale" of the Holocaust (2003); and A. Kaplan, From Krakow To Krypton: A History of Jews in Comic Books (2008).

RANEN OMER-SHERMAN

Literature, Hebrew: Haskalah. The Haskalah* ("enlightenment") was a Jewish literary, cultural, and social movement patterned after the European Enlightenment; it started in *Germany (Prussia) in the 1780s and moved first to *Galicia and *Russia, and then to *Lithuania and *Poland, lasting through the 1880s. Its initiators were young maskilim (followers of the Haskalah) in Königsberg and *Berlin who wished to emulate modern trends in European life and to introduce changes into Jewish society and Jewish culture.

Adhering to Enlightenment principles of humanism, tolerance, and freedom and prompted by medieval Jewish rationalists, especially *Maimonides, the maskilim envisioned a renewed form of Hebrew literature. They imagined that this literature would follow the trends of neoclassicism, adapting the poetics of contemporary European letters as well as the rediscovered aesthetics of the Hebrew *Bible. They also wished to revive the *Hebrew language as a medium for modern Hebrew letters. In contrast to the contemporary rabbinic linguistic practice of mixing Hebrew and *Aramaic and disregarding somewhat the proper use of Hebrew grammar, the maskilim insisted on using Biblical Hebrew (see HEBREW, BIBLICAL) for their creative writing, especially poetry. They studied the Hebrew language, grammar, and vocabulary in depth and published philological treatises and lexicons such as Talmud Lashon Ivri (Study of the Hebrew Language) and Otzar ha-Shorashim (Treasury of Roots) by the grammarian and biblical scholar Judah Leib ben Zeev (1764–1811)

An accompanying maskilic goal was to modernize Jewish education with a revised curriculum based on the formative texts of Judaism, starting with the Bible, together with secular disciplines, languages (especially Hebrew and German), and European customs and manners. Naphtali Herz Wessely (1725–1805) advocated these changes in his influential treatise on education, Divrei Shalom ve-Emet (Words of Peace and Truth), published between 1782 and 1785. Maskilim formed a society of Hebraists (Hevrat Dorshei Leshon Ever [Society for the Seekers of the Hebrew Language]) and launched a Hebrew journal, Ha-Me'assef (The Gatherer); published between 1783 and 1811, the journal was edited by the activist and author Isaac Euchel. Introducing various European literary genres, the maskilim published satire (Ktav Yosher [An Epistle of Righteousness] by Saul Berlin), biography and epistolary writings (Toldot Rambe-man: Lebensgeschichte Mos. Mendelssohns [The Life Story of *Moses Mendelssohn] by Euchel), and dialogues of the dead (Aaron Wolfsohn). Concurrently, they also revived traditional Hebrew genres such as fables (Joel Brill), proverbs, and polemics (Isaac Satanow). Thus, the Hebrew Haskalah continued previous phases of Hebrew literature and initiated new trends that broke with the past by fostering Modernism and *secularism.

The maskilim hoped to revive interest in the Hebrew Bible by continuing Moses Mendelssohn's Bi'ur project, the translation of the *Pentateuch into German (in Hebrew characters) with commentaries. Subsequently, they published translations and commentaries on other biblical books. Their poetry, which included idylls on nature and biblical epics such as Shirei Tiferet (Songs of Glory), on *Moses, by Wessely; Nir David (David's Lamp [light]), by Shalom Ha-Cohen, used biblical forms but was influenced by such German poets as Solomon Gessner and Frederick Klopstock. The maskilim also wrote sentimental poems and biblical dramas, such as Melukhat Sha'ul (The Reign of Saul) by Joseph Ha'efrati.

In the 1820s, Haskalah literary activities began in Austria and Galicia, with the publication in *Vienna of a second Hebrew journal, Bikkurei ha-Itim (The First Fruits of the Times; 1820–31); it was edited by Shalom ha-Cohen and others. The study of Judaism in Hebrew, known as Hochmat Israel, emerged at the same time in *Galicia and Italy, following a similar trend in Germany (Wissenschaft des Judentums). Its Galician proponents were Nachman *Krochmal in his historiosophy of Judaism, Moreh Nevukhei ha-Zeman (The Guide to the Perplexed of the Time), and Solomon Judah Rapoport, who wrote essays on talmudic subjects and biographies of major Jewish figures. In *Italy, Samuel David *Luzzatto wrote studies of the Bible and of Judaism (Mehkerei ha-Yahadut [Studies of Judaism]) and explored medieval manuscripts. They and others, such as the Italian scholar Isaac Samuel Reggio, who asserted the compatibility between Judaism and philosophy in his Ha-Torah veha-Philosophiah (Torah and Philosophy), contributed learned articles to the third Hebrew journal, Kerem Hemed (Delightful Vineyard; 1831–56), edited by Samuel Leib Goldenberg and Shneur Sachs. These learned maskilim critically probed Jewish history, examined the dating and the authorship of some biblical books, and revisited the Talmud, its sages, and their ways of studying the halakhah. Galicia was the venue of a bitter clash between Haskalah and *Hasidism, which culminated in anti-Hasidic satire by Joseph Perl (Megaleh Tmirin [Revealer of Secrets]; Bohen Tzaddik [Test of the Righteous]) and by Isaac Erter (Ha-Tzofeh Leveit Yisra'el [The Watchman of the House of Israel]). Some maskilim also argued against the *Kabbalah and the authenticity of the *Zohar and endeavored to eradicate superstitious customs and beliefs (Judah Leib Mises in Kine'at ha-Emet [The Zeal for Truth]).

There were various attempts between 1843 and 1845 to revive Bikkurei ha-Itim or to emulate its policy of combining belles lettres and timely, literary, and scholarly essays. Samuel Joseph Fünf founded and edited Pirhei Tzafon (Flowers of the North) in *Vienna (1841, 1844); Mendel Stern launched a literary and scholarly quarterly, Kokhvei Yitzhak (Stars of Isaac; 1845–69, 1873) in *Vienna; and Joshua Heschel Schorr founded and edited He-Halutz (The Vanguard; 1852–89), an anti-rabbinic, scholarly, and polemical periodical published in Lwów and other places. Another scholarly and literary periodical, Otzar Nehmad (Pleasing Treasury; 1856–63), was issued in Vienna by Isaac Blumenfeld.

The first of the popular weeklies, Ha-Magid (The Herald; 1856–1903), edited by Eliezer Silberman and others, was devoted to current events and to general interest articles; Ha-Melitz (The Advocate; 1860–1904), edited by Alexander Zederbaum and others, and Ha-Tzefirah (The Dawn; 1862–1931), edited by Hayyim Zelig Slonimsky, were launched first as weeklies and later published as dailies. Another important periodical was the weekly, turned monthly, Ha-Karmel (Carmel; 1860–71, 1871–80), edited by Fünf, in Vilna, which promoted moderate Haskalah; Ha-Levanon (Lebanon; 1863–86), launched first in *Jerusalem and then in Paris and other places, was edited by Jehiel Brill. Ha-Shahar (The Dawn; 1868–84), a literary monthly published in Vienna and edited by Peretz Smolenskin, included short stories, literary reviews, and essays on Judaism and contemporary issues by major writers. Abraham Baer Gottlob launched the literary monthly Ha-Boker Or (First Light of Morning; 1876–86) in Lemberg (Lvov) and *Warsaw. Overall, these periodicals served as vital instruments of mass communication, helping disseminate the Haskalah, its ideology, and Hebrew literature to a wider public in Eastern Europe and beyond.

The third Haskalah center – in Russia, Lithuania, and Poland – thrived in the second half of the nineteenth century; this phase of the Haskalah attempted to reach beyond the intellectuals to the masses. Thus, following the trend of romanticism, Abraham Mapu published the first Hebrew novel, Ahavat Zion (Love of Zion), in 1853. This historical romance, set in First *Temple times and written in Biblical Hebrew, evoked national images of the glorious past. Mapu's realistic 1857 novel, Ayit Zavu'a (The Hypocrite), exposed hypocritical characters in Jewish society, including some negative portrayals of maskilim, and advocated reorienting young Jews toward productive occupations such as agriculture.

In the 1860s and 1870s, two major autobiographies were published. Mordecai Aaron Günzburg published his life story, Avi'ezer, in 1863/4, and Moses Leib Lilienblum published his Hotot Ne'urim (Sins of Youth) in 1872. Both documented the failure of Jewish education and the struggles of young maskilim against obstacles raised by traditional Jewish society. Lilienblum, in Orhot ha-Talmud (The Paths of the Talmud), and Judah Leib Gordon, in Binah Leto'ei Ru'ah (Insight to the Confused), were among radical maskilim who carried on a continuous battle against religious authorities and argued that Jewish law could and should be modified to fit modern times and circumstances.

Adam Ha-Cohen Lebensohn (Shirei Sfat Kodesh [Songs of the Holy Tongue]) followed the old school of Haskalah poetry in his philosophical verses and flowery language; his son, Micah Joseph Lebensohn (Shirei Bat Zion [Songs of the Daughter of Zion], Kinor Bat Zion [The Harp of the Daughter of Zion]) wrote biblical epics and romantic and lyrical verses. The poet and translator Meir Ha-Levi Letteris published his translations and adaptations of European classical drama (Geza Yishai [The Stump of Jesse] after Racine's Athalie, and Ben Abuya after Goethe's Faust, based on the life of the rabbinic apostate *Elisha ben Abuya). Judah Leib Gordon published epics, fables, and poetry; in his timely poems he criticized the Jewish community and contemporary rabbis (Kol Shirei Y. L. Gordon [Complete Poems of Y. L. Gordon]).

A surge of works of literary criticism emerged in the 1860s, exemplified by the critical writings of Abraham Uri Kovner (Heker Davar [Probe of the Matter]), Abraham Jacob Papirna (Kankan Hadash Malei Yashan [A New Jar with Old Contents]), and Shalom Jacob Abramovich (Mishpat Shalom [Peaceful Judgment]; Abramovich later wrote under the pseudonym, Mendelev Mokher Seforim [Mendele the Bookseller]). They criticized Haskalah poetry and prose for their use of melitzah (grandiloquence and bombastic phraseology) and for dealing with irrelevant subjects. This school of criticism, following contemporary trends in Russian criticism, declared the need for a more realistic and practical literature.

Among realist novelists in the last quarter of the nineteenth century were Peretz Smolenskin, who wrote Hato'eh Bedarhei ha-Hayyim (The Wanderer in the Paths of Life), a picaresque semi-autobiographical novel, and Kevurat Hamor (Donkey's Burial), a satiric criticism of Jewish society; Reuben Asher Braudes, whose novel Ha-Dat ve-Hayyim (Religion and Life) promoted religious reforms; and Abramovich who wrote Ha-Avot veka-Banim (Fathers and Sons), a love story depicting the clash between young maskilim and traditional society. Among those writing satiric short stories was Mordecai David Brandstädter, who highlighted conflicts between maskilim and traditionalists.

With the rise of Jewish nationalism in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, Haskalah, with its orientation toward European culture, lost favor, and the 1881 *pogroms in southern Russia signaled its demise.

For further reading see M. Pelli, The Age of Haskalah: Studies in Hebrew Literature of the Enlightenment in Germany (2006); idem, In Search of Genres: Hebrew Enlightenment and Modernity: An Analytical Study of Literary Genres in 18th- and 19th-Century Hebrew Enlightenment (2005); M. Waxman, A History of Jewish Literature, vols. 3, 4 (1936); and E. Silberschlag, From Renaissance to Renaissance: Hebrew Literature from 1492–1970 (1973).

MOSHE PELLI

Literature, Hebrew: Israeli Fiction. The connections between narrative and nation-building, and the tensions between spiritual longing and material existence, are apparent in the parallel developments of Israel and Hebrew-language fiction in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries (see ISRAEL, STATE OF entries).

1940s: As Israeli literary critic Gershon Shaked (1929–2006) noted, Israel's native literary culture did not begin until the 1940s. S. Y. *Agnon's Only Yesterday (1945) stands as a milestone in the subversion and abandonment of the social realist "Eretz Israel" genre fiction of earlier writers. The novel signals a high-water mark for aesthetic accomplishment that contemporary writers still aspire to achieve. Agnon's masterpiece depicts the alienation of a Second *Aliyah (1904–1913) pioneer as he moves between the secular and religious worlds and between tradition and modernity. Only Yesterday touches on the central themes of Israeli literature: the collective versus the individual, the spiritual versus the material, and *Diaspora versus *Zion. It remains a powerful patchwork of the styles that have come to define Modern Hebrew literature: myth, epic, social realism, psychological realism, magical realism, and symbolic parable.

S. Yizhar (Yizhar Smilansky, 1916–2006) is far more representative of the 1940s. He initiated the style and substance of an Israeli-born literature, created by the so-called Native Generation, also known as the "Generation of 1948" or the "Palmakh Generation." With the *War of Independence (1947–49) barely ended, Yizhar penned his short story, "The Prisoner" (1949), which examines the interrogation and abuse of an *Arab shepherd by Israeli soldiers. Despite the military ethos of the time, Yizhar's story helped institute what have become substantial motifs in Israeli fiction: the (mis)treatment of its Arab citizens and neighbors and the tragic heroism of the Israeli (soldier or civilian) who must struggle to preserve dignity while wielding power. His 1949 novella, The Story of Hirbet Hizah, has similar themes (see ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE).

Even as the emerging Israeli state battled to set its borders and establish a stable economy, it sought to absorb hundreds of thousands of immigrants. The Native Generation had been raised on images of the stoic, strong, and brave "New Hebrew," but the *Holocaust survivors who arrived on Israel's shores were ravaged both physically and mentally. These survivors were often met with impatience, contempt, and silence by sabras (native-born Israelis), intolerant of vulnerability even as Israel faced an uncertain future. Yehudit Hendel's (b. 1926) story, "They Are Different People" (1949), may be one of the earliest works to confront the bewildering encounter between survivors and sabras. The encounter with *Mizraḥi Jews from Muslim countries proved more reassuring. Israel's mass evacuation of *Yemen's Jewry during Operation Magic Carpet (1949) captivated the country with a display of its own heroism. This episode helped popularize the work of Mordecai Tabib (1910–1979), a writer born in Israel to Yemenite parents. He achieved early success with As a Weed in the Field (1948), his depiction of the Yemenite Jewish community in Israel. The neglect of Jews from Muslim lands remains a contentious issue in literary studies today (see MIZRAḤI MIZRAḤIM).

1950s: Agnon produced several outstanding works in the 1950s, including the novellas Tehillah (1950) and the enigmatic Edo and Enam (1950). In Tehillah, Agnon crafts a sophisticated allegory of *Jerusalem, whereas the mysterious and complex tale of passion in Edo and Enam underlies a symbolic account of the confrontation between tradition and modernity. Some point to Agnon as the spiritual inheritor of Franz *Kafka, but unlike Kafka's writings, Agnon's works clearly reveal their debt to the religious traditions, language, customs, and teachings of rabbinic *Judaism and therefore stand apart from many other works in the Israeli literary canon.

Yizhar's rich output during this decade explores the legacy of the War of Independence and the fate of displaced Arabs in ways that undermine the Zionist narrative of national rebirth. The title story in his collection Midnight Convoy (1950) describes a desperate effort to resupply a besieged settlement in lyric terms and incorporates eroticized images of the Israeli landscape. Yizhar refined his depiction of the extremes of war and sacrifice in his mammoth The Days of Ziklag (1958), a novel that depicts a week in the lives of fighters preparing for battle. Through the use of stream-of-consciousness techniques, this novel rewrote readers' expectations of wartime fiction. The short story "The Swimming Contest" (1952) by Benjamin Tammuz (1919–1989) similarly complicated the belief in the Israeli military's nobility. In this story, the longing for coexistence between Jews and Arabs in Israel is brutally shattered by the killing of an Arab combatant. Moshe Shamir (1921–2004), another influential Native Generation author, published a fictionalized biography of his fallen brother, With His Own Hands (1951). This seminal work helped enshrine the romantic image of the fighting pioneer Israeli as bold, resourceful, pure of intention, and pure in arms. Shamir's ideological fiction echoes the work of Haim Hazaz, a writer who achieved great popularity in the 1930s and 1940s for several celebrated stories. These were published in one volume of Selected Stories in 1952, renewing his stature among younger writers.

The late 1950s saw the emergence of A. B. *Yehoshua (b. 1936), who published groundbreaking stories that reveal traces of Agnon's influence and, indirectly, Kafka's. These stories include "The Yatir Evening Express" (1959) and "Death of the Old Man" (1957). The first tale treats an isolation that begets violence when villagers derail a train, whereas the second examines violence directed against an isolated, elderly tenant. Resentment over conformist pressures finds anxious expression at the end of the decade in the novel Fortunes of a Fool (1959) by Aharon Megged (b. 1920), in which the ineffective antihero evokes the rootless protagonists of diasporic Jewish fiction, pointedly rejecting the figure of the New Hebrew enshrined by Shamir and other contemporaries of the Native Generation.

1960s: After Adolf Eichmann's capture, trial, and eventual execution (1960–62; see HOLOCAUST TRIALS), the *Shoah became a central focus of much Israeli literature. A survivor himself, Aharon Appelfeld (b. 1932) has crafted some of the most sensitive post-Holocaust fiction in Hebrew, although typically without treating the horrors directly. Appelfeld's early novel, Smoke (1962), subtly treats the trauma endured by those who emerged from *Nazi-occupied Europe. A host of talented writers who had absorbed the Palmakh ethos, including Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000) in Not of This Time, Not of This Place (1963), Haim Gouri (b. 1923) in The Chocolate Deal (1965), and Yoram Kaniuk (b. 1930) in Adam Unrecovered (1969), examined how the Shoah ruptured Jewish continuity and challenged the Zionist meta-narrative of Jewish rebirth in Israel. In the case of both Gouri and Kaniuk, the terrors of the Shoah receded only to expose an absurd, nonredemptive world in which detached irony gives way to black humor.

War, conquest, and grief receive complex treatment during this decade as Israeli society and its political borders profoundly changed. Kaniuk's Himmo, King of Jerusalem (1965) describes a morbid love affair between a beautiful nurse and her horribly disfigured and mortally wounded patient. As a kind of Israeli predecessor to The English Patient, Kaniuk's slim novel both solidifies and subverts the Israeli cult of sacrifice. Others who critically examined hero worship and sacrifice include Aharon Megged in The Living and the Dead (1965) and A. B. Yehoshua in his collection, Facing the Forests (1968). Megged measures the impotence of his contemporaries against the boldness of the earlier pioneers and finds both wanting. Yehoshua, especially in the much praised title story to his collection (first published 1963), contemplates the lassitude of a younger generation with a mixture of envy and contempt, while reserving no small measure of satire for the hubris of Israel's founding generation.

Amos Oz's (b. 1939) collection Where the Jackals Howl (1965), marked the appearance of Israel's most well-known literary talent and symbol of the "Statehood Generation" or "New Wave." This volume's best stories present allegorical and psychologically complex tales of the *kibbutz. For Oz, conflicts raging inside the kibbutz, the ideal socialist labor commune, become a cipher for the grim realities of an unattainable yet ever promised utopia. Oz's novel, My Michael (1968) appeared shortly after Israel's sweeping victory in the Six Day War (1967). Often considered an Israeli revision of Madame Bovary, Oz's novel imagines the inner life of a woman who finds release from her stultifying married life in sexual fantasies involving Arab men.

1970s: The euphoria following the Six Day War gave way among many intellectuals to a recognition that Israel's military triumph had failed to alter the country's status in the Middle East. Border incursions, state-sponsored terrorism, and skirmishes with neighboring Arab states continued. Oz's two novellas Unto Death and A Late Love (1971) seem to have captured a sense of impending crisis: The former displaces conquest and its legacy to the era of the *Crusades; the latter depicts one man's apocalyptic paranoia. Yehoshua also treated the cycle of warfare, grief, and retribution in the long story, "In the Beginning of Summer 1970" (1971), in which a father is mistakenly informed that his son has been killed in the line of duty.

Published on the cusp of the previous decade, David Shahar's (1926–1997) search for the lost era of pre-state Palestine in Summer in the Street of the Prophets (1969) is the first book of his multivolume epic, The Palace of Shattered Vessels (1969–94). This spiritually inflected epic marks a turn toward the nostalgic that emerged prominently in the 1970s. Yaakov Shabtai's (1934–1981) bittersweet and carnivalesque stories of his youth in *Tel Aviv were collected in Uncle Peretz Takes Flight (1972), but Shabtai's masterpiece is the formally inventive Past Continuous (1977). This novel makes use of a breathless, headlong rush of prose with little punctuation to narrate the alienation between Israeli generations. The posthumous publication of Agnon's incomplete A City and the Fullness Thereof (1973) revealed a different retrospective take, focusing on the author's pre-war youth. Agnon, Hebrew literature's only Nobel Prize winner (1966), died in 1970, but he continued to cast a long shadow on the literary world in Israel.

The Yom Kippur War (1973) severely tested Israel's military might. Perhaps as a consequence of a renewed sense of vulnerability, a darkness of tone and subject matter found its way into much Hebrew literature. The bleakest expression appears in Amos Kenan's (b. 1927) Shoah II (1975), which suggests an apocalyptic end to Jewish existence brought on by occupation and an abandonment of principles. Appelfeld approached the Holocaust in an oblique way in his masterful novella Badenheim 1939 (1979), which imagines a European resort narrowing into a ghetto. Yet, the disillusionment and crisis of the era were nowhere more strongly felt than in Yehoshua's The Lover (1977). Yehoshua's first novel reveals the influence of Faulkner in its use of multiple first-person narratives and fragmented chronology to tell the symbolically charged story of a disappearance that reveals the divides and ruptures within an Israeli family.

1980s: Israel emerged from the malaise of the 1970s only to deal with threats to its northern borders, the First Lebanon War, and a restive *Palestinian population. Internal social, ethnic, and economic divides continued unabated, notably characterized in the work of two Mizrahi writers, Eli Amir (b. 1937) and Sami Michael (b. 1926). Amir's semi-autobiographical Scapegoat (1983) follows the acculturation of the child of Baghdadi Jewish professionals into Israel's *Ashkenazi-dominated society, whereas Michael's Trumpet in the Wadi (1987) treats the relationships among Christians, Jews, and Muslims on the eve of armed conflict. Self-described Israeli Palestinian novelist Anton Shammas (b. 1950) is the author of the novel Arabesques (1986), a stylistic and thematic triumph of Hebrew literature, which covers several generations of his family's life. For these writers who acknowledge a hybrid identity, the claims of the individual outweigh the claims of the collective. Although different in tone and subject matter, Yehoshua Kenaz's (b. 1937) Infiltration (1986) examines another collection of outsiders, army recruits in the 1950s who are sidelined from combat and hence relegated to the periphery of Israel's celebration of militarism.

The personal and the political are increasingly conflated during this era. A microcosm of Israeli society appears in Amos Oz's Black Box (1987), an epistolary novel written in multiple voices that describes both familial estrangement and the decline of a social consensus. Blue Mountain (1988) by Meir Shalev (b. 1949) treats the immigrant story with both pathos and whimsy. Savyon Liebrecht (b. 1948) approaches the political and the personal with a feminist slant in stories from her collections, Apples from the Desert (1986) and Horses on the Geha Highway (1988). The title story of her first collection describes a mother's quest to bring her daughter back into the religious community; another stand-out, "A Room on the Roof," conveys fumbling efforts at good will between Israelis and Palestinians, as well as mistrust and condescension.

The first novel to treat the occupation of Palestinians, David Grossman's (b. 1954) Smile of the Lamb (1983), portrays the ethical compromises made by Israeli civilians and soldiers, while not shying away from acknowledging Palestinian suffering. Later, Grossman's nonfiction classic, The Yellow Wind (1987), recorded simmering Palestinian resentment that would explode during the First Intifada (1987–1993). Grossman's novel, See Under: Love (1986), is a complex work that employs post-modern strategies to explore the legacy of the Shoah. His ambitious novel is indebted to the fiction of slain Polish Jewish writer Bruno Schulz.

1990s: This decade saw an increasingly violent Intifada, military clashes in southern Lebanon, the bombing of Israeli cities by Iraq during the first Gulf War (1991), the Oslo Peace Accords, the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (1995), a tremendous influx of Jews (and non-Jews) from the former *Soviet Union, and an encroaching Americanization. The stratification of Israeli society, its exhaustion by the security situation, and a longing for normalcy are reflected in the “different wave” (Avraham Balaban) or “post-national” (Hanan Hever) writers who came to the fore, including Orly Castel-Blum (b. 1960), whose darkly comic Dolly City (1992) imagines a grotesque and paranoid vision of a dystopic Israel. Her work shares similarities to that of Etgar Keret (b. 1967), who achieved popular and critical acclaim with his short stories collected in Tsinorot (1992) and Missing Kissinger (1994). These hyperrealist and often humorous tales incorporate slang and pop culture references to examine previously solemn subjects such as the occupation of Palestinians and the Holocaust.

Writers from the former Soviet Union are an emerging group in Israel, ably represented by Alona Kimhi (b. 1966), whose debut collection Lunar Eclipse (1996) features well-crafted stories of emotional estrangement. The title story presents a probing examination of a Russian immigrant family. Ronit Matalon (b. 1959) writes of an older immigrant community, but one still marginalized in Israeli society. Her collection Strangers At Home (1992) sensitively takes readers inside Mizrahi immigrant homes and workplaces. Matalon's novel The One Facing Us (1995) features a teenaged protagonist who seeks to retrace her family's lives, loves, and losses through photographs while she endures an exile in Cameroon. This post-modern Bildungsroman presents one family's chronicle against the backdrop of the Mizrahi *Diaspora.

Another family saga written by a Mizrahi writer who is at the center of the Modern Hebrew canon is Yehoshua's Mr. Mani (1990). One of the most important Israeli novels, Mr. Mani is a tour de force composed of five one-sided “conversations.” Each conversation treats a progressively more distant historical era, beginning in 1982 and ending in 1848, cumulatively presenting roughly one hundred and forty years of Jewish history as a cosmic farce, rather than as governed by divine election. A more mainstream epic, Polish-born author Dan Tsalka's (b. 1936) sweeping A Thousand Hearts (1991), follows the fortunes and foolishness of the immigrants from the Third Aliyah (1919–23) who created modern-day Israel. Tsalka's novel, too, strives to demonstrate the origins of the enduring conflicts between East and West within Israel and without.

2000s: As the Second Intifada raged and as Israel embarked on the Second Lebanon War, the new millennium more and more resembled the old one. The *post-Zionism of the 1990s continued to exert its influence on society and on belles lettres. Castel-Blum's fun house of a novel, Human Parts (2002), powerfully evokes the terror of suicide bombing, while capturing the despair of a society riven by religious differences, ethnic strife, and economic injustice. Amir Gutfreund's (b. 1963) Our Holocaust (2000) plunges readers into an encounter with the history and memory of the Holocaust, while also daring to ponder whether Israeli society teeters on the edge of catastrophe. The brutality of war is brought home by Ron Leshem (b. 1976) in Beaufort (2005), a vivid novel grounded in interviews with soldiers who manned the bloody borderlands of south Lebanon prior to the Israeli withdrawal (2000). David Grossman's To the End of the Land (2008) introduces the memorable figure of a woman who believes her son will be killed in battle; Scheherazade-like, she then embarks on a desperate journey to keep him alive by telling his story. Hailed as a masterpiece, Grossman's grief-fueled novel has captivated critics and readers in Israel and abroad. Another celebrated author and activist, Amos Oz, returned to form, publishing his profoundly moving A Tale of Love and Darkness (2002). This semi-autobiographical work recounts the author's coming of age during Israel's early years and amidst the idiosyncratic souls who populated his family. As a personal saga of sadness and joy, of violence and compassion, Oz's *memoir-novel serves as a fitting monument to the first six decades of Israel's tumultuous existence. See also MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI.

ADAM ROVNER

Literature, Hebrew: Medieval Spain. In addition to the well-known tradition of lyric poetry by authors such as Samuel ibn Naghrela ha-Nagid (*Samuel ha-Nagid), Solomon *ibn Gabirol, Moses *ibn Ezra, and Judah *Halevi (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD), *Spain was also home to a tradition of rhyming prose narratives, known in Arabic as maqamat and in Hebrew as mahberot. The genre was adapted from Arabic authors such as Al-Hariri (1054–1122), whose proto-picaresque maqamat set the standard for rhetorical acrobatics and flowery narrative prose in the Muslim world. In the classical maqama, the narrator describes a series of deceptions that befall the protagonist at the hands of an eloquent and roguish antagonist, who dazzles his audiences and loosens their purse strings. The Castilian Judah al-Harizi (ca. 1165–1225) translated Al-Hariri's maqamat into Hebrew with the title Mahbarot Itiel (The Maqamat of Itiel). He then composed his own original maqamat in Hebrew, titled Tahkemoni (The Book of Tahkemoni: Jewish Tales from Medieval Spain, trans. D. S. Segal [2000]). His Barcelona contemporary, the physician Joseph ibn Zabara (ca. 1140–1200), wrote Sefer Sha'ashu'im (The Book of Delight, trans. M. Hadas [1962]); this work broke somewhat with the conventional maqama genre in that it featured a continuous story line of the frame tale genre in which shorter stories and discourses are set within the context of a discussion between protagonist and antagonist, as in the Arabic classic Kalila wa-Dimna (Kalila and Dimna, ca. 750) by Abdallah ibn al-Muqaffa'.

There are two Hebrew translations of Kalila wa-Dimna by Spanish writers, a complete version by Jacob ben Elazar (fl. ca. 1220–40) and a partial one by a man known only as Joel. Ben Elazar was also the author of an innovative collection of stories, Sefer Meshalim (The Book of Tales), also known as Sipurei Ahavah (Love Stories), some of which combine Arabic and Hebrew literary techniques with those more characteristic of the French and Italian novellas of the times. Contemporary with ben Elazar's translation of Kalila wa-Dimna is the anonymous Hebrew translation of another Arabic frame tale, the Mishle Sendabar (Tales of Sendabar, trans. M. Epstein [1967]). Both of these originally Arabic works were also translated into Castilian by King Alfonso X “The Learned” (Calila e Digna, 1251) and his brother Don Fadrique (Sendebat, 1253).

The Castilian author Isaac ibn Sahula (b. 1244) produced the encyclopedic Meshal Hakadmoni (Meshal Haqadmoni: Fables from the Distant Past, trans. R. Loewe [2004]) during the reign of Alfonso X (1252–84) and his successor Sancho IV (1284–95). Unlike Al-Ḥarizi, who hewed to the classical structure of the maqama, Ibn Sahula adapted the frame tale structure from Kalila wa-Dimna; thus, Meshal Hakadmoni is an extended debate between two protagonists, the “Moralist” and the “Cynic,” who embody the two main currents of intellectual thought in the Jewish community of Castile. Stories from Meshal Hakadmoni appear in later Spanish classics such as the 1343 Libro de buen amor (Book of Good Love) by Juan Ruiz and the 1340 Conde Lucanor (Count Lucanor) by Juan Manuel. Ibn Sahula, who wrote *kabbalistic treatises as well as a commentary on the *Song of Songs (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY), was the first author to make specific reference to the *Zohar; he is thought to have been acquainted with its author, *Moses de Leon.

The only Spanish Jewish author of the Middle Ages to win renown among Christian readers and listeners was Shem Tov ben Isaac ibn Arduetiel of Carrión (d. ca. 1369), known in Castilian as “Sem Tob” or “Santob de Carrión.” His Castilian work, the Proverbios morales (Jewish Wisdom in Christian Spain: The Moral Proverbs of Shem Tov de Carrión, trans. T. Perry [1987]), has become a classic of Spanish literature, but his Hebrew mahberot, although artistically important, are largely overlooked. Milhemet ha-Et veba-Misparayim (The Debate between the Pen and the Scissors) is an enigmatic lampoon of the literary debates between pen and sword common to the Middle Ages. Critics are in disagreement as to its allegorical meaning, and it has been largely overshadowed by the better known, earlier maqamat of al-Ḥarizi and Ibn Zabara.

After Shem Tov, Hebrew poetry enjoyed a bit of a renaissance in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries in Zaragoza, where there was a very active circle of Hebrew poets, among them Solomon Bonafed and Solomon ben Meshullam Da Piera. Although this scene produced little prose narrative of note, there is one exception. Vidal Benvenist wrote Melitzat `Efer ve-Dina (The Tale of Efer and Dina; M. Huss, Melitzat `Efer ve-Dina le-Don Vidal Benvenesht [2003]), a tragicomic farce of a novella narrating the misadventures of an older widower named Efer who misguidedly marries a very young girl named Dina. Efer’s inability to satisfy his conjugal requirements leads him to fatally overdose on an aphrodisiac. In a lengthy epilogue, Benvenist explains that `Efer ve-Dina is a moral allegory, but the work’s popularity suggests that the story stood on its own as entertainment.

Recent scholarship on the Spanish Hebrew maqamat includes J. Decter, Jewish Iberian Literature: From al-Andalus to Christian Spain (2007); D. A. Wacks, Framing Iberia: Maqamat and Frametale Narratives in Medieval Spain (2007); and M. Hamilton, Representing Others in Medieval Iberia (2007).

DAVID A. WACKS

Literature, Hebrew: Women Writers, 1882–2010. The entry of women writers into the Modern Hebrew literary scene was slow and halting, accompanied by an equally uneasy and belated recognition from the critical community.

POETRY: The poetic standards established by the *Bialik School necessitated deep familiarity with traditional texts, which was an exclusively male domain within the traditional Jewish educational system. Women only began to write verse in Hebrew after World War I when the national-cultural revolution in the *Yishuv established a clear preference for spoken Hebrew in its everyday usage. Even then, the lyrical style and personal themes favored by female poets were at odds with the militant, macho-intoned *Zionist meta-narrative and its poetics of harnessing art to the collective nationalist effort. Further, the tendency of subsequent literary historians to view poetry as a series of male “anxieties of influence” helped eliminate women poets from the canon of Modern Hebrew writing. Nevertheless, some of the women poets who appeared in the 1920s received public attention despite being marginalized by the literary establishment. The most prominent among these were Rachel (pseudonym of Rachel Bluwstein), Esther Raab, Elisheva Bichovsky, Yocheved Bat-Miriam, and Anda Amir-Pinkerfeld.

Rachel (1890–1931) was raised in Poltava and arrived in *Palestine in 1909; planning for a life of farming, she died young of tuberculosis. Rachel rose to mythic proportions in the popular culture of the *Yishuv because of her minimalist, lyrical, and nostalgic poems and her personal themes of loneliness, barrenness, and lost youth. Her verses, short and melodious, lent themselves to music; yet, although her poems were widely sung, they were deemed of no great poetic value by the critical establishment. Esther Raab (1894–1981), the first native-born female poet, also produced minimalist poetry, characterized by elliptical, irregular syntax and weighted with lustful energy and feminine rebelliousness. Leah Goldberg (1911–1970), who spent her childhood in *Russia and *Lithuania, arrived in *Tel Aviv in 1935, joining the circle of Modernist authors led by Abraham Shlonsky. Primarily a poet, Goldberg also excelled as prose writer, critic, editor, dramatist, and translator. Her poetry, initially avoiding the Jewish themes of her contemporaries, is characterized by a conversational style, using ordinary, familiar words and images and finding the lyrical in everyday experience. Elisheva Bichovsky (1888–1949), born to a Christian family in Russia, married Shimon Bichovsky and immigrated to Palestine in 1925. She started as a Russian poet before adopting Hebrew for her poetic expression, and her dreamy, romantic verses were received enthusiastically by the reading public but soon forgotten. Yocheved Bat-Miriam (1901–1980) left *Belorussia to settle in Palestine; she wrote Symbolist poetry, suggestive and musical, often mystical and romantic. Anda Amir-Pinkerfeld (1902–1981), who emigrated to Palestine from *Galicia, focused her poetry on the female experience and women’s lives and was largely ignored at the time.

Among the most notable women poets after the establishment of Israel in 1948 are Zelda, Ayin Tur Malka, Dahlia Ravikovitch, Nurit Zarchi, Yona Wallach, Rachel Chalfi, and Rivka Miriam. Zelda (1914–1984), who came from Russia as a child, stands out as a poet from the *Ultra-Orthodox community who won critical acclaim across the ideological and religious spectrum. Her poetry is suffused with mystical and *kabbalist echoes and expresses human yearnings for the presence of the Divine. Dahlia Ravikovitch (1936–2005), native born, is considered one of the most important poets in Modern Hebrew literature. Her poetry is rich with biblical citations, expressing personal longings for distant worlds of beauty and freedom; she also published verses of political protest addressing current issues. Yona Wallach (1944–1985), born in Israel, became known early in life for her iconoclastic, offbeat poetry and fantastic, strikingly erotic imagery. She is considered a major avant-garde voice, and her popularity is still growing despite her untimely death.

FICTION: Women prose writers of the Yishuv narrated both their private lives and their encounter with the new land, but most were marginalized by literary historiographers because they did not conform to the poetics of epic deeds and heroic nation-building. Among the more important were Nechama Pukhachevsky, Hemdah Ben-Yehuda, and Devorah Baron, but only Baron attracted the interest of the literary establishment. Baron (1887–1956), born in Belorussia, the daughter of a village rabbi, settled in Palestine in 1911 and published stories on Jewish life in the small Eastern European shtetl*, chronicling both its bleakness and its wealth of culture. She mainly focused on women's circumstances such as marriage*, infertility*, divorce*, and poverty, describing her father's sensitivity to the plight of women.

Female writers who began to publish after the birth of Israel, such as Amalia Kahana-Carmon (b. 1926), Yehudit Hendel (b. 1926), Shulamit Hareven (1931–2003), Rachel Eytan (b. 1931), Shulamit Lapid (b. 1934), and Ruth Almog (b. 1936), were acutely conscious of the discrepancy between their inclinations to portray subjective emotions and intimate relationships and the cult of physical heroism that was favored by the male arbiters of culture. This conflict often triggered self-doubt and low self-esteem in women writers, as well as a tendency to present women as victims, prone to mental disintegration and even madness. Kahana-Carmon's lyrical prose works, mostly written in the Modernist technique of stream of consciousness, have been likened to Virginia Woolf's novels. Many of her female characters are mentally tenuous, craving an ideal romantic relationship. By contrast, Shulamit Hareven presents strong female personalities who voice feminist opinions. Among Ruth Almog's main themes are mental breakdowns suffered by women as well as the plight of second-generation Holocaust* survivors. Shulamit Lapid, in her widely popular novel Gei 'Oni, reconstructs a heroic chapter in Zionist* history, successfully inserting the female point of view.

These women writers and others began to feel empowered to seek a more private vision in the 1970s, when the trend to reassess the Zionist meta-narrative caused writers of both sexes to turn away from ideological and political themes. Women writers won both public and critical accolades and became integrated into the mainstream history of Modern Hebrew literature, with the canonical establishment finally according them critical appreciation for offering an alternative, rather than minor, poetics.

A more radical turning point occurred in the late 1980s when gender* issues, along with other social concerns, came to the fore in both Israeli public discourse and fiction, followed by an unquestioned openness to women writers on the part of the literary/critical establishment. Women felt freer to express themselves as fiction writers and to introduce the feminine dimension to the national culture, unfettered by the sense of inferiority or estrangement that plagued the earlier generation. This also came about as a result of a new awareness in Israel of literary and cultural trends in the West, especially the modern women's movement in North America and Europe, which legitimized gender issues as worthy literary themes and validated women's stylistic preferences. Female writers were further emboldened to claim a central position by the general receptiveness in Israel to the post-modern spirit, which rejects any master narrative and prefers small "local" narratives of minorities of all sorts – ethnic, economic, or gender.

Women fiction writers born after the establishment of Israel – including Savyon Liebrecht (b. 1948 in Germany), Michal Govrin (b. 1950), Shifra Horn (b. 1951), Nava Semel (b. 1954), Zeruya Shalev (b. 1959), Ronit Matalon (b. 1959), Orly Castel-Bloom (b. 1960), and Yehudit Katzir (b. 1963) – revolutionized the literary scene. The country's critical establishment has placed them at the very core of current post-Zionist*, post-modern Israeli culture. While displaying a diversity of genres, styles, and themes, their feminine point of view has been accepted as a viable new form of literary poetics. Despite their artistic differences, these writers all transgress ideological, ethnic, and sexual boundaries, previously the domain of masculine literary experience. Their protagonists often feel the need to mend a ruptured reality or are presented as architects, intent on building new feminine models to replace the old male structures. Like the male writers of their generation, they express the agony of the second-generation Holocaust* survivor. They also reveal sympathy toward the Arab* minority and resentment of the macho culture still prevalent in Israel. Several of these writers cast their novels in the form of the hitherto male genre of the Künstlerroman, turning it into "the portrait of the artist as a young woman," thus asserting the validity of female artistic talent.

The most iconoclastic among these writers is Orly Castel-Bloom, whose dark, post-modernist, deconstructionist style envisions modern society in the image of depleted selves, grotesque actions, and broken-down social and familial structures. Savyon Liebrecht's realistic prose offers a sober look at central problems in current Israeli society such as the debate over the treatment of Palestinians, the psychological issues of children of Holocaust survivors, and the cult of machismo that still suffuses Israeli popular culture. Her writings intertwine social realism with feminist sensibility and major public issues with the private, feminine point of view. Zeruya Shalev's style is sexually bold and graphic, focusing on male-female relationships and blatantly oblivious to public matters. Michal Govrin's fiction, filled with a dense web of allusions to traditional Jewish texts, presents female protagonists who engage in crossing borders and opt for a non-Zionist view of modern Israel, such as Old World mysticism* or political activism on the far left, coupled with a romantic involvement with the ethnic taboo, an Arab man. Yehudit Katzir's works, mostly set in her home town, Haifa, are premised on a symbiotic relationship between the female protagonist and the city, employing the sensual feminine contours of the Haifa landscape as a semiotic marker of the female physical and mental condition. Her stories introduce multiple shades of love relationships, including a sexual affair between a schoolgirl and her female teacher; her protagonists are mostly imaginative and sensitive young girls, who grow up to become storytellers. Additionally, within the genre of the sophisticated thriller, Batya Gur (1947–2005) won international acclaim; indeed, Israeli best-seller lists of popular, less critically significant fiction prominently feature a good number of female writers.

Hebrew women writers have journeyed from marginality to mainstream, finally breaking into a previously male canon and validating female artistic visions and thematic concerns. These writers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first century have revolutionized Hebrew poetics by placing female existence and gender issues at the heart of literary expression; in the process they have also brought attention to their precursors, many of whom were deemed irrelevant in their own times.

For further reading in English, see N. Aschkenasy, Feminine Images in Hebraic Literary Tradition (1987); Y. Feldman, No Room of Their Own: Gender and Nation in Israeli Women's Fiction (1999); M. Gluzman, The Politics of Canonicity: Lines of Resistance in Modernist Hebrew Poetry (2003); S. E. Jelen and S. Pinsker, eds., Hebrew, Gender, and Modernity: Critical Responses to Dvora Baron's Fiction (2007); W. Zierler, And Rachel Stole the Idols: The Emergence of Modern Hebrew Women Writing (2004); and "Foreword," in The Defiant Muse: Hebrew Feminist Poems, ed. S. Kaufman, G. Hasan-Rokem, and T. S. Hess (1999), 1–21. NEHAMA ASCHKENASY

Literature, Hebrew: The Yishuv, 1880–1948. In the Yishuv (the Jewish settlement in *Palestine), literary expression was part of the *Hebrew revival. Initially, authors used imagery, landscapes, and ideas that reflected their European countries of origin, producing material of marginal literary quality. In the 1920s, when the center of Hebrew letters moved from Odessa to *Tel Aviv, literature began to evoke the local landscape and the daily experiences of the immigrant population. However, because Hebrew was still unfamiliar as a spoken language for many, writing of this era is often stilted and steeped in biblical style and phrases, or it echoes the Russo-Yiddish features and forms the writers knew from Europe. This is particularly pronounced in the case of Hebrew *theater. The Habimah, which was founded in Moscow in 1918 and transferred to Tel Aviv in 1926, brought Russo-Hebrew pronunciation as well as Russian acting and theatrical conventions. It was not until the 1960s that the Cameri Theater began to modernize the language and adopt Israeli cultural conventions (see THEATER: ISRAEL).

Native Jewish writers in the Yishuv descended from families that had come from Middle Eastern cities of the *Ottoman Empire, sometimes as much as three centuries earlier. Among the most well known is Yehuda Burla (1886–1969). These multilingual writers were engaged with the Arab culture around them and generally wrote short stories about daily life, tending to portray heroes at the center of romantic involvements. Shoshannah Shababo (1910–1992), Burla's student, wrote novels and many short stories, including a series of animal fables. Her work features colloquial language, contemporary usage, and representations of the diverse society of Christians, Muslims, and Jews in Palestine – rare qualities at that time. However, her teacher characterized her work as "trivial, melodramatic and sensational," which may account for the neglect of her work by later critics.

This Middle Eastern fiction is in marked contrast to writing by authors who arrived as part of the waves of immigration (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: JEWISH IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948) to Palestine from *Eastern Europe. The Second Aliyah (1904–14) was particularly important, bringing idealists inspired by the efforts of Eliezer ben Yehuda (1858–1922) to revive the Hebrew language (see HEBREW: MODERN REVIVAL). These writers were responsible for establishing Tel Aviv as the center of Hebrew letters in the 1920s, and they were key in developing a Hebrew vernacular that used *Sephardi pronunciation. In contrast, contemporaneous Hebrew writers in Europe continued to work with Hebrew as a primarily textual language.

Women authors who immigrated to Palestine during the Second Aliyah include Hemdah Ben-Yehuda (1873–1951), Devorah Baron (1887–1956), and Rahel Yanait (Ben Zvi, 1886–1979). Ben-Yehuda and Yanait wrote about pioneering and the particular experiences and status of women during this period. Yanait often wrote about the large number of suicides among this wave of immigration. Baron, the most distinguished of these writers, had been taught Jewish law by her father, a rabbi; she was a realistic writer and wrote short stories about women's plight under the yoke of religious life. Like many Second Aliyah writers, Baron described the *shtetl of her youth. Central to the literary scene in *British Mandate Palestine, Baron edited the literary section of Ha-Po'el ha-Tzair, the major literary organ of the time, which was edited by her husband until his death in 1937 (see also LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS [1882–2009]).

S. Y. *Agnon (1888–1970) is the most celebrated of the Second Aliyah writers, and in 1966 he shared the Nobel Prize for Literature with the European Jewish poet Nelly Sachs. Agnon is the only writer in Hebrew ever to have won this award. The first story he published in Palestine was "Agunot" (Forsaken Wives). His pen name "Agnon," which he adopted as his official surname in 1924, is derived from the title of this story. That same year a fire at his house destroyed his collection of rare books and manuscripts. Agnon moved to Talpott near *Jerusalem with his family, but in 1929 his library was destroyed once more, this time during anti-Jewish riots. These two traumatic events became repeated themes in his stories, reflecting the destruction of the Jewish people and the need to rebuild. Agnon tells the story of the Second Aliyah immigrant experience in his novel Tmol Shilshom (Only Yesterday). His anti-hero Isaac Kumer follows the *Zionist dream to build the land, but when he arrives he soon discovers that he is ill suited to this task and he is outbid by cheaper Arab laborers. Finally he moves to Jerusalem and adopts a spiritually oriented lifestyle instead. In this work, Agnon portrays the disillusionment of his generation and the hardships that they faced in their encounter with the land they hoped to settle and work. Other important works by Agnon are Shirah (1971), A Guest for the Night (1939), and A Simple Tale (1935).

There are a number of representations of the Land of Israel as a site of hostility in the works of Second Aliyah writers, who recorded accounts of attacks on pioneers by marauding bandits and the ravages of illness such as malaria. However, in the main, early Yishuv literature portrayed historical narratives of the Jewish past far more often than the contemporary pioneer experience. Asher Barash (1889–1952), from Lopatin, *Galicia, began publishing in Hebrew in 1908 and immigrated to Eretz Israel in 1915. His story “Facing the Gates of Heaven” examines the self-immolation of the only Jewish survivor of an entire community that was destroyed in Cossack massacres.

Among the important contributors to the development of Hebrew literature in this period were Uri Nissan Gnessin (1879–1913) and Joseph Haim Brenner (1881–1921). Together they wrote and published a literary weekly in *Warsaw and then moved to London where they founded a Hebrew periodical. Although Gnessin spent several months in Palestine, he left and returned to Russia where he died of a heart-attack at thirty-four. Gnessin introduced psychologically oriented prose mainly through short stories, and his complete works run to three volumes in Hebrew. Brenner moved to Palestine in 1909 and stayed; he was killed in 1921 by Arab rioters in Tel Aviv. Born in southern Russia, he was influenced by Dostoevsky and Turgenev, and his main characters are maladjusted young men rebelling against their parents’ generation. His Palestine writing depicts the alienation and isolation felt by the pioneer generation. He mocks Zionists who sentimentalized or romanticized the settlement enterprise; his pessimistic novel Breakdown and Bereavement (1920) conveys his generation’s ethos. As a literary figure Brenner was extremely important; he developed the psychological novel in Hebrew, and along with Agnon, he was instrumental in the move of Hebrew letters to Palestine. Another important figure of this era was Aharon Reuveni (1886–1971).

According to critic Gershon Shaked, the Second Aliyah generation wrote about both the literal experience of immigration and their ideological commitment to settling the land. “Predominantly anti-genre,” the literary style of these writers realistically presented the challenges faced by individuals and by the collective. In contrast, writers of the Third Aliyah (1919–23), although resembling their predecessors to some extent, “revived and revived genre writing.” Their subject matter “clearly defined heroes and enemies and unambiguous goals.” They contrasted favorably the pioneer, the agricultural worker, and the ideologue with the urban dweller and merchant. This writing depicts the struggle of the hero against disease, political threats, and the inhospitable land.

Third Aliyah writers include Hayyim Hazaz (1898–1973) and Avigdor Hameiri (born Feuerstein; 1890–1970). Hazaz’s fiction encompasses a wide variety of Jewish experience: He wrote about the *Yemenite Jewish community and other immigrants from Middle Eastern countries in both fiction and nonfiction, short stories, novels, and plays. His works include The Gates of Bronze (1923) and The End of Days (1950). Hameiri immigrated to Palestine in 1921, joined the staff of the daily newspaper Ha’aretz, edited several literary and cultural journals, and wrote more than thirty books.

As Hameiri’s generation began to control the publishing apparatus in Palestine and as presses were established by the *kibbutz and Labor movements, European readers were no longer the main audience for material being written in Palestine. In the 1920s Moznayim, published by the Hebrew writers’ society, and Ketuvim were among the literary journals that spread an interest in Hebrew literature. Yet, many of the prose writers of this period have been forgotten or neglected, because their literary productions were rarely original and did not attain the canonical status of works of the previous generation. The most prevalent tropes and themes were those of the Hebrew warrior who was as forceful in his relations with women as he was in fighting Arabs. This figure was an antithesis to the hapless, helpless stereotype of the Eastern European immigrant. Often this character was a halutz (pioneer) and shomer (guard), working the land by day and protecting it by night.

In its poetry, the Third Aliyah generation was more radical. Uri Zvi Greenberg (1896–1981), Abraham Shlonsky (1900–1973), Isaac Lamdan (1900–1954), and Sh. Shalom (Shalom Joseph Shapira, 1904–1990) had all fought in World War I in Europe. Their poetry reflects problems of adjustment in the Yishuv, as well as the wasteland environment of a post-war world. Isaac Lamdan’s poem “Masada” became the anthem of a generation, representing Jewish sacrifice that reflected the increasingly tense political situation developing in the Yishuv after the 1920–21 and 1929 riots that culminated in the Palestinian uprising of 1933–36. Subsequently poetry moved away from the pioneering imagery of the landscape and became increasingly urbanized. This is evident in the works of Natan Alterman (1910–1970) and Leah Goldberg (1911–1970; see POETRY, MODERN HEBREW).

The fiction writer Moshe Smilansky (1874–1953) was rediscovered by members of a new generation who were publishing novels in the 1940s and 1950s. Smilansky first traveled to Palestine in the 1890s; he worked in agriculture and was a founder of the Jewish Farmers Association. He fervently supported physical work, believing in its redemptive powers. His series on Arab life and depictions of pastoral surroundings and the Palestine landscape were ahead of his generation, who were still depicting European geography, and he profoundly influenced the content and styles of the first generation of native Ashkenazi writers.

Beginning in the 1940s during World War II, and then in the early years of Israel, a new group of writers dominated the literary field. They were born in Palestine (or had migrated there as children), fought in the 1948 War of Independence (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS), and went on to serve in governmental roles or in leading literary/educational positions. This generation wrote epic novels about the complex personal struggles of the pioneering hero generation. Aharon Megged (b. 1920) was born in Poland and moved to Palestine when he was six, growing up within the Yishuv. He served as Israel’s cultural attaché in London between 1968 and 1971. S. Yizhar (born Yizhar Smilansky; 1916–2006) was born in Rehovot into a Zionist pioneer intelligentsia family. He was a member of the *Knesset and is best known for his masterpiece Days of Ziklag (1958). Moshe Shamir (1921–2004), who was born in *Safed but lived mostly in Tel Aviv, served in the 1948 war and later the Knesset (1977–81). He became a voice of his generation with his novels, The King of Flesh and Blood (1958) and With His Own Hands (1970). Shamir’s He Walked Through the Fields (1947) was the first play performed in the State of Israel in 1948 (see THEATER: ISRAEL).

Nevertheless, a counter-canonical trend is also evident during this period. In contrast to Shamir, Yizhar, and Megged with their Labor Zionist backgrounds, active revisionists such as Jonathan Ratosh (1908–1981), who were strongly influenced by an ancient, pre-biblical mythology and vocabulary, founded the Canaanite movement. Although this movement never had a significant number of adherents, its “emphasis on myth and its stylistic mannerisms had considerable impact on contemporary poetry” (Carmi, 139).

The search for an authentic literary identity expressed in Hebrew, whether in the style of the traditional Labor Zionist literary canon, with its complex psychological components, or in the Canaanite mode, which was devoted to stripping away modern trends to find an authentic mythical past, characterized the literature of the Yishuv in its final phase. On the eve of the establishment of Israel, it was these two trends that would influence literary development in the decades to come.

For further reading, see S. Halkin, Modern Hebrew Literature (1970); A. Alcalay, Keys to the Garden: New Israeli Writing (1996); E. Zakim, Build and Be Built: Landscape, Literature, and the Construction of Zionist Identity (2006); G. Shaked, Modern Hebrew Fiction (2000); and T. Carmi, ed., The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse (1981).

RACHEL S. HARRIS

Literature, Ladino, refers to written or oral verbal compositions in the language of *Sephardic Jewry. The written genres were mainly reserved for educated people, mostly men, whereas folkloristic oral genres were universally known and often used by all Sephardic community members. Some *Ladino literature is similar to the equivalent literary genres of Iberian Spanish (which was subsequently developed by Sephardic Jews [see LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN]). Other genres are new, either autonomous of any prior tradition or developed under the influence of local literary forms. Although many of these genres are Jewish in nature, many others are Jewish only by virtue of the language in which they are written, their Hebrew orthography, and their source and target audience. The genres include translations into Ladino, rabbinical literature, drama, belles lettres, newspapers, other written publications, and popular folkloristic oral genres that have been written down in recent generations.

Very little literature before the 1492 expulsion from *Spain exists in Spanish written in Hebrew letters. Works that have survived include Coplas de Yosef (Verses of Joseph), by an anonymous writer; some Kharjas (the concluding Spanish verses of Hebrew poems); Takanot Valladolid (Regulations of Valladolid) for the communities in Castile formulated in 1432; instructions for conducting the *Passover seder; various contracts, written oaths, declarations, medical recipes, and agreements, most of them short and fragmented; and an entire manuscript of a women’s Ladino *prayer book from the fifteenth century (published by Moshe Lazar in 1995). Texts written by Jews in Latin script in Spain were made either for Christian patrons or for Jews who had converted to Christianity; they were in contemporary Spanish and not Ladino. Most Ladino literature was published after the expulsion from Spain, especially between the eighteenth century and the middle of the twentieth century.

TRANSLATIONS: Ladino translations are word-for-word translations of Hebrew liturgical texts into the Judeo-Spanish vernacular. This process started as an oral tradition in the Middle Ages, with the translations appearing in printed form from the sixteenth century onward. The most well-known translations are the Ladino Pentateuch from Constantinople in 1547 (written in Hebrew script) and the Ferrara Bible, 1553 (written in Latin script). Several haftarot (e.g., for *Tisha B’Av) and the Megillot (*FIVE SCROLLS) were also published continually in different locations throughout the *Ottoman Empire. The daily siddur and the holiday maḥzor (see PRAYER BOOKS) were translated in full in Ferrara using Latin script in 1552. The first extant Ladino siddur in Hebrew script was published for women around 1550 in Thessalonika. Since the eighteenth century only certain passages of prayer books have been translated into Ladino using Hebrew script. The Passover haggadah and Mishnah tractate Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) were continually translated into Ladino and published either as part of the maḥzor or as separate booklets. Ladino translations published in Latin script in *Italy, *Amsterdam, and London were aimed at converted Jews (see CONVERSOS) who were returning to Judaism; these translations are slightly “Hispanized” compared to equivalent Ladino texts produced in the Ottoman Empire.

RABBINIC LITERATURE: Rabbinic literature includes Bible commentaries (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY); the Mishnah, and the Passover haggadah; works relating to ethical behavior; Jewish legal works; *mystical writings; and *sermons. The most famous of these publications in Ladino in the sixteenth century are Moshe Almosnino’s Sefer Hanhagat ha-Ḥayyim: El regimiento de la vida (The Management of Life) and Crónica de los Reyes Otomanos (The History of the Ottoman Kings; known to the Spanish world as Extremos y grandezas de Constantinopla). Also published contemporaneously were Meza de la alma (an edited translation of Shulḥan ha-Panim by Joseph *Karo); El deber de los corazones (translated by Zadiq Forman from *Bahia ibn Pakuda’s Ḥovat Ha-Levavot (Duties of the Heart); and Dinim de sheḥitah i bedikah (by an anonymous writer). From the eighteenth century many other similar books were published by Abraham ben Isaac Asa (who also wrote a new Ladino translation of the entire *Bible); Yehudah Eliezer Papo’; Yehuda ben Shlomo Hai; Alcalai’ Shabetai ben Yaakov Vital; and others. (The most updated list can be found in Dov Cohen’s Bibliography of Ladino Books, www.hebrew-bibliography.com).

Meam Loez, one of the most voluminous and important rabbinic works in Ladino, was started by Rabbi Jacob Khuli (1689?–1732). He assembled biblical commentaries, ethical rules, and literary, historical, midrashic, halakhic, and kabbalistic sources into one Ladino composition. He completed the commentaries on *Genesis and *Exodus (until chapter 27), and after his death other rabbis carried on the enterprise. This Ladino classic was eventually published in its unfinished form, and the work ran into several editions. Because of its educational value, the book has been translated with some adjustments and additions into Hebrew, English, and other languages.

DRAMA: Although Ladino drama has existed since immediately after the expulsion from Spain, there are no texts left from that period. Many new plays were produced from the middle of the nineteenth century and survive in both printed and manuscript form, but many others no longer exist. In addition to biblical and historical topics like *Esther, *Joseph and his brothers, and Jephthah and his daughter, plays used other themes, either religiously oriented or entirely secular. The plays were not necessarily original; for example, La familia misterioza (The Mysterious Family) by J. Behar and Los Budžukes (The Twins; based on Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors). Many of these plays were musicals or semi-musicals.

BELLES LETTRES: Biographies, novels, and stories were written in Ladino from the second half of the nineteenth century. Some novels were written about historical Jewish people or events, but most were devoted to matters of contemporary life, and many were adaptations or translations of literature written in other languages. Original Ladino poetry was also published from the nineteenth century onward (mostly in newspapers and pamphlets).

NEWSPAPERS: A Ladino newspaper, La Buena Esperansa (The Good Hope), was published in 1842 Izmir. Since then hundreds of newspapers have been published there and in other cities, mostly in Thessalonika and Istanbul (Constantinople). The contents of the newspapers varied greatly: political, satirical-humorist, Zionist, or political-national. In addition to news and editorial articles, the newspapers included stories, poems, and various other sections found in modern newspapers (see JOURNALISM: *LADINO [OTTOMAN EMPIRE]).

OTHER PUBLISHED GENRES: Sephardic communities produced books and pamphlets in Ladino on the following topics: history of the Jews, biographies of personalities, analyses of Jewish life in recent times, *Zionism and nationalism, Jewish humor, grammar, pedagogical textbooks, and calendars. Missionaries in the community published books in Ladino about *Christianity, Hebrew grammar books, and even a Ladino biblical dictionary.

POPULAR AND FOLKLORISTIC GENRES: These genres were primarily oral and have only been recorded in print since the end of the nineteenth century. They include poetic literature, proverbs, *folktales, riddles, and jokes. The rich Ladino poetic oral folkloristic tradition includes the following genres: romansas (or romances) or ballads; coplas (or com-plas), poems of educational origin in assorted narratives; and cantigas (or canticas), which are lyric songs, especially love songs. Most of the coplas are related to Jewish life, whereas most of the romansas are not. These three types of *poetry are very old, and their origins can be traced back to Spain. However, a careful analysis of these genres reveals that many are later innovations, either adapted from local non-Jewish traditions or written by creative writers as new works using norms taken from the old traditions.

Many Ladino proverbs can be traced back to Spain. Some proverbs of Hispanic origin seem not to have changed over the centuries, although the vocabulary used may not be exactly the same. Others are based on Hebrew sayings or on similar proverbs from neighboring languages. Folktales, riddles, fables, and jokes generally relate to a communal attribute and were transmitted orally, especially by women, whereas men wrote satirical stories, folktales, and riddles. Folkloristic verbal compositions reflect the vernacular language more than the other literary genres and need further research.

Very little creative Ladino literature has been written since the middle of the twentieth century, despite efforts to reinvigorate the language. Current publications in Ladino written using Latin script are few, and their target readership is gradually decreasing. Most of these publications appear in bi- or multilingual formats, with the exception of the periodical Aki Yerushalaim: Revista Kulturala Djudeo-Espanyola (Here in Jerusalem: Cultural Journal of Judeo-Spanish), founded in *Israel in 1979. Several poets still write Ladino poems, which appear in bilingual publications. The newspapers Shalom in *Turkey, Los Muestros: La voz de los sefardim (Los Muestros: The Voice of the Sephardim) in *Belgium, and La Lettre Sepharade in the *United States and *France include small Ladino sections. Ladino plays are produced from time to time in Israel and Turkey, but can only fill a theater for a couple of evenings. Articles are sometimes published in Ladino (e.g., in Ladinar at Bar-Ilan University and by the Gaon Center at Ben-Gurion University in Israel). There are also some Ladino internet forums.

Recent research includes D. M. Bunis, "The Language of the Sephardim: A Historical Overview," in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, ed. H. Beinart (1992); idem, "Distinctive Characteristics of Jewish Ibero-Romance, Circa 1492," Hispania Judaica Bulletin (2004); P. Díaz-Mas, Sephardim: The Jews from Spain (1992); and O. R. Schwarzwald, "Judeo-Spanish Studies," in Oxford Handbook of Jewish Studies, ed. M. Goodman (2002), 572–600.

ORA RODRIGUE SCHWARZWALD

Literature: Latin America. The earliest literary works by Jews in the Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking Americas date back to the colonial period and are connected with the expulsion of the Jews from *Spain in 1492. In his first voyage across the Atlantic, Columbus's crew included crypto-Jews and conversos, some of whom worked as interpreters with the indigenous population. Throughout the sixteenth century, the New World became a magnet for Spanish individuals and families escaping the *Inquisition. Testimonios, inquisitorial reports, and other personal chronicles survive, among them the autobiography, correspondence, and last will and testament of Luis de Carvajal the Younger, known as Joseph Lumbroso, a victim of one of the largest autos-da-fe in Mexico City (1596).

A number of prominent colonial authors were rumored to have "Jewish blood." In the Age of Independence, starting in 1810 and covering more than the first half of the nineteenth century, such rumors were widespread. Friar Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, a leader of *Mexico's independence movement, was accused of being judaizantes. Writers born at the end of the nineteenth century, like Jorge Isaacs, author of the romantic novel María (1867), which was translated into English by Rollo Ogden (1890), did indeed have Jewish ancestry.

The arrival of *Ashkenazim from the European *Pale of Settlement in the last two decades of the nineteenth century and first three of the twentieth injected a new weltanschauung into Jewish life in the region. These immigrants to *Argentina, *Brazil, Mexico, Cuba, and other countries were impoverished *Yiddish speakers who, within a short period of time, embraced Spanish as their vehicle of communication. Alberto Gerchunoff, who died in 1950, is considered the grandfather of Latin American Jewish literature. His book The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas (1910) consists of a series of vignettes about the interaction of Jews and Gauchos in the Argentine countryside. Gerchunoff dreamed of Argentina as a place where Jews would thrive. But a *pogrom in 1919, called Semana trágica (Tragic Week), destroyed his hopes; as he matured, he became an ardent *Zionist. An immigrant from *Russia, Gerchunoff grew up reading Yiddish novels by Sh. Y. Abramovich, Sholem Aleichem, and I. L. Peretz (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY). On learning Spanish, he became infatuated with Don Quixote of La Mancha; Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas includes overt and tangential references to Cervantes' book. Gerchunoff wrote about Baruch *Spinoza, Heinrich Heine, and other Jewish rebels as well.

The three largest Jewish communities in Latin America, in order of size, are *Argentina, *Brazil, and *Mexico. Argentine writers, who either idealized or rebelled against Gerchunoff, include César Tiempo, Bernardo Verbitsky, and Germán Rozenmacher. The country's two most prominent twentieth-century Jewish authors are journalist Jacobo Timmerman (Prisoner without a Name, Cell without a Number) and statesman Marcos Aguinis (Marrano). Others include Isidoro Blainsten, Ricardo Feierstein, Mario Goloboff, Alicia Steimberg, Ana María Shúa, and Mario Szichman.

As in other countries in the region, Yiddish literature flourished in Brazil in the first decades of the twentieth century. A useful anthology showcasing provocative pieces is Alan Astro's Yiddish South of the Border (2003). However, it is in Portuguese that most Jewish authors in the country thrive. Samuel Rawet (The Prophet), Clarice Lispector (The Hour of the Star), and the prolific Moacyr Scliar (The Centaur in the Garden) offer, in their oeuvres, a complex picture of Jewish life in a religiously diverse, multiracial society. Lispector, who seldom wrote about her Jewish identity, is referred to as "the Virginia Woolf of Brazil." Scliar, who died in 2011, had a penchant for humor that brought him an international audience.

Through his poems, Yiddish writer Jacobo Glantz, a native of *Ukraine, established connections among Mexico, Eastern Europe, and *New York City. His daughter Margo Glantz (The Family Tree and The Wake) became an eminent novelist, critic, and scholar of women's literature, whose studies analyze figures like Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Equally significant is Angelina Muñoz-Huberman (Enclosed Garden), whose themes often address *Kabbalah and the Sephardic past.

Ilan Stavans (On Borrowed Words, The Disappearance, Resurrecting Hebrew), moved to the United States from Mexico at the age of twenty-five. For decades his writing has contextualized Latin American Jewish literature. Using a variety of media, Stavans' books, plays, and films focus on language and history. From 1996 to 2006 he edited the "Jewish Latin America" series at the University of New Mexico Press. It included translations into English of works by Gerchunoff, Scliar, and others.

Other countries in the region with important Jewish writers are Chile (Ariel Dorfman, Marjorie Agosin); Peru (Isaac Goldemberg); Cuba (José Kozer, Ruth Behar), Guatemala (Victor Perera, Alcina Lubitch Domecq); Costa Rica (Isaac Chocrón); Uruguay (Mauricio Rosencof, Teresa Porzecanski); and Venezuela (Alicia Freilich). Recurrent themes that manifest themselves in the tradition are *antisemitism, assimilation, and the connection between literature and politics. The Hispanic world is a stage for a particular type of antisemitism that developed in the period of Muslim rule, which was known as La Convivencia in medieval *Spain. Each country in the region has adapted it to its idiosyncratic needs. Consequently, Jewish authors of different nations present the theme differently.

This is also the case with assimilation: Jewish populations from Mexico to Argentine have been shrinking since the 1970s. Today most Latin American Jewish authors live abroad – in the United States, *Israel, Spain, and *France – and their connections with their native places have become increasingly tenuous. Frequently, their books are published abroad first (and in other languages) and only then at home, if at all. As for the connection between literature and politics, the economic and social disparities that characterize Latin America have turned authors into spokespersons for the voiceless. Jewish writers have generally been advocates of left-wing causes and movements; for instance, during Argentina's "Dirty War" and Chile's Pinochet dictatorial regime. They, like other Jews, have paid a disproportionate price through torture and becoming desaparecidos. They often emphasize the connection between these violent periods and the *Holocaust.

Another common theme, which is typical of Jewish *Diaspora literature in general, is the search for a genealogical tree. Although interest in the colonial period remains small, novels, stories, and poems point to *Poland, *Russia, *Lithuania, and other Eastern European nations in the quest for origins. Similarly of interest are the empathy between Jews and the indigenous population and the ambivalent liaison between Jews and the State of *Israel. Although Latin America has been a fertile ground for Zionist youth recruitment, the topic remains marginal in the region's literature. More prevalent is the theme of terrorism, especially since the attacks in Buenos Aires against the Israeli Embassy and the AMIA, the Jewish community center, in the early 1990s.

Finally, several non-Jewish writers from Latin America have injected Jewish content into their work. The most prominent is Jorge Luis Borges, whose stories ("Emma Zunz," "The Secret Miracle," "Death and the Compass," "The Aleph") and poems reflect on talmudic, kabbalistic, and historical themes. Other notable non-Jewish authors manifesting this interest include Julio Cortázar ("Press Clippings"), Carlos Fuentes (A Change of Skin, The Hydra Head, Terra Nostra), Mario Vargas Llosa (The Story-Teller), and, in a more tangential fashion, Roberto Bolaño (Nazi Literature in the Americas). Conversely, Jewish authors not from Latin America have set their plots in the Jewish communities of various Spanish-speaking countries of the Americas. Yiddish writers from Sholem Aleichem to Isaac Bashevis Singer published stories set in Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico. English-language novelists have done the same.

Among valuable resources are the following anthologies: I. Stavans, ed., Tropical Synagogues (1994); M. Agosin, ed., The House of Memory (1999); and S. A. Sadow, ed., King David's Harp (1999). In 1997, D. B. Lockhart compiled a dictionary, Jewish Writers of Latin America; see also FILM: LATIN AMERICA; LATIN AMERICA. ILAN STAVANS

Literature: *Russia and *Soviet Union (In Russian). The first Jewish contributions to Russian literature took place in the 1860s, when Russian literature itself was in the period of its greatest creative unfolding. Pushkin had died not long before; Gogol, Turgenev, Dostoyevsky, and Tolstoy were all producing masterworks. Such brilliance was unexpected a mere hundred years after the first intellectuals attempted to write Russian, a language of peasants, in a European style. Jewish writing followed a similar trajectory with similar astonishing results, but with the further complication that Jews in the Russian Empire had somehow to obtain a secular education. Moreover, all Jewish writers in Russia had to break to some extent with their religious communities, they had to contend with ethnic and religious discrimination, and they had to decide in which language to write. The choice of *Hebrew, *Yiddish, Polish, or Russian (among other possibilities) involved serious questions of identity, status, and politics.

Those who chose Russian were associating themselves with a major world literature and a large group of readers who were not necessarily well disposed toward Jews. Jewish writers responded to this situation by serving as both critics of Jewish life and apologists for it. Osip Rabinovich (1817–1869), the first Jew to publish in the Russian mainstream press, wrote about Jewish cantonists (forced recruits), emphasizing their suffering and their loyalty to Russia. In his novel Goryachee vremia (Seething Times), written against the backdrop of the Polish rebellion, Lev Levanda (1835–1888) examines the dilemma of young Jews, bent on assimilation but forced to choose between Poland and Russia. The memoirs of Grigory Bogrov (1825–1885) reflect the writer's ambivalence toward his Jewish background. Written a little later, the plays and novels of Semyon Yushkevich (1868–1927) expose the seamy underside of the Jewish bourgeoisie. Closer to the twentieth century came well-known writers whose works resonated with a larger public. The poet Semyon Frug (Shimen Frug in Yiddish; 1860–1916) wrote in Russian about Jewish suffering and Jewish identification with *Jerusalem; S. Ansky (the pseudonym of the once Russian radical and later Jewish ethnographer, Shloyme Zanvl/ Semyon Akimovich Rappoport [1863–1920]) is best known for his play The Dybbuk, which had both Russian and Yiddish variants. He also wrote stories in Russian about assimilating Jewish youth.

The next generation of writers came of age as Russian speakers, nurtured in Russian schools on Russian and European classics. Although highly conscious of, and hampered by, their Jewish backgrounds, they did not have Jewish educations. Among them are some of the greatest writers of the twentieth century. The extraordinary Osip Mandel'stam (1891–1938) was a complex poet who filtered the experience of modern upheaval through allusions to the Greek and Roman classics. Boris Pasternak (1890–1960) began as a futurist (a Modernist school associated with the Russian poet Vladimir Mayakovsky), but eventually renounced futurism in favor of simplicity and clarity. Pasternak is best known to non-Russians for his novel Dr. Zhivago, which includes a series of poems on the Russian Orthodox liturgical calendar. Both poets were drawn to Christianity: Mandel'stam in intellectual and cultural ways – his early baptism was perfunctory – and Pasternak profoundly. And both writers suffered from the *Soviet regime. Mandel'stam died in a transit camp on his way to the Gulag, whereas Pasternak had to renounce the Nobel Prize awarded to him in 1958.

With the revolutions of 1917 (the *Bolshevik revolution was the second of two), Jews gained civil rights and moved in droves to major Soviet cities, now legally open to them. Literature was a high priority for the Soviet state, and Jews participated on every level and in just about every competing literary group as poets, fiction writers, children's literature writers, and theorists. Ilya Il'f (1897–1937), with his non-Jewish co-author Yevgeny Petrov, wrote satires that defined an era and still loom large in the Russian imagination. Poet Eduard Bagritsky (1895–1934) was a revolutionary Modernist. The most famous of this group is Isaac Babel (1894–1940), whose precisely crafted stories reflect the deep ambivalence of the civil war period. Like Il'f and Bagritsky, Babel came from Odessa and understood Jewish life profoundly; his stories pit Cossacks against Jews and make unlikely heroes out of Odessa Jewish thugs. Il'f and Bagritsky both died young of tuberculosis; Babel, who had been fascinated by the transformation of the Soviet state and its excesses, was arrested and executed.

The Great Terror that claimed the lives of Babel and Mandel'stam was followed by World War II. Ilya *Ehrenburg (1891–1967), a famous satirist (and erstwhile Parisian expatriate), became, along with Vasily Grossman (1905–1964), Russia's best-loved war correspondent. Ehrenburg and Grossman responded not only to war but also to the *Holocaust. In the atmosphere of post-war state *antisemitism, this was neither easy nor safe. Both men sought unsuccessfully to document the Holocaust on Soviet territory. Life and Fate, Grossman's magisterial novel, is about the war as experienced by both Russians and Jews; because he called specific attention to Jewish lives and fates, the manuscript was confiscated. The fate of that novel is also a part of Russian Jewish literary history. A copy saved, at great personal risk, by the poet Semyon Lipkin (1911–2003), was smuggled out of the country in 1980 by the satirist Vladimir Voinovich (b. 1932) and prepared for publication in Switzerland by the scholar Simon Markish (1931–2003), son of the Yiddish writer Peretz Markish who had been executed by Stalin in 1952 (see JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE).

The liberalization that followed Stalin's death in 1953 was named after Ehrenburg's 1954 novel The Thaw. As the dissident intelligentsia took hold in the decades that followed, Jewish and part-Jewish writers became prominent both as liberals who managed to get provocative works into print and as radicals who published illegally in the West or who circulated their works privately in typescript. Voinovich falls into these categories, along with Yuly Daniel' (1925–1988), the son of a Yiddish writer, who was put on trial for publishing his works abroad. Joseph Brodsky (1940–1996), the best known internationally of these Jewish dissident writers, had been tried and sentenced to five years in a labor camp for not having a job, although his real transgression, obvious at the trial, was being a poet outside of the state's literary bureaucracy. After his release, Brodsky moved to the United States; in 1987, he received the Nobel Prize.

As Russian-speaking Jewish and part-Jewish writers emigrated to *Israel, Europe, and the United States, literature moved with them. With the fall of the Soviet Union, these literatures became one. The American emigré Sergey Dovlatov (1941–1990) became a beloved figure for a new generation of Russian readers. Novelists like Vasily Aksenov (b. 1932), Dina Rubina (b. 1953), and Lyudmila Ulitskaya (b. 1943); satirists like Igor' Guberman (b. 1936) and Mikhail Zhvanetsky (b. 1934); and poets like Lev Rubinshtein (b. 1947) reach Russian readers across the globe.

ALICE NAKHIMOVSKY

Literature: Scandinavia. Jewish history in Scandinavia is comparatively short, and few scholars have devoted attention to the community's cultural contributions. The reasons for this lack of attention are both geographic and linguistic: Scandinavia itself lies in Western Europe's northernmost climes, and a relatively small population speaks the Scandinavian languages. Moreover, Jewish contributions to Scandinavian letters emerged only during the nineteenth century when notions of a national literature began to hold sway. Thus, it is not surprising that the achievements of a small, largely assimilated minority residing on Europe's geographical and linguistic periphery have gone relatively unnoticed. As the Danish Jew, Georg Brandes (1842–1927), wrote in his riposte to criticism about his lack of engagement in the then-emerging *Zionist movement, "To write in Danish is the same as writing in water" ("Zionismen," 1905).

Accordingly, works of Jewish authors writing in the Scandinavian languages have been generally inaccessible to the world beyond the region. Peter Stenberg aptly describes the domestic situation of Swedish Jewish authors in his introduction to the recently published volume, Contemporary Jewish Writing in Sweden (2004), where he reports on an unnamed Swedish colleague who remarked that "he could not think of a major Swedish writer who was Jewish. When I began to list the authors who had agreed to appear in the anthology, he admitted his surprise at his own ignorance of the ethnic background of such prominent colleagues."

Three general historical trends are evident in Jewish writing in Scandinavia. The earliest Jewish inhabitants of the region were considered alien by their neighbors and published no literature. Their nineteenth-century descendants struggled to forge an identity based more on nation than on creed, and they assimilated for the most part, contributing significantly to emerging national cultures. In recent years, a body of Scandinavian Jewish literature has emerged that confronts the loss of a particularly Jewish identity. The representation of Jews by Scandinavians follows a similar paradigm: The first literary references describe an absent other; the next phase addresses the issue of social inclusion or exclusion; and finally, the issue of Jewish particularity comes to the fore.

The first Scandinavian literary work to address Jewish subjects was the Icelandic saga, Gyðinga saga (The Saga of the Jews), which was a thirteenth-century translation of 1 *Maccabees and fragmented excerpts from the writings of Flavius *Josephus. By the eighteenth century, the plays of the Dano-Norwegian playwright and professor, Ludvig Holberg (1684–1754), openly depict the presence of Jews in the everyday life of Copenhagen. In 1742, wearing his scholarly cap, Holberg published the first history of the Jewish people in a Scandinavian language, Den jødiske Historie fra Verdens Begyndelse, fortsat til disse Tider (Jewish History from the Beginning of the World, Continued until Our Times).

The issue of active Jewish participation in Scandinavian life became a subject of literary debate in the early nineteenth century, and the trope of "Moses" emerges. In 1814, when the Danish king granted Jews greater freedom, Thomas Thaarup (1749–1821) responded by penning the *antisemitic lyric, Moses og Jesus. An example of a philosemitic use of the same trope comes from Norway where Jewish residence was banned until the mid-nineteenth century. The Norwegian poet Henrik Wergeland (1808–1845) polemicized in favor of allowing Jewish immigration in his poems "Jøden" (The Jew) in 1842 and "Jødinden" (The Jewess) in 1844. In "Jøden" he employed the motif of Moses at the border of the "Promised Land" to criticize the exclusion of Jews from Norway. The Swedish author August Strindberg's social satire, Det nya riket (The New Kingdom) appeared in bookstores in 1882. In a chapter entitled "Moses," Strindberg satirically savaged the new rising class of Jewish entrepreneurs, publishers, and patrons of the arts. Despite extensive Jewish contributions to the dissemination and explication of late-nineteenth-century Swedish writers such as Strindberg, he complained that, even though "Moses" devotes himself to Swedish literature like no other, his love has been unduly rewarded by his control of academic endeavors. In a similar vein, Strindberg's friend Ola Hansson, a Swedish author with a distinct pan-German bias, attacked Georg Brandes, questioning his authenticity as an interpreter of Scandinavian literature and claiming that he was split by his doubleness as a Jew and a Dane. Although this type of attack was not restricted to Scandinavian debates, it is interesting to note that Brandes, a secular Jew who was a leader of the progressive literary avant-garde, was criticized for impurity by a member of the next generation of avant-gardists, as anti-Jewish feeling turned to a discourse of racial antisemitism at the end of the nineteenth century.

The most interesting representations of Jews are less clear-cut. Hans Christian Andersen's (1805–1875) "Jødepigen" (The Jewish Maiden [1855]), is a tale about a poor and loyal Jewish servant who cares for her mistress through good times and bad. The story ends with her death. Because she was a Jew, she is buried outside of the churchyard, and the tale ends by commenting on how the Jewess deserves resurrection and will be saved by the "Holy Ghost." Thus, Andersen's Jewess assimilates in death if not in life.

Perhaps the most interesting depiction of a Jewish character, however, precedes "Jødepigen" by two decades. The Swedish polymath, Carl Love Jonas Almqvist (1793–1866), wrote Drottningens Juvelsmycke (The Queen's Diadem), which was published in 1834; the novel includes a relatively minor character named Benjamin Cohen, also known "the White Jew." Cohen's role in the action is quite interesting. On the one hand, he is a stereotype, a venal pawnbroker, who buys the titular symbol of sovereignty stolen from the palace on the night of the murder of Gustav III, the very king who had invited Jews to live in Sweden. Although Cohen speaks in the type of *Yiddish-inflected Dano-Swedish that would be the staple of antisemitic lampoons well into the next century, there is a twist to the tale as Cohen later claims that he is not a Jew at all, and the question of stolen sovereignty in relation to the Jewish people is ironically raised. Although Almqvist interrogates notions of identity in general, his depiction of Jewish identity as an unstable and mutable concept guided by stereotype illuminates the image of Jews in nineteenth-century Sweden.

German-born Aaron Isaac (1730–1817) was Sweden's first legal Jewish resident, and he wrote the oldest extant text about Jewish life in Scandinavia. Isaac wrote his memoirs in Western *Yiddish using Hebrew orthography. However, the text was not published until 1897. In 1932, the Swedish Jewish historians Hugo Valentin and Abraham Brody translated, edited, and reissued the memoirs under the title Aaron Isaacs minnen: En Judisk kulturbild från gustaviansk tid (Aaron Isaac's Memoirs: A Picture of Jewish Culture from the Gustavian Age). Born Jewish, the prolific Danish poet and playwright Henrik Hertz (1798–1870) converted and did not address Jewish issues.

Thus, the history of published Scandinavian Jewish literature should begin with Meïr Aron Goldschmidt (1819–1887). Goldschmidt's novel En Jøde (A Jew) from 1845 is reputed to be the first depiction of a Jewish life from birth to death in Europe. The subject of Jewish assimilation is prominent in this novel as Goldschmidt depicts how sexual desire, patriotism, prejudice, and modernity inflect the particularities of identity. Early on in the novel, the young protagonist stabs a Christian Dane during the *pogrom of 1819, and the motif of blood between Jews and Christians looms large in his mind. Later, he serves as a mercenary and revolutionary abroad, hoping to impress the non-Jewish woman he loves. On his return home, he lends money to a Christian, and when he is rumored to be a usurer, he withdraws from Christian society, becoming the stereotype he had hoped to transcend. Although Goldschmidt's reputation has been colored by his satirical savagery of the philosopher, Søren Kierkegaard, he was one of the leading Danish novelists of the first part of the nineteenth century, and he continued to engage with issues of Jewish life and assimilation throughout his career (see also DENMARK).

The Jewish contribution to the emergence, dissemination, and eventually the canonization of modern Scandinavian letters at the end of the nineteenth century was significant. Georg Brandes, raised in an assimilated and secular Jewish home in Copenhagen, was perhaps the most influential Scandinavian man of letters of this era. He championed Ibsen, coined the phrase "the modern breakthrough," and introduced French literary aesthetics, John Stuart Mill, and Friedrich Nietzsche to the larger reading public in Scandinavia. Brandes was the inspirational leader of a politically engaged literary avant-garde in the seventh and eighth decades of the nineteenth century. Later on he defended *Dreyfus in print and advocated for peace and scientific inquiry. Brandes, a generation younger than Goldschmidt, was critical of the older man's self-identification. After listening to a talk by the author of En Jøde in the 1860s, Brandes remarked that he identified himself neither as Jewish nor as Danish. However, Brandes' desire not to identify himself as Jewish did not stop others from doing so. In a letter to August Strindberg, he once remarked that he had long enjoyed the "odium of being the North's anti-Christ." Georg's brother Edvard (1847–1931) was a playwright and a politician.

In Sweden, the poet Oscar Levertin (1862–1906), who originally was inspired by Georg Brandes' call for a critically engaged form of literary realism with pan-European ambition, became part of a nationalistic countermovement. Levertin and another Jewish Swede, Henrik Schück (1855–1947), initiated work on a history of Swedish literature inflected by national romantic notions. At the end of his short life, Levertin's creative work addressed his Jewishness. In the prefatory verse to Kung Salomo och Morolf (1905), Levertin remarks, "Myself, I am west and eastern," an interesting trope considering the orientalist discourse of his time.

Henri Nathansen (1868–1944) was a Danish Jewish writer who engaged issues of Jewish assimilation directly. His most popular play Indenfor Murene (Inside the Walls [1912]) addressed the issue of *intermarriage and Jewish family life. Tragically, Nathansen committed suicide after fleeing *Denmark in 1944. A portion of his novel, Mendel Philipsen og Søn (1932) was adapted and filmed by Liv Ullman as Sofie in 1992 (see FILM: EUROPE [POST-WORLD WAR II]).

Contemporary Jewish literature in Scandinavia has been largely concerned with three subjects: the *Holocaust, Jewish identity, and *Israel. Exiled German writers such as Nobel Prize winner Nelly Sachs (1891–1970) and Peter Weiss (1916–1982) lived and wrote in Sweden. Other survivors of the *Shoah, such as Cordelia Edvardson (b. 1929), Zenia Larrson (b. 1922), and Hédi Fried (b. 1924), have written autobiographical works in Swedish. Georg Klein (b. 1925), Erland Josephson (b. 1923), and Per Wästberg (b. 1933) are Swedish writers born before World War II. A younger generation of Swedish Jewish writers is concerned largely with the Jewish past and Israel, whereas in Denmark, an older generation of Jewish writers often revisits the experience of fleeing the German occupation in Denmark. The most prominent Danish Jewish writer is Suzanne Brøgger (b. 1944), who is a member of the Danish Academy. Her novel, Jadekatten: en Slægtssaga (The Jade Cat: A Family Saga [1997]), depicts the fate of a Jewish family during the *Nazi occupation. Pia Tafdup (1952) is a Danish Jewish poet who is also a member of the Danish Academy. Morton Thing (b. 1945) has written several cultural histories about the Jewish experience in Denmark.

Norway has a shorter history of Jewish settlement than Sweden and Denmark and also a scant history of Jewish literary activity. Jewish cultural life blossomed in the period between World War I and II, but half of the Jewish population was murdered by the Nazis. Leo Eitinger (1912–1996), who fled to Norway in 1939 and was deported to *Auschwitz in 1942, was a psychiatrist by training and wrote several books about antisemitism and his experiences in Norway. Eva Scheer (b. 1915) has published both fiction and non-fiction about Jewish life, folktales, and migration history. Mona Levin (b. 1939), daughter of the pianist Robert Levin, has published a 1983 biography of her father entitled Med livet i hendene (With Life in His Hands). Øystein Wingaard Wolf (1958) is the most prominent Norwegian novelist with a Jewish background. His books focus on Eastern European Jewish culture. For further reading in addition to Stenberg, see K. H. Ober, Meïr Goldschmidt (1976). MICHAEL STERN Literature: United States (Since 1900). In 1977 Irving Howe rashly announced the end of the writing of American Jewish literature. The American subject, for Howe as for others, had been immigration and the turmoil of assimilation. With the amazingly successful integration of American Jews into American society, that subject seemed exhausted, irrelevant, and impertinent. What hardships, special exclusions, disadvantages, and discrimination might late-twentieth-century American Jews claim? Yet, even though Howe was correct concerning the themes of the major canon of Jewish American writers, he was incorrect in his prophecy for the future course of American Jewish literature. Like all great traditions, American Jewish literature was more than a single-subject literature.

At the end of the nineteenth century and into the early decades of the twentieth century, the major figure in American Jewish fiction was the refugee Jew in his (and sometimes her) new world. This is the subject of the short stories and novels of Abraham Cahan (1860–1951), Mary Antin (1881–1949), Anzia Yezierska (ca. 1885–1970), Ludwig Lewisohn (1882–1955), and Michael Gold (1893–1967). Typical works include Cahan's Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto (1896) or his masterpiece, The Rise of David Levinsky (1917); Antin's aptly entitled, autobiographical The Promised Land (1912), which had to do with the promised land of the United States, and not the Jewish one; Yezierska's short stories and what was to become her most famous novel, The Bread Givers (1925); Lewisohn's autobiographical Up Stream (1922) and The Island Within (1928); and Gold's groundbreaking novel Jews without Money (1930), one of the earliest socially, indeed socialistically, informed Jewish American works. The most important early-twentieth-century writer about immigrant life was probably Henry Roth (1905–1995); his 1934 novel Call It Sleep burst on the American public with full force only in the 1960s when it came to be viewed as the great work of Jewish Modernism. All of these writers wrote primarily about the Jewish immigrant experience, often as that experience was lived among other ethnic and religious groups in American cities. Themes included the longings for the world left behind, the hopes and expectations of the new life in America, the disruptions of family and community relationships, and the budding realization that even the fulfillment of the American dream might not deliver the satisfactions seemingly promised by the goldene medina.

Indeed, this realization of the limitations of material wealth and individualist self-fulfillment, as Cahan so brilliantly portrayed it in David Levinsky, was in part what produced the amazing fit between Jewish authorship and the American literary tradition. As Jews began their integration into American life, the triumvirate of writers who dominated the canon in the mid-twentieth century became less concerned with the immigrant refugee experience and more with the existential, universal issues that the Jew in America might come to represent. Bernard Malamud (1914–1986), Saul Bellow (1915–2005), and Philip Roth (b. 1933) all wrote different kinds of fiction. So, too, did Cynthia Ozick (b. 1928), who was sometimes linked with Malamud, Bellow, and Roth as the one female Jewish writer of stature, and Isaac Bashevis Singer (1904–1991), the European-born *Yiddish writer and Nobel Laureate (1978) who began his career in America only in the 1940s.

Malamud, Bellow, and Roth readily found a place in mainstream American writing, as their inclusion in the major American anthologies of the 1960s and 1970s and in the university curriculum more than testifies. The Jewish subject of alienation, defamiliarization, and existential angst – the outsider struggling and not quite succeeding in finding a place within the dominant culture – was a quintessentially American subject, going back to the very origins of American fiction in the nineteenth century. In his 1976 novel, The Ghost Writer, Philip Roth introduces his life-long protagonist and alter ego Nathan Zuckerman; it is no accident that this comic and yet deeply philosophical portrait of the artist as a young Jewish man takes place in the New England of Hawthorne, Melville, and Henry James where American literature itself had its inception. Roth is a great humorist of Jewish neuroses, the comedy of Jewish family life, and of the assimilated Jew whose Jewishness is still primary to his identity, even if it is the aspect of himself that he would most like to be free of. These themes are central to Roth's first published fiction, Goodbye, Columbus and Other Stories (1959), and such other works as Portnoy's Complaint (1969) and Sabbath's Theater (1995), and they continue, as well, in the Zuckerman novels, up through The Counterlife (1987), American Pastoral (1997), and The Human Stain (2000). At the same time, a graver, more serious tone, which predominates in some of Roth's later novels, such as The Plot against America (2004), The Human Stain, Everyman (2006), and Indignation (2008) has also been present from the start.

Saul Bellow's writing is less wildly comic than Roth's, but his Jewish fiction is also characterized by irony, satire, and tremendous wit and precision. Bellow, who received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1976, also focused on the American Jew (even where he is not Jewish, as in Henderson, the Rain King [1959]). In Bellow's case, the preferred protagonist is the Jewish intellectual everyman in an America dissolving at its seams, losing the integrity of the past (such as it was), and moving into a future even more valueless and chaotic than the present. From such early novels as Seize the Day (1956), Herzog (1964), and Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970), through more recent fictions like Ravelstein (2000), the great theme of Bellow's fiction is the struggle of the self to achieve itself, in the face of everything that opposes it, including the meaningless of success.

Malamud, Ozick, and Singer pursue the Jewish subject somewhat differently. For Malamud, the immigrant Yiddish-speaking Jew, in such novels and short-story collections as The Assistant (1957) and The Magic Barrel (1958), is less an American everyman than a suffering Christ. More deeply in touch with the literature of the European Jewish *shtetl and with the Yiddish culture of the early-twentieth-century Jewish immigrant than either Roth or Bellow, Malamud not only Americanizes but also Christianizes the Jewish subject, recalling the concluding image of Henry Roth's Call It Sleep, where its young child protagonist is virtually crucified on the railway tracks. Ozick's immersion in the yiddishkeit of Europe and the American ghetto is at least equal to Malamud's, but it remains more specifically, concretely Jewish (i.e., non-universalist or Christian). From the publication of her first collection of short stories, The Pagan Rabbi in 1971, through the appearance of her other story collections and novels, including The Cannibal Galaxy (1983), The Messiah of Stockholm (1987), The Shawl (1980, 1983, 1989), The Puttermessa Papers (1997), and Heir to the Glimmering World (2004), and in her many essay collections as well, Ozick engages Jewish history and the textual tradition to extend the canon, not only of American literature but also of Jewish literature. Singer, who initially wrote in Yiddish and whose fiction remained connected, like Ozick's, to the European Jewish experience and the tradition of Yiddish writing, preserved an idea of Yiddish for a post-*Holocaust, non-Yiddish-speaking modern world. Similarly, Ozick has preserved an idea of Jewish writing in English, as constituting an American Jewish tradition in literature. Her most recent novel is Foreign Bodies (2010).

Malamud, Ozick, and Singer – precisely because they stayed more rooted in Jewish history, traditions, and sources than other American Jewish writers – were the direct antecedents of writers who emerged in the last two decades of the twentieth century. These include Steve Stern (b. 1947), Art Spiegelman (b. 1948), Melvin Jules Bukiet (b. 1953), Rebecca Goldstein (b. 1950), Michael Chabon (b. 1963), Allegra Goodman (b. 1967), Nathan Englander

(b. 1970), and Aryeh Lev Stollman. These authors have undertaken an expansion of the American Jewish subject, not only by tackling the Holocaust (for example, in Maus [1986, 1991] by graphic novelist Spiegelman [see LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS]) but also by restoring Jewish textual traditions (religious and secular) that had persisted in writings of Malamud, Singer, and Ozick. Some of these writers came from traditional *Orthodox or near Orthodox Jewish backgrounds; those who did not have undertaken the task of reading extensively in Jewish texts and traditions, which play prominent roles in both the themes and structures of their fictions. Writers who have emerged in the first decade of the twenty-first century for whom Jewish themes are central include Jonathan Safran Foer (b. 1977), Myla Goldberg (b. 1972), Dara Horn (b. 1977), Nicole Kraus (b. 1974), and Tova Mirvis (see also LITERATURE, UNITED STATES: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)).

EMILY BUDICK

Literature, United States: Popular Fiction. Two best-selling middlebrow novels of the 1950s signaled a new turn in Jewish writing within mainstream American literature. Marjorie Morningstar (1955) by Herman Wouk (b. 1915) and Exodus (1958) by Leon Uris (1924–2003) neatly illustrated the three Jewish experiences in the first part of the twentieth century that proved compelling to a mass American readership and exploitable to general publishers: the traumas of the *Holocaust, the struggle for Jewish *national and cultural self-determination, and the social and psychological hardships of acculturation. The success of both novels and of their *film adaptations rested on the ways they reflected and relieved Jewish anxieties about those experiences and satisfied Gentile curiosity about Jewish identity. They cast a long shadow over popular Jewish fiction and inevitably tied that fiction to the social novel, to Hollywood, and to American cultural productions in general. Over the next forty years, however, as writers, publishers, readers, and critics expanded definitions of “popular,” a wider range of narratives developed, and a longer, multinational history of popular Jewish fiction became visible. Like popular fiction in general, this often-denigrated mode of Jewish writing fulfills readers’ desire for instruction about and solutions to the confusions of the modern world and, in the right hands, is capable of an entertaining complexity.

At the beginning of the twentieth century what counted as “popular” Jewish literary work in America, as elsewhere, depended on the tastes and retail demands of an insular but still diverse Jewish readership. A 1906 magazine article on Jewish bookstores of the Lower East Side suggests that *Yiddish stories by Mendele Mokher Seforim (Sholem Abramovich [1835–1917]) and Jacob Dineson (1856–1919), plays by Jacob Gordin (1853–1909), and Yiddish translations of Shakespeare and Tolstoy were commercially fashionable. This reflected the situation of late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century Yiddish literature in both America and *Eastern Europe where the line between the literary and the popular was indistinct and readers were not yet categorized by their reading preferences.

It is not until the post-World War I expansion of publishing and mass-circulated newspapers that definitions of “popular” changed in relation to audience and content. In *Poland the emergence of a vigorous Yiddish tabloid press during the interwar years and its publication of serialized shund novels – “trashy” sensationalist novels written by anonymous hacks and established writers such as Yehoshua Perle (1888–1943), Yisroel Rabon (1900–1943), and Isaac *Bashevis Singer (1904–1991) – led to heated arguments about the dangers of pandering to working- and middle-class readers’ taste for formulaic stories featuring mild eroticism and violence. In the United States, the post-war growth of American and American Jewish publishing, the creation of the influential Book-of-the-Month Club, and the hiring of Jews at mainstream publishing companies shifted the meaning of “popular” in relation to American Jewish writing to connote primarily middlebrow fiction and commensurately wider circulation among both Jewish and non-Jewish readers. Edna Ferber (1887–1968), Ben Hecht (1893–1964), and Irwin Shaw (1913–1984) met great success in this publishing environment.

Whereas Ferber, Hecht, and Shaw typified a new class of popular Jewish writers who wrote on a wide range of general subjects, Milton Steinberg (1903–1950) and Leo Rosten (1908–1997) created a new mode of popular Jewish fiction that defended Jewish particularity against the forces of acculturation. Both wrote commercially successful middlebrow novels during the interwar period. Rosten’s comic novel, *The Education of H*Y*M*A*N K*AP*L*A*N* (1937), dramatizes an immigrant’s attempt to learn the English language and its cultural connotations without the loss of his endearing, positive sense of Jewish self-worth. Steinberg’s historical fiction, As A Driven Leaf (1939), dramatizes the life of *Elisha ben Abuya, the famous heretic of talmudic lore, whose attraction to Hellenistic philosophy reflected the wrangle among Steinberg’s contemporaries between Judaism and secular American life and values. Both novels became staples in Jewish adult education programs, maintaining a kind of popularity even to the present.

The rise of a popular Jewish fiction defined by its appeal to a mass audience, however, is a result of the economic boom following *World War II and the explosion of mass-market publishing. In combination with greater social mobility among Jews, increased leisure time, and a wave of post-war Jewish writing in English that explained or celebrated the passage of Jews and their nostalgia into the American mainstream, mass-market publishing expanded opportunities and audiences for popular fiction, especially genre fiction, patterned on the Wouk and Uris model.

As those two writers continued to mine Jewish history, Chaim Potok (1929–2002) earned national acclaim by revealing the conflicts within and between the *Hasidic and *Modern Orthodox communities in Brooklyn. Novels like The Chosen (1967), The Promise (1969), and My Name is Asher Lev (1972), examine the strains that secular society, *Zionism, liberal Jewish *theology, western philosophy and art, and the Holocaust placed on Jews and Jewish practice in America. That Potok’s social novels prominently feature educational settings – the *synagogue, the library, the *yeshivah, the graduate seminary – helps explain their popularity with general readers who found in them, and in the 1981 film version of The Chosen, compelling explanations of Judaism and Judaic scholarship. At roughly the same time the best-selling detective novels of Harry Kemelman (1908–1996) investigated Jewish acculturation to the middle-class American suburb and rendered it safe for Jewish family and congregational life. Over the course of twelve books from 1964 to 1996, Kemelman's protagonist, Rabbi David Small, defended his congregants and his faith, lecturing throughout on the meaning of Jewish religious practice and cultural mores for the benefit of non-Jews, and on how Jews ought to navigate the social mysteries of America for the benefit of his co-religionists.

Kemelman's work, and the short detective stories of James Yaffe (b. 1927) that appeared in the 1950s and '60s, paved the way for writers as varied as Marissa Piesman (b. 1956), Stuart Kaminsky (b. 1934), Kinky Friedman (b. 1944), Richard Zimler (b. 1956), Sharon Kahn (b. 1934), Ayelet Waldman (b. 1964), David Liss (b. 1966), Faye Kellerman (b. 1952), and Rochelle Krich (b. 1947). Kellerman's Peter Decker and Rina Lazarus mysteries and Krich's Jessica Drake mysteries, in particular, garnered wide readerships by featuring women detectives who inspect and defend Orthodox Judaism as an engine for contemporary American Jewish religious and cultural reawakening. The internationally distributed Israeli mysteries of Batya Gur (1947–2005), published in the United States between 1992 and 2006, also achieved mass-market success. Through Chief Superintendent Michael Ohayon of the *Jerusalem police, Gur conducted philosophical investigations into the frayed social fabric of the Jewish state just when America's political interests seemed to align more sharply with it. A similar dynamic is at work in the Gabriel Allon spy thrillers by Daniel Silva (b. 1960), a series that began with The Kill Artist (2000) and feature a morally conflicted Mossad assassin. These fictions by Kellerman, Krich, Gur, and Silva illustrate how religious revival and the challenges of Jewish national self-determination have eclipsed American Jewish acculturation as subject matter in mass-marketed Jewish mysteries and thrillers.

Popular Jewish fantasy and science fiction, a much smaller and still evolving genre, first reached a wide audience with Wandering Stars: An Anthology of Jewish Fantasy and Science Fiction (1974, 1998). Edited by Jack Dann (b. 1945), it identifies the apparent founders of the genre, writers already famous within science fiction such as Isaac Asimov (1920–1992), Harlan Ellison (b. 1934), William Tenn (Philip Klass [b. 1920]), and Robert Silverberg (b. 1935), all of whose most well-known work has no Jewish content. Their short stories in this collection, however, packaged with Isaac *Bashevis Singer's "Jachid and Jechida" and Bernard Malamud's "Jewbird," established an arguable tradition of speculative Jewish fiction about galactic *Diasporas, the supernatural, persecution, and the search for a Jewish home planet. A second volume, More Wandering Stars (1999), and works by Avram Davidson (1923–1993), Joel Rosenberg (b. 1954), Philip Graubart, Daniel (D. J.) Kessler, and Michael Burstein (b. 1970) carry on these themes of wandering and homecoming. In many ways, Marge Piercy's (b. 1936) speculative futurist novel He, She and It (1991) fits into this category as well.

In contrast, the popular Jewish romance developed energetically through a series of provocative innovations, the first initiated by Belva Plain (b. 1919). Her novel Evergreen (1978), adapted into a TV mini-series in 1985, chronicled the family saga of Polish Jewish immigrant Anna Friedman as she moved from the Lower East Side to arrival in the suburbs; this novel helped cement a now classic narrative of American Jewish social and material success into the popular imagination. By yoking that narrative to the forbidden loves and marital compromises of romance fiction, Plain, along with Gloria Goldreich (b. 1934) and Maisie Mosco (b. 1939?) in *Britain, created a profitable formula for stories that explored a woman's perspective on Jewish family, identity, and desire. Anita Diamant (b. 1951) reshaped the genre still further in her international best seller The Red Tent (1997), which retells the biblical story of *Dinah from Dinah's point of view. The novel incited contentious debate, facilitated by book clubs and reading groups, about the role and contributions of women to Jewish and Christian theology and religiosity. A stream of novels revisiting and refiguring Jewish women in history and within Orthodox communities soon followed, from the historical romances of Maggie Anton (Margaret Antonofsky [b. 1958?]) and Dora Levy Mossanen (b. 1945), to the biblical romances of the Israeli academic Eva Etzioni-Halevy (b. 1934), to the middlebrow love stories of Tova Mirvis (b. 1972) and Naomi Ragen (b. 1949) whose novels have replaced Chaim Potok's as mass-market primers on the esoteric worlds of Modern and Ultra-Orthodoxy (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX entries).

This increasing reciprocity between contemporary popular Jewish fiction and historical or Orthodox subject matter illuminates current literary and social trends. The recent boom in graphic novels (see LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS), for example, brought overdue recognition to the Jewish writer/artists who helped develop the comic book medium and introduced American audiences to Israeli comics artists like Uri Fink (b. 1963) and the Actus Tragicus collective: Mira Friedmann (b. 1952), Yirmi Pinkus (b. 1966), Itzik Rennert (b. 1956), Rutu Modan (b. 1966), and Batia Kolton (b. 1967). Yet the commercial and critical success of Art Spiegelman's Maus (1986, 1991) and the fan-fueled celebrations of Will Eisner (1917–2005) and his portraits of immigrant and first-generation American Jews in A Contract with God (1978) underlined the enduring attraction of woeful Jewish pasts to general audiences and publishers. The Jew of New York (1998) by Ben Katchor (b. 1951), Yossel (2003) by Joe Kubert (b. 1926), and the Jewish graphic novels of James Sturm (b. 1965) and French Jewish writer/artist Joann Sfar (b. 1971) are all mainstream historical fictions about Jewish acculturation or the Holocaust.

Springing up alongside them, however, are comic books by JT Waldman (b. 1979?), Alan Oirich (b. 1957), Robert J. Avrech (b. 1950), and Eric Mahr (1955–2010) aimed at a specifically Jewish mass readership and distributed by Jewish publishers worldwide. They resemble popular Jewish romances in their concern to explain or defend a resurgent Judaism, Jewish religious figures, and Orthodox religious practice as guides for the perplexed. Yet, they are a reminder, too, that formulaic Orthodox fiction – marketed by many of the same publishers and written in English and Hebrew in the United States, United Kingdom, South Africa, and Israel by writers such as Chava Rosenberg, Libby Lazewnik, and Ruthie Pearlman (b. 1949) – is itself a burgeoning literary niche, one inhabited nearly exclusively by Orthodox and Ultra-Orthodox women. The reprinting by a number of these publishers of nineteenth- and twentieth-century middlebrow fiction by Orthodox apologists is also drawing critical attention to earlier popular and middlebrow writers such as Godchaux Weil (1806–1878) in France, Marcus Lehmann (1831–1890) in Germany, Nathan Mayer (1838–1912) in the United States, Alexander Ben Ghat (1860?–1925?) in Turkey, Samuel Gordon (1871–1927) in the United Kingdom, and Mikhoel-Ber Sokolov (1902–1942) in Poland. Whether looking back at such writers or at those just starting out, the popular Jewish fiction they produced furnishes an important commentary on modern Jewish life and literacy.

LAURENCE ROTH

Literature: Women Writers (Europe and North America). Any account of Jewish women's writing in Europe and North America must begin with the work of *Gluckel of Hameln (1646–1724), who, between 1690, when she was first widowed with fourteen children, and 1719, recorded in her *Judeo-German memoir an account of Jewish life in seventeenth-century *Germany that details her family relationships, business dealings, and personal faith. The memoir is intercalated with didactic parables and moral lessons, inspired by the vernacular printed material available to Jewish women of the day. These included books of *customs, *ethical literature, collections of *folktales, paraphrases of the *Torah, and tkhines, devotional literature written for and often by women that provides vernacular prayers for *synagogue worship and *life-cycle and domestic rituals (see PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE).

Jewish women with literary aspirations in early-nineteenth-century *England, *France, *Germany, and the *United States confronted fictional stereotypes of themselves as “Jessicas” (Shylock's daughter in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice) who convert and marry Christians or as stalwart “Rebeccas” (the heroine of Walter Scott's Ivanhoe [1820]), who renounce romantic love for a Christian in favor of loyalty to their own heritage. One of the most influential answers to such depictions was the historical romance The Vale of Cedars, or The Martyr (1850) by Grace Aguilar (1816–1847). Aguilar, whose heritage was *Sephardic, was a staunch defender of Judaism; her theological and historical writings, such as The Spirit of Judaism (1842) and The Women of Israel (1845), were widely read and were influential for Jewish reform movements in England and in the United States. One enthusiast was Rebecca *Gratz, founder of the American Jewish Sunday School movement.

The first published collection of poems by a Jewish woman in the United States was Fancy's Sketch Book (1833) by Penina Moïse (1797–1880). Like Aguilar, she published in both Jewish and secular periodicals, also focusing on Jewish ritual reform, Jewish rights, assimilation, and resisting conversion. Emma *Lazarus (1849–1887), whose poem “The New Colossus” is inscribed on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty, was a prolific essayist on a range of topics of public and Jewish interest.

Eugénie Foa (1796–??), a French writer of Sephardic background, began her career as a novelist with La Juive (The Jewess; 1835), a historical romance about a Jewish woman who renounces her Christian lover. The novel includes descriptions of “exotic” Jewish rituals and was clearly targeted at the same non-Jewish audience fascinated by a contemporaneous opera of the same title by Jacques Fromental Halévy and Eugène Scribe. Aguilar and Foa also produced fictions depicting contemporary Jewish communities in England and France, respectively. “Rachel, or The Inheritance,” Foa's opening story in a collection entitled Rachel (1833), purports to be the posthumously discovered memoirs of a Jewish woman writer who, after refusing marriage to her Christian lover, is abandoned by her Jewish husband (as was the case with Foa). Aguilar's novella, The Perez Family (1843), similarly addresses the issue of *intermarriage by depicting a failed marriage between a Jewish man and Christian woman.

In 1833 Germany, the letters of Rahel Levin Varnhagen (1771–1832), a well-known Jewish salon hostess and avid correspondent, were posthumously published as Rahel: Ein Buch des Andenkens für ihre Freunde (Rahel: A Remembrance Book for Her Friends). Varnhagen was part of a group of “Jewish” salon hostesses including Moses *Mendelssohn's daughter, Brendel, who became the translator and writer Dorothea Schlegel, most of whom ultimately converted and intermarried. The “Jessica” theme of conversion and intermarriage continued to do battle with the “Rebecca” model of dutiful renunciation and spinsterhood throughout nineteenth-century literature by Jewish women. Later examples include Jenny (1843) by Fanny Lewald (1811–1889) in Germany; Reuben Sachs (1889) by Amy Levy (1861–1889) in England; and Other Things Being Equal (1892) by Emma Wolf (1865–1932) of San Francisco.

The close of the nineteenth century brought waves of immigrants from Eastern Europe to Western Europe and North America. Some of these women immigrants wrote in *Yiddish; others began writing in Russian or Polish, but subsequently switched to Yiddish or English. Many of their writings have been translated for the first time in the groundbreaking collections, Found Treasures (1994) and Arguing with the Storm (2007). Two immigrant writers who wrote successfully in English are Mary Antin (1881–1949) who published her autobiography, The Promised Land, about her 1912 journey from Poland to the United States. Anzia Yezierska (1885?–1970), whose most famous novel is The Bread Givers (1925), also collaborated on film versions of her stories and books.

In the twentieth century increasing numbers of American Jewish women writers have appealed to wider audiences by addressing both specifically Jewish and universal themes. Tillie Olsen (1913–2007), Grace Paley (1922–2007), and Cynthia Ozick (b. 1928) all achieved widespread critical acclaim and popularity among general audiences primarily for their short stories or, in Ozick's case, also for her many novels and literary essays. Jo Sinclair (Ruth Seid [1913–1995]), whose novel Wasteland (1946) treats Jewish self-hatred and features a Jewish lesbian character and whose The Changelings (1955) deals with tensions between Jewish and *African American communities in the Midwest, merits mention with Olsen and Paley because all three focused on issues of social identity and difference in the mid-twentieth-century American setting.

Joanne Greenberg (b. 1932), a prolific novelist who is best known for I Never Promised You a Rose Garden (1964; written under the pseudonym Hannah Green), about a young Jewish woman's mental breakdown and successful recovery, has addressed similar themes of otherness and disability. (Her other works with Jewish themes and/or characters include The King's Persons [1963], about the massacre of the Jewish population of York in 1190; A Season of Delight [1981]; Age of Consent [1989]; and Miri, Who Charms [2009]). Greenberg's notable contemporary is Lynne Sharon Schwartz (b. 1939); her astonishing vision of growing up in McCarthy-era New York is a feature of Leaving Brooklyn (1989), about a girl with one blind eye.

In recent decades, American Jewish women writers who have achieved general acclaim include award-winning poets such as Muriel Rukeyser (1913–1980), Maxine Kumin (b. 1925), Adrienne Rich (b. 1929), Marge Piercy (b. 1936, also a prolific novelist), Irena Klepfisz (b. 1941), and Louise Glück (b. 1943), and notable playwrights Wendy Wasserstein (1950–2006) and Joan Schenkar (b. 1951). Jewish women's contributions to contemporary fiction are particularly notable. The Mind-Body Problem (1983) by Rebecca Goldstein (b. 1950) focuses on an Orthodox girl's sexual and intellectual liberation. This book grew out of its historical context, cross-fertilized by writers such as Erica Jong and Betty Friedan, as well as, perhaps, Chaim Potok's The Chosen (1967). It helped found a still burgeoning subgenre of women's *Orthodox (or renounced Orthodox) novels by authors such as Pearl Abraham, Allegra Goodman (b. 1967), Ruchama King, Tova Mirvis, and Risa Miller.

Goldstein's more technically sophisticated work, Mazel (1995), harks back to the familiar family saga, found in precursors like British writer G. B. Stern's (1890–1973) The Matriarch (1924; originally published as Tents of Israel in Britain). Following in those generic footsteps are Canadian writer and poet Anne Michaels (b. 1958; Fugitive Pieces [1996]), British author Tamar Yellin (The Genizah at the House of Shepherd [2005]), and American Dara Horn (In the Image [2002]; The World to Come [2006]; All Other Nights [2009]). In The Red Tent (1997), Anita Diamant combines deeply researched historical fiction and a feminist reimagining of early Jewish women's lives in a popular revision of the biblical story of *Jacob's daughter *Dinah, beginning a trend in feminist historical fiction. For example, Eva Etzioni-Halevy (b. 1939), an Israeli author who publishes in English, is the author of the biblical romances The Song of Hannah (2005), The Garden of Ruth (2006), and The Triumph of Deborah (2008). The best of these historical fictions imagine the lives of women in historical eras for which there are few firsthand accounts of women's lives and thoughts. Maggie Anton self-published now-acclaimed trilogy called Rashi's Daughters (2005, 2007, 2009), exploring the lives of the three daughters of *Rashi, the renowned biblical and talmudic commentator who lived in twelfth-century France. Canadian author Lilian Nattel (b. 1956) explores the intertwined lives of the male and female dwellers in a fictional shtetl in 1880s *Poland in The River Midnight (1999) and in the Jewish immigrant underbelly of London in The Singing Fire (2004). British writer Linda Grant (b. 1951) offers the perspective of a Jewish immigrant from England and of Zionist rebels in British Mandate Palestine in When I Lived in Modern Times (2000). The Family Orchard (2000) by Nomi Eve (b. 1968) is a six-generation family saga that begins in Palestine in 1837.

Female authors from more recent Jewish immigrations to the United States include Gina Nahai, whose novels, The Cry of the Peacock (1992), Moonlight on the Avenue of Faith (1999), and Caspian Rain (2007), are about Jewish communities in Iran and Iranian Jewish communities in the Diaspora; Ruth Knafo Setton, whose novel The Road to Fez (2001) is about Jewish Morocco; and Lara Vapnyar (b. 1971), who has written a short-story collection about Soviet Jewry, There Are Jews in My House (2002).

Memoirs, especially of the Holocaust, by Jewish women are numerous; some noteworthy European examples that appear in English include German Swedish Cordelia Edvardson's (b. 1929) Burned Child Seeks the Fire (1997); Hungarian American Magda Denes' (1934–1996) Castles Burning (1998); and Polish Italian Edith Brück's (b. 1932) Letter to My Mother (2006). Some North American Jewish women have chosen the lives of women during and after the Holocaust as a subject for fiction; for example, Anyia (1974) by Susan Fromberg Schaeffer (b. 1941) and Cynthia Ozick's The Shawl: A Story and a Novella (1989). Depictions of Holocaust survivors and their children also appear in Anne Michaels' Fugitive Pieces (discussed earlier); Shira Nayman's Awake in the Dark: Stories (2006); and the autobiographical fiction cycle, The Holocaust Kid (2001), by Sonia Pilcer, who was born in a *displaced persons camp. Other authors who deal with the special trauma of survivors' children include Elisabeth Rosner (The Speed of Light [2001] and Blue Nude [2003]) and Linda Grant (The Clothes on their Backs [2008]). Pushing the very limits of what can be written about the Holocaust are Holocaust memoirs as graphic novels (after Art Spiegelman's Maus) and Holocaust satires. In the former group, there are We Are On Our Own (2006) by Miriam Katin (b. 1942) and I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors (2006) by Bernice Eisenstein (b. 1949). In the latter, there are My Holocaust (2007) by Tova Reich, The Empress of Weehawken (2007) by Irene Dische (b. 1952), and "The Living," from the short-story collection How is This Night Different? (2006) by Elisa Albert.

Finally, samples of Jewish women's writing in English and in translation from Europe and elsewhere can be found in anthologies published by University of Nebraska Press in the series on Contemporary Jewish Writing; one should also note the critical works, Keepers of the Motherland: German Texts by Jewish Women Writers (1994), by Dagmar Lorenz; Voices of the Diaspora: Jewish Women Writing in Contemporary Europe (2006), an anthology edited by Thomas Nolden and Frances Malino; and Contemporary Jewish Writing in Europe: A Guide (2008) by Vivian Liska and Thomas Nolden. The last work includes a helpful double bibliography offering critical information and highlighting which authors' works are currently available in English translation.

For further reading, see E. Avery, ed., Modern Jewish Women Writers in America (2007); J. Burstein, Telling Little Secrets: American Jewish Writing since the 1980s (2006); T. Nolden, In Lieu of Memory: Contemporary Jewish Writing in France (2006); C. Tylee, ed., "In the Open": Jewish Women Writers and British Culture (2006); A. F. Roller, The Literary Imagination of Ultra-Orthodox Jewish Women (1999); and A. Shapiro, ed., American Jewish Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical and Critical Sourcebook (1994).

JUDITH LEWIN

Literature, Yiddish: Beginnings to 1700. Yiddish developed as Jews moved into German-speaking territories in the course of the late first millennium CE and adapted the local language, as Jews had done in earlier migrations. Yiddish thus became the vernacular of *Ashkenaz and ultimately also a literary language that complemented *Hebrew literature over the course of a millennium. By the late Middle Ages, Yiddish literature spanned the same range of genres as did other European vernaculars of the period. Although a myth has grown over the centuries that Yiddish is “women’s literature,” because women rarely learned Hebrew, few of the genres discussed in this entry are inherently gender specific. In addition, there is clear evidence that the functional audience for early Yiddish literature comprised all of Yiddish-speaking Jewry, including the educated men who generally wrote, edited, published, distributed, sold, and indeed also bought and read early Yiddish books.

The earliest textual evidence of Yiddish appears in some thirty Yiddish glosses in *Rashi’s *Bible and Talmud commentaries (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARIES), demonstrating the use of the language by Rashi (who had studied in the Rhineland) and his students. As the religious glossing tradition developed, so did *Bible translation, from fifteenth-century literal translations for students of Hebrew to seventeenth-century idiomatic versions for Yiddish readers. The Tzene-rene (Go Forth and Behold [Hanau, 1622]), a biblical paraphrase with traditional commentary, is the most influential book in the history of Yiddish and indeed Ashkenazic culture. It functioned as the Bible for male and female readers with little or no knowledge of Hebrew, appearing in more than two hundred editions over the course of four centuries. Beyond translation, poetic adaptations of biblical narratives and midrashim* developed early in Yiddish, including dozens of texts from the earliest Yiddish anthology (Cairo *Genizah codex, 1382) to Moshe Esrim ve-Arba’s Shmuel-bukh (Book of Samuel [Augsburg, 1544]), the great masterpiece of the tradition, combining both Jewish sacred and Germanic heroic traditions.

Although liturgy (see WORSHIP) remained strictly the domain of *Hebrew-*Aramaic, translations of the *prayer book appeared by the fifteenth century, making it comprehensible to those who knew little Hebrew. Yiddish also fulfilled important liturgical functions in domestic ritual: Bilingual *Passover hymns had appeared by the fifteenth century, and there were also many collections of tikhines (supplications) and slikhes (penitentials), the most important domains of Yiddish prayer. Similarly, although traditional legal textuality (halakhah*), like liturgy, remained staunchly Hebrew-Aramaic, Yiddish frequently appears as quoted testimony in rabbinical responses to legal queries (see RESPONSA).

Among the most important and statistically most widespread genres in Ashkenaz were writings that taught proper conduct according to locally defined usage, minhogim (Hebrew, minhagim; see CUSTOM), through books of customs and literature emphasizing proper morals and ethical behavior. Such muser (Hebrew, musar*) writings, characterized by illustrative narratives, parables, and legends, include Isaac b. Eliakim of Posen’s Seyfer lev tov (Book of the Good Heart) published in *Prague in 1620.

Because of its obvious Christian origin, it is quite remarkable to find the secular epic or romance among popular early Yiddish genres. Dukus Horant (Duke Horant [1382]), for example, narrates a typical royal bridal quest, whereas the fifteenth-century Vidvilt (As You Wish) is an Arthurian romance concerning Sir Gawain and his son; both are from German sources. The masterpieces of the genre are Elye Bokher (Elijah) Levita’s rather conventional Bovo d’Antona (Bovo of Antona [1507]); and the consummate renaissance epic Pariz un Viene (Paris and Vienna [Verona, 1594]). These last two works are derived from Italian sources.

Although most narrative prose in Yiddish was translated from Hebrew, such as the popular quasi-historical Yousiften (*Josippon [Zurich, 1546]), there were also genuine original masterpieces among Yiddish compositions, such as the Maase Briyo ve-Zimro (Tale of Briyo and Zimro [ms., 1585]), a thriller of international intrigue and star-crossed lovers. The moral tale/ fable appeared in many forms, from an early lion fable (1382), to the often risqué Ki-bukh (Book of Cows [Verona, 1595]), to the masterful Maase-Bukh (Book of Tales [Basel, 1602]). An adaptive compilation of traditional Jewish and secular folktale sources and the period’s most influential collection of tales, the Maase-Bukh was designed as a vernacular aggadah* to teach ethical principles through pious exempla. The work by Glikl bas Leyb Pinkerle (*Glückel of Hameln; written 1691–1719) combines aspects of muser, minhogim, maase, historiography, and *memoir, giving profound insight into the period through the eyes of an intelligent and capable businesswoman. Additionally in prose there were treatises on hygiene, geography, accounting, mathematics, and medical practice (including magical charms and potions). The first Yiddish proto-newspaper Dinstagishe-Fraytagishe Kurantn (Tuesday-Friday Courier) appeared in 1686–87 in *Amsterdam, reporting on international events.

Jewish *theater arose from the holiday performance of purimshpiln. Although there is evidence for their prior existence, the earliest complete *Purim play extant is an Akhashveyresh-shpil (Ahasuerus-play [1697]), a bawdy burlesque based on the *Esther story. In the ensuing decades, Purim plays became sophisticated baroque dramas with orchestral accompaniment, branching out to include other biblical subjects. Yiddish drama did not venture beyond purimshpiln until the Haskalah* period, beginning in the eighteenth century.

Although early Yiddish literature did not possess a well-defined lyric genre, many lyric modes are present, the earliest of which is a rhymed blessing in the Worms Maḥzor (1272), followed by the aforementioned Passover hymns; rhymed penitential prayers, including *Torah songs (some composed by women); reflective philosophical poems such as Isaac Wallich’s memento mori poem (ca. 1700); playful philosophical disputations, such as Zalmen Soyfer’s debate between wine and water (1516); and biting Venetian satire, such as Elia Levita’s “Ha-mavdil lid” (Ha-Mavdil Song [1514]), a drinking song of yeshivah* students (“Pumay” [Whoopie], ca. 1600), and a brief and hauntingly lyrical fourteenth- or fifteenth-century love song written on the fly-leaf of a Rashi manuscript (“Vu zol ikh hin?” [Where Should I Go?]).

Like other European literatures of the period, Yiddish also possessed historical narrative in poetic form, often commemorating recent events that affected the Jewish community, such as Elkhonon Hellen’s Megilas Vints (Scroll of Vincent), on the Fettmilch insurrection in Frankfurt am Main in 1614–16 (Amsterdam, 1648); Joseph ben Eliezer Lipman Ashkenazi’s Kino al gezeyrous ha-kehilous de’k’k Ukraine (Lament on the Destruction of the Ukrainian Communities [Prague, 1648]) on the *Chmelnitzki massacres; and Jacob Tausk’s (Tausig) Eyn sheyn nay lid fun meshiekh (A Fine New Song about the Messiah [Amsterdam, 1666]), which expresses a pious believer’s joy at *Shabbatai Zevi’s supposed fulfillment of messianic prophecy. For further reading, see J. C. Frakes, ed., Early Yiddish Texts, 1100–1750 (2004); and J. Baumgarten, Introduction to Old Yiddish Literature, rev. ed. (2005).

JEROLD C. FRAKES

Literature, Yiddish: 1800 to Twenty-First Century. Yiddish literature helped shape both the traditional culture and the gradual modernization of the Jews. Although some adherents of the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah*) opposed the use of Yiddish, Yiddish authors contributed to education and secularization in several important ways. During the short period between 1860 and 1940, Yiddish literature recapitulated many aspects of European literary history and, at the same time, introduced Eastern European Jews to the modern world. Before its abrupt decline in the 1940s and 1950s, Yiddish was an influential medium of political and cultural activity.

Some of the earliest modern Yiddish writing arose among the Hasidim* and their antagonists, the mitnaggedim*. Two forms of Hasidic writing made an especially deep impression: orally transmitted tales about Hasidic leaders, such as the Baal Shem Tov*, and stories told by the leaders themselves. The hagiographic collection Shivhei ha-Besht (In Praise of the Baal Shem Tov) appeared in Hebrew in 1815 and was soon followed by several popular Yiddish editions. In a very different mode, Nathan Sternharz published fantasy tales by his Hasidic master, R. Nahman* of Bratslav. When Nahman's Sippurei ma'asiyot was published in a bilingual Hebrew-Yiddish edition in 1815, it provided an important precedent for future Yiddish writing.

Other significant early-nineteenth-century Yiddish narratives, based on the writings of the German author J. H. Campe (d. 1818), were published by Haikl Hurwitz of Uman and by Mendel Lefin of Satanov. In 1817 Hurwitz, an enlightened acquaintance of Nahman of Bratslav and Nathan Sternharz, published a Yiddish translation of Campe's Die Entdeckung von Amerika (The Discovery of America). Lefin translated several of Campe's narratives of sea adventure, including a bilingual edition of Onia so'ara (Raging Ship; ca. 1815–20) in Hebrew and Yiddish. Influenced by the German Bible translations and commentaries of Moses Mendelssohn* and his followers, Lefin also translated the biblical book of Proverbs* into Yiddish (Sefer mishlei Shlomo; 1814); in so doing, he showed the inadequacy of the outmoded Tsenerene. In Tarnopol, Joseph Perl (1773–1839) founded a modern Jewish school and wrote powerful parodies of Hasidic writing in several Hebrew and Yiddish works. Most of his Yiddish writings were not published until the twentieth century, however, and his Yiddish translation of Fielding's Tom Jones remains in an unpublished manuscript. Although Perl was not known for his Yiddish texts and did not overtly contribute to the evolution of Yiddish style, his parodic Hebrew writing introduced an effective Yiddish-inflected Hebrew that, by caricaturing the Hebrew of Hasidic authors, surpassed the prevailing neobiblical style called melitza.

The beginnings of modern Yiddish fiction are usually traced to the Yiddish newspaper Kol mevasser (1862–73), a supplement to the Odessa-based Hebrew newspaper Ha-Melitz (see JOURNALISM: YIDDISH [EASTERN EUROPE]). In Kol mevasser of 1864–65, S. Y. Abramovich serialized his first Yiddish novel, The Little Man, creating his folksy persona Mendele Mokher Seforim (Mendele the Bookseller; 1836–1917); the next year he printed The Wishing-Ring (first version, 1865). Previously known only as a young Hebrew-language essayist who had also written a Hebrew novella, Abramovich showed that it was possible to write serious and original fiction in Yiddish. In the subsequent decade he broke new ground with three seminal Yiddish novels: Fishke the Lame (first version, 1869), The Nag (1873), and The Brief Travels of Benjamin the Third (1878). In the spirit of Enlightenment literature, Abramovich used biting satire to attack the foibles of Jews (as well as Russians and Ukrainians, to a lesser extent) in the small towns of Eastern Europe*. After 1886 Abramovich revised and expanded his early fiction, sometimes dulling the satiric barbs, while making extensive contributions to Hebrew literature. H. N. Bialik*, who helped translate Fishke the Lame into Hebrew around 1900, proclaimed Abramovich “the creator of the nusah,” the dominant style in the Hebrew* revival at the end of the nineteenth century.

Sholem Aleichem (the pen name of Solomon Rabinovitch; 1859–1916) was a self-proclaimed successor to S. Y. Abramovich, whom he dubbed “the grandfather.” Sholem Aleichem began publishing stories and novels in Hebrew and Yiddish in the 1880s, and he strove to raise the general level of Yiddish writing by editing two volumes of The Jewish Popular Library (1888–89). He solicited Yiddish prose and poetry from the best living authors, including Abramovich, and he persuaded other Hebrew writers to try their hands at Yiddish.

In a mock trial of N. M. Shaykevitch called Shomer's Trial (1888), Sholem Aleichem attacked that author's trashy Yiddish works, which were then circulating widely. Among other criticisms, Sholem Aleichem accused Shomer of stealing his plots from contemporary French novels that were ill-suited to Yiddish readers. In his own fiction, by contrast, Sholem Aleichem proved that it was possible to write Jewish novels that were not simply derivative of prior European authors. With his books Stempeniu and Yosele the Nightingale (1888–89), about a Jewish violinist and a Jewish singer, respectively, Sholem Aleichem presented a distinctive Jewish perspective in tsarist Russia* and provided a new impetus for Yiddish writing.

During his remarkably prolific career, Sholem Aleichem's greatest literary accomplishment may have been his creation and perfection of the genre of the oral-style Yiddish monologue. In dozens of original short stories written early in the twentieth century and later collected in the volumes Monologues and Railroad Stories, he showed that Yiddish was ideally suited to representing the diversity of male and female Jewish voices. His best-known creation is Tevye the Dairyman, a loquacious monologist who recounts sad episodes from his family life in a sequence of stories written between 1894 and 1916. Centering on Tevye's daughters' rebellion against his authority and the tradition of arranged marriages*, these tales aptly represent the decline of the traditional Jewish world and the rise of Jewish assimilation into western societies. Sholem Aleichem was the most popular Yiddish author in his own time, and he became a household name around the world after the appearance of the Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof (1964) and its Hollywood film version (1971), based on his Tevye stories (see FILM, THEATER: UNITED STATES).

A contemporary rival of Sholem Aleichem was I. L. Peretz (1852–1915), the third “classic Yiddish author.” Although he started writing in Hebrew during the 1870s, in 1888 he responded to Sholem Aleichem’s call for submissions to The Jewish Popular Library and produced the ballad “Mon-ish.” Based in *Warsaw from 1889 until his death in 1915, Peretz excelled as a short-story writer in Yiddish and Hebrew. Unlike Abramovich and Sholem Aleichem, who were essentially nineteenth-century realist authors, Peretz was a Modernist who wrote for a somewhat more educated readership. He was influenced by contemporary Polish authors and in “Der meshugener batlen” (The Mad Talmudist; 1890) and “The Messenger,” he experimented with the avant-garde literary forms of internal monologue and stream of consciousness.

Peretz influenced the neoromantic trend in modern Jewish culture by using Ḥasidic elements in a sequence of Yiddish and Hebrew stories published from 1889 to 1902. Although he initially had satiric intentions, gradually Peretz came to believe that the artistic revival of Ḥasidic traditions could help revive modern Jewish life. Even Martin *Buber was influenced by Peretz’s neo-Ḥasidic stories, which led to his retellings of Ḥasidic tales in German from 1905 to 1908. The texts by Peretz and Buber introduced many western readers to the Ḥasidic world, albeit in portrayals that were sometimes distorted by sentimentalism. Toward the end of his life, striving to help rebuild traditional Jewish culture, Peretz turned to the popular genre of *folktales.

S. Ansky (also An-ski) the pseudonym of Solomon Rapoport (1863–1920), was an ethnographer and friend of I. L. Peretz. He extended the neoromantic movement into Yiddish theater with his play The Dybbuk (1916; first performed in 1919). Although the play was originally written in Russian for Stanislavski’s Moscow Art Theater, it was subsequently translated into Hebrew by H. N. *Bialik and then into Yiddish by Ansky. The Dybbuk, which is infused with materials from Ḥasidic circles and from the author’s ethnographic expeditions, quickly became a standard work in the repertoire of Yiddish and Hebrew theater troupes (see also DYBBUK).

Dovid Bergelson (1884–1952) was arguably the greatest twentieth-century Yiddish novelist. Living mainly in Kiev, he wrote a sequence of landmark novels that are at the aesthetic level of works by other leading European Modernists. Particularly memorable are his novels, Arum vokzal (At the Depot; 1909) and Descent, Opgang (Departing; 1920), and the novella In a fargrehter shtet (In a Backwoods Town; 1914). Bergelson’s fiction is an outstanding instance of modernistic style, using dream sequences, internal monologues, nonlinear plots, and shifting narrative perspectives. At odds with more nostalgic portrayals, Bergelson conveys the gloom of the decaying *shtetl and suggests that, decades before the *Holocaust, the small Jewish towns of Eastern Europe were already doomed.

Lamed (Levi Joshua) Shapiro (1878–1948) was a fine prose stylist who described the final years of traditional European Jewish *yeshivah life in “Eating Days” and wrote searing portrayals of *antisemitism and *pogroms in stories like “White Challah” and “The Cross.” Sholem Asch (1880–1957), like many other young Yiddish authors, was encouraged by I. L. Peretz in *Warsaw. In 1904, his portrayal of Jewish life in “The Shtetl” met with success. Asch achieved notoriety when his play God of Vengeance (1907), set in a brothel, was performed, and his works were translated into Russian, Polish, German, and French. During World War II, he became the object of bitter criticism when he began publishing novels on Christian themes.

American Jewish writing had its origins in Yiddish works and in implicit translations from Yiddish. In the twentieth century Polish-born American Jews such as Yankev Glatshetyn (Jacob Glatstein; 1896–1971), A. Leyeles (Aaron Glanz; 1889–1966), and Y. L. Teller helped created modernistic Yiddish poetry. They called themselves “Introspectivists” (Inzikhistn) and wrote many memorable verses from 1919 until most of their prospective audience was eliminated by the *Nazi genocide, American assimilation, and Soviet repression. Other American Jewish authors such as Mary Antin (1881–1949) and Anzia Yezierska (ca. 1885–1970) explicitly or implicitly translated their earliest English works from Yiddish. The Yiddishized grammar of Yezierska’s characters echoes in Henry Roth’s (1905–1995) Call It Sleep (1934), Bernard Malamud’s (1914–1986) The Magic Barrel (1958), and Grace Paley’s “Goodbye and Good Luck” (in The Little Disturbances of Man, 1959; see LITERATURE: UNITED STATES; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS [EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA]).

Women writers have written many striking Yiddish poems and stories that express a distinctive perspective. For instance, Anna Margolin (pseudonym of Rosa Lebensboym, 1887–1952) was associated with the Introspectivists in New York and wrote beautiful lyrical poems such as “Slender Ships.” Celia Dropkin (1888–1956) wrote poems and stories (e.g., “The Dancer”) that were printed in leading publications. Kadya Molodowsky (1894–1975) published her first poetry under the influence of Dovid Bergelson and his circle (see POETRY, YIDDISH). Many other noteworthy Yiddish works by women authors, such as Fradel Shtok (1888–1952), Rachel Korn (1898–1982), Blume Lempel (1907–1999), Chava Rosenfarb (1923–2011), and Yente Serdatsky (1877–1962), are included in the volume Found Treasures. Irene Klepfisz (b. 1941) has achieved recognition for her innovative efforts to write poems on the border between English and Yiddish (A Few Words in the Mother Tongue [1991]).

Although the *Yishuv (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: Yishuv) and Israel fostered Hebrew as the national language and did little to support Yiddish writing, a number of writers were active there in the twentieth century. Leading authors were Avraham Sutzkever (1913–2010), Leyb Rokhman (1918–1978), and Tsvi Kanar (1929–2009), notable for their Holocaust poetry and prose; Yosl Birshteyn (1920–2003), a humoristic author of The Collector; and the poets Rikuda Potash (1906–1965) and Lev Berinsky (b. ca. 1948).

In 1978 I. B. Singer (1904–1991), younger brother of the writer I. J. Singer (1893–1944), became the only Yiddish author to receive a Nobel Prize for Literature. After moving from Warsaw to *New York City in 1935, Singer began publishing widely in American Yiddish newspapers (see JOURNALISM: YIDDISH [NORTH AMERICA]). His breakthrough into English came when the story “Gimpel the Fool” was published in an outstanding translation by Saul Bellow and reprinted in the short-story collection, Gimpel the Fool (1957). Cynthia Ozick unforgettably satirized Singer’s milieu of aging New York Yiddish writers in her story, “Envy; or, Yiddish in America.” With a thematic emphasis on sex and demons, Singer appealed to Americans’ interest in what was perceived as an exotic foreign culture. Several of his works have been adapted to the stage and screen.

Since the Nazi genocide destroyed all of the European centers of Yiddish culture, the number of native speakers of Yiddish has dwindled, except among some *Hasidic communities. These Ultra-Orthodox (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX) Jews seldom participate in secular literary culture, however, and they have produced few readers and writers of Yiddish literature. Nevertheless, a devoted group of secular Yiddishists continues to read, write, and speak about Yiddish literature. Courses on Yiddish language and literature are being taught at many universities around the world, and academic research is thriving. While Hebrew has been transformed from an ancient language into a language of everyday Israeli life, Yiddish literature is gradually being transformed from a part of Jewish popular culture into a classical literature (see also MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; POETRY, YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH).

Among recent translations are K. Frieden, ed., Classic Yiddish Stories of S. Y. Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and I. L. Peretz (2004); F. Forman et al., eds., Found Treasures: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers (1994); J. Neugroschel, ed., No Star Too Beautiful: A Treasury of Yiddish Stories (2004); R. Wisse, ed., The I. L. Peretz Reader (1990); L. Shapiro, ed., The Cross and Other Jewish Stories (2007); Sholem Aleichem, Tevye the Dairyman and the Railroad Stories, ed. Hillel Halkin (1987); and I. Howe and E. Greenberg, eds., A Treasury of Yiddish Stories, 2nd ed. (1990). Critical studies include K. Frieden, Classic Yiddish Fiction: Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and Peretz (1995); B. Harshav, The Meaning of Yiddish (1990); D. Miron, A Traveler Disguised: The Rise of Modern Yiddish Fiction in the Nineteenth Century, 2nd ed. (1996); idem, The Image of the Shtetl and Other Studies of Modern Jewish Literary Imagination (2000); N. Seidman, A Marriage Made in Heaven: The Sexual Politics of Hebrew and Yiddish (1997); and R. Wisse, I. L. Peretz and the Making of Modern Jewish Culture (1991).

KEN FRIEDEN

Literature, Yiddish: The Yishuv. Until the early twentieth century Yiddish literature in *Palestine was confined to religious works; in the 1920s, however, increasing numbers of immigrants from *Eastern Europe caused a major shift. Although Zionist ideology proscribed Yiddish and its culture as epitomizing exilic existence, Yiddish writers who had been active in Europe continued writing in the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine – both for immigrants eager for materials in their native language and for a worldwide Yiddish audience. Some of these writers, many of whom followed Modernist trends, expressed views of Palestinian life that diverged from the Zionist mainstream ideal, perhaps empowered by writing in the forbidden language.

Between 1928 and 1946, the Yiddish Writers’ and Journalists’ Club in Palestine published twenty-six literary magazines featuring fiction, poetry, cultural criticism, and reviews. There is no information about the distribution of these magazines, yet their continued appearance is indicative of an ongoing demand. Numerous collections of locally written poetry and prose also appeared, both in Palestine and elsewhere. Because the Palestinian Yiddish writers were intimately connected with the European Yiddish culture of their native lands, the *Holocaust and its effects became an increasing theme in their work as information about its scope emerged.

Prose writers include Zalmen Brokhes (1886–1977), who published stories of Palestinian life starting in 1910, as well as two collections of prose (1918, 1937). Implicit criticism of Zionist ideology underlies much of Brokhes’ fiction, which often deals with the complex emotional dilemmas of rootless characters unaffiliated with any ideology who have come to their traditional homeland, yet feel estranged from it and from fellow Jews. Some of his stories are nuanced by an idealized orientalism, as they address problematics of identity; thus, Jewish characters admire those who have assimilated into the native Arab population and are hardly recognizable as Jews. The work of Avrom Rivess (1900–1963) appeared in most of the Yiddish magazines and was partly collected in a 1947 volume. Rivess deployed Expressionist techniques in his reevaluations of the idealized paradigm of the Zionist pioneer. Although a socialist like most other contemporaneous Palestinian Zionist writers, he lived in the developing city of *Tel Aviv and was concerned with urban issues. The Jewish characters whom Rivess describes struggle with themselves and the alien landscape, expressing doubt and dissatisfaction with the realization of the Zionist ideal. He also presents an unusual perspective on the Zionist project through the eyes of non-Jewish characters, such as a native Arab and an antisemitic Pole. Samuel Izban (1905–1995), who lived in Palestine between 1920 and 1938, published two volumes of Palestinian stories (1936, 1942). He depicted the effects of modernization on Palestinian Jews and on Jewish experiences in different areas of Palestine during the violent period of the Arab revolt (1936–39). Among his topics are the manifestations of middle-class European life that immigrants transplanted to Tel Aviv, the unique culture of Jewish minorities from Arabic-speaking countries, and the tiny group of *Karaites in the Old City of *Jerusalem.

Most Yiddish poets active in Palestine expressed the mainstream socialist *Zionism ideology, although some were preoccupied with private issues. The most prominent was Aryeh Shamri (1907–1978), whose pre-1948 poetry expresses the inner conflicts experienced by many young Zionists who left their homes in Europe while also extolling the virtues and joys of *kibbutz life. Shamri published two volumes of poems before 1948 and edited collections of Yiddish writing. His major work, the long narrative poem “Leyzer Tsipress” (1936), charts the progress of a young pioneer who finds solace for his homesickness in the creation of a new kibbutz. The prolific poet Yosef Papiernikov (1899–1993), who published six collections of poetry between 1927 and 1947, wrote lyrical and political poetry anchored in Zionist idealism. Starting in 1937, his work addressed the rise of *Nazism and the Holocaust, linking the tragic events in Europe with the young Zionists who had left their families behind to create a new homeland. The poet and prose writer Rikuda Potash (1906–1965), author of two volumes of poetry (1951, 1960), began publishing in *Poland and continued to write Yiddish poetry and short prose in Palestine. Her idiosyncratic poetry is highly lyrical and incorporates ancient and modern Middle Eastern and European themes, combining allusions to prehistoric cave art with references to Modernist painters such as Marc Chagall and Chaim Soutine (see ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY). Her poems offer biblical rereadings that foreground characters that the *Bible portrays as minor or negative. Her work, like that of the other Yiddish writers in Palestine, offers a range of perspectives on the evolving Zionist community and the transplantation and transformation of Eastern European Jewish culture (see POETRY, YIDDISH).

For further reading, see Y. Chaver, What Must Be Forgotten: The Survival of Yiddish in Zionist Palestine (2004); and N. Seidman, A Marriage Made in Heaven: The Sexual Politics of Hebrew and Yiddish (1997); see also LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM 1800.

Yael Chaver

Lithuania: See BALTIC STATES; POLAND; COUNCIL OF FOUR LANDS AND COUNCIL OF LITHUANIA

Liturgy: See PRAYER; WORSHIP

Los Angeles, on the southern California coast, is home to the second largest Jewish population in the *United States after *New York City. Spread over a large metropolitan area, Los Angeles originated as a small satellite of Gold Rush *San Francisco. In the city's early decades, Jews, mainly from *Central Europe, along with native-born *Sephardim, helped establish urban life as merchants, bankers, and civic leaders; Emil Harris served as the city's police chief in the late 1870s. Families observed the *Sabbath and *festivals in their homes and formed associations. The Hebrew Benevolent Society, founded in 1854, established a cemetery and a traditional congregation. Using funds largely raised by the community's women, they constructed the long-lived B'nai B'rith congregation (now Wilshire Boulevard Temple).

By national standards, Los Angeles's Jewish community developed late; in 1900 the Jewish community numbered just 2,500. However, soon after the 1906 San Francisco earthquake and fire, the center of western Jewish life shifted to Los Angeles. From 1907 to 1927, during a time of peak Jewish migration, San Francisco's Jewish population rose by only 5,000, whereas Los Angeles saw 58,000 new Jewish settlers. New railroad routes, water sources, and the discovery of oil helped make growth viable. Attracted by the city's boosterism, mild climate, and economic potential, Jews of East European origin, including immigrants, eastern migrants, and those born in California moved to Los Angeles to work in the new movie industry (see FILM: UNITED STATES), start related businesses, and heal from illness. To provide for this "health rush," Jews established the City of Hope hospital for tuberculosis care in 1912.

During the 1920s Jewish organizations multiplied as Jewish life spread from the downtown area to new centers, especially in multiethnic Boyle Heights, where 80,000 Jews supported the Orthodox Breed Street Shul, as well as the Hebrew Sheltering Society, Talmud Torah, Modern Social Center, and the Kaspars Cohn Hospital (later part of Cedars-Sinai Medical Center). Nearby City Terrace became home to Yiddish secularists. Jews of Sephardic origin consecrated their first Los Angeles synagogue in 1932.

After *World War II booming industries, real estate development, and new universities brought Jewish veterans. As Los Angeles grew by leaps and bounds, Jews settled near Fairfax, in the western part of the city, and in its valleys. This increasing population, 519,000 by 1999, stimulated the growth of Jewish *community centers; Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform congregations (see JUDAISM entries); a western branch of *Hebrew Union College, the University of Judaism (now the American Jewish University); the Skirball Jewish Center; the Museum of Tolerance; and the Brandeis-Bardin Institute. In recent years significant Persian and Israeli communities have increased the city's Jewish diversity and pushed the Jewish population toward 600,000.

For further reading, see E. Eisenberg, A. Kahn, and W. Toll, Jews of the Pacific Coast: Reinventing Community on America's Edge (2010); A. Kahn and M. Dollinger, California Jews (2004); and M. Vorspan and L. P. Gartner, History of the Jews of Los Angeles (1970); see also UNITED STATES, WESTERN.

Ava Fran Kahn

Love. Teachings on human and divine love abound in Jewish sources. From the *Bible to the present, prophets, poets, and philosophers have contemplated love's virtues and perils. Perspectives and approaches include the romantic, *mystical, intellectual, and pragmatic. Love is understood in the Bible and the *Talmud not only as emotion but also as action benefiting the self and others. Human and divine love are both sometimes conceived as intense yearnings that cannot be fulfilled.

The Hebrew noun for love, ahavah, and the verb ahv occur more than two hundred times in biblical narratives and poetry, marking it as a primary and recurring motif in inter-human and human-divine relationships. Unlike Greek (and Christian) terms that distinguish between spiritual (agape) and physical (eros) love, ahavah ranges in meaning from the sensuous to the spiritual, conveying notions of attachment, passion, affection, preference, loyalty, and yearning. Whereas other biblical nouns and verbs refer to a particular type of love, such as hesed, which often designates kindness and loyalty, or heshek, which denotes desire or passion, the verbal root ahv is used in a wide variety of social, political, and spiritual contexts.

Biblical stories, poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY), and *commandments (mitzvot) address parental love, romantic love, marital love, friendship, love of neighbor, and love of *God. The first use of ahv refers to *Abraham's love for *Isaac when God commands Abraham to sacrifice his beloved son (Gen 22:2). Similar examples of parental love include *Jacob's love for *Joseph (Gen 37:3, 44:20), Isaac's love for *Esau, and *Rebekah's love for Jacob (Gen 25:28). The active participle ohav (literally "lover") signifies a deep bond of friendship. A primary example is the relationship between *David and Jonathan (2 Sam 1:26). In *Proverbs 18:24, a friend is called ohav and is praised as "more devoted than a brother."

Episodes of a man's passionate love for a woman often have tragic consequences. An example is David's attraction to *Bathsheba, which ends with David's orchestration of her husband's death. Another case is the revenge against a lover turned rapist, as in Amnon's love for his half-sister *Tamar; this love is turned into hate and results in Amnon's murder at the hands of Tamar's brother Absalom (2 Sam 2:8–4:12, 9–20; 1 Kgs 1–2). In most cases of marital love, men are depicted in the active role of lover, whereas women are described in passive terms as being loved. Exceptions include, "And Rebecca loved Jacob" (Gen 25:28) and "And Michal, daughter of Saul, loved him [David]" (1 Sam 18:28).

A prominent use of ahv is in the mitzvot* (commandments) to love God, the neighbor, and the stranger. All three commandments use the verbal form ve-ahavta ("and you shall love"). According to a number of medieval Jewish *Bible commentaries, ahv signifies not only an emotion but also action. This observation stems from the fact that the verb is followed by the preposition le ("for" or "to"); literally, you shall love to your neighbor as yourself. This commandment implies an action and could be articulated as "Do for your neighbor as you would do for yourself." Some commentaries suggest that loving our neighbor as ourselves is an ideal to strive for. The ideal is articulated as a sincere, unlimited concern for the well-being of others. Other interpretations emphasize that because this directive is listed among the commandments called kedoshim or "sanctified acts" (Lev 19–20), it must be expressed in concrete acts. The Mishneh Torah* of Moses *Maimonides enumerates several examples of neighborly love, including visiting the sick, comforting mourners, joining a funeral procession, and providing a *bride and groom with all their needs.

Perhaps the most frequent context of love in the Bible is the intimate relationship between God and Israel. According to Deuteronomy 7:7–8, it is because of God's love (meh-ahavat) and the divine oath sworn "to your fathers" that God redeemed Israel from slavery. Divine love for Israel is dependent on Israel's love for God, which is seen as a religious obligation (Deut 10:12). This motif of reciprocal love appears in the range of interpretations of *Song of Songs. This biblical book is at once a celebration of human sexual love and, according to rabbinic and philosophic allegorical interpretations, an expression of the love between Israel and God. The eight chapters are permeated with depictions of the physical beauty of the lovers and of the Land of Israel. The mood and tone of the poems that comprise the Song of Songs exude erotic desire for union and consummation. The noun ahava and related verbs occur seventeen times in the Song, and numerous other verbs and nouns are used to convey the dynamics of the couple's mutual desire and love.

In Song of Songs, the woman's voice is prominent; this contrasts with other biblical books in which explicit references to women's desires are rare. The pain of separation is particularly acute for the woman, who refers to herself as "love sick" (2:5).

The last chapter contains one of the most profound reflections about the power of love in the history of literature: "Love is strong as death. . . . Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give all the wealth of his house for love, he would be utterly scorned" (8:6–7).

Evaluating notions of love in talmudic writings yields an abundance of positions and perspectives that range from *halakhic discussions on fulfilling one's marital sexual obligation to meditations on love of neighbor and love of God. Among the numerous rabbinic personalities, the life and thought of the second-century-CE sage and martyr *Akiva stand out as a remarkable tribute to the exalted powers of human and divine love. Midrashic traditions about his marriage to Rachel, their mutual devotion, and his views of marriage are exemplary of the wisdom of love. He taught that "love thy neighbor as thyself" is the greatest principle in the Torah (Sifra, Kedoshim 2) because it is predicated on love of oneself, which provides a foundation for love of others. He also held that love between man and woman represents the highest level of holiness and that marital harmony evokes the presence of the Shekhinah* (divine presence). Thus, he taught that one must not marry without love, not only because of the likelihood that the marriage would fail but also because of the potential risk of hating a spouse, a fellow human being. Akiva implied that human love is a manifestation of divine love and that the Song of Songs is simultaneously a celebration of romantic love and a celebration of the special love of Israel and God. Thus, he argued for the inclusion of the Song of Songs in the Bible: "For the entire world was not worthy as the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel, for all of scripture is holy, and the Song of Songs is holy of holies!" (M. Yadayim 3:5).

The Zohar*, the principal work of Jewish mystical theosophy, conceives of love and desire in terms of the individual, the community of Israel, and the unity within the godhead. On the one hand, loving God is the responsibility of the soul. As a particle of the divine, the soul seeks reunion with God. The righteous soul after death is depicted in God's "palace of love" where God fondles and caresses her, "even as a father treats his beloved daughter." Additionally, the Zohar's description of the love between Israel and God is expressed within the erotic language of the Song of Songs. Furthermore, the Zohar conceives of the cosmic rupture that occurred within God as a separation between God and His creation, and between the "upper worlds" and "lower worlds." The birth of human souls is the result of God's joining with the Shekhinah* (the feminine principle of the divinity representing God's immanence); this process provides a rationale for procreation, because the sexual union below affects the state of the upper worlds by bringing harmony to the male and female aspects of the divine. One who does not engage in procreation "diminishes the image that comprises all images" (Zohar I, 13a). Therefore, marital sexual union has cosmic redemptive value reflecting the union between God and the Shekhinah, or the upper and lower worlds, which is the reintegration of primordial unity.

The theme of love, especially love of God, pervades medieval Jewish *thought. Love of God is a religious duty, based on the commandment, "And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy might" (Deut 6:5). According to Jewish philosophers such as *Saadia Gaon, Solomon *ibn Gabirol, *Bahia ibn Pakuda, Abraham *ibn Ezra, and *Maimonides, love of God should be a rational love achieved by contemplation and studying philosophy and the sciences. In the tradition of Aristotle, philosophers such as Maimonides envisioned an intellectual love of God. Such love leads to the eternal life of the soul, because the eternity of the soul depends on the achievement of rational perfection. In contrast, thinkers such as Judah *Halevi rejected the rationalist approach as too sterile and instead insisted on the experience of faith, which creates an intimacy with the divine that leads to the overflow of love for God.

In the modern and contemporary period, the discourse of love of God is found most profoundly in the writings of *Hasidic masters. According to Shneur *Zalman of Liady (1745–1812), love is the inclination of the entire self and being toward the other. Love is "the cleaving of spirit unto spirit . . . manifesting in all parts of the soul: the intellect and emotions, as well as their modes of expression: thought, speech, and action. All of these are cloven unto the beloved." The Ḥasidic masters elevated the experience of mystical love of God as the most sublime human experience by fusing mystical contemplation with daily prayer. They described and prescribed stages whereby the Ḥasid moves from the heart to the intellect in yearning for God until reaching a stage of transcendence: "There are times when the love of God burns so powerfully within your heart that... it is not yourself who speak[s]; rather it is through you that the words are spoken" (Green and Holtz, 62).

Franz *Rosenzweig theorized about love as a central theological motif in The Star of Redemption, in which he conceptualized *revelation – the encounter of the human and the divine – as the outpouring of divine love upon the soul. Using the Song of Songs as a template for conceiving the dialogical moment of God and the human soul, Rosenzweig claims, "It is not enough that God's relationship to man is explained by the simile of the lover and the beloved. God's word must contain the relationship of lover to beloved directly... and so we find it in the Song of Songs" (trans. W. W. Hallo [1971], 199). Love and speech become interchangeable in Rosenzweig's *midrashic interpretation of the Song, underscoring the erotic and dialogical nature of love. The intimacy and presentness of love in revelation transform the self to a compassionate posture toward the other, which is manifested as love of neighbor. The boundaries between the erotic and the spiritual, the human and the divine, blur in the face of the fecundity of love.

For further reading, see A. and C. Bloch, The Song of Songs: A New Translation (1995); M. Goshen-Gottstein, "Abraham – Lover or Beloved of God," in Love and Death in the Ancient Near East: Essays in Honor of Marvin H. Pope, ed. J. H. Marks and R. M. Good (1987), 101–04; A. Green and B. Holtz, eds., Your Word Is Fire: The Hasidic Masters on Contemplative Prayer (1987); L. Jacobs, "The Love of God," in idem, A Jewish Theology (1973); Y. Muffs, Love and Joy: Law, Language, and Religion in Ancient Israel (1992); J. Van Seters, "Love and Death in the Court History of David," in Love and Death in the Ancient Near East, ed. J. H. Marks and R. M. Good (1987), 121–24.

YUDIT KORNBERG GREENBERG

Luria, Isaac (1534–1572) was the greatest mystic in the kabbalist center of sixteenth-century *Safed. Known by his acronym ha-Ari ("the lion"; usually said to stand for "Our Master Rabbi Isaac," but often read as "the Divine Rabbi Isaac"), Luria was born in *Jerusalem in 1534; after his father's death, his mother brought him to her brother's house in *Egypt where he grew up. He settled in Safed in 1570, only two years before his death, where a small group of disciples congregated around him. Knowledge is incomplete concerning his life before that. It seems that he studied Talmud and halakhah under several teachers, most notably David ben Zimra and Bezalel Ashkenazi, and became known as a master of legal studies; he made his living in commerce. He married his uncle's daughter in Egypt and had several children. Many legends surround his early studies in Kabbalah, some of which may have a basis in fact; certainly he wrote a commentary on a section of the Zohar, influenced by the teachings of Moses *Cordovero. His arrival in Safed was seen as particularly meaningful. He may have studied for a time with Cordovero, who died in 1570.

When Luria died in a plague, one of his disciples eulogized him in the traditional manner, without expressing anything exceptional concerning his personality or teachings. The first document that presents him as a great teacher and revealer of mystical secrets is the agreement, prepared by his main disciple, Ḥayyim Vital (d. 1620), and signed by several disciples, in which they undertake not to study or transcribe Lurianic teachings in Vital's absence and to keep these teachings secret. Several years later, legends concerning Luria's great spiritual powers began to spread in Safed, and some versions of his teachings began to be known, especially in Italy; they were spread by Israel Saruk (or Sarug), who presented himself as a disciple of Luria. A group of letters written by a visitor from Poland, Shlomo Shlumil of Dreznitz, between 1609 and 1615, are the first presentation of Lurianic legends; these had an almost immediate impact in Europe. Three of them were printed as a separate treatise, known as Shivḥei ha-Ari (Praises of the Ari). Later, a hagiographical work, Toledot ha-Ari (History of the Ari), was assembled, including much miraculous material.

During the first thirty or forty years after his death, three of his disciples wrote down versions of his teachings: Ḥayyim Vital, in several volumes and editions; Joseph ibn Tabul (only a few remnants of his version remain, mostly within the Vital corpus); and Moshe Yona, whose version was discovered only recently. The relationships among these four versions (including Saruk's) has not yet been analyzed in a comprehensive, satisfactory way. Luria himself wrote only a few pages that survived, adding very little to the understanding of the core of his teachings.

According to a tradition preserved by his disciples, Luria claimed that when he tried to put his ideas on paper they would come in a rush like a great river and could not be recorded. There can be little doubt that his disciples heavily edited the extant texts. In the authentic layer of the Lurianic hagiography, he is presented as possessing unusual spiritual power that enabled him to see into the souls of people, recognize their sins, and predict their future behavior. He could identify the various parts of every soul and its previous wanderings in other bodies in previous generations. In his Sefer ha-Hezyonot (Book of Visions), Vital preserved his teacher's detailed description of the history of Vital's soul (which, Vital believed, was the soul of the *messiah). It seems that Luria told several of his disciples such histories of their souls, fragments of which are preserved in Vital's works on the subject of gilgul (transmigration of souls), an important aspect of the Lurianic worldview. For further reading, see L. Fine, Physician of the Soul, Healer of the Cosmos: Isaac Luria and his Kabbalistic Fellowship (2003); see also KABBALAH, LURIANIC.

JOSEPH DAN

Luzzatto, Moses Ḥayyim (1707–1747) was a messianic leader, playwright, *mystic, and ethical writer. Luzzatto, who grew up in Padua, *Italy, was deeply immersed in the culture of his time; its influence is reflected in his poetry and especially his Hebrew plays, like Migdal Oz (The Fortress) and La-Yesharim Tehillah (Glory to the Righteous), written in the fashionable Italian allegorical manner. Several scholars designate Luzzatto as the first writer of Modern Hebrew literature, two generations before the emergence of the Berlin school of Hebrew Haskalah (enlightenment) writers. In his youth, he also wrote Leshon Limudim (The Learned Tongue), a manual of rhetoric.

Luzzatto established a secret society that soon turned into a mystical-messianic sect. He claimed that a maggid, a messenger from the divine world, appeared to him in 1727, transmitting secrets, directing his actions, and instructing him in the composition of a new, messianic version of the Zohar*, reflecting the arrival of the messianic age. He believed that he was the new Moses*, the final redeemer, the supreme messiah*, and his friend and disciple, Rabbi David Valle, was the messiah, son of David. Shabbatai Zevi*, the failed messiah, was the messiah, son of Joseph. In 1731 Luzzatto married a woman named Zipporah (like the biblical Moses) and wrote a commentary on his own marriage contract portraying the marriage as the culmination of the messianic process.

Luzzatto's messianic activities aroused opposition, and he was ordered by rabbinic courts to stop publishing and preaching. He left Italy and settled in Amsterdam* in 1735, where he wrote several ethical treatises, among them Mesilat Yesharim (The Path of the Righteous), the most popular and influential modern Jewish work in this genre. In 1743 he traveled to the Land of Israel* and settled in Acre (Acco), where he and his family perished in a plague in 1747. Despite the controversy surrounding him, his kabbalistic and ethical works had a profound influence on the modern movements of Hasidism*, as well as on the nineteenth-century tenuat ha-musar (Musar Movement*) in Eastern Europe*. For further reading, see S. Ginzburg, The Life and Works of Moses Hayyim Luzzatto (1931). JOSEPH DAN

Luzzatto, Samuel David (1800–1865), philologist, Bible* commentator (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARIES), prolific writer, translator, and Haskalah* figure in Italy*, was often known by the acronym Shadal (or Shedal). Born in Trieste, Luzzatto displayed precocious critical faculties; even as a young boy he called attention to deficiencies in commentaries on the book of Job*. His early intellectual contributions included a Hebrew grammar in Italian and a translation of the life of Aesop into Hebrew; he also translated both the Ashkenazic* prayer book (1821–22) and the Italian rite (1829) into Italian. By age thirteen, Luzzatto had withdrawn from school to help support his family, returning only to attend lectures on Talmud* given by Abraham Eliezer ha-Levi, Chief Rabbi of Trieste. In 1829, Luzzatto was appointed professor at the rabbinical college of Padua, established in that same year by the Jewish communities of Lombardy-Venetia, where he taught Bible, philology, and Jewish thought* and history. He wrote both biblical commentaries and grammatical works on the Hebrew language, and he translated a number of biblical books into Italian; he also delivered a series of lectures on aspects of Jewish theology that were published in Italian. An admired Hebrew poet himself, Luzzatto published editions of the poems of Judah Halevi*, with whose approach to Judaism he had considerable sympathy, as well as an influential anthology of medieval Hebrew poetry* (Tal Orot, 1881).

Luzzatto was a strong opponent of philosophical approaches to Judaism, and he also held negative views of Jewish mysticism*. Instead of rationalizing or spiritualizing the commandments*, he developed a positive system of Jewish life and practice grounded in revelation*, tradition, and the election* of Israel. He believed that Hebrew language and literature developed and enhanced the Jewish spirit. In a prolific literary career that spanned more than fifty years, he wrote in both Hebrew and Italian and left behind a voluminous correspondence; many of his writings still remain uncollected, and others are unpublished. Eighty-nine of Luzzatto's letters, essentially treatises addressing liturgical, bibliographical, exegetical, grammatical, historical, philosophical, and theological themes, are collected in Peninei Shedal (The Pearls of Samuel David Luzzatto), published by his sons in 1883. LISA RUBENSTEIN CALEVI

M

Maccabees, Books of are four works of Jewish historiography included in the *Septuagint. Although all four are in the Greek Orthodox canon and the first two are in the Catholic canon, Protestants relegate all four to the *Apocrypha. Because Jewish tradition ascribes them no significance at all, it has not preserved them. 1 Maccabees, originally written in *Hebrew, recounts the history of the *Hasmoneans from the beginnings of their rebellion against the *Seleucids in 168/7 BCE to the successful establishment of the dynasty. The book focuses first (ch. 2) on the founder of the dynasty, Mattathias, and then, successively, on each of his sons – Judah Maccabee (chs. 3–9), Jonathan (chs. 9–12), and Simon (chs. 13–16) – until Simon was succeeded by his own son, John Hyrcanus (ch. 16). The book, probably written in the late second century BCE, should be understood as a dynastic history justifying the new line of rulers. In contrast, 2 Maccabees, originally written in Greek, focuses on the history of *Jerusalem in the 170s and 160s. Despite the fact that it often overlaps 1 Maccabees, it is a work of the *Diaspora (originally based on a longer history by one Jason of Cyrene [2:23]) and, accordingly, much more religiously oriented. After first establishing that Gentile kings are generally benevolent to the Jews (ch. 3), it emphasizes the sinful nature of Jewish Hellenizing (ch. 4) and presents Antiochus Epiphanes' attack on Jerusalem and persecution of Judaism as a result of God's chastisements (chs. 5–6, following the theology of Deut 32). In this context, the book offers, in chapters 6 and 7, famous scenes of torture and *martyrdom that brought about *atonement and reconciled God with His people, thereby allowing for the victories of Judah Maccabee (chs. 8–15). The book is prefaced by two epistles sent by the Jews of Judea to those of *Egypt, asking them to participate in the celebration of the *Hanukkah festival in memory of the rededication of the *Temple; the dates in the first of these letters indicate that the book was written in the mid-to-late second century BCE. The title of 3 Maccabees is a misnomer, for the book has nothing to do with the Maccabees and little to do with the Land of Israel. Rather, the book reports a conflict between the Jews of Egypt and King *Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–205 BCE), who, after his failed attempt to enter the Jerusalem Temple (chs. 1–2), took his wrath out on the Jews of Egypt and attempted to annihilate them. Just in the nick of time, divine intervention foiled his attempt to have the Jews trampled by drunken elephants (ch. 6). This led to the king's repentance and the establishment of a festival (ch. 7), which the book was evidently meant to explain. In many ways, the book is reminiscent of *Esther. Written in Greek in the first century CE or later, 4 Maccabees is basically a philosophical treatise that uses the martyrdom stories of 2 Maccabees to establish the thesis that "devout reason is sovereign over the emotions." DANIEL R. SCHWARTZ

Magic refers to actions and rituals intended to transform reality for particular purposes. Magical behavior within a Jewish context, whether involving written incantations, talismanic objects, or specific actions, generally took place outside the ordained "official" realm of worship and practice. It is certainly the case that a range of activities that have magical intentions have always been a part of popular Jewish culture, despite the condemnation of magical practices in the *Bible and *rabbinic literature.

MAGIC IN THE HEBREW BIBLE: Although *Deuteronomy 18:10 forbids sorcery and divination, many biblical rituals and actions have magical elements. These include magical procedures related to agriculture, as in *Genesis 30:37–43 where *Jacob practices a type of talismanic breeding with goats, and the ritual trial of the woman accused of adultery (sotah) in *Numbers 5:11–31. The Bible portrays foreign sorcerers and Israelite *prophets who have magical powers, but their special abilities are generally understood to be subject to God's will. Thus, *Moses' "miracles" performed in contest with Pharaoh's magicians in *Exodus 7:8–12 derive from *God, and *Balaam's intended curses of the Israelites in the wilderness are turned into blessings through divine intervention (Num 23–24). The account of the witch of Endor in 1 *Samuel 28–3–25, who brings up the shade of the dead Samuel from Sheol at *Saul's request, preserves an obvious belief that the dead may be recalled to the land of the living but also makes clear that doing so is forbidden. A series of stories connected with the prophet *Elisha (2 Kgs 4:2–6, 16–17, 29–35, 38–41; 5:13–14, 25–27; 6:6) describe events that might be termed magical or miraculous.

SECOND TEMPLE AND RABBINIC SOURCES: *Second Temple era and rabbinic texts on magical themes discuss the transmission of magic from God through angels to humankind. These traditions also associate sorcery with traditions brought down by angels gone bad and with the introduction of technology (e.g., 1 Enoch 8:3). The book of Tobit, found in the *Apocrypha, has a number of magical elements, including a malevolent demon and the healing powers of the angel Raphael. Although significant Second Temple material remnants of magical praxis are lacking, numerous written traditions describe *Solomon as a wise magician who had control of demons and who used verbal remedies for healing and exorcism, who had mastered the "Book of Remedies" of *Hezekiah (since secreted away), and who created new modalities of magical/medical healing (*Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Testament of Solomon). The *pseudepigraphical Testament of Solomon serves as a fundamental treatise on Jewish demonology. Recent scholarship on Second Temple Judaism indicates that invoking the divine "Name of Power" and appeals to specific angels who assist the magician were central elements of magic rituals. A major theme of this magic tradition is healing. In Sefer ha-Razim (The Book of Secrets), dated by most scholars to the later talmudic period or early medieval times

Maghreb: See NORTH AFRICA

(sixth to ninth centuries), magical knowledge is said to have been transmitted by the angel Raphael to Noah in the antediluvian period.

Rabbinic traditions indicate that magic could be performed by men of learning, piety, and virtue (BT Sanhedrin 65a–67b). This magic is not seen to be in contradiction to monotheism because it derives from *God and is divinely transmitted to Jewish holy men. Thus, in general, rabbinic literature accentuates the numinous magical power of priestly ornaments and the staff of *Moses (Mekhilta, Beshallah, ed. Weiss, 4.60; Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer 40; Sefer ha-Yashar, Yalkut, Exodus 168), and the *Talmud preserves stories about holy men who were able to invoke the “Name of Power” – that is, the Tetragrammaton – to heal allies and insiders or kill or wound enemies of Israel. *Torah scholars were said to be able to destroy ideological opponents of the Jews with one flash of an angry gaze (BT Shabbat 34a; BT Bava Batra 75a). Rabbis are described as fighting heretics and witches, not with rational arguments, but with spells and visual energy; an example is the tale of Simon ben Shetaḥ and the witches of Ashkelon in JT Hagigah 2.2 (77d–78a) and the parallel story in JT Sanhedrin 6.9 (23c).

However, rabbinic literature also maintains a negative view of magical actions because they may “contradict (or damage) the heavenly hosts” (BT Sanhedrin 67b; Hullin 7b). Like the mixing of species (kilayim) or sex between humans and animals, witchcraft or sorcery destroys the cosmic fabric of energy, injuring God, as it were, and negatively affecting the world’s balance. Thus, magicians are feared because they dangerously mix that which should remain separate, physically and metaphysically. The Rabbis in the Talmud discussed the prohibition, “One shall not allow a witch to live” (Exod 22:17), in the context of capital crimes and believed that men as well as women can be tried for sorcery.

Nevertheless, in rabbinical literature, women are particularly associated with witchcraft. Although the Rabbis took for granted that both men and women had the potential to manipulate the powerful forces operative in the cosmos by reciting efficacious spells, they assumed that only a few men dabbled in such activities. Moreover, the Rabbis connected women’s supposed predilection for conjuration with the sexual unreliability and untrustworthiness that they also projected onto females. A statement attributed to the first-century-CE sage Hillel in M. Avot 2:7 warns, among other things, that “the more wives, the more witchcraft”; BT Sanhedrin 67a remarks that “most women are involved in witchcraft,” and BT Eruvin 64b notes in passing that present generations of the daughters of Israel indulge freely in witchcraft; BT Pesahim 111a warns, “When two women sit at a crossroad, one on one side of the road, and one on the other side of the road, facing each other, they are certainly engaged in witchcraft,” and provides a spell that a male traveler can use for protection against them. BT Gittin 45a describes an accusation of witchcraft against two daughters of R. Naḥman. Several rabbinic passages, such as BT Pesahim 110a, link sorceresses and human waste and offer formulas to use against them.

Although the Jerusalem Talmud contains several key sections devoted to the halakhic context of magical practice, it lacks the extensive demonology and the traditions of magical incantation and praxis found in the Babylonian Talmud, an indication that much of this material came into Jewish popular religion from Parthian and Sassanian culture. For example, Jewish magic was often characterized by verbal formulas designed to influence metaphysical entities such as angels, demons, and even God to act on the world in some specific way, ideally for the benefit of the practitioner or the client of the practitioner. Such adjurations have been found written on amulets and incantation bowls, as well as in handbooks for practitioners from late antiquity into the modern period. Although each text differed according to the specific situation, the language often contained quotations from Scripture invoking earlier actions of power and magic, such as the splitting of the Red Sea or *Elisha’s miracles, in the context of the magical prescription. In this way, the practitioner assumed the role and efficacy, if not the identity, of the biblical hero, as he or she performed the magic. Incantation bowls from late ancient Babylonia seem to have been used to expel household demons and other malevolent entities and to combat disease and misfortunes attributed to witches.

GEONIC ERA: Jewish magical recipe books began to be compiled in late antiquity and by the *geonic period the scribalization of Jewish magic is evident in handbooks such as the Sword of Moses, Sefer Ha-Razim, and other books with magic content found in the Cairo *Genizah. Much work remains to be done in cataloguing Jewish magical texts from around the world; editing magic books, amulets, and bowls; and analyzing their use in later kabbalistic imagery and praxis (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; KABBALAH).

For further reading, see the extensive and comprehensive bibliography in the second edition of the Encyclopedia Judaica, s.v. “Magic” (2007); J. Naveh and S. Shaked, Amulets and Magical Bowls (1987); N. Janowitz, Magic in the Roman World (2001); G. Bohak, Ancient Jewish Magic (2008); J. Trachtenberg, Jewish Magic and Superstition (1939; devoted to medieval Jewish magic); L. Schiffman and M. Swartz, Hebrew and Aramaic Incantation Texts from the Cairo Geniza (1992); M. Swartz, Scholastic Magic (1996); and J. Seidel “Charming Criminals,” in Ancient Magic and Ritual Power, ed. M. Meyer and P. Mirecki (1995).

JONATHAN SEIDEL

Magnes, Judah L. (1877–1948) was a prominent American rabbi, Jewish communal leader, and *Zionist. Born in Oakland, California, he earned ordination at *Hebrew Union College and a PhD from the University of Heidelberg. Between 1904 and 1912, he officiated at Temple Israel in Brooklyn and at Temple Emanu-El and B’nai Jeshurun Synagogue in Manhattan. He ultimately left the Reform rabbinate over issues regarding his support of traditional modes of Jewish worship (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA). From 1909 to 1922, Magnes served as chairman of the *New York City Kehillah, an organization founded to mediate community conflicts. During *World War I, Magnes emerged as a leading pacifist and important figure in the People’s Council for Democracy and Peace; he and his family later moved to *Jerusalem in 1922, where he became involved in efforts to establish the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. He served as its first chancellor (1925–35) and first president (1935–48). In response to the 1929 riots, Magnes became committed to establishing Jewish–Arab cooperation. Throughout the remainder of his life he advocated tirelessly for the establishment of a binational state in *Palestine. His activities included the establishment of Ihud in 1942, an organization that promoted Jewish–Arab cooperation. For further reading see A. Goren, Dissenter in Zion: From the Writings of Judah L. Magnes (1982); and D. P. Kotzin, “Transporting the American Peace Movement to British Palestine: Judah L. Magnes, American Pacifist and Zionist,” Peace & Change 29 (July 2004): 390–418.

DANIEL P. KOTZIN

Mahzor (pl. maḥzorim) comes from the Hebrew for “cycle” and refers to *prayer books containing the liturgies for the *High Holidays and/or the *Festivals (see WORSHIP).

Maimon, Salomon (1753–1800) was a Polish-Lithuanian rationalist philosopher whose fame extended both from his self-promoting, reflective autobiography and the philosophical acumen that prompted Immanuel Kant to note that “none of my critics have understood me . . . as well as Herr Maimon.” Born in Sukowiborg (near Mirz) as Solomon ben Joshua, Maimon changed his name in his thirties in homage to *Maimonides and as a way of participating in the Germanized world whose acknowledgment and support he desired.

Maimon received a traditional education and, by his own account, showed extraordinary promise in *Talmud study. At the age of eleven he received rabbinic ordination, married, and moved in with his wife’s family. In his Lebensgeschichte (An Autobiography [trans., J. Clark Murray (2001)]), published in 1792, Maimon describes the abuse he suffered from his mother-in-law and the miserable conditions of Polish Jewish life; through his own intellectual devices, he read Maimonides, taught himself German (albeit imperfectly), and studied *Kabbalah. Looking for guidance, he sought out *Dov Ber of Miedzyrzecz, but was acutely disappointed; Maimon’s sharp critique of *Ḥasidism, however, belies the deep intellectual influence of that encounter. To follow the demands of his philosophical awakening and escape his domestic life, Maimon took a position as a tutor. He abandoned *Poland altogether in 1776 and went to *Berlin, but was turned out of the city before making any serious contacts; he lived as a beggar before finding a sponsor in Posen. Back in Berlin by 1780, he read eclectically and voraciously and met Moses *Mendelssohn, who introduced him to other proponents of the *Haskalah.

Maimon was intellectually astute but socially inept, and he never polished his language skills. Virtually unintelligible, unrepentantly *Spinozistic, and scathingly honest, Maimon was again expelled from Berlin. His peripatetic life led him to Breslau where his wife found him and demanded a divorce. He returned to Berlin by 1787 where he achieved some professional acclaim. Writing in German and Hebrew, Maimon contributed several articles to Enlightenment journals, published ten major philosophical studies (including Versuch über die Transscendentalphilosophie mit einem Anhang über die symbolische Erkenntniß und Anmerkungen [Essay on Transcendental Philosophy with an Appendix on Symbolic Knowledge and Notes], his major work on Kant’s Critique of Pure Reason) and published Giva’at Ha-Moreh [The Hill of the Guide], a heavily edited Hebrew commentary on Maimonides’ Guide of the Perplexed.

Maimon’s philosophical sophistication was unparalleled: His grasp and critique of Kant’s idea of the thing-in-itself exposed weaknesses in reigning notions of the limits of human experience, the finitude of human cognition, and the ability to theorize about God. He wrote on metaphysics, logic, ethics, legal theory, philosophy, and mathematics. Although influenced by Maimonides, he was independently modern in his commitment to freedom of thought. However, Maimon suffered from his poverty and low status. In 1795 Graf Heinrich Wilhelm Adolf Kalkreuth offered his patronage, and Maimon lived the remainder of his life in Nieder-Siegersdorf in Niederschlesien (Lower Silesia, now Poland).

Recent scholarship includes A. Socher, The Radical Enlightenment of Solomon Maimon: Judaism, Heresy, and Philosophy (2006); and M. Buzaglo, Solomon Maimon: Monism, Skepticism and Mathematics (2002).

LEAH HOCHMAN

Maimonides (MOSES BEN MAIMON, also known as Rambam) was born in Cordova, *Spain, in 1138, but he and his family were forced to flee in 1148 when the *Almohads, an extremist sect, invaded southern Spain and offered all non-Muslims the choice of conversion, death, or exile. Maimonides’ family fled Spain and traveled through *North Africa, where, for some time, they lived incognito as Muslims. In 1166, Maimonides settled in Fustat, *Egypt (old Cairo), where he wrote most of his best-known works and served as court physician to the Sultan. He died in Fustat in 1204. Often regarded as the greatest Jewish philosopher of all time, Maimonides was also a talmudic expositor and renowned physician (see HALAKHAH; MEDICINE).

His first masterpiece, the Commentary on the Mishnah, published in 1168, is best known for its treatment of Chapter 10 of Tractate Sanhedrin. There, Maimonides lists thirteen principles he considers binding on every Jew: the existence of *God, the absolute unity of God, the incorporeality of God, the eternity of God, that God alone is to be worshiped, that God communicates to *prophets, that *Moses is the greatest prophet, that the *Torah was given by God, that the Torah is immutable, divine providence, that there is divine punishment and reward, that there will be a *messiah, and that the dead will be *resurrected. A Jew who accepts these principles, although he or she may commit every possible sin, is still accounted a Jew and has a share in *redemption. A Jew who denies even one removes him- or herself from the community of Israel and has no share in its destiny.

Maimonides’ second masterpiece, the Mishneh Torah, finished in 1178, is a fourteen-volume code of Jewish law that systematizes all 613 original *commandments (mitzvot), explaining in simple and elegant Hebrew prose what they are and what purposes they are intended to serve. (Since the Mishneh Torah has fourteen parts and the Hebrew number fourteen spells out the word yad, or “hand,” this code is often known in Jewish tradition as the Yad or Yad Hazakah [Strong Hand]). According to Maimonides, no commandment is given for the sake of obedience alone. Of special note is Book One, which sets forth the foundations of Jewish belief, a theory of moral traits or dispositions, the need for every Jew to study the Torah, and the importance of *repentance. Also of special importance is Book Fourteen, which ends by arguing that a messiah will come, restore sovereignty to Israel, establish peace with the other nations, and lead the world to the study of science and philosophy. Unlike some Jewish accounts of the coming of the messiah, Maimonides rejects the idea of a cataclysm, the performance of miracles, or abrogation of the *Torah, insisting that the world will follow its normal course.

Maimonides' philosophic reputation rests mainly on the Guide of the Perplexed, published in *Judeo-Arabic in 1190. Its overall theme is the conflict between secular and spiritual sources of knowledge or, as we might say, *reason and *revelation. If reason directs us to a God who is immaterial, unchanging, and devoid of emotion, on a literal reading, then revelation directs us to a God who has bodily parts, grows angry, and changes location. Maimonides argues that a literal reading of Scripture is unjustified, and thus the conflict is apparent rather than real.

According to Maimonides, all of Jewish law (halakhah*) aims at two things: the improvement of the body and the improvement of the soul. The former is a means to the latter; the soul is improved by acquiring correct opinions and eventually knowledge. The basis of all knowledge is summed up in the first two commandments, which Maimonides takes as (1) belief in a timeless, changeless, immaterial God and (2) rejection of idolatry. Only by acquiring knowledge can a person fulfill the commandment to love God.

Therefore, a person who has a false conception of God, one based on a literal reading of Scripture, is not worshipping God, no matter how many other commandments he or she may perform. That is not to say that the other commandments can be dispensed with – Maimonides does not countenance liberalization of the law. Rather, it is to say that the purpose of the other commandments is to put us in a position where we can perfect our intellect. This purpose could only be achieved if we lived in an orderly society that promoted the health and well-being of its members. Still health and well-being are not enough: A perfect society must also look after spiritual and intellectual growth.

Two features characterize Maimonides' thinking. The first may be described as demystification. In almost everything he wrote, Maimonides sought to free Judaism of any taint of mythology or superstition. Beyond the rejection of literal interpretation, he is skeptical of miracles and anything else that defies rational explanation. The second feature may be described as intellectualism. Rather than comfort, merri-ment, or ethnic solidarity, the purpose of Judaism is to direct us to truth. Should Scripture appear to say something that reason can show is false, we have no choice but to reinterpret it to conform to reason so that truth is preserved.

Behind this claim is the view that reason is a God-given faculty that defines us as human beings. In his terms, "[Man's] ultimate perfection is to become rational in actuality; this would consist in his knowing everything concerning all beings that it is within the capacity of man to know" (Guide of the Perplexed, Book 3, chapter 27). Rather than impeding the human relationship with God, reason brings us closer to God. This does not mean that reason can answer every question put to it. Maimonides is clear that part of rationality consists in the recognition that reason has limits. Thus, he makes the qualification that reason can only lead to things "that it is within the capacity of man to know." His basic point is that, when reason can answer a question, as in reason's affirmation of the existence of a timeless, changeless, immaterial God, we have a sacred obligation to trust it.

Despite his fame, Maimonides became the source of a long-standing controversy. To supporters, he restored Judaism to the intellectual rigor it was always supposed to have had. To detractors, he corrupted Judaism by assigning a larger role to Aristotle than to Moses. Whichever view one takes, there is no denying that, after the publication of Maimonides' works, Judaism was never the same. An old saying sums up his contribution well: "From Moses to Moses, there was none like Moses."

In addition to the primary sources mentioned earlier, for further reading, see I. Twersky, A Maimonides Reader (1972); D. Hartmann, Maimonides: Torah and Philosophic Quest (1976); R. L. Weiss, Maimonides' Ethics (1991); and K. Seeskin, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Maimonides (2005); also see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL.

KENNETH SEESKIN

Majdanek was a *Nazi forced labor camp and death camp in *Poland near Lublin. It opened in the summer of 1941 as the Waffen-SS POW Camp Lublin and later as the Waffen-SS Concentration Camp Lublin. More than 360,000 of its half-million prisoners would die there; 16% of those who died were Jews. Many perished from the camp's harsh living and working conditions, and the SS murdered many others on the camp's gallows, guillotine, or in one of Majdanek's four gas chambers. See HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Malachi, Book of is the last book of the prophetic corpus and of the Minor Prophets of the Hebrew *Bible (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]). The title of the book means "my messenger" and comes from 3:1, which mentions an eschatological or *messianic figure; it may be assumed that the author was anonymous. The author is particularly harsh in his criticism of the priests for corrupting the *Temple cult and offering incorrect teaching of the *Torah regarding *covenant laws (1:6–2:5). This criticism is surprising because the presumed date of composition is only about two generations after the rededication of the Second *Temple in 515 BCE. In calling the community to *repent (3:6–12), the author chastises those who do not and promises that those who do will be remembered for good (3:13–21). The book concludes on a positive note, linking the teaching of *Moses to the coming of the eschatological prophet, *Elijah, who will inaugurate the messianic era (3:22–24). By linking Mosaic teaching to prophetic eschatology, Malachi weds law and prophecy in a way that was to be identified with *rabbinic Judaism.

ERIC MEYERS

Marrano is a derogatory term for a converso* or "New Christian," a Jew who converted to Christianity under force in fourteenth- or fifteenth-century *Spain and *Portugal; some were crypto-Jews, practicing Jewish rituals in secret. See INQUISITION, SPANISH; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN.

Marriage and Marriage Customs. Nearly all Jewish texts praise marriage and hold it out as an ideal. The statement of Genesis 2:18, "It is not good for man to be alone," and the directive of Genesis 2:24 to "be fruitful and multiply," were understood in Jewish tradition as religious obligations. Rabbinic texts present marriage as a bulwark against sinful thoughts and behavior (see, for example, M. Kiddushin 4:12). So important is marriage that Jewish law rules that a man may sell a Torah scroll to obtain funds to marry (BT Megillah 27a; Mishneh Torah*, Hilkhot Sefer Torah 10:2; Shulhan Arukh*, Yoreh De'ah 270:1, and Even ha-Ezer 1:2).

There is little evidence for what marriage ceremonies looked like in biblical times. From the rabbinic period onward, the legal core of Jewish marriage has been a two-step process. The first stage, kiddushin or erusin, is often translated in English as “betrothal.” Although the couple does not yet live together, it is a form of unofficial marriage during which the laws of adultery apply; a betrothal may only be dissolved by divorce (or death of one of the parties). Kiddushin is created by the man presenting to the woman an item of minimal value (most commonly a ring is used) and stating, “You are betrothed to me according to the laws of Moses and Israel”; through this process, he “acquires” her as his wife. Rabbinic law also allows for kiddushin to be created by means of a document or an act of sexual intercourse (M. Kiddushin 1:1), but these fell out of Jewish practice early on.

The marriage is completed through nissuin, “nuptials,” also known as bringing the bride into the huppah. In rabbinic times, the huppah was a bridal chamber, and bringing the bride into it represented her entry into the husband’s household. In modern practice, the huppah is an open canopy under which the wedding takes place, although it continues to symbolize the new household being created. The nissuin is accompanied by seven blessings, the sheva berakhot. These blessings recall the creation of the world and human beings, the hope for the return to Zion, and the joy of companionship and marriage; they are recited over a cup of wine, which the bride and groom then share. At one time kiddushin and nissuin could take place as much as a year or more apart but since approximately the twelfth century CE, the practice has been to combine both in one extended ceremony. The two parts may be separated by a reading of the marriage contract (see later) or by words to the couple from the officiant or another person chosen for the occasion. The ceremony is usually followed by yihud, a period of seclusion for the bride and groom, which symbolically and legally represents the consummation of the marriage.

Biblical and rabbinic law allow for polygyny, although its frequency is difficult to gauge. Polygyny was formally prohibited among Ashkenazi Jews in a ruling attributed to the German scholar R. Gershom ben Judah (960–1028) in his “herem de-Rabbenu Gershom.” Men of Sephardi and Mizrahi descent, particularly those living in Islamic societies, did not consider themselves bound by the herem and sometimes contracted plural marriages well into the twentieth century. The State of Israel formally outlawed polygamy in 1951, but allowed for already polygamous immigrant families to remain intact. Moreover, because taking a second wife is valid by biblical law, if a man does so in violation of the law the relationship must still be dissolved by divorce; civil penalties such as imprisonment can also be brought to bear.

Weddings are prohibited during certain days and periods of the year. A wedding should not take place on the Sabbath or on a festival, for example, because of the rabbinic principle that one should not dilute the celebration of the holiday with the celebration of the wedding. Conversely, weddings traditionally do not take place during the period of the counting of the Omer between Passover and Shavuot, or during the three weeks between the 17th of Tammuz and Tisha B’Av, because both are considered to be periods of mourning.

In the post-talmudic period, it became customary to complete the wedding ceremony with the breaking underfoot of a glass or similar object by the groom. Various interpretations of this custom include frightening off evil spirits and commemorating the destruction of Jerusalem, even at the happiest moments. Other common customs include the aufruf: calling up the groom, or either or both members of the couple in egalitarian communities, to the Torah on the Sabbath before the wedding. Both bride and groom may fast on the day of the wedding before the ceremony and say penitential prayers usually reserved for Yom Kippur. Some couples also avoid seeing each other before the wedding, either for the day of the wedding itself or up to a week in advance. Immediately before the ceremony, the groom may place a veil over his bride’s face in the bedeken ceremony; one common explanation is that it prevents a man from being deceived as to the identity of the woman he is marrying, as was the biblical figure Jacob (Gen 29).

A Jewish marriage often includes the writing of a marriage contract (ketubbah) that is given by the groom to the bride. Originally, this document recorded the dowry and other property brought into the marriage and the conditions of its inheritance or return, as well as a deferred monetary pledge from the husband to the wife should he divorce or pre-decease her. It further spelled out obligations of the husband to the wife, such as providing financial maintenance, having regular sexual contact with her, and redeeming her if she was taken captive. Although a traditional version of the ketubbah is included in many Jewish marriages even to this day (particularly in Orthodox and Conservative practice [see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE]), it is generally considered to be symbolic and unenforceable. In the more liberal movements, couples may write their own contracts with individualized and mutual/egalitarian promises and commitments.

Other modern innovations to the wedding ceremony have generally centered on making the bride a more active and equal participant in the ceremony, in contrast to the traditional ceremony, in which she need only passively accept the ring given to her by the groom. These innovations include the addition of words for the bride to say when accepting the ring, a mutual exchange of rings (and even mutual statements of setting aside the other in betrothal), and the inclusion of women as participants in reading the ketubbah, reciting blessings, or officiating over the wedding. Other modern adaptations of Jewish wedding customs include ceremonies for marriages between a Jewish and non-Jewish partner or ceremonies for the commitment of two Jewish same-sex partners to each other (see also LIFE-CYCLE RITUALS).

For further reading, see R. Biale, Women and Jewish Law (2nd ed., 1995); G. Labovitz, Marriage and Metaphor: Constructions of Gender in Rabbinic Literature (2009); and J. R. Baskin, “Medieval Jewish Models of Marriage,” in The Medieval Marriage Scene: Prudence, Passion, Policy, ed. S. Roush and C. Baskins (2005), 1–22.

GAIL LABOVITZ

Marriage, Levirate, from the Latin levir (brother-in-law), refers to the mandated marriage of a widowed woman to her husband’s brother. In Israelite religion and Judaism, levirate marriage applies to a childless widow, based on the ruling in Deuteronomy 25:6–8 that if a man dies and leaves no sons, his widow should not be married to a “stranger.” Rather her husband’s oldest brother is to perform the duty of the levir (in Hebrew, yibbum) and marry her. The first son that the woman bears to her new husband will be considered the heir of the deceased brother, “that his name may not be blotted out in Israel.” (By rabbinic times, levirate marriage was considered obligatory only when the widow had no child of either sex [M. Yevamot 2:5; BT Yevamot 22b]). Should the brother-in-law refuse to perform this obligation, then he and his brother’s widow had to perform a ceremony called ḥalitzaḥ (removal), which is described in Deuteronomy 25:9–10. The woman approaches the brother-in-law in the presence of the community elders, pulls his sandal from his foot, spits in his face, and declares, “Thus shall be done to the man who will not build up his brother’s house!” Then the brother-in-law “shall go in Israel by the name of ‘the family of the unsandaled one,’” and the released widow is now free to marry as she chooses.

The purpose of levirate marriage in Israelite religion was to preserve patriarchal patterns of inheritance; it also provided protection for widows in societies that offered single women few attractive options. Levirate marriage presupposed a polygynous society in which a man could have more than one wife. A man who refused the duty of the levir may have been concerned about his own potential economic loss in providing an heir for his brother’s property, as well as the impact of adding another woman and her potential children to his household. It is interesting to note that in all other circumstances biblical law forbids a man to marry his brother’s widow (Lev 18:16, 20:21). Levirate marriage appears in biblical narrative in the story of *Tamar, the daughter-in-law of *Jacob’s son *Judah, in *Genesis 38. Although the events in the book of *Ruth bear similarities to levirate marriage, Boaz’s agreement to marry his kinsman’s widow, Ruth, reflects the institution of the goel (redeemer of clan property).

Rabbinic Judaism continued the practice of levirate marriage, although some rabbinic sages recommended ḥalitzaḥ in all cases (BT Bekhorot 13a and Yevamot 109a). A tractate of the Talmud, Yevamot (sisters-in-law), is devoted to the ramifications of this custom. During the medieval period, rabbinic authorities who lived in the Muslim world, where polygyny was a cultural norm, generally supported levirate marriage. However, levirate marriage was rendered virtually impossible among Jewish communities in Christian regions by the legal amendment (takkanah) against polygyny attributed to R. *Gershom ben Judah of Mainz ca. 1000. Nevertheless, the ceremony of ḥalitzaḥ had to be performed by the brother-in-law before the childless widow could remarry. A 1950 takkanah by the Chief Rabbinate of the State of Israel prohibited the practice of levirate marriage in Israel and made performance of ḥalitzaḥ obligatory.

In the contemporary era, Orthodox Judaism (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX entries) requires a childless widow to undergo ḥalitzaḥ to be free to remarry. The ceremony takes place in the presence of a specially convened Jewish court (beit din) of five ordained rabbis. The ritual “ḥalitzaḥ” shoe used is made entirely of leather. The widowed sister-in-law must remove this shoe from the right foot of the levir and spit on the ground; she then repeats in Hebrew the formula mandated in Deuteronomy 25:9–10. All present join her in reciting the final three words of this passage three times.

Sometimes, a levir refuses to participate in the ḥalitzaḥ ceremony out of hopes of extorting financial gain from the widow or her family or because of geographical distance, rejection of traditional Jewish ritual, or disabilities to which he is subject. Despite Israeli legislation and efforts of Orthodox Jewish courts to intervene in individual cases, some women remain bound to a brother-in-law’s whims and are unable to remarry. Such women are among those termed agunot (sing. agunah*; “chained” or “anchored women”). This is one of the disturbing surviving remnants of women’s secondary legal status in halakhah* (Jewish law). Recent scholarship includes D. E. Weisberg, Levirate Marriage and the Family in Ancient Judaism (2009). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Marshall, Louis (1856–1929) was a prominent attorney and one of the most influential Jewish communal leaders of his day. The son of German Jewish immigrants, Marshall was born in Syracuse, New York; he later moved to *New York City where he played a crucial role in the reorganization of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America and was a prominent supporter and leader of both the New York Kehillah and the *American Jewish Committee. He worked to combat *antisemitism and to improve conditions for immigrants on the Lower East Side, and he also opposed immigration restrictions that would have closed the *United States to Jewish refugees. Marshall was a supporter of the rights of all minority groups and fought for social justice; he was also a conservationist. Believing that Jews were not a separate nationality, Marshall did not embrace *Zionism, although he was a supporter of the *Balfour Declaration. For further reading, see H. Alpert, Louis Marshall: 1856–1929 (2008); C. Reznikoff, ed., Louis Marshall: Champion of Liberty, 2 vols. (1957); and J. Sarna, “Two Jewish Lawyers Named Louis,” American Jewish History 94(1–2) (2008).

MICHAEL R. COHEN

Martyrdom, the act of submitting to death rather than compromising one’s convictions, is generally believed to have emerged in Judaism in *Hellenistic times. This view is based mainly on 2 *Maccabees, which describes the executions of a scribe named Eleazar (ch. 6) and of seven anonymous brothers in the presence of their mother (ch. 7) for refusing to eat pork and to worship the *Seleucid king Antiochus IV. However, the unique stylistic, linguistic, and thematic features of these two stories, together with the plausibility that the final format of the book is the work of a mid-first-century-CE redactor, contest the stories’ Hellenistic provenance.

Versions of these stories surfaced in 4 *Maccabees, from the first or second century CE, when martyrdom gained popularity in Jewish circles under *Roman-Christian influences. Internalizing the Roman ideal of “noble death,” first-century writers *Philo of Alexandria, *Josephus Flavius, and the anonymous author of the Assumption of Moses (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA) presented contemporaneous Jews as emulators of a long-standing Jewish martyrological tradition (although none of them mentioned the Maccabean martyrs). They describe Jews killed by Romans and threats by peaceful Jewish protestors to commit suicide and kill each other rather than see violations of Jewish laws. *Temple imagery (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT) of priests and ritual sacrifices helped these authors justify such exceptional forms of voluntary death. Yet Philo’s and Josephus’ peaceful protestors did not have to make good on their promises, because the Roman authorities abandoned their offensive decrees. Although these Jewish martyrological discourses endorsed the admired Roman ideal, they also reflected anxiety, because of the general biblical prohibition against taking human life and the absence of a martyrological doctrine in *Judaism.

Theologizing the concept of voluntary death became the task of the Rabbis. Their rulings attempted to balance the Jewish commitment to the sanctity of life and the popular notion of voluntary death. A second-century rabbinic council at Lod allegedly set the basic rule: When forced to choose between transgressing the commandments (mitzvot) and death, a Jew “should transgress rather than be killed,” except in cases of idolatry, sexual misconduct, and homicide (BT Sanhedrin 74a–b, JT Sanhedrin 3:6, 21b). In contrast, Rabbi Ishmael argued that engaging in idolatrous worship was permitted to save one’s life, because Leviticus 18:5 instructed that one was to live by the commandments, not die for them, but this minority position was challenged.

The Rabbis distinguished between forced idolatrous worship in private, which is permissible to save one’s life, and in public (i.e., in the presence of at least ten men), which must be avoided. According to other talmudic views, in times of religious persecution Jews must let themselves be killed, even for a trivial commandment. However, if the demand to transgress benefits only the oppressor and does not aim at denigrating Judaism publicly, life should be chosen. All of these *halakhic (legal) discussions employ the verb “to be killed,” stressing the passive nature of martyrdom. These rulings abandoned the Temple symbols and the images of active martyrdom found in first- and second-century-CE Jewish narratives.

Several martyrological accounts appear in the Talmud and various *midrash collections. They include a version of the anonymous mother and sons narrative from Maccabean times (BT Gittin 57b; Lamentations Rabbah 1:16, §50) and the story of four hundred girls and boys who drowned themselves in the sea en route to Rome to escape sexual slavery (BT Gittin 57b). More famous and detailed are the accounts about the Roman executions of ten Rabbis, including *Akiva, Ḥananiah ben Teradyon, and Judah ben Baba, during the second-century-CE Hadrianic persecutions (BT Sanhedrin 14a; BT Avodah Zarah 8b, 17b–18a; Lamentations Rabbah 2:2). These talmudic accounts lack a specific term for martyrdom. Only later did rabbinic discussion link the need to avoid a public transgression at all costs to the act of sanctifying God’s name (kiddush ha-Shem). A post-talmudic text, called both Midrash Eleh Ezkerah (These I Shall Remember) and Midrash ‘Asarah Harugei Malkut (The Ten Killed by the Royal Government), reworks individual talmudic tales into a legendary martyrology, known as the “Ten Martyrs.” Excerpts from this midrash appear in a selihah (penitential prayer) recited on *Yom Kippur, also entitled Eleh Ezkerah. Similar content appears in a dirge for *Tisha B’Av entitled Artzei ha-Levanon (The Cedars of Lebanon).

No other period in history is more identified with Jewish martyrdom than the *Middle Ages. The first known case took place in Otranto in southern *Italy, a *Byzantine province at the time. A tenth-century epistle reports the self-sacrifice of two rabbis and their student. Equally important to the history of Jewish martyrdom is the liturgy and literature produced by Italian/Byzantine Jewry, especially the tenth-century Sefer Yosippon (Book of *Josippon). It retells the Maccabean stories of martyrdom and Josephus’ accounts of events during the conflicts with Rome. Together with contemporary liturgical works, Sefer Yosippon restored to Jewish memory the nonrabbinic martyrs of the past and the Temple cult symbols of the Roman period, especially the korban (sacrifice).

The Book of Josippon became part of the curriculum in Franco-German (*Ashkenazic) study centers like the one in Mainz headed by Rabbi *Gershom ben Judah, the Light of the Exile. The French rabbis – Joseph bar Solomon of Carcassonne, an eleventh-century liturgical poet (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]), and *Rashi (d. 1105) – were also familiar with the book. By the early eleventh century martyrdom went beyond literature in France. A Hebrew account describes Jewish women drowning themselves in a river in response to King Robert’s campaign of forced conversion, whereas others were “put under the sword.” Latin accounts also ascribe suicide to these French Jews.

The First *Crusade initiated a significant chapter in the history of Jewish martyrdom. In the late spring and summer of 1096, bands of crusaders attacked European Jewish communities with the slogan, “death or conversion.” Many were killed by crusaders, and others ritually killed their families and themselves to avoid forced conversion. Three Hebrew narratives describe these events and praise the martyrs, comparing them to the martyr-heroes of the past, including the anonymous Maccabean mother with her seven sons and the martyrs of the talmudic period. Also in the list are the biblical “martyrs” *Daniel and his three associates, as well as *Abraham and his son *Isaac. Medieval midrashim (legends) present Abraham’s binding (akedah*) of Isaac on the altar (Gen 22) as an actual offering, followed by Isaac’s miraculous revival, making the akedah synonymous with martyrdom (see S. Spiegel, The Last Trial [1967]).

Together with medieval liturgical poetry (piyyutim), the midrashim, and the memorial books (Memorbücher) of the dead, the reports of forced conversion and kiddush ha-Shem generated a distinctive Ashkenazic style of reporting and commemorating. The singing of the liturgy Aleinu le-shabeaḥ (We should praise *God) and the meditation Unetanneh tokef (the title of a medieval liturgical poem that is recited on *Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur) were ascribed to the martyrs themselves. Other responses to the events of 1096, including the poem Av ha-Raḥamim (Merciful Father), the mourners’ Kaddish*, and the Yizkor* memorial service, have all remained an integral part of Ashkenazic liturgy and worship.

Although the massacres during the so-called Shepherd’s Crusade and the Black Death of the fourteenth century were far more devastating, it was the martyrologies of the crusading period that have left a lasting impression on the collective memory of Ashkenaz, and their style was used to describe the massacres of Jews by *Chmelnitzki and his Cossacks (1648–49) in *Poland and the *Ukraine (1768).

Yet, martyrdom, and especially the taking of others’ lives, was not without controversy. Medieval rabbinic authorities like Rabbi Jacob ben Meir Tam (d. 1171 [see TOSAFISTS]) viewed self-destruction as a legitimate way of avoiding torture in cases of forced conversions, and Rabbi *Meir of Rothenburg (d. 1293) answered in the negative when a Jew inquired if he needed to do penance for having sacrificed his family during a massacre. Nevertheless these discussions and inquiries also reveal misgivings and perplexities. This is evident also from a medieval *Bible commentary that rejected acts of self-destruction and in which a certain rabbi labeled another a “murderer” for ritually taking the lives of others. Moses *Maimonides mocked another rabbi for recommending martyrdom. His Epistle on Martyrdom (c. 1165) rejects self-destruction when faced with the Muslim demand to convert, because he did not consider *Islam an idolatrous religion. Except for an early case of kiddush ha-Shem in 1148, it seems that Maimonides’ ruling prevailed during the *Almohad regime in *North Africa and *Spain.

Martyrdom resurfaced in Christian *Spain at the close of the fourteen century. Ashkenazic-style reports describe acts of kiddush ha-Shem in reaction to mob violence. Among those involved were descendants of Franco-German rabbis like Rabbi *Asher ben Jehiel, who had established study centers in Spain. However, kiddush ha-Shem was less common in Spain. After the 1492 *expulsion, *Sephardim invoked the concept of kiddush ha-Shem to describe the hardship of exile and the struggle of crypto-Jews to remain loyal to Judaism.

Kiddush ha-Shem received additional meaning after the *Holocaust. Even though the *Nazis did not offer Jews a choice between life and death, the six million victims of the Holocaust are considered martyrs because the Nazis indiscriminately murdered them only for being Jews. Together with other martyrs, they are remembered in the Yizkor service as saints who sanctified God’s name.

For further reading, see R. Chazan, European Jewry and the First Crusade (1987); J. Cohen, Sanctifying the Name of God (2004); and S. Shepkaru, Jewish Martyrs in the Pagan and Christian Worlds (2005). SHMUEL SHEPKARU

Marx, Karl (1818–1883) was born in Trier in the Rhineland to parents from observant families who descended from a distinguished rabbinic line. His paternal grandfather, Meir Halevi Marx, was rabbi of Trier, a position Marx’s uncle, Samuel Marx, later assumed. Marx’s maternal grandfather, Issac Pressburg, had been rabbi of the Dutch city of Nijmegen. His father, Heschel Marx (1782–1838), trained in law. After the 1815 restoration of the Kingdom of Prussia, an edict barred Jews from practicing law, and Marx’s father became a Lutheran, officially changing his name to Heinrich. Karl was baptized in 1824, at the age of six. His mother, Henrietta Pressburg, converted a year later, after the death of her father.

Marx received a secular education and studied history and philosophy at the universities of Bonn and Berlin. In 1841, Marx received his PhD from the university in Jena. Denied teaching posts because of his membership in the radical group, the Young Hegelians, Marx became editor of Rheinische Zeitung in 1842. There he expressed open aversion to organized religion. His co-editor, the German Jewish socialist, Moses Hess (1812–1875), commented that “Dr. Marx... will give medieval religion and politics their last blow.” In 1843, Marx married Jenny von Westphalen, who was from a Prussian aristocratic family; they moved to Paris where Marx began a lifelong friendship and collaboration with Friedrich Engels. In Paris Engels gave Marx a copy of his first book, The Conditions of the Working Class in England (German, 1845).

Expelled from France in 1845, Marx moved to Belgium with Engels; he renounced his Prussian citizenship and became, for the rest of his life, stateless. In Belgium Marx formulated his theory of class struggle, arguing that history, beginning in the feudal era, could be reduced to the conflict between classes. He argued in The Communist Manifesto (1848) that the passage from feudalism to capitalism divided the bourgeoisie and proletariat into two hostile camps; after the inevitable overthrow of the former, the proletariat would eliminate social classes by abolishing private property.

Marx’s attitude to Jews and Judaism has evoked accusations of antisemitism. In On the Jewish Question (1844), he associated Jewry with usury and finance capitalism, writing, “The social emancipation of the Jew is the emancipation of society from Judaism.” In an 1843 letter, Marx wrote that “the Israelite faith is repugnant to me.” Recent scholars, however, have situated Marx’s views in the wider context of his revulsion for all organized religions; they point to his friendships with contemporary Jewish intellectuals like Moses Hess and Heinrich *Graetz (1817–1891) and note the complexity of his views on the “Jewish question.” Marx unambiguously favored Jewish emancipation and full rights for Jews as Jews. When the French parliament called for a universal Sunday rest day, Marx opposed the bill because it legalized “the Sunday of the Christians”; he asked, “Should not the Jewish Sabbath have the same right?” Thus, Marx distinguished between the role Jews had played in the modern state, which he believed was negative, and the rights they were entitled to as individuals, which he absolutely supported. For further reading, see R. C. Tucker, ed., The Marx-Engels Reader, 2nd ed. (1978); S. Avineri, “Marx and Jewish Emancipation,” Journal of the History of Ideas, 23(3) (1964): 445–50; and D. M. Snyder, Freud, Einstein, and Marx: The Influence of Judaism on Their Works (1998).

JOSHUA D. ZIMMERMAN

Masada is a mountain located on the southwestern shore of the Dead Sea in *Israel. The small plateau served as a royal citadel and desert palace for *Herod the Great and later as the final stronghold of rebels in the First *Jewish War against *Rome. In his Jewish War (7.280–303), the first-century-CE historian *Josephus describes the site’s lavishly decorated palaces and remarkable feats of architectural engineering. The excavations carried out in 1963–65 largely confirmed Josephus’ description of the impressive fortress (Y. Yadin, Masada: Herod’s Fortress and the Zealots’ Last Stand [1966, 1998]). Herod employed the latest Roman artistic and architectural techniques, including frescoed walls and mosaic floors, to construct his secluded palace and safe haven.

The Jewish rebels who took Masada at the time of the First Jewish War were a group known as the Sicarii (Daggermen). The rebels held the fortress for a number of years before the Romans surrounded them. After a three- to six-month siege, the Romans took the fortress in the spring of 73 or 74 CE. Josephus relates the famous story of the mass suicide of the 960 rebels (Jewish War 7.320–401). Archeological and literary evidence have been cited both to confirm and to deny the account, leaving a strong sense of doubt among many scholars that it actually occurred. Map 3

STEVEN H. WERLIN

Masorah; Masoretes. Masorah, which means “transmission,” refers to scribal traditions that evolved to preserve correct readings, performance, and reproduction of the biblical text. Although vowel signs were introduced into the biblical text by the sixth or seventh century, the Masoretes developed various systems of graphemes (written symbols) to facilitate accurate vocalization, accentuation, and cantillation (chanting). These *grammarians and *scribes lived in the Land of Israel, primarily in Tiberias in the *Galilee and *Jerusalem, and also in *Iraq; they were active between the seventh and eleventh centuries.

Masorah also refers to textual notes that the Masoretes added to the margins of manuscripts and the bottom of the pages of biblical codices to facilitate the correct reading and copying of the biblical text. The necessity for such annotations arose from the early practice of writing the biblical text in continuous script without breaks between words, sentences, or paragraphs. Although final forms of some Hebrew letters were introduced in late antiquity and the *Talmud alludes to paragraph divisions, marking the division of the text into verses was an early concern of the Masoretes.

Masoretic textual notes are typically divided into two categories. The Masorah Parva (minor masorah) most frequently indicates certain words that are to be read aloud differently from how they are written; it also identifies difficult words whose distinctive spelling was worthy of special attention by copyists. The Masorah Magna (greater masorah), preserves concordances of unique grammatical forms as well as mnemonic devices highlighting significant features of vocalization and cantillation of the text.

Rabbinic literature mentions the practice of liturgical recitation (kerei) diverging from written text (ketiv). This practice serves a number of purposes, including correcting archaic grammatical forms and textual errors preserved in the written text, as well as softening strong language in the written text that is nonetheless retained in oral recitation. In addition to the textual masorah, a numerical masorah developed to aid copyists. It indicates, for example, the number of verses in each biblical book and annotates key milestones, such as the midpoint of the number of verses in the *Torah.

No uniform tradition exists for the masorah as a whole: Each school of Masoretes employed a different set of graphemes to establish vocalization, accent, and cantillation, and their annotations differed as well. Thus, the Tiberian system uses eight signs to indicate seven vowels, whereas the older Palestinian system indicates only five vowels. The Tiberian school of Masoretes developed into two rival factions, that of Ben Asher and that of Ben Naphtali; the Ben Asher school eventually gained ascendancy. The tenth-century Aleppo Codex, considered the most authoritative masoretic document, represents the Ben Asher tradition.

As Tiberian vocalization marks do not indicate accent, a system of cantillation graphemes was also developed. For the prose books of the Bible, this system relies on dots and lines indicating either conjunctive or disjunctive accents, placed above or below a word to mark the accented syllable. Some of the names and symbols of these accents are reminiscent of hand movements, long used as prompts in public recitation and retained to this day by some communities. Accent placement follows structured rules that generally rely on the logic of the biblical verse but also take the verse's rhythm into account. The poetic books of *Psalms, *Proverbs, and *Job use a different system of accents. Because of their canonical status in public reading, masoretic notes were also appended to *Targum Onkelos, an *Aramaic Bible translation. For further reading, see J. R. Jacobson, Chanting the Hebrew Bible: The Art of Cantillation (2002), 360–94.

PHILLIP I. ACKERMAN-LIEBERMAN

Mathematics: See SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS

Medicine. From the biblical period to modern times, there has been a strong connection between Judaism and medicine. Many of Judaism's most famous sages were also physicians, and Jews have looked favorably on medicine as a profession. This cultural affinity is based on economics and education. As a minority community, Jews were often barred from livelihoods in agriculture and in crafts. However, under Persian, Greek, Roman, Muslim, and Christian rule, the profession of medicine was consistently available to Jews. In addition, mastery of the corpus of Jewish religious literature requires a thorough knowledge of medicine and science. For example, slaughtering animals according to ritual norms (sheḥitah*) entails substantial anatomical knowledge to detect blemishes and anatomical irregularities that might render the animal unfit for consumption; similarly, the laws pertinent to conjugal restrictions during women's menstrual cycles (niddah*) necessitate significant gynecological specialization. Moreover, just as medicine, especially in its pre-modern forms, demanded familiarity with *astronomy, botany, zoology, and mathematics, so too mastery of *rabbinic Judaism called for encyclopedic learning. In the Renaissance, for example, educated Jews pursued the cultural ideal of hakham kolel, a Hebrew rendering of the Latin homo universalis or perhaps the Italian uomo universale, appellations that were accorded to a person of universal learning.

BIBLICAL PERIOD: Most of what we know about Jewish medicine in the biblical period comes from the Hebrew Bible itself (see ILLNESS AND DISEASE: BIBLE AND ANCIENT NEAR EAST). Common ailments were treated by means of preventive medicine such as ritual washing and dietary restrictions. More unusual diseases sometimes called for *magical treatments; according to BT Pesaḥim 56a, King *Hezekiah (2 Kings 18–20) prohibited the “Book of Cures,” which purportedly contained remedies for all known diseases. Additionally, midwifery was a distinguished profession for Israelite women. The book of Exodus praises Shifrah and Puah for their bravery in defying the Egyptian king's order to kill male Jewish infants (Exod 1:15–17). Finally, it is important to note that, although ancient Jews practiced medicine, *God was considered the ultimate healer, and physicians only acted as God's instruments, as attested by Exodus 15:26: “I am the Lord that heals you.” Above all, medicine in the Bible is chiefly concerned with hygiene, and some 213 of the 613 *commandments deal with preventing the transmission of contagious disease. Practices such as quarantine, the immersion of utensils and clothing in scalding water, and prescribed bathing all reflect this focus.

TALMUDIC PERIOD: Numerous talmudic dicta, such as “the saving of a life (pikuah nefesh) takes precedence over the observance of the *Sabbath” (BT Yoma 85a), illustrate the importance given to healing. At this time (200–600 CE), Jewish physicians were prized throughout the Greco-Roman world, as attested in the medical writings of Pliny the Younger, Aulus Cornelius Celsus, and Galen. Prominent Gentile rulers and religious leaders (such as the *Church Father Basil [fl. 300 CE]) retained Jewish physicians. Pedagogically, the study of medicine was closely linked to the religious curriculum of the time. Many of the talmudic sages, including Ishmael, Ḥaninah ben Dosa, and Samuel ben Abba ha-Cohen, were practicing physicians. Modern physicians have detected precocious knowledge in talmudic medical references to embryology, as well as in other areas.

MIDDLE AGES: Medieval Jewish physicians played a major role in the transmission of ancient Greek medical knowledge; they often worked alongside Gentile scholars in translating Greek and Arabic medical texts, usually by way of Hebrew, into Latin and eventually the European vernaculars. Medieval Christian physicians such as Roger Bacon (thirteenth century) and Vesalius (sixteenth century) urged their students and readers to study Hebrew as a resource for medical knowledge and may have known Hebrew themselves. In *Byzantium especially, Jews played a crucial role in the transmission of Greek medical learning to European culture. The sixth-century physician Asaph ben Berekhiah, known more commonly as Asaph ha-Rophei (Asaph the Physician), wrote an encyclopedic medical work reflecting contemporary practices. Several centuries later, in Byzantine-ruled southern *Italy, Shabbetai Donnolo was closely associated with Salerno's famous medical school; he wrote a well-known medical work, Sefer ha-Yakar (E. Lieber, "Asaf's Book of Medicines," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 38 [1984], 233–49). In *Spain, where Jewish culture flourished under Muslim rule, a number of Jewish viziers, translators, and philosophers were also physicians. The eleventh-century linguist and *Court Jew Ḥasdai ibn Shaprut translated Dioscorides' Materia medica, a pharmacological handbook, into Arabic. Judah *Halevi (twelfth century), better known as a poet and author of the philosophical work The Kuzari, was also a practicing physician. Towering over all other scholars of the period was Moses *Maimonides (1135–1204). In addition to his myriad accomplishments as a community leader, halakhic codifier, and religious philosopher, he also wrote medical works, the most famous of which was Pirkei Moshe (Chapters of Moses; see H. Davidson, Moses Maimonides: the Man and his Works [2005]).

RENAISSANCE AND BAROQUE ERAS: After the 1492 expulsion of Jews from Spain (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN), many Iberian Jewish doctors, some of whom were forced to convert to Christianity, took their talents elsewhere, most importantly to *North Africa, *Italy, the Low Countries, and the *Ottoman Empire. One such figure is Amatus Lusitanus (1511–1568), who published more than seven hundred Latin consilia, or medical case studies, which demonstrate deep medical learning and a refreshingly anecdotal nature. In fact, the practice of narrative medicine, endorsed by several contemporary physicians, has deep roots in the Renaissance period and especially in the works of *Sephardi Jews.

Jewish physicians abounded in early modern Italy. David de Pomis (1525–1593) served as Pope Pius IV's personal physician and wrote an apologetic work in Latin defending the legacy of Jewish doctors. Italian Jewish physicians were particularly celebrated for their integration of medical learning with traditional Jewish education and culture. Medical schools, including Padua, were among the first to offer admission to Jews, beginning in the early seventeenth century. Numerous Jews matriculated, and most were awarded the degree artium ac medicinae doctor (Doctor of Arts and Medicine). Joseph Zahalon (1630–1693), scion of a Spanish rabbinical dynasty, took his degree from the University of Rome and wrote a Hebrew medical encyclopedia intended for lay people entitled Otzar ha-Hayyim (Treasury of Life). In many ways it may be seen as a forerunner of modern efforts to popularize medical knowledge, such as Dr. Spock's child care books or www.webmd.com. Joseph Delmedigo (1591–1655), a graduate of Padua, studied with Galileo Galilei and wrote prolifically on a great variety of topics, including medicine.

MODERN PERIOD: In the wake of the French Revolution, Jews were gradually granted civic *emancipation in most of Western Europe. As a result, many barriers to attendance at European universities, most of which had not been as tolerant as those in Italy, and various other obstacles to professional advancement, were removed. Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, in Europe and North America, Jewish doctors and medical researchers were responsible for many important discoveries and developments. It is difficult to imagine the progress of modern medicine without the contributions of Sigmund *Freud (d. 1939) in psychology or Jonas Salk (d. 1995), who discovered a widely used polio vaccine, in infectious diseases.

In the early-twenty-first century, Jews are significantly involved in medicine and medical research. In *Israel, scientists continue to break new ground in all areas of medical research and treatment, and centers such as Hadassah Hospital and the Weizmann Institute of Science have achieved worldwide fame. In North America, Jewish physicians are ubiquitous to the extent of becoming a cultural fixture.

For further reading, see H. Friedenwald, The Jews and Medicine (1944); J. Preuss, Biblical and Talmudic Medicine, trans. F. Rosner (1993); R. Barkai, "Le judaïsme espagnol du Moyen Âge et la médecine," in Le Monde sépharade, ed. S. I. Trigano (2006); J. Shatzmiller, Jews, Medicine, and Medieval Society (1995); D. Ruderman, Jewish Thought and Scientific Discovery in Early Modern Europe (1995); N. Berger, ed., Jews and Medicine: Religion, Culture, Science (1995); and "Medicine," Encyclopedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (2006); see also NURSING: UNITED STATES. ANDREW BERNIS Megillah, Hebrew for "scroll," may refer specifically to the biblical book of *Esther, which is publicly read on the festival of *Purim, often from a specially designated and decorated scroll (see CEREMONIAL OBJECTS). Esther is one of five relatively brief biblical books that constitute the *Five Scrolls (ḥamesh megillot); the others are *Ecclesiastes, *Lamentations, *Ruth, and *Song of Songs. Megillah is also the name of a tractate in Order Mo'ed of the *Mishnah and *Talmud; it deals with the observance of the festival of *Purim and aspects of the book of Esther.

Megillat Ta'anit (Scroll of Fasting) is a document of a semi-historical character that originated among the sages of the *Second Temple era. It was apparently compiled between 41 and 70 CE. The scroll is essentially a list of about thirty-five dates drawn up in *Aramaic and arranged in *calendar order. Its goal, as stated in its opening sentence, is to forbid Jews to fast on these days that are defined in the Jerusalem *Talmud as "days on which miracles had been performed for Israel." The dates listed are, in the main, those of joyous events of various kinds during the Second Temple period, from the days of *Ezra and *Nehemiah to the times of the destruction of the *Temple. An explanatory commentary in *Hebrew, known as the "Scholion," was later appended to the scroll and has been transmitted in two versions. The most recent edition is V. Noam, Megillat Ta'anit: Versions, Interpretation, History, with a Critical Edition (2003).

VERED NOAM

Mehitzah (literally, "partition") is a physical divider separating men and women during *synagogue *worship in Modern Orthodox and Ultra-Orthodox forms of *Judaism. Although there was a "women's court" (ezrat nashim) in the Second *Temple in Jerusalem, it was open to men and women; only at the joyous water-drawing ceremony on the harvest festival of *Sukkot were the sexes separated (BT Sukkot 51b–52). There may have been separate sections for women in ancient synagogues, but there is no definitive evidence for this; the *Talmud refers to efforts to separate men and women in synagogues during crowded festival worship (BT Kiddushin 81 a) to preserve propriety.

Separate worship sections or rooms for women only became widespread in the later Middle Ages. Men prayed together in the central part of the synagogue because they are obligated to participate in communal worship; women, who are not so obligated, were relegated behind a visual barrier of some kind, either in the back of the sanctuary or in an upstairs gallery. Placing women away from the center of worship and out of the sight of men may also have been an effort to preserve modest behavior between the sexes and to focus men's attention on prayer (because women's voices are said to be a sexual distraction to men [BT Berakhot 24a]). In some places, such as the German city of Worms, women prayed in a separate room with a small window that connected to the main synagogue so that they could hear the service.

In the twenty-first century, men and women are no longer separated during worship in liberal forms of Jewish practice. Reform Judaism eliminated the mehitzah in the 1800s on the grounds that it had no biblical basis. Although men and women still prayed separately in Reform synagogues in Europe into the twentieth century, there was no longer a physical divider; family seating was usually the norm in Reform synagogues in the United States (see JUDAISM, REFORM entries). Traditional communities consider mehitzah as a requirement during prayer, although they differ as to the height and nature of the partition. Thus, there are a variety of styles of mehitzot, including balconies, fixed partitions, movable partitions, curtains, and in some cases entirely separate rooms. In some Modern Orthodox synagogues in the United States there are no visual barriers, and the *Torah scroll can be passed between the men's and women's sections, offering women more inclusion in public worship.

For further reading, see essays in S. Grossman and R. Haut, eds., Daughters of the King: Women and the Synagogue (1992).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Meir Ben Barukh (Maharam) of Rothenburg (ca. 1215–1293) was the leading *Ashkenazic rabbinic authority in northern Europe during the second half of the thirteenth century. He studied with *Tosafists in both France (see FRANCE, MEDIEVAL) and *Germany, including Isaac ben Moses (known as the Or Zarua) in Würzburg, Jehiel ben Joseph of Paris, and Samuel ben Solomon of Falaise.

Meir wrote his liturgical elegy (kinnah) for the Talmud, "You who have been consumed by the fire, seek the well-being of your mourners," after he witnessed its burning in Paris in 1242. This event, and others in his native Germany, focused Meir's attention on the incipient decline of Ashkenazic Jewry; his *halakhic writings and methods reflect these developments in several ways. His admiration for *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah and for Isaac Alfasi's Halakhot Rabbati, for example, inspired several of his students – R. *Asher ben Jehiel (Rosh), Mordecai ben Hillel, and Meir ha-Kohen – to write works and commentaries that were linked to these great *Sephardic codes (see HALAKHAH). Meir wrote hundreds of *responsa, which, together with those of his predecessors, were preserved by his students. This ensured the survival of large amounts of Ashkenazic halakhic material in its original form.

In his Sefer Tashbez, Samson ben Zadok observed and recorded Meir's comportment in a variety of situations, emphasizing his practical halakhic applications and customs. This genre, which was not so much in vogue in Ashkenaz during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, became a dominant form of rabbinic expression during the later Middle Ages. Although sometimes seen as stringent, Meir's halakhic rulings often managed to blend or combine opposing positions. This tendency, which may have come to Meir through the teachings of the Hasidei Ashkenaz (the German pietists; see MIDDLE AGES: Hasidei Ashkenaz), characterized his approach to communal government and monetary affairs, as well as his rulings in ritual matters. His affinity for German pietism can also be seen in his Torah commentary, which was based for the most part on masoretic details (see MASORAH; MASORETES), and in some of his many liturgical poems (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]).

Meir was arrested in Lombardy in 1286 (perhaps while he was on the way to the Land of *Israel), and he was held in several locales in Germany for seven years until his death. During his imprisonment, Meir completed his Tosafot to Tractate Yoma and was able to consult with students and colleagues. No stranger to tragedy, Meir ruled that a father who had slain his family (in Koblenz in the 1260s) in anticipation of the imminent threat of conversionary efforts (and had then himself been spared) did not require any special expiation, because he had acted in accordance with earlier Ashkenazic halakhic practices (see MARTYRDOM). Based on a passage in hekhalot literature, Meir also wrote that once a person decided to undertake *martyrdom, he did not feel the pain of death. After his death in 1293, Meir's remains were held until 1307, when they were successfully ransomed by a Jew named Alexander Wimpfin. In accordance with his request, Alexander was ultimately buried next to Meir in the Jewish cemetery of Worms, where their graves (and tombstones) can still be seen. EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

Meir, Golda (1898–1978) was the fourth prime minister of the State of *Israel. Born Golda Mabovitch in Kiev in the *Russian Empire (modern-day *Ukraine), she emigrated with her family to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1906 where she attended public schools. She attended what is now the University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee and worked at a Yiddish-speaking school before moving to Denver, Colorado, to live with her sister. There she became increasingly involved in the Labor Zionist movement (see ZIONISM) and also met Morris Meyerson whom she married at the age of nineteen. They immigrated to *Palestine in 1921 and joined Kibbutz Merhaviah in the Jezreel valley; a natural leader, Golda left the kibbutz for Tel Aviv in 1924 to become an official of the Histadrut Trade Union. She served as an emissary to the United States between 1932 and 1936 and in 1946 became head of the Political Department of the Jewish Agency, the chief liaison with the Palestine British Mandate government. After Israel's creation, she became the new state's first ambassador to the Soviet Union. In 1949 she was elected to the Knesset as a member of Mapai (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES) and was appointed minister of labor; in 1956 she became foreign minister, the position she held until her retirement in 1965. When Prime Minister Levi Eshkol died in 1969, Meir was urged to return to politics and, with the support of the Labor Party, became Israel's first female prime minister. Major events during her time in office include the murders of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Summer Olympics and the Yom Kippur War of 1973 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT). She resigned from office on April 11, 1974. In 1975, Golda Meir was awarded the Israel Prize for her contributions to the state and also published her autobiography, My Life.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Memoir and Life Writing: Hebrew (1780s to Present). A key point of contention in the field of Jewish lifewriting in general, and Israeli lifewriting specifically, is whether Jewish history's collective emphasis stands in essential tension with the individual impulse at the heart of autobiographical writing. Israeli literary critic Gershon Shaked (2000) suggests that writers in Hebrew from the late nineteenth century onward have faced a choice between engaging with socioeconomic and political issues or retreating to the internal realms of confession, romance, or spirituality. This split between public and private continued to structure Hebrew literary output through the first decades of the State of Israel and has had a significant impact on the production, cultural status, and social role of Israeli lifewriting in its many manifestations.

A survey of Israeli lifewriting – that is, memoirs written in Hebrew after the declaration of the State of Israel in 1948 – must begin with its precedents in Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) and turn-of-the-century autobiographical literature (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; for a seventeenth-century Hebrew autobiography, see MODENA, LEON). Scholars have examined how Haskalah authors absorbed or digressed from the influential paradigms set by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, whose Confessions (1782–89) addressed society rather than God and emphasized the years of childhood as central to comprehending the adult. Salomon Maimon's Lebensgeschichte (Life History; 1796) and Mordecai Aaron Günzberg's Aviezer (ca. 1828) both relied on the Rousseauian model; their focus on childhood and on education in heder (the traditional Jewish pedagogical system) and their critique of Jewish marital norms are particularly noteworthy. Among Hebrew memoirs from Eastern Europe, Moses Leib Lilienblum's Hattot Neurim (Sins of Youth; 1876) is generally considered the most important. Lilienblum's work in turn influenced the next generation of European Jewish intellectuals such as Micah Joseph Berdichevsky and Mordecai Ze'ev Feiberger.

During the tehiyah (see HEBREW: MODERN REVIVAL) of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, fictional autobiographies often became a vehicle to express the personal crises of a generation of young Jews. Dubbed telushim (uprooted ones), these young men attempted to free themselves from the bonds of traditional Jewish life and join secular European society; the "apostasy narrative," describing their crises of faith, grounds their disguised tales. Feiberger's Le'an (Whither?; 1899) and Joseph Haim Brenner's Ba-Horef (In Winter; 1903) are outstanding examples of this genre's ripening at the turn of the century. Also from this period, although in a different vein, is Safiah (Aftergrowth; 1908–19) by the preeminent poet Hayyim Nahman Bialik. This fragmentary collection of first-person prose sketches recalls the early childhood of a boy named Shmulik in his native village.

After this creative spurt, Hebrew fictional autobiography was a somewhat dormant genre until the 1970s. Meanwhile, in the decades immediately preceding and following the establishment of Israel, the national enterprise of settling the Jewish homeland dictated the focus of personal and public literature. Memoirs of the settlement movement and autobiographical works by Zionist leaders began to surface (see ZIONISM). Creative fiction was expected to adhere to the Zionist ideological agenda by supporting the collective striving toward national goals; such themes as the War of Independence and redeeming the land through agriculture prevailed. As Yael S. Feldman has written, saying "I" and expressing individuality were still difficult tasks for writers into the 1970s. Even when David Shahar (The Palace of Shattered Vessels series; 1969 onward) and Hanoah Bartov (Shel mi atah yeled [Whose Little Boy Are You?]; 1970) crafted fictional autobiographies, significant historical moments in the Israeli national narrative framed their recollections of childhood. This period also saw the publication of autobiographies by political icons such as Yigal Allon (1975), Golda Meir (1975), Moshe Dayan (1976), and Yitzhak Rabin (1979). Michael Keren has convincingly shown how these leaders' awareness of current events as well as their own mythological legacies led to narrative choices that enhanced particular aspects of their public identities.

This ideological emphasis militated against intensely personal, confessional works in mid-twentieth-century Israeli society. A notable exception was Pinhas Sadeh's Ha-hayyim kemashal (Life as a Parable; 1958). In Sadeh's paradigm-setting book he declares, "Since I cannot write, do not want to write, and it is impossible that I could write about anything apart from myself, all that I really need to know is myself." Although it was marginalized at first because of its combination of existential confessionalism and Christian theology, Ha-hayyim kemashal gradually won an audience and recognition of its innovations.

The past two decades have shown renewed interest in both Hebrew literary autobiography and the life writing of Israeli public figures. S. Yizhar's Mikdamot (Preliminaries; 1992), Haim Beer's Havalim (The Pure Element of Time; 1998), Nurit Zarchi's Mishakei bedidut (Games of Loneliness; 1999), and Amos Oz's Sipur al ahavah vehoshekh (A Tale of Love and Darkness; 2002) are examples of relatively unmasked attempts by acclaimed authors to create detailed, yet aesthetically innovative narratives about their lives. In Sipur hayyim (Story of a Life; 1999), Aharon Appelfeld continued his exploration of Holocaust memories in the context of Israeli lifewriting. These and other recent publications point not only to the authors' desires to portray themselves in the context of their family, education, and young adulthood but also to the receptiveness of the Hebrew-reading audience to such works.

Israeli historiography, like Israeli literary culture, did not immediately make space for the writing of individual lives. The reasons are similar: an initial adherence to collective ideological imperatives, followed by an expanded perspective. Where Zionist historiography might once have focused on nation, class, and the historical process as forces, it now increasingly recognizes the role of individuals in shaping history. Perhaps the relative stability of the nation-state, more than sixty years after its founding, has made possible this backward-looking stage of Israeli society and culture. Anita Shapira's biography of Berl Katznelson, Berl: Biografiyah (1980), is viewed as a watershed moment that opened up the field of academic biography in Israel. In a similar vein are works on David Ben-Gurion by Shabtai Tevet (1976) and Michael Bar-Zohar (1980), as well as Yehuda Reinharz's study of Chaim Weizmann (1987). Literary figures are also benefiting from the recent acceptance of Hebrew biography. Yehoshua Porat's biography of Yonatan Ratosh (1989), Ehud Ben-Ezer's biography of Esther Raab (1998), and Haim Beer's group portrait of Bialik, Brenner, and S. Y. Agnon (1992) constitute examples of Hebrew literary criticism entering the age of biography. Taken together, these developments in Israeli lifewriting indicate that the once dominant discourse of the national narrative has given way to a more flexible and variegated texture of literary production (see also ISRAEL, STATE OF entries).

For further reading, see Y. Feldman, "Living on the Top Floor: The Arrested Autobiography in Israeli Fiction," Modern Hebrew Literature 1 (1988): 72–77; A. Mintz, Banished from Their Father's Table: Loss of Faith and Hebrew Autobiography (1989); G. Shaked, Modern Hebrew Fiction (2000); M. Keren, "National Icons and Personal Identities in Three Israeli Autobiographies," Biography 27(2) (2004): 357–83; M. Moseley, Being for Myself Alone: Origins of Jewish Autobiography (2006); and T. Hess, "The Confessions of a Bad Reader: Embodied Selves, Narrative Strategies, and Subversion in Israeli Women's Autobiography," Prooftexts 27 (2007): 151–87. HANNAH S. PRESSMAN Memoir and Life Writing: Mizrahi. The *Mizrahi (Middle Eastern) memoir tells the personal story of Jewish life in Arab and Muslim lands, written for the most part after that life was no longer possible. In part, these memoirs are efforts to recover, preserve, and reclaim a lost heritage, either responding to the dominant *Ashkenazi culture or reformulating or reframing the Mizrahi identity. The increasing popularity of the Mizrahi memoir speaks to a growing interest in "ethnic" literature and the embrace of the personal narrative. Depending on their author and intended audience, these autobiographical works tend to emphasize either the fruitful links between Jews and Muslims before their disruption caused by the historical and cultural changes of the second half of the twentieth century, or the tragedy of the increasing inhospitality of the ancestral home.

These memoirs are written in Arabic by those who maintained it as their mother tongue; in French by those who studied at *Alliance Israélite Universelle schools; in Hebrew by those who immigrated to *Israel; and in English by those wishing to reach a larger – and western – audience. They re-create a life that no longer exists, often including rich details of the quotidian that evoke a time before electricity and nationalism, in which Jewish *festivals and traditional *customs were woven into the daily routine and the family sat at the center.

Most of these memoirs take place during times of intense societal changes, including increasing secularization, modernization, and urbanization. As traditional Muslim societies became more aware of the larger world and as ideas of political nationalism spread, the status of Jews changed. The memoirs portray these changes from the perspectives of individuals, depicting personal stories against tumultuous historical backdrops. The audiences for these works are the writers themselves and their peers, their children, and Jews from very different backgrounds. One of the earliest such works – Albert Memmi's 1953 autobiographical novel La Statue de Sel (Pillar of Salt), the story of a young Jewish boy growing up in French-colonized and *Nazi-occupied Tunisia – has become a classic (see NORTH AFRICA). Although nearly every community has its chronicler, a greater number of works are set in *Egypt, *Iran, and *Iraq.

A number of Egyptian-born writers have followed essayist Jacqueline Kahanoff's lead in writing about the Levantine dimension of their lives. Her From East the Sun, originally written in English, was first published in Aharon Amir's Hebrew translation Memizrah ha-Shemesh (1978). André Aciman (Out of Egypt; 1994), Gini Alhadeff (The Sun at Midday: Tales of a Mediterranean Family; 1997), and Lucette Lagnado (The Man in the Sharkskin Suit; 2007) also recall their origins in Egypt: They write of cosmopolitan families; eccentric relatives; the colorful confusion of languages, cultures, and identities; and the devastating impact of dislocation and exile.

Although Alexandria is the more Mediterranean of Egypt's major cities, Cairo is also a site of multiculturalism and of fluid identities. Cairo-born Claudia Roden develops the language of food, offering memories of her lost past through tracking down other displaced Middle Easterners to gather recipes and compile cookbooks. Her first cookbook, A Book of Middle Eastern Food (1974), intersperses stories and personal reminiscences with recipes. The book works on two levels: a sharing of memories with compatriots and a culinary introduction to the region for a western audience. The texts based in Egypt share a number of memories – the quail harvest, summers in Alexandria, street vendors, social stratification, shifting identities, and multilingualism: French for culture and education, Italian for assumed identity, *Ladino and/or Turkish from the past, and Arabic limited to the lower classes and thus the kitchen, with English as a language of the future.

In recent years a number of Jewish women have joined their non-Jewish counterparts in writing memoirs set in Iran. (For a variety of reasons these memoirs tend to be written in English.) Although the 1979 revolution is the catalyst for nearly all of them, the difference is that the Jewish writers do not tend to idealize pre-revolutionary Iran. Instead they show themselves chafing against the restrictions that limited them as girls and the hatred that threatens them as Jews. Examples include Roya Hakakian, Journey from the Land of No: A Memoir of a Girlhood Caught in Revolutionary Iran (2004); Farideh Goldin, Wedding Song: Memoirs of an Iranian Jewish Woman (2003); Dalia Sofer, Septembers of Shiraz (2007); and the autobiographical fiction of Gina Nahai (Moonlight on the Avenue of Faith; 1999; The Eye of the Peacock; 2000, and Caspian Rain; 2008).

A number of writers have memorialized Iraq – and especially Baghdad – from before the great exodus of the Jewish community in the middle of the last century. These memoirs tend to portray the lively cultural exchange during the literary renaissance – the friendships among Arabs and Kurds, Muslims, Christians, and Jews that took place in the coffeehouses. Although Nissim Rejwan (Last Jews in Baghdad; 2004) describes a lower class background, Isaac bar Moshe (Khuruj Min al-Iraq [Leaving Iraq, 1975]; Beit fi Baghdad [A House in Baghdad], 1983) and Sasson Somekh (Baghdad Etmol [Baghdad Yesterday]; 2003) are from the comfortable middle class. Their memoirs, written in Arabic, recall overlapping social circles and intellectual development, but Bar Moshe details the unraveling of the community in far greater detail than other authors. In a novelized autobiography, Mona Yahia (When the Gray Beetles Took over Baghdad, 2000) further fleshes out the community's collapse. Earlier works in Arabic include Kull Shay Hadi fi al-Iyadah (All Quiet in the Surgery, 1981) by physician Salman Darwishe and Qissat Hayati fi Wadi al-Rafidayn (The Story of My Life in Mesopotamia, 1980) by poet Anwar Shaul. Violette Shamash (1918–2006) provides an overview of twentieth-century Jewish life and history in Iraq through events in the lives of her own family in Memories of Eden: A Journey through Jewish Baghdad (2008).

Recently, the children of those who grew up in Arab lands have begun to publish memoirs recovering their parents' histories; for example, Jack Marshall, From Baghdad to Brooklyn: Growing up in a Jewish-Arabic Family in Midcentury America (2005); Marina Benjamin, The Last Days in Babylon: The History of a Family, the Story of a Nation (2006); and Ariel Sabar, My Father's Paradise: A Son's Search for His Family's Past (2007). This last book documents the decline of the small Jewish community in *Kurdistan and its problematic resettlement in Israel.

Although the process of recovery is a common motif – and allows these books to qualify as memoirs – it is the Mizrahi past that captures the reader's interest. Together these narratives serve to complement the Ashkenazi memoir and to correct Jewish historiography. Ranging from nostalgic to tragic, the past is either a lost idyll, a series of tribulations, or, most commonly, a combination of the two: the story of a home becoming no longer home.

NANCY E. BERG

Memoir and Life Writing: Yiddish. With the exception of a few pre-modern Yiddish memoirs, most notably the memoirs of Glikl Hameln (1689–1719; published as Zikhroynes in 1896; see GLÜCKEL OF HAMELN), Yiddish lifewriting developed in the 1880s. The first biographical entries on Yiddish writers appeared in 1889 in Nahum Sokolov's Sefer Zikaron le-Sofrei Yisrael ha-Khaim Itanu Kayom (A Memoir Book of Contemporary Jewish Writers). Shloyme Reb Khayims (Shloyme, Hayyim's Son) by Mendeley Mokher Seferim (the pseudonym of Sholem Jacob Abramovich), written between 1894–1914, is the first Yiddish autobiographical novel; the first part, Petikhta, was originally written in Hebrew and later reworked in Yiddish. This work is paradigmatic of the Yiddish autobiographical genre in its rejection of the confessional model that has characterized the genre in Hebrew. Instead, Shloyme Reb Khayims presents a fictionalized version of the author's life narrative and embeds it within a larger Jewish context by foregrounding ethnographic and cultural historical phenomena. Sholem Aleichem's autobiographical Funem Yarid (From the Fair; 1913–16) was modeled on Abramovich's recollections and presents episodes from the author's childhood and early youth in novelized form. This is in contrast to I. L. Peretz's mature self-examination in Mayne Zikhroynes (My Memoirs; 1913–16; see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM 1800 TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY).

In addition to literary autobiography, other subgenres of Yiddish life writing emerged in the twentieth century. Ezekiel Kotik's Mayne Zikhroynes (My Memoirs; 1913) exemplifies a Yiddish ethnographic memoir. Yiddish memoirs of Jewish political leaders and party members, cultural leaders, actors, painters, and other artists also proliferated. A prime example is Abraham Cahan's five-volume Bleter fun mayn lebn (Pages from My Life; 1926–36). One rich literary form was the autobiographical poeme or long narrative poem. Examples include Menahem Boreyso's Der Geyer. Kapitln fun a Lebn (The Walker: Chapters from a Life; 1943); and Y. Y. Schwartz, Kentoki (Kentucky; 1925) and Yunge yorn (Youth; 1952). A particularly important subgenre is the Yiddish khurbn or *Holocaust memoir, originally crafted as testimony and eyewitness accounts (see also HOLOCAUST DIARIES). These are exemplified by Mark Turkov's 176-volume series, Dos Poylishe Yidntum (Polish Jewry; published in Buenos Aires between 1946 and 1966), which includes Elie Wiesel's 1955 Un di Velt hot Geshvign (And the World Was Silent; later reworked in English as Night).

The artistically most accomplished Yiddish autobiographical novels are Jacob Glatstein's Ven Yash iz Geforn (When Yash Set Out; 1938) and Ven Yash iz Gekumen (When Yash Arrived; 1940); Jonah Rosenfeld's Eyner Aleyn (All Alone; 1940); Y. Y. Trunk's seven-volume Poyln: Zikhroynes un Bilder (Poland: Memoirs and Pictures; 1944–53); I. J. Singer, Fun a Velt Vos iz Nishto Mer (From a World That Is No More; 1946); Dovid Bergelson's Bam Dnyepr (On the Dnieper; 1932, 1940); and I. B. Singer's rich and diverse autobiographical oeuvre, including In mayn tatns bezdn-shtub (1956; published in 1966 in English as In My Father's Court). More recent examples include Joseph Buloff's Fun Altn Markplats (From the Old Marketplace; 1995) and Boris Sandler's Lamedvovnikes fun mayn zikorn (Lamedvovniks from My Memory; serialized in Forverts, 2005).

Although women writers have produced few major novels in Yiddish, some, in addition to Glikl Hameln, have excelled as writers of autobiography. Examples include Bella *Chagall's Brenendike Likht (1945; published in English as Burning Lights, 1946); Esther Singer Kreitman's Sheydim-Tants (Demon's Dance, 1936; published in English as Deborah, 1983); Hinde Bergner, In di lange vinternekht (In the Long Winter Nights; 1946), and Puah Rakovsky, Zikhroynes fun a yidisher revolutsyonerin (Memoirs of a Jewish Woman Revolutionary, 1953; published in English as My Life as a Radical Jewish Woman, ed. P. E. Hyman [2001]).

Three recent critical studies of the Jewish autobiography provide the first systematic attempts in English to establish coherent theoretical and historical frameworks. Marcus Moseley's application of Rousseau's confessional paradigm situates the field in a historical context of publication data, critical reception, and textual influence. The only book-length study of Yiddish autobiographical writing to date is Jan Schwarz's Imagining Lives, which establishes a theoretical framework encompassing the diversity and variety of Yiddish life writing with particular focus on the autobiographical novel. The book provides close readings of eight autobiographical works by seven Yiddish writers highlighting ethnography, genre hybridity, and lack of self-examination. Schwarz also discusses the most influential exceptions – the confessional works of I. L. Peretz, I. B. Singer, and Jonah Rosenfeld – noting that “Yiddish writers became masters of comic relief, irony, meta-discourse and wordplay inscribed in a literary discourse that was highly ambivalent about modern concepts such as ‘privacy,’ ‘inwardness’ and ‘self’” (160).

The more than eight hundred Yizkor* books (memorial volumes) of Eastern European Jewish communities assembled and published by Holocaust survivors provide a treasure trove of Yiddish autobiographical material, much of which has never been translated (see HOLOCAUST DIARIES). A rich collection of autobiographies by young people, mostly in Yiddish, submitted to YIVO* competitions in the 1930s, has been edited by Jeffrey Shandler.

For further reading, see J. Shandler, ed., Awakening Lives: Autobiographies of Jewish Youth in Poland before the Holocaust (2002); M. Stanislawski, Autobiographical Jews: Essays in Jewish Self-Fashioning (2004); J. Schwarz, Imagining Lives: Autobiographical Fiction of Yiddish Writers (2005); M. Moseley, Being for Myself Alone: Origins of Jewish Autobiography (2006); D. Assaf, “Introduction,” Journey to a Nineteenth-Century Shtetl: The Memoirs of Yekhezkel Kotik (2002); J. Kugelmass and J. Boyarin, eds., From a Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry (1998); and E. Lifschutz, Bibliography of American and Canadian Jewish Memoirs and Autobiographies (1970).

JAN SCHWARZ

Menasseh Ben Israel (1604–1657) was an Amsterdam* rabbi, author, and publisher who attempted to negotiate the readmission of Jews to Britain*. Born Manoel Dias Soeiro to converso* parents who had left Portugal* in 1603, he arrived in Amsterdam with his family as a child. A talented orator, he became rabbi of the Neveh Shalom congregation at age eighteen. In 1627 he founded Amsterdam's first Hebrew printing* press. One of his earliest writings, El Conciliador, which attempted to reconcile discrepancies in the Hebrew Bible*, won him recognition from Jews and Gentiles, and he began corresponding with prominent non-Jewish scholars. Ben Israel wrote several other treatises on Jewish doctrine, including Nishmat Hayyim (On the Immortality of the Soul), which discusses reincarnation of souls. In 1650 he published the Hope of Israel in Spanish, Hebrew, Latin, and English. This volume dealt with the claim of Aaron Levi Montezinos (Antonio de Montesinos) that the natives of the Andes are descendants of the ten lost tribes of Israel (see ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; and TRIBES, TEN LOST), and in it Ben Israel argued that Jews have to reside in England (as well as all other parts of the world) for the messiah to come (see MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN). In 1655 he traveled to England to promote the official recognition of Jews. Oliver Cromwell, who led England at that time, was open to Jewish readmission and called the Whitehall Conference in December 1655 to consider whether and under what conditions it was lawful to admit Jews. Although millennialists supported readmission, merchants feared commercial competition and antisemitic* literature probably influenced public opinion against the proposal as well. Rather than have a negative decision on record, Cromwell dismissed the gathering. In 1656 Menasseh ben Israel published Vindiciae Judaearum in defense of the Jews. He returned to Amsterdam in 1657 after being granted a pension from Cromwell and died later that year.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Mendelssohn, Moses (1729–1786) was a German Enlightenment thinker and writer and the central figure in the initial stages of the Haskalah*, the Jewish Enlightenment movement. Born in Dessau (Anhalt), the fourteen-year-old Moses Mendelssohn walked to Berlin* to continue learning with his mentor David Fraenkel, who had been named rabbi in Berlin. Fraenkel's introduced Mendelssohn to the Haskalah*, the religious enlightenment of Judaism in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries that echoed the contemporaneous scientific and intellectual revolutions in European thought. In Berlin Mendelssohn befriended several Jews (including Aron Gumpertz and Israel Samoscz) who studied European and ancient languages, mathematics, medicine*, and natural science* along with more traditional Jewish subjects; under their guidance Mendelssohn immersed himself in contemporary theology, ancient philosophy, and classical literature. He earned a small livelihood, first through tutoring and then as a bookkeeper for a silk manufacturing company (one of the professions available to Jews in Prussia); later he became a partner and then inherited the business, working full time throughout his life. Mendelssohn married Fromet Guggenheim in 1762; together they had ten children – Sara, Brendel (later Dorothea von Schlegel), Chaim, Recha, Mendel, Joseph, Yente (later Henriette), Abraham, Sisa, and Nathan; five survived to adulthood.

Over the course of his successful intellectual career, Mendelssohn published widely (and often anonymously) in German (on aesthetics, belles lettres, metaphysics, mathematics, contract law, religious liberty, and Judaism*) and in Hebrew (on logic, aesthetics*, literature*, halakhah*, medieval theology, and Bible* commentary). With his close friends Gotthold Ephraim Lessing and Friedrich Nicolai, Mendelssohn co-edited the Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und der freyen Künste (Library of the Fine Arts and the Arts of Freedom, 1757–58) and the Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend (Letters Concerning the Latest Literature, 1759–65), two of the main organs of the German Enlightenment in the eighteenth century. In his aesthetics, Mendelssohn introduced and greatly expanded the ideas of the sublime, the ugly, genius, tragedy, and the creative use of human imagination; his innovative theory of language took advantage of Enlightenment ideas about language formation, the transference of symbols, semiotic significance, and cultural development. His work in metaphysics, Phaëdon or On the Immortality of the Soul, in Three Dialogues (1767), brought him international attention and earned him the oft-quoted moniker, the “German Socrates”; even before its publication Mendelssohn's reputation as a philosopher was secured with his two prize-winning essays, “Pope, A Metaphysician!” (1755, co-written with Lessing) and “On Evidence in Metaphysical Sciences” (1763). Famous for his clear prose, philosophical acumen, and adherence to Judaism, Mendelssohn's publications came to an abrupt halt after he suffered a severe breakdown brought about by the public appeal for his conversion to Christianity by Swiss pastor Johann Caspar Lavater in 1769–70 and the royal rejection of his admission to the Berlin Academy (despite unanimous nomination).

After a slow recovery, Mendelssohn turned his attention toward *Bible translation, including the *Psalms and *Ecclesiastes, before issuing a full translation of the *Torah (transliterated into German using Hebrew characters), accompanied by a commentary called the Bi'ur (1780–83). Many Jewish leaders reacted negatively to his endeavor. The sting of the epithet, “the Jewish Luther,” was fully intended; both the translation and the Bi'ur were rejected by halakhic authorities in *Central Europe who saw the effort as a thinly veiled attempt to teach *Yiddish-speaking Jews the German language and thereby introduce them to the secularizing forces of European culture.

However, Mendelssohn's prominence allowed him to aid several Jewish communities threatened with expulsion, heavy taxation, or violence; he prevailed on powerful figures among his non-Jewish contacts to use their influence to help where and when they could. Mendelssohn interceded in a dispute about early burial in Mecklenburg-Schwerin; Pastor Lavater intervened at Mendelssohn's request on behalf of a Swiss Jewish community; and Mendelssohn's close acquaintance, Wilhelm von Dohm, helped when Jews in Alsace-Lorraine were endangered. Dohm's treatise advocating Jewish civil *emancipation, On the Civil Improvement of the Jews (1781), launched a public debate that lasted a century. The following year, Mendelssohn published a German translation of *Menasseh ben Israel's 1656 appeal to Oliver Cromwell, Vindicae Judaerum, to which he attached a lengthy preface that advocated Jewish civil acceptance on economic and humanitarian grounds.

That work prompted a second conversionary appeal from an anonymous author (later revealed as August Cranz). Unlike the Lavater affair, Mendelssohn used this opportunity to write a full-scale rational defense of Judaism, Jerusalem, or On Ecclesiastical Power and Judaism (1783), a work that begins with a discursive analysis of the need to separate church from state. In addition to his political and religious works, Mendelssohn continued to publish in philosophy, particularly with an eye toward education and edification; his Morning Hours, or Lectures on the Existence of God (1785) is a collection of a series of lectures delivered to his son and a close circle of friends. At the same time, Mendelssohn became involved in a controversy regarding Lessing's reputation as a natural philosopher (the so-called Pantheism Debate). Against the charge that his friend held closely guarded secrets about his true religiosity, Mendelssohn aggressively argued that Lessing had been theologically misunderstood. The exchange of letters and essays became so fierce that early in January 1786 Mendelssohn ran to his publisher without a coat, became quite ill very quickly, and died within a few days.

The public mourning on news of his death was international in scope, and plans began immediately to erect a monument to his memory. A rise in anti-Jewish sentiment thwarted that effort, but within the German Jewish community Mendelssohn became a model of the possibilities of Jewish Enlightenment, intellectual aptitude, and, somewhat ironically, ecumenical dialogue. The Hebrew biographical eulogy written by Isaac Euchel, a leading figure in the Haskalah, made Mendelssohn a symbol of the potential within Jewish scholarship and solidified his place in the histories of modern philosophy, Jewish *thought, and Jewish *emancipation. In modern Judaism, Mendelssohn is alternately reviled (by those who blame him for liberal forms of Judaism and the organizational breakdown of traditional Judaism) and revered (by those who praise him for opening the *ghetto doors). In fact, his admirers included Samson Raphael *Hirsch and David *Friedländer, two very different Jewish thinkers whose influence on nineteenth-century German Jewry had widely distinct impacts. For further reading, see A. Altmann, Moses Mendelssohn: A Biographical Study (1973); and S. Feiner, Moses Mendelssohn: Sage of Modernity (2010).

LEAH HOCHMAN

Mendes-Nasi Family. The most prominent and best known figures of Ottoman Jewry were the Portuguese conversos, Gracia Mendes (ca. 1510–1569) and her nephew, Joseph Nasi (ca. 1524–1579). The Mendes-Nasi *banking house was renowned throughout Europe for its wide-ranging commercial activities and its list of prominent clients, which included the royal houses of *France and *Spain. In 1553, Gracia settled in Istanbul, and Joseph followed her in 1554. In Istanbul, they openly returned to *Judaism and became leading members of the Jewish community. They also became heavily engaged in tax farming and commercial enterprises. To manage their affairs in the *Ottoman Empire and Europe, Gracia and Joseph developed a broad network of agents, functionaries, and correspondents. Joseph's familiarity with European affairs, and his many informants, made him an invaluable advisor to the Ottoman court. Among various honors, he received an official appointment as governor of Naxos and the Cyclades archipelago.

Both Gracia and Joseph were deeply involved in philanthropic activities within the Jewish communities of Istanbul and Salonika, where they founded synagogues and yeshivot and supported scholars. Gracia and later Joseph, who became her son-in-law in 1553 when he married his cousin Reyna, secured from the sultan a concession to develop the *Galilee town of Tiberias, then in ruins, and its vicinity. They founded a yeshivah there and completed the reconstruction of the town's walls in 1565. Although Jews did settle in Tiberias and its community flourished for a while, the project encountered numerous difficulties and was abandoned in the seventeenth century. See also, WOMEN, EARLY MODERN.

A VIGDOR LEVY

Menorah. Menorah is the Hebrew word for a stand or repository for a lamp. This term generally designates the golden lamp stand of the wilderness *Tabernacle, as described in *Pentateuchal texts, and also the ten golden lamp stands of the First *Temple (1 Kgs 7:49). A cylindrical, unbranched menorah with a single lamp, probably seven-spouted, perhaps stood in a pre-monarchic tent shrine (see Lev 24:1; cf. 1 Sam 3:3). The First Temple lamp stands, also unbranched, held multi-spouted lamps (see Zech 4:2). The elaborate seven-branched menorah of the Second *Temple, as known from ancient art as well as *Josephus and *rabbinic literature, probably influenced the description (Exod 25:31–40; 37:17–24) of the Tabernacle menorah. With its branches and elaborate botanical decorations, it would have resembled a stylized tree and thus symbolized divine power as a source of fertility. Its lamps may have signified divine omniscience. Like the other sacred furnishings, the menorah contributed to the sense of divine presence in *God's earthly dwelling.

CAROL MEYERS

Menorah Association, the intercollegiate national Jewish organization devoted to serving the needs of American Jewish undergraduates, came into being at a time when American Jewish college students were far and few between and campus life was inhospitable to expressions of Jewish collective identity. Established at Harvard in 1906, where, as one of its sayings would have it, young American Jews were encouraged to find themselves "as Jews in the modern world, without ghettoism and yet with a certain distinction," the Menorah Association spread to some eighty campuses by 1920, before losing ground to *Hillel at one end of the spectrum and Jewish *fraternities and sororities at the other. In the years before *World War I, the organization provided a public address for Jewish collegians – a place for intellectual give-and-take and socializing.

The Menorah Association went on to publish a sophisticated intellectual magazine known as The Menorah Journal (published in various forms between 1915–62), which intended, according to the editorial statement in the first issue, to be "a Jewish forum open to all sides, devoted first and last to bringing out the values of Jewish culture and ideals, of Hebraism and of Judaism and striving for their advancement." Its impact on American Jewish arts and letters was far reaching, especially during the interwar years. Within its "timely, vivacious, and readable" pages, contributors as varied as Salo Baron, Sidney Hook, Mordecai M. *Kaplan, Lewis Mumford, Solomon *Schechter, and Lionel Trilling reckoned with the challenges and possibilities of the modern Jewish experience.

JENNA WEISSMAN JOSELIT

Mesopotamia and Ancient Israel. Mesopotamia ("between the rivers") refers to the geographical area on both sides of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers extending northward from the Persian Gulf. Now constituted as *Iraq, this fertile area was one of the birthplaces of urban civilization and the development of a system of writing. With the nineteenth-century decipherment of cuneiform, which used wedge-shaped symbols to indicate words and syllables, hundreds of thousands of tablets and monumental inscriptions became available to modern scholars. These were written in a variety of languages, including Sumerian, Hittite, Hurrian, and Akkadian. Along with the discovery of this literary heritage of the ancient *Near East came the realization that certain sections of the *Pentateuch show a remarkable correspondence with Akkadian texts in particular. These correlations can be grouped into four categories.

MYTHOLOGICAL TEXTS AND GENESIS 1–11: *Genesis 1–11 tells the story of humankind from creation to *Abraham. Numerous aspects of this narrative demonstrate familiarity with Mesopotamian culture. Although Genesis 1 has several interesting parallels with the Babylonian epic of creation, called Enuma Elish, the *flood story of Genesis 6–9 provides the most striking parallels with Mesopotamian texts, particularly with the epics of Gilgamesh and Atrahasis.

Common to the *Bible and these texts are the following elements: the gods/God decide to send a flood; one man is chosen to build a boat and save himself, his family members, and creatures; the boat comes to rest on a mountain; the hero sends out birds to see if the land has dried sufficiently to disembark; the hero offers a sacrifice; and human history begins anew. The most notable contrasts between the Bible and the epic of Atrahasis concern the reasons for the flood and the measures taken to prevent future catastrophes. In the Mesopotamian myth, the gods bring the great flood because of the incessant noise caused by humankind, which is generally understood as a reference to overpopulation. Subsequently, in an effort to stem overpopulation, the gods introduce infertility, stillbirth, and women who are not allowed to reproduce. This stands in stark contrast with the Bible's assertion that humankind was wiped out because of their corrupt and violent nature. Similarly, in the aftermath of the flood, the Israelite God introduces capital punishment for homicide and repeatedly prescribes that *Noah's family "be fruitful and multiply" (Gen 9:1–7). The Bible's assertion that the ark came to rest on Mount Ararat in present-day Armenia, and not on a mountaintop in the vicinity of the Land of Israel, is also suggestive of the Mesopotamian origins of the biblical account. Further, the story of the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11 offers an obvious satire on Mesopotamian culture, because the tower is certainly a reference to a ziggurat, a tall pyramidal structure found in a typical Mesopotamian temple complex that was thought to provide a connecting link between heaven and earth. In the Torah, the tower represents humanity's rejection of God's command to "fill the earth" (9:1, 7) and thus results in their scattering and disunity. According to this tongue-in-cheek view of a characteristic Mesopotamian institution, "Babel," which in Akkadian means "gate of god," is equated with confused gibberish as God "confounds" (Hebrew, balal) human speech (Gen 11:9).

SOCIAL CUSTOMS AND THE ANCESTORS OF ISRAEL: The discovery of a large archive at Nuzi, in present-day northeastern Iraq, provides scholars with extensive family records offering details regarding *marriage, *adoption, and inheritance practices in the fifteenth century BCE. Although a previous generation of scholars may have exaggerated the parallels between the social customs of Nuzi and the ancestors of Israel, it is clear that the patriarchs and their families as represented in biblical narratives, were very much a part of the culture of the ancient Near East (see BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES). For example, just as Laban makes *Jacob swear that he will take no wives in addition to his daughters *Rachel and *Leah (Gen 31:50), so Nuzi marriage contracts include a clause prohibiting the husband's marriage to additional women in order to safeguard the status of the first wife. That the firstborn son is entitled to a greater or perhaps double portion of the inheritance is documented at Nuzi and in other ancient Near Eastern legal sources (see LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST and HEBREW BIBLE) and is assumed in the Genesis narratives (see Deut 21:17). The practice of an infertile wife providing her husband with a concubine or slave wife to bear children is found several times in Genesis (chapters 16, 30) and is well documented in ancient Near Eastern law codes.

BIBLICAL AND CUNEIFORM LAW: Collections of legal material from the ancient Near East generally pre-date the *Torah, but the two legal bodies share several features in common. The Code of *Hammurabi, dated to the eighteenth century BCE, is the most famous law collection because it is the most extensive, consisting of a prologue, epilogue, and 282 laws. One element typical of these law collections is their “case law” or “if-then” phraseology; this casuistic style is also found in Exodus 21–22. In addition, the Torah incorporates several legal themes found in Mesopotamian law. Among these are the following: (1) The Goring Ox: Exodus 21 contains several stipulations regarding an ox that gores people or other oxen. If the ox had a previous history of goring and the owner neglected to take precautions, the penalty is more severe. This same distinction is made in the Laws of Hammurabi and the Laws of Eshnunna. Exodus 21:35 stipulates that, if an ox gores and kills another man’s ox, both oxen, the dead and the live, are sold and the owners split the proceeds; the same is found in the Laws of Eshnunna 53; (2) Battery of a Pregnant Woman: Israelite and Mesopotamian laws both deal with the penalty for a man who hits a pregnant woman and causes her to lose her fetus or her life (Exod 21:21–22; Lipit Ishtar d–e–f; CH 209–214, Middle Assyrian Law 21, 51–52); and (3) “Eye for an Eye”: the legal principle of exact retribution is found in the Torah and the Hammurabi code (Exod 21:24–24; Lev 24:20; LH 196–200), but in the latter it only applies to the upper class.

However, although there is overlap in style and subject matter, fundamental differences are obvious. Mesopotamian law takes the principle of exact retribution to an extreme and therefore prescribes vicarious punishment, so that according to Hammurabi’s laws, a builder has to hand over his son for execution if his shoddy construction kills the son of the owner of a home he built. The Torah rejects this principle. In addition, Israel was unique in its belief that only God can promulgate law. Outside of the Bible, law functioned as the expression of the king’s will, and the gods served only to inspire him with attributes of equity and justice. Modern scholars assume that the ordinances in these legal collections were never actually imposed on the people but rather functioned as royal propaganda to assert the king’s legitimacy because he was seen as instituting justice. The extent to which the people of ancient Israel observed the laws of the Torah is unclear, but their explicit purpose was to serve as the stipulations of God’s *covenant with Israel, with the purpose of producing a “holy nation” (Exod 19:6). Thus, unlike Mesopotamian law, the Torah includes legislation regarding rituals, religious festivals, and admonitions of a moral nature, such as the prohibition of mistreating vulnerable members of society and the commandment to “love one’s fellow as oneself” (Lev 19:18).

COVENANT AND TREATY FORMS: Many of the texts recovered from the ancient Near East were found in royal archives so it is not surprising that treaties between kings, both of small city-states and vast empires, are available for comparison with biblical texts. The two major sources of these political texts are the *Hittite Empire (present-day Turkey in the period 1500–1400 BCE) and the Neo-Assyrian period (northern Iraq, 750–610 BCE). An analysis of the treaties and the covenant forms found in the Torah leads many scholars to conclude that Israelite authors borrowed a form used by other peoples to express political fealty to convey Israel’s *covenant relationship with its God.

For example, the basic elements of the sixty-odd treaties found include the following: (1) an introduction of the speaker, the king or overlord, and the basis of his authority to proclaim a treaty; (2) the historical prologue, which recounts the previous relationship of the treaty partners; (3) the stipulations of the treaty, including nonaggression, payment of tribute, and the prohibition of making treaties with the overlord’s enemies; (4) a statement concerning the disposition of the document and when it is read; (5) calling of the gods to witness the treaty-making; and (6) enumeration of blessings for those who observe the terms of the document and curses for those who transgress. These elements do not all occur in every treaty; however, the treaties as a whole exhibit a basic unity. In the Hebrew Bible, the texts that describe the covenant at Sinai (Exod 20–24, as well as the book of Deuteronomy), exhibit almost all of these elements, whereas Leviticus 26 preserves a catalogue of blessings and curses linked to Israel’s adherence to the covenant. Thus, modern scholars assume that Israelite theologians adopted a contractual form known in ancient Near Eastern political life to express a vassal king’s exclusive relationship with his overlord to express Israel’s religious belief that its relationship with its God is also exclusive.

For further reading, see John H. Walton, Ancient Israelite Literature in Its Cultural Context (1994); A. Kuhrt, The Ancient Near East 3000–330 BC (1995); and J. B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (1969). Map 1

ELAINE GOODFRIEND

Messianism: Biblical and *Second Temple Eras. Messiah is an anglicized form of the Hebrew word for “an anointed one,” mashiah. *Anointment with oil was a characteristic Hebrew ritual of initiation into a divinely sanctioned role, particularly as king. A few passages in the prophetic writings in the Hebrew *Bible express an expectation that at some future time God would establish an anointed king who would rule with justice and righteousness. Because several biblical statements promised that Israel would never fail to have a king of the seed of *David (*2 Sam 7), Jews naturally believed that this ruler would be a descendant of King David. The expected king is sometimes called the son of David (Isa 11; Ezek 35; Micah 5; Jer 33:14–16; Zech 9), or he is called the “branch,” ostensibly a “new shoot of the Davidic family tree” (Jer 23). The messiah of the Hebrew Bible is a human being who will restore Israel to its former independence and prominence. As God’s anointed, he is, according to Isaiah 11:3–4, the strong vindicator who will carry out divine vengeance against Israel’s enemies.

Messianic expectations also appear in *apocalyptic and pseudepigraphical writings (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). In the pseudepigraphical Psalm of Solomon, dated variously to the first century BCE or CE, the theme of the victorious battles of the messiah is extended against all those Gentile nations who have harmed Jerusalem, and the messiah himself is seen as a blameless ruler (17:36–37a, 39–40). In the *Dead Sea Scrolls the generic term “messiah” describes an expected rule by two concurrent messiahs: a priestly messiah descended from *Aaron and an anointed descendant of David.

Messianism: Early Modern. Jews in the centuries between approximately 1400 and 1800 drew from a long tradition and a rich array of biblical, rabbinic, and medieval Jewish sources in thinking about the messiah and the end of days. Significant historical and social developments, such as the 1492 expulsion of the Jews from Spain, fueled messianic conjecture. Early modern Jewish messianism was also closely connected to Christian and Islamic messianic speculation. Although generally discouraged by rabbinic authorities, some early modern Jews did attempt to calculate the beginning of the messianic era.

Jewish messianic views were rarely simple and not always uniform. For example, some Jews believed that the coming of the messiah would be accompanied by an apocalyptic overturning of society through warfare, natural disaster, and cosmic changes. Others imagined a more peaceful transformation. In either event, messianism addressed the challenge of divine promise and current and historical suffering by positing a future reality that reestablished the position of Jews and Judaism. This was a comforting notion at times of persecution and marginalization; messianic anticipation could also serve as a catalyst for early modern Jews to repent for their own perceived shortcomings.

Throughout the Early Modern period, numerous Jews claimed to be harbingers of the messiah or the messiah himself. One example is the early-sixteenth-century figure Asher Lemlein of Ruetlingen, who circulated around Germany and northern Italy. Asher was reported to have claimed the title of prophet and had some success gathering followers and believers in his doctrines and in his ascetic practices of fasting and flagellation. Other well-known messianic figures included David Reuveni, who approached the pope in the 1520s to obtain a letter to the Holy Roman Emperor and king of France in a quest to secure arms for his alleged state, and Solomon Molkho, who had some interactions with Reuveni and was viewed by some as a messianic prophet. Reuveni found support among Jews in Rome, especially among conversos, some of whom believed he heralded the messiah. Molkho's parents were Portuguese conversos. He traveled extensively in Europe and the Ottoman Empire, before being burned at the stake in 1538 in Mantua, Italy for refusing to return to Christianity.

Jewish messianism took on mystical dimensions in sixteenth-century Safed, where Isaac Luria stood at the center of a colorful group of kabbalists and ascetics. Under Luria's teaching, the emphasis on human actions in bringing about the final redemption reached new heights. Dramatic events and discoveries, especially those in the New World, further excited messianic speculation. The important Amsterdam rabbinic leader Menasseh ben Israel (1604–1657), who developed a host of relationships with Christian scholars and who advocated vociferously for the readmission of Jews to England, speculated about connections between North America natives and legendary accounts of the "Ten Lost Tribes" (see TRIBES, TEN LOST).

Popular legends during this period also told about warrior Jews, hiding in the mountains, waiting to usher in apocalyptic times. The myth of the "Red Jews" provided a powerful image for a Christian society expecting the apocalypse and fearing the very real westward spread of the Turks. It simultaneously reinforced anti-Jewish stereotypes and the fear that the Jews were plotting, this time with military assistance, the overthrow of Christianity and the establishment of Jewish dominion over the entire world.

Certainly the best known Jewish messianic figure of the Early Modern period was Shabbatai Zevi. Zevi was born in the Ottoman city of Smyrna (Izmir) in 1626. After an extended period of semi-seclusion between 1642 and 1648, he publicly proclaimed himself the messiah. Later, in 1665 in an apparent trance, Nathan of Gaza (1644–1680), who would become something like Zevi's publicity agent, made several utterances, including referring to Zevi as the messiah and to himself as a prophet chosen by God. Zevi traveled to Jerusalem, but was expelled by the rabbis there. Tales of his alleged miracles spread throughout Europe and the Islamic world; he was credited with resurrection of the dead, among other wonders. Although many, including prominent lay people and rabbinic leaders, discounted Zevi and his accomplice, large numbers of Jews were apparently convinced that the messianic era was beginning. Poor economic conditions and the penitential aspects of his messianism may have added to Zevi's appeal (see also WOMEN: EARLY MODERN PERIOD).

In 1666 Zevi sailed to Constantinople from Smyrna, where he announced he would assume rule over the Ottoman state. In February of that year, he was arrested by Turkish authorities. After being imprisoned and given the choice between death and conversion to Islam, Zevi became a Muslim. He was eventually banished to Albania, where he died in 1676. Although many followers were quite naturally devastated, some held fast to their belief in the failed messiah, convinced by Nathan of Gaza that Zevi had to penetrate the world of Islam to elevate the remaining divine sparks and save the Muslims from evil, before ushering in the messianic era. Others supporters argued that Zevi was indeed the messiah, but was the Messiah son of Joseph, who would serve as a precursor to the Messiah son of David. Small pockets of believers endured long after Zevi's conversion and death, forming sectarian Sabbatean groups. Such beliefs were frequently condemned; Sabbateans were excommunicated by the Polish Council of Four Lands in 1669.

Among important studies on this topic, see A. H. Silver, A History of Messianic Speculation in Israel: From the First through the Seventeenth Centuries (1927; rep. 1959); M. Saperstein, ed., Essential Papers on Messianic Movements and Personalities in Jewish History (1992); M. Goldish, The Sabbatean Prophets (2004); A. Gow, The Red Jews: Antisemitism in an Apocalyptic Age, 1200–1600 (1995); and D. B. Ruderman, "Hope against Hope: Jewish and Christian Messianic Expectations in the Late Middle Ages," in Exile and Diaspora: Studies in the History of the Jewish People Presented to Professor Haim Beinart, ed. A. Mirsky, A. Grossman, and Y. Kaplan (1991), 185–202.

DEAN PHILLIP BELL

Messianism: Modern Approaches. There are a number of approaches to the issue of messianism in twenty-first-century Judaism. One of the most prominent originates in attempts to explain why Jews do not consider Jesus to be the messiah. A frequent Jewish answer is that sources in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple era texts pre-determined Jewish messianic expectation in the first century CE toward a figure who would win political independence from Rome; the failure of Jesus of Nazareth to do this would naturally have led contemporaneous Jews to dismiss claims that he was the messiah (Segal).

This argument, although well grounded in traditional sources, is nevertheless problematic for three reasons. First, it fails to explain the existence of “Jewish Christians” among early Christianity’s adherents, such as the author of the Gospel of Matthew (P. Schäfer). Second, this kind of argument is absent in the rabbinic literature of antiquity: When the Catalan rabbi Moses *Naḥmanides made such a claim at the Barcelona Disputation of 1263, he was among the first to do so. Most importantly, Jewish messianic views in late antiquity were not limited to a royal figure of the Davidic line. Although it is true that the term “messiah” (lit. “anointed”) refers to the king of Israel who is likened to a son of God in *Psalms 2, we also find less politicized notions of “messiah” in the binary messianism of *priest and *king in *Zechariah 4 and various *Dead Sea Scroll texts. Similarly, Second Temple and *rabbinic literature gave messianic associations to the vision in *Daniel 7 of a heavenly figure described as “one like a son of man” (Collins).

Given the difficulty of precisely defining what does or does not count as a valid messianic ideology in Judaism, a more useful approach is to develop a historical typology of the various forms in which messianic expectation has been expressed in Jewish culture. The central piece of scholarship in this regard is Gershom *Scholem’s 1959 essay, “Toward An Understanding of the Messianic Idea in Judaism.” There Scholem analyzes classical Jewish texts, kabbalistic writings, and the documents of *Sabbatean and post-Sabbatean movements (see SHABBATAI ZEVI) to demonstrate that the messianic idea in Jewish tradition is primarily associated with *apocalypse and catastrophe. For Scholem, the “revolutionary, cataclysmic element in the transition from every historical present to the messianic future” was rooted in the utopian aspect of Jewish messianism, which sees the ideal as future. (This tendency always coexists with the anti-apocalyptic “restorative” aspect of the messianic idea, which sees the ideal as past, although the ratio between the two elements differs in various historical contexts.) Scholem argued that liberal Judaism’s “bourgeois” association of the messianic idea with Enlightenment notions of progress ignored the apocalyptic aspect of Jewish tradition.

Messianic utopianism in Judaism, according to Scholem, requires an utter break between the future and the present: Present structures will be nullified and destroyed. Although he saw a great deal of potential in the ability of this anarchic element of the Jewish tradition to ground the revolutionary creativity in the *Zionism of his time, Scholem also saw dangers when the apocalyptic element in Jewish messianism was not in harmony with its more traditional restorative aspect. In Scholem’s view, the *antinomian trends that began in *Lurianic Kabbalah in the sixteenth century led to the heightened antinomianism of the radical Sabbateans who believed *Shabbatai Zevi’s conversion to Islam in 1666 to be necessary; in turn, antipathy to these trends grounded the break from Jewish history epitomized in post-Enlightenment liberal Judaism.

Scholem’s typology allows us to categorize the differing twentieth-century religious responses to Zionism summarized by Aviezer Ravitzky. The support of the *Ultra-Orthodox Neturei Karta (Guardians of the City) for *Palestinian rights is in line with a perspective that insists that the messianic era must be effected by divine intervention; therefore, the socially destructive apocalyptic energies of messianism as a human phenomenon risk detaching God from Jewish history. Similarly, Rabbi Abraham Isaac *Kook’s progressive notion of history, which led him to see the political successes of Zionism as a sign of imminent religious *redemption, is broadly utopian. The notion of the rate of progress as pre-determined, and the insistence that the present moment is on the cusp of redemption, led his son Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook (and, more broadly, the contemporary Israeli settler movement) to assert that “the State of Israel is divine.” Here, anarchy shows itself in an abandonment of political realism.

Scholem also associated the restorative pole of the messianic idea with passivity and the anarchic-utopian pole with activity. These associations are no longer viable. When a group of anti-Zionist Ultra-Orthodox Jews demonstrates outside the Israeli consulate in *New York City, is this “passive”? When West Bank settlers are carried by Israeli police from their homes during the dismantling of settlements, is this “active”? The blurring of the boundary between the anarchist and the bourgeois, which seemed so clear for Scholem, may make it desirable to view expressions of the messianic idea – and not only in the contemporary period – as strategies by which a particular worldview is validated. In other words, a messianic ideology is one of many pragmatic strategies by which a religious Jewish community hopes to achieve or sustain power of one form or another.

This is true for the rabbis of antiquity who warned against hastening the end. It is true for Maimonides’ rationalist approach to the messianic idea. It is true for Sabbateanists; it is true for Kook and Neturei Karta. It is true for the Ḥabad Ḥasidim who in the 1990s said that the messiah’s arrival was imminent, and it is true for those *Ḥabad Ḥasidim who believed that their rebbe Menaḥem Mendel *Schneerson was himself the messiah, and for those among that group who believe that Schneerson remains invisibly present within their community after his death in 1994 (Berger). It is even true of the identification of the messiah with the ethically responsible self in the writings of the twentieth-century French Jewish philosopher Emmanuel *Levinas. Where all these views differ is not in viewing messianism as a strategy, but in their convictions of where essential power resides: Is it in the divine, in the community, or in the individual? In and through those self-definitions, the parameters of lives in the historical present are drawn – even if (and perhaps because) the messiah is not present.

For further reading, see A. F. Segal, Rebecca’s Children (1986); P. Schäfer, Jesus in the Talmud (2007); J. J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star (1995); G. Scholem, The Messianic Idea in Judaism (1971); A. Ravitzky, Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism (1996); D. Berger, The Rebbe, The Messiah, and the Scandal of Orthodox Indifference (2001); E. Levinas, Difficult Freedom (1990); and M. Kavka, Jewish Messianism and the History of Philosophy (2004).

MARTIN KAVKA

Metatron refers to one of the supreme powers in the divine realm in *talmudic, *midrashic, and *kabbalistic literature. Metatron is often associated with the term sar ha-panim (prince of the countenance), meaning an entity with the power of standing face to face with God (while others are to His left, right, or behind Him). Talmudic literature associates Metatron with Exodus 23:21, “for my name is in him"; the name should therefore be interpreted as deriving from Greek tetra ("four") and the Tetragrammaton, the divine name of four letters (although other explanations have been offered, based on references to Metatron as a "messenger"). According to BT Ḥagigah 15a, the sage *Elisha ben Abuya was declared a heretic when he observed Metatron sitting on a throne in the seventh heaven and judging the world, and he said, "Perhaps there are two powers in heaven." Metatron may also be associated with the sar ha-olam (prince of the world), an opaque midrashic reference, probably to a demiurgic power. He is frequently described in hekhalot mystical literature, and the most detailed description is found in the late *pseudepigraphical work, 3 Enoch (also called The Hebrew Apocalypse of Enoch and Sefer Hekhalot [Book of the Palaces]), which describes the gradual transformation of Enoch ben Jared (Gen 5:24) into the power Metatron (see ESCHATOLOGY; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE). The identification of Metatron with Enoch was probably motivated by the wish to sever any connection between Metatron and the creation, because there were tendencies to view him as a demiurgic power. In 3 Enoch, Metatron is called a na'ar (youth or servant), and the same appellation is found in *gnostic treatises. Gershom *Scholem identified him with Yahoel, an angel who appears in The Apocalypse of Abraham, a pseudepigraphical work of the first or second century CE. Medieval kabbalists often connected Metatron with different entities of the divine realms as described in the *Kabbalah, most often with the *Shekhinah (G. Scholem, Kabbalah [1974], 377–81).

JOSEPH DAN

Mexico was probably the first European settlement in the Americas to receive Jews. A few came with *Columbus, probably escaping from the persecution of the Inquisition in the Iberian Peninsula. Yet New Spain was not particularly welcoming to Jews, even conversos, because the reigning ideologies of *Spain were instituted on the new continent. Documents relating to auto-de-fés – the public ritual of penance in which those condemned as heretics or apostates (especially Jews) were sentenced and burned at the stake – provide evidence of the persecution that Jews endured in New Spain. Moreover, derogatory concepts about Jews fostered by the Inquisition took root, entering Mexico's culture and language and remaining unchallenged.

Mexico's contemporary Jewish community traces its roots to more recent immigrants who arrived during the second half of the nineteenth century. Although a few wealthy European Jews established large business enterprises, they were too few to constitute an organization of any sort. It was the subsequent male immigrants from *Turkey, *Syria (Aleppo and Damascus), and the *Balkans, all poor, who established organized communities. Early on, they brought a rabbi (hakham) to perform rites and lead the group. The importation of brides from the "Old Countries" enabled the communities to grow and maintain their culture and religion.

*Eastern Europeans who arrived in the second decade of the twentieth century followed a small group of Jews from the *United States who had settled in Mexico, for the most part to escape conscription during *World War I. Most Eastern Europeans arrived by ship in the port of Veracruz and then traveled through the hinterland to reach Mexico City, where most settled. As the numbers of *Ashkenazim increased, Jewish communities formed along ethnic and linguistic lines. If Arabic, French, and *Ladino were the linguistic tools for the earlier groups, *Yiddish was central for the Eastern Europeans, who had also brought the different ideologies of their countries of origin. The Ashkenazim ultimately established a network of secular Jewish day schools and organizations that directed the communal life of Mexican Jews.

Although the first Ashkenazic immigrants made great strides into the business world by becoming small shopkeepers and eventually dealing in larger enterprises, their children took advantage of educational opportunities. Within a few decades, the peddlers and shopkeepers, the bakers, and the tailors of the immigrant generation were replaced by a generation of professionals who distinguished themselves in many walks of life. In the last decades of the twentieth century, Jews ventured into politics as well. By this time, *Yiddish had been supplanted by Spanish, the language in which almost all of the contemporary expression of the community is handled. Whether this trend represented a loss for the community or a welcome form of adaptation is still a matter of debate for some. After World War II, Mexico permitted only a few dozen Jews into the country; this was the state policy of most *Latin American countries. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Mexico's Jewish community is stabilized at 40,000. More than 90% live in the capital, and there are smaller communities in Monterrey, Guadalajara, and Tampico and, of late, in Cancun, among other places. Currently, Jews of *Sephardi and *Mizrahi (Middle Eastern) origins hold most of the positions of authority within the various organizations; this is a significant change from previous decades when Ashkenazim were the major community leaders.

For further reading, see A. Cimet, Ashkenazi Jews in Mexico: Ideologies in the Structuring of a Community (1997); and A. Gojman de Backal, Generaciones Judías en México, 1922–1992 (1993).

ADINA CIMET

Mezuzah (literally, "doorpost") refers to a parchment, called a klaf, and its container that are traditionally nailed to the right side of the doorpost of a Jewish home at an angle, with the top tilted inward. Many Jews place a mezuzah on the main entrance within thirty days of moving into a new residence; some also affix one to each exterior and interior door (with the exception of the bathroom). The containers can be produced from a variety of materials and are often decorative. The parchment, which must be handwritten in a prescribed way with quill and ink by a trained scribe, contains Deuteronomy 6:4–9 (which begins with the shema* and ends with the *commandment to write "these words" on the doorpost of one's house) and Deuteronomy 11:13–21 (which contains the same commandment and promises of blessings for fulfilling it). The word Shaddai (usually translated as "Almighty") is written on the inside of the back of the mezuzah and is often visible through a small hole in the container. Although many superstitions about the protective and talismanic powers of the mezuzah have been part of Jewish popular religion over the centuries, mainstream tradition has been insistent that its purpose is to remind people during their daily routines of the unity of *God and to strengthen their love and worship of God (Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, Tefillin 5:4, 6:13). ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Micah is the sixth book of the Minor or Twelve *Prophets; it is dated to the middle and late eighth century BCE. The prophet Micah came from the town of Moreshet near Gath in southwest *Judah, a rural area that bordered on *Philistia. He was especially concerned with the plight of simple folk who were exploited by urban sophisticates. His prophecies present an intricate mix of weal and woe. He excoriates his audience and offers them comfort, predicting both a divine judgment that will lay the nation waste and a renewal that will follow for the now chastened nation. Micah shares with *Isaiah, his contemporary, a critique of economic and social developments in eighth-century society. His angry denunciations of the wealthy and powerful are the strongest found in the Hebrew *Bible (3:1–4). The prophetic emphasis on morality is central for Micah; he criticizes idolatry in only a few brief passages. Without rejecting the sacrificial cult at the center of *Israelite religion, he ridicules the quantity of offerings brought by the rich and stresses that justice, grace, and humility are more important than worship (6:6–8). He differs from Isaiah in predicting that God's punishment of Judah may lead to *Jerusalem's fall to a foreign enemy (3:12). Micah criticizes those who (like Isaiah) believe in Zion's inviolability (3:11).

False prophecy is a particular concern for Micah, but unlike *Jeremiah he does not regard the false prophets as complete fabricators; their failure is that they transmit God's message inaccurately (e.g., 3:5–8). His vision of the eschaton (day of judgment or last days) is less universal than Isaiah's; he predicts the punishment of Israel's foes but not the subsequent creation of a *covenant between them and God (5:4–8). Although he lived in the southern kingdom, he is concerned as well by the fate of *Israel, the northern kingdom. As a result, some scholars have speculated that chapters 6–7 stem from a northern prophet; however, earlier chapters, clearly of Judean origin, also discuss events in the north, making such speculation unnecessary. Micah's prophecies were recalled on the eve of Jerusalem's destruction in the late sixth century BCE and served as a precedent (and legal defense) for similar prophecies by *Jeremiah (Jer 26:18). Micah includes several obscure prophecies about the monarchy in the period of the eschaton (2:12–13, 5:1–4) that became especially influential in the later development of *messianic ideologies. BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Middle Ages: Childhood. Medieval Jewish communities in Christian countries felt under siege and under constant pressure to convert to Christianity. The threat was three-pronged: theological seduction, economic temptations, and forced coercion using violence. To withstand these temptations and pressures, Jewish communities developed a sophisticated socialization process. Already in the eleventh century Jews recognized that the main thrust of Christian *conversion efforts was directed at children. In descriptions written immediately after the First *Crusade (1096 and subsequent years), it is clear that the extreme behavior of parents in killing their children and in committing suicide themselves was based on the conviction that Christians wished to convert Jewish children. Christian theological discussions on whether or not children of Jews could be taken and converted by force to the "true religion" do not appear until the end of the twelfth century and during the thirteenth century. However, when the community of Blois in the Rhine Valley in France in 1171 was annihilated following a *ritual murder accusation, surviving Jewish children were brought up as Christians. Thus, Jews took this threat seriously and defined childhood and youth as the time for intensive *education in Jewish practice, values, and identity to enable young people to resist Christianity and even the possibility of forced coercion to Christianity on pain of death (see MARTYRDOM).

The definition of the special character of "childhood" is evident in discussions on breastfeeding and in the Rabbis' ruling that infants should be nursed for twenty-four months. If a woman was divorced she could not remarry until the infant reached two years, for fear that the new "father" would demand that she stop breastfeeding. The manifold discussions in Jewish sources related to Christian wet nurses make it clear that there was an awareness that a suckling infant "knows who is breastfeeding him" and that changing a wet nurse should be assiduously avoided lest the child's health be jeopardized, even if the nurse did "bad things" (was deceitful or swore). It was believed that everything an infant ate would have an effect when he or she grew up; therefore it was stressed that the wet nurse must eat only kosher food. The wet nurse, whether she was Jewish or Christian, had to live in the parents' home where she would be under supervision.

When the infant was weaned, it reached the age of childhood. This was a distinct and special period in which attention had to be paid to "children's behavior" because the understanding of children is different from that of adults. During this time, children are more sensitive, both from a spiritual and a physical point of view; they are easily frightened and easily surprised, and it was desirable for parents to supervise them strictly. The quality of a child's early years was recognized as having an influence on his or her adult life. The physical closeness of parents and children – particularly the close relationship between the father and his small children – is expressed in sources that describe how the father holds his child close to him during meals and during the *blessings after meals, when he is with his books studying, and even when at prayer. The father is warned to watch if the child soils himself, but there is no advice or instruction to remove the small child. We find many descriptions of heartbreak, bitter weeping, and inconsolability following the death of children, as well as advice to adults not to kiss their children in front of bereaved parents and not to boast about them in their presence.

From the age of five and older, young boys started formal studies with a special ceremony on *Shavuot, although they continued, in most cases, to stay at home. Fathers hired teachers for their sons and, it would seem, included children of relatives or needy children in this home teaching arrangement. In this way the father could know what the teacher was teaching and also evaluate his quality. In the literature we find a regulation obliging a father to hire a teacher for his son (or to teach him himself); a father who was absent for long periods for business had to leave funds for his wife to hire a teacher. In the *responsa literature there are many instances of parents refusing to pay teachers their wages because, in their opinion, they had not taught properly, had missed lessons, or could not show that the children had made any progress. Home teaching also permitted girls to study occasionally or to pick up knowledge by hearing what was going on. The communal heder (teaching room) was established towards the end of the medieval period and boys left the house at age five or six to go to their studies. The curriculum consisted of learning the Hebrew letters and starting to read them, followed by learning passages from the *Torah, then the *Mishnah, and later on the *Talmud. At an older age able boys went to study at a *yeshivah, but this was after the period defined as childhood.

During childhood, parents employed a complex and proven process of socialization to ensure the internalization of Jewish values. Special emphasis was placed on the level of each child's understanding. Thus, introduction to the world of mitzvot (divine *commandments) began in accordance with their apprehension and mental capacity, not according to chronological or biological age. The age of thirteen was regarded as the time when all boys were considered adults by virtue of their chronological age and not on account of their mental capability. The *Bar Mitzvah ceremony did not exist in the Middle Ages and only developed later, when communities began marking the capability of the boy according to his chronological age. In addition to his ceremonial initiation into learning at the age of five, a boy attended synagogue with his father and became socialized in *Sabbath and *festival *synagogue rituals and *customs. In contrast, girls were socialized into Judaism and Jewish identity through learning domestic practices and rituals from their mothers in the home (see EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN).

For further reading, see E. Kanarfogel, Jewish Education and Society in the High Middle Ages (1992); I. G. Marcus, Rituals of Childhood: Jewish Acculturation in Medieval Europe (1996); E. Baumgarten, Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Europe (2004); and S. Goldin, "Jewish Society under Pressure: The Concept of Childhood," in Youth in the Middle Ages, ed. P. J. Goldberg and F. Riddy (2004), 25–43.

SIMHA GOLDIN

Middle Ages: Crusades. Pope Urban II's proclamation of the First Crusade at the Council of Clermont, on November 27, 1095, set in motion an unprecedented movement that changed the Middle East and had significant repercussions on religious, economic, political, and social life in Western Europe. The crusader movement also dramatically affected the fate of Jewish communities in Europe and the Middle East. Urban II's call evoked an extraordinary response: Men and women throughout Europe, of all ages and social classes, set out to liberate *Jerusalem and the holy places from the Muslims. Theirs was a penitential war; the pope had promised remission of all sins for those taking the cross. Although reasons varied, this spiritual reward, granted in an age of religious revival, is considered to have been among the crusaders' main motivations.

The First Crusade embarked from Europe in three major waves between 1096 and 1101. Generally known as the People's Crusade or the Popular Crusade, the first wave consisted of independent bands of poor people as well as experienced knights, such as Emicho, count of Flonheim. They began their march in the spring of 1096, five months before the date set by the Pope (August 15) and without waiting to gather that year's harvest. In their march through northeastern *France, the Rhineland, Bavaria, and Bohemia, these crusading bands, together with local townspeople, ferociously attacked the Jewish communities they encountered. These assaults were the first of many violent acts perpetrated against Jewish communities by crusaders and would become a characteristic feature of the crusading movement.

Modern scholars debate the motives for these attacks. Although traditionally they have been attributed to the greed of poorly equipped and disorganized crusading bands, historians in recent years have focused on spiritual and ideological reasons. Looting and material gain were not the sole aim but a common means to supply badly equipped armies. The crusaders' principal purposes were to avenge the crucifixion of Christ, to convert Jews by forced baptism, and to create a uniform Christian society by eliminating the "other" by baptism or by death. These ideas are expressed in contemporary sources, both Jewish and Christian. A Hebrew narrative reports crusaders complaining about their long march to avenge those who had profaned the holy shrines, while "the Jews – they whose forefathers murdered and crucified him for no reason [were close at hand]. Let us first avenge ourselves on them and exterminate them from among the nations so that the name of Israel will no longer be remembered, or let them adopt our faith." Forced *conversion of non-Christians was against canon law, and the Church prohibited attacks on Jewish lives and property. However, crusader rhetoric and zeal aroused profound anti-Jewish sentiments and a high degree of violence, which local leaders, both lay and religious, were generally unable to prevent.

The attacks seem to have started in Rouen, shortly after the Council of Clermont. Contemporary sources refer to letters being sent by the Jews of France (see FRANCE, MEDIEVAL) to the *German communities of Trier and Mainz, warning them about the approaching threat and advising them to buy their safety by bribing leaders of the crusader bands. Yet Jewish communities in Trier and even in *Prague were nevertheless assaulted; the cruelest attacks were in the Rhineland – mainly in the towns of Speyer, Worms, Cologne, and Mainz – where the Jewish communities were almost totally destroyed. Some of these attacks were outbursts of spontaneous violence by crusaders and burghers; others, such as the annihilation of the Jewry of Mainz, were organized and premeditated. In May 1096, Count Emicho encamped outside Mainz, where he prepared his army to storm the city. Once the city gates were opened by townspeople, Emicho's army attacked the archbishop's palace, where many Jews had taken shelter. There, after Jewish defenders failed to fight back the crusader forces, many Jews were slaughtered; others chose to take their own lives and those of members of their families. The Jews of Mainz were not alone in choosing this recourse; it was shared by many others who were faced with forced baptism. *Martyrdom to sanctify God's name (mavet al kiddush ha-Shem) was the Jews' most remarkable response to the 1096 attacks.

The 1096 massacres are described in three unique Hebrew narrative sources: the so-called Mainz Anonymous or The Narrative of the Old Persecution; the Solomon bar Simson Chronicle; and the so-called Eliezer bar Nathan Chronicle. The first was written close to the events and the other two about a generation later. Jews also memorialized the victims in lists of martyrs and in poetry (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE). However, Christian sources on the First Crusade hardly mentioned these events. The most complete description is found in Albert of Aachen's Historia Hierosolymitana.

Although the 1096 assaults were the most devastating, anti-Jewish violence continued in subsequent crusades. As part of the call for the Second Crusade (1147–49), some crusader preachers, such as the Cistercian monk Ralph, called for attacks on Jews in towns in France and Germany. These acts of violence were reduced or prevented by the interventions of the Cistercian abbot Bernard of Clairvaux, one of the leading figures of the medieval church, and of Conrad III of Germany. Similarly, on the eve of the departure of the Third Crusade (1189–92), Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa took firm measures to protect the Jews in the Rhineland. The Third Crusade, however, did lead to deadly attacks on Jewish communities in *England. The attacks started in London, on the coronation day of Richard I (September 3, 1189), and spread to Norwich, King's Lynn, Stamford, Lincoln, Bury St. Edmunds, and York. In York, the Jewish population was annihilated: The city castle, where the Jews had taken refuge, was set on fire by the attackers. Many Jews took their own lives, whereas others, who were able to leave the castle after promising to accept baptism, were massacred outside its gates. Violence against Jews also occurred during the Shepherds' Crusade of 1320.

For further reading see S. Eidelberg, trans. and ed., The Jews and the Crusaders: The Hebrew Chronicles of the First and Second Crusades (1977); R. Chazan, God, Humanity and History: The Hebrew First Crusade Narrative (2000); J. Riley-Smith, "Christian Violence and the Crusades," in Religious Violence between Christians and Jews: Medieval Roots, Modern Perspectives, ed. A. Sapir Abulafia (2002), 3–21; J. Bronstein, "The Crusades and the Jews: Some Reflections on the 1096 Massacre," History Compass 5 (2007): 1268–79; R. C. Stacey, "Crusades, Martyrdoms, and the Jews of Norman England, 1096–1190," in Juden und Christen zur Zeit der Kreuzzüge, ed. A. Haverkamp (1999), 233–51; and D. Nirenberg, Communities of Violence: Persecution of Minorities in the Middle Ages (1996), 43–69. Map 7

JUDITH BRONSTEIN

Middle Ages: Demography. For the first half of the Middle Ages (roughly the sixth through the tenth centuries), the overwhelming majority of Jews lived under Muslim domination, with a substantial number residing in eastern Christendom under *Byzantine rule. Western Christendom was a distant third in terms of the Jewish population it hosted and the power and creativity of that population. Even in Europe, the largest Jewish communities were in areas under Muslim control, such as most of the *Iberian Peninsula (*Spain) and southern sectors of *Italy (see also SICILY).

This distribution of world Jewry reflected the relative power of the three major power blocs during the first half of the Middle Ages: the dominant *Islamic bloc, the still potent Greek Christian bloc, and weak and backward Latin Christendom. Significant change in world Jewish demography largely resulted from alterations in the patterns of medieval economic, political, and military power. Beginning around the year 1000, Christian Europe unexpectedly surged forward in population, economy, military might, political organization, and cultural creativity. As western Christendom advanced, it became home to an increasingly large Jewish population.

Some of western Christendom's new Jews fell into the Christian orbit as a result of the expansion of Christian power and control. As Christian forces eliminated Muslim enclaves on the Italian and Iberian Peninsulas, the largest Jewish communities in Europe came under Christian domination. In addition, the accelerating vigor of western Christendom attracted enterprising Jews from nearby Islamic territories into the old areas of Jewish settlement across southern Europe. More strikingly, this new vigor enticed Jews from Islamic territories and the Christian sectors of southern Europe into areas of northern Europe in which Jewish communities had never taken hold. Arguably the most important development of the second half of the Middle Ages (roughly the eleventh through the fifteenth centuries) was a pronounced shift in the center of gravity in world Jewish population, power, and creativity. During this period, Jews began the process of becoming a predominantly European people, centered in Latin Christian areas of the western world.

With the passage of time, the varied areas of the Iberian Peninsula and southern France (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN) achieved increasing political coherence and economic progress. The Italian Peninsula was not able to reach the same level of political coherence, which stunted its economic development as well. By the early fourteenth century, southern French Jewry was expelled by the Capetian rulers of a unified France that stretched from the Mediterranean Sea into the northern areas of Western Europe. At the end of the fifteenth century, a similar fate befell the large Jewish communities of the Iberian Peninsula. Only Italian Jewry was able to preserve itself, although sectors of these Jews were uprooted from time to time. Curiously, Italy's failure to achieve political coherence worked to the Jews' advantage, enabling them to avoid the wholesale expulsions that afflicted their co-religionists further westward.

The lack of Jewish economic diversification in northern Europe created an obvious need for demographic mobility (see ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; GERMANY). As the Jewish population grew, urban centers could absorb only a finite number of Jews involved in limited economic activities. There was thus a constant pressure toward demographic movement. While Jews seem to have clustered initially in the major urban centers of northern France and *England, economic pressures constantly drove them out of these centers and into lesser urban areas. Likewise, limited economic opportunities influenced Jewish readiness to respond positively to invitations emanating from *Eastern Europe. Willingness to move into uncharted territories and to respond to economic opportunity brought Jews into areas of medieval Europe previously unfamiliar to them. Adaptation to limited economic circumstances and the willingness to strike out into new locales were a constant feature of Jewish life in Latin Christendom throughout the Middle Ages. For further reading, see R. Chazan, The Jews of Medieval Western Christendom (2006); and idem, Fashioning Jewish Identity in Medieval Western Europe (2009); see also COMMERCE, MEDIEVAL; Map 7. ROBERT CHAZAN

Middle Ages: Hasidei Ashkenaz (the pious ones of Ashkenaz or the German pietists). The Hasidei Ashkenaz were circles of *mystics and pietists that flourished mainly in the *Rhineland and in Regensburg (and to a lesser extent in northern France) from the second half of the twelfth century through the late thirteenth century. These schools were independent of each other and developed different theologies and worldviews. The most influential branch of Hasidei Ashkenaz was descended from the prominent Kalonymus rabbinic families in pre-crusade Mainz; it was founded by R. Samuel ben Kalonymus of Speyer (b. 1115), who was also known by the epithets he-Hasid (the pious), ha-Kadosh (the holy), and ha-Navi (the prophet). Some see the formation of this branch as closely linked to the religious notion of *martyrdom (kiddush ha-Shem) that became more prevalent in *Germany at the time of the First *Crusade in 1096. Samuel's son R. Judah he-Hasid (d. 1217) and Judah's student (and relative) Eleazar ben Judah (ben Kalonymus) of Worms (d. 1230 or 1237) subsequently headed this circle in the Rhineland, although Judah left for Regensburg in 1195.

The main exoteric work of this movement is Sefer Hasidim (Book of the Pious), which is attributed to Judah he-Hasid, but appears to contain material from all three of the movement's leaders. This lengthy treatise is suffused with ethical and prescriptive materials that were addressed both to the aspiring pietist and to the devoted nonpietist. A small number of passages in Sefer Hasidim (and elsewhere) intimate that the pietists may have constituted separate communities or should at least strive to do so, an instruction that was apparently never actualized. Indeed, Judah served (together with two nonpietist rabbinic scholars) as a member of the rabbinic court in Regensburg, and Eleazar sat on the rabbinic court in Worms and was also a signatory on the supercommunal ordinances promulgated for Speyer, Worms, and Mainz (the so-called Takkanot Shu"m) during the 1220s. Sefer Hasidim criticizes the prayers, educational methods, and religious mores of nonpietist rabbinic scholars (and laymen), even as it makes recommendations in these areas for the benefit of all Jews. Necromancy, the occult, and the world of the souls are vividly discussed within the exempla in this work, as are the behaviors of Christians that are worthy of emulation (such as decorum during prayer and the dedication of chivalrous knights to their principles) and those that are not.

The social theories of Judah he-Hasid in Sefer Hasidim and the more prolific Eleazar of Worms in his halakhic work, Sefer Rokeah (Book of the Perfumer), and in several of his esoteric works (including his prayer commentary) differed significantly, as did the ways in which they instructed sinners to seek *repentance. Often their guidance had elements in common with surrounding Christian penitential practices.

Judah and Eleazar composed commentaries to the Torah (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY) that ran the gamut from forms of peshat interpretation and simple gematria (see NUMEROLOGY) passages to more complex numerical and letter manipulations and esoteric constructs. It is possible to detect nascent *kabbalistic teachings, especially in the writings of Eleazar, together with prayer interpretations that revolve around a precise counting of the Hebrew words and letters in each prayer text, in addition to *midrashic and fully esoteric interpretations of the *liturgy. Eleazar of Worms was also a prodigious author of liturgical poems (piyyutim; see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]); Judah the Pious was not, although he is perhaps the author of the so-called Shir ha-Kavod. Eleazar's student, Abraham ben Azriel of Bohemia, produced an extensive commentary to the piyyutim entitled Arugat ha-Bosem (Bed of Spices [Song of Songs 3:15]). R. Moses ben Isaac of *Vienna (ca. 1200–1270) records a variety of teachings from both Judah and Eleazar (with whom he studied) in his halakhic compendium, Sefer Or Zarua. Judah's descendants continued his tradition of esoteric studies. Particularly noteworthy is his great-grandson, Moses ben Eliezer, who composed a mystical commentary on the Shi'ur Komah. Among the esoteric theories of this school, the divine kavod, which emanated from the godhead and served as the subject of *revelation (a concept that has its origins in the writings of *Saadia Gaon), became especially influential. Also of importance is the more exoteric notion that focused extreme devotion on every detail of the commandments and the imperative that sought to uncover the covert or hidden divine will (see also KABBALAH).

The Circle of the Unique Cherub (Hug ha-Keruv ha-Meyuhad) is also associated with Hasidei Ashkenaz. This school based many of its mystical teachings on a pseudopigraphical treatise, Baraita de Yosef ben Uziel, the author of which was said to be descended from Ben Sira (see WISDOM OF BEN SIRA) and the prophet Jeremiah. This circle also produced a commentary (that is attributed to Saadia Gaon) on the earlier mystical work Sefer Yetzirah, and additional commentaries to Sefer Yetzirah as well. One of the leading figures in this group was Elhanan ben Jakar of London (who also lived for a time in northwest France and was the author of several works). This circle also produced a theological work entitled Sod ha-Sodot (Secret of Secrets).

A third branch of Hasidei Ashkenaz produced several anonymous mystical and ethical treatises. Among these is Sefer Hayyim (written at the turn of the twelfth century) that has been (incorrectly) attributed to the Tosafist student of R. Jacob Tam, R. Hayyim ha-Kohen. Sefer ha-Navon, a commentary to the shema* and Shi'ur Komah (composed c. 1230) has recently been attributed to a R. Neḥemiah ben Solomon, who may be the same person as R. Troestlin ha-Navi of Erfurt.

Modern scholarship initially posited a gap between the Hasidei Ashkenaz and the *Tosafists, who flourished in northern France and Germany at the same time and were the leading talmudists and halakhists of the day. More recently, however, it has been shown that these distinct groups of rabbinic scholars interacted productively on both intellectual and spiritual levels. Tosafists sometimes accepted the broader curriculum and the sharp focus on deciding matters of Jewish law (as opposed to unbridled theoretical study) that were stressed by the Rhineland pietists, even as the pietists participated to an extent in Tosafist talmudic study. R. Eleazar of Worms composed Tosafot to BT Bava Kamma that were based on the Tosafot of R. Isaac (Ri) of Dampierre, and Sefer Hasidim proclaims the virtue of possessing genuine Tosafot texts. Similarly, it is possible to point to Tosafists in both northern France and Germany who affected pietists' behaviors and regimens. These include R. Moses of Coucy and the brothers (R. Moses and R. Samuel) of Evreux in the mid-thirteenth century, as well as R. Isaac of Corbeil and R. *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenburg in the second half of that century. At the same time, however, only the Hasidei Ashkenaz were familiar with *Neoplatonic and other philosophical systems, which they joined with earlier Jewish mystical texts (most notably hekhalot literature, which was more widely available in medieval Ashkenaz) to put forward theosophical and theurgic doctrines and formulations. A number of these doctrines made their way southward and were subsequently absorbed by the systems of kabbalistic teachings then developing elsewhere in medieval Europe.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, "Women and Sexual Ambivalence in Sefer Hasidim," Jewish Quarterly Review 96 (2006): 1–8; M. Idel, "Some Forlorn Writings of an Ashkenazi Prophet: R. Nehemiah ben Shlomo ha-Navi," Jewish Quarterly Review 95 (2005): 183–96; E. Kanarfogel, "R. Judah he-Hasid and the Rabbinic Scholars of Regensburg: Interactions, Influences and Implications," Jewish Quarterly Review 96 (2006): 17–37; I. Marcus, Piety and Society (1981); and H. Soloveitchik, "Three Themes in the Sefer Hasidim," Association for Jewish Studies Review 1 (1976): 311–57.

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

Middle Ages: Jewish–Christian Polemics. Medieval Jewish polemicists against *Christianity inherited only a thin legacy of Jewish responses to Christian arguments in late antiquity. Nonetheless, under the impact of a challenging and often dangerous environment, Jews produced a rich and variegated polemical literature.

In the early Christian centuries, we find sporadic remarks in *rabbinic literature that respond to Christian claims and doctrines that Jews saw as theologically unacceptable, such as some degree of multiplicity in the deity. Various versions of a counter-gospel called Toldot Yesu (The Biography of Jesus) began to circulate, providing generations of Jews with a hostile narrative of Jesus' illegitimate birth followed by a supposed career of sorcery, rebelliousness, and eventual hanging on a stalk of cabbage. The earliest full work containing sustained arguments against Christianity is a polemic of eastern provenance entitled The Book of Nestor the Priest. Although it is sketchy and poorly organized, it covers many points of contention between Jews and Christians, ranging from disputed interpretations of passages in the Hebrew *Bible to Jewish claims of inconsistencies in the *New Testament. This work exerted considerable influence on later Jewish authors in the heart of Christian Europe.

Sporadic philosophical arguments against Christian doctrines began to appear by the tenth century in works of Jewish thinkers like R. *Saadia Gaon, who lived in the Muslim orbit; similarly, biblical exegetes periodically refuted the Christological understanding of a few key verses in the Hebrew Bible. However, full-fledged polemical works by European Jews did not emerge until the third quarter of the twelfth century, when Jacob ben Reuben's Milhamot ha-Shem (Wars of the Lord) and Joseph *Kimhi's Sefer ha-Berit (Book of the Covenant) appeared almost simultaneously in southern France (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES).

Although the themes addressed in these and later polemics vary widely, this literature essentially consists of warring interpretations of biblical words, verses, and passages. Thus, Christians asserted that the plural form, "Let us make man," in *Genesis 1:26 refers to at least two of the persons in the triune God; conversely, Jews argued that it is a plural of majesty or that it describes God's inclusion of the angels or the lower elements in the divine decision. Christians translated the word almah in *Isaiah 7:14 as "virgin," whereas Jews understood it as "young woman," insisting that both context and philology ruled out the christological interpretation. Christians saw the servant in Isaiah 53 as the suffering Jesus, while Jews usually took the figure as a collective representation of the Jewish people in exile.

Beyond the Hebrew Bible, Jews had to address the painful argument that their suffering and exile proved their rejection by God; thus, contemporary circumstances entered the fray. This was a double-edged sword because Jewish polemicists were able to cite the failure of the Crusades (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES) and what they saw as the evident moral inferiority of contemporary Christians to buttress their own position. Jews also brought critical literary approaches, sometimes incorporating historical analysis, to bear on the New Testament. These approaches ranged from a critique of contradictions and inconsistencies to sharply divergent assessments of Jesus; on the one hand, he was depicted as a sinner, even an idolater, but on the other he was portrayed as a fully committed, if sometimes foolish or megalomaniacal, adherent of the *Torah.

These themes are evident to a greater or lesser degree in the major thirteenth-century polemics, Sefer Yosef ha-Mekanne (The Book of Joseph the Zealot) and the Nizzahon Vetus (Old Book of Polemic) both from northern Europe, as well as in Meir of Narbonne's Milhemet Mitzvah (Obligatory War). Although a critique of Matthew had already appeared in Jacob ben Reuben's work, Profiat Duran, a fourteenth-century Spanish Jew, constructed the most sophisticated analysis of the New Testament in his Kelimat ha-Goyim (Shame of the Gentiles).

The philosophical dimension of Jewish polemic was developed almost exclusively by *Sephardic Jews, although the Ta'anot (Arguments) of the Italian Moses ben Solomon of Salerno is the most impressive work of this genre before the fourteenth century. Hasdai *Crescas, a major philosopher, turned his attention to the Christian challenge, and his Refutation of the Christian Principles is the most technical and challenging philosophical polemic of the Middle Ages. While Christians usually took the offensive with respect to discussions of the Hebrew Scriptures, Jews generally initiated philosophical arguments regarding Christian doctrine. Thus, they maintained that the Trinity is a manifestly contradictory belief; that a God who is unlimited and unchangeable could not take on flesh; that transubstantiation, aside from its evident logical challenges, requires the body of Jesus to be present on several altars simultaneously; and that the preservation of Mary's virginity during childbirth requires two objects to take up the same space at the same time. All of this, they said, entails logical contradictions that cannot be overcome even by the miracles of an omnipotent God.

In the thirteenth century, Jews were challenged by a Christian assault on the *Talmud that posed multidimensional dangers. Although this attack originated earlier, it reached maturity in two public disputations: one in 1240 in Paris and the other in 1263 in Barcelona. In the first, Nicholas Donin, a Jewish convert to Christianity, asserted that the Talmud contained foolishness, theologically objectionable beliefs, laws and other dicta hostile to Gentiles, and blasphemous statements regarding Jesus and Mary. Moreover, Donin claimed that the Talmud constituted “another law” beyond the Hebrew Bible. Thus, he argued, the long-standing Christian perception, so important to the protected status of the Jews – that Jews observe the Hebrew Bible – needed to be radically rethought. R. Jehiel of Paris mounted a defense, arguing among other things that contemporary Christians are not subsumed under the discriminatory laws in the Talmud that were aimed at ancient pagans; that in light of an apparent anachronism, at least some talmudic passages about “Jesus” refer to someone other than the founder of Christianity; and that the Talmud is a necessary supplement to the Hebrew Bible without which many biblical laws would be impossible to apply.

In the 1263 Barcelona disputation, another convert, Pablo Christiani, argued that the Talmud contains manifold proofs of Christian doctrine. Moses *Nahmanides replied that if this were so the Rabbis would have embraced Christianity. However, this argument did not prevent him and later Iberian Jews from having to confront a campaign of growing sophistication that reached its climax in the lengthy Tortosa disputation of 1413–14. Isaac *Abravanel, the last great figure produced by medieval Iberian Jewry, devoted an entire work, Yeshu’ot Meshiho (The Saving Acts of His Messiah), to providing an explication for Jews of rabbinic passages used by Christians in this sustained attack.

For further reading, see D. Berger, The Jewish-Christian Debate in the High Middle Ages: A Critical Edition of the Nizahon Vetus with an Introduction, Translation, and Commentary (1979); S. Krauss and W. Horbury, The Jewish-Christian Controversy: From the Earliest Times to 1789 (1995); and D. Lasker, Jewish Philosophical Polemics against Christianity in the Middle Ages, 2nd ed. (2007).

DAVID BERGER

Midrash: See AGGADAH; RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS; RABBINIC LITERATURE: MIDRASH

Mikdash: See TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; TEMPLE, SECOND.

Mikveh (pl. mikva’ot; a ritual bath). A mikveh is “a place where [water] is accumulated” and refers to an artificial reservoir of water used for the ritual purification of persons and objects. Often, a mikveh includes two pools: one for the actual immersion, generally with broad steps leading into the water, and the other as a reservoir that collects rain water to be used in the main pool. The oldest known mikva’ot are from the *Hasmonean period, around 150 BCE.

Two millennia ago, a significant part of Jewish purity rituals was connected to the Second *Temple in *Jerusalem, including ritual *immersion before entering the Temple precincts. Archeologists have excavated more than forty mikva’ot of the Second Temple era on the Temple Mount. After the Temple’s destruction in 70 CE, the majority of ritual purity laws became obsolete, and the use of ritual baths was mainly reserved for a specific domain of purity, the *niddah laws related to women’s menstrual cycle. In theory, the Rabbis could have decreed that these laws were also irrelevant after the destruction of the Temple, but they decided otherwise.

Although women may ritually immerse in a natural body of water, doing so can be problematic and unreliable. Thus, each Jewish community generally built its own mikveh, sometimes even before building a *synagogue. The mikveh’s basic physical structure is determined by Jewish law (Mikva’ot, sixth tractate of the Order Tohorot (Purities) of the *Mishnah and *Talmuds). The water volume should be about several hundred liters (the exact amount is a subject for debate, because of the various interpretations of the rabbinic volume of forty se’ah). For a mikveh to be valid, its water, or at least a portion of it, must be accumulated in a “natural” way; it should not be “drawn water.” For this reason, many mikva’ot are located in places where water can be accumulated naturally. Since the Middle Ages, mikva’ot have often been built under or near *synagogues. Today, the vast majority of modern mikva’ot are heated, but before the Early Modern period, this was not the case.

A mikveh can be used for other Jewish ritual purposes, including the purification of certain utensils produced by non-Jews, the ritual immersion of *converts to Judaism, immersion by women before *marriage, and voluntary ritual immersion for men. This practice of male ritual immersion has existed since ancient times, but it has become especially common since the sixteenth century, with the rise of *kabbalistic and then *Hasidic circles. Although in theory the main purpose of such immersion is for purification after ejaculation, men’s mikveh immersion is more often understood as a spiritual preparation for the *Sabbath and major *festivals. See also IMMERSION, RITUAL: WOMEN; NIDDAH; PURITY AND IMPURITY. EVYATAR MARIENBERG

Minyan is a worship quorum, generally composed of ten adult Jewish males in traditional *Judaism and ten adult Jews in liberal forms of Jewish *worship. A minyan is required for communal *Torah reading and the recitation of certain communal prayers such as the *Kaddish.

Miriam. One of the few biblical women not presented as someone’s wife or mother, Miriam appears with her brothers *Aaron and *Moses as a leader of the *Israelites during the Exodus period (see Micah 6:4). She is mentioned in five biblical books, more than any other woman; unlike Moses, Miriam is called a *prophet in Exodus. Credited with helping her mother save the infant Moses (Exod 2), Miriam also figures prominently as composer and performer (with a cohort of women) of the song with which the Israelites celebrated their miraculous deliverance from the Egyptians at the Sea of Reeds (Exod 15:20–21 and also Exod 15: 1–20). This is one of the earliest poems in the *Bible and one of the earliest biblical proclamations of divine intervention in human affairs. Miriam’s role as its composer gives her a primary place in the Bible’s prophetic tradition. When Miriam is punished for criticizing Moses, her brother appeals to God on her behalf (Numb 12). See also, EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL.

CAROL MEYERS

Mishkan: See TABERNACLE

Mishnah (ca. 200 CE) is an ancient book of case law containing traditions that pertain to ritual, civil, and criminal domains. The Mishnah is significant because it was the first literary work produced by the rabbinic movement (ca. 50–600 CE), a movement that shaped the scriptural, scholastic, and liturgical modes of religious expression characteristic of pre-modern *Judaism.

The project of collecting legal traditions into retrievable form is said to have begun shortly after the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE. According to T. Eduyot 1:1, “When the sages entered the vineyard at Yavneh they said: ‘The time is coming when people will seek a word from the teachings of the Torah, but will not find it, or [they will seek] a word from the teachings of the scribes, but will not find it. . . . They said: let us begin [by collecting the traditions of] *Hillel and Shammai.’” Traditions were passed on in a formal manner to stem the losses brought about by the destruction of the central cultic and scribal center. More than one-third of the legal teachings recorded in the Mishnah concern rituals practiced at the *Jerusalem *Temple.

Several features of the Mishnah’s literary form seem particularly well designed to aid in the preservation and formal transmission of tradition. For example, legal traditions are often grouped in sets of three or five, a feature commonly associated with oral tradition. Likewise, the Mishnah employs parallel structures with extensive repetition of key elements. It also organizes its traditions topically, rather than by associatively linking them with biblical verses, enabling its students to recall teachings by subject matter or a sage’s name. The broadest topical divisions in the Mishnah are known as orders (sedarim, pl.; seder, sing.), which are further subdivided into sixty-three tractates (masekhtot, pl.; masekhet, sing.). Each tractate is divided into chapters, and each chapter consists of individually numbered teachings – each of which is known as a mishnah (pl. mishnayot). The six orders of the Mishnah are laws of Agriculture (Zera’im), Holidays (Mo’ed), Women (Nashim), Civil Laws (Nezikin), Holy Things (Kodashim), and Purities (Tohorot). Masekhet, the Hebrew word for tractate, literally means “webbing” and alludes to the fact that the Mishnah’s topical organization is a loose one, with the Mishnah often associatively shifting from topic to topic. An additional feature of the Mishnah that aids in the formal transmission of tradition is its condensed expression. Where parallels (especially in the *Tosefta) often preserve lengthy and spelled-out versions of tradition, the Mishnah is known for its laconic and telegraphic style.

Traditional accounts attribute the redaction of the Mishnah to R. Judah the *Patriarch (*Judah ha-Nasi, referred to in the Mishnah as Rabbi) in 200 CE (see BT Bava Metzia 86a: “The end of Mishnah is Rabbi and Rabbi Natan”). Earlier collections of legal traditions that were similarly arranged by topic and divorced from relevant biblical verses are said to have served as the prototype and basis for Rabbi’s collection. Important earlier collections are said to have circulated in the name of R. Meir, and before that in the name of R. *Akiva; both were among the *Tannaim, sages active between 50 and 200 CE.

Scholars debate why legal traditions were collected in the Mishnah. One school of thought suggests that R. Judah the Patriarch edited the Mishnah to serve as an authoritative law code (Epstein, 1957). In this conception, R. Judah edited the Mishnah to codify his preferred legal positions. The major difficulty with this explanation is that the Mishnah contains numerous unresolved legal disputes. Later sages, especially the school associated with R. Joḥanan, developed a number of rules to determine practical law in the face of the numerous disputes (e.g., “when there is a dispute between X and Y, the law follows Y”; Zlotnick). The other leading theory suggests that the Mishnah was formulated to serve as a pedagogical tool in the training of rabbinic sages (Goldberg). The legal cases in the Mishnah would have exposed rabbinic disciples to key legal principles and provided the grounds for conceptual consideration of how different principles intersect (Alexander). Regardless of which theory is historically accurate, subsequent generations of sages used the Mishnah both as a resource for legal decision making and for academic training. More recent attention to the literary arrangement of traditions has led scholars to assert that the Mishnah presents conceptual distillations of religious *thought and philosophy.

Of all the genres of rabbinic literature collectively known as “Oral *Torah,” the Mishnah shows the clearest signs of having been orally performed in antiquity. As noted earlier, many of the Mishnah’s literary features seem designed to facilitate oral transmission. A subject of ongoing scholarly debate has been the question of when, how, and for what purposes was the Mishnah written down. Some scholars suggest that the official version of the Mishnah was available only in “oral” form, as memorized by official performers in the rabbinic academies (Lieberman). Others propose that an official written version of the Mishnah existed (Epstein, 2000). Recent scholarship has argued that oral and literary modes of text production, performance, and preservation were used in conjunction with each other (Jaffee).

Although it is true that the Mishnah distills and records early legal traditions for posterity, the Mishnah’s historical significance is not limited to its relationship to the past. It is equally (if not more) important because it served as the springboard for oral study after it was redacted. In the centuries following its promulgation by R. Judah, the Mishnah became the central curricular document around which rabbinic learning was organized. Each of the Talmuds (the Jerusalem *Talmud, completed around 400 CE, and the Babylonian *Talmud, completed around 600 CE) is structured as a commentary to the Mishnah. In the Talmuds, the legal traditions of the Mishnah become the subject of extended conversation, debate, argument, and interpretation (see also RABBINIC LITERATURE: MISHNAH AND TALMUD).

Important research includes J. Neusner, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Purities: The Redaction and Formulation of the Order of Purities in Mishnah and Tosefta (1977); idem, Judaism: The Evidence of the Mishnah (1988); J. N. Epstein, Introduction to Tannaitic Literature (1957); idem, Introduction to the Text of the Mishnah (2000); D. Zlotnick, The Iron Pillar – Mishnah (1988); A. Goldberg, “The Mishnah – A Study Book of Halakhah,” in Literature of the Sages, ed. S. Safrai (1987); E. S. Alexander, Transmitting Mishnah (2006); S. Lieberman, “The Oral Publication of the Mishnah,” in Hellenism in Jewish Palestine (1994), ed. S. Lieberman; and M. Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth (2001).

ELIZABETH SHANKS ALEXANDER

Mishnah: Orders and Tractates

ZERA'IM (Seeds)	MO'ED (Seasons)	NASHIM (Women)	NEZIKIN (Damages)	KODASHIM (Holy Things)	TOHOROT (Ritual Purities)
Berakhot	Shabbat	Yevamot	Bava Metzia	Zevahim	Keilim
Pe'ah	Eruvin	Ketubbot	Bava Kamma	Menahot	Oholot
Demai	Pesahim	Nedarim	Bava Batra	Hullin	Nega'im
Kil'ayim	Shekalim	Nazir	Sanhedrin	Bekhorot	Parah
Shevi'it	Yoma	Sotah	Makkot	Arakhin	Tohorot
Terumot	Sukkah	Gittin	Shevu'ot	Temurah	Mikva'ot
Ma'aserot	Beitzah	Kiddushin	Eduyot	Keritot	Niddah
Ma'aser Sheni	Rosh Ha-Shanah		Avodah Zarah	Me'ilah	Makhshirin
Hallah	Ta'anit		Avot	Tamid	Zavim
Orlah	Megillah		Horayot	Middot	Tevul Yom
Bikkurim	Mo'ed Katan			Kinnim	Yadayim
	Hagigah				Uktzim

Mishneh Torah is Moses *Maimonides' fourteen-volume codification of Jewish law completed in 1190 in *Egypt.

Mitnaggedim (sing. mitnagged) were those Jews who opposed the Ḥasidic movement that began in eighteenth-century *Poland. See ḤASIDISM: EUROPE; VILNA GAON, ELIJAH.

Mitzvah (pl. mitzvot) is the Hebrew word for "commandment." In the Hebrew *Bible, the term is synonymous with torah (instruction), mishpat (ruling), hukah (statute), and mishmeret (observance). Yet, mitzvah encompasses all these definitions. Although mitzvah can refer to any kind of commandment, the word is usually used in reference to divine mandates. An additional meaning appears in *rabbinic literature where a mitzvah can be a laudatory, but not strictly required, religious act. For example, it is a greater mitzvah for a man to betroth his bride in person, rather than by proxy (BT Kiddushin 41a; see BETROTHAL). In the *Talmud, the word mitzvah can refer broadly to any religious observance and has an exclusively religious connotation. The Rabbis adopted the word gezerah (edict or decree) to refer to an order from a secular authority. The sages also categorized mitzvot into groups, including positive (those requiring one to perform an act) and negative (those prohibiting one from performing an act). Another rabbinic categorization separated mitzvot d'oraita (*Torah commandments), which are commandments considered to be from *God, whether or not explicitly stated in the *Pentateuch, from mitzvot d'rabbanan (commandments of our Rabbis), which are behaviors the sages considered to be either required or prohibited by rabbinic authority. The medieval halakhic tradition (see HALAKHAH), based on a statement in BT Makkot 23b, developed the notion that there were 613 divine mitzvot. Many attempts to list the 613 were made, but they all differed to some degree, and no list achieved authoritative status.

In *Yiddish, the word mitzvah came to mean any good deed, whether religious or secular in nature. This is still the meaning most commonly intended when *Ashkenazic Jews use the word. *Sephardic and Middle Eastern (*Mizraḥi) Jews rarely use the word in this way. However, they do use the term to refer to a prestigious *synagogue ritual act, such as being called to recite the blessings before and after a portion of the day's Torah (see TORAH READING) or Haftarah* readings. Ashkenazic Jews use the word kibbud (honor) to express that meaning. In Modern Hebrew, the term mitzvah is exclusively religious. Israelis use the word pekudah to refer to a secular command or directive.

MARCUS MORDECHAI SCHWARTZ

Mizrachi refers to the Religious Zionist movement founded in 1902 in *Vilna by Rabbi Isaac Jacob Reines. Mizrachi is allied with the Religious Zionist and Modern Orthodox movements in Israel and throughout the world (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX; JUDAISM, ISRAELI FORMS OF). The Mizrachi youth movement Benei Akiva was founded in 1929; it is one of the largest organizations in Israel (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: YOUTH MOVEMENTS) and has many chapters throughout the world.

Mizrachi Women's Organization of America, known as AMIT since 1983, was founded in 1925. Initially a women's auxiliary to Mizrachi, the organization declared its autonomy in 1934. See ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA.

MIZRAH refers to a decorative plaque hung on the eastern wall of a synagogue or home to indicate the direction of *prayer (see Plate 9).

Mizraḥi (pl. Mizraḥim) designates communities with long histories in the Middle East and North Africa. The term differentiates Mizraḥi Jews from *Sephardim, who established themselves in these regions after the 1492 expulsion from *Spain. See also, EGYPT; IRAN; IRAQ; KURDISTAN; NORTH AFRICA; and YEMEN.

Moab is a region that extended east-west from the Dead Sea to the Syro-Arabian Desert. It was crossed toward the north by the Arnon River (Wadi Mujib), and its southern border was the Zered River (Wadi el-Hesa). The king's highway (Num 21:22) ran north-south through the country. Known from the Early Bronze Age, Moab appeared in *Egyptian texts in the Late Bronze Age IIB. Changing borders reflected international relations throughout the Iron Age II: Moab was intermittently ruled by foreign nations including

*Israel, Neo-*Assyria, and *Babylon. Moabite kings, some known from local, biblical, and Neo-Assyrian texts, ruled from the capital Dibon (Dhiban). The national god Chemosh was worshiped both in Moab and in *Jerusalem (by *Solomon's Moabite wives; 1 Kgs 11:7–8). The ninth-century-BCE Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone) attests to Moab's king Mesha regaining his freedom from Omri, king of *Israel (2 Kgs 3:4–5). Excavations at Dhiban, Madaba, Tall Hisban (Hesbon), `Ara`ir (Aroer), and other sites illuminate Moabite culture. Its economy combined agriculture and pastoralism.

Moab is mentioned often in the *Bible. It shares roots with the *Israelites (through *Abraham and Lot in *Gen 19:37; through *David in the book of *Ruth; and through Solomon in 1 Kgs 11:1, 7, 33). More frequently, relations with Israel are shown as hostile (Num 21:29–39, 22:1ff; Judg 3:12–30; 1 Sam 14: 47; 2 Sam 8:2–3; Ezra 9:1; Neh 13:1–2; various prophets). In the fourth to third centuries BCE, Moab became home to Nabateans moving north from their desert homeland. Map 2 BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Modena, Leon (Judah Aryeh mi-Modena [1571–1648]) was a Venetian rabbi, *cantor, orator, teacher, author, and polemicist (see ITALY; VENICE). Both before and after his rabbinic ordination in 1609, Modena undertook a variety of occupations and activities to gain income and influence. He served as a legal clerk for the rabbis of Venice; taught students of all ages, including Christians; was a proofreader and publication expeditor; wrote *poetry for books, weddings, and gravestones; was a popular preacher and a letter writer; translated Hebrew documents for the government; and served as maestro di cappella for Jewish musical groups, as a cantor, and as a rabbi outside of Venice. He was offered a chair in oriental languages in Paris that he refused. Often in his life, Modena turned to gambling, justifying this compulsion in a pastoral dialogue, Sur mera (1595), and in a responsum (see RESPONSA LITERATURE).

In his many published books, Modena demonstrated his skills as an author, teacher, and popularizer of rabbinic teachings. In Sod Yesharim (Secret of the Upright, 1594/5), he prefaced magic tricks, folk remedies, and riddles to a curriculum of biblical and rabbinic studies. In Tzemah Tzaddik (Flower of the Virtuous, 1600), he embellished a Hebrew translation of the popular Fior di Virtù, with citations from Jewish sources. In Midbar Yehudah (The Wilderness of Judah, 1602), he included Hebrew translations of his *sermons and “Kinah Shemor,” a macaronic poem, sounding and meaning the same in Hebrew and Italian. Modena made the first complete Italian translation of the *Passover haggadah (1609). In Galut Yehudah (The Exile of Judah, 1612), he tried to overcome church laws against translating the Bible into Italian by providing a glossary of words, to which he later added one of rabbinic terms (1640). In Lev Aryeh (The Life of Judah, 1612), he presented a Hebrew system of memory improvement as a preface to a work on the 613 religious *commandments. Modena used current dramatic standards and Italian language to bring traditional rabbinic sources to the attention of Italian Jews in his play, L'Ester (1619), on the life of Queen *Esther. He contributed an index, Beit lehem yehudah (Bethlehem in Judah, 1625) to the anthology Ein Yaakov, the major source of rabbinic materials in *Italy (where the *Talmud was banned), as well as a supplementary collection of rabbinic teachings, Beit Yehu- dah (The House of Judah, 1635). Modena's Historia de' Riti Hebraici (History of Jewish Rituals, 1637, 1638), written in Italian, provided the first vernacular description of *Judaism by a Jew for a non-Jewish audience.

Modena's important writings remained unpublished during his lifetime, as did his sermons, *poetry (Shirei Yehudah [The Poetry of Judah]), letters, *respona (Ziknei Yehudah [The Elders of Judah]), testaments, *Bible commentaries, and autobiography (Hayyei Yehudah [The Life of Judah]). Topics addressed in his respona reveal many aspects of Jewish life in seventeenth-century Italy: They include answers to questions about musical performances in *synagogues, men going about bareheaded, and Jews playing tennis or traveling by boat on the *Sabbath. His most significant writings were polemics against Jewish heresy, Christianity, and Jewish *mysticism; these included Sha'agat Aryeh (The Roar of the Lion, 1622) written against Kol Sakhal (The Voice of the Fool), a work that he claimed to have translated from Spanish; and Diffesa (Defense, 1626), a defense of the Talmud written in Italian (see also MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH–CHRISTIAN POLEMICS).

Modena was a critic of recent trends in Jewish mysticism, especially the spread of the new school of Lurianic Kabbalah (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC) and the influence of Christian Kabbalah on Jewish apostasy (see CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM). These efforts culminated in a trilogy of works: a tract against reincarnation, Ben David (The Son of David, 1636); a text challenging the authenticity of the *Kabbalah, Ari Nohem (The Lion Roars, 1639); and an attack on Christian Kabbalah, Magen vaHerev (Shield and Sword, 1645). In his autobiography, the first in Hebrew, Modena regularly recorded the details of his unhappy but productive life. It is testimony to Modena's candor about himself and his times. Living in the Venetian *ghetto in the midst of Christian society, and on the boundaries between Judaism and Christianity, between Hebrew and Italian, and between medieval and modern Jewry, Modena was a highly accomplished scholar, community leader, and writer, but also a complex and tormented individual.

For further reading, see The Autobiography of a Seventeenth Century Venetian Rabbi: Leon Modena's Life of Judah, trans. and ed. M. R. Cohen, with essays by M. R. Cohen, T. K. Rabb, H. E. Adelman, N. Z. Davis, and B. C. I. Ravid.

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

Modern Orthodox Judaism: See JUDAISM, ORTHODOX

Money Lending: Medieval and Early Modern Europe.

Money lending, together with *commerce, was the chief livelihood of Jews in medieval and early modern Europe. There was also a substantial Jewish servant class, and many Jews, as were non-Jews, were active in more than one profession at the same time. Credit operations often went hand in hand with activities such as minting, money changing, the plate and bullion trade, and tax collection. Like money lending, these activities demanded capital, accounting and metallurgical skills, as well as close ties with the holders of political power. One of the earliest extant documents before the year 1000 portrays a Jew of southern *France busy “in the affairs of the archbishop of Narbonne, supplying his needs; . . . exchanging his gold and silver; investing in merchandise; contracting with a junior partner; and lending money for interest.”

In medieval society, a variety of people extended credit in a range of situations. Informal arrangements for small credit needs were part of family and neighborhood networks in villages and towns. Christian merchants extended loans for business capital, as well as for political purposes, to colleagues, town governments, and kings. Ecclesiastical institutions were frequently involved in credit operations, usually camouflaged as charitable help. In some locations only Jews served as professional money lenders, in other regions foreign Christians – the so-called Lombards and Cahorsins – were also active. In *Italy, local merchants and professional money lenders, all of whom were Christians, largely met the credit needs; only in the fourteenth century did Jewish bankers arrive in parts of Italy from *Germany. England appears to be a special case, because there the credit business was the principal activity of Jews from the time of their arrival in the late eleventh century (see ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES). Often, Jewish and Christian credit existed simultaneously, fulfilling different functions and serving different clienteles.

Jews were borrowers, as well as lenders. However, lending money to a fellow Jew transgressed the biblical prohibition, “To a foreigner you may lend upon interest, but to your brother you shall not lend upon interest” (Deut 23:20–21). In southern Europe, where Jews frequently owned property, mortgaging land was a frequent expedient in this situation. In northern *France and in *Germany, where Jewish ownership of agricultural property was much more circumscribed, the prohibition urgently called for a solution. Experts in religious law came to permit a number of exceptions, including the regular interest-bearing loan, provided the subterfuge of a pawn and a non-Jewish intermediary were employed.

In the early Middle Ages, in southern France (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN) and then in *Ashkenaz, Jewish money lending first appeared as a byproduct of trade operations, when the vendor consented to delayed payment for goods delivered. Effectively a loan, such postponement was granted to preferred customers (implied in the term, ma’arufiya) with whom a business relationship had long been established. Regular loans, typically granted to the nobility, also appear in the sources; once again this procedure was geared toward maintaining a business association. As in Jewish commercial enterprises in this period, the credit clientele in Ashkenaz was mostly from the upper classes; their financial needs did not stem from destitution. In contrast, there are signs of a low-end lending market involving Jews and their neighbors in rural areas of southern and central France. By the twelfth century the clientele in the north was still mainly made up of members of the elite, which now included both clergy (archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, deacons, communities of monks, and cathedral priests) and laity (kings, dukes, princes, margraves and burgraves, counts, landed proprietors, and knights). Commoners were among the patrons in the thirteenth century, and by the early fourteenth century they made up a significant part of the clientele. The largest numbers of borrowers were burghers, who came from practically every major town and many smaller ones, as well as peasants. In the later Middle Ages, Christian financiers took over lending to the well-to-do, and Jews dealt with the most problematic and socially volatile clientele: the poor. This remained the situation in the Early Modern period as well. At the very end of the era under consideration, a resurgence of Jewish involvement in high finance ultimately led to the establishment of banking houses of the *Rothschilds, Warburgs, and many other families in the nineteenth century (see BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES).

Surviving sources shed little direct light on personal motives for borrowing money. There is no mention of the expenses incurred by crusaders, an undertaking that many historians conjecture may have plunged people into debt and thus set the scene for the persecutions of the twelfth century. As for kings, princes, prelates, and town governments, it is safe to infer that many loans were motivated by political necessity. Thus, Vivelin “the Red” of Strasbourg, at the top echelon of Jewish bankers in early-fourteenth-century Germany, lent substantial sums to the Count Palatine of the Rhine and to the archbishop of Mainz. He also served as counselor to the archbishop of Trier, with whose Jewish and Christian officials he jointly carried out numerous financial deals. He was the principal in a complicated arrangement by which King Edward III of England, in dire need of cash for his military operations in France, raised the immense sum of 340,000 gold florins in 1338/9. As part of security for the loan, the English crown was pawned to the archbishop of Trier, who eventually turned it over to Vivelin.

Outside the elite, the demand for credit by significant numbers of commoners has usually been seen as tied to economic distress. However, in many documented cases this premise is clearly inapplicable. Peasants often took out loans in the fall after the harvest was in, when food was plentiful. Significantly, much of the information on credit in the countryside, indeed on early credit in general, comes from regions that specialized in viticulture. It has been recently suggested that wine growing and its recurring need for high money inputs provided the initial stimulus for Jews to move from trade to money lending (Soloveitchik). Recourse to the money lender for survival applies much more to the great number of borrowers from the urban lower classes who made up the bulk of clients in later medieval Germany and *Spain.

An integral part of the lending business, then as now, was the necessity for collateral: tangible assets to secure outstanding loans. Given the agricultural character of medieval society, it is not surprising that the earliest and, for a long time, the most important pawns were landed properties. With increasing legal elaboration came the development of additional forms, such as the written deed claimable in court or the warranty promise by a third party. There was also a curious medieval custom called in German Einlager (literally “depositing”) and in Hebrew, “eating on someone as warranty.” In case of failure to pay, the debtor agreed to lodge on his account a party in an inn, with their horses in the stable, to eat and drink merrily away until payment of the debt was effected. This custom was also practiced between Jews, apparently without the horses.

The use of pledges gave rise to serious and sometimes unbearable tensions. From early on, pawning ecclesiastical utensils to Jews was seen as sacrilegious. Even more fraught with difficulties was the privileged status that came to be granted to Jews (and to the Italian money lenders called Lombards) in regard to stolen goods. Civil authorities walked a thin line between the need to deter theft and the wish to promote the smooth performance of the marketplace. Thus, it became accepted practice to let the lender swear that such pawns had been accepted in good faith as security, rather than acquired as cheap goods of doubtful provenance. Conversely, an increasing range of objects were prohibited as pawns: ecclesiastical utensils; goods whose wet or bloody condition suggested theft or robbery; the weaponry and armor of the members of urban militias; the buckets, axes, and shovels kept at different locations throughout town in case of fire; and a whole range of tools and raw materials essential for the livelihood of artisans. Accepting pawns as security could and did easily develop into pawnbroking, a practice that aroused intense antagonism. However, daily practice might sometimes have been more relaxed, as has recently been suggested in a local study based on records from fourteenth-century Marseilles (Shatzmiller).

Interest rates were exorbitantly high, reaching sometimes more than 100% per year, but the rich usually borrowed more cheaply and for longer periods. Government authorities closely monitored money lending for control of interest rates, for taxation, and for the maintenance of social calm. The most elaborate system was the English "Exchequer of the Jews" and its local branches, the "Registries of Deeds." In return, Jewish bankers everywhere depended on the government, its agents, and its legal machinery to collect debts, recoup capital and interest, and foreclose on collateral when the lender failed. In short, to carry out their business, Jews depended on Christian rulers to employ the machinery of authority against the Christian borrower. Such assistance created anxieties for some especially pious monarchs, like the thirteenth-century French king Saint Louis, who felt significant guilt. Protecting Jewish lenders also left authorities open to criticism and heavy pressure, especially when combined with accusations of corruption and taking bribes from the Jews.

Altogether, money lending was a risky business, and things could go very wrong. Rabbi *Abraham ben David of Posquières (southern France, twelfth century) had some pertinent advice to investors in the lending business (Responsum no. 14):

And do not lend without a good pledge of gold and silver; and put the money regularly beneath the earth to safeguard from fire and thieves without people knowing about this, so that it shall not be known to thieves and make them think of stealing; and when you receive a pledge of gold and silver conceal it in a secure place beneath the earth. And do not take pledges of gold and silver from great townsmen and violent men so that you shall not be forced to return them without security against your will.

The resentment surrounding lending money created an intense and enduring negative image of Jews in much of medieval Europe. These tensions remain visible in a variety of cultural forms, including Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, written more than three hundred years after the last Jewish money lender had been expelled from England.

For further reading, see H. Soloveitchik, Principles and Presures: Jewish Trade in Gentile Wine in the Middle Ages (2003); R. W. Emery, The Jews of Perpignan in the 13th Century: An Economic Study Based on Notarial Records (1959); J. Shatzmiller, Shylock Reconsidered: Jews, Moneylenders and Medieval Society (1990); and M. Toch, The Economic History of Medieval European Jews. vol. I: The Early Middle Ages (forthcoming).

MICHAEL TOCH

Monotheism, Ethical: See GOD; JUDAISM: REFORM entries; THEOLOGY

Montefiore, Moses Haim (1784–1885) was a British businessman, communal leader, and philanthropist who was revered for his interventions to assist Jewish communities in *Eastern Europe and Muslim lands. Although born in Livorno, Montefiore came from a family of Anglo-Italian merchants already well established in London. His cosmopolitan roots in the western *Sephardi Diaspora informed his Jewish activism and belied his popular image as the quintessential English Jew. Montefiore made a fortune on the stock exchange, thanks partly to his marriage to the wealthy, *Ashkenazi JUDITH BARENT COHEN (1784–1862), whose brother-in-law Nathan *Rothschild became a close associate. In later life the Rothschild connection added greatly to Montefiore's influence, but his fame as a humanitarian in the non-Jewish world owed much to business connections forged with evangelical and nonconformist Christians.

In his forties, Montefiore cut back his business activity before embarking for *Palestine with Judith in 1827. This life-changing pilgrimage inspired Montefiore's second career as a communal leader, as well as Judith's growing confidence as a pioneering Anglo-Jewish writer. In all, Montefiore made seven visits to Palestine; the last one was in 1875 when he was ninety. Montefiore devoted the 1830s to campaigning for Anglo-Jewish emancipation; to this end he served as Sheriff of the City of London, an office that brought him a knighthood. Although he served as president of the Board of Deputies for British Jews for some forty years (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN), his role in Jewish communal politics was controversial. He was widely blamed for the bitter divide that developed in Britain between *Reform and mainstream Judaism. Meanwhile, Montefiore's high-profile foreign missions (accompanied by Judith) brought the couple growing celebrity. The intersection between Jewish interests and British imperialism ensured that they had their greatest success in the Muslim world, where Montefiore's intervention in the *Damascus Affair (1840) and their mission to Morocco (1864) elicited formal commitments to protect local Jews. Missions to *Russia (1846), Rome (1859), and *Romania (1867) had less direct impact, but contributed to the globalization of modern Jewish consciousness.

Montefiore's long-standing commitment to Palestine also proved pivotal in this regard. His second visit (1839) has attracted particular attention because of Montefiore's precocious scheme to promote Jewish agricultural colonization, a project more influenced by contact with British antislavery activists than an explicitly nationalist agenda. Judith's account of the expedition (1844) became a central reference in debates about the introduction of productive industries in Palestine, although the scheme foundered as did later agricultural and industrial initiatives. Only the windmill and almshouses Montefiore built outside the Old City survived to become symbols of modern *Jerusalem.

All these activities were facilitated by Montefiore's innovative *philanthropy. Through the Holy Land Relief Fund (1855) and the Persian Famine Relief Fund (1872) he pioneered subscription fundraising in a global, Jewish context; however, he left nothing substantial to the early *Zionists who raised money in his name. The only charitable institution Montefiore founded was the Judith Lady Montefiore Theological College in Ramsgate, in memory of his wife. Their loving marriage had been marred by infertility. She found expression through publishing her travel diaries and compiling the first ever Jewish *cookbook (1846); rumours of illegitimate children suggest this profoundly religious man may have sought comfort in extramarital affairs. A recent study is A. Green, Moses Montefiore: Jewish Liberator, Imperial Hero (2010).

ABIGAIL GREEN

Months: See CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR; NEW MOON

Montreal: See CANADA; LITERATURE: CANADA

Morocco: See NORTH AFRICA

Mortara Affair. This international cause célèbre involved the abduction and rearing of a Jewish Italian boy, Edgardo Mortara (1851–1940), as a ward of the Papal States after his involuntary baptism. When still a toddler Mortara became seriously ill. Worried that he might die and fearing for his soul, the family's teenaged servant, Anna Morisi, sprinkled Mortara with water. Four years later, after Morisi reported her crude baptism to a friend, the Inquisition of Bologna (a city then part of the Papal States) became aware of the incident. The Catholic Church swiftly applied canon law to affirm the inviolate nature of the baptismal act and insisted on its legal and moral obligation to rear and educate any baptized Jewish child. On June 23, 1858, civil authorities abducted Mortara, then six years old, from his parents' home. Pope Pius IX (Giovanni Mastai Ferretti, 1792–1878) adopted the child as his son, prompting an international scandal. The incident undermined and even hastened the end of the Vatican's temporal powers and had profound ramifications for the unification of *Italy.

Despite their repeated appeals, requests by Salomone Mortara and Marianna Padovani for the return of their son were denied. Church authorities maintained the validity of Edgardo's baptism and declared that the young boy would be returned only if his parents converted, which they refused to do. Although the seizure of an involuntarily baptized Jewish child in nineteenth-century Italy was not unheard of (a five-year-old girl secretly baptized by a domestic was removed from her home in Ferrara in 1817), this particular case attracted significant international attention. European leaders, including Count Camillo Cavour, architect of the Italian unification movement, and Napoleon III, protested the abduction. By late 1858, The New York Times had published more than twenty articles about the incident. The Mortara Affair also highlighted Jewish vulnerability and played a central role in the founding of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle. In 1870, the annexation of Rome to the kingdom of Italy successfully completed Italian unification and vindicated nationalist, liberal, and anticlerical ideologies. Mortara, nineteen years old at the time, moved to *France. There, he entered the Augustinian order and four years later was ordained a priest, adopting the spiritual name Pius. His missionary work would take him to Munich, Mainz, and Breslau. In 1912, he provided a written statement (which mentioned his abduction) in favor of the canonization of Pius IX. The beatification, which took place in September 2000 during the papacy of Pope John Paul II, was strongly protested by descendants of the Mortara family, among other groups. Mortara attended his mother's funeral, led by the rabbi of Bologna, in 1895. He died in Belgium at the age of eighty-eight, two months before the Nazi invasion of that country.

Edgardo's story has been dramatized and embellished by several playwrights, including Herman Moos in his 1860 play, Mortara, or The Pope and His Inquisitors. In 2002, Pulitzer-prize-winning playwright Alfred Uhry adapted David Kertzer's definitive book, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara (1997), into the play Edgardo Mine (now The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara). LISA RUBENSTEIN CALEVI

Moses is the Israelite leader whose story appears in the biblical books of *Exodus through *Deuteronomy. Born to a Levite family, he is placed in a basket and set afloat on the Nile by his mother to save him from the *Egyptian edict to kill all male Hebrew infants. Moses is rescued and adopted by the pharaoh's daughter (Exod 2:1–10) and comes of age in the Egyptian court. As a young man he flees to Midian after killing an abusive overseer (2:11–15); there he marries Zipporah, daughter of *Jethro, priest of Midian, and encounters *God in a burning bush (2:16–3:6). Countering all of Moses' protestations of inadequacy, God commands him to free the Hebrews from their Egyptian oppressors (3:7–4:17). Moses' entreaties to Pharaoh initiate a sequence of escalating confrontations that culminate in the unleashing of ten plagues (5–12). When Pharaoh relents, Moses instructs the people to institute the *Passover to commemorate their escape from servitude (12–13). When Moses leads the people out of Egypt, Pharaoh reconsiders his decision and gives chase. At the Red Sea (or "Reed Sea"; Hebrew, yam suf) the Egyptian army perishes after the Hebrews miraculously cross over on dry land (14–15).

Moses leads the people for forty years in the wilderness, the signature moment of which is the theophany at Sinai (or Horeb) and Moses' reception of the laws of the *covenant. At the end of the wilderness sojourn, Moses delivers a farewell address (Deut 32) and dies before the people enter the land of *Canaan.

The centrality of Moses as liberator, lawgiver, prophet, judge, and priest can hardly be overstated. A leader on the most intimate terms with God, yet humble (Num 12:3) and even reluctant, he came to represent, in many ways, an ideal personage. Several other characters in the monotheistic traditions can be said to be portrayed as varieties of a "second Moses": *Joshua, *Elijah, *Josiah, and *Ezra, as well as Jesus and Muhammed. Post-biblical Jewish interpreters represented Moses as a paragon of their own belief systems: For Hellenistic Jews he became a philosopher; for rabbinic Jews he was the author of the *Pentateuch and promulgator of the Oral *Torah.

For all that, something of Moses resists emulation. He is a man characterized by both a quick temper and passivity; other aspects of his story reveal a side that is enigmatic, even esoteric (the "bridegroom of blood" episode [Exod 4:24–26], the magicians' duels in Pharaoh's court [Exod 7], the bronze serpent [Num 21:4–9]). Moses is the people's intercessor, yet he is nevertheless removed from them. He requires *Aaron to speak for him (Exod 4:10–17, 27–31), and he wears a veil to obscure his glowing face (Exod 34:29–35). Deuteronomy explicitly describes his connection with God as unique and unsurpassed (Deut 34:10–12). In addition, his death outside of the land and his unknown grave (34:6) ensure that he belongs to a previous age; it is significant that Moses' descendants play no discernible role in biblical Israel's later history.

This inaccessibility is also reflected in the question of the historical Moses. No extrabiblical sources attest to him, and many aspects of his story echo episodes from other ancient texts. Nonetheless, some elements of the narrative, such as his name, do have an authentically Egyptian feel, and recent historical research plausibly allows for a modified, reduced version of the Exodus. However, the nature of the literature and the scanty historical evidence make any level of certainty highly unlikely. Recent scholarship includes B. Britt, Rewriting Moses (2004); W. H. C. Propp, Exodus 1–18 (1999); and S. Weitzman, Song and Story in Biblical Narrative (1997).

SEAN BURT

Moses de Leon (ca. 1240–1305) was the principal author of the Zohar*, the most important work of the Kabbalah*. He was born in Leon in Spain*, wandered among several communities in Castile, resided for many years in Guadalajara and then in Avila, and died in Arevalo. As a young man he studied Jewish thought*, especially the works of Maimonides*, but then dedicated himself to mysticism*, writing more than twenty treatises. In the 1270s he began to write the Midrash ha-Ne'elam (The Esoteric Midrash), which became the earliest stratum of the Zohar. According to Gershom Scholem*, Moses de Leon completed the Zohar, which was written in Aramaic*, in the early 1290s and then wrote many of his Hebrew works; Isaiah Tishby maintained that he continued to write sections of the Zohar until his death. He made a meager living selling portions of the Zohar; he claimed he had copied them from an ancient manuscript that originated with the second-century-CE Tanna*, Rabbi Simon bar Yoḥai. After de Leon's death, his destitute widow was offered a large sum of money for the original text of the Zohar. She denied its existence, claiming that her late husband "was writing from his mind."

The writings of Moses de Leon include Bible commentaries (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY) and interpretations of prayers* and commandments*; most have never been printed. His best known treatises are Sefer ha-Rimon (Book of the Pomegranate) on the kabbalistic reasons for the commandments, Or Zarua (Spreading Light) on creation, Ha-Nefesh ha-Ḥakhamah (The Wise Soul), and Shaarei Zedek (Gates of Justice) on Ecclesiastes*. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Kabbalah (1974), 432–34; and I. Tishby, Wisdom of the Zohar, vol. 1 (1989).

JOSEPH DAN

Musar Movement. The Hebrew term musar, usually translated as morals or ethics*, also bears the meaning of chastisement and method. In the teaching of the nineteenth-century Musar movement, all senses of musar combine, creating a powerful call for serious self-examination and correction of the religious life. Whereas Ḥasidism* emphasizes joyfulness and devotional feeling during religious activities, the Musar movement – associated with the mitnaggedim* (the "opponents," the rabbinical movement that stood in opposition to Ḥasidism) – stresses labor, duty, and seriousness as essential prerequisites for a genuine religious and moral life.

Proponents of the Musar movement locate its origins in the teachings of the Vilna Gaon* and his students, but the real founder was Rabbi Israel (Lifkin) Salanter (1810–1883). Salanter, who typified in his personality the religious duty of love and respect to other human beings, directed his students to work constantly on their moral virtues and to be sensitive to the needs and feelings of others. Salanter urged his followers to study traditional ethical and moral (musar) works, such as the famous Mesillat Yesharim (Path of the Just) by the eighteenth-century Italian kabbalist* Moses Ḥayyim Luzzato* and the eleventh-century ethical classic Ḥovot ha-Levavot (Duties of the Heart) by the Spanish pietist Bahia ibn Pakuda*. Salanter taught that these books should be studied as a spiritual exercise arousing the deepest feelings of the soul. Musar study was to be undertaken loudly, with repetitions, to stimulate enthusiasm (hitpalut); the student of musar had to experience the religious weight of ideas such as "fear of Heaven," "rewards and punishment," "intention," and "virtues" and correct his or her life accordingly.

During his lifetime Salanter was recognized as one of the preeminent Lithuanian rabbis* and leaders. However, his social and religious group did not expand beyond several dozen faithful students and admirers. Initially Salanter hoped that his teaching would influence traditional-minded Lithuanian Jews, but the movement's very strict requirements were not attractive to the public. Salanter's students expanded the boundaries of the Musar movement after his death by opening yeshivot and other educational institutions that followed Salanter's teachings. With the movement's growing success, antagonism began to develop from different quarters. Followers of the Haskalah* criticized Salanter and his students as reactionary, and conservative mitnaggedim* considered his novel approach to be a break with the Lithuanian emphasis on speculative study of Torah*. After long and fierce debates the Musar movement prevailed, and most Lithuanian-style yeshivot added moral teachings to their curriculum. Most also created the position of mashgiach ruḥani (spiritual supervisor) to guide the students' moral and religious behavior.

After Salanter's time, not only the size but also the ideas and methods of the Musar movement continued to develop, and various schools of thought emerged. The dominant approach was developed by Note Hirsh (Natan Tsevi) Finkel (1849–1927), known as the Saba (elder or grandfather) of Slobodka, the spiritual director of the central Musar Yeshivah in Slobodka. Finkel's most important educational principle was the greatness and responsibility of humankind, as created in God's image.

In the early twenty-first century, the most influential Lithuanian-style yeshivot in Israel* and the United States* continue to share a deep commitment to the teachings and practices of the Musar movement. Indeed, among nearly all present-day Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX), and especially in the non-Ḥasidic branch of Ḥaredi (Ultra-Orthodox) Jews, its ideas are preserved in an emphasis on serious self-examination and correction in all aspects of life. For further reading, see I. Etikes, Rabbi Israel Salanter and the Mussar Movement (1993); and H. Goldberg, Israel Salanter: Text, Structure, Idea (1982).

CHAIM MEIR NERIA

Museums. The first Jewish museums were established in Europe, the United States*, and Palestine* in the early twentieth century, and their history is integrally linked with the twentieth-century Jewish experience. Jewish museums acquire Jewish *art defined in its broadest sense to include antiquities, *ceremonial objects, ethnographic artifacts, historical documents and memorabilia, and fine and folk art. These artifacts reflect the 4,000-year history and heritage of the Jewish people as it evolved in many lands (see entries under ART and CEREMONIAL OBJECTS).

EUROPE: Jewish museums are the product of the modern age when major demographic shifts, increasing secularization, and the rise of nationalism radically altered patterns of Jewish life. Several factors led to the development of Jewish museums. One was the academic aspirations of the Wissenschaft des Judentums*, the scientific study of Judaism, which originated in *Germany in the 1820. An underlying political agenda of the Wissenschaft movement was to focus on Judaism's contributions to western civilization and thus dispel *antisemitic stereotypes. A society dedicated to the study of Jewish art was founded in *Vienna in 1895 and a museum was established in 1897. Similar developments took place in *Frankfurt (1901 and 1922) and in Budapest (1910 and 1916; see HUNGARY). A 1906 urban renewal project in the *Prague ghetto spurred a salvage effort and the creation of a museum. The rescue effort of Jewish artifacts was also extended across Bohemia and Moravia. In *Eastern Europe, the emigration of more than two million Jews motivated S. Ansky, author of The Dybbuk, to organize a regional expedition to document folkways and collect objects. A museum was established in *Saint Petersburg in 1913. A museum named for Ansky was formed in *Vilna in 1920; *YIVO was founded in 1925. In Lwów, the public museum first collected Judaica; a Jewish art society was founded in the 1920s and a museum established in 1931. The museum's holdings along with Maksymilian Goldstein's collection were transferred to the Municipal Museum in 1941. Museums in Danzig in 1904 and *Warsaw in 1910 grew from private collections. Collection, cataloguing, and study of Jewish art continued after World War I with new museums in Breslau, Kassel, Munich, Mainz, and Odessa; the Jewish Museum in *Berlin was dedicated in January 1933. Museums were opened in *Amsterdam and London (see *Britain) in 1932.

During the *Holocaust, European Jewish museums were either looted or completely destroyed. The Danzig collection was shipped to the Jewish Museum in *New York City for safekeeping. After the war, the Jewish Cultural Reconstruction (JCR), a consortium of American Jewish institutions, was authorized by the State Department to identify and distribute heirless and unclaimed Jewish property in the American Occupied Zone of Germany to Jewish communities in *Israel and worldwide; about three hundred objects were returned to *Holland. Part of YIVO's collection was recovered and sent to its new home in New York City. In the post-World War II era, a few Jewish museums, including those in London, Amsterdam, and Budapest, renewed their activities, and new museums were established in Paris, Belgrade, *Warsaw, and Kraków.

A remarkable phenomenon, beginning in the 1960s, has been the revival of European Jewish museums. Museums have been established or reopened in *Austria, *Belgium, *Denmark, *France (Paris and the Alsace region), *Germany, *Greece (Rhodes and Salonika), Ireland, *Italy, Morocco, Norway, *Portugal, *Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and *Turkey.

Since the collapse of communism in the late 1980s, scores of Jewish museums have been created across the region in *Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, *Bulgaria, Croatia, Czech Republic, Hungary, *Latvia, *Lithuania, *Poland, *Romania, Slovakia, and *Ukraine, where a collection was discovered in 1989 at the Historical Treasures Museum of the Ukraine in Kiev. The Ansky Collection, long hidden in storage, is displayed at the State Ethnographic Museum in Saint Petersburg, where there is also a Jewish museum. A museum is being built in Moscow as well. The Lwów collections in the Museum of Ethnography and Artistic Crafts were made public in the 1990s. After the reunification of Germany, numerous Jewish museums were built, the most prominent among them in Berlin in 2001 and Munich in 2007. Nearly one hundred *synagogues have been restored and many house museums. Thirty countries are members of the Association of European Jewish Museums (AEFM), which "seeks to promote the study of European Jewish history and works to protect and preserve Jewish sites and the Jewish cultural heritage in Europe." Efforts are ongoing to recover artifacts from pre-war European Jewish museum collections aided in part by provenance data now accessible on the internet.

ISRAEL: The Bezalel Art School for Arts and Crafts opened in *Jerusalem in 1906 and the Bezalel Museum soon afterward, also in Jerusalem (see ART: ISRAELI). The school was ideologically aligned with *Zionism, and the aim of its founder Boris Schatz was to develop a new Jewish art influenced by those ideals. The establishment of the State of *Israel in 1948 led to tremendous growth in museums. The Bezalel Museum was incorporated into the Israel Museum, the national museum, which houses encyclopedic collections ranging from prehistory through contemporary art. Today there are some two hundred museums in Israel. A number of them, such as the Wolfson Museum and the Nahon Museum of Italian Jewish Art, both in Jerusalem, are similar to Jewish museums elsewhere in the world in their collections and exhibitions of Judaica and Jewish art. Others focus on Israeli history. The Eretz Israel Museum founded in Tel Aviv in 1953 is comprised of theme pavilions including *archeology, ethnography, and folklore. Independence Hall, where David *Ben-Gurion proclaimed the establishment of Israel, is located in the former home of Meir Dizengoff, *Tel Aviv's first mayor, which he donated in 1932 for the Tel Aviv Museum of Art. Israeli art is featured in many museums including Ein Harod, founded in 1933. Homes of luminaries in Israeli society, including artists, have been preserved as museums, and Theodor *Herzl's study from Vienna is reconstructed at the Herzl Museum in Jerusalem. Ethnic heritage is the focus of museums such as the World Center for the Heritage of North African Jewry, the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Center, and the Rosh Ha'ayin Museum of Yemenite Jewry. Beth Ha-Tefusoth on the campus of Tel Aviv University opened in 1978 to tell the story of the Jewish people in the *Diaspora. Thousands of archeological sites throughout Israel have been made accessible for visitors.

THE AMERICAS AND THE CARIBBEAN: In the United States, the Jewish Museum was launched at the *Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) of America in New York City in 1904 and the Union Museum at *Hebrew Union College (now HUC-JIR) in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1913. Early acquisitions included private collections, several of which had been primarily formed in Europe. For four decades, they were the only two Jewish museums in the United States, although some synagogues housed commemorative artifacts and ceremonial objects that later formed the basis of museum collections. The Jewish Museum has gained international stature in the art world and in the field of Jewish art; the JTS Library also maintains significant visual arts holdings. Parts of the HUC-JIR collection are housed at the Skirball Cultural Center in *Los Angeles, which became an HUC-JIR affiliate in 1996.

After the *Six Day War in 1967, there was a tremendous upsurge in interest in Jewish life and culture. This interest coincided with a general focus on ethnicity that has significantly affected American life. The Council of American Jewish Museums (CAJM) was founded in 1977 with seven members: B'nai B'rith Klutznick National Museum, Washington, D.C.; Jewish Museum, New York City; *Yeshiva University Museum, New York City; Magnes Museum, Berkeley, California; National Museum of American Jewish History, *Philadelphia; Spertus Museum, *Chicago; and Skirball Museum, Los Angeles. Today CAJM's seventy-five members include art and history museums, Jewish historic sites, archives, *Holocaust memorial and education centers, synagogue museums, children's museums, and galleries connected with Jewish Community Centers and universities. CAJM's mission is "to assist its members as they educate and inspire diverse audiences on all aspects of Jewish culture and history." A number focus on regional Jewish history, including those in Alaska, Maryland, Florida, Oregon, and the Museum of the Southern Jewish Experience in Mississippi. The *Center for Jewish History in New York is a unique partnership of five major institutions: American Jewish Historical Society, American Sephardi Federation, *Leo Baeck Institute, Yeshiva University Museum, and *YIVO.

In *Canada, a museum was created in 1964 at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto with historian Cecil Roth's collection, formed over a fifty-year period. Museums were later founded in Winnipeg and Montreal, and Jewish historical societies have been formed in several cities, including Calgary, Vancouver, and St. John. In *Latin America, the Buenos Aires Jewish Museum was established in *Argentina in 1967. The Jewish Museum of Rio de Janeiro was formed in *Brazil in 1977. In Chile, museums in Santiago and Valparaíso both highlight the *Sephardic experience, as does the Jewish Museum in Caracas, Venezuela. The Jewish Museums in Paraguay and Mexico City house documentation on the *Holocaust. In the *Caribbean, historic synagogues in Curaçao, *Jamaica, and St. Thomas have museums featuring the history of these communities.

ASIA, AUSTRALIA, and SOUTH AFRICA: The effort to preserve local Jewish history has been a major impetus to conserve Jewish sites across the globe, often as museums. Some of these communities have a long history; others have emerged within the last two centuries. Sometimes the Jewish presence is dwindling or is no more. In *India, the Paradesi Synagogue in Cochin, India, which dates to 1568, and several synagogues in Mumbai are being maintained. In Shanghai, *China, the Ohel Rachel Synagogue is undergoing renovation.

The Jewish community in *Australia dates to the nineteenth century and grew with immigrants from Eastern Europe, refugees fleeing *Nazi Germany in the 1930s, and survivors after the war. Jewish museums were established in Melbourne in 1982 and Sydney in 1992. The Jewish community in *South Africa also dates to the nineteenth century. The Jewish museum opened in Capetown in 2000, and a Holocaust Center is located nearby.

HOLOCAUST MUSEUMS AND MEMORIALS: Beginning in the 1970s, Holocaust museums and memorials have been established worldwide. The Association of Holocaust Organizations is a network of hundreds of institutions that "advance Holocaust programming, education, and research." Lohamei ha-Ghettaot, the Kibbutz of the Ghetto Fighters, organized a museum in 1949. *Yad Vashem in Jerusalem was founded in 1953 to serve as the international site of remembrance. For decades there were only a few memorials, among them the Anne *Frank House in Amsterdam. Several were at camps, including *Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Buchenwald, Dachau, *Theresienstadt, and *Treblinka, and at the site of the *Warsaw ghetto. Memorials, monuments, and museums have now been built in Berlin, Copenhagen, Paris, and Rome and at many other locations across Europe and in places where Jews sought refuge, such as Shanghai. Israel has a number of Holocaust memorials and museums, including some that commemorate the heroic resistance of individuals, such as the Hannah Senesh House and Yad Mordecai, a tribute to Mordecai Anielewicz, the commander of the Warsaw ghetto uprising. Three major museums opened in the 1990s in the United States: the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.; the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles; and the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York (see also HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS).

In 2010 there are nearly three hundred Jewish museums throughout the world, and their numbers continue to increase. They share a common mission both to preserve the Jewish heritage and to confront issues of contemporary Jewish identity and cultural renewal. Many museums have published catalogues about their history, collections, and of special exhibitions; for a survey, see G. C. Grossman, Jewish Museums of the World (2003). Other useful works include A. Sacerdoti, The Guide to Jewish Italy (2004); R. E. Gruber, Jewish Heritage Travel: Guide to Eastern Europe (2007); R. and B. Z. Dorfman, Synagogues Without Jews (2000); and J. E. Young, The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning (1993).

GRACE COHEN GROSSMAN

Music, Biblical Era: See BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE

Music, Folk. Musicologists typically designate the musical traditions of a given culture as religious, folk, and art. Folk music is part of the personal, communal, and celebratory lives of ordinary people. Although Jewish religious music has historically been performed by men, folk music is sung in the home by both men and women. Where art music is the product of an identified composer, folk music makes use of well-known traditional melodies whose authors are unknown.

In the modern period, these categories overlap in interesting ways. Both *Ashkenazic and *Sephardic Jews have venerable folk traditions. Major categories within Ashkenazic folk music include *Yiddish songs, klezmer music, and *Hasidic niggunim (wordless songs). In the Sephardic tradition, Judeo-Spanish (*Ladino) songs and *piyyutim (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) are important categories.

In the second half of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first century, performers have collected, studied, and taken these Jewish folk traditions into new performance arenas.

Ashkenazic folk songs of *Central and *Eastern Europe were part of Jewish *life-cycle rituals and joyous *festival celebrations in the home. Many songs were in Yiddish, the spoken language of most Ashkenazic Jews. Their topics range from religious to secular themes; many Yiddish songs originated in the Yiddish *theater. In America, Jews who maintained an allegiance to a secular Yiddish culture particularly emphasized the preservation of this musical tradition. Klezmer (the Yiddish word derives from the Hebrew term for a musical instrument) refers to the instrumental accompaniments to Yiddish songs in the theater; klezmer music was also heard at Jewish weddings, *Bar Mitzvahs, and other life-cycle events. Many klezmer styles derive from Eastern European folk traditions. *Hasidic music may be both vocal and instrumental. Joyous and fervent singing characterizes the niggunim, the wordless songs sung in the *synagogue and at a tisch (literally “table,” referring to a gathering with a rebbe, the spiritual leader of a Hasidic dynasty).

Each of these genres fits into a particular musical context, depending on its role in European Jewish life. Thus, *cantorial music is connected with the *synagogue; Yiddish songs are associated with daily life or the theater; klezmer music is heard during celebratory life-cycle events; Hasidic music is found in the synagogue and also as part of ritual life in the home; and art music is heard in the concert hall. Each genre is more easily defined through its use or context rather than through discrete musical definitions, nor can sharp lines be drawn among these various styles. *Cantors not only sang for the synagogue but they certainly also sang Yiddish songs. Some Yiddish songs depict a hazzan (cantor) and may even parody the emotional style of cantorial singing. The aesthetic of the virtuosic playing of a clarinet for a klezmer musician is said to follow the geshrai, or “wail,” of the cantor. The interrelationship of the genres is also found within the very fabric of the music itself: Nusakh (the *liturgical tradition of the synagogue) is incorporated into Yiddish songs, klezmer, Hasidic melodies, and art music. When new songs were composed for each genre they were often written in the style of Jewish prayer modes.

The Judeo-Spanish (Ladino) traditions of Sephardic Jews have retained many aspects of medieval *Spanish and *Portuguese culture. This synthesis of Jewish and Spanish cultures has continued for the five hundred years since the 1492 expulsion of Spanish Jews, although the balance of preservation versus new influence has varied in different times and places. The Spanish tradition has been ongoing for Jews in Morocco (see NORTH AFRICA), whereas Jews in *Turkey and *Greece (and see BALKANS) have adopted some local Middle Eastern influences. Some historians hold that the venerable musical forms of these Sephardic Jews, namely the ballad and romancero, were time-honored traditions, untouched by new cultural influence and thus faithfully transmitted. Modern scholars, however, have been unable to validate this claim. Nevertheless, Judeo-Spanish (*Ladino) music has deep historic roots and, like other forms of Jewish music, is both perpetuated and innovatively revitalized by modern performers.

Women have long conserved Judeo-Spanish music: Many of the song texts of the romancero and ballad deal with women’s experiences in life-cycle events, passionate or erotic courtly *poetry, and epic tales or stories. Dirges relating the deaths of individuals in untimely and other circumstances are known as endechas, while coplas are short holiday songs (see also LITERATURE, LADINO). The wedding context has been a particular rich source of music for Sephardic women. The preparation of the *bride for the *mikveh (ritual bath) before the wedding, a bride’s dowry, and her relationship with her mother-in-law are among the subjects of these songs. Some Judeo-Spanish melodies are also incorporated into the prayer liturgy.

The practice of singing piyyutim is an important part of religious life; it started in the sixth century and has continued. In the past two hundred years Sephardi and *Mizrahi (Middle Eastern) communities have renewed this tradition; for example, in North Africa, *Turkey, Syria, and *Iraq. These texts are sung, some with elaborate melodies, on the *Sabbath in the synagogue between the portions of *Torah reading or at home as part of the festive Sabbath meal. They are also sung during *life-cycle rituals.

Songs connected to *Zionism and building a Jewish homeland in the Land of Israel comprise an additional Jewish folk music genre during the twentieth century; they were sung in a variety of languages including Yiddish, Judeo-Spanish, Russian, Polish, English, Arabic, and Hebrew. In the second half of the century, traditional Zionist songs as well as new compositions that came out of the State of *Israel, founded in 1948, were prominent in North American Jewish life in synagogues, classrooms, and youth groups and at social events and *summer camps.

For further reading, see I. J. Katz, “A Judeo-Spanish Romancero,” Ethnomusicology 12(1) (1968): 72–85; E. Koskoff, Music in Lubavitch Life (2000); S. Rogovoy, Essential Klezmer: A Music Lover’s Guide to Jewish Roots and Soul Music, from the Old World to the Jazz Age to the Downtown Avant-Garde (2000); R. Rubin, Voices of a People: The Story of Yiddish Folk-song (1950); E. Seroussi, “New Directions in the Music of the Sephardic Jews,” in Modern Jews and Their Musical Agendas, Studies in Contemporary Jewry, ed. E. Mendelsohn, 9 (1993), 61–77; and M. Slobin, Tenement Songs: The Popular Music of the Jewish Immigrants (1982).

MARK KLIGMAN

Music, Popular. Popular Jewish music encompasses the range of musical practices that address Jewish identity outside religious ritual and western art music composition. In this essay, the focus is on distinctive forms of music that Jews have enjoyed in social and recreational contexts. However, the very porousness of the borders between so-called popular, classical, and sacred music has always been a characteristic of Jewish music.

Although Jews undoubtedly used music in their daily lives before the late nineteenth century, what we know from that earlier time period amounts mainly to lyrics and fragmentary descriptions. By the end of the nineteenth century, however, the mass migration of millions of Jews from *Eastern Europe, the rise of *Zionism, and the development of music recording technologies led Jews to explore new ways to express, preserve, and distribute their ideas of Jewish sound. In the first half of the twentieth century the ability to record and replay musical performances through phonograph records, piano rolls, mass-produced sheet music, and radio *broadcasting allowed Jews and others to explore sounds beyond their local musical spheres. Although communities relied on live musicians to perform for their celebrations and *life-cycle events, they also found mass media a convenient and novel way to hear a wide range of Jewish musical artists and practices.

Musicians actively addressed these listening practices. Jewish wedding players (klezmorim) had developed a well-established presence in Eastern Europe by the nineteenth century, and their popularity crossed over to North America with *immigration. Each city with a significant Jewish population had its own network of musicians, who played for events both inside and outside the Jewish community. Many made recordings, and the most prominent musicians, such as clarinetists Naftule Brandwein (1884–1963) and Dave Tarras (1897–1989), became household names and important symbols of the Eastern European Jewish experience in America (see also MUSIC, FOLK).

*Synagogue singing also became a prominent form of Jewish popular expression, as *cantors became superstars alongside their opera counterparts. Many, including Mordechai Hershman (1888–1940), Moishe Oysher (1907–1958), and Yossele Rosenblatt (1882–1933), supplemented their synagogue positions with best-selling records, international concert tours, and *film appearances (Rosenblatt, for example, performed briefly in the film The Jazz Singer [1927]). A few “lady cantors,” particularly Sophie Kurtzer (1896–1974), emerged on the scene as both performers and recording artists; because of their gender they were not permitted to sing in synagogues, but instead performed liturgical music on the vaudeville stage (“Di Eybecke Mame: Women in Yiddish Theater and Popular Song 1905–1929” [1993 CD]). The Yiddish *theater, which took root in numerous European and American cities around the turn of the twentieth century, also expanded into the *Yiddish recording and film industries. Musicals comprised an important popular component of the theater, and composers such as Sholom Secunda (1894–1974), who wrote “Bei Mir Bistu Shayn,” and Joseph Rumshinsky (ca. 1881–1956) teamed with actor/singers such as Molly Picon (1898–1992) and Aaron Lebedeff (1873–1960) to create icons of popular song for Yiddish-speaking audiences. Their work crossed over into broader cultural realms of American culture as well, with Yiddish songs appearing in the jazz standards repertoire and hit parades by the 1930s (see FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE).

In the Middle East and Mediterranean, meanwhile, different ideas of Jewish “popular” music emerged. Prominent Jewish music researcher Abraham Z. Idelsohn (1882–1938) attempted to fashion a new, “pure” repertoire of Hebrew folk songs that would prepare children for enculturation into a pre-Israeli, Hebrew-speaking society. Songwriters such as Mordecai Zeira (1905–1968) and singers such as Bracha Zefira (1911–1990) contributed in a similar spirit, through folk-like songs that combined Hebrew lyrics, socialist ideologies, pastoral imagery, easily sung melodies, youthful idealism, and promises of cultural integration. Such efforts at *Zionist music-making, some of which had roots in late-nineteenth-century Europe, became important parts of the Zionist project, both in *Palestine and internationally. Recording companies in *Turkey and *Greece also issued records of Jewish performers versed in Arabic and Mediterranean traditions, providing another current of popular music production important to Sephardic communities.

The rise of the *Nazi regime ironically gave an initial boost to Jewish popular music in *Central Europe by consolidating Jewish cultural production in the 1930s; after the start of the war, accounts show that Jews continued to write and exchange popular songs even as they were moved into *ghettos and concentration camps. The *Holocaust ultimately silenced Jewish music in most of Europe; after World War II, Palestine/Israel and the *United States became the central sites of training, recording, and popular musical consumption.

ISRAEL: In Israel, popular song became a means of nation-building and part of the government’s central project for creating a unified Israeli culture. Already by Israeli statehood in 1948, the country had a significant body of songs from which it drew for local public singing sessions and national celebrations. Songwriters such as Naomi Shemer (1930–2004) later added to this repertoire with songs that extolled the land in poetic, biblically inspired terms. The Israeli *military, central to the country’s security, also became an important source for new popular music through its entertainment troupes. Based on British practices, these troupes kept up the morale of soldiers while wittily addressing contemporary concerns. Their shows and songs often became sensations throughout Israel and started the careers of many Israeli popular musicians, including Arik Einstein (b. 1939), Danny Sanderson (b. 1950), Ehud Manor (1941–2005), and Yehoram Gaon (b. 1939).

Outside the army, attempts to create a specifically “Israeli” popular music in the 1960s took the form of national song contests, such as the Israel Song Festival, the Hasidic Song Festival, and the Mizrahi Song Festival (and, later, the Pre-Eurovision Competition). Determined both through popular vote and “expert” panels, these competitions introduced such songs as “Abanibi” (1978) and “Jerusalem of Gold” (1967). Meanwhile the Hasidic Song Festival became an important platform for Shlomo Carlebach’s music in the 1970s. The influence of rock music from Europe and the United States led to another transformation of the Israeli scene toward the end of the 1960s. Although groups simply covered English songs at first, eventually bands such as the Churchills and Kaveret began to combine rock aesthetics and Hebrew lyrics to reflect the Israeli experience. Artists such as Shlomo Artzi (b. 1949), T-Slam, Rami Kleinstein (b. 1962), Rita (b. 1962), and Aviv Geffen (b. 1973) became central figures between the 1970s and the turn of the twenty-first century, creating a culture of concerts alongside the popular public singing tradition.

The 1980s brought artists from the previously marginalized Middle Eastern (*Mizrahi) Jewish communities into the public spotlight. Although singers such as Haim Moshe (b. 1955) and Zohar Argov (1955–1987) had achieved popularity earlier, they had fought to do so on their own terms. Now, figures such as Yemenite Jewish singer Ofra Haza (1957–2000) thrived in the flourishing world music scene in the mid-1980s with a successful blend of rock and Middle Eastern music. The group Ethnix followed in the late 1980s, using exotic imagery and sounds to build a following. A few years later, The Teapacks (Tipex) and Eyal Golan (b. 1971) continued to open doors to the mainstream industry. In doing so, Mizrahi artists began to give Israel an ethnic sound that distinguished its music from that of other countries and helped define “Israeliness” in the international music market.

Rap and hip-hop styles also became important within Israeli popular music from the late 1990s, with artists such as Segol 59 (b. 1969) and Subliminal (b. 1979) outlining political positions through their songs, and novelist David Grossman writing the lyrics for Ha-Dag Nahash’s biggest hit, “The Sticker Song” (Shirat ha-Sticker) in 2004.

UNITED STATES: In North America (and elsewhere), where Jews represented a tiny percentage of the population, popular music was used by different Jewish constituencies to forge a dialogue with the emerging youth culture scene.

Perhaps the most influential Jewish music of the post-war era came from the folk revival, which held an increasingly central position within young adult life in the 1950s, just as Jewish enrollment in college campuses rose and youth movements came to prominence. With Jewish wedding band music and the cantorial “star” system in decline, folk music became a key form of expression for young people and a means of empowerment for Jewish self-expression. Moving this agenda forward was *Orthodox rabbi Shlomo Carlebach (1925–1994). As one of *Habad Lubavitch’s first emissaries to college campuses in the 1950s, Carlebach took up the guitar to make his religious message attractive to young people. Although he left Habad soon afterward, his songs and ministry propelled him into a legendary and sometimes controversial career. Carlebach became a fixture of the folk music scene in the 1960s, and he gave well-received concerts in such venues as Manhattan’s Village Gate and the Berkeley Folk Festival. His more than twenty official albums (mostly live) and two songbooks brought him popularity throughout the Jewish world and provided a basis for what would become the Orthodox music industry. His near-constant touring exposed him to a wide fan base, and his three “homes” – the House of Love and Prayer in San Francisco, the “Carlebach Shul” in *New York City, and Moshav Modi’in in Israel – provided spaces for other musicians to follow in his footsteps.

Carlebach’s success, the rise of a new generation of young Jews in the 1970s, and a renewed American fascination with ethnic identity led Jewish popular music to turn toward “revived” forms of expression. Musicians such as Joel Rubin, Zev Feldman, and Hankus Netsky researched the music of the klezmerim and formed their own ensembles, leading to a new genre known as “klezmer music.” In Boston, a group called “Voice of the Turtle,” influenced by the Early Music movement, performed music derived from Sephardic Jewish communities. In liberal Jewish movements, meanwhile, young musicians such as Michael Isaacson (b. 1946), Debbie Friedman (1952–2011), Jeffrey Klepper (b. 1954), and Daniel Freeland (b. 1952) began to present their own contemporary liturgical settings. Orthodox Jewish artists such as the Diaspora Yeshiva Band (centered in Israel, but composed largely of American Jews) and Avraham Fried (b. 1959) created musical settings of devotional texts in rock and bluegrass styles. All these approaches gained attention through public performances and internationally distributed albums.

The radical Jewish culture movement, outlined by jazz saxophonist John Zorn (b. 1953) in 1992, moved Jewish music into even edgier realms. The underground popularity of his and others’ avant-garde musical efforts throughout the 1990s inspired bold rhetorical pairings of sound, performance, and Jewish symbolism. Related movements at the close of the twentieth century, often fueled by survivalist philanthropic efforts, led to an expansion of “radical” Jewish musical activity, including record labels JDub, Reboot Stereophonic, and OyHoo, as well as performance venues such as New York’s Makor. Through these and other networks, including an expanding number of Jewish music festivals across North America, young Jewish musicians could explore and support new forms of musical expression such as (nonparody) Jewish hip-hop, reggae, punk, and a wide array of styles and fusions. Among the most prominent of these musicians was Matisyahu (b. Matthew Miller, 1979), a young baal teshuvah (an individual who recently “returned” to Orthodox Judaism). He was initially signed by JDub and his career as a Hasidic reggae performer led to mainstream recognition in 2005.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Jewish popular music comprises a wide spectrum of activities, linked with any of a number of established musical genres. Orthodox popular music artists release dozens of albums per year, providing observant Jews with a culturally sanctioned space for enjoying popular music recreationally. Expanded a cappella offerings timed for the weeks between *Passover and *Shavuot, when some Jews do not listen to instrumental music, and the cultivation of female artists for female audiences highlight creativity in this area. Jewish composers and performers within *Reform Judaism and other liberal religious communities continue to find inspiration from acoustic/folk, country, and gospel artists and inspire a wide network of local song leaders. Downloading services (such as iTunes and OySongs) help music travel to ever wider audiences, and periodic efforts to establish a Jewish Grammy award emphasize the place some American Jews want “Jewish music” to occupy. These and other diverse efforts to reinvent the idea of Jewish music for new audiences continue to make popular Jewish music a vibrant, wide-ranging, and ever changing process linking identity with creativity.

For further reading, see S. Gilbert, Music in the Holocaust: Confronting Life in the Nazi Ghettos and Camps (2004); M. Kligman, “Contemporary Jewish Music in America,” American Jewish Yearbook (2001); S. Rogovoy, The Essential Klezmer (2000); E. Seroussi and M. Regev, Popular Music and National Culture in Israel (2004); M. Slobin, ed., American Klezmer: Its Roots and Offshoots (2001); idem, Chosen Voices: The Story of the American Cantorate (2002 [1989]); and idem, Fiddler on the Move (2003).

JUDAH M. COHEN

Music, Religious. Music, both vocal and instrumental, has always played an important role in Jewish life; this is evident in biblical writings, such as the “Song at the Sea” in *Exodus 15. *David is described as a musician who plays the kinnor, a hand-held lyre (1 Sam 16:14–23); *prophets are also connected to musical activities (1 Sam 10:5; 2 Kgs 3:15). During First and Second *Temple times, music accompanied sacrifices and celebrations. Many of the *psalms were probably performed with singing and musical accompaniment (see BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE). After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, when the Rabbis prohibited musical instruments during *worship to indicate mourning, music was relegated to a subsidiary role. Over the next 2,000 years music increasingly returned to Jewish religious life, both in the *synagogue, in *life-cycle celebrations, and in other aspects of Jewish life (see also CANTOR, CANTORATE entries).

Jews have been strongly influenced by the prevalent musical styles in their diverse places of residence. *Ashkenazic Jews follow Western and Eastern European cultural aesthetics, whereas *Sephardi and *Mizraḥi Jews follow a range of musical practices, from the Andalusian styles of *Spain and *North Africa to Middle Eastern music from the Levant (*Turkey, *Syria, Lebanon, *Iraq, and *Egypt). Although liturgical texts are similar among Ashkenazic, Sephardi, and Mizraḥi Jews, the music that accompanies them conforms to regional traditions. Music has been and continues to be transmitted orally; written documentation is limited before 1750.

There are three genres of Jewish liturgical music: cantillation, chant, and liturgical song. The development of these three genres shows the changes and growth of music in Jewish religious life. Cantillation refers to the intonation of biblical and liturgical texts. Although scholars differ in their dating of cantillation, it has probably been practiced since Second Temple times. The Ben Asher Family in the *Galilee city of Tiberias in the early Middle Ages codified the system of ta'amim, the accent signs that indicate the tonal structure of a biblical sentence; these signs refer to a melodic formula, not an exact musical pitch. A. Z. Idelsohn, one of the first Jewish musicologists, believed the various twentieth-century practices of cantillation were survivals of ancient traditions. However, modern scholars are doubtful that modern practices faithfully maintain traditions that are more than two thousand years old (Shiloah; Seroussi).

Chant refers to the musical rendering of biblical texts and medieval liturgical writings found in the siddur (*prayer book). Practices include the chanting of *Psalm texts found in the *worship and in the various statutory prayers (shema and amidah*). Ashkenazic, Sephardi, and Mizraḥi communities have different rites; that is, different musical styles of chanting. The styles of liturgical song are also unique to each rite; this is the area that has shown the most growth and development in the modern era. Piyyutim (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) have been written throughout the past two thousand years and been sung using adaptations of melodies from various locales.

ASHKENAZIC MUSIC: The primary aspect of chant in the *Ashkenazic tradition is the practice of Jewish prayer modes or nusakh. The term nusakh also means liturgical rite. In this context it refers to prayer modes that operate like other musical modes that are defined by two parameters: scalar definition and a stock of melodies variously applied. The number of modes used in the Jewish tradition is a matter of scholarly debate. The generally accepted practice today, which is a part of the pedagogy in American cantorial schools, is the adoption of three prayer modes: Ha-Shem Malakh, Magen Avot, and Ahavah Rabbah. The name of each mode derives from the opening words of a liturgical passage that marks one of the first usages of that particular prayer mode in the *Sabbath liturgy. Hence, music and text are closely associated.

In most instances a Jewish prayer mode is defined by the four lowest notes (or tetrachord) that make each of the three primary modes unique. The Ha-Shem Malakh mode is similar intervallically to the western major scale with a lowered seventh (C-D-E-F-G-A-Bb-C). Magen Avot is equivalent to a western natural minor scale (C-D-Eb-F-G-Ab-Bb-C). Ahavah Rabbah has often been called the most "Jewish" of these modes because it is quite distinctive (C-Db-E-F-G-Ab-Bb-C) and without an equivalent in western music. Its essential feature is the augmented second interval between the second and third notes of the mode (D-flat to E-natural).

Ahavah Rabbah means "great love"; this designation aptly reflects the affective association of this mode, which expresses "great love" for God through a unique musical sound. The melancholy nature of the mode enhances its rich musical expression. Ha-Shem Malakh ("the Lord reigns") expresses God's majesty. Magen Avot ("shield of our fathers") does not have an affect and is used as a didactic mode to recite the text.

All three modes are used during Sabbath worship to convey various aspects of the text. Sabbath prayer on Friday night begins with the Kabbalat Shabbat psalms offering praises to God that are chanted in the Ha-Shem Malakh. Likewise, this mode is appropriately used on the *High Holidays, particularly *Rosh Ha-Shanah. The Ahavah Rabbah mode is used on Shabbat morning for a contemplative section of the service before the amidah* prayer.

Liturgical melodies in Ashkenazic practice can be divided into two categories: Mi-Sinai niggunim (melodies from Mount Sinai) and metrical tunes. These two categories contain known melodies that are either sung by the hazzan (*cantor), the congregation, or both and are associated with particular liturgical sections at specific times during the calendar year. The Mi-Sinai niggunim represent the oldest body of melodies in the Ashkenazic tradition and encompass the recurrent melodies of the High Holidays and the three *festivals of *Sukkot, *Passover, and *Shavuot. Documentation for these traditions begins in the eighteenth century, but they were most likely used even earlier. They include High Holiday melodies like kol nidrei and the aleinu. Mi-Sinai niggunim comprise set tunes of greater length than Jewish prayer modes, which are shorter musical fragments. Both musical types are similar in that they flexibly apply the melody or melodic fragment to the text.

In addition to the recurring melodic phrases of the Mi-Sinai niggunim, the Ashkenazic tradition contains a vast array of metrical tunes. These melodies are characterized by their regular rhythms that facilitate congregational singing. The German liturgical tradition in particular made regular use of metrical tunes. Adon Olam and Yigdal are liturgical poems sung at the end of Sabbath prayer; there are many musical settings for these texts. Other melodies for specific holidays that were well established in the nineteenth century include Adir Hu for Passover, Maoz Tzur for *Hanukkah, and Eli Tziyon on *Tisha B'Av.

Specific practices in the synagogue inform Ashkenazic liturgical performance. In antiphonal singing, the cantor sings solo passages and the congregation responds. The cantor's portions consist of a few lines of the liturgical text that mark closure to a paragraph; this is known as a hatimah, a seal that ends the prayer. Some congregational responses are the utterance of a word, such as amen, or a phrase of text. One particular practice in the Ashkenazic tradition is worth noting. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries aesthetic beauty became a central goal of synagogue music.

The hazzan was assisted by two others, and together they became known as the meshorerim. One of the participants was a boy and referred to as the “singer,” and the other was a man known as the “bass.” Many musical manuscripts of this period indicate a melodic line to be sung by one of the three participants. Evidence for this practice is also taken from illustrations found in *prayer books (e.g., the Leipzig Mahzor) showing the main singer and two assistants. The addition of more singers gradually led to choral singing in the forms of hymns, beginning in 1810, and four-part choral writing. Salomon Sulzer was among the first to develop choral music in an artistic style that became popular in nineteenth-century Western Europe.

During the era of the Haskalah* (Jewish Enlightenment) in *Central European cities, musical practitioners began incorporating external influences while, at the same time, retaining elements of traditional Jewish music, such as the Mi-Sinai niggunim. The most significant development in Central European cantorial and synagogue music resulted from the liturgical and aesthetic changes of the *Reform movement. Although changes in various Central European cities began in the late 1700s and early 1800s, reforms did not take shape in an established fashion until the mid-nineteenth century under the musical leadership of Salomon Sulzer (1804–1890). Sulzer began to officiate at the New Synagogue in *Vienna in 1826, and he elevated the office of cantor with his fine musicianship; Schubert and Liszt admired his singing. Sulzer’s lasting contribution is his two-volume publication Shir Zion, a collection of his compositions and those by other composers that he commissioned; it was published in 1840 and 1866. Sulzer’s goal was to take traditional Jewish melodies and “purify” them. He felt that ornate baroque musical elaborations did not befit the dignity of the service.

Another significant figure in Central European synagogue music was Louis Lewandowski (1821–1894). He served as a choral director and composer in *Berlin at the Old Synagogue in the Heidereutergasse, and after 1866 at the New Synagogue. His musical compositions appear in two publications, Kol Rinah U’T’fillah (A Voice of Joy and Prayer, 1871), for one and two voices, and Todah W’Simrah (Thanksgiving and Song, 1876–1882), for four voices and solos, with optional organ accompaniment. Lewandowski’s musical compositions in Kol Rinah U’T’fillah contain simple choral responses designed for ease of use with congregations. Many of the Todah W’Simrah compositions include organ accompaniment that doubled the choral line or filled in the solo melodic line. The accompaniment adds a rich texture but the optional indication displays Lewandowski’s recognition that not all congregations would want or be able to afford an organist.

The *Eastern European cantorial style remained traditional in focus. Few Eastern European synagogues incorporated the reforms commonly found in Central Europe. Adherence to traditional melodies and the Jewish prayer modes remained the norm, although some cantors came to *Vienna to study with Sulzer and incorporated his musical innovations in a style appropriate for their home communities. The hallmark of the Eastern European style was the use of recurring melodic fragments that convey a deep emotional feeling to the congregation. Ornate musical embellishments were used to transport the listener into a spiritual realm. Word repetition was not uncommon. The nicely patterned phrases of Central Europe came to be known as hazzanut ha-seder, which means “orderly cantorial style,” whereas the free and ornate Eastern European style was known as hazzanut ha-regesh, or “emotional cantorial style.” This latter approach became the foundation for the “golden age of the cantorate” in America during the first few decades of the twentieth century. Despite their stylistic differences, hazzanut ha-seder and hazzanut ha-regesh were also intermingled in the compositions of cantors from the Eastern European musical world who studied with cantors such as Sulzer.

Jewish religious music also includes a variety of niggunim, songs with and without words that are performed in various contexts in *Hasidic communities. These songs are sung to a variety of syllables like “Ay, yai, yai”; “Bum, bum, bum”; and “Tra, la, la.” Some claim that the use of these different vocables, nonsense words, is significant. Melodies are often in the Ahavah Rabbah prayer mode. Types of niggunim include stam niggun, a regular tune with a clear rhythm; devekut niggun*, ecstatic, usually slow, melodies sung on special occasions to reach a deep spiritual state; and rebbe’s niggun, which is like a devekut niggun but is a special melody initiated by the rebbe. Jewish celebrations also included the singing of *Yiddish songs and klezmer music (see MUSIC, FOLK; MUSIC, POPULAR).

Jews from Central and Eastern Europe brought their synagogue music with them to America. Over time these two Ashkenazic styles merged into what has been called minhag America (“American *custom”).

Between 1880 and 1930 cantorial music was extremely popular among American Jews, and Eastern European-born cantors recorded their liturgical music on 78 rpm recordings. The most prolific cantor was Yossele Rosenblatt; other major performers include Zavel Kwartin, Pierre Pinchik, Mordecai Hershman, Gershon Sirota, and Labele Waldman. By the 1930s, this “Old World” music began to lose appeal as congregations sought to develop a new aesthetic for the American synagogue. Composers such as A. W. Binder, Isadore Freed, and Herbert Fromm used a range of approaches during the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s. One strategy was to use traditional melodies, but to add new harmonies and styles that were more contemporary. Another approach was to write new melodies in the style of older melodies or new melodies in a contemporary style. Directing their music at congregations seeking an identity as American Jews, these composers offered a musical style that combined aspects of European heritage with the more familiar sounds of American culture. In the 1950s through the 1970s, another generation of composers – some born in America, others in Europe – found new ways to write for the synagogue. Max Helfman, Max Janowski, Heinrich Schalit, and Frederik Piket wrote music for the synagogue that incorporated artistic uses of the organ and choir and some moments of traditional cantorial artistry.

By the 1970s American Jewish children and young people were attending Jewish *summer camps where they were exposed to a range of Jewish musical styles including *folk music. As they brought these new modes back to their congregations, clashes developed between accessible and singable music versus traditional cantorial styles. Certainly, by the early twenty-first century, the trend in American synagogue worship of all denominations is for participatory music as opposed to cantorial performance.

American Jews of all denominations have also been creating music for liturgical use that expresses their religious experiences and aspirations. Composers and performers include Debbie Friedman (1952–2011) and Kol B'Seder in the Reform movement and Safam and Craig Taubman in *Conservative Judaism. Among the vast array of performers in the *Orthodox community are Mordecai Ben David, Avraham Fried, Regesh, Miami Boys Choir, Dedi, and Yaakov Shweky. Other composers, including Michael Isaacson, Benjie Ellen Schiller, and Ami Aloni, have combined a range of music styles that tend to be accessible to congregations. The neo-Hasidic repertoire of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach has also been an important resource for contemporary worship.

SEPHARDIC MUSIC: Cantillation and liturgical chant in Sephardi/Mizrahi communities are significantly influenced by the music of the majority culture in any given location. Western Sephardic Jews (from communities in *England, *Amsterdam, and the Americas) use western musical scales and styles. Some of the liturgical chanting in this tradition is choral, an influence of neighboring Ashkenazic communities. Jews from the Levant, the most eastern end of the Mediterranean, closely follow the musical styles of their Arab surroundings – including the use of maqamat, Middle Eastern scales that include notes not found on fixed-pitch western instruments like a clarinet, trumpet, or piano. Like nusakh in the Ashkenazic tradition, maqamat are systematically applied to the liturgy. As with the recitation of the Qu'ran, cantillation and liturgical singing in the Levant are centered around one maqam, but once it is established the hazzan changes the maqam, an artistry demonstrating a unique synthesis of Jewish and Arab cultures. The North African tradition combines the western and Middle Eastern styles. Like western Sephardic music, North African liturgical music uses western scales, but like the Levant style, unique rhythms are found in the music (see NORTH AFRICA).

Piyyutim, which are created from pre-existing music, serve as an important genre of liturgical song. The process of adaptation begins with the selection of a pre-existing song that has a text, which can be in Arabic, Spanish, or Greek, and the selection of music in a Middle Eastern style. The second step is to create a Hebrew poem, a piyyut. The melody is then applied to the new text, and it is incorporated into the liturgy. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century singing and learning these songs are an active part of Sephardi/Mizrahi religious culture in Israel. This music is heard not only in the synagogue but also on the radio, on recordings, and in concerts.

For further reading, see H. Avenary, "The Concept of Mode in European Synagogue Chant," YUVAL 2 (1971): 11–12; B. Cohon, "The Structure of Jewish Prayer Modes," Journal of the American Musicological Society (1950); M. Kligman, Maqam and Liturgy (2008); A. Z. Idelsohn, Jewish Music in Its Historical Development (1929); A. Shiloah, Jewish Musical Traditions (1992); and E. Seroussi et al., "Jewish Music," in Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians (2001).

MARK KLIGMAN

Music, Synagogue. Just as the *synagogue itself was created as a substitute for the Jerusalem *Temple, synagogue music emerged in the shadow of the Temple. Synagogues could not wholly re-create the elaborate musical accompaniment provided by the choirs and orchestra of the Temple, but delegations of pious Israelites from around the country (called anshei ma'amad [men of standing]) were specially designated to represent their communities; they visited the Temple for one week at a time, observed the rituals there, and apparently brought home transferable aspects of the rite, including the music.

The destruction of the Jerusalem Temple in 70 CE forced dramatic changes in Jewish worship. The Rabbis now saw musical accompaniment as inappropriate for a nation that was mourning the loss of its spiritual center, and they understood the quotation in Hosea 9:1 ("Rejoice not, O Israel, as other peoples exult"; cf. BT Gittin 7a) to be a blanket indictment of virtually all musical activities, including those of the synagogue. The choral and instrumental performances that had distinguished the Temple rituals were discontinued.

The sole "musical" remnant of the Temple service to survive transplantation to the synagogue was the ritual chanting of portions of the *Torah. Instituted in the time of the Second Jerusalem Temple, this practice became the centerpiece of the new synagogue service, and by the third century CE, what had been a fairly simple act of declaiming the sacred text became an obligatory musical exercise (see BT Megillah 32a). The "oral transmission" of the tradition governing proper pronunciation and grammatical syntax of the biblical text gave way to a series of written systems whose symbols also acquired musical significance. Chanting of the scriptural passages became known as cantillation (see MUSIC, RELIGIOUS), and in addition to varying motives to articulate grammatical phrases, unique music evolved to distinguish the chanting of different scrolls. The music used to chant from the *Pentateuch was different from that used for *prophetic passages (see HAFTARAH) or for the scroll of *Esther (read on *Purim) or *Lamentations (read on *Tisha B'Av), or those read on the pilgrimage *festivals of *Passover, *Shavuot, and *Sukkot (the *Song of Songs, *Ruth, and *Ecclesiastes, respectively [see FIVE SCROLLS]).

As the liturgy became increasingly complex, with distinctive content for morning, afternoon, and evening *worship and with additional passages for *Sabbath and the festivals, the music used for chanting these texts underwent similar elaboration. The term nusakh emerged to refer both to the composition of specific liturgies and to the music used for rendering those selections. Morning and evening services would sound different from each other; weekday worship would differ from Sabbath prayers; and music for the pilgrimage festivals would be distinguished from *High Holiday melodies.

Describing the evolution of synagogue music might have remained a simple task, but for another important outcome of the destruction of the Temple: the concomitant dispersal of the Jewish people among the nations of the world. With memory of the historic Temple practices fading (in the absence of any form of written notation to preserve it), Jews living as small minorities among larger communities with their own rich musical traditions inevitably fell under the sway of the majority culture. Nusakh and cantillation continued to define synagogue musical practice but the actual development of each genre was complicated by the evolution of widely divergent "local" practices. Three broad divisions took shape: Middle Eastern or *Mizrahi communities from what are now referred to as Muslim lands; *Sephardic Jews, representing the once-flourishing Spanish-Portuguese traditions (dispersed among a variety of Mediterranean and other locales after the expulsion of the Jews from *Spain and *Portugal in the late fifteenth century); and *Ashkenazim, Jews from Central and Eastern Europe. Within these three large divisions are infinite variations. Yet, despite the inevitable alterations that have resulted from centuries of oral transmission (and the vagaries of personal preference), each retains a commitment to its historic sense of “tradition.”

The juxtaposition of European Jewish communities with the evolution of western culture has resulted in the development of synagogue musical models and forms that do not strictly conform to the time-honored practices of nusakh and cantillation. A 1605 responsum by Leon *Modena (1571–1648) paved the way for the introduction of unaccompanied choral music into some Sephardic synagogues; Leone and Salamone Rossi (ca. 1570–ca. 1628) were particularly prolific composers in this regard, but isolated compositions by both Christian and Jewish composers in *Italy, *France, and *Amsterdam point to a relatively limited receptivity to this type of music throughout the Sephardic *Diaspora.

New attitudes promulgated by the nineteenth-century *Reform movement produced fundamental alterations in Ashkenazic synagogue music. In their desire to modernize many aspects of the synagogue ritual, reformers abolished nusakh and cantillation and encouraged Reform *cantors to produce beautiful music like that written by Bach and other masters of church music. Unfortunately, the typical synagogue musician fell far short of this ideal. However, Salomon Sulzer (1804–1890), Louis Lewandowski (1821–1894), and others succeeded in composing well-received music for cantor, choir, and the organ, whose adoption signaled a rejection of the centuries-long mourning for the Temple.

To be sure, not all Ashkenazic communities adopted these radical musical innovations, and in time, even the Reform movement modified its stance in opposition to any traditional music. In particular, Salomon Sulzer respected the historic role of nusakh and sought to substitute a “new nusakh” that incorporated contemporary musical values for some of the traditional forms of the past. He and others also preserved a core of traditional melodies known as “Mi-Sinai” tunes, that, although not literally “from Sinai,” had been a much beloved part of Ashkenazic tradition since the eleventh century. This notion of keeping the best of the past while incorporating new musical forms and models has, to a greater or lesser extent, informed all of Ashkenazic synagogue music ever since. In addition, the technological advances of the twenty-first century have made possible an increased sharing of “ethnic” melodies across denominational and cultural boundaries, resulting in new definitions of “tradition” and a richer heritage of new and historic musical materials from which future synagogue music will inevitably draw.

MARSHA BRYAN EDELMAN

Mysticism: See also; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURI-ANIC; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND, etc.

Mysticism: Ancient. Several concepts that developed within the normative culture of early rabbinic *Judaism in the first and second centuries CE provided the context for the emergence of Jewish mystical creativity in late antiquity. The most important concepts were esoteric speculations concerning the divine realm, described in the *Mishnah as “the work of the chariot” (ma’aseh merkavah), consisting of exegetical-homiletical discussions of the first chapter of *Ezekiel and related biblical texts, and “the work of creation” (ma’aseh bereshit), reflections on the biblical narratives of the creation. In addition, the emergence of the celestial power *Metatron, a demiurgic mythical figure, and the development of *Samael, a satanic figure, also provided important material for subsequent mystical speculation.

The term ma’aseh bereshit in M. Hagigah 2:1 refers to homiletical exegesis of the biblical chapters dedicated to the creation, mainly the first chapters of *Genesis. The *Talmuds, especially M. Hagigah 2, as well as the *Tosefta and *midrash, include a variety of homilies and stories interpreting the process of creation. The largest collection of these traditions is at the beginning of the midrash collection Genesis Rabbah, but such traditions also appear frequently in other classical and late midrashim. Although BT Hagigah prohibits dealing (at least in public) with “what is below and what is above, what is before and what is after” (a quote from the *apocryphal book, *Wisdom of Ben Sira), several treatises dedicated specifically to this subject were composed in the late talmudic and *geonic periods. They include the Baraita de-Ma’aseh Bereshit, Midrash Konen, and Midrash Tadsheh. Sefer Yetzirah* also fits into the ma’aseh bereshit literature of late antiquity.

Medieval Jewish mystics and esoterics devoted much effort to the subject of creation, especially in the numerous commentaries on Sefer Yetzirah written by kabbalists and the Hasidei Ashkenaz* in the thirteenth century. In the *Kabbalah, ma’aseh bereshit acquired an intense mystical significance; the term sometimes denoted not only the creation of the universe but also the emanation of the divine hypostases, the sefirot*. The detailed study of this process in the Zohar* and other kabbalistic works served not only to describe the past but also revealed a mystical purpose in the present. The knowledge of the secrets of Genesis could enable the mystic to ascend the same ladder in reverse and return to the primordial perfection of the divine world.

Ma’aseh merkavah, literally “the work of the chariot,” is also a mishnaic term indicating the midrashic exposition of the celestial chariot described in Ezekiel 1 and 10 (M. Hagigah 2:1). In the same way as ma’aseh bereshit (the work of creation) refers to the midrashic expounding of Genesis 1–2, ma’aseh merkavah was extended to include any discussion or description of the celestial realms. At the end of the twelfth century, *Maimonides identified ma’aseh merkavah with metaphysics (and ma’aseh bereshit with physics); many other Jewish writers connected ma’aseh merkavah with mystical speculation and theosophy. Several treatises of hekhalot* and merkavah mysticism, the Jewish esoteric speculations of the talmudic and geonic periods, include the term merkavah in their titles and expound, in great detail, the descriptions in Ezekiel. Reuyot Yehezkel, for instance, is an ancient treatise describing the seven chariots Ezekiel saw when he looked into the waters of the river Kvar, when one firmament after another opened above him to reveal the chariot in each. The merkavah texts were also important in medieval Europe. Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (d. 1238) wrote a treatise called “The Secret of the Chariot”; Spanish and Provençal mystics, especially in Sefer ha-Bahir and the Iyyun Circle, used merkavah terminology as a source for their mystical symbolism.

A distinction should be made between ma'aseh merkavah, which is essentially an intellectual activity of midrashic homiletics, and yeridah le-merkavah, "descending to the chariot," which is the actual mystical activity of ascension to the divine palaces (hekhalot), described in several ancient texts. The "descenders" used imagery from Ezekiel, but their main sources and symbols were taken from the *Song of Songs and other texts (see KABBALAH). JOSEPH DAN

Mysticism: Hekhalot and Merkavah Literature. These ancient Hebrew esoteric and mystical writings were composed between the third and the seventh centuries. This literature includes about two dozen treatises and deals with four broad subjects. Merkavah ("chariot") literature is concerned with homiletical interpretation of *Ezekiel 1 and other biblical descriptions of the celestial realms, with particular emphasis on the terminology of Ezekiel's vision of the divine chariot (ma'aseh merkavah). The second group comprises *magical works that delineate formulas by which angelic powers can be forced to serve human needs. These include Sefer ha-Razim (The Book of Secrets), "The Sword of Moses," and "Havdalah of Rabbi Akiva." A third category, the "work of creation," emphasizes cosmogony and cosmology (ma'aseh bereshit), is discussed throughout this literature (see also, MYSTICISM: ANCIENT). The Hekhalot ("palaces") texts detail the mystical ascent to the celestial palaces. This ancient library of esoteric texts, combined with Sefer Yetzirah* and sections in the *Talmud and *midrash dealing with these subjects, together with the myths of *Metatron and *Samael, have served over the centuries as the basic sources of mystical terminology, imagery, and ideas concerning the celestial and divine realms.

The first clear appearance of a school of mystics in ancient Judaism is attested by the works of the self-described yordei ha-merkavah, "the descenders to the chariot." Their writings, integrated into hekhalot and merkavah literature, usually include a mixture of *magic, cosmogony and cosmology, and speculations concerning the chariot envisioned by Ezekiel. Some describe actual mystical activity, including ascension to the divine world and participation in celestial rituals. This mystical material is found mainly in five works. These are Hekhalot Zutarti, "the lesser book of hekhalot," the center of which is the description of the ascension of Rabbi *Akiva to the divine throne. Hekhalot Rabbati, the most elaborate extant work of its kind, is centered around the story of the ten martyrs (see MARTYRDOM) and the ascension of Rabbi Ishmael (described as a High Priest the son of a High Priest); this work imagines that the *Temple has not been destroyed. The remaining three are Ma'aseh Merkavah, an untitled collection of hymns and descriptions of mystical ascensions (published by Gershom *Scholem, who gave it its title); the Shiur Komah (Measurement of Height), the description of the divine figure of the Creator (yotzer) in anthropomorphic terms, listing the divine limbs, their mysterious names, and their measurements; and Sefer Hekhalot, known also as the Third Book of Enoch or the Hebrew Apocalypse of Enoch. The first part of this text relates the elevation of *Enoch and his transformation into the divine power of *Metatron, "the prince of the countenance"; the second part is a detailed, systematic description of the divine realms and the powers that govern them. To these may be added another treatise, the Sar Torah, the "Prince of the Torah," describing the descent of the Shekhinah* to the Second Temple when it was being built by those who returned from *Babylonian exile.

These mystical treatises include several characteristics not found anywhere else. They are: 1) the term hekhalot, "palaces" or "temples," seven of which comprise the divine world; 2) the divine pleroma, constituted of several powers who are called "Lord God of Israel" in addition to their "angelic" names; 3) the image of God as the shiur komah; 4) a unique concept of history, completely disregarding talmudic tradition; 5) the terminology of ascent and descent to the chariot; 6) reliance on a new interpretation of the *Song of Songs as a self-description of God, in addition to an exegetical focus on Ezekiel and other visionary texts; and 7) the insistence that there is an individual way through which a human being can approach God, independent of halakhic and midrashic contexts. In this way, these treatises present a spiritual alternative to the "exoteric" Jewish way of life.

Hekhalot mysticism is different from medieval Jewish mysticism in its emphasis on the visionary and in its continuous references to direct, individual mystical experiences, rather than a reliance on textual exegesis. The Shiur Komah and the other works in this group contain the earliest Jewish descriptions of God and his pleroma, mainly using monarchic terminology and images. A significant part of this literature is instructions about how to overcome the grave dangers the mystic might encounter on his way (especially at the gate of the sixth palace). The many hymns include those sung by celestial powers and others by the mystics themselves; some of these were included in the *prayer book. The ultimate purpose of this mystical journey is to view "the king in his beauty" and to be integrated into the pleroma surrounding God. The description of the transformation of Enoch can be regarded as the earliest Hebrew example of unio mystica (mystical communion). Scholarly studies include J. Dan, Jewish Mysticism vol. I (1998); idem, Ancient Jewish Mysticism (1989); P. Schäfer, The Hidden and Manifest God: Some Major Themes in Early Jewish Mysticism (1992); and D. J. Halperin, The Faces of the Chariot (1988). JOSEPH DAN

Mysticism, Women and. Women have been conspicuously absent from Jewish mysticism from its earliest incarnation in hekhalot mysticism (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH) through medieval *Kabbalah. Although feminine imagery abounds in Kabbalah, historical evidence for female mystics does not. This glaring absence has been noted by several scholars of medieval Jewish history and mysticism who offer varying explanations. Gershom *Scholem attributes women's absence to the association between women and the demonic in Jewish myth (37–38). Judith Baskin suggests that Kabbalah is a highly intellectual text-based enterprise, and few if any medieval or early modern Jewish women would have been able to attain the requisite expertise. Sharon Koren notes that late antique and medieval Jewish mystics were unique in their understanding of physical impurity as an insurmountable obstacle to divine communion. Close reading of mystical writings, from hekhalot through pre-expulsion Kabbalah, reveals that women were actively barred from mystical pursuits because of what was seen as their innate impurity (see PURITY).

Jewish practice, however, has never been monolithic or without variations. There is some evidence that Jewish women engaged in “alternate” forms of spirituality in the late ancient and early modern eras. There were women prophets in the Bible (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). Late antique *pseudepigraphical literature, such as The Testament of Job and Joseph and Asenath, describes women speaking with angels. *Philo reported that women participated in the spiritual exercises of the Therapeutae. Moreover, in the late ancient period, some women may have engaged in magical practices. Indeed, the rabbinic claim that “most women engage in sorcery” may refer to women’s success as healers (see MAGIC).

In early modern *Safed, Ḥayyim Vital mentions in his mystical diary that spirits would possess certain women and speak through their agency. These women were not kabbalists; rather they served as vessels for dispossessed souls (often male). Women participated actively in the *Sabbatean movement, and some functioned as prophets. Eva Frank (1754–1816), daughter of the charismatic Sabbatean leader Jacob *Frank (1726–1791), played a major role in her father’s *antinomian theology. Originally named Rachel, Eva is referred to in Frankist writings as the Lady, the Virgin, or Matronita, the Aramaic name for Shekhinah*, the feminine aspect of the Divine in kabbalistic thought. She became known as Eva after the conversion of her family to Christianity in 1760. Jacob Frank saw himself as the eternal *Messiah and told his followers that Eva-Rachel should be recognized as the Shekhinah who would lead them as a messianic redeemer while he was temporarily absent. Ultimately, Frank claimed, he would be reborn and united with his daughter in “the unity of Messiah and Shekhinah.” Long after her death, many Frankist families continued to keep a miniature portrait of Eva Frank and honored her as a saintly woman who was falsely reviled.

In *Hasidism, some women, most famously Hannah Rochel *Verbermacher, also known as the Maid of Ludmir, functioned as spiritual leaders. Yet as many scholars have noted, the Maid of Ludmir was able to succeed only as long as she denied her femininity.

Women have turned to mystical traditions in the modern period. Recently, some feminists have reclaimed the symbol of the Shekhinah as a means of supplementing what they perceive to be the patriarchal bias of Jewish theology. Judith Plaskow urges that the “long suppressed femaleness of God, acknowledged in the mystical tradition, but even here shaped and articulated by men, must be reexplored and reintegrated into Israel.” Toward that goal, many Jewish feminists have reinterpreted mystical themes and emphasize the symbol of the Shekhinah in innovative prayer rituals. Women figure prominently in the Jewish Renewal movement (see JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT) – a spiritual community described by David Wolfe-Blank as “Ḥasidism meets feminism.” New adaptations of Kabbalah and greater educational opportunities may enable women to breach the boundaries of Jewish esotericism and actively participate in Jewish mysticism.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, “Dolce of Worms: Women Saints in Judaism,” in Women Saints in World Religions, ed. A. Sharma (2000), 39, 42; J. H. Chajes, Between Worlds: Dybbuks, Exorcists, and Early Modern Judaism (2003); S. Fishbane, “‘Most Women Engage in Sorcery’: An Analysis of Sorceresses in the Babylonian Talmud,” Jewish History 7 (2003): 27–42; S. Koren, “The Woman from Whom God Wanders,” Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1999; J. Plaskow, “The Right Question is Theological,” in On Being a Jewish Feminist, ed. S. Heschel (1995); G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1941); A. Rapoport-Albert, “On the Position of Women in Sabbatianism,” in HaHalom VeShivro: The Sabbatean Movement and its Aftermath: Messianism Sabbatianism and Frankism, ed. R. Elior (2001), 279–94; and C. Weissler, “Meanings of the Shekhinah in the Jewish Renewal Movement,” in Women Remaking American Judaism, ed. R. Prell and D. Weinberg (2007), 51–81; and see LILITH.

SHARON KOREN

Nagid is a title of biblical origin (I Sam 10:1) that was used to refer to Jewish notables and communal leaders in the lands of *Islam. Initially this title was an honorific bestowed by the *geonic academies (yeshivot) of *Babylonia and *Palestine; by the Mamluk period in *Egypt (1250–1517), nagid was the official designation of the head of the Jewish community, a position that had become hereditary. Documents from the Cairo *Genizah indicate that the use of nagid in this sense already appeared around 1065, when the office of head of the community was first established, but it did not become the normative title until the thirteenth century.

Before the thirteenth century, local Jewish notables who were close to Muslim authorities, many of whom were physicians (see MEDICINE) and had unimpeded access, would be granted the title nagid by one or more of the geonic academies. This title was in recognition of both their intermediary roles on behalf of the Jewish community and their support of the academies. Thus, the title, the equivalent of the Arabic amīr, recognized the authority of these notables rather than conferring it on them, and its use by the notables constituted deference to geonic leadership.

Jewish communal leaders in Tunisia (see NORTH AFRICA), *Spain, and *Egypt bore this title from the eleventh century, perhaps the most famous being the Granada physician and courtier Samuel ibn Naghrela (d. ca.1056), also known as *Samuel ha-Nagid; the title also appears periodically in the twelfth century in *Syria and *Yemen. One Zakkār ben ‘Ammār was appointed nagid of the Jews of Palermo in 1069, but no other nagid of *Sicily is known; this suggests that the term was not yet attached to an established office of the headship of the Jews. However, in Egypt from the time of Abraham Maimonides (d. 1237), the title nagid and the hereditary headship of the Jewish community (raʾīs al-yahūd) were linked. The office seems to have disappeared from Egypt by the 1600s in favor of the honorific hakham, or chief rabbi, although it persisted in the Maghreb (North Africa) until the nineteenth century. For further reading, see S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society, 2:23–40 (1967–93); and M. Cohen, Jewish Self-Government in Medieval Egypt (1980). PHILLIP I. ACKERMAN-LIEBERMAN

Nahman Ben Simḥa of Bratzlav (1721–1810) was the great-grandson of the founder of the *Ḥasidic movement, Israel *Baal Shem Tov (the Besht), whose daughter, Edet, was his grandmother. He was also the grandson of Rabbi Nahman of Horodenka, a prominent disciple-colleague of the Besht. Nahman was born in Medzibuz, *Ukraine; he lived some time in Husiatin and then moved to Medvedovka, where he began to assemble adherents and assume the role of a Ḥasidic tzaddik. In 1798 he traveled to the Land of Israel, visiting Jaffa, Tiberias, *Safed, and Haifa. He was in Acre in 1799 when Napoleon besieged the town and he escaped on a Turkish ship. After many hardships, he reached Crete and then returned to Ukraine. He settled in Zlatopoli, but was attacked by the local tzaddik, the Sava (“grandfather”) of Shpoli, who accused him of leaning toward heretical *Sabbatean ideas. He moved to Bratzlav, where he was joined by Nathan Sernhartz of Nemirov, who became his faithful disciple, biographer, and editor of his writings. He later settled in Uman, where he died, probably of tuberculosis.

Rabbi Nahman’s teachings are presented in the two volumes of his collected sermons, Likutei Moharan (Lessons of Rabbi Nahman, printed in 1808 and 1811). In 1806, probably as the result of the death of his young son, he began to tell stories, presented as *folktales, but that were highly original and enigmatic. Rabbi Nahman combined Lurianic mystical teachings (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC) with intense personal perceptions. He emphasized the paradoxical (he used the Hebrew term kushia) nature of the Lurianic myth, turning it into a personal vision of his own messianic destiny. In his homilies, and especially in his narratives, he described in enigmatic terms the difficult journey of the *messiah toward the completion of his redemptive mission. The radical nature of his ideas and the controversy surrounding him contributed to the fact that he attracted only a small group of adherents while other Ḥasidic dynasties gathered thousands of followers.

When Rabbi Nahman died, his adherents did not appoint anyone to replace him. Because they were the only Ḥasidic group who followed a dead tzaddik, they were called the “dead Ḥasidim.” (In the 1990s the Lubavitch Ḥasidism [*Ḥabad] also became leaderless when Rabbi Menahem Mendel *Schneerson died without an heir.) Bratzlav Ḥasidism had few resources and was very loosely organized; its main concern was to print and reprint the writings of Rabbi Nahman.

Nahman of Bratzlav became the best-known Ḥasidic leader among non-Ḥasidim, Jews and non-Jews. Martin *Buber’s first work was a translation, or adaptation, into German of Rabbi Nahman’s narratives. Because of its relaxed organization, Bratzlav Ḥasidim attracted many spiritualists and “New Age” adherents in the late twentieth century. The movement is open to every seeker of mystical and esoteric teachings (see KABBALAH), and its popularity continues to increase. For further reading, see D. Assaf, ed., Bibliography of Bratzlav Hasidism (2000). JOSEPH DAN Nahmanides (Moses Ben Nahman), also known as the Ramban, was born in 1195 and died in 1270. He lived most of his life in the Catalan city of Girona in the Crown of Aragon, emigrating to *Jerusalem in 1265. He is known for his participation in and narrative of the Barcelona disputation (1263), for his contribution to *mystical teachings, and for his *Bible and *Talmud commentaries.

Among Nahmanides’ many surviving works, his systematic *Torah commentary is perhaps the most significant (see also BIBLICAL COMMENTARY). Written in *Jerusalem near the end of his life, it is simultaneously innovative and firmly rooted in the dominant scholarly traditions of his age. In his methodological introduction, he sets the scene for a unique reading of Scripture, presenting the Torah as a text whose innumerable layers of meaning reveal themselves differently depending on the reader. Nahmanides cites interpretations of well-recognized authorities, principally Rashi and Abraham ibn Ezra, but also Maimonides. He makes use of midrash, sometimes to lend support to his own readings and sometimes as a rhetorical foil against which to project a new and unprecedented interpretation. In addition, he weaves references to mystical interpretations into his commentary (see KABBALAH), although he often stops short of developing them beyond the level of allusions or hints.

As a commentator and halakhic innovator, Nahmanides strove to synthesize or reconcile diverse approaches and views. In his Torah commentary, he brought together the Tosafists' emphasis on the peshat (plain meaning of the text) with the philosophical and mystical preference for allegorical readings. His legal writing similarly advanced a synthetic approach that paid homage to varied authorities. Nahmanides' "Letter to the French Rabbis," a response to their plea that he support a herem (ban of excommunication) placed on students of Maimonides' philosophy, is indicative of his broader approach to matters of halakhic interpretation. In this letter, Nahmanides worked to reconcile the various parties by reviewing the legal precedents that either supported or contradicted the use of a herem to achieve ideological ends.

Nahmanides also examined the intersections between Jewish and Christian interpretations of the Hebrew Bible and history. Responses to Christian interpretations can be discerned in his biblical commentary, in his Sefer ha-Geulah (The Book of Redemption), and most directly in his account of the Barcelona disputation, Sefer ha-Vikuah (The Book of the Disputation). The extant version of the Vikuah (likely not the original, which Nahmanides wrote at the behest of the bishop of Girona) uses Jewish and Christian sources to show that the Jewish messiah was to be expected within the following century. Circulation of this work in Christian circles resulted in Nahmanides' expulsion from the Crown of Aragon by order of Pope Clement IV.

Recent research includes N. Caputo, Nahmanides in Medieval Catalonia: History, Community, and Exile (2008). See also MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL. NINA CAPUTO

Nasi: See PATRIARCH

Nasi Family: See MENDES-NASI FAMILY; and WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

National Council of Jewish Women: See ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA.

Nazi Party. Nazi is an abbreviation for the National Socialist German Workers' Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei [NSDAP]) that formed in Germany in 1919 and achieved power in 1933, establishing the Third Reich. Under the leadership of Adolf Hitler, the NSDAP established a totalitarian regime in Germany that actively attempted to eliminate from German society political opponents, especially communists, as well as those deemed of insufficient "racial purity," including Jews and Roma.

The Nazis also targeted homosexuals and individuals with physical or mental handicaps as unworthy to live. With its invasion of Poland in September 1939, the Nazi leadership fomented what would become World War II. This cataclysm, which concluded with Germany's defeat in 1945, resulted in millions of deaths, including the deliberate murder of as many as six million Jews, as well as of many political prisoners and others the Nazis deemed undesirable. See EINSATZGRUPPEN; GERMANY; HOLOCAUST entries; and entries on European countries.

Nazirite (from the Hebrew word nazir, "separated" or "dedicated"). According to Numbers 6:1–21, a man or woman who takes a vow of devotion to God for at least thirty days assumes Nazirite obligations, including abstaining from grapes and all derivative products, leaving hair unshorn, and shunning contact with a corpse. At the conclusion of a nazirite vow, the Nazirite brings three specified sacrifices to the Temple, following which the hair of the head is shaved and burned on the fire as a sacrifice of well-being. Some individuals, such as Samson and Samuel (Judg 13:7; 1 Sam 1:21), were permanent Nazirites. Halakhic regulations concerning the Nazirite are found in the Mishnah and Talmud in Tractate Nazir and are summarized in Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, Hafla'ah, Nazir. KATE FRIEDMAN

Near East, Ancient. This term refers to the geographical region in which ancient Near Eastern civilizations were located; it extends from Iran in the east to Egypt in the west, and from Turkey in the north to Arabia in the south. It is labeled the "Near East" from the perspective of Europe and in contrast to eastern Asia, the "Far East." Civilization began in the Near East with the domestication of cereal plants and flock animals around 8000 BCE, a development that allowed for a sharp rise in population, the growth of cities, and, by 3100 BCE, the advent of writing. After the conquests of Alexander the Great in 332 BCE, the cultures of the region began to merge with that of ancient Greece, and this new Hellenistic civilization largely marks the end of the ancient Near East.

The ancient Near East also provided the "cradle" of Jewish civilization, because the Land of Israel, situated on the land bridge between Egypt and Mesopotamia, was heavily influenced by the cultures of these regions. When they find similarities between the Hebrew Bible and ancient Near Eastern texts, modern scholars assume that the Mesopotamian or Egyptian sources influenced the Israelite version, because of the greater antiquity and cultural dominance of these civilizations. Fragments of Babylonian literary texts from Mesopotamia have been found in Israel, Egypt, and Ugarit, on the Mediterranean coast of Syria, indicating the broad extent of their cultural dissemination. The Israelites may also have absorbed aspects of ancient Near Eastern culture indirectly via the Canaanites who lived in the land before their arrival. Genesis records that Abraham, Jacob, and Jacob's twelve sons, the ancestors of the twelve Israelite tribes, all lived for a time in both Mesopotamia and Egypt. According to Exodus, Israel as a people came into existence in the land of Egypt and, after the conquest of the land of Canaan, settled among a variety of native peoples. The courts of the United Monarchy, under David and Solomon, and later those of the kingdoms of

*Israel and *Judah may have employed scribes and administrators trained in the scribal schools and royal bureaucracies of other nations, and these individuals would have brought the intellectual traditions of their homelands. The dual kingdoms of *Israel and *Judah endured centuries of domination by the two great empires of Mesopotamia – *Assyria and *Babylonia. The 580s BCE exile of Judah's upper classes to Babylonia and *Persia exerted a particularly significant influence on later Jewish institutions. Considering all of the various cultural pressures imposed on the small nation of ancient Israel, what is truly remarkable was its ability to maintain such a distinctive sense of its *God and its unique role in world history. Map 1 ELAINE GOODFRIEND

Nehemiah, Book of: See EZRA and NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF

Ner Tamid (“eternal flame” or “light”). In every synagogue a light is always kept illuminated above or in front of the ark (aron ha-kodesh) in which the *Torah scrolls are stored. The ner tamid fulfills the *commandment in *Exodus 27:20–21 that a light is to be kept burning in the Tent of Meeting “from evening to morning before the Lord.” It is also a remembrance of the *menorah that was always lit in the *Jerusalem *Temple and of the presence of *God who accompanied the *Israelites in the wilderness as a pillar of flame by night (Exod 13:21–22). Historically, these lights were fueled by oil; in the contemporary era, they tend to be electric, often with back-up systems in case of power failure. See also HANUKKAH.

Netherlands: See AMSTERDAM

Nevi'im: Literally “prophets,” this term is the designation for the second of the three traditional divisions of the Hebrew Bible. See PROPHETIC BOOKS (NEVI'IM).

New Christians: See CONVERSOS; INQUISITION, SPANISH; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN

New Moon: See ROSH HODESH

New Testament refers to the Christian canonical Scriptures that consist of twenty-seven writings: the four Gospels (Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John), describing the mission and teaching, death, *resurrection, and exaltation to God's right hand of Jesus of Nazareth, whom Christians regard as the *messiah; the Acts of the Apostles, describing the beginnings of *Christianity as a messianic sect within *Second Temple Judaism; twenty-one letters of differing lengths attributed to leading figures from the first generation of Christianity, notably the apostle Paul; and an *apocalypse (the Revelation of John) somewhat similar to the book of *Daniel. The Gospels and the letters of Paul were widely recognized as authoritative by the Christian churches by the end of the second century, and the complete body of literature was designated canonical in the fourth century. It is important to note that as “canon” these writings define not only the features that unify Christianity but also the diversity that equally characterizes Christianity.

These writings are described as “the New Testament,” both because the only sacred text recognized by the very first Christians was the Hebrew *Bible or Septuagint, and because over the next two centuries these twenty-seven writings came to be regarded as a supplement or complement to the Tanakh (Hebrew Bible). The Tanakh was designated the Old Testament and included as a fundamental part of the Christian Bible. Therefore, the New Testament did not so much supersede the Old Testament as provide the lens through which Christians read the Tanakh. It was the key to the Christian interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. In fact, within Christianity the New Testament plays a role in relation to the Tanakh somewhat equivalent to the role of the *Mishnah in relation to the Tanakh within rabbinic *Judaism.

It is important, then, to appreciate that the New Testament writings are interrelated with the Tanakh by a host of assumptions, themes, concerns, language, quotations, and allusions. It is not possible to appreciate the writings of the New Testament without knowledge of and reference to the Tanakh. The New Testament on its own would have many gaps in the religion it inculcated; these gaps are the unspoken taken-for-granted of the New Testament writers, and they can only be filled from the writings that the New Testament writers regarded as their Scripture.

It is also highly significant that almost all the New Testament writers were Jews. Because Christianity began within and as part of the rich diversity of late *Second Temple Judaism, it is not inappropriate to describe the New Testament as Jewish literature, which tells of a renewal movement within Second Temple Judaism that ultimately grew mostly beyond the boundaries of traditional Judaism and became Christianity.

Christian biblical scholarship has always depended on the help of interested or sympathetic rabbis. After centuries of suspicion and hostility, the latter half of the twentieth century saw an increase in Jewish and Christian scholars working together to achieve a better understanding of the circumstances that produced the New Testament. The Jewishness of the foundational inspirational figure, Jesus, is now taken for granted, and the Jewishness of his mission and message is widely accepted on all sides. More controversial is the character of the ex-*Pharisee and apostle to the Gentiles, Paul, whose own writings probably indicate an individual who saw his role as fulfilling or helping fulfill Israel's commission to be a light to the Gentiles.

Helpful readings include R. E. Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (1997); J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity, 3rd ed. (2006); and S. McKnight and G. R. Osborne, The Face of New Testament Studies: A Survey of Recent Research (2004). JAMES D. G. DUNN

New Year For Trees: See TU B'SHEVAT

New Years. Jewish tradition acknowledges four distinct new year observances throughout the conventional twelve-month cycle (M. Rosh Ha-Shanah 1:1), although the *Bible itself, in *Exodus 12:2, identifies only the first day of the spring month of Nissan (March–April) as the start of the year. Rabbinic Judaism, however, interprets this particular new year as the commemoration of the beginning of Jewish national *redemption, when the Israelite *tribes dedicated special offerings at the *Tabernacle. The Rabbis further identify a new year of trees, *Tu B'Shevat, or the fifteenth of the Hebrew month of Shevat (January–February), and a new year for tithing cattle on the first of Elul (August–September). The most commonly known Jewish new year is the first of Tishri (September–October), called *Rosh Ha-Shanah, literally the “Head of the Year.” Rosh Ha-Shanah is one of the most observed and revered Jewish holidays, signifying spiritual renewal (see HIGH HOLIDAYS).

PAUL STEINBERG

New York City. Since 1654, when it was called New *Amsterdam, Jews have participated in the life of New York City, helping shape its distinctive attributes as the largest city in the *United States. Their presence increased the city’s religious diversity and contributed to New York’s initial prominence as a seaport and mercantile center and later as a city of light industry. Jews transformed the Lower East Side of Manhattan into a storied immigrant enclave and helped make New York the nation’s intellectual, artistic, musical, theatrical, and cultural center. In return New York gave Jews opportunities for social and economic mobility, a free public educational system from kindergarten through college, and a headquarters for diverse national organizations, as well as freedom for political, religious, and ideological expression. Three hundred years after the first twenty-four Jews arrived, roughly two million Jews lived in New York City, more than 25% of its population.

Jews first came to New Amsterdam as refugees, fleeing the Portuguese conquest of *Brazil. Although they were not welcomed, Jews were permitted to live, trade, and practice their religion in private, provided they took care of their needy. The freedoms Jews won, including the right to stand guard and bear arms, endured under *British rule, and Jews integrated into New York’s colonial culture and politics, working as merchants, craftsmen, and traders. They established the first *synagogue in North America, Shearith Israel (Remnant of Israel) in 1704, consecrated the first *cemetery, and opened the first Jewish school. By the time of the Revolutionary War (see UNITED STATES: AMERICAN REVOLUTION), community and congregation were largely co-extensive. Jews forged links with fellow New Yorkers as well as with Jews in other colonial cities and across the Atlantic as they struggled to balance commercial success with the requirements of religious observance.

In the wake of the American Revolution, Jewish life was democratized, including expanded opportunities for *women in the synagogue. After 1825, the city’s Jewish population more than doubled in each succeeding decade, from 7,000 in 1840, to 40,000 in 1860, to 500,000 in 1900. At the beginning of the twentieth century, New York City, with 40% of American Jews, was the largest Jewish community in the United States; more Jews lived in New York than in any European city. Jewish immigrants from the *German states, *Habsburg Empire, *Ottoman Empire, and *Russian Empire established their own congregations; started alternative forms of Jewish fellowship, such as the fraternal order B’nai B’rith (Sons of the Covenant; see UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES); introduced intellectual activities, including library associations and a Young Men’s Hebrew Association; and developed philanthropic organizations, including a hospital. Jewish intellectuals, rabbis, writers, poets, political activists, and educators – along with garment manufacturers, bankers, printers, and publishers – came as immigrants. As the city entered a period of explosive growth after its 1898 consolidation with Brooklyn, Queens, and Staten Island, American-born Jews also found opportunities in New York.

By 1900, interlocking networks of New York Jews had transformed American Judaism. They experimented with forms of community such as the New York Kehillah (1908–22), types of organizational leadership such as the *American Jewish Committee (1906), women’s organizations such as Hadassah (1912; see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA; ORGANIZATIONS, NORTH AMERICA: WOMEN’S), Jewish settlement houses such as the *Educational Alliance, institutions of higher education such as the *Jewish Theological Seminary (reorganized 1902) and *Yeshiva University, immigrant aid societies, *labor unions, socialist *fraternal orders, *Zionist organizations, as well as many varied philanthropies. New York Jews simultaneously built an expansive *Yiddish cultural infrastructure of newspapers (see JOURNALISM, YIDDISH), theaters (see THEATER, YIDDISH), schools, and publications, as well as fraternal organizations, congregations, and charities where Yiddish was the favored language. These immigrant worlds intersected with English-language cultural production in *art, *music, *theater, and publishing and were sustained by such light industries as food, clothing (see FASHION), cigar manufacturing, and construction. Jews occupied all rungs on the socioeconomic ladder from peddler and garment worker to salesman and civil servant to banker and lawyer.

The pace of immigration was halted first by *World War I and then by federal legislation. In the 1920s internal migration took Jews to apartment houses built by Jewish builders in middle-class neighborhoods of Brooklyn, upper Manhattan, and the Bronx. Jews embraced public education as a vehicle of socioeconomic mobility, taking advantage of the city’s free educational system. They sought to develop a way of life that retained Jewish dimensions even as they pursued political involvement and economic opportunity in American society.

Conscious of increasing *antisemitism in American life between the world wars, especially restrictions on residence, education, and occupations, New York Jews accepted responsibility to alleviate Jewish suffering abroad. With more than a million Jews in the city and every form of Jewish religious and political expression from communist to Ultra-Orthodox, there was little consensus regarding how best to combat antisemitism, succor European Jews, and aid the small *Zionist community in *Palestine. Multiple organizations developed, each with its own program.

World War II brought refugees from *Nazism to New York City, including *Hasidim and other devoutly Orthodox Jews, as well as intellectuals, artists, and photographers from Europe’s capital cities, many of whom further enhanced New York’s role as producer of elite culture, even as popular culture, including *music, comics (see LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS), theater, *radio, and publishing continued to flourish. Similarly, the visible presence of diverse Orthodox groups in the city coexisted with liberal forms of *Judaism.

Immigrants helped sustain New York’s Jewish working class; only in the 1970s did the city’s Jewish occupational profile change dramatically as Jews moved into the middle and upper middle classes, out of manufacturing and into managerial and professional positions, finance, real estate, and education. Simultaneously, New York Jews left the city for the Sunbelt and suburbs, reducing the population to just over 1 million by 1980. The city's ethnic composition changed as well, as the increasing numbers of nonwhite residents made Jews a more prominent percentage of white New Yorkers. Since the 1980s, young Jews have returned to New York City, especially Manhattan and Brooklyn, as its fortunes have improved. Immigrants from the former *Soviet Union and Israelis have provided New York Jews with an ongoing foreign-born population whose presence has rejuvenated declining Jewish neighborhoods.

Sheer size has given New York's Jews tremendous psychological security, unusual for the twentieth century. In the interplay of overlapping communities, Jews discovered their own identities and experimented with alternative voices. Jews participated in New York's famous style – brash, ironic, fast-paced, and humane – and also helped build an urban politics that was socialist in sympathies, liberal in values, and democratic in ethos. For further reading see, M. Rischin, The Promised City (1963); D. D. Moore, At Home in America (1981); and E. Lederhendler, New York Jews and the Decline of Urban Ethnicity (2001).

DEBORAH DASH MOORE

New Zealand. Although several Jewish merchants and prospectors traded temporarily in New Zealand in the 1830s, a permanent Jewish community only formed a decade later with the settlement of Wellington. The community, mostly shopkeepers with familial and business connections with *Australia and *Britain, remained small and tenuous until the discovery of gold on the West Coast in 1864. The gold rush pushed the Jewish population over 1,200 in 1867. *Synagogues were established in the main towns. With the community's close ties with Britain, these and other institutions were modeled along Anglo-Jewish lines. Jews encountered little prejudice, and a number of successful businessmen made the leap from commerce to local politics. For example, Julius Vogel served as prime minister for two terms in the 1870s. New Zealand's geographical isolation ensured that it was almost entirely bypassed during the period of *Eastern European mass migration. The Jewish population only passed 2,500 in the 1930s, boosted by an influx of as many as 1,000 German Jewish refugees. During the post-war period, the community grew slowly to around 4,500 Jews in 1960 and about 7,000 in 2008. Although the size of New Zealand Jewry has been supplemented by immigration – Hungarians after 1956; Russians, Israelis, and South Africans over the last three decades – this influx has been somewhat offset by the departure of significant numbers of Jews for Australia. The bulk of the Jewish population is now clustered in Auckland and Wellington, which are served by day schools, *Reform and *Orthodox congregations, and an array of cultural and social organizations. For further reading, see L. M. Goldman, The History of Jews in New Zealand (1958); and S. Levine, The New Zealand Jewish Community (1999).

ADAM MENDELSON

Newport, Rhode Island. This Atlantic port city was founded in 1639. In 1658 fifteen Jewish families of *Sephardic origin arrived in Newport and established Jeshuat Israel (Salvation of Israel), the second Jewish congregation in what would become the *United States. The community purchased land and consecrated a *cemetery in 1677. Newport is known for the oldest standing *synagogue in North America, built by the preeminent colonial architect Peter Harrison and dedicated in 1763. It is known as the Touro Synagogue, in honor of the community's *Amsterdam-born *cantor, Isaac Touro. In 1790 President George Washington wrote a letter, "To the Hebrew Congregation in Newport," declaring that the United States would "give to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance." The synagogue continues to serve an active Jewish congregation.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Niddah is the term used in Jewish tradition for a menstruating woman and, by extension, for menstruation, menstrual impurity, laws related to menstruation, and the like. In the Hebrew *Bible, niddah appears within the wider context of discussions of *purity and impurity. The word derives from a Hebrew root (nhd/ndh) that pertains to "wandering" or "exclusion," suggesting that a menstruating woman or others in a state of impurity should be excluded from the community.

The main biblical sources about menstruation are found in Leviticus 15:19–24, 18:19, and 20:18. In the first text, the menstruating woman and persons and objects with which she comes into contact are, or become, impure. There is no suggestion, however, that intimate relations with a woman during this period of seven days are forbidden. The two other texts formally warn against sexual relations and include the statement that both men and women who transgress the prohibition "shall be cut off from among their people." These texts were discussed and developed in various types of Jewish literature of the *Second Temple period, as well as in the *Mishnah and *Talmud.

The Rabbis read the three biblical texts, as well as the later part of Leviticus 15, which seems to speak about a woman who suffers from a long lasting and abnormal genital discharge, as complementing one another. They resolved at least some of the discrepancies among them by distinguishing between regular menstrual bleeding and protracted bleeding unrelated to menstruation. However, the Rabbis also instituted a major change in the laws of niddah, which continues to be observed in traditional communities. This was the addition of seven "clean" or "white" days following the cessation of bleeding before marital intimacy could be resumed (BT Shabbat 13a). The Rabbis also made *immersion in a *mikveh (ritual bath) mandatory in all cases at the conclusion of the niddah state and before resumption of sexual relations. The punishment of being "cut off from among the people" was generally understood to mean a premature death "by the hands of Heaven."

According to rabbinic tradition, a woman is in a state of niddah from the onset of her menstrual bleeding, if not a little earlier, until her ritual immersion. The immersion must be performed seven days after the end of the bleeding. During the Middle Ages it was decreed that the counting of these seven "clean" or "white" days cannot begin before four or five days had passed from the onset of the bleeding. Thus, a woman who keeps these laws according to rabbinic/*Orthodox tradition will generally immerse in the mikveh around the twelfth day of her cycle. In addition to the basic prohibition of physical contact between a niddah and her husband, some domestic activities, considered by the Rabbis as possible triggers of intimacy between husband and wife, were declared forbidden as well. According to some traditions, which at times were sanctioned by the highest authorities, a niddah should also avoid entering *synagogues and *cemeteries. Observance of these rules is one of the three ritual obligations specifically incumbent on women – together with hallah, separating a part of the dough used to make *Sabbath loaves, and hadlakah, kindling Sabbath lights.

Although traditional Jewish communities have considered the niddah laws to be extremely important, some discomfort with those laws can be detected today, even in the most traditional circles. The many apologetic works explaining the purported benefits of observing these laws and the euphemism for these regulations– taharat hamishpahah (purity of the family) – are just two reflections of this discomfort. This expression, likely coined first in Germany, replaces the traditional expression hilkhot niddah (laws of niddah), reducing some of its negative connotations. Another example of the reshaping of these laws is the decision of *Conservative Judaism that couples should observe only the seven biblically ordained days of niddah separation without the “white days” added during the rabbinic era.

Recent books on this subject include C. Fonrobert, Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender (2000); and R. Wasserfall, ed., Women and Water: Menstruation in Jewish Life and Law (1999); see also BARAITA DE-NIDDAH.
EVYATAR MARIENBERG

Nissan is the first month of the Jewish calendar; it is equivalent to March and/or April on the Gregorian calendar. Its status as the beginning of the Jewish calendar year derives from Exodus 12:1–2. The festival of *Passover (Pesah) takes place from Nissan 15–21, preceded by the Fast of the First-born (Nissan 14; see FAST DAYS). *Yom ha-Shoah is commemorated on or around 27 Nissan. See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Noah: See FLOOD; GENESIS

North Africa. Northern Africa from the west of *Egypt to the Atlantic coast of Morocco, known as al-Maghrib in Arabic (referred to as the Maghreb or North Africa), has been an important region of Jewish life since ancient times. The origins of North African Jews are unknown; historical evidence demonstrates a scattering of Jewish communities across the Maghreb in *Roman times. During the late Roman period, the Maghreb was a place of active proselytism and heterodoxy, and there are traditions that there were converts to Judaism among the indigenous Berber (Amazigh, pl. Imazighen) population.

At the time of the Muslim conquest of North Africa in the seventh century CE (see ISLAM AND JUDAISM), Jewish communities were found on the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts, as well as along the caravan trails of the interior regions north of the Sahara. From the tenth century, if not earlier, a major Jewish community, known for its rabbinical scholars and traders, was established in Sijilmasa, the most important city and center of trade in the southeastern Moroccan pre-Saharan region under an independent Kharijite dynasty. Jews were also found in Berber regions dominated by the Ibadi Islam, a branch of the Kharijite movement; some Jews have continued to live in Ibadite centers – including Jabal Nafusa in Libya, the southern Tunisian island of Jerba, and the Mزاب on the edge of the Sahara in central Algeria – until recent times.

The city of Fez in north central Morocco, founded in the late eighth century and developed as the capital of the Idrisid dynasty, became perhaps the largest Jewish community in the Maghreb in the early Islamic centuries. Jews quickly established themselves in other Muslim cities in what would today be Algeria and Tunisia, such as Tahert, Tlemcen, Kairouan, and Mahdiya. The Maghreb became an integral part of the Jewish world in the Muslim Mediterranean, with Fez and Kairouan developing into major centers of talmudic learning. At the same time *Karaism spread to North Africa, gaining strength in the pre-Saharan region of Ouargla in Algeria; over time it dwindled in importance, surviving only in some remote areas, such as in the High Atlas Mountains.

Two Berber dynasties, the *Amoravids, followed by the *Almohads, emerged in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. They ruled a vast empire including much of the Maghreb and *Spain from their capital of Marrakesh. Forced conversions under the exceptionally intolerant Almohad dynasty led to the disappearance or eclipse of numerous Jewish communities. Some Jews practiced *Judaism secretly, while others, including Moses *Maimonides and his family, went into exile. The Almohad persecutions, however, did not last beyond the first decades of the thirteenth century, and Jewish life again appeared in the Maghreb, under the Hafsid in Tunisia, the Zayyanids in Algeria, and the Marinids in Morocco. Jews lived in large numbers in interior cities such as Marrakesh, and they contributed to the growth of coastal cities such as Tetuan, Algiers, Oran, Gabes, Tunis, and Tripoli.

The mass influx of Jews to North Africa from the *Iberian Peninsula, after the persecutions of 1391 and especially the expulsion of 1492, changed the religious and cultural landscape of the Maghreb. Although the Iberian Peninsula and the Maghreb had originally been part of the same cultural and social network, Spanish Jews (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN), who had become increasingly hispanized in the centuries before the expulsion, brought important changes to North African Jewry, forming new communities or infusing the old with new customs and religious practices. In some places, the Spanish Jews, referred to in rabbinical sources as the exiles (megorashim), came into conflict with the native toshavim and sometimes took over religious or communal leadership. Over the centuries a degree of assimilation took place, especially in Morocco where a new kind of cultural synthesis occurred, with Spanish giving way to Arabic in most places (although Judeo-Spanish/*Ladino lingered in parts of the Mediterranean littoral). In the religious domain, the Sephardi legal tradition remained strong, and until modern times legal documents still referred to the Castilian minhag. Spanish mystics also brought their traditions to North Africa, finding fertile ground throughout the Maghreb, especially in the southern regions of the Sous and Dra'a valleys of Morocco. Almost everywhere in the Maghreb, *mysticism fused with popular practices and customs. In recent centuries mystical elements were manifest in the popular veneration of holy men (Hebrew, kedoshim or tzaddikim) and *pilgrimages to their shrines on the anniversaries of their deaths (Hebrew, hillula, pl. hillulot). The Spanish tradition of Hebrew poetry spread, but adopted a Maghrebi style, evident in liturgical poetry (piyyutim; see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]). With the demise of Jewish life in Spain, the Andalusian traditions became an important component of the cultural identity of North African Jewry in their religious customs and practices, *music, and artistic expression.

The political transformation of the sixteenth-century Maghreb redefined Jewish communities in North Africa. The end of the Berber Marinid dynasty in Morocco gave rise to an Arab sharifian (Arabic sharif, pl. shurafa; claiming descent from the Prophet Muhammad) dynasty of the Sa'dis, followed by the emergence of the Alawids in the seventeenth century (still ruling in the twenty-first century). Jews were more numerous in Alawid territories than in any other part of the Muslim world, with hundreds of communities in both urban and rural areas. Already in the fifteenth century, with increased population pressures caused by the Iberian immigrants, the Marinids had created a separate quarter for the Jews in their capital city of Fez called the mellah. In the sixteenth century, the Sa'dis created a mellah for the Jews in their capital Marrakesh, and subsequently the Alawids created new mellahs. The term mellah came to connote the Moroccan Jewish quarter or even the Jewry of a given locale, whether or not Jews were actually confined to a designated neighborhood. The boundaries of the mellah were far more porous than the walls of the *ghettos of early modern Europe; Jews were usually able to circulate throughout the city, travel, and settle in other parts of Morocco.

In the sixteenth century, regions of North Africa east of Morocco came under the orbit of the *Ottoman Empire, which established what became known as the regencies of Tunis, Algiers, and Tripolitania. Although the Ottomans maintained nominal control, the local Turkish military corps had considerable autonomy; in some places they formed local dynasties, such as the Husaynids in Tunisia. Jews were an important component of the capital cities in Ottoman North Africa, and they were also numerous in various provincial towns and villages along the coast and in the interior. They formed part of a vast network of communities linked by traders and scholars who circulated throughout the Mediterranean. Italian Jews (see ITALY) from the Tuscan port of Livorno were important in Ottoman North Africa, especially in Algeria and Tunisia, where they maintained an identity distinctive from local Jews. They were engaged in the buying and selling of goods and captives for the corsairs, as well as the import and export trade, and many Livornese, as in Algiers, occupied leadership positions in the Jewish communities.

North African Jews held a range of economic roles, from large-scale merchants (Arabic, tujjar) who were closely connected to the Muslim rulers, to the traders involved in the regional and trans-Saharan caravan trade, to the ubiquitous Jewish peddlers and artisans who plied their wares in rural areas and served as important intermediaries between the town and the countryside. As elsewhere in the Islamic world before the modern period, Jews were considered to be "people of the book" (Arabic, ahl al-kitab), belonging to a legitimate yet inferior religion that was protected by the Islamic state. As protected subjects (Arabic, dhimmis*), Jews were allowed to practice their religion in exchange for the payment of an annual poll tax (Arabic, jizya) and the acceptance of certain disabilities indicating their inferiority to Muslims.

The Muslim authorities were responsible for ensuring the protection of the Jewish communities, and only in a few cases was this "contract" violated, most notably under the Almohads, and occasionally by local rulers, such as when the Jews in the Algerian Saharan region of Touat were massacred in the fifteenth century. With the disappearance of indigenous Christians from the Maghreb, probably in the Middle Ages, Jews became the only dhimmis, in contrast to the Middle East with its large and diverse Christian populations.

The growth of European power in the Maghreb challenged the status of the Jews. Already serving as important middlemen in the North African-European trade, Jews took advantage of new opportunities and were important instruments for European expansion into new markets. Some Jews obtained the protection of the foreign consulates and extraterritorial rights as brokers for foreign firms, based on the system of capitulations between the foreign powers and the Ottoman Empire, or through treaty relations with North African governments. This enabled them to escape the jurisdiction of the Muslim authorities and increased tensions between Muslims and Jews. The appearance of foreign Jewish organizations, especially after the foundation of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle in 1860 and its establishment of a network of schools, also precipitated changes in the Jewish communities of the Maghreb as these organizations pressed for changes in the status of the Jews and the modernization of their educational systems.

Pressured to implement the Tanzimat reforms of the Ottoman Empire, the Husaynid beys of Tunisia lifted the civil disabilities associated with dhimmi status in the "fundamental pact" (ahd al-aman*) of 1858, followed by the constitution of 1861. The constitution was suspended after a revolt in 1864, but the legal disabilities of the dhimmi were not reinstated in the period before the establishment of the French protectorate in 1881. In Libya, when direct Ottoman control after 1835 put an end to the hereditary Qaramanli dynasty, Jews were subject to the Tanzimat reforms that abolished the legal disabilities and special obligations associated with dhimmi status. Although Morocco was subject to outside pressures, and a growing number of Moroccan Jews became protégés of foreign powers, the Islamic dhimma system was maintained there through the nineteenth century until it fell into disuse after the establishment of the protectorate in 1912.

Colonial rule in the Maghreb hastened the transformation of the North African Jewish communities. From 1830, the French conquest of Algeria and the establishment of direct colonial rule led to the dismantling of the self-governing institutions of the Jewish community and the imposition of restrictions on rabbinic jurisdiction to religious matters that had no connection to French civil or criminal law (see FRANCE: 1789–1939). Algerian Jewry was integrated into the French Jewish *Consistory system by the establishment of three Consistories in Algeria, which were subordinate to the central Consistory in Paris (see FRANCE: CONSISTORIES, 1806–1939). In 1870, Algerian Jews were collectively naturalized as Frenchmen (except for the Jews of the Mزاب region of the Algerian Sahara, which was still not firmly under French control) through the Crémieux Decree. In the 1880s, the enfranchisement of Algerian Jews met with considerable opposition from the French settler population amid a mood of growing *antisemitism; this hostility was aggravated during the time of the *Dreyfus Affair when anti-Jewish rioting occurred. While most Jews in Algeria maintained a close connection to their indigenous culture, receiving a modern French education and identification with France led to assimilation to French culture that continued, despite the suspension of the Crémieux Decree under the Vichy regime in *World War II. The mass emigration to France and, to a much lesser extent, to *Israel (about 100,000 out of 140,000 Jews were still in Algeria in 1950), during the revolution and especially from 1962–63 after Algerian independence, was a decisive turning point; the community rapidly dwindled in the 1970s, with the few remaining Jews becoming nearly invisible.

The virtual end to Libyan Jewry came even sooner. Under Italian rule, beginning in 1911, Jewish institutions were also made subservient to the colonial authorities, but the degree of Italianization was uneven depending on location and sectors of the Jewish population. Fascist colonial rule (from 1922) came to an end during World War II with the British occupation beginning in 1943. Arab rioting in Tripoli in November 1945, which spread to surrounding areas, was a major turning point; further rioting after the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 caused the majority of Libyan Jews to emigrate. Most of the remaining Jews left with the end of the British administration and Libyan independence at the beginning of 1952, and the last few thousand emigrated as Jewish life became extremely difficult after the Six Day War of 1967 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1956–1967) and Mu'ammar Qadhafi's revolution of 1969. The majority of the approximately 36,000 Jews in Libya after World War II immigrated to Israel, and several thousand settled in Italy and other countries.

Unlike Algeria which was ruled by France as a direct colony, Tunisia was established as a French protectorate. This meant that France maintained the traditional institutions of the country, while also modernizing them. The self-governing institutions of the Jewish community continued to function in theory, but in reality efforts were made to reduce the authority of the rabbinical *courts and local Jewish leadership, while the Alliance Israélite Universelle accelerated its efforts to encourage Jewish identification with French culture. Although a significant number of Jews obtained French citizenship, there was no equivalent to the Crémieux Decree in Tunisia. Yet even without citizenship for all, Tunisian Jewry's political and social status was transformed, and new generations of Tunisian Jews were greatly influenced by French secular culture and education. When Tunisia achieved independence in 1956, there were about 105,000 thousand Jews in the country. By the 1960s, the majority had left for France or Israel. However, several hundred still remained at the beginning of the twenty-first century, primarily in Jerba and Tunis.

Morocco had the largest Jewish population of any country in the modern Islamic world, about 280,000 before the era of mass emigration, and it was one of the last areas subjected to foreign occupation. A protectorate was established in Morocco in 1912 (although the conquest of the country was completed only in the 1930s). The French claimed most of the territory, Spain ruled several regions in the north, and Tangier became an international zone. Rather than abolishing the Alawid dynasty, the colonial authorities preserved the sharifian government as a symbolic entity, using the sultan to issue dahirs and legitimize foreign rule. Jews' dhimmi status was eliminated de facto (but never formally abolished), because they were no longer subject to the Islamic shari'a courts, but their status was left poorly formulated with no clear notion of nationality. Jewish internal autonomy, guaranteed to the dhimmi by the Islamic state, was also undermined by reducing the judicial autonomy of Jewish courts and placing the organizations of the Jewish community under the control and surveillance of the colonial regime. The Alliance Israélite Universelle network of schools in Morocco was greatly expanded during the colonial period and became the quasi-official Jewish educational system for Moroccan Jewry, with the approval of the protectorate authorities. Modernization and the growth of secular culture made inroads in traditional Jewish life, as did a massive process of urbanization, with the modern city of Casablanca growing to become the largest community in Morocco. However, modern trends coexisted with continued adherence to traditional Jewish religious practice. With the growth of the anticolonial movement in the 1950s and the uncertainties of the future in an independent state, the era of mass emigration began, especially in 1955, the year before Morocco's independence in 1956. After independence, *Zionism was banned, and emigration was organized clandestinely for several years. Although many Jews adjusted to life in independent Morocco, emigration continued in a steady stream over the next few decades. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, only a few thousand Jews remain. A far larger number of Moroccan Jews and their descendants live in Israel, France, North America, and in smaller numbers on other continents.

For further reading, see J. Gerber, Jewish Society in Fez, 1450–1700: Studies in Communal and Economic Life (1980); H. E. Goldberg, Jewish Life in Muslim Libya: Rivals and Relatives (1990); E. Gottreich, The Mellah of Marrakesh: Jewish and Muslim Space in Morocco's Red City (2007); H. Z. Hirschberg, A History of the Jews in North Africa, 2 vols. (1974–81); M. M. Laskier, North African Jewry in the Twentieth Century: The Jews of Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria (1994); D. J. Schroeter, The Sultan's Jew: Morocco and the Sephardi World (2002); idem, "Jewish Communities of Morocco: History and Identity," in Morocco: Jews and Art in a Muslim Land, ed. V. B. Mann (2000), 25–54; R. S. Simon, M. M. Laskier, and S. Reguer, eds., The Jews of the Middle East and North Africa in Modern Times (1993); N. A. Stillman, The Jews of Arab Lands: A History and Source Book (1979); and H. Zafrani, Two Thousand Years of Jewish Life in Morocco (2005). Map 5

DANIEL J. SCHROETER

Numbers, Book of, known in Hebrew as bēmidbar, "in (the) wilderness (of)" (from the initial verse of the book), is the fourth book of the *Pentateuch. The book is also known as "the fifth of those who were counted" in rabbinic literature. The expression refers to Numbers as the book of the five books of the *Torah that refers to the censuses of Israel in the wilderness. The name Numbers is derived from the Greek title of the book, Arithmoi ("numbers"). The book narrates Israel's departure from Mount Sinai, its journey through the wilderness, and its arrival in the land of *Moab across the Jordan River from the Land of *Israel.

The book of Numbers is well integrated into the larger literary structure of the *Pentateuch. Indeed, the initial unit of the book, Numbers 1–2, concludes the narrative block concerning the *revelation of the Torah at Mount Sinai that began at Exodus 19. This final segment provides an account of Israel's census immediately before its departure from Sinai. The literary structure of Numbers 3–36 is governed by travel formulas that trace Israel's journey from slavery in *Egypt, through the wilderness, and on to *Moab and the Jordan River, prior to entering the promised land of Israel. The narrative emphasizes tensions in the relationship between *God and the people that require the establishment of the tribe of Levi as *priests who will serve as holy intermediaries between God and Israel.

Numbers 3–36 includes six major literary units defined by the stages of Israel's journey from Mount Sinai to Moab. Numbers 3:1–10:10 focuses on the sanctification of Israel under the leadership of the Levites; it is the Levites who will purify the people and the *Tabernacle in preparation for the journey through the wilderness. Numbers 10:11–19:22 narrates the journey from Sinai to the wilderness of Paran, including the organization of the tribes around the Tabernacle. During the journey, the people complain against God and Moses for various reasons, such as lack of food, questions of leadership, and fear of the *Canaanites, and God decrees that the wilderness generation will die without entering the Land of Israel. The tribe of Levi is selected to serve as priests, and the line of *Aaron is chosen to serve as the chief priests (kohanim) of Israel.

Numbers 20:1–20 recounts the journey from Paran to the wilderness of Zin or Kadesh; there, *Moses and Aaron are condemned for failing to sanctify God. Numbers 20:22–21:3 describes the trip from Zin/Kadesh to Mt. Hor where Aaron dies. In Numbers 21:4–35 the Israelites journey from Mt. Hor to Moab; these chapters include the defeat of Sihon and Og who tried to oppose Israel. Numbers 22–36 recounts Israel's arrival in Moab; these chapters include *Balaam's blessing of Israel, the grant of eternal priesthood to Phineas ben Elazar ben Aaron (ancestor of the Zadokite priestly line in *Jerusalem), a new census of the people, the selection of *Joshua to succeed Moses as leader of the Israelites, and questions concerning the distribution of the Land of Israel among the *Israelite tribes.

Modern biblical scholarship generally views Numbers as a product of the post-exilic Priestly stratum or source of the Pentateuch, although it includes much earlier material from the northern Israelite E stratum and the southern Judean J stratum (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP).

For further discussion, see N. S. Fox, "Numbers," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Brettler (2003); J. Milgrom, Numbers: The Jewish Publication Society Torah Commentary (1990); and B. A. Levine, Numbers, 2 vols. (1993; 2000).

MARVIN A. SWEENEY

Numerology (Gematria). As in Greek and Arabic (and partially in Latin), the letters of the Hebrew alphabet also represent numbers. (The first nine letters of the alphabet represent the numbers one through nine; the next ten represent the numbers ten through one hundred; and the final three letters represent two hundred, three hundred, and four hundred.) The concept of separate signs for numbers reached Hebrew only in the nineteenth century, several centuries after it was accepted in European languages. Jewish scholars, since late antiquity, have used this duality of the meaning of the letters as a tool, mostly for homiletical and exegetical purposes. Gematria, the Hebrew term used to designate this practice, is derived from Greek, indicating *Hellenistic influence. The earliest Hebrew literary gematria is found in a Greek Christian text from the late first century CE. It is the reference to the "number of the Beast, 666," in the *New Testament book of Revelations: 666 is the numerical value of the Hebrew letters indicating the name, Nero Caesar (Rev 13:18). In the *Talmud and *Midrash only a few examples of gematria appear; it seems that the Rabbis avoided using it for *halakhic (legal) purposes, thus denying it any normative authority.

The concept of numerological analysis is often attributed to the ancient work of cosmology and cosmogony, the Sefer Yetzirah* (Book of Creation), whose date of composition is unknown (probably third or fourth century CE). However, there is no basis for this attribution, because there is no use of gematria in that work. Sefer Yetzirah does attribute the process of creation to the power of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet and the ten sefirot belimah*, a term that in the Middle Ages was explained as referring to the first ten numbers. However, Sefer Yetzirah itself does not say this and there is no further use of numerology in the book.

In medieval times the use of gematria expanded in Hebrew exegetical writings, in homiletical works, and especially in the writings of esoterics and mystics (see KABBALAH). The first systematic presentation of this system is found in the Sefer ha-Hokhmah (The Book of Wisdom) of Eleazar ben Judah of Worms, written in 1217. Rabbi Eleazar wrote a list of the seventy-three "gates of wisdom" (that number being the gematria of the word hokhmah, "wisdom"), a methodological directory indicating how every verse in the *Bible should be interpreted. About twenty of these "gates" are numerical in nature, focusing on the number of words in the verse, the number of letters, the number of times the name of *God is mentioned, the number of times a particular letter is used, and other numerical features, including gematria itself. This work constituted a formal acceptance of numerical values as normative methodologies for discovering and interpreting the secret meanings of biblical texts. Judah ben Samuel the Pious of Regensburg, the teacher of Rabbi Eleazar, used these methods to demonstrate the meaning of the *prayer book (see MIDDLE AGES; HASIDEI ASHKENAZ). He believed that there was an underlying numerical harmony designed by God that was reflected in all sacred texts as well as in universal phenomena. Several decades later the Spanish mystic Abraham *Abulafia developed a similar system, using gematria as a central tool in his writings and attributing its authority to the Sefer Yetzirah.

Many mystics in the Middle Ages and modern times used gematria in their exegetical speculations, although many others did not. In the first work of the Kabbalah, the Bahir, written at the end of the twelfth century, there is only occasional, nonsystematic use of gematria, and it is used only seldom in the vast, colorful, and dynamic homiletical discussions of the Zohar*. Hayyim Vital, who preserved the teachings of Isaac *Luria, the great kabbalist of sixteenth-century *Safed, made only marginal use of this method (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC). Other kabbalists, however, used it abundantly.

When kabbalistic works became known in Christian Europe, Christian Kabbalists, starting with the school of Pico della Mirandola in Florence at the end of the fifteenth century, and continuing in Johannes Reuchlin's De arte kabbalistica (1517), found gematria an intriguing new concept; they sometimes identified it with the Kabbalah as a whole (see CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM). This was the beginning of the tendency to view Jewish mysticism as based on numerology, a concept that is not supported by the characteristics of the Hebrew texts themselves. JOSEPH DAN Nursing: United States. Jewish precepts of "visiting the sick" and "performing acts of lovingkindness" may refer to ancient traditions of nursing. The modern profession of nursing developed in the mid-nineteenth century, based on the activity of volunteer caregivers, primarily women, in time of war. The professionalization of nursing and its acceptance as a "respectable" career for women are often attributed to the work done by Florence Nightingale during the Crimean War. In the *United States, the *Civil War was the central event in the development of the profession.

As part of their traditional communal responsibilities, Jewish women in nineteenth-century America created benevolent societies to care for the sick in cities and towns where they lived. During the Civil War, Jewish women, like their non-Jewish counterparts, voluntarily cared for sick and wounded soldiers. Most notable among these Jewish volunteer "nurses" were Phoebe Yates Pember (1861–1920), who served as the Matron of the Chimborazo Hospital in Richmond, Virginia, and Rosanna (Rosana) Osterman (1809–1866), who turned her home in Galveston, Texas, into a hospital, where she cared for the wounded of both the Confederate and Union fighting forces.

The remainder of the nineteenth century witnessed a rapid expansion and consolidation in the advancement of the nursing profession in the United States. By the early 1900s, the credibility of nursing had been established, hospitals were creating nursing schools, and knowledgeable, trained nurses were very much in demand. Many women who were seeking a role in society beyond the home and family were attracted to this profession. Articles appeared in the Jewish press urging young Jewish immigrant women to take up nursing as a career; Jewish women who entered the profession often went into Jewish hospital training schools.

Jewish women were also active in establishing nursing programs in the community. Foremost among them was Lillian *Wald (1867–1940), who studied at the New York Hospital School of Nursing. With the support of Jewish philanthropists, notably Jacob Schiff, she set up the Henry Street Settlement and the Visiting Nurses of Henry Street. Wald coined the term "public health nursing"; her district nursing scheme inspired Henrietta *Szold, who recruited two American Jewish nurses, Rose Kaplan (1867–1917) and Rae Landy (1885–1952), to go to *Palestine in 1913 and set up a similar program. From this modest project grew the vast network of health services that continue to be sponsored by Hadassah, the *Zionist women's organization that Szold founded (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA).

Throughout the twentieth century, Jewish nurses, including such notables as Margaret Arnstein (1904–1972), Naomi Deutsch (1890–1983), Myra Levine (1920–1996), Blanche Pfefferkorn (1884–1961), and Mathilda Scheuer (1890–1974), have played a leading role nationally and internationally in the advancement of nursing education, public health nursing, and nursing administration. The profession of nursing in America has also continued to grow as an academic discipline, firmly placed within the nation's system of higher education. Early in the twenty-first century, nursing is experiencing a shortage of practitioners. Jewish women and men are drawn to this profession, which offers opportunities for fulfilling and rewarding careers in an area of endeavor that reflects and fulfills ancient Judaic benevolent precepts (see also MEDICINE). EVELYN ROSE BENSON

Obadiah is the fourth book of the Minor or Twelve *Prophets; it consists of only twenty-one verses. This oracle against *Edom, the nation living southeast of *Judah, excoriates the Edomites for their glee when *Jerusalem was destroyed, predicts their ruin, and looks forward to a day when the Judean and Israelite exiles will return to reclaim lands taken away from them by Edomites and others. Oracles against other nations occur frequently in prophetic literature (see, e.g., Isa 14–23; Jer 46–51; Ezek 25–32), and oracles against Edom are especially common (Jer 49:7–22; Ezek 25:12–14; Isa 34).

Obadiah was likely written shortly after the *Babylonians destroyed the *Temple in 586 BCE. It shares with *Lamentations 4:21–22, *Psalm 137:7, and other exilic and post-exilic texts the view that the Edomites somehow abetted the Babylonians or joyfully watched Judah's discomfiture; verses 17–19 may imply that the Edomites occupied Judean territory after the Babylonian conquest. It is not clear to what extent these texts reflect genuine Edomite collusion against Judah and to what extent they are expressions of long-standing enmity between the nations. Already in the pre-exilic era Edomites had begun to settle in the Negev, to the west of their traditional territory, although much of this settlement in Judean territory may have been relatively peaceful. Obadiah verses 1–5 closely resemble *Jeremiah 49:9 and 49:14–16, probably because both of these texts use an older oracle against Edom. Rabbinic tradition identifies the author of this book with the character Obadiah in 1 Kings 18, who protected prophets of God from Queen Jezebel (BT Sanhedrin 39b). This would locate the author of this book in the ninth-century-BCE northern kingdom of Israel. In fact, the book reflects the fall of the southern kingdom in the late sixth century.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Omer. The word omer refers to a measured offering of barley given on the second day of *Passover at the time of the *Temple. In that era, this offering was necessary before the grain from the new crop could be used. From the day that this offering was given, seven weeks were counted, at which point the holiday of *Shavuot was celebrated. In the second century CE, this period of time became a time of mourning. Tradition relates this tradition to the death by plague of 24,000 students who had been taught by Rabbi *Akiva. Some believe that this is a veiled reference to the Hadrianic persecutions that took a terrible toll on the Jews between 135 and 138 CE after the Second *Jewish War against *Rome. The omer period is forty-nine days long, of which thirty-three days are treated as days of semi-mourning. Various customs exist as to which thirty-three days should be commemorated in this way. On Lag B'Omer, the thirty-third day of the omer period, all the rules of mourning are lifted, and joyous events, such as weddings, can take place.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Omer, Counting of the (sefirat ha-omer). The omer* is counted beginning on the second night of *Passover through the night before *Shavuot. This practice originates in the barley sacrifice offered in the *Temple on the second day of Passover (Lev 23:15–16). The counting is done after nightfall each day, and the requirement is to count both the days and the weeks. For example, one would say, "Today is the twenty-fifth day, which is three weeks and four days in the omer." A blessing is recited before counting, and the count is done standing. However, if one forgets to count at night, one counts during the day without a blessing. If one misses an entire day, the custom is to continue counting throughout the omer period, but without a blessing.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Oral Torah: See TORAH

Ordination: See RABBINIC ORDINATION; RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN

Organizations: North America. The organizational structure of the American Jewish community is informed by the singular pluralistic nature of American society, a model unique in Jewish history, in which multiple organizational "voices" express a range of views and ideological interests, even as they achieve consensus on core issues and concerns. The organizing principle of American Jewish communal structure is federalism: Institutions voluntarily and contractually link themselves to each other, thereby creating partnerships that benefit the Jewish community.

The beginning of an organized American Jewish community can be dated to 1859 with the establishment of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites. However, communal efforts at large-scale organization, in response to pressing national and local communal needs, developed as a result of the massive immigration from *Eastern Europe from 1880–1920. The earliest organizational response, the federation (see later discussion), addressed the needs of funding local social services. The *Boston Federation of Jewish Charities (1895) paved the way, and by the turn of the century federations of Jewish organizations representing different constituencies had been established in a number of communities. Historically important as well was B'nai B'rith, an international Jewish fraternal group with a substantial membership, founded in the United States in 1843 (see UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES).

Contemporary American Jewish organizational structure is expressed, locally and nationally, in five arenas of activity: social services, religion, public affairs and community relations, Israel and other international concerns, and education and culture. In the social service sphere, the local federation is the key agency, organized by contractual agreement with its member social service agencies for the purposes of joint fundraising and allocations. Over the years federations have become responsible as well for communal and social planning and for coordination of social services within the community. The federations are organized under an umbrella or "roof" agency, the United Jewish Communities (UJC) of North America, successor to the highly effective Council of Jewish Federations and the United Jewish Appeal, which was a fundraising arm on behalf of Israel. UJC represents 155 federations and more than 400 independent Jewish communities across North America.

Denominational groupings in American Jewish religious life include the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist movements (see entries under JUDAISM), each with its own rabbinical association and congregational body (which also serves as the public affairs arm for its movement). The organizational structures for the various movements include the Rabbinical Council of America and the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America for the mainstream Orthodox community; the Rabbinical Assembly and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism; the Central Conference of American Rabbis and the Union for Reform Judaism (formerly the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, founded in 1873 as the first synagogue body in America); and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association and the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation.

The community relations sphere plays out on both the local and national levels. Eleven national organizations, each operating from a distinctive ideological base, are active in this arena. The three "defense" agencies – the American Jewish Committee (founded in 1906), the Anti-Defamation League (founded in 1913 by B'nai B'rith), and the American Jewish Congress (founded in 1918) – are the most visible. On the local level, more than a hundred Jewish community relations councils (JCRCs) monitor community activity and provide an active grassroots presence for advocacy on national issues.

Advocacy on behalf of Israel is a subset of the community relations sphere of activity, with the national agencies and the JCRCs doing the work, together with a highly effective lobbying group, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which has the mandate of being a spokesperson to the administration on behalf of the American Jewish community on matters related to Israel. *Zionist organizations do not have the impact they once had, with the exception of Hadassah, the women's organization with a substantial grassroots membership and a multi-issue agenda (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA; SZOLD, HENRIETTA).

Finally, *education and culture are relative newcomers to the Jewish organizational scene, with national agencies in each arena, such as the Jewish Educational Service of North America (JESNA), coming into being only over the last half-century or so. With the growing recognition since 1968 of the importance of Jewish education, and especially since 1990, emerging agencies in this arena have a significant communal voice. In recent decades, new organizations as well have appeared in all the spheres of activity. Special mention ought to be made of the impact of Jewish family foundations, which have made "donor-directed" giving a powerful force in American Jewish life.

For further reading, see J. A. Chanes, A Primer on the American Jewish Community (3rd ed., 2008); idem, "Who Does

What? Jewish Advocacy and Jewish Interest," in Jews in American Politics, ed. L. S. Maisel and I. N. Forman (2004); and N. Linzer, J. A. Chanes, and D. Schnall, eds., A Portrait of the American Jewish Community (1998). Also useful is D. J. Elazar, Community and Polity: The Organizational Dynamics of the American Jewish Community (rev. ed., 1995); see also UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES; UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT; and ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA. JEROME A. CHANES

Organizations, Women's: North America. Jewish women have played significant roles in a multitude of causes, including the labor (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT), feminist (see JUDAISM: FEMINISM), and socialist movements. They have also banded together to meet various needs in the Jewish community. Most modern Jewish women's organizations trace their origins to small groups dedicated to service, philanthropic, and religious work. Many of these organizations began as auxiliaries to existing men's groups that then branched off to pursue their own agendas and to control the expenditure of their often prodigious fundraising. Despite varied interests and multiple ways of identifying as Jewish, these groups share a commitment to the continuation of Jewish life, the promotion of Jewish education, and the provision of social services and relief to Jewish communities locally and around the world, as well as a belief in women's potential to contribute significantly to public life.

Jewish women's organizations in the United States began with Rebecca *Gratz (1781–1869), a *Philadelphia native who established models and agendas that would be followed by the many groups that succeeded her. Concerned about evangelical overtones in other charities, Gratz created the Female Hebrew Benevolent Association in 1819. In 1838 she founded the first Hebrew Sunday School, serving both male and female students. By mid-century she had opened the Jewish Foster Home; it eventually became the Association for Jewish Children in Philadelphia.

A great increase in Jewish women's organizational activity occurred with the simultaneous influx of immigrants from *Eastern Europe and the rise of the "club women movement" in the late nineteenth century. By this time both middle-class Protestants and Jews had subscribed to the notion of "separate spheres," associating women with domestic and child-rearing responsibilities and men with the realms of business and politics. Women in both groups were perceived to be more closely associated with religion (although not religious leadership) than their male counterparts. *Sisterhoods of Personal Service, which were generally associated with Reform *synagogues, played a major role in these years. Formed throughout the nation, these organizations participated in immigrant aid and established settlement houses and religious schools. The National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods was formed in 1913 to coordinate their efforts. (In 1993 the group became Women of Reform Judaism-The Federation of Temple Sisterhoods.) In 1918 the Women's League for Conservative Judaism was founded. Both organizations sought to promote religious observance in the home as well as the synagogue; they assisted synagogue functioning and supported programs of Jewish education (see SYNAGOGUE SISTERHOODS).

The *National Council of Jewish Women was founded in 1893. This group, which emerged from the Parliament of Religions of the *Chicago World's Fair and maintained close ties to non-Jewish club women, sought to promote Jewish and American values. It consistently expanded its programming over the years, with notable attention paid to Jewish *education, immigrant aid and education, services to the blind, and Jews living in rural areas. Although initially reluctant to take stands on such then-controversial issues as *Zionism and women's suffrage, in the post-*World War II era the organization became actively involved in politics as a member of the Women's Joint Congressional Committee and, in the 1970s, as an advocate for the Equal Rights Amendment and as a supporter of *Israel.

Another organization established in these years was B'nai B'rith Women (1897), which started as an auxiliary of the men's organization. Although the men withheld formal recognition of these auxiliaries until 1953, they functioned independently, providing social outlets as well as philanthropic and political activism. The Young Women's Hebrew Association (YWHA) followed a similar trajectory, emerging from the Young Men's Hebrew Association (YMHA) in 1902. It continued the YMHA's interest in social and cultural endeavors, but had a stronger focus on Judaism than the men's group. Over time the YWHA expanded its services, becoming a model for the Jewish *Community Center movement later in the twentieth century (see SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN; UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES).

Not all Jewish organizations of the period were associated with the middle class. Many working-class Jews were active in such labor groups as the *International Ladies Garment Workers Union and the *Workmen's Circle but few working-class groups composed solely of women emerged. However, Women's American ORT was one such organization. Founded in Russia in 1880, ORT (Organization for Rehabilitation through Training) provided vocational training for Jews and supported *agricultural colonies. Internationalized in 1921, the group gained the support of the international labor movement. Women's American ORT was founded in 1927; it underwrote vocational education in Eastern Europe and provided aid to refugees and *displaced persons in the World War II era. In recent decades, it has worked with ORT International to expand educational offerings in Israel, *Latin America, and the former *Soviet Union.

The Emma Lazarus Federation of Jewish Women's Clubs was founded in 1944 as the women's division of the Jewish People's Fraternal Order of the International Workers Order. This group provided relief to victims of World War II and in the post-war years maintained a commitment to progressive values such as combating *antisemitism and racism, even as many members distanced themselves from the Communist Party. Working-class women were also active in the Zionist movement. *Pioneer Women, known today as Na'amat, was founded in 1925 to support pioneer women in *Palestine. The organization placed great emphasis on *Yiddish and immigrant identity in its early years, although this identification changed over time as Jewish immigration to the United States from Eastern Europe declined. Na'amat has maintained an active role in Israel, working closely with the Labor Zionist movement (see ZIONISM).

Other Zionist women's organizations include *Mizrachi (AMIT), founded in 1925 as the Mizrachi Women's Organization of America. This organization was directed at *Orthodox Jewish women who supported Zionism, and it emerged from auxiliaries to male Mizrachi groups. Mizrachi women's activism has centered on Israel, including operating religious vocational schools for girls. The group is also known for assisting with the waves of immigration to Israel from the "Teheran children" of the 1940s to more recent arrivals.

The largest Jewish women's organization, in or outside the realm of Zionism, is Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America. Founded in 1912 by Henrietta *Szold (1860–1945), Hadassah quickly grew to become one of the major Jewish women's organizations in the United States. Hadassah engages in a wide range of activities at home and abroad, including establishing the American Zionist Medical Unit during World War I, providing social services and medical care in Palestine (see NURSING: UNITED STATES), promoting Jewish and Zionist education in the United States, playing a major role in the Youth Aliyah from Germany in the 1930s (see HOLOCAUST RESCUE), and opening the Hadassah Medical Center at Ein Kerem in *Jerusalem in 1952.

On women's organizations in Europe during this period, see BRITAIN: WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE; WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE.

For additional information, see relevant entries in P. E. Hyman and D. D. Moore, eds., Jewish Women in America (1998); P. E. Hyman and D. Ofer, eds., Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, CD-ROM (2007); S. Reinharz and M. A. Raider, eds., Jewish Women and the Zionist Enterprise (2004); F. Rogow, Gone to Another Meeting: The National Council of Jewish Women, 1893–1993 (1993); and E. B. Simmons, Hadassah and the Zionist Project (2006).

MARY MCCUNE

Ottoman Empire. The Ottoman Empire was founded by Osman I (d. 1324), who united the provinces of Turkish Anatolia. In the centuries to come, the empire expanded into the European *Balkans and conquered the remaining territories of the Christian *Byzantine Empire, including Constantinople, which fell in 1453. The Ottoman Empire was a reliable and welcoming haven for Jews throughout its history. Jews were a privileged minority who made important contributions to the development and expansion of the economy and administration, as well as to Ottoman science, *medicine, technology, culture, and entertainment. They experienced unprecedented levels of individual and religious freedom and long periods of prosperity and cultural efflorescence. The Ottoman Jews also knew periods of spiritual and material impoverishment, reflecting the general decline of Ottoman society, but they were never singled out for religious persecution or oppression.

OTTOMAN–JEWISH SYMBIOSIS: As Ottoman power increased in Anatolia and the Balkans, communities of Greek-speaking Jews, known as *Romaniotes, came under their control. The Jews were mostly urban, engaged in *commerce, crafts, and the professions. By contrast, the Ottoman Turks were primarily warriors, peasants, and nomadic herdsmen. Because the Turkish urban classes were small and Jews were regarded as politically more reliable than the local Christians, the Ottomans preferred to repopulate newly conquered towns with Jewish settlers. They encouraged Jews to settle in Bursa, their first important capital (since 1326), with the expectation that Jews would help in the city's reconstruction and economic development. Similarly, in 1361, when the Ottomans captured Adrianople (Edirne, in Turkish) and subsequently designated it as their new capital, they again settled considerable numbers of Jews in the city. Jewish settlers included not only local Romanians but also Jewish immigrants from abroad, mainly from *Hungary, *France, *Italy, and *Sicily.

A similar development, but on a far larger scale, took place after the 1453 conquest of Constantinople (Istanbul) and its transformation into the new Ottoman capital. Although Turks, Greeks, Armenians, and Slavs were also settled there to repopulate the nearly desolate city, no group was concentrated to a greater extent than the Jews, who were relocated near Istanbul's port, the hub of the city's economic activity. Jews in the Ottoman Empire as a whole constituted a small fraction of the entire population, but in Istanbul made up more than 10% of the residents and were the third largest group after Turks and Greeks.

Jews engaged in a wide range of crafts and professions, but their greatest contribution was developing Istanbul's domestic and international trade. By 1480, they dominated the city's commercial life, playing a major role in the operation and administration of the customhouses and the docks and forming partnerships to bid for tax-farming contracts and government monopolies. Jews were also heavily engaged in the minting of coins and in their distribution.

OTTOMAN EXPANSION AND JEWISH IMMIGRATION: Between 1450 and 1600, the Ottoman state was transformed into a world power. By the end of the sixteenth century, the sultans' domain extended from *Hungary and Transylvania in the north to *Yemen in the south, and from the borders of Morocco (see NORTH AFRICA) in the west to the *Iranian plateau in the east. The administration of such a vast empire created complex needs, as well as opportunities. The newly conquered territories required legions of bureaucrats and entrepreneurs to govern and administer them and to exploit their resources to meet the ever-increasing financial needs of the state. Additionally, by virtue of its new position and power, the Ottoman Empire played a leading role in international affairs and the world economy.

Ottoman expansion coincided with a period of severe persecution of Jews in Europe and their expulsions from *England (1290), most of *France (1306 and 1394), Austria (1421), and later from many of the *German lands; many Ashkenazim resettled in the Ottoman Empire. In 1467, a new wave of massacres and attacks on Jews and conversos was initiated in *Spain, culminating in the establishment of the *Inquisition in 1480. This resulted in the first significant immigration of Iberian Jews, *Sephardim, to the Ottoman Empire. The worst period of Jewish suffering occurred in the period 1492–1511, when Jews were expelled not only from *Spain (1492) and *Portugal (1497) but also from *Sicily and Savoy (1492), Navarre and Provence (1498), Marseilles (1507), the kingdom of Naples (1510–11), and other places. The diminishing possibilities for refuge in Europe and the establishment of successful patterns of immigration and settlement in the Ottoman Empire made it a preferred destination for increasing waves of Jewish refugees; these waves numbered in the tens of thousands and continued through the sixteenth and into the seventeenth century.

The Ottomans, who were pleased to provide the Jewish refugees with a safe haven, took an active role in directing Jewish immigrants to areas where they were most needed by offering incentives, such as exemptions from certain taxes. Although reliable figures are not available, it is likely that more Jews lived in the Ottoman Empire by 1600, than in any other state in the world. The European Jews, especially the *Sephardim, possessed the knowledge, experience, and skills suited to meet the new needs of the rising Ottoman Empire. Like the Romanians, many of the Iberian Jews had extensive expertise in banking, *commerce, tax farming, management of ports and customhouses, and the purveying of large quantities of foodstuffs, clothing, and arms for the government. Additionally, the Sephardim had also been prominent in international *banking and business. Ironically, their expulsion and dispersal across the Mediterranean lands, the Atlantic seaboard, and the New World presented them with opportunities to forge widely flung commercial and banking networks and propelled some to new heights of wealth and fortune. Within a short time of their arrival in the Ottoman Empire, European Jews were found in every major center of international trade. Salonika, which had a Jewish majority, was regarded, because of the activities of its Jewish merchants, as the most important commercial city in the eastern Mediterranean (see GREECE).

In addition to their entrepreneurial and managerial skills, European Jews brought knowledge of European sciences and *medicine. They introduced *printing and a range of new technologies and methods of production, which the Ottomans used in the exploitation of mineral resources and the manufacture of textiles, arms, munitions, and other products. Jewish entrepreneurs and laborers turned Salonika, Istanbul, and *Safed into major centers of textile production. Jews from Salonika managed the exploitation of the silver mines in Sidrekapsi, and in Rhodes they were engaged in mining sulfur. As administrators of ports and customhouses, Jews played an important role in the development of the Danube basin, an area of great economic and military importance. Jews were also instrumental in the revitalization and reorganization of the economies of Ottoman Syria, *Iraq, *Egypt, and *North Africa. In Egypt, for example, a Sephardic Jew, Abraham Castro, was appointed in 1520 to administer the local mint.

Many individual Jews rose to politically influential positions as advisors to ministers and governors, and even to the sultans themselves. The quickest paths to political prominence were careers in medicine or banking. One of the best-known and most influential Ottoman Jewish physicians was Moses Hamon (ca. 1490–ca. 1554), who served as personal physician to the sultans Selim I (ruled 1512–20) and Suleiman the Magnificent (1520–1566). Moses used his political influence to promote Jewish interests, prevailing on Suleiman the Magnificent to issue an order protecting Jews against *ritual murder accusations (blood libels). He also interceded with the sultan to exert pressure on *Venice to permit the departure of the *Mendes-Nasi family, a renowned Marrano family, to safe haven in the Ottoman Empire. Moses was a patron of Jewish learning and scholarship who maintained a major yeshivah headed by the renowned scholar, Rabbi Joseph Taitazak.

COMMUNITY LIFE: Ottoman Jewry was very diverse, comprising several different ethnic groups, each with its own spoken language, culture, and religious customs and traditions. In the Balkans and Anatolia, the native, Greek-speaking Romaniotes and the immigrant, Spanish-speaking Sephardim were the dominant groups in the sixteenth century. Over time, most of the Romaniotes were assimilated into Sephardic culture. In the *Arabic-speaking Ottoman provinces of the Middle East and North Africa, most Jews spoke Arabic. In addition, numerous smaller groups of Ashkenazi and Italian Jews, who were spread across the empire, maintained their distinctive culture and organization into modern times.

In general, the Jews in the Ottoman Empire enjoyed a broad measure of autonomy and personal freedom to settle wherever they wished and to travel; they could engage in almost every occupation and profession; practice their religion; establish their own religious, judicial, educational, and social institutions; and organize community life with minimal government interference. Economic prosperity and freedom of worship facilitated the emergence of new major Jewish cultural centers, which attracted scholars from various parts of the Ottoman Empire and Europe and from which education and culture radiated to the smaller communities. Indeed, in the sixteenth century, Salonika, Istanbul, and Safed emerged as world centers of Jewish scholarship and intellectual and cultural creativity. Among the great luminaries of that period were the legal scholar, Joseph *Karo (ca. 1488–1575), and the mystic and poet, Solomon Alkalbetz (ca. 1505–1584). Map 9

In the sixteenth century, because of the diversity of the Jewish population, community institutions tended to be decentralized. However, during the seventeenth century, with growing integration among the various groups, Jewish institutions became more centralized and communities began to appoint chief rabbis (rav ha-kolel). In the larger communities (Istanbul, Salonika, Izmir, Edirne), the chief rabbinate was usually held jointly by two or three chief rabbis, representing various interests within the community. As of 1835, the Ottoman authorities appointed an official chief rabbi (hakham bashi; haham başı, in Turkish spelling), first in Istanbul and later in other major cities. The authorities regarded the Hakham Bashi of Istanbul as representing all the Jews of the empire.

DECLINE AND REAWAKENING: In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Ottoman Jewish communities, as did the empire generally, underwent a period of material and spiritual decline. Jews, and non-Jews alike suffered from the wars and disorder affecting many Ottoman provinces. In areas that remained firmly under government control, Jewish life and property were generally secure. Although Jews continued to play a significant role in Ottoman economic, political, and cultural life, they lost their primacy to other minority groups, especially Greeks and Armenians. In the nineteenth century, however, Jews greatly benefited from the reforms introduced by modernizing Ottoman rulers. Of all the Ottoman religious minorities, Jews were the only group that did not entertain separatist nationalist aspirations and remained loyal to the state, preferring to live in the multi-religious and polyethnic Ottoman Empire, rather than in the newly established Balkan nation-states. In return, the Ottoman government took great care to ensure that Jewish representatives were appointed to the new state institutions, such as municipal, provincial, and state councils; the new secular law courts; and the first Ottoman parliament (1877–78). Jews were also encouraged to enroll in state schools, which enabled them to pursue careers in government service and politics.

In the second half of the nineteenth century, western Jewish philanthropic organizations also began to play a major role in modernizing Ottoman Jewish life. The most important was the *Alliance Israélite Universelle (AIU). Established in Paris in 1860, the AIU founded dozens of schools throughout the empire; using French as the language of instruction, these schools offered a European curriculum and brought significant segments of the Jewish population into modernity. By 1912, the AIU operated 115 schools in the Ottoman Empire, including schools for girls, with a total enrollment of some 19,000 students.

Modernization increased the cultural diversity of Ottoman Jewry and contributed to its politicization. During the empire's final decades, considerable numbers of Jews, like Moïse Cohen Tekinalp (1883–1961) and Emmanuel Carasso (Karasu; d. 1934), were enthusiastic supporters of the Young Turk movement and called for Jewish integration into Turkish society and culture. Others supported political *Zionism, which had become popular among the Jewish masses. Many Jews shared the views of Lucien Sciuto (1858–1947), editor of the Zionist paper L'Aurore, who believed that Ottoman patriotism and Zionism complemented one another and who advocated an Ottoman–Zionist alliance.

The Ottoman government, however, which already had considerable difficulties with separatist nationalist movements, was opposed to political *Zionism. Still, it regarded Zionism in a class by itself because Zionists used diplomacy, politics, and economic methods to advance their cause, rather than violence. Turkish leaders also recognized the economic benefits that the Zionist enterprise had brought to *Palestine and the empire as a whole, and they respected the political influence that Zionist leaders exercised internationally. Consequently, Turkish leaders were prepared to engage in dialogue. Although they unsuccessfully opposed Zionist settlement in Palestine, Turkish leaders continued to welcome Jewish immigration to other parts of the empire.

By 1908, the Ottoman Empire had lost most of its possessions in Europe and Africa, and its Jewish population was reduced to some 450,000. The Jews, together with the rest of the Ottoman population, suffered heavy losses during the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and World War I. After these two conflicts the empire lost almost all of its remaining territories in Europe and its Arab provinces with their significant Jewish communities. With this final disintegration, less than 100,000 Jews remained in the truncated Ottoman Empire, which in 1923 became the *Turkish Republic (see TURKEY).

For further reading, see E. Benbassa and A. Rodrigue, Sephardi Jewry: A History of the Judeo-Spanish Community, 14th–20th Centuries (2000); A. Levy, The Sephardim in the Ottoman Empire (1994); idem, ed., The Jews of the Ottoman Empire (1994); idem, ed., Jews, Turks, Ottomans: A Shared History, Fifteenth through the Twentieth Century (2002); A. Rodrigue, French Jews, Turkish Jews: The Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Politics of Jewish Schooling in Turkey, 1860–1925 (1990); M. Rozen, A History of the Jewish Community of Istanbul: The Formative Years, 1453–1566 (2002); and N. Todorov, The Balkan City, 1400–1900 (1983).

AVIGDOR LEVY

Oz, Amos (b. 1939). One of the most popular and widely translated Israeli writers (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION [1945–2009]), Amos Oz has achieved a powerful and enduring reputation for his evocative representations of the inner and outer landscapes of the Israeli people, his penetrating literary essays, and his unsparing political criticism of his country's policies vis-à-vis the Palestinians. Oz's works have been translated into more than thirty languages. His vision of the art of the novel has been equally informed by Hebrew Modernists such as S. Y. *Agnon and Russian novelists such as Tolstoy and Chekhov. These varied influences were present as early as his first collection of short stories, Where the Jackals Howl (1965), which was soon followed by his first novel, Elsewhere Perhaps (1966). The overwhelmingly positive critical reception of his second novel My Michael (1968) ensured his position in the vanguard of Israeli writers and launched his still expanding international reputation. In these works, Oz helped inaugurate a discursive tradition in contemporary Hebrew letters of artistically engaging not only with biblical precedents and archetypes in provocative ways but also with the landscape itself (particularly the desert), to illuminate the present conflicts and paradoxes that beset Israeli society.

Oz's first autobiographic work, A Tale of Love and Darkness (2004), is a complex novelistic memoir that reveals the sources of many of the author's most haunting images and even plots, particularly in the fraught realm of parent-child relations (see MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW). Of Oz's numerous novels, short fiction, and essay collections, this epic work has received the greatest critical approbation, perhaps because this searing memoir sheds new light on many of the themes of his earlier novels.

RANEN OMER-SHERMAN

P

Pale of Settlement refers to the area in the Russian Empire in which Jews were permitted to settle. This large swath of western *Russia, constituting just under 500,000 square miles, was officially called cherta postoianogo zhitel'stva evreev. (The term "Pale" [an enclosure] was drawn from its use in depicting nineteenth-century Irish conditions.) The Russian Pale included fifteen provinces that were consolidated in imperial statutes from 1804 to 1835; these were subject to intermittent alterations until the Pale's effective abolition in 1915 and official dissolution with the Russian Revolution in February 1917. Jews made up some 12% of the population of the Pale; in many urban areas, especially in northern provinces in *Lithuania and *Belorussia, they made up the majority. Map 11

The Pale originated in 1792 after the first partition of *Poland in 1772. Merchants wary of competition and alleged Jewish economic mendacity protested the influx of Jews from Belorussia into Russia. Such sentiments had a continuing influence on the ongoing existence of the Pale; Russian officials who occasionally considered its abolition were persuaded that Jews would have a disruptive economic impact if permitted to settle more freely. The Pale restricted Jewish residence, roughly speaking, to those areas where they had lived before the Polish partitions (1772, 1793, 1795). Included also was New Russia, which had been acquired from the *Ottoman Empire; its largest city, a major Jewish center, was Odessa. However, Congress Poland (called the Vistula provinces after 1863) fell outside the boundaries of the Pale, despite the region's high concentration of Jews. Even within the fifteen provinces of the Pale, certain cities (Kiev, especially), peasant villages in some of the provinces, and an area of some fifty miles adjacent to the western borders of Russia prohibited Jewish settlement until the second half of the nineteenth century.

By the late 1850s and early 1860s some of these restrictions were lifted: Jewish merchants were permitted to settle outside the Pale, as were Jews who held academic degrees and, eventually, even Jewish craftsmen. During this era, the Jewish populations of Moscow and *Saint Petersburg began to grow in size. Contraction occurred after the pogroms of 1881–82 when the so-called May Laws limited Jewish residence in villages. At the same time actions were taken to remove Jews living outside the boundaries of the Pale; the most dramatic incident was the 1891 expulsion of large numbers of Moscow Jews. Even before the introduction of the May Laws, Jews living outside the original boundaries of the Pale were subjected to intermittent harassment, arrest, and expulsions.

By the late nineteenth century, Jews, western liberals, and others saw the existence of the Pale, along with the eruption of *pogroms in the 1880s and later, as the most egregious examples of anti-Jewish treatment in Russia. However, it is important to point out no resident of the Russian Empire enjoyed freedom of movement (even nobles enjoyed such freedom as a privilege, not a right), and the general restriction of Jewish settlement to the Pale was consistent with such presumptions. Certainly, the Pale was unique in its form, but its basic intent to restrict residence reflected an overarching principle of Russian governance. Map 11

Pale restrictions were temporarily suspended in 1916 during *World War I when large numbers of Jewish refugees, many exiled by the Russian army, moved into Russia's interior. With the February 1917 Russian Revolution, the Pale of Settlement was officially abolished. For further reading, see Hans Rogger, Jewish Policies and Right-Wing Politics in Imperial Russia (1986); see also RUSSIA. STEVEN J. ZIPPERSTEIN Palestine as a geographical designation has its origins in the second century CE after the unsuccessful Second *Jewish War, when *Rome joined the humbled province of Judea (which already included *Samaria) with *Galilee to form a new province called Syria Palestina. The name "Palestina" was a reference to the *Philistines, who had settled along the coast of the Land of Israel in biblical times. The Philistines came under *Assyrian rule in the mid-eighth century BCE and disappeared from history after their conquest and exile by the *Babylonians in 604 BCE.

Palestine passed from *Byzantine to *Muslim control in the 630s CE and was a province of various Muslim powers, including the Umayyad and Abassid Caliphates, the Fatimids, the Mamluks, and the *Ottoman Empire (see EGYPT; IRAQ; ISLAM). Parts of the region constituted a Christian *Crusader kingdom from 1099–1187 CE. During *World War I, the Ottoman Empire, which sided with the Central Powers, was driven from the region by British forces, which captured *Jerusalem in 1917. After the war, *Britain assumed a mandate over Palestine (affirmed by the League of Nations in 1922) and formally administered the region from 1920 to 1948 (see BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE). In 1947, the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into separate Jewish and Arab states (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE); although this vote precipitated the British withdrawal in May 1948 and ultimately led to the establishment of the State of Israel, much of the territory that was to form a new Arab entity initially fell under the political control of Jordan and Egypt or became part of Israel. A significant proportion of the Arab population of Mandate Palestine became refugees living in camps in areas under Jordanian and Egyptian authority (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1948] and Maps 12, 13).

Since 1967 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–1967]), efforts to form an independent Palestinian state have progressed haltingly. In 1988 the State of Palestine was formally declared and recognized by more than one hundred United Nations member states. The European Union and the United States have diplomatic ties with the Palestinian Authority, and a number of other countries recognize Palestine as a national entity. Substantive negotiations have taken place with Israel, particularly in 2000, but without ultimate success thus far, and substantial disagreements remain. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Palestinian leadership is divided and in conflict; Gaza is under the authority of Hamas, and the West Bank is governed by the Palestinian Authority. When or whether the elusive goal of a viable Palestinian state will be achieved – and if so, in what form – remains unclear.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Palestine: UN Partition Plan, 1947: See BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; Map 12

Pappenheim, Bertha (1859–1936) was born in *Vienna, but lived most of her life in *Germany. A feminist leader, social worker, activist in the international campaign against “white slavery” (see PROSTITUTES, PROSTITUTION: MODERN ERA), author, and translator, she founded (1904) and led the German Jüdischer Frauenbund (League of Jewish Women) and co-founded the International Jewish Women’s League (1914). A pioneer in modern Jewish social work, Pappenheim founded Women’s Relief (1901, *Frankfurt), a women-led organization that served Jewish women and Eastern European Jewish immigrants and refugees, inspiring similar projects throughout *Central and *Eastern Europe. Pappenheim founded an innovative home for unwed mothers and at-risk girls and children (1907, Isenburg); she was instrumental in establishing the Central Welfare Agency of German Jews (1917), which coordinated the social service efforts of Jewish communities and private organizations across Germany. Late in life, she advised the administration of the Beth Jacob girls’ schools in *Poland (see SCHENIRER, SARAH) and lectured at Franz *Rosenzweig’s and Martin *Buber’s Free Jewish House of Learning in Frankfurt. Pappenheim was also a prolific writer of speeches, travel accounts, plays, stories, prayers, and aphorisms, and she was the translator of Mary Wollstonecraft’s Vindication of the Rights of Women, the *Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln (to whom she was distantly related), and other Old *Yiddish texts into German. She is also known for her role in the history of psychoanalysis as the subject of the case study “Anna O.” in Josef Breuer and Sigmund *Freud’s Studies on Hysteria (1895) and as having coined the phrase “talking cure.” Recent scholarship includes E. Loentz, Let Me Continue to Speak the Truth: Bertha Pappenheim as Author and Activist (2007).

ELIZABETH LOENTZ

Passover (Pesah [often Pesach] in Hebrew) is one of the three pilgrimage *festivals, beginning on the 15th of *Nissan (March or April). From an agricultural perspective, Passover is associated with the spring season and the beginning of the barley harvest. This aspect is remembered today with the counting of the *omer, beginning on the festival’s second day. More significantly, Passover commemorates the events described in the book of *Exodus, wherein the *Israelites were enslaved and then freed from *Egypt through divine miracles and the leadership of *Moses.

The Hebrew name of the holiday, Pesah, comes from the Hebrew three-letter root peh/ samekh/ het, meaning “to pass over” or “to spare.” During the last of the ten plagues, just before the Exodus, God “passed over” the houses of the Jews and killed only the firstborn of the Egyptians. The word pesah also refers to the paschal sacrifice, which was an animal (a yearling sheep or goat) that was sacrificed at Passover in the *Temple in Jerusalem. As with most other Jewish holidays, Passover has additional descriptive names: Hag ha-Aviv (the festival of spring), Hag ha-Matzot (the festival of unleavened breads), and Zeman Herutenu (season of our freedom).

The *Bible instructs that Passover lasts seven days (Lev 23:5). The first and final days have greater significance than the intermediary days, hol ha-mo’ed (literally, “the mundane of the festival”). On the first and final days there are festival restrictions from work and also directives to perform certain rituals, such as holding a ceremonial meal, the seder, on the first day; there are also *customs, such as the recitation of *Yizkor, the memorial prayer, on the last day. Jews outside of Israel traditionally observe the diasporic two-day extension of sacred days (yom tov sheni shel galuyot) and therefore conduct a seder on each of the first two nights of Passover. *Diaspora Jews also add a second holy day at the end of Passover, making Passover last eight days. Jews in Israel keep one first day of Passover and thus hold only one seder, and they observe only one holy day at the end.

Traditional observance of Passover requires intense preparation, beginning with the elimination of any hametz from the home. Hametz is food that is made from any of five grains (wheat, barley, oats, spelt, or rye) and has been allowed to rise. Prohibited foods include items such as pasta, cereal, and beer, because they contain byproducts or derivatives of the principal forms of hametz. Expanding on the Torah’s injunction, “and no leaven shall be found in your houses” (Exod 12:19), Jewish law stipulates that one must not only refrain from consuming hametz but it is also forbidden to own it or to derive benefit from it (e.g., making money in a hametz-related business venture or enjoying hametz in a social activity with non-Jews).

*Ashkenazic Jews also prohibit a group of foods called kitniyot (from the Hebrew adjective katan or “little”), in addition to hametz. These include rice, corn, millet, and legumes (beans, peas, lentils, seeds, and peanuts) and all their derivatives. This ban against eating kitniyot was likely an extra protective measure to make sure people would not accidentally cross the line from non-hametz into hametz. The Ashkenazic injunction concerns the act of consumption only (not the owning of kitniyot), and because kitniyot are not hametz, there is no obligation to destroy or sell these foods. *Sephardim do not adhere to this prohibition.

The removal of hametz can be especially painstaking because even the smallest amount of hametz in food renders it unacceptable for Passover, unlike other accidental mixing of prohibited foods (e.g., dairy and meat) that may be disregarded if it involves less than one-sixtieth of the sum. Therefore, Passover cleaning often entails serious scrubbing and wiping clear areas and appliances used for food, as well as exchanging dishes and cookware used all year for those reserved for Passover.

The cleaning efforts are formalized at sunset on the 14th of Nissan, the evening before the first seder, with bedikat hametz, the search for hametz, performed systematically to ensure that none is left in the house; bi’ur hametz (destruction of hametz), a ceremony wherein the hametz found is taken outside and burned the following morning; and mekhirat hametz, the sale of hametz to a non-Jewish friend, which technically fulfills the obligation not to “own” hametz, but stipulates that the original owner repurchases the hametz at the close of the festival.

The festival (15th of Nissan) commences with the seder. The original seder, as devised in the talmudic era, was based on the Roman version of a Greek symposium. The seder is not meant to be overly formal; rather participants are to act like free people and recline comfortably, and small children are welcome to play an active role. It follows a fourteen-part procedure that is set forth in a text called the haggadah. This book recalls and teaches the story of the Exodus through symbolic foods set on a large seder plate, the prescribed eating of matzah (unleavened bread), four questions, rabbinic teachings, and folksongs. In this way, the seder fulfills the biblical commandment, "And you shall explain to your son on that day, 'It is because of what the Almighty did for me when I went free from Egypt'" (Exod 13:8). Four cups of wine are consumed, each at a specific point during the seder, and a substantial meal is served at about the midpoint.

Hallel* is recited on the first and last days of the festival, and a half-hallel is recited during the intermediary days. A special prayer (tefillat tal [the prayer of dew]) that officially marks the end of winter and the beginning of spring is chanted in synagogue on the first day. On the intermediary *Sabbath of Passover, Ashkenazic Jews read the *Song of Songs in *synagogue, as it expresses God's intimate relationship with the Jewish people, a central Passover theme.

The Christian holiday of Easter is related to Passover in that both are springtime observances that emphasize themes of rebirth. Christ is referred to as the paschal sacrifice in Christian liturgical language, and some say that the Last Supper was a Passover seder.

For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Spring and Summer Holidays (2009); P. Goodman, The Passover Anthology (1961); T. H. Gaster, Festivals of the Jewish Year (1952); I. Greenberg, The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays (1993); and I. Klein, A Guide to Religious Jewish Practice (1979).

PAUL STEINBERG

Patriarch (Hebrew, nasi). The Patriarchs were hereditary leaders of the Jewish community in the Land of *Israel in the first five or six centuries CE. They were descendants of the family of Gamaliel (I) mentioned in Acts 5:34 (see *NEW TESTAMENT) and his son Simon (e.g., *Josephus, War 4.159; Life 309), who were significant figures in pre-70 CE *Jerusalem. Simon's son Gamaliel II plays an important role in traditions about the early rabbinic movement. By a certain point in the third century – perhaps in connection with Judah the Patriarch (d. ca. 200 [*Judah ha-Nasi]), the editor of the *Mishnah – the Patriarch emerged as a major figure in local matters and claimed an inherited right to the office (descent from *David) and a role in the administration and exercise of justice, all without formal recognition from the *Roman government. At the end of the fourth century and for a brief period, however, Roman laws did recognize the status of the Patriarchs and assigned them the authority to appoint and depose community officials in the *Diaspora as well. See H. Lapin, "The Rabbinic Movement," in J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin, eds., The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture (2010), 58–84.

Pentateuch is the Greek term – five [penta] books [teuchos] – for the *Torah section of the Hebrew *Bible, also known as the Five Books of Moses. These biblical books are *Genesis, *Exodus, *Leviticus, *Numbers, and *Deuteronomy.

Periodicals: *Canada (English Language). The Canadian Jewish community is served by national and regional English-language periodicals. The most widely read periodicals are the weeklies sponsored by Jewish organizations. The Canadian Jewish News is published out of Toronto and Montreal by the Canadian Jewish Congress, an overarching comprehensive organization. The Jewish Tribune, sponsored by B'nai B'rith Canada, takes a somewhat more conservative approach. Outlook, a national magazine of opinion, published six times a year, describes itself as "independent" and "secular with a socialist humanist perspective." Afterword seeks to attract younger Canadian Jews. In 2008 regional/local periodicals were published in Ottawa, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Vancouver. Two cultural publications of note are Parchment: The Journal of Canadian Jewish Writing and Canadian Jewish Studies. LIBBY K. WHITE Periodicals: United States (English Language). In 2008, the website of the "Index to Jewish Periodicals" (www.jewishperiodicals.com) listed more than two hundred English-language publications of various kinds "devoted to Jewish affairs." Of these, the great majority are published in the *United States.

The English-language Jewish press in the United States originated in response to Christian missionary efforts. In 1823 Henry Jackson, a Jewish printer living in *New York City, refuted the claims of conversionists in The Jew. Isaac *Leeser (1806–1868) of *Philadelphia edited The Occident and American Jewish Advocate from 1843 until his death. This monthly journal contained articles on Jewish history, news from the American and international press, reports on American Jewish settlements, fiction, and poetry. The Occident attacked *antisemitism and *intermarriage, endorsed separation of church and state, and supported a Jewish state in *Palestine. Leeser focused on matters on which Jews could agree, such as the Edgar *Mortara case, General Ulysses Grant's Order 11 (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR), Sunday closings, and Jewish chaplains in the army (see UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY). The Occident supported benevolent societies, Jewish hospitals, and day schools. After Leeser's death, Mayer Sulzberger edited The Occident for one year and then it ceased publication.

Isaac Mayer *Wise (1819–1900) established The Israelite in 1854 as a weekly journal. Based in Cincinnati, Ohio, Wise was especially concerned to promote the practice of American Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA) and to provide information for Jews in small towns throughout the United States who were at a distance from major Jewish population centers. The Israelite included sermons and editorials, news of the Jewish world, as well as fiction by Wise and others. It attacked the assumption that the United States was a Christian country and proclaimed the Reform tenet that Jews were a religious group, not a national entity. The Israelite became The American Israelite after 1876, and it continued to be published into the first decade of the twenty-first century.

The American Israelite was the first of the many periodicals published by denominational movements to communicate with their members and the public at large. In the early twenty-first century The Jewish Observer and Tradition represent Orthodox approaches. The Conservative movement publishes Voices of Conservative/Masorti Judaism, and Conservative Judaism, whereas Reform publications include Reform Judaism and the CCAR Journal. The Reconstructionist and Humanistic Judaism are published by smaller denominations (see entries under JUDAISM).

Jewish nonsectarian organizations also publish periodicals for their members and for other interested readers. B'nai B'rith (see UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES) began publication of its first magazine, Menorah, in 1886. Its twenty-first-century successor is B'nai B'rith Magazine. The *American Jewish Committee published the monthly magazine Commentary between 1945 and 2006. Initially a liberal center-left publication, Commentary became increasingly conservative in the 1970s under its editor Norman Podhoretz. Since 2007, Commentary has been published as an "independent journal of public opinion." The *American Jewish Congress publishes Congress Monthly, which focuses on civil liberties, racial equality, political liberalism, and *Zionism, as well as the more academic Judaism: A Quarterly of Jewish Life and Thought.

The first American *Zionist magazine was the Maccabean, which appeared in 1901; it is now The American Zionist. The Theodor Herzl Foundation of the American Zionist Foundation has published Midstream Magazine since the 1950s. The periodical describes itself as the leading intellectual Zionist journal in the world, "a medium of informed discussion and lively thinking." Hadassah Magazine began life as a modest "bulletin" for members of what is now *Hadassah: The Women's Zionist Organization of America. It has evolved into a stylish "Jewish feature and literary magazine" that emphasizes events in Israel and the Jewish world for a predominantly female audience.

The Menorah Journal, originally associated with the *Menorah Association, a group that sponsored Jewish organizations on college campuses, was published in different forms between 1915 and 1962. This sophisticated and intellectual periodical had a significant impact on American Jewish culture. Many contributors were well-known academics, and the journal's content included translations from *Yiddish, articles on Zionism, reports on cultural events, and art reproductions.

A number of American Jewish periodicals are independent. The largest, Moment magazine, founded in 1975 by Elie *Wiesel and Leonard Fein, comments on contemporary American Jewish society from disparate points of view. Tikkun, founded in 1986 and edited by Michael Lerner, is a Jewish critique of politics, culture, and society from a leftist perspective. Lilith Magazine (1976), and Bridges: A Jewish Feminist Journal (1989) are among independent periodicals directed at Jewish feminists (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). Heeb, established in 2001, takes an iconoclastic and satiric approach geared to a college and post-college audience.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, many American Jewish communities support English-language weekly or monthly newspapers. Although the existence of some of these periodicals is tenuous because of inadequate funding and lack of professional staffing, these local periodicals play an important communal role in providing international and national Jewish news. A major resource for these local and regional periodicals is the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, which describes itself as "the Global News Service of the Jewish People"; it was originally founded as the Jewish Correspondence Bureau by Jacob Landau in 1917. Local periodicals also report on a variety of Jewish events in their communities and regions and provide calendars of educational programs and upcoming activities. Many are affiliated with the American Jewish Press Association, founded in 1944 as "a voluntary not-for-profit professional association for the English-language Jewish press in North America." The English-language Forward, published weekly since 1990 as an independent and progressive source of news and opinion on Jewish affairs, is particularly renowned for its cultural pages.

A broad variety of academic journals focused on the Jewish experience are published in the United States. The oldest is the Jewish Quarterly Review, established in 1889. American Jewish History, published by the American Jewish Historical Society, the oldest national ethnic historical organization in the United States, was founded in 1892 as Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society. Jewish Social Studies: History, Culture, and Society appeared between 1939 and 1993; a new series of the journal began in 1994. Among other academic journals are the AJS Review, founded in 1976 as the scholarly publication of the Association for Jewish Studies; Prooftexts: A Journal of Jewish Literary History, published since 1980; Shofar: An Interdisciplinary Journal for Jewish Studies, established in 1981; Nashim: A Journal of Jewish Women's Studies and Gender Issues, co-founded by the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in *Jerusalem and the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute in 1998; and the Journal of Jewish Communal Service, published by the Jewish Communal Service Association for Jewish communal professionals.

For further reading, see L. Harap, In the Mainstream: Jewish Presence in the Twentieth Century: American Literature 1950's–80's (1989). See PERIODICALS: CANADA (ENGLISH LANGUAGE) and BRITAIN for information on other English-language periodicals of Jewish interest, and see entries under JOURNALISM.

LIBBY K. WHITE

Persia, Ancient. Cyrus the Great, part of the Achaemenid dynasty, became king of Persia in 557 BCE and reigned until 530 BCE. His father Cambyses I ruled over Anshan, in the heart of what is now *Iran. After defeating the *Babylonian King Nabonidus in 539, Cyrus ultimately assumed control over all of western Asia. In 538, Cyrus authorized the Jewish community in Babylonia to return to *Judah and rebuild the *Temple in *Jerusalem (Ezra 1). His son Cambyses II (reigned 530–522 BCE) extended the empire as far as *Egypt. Darius I (522–486 BCE) consolidated the empire, and his reign figures prominently in the chronological headings of the prophetic books of *Haggai (1:1, 15; 2:1; 10; 18; 20) and *Zechariah (1:7, 7:1). Although Darius succeeded in establishing Persian rule over a vast stretch of territory from Libya and Egypt in the west, Ionia and Lydia in the north, all the way to the Indus in the east, and the Persian Gulf and Arabian Sea to the south, much of the fifth century BCE was spent in wars with the Greeks. Despite many challenges to imperial rule, Persian control over this vast area lasted until the conquests of *Alexander the Great in 330 BCE. The rulers of the relatively tranquil Achaemenid dynasty allowed a measure of home rule in all their satrapies (provinces), along with religious freedom. In this era long-lasting and culturally important *Diaspora centers were established in Iran and *Iraq (see BABYLONIAN EXILE). The book of *Esther, although generally seen as fictional, is set in Persia and reflects a highly acculturated Jewish community.

During Achaemenid rule there was significant rebuilding of Jewish life in the Land of Israel, a province called *Yehud by the Persians. Jews returned to Yehud in 538 under the governor Sheshbazzar (Ezra 1:8, 5:14); in 520 BCE under the leadership of the Persian-appointed governor *Zerubbabel (Haggai 1:1, 14); and in the fifth century under the leadership of *Ezra and *Nehemiah. However, a far larger number remained in Babylon. Persian rule over the province of Yehud lasted from 539 to 332 BCE, when the *Hellenistic era began with the arrival of *Alexander the Great in western Asia. The rebuilding of the Jerusalem *Temple was undertaken during the years of Persian rule; the small amount of material evidence from this era indicates that most Jews were involved in farming and lived at a subsistence level (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD).

There is very little information about the Jews who remained in central Mesopotamia during the Hellenistic (331–238 BCE) and Parthian (238 BCE–224 CE) periods. More information is available for era of the Persian Sassanian dynasty (224–651 CE). It was under its rule that the Babylonian academies of *Sura and *Pumbedita became the center of rabbinic culture, ultimately producing the Babylonian *Talmud. The Sassanian rulers, who championed the Zoroastrian religion, changed imperial culture toward a more consciously “Persian” aesthetic and identity. Zoroastrianism and Persian language and culture were quite visible, as the Talmud attests, in part because Ctesiphon, located on the Tigris River in Iraq, served as the Sassanian capital. However, forms of *Aramaic remained the general vernacular and were used as scholarly languages, at least among the Jewish and Christian communities.

Within this broad cultural and political context, Jews flourished in Mesopotamia. The Talmud refers to very few instances of state-sponsored religious restrictions or persecutions (see, e.g., BT Yevamot 63b; BT Bava Metzia 86b). Rabbinic tradition reveals that some Jews closely identified with Babylonia, claiming biblical-era origins for the Shaf V’yativ synagogue in Nehardea. In 651 CE, Muslim forces conquered the Sassanian Empire, introducing a new era for the Jews of western Asia (see ISLAM AND JUDAISM; IRAN; IRAQ; JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE). For further reading, see H. Lapin, “The Rabbinic Movement,” in The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture, ed. J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin (2010).

Pesah (or Pesach): See PASSOVER

Pharisees (ca. mid-second century BCE–70 CE) were one of the Jewish groups to emerge in *Judea after the *Maccabean revolt. Although popularly known from hostile *New Testament accounts as punctilious and legalistic Jews, a more balanced portrait of Pharisees as scholars, teachers, and community leaders emerges from other sources. The term “Pharisees” (Hebrew, perushim; Greek: pharisaioi), appears to mean “separatists” in Hebrew, although it is doubtful whether it always referred to a specific group or was a self-chosen designation. What the Pharisees separated from is also unclear – perhaps from Jews less devoted to biblical *purity laws or *Torah study.

The main historical sources – *Josephus, rabbinic texts, and the New Testament – emphasize different aspects of the Pharisees. Josephus focuses on their political involvements and religious interests. The New Testament Gospels savage Pharisees as falsely pious and arrogant, but also reveal a competition between them and Jesus for popular support, thereby partially explaining the hostility. Scattered New Testament references, which are less hostile, confirm the Gospels’ presentations of the Pharisees as zealously devoted to *Torah. Rabbinic texts post-date the Pharisees by at least a century and reveal mixed attitudes toward them, but generally confirm other descriptions of Pharisaic religious views.

Josephus provides the most information (Jewish War 2:162–66; Jewish Antiquities 13:288–98, 400–21; 17:42; 18:4–17). He describes the Pharisees’ sporadic involvement in national affairs, typically through opposition to or alignment with more powerful leaders. They fell afoul of *Hasmonean rulers John Hyrcanus (reigned 134–04 BCE) and Alexander Jannaeus (reigned 103–76 BCE), who supported the rival *Sadducees, but found favor under Salome Alexandra (reigned 76–67 BCE), who allowed them to persecute their opponents. A few Pharisees opposed *Rome before the war in 66–70 CE. Rabbinic and New Testament texts hint at the Pharisees’ limited involvement in politics. According to the New Testament, some Pharisees sit on councils (Acts 5:34) and are involved in palace intrigues (BT Kiddushin 66a), but notably, they play no role in the trial of Jesus.

Josephus focuses on the Pharisees’ specific religious views: their belief in free will, an imperishable soul, and reward and punishment after death. He also highlights their fidelity to “traditions of their fathers,” teachings that clarify, expand, and alter biblical law (see HALAKHAH) in an effort to make ancient commandments relevant. These religious issues are confirmed by other sources (Mark 7:3; Acts 23:8; cf. M. Avot 1:1, 3:15). The New Testament and rabbinic writings emphasize piety based in the home and community that is separate from (although not opposed to) *Temple worship. Pharisees are said to observe commandments rigorously regarding the *Sabbath, purity, *marriage, and *dietary rules (provoking disputes with Jesus over competing interpretations; Matt 12:1, 15:2), and to revere Torah study. This strict observance made them popular with the masses, who appreciated their zeal and welcomed their guidance (Matt 23; M. Toharot 4:12; BT Niddah 33b).

The rabbinic movement has its roots in the Pharisaic movement, whose model of personal piety in daily life and devotion to Torah study was well suited for a world after 70 CE, when Jews no longer had a Temple or political power. For further reading, see E. Rivkin, A Hidden Revolution (1978); S. Mason, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees (2001); and A. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes, and Sadducees in Palestinian Society (2001).

ADAM GREGERMAN

Philadelphia. With a bustling tidewater port and tolerant attitude toward religious diversity, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania’s largest city, attracted Jews early in the eighteenth century. Six Jews had traded in the merchant town by 1719, and New York merchants and brothers Nathan and Isaac Levy settled there with their families in 1737. Nathan’s 1740 purchase of land for a Jewish cemetery laid the groundwork for Philadelphia’s first Jewish communal institution.

By 1761, immigrants from *Central Europe increased the Jewish population, and a prayer group was functioning. This congregation, already serving three hundred Jews, incorporated in 1782 as Mikveh Israel (Hope of Israel), following *Sephardic ritual. Before the end of the century, a second congregation, Rodeph Shalom (Seeker of Peace), was established, the first in the *United States to follow *Ashkenazic customs.

Upheavals in Europe brought more Jews to North America throughout the nineteenth century, and newcomers to Philadelphia often required charitable services. By 1820, two independent benevolent societies existed; Rodeph Shalom congregants formed an additional larger association, the United Hebrew Beneficent Society, in 1829. These groups also enjoyed support from Jews in other states and from local Gentiles. Philadelphia Jews rose to national influence during the Jacksonian era when Isaac *Leeser (1806–1867) became prayer leader at Mikveh Israel. Leeser published The Occident and American Jewish Advocate, the first important Jewish *periodical to achieve widespread circulation. In its pages he instructed American Jews about religious practices, advocated for charitable and religious endeavors, and provided a forum for spiritual writing by men and women. Leeser also established a publishing company for Jewish works, translated the *Bible into English, established a short-lived rabbinical seminary, and served as advisor to numerous Jewish ventures. These included the first Jewish Sunday school (1838), led by Mikveh Israel's Rebecca *Gratz (1781–1869), and the Jews' Hospital (1866). Sabato Morais (1823–1897), his successor at Mikveh Israel, continued to advocate for an Americanized form of traditional Judaism and established the Young Men's Hebrew Association (see UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTERS) and New York's *Jewish Theological Seminary (1887). Younger Philadelphians linked to Mikveh Israel helped organize the *Jewish Publication Society (1888), the American Jewish Historical Society (1892), and the *American Jewish Committee (1906). Beginning in 1906, Philadelphia rabbi Bernard Levinthal (1865–1952) played a role in the establishment of *Yeshiva University in *New York City. Increasing immigration led to the formation of many new congregations, some of which participated in the effort to streamline and simplify Jewish practice; Keneseth Israel (Assembly of Israel, 1847) became a nationally influential *Reform congregation in the later nineteenth century.

By 1905, Philadelphia's 75,000 Jews supported one hundred and fifty different Jewish associations, including a rabbinical *court and *kosher supervising agency. The *American Jewish Congress was founded in Philadelphia in 1916 to obtain "not charity but justice" for Europe's Jews, and in 1939 Maurice B. Fagin founded Philadelphia's Anti-Defamation Council, forerunner to *B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League. In the 1970s, Philadelphia's active movement to aid Jews trapped in the *Soviet Union made it a national hub for tourists traveling to the USSR to assist Jews. By the end of the twentieth century Philadelphia's Jewish population of 260,000 included approximately 6,000 Soviet immigrants. For further reading, see D. Ashton, Rebecca Gratz: Women and Judaism in Antebellum America (1997); idem, Jewish Life in Pennsylvania (1998); and M. Friedman, When Philadelphia Was the Capital of Jewish America (1993).

DIANNE ASHTON

Philanthropy. There is no exactly analogous word for philanthropy or charity in the Jewish lexicon. The word "philanthropy," from the Greek, means love of humankind, whereas charity, from the Latin caritas, refers to an act of lovingkindness. Tzedakah is the operative Jewish value concept, and it is based in the root tzedek, which means righteousness or "doing the right thing." People should help those who are less fortunate because they are commanded to do so, whether or not they have any connection to the recipient. The twelfth-century Jewish philosopher Moses *Maimonides famously describes eight degrees of giving, noting that even one who is a beneficiary must donate to others as well. For Maimonides the highest levels of tzedakah were to give anonymously in such a way that the recipient would ultimately become independent (Mishneh Torah, "Laws of Gifts to the Poor" 10:7–14). Today, philanthropy is an imperative imbued in many Jews who may not observe other *commandments.

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Philistines. The Bible represents the Philistines as one of the bitter foes of the biblical *Israelites. Their area of habitation along the fertile coastal strip of southwestern *Canaan stretched from the border of *Egypt's Sinai Peninsula in the south to the banks of the Yarkon River in modern-day *Tel Aviv in the north, and from the Mediterranean Sea in the west to the shephelah, the low-lying Judean foothills in the east. According to Egyptian sources, they were one of a number of ethnic groups later termed "Sea Peoples," who were on the move during the transitional period between the Late Bronze and Early Iron Ages (ca. 1200–1150 BCE). By the reign of Pharaoh Ramses III in the early twelfth century, the Philistines were settled in the area traditionally associated with them. Hence, their rise in the land was more or less concurrent with the rise of the Israelites in the central hill country.

This situation is reflected in *Judges, in which the Philistines are among the peoples opposed to the nascent Israelites, and particularly in *Samuel, in which pressure from Philistine expansionism leads in part to the decision to institute kingship in Israel (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP). *Saul, the first king of Israel, dies in battle against the Philistines (1 Sam 31), but King *David's relationship with them is more complex. Although he is presented as a scourge of the Philistines, for example killing their champion Goliath (1 Sam 17), in a number of texts he is allied with them and even becomes a vassal of Achish, the king of Gath (1 Sam 27). After assuming kingship over all Israel, David turns against his erstwhile suzerains and effectively brings an end to Philistine expansionism (2 Sam 5:17–25; 8:1; 21:15–22; 23:9–17). From that time onward, they play a minor role in biblical narrative and prophetic texts and eventually pass from the scene.

This indistinct biblical portrait may be supplemented by both textual and material finds. Egyptian texts convey information regarding the period of Philistine settlement and *Assyrian and *Babylonian sources document the later phases of their history in the eighth and seventh centuries BCE. Archeological excavations in the 1960s in Philistia deepened our understanding of their history and material culture. *Archeological evidence indicates that the Philistines originated in the Aegean world, as reflected in their pottery, architecture, small finds, names, and faunal remains. Nonetheless, within a couple of generations they had more or less acculturated to their Canaanite environment, and during the latter centuries of their habitation, they exhibited many features of regional Canaanite culture, including its pantheon of deities and its script.

Whereas the Bible presents the Philistines as a united conglomeration of five cities (the “Pentapolis” consisting of Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Gaza along the coast, and Ekron and Gath farther inland), extrabiblical evidence points to a system of independent city-states, which engaged in a tightrope walk of shifting alliances with each other and with the major powers in Egypt and *Mesopotamia that had designs on their territory and trade. Coming under the control of Assyria at the time of Tiglath-Pileser’s western campaigns (743–732 BCE), the Philistines disappeared from history after their conquest by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar II in 604 BCE. Their memory lives on in the geographical designation “*Palestine.” For further reading, see T. Dothan, The Philistines and Their Material Culture (1982); C. S. Ehrlich, The Philistines in Transition (1996); and A. E. Killebrew, Biblical Peoples and Ethnicity (2005). Map 2 CARL S. EHRLICH

Philo Judaeus of Alexandria (ca. 20 BCE to 50 CE), was a preeminent *Hellenistic Jewish thinker, biblical exegete, and delegate of the Jews to the Roman emperor Caligula. The two epithets for Philo, “Judaeus” and “of *Alexandria,” highlight his importance as a writer who brought together Jewish tradition and Greek philosophy. Despite his great learning, we know little about his education. Philo came from a prominent family; according to *Josephus, his brother was the very wealthy Alexander the alabarch (an official under Roman rule), whose son Tiberius Julius Alexander turned away from Jewish practices and served under the Romans in several high posts. The most famous episode of Philo’s life was his participation in a mission to Caligula in 39 or 40 CE after a violent uprising, whose causes scholars continue to debate, against the Jews in Alexandria in 38 CE. By his own account an attendee at sports and theatrical events, Philo appeared to have enjoyed many aspects of Hellenistic culture.

Philo, who wrote in Greek and probably knew little if any Hebrew, produced more than forty extant treatises; most are commentaries on the Greek *Pentateuch. They can be grouped into three series, each with apparently different aims and audiences. The “Allegorical Commentary,” a verse-by-verse commentary on parts of *Genesis that is marked by long digressions and allegorical interpretations, seems directed toward Jews like Philo himself who were well educated in Jewish tradition and Greek thought. By contrast, in the “Exposition of the Law” and two companion works on *Moses, Philo evidently assumes that his readers have little or no familiarity with Jewish Scripture and practices; his favorable presentations may be addressed either toward Jews or non-Jews. In those works, which offer various interpretations including allegorical ones, he discusses the Bible in thematic treatises on creation, the patriarchs, the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS), particular laws, virtues, and rewards and punishments. A third series, preserved primarily and incompletely in Armenian translation – Questions and Answers on Genesis and Exodus – contains questions and answers on individual verses. This series, probably directed toward Jews alone, includes both literal and allegorical interpretations and may have been intended for *synagogue or school study or as preliminary notes for the “Allegorical Commentary.” Philo also wrote several treatises on philosophical topics, including providence and the (non-) rationality of animals. In two treatises, Against Flaccus and On the Embassy to Gaius, he recounts in dramatic detail the recent anti-Jewish Alexandrian uprising and the legation to Caligula. In another work, he describes a contemporary group of ascetics (the Therapeutae) who lived by Lake Mareotis, close to Alexandria. These miscellaneous writings could have been written for both Jews and non-Jews. In the Hypothetica, Philo offers a sympathetic account, probably for a critical audience, of Jewish laws and discusses another Jewish group, the *Essenes. Several of his treatises have been lost.

Central to Philo’s thought was his belief in the one, true *God. Although he speaks of a transcendent God far removed from the sensible, mortal world, Philo also refers to the soul as God’s abode. Philo’s God is both personal – the God of *Abraham, *Isaac, and *Jacob – and abstract: the Existent (in Greek, to on). Both concepts are supported by *Exodus 3:14–15 (Greek), in which the God of the patriarchs reveals His name as ho ōn, He who is. Discussing the interaction between God and creation, Philo mentions different intermediaries, most prominently the Logos and God’s creative and kingly powers. For Philo, the height of human happiness was to “see God” – not what He is (impossible to know), but that He is (On Rewards and Punishments 44) – with the eyes not of the body but of the soul.

Deeply influenced by Platonic thought and Greek exegetical methods, Philo distinguished between body and soul and the sensible and intellectual worlds. Especially known for his allegorical interpretations of the *Bible, in which he presents Scripture’s deeper meaning, Philo viewed Scripture as a symbolic account of the soul’s quest to see God and the soul’s battle against the passions. For example, Israel’s exodus from Egypt symbolizes the soul leaving behind the “land” of the body, senses, and passions. The war among the kings in Genesis 14 represents the conflict between the four passions and five senses, which ends when reason, symbolized by *Abraham, intervenes. With its view of a universal, symbolic meaning underlying the particular biblical details, Philo’s thought is marked by a tension between the universal and the particular. This tension is also reflected in his use of general Greek philosophy to explain particular Jewish traditions and his apparent openness to the wise and virtuous of all nations, on one hand, and his fervent loyalty to the Jews, on the other.

Although Philo is the most famous representative of Hellenistic Judaism, he had many predecessors who produced a rich Jewish literature in Greek based on the Greek Bible (the *Septuagint). Among these predecessors were Aristobolus, whose writings survive in fragments, and the author of the *Letter of Aristeas, both of whom interpreted the Bible symbolically. Alexandria itself was home to a vibrant Jewish community for centuries under the rule of the *Ptolemies (323–30 BCE; see also PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT). After the Romans took over in 30 BCE and later during Philo’s lifetime, relations between Jews and their neighbors deteriorated, and Philo is our chief witness to the contemporary violence, which some scholars call the first *pogrom. Christians appreciated Philo’s idea of the Logos; his symbolic approach to Scripture and his writings, preserved by the Church, had a stronger influence on *Christianity (see CHURCH FATHERS) than on Judaism. The Rabbis do not refer to Philo, perhaps more unintentionally than deliberately, because he wrote in Greek rather than Hebrew or *Aramaic and focused on philosophical instead of practical, legal issues. A probable contemporary of *Hillel and Jesus, the pre-rabbinic and nonrabbinic Philo was nonetheless deeply committed to the Jewish people, their beliefs, and their practices. In a well-known passage (On the Migration of Abraham 89–93), he declares it essential not only to recognize the symbolic value of the laws but also to follow these laws in practice. After *Josephus (37–ca. 100 CE), Philo was not mentioned again until 1573, in Azariah dei *Rossi's The Light of the Eyes. Despite this long neglect, in recent years Philo has gained more attention in Jewish studies.

The standard English translation of Philo's works is by F. C. Colson, G. H. Whitaker, and Ralph Marcus, trans., Philo in Ten Volumes (and Two Supplementary Volumes); 1929–62). For a general bibliography and for recent studies on Philo as a Jew, see E. Birnbaum, "Two Millennia Later: General Resources and Particular Perspectives on Philo the Jew," Currents in Biblical Research 4 (2006): 241–76.

ELLEN BIRNBAUM

Philosophy: See THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MODERN

Phoenicia; Phoenicians. Phoenicians is the Greek name for the Semitic-language-speaking people who, beginning in the Iron Age, lived in the area of the eastern Mediterranean stretching from northern *Canaan to southern *Syria and inland to the mountains of Lebanon. Less a unified nation than a collection of independent city-states (the most prominent being Arwad, Byblos, Sidon, and Tyre), Phoenicia was most well known for its seafaring mercantile economy, and particularly for its trade in timber, luxury goods and crafts, and purple dye. The Phoenicians largely fell under the control of various regional powers from the mid-ninth to the early sixth century BCE, but experienced a renewal under the *Persians, who made extensive use of their fleets. During this era, the Phoenician colony city of Carthage in *North Africa was founded. An era of power struggles and relative decline followed, culminating in the complete loss of autonomy to *Rome in 64 BCE. 1 *Kings notes that *Solomon entered into economic and political alliances with Hiram of Tyre, leading most notably to Solomon's use of Tyrean goods and craftspeople for the construction of the first *Jerusalem *Temple (1 Kgs 5–7). Additionally, several prophetic oracles speak of and against the Phoenicians (e.g., Ezek 26–28; Isa 23). Their religion is not well understood, but it appears to have had similarities to *Canaanite practices. Its most infamous aspect was the widely reported practice of child sacrifice. Biblical and Greek polemics obscure the issue, but the discovery in Carthage of a tophet, or sacred precinct (cf. Jer 7), containing burned remains of infants and small children appears to verify the practice, even if the children sacrificed quite possibly were victims of the high infant mortality rates of the period. For further reading, see G. E. Markoe, Phoenicians (2000). Map 2

SEAN BURT

Photography has influenced political, environmental, and social change at the same time as culture, environment, and technology have shaped the development of photography. Technological innovations have transformed photography from early daguerreotypes on polished silver plates, to glass negatives, to film, and, most recently, to digital images on computers. Equipment has varied from large-view cameras on tripods, to tiny rangefinders such as the Leica, to the 35-mm single lens reflex with interchangeable lenses. At first, photography was considered a scientific process, but later artistic influences included the Pre-Raphaelites, the Arts and Crafts movement, the Impressionists, and the Surrealists.

From its beginnings, photography, which lacked a formal academic structure, was a venture open to anyone regardless of age, religion, or gender. From a Jewish perspective the field was open because *halakhic authorities did not consider a photograph a graven image. The rise of photography in the second half of the nineteenth century also paralleled a move toward secularism in Jewish life; most early Jewish photographers appear not to have incorporated Jewish subject matter into their work.

The daguerreotype was invented in France in 1839. This new technology quickly traveled across Europe and was brought to the *United States by Samuel F. B. Morse. The first Jewish American photographer, Solomon Carvalho (1815–1897), was born into a *Sephardic family in *Charleston, South Carolina. He studied the daguerreotype technique under Morse. Carvalho served as photographer on John Charles Fremont's expedition (1853–54) to find a route for the first transcontinental railroad (see also ART, AMERICAN; BEFORE 1940).

In Europe, Jewish photographers can be dated back to Hermann Gunther Biouw (1804–1850) and his sister Johanna Biouw in *Germany who made daguerreotype portraits. Johanna established her own clientele as a Wanderdaguerreotypistin (itinerant daguerreotypist) in 1848. Berthe Wehnert-Beckmann (1815–1901) had established herself as an itinerant daguerreotypist in southern Prussia by age twenty-eight, likely making her the world's first female Jewish professional photographer.

In a number of locales, such as the western provinces of *Russia, Jews operated photography studios and served Gentile as well as Jewish clients. As Jeffrey Shandler has noted, photography facilitated new cultural practices. The taking of pictures marked significant milestones in people's lives, and the photographs served as tokens of remembrance among an increasingly mobile population. In addition, posing for photographs enabled subjects to fashion new images of themselves, including fantasies realized through the use of the various props and backdrops available at photography studios.

Photographic images became increasingly important in shaping Jewish popular culture at the beginning of the twentieth century. New printing techniques facilitated the mass production of picture postcards, which became widely popular across Europe and in America. Among the vast array of images to appear on these cards were many hundreds related to Jewish life, from portraits of famous Jewish authors to the facades of synagogue buildings, as well as images of archetypal Jewish figures and biblical scenes. In addition to their use in correspondence and their appeal as collectibles, postcards engendered new kinds of cultural interactions (Shandler).

Jews also played a significant role in the shaping of the photographic image in the larger culture. The acceptance of photography as an art form in the early 1900s was due to the efforts of Alfred Stieglitz (1864–1946), particularly his work on behalf of artistic photographers and his guidance concerning the formation of the Photo-Secession, a group of American photographers supporting the creative use of the camera. With Stieglitz, Paul Strand (1890–1976), who helped found the Photo League in New York City, introduced Modernism into twentieth-century photography.

The general introduction of 35-mm film in the 1930s and the subsequent use of cameras with interchangeable lenses enabled a new generation of photographers to bring a faster, more informal style to photography. In Germany, the photojournalist Erich Salomon (1886–1944) was among the first to use a miniature camera, allowing him to quietly capture people unposed and unaware of the photograph being made. Based on his technique, The London Graphic coined the term “candid camera.” Robert Capa (1913–1954), born André Friedmann in Hungary, earned the title, “The Greatest Photographer in the World,” for his derring-do during the Spanish Civil War. He was among the first wave of soldiers storming the beaches on D-Day, June 6, 1944. He and David (Chim) Seymour (1911–1956) established the photo agency Magnum. Capa served as president of Magnum for three years before he was killed by a landmine while covering the war in Indochina in 1954. Capa’s brother, Cornell (1918–2008), established the International Center for Photography in New York City. Arthur Fellig (1899–1968), better known as Weegee, gained distinction as the first photographer to respond to crime scenes with the aid of his police scanner.

Social documentary attracted many Jewish photographers whose concern for recording the human condition dominated their work. Arthur Rothstein (1915–1985) and Ben Shahn (1898–1969) worked for the Farm Security Administration during the 1930s to make visual records of the impact of the Great Depression and to expedite aid to stricken Americans. Roman Vishniac (1897–1990) photographed Jewish urban life and scenes from the doomed Jewish villages of Eastern Europe before his immigration to America.

Other European photographers who came to the United States before World War II include Alfred Eisenstaedt (1898–1995), who became a celebrated Life Magazine photographer famous for the photograph of the kiss in Times Square on V-J Day in 1945. Swiss-born Robert Frank (b. 1924) traveled across the United States in the 1950s and published The Americans, a cynical look at his adopted country that contributed to a new form of work often referred to as street photography. (Other Jewish photographers in this genre include Lee Friedlander [b. 1934], Garry Winogrand [1928–1984], William Klein [b. 1928], Helen Leavitt [b. 1913], and Walter Rosenblum [1919–2000]). Lotte Jacobi (1896–1990), a fourth-generation photographer whose photographic roots went back to the daguerreotype, was known for her psychologically acute portraits of famous artists, scientists, and politicians. Hungarian-born André Kertész (1894–1985) is considered a seminal figure of photojournalism, the photo essay, and artistic photography. Man Ray (1890–1976), born Emmanuel Radnisky in Brooklyn, New York, moved to Paris where he sketched, painted, sculpted, and established a photo studio. His experimentation resulted in the Rayograph – a form of camera-less photography.

Important photographers of the post-World War II era include Mary Ellen Mark (b. 1940), who photographs diverse cultures and people around the world for magazines, exhibitions, and books; Bruce Davidson (b. 1933), who created photographic explorations of the civil rights movement (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT), the subterranean world of the New York subway system, and Spanish Harlem; and Joel Meyerowitz (b. 1938), known for his photographs of New York City and landscapes of Italy and Massachusetts.

New York City produced many Jewish fashion photographers, including Lillian Bassman (b. 1917), Richard Avedon (1923–2004), and Irving Penn (1917–2009). Avedon created a large portfolio of portraits, employing a style where the subject stood facing the camera in front of a white background. Penn also favored a simple background, whereas Bassman brought drama to her prints. Diane Arbus (1923–1971) began her career as a fashion photographer, but became a central figure in contemporary documentary photography with her direct, confrontational human depictions. Elliott Erwitt (b. 1928) is known for the humor he finds while photographing candid, everyday settings.

Annie Liebowitz (b. 1949) became well known beginning in the 1980s when she was photographing celebrities for Rolling Stone magazine. During his sixty-year career Arnold Newman (1918–2006) photographed presidents, artists, actors, and writers. He is credited with popularizing the environmental portrait that demonstrated personality and character by placing the subject within his or her usual surroundings. Richard Misrach’s (b. 1949) color landscapes explore human influences on the environment. Digital technology has allowed him to create large images, some as large as 6 × 10 feet. Arthur Ollman (b. 1947), who creates color landscapes at night, served as the first director of the Museum of Photographic Arts. For further reading, see G. Gilbert, The Illustrated Worldwide Who’s Who of Jews in Photography (1996); and N. Rosenblum, A World History of Photography (1984); see also ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940.

CAROLE GLAUBER

Phylacteries: See TEFILLIN

Pidyon Ha-Ben: See FIRSTBORN SON, REDEMPTION OF

Pilgrimage (aliyah la-regel). After the suppression of the Bar Kokhba rebellion in 135 CE, Jews were forbidden by Roman imperial decree to live in or even enter Jerusalem. Late ancient Christian sources suggest, however, that they were permitted to visit the city on the 9th of Av (*Tisha B’Av) to lament the destruction of the Temple. Karaite sources mention that under Roman-Byzantine rule Jewish pilgrims were restricted to less significant sites in Palestine, such as Tiberias in the Galilee, Gaza, or Zoar (near the Dead Sea).

MEDIEVAL PERIOD: These limitations were removed during the Muslim period (638–1099), and many Jews made pilgrimages to Jerusalem. Some sources speak of people coming annually from as far as Iraq, the coast of North Africa, and Italy. During the month of Tishri and especially during the festival of Tabernacles (*Sukkot), Jewish pilgrims from both Muslim regions and Christian Europe assembled on the Mount of Olives to pray and perform a ritual walk around the perimeter of the Temple mount, reciting prayers at each gate. The heads of the Jerusalem yeshivah and other Jewish dignitaries from Muslim countries attended this central pilgrimage event, which was used as an opportunity for public announcements, such as an annual reassertion of the rabbinic ban on Karaism (Gil).

Unlike pilgrimages to the *Temple in pre-exilic and Second Temple times that were made to fulfill a biblical decree (Deut 16:16), medieval Jewish pilgrimages were not focused on Jerusalem alone. Sahal ben Matzliaḥ, a tenth-century Karaite writer, in a critique of rabbinic Jews and their practices, describes Jewish pilgrimages to the graves of deceased Jewish dignitaries in the *Galilee for healing purposes. This custom intensified after the establishment of the Latin Crusader Kingdom of Jerusalem in 1099, when Christian authorities prohibited the public ritual aspects of Jewish pilgrimage and pilgrimage became an individual matter. Because Jews were again banned from permanent settlement in Jerusalem, other cities like *Hebron, especially the Cave of the Patriarchs and Matriarchs (me'arat ha-makhpelah), became preferred pilgrimage destinations. Visits to the tombs of luminaries for personal supplication were common until at least the end of the Mamluk period in the early sixteenth century, and they remained an ongoing aspect of Jewish pilgrimage, especially in the Muslim world, well into the twentieth century.

Several medieval accounts of pilgrimages to the Land of Israel (and elsewhere) written by Jews have survived. The three most notable are those of the Iberian *Benjamin of Tudela and the German Petahiah of Regensburg, both of the twelfth century, and the thirteenth-century writings of Jacob ben Nathanel ha-Cohen, from southern *France. These *travel writings make clear that the motivations for pilgrimage were not only pietistic and religious; for medieval Jews, pilgrimage was also an opportunity for *tourism and adventure. Pilgrimage accounts indicate that medieval travelers frequented a number of Jewish sites in Palestine, both in Jerusalem and elsewhere. In a 1267 letter written from Jerusalem to his son, Moses *Nahmanides commented, "Continually people crowd into Jerusalem, men and women, from Damascus, Zohah [Aleppo], and from all parts of the country, to see the Sanctuary and to mourn there" (F. Kobler, ed., Letters of Jews through the Ages [1952], 1:226). Cairo *Genizah documents also reveal that women were among the Jews who visited holy shrines and made pilgrimages to Jerusalem and elsewhere; widows, in particular, had significant freedom of movement (S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society: The Family [1978], 3:338). The identification of holy sites for pilgrimage served also as a polemical point of debate in the ongoing debate between medieval Jews and Christians (Reiner).

Jews also made pilgrimages in their respective countries of settlement. Some accounts from the Rhineland mention journeys to the grave site of Rabbi *Judah the Pious in Regensburg (see ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ), as well as to the graves of the martyrs killed during the First *Crusade of 1096 (Shoham-Steiner). Tombs of holy men and of male and female martyrs were also popular pilgrimage sites in Middle Eastern countries (Zenner, Stillman).

MODERN PERIOD: Pilgrimages to tombs have remained an aspect of Jewish popular religion, particularly among men and women of *Mizraḥi (Middle Eastern) and *Sephardic origins; many believe that such visits may prompt the deceased to intercede between the supplicant and *God. Similar beliefs and practices are held by the *Ḥasidim within *Ashkenazic Jewry, but generally not by other Ashkenazic Jews.

For further reading, see M. Gil, "The Aliya and Pilgrimage in the Early Arab Period," in The Jerusalem Cathedra 3, ed. L. Levine (1983), 163–73; E. Reiner, "Traditions of Holy Places in Medieval Palestine: Oral versus Written," in Offerings from Jerusalem: Portrayals of Holy Places by Jewish Artists, ed. R. Sarfati (2002), 9–19; E. Shoham-Steiner, "For a Prayer in That Place Would Be Most Welcome": Jews, Holy Shrines and Miracles – A New Approach," Viator 37 (2006): 369–95; S. Sered, Women as Ritual Experts (1996); and W. P. Zenner, "Saints and Piecemeal Supernaturalism among the Jerusalem Sephardim," Anthropological Quarterly 38(4) (1965): 201–17; and see TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD.

EPHRAIM SHOHAM-STEINER

Pinsker, Leon (Lev, or Yehudah Leib; 1821–1891), a doctor and expert in pathology, emerged in the last decade of his life as the chair of the central committee of the proto-*Zionist organization, Hovevei Zion. He was born in Tomaszow and died in Odessa; his father was a Jewish educator in Odessa and a *Karaite specialist. Leon Pinsker's Jewish involvements were originally liberal and integrationist. The *pogroms of 1881–82, however, inspired him to write the anguished German-language pamphlet, Autoemancipation (1882). As the informal leader of Russia's Jewish nationalists before the 1884 formal establishment of Hovevei Zion, and then as its organizational head until his death, he sought to achieve formal governmental recognition of the body, to organize its fundraising, and to mediate between its religious and nonreligious members. Much to his frustration, none of these tasks was accomplished with unequivocal success.

Pinsker is best remembered for Autoemancipation, in which he described the Jews as a ghostlike people without the concrete trappings of nationhood; indestructible, they would continue to inspire unease until they found themselves a home. For further reading see David Vital, The Origins of Zionism (1975).

STEVEN J. ZIPPERSTEIN

Piyyut/Piyyutim: See POETRY, LITURGICAL (PIYYUT)

Poetry, Biblical: See BIBLE: POETRY

Poetry: Britain. Isaac Rosenberg (1890–1918) was the first Anglo-Jewish poet to write explicitly Jewish verse in English. Poems, such as "The Burning of the Temple," "The Destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonian Hordes," and "Through These Pale Cold Days," reflect on Jewish history and a *Zionist future by "the pools of Hebron again." Rosenberg also wrote an unfinished play in verse, Moses, in which Hebrew slaves are inducted into "some newer nature, a consciousness/ Like naked light seizing the all-eyed soul." Despite these themes, Rosenberg is read mainly as a *World War I poet.

Rosenberg's Modernist emphasis is also found in the poems of John Rodker (1894–1955). Significantly, Rodker told Ezra Pound that he had "no history to speak of." Unlike Rosenberg, Rodker did not write explicitly about Jewishness. Rather, he wrote poems, plays, and novels as an outsider, someone who felt exilic as a Jew in England. In his autobiography, Memoirs of Other Fronts (1932), Rodker stated, "In Paris I feel English, in London a foreigner." His intense, often imagistic poems stress alienation and the elaborate masks that modernity compels people to wear. Pound believed that Rodker's poetic novel Adolphe 1920 (1929) marked a notable "development" from James Joyce's Ulysses (1922). Other, less influential Anglo-Jewish poets at work between the wars include Lazarus Aaronson, A. Abrahams, Gilbert Frankau (son of the Victorian Anglo-Jewish novelist Julia Frankau), Louis Golding, Joseph Leftwich, Julius Lipton, James Singer, and Humbert Wolfe.

In the wake of *World War II, Anglo-Jewish poets became more assertive. After the *Holocaust, poets such as Jon Silkin (1930–1997), Philip Hobsbaum (1932–2005), and Elaine Feinstein (b. 1930) felt compelled to reconsider their English and Jewish identities. The Welsh poet Dannie Abse (b. 1923) expressed a widely held view when in "White Balloon," he wrote, "Dear love, Auschwitz made me/ more of a Jew than Moses did." Silkin wrote "A Prayer Cup," which features "wine," in a figure of Christian transubstantiation, changing to "three inches of the blood/ of six million." Meanwhile, Hobsbaum ironically recorded the lessons learned at the "University of Auschwitz" in his poem, "Professor Grottmann Explains Everything." Feinstein, too, wrote of feeling "like someone/ who has escaped too lightly/ from the great hell of the camps" and then added, "except that I don't altogether escape" ("Lisson Grove").

Beginning in the 1960s, several women added their voices to Anglo-Jewish verse. Elaine Feinstein harked back to an important Anglo-Jewish forebear in the eponymous "Amy Levy" (see LITERATURE: BRITAIN). The poem has Levy (1861–1889) question Feinstein in a dream: "Here, it is my name that makes me strange./ A hundred years on, is it still the same?" Thus, Feinstein pessimistically suggests that "a hundred years on" the situation of Anglo-Jewish women poets is, indeed, "the same." Among other contemporary women poets, Ruth Fainlight (b. 1931), Karen Gershon (1923–1993), Lotte Kramer (b. 1923), Gerda Mayer (b. 1927), Jenny Joseph (b. 1932), and Joanne Limburg (b. 1970) merit attention.

Gershon, Kramer, and Mayer share some history because all three poets were *Kindertransport refugees from continental Europe. Much of their poetry concerns this childhood flight from *Nazism; for example, Gershon's "The Children's Exodus," Kramer's "Dover Harbour," and Mayer's "The Emigration Game – Winter 1938/39." Fainlight stands in interesting contrast to Feinstein. Whereas the latter celebrates her exilic freedom (indeed, she has written three poems with the title and theme of "Exile"), Fainlight tends not to romanticize her Jewishness in this way. Rather, Fainlight presents Jewishness as unchosen displacement (see, for instance, "Vertical"), with poetry and other arts offering a safe aesthetic space where the pressure of dominant cultures may be provisionally eased and contained (see, for example, "With David in the Nimrud Galleries," "Paradise," and "Green"). Exile is also a concern of Jenny Joseph. Her poem "An Exile in Devon" is situated among "English country lanes," a locale in which the speaker feels "very lonely." Here the poem's persona cannot relate to her insular English friend who "never has known greater danger than/ All who watch tides and storms in a peaceful country." Yearning for a shared emotional landscape, the speaker poignantly states, "I ache for the misery I fight against." By contrast, "Warning" is set "in the street," far from rural England. This poem celebrates difference and nonconformity: "When I am an old woman I shall wear purple/ With a red hat which doesn't go, and doesn't suit me." Here Joseph's persona exalts in chutzpah and personal freedom: She plans to "gobble up samples in shops" and leave her English friends "shocked and surprised." According to BBC polls, "Warning" remains a favorite poem of the English reading public. Like Joseph, Joanne Limburg brings humor to bear on her situation as an English Jew. Poems such as "Mother Chicken Soup" and "The Nose on My Face" tackle stereotypes surrounding the "Jewish mother" and Jewish women in England. The former poem concludes with the speaker's mother boiling herself in a pot of chicken soup. Her (suicide) note reads, "I don't expect gratitude -/ Only that you should do as much/ for your own children./ Turn me up to 150/ When you get in. Mum." Humorously, "The Nose on My Face" lists ways in which Jewish women are negatively portrayed in English culture and society and satirizes English hypocrisy about such stereotypes.

Among other poets deploying humor to evoke their sense of dislocation from mainstream Englishness are Daniel Weissbort (b. 1935), Bernard Kops (b. 1926), and Michael Rosen (b. 1946). For example, Weissbort's "So English," "The Name's Progress," and "My Country" wittily evoke childhood alienation in the midst of popular patriotism and expectations that British Jews should assimilate. Irony abounds in Weissbort's verse; for example, "With nostalgia, I remember/ 'Onward Christian Soldiers' and/ 'To be a Pilgrim'" ("Memories of War"). By contrast, Bernard Kops expresses earnest nostalgia for the lost London of the Jewish East End: "Belonging – we belonged./ Poverty came later,/ when most of us did well/ and moved away" ("Passover '38"). Kops' humor is informed by melancholy, together with memories of Hitler: "a madman on the radio, far away." Michael Rosen is probably best known as a children's writer; again, many of his poems concern childhood experiences. Regarding *antisemitism in English society ("New School") and literature ("English Literature"), Rosen is unflinchingly perceptive. However, it is Emanuel Litvinoff (b. 1915) who has probably written the most powerful poem about English literary antisemitism: "To T.S. Eliot."

Several acclaimed Anglo-Jewish poets are also translators, notably Michael Hamburger (b. 1924) of German, Richard Burns (b. 1943) of Serbian, and George Szirtes (b. 1948) of Hungarian verse. Other accomplished poets, such as Nobel Laureate Harold Pinter (1930–2008) and Micheline Wandor (b. 1940), are better known as playwrights (see LITERATURE: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN). Similarly, Jonathan Treitel (b. 1959) is an acclaimed novelist while also a respected poet.

PETER LAWSON

Poetry, Holocaust: See HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY

Poetry, Liturgical (Piyyut). Piyyut (pl. piyyutim) refers to a poem created to substitute for, adorn, or preface a passage from the Jewish *liturgy or a liturgical rite. The Hebrew term derives from the Greek ποιητής (something made, created), which is related to the English word "poetry."

The term “piyyut” first appears in Rabbinic Hebrew, indicating an awareness that these works differed in form and idiom from biblical poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY) and the biblicalizing poetry of the *Second Temple period. The genre may have its roots within Hebrew literature, perhaps as an intensified form of *midrashic (prose) rhetoric; other elements, however, suggest a complicated relationship with contemporaneous Christian liturgical poetry. Unlike biblical poetry, piyyutim typically employ end-rhyme, quote explicitly from textual sources, allude to midrash, and consist of complicated multi-poem forms. Piyyutim display deep familiarity with rabbinic traditions of interpretation, and their many rhetorical features, such as metonymy, resemble *midrashic methods of reading. Originally, piyyutim occupied the place of statutory prayers; poems were interwoven with liturgical formulas, as well as allusions to the weekly *Torah reading and contemporary events. As the texts of the prayers became fixed, poems were used to frame the standardized wordings rather than replacing them.

The earliest piyyutim (ca. fourth and fifth centuries CE) were composed primarily for *Tisha B’Av and the *High Holidays; these poems embellished specific liturgical moments, such as the *shofar or avodah services (see WORSHIP), or they developed topical themes such as penitence or mourning. In their classical period (fifth to seventh centuries CE), the majority of piyyutim adorned the blessings of the *Sabbath and festival amidah (standing prayer). These poems assume the so-called triennial cycle of Torah readings typical in the Land of Israel and have proven critical in reconstructing the ancient lectionary, including the haftarah* cycle. As the Babylonian (annual) lectionary became more widespread, and the text of the amidah became standardized, piyyutim embellishing the shema* (affirmation of divine unity) and its blessings became increasingly popular. Eventually, poets throughout the Jewish world were composing for almost all liturgical occasions, including *marriages and *circumcisions. As the liturgy became standardized, local selections of piyyutim often served to distinguish various rites from one another.

Although the Babylonian *Geonim initially resisted the liturgical variation and diversity introduced by piyyutim, over time they came to accommodate to their extremely popular use. In the Middle Ages, piyyutim developed along distinctive trajectories in medieval *Ashkenaz and *Sepharad. Ashkenazic poetry amplified the complex styles typical of the classical piyyutim, emphasizing ornate forms, opaque allusions to the *Bible and rabbinic traditions, and clever but artificial grammatical constructions. Medieval Sephardic poets rejected the conventions of classical piyyut in favor of a more lyrical aesthetic and innovated by introducing Arabic meter. In the later Middle Ages, piyyutim incorporating kabbalistic themes (see KABBALAH) became popular in both Sephardic and Ashkenazic *prayer books.

Piyyutim are not only beautiful literary works in their own right but they also shed light on numerous aspects of Jewish culture through the centuries. They reveal dramatic literary developments in Hebrew poetics and *aesthetics; indicate the complex development and experience of the Jewish prayer service; intersect in tantalizing ways with early *synagogue art and early Christian hymnography; and suggest much about the creation and transmission of rabbinic aggadah in the popular synagogue context in Jewish antiquity and the Middle Ages. For further reading, see L. S. Lieber, Yannai on Genesis: An Invitation to Piyyut (2010). LAURA S. LIEBER

Poetry, Medieval: Christian Europe. In *Italy, Hebrew rhymes on lapidaries date from the late seventh to early eighth centuries. Southern Italian Jews had preserved liturgical poetry (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) by the sixth-century poet Eleazar ben Kallir and new compositions did not appear until the ninth century. Early paytanim (composers of piyyutim) include Shefatiah, his son Amitai, and Silano. By the mid-tenth century, piyyutim flourished in central and northern Italy, composed by poets such as Solomon ha-Bavli and Meshullam bar Kalonymos. Italian paytanim adhered to Palestinian exemplars, but they were also innovative, devising a new “word meter” that would become popular in later *Ashkenazic piyyutim. They composed piyyutim for sections of the *liturgy without Kallirian exemplars, chiefly the Yotser and Ma’ariv. These traditions traveled to the Rhineland of *Germany with Meshullam bar Kalonymos, who was purportedly enticed by Charlemagne to settle in Mainz.

Early Italian Jewish poets also used Hebrew for nonliturgical literature. The works of Shabbetai Donnolo, the ninth-century physician (see MEDICINE) and metaphysician, had a long life. A macaronic Italian and Hebrew song from the tenth century documents early Jewish participation in the Sicilian slave trade. Immanuel of Rome (ca. 1261–ca. 1332) introduced the sonnet to Hebrew soon after its appearance in Italian (1300), but disapproval of Immanuel’s profane subject matter drove the Hebrew sonnet underground for another two centuries. By Immanuel’s time, poets had abandoned the heavy aesthetic of Palestinian piyyut for the lighter elegance of Spanish Hebrew verse (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; SPAIN, MUSLIM). Immanuel also adapted the quantitative metrics of Spanish Hebrew, paving the way for the stress-syllabic meters that would characterize later Hebrew poetry in Europe. Other poets from this later period include Moses da Rieti (1388–after 1460), who introduced the terza rima into Hebrew and whose Mikdash Me’at (Little Sanctuary) was inspired by Dante’s Divine Comedy. The lament of Moses Remos (ca. 1406–1430), a Majorcan-born physician living in *Sicily, was written just before his execution in Sicily on charges of poisoning a patient.

Italian Jewish poetry, with its Palestinian traditions, made its way into *Germany with the migration of southern Italian Jews in the mid-tenth century. This explains why German (*Ashkenazic) Jewish practice preserved Palestinian texts and customs that survived nowhere else in Europe. Early Ashkenaz paytanim include Meshullam bar Kalonymos, Simon bar Isaac bar Abun, *Gershon Meor ha-Golah of Mainz (“Light of the Exile”; ca. 960–1028), and Meir bar Isaac Shatz (“Nehorai”). Often linked to these poets is Joseph ben Samuel Tov Elem (= Bonfils) in Limoges, an indication of early Ashkenazic hegemony over the Jewish communities of France (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES). Ashkenazic reverence for Kallir and his early Italian successors inspired a unique genre, the piyyut commentary, a largely unpublished literature. Ashkenazic Jews, seeking new sites in the *liturgy to embellish poetically, produced a prolific corpus of the penitential genres known as seliḥot and kinnot (sing., seliḥah, kinnah). After the First Crusade attacks on Jewish Rhineland communities (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES), poetic laments commemorated the victims. The Ashkenazic seliḥot and kinnot that memorialize Jewish suicide-martyrs embody Jewish ideals of resistance and faith while embedding historical details in verse, a new development in European Hebrew poetry.

The evidence for secular poetry in Ashkenaz is virtually nonexistent, although songs, stories, and poems presumably had their place in communal life. Among surviving religious poetry are works associated with the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz*, or German pietists. The great mystical poem, “Shir ha-Yihud” (Poem of [Divine] Union) is attributed to their founder, Judah the Pious*; Judah’s grandson, Eleazar ben Judah of Worms, the Rokeaḥ; ca. 1165–ca. 1230), composed a moving elegy describing the murder of his wife and daughters (see WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES).

Although scholars have largely considered French Jewry part of Ashkenaz, its poetic legacy is distinct. By the early twelfth century, Troyes, home to the renowned Solomon bar Isaac (Rashi*, d. 1105), was a magnet for Jewish scholars. Rashi and his grandsons, the Tosafist* exegetes Samuel ben Meir (the Rashbam, ca. 1055–ca. 1174) and Jacob ben Meir (Rabbenu Tam, d. 1171), were also poets, although poetry did not figure centrally in their intellectual universe and was less emphasized as a mature occupation than it was among German Jews. Some French poets, like Rabbenu Tam, and some Ashkenazic poets who studied in France, like Ephraim of Regensburg or Meir of Rothenberg*, show an awareness of Spanish styles. Meir of Rothenberg (d. 1293) was in Paris in the early 1240s when the Talmud was burned following its trial for blasphemy. His lament, “Ask, O You who have been burned in fire,” which is still recited on Tisha B’Av*, was modeled on Judah Halevi*’s beloved poem, “Zion, won’t you ask about the fate of your captives?”

French rabbis also composed penitential seliḥot and kinnot with martyrological* themes; many commemorate incidents of judicial execution, reflecting the changing tenor of anti-Jewish violence during the thirteenth century. Judah bar Jacob composed a double set of kinnot in response to the burning of thirteen Jews in Troyes in 1288; one in Judeo-French attests to a largely lost tradition of vernacular composition. (A macaronic wedding song in Hebrew and Judeo-French also survives.) Yom Tov Joigny, who composed a lament for the martyrs of Blois (1171), was among the two hundred martyrs of York (1191 [see MARTYRDOM]). After the expulsion of 1306, traces of French Jewish poetry survive in Provence and Catalonia and, after the final expulsion of 1394, in northern Italy.

England was home to several thousand Jews from the mid-twelfth century until their expulsion in 1290 (see ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES). Most of this community originated in Normandy and retained strong ties to French Jewish tradition. Although very little remains of their literature, at least two thirteenth-century poets are known: Meir ben Elias of Norwich and Jacob of London. Scholars debate whether Berekhiah ha-Nakdan, the author of a lively Hebrew collection of fox tales, a popular medieval genre of animal stories, was an English Jew.

Provence is usually treated as a cultural satellite of Spain. Languedoc became French in 1224, but Provence proper, south of the Rhone, was not annexed until the late fifteenth century. Twelfth-century Spanish refugees to Provence, like Joseph Kimḥi* (ca. 1105–ca. 1170), brought with them a highly developed interest in biblical grammar*, exegesis, and elegant Hebrew verse. Kimḥi’s Bible commentaries* contain poetic prefaces, and he wrote didactic and liturgical poems. The late-thirteenth-century Gascon exile, Isaac ha-Gorni, has been called Provence’s Hebrew “troubadour”; his extant lyrics depict his travels through the Jewish communities of Provence and his clashes with local notables and poets (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES).

The piyyutim of Isaac ha-Seniri (d. after 1229) and Zerahiah ha-Levi (ca. 1125–?) were beloved in Provence for centuries; others, by Solomon Melguerri and Reuben bar Isaac of Montpellier, were later transplanted by exiles to North Africa*. Abraham Bedersi (mid-thirteenth century to after 1290) and his son Jedaiah (ca. 1270–after 1306) wrote polemical, philosophical, and moralistic verse. Jedaiah, and perhaps his father, composed eccentric forms of alliterative verse; Jedaiah also authored a rhymed philosophical meditation, Beḥinat ‘Olam (Examination of the World), one of the most popular medieval Hebrew books, as well as a unique Hebrew poetic treatise, Sefer ha-Pardes (The Book of the Orchard). Other unusual poetic works include the Hebrew and Judeo-Provençal Esther verse romances of Crescas (Israel) Caslari (d. after 1357) and the Evel Rabbati (The Great Mourning) of Jacob ben Solomon, which describes his daughter’s death from plague in 1382.

In the mid-twelfth century, increasing areas of Muslim Spain returned to Christian rule. The bridge figure for this period is Abraham ibn Ezra* (ca. 1093–ca. 1167). With the Berber invasions of the Muslim South, he began his peregrinations through North Africa, Italy, Provence, France, and England. A stylist and grammarian, as well as a composer of sacred and secular verse, Ibn Ezra introduced the poetic forms and meters of Spanish Hebrew into Christian lands. The popular maqama evolved in Christian Spain to reflect the interests of the vernacular romance (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN). Joseph ibn Zabara, Judah ibn Shabbetai, Judah al-Ḥarizi (an émigré in Provence), Jacob ben Elazar, Shem Tov ibn Falaquera, and Isaac ibn Sahula all composed maqamot of enduring appeal. Christian Spain also produced kabbalistic poets, like the biblical exegete Moses ben Naḥman (Naḥmanides* or the Ramban; 1194–1270) and Meshullam Dapiera (early thirteenth century to after 1260; see KABBALAH). The visionary author of the Sefer ha-Ot (Book of the Letter), Abraham Abulafia* (1240–ca. 1291) wandered through Palestine, Greece*, and Italy; his legendary journey to Rome in 1288 to convert the Pope nearly ended in his death.

Among secular poets of later thirteenth-century Christian Spain* is Todros Abulafia (1247–after 1300), who belonged to the circle of poets, scholars, and translators at the court of Alfonso X (the Wise) of Castile. His poetry addresses an astonishing diversity of themes, including the romance topos of “spiritual love.” Shem Tov Arduel, or Santob de Carrión (late thirteenth century to after 1345), wrote a Hebrew maqama (Milḥemet ha-Et ve-ha-Misparayim [The Battle of the Pen and Scissors]) and the Spanish Proverbios morales. However, by the late fourteenth century, Hebrew poetry, like its authors, was under siege. Approximately two-thirds of Spanish Jewry converted after the 1391 pogroms*. The poets known as the Adat Nogrim (Band of Singers) continued to write, some as Christians. Solomon Dapiera (1340s–after 1417) converted in 1413–14 after the Disputation of Tortosa; Vidal Benveniste, his student, remained a Jew. Solomon ha-Levi (baptized Pablo de Santa Maria, ca. 1351–1435), whose *Purim parody in verse was written from a London prison in 1389, converted after 1391. Solomon Bonafed (d. after 1445) remained a Jew. After 1492, the legacy of these poets was carried into exile. A few survivors, such as Judah Uziel of Fez and Nahman Sanbel, a follower of the *messianic pretender, David *Reuveni, continued to write. Over the years, the memory of French and Provençal poetry was overshadowed by the Spanish. Nonetheless, in many Hebrew manuscripts, poems from these traditions await reclamation.

For further reading, see T. Carmi, ed. and trans., Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse (1981); B. Bar Tikvah, "Reciprocity between the Provençal School of Piyyutim and the Schools of Catalonia and Askenazi France," in Rashi: 1040–1990: Hommage à Ephraïm Urbach, ed. G. Sed-Rajna (1993), 375–83; P. Cole, ed. and trans., The Dream of the Poem: Hebrew Poetry from Muslim and Christian Spain 950–1492 (2007); S. L. Einbinder, "Meir b. Elijah of Norwich: Persecution and Poetry among Medieval English Jews," Journal of Medieval History 26(2) (2000): 145–62; idem, Beautiful Death: Jewish Poetry and Martyrdom in Medieval France (2002); and I. Ta-Shema, "Ashkenazi Jewry in the Eleventh Century: Life and Literature," in Ashkenaz: The German Jewish Heritage, ed. G. Hirschler (1987), 20–23.

SUSAN L. EINBINDER

Poetry, Medieval: Muslim World. Nearly all of the Hebrew verse composed during the first centuries of Islam adhered in form and content to a religious poetic model going back to the traditional piyyut (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) of *Byzantine Palestine. It is only with *Saadia Gaon that Hebrew poetry in the Muslim world begins to reflect the Jews' encounter with Islamic civilization. Arabization of the Jewish communities of the Muslim world west of the Iranian plateau and the cosmopolitan intellectual and cultural environment in Baghdad prompted Saadia to create a multifaceted intellectual agenda for the Jewish communities under his guidance. This innovative cultural program placed Hebrew poetry in a position of prominence.

Saadia Gaon and likeminded religious intellectuals were aware that Muslim society held Arabic poetry and its classical language in very high esteem. It also attached great importance to the "inimitable wondrousness" of the Arabic Qur'an. These developments in Arabo-Islamic culture stimulated Jewish reconsideration of the Hebrew *Bible and its classical language, leading to renewal and innovation in Hebrew poetry. Under Saadia, Biblical *Hebrew replaced the decidedly aclassical and inventive Hebrew of the traditional piyyut. He compiled a poetic manual for Hebrew poets as well as a philosophical poem and other nonliturgical verse as part of his revamping of the Jewish higher curriculum. Nevertheless, it fell to the Jewish community in al-Andalus (present-day *Spain), on the western frontier of Islam, to develop Hebrew poetry most fully.

*Dunash ben Labrat, a Moroccan who had ventured eastward to become one of Saadia Gaon's disciples, returned to the Muslim West; in Umayyad Cordoba he developed a Hebrew prosody based on Arabic metrics. Ben Labrat also introduced Arabic-inspired social themes to his new style of Hebrew verse, alongside his ongoing production of liturgical poetry. By the end of the tenth century a more artistically sophisticated generation of Andalusī Hebrew poets had emerged, although several of them stuck firmly to the older liturgical poetic style. However, Andalusī Jewish elites swiftly embraced the new style of Hebrew poetry and supported a class of professional poets who, like their Arabic counterparts, sang the praises of their patrons.

Hebrew poetry was such a cornerstone of the Andalusī Jewish cultural scene that it rapidly became a vehicle for imaginative exercises on various themes, self-expression, and artistic experimentation and was never confined to professional poets. By the third generation, the Andalusī school of Hebrew verse came of age in the towering figure of *Samuel ha-Nagid (d. 1056), the first of the four greatest poets of the period, as well as a rabbinic scholar, communal leader, and high official in the Muslim state of Granada. Samuel mastered the metrical system that Dunash had devised, and he incorporated into Hebrew all of the major themes and genres (e.g., panegyric, wine, love, floral, meditative, lament, gnomic, martial) developed in Arabic poetry. Like Samuel ha-Nagid, each of the three most accomplished poets to follow mastered Andalusī rhetorical conventions and style while developing his own individual voice in a dialectical relationship with poetic tradition. Each poet also found new ways to incorporate language, images, and motifs drawn from social poetry (even including erotic elements that were used to explore the relationship between God and Israel) in his liturgical compositions.

Solomon *ibn Gabirol (d. ca. 1058) was a socially alienated, philosophically minded poet who incorporated Neoplatonic thought into much of his verse. He emphasized the inner spiritual life of the individual in his liturgical compositions, blurring the thematic lines between religious and non-religious Hebrew poetry. Moses *ibn Ezra (d. ca. 1138), two of whose Arabic prose works about Andalusī Hebrew poetry and poetics have also come down to us, was deemed "the penitential poet" by tradition, on account of his large corpus of penitential poems. He is also regarded as the most "conservative" Hebrew poet because he closely followed Arabic verse in form and content. Although the creation of Hebrew poetry in Muslim Spain would not actually end until Saadia ibn Danaan at the end of the sixteenth century, Judah *Halevi (d. 1141) was the last great Hebrew poet of the immediate period who was associated with the Arabic cultural environment. Halevi is almost universally regarded as the most artistically accomplished post-biblical Hebrew poet. His unique lyric sensibility is reflected in social and liturgical verse alike; he created an entirely new genre of Hebrew "sea poems" that serve as a brilliant poetic reflection of his inner turmoil and fervent hope in abandoning Iberia for the Land of Israel. Translations of these poets' work appear in T. Carmi, The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse (1981), and P. Cole, The Dream of the Poem (2007).

In addition to the mono-rhymed Arabic-style Hebrew lyric designed for recitation, from the eleventh century on poets also composed metrically complex strophic poems (in Arabic, muwashshah [girdle poem]) that were sung to musical accompaniment. In their Hebrew incarnations, the piquant concluding segment of this type of poem could be in colloquial Arabic, a romance language, or Hebrew.

Some time after the Arabic literary form of elevated rhymed prose arrived in al-Andalus from the Muslim East, various types of Hebrew rhymed prose narratives interspersed with short poems became popular forms of entertainment as much as vehicles for literary artistry. Judah al-Ḥarizi (thirteenth century), originally from Castile, left Iberia for the Muslim East and composed the Book of Tahkemoni, the classical Hebrew collection of the Arabic maqama genre (rhetorical anecdotes). Among others, the sixteenth-century Yemeni author Zechariah al-Dahiri modeled his own maqama collection after al-Ḥarizi (see also LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN).

From al-Andalus, Hebrew poetry migrated south and east. Because of their renown and prestige, the poetry collections of the great Andalusí Jewish literary and religious intellectuals were quickly copied and absorbed by socially more conservative Jewish communities and their poets in *North Africa, *Egypt (the thirteenth-century *Rabbanite Joseph ben Tanḥum Yerushalmi and the *Karaites Moses Dar'í), *Yemen, *Iraq, and subsequently in other parts of the *Ottoman Empire. Although the social themes never attained as much popularity in the East as they had enjoyed in al-Andalus, the biblicalizing style and arabicizing prosody of the Andalusí poets caught on and were employed in sacred compositions. From the sixteenth century on, Hebrew poetry in Muslim lands turned even more sharply to deeply pious yearnings for *redemption and to mystical themes (see KABBALAH). Among many important poets, Israel Najara (sixteenth-century *Palestine) and Shalem Shabazi (seventeenth-century Yemen) stand out for composing hundreds of liturgical poems. ROSS BRANN

Poetry, Modern Hebrew. Since its beginnings in the late nineteenth century, Modern *Hebrew poetry has been characterized by a tension between centuries of earlier Hebrew literary texts, with their rich metaphorical and literary allusions, and the colloquial Hebrew of the contemporary world, with its reliance on everyday speech and physical realities.

EARLY EXEMPLARS: Hayyim Nahman *Bialik (1873–1934), considered the father of Modern Hebrew poetry, wrote his first Hebrew poem, “El ha-Tzippor” (To the Bird), in Odessa in 1882. Reflecting his longing for a Jewish homeland, Bialik’s poetry lamented the degeneration of the Jewish nation in exile and called for a new future. This focus made him the first Jewish national poet. Bialik was educated in Jewish tradition and Hebrew lore, and his rich poetic imagery drew on this heritage while also expressing the inner conflicts of modern individuals.

Saul Tchernikhovsky (1875–1943) came from a markedly different background. Secular by upbringing, Tchernikhovsky was interested in European literature; he translated works into Hebrew from more than fifteen languages. Profoundly influenced by the landscapes of his childhood – the fertile fields and the vast steppes of the Russian Crimea – his poetry is steeped in natural imagery. Tchernikhovsky coined many new terms for flora and fauna, providing a new Hebrew vocabulary for his verdant imagery. Alongside his contributions to Hebrew poetic form and linguistic tools was his thematic interest in depicting women and the female anatomy. Tchernikhovsky’s revival of love themes in Hebrew poetry was deeply influenced by the writings of Immanuel of Rome (ca. 1261–ca. 1328), who wrote passionate Hebrew love sonnets based on Italian models (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE).

In their respective ways, Bialik and Tchernikhovsky developed a future for Hebrew poetry by introducing innovative forms and language. However, both men were working with a written Hebrew that lacked the vibrancy of living speech. In the 1920s, as the center of Hebrew poetry moved to *Palestine, with its preferred use of *Sephardic pronunciation, their intricate poetic cadences, rhythms, and rhymes, composed in the *Ashkenazi pronunciation of *Eastern Europe, soon lost favor. Difficult to read and trapped within Eastern European motifs, rather than the living landscape of *Palestine, these two poets were soon superseded by a new generation.

PALESTINIAN PERIOD (1920–47): In the era after World War I and before the establishment of the State of *Israel, poets first introduced the rhythms of the spoken language into Hebrew poetry, although their literary themes continued to be influenced by European movements, including Russian Futurism, Russian Symbolism, and German Expressionism. Among this generation were the poets Yehuda Karni (1884–1949), Uri Tzvi Greenberg (1896–1981), Isaac Lamdan (1899–1954), Abraham Shlonsky (1900–1973), S. Shalom (1904–1990), and Natan Alterman (1910–1970). These poets described the realities of life in the *Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine, capturing authentic experience. They secularized biblical imagery to represent the challenges and joys of settling the land, with poets like Abraham Shlonsky rebelling against Bialik’s “classicism.” Abba Kovner (1918–1987), Itamar Ya’oz Kest (b. 1934), and others also represented in poetic terms the starker truths of the daily struggle for survival in Palestine.

Lyrical poetry capturing the essence of the Palestine landscape was characteristic of this era. Esther Raab (1894–1981) and Rahel Bluwstein (1890–1931), known simply as Rahel, published elegiac, erotic, and sensual descriptions of the Land of Israel. Concurrently, Leah Goldberg (1911–1970) and Natan Alterman were depicting the growth of *Tel Aviv, Palestine’s urban center. Alterman’s importance as a national figure, occupying the status Bialik had once held, was assured through his weekly newspaper column that discussed current events in verse. His ironic and satirical wit introduced new dimensions of humor into Hebrew poetry. Although most Modern Hebrew poetry is secular, there were important exceptions in this period. Greenberg and Zelda (Zelda Shneurson Mishkowsky [1916–1984]) were steeped in *Hasidism and wrote poetry full of allusions to traditional *Judaism. Greenberg’s religious poetry encapsulated his belief in the messianic vision of a Jewish return to the Land of Israel.

PALMAKH GENERATION (DOR HA-PALMAKH). These poets, who began publishing in the 1940s, included Natan Zach (b. 1930), Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000), Haim Gouri (b. 1923), Anadad Eldan (b. 1924), Amir Gilboa (1917–1984), and Ted Carmi (1925–1994). Born in Israel or immigrating there as children, they were raised within the material reality of *Zionist ideology in the 1920s and 1930s, with Hebrew as their dominant spoken language. Many of these men had served as soldiers in the Palmakh (pre-state Jewish defense forces) or British Army, and they became officers in the 1948 War of Independence. Turning from the European influences of previous generations, they looked to the Anglo-American literary traditions of late Modernism. Influenced by poets such as W. H. Auden and William Carlos Williams, their poetry shaped biblical imagery into a colloquial discourse. Thematically, these writers expressed the premises of Zionist ideology, which they often challenged or questioned. Shying away from the bombastic literary traditions of their predecessors with its exalted language, they focused on personal details of intimate and private experiences. Their tone, reflecting existentialist sentiments, was deliberately understated and often focused on personal loss or grief.

Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000), whose early poetry reflects the thematics of this generation, came increasingly to represent the minutiae of daily life. His writings are characterized by gentle irony and tender depictions of love – whether sexual love, love for people, or love for Israel, particularly *Jerusalem. His discovery by British poet Ted Hughes in the 1960s and the subsequent translation of his work into more than thirty languages gave Amichai an international reputation and following. His complex integration of traditional religious figures and texts into profoundly secular poetry resonated with the Israeli public, and the simplicity of his language and modes of expression made his poetry accessible and popular.

NEW WAVE GENERATION: During the 1960s and 1970s the “New Wave” generation began to experiment with avant-garde poetry. This generation included Pinhas Sadeh (1929–1994) Yonah Wallach (1944–1985), Yair Hurvitz (1941–1988), and Meir Wieseltier (b. 1941). Sometimes known as the Dor ha-Medinah (generation of the state), these writers experimented with language, producing radical and dissonant verse with sparse forms, fractured sentences, and disjointed images. Much of this poetry is hypersexualized or political in content, although it can convey equally well the fragmentation of the human being in the modern world.

OTHER APPROACHES: Despite these historical divisions it would be wrong to suggest that all Israeli poets were bound by such classifications. Dalia Rabikovitch (1936–2005) began by writing romantic poetry peopled with mythological and fantastical figures; her early works appeared in the 1950s in Avraham Shlonsky’s journal Orlioni. Her later poetry has a bitter and sarcastic tone; its free-flowing and discordant language is characteristic of the Dor ha-Medinah poets. She is best known in Israel for poetry that reflects her involvement with the *Israeli peace movement after the 1982 Lebanon War. Hebrew poetry that expressed the horrors of war and a longing for peace appeared as far back as Bialik’s poem, “Ba-Ir Ha-Harigah” (In the City of Slaughter), about the 1905 Kishinev *pogrom in Moldova. Poets in the 1920s and 1930s frequently invoked their experiences of fighting in World War I in Europe, before their arrival in Palestine, or of the violence against Jews in Palestine, particularly in the riots of 1929. The Dor ha-Palmakh poets often portrayed images of soldiers, dead comrades, and the violence and perceived heroism of war. In addition to serving in the War of Independence, many, such as Haim Gouri, helped resettle refugees and *Holocaust survivors in Europe and Israel. Their use of military imagery is ambiguous, neither celebratory nor condemnatory. It was Hebrew poets from the 1970s and 1980s, such as Dalia Rabikovitch, Maya Bejerano (b. 1949), and Isaac Laor (b. 1948), who became increasingly critical of war and celebrated peace. A number of recent anthologies have appeared that gather writings of this kind from different historical periods in Israel. They include No Rattling of Sabers: An Anthology of Israeli War Poetry (ed. E. Raizen; 1996); No Sign of Ceasefire: An Anthology of Contemporary Israeli Poetry (ed. W. Bargad and S. Chyet; 2002); and After the First Rain: Israeli Poems on War and Peace (ed. M. Dor and B. Goldberg; 1998).

The publication of Keys to the Garden: New Israeli Writing (ed. A. Alcalay; 1996), an anthology of Mizrahi poetry, heightened an awareness of voices that had been relegated to the margins of the Hebrew literary canon, which had historically been dominated by *Ashkenazi men. Featuring writers from the Levant, *Turkey, *Iran, *India, and the Arab world, this anthology offered poetry concerned with themes of cultural identity, race, class, gender, and political allegiances. Erez Biton (b. 1942), Amira Hess, Lev Hakak, Shlomo Avayou (b. 1939), Ronny Someck (b. 1951), Tikva Levi, and Sami Shalom Chetrit (b. 1960) are just a few of the writers whose concern with issues beyond the Zionist ideological narrative has begun to reshape the Israeli poetic map. Similarly, The Defiant Muse: Hebrew Feminist Poems from Antiquity to the Present: A Bilingual Anthology (ed. S. Kaufman, G. Hasan-Rokem, and T. Hess; 1999) made women’s Hebrew poetry more readily available in translation than ever before.

Contemporary Hebrew poetry has experienced a resurgence in popularity since 2000. A proliferation of literary journals in Israel has made verse accessible to nontraditional readers of poetry, and poetry festivals held throughout the country have also renewed interest in the medium. A host of new poets are emerging whose subject matter is delineated by the themes of the journals in which the poems appear. Radical, political, and feminist poetry appears alongside experiments in literary forms. Isaac Laor has been among those senior poets working to encourage new poetic voices through his literary journal, Mita’am: A Journal of Literature and Radical Thought. Amir Or (b. 1956) has fostered the development of Hebrew poetry through the Helicon Society, which offers courses and workshops for Jewish and Arab poets to work together; he also publishes journals featuring these younger poets. Along with this support of innovative themes and styles, there is a renewed interest in the ballad and a return to more traditional poetic forms, advocated by journals such as Ho!

A number of leading Hebrew poets have had their verses adopted or adapted as lyrics for popular *music. Natan Alterman wrote lyrics to several songs that became immensely popular, and Yona Wallach has written lyrics for rock bands. Even when particular poets appear to have been replaced by younger generations, musical versions of their poetry continue to be popular. Demonstrating the durability of great poetic verse, Bialik’s love poem “Hikhnisini Taḥat K’nafekh” (Take Me under Your Wing), written in 1905, continues to be sung in a haunting, lilting rendition and is often heard on televised music competitions. A classic resource is T. Carmi, Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse (1981). RACHEL S. HARRIS

Poetry: United States. Jewish poets in the *United States have produced a remarkably rich and diverse body of work since at least the late nineteenth century. Mid-twentieth-century Jewish poets such as Karl Shapiro (1913–2000) and Howard Nemerov (1920–1991) and, more recently, Alan Shapiro (b. 1952) and Robert Pinsky (b. 1940), have received academic acclaim as masters of traditional formalist verse, but Jews have been especially important figures in experimental strains of modern and contemporary poetics. Post–World War II poets Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997), Jerome Rothenberg (b. 1931), and Charles Bernstein (1950) became leaders in the countercultural movements of “Beat” poetry, “ethnopoetics,” and “Language” poetry.

Among American Jewish poets are many women, including Emma Lazarus (1849–1887), whose “New Colossus” is etched on the base of the Statue of Liberty. Feminist poets Muriel Rukeyser (1913–1980) and Adrienne Rich (b. 1920) also have written on behalf of other aggrieved communities. For example, Rukeyser’s 1938 Book of the Dead documents the disastrous exposure of hundreds of West Virginia tunnel workers to silica dust. The long poems of Charles Reznikoff (1894–1976) – Testimony, based on trial records concerning mistreatment of *African Americans, and Holocaust – blend historical documentation with the Modernist technique of Objectivism. The contemporary poet Irena Klepfisz (born 1941 in the *Warsaw *ghetto) sets *Yiddish beside English in her poetry, which often invokes the *Holocaust. Jewish Modernists such as Moyshe-Leyb Halpern (1886–1932) and Jacob Glatstein (1896–1971), writing in Yiddish in the first decades of the twentieth century, also made important contributions to the experimental and innovative strains of American poetry (see POETRY, YIDDISH).

Despite these accomplishments (and the fact that three recent American poet laureates – Louise Gluck [b. 1943], Pinsky, and Stanley Kunitz [1905–2006] – have been Jews), the study of Jewish American poetry remains in its infancy. In “The Sorrows of American Jewish Poetry” (in Figures of Capable Imagination [1976]), literary critic Harold Bloom infamously suggested that poetic practice is “alien to a Jewish sensibility.” “The Jew,” he argued, “cannot wholly commit himself to the ‘pragmatic religion-of-poetry,’ or hold a precursor poet in ‘god-like esteem’ (251, 253). Bloom viewed as unconscionably transgressive the idea of the Jewish poet mixing allegiances and influences with a “gentile precursor.” In 1994, novelist and essayist Cynthia Ozick suggested that Jewish American poetry has yet to come into its own because it “depends upon its ability to generate a shared vision of communal well being, grounded in a culturally distinct language, a ‘new Yiddish’” (“America: Toward Yavneh,” in What is Jewish Literature?, ed. H. Wirth-Nesher [1999]).

*Diaspora poetics – that is, the emphasis on a lost or erased origin that maintains its spectral power over the secular Jewish culture of America – and the acceptance of an unstable, linguistically oriented sense of self that exists in between clearly delineated spaces may be the signal characteristics of Jewish American poetry. Both are evident in the Yiddish Modernist poetry of Mikhl Likht (1893–1953). Born in the Ukraine, Likht became immersed in the *New York City Yiddish Modernist culture in the 1920s. A translator of Wallace Stevens, Ezra Pound, and Gertrude Stein, Likht was so committed to an introspectivist poetics and kaleidoscopic stylistics that even fellow Yiddish Modernists found him utterly incomprehensible. Becoming doubly inaccessible, Likht positioned himself as a Yiddish writer who eschewed proletarian themes and as an American Modernist who wrote in Yiddish, a language that none of his peers (Stevens, Mina Loy, Carl Sandberg) could have understood.

In contrast, Charles Reznikoff translated diasporism from a deficit state into a literary opportunity in which the possibility of redemption coexists with the face of loss. His contemporary, Louis Zukofsky (1904–1978), attempted to transform his alienation from traditional *Judaism and the situation of diasporism into the grounds for a radical humanistic ethics and a poetics that celebrates the sublimity of the particular things found in everyday life.

The diasporic poetics of Likht, Reznikoff, and Zukofsky is carried forward in the work of several important contemporary Jewish American poets, such as Alicia Ostriker (b. 1937), Norman Finkelstein (b. 1954), Rachel Blau DuPlessis (b. 1941), and Michael Heller (b. 1937). In “Remains of the Diaspora,” poet and memoirist Heller, following H. N. *Bialik, argues that for the diasporic Jew “language replaces essence” and that the space of the “between” becomes an ironic foundation for poetic utterance. For Heller, as for other contemporary radical Jewish poets such as Finkelstein in Tracks, Armand Schwerner (1927–1999) in Tablets, and Ostriker in the Nakedness of the Fathers, the Hebrew *Bible and other religious texts remain important sources of inspiration, even as these texts no longer possess canonical authority or signify the poet’s allegiance to Judaism as a religious practice.

In Ostriker’s poetry, the gaps, silences, and omissions in the biblical text represent a literary opportunity, metaphorically, to give birth to the feminine and maternal aspects of Judaism. Ostriker argues that these impulses have been repressed in the patriarchal tradition, but, like the grandmother swallowed by the wolf in the fairy tale, await a return. Like Reznikoff, Ostriker also emphasizes a poetics of immanent spirituality, which she links to the Shekhinah*, or the feminine principal of a nontranscendent *God. Ostriker’s project is to “encounter the physical selves of women,” especially through attempts to reimagine the voice of the Jewish mother as something much more complex than the stereotypical smothering figure. In yet another way Ostriker’s contemporary feminist *midrashic project dovetails with Reznikoff, whom she cites in her text. She imagines radicalism and her version of cultural Jewishness in a political context, as a call to social change. Both of these contemporary Jewish poets upend exclusionary ways of thinking about “sacred” and “secular” spaces, preferring to struggle to determine what Ostriker calls the “sacredness immanent within matter.”

Several landmark publications have begun to rectify the lack of significant commentary on poetry by American Jews. These include the essay, “Jewish American Poetry,” by M. Y. Schreiber in The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature (ed. H. Wirth-Nesher and M. P. Kramer [2003]), and, most prominently, the Norton Anthology of Jewish American Literature (ed. J. Chametzky, J. Felstiner, H. Flanzbaum, and K. Hellerstein [2001]), which brought canonical status and a wide audience to previously underacknowledged poets. The anthology offers translations of Yiddish poets associated with experimental movements such as Introspectivism; Modernist poets writing in English (including the Objectivists – Reznikoff, George Oppen [1908–1984], and Carl Rakosi [1903–2004]); and Zukofsky, an unofficial student of Ezra Pound whose epic poem “A” was consciously written in response to Eliot’s “The Waste Land”; as well as a range of contemporary voices (among them, Pinsky, Allen Grossman [b. 1932], Philip Levine [b. 1928], and Jacqueline Osherow [b. 1956]).

DANIEL MORRIS

Poetry, Yiddish. Despite the existence of fourteenth-century *Yiddish verse narratives, Yiddish poetry is best understood as modern poetry. That is, only with the possibilities of a secular culture, as well as the political and societal transformations associated with modernity in *Eastern Europe, could Yiddish writing emerge as a self-consciously literary phenomenon. The most significant cultural “moment” for Yiddish poetry occurred roughly from the 1880s through the 1920s.

It is an irony of Yiddish culture that a language castigated by the Jewish intelligentsia of the Haskalah* as an ugly “jargon” and as secondary to *Hebrew could lend itself so well to the production of poetry. Yet it has been argued that the very properties that led to the denigration of Yiddish, such as its fusing of Germanic, Hebraic, and Slavic components and its relative porousness to other languages, offered poets an appealing latitude in diction and sensibility. In addition, the development of Yiddish over hundreds of years as the language of daily life, through which and into which *Ashkenazi Jews poured their sufferings, insights, and joys, also made the language a responsive medium for poetry. Yiddish writers drew on a rich vernacular repository of idioms, proverbs, *folklore, and *music. It is not surprising that many Yiddish poets wrote their first poems in other languages since their literary influences came from German and Russian, as well as from *Hebrew, which was part of Jewish traditional education. The exhilaration of Yiddish poets as they both discovered and enhanced the poetic power of their own language comes through in their periodic “manifestos” and essays, as well as in their poems.

Modern Yiddish poetry can be viewed as progressing through several “movements” involving loosely grouped writers in *New York City, Kiev, *Warsaw, and Moscow and progressing from “proletarian,” labor-oriented verse into more sophisticated phases of romanticism and Modernism – all within a matter of decades.

“Sweatshop poetry,” with its vivid calls to action and images filled with anger and pathos, appealed to the urban-centered working masses. Beginning in the 1880s, these poems flourished in New York City, where a vast number of Jewish immigrants fleeing strife in Eastern Europe were struggling to live. Published in Yiddish newspapers (see JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA) and sung in the streets, this poetry became a source of political sustenance and cultural strength at a time when labor organizing (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT) and the writing of poetry seemed to go hand in hand. Significant labor poets included Dovid Edelstadt (1866–1892), whose poems, set to music, have titles such as “In kampf” (In Struggle) and “Vakht uf!” (Awake) and urge their audience to throw off their chains and demand their workers’ rights; and Morris Rosenfeld (1862–1923), who gained a reputation as the voice of the sweatshop workers and whose poems were the first Yiddish poems to be translated into English.

The proletarian impulse in Yiddish poetry was cast aside in New York by the group Di Yunge (The Youth), the next generation of writers who emerged in 1907 with its own literary journal and gatherings in local cafes. These poets pursued an aesthetic of beauty and a poetry that spoke in the first person, rather than as, or for, a collective. Yet many of the poets themselves differed little from their readers in the work they did to survive: Proletarian aesthetes, they were paperhangers, house painters, shop workers, and boot makers. Although poets such as Mani Leyb (1883–1953), Moyshe Leyb-Halpern (1886–1932), Zisha Landoy (or Landau; 1889–1937), Anna Margolin (1887–1952), and H. Leyvik (1888–1962) are associated in some way with Di Yunge, they had sharply different styles, each bringing something new and memorable into Yiddish poetry. Leyb and Leyb-Halpern represented two extremes: the former with a mellifluous “high” style, marking a preoccupation with beauty against harsh material life, and the latter with a satirical, at times grotesque, “low” style, enmeshed in everyday struggles. In recent years, Leyb-Halpern has found perhaps his most appreciative audience, due in part to contemporary critics’ appreciation for his more Modernist style.

The years after *World War I brought forth new groupings of Modernist writers in New York, *Poland, and the *Soviet Union, each with its little magazines, café gathering places, and literary arguments against the writers who had so recently preceded them. It was a time of artistic ferment in all the arts, and because Yiddish poets were writing what literally could not have been dreamed of before in a traditional Jewish context, they identified with the international avant-garde. In New York, where immigrant poets were free to be as Jewish and as American as they chose, a group of writers formed the group In zikh (Inside the Self, or introspectivist), issuing a manifesto in 1919 that declared (among other things) their independence from the necessity of having Jewish content in their poems. In contrast to members of Di Yunge, who never fully felt at ease in America, these younger poets knew English well, and some had even attended college in New York. Most were attracted to the imagism and free verse of their Anglo-Modernist contemporaries; they regarded themselves as cosmopolitans who happened to write in Yiddish, rather than as representatives of a Jewish culture. Significant In zikh poets included A. Leyeles (born Aron Glaz; 1889–1966), N. B. Minkov, Yankev Glatshetyn (Jacob Glatstein; 1896–1971), and Mikhl Likht (1893–1953), with Tsilia (Celia) Dropkin (1887–1956) tangentially affiliated. Of these writers, Glatshetyn is the best known, most translated, and most valorized as a poet of international stature. Likht, the least translated, is deserving of twenty-first-century rediscovery because of his radical embrace of Modernist experimentation.

The In zikh assertion of the “kaleidoscopic” individual psyche as a filter for experience brought them close to the Expressionism of their colleague poets in *Eastern Europe. Yet where the New York writers wrote with excitement about the “chaos” of the city in which they found themselves, the Yiddish poets in interwar *Poland and the *Soviet Union actually lived in chaotic conditions that were dangerous as well as stimulating. In the new Polish state that emerged after *World War I, Jews were confronted with rising Polish nationalism and *antisemitism. A Modernist aesthetic could not be the sole concern for poets in this milieu. In Warsaw, a group of poets spearheaded by Peretz Markish (1895–1952) published its first journal in 1922, declaring themselves as young, happy explorers of their frightening, dark times. Dismissed by one critic as an anarchic “gang,” these writers took the word as their banner and called themselves Di Khalyastre. Their fervor is reflected in poet Melekh Ravitsh’s (1893–1976) comment, often cited by critics, that being a Yiddish writer in Warsaw then was “to feel the redemption at hand and to be at its center." Ravitsh edited his own journal that same year, Di Vog (The Scale) as did a third "gang member," Uri Tzvi Greenberg (Albatros). Just two years later, the group was shattered by ideological differences. Greenberg (1896–1981) emigrated to *Palestine and Markish sought to live out his revolutionary ideals by returning to the Soviet Union in 1926. Ravitsh left Warsaw in the 1930s, traveling widely in the service of Yiddish culture. Of the Di Khalyastre poets, it is Markish who has won particular critical appreciation.

The early 1920s were also the high point of Modernist and revolutionary fervor for Yiddish poets in the Soviet Union, boosted by the regime's brief period of support for Yiddish *secularism. In 1922, Kiev-based writers led by Dovid Hofshiteyn (1889–1952) published their literary journal Shtrom (Stream), in Moscow. For a time, they managed to balance their loyalty to Yiddish and Jewish culture with support for the new political ideals. By the mid-1920s, however, the political climate in the Soviet Union had hardened to the point where writers had to alter their poetry to fit party demands. Significant Soviet poets include Hofshiteyn, Izi Kharik (1898–1937), Leyb Kvitko (ca. 1890–1952), as well as Moyshe Kulbak (1896–1940), whose stylistic range has been admired by critics. Another important cohort of Yiddish poets were Yung Vilne, who were active writers and social activists in Polish *Wilna in the 1930s. Of this group, Avrom (Abraham) Sutzkever (1913–2010) represents a bridge to the other side of *World War II and the *Holocaust, because almost alone among his fellow poets he survived and had a long and fruitful career as a poet in *Israel.

There are numerous Yiddish poets who do not fit into the above categories. Significant among them are Avrom Reyzen (Abraham Reizen; 1876–1953), known for his gentle, folksy lyrics; Yehoash (Solomon Bloomgarten; 1872–1927), an early Modernist who translated the Hebrew *Bible into Yiddish; Itzik Manger (1901–1969), who fashioned whimsical poems around biblical characters; and Kadya Molodowsky (1894–1975), whose evocative poetry focusing on women has drawn the positive regard of feminist critics.

The genocide of Eastern European Jewry brought Yiddish poetry as a widely developing genre to a definitive end. In the Soviet Union, repression and worse overtook most Yiddish writers. Kulbak and Kharik disappeared into prison camps in the 1930s; Hofshiteyn, Markish, Kvitko, Fefer, and other Yiddish writers were executed on August 12, 1952, as part of a general purge of Yiddish leaders and intelligentsia (see also JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE). For North American writers, who could only look on with horror from afar, the murder of their colleagues and destruction of their home culture and collective past meant the disintegration of their own future prospects in Yiddish (already weakened by Jews' rapid assimilation into American life). In response, most of the In zikh poets rejected their cosmopolitanism. In Yankev Glatshiteyn's 1938 poem, "A gute nakht velt" (Good Night, World), he stingingly rebukes "pig-gish German" and "hostile Polack" and proudly returns to his "four [ghetto] walls," again embracing traditional Jewish motifs in his poetry.

Yiddish poetry (as well as the language and culture itself) was long denigrated in Israel, in part because of a conscious privileging of Hebrew as the state language. However, Yiddish poets who arrived in Israel after the war were active in writing and publishing as members of the group Yung Yisroel (Young Israel). Significant writers included Moyshe Yungman (b. 1922), Rivke Bassman-Ben-Chaim, Rukhl Fishman (1935–1984), and Avrom Sutzkever, under whose leadership the internationally respected literary journal, Di Goldene Keyt (The Golden Chain), flourished for many years. The Yiddish newspaper, The Forverts, published weekly in New York, often publishes work by Yiddish poets in Israel, as well as contemporary poets in the United States and other countries. However diminished, Yiddish poetry is still being written and translated.

For further reading, see M. L. Bachman, Recovering "Yiddishland": Threshold Moments in American Literature (2008); M. Falk, With Teeth in the Earth: Selected Poems of Malka Heifetz Tussman (1992); A. Glaser and D. Weintraub, eds., Proletpen: America's Rebel Yiddish Poets (2005); The Selected Poems of Jacob Glatstein, trans. R. Whitman (1972); B. Zunoff, ed., I Keep Recalling: The Holocaust Poems of Jacob Glatstein (1993); B. Harshav and B. Harshav, eds., American Yiddish Poetry, A Bilingual Anthology (1986); idem, eds., Sing, Stranger: A Century of American Yiddish Poetry: A Historical Anthology (2006); I. Howe, R. R. Wisse, and K. Shmeruk, eds., The Penguin Book of Modern Yiddish Verse, (1987); R. H. Korn, Paper Roses (Papirene Rozen), trans. S. Levitan (1985); A. Kramer, ed., A Century of Yiddish Poetry (1989); R. R. Wisse, A Little Love in Big Manhattan: Two Yiddish Poets (1988); L. Wolf, ed. and trans., The World According to Itzik: Selected Poetry and Prose by Itzik Manger (2002); S. Kumove, ed. and trans., Drunk from the Bitter Truth: The Poems of Anna Margolin (2005); K. Hellerstein, ed. and trans., Paprine Brikn: Paper Bridges, Selected Poems of Kadya Molodowsky, (1999); I. J. Schwartz, Kentucky (Kentoki), trans. G. Dubrovsky (1990); Abraham Sutzkever, The Fiddle Rose: Poems 1970–72, trans. R. R. Wisse (1990); R. Whitman, ed. and trans., An Anthology of Modern Yiddish Poetry (1966); and S. Wolitz, "Di Khalyastre, the Yiddish Modernist Movement in Poland: An Overview," Yiddish 4(3) (1987): 5–19. See also LITERATURE, YIDDISH; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH; YIDDISH; AND YIDDISH DICTIONARIES.

MERLE LYN BACHMAN

Pogrom, a Russian word meaning "destruction," entered foreign languages after the anti-Jewish riots of 1881–82 in the *Russian Empire; it is often used in connection with any mass anti-Jewish violence. Earlier pogroms in the Russian Empire occurred in 1821, 1859, and 1871 in Odessa, mainly perpetrated by Greeks. The first major pogrom wave began on Easter 1881, after the murder of Tsar Alexander II on March 1 and in response to rumors that the new tsar had ordered attacks on Jews. Starting in Elisavetgrad (now Kirovograd) on April 15, pogroms spread to major cities in Russia's southeastern and southern regions (now *Ukraine) and from there to surrounding towns and villages. Sporadic pogroms also erupted between 1882 and 1884. These pogroms were directed primarily against Jewish property, and there were relatively few casualties. The most striking feature of these pogroms was the hesitant response of the authorities, who usually ended the riots only on the third day. Russian authorities and newspapers blamed Jewish economic "exploitation" for causing outbursts of popular anger. As a result, Jews were forbidden to settle in rural areas. Among Jews, the pogroms undermined hopes of Jewish integration into Russian society and increased emigration, as well as enthusiasm for expanding the Jewish presence in *Palestine.

After twenty years of relative calm, a terrible pogrom broke out on April 6–8, 1903 in Kishinev. Local authorities did not respond for three days while forty-seven Jews were killed, more than four hundred wounded, and seven hundred houses were burned; damage was estimated at three million rubles. Public opinion blamed the reactionary Interior Minister Viacheslav Pleve for organizing the massacre. The shock of Kishinev intensified an oppositional and revolutionary mood among Russian Jews, and young people began to organize armed self-defense squads. The pogrom that erupted on September 14–16, 1903, in Gomel turned into a battle in which *Zionist and *Bundist units repulsed the rioting mob. Ten Jews and eight Christians were killed; the authorities prosecuted both the rioters and members of the self-defense groups. The mobilization for the Russo-Japanese war in 1904 was accompanied by forty-three “mobilization” pogroms; similarly, the outbreak of the first Russian Revolution in 1905 was followed by as many as fifty pogroms between January and mid-October 1905. Some of these were successfully checked by self-defense units. The publication of the Imperial Manifest promising civil liberties and the establishment of a parliament on October 17, 1905, was followed by a massive outbreak of anti-Jewish violence. In late October and November 1905, almost 3,000 Jews perished in approximately six hundred pogroms, mostly in the Ukraine region. Russian troops were active participants in pogroms in Białystok (June 1–3, 1906; seventy killed) and Siedlce (August 26–29, 1906; thirty killed). A new wave of anti-Jewish violence erupted during *World War I, when Russian units, particularly Cossacks, undertook pogroms in Russian territory and in Austrian *Galicia. During the Civil War (1918–20), which started after the Russian Revolution of 1917, there were extremely bloody pogroms, especially in Ukraine, where all the fighting armies robbed and massacred Jews, who were alternately blamed for supporting the *Bolsheviks or for being bourgeoisie. Although the Bolsheviks struggled to quell anti-Jewish violence within the Red Army, the atrocities performed by the Whites, by the Ukrainian Directory army under S. Petlura, by the Polish army, and by numerous “Green” bands continued uncurbed. It is estimated that about 50,000 Jews lost their lives in the Civil War pogroms; the most destructive was a pogrom in Proskurov by a Ukrainian unit (February 15, 1919) in which approximately 1,600 Jews were killed.

There were also anti-Jewish attacks immediately after the end of *World War II in *Poland; the most notorious occurred in Kielce, where a mob murdered forty *Holocaust survivors on July 4, 1946.

For further reading, see Committee of the Jewish Delegations, The Pogroms in the Ukraine under the Ukrainian Governments (1917–1920): Historical Survey with Documents and Photographs (1927); J. D. Klier and S. Lambroza, eds., Pogroms: Anti-Jewish Violence in Modern Jewish History (1992); and I. M. Aronson, Troubled Waters: The Origins of the 1881 Anti-Jewish Pogroms in Russia (1990).

VLADIMIR LEVIN

Poland was home to one of Europe’s largest and most important Jewish communities from the early sixteenth century through World War II. Significant religious, cultural, and political influences on contemporary Jewish life developed in Poland. Russian and Ukrainian Jews, as well as much of the Jewish population in the *United States and *Israel, can trace their origins to Polish Jewry.

Pre-modern Poland was far larger than the area within its contemporary borders. The first Polish state was established at the end of the tenth century. The sixteenth-century union between the kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of *Lithuania formed the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, making Poland one of the largest states of Europe, encompassing parts of present-day *Ukraine, *Belarus, and the *Baltic states. Yet at the end of the eighteenth century the country was partitioned by the surrounding *Russian, Prussian, and *Habsburg Empires. Poland was not reestablished as an independent state until after World War I.

Significant Jewish settlement in Poland began in the twelfth to fourteenth centuries with migration from Western Europe and especially from German-speaking lands, in the wake of persecutions during the *Crusades and black death. Early Jewish settlers in Poland also came from the Crimea and the Mediterranean, but by the fourteenth century most Jews in Poland were of *Ashkenazic origin. They brought with them communal institutions, religious traditions, and the Judeo-German language, which later developed into *Yiddish, the everyday language of most Polish Jews. Jewish migrants were also drawn by economic opportunity at a time of increased state consolidation. Polish kings encouraged Jewish settlement to develop the economy, but Jews were allowed to settle only in certain locations with specific permission granted by charter; they sometimes faced persecution from church authorities and townspeople, who considered Jews to be economic competitors.

In 1264 Bolesław the Pious of Kalisz granted the first charter allowing Jewish residence in Poland, and in 1334 a charter from Kazimierz the Great placed Jews under the jurisdiction of royal governors. Early Jewish population centers were Kraków, Kalisz, Gniezno, Sandomierz, and other princely capitals. Perhaps 18,000 Jews lived in Poland and 6,000 in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the early sixteenth century, about 0.5% of the population. With the establishment of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in 1569 and Poland’s concomitant expansion when *Ukraine was transferred from Lithuania to Poland, Jewish settlement became increasingly characterized by residence in small towns owned by Polish nobility, szlachta in Polish. These magnates, who became dominant in Polish politics and the economy at the expense of the king, encouraged Jewish settlement as a means of developing their towns. The relationship between the szlachta and Jews characterized Polish Jewish life from the mid-sixteenth century until the eighteenth-century partitions and was the origin of Jewish residence in the small private town, the shtetl (“small town” in Yiddish). Numbering about 20,000 to 30,000 Jews at the end of the fifteenth century, Poland’s Jewish population had increased to about 300,000 in the mid-seventeenth century.

More significant Jewish settlement in private towns took place from the late seventeenth through the eighteenth century, when Jewish residence was connected with economic reconstruction after Poland’s mid-seventeenth-century wars with Sweden and the Muscovites. The occupations of Polish Jewry were more diversified than in many other locations in Europe; small-town economic development depended on Jews as craftsmen, traders, and managers of the magnate estates. By the eighteenth century more than 70% of Polish Jewry lived in the eastern part of the country, mainly in towns.

The mid-seventeenth-century wars, especially the peasant revolt led by Bogdan *Chmelnitzki (also Chmielnicki) in Ukraine in 1648, disrupted Polish Jewish life. Devastation to Jewish communities was significant, although probably not as widespread as indicated by Nathan Hannover's chronicle, written in 1653. Perhaps one-fifth of the Jewish population was killed. Historians have also disagreed about the extent to which the uprising and wars left Polish Jewry in crisis. It is clear, however, that Poland-Lithuania emerged from the turmoil as a weaker state.

Until the mid-eighteenth century, medieval Polish Jewry enjoyed permanent, centralized communal autonomy to a greater degree than elsewhere in Europe in the form of the *Council of Four Lands, which met once or twice a year from the sixteenth century until its dissolution in 1764. Yet even in medieval Poland and increasingly in modernity, Jewish life was influenced by interactions with Poland and Polish society as Jews contributed to the development of the Polish state, its economy, and culture. Religious life flourished among medieval Polish Jewry, and yeshivot in Poland and Lithuania trained rabbis for communities throughout Europe. Yet the eighteenth century also witnessed consolidation of the Catholic Church's influence in the Polish state, and one historian argues that the worst religious persecution of Polish Jewry took place in the 1740s and 1750s.

The end of the eighteenth century saw the fragmentation of Poland and its Jewish population. Approximately 750,000 Jews lived in Poland-Lithuania in 1764–65; after three partitions of Poland (1772, 1793, 1795), approximately 150,000 came under Prussian rule, about 250,000 under *Habsburg rule, and the remainder found themselves under tsarist rule. Poland's Jewish population was subsequently subject to the varying rulings of the partitioning states. Poland continued to exist as a political entity under Russian control; it was called Congress Poland or the Polish kingdom, but had a largely diminishing degree of autonomy. Other territories of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth under tsarist control further east were incorporated directly into the *Russian Empire.

Even as the Polish state was disintegrating, Polish Jewish religious life was experiencing a major upheaval as *Hasidism developed and spread rapidly to most areas of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Early Hasidic circles multiplied throughout Ukraine beginning in the mid-eighteenth century. By the mid-nineteenth century Hasidism predominated in the Polish kingdom and had spread into present-day *Belarus, *Romania, and Hungary. Hasidism attracted only a minority of the Jewish population in Lithuania. In the nineteenth century the Haskalah also made inroads among a minority of Jews, prompting Hasidim and mitnaggedim*, opponents of Hasidism, to unite in opposition. An increasing minority of Jews, partly drawn from a small group of economic elites, became proponents of assimilation; by the mid-nineteenth century, they sought to transform Polish Jews into "Poles of the Mosaic faith." Polish Jews took part in the Kościuszko insurrection in 1794 and in both nineteenth-century Polish uprisings against Russian rule. *Emancipation of Jews in the Polish Kingdom in 1862 removed restrictions on Jewish settlement. Because Jews elsewhere in the Russian Empire did not yet enjoy these rights, the Polish Kingdom experienced an influx of Jews from the Russian interior.

Polish-Jewish relations deteriorated in the late 1860s, and in 1881–82 pogroms took place in the Polish Kingdom as elsewhere in the tsarist realm. The subsequent development of *Zionism, socialism, and their variants, together with the move from small town to large city as part of industrialization, led to significant shifts in Jewish life, particularly after 1905 when restrictions on political activity in the Russian Empire were eased. Polish independence after *World War I was accompanied by recognition of minority rights when Poland signed the Minorities' Treaty at Versailles, under pressure from the Allies. At the same time, hundreds of Jews were killed when they were caught in border conflicts between Poland and its eastern neighbors after World War I.

Interwar Polish Jewry comprised the largest Jewish community in Europe, second in the world only to the *United States. In 1921 Poland's population of 27.2 million included 2.86 million Jews; in 1931 Jews numbered 3.1 million out of a population of 31.9 million. Migration from small towns to large cities accelerated, and by the late 1930s nearly one-third of Polish Jews lived in the twelve largest cities. Jews were among the many ethnic minorities who accounted for more than 30% of Poland's population. The interwar Jewish economic structure continued to differ from that of the surrounding population. Whereas a majority of ethnic Poles were employed in agriculture, in 1931 about 96% of Polish Jews worked in nonfarm occupations, mainly as artisans, traders, or small shopkeepers. A small number were industrialists and other economic elites, and 56% percent of doctors and one-third of legal professionals were Jewish.

Interwar Jewish political and cultural life flourished. *Zionist parties were strongest in the early interwar years, whereas the *Bund garnered limited support until the second half of the 1930s, when its opposition to boycotts and anti-Jewish violence gave it the support of majorities in Łódź, Warsaw, and elsewhere. Many Jews remained religious, and they formed Agudat Israel in response to the secular Jewish parties. Yet as traditional religious life weakened and occupational prospects dimmed, youth groups affiliated with political parties nourished cultural as well as political interests. Interwar Jewish youth became increasingly Polonized as a majority attended Polish-language public elementary schools; however, many Polish-speaking Jewish young people identified with Zionism. The Polish-language Jewish press came into its own, including periodicals founded by journalists seeking to develop a modern Jewish national culture. The Yiddish press still had the largest circulation among Jews (see JOURNALISM: YIDDISH [EASTERN EUROPE]); although a Hebrew press developed it struggled for readers.

The economic depression of the 1930s hit Poland with particularly severity. Economic boycotts, anti-Jewish violence at universities, and quotas in some liberal professions resulted in a desperate situation for many Jews. No outright antisemitic legislation was enacted as it was elsewhere in Eastern Europe, but the Polish government did not oppose economic discrimination and passed legislation restricting *kosher slaughtering. In 1934 Poland renounced its obligations under the Minorities' Treaty, and in the second half of the 1930s economic boycotts escalated. *Pogroms occurred in Przytyk in 1936 and in other towns and continued until the first half of 1938, when the government began to clamp down on the violence.

With the outbreak of *World War II, Poland was partitioned between the *Soviet Union and *Nazi *Germany. Between 1 million and 1.2 million Jews lived in the eight provinces of eastern Poland that came under Soviet control. Another 300,000 Jews in Soviet-occupied Poland were refugees from Nazi-occupied areas. Under Soviet rule, Jewish institutions were dissolved or disbanded themselves in anticipation of Soviet authority. Jews, along with the non-Jewish population, suffered from Sovietization of the economy and from deportations to the Soviet interior. In Nazi-occupied Poland, terror against Jews began immediately. Nazi authorities appointed a Jewish Council, the Judenrat, in most Jewish communities to implement their orders; in larger cities, the Judenrat also oversaw formal and informal Jewish communal and social welfare efforts. Enclosed ghettos (see HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS) were established in large cities throughout Nazi-occupied Poland, whereas in smaller towns Jews were required to live in often unenclosed ghettos or were deported to ghettos in nearby cities. Death from starvation and disease was common.

After the outbreak of the Nazi–Soviet war on June 22, 1941, Jews living in what had been Soviet-occupied eastern Poland were among the first victims of mass shootings during the early stage of the Nazi genocide, as the German army advanced eastward (see EINSATZGRUPPEN; HOLOCAUST entries). Jews who survived these mass shootings were rounded up into ghettos, which often were liquidated in a few months. Pogroms carried out by surrounding non-Jewish populations in Polish territory that had been under Soviet control accompanied the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, particularly in the area that is presently northeastern Poland. The extent of Nazi supervision of this violence is still unclear.

Polish Jews were among the first victims of industrialized mass murder through gassing at Nazi camps beginning in December 1941. All six Nazi annihilation camps were located on Polish territory; three were established as part of Operation Reinhard specifically for the genocide of Polish Jewry (see HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS).

Approximately 50,000 Polish Jews survived the *Holocaust on Polish territory and an estimated 250,000 survived in the Soviet interior. After the war, Poland's pre-war eastern territories became part of the Soviet Union, and returning Polish Jews were resettled in Poland's western territories newly acquired from Germany, particularly Lower Silesia. Jewish communities were also reestablished in Łódź, Warsaw, Kraków, Gdańsk, and other cities. Approximately 275,000 Jews lived in Poland in the early post-war years, a number that fluctuated with returns and departures. Post-war pogroms, culminating with the murder of 40 Jews in *Kielce in July 1946, contributed to mass Jewish emigration, and only an estimated 94,000 Jews remained in Poland by 1948. Poland's surviving Jewish population continued to be depleted by emigration waves from 1956 to 1960, which left around 36,800 Jews in Poland; a government antisemitic campaign in 1967–68 prompted the departure of at least an additional 13,000 Jews and the remaining Jewish population became increasingly assimilated.

By the end of communist rule in 1989, approximately 10,000 Jews were estimated to be living in Poland. Following the revival of Jewish religious and communal life in the two decades since then, population estimates have at least doubled. Only a fraction are members of Jewish communal institutions, but efforts to develop Jewish life have revived existing Jewish organizations and led to the establishment of new Jewish institutions.

For further reading, see A. Polonsky, The Jews in Poland and Russia, 3 vols. (2009, 2011); G. D. Hundert, Jews in Poland-Lithuania in the Eighteenth Century (2004); M. Opalski and I. Bartal, Poles and Jews: A Failed Brotherhood (1992); J. Gross, Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland (2001); D. Engel, In the Shadow of Auschwitz: The Polish Government-in-Exile and the Jews, 1939–1942 (1987); and J. Michlic, Poland's Threatening Other: The Image of the Jew from 1880 to the Present (2006). Maps 8, 11 KAREN AUERBACH

Portugal. Many Jews fled to Portugal at the time of the expulsion from Spain in 1492, joining an ancient native community/ Seeking to retain these valuable immigrants, King Manoel I chose to ignore the troubled history of the Spanish conversos and in 1497 forcibly converted all of the Jews in Portugal. Many of these Portuguese conversos retained a crypto-Jewish identity and a number left Portugal for various *Sephardic Diaspora centers in the *Ottoman Empire, *Amsterdam, *France, and the New World (see BRAZIL and CARIBBEAN) over the next few centuries. The *inquisition was established in Portugal in 1536 and remained in effect until 1821. Map 6

Some Jewish families of Portuguese origin from Morocco returned to Portugal in the nineteenth century and a synagogue was dedicated in Lisbon in 1904. During World War II, significant number of Jewish refugees were able to escape Nazi-occupied Europe through Portugal, which was officially neutral. The Jewish population at the beginning of the twenty-first century was approximately 1000.

Post-Zionism, like Zionism, is best understood as a discourse, a body or assemblage of concepts and practices that position people to think and act in particular ways. Zionism has provided the dominant model through which Israelis and other Jews view Jewish history and Israeli national identity. This model is grounded in concepts such as homeland, return to Zion, ingathering of the exiles, redemption of the land, ascent (aliyah) and descent (yeridah), together with related practices. Similar to other forms of nationalism, Zionism constructs a model of the good citizen who accepts and enacts the truths of Zionist discourse as “commonsensical.” These truths include the following: The Land of *Israel belongs solely to the Jewish people; the State of *Israel is a Jewish state, the state of the Jewish people; it is incumbent on all Jews to live in the State of Israel; a full Jewish life can only be lived in Israel; and Israel should be ordered by Jewish concepts and practices derived from Zionism. The discourse and practices that embody and disseminate these truths set limits on the ways in which Jewish history, Jewish culture, and Jewish identity can be legitimately represented and discussed. Those positioned by Zionism regard Zionist concepts and practices to be “normal,” and they view practices that depart from Zionism as problematic and abnormal.

Post-Zionism functions as a minoritarian discourse that brings to light and challenges the “unseen” or concealed power relations embodied in the dominant mode of thought. Rendering problematic what Zionists accept as truth, it strives to transform Israeli society and culture. One way in which it does this is by opening spaces for alternative Israeli discourses. Whereas Zionism designates the Land of Israel to be the possession of the Jewish people and inscribes that "truth" into legal, political, and social practices, post-Zionism challenges such assumptions and practices. From a post-Zionist perspective, the prevailing Zionist model of Israeliness marginalizes or excludes groups such as Jews from Middle Eastern countries (*Mizrahim), *women, *Arab citizens of Israel, and gays, and lesbians. In contrast, post-Zionist writings seek to validate the position of such groups, while questioning the capacity of Zionism to address and resolve effectively the basic problems confronting a democratic state.

From a post-Zionist perspective, the dominant Israeli scholarship has been conscripted to the service of Zionist ideology that grounds accounts of Israeli history and society in Zionist "truths" or doxa. Disseminated through schools, universities, scholarly texts, the military, the media, state documents, laws, geographical sites, memorials, and the official calendar, these "truths" have shaped the prevailing conceptions of Israeli national identity and culture.

In its current usage, post-Zionism was first used to designate a group of scholarly writings that emerged in the 1980s. These writings challenged dominant Israeli historical narratives regarding the Zionist settlement of the land, the 1948 war, the 1948 Palestinian Arab flight, the history and reception of Jews from Middle Eastern countries, and Israeli efforts at peace (see relevant entries under ISRAEL, STATE OF). They also questioned prevailing representations of Israel as a society that accepted and treated equally all Jews and all citizens. Subsequent post-Zionist scholarship revealed the inequitable effects of the practices of defining boundaries and allocating space that are grounded in the Zionist concept of Israel as a Jewish state.

The scholars whose writings have been designated as post-Zionist are members of a generation that was born or grew to maturity in the decades after the 1948 establishment of Israel. Their perspectives were shaped by events such as the post-1967 Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, the near defeat of Israel in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the 1982 invasion of Lebanon and its aftermath, the growing impact of Mizrahi Jews, the emergence of a militant Israeli religious right, the growing power of Israeli settlers in the West Bank and Gaza, and the development of a powerful Palestinian national identity within the occupied territories and among Israel's Arab citizens. For a growing number of Israelis, such events rendered untenable previously dominant views of Israeli society and culture. Consequently, many scholars and critics felt the need for new ways of understanding Israel and its history.

The journal Theory & Criticism, founded in 1990, developed a theoretically informed post-Zionist critique and applied it to areas of society and culture not previously addressed by historians and sociologists. Drawing on the writings of French philosopher Michel Foucault, many contributors highlighted the power relations inherent in Israeli history and society. Applying concepts from feminist, post-structuralist, and post-colonial writings, they sought to render problematic the Zionist assumptions that informed prevailing concepts of Israeli national identity.

Challenging prevailing forms of Israeli national identity, post-Zionism has created spaces for imagining alternative, non-Zionist, pluralistic forms of Israeli national identity. Rather than viewing Israel as a Jewish state dominated by one ethnic group, many post-Zionists envision a democratic state marked by diversity and difference, in which all groups share equitably in the access to power. Insofar as post-Zionism creates spaces for alternative, more complex understandings of Israeli society and culture, it functions as a transformative force in Israeli national life. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, post-Zionist views are increasingly evident within the academy and in areas of public culture such as *film, *literature, and television.

The ambiguous and conflicting meanings ascribed to the term "post-Zionism" mirror the ambiguity and conflicted meanings associated with the term "Zionism." Rather than engage in the futile task of either discovering or positing an essential meaning of the term, it is more useful to perceive it as a pragmatically useful label for a type of discourse that produces identifiable effects and to focus on how such discourse operates and what it does. Although many scholars so identified reject the label "post-Zionist," their writings nonetheless have helped shape an alternative, post-Zionist rethinking of Israeli society, politics, and history.

Post-Zionism also renders problematic the ways that many Jews worldwide understand Jewishness. Challenging Jews to reflect critically on previously unquestioned premises of Jewish identity, its proponents argue that post-Zionism opens new ways of conceptualizing Jewish and Israeli identity and Jewish *ethics. For further reading, see E. Nimni, ed., The Challenges of Post-Zionism (2003); L. J. Silberstein, The Postzionist Debates: Knowledge and Power in Israeli Culture (1999); and L. J. Silberstein, ed., Postzionism: A Reader (2008).

LAURENCE J. SILBERSTEIN

Prague is the cultural and political center of Bohemia and the Czech lands and the capital of the present-day Czech Republic (see also CZECHOSLOVAKIA). It is home to one of the oldest and, at times, most populous Jewish settlements north of the Alps. In 2009 the city's population was approximately 1.2 million, including an estimated several thousand Jews.

Jewish merchants are mentioned as present in the late tenth century; several sources testify to casualties in Prague during anti-Jewish rioting that accompanied the First *Crusade in 1096. The earliest permanent Jewish settlements were probably located in the two castle districts (under the Pražský hrad and Vyšehrad). By approximately the mid-twelfth century, the Jewish population began to shift to the Old Town (Staré Město), where the city's Jewish Quarter would remain throughout the later medieval and modern periods. Several *Tosafists lived in Prague. Isaac ben Moses of *Vienna (ca. 1200–1270), who studied there, included many glosses in old Czech in his Or Zarua (Spreading Light), a widely circulated book of *customs. The most infamous incident of medieval anti-Jewish violence, a massacre of Prague's Jews at the time of Passover and Easter in 1389, was memorialized by Avigdor Kara (d. 1439) in an elegy that became part of the local liturgy for *Yom Kippur. After the Hussite Wars (1419–37), which confirmed the complete break of several Bohemian Christian denominations from the Roman Catholic Church, Prague's Jews were among Europe's first to live in a setting of multiple Christianities.

In the sixteenth century, Prague Jews, particularly Gershon ben Solomon Cohen and his family, pioneered the *printing of Hebrew books in Central Europe. During this era, the economically diverse community suffered internal strife; in 1541 and again in 1559, Ferdinand I expelled the Jews from Bohemia, although several wealthy families were allowed to remain during each of these brief expulsions. In 1564 a burial society was founded, indicating renewed growth in the Jewish community. Burial society and *synagogue records show that a female leadership existed alongside the male, most likely responsible for matters having to do directly with women's roles in these institutions and the burial of women.

Jewish scholarship flourished in the cosmopolitan atmosphere fostered by Rudolf II (1576–1612). Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel (the Maharal of Prague) served as chief rabbi from 1597 until his death in 1609. Scholars associated with his circle include Rabbi Yom-Tov Lipmann Heller (d. 1654) and the astronomer and historian David Gans (1541–1613; see also SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS). Rivkah bas Meir Tiktiner (d. 1605), the first woman known to have published an entire Hebrew composition, Meneket Rivkah (Rebekah's Nurse), a guide to pious behavior for women, also lived for some time in Prague and is buried there. Medieval and early modern gravestone inscriptions single out at least a half-dozen additional women for their level of learning or because they preached to other women.

Rudolf's reign was followed by political disintegration and the outbreak of the Thirty Years War, and Prague's Jews marked decisive events in their liturgical calendar with annual days of commemoration recalling, for example, the second Defenestration of Prague (1618) and the Battle of White Mountain (1620). At first Jews gained materially from the seventeenth-century re-Catholicization of Prague; some purchased the homes of exiled Protestant nobles, greatly expanding the size of the Jewish Quarter. By the second half of the seventeenth century, however, the general deterioration of Bohemia's political and cultural situation affected Jewish life as well. Plague took thousands of lives during 1679–80, and a fire in 1689 leveled the Jewish Quarter. Homelessness forced Jews to rent accommodations in Christian homes, leading to calls for a permanent elimination, relocation, or reduction of the Jewish community. Nonetheless, the quarter was rebuilt in its original location.

Relative stability returned briefly during the tenure of David Oppenheim, appointed chief rabbi in 1702. Beila Horowitz and Rachel Raudnitz published a Yiddish tale of the Jewish community's origins. Pressures to reduce the Jewish population prevailed, however, with the 1726 enactment of the Familiants laws, which limited the number of Jewish families in the country. In 1744, Maria Theresa ordered the expulsion of Prague's Jews, arousing both strident opposition and international Jewish diplomatic efforts. Jews returned to the city by 1748, but in 1754 fire again devastated the Jewish Quarter.

Joseph II's Edicts of Tolerance (1781–82) opened new doors for Bohemia's Jews by removing many restrictions based on religion, but they also signaled the dismantling of Jewish autonomy. Chief Rabbi Ezekiel Landau (1754–1793), a prominent scholar, supported some reforms while fighting for the continuation of traditional Jewish practice against Haskalah* thinkers like Peter Beer (ca. 1758–1838) and Herz Homberg (1749–1841). Solomon Judah Rapoport (1790–1867), a prominent maskil (supporter of Haskalah) of the following generation, was also active in Prague.

Between 1896 and 1912, the now impoverished Jewish Quarter was completely cleared and rebuilt; six of the original synagogues, including the thirteenth-century Altneuschul, and the Jewish Town Hall remained standing. To save what he could of the old ghetto's material remains, Salomon Hugo Lieben established the Jewish Museum of Prague (see also MUSEUMS). Also around this time, a variety of *Zionist and other Jewish movements were active in Prague. A large circle of Jews often met in the salon run by Berta Fanta, which Albert *Einstein also visited.

After the *Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia, Lieben, librarian Tobias Jakobovits, and their colleagues in the Jewish Museum reached an arrangement with the occupiers. They continued to collect and catalogue artifacts, many from Bohemian and Moravian Jewish communities effectively eliminated by deportations, for what the Nazis presumed would be a museum to the extinct race. Lieben died in Prague in 1942, and Jakobovits was eventually deported and perished in *Auschwitz. Thanks to their efforts and those of their staff, however, innumerable artifacts and documents were preserved, and the Jewish Museum in Prague still houses extensive collections of Judaica, including more than 11,000 textiles. During the communist era, Jewish property and institutions, including the museum, were nationalized. Most have been returned to the Jewish community since the 1989 Velvet Revolution. Today, the Jewish Museum collections are housed in several of the surviving synagogue buildings, and the city has a number of active synagogues and prayer groups of various denominations, a Jewish school, and kosher restaurants.

For further reading, see D. Altschuler, ed., The Precious Legacy: Judaic Treasures from the Czechoslovak State Collection (1983); P. Demetz, Prague in Black and Gold: Scenes from the Life of a European City (1997); H. J. Kieval, Languages of Community: The Jewish Experience in the Czech Lands (2000); and M. Vilímková, The Prague Ghetto (1990). Map 8

RACHEL L. GREENBLATT

Prayer: See BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE; BLESSINGS; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP; and entries that follow

Prayer: Women's Devotional. Prayer in Judaism developed as private, individual supplication among men and women alike. Biblical prayers (see BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE) are presented as spontaneous appeals to *God, with specific, direct requests. Examples of women who pray include the matriarchs *Sarah, *Rebekah, *Rachel, and *Leah. However, the Bible generally does not provide us with the texts of these prayers. One of the first private prayers whose actual wording is recorded is that of Moses, who beseeches God on behalf of his sister Miriam: "God – I pray You; please heal her" (Num 12:13). The first complete woman's prayer is the supplication of *Hannah (the mother of the prophet Samuel) for a son. Later on, Hannah's heartfelt, intimate, whispered appeal to God was adopted as the paradigm for the individual prayer (amidah) that is at the heart of every public worship service (see WORSHIP). Her contribution is commemorated in the introduction to prayer books used in many Jewish communities, with the words, "And Hannah prayed . . ."

The destruction of the Second Temple led to the development of the public prayer service as a replacement for the daily sacrifices and ultimately to the development of written liturgy. Men, as participants in the formal synagogue prayer quorum (minyān*), henceforth followed a set liturgical Hebrew text for public worship that was ultimately recorded in the prayer book (siddur*). This public and communal orientation dictated the wording of the prayers, their subject matter, and their language. Still, when people felt that the prayer book failed to address their own private challenges and difficulties, they were entitled, even within the framework of the communal prayer service, to choose their own subjects for prayer, to use their own words, and to pray in their own way.

According to halakhah*, women are required to pray as individuals, but they are exempt from time-bound commandments that include participation in public prayer (M. Kiddushin 1:7). Thus, their connection with the synagogue and the formal prayer service has traditionally been far more tenuous than that of men. M. Berakhot 3:3 exempts women from mandatory participation in the recitation of the shema*, but requires them to participate in the grace after meals (see BLESSINGS: BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS) and "prayer." Medieval rabbis disagreed over whether this prayer is "the Prayer" (i.e., the amidah) or simply a requirement for daily prayerfulness. In addition, women were generally removed from the world of the religious study hall; they had little formal religious education and were generally unfamiliar with the Hebrew language. They spoke the language of their surroundings or its adaptation by the Jewish community (in Eastern Europe – Yiddish*; among Spanish exiles – Ladino*; in Yemen* and other Arab countries – Judeo-Arabic*). Halakhah permits a person to pray in the language with which he or she is most familiar. As Rabbi Abraham Danzig (Poland, 1748–1820) wrote in Hayyei Adam, his authoritative halakhic guide, "Those who do not understand the Holy Tongue, along with women, should rather pray in a language that they understand; only, they should pray wholeheartedly" (Rule 22:12). In some communities, a female "leader" (firzogerin) would recite the traditional (Hebrew) prayers in the local vernacular in the women's section of the medieval synagogue, and the other women gathered would repeat them after her. As early as the thirteenth century there is evidence of women "cantors*" who led other women in prayer (see WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES).

Women's lack of familiarity with Hebrew, along with the particular needs and difficulties of their lives, created an opportunity for liturgical creativity and for personal, private prayer. The rich tapestry of women's prayer customs, rituals, and formulas created over the course of Jewish history reflects different periods, different styles, and different languages. Many of these traditions were passed down from mother to daughter within the home, without ever being committed to writing. (Sometimes, as in the case of the Spanish and Portuguese conversos*, secrecy was of the utmost importance.) Some of the prayers that have been preserved in writing testify to extensive familiarity with religious texts. Examples of women liturgists include the medieval Rabbanit Marcena of Gerona; the seventeenth-century Asnat Mizraḥi of the Barzani rabbinical family, who eventually became the head of the yeshivah in Mosul, Kurdistan*; and the eighteenth-century Sarah Rebekah Rachel Leah Horowitz, learned author of Tkhine imohes (Supplication of the Matriarchs). Horowitz composed an Aramaic* prayer in rabbinic style, together with a Hebrew introduction and Yiddish* prose translation. Devorà Ascarelli* translated Hebrew liturgical poetry into rhymed Italian, presumably for use by female worshipers. Her Abitacolo degli oranti (Abode of the Suppliants) was completed in 1537 and published in 1601.

In Central* and Eastern Europe*, starting in the sixteenth century, a tradition developed among educated, religious women of reciting supplications, called tkhines in Yiddish, for female use in domestic rituals and in synagogue worship. Collections of such vernacular prayers, many written by men, began to appear in the sixteenth century; the invention of printing* facilitated their production and spread. Most books of tkhines were arranged in order of subject, with no mention of the names of their authors. Where names do appear, they are mostly figures about whom little is known. Sarah bas Tovim (early-eighteenth-century Poland*) was among the most beloved composers of tkhines. Her Shloyshe sheorim (The Three Gates) includes prayers for the three "women's commandments" (ḥallah [the Sabbath* loaves], niddah*, and hadlakah [kindling Sabbath lights]) as well as tkhines for the High Holidays* and Sabbath (see also WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE).

Another notable figure is Fanny Neuda, (d. 1894) who composed a book of prayers in German for women and girls that was published in Prague* in 1855. Her Stunden der Andacht (Hours of Devotion) went through twenty-eight editions by the 1920s and was also translated into English. Recent decades have witnessed a flourishing of women's prayers. Some communities have adopted certain prayers composed by women to be recited by the congregation as a whole; in some places it has become customary for women to recite prayers on significant occasions in their lives or as part of newly created rituals that highlight women's rites of passage.

For further reading, see A. Lavie, A Jewish Woman's Prayer Book (2008); E. Taitz, "Women Voices, Women's Prayers: Women in the European Synagogues of the Middle Ages," in Daughters of the King: Women and the Synagogue, ed. S. Grossman and R. Haut (1992); V. L. Ochs, Inventing Jewish Ritual (2007); E. M. Umansky and D. Ashton, eds., Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality: A Sourcebook, rev. ed. (2008); and C. Weissler, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women (1999); also see BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE; JUDAISM, FEMINIST; PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WORSHIP.

ALIZA LAVIE

Prayer Books (see also WORSHIP). The first formal Jewish prayer books (siddur; pl. siddurim, from seder, the Hebrew word for "order") originate during the period of the Geonim* (ca. 600–1038). The Seder Rav Amram Gaon (ca. 875) was the response of the Babylonian Gaon, Rav Amram* bar Sheshna, to a Spanish Jewish community's request for a detailing of the annual order of prayers (see RESPONSA LITERATURE). Subsequently, Saadia* Gaon produced the Kitāb Jāmi'al-Halawāt wa 'l-Tasābīḥ (The Comprehensive Book of Prayers and Praises). These books contributed enormously toward the standardization of the liturgy. The earlier of the two, Seder Rav Amram, was sent to the Jews of Spain at their request around 860. It included all of the regular prayers according to the annual cycle for weekdays, *Sabbaths, *festivals, *New Moons, *fasts, and the holidays of *Hanukkah and *Purim. Each section of prayers was prefaced with the pertinent laws (see HALAKHAH), and at the end, there were special prayers and benedictions for use in daily life (e.g., blessings to be recited before partaking of specific foods or at grace after meals [see BLESSINGS: BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS]) and for rites of passage in the *life cycle (e.g., *circumcision, *marriage, and burial). As a work of literature, Rav Amram's prayer book pales in comparison with Saadia's liturgical masterpiece, composed some time between 928 and 942. Saadia's prayer book went far beyond Rav Amram's and, for that matter, most later prayer books in that it was not merely an arranged compilation of existing prayers. The Kitāb Jāmi 'al-Halawāt wa 'l-Tasābīh offered the worshiper a complete and systematic introduction to the subject of liturgy, its historical evolution, significance, and rationale. It also provided helpful notes and comments to the service and to individual prayers, all in *Judeo-Arabic, rather than *Hebrew, for easy understanding by the lay person. In addition to the required prayers, Saadia included liturgical poems (piyyutim) by great poets of the past, such as Jose ben Jose, as well as his own poetical creations, which were highly regarded by later generations and served as thematic and linguistic models for liturgical poets of the golden age of Hebrew letters in Islamic Spain (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; SPAIN, MUSLIM).

Local variations in prayer books were common until the development of *printing centralized the production of prayer books regionally. Iberian (*Sephardi) Jews, expelled from *Spain in 1492 and *Portugal in 1497, also imposed their own rite or prayer practices in their new communities, leading to the virtual disappearance of the local liturgies of *North Africa, the *Balkans, and the entire Middle East (except *Yemen). Printed prayer books according to the Sephardi rite, usually produced in *Italy, become standard in these countries.

Prayer Books: United States (see also WORSHIP). The first prayer books (siddurim) edited in the *United States appeared in the second half of the nineteenth century. Like their Western European counterparts, these books were largely the work of individual, non-Orthodox rabbis who adapted, to varying degrees, the inherited rabbinic liturgy to conform to the rationalist temper of the age; to insights emerging from scientific inquiry, comparative religion, and biblical criticism; and to sensitivities resulting from the growing social and cultural integration of the Jewish community into American life. In these prayer books, references to *revelation of the Torah at Sinai, the physical *resurrection of the dead, a personal *messiah, the splitting of the Red Sea, biblical understandings of divine reward and punishment (see COVENANT), requests for the reinstitution of the sacrificial system (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT), the ingathering of the exiles (see ESCHATOLOGY), and assertions of Jewish *election were often replaced or, in deference to the text's antiquity, translated nonliterally.

*Reform Judaism's Union Prayer Book (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA), published in 1895 (with successive updated editions), was the first prayer book produced by a movement. It was followed by the Reconstructionist Sabbath Prayer Book (1945) and the Conservative Sabbath and Festival Prayer Book (1946; see JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST). *High Holiday and daily liturgies were also published by the Reform and Reconstructionist movements in the first half of the twentieth century. All of these siddurim reflected the sensitivities evident in the individually edited liturgies of the previous century.

Each of the liberal movements has revised its official liturgy in the last half-century, sometimes more than once. Reform Judaism published Gates of Prayer in 1975 and Gates of Repentance in 1978, and Mishkan T'filah, an entirely new *Sabbath, weekday, and *festival prayer book, in 2007. Conservative Judaism published Siddur Sim Shalom: A Prayer Book for Shabbat, Festivals and Weekdays in 1985; a significantly revised edition appeared in 1998. The Conservative movement's first High Holiday liturgy was released in 1972; a revised version, Maḥzor Lev Shalem, appeared in 2010. The Reconstructionist Kol Haneshamah prayer book series appeared between 1989 and 1999. As in the nineteenth century, liturgies have also been created by individuals, most notably by Sydney Greenberg and Jonathan D. Levine (Likrat Shabbat [1971]) and Marcia Falk (The Book of Blessings [1996]).

The many factors that have motivated this hunger for new liturgy include the feminist critique of traditional androcentric language used to address God (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST); issues surrounding the horrors of the *Holocaust and the founding of the State of *Israel; increased interest in mysticism (see KABBALAH) and spirituality; the growing informality of English usage; the thirst for novelty; renewed affirmation of liturgical forms that were previously rejected; and the growing number of Jews who lack *synagogue and Hebrew literacy, on the one hand, and those who wish to return more Hebrew to the liturgy, on the other.

The first American *Orthodox siddurim were reprints of traditional European prayer books. This changed in 1949 with the publication of Phillip Birnbaum's Ha-Siddur ha-Shalem, followed in 1960 by David de Sola Pool's Traditional Prayer Book. These siddurim did not revise the established liturgical texts but responded to modern sensitivities by including English readings, a contemporary commentary, and prayers for the State of Israel and the United States. English readings are omitted in the widely used The Complete Artscroll Siddur (1984), but the text includes an extensive rubric and a less formal English translation; one edition provides a complete transliteration of the Hebrew prayers. These changes reflect a community that has become ritually stringent in the last thirty years while attracting greater numbers of Jews not raised in observant households.

ERIC CAPLAN

Priesand, Sally Jane (b. 1946) was the first woman ordained a rabbi in North America (June 1972). As a teenager in Cleveland, Ohio, Priesand had little sense of the challenges she would face as a woman pioneering in a male-dominated profession. When she matriculated at Reform *Judaism's *Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 1968, she found herself in the media spotlight. She met faculty opposed to the ordination of any woman and synagogue members who viewed her as a curiosity.

In 1972, she became assistant rabbi at *New York City's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue (1972–79). From 1979 to 1981 she held part-time positions and in 1981 became rabbi at Monmouth Reform Temple in Tinton Falls, New Jersey. There, until her retirement in 2006, she acted on her conviction that a rabbi's primary task is to enable Jews to take responsibility for their Judaism. The author of Judaism and the New Woman (1975), Rabbi Priesand asked her congregants to share her passions for Judaism, social justice, women's equality, and *Israel. See also JUDAISM; FEMINIST; RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN.

PAMELA S. NADELL

Priests and Priesthood: See AARON; CANAAN, CANAANITES; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP

Printing. This entry surveys books printed with Hebrew type and includes not only books written in *Hebrew but also works in *Yiddish, *Ladino (Judeo-Spanish), *Aramaic, Judeo-Italian, *Judeo-Arabic, and Judeo-Greek that have been printed in Hebrew alphabets.

FIFTEENTH CENTURY: Hebrew incunabula (books printed before January 1501) appeared in *Italy, *Spain, *Portugal, and in the *Ottoman Empire (one edition only). According to modern research about one hundred and forty editions, printed on about forty presses, were printed in the incunabular period. Many of these editions are rare; in all, about two thousand copies are preserved in public collections, and approximately one hundred are in private hands, dispersed around the globe.

The first dated Hebrew printed book was finished on February 17, 1475, in southern Italy by Abraham ben Garton. However, as early as 1469–72 a group of six undated books was printed in Rome. One of these editions mentions the names of Obadiah, Manasseh, and Benjamin of Rome. From a number of technical features it appears that the large Hebrew dictionary (Sefer ha-Shorashim [Book of Roots]) by David *Kimḥi was the first Hebrew book ever printed. In 1475 the press of Meshullam Cusi was active in northern *Italy, and between 1474 and 1477 Abraham Conat published attractive books. The first Jewish woman mentioned as associated with a printing press was Abraham Conat's wife Estellina. In 1482 Abraham ben Ḥayyim of Pesaro printed the first Hebrew *Pentateuch at Bologna. After 1483, members of the Soncino family became the leading printers of Hebrew books in Italy. Joshua Solomon began to publish separate treatises from the Babylonian *Talmud in the town of Soncino. Also working at Soncino were his nephews Gershom and Solomon. Under pressure from the Catholic Church, Joshua Solomon had to flee to Naples; Gershom became an itinerant printer who established presses at Brescia, Barco; later at Fano, Pesaro, Altona, Rimini, Ancona, and Cesena; and finally at Salonika and Constantinople. In 1494 Gershom published a vocalized Hebrew Bible in Brescia; it has become famous because Martin Luther used it as a source for his German translation of the Old Testament (see REFORMATION). The Soncino family published more than one-third of all the Hebrew incunabula ever printed. In Naples a second Hebrew press belonged to Joseph ben Jacob Ashkenazi Gunzenhauser and his son Azriel. Probably as a result of the war between *France and the kingdom of Naples, the production of Hebrew books there came to an end in about 1492, after twenty books had been published.

Knowledge of the history of Hebrew book production in the Iberian Peninsula during the fifteenth century is limited, because much historical evidence was destroyed with the expulsion of the Jews from *Spain in 1492 and subsequent events in *Portugal in 1497. *Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch from the press of Solomon ben Moses Alkabit Halévi at Guadalajara, probably dating from 1476, is the oldest known Spanish Hebrew printed book. Like the first dated Italian Hebrew book, which happens to be the same text, it is known from one copy only. Ten years later Eliezer Alantansi was active at Híjar. His books display a high degree of aesthetic quality. In Zamora, Samuel ben Musa printed another commentary on the Pentateuch by Rashi, probably in 1492, again known from one copy only.

The first Hebrew book to be printed in Portugal was an edition of the Pentateuch, issued in 1487 at Faro from the press of Samuel Giacon; only one copy is known. In Lisbon Eliezer Toledano published a number of very fine printed books. In Leiria Samuel Dortas owned a printing shop together with his sons. He published not only Hebrew books but also volumes in Latin and Spanish.

The first Hebrew press in the *Ottoman Empire was founded as early as 1493. The brothers Samuel and David ibn Naḥmias, who had escaped from Spain, published *Jacob ben Asher's popular Arba'ah Turim (The Four Orders of the Code Of Law) on December 13, 1493, in Constantinople. This was the first book in a long succession of more than eight hundred Hebrew and Ladino publications printed in that city up to the twentieth century.

SIXTEENTH CENTURY: After two centuries of expulsions (*England, *France, *Germany, and Spain), almost the whole of Europe, with the exception of northern Italy and the Papal States, was closed to Jews. The result was a radical shift eastward. At the same time, the spread of Hebrew printing continued throughout the sixteenth century; new Hebrew presses were established not only in France, Germany, Switzerland, *Poland, *Czechoslovakia, and the Low Countries but also in Morocco (see NORTH AFRICA), *Egypt, and the Land of *Israel.

Originally, Hebrew printing in Italy was dominated by Gershom Soncino. However, after Daniel Bomberg established his Hebrew press in *Venice, Soncino was surpassed. Bomberg invested large sums of money in his firm and published more than two hundred and twenty Hebrew works with the help of famous Jewish scholars. His large rabbinic bibles in three editions are famous all over the world. Thereafter, Venice became the center of Hebrew printing for a long period. The owners of the presses were Christians, like de Farri, Giustiniani, Bragadini, Zanetti, di Gara, Cavalli, and Grypho but the typesetters and correctors were mainly Jews. Outside Venice, Hebrew presses were active in Genoa, Mantua, Rome, and Bologna. The Venetian editions of the *Talmud were extremely important. However, a struggle between Giustiniani and Bragadini caused the confiscation and burning of thousands of Talmud volumes in 1554 by the Catholic Church, after which it was forbidden to print the Talmud in Italy. Important printing houses were established in the second half of the century in Cremona, Ferrara, Mantua, Riva di Trento, Sabbioneta, and Verona.

Outside Europe, Hebrew printing developed mainly in the Ottoman Empire. Many presses flourished in Constantinople/Istanbul. Closely associated were the Hebrew presses in Salonika. Short-lived presses were also established in Adrianople, Cairo, Safed, and Fez.

In Eastern Europe a flourishing printing office was set up in Prague by Gershom Cohen, the founder of a dynasty of printers. His Passover haggadah of 1526 became widely famous as the first lavishly illustrated printed Passover ritual. In Oels, Augsburg, Ichenhausen, and Heddernheim, both Hebrew and Yiddish texts were published (including the medieval rhymed versions of the books of Samuel and Kings). In Poland, the Helicz brothers were active in Kraków. Hayyim Shwarts and his son established a press in Lublin associated with Eliezer ben Isaac Ashkenazi, who moved in 1577 to Safed to publish the first book printed in the Holy Land. In 1562 Kalonymos ben Mordecai Jaffe set up a printing office in Lublin that was carried on by his heirs up to the end of the seventeenth century.

Christian printers of Hebrew books outside Italy include Martin Le Jeune and Chrétien Wechel in Paris; Robertus I Stephanus (Estienne) in Paris and Geneva; Froben and Petri in Basel; and Froschouer in Zürich. In Germany, Hebrew books appeared in Tübingen, Augsburg, Cologne, Mainz, Wittenberg, Leipzig, Solingen, and Isny. Christoph Plantin of Antwerp produced a number of editions of the Hebrew Bible. One of his most prestigious projects was the large polyglot Biblia Regia.

SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES: At the end of the sixteenth century Sephardic Jews settled in Amsterdam where the need for a Hebrew printing office was soon felt. On January 1, 1627, Menasseh ben Israel, the well-known rabbi, printer, and diplomat, published a Hebrew prayer book. Amsterdam now became the new international center of Hebrew printing. By 1655 Menasseh's press had published about fifty Hebrew books (and some Yiddish), in addition to works in Spanish, Portuguese, and Dutch. In 1640 Immanuel Benveniste established himself as a printer of Hebrew books in Amsterdam. In the next nineteen years he published almost every important text from Jewish literature. His uncensored edition of the Babylonian Talmud (1644–48) became famous. His employer Uri Feiwesh Halevi, grandson of the first rabbi in Amsterdam, became his successor in 1658. He published Hebrew and Yiddish books, especially for German and Polish Jews in the city; he also published the first newspaper in Yiddish, which appeared every Tuesday and Friday.

In 1654 Joseph Athias founded a printing office in Amsterdam. In addition to Hebrew books, he also published books in other languages. He published a Yiddish Bible in competition with Uri Feiwesh Halevi with poor results, but his Hebrew Bible met with much more success; the edition had to be reprinted in 1667, and he was rewarded by the Dutch authorities for this achievement. His Bible became the leading text edition well into the nineteenth century. His son Immanuel Athias continued the press until 1714. His monumental edition of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah in 1702/3 is considered by specialists to be the most beautifully printed Hebrew book ever produced in Amsterdam. Another member of the Athias family, Abraham, was a printer of Hebrew books from 1728 to 1746. David de Castro Tartas published important editions at the end of the seventeenth century. In addition to these large printing concerns, quite a number of smaller shops were active, including those of Jehudah ben Mordecai, Samuel ben Moses Halevi, Reuben ben Elyakim, Jacob and Isaac de Cordova, Moses Kosman Emerich, Moses Dias, Asher Anshel Shoḥet, Moses Mendes Coutinho, Joseph Dayan, Moses Frankfurt, Isaac Jehudah Leon Templo, and Naftali Hirz Levi Rofeh and his heirs (up to 1813). Most important during more than two centuries was the firm of Proops, which held a monopoly on the Hebrew book market until the economic crisis in the Netherlands at the end of the eighteenth century.

In Germany, many Hebrew presses were active, but Jews were hardly ever allowed to own a press. Very often, the owners were Christians, who left the actual printing to Jewish specialists. There were Hebrew presses at Fürth, Sulzbach and Wilhermsdorf; at Dessau, Dyhernfurth and Halle; at Altona, Berlin, Frankfurt on the Main and Frankfurt on the Oder, Gotha, Hamburg, Hanau, Jessnitz, Karlsruhe, Neuwied, Offenbach, and Wandsbeck.

NEW ERA: By 1760 the center of Hebrew printing had moved to Eastern Europe. At the same time ecclesiastical and governmental censorship increased. Many local presses came into being, but were heavily supervised and produced books of inferior quality. In Russia the first Hebrew book was published in 1760. More than thirty presses were established in the Ukraine, Belorussia, Lithuania, and Poland. Vilna became a center, where the Romm family edited rabbinic texts. Warsaw became more and more important, and by about 1800 Vienna had a leading position. Influenced by the Mendelssohnian Enlightenment (Haskalah), new Hebrew presses in Berlin, Königsberg, and Breslau were established. The first Hebrew journal, Ha-Me'assef (The Gatherer) was published in Berlin between 1783 and 1811 (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH). In France, Hebrew presses became active in Metz (about 1760), Strasbourg (about 1770), and Paris (1806). Hebrew presses existed in Britain in London and Edinburgh; in Italy, Livorno, Pisa, and Reggio Emilia had Hebrew printing offices. Jewish printers worked in the United States, beginning in New York City as early as 1825. At the end of the nineteenth century, Hebrew presses were established in every city in Canada with a substantial Jewish community, including Toronto. Yiddish and Hebrew journals were also published in many locations (see JOURNALISM: YIDDISH; PERIODICALS: CANADA: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES).

There was a short typographical renaissance between the world wars. E. Lissitzky designed splendid books in Moscow, Kiev, Odessa, and Berlin (see ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS). The "Soncino Gesellschaft" in Berlin stimulated the love for fine printing; Jewish designers who became interested in the development of new Hebrew type faces included Rafael Frank with his Frank-Ruehl letter. Henri Friedländer developed a completely new type face, the Hadassah type. In Israel, E. Korén's new type face was used in the so-called Korén-Bible, a masterpiece of Modern Hebrew typography. After 1948, the State of Israel became a center of new developments in the printing and publishing of Hebrew books.

For further reading see “Printing, Hebrew,” in Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (2007), 16: 529–40; S. Iakerson, Catalogue of Hebrew Incunabula from the Collection of the Library of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America (2004–05); Catalogue of Books Printed in the XVth Century Now in the British Library: BMC Part XIII, Hebraica, compiled by A. K. Offenber (2004); M. J. Heller, The Sixteenth Century Hebrew Book. An Abridged Thesaurus (2004); L. Fuks and R. G. Fuks-Mansfeld, Hebrew Typography in the Northern Netherlands 1585–1815 (1984, 1987); and H. Friedlaender, The Making of Hadasah Hebrew (1975); see also WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE.
ADRI K. OFFENBERG

Prophets (Nevi'im) is the second section of the three traditional divisions of the Tanakh* (see also BIBLE, HEBREW; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). The books in this division include the historical books of *Joshua through *Kings, which contain narratives about rulers and prophets (often known as Former Prophets), and books that collect the prophecies of specific individuals (often known as Latter Prophets). Three of these books in the Latter Prophets – Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel – are generally designated as the Major Prophets, because of their considerable length. The other far shorter books in the Latter Prophets are known as the Minor Prophets and also as the Twelve Prophets. The books in the Prophets division of the Tanakh appear in the following order: *Joshua; *Judges; 1 and 2 *Samuel; 1 and 2 *Kings; and *Isaiah; *Jeremiah; *Ezekiel; *Hosea; *Joel; *Amos; *Obadiah; *Jonah; *Micah; *Nahum; *Habakkuk; *Zephaniah; *Haggai; *Zechariah; and *Malachi.

Prostitutes, Prostitution: Hebrew Bible Through Middle Ages. The Hebrew *Bible mentions many times the practice of offering sexual services in return for material compensation, both in its literal sense and as a metaphor for Israel's worship of other gods. The Hebrew term for prostitution, zenut, zenunim, also serves as a general term for sex outside of marriage in the Hebrew Bible and Jewish texts in general, so that it is occasionally uncertain which activity a text is addressing. In Hebrew, the prostitute is called a zonah, but perhaps also a kedeshah. References to prostitution by males are ambiguous (Deut 23:18–19; 1 Kgs 22:47). Legislation in the Torah attempts to outlaw prostitution, although it states no penalty, except for the daughter of a *priest who is to be burned (Deut 23:18; Lev 19:29, 21:9). A prostitute is forbidden to bring her wages to the sanctuary as payment for any vow (Deut 23:19), and a priest may not marry a prostitute (Lev 21:7, 14). In contrast, biblical narratives show a more benign attitude to the prostitute. Rahab, the prostitute of *Jericho, shows exemplary faith and foresight when she harbors Israelite spies (Josh 2, 6). *Tamar poses as a prostitute to seduce *Judah for a just cause and becomes the ancestor of *David and the line of the *Messiah (Gen 38). One of the unnamed prostitutes who come before King *Solomon for justice shows unselfish compassion (1 Kgs 3).

In addition to common prostitution, modern scholars have assumed the existence of “cultic” or “temple” prostitution both in Israel and its neighbors. In this case, a shrine or temple receives the payment for sexual relations, either because the prostitute was the employee of the temple or because an individual had sexual relations in fulfillment of a vow. The Hebrew term kadesh/kedeshah is associated with this form of prostitution in particular because of the association of the root k-d-sh with holiness (Gen 38; Deut 23:18, Hos 4:14; 1 Kgs 22:47). Biblical scholarship in recent years has expressed greater skepticism about the existence or prevalence of these practices.

Prostitution is frequently used in the Hebrew Bible as a metaphor for Israel's abandonment of its covenant and the worship of other gods. This is evident in the expression, “to whore after other gods” (Exod 34:15–16; Deut 31:16; Judg 2:17), and in the allegories found in prophetic books (Hos 1–3; Jer 2:20–25, 3; Ezek 16, 23).

In post-biblical Jewish texts, the introduction of prostitutes in the Jerusalem *Temple was considered an outrageous desecration of its holiness (2 Macc 6; BT Gittin 56b). To specify those who are off-limits for marriage to a priest, the *Talmud expands the definition of a prostitute, zonah, to include any woman who has sexual intercourse outside the context of *marriage; female converts to Judaism along with emancipated slave women are included in this category because it is assumed that they were previously promiscuous (BT Yevamot 61a). The Talmud imagines that professional prostitutes may be either Jewish or Gentile, but in either case, a Jewish man must stay at least four cubits from a prostitute's door (BT Avodah Zarah 17a). According to the Talmud, an extravagantly expensive Gentile prostitute converted to Judaism and married a Jew because his tzitzit (ritual *fringes) miraculously prevented him from having sexual relations with her (BT Menaḥot 44a).

Jewish texts from the medieval period attest to the existence of Jewish prostitutes and brothels in Jewish neighborhoods. Jewish authorities tolerated and on occasion even subsidized prostitution in Jewish communities because it was thought to serve a positive function in preventing the violation of virgins and married women, a notion adopted from Christian society.

For further reading, see E. A. Goodfriend, “Prostitution,” Anchor Bible Dictionary (1992), 5:505–10; J. R. Baskin, “Prostitution: Not a Job for a Nice Jewish Girl,” in The Passionate Torah: Sex and Judaism, ed. D. Rutenber (2009), 29–35; A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2004), 133–47; and Y. Assis, “Sexual Behavior in Medieval Hispano-Jewish Society,” in Jewish History, ed. A. Rapoport-Albert and S. Zipperstein (1998), 25–59.

ELAINE A. GOODFRIEND

Prostitutes, Prostitution: Modern Era. During the late nineteenth century, there was significant Jewish involvement in the “white slave trade,” a euphemism for the trafficking of women across international borders for the purpose of prostitution. Impoverishment, social breakdown, and a high degree of geographic mobility in Eastern Europe enabled profiteers to induce or entrap Jewish women to travel abroad and serve as prostitutes. Young widows, abandoned wives (agunot*), spinsters, or “ruined women” were offered an escape from poverty and shame and the promise of riches in distant lands. On arrival the women were usually placed in brothels where they had to work, initially without pay, to pay back all of the fees incurred through their travels. Some young women from poor families were tricked into “marriages” and then transported abroad to a life of prostitution. Others became prostitutes of their own volition to escape the drudgery of factory or domestic work or the grinding poverty of family life.

Jews neither controlled nor dominated the white slave trade, but they did oversee the large and lucrative traffic in Jewish women. By the turn of the twentieth century, Jewish criminal gangs managed a complex system of routes, personnel, brothels, and corrupted officials. Obtaining accurate statistics on Jewish prostitution is nearly impossible. Although prostitution was legal in most European states in the late nineteenth century, it carried a social stigma and legal consequences, such as the need to submit to regular medical examinations. Additionally, many women engaged in prostitution only on an occasional basis. Nonetheless it is estimated that the proportion of Jews among prostitutes was never, even at its height, greater than the proportion of Jews in the population.

Jewish women from Europe were sent as far as *South Africa and the Far East, with *Britain and Constantinople serving as major transit points; one of the main destinations was *Latin America. Latin American countries were eager to attract European immigrants and imported thousands of young men to serve in their growing economies. Open borders and underdeveloped law enforcement capacities led to rampant prostitution. In 1900, shortly after having been excluded from the Jewish cemetery by the local burial society, the Polish Jewish pimps of Buenos Aires chartered a mutual aid society and obtained their own cemetery (see *Argentina). The groups that came to be known as the Zwi Migdal Society later had a *synagogue as well. This was only the most infamous of a series of Jewish communal institutions established by and for criminal elements around the world.

North America was another destination of the white slave trade, as well as a recruiting ground. Crowded and poor immigrant neighborhoods in cities across the United States provided ideal conditions for prostitution.

Opposition to trafficking in women began in the 1880s. Sensational press stories about kidnappings of young girls raised general as well as Jewish opposition, and non-Jewish organizations began to form to combat the white slave trade. In 1899, Britain's fiery evangelical campaigner William Coote toured Europe trying to raise awareness about the need to regulate cross-border traffic and protect women. The *Rothschild family partly financed Coote's trip. Only several years previously, the formation of the Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women had created a central agency for British Jewish action. In Germany, Bertha *Pappenheim tirelessly fought for the rights of women. Combating the trade in women was one of the central platforms of her Jüdischer Frauenbund, established in 1904. This and other voluntary associations across Europe established travelers aid stations at major terminals and worked to have laws changed to prevent the free movement of human traffic. Equally important, they established international communication lines. The National Council of Jewish Women in the United States undertook similar initiatives in the American immigrant community (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA).

*World War I essentially put an end to the period of major Jewish involvement in prostitution. Jewish prostitution and small-scale procuring and trafficking continued, but the conditions were no longer ripe for large-scale activities as emigration slowed down and Jews in western countries increasingly moved up the economic ladder.

Prostitution once again came to the fore in Jewish communal concerns after the collapse of the *Soviet Union and the large-scale immigration of former Soviet citizens to *Israel in the 1990s. Among the many immigrants was a small minority of individuals involved in a variety of criminal activities, including trafficking and prostitution. The relatively open immigration policies contained in the Law of Return made Israel a useful hub for international criminal enterprise. Vulnerable women from every ethnic group in the former Soviet Union were brought into Israel either voluntarily or in some cases by deception to serve as prostitutes in Israel or to be shipped elsewhere. As the scope and size of the problem became clear, the Israeli government worked with internal nongovernmental organizations and women's groups as well as international bodies to craft appropriate policies on judicial and criminal matters, as well as issues of rehabilitation and repatriation. Although these efforts did not end the international traffic in women, by 2004 they had proven effective in increasing both the prosecution of leaders of criminal rings and the rehabilitation of their victims.

For further reading, see E. Bristow, Prostitution and Prejudice: The Jewish Fight against White Slavery 1870–1939 (1983); R. Gershuni, "Trafficking in Persons for the Purpose of Prostitution: The Israeli Experience," Mediterranean Quarterly (Fall 2004): 133–46; N. Glickman, The Jewish White Slave Trade and the Untold Story of Raquel Liberman (2000); and R. Rosen, The Lost Sisterhood: Prostitution in America, 1900–1918 (1982).

ELIYANA R. ADLER

Protestant Reformation: See REFORMATION

Provence: See FRANCE, SOUTHERN

Proverbs is part of the *Writings (Ketuvim), the third section of the Hebrew *Bible. It is usually found following *Psalms, although in some manuscripts *Job precedes it. With Job and *Ecclesiastes, Proverbs comprises biblical wisdom literature.

Proverbs is a collection of sayings intended to teach young men how to live prosperous, happy, and righteous lives. The book believes that wisdom is essential to achieve these goals and frames its purpose as an explication of "proverbs and maxims, the words of the wise and their riddles" (1:6). The Hebrew name of the book, Mishlei, is short for its first two words, mishlei shelomo, part of a title that identifies the contents of the book as "the proverbs of Solomon son of David, king of Israel." Later Jewish literature often quotes Proverbs by introducing it with the words, "Solomon said . . ."

Proverbs 1–9 present extended teachings in praise of wisdom, personified as a female character who sometimes speaks the teachings in praise of herself. In rabbinic tradition, "wisdom" in the book of Proverbs always refers to *Torah. The most well-known verses in the book are 3:17–18: "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace; she is a tree of life to those who hold fast to her, and all who take hold of her are happy." These verses are quoted (in reverse order) in the *synagogue liturgy as the Torah scroll is returned to the ark. Another passage from the book that continues to be a living part of Jewish tradition is 31:10–31, the alphabet acrostic in praise of "the capable woman," known from its first two words as eshet hayil. This has traditionally been recited at the dinner table on *Sabbath evening. In some households, the "capable woman" is understood literally as the woman of the house; in others, it refers to the Torah. In its biblical context, these words were probably meant to match the metaphoric description of “wisdom” as a woman in chapters 1–9, especially Proverbs 8. The bulk of Proverbs, however, is made up of the single-line proverbs that give the book its name. Despite many scholarly efforts to understand them in context, there is no apparent reason for their present arrangement (see also BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE).

According to a famous passage in BT Shabbat 30b, the Sages wished to exclude Proverbs from the Bible because of an apparent contradiction: Proverbs 26:4 advises, “Do not answer a dullard in accord with his folly,” while the next verse gives the opposite advice: “Answer a dullard in accord with his folly.” Because each alternative is sometimes appropriate, cooler heads prevailed. Although the book of Proverbs refers frequently to “the Lord,” there is nothing else specifically Jewish about it except that it is written in Hebrew. Indeed, Proverbs 22:17–24:22 are apparently a Hebraized version of an *Egyptian text teaching similar principles. Nonetheless, the attribution of most of the book to *Solomon secured its solid place in the Bible.

MICHAEL CARASIK

Psalms. The Book of Psalms, in Hebrew Tehillim, is the first book of the third section of the Hebrew *Bible, Ketuvim or Writings. Its English title reflects the Greek translation of the Hebrew term mizmor, which opens many psalms, and means “a song sung to the accompaniment of a plucked instrument.” Tehillim means “songs of praise,” reflecting the most common genre of poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY) in Psalms.

Jewish tradition associates the book with King *David, assuming that he wrote all or most of the psalms that it contains. Approximately half of these psalms open with a superscription or title that contains the word ledavid; it is not clear, however, if this title is meant to ascribe authorship to him or may suggest that the psalm is written in the style of a Davidic composition. Rather than viewing the book of Psalms as composed by David and largely reflecting various prayers recited in response to events in his life, it should be viewed as a nonhaphazard collection of collections of different genres from various places and times, sharing many qualities of ancient *Near Eastern prayers (see BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE).

Psalms has a broad structure: It opens with a psalm comparing the entire collection to the five-part *Torah; indeed, Psalms is divided into five parts or books (1–41, 42–72, 73–89, 90–106, and 107–150). It is not a random collection of prayers, but a structured book that should be studied as Torah. Many of the psalms in the early part of the book are laments or petitions, whereas toward the end, hymns that praise *God predominate: The book thus moves from requests to thanksgiving. There are also psalms commemorating God’s role in history, psalms celebrating God as king, and others. Some are to be recited by individuals, others by the community. There are also some collections within Psalms, such as the Psalms of Ascent (120–134). Psalm 14 is duplicated in a slightly different form in Psalm 53, indicating the complex history of the book and its editing. Some Psalms have a very early origin, such as Psalm 29, which shows clear connections to pre-Israelite *poetry, whereas others are written later, such as Psalm 137, which opens, “By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat.” Although many of the psalms likely originated in the *Temple in Jerusalem, internal references suggest that some (e.g., Psalm 80) were composed in the northern kingdom of *Israel.

It is unclear how individual psalms were used in the Jerusalem Temple or exactly who composed them. A few psalms, such as 118:27, “bind the festal offering to the horns of the altar with cords,” incorporate explicit hints of when they were recited. Most likely there were guilds of Levites such as the Asaphites (see Psalms 50, 73–83), who were in charge of composing and reciting psalms (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). They were well versed in Israelite poetry and ancient Near Eastern prayers, which explains why Psalms shares so many motifs, techniques, and even phrases found in the poetry of Israel’s neighbors. Yet Psalms should not be understood only in terms of its origin. It has had a lasting impact on *Judaism: More than half of the psalms are used as post-biblical liturgy (see WORSHIP), and very many verses from Psalms are recontextualized in Jewish prayer language and quoted in a broad range of Jewish literature.

MARC BRETTLER

Pseudepigrapha means “false writings”; more precisely, this term refers to texts attributed to authors who did not write them. Pseudepigrapha is also the designation for extracanonical Jewish texts composed in the (roughly) five centuries from *Alexander the Great to the end of the second century CE. However, this name is inaccurate on a literal level because only some of these diverse works are falsely attributed to known figures; the remainder are either unattributed or indicate something about their true author.

Jewish pseudepigrapha share essential traits that legitimate grouping them together: Like the canonical texts of Judaism – the Hebrew *Bible and *rabbinic literature – they were all composed by Jews, and they shaped and expressed a range of Jewish self-definitions. However, unlike the canonical texts, these writings did not achieve enduring authority in Judaism; instead, they fell from use and, in many cases, from memory as well. Many survive only because *Christians of late antiquity and the medieval period preserved them out of largely antiquarian interests; others were preserved in the *Apocrypha, in what became the Roman Catholic Old Testament (e.g., *Wisdom of Ben Sira, *Tobit, 1 *Maccabees, etc.). Most of these works survive in Greek, although in some cases they are certainly translations of Hebrew originals. Some pseudepigraphical writings are only extant in other languages of the early church, including Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Ethiopic, and Georgian.

Surveys of the pseudepigrapha typically organize them by genre (e.g., Charlesworth). The chief difficulty with this approach is uncertainty regarding the genre of some pseudepigrapha. An alternative, historical approach surveys the literature by compositional history (e.g., Nickelsburg). It labors under an equally limiting impediment, namely the difficulty of dating works that are often preserved only secondarily. For simplicity of presentation and in spite of its evident deficiencies, this entry uses the genre approach.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE: Apocalyptic literature is generally defined as narrative literature in which an otherworldly being reveals heavenly secrets about a coming new age and place. A number of Jewish pseudepigrapha fit that definition, chief among them 1 Enoch and 4 Ezra (others include 2 Enoch, 3 Enoch, 2 Baruch, *Sibylline Oracles, and Apocalypse of Elijah; see also ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE).

1 Enoch is an anthology of apocalyptic texts ascribed to the biblical Enoch, whose privilege of having “walked with God . . . because God took him” (Gen 5:24) qualified him as a bearer of heavenly mysteries. The texts came into existence over the course of as much as two centuries and explain earthly evil as the consequence of a heavenly rebellion (1 Enoch 6–16; cf. Gen 6:1–4); they include Enoch’s description of his heavenly tour (chs. 7–36) and an “Animal Apocalypse” that assigns animal identities to actors in a historical apocalypse (ch. 83–90). As a whole, 1 Enoch expresses the dissatisfaction of pious Jews with *Hellenistic rulers, “Hell-enizing Jews,” and perhaps even the *Maccabees.

4 Ezra records a sequence of conversations between a seer and an angel and an ensuing sequence of visions that, like parts of 1 Enoch, amount to an historical apocalypse. In the case of 4 Ezra, the apocalyptic vision is more targeted, addressing the sense of loss in the late 70s CE after the destruction of the *Temple by *Rome.

TESTAMENTS: Modeled on the valedictory speech of *Moses in *Deuteronomy 33 and similar works, the testamentary genre is well attested in Jewish pseudepigrapha. The exemplars of this genre generally relate the deathbed speech of a biblical hero in which he instructs and exhorts his children. The Testament of Job, composed some time after the Roman annexation of *Egypt in the late first century BCE, accomplishes the hortatory objective indirectly. In his deathbed speech, *Job tells his second set of children how he came to lose his first family as a result of his opposition to Satan’s maintenance of a temple in Egypt, and that he knew his destruction of Satan’s temple would bring such suffering on him. Yet, he also knew that, if he was patient in his suffering, God would doubly reward him for his perseverance. The work seems to argue for Jewish perseverance in the face of severely diminished prospects as a result of the transition from *Ptolemaic to Roman rule.

A second example, the Testament of Moses, composed some time in the first third of the first century CE, reports Moses’ deathbed speech to *Joshua, who is apprehensive about having to assume leadership. Moses foretells the trials and triumphs of the people of Israel to the days of *Herod and beyond, showing that God’s promises to Israel would prevail over any deficiencies in Joshua’s leadership, as well as the sin and punishment of Israel. Indeed, the history Moses narrates ends with a certain Taxo being martyred, an event that seems to precipitate God’s final judgment against evil, which is described in a hymn in near-apocalyptic terms. Before breaking off (only a single incomplete Latin manuscript of the testament is extant), Joshua expresses his abiding anxiety and Moses reassures him of God’s steadfast commitment to keeping His promises.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs also has a strong anticipatory element: Each speech from the twelve sons of *Jacob recounts an event or events from the patriarch’s life, his exhortation to hold to a virtue or avoid a vice evoked by his narrative, and a prophecy of his descendants’ fate through history to the end of time. In its present form the Testaments is a Christian work, roughly datable to 200 CE. However, as evidenced by the use of Jewish source material in the speech by Levi and some other speeches (see, for example, the *Aramaic Levi Document, attested in the *Dead Sea Scrolls and Cairo *Genizah fragments), most agree that the Christian composition relied on an earlier Jewish original.

Other testaments include the Testament of Solomon, Testament of Adam, and Testaments of the Three Patriarch (*Abraham, *Isaac, and Jacob).

THE BIBLE REWRITTEN, EXPANDED, AND EXPOUNDED: This broad category of texts comprises a range of multi-genre contributions to the literature of early Judaism. Jubilees is an example of the Bible rewritten. Dated some time in the middle of the second century BCE, it is framed as a revelation by the “angel of the presence” to Moses of events from Genesis 1 to Exodus 20. The history covered is divided into 49-year periods (“jubilees”), and it heavily rewrites the corresponding biblical account. It does so for several purposes, among which are assigning to the ancestral period the origin of the pure priesthood in Levi (especially 30–32) and the development of biblical and nonbiblical laws (e.g., the requirement of a 364-day solar calendar). It also aims to rehabilitate the stained reputations of the ancestors in the biblical record. Thus, Jacob’s negative judgment of Levi and Simeon because of the incident involving *Dinah and *Shechem is erased; rather, their zeal is why the *priesthood was assigned to Levi (30:17–20; cf. Gen 34; 49:5–7). It also includes an “apocalypse” in ch. 23 that envisions justification for those who embrace the book’s agenda. This indicates that Jubilees was probably intended as an expansive proposal for how early Judaism should define itself going forward in the *Hasmonean era.

The book, Joseph and Aseneth, exemplifies “the Bible expanded.” This work explains how the devout Israelite *Joseph could have married the daughter of an Egyptian priest of On (Gen 41:45). The first half of the book reports how Aseneth, love-struck from the first moment she saw Joseph, was rejected because she was not an Israelite (8:5). After Aseneth undergoes a complex conversion process, she and Joseph marry (chs. 1–21). The second half reports that Pharaoh’s son, jealous of Joseph, recruits Joseph’s brothers – Dan, Gad, Naphtali, and Asher – to carry out his plot to steal Aseneth and murder Joseph; Simeon and Levi and other brothers save the married couple. In the process, Pharaoh’s son is mortally wounded, Pharaoh dies of grief, and Joseph becomes Pharaoh of Egypt (chs. 22–29). The date of the work is contested (at least one scholar assigns it Christian authorship), but it was most likely written in Egypt around the turn of the Common Era.

The *Letter of Aristeas typifies what one might call the “Bible expounded.” Works of this kind neither rewrite nor expand a single element of the Bible; rather they create completely new legends and accounts that build from a simple event or the name and memory of a biblical figure (e.g., Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah). The Letter of Aristeas recounts the creation of the *Septuagint at the behest of *Ptolemy II. Some other examples of this broad category of texts include Jannes and Jambres, 4 Baruch, Pseudo-Philo, the Aramaic Levi Document, the Life of Adam and Eve, and Lives of the Prophets.

WISDOM LITERATURE: Texts in this category are less a genre than exemplars of a literary strategy that argues for a particular worldview. These writings employ a variety of “wisdom subgenres” (e.g., diatribes, hortatory discourses, apothegms, parables, proverbs) to argue for particular visions of reality. The Wisdom of Solomon, an early Roman-era hortatory discourse by a Jew of *Alexandria, exemplifies this type of literature. Responding to the declining fortunes of Jews under Roman rule, the author calls his audience to a deeper appreciation of their own traditions and argues for the preeminence of God's wisdom as an organizing principle for the community's life. In 1:1–6:11 the author explains that possessing wisdom leads to righteousness, which in turn offers immortality. In 6:12–9:18 the authorial voice becomes that of *Solomon (although he is not named) who describes in alternating portions his search for wisdom and its extraordinary qualities. The remainder of the book, chs. 10–19, demonstrates from Israel's history (especially in Egypt in the days of Moses) how wisdom executes justice and mercy according to recipients' righteousness (with a special emphasis on idolatry).

Some of the other wisdom works from this era include *Wisdom of Ben Sira, Pseudo-Phocylides, 3 *Maccabees, and 4 Maccabees.

PRAYERS, PSALMS, AND HYMNS: This category of texts includes, among others, Prayer of Manasseh and Psalms of Solomon (see also Prayer of Joseph, Prayer of Jacob, Odes of Solomon). Prayer of Manasseh is an individual lament over past sins and purports to be the petition that Manasseh successfully used to be released from Babylonian captivity (2 Chron 33:12–13). It dates perhaps from just before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE and focuses on the effectiveness of contrition and *repentance in evoking God's mercy.

Psalms of Solomon, dating perhaps from the first century CE, is similar in style and tone to the biblical *psalms, with the exception of its historical references (e.g., Pompey in Psalm 2) and its distinctive messianic hope (especially Psalm 18). It also captures the contrasting notions of God's justice apparent in the Torah, arguing at points that God deals strictly in retributive justice (8:9–14) and at others that God offers unilateral mercy (3:6–8; 4:6).

FRAGMENTARY WORKS: A number of texts from early Judaism are known only through their fragmentary reproduction in non-Jewish sources like the *Church Fathers Eusebius in Ecclesiastical History or Clement of Alexandria in Stromateis. Among these are also the writings of historians and chronographers like Demetrius and Eupolemus, the historical novelist Artapanus, the playwright Ezekiel the tragedian, and *Philo the epic poet. In various ways and by means of diverse genres they rewrote, expanded, and expounded the Bible and broader Jewish traditions of their day. For further reading, see James Charlesworth, Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (1983); and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah, 2nd ed. (2005); and

PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT.

ROBERT KUGLER

Psychoanalysis is both a therapeutic technique and a global theory of human behavior, individual and collective. Although its scientific status remains in dispute, its vision of human experience as governed by powerful though largely unconscious drives continues to inform psychology in both theory and practice, and it plays a central role in the self-understanding of the West, especially in the social sciences, the humanities, and the arts.

Psychoanalysis originated with the clinical experiences of the Viennese Jewish physician Sigmund *Freud (1856–1939), who trained in neurology both in *Vienna and in Paris. Freud's early studies of hysterical symptoms convinced him that pathological behavior could be relieved even without hypnosis if the patient was permitted to speak freely about past traumas. This method (dubbed the "talking cure" by Bertha *Pappenheim) prompted the conclusion that "hysterics suffer mainly from reminiscences." From this clinical discovery there emerged a sophisticated theory of mental life applicable not only to hysterical patients but also to all human beings, both as individuals and in the collective. A key insight that animated the early psychoanalytic movement was that most if not all of human behavior is permeated with meanings derived from partly suppressed traumas that were originally sustained in the course of early childhood development. In The Interpretation of Dreams (1900), Freud took the unorthodox approach of using his own biographical material as clinical evidence and argued that dreams should be understood as the unconscious mind's creative attempt to realize desires disallowed by the conscious mind. Dreams were thus "wish fulfillments," and the analysis of dream symbolism was to serve as "the royal road to the unconscious." In The Psychopathology of Everyday Life (1901), Freud further claimed that normal or functional adult waking life exhibits various seemingly meaningless phenomena (e.g., jokes, slips, lapses in memory, etc.) that serve a similar function of wish fulfillment (hence the popular term, "Freudian slip"). The crucial principle for psychoanalytic technique is that the client must effect a "transference" to the analyst: Through this emotional bond earlier traumas are reenacted in the clinical setting under the analyst's guidance, so that the client can gain a more conscious understanding and acceptance of previously unconscious difficulties.

In his early work Freud proposed a "topography" of mind, distinguishing among conscious, unconscious, and pre-conscious processes. The later "meta-psychology" (developed after World War I) divides the individual psyche into three roles: "id," "ego," and "super-ego." The id (Latin for "it," and in Freud's German texts identified simply as das Es or "the it") is the seat of instinctual drive. Because the id's only goal is to satisfy its desires, Freud describes it as operating according to the "pleasure principle." However, external reality often frustrates the id's desires. The ego (Latin for "I," the self as empirical subject, and in Freud's German, das Ich) is the agency that acts on behalf of the id to realize its desires in light of the world's obstructions. The ego operates only in accordance with the "reality principle." The ego helps the id realize its desires, directly through sexuality, indirectly through aim-inhibited relations of friendship, or by diverting the drives into other nonsexual, physical, intellectual, and artistic-creative activities (a diversion Freud called "sublimation"). Freud's meta-psychology (see, e.g., The Ego and the Id, 1923) suggests that much of our psychic difficulty is due to "repression," the internal and unrelieved pressure that results when our drives find no route to realization.

Psychoanalysis pays strong attention to sexual feelings in early childhood because they are considered crucial to the development of normative adult psychology (see, e.g., Freud, Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality [1905]). Freud was initially convinced that much childhood trauma was traceable to actual incidents of "seduction" (i.e., sexual abuse). However, early in his career he abandoned this theory and concluded instead that memories of seduction are wish-fulfillment fantasies. According to the classical Freudian theory of the "Oedipal Complex," the young (male) child's first romantic attachment is to his mother, whose breast is the primary object of desire. The father first appears as a threat to this symbiotic relation. The child can only overcome his anxiety over the possible loss of the mother's love and his fear of the father (defined as "castration anxiety") by identifying with and thereby internalizing his father's authority. The result is to install a new psychological structure, the super-ego, which functions as the inner voice of moral authority (popularly known as "conscience") and which represents the inner psychological projection of external social norms. It is the super-ego that frequently sets up powerful internal inhibitions on the realization of id drives, resulting in a psychological condition of drive suppression that Freud called "neurosis."

By the mid-1910s Freud had begun to apply the lessons of his meta-psychology and his technique for symptom interpretation to the behavior of whole groups and cultures (see, e.g., Totem and Taboo [1913]; Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego [1921]). The ultimate consequence of this turn was a speculative anthropology and full-blown theory of civilization. The brutality of World War I seemed to provide evidence of a second drive alongside the instinct for pleasure. This second, or "death drive" (first announced in Beyond the Pleasure Principle [1920]), represents the human organism's longing for destruction and ultimate stasis. Freud ultimately concluded that because this drive cannot be given full expression (either directly or through sublimation), modern societies must repress their instinctive longing for violence. In addition, because the super-ego condemns even the recognition of such violent desires, much of our guilt is thrust back into the unconscious. All of modern civilization is therefore neurotic, and irremediably so. The classic statement of this claim is Civilization and its Discontents (1930).

Freud's attitude toward religion was largely hostile. As a partisan of modern science, he tended to see religious belief as little more than a mass delusion and an infantile flight into fantasy (see, e.g., The Future of an Illusion [1927]). Yet even on this point Freud's views remained complex. His final book, Moses and Monotheism, published in 1939, speculates that *Moses was an Egyptian prince who introduced a primitive form of monotheistic sun worship to his Jewish followers; they then murdered their leader, whose memory was transformed into a divinity that become the supersensory object of veneration and fear. In Freud's account, *Judaism is thus created as the original Oedipal rebellion and stands as a paradigm for the birth of civilization. This controversial theory seems to suggest that Hebrew monotheism cannot be condemned as merely a mass delusion, because it provided western society with its earliest and most powerful explanation for the authority of its moral principles and its renunciation of instinct. It has even been argued that, notwithstanding his apparent hostility to religion, Freud saw psychoanalysis itself as the most advanced cultural manifestation of Judaism (see Y. H. Yerushalmi, Freud's Moses: Judaism Terminable and Interminable [1993]).

The scientific status and therapeutic efficacy of psychoanalysis remain much disputed. Freud himself suggested that psychoanalysis encountered "resistance" because it confronts us with facts about our own desires we do not wish to know, and like the discoveries of Copernicus and Darwin, it challenges the human being's feelings of dignity and uniqueness in the universe (see Freud's 1925 essay, "The Resistances to Psychoanalysis"). Yet the psychoanalytic movement is highly diverse and has itself thrived on criticism, spawning especially rich schools of feminist psychoanalysis, Lacanian structuralism, and object relations. Whatever their scientific status, psychoanalytic explanations are now commonplace, and they have inestimably enriched our understanding of human desire and meaning.

PETER E. GORDON

Ptolemies were the Macedonian rulers of *Egypt from the death of *Alexander the Great (323 BCE) to the annexation of Egypt by *Rome (30 BCE). Over the course of the dynasty, the Ptolemies maintained varying degrees of control over Egypt, the western Levant, and assorted other regions in and on the edges of the Mediterranean and the Aegean. Between the late fourth century and approximately 200 BCE, these territories included the Land of Israel. During the Fifth Syrian War (202–198), Antiochus III (reigned 223–187) took advantage of a period of weakness in Egypt and recovered the region for the *Seleucids.

Ptolemy I Soter (305–282) began as satrap of Egypt in the year of Alexander's death. When the struggles among Alexander's generals and successors (the Diadochoi) for control of his empire drew to a close, Ptolemy took the title of king in 305/304. Among his descendants were Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–204), who won the Fourth Syrian War at the battle of Raphia in 217 BCE, but only with the help of native Egyptian troops. Philopator's dependence on native Egyptians engendered renewed nationalism among Egyptians and opened the floodgates to rebellion against Macedonian rule that never completely abated. Ptolemy V Theos Epiphanes was a weak ruler and lost Ptolemaic holdings in the western Levant and throughout the Mediterranean and Aegean to the Seleucids in 200 (the Fifth Syrian War).

The subsequent history of the dynasty is a story of court intrigue, assassinations, disputed successions, and a diminishing empire. Beginning with Ptolemy IX Soter II (116–107), claimants to the throne made increasingly complicated overtures to Rome for assistance. Thus when Ptolemy XII left control of Egypt to Cleopatra VII in 51 BCE and she faced opposition, she turned to Rome for help, further involving the empire in Ptolemaic Egypt. Cleopatra curried favor first with Caesar, then with Mark Antony. When Octavian defeated Antony at the Battle of Actium, Cleopatra was without options and committed suicide in the same year (31). Ptolemy XV Caesar, a son Cleopatra claimed was fathered by Caesar, was assassinated by Octavian in 30, and the Ptolemaic dynasty came to an end.

Judeans living in Egypt flourished under the Ptolemies because of the empire's policy of permitting considerable opportunity and freedom to the many ethnicities gathered in Egypt. Having arrived in Egypt as early as the sixth century BCE under *Persian rule, Judeans were already well settled there by the time of the Ptolemies, and the vast documentary evidence from Egypt testifies to their even deeper integration with the land, its inhabitants, and its cultures under Macedonian rule. Among important texts about Jewish life in Ptolemaic Egypt are the *Letter of Aristeas and the

Jewish Politeuma Papyri from second-century Heracleopolis (see EGYPT: HERACLEOPOLIS PAPYRI). ROBERT KUGLER

Ptolemies: Impact on Jewish Culture and Thought.

Interactions with Greek political, social, and intellectual life under Ptolemaic rule had a transformative effect on Jewish culture and theology, both in the Land of *Israel and in *Diaspora communities. The Zenon Papyri attest to the appearance of Greeks and Hellenic institutions in *Syria and *Phoenicia in the third century BCE. At the same time as some Greeks resettled in the Jewish homeland, some Jews moved to other parts of the Mediterranean world where they adopted the Greek language and *Hellenistic customs. The diadochic wars and later civil strife brought many Jewish slaves to Egypt, but the vast majority willingly migrated there for social advancement and economic gain. Records reveal that Jews were fully integrated into the rhythms of Ptolemaic social and political life, occupying positions as soldiers, civil bureaucrats, and businessmen.

Jewish writers also benefited from the Ptolemaic interest in higher learning and *Alexandria's vibrant intellectual climate. The translation of the Hebrew *Bible into Greek (the *Septuagint), which the *Letter of Aristeas asserts took place during the reign of Ptolemy II (reigned 285–246 BCE), probably occurred over the course of two centuries (third to first centuries BCE). In addition, Jewish authors from this period readily incorporated Hellenistic literary techniques into their own works: Artapanus created a historical romance extolling *Abraham, *Joseph, and *Moses for their cultural achievements; the poet Philo's On Jerusalem and the playwright Ezekiel's Exagoge are examples of Greek-language Jewish poetry modeled on the Greek epic and classical tragedy, respectively; and the writings of Aristoboulus reconciled Jewish traditions with Hellenistic philosophy, ideas that he supposedly taught to Ptolemy VI (reigned 180–145 BCE).

DAVID M. REIS

Pumbedita was one of the most important centers of Jewish communal and cultural life in *Babylonia during the period when the *Talmud was being formed and in the subsequent era of the *Geonim. Its precise location is debated, but it was located at the northwest corner of the area of intensive Jewish settlement, near the junction of the Euphrates River and a major canal (near present-day Falluja). Pumbedita is best known as a major center of rabbinic learning. According to *Sherira Gaon, its talmudic academy was founded by Rav Judah in the mid-third century CE after Nehardea was devastated by Palmyrean raids. Despite some interruptions and temporary relocations, this academy retained its prominence for many centuries alongside competing centers, including *Sura. The Babylonian Talmud contrasts the versions of traditional materials preserved in these two centers on dozens of occasions. In the geonic period the Pumbedita academy, which could also be referred to as Nehardea, retained its central role alongside the academy of Sura. At the end of the ninth century it relocated to Baghdad, but continued to be known as the academy of Pumbedita until at least the middle of the eleventh century. Map 5

ROBERT BRODY

Purim (literally, "lots") is a minor *festival, commemorating the events described in the book of *Esther found in the *Writings section (Ketuvim) of the Hebrew *Bible. Purim is observed on the 14th of *Adar (the second month of Adar during a leap year [see CALENDAR]). In walled cities that have stood since the time of *Joshua (e.g., *Jerusalem), Purim is observed on the 15th of Adar and is known as Shushan Purim. The central observance of the festival is listening to the reading of the book of Esther from a parchment scroll or megillah* (see *FIVE SCROLLS). The megillah is read both on the evening of the festival and in the morning, accompanied by *blessings. It is customary to sound graggers or noisemakers whenever the wicked Haman's name is mentioned. Another custom is giving gifts to the poor (mat-tanot l'evyonim), usually in the form of money, as well as sending gifts of at least two types of food to friends (mishlo'ah manot). In addition, a festive meal or seudah is held during the mid to late afternoon.

Purim is a day of frivolity, when costumes and role-playing are acceptable. Children and adults dress in costumes and masks, often portraying the characters in the biblical story. Purim spiels (plays and skits) have been popular since the medieval period. These plays generally include a satire of the rabbi or other esteemed communal figures. In addition, the *Talmud says that one should become intoxicated on Purim "until he is unable to distinguish (ad delo yada) between 'cursed be Haman' and 'blessed be Mordecai.'"

For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Winter Holidays (2009); T. H. Gaster, Festivals of the Jewish Year (1952); E. Ki Tov, The Book of Our Heritage (1979); and P. Goodman, The Purim Anthology (1973).

PAUL STEINBERG

Purity and Impurity, Ritual (Heb. tohorah ve-tumah). In Israelite religion, a ritually pure person or object was eligible to have contact with holy places, such as the wilderness *Tabernacle or the *Jerusalem *Temple and related holy objects, whereas an impure person or object was not. Biblical laws of ritual purity and impurity are found in priestly documents (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP) in *Leviticus 11–17 and *Numbers 19; additional laws appear in Leviticus 5:2–3; Numbers 31:19–20, and *Deuteronomy 14:3–21; 23:10–15; 24:8; 26:14. The three main sources of impurity are corpses and certain animal carcasses; skin diseases in humans (zara'at) and fungal growths in fabrics and houses; and male and female genital discharges. Many scholars have noted that the physical substances and states labeled impure are characteristics of the physicality that separates created beings from *God. Human beings must cleanse themselves from sources of impurity such as death and procreation before approaching the *Tabernacle or *Jerusalem *Temple, because they are sites of holiness.

In the biblical system, all Israelites, including priests and ordinary Israelites, men and women, are subject to ritual impurity. Those in a state of ritual impurity can contaminate other people, objects, and spaces. However, ritual impurity is understood as impermanent. Methods of purification, specified in each case, generally involve a waiting period of some kind followed by *immersion in "living water" (mayyim hayyim; [Lev 15:13]); laundering of ritually impure garments and objects; and bringing a burnt offering and a purification offering (hattat) to the sanctuary at a prescribed time.

Biblical impurity regulations are systematized in great detail in *rabbinic literature. Twelve tractates in the *Mishnah and the *Tosefta, comprising the order Tohorot (Ritual Purities), as well as many additional legal rulings in other tractates, legal *midrash collections, and the two *Talmuds, demonstrate the importance of ritual purity and impurity legislation in rabbinic *Judaism. As in the Bible, impurity is removed by sacrifices, *immersion in water (see MIKVEH), waiting periods of various lengths, and in some cases special cultic acts. According to rabbinic sources, priests in the *Second Temple era were especially strict about the purity of the Temple in Jerusalem itself and took precautions to protect sacred objects and the priests from impurity. No burials were permitted in Jerusalem, for example, and corpses were not allowed to be kept in the city overnight.

Most of the laws of impurity and purity are no longer operative in the contemporary era, mainly as a result of the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple. In traditional Jewish communities, the laws concerning a husband's separation from the niddah* continue to be observed, as do strictures forbidding those of priestly descent from contact with corpses. Recent scholarship on this complex topic includes C. Hayes, Gentile Impurities and Jewish Identities (2002); and J. Klawans, Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (2000).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Queen of Sheba. Monarch of a prosperous empire in what is now modern-day *Yemen or southwestern *Arabia, the Queen of Sheba is mentioned in 1 *Kings 10:1–13 and 2 *Chronicles 9:1–12. According to these accounts, the Queen of Sheba, hearing of King *Solomon's fame, comes to test his *wisdom, bringing gifts of spices, gold, and precious stones. Impressed by Solomon's court and his answers to her questions, she offers blessings and praise to Solomon and his *God.

Later Jewish legends suggest that the queen and Solomon had a romantic relationship (Alphabet of Ben Sira* 2). Ethiopian traditions identify Sheba with *Ethiopia; Ethiopian Jews, the Beta Israel, are said to be descendants of Israelite escorts who returned with Menelik, the supposed son of the union of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba and founder of the Ethiopian royal dynasty. On the Queen of Sheba in Jewish, Christian, Muslim, and Ethiopian traditions, see J. B. Pritchard, ed., Solomon and Sheba (1972); and J. Lassner, Demonizing the Queen of Sheba: Boundaries of Gender and Culture in Postbiblical Judaism and Medieval Islam (1993).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Qumran. Khirbet Qumran, a small site on a marl plateau overlooking the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, about twenty-two kilometers east of *Jerusalem, became famous after the discovery of hundreds of scrolls in the nearby caves that date to the late *Second Temple period. Later termed the *Dead Sea Scrolls, these documents are believed by most scholars to constitute the library of the inhabitants of Qumran. The site's name comes from the modern Arabic name for the adjacent dry river bed, Wadi Qumran. The etymology of the word "Qumran" is unknown, as is the site's ancient name.

Although nineteenth-century European explorers surveyed the ruins of Qumran, the site received little attention before the discovery of the scrolls in 1946/47. After Israel's War of Independence in 1948 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING), the site fell under the jurisdiction of the Jordanian Department of Antiquities. In 1951, Roland de Vaux, a French biblical scholar at the École Biblique in Jerusalem, along with G. Lankester Harding, the chief inspector of antiquities in Jordan, began the first season of excavation at Qumran. Four additional seasons took place between 1953 and 1956.

Covering less than one-and-a-half acres, Qumran was thought to be a late *Roman fort before the discovery of the scrolls. The excavations, however, revealed that the buildings, constructed mostly of rough fieldstones, are unlike other Roman military installations. De Vaux verified Qumran's connection to the scrolls by noting that certain types of ceramic vessels such as cylindrical jars ("scroll jars") are found at the site and in the surrounding caves, but are rare or unattested at other sites in Judea.

Recent reexaminations of de Vaux's work have shown that the community associated with the Dead Sea Scrolls first occupied Qumran during the late *Hellenistic or *Hasmonean period, probably not long after 100 BCE. The site was destroyed by the earthquake of 31 BCE and rebuilt. After destruction by fire around 9/8 BCE, the settlement was abandoned for a few years and was reoccupied by the same community after 4 BCE. The site was inhabited until its destruction by the Romans in 68 CE, during the First *Jewish War (66–70 CE). A Roman garrison occupied the site for several years after the revolt (Magness).

The settlement of Qumran has several unusual features. For example, the lack of domestic structures inside the settlement suggests that the majority of inhabitants lived in tents and huts outside the site or in the surrounding caves. The community probably numbered between one and two hundred members at any given time. Because there are no sources of fresh water in the vicinity of Qumran, the inhabitants constructed an aqueduct that carried rainwater from flash floods in the wadi to the settlement. More than a dozen pools within the settlement would have been filled in a single flash flood, a natural phenomenon that typically occurs only once or twice per season in the region. Ten of the pools seem to have been used as Jewish ritual *immersion pools, or mikva'ot (see *MIKVEH). These pools have broad sets of steps that lead to the bottom, sometimes with ancillary features such as alternating deep and shallow treads and low partitions. Qumran boasts the highest density of mikva'ot per square foot of any site so far discovered. This concern with ritual *purity, together with evidence from the scrolls, indicates that the Qumran community considered the Jerusalem *Temple and its *priesthood polluted; the community therefore constituted their group as a substitute temple with every full member living as if he were a priest officiating in the Temple.

A large dining room with an adjacent pantry that contained more than one thousand dishes is evidence for communal meals, such as those described in the scrolls and by the ancient Jewish historian, *Josephus. Some of the Dead Sea Scrolls might have been written in a room that de Vaux identified as a scriptorium, or writing room; it was furnished with plastered mud-brick tables and benches and yielded a number of inkwells.

Many scholars have identified the inhabitants of Qumran and the authors of the scrolls as the Jewish sect known as the *Essenes, who are described by Josephus in his second book, Jewish War. Because archeological evidence both supports and refutes such an identification, the matter largely comes down to how one interprets the literary evidence of Josephus and the scrolls.

In the past two decades, some scholars have questioned de Vaux's interpretation of Qumran as a sectarian settlement, suggesting that the site was a villa, manor house, fort, or industrial center. Such alternative theories, however, ignore the connection between the scrolls and the site, established beyond doubt by the archeological finds. Therefore, most scholars still accept de Vaux's interpretation of Qumran as a sectarian settlement associated with the Dead Sea Scrolls. For further reading, see R. de Vaux, Archaeology and the Dead Sea Scrolls (1973); and J. Magness, The Archaeology of Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls (2002). STEVEN H. WERLIN

R

Rabbanites/Rabbinites was the name given by *Karaites to those who adhered to rabbinic *Judaism.

Rabbi refers to a Jewish teacher and religious authority (see RABBINIC ORDINATION; RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN). The word derives from rav, the Hebrew word for “great.” The form “rabbi” is a combination of rav and a first-person possessive suffix; it has the sense of “my revered master” or “my revered teacher.” After the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE, the proponents of rabbinic Judaism came to be known as the Rabbis; the word first appears in the *Mishnah. The related term “Rabban” is associated with the *Patriarchs who served as leaders of the rabbinic community in post-70 CE *Palestine. See also entries under JUDAISM.

Rabbinic Hermeneutics (methods of interpreting Scripture) are grounded in the belief that the *Pentateuch was revealed in every detail by *God, who dictated its content to *Moses. Furthermore, the rabbinic approach to interpretation regards the *Torah as profoundly intentional: Every word and every letter have the potential to reveal insights into the meaning of the text. For the *Rabbis, there can be no simple repetitions or contradictions in a divinely composed work; every apparent contradiction or doubling of a word or story is seen as an opportunity for exegesis. Finally, the Rabbis read the Hebrew *Bible with the assumption that every part of it is connected to and therefore may shed light on every other part. For this reason, much of rabbinic hermeneutics relies on close and careful reading of the biblical text.

The early Rabbis employed various strategies when reading Scripture. The most famous are referred to as the “Thirteen Principles of Rabbi Ishmael,” first set forth in the opening of the *midrash collection Sifra. The first principle, kal vahomer, utilizes logical inference. If there are two situations, one that is generally stricter and the other more lenient, a prohibition that applies to the more lenient case can also be applied to the stricter situation, even if there is no explicit textual reference linking that restriction to the latter. The remaining principles make assumptions about the relationship of words or phrases within Scripture. The most far-reaching principle is gezerah shavah, which allows one to apply a ruling explicit in one case to a second less obvious case when the two cases use identical language, even a single common word. Others, such as kelal ufrat and binyan av, allow the exegete to broaden or restrict the application of a rule based on the presence of specific and general terms within a verse, or to derive information about the scope of a law in one verse from information in an adjacent verse.

In addition to the principles associated with Rabbi Ishmael, rabbinic exegetes used other approaches. Rabbi *Akiva was known (and sometimes criticized by his colleagues) for deriving or basing rulings on a single letter, specifically the vav or yod used as matres lectionis (this term [Latin for “mothers of reading”] refers to the occasional use of certain consonants as vowels in Hebrew orthography to indicate particular forms of words when there might otherwise be ambiguity). In Biblical Hebrew the same word may be written in two ways (full or defective spelling); Akiva saw the additional letter, used only to indicate a certain vowel sound in an alphabet without vowels, as an invitation to expand the scope of the law. He also argued that the doubling of verbs (the infinitive absolute form), employed in Biblical Hebrew as an intensifier, provided the exegete an opportunity to expand the law’s application.

One of the distinctions between other exegetical systems and rabbinic hermeneutics is that the latter lacks a consistent link between signifiers and that which is signified. Whereas in some interpretive approaches a certain number or color or animal will always signify the same thing, rabbinic hermeneutics allows for a word to convey one thing in one context and another meaning elsewhere. For example, the gezerah shavah principle allows the exegete to apply a meaning derived from one verse to another verse based on a common word, without reference to the meaning of that word. It is not the import of the word but simply its presence that signals to the exegete that one verse can be used to explain the other.

This fluidity of meaning or significance allows for significant exegetical flexibility and even playfulness but it can also make rabbinic exegesis seem imprecise and open-ended. In aggadah*, this tendency could be given free rein, but in halakhah*, such imprecision could potentially lead to anarchy. The Rabbis themselves were aware of the potential for chaos; they declared that a sage could not create a gezerah shavah on his own, but could only transmit one that he had learned from his teacher. The expansive nature of hermeneutics was apparently kept in check, particularly in the realm of legal exegesis, by the constraints of the rabbinic community’s understanding of the limits of the law. Nonlegal exegesis was far less constrained, because it had no prescriptive bearing on daily life.

Despite their belief in divine *revelation of Torah and their use of shared exegetical principles, the Rabbis in no way display or insist on a monolithic view of Torah. In fact, the Rabbis celebrated the multivocality of Scripture, offering, validating, and preserving competing interpretations of words and verses, even when those opposing readings had an impact on law and practice. Although they proclaimed, “The law follows so-and-so,” the Rabbis still insisted that opposing views could also be “the words of the living God.”

Although most rabbinic exegesis focuses on the Hebrew Bible, the Rabbis sometimes applied similar strategies to earlier rabbinic texts. The Babylonian *Talmud may query the use of inclusive terms such as “all” or “every,” asking, “What is this term meant to include?” The Talmud often argues that the *Mishnah’s choice of words, its word order, and the ordering of rules are intentional decisions that can be used as the basis for interpretation.

Modern scholarship not only analyzes the rabbinic hermeneutics of the past but has also expanded the ways in which biblical and rabbinic texts are read. Like the classical Rabbis, contemporary scholars operate on the assumption that the wording of these texts is intentional and should be read carefully. The tools of literary criticism are now applied to ancient writings; word choice, voice, and motif are all important criteria for interpreting texts. Scholars may ask many of the same questions posed by ancient and medieval commentators, albeit with a willingness to consider radically different solutions. Modern readers might question the Rabbis' willingness to interpret a verse in *Genesis with the aid of a verse from *Psalms but they too employ intertextual interpretation to enrich understanding of the *Bible. Comparative studies, anthropology, folklore studies, feminist criticism, and other methodologies are all used to read the Hebrew Bible and rabbinic texts. Thus, the rabbinic dictum, "The Torah has seventy facets," has been adopted and expanded by modern scholarship.

For further reading, see D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (1990); M. Fishbane, The Midrashic Imagination (1993); and C. E. Fonrobert and M. S. Jaffee, eds., The Cambridge Companion to the Talmud and Rabbinic Literature (2007).

DVORA E. WEISBERG

Rabbinic Judaism: See JUDAISM

Rabbinic Literature: Midrash. Midrash, from the Hebrew root d-r-š – "to investigate, seek, search out, examine" – may refer generally to the interpretation of any text, sacred or secular, ancient or contemporary. In its strictest sense, however, midrash is the process of *Bible exegesis or commentary that characterizes classical rabbinic interpretation. It also refers to the vast and varied rabbinic compilations from the late antique and medieval periods that preserve what were originally oral exegetical traditions. Midrash, as both a process and the result of that process, grew out of the Rabbis' attempt to construct contemporary meaning out of biblical verses. Through midrash, rabbinic commentators made biblical ordinances relevant, taught moral lessons, told stories, and maintained the Jewish meta-narrative that has shaped and continues to sustain the Jewish people.

Midrash compilations, which were created between the fifth and thirteenth centuries, take several forms. Halakhic midrashim, the earliest midrashic collections, deal primarily with issues of *halakhah, rabbinic law. They are exegetical works that provide word-by-word explications of verses in the books of *Exodus, *Leviticus, *Numbers, and *Deuteronomy. Halakhic compilations include Mekhilta de Rabbi Ishmael, a verse-by-verse exposition of Exodus 12:1–23:19, as well as Exodus 31:12–17 and 35:1–3; Sifra, a running commentary on Leviticus in its entirety; and Sifre Numbers and Sifre Deuteronomy. Redacted in the Land of Israel, these compilations are also known as tannaitic midrashim because they are written in Mishnaic *Hebrew and the sages mentioned are *Tannaim, Rabbis of the period from the beginning of the first to the third century CE, as well as the first generation of *Amoraim, Rabbis of the third and fourth centuries CE.

Aggadic compilations are also verse-by-verse exegeses of biblical books; in these instances the focus is on non-legal material, *aggadah, rather than halakhah. The premier examples of aggadic exegetical compilations are Genesis Rabbah and Lamentations Rabbah. These two works are part of the larger compilation, Midrash Rabbah, which also includes midrashic compilations on the rest of the *Pentateuch and the other *Five Megillot (scrolls).

Homiletical midrash collections gather a series of *sermons based on a particular verse or group of verses. They include Leviticus Rabbah, Deuteronomy Rabbah, and Numbers Rabbah, as well as other compilations such as Pesikta de Rav Kahana, which collects selected passages or sections read in the *synagogue on special *Sabbaths or *festival days. In these works, chapters are constituted of homilies that cohere around a particular topic. The collections of homilies also share a structural arrangement: a series of proems (petiḥtot), the body (gufa) of the homily, and an eschatological conclusion or peroration. The petiḥta (proem) is usually a verse from the Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible, especially from *Psalms or the *wisdom literature, although also sometimes from the Prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHETIC LITERATURE). This proem is an earmark of all aggadic compilations, whether exegetical or homiletical. Through a chain of interpretations, the seemingly extraneous verse is connected to the verse under discussion. This structure exemplifies a fundamental aspect of midrash: the desire to unite the diverse parts of the tripartite canon – *Torah, *Prophets, and *Writings – into a harmonious, seamless whole that reflects the oneness of God's word.

Later compilations, which are more difficult to date, include the Midrash on Psalms; Exodus Rabbah; Tanna de-be Eliyahu, also known as Seder Eliyahu; and the Tanḥuma-Yelamdenu literature, which consists of a group of homiletic midrashim on the Torah. In addition to the aforementioned compilations, anthologies of midrashim were edited during the middle to late medieval period. Among them are the Yalkut Shim'oni (known simply as the Yalkut), Yalkut ha-Makhiri, and the Midrash ha-Gadol. The Yalkut, compiled from more than fifty works and covering the entire span of the Hebrew Bible (Tanakh), is one of the most well-known and comprehensive medieval collections.

Despite the broad designation of midrash compilations as either halakhic or aggadic, it is important to note that halakhic midrash collections contain aggadic material and vice versa. In addition, whether halakhic or aggadic, late antique or early medieval, the midrashic locus of exegesis is a biblical word or phrase. Punsters par excellence, the Rabbis were keen on making philological associations. They culled Tanakh for verbal affinities; they spun stories and drew connections to elucidate the word or verse at hand. Every letter of a word, every phrase, was open to interpretation; this was based on the conviction that the divine word was expressed in a certain way to teach or explain something. Nothing in Scripture is superfluous or repetitious; every word has many meanings, some more apparent than others. Indeed, one will often find contradictory statements from various Rabbis about the meaning of a word, and no one interpretation is privileged over another. This multiplicity of meaning does not challenge scriptural authority but rather reflects its infinitude.

*Rabbinic hermeneutics provided a range of exegetical strategies that are employed in halakhic and aggadic midrashim. The kal vaḥomer (literally “light and heavy”) established an argument by means of a major or minor premise: “If this is true, how much more so is that true.” This form of reasoning is found in both halakhic and aggadic midrashim. The gezerah shavah (“similar laws”), however, is more common to halakhic midrashim: By means of analogy, a particular detail of a biblical law in one verse is derived from the meaning of the word or phrase in the other. Other hermeneutical principles that characterize halakhic midrashim include the binyan av, through which a specific law in one verse may be applied to all other similar cases; kelal ufrat, perat ukelal, which applies rules of inference between general and specific statements and vice versa; and hekkesh, which establishes inference by analogy, whether explicit or implicit, between two subjects (but not words) within the same or similar contexts (see also RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS).

Nonlegal biblical passages are often explained by means of philological associations, including analogies based on the use of the same word in two different verses. Word play also takes the form of gematria (see NUMEROLOGY), whereby the arithmetical value of Hebrew letters is used to interpret a word or verse. In notaricon (shorthand writing) a Hebrew word becomes an acronym in which each letter stands for another word, which in turn forms a phrase or sentence.

In addition to word plays, midrashic literature contains scores of stories, maxims, and parables (meshalim [sing., meshal]). Parables about kings are one typical narrative form. Nearly all rabbinic meshalim have a bipartite structure: the fictional narrative, that is the mashal proper, and its application, the nimshal, which usually concludes with a biblical verse that serves as the mashal's proof-text. Formulaic phrases mark the two parts: mashal le, “it is like,” and kakh, “so, too, similarly.”

Current studies in midrash reflect broad disciplinary trends in related humanities fields. This is most apparent in scholarship that addresses the literary and cultural aspects of rabbinic literature. Underlying this relatively recent trend in the study of midrash is the recognition that interpretive texts are themselves literary works and should be examined in light of literary motifs, themes, and structure. Moreover, as literature they reflect beliefs, values, and customs and also serve as cultural transmitters. Many contemporary scholars are no longer interested, for example, in how a story about a certain Rabbi may be used in constructing his historical biography. Instead, they analyze rabbinic narratives in terms of their literary quality. At the same time, these texts are also regarded as artifacts that function as conveyors and mediators of rabbinic culture. The historical import of narratives is therefore undiminished because they yield insight into the milieu of those who recorded, transmitted, and lived by them. Scholarship on midrash has advanced on the heels of other fields and it has in turn contributed to the study of the New Testament, patristic exegesis (see CHURCH FATHERS), the *Talmud, and late antique Judaism and has made its presence felt in areas such as literary theory.

This shift in how midrash is studied may be attributed to the fact that scholars of rabbinic literature are no longer trained solely within the confines of rabbinical seminaries. Advances in literary criticism, theory, and cultural studies have contributed to current interdisciplinary approaches to rabbinic literature, bringing a rich array of questions and a broad set of theoretical skills to the study of rabbinic texts, including the critical lenses of *gender, orality, and performance studies. Similarly, technological developments have facilitated the production of new critical editions of midrash collections. Whether scholars of rabbinic literature at the beginning of the twenty-first century address long-standing matters of concern or more novel issues, whether they support well-established positions or propose suggestive readings, they do so cognizant of broader contexts and alternative methodological frameworks, some of which are unique to the study of rabbinics and some of which are common to the study of ancient and medieval texts in general.

For further reading, see C. Bakhos, ed., Current Trends in the Study of Midrash (2006); J. R. Baskin, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002); D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (1990); S. Fraade, From Tradition to Commentary: Torah and its Interpretation in the Midrash Sifre to Deuteronomy (1991); G. Hartman and S. Budick, eds., Midrash and Literature (1986); G. Hasan-Rokem, Web of Life: Folklore and Midrash in Rabbinic Literature (2000); B. Visotzky, Golden Bells and Pomegranates: Studies in Midrash Rabbah (2005); and A. Yadin, Scripture as Logos: Rabbi Ishmael and the Origins of Midrash (2004). CAROL BAKHOS

Rabbinic Literature: Mishnah and Talmuds. The rabbinic movement is often credited with the reinvention of Judaism in the wake of the *Roman destruction of the Second *Temple in *Jerusalem in 70 CE. The literature of this movement was produced orally by a network of Rabbis who lived roughly between the final years of the Second Temple and the Islamic (Umayyad) conquests of the seventh and eighth centuries CE. The earliest group of Rabbis, periodized as the *Tannaim (ca. 70–200 CE), engaged in study practices that produced two general types of text: *midrash and mishnah. Midrash is the creative interpretation of the Tanakh*, and mishnah is the formulation of statutes that clearly and unequivocally assert a legal requirement or theological principle. Individual midrashim or mishnayot attributed to their authors circulated orally in tannaitic Judea and formed the basis for discussions that transpired within disciple circles surrounding individual Rabbis.

Around the year 200 CE, the *Mishnah, a definitive collection of mishnayot arranged in six topical orders, divided into sixty-three topical tractates, with each tractate subdivided into chapters, was compiled by R. *Judah the Patriarch, a Rabbi with political authority in both the Jewish and Roman political arenas. The Mishnah combined preexisting mishnayot from different disciple circles, creating a legal code that canonized multivocal debate. However, the process of mishnaic redaction could not incorporate all prior mishnah traditions. The opinions held by Tannaim that were excluded from the Mishnah are called baraitot*. Many of these traditions were collected in what is called the Tosefta*.

The Rabbis who were intellectually active in the period after the completion of the Mishnah in both Palestine and Babylonia are periodized as Amoraim* (ca. 200–ca. 500 CE). These Rabbis continued the practice of producing midrash and mishnah-type texts within small disciple circles. Over time, the intellectual conversations in rabbinic circles metamorphosed into a single intellectual discourse that incorporated both types of rabbinic traditions within a study practice characterized by intense debate and discussion. This discourse is occasionally referred to within rabbinic texts as talmud.

The two extant literary Talmuds, the *Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds, owe their general form and some content to the amoraic discourse of talmud that combined mishnah and midrash forms within an environment of successive generational interpretation and academic debate. Both Talmuds are structured around the Mishnah and can thus be described as commentaries to the Mishnah. However, despite their formal structure around the Mishnah, the Talmuds are not limited by the Mishnah's content. Rather they use the content of each individual mishnah as a conceptual starting point for a conversation that incorporates tannaitic baraitot (in both mishnah and midrash form), amoraic statements (in both mishnah and midrash form), and interpretations and debates about these statements conducted by named Rabbis of later generations and by the Talmud's anonymous voice. These conversations can also include biographical anecdotes about contemporaneous figures. An individual mishnah may generate several such conversations, or sugyot (sing., sugyah). Both Talmuds are anthological in the sense that they collect earlier materials from disparate Rabbis who lived in different geographic regions (in both Palestine and Babylonia), in different times (ca. 70–ca. 750 CE). Each Talmud can be described as a collage that juxtaposes different texts and even different genres of text, while explicitly attributing the voices in its conversation to a temporally and geographically diverse rabbinic population.

Concurrently with the production of the Talmuds and for some centuries beyond their completion, the rabbinic movement also compiled midrashic works that were based on expansions of biblical texts rather than explications of the Mishnah (for a discussion of these writings, see RABBINIC LITERATURE: MIDRASH; AGGADAH).

Since its composition, the Babylonian Talmud (BT; also known as the Bavli) has been the primary vocational curriculum of rabbinic scholars. The primacy of BT as a study text owes a great deal both to its literary merits as the definitive comprehensive work of rabbinic literature and to the political power of the Babylonian Geonate that emerged as the leadership of world Jewry during the period of the Abbasid dynasty (750–1000 CE). The Geonim created large bureaucratic academies or yeshivot that trained hundreds of students in BT while conducting polemics with their Palestinian rabbinic peers. The geonic choice of BT as its primary literary text reflects its inherent value, its linguistic use of Babylonian (Eastern) *Aramaic, and the fact that it is the sole surviving literary patrimony of the Babylonian Rabbis.

As the primary text of scholars who have devoted their lives to study for more than a millennium, the Bavli has been the subject of many important commentaries. Chief among these is the commentary of *Rashi, remarkable for its combination of brevity and conceptual depth. Also of note are the writings of the French and German *Tosafists, who applied a dialectical style to BT that is reminiscent of the dialectic found within BT itself. Where BT is energized by its contrasts of tannaitic and amoraic sources that are apparently in disagreement, Tosafist commentary is characterized by its insistence that all of BT must cohere and by the dialectical distinctions that individual Tosafists offer to extract themselves from apparent inconsistencies. Within the history of theoretical Talmud study, this kind of reasoning has occasionally led to pilpul, a form of question-and-answer dialogue that can be described as more ritualistic than substantive.

The various codes of Jewish law that were compiled in the medieval period and in the Renaissance drew heavily on BT as the dominant work of rabbinic literature, and particularly of rabbinic law. BT so dominated Jewish legal study that each attempt to simplify Jewish law through the production of a code occasioned resistance among those who preferred the explicit multivocality of BT legal discourse. Even as codes have become the default descriptions of Jewish law for the masses, legal experts continue to return to BT to craft their own responses to new crises, often through responsa* literature. In this way, rabbinic literature continues to be a living and ever expanding endeavor. See also HALAKHAH; MISHNAH; TALMUD, BABYLONIAN; TALMUD, JERUSALEM.

BARRY WIMPFHEIMER

Rabbinic Ordination refers to the granting of the title “*rabbi.” Processes leading to ordaining rabbis have varied widely. The rabbinic tradition viewed the transfer of leadership from Moses to Joshua (Num 27:22, 23; Deut 34:9) as the first link in a long chain of ordinations continuing into their own times (M. Avot 1:1). A rabbi with Mosaic ordination (semikhah, literally, “laying on of hands”) had very broad powers, perhaps even a seat on the *Sanhedrin (Jewish *court and legislative body). Only granted in the Land of Israel, this ordination was discontinued in late antiquity, probably as a result of persecution. Various efforts were made in the medieval and early modern periods to revive the practice. The most famous effort was the 1538 attempt by Jacob Berab and Joseph *Karo in *Safed. In the early twenty-first century, rabbinic leader and scholar Adin Steinsaltz was involved in a similar undertaking.

In the *Middle Ages, the title “rabbi” was generally granted to an individual by rashut (a license) or minhui (an appointment). He then became the judge and leader of a particular community. The powers granted to such an appointee were much more restricted than those of the Mosaic ordainees. Originally granted only by the *Exilarch, the head of the Jewish community in *Iraq, this “appointment” likely evolved into the form of ordination that became most common from the thirteenth to the nineteenth centuries: hattarat hora’ah, literally, “a permit to instruct.” The assignment of the written permit conferred recognition of Jewish halakhic competence and protection from claims of malpractice. Although no laying on of hands occurred in the grant of hattarat hora’ah, it also came to be known colloquially as semikhah.

In the nineteenth century, newly organized liberal movements of Judaism began to ordain rabbinic leaders graduating from modern, academically oriented seminaries. With a curriculum much broader than the merely legal (see HALAKHAH), these seminaries recognized that contemporary Jews were as much in need of pastors as of the legal experts required by medieval and early modern communities. Today, ordination from the seminaries of liberal movements and hattarat hora’ah exist side by side; both are popularly termed semikhah. Liberal rabbinic seminaries began ordaining women in the 1970s and 1980s, and all non-Orthodox seminaries now do so. Most also ordain gays and lesbians (see entries under JUDAISM).

MARCUS MORDECHAI SCHWARTZ

Rabbinic Ordination of Women. Women's quest for rabbinical *ordination dates to the late nineteenth century in *Germany and the *United States; it was, in part, a natural consequence of *Reform Judaism's insistence on the religious equality of men and women. The ordination of women also emerged as part of a larger cultural debate about women's rights and their access to the learned professions. In the 1890s, the charismatic female Jewish preacher Ray Frank (1861–1948) was hailed in the press as “the girl Rabbi of the Golden West.” In the decades that followed, a handful of individuals, among them Martha Neumark at Cincinnati's *Hebrew Union College and Irma Levy Lindheim, Dora Askowith, and Helen Levinthal at New York's Jewish Institute of Religion, unsuccessfully sought ordination. In 1935, Regina *Jonas (1902–1944) was privately ordained in Germany and became the first woman rabbi. Jonas used her position to offer solace to her persecuted co-religionists in *Nazi Germany; she was deported and murdered at *Auschwitz.

The question of women's ordination continued to be discussed in the United States in the 1950s and 1960s. In the 1950s the story of Paula Ackerman succeeding her late husband in the pulpit was so newsworthy that her picture appeared in Time magazine. In the 1960s, the topic gained greater urgency as the second wave of feminism gathered force. For many Americans and American Jews, female ordination became an important symbol of Judaism's commitment to gender equity.

In 1972, Sally *Priesand was ordained by the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati, Ohio. Two years later the *Reconstructionist movement ordained Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, and, in 1985, after a vociferous public debate that lasted slightly longer than a decade, the *Conservative movement ordained Amy Eilberg. Jacqueline Tabick, the first female rabbi in *Britain, was ordained in 1975 by Leo Baeck College, an institution under the joint sponsorship of the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain and the Union of Liberal and Progressive Synagogues. Even as the question of the permissibility of women's ordination was resolved in the liberal movements of American Judaism and the United Kingdom, and the first women were ordained in *Israel, some Orthodox Jews began to ask if there would be Orthodox female rabbis. By the early twenty-first century, a few Orthodox women, including Haviva Ner-David and Sara Hurwitz, had received private, not seminary, ordination. Hurwitz assumed the title of Rabba.

As the struggle for female ordination was achieved for many, the history of women in the rabbinate opened. It began with the challenges that the presence of women rabbis raised for their seminaries, their congregants, and their male colleagues. It continued with the difficulties these women faced as they sought to reconcile feminism with Judaism (see JUDAISM: FEMINIST) and demanded Judaism's embrace of women's voices and perspectives. The pioneering cluster of female rabbis had to convince congregations to hire them and then had to establish their authority in a hitherto exclusively male profession; they even had to fight for maternity leave. Yet, if these initial skirmishes were mostly fought by the first cohorts of women ordained, the larger issue of living within a tradition that had largely ignored female perspectives remains an ongoing challenge.

Female rabbis decry the exclusion of women's voices and views from the sacred texts of Jewish tradition, especially its liturgy and the giant corpus of *rabbinic literature. These rabbis have often rediscovered women from the Jewish past, reinterpreting their lives to cast them as role models and to teach lessons for Jews today. They have also turned a critical lens on the trajectory of women's lives, asking how Judaism could signify moments of change, of joy, of despair, and especially those intimately linked to the feminine. They seek to unite Judaism, through Jewish feminism, with the occasions, great and small, that rest at the core of women's lives, and they have created an array of new rituals to do so. They have also extended their feminist critique to include the challenges that face gays and lesbians (see ETHICS, SEXUAL).

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, several hundred women have been ordained as rabbis in North America, the United Kingdom, and Israel, and as many as half of rabbinical students in seminaries of liberal denominations of Judaism, including those of the Conservative/Masorti and Reconstructionist movements, are female (see entries under JUDAISM). The paths of rabbis who are women have not been free of obstacles. Many female clergy hold subordinate positions in larger *synagogues or work as educators or chaplains, rather than as senior leaders of congregations. These occupational patterns are a reflection not only of persistent cultural prejudices toward women as religious authority figures but also of many women's choices of rabbinic options that allow them time for the demands of home and family.

Recent books on women and ordination include E. Klapheck, Fräulein Rabbiner Jonas: The Story of the First Woman Rabbi (2004); P. S. Nadell, Women Who Would Be Rabbis: A History of Women's Ordination, 1889–1985 (1998); H. Ner-David, Life on the Fringes: A Feminist Journey toward Traditional Rabbinic Ordination (2000); and S. Sheridan, ed., Hear Our Voice: Women Rabbis Tell Their Stories (1994) on women's ordination in Britain.

PAMELA S. NADELL

Rabin, Yitzhak (1922–1995), the fifth prime minister of *Israel, was born in *Jerusalem and grew up in *Tel Aviv where he attended agricultural school. In 1941, he joined the Palmakh branch of the Haganah (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES) and assisted in the allied invasion of Lebanon. He rose to the position of Chief Operations Officer of the Palmakh in 1947. During the 1948 War of Independence he directed Israeli operations in Jerusalem (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS). In 1964 he was appointed Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF). After the 1967 Six Day War, he retired from the IDF and became ambassador to the United States. He was appointed minister of labor in March 1974 by Golda *Meir and succeeded her as prime minister of Israel after her resignation the following month. The Sinai Interim Agreement was a major accomplishment of the early part of his term and a step toward peace between Israel and Egypt. Rabin resigned before new elections in May 1977, when it was revealed that his wife was maintaining a foreign currency bank account in contravention of Israeli law. In

1992 Rabin defeated Shimon Peres to become leader of the Labor Party (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES). He played an important role in negotiating the Oslo Accords and a peace treaty with Jordan; in 1994 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize with Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat. On November 4, 1995, Rabin was assassinated in Tel Aviv by Yigal Amir, an right-wing Israeli who was an opponent of the Oslo Accords. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Rachel and her older sister *Leah are *Jacob's wives; her story is told in *Genesis 29–35. Rachel is the younger daughter of Laban, the brother of Jacob's mother *Rebekah. Rachel first encounters Jacob at a well, where he falls in love with her. Although Jacob undertakes to work for Laban for seven years in order to marry Rachel, Laban substitutes her sister Leah for Rachel at the time of marriage. Jacob marries Rachel shortly thereafter, in return for another seven years of promised labor. The sisters' rivalry for Jacob's affection is magnified by Rachel's long period of childlessness (see INFERTILITY); nevertheless, she is always the beloved wife. Frustrated by her infertility, Rachel gives her slave Bilhah to Jacob as a surrogate mother, and Bilhah bears Dan and Naphtali. With divine help, Rachel is finally able to conceive. Her sons are *Joseph and Benjamin; she dies while giving birth to Benjamin and is buried on the road to Bethlehem (Gen 35:19–20). Although Rachel and Leah compete against each other as co-wives of Jacob, they are united in feeling that Laban has cheated them economically (31:14–15). Sharing in her family's trickster traditions, Rachel does not hesitate to deceive her father about her theft of his household gods as Jacob and his family prepare to return to *Canaan. NAOMI STEINBERG

Radhanites (Arabic, radhaniya) were Jewish merchants who maintained trans-Eurasian trading routes in the early Muslim period, described in the Kitab al-maslik wa'l-mamalik (Book of Routes and Kingdoms) of Ibn Khurdadbeh, overseer of the mail and information services in the mid-ninth-century Abbasid Empire. These merchants are also mentioned as rahadaniya in the Kitab al-buldan (Book of the Countries) by the early-tenth-century geographer, Ibn al-Faqih. Scholars have long debated the geographic origin of these multilingual traders whose land and sea routes traversed Europe, *India, and *China, as well as the Middle East and *North Africa. Their goods included furs, weapons, eunuchs, and slaves from northern and eastern Europe, and musk and perfume, fine fabrics, and spices such as cinnamon and camphor from China. The current consensus, based on the research of Moshe Gil ("The Radhanite Merchants and the Land of Radhan," Journal of Economic and Social History of the Orient 17 [1974]: 209–28), is that the Radhanites came from the region of Radhan, on the Tigris River in southern *Iraq, the area of origin of the Jewish population of Baghdad and an ancient mercantile center. KATE FRIEDMAN

Radio: United States. From 1920 to 1953, radio was the single most powerful and popular medium in the *United States, dominating the cultural and political landscape. Radio *broadcasts entertained audiences during the Depression, became a key vehicle for President Franklin Delano Roosevelt to rally the support of the American public, and emerged as a vital source of mobilization, entertainment, and news during *World War II. The 1930s and 1940s are often called radio's "Golden Age."

During those two decades, the United States was still absorbing the twenty-five million immigrants who arrived between 1881 and 1924, including some two and a half million *Yiddish-speaking Jews from *Eastern Europe. By 1930, American Jews made up about 3% of the American population, but they were overrepresented on radio. As with vaudeville and Hollywood *film (see ENTERTAINMENT), Jews played critical roles in the development of radio (see also BROADCASTING). Among the most influential figures were three children of Jewish immigrants: David Sarnoff (1891–1971), William Paley (1901–1990), and Gertrude Berg (1899–1966).

Sarnoff, who immigrated from Europe with his family at age nine, was instrumental in establishing the Radio Corporation of America (RCA), which owned the National Broadcasting Corporation (NBC); he assumed the presidency in 1930. William Paley entered the radio business in the mid-1920s, first as a program sponsor and two years later as the president of the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS), which competed with Sarnoff's NBC for dominance of the young medium. Gertrude Berg was a writer, producer, and performer whose program, The Goldbergs, which debuted on NBC in 1929, made her one of the most popular and powerful women in radio throughout the 1930s and 1940s. Through The Goldbergs, Berg became one of the most recognizable figures in the medium, both for her Yiddish-accented portrayal of matriarch Molly Goldberg and for her strength and stature behind the scenes. Whereas Sarnoff and Paley cast long shadows over the development of network radio by virtue of their ownership of the two largest radio networks, Berg mined The Goldbergs for every audience, every outlet, and every possible story line. After seventeen years on radio, countless live performances, several books, guest appearances on other radio and television programs, innumerable magazine articles, six seasons on television, and a handful of live stage shows, she retired shortly before her death.

Berg was one of many popular Jewish radio performers. Others included Arthur Tracy (born Abba Tracousky), known as the "Street Singer," one of radio's first superstars, and Mel Blanc, the famous voice-over artist, who began his career on radio in Los Angeles. For other performers, like Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Fanny Brice, and Groucho Marx, radio became another venue for their already substantial success. Jack Benny, George Burns, and cartoonist Harry Hirschfeld were among radio's early luminaries and other performers used radio to supplement their careers off the air.

Berg's Molly Goldberg stands out as one of a handful of Jewish characters who became part of the popular culture pantheon, but other, lesser known but regular Jewish characters inhabited the radio landscape. Among them were Jack Benny's pals, Mr. Kitzel and Schlepperman; Izzy Finkelstein, who appeared on WMAQ's program Kaltenmeyer's Kindergarten; Papa David Solomon from Life Can Be Beautiful; and Mrs. Nussbaum from the Fred Allen Show. Other shows revolved around Jewish characters, like WBNX's comedy, Bronx Marriage Bureau. CBS debuted a program called Meyer the Buyer in 1932, and Potash and Perlmutter were the title characters of a series of popular short stories. Mama Bloom's Brood, a melodramatic saga of a Jewish family, also aired during the 1930s.

Following the success of The Goldbergs and the popularity of Eddie Cantor, NBC surveyed its audiences and found that people responded positively to characters “of a Jewish type.” However, Jewish entertainers like Cantor and Benny were still far more popular than their more overtly Jewish counterparts. With the notable exception of The Goldbergs, performers who specialized in Yiddish accents generally remained minor stars in mainstream American broadcasting.

For the sizable audience of Jewish immigrants interested in Yiddish programming, local stations created a thriving and creative radio culture on the margins of the mainstream. Yiddish stations operated on a shoestring budget and struggled to stay on the air; nevertheless, they, their performers, and their sponsors created a relatively independent arena for broadcasting Jewishness and Jewish culture. Stations relied on “time brokers” to strike sponsorship deals with local businesses. As a result, Yiddish programs were often sponsored by businesses like Parmet Brothers’ Furniture in New York, Harry Kandel’s Appliances in Philadelphia, or the oddly named Chicago Pharmacy in Los Angeles. Thus, commercial radio became part of a delicate network of local businesses, theaters, performers, and even charities – all of which used radio to speak to and about the communities they served.

Most Jewish immigrants and their children listened to both Yiddish and English programs, and their tastes and preferences took shape around the interactions between the two. To Jewish immigrant listeners, programs like Clara, Lu and Em, or The Shadow may have sounded more foreign than familiar, while shows in Yiddish like Bay tate mames tish (‘Round the Family Table) and Der yidisher filosof (The Jewish Philosopher) featured the sounds of fictionalized Jewish familial strife. In fact, the culture of Yiddish radio relied heavily on the direction of English radio: Yiddish-speaking audiences were listening to radio even before the first Yiddish broadcast was made, the Yiddish press reported on and carried listings for English radio programming, and Yiddish-speaking radio performers copied the successful formulas of their English-speaking counterparts. Yiddish radio and its audiences benefited from radio’s multilingualism, which permitted its immigrant audience to navigate complementary relationships among their Jewish communities and their American contexts.

Even though *television came to replace radio as the primary medium of in-home entertainment during the early 1950s, Yiddish-language radio continued in large American cities like *New York, *Chicago, Detroit, Baltimore, *Philadelphia, and Los Angeles through the 1970s. Yiddish-language programs were also heard in smaller markets like Rochester, New York; Tuscaloosa, Alabama; and, in 1960, Honolulu. Yiddish programming in cities with significant Yiddish-speaking audiences like New York and Miami adapted to changes in radio more broadly, playing more records and reading more news, just as their English counterparts underwent similar changes. New York housed the majority of radio stations that carried Yiddish programs and produced more Yiddish-speaking performers than any other city. This was mainly thanks to WEVD, “the station that speaks your language,” which dedicated most of its broadcast hours to programming in Yiddish. Local businesspeople owned and operated smaller stations, which featured Yiddish programs alongside shows in other immigrant languages.

For further reading, see J. Dunning, On the Air: The Encyclopedia of Old-Time Radio (1998); A. Y. Kelman, Station Identification: A Cultural History of Yiddish Radio in the United States (2009); J. Hoberman and J. Shandler, Entertaining America (2003); and for a good catalogue of programs and characters, see D. Siegel and S. Siegel, Radio and the Jews (2007).

ARI Y. KELMAN

Rashi, the acronym for Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac (1040–1105), who was born in Troyes in northern France (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES), was a universally revered and respected rabbi, teacher, author, and communal leader. At age eighteen, already married, he left for Mainz, where he spent six years at the yeshivah of R. *Gershom ben Judah of Mainz studying with Jacob ben Jakar. After the latter’s death he moved to Worms, where he spent about four years studying with R. Isaac ha-Levi. At age thirty, he returned to Troyes, where he spent the rest of his life, apparently earning his living from engaging in commercial activities with Christians; he was probably not a vintner or wine merchant as some have suggested. Two of his three daughters were married to prominent scholars, Jochebed to Meir ben Samuel and Miriam to Judah ben Nathan. Jochebed’s four sons were all great scholars; the most prominent were Samuel (Rashbam) and Jacob (Rabbenu Tam).

Shortly after his return to Troyes, Rashi founded a yeshivah where he cultivated an atmosphere of warmth, openness, creativity, critical thinking, and dedication to the truth. He encouraged his students to write, and they produced works in many fields, including biblical commentary, talmudic exegesis, halakhah*, midrash*, and piyyut (see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) commentary. Among his most famous students were Shemaiah, who seems to have served as his personal secretary; Joseph Kara; and his grandsons Samuel and Jacob.

Rashi was soon recognized as the greatest scholar of his generation and assumed leadership of his community, exerting his influence throughout the region and beyond. Although modest in manner, he was not afraid to take a stand. He tended to be lenient in his halakhic decisions and opposed his teachers when he was convinced he was right. He encouraged peace and unity both within his own community and between other communities in the region. Rashi took a firm stance against certain local customs that he felt contravened the teachings of the Babylonian *Talmud, which he insisted took precedence. In general he had a very positive attitude to women; he particularly supported the right of women to refuse yibbum (see MARRIAGE, LEVI-RATE). On the question of apostates (Jews who had converted to *Christianity) he was also lenient, preferring a welcoming approach that facilitated bringing them back into the community.

The most innovative and influential of Rashi’s many works was his *Bible commentary (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY). He was the first *Ashkenazi exegete to produce a running commentary on the entire Hebrew Bible (the sections on *Ezra-Nehemiah, *Chronicles, and from *Job 40:25 to the end have not survived). He combined midrashic sources with grammatical and linguistic comments and included observations on aspects of contemporary life. His *Torah commentary is particularly weighted with midrashic material: Only a quarter of the comments are original to him, whereas in the rest of the Bible commentary the figure is two-thirds. Yet the Torah commentary is not a mere anthology. Rashi carefully chose which comments to include and then edited them to suit his exegetical needs, usually avoiding traditions that diverged from the peshat or contextual meaning. Despite his declared intention to incorporate only aggadot* that properly explained the biblical text, he often cites aggadot for didactic or polemical reasons or sometimes simply out of his love for aggadah (see also RABBINIC LITERATURE: MIDRASH).

Rashi also wrote a commentary on most of the Babylonian *Talmud. This enterprise was not as innovative as his biblical commentary (there were precedents in *Germany) but it represented the culmination of Ashkenazi talmudic exegesis and superseded all those that preceded it. Aimed at a more advanced student, it became an enduring indispensable aid to Talmud study and has since been included in almost every printed edition of the Talmud, generally on the inner margin beside the binding.

In addition, Rashi wrote hundreds of responsa*. Most that survive are in the areas of religious ritual and conduct. Rashi was also an innovator in the field of Hebrew language, coining more than a thousand new words and inventing a new system of Hebrew grammar, although the latter did not have a lasting impact. His commentaries also preserve hundreds of glosses in Old French, the vernacular language of his milieu, many unattested in other sources (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES).

Rashi lived at a time of great intellectual and religious ferment. The so-called twelfth-century renaissance was already underway in France by the middle of the eleventh century, and many of its intellectual currents influenced his yeshivah. This was also a time of religious persecution. The First *Crusade of 1096 had a profound impact on Jewish communities in the Rhineland and surrounding areas. At the same time Christian clerics were beginning to press Jewish conversion to Christianity and coerce Jewish leaders to engage in religious disputations (see MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS). In his biblical commentaries Rashi is consistently negative in his characterizations of Gentiles (e.g., *Esau, *Ishmael, and *Balaam in his Torah commentary), and in a number of his commentaries (*Isaiah, Minor Prophets, *Psalms, *Song of Songs) he openly polemicalizes with Christian views. He also stresses at every turn the virtues of the Jewish people, the Land of Israel, and the special relationship between God and Israel. As a leader, he believed his duty was to defend his faith and provide encouragement and ammunition for his followers in the face of Christian hostility.

Rashi's influence was immense. His Torah commentary gained unprecedented acceptance throughout the Jewish world; it was the first Hebrew book printed (1470–75) and has been the subject of hundreds of supercommentaries and scholarly articles (see PRINTING). It was also studied intently by Christian scholars and translated into several languages. The halakhic ruling in the Arba'ah Turim (see JACOB BEN ASHER) and Shulhan Arukh* (see HALAKHAH) that one may fulfill one's obligation of reviewing the weekly Torah portion with Rashi's commentary instead of Targum Onkelos* has given it near-canonical status. It is the primary commentary that is studied in schools and yeshivot, and some circles take Rashi's comments as the only true interpretation. As someone known for his humility and as a man who made the pursuit of truth his credo, Rashi might have been puzzled and even appalled by this phenomenon. He was constantly revising his commentaries and expressed regret to his grandson, Rashbam, that he did not have time to incorporate the new insights being revealed by his students every day. Although much in Rashi's commentaries is timeless, portions were intended to give solace and support to a beleaguered community, weary of the exile, and these need to be understood in their proper context.

For further reading, see M. Banitt, Rashi, Interpreter of the Biblical Letter (1985); B. Gelles, Peshat and Derash in the Exegesis of Rashi (1981); M. Liber, Rashi (1906); C. Pearl, Rashi (1988); and E. Shereshevsky, Rashi, the Man and His World (1982).
BARRY DOV WALFISH

Reason. In most theological discussions, reason stands for what the human mind is capable of discovering on its own and is opposed to *revelation. According to Moses *Maimonides, reason can demonstrate the existence of *God without the aid of Scripture. By the same token, Judaism holds there are some *commandments (mishpatim) that even if God had not given them, we would be justified in giving to ourselves on the basis of reason; for example, the prohibitions against murder, stealing, and false testimony. Beyond this, it is often said that Judaism does not assert anything that reason can show to be absurd. Although Jewish beliefs often go beyond what reason can show (e.g., that the world was created), they never go against reason.

What then can reason show? A great deal of medieval *thought took on the question of what to do with biblical passages that suggest God has bodily parts, occupies space, and changes location. How can this be true if, as Judaism asserts, God is one? After all, anything that has parts or takes up space is divisible. The answer was that, because reason can show that God is immaterial, any passage that suggests otherwise cannot be read in a literal fashion. Thus, instead of saying that God walked with Noah, we would have to say that Noah was beloved of God. In this way, reason is needed to arrive at the true meaning of Scripture.

How far can reason extend? Maimonides did not think reason was capable of demonstrating that the world was created. Nor, in his opinion, could reason answer all the questions one might ask about prophecy (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY) and providence. Similarly, a person could object that reason can show that murder, stealing, and lying are immoral, but it does not explain the details of how to pray or how to observe the *festivals and *life-cycle rituals. For that we have to turn to revelation, or at least revelation as interpreted by *rabbinic tradition. In the contemporary world, the ability of reason to demonstrate something as basic as the existence of God or the truths of geometry has been called into question as alternative conceptual schemes are articulated and defended.

The obvious conclusion is that reason and revelation must work together. According to Deuteronomy 4:6, the *Torah was intended to be a body of wisdom. Without reason to provide clarity and structure, the Torah would be confusing and misleading. Take the often-quoted line, "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" (Exod 21:23–27). Does this mean that God approves of dismemberment as a form of compensation? The answer is no. All that is being asserted is the principle of lex talionis: The severity of the punishment, whether assessed through imprisonment or financial compensation, should match the severity of the crime. By the same token, without the guidance of revelation, many of the questions people ask about life, *death, and the purpose of human existence would go unanswered. The success or failure of a religion may be judged on how well it balances the claims of one with those of the other.

For further study, see Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, Book 1, "Basic Principles of the Torah" (1178); Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed (1190); H. Cohen, Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism (1919); M. Buber, Eclipse of God (1952); L. Goodman, God of Abraham (1996); and K. Seeskin, Searching for a Distant God (2000).

KENNETH SEESKIN

Rebbetzin. This Jewish honorific term for a rabbi's wife derives from Yiddish and probably originated in medieval Europe. Although no such title exists in ancient Judaism, its emergence in the vernacular language of *Central and *East European Jewry indicates that rabbis' wives frequently assumed important if unofficial religious roles in Jewish communities. Rabbis tended to marry women from elite families whose daughters received Jewish educations far superior to those of most women. Many learned rebbetzins led prayers in the women's section of the synagogue (see WORSHIP) and undertook a variety of female community endeavors including bridal arrangements, burial preparations, and dispensing of charity (see WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES). Some rebbetzins were regarded as reliable witnesses of their husbands' rulings on ritual matters, particularly related to the *dietary laws, and might be consulted for legal opinions based on their knowledge of their husbands' practices. In a social context that honored scholarship above economic success, the rebbetzin frequently supported her family financially by running a business while her husband devoted himself to study. In East European communities the rebbetzin often had a monopoly on the sale of yeast; she might also cater refreshments following *life cycle events where her husband officiated.

In North America, the rebbetzin in all denominations of Judaism was expected to fulfill a number of social, communal, and educational functions within her husband's congregation. Before the introduction of female ordination in non-Orthodox forms of Judaism beginning in the 1970s (see RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN), some women who become rebbetzins built on their husbands' positions to achieve their own leadership roles as teachers and representatives of Jewish life within their communities and the larger non-Jewish world. With changing social mores and increased professional opportunities for Jewish women in many fields, including the rabbinate and cantorate (see entries on CANTORS; CANTORATE) it is less common for early-twenty-first century rabbis' spouses to follow these patterns. However, within the Orthodox Jewish community, most rebbetzins continue to fulfill traditional expectations, serving as domestic hostesses to their husbands' congregations and as teachers and counselors to female congregants (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX entries).

For further reading, see I. Etkes, "Marriage and Torah Study among the Lomdim in Lithuania in the Nineteenth Century," in The Jewish Family: Metaphor and Memory, ed. D. Kraemer (1989), 153–78; and S. R. Schwartz, The Rabbi's Wife: The Rebbetzin in American Jewish Life (2006).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Rebekah is the matriarch of the second generation of Israelite ancestors. She stands out for her relationship to her husband *Isaac and the dynamic quality of her actions. Like the other matriarchs, she overcomes *infertility (a motif that highlights the importance of offspring and the divine role in human events). She is the only matriarch who has a monogamous marriage, and she is the first whose husband is said to love her (Gen 24:67). Rebekah dominates the longest chapter in Genesis (24), in which she is identified as a suitable wife for Isaac through her actions at the well and is blessed by her brother, Laban, as the future ancestor of myriads (24:60; cf. 22:17 where God makes the same promise to *Abraham). When pregnant, Rebekah receives an oracle directly from God (25:23) indicating that the twins in her womb are the eponymous ancestors of two nations and that the younger will prevail. She subsequently tricks her husband (27) into blessing her favored second son *Jacob over his brother *Esau.

CAROL MEYERS

Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC) was founded in 1968 in *Philadelphia by its first president, Ira Eisenstein. The establishment of this school put Reconstructionism (see JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST) on the map as an independent denomination in the American Jewish community. The training program and curriculum reflect Reconstructionist ideology. Because of the movement's belief in women's equality, women were accepted as rabbinical students from its inception; in 1974 Sandy Eisenberg Sasso was the first woman to be ordained. The curriculum at RRC is constructed around seminars that focus on the evolving history and culture of the Jewish people. Today the school has both rabbinical and cantorial training programs (see entries under CANTOR, CANTORATE). It also supports centers that contribute to the understanding of Jewish views on women and gender studies, ethics, and aging. Many graduates assume leadership roles in Reconstructionist congregations, but others also serve Reform and Conservative congregations or undertake careers as Jewish communal service professionals, institutional chaplains, principals of day schools, or as chaplains on college campuses. REBECCA ALPERT

Red Heifer. Numbers 19 describes the ritual of the red heifer that is slaughtered outside the camp and burned with its flesh, blood, and dung. When combined with spring water, the heifer's ashes produce a "water of lustration" (mei ha-niddah) that is efficacious in eliminating ritual impurity acquired from contact with or propinquity to a corpse, grave, or human bone. The red heifer used in this ritual has to be perfect and unblemished and could never have been yoked (Num 19:2). All involved in the slaughter, burning, and gathering of the heifer's ashes are rendered ritually unclean until the evening. M. Parah, part of the *Mishnah's order Tohorot (Purities), details the ritual of the red heifer; among other criteria, the presence of even two black hairs is said to invalidate an otherwise red animal. In fact, finding a heifer that fulfills all halakhic requirements is all but impossible; according to M. Parah 3:4, only eight such heifers were ever sacrificed. Later Jewish tradition characterized this law as a ḥok, a divine commandment beyond human reasoning.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Redemption. In Jewish tradition, redemption connotes the restoration or return to an original state from a position of difficulty. In the *Pentateuch, two terms describe acts of redemption: go'el and padah. Go'el refers to a kinsman who is obligated to help a near relative when that relative has either sold himself to a wealthy "stranger or sojourner" (Lev 25: 47–55) or has been forced to sell some of his property (25:23); the go'el must also avenge the blood of his nearest relative (Gen 9:5). According to levirate marriage (see MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE) legislation (see HALAKHAH), the go'el must marry the childless widow of his brother or, in some cases, near kinsman (Ruth 4:4). Padah refers to the redemption or ransom required to free an individual or group of people from bondage or ownership. The term is used specifically with respect to the deliverance of Israel from slavery (Deut 7:8). Padah is also used to refer to the deliverance of the firstborn son (Exod 13:13, 14; Lev 27:26; see REDEMPTION OF FIRSTBORN SON [PIDYON HA-BEN]).

Both classical (*Isaiah and *Amos) and exilic (*Jeremiah) prophetic writings link the idea of redemption to the concept of teshuvah (*repentance or return). The statement, "Seek me and live" (Amos 5:4–6), links human responsibility for repentance to the accessibility of divine redemption. For Isaiah, human repentance is tied to the hope for an "end of days" or a time of universal liberation from war (2:2–4). The prophet Jeremiah understands redemption as the post-exilic restoration when "the remnant will be gathered up and restored" (23:2–4) and returned to the land (23:5–8, 33:14–26).

Rabbinic Judaism invokes the biblical padah and applies the notion of ransom buying to halakhic merit. Rabbi *Akiva, for example, attributes the parting of the Reed Sea to the merit of Jacob (Mekhilta 29b; Exodus Rabbah 21:8). Rabbinic Judaism also develops the prophetic link between teshuvah and redemption, conceptualizing redemption as a divine-human partnership of *atonement: God will forgive those who are truly repentant.

The medieval philosopher Moses *Maimonides (The Guide of the Perplexed) likened redemption to the full actualization of the human intellect that will take place in the world to come (olam ha-ba). This concept of redemption received further expansion in Jewish mysticism in the idea of tikkun or repair. According to this conception, human beings can help restore divine unity through their halakhic deeds and observance (see KABBALAH).

By contrast, Hermann *Cohen identified Jewish redemption with autonomous ethical action (The Religion of Reason: Out of the Sources of Judaism). Both Martin *Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig challenged this strictly ethical understanding of redemption. For Buber, redemption reflected the individual's capacity to respond with the whole being to the divine encounter ("Faith of Judaism"). For Rosenzweig, Jewish redemption meant the community's ability to sustain itself through its liturgical *calendar and to anticipate the full redemption of all persons in a not-yet future (The Star of Redemption).

RANDI RASHKOVER

Redemption of Firstborn Son (Pidyon Ha-Ben). This ritual originated in the biblical period when firstborn sons were to be consecrated to God to serve as priests (Num 3:12). When the priesthood was assigned to the Levites (see ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT), firstborn sons in nonpriestly families were redeemed from the priesthood at the price of five shekels (Num 3:46–48). Biblical *commandments also required that firstborn unclean animals be redeemed and that firstborn clean animals be sacrificed (Num 18:15–17). Redemption of firstborn sons is also explained as a commemoration of the slaying of the firstborn sons of the *Egyptians before the exodus (Exod 13:15; Num 3:13). The redemption is to occur on the thirtieth day after birth, although it may be postponed if that day is a *Sabbath, *festival, or *fast day. The ritual includes the recitation of a *blessing followed by the sheheḥeyanu prayer of thanksgiving; the father redeems his infant by giving five silver coins of a specific minimum weight to a guest of high priestly descent (kohen). Often the coins are returned to the family as a gift. Redemption does not apply in case of cesarean section or a miscarriage or stillbirth after the first forty days of a previous pregnancy, since the commandment refers to the firstborn son's opening of the mother's womb (Num 3:12).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Reform Judaism: See JUDAISM, REFORM entries

Reformation. Between 1517 and 1620, the Protestant Reformation split European Christendom into competing confessional churches, including Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, and Tridentine Catholic. It affected Jews most directly in the Holy Roman Empire of *Germany, and in *Italy and *Poland. Martin Luther made Jews a central image in his writings, symbolizing human rebellion against *God. This belief permeates his anti-Jewish polemical books, most notably On the Jews and Their Lies (1543). Traditional Catholics continued to believe that Jews sometimes committed *host desecration and *ritual murder. Apart from a few expulsions from cities or territories, the Reformation did not ultimately affect Jewish life in the Holy Roman Empire as much as did the shift toward princely absolutism in the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (see COURT JEWS).

Within the Italian states, Jews experienced the Reformation through a tightening of control over their lives. In 1553, the Catholic Church introduced censorship controls over Jewish *printing and books and banned the *Talmud. These measures forced Jewish communities to introduce their own form of pre-publication censorship. Pope Paul IV decreed in his bull Cum nimis absurdum (1555) that henceforth Jews would be tolerated in Catholic lands only under much stricter conditions. By the 1580s, a number of Italian towns and cities had forced their Jewish residents to live in small, densely populated, walled *"ghettos," giving them a visible yet isolated place within the community. The Catholic Church also made *conversions of Jews a higher priority than before, and a number of Jews became Catholic proselytes. Polish Jewry also experienced some elements of the Catholic Reformation, notably polemical attacks and limited press controls, although the community also benefited from increased German Jewish immigration by the end of the sixteenth century.

In both Italy and in the Holy Roman Empire, Jews responded to crises through appeals to the authorities, reliance on widespread family networks, and migration when necessary. The Reformation stimulated both Jewish hopes and fears, raising *messianic expectations among some, while others anticipated persecution and even the possibility of *martyrdom. Jews were also indirectly affected by internal Christian developments. *Christian Hebraism, a movement that was particularly strong in German-speaking Europe during the Reformation, would ultimately provide both Protestants and Catholics with a more realistic idea of Jews and their beliefs. The new biblicism among Protestants also awakened eschatological hopes, which traditionally included the mass conversion of the Jews. Such hopes encouraged some political leaders to support Jewish residence in *Britain (see *MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL).

For recent research, see D. P. Bell and S. G. Burnett, eds., Jews, Judaism and the Reformation in Sixteenth Century Germany (2006); A. Raz-Krakotzkin, The Censor, the Editor, and the Text: The Catholic Church and the Shaping of the Jewish Canon in the Sixteenth Century (2007); D. Ruderman, ed., Essential Papers on Jewish Culture in Renaissance and Baroque Italy (1992); K. R. Stow, Catholic Thought and Papal Jewish Policy 1555–1593 (1977); and M. Teter, Jews and Heretics in Catholic Poland (2006).

STEPHEN G. BURNETT

Rehoboam (ca. 928–911 BCE), son of *Solomon with Naamah, an *Ammonite (1 Kgs 14:21, 31), was king of *Judah for seventeen years. After his father's death, Rehoboam confronted the ten northern tribes, led by his rival Jeroboam, at *Shechem and considered their demand that he lighten the heavy taxation Solomon had imposed (1 Kgs 12:4; 2 Chron 10:4). Disregarding advice from Solomon's elders, the young Rehoboam listened to his contemporaries and declared that he would significantly increase his father's demands (1 Kgs 12:13–14). This harsh response became the justification for the secession of *Israel from the *United Monarchy and its establishment as the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam (1 Kgs 12:16–20). During the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign, Shishak of *Egypt conquered and sacked *Jerusalem and the *Temple and carried off Solomon's golden shields (1 Kgs 14:25–26).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Repentance. The Hebrew term for repentance is teshuvah, “returning,” and generally refers to returning to *God and virtue. *Judaism acknowledges that humanity is created with an inclination toward evil (yetzer ha-ra) and that people will transgress. Yet it provides ample opportunity for Jews to engage in teshuvah, as the daily liturgy (see WORSHIP) identifies God as appealing for teshuvah (ha-rotzeh b'teshuvah).

Teshuvah is an important biblical theme, particularly in the prophetic writings (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). The book of *Jonah, read on the afternoon of *Yom Kippur, is the primary biblical text that has the power and importance of teshuvah as its central message. The story's moral, which is often repeated in liturgy (especially the High Holiday maḥzor), is that God prefers the wicked to repent and return to virtue and live, rather than be punished and destroyed.

After the destruction of the Second *Temple by *Rome in 70 CE, teshuvah and the role of related spiritual endeavors, such as prayer, became of utmost concern to the *Rabbis. *Atonement for sins was no longer possible through sacrifice (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT) so they attempted to demonstrate that nonsacrificial methods were equally effective. Thus, the most significant meditations on teshuvah are not found in the *Bible, but in *rabbinic literature. Numerous, scattered statements throughout the *Talmud speak of the importance of teshuvah in a person's life, asserting that it will bring *redemption and longevity, as well as divert evil. Moreover, the Rabbis regard teshuvah as so fundamental to human existence that the Talmud lists it as one of the seven things created before God created the world (BT Pesaḥim 54b).

Later Jewish thinkers further elucidated the process of teshuvah. *Saadia Gaon (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL) claimed that there are four stages to teshuvah: renunciation of sin, feelings of remorse, pursuit of forgiveness, and the determination not to relapse into sin (Emunot V'De'ot, ch. 5). The first attempt to systemize the ideology of teshuvah in the Jewish tradition, however, is found in *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, where he writes that repentance is always possible, even at the moment before death (Hilkhot Teshuvah 1–2).

Jewish thought asserts that teshuvah at any time is considered acceptable and meritorious. However, particular importance is associated with the *High Holidays, especially *Yom Kippur. Beginning with *Rosh Ha-Shanah and ending with Yom Kippur, Jews reflect on their actions in the past year, seek forgiveness from others, and attempt to make up for whatever wrongs they may have committed. According to the M. Yoma 8:9, however, only Yom Kippur, as the Day of Atonement, can effect pardon for offenses between an individual and God; therefore, one who confesses and atones on Yom Kippur can be forgiven for sins against God. Offenses against another person, such as assault, injury, or theft, are not forgiven until the perpetrator pays full restitution, begs for forgiveness, and does something to appease the victim. Maimonides explains that, if the victim still refuses forgiveness, the perpetrator should repeat the procedure a second and third time, if necessary. The Rabbis believed that teshuvah is something fundamentally important to do before death (Avot* 2:10). Consequently, confessionals and opportunities to repent are included throughout daily (e.g., taḥanun) and seasonal *worship (e.g., seliḥot).

In recent times, the term used to describe one who chooses to assume traditional Jewish ritual and moral observances is baal teshuvah or “one who repents.”

For further reading, see L. Jacobs, Judaism and Theology: Essays on the Jewish Religion (2005); P. H. Peli, Soloveitchik on Repentance (1984); and M. Strassfeld, A Book of Life: Embracing Judaism as a Spiritual Practice (2006).

PAUL STEINBERG

Responsa Literature refers to a legal process through which individuals and communities send inquiries on legal issues (she'elot) to rabbinic authorities. These inquiries, together with the responses to them (teshuvot), constitute responsa literature. The responsum, the written answer to the question, is generally designed to clarify the law (see HALAKHAH) and provide a halakhic solution to an authentic dilemma. Responsa literature covers a wide range of topics, including economic, social, familial, and ethical issues; major emphases change with the concerns of succeeding generations.

In the introduction to his legal code, the Mishneh Torah, Moses *Maimonides describes the process of responsa literature as follows: “And the residents of every city would address halakhic questions to a contemporary gaon (leading talmudic scholar) concerning both religious and general concerns, depending often on proper explanation of difficult talmudic passages, and he would respond to them in his wisdom." In time the various responsa would find their way into literary collections. Although most responsa were written in *Hebrew with smatterings of *Aramaic, some were written in other languages. For example, a noticeable percentage of responsa from the geonic period, as well as medieval responsa written by Isaac Alfasi (also known as the Rif; 1013–1103), who lived in Morocco, and Maimonides, who lived in Egypt, were in *Judeo-Arabic (Arabic written in Hebrew letters).

Responsa literature, which originated in the period of the *Geonim, still continues today; thus, this genre covers a period of approximately 1,200 years. In every generation, prominent respondents (poskim) emerged who were accepted locally, regionally, and even internationally as Jewish legal authorities, even though they did not represent a formal judicial body. In early periods, responsa were given recognition as legal rulings, particularly in cases dealing with monetary issues. In later times, however, because of historical circumstances and changes in Jewish communal structure, they came to be viewed more as legal opinions than as rulings. Since responsa reflect an actual reality related to specific cases, they achieved a preferred status relative to other halakhic sources, particularly in comparison to legal codes that often seemed more theoretical than practical. As a result, when there was a contradiction between the two, the general tendency was to follow the responsum, although there are opinions that give preference to legal codes (see HALAKHAH). In addition to serving as instruments for halakhic rulings, the responsa are also an important source for documenting Jewish history and legal development.

Generally, the authors of the responsa responded to questions posed by both litigants and tended not to respond at the request of only one litigant. This was in accord with *Rashi's statement (Responsa of Rashi, Elfenbein edition, 74), "It is not our approach to make ourselves into advocates who respond decisively to a litigant." This statement is consistent with the dictum of Judah ben Tabai in M. Avot* 1:8: "Do not act as an advocate." Occasionally, questions to authorities were posed by rabbinic judges before whom the litigants appeared, rather than by the litigants themselves.

In general, inquiries were sent to the halakhic centers of the time, both by locals and by individuals who lived further afield. In geonic times, the respondents were the highest judicial authorities, who had legal power that extended over the entire Jewish *Diaspora; indeed, the responsa literature of the Geonim contributed significantly to preserving a unified Jewish halakhah. In the wake of historical transformations in the later Middle Ages, both the nature and the scope of the questions posed underwent changes. Even during the geonic period, however, the unity of the halakhah was sometimes broken, as evidenced by contradictory responses to the same question. Infrequently, questioners turned to two authorities with a query so they could choose the preferred response; however, the Geonim strongly frowned on this practice.

During the geonic period, the most important respondents were Natronai, *Saadia, Samuel ben Hofni, Sherira, and *Hai; they were succeeded by Joseph ben Meir ibn Migash, Isaac Alfasi (Rif), Maimonides, and *Nahmanides; and subsequently in *North Africa by the Ribash, the Tashbatz, and the Rashbash. *Gershom ben Judah of Mainz (Ragmah) and *Rashi stand out among respondents in medieval *France and *Germany; after them, important respondents include Jacob ben Meir Tam; *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenberg (Maharam); and *Asher ben Jehiel (Rosh), a student of the Maharam, who spent the later part of his life in *Spain.

The vast quantity of responsa collections, the large number of authors, and the diverse range of topics they address make it extremely difficult to navigate this literature. Beginning in the seventeenth century, there were attempts to reduce this difficulty by creating collections of responsa organized in a systematic fashion. However, these attempts were far from comprehensive. In recent years, the Institute for Research in Jewish Law of the Hebrew University has published an index of responsa literature, which can now be accessed through the Responsa Project software created by Bar-Ilan University. For further reading, see N. S. Hecht, B. S. Jackson, S. M. Passamaneck, D. Piattelli, and A. M. Rabello, eds., An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law (1996).

GIDEON LIBSON

Resurrection. *Daniel is the first book in the Hebrew *Bible to stress the concept of resurrection, together with the idea that those resurrected will ascend to heaven for astral immortality. This idea became central to other apocalyptic writers because it supported the belief that God would intervene in the lives of the persecuted to reestablish justice. The form of immortality that was envisioned may well have been angelic. The angels had been identified with the stars as early as the First *Temple period. Several strands of late *Hellenistic spirituality apparently involved the way in which astral immortality was gained. For instance, the books of Enoch (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) are obsessed with the notion of astral journey, as are the hekhalot texts of Jewish mysticism (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE). Aramaic fragments of 1 Enoch were found at *Qumran, indicating that *Enoch writings were known to the *Dead Sea Scroll sectarians.

Talmudic texts hint that the earliest Rabbis occasionally practiced mystical ascension techniques and traditions. For instance, *Josephus reports that the *Essenes "immortalize" (athanatizousin) souls, which is almost the same term that appears in the Mithras liturgy (Antiquities 18.18). In another phrase that suggests the theme of the rivalry between angels and men over the approach of a mystic making a heavenly ascent, Josephus says that they "think the approach of the righteous to be much fought over." The Dead Sea Scrolls also report that the members of the Qumran groups are "together with the angels of the Most High and there is no need for an interpreter." The location for this meeting must be either heaven or the re-created ideal earth. The Qumran community probably believed its forebears to have ascended to heaven as angels after their deaths, as Daniel 12 implies.

The Qumran community held that the angels were their close companions. The "Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness" describes a military plan in which the angels of God descend to lead the numerically insignificant Qumran community to victory. Its priestly preoccupation with ritual cleanliness is functional for a group that desired angelic company. Angels would not consent to enter an Essene camp unless the Qumranites were in an adequate state of ritual *purity, the same state recognized by the Rabbis as a necessary precondition for ascent to the heavenly Temple. For further reading, see A. F. Segal, Life after Death: A History of the Afterlife in Western Religions (2004); see also AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD. ALAN F. SEGAL Revelation denotes either the appearance of the divine presence to human beings or the divine communication of teachings and commandments to human beings. The Hebrew *Bible recounts numerous instances of appearances or revelations of *God's presence (gilui ha-shekhinah) or manifestations by divine beings who are God's messengers to human beings. In these stories, an appearance of the divine may confer promises of future blessing, bring a human being into a covenantal relationship, provide warning, or give practical, moral, or religious instruction.

Revelation in a more specific sense refers to God's issuance of commandments to human beings. In the Hebrew Bible, God issues commandments (mitzvot*) in the framework of a *covenant (berit), in which the human party is obliged to observe the commandments in exchange for divine favor and blessing and on the pain of punishment. In the theophany at Mount Sinai (ma'amad har Sinai [Exod 19–20]), God appears to the assembled Israelites, appoints them as a holy people, and gives them the *Ten Commandments through the mediation of *Moses. This is the most significant example of divine revelation in the Hebrew *Bible, although the Hebrew Bible also relates several instances of such covenants between God and human partners; for example, *Noah (Gen 9), *Abraham (Gen 15, 17), and David (2 Sam 7). Late biblical and post-biblical Jewish thought assigned primacy to the Sinai revelation and claimed that the entire written text of the *Pentateuch was revealed to Moses at that time.

For rabbinic *Judaism, the revelation to Moses at Mount Sinai contains both the entire Written *Torah (Torah she'bikhtav) and also an Oral Torah (Torah she'b'al peh), which contains additional laws given to Moses at Sinai as well as resolutions to legal perplexities arising from interpretive problems in the Written Torah itself. The authority of the Rabbis rested not only on their expertise in interpreting and applying the Written Torah but also on their possession of this oral tradition that originated from Moses' encounter with God at Sinai (cf. M. Avot 1:1). This authority was challenged by the medieval *Karaites movement, which accepted the divine origin of the Written Torah but not of the Oral Torah. The belief that God revealed Torah from heaven (torah min ha-shamayim) was considered to be of such importance that the Rabbis declared that anyone who denied it would lose a place in the world to come (M. Sanhedrin 10:1). Because the Rabbis believed that the entire text of the Torah was a product of the divine mind, their interpretive method of *midrash could uncover both legal and nonlegal religious teachings that went beyond the plain sense meaning of the written text (see RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS).

Medieval Jewish thinkers treated the Written Torah as the supreme source of all religious and moral knowledge (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL). The medieval Jewish mystical teachings of the *Kabbalah held that by correctly interpreting the Torah one could glean its secret mystical teachings about the inner life of the godhead. Medieval Jewish philosophers who had studied the philosophies of Plato, Aristotle, and their ancient and medieval successors argued that the claims about God's activity in the world were either consistent with or even superior to the metaphysical and scientific teachings of these philosophies. *Maimonides, for example, claimed that a proper reading of the Written Torah showed that Moses was not only the greatest prophet in human history but also possessed great scientific and philosophical knowledge.

Modern debates about the nature of divine revelation have been deeply affected by developments in modern biblical scholarship, in particular the documentary source hypothesis, which showed that the Pentateuch was likely composed of several literary strands and only later redacted into a single canon (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP). Most Orthodox Jews reject the conclusions of biblical scholarship or only accept those conclusions that are consistent with the traditional belief in the unity and divinity of the Pentateuch. However, for many Jews, the traditional notion of revelation of the entire Written Torah as a whole has become untenable. Nonetheless, many non-Orthodox Jewish thinkers maintain that a belief in divine revelation is central to Judaism, even if their conception of revelation does not conform to the traditional view. Such thinkers disagree about the extent to which a divine-human encounter involves a verbal communication from God and the extent to which the biblically ordained commandments and the rabbinic legal system (halakhah) remain binding on modern Jews. For example, Martin *Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig agreed that revelation consisted primarily in the revelation of the divine presence to Israel, and not the articulation of specific law. However, Buber held that every person had to interpret what God demanded of him or her individually, while Rosenzweig argued that observance of the concrete laws of both the Written and Oral Torah was the proper response to God's commanding presence (cf. F. Rosenzweig, On Jewish Learning [1955]). Many non-Orthodox thinkers view the biblical text as an interpretation, and not a recording of the event of revelation, or as Abraham Joshua *Heschel put it, a midrash on revelation (God in Search of Man [1959]). Liberal Jewish thinkers have also introduced the idea of progressive revelation: Because every generation is capable of contributing innovative moral and religious insights to Jewish life, the understanding of God's will unfolds and develops through history.

WILLIAM PLEVAN

Ringelblum, Emanuel (1900–1944) was an historian, social worker, and organizer of the Oyneg Shabes Project in the *Warsaw ghetto (see HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS). In 1939, Ringelblum formed a group of clandestine archivists who gathered significant documentation chronicling the horrific daily events of the Warsaw ghetto (including Jewish Council notices, personal testimonies, photographs, poetry, essays, announcements of cultural events, and underground newspapers) as well as information about deportations and death camps. The group buried the documentation in milk cans some of which were recovered after *World War II. The Ringelblum archive is one of the most valuable collections of primary source documentation about the Holocaust. For further reading, see S. Kassow, Who Will Write Our History? Emanuel Ringelblum, the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Oyneg Shabes Archive (2007); see also HOLOCAUST DIARIES; HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION.

Ritual Bath: See IMMERSION, RITUAL: WOMEN; MIKVEH; NIDDAH

Ritual Murder Accusation (also blood libel) is a myth that developed in medieval Christian Europe after the First Crusade (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES), first as a false accusation of "ritual murder," according to which Jews were accused of capturing a Christian, usually a young male, and crucifying him around Easter/*Passover. Later, a blood motif was added, claiming that Jews collected Christian blood for ritual, "medical," or magical use. This version of the accusation became known as the "blood libel."

The first recorded accusation took place in Norwich, England (see ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES) in 1144, when the mutilated body of an apprentice, William, was found around Easter. Efforts to implicate Jews failed because of royal protection provided by Henry II. In the twelfth century there were five more ritual murder accusations in England and France (see FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES) – Gloucester, 1168; Blois, 1171; Pontoise, 1179; Bury St. Edmunds, 1181; and Winchester 1192 – some of these accusations ended in the arrests and executions of Jews. It has been recently argued that the case of Richard of Pontoise led to the change in policies toward the Jews by Philip Augustus of France and their expulsion in 1181 from the Île de France. Ritual murder accusations turned into the blood libel in the thirteenth century, perhaps because of the increasing centrality of blood imagery in Christian ritual and worship. In 1236, Jews in Fulda, *Germany, were accused of killing several Christian children to collect their blood for medicinal purposes. Emperor Frederick II ordered an inquiry into the validity of such charges, focusing on whether or not Jews needed Christian blood. After scholars and prominent converts testified that no tenet of Jewish religion required blood, the accused Jews were exonerated. In the thirteenth century there were an estimated fifteen ritual murder accusations. One, in Valreas, France, in 1247, resulted in a papal intervention when Pope Innocent IV sent a letter to the Archbishop of Vienne, condemning blood accusations against Jews. The 1255 accusation that developed after the death of Hugh of Lincoln is evoked in the final stanza of the ritual murder narrative that constitutes "The Prioress's Tale" in Geoffrey Chaucer's fourteenth-century Canterbury Tales.

Extensive records have survived from a ritual murder accusation and the ensuing trial in Trent (Trento) in northern *Italy in 1475. On March 26, 1475, Easter Sunday, the body of a two-year-old boy, Simon, was found in the cellar of a Jewish home in Trent. On the instigation of Bishop Hinderbach of Trent, eighteen Jewish men and one Jewish woman were immediately arrested, interrogated under torture, and executed. Seeking canonization of Simon, Hinderbach did all he could to establish a local cult, promoting alleged miracles resulting from Simon's martyrdom. Pope Sixtus IV sent an emissary, Bishop Battista Dei Giudici di Ventimiglia, to investigate. Documentation was collected, and in the process, numerous broadsheets depicting the death of Simon were published, popularizing the imagery of ritual murder. One of these images provided the basis for the depiction of Simon of Trent above the main city gate, the Brückenturm, in *Frankfurt. Despite initial papal opposition, a local cult in Trent developed and was legitimized in 1588. Although Simon was never canonized, his feast (on March 24) became part of the Catholic calendar. It was only suppressed in 1965 after the Second Vatican Council. As R. Po-Chia Hsia has shown, undoubtedly because of the publication of illustrated broadsheets about Trent, other accusations followed in northern *Italy and the Holy Roman Empire (Reggio, Mantua, 1478; Arena, 1479; Portobuffuola and Verona, 1480). The popularity of Simon's story also retroactively stimulated several local legends about child murders (e.g., Lienz, 1442, recorded 1475; Rinn, 1462).

The blood accusation was sometimes conflated with the libel that Jews *desecrated the host (the communion wafer believed to be the body of Christ). After the Protestant *Reformation, which challenged the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, accusations gradually diminished in Protestant areas. In Catholic areas, however, they continued.

Blood libels and host desecration accusations appeared in *Poland for the first time in the sixteenth century, at the height of the *Reformation, and continued through the end of the eighteenth century. A 1756 trial in Jampol led to a Jewish diplomatic mission to Pope Benedict XIV, who charged Cardinal Giovanni Ganganelli to write a report about blood accusations against Jews. The future Pope Clement XIV produced a forty-page report refuting the blood accusations. However, the accusations did not stop, enduring in early modern Poland until 1787.

The blood libels were not just a phenomenon of the pre-modern period. They continued through the twentieth century, albeit in a somewhat different form. Although the first nineteenth-century accusation surfaced in Damascus in 1840 (see DAMASCUS AFFAIR), Europe remained the main arena, in which a new wave of accusations and a new debate about their validity took place in the nineteenth and early twentieth century. The question of ritual murder or blood libel became a subject of dispute and a proxy in a broader struggle between Modernist and anti-Modernist Catholic intellectuals in Europe. Yet the question became real when new trials sprang up across Eastern and Central Europe.

Whereas the 1840 *Damascus Affair followed older patterns, including the acceptance of the ritual murder charge by officials and a mode of investigation that involved torture, it did not have the "modern" characteristics of the cases that took place in Europe in the latter part of the nineteenth century. European newspapers recorded hundreds of accusations against Jews in the last two decades of the nineteenth century, but not all of these cases became full-fledged trials. Six trials – Kutaisi in Georgia, 1871; Tiszaeszlár, Hungary, 1882–83; Xanten, Germany, 1891–92; Polna, Bohemia, 1899–1900; Konitz, West Prussia, 1900–01; and Kiev, *Russian Empire, 1911–13 (the famous Mendel *Beilis case) – drew wide international attention. That the timing of the trials coincided with the rise of political *antisemitism is not coincidental. As H. Kieval has argued, these trials employed modern methods of investigation, including forensics. Although actual trials may not have continued beyond the first decades of the twentieth century, the myth has not died. It appeared in *Nazi antisemitic rhetoric and still persists on antisemitic websites. Rumors of Jews killing Christian children were used to incite violence in Eastern Europe in the wake of *World War II, resulting in *pogroms against Jewish survivors returning home (e.g., Topolčany, Slovakia, 1945–46; Kielce, Poland, 1946).

For further reading, see J. Frankel, The Damascus Affair: "Ritual Murder," Politics, and the Jews in 1840 (1997); R. Po-chia Hsia, The Myth of Ritual Murder: Jews and Magic in Reformation Germany (1988); idem, Trent 1475: Stories of a Ritual Murder Trial (1992); H. Kieval, Blood Inscriptions: "The Ritual Murder" Trial in Modern Europe (2008); M. Rubin, Gentile Tales: The Narrative Assault on Late Medieval Jews (2004); and K. R. Stow, Jewish Dogs: An Image and Its Interpreters: Continuity in the Catholic-Jewish Encounter (2006). MAGDA TETER

Roma: See HOLOCAUST: ROMA

Romania. Archeological evidence (such as coins discovered in Banat and Hebrew inscriptions found at Sarmizegetusa, the former capital citadel of Dacia) date a Jewish presence in what is now Romania from as early as the second century CE, when Jewish soldiers in the legions of *Rome arrived (and perhaps settled) in the region, with the conquest of Dacia. The first documentary proof of the local population's contacts with Jews appears in the writings of *Benjamin of Tudela, the mid-twelfth-century Jewish traveler; he describes good relations between *Byzantine Jews and the Vlachs living south of the Danube (today the Aromanians). Benjamin's stories are confirmed by medieval documents (like commercial deeds and interfaith marriage certificates), which show that, by the thirteenth century, Jews were crossing *Bulgaria and the Danubian lands as the main traders between *Byzantium, *Russia, and *Poland. Jews were present in Transylvania from the eleventh or twelfth century (under King Ladislau I), but were not particularly welcome; they enjoyed more favorable treatment in the mid-thirteenth century when King Bela IV decided to encourage their settlement in this area.

During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, *Ashkenazi Jews from *Germany, Poland, *Austria, Moravia, Czechia, and *Ukraine, as well as *Sephardic Jews from the *Ottoman Empire and *Spain who were traveling through Moldova and Wallachia, started forming stable Jewish communities. Ashkenazi Jews settled mostly in Moldova, where they continued to play an important role in trade between the Ottoman Empire and Poland; Sephardic Jews preferred Wallachia and the southern commercial routes. The first Jewish quarter is mentioned at the beginning of the fourteenth century in Cetatea Albă (Bolgrad). By 1550 the first Sephardic community is mentioned in Bucharest. In the mid-sixteenth century an Ashkenazi Jewish community was established in Iassy.

Some Wallachian and Moldovan rulers, such as Dan I (late fourteenth century) and Stephen the Great (late fifteenth century), saw the benefits of a Jewish presence and provided various privileges to the new settlers. Dan I gave Jews the right to lease land by the year. Stephen the Great is known for using the diplomatic services of Isaac Beg, a Jewish physician accredited at his court as a representative of the Ottoman sultan Uzun Hassan in 1473–74. Other rulers (such as Peter Rares of Moldova in the mid-sixteenth century) encouraged *money lending by borrowing from Galician, German, and Ottoman Jews. Nevertheless, most of the settled Jews were rather poor, as mentioned in accounts from the late-sixteenth-century reign of Michael the Brave of Wallachia and Moldova. It was only in the seventeenth century that the Jewish communities started playing a role in the economy of the Danubian Principalities, as shown by the inclusion of provisions related to Jewish converts to Christianity in the "Govora Bill of Rights" (1640 Wallachia) and to the Jewish inhabitants in the "Romanian Book of Learning" (1646 Moldova). The visit to Iassy of prominent rabbis Elia del Medigo and Shlomo ben Arvey in the early seventeenth century demonstrates the cultural importance of the local community at that time. More Jewish communities were established in Moldova throughout the seventeenth century with the arrival of refugees from Ukraine after Bogdan *Chmelnitzki's Cossack uprising and *pogroms (Piatra Neamț, Soroca, Ștefănești, Focșani, Roman, Kishinev). New communities were also recorded in Wallachia (Craiova, Târgoviște), as well as the first Jewish guild (at the turn of the eighteenth century, under Constantin Brâncoveanu).

In early-seventeenth-century Transylvania, Prince Gabriel Bethlen provided benefits to Ottoman Jewish merchants in an attempt to boost local trade; he gave them the right to settle, practice their religion, and travel freely. In many cases, however, these rights were not enforced. Still, they led to the emergence of new Jewish communities (Alba Iulia).

Jewish immigration to Moldova and Wallachia increased in the eighteenth century. Rulers recognized Jewish contributions to the emergence of internal markets, the flow of local commerce and its connection to the international economy, and the development of certain crafts and trades; they granted Jewish communities autonomy and rights. Jewish physicians and advisors served at their courts (Constantin Brâncoveanu, Nicholas Mavrocordat), and rulers encouraged new settlements (Oradea, Cluj, Dej, Sighet, Arad, under Joseph II). Still, this was also the time of a first *pogrom and destruction of a *synagogue (Bucharest, 1715, under Sherban Cantacuzino); the first official *ritual murder accusation (Onițcani, Moldova, 1726, under Michael Racovitza); the imposition of excessive taxation against the Jews; and strict control of their community life (Transylvania, 1776, under Maria Theresa). This oscillation between privileges and restrictions continued in the first half of the nineteenth century and culminated with the enforcement of the "Organic Regulations" of both Moldova and Wallachia that labeled the Jews as aliens and stripped them of all political and civic rights (1831–32).

Despite these restrictions, Jewish immigration continued to increase in the nineteenth century, and a number of Jewish intellectuals joined Romanian national revolutionary movements. Jewish bankers Davicion Bally and Hillel Manoach and painters C. D. Rosenthal and Barbu Iscovescu provided active (including financial) support to the Revolution of 1848. However, even though the revolutionaries included Jewish *emancipation among their demands the new authorities refused to grant it. On his election as ruler of both Moldova and Wallachia (thus achieving the unification of the Danubian Principalities), Alexander John Cuza gave civil and political rights to the Jews in accordance with international provisions (1865). However, these rights were never realized, as he was forced to abdicate a few months later. Cuza was followed by German Prince Karl von

Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, who, under pressure from nationalist and xenophobic Romanian parliamentarians, promulgated a new constitution in which Article 7 denied any civil and political rights to the Jews. This made the “Jewish problem” in Romania official and happened about the time (1867) when the Jews of Transylvania were becoming *Hungarian citizens, enjoying full and equal civil and political rights. Map 10

Despite the fact they were not Romanian citizens, many Jews fought in Romania’s Independence War of 1877–78. The Peace Congress of Berlin (1878) made emancipation of the Jews a condition of the international recognition of Romania’s independence; the Romanian authorities revised the constitution, but only provided for the naturalization of individual Jews. Approximately 888 Jews who had fought in the Independence War were initially naturalized; by 1913, only 4,668 of the 231,038 Jews living in Romania were full citizens. Many Jews were expelled or left on their own.

About 23,000 Jews (mostly noncitizens) fought in the Romanian Unification War of 1916–18 (World War I); many were decorated for their service. The post-war unification of Wallachia, Moldova, and Transylvania, as well as Bessarabia and Bukovina, tripled the number of Romanian Jews. The Constitution of 1923 finally granted Jews full and equal civil and political rights. As a result, many Jews became involved in political life, assuming important positions. By 1930 the number of Jews in Romania exceeded 750,000. In addition to the traditional *Ashkenazi and *Sephardic communities, there were Neolog (see JUDAISM, NEOLOG) communities in Transylvania. The strong Orthodox community of Sighet is particularly well known. Important Ḥasidic dynasties that originated in Romania include the Satmar and Klausenberg communities (see also ḤASIDISM: EUROPE). Map 10

In 1937, with the coming into office of the Goga-Cuza government, *antisemitism became state policy; by 1938, 220,000 Jews were stripped of Romanian citizenship.

In 1940, after the occupation of Bessarabia and Bukovina by the Soviet Union, Jews were accused of having sided with the enemy, and a decree issued in August imposed a legal status on Jews that was based on the *Nazi Nuremberg Laws. At the same time, Hungary annexed northern Transylvania with its 150,000 Jews. These Jews were deported to Nazi death camps in the summer of 1944, and 85% perished. In 1941, Bessarabia and northern Bukovina were retaken by Romania; most Jewish residents of these regions were eventually deported to Nazi death camps in Transnistria. The Jews of Wallachia and Moldova were taken to forced labor battalions, evacuated, and abused, but most were not deported or exterminated. Between 280,000 and 380,000 Romanian Jews died in the *Holocaust. During the communist regime, most of Romania’s remaining Jews emigrated, mainly to *Israel, under an agreement with the local authorities (“the ransom of the Jews”). Today only 8,000 Jews still live in Romania, most of them elderly people. About half live in Bucharest. Nevertheless, community life continues: there are a number of Ashkenazic Orthodox congregations; most of the Sephardic communities disappeared after World War II and those few remaining are now included in Orthodox communities), with a number of active synagogues, several museums, a *Yiddish theater, a publishing house, a newspaper, a research center, and youth clubs. Valuable studies of this community include V. Neumann, The History of

Romanian Jews, 5 vols. (2002–04); C. Iancu et al., eds., The Jews of Romania (1866–1938), 3 vols. (1998–2006), and R. Ioanid, The Ransom of the Jews (2005). FELICIA WALDMAN

Romaniote Jews are the “indigenous” Greek-speaking Jews of *Greece and the *Balkans who first came to the region in the Roman period, in the centuries before and after the start of the Common Era. They were known as Benei Romania, or Romaniote Jews, because Jews called Byzantium and other Greek-ruled lands Romania, the land of the Romans. The distinctive *customs of this community are known as “minhag Romania.” See also BYZANTINE EMPIRE; TURKEY. Map 9

Rome; Roman Empire When Jews first came into contact with Rome in the second century BCE, their response was neutral. Thus, *Daniel 11:30, reinterpreting *Numbers 24:24, speaks of “ships of Kittim” who came against Antiochus IV and forced him to withdraw from *Egypt. As the *Septuagint and the *Targum make clear, the Kittim are the Romans. The treaty between Judah *Maccabee and Rome (1 Macc 8) offers high praise for the Romans, who are described as men of great valor and nobility, as faithful friends of their allies, and as being governed in full harmony by their Senate. They were also far enough away so that Judah did not transgress God’s word when making a treaty with them (Deut 7:1–2, 20:15). Yet when Pompey conquered *Jerusalem in 63 BCE and desecrated the *Temple, Rome’s image suddenly became absolutely negative: “Alien nations ascended your altar; they trampled it proudly with their sandals” (Psalms of Solomon 2:2 [see PSEUD-EPIGRAPHIA]); God is asked “to turn the pride of the dragon (i.e. Pompey) into dishonor,” and before long, “God showed me the insolent one slain on the mountains of Egypt” (2:25–26). The *Dead Sea Scrolls frequently speak of the Romans as Kittim, “swift and powerful in battle,” “with cunning and treachery they behave towards all the peoples...like an eagle, insatiable” (1QpHab II 12–13; III 5–6.11–12). The Roman Senate, once so praised, now becomes “the house of blame” (IV 11). The “Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness” foretells Rome’s final destruction in the war between light and darkness, when the Kittim form the satanic “army of Belial” (1QM I 13).

After the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple in 70 CE, *Josephus Flavius is alone in defending the Romans. He argues that without God’s help they could never have built such a huge empire (Jewish War 2:390); God stands now on the side of Rome (5:367–8). Josephus extols Roman philanthropy and leniency in victory (5:341.372) and insists that Titus wanted to preserve the Temple, even against the will of the Jews (6:128). According to Josephus, Rome’s actions should be understood as a fulfillment of God’s plan. The contemporary book, Apocalypse of Ezra (see PSEUD-EPIGRAPHIA), sees Rome quite differently, describing it as the eagle coming up from the sea that reigns over the whole earth. It is the fourth beast of Daniel 7:7–8 that has wielded power over the world with terror and oppression, but its end has come; the earth shall be freed from its violence and be refreshed again (4 Ezra 11).

*Rabbinic literature is not uniform in its representations of Rome and of the Roman emperors. The image of Vespasian is mainly positive. However, Titus alone is fully blamed for the destruction and desecration of the Temple; he is the godless ruler who consciously provokes God's wrath and is finally punished forever in hell (BT Gittin 56b–57a). Hadrian, who is praised by the *Sibylline Oracles early in his reign as “the best of all men” (5:48), receives very positive treatment in some rabbinic texts (e.g., Leviticus Rabbah 25:5); however, most rabbinic views are wholly negative because of his suppression of the Second *Jewish War led by *Bar Kokhba (JT Taanit 4, 68d–69a). An emperor interested in Judaism and in friendly contact with *Judah ha-Nasi is depicted in several anecdotes about “Antoninus and Rabbi” (e.g., BT Avodah Zarah 10a–b); “Antoninus” is a conflation of several emperors, including Marcus Aurelius and Caracalla. Although in general the anecdotes are positive toward Antoninus, some texts are rather critical. The last emperor to be mentioned several times in rabbinic literature is Diocletian, whose image is between neutral and positive (e.g., JT Berakhot 3:1, 6a; JT Avodah Zarah 5:4, 44d).

Regarding Roman rule, most Rabbis tried to come to terms with reality and to restrain their fellow Jews from waging a new revolt. R. Judah praises Rome because “they organize markets, repair bridges, set up bathhouses,” but R. Simon ben Yoḥai objects: “Whatever they set up, they set up only for their own convenience. Markets serve them for their whores, bathhouses to preen themselves in, and bridges to collect tolls” (BT Shabbat 33b). Many rabbinic texts conflate Rome with *Esau, Jacob's perennial rival and enemy, and with Esau's descendants, the *Edomites, who under the leadership of Amalek attacked the Israelite tribes at Rephidim (Exod 17). Rome is the “pig,” an utterly impure animal. It is also the sinful empire or, more clearly, the fourth empire of Daniel 2, which comes after *Babylon, Media, and Greece and is the worst of all, but whose fall will lead to the final *redemption.

The Christianization of the empire in the fourth century did not change this negative image. When Christian Rome claimed to fulfill biblical prophecies and to be the true Israel, the Rabbis countered that the Oral *Torah was the true sign of God's *election (see also REVELATION).

In the political turmoil of the early seventh century when *Palestine was conquered by the *Persians, retaken by Rome, and finally taken over by the militant forces of *Islam, *apocalyptic hopes led to a much more aggressive and violent attitude toward Rome. This is documented in the apocalyptic Sefer Zerubbabel and some piyyutim (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) closely related with it. Yet when the situation calmed, Jewish attitudes toward Rome (in this case, the *Byzantine Empire) again became more moderate, accepting the status quo and even seeing Rome as an instrument in God's plan, although always full of hope that the fourth empire would soon come to an end and give way to God's rule. Recent research includes M. Hadas-Lebel, Jerusalem against Rome (2006); and M. Goodman, Jews and Romans: The Clash of Ancient Civilizations (2007). Map 4

GÜNTER STEMBERGER

Rosenzweig, Franz (1886–1929) was a German Jewish philosopher and theologian best known for his philosophical book, The Star of Redemption. Rosenzweig argued for a “new thinking,” a new form of philosophy that recognized the actuality of divine *revelation. Throughout his writings, he aimed to demonstrate the capacity of the Jewish literary tradition to inflect and inform this new type of reflection and to serve as the spiritual, social, and intellectual grounding for Jewish thought and community. A central figure among German Jewish intellectuals in the Wilhelmine and Weimar Jewish renaissance, he wrote on education, Jewish religious observance, translation and translational philosophy, biblical hermeneutics, and the theological divide between Judaism and Christianity.

Rosenzweig was born and raised in an assimilated bourgeois family in Kassel, *Germany. He studied philosophy with Heinrich Rickert and Friedrich Meinecke in Freiburg, completing a doctoral dissertation in 1913 entitled Hegel and the State (published in 1920). Rosenzweig's early advocacy of a neo-Hegelian revolution in philosophy and history developed in conversation with a close-knit group of friends, including assimilated Jews who had converted to Protestantism. However, passionate and formative dialogues on philosophy and theology with one member of this circle, Eugen Rosenstock (later, Rosenstock-Huessy, 1888–1973), convinced Rosenzweig of the need for a robust concept of revelation to anchor and orient human thought and action. His “conversion” from a secularized Hegelian philosophy to a belief in divine revelation generated a spiritual crisis. In 1913 Rosenzweig planned to be baptized, but he soon reversed himself and embraced Judaism instead. At this time he wrote that liberal Judaism and liberal Christianity had both overly accommodated the pernicious historicism and idealism of the day (“Atheistic Theology,” [1914]); like the Christian dialectical theologians who emerged in this period, Rosenzweig argued that only a radical theism was adequate to address the failures of modern *thought. Over time, Rosenzweig came to argue that the Jewish concept of revelation uniquely posited an unmediated relationship between human beings and God (see Judaism despite Christianity: The Letters on Christianity and Judaism between Eugen Rosenstock-Huessy and Franz Rosenzweig [1969]).

Rosenzweig began studying Jewish texts and languages in 1914 with Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918) and others at the Institute for the Scientific Study of Judaism. During *World War I, he served in an anti-aircraft gun unit in Macedonia and began the outline for his best-known work (“The Germ Cell of the Star of Redemption” [1917]). He wrote The Star of Redemption (published in 1921) on postcards mailed home. The Star contrasts the Hegelian-influenced concept of a total synthesis between God's revelation and the historical process, and the conception of the human philosophical task that flows from it, with a view based on the acknowledgment of God's creation of the world. The book, which examines what Rosenzweig regards as the three irreducible constituent elements of the cosmos – God, the human being, the world – argues that God's revelation animates the world, the individual, and the collectives of the faithful. For Rosenzweig, these communities are constituted by the Jewish people and Christian believers; each asymmetrically ritualizes God's revelation in the world. Rosenzweig's interlocutors in The Star include Goethe, Schelling, and Fichte as well as the ever-present Hegel, but the unusual style derives as well from passages from the Hebrew *Bible and Jewish liturgy that are integrated into a more traditional philosophical presentation.

After the war, Rosenzweig decided against a university professorship and devoted himself to the recapitulation and fine-tuning of the philosophical insights of The Star of Redemption (The New Thinking [1925]; Understanding the Sick and the Healthy: A View of World, Man, and God [1953]); adult Jewish education; and translation of Hebrew texts into German. Rosenzweig's assumption of official leadership of the Freies Jüdisches Lehrhaus in 1920 allowed him to put ideas he had developed for Jewish educational innovation ("It is Time" [1917]) into the context of his commitment to furthering German Jewish engagement with the texts of the Jewish tradition ("Towards a Renaissance of Jewish Learning" [1920]). Rosenzweig's goal was to construct a new form of Jewish learning that would recognize the challenges of post-emancipation Jewish life. He imagined that adult Jewish learning should move from the periphery (acculturated Jewish identity and superficial understanding of Judaism) toward the center (profound engagement with the texts, languages, and central ideas of *Torah). This model for learning became influential and generated new interest in adult Jewish study, in Germany and elsewhere.

Rosenzweig translated the *blessing after meals and *Sabbath evening liturgy (1920), the liturgical poetry of Judah *Halevi (Sixty Poems and Hymns of Yehudah Halevi [1924; expanded edition, 1927]), and, in collaboration with Martin *Buber, the Hebrew *Bible (1925–29; see BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS). Rosenzweig's translations of these Hebrew texts into German reflected multiple and sometimes competing social and cultural identities; he focused on cultivating "hearers" rather than mere "readers" of liturgical and poetic Hebrew and its unique vocal and spiritual register. The Bible translation in particular (which Buber completed alone in 1961) was intended to stretch the German language and compel the attention of readers who had become immune to the Bible's audacious religious vision.

Rosenzweig's articulation of Jewish communal identity and praxis took a careful path that valued both individual *autonomy and communal ties cemented by biological membership and divine *election ("The Builders" [1924]). His personal politics defied easy classification because he distanced himself from both *Zionism and the major organizations of liberal German Jewry (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY). He profoundly influenced contemporaneous theologians, such as Buber, and later Jewish thinkers grappling with modern conceptions of *revelation and the ethical imperatives of Judaism, such as Arthur A. Cohen and Emmanuel *Levinas (see THOUGHT, MODERN).

In 1922 Rosenzweig was given a diagnosis of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, and from then on he suffered increasingly from debilitating muscular degeneration. Thanks to the tremendous labors of his wife, Edith Hahn Rosenzweig, he remained productive despite his near-paralysis until his death, just shy of age 43, in 1929. MARA H. BENJAMIN

Rosh Ha-Shanah: See HIGH HOLIDAYS; NEW YEARS

Rosh Hodesh, the New Moon, (literally, "head of the month") indicates the beginning of each Hebrew month. The Bible describes Rosh Hodesh as a semi-festival, celebrated with special sacrifices (Num 28:11–15) and the sounding of trumpets (Num 10:10). The dates of Rosh Hodesh were fixed in the fourth century CE under the *Patriarch (nasi) Hillel II. It is observed eleven times per year, because the 1st of Tishri is *Rosh Ha-Shanah. Observance of Rosh Hodesh begins the preceding *Sabbath, with a special *Blessing of the Moon. Additional *liturgy is recited on Rosh Hodesh itself (e.g., *Hallel), representing its festive status, and mourning and fasting are prohibited. Months of thirty days require two days of Rosh Hodesh, and months of twenty-nine days require one day. Rosh Hodesh has long been considered a special day for *women; T. Rosh Ha-Shanah 23a describes it as a reward for Israelite women's righteousness. Some contemporary Jewish women and girls participate in Rosh Hodesh groups of various kinds. For further reading, see P. Adelman, Miriam's Well: Rituals for Jewish Women Around the Year (1996); and C. Diamant, Moonbeams: A Hadassah Rosh Hodesh Guide (2000). PAUL STEINBERG

Rossi, Azariah dei (1511–1578). Born in Mantua to an illustrious *Italian Jewish family, Azariah dei Rossi was an innovative Jewish historian and multilingual poet. Learned in Latin, Greek, and Italian, as well as Hebrew, and strongly influenced by Italian humanism, he conducted extensive critical and comparative historical research. In his magnum opus on Jewish history, Me'or Einaim (Light of the Eyes), he cited more than one hundred non-Jewish sources in his discussion of biblical and rabbinic history and literature. Many contemporaneous rabbinic authorities spurned Rossi's revolutionary historiography because of his reliance on non-Jewish historiography to align Jewish chronology and his skepticism toward *aggadic *midrash. However, nineteenth-century *Wissenschaft scholars praised Rossi as "the first true Jewish historian."

Rothschild, Baroness Betty de (1805–1886) grew up in *Frankfurt nurtured by the Orthodox traditions of the *ghetto while simultaneously tutored in the social skills appropriate to a modern European lady. At nineteen, she married her uncle James and moved to his ornate mansion in the heart of Paris where she presided over a salon famous for its opulence; there, financial leaders mingled with imperial ambassadors and leading artists. Betty became an intimate of Queen Marie-Amelie, she introduced Chopin to Paris and became his pupil, and Ingres painted her portrait. She educated her five children for leadership roles in French society and in Jewish *philanthropy. Betty championed vocational and moral education for young women, creating and presiding over the first modern Jewish women's philanthropic society for a half-century. In her will she left instructions for her children to value strong family ties and to remain loyal to their faith. Recent scholarship includes L. S. Schor, The Life and Legacy of Baroness Betty de Rothschild (2006). LAURA S. SCHOR

Rothschild Family. In 1770, Mayer Amschel Rothschild (1744–1812), a twenty-six-year-old coin dealer, recently accorded the title of Court Agent to William, Prince of Hesse-Kassel, married Gudule Schnapper (d. 1849), the seventeen-year-old daughter of a prosperous family. Mayer and his bride both lived in the judengasse, the Jewish *ghetto of *Frankfurt. In partnership with his brother Kalman, Mayer used the dowry brought by Gudule to invest and trade, soon establishing himself as Frankfurt's leading coin and antiques dealer.

During the next twenty-two years, Mayer and Gudule had nineteen children, ten of whom – five girls and five boys – survived to adulthood. Each of the children was put to work in the back room of the family house, which accommodated Mayer's growing business. By the 1790s the focus of the business had changed to *banking, and the Rothschilds had become one of the wealthiest families of the ghetto, conducting business all over *Germany as well as in *Amsterdam, Paris, London, and *Vienna. Clients included wealthy Christian firms as well as Jewish families of means. In the following years, each of the Rothschild children made a suitable marriage, deepening the relationship among the Rothschilds and other wealthy Jewish families in Frankfurt, Hamburg, and London. The daughters were given dowries and each son received a share of the business. James Rothschild (d. 1868), the youngest child, married his niece Betty, the first of many intrafamily weddings.

In 1810, Mayer Rothschild and his sons entered into a business agreement that codified the business philosophy articulated in the company motto: Concordia, Industria, Integritas. Each of his sons would become a partner, but only Mayer was permitted to withdraw capital, hire, and fire, and his sons could not marry without his consent. This agreement was modified in the coming decades, as leadership passed from one generation to the next, but the principles of family solidarity and financial prudence remained unchanged. During the Napoleonic wars, Nathan Rothschild (d. 1836) propelled the family to a new level of financial success by establishing a bank in London and developing ties with the British government. Soon after, James Rothschild started a bank in Paris, establishing ties with successive French governments. Salomon Rothschild (d. 1855) moved to Vienna and worked with the Austrian imperial government. Carl (Kalman) Rothschild (d. 1855) established a bank in Naples, working with Austria and establishing financial ties with the Vatican. The oldest son, Amschel Mayer (d. 1855), remained in Frankfurt. All five brothers were ennobled by Austrian Emperor Francis I (1816 and 1818), receiving the title of Baron; Nathaniel Mayer Rothschild (d. 1915), of the London branch of the family, received the British peerage title of Lord Rothschild in 1885. Four of the brothers had large families. In the next generation there were twelve sons who were educated to take over the growing family empire that now included railroads, mines, vineyards, race horses, and a variety of other investments extending beyond Europe to the Americas and Asia. Lionel Rothschild (d. 1879) of England became the first Jewish member of the House of Parliament, and Alphonse Rothschild (d. 1905) of France became the first Jewish member of the Bank of France.

Rothschild wealth attracted *antisemitic caricature, but the Rothschilds, unlike many of their wealthy co-religionists, resisted the temptation to convert. They used their high profile and connections to government leaders to protect Jews around the world. In the absence of world Jewish organizations, Jewish community leaders in the Muslim world and in *Eastern Europe began to turn to members of the family to solve their problems, both pecuniary and political.

In addition to responding to crises, the Rothschild family helped fellow Jews educate themselves for life in the modernizing world. Following the leadership of Mayer Amschel, who championed the effort to grant the Jews of Frankfurt citizenship rights and who later founded a modern school for poor Jewish children, the Rothschild families in *Britain and *France also established modern schools so that Jewish young people would be able to participate in the changing economies of their cities and towns while maintaining their Jewish identities. When they realized that hospital rooms were adorned with crucifixes and that dying patients were visited by Christian clergy, the Rothschilds began to build Jewish hospitals. Later, seeking to provide cleaner and healthier housing for the urban poor, they added subsidized housing to their roster of philanthropic projects. Rothschild *philanthropy was not limited to support of Jewish interests. Many members of the family developed individual philanthropic interests in the arts, in science and *medicine, and in social services for the chronically ill and for criminals.

Edmond de Rothschild (d. 1934), born a century after Mayer Amschel, turned his philanthropic energy to *Palestine, funding *agricultural settlements and supporting the Modern *Hebrew revival in the hope of creating a place for Jewish regeneration. His son James ("Jimmy"; d. 1957) bequeathed funds for the construction of *Israel's Knesset (parliament) in his memory; his daughter-in-law Dorothy Pinto de Rothschild (d. 1988) funded a new building for Israel's Supreme Court and additions to *Yad Vashem in Israel. For further reading, see N. Ferguson, The World's Banker: The History of the House of Rothschild (1998).

LAURA S. SCHOR

Rubenstein, Richard L. (b. 1924), the author of the provocative After Auschwitz: History, Theology and Contemporary Judaism (1966), was the first theologian (see THEOLOGY) to engage directly the theological challenges and psychological predicaments posed by the *Holocaust (see HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES). Against the grain of classical and modern Jewish *thought, Rubenstein abandoned both the *God of history and Jewish *election. Preoccupied by the failure of theodicy – divine justice – he presented in its stead a type of Jewish paganism centered around a naturalized conception of the Jewish people, ritual practice, and of God, based on the cyclical rhythm of nature. He saw suffering (see EVIL AND SUFFERING) as part of the natural state, not the deserved punishment meted out by a just and loving deity (see COVENANT).

Rubenstein's thought shows a self-conscious shift away from the prophetic theology and ethics avowed by *Buber and *Heschel; rather, he tends toward the more archaic theological and cultural system represented by the priestly religion of *Leviticus. His innovations were bitterly contested when they first appeared. Ironically, however, most Jewish theologians who defended classical Jewish theology against Rubenstein have followed his rejection of theodicy in response to the problem of evil. Jewish feminism has been the only branch of Jewish theology and thought that has caught up with Rubenstein's emphasis on the body and other material constructs (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST).

ZACHARY BRAITERMAN

Russia. At the end of the nineteenth century some five or six million Jews lived in the Russian Empire. Another two million hugged its margins at the eastern edges of *Austria-Hungary and Prussia (see GERMANY); together they constituted two-thirds of the world's Jews. Despite pronounced regional differences, the Jews of Russia shared a reliance on *Yiddish, widespread religious piety, and employment in a narrow cluster of occupations. Russia was the site of the most vigorous religious trends in modern Jewish life (*Hasidism captured the allegiance of probably half of Russia's Jews), and the most influential political ideologies of Jewish modernity (*Zionism and Jewish socialism [see BUND]) were first formulated there.

Jews entered Russia in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries as a byproduct of the partitions of *Poland (1772, 1793, 1795). Previously, the Russian Empire had prohibited Jewish residence because of religious bias. Perhaps as many as one million Jews lived in the region of Poland acquired by Russia through the partitions. Jews were also part of the population of New Russia, the region on the northern littoral of the Black and Azov Seas that was acquired by Russia from the *Ottoman Empire over the course of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. During the nineteenth century Jews holding certain occupations (first merchants, later artisans) and those with higher education were allowed to move to Moscow, *Saint Petersburg, and elsewhere outside the *Pale of Settlement and historic Poland, where the vast majority of Russia's Jews resided. Jews made up some 12% of the population of southwestern Russia and Poland; in many urban areas they were often the majority, especially in northern provinces in *Lithuania and *Belorussia. Despite intermittent efforts to assimilate them, the Russian government believed in the essential separateness of Jewry, and there was little intervention into Jewish life until the reign of Nicholas I (1825–55). Map 11

On the whole, the only state-recognized bodies representing Russian Jewry were the local kahals. These Jewish *communal structures were charged with taxation and other aspects of internal administration; after the conscription reforms instituted under Nicholas I in 1827, they were also responsible for delivering draftees. Kahal electors and officeholders came from the wealthiest sector with a sprinkling of learned Jews. Jewish communal life also included hevras, or associations, the most prestigious of which was the hevra kadisha, the burial association. Eventually, kahals were implicated in the cantonist system, when Jews were forcibly recruited into the army, often at very young ages. This was one of the darkest chapters in Russian Jewish life, and it ended soon after the death of Nicholas I in 1855. Folk-songs, many of them furious and among the most poignant artifacts of their kind produced by Russia's Jews, circulated for decades about the abuses of the rich protecting their own offspring from the draft at the expense of the children of the poor. Although kahals were officially abolished by the Russian government in 1844, they continued to function. Laws were instituted to ensure that rabbis had a command of either Russian or a European language, but were rarely enforced. Under the reign of Alexander II (1855–81) economic, juridical, and educational reforms were instituted that offered the promise that Russia, like other European countries, was moving toward better integrating its Jews.

In southern regions, *Ukraine, and New Russia, Jews were concentrated in commerce, mostly petty trade. In Lithuania and Belorussia, the majority earned their living in small workshops, primarily in clothing, leather, cigarette manufacturing, and the like. Over the course of the nineteenth century, petty merchants were undermined by the decline of fairs and the rise of permanent markets and also by the government's battle with smuggling. The industrialization of Russia in the last quarter of the nineteenth century further weakened the economic standing of artisans, undermined their independence, and tied them to a larger, more complex market that made it harder to earn a profit. The building of railways marginalized some previously crucial commercial and banking centers (Berdichev, for example), but also enabled the rapid growth of southern ports like Odessa, and Kharkov. Jews were central in the commercial life of Odessa and in manufacturing circles in Białystok and Łódź; they had a major impact on the marketing of sugar and a crucial role in the building of railways. A small but highly visible sector of wealthy Jewish merchants emerged, most obviously in Saint Petersburg, but also in Odessa, Warsaw, and other cities. A steady movement from small towns (often called a shtetl, the diminutive for shtot, "city" in Yiddish) to cities began in the middle of the nineteenth century. Increasing impoverishment and overpopulation characterized late-nineteenth-century Russian Jewry, whose population increased eightfold between 1800 and 1900.

Most Jews lived among Poles, Ukrainians, and Lithuanians and had little contact with Russians. Operating from an almost entirely Jewish frame of reference, they saw the regions in which they lived as subdivided along Jewish cultural lines, with variations in religious practice, Yiddish pronunciation, regional customs, legends, and food preferences and specialties. Until the 1860s, even most modernizing Jews did not see acquisition of the Russian language as desirable; those anxious for access to the larger world learned German or sometimes Polish.

Hasidism dominated much of religious Jewish life in the Russian Empire, with the exception of Lithuania. Rabbinic or mitnaggedic Judaism, the religious alternative to Hasidism, concentrated much of its effort on training talented male students in talmudic academies (yeshivot); the most important was in Volozhin, outside of *Vilna. The mitnaggedim sought to consolidate their values through the production of talmudic scholars who would fan out across Eastern Europe and influence the norms of Jews around them. Hasidim established countless separate prayer houses in places small and large where tzaddiks, *rebbe*s with local and sometimes regional stature, exerted influence. By the late nineteenth century, the Musar* movement, established by Israel Salanter (1810–1883), sought to co-opt Hasidism's emphasis on meditation and introspection for rabbinic Judaism while also hoping to win back some youth drawn to modern trends like the Haskalah* (Jewish enlightenment).

The introduction of a spate of government-sponsored Jewish schools in the 1840s and 1850s and the liberalization of government policy under Alexander II (1855–81) excited Jewish hopes for the liberalization of Russia. These trends encouraged larger numbers of Jewish youth to acquire secular educations and bolstered the social and cultural foundations of the Jewish enlightenment movement in Russia. Its first significant intellectual leader was Isaac Baer *Levinsohn whose 1827 Teudah be-Yisrael (Testimony in Israel) set the tone for the Haskalah in Russia with his insistence that occupational, linguistic, and educational reforms among Jews were the trademarks of lasting change.

The Haskalah inspired Hebrew fiction; Abraham Mapu's biblically based novels created shockwaves for many eager, cloistered readers (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH). Beginning in the 1860s, the enlightenment movement reached more readers through Yiddish literature. Mendele Mokher Seforim (Sholem Jacob Abramovich), like so many other Yiddish writers, started in Hebrew and then switched to the more widely known and accessible Jewish vernacular (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO ...).

Jewish institutional life expanded considerably beginning in the 1860s with the publication of newspapers in Russian, Hebrew, and Yiddish (see JOURNALISM: YIDDISH [EASTERN EUROPE]; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION [IN RUSSIAN]) and the creation of the *Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment among the Jews of Russia (OPE), based in Saint Petersburg with branches in Odessa and elsewhere. Those most closely associated with such Haskalah institutions were a cluster of wealthy Jews (most importantly the Günzburgs); professionals trained in Russian universities, typically as lawyers or doctors; a few modernized rabbis; writers; and a good many intellectuals who believed in the prospect for a Europeanized Russia. *Britain and, to a lesser extent, *France provided models of Jewish acculturation, as consolidated under the influence of Moses *Montefiore, whose blend of altruism and moderate piety and whose courageous efforts on behalf of the Russian and *Ottoman Empires and of other Jews left a deep impression.

Religious circles also incorporated modernizing changes: A spate of new yeshivot in Lithuania sought to battle modern trends by attracting the best minds to Torah study instead of the secular educations that were increasingly the destination of many talented Jews beginning in the 1860s and '70s. Slowly religious circles became alert to the need for systematic education for girls as well. Some Jewish women began to appear on the pages of Jewish periodicals; Maria Saker of Odessa, later an important Jewish pedagogue, was probably the first Jewish woman to publish articles in Russian in Jewish newspapers. Girls were exempt from the restrictions imposed on Jewish entry into Russian educational institutions that were imposed in the 1880s, and their numbers in Russian schools continued to rise considerably. Beginning in the late 1860s, young Jewish women and men were found in substantial numbers among Russian radicals. Their presence was made powerfully visible when Alexander II was assassinated in 1881 and it was discovered that one of the plotters, Hesia Helfman, was a Jew (see also SCHENIRER, SARAH, on education for girls).

The sudden and ferocious *pogroms of the 1880s that broke out in the immediate wake of the assassination, together with the widespread belief that they were fomented by government authorities, increased the numbers of Jewish immigrants headed westward. Many headed for Brody on Austria-Hungary's eastern border where they were aided by Jewish philanthropic institutions based in Paris or London. The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) and other groups sought to protect immigrants from exploitation, to facilitate their movement across Europe, preferably to the *United States, or to help those who left Russia precipitously to return.

New political ideologies, most importantly Zionism and Jewish socialism, insisted that the pogroms of Russia were the work of the authorities. Such views, also shared by many western liberals, were bolstered by increasingly murderous waves of attacks against Jews in 1903, and especially 1905–06. The Kishinev pogrom of 1903, in which forty-seven Jews were killed, many were raped, and much property was destroyed, precipitated hundreds of public demonstrations worldwide. It was argued that the Russian government fomented such violence to press Jews to emigrate, or to deflect animosity that might otherwise be directed at it, or to punish Jews for their political radicalism.

Certainly, pogroms reinforced Russian Jewry's mounting sense of insecurity. However, the mass migration of some two million Jews from the empire (one-third of all Russian Jews) was mostly prompted by other reasons. This is clear because the trajectory of internal migration in those years was largely from poorer regions in the northern Pale of Settlement (where there were few pogroms) to the more economically vibrant southern provinces (where nearly all pogroms erupted). Proportionately as many Jews abandoned the economically depressed but mostly pogrom-free *Galicia, which was under Austrian rule and where Jews enjoyed equal civic rights, as left the Russian Empire.

Mass migration was a byproduct of poverty (especially in Lithuania and Belarus), overpopulation, post-1881 restrictions on residence, and also the sense that *antisemitism was gaining the upper hand. Moreover, the image of the United States as a land of opportunity was fanned by publicist literature in Yiddish, cheap steamship tickets, and reports of plentiful employment. The mass migration was mainly from the lower middle class. Most of the poorest Jews stayed behind, as did most of the richest and the most resolutely pious. No doubt, there were good reasons for Jews in Russia to believe that their future would deteriorate: The increase in anti-Jewish rhetoric and violence, the heightened prominence of antisemitism in Russian public life, and eventually the Mendel *Beilis affair of 1911–13 were all widely viewed as evidence of a dark, ever-encircling phenomenon. By the turn of the twentieth century, probably the best known Russian words in the West were tsar, vodka, and pogrom.

Those who sought to stem the migratory tide (and, of course, two-thirds of the Jewish community remained in Russia) fell into different camps. Many religious leaders attempted to dissuade immigration because it was viewed as disruptive and even disastrous to traditional norms. Some Jewish intellectuals continued to insist on the prospect for integration into Russia, although liberalism lost ground as the century waned. After the 1905 revolution, most great hopes for the newly established Russian parliament were disappointed. Among the most powerfully felt political options was Jewish socialism. The Jewish Socialist Labor *Bund, founded in 1897, attracted 33,000 members and was by far Russia's largest Marxist group. With various spurts and theoretical changes, Jewish socialism charted a subtle course between *Marxism and nationalism. It expanded at times of revolutionary turbulence and optimism (in 1905 especially) and contracted at others. Still, the heroism of Jewish revolutionaries, their work in organizing self-defense groups to protect Jews from pogroms, and their participation in philanthropic activities endeared them widely even to Jews without socialist convictions.

Zionism was built on institutional and ideological foundations that dated back to responses by intellectuals and others to the pogroms of 1881–82. Much of the movement's constituency was drawn from Russian Jews, under the leadership of Leon *Pinsker, the author of Autoemancipation (1882). The most influential intellectual figure in the movement, even after the ascendancy of Theodor *Herzl, was the Odessa-based essayist *Aḥad Ha-Am (Asher Ginzberg), editor of the Hebrew journal, Ha-Shiloaḥ. He saw Zionism as the prime mechanism for Jews to absorb western culture without submerging their Jewish identity, and he stressed the cultural benefits of rebuilding Jewish *Palestine. Zionism had about 100,000 devotees, but most of them viewed it in philanthropic rather than avowedly political terms.

The 1905 revolution opened up new possibilities for Jewish public activity and, in turn, closed off others. Jews could now vote for members of the new Russian parliament, or duma, but changes in electoral laws marginalized Jews, liberals, and nearly all but the most conservative. After 1907, political parties like the Bund shrunk in size, but devotees threw much energy into educational and cultural activities, literary and ethnographic projects, and the launching of many hundreds of modernized Jewish schools and lending libraries. Restrictions were lifted on Yiddish publishing, which flourished in these years with dozens of periodicals. Brilliant writers (the most famous being Isaac Leib Peretz and Sholem Aleichem [Shalom Rabinowitz]) vied for recognition in a crowded, vibrant marketplace. To be sure, many felt that the Russian Jewish world around them was in the midst of decay; such themes figured prominently in Russian cultural and artistic life in general, and they are echoed in the ethnographic and belletristic work of Semyon Ansky (Shloyme Zanvl Rappoport), author of the most famous Yiddish play, The Dybbuk (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; THEATER, YIDDISH). Ansky was also responsible for a major ethnographic expedition that toured hundreds of places in the Ukraine between 1912 and 1914 culling the artifacts, songs, and tales of a culture that he believed was on the verge of disappearance.

Late imperial Russia was more and more open to Jews of talent. Jewish-born artists, include El Lissitzky and Marc Chagall, occupied an increasingly visible role in cultural affairs along with newly emerging writers (see ART: EUROPE [TWENTIETH CENTURY]; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS). Arguably, the finest of all Russian poets of the 1920s was Osip Mandelstam, and the best prose writer was Isaac Babel (see LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION [IN RUSSIAN]). In Odessa, despite a vociferously antisemitic municipal government at the end of the nineteenth century, Jews owned two of the city's three dailies; Jewish journalists, including the future Revisionist Zionist leader Vladimir Jabotinsky, wrote for all three of Odessa's liberal newspapers. The Jewish backgrounds of Marxists like Leon *Trotsky did not stand in the way of their political influence. The internationalist arm of Russian Marxism, Menshevism, came to be dominated by ideological leaders of Jewish birth. Young Jews in small towns as well as cities now increasingly favored the Russian language (and to an extent also Polish).

At the same time, antisemitism emerged in the last years of the reign of Nicholas II (1896–1917) as a crucial, ever more prominent bulwark of reactionary ideology. In some circles, including those associated with the Russian-inspired forgery, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, it constituted the centerpiece of a future, post-Romanov Russian identity. The ferocity of anti-Jewish hatred, erupting with such murderous results in the years immediately following the 1917 Russian Revolution, can be traced in some measure to the consolidation of such ideas. *World War I led to the mass evacuation in 1914–15 of hundreds of thousands of Jews, often under profoundly degrading conditions. With the Eastern front situated in Russian Jewry's demographic heartland, charges of Jewish disloyalty were widespread. When tsarism collapsed in February 1917 in the midst of the war, the imperial regime found few defenders. Map 10

For further reading, see I. Levitats, The Jewish Community in Russia, 1772–1844 (1943); M. Stanislawski, Tsar Nicholas I and the Jews (1983); I. Etkes, Israel Salanter and the Mussar Movement (1993); S. J. Zipperstein, The Jews of Odessa: A Cultural History, 1794–1881 (1985); B. Nathans, Beyond the Pale: The Jewish Encounter with Late Imperial Russia (2002); and J. Frankel, Prophecy and Politics: Socialism, Nationalism, and the Jews in Russia, 1862–1917 (1981). STEVEN J. ZIPPERSTEIN

Ruth, Book of, is a novella of four chapters in the *Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible. Although set “in the time of the *Judges” (Ruth 1:1), there is no scholarly consensus on when the book was composed. Some place it shortly after the reign of *David (ca. 900 BCE) because of the prominence given to David's genealogy (4:17–22) at the book's conclusion. Others suggest the book was written during the *Persian period (ca. 500 BCE), in opposition to *Ezra's and *Nehemiah's prohibitions of foreign marriages.

The book tells the story of Naomi, wife of Elimelekh of Bethlehem in *Judah, and her daughter-in-law Ruth, a Moabite; both are widowed in *Moab. While a second widowed daughter-in-law, Orpah, chooses to return to her own family, Ruth expresses loyalty to Naomi and Naomi's people (1:16–17) and returns with her to Bethlehem. There, thanks to Naomi's strategizing and Ruth's courageous assertiveness, Ruth is ultimately redeemed and acquired as a wife by Naomi's kinsman, Boaz (Ruth 3–4). The couple's great-grandson is King *David. The book of Ruth is one of the *Five Scrolls and is read in the synagogue on the festival of *Shavuot. See also MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; REDEMPTION.

KATE FRIEDMAN

S

Saadia Ben Joseph Gaon (882–942) was the outstanding Jewish personality of the geonic period (eighth–eleventh centuries). His intellectual accomplishments cover the entire spectrum of Jewish endeavors: *Bible translation and *Bible commentary, *theology, *thought, liturgy, linguistics, chronology, calendation, *poetry, polemics, and more. Born in Fayyum, *Egypt, Saadia studied in the Land of Israel before moving to *Iraq. Given his foreign origins, Saadia would not have been a natural choice to become *Gaon, the head of the Babylonian talmudical academy of *Sura, but the strength of his personality and his multiple accomplishments could not be ignored. His tenure as the head of the academy was not untroubled, however, and his principled stances and combative personality made for clashes with the communal authorities.

Saadia's early career was marked by polemical defenses of Babylonian rabbinic hegemony in the following areas: (1) the Jewish *calendar (against Ben Meir, the Gaon of the Land of Israel); (2) the divine origin of the Bible (against the heretic Haywayhi of Balkh, usually known in Hebrew as Hivi ha-Balkhi); and (3) the truth of the Oral *Torah versus the *Karaites. It should be noted, however, that the traditional *Rabbanite view of Saadia as the victor over a major Karaite threat overemphasizes the status of Karaism in his day. Saadia's translation of the Bible into *Arabic and his rationalistic commentaries on most of its books set the standard for later Jewish understanding of Scripture. His *prayer book had a major impact on subsequent Jewish liturgy, and his linguistic studies and poetry expanded understanding of the Hebrew language (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD). The form of *Judeo-Arabic that Saadia employed played a major role in the standardization of usage in that language.

Saadia is probably best remembered in the Jewish world for his theological/philosophical book, The Book of Doctrines and Opinions, because that is one of his few Judeo-Arabic compositions to have been translated into Hebrew in the Middle Ages. The structure of this book is similar to that of Islamic theological works known as Kalam: It begins by defending the use of *reason for religious reasons, proceeds to prove the existence of *God by demonstrating that the world was created and thus needs a Creator, continues by discussing the nature of divine unity, and concludes with a defense of divine justice. The book also discusses the reasons for the *commandments, free will, reward and punishment, *resurrection, the *messiah, and the *afterlife. Some of these philosophical ideas are also repeated in Saadia's *Commentary on Sefer Yetzirah, a speculative text of unknown provenance. Although Saadia did not adopt all doctrines of the Kalam, such as the existence of atoms, his work is clearly indebted to the Islamic model, and it represents the integration of the Jewish tradition with the reigning form of rational speculation of his day. Although Jewish philosophers would later abandon Saadia's form of theological philosophy, especially under the decisive influence of *Maimonides'

Aristotelianism, his authoritative work set the pattern for subsequent rational defenses of Jewish tradition (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL).

In the past century, with the discovery of Saadia's original Judeo-Arabic works, many of them in the Cairo *Genizah, the breadth and depth of his intellectual accomplishments have attracted greater interest, and appreciation of his accomplishments has only been heightened.

DANIEL J. LASKER

Sabbateanism (*Ottoman Empire and *Turkey) denotes the *mystical, heterodox Judaism taught by *Shabbatai Zevi (1626–1676) and practiced by his followers (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN). After his forced conversion to *Islam in 1666, Zevi's movement split, and some of its members returned to the Jewish fold. Others followed his lead into a nominal conversion to *Islam, while continuing to observe Zevi's teachings in secret, including a strict endogamy. Although most of this latter group settled in the *Ottoman port city of Salonika, other, smaller groups existed in Edirne and Izmir. Doctrinal and personal disputes over the following decades would eventually lead them to subdivide into (at least) three separate and mutually antagonistic groups, which became known (among other names) as the Yakubi, Kapanji, and Karakash. The subgroups continued to live in close proximity to one another, although with minimal social contact and no intermarriage. Although others, including the authorities, seem to have been aware of their existence, these groups' outward compliance to Islamic practice combined with the Ottomans' traditional religious tolerance ensured that they could continue to live largely unmolested for the next two centuries.

Ultimately, it was the increasing modernization and westernization of the Ottoman Empire in the second half of the nineteenth century that produced the greatest crisis for the group. A "revolt" among Sabbatean youth against their communities' backwardness led to a greater openness toward and participation in the surrounding Ottoman society, including contemporary revolutionary political movements. By virtue of this greater exposure to the West, several members played important roles in the Young Turk Revolution (1908–18). The Greek capture of Salonika (1912), the Great Fire in that city (1917), and the Greco-Turkish Population Exchange (1924) combined to destroy the Sabbateans' communal structure and inner cohesion; their members subsequently dispersed to the western cities of the Turkish Republic and, to a lesser extent, Europe and North America. Although a small remnant of Karakash reportedly continues to practice their religion, the majority of Sabbateans (or Selânikli Dönme) have assimilated into secular Turkish society, where they have excelled in business, politics, academia, and journalism. Despite their material success, they have increasingly become objects of hostility, as both individuals and as a perceived group, from the country's religious and ultra-nationalist right (and, increasingly, the left). Recent scholarship includes M. D. Baer, The Dönme: Jewish Converts, Muslim Revolutionaries, and Secular Turks (2009); and see also ANTINOMIANISM; FRANK, JACOB AND FRANKISM.

PAUL F. BESSEMER

Sabbath (Hebrew, Shabbat) is observed from sunset Friday evening until nightfall on Saturday. The word “Sabbath” is drawn from the Hebrew root sh/v/t, meaning “to cease”; this verb is used to describe God’s rest from creation on the seventh day of the first week (Gen 2:2–3). The ordinance to observe the Sabbath is the fourth of the *Ten Commandments and the only ritual observance that is included. In the version that appears in Exodus 20:8–11, the *Israelites are to “remember” the Sabbath day and “keep it holy” because God has blessed and sanctified this day as a commemoration of divine rest. In the reiteration of the Ten Commandments in Deuteronomy 5:12–15, the Israelites are commanded to “observe” the Sabbath, and the day of rest is connected with the experience of slavery in *Egypt and divine *redemption. At the epiphany at Mount Sinai (Exod 31:13–14), the Sabbath is described as an eternal sign of God’s sanctification of Israel and as a holy day to be observed throughout the generations as a remembrance of creation. Whoever profanes the Sabbath will be put to death (31:14, 15). Sabbath observance applies to all living beings within the Israelite community: men, women, children, servants, and non-Israelite visitors, as well as animals, a reminder of the inclusiveness of creation (Exod 20:10). Sabbath observance took on special resonance during the *Babylonian Exile because it offered a way to maintain Jewish religious distinctiveness in a foreign setting where there was no central shrine.

There are only a few biblical indications as to what was specifically forbidden on the Sabbath. However, rabbinic halakhah* developed an elaborate corpus of rules defining prohibited “work,” based on the thirty-nine activities connected with the construction of the wilderness *Tabernacle (Exod 31). These prohibitions are listed in the *Mishnah in Tractate Shabbat and encompass actions linked to agricultural labor, textile manufacture, preparation of bread, slaughtering, working with leather and parchment, writing, building, transporting an object between private and public spaces, and lighting a fire. Theologians have suggested that one must cease from these and related activities because they all exemplify human efforts to master the world; on the Sabbath, human beings should remember that they were created and should exist in a state of harmony with the rest of the created world.

The Sabbath is in many ways the most holy of days on the Jewish calendar, rivaled only by Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, which is termed “Sabbath of Sabbaths” in Leviticus 23. However, as in any instance where human life is endangered, everything possible must be done to save it, even if doing so requires doing actions that are ordinarily forbidden on the Sabbath. Over time, Jews have found creative solutions to observing the Sabbath without creating impossible burdens. These include the innovation of the eruv, which enables carrying within a circumscribed area; employing a non-Jew to perform tasks forbidden to Jews; keeping the oven and burners at low heat to provide warm meals and hot water; and using technologies such as electronic timers to turn lights on and off. Various denominations of *Judaism differ in their classification of certain Sabbath prohibitions, such as whether the use of electricity and automobiles on Shabbat constitutes lighting a fire.

The Sabbath traditionally includes three festive meals: dinner on Friday evening, lunch on Saturday, and another meal before the conclusion of the Sabbath. The Friday evening meal is preceded by the kindling of Sabbath lights by a woman or women of the household and the recitation of a blessing (a man may also kindle the lights and recite the blessing if no women are present); the recitation of kiddush over a cup of wine, and the blessing of the special Sabbath bread (see hallah). It is the custom to have two loaves of hallah at each Sabbath meal as a reminder of the double portion of manna that God provided during Israel’s wilderness wanderings on the day before the Sabbath (Exod 16:22–30). Many people sing Sabbath songs (zemirot) at meals to enhance the joyousness of the day.

Sabbath *synagogue ritual includes communal worship on Friday evening, Saturday morning, and, in traditional settings, on Saturday afternoon. Friday evening worship begins with the Kabbalat Shabbat service, which originated in the community of mystics in sixteenth-century *Safed. Central to Kabbalat Shabbat is the recitation of the hymn Lekha dodi likrat kallah, penei shabbat nekabbelah (Come, my beloved, to meet the bride, let us receive the presence of the Sabbath), which is attributed to Solomon ha-Levi Alkabetz (ca. 1500–1580). As in this hymn, the Sabbath is often characterized in female terms as a queen or *bride (Genesis Rabbah 11:9). Worship on Sabbath morning includes the reading of the weekly Torah portion (see TORAH READING) and haftarah* portion. During the afternoon service, a section of the following week’s Torah reading is chanted (see WORSHIP). Saturday afternoons are often a time for personal or communal study. The Sabbath concludes with the havdalah* ritual, recited when three stars are visible on Saturday evening, to mark the separation between the holiness of the Sabbath and the ordinary days of the working week. An additional Saturday evening custom, melaveh malkah (accompanying the queen), includes a festive meal to mark the end of the Sabbath and to prolong its joyousness for a few more hours.

Jewish fast days, except *Yom Kippur, are moved forward a day if they fall on the Sabbath; mourning rituals are postponed, and in traditional communities weddings do not take place until after sunset on Saturday. Special Sabbaths precede or coincide with the observance of *Rosh Ha-Shanah, Yom Kippur, *Tu B’Shevat, *Purim, *Passover, *Tisha B’Av, and *Sukkot (see e.g., SHABBAT HA-GADOL).

For further reading, see R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004); E. Ginsburg, The Sabbath in the Classical Kabbalah (1989); and A. J. Heschel, The Sabbath (1951; rep. 2005).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Saboraim are probably the least known link in the chain of rabbinic tradition (see JUDAISM; RABBINIC LITERATURE); they come after the *Amoraim and before the *Geonim (see also STAM, STAMMAIM). The title means approximately “opiners” and seems to imply that the dicta of these Rabbis are to be treated as “opinions,” of lesser status than those of their predecessors, the Amoraim or “sayers.” Our earliest and most important sources with regard to the Saboraim date to the geonic period, but even in geonic sources we find only a few scattered references and obscure remarks. An exception is the Epistle of Sherira *Gaon, written toward the end of this period in 986 CE, which provides the most extensive early discussion of the Saboraim; it is the most reliable source for this period, despite the centuries that elapsed between the last Saboraim and Sherira's time. Among other sources, Sherira had access to contemporary chronological lists, part of which he quoted verbatim. Later writers, including the historian *Abraham ibn Daud and medieval rabbinic authors, give at best derivative accounts of the Saboraim and their works, and their attributions of particular talmudic passages to the Saboraim are often conjectural. According to Sherira, the saboraic period was quite brief and confined to the early decades of the sixth century CE. It was followed by a period during which the major Babylonian academies were unable to function normally because of persecution by the Zoroastrian authorities; when they reopened toward the end of the century, the geonic period had begun.

According to Sherira and the somewhat earlier Seder Tan-naim ve-Amoraim, the Saboraim played a relatively minor role in completing the redaction of the Babylonian *Talmud. The nature of their contribution is described in vague terms, such as "they settled all open questions" or, in contrast, "they innovated nothing." A very small number of specific opinions attributed to named Saboraim are found in the Talmud; in addition, Sherira attributes to them a long anonymous passage at the opening of Tractate Kiddushin "and others as well." This tantalizing remark has provided a springboard for recent generations of academic Talmud scholars, who have attempted to identify or characterize additional saboraic contributions among the anonymous portions of the Babylonian Talmud. Some scholars have gone so far as to attribute all anonymous portions of the Talmud to the Saboraim or have described them as "the designers and the real builders of the Talmud" (see TALMUD, BABYLONIAN). Others have attributed particular types of discussions or remarks to this shadowy group. The question of the saboraic contribution is of crucial importance for any theory of talmudic redaction, but it is unlikely that a consensus can be achieved in view of the dearth of ancient evidence and the problematic nature of some of what does exist. For further reading, see R. Brody, The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture (1998). ROBERT BRODY

Sacrifice: See LEVITICUS; SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP

Sadducees were a group of traditional, elite Jews in the last two centuries of the *Second Temple period. They came from wealthy and priestly classes and, although not large in number, sometimes had a significant influence on political and religious life in the period before 70 CE. Sadducees held prominent positions in the *Temple, with some serving as the High *Priest (Acts 5:17; Jewish Antiquities 20:199; BT Yoma 19b), and they rejected innovations that might weaken this central institution. Their general conservatism is reflected in their opposition to interpretations of the Written *Torah promulgated by the *Pharisees, especially the oral traditions taught by scribes outside the Temple. Politically, they endorsed collaboration with ruling authorities, Jewish and Gentile. A few may have supported the revolt against *Rome in 66 CE, but most opposed it, correctly judging that *apocalyptic fervor and military adventurism threatened not just their positions but also Judean society as a whole.

Reconstruction of their views and history is difficult. No extant text can be attributed to a Sadducean author with certainty, and other sources such as *Josephus, the *New Testament, and *rabbinic literature mention them only occasionally. The origins of the group are murky. Although the name "Sadducees" (Hebrew, zaddukim; Greek, saddoukkaioi) is related to the Hebrew word for "righteous," it may also link them, in tradition if not in fact, with the High Priest Zadok under *David (2 Sam 8:17; 1 Kgs 1:32–39). From Zadok's line emerged priests entrusted with control of Temple ritual (Ezek 44:15). Only later, after the *Hasmonean revolt in the mid-second century BCE, do Sadducees appear as a discrete group. Josephus mentions them incidentally (Jewish Antiquities 13:173) in a section on the early Hasmonean period (160–42 BCE). However, they first appear to have played a role in public affairs under John Hyrcanus (134–104 BCE), who favored them over the *Pharisees after the latter opposed his usurping the position of High Priest (Jewish Antiquities 13:289–97; cf. BT Kiddushin 66a). A rabbinic statement (Avot de Rabbi Nathan* A5/B10) that the Sadducees emerged after a dispute over the *afterlife is too vague to be historically useful.

Sources typically show that the Sadducees engaged in conflicts over biblical interpretation (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY), although they seldom provide social or historical context to the disputes. Scattered throughout *rabbinic literature are disagreements between Sadducees and others (often Pharisees) regarding *purity, the *Sabbath, Temple administration, and criminal law (M. Yadayim 4:6–7; M. Niddah 4:2; M. Makkot 1:6; BT Hagigah 23a). In the *New Testament, Sadducees argue with Jesus and his followers about *resurrection (Mark 12:18; Acts 4:1, 23:6). Josephus presents them as a small, combative group that denies resurrection, rejects the Pharisees' approach to biblical interpretation, and insists that humans have free will (Jewish War 2:164–66; Jewish Antiquities 18:16–17). Although these positions are generally consistent with biblical teachings, no source presents them favorably; in Josephus and rabbinic literature they are contrasted unfavorably with the popular Pharisees. With the Temple's destruction in 70 CE, the Sadducees disappeared from history.

For further reading, see G. Baumbach, "The Sadducees in Josephus," in Josephus, the Bible, and History, ed. L. H. Feldman and G. Hata (1989); and A. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes, and Sadducees in Palestinian Society (2001).

ADAM GREGERMAN

Safed (Tzfat in Hebrew) is a small town in the Upper *Galilee in northern Israel that served as a center for Jewish mystics (see KABBALAH) beginning in the sixteenth century. Many kabbalists among the Jews who were exiled from *Spain in 1492 assembled in this town, which was under *Ottoman rule. They were attracted by the tradition that the tomb of Simon bar Yoḥai, the second-century sage to whom the *Zohar, the main book of the *Kabbalah, is attributed, was located in nearby Miron. Among the important Safed figures of this period were Joseph *Karo, the great halakhist, mystic, and author of the Shulḥan Arukh, the major law code of modern Judaism (see *HALAKHAH); Moses Alsheikh, a great sermonist; and Israel Najara, a significant liturgical poet

(see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]). The Safed kabbalists included Solomon Alkabetz (to whom the hymn Lekha Dodi, welcoming the *Sabbath, is attributed); Moses *Cordovero; and especially Isaac *Luria, who revolutionized the Kabbalah with his disciples, particularly Ḥayyim Vital (see KAB-BALAH, LURIANIC). The community in Safed declined at the end of the 1500s, but was reinvigorated in the eighteenth century when *Hasidic leaders began to arrive. To this day the city remains a center for Ḥasidim and kabbalists; celebrations of the Lag B'Omer festival (see *Omer) in Miron honoring the memory of Simon bar Yoḥai attract hundreds of thousands of Israelis every year. For further reading, see L. Fine, Safed Spirituality (1984). Map 9 JOSEPH DAN

Saint Petersburg (also called Petrograd, 1914–24, and Leningrad, 1924–91) is an important Russian administrative, financial, industrial, scientific, and cultural city and a large Baltic seaport. It was founded in 1703 by Tsar Peter I and served as *Russia's capital until 1918. Individuals of Jewish origin, most of whom had been baptized, lived in Saint Petersburg in the city's early years. However, a Jewish community was not founded until 1802, and it was only in the 1860s that a few thousand Jews settled in the city, as a result of the reforms of Alexander II. A separate Jewish cemetery (Preobrazhensky) was opened in 1874, and the Great Synagogue was dedicated in 1893.

Because of the restrictive legislation on settlement, the pre-revolutionary Jewish community was comparatively better educated, more acquainted with Russian culture, and better off than the Jewish population as a whole. A dynasty of oligarchs, the Baron Günzburgs (Yevzel, Horace, and David), led the community from 1870 until 1910. The communal leaders often represented all of Russian Jewry before the central authorities whenever protection of Jewish interests was needed. In the second half of the nineteenth century, Saint Petersburg became a center of Jewish publishing (mostly in Russian) and of Jewish public, political, and cultural activity. A number of Jewish Russian-language public organizations were founded there, including the *Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment among the Jews of Russia (OPE, 1863); the Society for Crafts and Agricultural Labor among Jews in Russia (ORT, 1880); and the Society for Safeguarding the Health of the Jewish Population (OZE, 1912).

By 1897, the Jewish population had grown to 17,000, and it increased to 50,000 in 1917. As a result of the February 1917 anti-monarchist revolution, Grigory Shreider, a Jew and member of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, was elected mayor of the city. In September 1917, Leon *Trotsky became the chairman of the Petrograd Soviet (Council) of Workers, Soldiers, and Peasants and played a decisive role in the *Bolshevik October Revolution. The 1920s and the beginning of the 1930s saw an influx of Jews to Leningrad from the former *Pale of Settlement; they sought education, employment, and integration into Soviet society. During the interwar period Jews became the largest minority in the city, constituting 201,000, or 6% of the city population in 1939; they were prominent as administrators, physicians, writers and journalists, artists and musicians, lawyers, and university faculty.

During the Stalinist era, individual Jews paid for their advances in Soviet society with the loss of any permitted form of Jewish identity. In Saint Petersburg, all synagogues but one were closed, and *Zionist activity was eradicated. Communal leaders (Lev Gurevich), Jewish scholars (Israel Zinberg), and Hebrew writers (Ḥaim Lensky) were arrested; some were shot and others died in camps. On the eve of *World War II, Leningrad had no Jewish press, schools, clubs, performance groups, or any other Jewish organizations.

Leningrad was not occupied by the *Nazis, but the city was held under siege for almost three years (1941–44); during this time, up to a million people, including thousands of Jews, died from hunger, cold, and shelling. Many were evacuated to the east and returned to their homes after the war.

With the appearance of the post-war state and growing *antisemitism, the number of Jews and their roles in Leningrad life gradually declined. The Jewish population dwindled from 167,000 in 1959, to 108,000 in 1989, and to 36,000 in 2004, because of negative natural growth and subsequent emigrations. Between 1967 and 1989, Leningrad was a major center of the *Soviet Jewish movement for immigration to *Israel. In 1970, a group of Leningrad and Riga "refuseniks" unsuccessfully attempted to hijack a small plane to escape to Sweden and then to Israel. In the 1980s an underground Leningrad Jewish Almanac was published (see SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989).

In the second decade of the twenty-first century, Saint Petersburg has the second largest Jewish community in Russia, numbering approximately 40,000. However, the community has a high median age, extremely low birth rate, and a high percentage of *intermarriages. It has a number of Jewish religious, charitable, and cultural organizations; the Grand Choral Synagogue, dedicated in 1893, was reconstructed and renovated between 2000 and 2005. For further reading, see M. Beizer, The Jews of St. Petersburg: Excursions through a Noble Past (1989). Map 11 MICHAEL BEIZER

Salonika: See BALKANS; GREECE, Map 9

Samael is one of the most common names in *rabbinic literature for an evil power in the divine realms; in the literature of medieval *Kabbalah, Samael is identified with the devil himself. The name, which was probably included in the list of the rebellious archangels in 1 Enoch (see ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; PSEUDEPIGRAPH), is usually explained as "the blind one" (and so it appears in *gnostic literature). It is possible, however, that the name is derived from semol, the Hebrew word for "left," which is often identified with evil and the sinister ("Evil comes from the north" [Jer 1:14]). In talmudic literature, Samael is mentioned as a tempter (e.g., of *Abraham) or as Satan, the "prosecutor" (kategor) in the divine world. His figure appears increasingly in late midrashim of the early medieval period. In hekhalot literature (especially in Hekhalot Rabbati), he is called the Prince of *Rome, who demands the death of ten sages, described in detail in the story of the martyrs (see MARTYRDOM). In all ancient sources, he is described as a servant of God, part of the hierarchy of the divine court. The first *midrashic source to depict him as evil is chapter 13 of Pirkei de-Rabbi Eliezer (seventh to eighth century CE), in which he is the head of a group of rebellious angels and is identified with the snake who tempted *Adam and Eve. This chapter was incorporated into the Bahir, the earliest text of the Kabbalah (late twelfth century).

A different role for Samael is first alluded to in the thirteenth century in Nahmanides' Commentary on the Torah* (at Lev 16), which describes him as the “soul of the sphere of Mars,” the source of bloodshed and evil. Samael has a central role in Isaac ha-Cohen’s “Treatise on the Emanations on the Left” (first half of the thirteenth century), which describes him as the highest emanation of the divine system of evil powers; his counterpart is said to be Lilith*. The concept of the sitra aḥra, “the other (i.e., the left) side,” in the Zohar* is based on this treatise; subsequently Samael became the common reference to the devil in kabbalistic literature and popular literature based on the Kabbalah. Often he is referred to as the samekh-mem, the first two letters of his name, so as not to pronounce the name in full (see J. Dan, Jewish Mysticism [1999], 3: 253–82, 367–414). JOSEPH DAN Samaria (Hebrew, Shomron) is a city located 56 kilometers (35 miles) northwest of Jerusalem*, strategically situated astride important trade routes. According to the Bible, Samaria fell within the tribal territory of Manasseh (Josh 17). In the early ninth century BCE, Omri, king of Israel*, purchased the site and made it his capital (1 Kgs 16:23–24). He and especially his son Ahab* fortified the site and transformed it into a cosmopolitan city that looked to Phoenicia* for its architectural style and decorative elements. Its elegant palace was vilified in the kingdom of Judah* as a “house of ivory” (1 Kgs 22:39; Amos 3:15, 6:4). Excavated plaques of ivory and semi-precious stones attest to royal opulence and eighth-century ostraca (inscribed pot fragments) illuminate Samaria’s economy.

Samaria was conquered, with the rest of the kingdom of Israel, by the Assyrians* in 721 BCE, and its population was deported (2 Kgs 17:1–6). Foreigners were resettled at the site of the destroyed capital (2 Kgs 17:24–33), after which the region fell under successive Babylonian* and Persian* control. Letters from the Jewish community of Elephantine in Egypt* indicate that during the Persian period Samaria still held a place of importance in the Jewish world (cf. Ezra 4:1–3). In the Hellenistic* period, it became a center of pagan culture. Late in the first century BCE, Herod the Great* renovated the city, renaming it Sebaste and building a great Roman temple there. Map 2 BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Samaritans (Hebrew, shomronim; “keepers”) constitute a religious community parallel to but distinct from Judaism*. Attempts to construct a definitive history of the Samaritans suffer from the problematic nature of the available sources, which are often fragmentary, late, and heavily colored by polemic. The Samaritan chronicles trace their origins to the eleventh century BCE, when the priest Eli abandoned Shechem* to establish a new shrine at Shiloh*. For the Samaritans, this schism divided Israel into the true people of God (the Samaritans consider themselves the “keepers” of the law) and deviant Jews. Jewish sources see the matter differently, tracing the history of the Samaritans back to the “Samaritans” (also called “Cutheans”), foreigners whom the Assyrians* resettled in Samaria* after the destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel* (2 Kgs 17:5–6, 24–41). Later Jewish writers cite this biblical story as proof that the Samaritans possessed alien genealogical roots and practiced a syncretistic, and thus inauthentic, form of Judaism*.

After Jewish captives returned from the Babylonian Exile*, they clashed with those who had not experienced deportation. Areas of disagreement included who should have authority in rebuilding the Temple*, intermarriage*, and the reconstruction of Jerusalem’s* walls (Ezra* 4:1–24, 9:1–4; Neh* 13:23–29; 1 Esdras 2:16–30 [see PSEUD-EPIGRAPH]). The leaders of the returning exiles sought to shape their new community by isolating it from the “people of the land.” Yet at this stage their “opponents” were not yet organized into a definable religious sect, despite the later attempts of Josephus* and the Samaritan chronicles to portray these clashes as an instance of Jewish–Samaritan conflict.

It is during the Hellenistic* period that the contours of a distinct Samaritan religious tradition emerge. Their temple at Mount Gerizim, dating to the fourth century BCE, became a symbol for the Samaritan religion and an obvious rival to the Jerusalem Temple*. Later, the Samaritans refused to participate in the Maccabean* revolt, sensing that its religious interests were incompatible with their own. The differences between the groups were also apparent to the Hasmoneans* who captured Shechem, destroyed the Mount Gerizim sanctuary, and established Jewish control of the region of Samaria* during the reign of John Hyrcanus (134–104 BCE). The Samaritans experienced uneven fortunes in subsequent centuries, benefiting from the largesse of Rome* in the first century BCE but experiencing persecutions under Pontius Pilate (r. 26–36), Hadrian (r. 117–138), and the Byzantine Empire*.

The New Testament* and rabbinic* literature display an ambivalent attitude toward the Samaritans. Although Jesus forbids his apostles from missionizing to the Samaritans (Matt 10:5), Luke highlights their superior piety and faith (Luke 10:29–37, 17:11–19) and includes Samaria among the places receptive to apostolic preaching (Acts 1:8, 8:4–25). The Talmud* occasionally offers a positive evaluation of the Samaritans, but more often emphasizes their differences: The Rabbis* refuse to classify Samaritans as Israelites, prohibit marriage with them, and underscore distinctions in worship and ritual cleanliness practices (M. Berakhot 7:1; M. Kiddushin 4:3; M. Nedarim 3:10; M. Niddah 4:1).

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, a small Samaritan community of under a thousand remains in the Middle East; most live in the Israeli town of Holon and in Kiryat Luza on Mount Gerizim, on the West Bank near the city of Nablus. DAVID M. REIS

Samuel, Books of. The three central institutions of ancient Israel – the monarchy (see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP), the priesthood* (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT), and prophecy (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY) – are at issue in the books of Samuel. They are depicted as developing simultaneously as interdependent branches of the state. Although the intrigues associated with the throne occupy the bulk of the narrative, the monarchy alone appears to be an insufficient vehicle of God’s will for Israel. Thus, this account of the rise and fall of Saul* and the rise of David* and his house is not named after either monarch, but rather after the prophet Samuel, anointer of both kings.

Scholars have proposed numerous subdivisions for the book of Samuel beyond its now standard division into two books, 1 and 2 Samuel. The German scholar Leonhard Rost suggested that portions of 2 Samuel 6 through 1 Kings 2 are a cohesive unit, concerned with David’s successor as king.

However, one need not detach these chapters from their context to identify succession as the central theme throughout the books of Samuel. Heredity figures as a problematic basis for succession in each of the three political spheres. The priest Eli who administers the shrine at *Shiloh has unworthy sons – Hophni and Phinehas die ignominious deaths – and therefore passes religious authority to Samuel (1 Sam 2:12–4:22). David later designates the house of Zadok to serve as priests (2 Sam 20:26), yet also attempts to place his own sons in a priestly role (2 Sam 8:18). Samuel positions his sons as his successors, but their corrupt tendencies lead to the people's demand for a king (1 Sam 8:1–5, 12:1–2). Other prophets, such as Nathan (2 Sam 7, 12) and Gad (1 Sam 22:5; 2 Sam 24:11–25), seem to arise spontaneously to both advise and harass the king. The problem of hereditary succession is most pronounced in regard to the throne. Saul, the first king of Israel, watches the kingdom slip and God withdraw from him during his lifetime. His surviving descendants become dependents, who live and die according to David's word. Even King David, to whom God promises "your throne will be established for eternity" (2 Sam 7:16), endures the rebellions of three of his sons before pronouncing *Solomon his successor from his deathbed.

Parallel to the stress that underlies the family structure is the tension between the northern tribes of *Israel and the southern tribe of *Judah that is sometimes concealed and sometimes exacerbated by the monarchy (see TRIBES, TWELVE). Those who initially question the legitimacy of Saul's rule (1 Sam 10:27) seem to be quieted by his military victories (11:12), but a rival state of Judah is established by the covert initiation of David (1 Sam 16:12–13; 2 Sam 2:1–4a). While David moves to centralize the state by establishing *Jerusalem as its capital (2 Sam 7) and by conducting a census (2 Sam 24), the northern tribes side with a pretender on three separate occasions (2 Sam 2:8–11, 15, 20:1–2). Despite the fact that the establishment of the monarchy benefits the kingdom in the international arena, it does not efface regional affiliations (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES).

Although subject to familial schism and tribal strife, the monarchy develops in response to external pressures. It is inaugurated to consolidate the military and stave off the *Philistine advance on Israel (1 Sam 9:16); the residents of particular regions rally behind the king based on his ability to defend them, and the king builds his reputation by expanding his treasury and his country's borders through conquest. In the early part of his career, David is able to finesse his alliances to strengthen his kingdom. However, biblical narrative makes clear that the glory and spoils of war do not belong to humans alone. Saul's downfall is precipitated by his failure to uphold the ban against Amalek and his acquisition of Amalekite property (1 Sam 15:4–35). The battle engineered to do away with *Bathsheba's cuckolded husband constitutes David's worst crime (2 Sam 11:14–12:14).

The political has a distinctly personal edge as intrigues and battles materialize amidst the complexity of human motivation. Scholars attribute 1 and 2 Samuel to the *Deuteronomistic History, a chronicle of early Israel that spans *Joshua to *Kings, yet the characterizations in Samuel display a particular interiority. As Samuel inveighs against the monarchy, we see a man disappointed in his people's lack of religious devotion and his own ability to rouse them. God's abandonment of Saul results in bouts of paranoia and depression that plague him until his final day. When facing the violent lust of her brother Amnon, *Tamar looks squarely at the bleak fate of a violated woman (2 Sam 13). Rizpah, Saul's concubine, illustrates that vengeance settles scores while opening fresh wounds as she watches over the dismembered corpses of her sons and other descendants of Saul until they receive proper burial (2 Sam 21:8–14). David is twice compelled to survive as a fugitive, first when he is pursued during his youth by Saul, a father figure, and later in life when he is threatened by his son Absalom.

RACHEL HAVRELOCK

Samuel ibn Naghrela Ha-Nagid (993–1056) was the chief minister and commanded the armies of the Berber kingdom of Granada (see SPAIN, MUSLIM). An outstanding talmudic scholar, he was also one of the greatest medieval Hebrew poets (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD). As the title nagid* indicates, ibn Naghrela also led Granada's Jewish community. An exemplar of the Jewish courtier class of Muslim Spain, ibn Naghrela's success demonstrates the heights to which a Jew could rise in this milieu. However, his achievements also brought significant hostility from Muslims who did not believe that a dhimmi* should wield so much power. Ten years after Samuel's death, his son, Joseph ha-Nagid, who had succeeded his father as chief minister and whose opulent lifestyle had aroused resentment, was assassinated in a popular uprising. The Jewish quarter of Granada was destroyed, and its inhabitants were killed by an angry mob.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

San Francisco was founded during the tumultuous years of the California Gold Rush, and its Jewish community grew quickly. By 1851, American-born Jews, including *Sephardim, as well as immigrants from *Britain, *Poland, parts of *Germany, and *France, had created benevolent societies and congregations. In the 1870s the Jewish population of San Francisco reached 16,000, second only to *New York City. The thriving community established *synagogues, associations, schools, an orphan asylum, and several newspapers. Twentieth-century immigrants contributed to the growth of community organizations, settlement houses, and a Jewish hospital. After World War II, Jews created new institutions including day and high schools, museums, and a renowned film festival. Between 1986 and 2004 the Jewish population, including surrounding communities, doubled to 228,000. With little *antisemitism, many Jews achieved success in commerce and elected office. These include Adolph Sutro as mayor (1894–96), Julius Kahn (1899–1903, 1905–24) and Florence Prag Kahn (1925–37) in the U.S. House of Representatives, and Barbara Boxer and former mayor Diane Feinstein, both currently in the U.S. Senate. For further reading, see A. F. Kahn, Jewish Voices of the California Gold Rush (2002); F. Rosenbaum, Cosmopolitans: A Social & Cultural History of the Jews of the San Francisco Bay Area (2009); and E. Eisenberg, A. F. Kahn, and W. Toll, Jews of the Pacific Coast: Reinventing Community on America's Edge (2010); see also UNITED STATES, WESTERN.

AVA FRAN KAHN

Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin developed in the *Second Temple period as a judicial and legislative body for the Jewish population in *Jerusalem; its name derives from the Greek designation (synhedrion) for advisory councils to *Hellenistic rulers. Historical sources give conflicting views of the Sanhedrin and its functions, perhaps because the Sanhedrin took on a different character when it came under rabbinic leadership after the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE. Before that time, the Sanhedrin represented more than one point of view. The two major parties were the *Pharisees and *Sadducees; according to *Josephus each party had periods of ascendancy and decline, at least in *Hasmonean times. The Sanhedrin is said to have had seventy-one members. The presiding officer was initially the high priest; in the second century BCE, power was transferred to a new hereditary office, the Nasi (or *Patriarch). The *Av Beit Din (Head of the Court) presided over the Sanhedrin when it heard criminal cases. While the Temple stood, the Sanhedrin was said to have met daily (except on the *Sabbath and *festivals) in a special chamber, the “hall of hewn stones” (lishkat ha-gazit; Sifra, Vayikra 19a; BT Sanhedrin 88b).

Some scholars believe that, after the Temple’s destruction, the Sanhedrin was reestablished as a center of rabbinic jurisprudence in Yavneh and later in other locations. Its final location was said to have been in Tiberias in the *Galilee (BT Rosh Ha-Shanah 31a, b).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Sanhedrin, France: See FRANCE: CONSISTORIES, 1806–1939

Sarah, ancestral mother of the Jewish people, is the wife of *Abraham and the mother of *Isaac. Originally Sarai, her name is changed as part of God’s *covenant with Abraham in *Genesis 17:15. Living in a society where a woman fulfilled her duty to her husband’s household through child bearing, Sarah’s *infertility (11:30) threatens her status as Abraham’s primary wife. To alleviate this threat, Sarah tells Abraham to father a child through a surrogate, her Egyptian slave (often translated as maid or handmaid) *Hagar: “Consort with my maid; perhaps I shall have a son through her” (Gen 16:2). The child of Abraham and Hagar is *Ishmael, a name selected by God. However, when Sarah is ninety years old, she becomes pregnant through God’s intervention and gives birth to Isaac. To protect her interests and those of her son, Sarah persuades Abraham to expel Hagar and Ishmael. This was possible because Sarah’s interests, as Abraham’s primary wife, took precedence over those of Hagar. Moreover, the marriage between Abraham and Sarah was based on patrilineal endogamy (i.e., both partners to the marriage were descended from the patrilineage of Terah, Abraham’s father [Gen 20:12]), whereas the Egyptian Hagar had no genealogical ties to either Terah or Abraham. See also BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES.

NAOMI STEINBERG

Saul was the first king of the *United Monarchy of all the *Israelite *tribes. He reigned from about 1020–1000 BCE. His story begins in 1 *Samuel 9 where he is described as the son of Kish, a Benjaminite and “a man of substance.” He is “an excellent young man; no one among the Israelites was handsomer than he; he was a head taller than any of the people” (9:1–2). According to 1 Samuel 10, Saul is chosen by God as king, anointed by Samuel, and supported by the people. Saul organizes an army and leads battle on behalf of all Israel against its regional enemies; of these the *Philistines are the most threatening.

Saul’s fall from divine favor and his loss of Samuel’s support are explained as a result of his impatience in making a burnt offering before a battle in Gilgal (13:8–14) prior to Samuel’s promised arrival. In his victory over Amalek, Saul increases God’s anger when he does not obey Samuel’s divine directive to annihilate all living creatures connected with the defeated nation. At this point, Samuel tells him that, because Saul has rejected God’s command, “the Lord has rejected you as king over Israel” (15:26).

The rest of Saul’s story details his descent into madness and his increasing envy of *David. In his final battle against the Philistines at Mount Gilboa, the defeated Saul loses all of his men, including his three sons Abinadab, Jonathan, and Malchi-shua; he commits suicide by falling on his sword rather than face the ignominy of falling into enemy hands (1 Sam 31:3). David’s poetic elegy over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 2) laments, “How the mighty have fallen,” and recalls Saul who clothed the daughters of Israel “in crimson and finery.”

KATE FRIEDMAN

Schechter, Solomon (1847–1915), the important Anglo-American scholar and religious leader, was born in Foçsani, *Romania, and died in *New York City. Reared in a *Hasidic family, Schechter received a traditional Jewish education in Romania and *Poland. He studied in *Vienna and *Berlin at modern institutions that advocated the scientific study of Judaism (see WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS) and at the University of Berlin. Beginning in 1890 he taught rabbinics at Cambridge University in *Britain, before becoming president, in 1902, of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS) in New York City, which he led until his death.

Schechter’s foremost scholarly success was his retrieval of more than 100,000 documents from the Cairo *Genizah, an achievement that revolutionized the study of rabbinic and medieval Jewish life. His greatest fame came as a public intellectual and institutional leader. Schechter reached a popular readership through his English-language essays on the literary, historical, and theological traditions of the Jewish people, published in three volumes as Studies in Judaism (1896, 1908, 1924); his theological writings were collected in Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909).

Schechter endeavored to make JTS the North American center for academic Judaic scholarship and believed that its achievements would raise the general level of American Jewish culture. Under his leadership, “Schechter’s Seminary” and Conservative Judaism (see JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE) were positioned as the vital center of American Jewish life, against Reform, which he criticized for its assimilationism, and Orthodoxy, which he deemed too rigid and backward to cope with modernity (see JUDAISM entries). At JTS, Schechter legitimized the modern rabbi and scholar as a public figure as well as a religious leader.

Schechter never fit easily into any modern form of Judaism or Jewish ideology; rather than serving as a partisan for any one position, he was interested in the spectrum of Jewish expression from *Hasidism to *Haskalah. Schechter studied Judaism critically while simultaneously defending it against forces he deemed to be its foes. Thus, he embraced Judaism as a faith, with a history and tradition, but also argued that it grew organically, housed inside of a living people. Schechter used the term “Catholic Israel” to express his vision of a Judaism that would receive and re-create a living Jewish tradition, linking Jews together in time and space, as a people and as *covenantal partners with *God. He supported *Zionism, convinced that the creation of a physical and spiritual center for world Jewry would unify Jewish life and counter assimilation and *antisemitism. DAVID STARR

Schenirer, Sarah (1883–1935) was the founder of the Beit Yaakov (Bais Yaakov) school network. A native of Kraków, Schenirer was educated in Polish schools, becoming a seamstress at fourteen to help support her family. Schenirer's vision of education for religious women found broad support from many Orthodox leaders in post-World War I *Central and Eastern Europe who had come to believe that traditions against educating girls should be disregarded, given the rapidly changing social conditions and widespread assimilation. The Agudat Yisrael movement provided the Beit Yaakov network with financial assistance, logistical guidance, and a literary forum, the Yiddish-language Beys-Yankev Zhurnal. Schenirer's dedication was supplemented by the organizational professionalism of Dr. Leo Deutschlander and the female teachers he recruited from Germany who taught summer training courses and, later on, at the central teachers' seminary in Kraków that Schenirer founded. There were 227 Beit Yaakov schools in Poland by 1935, with more than 27,000 pupils. Schools were also established in *Austria, *Czechoslovakia, *Romania, *Lithuania, *Palestine, and the *United States. For further reading, see G. Bacon, "Schenirer, Sarah," Encyclopedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (2006).

Schindler, Oskar (1908–1974), a Czech rescuer of Jews during the *Holocaust, was made famous by Steven Spielberg's 1993 film, Schindler's List, based on the book by Thomas Keneally. In the late 1930s Schindler worked as a spy for Abwehr, the Germany military's counterintelligence branch, and was arrested and imprisoned in Czechoslovakia in 1938 for his activities; he was released following the Munich Agreement. Schindler arrived in Kraków, *Poland, in the fall of 1939 with the goal of making as much money as he could. He took over a Jewish-owned pots and pans factory, Emalia, which had gone bankrupt before the war broke out. He inherited the factory's Jewish managerial team and relied heavily on them to run the factory. The genius behind Emalia's operations was an Orthodox Jew, Abraham Bankier. It was Bankier who suggested that Schindler consider using Jewish workers as an inexpensive source of labor, knowing that work meant life for Jews in Nazi-occupied Poland. Over time, Schindler gained such a good reputation as a benevolent factory owner that he was invited to meet secretly in Budapest in late 1943 with representatives of *Palestine's Jewish Agency. They convinced him to act as a conduit for Jewish funds smuggled into Poland to help Jews in various forced labor and concentration camps (see HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS).

Schindler also built a sub-camp at Emalia for his Jewish workers. In July 1944, when Schindler was ordered to close his sub-camp and send his Jewish workers to Płaszów, he decided to open a new factory in Brännlitz (Brnenec) in what is now the Czech Republic, which would employ a thousand Jewish workers. He invested a significant amount of time and resources to obtain the necessary SS and military permissions to open his new factory in Brännlitz. Although he had little to do with making up the semi-mythical "Schindler's list," he did everything possible to ensure the transfer of 1,000 Jewish workers from Kraków to his new factory. From October 1944 to May 1945, Schindler spent most of the wealth that he had made in Kraków to save the lives of 1,098 Jews. He and his wife Emilie are recognized at Yad Vashem in Israel as Righteous among the Nations for their efforts to save Jews.

For further reading, see D. M. Crowe, Oskar Schindler: The Untold Account of His Life, Wartime Activities, and the True Story behind the List (2004); and M. Pemper, The Road to Rescue: The Untold Story of Schindler's List (2008); see also HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS. DAVID M. CROWE

Schneerson, Menachem Mendel (1902–1994), the seventh rebbe of the Lubavitcher *Hasidim (see HABAD), was born in Nikolayev, *Ukraine. His mother, *Rebbetzin Chana Schneerson, hailed from an elite rabbinic family; his father, Rabbi Levi Yitzchak Schneerson, was a gifted scholar. In 1929, Schneerson married Chaya Mushka Schneersohn, a distant cousin, in *Warsaw. Chaya Mushka was a daughter of Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, then the Lubavitcher Rebbe. Rabbi Menachem Mendel studied mathematics and science at the University of *Berlin and the Sorbonne in Paris. In 1941, he and his wife moved to *New York City; they had no children.

Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak died in 1950, and Rabbi Menachem Mendel became Rebbe the next year. He led Lubavitch for forty-four years, helping a small movement that was nearly destroyed during the *Holocaust burgeon into a worldwide community that has influenced Jews far beyond Hasidic and even *Orthodox circles (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX). During the final years of Schneerson's life, a large percentage of his followers became convinced that he was the *messiah: They assumed he was immortal and would usher the world into a glorious messianic age. When he passed away, deep-seated political strife emerged around this issue, because many believe the messiah must come from the ranks of the living. Some Lubavitchers are convinced that Schneerson will not be the messiah, some are unsure, and a fair number believe strongly that he will indeed usher in the messianic age. This controversy and the lack of an obvious heir have meant that there is no universally recognized Lubavitch leader in the first decades of the twenty-first century.

Schneerson's true legacy lies in the extraordinary growth that Lubavitch enjoyed during his leadership. This expansion, which owes much to Schneerson's emphasis on outreach to Jews beyond the Lubavitch community, seems likely to continue. Lubavitch scholar Simon Jacobson estimates that Lubavitch has more than 200,000 followers around the world. Other scholars weigh in with lower estimates, but Schneerson clearly revolutionized Lubavitch in size, scope, and passion. STEPHANIE WELLEN LEVINE

Scholem, Gershom Gerhard (1897–1982) was the founder of the scholarly study of Jewish *mysticism (see also KABBALAH), a towering figure in twentieth-century *Jewish studies, and a highly influential Jewish thinker. Born to an assimilated Jewish family in *Berlin, Scholem became committed to *Zionism as a young man; he associated with Martin *Buber and began to study Hebrew and *Talmud. His close friendship with Walter *Benjamin lasted until Benjamin's death in 1940 (G. Scholem, Walter Benjamin: The Story of a Friendship [1982]). Scholem decided to write his doctoral thesis on the Bahir*, which he identified as the earliest work of the Kabbalah. His first book was a translation of this work into German with a commentary (Leipzig [1923]).

Scholem immigrated to Jerusalem* in 1923 and worked in the Jewish National Library that had been established at that time; he wrote the library's index for Judaica, which is still in use (G. Scholem, From Berlin to Jerusalem: Memories of My Youth [1980]). In 1925 he delivered one of the opening lectures of the Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem. The next year, together with the Institute of Chemistry (opening lecture given by Albert Einstein*), it became the core of the just founded Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Scholem taught scores of students about Jewish mysticism throughout his career at Hebrew University. He also participated in a small circle of Jerusalem intellectuals known as Berit Shalom (Pact of Peace), which was dedicated to fostering peaceful relations between Jews and Arabs. He assembled an exhaustive library on Kabbalah, which is now housed in a special reading room at the National and University Library in Jerusalem (The Library of Gershom Scholem on Jewish Mysticism, ed. J. Dan and E. Liebes, 2 vols. [1999]).

Scholem's best known work, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1941, 1946; 2nd ed., 1954), was the first historical survey of Jewish mysticism. In 1957 he published (in Hebrew) his history of the messianic movement headed by Shabbatai Zevi*, which was translated into many languages. Other important books include Jewish Gnosticism, Merkavah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition (1960). His articles for the Encyclopedia Judaica, including a comprehensive article on the Kabbalah, appeared in book form as Kabbalah (1974). Scholem served as the president of the Israeli Academy of Arts and Sciences between 1968 and 1974. After his death, several volumes of his diaries and correspondence were published, including A. D. Skinner, ed., A Life in Letters, 1914–1982 (2002); and idem, Lamentations of Youth: The Diaries of Gershom Scholem, 1913–1919 (2008).

On Scholem's heritage, see J. Dan, Gershom Scholem and the Mystical Dimension in Jewish History (1987); idem, Jewish Mysticism, vol. 4 (1999); and P. Schaefer and J. Dan, eds., Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism: Fifty Years After (1993).

JOSEPH DAN

Science and Mathematics: Middle Ages and Early Modern Period. According to an ancient myth, retold in differing versions by medieval Jews, Muslims, and Christians, science originated in ancient Israel, was mastered by Solomon* (who wrote hundreds of lost books on the sciences), and was stolen by or passed on to the other nations. Judah Halevi's* formulation asserted, "In truth, the roots and principles of all the sciences were transferred from us to the Chaldeans first, and then to the Persians and Medians, and then to the Greeks, and then the Romans" (Kuzari II, 66). This popular myth (cf. also Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed* I, 71) reflected Jewish pride, but it also legitimized scientific study by Jews. Despite the conviction that all truth could be found in the Torah and in the face of rabbinic prohibitions against the study of Greek wisdom (e.g., BT Sotah 49b, Bava Kamma 82b; cf. Menahot 99b), learned medieval Jews, many of them leading rabbis, talmudists, and biblical commentators, studied the sciences. Some sought knowledge for its own sake; for others scientific study was a religious duty connected with the desire to know and draw near to God* (e.g., Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, Laws of Repentance X, 6). Some Jews used science to defend Judaism from subversive claims stemming from faulty or pseudo-science. *Hasdai Crescas wrote his pioneering critique of Aristotelian natural science as part of his efforts to strengthen Jewish commitment after forced conversions and massacres took place in Christian Spain* in 1391. Troubled by the dependence of Maimonides and his followers on "the words of the Greek [Aristotle]," which had weakened Jewish faith, Crescas sought to make known the "fallaciousness of his proofs and the fraudulence of his arguments" (Crescas, Light of the Lord, intro.)

Jewish scientists, like their Muslim predecessors, devoted effort to enumerating the sciences. Their listings indicate the range of scientific inquiry. Most followed the Aristotelian division of science into theoretical and practical, with logic being considered an instrument for scientific inquiry, but not a science. Theoretical science was divided into mathematics, natural science, and divine science and practical science was divided into ethics*, economics or governance of the household, and politics.

Mathematics (discussed later) was usually divided into the quadrivium of arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music. Sometimes, following Alfarabi, optics, mechanics, and engineering were included as well. The division of natural science generally followed Aristotle's books: The Physics, On the Heavens, On Generation and Corruption, Meteorology, On Animals, On the Soul, Parva naturalia, the pseudo-Aristotelian On Plants, and occasionally the pseudo-Aristotelian On Minerals. Some enumerations also added medicine*, as well as astrology*, alchemy, and other occult sciences. Jewish scientists who adhered to the Aristotelian tradition emphasized the importance of the orderly study of the sciences before approaching metaphysical questions. Maimonides cautioned the student for whom he wrote the Guide to study the sciences systematically, so that the "truth should be established in your mind according to the proper methods and that certainty should not come to you by accident" (Guide, epistle dedicatory [Pines trans., p. 4]). The first Hebrew translation of a work of Aristotelian science, Meteorology (translated by Samuel ibn Tibbon in 1210; ed. R. Fontaine [1995]), insists that students of natural science begin with the Physics, Aristotle's book on the principles of nature, and then proceed to On the Heavens and On Generation and Corruption, before turning to the various subjects of Meteorology.

Medieval Jewish science arose at the same time as medieval Islamic science; both were a direct result of the translation movements from Greek and Syriac into Arabic from the mid-eighth to the end of the tenth century. Except for certain very influential early Hebrew texts, such as Sefer Yetzirah* and Mishnat ha-Middot, whose dating cannot be determined with certainty, Jewish and Muslim scientists relied on Arabic translations of the major works of Greek science and mathematics and the growing contributions of Arabic scholars in these fields. One of the first accounts of the beginnings of medieval Jewish science was provided in 1068 by the Islamic historian and scientist Sâ'id al-Andalusî in his Book of the Categories of Nations. Al-Andalusî lists Jewish scientists, physicians, and astrologers, from the East and the West, with special attention to contemporaries in al-Andalus (Spain*), noting their fields and their accomplishments. In fact, with a few major exceptions, such as the leading eighth-century astrologer, Mâshâ'allâh, Jewish scientists writing in Arabic made few contributions (see ASTROLOGY).

The first versatile and prolific Jewish scientists were two twelfth-century Spanish thinkers, *Abraham bar Ḥiyya (ca. 1065–1140) and Abraham *ibn Ezra (ca. 1089–1167); both wrote in Hebrew. Bar Ḥiyya wrote on mathematics, geometry, astronomy, astrology, and philosophy. He compiled the first Hebrew encyclopedia of science, The Foundations of Intelligence and the Tower of Belief; among other topics, it contains sections on logic, the quadrivium and optics, the natural sciences, and divine science. Ibn Ezra, best known for his *biblical commentaries, wrote about thirty scientific treatises, most of which treat astronomy and astrology. S. Sela has shown that, although ibn Ezra's scientific writings are for the most part reference works and textbooks for laymen, based on his Arabic sources, he does not hesitate to explicate his sources and criticize them sharply. Both bar Ḥiyya and ibn Ezra were pioneers in the development of a scientific Hebrew terminology.

Maimonides, who was learned and well read in all the sciences, wrote a bit on mathematics and astronomy and a great deal on *medicine; he rooted his theology in twenty-five premises he claimed were demonstrated by Aristotle in his books on natural science (Guide II, introduction). Although Maimonides declared that he did not intend to break new ground in science in his Guide (II, 2, preface), he may have influenced the course of Hebrew science with his recommendation in a letter to Samuel ibn Tibbon, the translator into Hebrew of the Guide, that the "books of Aristotle are the roots and principles of all the compositions on the sciences, but they cannot be understood without the commentaries on them by Alexander of Aphrodisias, Themistius, and Averroes." Perhaps this is why few works of Aristotle were translated from Arabic into Hebrew, but virtually all the commentaries on Aristotle's writings by Averroes were. Through these commentaries, Jews learned and mastered Aristotelian natural science in Hebrew. These translations were part of an impressive translation movement that in the century and one-half after Maimonides' death made available to Hebrew readers works on logic, natural science, and divine science, as well as more than fifty works of Greek and Arabic mathematics and astronomy and nearly one hundred medical and pharmacological writings (far more if one counts Latin-to-Hebrew translations).

Hebrew encyclopedias of science were another valuable source for scientific instruction, particularly in the thirteenth century. Some, such as Judah ben Solomon ha-Kohen's Midrash ha-Ḥokhmah (The Exposition of Wisdom), ranged over the various subjects of logic, geometry, astronomy and astrology, natural science, and divine science; others, like Shem-Tov Falaquera's De'ot ha-Filosofim (The Opinions of the Philosophers), went into greater depth, but limited the subject matter to natural and divine science. The many translations of Averroes' commentaries on natural science also gave rise to a tradition of supercommentaries on these texts, the most famous and significant of which were by *Gersonides (1288–1344). Gersonides carefully explicated Averroes, but did not hesitate to criticize him and Aristotle when he disagreed with their science; he also put forward novel interpretations of his own. Thus, his study of Aristotle's analysis of motion in the Physics resulted in an original non-Aristotelian understanding of the concept of force and of the relation among force, resistance, and motion (R. Glasner, in Studies in the History and Philosophy of Science, 28 [1997]). Glasner has also shown how Gersonides dealt with one of the central problems of medieval science: the basic incompatibility between Ptolemaic astronomy, with its system of epicycles, and Aristotelian physics. Gersonides, like Averroes, rejected epicycles, but went on to propose his own planetary models, while modifying and adapting Aristotelian physics to fit his theories.

Hasdai *Crescas is another creative and influential figure in the history of science; his knowledge of Aristotelian science was based primarily on the Hebrew translations of Averroes. As part of his revolutionary critique of Aristotelian science, Crescas argued for the actual existence of the void and the infinite, in opposition to the Aristotelian science of his day, and he put forward bold new theories of space and time. Some have contended that, with the exception of Gersonides and Crescas, Jews writing in Hebrew contributed little originality to medieval scientific inquiry. However, recent studies have countered this generalization. For example, the medieval Jewish students and commentators on Averroes were not passive readers of the texts nor did they accept blindly the principles and claims of Aristotelian natural science. Their desire to understand and explicate inevitably gave rise to critique and innovation. The modern emphasis on creativity, however, can be misleading. What must be noted is that the hundreds of Hebrew translations, both from Arabic and from Latin, made it possible for Jews to master the sciences of their day and, in some instances, to contribute to the progress of science.

Jewish interest in science continued throughout the medieval period and was spurred on by the Italian Renaissance. In the early seventeenth century, Jews were at the center of scientific discovery. For example, David Gans worked in Tycho Brahe's observatory near *Prague and discussed scientific questions with Tycho and Johannes Kepler. The young Joseph Solomon Delmedigo was a student assisting Galileo in Padua. It has generally been thought that after Delmedigo there was little Jewish interest in science until the beginning of the eighteenth century, but recent scholarship has shown that this view is not quite accurate. Yet even those who point to "widespread interest in scientific endeavor" during this period admit that "only a handful of Jews contributed substantially to science, and even these were primarily active in the field of medicine" (D. B. Ruderman, Jewish Thought and Scientific Discovery in Early Modern Europe [1995], 12).

MATHEMATICS: In addition to early undated Hebrew mathematical compositions and the twelfth-century mathematical works of bar Ḥiyya and ibn Ezra, the Arabic-to-Hebrew translation movement of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries made available an impressive list of Greek and Arabic works of the quadrivium. Among the Greek mathematicians translated into Hebrew were Archimedes, Autolycus, Euclid, Eutocius, Geminus, Menelaus, Nicomachus, Ptolemy, and Theodosius. Moreover, Arab mathematicians commented on the Arabic versions of many of these works, explicated them, and wrote their own independent treatises. Among the Arab mathematicians translated into Hebrew were Averroes, al-Bitrûjî, al-Farghânî, al-Hassâr, al-Khwârizmî, ibn Aflah, ibn al-Bannâ, ibn al-Muthannâ, Thabit ibn Qurra, and Zarqâllu. Through these translations medieval Jews could learn subjects such as arithmetic, geometry, algebra, optics, spherics, and astronomy. These translations gave rise to commentaries and independent treatises in Hebrew. The authors of these Hebrew works for the most part did not seek to advance mathematics, but rather to understand and explain it. One major exception is Gersonides, who made original contributions in the fields of mathematics and astronomy; he even invented observational instruments such as the Jacob Staff, for observing the distance between two stars, among other uses. Jews studied the mathematical sciences as part of the orderly curriculum of science referred to earlier. In particular, it was a prerequisite for the study of astronomy. There were also religious reasons for studying mathematics. For one, it was important for resolving *calendric matters, such as determining the time of the new moon (see ROSH ḤODESH) and of the *festivals. Bar Ḥiyya and ibn Ezra each wrote books entitled Sefer ha-'Ibbur (The Book of Intercalation).

For further reading, see S. Sela, Abraham Ibn Ezra and the Rise of Medieval Hebrew Science (2003); S. Harvey, The Medieval Hebrew Encyclopedias of Science and Philosophy (2000); W. Z. Harvey, Physics and Metaphysics in Ḥasdai Crescas (1998); and T. Lévy, "The Establishment of the Mathematical Bookshelf of the Medieval Hebrew Scholar: Translations and Translations," Science in Context, 10 (1997): 431–51.

STEVEN HARVEY

Second Temple Period is the era extending from the rebuilding of the *Jerusalem Temple in 515 BCE by exiles who had returned from *Babylon to the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE during the First *Jewish War against *Rome. See APOCRYPHA; ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HELLENISM; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD and related entries.

Secularism in the contemporary Jewish world is committed to the historical and cultural survival of Jews as an ethnic group, separate from the religious beliefs and practices of *Judaism. From a "secular" stance, particular distinctions among religious beliefs, practices, or feelings are irrelevant. The ideology of modern secularism calls for a life without recourse to scriptural authority, ecclesial property, or divine purpose.

Some have suggested that the first "secular Jew" was Benedict (Baruch) *Spinoza. In fact, the economic and social forces that have led to transformations of religious distinctions within Judaism have manifold causes. By the end of the eighteenth century, Jews like Berr Isaac Berr (writing in 1791) would voluntarily "divest" themselves from their "corporation in civil and political matters," unless otherwise commanded by "spiritual laws," in exchange for legal emancipation. Similarly, the writer and poet Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) maintained that "the baptismal font is the ticket of admission to European culture." Many Haskalah writers placed value in "the torah of man" before the "Torah of God," in the words of N. H. Wessely (1782). The Scientific Study of Judaism (Wissenschaft des Judentums*, established 1819) provided scholarly documentation of the diversity and ongoing change that have always characterized Jewish life. As a result, some urged a separation of the private realm of Jewish identity from the public realm of participation in the broader society; as Judah Leib Gordon's 1862 verse put it, "Be a man in the streets and a Jew at home." Others, like S. Tchernichowsky (1899), condemned exilic piety; he invoked "the God of gods, who took Canaan by storm/ Before they bound him in phylacteries." Before their destruction, *Central and *Eastern European Jewry had developed a range of Jewish secularisms in urban centers such as *Vienna, *Prague, Odessa (see RUSSIA), and *Warsaw that included political identities such as the *Bund and various approaches to *Zionism; Modernist endeavors in Yiddish and Hebrew *literature and *poetry (as well as literature in other languages); and the development of Yiddish and Hebrew *theater, *film, and *popular music. The degree of secularism among Middle Eastern Jewry varied geographically; by the mid-twentieth century, Jews in *Iran and *Iraq were overwhelmingly secular, but this was not the case in *Kurdistan and *Yemen.

Secular ideologies, which were generally held by the founders of the State of *Israel, pervade contemporary Israeli society in both extreme expressions ("the negation of *Diaspora") and moderate forms (hiloni, secularist). Modes of religious observance in Israel compromise in a range of ways with this pervasive secularism. Haredi or Ultra-Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX) make only minimal compromises; for example, in regard to serving or not in the military (see JUDAISM, ISRAELI FORMS OF), whereas other groups show more flexibility.

It could be argued that all forms of North American Judaism are more or less secularized in their various accommodations to the modern secular world. Moreover, a majority of North American Jews maintain a secular ethnic identity without religious affiliation or significant religious practice. For further reading, see T. Deutscher, ed., The Non-Jewish Jew and Other Essays (1968); and M. Fox, "Judaism, Secularism, and Textual Interpretation," in idem, ed., Modern Jewish Ethics (1975).

GREGORY KAPLAN

Sefer Yetzirah (The Book of Creation), the most influential work to emerge from ancient speculations concerning creation, became one of the main sources of Hebrew *mystical terminology and imagery for many centuries. It was probably written (anonymously) in the third or fourth century, although the book itself does not contain any clear indication by which it can be dated. Various scholars have suggested dates of composition ranging from the first century CE, before the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE, to the ninth century, just before the book's tenth-century commentaries were written. Many external influences have been suggested, including Neoplatonic, Neopythagorean, Zoroastrian, and Hindu, but no distinct parallels have yet been identified. The impact of Sefer Yetzirah was felt mainly from the tenth century and later, when it was adopted as a sacred text first by rationalist thinkers and *scientists and then (in the second half of the twelfth century) by esoterics and mystics (see KAB-BALAH). The work survives in three different versions, usually known as the "short," "long," and "Saadian" versions; each served as a basis for a tenth-century commentary by Dunash ibn Tamim, Shabbatai Donolo, and *Saadia Gaon, respectively.

In brief and enigmatic sentences, Sefer Yetzirah presents a systematic view of the principles of the process of creation (yetzirah) and the laws governing nature and humans. In almost every respect, this system differs not only from the detailed discussions of the subject in the *Talmud and *midrash but also from the events presented in *Genesis 1. None of the actions and terms in the Genesis creation narrative is prominent in Sefer Yetzirah; indeed, even the term “creation” is not used in the most ancient versions. Rather, the world was “carved” (hakak). According to Sefer Yetzirah, the world came to be by “thirty-two paths of wondrous [divine] wisdom,” which have been interpreted as the numbers from one to ten, plus the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This basic concept follows both the statement in the *Mishnah that the world was created by ten divine utterances (M. *Avot 5:1) and the talmudic view that the world was created by the letters of the alphabet. Sefer Yetzirah systematizes these concepts, presenting a picture of the creation process that is largely independent of the version in Genesis 1.

The ten “numbers” (sefirot*) are the ten directions, or five dimensions, of the universe: north, south, east, west, up, down (in space), beginning, end (in time), good, and evil; they also express the involvement of the three elements: air, water, and fire. Each letter of the alphabet is in charge of three realms – one in the universe (the stars), one in time (month, week, day), and one in the human being (an organ or a sense). The author invented a transcendent system of Hebrew grammar, seeing in the rules of language the source of the laws of nature. The grammatical distinction between masculine and feminine governs all existence. He viewed the difference between good and evil as a grammatical one, and as such both are present in the universe and in the human entity. The work does not deal with any religious or ethical subject. It does not mention *commandments, the people of Israel, the human soul, *prayer, or *redemption. The end of the book indicates that the understanding of these scientific laws brought *Abraham into a religious union with *God, and those who follow him in this may achieve the same mystical status.

Sefer Yetzirah is not mentioned in ancient Hebrew literature, and its terminology is original and unique (a reference to hilkhot yetzirah in Babylonian *Talmud Tractate Sanhedrin is probably unrelated to this work). Jewish rationalists and scientists in the tenth century “discovered” this book; Saadia Gaon and Dunash ibn Tamim wrote detailed commentaries in Arabic, and Shabbatai Donolo wrote a commentary in Hebrew. Many rationalistic, scientific commentaries followed until the twelfth century; of these, the most detailed was by Judah ben Barzilai of Barcelona. Late in the twelfth century the treatise became a major source for Jewish mystics and esoterics in Europe, kabbalists and non-kabbalists, many of whom derived their terminology from it. Since that time, Jews and Christians alike have regarded it as an ancient expression of Jewish mysticism. Sefer Yetzirah was first printed in Mantua in 1562 and has been reprinted scores of times since; it has also been translated into many languages. In 2004 Peter Hyman published a scholarly edition with a textual commentary, English translation, and detailed bibliography. Other studies include J. Dan, Jewish Mysticism, vol. I (1998); and G. Scholem, The Origins of the Kabbalah (1987).

JOSEPH DAN

Sefirot is an ancient cosmogonic Hebrew term that was adopted in the medieval *Kabbalah to describe the intrinsic structure of the divine world. It became the most recognizable kabbalistic term, and the system of ten sefirot, ten divine emanations or hypostases, became an identifying characteristic of the kabbalistic worldview.

The term sefirot originated in the ancient cosmogonic Hebrew work, Sefer Yetzirah* (The Book of Creation). The first chapter of that work describes, in various, often conflicting ways, the ten sefirot belimah (numbers of nothingness?) that, together with the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, constitute the thirty-two “secret paths of wisdom” by which God created the universe. Medieval commentators, like *Saadia Gaon, and modern scholars, like Gershom *Scholem, identified the sefirot with the ten primary numbers. The Sefer Yetzirah describes them as the ten directions of the universe: up, down, east, west, north, south, beginning, end, and good and evil. Another section of that work identifies them as archangels – the holy beasts of the *Ezekiel chariot (Ezek 1). Another section describes the first four sefirot as the stages in the evolution of the elements from which the universe was created. These elements consist of the spirit of God, from which air, water, and finally fire came forth (the fourth element, earth is not included in this system). The text states emphatically that the sefirot are ten in number: “ten and not nine, ten and not eleven.”

During the tenth to twelfth centuries, philosophers and scientists in *Iraq, *Italy, and *Spain made several attempts to reconcile this ancient, opaque system with contemporary views of the world. By the end of the twelfth century, the system was adopted by esoterics and mystics in southern *France, *Spain, *Germany, and northern *France. Although writers in northern France and Germany retained the concept that the sefirot represented cosmological entities, kabbalists in southern France and Spain interpreted the term as indicating the intrinsic structure of the divine world. This is not evident in the first work of the Kabbalah, the Bahir* (ca. 1190), but it is emphatically stated in the commentary on the Sefer Yetzirah written by *Isaac the Blind, the leader of the earliest circle of kabbalists in southern France, in the beginning of the thirteenth century. In the first half of the thirteenth century, the kabbalists in Gerona, Spain, adopted and developed the system of ten divine sefirot, and since then, with few exceptions (like Abraham *Abulafia in the second half of that century), it has become a prominent characteristic of Jewish *mysticism.

The Kabbalah transformed these emanations or hypostases, which likely have Neoplatonic origins, into a vast, colorful mythology. This system of sefirot dominates the complex, dynamic descriptions of the divine world of the Zohar*, and its main ideas became the “standard” kabbalistic description, although every kabbalist developed an individual system that diverged to some extent from that “standard.”

The main outlines are as follows: The eternal God, the source of everything, called Ein Sof*, is the origin of the flow of divine “light” from which all existence emerged. The “point” at which a divine will to create and evolve is identified is the first sefirah, usually called keter (crown). From keter the divine “plan” for all existence emerged; this is the second sefirah, hokhmah (the divine wisdom). The actual existence of divine beings begins with the third sefirah, binah (intelligence). These three sefirot represent, in the anthropomorphic terms of the Kabbalah, the head of the divine figure. From binah emerged the two arms: the fourth sefirah, hesed (charity) on the right, and the fifth, din (justice), on the left (also called gevurah [divine power]). The sixth sefirah, tiferet (grandeur, also called rahamim [mercy]), united the two ways of divine conduct of the world, representing the divine heart. The seventh and eighth sefirot, nezah (eternity) on the right and hod (glory) on the left, represent the two legs. Between them is the ninth sefirah, yesod (foundation) or tzaddik (righteousness), representing the male organ. The tenth sefirah, malkhut (kingdom) or Shekhinah* (divine residence or presence), is a separate entity; it represents the female aspect of the divine world, the wife or the daughter, and it is the power that is dominant in the created worlds beneath it. It leads the hosts of angels and heavenly bodies, as well as the physical, human world. There is also a parallel system of sefirot – “the emanations on the left,” the sitra alra (the other side, meaning the left) – which represent the realm of evil, consisting of seven or ten sefirot, headed by Samael* and the feminine aspect, Lilith*.

The sefirot represent a dynamic, ever-changing realm. They thrive when divine flow is abundant, and the lower ones suffer when it is diminished by the sins of the people of Israel. The masculine and feminine powers come together in erotic union, and their joining increases the flow of divine goodness; however, when Israel’s sins cause them to be separate, the powers of evil are strengthened. Prayers*, fulfillment of religious commandments*, and ethical deeds increase the good flow. In the Zohar*, as well as in some other kabbalistic works, the imagery describing the sefirot is intensely mythological, attributing to the divine powers strong individual characteristics and relationships. At the same time, the detailed description of the emanation of the sefirot serves as a spiritual ladder that can be used by the mystic to uplift his or her soul, stage by stage, in the opposite direction – from the physical universe to the summit of the divine realms.

Lurianic Kabbalah (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC), which developed in sixteenth-century Safed*, while following the main contours of this system, transformed it into a structural theory: Everything in the universe is located according to this hierarchy, there is an infinite number of such groupings, and only its place in this cosmic ladder decides the particular characteristics of each entity. However, most kabbalists in the modern period did not accept this theory, and the concept of the sefirot as presented in the Zohar remained most prevalent. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Kabbalah (1974), 88–116; and I. Tishby, The Wisdom of the Zohar, (1989), vol. I. JOSEPH DAN

Seleucids. After the death of Alexander the Great* in 323 BCE, his generals and other claimants scrambled to gain supremacy over the territory he had conquered. The wars of these “successors” (Diadochi) took place over a forty-two-year period (322–280). Within a few years, Ptolemy I (r. 305–283) and Seleucus I (r. 305–281) had claimed Egypt* and Mesopotamia*, respectively, and joined in an alliance against Antigonos, a rival general who had staked a claim to Asia. In 312, after Ptolemy defeated the Antigonid forces at Gaza, Seleucus returned to Babylon* to secure his authority. Although ancient chronicles mark this year as the beginning of the Seleucid kingdom, it was not until 305 that Seleucus claimed the title “king.” Three years later, Ptolemy and Seleucus joined Cassander and Lysimachus in an alliance against Antigonos, who was killed at the battle of Ipsus. Ipsus marked a pivotal moment in the history of Palestine*, for when the victorious generals divided Antigonos’s land, Seleucus was awarded Syria*. Yet Ptolemy, whose armies had not participated in the fighting, claimed the southern region of Syria before Seleucus could secure it. For the next century, the Ptolemies* ruled the province that included the Land of Israel (called “Coele-Syria and Phoenicia*” by the Seleucids).

The geopolitical pendulum shifted during the Fifth Syrian War (202–198), when Antiochus III (r. 223–187) took advantage of a period of weakness in Egypt* and reconquered Palestine. His success was short-lived, however, for during the next decade the Romans repelled his advances into Greece and defeated him at Magnesia (190). Two years later, Rome* forced him to dismantle his army according to the provisions of the Treaty of Apamea (188). Seleucid prestige suffered further in 169, when Rome once again forced Antiochus IV (r. 175–164) to retreat unceremoniously from Egypt.

This humiliating defeat coincided with a rebellion in Jerusalem* that led Antiochus to institute a number of oppressive measures against the Jews: These events have been detailed in sources such as Daniel*, 1 and 2 Maccabees*, and Josephus*. During Antiochus’s Egyptian campaign, Jerusalem fell into rebellion as Jason and Menelaus, rival claimants to the high priesthood*, jostled with one another for power. Antiochus responded by entering the city in 168 to quell the unrest by force. His relationship with the Jews apparently deteriorated, prompting him to station a garrison in the city as a show of force. Tensions mounted as Antiochus instituted a series of decrees that prevented the Jews from worshiping*, abolished their observance of the Sabbath* and circumcision*, and banned them from possessing the Torah*. He also dedicated the Temple* to Zeus Olympius (the “abomination of desolation”) and compelled Jews to participate in Greek religious festivals. The ensuing Maccabean revolt culminated in the restoration of the Temple in 164 and the emergence of Jewish autonomy under the Hasmonean* dynasty (142–37).

Conflicts with the Parthians and Romans and internal dynastic struggles contributed to the contraction of the kingdom’s territory in subsequent years. In 129 the Parthians conquered Mesopotamia*, leaving the Seleucids with little more than Syria. Thereafter, political factionalism accelerated the Seleucids’ decline, culminating in Pompey’s reorganization of Syria into a Roman province in 64 BCE.

DAVID M. REIS

Sepharad, Sephardim (adj. Sephardi, Sephardic). Sepharad is a biblical place name (Obadiah 20) that medieval Jews applied to their communities in the Iberian Peninsula (Spain and Portugal) and to the culture they created. After the expulsion of Spanish Jews in 1492 and the forced conversion of Portuguese Jews in 1497, Sephardim spread throughout the Mediterranean world, taking their distinctive traditions and vernacular language *Ladino with them. See CONVERSOS; SPAIN entries. Maps 6, 9

Septuagint is the translation of the Hebrew *Bible into Greek. Septuaginta means “seventy” in Latin (LXX), and this name derives from the tradition that the very first Greek translation of the *Torah (*Pentateuch) was said to have been translated by seventy-two elders, six from each tribe. This number was subsequently rounded off to seventy. The story of the miraculous creation of the translation (thirty-six pairs of translators working in separate cells yet producing identical renderings in seventy-two days) is first presented in the Jewish *Hellenistic *Letter of Aristeas § 301–7 (second or first century BCE) and expanded in later sources, especially Epiphanius, On Weights and Measures (fourth century CE). The tradition preserved in *rabbinic literature, especially Soferim 1:5, of there being five translators of the Torah, one for each book, is more realistic than that of seventy-two (or seventy) translators.

NATURE AND CONTENT: The translation of the Torah into Greek was soon followed by translations of the other books of Hebrew Scripture. However, the first translation was so dominant that its name was ultimately attached to these other translations as well. The various translations differ greatly among themselves, and the name “LXX” ultimately came to designate a group of many translations of different natures that represent different approaches and were produced at different times. Most passages reflect the original Greek translations (the “Old Greek”), but some reflect later revisions.

The Septuagint contains Greek versions of all the books of Hebrew Scripture (the Hebrew canon). In addition, it contains Greek versions of Hebrew books such as Baruch and the *Wisdom of Ben Sira that were not included in the canon of Hebrew Scripture. It also includes writings originally written in Greek (e.g., 2–4 *Maccabees), so that the LXX is more than just a collection of translated works. All of these Greek books, most of them translations from *Hebrew and *Aramaic, were accepted as authoritative (sacred) by the Alexandrian Jewish community. Subsequently, all the books of Greek Scripture that are not included in the canon of the Hebrew Bible were rejected by traditional Judaism and are therefore traditionally named sefarim hitzoniyyim (outside books) or *Apocrypha (the hidden books).

The books in the LXX are arranged differently from their position in the Hebrew Bible, in which the three large divisions are Torah, *Prophets, *Writings. In contrast, the books of Greek Scripture are arranged according to their content: Torah and historical books, books of poetry and wisdom, and prophetic books. Within each group, the sequence of the books differs from Hebrew Scripture. For example, in Greek Scripture, *Ruth (one of the *Five Scrolls, included among the Writings in Hebrew Scripture) follows the book of *Judges because its story took place “in the days of the Judges” (Ruth 1:1). Often the names of the books differ from their counterparts in Hebrew Scripture as well (e.g., 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings are named 1–4 Kingdoms in the LXX).

DOCUMENTATION: The LXX is known from ancient leather and papyrus scrolls and codices, among them several early copies found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. The most reliable complete texts of the LXX are the codices B (Vaticanus), A (Alexandrinus), and S (Sinaiticus), from the fourth to fifth centuries CE.

DATE: According to the Letter of Aristeas, *Ptolemy II Philadelphus (r. 285–246 BCE) initiated the translation of the Torah. This date is probably correct, whereas most other details in this document may be fictive. The translations of the Prophets and Writings were completed by the middle of the first century BCE. The grandson of Ben Sira knew the translation of the Prophets and part of the Writings in 132 or 116 BCE, according to different computations of the date of his Greek translation of the Wisdom of Ben Sira.

ORIGIN: The Letter of Aristeas, rabbinic literature, and various additional sources describe the Jewish origin of the LXX; its terminology and exegesis reflect its Jewish nature. However, the LXX often differs from the Hebrew text that was current in the Land of Israel from the second to first centuries BCE onward and that was later to become the *Masoretic text. These differences were not to the liking of the circles of the *Pharisees, and soon a trend developed to replace the LXX with new translations. These new translations adapted the Old Greek translation to the Hebrew text then current in the Land of Israel.

Jewish dislike of the LXX became stronger when the Greek writings of early *Christianity (the *New Testament [NT]) based themselves, quite naturally, on the LXX. The LXX influenced the NT at various levels. At an early stage, the belief developed that this translation was divinely inspired and hence the way was open for several *Church Fathers to claim that the LXX reflected the words of God more precisely than did the Hebrew Bible. Western Christianity held to the LXX as revealed scripture until it was replaced by the Vulgate translation produced by the Church Father Jerome (ca. 400 CE). In the Russian and Greek Orthodox churches, the LXX is still considered sacred.

BACKGROUND: Many renderings reflect the cultural environment of the translators, who came from both Palestinian and *Egyptian societies. When analyzing individual renderings, the translators’ focus is on their linguistic and exegetical background and on the ideas behind them.

The translators often added their own religious convictions to verses in the Hebrew Bible. In several places, they interpreted the context as referring to the *messiah. In other instances, the translators avoided physical depictions of *God that were sometimes present in the Hebrew original. This phenomenon occurred especially in *Esther and *Proverbs. Probably the most characteristic feature of the book of Esther in the LXX is the addition of a religious background to a book that does not mention God’s name in the original.

TEXTUAL AND LITERARY ANALYSIS OF HEBREW SCRIPTURE: The LXX was translated from a Hebrew text that differed, often greatly, from the Masoretic version. This is not surprising, because in antiquity many differing copies of the Hebrew Scripture text were in circulation. Some of these differences are minor, whereas others involve a whole paragraph, chapter, or even book. The contents of all these copies were considered “Scripture.”

EMANUEL TOV

Serbia: See BALKANS

Sermons are a genre of oral discourse, usually within the context of the *worship service, in which the speaker crafts a message generally rooted in scriptural readings and bearing resonance to issues of contemporary concern. Although written texts are the best evidence for the sermon in the era before recordings and videotapes, they give little sense of what actual sermons were like. This is because rabbinic leaders in the pre-modern period delivered sermons in the vernacular spoken by their own Jewish communities, but recorded them for posterity in *Hebrew, usually after they had delivered the sermon.

The *New Testament and *rabbinic literature provide abundant evidence for sermons delivered as a regular part of *Sabbath worship. However, rabbinic writings preserve nothing comparable to the texts of sermons delivered by such *Church Fathers as Chrysostom, Augustine, and many other gifted Christian preachers, which were stenographically transcribed during delivery.

The earliest texts of Jewish sermons that were written by an individual preacher date from the thirteenth century. In form they reveal continuity with the homiletical *midrash: Beginning with a verse from the Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible, they discuss various interpretations of the verse before relating it to a verse in the weekly *Torah reading (parashah). Frequently a group of verses from the parashah are then interpreted so as to highlight a central theme. A new form for the Jewish sermon, influenced by Christian scholastic preaching, can be documented from the late fifteenth century. It begins with one verse from the *Torah reading, followed by a passage from the *Talmud or a *midrash. After an introduction, the body of the sermon usually focuses on a topic suggested by the opening verse. At some point, the rabbinic passage is shown to relate unexpectedly to the verse and the topic. This structure became dominant among the *Sephardic communities of the Mediterranean basin and later in northern Europe.

A different structure was common in the *Ashkenazi communities of northern and *Eastern Europe. Here, the sermon established a chain of connections in which one biblical verse or rabbinic passage led by association to another, which led to a third, and so forth. Here the goal often seemed more to demonstrate the knowledge and intellectual rigor of the preacher than to investigate a specific topic.

For Jewish preachers before the nineteenth century, commentary on biblical and rabbinic texts was paramount, and novelty of interpretation was highly valued. One striking homiletical technique was to problematize the classical text by raising a series of difficulties or “doubts” associated with it, before resolving all of the problems in an ingenious new way. Preachers influenced by philosophy interpreted the classical texts in accordance with their own intellectual commitments, often presenting familiar narratives as allegories of philosophical truths. As *festivals approached, sermons generally treated the legal and ritual requirements for proper observance, as well as the spiritual message of the occasions. The Sabbath preceding *Passover provided an opportunity for the preacher to review the complex laws of removing all inappropriate foods from the house; the sermon on the Sabbath before *Yom Kippur was devoted to a discussion of the complexities of *repentance and *atonement.

Sermons also accompanied *life-cycle events: *circumcision of a son, *marriage, and *death. Eulogies, an especially important preaching occasion, provide evidence for attitudes about death and the *afterlife (including reincarnation), as well as information about the individual being mourned. One role of the preacher was to rebuke the congregation for its religious failures, a tradition rooted in the biblical prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). The challenge in the sermon of rebuke was to criticize the listeners in a manner that would not counterproductively turn them away from the preacher and his message.

The parable or exemplum, a fixture of Jewish discourse from biblical times, was an effective component of Jewish homiletics. Elaborate narratives from non-Jewish literature were occasionally mobilized for stunning rhetorical effect. Jacob Kranz (1741–1804), the Maggid of Dubno, was a preacher renowned for his ability to create parables to illustrate the most challenging points.

Beginning in the early nineteenth century, significant changes in the status of European Jewish communities and new movements within those communities resulted in a different style of Jewish preaching. Although the sermon was still usually anchored in a biblical text, the center of gravity shifted from exegesis to the elucidation of a religious theme.

With the greater integration of Jews into their surrounding society, new occasions for Jewish preaching arose, including the coronation or death of a monarch; government-proclaimed days of prayer or thanksgiving; the beginning of a war, a decisive battle, and the termination of conflict; and the passing of important new legislation. On some of these occasions Gentile dignitaries and other members of the non-Jewish community might be in attendance. Texts of these topical sermons were sometimes published in pamphlet form for wide distribution.

The late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries witnessed a flourishing of Jewish homiletical oratory. In many American congregations, Sunday morning weekday services and Friday evening Sabbath services became the primary preaching occasions, with the shorter liturgy allowing more time for the sermon. Jewish preachers frequently discussed controversial social issues both of specifically Jewish concern (*Judaism, Reform *Zionism) and of wider interest (rights of workers, capital punishment, war and peace). Many preachers attracted worshipers to the synagogue, and excellent preaching skills were considered a highly important qualification of an effective rabbi. The number of printed volumes of collected sermons expanded dramatically during this era.

In recent decades, the prestige of the sermon appears to have diminished significantly, with a preference for informal presentations inviting congregational response. Similarly, the time allotted to the sermon has diminished from generation to generation. Yet a new generation of women rabbis (see RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN) has breathed new life into the genre. It is unclear whether this will be sufficient to generate a renaissance of the sermon.

For surveys and representative examples of Jewish sermons from the High Middle Ages to the present, see M. Saperstein, Jewish Preaching 1200–1800 (1989); idem, “Your Voice Like a Ram’s Horn”: Themes and Texts in Traditional Jewish Preaching (1996); idem, Exile in Amsterdam: Saul Levi Morteira’s Sermons to a Congregation of “New Jews” (2003); and idem, Jewish Preaching in Times of War: 1800–2001 (2008).

MARC SAPERSTEIN

Shabbat Ha-Gadol (GREAT SABBATH) refers to the *Sabbath directly preceding Passover. One possible reason for its special designation is that the haftarah read on that day speaks of the “the awesome [gadol], fearful day of the Lord” (*Malachi 3:23) when the *messiah will appear. Another suggestion is that the Israelites fulfilled God’s orders to have each Jewish household select a lamb (an animal worshiped by the Egyptians) to be used in the paschal sacrifice on the Sabbath before the exodus from *Egypt on the 14th of Nissan. The decision to make this sacrifice was the Israelites’ first initiative as a liberated people. A third possibility is that in many communities the rabbi gives a lengthy sermon on Shabbat ha-Gadol, perhaps the grandest of the year, to discuss the many laws and practices of the *festival.

PAUL STEINBERG

Shabbetai Zevi (1626–1676) was the most notorious Jewish messianic claimant in the Early Modern period. Born in the bustling commercial city of Smyrna (present-day Izmir) on the western coast of the *Ottoman Empire (what is now *Turkey), he first declared himself the *messiah in 1648, shortly before his twenty-second birthday. However, only in the spring of 1665, when he was proclaimed messiah in Gaza by the brilliant young kabbalist Nathan Ashkenazi (also known as Nathan of Gaza), did people begin to pay attention.

Through the autumn and winter of 1665–66, the news of imminent *redemption swept the Jewish *Diaspora. From London to *Yemen, from *North Africa to *Poland, Jews of all ages and both sexes went into convulsions of penitence and “prophecy,” saw visions of Shabbetai Zevi enthroned in heaven, sold their goods, and packed provisions for their voyage to the Holy Land. They recited public prayers for the newly revealed king; fasts mourning the destruction of the *Temple were abolished by rabbinic decree; and edition after edition of Nathan of Gaza’s penitential liturgies rolled off the Hebrew presses. At the end of 1665, Zevi set sail for Constantinople, expecting to receive homage and a crown from the Ottoman sultan.

Instead, Shabbetai Zevi was arrested on landing. The authorities kept him for months in cushioned imprisonment in the fortress of Gallipoli where he comported himself as monarch, issuing proclamations and “decrees” and giving audiences to visitors from all over the Diaspora. In September 1666, he was abruptly summoned to Adrianople to appear before Sultan Mehmed IV. Presumably given the choice between conversion to *Islam or death, he chose Islam. He left the sultan’s presence on September 16, wearing the turban that was Muslim headgear, his name changed to “Mehmed Effendi.”

As news of his conversion spread, believers only slowly abandoned their faith. Many made excuses: They explained that “donning the turban” was not apostasy but assumption of royal power, or it was the messiah’s destiny to become an apostate, thereby taking on himself the archaic sins of the Jewish people, or his apostasy was an act of kabbalistic tikkun (mending), a descent into the regions of darkness to retrieve the divine “sparks” buried there (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC). Zevi himself, now a salaried functionary of the Ottoman court, continued to behave as the Jewish messiah, alternating Jewish rituals with Qur’anic recitations and proposing to convert the Jews to Islam through disputation with his rabbinic followers. The sultan, growing tired at last of these interfaith antics, banished him at the beginning of 1673 to a remote spot on the Adriatic coast. There he died on *Yom Kippur, 1676.

The enigma of Shabbetai Zevi remains: How did this weak, self-absorbed, severely disturbed man – scholars like Gershom *Scholem have convincingly diagnosed him as suffering from bipolar (manic-depressive) disorder – command the allegiance and enthusiasm of otherwise sensible men and women from all over the Jewish world? There is probably no one key that will unlock this mystery. Yet part of his appeal certainly lay in his implied promise, made explicit in the sectarian activity that followed his death (see FRANK, JACOB AND FRANKISM; SABBATEANISM [OTTOMAN EMPIRE AND TURKEY]), to redeem Judaism not only from the yoke of Gentile rule but also from the shackles of its own religious law (see ANTINOMIANISM). Surely this man must be the messiah, argued Abraham Cardozo, one of his followers; if he were not, he would be too great a sinner for the world to endure.

The classic account is G. Scholem, Sabbatai Sevi: The Mystical Messiah (1973). Recent studies include M. Goldish, The Sabbatian Prophets (2004); and D. J. Halperin, Sabbatai Zevi: Testimonies to a Fallen Messiah (2007), who provides annotated translations of primary sources.

DAVID J. HALPERIN

Sharansky, Nathan (b. 1948 as Anatoly Borisovich Sharansky) was a human rights activist and a prisoner of conscience in the *Soviet Union and, as a resident of *Israel since 1986, was elected Chairman of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel in June 2009.

A native of Donetsk, Soviet Union (now *Ukraine), Sharansky graduated from the Moscow Institute of Physics and Technology with a degree in computer science. After being denied a visa to Israel in 1973, he gained recognition as a spokesperson for Soviet Jewry and the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group. He was arrested in 1977, convicted in 1978 of treason and spying on behalf of the United States, and sentenced to thirteen years imprisonment and forced labor. His wife Avital organized a campaign for his release that gained international attention (see SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989).

Sharansky was released in 1986 in exchange for two Soviet spies and immigrated to Israel. He was elected president of the Zionist Forum, an organization of former Soviet activist groups, in 1988. In 1995 he created Yisrael B’Aliyah, a political party devoted to helping Israel absorb Soviet immigrants. Yisrael B’Aliyah won seven Knesset seats in 1996, and Sharansky became minister of industry and trade. He served as minister of the interior from 1999 to 2000 and as minister of housing and construction and deputy prime minister from 2001 to 2003. In early 2003, his party merged with Likud (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES), and Sharansky was given ministerial responsibilities for *Jerusalem and *Diaspora affairs. He resigned from government service in May 2005 in opposition to Ariel *Sharon’s removal of Jewish settlements from Gaza. Since 2009, Sharansky has served as the Chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel. Sharansky’s books include the *memoir, Fear No Evil (1988); The Case For Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror (2006), co-written with Ron Dermer; and Defending Identity: Its Indispensable Role in Protecting Democracy (2008).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Sharon, Ariel (b. Ariel Scheinermann in 1928) was the eleventh prime minister of the State of Israel, serving from March 2001 to April 2006. He suffered a severe stroke on January 4, 2006, from which he has never recovered.

Sharon spent more than thirty years in the Israeli military (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES); he was appointed head of the Northern Command Staff in 1964, head of the Army Training Department in 1966, and head of the Southern Command Staff in 1969. During these years, he also earned a law degree from Hebrew University (1962). Sharon resigned from the army in 1972, but was recalled to service during the 1973 Yom Kippur War (see ISRAEL, ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT). Elected to the Knesset that same year, he resigned to serve as security advisor to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1975. Elected to the Knesset again in 1977, he served as minister of agriculture from 1977 to 1981 in Menahem Begin's government. In 1981 he was appointed defense minister, but resigned in 1983 after Israel's Kahan Commission found him indirectly responsible for the massacres of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Lebanon. His numerous governmental positions in the 1990s included minister of national infrastructure in 1996 and foreign minister in 1998. Sharon became Likud party leader after the resignation of Benjamin Netanyahu in 1999, and he was elected prime minister in a special election held on February 6, 2001. His disengagement plan, which called for Israeli troops and settlers to withdraw from the Gaza Strip, caused a rift in the Likud Party and prompted Sharon to leave Likud and form the Kadima party in November 2005 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES). The platform of the new party stressed peace with the Palestinians, security for Israel, and dismantling of terrorist groups.
ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Shaving. The Bible prohibits shaving "the corners of one's beard" (Lev 19:27). However, rabbinic literature sanctions the use of depilatories and cutting off the hair of the face with a scissor action as long as the blade does not touch the face. Nonetheless, throughout much of Jewish history, a beard was seen as a sign of authority and maturity. The image of the rabbi or scholar was always one that included a bearded face. In addition, not shaving is one of the requirements of the mourning process (see DEATH AND MOURNING). Therefore, after the loss of a close relative or during the parts of the calendar that commemorate sad events in Jewish history, many men have the custom of not shaving.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Shavuot (literally, "Weeks") is one of the three pilgrimage festivals. It falls on the 6th of Sivan (May or June). The Torah refers to Shavuot in three ways: Hag Ha-Katzir (Feast of the Harvest; Exod 23:16), a reminder of when two special loaves of bread made from the newly cut wheat would be offered at the Temple; Yom (or Hag) Ha-Bikkurim (Feast of the First Fruits), when Israelites were to bring a Temple offering of new crops of any of the shivat minim (seven species; Num 28:26); and Hag Ha-Shavuot (Feast of Weeks; Deut 16:10), because Shavuot is the culmination of counting seven weeks after bringing the omer (an offering of sheaves of grain).

During the time of the Second Temple, the Sadducees and the Pharisees debated the exact date to celebrate Shavuot. The argument concerned an ambiguity in Leviticus 23:15–16 about when to begin counting the omer (see OMER, COUNTING OF). The Sadducees argued that counting should begin the day after the Sunday after the first night of Passover. The Pharisees, whose interpretation was ultimately accepted, contended that the counting should begin on the second day of Passover. Simultaneously, the Rabbis were debating exactly when the Torah was revealed. After centuries of discussion, the 6th of Sivan was celebrated as both Shavuot and the day on which the Torah was given, Zeman Matan Torateinu (Season of the Giving of our Torah).

Shavuot observances follow those of festivals, including restrictions from work. Orthodox and Conservative Jews outside the Land of Israel traditionally observe the diasporic two-day extension of sacred days and therefore observe two days of Shavuot; Reform Jews observe Shavuot for one day (see entries under JUDAISM). The Torah reading for the day is the Ten Commandments. The book of Ruth is also read in synagogue (on the second day in the Diaspora) because it connects to themes of the harvest and accepting faith in Torah, and because Ruth is the great-grandmother of King David whom, the Rabbis say, was born and died on Shavuot.

Customs unique to Shavuot include decorating the home and synagogue with flowers and greenery. This custom may originate from bringing bikkurim (first fruits) to the Temple as offerings or in remembrance of the lush description of Mount Sinai at the time the Torah was given (Exod 34:3). Another custom is Tikkun Leil Shavuot (Set Order of Study for the Night of Shavuot), which is an all-night study session developed by mystics (see KABBALAH). The tikkun is meant to inspire a sense of restless anticipation on the night preceding the giving of the Torah. Eating dairy products is also a Shavuot custom, likely as a demonstration of self-control, as manifested in Torah laws, especially the dietary laws.

For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Spring and Summer Holidays (2009); I. Greenberg, The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays (1993); P. Goodman, The Shavuot Anthology (1992); and I. Klein, A Guide to Religious Jewish Practice (1979).
PAUL STEINBERG

Shechem (Tell Balâtah), a biblical city of refuge, is located in the Central Highlands within the territory of Ephraim (Josh 20:7, 21:21). It sits astride a major trade route between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, 67 kilometers (40 miles) north of Jerusalem. Its strategic location and proximity to fertile land ensured its importance throughout the Bronze Age. Shechem figures prominently in the Genesis ancestral narratives. Abraham (Gen 12:6–7) and Jacob (Gen 33:18–20) both build altars there. Jacob's sons kill the male inhabitants of Shechem to avenge the rape of their sister Dinah (Gen 44) by the eponymous prince of the city. There, Joseph is buried (Josh 24:32). Later, the Shechemites are said to have first supported Gideon's son Abimelech, but later to have turned against him (Judg 9). The story of their revolt includes references to the Temple of El Berith/Baal Berith (also called the Tower of Shechem), undoubtedly the traditional Canaanite temple that had long stood within the city. After *Solomon's death, his son *Rehoboam goes to Shechem to be acclaimed king (1 Kg 12:1), and soon after Jeroboam declares Shechem the first capital of the northern kingdom of *Israel (1 Kgs 12:25). Its destruction is attributed to the *Assyrians, who conquered Israel in the last quarter of the eighth century BCE. Map 2 BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Shehitah. Ritual slaughter. See DIETARY LAWS.

Shekhinah. The *Rabbis use the term Shekhinah (dwelling or resting) to describe *God's presence or immanence in this world. Although this meaning is absent in the Hebrew *Bible, in *rabbinic literature the Shekhinah functions like the biblical kavod (glory) that accompanied the Israelites in the desert and rested on the *Tabernacle/ Tent of Meeting (mishkan, ohel moed). The Rabbis taught that the Shekhinah could be present when Jews behaved righteously, as when scholars studied (M. Avot* 3:3), when a quorum of men prayed together (BT Berakhot 6a), or when husbands and wives engaged in licit sexual relations (BT Sotah 17a). The Shekhinah protects the weak (BT Shabbat 31a), cares for the sick (BT Shabbat 12b), and accompanies Israel in exile.

The Rabbis understood the Shekhinah as identical with God: the divine power manifest in the terrestrial realm. The Shekhinah, like sunshine, suffuses the earth with radiance, but is ontically identical with its guiding force. Some later rabbinic midrashim*, however, personify the Shekhinah, describing it in ways that suggest *gender and ontic independence (among others, Song of Songs Rabbah 8:11; Midrash Proverbs to 22:28). Whatever the original rabbinic intentions might have been, medieval thinkers were uncomfortable with any intimation of anthropomorphism or of a compromised monotheism. *Philo, the first-century-CE Alexandrian Jewish philosopher, had already allegorized the Shekhinah as the logos of God. Nearly a millennium later, *Saadia ben Joseph Gaon (d. 942) propounded that God created the Shekhinah as a lower glory that would be visible to *prophets. This understanding was adopted by Abraham *ibn Ezra (d. 1167), Judah *Halevi (d. 1141), and *Maimonides (d. 1204).

By contrast, medieval *Kabbalah enlarged on the mythological possibilities inherent in Jewish tradition to articulate a theology of a feminine Shekhinah, the female aspect of a male God. These mystics believed that God is both hidden and manifest in our world. The hidden aspect, the Ein Sof* (without end), lies beyond the realm of human cognition. Ten knowable attributes or sefirot* flow from this eternal and infinite source. The feminine Shekhinah is the final emanation, mediating between heaven and earth and serving as the passive eye or door through which a mystic can achieve divine vision. The popularity of the Shekhinah in Kabbalah corresponds to the popularity of the cult of the Virgin Mary among contemporaneous Christians. The need for nurturing female images may be a response to similar theological needs and cultural stimuli.

In the kabbalistic vision, the Shekhinah is essential for cosmic homeostasis. Medieval kabbalists believed that all liturgical and ritual acts affect both the terrestrial and heavenly realms. Proper performance of the *commandments unites opposing sefirot and enables a divine union that is imagined in overtly sexual terms. Drawing on images from *Proverbs, *Song of Songs, rabbinic midrashim, and earlier

Jewish *mysticism, twelfth- and thirteenth-century kabbalists believed that the Shekhinah was the divine *bride who united with her spouse, the sefirah Tiferet, in a celestial bridal chamber. Halakhically sanctioned physical intercourse between a male mystic and his wife on earth, particularly on *Sabbath eve, was understood as a particularly effective means of fostering both divine and mystical union.

In sixteenth-century *Safed, mystics instituted the Kabbalat Shabbat ceremony welcoming the *Sabbath *bride. It was here that Solomon Alkabetz wrote the liturgical poem, Lekha dodi likrat kallah (Come my beloved to meet the bride), which has been associated with this ritual ever since. Isaac Luria further enlarged on human marital union in his kabbalistic system as a means to effect devekut (divine union) between the masculine and feminine aspects of God (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC). Moreover, he and his students believed that it was necessary to perform each commandment with the intention (kavannah*) of uniting God with the Shekhinah, as a way to achieve harmony in the cosmos (tikkun olam*).

Although medieval Jewish mysticism conceived of the Shekhinah as feminine, it is important to note that medieval Jewish attitudes about the inferior position of women played a major role in her kabbalistic conceptualization. The Zohar* describes the Shekhinah as a passive vessel lacking any distinct personality (1:181a, among other references). Consequently, the Shekhinah is like a revolving sword with the potential for both good and evil (Zohar 1: 53b, 221b, 242a; 2:27b; 3:19b). When she is described in positive terms, she is often gendered as male, as the sefirah Malkhut or David; when she is under the sway of excessive judgment or the demonic "other side," she remains female (see LILITH; SAMAEL; SEFIROT).

The feminine Shekhinah remains a vibrant religious symbol among many contemporary Jews. *Hasidism adapted earlier mystical understandings of the Shekhinah into its theology and practices. Some Jewish feminists have incorporated the Shekhinah into Jewish liturgy (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). The Jewish Renewal movement, founded on aspects of both Hasidism and feminism, emphasizes the role of the Shekhinah in *worship and ritual (see JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL). In fact, the enduring symbol of the feminine Shekhinah has even crossed religious boundaries and been reconceived in New Age spirituality.

For further reading, see A. Green, "Bride, Spouse, Daughter: Images of the Feminine in Classical Jewish Sources," in On Being a Jewish Feminist, ed. S. Heschel (1983); idem, "Shekhinah, the Virgin Mary, and the Song of Songs: Reflections on a Kabbalistic Symbol in Its Historical Context," AJS Review 26 (2002): 1–52; M. Idel, "Sexual Metaphors and Praxis in the Kabbalah," in The Jewish Family, ed. D. Kraemer (1989); S. Koren, "Kabbalistic Physiology: Isaac the Blind, Nahmanides, and Moses de Leon on Menstruation," AJS Review 28 (2004): 317–39; idem, "Shekhinah as Female Symbol," Encyclopedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (2006); P. Schäfer, Mirror of His Beauty: Feminine Images of God from the Bible to the Early Kabbalah (2002); G. Scholem, "Shekhinah: The Feminine Element in Divinity," in On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead, ed. J. Chipman (1991); E. Wolfson, Through a Speculum That Shines (1994); and C. Weissler, "The Meanings of the Shekhinah in the Jewish Renewal Movement," Nashim 10 (2006): 53–83.

SHARON KOREN

Shema, “Hear!” or “Listen!” in Hebrew, refers to Judaism’s fundamental profession of belief in and commitment to the unity and uniqueness of *God. The shema, often translated, “Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one” (Deut 6:4), is recited twice daily in Jewish *worship and at other critical moments in a Jew’s life.

Shemini Atzeret. This festival, whose name means “the eighth [day] of assembly,” takes place on the 22nd of Tishri. It originates in the commandment in Leviticus 23:34 that after the seven days mandated for *Sukkot, “on the eighth day there shall be a holy convocation for you.” Shemini Atzeret shares all of the characteristics of Sukkot, excluding the waving of the four species and dwelling in the sukkah. Many Jews in the *Diaspora celebrate Shemini Atzeret as the eighth day of Sukkot. In Israel and in Reform Judaism, Shemini Atzeret observance is merged with *Simḥat Torah.

Shevat, the eleventh month of the Jewish calendar, takes place in January and/or February of the Gregorian calendar. *Tu B’Shevat, the new year for trees, is celebrated on the 15th of this month.

Shiloh (Tell Seilūn), an important place of pilgrimage and *worship in the *Canaanite era, continued to serve as a sacred site during the period of *Israelite settlement (1 Sam 1:3). Centrally located in the territory of Ephraim, Shiloh was the place where the Israelites set up their *Tent of Meeting when they came into the promised land (*Josh 18:1). During the era of the *Judges, a sanctuary was constructed at Shiloh, and the *Ark of the Covenant was housed there (1 Sam 4:3–4). Priestly leaders and their families, including Phineas (Josh 22:12–13), Eli (1 Sam 1:10), and *Samuel (1 Sam 3:19–21), and their sons (1 Sam 2:12; 8:1–3) officiated at Shiloh. Israelites worshiped there during the vineyard festival (Judg 21:19–22) and at annual festivals (1 Sam 1:21). In addition, the sanctuary there served people in times of personal need (1 Sam 1:21–28). After *Solomon’s construction of the *Jerusalem *Temple, the Shiloh sanctuary is rarely mentioned. However, the prophet Ahijah came from Shiloh to announce *Jeroboam’s imminent ascent to *kingship of *Israel (1 Kgs 11:29–32), and mourners came from Shiloh to the site of Temple after its destruction by the *Babylonians (Jer 41:4–5). BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Shivah: See DEATH AND MOURNING

Shoah is a Hebrew word that means “sudden disaster” or “catastrophe”; it is often used instead of “*Holocaust” to designate the destruction of European Jewry in World War II. Because the word shoah has no ritual implications, it has none of the connotations of willing *martyrdom implicit in the word “holocaust,” which in Greek means “a sacrifice (or offering) that is consumed by fire.”

Shofar is a musical instrument that may be made from the horn of an antelope, gazelle, goat, or ram, but not from a cow’s horn (BT Rosh Ha-Shanah 27a); a ram’s horn is considered desirable because of its association with Genesis 22 (the akedah* [binding of Isaac]; BT Rosh Ha-Shanah 16a). Biblical citations indicate that the shofar was sounded in religious, military, and ceremonial situations. Examples include the *revelation at Mount Sinai (Exod 19:16); the siege of *Jericho (Josh 6); proclamations of *festivals and new moons (see ROSH ḤODESH [Num 10:10; Ps 81:4]); celebrations praising *God (2 Sam 6:15; 1 Chron 15:28; Ps 98:6, 150:3); and the designation of a new king (1 Kgs 1:34).

Details of sounding the shofar, distinguishing between the use of long blasts (tekiah) and a series of short blasts (teruah), appear in Numbers 10:1–10; these blasts were expanded in rabbinic times with the addition of an undulating sound of three broken notes (shevarim). Isaiah 27:13 predicts that the sounding of the ram’s horn will gather those dispersed in *Assyria and *Egypt and bring them to worship in *Jerusalem; midrashic legends associate the sound of the shofar with messianic *redemption and the *resurrection of the dead (see Plate 7).

In contemporary *worship, the shofar is sounded in the synagogue on *Rosh Ha-Shanah, “the first day of the seventh month” (Lev 23:24; Num 29:1), and at the end of the concluding Ne’ilah service on *Yom Kippur (Lev 25:9). The shofar is sounded only during the day and not on the *Sabbath. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Shtetl, the diminutive for shtot, “city” in *Yiddish, is a Jewish designation for towns in *Eastern Europe with significant Jewish populations. Although Jews often did not constitute the majority of the population in any given town, in Jewish minds, the shtetl was a distinctly Jewish entity. Shtetls (or shtetlakh), which ranged in size from a few hundred inhabitants to forty or fifty thousand, occupied a place between rural villages and cities. They were local economic centers whose markets drew peasants from the surrounding rural areas, as well as smaller numbers of Jewish farmers. Within the shtetl, Jews worked in a wide range of crafts and occupations; some Jews went out into the countryside to work in various capacities during the week, returning to the shtetl for the *Sabbath.

Shtetls developed in response to specific social, economic, and political circumstances in *Poland. In the late 1500s and early 1600s, Jews were encouraged to move from more central areas to underdeveloped areas in the east and south that Poland had gained in 1569 when it formed a union with *Lithuania. The powerful nobility owned vast estates and wished to profit from their natural resources. To foster economic development, they sought colonizers to whom they could entrust the management of these lands, and Jews, whose lack of political power meant they offered no potential threat, fit the bill. In exchange for taxes and fees, Jews received protection and were made managers and agents for absentee landlords. They served as tax collectors and leaseholders for all sources of income on these lands, such as tolls, mills, and fishing ponds. One major area of Jewish activity was in the manufacture and sale of alcohol, in which Jews played such a central role that the image of the Jew as tavern keeper became fixed in East European culture. The control Jews were granted over so many aspects of the lives of the peasantry contributed significantly to ethnic and religious tensions.

Jews in the shtetls were granted the right to self-rule, as long as the kahal*, their autonomous *community organization, paid the government the required taxes and filled conscription quotas. Running the kahal were wealthier members of the community; in this hierarchical society, women (see WOMEN: EASTERN EUROPE), the poor, single men, and the minimally literate had no political voice. The kahal ran the Jewish *court system, collected taxes, oversaw Jewish communal institutions, and hired people to fulfill the community's religious and administrative needs. Along with ritual slaughterers (see DIETARY LAWS), *cantors, and other functionaries, they hired a communal *rabbi. All the institutions needed for Jewish communal and religious life existed in the shtetl, including a *mikveh (ritual bath), *cemetery, *synagogue, and study house. Many social welfare organizations (hevras) engaged in providing for the needy – dowries for poor brides, helping the ill and their families, proper burial for the dead – while others served as settings for study and socializing.

Shtetls had mixed populations, but Jews generally constituted the majority. Some shtetls, such as mid-nineteenth-century Berdichev, were as much as 90% Jewish. Jews and non-Jews lived in separate areas of town, with Jews generally living close to the central marketplace. Jews and non-Jews interacted mainly, although not exclusively, through commercial dealings. Although linguistic barriers tended to limit interactions, the many Slavic words that worked their way into *Yiddish are an indication of the cross-cultural influences that developed. Some close personal relationships formed between Jews and non-Jews, but it was also not uncommon for violence to be directed at Jews, from small local attacks to large-scale *pogroms.

The number of shtetls in Poland increased significantly in the course of the seventeenth century and into the eighteenth century. By the second half of the eighteenth century, more than half of the Jewish population lived in hundreds of private towns owned by the Polish nobility. In the late 1700s, Poland was conquered and partitioned by its neighbors – Austria (see HABSBURG EMPIRE), Prussia (see GERMANY), and *Russia. Most shtetls were concentrated in a region that passed into the control of *Russia, which, for nearly three centuries, had forbidden Jewish residence within its boundaries. The tsars dealt with this new “Jewish problem” by establishing the *Pale of Settlement, restricting Jewish residence to these newly acquired “western borderlands.” Although Jews would only be allowed to live outside of the Pale under specific circumstances until the time of the 1917 Russian Revolution, the shtetls themselves were not areas of confinement like the *ghettos of early modern Western Europe.

Many socioeconomic changes in the nineteenth century, including a growing Jewish movement to urban centers, began to erode shtetl life, particularly in former areas of Poland that were now part of the *Austro-Hungarian Empire and Germany. Although the Russian government abolished the kahal in 1844, Jewish communal self-government existed until the 1917 Russian Revolution. In the period after World War I, modernization changed shtetl life in many ways as new political movements, such as *Zionism, made inroads and as younger people left for cities. Nevertheless, much of the traditional shtetl world endured until it was effectively destroyed by the *Nazis during World War II.

A popular nostalgia for the traditional world of the shtetl began as early as the late nineteenth century, as modernization began to encroach on East European Jewish life in the many forms of the Haskalah* (Jewish enlightenment movement). This nostalgia was expressed in Hebrew and Yiddish literature that was, itself, part of the change, such as the writings of Mendeleyev Mokher Seforim and Sholem Aleichem (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH). That nostalgia continues to color contemporary understandings of the shtetl, as seen in popular novels and in theatrical and film productions such as Fiddler on the Roof and Yentl.

Recent research includes M. Stanislawski, “Kahal,” in The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe (2008); D. Assaf, ed., Journey to a 19th Century Shtetl: The Memoirs of Yekhezkel Kotik (2008); I. Barta, The Jews of Eastern Europe, 1772–1881 (2006); Y. Eliach, There Once Was a World: A 900-Year Chronicle of the Shtetl of Eishyshok (1999); S. Kassow, “Shtetl,” in The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe (2008); G. D. Hundert, The Jews in a Polish Private Town (1992); and S. Zipperstein, Imagining Russian Jewry (1999). LISA COHEN

Shulhan Arukh (Set Table) is a codification of Jewish law prepared by Joseph *Karo in sixteenth-century *Safed. The Shulhan Arukh, which was intended as a summary for popular use of Karo's Beit Yosef, an encyclopedic work on Jewish law, became authoritative both in the *Sephardic world and, with the additional notes provided by Moses *Isserles in his Mappah (Tablecloth), in the *Ashkenazic world as well. See also HALAKHAH.

Sibylline Oracles. The sibyl was a legendary Greek prophetess, known for prophecies of doom. Beginning in the second century BCE, Jews composed oracles in the name of the sibyl, praising *Judaism and predicting doom on their enemies. The standard collection contains twelve books. Part of Book 3 was composed in *Egypt in the second century BCE, under *Ptolemy VI Philometor. It predicts prosperity for the Jews in the reign of the seventh king of Egypt from the line of the Greeks. The fourth book, dated to the late first century CE, divides history into four kingdoms and ten generations and predicts cosmic destruction and *resurrection. It advocates baptism as a penitential ritual and is thought to come from *Syria. The fifth book, from Egypt, has bitter recriminations against *Rome for the destruction of the Second *Temple. There is also Jewish material in other books, but it has been reworked by *Christians. For further information, see J. J. Collins, “Sibylline Oracles,” in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (1983), 1: 317–472; see also PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. JOHN J. COLLINS Sicily. Jews lived in Sicily for more than a millennium, for the most part in a state of convivenza (coexistence) with their Gentile neighbors, except toward the end, under Aragonese-Spanish rule. The main cause for the change was the Catholic Church, chiefly the mendicant friars, whose conversionary sermons and rabble-rousing preaching resulted in persecution and massacre.

The early history and antecedents of the Jewish presence in Sicily, like that of most other Jewish settlements in Europe, are shrouded in myth and legend. It is generally assumed that Jews first settled on the island in the first century of the Christian era, but no hard documentary evidence has come to light so far to support this. The first piece of concrete and reliable evidence is a Latin epitaph on a tombstone in Catania, dated 383. Except for a few letters of Pope Gregory the Great, there is little information on the Jewish community until the Muslim conquest of the island in the ninth century (see ISLAM AND JUDAISM).

Sicilian Jewry became absorbed into the Muslim-Mediterranean world, which stretched from the Middle East and beyond to *Arabia and *India in the east, to *Spain in the west, and encompassing *North Africa from Morocco to *Egypt. The letters of Jewish traders in the Cairo *Genizah shed light on this chapter of Jewish history, providing information on shipping and ship movements in the Mediterranean and on trade with North Africa, Italy, Spain, and *Byzantium. Some of these merchants even ventured as far as Arabia, Aden, and *India.

With the Norman conquest of Sicily (1061–91), the island returned to Christian rule. However, it was not until the Aragonese conquest that the Jewish population was seriously affected. The Catholic Church undermined the position of the Jews in Sicily, and the Spanish rulers exported to Sicily some of their policies toward the Jews. All the same, relations between Jews and Christians appear to have been at times cordial and at other times at least tolerable. There existed no compulsory separate Jewish quarters, only voluntary ones such as the Cassaro in Palermo. Yet even in those areas, Christians lived intermingled with Jews.

Jews in Sicily were citizens and suffered from relatively few disabilities, particularly in the economic sphere where they engaged in agriculture and industry, trade, and *commerce, including international trade and shipping, as well as in most professions, which in turn enhanced their social status. There were an unusual number of craftsmen and physicians among the Jews. However, the majority were laborers, on the land and in town. In the fifteenth century the Sicilian Jewish population reached 25,000 or thereabouts, more than half of all Italian Jewry (see ITALY). All of this came to a sudden end with the expulsion order issued by Spain's monarchs in 1492 that affected the Jews of Sicily as well as those of the Iberian Peninsula (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN). Some 80% of the Jews went into exile, whereas the remainder converted to Catholicism, only to be caught in the net of the Spanish *Inquisition. SHLOMO SIMONSOHN

Siddur (pl. siddurim; also sometimes seder/sedarim) comes from the Hebrew for "order" and refers to a prayer book. Generally, although not always, the term refers to the order of prayers for weekdays and *Sabbaths. See also MAHZOR; PRAYER BOOKS; WORSHIP.

Silver, Abba Hillel (1893–1963) was a Lithuanian-born American *Zionist leader. Despite his *Orthodox background, Silver attended *Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he was ordained a Reform rabbi (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA) and received a doctorate. In 1917, with his appointment as rabbi of Tiferet Israel, an important Reform congregation in Cleveland, Ohio, he entered Jewish public life. He became chairman of the Zionist Emergency Committee and, in 1945, president of the Zionist Organization of America. As one of the three leaders of the Zionist movement after its 22nd Congress, he set forth the Zionist position during the discussions preceding the 1947 United Nations Partition Resolution (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING). Silver's rise to leadership in the 1940s and 1950s, a critical period for Jewish existence in modern times, constituted a significant change in American Zionism and the American Jewish community.

Silver created a new model for American ethnic politics. He welded broad sectors of American Jewry into a political force struggling to establish a Jewish state, and he himself made a critical contribution toward that goal. Contemporaries described Silver as a stubborn, charismatic, proud, and militant leader. He identified with the Republican Party, but opposed the Cold War; he struggled for individual rights, social justice, and freedom of speech and acted to combat unemployment and in support of workers' rights. With the 1948 establishment of the State of *Israel, Prime Minister David *Ben-Gurion, a long-standing rival, ousted Silver from most of his official positions in the Zionist movement and the Jewish Agency. Recent research includes a special issue of the Journal of Israeli History 17:1 (1996) and Z. Segev, "The Jewish State in Abba Hillel Silver's Overall World View," American Jewish Archives 56 (2004): 94–127.

ZOHAR SEGEV

Simḥat Bat (joy of a daughter) is an evolving ritual to celebrate the birth of a daughter and her entry into the *covenant between God and the Jewish people. A simḥat bat, like the zeved ha-bat (gift of a daughter) ritual performed in *Sephardic communities, is an opportunity to welcome, name, and bless a new daughter among family members and friends. Unlike the ritual *circumcision (berit milah) on the eighth day of life initiating male infants into the community, Judaism has not previously had a ritual to celebrate the birth of a daughter, and a variety of contemporary liturgies have been developed. These ceremonies may take place at home or in the synagogue. For further reading, see A. Diamant, The New Jewish Baby Book (2005); see also LIFE-CYCLE RITUALS.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Simḥat Torah (literally, joy of the Torah). This *festival is observed on the 23rd of Tishri, the day after *Shemini Atzeret, by many Jews in the *Diaspora. In most Reform congregations (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA) and in *Israel, Simḥat Torah and Shemini Atzeret observances are combined and take place on the 22nd of Tishri, immediately following the conclusion of the seven days of *Sukkot. Simḥat Torah celebrates the completion and recommencement of the yearly cycle of public *Torah reading. The festival is derived from *Deuteronomy's injunction to read portions of the *Torah publicly (31:9–13). The joyous celebration begins in the evening when the final Torah portion is read in the *synagogue; this reading is followed by seven hakafot (circuits) with Torah scrolls around the synagogue sanctuary accompanied by dancing and singing. The following morning, the final portion of Deuteronomy and the first portion of *Genesis are read; traditionally, the reader of the final section of the Torah is called hatan Torah (*bridegroom of the Torah), and the reader of the first section of Genesis is known as hatan bereshit (bridegroom of the beginning). Simḥat Torah is also a time when some *synagogues offer a special welcome to children beginning their studies (see CONSECRATION). For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Fall Holidays (2009); and P. Goodman, The Sukkot/Simchat Torah Anthology (1988).

PAUL STEINBERG

Sisterhoods: See SYNAGOGUE SISTERHOODS

Sivan is the third month of the Jewish calendar; it is equivalent to May and/or June on the Gregorian calendar. The spring harvest festival of *Shavuot is celebrated on the 6th of Sivan.

Sobibór was a *Nazi death camp located about sixty-five miles northeast of Lublin. Like *Bełżec and *Treblinka, it was established following the 1941 Aktion Reinhard directive. The Nazis began the construction of Sobibór in the form of four small camps in March 1942 and opened it the following month. Sobibór III was the site of the three carbon monoxide asphyxiation chambers, mass graves, and the barracks for Jewish slave laborers. Commandant Franz Stangl and his staff murdered 250,000 Jews between April 1942 and September 1943 before transforming the site into a concentration camp. In September 1943 hundreds of Jewish inmates attacked their guards and escaped, although the SS subsequently captured about half of them. Himmler ordered Sobibór closed, and the site was turned into a farm. See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE, etc.

DAVID M. CROWE

Social Work: United States. Before the 1880s, when institutionalized social work began to displace traditional modes of relief, American Jewish institutions offered social services to their own communities. The roots of this arrangement lay in American traditions of voluntarism and self-help, Jewish traditions of *philanthropy and mutual obligation, and the hostility and missionary tactics that often greeted Jews when they relied on non-Jewish social services.

The massive immigration of Jews from *Eastern Europe at the beginning of the twentieth century called into question the efficacy of these traditional arrangements; at the same time, charity organization societies and other institutions were emphasizing individualized service, interagency planning, and social reform. A new generation of pre-suffrage, college-educated women extended maternalist notions of women's duty into activist work on behalf of the new urban, immigrant, industrial workers. Among these were many Jewish women, including members of the National Council of Jewish Women (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA), who worked specifically with Jewish immigrants, and *Lillian Wald, who opened the Henry Street Settlement House on *New York City's Lower East Side to provide health care to all local residents. Women and men worked to combat poverty and illness in sectarian and nonsectarian settings. They provided vocational guidance, small loans, direct relief, milk stations, *summer camps, mental health services, elderly care, and orphanages. These involvements often opened the door to other commitments, including public health and peace work, as well as campaigns for the rights of immigrants, labor (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT), women, and civil rights (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT).

The diversity of the Jewish community in terms of nation of origin, social class, and ideology (including *Zionism) initially made the centralization of Jewish social services impossible. *New York City's Kehilla was a short-lived centralization experiment, which established the School for Jewish Communal Work (1916–19). By 1920, many American Jewish communities had federations, which raised and disbursed funds to various agencies and later led communities in social planning (see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA). Jewish social workers could choose to join Jewish professional societies and contribute to Jewish social work journals and conferences.

In and outside of Jewish social service agencies, American Jews were deeply involved in the transition of social work to a scientifically trained profession, as the field gradually came to rely on specialized experts trained in psychology and casework. During the Depression, a growing cadre of professionals with knowledge of social inequities laid the groundwork for shifting some social welfare responsibilities from religious and ethnic communities to city, state, and federally supported agencies.

Since 1914, overseas aid has also been an important focus of American Jewish social agencies' fundraising and energies. American Jews' experiences with immigration proved crucial to their assistance to displaced victims of *World War II. The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (founded in 1881 by East European Jews) and the American Jewish *Joint Distribution Committee (founded in 1914 by Jacob Schiff and other well-established German Jews) provided funds, trained workers, and helped rescue and resettle European Jews.

Within the United States, Jews have wrestled with the question of Jewish content in social work training. The Graduate School of Jewish Social Work, open from 1924–40, combined technical training with Jewish learning. Today, several Jewish-sponsored institutions sponsor social work training schools. Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work recently dropped the word "Jewish" from its Jewish Social Work Forum to attract a "more diverse pool of contributors," even as it retained its commitment to reflecting Jewish social work interests. Despite the *secularist pull, sectarian Jewish institutions, with their focus on intracomunal needs, family services, poverty, and refugees (abroad and at home), continue to serve as important focal points of Jewish affiliation and group identity for social workers, board members, donors, and volunteers.

MARJORIE N. FELD

Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment Among the Jews of Russia (OPE). From 1863 until 1929, the Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment Among the Jews of Russia was the only officially recognized, *secular Jewish educational institution in *Russia. During the 1860s, its leaders encouraged Jews to integrate into Russian society; after a dormant period, the movement became revitalized in the 1880s and 1890s, thanks to its expansive educational program. The *Bolsheviks closed it permanently in 1929.

The society was organized by Baron Horace Günzburg and Abram Brodskii, wealthy Jews who viewed themselves as representing the Jewish masses before the tsarist government. Their behind-the-scenes activity appeared to bear fruit during the reign of Alexander II (1856–81), when the government reversed several of the most heinous policies of Nicholas I, including the military recruitment of underaged boys. Alexander II extended new reforms to Jews considered "productive" or "useful," giving Jews of the First Merchant Guild, Jews with diplomas from a Russian institution of higher education, Jewish army veterans, and Jewish artisans with proper certification the right to leave the *Pale of Settlement and take up residence in Russia proper.

The OPE initially devoted most of its budget to scholarships for Jewish university students; it wished to support individuals fluent in Russian, cultivated in the arts and sciences, and therefore worthy of equal rights. The society also subsidized special supplements in the Hebrew newspaper, ha-Zafirah. Like many supporters of the Haskalah* (Jewish enlightenment), early OPE leaders saw *Yiddish as one of the central reasons for the intellectual backwardness of Russia's Jews.

Approved in 1867, the Odessa OPE branch envisioned the total transformation of Jewish society. Eager to attain full integration and equal rights, they put their hopes in a translation of the Hebrew *Bible into Russian, which they hoped would have the same effect in Russia that Moses *Mendelssohn's *Bible translation had had in *Germany. At the same time the Odessa branch tried to satisfy the need for education among Jewish workers by offering unofficial courses. However, the Holy Synod refused to give permission for such a translation, and the government demanded that the branch stop giving instruction in Russian, maintaining that the courses spawned terrorism.

As a result of changes in the government after the attempt on Alexander II's life in 1866, the OPE entered a period of dormancy. Although the government did not shut down the organization entirely, despite Jacob Brafman's recommendation in his infamous Book of the Kahal (1868), the Odessa branch did close after the *pogroms in that city in 1871. However, during the 1870s, leaders in *Saint Petersburg kept a low profile, distributing the bulk of their small budget to scholarships.

In its later period, the OPE – active in Odessa, Moscow, Kiev, and Riga, in addition to Saint Petersburg – subsidized private Jewish schools where secular subjects were taught. Because boys attended religious schools, girls made up the majority of students; efforts to support schools with both Jewish and secular curricula were problematic. In 1906, Baron David Günzburg won the right to open a Jewish university, and the OPE opened a teachers' academy in Grodno in 1907; the society also moderated its policy on Yiddish in an effort to educate as many Jews as possible. The numbers of students in OPE schools and programs, although sizable, always remained lower than those in state-sponsored Jewish schools. In 1909, the OPE began publishing a journal devoted to issues of Jewish education in Russia, The Messenger of the Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment.

During and after World War I, OPE educated Jewish refugees with government and support from Jewish communities outside Russia. In Soviet times, facing Bolshevik opposition, the few remaining members congregated in the magnificent library in Saint Petersburg; Shaul Ginzburg and Israel Zinberg managed to publish several volumes of articles devoted to Jewish history. In 1929, the Bolsheviks closed the society and divided its archival treasures, giving part to a Jewish scholarly institute in Minsk and part to an institute in Kiev (see BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION).

Recent research on the OPE includes D. Fishman, The Rise of Modern Yiddish Culture (2005); B. Horowitz, "The Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment Among the Jews of Russia, and the Evolution of the St. Petersburg Russian-Jewish Intelligentsia, 1893–1905," Studies in Contemporary Jewry 19 (2004): 195–213; and S. Zipperstein, Imagining Russian Jewry: Memory, History, Identity (1999).

BRIAN HOROWITZ

Solomon is the son of *David and *Bathsheba (or Bathshua [1 Chron 3:5]) and the final king to rule over a *United Monarchy. The stories concerning Solomon are found in the books of *Kings and *Chronicles (the latter relies heavily on the former). Kings depicts Solomon, the tenth son of David, as an unlikely successor. Amidst the chaotic power struggles that characterize the end of David's reign, Solomon is represented as passive, chosen to be king rather than choosing to seek the throne. He attains his ascent, however, with the support of a powerful coalition, including his mother, the court prophet Nathan (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY), and leaders of the priesthood and the military (1 Kgs 1), who obtain the blessing of the enfeebled David (only in Chronicles is Solomon elected by *God). As such, Solomon's succession may be seen as a coup over Adonijah, David's eldest remaining son.

The book of Kings describes Solomon's reign as Israel's golden age of prosperity. He creates an efficient bureaucracy and enters into political and economic agreements with neighboring nations (most notably *Egypt and *Phoenicia) that enrich Israel and expand its influence. He also embarks on a series of building projects, culminating in the construction of the *Temple in *Jerusalem. In addition, Solomon receives wisdom from God for which he becomes renowned worldwide (see especially 1 Kgs 3:16–28, 10).

Nonetheless, Solomon and his kingdom fall from their glorious heights, ultimately leading to the dissolution of the United Monarchy after his death. According to Kings, Solomon causes this fall by his introduction of illicit religious practices, brought by his many foreign wives. Chronicles, in contrast, scrupulously avoids criticism of him, although its emphasis on David's role in planning the Temple may be an implicit criticism of Solomon (Brueggemann).

Regarding the historicity of Solomon, the biblical texts appear to derive from some apparently authentic sources (for example, 1 Kgs 4:1–19; see also the citation of the "Book of the Acts of Solomon" in 1 Kgs 11:41). Other elements, such as the frequent use of symbolic numbers and the story of the *Queen of Sheba, reveal that the narrative had aims other than historical. Further, the extent and prosperity of the United Monarchy may be exaggerated. Despite the purported majesty of Solomon's kingdom, no extant extrabiblical sources of the tenth century mention him or an Israelite monarchy. Recent research additionally suggests that some building projects attributed to Solomon were instead ninth-century products of the northern kingdom of *Israel (Finkelstein and Silberman). Elsewhere in the Bible, Solomon stands for the pinnacle of human wisdom (outside of some critical traditions; see Neh 13:23–27 and perhaps Deut 17:14–20). *Ecclesiastes, *Song of Songs, parts of *Proverbs (see BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE), and the Wisdom of Solomon (see APOCRYPHA) are traditionally attributed to Solomon. Scholarly consensus, however, finds no credible historical connections between the king and these books. In post-biblical tradition, Solomon becomes a writer of psalms in the Psalms of Solomon (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA). A noncanonical psalm found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls (11QPsAp^a) additionally provides the earliest attestation of what became a vibrant complex of Solomonic traditions – namely Solomon as exorcist and practitioner of esoteric or *magical arts – which was further developed in the Testament of Solomon (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA) and Sefer ha-Razim (Torijano; see MAGIC).

For further reading, see W. Brueggemann, Israel's Ironic Icon of Human Achievement (2005); I. Finkelstein and N. A.

Silberman, David and Solomon: In Search of the Bible's Sacred Kings and the Roots of the Western Tradition (2006); and P. Torijano, Solomon the Esoteric King: From King to Magus, Development of a Tradition (2002). SEAN BURT Soloveitchik, Joseph B. (1903–1993) was one of the greatest talmudists of the twentieth century, a prominent Jewish philosopher, and a leader of Orthodoxy (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX), especially in North America. Born in Pruzhan, he taught *Talmud for more than four decades in *New York City at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, affiliated with *Yeshiva University. He simultaneously served as the chief rabbinic figure in *Boston, commuting weekly between the two cities. A brilliant orator, “The Rav” influenced numerous leaders of American Orthodox Judaism. As a result of the *Holocaust, he broke from many traditionalist rabbis and family tradition and became a strong supporter of religious *Zionism, serving as honorary president of *Mizrachi, the religious Zionist movement.

Soloveitchik's talmudic method was that of the “Brisker” school, which implemented a mode of conceptual analysis pioneered by his grandfather, Rabbi Chaim Soloveitchik of Brisk (1853–1918). He held a PhD in philosophy from the University of *Berlin; in addition to his mastery of classic Jewish sources, he was broadly erudite in philosophy, Christian theology, science, and world literature. Soloveitchik especially engaged the writings of Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, Hermann *Cohen, Søren Kierkegaard, Rudolf Otto, and Max Scheler. His use of such material set him apart from many other Orthodox rabbinic authorities and greatly fortified a brand of Orthodoxy—generally known as “Modern” or “Centrist”—that embraces general culture. Soloveitchik's emphasis was on religious phenomenology and anthropology. Dominant themes in his work include dialectic, loneliness, suffering, and the power of *reason in the study of *halakhah. His two best known works are Halakhic Man (1944 [Hebrew]; trans. L. J. Kaplan, 1983), a depiction of the orientation of the halakhic scholar in neo-Kantian terms, and The Lonely Man of Faith (1965, 2006), an existentialist essay that depicts religious life as an oscillation between mastering nature and relating to *God in a *covenantal community. DAVID SHATZ

Soloveitchik, Joseph B.: Religious Thought. Soloveitchik's view of Judaism emphasizes the centrality of normative action (halakhah) and its study. Halakhic Man offers a phenomenology of this ideal human type by comparing it to scientific “cognitive man” and mystical homo religiosus: It highlights the intellectual rigor, quantitative orientation, and this-worldliness that “halakhic man” shares with the former and contrasts it with the otherworldliness, qualitative orientation, and subjectivity characteristic of the latter. Despite the importance of halakhah and its study, recent scholarship has demonstrated that Halakhic Man is not a self-portrait; Soloveitchik himself allowed more room for “religious” yearnings than Halakhic Man would.

U-Vikkashtem mi-Sham (And You Shall Seek; published in Hebrew in 1978 but drafted in the 1940s) explores the human relationship with God. He emphasizes the interrelationship between how human beings seek God in a wide variety of inquiries and experiences and how God confronts human beings through *revelation and *commandment. At the primitive stage, revelation, which demands surrender to the divine will, collides with the human yearning for autonomous religious fulfillment. In the higher stages, imitation and cleaving to God provide modes of relationship to God that overcome the contradiction. Engagement in halakhah and its creative study plays an essential role in this process.

Halakhic Mind (written in the 1940s and published in 1984) adds an epistemological foundation to Soloveitchik's thought, arguing on the basis of contemporary physics and philosophy for pluralism and the methodological autonomy of religious knowledge. Lonely Man of Faith (1965), the best known of Soloveitchik's works composed in English, contrasts majestic man (the couple created in Genesis 1), whose technology and culture establish dominion over the world, with the man of faith (Adam and Eve of Genesis 2) who seeks personal relatedness; God ordains and endorses both of these aspects of the human personality. “Confrontation,” written the year before, sketches a similar anthropology in setting guidelines for Jewish–Christian dialogue. Such dialogue was desirable in promoting ethical and social goals shared by the two religions, but not when the subject was the unique and incommensurable doctrines and experiences that distinguish each faith community.

Kol Dodi Dofek (The Voice of My Beloved Knocks [Song of Songs 5:2]), originally delivered as a lecture on Israel Independence Day 1956, is noteworthy for its rejection of traditional theodicy in favor of a halakhic orientation that stresses the practical imperative to respond to *evil. In this essay, Soloveitchik also proposes a theory of the dual nature of Jewish identity that encompasses the fate shared by all Jews and the sense of destiny defined by individual religious commitment.

Several important manuscripts, mainly from the 1950s, expand on these explorations of the human condition; they include Family Redeemed, Worship of the Heart, Out of the Whirlwind, and Emergence of Ethical Man. Other collections of essays and recorded material and unofficial sets of notes continue to appear. SHALOM CARMY

Song of Songs, the book of (Hebrew, Shir ha-Shirim), also known as “The Song of Solomon” and “Canticles,” is the fourth book of the *Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible, falling between the books of *Job and *Ruth. This book is one of the *Five Scrolls; it is traditionally recited in the *synagogue on the *Sabbath during *Passover.

The Song of Songs is an anthology of lyrical poems (see BIBLE: POETRY) of varying lengths, in which two lovers express their yearning for one another; they use bold metaphors and imagery from the worlds of nature and culture to create vivid emotional and sensual impressions. Unique among biblical books, the Song articulates the experience of erotic love between two humans; religious themes, the deity, and nationalism are altogether absent. Feminine voices are particularly prominent; the female lover has considerably more lines than her male beloved, and “the Daughters of Jerusalem” appear as a kind of recurring chorus.

Within the Bible, the erotic language and imagery of the Song resonate with charged passages from the prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY), notably *Hosea 2, *Jeremiah 2, and *Ezekiel 16, which use the language of romantic love to explore the nuances of the God–Israel relationship. Seen in the context of ancient literature, Song of Songs participates in a widespread ancient *Near Eastern and Mediterranean tradition of “secular” love lyrics, of which *Psalm 45 may also be an example. Passages from the Song resemble lyrics recovered from Sumer, *Babylonia, Ugarit (see CANAAN, CANAANITES), *Greece, and especially *Egypt. This book probably represents the finest surviving exemplar of what was once a widespread Israelite genre of writing.

Jewish (and Christian) tradition ascribes authorship of Song of Songs to King *Solomon, based on the invocation of his name in the first verse and a scattering of mentions in the text; most modern scholars, however, reject any Solomonic connection. Certain elements of the language are sufficiently archaic to support a pre-exilic dating and associations with the northern kingdom of *Israel, but other linguistic features, including Persian and Greek loanwords, typify late Biblical *Hebrew. The composite linguistic picture suggests that pre-exilic lyrics were redacted together into their current form during the *Babylonian Exile or post-exilic periods, with a resulting leveling of language.

Its nontheological and overtly erotic nature apparently led to controversy (genuine or rhetorical) over the Song's inclusion in the biblical canon, although the Greek, Latin, and *Dead Sea Scroll versions of the book are remarkably close to the *Masoretic text. However, by the early centuries of the Common Era, the Song of Songs had become prominent in *rabbinic and post-rabbinic exegesis. *Tannaitic sources indicate that Rabbi *Akiva (second century CE), the book's most vigorous champion, already understood the book to be an allegorical expression of God's love for Israel, arguing against others who may have regarded the book as no more than a collection of secular love songs (T. Sanhedrin 12.10). Far from being profane, the Song of Songs was, according to Rabbi Akiva, “the Holy of Holies” (M. Yadayim 3:5). Allegorical interpretation, in which the male lover is understood to be the deity and the female lover the community of Israel, transformed the Song into a powerful religious text while simultaneously giving Jewish *theology a deeply romantic, erotic vocabulary.

Over subsequent centuries, a rich and diverse exegetical tradition developed around the Song of Songs. As one of the Five Scrolls, the work has its own *midrashic anthologies (Shir ha-Shirim Rabbah and Shir ha-Shirim Zuta), produced by the Palestinian Amoraim. The Targum (*Aramaic paraphrase) of the Song, which was widely popular throughout the medieval Jewish world, retold the biblical book as a coded history of Israel from the time of Egyptian exile to the *messianic era. *Rashi's commentary likewise favors an historical interpretation, whereas Abraham *ibn Ezra composed a threefold commentary from philological, allegorical, and figurative perspectives. Synagogue poetry drew heavily on the Song; it became a central text for both Passover and *Shavuot liturgical poetry (see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]). Philosophical sources (particularly Neoplatonist) understood the woman to represent the soul of the individual. According to kabbalistic interpretations, the feminine speaker in Song of Songs is identified with the Shekhinah and her sefirotic* counterparts, such as the Sabbath; the Zohar itself opens with an exposition of Songs 2:2. Under the influence of medieval mystical practices, it became customary in many Jewish communities to recite the entire book or selected excerpts on Friday evenings as part of the Kabbalat Shabbat service (see SABBATH; SAFED). The romantic-erotic vocabulary of Shir ha-Shirim has exerted an enduring influence on the lexicon of Hebrew *poetry of all kinds to the present day.

LAURA S. LIEBER

Sororities: See FRATERNITIES AND SORORITIES: NORTH AMERICA

South Africa. Although the Dutch first claimed the Cape as a colony in 1652, using it as a strategic supply station on the sea route to *India, Jews only began to settle in southern Africa in the nineteenth century. Unlike its counterpart in the western hemisphere, the Dutch East India Company prohibited the settlement of those who were not Protestants. The legal basis for Jewish settlement was delayed until 1804 and only became ratified when *Britain captured the colony two years later. Over the next five decades, a trickle of Jews from Britain and the *German states settled in this distant colony. Because its economy was primarily agricultural, most Jews gravitated toward trade in the towns that spread from Cape Town into the hinterland. In the middle decades of the nineteenth century, they began to establish communal institutions, including the first *synagogue in Cape Town in 1841. The prospects of this small and tenuous anglicized community began to rise with the discovery of diamonds in 1867. Gold finds on the Witwatersrand two decades later completely transformed South African Jewry. Although only a small constituency in a vast Jewish migration out of *Eastern Europe, the 40,000 Jews who made their way to South Africa before the outbreak of *World War I were remarkably homogeneous, most hailing from the Kovno province in *Lithuania. Many settled in the new mining metropolis of Johannesburg, whereas others remained in Cape Town, their primary port of entry. In the countryside, Jews became a fixture in the rural economy, opening stores, operating as itinerant salesmen, supplying credit, and sending the harvest for sale to the cities. Although a minority of Jews became associated with organized crime in the unruly mining towns, the majority aspired to and attained respectability and middle-class status. They were aided in their upward mobility by their skin color: Jews were regarded as white and benefited from the advantages of racial privilege in an economy and society structured largely by race. Importantly for their political future, Jews gravitated toward the English-speaking population, which maintained a cultural and political affinity with Britain.

Clustered in the immigrant neighborhoods of Johannesburg and Cape Town, the new arrivals established their own synagogues, fraternal organizations, newspapers, cultural groups, and political organizations. They also brought an enthusiastic *Zionism that served as an important locus of communal identity and energy in an environment that encouraged ethnic nationalism and largely excluded Jews from mainstream political power. The South African Zionist Federation, established in 1898, also provided a vehicle to challenge the hold that the Anglo-Jewish elite continued to exercise on communal leadership. Despite some tensions between the Eastern European newcomers and the pre-existing community, the vast numerical preponderance of “Litvaks” and their economic success and rapid acculturation ensured that they soon took over the leadership of the key institutions of South African Jewry. Many of these institutions were modeled along British lines: South African Jews were officially represented by a Board of Deputies and ministered to by a chief rabbi. Although initially scornful of the lax and decorous Orthodoxy of their Anglo-Jewish counterparts, the Litvak community gradually adopted many of these same features. The Reform movement did not arrive in South Africa until 1933 and met substantial resistance (see JUDAISM: REFORM). In the first decade of the twenty-first century, it has still made only limited inroads into a community that is still overwhelmingly affiliated with *Orthodox congregations.

The decades between the world wars were deeply unsettling for South Africa and its Jewish community. Economic distress in the 1920s and 1930s led to a significant increase in vocal *antisemitism. The Quota Act of 1930 all but closed South Africa's doors to immigrants from Lithuania, although the act did enable the entry of about 6,000 German Jewish refugees between 1933 and 1939. Spurred on by a rag-tag assortment of organizations and extremists with fascist sympathies, the major Afrikaner political parties co-opted the "Jewish Question" as a central plank for political mobilization. Although the Jewish community enthusiastically supported the government's war effort, feelings about the Allied cause among the Afrikaner establishment were at best ambivalent and often hostile. Unsurprisingly the election victory of the leading Afrikaner political party in 1948 shocked South African Jewry. Although the National Party quickly abandoned its antisemitism and sought rapprochement, the Jewish community long remained nervous of the new government. This lingering apprehension underpinned the community's official neutrality to the government's policy of apartheid. The Board of Deputies strictly adhered to its traditional political neutrality into the 1980s.

For the most part, Jews limited their opposition to apartheid to support of rival political parties. Although the majority probably accepted the racial status quo, a significant minority became prominent in liberal and radical opposition politics. Heirs to an immigrant radical political tradition, they moved from trade union organization (and sometimes *Zionist youth movements) to the Communist Party. During the era of apartheid the broader Jewish community regarded this fringe minority with diffidence and concern.

The end of apartheid transformed the Jewish community's relationship with its radical fringe. A number of those exiled and imprisoned returned to prominent government posts. Since the 1990s, South Africa's embrace of multiculturalism has enhanced the standing of this prosperous community. A broad range of communal organizations and institutions continue to thrive. Johannesburg in particular has become the center of a Jewish religious revival, with fifty synagogues, seventeen small neighborhood prayer centers (shtieblach), and twelve Jewish day schools. However, the community's overall health is intimately intertwined with that of the broader society. Fears of crime and political and social instability continue to persuade many to emigrate. Since the early 1960s, emigration and a low birth rate have had a major demographic impact on the size and average age of the Jewish population. From a numerical peak of more than 120,000 in the early 1970s, the community, now heavily concentrated in Johannesburg and Cape Town, has declined to approximately 80,000 in the second decade of the twenty-first century. Recent scholarship includes R. Mendelsohn and M. Shain, The Jews in South Africa: An Illustrated History (2008); and G. Shimon, Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa (2003).

ADAM MENDELSON

South America: See LATIN AMERICA

Soviet Union. The Soviet Union (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics [USSR]) was created in the former Russian Empire in 1922 after a period of civil war that followed the 1917 Bolshevik revolution. Its first leader, Vladimir Lenin (d. 1924), was succeeded by Joseph Stalin who maintained leadership until his death (d. 1954). The Soviet Union formally dissolved in 1991 and was succeeded by the Russian Federation. For relevant entries, see BELORUSSIA; BIRO-BIDJAN; BOLSHEVISM; COMMUNISM; EHRENBURG, ILYA; HOLOCAUST; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION; PALE OF SETTLEMENT; RUSSIA; SAINT PETERSBURG; SHARANSKY, NATHAN; SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF ENLIGHTENMENT AMONG THE JEWS OF RUSSIA (OPE); SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989; TROTSKY, LEON; UKRAINE. Map 10

Soviet Union: Jewish Movement, 1967–1989. The *Bolshevik leadership in the early years of the Soviet Union viewed the *Zionist movement as bourgeois and reactionary. Moreover, they never recognized de facto the natural right of Soviet citizens to emigrate. Therefore, after the 1917 October revolution the Zionist movement was gradually suppressed. The 1948 establishment of *Israel aroused enthusiasm among Soviet Jews, and many hoped they would be allowed to move to the Jewish state. However, the government launched an *antisemitic campaign of unprecedented severity instead, which continued until Stalin's death in 1953.

The post-Stalin "thaw" was marked, among other things, by the first trickles of Jewish emigration to Israel. The presence of a large Israeli delegation at the 1957 Festival of Youth and Students in Moscow created a great stir among Jews. However, dozens of those who made contacts with Israeli delegates or Israeli embassy staff were punished with imprisonment.

Israel's victory in June, 1967 over the united Arab armies in the Six Day War roused national pride among Soviet Jews, led to a variety of Zionist endeavors, and increased Jewish alienation from the Soviet state, which supported Israel's enemies. In Leningrad, an underground Zionist youth organization was formed. It had a committee, a charter of its own, a network of ulpanim to teach Hebrew, and connections with Zionist groups in other cities. In Moscow, initiatives usually came from veteran Zionists, who had returned from prison camps. The total membership of the Riga Zionist groups exceeded 150. In Odessa there were two Zionist groups.

On June 13, 1967, Moscow student Yaakov Kazakov publicly renounced his Soviet citizenship and demanded to be allowed to go to Israel. Jews began to address collective appeals to Soviet and international organizations, demanding the right to emigrate, as stipulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. One appeal, to U Thant, Secretary General of the United Nations, was signed by 531

Georgian Jews. It ended with the words, “Israel or death!” A desperate demonstrative act of those refused exit visas was an attempt to hijack a small airplane and to fly it to Sweden. The operation was launched on June 15, 1970, by activists from Riga (see BALTIC STATES) and Leningrad (see SAINT PETERSBURG), and it was headed by ex-political prisoner Edward Kuznetsov and former military pilot Mark Dymshits. All the participants were arrested and sentenced to long prison terms, and Dymshits and Kuznetsov were sentenced to be executed. Only international protests led to the commutation of their death sentences to terms of fifteen years. Other trials followed, at which dozens of Zionists who had nothing to do with the hijacking were found guilty. After the hijacking attempt, the struggle for *aliyah emerged openly. On February 24, 1971, a large group of “refuseniks” from several cities held a demonstration in the reception room of the presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. This was followed by similar actions in *Lithuania, *Ukraine, *Belorussia, and Georgia. Some demonstrations attained their goals; others ended with arrests, as in the case of Moscow activist Ida Nudel who, on June 1, 1978, hung a placard from her balcony that said, “KGB, give me a visa to Israel.”

Reacting to increased western support for Soviet Jews and hoping that the Zionist movement would be weakened if “troublemakers” were allowed to leave, the Soviet government sharply increased the number of exit permits. In 1971, 12,900 Jews left but only after a long bureaucratic process, severe humiliation, and surrender of their Soviet citizenship; a further 31,900 left in 1972. In 1972, a law was passed requiring the departing Jews to repay the Soviet Union for the costs of their educations. However, the government had to backtrack when the U.S. Congress adopted the Jackson-Vanik Amendment (December 1974), linking the provision of most-favored-nation trade status with the *United States to Soviet permission for emigration.

Between 1969 and 1971, a majority of the veterans of the Zionist movement left the USSR. Thereafter, the struggle for aliyah was led by a new group who included acculturated Soviet intelligentsia.

Increased emigration options enabled more Jews to go to the United States and other western countries. One factor behind this phenomenon, known as “dropping out” (neshirah in Hebrew), was fear about life in Israel in the wake of the Yom Kippur War of 1973. Another was the agreement of the United States to grant ex-Soviet Jews refugee status, which afforded them special rights. Propaganda in the Soviet mass media, which presented Zionism as the incarnation of universal evil, also made Israel appear less attractive to Soviet Jews.

The Jewish movement in the Soviet Union evolved within the context of a growing dissident movement that taught Jewish activists ways to struggle against the regime. Some Jewish dissidents believed that a common struggle waged by all opposition forces would be most effective. Others worried that cooperation with other dissidents would lead to increased repression against the Jewish movement. This happened in the case of Anatoly (Nathan) *Sharansky, who was one of the most visible Zionist activists and dissidents. In March 1977, he was arrested and sentenced to thirteen years in prison on the charge of espionage. The international campaign to release Sharansky made his name a household word. Finally, in 1986, Sharansky was freed in exchange for a Soviet spy who had been arrested by the Americans.

By the mid-1970s, some movement activists decided to elevate the national consciousness of the assimilated Jewish intelligentsia by increasing the amount of activities related to Jewish culture. In addition to teaching Hebrew, cultural activities included staging amateur plays, organizing song festivals, maintaining underground Jewish libraries, publishing samizdat journals (underground publications), and holding seminars on Jewish culture. Amateur purimshpils (*Purim plays, which updated the biblical history of Mordecai and *Esther to make fun of the Soviet regime and its persecution of Jews) enjoyed considerable popularity. There was even an attempt, in December 1976, to hold an international scientific symposium in Moscow on prospects for Jewish culture in the USSR. However, the Soviet authorities declared the symposium “a Zionist provocation” and forcibly prevented it from taking place.

As mentioned earlier, in the 1970s, Jewish samizdat began to appear in the form of periodicals; the first one was Iton (Riga). The most serious publications devoted to Jewish culture, history, and thought were Jews in the USSR (Moscow, 1972–79) and the Leningrad Jewish Almanac (1982–89). The most widespread form of Jewish cultural activity was the teaching of Hebrew. In the early 1980s, there were a hundred Hebrew teachers in Moscow alone, with more than 1,000 students. Yuli Kosharovsky organized summer seminar/camps for teachers of Hebrew, and Alexander Kholmyansky and Yuli Edelstein coordinated ulpanim throughout the country.

The movement for emigration entailed serious expense. Support was needed for “Prisoners of Zion,” a designation for people who were fired from their jobs, as well as for reproducing samizdat, for providing kosher food for religious Jews, and for covering some of the expenses connected with emigration. To meet these needs, foreign aid, in the form of clothing packages, as well as money, was sent from abroad. The Israeli organization Nativ played a central role, distributing aid from the American *Joint Distribution Committee. Also involved were other foreign Jewish and non-Jewish organizations that fought for the rights of Soviet Jews. In North America, these organizations included the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry, the Union of Councils for Soviet Jewry, the New York Conference on Soviet Jewry, the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, the Academic Committee for Soviet Jewry, the Habad Lubavich Movement, and the Jewish Defense League. The Women’s Campaign for Soviet Jewry, “35,” was active in *Britain. All these organizations sent emissaries disguised as tourists who brought items that Soviet Jews could then sell. In response, the Soviet government used all means possible to halt foreign aid, including arresting tourists and confiscating items they were bringing to Soviet Jews.

1980–1989: The invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet army in December 1979 resulted in the curtailment of Jewish emigration. A long period of mass refusal of emigration requests began. The majority of refuseniks waited seven to nine years to emigrate, but some were denied permission to leave for fifteen or more years. After an applicant was refused an exit visa, it was impossible to return to normal Soviet life. Many people lost their jobs and were deprived of their means of survival. Young Jewish male refuseniks faced the prospect of being conscripted after being expelled from university. Many lost the most productive years of their lives, and their professional qualifications were wasted. Nobody knew how long his or her refusal would last; making meaningful plans was impossible.

At this time, when the refuseniks numbered in the tens of thousands, the importance of Jewish cultural activity increased. Grigory Kanovich and Lev Utevsky ran an especially popular seminar on Jewish history and tradition, which was given in people's homes in Leningrad. In May 1981 the police broke into a seminar meeting, dispersed the gathering, arrested the mathematician Yevgeny Lein, and charged him with attacking a policeman. Seminars on Jewish culture took place also in Moscow, Kharkov, Kishinev, and Riga.

Some refuseniks turned to religion. A majority of the newly religious Jews were affiliated with Ḥabad Ḥasidism, whereas others identified with the Lithuanian mitnagged* tradition. A Zionist-oriented religious movement known as Maḥanayim, a Hebrew word meaning "two camps," in reference to Moscow and *Jerusalem, was also established.

By the mid-1980s, the refuseniks had created the basis for an independent Jewish public, religious, and cultural life, which flourished during the 1990s. Although Mikhail Gorbachev proclaimed a new political course of glasnost (openness) in the spring of 1985, only in 1987 was aliyah renewed. By late 1989, almost all the long-term refuseniks and "Prisoners of Zion" had been allowed to emigrate. The government also legalized Jewish cultural, educational, and public organizations, although during the 1990s, the majority of Soviet Jews emigrated to Israel and the West.

Important studies include M. Azbel, Refusenik: Trapped in the Soviet Union (1981); H. Butman, From Leningrad to Jerusalem: The Gulag Way (1990); P. Buwalda, They Did Not Dwell Alone: Jewish Emigration from the Soviet Union 1967–1990 (1997); M. Gilbert, Jews of Hope (1984); E. Lein, Lest We Forget: The Refuseniks' Struggle and World Jewish Solidarity (1997); B. Morozov, Documents on Jewish Emigration (2002); and N. Sharansky, Fear No Evil (1988).

MICHAEL BEIZER

Spain, Christian. From its earliest appearance under *Roman rule, Jewish society in the *Iberian Peninsula was marked by a high degree of cultural integration. In the early Middle Ages, Spain came under the control of the Visigoths, Christians of Germanic origin. Although Jews became the target of royal persecution and attempts at forced conversion, they nonetheless remained a prominent segment of Spanish society. The successful Muslim invasion in the early eighth century changed the situation of the Jews once again (see SPAIN, MUSLIM) and led to a significant cultural flowering. However, after several centuries of *Islamic hegemony, the balance of power in the peninsula shifted back to Christian dominance as the Reconquista (reconquest) effort pushed southward in the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. At the same time, the intolerant rule of the *Almoravid Berbers in Muslim Spain led many Jews to move into Christian regions where they established communities in market towns, re-creating and extending many of the same roles as merchants, artisans, and civil servants that they had performed in Muslim al-Andalus.

The Jews of Christian Iberia were geographically and socially mobile, taking advantage of extensive royal protection and tax incentives, and establishing close ties with their Christian and Muslim neighbors. Despite Christian writings that caricatured Jews and attacked their religion, little effort was made to implement the segregation and legal restrictions suffered by Jews elsewhere in Europe. Wealthy *Sephardic merchants and courtiers imitated the postures of the Christian elite both in their dress and in their custom of taking Muslim concubines. This propensity toward social and cultural interaction with non-Jewish society provoked harsh condemnation from Jewish moral and spiritual leaders. The general permeability of social boundaries among Iberia's three religious groups also threatened to undermine the autonomy of Jewish *communal self-government. The willingness of many Jews to frequent Christian courts meant that their communal officials depended on royal intervention to buttress their control. These communities were often torn by internal strife that reflected and at times even exceeded that found in the dynamic and unruly frontier society in which they lived.

The reorientation of Iberian life away from *North Africa and the Middle East toward the increasingly vibrant cultural orbit of Christian Europe also transformed Jewish religious culture. Jewish scholars continued to pursue an Andalusí educational curriculum with its strong emphasis on practical halakhah, Greco-Arabic-oriented *thought (see SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL), and Arabic literary (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN) and *grammatical modes. Yet, beginning in the thirteenth century there was a distinct shift toward the cultural and intellectual trends of northern Europe. The Jewish centers of *France and *Germany had developed a strong tradition of *mysticism, ascetic pietism (see ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ), and elaborate forms of talmudic exegesis (see TOSAFISTS). Increased interaction among scholars from both sides of the Pyrenees led to a considerable expansion of Sephardic intellectual interests. Catalan rabbis Moses ben Naḥman (*Naḥmanides) and Jonah Gerondi studied in these northern academies and became major vehicles for their mystical and penitential ideals, while thirteenth-century German scholars, such as Dan Ashkenazi and *Asher ben Yeḥiel, and his sons, helped bring northern European learning to Castile. Increasing interest in mysticism among Iberian Jews can be seen in the proliferation of kabbalistic study circles (see KABBALAH) and in the production of the *Sefer ha-Zohar (Book of Splendor) in the late thirteenth century. This overall shift in religious and intellectual approaches provoked a virulent and protracted debate over the suitability of the study of philosophical texts, particularly the writings of *Maimonides. In the end, the Sephardic tradition of accommodation and amplification won out, and Kabbalah took its place alongside philosophical and talmudic study in the Hispano-Jewish academies.

Throughout the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, religious tensions between Jews and Christians manifested themselves in polemical literature, public disputations (see MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH–CHRISTIAN POLEMICS), and sporadic outbreaks of violence. Yet, such confrontation did little to alter the long-standing intercultural bonds and intracomunal factionalism that continued to characterize the daily life of most Jews. In 1391, however, this enduring paradigm of Iberian Jewish society suffered an unprecedented rupture. During the spring and summer of that year, Christian preachers helped ignite an outbreak of anti-Jewish riots that swept over the region. These attacks resulted in the murder of approximately one-third of Iberian Jewry and the forced conversion of another third. Intense missionary activity in the decades following the attacks augmented the numbers of these New Christians, or conversos*, and permanently altered the relationship between Iberian Jews and Christians. No social or religious mechanisms existed to facilitate the integration of the conversos into Christian society or to prevent their contact with Iberian Jewry. As a result, the fate of the Jews became bound up with that of the conversos over the course of the fifteenth century. Municipal and regional councils' increasingly vigorous attempts to restrict Jewish rights were closely tied to the calumny that Jewish blood made the conversos resistant to true Christianization and to the growing sentiment that the Jews actively fostered heresy among the New Christians. This latter accusation was made official by the Spanish Inquisition* and motivated the decision of monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella to expel their Jews in 1492. In 1498 the Catholic monarchs successfully lobbied neighboring Navarre to expel its Jews as well, but their efforts to exert similar influence over Portugal* produced very different results. Seeking to retain this valuable new community, King Manoel I chose to ignore the troubled history of the Spanish New Christians and in 1497 forcibly converted all of the Jews in Portugal. This momentous decision extended the debate over the conversos' religious identity and further complicated their relationship to both the Christian and Jewish communities.

Despite the decline in political fortunes during the fifteenth century, Jewish intellectual life continued to flourish and to display strong signs of Christian influence. Jewish preachers and moralists followed closely the arguments and methodological developments of their Christian counterparts, noting with envy the respect and honor that they were able to command. The last generation of Jews born in Iberia boasted a number of significant poets, philosophers, kabbalists, and exegetes. Among these exiles, Joseph Karo* represents the continued vitality of Sephardic legal codification and theosophical Kabbalah*. His great legal compendium, Beit Yosef, and its more popular digest, the Shulhan Arukh* (see HALAKHAH), represent a culmination of the medieval Hispano-Jewish religious program. Karo's work became the rock on which much of Jewish society was established for centuries to come.

For further reading, see J. Ray, The Sephardic Frontier: The Reconquista and the Jewish Community in Medieval Iberia (2006); Y. Baer, A History of the Jews in Christian Spain (1961); and B. Gampel, "A Letter to a Wayward Teacher," in Cultures of the Jews, ed. David Biale (2002). Maps 6, 7 JONATHAN RAY

Spain, Muslim. Between 711 and 1492 Muslims ruled all or part of the Iberian Peninsula*. Muslim Spain (known as al-Andalus in Arabic and Sepharad* in Hebrew) represented a unique enclave in medieval Europe where Muslims, Christians, and Jews coexisted, sometimes peacefully, but more often in strife. The quality and nature of this coexistence, which was known as convivencia, have been the subject of some dispute among scholars. The coexistence of the three communities was fragile as Muslim and Christian kingdoms fought among themselves and with each other. Jews were subject populations under both Muslims and Christians, sometimes serving as cultural and political mediators between warring and competing dynasties and regimes. As a result of the diverse religious and ethnic mosaic that comprised Andalusia, a shared culture that was noted for its sophistication, originality, and brilliance emerged. So dazzling was the civilization of the Caliphate of Cordoba and its successor states that al-Andalus is frequently depicted as a lost paradise in Arabic as well as Hebrew* literature. As the Christian reconquest of Spain advanced in the twelfth century, both Jews and Muslims lamented the loss of Muslim Spain in romantic and nostalgic terms.

The Muslim invasion of Spain in 711 represented a welcome respite for the Jews after decades of persecution and forced conversion under Visigothic Christian kings. Jews who had fled to North Africa* returned and reverted to Judaism, finding the dynamic Umayyad dynasty of Cordoba eager to exploit the skills of its many minorities in its newly conquered province. By the ninth century, Muslim Spain formed an integral part of a vast medieval Muslim commercial nexus that extended from the Atlantic Ocean all the way to Central Asia and the Indian Ocean. Jews of far-flung communities across the Mediterranean were united by trade and shared values, as Muslim civilization, cemented by the Arabic language, spread through these far-flung territories.

Jewish cultural development in Spain drew its inspiration from at least two sources. On the one hand, medieval Andalusian Jews strengthened their cultural and economic ties with Jewish communities in neighboring North Africa*, Muslim Sicily*, Palestine*, Egypt*, and Babylonia* (Iraq*). Through their correspondence with the ancient talmudic centers in Baghdad (Sura* and Pumbedita*) and their leaders (Geonim*), the Jews of Spain shared in the emergent rabbinic culture that would become the patrimony of much of world Jewry. At the same time, as the Jewish commercial and intellectual leadership came into contact with a worldly Arab elite, the Jews of Spain were profoundly influenced by local cultural developments. Arab culture was influenced by the courtly traditions of the court in Baghdad, which, in turn, drew heavily from older Persian models. At the same time, Arabic poetic models recalled the motifs of ancient pre-Islamic Arabian poetry. Andalusian Jews were exposed to both of these trends through their contacts in court circles, and they, too, were keenly interested in philology and linguistics, poetry* and literature*, and the ancient traditions of philosophy* and science* that now circulated in Arabic translation.

The Judeo-Arabic* tradition flourished until the mid-twelfth century. This tradition blended the special interests of Muslims, such as jurisprudence, philosophy, and theology, with Jewish rabbinic* and exegetical traditions (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY). Adapting the forms and motifs of the courtly Arabic literary traditions that they imbibed in the cultural centers of Cordoba, Granada, and Seville, Jews fashioned a unique poetic corpus that was both secular and religious; it was written in a rare Biblical Hebrew*. This combination of the secular and religious, as well as the enormous range of interests and areas of inquiry, has been the hallmark of Sephardic civilization.

In the early tenth century, the ruling Umayyad prince 'Abd el-Rahman III announced his independence from the Abbasid Caliphate in Baghdad and declared himself Caliph of Cordoba. His dazzling court housed entertainers, scholars, experts in the sciences, artists, and architects, as well as a council of physicians, in which a learned Jew, Ḥasdaï ibn Shaprut, soon came to the attention of the ruling monarch. An excellent physician who was gifted in languages, Ḥasdaï performed vital fiscal and diplomatic services for the Muslim ruler. At the same time, Ḥasdaï launched Spanish Jewry on an independent cultural and political course, surrounding himself with Hebrew poets and patronizing Judaic scholars. He also supported and defended beleaguered Jewish communities abroad, encouraged the emergence of a domestic school of rabbinic scholarship in Andalusia, and communicated with the Jewish king of the *Khazars in the Crimea. Ḥasdaï is often credited with launching a renaissance in Jewish learning in Spain and of setting Andalusian Jewry on the path of cultural independence from the rabbinic center in Iraq. He is also invoked as the prototype of Sephardic leadership. Soon, several cities in Spain emerged as magnets for poets and scholars, and the Hebrew academy of Lucena rivaled the talmudic academy of Cordoba. Patrons included the poet-statesman-warrior *Samuel ibn Naghrela ha-Nagid.

By the mid-tenth century, Muslim Spain had emerged as the home of a new and exciting Hebrew poetry. Imitating their Muslim counterparts in both poetic form and content and drawing on the linguistic studies of their North African co-religionists, Hebrew poets in the employ of Jewish courtiers began to emerge from anonymity. Among their many themes were songs on wine, the wine party, and friendship (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD). Philosophical musings and scientific observations were skillfully interwoven in their poetic verses. At the same time Hebrew poets wrote liturgical poetry that continues to adorn the Hebrew *prayer book and *High Holiday ritual (see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]). Among the most famous of the hundreds of poets were Solomon *ibn Gabirol, *Samuel ibn Naghrela (Samuel ha-Nagid), Moses *ibn Ezra, Abraham *ibn Ezra, and Judah *Halevi. The legacy of the Jews in Muslim Spain also extended into *science and philosophy, astronomy and *astrology, *grammar, and linguistics.

The golden era of Jewish life in Muslim Spain was short-lived. The Caliphate of Cordoba collapsed in 1006, and Andalusia was beset by devastating civil war. Jews fled Cordoba, hoping to find refuge and patronage in the small successor Berber kingdoms that flourished in eleventh-century Spain. The courts of the successor states (known as the taifa kingdoms) continued to pursue the earlier brilliant secular culture in Malaga, Badajoz, Saragossa, Granada, and more than a dozen other regional petty kingdoms. Yet the territory under Islamic rule on the peninsula was steadily contracting. After the fall of Toledo to Christian armies in 1085, Spanish Muslims hastily invited the *Almoravid Berbers of Morocco to assist in stemming the tide of Christian victories. In the atmosphere of mounting religious warfare and the First Crusade (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES), the Almoravids introduced harsh discriminatory legislation against Christians and Jews in their kingdom. As a result, the exodus of the Jews from Muslim to Christian Spain commenced. The Almoravids, in turn, were replaced in the mid-twelfth century by the still more fervent and fundamentalist Muslims, known as the *Almohads, who invaded Spain in 1146–47. Their campaigns were based on a fierce and zealous Islamic fundamentalism that included a policy of forced conversion of Jews and Christians. In the unfolding atmosphere of religious persecution and jihad, Jews fled Muslim Spain into Christian Spain en masse. At this juncture, the great medieval thinker Moses *Maimonides and his family fled Cordoba, wandering in Spain for several years until they found temporary shelter in Morocco. Although he spent most of his adult life in *Egypt, Maimonides always regarded himself as a product of Andalusia/Sepharad.

By the end of the twelfth century, only a small remnant of Jews remained under Muslim rule in Spain. With the fall of Seville to the Christians in 1248, Muslim Spain was itself reduced to a small enclave in the south with its capital in Granada. The center of gravity of Jewish life shifted to Christian Toledo in the kingdom of Castile, to Barcelona in Catalonia, and to scores of towns and villages. Although the Jews continued to cultivate the Arabic language and their former poetic arts, also serving as translators of Arabic classics into Castilian or Latin, their political and cultural destiny was now tied to the broader trends of western Christendom. Demands for greater intellectual conformity as well as a reappraisal of the formerly accepted philosophic traditions began to clash with the former Iberian culture. Both Jews and Judaism were now under attack, and memories of Muslim Spain dimmed in the new and challenging realities of Christian *Spain. The Sephardic civilization that accompanied the Jewish exiles from Iberia in 1492 was a unique amalgam of the cultural richness created by Jews in both the Muslim and Christian realms.

Important research includes J. Gerber, The Jews of Spain: A History of the Sephardic Experience (1992); and S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Genizah, 6 vols. (1967–93). Maps 5, 6 JANE GERBER

Spinoza, Baruch (or Benedictus in Latin; 1632–1677), one of the major philosophical figures of early modern Europe, was born in *Amsterdam, the middle son in a prominent *Portuguese Jewish family of moderate means. As a student in the community's Talmud Torah (school), his intellectual gifts could not have gone unnoticed by the congregation's rabbis. However, he was forced to cut short his formal studies at age seventeen to help run his family's importing business, and he never progressed to the upper levels of the curriculum, which included advanced study of *Talmud.

On July 27, 1656, Spinoza was issued the harshest writ of herem*, or excommunication, ever pronounced by the *Sephardic community of Amsterdam; this ban was never rescinded. Exactly what Spinoza's "monstrous deeds" and "abominable heresies" were alleged to have been remains unclear. Most likely, he was giving utterance to the radical ideas that would soon appear in his philosophical treatises.

To all appearances, Spinoza was content to leave Judaism and the community behind; he no longer harbored either faith or religious commitment. Within a few years, he left Amsterdam altogether. By the time his extant correspondence begins, in 1661, he is living in Rijnsburg, not far from Leiden. There, he worked on the Treatise on the Emendation of the Intellect, an essay on philosophical method, and the Short Treatise on God, Man and His Well-Being, an initial but aborted effort to lay out his metaphysical, epistemological, and moral views. His critical explanation of Descartes' Principles of Philosophy, the only work he published under his own name in his lifetime and which earned him widespread renown as an expositor of Cartesian philosophy, was completed in 1663, after he had moved to Voorburg, outside The Hague. He was also working on what would eventually be called the Ethics, his philosophical masterpiece. However, when he saw the principles of toleration in Holland being threatened by reactionary forces, he put that work aside to complete his “scandalous” Theological-Political Treatise, published anonymously and to great alarm in 1670. When Spinoza died in The Hague, he was still at work on his Political Treatise; it was soon published by his friends along with his other unpublished writings, including a Compendium to Hebrew Grammar.

In the Ethics, Spinoza denies the traditional *God of Abrahamic religions as an anthropomorphic fiction. God, he insists, is not endowed with any of the psychological or moral characteristics necessary for a providential Being. God does not will, judge, or deliberate; nor is God good, wise, and just. For Spinoza, God is nothing but nature – Deus sive Natura, “God or Nature,” in his famous phrase – the infinite, necessarily existing, eternal, and active substance of the universe. Everything else that exists is “in” God in the sense of being a part of nature (or a “mode” of the substance). There is nothing supernatural for Spinoza; whatever happens does so with an absolute necessity as a result of nature’s laws and processes. Even human beings, including their states of mind, are determined by natural causality; there is no freedom of the will. With this metaphysics, Spinoza also rejects both the divine creation of the world, because nature (as God) is eternal, and the possibility of miracles, because there can be no supernaturally caused exceptions to the order of nature.

Spinoza, moreover, denies that human beings are endowed with an immortal soul. There is an eternal aspect of the human mind – namely, the adequate ideas or truths that the virtuous person pursuing knowledge acquires in this lifetime; because these ideas are eternal, they do not come to an end with the death of the person. Yet this eternity of the mind, which is enjoyed in this world, must not be confused with the personal immortality of the soul in some world-to-come. Such beliefs in personal immortality are a pernicious and superstitious doctrine that fosters the harmful passions of hope (for eternal reward) and fear (of eternal punishment). The life of freedom and happiness is an active one guided by reason and knowledge, within which the power of the passive affects (emotions) is diminished.

In the Theological-Political Treatise, Spinoza argues that the *Bible is not literally the work of God or even of *Moses. It is a compilation of human writings that were passed down through generations and finally edited in the *Second Temple period (most likely, he surmises, by *Ezra). Thus, Scripture is not a source of theological, scientific, philosophical, or historical knowledge, but only conveys the various ideas intended by its authors. Taking issue with *Maimonides’ claim that the key to interpreting Scripture is *reason and demonstrable truth, Spinoza insists that its meaning should be investigated just as one investigates nature: through empirical study, inquiring into its authors, their language, and the historical, social, and political contexts in which they wrote. If there is a “divine” truth in Scripture, it is a simple moral one: Love your neighbor.

The ceremonial laws proclaimed in *Torah, Spinoza says, may have had a certain value and relevance in a particular historical period, as long as there was a *Temple. However, with the destruction of that central element of ancient *Israelite religion, the *commandments and the *halakhic structure that developed from them lost their raison d’être. Consequently, latter-day Jews are not obliged to observe them. Or, as one contemporary document describes Spinoza’s views on this matter, “the Law is not true.”

Finally, Spinoza denies that there is any metaphysically or morally interesting sense in which the Jews are God’s chosen people (see ELECTION). There are no differences among human beings in which one group might take any special pride: All are equally a part of nature. The only sense in which the Jews, for a time, enjoyed a particular divine “vocation” was during the era of ancient *Israelite kingship, when they enjoyed the good fortune of a secure and well-ordered polity for an extended period of time. Yet, this polity was not the supernatural result of some special divine favor, but only the natural consequence of wise laws.

STEVEN NADLER

Sports and Americanization. The belief that Jews do not take part in American athletic pastimes was once widespread. Such stereotypes took on *antisemitic dimensions in less tolerant times, when supposed “cowardly” Jewish inactivity on the sports field was linked to their alleged absence from the battlefield. Early-twentieth-century opponents to immigration from *Eastern Europe connected presumed Jewish athletic inactivity to fears that these newcomers would not make the necessary cultural adjustments to become true Americans. To counter such inaccurate attitudes, historians of Jewish American involvement in athletics responded by identifying Jewish sports champions. This tradition continues among some eighteen Jewish sports halls of fame and several online archives, websites, and periodicals that chronicle Jewish athletic prowess.

The American Jewish encounter with sports, however, transcends competitive achievements. It is also a useful lens for the examination of Jewish acceptance, adjustment, and accommodation to American life. Involvement in athletic activities and allegiance to professional sports teams played central roles for Jews in becoming Americans, at least for Jewish males. Author Chaim Potok reflects this phenomenon in the opening chapter of The Chosen, his 1967 novel about *Modern Orthodox and *Ultra-Orthodox youth in the 1940s, which is set at a baseball game between two *yeshivot. Moreover, the entrepreneurial history of American Jews also plays a role, when Jewish team owners and boxing promoters and managers, particularly in the early decades of the twentieth century, are included in discussions of how immigrants and their children emerged from poverty through initiative in high-risk *entertainment industries (see SPORTS: UNITED STATES entries).

Contemporary Jewish union organizers and sports agents are likewise part of Jewish involvement in American sports. They have protected and enhanced the rights and salaries of athletes; their victories for their clients have transformed the economics of these popular attractions. As members of the media, Jews are also major players in the evolution of sports within American popular culture; their reporting, photography, and involvement in radio and television *sportscasting, commentary, and production have helped shape sports journalism and enhanced popular interest in these pastimes.

Those hostile to Jews have exploited the long-standing Jewish involvement in these off-the-field activities to allege Jewish control of American sports, and some have also resorted to more invidious characterizations of Jews as corruptors of athletics pastimes. Auto manufacturer Henry Ford articulated the most outrageous group censure when he blamed the infamous 1919 "Black Sox" baseball scandal on a Jewish conspiracy (see SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL). In recent times, unfocused anger has often been directed at Jewish sports agents who are portrayed as controlling athletic labor unrest, even though they do not play the game.

Yet, the ever-increasing tolerance accorded Jews in contemporary America may also be reflected through the experience of sports. Most notable, perhaps, is the willingness of the majority of American sports fans to accept the *High Holidays as occasions when most Jewish athletes put their religion ahead of obligations to teammates.

Indeed, the conflicting demands of sports and religious practice are emblematic of Judaism's encounter with America. Of all the challenges to personal and religious identity that America posed to immigrant Jews and their children, none was more daunting than athletics. For most elders, sports and recreation remained a worthless frivolity, even if they offered health benefits. In contrast, the immigrants' children clearly understood that participation in athletics and some degree of knowledge about and enthusiasm for professional sports were fundamental American activities. Battles over the centrality of sports were a major source of intergenerational conflict. For many parents, practices and games on Friday nights, Saturdays, and Jewish *festivals, which lured children away from the *synagogue and the family table, were a particular crisis. Nonkosher (see DIETARY LAWS) training foods also undermined faith obligations. Sports forced youngsters to choose between Judaism and athletics, and generally, the secular pursuit won. Yet, forward-thinking rabbis also attempted to mitigate athletics' impact on their communities. From the Temple Center initiatives of Reform rabbis in the 1890s through the Synagogue Center efforts starting in the 1910s, and down to Jewish Community Centers of the present day (see UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTERS), sports facilities have often been integrated into sacred spaces to indicate that Judaism and athletics are not inimical. These efforts are emblematic of a traditional faith's reconciliation with the modern world. No other modern Jewish community has used the "come to play, stay to pray" strategy as extensively as American Jews. For further reading, see J. S. Gurock, Judaism's Encounter with American Sports (2005).

JEFFREY S. GUROCK

Sports: Israel. Sports, which have been a major facet of Israeli life for more than a century, have both shaped and reflected individual and national aspirations. Positive attitudes toward competitive and recreational athletics overcame long-held cultural traditions and helped create a new Jewish physical self-image. Sports continue to serve as a unifying force for the young nation and embody Israel's ideals. Despite political rivalries, an arduous road to international acceptance, and an Olympic Games massacre, sports have become a passion, an industry, and a political force in Israeli society.

Although individual sporting activities took place in *Palestine for many years, organized sports emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century in physical education and self-defense classes in schools. In 1906, Russian olim (immigrants) formed the first sports associations: the Rishon Letzion (later renamed Maccabi, after the liberation fighters), Yaffo, and the Bar Giora Yerushalayim. Within a few years, there were ten branches of Maccabi, combining sports with Hebrew study and cultural activities. In 1910, a sports festival in Rehovot attracted more than a thousand participants. Soccer matches began to be held with Turkish and Arab students, and in 1912 regular soccer tournaments began to take place. After the establishment of the *British Mandate following World War I, the number and quality of sporting events increased. The Hapoel (the worker) and Beitar (named for the site of the last stand in the Second *Jewish War against *Rome) associations were formed in 1924. The desire to strengthen ties with *Diaspora Jews inspired the creation of the Jewish Olympics, the *Maccabiah, whose first games in 1932 (the 1,800-year anniversary of *Bar Kokhba's revolt) attracted 390 athletes representing fourteen nations and were enthusiastically embraced by the *Yishuv.

Sporting competitions often became sites for expressions of anti-British sentiments and nationalistic rallies, as well as for internecine political rivalries. The importance of sports in demonstrating Israel's independence, place in the world of nations, pride, and integration of Jews from many parts of the world, was exemplified in September 1948, when a national soccer team toured the United States to raise funds and support, and in 1953, when Israel placed fifth at the European basketball championship in Moscow, in front of Jewish fans. In the ensuing years, sports increased in popularity, with regular classes and "sport badge" trials in schools; government-funded programs and facilities; the founding of the Wingate Institute for physical culture, teaching, and research; and some success in international competitions, mostly in the Asian games, and later at the Olympics. The Maccabiah games held every four years remained a popular event, although noted more for encouraging aliyah than for impressive results.

At the 1972 Munich Olympics, eleven members of the Israeli delegation were murdered by "Black September" terrorists. The atrocity, its mismanagement by German police, and the resumption of the games after only a day's hiatus all served to reinforce Israeli perceptions of world apathy and the need for self-reliance. It is a lingering wound.

As support for sports gradually increased, to the point where they became essential to Israeli society, the status of teams and players changed from amateur to professional. Sports, especially soccer, served as a harbinger and reflection of deep societal changes. These changes included the integration of non-Jews into national teams, the increasingly critical scrutiny from a greater number of media outlets, the passing of team ownership from political organizations to businesspeople and foreign oligarchs (to gain respectability and political legitimacy), the free transfer of players, and a widening gap between wealthy teams and the rest. In reaction, teams managed and owned by fans emerged, such as Hapoel Katamon FC (soccer) and Hapoel Ussishkin BC (basketball), which aimed once again to represent their communities.

Several unique historical circumstances and developments have shaped Israeli sports: a large military budget that leaves few funds for nonsecurity concerns; the universal draft, which has sometimes delayed the development of promising athletes; a poor organizational base; and the desire to create a “new Jew,” strong in body and spirit. In the 1920s, religious authorities began voicing heated opposition (although some, including Rav *Kook, viewed sports favorably) and fought, sometimes physically, against holding sporting events on the *Sabbath.

Politics too has had a strong impact, as parties and ideological blocs battled on the playing field. Maccabi, Hapoel, Beitar, and Elitzur represented the liberal center, labor, the right, and religious *Zionism, respectively. From their inception, these associations often refused to compete against each other, and when they did, violence was common. Statehood in 1948 led to the formation of unified federations and leagues, but until the mid-1960s, under the “fifty-fifty system,” all teams, delegations, and organizations were split equally between Maccabi and Hapoel. Several times the arrangement collapsed, and rival leagues were created until the courts intervened. With the rise of the right after the election of a Likud government in 1977, Beitar Jerusalem became the most popular soccer team, and its identification with *Mizrahim (Jews of Middle Eastern origins) exemplified the changing power dynamics in the country.

Israel’s relations with the Arab world have had a detrimental effect on its international sports activities. Until the mid-1940s, Jewish teams competed amicably with Arab counterparts in local leagues and with representatives of neighboring nations, including the Egyptian Army team. After independence, Israeli athletes and teams were tossed around and migrated among various European and Asian sports federations, sometimes being denied participation entirely. After the 1967 Six Day War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS), Muslim and Eastern European countries boycotted competition with Israeli sports teams, culminating in the country’s 1982 expulsion from the Asian sports federations. For several years, with the exception of its basketball team, which remained in the Europe federation, Israeli teams were assigned to the Oceanic group – an anomaly that enabled Israel to advance, for the first and only time, to the World Cup, but inhibited progress because of a lack of competition. After the collapse of the Soviet bloc, Israel joined the Europe federation, where it faced stiffer competition but also a chance to improve. The 1993 Oslo peace process enabled limited but promising ties with Arab players and teams, but these prospects were dashed when bloodletting resumed.

Immigrants played a special role, often elevating the level of competition. In the 1930s, many Maccabiah participants chose to remain in the country rather than return to Europe, thus helping advance athletics, particularly soccer. In the early years of the state, *Eastern European world champions Agnes Keleti (gymnastics) and Angelica Rozeanu (table tennis) raised the bar, as did several gymnasts, high jumpers, and swimmers from the former USSR in the 1990s.

Israel first participated in the Olympic Games in 1952, when diver Yoav Ra’anan placed ninth, and has done so since, except for the 1980 Moscow games, when it joined a western boycott. For decades, results were poor but enthusiasm high. In the 1988 Seoul Olympics, Yoel Sela and Eldad Amir (sailing), who were headed for a certain medal but declined to sail on the last day of the competition because it coincided with *Yom Kippur, were hailed for upholding Jewish tradition over winning. After that, however, winning became a national obsession, and increased funding and training finally brought the desired results. Israel’s first medals came in the 1992 Barcelona games, when Yael Arad and Oren Smadja won silver and bronze medals, respectively, in judo. Only one Israeli has ever won a gold medal: windsurfer Gal Friedman (whose first name means “wave”) at the 2004 Athens games. Another windsurfer, Shahar Zubari, has won a bronze, as have kayaker Michael Kalganov and judoka Arik Ze’evi. These athletes also excelled at world and European championships, as did sailors Shimshon Brukman, Eytan Friedlander, Zefania Carmel, and Lydia Lazarov.

Tennis, too, has produced world-class performers: Shlomo Glickstein, Amos Mansdorf, Anna Smashnova, and Shahar Peer were ranked at various times since the 1980s among the world’s top twenty players. In track and field, such achievements were rare, with the exception of sprinter David Tabak in the 1950s and Esther Roth-Sahamorov, who ruled Israeli track for two decades, starting in the late 1960s. Her finest moment came in the 1976 Montreal Olympics, where she placed sixth in the 100-meter hurdles, four years after her coach, Amitzur Shapira, was murdered at Munich. In the 1990s, pole vaulter Alex Averbuch shone.

Men’s soccer, Israel’s most popular sport, originated during late *Ottoman rule. The Palestine Football Association was established in 1928, and a league comprising British, Jewish, and Arab teams debuted in 1932. Although there was not yet a state, a national team was formed in 1934; its first games were pre-World Cup defeats to Egypt, 4–1 and 7–1. The 1956 pre-Olympic tournament with the *Soviet Union was a historic milestone for soccer and the nation. The games galvanized the identification of Soviet Jewry with the young state and were seen as both a call to open the gates to immigration and a part of the millennium-long battle against the goyim (nations), as expressed by popular poet Natan Alterman (see POETRY, MODERN HEBREW). The two losses did not alter these views. The national team’s greatest successes came in a six-year span. It won the Asian Nations Cup (1964), reached the 1968 Olympic tournament’s quarterfinals, and in the 1970 Mundial played to ties with Sweden and with Italy, the finalist. In the new millennium, the national team and the youth team have achieved respectable results, and Maccabi Haifa and Hapoel Tel Aviv have done well in European tournaments. Israel’s top footballers have become cultural icons, with goalie Yaakov Chodorov, and Mordechai Spiegler, Eyal Berkovich, Chaim Revivo, and Yossi Benayoun (the latter three played well in the English and Spanish leagues) leading the way.

Basketball, second only to soccer in popularity, has been the most successful sport, with its greatest achievement the silver medal won in the 1979 European Championship of Nations. In Israel’s first two decades, the league was ruled by the Hapoel and Maccabi teams of *Tel Aviv, but since the late 1960s, Maccabi has won all but two championships, at one point having twenty-three consecutive undefeated seasons. Bolstered by the best local players, new immigrants, and American players, Maccabi Tel Aviv became "the Nation's Team," winning the European champion title five times since 1977. Israel's greatest basketball stars – center Tanchum Cohen-Mintz and two dynamic guards, Tal Brody and Miki Berkovich – played for Maccabi. New Jersey-born Brody, an "All American" who immigrated in 1970 and immediately led his team and the nation to success, became known for his cry, "We are on the map," after defeating the Russian Army team in 1977, at a time when the USSR aided Israel's enemies. Berkovich, a superb clutch player, won nineteen championships and two European cups and led the national youth team to fourth place in the European championship.

Women athletes have kept pace with men, despite facing ongoing discrimination in funding, having fewer coaches and facilities, and receiving no more than 5% of all sports media coverage. Basketball is first in participation and popularity, with the leading teams being Elitzur Holon, Elitzur Ramla, and A. S. Ramat Ha-Sharon. Ramat Ha-Sharon, which is owned, run, and coached by women who are strong advocates for women's rights, reached the European Ronchetti Cup finals. Top national players included Anat Draigor, who led her Holon team to sixteen championships, and Limor Mizrahi and Shay Doron, who played briefly in the powerful WNBA league. Although a women's soccer league and a high school league have formed, and star Sylvie Jian has attained success abroad, female soccer players are still ignored or mocked. In response to legal challenges, Israel's Supreme Court determined that municipalities must increase funding for women's sports, but the national sports bodies, in which few women hold executive positions, still devote, on average, eight times more funding to men's teams.

Sports are popular in Arab communities, and Arab athletes represent the country in international competitions, with boxer Johar Abu Lashin winning the IPC world light heavyweight title. Rifat Turk, the first Arab footballer on the national team (and later deputy mayor of Tel Aviv), was followed by several others. Often they scored match-saving goals, but nonetheless were criticized for not joining in singing the national anthem. Teams representing Arab towns (with Muslim, Christian, and Jewish players who get along well) have reached the premier league, and Bnei Sakhnin won the State Cup in 2004; its elated fans waved Israeli and Palestinian flags. However, at times of heightened political tensions, anti-Arab feelings were expressed in stadiums and occasional fan violence erupted. Sports may help not only in establishing minority identity but also in serving as an "integrative enclave," with participants and fans identifying with the state. A number of projects have used sports to build bridges between Jews and Palestinians (Israeli citizens as well as those in the territories), with the Peres Center for Peace taking a leading role.

Israel excels in paraplegic sports; many athletes are former soldiers who were injured in battle. In this arena, Israelis have set many world records and won hundreds of Olympic medals, notably by basketball player and four-time Olympic table tennis champion Barukh Hagai and swimmer Karen Leibovitz.

In addition to competitive sports, sport amami (the peoples' sports) – including the three-day Jerusalem Hike, the Mount Tabor Run, and the swim across the Sea of Galilee – are yearly events drawing thousands of participants of all ages and abilities. The popularity of sports is reflected in the establishment of a special government sports ministry and in the large number of cultural works devoted to it. Writers from *Bialik and Berdechevsky, through Pen and Shlonsky, and up to Gouri and Grossman, have described games and often participated in them (see LITERATURE, HEBREW entries; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW). Among a number of films that successfully blend sports, history, and art are Cup Final, which deals with soccer and the Lebanon War, and Gloves, about boxing in 1930s Tel Aviv.

In 1997, during the Maccabiah opening ceremonies in Tel Aviv, four Australian athletes marching on a bridge over the Yarkon River were killed and sixty-five others were injured when the bridge collapsed. The disaster was widely seen as a symptom of official mismanagement and a symbol of the failure of the Zionist dream, which the games embody. Yet, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, sports are more popular than ever in Israeli society.

For further reading, see Y. Galily and A. Ben-Porat, eds., "Sports, Politics and Society in the Land of Israel: Past and Present," Israel Affairs 13(3) (2007); H. Harif and Y. Galily, "Sports and Politics in Palestine: Football as a Mirror Reflecting the Relations between Jews and Britons," Soccer and Society 4(1) (2003): 41–56; H. Kaufman, "Jewish Sport in the Diaspora, Yishuv, and Israel: Between Nationalism and Politics," Israel Studies 10(2) (2005): 147–67; and T. Sorek, Arab Sport in a Jewish State: The Integrative Enclave (2007).

ALON RAAB

Sports, United States: Baseball. Baseball has been played by Jews since record keeping began after the *Civil War. Lipman "Lip" Pike, son of Dutch Jewish immigrants, was a power-hitting outfielder who played on some of the first professional barnstorming teams. A member of the St. Louis team in 1876, which was the inaugural season of the National League (NL), Pike established a Jewish presence from the beginnings of what is now known as Major League Baseball (MLB). Jacob Pike, his brother, was an umpire who officiated professionally in the 1870s. The number of Jewish players active during the formative period is unknown, as athletes commonly hid their identities to avoid *antisemitic reactions on the field and restrictions in public accommodations when traveling.

In 1919, Ty Cobb of the Detroit Tigers, an outspoken racist, ended the career of Jesse Baker (Michael Silverman) of the Washington Senators by spiking the rookie shortstop in the arm on learning he was Jewish. Among those who eventually revealed themselves as Jews were Klondike Kane (Harry Cohen), who pitched for three MLB teams before 1907, and Henry Bostwick (Lifschitz) of the 1915 Boston Red Sox. Barney Peltz of Farmington, Missouri, pitched for the St. Louis Browns of the American League (AL) in 1903 and was known as "the Yiddish curver." George Stone, an outfielder from Lost Nation, Iowa, was the first Jew to win a MLB title, hitting .358 for the Browns in 1906. Pitcher Erskin Mayer, a Georgian, signed with Philadelphia in 1912 and won twenty-one games for the Phillies in their 1915 championship team. The Jewish presence in baseball was noted by Irving Berlin in a 1913 song, "Jake, Jake, the Yiddish Ballplayer." Songwriters Jack Norworth and Albert Von Tilzer (Gumbinski) composed "Take Me Out to the Ballgame" (1908), which remains the game's unofficial anthem.

Among Jewish entrepreneurs active in organizing the sport were Aaron Stern, founding owner of the Cincinnati Reds, and Barney Dreyfuss, who bought the NL Pittsburgh Pirates in 1900. In 1903 Dreyfuss proposed what became the "World Series," launching the modern era of baseball; he was honored in 2008 with a special election to the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, New York.

Jewish participation in baseball drew opposition, especially after the 1919 "Black Sox" scandal, in which eight Chicago White Sox were banned from MLB for "fixing" the World Series in return for bribes from gamblers, most prominently Arnold Rothstein. In 1923, Collyer's Eye, a sports magazine, reported that Sammy Bohne (Cohen) of the Reds conspired with gamblers to affect the outcomes of games. The Reds filed a libel suit, clearing Bohne's name. Henry Ford's Dearborn Independent, in a 1921 editorial, "The Jewish Degradation of Baseball," accused "the Jews" of turning "an American outdoor sport" into "vaudeville" for the sake of "money, money, money."

Charles Solomon "Buddy" Myer of the Washington Senators, son of an Ellisville, Mississippi, textile merchant, was the first Jewish MLB star. An infielder who played seventeen seasons (a standing career longevity record for Jewish players), Myer led the AL in stolen bases in 1928, won the batting title in 1935, and posted a .301 lifetime average. Morris "Moe" Berg, Myer's teammate for several years in Washington, was another of the relatively few college graduates then in MLB, completing a Princeton degree in languages and a Columbia law degree before signing with the White Sox in 1925. Berg had a long and undistinguished career as a catcher. In 1934, he was mysteriously named to a special team of superstars (including Babe Ruth and Jimmy Foxx) for an exhibition tour of Japan. It was later revealed that Berg had been recruited by the State Department to photograph Japanese military sites. Retiring from baseball in 1939, he took up espionage full-time, completing overseas missions during *World War II.

The first bona-fide Jewish baseball superstar was Henry Benjamin "Hank" Greenberg, the son of a Romanian Jewish immigrant, who grew up in the Bronx (*New York City). Playing all but his final season with the Detroit Tigers, Greenberg hit 331 home runs (despite missing four seasons to serve in the wartime Pacific) and had a lifetime batting average of .313. He was the AL Most Valuable Player (MVP) in 1935 and 1940, leading the Tigers to World Series victories both seasons. Greenberg was harassed through much of his career with antisemitic taunts from players and fans. His refusal to play on *Yom Kippur was a model of behavior for future players, including Sandy Koufax and Shawn Green. Greenberg was the first Jewish player elected to the Hall of Fame (1956).

Sandy Koufax, a Brooklyn native, was the greatest Jewish pitcher (perhaps the greatest pitcher) to play the game; he joined the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1955, accompanying the team to Los Angeles in 1957. His impressive career statistics – four no-hitters (including a perfect game), a 2.76 lifetime Earned Run Average (ERA), and 2,396 strikeouts – do not do justice to the speed of his fastball or the intensity of his hero worship among Jewish baseball fans. He was the youngest player ever inducted into the Hall of Fame. Al Rosen, third baseman for the Cleveland Indians (1947–56), led the AL in home runs twice and batted in more than a hundred runs for five consecutive seasons. A four-time All-star, he was the first player ever to be selected unanimously as AL MVP (1953). Hank Greenberg, then general manager of the Indians, mentored Rosen for a career as a baseball executive. Rosen eventually served as president of the Yankees (1979) and San Francisco Giants (1985–92).

Of the many Jewish executives and owners in MLB during the second half of the twentieth century, Allan H. "Bud" Selig was probably the most influential. He bought the Seattle Pilots in 1970 and transplanted them as the Milwaukee Brewers. In 1992, baseball owners appointed Selig as acting commissioner. In 1998, after selling the Brewers, Selig formally assumed office. He is the first Jewish baseball commissioner.

For further reading, see B. A. Boxerman and B. W. Boxerman, Jews and Baseball (2007); P. Levine, Ellis Island to Ebbets Field: Sport and the American Jewish Experience (1992); G. B. Kirsch, O. Harris, and C. E. Nolte, eds., Encyclopedia of Ethnicity and Sports in the United States (2000); and S. A. Riess, Sports and the American Jew (1998).

DAVID MARC

Sports, United States: Basketball. In 1891 Dr. James Naismith devised the game of basketball for the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) school in Springfield, Massachusetts, as an athletic indoor winter activity. Among the first known Jewish players was Frank Basloe (1887–1966), an immigrant from *Hungary, who grew up playing basketball in Herkimer, New York. Basloe made his mark on the sport as an organizer and promoter of professional barnstorming teams (1903–23) and later as an executive with several leagues. Beating the bushes for talent, Basloe raised teams that traveled the northeast quadrant of the country, challenging locals wherever Basloe could secure facilities and helping popularize the game. Basloe, who used basketball profits to capitalize a real estate business, endowed Herkimer's public library and helped found its synagogue.

Much Jewish basketball history took place in *New York City and *Philadelphia, where universities had eagerly adopted the sport because of its modest spatial demands at a time when Jewish enrollments were increasing. As with collegiate football, Jewish Ivy League students sometimes pursued basketball to counter *antisemitic stereotypes. The first known Jewish intercollegiate player, Henry Hart Elias at Columbia University (1901–03), was elected team captain as a senior. Another Columbia student, Samuel Melitzer, was the first Jewish player named to an All-American basketball team (1909). New York University, City College of New York, St. John's University, and Long Island University all became intercollegiate basketball powers with Jewish players on their rosters.

In Philadelphia, the University of Pennsylvania (Penn), Villanova University, and Temple University produced notable Jewish players and coaches. Michael Saxe starred on Penn's first Ivy League championship team in 1908 and became Villanova's first head coach (1921–26). Emanuel "Menchy" Goldblatt, a Penn All American in 1927, was a ball handler known for his stalling ability, an important element of the game before the introduction of the shot clock. Goldblatt was founding basketball coach and athletic director at Philadelphia Textile Institute (now Philadelphia University).

Mike Bloom, a 1938 All American, led Temple to its first National Invitational Tournament (NIT) championship and played professionally. Temple's Samuel Cozen (1929–30) began a distinguished Philadelphia coaching career at Overbrook High School, where he taught fundamentals to Wilt Chamberlain. As head coach at Drexel University (1953–68), he won eleven Mid-Atlantic Conference titles, with a career record of 230–94.

Harry Baum, an Austrian-born Jew who never played competitive basketball, was a pivotal figure in the sport's Jewish American history. A superb lacrosse player, Baum was a doctoral candidate in electrical engineering at Columbia when he began coaching immigrant Jewish boys at the University Settlement House. Beginning in 1906, Baum coached a youth team, the Bizzy Izzies, composed of Jewish boys who could not meet weight limits for public school teams. Baum designed an offensive strategy for the Izzies, while teaching fitness and proper nutrition; his team dominated the "midget" division of settlement house youth basketball and produced a half-dozen noteworthy basketball pioneers. Guards Barney Sedran (Sedransky) and Marty Friedman had long professional careers, sometimes playing for the same teams, including the New York Whirlwinds (1920–21), where they became known as the "Heavenly Twins." During World War I, Friedman played for the U.S. Army's American Expeditionary Force team, which introduced basketball to Europeans. Sedran and Friedman were among the first in a tradition of star "Jewish guards," known for playmaking, ball control, and outside shooting. Both were inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame. Another Izzie veteran, Lou Sugarman, was among the first Jewish students to win a collegiate athletic scholarship, accepting an offer from Syracuse University in 1908. Sugarman played professionally but, like many of his contemporaries, hedged his career options by earning a dental degree in the off-season. He was known to stop in the middle of a game to respond with his fists to an antisemitic remark from an opponent, fan, or teammate. Izzie veterans Ira Streusand and Jake Fuller (Furstman) played together for CCNY. Streusand, the school's first All American (1908), was so accurate from the foul line that he is sometimes cited as a factor leading to elimination of an early rule allowing a team to designate any player to shoot its free throws. Streusand and Fuller turned professional in 1911, joining Newburgh of the Hudson River League. Among their teammates was Joseph "Gid" Girsdanský, son of Max Girsdanský, a founder of the Socialist Party, U.S.A., and an NYU star who had helped the Violets to an undefeated record in 1908.

In 1919, Nat Holman, a twenty-three-year-old graduate of NYU, took over as basketball coach at CCNY, which subsequently emerged as a national basketball power, fielding a succession of Jewish All Americans: Louis Farer (1925), Pinky Match (1925), Moe Spahn (1932), Mo Goldman (1934), Bernard Fliegel (1938), Red Holzman (1942), and Irwin Dambrot (1950). The Beavers were the only team in collegiate basketball history to win both the NCAA and NIT post-season tournaments in a single season (1949–50), a feat that can never be repeated because of subsequent rule changes. Holman refused to adhere to racial exclusion agreements, which led segregation-state schools to avoid CCNY as an opponent. When the University of Kentucky was forced to play the Beavers in the 1949–50 NCAA championship game, Holman started his regular five, including two African Americans. After the CCNY victory, the Kentucky legislature ordered the state flag flown at half-staff.

Born and raised on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, Holman was team mascot for the Izzies at age eight, a college star for NYU, and a member of the Original Celtics (1922–30), one of the fabled teams of American sports. Holman, who was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in 1964, helped organize the first U.S. Maccabiah Games team in 1932 and was widely known to Jewish fans across the country.

Professional basketball was an unstable business before World War II. With no "major league" in the sport, virtuoso teams were the pro game's only asset. The Philadelphia Sphas, a self-described "all-Jewish team," stands with the Original Celtics and Harlem Rens among the great pre-NBA teams. Organized in 1918 by Eddie Gottlieb, Harry Passon, and Hughie Black, with Jewish high school players, the team was originally sponsored by the Young Men's Hebrew Association (YMHA). In 1921, the South Philadelphia Hebrew Association (SPHA), a social club, agreed to back the team. The Sphas were successful at the box office; according to Harry Litwack, a Hall of Famer who coached at Temple for twenty-five years after retiring from the Sphas, there were certain antisemites who regularly attended, including a woman who sat in the front row and jabbed at Sphas players with a hat pin. After playing in several leagues that collapsed during the 1920s, the Sphas joined the American Basketball League (ABL) in 1933. Gottlieb, who had paid the franchise fee, became team owner and coach. With the Hebrew transliteration for "Spha" atop a Star of David emblazoned on their jerseys, the team played twelve seasons in the ABL, winning seven league championships. Standouts included Davey "Pretzel" Banks, a 5'5" guard who ranks thirteenth on the ABL's career scoring list; Temple All-American Mike Bloom; and Max Posnak, one of four Jewish starters on the 1929 St. John's University "Wonder Five" team.

In 1946, Gottlieb was offered the Philadelphia franchise in the new Basketball Association of America (BAA). However, BAA owners balked at the idea of the "all-Jewish team," and Gottlieb agreed to their terms, renaming his club the Philadelphia Warriors and taking some of the best players with him. The Sphas, still technically in existence, were left without a coach, home arena, or league. However, their legacy was still evident when the Warriors won the BAA championship in 1947 with three Jewish players on the team: Petey Rosenberg, a St. Joseph's star, and two NYU All Americans, Jerry Fleishman and Ralph Kaplowitz. Eventually, the Sphas were sold, and the once mighty "all-Jewish team" became the Washington Generals, who lost game after game, as per the script, to another team too "ethnic" for the new professional basketball league: the "all-black" Harlem Globetrotters, an exhibition team created by Abe Saperstein in Chicago in 1926.

The National Basketball Association (NBA) came into existence in 1949 with the merger of the BAA and NBL. Maurice Podoloff, a Russian Jewish immigrant, served as president until 1961; he helped the NBA gain access to larger cities and better arenas, as pro basketball moved toward parity with baseball and football. The NBA's annual "most valuable player" award bears Podoloff's name, and its "rookie of the year" award is named for Gottlieb, acknowledging both as league founders. David Stern became the NBA's chief executive in 1984. Under his leadership, pro basketball has gained international prominence and a domestic marketing apparatus that is the envy of other sports.

Two Jewish NBA pioneers, a player and an owner-coach, both of whom would be inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame, were crucial figures in the early success of the league. Adolph "Dolph" Schayes was perhaps the most accomplished Jewish player of the 1950s. A star at NYU (1944–48), he was drafted a year before the NBA consolidation by both the New York Knicks (BAA) and the Syracuse Nationals (NBL). Schayes stunned hometown fans by choosing Syracuse. During fifteen NBA seasons, he was a twelve-time East Division All-star and four-time all-NBA forward, and he led the league in free throws twice and rebounds once, scoring 18,434 career points and averaging 18.2 per game. In 1954–55, he gave Syracuse its only NBA championship, sinking two free throws in the final seconds of the final game against the Fort Wayne Pistons, who had led by 17 at the half. The team left Syracuse in 1963 for *Philadelphia, replacing the Warriors, which Gottlieb had moved to *San Francisco. Schayes became head coach of the new Philadelphia 76ers, winning NBA Coach of the Year honors in 1966. His son, Danny Schayes, an All American at Syracuse University, played in the NBA from 1981 to 1999. During that time, the number of Jewish players in the league declined. In 1986, when Ernie Grunfeld retired from the New York Knicks, Danny Schayes was the only Jewish player in the NBA. Others would follow, but no more than a handful.

Lester Harrison formed the NBL Rochester Royals in 1945, appointing himself coach. The Royals were NBL champions in their first two seasons and, after consolidation, won the 1951 NBA championship. Harrison racially integrated the NBL in 1946, signing two African American players: Pop Gates, who had played for the "all-black" Harlem Rens, and Dolly King (Long Island University). Among several Jewish players he signed were Jack "Dutch" Garfinkel, originator of the "look away" pass, and William "Red" Holzman, who later coached the New York Knicks to NBA championships in 1970 and 1973. Making their impact as coaches rather than players, Harrison and Holzman signaled the direction that Jewish involvement in the sport was taking.

Of the many Jewish NBA coaches, none was more successful than Arnold "Red" Auerbach, the Brooklyn-born son of Russian immigrants. A fair collegiate player, he never turned professional. However, as coach of the *Boston Celtics (1950–66), he built the NBA's greatest dynasty, winning nine league championships. Retiring from coaching with a record of 938–479, he remained the Celtics' general manager and president, shaping teams that added seven more league titles. Like Holman and Harrison, Auerbach opposed segregation in basketball, drafting and signing Chuck Cooper, the NBA's first African American player in 1950, and hiring Bill Russell, the NBA's first African American coach, in 1966.

For further reading, see F. Basloe (with D. G. Rohman), I Grew up with Basketball: Twenty Years of Barnstorming with Cage Greats of Yesterday (1952); P. Berger, Heroes of Pro Basketball (1968); P. Levine, Ellis Island to Ebbets Field: Sport and the American Jewish Experience (1992); G. B. Kirsch, O. Harris, and C. E. Nolte, eds. Encyclopedia of Ethnicity and Sports in the United States (2000); S. A. Riess, Sports and the American Jew (1998); and J. Rosin, Philly Hoops: The Sphas and Warriors (2003).

DAVID MARC

Sports, United States: Football. American football was first played in the 1870s as an intercollegiate sport at elite colleges in the northeast and was gradually taken up by colleges across the country. Professional teams were formed by the turn of the century, but not systematically organized until the 1920s. Henry Moses Epstein, a member of the Columbia University team in 1870, is the first known Jewish student to play intercollegiate football. The first University of Pennsylvania football team, fielded in 1871, included Emil G. Hirsch, who went on to serve as rabbi for forty-two years at Sinai Synagogue, *Chicago's largest Reform congregation (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA). Lucius Littauer, heir to his family's glove-making fortune, played for Harvard (1875–78) and coached the Crimson team before serving five terms as a Republican congressman. Phil King, who quarterbacked at Princeton, was the first Jew named to an All-American football team, winning the honor three times (1891–93).

A total of nine Jewish students were selected as All Americans before 1920. Among them was Arthur "Bluey" Blumenthal (1911–12) of Princeton, believed to be the model for Robert Cohn, a character in Ernest Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises. Joseph Alexander of Syracuse University (1918–20) linked traditional collegiate football to the emerging National Football League (NFL). A practicing physician in 1925, he was the first player to sign a contract with the NFL's New York Giants and, as player-coach in 1926, the first Jewish head coach in the league. He returned to full-time medical practice in 1929.

Benny Friedman made the forward pass his principal offensive weapon, throwing a record twenty touchdown passes for the Giants in 1929. A successful head football coach at the City College of New York (CCNY) for nine years, Friedman became the first athletic director at Brandeis University. In the 1960s, Friedman spoke out on behalf of pension benefits for NFL pioneers, many of whom were suffering from chronic injuries that had impoverished them. As a result, he was effectively blacklisted from coaching and front-office positions and ignored by the Pro Football Hall of Fame. After a leg amputation necessitated by diabetes, Friedman committed suicide at age 76. He was inducted into the Hall of Fame posthumously in 2005.

John Alexander played only two pro seasons, but is acknowledged as an innovator in football defense. As a defensive tackle for the Milwaukee Badgers in 1922, he unveiled a new style of playing his position that included roaming between the line of scrimmage and the defensive backfield to achieve maximum flexibility in anticipating offensive strategy. Alexander credited the idea to his Milwaukee teammate Paul Robeson (the singer and political activist), whom he had also known while playing for Rutgers University in 1919. Brooklyn-born Sid Luckman had a distinguished college career as the quarterback of otherwise weak Columbia teams (1936–39). After a rough first professional season, Luckman took the Chicago Bears to the NFL title, defeating the Washington Redskins 73–0 in the championship game. In eleven seasons, Luckman passed for 14,683 yards and 137 touchdowns, bringing the Bears four league titles.

Among head coaches, Sid Gillman was known as one of football's great analysts and strategists. He is credited as the originator of the "West Coast offense," which places primary emphasis on deep forward passes, making use of the width as well as the length of the gridiron. Gilman, who had his greatest success with the San Diego Chargers, winning five division titles and an American Football League (AFL) championship, was an early advocate of using film review sessions for game preparation. Other important Jewish head coaches include Allie Sherman of the New York Giants (1961–68) and Marv Levy of the Montreal Alouettes (Canadian Football League, 1973–77), Kansas City Chiefs (1978–82), and Buffalo Bills (1986–97).

The first Jewish team owner was Nate Abrams, silent partner of the celebrated Earl "Curly" Lambeau of the Green Bay Packers. Another owner, Art Modell, was a New York advertising executive before buying the Cleveland Browns in 1961. When Cleveland city officials failed to meet his demands for stadium improvements in 1995, Modell moved the team to Baltimore. Modell made a lasting impact on the NFL behind the scenes, representing owners in television negotiations that led to increasingly lucrative contracts. Al Davis, owner of the Oakland Raiders, had served as an AFL commissioner in 1966. Under Davis, the Raiders became one of the most successful teams in professional sports, winning thirteen division championships, one AFL championship, and (after the merger with the NFL), three Super Bowls.

Although football referees are usually anonymous to the public, Jerry Markbreit, who officiated in high school, college, and professional football for forty-three years, achieved a degree of fame as the author of three books, including Last Call: Memoirs of an NFL Referee (with A. Steinberg, 2001), and as a columnist in the Chicago Tribune who answered questions on football rules. After ten seasons of officiating in the Big Ten Conference, Markbreit joined the NFL as a line judge in 1976 and was promoted to head referee after just one season. During his twenty-three years in the NFL, Markbreit was head referee in a record four Super Bowls.

Useful sources include B. Friedman, The Passing Game (1931); G. B. Kirsch, O. Harris, and C. E. Nolte, eds., Encyclopedia of Ethnicity and Sports in the United States (2000); P. Levine, Ellis Island to Ebbets Field: Sport and the American Jewish Experience (1992); B. Postal, J. Silver, and R. Silver, eds., Encyclopedia of Jews in Sports (1965); and S. A. Riess, Sports and the American Jew (1998).

DAVID MARC

Sports, United States: Women. American Jewish women have been active participants in American sports as athletes, administrators, and advocates. They have achieved national and international success in sports such as basketball, swimming, track and field, tennis, and golf.

Jewish women's involvement in athletics on a significant scale began at the end of the nineteenth century, first at Jewish settlement houses (see SOCIAL WORK: UNITED STATES) and then at Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Associations where immigrant Jewish women's participation in physical exercise and sport was encouraged as part of their Americanization process (see SPORTS AND AMERICANIZATION). While some Jewish women and girls engaged in sport for its health benefits, others became competitors. Women who challenged traditional gender and ethnic boundaries included Charlotte Epstein (1884–1938) in competitive swimming and the Olympic Games, Lillian Copeland (1904–1964) as an Olympic track and field star, and Elaine Rosenthal (1896–2003) in competitive golf. Jewish women basketball players opened athletic prospects for other women.

In 1885 the Young Women's Union in *Philadelphia, the oldest Jewish settlement house in the United States, was established. It included a school for domestic instruction, classes in English and reading, and recreation and sports activities. Jewish women instructed young Jewish women and girls in calisthenics and gymnastics, and after a new building opened in 1900, both girls and boys used the gymnasium. Philanthropists who founded the Irene Kaufmann Settlement House in Pittsburgh in 1895 incorporated sport and physical education into its program; it offered women's volleyball, gymnastics, track, and other sports. *New York City's Educational Alliance and Hebrew Technical Institute for Girls, *Boston's Hebrew Industrial School, Detroit's Hannah Schloss Memorial Building, St. Louis's Jewish Educational Alliance, and other immigrant aid organizations integrated sport with educational programs for Jewish women and girls.

Chicago Hebrew Institute (CHI), the forerunner of today's Jewish *Community Centers, was organized in 1903 by a group of young men to promote the moral, physical, religious, and civic welfare of Jewish immigrants and residents in *Chicago, both male and female. In the report for 1913–14, the superintendent noted the success of the "Ladies of the English School for Foreigners Gymnasium Class." The opening of a new gymnasium and swimming pool at the CHI in 1915, with separate facilities for men and women, promoted women's athletic participation. Girls now had their own gym in which to develop their basketball ability and competitive spirit. The 1921 team compiled an impressive record and went undefeated in twenty-six games. They played teams from the Hull House settlement, the Illinois Athletic Club, church teams, and working-class girls' teams. In volleyball, too, these Jewish girls earned victories. At the Jewish People's Institute (the CHI changed its name in 1922), girls demonstrated prowess in swimming and won events in Chicago city competitions.

New York City's Young Women's Hebrew Association (YWHA), the oldest in the United States, offered physical culture to immigrant Jewish women at the beginning of the twentieth century. The large number of women using the facilities led to a campaign for a new building. In 1914 the impressive new YWHA facility opened with a comprehensive program in sports and physical culture training; it housed a synagogue as well. Jewish women and girls participated in the Young Women's Hebrew Athletic League, competing against other YWHAs and YWCAs.

Most YWHAs, however, had neither their own funding nor female staff trained in physical education and sports. During the early twentieth century, most YWHAs were affiliated with Young Men's Hebrew Association (YMHAs) and YMHA athletic spaces usually remained the male domain. Over time, however, with the aid of the National Jewish Welfare Board (JWB), several YMHA–YWHAs in various communities provided more athletic spaces for women. The JWB, which was organized in 1921 and became the national governing body for YMHAs and YWHAs and the National Council of Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Associations, actively promoted the merger of YMHAs and YWHAs and sought to develop them into Jewish Community Centers (JCCs).

Basketball held wide appeal for women and girls at Jewish Ys. However, the women's basketball game differed from the men's version to accommodate concerns that basketball was too physically rough on women's bodies. Some medical commentators worried that too much physical exertion by women harmed their reproductive ability and that strenuous athletics promoted competition, rather than female cooperation. Jewish immigrant Senda Berenson became a leading physical educator of women and would become known as the "Mother of Women's Basketball." While attending the Boston Normal School for Gymnastics, she became interested in women's physical education. In 1892 Berenson became the Director of Physical Training at Smith College in Northampton, Massachusetts. After observing Dr. James Naismith's new basketball game at Springfield College, Berenson organized the first women's basketball game at Smith College in 1892, adapting the rules for women. Women's basketball gained popularity for Jews and Gentiles at colleges, schools, YWHAs and YWCAs, and in working-class leagues. To honor her vital role in basketball, Berenson was the first woman inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame.

American women wanting to pursue competitive swimming benefited from the impressive leadership and reform activism of Charlotte Epstein. As an athlete and as an administrator promoting competitive aquatic sports for women in the Women's Swimming Association (WSA) and through her major involvement in the Olympic Games, the Maccabiah Games (the Jewish Olympics, begun in *Palestine in 1932 [see SPORTS: ISRAEL]), and YWHAs, Epstein changed the sporting culture for women. During the early twentieth century, male officials governing amateur athletics prohibited women swimmers from competing in sanctioned swim races, national championships, and the Olympic Games. They expressed concerns about young women and girls engaging in vigorous competitions and being watched by spectators. Epstein led the way to overcome gender restrictions in swimming for Jewish and non-Jewish swimmers alike. Gertrude Ederle, Olympian and the first woman to swim the English Channel (1926), learned to swim at Epstein's swimming club and credited Epstein and the WSA for launching the successful swimming careers of many early American swimming champions.

In several ways, Epstein campaigned to reform gender constraints in aquatic sports. She promoted the national and international success of WSA swimmers, including Olympians and national champions Aileen Riggan, Helen Meaney, Alice Lord, Eleanor Holm, as well as Gertrude Ederle. She also battled the U.S. Olympic Committee to enable American women swimmers and divers to go to the 1920 Olympics in Antwerp, Belgium, the first time females were allowed to compete in these sports at the Olympics. Epstein achieved the official position of Olympic team manager of the U.S. Women's Swimming Team for the 1920, 1924, and 1932 Games. She chaired the Swimming Committee in the 1935 Second Maccabiah Games held in *Tel Aviv, which included Jewish athletes from thirty countries. In 1936, however, Epstein refused to attend the *Berlin Olympic Games. As a Jew, she boycotted American participation in the "Nazi Olympics," and she withdrew from the American Olympic Committee (AOC) to protest *Nazi policies. Epstein's influential swimming career continued until her death in 1938. In 1939, in recognition of Epstein's distinguished service, the AOC issued a resolution to honor her; she was also inducted into the International Swimming Hall of Fame and the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

American Jewish women also competed in track and field. In the 1920s Lillian Copeland attended the University of Southern California, where she became an outstanding track and field athlete, winning nine national titles and setting world records in the javelin throw and the discus throw. On the American women's Olympic team in the 1928 Olympics, she earned a silver medal in the discus. At the 1932 Los Angeles Olympic Games, Copeland won the gold medal in the discus throw, setting a world record. Sybil Koff, another track and field star in national competitions, contributed to American track and field victories at the 1932 and 1935 Maccabiah Games, winning a total of seven gold medals in these first two competitions. Although they both qualified for the 1936 American Olympic track team, Koff and Copeland boycotted the "Nazi Olympics."

Golf at Jewish country clubs drew the athletic interest of affluent Jewish women who had been excluded from Protestant country clubs. Elaine Rosenthal Reinhardt became one of the most prominent golfers in the early twentieth century, playing at Ravisloe Country Club, a Jewish club in Homewood, Illinois, outside Chicago. Her father, a successful businessman, was an active member of Ravisloe Country Club, and her mother and sister also played golf on the Ravisloe links. In 1914, at age 18, she reached the finals in the U.S. women's national golf championship in New York and in 1917 won the first of three Western Women's Golf Championships (also in 1918 and 1925), becoming the first woman to earn the "triple crown." During World War I, golf matches were halted, but Reinhardt was among elite golfers invited to participate in American Red Cross golf exhibition fundraisers with stars like Bobby Jones (Borish 2002, 84). At times, *antisemitic incidents occurred in the Western Women's Golf Association, as in 1923 when Jewish women golfers from six Jewish clubs in or near Chicago were barred from competing in the championship.

Outstanding tennis player Julie Heldman of Houston, Texas, won a gold, bronze, and silver medal in singles and doubles events at the 1968 Olympics in Mexico City, when tennis was an exhibition sport. She won three gold medals in the 1969 Maccabiah Games. Heldman was ranked as high as #2 in the United States in 1968–69 and #5 in the world in 1969. Her mother, Gladys Heldman (1922–2003), was the #1 amateur player in Texas and competed in the U.S. Open and Wimbledon; in 1953 she founded World Tennis magazine, which she sold in the 1970s. Gladys championed women's professional tennis, advancing its efforts to provide more prize money for women at a time when men dominated the sport. In 1970 Julie Heldman spearheaded the efforts of the best women players, like Billie Jean King and Rosie Casals, to form their own pro tour to battle gender discrimination and the lack of prize money. She played in the first Virginia Slims Circuit tournament, held in Houston in 1970; the Virginia Slims Circuit gained popularity and later merged with the U.S. Tennis Association. In honor of her achievements in sports Gladys Heldman was inducted into the International Tennis Hall of Fame in 1979 and the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in 1989; Julie Heldman was inducted into this Hall of Fame in 2001.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, American Jewish women continue to play sports, participate in new opportunities in sports competitions, and pursue careers in sports industries like *sportscasting on *radio and *television. Contemporary Jewish women honored in 2003 at the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame included professional golf champion Amy Alcott, ESPN sportscaster Linda Cohn, Olympic world record swimmer and Maccabiah champion Marilyn Romanesky, and figure skaters Sarah Hughes, Olympic Gold Medal, 2002, and Alexandra (Sasha) Cohen, Olympic Silver Medal, 2006, among many others.

For further reading, see L. J. Borish, "American Jewish Women in Sports," in Encyclopedia of American Jewish History, ed. S. H. Norwood and E. G. Pollack (2008), 2:522–27; idem, "Women, Sports, and American Jewish Identity in the Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries," in With God on Their Side: Sport in the Service of Religion, ed. T. Magdalinski and T. J. L. Chandler (2002), 71–98; and S. A. Riess, eds., Sports and the American Jew (1998). LINDA J. BORISH

Sportscasters. Broadcasts of sporting events began during the 1920s with the rise of commercial *radio. At first, staff announcers were assigned to cover these events, with little thought given to the need for specialized knowledge. Bill Stern, an actor and stage director who sometimes worked as a radio announcer, was among the first to specialize in sports broadcasting or sportscasting. After he lost a leg in an automobile accident in 1935, he gave up other pursuits to work full-time for National Broadcasting Corporation (NBC) radio sports, covering college football games, championship boxing, and other major events for the network as a play-by-play announcer. Between 1940 and 1952, Stern was NBC's first sports director. Marty Glickman, the Bronx-born son of Romanian Jewish immigrants, was instrumental in developing the art of play-by-play description. A track and football star at Syracuse University and member of the 1936 U.S. Olympic track team, Glickman joined the staff of New York radio station WHN as an unpaid office boy in 1939. Within a year he was broadcasting professional hockey games. In 1943, Glickman convinced WHN management to allow him to attempt a live broadcast of a charity all-star basketball game at Madison Square Garden, although basketball was then considered too fluid a game to describe coherently for radio audiences. Glickman addressed the problem by inventing a variety of descriptive terms, including "top of the key" and "set shot," which remain in common use. After World War II, Glickman became a ubiquitous radio and television voice in New York sports, serving as principal play-by-play announcer for many of the city's professional teams, including the Knicks (basketball), Rangers (hockey), and Giants and Jets (football). He was at the microphone for scores of events at every level of competition, from high school football to international track and field meets. However, Glickman was repeatedly overlooked for lucrative National Football League network television positions because of a voice characterized euphemistically by some executives as "too New York" for national audiences.

Johnny Most, whose unmistakably raspy voice announced Boston Celtics basketball games on radio and television from 1953 to 1990, was mentored by Glickman in the 1940s. The grandson of the German Jewish anarchist philosopher, Johann Most, Johnny Most developed into a quintessential home-team partisan, shamelessly rooting for the Celtics and denigrating opponents, a sportscasting style Glickman abhorred. In the 1960s, Glickman hired Marv Albert (Marvin Philip Aufrichtig) as his statistician and helped guide Albert to a career as a leading national play-by-play announcer in professional basketball and hockey.

Sam Balter, born in Detroit, was an All-American basketball player at UCLA (1927–29) and then a member of the Universal Pictures basketball team, which was selected to represent the United States at the *Berlin Olympic Games in 1936. The only Jewish American to win a gold medal at the *Nazi-hosted Olympics, Balter refused to appear at the awards ceremony with Adolph Hitler. Balter was the voice of southern California sports before the region had major league teams, serving as a play-by-play announcer for the Hollywood Stars and Los Angeles Angels baseball teams and the Los Angeles Stars basketball team, as well as for UCLA collegiate football and basketball (1945–52). He achieved a national following as host of One for the Book, the first radio sports commentary program, which aired on the Mutual network for eighteen years. Balter appeared in dozens of feature films and television programs as Hollywood's archetypal sportscaster.

Mel Allen (Melvin Allen Israel) was born in Birmingham, Alabama, the son of Russian immigrants. Admitted to the University of Alabama at fifteen, he began his career as a student, calling Crimson Tide football games on radio; he continued to cover football through much of his life, including fourteen Rose Bowl games. However, Allen was best known for his baseball work, serving as principal radio and television play-by-play announcer for the New York Yankees (1949–64) and for twenty-four All-star games and thirteen World Series. He also hosted the first baseball highlights program on television, This Week in Baseball. A master of understatement, Allen greeted even the most spectacular home run with his signature phrase, "Well, how about that?" In 1978, he received the Ford Frick Award, Major League Baseball's highest honor to a nonplayer.

Howard Cosell (Cohen) is remembered by many as a color commentator on American Broadcasting Corporation's (ABC) Monday Night Football telecasts during the 1970s. He was a brash, vociferous attorney-turned-broadcaster, and some thought the persona he projected bordered on stereotype. Earlier in his career, Cosell helped expand the role of the sportscaster from objective describer to advocacy journalist. This was especially true in boxing, the one sport in which Cosell served as a play-by-play announcer. He was alone among sportscasters in supporting Muhammad Ali when the boxing establishment stripped him of the heavyweight championship in response to political pressure, and Cosell did not hesitate to denounce poor officiating, something now expected of announcers. Suzyn Waldman, a former actress and singer, was one of the first female play-by-play announcers in Major League Baseball, joining the Yankees in 1994, and she has since become a color commentator. Waldman's readiness to show emotional responses to events has made her a controversial figure among fans.

DAVID MARC

Stam, Stammaim. This term, which means “anonymous,” refers to the editorial (stammaitic) layer of the Babylonian *Talmud, dating to the sixth century CE and possibly extending later. As the final authorities in the talmudic process, the anonymous Stammaim played a significant role in redacting tannaitic (see TANNAIM) and amoraic (see AMORAIM) texts into the form in which they appear today. See also SABORAIM.

Straus Family. This American Jewish family was prominent in business and politics. Lazarus Straus (d. 1898) was born in Otterburg, *Germany, and arrived in the *United States in 1854 after participating in the German revolutions of 1848. He worked as a peddler in the American South (see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN), and after the *Civil War, he moved to *New York City, where he opened a crockery and glassware store with his two eldest sons.

Lazarus’s youngest child, Oscar (1850–1926), was best known for his national and international political service, most notably serving as the secretary of commerce and labor (1906–09) for President Theodore Roosevelt; he was the first Jewish cabinet secretary. Oscar also represented the United States in Constantinople as minister (1887–89, 1898–99) and ambassador (1909–10); he worked with Woodrow Wilson to make the League of Nations part of the Versailles Treaty. In addition to his political prominence, Oscar Straus was also deeply involved in Jewish causes, serving on the boards of major Jewish organizations, raising money for Jews in *Eastern Europe, and helping found the American Jewish Historical Society.

Lazarus’s youngest child Isidor (1845–1912) was a successful businessman who also entered politics. After the Civil War, he went into business with his father and his brother Nathan, and the two brothers subsequently became sole owners of R. H. Macy & Co. He later served New York in the House of Representatives and worked closely with President Grover Cleveland. Isidor was active in the Jewish community, serving on the boards of local and national religious institutions, and was president of the Educational Alliance. Isidor and his wife Ida died aboard the Titanic in 1912; their son Jesse (1872–1936) served as U.S. Ambassador to *France between 1933 and 1936.

MICHAEL R. COHEN

Strauss, Leo (1899–1973) was a German-born political theorist whose academic career unfolded mostly in the *United States. Although Strauss is best known for his interpretive studies of ancient and modern political philosophers, scholars have been increasingly attentive to his lifelong preoccupation with what he called the “theological-political problem,” especially in its Jewish guise. His youthful essays on Jewish matters reflect his early commitment to political *Zionism, his awareness of its limitations, and his grappling with the avatars of modern Jewish thought (see THOUGHT, MODERN) from *Spinoza to *Rosenzweig (M. Zank ed., Leo Strauss, The Early Writings: 1921–1932 [2002]). Strauss’s first two books, Spinoza’s Critique of Religion and Philosophy and Law, chart his path away from modern attempts to resolve the problem of Judaism toward an investigation of medieval Jewish philosophical efforts to reconcile the heritage of *Jerusalem with that of the Greek philosophical tradition (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL). His subsequent studies of medieval Jewish thinkers such as Judah *Halevi and above all *Maimonides were marked by an emphasis on the esoteric character of their writing and the necessity of “reading between the lines” to arrive at their true intentions. In his own far from transparent writings on these thinkers, Strauss seems to have intimated that Maimonides may not have been at bottom a believing Jew at all, but a philosopher who upheld rabbinic *Judaism primarily for political reasons. Strauss’s essays in Persecution and the Art of Writing and his introductory essay to Shlomo Pines’ authoritative translation of the Guide of the Perplexed have sparked ongoing controversies over the nature of Maimonides’ “secret teaching.”

Strauss’s own theological position has itself been a subject of much controversy. He made perfectly clear his belief that Jerusalem and Athens (Greek philosophy) present “incompatible claims” to our allegiance. Jerusalem’s claim, he repeatedly stated, remains intact and eternally irrefutable even after the onslaught of the Enlightenment-bred criticism of religion. In a number of his later essays, he eloquently and admiringly reiterated the message emanating from Jerusalem as the call to live in “obedient love” of the Creator of the universe. He identified the creative tension between Jerusalem and Athens as the vital nerve of western civilization and recommended that “every one of us can be and ought to be either the one or the other, the philosopher open to the challenge of theology, or the theologian open to the challenge of philosophy” (“Progress or Return? The Contemporary Crisis in Western Civilization,” Modern Judaism 1[1] [1981]: 17–45). None of these statements, however, have erased the suspicion that Strauss himself made his own personal decision in favor of Athens. Both his preponderant focus on the great thinkers of the western philosophical tradition and the testimony of some of his closest students have strengthened such suspicions. Yet the case is not closed. The very title of Kenneth Hart Green’s study of Strauss’s Jewish thought (Jew and Philosopher: The Return to Maimonides in the Jewish Thought of Leo Strauss [1993]) reflects the fact that Strauss can still be read as a thinker whose own fundamental allegiance was truly dual in nature.

ALLAN ARKUSH

Suffering: See EVIL AND SUFFERING

Sukkot (literally, “Booths”), also known as the Feast of Booths or the Feast of Tabernacles, is one of the three *pilgrimage *festivals, together with *Passover and *Shavuot. It takes place between the 15th and 21st of *Tishri. Many Jews in the *Diaspora observe an additional, eighth day (see later discussion and SHEMINI ATZERET). Sukkot was originally an agricultural celebration, marking the fall harvest (Deut 16:16). The agricultural nature of the holiday is underscored in Exodus 23:16 and 34:22 where it is described as Hag Ha-Asif, the Feast of Ingathering (of the fruits of the harvest).

Sukkot also plays a key role in the historical and spiritual identity of the Jewish people. The Israelites are instructed to live in booths during the seven-day holiday as a memorial to the exodus from *Egypt, “in order that future generations may know that I made the Israelite people live in booths when I brought them out of Egypt” (Lev 23:41–43). Sukkot’s broad significance is likely why King *Solomon chose it as the day on which to dedicate the *Temple in *Jerusalem (1 Kgs 8:2) and why it is designated in the Bible as the holiday on which the *Torah is read publicly (Deut 31:10–12; Neh 8:1–18).

*Rabbinic Judaism emphasizes Sukkot's celebratory mood, referring to it as zeman simḥateinu, the time of our rejoicing. In fact, the Rabbis describe an elaborate, joyful ceremony called Simḥat Beit ha-Sho'evah (literally, "the rejoicing at the place of water drawing"), a ritual derived from Sukkot's association with the fall season and rain-fall. Sukkot's observance involves two unique symbols: the sukkah itself and the four species. Each household is to construct a sukkah and dwell in it for the duration of the festival, conducting meals and even sleeping in it. This practice serves as a commemoration of the Israelites' experience in the desert. There are many rabbinic guidelines as to the building of the sukkah; for example, it must have a minimum of three walls and a roof of natural material (sekhakh). Talmudic Rabbis debated whether the sukkah is a representation of God's "clouds of glory" (ananei kavod) or God's sheltering presence, rather than of actual desert huts (BT Sukkah 11b). The four species – palm (lulav), citron (etrog), myrtle (hadass), and willow (aravah) – are bundled together and waved in every direction during parts of the synagogue service and paraded as symbols of joy and of the integral relationship among God, the Land of Israel, and the Jewish people.

Three other holy days have become incorporated into the observance of Sukkot; they deepen the holiday's meaning and add to its festivity. Hoshanah Rabbah (the seventh day of Sukkot, the 21st of Tishri) incorporates evocative rituals involving the four species; medieval *kabbalists deemed it the final day of annual judgment (Zohar, Tzav 31b). Shemini Atzeret, the 22nd of Tishri, which serves as both the eighth day of Sukkot in the Diaspora and a separate ordained festival, shares all of the characteristics of Sukkot, excluding the waving of the four species and dwelling in the sukkah. Finally, the joyous celebration of *Simḥat Torah has become appended to Sukkot; it is observed on the same day as Shemini Atzeret in *Israel and in many *Reform congregations (22nd of Tishri) and on the 23rd of Tishri by Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Orthodox Jews (see entries under JUDAISM) in the Diaspora.

For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Fall Holidays (2009); I. Greenberg, The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays (1993); P. Goodman, The Sukkot/Simchat Torah Anthology (1988); and I. Klein, A Guide to Religious Jewish Practice (1979).

PAUL STEINBERG

Sulam, Sarra Copia (ca. 1592–1641; also Sara Copia Sulam) was a Jewish writer, poet, and patron in early modern *Venice who cultivated a circle of Christian men of letters who gave her lessons in literature and philosophy in exchange for financial backing and intellectual camaraderie. She began a correspondence with the Genoese monk Ansaldo Cebà after reading his drama, L'Ester. She also maintained relations with Leon *Modena, who also wrote a play in Italian about *Esther and dedicated it to her. Gradually, Copia Sulam's Christian friends turned against her. Baldassare Bonifacio, a poet, priest, and legal scholar, published a treatise, "On the Immortality of the Soul," in which he claimed that Copia Sulam did not believe in this doctrine. She published a riposte, "The Manifesto of Sarra Copia Sulam, a Jewish Woman, in which She Refutes and Disavows the Opinion Denying Immortality of the Soul, Falsely Attributed to Her by Signor Baldassare Bonifacio." Two other members of her circle, the poets Numidio Paluzzi and Alessandro Berardelli, began to steal from her. She severed ties with them and brought charges against them. In revenge, in two publications, Le Satire Sarreidi and Rime del Signor Numidio Paluzzi, they accused her of stealing Paluzzi's writings and publishing them as her own.

As a Jewish woman writer who had both captivated and bested Christian clerics in public, Copia Sulam was an ideal target for accusations that would undermine her accomplishments as a woman and a Jew. An unidentified contemporary wrote a defense of Copia Sulam in the form of an imaginary trial before Apollo, in which some of history's greatest women writers defended her. Her Jewishness, which they mentioned frequently in their support of her, was not perceived as an obstacle to receiving a fair hearing. A recent compilation is D. Harran, ed. and trans., Jewish Poet and Intellectual in Seventeenth-Century Venice: The Works of Sarra Copia Sulam in Verse and Prose along with Writings of Her Contemporaries in Her Praise, Condemnation, or Defense (2009).

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

Summer Camping. Organized summer camping is a distinctly American phenomenon. Three periods of development in the history of Jewish summer camping in North America can be identified.

American Jewry's earliest encounters with the American camping movement were direct outgrowths of the Settlement, Fresh Air, and other social reform initiatives that arose during the last decade of the nineteenth century (see SOCIAL WORK: UNITED STATES). Camp Lehman (renamed Camp Isabella Freedman), established in 1893 by the Jewish Working Girls Vacation Society of *New York, may have been the first Jewish camp in the *United States. Jewish reformers wanted to establish settlement camps specifically for the children of Jewish immigrants. The Educational Alliance in New York founded a camp in 1901 that was incorporated as Surprise Lake Camp in 1902. In Cleveland, a committee of the United Jewish Charities established the first of many Fresh Air Camps in 1904. The *National Council of Jewish Women founded Camp Wise (1907) "for needy children, mothers, and babies." In addition to the Jewish camps that were sponsored by social welfare organizations, a host of privately owned camps cropped up during the first few decades of the twentieth century. Although these camps were privately owned, many of their founders were progressive thinkers who embraced the ideals that had inspired the pioneers of American camping.

The second phase was the emergence of educational camps or camps with an explicitly Jewish mission. In the early years of the twentieth century, many Jewish leaders began to contemplate new and innovative means to improve and strengthen Jewish *education in America and to counter assimilation. Efforts to acculturate and Americanize East European immigrants had been so effective that many Jews were drifting away from Jewish life and religious practice. Jewish educator Samson Benderly (1876–1944) insisted that a revitalized Jewish educational system could be effective in safeguarding the future of Jewish life in America if it focused less on “the amount of knowledge obtained . . . (and more on) the creation of a Jewish atmosphere.” The camping environment emerged as an innovative vehicle for the promulgation of experiential Jewish learning. With the establishment of Camp Cejwin (1919), sponsored by the Central Jewish Institute, and Camp Boiberik (1919), a secular camp with an emphasis on *Yiddish language sponsored by the Sholem Aleichem Folk Institute, American Jews slowly began to recognize the educative potential of organized camping.

Some of the camps established during this period actively espoused a particular Jewish ideology, and their educational mission was to promote the camps’ ideological point of view. Thus, camps were founded that promoted Yiddish language, *Zionism, *Hebrew learning, and *socialist ideals. A cadre of progressive Jewish educators, many of whom had either studied with or been directly influenced by the same progressive educators who inspired the trailblazers of the American camping movement, pioneered the development of camps with a specifically Jewish mission. Albert P. Schoolman (1894–1980), one of the progressive Jewish educators, took the helm of the newly established Camp Cejwin in 1923. A few years later, Jewish educators Isaac B. Berkson (1891–1975) and his wife, Libbie S. Berkson (1891–1970), collaborated with Alexander M. Dushkin (1890–1976) and his wife, Julia Dushkin (1895–1976), in the founding of Camp Modin (1922), which focused on Jewish learning and living. Samson Benderly also established a camp, Camp Achvah (1927), which emphasized the development of future Jewish educational leaders. Shlomo Bardin (1898–1976), a charismatic Zionist youth leader, founded a “Summer Camp Institute” (1941) under the sponsorship of the American Zionist Youth Commission, with financial backing from Supreme Court Justice Louis D. *Brandeis. The Institute was named for Brandeis after his death. Shlomo Shulsinger (1912–2004) established Camp Massad (1941), with an educational program that concentrated on Hebrew-language learning.

Jewish educational camping programs proved to be invaluable tools for the strengthening of Jewish life in mid-twentieth-century America. As American Jews left urban, immigrant neighborhoods and resettled in the suburbs, Jewish identity became ever more compartmentalized, and Jewish camping programs offered young people a chance to experience an all-encompassing Jewish environment.

During this post-World War II era, the establishment of camps associated with the religious movements of American Judaism marked the beginning of a third phase in Jewish camping. By the mid-1940s, some leaders of American Judaism’s various religious streams began to recognize how organized camping programs could augment Jewish learning, develop leadership skills, and concomitantly strengthen ideological ties to their respective religious movements. Rabbi Moshe Davis (1916–1996), one of Camp Massad’s founders in 1941, went on to play a central role in the establishment of Conservative *Judaism’s Camp Ramah in 1947. Similarly, many of those who had been influenced by the first Jewish educational camps were instrumental in the development of the Hebrew program at Reform Judaism’s first Union Institute (established in 1952). A number of large synagogues began to acquire camp sites of their own at this same time, and after the 1950s, camps associated with the Orthodox and *Hasidic movements also came into existence. During the last quarter of the twentieth century, both the Conservative and Reform movements continued to establish new camps in the United States and *Canada. In 2002 Camp JRF, the *Reconstructionist movement’s first camp, opened, and Jewish camps in North America reflected the entire spectrum of Jewish religious practice and learning.

In the early decades of the twenty-first century, an estimated 50,000 young people annually attend nonprofit camps with Jewish affiliations and an additional 10,000 individuals serve as staff for these camps. These figures underscore the degree to which Jewish camping has become an established feature in the lives of many American Jews.

For further reading, see J. W. Joselit and K. S. Mittelman, eds., A Worthy Use of Summer: Jewish Summer Camping in America (1993); J. J. Goldberg and E. King, Builders and Dreamers: Habonim Labor Zionist Youth in North America (1993); W. Ackerman, “A World Apart: Hebrew Teachers Colleges and Hebrew-Speaking Camps,” in Hebrew in America, ed. A. Mintz (1993), 105–28; and M. M. Lorge and G. P. Zola, eds., A Place of Our Own: The Beginnings of Reform Jewish Camping in America (2006). GARY PHILLIP ZOLA

Sura was the original location of the preeminent Babylonian rabbinic academy (yeshivah) of the geonic era; it was founded by Rav, one of the two leaders of the first generation of Amoraim in Babylonia. The place name continued to be applied to the academy when it was relocated to Baghdad, sometime in the ninth century (see AMORAIM; GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES; PUMBEDITA).

Synagogue is a place of Jewish worship and study. Its word derives from the Greek for “assembly”; its Hebrew equivalent is beit keneset (house of assembly). Its origins are obscure and may go back to the *Babylonian Exile. Certainly, by the beginning of the first century CE, the synagogue was a well-established and essential Jewish institution in the *Land of Israel and the *Diaspora. Unlike the *Temple in *Jerusalem or other shrines in pre-exilic times, the synagogue was never a place in which sacrifices were offered, nor was it administered by priests (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP). Beginning in the nineteenth century, some Jewish reformers began to call synagogues “temples” (see JUDAISM, REFORM), and since then this custom has become common among adherents of Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist Judaism. See other entries under SYNAGOGUES.

Synagogue Sisterhoods. Since the nineteenth century, North American Jewish women have formed organizations that promoted the good and welfare of their families, *synagogues, and the needy of the community (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN’S: UNITED STATES). Even when there was sentiment against women earning money outside the home, there was never a norm that Jewish women’s activities should be limited to the domestic realm. In fact, voluntary activity on behalf of the community was encouraged, particularly in arenas considered women’s spheres in American society, such as *education, culture, and areas of religion apart from ritual. The predominant model in synagogues and elsewhere was separate men’s and women’s groups.

Synagogue sisterhoods gained in strength as the major American Jewish denominations became institutionalized in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (see entries under JUDAISM). Sisterhoods offered Jewish women a place to gather as women and as Jews, to socialize, to study, to support important causes and, not least, to raise money for their synagogue and national movement institutions. During the interwar and post-World War II years when many hundreds of Reform and Conservative congregations were founded, both sisterhoods (and brotherhoods) were organized. Three major coordinating organizations brought local groups together for national efforts and support of movement institutions. The National Foundation of Temple Sisterhoods (NFTS), now Women of Reform Judaism, was founded in 1913; the Women's League of the United Synagogue (now Women's League for Conservative Judaism) was formed in 1918; and the Women's Branch of the Orthodox Union of Jewish Congregations was established in 1923.

As the Jewish feminist movement (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST) of the mid to late 1970s began to flourish, a sharp debate arose about the separation by gender of education, fundraising, and cultural support of synagogue life. Many sisterhoods had difficulty recruiting younger members, and as more women worked outside the home for pay and balanced the demands of dual-career families, they could not attend daytime meetings and had less energy for volunteer work. In a number of synagogues, men's clubs and sisterhoods began to institute jointly sponsored programming.

Assuming leadership roles in sisterhoods had historically provided an entry for some women into the broader power structure of the temple or synagogue. For many decades the only women on synagogue boards were revolving representatives of the sisterhood and parent-teachers association of the religious school. One of the few paths to female leadership in a Jewish organization was through regional and national sisterhood offices. During the last quarter of the twentieth century, this pattern changed somewhat as more and more women entered the mainstream of congregational and communal leadership. Nevertheless, synagogue sisterhoods continue to exist and play numerous important local and national roles. For example, the Women of Reform Judaism sponsored the publication of The Torah: A Women's Commentary (2008), which included contributions from more than two hundred female scholars. This volume, edited by T. C. Eskenazi and A. Weiss, won the 2008 National Jewish Book Council Everett Family Foundation Book of the Year designation.

Some sociologists have recently suggested that synagogue life, particularly in the liberal Jewish movements, has become "feminized," as has much of religious life in America in general. They argue that there is now an important role for single-gender groups, particularly the strengthening of men's clubs/brotherhoods and groups for teenage boys, to bring more men back into congregational life in an activist way.

Recent research includes S. B. Fishman and D. Parmer, Matrilineal Ascent/Patrilineal Descent: The Gender Imbalance in American Jewish Life (2008); and P. E. Hyman and D. Ofer, eds., Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, CD-ROM (2007).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Synagogues, Ancient. Synagogues flourished throughout the *Land of Israel during the *Roman and *Byzantine periods, continuing well into *Islamic times. The centrality of local communities as sites of *Torah study and the development of private associations during the *Hellenistic period provide some context for this development.

By the first century CE at the latest, Jewish synagogues existed in the Land of Israel and the Roman *Diaspora. The clearest *archeological evidence for early synagogues is a monumental Greek inscription recovered in *Jerusalem that relates that a certain Theodotos, "son of Vettenos the priest and synagogue leader (archisynagogos), son of a synagogue leader, and grandson of a synagogue leader, built the synagogue for the reading of the Torah and studying of the commandments and as a hostel with chambers and water installations to provide for the needs of itinerants from abroad, which his fathers, the elders, and Simonides founded."

A number of buildings from the later part of the *Second Temple period in the Land of Israel have been identified as synagogues. These include structures uncovered at Gamla, *Masada, Herodium, and recently at Modi'in, Kiryat Sefer, and *Jericho. Each of the buildings at Gamla, Masada, and Herodium is a large meeting room surrounded by benches. *Philo of Alexandria describes the synagogues of the *Essenes as having such benches (Every Good Man Is Free, lines 81–82). The building at Gamla, constructed after 40 BCE, is a large, freestanding rectangular structure (16 × 20 meters) built on the city's western side next to the city wall. The main entrance was on the west, with an exedra and an open courtyard in front. The center of the hall was unpaved and surrounded (except for the main entrance) by stepped benches. The synagogue of Masada was built during the First *Jewish War of 66–74 CE. Located on the northwestern casement wall, the room is rectangular in shape (15 × 12 meters); benches with four tiers were built on three sides of the room. On the fourth side, at the northwestern end of the building was a large, protruding room (measuring 3.6 × 5.5 meters), within which fragments of the biblical books of *Deuteronomy and *Ezekiel were discovered. The room at Herodium was also fitted with benches during the First Jewish War. On the basis of the similarities between these benches and those at Masada, some scholars have identified this room as a synagogue.

Archeological evidence for synagogues during the two centuries following the destruction of *Jerusalem in 70 CE is sparse, although *rabbinic literature provides ample evidence for synagogues for this period. *Tannaitic writings, reflecting the late first through the early third centuries, provide information about synagogues within communities that were under rabbinic influence. M. Megillah 3:2 assumes that synagogue buildings were not so clearly distinguished that they could not be converted for use for another communal or industrial purpose. M. Nedarim 9:2 relates that a private house could be transformed into a synagogue, a parallel with Christian house synagogues, as well as the third-century *Dura Europos synagogue in Syria and synagogues elsewhere in the Diaspora. Sources discuss a synagogue in *Alexandria that bore similarities to the Jerusalem *Temple (T. Sukkah 4:6), whereas T. Megillah 3:21–23 suggests that the ideal synagogue, like the *Tabernacle/Temple, should be built "at the high point of the town," its doors open to the east. The interior of the synagogue was to be directed toward a scrolls box (teva) that was set on the wall aligned with Jerusalem. This literary testimony indicates that synagogues were a common feature on the Palestinian landscape by the third and fourth centuries CE.

More than one hundred synagogues from the fourth through eighth centuries are known from archeological evidence. Three basic “types” of synagogue buildings or basilicas have been discovered in the Land of Israel: the broadhouse, longhouse, and Galilean. The principle of sacred orientation may be observed in all three types, and platforms supporting Torah shrines were placed on the Jerusalem-aligned wall in the vast majority of cases. From the fifth century onward, longhouse basilicas often incorporated an apse. Broadhouse synagogues have been discovered at Khirbet Shema in the Upper *Galilee and at Eshtemoa and Khirbet Susiya in the Mount Hebron region of Judea. A Torah shrine was placed on the broad wall, aligned with Jerusalem.

Longhouse basilicas, generally dating to the fifth and sixth centuries, consisted of an atrium, sometimes a narthex, and a nave, the focal point of which was a Torah shrine set on a platform (bimah) on the Jerusalem-aligned wall. The Torah shrine (called an aronah or beit aronah in inscriptions and literary sources) was sometimes flanked by seven-branched *menorahs. These menorahs not only forged a connection between the synagogue and the Jerusalem Temple but they also provided illumination necessary for the reading of biblical scrolls and served to emphasize the ark platform. This arrangement is first reflected in the synagogue mosaic at Hammath Tiberias B, in level 2a. Many synagogues of the sixth century and later, including Na’aran and Beth Alpha, included an apse on the Jerusalem wall that housed the Torah shrine. This feature, together with the entire arrangement and many of the furnishings of the building, was borrowed from contemporary churches. The apse and bimah were sometimes separated from the nave by a screen.

The naves of many longhouse and apsidal basilicas and the hall of the broadhouse at Khirbet Susiya were paved with highly intricate mosaics. A number of mosaics included images of the Torah shrine area, the zodiac wheel, biblical imagery, and numerous dedicatory inscriptions in *Aramaic, Greek, and occasionally Hebrew. Images of the Torah shrine, flanked by two menorahs, appear at Hammath Tiberias, Sepphoris, Beth Alpha, Beth Shean A (which may actually be a *Samaritan synagogue), Na’aran, and Khirbet Susiya. These mosaic panels were laid in front of the bimot of these synagogues and were imprecise mirror images of them. The pediment of a Torah shrine very similar to the one at Beth Alpha was discovered at Nabratein (although at Nabratein the pediment is flanked by lions, and not birds, as at Beth Alpha). A large three-dimensional menorah was discovered at Hammath Tiberias A, and fragments of large menorahs were found at Maon (Judea), Khirbet Susiya, and Eshtemoa. A three-dimensional lion similar to those flanking the bottom of the ark in the Beth Alpha synagogue mosaic was discovered at Chorazin (see Plate 3 for similar imagery).

The zodiac wheel mosaics within synagogues are clearly related to the course of the Jewish lunar-solar *calendar, as is made clear by the fifth-century mosaic from Sepphoris. The earliest zodiac wheel was found at Hammath Tiberias. There the signs of the zodiac are individually labeled in Hebrew, with the seasons personified in each corner. In the center is the sun god Helios. At Sepphoris, about a century later, the zodiac wheel includes both the signs and personifications of each month, clearly labeled with the Hebrew name of the month. The chariot of Helios appears, but Helios himself does not. At Ein Gedi the names of the months and zodiac signs appear in a long textual inscription, but they are not illustrated. These varying designs reflect the different attitudes held by various communities to possibly idolatrous imagery. The zodiac at Na’aran was defaced by iconoclasts (as were images at Khirbet Susiya and other sites) during the early Islamic period, reflecting changing Jewish attitudes toward visual representations, most likely in response to Muslim aniconism within mosques (see ISLAM AND JUDAISM). Biblical scenes that appear in synagogue mosaics include the binding of Isaac (akedah) at Beth Alpha and Sepphoris; the angels’ visit to *Abraham and *Sarah and *Aaron before the *Tabernacle at Sepphoris; *Noah’s ark at Gerasa; *Daniel in the lion’s den at Na’aran, and perhaps Khirbet Susiya; and *David playing his harp at Gaza. All of these images appear in Christian art as well and seem to have been adopted for synagogue ornamentation from the larger cultural context. The similar scroll mosaics of the Maon (Nirim) synagogue near Gaza and of the nearby Shella church reflect the close relationships between artisans and tastes across communal divides. Images of Aaron before the Tabernacle and assorted elements of the Jerusalem Temple sacrificial cult appear in the Sepphoris mosaic. Each of these biblical images parallels themes that are common in Jewish liturgical poetry and other literature from late antiquity (see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]). Particularly significant is a mosaic pavement from the narthex of the sixth-century synagogue at Rehov in the Beth Shean region. This twenty-nine-line inscription directly parallels texts that appear in rabbinic literature and is a copy of a fourth-century wall inscription from the same synagogue that is the earliest extant textual exemplar of *rabbinic literature.

Galilean-type basilicas, now generally dated from the fourth to sixth centuries, are found in the synagogues at Capernaum, Chorazin, Meiron, Nabratein, Kfar Baram, Umm al-Qantar, and Arbel. The synagogue at Meroth has some of these features. The emphasis on the decoration of the external facade of these buildings is closely related to church architecture in Syria. Typical of this group is the structure uncovered at Meiron, in which the triple facade faces southward toward Jerusalem. It is likely that the Torah shrine was placed between the portals of this structure, as at Meroth in the Upper Galilee and as has been conjectured at Capernaum and Chorazin.

DIASPORA SYNAGOGUES: Archeological and literary sources suggest that synagogues existed throughout the Roman and Sassanian (see PERSIA) Empires from the third century through the Islamic conquest. Diaspora synagogues were built according to the architectural norms of each locale. They are unified by the presence of a large Torah shrine, sometimes images of menorahs and Torah scrolls, and terminology found in dedicatory inscriptions. The synagogue uncovered at Dura Europos, a town in the Syrian desert, was a renovated private dwelling that was converted into a synagogue some time before 244/45 CE. The largest room had a large Torah shrine built on the western (Jerusalem-aligned) wall and benches around the walls. The façade of the Torah shrine was decorated with the image of the Jerusalem Temple, flanked on the right by the binding of Isaac (according to 2 Chron 3:1, this event took place on “Mount Moriah,” the Temple Mount); on the left were representations of a seven-branched menorah, a palm frond (lulav), and a citron (etrog). In 244/5 CE the walls were completely covered with paintings representing biblical events read through the prism of Jewish biblical interpretation (*midrash). Sixty percent of the paintings have been preserved. The generally heroic themes include the discovery of *Moses by the daughter of Pharaoh, the crossing of the Red Sea, the tribes encamped around the Tabernacle, *Ezekiel’s vision of the dry bones, and *Esther before King Ahashuerus. The paintings, inscriptions, and a unique prayer text on parchment parallel traditions preserved in rabbinic literature. Map 4

Impressive synagogues have been uncovered in Ostia Antica, the ancient port of Rome, and in Sardis in modern-day *Turkey. The Ostia synagogue building was originally constructed toward the end of the first century CE. It was renovated for use as a synagogue during the second and third centuries and was enlarged and partly rebuilt at the beginning of the fourth. The triple entrances in the facade of the second- to third-century basilica are aligned toward the east-southeast, perhaps in the direction of Jerusalem. A stepped podium stood on the wall opposite the main entrance. A Latin and Greek inscription from this construction phase mentions a shrine for the Torah. During the fourth century, the southernmost entrance portal on the eastern wall of the synagogue was sealed and replaced with a large free-standing Torah shrine. This Torah shrine is similar to images in wall paintings and gold glass discovered in the Jewish *catacombs of Rome and on oil lamps found in Ostia.

The Sardis synagogue is the largest synagogue yet uncovered, with its main hall measuring 54 × 18 meters. This impressive building, part of the southern side of the municipal center of Sardis, was taken over by the Jewish community and remodeled as a synagogue during the fourth century. The remodeling included the installation of two aediculae on stepped podia on the eastern wall of the synagogue and the construction of a podium in the center of the hall. The significance of these aediculae is made clear both by their prominence and by a nearby Greek inscription that reads, “Find, open, read, observe.” Another Greek inscription refers to the Torah shrine as the nomophylakion, “the place that protects the Torah.” Survey works on the history of the ancient synagogue include S. Fine, ed. Sacred Realm: The Emergence of the Synagogue in the Ancient World (1996); and L. I. Levine, The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years (1999).

STEPHEN FINE

Synagogues, Europe: Medieval to Eighteenth Century.

Few physical traces survive of medieval synagogues because Jews were expelled so often from their places of residence. Moreover, prohibitions against building new synagogues were intermittently in force throughout Christian Europe beginning in the fourth century. The most substantial synagogues were in *Spain, *Sicily, southern *Italy, and *Central Europe. Medieval synagogues were often located in or near the house or business of a wealthy community leader. A stone house in the medieval Italian town of Sermoneta may have housed such a synagogue; worshipers would have met in a large room on the first floor (above ground level).

A fifteenth-century Italian manuscript illustration shows a similar open room with a large decorated arch supported by Corinthian columns and a wooden coffered ceiling. A tall wooden ark (aron ha-kodesh, in which the Torah scroll or scrolls are stored) is set against one wall and a lower reader’s table set before it; at either side are chests or desks for worshipers, facing the room’s center. Later versions of domestic synagogues survive in Dubrovnik, Croatia, where a prayer room was created after 1532 on the third floor of a fourteenth-century house, and in Pfaffenhofen, France, where a small house synagogue built in 1791 retains a medieval character.

More public “hall-type” synagogues include two examples in Trani, southern Italy, which were converted to churches in the fifteenth century, and fragments of two synagogues in Sopron (*Hungary) and one in Budapest. The partially reconstructed thirteenth-century synagogue of Sopron is set back from the street through a passageway between two houses. The sanctuary was a vaulted space with the small ark set permanently into the east wall and decorated with carved stonework; the women’s prayer room had a separate entrance on the south. The synagogue complex included a caretaker’s house, a fourteenth-century building to house travelers or the sick, and a *mikveh (ritual bath).

Vaulted stone synagogues were erected in larger towns with prosperous Jewish populations. Double-nave structures appear in Central Europe beginning in the twelfth century, including the synagogues at Worms (*Germany) and *Prague (Czech Republic). Other examples are known from Regensburg (Germany), *Vienna (Austria), and Maribor (Slovenia). The Worms synagogue was rebuilt after its destruction in World War II. The original structure built in 1034 was renovated between 1170 and 1200; the men’s hall (1175) was divided by two columns on the east-west axis into parallel aisles of equal size. The ark stood at the east end; the bimah (elevated platform used for *Torah reading) was between the columns. A women’s annex, at right angles to the men’s section on the north side, was built in 1213. The so-called *Rashi chapel was added in 1624 at the short west end. In 1842, the women’s annex was opened, and the wall separating it from the men’s hall was broken by two large doorways with pointed arches.

The oldest synagogue in continuous use is Prague’s thirteenth-century Altneushul (Old-New Synagogue). The Altneushul also has a double-nave plan, with two tall octagonal piers. The bimah is between the piers; its wrought iron enclosure with pointed arches probably dates from the fifteenth century. The women’s section in the west annex, dated 1732, was later extended to the north side. Narrow windows about three feet above the floor level connect the women’s annexes with the main hall.

The hundreds of synagogues that existed in medieval *Spain and *Portugal reflected Middle Eastern Jewish models and Muslim cultural influences. In Toledo, where there were at least nine synagogues and five midrashim (small chapels), two survive. The older, originally the Great Synagogue, is now commonly known as Santa Maria la Blanca, after the church into which it was transformed following the 1492 expulsion. Inside the modest exterior, four rows of thirty-two octagonal piers, which support horseshoe arches, articulate an impressive open space, and stucco ornaments in the clerestory windows convey a sense of opulence. There is no women's section or gallery. A similar synagogue in Segovia is now a church. The private Toledo synagogue of courtier Samuel Halevi Abulafia (1320–1360), known as El Transito, is very different. It was joined to his palace on the east side, and the large rectangular interior has rich stucco decoration with Hebrew inscriptions encircling the nave just below the high decorated ceiling. Some inscriptions praise King Pedro I, and others hail Abulafia as "prince among the princes of the tribe of Levi." A spacious gallery on the north side was possibly for women.

Between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, Italian Jewish communities built impressive synagogues. The finest were in Livorno, Ancona, Padua, and especially in the *Venice *ghetto, where five separate synagogues survive; each served a segment of Venice's diverse community. The Scuola Grande Tedesca (1528–29, rebuilt 1732–33) is located high up in a tall building in the Ghetto Nuovo. This location fulfilled the talmudic dictum that synagogues should be located at the highest point in town. The trapezoidal sanctuary is two stories high and has an elliptical gallery for women at the second level (a result of eighteenth-century remodeling); this gallery masks the room's irregularity and is reminiscent of contemporary theaters. Originally, the bimah was located in the center of the space. The Scuola Canton (1531–32; rebuilt with a new ark in 1736) is a small rectangular room filled with light, color, and delicate ornamentation reminiscent of Venetian patrician parlors or the meeting places of Christian confraternities. As in most Italian synagogues, the ark and bimah are set across from each other in a bipolar arrangement. Benches line the sides of the room, and congregants would follow the service by looking first left, then right. The richly carved and gilded wood ark is typical of Baroque-period Italian synagogues, but its size harmonizes with the intimate Renaissance space. The bimah (1780) is set in a raised niche protruding from the building and overhanging a canal. A little cupola provides light for the Torah reader; its columns are intricately carved with intertwined branches and twigs.

Two major synagogues were built in Venice's Ghetto Vecchio: the Scuola Levantina (built after 1589; remodeled in the seventeenth century) and the Scuola Spagnola (built after 1589; remodeled in the mid-seventeenth century). Grander than earlier synagogues, they employed workshops of prominent Christian architects, probably including Baldassare Longhena. The Scuola Grande Spagnola has a bipolar arrangement of ark and bimah set within a large rectangular space; an elliptical women's gallery is inserted high up in the tall room. The interior is sumptuously decorated with black and white marble, rich woods, and faux-marble wall painting. The exuberant ark design of rising classical elements culminates in a series of pediments and arches. Within this composition is the *Decalogue mounted on a frame of golden rays, a device used by Gian Lorenzo Bernini in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Several eighteenth-century synagogues in Piedmont, such as Carmagnola, Cuneo, and Casale Monferatto, are unmarked on the outside, but richly adorned within. Most centrally placed bimot are octagonal, and ornate arks decorated with twisted columns refer to the Jerusalem *Temple. Two synagogues in southern France are similar: Carpentras (1367; remodeled in 1741 by Antoine d'Alemand) and Cavaillon (rebuilt in 1772 by Antoine and Pierre Armelin).

These *Sephardi synagogues present a taste of Versailles in their delicate frothy Rococo decoration.

A second arena of intensive synagogue building in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was in the new Dutch Republic and areas settled by Dutch traders. In 1670, the Portuguese Jewish community in *Amsterdam began building a grandiose place of worship with offices, a library, and schoolrooms on a plan by master-builder Elias Bouman. Similar to Bouman's design for the Ashkenazi Great Synagogue erected the year before, the synagogue is a restrained interpretation of the classical style: opulent but without the drama of the Italian Baroque. Dedicated in 1675, the Esnoga was at that time the largest synagogue in the world, seating 1,200 men with places in the galleries for more than 400 women and other visitors. Four giant Ionic columns on massive plinths on either side support the wooden barrel-vaulted ceiling. The columns on the east and west walls are engaged. Six smaller columns sustain the galleries, which run around three sides of the building. Part of the balcony accommodated women, the first instance of what would become standard practice in synagogue design. The great wooden ark is surmounted by pediments, crowns, and obelisks; above the central bay, in an aedicule beneath a crowned pediment is the *Decalogue. The seventy-two windows ensure bright light; in the evening, twenty-six magnificent chandeliers of various sizes and candlesticks on each bench light up the interior.

London's Sephardi Bevis Marks Synagogue (1701) recalls the red-brick exterior and interior plan (80 ft × 50 ft) of Amsterdam's Esnoga. London's Ashkenazim built their first synagogue in 1722, in Duke's Place, and another, the Hambro Synagogue, was erected in 1725; both are modeled on Bevis Marks. Inspired by the Amsterdam and London synagogues, Dutch and English Jews built similar structures in the New World. Amsterdam Jews who settled in Curaçao in 1659 erected a four-story synagogue in a tiled courtyard, reflecting the Esnoga and Spanish Baroque architecture. Other *Caribbean synagogues were erected in Surinam, Barbados, Nevis, St. Eustatius, and St. Thomas.

In Kraków, *Poland, legends date the Old Synagogue to the fourteenth century, but it was probably first erected in the late fifteenth century and then rebuilt by Italian architect Matteo Gucci in 1570. Many Polish synagogues of this era were designed by Italians, who adapted Italian architecture for Jewish use. The Old Synagogue retains the medieval double-nave plan, but incorporates many Renaissance features. The Remu Synagogue, built in 1557, was probably the first masonry Renaissance-style synagogue in Poland, replacing a 1553 wooden structure. This small rectilinear building with a single nave has round-headed windows set high in the walls and a Roman barrel vault; a separate room for women to the west was added in the nineteenth century. Built-in furnishings, including the ark and the poor-box, resemble sculpted wall tombs produced for the royal court and Polish churches. Similar "hall-type" synagogues, erected over the next century throughout Poland, included the famous, and now destroyed, 1582 Nachmanowicz Synagogue (also known as TaZ Synagogue, or Golden Rose) in Lwów (now Lviv), *Ukraine. The Pinczow synagogue (ca. 1600) was one of the first Polish synagogues to include a women's section (situated over the vestibule). Deteriorated wall paintings from the second half of the eighteenth century, attributed to the Jewish painter Jehuda Leib, survive. The large barrel-vaulted Izaak Synagogue in Kraków (1638–44) also has a women's section at the west end, built over an entrance vestibule. The sanctuary recalls Baroque churches, but like other synagogues, much of its wall space was decorated with Hebrew liturgical texts.

Another important type of synagogue in late-sixteenth-century Poland is defined by its square or almost square plan and the presence of a large central bimah, surrounded by four corner columns or piers that rise to the ceiling vault. This "bimah-support synagogue" provided wider roof spans and larger uninterrupted interior spaces to better accommodate large crowds. The large space and the centrality of the reader's platform created a dramatic effect. The first such synagogue may have been the 1567 MaHaRShal Synagogue in Lublin (rebuilt in 1656). Other examples in eastern Poland include Przemyśl (1592–95), Zamosc, (ca. 1600), Tykocin, (1642), and Lancut (1761) and, in western *Ukraine, Satanov (eighteenth century) and Zhovkva (1692). The Lancut synagogue, which was sponsored by a local noble, has a simple plan: a vestibule, a room on the entrance side, and a main hall beyond. Women reached their gallery above the vestibule by an external stairway. The unusually light main prayer hall, several steps below the vestibule, is lit by large windows; the center bimah, comprised of four large thick columns set on square bases, supports the central vault. Painted images include zodiac signs, musical instruments mentioned in the *Psalms, and images of lions, unicorns, monkeys, grapes, birds, deer, and flowers. While expensive masonry synagogues were springing up throughout greater Poland, a parallel tradition developed of building synagogues in wood (see SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN).

In German urban centers, new synagogues were erected in fashionable styles. The *Berlin Heidereutergasse Synagogue (1712–14) resembled contemporary Protestant church architecture in detailing and spatial configuration. In Wörlitz, the Duke of Anhalt-Dessau sponsored a synagogue (1789–90) in an English garden setting that resembled an ancient round temple; the architect even called it the Temple of Vesta. This classical style can also be seen at Lunéville, France (1785–88) and frequently in the 1820s in *Vienna (1826, Seitenstettentempel); Wrocław, Poland (1820s, White Stork Synagogue); Obuda, *Hungary (1821); and elsewhere.

SAMUEL D. GRUBER

Synagogues: France. Eighteenth-century synagogues of architectural significance in the former papal territories of Carpentras and Cavaillon are now considered French national historical treasures. A synagogue in Avignon from this era did not survive, but was completely rebuilt in 1846. The first large modern synagogue constructed after *emancipation (1790–91) was in Bordeaux in 1812. When it was destroyed by fire, it was replaced in 1882, with partial funding from the Pereire family; the new synagogue was the largest in Europe at that time.

Perhaps two hundred and fifty synagogues were built throughout France in the nineteenth century. The architectural challenge was to invent something that was the equivalent of monumental European churches, but still had some specifically Jewish features. The Romanesque style was repeatedly chosen and the Gothic rejected. Respected architects were often involved, and they used styles and materials that were being introduced everywhere. The buildings themselves indicated the participation of Jews in French culture. The synagogue on the Rue des Tournelles in Paris, dedicated in 1876, was designed by a student of the great Victor Baltard (known for the market pavilions at Les Halles), and it benefited from the introduction of the metal-work methods of Gustave Eiffel. In the early twentieth century, immigrant Jews built a synagogue on the Rue Pavée in an Art Nouveau style designed by Hector Guimard, the architect known for his Paris Métro design.

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Synagogues: Nineteenth Century. Although traditional synagogue building in local forms, materials, and design continued with few alterations outside the European sphere of influence, significant innovations occurred in Europe, North America, and colonized areas. The opening of trades and educational opportunities to Jews allowed them to become building entrepreneurs, property owners, and sometimes architects and engineers, even in European countries where they lacked full civil rights. With gradual legal *emancipation, Jewish communities erected synagogues on public streets or outside traditional Jewish quarters. A municipal building inspector might determine the synagogue's site, size, and style, but Western and Central European Jews made architectural decisions on their own. Traditional Jewish districts survived, but educated and prosperous Jews often moved to new areas where they were generally permitted to construct new synagogues. Some governments promoted a single large synagogue in major cities to facilitate the supervision of Jews who had previously been dispersed in a number of small prayer houses. Large synagogues promoted greater prestige for their occupants and provided opportunities for impressive architecture; however, a single community synagogue forced those with differing ritual needs to worship privately in modest quarters. Synagogues also rose in towns where Jews had earlier been excluded by law or custom. Overall, the nineteenth century saw the construction of ampler, more orderly, and sturdier synagogues, especially in capitals and major commercial cities.

Other political changes in Europe affected synagogue design, particularly the growth of nationalism after the defeat of Napoleon in 1815. Throughout Europe, architects selected architectural styles from the past to express their distinctive national characters and histories. Italians often favored Roman-derived forms, whereas the French, inventors of Gothic architecture, promoted Gothic revival. However, the Jews, without their own European architectural heritage, spent the century trying to formulate a Jewish style. Thus, an Egyptian-style synagogue at Canterbury (1848, Hezekiah Marshall) evoked a country that had endured for millennia and that was close to the Jews' ancient homeland. Yet, because ancient Egyptians had persecuted the Israelites, that style soon lost favor.

Because Gothic architecture was specifically connected with Christian religious edifices, few Gothic synagogues were built, although several synagogues did include its slender, pointed-arched forms inside, where the congregation could privately enjoy the popular style. Only rarely and then among acculturated *Reform Jews did the Gothic style appear on the exterior (1888, Ceske Budejovice, Max Fleischer).

Greco-Roman architecture, with pagan associations, was usually considered unsuitable. Nevertheless, in the early nineteenth century, when Americans admired the Greek struggle for independence and associated the Greeks with their own revolutionaries, several U.S. congregations built synagogues in the Greek Revival mode (1841, *Charleston, Beth Elohim, Cyrus L. Warner and David L. Lopez). Occasionally, as in Warsaw (Tlomacka Street, 1877, Leandro Marconi) and Moscow (Arkhipova Street, 1891, Ivan Shaposhnikov and Lev Bachman), a Roman facade was designed for Jews who prudently conformed to a style promoted by their repressive government. At the end of the century, when excavations uncovered ancient Roman-era synagogues, architects in *New York City (1897, Shearith Israel, Arnold Brunner) and *Chicago (1891, Kehillah Anshe Ma'ariv, Dankmar Adler and Louis Sullivan) devised synagogues meant to reflect an authentic Jewish past.

Islamic forms, connoting the Middle East, came to be seen as particularly suitable. After the construction of the synagogue at Dresden (1840, Gottfried Semper), where the interior supports, horseshoe arches, and ornamentation were inspired by the Alhambra palace in *Spain, this style was adopted in many cities, including Budapest (Dohány Street, 1859, Ludwig von Förster); Cologne (Glockengasse, 1861, Ernst Zwirner); and New York City (1868, Temple Emanuel, Leopold Eidlitz). Spanish and *North African medieval (Moorish) architecture was as delicate and decorative as Gothic, so that it could be seen as "Jewish Gothic." Its potential for decorative elaboration recommended it to many congregations from Samara, Russia (end of the nineteenth century) to New York City's Eldridge Street synagogue (1887, Herter Brothers). This architectural style, however, did perpetuate views of European Jews as exotic and foreign.

Therefore, many Jewish architects favored versions of a sturdy and round-arched Romanesque style that was European in origin. This architectural style had preceded Gothic, just as Judaism had preceded Christianity, and was therefore considered conceptually appropriate. Examples include synagogues at Kassel (1843, Albert Rosengarten), Hannover (1870, Edwin Oppler), and Paris (Rue de la Victoire, 1874, Alfred Aldrophe).

A compromise between Middle Eastern and native European styles called the Byzantine style appeared in synagogues; these buildings had central plans, domes, and, often, nonfigural mosaic decoration. Jews approved of the style's Middle Eastern origin and also its connotations of Roman imperial power, because Constantinople (modern Istanbul) was the capital of the *Byzantine or Eastern Roman Empire until 1453. Most of these structures, even if designed in the nineteenth century, were constructed in the early twentieth century.

A few exceptional synagogues defy stylistic classification. These include synagogues in Stockholm (1870, Vilhelm Scholander) and Turin (1889, Alessandro Antonelli), which has an elongated cupola. Most European Jews in Asia and South America imported European ideas about sacred architecture. Synagogues in colonial cities and in North America employed many European styles, but where there was no official state religion, as in the United States, the political connotations of style lost their European potency.

Changes generated by Jews themselves, rather than by governments, were also responsible for new synagogue designs. The Central European Reform movement (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY), starting with the synagogue in Seesen, Germany (1810), moved the bimah (elevated platform used for *Torah reading) eastward toward the aron ha-kodesh (Torah ark); placed seats in orderly pews instead of arranging individual chairs and reading desks in a U-shape around the bimah; and sometimes provided space for a male choir, a harmonium, or an organ in a loft. As women's literacy and attendance increased and as *sermons and *music became important within modernized services, a women's gallery on only one side of the interior no longer sufficed. Architects accommodated the overflow in galleries above the aisles of the principal interior space, an idea derived from Protestant churches. Tall screens no longer hid women entirely from the view of male worshipers, although decorative parapets provided both safety and a sense of separation. Many nineteenth-century synagogue forms persisted into the early twentieth century. For further reading, see C. H. Krinsky, Synagogues of Europe: Architecture, History, Meaning (1996).

CAROL HERSELLE KRINSKY

Synagogues: Twentieth Century. At the beginning of the twentieth century, most synagogues continued to be historicist in style. Some styles, like the Moorish style, were actually nineteenth-century pastiches of older motifs. However, in many of these buildings, new structural and mechanical technologies and new materials were enthusiastically embraced.

In the early twentieth century a few distinctive synagogue designs broke with tradition. These included the synagogue in Subotica, Serbia (Komor and Jakab, 1901), which combined Balkan, Hungarian, and Jewish folk and architectural traditions, and Hector Guimard's striking Art Nouveau Rue Pavée Synagogue in Paris (1911–13). After World War I there was a shift toward simpler forms. Traditional plan arrangements were often maintained, but Art Deco and Art Moderne styles reduced applied decoration and streamlined forms. Although exteriors were frequently treated monochromatically, many sanctuaries were brilliantly colored, with liturgical, functional, and even mechanical elements uniformly designed with Deco and Moderne motifs. A masterful example is Temple Beth El in Paterson, New Jersey, built in the Art Deco style (Frederick Wentworth, 1929).

In Europe, the developments of the Modernist movement were adapted for synagogues. In Zilina, Slovakia (1928–30), Peter Behrens created a stripped-down version of the domed synagogue popular in *Central Europe. Behrens placed a half-dome on a rectangular block; within, the dome rises on slender concrete piers from a square, set within the rectangular mass. Outside, the ground floor is faced in stone, and the rest of the structure is made of reinforced concrete. Despite the concrete, the building looks traditional because of its massing and the monumental entrance stairway. Like Zilina, the monumental Great Synagogue in *Tel Aviv (ca. 1930) combines traditional elements such as arched windows and a large central dome with the plain smooth wall surfaces and combined massing of block-like forms typical of early European Modernism. The Yeshurun Synagogue in *Jerusalem (Friedmann, Rubin, and Stolzer, 1934–35) eschews the hierarchical arrangement of multiple forms for a simple joining of two main masses – a rectangular block, entered on its long side, with a tall half-cylinder, housing the sanctuary, joined to the rear.

Experiments with Modernism in synagogue design in the 1920s and 1930s include the Dutch Cubist-style Jacob Obrechtplein Synagogue in *Amsterdam (1927–28), designed by Jewish architect Harry Elte; it also recalls Frank Lloyd Wright's Unity Temple near *Chicago. The Lekstraat Synagogue (A. Elzas, 1936–37), also in Amsterdam, is a plain stone box with simple square windows that emphasizes only the ark (aron ha-kodesh, in which the *Torah scroll or scrolls are stored) and the bimah (elevated platform used for *Torah reading). Elzas, who won a competition among nine Jewish architects for the commission, designed an unusually spare synagogue. The simple geometry and white concrete walls are offset slightly by the use of exterior stone and the introduction of abundant natural light through large windows. In London, Sir Evan Owen Williams designed a very open interior for the Dollis Hill Synagogue with galleries cantilevered from the wall, rather than supported by piers of columns. The walls and roof are made of corrugated concrete that strengthen the structure. Hexagonal and shield-shaped windows recall the Star of David.

Perhaps the most consistent modern synagogue form of the period was that built in Plauen, Germany (Fritz Landauer, 1930). It was conceived as a white box elevated on stilts at one end; the window arrangement differentiates discreet building functions, much as in contemporary industrial buildings. The Oberstrasse Synagogue in Hamburg (Felix Ascher and Robert Friedman, 1931) combines simple forms and an austere exterior with a symmetrical and hierarchical arrangement of space, the formality of which resembled contemporary civic buildings. Notable modern synagogues were also built in Brno, Czechoslovakia, and Athens, Greece.

After World War II and the *Holocaust, most synagogue construction took place in the United States, where Modernism quickly supplanted earlier styles as an expression of a new Judaism. Demand for suburban synagogues created a boom of modern-style synagogues that also served as educational and community centers. Eric Mendelsohn developed the full expansion of the sanctuary and multiple use of spaces – important concepts for modern synagogue design. He accentuated the sanctuary section within a larger complex using elevated and curvilinear forms; sliding partitions allowed spaces to serve diverse functions at different times. At B'nai Amoona (St. Louis, 1950) a dramatic parabolic roof rises from the ark wall to the entrance wall; the top is glazed, allowing light to pour over the congregation and onto the bimah and ark. Mendelsohn's sanctuary at the Park Synagogue in Cleveland is a hemispheric dome that rises almost straight from the ground.

Mendelsohn's designs formed the basis of most suburban synagogue architecture from the 1940s through the 1980s. Percival Goodman appreciated and implemented Mendelsohn's innovations. His many designs lacked Mendelsohn's drama, but they excelled in providing efficient, functional, and differentiated spatial arrangements, often highlighted with accents of modern art. His widely emulated work often applied sculpture to spaces, rather than sculpted space.

Influenced by Mendelsohn and Goodman, many architects transformed the sanctuary space with dynamic expressive forms, often of concrete and glass. Congregations frequently favored symbolic building profiles recalling mountains or tents. Frank Lloyd Wright expressed his intent for Beth Shalom Synagogue (Elkins Park, Pennsylvania, 1959), writing, "We want to create the kind of building that people . . . will feel as if they were resting in the very hands of God." At Congregation Israel in Glencoe, Illinois (Minoru Yamasaki, 1964), pre-cast concrete arches frame the building, but large gaps in the structure fill the sanctuary with filtered light. The interior is spacious, and the use of light, white walls, and little ornamentation create a cerebral space. The tall, thin gilded ark has been likened to a prayer shawl wrapping the Torah scrolls, but from the sanctuary entrance it also suggests a single flame – a burning bush or eternal light.

In post-War Europe, the primary element of the Ruhrallee Synagogue at Essen, Germany (Dieter Knoblauch and Heinz Heise, 1959), is a hemisphere that rises directly from the ground – with no visible substructure or drum. The unified shape may symbolize the monotheism of Judaism, but it also reflected current trends in architecture favoring pure geometric forms. Inside, the ark is a rectangle inscribed within a broad triangle, set into the shell of the hemispheric dome at the apex of which a Star of David is inscribed, within a series of small round windows that define the shape with light. German architect Alfred Jacoby has inherited these traditions. His designs – often bright, crisp, and comfortable, with a single defining expressive element – have been very popular in late-twentieth-century Germany. His synagogue in Park City, Utah, has brought the language of Mendelsohn and Goodman back to the United States.

The dramatic synagogue in Livorno, *Italy (Angelo di Castro, 1962), replaced the famous Renaissance synagogue destroyed in World War II. The expressive structure is defined by crooked concrete buttresses that, connected by concrete walls, appear to exert pressure to keep the building together; these buttresses allow a large unimpeded interior sanctuary that, like its predecessor, has rows of seats on three sides and the Torah ark on the fourth.

In *Israel, similar expressive tendencies are found. The synagogue in Beersheva (1961) nestles under a sweeping concrete vault that covers the sanctuary like a turtle shell. The vault is anchored in the ground on either side of the small prayer hall that is lit by a wall perforated from floor to ceiling by hexagonal openings. In contrast to Beersheva, the Israel Goldstein Synagogue on the Givat Ram campus of the Hebrew University (Heinz Rau and David Reznik, 1957) appears ready to float away. The windowless synagogue recalls a giant balloon, as its smooth white bulbous form seems to levitate off the ground; its lower level is pierced with wide arches that light the entire structure, including the sanctuary encased in the building's upper part. Perhaps the most inventive of modern synagogues is the one at the army officer training school at Mitzpeh Ramon (Zvi Hecker, 1969), set in dreary desert surroundings. The exterior of the small sanctuary is concrete that is faceted like crystal to create a complex arrangement of colored shapes and patterns.

Very different is the Cymbalista Synagogue at Tel Aviv University (Mario Botta, 1998), which creates within a unique sculptural form two sanctuaries that are equal in size. Each is a near-cube and they are bathed in natural light funneled from above. The shapes, volumes, and the use of light are indebted to unbuilt synagogue projects of Louis Kahn.

Toward the end of the twentieth century, the number of large synagogue projects has declined in Europe and North America, as resources shifted to the erection of large regional community centers and to Jewish museums and *Holocaust memorials. In a reaction to Modernism, some communities attempted to re-create the lost intimacy of Old World and inner city synagogues – often by erecting smaller chapels incorporating historical styles adjacent to big sanctuaries or including symbolic elements referring to the lost synagogue culture of the Old World. Another trend is the incorporation of “green” technologies into synagogue designs. Environmental concerns remain, however, mostly rhetorical, although a significant effort has been made to integrate synagogues more into natural settings and to include more *gardens and greenery in the synagogue experience. Windows onto gardens and wooded areas, as at the 1989 Jewish Center of the Hamptons by Norman Jaffe (East Hampton, New York), are increasingly common (see ECOLOGY).

In the first decades of the twenty-first century important new synagogues continue to be built that combine the traditions of rationalism and expressionism and also adapt the forms pioneered by the modern masters.

For further reading, see K. Elman and A. Giral, eds. Per-cival Goodman: Architect, Planner, Teacher, Painter (2001); S. D. Gruber, American Synagogues: A Century of Architecture and Jewish Community (2003); A. Kampf, Contemporary Synagogue Art: Developments in the United States, 1945–1965 (1966); C. H. Krinsky, Synagogues of Europe (1985); R. Stephan, ed., Eric Mendelsohn, Architect 1887–1953 (1999); and E. Van Voolen and A. Sachs, eds., Contemporary Architecture and Jewish Identity (2004).

SAMUEL D. GRUBER

Synagogues, Wooden. Wooden synagogues were constructed continuously in *Eastern Europe from the earliest period of Jewish settlement beginning in the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries until their almost complete destruction by the *Nazis beginning in 1939. Unlike the synagogues in almost every other country of the Jewish *Diaspora, which followed the existing forms of local and regional architecture, a distinctive type of wooden synagogue architecture emerged in the Jewish communities in the small towns or *shtetls of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

The oldest documented wooden synagogues that survived into the twentieth century were built in the south central regions of present-day *Ukraine from the middle of the seventeenth century. Although there were once hundreds of wooden synagogues in small towns in what are now *Poland, Ukraine, *Belarus, and *Lithuania, the surviving documentation, primarily compiled by Polish architectural historians before *World War II, recorded only the largest and finest structures. One region of particular emphasis was present-day northwestern Poland and Lithuania where Jewish communities, such as Wolpa, Olkienniki, and Zabłudow, had erected magnificent synagogues that are generally considered to be masterworks of Eastern European monumental wooden architecture. Late in the nineteenth century, Polish and European architectural historians began to photograph and study the wooden synagogues. The primary sources of documentation were compiled under the direction of the Polish art historian, Szymon Zajczyk, by students of the Institute of Polish Architecture in Warsaw. It is this documentation that partially survived *Nazi destruction and was published by Maria and Kazimierz Piechotka in a series of landmark books beginning with Wooden Synagogues (1957 and 1959).

The construction system of most wooden synagogues combined a squared, stacked-log wall system of ancient Slavic origin with a technically advanced, early modern roof-trussing system that typically sheltered a unique, domed wooden cupola above the prayer hall. This curved, tent-like cupola was typically hung from the roof structure and, because of its technical and stylistic sophistication, was probably designed by regional architects employed by the Polish ruling class. This interior cupola combined Baroque styles related to monumental Polish civic buildings and churches with regional traditions of wood construction to produce the uniquely Jewish interior space of the small town synagogue. Surprisingly, this unique aspect of the wooden synagogues was not derivative of the masonry synagogues found in larger towns throughout these regions. The wooden synagogues were almost certainly built by non-Jewish craftsmen (Jews were generally excluded from the building trades) under the direction of regional master builders.

The interiors of these synagogues were dominated by an elaborate octagonal central bimah (elevated platform used for Torah reading) and a monumental multitiered ark (aron ha-kodesh; storage cabinet for the *Torah scroll or scrolls) set along the western walls. Although directly related to wooden monumental architecture of the Baroque period, especially church altars, the ark and bimah followed distinctive Jewish stylistic models that had developed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and were found throughout the *Ashkenazic Diaspora.

By the beginning of the eighteenth century, the prayer hall of the small town wooden synagogue was commonly built alongside a group of subordinate rooms and structures. Typically the auxiliary structures surrounding the prayer hall included an entrance hall, beit midrash (house of study), meeting rooms, a women's gallery, and possibly a school. Later in the nineteenth century, as the Jewish community grew, these functions were often transferred to neighboring buildings. A typical exterior expansion to the small town synagogue was the erection of a second-floor women's gallery above the entrance that replaced a first-floor gallery. This change in location may have reflected the influence of traditions from the larger towns. Such expansions can be recognized in exterior photographs by the presence of exterior stairs on the front of the synagogue that women used to attend services while men continued to use the main entrance to the prayer hall on the first floor.

Perhaps the most unusual aspect of the typical wooden synagogues from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was their common pattern of liturgical wall paintings. In synagogues from the oldest central Ukrainian regions, colorful, elaborate paintings covered the entire walls and ceiling of the prayer hall. The dominant visual elements of the paintings were large painted tablets with portions of daily prayer. Typically these prayers were painted with black Hebrew letters on brilliant white backgrounds and were surrounded by elaborately painted architectural surrounds with columns and arches following the precedent of book art and Hebrew illuminated manuscripts. The remaining surfaces of the interior were filled with ensembles of animal and vegetative motifs following highly stylized patterns typical of wooden synagogues throughout Eastern Europe.

Although early scholars sometimes attributed these paintings to the work or influence of local vernacular sources, the wooden synagogue paintings were actually the works of highly trained Jewish artists who occasionally signed and dated them. These artists probably worked in guild-like associations and produced a uniform liturgical art that was remarkably consistent in wooden synagogues throughout Eastern Europe. The most famous examples of wooden synagogue paintings to be photographed before their destruction were located in the towns of Gwozdziec, Chodorow, Jablonow, and Michalpol in the Podolia region of south central Ukraine. This regional style spread throughout Eastern Europe and was even imported to *Germany. In the 1730s, a well-documented artist from Brody in Ukraine, Eliezer Sussman, painted the walls of at least seven synagogues including, in 1735, the ceiling of the Horb Synagogue, which is preserved at the Israel Museum, *Jerusalem.

Although complex and exotic to a modern observer, these paintings actually followed consistent patterns of layout, motif, and liturgical reference. The paintings demonstrate the influence of sources outside of Poland, including *Sephardic/*Ottoman, Baroque, and Western European decorative arts motifs. They also reveal an older stratum of Ashkenazi Rhineland sources, particularly animal symbolism and architectural motifs of medieval origin. These paintings indicate a surprisingly multicultural and cosmopolitan development not usually associated with the small Polish/Ukrainian town or shtetl. See Plate 9 for similar imagery. This artistic tradition flourished in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; the practice ended in the early nineteenth century, although the paintings were generally preserved. This change in the character of the small town synagogue is generally attributed to the changes in Jewish communities of Eastern Europe during the Early Modern period, such as the advent of the Haskalah*, the rise of *Hasidism, and increasing industrialization and urbanization. Recent research includes T. C. Hubka, Resplendent Synagogue: Architecture and Worship in an Eighteenth-Century Polish Community (2003). THOMAS C. HUBKA

Syria, Ancient. Located at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, Syria is bordered by *Turkey, *Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and *Israel. In ancient times, Syria was an important trade center between *Mesopotamia and *Egypt; the city of Ebla, south of present-day Aleppo, was a major cultural and political power in the mid-third millennium BCE. Excavations at Ebla have yielded the earliest examples of a Semitic language, a form of Proto-Canaanite. The city of Ugarit, which flourished in the twelfth century BCE, is an important source of Canaanite literature, which was inscribed in an alphabetic cuneiform script on clay tablets (see CANAAN, CANAANITES; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT). Ugaritic, a northwest Semitic language, is closely related to Biblical *Hebrew; many of the writings from Ugarit offer important parallels to biblical writings, both prose and poetry, and have been valuable resources in translating difficult Hebrew words. They also illuminate the larger Canaanite context of which ancient Israel was a part (Map 1).

In the first millennium BCE, the *Phoenicians, who lived in an area stretching from northern Canaan to southern Syria and inland to the mountains of Lebanon, were the dominant ethnic group. Less a unified nation than a collection of independent city-states (Arwad, Byblos, Sidon, and Tyre), Phoenicia had a seafaring mercantile economy with trading connections throughout the region, including with the Israelite monarchies. In the *Hellenistic era, after the death of *Alexander the Great, Syria came under the rule of the *Seleucids, whose capital city was Antioch. In the mid-second century BCE, Seleucid Syria lost control of *Jerusalem and much of the Land of Israel to the *Hasmonean dynasty. After a century of decline, Syria was reorganized by Pompey into a *Roman province in 64 BCE, and it remained under Roman and *Byzantine rule until the *Muslim conquests of the seventh century CE. The Umayyad dynasty (661–750) established Damascus as its capital in 661. Significant numbers of Jews lived in Syria in Roman times, particularly in Damascus, and a sizable Jewish community lived there in the Muslim era as well. Maps 4, 5

Szold, Henrietta (1860–1945) was an editor and scholar, the guiding spirit and founder of Hadassah: The Women's Zionist Organization of America (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA), and a political leader in pre-statehood *Palestine. Born in Baltimore, the oldest child of Rabbi Benjamin Szold and his wife Sophie (Schaar) Szold, Szold was highly educated by her father and at Western Female High School. For fifteen years, she taught adult classes at her father's *synagogue, Oheb Shalom, and taught French, German, botany, and mathematics at the Misses Adam's School. In 1889 she founded and became principal of one of the first immigrant night schools in America. Szold was a charter member of the Baltimore Zion Association and served on the executive committee of the newly founded Federation of American Zionists.

As executive secretary of the *Jewish Publication Society (JPS) from 1893–1916, Szold played a pioneering role in creating Jewish literary culture in the *United States, translating, editing, and overseeing the publication of dozens of significant works on Jewish history and religion, inaugurating the American Jewish Year Book series, and writing essays herself.

In 1902, Szold was accepted as a special student at the *Jewish Theological Seminary in *New York City after pledging that she would not pursue a rabbinic diploma. There she fell in love with the scholar Louis Ginzberg, whose works she translated and edited; she suffered a severe emotional crisis when Ginzberg married a younger woman. A turning point came after a trip to *Palestine with her mother in 1909. In 1912, with associates from her women's Zionist study circle, Szold formed "the daughters of Zion" and became its first president; in 1914, this group became Hadassah. Led by Szold, Hadassah established a nurses' settlement in Palestine; this program was followed by innovative contributions to the health and welfare of both Jews and Arabs, including clinics, dispensaries, hospitals, infant welfare stations, and other services oriented to women and children.

Szold went to live in Palestine in 1920; except for occasional visits to the United States, she remained there for the rest of her life. In 1927, she was appointed to the three-member Palestine Zionist Executive. In 1931, elected to the executive board of the Vaad Leumi (National Council), she established a comprehensive system of social welfare services including family welfare, child care, immigrant aid, and vocational schooling. Her most challenging task came two years later, when she became head of Youth Aliyah, organizing and supervising the rescue of thousands of children from *Nazi *Germany.

In her later life, Szold's support of Brit Shalom (Covenant of Peace) and subsequently, the Ihud (Union) Association, which called for the creation of a binational state, drew criticism from some Zionist groups, including Hadassah. Yet her manifold contributions to the health, education, and welfare of the *Yishuv and her moral and intellectual leadership of the American Zionist women's movement made her a beloved, even legendary, figure in her lifetime. At once a visionary and a practical administrator, Szold gave American Jewish women an enduring public role and public Jewish identity in *Zionism (see also, ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT).

Recent research includes, B. R. Shargel, Lost Love: The Untold Story of Henrietta Szold (1997); B. Kessler, ed., Daughter of Zion: Henrietta Szold and American Jewish Woman (1995); and S. Reinharz and M. Raider, eds., American Jewish Women and the Zionist Enterprise (2005).

JOYCE ANTLER

Tabernacle (mishkan in Hebrew, literally “dwelling”) refers to the portable shrine described in the *Pentateuch as accompanying the Israelites throughout their wilderness wanderings. The Tabernacle served as the center of sacrificial and cultic activity and was also the place where the *Ark of the Covenant was housed. According to Exodus 40:34, “the cloud covered the Tent of Meeting, and the Presence of the Lord filled the Tabernacle.” Directions as to the construction of the Tabernacle and its component parts were revealed to Moses at Mount Sinai (Exod 25–27). It was to be erected facing eastward wherever the Israelites camped, and the tribes were to be arrayed around it in a prescribed pattern. Modern scholarship assigns the detailed traditions about building of the Tabernacle and the types of sacrifices to be offered there (Leviticus) to the Priestly strand of biblical authorship (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP). According to these texts, the priests or kohanim, the descendants of *Aaron, brother of *Moses, officiated at the Tabernacle, while other members of the tribe of Levi, the “regular” Levites, had subservient roles (see PRIESTHOOD).

Many modern scholars question the historicity of the Tabernacle narratives described in the *Torah and suggest that Priestly writers of a later era projected their vision of a wilderness mishkan to reinforce the significance of the Jerusalem *Temple, “the place in which I will put my name” (Deut 12:5), to worshipers of their own time. Others suggest that stories about the Tabernacle reflect a shrine from the reign of King *David, which itself would have been based on shrines from the pre-monarchic period of Israelite life in the Land of Israel. See also CANAAN, CANAANITES; EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Tallit (pl. tallitot) is a *prayer shawl, traditionally made of wool or silk, worn by adults during morning *worship, on *Tisha B’Av in the afternoon, and on *Yom Kippur at all services. Each of the prayer shawl’s four corners has a fringe called tzitzit that is knotted in a particular way. These fringes are based on Numbers 15:38–40 and Deuteronomy 22:12, which ordain the making of twisted cords on the four corners of one’s garment as a constant reminder of divine *commandments; Numbers 15:38–40 also specify that the fringes should include a blue thread, although this is no longer considered a requirement for the tzitzit. Until recently, only men wore tallitot; in the beginning of the twenty-first century, it is increasingly common for women to wear tallitot during worship, including in some Orthodox settings (JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX). In some traditional communities, men wear a smaller, four-cornered garment called a tallit katan or arba kanfot under their clothing as a reminder throughout the day of the obligation to observe divine commandments.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Talmud, Babylonian. The Babylonian Talmud (abbreviated BT in this volume; also referred to as Bavli or Shas) is the literary pinnacle of *rabbinic *Judaism. From the time of its composition, it has been the work of literature most representative of Jewish ideas, values, laws, practices, rituals, and culture. The BT has served as both the primary study text in the rabbinic curriculum from the period of the geonic academies to the present and the starting point for discussions of halakhah (Jewish law), both practical and theoretical.

The two extant literary Talmuds, the Jerusalem (JT) and Babylonian Talmuds, owe their general form and some content to the discourse of talmud (“study”) undertaken by the *Amoraim, rabbinic scholars and teachers who were intellectually active in both *Palestine and *Babylonia from ca. 200–ca. 500 CE. The Amoraim, like their predecessors, the *Tannaim, produced two general types of texts: *midrash, the creative interpretation of the *Bible, and mishnah, the formulation of legal statutes and theological principles. The Talmuds include both approaches in their systematic discussions of the *Mishnah, the legal compilation completed in the Land of *Israel ca. 200 CE.

The Talmuds are structured as commentaries to the Mishnah; their expositions proceed order by order, tractate by tractate, and chapter to chapter, down to each individual mishnah. However, the Amoraim were not limited by the Mishnah’s content; rather, they used the subject matter of each mishnah as a conceptual starting point for a conversation that incorporates tannaitic beraitot* (traditions that do not appear in the Mishnah) in both mishnah and midrash form, amoraic statements (in both mishnah and midrash form), and interpretations and debates about these statements conducted by named Rabbis of later generations and by the Talmud’s anonymous voice. These conversations can also include biographical anecdotes about contemporaneous figures. An individual mishnah may generate several such conversations, or sugyot (sing., sugyah). Redacted versions of these discussions, cumulatively termed gemara* (study), were ultimately combined with the Mishnah to form the Talmud.

The BT is larger, less ambiguously composed, and more conceptually developed than its counterpart. While the JT was redacted in the fourth century CE, the BT remained a work in progress until the seventh century; even after its main redaction, the BT’s text remained fluid enough to allow for interpolations and slight modifications until well into the period of the *Geonim. The two Talmuds are also the products of different political and cultural surroundings; the JT came together within a *Byzantine Roman environment populated by neighboring pagans and Christians, whereas the BT was redacted in the Sassanid Persian environment among neighboring Zoroastrians (see PERSIA).

Both Talmuds are anthological in the sense that they collect earlier materials from disparate Rabbis who lived in different geographic regions (in both Palestine and Babylonia), in different times (ca. 70–ca. 750 CE). Each Talmud can be described as a collage that juxtaposes different texts and even different genres of text, while explicitly attributing the voices in its conversation to a temporally and geographically diverse rabbinic population. That being said, each Talmud is the expression of a specific social group, and the ideas each contains reflect the weaknesses of that group as much as its strengths. In many ways, rabbinic literature is elitist and misogynistic, reflecting the limitations of its collective authors. Even within rabbinic literature, the BT reflects a particular suspicion of learned women. When earlier materials being used within a BT sugyah transmit the possibility of women of authority and knowledge, BT interpreters resist this presentation and rewrite their received sources to subjugate such women to rabbinic male authorities (see TALMUD STUDY: FEMINIST APPROACHES).

The energy of a talmudic sugyah is often dialectical, involved in resolving the apparent conflict of disagreeing canonical sources, be they biblical, tannaitic, or amoraic. A posed conflict can be resolved either by distinguishing the cases conceptually (dialectically) or by assigning two contradictory positions to named authorities of equal canonical weight. The issue of canonical weight emerges from the underlying assumption, shared by both Talmuds, that the periodization of Tannaim and Amoraim creates a line of authoritative division. According to this assumption, any Tanna, regardless of era, can argue with any other Tanna; similarly, any Amora can argue with any other Amora. However, an Amora may not argue with a Tanna, even if the time gap between the Amora and the Tanna is shorter than the gap between an earlier and later Tanna or an earlier and later Amora. Many talmudic sugyot have the feeling of bookkeeping exercises intended to preserve these assumptions about rabbinic canonical authority.

The traditional understanding of the Talmuds' composition is that both of the extant literary works are direct and accidental remnants of the intellectual discourse of talmud. Because scholars must have compiled an oral record of talmudic discourses to preserve the opinions of earlier Rabbis, the Talmuds that we have today, the thinking goes, are merely transcriptions of these oral records. This understanding of talmudic composition is still the scholarly consensus for the JT. Over the last forty years, however, scholars have reached a different understanding about the composition of the BT. Although the BT undoubtedly draws on the oral record of talmudic discourses in amoraic times, the BT's redacted text represents a more thorough and comprehensive redaction. This redaction (editing) is responsible both for the comparatively smooth organizational flow (relative to the JT) of the warp and woof of BT sugyot and for a significant portion of content that is unattributed to named Tannaim and Amoraim. The anonymous nature of the BT's redactors has earned them the name Stammaim* (anonymous ones).

In a given JT sugyah, the relationship between adjacent texts (for example a mishnah-style baraita and an amoraic midrash) is often ambiguous and left to the reader to determine, sometimes with great difficulty. Within a BT sugyah, by contrast, the relationship between collected texts is almost always expressly spelled out by the words of an anonymous stam, who notes that the two texts are mutually supportive, contradictory, or coincidentally overlapping. Additionally, a sugyah is often constructed linearly along historical lines, with tannaitic material followed by amoraic material followed by anonymous material. This creates the framework in which later authorities can comment on and interpret the opinions of their predecessors. As the latest authorities in this chain, the anonymous Stammaim play a significant role in interpreting tannaitic and amoraic texts, because all readers of the BT encounter the tannaitic and amoraic viewpoints through the lens of their stammaitic interpreters.

The importance of the Stammaim is not limited to a particular genre of talmudic composition. Within ethical or theological discussions, legal debates, or extensive narratives, the Stammaim shaped earlier materials and the evolution of ideas. Recent work has demonstrated the extent to which the Stammaim are responsible for some of the most famous BT narratives as well as for the abstract legal conceptualizations for which the BT is well known. In short, scholars now consider the Stammaim the authors of the BT as we know it.

Although the BT does not differentiate between halakhah* (legal teachings) and aggadah* (nonlegal traditions), geonic interests in consolidating legal authority led to a curriculum that was selectively oriented toward its legal portions. Some of the earliest geonic monographs are legal codes* whose prose is cut and pasted from the BT. The geonic responsa*, mostly legal rulings posted to distant Jewish communities, rely almost exclusively on the BT. Post-geonic responsa down to the present continue this practice of discussing legal issues within the framework of the BT sugyot in which they arise. Since the geonic period, vocational scholars have been more interested in the halakhic sugyot of the BT, even though the BT consists of roughly equal amounts of halakhah and aggadah and this material is not differentiated within the text.

Composed orally, the BT was studied orally into the geonic period, when it began to be transcribed. The earliest written text witness of the Bavli is an eighth- or ninth-century Cairo Genizah* fragment of a scroll containing Tractate Hullin. The BT survived in manuscript form until the dawn of printing. Among the surviving medieval manuscripts of the BT is Munich 95, a manuscript that records the BT in its entirety. Bavli tractates were printed in pre-expulsion Spain and by printers from the Soncino family in Italy* in the fifteenth century (see PRINTING). The first complete printed edition of the BT, the Bomberg Shas, was printed in Venice* between 1519 and 1523. The Vilna edition of 1880–86, printed by the “Press of the Widow and Romm Brothers” is a remarkable aesthetic achievement and has stood as the definitive edition of the BT ever since.

Two aggadic digests of BT, Haggadot ha-Talmud and Ein Yaakov, were printed in the sixteenth century. The latter volume was a popular text in the sixteenth through twentieth centuries and went through more than a hundred printings. In the last century, the entire BT has become a popular study text for nonvocational scholars, individuals who are not professionally involved with the Jewish community or academics in Jewish studies*, with the rise of Daf Yomi, a program that studies one two-sided page of BT every day and completes the BT in its entirety every seven and a half years. Recent celebrations to honor this completion have filled major arenas in the United States and Israel.

For further reading, see R. Kalmin, “The Formation and Character of the Babylonian Talmud,” in The Cambridge

History of Judaism, vol. 4, ed. S. T. Katz (2006), 840–76; and C. E. Fonrobert and M. S. Jaffee, eds., The Cambridge Companion to the Talmud and Rabbinic Literature (2007).

BARRY WIMPFHEIMER

Talmud, Jerusalem (Yerushalmi, abbreviated in this volume as JT). This Talmud, also known as the Talmud of the Land of Israel or the Palestinian Talmud (and sometimes abbreviated at PT), is the commentary on the Mishnah* of the Amoraim* living in the Land of Israel. From the period of the Geonim* until early modernity, the JT was also known as gemara d'vnei ma'arava (the learning of the people of the West), gemara d'vnei eretz Yisrael (the learning of the people of the Land of Israel), as well as more briefly, talmud eretz Yisrael and talmud d'ma'arava.

The JT is organized according to the orders of the Mishnah and is divided into tractates, chapters, and halakhot (discussions of an individual mishnah or parts thereof). There is no JT to chapters 21–24 of Tractate Shabbat, chapter 3 of Makkot, Tractates Avot* and Eduyyot, all of order Kodashim, and most of order Tohorot, except for chapters 1–3 of Niddah. Scholars consider it unlikely that the JT ever included Kodashim and Tohorot, and attempts to reconstruct the missing portions of Shabbat, Makkot, and Niddah have proven flawed. Manuscript evidence suggests that even at an early stage the JT did not cover these mishnaic orders and chapters.

The JT explicates mishnayot and beraitot*, presents aggadah*, examines legal and conceptual issues ranging beyond the specific mishnah under discussion, and anthologizes material thematically related to the individual mishnah. One of the JT's noteworthy literary features is that of "transferred sugyot," which are often lengthy sequences of material that are repeated nearly verbatim in different JT tractates. These repetitions may be due to the redactors' desire either to use the transferred material to shed light on a discussion in another tractate or simply to include all relevant material within one tractate so that the tractate can be studied independently of the whole. Yet, the JT did not undergo the centuries of intensive scrutiny accorded the Babylonian Talmud* (BT) and was relatively neglected before the nineteenth century. Numerous textual problems render the JT a challenging subject of study; they were likely both cause and effect of its marginalization. Elucidating the text and establishing accurate readings in the JT are consequently important concerns of academic scholarship. Contemporary academic scholarship also studies the JT's literary features and halakhah*, as well as what it reveals about amoraic rabbinic culture in the Land of Israel.

The JT includes the teachings of five generations of Amoraim (ca. 220–360/370 CE), who were mainly active in Tiberias (the likely site of the JT's redaction), Lydda, Sephoris, and Caesarea, all sites in the Land of Israel. Academic talmudists at one time believed that the end of the Palestinian Patriarchate* in 429 and/or a supposed climate of persecution in fifth-century Palestine served as the catalysts for the JT's redaction. Saul Lieberman also famously argued that the tractates Bava Kamma, Bava Metzia, and Bava Batra were edited in Caesarea approximately fifty years before the rest of the JT (ca. 350). His argument was based chiefly on these tractates' Caesarean focus, terser language, and the overwhelming presence in them of early Amoraim and the absence of major and especially late Amoraim.

Skepticism currently reigns about the arguments for a 429 date and about Lieberman's "Talmud of Caesarea" hypothesis (notwithstanding scholarly acknowledgment that those three tractates have distinctive features); the reasons for the JT's redaction remain unclear. It has very recently been suggested that the JT was redacted at the end of the Palestinian Amoraic period in ca. 360/370. Yet a ca. 400 date remains plausible because little in the JT's portrayal of the Amoraim suggests that they functioned as redactors. Moreover, an anonymous editorial layer, independent of the Amoraim, that arranges and comments on materials is clearly present.

The JT was first printed in Venice* in 1523 on the basis of a manuscript (the Leiden manuscript) copied by R. Jehiel ben R. Jekutieli in Rome in 1289. R. Jehiel described this manuscript as full of errors and stated that he had made corrections on his own authority. Later glossators also made changes to R. Jehiel's manuscript, and these changes, many of which were not based on solid knowledge of the JT or its Galilean Aramaic* dialect, made their way into the Venice edition, which is the basis of all subsequent printed editions. In 2001, the Academy of the Hebrew Language published a scholarly edition of the Leiden manuscript that, among other things, distinguishes the JT base text from the pre-1523 emendations. This new edition will facilitate scholarly research into the text of JT. The Leiden manuscript is the only manuscript of the entire JT, but partial manuscripts are also extant. These include the slightly older, incomplete Rome manuscript (which contains all of order Zera'im except for Bikkurim, and Sotah); the Escorial manuscript of the three Bava tractates (fifteenth century); and JT fragments from the Cairo Genizah*.

The JT contains Babylonian sugyot and teachings attributable to Babylonian Amoraim of the first three generations (ca. 220–350), but lacks teachings from the following four generations. The BT contains much Palestinian material, including traditions of the nahotei (those who descended), sages who transmitted rabbinic teachings between Babylonia and Palestine. Pre-modern and traditionalist scholarship inclined to the view that some traditions in the BT depended on teachings in the JT. Beginning in the nineteenth century, academic scholarship agreed that the BT knew nothing of the JT. This debate became more nuanced in the twentieth century, as some scholars argued that the inter-talmudic parallels are largely due to a layer of "early talmud" shared by the two rabbinic centers. This position has been further refined with the growing realization that some sages of the fourth and fifth Babylonian Amoraic generations (mid- to late-fourth century CE) were strongly influenced by Palestinian learning. This suggests that at least some inter-talmudic parallels may be due to an influx of Palestinian materials into Babylonia toward the end of the Amoraic period in the Land of Israel. A recent study by Alyssa Gray argues that one BT tractate may have known and relied on its JT parallel.

For further reading, see J. Neusner, The Talmud of the Land of Israel, vol. 35 (1983); C. Hayes, Between the Babylonian and Palestinian Talmuds (1997); R. Kalmin, The Sage in Jewish Society of Late Antiquity (1999); idem, Jewish Babylonia between Persia and Roman Palestine (2006); B. Bokser, Yerushalmi Pesachim, ed. L. Schiffman (1994); and A. Gray, A Talmud in Exile (2005).

ALYSSA M. GRAY

Talmud Study: Feminist Approaches. Feminist approaches to the Talmud are the direct result of Second Wave feminism, an intellectual movement of the 1960s and '70s. Second Wave feminism investigated the origins of patriarchy and criticized patriarchal societies and religions that uphold and maintain women's inferior opportunities and secondary positions in most aspects of life. It identified monotheistic religions, among them Christianity and Judaism, as patriarchal religions; the feminist project of critiquing their foundational documents and holy canons began with the Bible (both the Hebrew Scriptures and the New Testament). Some feminist scholars also identified the Talmud (particularly the Babylonian Talmud, which became in effect the second Jewish Scripture) as a site of patriarchal authority within Judaism.

Feminist studies in talmudic literature began with the rather naïve question of whether the Talmud should be seen as an improvement on the Hebrew Bible with regard to women or whether, on the contrary, it reinforced and increased women's secondary position and lesser status in Judaism. This approach arose from a similar Christian endeavor, in which Christian feminists were describing early Christianity as a reaction against the repressive attitude of Judaism to women, represented by the Rabbis who produced the Talmud. Elsewhere, I have defined this sort of assessment, in which scholars deem one patriarchal system as more friendly to women than another, as "comparative patriarchy," and I have questioned the usefulness of and motivations behind denigrating one system while praising another.

Since the mid-1980s, however, there has been a shift in emphasis in feminist studies of the Talmud. Increasingly, the Talmud itself and related documents (such as midrashic compositions of various eras) have become the focus of investigation and are studied as foundational Jewish patriarchal documents in their own right. Early scholars who engaged in feminist talmudic research tended to be women (foremost among them Judith Hauptman, Judith R. Baskin, and Judith R. Wegner), but as feminist (and women's) studies became a recognized discipline internationally (often in the process, changing its name to gender studies), many male scholars joined the project (Jacob Neusner and Daniel Boyarin have been especially influential in the talmudic realm). This change in emphasis arose not just because of an internal critique of earlier methods but also as a result of a paradigm shift evident in a broad range of fields. Feminist studies profited significantly from post-modern critiques of many academic disciplines, which deconstructed the way knowledge was created as a seat of power for the elite against the poor, the colonized, the dispossessed, and, among them, women. These critiques identified talmudic discourse as a prime example of a privileged male endeavor that participated in the disempowerment and silencing of female voices. Academic talmudic studies since the nineteenth-century Wissenschaft des Judentums was seen as continuing these attitudes. Among the scholars who have been active in this newer feminist critique of rabbinic texts are Charlotte Fonrobert, Miriam Peskowitz, and Michael Satlow.

Most feminist studies of talmudic literature in the first decade of the twenty-first century tend to be focused on a specific issue (such as the talmudic construction of menstruation (niddah), rabbinic attitudes to marriage, or rabbinic formations of male-female division of labor) rather than on general analyses or overviews of rabbinic attitudes toward women. Many scholars are interested in how and why rabbinic literature constructed particular visions of women and of relations between the sexes. Some contemporary scholars have critiqued previous feminist endeavors for naiveté, a lack of attention to minority voices in rabbinic discourse, or insensitivity to nuance; some have described their own work as more sophisticated or rigorous than that of their predecessors. Perhaps, however, their work might best be described as a product of a new academic Zeitgeist.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, an innovative international project is underway. Its goal is to profit from all forms of feminist insight, to bring together scholars from the various approaches described earlier, and to draw on their collective energy to create a comprehensive feminist commentary on the Babylonian Talmud. The first volume, devoted to Tractate Taanit, appeared in 2008.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, "The Separation of Women in Rabbinic Literature," in Women, Religion and Social Change, ed. Y. Y. Haddad and E. B. Findly (1985); idem, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002); D. Boyarin, Carnal Israel: Reading Sex in Talmudic Culture (1993); C. E. Fonrobert, Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender (2000); J. Hauptman, "Women's Liberation in the Talmudic Period: An Assessment," Judaism 26(4) (1971–2): 22–28; idem, Rereading the Rabbis (1998); T. Ilan, "Jewish Women's Studies," in Oxford Handbook of Jewish Studies, ed. M. Goodman (2002), 770–96; idem, Massekhet Ta'anit (Feminist Commentary to the Babylonian Talmud), vol. II.9 (2008); J. Neusner, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Women IV (1980); M. Peskowitz, Spinning Fantasies: Rabbis, Gender, and History (1997); J. Plaskow, "Anti-Judaism in Feminist Christian Interpretation," in Searching the Scriptures. Volume One: A Feminist Commentary, ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza (1994), 117–29; M. Satlow, Jewish Marriage in Antiquity (2001); and J. Romney Wegner, Chattel or Person: The Status of Women in the Mishnah (1988).

TAL ILAN

Talmud Study: Modern Approaches. For many generations, the study and analysis of the talmudic corpus, especially the Babylonian Talmud, was one of the most prestigious religious vocations in traditional Jewish societies. In nineteenth-century Eastern Europe, influential forces, among them the Hasidic movement and the Haskalah (Jewish enlightenment), decentralized and weakened the position of Talmud study as the preeminent activity to which Jewish males, especially young Jewish boys, could aspire. In direct response to these challenges, the modern study of Talmud emerged and attracted new generations of scholars, outnumbering and possibly excelling previous generations.

The first modern yeshivah (talmudic academy) was established by R. Chayim of Volozhin, the prominent disciple of the Vilna Gaon, in Volozhin (now Valozhyn, Belarus). Following the model and inspiration of his mentor, and in direct response to the theological challenges of Hasidism, R. Chayim of Volozhin developed a theology according to which scholars should undertake the study of Torah in a contemplative manner, for the sake of the Torah itself (lishma), with little or no practical intent. The Volozhin Yeshivah was therefore instituted as an absolutely independent institution, dedicated exclusively to the theoretical study of the Talmud. It was owned and administered by the Rosh Yeshivah, the dean, who was responsible for the spiritual development and material needs of his students. Methodological innovations were not visible or intended at first, but they soon developed in this rigorous environment.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, Rav Chaim Soloveitchik, a brilliant scholar from Brisk, who taught for several years in the Volozhin Yeshivah, developed an original method of studying the Talmud. Rav Chaim Soloveitchik was not interested in the literal hermeneutics of the Talmud or in complex comparative and harmonistic studies of topics (sugyot) in the form of casuistic argument (pilpul). Instead, he preferred to take a single topic and to break it down into its basic analytical components to understand how these different elements interacted in constituting a specific sugyah and later giving rise to a single prescribed action or law. Although this method was not itself entirely unprecedented, the systematic way in which Rav Chaim Soloveitchik applied it and the technical language he created for it, such as hakirah (inquiry), hiluk (distinction), and dinim (underlying principles), were new. Rav Chaim Soloveitchik's method was further developed by his sons, Yitzhak Zev of Brisk and Moshe Soloveitchik, and by his grandsons, of whom the most famous was Joseph B. *Soloveitchik of *Boston, and by other more faithful disciples, such as Baruch Ber of Kaminitz (N. Solomon, The Analytic Movement: Hayyim Soloveitchik and His Circle [1993]). Although many challenged this new method, seeing it as far too synthetic an approach to the complexity of talmudic literature, it nonetheless spread quickly in the yeshivah world and paved the way for further methodological debates and modification. One such was promoted by Rabbi Shimon Shkop of Telz, who suggested that sevarah (natural and unaided logic), more than revelation, was the ground for monetary laws in Judaism.

During the twentieth century, the Talmud was studied in academic settings as well. The new generation of scholars – H. Albeck, J. N. Epstein, S. Lieberman, and E. A. Orbach – who came to academia after being exposed to the new and radical methods developed in the yeshivot, preferred a critical and historical approach to the Talmud. Previous generations of academic Talmud scholars had paid little if any attention to the rich and diverse manuscript tradition of the entire talmudic corpus or to how the historical process of redaction and editing shaped the tradition itself. In recent years, with the publication of a variety of critical editions, scholars are better able to identify different layers and previous forms of the various sections of the talmudic corpus; greater authority is now attached to the *Stammait, the anonymous editors and redactors of the Babylonian Talmud (see TALMUD, BABYLONIAN). For contemporary approaches to academic Talmud study, see C. E. Fonrobert and M. S. Jaffee, eds., The Cambridge Companion to the Talmud and Rabbinic Literature (2007).

CHAIM MEIR NERIA

Tamar (Genesis 38) is the daughter-in-law of *Judah, one of *Jacob's sons. She first marries Er, who dies without offspring. Tamar is then married to Er's brother, Onan, in accordance with the Israelite principle of levirate marriage (see MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE), whereby a near male relative married a childless widow. Their first male child would carry on the lineage of the deceased and inherit his property. Onan refuses to fulfill his levirate duty and is killed by God. Fearful that Tamar is the cause of his elder sons' deaths, Judah denies her his last son, Shelah. To obtain her rights, Tamar disguises herself as a *prostitute and becomes pregnant by Judah. Although Judah initially condemns Tamar for "playing the harlot," he ultimately acknowledges her righteousness. Tamar gives birth to twins, Perez and Zerah; through Perez, she is an ancestress of King *David (Ruth 4:12, 18–22; 1 Chron 2:4). Biblical tradition praises Tamar for her faithfulness to the principle of levirate marriage.

NAOMI STEINBERG

Tamar (2 Samuel) is the daughter of King *David (2 Sam 13). Although her mother is not directly identified, Tamar is said to be a full sister of Absalom, who was the son of Maacah (2 Sam 3:3). Tamar is also a half-sister of Amnon, David's firstborn son by his wife Ahinoam. Professing love for Tamar, Amnon uses a ruse to rape her and then immediately banishes her from his presence. Tamar's brother Absalom takes her into his house and advises her to remain quiet about this outrage and not to take it to heart; at this point, the forlorn Tamar disappears from the story. When Amnon's treatment of Tamar does not prompt David to take action, Absalom takes revenge against Amnon and kills him. This action advances Absalom's chances of becoming heir to the throne but also prompts his rebellion against his father that will lead to his own death. Thus, Tamar unwittingly plays a central role in the succession narrative that will ultimately result in *Solomon succeeding David as king.

In 2 Samuel 14:27, another Tamar is named as one of the four children and only daughter of Absalom; she is said to be beautiful, as was her father (14:25).

NAOMI STEINBERG

Tammuz is the fourth month of the Jewish calendar, usually falling in June and/or July according to the Gregorian calendar. See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Tanakh is an acronym designating the Hebrew *Bible. It is formed from the Hebrew words *Torah (*Pentateuch/Five Books of Moses), Nevi'im (*Prophets), and Ketuvim (Writings).

Tannaim (sing. Tanna, from Aramaic teni, Hebrew shanah, "to repeat, learn, teach, recite") are the rabbinic teachers of the period of the *Mishnah, so called because their teachings are supposed to have been transmitted by continual oral repetition. Medieval authorities disagree about when the tannaitic period began. Most believed that the era began with *Hillel and Shammai (first century CE), but some saw Simon the Just, who lived two or three centuries earlier, as the first Tanna (e.g., Joseph ibn Aknin); others began with the destruction of the *Temple in 70 CE, regarding *Joḥanan ben Zakkai as the first Tanna (e.g., *Abraham ibn Daud in his Sefer ha-Kabbalah). The period of the Tannaim ends with *Judah ha-Nasi and his sons in the early third century (see MISHNAH). Since ibn Daud, the Tannaim have generally been counted as five generations, perhaps in conscious symmetry with the five "pairs" (zugot) leading up to Hillel and Shammai.

The most important Tannaim before 70 CE are Gamaliel the Elder and Simon ben Gamaliel; other scholars of the period are frequently mentioned collectively as the "houses"

(or “schools”; batei) of Hillel and Shammai. Outstanding younger contemporaries of *Joḥanan ben Zakkai are Rabban Gamaliel II, Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, Joshua ben Ḥananiah, and Eleazar ben Azariah. R. Ishmael and R. *Akiva were the most important teachers before the Second *Jewish War against Rome (132–35 CE). The most outstanding members of the post-war generation were R. Meir, R. Nathan, R. Simon ben Yoḥai, R. Judah, and R. Neḥemiah. R. Ḥiyya, and Bar Kappara were younger contemporaries of Judah ha-Nasi.

All these Rabbis were active in *Palestine after the destruction of *Jerusalem, mostly at Yavneh (Jamnia) and Lod (Lydda) in *Judea; after *Bar Kokhba, the rabbinic center moved to the *Galilee, where at first Usha, then Beth Shearim, and finally Sepphoris were the major centers of the rabbinic movement. Many of the early Tannaim may have been *Pharisees before 70 CE, but this is explicitly attested only for Gamaliel the Elder in the *New Testament and for his son Simon ben Gamaliel by *Josephus. A number of early Rabbis were priests (see PRIESTHOOD); before 70, others may have been scribes. Older scholarship assumed that soon after the destruction of the Temple in 70, the Tannaim, under the leadership of the *Patriarch, took over the religious and perhaps also the political leadership of the Jewish people, continuing the old institution of the *Sanhedrin as the highest national authority. More recent studies question both the existence of a national Sanhedrin after 70 and the office of the Patriarch before Simon ben Gamaliel II or Judah ha-Nasi. Contemporary scholarship also minimizes the importance of the rabbinic movement in the tannaitic period and the influence of the Tannaim among the common people.

The teachings of the Tannaim are included in the Mishnah, *Tosefta, and halakhic *midrashim on the books of *Exodus (Mekhilta), *Leviticus (Sifra), *Numbers (Sifre on Numbers and Sifre Zuta), and *Deuteronomy (Sifre on Deuteronomy), and in Seder 'Olam Rabbah, the rabbinic chronography attributed to Jose ben Ḥalafta. Other tannaitic teachings are found in both *Talmuds and other later rabbinic writings, introduced as baraitot (“external” teachings) with formulas such as teno rabbanan (our masters teach), tanya (it has been taught), or similar expressions containing the root teni. These teachings are considered to be especially authoritative, nearly at the same level as sayings in the Mishnah. Yet, many have been reworked or are outright pseudepigraphic.

Biographical anecdotes about some of the more famous Tannaim, such as Hillel, Akiva, or Meir, appear only in the Talmuds and later midrashim and cannot be taken at face value; many are hagiographic legends, incorporating and exemplifying the values of a much later period. The only Babylonian master coming close to the authority of the Palestinian Tannaim is Rav, also called Abba Arikha, “the Tall.” He had studied in Palestine before returning to *Babylonia where he became the most important rabbinic teacher at *Sura on the Euphrates until his death in 247 (the date is given by Sherira *Gaon). The Babylonian Talmud states several times (e.g., BT Sanhedrin 83b), “He counts as a Tanna and may dispute (against the view adopted in the Mishnah).”

Another meaning of the term tanna is that of a coach who knew as much as possible of the rabbinic tradition by heart and passed on his knowledge to students by his continually repeated recitation. A kind of walking library, he was despised by many Rabbis because of his purely mechanical knowledge: “The magician mutters and does not know what he is saying. The tanna teaches and does not know what he is saying” (BT Sotah 22a). Despite such criticisms this office remained in existence until *geonic times because it was so closely connected with the rabbinic ritual of learning and the Oral *Torah.

For further reading, see J. Neusner, ed., Dictionary of Ancient Rabbis. Selections from The Jewish Encyclopaedia (2003); C. Hezser, The Social Structure of the Rabbinic Movement in Roman Palestine (1997); and G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (1996). GÜNTER STEMBERGER

Targum (pl. targumim) is the *Aramaic word for translation and refers especially to the Aramaic translations of the *Bible. During the *Second Temple period, Hebrew ceased to be the spoken language of the Jewish people; it was replaced by Greek (in the Hellenistic *Diaspora), Aramaic (in its various dialects in the *Land of Israel and *Babylonia), and Mishnaic Hebrew. There was thus a need for a translation that would accompany the public reading of sacred scriptures, thereby preventing them from becoming an incomprehensible and fossilized heritage of the past. This translation was especially needed after rabbinic preaching charged the biblical texts with new *aggadic and *halakhic interpretations that had to be transmitted to the masses. The need for this “mediator” between scriptures and the people was especially urgent in the *synagogues and in the schools in which the younger generation was educated. In addition to Greek translations of the Bible such as the *Septuagint, quite a few Aramaic texts preserve the synagogue activity of the meturgemanim (translators), which took place in the first seven centuries CE, until the Muslim conquest of the Middle East. The most famous translations are the translation of the *Pentateuch attributed to a certain Onkelos (who is believed to have lived in the Land of Israel in the first to second centuries CE) and the Targum to the *Prophets composed by his contemporary, Jonathan ben Uziel. These two Targumim were also used by the *Babylonian Rabbis and eventually were accepted as the authoritative translations of the biblical texts, thus achieving a great sanctity. Other Targumim that were created in the Land of Israel, such as the Targum Yerushalmi to the *Pentateuch, did not enjoy such a status, but they also testify to the ways in which the vitality of the sacred scriptures was maintained.

The Targumim incorporated many aggadic and halakhic traditions – words of rebuke or consolation, folk elements, and theological issues – into the biblical text, constructing new interpretations to suit the ears and needs of new generations. Often this meant that they drew away from the “simple” meaning of the text or inserted long additions that might sometimes overshadow the biblical source. The variegated traditions that were embedded in these translations frequently have a didactic tone; thus, they stress the importance of *Torah study or prayer, extol biblical ancestors, or vividly describe the end of days (see ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD). They also emend apparent anthropomorphic descriptions of *God and publicize new rabbinic halakhah (legislation). From this perspective the Targumim should also be seen as “mediators” between the elite rabbinic class and ordinary Jews.

New languages spoken by the Jewish people from the seventh century onward, such as Arabic (see JUDEO-ARABIC) and later *Yiddish, displaced the Aramaic Targumim. Their use gradually declined but they continue to be used as aids for understanding the biblical text and a resource for scholarship. For further reading, see J. W. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature (1969). AVIGDOR SHINAN Tefillin (also phylacteries), an *Aramaic word meaning “attachment,” refers to small black leather boxes and straps worn on the head (between the eyes) and on the arm or hand (generally the left arm for a right-handed person and the right arm for a left-handed person [BT Menahot 37a]). The boxes contain parchments inscribed with four passages from the *Torah; the box for the forehead has four separate compartments, one for each parchment, and the box for the arm has a single compartment for one parchment on which all the passages are written. The passages (Exod 13:1–10, 13:11–16; Deut 6:4–9, 11:13–21) ordain that “these words” are to be worn as “a sign upon your hand and as frontlets between your eyes” as a reminder of *redemption from *Egypt and the *covenant between *God and the Israelites.

Men have traditionally worn tefillin during weekday morning *prayers (but not on the *Sabbath or *festivals) from the time of *Bar Mitzvah. Different communities wrap the tefillin around the arm in different ways. Many *Ashkenazim use a counterclockwise motion while *Sephardim and *Hasidim wind them clockwise. Jewish mystics (see KABBALAH) inscribed the word Shaddai (Almighty) on the tefillin, both in writing and in their modes of winding and knotting. Women are not obligated to put on (“lay”) tefillin, but some have chosen to do so in various times and places according to rabbinic (BT Eruvin 96a) and medieval sources (Grossman). Some rabbinic authorities have permitted this practice (Solomon ben Aderet [Rashba]; Jacob ben Meir Tam [Rabbeinu Tam]) or allowed it with the stipulation that women should not recite the blessing since they are not obligated to observe this *commandment (*Maimonides); others have tried to discourage it (Shulhan Arukh; Moses Isserles [Rama]; see HALAKHAH). In the contemporary era, the practice is increasing among women, particularly in Conservative and Modern Orthodox forms of *Judaism. For further reading, see R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004); and A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2004).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Tel Aviv is the second largest city in *Israel with a total population (with neighboring Jaffa) of nearly 400,000 and an area of twenty square miles (51.8 square kilometers). It is the economic center of Israel, as well as a popular tourist and cultural destination. Situated on Israel’s Mediterranean coastline, Tel Aviv was founded in 1909 as a new Jewish city, north of the ancient port city of Jaffa, which had a predominantly Arab population. The name, which means “hill of spring,” is derived from *Ezekiel 3:15: “And I came to the exiles at Tel Aviv”; it was also the title of the Hebrew translation by Naḥum Sokolow of Theodor *Herzl’s visionary novel about a Jewish state, Altneuland. Tel Aviv gained municipal status in 1934 and saw a dramatic increase in population during the 1929–39 Fifth Aliyah (see ISRAEL, STATE OF:

IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948) which was constituted primarily of immigrants from *Nazi *Germany. In these years Tel Aviv’s “White City” was developed by architects who had been trained in the International or Bauhaus style. These four thousand or more buildings within a concentrated area, the world’s largest grouping of structures in this Modernist style, are characterized by asymmetry, functionality, and simplicity; the “White City” was named a UNESCO World Heritage Site in 2004.

Tel Aviv served as Israel’s center of government until the end of 1949 when the capital was established in *Jerusalem. However, as of 2009, nearly all national embassies continue to be located in the Tel Aviv area. Much of Jaffa’s Arab population (approximately 70,000 of a total population of 100,000 in 1948) left the city during the developing tensions at the end of the *British Mandate period and the conquest of the city by Haganah and Irgun forces on May 14, 1948 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES). The present Arab population of Jaffa is estimated at 10,000 out of a total population of 80,000. Tel Aviv and Jaffa were combined under one municipal government in 1950. For recent research, see the collected articles in Israel Studies 14(3) (2009). Map 14 ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Television: United States. Although Jews have been involved as executives, writers, and performers in the commercial television industry in the United States since its inception in 1939 (see BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION), the medium has a conflicted history when it comes to the representation of Jewish characters and themes. As in other forms of entertainment such as *film, Jewish artists often found it necessary to minimize or erase the ethnic and religious specificity of their work. In television, which depends on reaching a broad audience and which is driven largely by commercial advertising, this tendency has been even more pronounced. Yet on those occasions when Jewish characters have been given leading roles, they have often proved extremely popular.

On January 17, 1949, just a few months after the start of prime-time network programming in the United States, the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) premiered The Goldbergs, the first television series to feature a Jewish family. Featuring Gertrude Berg (1898–1966), who was also the show’s head writer, as Molly Goldberg, an immigrant wife and mother, this early situation comedy chronicled the struggles of a loving Jewish family and their Bronx neighbors as they sought to fit into modern American culture. Although The Goldbergs, which began as a radio series in 1929, seems like an historical anomaly – it would be nearly a quarter-century before another television series would be built around an explicitly Jewish family – the late 1940s actually saw a boom in ethnic-themed television series. In addition to The Goldbergs, viewers could tune in to programs such as Life with Luigi (Italian), Amos and Andy (African American), and Life of Riley (Irish). Most of these shows, including The Goldbergs, were adapted from the medium of radio, where ethnic dialects were both a steady source of humor and an effective way to differentiate one otherwise unremarkable comedy from another. Indeed, early episodes of The Goldbergs tended to rely heavily on Molly’s misuse of English idiom for comic effect. Over the six-year life of the series (which included runs on the National Broadcasting Corporation [NBC] and the short-lived DuMont network), however, the focus shifted to emphasize how Molly's traditional Jewish values could be reconciled with a growing American emphasis on consumerism and the nuclear family. In this sense The Goldbergs served to normalize the immigrant experience and to model a kind of post-war American citizenship. In the series' final season, the Goldberg family moved to the fictional suburb of Haverville, where they quickly learned to fit in with their Gentile neighbors.

After the cancellation of The Goldbergs in 1955, it would be nearly two decades before a television series featured an explicitly Jewish character as a central cast member. Throughout the late 1950s and 1960s, Jewish characters were scarce, and when they did appear it tended to be in supporting roles or one-episode guest appearances. Television historians attribute this disappearance of Jewish characters to self-policing by Jewish studio executives. Some writers who worked in the industry at the time report that there seemed to be quotas on how many Jewish characters would be approved by network executives. It is unclear whether this self-censorship was a response to the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) hearings of the early 1950s, to real or perceived antisemitism among the viewing public, or to these executives' own conflicted relationship to Judaism. Regardless, television writers and producers of the 1950s and '60s learned to abide by the maxim (sometimes attributed to Neil Simon), "Write Yiddish; cast British." In the most infamous example of this phenomenon, a show called Head of the Family, written by and starring Jewish comedian Carl Reiner and based on his own experiences as a comedy writer for Sid Caesar's Your Show of Shows (1950–54), could not find a network willing to produce it until it was recast with different leading actors as The Dick Van Dyke Show (1961–66). Although Reiner himself did appear in the show, it was as the ethnically neutral Alan Brady (based on Caesar). Meanwhile, the only explicitly Jewish character in the show was a supporting role, Maurice "Buddy" Sorrell (Morey Amsterdam).

Although Jews were rarely depicted as lead characters in regular dramatic series, the 1950s and 1960s did see a number of important television movies featuring Jewish characters, often as stand-alone episodes of anthology-style series such as Philco Television Playhouse, Matinee Theater, and Playhouse 90. Many of these "teleplays" focused on the Holocaust, including Anne Frank: The Diary of a Young Girl (1952) and The Final Ingredient (1959), both co-produced by the Jewish Theological Seminary (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION). The most famous example of televised Holocaust drama during this period was Judgment at Nuremberg (1959, remade as a feature film in 1961), which dramatized the Nuremberg war crimes trials and included actual newsreel footage of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

Bridget Loves Bernie, the show that reintroduced a Jewish leading character to prime-time series television in 1972, was not without controversy. A comedy built around the romance between a young Jewish cab driver, Bernie Steinberg (David Birney), and his Irish Catholic bride, Bridget Fitzgerald (Meredith Baxter), the show presented ethnic intermarriage as not only acceptable but also as (arguably) a desirable remedy to the ethnic and racial divisiveness of 1970s culture. The show earned top ratings, but it was cancelled after only one season because of vocal protest from Jewish advocacy groups. Having drawn flak for a comic portrayal of Jews, the networks seemed to avoid overt representations of Jewish characters in sitcoms for most of the 1970s, with one notable exception. In 1974, the Jewish character Rhoda Morgenstern (Valerie Harper) went from a supporting character in The Mary Tyler Moore Show (1970–77) to star in her own spinoff, Rhoda (1974–79). Although Rhoda's Jewish identity was rarely central to the show's plot, it was nevertheless clearly marked. This stands in contrast to several other shows of the 1970s in which Jewish characters did not appear explicitly, but which nevertheless were (and continue to be) read as Jewish by viewers inclined to do so. Typically, these shows, which include Barney Miller (1975–83), Welcome Back Kotter (1975–79), and Taxi (1979–83), feature a Jewish actor in a leading role in which the character's religion or ethnicity is never specified, leaving open the possibility that he might be Jewish. Generally speaking, however, televised representations of Jewish characters in the 1970s were reserved for more serious fare, such as the Emmy-winning NBC mini-series, Holocaust: The Story of the Family Weiss (1978).

The 1980s saw two significant developments in network programming that helped open the door for more overt depictions of Jews. First was the popularity of ensemble-based dramas such as Hill Street Blues (1981–87) and L.A. Law (1986–94). With shows following more characters and more story lines simultaneously, producers seemed more willing to allow some of those characters and stories to be explicitly marked as Jewish. For example, a recurring story line in thirtysomething (1987–91) centered around Jewish ad man Michael Steadman (Ken Olin) and his struggles with how to maintain his connection to Judaism. Over the course of the show's four seasons, viewers saw Steadman's wedding to a non-Jewish woman, the couple's holiday observances, and their son's circumcision ceremony. Yet because these episodes were embedded within the context of a multifocal ensemble series, thirtysomething was not thought of as a "Jewish show."

The other significant development in this period was the declining influence of the old-school television moguls. Increasingly, the networks were run by a younger generation of executives who were less reluctant to showcase explicitly Jewish characters. Thus, by the early 1990s there were several highly successful series built around Jewish characters, most notably Seinfeld (1989–98), Northern Exposure (1990–95), and Brooklyn Bridge (1991–93). Although these shows tended to portray Jews positively, the range of characters often seemed limited to the schlemiel stereotype made famous in American culture by Woody Allen. For example, Newsweek declared in 1992, "A new breed of leading man has swum into the television mainstream. He's funny, he's highly verbal and he's slightly neurotic. Oh, and Jewish." While Jewish leading men were becoming more common, fewer shows featured Jewish women. Those that did, such as The Nanny (1993–99) and Will and Grace (1998–2006), drew criticism for perpetuating stereotypes of the "Jewish American Princess."

With the expansion of cable and satellite television since the late 1990s, programmers have seemed more willing than ever before to depict a broad range of Jewish characters. This has led to some downright unflattering portrayals of Jews, such as Larry David's character in Curb Your Enthusiasm (2000–present), as well as shows that have turned classic Jewish stereotypes inside out by embracing them, such as The Daily Show with Jon Stewart (1999–) and the Comedy Central movie The Hebrew Hammer (2003). Nevertheless, some portrayals of Jewish characters still periodically provoke controversy, and frank depiction of Jewish ritual observance is still extremely rare on America's airwaves.

Recent years have seen a significant surge in scholarly attention to images of Jews in television. Two especially valuable studies are D. Zurawik's The Jews of Prime Time (2003) and V. Brook's Something Ain't Kosher Here: The Rise of the "Jewish" Sitcom (2003). Although this scholarly attention reflects in part a growth in television studies in general, it also seems to indicate a greater awareness of the role that depictions of Jews on television play in defining Jewish American culture.

HENRY BIAL

Temple, Second. This term signifies both a concrete cultic, economic, and political institution that existed in *Jerusalem from ca. 515 BCE until 70 CE and a historiographic rubric for delineating the specific form(s) of Jewish religion, culture, and social organization that existed during that period. Despite significant transformations in the nature of *Judaism and Jewishness over the course of the Second Temple period, the Jerusalem Temple was a consistent source of stability and cohesion. Not only did this structure serve as the focal point for *worship, but regular *pilgrimage to the Jerusalem Temple and payment of the half-shekel tithe (instituted under *Hasmonean rule) also tied far-flung Jewish communities of the Mediterranean *Diaspora to their Judean homeland. At the same time, the very centrality of this institution and its personnel to the structure of Jewish society as the most concentrated locus of religious authority, social prestige, and political power guaranteed that it would remain a site of contestation, especially among the Judean elite.

The Second Temple and its sacrificial cult were reconstituted, in the face of significant delays, by Judean exiles returning from *Babylonia under the auspices of the Achaemenid (*Persian) Empire. It was built on the same sacred site in Jerusalem formerly occupied by the First Temple, which was constructed during the reign of *Solomon and destroyed by the Babylonians in 587/6 BCE (see TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT). From the time of the Second Temple's rededication in ca. 515 CE until its destruction in 70 CE by the *Romans, its leadership and operation were frequently disrupted. Most significantly, the *Seleucid military in 167 BCE desecrated the Temple and looted its treasury. These acts exacerbated existing tensions between the Judean population and their Syrian overlords, as well as among various sectors of Judean society. The ensuing revolt, led by the *Maccabee family of the provincial priestly clan of Hashman (*Hasmoneans), accomplished its primary aim of restoring the Jerusalem cult to its proper form, at least as this was understood by the rebels and their supporters. After the Temple's rededication in December 164 BCE (25 Kislev), the Hasmoneans gradually assumed control of the high *priesthood, formally displacing in 152 BCE the Zadokite family that had traditionally occupied the office. The Hasmoneans eventually used the Jerusalem Temple as a base from which to consolidate political power in a quasi-independent Judean state. Likewise, a century later, *Herod the Great's massive remodeling project to transform the Second Temple from an obscure provincial sanctuary into a world-class shrine (completed in 19 BCE) was a major part of his concerted efforts to cement his standing within Jewish society, as well as to integrate Jerusalem into the emergent Roman imperial system. The Hasmonean usurpation of the high priesthood and its perquisites proved a profound ideological irritant that contributed decisively to the formation of a range of sectarian groups that competed for influence over Jewish religious practice in general and the sacrificial cult in particular. These sectarian movements, including the *Pharisees, *Sadducees, and the *Dead Sea Scrolls sect generally identified as the *Essenes, loom large in both ancient and modern accounts of the tensions that characterized Judean political and social life throughout the late Second Temple period.

The recurrent conflicts that mark the history of the Second Temple reflect its abiding centrality to the organization and functioning of Jewish society and religion. Equally significant, therefore, are the deep structural continuities in cultic practice, spatial arrangement, and ritual personnel. Throughout its history, the Second Temple was devoted to the worship of YHWH alone, and its priesthood became increasingly assertive in claiming that it was the sole authorized locus for sacrifice and its attendant rituals, notwithstanding the existence at various times during this period of other Yahwist shrines (i.e., the temples at Elephantine and Leontopolis in *Egypt as well as the *Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim). Encompassing both preparatory purifications and a regular sequence of sacrificial actions, the elaborate system of vegetable and especially animal offerings enacted in the Temple was understood to maintain the presence of *God – and thus God's protection and blessing – within the Temple and its community.

The Temple was organized into concentric zones of increasing holiness, from the entrance and exit gates in the southern wall of the Temple platform to a series of courtyards (for Gentiles, women, ordinary Jews, and priests), to a holy place (heikhal), and finally to the "holy of holies" at the heart of the shrine itself (devir). Set off from each other by a complex system of barriers and screens, these spaces served distinctive functions in the operation of the cult; each was accessible to progressively restricted classes of people based on criteria of ethnicity (Jew/Gentile), gender (male/female), and caste (high priest/priest/laity). The Aaronite priesthood itself was divided into high priests (kohanim) and simple priests (Levites). As a source of great prestige and power, membership in the priesthood through genealogical descent was subject to intense scrutiny and often proved a matter of contentiousness. Thus, the Temple epitomized, in both symbolic and concrete ways, the hierarchical divisions internal to Jewish society as well as the relationship of Jews to the surrounding non-Jewish world.

For further reading, see J. R. Branham, "Penetrating the Sacred: Breaches and Barriers in the Jerusalem Temple," in Thresholds of the Sacred, ed. S. Gerstel (2006), 6–24; S. J. D. Cohen, "The Temple and the Synagogue," in The Cambridge History of Judaism 3: The Early Roman Period, ed. W. Horbury, W. D. Davies, and J. Sturdy (1999), 298–325; E. S. Gruen, Diaspora: Jews Amidst Greeks and Romans (2002);

M. Himmelfarb, A Kingdom of Priests: Ancestry and Merit in Ancient Judaism (2006); J. Klawans, Purity, Sacrifice, and the Temple: Symbolism and Supersessionism in the Study of Ancient Judaism (2006); and S. Schwartz, Imperialism and Jewish Society, 200 BCE to 640 CE (2001). RA'ANAN BOUSTAN

Temple and Temple Cult. The term “temple” generally relates to the Temple (mikdash or bayit) in *Jerusalem, built by King *Solomon in the mid-tenth century BCE (1 Kgs 5–8), although its development long pre-dated Solomon’s reign. We encounter narratives in the *Pentateuch that depict the construction of the *Tabernacle (mishkan) during the period of the wilderness wanderings under the leadership of *Moses. Many scholars see in these traditions the hand of later Jerusalem *priests, projecting their own understanding of the Temple’s role back into Israel’s formative period, thereby reinforcing its significance to the worshipers of their own time. Others, however, see in the Tabernacle tales the depiction of a pre-Temple shrine that was constructed during the reign of King *David in *Jerusalem (ca. 1005–975 BCE), which would have drawn from earlier shrine models that had been a part of pre-monarchic tribal religion.

David’s early tent-shrine in Jerusalem emulated that of the *Shiloh sanctuary. Shiloh was the most prominent pre-monarchic cult site that represented the traditional religious interests of the *Israelite tribes, with a priesthood that boasted descent from Moses. It was this tradition that dominated during David’s reign in Jerusalem. This dominance was most evident when David installed Shiloh’s most venerated icon, the *Ark of the Covenant, in Jerusalem to symbolize that city’s role as the new center of national religion. It is this iconography that Solomon eventually incorporated into his much more ornate Temple, with a different priestly line and ritual fixtures.

In both cases, however, David’s tent-shrine and Solomon’s Temple were strongly influenced by even older traditions from Israel’s neighbors. The tent-shrine had much in common with *Canaanite shrines to the deity El, and Solomon’s Temple was patterned on other northwest Semitic temple structures in both *Phoenicia and further east in *Syria and *Mesopotamia. Thus, although the priesthoods associated with the earlier tent-shrine and the later Temple dedicated themselves to Israel’s deity YHWH, their manner of religious expression was consistent with that of other ancient peoples of the region who worshiped their own deities in similar fashion.

During the monarchic period after Solomon’s death, other religious centers existed in addition to Jerusalem. In the northern kingdom of *Israel, *Beth El constituted a major religious site with a full priesthood, liturgical traditions, and connections to northern royal circles much like the Jerusalem Temple in the southern kingdom of *Judah (see especially Amos 7:10–17). Unlike the Temple in Jerusalem (a former Canaanite city conquered only in David’s day; see 2 Sam 5), Beth El had strong ties to ancestral tradition and was regarded by many Israelites as the more significant religious hub. Many scholars view Beth El as the locale where a number of important psalms and *biblical narrative traditions developed that were later preserved by scribes and priests in Jerusalem. Other religious sites also existed in the southern kingdom, such as the temple at the royal fortress of Arad; similar royally sponsored cult sites could be found throughout the Judean countryside. After the *Assyrian army destroyed the northern kingdom (721 BCE) and then devastated the Judean countryside in 701 BCE, only the Jerusalem Temple remained until its destruction at the hands of the Babylonians in 587 BCE. After the nearly fifty-year exile in *Babylonia, the Jerusalem Temple was rebuilt (the “Second *Temple,” completed in 516 BCE) under the auspices of the *Persian rulers who succeeded the Babylonians. It once again became a central focus of religious life in the Land of Israel and a focus of *pilgrimage by *Diaspora Jews.

In all periods, the Jerusalem Temple cult consisted of a ritual system revolving around regular sacrifices (see WORSHIP) and the production of sacred literature. Both aspects were governed by the Jerusalem priesthood (kohanim) that claimed descent from *Aaron. They were assisted by the Levites, members of the tribe of Levi who were not direct descendants of Aaron. In the pre-exilic period, this priesthood remained largely sponsored by the royal Davidic family, similar to the Beth El priesthood in the north that was a client group of the northern kings. The Temple itself was a physical representation of the divine cosmos, and the Davidic king was its chief functionary, symbolizing his and YHWH’s interconnected relationship as sovereigns of the heavens and earth (see also 2 Sam 7; Ps 2). The regular practice of sacrifice within the Temple’s precincts maintained the devotional dialogue between the nation and its God, and many of the ritual texts in the book of *Leviticus (especially 1–16) provide some insight into how these sacrifices and related rituals were conducted. It was through the workings of the Temple cult that sin could be expiated, guilt forgiven, fertility and security maintained, and sacred doctrine taught.

Yet, the Temple cult was not universally accepted. The Israelite public (mostly the northern tribes, although likely some southerners as well) apparently denounced Solomon’s Temple shortly after that king’s death (1 Kgs 12:16), and many of the prophets express condemnation of its priesthood, systems of ritual, and mythic traditions (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; AMOS, etc.). In the late eighth century BCE, the prophet *Micah publicly declared that, because it supported injustice, the Temple mount in Jerusalem would be demolished (3:12), a threat remembered a century later when *Jeremiah condemned those who thought that the mere existence of the Temple and its ongoing cultic infrastructure would save them from the effects of their sins and transgressions (7:1–15, 26:17–9). This critique continued into the post-exilic period. Although some prophets supported the Temple and its functionaries (*Haggai; *Zechariah), others pointed out its flaws (*Isaiah 56–66; *Malachi), and this tension persisted between various Jewish sects well into the *Roman period. The final destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE vindicated those critical of Temple-based groups, although the Temple and its practices remained an important ideological fixture in the later writings of *rabbinic Judaism, which fostered hopes of an eventual rebuilding of the Temple in the distant future.

For further reading, see I. Knohl, The Sanctuary of Silence (1995); J. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16 (1991); B. C. Ollenburger, Zion, City of the Great King (1987); and M. Fox et al., Texts Temples and Traditions: A Tribute to Menahem Haran (1996).

MARK LEUCHTER

Ten Commandments. The group of ordinances commonly referred to as the “Ten Commandments” or “Decalogue” are found twice in the *Torah: in *Exodus 20:2–14 and *Deuteronomy 5:6–18. Neither of these biblical passages uses the expression “ten commandments.” The closest biblical parallel is in Exodus 34:28, where the phrase “ten words” (aseret ha-devarim; often translated as “ten commandments”) appears in conjunction with “the words of the covenant” (divrei ha-berit) as what *Moses inscribed on the stone tablets that he was commanded to hew in preparation for his ascent of Mount Sinai (34:1).

There are numerous differences, some small, others more significant, between Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5. For example, in Exodus 20:8–11, the Israelites are to “remember” the *Sabbath day, and the commandment is related to the creation narrative in Genesis 1–2:4. The Sabbath imperative in Deuteronomy 5:12–15 is to “observe,” and remembrance of the day is connected with the experience of slavery in *Egypt and divine *redemption. The prohibition against coveting in Exodus 20:14 includes the wife as one among many of the neighbor’s possessions; in Deuteronomy 5:18, the neighbor’s wife is a separate entity, mentioned apart from the neighbor’s belongings. The order of the commandments is the same in both biblical books, but in the *Septuagint (the Greek translation produced by Alexandrian Jews in the early third century BCE) the command not to commit adultery comes before the prohibition against murder and directly after the imperative to honor one’s parents.

The division of the verses into “ten commandments” is as old as Exodus 34, but there are several differing traditions about how to arrive at this number. For Jews, Exodus 20:2 (and Deut 5:6) is generally understood to comprise the first commandment, even though it contains no imperative. Further, Jews have typically imagined the commandments as written on two tablets of five each. With this configuration, the first five (including honoring of parents) reflect human obligations to God, whereas the latter five form a complementary grouping to regulate dealings with other human beings.

Biblical interpreters have also raised questions about the meaning or application of several of the commandments. What, for example, does it mean to take “God’s name in vain”? Does “coveting” cover thought alone, or does it necessarily carry over to actions as well? Most scholars would agree that “murder” is a more accurate rendering than “kill,” but there is still considerable disagreement over whether “having no other gods before me” was, in its biblical context, equivalent to “having no other gods except me,” which would constitute an affirmation of *monotheism.

In form, the commandments are styled as apodictic: that is, they are direct imperatives with no “ifs, ands, or buts.” This is a distinctively (although not uniquely) biblical way of expressing especially important laws. These commandments can be viewed as an essential component of the *covenant between God and Israel that was established, ratified, and renewed at several points in the Hebrew Bible. The overall structure of this covenant finds parallels elsewhere in the ancient *Near East (see LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND HEBREW BIBLE). In spite of the myriad difficulties in fully understanding the Ten Commandments and the differences in enumerating and ordering them, they stand somewhat apart from and above the rest of the laws of the Hebrew

*Bible. Nonetheless, it would not be correct to assert that they are inherently more important or of greater sanctity than any of the other *commandments given by God at Mount Sinai or on other occasions.

LEONARD GREENSPOON

Tevet, the tenth month of the Jewish calendar, is equivalent to December and/or January on the Gregorian calendar. See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Theater: Britain. Plays by Jewish authors with Jewish themes did not gain prominence on the English stage until the late nineteenth century when Israel *Zangwill (1864–1926) dramatized his novel, Children of the Ghetto (1899). Set in London’s East End, a center of Jewish immigration since the 1880s, the play depicts a conflict between Orthodox and secular worldviews, a recurrent theme in early Jewish theater. In The Melting Pot (1908), Zangwill imagines the disappearance of such dichotomies. Indeed, the play represents the *United States as the crucible in which Jewish and other ethnic minorities will melt into one new people. Such was the success of this drama that its title became a popular metaphor for the American *immigrant experience. Zangwill went on to adapt another of his novels into a successful comedy, The King of Schnorrers (1925), dramatizing the triumphs of the little man (here a *Sephardic beggar) in the face of the *Ashkenazic and Sephardic Jewish establishments.

After *World War II, a new generation of Jewish playwrights made its mark. The Nobel Laureate Harold Pinter (1930–2008) wrote several seminal pieces, including The Birthday Party (1957), The Homecoming (1964), and Ashes to Ashes (1996). In The Birthday Party, Goldberg and McCann interrogate Stanley, before taking him away to an unknown destination. As a Jew and an Irishman, the interrogators are marginal in English society. Most significantly, Stanley is a victim of circumstances beyond his control. As Pinter remarked at Jewish Book Week in London (2003), “My experience during the war and after the war was of a world which is extremely precarious, to put it mildly – fraught with anxiety and fear and dread of what was to come on the very next day.” The Homecoming explores such precariousness within an implicitly Jewish family from London’s East End. When Max’s academic son visits with his American wife, his other son steals her. Meanwhile, Max presides over this terrain of shifting allegiances with patriarchal scorn. He derides both sons, who are correspondingly dismissive of him. Typically for Pinter, what is spoken frequently implies quite the opposite, and the recurrence of a stage-directed “Pause” leaves plenty of room for menace and paranoia to gestate. Like several of Pinter’s later plays, such as One for the Road (1984) and Mountain Language (1988), Ashes to Ashes is more explicit about the issues of slave labor, torture, and totalitarian politics from a post-*Holocaust perspective of concern for the victims of inhumanity.

Arnold Wesker (b. 1932) also draws on working-class Jewish roots for his trilogy of plays first performed in 1958–60. These plays depict the socialist struggles of an East End Jewish family (Chicken Soup with Barley, I’m Talking about Jerusalem) and the stunted lives of Norfolk farm laborers (Roots). Often didactic, Wesker’s drama diagnoses the situation shared by Jewish and Gentile members of the working class. He writes empathetically in the preface to the trilogy, "I am at one with these people: it is only that I am annoyed, with them and myself." In Chicken Soup with Barley and I'm Talking about Jerusalem, the politically engaged Kahn family members proclaim socialist ideals, but over the course of twenty years become gradually disillusioned as their political hopes fail to materialize. Like other Anglo-Jewish playwrights, Wesker has to reckon with the legacy of Shylock. Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice (1598) casts a long shadow over representations of Jews on the English stage. In response, Wesker wrote Shylock (1980), originally titled The Merchant; this drama ambitiously rewrites Shakespeare's antisemitic comedy from the perspective of the Venetian Jew. Wesker's Shylock shows generosity, gregariousness, and cultivation in marked contrast to the mean-minded and philistine Gentiles of Venice.

Bernard Kops (b. 1926) brings another East End voice to English theater. His oeuvre began with The Hamlet of Stepney Green (1957). Here, as elsewhere, the poetry of the drama owes much both to Yiddish folklore and biblical prophecy. Kops has since written several successful plays with Jewish themes, including Ezra (1981) about the fascist poet Ezra Pound, Dreams of Anne Frank (1992), and Green Rabbi (1997).

Steven Berkoff (b. 1937) is also alive to the energies of the Jewish East End, as his Expressionistic drama East (1977) demonstrates. Jewish humor runs through both Kvetch (1986) and Sit and Shiver (2004). Interestingly, Berkoff turned to the Czech Jewish writer Franz Kafka (1883–1924) for inspiration; his adaptations include In the Penal Colony (1968), Metamorphosis (1969), and The Trial (1971).

Jack Rosenthal (1931–2004) brought Anglo-Jewish drama to television audiences. In particular, The Evacuees (1975) follows the fortunes of two Jewish boys evacuated from Manchester to an outlying town during World War II; Bar Mitzvah Boy (1976) charts the embarrassments and eventual fulfillment of a Jewish boy's rite of passage. More recently, female playwrights have invigorated Anglo-Jewish drama. Julia Pascal (b. 1949) explores prejudice and tragedy in her Holocaust Trilogy (1990–92). She also celebrates Yiddish theatrical culture in The Yiddish Queen Lear (1999) and presents perspectives from the Arab–Israeli conflict in Crossing Jerusalem (2003–04).

Diane Samuels (b. 1960) has won acclaim with Kindertransport (1992). Her drama presents the Anglicization of a young female refugee from Nazi Germany. When Eva's mother arrives in Britain to reclaim her daughter after the war, the ensuing emotional conflict suggests that fallout from the Holocaust remains a disturbing presence in England.

Patrick Marber (b. 1964) is probably best known for his award-winning comedy Closer (1997), which was made into a Hollywood movie. His Howard Katz (2001) explores the conflict between Jewish values and the superficial world of television in the life of a show-business agent. The play opens with Katz as a derelict and goes back in time to explore how he fell from success to catastrophic marginalization. Suffering a spiritual crisis, the Job-like Katz rails against God while seeking some sort of redemption.

Famous for screenplays and movies that are devoid of Jews, Mike Leigh (b. 1943) surprised critics with Two Thousand Years (2005), his drama about English Jews and Israel. However, Leigh sees no disjuncture in his oeuvre, as he stated in a Guardian newspaper interview, "I don't think you can pull out any play or film from my canon that is not Jewish in its view of life and all its tragic-comic aspects."

PETER LAWSON

Theater: Europe. The participation of Jews in the creation of European drama and theater became significant with emancipation and assimilation, beginning in the late eighteenth century. Jews became increasingly active as actors, directors, and theater managers, while also writing plays in the languages of their native countries. In nineteenth-century France, Adolphe d'Ennery (1811–1899) wrote more than two hundred plays, vaudevilles, and melodramas; Ludovic Halévy (1834–1908), nephew of the composer Jacques Fromental Halévy, wrote comedies, farces, and libretti (mostly in collaboration with Henri Meilhac); and Catulle Mendès (1841–1909) penned verse-dramas and libretti. By and large, these works were in the popular style of their day, depicting the conventions and pleasures of bourgeois society. Occasionally they addressed Jewish concerns or featured Jewish characters, as in Mendès' Les Mères ennemies (1882). In the later nineteenth century, Albin Valabrègue (1853–1937) was a prolific French dramatist and dramatic critic, and Sarah Bernhardt (1844–1923) rose to international fame as the leading romantic French actress of her day, often called "la belle juive." She followed in the footsteps of Eliza Rachel Félix (1821–1858; known as Rachel), the leading classical actress of mid-nineteenth-century France. The most prominent theater personality of Jewish origin on the contemporary French scene is Ariane Mnouchkine (b. 1939), one of Europe's leading theater directors, who founded the Théâtre du soleil, a Parisian avant-garde ensemble, in 1964. Playwrights in French include the late Belgian-born René Kalisky (1936–1981), who unabashedly addressed Jewish themes, in particular the Shoah Jean-Claude Grumberg (b. 1939), who wrote a number of Holocaust plays, such as L'atelier (1979) and Zone libre (1990); and actor-dramatist Victor Haïm.

A similar growing involvement of Jews in drama and its production can be found in other European countries from the nineteenth century onward. In Holland, Herman Heijermans (1864–1924) wrote plays addressing problems of the lower middle class and Jewish themes (Dora Kramer, 1893; Ghetto, 1898). Louis Frederik Johannes Bouwmeester (1842–1925), born into an acting family, was known for his Shakespearean roles, not least as Shylock. In neighboring Denmark, Henrik Hertz (1797–1870) wrote comedies, enjoying great success all over Europe with his lyrical drama, Kong Renés Datter (1845). Edvard (Cohen) Brandes (1847–1931) was highly influential as a dramaturge and theater critic, and his brother Georg Brandes (1842–1927) was one of the leading theater intellectuals of the day, promoting Scandinavian and German drama (see LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA). Ferenc Molnár (1878–1952) was among the leading Hungarian writers of the twentieth century, an author of popular plays that combine wit and romantic sentimentalism, such as Liliom (1909) and The Swan (1920). Bela Nagy was a much admired actress, and Oszkár Beregi (1876–1965) was famous for his Shakespearean roles. István Örkény (1912–1979) was known for plays combining modern style with folkloristic elements. Polish writer and critic Wilhelm Feldmann, author of Sady Boze, became a leading figure in Polish literature of the late nineteenth century.

Tadeusz Kantor (1915–1990) was a pivotal figure in Polish avant-garde theater, introducing “happening” and ritualistic elements in theater performance.

Yet nowhere in Europe was the participation of Jews in the theater arts as significant and enthusiastic as in *Germany and *Austria. Arnold Zweig provides an overview of their myriad activities in Juden auf der deutschen Bühne (Jews on the German Stage; 1928). Jacob Herzfeld (1769–1826), admired by Goethe and Schiller, was the first prominent Jewish actor in the late eighteenth century, followed in the nineteenth century by Ludwig Dessoir (1810–1874) and Bogumil Dawison (1818–1872), who was famous for his nuanced verisimilitude. The quality and quantity of Jewish performers were broadly noted in the nineteenth century, but Jews were equally active as directors and entrepreneurs. Adolph L’Arrogne (1838–1908) was prominent both as director and playwright; Ludwig Chronegk (1837–1890) acted as director of the famous Meiningen Court Theater; in Austria, Adolf von Sonnenthal (1834–1909), the uncontested star of the *Vienna Hofburg-theater, was appointed its director. Otto Brahm (1856–1912) championed social-oriented, naturalistic drama toward the end of the nineteenth century.

The late Wilhelmine Empire and the Weimar Republic were the heyday of Jewish participation in German theater life. Versatile director Max Reinhardt (1873–1943) introduced the new Modernist drama and created a theater of fantasy and spectacle, while his colleague Leopold Jessner (1878–1945), who became the first artistic director of the *Berlin State Theater in 1919, promoted Expressionistic and political drama. Jewish actors and directors were ubiquitous in the popular and revue theaters, particularly in Berlin and Vienna. A wide range of Jewish acting talents, including Ernst Deutsch, Fritz Kortner, Fritz Massary, Max Pallenberg, Alexander Granach, Elizabeth Bergner, and Curt Bois, can still be seen in the cinema of the time. The list of Jewish dramaturges includes Felix Holländer, Arthur Kahane, and Heinz Liepmann. Ludwig Barnay, Oscar Blumenthal, and the brothers Anton and Donat Herrnfeld were well-known theater managers and producers.

Especially noteworthy is the successful activity of German and Austrian Jews as theater critics and theoreticians. Among the most prominent were Alfred Kerr, Siegfried Jacobsohn, Maximilian Harden, Karl Kraus, Alfred Polgar, Fritz Engel, Emil Faktor, Monty Jacobs, and Julius Bab. The famous Viennese playwright Arthur Schnitzler (1862–1931) depicted fin-de-siècle social and sexual decadence, and Richard Beer-Hofmann (1866–1945) wrote neo-romantic lyrical drama (Jaákobs Traum; 1918). Jewish dramatists such as Ernst Toller, Carl Sternheim, and Else *Lasker-Schüler played a prominent role in shaping Expressionist drama. Other Jewish authors who wrote for the stage include Lion Feuchtwanger (1884–1958) and Paul Kornfeld (1889–1942). Mention should also be made of Max Herrmann (1865–1942), who established theater/performance studies as an academic discipline. The rise of *National Socialism in the 1930s put an end to the remarkable impact of Jewish talent in German theater.

Although some prominent Jewish actors (Ernst Deutsch and Fritz Kortner) returned to the German-speaking stage after the Shoah, the persecution and murder of European Jewry by the Nazis marked the end of an amazing era of Jewish participation in German theater. Yet, many interesting productions in twenty-first-century Germany and Austria are the work of Jewish directors, who often address the Holocaust in their stagings. Some, such as Hungarian-born director and playwright George Tabori (1914–2007) or Peter Zadek (1926–2009), were born before the Holocaust; others such as Jossi Wieler and Arie Zinger were born afterward.

ANAT FEINBERG

Theater: Holocaust: See HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA

Theater: Israel. Israeli theater emerged with the establishment of the State of *Israel in May 1948. However, Israel’s early cultural and theatrical activities must be understood in the contexts of theatrical performances in *Hebrew that took place in the pre-state period and of theatrical activities in Hebrew that took place outside of the Land of Israel, particularly in *Eastern Europe. Initially, Israeli theater was synonymous with theater performed in Hebrew, as opposed to *Yiddish theater or Jewish *theater in other languages. However, with the growing awareness of Israel’s cultural diversity, beginning in the wake of the 1967 Six Day War and reaching a peak with the influx of immigration from the former *Soviet Union in the 1990s, theater in Russian and Arabic, as well as theater in Yiddish, Amharic (*Ethiopia), and Moroccan *Judeo-Arabic, also became part of Israel’s cultural milieu. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, *Arabic is the mother tongue of a little more than 20% of Israel’s population (see DEMOGRAPHY).

The first Hebrew performances in the Land of Israel took place in schools, beginning in 1889, with pupils performing for their parents and teachers. These performances, which served as a tool for teaching the Hebrew language, were frequently steeped in the *Zionist ideology that provided the impetus for Jewish settlement and the establishment of a secular Jewish, later Israeli, culture. The theater in Israel has always served as a significant expression of this culture, as well as an extremely important form of entertainment.

Beginning in 1905, with an influx of immigrants with theater backgrounds or aspirations, a number of semi-professional theaters were established, primarily in Jaffa, but also in *Jerusalem and other places. These theaters performed Hebrew translations of plays from contemporaneous European repertoires (e.g., Ibsen, Chekhov, Hauptmann, and Molière). They also featured plays by Yiddish playwrights like Sholem Aleichem, Jacob Gordin, and Dovid Pinski, whose depictions of Jewish life in the *shtetl had a strong appeal for local audiences, most of whom had left this experience behind. However, these productions did not lead to a full professionalization of the Hebrew theater or to any significant production of Hebrew dramatic writing. During World War I, theatrical activities stopped, more or less completely. Although audiences yearned for theatrical depictions of life in the new country, such a repertoire did not develop for quite a long time.

The first fully professional theater performing in Hebrew was founded in Moscow in 1917 by a group of actors led by Menachem Gnessin (1882–1951), Hanna Rovina (1889–1980), and Nahum Zemah (1887–1952). Zemah, in particular, had already performed at one of the Zionist congresses before he successfully formed a Hebrew-language theater collective. The collective received professional training under Constantin Stanislavski, the leader of the famous Moscow Art Theater, and it was incorporated as the "Biblical Studio" within the network of "ethnic" theaters that had gained official support as a result of the "Bolshevik revolutionary spirit. The members of the collective referred to themselves as Habimah, Hebrew for "the stage." This term not only referred to the theatrical stage as such but also was the word for the elevated area in the synagogue where Torah reading traditionally took place. The first performance for which the Habimah theater became world famous was The Dybbuk, a play written in Yiddish by Ansky (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH) that was translated into Hebrew by the national poet Hayyim Nahman Bialik. This production, which premiered in 1922, was directed by the Armenian-born director Jevgeni Vahtangov, and it remained in the Habimah repertoire until the mid-1960s. It is still considered an important Symbolist Expressionistic contribution to world theater.

During the 1920s, inspired by the success of Habimah, as well as the demands of the local population for a full theatrical culture, a number of Hebrew theaters were founded in the Land of Israel. The most successful were the Eretz-Israel Theater and the Ohel ("tent" or "tabernacle" in Hebrew) Theater. As a result of the growing pressures from the communist regime in the Soviet Union, beginning in the mid-1920s, the Habimah theater went on a world tour that ended with the troupe settling permanently in Tel Aviv in 1931. Habimah received the official title of Israel's National Theater in 1958. Among the many theaters that were established during the pre-state period, the Cameri Theater, founded in 1944, remains the most vital; today it is the Tel Aviv Municipal Theater. Its premiere of a stage adaptation of the popular novel, He Walked Through the Fields by Moshe Shamir (1921–2004), depicting the Jewish struggle against British Mandatory rule, took place a few days after the declaration of Israeli independence (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: YISHUV [1888–1948]).

By independence, there had already been several attempts to write Hebrew drama for the stage in response to the wish of the growing Jewish population to view their own reality mirrored theatrically. The Shamir play, adapted and directed by Josef Milo (1916–1997), who was among the group that founded the Cameri Theater, is not only technically the first Israeli play; it also became a model for a whole generation of playwrights depicting the first generation of young Israelis facing moral and personal dilemmas in the struggle for Israeli independence in the "Old-New" Jewish homeland. During this initial stage, Israeli drama and theater generally expressed the mainstream Zionist ideology on which Israeli society had been founded. An exception was the playwright Nissim Aloni (1926–1998), whose poetic-surrealistic dramas rebelled against this realist trend. Because established theaters were not eager to produce his lyrical, enigmatic texts, he founded his own short-lived theater, Teatron Ha-Onot (Theater of the Seasons).

In the wake of the 1967 Six Day War, and even more forcefully after the 1973 Yom Kippur (October) War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS), various playwrights began to question and criticize basic tenets of Zionism, raising moral issues concerning the Israeli occupation of Palestinian land and Israeli expansionism and criticizing Israeli society for its blindness to the suffering of others. The most prominent playwrights representing this trend are Hanoch Levin (1943–1999) and Joshua Sobol (b. 1939).

Levin began his career as writer and director (of his own plays) in the late 1960s with satirical revues; he gradually moved on to different genres of dramatic writing, developing a highly personal style that initially met with serious resistance from local audiences. After about a decade of writing and directing grotesque comedies of everyday life, Levin moved on to mythical plays such as The Torments of Job (1981), an improvisation based on the biblical Job. In this performance and in many of his later fantastic spectacles of cruelty, Levin developed a distinct style of language and visual images; in his later work, he also became more poetic and compassionate. His constantly evolving originality, both as writer and a director, gradually earned him his well-deserved recognition. Levin's last performance, Requiem premiered at the Cameri Theater in 1999, a few months before his death; as of 2010, it was still in the repertoire of the theater.

Sobol began his playwriting career in the early 1970s, also with satirical writing, but established himself as an internationally performed dramatist with plays on historical subjects. His most frequently produced play, Ghetto (1984), presents the history of the theater company in the Vilna ghetto during the Nazi occupation; it has been performed in more than twenty countries worldwide. Ghetto is the first part of a trilogy depicting Jewish life in the Vilna ghetto that problematizes the notion of survival. In Shooting Magda (Palestinian Woman) (1985), he presents the complexities of Israeli-Palestinian cooperation as the characters attempt to make a television film about the life of the Israeli Palestinian woman Magda. These and many of Sobol's other plays were directed by Gedalia Besser at the Haifa Municipal Theater (which was founded in 1961 by Josef Milo). Sobol and Besser served as the theater's artistic directors between 1985 and 1988 until they were forced to resign because of strong reactions against Sobol's play, The Jerusalem Syndrome.

After Haifa had established its own municipal theater, Jerusalem also opened its own local theater in 1968 at the Jerusalem Khan with a young group of actors led by British director Mike Alfreds and later by director Ilan Ronen (b. 1948), who subsequently served as the artistic director of the Cameri and after that of the Habimah National Theater. In 1973 the city of Beersheva opened its own municipal theater, completing the spread of established theaters to the peripheries of the country. In 2000 the Herzliya Ensemble was founded by Besser, further strengthening the hegemonic position of cultural activities in the Tel Aviv area. Given the economic difficulties faced by the established theaters, as well as a growing market economy approach to the arts in general and to the theater in particular, these established theaters frequently cooperate on major productions. This situation has led to a gradual decrease in the social and ideological content of the repertoire, because economic needs favor catering to an entertainment-hungry audience rather than a radical one, which had been the case in the 1980s and the first years of the 1990s.

With the big wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union beginning in 1990, a group of actors led by director Yevgeny Arye established a theater, Gesher (Bridge), performing in Russian. However, after a few performances, Gesher decided to present its performances in Hebrew for a much larger audience. Yet, the theater, now located in the southern part of Tel Aviv in Jaffa, has a distinct “Russian” performance style, reconnecting to the traditional style of the Habimah theater. The Arab-Hebrew Theatre of Jaffa, founded in 1998, is also located in Jaffa, which has mixed neighborhoods of Jews and Arabs. As its name indicates, it performs in both languages and for both communities, presenting experimental performances for adults as well as children’s plays. The Beit-Hagefen Theatre in Haifa caters to the gradually growing Arabic-speaking population.

In addition to the expansion of established theaters, the frameworks for fringe theater have also gradually developed. The annual Acco Festival of Alternative Israeli Theater was established in 1980 by actor-director Oded Kotler (b. 1937); it takes place during the early fall *Sukkot holiday in the city of Acre, on the coast north of Haifa. Acre also has a mixed population of Arabs and Jews. This festival, which generally attracts a young audience, has had a crucial impact on the development of new forms of theater in Israel. Since its inception, the festival has encouraged socially and politically engaged theater. One outstanding example was the five-hour performance Arbeit macht frei vom Totland Europa (Work Liberates from Deathland Europe) directed by Dudu Ma’ayan, depicting the daily life on the verge of madness of Selma, a *Holocaust survivor, and in particular her encounter with a local Palestinian, an Israeli Arab. The performance won the first prize at the 1991 festival.

Since the 1970s, and especially since the early 1990s, different genres of performance art have developed in Israel. Two of the more outstanding artists in this field are Tamar Raban and Ruth Kanner. The Zik group has added an interesting perspective to the art of performance by focusing on the processes that materials like clay and glass undergo in their formation. During this time there has also been a remarkable development of modern *dance in Israel, with choreographer Ohad Naharin at the Bat Sheva Dance Company and the Yasmin Goder Dance Ensemble as two of the more outstanding examples. They have added interesting forms of expression to the vital and steadily expanding Israeli performing arts culture.

For further reading, see the English-language journal, Assaph: Studies in the Theatre (published by Tel Aviv University since 1985); L. Ben-Zvi, ed., Theatre in Israel (1996); H. Levin, The Labor of Life: Selected Plays, trans. B. Harshav (2003); F. Rokem, Performing History: Theatrical Representations of the Past in Contemporary Theatre (2000); D. Urian, The Arab in Israeli Drama and Theatre, (1997); and idem, Judaic Nature of Israeli Theatre: A Search for Identity (2000). FREDDIE ROKEM

Theater: United States. In the 1960s, British director Tyrone Guthrie noted that if Jews were to withdraw from the American theater, it “would collapse about next Thursday.” Witticism aside, his remark accurately reflects the disproportionate presence of Jews in the theater, not only among audiences but also as writers, producers, directors, actors, and designers. It can be said that the story of the American theater, especially during the twentieth century, is partly a Jewish story and that Jewish sensibilities have had a significant impact on stage representations, even when the subject matter has not been specifically Jewish.

BEGINNINGS: This presence goes back to the nineteenth century. Mordecai Manuel Noah (1785–1851), son of a Portuguese Jew, was one of the first playwrights to advocate for drama on national themes, frequently turning to recent history for his subject matter. He is most remembered for She Would Be a Soldier (1819). In terms of plays representing contemporary Jewish American life, a breakthrough figure is actor-manager M. B. Curtis (1852–1921); his appearance as the title character in Sam’l of Posen (1881) created the prototype of the fast-talking, wisecracking, immigrant traveling salesman. Two more “Sam’l” vehicles followed before Curtis’s career fizzled in the 1890s. The plays, which appealed to both Jewish and non-Jewish audiences, helped create a vogue for comic stage Jews by the turn of the century, most notably David Warfield (1866–1951), who scored a big hit as the peddler Simon Levi in The Auctioneer (1901), directed by David Belasco (1853–1931). In contrast, knockabout comedians Joe Weber (1867–1942) and Lew Fields (1867–1941) were best known as stage Germans; between 1896 and 1903, their musical satires were the toast of New York.

Jewish entrepreneurs and managers, many of them of German or Central European backgrounds, also had established themselves by the turn of the century. Oscar Hammerstein I (1847–1919), who created everything from operas houses to vaudeville palaces, ultimately was the central force behind the move of *New York City theaters uptown to Times Square, thus helping define the “Broadway” of today. In 1895, seven Jewish theater owners formed the controversial “Theatrical Syndicate,” which centralized booking practices. This group nearly monopolized American theatrical production and eliminated Victorian-era modes of theatrical organization. Manager Lee Shubert (1873?–1953) and his brothers, Sam and Jacob challenged the “Syndicate’s” brief monopoly. Another fierce opponent was David Belasco, a multitiered playwright, director, producer, and career maker who brought new realism and artistic control to his meticulously designed productions, many of which enjoyed huge commercial success.

VAUDEVILLE: The vaudeville era featured numerous Jewish comics, many of whom used their ethnic identification as a fuel for comedy and eventually crossed over from vaudeville and revues to full-fledged musical comedies. Fanny Brice (1891–1951) became a sensation in 1909 with “Sadie Salome Go Home,” and the next year joined the annual Ziegfeld revue, where she remained, on and off, until 1923, often doing comic turns with a homey, zany Jewish inflection. Sultry singer Sophie Tucker (1884–1966) made her debut with Ziegfeld in 1909 and was playing vaudeville’s prestigious Palace Theater by 1914; her distinctive performance style brought a syncopated blues quality to American popular theater and cabaret. The exuberant Al Jolson (1886–1950) debuted at the Winter Garden in 1911 and was a headliner in shows and revues for two decades; his signatures were blackface routines. Another kinetic, sometime blackface comedian was the pop-eyed Eddie Cantor (1892–1964), who debuted with Ziegfeld in 1917 and went on to a number of Broadway successes in the following decade. The five Marx Brothers, a long-time vaudeville act, took Broadway by storm with I’ll Say She Is (1924); although best remembered today for their later films, their stage work of the 1920s embodies the assertive comic energy that many first- and second-generation Jews were then bringing to the American stage.

MUSICALS: Perhaps in no theatrical genre was Jewish influence more profound than in the musical. A successful songwriter as early as 1905, Jerome Kern (1885–1945) laid the foundations for the American popular standard, eventually composing music for a series of musicals at the intimate Princess Theater (and similar venues) between 1915 and 1917. These fresh, urbane musicals are seen as pivotal to the genre. He also pioneered the “book musical” with his score for Show Boat (1927). Kern’s work had an indelible influence on a young Richard Rodgers (1902–1979), whose long-time collaboration with lyricist Lorenz Hart (1895–1943) brought a smart, jazzy sophistication to the genre. Scoring their first success in 1925, the team peaked in popularity and influence in the late 1930s. Also of enduring popularity and cultural importance are the protean Irving Berlin (1888–1989) who, from 1907 on, contributed songs to every theatrical genre and the brothers George (1898–1937) and Ira (1896–1983) Gershwin who, as composer and lyricist, brought a brilliant, jazz-inflected energy to musical comedies of the 1920s. Later, George’s score for Porgy and Bess (1935) pioneered a new type of folk opera. The Cradle Will Rock (1937), by Marc Blitzstein (1905–1964), controversially featured biting social commentary in a way never before seen in an American musical.

Cross-pollination among artists of Jewish background ultimately bore decisive musical fruit in 1943, when Kern’s collaborator on Showboat and other operettas, Oscar Hammerstein II (1895–1960), teamed up with Rodgers for Oklahoma! Hammerstein’s tender lyricism and scrupulous concern for dramatic integrity, when fused with Rodgers’ arresting melodies and spirited pursuit of musical storytelling, resulted in a watershed “musical play” – a model to which many works aspired in the next generation. The collaboration lasted until Hammerstein’s death and included such successes as Carousel (1945), South Pacific (1949), and The King and I (1951). The Rodgers and Hammerstein “musical play” mold was followed most successfully perhaps by Alan Jay Lerner (1918–1986) and Frederick Loewe (1904–1988) in Brigadoon (1947) and My Fair Lady (1956). Among creators of musical comedy in the 1940s and 1950s, leading Jews were Frank Loesser (1910–1969) and Adolph Green (1914–2002).

The 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s increasingly saw innovation in the musical theater. The legendary Jerome Robbins (1918–1998) combined the roles of director and choreographer with signature pieces such as West Side Story (1957) and Fiddler on the Roof (1964), forging a new model of director as auteur. The former featured a bold, colorful score by Leonard Bernstein (1918–1990), who was a frequent Broadway composer in the 1940s and 1950s. Stephen Sondheim (1930–) showed wit, feeling, and technical mastery as lyricist for both West Side Story and Gypsy (1959) before becoming a composer as well; writing both words and music, he explored new forms of musical storytelling through such works as Company (1970), Follies (1971), and Sweeney Todd (1979). He is widely seen as the foremost figure in American musical theater of the post-Rodgers-and-Hammerstein era. No recent producer-director of musicals has had more impact than Harold Prince (b. 1928) who, in works from Cabaret (1966) to Company to Evita (1979), helped shape the “concept musical” production that depended heavily on the director as virtuosic auteur.

SOCIAL REALIST DRAMA: The Great Depression saw the emergence of a social realist drama, often with a leftist political agenda. The era’s preeminent ensemble, which consisted predominantly of Jews of Eastern European origin, was the Group Theater, founded in 1931. Before it disbanded in 1940, it had staged such important works as Awake and Sing! (1935) and Golden Boy (1937), both by Clifford Odets (1906–63); it also staged Johnny Johnson (1936), featuring a score by Kurt Weill (1900–1950), a refugee from Nazi Germany. Two of the Group Theater’s co-founders, Harold Clurman (1901–1980) and Lee Strasberg (1901–1982), although frequently at odds, had a decisive impact on American actor training, with Strasberg eventually joining the influential Actors Studio in 1948. He is seen as a primary conduit for Stanislavsky’s ideas to the American stage and for the resulting emergence of a more naturalistic, low-key “Method” acting style that was widespread by the 1950s.

PLAYWRIGHTS: Jews were among the country’s leading playwrights. Starting in 1921, George S. Kaufman (1889–1961) was a prolific, commercially successful writer of wise-cracking comedy. He is ultimately best remembered for his collaborations with Moss Hart (1904–1961), starting with Once in a Lifetime (1930). Hart later went on to further success as a director (My Fair Lady), theater memoirist (Act One; 1959), and producer. Elmer Rice (1892–1967) wrote perhaps the country’s finest Expressionistic play, The Adding Machine (1923), before turning toward realism with Street Scene (1929), later adapted into an opera by Weill and Langston Hughes. Clifford Odets had fourteen plays produced between 1935 and 1954, enjoying his greatest success early on, when he was closely associated with the Group Theater; in addition to his tender portrayal of a working-class Jewish family in Awake and Sing!, his agit-prop Waiting for Lefty (1935) was a sensation for him and the Group Theater. Building on Odets’ concern for domestic realism and social commentary was Arthur Miller (1915–2005), who towered over the American theater for three decades and is widely recognized as one of the greatest playwrights the country has produced. Miller scored major success with All My Sons (1947), Death of a Salesman (1949), and The Crucible (1953). He remained active into the 1990s, although his later work was received abroad more positively than in the United States (see also THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS).

STAGE DESIGN: Stage design of the mid-twentieth century often aimed for “poetic” visual effects rather than the laborious literalism of the previous generation. Many of the leading exemplars of this new design were Jews, including Lee Simonson (1888–1967); Jo Mielziner (1901–1976), who had one Jewish parent, designed sets for Death of a Salesman, South Pacific, and The King and I, as well as for Tennessee Williams’ A Streetcar Named Desire (1947). Boris Aronson (1900–1980) created memorable sets for many hit shows from the 1930s to the 1970s.

ALTERNATIVE THEATER: The 1960s alternative theater in New York was perhaps best represented by the work of Jewish artists. A key early influence was the Living Theater Company, created in 1946 by Julian Beck (1925–1985) and Judith Malina (b. 1926); a watershed moment was their 1959 production, The Connection, whose documentary-like, spontaneous quality explored new approaches to performance. In the 1960s, the group pioneered works based around improvisation and collective creation, working outside the United States for an extended period. Joseph Chaikin (1935–2003) founded the Open Theater in 1963, a company that explored new means of play creation and acting through a theater stripped of all but its essentials. In 1968, critic and practitioner Richard Schechner (b. 1934) defined these and other new companies as “environmental theater”; partly taking his cue from their work, he went on to shape the emerging field of Performance Studies.

ARTISTIC DIRECTORS: Although many Jews were instrumental in founding theaters in the post-war period, a few names stand out. In 1950 Zelda Fichandler (b. 1924) co-founded Arena Stage in Washington, D.C., and served as its artistic director for more than forty years, giving impetus to the nation’s growing regional theater movement. In New York City, Joseph Papp (1921–1991) founded the Shakespearean Theater Festival in 1954, which eventually became the New York Shakespeare Festival, which in turn gave rise to the Public Theater, arguably the city’s leading contemporary not-for-profit company and one with a long track record of creating important new work. Herbert Blau (b. 1926) co-founded both San Francisco’s Actor’s Workshop (1952) and New York’s short-lived Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center (1965); as a director and theorist, he has been instrumental in bringing nonrealistic and avant-garde plays and practices to the American theater. Robert Brustein (b. 1927) is another leading figure in the regional theater scene, founding both Yale Repertory Theater (1966) and Cambridge’s American Repertory Theater (1979). Emily Mann (b. 1952) is well known for her documentary theater pieces; she is also an accomplished director and, since 1990, artistic director of Princeton’s McCarter Theater. Born and raised in Venezuela, playwright and director Moisés Kaufman (b. 1963) founded the Tectonic Theater Project; his documentary-style Laramie Project (2000) pushed boundaries of genres in exploring a hate crime in Wyoming. For further reading, see H. Erdman, Staging the Jew: The Performance of an American Ethnicity, 1860–1920 (1997); see also ENTERTAINMENT. HARLEY ERDMAN

Theater, United States: Playwrights. American Jewish involvement in theatrical production was minimal before the late 1800s. When Jewish characters appeared on nineteenth-century American stages, they were likely to be hook-nosed, heavy-bearded, avaricious stereotypes in plays written and produced by Gentiles. Toward the end of the century, however, massive *immigration from *Eastern Europe gave Jews a more visible American presence. While Yiddish theater took root in Yiddish-speaking neighborhoods (see THEATER, YIDDISH), Jews also became active as theater owners and producers in the English-speaking theater. More gradually, English-speaking Jewish playwrights emerged; in most cases, they saw themselves as Americans who had no particular interest in writing about Jews.

Jewish writers were prominently involved in the great blossoming of American drama after *World War I. George S. Kaufman (1889–1961) was the leading American comic playwright of his time. With Moss Hart (1904–1961), also a Jew, he wrote You Can’t Take It with You (1936) and The Man Who Came to Dinner (1939), among other plays; yet there are few Jewish characters or Jewish references in the forty-odd plays he wrote with various co-authors. Lillian Hellman (1905–1984), from a New Orleans Jewish family, based the villainous characters of The Little Foxes (1939) on her relatives, but expunged any suggestion of Jewishness.

No major American Jewish playwright has written exclusively about Jewish characters. However, over the course of the twentieth century, a canon of mainstream American plays by Jewish authors has emerged in which Jews take center stage and are confronted with issues facing them in real life. The great subject of this drama was the tension between Old World tradition and New World opportunity, a matter of urgent concern to members of all ethnic groups, in America and elsewhere.

This tension is dramatized explicitly, not to say blatantly, in The Jazz Singer (1925) by Samson Raphaelson (1894–1983), a Broadway hit starring George Jessel and later a famous movie starring Al Jolson, whose life story it parallels. The hero faces a stark choice: to be a *cantor like his father, who has thrown him out of the house for his “dirty music from the sidewalks,” or a jazz-singing Broadway star. As so often happens in American Jewish drama, the conflict between heritage and opportunity is played out in an intensely emotional generational conflict (see also FILM: UNITED STATES). Elmer Rice (1892–1967) declared that his Jewish origin was “a matter to which I have paid no attention,” but his Street Scene (1929) includes a Jewish family among the variegated residents of a New York tenement. In Counsellor-at-Law (1930), Rice once more depicts a teeming, multiethnic New York, but this time his protagonist (first played by Paul Muni, originally from the Yiddish theater) is a powerful Jewish lawyer, a hard-nosed immigrant boy who has worked his way up from poverty through native ability and unrelenting drive, only to be deserted by his fastidious wife and nearly destroyed by a malicious rival, both old-stock WASP Americans. Like so many characters in American Jewish plays, the protagonist of Counsellor-at-Law shows no interest whatever in Judaism as a religion; strikingly, American Jewish drama is almost entirely about secular Jews.

The Group Theater (1931–40), whose members left a permanent mark on American drama and *film, never defined itself as a Jewish institution, but there was something characteristically Jewish in its combination of left-wing idealism, endless disputation, and intense emotionalism on and off the stage. Two of its three directors were Jewish, as were many of its actors (including several Yiddish theater veterans) and a number of its playwrights, notably John Howard Lawson (1894–1977), author of Success Story (1932); Sidney Kingsley (1906–1995), who wrote Men in White (1933); and Clifford Odets (1906–1963). A minor actor with the company, Odets became the standard-bearer of Depression-era radical political theater when his one-act agit-prop play Waiting for Lefty (1935) galvanized its first audience into shouting “Strike! Strike!” along with the actors. Lefty was followed just weeks later by Awake and Sing!, the classic American Jewish family play; literary critic Alfred Kazin wrote joyfully of “watching my mother and father and uncles and aunts occupying the stage . . . by as much right as if they were Hamlet and Lear.” Odets’ play depicts the struggle between the two rival imperatives that competed to fill the vacuum left by the weakening of *Orthodox tradition. Bessie, the mater familias, stands for the Yankee dollar, for “success” for self and family; Jacob, her father, stands for the *Marxist revolution that seemed so bright with promise to so many Jews and to others at the time. Later plays by Odets include Paradise Lost (1935), a less successful Jewish family play full of Depression malaise, and Golden Boy (1937) about an Italian American youth (who might easily have been a Jew), who must choose between becoming a violinist or a prize fighter; it thus dramatizes another conflict between a higher calling and the lure of money and possessions. After the Group Theater dissolved, Odets, not himself immune to material success, spent most of his working life in Hollywood.

The most eminent of all Jewish playwrights is unquestionably Arthur Miller (1915–2005), although some critics reject him as an American Jewish writer. Miller wrote that early in life he struggled to identify himself “with mankind rather than one small tribal fraction of it,” and certain critics have argued that in his masterpiece, Death of a Salesman (1949), he covered up the Jewishness of the Loman family in the interests of a false “universality.” Only in his preface to the fiftieth-anniversary edition of Salesman did he acknowledge the Lomans as “Jews light-years away from religion or community that might have fostered Jewish identity.” Miller’s sense of himself as a Jew was complicated and changed over time. In After the Fall (1964), Incident at Vichy (1964), and Playing for Time (1985), he wrestles with the *Holocaust, which has cast a long shadow over American Jewish drama. In The Price (1968), he created his most charming comic character, an aged Jewish secondhand furniture dealer and dispenser of heavily accented wisdom. Broken Glass, written in 1994 but set in 1938, depicts a Brooklyn matron so traumatized by the news of Nazi horrors that she loses the ability to walk, while her husband eats himself up with his own ambivalence about his Jewishness. Written when Miller was seventy-eight, it was his first full-length play since his student days to focus on American Jews whose Jewish identities were explicitly at the center of their plight.

Neil Simon (b. 1927) wrote a succession of Broadway comedies that brought him immense popularity. His characters, in plays like Barefoot in the Park (1963) and The Odd Couple (1965) are fast-talking, wisecracking, middle-class New Yorkers – all characteristics frequently associated with Jews – but they are not explicitly Jewish. Like Miller, Simon seemed to be more at ease in confronting Jewish circumstances and responses directly as he grew older. The three semi-autobiographical plays of his Brighton Beach trilogy – Brighton Beach Memoirs (1982, 1983), Biloxi Blues (1984, 1985), and Broadway Bound (1986) – are about the escape of a young writer from the narrow limitations of his Jewish family into the wider world. Lost in Yonkers (1991) explores the indirect effects of Nazi tyranny on several generations of an American Jewish family.

In the first half of the twentieth century, American Jewish drama showed Jewish characters trying to establish themselves as Americans; after *World War II, however, a number of playwrights suggested that the unprecedented prosperity and acceptance that American Jews were enjoying entailed losses as well as gains. The Tenth Man (1959) by Paddy Chayefsky (1923–1981) focuses on a Jewish lawyer who is cured of “the *dybbuk of lovelessness” by a ritual exorcism in a shabby synagogue; in Grown Ups (1981) by Jules Feiffer

(b. 1929), a bright young Jewish reporter leaves his wife and quits his job at the New York Times in an explosion of futility. Sight Unseen (1991, 1992) by Donald Margulies (b. 1954) depicts a famous Jewish painter from Brooklyn who looks to a former Gentile lover to discover what is missing from his life. The heroes of all three plays are talented, “successful” young men who find themselves somehow adrift.

A different response to post-war middle-class Jewish prosperity was the embrace of nostalgia for an imagined past. Most of the leading composers of American musicals, including Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, George Gershwin, Richard Rodgers, Leonard Bernstein, and Stephen Sondheim, were Jews who had little interest in explicitly Jewish themes. In the mid-1960s, however, Joseph Stein (1912–2010) wrote the book, Sheldon Harnick (b. 1924) wrote the lyrics, and Jerry Bock (1928–2010) composed the music for Fiddler on the Roof (1964), directed by Jerome Robbins (1918–1998). Adapted from stories of Eastern Europe shtetl* life by Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY), this enduringly successful musical reminded millions of Jews where their forebears had come from, and it provided the Gentile world with a sympathetic idea of what it meant to be a Jew. The Producers (2001), with book, lyrics, and music by Mel Brooks (b. 1926) (with an assist on the book by Thomas Meehan) completed the story, in a way, by gleefully reducing Hitler to a figure of fun.

In the last two decades of the twentieth century, American Jewish playwrights mainly expressed a rueful and comic acceptance of the complexity of middle-class American Jewish life. Alfred Uhry (b. 1936) wrote two shrewd plays, Driving Miss Daisy (1987) and The Last Night of Ballyhoo (1997), about well-established southern Jews of German descent. In contrast, Donald Margulies wrote several keenly perceptive plays about lower-middle-class Brooklyn Jews. After two whimsical hits, A Thousand Clowns (1965) and I’m Not Rappaport (1985), Herb Gardner (1934–2003) wrote the powerful Conversations with My Father (1992), about a saloon-keeper haunted by conflicting feelings about his Jewish identity. In Isn’t it Romantic? (1981, 1983) and The Sisters Rosensweig (1992), Wendy Wasserstein (1950–2006) wrote empathically about Jewish women and their personal and generational struggles. Surprisingly, David Mamet (b. 1947), a major American playwright and a zestful polemicist on Jewish issues, has written only a few brief minor stage works on these issues, notably in the three one-act plays collectively entitled The Old Neighborhood (1997).

The most important American play of the 1990s was inarguably Angels in America (1991, 1992), subtitled “A Gay Fantasia on National Themes,” a massive double-length drama by Tony Kushner (b. 1956). Several of its characters are Jews, including two historical figures, Roy Cohn and Ethel Rosenberg. In describing the play, Kushner said, “Judaism isn’t what the play is about, but I’m Jewish and it took me by surprise that it wound up being all over the play.” Angels in America begins with the funeral of an elderly immigrant Jewish woman. “You can never make the crossing that she made,” says the rabbi to the congregation, but “In you that journey is.” In the first decades of the twenty-first century, it seems safe to assume that some remnant of that journey will be part of the continuing psychic DNA of American Jewish drama.

For further reading, see H. Erdman, Staging the Jew: The Performance of an American Ethnicity, 1860–1920 (1997); J. Novick, Beyond the Golden Door: Jewish American Drama and Jewish American Experience (2008); E. Schiff, ed., Awake and Singing: New Edition: Six Great American Jewish Plays (2004); and J. Shatzky and M. Taub, eds., Contemporary Jewish-American Dramatists and Poets: A Bio-Critical Sourcebook (1999).

JULIUS NOVICK

Theater, Yiddish. Long before scripted dramas were written and performed in *Yiddish, Yiddish speakers enjoyed performances of entertainers (badkhonim) at Jewish events, particularly weddings. Part of a wider fabric of medieval Jewish performers, including magicians who performed at fairs, wandering troubadours, and wedding musicians, badkhonim developed repertoires of wedding songs, riddles, parodies, and serious and comic songs. By the end of the sixteenth century, dramatic dialogues, primarily purimshpiln (*Purim plays), were performed publicly. The earliest extant manuscript of a purimshpil is an Akhasheyresh-shpil (Ahasuerus play) dating to 1697. These dramatizations were performed by men and boys, often students from yeshivot (religious seminaries). In a spirit of irreverence befitting the jovial mood of the Purim holiday, humor relied heavily on scatological and sexual jokes and puns, which often angered religious authorities.

Theatrical performances found a more regular place in Jewish life with the late-eighteenth-century advent of the Haskalah* or Jewish Enlightenment. The movement's proponents (maskilim) urged fellow Jews to become less insular, to integrate more fully into European society, and to benefit from secular thought. Despite fierce resistance from religious Jews, the Haskalah ultimately paved the way toward new forms of religious expression and a new orientation toward the non-Jewish world. Two *Berlin maskilim of the 1790s who took a strong interest in drama and wrote important Yiddish dramatic satires were Aaron Halle-Wolfssohn and Isaac Euchel. Euchel was the author of Reb Henokh, oder vos tut men damit? (Reb Henokh, or What Can Be Done with It?), and Wolfssohn wrote Leichtsinn und Frömmelheit (Frivolity and False Piety). Important later maskilic plays include Serkele by Solomon Ettinger (1800–1856); Avrom Ber Gottlob's 1839 Der dektukh (The Bridal Veil); Der ershter yidisher rekrut in rusland (The First Jewish Recruit in Russia) by Israel Aksenfeld (1787–1866); and Di takse (The Tax) by S. Y. Abramovich (1836–1917), best known as Mendeley Mokher Seforim (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH).

Soon after assembling his first troupe in Jassy, *Romania, in 1876, Avrom Goldfaden (1840–1908) began writing burlesques and full-length comedies, including Di kishemakherin (The Sorceress) and Der fanatic, oder di tsvey Kuni-lendl (The Fanatic, or the Two Kuni-Lendls), lampooning religious fanaticism. Before long, Goldfaden's company had rivals, one led by Joseph Lateiner (1853–1935) and the other by Moyshe Hurwitz (1844–1910). Other playwrights who would contribute to the foundation of the professional repertoire were Nokhem-Meyer ("Shomer") Shaykevitch (1849–1905) and Yoysef-Yude Lerner (1847–1907).

The *pogroms following the 1881 assassination of Tsar Alexander II helped spark a Jewish emigration from *Russia. As a result, Yiddish theater companies were created or expanded in Eastern European cities outside the Russian Empire, and new centers of Yiddish theater arose further west. However, the vast majority of Eastern European emigrants came to the *United States where *New York City emerged as a major center of Yiddish theater. There, the most popular plays from Eastern Europe were performed, as well as new works written largely in the same vein: that is, primarily melodramas, musicals, and broad comedies. Reviewers lamented the "low" taste of the Yiddish audience and hailed the early dramaturgical activity of Jacob Gordin (1853–1909). Gordin also deplored the existing repertoire and set out to reform Yiddish drama with such works as Der yidisher kenig Lir (The Jewish King Lear), Mirele Efros, and Got, mentsh un tayvl (God, Man, and Devil). Although Gordin was often praised in New York for breathing fresh life into Yiddish drama, European critics like I. L. Peretz (1852–1915) and Noyekh Prilutski (1882–1941) were less enthusiastic. Peretz regarded Gordin as little better than a shund (vulgar) playwright and felt that a different type of dramaturgy was needed to elevate the artistic level of Yiddish drama. Peretz wrote short plays influenced by naturalism, whereas his full-length verse-plays were symbolic (see also FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM 1800 TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY).

Gordin created a following not just among American audiences and critics but also among a new generation of playwrights. Successful dramatists in New York at the turn of the twentieth century included Leon Kobrin, Zalmen Libin, Nokhem Rakov, and Isidore Zolotarevsky. However, the American Yiddish stage often belonged more to performers and composers than to playwrights. Audiences worshiped musical theater specialists like Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky, Sigmund and Dina Feinman, Clara Young, and Regina Prager; comedians like Berl Bernstein and Zelig Mogulesco; and character actors like Boaz Young and Bina Abramovitch. Because of the importance of *music in the Yiddish repertoire, its composers contributed as much to its success as its performers. Among the most important composers of music for the Yiddish theater were Arnold Perlmuter and Herman Wohl (who had many of their greatest successes as a team), Dovid Meyerovitch, Louis Friedsel, Joseph Rumshinsky, Abe Ellstein, Sholem Secunda, and Peretz Sandler.

As long as immigration continued, New York remained one of the world capitals of Yiddish theater, with a new generation of playwrights contributing to the maturation of Yiddish drama. Dovid Pinski (1872–1950) created biting satires, like Der oytser (The Treasure), but also wrote in a darker vein, in dramas like Der eybiker yid (The Eternal Jew) and Di familye Tsvi (The Family Tsvi). Peretz Hirschbein (1880–1948) is best known for his idylls of village life, such as A farvorfn vinkl (A Forsaken Nook) and Grine felder (Green Fields). Other accomplished dramatists working primarily in New York were Osip Dimov, H. Leivick, and Fishl Bimko, all of whom wrote for successful troupes. Foremost among these was Maurice Schwartz's Yiddish Art Theater, which performed western and Yiddish classics, new Yiddish dramas, and adaptations of *Yiddish literature, like Sholem Aleichem's Tevye der milkhiker (Tevye the Dairyman) and I. J. Singer's Yoshe Kalb, dramatized by Schwartz himself. For true ensemble acting, New York Yiddish audiences went to Artef (from the Yiddish acronym for Workers' Theater Collective). The company established itself as the avant-garde answer to commercial offerings with its innovative productions of classic and new Yiddish plays.

After the Russian Revolution (1917), state-sponsored Yiddish theaters were founded in a number of major cities of the *Soviet Union. Of the fourteen state Yiddish companies, by far the most celebrated was the Moscow State Yiddish Theater (best known by its Russian acronym, GOSET), which revolutionized Yiddish theater with avant-garde productions of Yiddish classics, new Yiddish plays, and works from the European repertoire. The company's founder, Alexander Granovsky, put his mark on Yiddish standards like Goldfaden's Di kishefmakherin (The Sorceress) and Sholem Aleichem's Dos groysge gevins (The Lottery). After Granovsky's 1928 defection to the West, actor Solomon Mikhovels (1890–1948) took over, focusing for a while on new works like Boytre by Moyshe Kulbak (1896–1940) and Der toyber (The Deaf Man) by Dovid Bergelson (1884–1952). When Soviet authorities used Kulbak's underworld drama as an excuse to crack down on the troupe (Kulbak was arrested and disappeared into the gulag), GOSET responded with politically correct versions of Goldfaden's Shulamis and Bar Kokhba.

Yiddish theater continued to thrive elsewhere in Eastern Europe in the first three decades of the twentieth century. Schwartz's Yiddish Art Theater, which formed just a couple of years after the *Vilna Troupe, found a lasting place on the world theatrical map with its 1920 production of S. Ansky's Der dibek (The *Dybbuk). The company's further successes included Yoshke muzikant (Yoshke the Musician) by Osip Dimov (born Joseph Perlman, 1878–1959) and Kiddush ha-Shem (Martyrdom) by Sholem Asch (1880–1957). The Vilna Troupe continued to perform until the *Holocaust, when its remaining members were trapped in the Vilna ghetto and liquidated along with their neighbors. Before then, however, interwar *Poland was fertile ground for new ventures in Yiddish theater. The 1920s brought the creation of such companies as VYKT (Varshever yidisher kunst teater, or Warsaw Yiddish Art Theater), founded in 1924 and led by Zygmunt Turkow (1896–1970) and his wife Ida Kaminska (1899–1980); VNYT (Varshever nayer yidisher teater, or Warsaw New Yiddish Theater), founded by Zygmunt's brother, Jonas Turkow (1892–1982), in 1929; and Yung Teater (Young Theater), established by Mikhl Weichert in 1932.

The annihilation of Polish Jewry by the *Nazis destroyed a particularly vibrant theatrical culture. Yet during the war, performers made valiant efforts to carry on their activities in the face of the gravest danger. *Warsaw *ghetto leader Emanuel *Ringelblum's diaries chronicle a variety of cultural undertakings, including musical and theatrical performance. As the Nazi ghettos were liquidated and the survivors were sent to concentration camps, they continued to perform even in the camps. After the war, surviving actors resumed theatrical activity, first in *displaced persons camps and then in the places where they settled.

Important secondary hubs of Yiddish theater include *Argentina; *South Africa, where Sarah Sylvia reigned as the leading star; *Australia, dominated by Polish immigrants Yankev Weislitz and Rochl Holzer; and Montreal (see CANADA), which had long served as a "provincial" theater on the North American circuit (along with *Chicago, *Philadelphia, Detroit, and Baltimore, among others). *Israel, home to countless native Yiddish speakers, was problematic for Yiddish theater. The privileging of Hebrew over Yiddish in *British Mandate Palestine and later in the State of *Israel made it difficult to mount Yiddish theater productions. Nevertheless, Yiddish performances in Palestine began as early as the 1890s and continued into the early decades of the state. By the early twenty-first century, little regular activity remains, although Shmuel Atzmon's Yiddishpil company, based in *Tel Aviv, continues to carry the flame.

While Yiddish culture was all but destroyed by Hitler and Stalin, it also lost popularity in more comfortable venues. The Yiddish theater thrived in places like New York as long as there was a steady stream of new immigrants. That supply largely dried up after strict immigration quotas were imposed in the 1920s, and the American Yiddish theater began a steady decline. Nevertheless, Artef was important throughout the 1930s, as was the Yiddish Art Theater in the 1930s and 1940s. As of the early twenty-first century, the Folksbine is the only American company continuing to offer Yiddish performances on a fairly regular basis.

For further reading, see N. Sandrow, Vagabond Stars (1977; reprinted 1999); J. Berkowitz, ed., Yiddish Theater: New Approaches (2003); and J. Hoberman, Bridge of Light (1991), which focuses on Yiddish film. Memoirs include J. Adler, A Life on the Stage (1999); P. Burstein, What a Life! (2003); and H. Yablokoff, Der Payatz (1995). For English translations, see J. Berkowitz and J. Dauber, eds., Landmark Yiddish Plays (2006); and N. Sandrow, ed., God, Man, and Devil (1998).

JOEL BERKOWITZ

Theology. Judaism offers a rich theological tradition devoted to describing *God and how God functions within Jewish life.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY: Covenantal theology, prophetic theology, Land of Israel/Temple theology, and wisdom theology are types of biblical theology. *Covenantal theology is based on the attributes of divine mercy and divine justice as they are exemplified in God's creation and ordering of the world and God's care for everything created (Gen 1). It also assumes that the divine-human relationship is predicated on divine promises and divine law. Both the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants function according to the theo-logic of a God who issues both promises and *commandments. Obedience to these laws is the prerequisite to fulfillment of God's promises (Gen 17; Exod 19). Covenantal theology supports a theology of history in which acts of divine grace in the past are invoked to bring individuals into a present and future relationship with God.

Prophetic theology is expressed in the responses of *prophets like *Isaiah and *Jeremiah to historical challenges to covenantal theology such as war and exile (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). The prophets consider such events in light of a theology of reward and punishment according to which loss of divine favor is a result of human deviations from covenantal practice and obligation. Prophetic theology also develops expectations of divine *redemption and covenantal renewal at some future time (see ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD). A related *Land of Israel/*Temple theology, or "theology of Zion," is expressed in the *Psalms and historical writings of the Hebrew *Bible. This theology identifies the Land of Israel and the *Jerusalem Temple as sacred meeting places between the divine and the human that provide access to divine reality and eternity. Wisdom writings, found in *Job, *Ecclesiastes, *Proverbs (see also BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE), and *Song of Songs, draw a connection between the divine order expressed within nature and the social norms incumbent on both Jews and Gentiles. Wisdom literature incorporates covenantal theology into this larger context of the divine order.

RABBINIC THEOLOGY: Rabbinic texts (*Mishnah, *Talmud, and *midrash) emphasize the two poles of divine reality: divine transcendence and divine immanence. According to the Rabbis, God transcends the created world, and the age of prophecy has come to an end: “The Holy One, blessed be He, is the Place of His world and His world is not His place” (*Rashi). Nonetheless, the Rabbis developed *halakhic and liturgical structures that presuppose God’s concern for creation and in particular the ability of the individual to live according to divine law and engage in *repentance behaviors for the sake of *atonement and forgiveness. Rabbinic literature also wrestles with classic theological questions, including how and why God permits suffering (see EVIL AND SUFFERING); questions related to creation – was the world created at a particular moment in time?; and whether God speaks in the language of human beings.

MEDIEVAL THOUGHT: Like the wisdom tradition before it, Jewish *thought in the Middle Ages deepened the inquiry into the relationship between God’s activity as revealer and God’s activity as creator. However, medieval theology, as exemplified by the work of *Saadia Gaon (882–942) and Moses *Maimonides (1135–1204), used human *reason to inquire into the divine nature. The Book of Doctrines and Opinions, by Saadia Gaon offers one of the first systematic Jewish accounts of the link between a God available to analysis by human *reason and a God of tradition whose *revelation exceeds human understanding. Influenced by Aristotle, Maimonides’ work presents a rigorous philosophico-theological investigation into the unity of God. In negative theology, an aspect of this inquiry, both positive and negative claims concerning God are declared beyond human understanding, while the true, unparalleled nature of God is continuously pointed to but never reduced to human propositions.

EARLY MODERN PERIOD: *Mysticism presented an altogether new set of paradigms for Jewish theology (see KABBALAH). The well-known kabbalist Isaac Luria (1534–1572) described God as Ein Sof (without end) – infinitely unknowable, on the one hand, and as generative of emanations or sefirot* through which this same God creates the world, on the other.

In the seventeenth century the work of Baruch *Spinoza (1632–1677) sent shock waves through Jewish intellectual circles. Spinoza challenged biblical and medieval claims concerning the transcendence of God over creation by positing an identity between God and substance (The Ethics). However, modern Jewish *thought has not sustained Spinoza’s overturning of divine transcendence, and even thinkers as philosophically inclined as Moses *Mendelssohn (1729–1786) and Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918) reassert the Jewish commitment to the transcendence of God while maintaining the close connection between divine perfection and human theoretical and practical reason.

MODERN APPROACHES: Twentieth-century Jewish theology renewed the focus on the biblically-based model of covenantal theology. Whereas Martin *Buber’s I and Thou recovers the biblical account of divine calling and human response, Franz *Rosenzweig’s The Star of Redemption is alone in restoring the twofold emphasis on divine *love and command as the central elements in the divine–human relationship. Deeply concerned with tackling God’s relationship to the suffering of the Jewish people during the *Shoah, post-Holocaust Jewish theologians like Eliezer *Berkovits and Elie *Wiesel use the covenantal model as their baseline for coming to terms with the depth of evil expressed in the *Holocaust (see also HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES). Although some post-Holocaust theologians like Emil *Fackenheim and Richard *Rubenstein reject the validity of a covenantal theology in the wake of the Shoah, Jewish thinkers in America have enriched the covenantal account of Jewish theology. Both Abraham Joshua *Heschel (God in Search of Man) and Joseph B. *Soloveitchik (The Lonely Man of Faith) emphasize God’s desire for the living response of the Jewish community to acts and expressions of divine love and divine command. More recently, David Novak has further developed Jewish covenantal theology and applied it to the challenge of contemporary multiculturalism.

Late-twentieth- and early-twenty-first-century Jewish theology has also been marked by the development of Jewish feminist theology (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). Both Judith Plaskow (Standing again at Sinai) and Rachel Adler (Engendering Judaism) reconsider classic Jewish conceptions of God through the lens of women’s narrative, secondary legal status, and liturgical experience. RANDI RASHKOVER

Theresienstadt was a concentration camp north of Prague in the town of Terezín (Theresienstadt) in Czechoslovakia that was established in October 1941. It was initially a *ghetto for elderly and privileged Reich Jews, but Adolf Eichmann later transformed it into a special “show” camp to dispel rumors about the “Final Solution.”

To maintain this façade, Eichmann, who kept an office at Theresienstadt, allowed the ghetto’s large community of scholars, writers, musicians, and artists a certain amount of creative freedom to study, write, and compose. In 1944, Joseph Goebbels’ propaganda office produced a film, Theresienstadt: Ein Dokumentarfilm aus dem jüdischen Siedlungsgebiet (Documentary Film of the Jewish Resettlement), that was later shown to a visiting Red Cross delegation. Fifteen thousand children passed through Theresienstadt on their way to death camps in occupied Poland. Some of their artwork and poems have been published in I Never Saw Another Butterfly, edited by Hana Volavkova. More than 33,000 Jews died in Theresienstadt and more than 87,000 were sent on to death camps. See CZECHOSLOVAKIA; HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Thought, Early Modern (1500–1750). Jewish thought in the Early Modern period covers a broad spectrum, including philosophical and theological works as well as scientific, ethical, and homiletical writings.

After 1492, the rationalist approaches that were prevalent in the medieval period (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL) declined in prominence, and Jewish thinkers who upheld the eternity of the universe, the lack of personal providence, and Averroes' double truth became increasingly rare. Most sixteenth-century Jewish thinkers were conservative, claiming the superiority of *revelation over *reason; they produced homiletical and theological treatises that made use of philosophical language and style without substantive philosophical content. As a result, concepts and terminology acquired new meanings, entirely different from their original connotations.

Spanish exiles enriched the Mediterranean basin with their spiritual creativity and their organizational talents – gathering writings into “public libraries,” broadening the scope of study and teaching, and so forth. Their rational style also influenced *Ashkenazic thought. Philosophical trends persisted into the sixteenth century, but they encountered conservative opposition. For instance, a sharp dispute erupted in the early sixteenth century around Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov's Sefer ha-Emunot (Book of Religious Beliefs) written at the end of the fourteenth century), which is a major attack on philosophy. Moses Alashkar adopted a classic rationalistic stance in this controversy, countering Shem Tov's arguments thoroughly in his Hassagot (Critical Notes), first printed in 1553. The wanderings of this sage from *Spain to *North Africa, *Greece, *Egypt, and *Jerusalem point to the hardships that exiled rationalists endured.

A unique type of philosophical literature emerged in countries that were part of the *Ottoman Empire. Joseph Taitatsak, who left Spain in 1492 and became a rabbi in Salonika (see BALKANS), adopted conservative approaches that medieval rationalists had rejected; these included the claim that the soul had been created directly by *God without intermediate hypostases. For proofs, Taitatsak relied on scholastic Christian literature and particularly on Thomas Aquinas's commentary on Aristotle, highlighting the Neoplatonic aspects of Aquinas's thought. Taitatsak also wrote a number of scholarly biblical exegeses.

In Salonika, Moses Almosnino (ca. 1515–ca. 1580) used a rationalist style, pervaded with philosophical terminology, to claim that the *Torah is superior to reason. Contrary to medieval rationalists, Almosnino claimed that the foundations of *science and wisdom are in the Torah and that knowledge is acquired through the study of Torah. At the same time, he continued to pursue serious philosophical studies and translated philosophical and scientific texts. Although Almosnino was not a kabbalist (see KABBALAH), his views parallel mystical claims that the Torah is a receptacle of supernal truths. This approach is also typical of other thinkers active in Almosnino's surroundings, whose ideas and conservatism drew them into the kabbalists' camp.

*Italy, too, was a center for thinkers hostile to philosophy and its authority. Isaac *Abravanel, Jehiel of Pisa (d. ca. 1574), and Judah Moscato (d. ca. 1593), who wrote a comprehensive commentary on Judah *Halevi's The Kuzari, attacked philosophers and disparaged their achievements. Nevertheless, Judah Abravanel, Isaac's son, also known as Leone Ebreo, wrote the Dialoghi d'Amore (Dialogues of Love), a treatise with definite philosophical traces. This sixteenth-century work is built as a dialogue between Sophia, who presents rational thought as the supreme value and the source of cosmic processes, and Philo, for whom the driving cosmic force is love. The philosophical stance is based on Aristotle and on Averroes' commentary, and even Abravanel's description of love adopts a philosophical style.

Samuel Saul Siriro (d. 1655), a disciple of Saadia ibn Danan, who was active in Morocco (see NORTH AFRICA), wrote a book of homilies that combines a literal interpretation of *aggadah and medieval thought. Siriro argued that miracles were meant to strengthen the faith of the masses, but perfect individuals do not need miracles because they attain knowledge of God through study. However, Siriro did not advocate the detailed curriculum carefully specified by medieval philosophers that included the study of logic, the life sciences, physics, and so forth. Rather, he depended on rabbinical homilies, emptying them of their philosophical contents while preserving their frame and style. Siriro painstakingly explained his perception of miracles, offering extensive support for the view that the perfect individual can bring them about. Contrary to Abraham *ibn Ezra, who said that miracles can only occur through the individual's conjunction with the supernal worlds, Siriro claimed that the image of God within human beings endows them with the ability to perform miracles. Siriro's homilies also make superficial use of the narrative-midrashic contents of the *Zohar, but not its kabbalistic teachings. Siriro cited philosophical texts, from *Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed through *Gersonides' commentary on the Torah, and also alluded to fifteenth-century scholarly literature, such as Abraham Bibago's Derekh Emunah (The Path of Faith). Thus, Siriro's homilies point to a detachment from the content of medieval philosophy while preserving its style.

In Ashkenaz, Judah *Loew, the Maharal of *Prague (d. 1609), deliberately used a semi-philosophical scholarly style in his prose, giving readers the impression of confronting a rationalist body of work that required such terminology, although its contents were unswervingly opposed to rationalism. For instance, a central claim in the essay Tiferet Israel (The Splendor of Israel), which is devoted to the superiority of the Torah, is that technical and practical action are essentially preferable to abstract thinking. Loew devoted many discussions to the seemingly rational argument that the practice of the commandments is superior to any intellectual pursuit, insisting that the order of the world rests on spiritual rules and laws. Thus, cosmic laws demonstrate that religious practice, rather than intellectual study, leads to perfection.

Moses *Isserles, known as the Rema (d. 1572), wrote a long essay on the reasons for the *commandments in general and for the *Temple service in particular. He relied on medieval rationalist works, particularly on Maimonidean and post-Maimonidean treatises such as Albo's Sefer ha-Ikkarim (Book of the Principles of Faith). Although Isserles was an extremely conservative thinker, the prominent Ashkenazi sage Solomon Luria still attacked him for his exaggerated recourse to rationalism. Like Loew, Isserles also drew on the kabbalistic corpus and offered scholarly formulations of mystical approaches.

By the seventeenth century, the philosophical content and style of the Middle Ages, still present in sixteenth-century writings, had disappeared almost entirely. Exceptions were still evident in Italy, including the work of Leon (Judah Aryeh) *Modena, who was critical of Kabbalah. Ma'aseh Tuviah, a medical compendium by Tuviah Ha-Cohen (d. 1729), who grew up in Metz and Kraków, was well known in Ashkenaz. In this treatise, elementary theological approaches are presented as backed by philosophical claims.

In the *Ottoman Empire some homilists with a philosophical background, such as Joshua Benveniste (d. ca. 1668) and Solomon Amarilio (d. 1722), dissociated themselves from kabbalistic sources. Nissim ibn Shangi mingled homiletics, exegesis, and halakhic discussions in his writings. In contrast to the many homiletical works of this era, philosophical monographs are rare. A few important examples still appeared, however, defending the Oral Law. In seventeenth-century *Venice, Immanuel Aboab (d. 1628) wrote Nomologia or Halakhic Homilies. In this treatise, Aboab dealt with such theological and philosophical issues as the divine attributes, the reasons for the *commandments, and psychology. Aviad Sar Shalom Basilea (d. ca. 1743), who also wrote a book in defense of rabbinic tradition entitled Emunat Hakhamim (Faith of the Wise), attested that he is not a kabbalist but wished to defend the honor of tradition in all its manifestations, including Kabbalah.

Another essay on the same subject was written by the celebrated rabbi of the eighteenth-century *Sephardi community in London, David Nieto (d. 1728), originally from Italy. Nieto was involved in a serious polemic over a fundamentally philosophical issue. Preaching in London's Spanish-Portuguese synagogue in 1703, Nieto claimed that God and nature are one. When he was accused of conceptual associations with *Spinoza, a controversy erupted that abated only when Zvi Hirsch Ashkenazi and his Hamburg court cleared Nieto of any blame. Nieto wrote the book Matteh Dan (The Staff of Dan), which was called "the second Kuzari" because it followed the format of a dialogue between the Khazar king and a rabbi that Judah Halevi had used for his Kuzari. This treatise, which was also intended to defend the eternity and holiness of *rabbinic tradition (the Oral *Torah), is suffused with philosophical scholarship from the Middle Ages and the Early Modern period. Nieto published several essays as well as *sermons, many marked by a philosophical orientation.

In more remote areas, unaffected by the Spanish exiles and their culture, medieval philosophical monographs were still popular. In seventeenth century *Iran, Judah ben Elazar published a comprehensive philosophical essay, Hovot Yehudah (The Duties of Judah). This book deals with four realms of Jewish thought: the existence of God, prophecy (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY), *revelation, and *messianism. The book ends with a discussion on the soul and other topics that Jewish philosophy considered esoteric. Philosophical monographs of this kind were still produced in *Yemen as well.

For further reading, see R. Bonfil, Rabbis and Jewish Communities in Renaissance Italy (1993); B. D. Cooperman, ed., Jewish Thought in the Sixteenth Century (1983); and I. Twersky and B. Septimus, eds., Jewish Thought in the Seventeenth Century (1987).

DOV SCHWARTZ

Thought, Medieval. Medieval Jewish thinkers reread the *Bible and *rabbinic literature using philosophical language and ideas of classical Greece. However, the philosophy they produced was discontinuous with those earlier texts in form and focus. Rather, their writings defined aspects of medieval Judaism at the same time as they helped transmit religious thought from the Muslim world to medieval Christian culture.

*Israelite religion placed emphasis on the obligations of *covenant, not expressions of creed. Rabbinic Judaism structured Jewish life into a coherent spiritual and social whole, organized around the mitzvot, commandments mandated by God; after the destruction of the *Temple, the focus was on ritual and interpersonal ethics. Just as the Rabbis of the *Talmud developed, amplified, and reinterpreted biblical ideas about God, prophecy, creation, miracles, providence, human felicity, and more, the Jewish philosophers of the Middle Ages provided a new approach to encountering and knowing *God (see also THEOLOGY). Philosophical ideas were the subject of extended essays; they also were applied to biblical texts and penetrated traditional *Bible commentaries, legal discussions, and popular *sermons.

By the late eighth century CE, Jews in Muslim-dominated *Mesopotamia, *Spain, and *North Africa were coming into extended contact with the ideas of Greek philosophy as mediated through Arabic translations and the integration of philosophical ideas into *Islam. A similar development took place within Judaism beginning in the mid-800s. As intellectual intermediaries between Islamic thought and the Christian world, Jews, especially in Spain, were translators, commentators, and original thinkers who provided the multicultural and transnational bridges needed for intellectual discourse.

Medieval philosophy was dominated by internal and external religious disputes as well as by an extended dialogue between *reason (which included *science) and *revelation (which referred to the beliefs of religious traditions). The apologetic and polemical activity of medieval Jewish philosophy gave Jews an arena of intellectual equality with the more dominant religions of Islam and *Christianity. Jewish philosophers were particularly challenged by the contrast between the methodology of philosophy and that of the Bible and Talmud. As they shifted from narrative theology to a systematic exposition of ideas, these thinkers also reflected on the truth value of human reason and inquiry in relation to divine revelation. The understanding of God that religious philosophers adapted from Greek thinkers led them to reconsider the use of anthropomorphic language in the *Bible and *Talmud.

Jewish philosophers often contended that philosophy was actually the wisdom alluded to in *Proverbs and other traditional texts – that is, philosophy was initially developed by Jews but then lost because of the "tribulations of the exile." Jewish philosophers justified their activity by contending that they were recovering and restoring the original tradition that had been subsequently distorted by the Greeks. The claim that philosophy was native to Judaism and not a foreign import was augmented by the idea that philosophical endeavors helped fulfill commandments such as "knowing God."

Jewish thinkers included Kalam theologians, Neoplatonists, Aristotelians, and those who had qualified reservations about (or completely rejected) Aristotelian philosophy. The subject matter of medieval Jewish philosophy comprised physics and other sciences, metaphysics, ethics, and politics. Jewish philosophy was shaped by and affected Islamic philosophy, influenced the development of *Kabbalah, and played a role in Jewish–Christian dialogue and polemic (see MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH–CHRISTIAN POLEMICS).

*Saadia ben Joseph Gaon (*Egypt and *Iraq, 892–942) was the most prominent figure to use the rhetorical and rational approach of Kalam, a system of thought originating in Islam that sought to explain scripture in a manner congruent with reason. Saadia justifies the use of reason, seeing it as a complementary (but ultimately subsidiary) source of knowledge to revelation. In his Book of Traditional Doctrines and Rational Opinions, Saadia provides the first systematic exposition of many critical areas of Jewish belief and develops a model for understanding the commandments by distinguishing between those that are universal-rational and those that are ritual-traditional. Using the dialectical argumentation characteristic of Mutazilite Kalam, Saadia offers arguments for creation ex nihilo and, based on that principle, then articulates reasons for the existence, unity, and incorporeality of God. He proceeds to discuss divine providence and justice, human freedom, and the intellectual afterlife of the soul. Another rabbinic exponent of Kalam was Da'ud ibn Marwan (often called David al-Mukammis). Kalam theologians were also found among the *Karaites; the most prominent are Jacob al-Kirkisani, Japheth ben Eli ha-Levi, and Joseph al-Basir.

The physician Isaac ben Solomon Israeli (*North Africa, 850–ca. 932), the poet Solomon *ibn Gabirol (Spain, 1021–ca. 1058), and the jurist *Baḥia ibn Pakuda (Spain, late 1000s) are the three Jewish thinkers most closely identified with Neoplatonism. Although Israeli corresponded with Saadia and was known to *Maimonides, his works were primarily known in Latin and did not influence other Jewish thinkers. Gabirol's major work, Fountain of Life, was known exclusively in its Latin version, Fons Vitae; it too had little effect on Jewish thinkers. In contrast, his ethical work, The Improvement of Moral Qualities, and his liturgical poem, The Sovereign Crown, are still studied and recited. Baḥia's work, Guide to the Duties of the Heart, was translated from *Judeo-Arabic into Hebrew and had a significant impact on Jewish ethics and spiritual development. Ibn Gabirol's Crown reprises many of the ideas of Fountain of Life and articulates a deep yearning for spiritual purification and ascent to the divine. The ideas of ethical improvement and a spiritual ascent toward God are evident in ibn Gabirol's Improvement and in Baḥia's Duties. The intent of Baḥia's work is to alert Jews who are focused on external commandments to the inner spiritual experience. Baḥia leads the reader from the unity of God to a union with the divine. The Neoplatonic emphasis on the spiritual ascent is also found in various expressions of Jewish *mysticism.

The initial period of Jewish Aristotelianism extended from the ninth to the end of the twelfth century and was related to Arabic translations of Aristotle and Islamic commentary on that literature. Beginning in the thirteenth century, the Jewish intellectual center moved to Christian countries, and the language of discourse and translation shifted from Arabic to Hebrew. Jewish Aristotelians distinguished between philosophical and theological works and focused on disparities between their received tradition and the scientific-philosophical ideas derived from Aristotle. For example, biblical and rabbinic assumptions about creation and miracles did not accord with the physics of an eternal cosmic order and the regular patterning of natural phenomena. The metaphysical conception of a transcendent, unmoved mover was at variance with the biblical presentation of a "most moved mover," who had knowledge of and concern for individuals. The biblical portrayal of a *covenantal community serving God through adherence to specific commandments was not easily reconciled with a universal virtue-based ethics and claims that human felicity (eudaemia) could be attained through the intellectual apprehension of abstract knowledge. Aristotelian emphasis on reason led to a view of faith as cognitive and propositional, rather than an expression of loyalty to and relationship with God. Moreover, the notion of the attainment of individual intellectual excellence led to the conclusion that the *afterlife related to the perfection of the human soul, rather than to physical *resurrection and the politics of national restoration.

*Abraham ibn Daud (Spain, 1110–1180), the author of an essay about the transmission of the Jewish tradition, Sefer Ha-Kabbalah (Book of Tradition), also composed the first Aristotelian work, Emunah Rabbah (Exalted Faith), written by a Jew. Ibn Daud critiques the theological inadequacies of both Saadia and Ibn Gabirol and presents the bases of natural science in order to end confusion about the imagined disagreement between religion and philosophy. He writes of the healing of the soul through moral conduct, but gives preeminence to theoretical knowledge. In the quest for felicity, ibn Daud claims that ritual commandments and moral acts have value, although metaphysical philosophy seems to have greater significance. Following the Arab philosopher ibn Sina (Avicenna), he develops arguments for an incorporeal, necessarily existent God whose attributes cannot be discussed in a positive way, but who nonetheless has a relationship with this world.

The dominant figure in medieval Jewish thought is Moses ben Maimon, also known as Moses *Maimonides (Spain, North Africa, Egypt, 1135–1204). His three most significant works are the Commentary to the Mishnah, a survey of the oral tradition of Judaism; Mishneh Torah*, a comprehensive legal code detailing the obligations of all Jews; and Guide for the Perplexed, the preeminent statement of medieval Jewish philosophy. He also wrote works of *medicine, logic, and legal *responsa. Maimonides is a pivotal figure, representing the apex of the Judeo-Arabic philosophical tradition. Except for the Mishneh Torah, which was written in Hebrew, all of Maimonides' works were composed in Arabic; the Hebrew translation of the Guide established the philosophical framework for Jews in Christian lands. His work affects all subsequent Jewish thought, influences key Christian thinkers, and is the starting point for *Spinoza's critique of religion.

Debates over Maimonides began in medieval times and continue in contemporary academic scholarship. One perspective has Maimonides offering a comprehensive demonstration of the coherence of Torah and philosophy. Another approach argues that Maimonides subtly introduced contradictions into the Guide to conceal his true, more radical, opinions. This method enabled Maimonides to bifurcate between *halakhic (legal) writings, which served as an exposition of revealed *theology for the masses, and speculative work that discussed and identified a more mature philosophical truth for the intellectual elite (see STRAUSS, LEO). How one understands Maimonides' views on virtually every major philosophical question depends on whether one sees a unified, coherent body of work infused by philosophy or an exoteric and esoteric division between legal theology and philosophy.

All agree that a major focus of Maimonides' philosophical project involves a philosophical hermeneutic of the Bible and rabbinic literature centered on a vigorous repudiation of idolatry, understood as false ideas about God (in addition to the worship of other deities). The Guide may be understood as a major rereading of scripture; it reinterprets any terms that might be understood to describe God or the actions of God in anthropomorphic ways. Maimonides also held that no positive attributes can be predicated of God, for such descriptions might impinge on the unity of God. To preserve this central idea, all positive terms, such as existence, life, power, will, and knowledge, had to be avoided when speaking of divinity. Maimonides contends that identical language may be used in relation to God and human beings, but the similarity is exclusively verbal, not essential. Negative attributes imply a philosophical agnosticism: Nothing can be known concerning the true being of God. The question of the predication of attributes to divinity was a distinctive and central issue in medieval Jewish philosophy.

The Aristotelian tradition continued in *Yemen, North Africa, Spain, and, particularly, in *Italy and southern *France. The Provence region of southern France became a center for biblical studies, talmudic exegesis, mathematics, and philosophy. During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the translation project of the *ibn Tibbon family led to the dissemination of philosophical works in Hebrew and created the technical vocabulary needed to pursue philosophy in Hebrew. Over time, the major works of Jewish and Muslim thinkers became available in Hebrew. Along with the work of Maimonides, the writings of the Spanish-Islamic philosopher, Averroes, had a significant influence on subsequent thinkers. The philosophical agenda was defended and carried on in Provence in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries by Shem Tov ibn Joseph Falaquera, Isaac Albalag, Jedaiah Berdisi ha-Penini, Nissim ben Moses of Marseille, and Levi ben Gershon (*Gersonides). In this period as well, a series of confrontations developed over the legitimacy of philosophy and the role of Maimonides in the canon of Jewish studies. Philosophical ideas also began to appear within *biblical commentaries and *sermons, bringing these ideas to a broader public. One response was to attribute religious laxity to the philosophical allegorization of biblical texts.

The most significant early critics of philosophy were Judah *Halevi (Spain, ca. 1070–1141) and Moses ben Naḥman (*Naḥmanides, Spain, 1194–1270). Halevi wrote in a dialogical style, and Naḥmanides' opinions are found scattered through his many works. During a later stage of Aristotelian criticism, Ḥasdai *Crescas (Spain, ca. 1340–1410) stands out for his rigorous philosophical argumentation. Although each thinker was influential in defense of a traditional expression of Judaism, their methodologies and their relationship to Aristotelianism differed from one another.

Naḥmanides was a physician, biblical commentator, talmudist, legal scholar, and kabbalist who defended the Rabbis of the *Mishnah and *Talmud, as well as the legal and theological positions of his predecessors, the *Geonim. Naḥmanides is often critical of philosophy, singling out Aristotle for opprobrium. In his Torat ha-Adam, which deals with illness, *death, and rituals of *mourning, Naḥmanides disparages philosophers who imagine that human beings should transcend pain and be indifferent to loss. Yet, throughout his writings, Naḥmanides adopts positions that join reason and revelation. Considered one of the significant figures in the development of Kabbalah, Naḥmanides occasionally incorporates philosophical concepts into what he accepts as the mystical teachings of antiquity. Although identified as a critic of Maimonides, their relationship is actually complex. In an effort to moderate the developing criticism of Maimonides, Naḥmanides counseled the rabbis of Provence to revoke their ban on the philosophical portions of the Mishneh Torah and only to prohibit study of the Guide. One of his key teachings is that divine providence is evidenced through hidden miracles performed for the pious (differing from Maimonides' focus on the intellectual elite). Naḥmanides also accepts that necessary processes dominate the natural world and apply to Gentiles, unexceptional Jews, and even to the Jewish people as a whole.

During the last century of Spanish Jewish life, an intellectually sophisticated and theologically conservative group of thinkers, led by Ḥasdai Crescas, offered a sustained critique of the naturalism and intellectual elitism of earlier Jewish Aristotelians. After the anti-Jewish riots of 1391, subsequent large-scale conversions to Christianity, lax observance of commandments, and a tendency to see Judaism as an expression of universal philosophical ideas, Jewish thinkers articulated an approach to Judaism that would reclaim its distinctiveness, assert the particular significance of the commandments, and affirm the importance of Jewish peoplehood. They also were influenced by Christian theologians who rejected philosophical naturalism, reasserted the importance of faith over intellect, and claimed that willful decisions for God were more religiously significant than rational reflection about the divine. Avner of Burgos (Spain, ca. 1270–ca. 1347), who converted to Christianity at a mature age, was another determinist thinker.

Crescas' primary student was Joseph Albo (d. 1444); his Sefer ha-Ikkarim (Book of the Principles of Faith) also explores the dogmas of Judaism. Albo limits the essential Jewish principles of faith to three: the existence of God, revelation, and divine justice (linked to the idea of immortality). All this was part of an effort by the intellectual leaders and members of the community to articulate a set of beliefs and behaviors that would provide spiritual strength, security, and solidarity for a beleaguered people.

The influence of Crescas extended through Abraham Bibago (d. ca. 1489), Abraham Shalom (d. 1492), and Isaac *Arama (ca. 1420–1494), all of whom sought to reinvigorate Judaism by emphasizing faith as a willful act extending beyond the limitations of reason. They stressed spiritual closeness with the divine and ultimate salvation through the practice of the commandments. The translation of Aristotle's Ethics into Hebrew led to a growing respect for philosophical *ethics. The increased influence of Kabbalah is also felt during this period, with philosophers respectfully introducing some mystical ideas into their writings. They all argued against dissident Jewish intellectuals and disputed core Christian beliefs while speaking respectfully of the culture of Christian faithfulness.

Isaac *Abravanel (1437–1508) was a prolific commentator and author who also should be considered among this group of medieval thinkers. In addition to his extended commentary to the Bible, he composed works on cosmology, providence, and messianic redemption. In his Rosh Amanah (Head of Faith), Abravanel contends that were Judaism to require a set of creedal propositions, Maimonides' principles would be sufficient. However, the entire body of 613 mitzvot*, rather than any set of propositions, was essential for a Jewish future.

Medieval Jewish philosophy exhibited a subtle interplay of ideas brought from Greek thought with biblical and rabbinic texts and beliefs. The religious technique of close and strong reading of biblical texts enabled Jewish philosophers to bring new ideas into harmony with classical religious language. Efforts to establish correlations among science*, philosophy, and classical Judaism were not always successful, but even when the results of rational speculation were rejected, the creative interchange added much to Judaism, developed cultural bridges among the three Abrahamic religions, and forged a conduit between the Hellenic* heritage and modern thought.

For further reading, see D. Frank and O. Leaman, eds., The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Jewish Philosophy (2003); D. Frank, ed., The Jewish Philosophy Reader (2002); K. Seeskin, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Maimonides (2005); and H. Tirosh-Samuelson, Happiness in Premodern Judaism: Virtue, Knowledge, and Well-Being (2003).

BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Thought, Modern. Jewish thought embraces all serious forms of intellectual engagement with the Jewish heritage, ranging from sacred texts and their commentaries, to systematic examinations of the ethical and metaphysical implications of Jewish belief, to reflections on the meaning of the Jewish past, to works of fiction and poetry that reflect on distinctive Jewish themes, memories, and experiences. "Modern" is a problematic term covering multiple and contradictory phenomena because modernity is a series of responses to continuous economic, social, political, scientific, technological, and cultural changes. Jewish modernity partakes of these dynamic and contradictory elements.

For purposes of this brief summary, modern Jewish thought can be divided into three phases: from the late eighteenth century to around 1881, from around 1881 to 1948, and since 1945. These periods overlap, but they convey the shifting focus of modern Jewish thought. The first era was dominated by political emancipation* and rationalist ways of conveying the essence of Judaism*; the second by responses to antisemitism* and the development of Zionism*; and the third by the shock of the Holocaust*, the desire to reconnect with tradition, and intellectual efforts to render Judaism more egalitarian and inclusive.

The eighteenth-century Enlightenment's* espousal of universal rational values led to viewing the Jews as human beings first and foremost. Moses Mendelssohn* (1729–1786), a notable figure of the German Enlightenment, is usually considered to be the first major Jewish thinker thoroughly in the modern mode. Unlike Baruch/Benedict Spinoza* (1632–1677), who was profoundly affected by the early phases of the scientific and philosophical revolutions of early modern Europe but found himself outside Judaism, Mendelssohn remained a devoted Jew all his life. His treatise Jerusalem presented Judaism as a religion of reason*. Judaism's revelation* was a divinely inspired set of behaviors ("revealed legislation") that sustain the Jews as a holy people. Mendelssohn launched a Jewish Enlightenment movement, the Haskalah*.

The Berlin Haskalah* founded by Mendelssohn was succeeded by the Haskalah in Austrian Poland* (Galicia*) in the 1820s and in parts of the Russian Pale of Settlement (Vilna* and elsewhere) soon after. The outstanding figure of the Galician Haskalah is Nahman Krochmal* (1785–1840), who created an original philosophy of the cycles of Jewish history. The Russian maskilim defended the integrity of Judaism and brought scenes from the biblical past to life in their novels and other works. They were also critical of the backwardness of Jewish education and the rigidity of traditional rabbis. Major figures included Isaac Baer Levinsohn* (1788–1860), Abraham Mapu (1808–1867), Judah Leib Gordon (1830–1892), Moses Leib Lilienblum (1843–1910), and Peretz Smolenskin (1842–1885; see also LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH).

In German-speaking lands, the Berlin Haskalah found its continuation in efforts to modernize the liturgy, the most direct expression of Jewish faith and hope (see WORSHIP). Universalistic and utopian dimensions were to be emphasized, whereas prayers that called for the ingathering to the Holy Land in the days of the messiah*, reestablishment of the Davidic dynasty, and rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple* were downplayed as contradictory to the aims of emancipation. In the 1820s the Wissenschaft des Judentums*, the movement for the scientific study of Judaism, began to develop under the leadership of Leopold Zunz* (1794–1886). Modern historical knowledge of Judaism was to be the basis for a conception of historical progress that would demonstrate that Judaism was a thoroughly up-to-date religious option. Research uncovered lost works of Jewish literature and philosophy, leading to a great appreciation of what came to be called the "golden age" of medieval Sephardic Jewry*, a model of a sophisticated Judaism that German Jewry could emulate. The new historiography led to sweeping accounts of the saga of the Jewish people through many centuries, epitomized by the writings of Heinrich Graetz* (1817–1891) and even one early espousal of Jewish national revival – Rome and Jerusalem (1861) by Moses Hess (1812–1875).

During the first half of the nineteenth century, a range of views developed as to how much Judaism needed to be changed to fit "the spirit of the times." Samson Raphael Hirsch* (1808–1888), the founder of what is called Neo-Orthodox Judaism (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX), agreed that Jews should modernize their secular way of life, but insisted on loyalty to the Torah and the commandments as supernatural revelation. Rabbinic synods in the 1840s brought together German rabbis who felt that some changes were necessary but disagreed as to exactly what they should be. The exponent of the reform position in his scholarly work was Abraham Geiger* (1810–1874); Samuel Holdheim (1806–1860) was one of the more extreme reformers (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY). Zacharias Frankel* (1801–1875) advocated a "Positive-Historical Judaism" that preserved traditional modes of worship and upheld continuity of the halakhah* with respect for Wissenschaft des Judentums (see JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE). Underlying specific issues was a drastic change in attitude according to which Judaism was subject to deliberate, conscious human choice, rather than a more passive consequence of obedience to the divine. This assertiveness would reappear in a different guise in Zionism*.

Thus, nineteenth-century Jewish thinkers attempted to define the tradition in relation to a new Jewish political status as well as in response to developments in science and historiography. Ethical monotheism was held to be the core of what had to be retained in a fully modern religion. For some Modernists, Judaism seemed to be congruent with the philosophy of Immanuel Kant, who postulated the idea of God as the necessary ground for the “moral law” as integral to a purified Judaism. Jewish thought was also influenced by post-Enlightenment Romantic aspirations toward the sublime and an appreciation of national cultures. The German philosopher G. W. F. Hegel conceived of the unfolding self-consciousness of Geist (Spirit, Mind) as being attained through the dialectic of ideas reacting against each other toward synthesis on an ever higher level. This conception supported the view of Jewish understandings of *Torah evolving over time as Jews adapted to changing circumstances and advanced to new stages of development.

In the mid-nineteenth-century United States, many Jews found Reform Judaism an attractive alternative to more traditional forms of Jewish practice. The most assertive sector of the Reform rabbinate drafted a statement of principles in Pittsburgh in 1885 that expressed a willingness to drop whatever was anachronistically unsuited to the mores of modern society. It affirmed the openness of Judaism to the scientific worldview and a commitment to speak out on social issues (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA). Rabbis who felt that Reform had gone too far in instituting drastic change looked to Positive-Historical Judaism as precedent for preserving halakhic continuity with due respect for historical research; in the United States this approach became known as Conservative Judaism. Those who felt that this trend did not adhere closely enough to traditional halakhah coalesced into what became Modern Orthodoxy (see JUDAISM entries).

In Europe, the rise of modern *antisemitism, beginning in the 1870s, and the upsurge of mass socialist and nationalist movements presented new challenges for modern Jewish thought. Jewish movements emerged that offered completely secular interpretations of what was meaningful in Jewish history and culture. Spiritual (i.e., cultural) Zionists, such as *Aḥad Ha-Am (Asher Ginzberg, 1856–1927) saw in the *Hebrew-language and literature revival, along with Jewish ethnicity and values, evidence that the ancient tradition could be adapted to secular life. Political Zionists like Leon *Pinsker (1821–1891) and Theodor *Herzl (1860–1904) emphasized the urgent need for a Jewish homeland (“self-emancipation”) in view of the failure of emancipation in the *Diaspora to bring about the acceptance of Jews. For the Jewish Workers *Bund of Russia, Poland, and Lithuania, *Yiddish was the language of the Jewish masses and participation in the revolutionary struggle the primary goal. Left-wing movements, Zionist and non-Zionist alike, found support for their collectivist utopianism in the words of the biblical prophets and in the traditional communal structures of Jewish life.

The prestige of Darwinian biology played a notable role in late-nineteenth-century Jewish thought. Ideologists such as Aḥad Ha-Am and Simon *Dubnow (1860–1941) explained the course of Jewish history as demonstrating the strength of a Jewish collective “will to survive” that had enabled the Jewish people to adapt to different environments and epochs. Jewish peoplehood was said to offer a sense of participation that provided identity to the individual Jew, together with a vision of a better world. Secular Jewish writers from Y. L. Peretz (1852–1915) to Martin *Buber (1878–1965) drew on *Hasidism and the traditional Jewish world to portray the emotional strength of the old Jewish way of life and tensions within it.

Modern Jewish religious historical scholarship opened up a new appreciation of rabbinic Judaism. Influential works included Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909) and Studies in Judaism by Solomon *Schechter (1847–1915) and Jewish Theology, Systematically and Historically Considered (1918) by Kaufmann Kohler (1843–1926). Responding to the claims of liberal Christianity that it had superseded Judaism, Jewish thinkers like Leo Baeck (1873–1956) defended the ethical and rational essence of Judaism. Jewish philosophy reached a high level of professional sophistication in the Jewish writings of Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918). Cohen combined an appreciation of prophetic ethics, democratic socialism, and the continued relevance of the philosophy of Immanuel Kant in a series of philosophical works and essays culminating in Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism (1919). His concept of the “correlation” of the ideas of God and humankind was particularly influential. Jewish scholars inspired by cultural Zionism, such as Martin Buber and Gershom *Scholem (1897–1982), played an influential role in twentieth-century Jewish thought, as did Hermann Cohen’s student, Franz *Rosenzweig (1886–1929).

In the 1920s and 1930s the *Reconstructionist position advocated by Mordecai M. *Kaplan (1881–1983), a dissident faculty member of the Conservative *Jewish Theological Seminary in *New York City, captured the attention of quite a few Reform and Conservative rabbis. Kaplan drew on sociological theory, progressive social values, and theories of religious naturalism to emphasize the evolving nature of Jewish civilization, the need for modern Judaism to come to terms with democracy and modern science, and a “trans-natural” (but not supernatural) God that sustained human efforts to achieve self-realization. By the 1930s some prominent Reform rabbis took up the cause of Zionism and social reform in the Columbus Platform, which referred positively to klal Yisrael (the whole of the Jewish people) and Jewish practices that had previously been set aside by most Reform Jews.

In post-World War I Europe, however, expressions of cultural pessimism were moving theology in new directions. Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963) applied a methodology derived from the sociology of religion in his 1930 analysis of Jewish history, Golah ve-Nekhar (Exile and Estrangement). His History of the Religion of Israel (1960) offered a conception of the uniqueness of *Israelite religion; his work reveals a growing presence of Jewish scholars in *Bible scholarship. Religionswissenschaft (the academic study of religion as such) was concerned with the varieties of experiencing the holy. Philosophical idealism gave way to phenomenology and what was later called existentialism. The writings of Franz Rosenzweig avoided philosophical reductionism, advocating what he called a “new thinking,” based on open-minded reading of Jewish texts and selective appropriation of Jewish practices. Along with Martin Buber he began to publish a German translation of the Bible that sought to recapture the immediate effects of the Hebrew original. Buber himself was religiously unobservant, but appreciative of the inner religious impulse; his I and Thou focused on the intersubjective encounter in the here-and-now with others, including *God as the Eternal Thou.

The most recent phase of modern Jewish thought took shape after World War II. A central issue was the implications of the *Holocaust. Some reiterated that the suffering of the innocent has been a theme of Jewish thought at least since the biblical book of *Job and the *midrash (Michael Wyschogrod [b. 1928], Eliezer *Berkovits [1908–1992], and Emil *Fackenheim [1916–2003]), whereas others argued that the religious implications of the Holocaust mandated new theologies (Richard *Rubenstein [b. 1924], Irving Greenberg [b. 1933]).

Contemporary Jewish thought has moved in different directions. The academic study of Judaism and of the Jewish experience has achieved a high level of recognition that the proponents of Wissenschaft des Judentums only dreamed of, and a new generation of scholars has produced meticulous studies in almost every aspect of Jewish life. So far, few philosophies of Judaism have taken up the reconciliation of religious faith with modern science and historiography (to be sure, that is the case with general philosophy as well). The predominant tendency has been a reappraisal of elements of Judaism that Jewish Modernists had previously neglected. Emmanuel *Levinas (1906–1995), the most internationally recognized Jewish philosopher of the last decades of the twentieth century, made the primacy of *ethics the starting point of his philosophy, but kept his phenomenology separate from his readings of talmudic texts.

An increasing appreciation of traditional Judaism is heralded in a series of works of poetic power by Abraham Joshua *Heschel (1907–1972), who evoked the spirituality of the lost world of pious East European Jewry and the pathos of a *God who cared passionately about human life. As a result of the scholarship of Gershom Scholem and others, Jewish *mystical writings found a new respectability and have been examined for complex ideas of divine creativity. Thinkers who have found spiritual insight in the *Hasidic masters include Martin Buber and Arthur Green. Contemporary Jewish thinkers have also drawn on midrashic and halakhic literature for insights on social and technological change, including challenges in bioethics and *environmental concerns (see ETHICS entries).

Against this neo-traditionalism has been the effort to confront and expunge sexist features of Judaism. Feminist Jewish thinkers, including Judith Plaskow (b. 1947), Susanna Heschel (b. 1952), Rachel Adler (b. 1943), and Hava Tirosh-Samuelson (b. 1950), have outlined a sweeping reorientation of Jewish spirituality to overcome ingrained patriarchal bias (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). Similar reconsiderations have occurred with respect to *homosexuality.

By the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, modern Jewish thought has become more pluralistic than ever. The lines among the liberal denominations have become attenuated while Orthodox Jewish thought in America and Israel (Joseph B. *Soloveitchik [1903–1993]; David Hartman [b. 1931]) has gained self-confidence. Humanistic Judaism espouses an anti-theistic religious reading of Judaism, whereas Jewish Renewal emphasizes immediate spiritual experience (see entries under JUDAISM). Overall, the tendency in recent Jewish thought by writers such as Arthur Green, Eugene B. Borowitz (b. 1924), and Neil Gillman (b. 1933) has been to affirm that Judaism can be a guide to life and that meanings applicable to contemporary concerns can be extracted from a range of Jewish texts.

ROBERT M. SELTZER

Tiberias: See GALILEE

Tikkun Olam (mending or correcting the world) is the most potent operative term in Lurianic Kabbalah (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC); it has expressed the messianic endeavor of believers in the kabbalistic worldview from the seventeenth century to the present (see MESSIANISM entries). Its source is the talmudic term tikkun ha-olam, a reference to deeds that enable the world to function correctly (used scores of times in the *Talmuds, especially in BT Gittin 3b). In the Lurianic myth, it represents the third and final phase in the cosmic-historical myth of creation. The first is the tzimtzum*, the divine contraction within itself to create empty space in which emanation and creation could take place; the second phase is the shevirah, “breaking of the vessels,” the catastrophe in which the divine plan broke down. The third phase will be tikkun, which will correct that catastrophe and subsequent disasters and achieve the messianic *redemption of the divine and earthly realms.

Human beings advance the process of tikkun through fulfilling divine *commandments, observing ethical norms, and being spiritually devoted to *God. In terms of the Lurianic myth, each good deed frees a divine spark imprisoned by the powers of evil, strengthening the positive forces in the cosmic struggle between good and evil; conversely, each sin has the opposite effect. When all sparks are returned to their rightful place, tikkun will be complete and redemption achieved. The concept has been universally accepted by Orthodox Jewish thinkers in the last four centuries. The theologians of the heretical *Sabbatean movement in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, who were followers of *Shabbatai Zevi, assigned a central role in this process to the messiah. Modern *Hasidic sects believe that their leaders devote their mystical powers to this goal. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954); and idem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1960).

JOSEPH DAN

Tikkun Olam: Contemporary Understandings. In the early twenty-first century, many Jews have interpreted tikkun olam as a Jewish imperative to work for ethical harmony, social justice, and *ecological practices, arguing that repairing the world is closely linked to Jewish values of righteousness and lovingkindness. See, for example, N. J. Diamant, ed., Tikkun Olam: Social Responsibility in Jewish Thought and Law (1997); and E. N. Dorff, The Way into Tikkun Olam: Repairing the World (2007).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Tisha B'Av, the 9th of *Av, is a major *fast day on the Jewish *calendar. When it falls on the *Sabbath it is deferred to the next day. According to tradition, this is the day on which both the First and Second *Temples were destroyed, and it is also associated with other disasters in Jewish history. Observances include communal reading of *Lamentations and other laments (kinnot); the book of *Job is customarily read in *Sephardic communities. Like Yom Kippur, Tisha B'Av has traditionally been a day of abstention from eating, drinking, bathing, engaging in sexual relations, and wearing leather shoes.

Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar, usually occurs in September and/or October according to the Gregorian calendar. The *High Holidays of Rosh Ha-Shanah (1st and 2nd) and Yom Kippur (10th) take place in Tishri, as does the festival of *Sukkot (15th to 21st) and the associated days of Hoshanah Rabbah (21st), *Shemini Atzeret (22nd), and *Simḥat Torah (22nd or 23rd depending on location and practice). See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Tkhines is the Yiddish term for “supplicatory prayers” (Hebrew, teḥinnot). They are often associated with women’s synagogue and domestic vernacular devotions in early modern Europe. See PRAYER: WOMEN’S DEVOTIONAL; and WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE.

Tobiads were a high-ranking Israelite family in *Second Temple times whose members were active from the fifth to the second century BCE. Their estate at Araq el Emir between Amman and the Jordan River was considered *Ammonite in biblical times. However, the Tobiads were habitually involved in the affairs of *Jerusalem.

Tobiah I, the first known Tobiad, had a hostile relationship with *Nehemiah. He was well connected and highly regarded in Jerusalem, and both he and his son married into aristocratic families. The high priest, Eliashib, allocated a chamber for him in the *Temple. However, Nehemiah removed Tobiah from the Temple and had his chamber purified. He also called Tobiah an “Ammonite servant” (Neh 2:19), suggesting that Jews were to shun his company.

A Tobiah II, thought to have been active ca. 300 BCE, is attested by two *Aramaic inscriptions from Araq el Emir. Tobiah III appears in the Zenon papyri. In 257, he sent letters to *Ptolemy Philadelphus and his finance minister, Apollonius, referring to presents sent to the king and his minister. Another papyrus (259) attests that Tobiah was the commander of a Ptolemaic military fort at Araq el Emir (V. A. Tcherikover, Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum I [1957], 115–29). Some of his soldiers were Greek, and others were Jewish. Affinity with the Ptolemies is also evident in the tale about Joseph, son of Tobiah, and his son Hyrcanus in the writings of *Josephus (Antiquities 12.156–222, 228–236). These must be the son and grandson of Tobiah III; not only is Joseph’s father’s name identical with that of Tobiah III but also the careers of Joseph and Hyrcanus, covering the years ca. 230–175, are a chronological fit. The activities of Hyrcanus in Trans-Jordan seem apt, and the description of his fort resembles the archeological remains of Araq el Emir.

The tale makes its heroes the rulers of *Palestine’s non-Jewish elements; Joseph is the country’s tax farmer, and his son levies tribute from the Trans-Jordan barbarians. Both treat their non-Jewish taxpayers harshly, and both are depicted as extremely loyal to King Ptolemy, to the extent that Hyrcanus is portrayed as hostile to *Seleucus IV. The main points of this story are untrustworthy; if Hyrcanus had not accommodated himself to his new Seleucid masters, he would not have placed his money in the Temple while Seleucus IV was king. Moreover, the author of 2 *Maccabees, who mentions the Hyrcanus treasure to dissuade a Seleucid minister from sacking the sanctuary

(3:10–11), clearly considered Hyrcanus to be a respected partisan of Seleucus.

When internal strife plagued Jerusalem in 169 BCE, “the sons of Tobiah” sided with Menelaus and Antiochus IV. According to Josephus, they demonstrated loyalty to Antiochus by championing *Hellenism (Jewish War 1.31–32; Antiquities 12.239–241). These hellenizing tendencies were not new; Tobiah III used the greeting formula, “many thanks to the gods,” in a letter to Apollonius, and statues of animals were found at Araq el Emir. However, in 163 when the enemies of the *Hasmoneans captured the family stronghold, some of the Tobiad soldiers were away fighting in Judea in support of the Jewish cause. Some of these combatants probably survived, but they, like their Tobiad commanders, are not mentioned after 163. For further reading, see E. Will and F. Larché, eds., Iraq al-Amir (1991); and D. Gera, Judaea and Mediterranean Politics, 219 to 161 B.C.E. (1998), 36–58.

DOV GERA

Tobit, Book of: See APOCRYPHA

Torah. The word torah can be understood broadly as “teaching” or “instruction.” Torah sometimes designates the first of the three divisions of the Hebrew *Bible, also known as the Five Books of Moses or the *Pentateuch. The Torah contains the books of *Genesis, *Exodus, *Leviticus, *Numbers, and *Deuteronomy.

Yet Jews have also used the word “Torah” to refer to the entire body of Hebrew scriptures as God’s *revelation to the people of Israel. It is in this context that “Written Torah” refers to the entire *Bible and “Oral Torah” designates the voluminous *rabbinic literature that grew up around the Written Torah. This Oral Torah (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: FROM THE MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; RABBINIC LITERATURE: MISHNAH AND TALMUDS), which was decisive for Jewish life, came to assume the sanctity and inviolability of the written word. The Rabbis taught that both components of divine revelation were delivered to the people of Israel at Mount Sinai through the mediation of *Moses and subsequently passed down through later prophets and other recognized authoritative figures (M. *Avot 1). Rabbinic *Judaism understands these two sources of divine instruction to be coexistent and equally essential.

Torah also refers to the Torah scroll, the handwritten, rolled parchment document used in *synagogue ritual, on which the Five Books of Moses are inscribed. As the symbolic representation of divine revelation, the Torah scroll is treated with the utmost respect and veneration (see CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; TORAH READING).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Torah Reading. The center of liturgical activity in the *synagogue on the *Sabbath and *festivals is the communal reading from the Hebrew *Bible. This reading comprises a portion from the *Pentateuch, which is read continuously in a fixed cycle on Sabbaths and in a segmented way on the festivals and other specific days, such as days of *fasting or the first days of the Hebrew months (*Rosh Ḥodesh). On the Sabbath and festivals, selected chapters from the *Prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI’IM]) attuned to the *Torah readings are added (*Haftarah). On Sabbath afternoons, on Mondays, and on Thursdays, the first part of the following weekly unit is read. This custom dates to the *Second Temple period (according to some traditions it can be traced to the book of *Nehemiah, chapter 8), an era when divinely revealed scriptures began to be perceived as the most important channel of communication between human beings and God. In that era, sacrifices, prophecy, and dreams—the three most important venues of communication in the biblical period—ceased to play as important a role in Judaism. Instead, gathering for reading God’s words, explaining them, and looking for their relevance to the ever-changing circumstances of life took place in the newly established institution of that time, the synagogue.

Our knowledge about Torah reading comes mainly from *rabbinic literature, in which the *Mishnah and other sources deal at length with various aspects of this custom. Although reading from the Torah on the festivals became fixed at a very early stage (because the reading was connected to the liturgical content of each specific holiday, such as reading the story of the exodus on *Passover), Sabbath readings took different forms. In the *Land of Israel, the Torah was read continuously in anything between 137 and 175 weeks, depending on local customs. These customs were flexible enough to allow the community to read at least the minimum of twenty-one verses (as ascribed by M. Megillah 4) and up to the average reading of forty verses as attested in various sources. It seems that different communities saw no harm in reading the Torah in the so-called, if imprecise, triennial cycle (137 weeks are always less than three years, while 175 weeks are more than three years). In these cycles the Torah was read at a moderate pace, without having a fixed date on which to start the new cycle of reading. As opposed to this custom, the Jews of *Babylon adopted an annual cycle of reading, which began every year on the first Sabbath after the holiday of *Sukkot. In this fixed cycle the Torah was divided into fifty-four units (each called a parasha; pl. parashot) that were read simultaneously in all synagogues (the last was read on the ninth day of *Sukkot). Only a few Jewish leap years have more than fifty-three Sabbaths; in all other years two parashot are joined and read together according to fixed rules. This fixed cycle became standard in the post-rabbinic period, both in the communities of the east and those of the west, thanks to the authority of the Babylonian *Talmud and its impact on Jewish religious life. In liberal forms of contemporary *Judaism, some attempts have been made to revert to variations of the ancient triennial reading but only time will tell if these modifications will prevail. In any case, the Torah reading remains the central core of Sabbath and festival *worship.

It should be noted that reading from the Torah was always accompanied in antiquity by a translation into the vernacular (see TARGUM) and almost invariably by a *sermon that expanded the biblical text in various directions. For further reading, see C. Perrot, “The Reading of the Bible in the Ancient Synagogue,” in Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. M. J. Mulder and H. Sysling (1998), 137–59.

AVIGDOR SHINAN

Tosafists were rabbinic scholars in northern *France and *Germany during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. They are best known for Tosafot (lit. “addenda”), glosses to the Babylonian *Talmud that are printed in the standard editions of the Talmud along with the commentary of *Rashi (Solomon ben Isaac [d. 1105]).

The earliest Tosafists were Rashi’s family members or students, including his son-in-law Meir ben Samuel (ca. 1060–ca. 1135) and Isaac ben Asher, who later settled in Speyer. Rashi’s grandson, Jacob ben Meir (Rabbeinu Tam [1100–1171]) of Ramerupt, and his great-grandson (and student of Rabbeinu Tam), Isaac ben Samuel (Ri) of Dampierre, influenced the method and style of the Tosafot. Students of Rabbeinu Tam were active in France, *England, the Rhineland, southern Germany, Bohemia, *Hungary, and beyond. Ri was responsible in large measure for the written formulations of Rabbeinu Tam’s teachings. In turn, Ri’s Tosafot were collected and edited by his student, Samson ben Abraham of Sens. The so-called Tosafot Sens are among the most authoritative extant collections. Ri’s work was also continued by his son Elhanan (who died a martyr’s death during his father’s lifetime), by Barukh ben Isaac (author of the halakhic treatise, Sefer ha-Terumah), and in the thirteenth century by Judah ben Isaac (Sirleon) of Paris. Students of Ri transmitted tosafist materials to *Provence and northern *Spain, where they were important for *Jonah ben Abraham of Gerona, *Naḥmanides, and other thirteenth-century Spanish scholars.

The tosafist method was based on close readings of the talmudic text and Rashi’s commentary. The Tosafists raised internal linguistic questions and called attention to inconsistencies (along with verifications of the correct text of the Talmud itself), followed by an analysis of parallel passages in the Babylonian Talmud and a wide range of other *halakhic and *aggadic sources. They resolved contradictions by use of the dialectical method and according to fixed methodological principles. In addition, they also considered the implications of apparent inconsistencies for Jewish law and custom. Because the Talmud was the source of halakhic decision making (see HALAKHAH), it was necessary to resolve all forms of contradictions or inconsistencies, conceptual or linguistic, within the talmudic corpus, so that the Talmud could remain the ultimate arbiter of Jewish law and life.

Thirteenth-century French Tosafists also produced halakhic works and rulings. Moses of Coucy’s Sefer Mizvot Gadol and the pesakim (decisions) of Jehiel of Paris are two examples of this shift. Nonetheless, the tosafist study hall at Evreux (in Normandy) continued to issue different forms of Tosafot comments, including the Tosafot Shitah, a presentation of the talmudic sugya with various explanations and tosafist discussions. Some scholars have suggested that this format was in response to the trial (and burning) of the Talmud around 1242 in Paris, after which the need to preserve remaining texts of the Talmud (and Rashi’s commentary) became more acute. Others see this development as an effort (inspired perhaps by the teachings of the German Pietists [see MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ]) to tone down the complex dialectic of the twelfth century in order to focus on the simple meaning of the talmudic text and its relevance for Jewish law (halakhah*).

Although northern French Tosafists typically produced glosses to the text of the Talmud and to Rashi, twelfth-century German Tosafists, such as Eliezer ben Nathan (Raban) of Mainz and his grandson, Eliezer ben Joel ha-Levi (Rabiah), composed free-standing works presenting both talmudic comments and legal decisions and rulings. German Tosafists tended to preserve their written *responsa, and German dialectic was more muted than its French counterpart. These divergences may have resulted from differing leadership roles: Northern French Tosafists saw themselves principally as academy heads (roshei yeshivah) and considered the interpretation of the underlying talmudic texts to be most important. In contrast, although many German Tosafists were also academy heads, their principal role was as communal judges (dayyanim).

These differences continued throughout the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, when there was relatively little contact between French and German centers. Several large legal works composed by German Tosafists during this period have been lost; two examples of such lost books are Ephraim ben Isaac of Regensburg's Arba'ah Rashim (The Four Heads) and Sefer Ha-Hokhmah (Book of Wisdom) of Barukh ben Samuel of Mainz. Although the Tosafot form ultimately became attached (via *printing) to the text of the Talmud, these larger and free-standing German works were not as easily retained. Isaac ben Moses of Vienna's thirteenth-century Sefer Or Zarua, which represented a renewed joining of German and northern French traditions (as well as those from *Austria and *Italy), contains Tosafot comments as well as more independent halakhic formulations, in addition to responsa and other rulings. It was not printed until 1862.

The availability of Tosafot texts was aided by late-thirteenth-century compilations directed by Perez of Corbeil, Eliezer of Touques (whose place of residence and study has been debated) and *Asher ben Jehiel (Rosh), who fled to Toledo, *Spain, in 1305 to escape persecution in Germany. Asher's teacher, *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, and some of his students amalgamated German and French tosafist methods and compositions with the major pillars of *Sephardic halakhah. This combination reflects, in part, the general decline of *Ashkenazic Jewry, especially apparent in the second half of the thirteenth century.

Some have noted similarities between tosafist methods and Christian scholastics. Although there were direct scholarly contacts between twelfth-century Jewish and Christian biblical exegetes, there is no similar evidence with respect to legal literature. Perhaps social or economic interactions between Christian and Jewish scholars introduced Jews to general tendencies in contemporary Christian dialectic, if not the specific texts and literary formulations that supported it. Institutional shifts between pre-Crusade and tosafist academies and the twelfth-century change in the nature of authorship parallel the slightly earlier shift from monasteries to cathedral schools in the Christian educational system.

Recent research suggests that a number of Tosafists were keenly interested in biblical exegesis (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: FROM THE MIDDLE AGES TO 1800). Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) and Joseph ben Isaac of Orleans (Bekhor Shor), both from the twelfth century, are known for their peshat exegesis. Yom Tov of Joigny, Jacob of Orleans, Isaiah di Trani (who studied in Germany with Simḥah of Speyer and came into contact with materials by Rabbeinu Tam and his students), and Moses of Coucy sought to develop Rashi's exegetical methods further. German and northern French Tosafists composed liturgical poems throughout the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, favoring genres that had not been fully used previously (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE). A number of Tosafists were also interested in Jewish *magic and *mysticism, especially hekhalot literature (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE). Much of the data for tosafist involvement in these and other disciplines are found in manuscripts and will become clearer and better known as these texts are studied and published. For further reading, see E. Kanarfogel, Peering through the Lattices: Mystical, Magical, and Pietistic Dimensions in the Tosafist Period (1992).

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

Tosefta ("supplement"; *Aramaic for Hebrew tosefet) is the largest collection of teachings outside of the *Mishnah that are attributed to the *Tannaim (ca. 70–220 CE), the foundational layer of rabbinic sages in Roman *Palestine. The six-part structure of the Tosefta is very similar to that of the Mishnah. It contains all but four of the Mishnah's tractates, but it is between three and four times longer. Its compilation has been dated anywhere from the third to the fifth centuries, and perhaps even later. Its language is mostly Middle Hebrew, like that of the Mishnah. The best medieval manuscript in terms of completeness and accuracy, ms. Vienna, probably derives from fourteenth-century *Spain. It served as the basis for the leading scholarly edition by Saul Lieberman (1955–92). An older, inferior *Ashkenazi manuscript, ms. Erfurt, contains only the first four orders; it served as the basis of Moses Samuel Zuckermann's edition (1880, 1882; reprinted with supplement by S. Lieberman, 1970). A now lost manuscript was the basis for the first printed edition (Venice, 1521–22). The only complete English translation was produced by Jacob Neusner and his students (6 vols., 1977–86; reprinted 2 vols., 2002).

The relationship between the Tosefta and the more authoritative Mishnah is a central and still vexing research question. Traditional scholarship characterized the Tosefta as a supplement to the Mishnah. Various medieval sources, including Rav Sherira *Gaon in his famous letter to the Jews of Kairouan, as well as *Rashi and *Maimonides, identified different Rabbis as the Tosefta's redactor. They included one of Rabbi *Akiva's last students, Rabbi Neḥemiah, based on a tradition attributed to Rabbi Joḥanan in BT Sanhedrin 86a. In fact, however, Rabbi Neḥemiah's attributed statements sometimes contradict the Tosefta's anonymous positions. A medieval authority, Rabbi Samson of Chinon, famously noted that "Tosefta" in the Talmud "is not what we call Tosefta." Other prominent candidates for the Tosefta's redactor proposed by medieval authorities include *Judah Ha-Nasi's colleague, Rabbi Ḥiyya; his student, R. Hoshayah (or Oshayah); and Bar Kappara. The academic consensus today is that "our" Tosefta's redactors cannot be identified.

The traditional characterization of the Tosefta as a supplement to the Mishnah stemmed from factors in addition to its name ("Supplement") and the various traditions regarding its editor: its larger volume, its reliance on late *Tannaim, its frequent identifications of the authors of parallel teachings cited anonymously in the Mishnah, its propensity to incorporate more scriptural exegesis than the Mishnah, and its greater quantity of *aggadah. Another puzzle is the fact that it contains material in common with, at variance with, and independent of the Mishnah. The consensus today is that the Tosefta and the Mishnah were derived from earlier tannaitic collections and that the Tosefta seems to contain tannaitic traditions that pre-date the editing of the Mishnah. Recent studies have shown that the Tosefta as an edited collection appears not to have been available to the redactors of either the Jerusalem or the Babylonian Talmuds. The Tosefta may provide evidence of changes to the Babylonian Talmud's versions of ostensibly tannaitic traditions, or beraitot. Toseftan material was studied in the Babylonian academies of the *Geonim, perhaps in collections generically known as tosefata (plural for tosefta). For these and other reasons, the Tosefta's research value is tremendous, notwithstanding its complex transmissional and editorial history.

For further reading, see P. Mandel, "The Tosefta," in The Cambridge History of Judaism: Volume 4: The Late Roman-Rabbinic Period, ed. S. T. Katz (2006), 316–35; "The Tosefta," in Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, ed. H. L. Strack and G. Stemmerger (1992), 167–81. ROBERT DAUM

Tourism refers to short-term, nonessential visits made to sites of interest. As a leisure activity away from home, Jewish tourism reflects and highlights social values present but often submerged in daily life. Such travel may also embody models and values designed to transform the participants' outlook, because both tours and sites may be crafted by various Jewish constituencies to promote particular points of view. Hence, Jewish tourism frequently expresses a relationship with the past while outlining a program for the future.

PILGRIMAGE: Although modern tourism is often seen as originating in the eighteenth-century Grand Tour, it bears some continuity with traditions of religious pilgrimage. The *Torah commands thrice-yearly pilgrimages to the *Jerusalem *Temple (Exod 22:17; Deut 16:16). In the late *Second Temple period, pilgrimage to the Temple was one of the most widespread religiously motivated contemporary movements of people, and it profoundly shaped the nature of Jerusalem. The existential experience of oneness created in the gathering and common worship of Jews from all over the Near East made the Temple a unique site of social and spiritual convergence. In the centuries following the Temple's destruction in 70 CE, Jews and Jewish groups made pilgrimages to its ruins. Pilgrimages to tombs of tzaddikim (righteous sages) received new impetus through the practices of sixteenth-century *kabbalists in *Safed. Later, *Hasidic leaders encouraged mass pilgrimages of their followers to visit *rebbe*s during the *festivals. Hilulot (celebrations) at cemeteries, which commemorate the anniversary of the deaths (ascent of the souls) of the righteous, were common, especially in *North Africa; these mass gatherings were also important times for cementing communal ties.

JEWISH RESORTS AND EXCURSIONS: The mass migrations of Jews to Western Europe, the *United States, and *Israel in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; the intensive *urbanization of Jewish populations; the increase in leisure time and disposable income; the institution of paid vacations; and the greater ease of international travel created new tourism practices. These included visits to spas, ski resorts, or summer retreats that became ethnic vacation enclaves. Hotels and restaurants were built that catered to the religious or cultural needs of Jewish publics by supplying *kosher food, *synagogues, and, occasionally, *ritual baths, as well as *Passover seders and Jewish-oriented lectures and entertainment. The best known of these North American vacation locations are the "Borshet Belt" in the Catskill mountains of New York State, the Laurentian mountains (north of Montreal), and Miami Beach (see UNITED STATES: SOUTH FLORIDA); others existed and some continue to exist in many European countries. With the decline of religious observance and the weakening of traditional social structures and strictures, these resorts became not only centers for Jewish family vacations but also meeting places for Jewish singles. Yet, these same forces eventually led to the decline of many of the resort centers catering exclusively to Jews.

HERITAGE AND GENEALOGICAL TOURS: Following the mass global Jewish migrations of the twentieth century, and once Jews were comfortably settled in their new homes – in *Israel or in the West – many returned to the "Old Country" to meet remaining family, immerse themselves temporarily in a nostalgic past, and display the prosperity achieved in their new places of residence. With growing cultural and temporal distance from the home country, such tours became sites of imagination of a mythic communal Jewish past, rather than of memories of a lived personal experience. This imagined past became more vivid when compared to a more fragmented, alienated present identity (as a result of acculturation in the West or the decline of commitment to *Zionism in Israel). In some cases, especially in contemporary Jewish tourism to *Eastern Europe, these voyages are often linked to genealogical research done on the *internet; in the case of North African Jewish immigrants, Old Country tourism is often combined with pilgrimages to saints' tombs, visits to ancestral homes and to tombs of family members, and sightseeing and shopping. These visits are an important source of capital, both economic and social, for small remaining local Jewish communities. Such tourism also supports certain threatened cultural forms, such as Andalusian *music, which is less popular among contemporary Moroccan Muslims. Through such tours, perceptions of center and periphery, *Diaspora and homeland, may be altered, sometimes in ways not foreseen by organizers or travelers. Thus, Israeli travelers seeking their North African roots in Morocco may come to find that they are far more Israeli than they thought (A. Levy, "Homecoming to the Diaspora: Nation and State in Visits of Israelis to Morocco," in Homecomings: Unsettling Paths of Return, ed. F. Markowitz and A. H. Stefansson [2004], 91–108).

For those seeking their ancient heritage, such as golden age Jewish *Spain or the *ghetto of *Venice, memory is replaced by culture and history. In such places, the small local Jewish communities play little role in the development or narration of Jewish tourist sites. Tours also take place to sites of first Jewish immigration, such as in visits to Ellis Island or the Lower East Side in *New York City. Here, the narratives told at the sites may adapt themselves to tourist expectations, while the present surroundings are likely to disappoint those seeking a frozen past painted in nostalgic hues. Jewish tour sites are promoted by a substantial literature, ranging from tourist bureau pamphlets to Jewish travel guides to large coffee-table books. Media products, such as Fiddler on the Roof or Schindler's List, are also instrumental in shaping the Jewish tourist map and visitors' expectations of heritage sites (see FILM: UNITED STATES).

Another destination is "exotic" Jewish communities, which combine the lure of the other with the connection to an imagined common tradition. This type of tourism includes visits to what many secular Jews see as representative of a more traditional "past," such as the Ultra-Orthodox (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX) quarter of Meah Shearim in *Jerusalem. Other ethnically exotic tour destinations include Kai-feng in *China and *Cochin in *India. In some cases, visits become "missions" that combine tourism with financial or volunteer aid to a local Jewish community; such ventures are increasingly popular in *Latin America and parts of the former *Soviet Union.

In addition, the thirst for Jewish heritage may be satisfied through day trips to Jewish *museums, as well as the integration of Jewish museums (and old *synagogues) into broader vacation itineraries. These museums range from one-room synagogue annexes promoting local Jewish history to broadly conceived cultural centers (Jewish Museum in New York), to museums erected by state governments to introduce non-Jews to the basics of Judaism and glorify the Jewish history of the country (Jewish Museum in *Berlin). Jewish history and heritage museums, including museums that address the *Holocaust, define and authorize a variety of cultural messages ranging from Zionism to Jewish-Gentile symbiosis, from religious observance to the preservation of American freedoms and the need for tolerance among varying racial, ethnic, and religious groups (B. Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, "Exhibiting Jews," in Destination Culture: Tourism, Museums, and Heritage [2001], 83–131).

HOLOCAUST TOURS: Since the 1980s, visits to Holocaust sites in *Poland have become increasingly popular on both the Israeli and the *Diaspora agenda. Many culminate in the "March of the Living," during which thousands of Israeli and Diaspora Jewish youth walk in a flag-waving procession from *Auschwitz to Birkenau. On such tours, the abandoned Jewish sites become markers of destruction rather than nostalgic venues of past life. Poland is depicted as a Jewish cemetery and the Holocaust as the inevitable end to life there. The ideological agenda is to reaffirm the precariousness of Jewish life in the Diaspora and the imminent dangers of *antisemitism; strengthened commitment to Israel's security and opposition to assimilation are presented as necessary responses to the Holocaust (J. Feldman, Above the Death-pits, Beneath the Flag: Youth Voyages to Holocaust Poland and the Performance of Israeli Identity [2008]).

In recent years, several European countries whose Jewish communities were destroyed by the Holocaust have created entire Jewish landscapes, now devoid of living Jews. These include festivals of Jewish culture, restaurants offering "Jewish" food, restorations of abandoned Jewish synagogues and cemeteries, and revivals of art forms like klezmer *music. Many of these sites are promoted by national governments and local entrepreneurs in order to attract income from Jewish tourists; in some cases, developing Jewish heritage sites may broadcast a distancing from past antisemitism to a larger constituency. Alternatively, these sites may seek to recast the country's past as more tolerant or multicultural than it actually was, providing present groups fostering such values with a greater historical authority. Thus, local actors come to reshape their own heritage through touristic representations of Jews and Judaism (see R. E. Gruber, Virtually Jewish: Reinventing Jewish Culture in Europe [2002]).

TRAVEL TO ISRAEL: Among the most important contemporary Jewish touristic practices are visits to Israel by Jews from the Diaspora; these make up more than 20% of Israel's incoming tourism. Although individuals and families often spend substantial time visiting family members, group tours sponsored by synagogues, Jewish *Community Centers, or philanthropic organizations emphasize the integrity of local communities and the strengthening of their commitments to the State of Israel. A number of synagogues, Jewish day schools, and other organizations sponsor *Bar/Bat Mitzvah tours, thus integrating Israel into a family-focused rite of passage. These tours also tend to integrate and foster other practices that link Diaspora communities with Israel, including *philanthropy (mission tours), political support (solidarity tours), and *immigration (aliyah) orientation tours).

Many Jewish youth organizations, as well as Jewish day schools and synagogues, promote summer programs to Israel, some combining touring with study, archeological excavation, short-term volunteer service, or paramilitary training. Although the theme of "Jewish peoplehood" is prominent in almost all youth programs, no less important is the creation of an all-Jewish Diaspora social environment to strengthen future commitment to the community back home. Perhaps the most prominent project of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries has been Birthright Israel/Taglit, which offers free trips to Israel for Jewish university students and young people in their twenties. These trips are geared to strengthen Jewish identity, particularly for less affiliated Jewish youth, as well as increase support for Israel on college campuses (B. Chazan, ed., The Israel Experience: Studies in Jewish Identity and Youth Culture [2001]; see also, ISRAEL, STATE OF entries).

Almost all Jewish tour groups to Israel visit *Masada, pray at the Western Wall, and spend the *Sabbath in Jerusalem; many include speeches by Israeli politicians, rabbis, or educators. For most tourists, however, the contact with Israeli peers is minimal because such tours reinforce a monolithic mythic image of Israel over meaningful contact with the variety of modern Israeli cultures. On the margins of the map are tours focused on particular social or religious issues or with orientations critical of Israeli government positions ("alternative" tours).

In the present global culture, which presents Jews with a wide, often bewildering variety of options for being Jewish and a decline in traditional modes of expressing and performing "Jewishness," the experiential, short-term, sensory immersion offered by tourism will make it an increasingly important practice in the formation of Jewish identity.

JACKIE FELDMAN

Travel Writing: Middle Ages and Early Modern Period.

Spanning ages and cultures, travel has served as an almost universal literary subject, expressed in a variety of genres and forms. Pre-modern Jewish travel writing encompasses a disparate corpus of mostly *Hebrew texts that originate between the twelfth and eighteenth centuries. It includes travel guides; travelogues, diaries, and letters (sometimes in combination); and poems in which the travel motif may be used as a metaphor for a spiritual journey. The emergence of Jewish travel writing appears to be associated with the Crusades (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES), when the growth of sea traffic from Western Europe to the Levant (eastern Mediterranean) also brought Jewish pilgrims and merchants to the Middle East and beyond. Just as medieval Jewish *pilgrimage to the *Land of Israel/*Palestine echoes certain patterns of Christian pilgrimage to the same region, the earliest Hebrew travel writings resemble the Latin (or vernacular) itinerarium (travel log). These documents range from brief notations of distances covered and places visited to more elaborate narratives. There are about a dozen Hebrew "itineraries," apparently from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; all originate in Christian Europe, the region where most Jewish travel writers lived. Most of these itineraries record journeys to the Levant, but a few extend as far as *Iraq and *Iran.

In some of these itineraries, the narrator may be the traveler himself (no instance of a pre-modern Jewish woman travel writer is known), writing after having completed his peregrinations and addressing an audience at home; in others, the travels are told through a third person. Some works are actually fictional compilations of passages from earlier examples of the genre. In certain cases, as with Benjamin of Tudela's "Travel Book" (see later discussion), the characterization of the work as an "itinerary" seems questionable; the sequence of loosely connected topographic entries may be better described as a popular anthology of foreign places. Passages that border on ethnographic or historiographic commentary tend to go hand in hand with curiosity for the exotic and grotesque. Some of these works include journeys into the legendary realm of the "Ten Lost Tribes" living at the River Sambation and tales about marvels and miracles (see ELDAD HA-DANI).

The most famous medieval Jewish traveler is *Benjamin of Tudela. The only information we have about him comes from his literary work. As the introduction to his Sefer Massa'ot (Book of Travels) suggests, he came from the city of Tudela in northern *Spain. He returned there in 1173, the only firm date that can be assigned to Benjamin and his journeys. The reader of the book gains an impression of a more or less contiguous land and sea route from Navarre, through southern France (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN), *Italy, and *Greece to *Syria, Palestine, Iraq, and eastern Iran. To what extent the account should be considered an authentic record of Benjamin's personal journeys is, however, open to debate. At the least, the references to *Arabia, *India, and *China are certainly based on hearsay. Benjamin's book has been transmitted in several manuscript versions and early printed editions, as well as numerous translations, reflecting the fact that it became a favorite among Jewish (and subsequently Christian) readers. These different versions reveal that the text underwent a process of editing; additional material attached by later generations makes it impossible to reconstruct Benjamin's original text.

A few decades after Benjamin, an *Ashkenazi rabbi, Petahiah of Regensburg, set out on a journey from Bohemia to the Middle East. However his Sivvuv (Circuit) appears to have been haphazardly assembled, without any effort at establishing a geographical or narrative sequence. It seems likely that Sivvuv was not written by the traveler himself, but was based on his oral reports.

From the fifteenth century onward, there are a number of extant Hebrew letters that were written by Italian Jewish merchants, pilgrims, and immigrants who traveled to the Land of Israel. Although their immediate addressees were often family members, friends, or business partners back home, these epistles were also intended for broader distribution. Among them are the letters of the famous rabbi (and *Mishnah commentator) Obadiah of Bertinoro (1488) and the travel account of Meshullam of Volterra (1481), a Tuscan businessman. Obadiah offers a notably unbiased depiction of Muslim, Jewish, and other religious communities in *Egypt and Palestine; Meshullam, however, shares many of the cultural prejudices and stereotypes of his Christian countrymen vis-à-vis the East. A particular gem is the pilgrimage account by another Italian Jew, Rabbi Moses Basola, which begins with his ship's departure from *Venice in 1521 and concludes with his embarkation from Beirut in 1523. Moreover, the author includes extensive advice for future travelers on the same route.

Moses Almosnino, a *Sephardic rabbi from Salonika, left a Judeo-Spanish (*Ladino) account of his mission to Constantinople in 1566 that has certain similarities to contemporary Italian ambassadorial reports. It includes a description of the coronation parade of Sultan Selim II and a detailed portrait of the city of Constantinople. With some rearrangement and omissions, it was later printed in Latin script as Extremos y grandezas de Constantinopla (Madrid, 1638).

Eighteenth-century Hebrew literature includes new forms of travel writing, such as Ma'agal Tov (Good Circuit), the travel diary of Hayyim Joseph Azulai (Hida). This work offers the rare example of an *Ottoman Jew who, as an emissary on behalf of the Jewish community in Palestine, traveled to Western Europe, including a visit to Versailles. The description of travels in *Morocco by Samuel Romanelli, a Mantuan Jew (Massa' ba-'rav [Vision of an Arab Land]; cf. Isa 21:13) provides a fascinating amalgam of a traditional Hebrew travelogue infused by Enlightenment thought.

For more information on these writings, see E. N. Adler, ed., Jewish Travellers (1930); J. Prawer, The History of the Jews in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (1988), 169–250; M. N. Adler, ed. and trans., The Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela (1907); A. David, ed., In Zion and Jerusalem: The Itinerary of Rabbi Moses Basola (1521–1523) (1999); M. B. Lehmann, "Levantinos and Other Jews: Reading H.Y.D. Azulai's Travel Diary," Journal of Jewish Studies 13(3) (2007): 1–34; and M. Pelli, "The Literary Genre of the Travelogue in Hebrew Haskalah Literature: Shmuel Romanelli's Masa Ba'ra," Modern Judaism 11 (1991): 241–60. MARTIN JACOBS

Treblinka, located in a remote area northeast of *Warsaw, was the deadliest of the *Nazi Aktion Reinhard death camps. From July 1942 until early August 1943, the Germans murdered 874,000 Jews and several thousand Roma there (see HOLOCAUST: ROMA). Treblinka I opened in the summer of 1941 as a forced labor camp, followed by Treblinka II, the death camp, a year later. Franz Stangl, Treblinka's commandant, did everything he could to disguise the entrance of the death camp and hide its real purpose from arriving victims. Treblinka was shut down after an uprising on August 2, 1943. Although the SS shot many of the camp's remaining prisoners during the escape, the rebels were able to destroy part of the camp. Unfortunately, the brick gas chambers remained intact and were used for several more weeks before Treblinka was closed and totally demolished. See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE, etc.

DAVID M. CROWE

Tribes, Ten Lost. Claims of descent from the "Ten Lost Tribes" are ancient and have proceeded from hundreds, if not thousands, of groups throughout the world. According to the Bible, the *Assyrians conquered the northern kingdom of *Israel in the eighth century BCE; the ten tribes (Reuben, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, Manasseh, Ephraim, Dan, Naphtali, Gad and Asher) that made up the population were exiled "in Halah, and in Habor by the river of Gozan and in the cities of the Medes" (2 Kgs 17:6). Their fate has always been something of an enigma. Although it was generally assumed that they had assimilated into the local population, biblical passages documented their place of exile (1 Chron 5:26), and prophetic proclamations (Isa 11:11–12; Ezek 37:21–23) suggested that they continued to live on and would be "ingathered" in latter days. Hopes of discovering the location of these ten tribes and belief in the possibility of their ultimate return were kept alive throughout the ages.

The *Mishnah and *Talmud discuss the fate of the ten tribes. Rabbi *Akiva believed that they had disappeared, whereas Rabbi Eliezer argued that they would eventually return (M. Sanhedrin 10:3). Some suggested that the tribes lived beyond the impassable Sambatyon River, which flowed six days of the week and stopped on the *Sabbath, when Israelites were forbidden to travel. References to this theme appear in Jewish classical texts (Genesis Rabbah 73:6; M. Sanhedrin 10:6; BT Sanhedrin 29b), as well as in *Josephus (Wars 7:96–97) and Pliny the Elder (Historia Naturalis 31:24).

The legend also became popular among members of Christian denominations, who sought out "Israelites" among Jews and Gentiles, whom they could convert to Christianity to hasten the arrival of the millennium. In the sixteenth century, Bishop Las Casas worked among Native Americans in order to "save" "Lost Israelites." In the nineteenth century, Rev. Joseph Wolff, a missionary for the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, became convinced that the Jews of Bukhara, as well as other non-Jewish tribes in the Hindu Kush area, were descendants of the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. In the nineteenth century, Dr. Francis Mason, of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society in Burma, suggested that the worship of the indigenous Karen and their belief in a monotheistic eternal god called Y-wa were similar to that of the ancient Israelites. Others have noted that the Pathans, the largest single tribe in the world (fifteen million people), inhabiting an extensive area from Afghanistan through Pakistan to Kashmir in *India, are divided into distinct local tribes reminiscent of the ten tribes: Rabbani may be Reuben, Shinwari may be Shimon; Daf-tani may be a corruption of Naftali, Jajani – Gad, Afridi – Ephraim, and Yusufzai – the sons of Joseph.

In recent years, groups in Africa and in Asia have claimed "Lost Tribes" status, on the basis of which they wish to convert to Judaism and migrate to the State of Israel. Notable among these are the Shinlung from Mizoram and Manipur states in northeast *India, who have recently been designated "Bnei Menashe" (Children of Manasseh).

Important studies include A. Godbey, The Lost Tribes: A Myth (1930); T. Parfitt and E. T. Semi, Judaizing Movements: Studies in the Margins of Judaism (2002); S. Weil, Beyond the Sambatyon: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes (1991); and idem, "Lost Israelites from North-East India: Re-Traditionalisation and Conversion among the Shinlung from the Indo-Burmese Borderlands," The Anthropologist 6(3) (2004): 219–33.

SHALVA WEIL

Tribes, Twelve. According to the *Torah, the twelve tribes of Israel stem from *Jacob's twelve sons: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, Joseph, and Benjamin. The fact that the twelve are conceived amidst a competition between two sisters, *Rachel and *Leah, works etiologically to explain why conflict sometimes arises among them. Leah gives birth to Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, as well as to a daughter, *Dinah. Leah also claims Gad and Asher, the sons of Zilpah, her servant and surrogate, as her descendants. Rachel similarly absorbs Dan and Naphtali, born to her servant Bilhah. After contending with prolonged barrenness, Rachel gives birth to Joseph and Benjamin. A dozen sons and one daughter may not, however, be the extent of Jacob's family because he is recorded immigrating to *Egypt with sons and daughters (Gen 46:7, 15). There is no tribe of Joseph; rather each of his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, became the father of an eponymous half-tribe. See also ISRAELITES: TRIBES.

Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940), a leader of the *Bolshevik Revolution, was born Lev Davidovich Bronstein in one of the Jewish farm colonies in southern *Ukraine. He became active in movements against the tsar and was first arrested in 1898. Exiled to Siberia, he escaped to London in 1903 with a false passport under the name Trotsky, which he had adopted from the name of a prison guard. In London, he met Vladimir Lenin and other leading Bolsheviks. Trotsky returned to *Russia in 1905 and helped lead the *Saint Petersburg Soviet (or Council of Workers) during the revolutionary upheaval. Arrested, tried, and sentenced to Siberian exile for life, he again escaped to Western Europe. After the abdication of Tsar Nicholas II, Trotsky returned to Russia in the spring of 1917. Together with Lenin, he led the Bolshevik seizure of power in October. During the ensuing Civil War, Trotsky organized the Red Army and successfully defended the revolution against White forces.

In spite of his prestige and skills as a military commander, an orator, and a writer, Trotsky was outmaneuvered by Joseph Stalin in the struggle for power after the death of Lenin in January 1924. Stripped of his party membership, Trotsky was exiled to *Turkey in 1929. Over the next decade, while living in Turkey, *France, and Norway, he led a campaign of opposition to Stalin. He wrote a history of the revolution, a memoir, and host of other books and articles, all to justify his role in the revolution. He also witnessed the rise of Hitler in *Germany and predicted annihilation for the Jews in the event of a new war. Hounded out of Europe, he was able to find refuge in *Mexico in 1937, where he was killed by a Stalinist agent in August 1940.

JOSHUA RUBENSTEIN

Tu B'Shevat (literally, "15th of Shevat") is known as Rosh Ha-Shanah la-Ilanot, or the new year for trees (see NEW YEARS). Rabbinic *Judaism identifies it as the boundary for determining a tree's first year for tithing purposes. A holiday of little religious significance with no mandated observances, Tu B'Shevat remained largely dormant until sixteenth- and seventeenth-century *Kabbalists endowed it with great mystical importance (see KABBALAH). They created a Tu B'Shevat seder that parallels the traditional *Passover seder, including an order of eating fruits, reciting blessings, and drinking four cups of wine. Early *Zionists enhanced the significance of Tu B'Shevat, associating it with restoring the Land of *Israel and planting trees. Today, Tu B'Shevat inspires a cross-pollination of religious, mystical, ecological (see ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ECOLOGY), and Zionist currents, including kabbalistic rituals, tree planting, expressions of environmental concern and welfare, and pride in Israel. For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Winter Holidays (2009); and A. Elon, N. M. Hyman, and A. Waskow, eds., Trees, Earth, and Torah: A Tu B'Shvat Anthology (1999); see also Ecology.

PAUL STEINBERG

Tunisia: See NORTH AFRICA

Turkey. In the fourteenth century, when the *Ottoman state was in its early formative stages, Jews were already settled in Anatolia and the *Balkans, where they had lived for many centuries. Most of them were Greek-speaking because their traditions and culture had been formed under *Byzantine rule. They were known as Benei Romania, or *Romaniote Jews, because Byzantium and other Greek-ruled lands were known by the Jews as Romania, the land of the Romans, and they developed customs now known as "minhag Romania" (see GREECE). The first Ottoman Jews were thus the continuation of the sizable Greek-speaking Jewish communities in pre-Ottoman Asia Minor. Archaeological evidence (found in Ephesus, Pergamon, Smyrna, and Sardis) shows that the first signs of Jewish life in Asia Minor date to the fourth century BCE, which makes the Jewish community of Turkey one of the oldest in the world.

The first Jewish colony to be mentioned in Turkish history proper was in Bursa, a city located in a province that has been the cradle of a number of civilizations and religions, from the pre-Christian era to the present. After his conquest of the city in 1324, Orhan, the second sultan of the newly founded Ottoman state, permitted the Jews to build their first synagogue, Etz ha-Ḥayyim, which has been in use ever since. Before that, under Byzantine rule, Jews had not been allowed to exercise their religion freely. Encouraged by more tolerant rule, many Jews migrated to the Ottoman lands toward the end of the fourteenth century and throughout the fifteenth century; *Karaites, as well as Jews expelled from *Hungary, *France, *Sicily, Venetian-ruled Salonika, and Bavaria, found refuge there.

In the mid-fifteenth century, after taking Constantinople (1453), Sultan Mehmet II issued an official invitation for Jews to settle in the empire. A great influx of Jews arrived during the reign of Mehmet's successor, Beyazid II (1481–1512), after the 1492 expulsion from *Spain. The Spanish Jews settled chiefly in Constantinople, Salonika, Adrianople, Nicopolis, *Jerusalem, *Safed, Damascus, and *Egypt and in Bursa, Tokat, and Amasya in Anatolia. Jews did not settle in Izmir until the mid-sixteenth century. Soon after their arrival at the end of the fifteenth century, *Sephardic Jews became the largest Jewish community in Ottoman lands. They outnumbered both the Romaniote Jews and the *Ashkenazi Jews coming from the *Habsburg Empire, who had constituted most of the Jewish communities in Ottoman lands until that time. The chief center of the Sephardic Jews was Salonika, which became virtually a Spanish Jewish city as the Spanish Jews soon outnumbered their co-religionists of other nationalities and even the original native inhabitants. *Ladino became the ruling tongue, and its purity was maintained for about a century. In the middle of the sixteenth century, another wave of European Jewish refugees, expelled from Italy and Bohemia, arrived in the Ottoman Empire. Moreover, in 1556 Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent saved the Ancona conversos from papal persecution by declaring them Ottoman subjects.

Jews introduced various arts and industries into the country, including *printing; Sephardim David and Samuel ibn Naḥmias established the first Hebrew printing press in Istanbul in 1493. Jews distinguished themselves in *medicine and served as interpreters and diplomatic agents at the Ottoman courts. In Muslim Constantinople many owned beautiful houses and gardens on the shores of the Bosphorus.

The Ottoman Empire at this time was a classic example of a pluralistic society. Although the Ottoman state was established as a Turkoman principality, it soon expanded to the Rumelia region and established control over Central and Eastern Anatolia, the Middle East, and North Africa, uniting dense Muslim and Christian populations under its administration. When the Sephardic Jews who migrated from Spain are added to this diversity, the extent of religious and ethnic pluralism in the Ottoman state is evident. Legal enforcement of pluralism played a considerable role in the success of the Ottoman experience. The general principle in Islamic-Ottoman law was the application of the same regulations to all individuals in a Muslim society (including non-Muslims). In addition, Christians, Jews, and followers of other religions were also given an opportunity to implement their own laws in certain areas. Non-Muslims were vested with the right to apply to their religious courts in personal status matters as well as the right to apply to Ottoman courts. Jews were on a par with Christians in exercising this judicial right. The Ottoman world was a medley of peoples in a diverse society, with different sections of the community living side by side, but separately, within the same political unit. Christian and Jewish communities in the Ottoman Empire lived under what has been called the millet system. Millet, which originally meant a religious community, came to mean "nation" in the nineteenth century. The system provided, on the one hand, a degree of religious, cultural, and ethnic continuity within these communities, while on the other it permitted their incorporation into the Ottoman administrative, economic, and political system.

In this relaxed atmosphere, Jewish culture flourished. The sixteenth century witnessed the rise of important thinkers like the *kabbalists of *Safed (Joseph *Karo, Moses *Cordovero, Isaac *Luria, Ḥayyim Vital); the seventeenth century was marked by the messianic movement of *Shabbatai Zevi, which ended with the emergence of the Dönme, pseudo-converts to Islam who maintained Jewish identity and traditions in secret (see SABBATEANISM: OTTOMAN EMPIRE AND TURKEY).

During the Crimean War (1853–56), Jews who were fleeing the war zone took refuge in the Ottoman Empire. Throughout the nineteenth century, and especially after 1875, as the empire was contracting, giving rise to new nation-states in the Balkans, considerable numbers of Jews, together with even larger numbers of Muslims, migrated from the newly independent states to the remaining Ottoman territories. The Balkan Jews were joined by many Russian Jews who were also seeking refuge in the Ottoman Empire. These immigrants were generally well received and even assisted by the Ottoman authorities and the local Jewish communities. However, in ensuing decades, many of these immigrants moved again, mainly to Western Europe, the Americas, and several African countries. This outward movement also swept with it established Ottoman Jews, who were attracted by economic opportunity in the West. The modern education and Western languages that many of them had recently acquired further facilitated this movement. However, those who stayed in the Ottoman lands continued to prosper and felt like a protected minority.

The new Republic of 1923 was certainly different from the empire in mentality and organization. The Jews, who were once a recognized autonomous community of the Ottoman state, became "equal citizens" of Turkey, and all their institutions came under "state control." In 1933, after Hitler's ascension to power, Atatürk invited Jews to leave Nazi Germany and settle in Turkey. During World War II, Turkey, as a neutral country, not only protected its Jews but also facilitated the safe land and sea passage of thousands of European Jewish refugees, mostly to Palestine and the Americas. Across Europe, Turkish diplomats provided documents and visas to fleeing Jews, and many Jewish agencies managed to help the war victims from their headquarters in Istanbul.

Today there are approximately 26,000 Jews living in Turkey. The vast majority are in Istanbul, with a community of about 2,500 in Izmir and smaller groups located in Adana, Ankara, Bursa, Çanakkale, Iskenderun, and Kırklareli. Sephardic Jews make up 96% of the community, with Ashkenazi Jews accounting for the rest. There are about one hundred Karaites, an independent group that does not accept the authority of the chief rabbi. Turkish Jews are legally represented, as they have been for many centuries, by the Hakham Başı, a chief rabbi, who is assisted by a religious council made up of a Rosh Beit Din (head of the Jewish court) and three Hakhamim. Thirty-five lay counselors look after the secular affairs of the community, and an executive committee of fourteen, the president of which must be elected from among the lay counselors, runs daily affairs. In the early twenty-first century, sixteen synagogues are operating in Istanbul; they are classified as religious foundations (Vakıfs). The community's newspaper, Shalom, is printed in Turkish and Ladino. The Jewish community also maintains a primary school for nearly 300 pupils and a secondary school for 250 students in Istanbul, plus an elementary school for 140 children in Izmir. Turkish is the language of instruction, and Hebrew is taught as well. Two Jewish hospitals (in Istanbul and Izmir) serve the community. Both cities have homes for the aged (Moshav Zekinim) and several welfare associations to assist the poor, the sick, needy children, and orphans. Social clubs containing libraries, cultural and sports facilities, and discotheques give young people opportunities to meet. There are several Jewish professors teaching at the universities of Istanbul and Ankara, and many Turkish Jews are prominent in business, industry, and the liberal professions.

Important studies of this community include B. Braude, Christians and Jews in the Ottoman Empire (1982); H. Inalcik, "The Ottoman Decline and its Effects upon Reaya," Aspects of the Balkans: Continuity and Change. Contributions to the International Balkan Conference, ed. H. Bimbaum and S. Vryonis Jr. (1972); A. Levy, The Jews of the Ottoman Empire (1994); S. Shaw, The Jews of the Ottoman Empire and the Turkish Republic (1991); and W. F. Weiker, Ottomans, Turks and the Jewish Polity: A History of the Jews of Turkey (1992).
BÜLENT ŞENAY

Twelve Tribes: See TRIBES, TWELVE

Tzaddik: See HASIDISM: EUROPE

Tzedakah: See PHILANTHROPY

Tzimtzum (divine contraction) is one of the most profound and influential terms in Lurianic Kabbalah (see KABBALAH, LURIANIC). The concept is already present in midrashic literature, in the esoteric teachings of the medieval Hasidei Ashkenaz (especially the Baraita of Joseph ben Uzziel), and in the works of several early kabbalists, usually denoting the divine contraction into universal existence. The origin of tzimtzum appears to be in the midrashic description of the Shekhinah being "contracted" into the space between the cherubim in the Holy of Holies in the Jerusalem Temple (Tanhuma Vayakhel 7).

In Lurianic Kabbalah, however, tzimtzum denotes the first step leading from the infinity of the eternal godhead (Ein Sof*) to the emanation of the divine powers and the earthly world. According to Luria, the tzimtzum is a negative process. It signifies the contraction of the infinite divine into itself, to create an empty space (tehiru) into which the divine light can flow and shape the sefirot*. In the original Lurianic myth this was a cathartic process through which potentially evil elements were purged from the godhead; they remained in the tehiru, later to evolve into the satanic powers. Later Lurianic kabbalists gave different interpretations, some of them describing the tzimtzum as a benevolent act, limiting the infinity of God to enable divine communication with creation. The term, in different interpretations, was used by Christian kabbalists (see CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM) and European esoterics in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954); idem, Kabbalah (1974); see also LURIA, ISAAC.
JOSEPH DAN

U

Ugarit: See CANAAN, CANAANITES; SYRIA, ANCIENT

Ukraine. According to archeological evidence from Greek colonies in Crimea, Jews appeared in what is now Ukraine in the last centuries BCE. In the seventh to ninth centuries CE, the steppe part of contemporary Ukraine was under the control of the *Khazar state. The Khazars had accepted Judaism as their official religion and gave refuge to Jews from *Islamic and *Byzantine regions. Jews were present in the medieval towns of Kievan Rus'; a letter from Kiev Jews dated to the first third of the tenth century was found in the Cairo *Genizah, and a *pogrom in Kiev in 1113 is mentioned in the Russian Primary Chronicle.

*Ashkenazi Jews began to settle in Ukraine in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, in territories belonging to the Polish kingdom and the Great Duchy of *Lithuania; Ashkenazi immigration continued until the mid-seventeenth century. Jews settled in towns under royal protection where they engaged in local and international trade, served as tax collectors, and established industries. After the Lublin Union of 1569, when *Poland and Lithuania became one state, Polish colonization of the eastern Ukraine began. Lands were distributed among Polish magnates who established private towns and villages and invited Jews to fulfill various managerial functions. Jews administered large landholdings and villages, collected taxes from the Ukrainian peasantry, leased inns and mills, and produced and sold alcohol. The close connections between Jews and the Polish landlords proved especially harmful during the *Chmelnitzki uprising of 1648–49, when much of the Jewish population of the eastern and central Ukraine was killed or fled. Jewish settlements in right-bank Ukraine (west of the Dnieper River) were revived relatively quickly but left-bank Ukraine, under the control of *Russia, remained closed to Jews until the end of the eighteenth century.

Jewish economic roles continued unchanged during the eighteenth century, although their prosperity diminished significantly. Jews were often targets of the haidamak anti-Polish bands, which destroyed many communities; especially notorious was the slaughter in Uman in 1768. In the first half of the 1700s, there were clandestine groups of adherents of *Shabbatai Zevi; the area became the center of the *Frankist movement in the mid-eighteenth century. *Hasidism originated in right-bank Ukraine where the movement's founders, Israel *Baal Shem Tov (Międzybóž in Podolia) and Dov *Ber the Maggid of Międzyrzecz (Volhynia), and their followers resided.

In the first partition of Poland in 1772, the areas of Ruś Czerwona were annexed by *Habsburg Austria and became known as eastern *Galicia. The Russian Empire annexed right-bank Ukraine in the second partition of 1793. According to the 1764 census, there were approximately 120,000 Jews in the Ukrainian lands annexed by Austria and around 130,000 in the Ukrainian lands annexed by Russia. Thus, both empires acquired large numbers of Jews who were deeply involved in the feudal agricultural economy and constituted a significant part of the urban population. In 1794, the Russian government allowed Jewish settlement in left-bank Ukraine and in southern regions of contemporary Ukraine newly acquired from the *Ottoman Empire. With the annexation of the Crimea in 1783, local Jews (krymchaks) and *Karaites, who had continued to live in the peninsula under the Tatar khans, also came under Russian rule.

In Galicia, the Austrian government immediately began to implement measures for “improvement” and “productivization” of Jews, to reorganize Jewish communities, to establish state Jewish schools, and to support the Haskalah* movement. However, Galician Jewry remained highly traditional into the early twentieth century; Hasidism had an extremely strong influence there (the first Orthodox political organization, Maḥzikei ha-Dat [Strengtheners of the Faith], was established in Galicia in 1878). Jews were emancipated in 1867, but Galicia, as well as Transcarpathia and Bukovina, remained the most underdeveloped areas of the Habsburg Empire. The acculturation of Jews in Galicia gravitated first toward German and after 1867 toward Polish culture; in Bukovina and Transcarpathia, the influence of German and Hungarian cultures, respectively, on the educated strata of Jews was very strong. In 1890, there were approximately 811,000 Jews in eastern Galicia, 90,000 in Bukovina, and 100,000 in Transcarpathia.

In the Russian Empire, during the nineteenth century, Jewish settlement was spread through left-bank and southern Ukraine. During this period of rapid demographic growth, thousands of Jews were attracted to new urban and commercial centers like Odessa, Ekaterinoslav (now Dnepropetrovsk), and Nikolaiev; at the same time Jewish *agricultural colonies were established in the steppe regions. Jews in the Russian Empire did not have civil equality, and after 1881 their settlement in rural areas was prohibited. Ukraine was the major location of pogroms in 1881–82 and 1905. According to the census of 1897, there were 1,893,000 Jews in Russian Ukraine, constituting 9.9% of the total population.

On the eve of World War I, Jews in the Russian Empire, including those in Ukraine, were diverse. Traditional communities on the right bank of the Dnieper were dominated by Hasidim, mostly of the Sadigora and Chernobyl' dynasties; Jews lived in small towns (shtetls* or stetlakh) where they made up about half of the population. Left-bank areas had been settled by immigrants from Lithuania and *Belorussia; Hasidim in these communities belonged to *Ḥabad. In the multinational and vibrant urban centers in the south, Jews were modernized and highly acculturated; they constituted 30% of town and city dwellers. *Zionism had a significant influence, especially in the south, whereas Jewish socialist parties (the *Bund and Poalei-Zion, among others) were relatively weak.

When the Russian Empire collapsed in 1917, an independent Ukrainian state was established with its capital in Kiev; Jews were granted national autonomy, and a ministry for Jewish affairs was created in the Ukrainian government. However, the autonomy was short-lived, and the Civil War of 1918–20 that took place on Ukrainian territory brought with it an extremely high level of anti-Jewish violence. All the fighting armies – but especially the White army of General Anton Denikin, the Simon Petlura army of the Ukrainian People's Republic, and numerous "Green" bands of various atamans (Cossack leaders) – perpetrated perhaps as many as 1,500 pogroms in which approximately 50,000 Jews were murdered.

Between 1919 and 1939 the western part of contemporary Ukraine (Galicia and parts of Volhynia) was part of Poland, whereas the rest became the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic of the USSR. Jewish social and economic life in the Polish territories remained unchanged, and Jewish religious communities were officially recognized. Although Jews had full citizenship rights, the Polish regime grew increasingly discriminatory, aiming to minimize the Jewish role in the economy and to restrict the numbers of Jews in universities and in the state service. At the same time, Jewish culture as well as Jewish politics of various kinds (Zionist, socialist, Orthodox) flourished.

In Soviet Ukraine the Soviet authorities deliberately destroyed the traditional Jewish socioeconomic structure and religious institutions, while rapid urbanization and significant upward mobility took place. In the 1920s, left-wing Jewish culture blossomed in Ukraine, but it was liquidated by the authorities toward the end of the 1930s. Until the late 1930s the authorities supported *Yiddish as the national language of Jews: in 1931 there were more than one hundred Jewish local soviets (governing councils) operating in Yiddish, Yiddish state schools, and courts of justice with Yiddish-language procedures. Three Jewish national regions – Kalinendorf, Novozlatopol', and Stalindorf – existed in 1930. There were one hundred and sixty-two agricultural colonies in these regions involving 200,000 Jews. Because of emigration to major Soviet centers, the Jewish population in Ukraine declined from 1,750,000 in 1926 to 1,533,000 in 1939.

With the outbreak of World War II, the USSR annexed western Ukraine from Poland in 1939 and northern Bukovina from *Romania in 1940, thus acquiring large Jewish populations (1,056,000 and 282,000, respectively) and important Jewish centers such as Lwów and Czernowitz, which had never previously been under Russian rule. Soviet authorities nationalized private property and prohibited Jewish political, religious, and cultural activities. Nazi Germany occupied Ukraine in the summer and autumn of 1941 and its easternmost regions in the summer of 1942. Even before the arrival of German units, Ukrainian nationalists in eastern Ukraine began the mass murder of Jews. The advancing German army and Einsatzgruppen C and D murdered the majority of Jews in eastern Ukraine by the end of 1941 (the well-known mass murder of 35,000 Jews took place in Babi Yar near Kiev on September 29–30, 1941). In western Ukraine, Jews were concentrated in ghettos and sent to death camps during 1942 (see HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS). Only in the zone occupied by Romania (Transnistria), especially in its northern part, did significant numbers of Jews remain alive. More than 1.5 million Ukrainian Jews (approximately 60%) perished during the *Holocaust.

After World War II, many Jews who had been evacuated to eastern regions of Russia returned to Ukraine, whereas those from the former Polish and Romanian territories were allowed to leave the USSR. The Ukrainian Soviet authorities displayed the highest level of *antisemitism of any Soviet republic, especially in the decade following the war. Nonetheless, in the areas annexed in 1939 (eastern Galicia, northern Bukovina) and in 1945 (Transcarpathia, annexed from *Czechoslovakia), as well as in former Romanian-occupied areas, vestiges of Jewish culture and religion continued to exist until the end of the twentieth century. The number of Jews in Ukraine decreased from 840,000 (2% of the total population) in 1959 to 487,000 (1%) in 1989. Twenty-six of the forty-one legal *synagogues were closed between 1959 and 1962; however, in many places illegal prayer groups gathered in private homes. The authorities persecuted those who engaged in Jewish religious or cultural activities and allowed publication of antisemitic literature.

The revival of Jewish life in Ukraine started in the late 1980s, at the time of perestroika. At the same time, however, in the late 1980s and early 1990s, about three-quarters of Ukrainian Jews emigrated to *Israel and the *United States. In the independent Ukraine, established in 1991, extensive Jewish cultural, educational, social, and religious activities have developed. In the mid-1990s, there were about 250 Jewish organizations and religious communities; 106 Jewish newspapers were published in 2000–03.

For further reading, see H. Abramson, A Prayer for the Government: Ukrainians and Jews in Revolutionary Times, 1917–1920 (1999); H. Aster and P. J. Potichnyj, eds., Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspective (1990); I. Bartal, The Jews of Eastern Europe, 1772–1881 (2005); Z. Gitelman, Jewish Nationality and Soviet Politics: The Jewish Sections of the CPSU, 1917–1930 (1972); and V. Khanin, ed., Documents on Ukrainian-Jewish Identity and Emigration, 1944–1990 (2003). Map 11

VLADIMIR LEVIN

United Monarchy refers to the period from approximately 1030 to 930 BCE when the twelve Israelite *tribes were united under one ruler. The first king, *Saul, from the tribe of Benjamin, reigned from ca. 1030 to 1010 BCE. He was followed by *David (ca. 1008–970 BCE), from the tribe of Judah, who was succeeded by his son *Solomon (ca. 970–931 BCE). The United Monarchy broke down early in the reign of Solomon's son *Rehoboam when ten of the tribes were led in secession by *Jeroboam and founded the northern kingdom of *Israel. Rehoboam and his dynastic successors continued to rule the southern kingdom of *Judah until its defeat by *Babylon in 586 BCE. See also ISRAELITES; KINGSHIP; KINGS and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; Map 2.

United States: African American–Jewish Relations. For much of American history, geographic and demographic factors limited interactions between African Americans and Jews. Jewish communities were small and predominantly urban, and although allusions to the *Bible in slave spirituals suggest a sense of kinship with Jewish experience, in reality the everyday interaction between slaves and Jews was very limited. Few Jews lived in the south (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR; UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN), and those who did rarely own plantations. Nevertheless, roughly one in four southern Jews were slaveholders, and Jews participated in the slave economy as investors and traders. For example, Aaron Lopez (1731–1782), a Newport, Rhode Island, merchant, brought twenty-one boatloads of slaves from Africa during his lifetime. Jews spoke both for and against abolitionism. Judah P. Benjamin (1811–1884) defended slavery before the Senate in 1858, before serving in the Confederate cabinet. Rabbi David *Einhorn (1809–1879) fled Baltimore in 1861 after preaching against slavery. For the most part Jews shared the racial attitudes of their neighbors. After the Civil War, Jewish peddlers expanded their routes through the south, selling merchandise to former slaves and their families in the new rural economy. Some stayed to open stores and were often more willing to serve black customers than were their white Gentile counterparts.

The concurrent mass migrations of Jews from *Eastern Europe to the United States and of African Americans from the south to northern industrial cities from the 1880s onward fundamentally altered the preexisting pattern of African American–Jewish relations. In their new urban environments, Jews and blacks came into close contact. This was not, however, a relationship of equals. Jews were free from the restrictions of racial segregation (although they were victims of social exclusion) and for the most part did not compete directly with African Americans for industrial jobs. Nonetheless, their relationship entailed both conflict and collaboration. Many Jews were storekeepers and landlords within black neighborhoods, selling to black customers and competing with local black businessmen. Jewish and African American cultural, political, and intellectual leaders often found kinship and common cause. The *Yiddish press criticized episodes of lynching in the south, Jewish-led socialist trade unions aggressively recruited black members, and the *Communist Party and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), respectively, provided a welcoming home for radicals and liberals of both communities. However, this cooperation did not extend far beyond community elites.

This political collaboration climaxed in the decades immediately after *World War II, the apex of the fabled “black-Jewish alliance” during the civil rights struggle (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT) when Jewish defense agencies, including the American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, and Anti-Defamation League of B’nai B’rith, worked in tandem with the NAACP (see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA). This cooperation was mutually beneficial. Jewish groups believed that *antisemitism and racism had common roots and that advancing African American civil rights through legislation enforcing fair standards in hiring and housing would ultimately benefit Jews. The Jewish defense agencies and the NAACP pursued their struggle through the courts and legislative chambers. Jewish students and political activists preferred direct action in the streets, joining and participating in the marches and sit-ins organized by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality.

Jews, both men and women, formed a disproportionately large percentage of Freedom Riders and participants in the Mississippi Freedom Summer. The murders of civil rights activists Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney – two Jews and an African American – in rural Mississippi in 1964 demonstrate this outsized involvement. The prominence of Jews, including a number of rabbis, among the “outside agitators” in the south was of concern to local Jews, who worried that Jews and blacks would be inexorably linked in the minds of often violent segregationist extremists.

As the civil rights struggle fragmented and was radicalized in the late 1960s, the close alliance between Jewish and African American political activists soured. Memories of close cooperation during the 1950s and 1960s heightened the sense of disappointment and disenchantment felt by many Jews when some civil rights organizations adopted separatist and anti-Zionist platforms. Moreover, Jewish landlords and storekeepers who owned property and stores within African American neighborhoods were particularly hard hit during the race riots of the late 1960s and by campaigns for black economic self-reliance. At much the same time, Jewish inner-city neighborhoods were being emptied by white flight. The public relationship between Jews and African Americans deteriorated further in the last few decades of the twentieth century as a series of acrimonious episodes exposed the raw nerves of both communities. These included the 1979 forced resignation of Andrew Young, a black civil rights hero, as America’s chief delegate at the United Nations for making secret contacts with the Palestinian Liberation Organization; the rise of the crudely antisemitic Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam; and the 1991 rioting in Crown Heights, which followed the accidental killing of an African American boy by a *Hasidic funeral motorcade. These incidents almost uniformly ended in the trading of accusations of antisemitism and racism. Although Jews and African Americans remain united in their loyalty to the Democratic Party and adherence to liberal politics in the first decade of the twenty-first century, there is evidence that their interests have diverged on a number of key issues, including affirmative action. In the 2008 presidential election, however, successful candidate Barack Obama received overwhelming Jewish support; figures based on exit polling data suggest that 78% of Jewish voters supported Obama, and some have suggested that his election has restored links between Jews and African Americans.

Recent studies include H. Diner, In the Almost Promised Land: American Jews and Blacks, 1915–1935 (1995); M. Adams and J. Bracey, eds., Strangers and Neighbors: Relations between Blacks and Jews in the United States (1999); and C. Greenberg, Troubling the Waters: Black-Jewish Relations in the American Century (2006).

ADAM MENDELSON

United States: Agricultural Settlements. Between 1881 and 1910, Jews from *Eastern Europe established approximately seventy planned farming settlements in the United States. A major impetus came from Am Olam (Eternal People), a Russian Jewish organization that aimed to solve the “Jewish problem” through establishment of socialist, agrarian colonies in North America. Members believed that an “abnormal” Jewish occupational profile fueled *antisemitism, that a “return” to farming would “normalize” Jewish life, and that colonies would demonstrate the value of communal living and the Jewish capacity for productive labor. Although these colonies were short-lived, they played a key role in opening rural areas to Jewish settlement.

Between 1881 and 1884, approximately twenty-four colonies, some consisting of only a few dozen individuals and others with sixty or more families, were founded in locations including Louisiana, the Dakotas, Oregon, Colorado, Arkansas, Kansas, and New Jersey. Many were sponsored by established American Jews, eager to divert immigrants from settling in northeastern cities, and Am Olam chapters founded a few as well. Others were settled by groups espousing similar philosophies, but whose connections to Am Olam are unclear. Although some were strictly communal, others divided land into private holdings. Many group leaders were intellectuals and students, but colonists also brought experience in trade and, in some cases, farming. Most colonists were drawn from the southern *Pale of Settlement in *Russia, where Jewish farming settlements existed in the nineteenth century.

Economic activity was largely agrarian. There was a heavy emphasis on intellectual and cultural development, with several colonies creating disciplined educational regimes. Religious life was notably lacking, as many leaders had rejected traditional Judaism while still in Russia. Although there is evidence of religious observance at some colonies, in others tradition was ignored or even flouted by such practices as raising pigs.

Most colonies lasted five years or less, with some succumbing to floods, grasshoppers, blizzards, and hailstorms. Others were torn apart by disagreements, as at New Odessa, Oregon. Colonies were also derailed by disputes between settlers and sponsors, including misunderstandings over whether aid was intended as a gift or a loan. The settlements that lasted the longest were in central New Jersey. Proximity to *New York City and *Philadelphia made them attractive to newcomers and enabled sponsors to exercise oversight. Sponsors transformed these colonies by establishing factories to attract additional settlers; in 1891, for example, Woodbine was founded as a mixed agricultural-industrial settlement in southern New Jersey. The New Jersey colonies reached their peak population in the mid-1910s. Yet, growth altered their character, as industrial settlers did not share the ideologies and backgrounds of earlier colonists. Over time, these communities became distinctive for their rural location rather than their ideological orientation.

Although settlements similar to the Am Olam colonies, like Clarion, Utah, were founded as late as 1911, by the early 1890s tensions with settlers as well as the high rate of failure led sponsors to turn their support to individual farmers, rather than colonies. In contrast to Clarion and the earlier colonies, the rich cultural life and cooperative economic enterprises that characterized settlements of socialist-oriented Jewish chicken farmers in northern New Jersey and Petaluma, California, which developed in the 1920s, resulted from a cluster of individual farmers, rather than a planned, collective settlement.

Despite their short duration, agricultural colonies established migration streams that brought other Jewish migrants to rural America. In North Dakota, independent Jewish farm families replaced colonists, and Jewish merchants followed, settling in towns. Painted Woods Colony had dwindled to three families by 1900, but there were two hundred and fifty Jewish farm families in the region by 1912. Of the eight hundred Jewish homesteaders in North Dakota, about half were members of organized colonies. These early pioneers often became Jewish community leaders in these remote areas and in the larger cities of second settlement. For example, Portland, Oregon, attracted colony veterans whose experience and relative acculturation propelled them into leadership positions.

For further reading, see E. Eisenberg, Jewish Agricultural Colonies in New Jersey (1995); idem, "From Cooperative Farming to Urban Leadership," in Jewish Life in the American West, ed. A. Kahn (2002); R. A. Goldberg, Back to the Soil (1986); and K. Kann, Comrades and Chicken Farmers (1993); see also, BARON DE HIRSCH FUND. ELLEN EISENBERG

United States: American Revolution. In 1776, about 2,000 Jews, constituting less than one-tenth of 1% of the population, lived in the thirteen North American colonies that were poised to rebel against British rule. Most of these Jews, many of Sephardic descent (see UNITED STATES: SEPHARDIM), were involved in merchant activities and tended to oppose British trade restrictions, although some supported the British side. Jewish merchants were among those who signed the Non-Importation Resolution of 1765, as well as the Agreement of 1769, pledging not to deal in British goods.

Jews fought in militias against the British; the first Jew to die of battle wounds was Francis Salvador, who had arrived in South Carolina in 1773 and been elected to its General Assembly. The thirty Jewish men who joined the patriot cause in South Carolina formed their own "Jews' Company." Two Pennsylvanian Jews, Solomon Bush and David Salisbury Franks, attained the rank of lieutenant colonel. Other Jews provided financial support. Polish immigrant Haym Salomon (1740–1785), who settled in *New York City in 1775 and worked as a financial broker for overseas merchants, became an advocate of the revolutionary cause. Like many Jews, he fled to *Philadelphia when the British occupied New York. Salomon negotiated significant loans, without commission, from *France and Holland for the war effort and is said to have provided funds to individual members of the Continental Congress during their stays in Philadelphia. Similarly, the brothers Michael and Barnard Gratz, who had immigrated to Philadelphia from Prussia, became suppliers of arms and clothing to the American army.

Despite Jewish military and financial support for the Revolution, discriminatory legislation of various kinds persisted in most states, in some cases into the 1820s. It was only with the 1791 adoption of the First Amendment to the Constitution (part of the Bill of Rights), proclaiming that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," that the separation of religion and government in the new United States of America was affirmed and the way was opened to equal rights for all citizens regardless of religious beliefs. For further reading, see H. Diner, The Jews of the United States: 1654–2000 (2004).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

United States: Civil Rights Movement. *African Americans consider two triumphant moments as centerpieces of the American civil rights movement: the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom in August, 1963, and the protest march from Selma to Birmingham, Alabama, in February, 1965. These events are scarcely less iconic for the American Jewish community. Rabbi Joachim Prinz, who had fled *Nazi *Germany in 1937, preceded Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. to the podium in Washington, speaking shortly before King delivered his famous "I have a Dream" speech. Abraham Joshua Heschel interlocked arms with King, Ralph Bunche, and Ralph Abernathy in the front row of marchers in Selma. This intermeshing of African American and Jewish memory is not accidental. Instead it speaks to a long and dedicated involvement by Jews in the American civil rights movement.

This Jewish engagement with civil rights for African Americans began early. Joel Spingarn, one of the founders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909, was the first of many Jews to become involved in the leadership of the organization. Others provided financial support for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund. Julius Rosenwald, part owner of Sears, Roebuck, provided a different kind of philanthropic aid, working with Booker T. Washington to dramatically improve education for black children in the south. At the ideological fringe of both communities, black and Jewish radicals found common cause within the Communist Party. Support for civil rights extended beyond the elites: there is evidence of Jewish working class sympathy for black civil rights from the 1920s onwards. A sense of identification, kinship, and shared victimhood with African Americans persisted well after most Jews had entered the middle class.

In the decades following the Second World War, the Jewish defense agencies – the American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, and Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith (ADL), collaborated closely with the NAACP. There were benefits to cooperation since both groups sought federal legislation that would enforce fair standards in housing and employment. Jewish defense agencies believed that racism and antisemitism were twin phenomena; advancing black civil rights would undermine lingering prejudices and restrictions that also affected Jews. Both Jewish and black organizations shared common tactical approaches, relying on a combination of educational efforts (particularly the distribution of literature), legal challenges, and lobbying for legislation. The ADL, for example, filed an amicus curiae brief in Brown v. Board of Education, provided legal aid to the NAACP, and used its southern field offices to distribute school textbooks that promoted desegregation.

Rabbis and college students also flocked to the banner of the civil rights struggle. The *Reform, *Conservative, and *Orthodox movements all publicly declared their support for the Brown decision in favor of school desegregation. Members of the Reform Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) and the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly, activated by a sense of moral imperative and prophetic impulse, formed delegations to join sit-ins and marched in solidarity in southern states. Some students also credited Jewish values as their inspiration for joining the civil rights movement. In the early 1960s, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) provided a welcoming ideological home for young Jewish radicals. Jews, both men and women, formed a disproportionately large cohort among Freedom Riders and participants in the Mississippi Freedom Summer. This prominence was tragically reflected in the murders of Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney, an African American and two Jewish civil rights activists, in rural Mississippi in 1964.

These public demonstrations of support for the civil rights movement by rabbis and students created tensions within southern Jewry. Although a small number of southern rabbis spoke and acted against segregation, most southern Jews preferred to maintain a safe silence on the topic. Many feared that the rabbis and Jewish activists who flocked southwards would lead ardent segregationists to associate their small and vulnerable Jewish communities with "outside agitators." These fears were magnified by the wave of bombings at *synagogues and *community centers, including six in 1958 alone.

While the NAACP and Jewish groups continued to cooperate into the 1970s and 1980s, albeit at a lower level of intensity, the close partnership between Jewish and black political activists soured as the civil rights movement itself fragmented and radicalized. In the late 1960s, student organizations such as SNCC embraced an agenda based on separatism, eventually expelling their white members. SNCC's adoption of an anti-*Zionist platform following the Six Day War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–1967]) compounded the sense of betrayal among longtime Jewish supporters. The rift was the first in a series of episodes that fomented distrust between Jewish and African American groups and often produced countervailing charges of anti-semitism and racism. Incidents in the late 1960s and 1970s, including race riots in a number of northern cities, the struggle for control over the predominantly African American Ocean-Brownsville school district in New York City, and the rise of Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam, narrowed the once broad support that the civil rights movement had enjoyed within the Jewish community. Black and Jewish groups could still find common cause in the 1980s and 1990s, but on a number of key issues, such as affirmative action, their interests increasingly diverged.

For further reading, see C. Greenberg, Troubling the Waters: Black-Jewish Relations in the American Century (2006); and M. Adams and J. Bracey, eds., Strangers and Neighbors: Relations between Blacks and Jews in the United States (1999); and UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN-JEWISH RELATIONS.

ADAM MENDELSON

United States: Civil War. In 1861, about 125,000 Jews, mostly recent *immigrants, lived in northern states and supported the Union; 25,000 Jews lived in southern states and supported the Confederacy. Jews ultimately fought on both sides of the American Civil War (1861–65). They composed prayers for the Union and for the Confederacy and in some cases literally battled against their own relatives. All told, about 8,000–10,000 Jews donned uniforms, and at least fifty rose through the ranks to become officers. Judah P. Benjamin (1811–1884) of Louisiana, one of the most accomplished Jews of his day, served at different times as the Confederacy's Attorney General, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State.

On the issue of slavery, Jews resembled their neighbors, owning slaves where it was legal to do so and expressing a full spectrum of views from pro-slavery to abolitionist. A well-publicized address by Rabbi Morris Raphall of *New York City, delivered on the National Fast Day (January 4, 1861) just before the war, concluded that slaveholding as such was "no sin." Other Jewish leaders condemned such views.

During the war, Jewish supporters of the Union cause waged a political battle to amend the military chaplaincy law, passed in 1861, that stipulated that a regimental chaplain be “a regular ordained minister of some Christian denomination.” At least two Jewish chaplains (one of whom was not “regularly ordained”) were rejected on account of the discriminatory law, thereby disadvantaging Jewish soldiers and delegitimizing the Jewish faith. One of the rejected chaplains, Rev. Arnold Fischel, came to Washington to lobby personally on behalf of a change in the chaplaincy law, and President Abraham Lincoln promised him support. A revised bill that legalized non-Christian chaplains, a landmark in the legal recognition of America’s non-Christian faiths, became law on July 17, 1862 (see also UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY).

Exactly five months later, on December 17, 1862, an even greater challenge confronted Jews when General Ulysses S. Grant expelled “Jews as a class” from his war zone in an attempt to end the smuggling and cotton speculation in which Jews and non-Jews alike engaged. Because they were easily identifiable and stigmatized by age-old stereotypes, Jews came to symbolize for Grant all wartime profiteers. When informed of the order by Jewish victims who had been forced from their homes, President Lincoln had it countermanded on January 4, 1863. The episode reminded Jews of their vulnerability but also empowered them with the knowledge that they could fight back against bigotry and win.

A dramatic upsurge in many forms of anti-Jewish intolerance, in the north as well as in the south, characterized the Civil War era. Wartime tensions victimized Jews, much as they did Catholics and African Americans. Some Jews read special significance into the fact that the war ended on the eve of Passover*. Southern Jews continued to memorialize their wartime victims long after the war ended, creating a Jewish counterpart to the south’s “religion of the lost cause.” For further reading, see B. W. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War (1951); see also UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN. JONATHAN D. SARNA

United States: Community Centers. Jewish Community Centers (JCCs) are an example of an American Jewish institution that has reinvented itself in response to changing communal needs. Founded in the 1850s as social clubs for German Jewish immigrants*, they were first known as Young Men’s and Young Women’s Hebrew Associations (YM/YWHAs). Strongly influenced by the YMCA movement, they aimed to counteract assimilatory forces by providing a comfortable space within which young adult Jews could mingle. By the 1880s there were YM/YWHAs in New York City*, Chicago*, and St. Louis. Their programs encompassed athletics, literary societies, social events, religious services, holiday celebrations, and some limited social services.

Social welfare functions became central between 1880 and 1920 when the Y’s were transformed from social clubs to settlement houses that helped support and Americanize tens of thousands of Jewish immigrants from East Europe*. Similar to Jane Adams’ Hull House in Chicago, centers such as the Henry Street Settlement on the Lower East Side of Manhattan held English-language and citizenship classes as well as lessons in deportment, fashion*, and cooking. By the middle of the twentieth century when the post-World War II* move to the suburbs accelerated along with the baby boom, the newly renamed Jewish Community Centers (JCCs) were refashioned into hubs of sports*, recreation, and cultural activities, as well as a range of programs for children. A few, epitomized by the 92nd Street Y in New York City and later on by the DCJCC in the heart of the nation’s capital, specialized in educational and cultural events.

A recurring debate in communal leadership circles concerned the role that the maintenance of Jewish identity should play in JCC programming. There was also ongoing competition with local synagogues* whose lay and professional leadership felt that some Jews affiliated with JCCs instead of with synagogues. Such notables as Oscar Janowsky and Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan* wrote harsh critiques of the role of JCCs. Kaplan was credited with inventing the Synagogue Center movement based on his conception of a “synagogue center” combining religious, social, and communal activities. Subsequently, many Conservative synagogues* founded by his students between 1945 and 1975 had “Jewish Center” as part of their name. The “shul with a pool” phenomenon emerged, with the Forest Hills Jewish Center in New York City leading the way.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the JCC movement has expanded in several important ways. Although individual JCCs are generally autonomous and receive significant support from local Jewish federations, the national organization (JCCA) has grown in importance, raising major grant money and providing trips to Israel and American-based training for staff in Judaic and social work skills. The umbrella organization has also set standards for child care, prepared curricula, and initiated grants to train camp directors (see SUMMER CAMPING). The JCCA supports a large network of infant care and nursery schools, teen programming, summer day camps, and some overnight camps. Many JCCs house senior day care programs as well as athletic facilities. They also provide the venue for children’s competitive sports teams that do not meet on the Sabbath* and other services aimed primarily at the Orthodox community*, such as swimming pool hours separated by gender. For further reading, see D. Kaufman, Shul with a Pool: The Synagogue-Center in American Jewish History (1998).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

United States: Demography. From the beginning of Jewish settlement in the mid-seventeenth century in what is today the United States until the late twentieth century, the number of Jews has risen steadily. Changes in the size of the American Jewish population were determined mostly by the interplay between natural increase on the one hand and the migratory balance on the other; primary relationships with non-Jews in mixed families did not directly cause quantitative gains or losses because only the assignment of religious identity to their offspring had this effect. Jewish demographic evolution was not evenly spread throughout the period; what mainly affected the pace of increase was the number of new immigrants. Immigration also played a significant role in the sub-ethnic composition of Sephardic* and Ashkenazic* Jews, as well as in the nativity structure of foreign-born versus American-born Jews.

Any assessment of the demography of American Jews is dependent on the nature and quality of information sources, and it is further affected by the definition of group identity.

Hence, even very basic demographic data should be regarded as estimates. For the colonial period, the statistical information has heavily relied on documentation of *synagogue membership and Jewish communities. Since 1776, the United States has rigorously separated church and state, forbidding the census or any other official ongoing or temporary registration from inquiring into matters of creed. This has prevented any separate classification of religious groups. The single exception was the 1957 Current Population Survey that was voluntary and included a question on religion. For specific eras, such as the mass immigration at the turn of the nineteenth century, censuses can be used to study, at least partially, the demography of the Jews by defining them according to country of birth (*Russia) and mother tongue (*Yiddish).

Noncensus proxy indicators, especially valid in periods of ethno-religious segregation and strong Jewish identity, are death certificates and cemetery of internment, the number of pupils absent from school on *Yom Kippur, and distinguishable Jewish names. Since the mid-twentieth century there has been a growth in communal and nationwide surveys that allocate Jews by a single or a combination of methods, including master lists, distinctive Jewish names, and random samples. Informal surveys, conducted by private research groups, often introduce a question on religion. However, given the small proportion of Jews in the total American population, these samples are inadequate for quantitative analyses of the Jewish population.

In past eras, given strong religious identity and almost universal endogamy, the definition of "who is a Jew" was unequivocal. However, more recently, as successful acculturation has increased familial relationships with non-Jews, this definition has gained in complexity. This difficulty has been further enhanced by the ambiguity of "Jewishness," which is viewed as both a religion and an ethnicity. In the United States, where religious affiliation is not anchored by legal provision, people can informally switch from one religious group to another, and changes in religious affiliation are reversible. There may also be multiple bases of identity. Most demographic research relies on subjective self-declaration and considers as Jews all those who define themselves as such, whether they see themselves as belonging to a religious, ethnic, cultural, or other group. This designation may also include people with no religion (or a religion theologically compatible with Judaism) who do not consider themselves Jewish but have a Jewish mother and/or father.

Despite the many methodological and conceptual limitations, there is a rich and comprehensive documentation of the evolution of the American Jewish population and its demographic characteristics. The beginning of the community dates to 1654 with the permanent settlement in New Amsterdam, later *New York City, of twenty-three Jewish refugees of *Sephardic origin from Recife, *Brazil. Over the next few decades the number of Jews increased slowly to about 300 in 1700, 2,500 in the revolutionary year of 1776, and up to roughly 3,000 Jews in 1820. With this growth, the Jewish community also became more diverse, including people from many countries in Europe. By 1730, Jews from *Central Europe already outnumbered their Sephardic counterparts in America, and over the next two centuries the percentage of *Ashkenazic Jews in the American Jewish population continued to grow. Although Jewish immigration never stopped, by the early nineteenth century the proportion of native-born Jews had increased substantially (see UNITED STATES: IMMIGRATION).

The Jewish population was 15,000 in 1840, 150,000 in 1860, and approximately one-quarter of a million in 1880. This rate of increase was 15% higher than that of the American population as a whole, with most of the growth being attributable to large-scale immigration from German-speaking (Central) Europe. Although the new arrivals settled disproportionately in New York, these years were characterized also by spatial dispersion throughout the continent. The paramount reasons for this internal movement were economic in nature and included the establishment of new markets and the search to exploit new opportunities. In the process, Judaism also spread to become a nationwide religion, and the foundations for Jewish institutions and organized activities were laid.

No doubt the most meaningful demographic change for American Jews was the mass immigration of two million *East European Jews who entered the country between 1881 and the outbreak of *World War I. Accompanied by internal demographic development, the number of Jews had climbed to 3.4 million by 1920. Since the overwhelming majority of the new immigrants had arrived from a single defined area, the composition of the American Jewish community came to be dominated by Jews of Eastern European provenance. Such a large immigration over such a relatively short span of time also increased the share of Jews in the total American population from approximately 0.5% at the beginning of the period to more than 3% in 1914. Likewise, in light of the geopolitical changes in Europe, especially the dismantling of large empires into smaller sovereign countries, the United States came to have the largest concentration of Jews in the world, and it maintained this demographic seniority throughout the twentieth century. Because the immigrants tended to stay in cities that were ports of entry, the percentage of Jews in these locations was far higher than elsewhere, and the northeast became home to as many as two-thirds of America's Jews.

The new immigrants came mostly from the poorer strata of Eastern European Jewry. After a short period of hard work in physical jobs, they began to move up the socioeconomic ladder. This trend was accelerated between the two world wars and especially by the immigrants' American-born children, who by the 1930s had become a majority among the Jewish population. Restrictions on entry to the United States, despite some flexibility after the rise of the *Nazi party in *Germany and immediately following the end of *World War II, substantially diminished the number of Jewish immigrants. Overall, between 1933 and 1950 some 300,000 Jewish refugees, survivors, and *displaced persons from Europe settled in the United States. Given that the American Jewish population had increased to five million by 1950, these low numbers indicate the declining importance of immigration as a component in the demographic development of American Jewry.

The second half of the twentieth century was characterized by the full acceptance of Jews into the social and economic American mainstream and by their unprecedented achievements in education, occupational mobility, and income, as well as in the public and political arenas. Jews began to spread geographically from city centers to the suburbs, and on the national level many moved to southern and western states, distributing the Jewish population almost equally among the Sunbelt regions and the Northeast and Midwest. However, their successful integration affected the demographic patterns of the Jews, slowing their demographic evolution. By 1990, the Jewish population had slightly increased to an all-time high of 5.5 million. However, after that, it began to diminish for the first time in its history and in 2005 numbered 5.3 million. These numbers reflect wide social processes of marriage postponement, increased divorce rates, frequent interfaith marriage, which now comprise half of all new marriages involving at least one Jewish partner, and low fertility. Since the majority of the children of mixed couples are not raised within the Jewish faith, actual Jewish fertility has dropped deeper below the required threshold for intergenerational replacement. These patterns have resulted in the aging of the Jewish population and in a larger number of deaths than births; eventually they will lead to negative natural movement. Even a positive international migration balance from countries including *Israel and the former *Soviet Union has not offset the internal demographic losses (see DEMOGRAPHY).

Accordingly, Jews in 2010 comprised less than 2% of total American population. From a worldwide Jewish perspective, the United States no longer has the largest concentration of Jews; rather it shares this position with Israel. With due caution, barring possible changes in the demographic patterns as a result of general socioeconomic and cultural processes or particularistic Jewish circumstances, the number of American Jews is anticipated to diminish somewhat further.

UZI REBHUN

United States: Economic Life. At the turn of the twenty-first century, about 44% of all American Jewish men worked in professional occupations, and another 23% earned their living in management positions. Moreover, 40% of the married men in these two occupational categories had wives who also worked in professional or managerial occupations. As a consequence, some two-thirds of American Jewish families had occupations that placed them comfortably in the upper middle class, and only 2% lived in households below the poverty line. Young Jewish adults are entering these same occupations at about the same rate as their parents, suggesting that this level of economic security is likely to persist for some decades into the future.

The economic life of American Jewry was not always this prosperous. At the turn of the twentieth century, in the middle of the period of mass Jewish migration from *Eastern Europe and *Russia, most American Jewish men – more than 80% – were in blue-collar occupations; about a quarter of these blue-collar employees worked in crafts occupations and the rest as operatives and unskilled laborers. Their earnings were correspondingly low, mainly because these occupations were at the low end of the wage distribution but also because the American economy had yet to experience the large increase in worker productivity that would characterize the twentieth century. Jewish women from these poor families typically worked until marriage and sometimes afterward as well, but most withdrew from the labor force once they began having children.

The transformation of the male Jewish labor force from one dominated by low-paid blue-collar workers to one with a majority of well-paid professionals and managers was largely achieved by 1950 and has been relatively stable for the last half-century. This remarkable phenomenon was achieved largely because of the heavy emphasis that Jewish immigrants placed on taking advantage of American educational opportunities for their children. Seeing education as a route to social assimilation – or, as they would have put it, Americanization – as well as economic advancement, Jewish parents were willing to make sacrifices in their own consumption levels to keep their children out of the workplace and in school. Among Jewish men born during the interwar period (1925–40), most of whom were the sons of blue-collar immigrants, fully one-quarter pursued higher education beyond college and earned an advanced degree. Although opportunities for higher education were expanding dramatically for all Americans, only 12% of non-Jewish men in this age cohort earned advanced degrees. Thus, despite a clear pattern of anti-Jewish discrimination in many colleges and universities, Jewish men were able to earn high-level degrees at more than twice the rate as their non-Jewish counterparts.

Jewish families educated their daughters as well as their sons, although labor market opportunities for women would lag behind those for men for several decades. Jewish women not only finished high school but often college as well, and among those born during the interwar period some 15–20% would go on to earn advanced degrees. As was the case for their brothers, this was markedly higher than the 5–7% of non-Jewish women in this cohort who earned advanced degrees. Many of these Jewish women entered the professions as public schoolteachers and social workers, whereas others worked in Jewish communal institutions on a volunteer basis. It was also common for the wife of a self-employed man to help in her husband's business, for example as a bookkeeper or receptionist, perhaps part-time or on a seasonal basis.

As soon as their income position improved, American Jewish immigrants or their adult children moved to middle-class housing in more attractive neighborhoods than the crowded tenements in which they had initially settled. By the 1950s they would move again into even more pleasant suburban neighborhoods. Recognizing that their own improved income status derived from educational achievements, Jewish parents continued to emphasize the importance of education for their children. With higher incomes than their immigrant parents, they could afford to live in neighborhoods with high-quality public schools and to finance higher education for their children. Most third-generation American Jewish youth would go to college. Among those born during and after *World War II (1941–75), about 40% of the Jewish men and 30% of the Jewish women would continue their education and earn advanced degrees. These rates were at least three times higher than the rates at which their non-Jewish counterparts were earning advanced degrees, resulting in a disproportionate presence of Jews on many university campuses. They would go on to be disproportionately represented in a number of professions as well, although Jews would always remain a small minority in each occupation because they are such a small fraction (about 2%) of the American population.

One of the most significant economic decisions made by immigrant Jews at the turn of the twentieth century was to limit their number of children. Jewish fertility rates in Russia and Eastern Europe had been very high, and most immigrant Jews came from large families, in which eight, ten, or even more siblings would not have been remarkable. Yet, low-income American Jews understood that they could not provide many advantages for so many children. Statistical data for the year 2000 are available for married Jewish women born since 1925. In every age group, these women have borne between 2 and 2.5 children on average. This low fertility rate began much earlier than most people realize, and it enabled the relatively large investments that even low-income immigrants made in the health and education of their children. Each generation of Jewish women tended to be better educated than their non-Jewish counterparts and thus more likely to improve their children's educational opportunities. Jewish families avoided the pattern of other immigrant groups where the mother worked and the older daughters cared for young siblings. Instead, Jewish mothers typically withdrew from the labor force to care for young children and often reentered when the children were older. Even as later decades saw young families with higher incomes, Jewish parents chose not to have more children but rather to invest even more heavily in the education and health of each child.

The prevalence of high-level graduate education and professional training among young Jewish men and women affects not only their future income prospects but also their family lives. Since young adults tend not to think of marriage until they can see the shape of their future careers, the typical age at marriage is several years older than that of earlier generations, especially for women. Increasing numbers of people earning graduate and professional degrees mean that single adults become a rising proportion of the Jewish population, and their parents, the so-called empty nesters, become correspondingly more numerous as well. Jews tend to have higher rates of marriage than non-Jews, yet the proportion of women who never marry has been rising, and couples who marry later are more likely to remain childless. Jewish fertility rates have been falling well below replacement levels because of the high incidence of unmarried women, but young Jewish families still have 2–2.5 children on average and emphasize the importance of health and education for both sons and daughters. Jewish communal institutions seem to be adapting to the needs of two-career couples with high expectations. It is likely, therefore, that the economic life of American Jews has stabilized at its current level, well above that of the general U.S. population, and, at least in its large outlines, will persist for several generations to come.

For further reading, see C. U. Chiswick, Economics of American Judaism (2008); B. R. Chiswick, "The Occupational Attainment and Earnings of American Jewry, 1890–1990," Contemporary Jewry 20 (1999): 68–98; idem, "The Occupational Attainment of American Jewry: 1990–2000," Contemporary Jewry 27 (2007): 80–111; and 2000/01 National Jewish Population Survey, available at www.jewishdatabank.org.

CARMEL U. CHISWICK

United States: Fraternal Societies. When Jewish fraternal associations first emerged in the mid-nineteenth century, they were based on other fraternal societies such as the Freemasons. These groups helped new *immigrants maintain their Jewish identities while integrating into American society; they emphasized education, English-language skills, and American ideals, while fostering either a religious or ethnically Jewish consciousness. By 1917, there were almost 3,000 lodges with nearly 500,000 members.

The first and most prominent Jewish fraternal society was B'nai B'rith, founded in 1843 by a group of German immigrants, many of whom were also members of the Masons and Odd Fellows (see also ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA). B'nai B'rith, translated as "Sons of the Covenant," lived by its motto of "Benevolence, Brotherly Love, and Harmony," providing sick benefits to members and support for widows and orphans. Its emphasis on an American Jewish identity based more on Jewish peoplehood than religion provided a *secular alternative to the *synagogue. Although B'nai B'rith was not anti-religious – some of its members were national religious leaders – it consciously avoided any mention of potentially divisive religious controversies to maintain unity. After its founding generation had successfully integrated into American society, B'nai B'rith discarded Americanization rituals and began to emphasize Jewish social service. A similar organization, the United Order of True Sisters, was founded in 1846 with comparable goals for women, but it did not achieve the success of B'nai B'rith (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA).

Whereas B'nai B'rith focused on the generation of German Jewish immigrants, new fraternal societies emerged after 1880 as East European Jews began to arrive in America in greater numbers. The Arbeter Ring* (*Workmen's Circle), one of the most prominent fraternal groups, held educational lectures and discussions, as well as picnics, dinners, and dances, and also served as a mutual aid society for its members. The Arbeter Ring differed from many other fraternal societies in its admission of women. By 1906, more than 30% of its members were women, many of whom played an important role in local branches. Another difference was that a major focus of the Arbeter Ring was advocacy for radical socialist politics; not surprisingly, many of its early members were avowed socialists. After 1900 the society began to expand its membership, and by 1906, it boasted 8,000 members. It continued to grow rapidly, gaining 19,000 new members in 1909 alone. Many of these new members were not as politically inclined, but the Arbeter Ring continued to focus on socialist causes.

The Arbeter Ring was one of many fraternal societies for East European immigrants, some of which included landsmanshaftn (groups of immigrants from the same hometown). The Independent Order B'rith Abraham fraternal society was an umbrella organization for groups of new immigrants. More than 120 of its 354 New York branches were landsmanshaftn, which helped it become the largest American Jewish fraternal society by *World War I. Landsmanshaft organizations joined larger fraternal societies for financial reasons and to enhance their benefits, as well as for social prestige and networking opportunities. Many landsmanshaftn also had ladies auxiliaries. Finally, whereas landsmanshaftn helped maintain Old World ties, joining a fraternal society helped integrate the immigrants into the American milieu by exposing them to rituals that emphasized a hybrid American Jewish identity.

After the precipitous decline of Jewish *immigration after World War I, the need for Americanization declined, and so, too, did the prominence of Jewish fraternal societies. However, many landsmanschaftn continued to function into the twenty-first century through the maintenance of cemetery plots and burial services for the descendants of original members.

For further reading, see D. Soyer, Jewish Immigrant Associations and American Identity in New York, 1880–1939 (1997); D. D. Moore, B'nai B'rith and the Challenge of Ethnic Leadership (1981); J. Sarna, American Judaism (2004); and C. Wilhelm, "The Independent Order of True Sisters," American Jewish Archives 54(1) (2002): 37–63.

MICHAEL R. COHEN

United States: Higher Education. The Jewish encounter with American higher education is an important barometer of the Jewish position in American society. In the early years of the United States, the denominational bent of the nine colonial American colleges limited Jewish contact to an occasional student matriculation. This situation remained unchanged until the final decades of the nineteenth century, when some universities began to view a Jewish faculty and student presence as evidence of their broader missions of research and community service. This academic receptivity led American Jews to view the nation's colleges and universities as vehicles for educational, cultural, and social acceptance and advancement, and the numbers of Jewish students seeking higher education increased steadily. By 1910, the City College of New York was a predominantly Jewish institution. Similarly, a small but significant number of Jewish faculty appeared on college and university rosters around the country. Finally, Jewish philanthropists, perceiving institutional receptivity and hospitality, increasingly supported institutional initiatives.

In the early twentieth century, the rise of campus *antisemitism reflected the general social antisemitism in response to the large Eastern European Jewish migrations. Academic appointments became increasingly difficult to obtain, especially in the humanities. The social life of Jewish college students became more segregated, the rapid increase in Jewish fraternities being one indicator (see FRATERNITIES AND SORORITIES: NORTH AMERICA). After World War I, institutions hitherto viewed as open to all of merit and character began to impose admissions restrictions. Jews continued to attend college during the 1920s and 1930s, although not always the ones they regarded as most desirable. Graduate school acceptances were more difficult to obtain, particularly at medical and engineering schools. After World War II, although some restrictions on student admissions and faculty appointments persisted, most Jews seeking access to higher education found opportunities. The growth of public higher education, the lessening of anti-semitic attitudes, a renewed emphasis on scholarship, passage of anti-discrimination legislation, and increased competition for competent faculty in the 1950s and early 1960s had overcome most remaining prejudices.

FACULTY: Most colleges in the nineteenth century stressed the inculcation of Christian discipline and piety, and many applied informal or explicit religious tests to prospective faculty. Only toward the end of the century, when American colleges and nascent universities relinquished their explicitly Christian orientation in favor of research and subject mastery, did career opportunities emerge for Jews. Although prejudice persisted, possibilities for academic careers were better for Jews in late-nineteenth-century America than in England or Germany.

Receptivity to Jewish faculty was often linked to Jewish philanthropy. Under President Seth Low (1889–1901), Columbia University accepted many endowments and contributions from New York's Jewish community. Low emphasized Columbia's public role, including the provision of impartial access to all positions and facilities. Although Columbia's trustees did not invite a Jew to membership for another third of a century, Low appointed or reappointed several Jewish faculty. The Jewish Encyclopedia (1901–05) contained an entry for most of the major American universities, each indicating the Jewish representation on the faculty. From three to seven names were listed for most institutions; a significant number of these professors (about sixteen) taught in Semitics departments (see JEWISH STUDIES); the rest were spread over a large number of disciplines. The University of California at Berkeley appointed one of the first female Jewish professors, economist Jessica Blanche Peixotto in 1904; she became a full professor in 1918, the first woman to achieve that rank in the University of California system. Jews had the most difficulty obtaining appointments in fields that interpreted past and present Christian culture, such as history, religion, English literature, and art. Franz Boas's leadership in *anthropology assured continued Jewish representation in that field, and Jews secured appointment to prominent posts in other "newer" disciplines. This pattern persisted through the 1960s when Jews, by then well represented in the social sciences and professions, remained underrepresented in the humanities. Jewish women also remained underrepresented at that time.

Academic antisemitism flourished in the early twentieth century as the Eastern European Jewish migrations increased in size and visibility and as more Eastern European students appeared at elite institutions. The occasional Jewish student who obtained admission to graduate school seldom went on to a significant academic career. Jewish representation on European university faculties slightly increased early in the century as the Jewish numbers in American institutions declined. Factors that ultimately reversed this pervasive discrimination included the appointment to university faculties of significant numbers of scholars fleeing *Nazism, including many Jews; the general liberalization of attitudes that occurred during and after World War II; and changing demographic and economic conditions. American colleges played a significant role in the war effort, and Jews capitalized on opportunities when stationed at colleges where their potential for admission or employment would previously have been restricted. There was no turning back once the war had privileged intellectual over social considerations in faculty appointments.

Knowledge of the results of European antisemitism further silenced objections to Jewish appointments. Once Jews became part of a college or university hierarchy, their views on subsequent appointment and promotion decisions had to be considered. Finally, the rapid growth in undergraduate enrollments, due first to the G.I. Bill and then to the rising birth rate and the increase in the number of women attending college, created a severe faculty shortage. By the first decade of the twenty-first century, Jews comprised more than 10% of the American professoriate, although they were only 2% of the American population. The proportion of Jewish academics approached 40% and higher at certain “elite” institutions.

STUDENTS: Schools and universities began to attract American Jewish students and their parents in the late nineteenth century as it became clear that economic advancement required secular education. Universities, when opening or incorporating extant professional schools, raised their entrance requirements to include a bachelor’s degree. Increased economic security among Jews made a longer period of post-secondary education feasible. The American Jewish student population exhibited rapid growth, high visibility, and strong geographic, institutional, and disciplinary concentrations.

Jewish students soon found themselves blamed for their own success. Initial concern about the increasing size of the Jewish student body was moderate: From its start in the late nineteenth century through *World War I, the gradual Jewish influx involved, for the most part, assimilated students. The movement toward liberalized access to American colleges that occurred between 1890 and 1910 discouraged any proclivity toward admissions restrictions. These factors continued to influence admissions policies after World War I. However, the balance soon shifted. With a college education now imperative to social advancement, officials feared that the growing Jewish presence might reduce higher education’s attractiveness to the Gentile constituency. Fear of the foreigner and racial categorization had become commonplace by the 1920s, and Jews had attained enough upward mobility to translate an abstract “threat” into a present reality.

Discrimination in college admissions and the enactment of immigration restrictions occurred simultaneously. Admissions restrictions most frequently were imposed at or near major Jewish population centers. Universities devised two restrictive devices: selective admission and quotas. Created and elaborated at Columbia University after World War I, selective admissions postulated that the individual characteristics of some Jewish students created a “problem” and that mechanisms existed to distinguish between “desirable” and “undesirable” students. Application forms eliciting social characteristics, “psychological” (intelligence or aptitude) tests, photographs, character references, and personal interviews were near simultaneous innovations designed to facilitate such distinctions. Viewing “desirability” as an individual property, Columbia University authorities concluded that, given adequate information about each candidate and a large enough applicant pool, one could compose a freshman class containing an acceptable academic and social mix. This usually meant excluding most Jews of Eastern European origins. Harvard president Abbott Lawrence Lowell (1910–33) viewed the presence of Jews as a group as problematic apart from any member’s personal characteristics. All interests, therefore, would be best satisfied by placing a quota (a strict limitation) on the number of Jewish students – even if all who applied appeared individually desirable.

Advocates of selective admissions viewed the expanded dossier as a way of evaluating social desirability while retaining the focus of admissions decisions on the individual student. The result was a Jewish enrollment at the desired level. The cost for these institutions was a laborious and subjective admissions procedure; the gains consisted of an “acceptable” student body, according to the administration’s narrow definition. The use of selective admissions deflected much criticism precisely because it singled out no single status as “key.” To the contrary, quota establishment remained indefensible (a university was not, after all, a social club or summer resort). Consequently, it was a covert, although common, practice.

Although private institutions had nearly free rein to change their admissions policies, the U.S. Constitution’s Fourteenth Amendment meant that public colleges concerned about a Jewish presence and lacking an indigenous Jewish population were confined to restricting out-of-state matriculations. The existence of restricted boarding houses at state schools with dormitory shortages also proved effective. Even if legally prohibited from the invidious use of selective admissions, college officials retained broad discretion over admissions. After World War II, many colleges confronted litigation and antidiscrimination legislation (such as the 1948 Fair Education Practices Act in New York State). These colleges still managed to save the selective admissions process (and its subjective and discretionary methods), while having to cease all discrimination on the grounds of race, creed, color, or national origin. Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, although primarily aimed at equal treatment for blacks and Hispanics, also assured equal treatment for Jews. Today, few selective institutions are accused of anti-Jewish discrimination, although it is not clear precisely when discriminatory practices ended at a number of colleges.

Jewish students received little help from college officials when confronted with social ostracism. However, they occasionally obtained the support of Jewish philanthropists to “neutralize” their fellow students’ antisemitism. Jacob Schiff, the financier, anonymously endowed the student center at Barnard College to counter the self-selecting student culture. Centrally located, its facilities would be open to all. Jewish students responded to social exclusion either by focusing on their academic work (thereby earning the reputation of “grinds”) or by establishing predominantly Jewish academic and social organizations. At Harvard College in 1906, a group of Jewish undergraduates organized the first *Menorah Society, which had as its purpose “the promotion in American colleges and universities of the study of Jewish history, culture and problems, and the advancement of Jewish ideals.” Other students did not aspire to inclusion in either the Gentile or Jewish student cultures. In traveling a difficult road, some relied on their Jewishness for strength; others sublimated their frustrations into some creative endeavor. Some perhaps never fully recovered from the negative status that their Gentile counterparts attached to them.

Jewish students moved into the mainstream after World War II; their transition was eased in the 1960s by the decline of fraternities and sororities as mainstays of student culture. Some identifiably Jewish organizations, such as Menorah, declined; others, such as *Hillel Foundations, grew. Academically, Jewish students opted for a broader spectrum of institutions as overt and covert discrimination declined and as public higher education increased in size to absorb the baby boom. As discrimination declined in professions dominated by firms (e.g., engineering) rather than by individual practice (e.g., medicine), they chose majors leading to a larger number of occupations. In this climate, assimilation (and, less openly, a fear of *intermarriage) replaced inclusion as the main problem perceived by the concerned Jewish community.

For further reading, see L. S. Feuer, "The Stages in the Social History of Jewish Professors in American Colleges and Universities," American Jewish History 71 (June 1982): 432–65; D. Oren, Joining the Club: A History of Jews and Yale (1986, reprinted 2001); M. Synnott, The Half-Opened Door: Discrimination and Admissions at Harvard, Yale, and Princeton, 1900–1970 (1979, reprinted 2010); and H. S. Wechsler, "Academe," in Jewish American History and Culture: An Encyclopedia, ed. J. Fischel and S. Pinsker (1992), 3–13.

HAROLD S. WECHSLER

United States: Immigration. Since the 1980s, scholars of Jewish immigration have shifted their emphasis from political and social motivations that might seem unique to Jews, like generalized persecution or specific *pogroms, to a more nuanced view that integrates Jewish population movements into the general social evolution of Europe. Explanations for the immigration of Jews to North America still acknowledge their respective niches in the economies and moral imagination of European states, but Jewish immigration is no longer depicted as a mass exodus divided into distinctive ethnic eras – *Sephardic, *German, and *East European. Instead it is seen as part of the much larger migration of people away from Europe and as a sequence of strategies devised to sustain families in response to the continuing evolution of European capitalism.

The first Jewish settlers in the Americas were indeed Sephardim, members of former Portuguese converso* families who had re-created themselves as Jews in seventeenth-century *Amsterdam. "Jews of the Portuguese Nation" adjusted to the expansion of the Dutch trading empire by moving around it in disproportionate numbers. For example, after the Dutch captured Recife, *Brazil, from *Portugal in 1630, half of the civilian population of about 3,000 consisted of Sephardic Jews. When the Portuguese recaptured the area in 1654, Jews either relocated to Curacao, the Dutch free port off the coast of Spanish Venezuela, or returned to Amsterdam. Curacao remained the largest Jewish enclave in the Americas, at about 1,500, through the American Revolution (see CARIBBEAN). In 1654, a fugitive group of twenty-three refugees from Recife were part of the passenger contingent that landed in New Amsterdam. To resist Governor Stuyvesant's attempts to evict them, they used their influence with relatives who owned stock in the Dutch West India Company. Few stayed beyond a year or two. When the English captured the port in 1664 and renamed it *New York, the Jews were able to remain; more Jews also arrived from England, because Oliver Cromwell, England's ruler in the 1650s, had authorized the reentry to his realm of a modest group of Sephardic merchants from Amsterdam (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN).

Among the Jews who formed a congregation in New York in the 1690s were Sephardim from London and *Ashkenazim from the Rhineland or the *Baltic. Sephardim and Ashkenazim in London and Amsterdam sustained separate institutions, but in the North American colonies, the members of the two small groups blended to support synagogues, cemeteries, and benevolent societies. By the 1740s, Jews in New York supplied the British Army with goods of various kinds and some went with the troops on the attempted conquest of *Canada in 1756–58. A few of these Jews became the nucleus of a tiny Jewish community in Montreal. By the outbreak of the *American Revolution, Jewish mercantile enclaves in *Charleston, *Philadelphia, and New York numbered in total about 2,000 to 2,500 persons. Their isolation from further immigration during the generation spanning the French Revolution (1789) and the end of the Napoleonic Wars (1815) enabled them to see themselves as an elite enclave in the new nation.

Between 1820 and *World War I, Jews participated in the massive population transfer from Europe to the Americas. The spread of industrial capitalism, intensified *urbanization, and the accompanying transformation of agriculture led millions of rural young people to work in the mines, along the docks, and in the factories of European cities. Jews who had lived among them as peddlers and produce dealers found their customers leaving and their economic functions becoming obsolete. Steadily through the nineteenth century, young Jews left rural areas for cities like Hamburg and *Berlin. A few thousand young Jewish men in the 1820s moved to the English Midlands, where relatives in Manchester or Birmingham might supply them with items to peddle in the countryside. By the early 1840s, as the United States recovered from a severe depression and as German farm families populated its Midwest, America became the key destination for emigrating Jews.

Jews left the German lands in disproportionate numbers; although they constituted only 1.1% of the German population, they were 4% of the emigrants. By 1860, the Jewish population of the United States was estimated at 150,000, as tens of thousands of young men followed family chains of migration to join relatives and bring others, including wives, in their wake. By 1860, there were 40,000 Jews in New York and 8,000 in both Baltimore and Philadelphia. Other young men began their careers as peddlers, following the new canal and railroad networks deep into the interior of the still sparsely populated country. Supplied with goods by relatives, they traveled into the cotton country of the South (see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN), with its transportation hub of New Orleans. In 1860 about 4,000 Jews lived in that city, many from Alsace. Other Jewish peddlers proceeded from St. Louis to follow the Santa Fe Trail to New Mexico.

With the discovery of gold in California in 1848, Jewish young men came to *San Francisco; by 1870, the city's Jewish population was 17,000, the second largest community in the nation (see SAN FRANCISCO; UNITED STATES, WESTERN). On the Pacific slope, including Victoria, British Columbia, Jews created a mercantile network between the 1850s and 1880s, bringing dry goods and credit to mining and farming towns and exporting gold dust, hides, and farm commodities through relatives and partners in the hub city of San Francisco. Throughout the unsettled region, Jewish merchants gained exceptional civic status as pillars of stability. Although Jewish emigration after 1880 is dominated by an unprecedented stream of people from *Eastern Europe, another 100,000 new immigrants from Germany reached America between 1872 and 1914.

As railroad networks extended into *Poland and *Ukraine, as the Jewish population grew through natural increase far faster than the local peasantry, and as Russian state policy limited Jewish opportunities, Jews left their towns and villages in larger numbers. Some migrated to the Black Sea port of Odessa, where they dominated the grain trade to the Mediterranean. However, far larger numbers resettled in northern cities like *Warsaw, *Vilna, and Minsk where many found work in the new mass-production clothing factories, most owned by Jews. Pogroms, primarily in Moldavia and Ukraine between 1903 and 1906, induced many more Jews to emigrate, but economic upheavals underlay the political horrors. Between 1881 and 1924, with a lengthy hiatus during World War I, perhaps 2.3 million Jews from Eastern Europe arrived in the United States, comprising about 10% of the total foreign influx. About 75% of Jewish immigrants arrived from *Russia, 4% from *Romania, and approximately 19% from the lands of the *Habsburg Austro-Hungarian Empire, especially *Galicia. Unlike their predecessors from German lands, Jews were the largest group to leave Russia, followed by Poles and Finns.

In addition, from 1880 through 1914, about 90,000 Jews arrived in *Canada, and the trickle continued at 4,000 annually throughout World War I. Most settled in Ontario, especially Toronto, but several thousand moved to the prairie hub of Winnipeg. Between 1892 and 1914, 90,000 Jews also arrived in *Argentina. The *Baron Maurice de Hirsch Fund and its affiliates, as well as the Argentine government, subsidized twenty thousand or more so they might be located on cooperative farms. Some managed to acquire their own land, but most relocated to Buenos Aires. Unlike in Canada or the United States, however, more than 40% of these immigrants left the country, most for North America, perhaps because of the instability of an economy that depended on agricultural exports.

The migration from *Central Europe in the mid-nineteenth century had consisted primarily of single people but the mass exodus from Eastern Europe was mainly made up of young families, usually linked through brothers, sisters, and in-laws. The need to accommodate traditional religious values and to be near places of industrial employment led East European Jews to settle in congested urban enclaves. There, distinctive Jewish neighborhoods permitted the establishment of a culture that featured both observance of *Orthodox Judaism and *Bundist socialism. New York City in the 1890s became the capital of *Yiddish theater and Yiddish publishing (see JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA) and by 1930 held more than two million Jews, a number unprecedented in history. Smaller groups, still in the hundreds of thousands, settled in industrial cities like *Philadelphia and *Chicago, whose Jewish communities were as large as those of Odessa or Vienna. Enclaves of 500 to 1,000 Jews, mostly small storekeepers and their families, were established in small cities throughout the Midwest. Contingents of 3,000 or more Jews, including Sephardim from Rhodes and the Sea of Marmora, settled along the Pacific Slope in Seattle, Portland, and *Los Angeles.

In 1924 the U.S. government drastically curtailed legal immigration through the imposition of national origins quotas. Jews who still desired to immigrate, if permitted to do so by their country of origin, had to wait until the number assigned them by American consuls became eligible. During the *Nazi years and the severe Depression in the United States, thousands desiring to enter were unable to do so.

Starting in 1965, when the United States began to liberalize its immigration laws, Jews again became a small proportion of millions of newcomers. Thousands of young Israelis, some with professional skills, organized a family-based transit between the two countries, a migration that persists. In the immediate aftermath of the *Iranian Revolution of 1979, more than 300,000 persons, including more than 30,000 Jews in family groups, fled to the United States. After the collapse of the *Soviet Union, at least 100,000 Jews emigrated from Russia. Although the Russians settled primarily in the New York area, most of the Iranians and many of the Israelis felt more comfortable in the salubrious climate of southern California. These communities play distinctive roles in cultural and political life in *Los Angeles, which is now American Jewry's second city.

Relevant studies include J. Bodnar, The Transplanted: A History of Immigrants in Urban America (1985); W. Nugent, Crossings: The Great Transatlantic Migrations, 1870–1914 (1992); D. M. Swetschinski, Reluctant Cosmopolitans: The Portuguese Jews of Seventeenth Century Amsterdam (2000); A. Barkai, Branching Out: German-Jewish Immigration to the United States, 1820–1914 (1994); M. Rischin, The Promised City: New York's Jews, 1870–1914 (1962); G. Tulchinsky, Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community (1993); H. Avni, Argentina and the Jews: A History of Jewish Immigration (1991); S. Feher, "From the Rivers of Babylon to the Valleys of Los Angeles: The Exodus and Adaptation of Iranian Jews," in Gatherings in Diaspora: Religious Communities and the New Immigration, ed. R. S. Warner and J. G. Wittner (1998); and S. J. Gold, The Israeli Diaspora (2002).

WILLIAM TOLL

United States: Labor Movement. Encompassing trade unions and union federations, newspapers, political parties, fraternal societies (see UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES), theater groups, educational institutions, housing cooperatives, vacation resorts, and even a bank, the Jewish labor movement sought to raise the consciousness and skills of workers to empower them to fight for their rights and prepare them to take charge of society. Through its many activities and institutions, the movement's programs also tried to infuse a bit of its socialist vision of justice and equality into the present world. Although the Jewish labor movement faded as American Jews moved into the middle class, it left a legacy of liberalism that still exists today.

The Jewish labor movement arose with the mass *immigration of *Yiddish-speaking Jews from *Eastern Europe to the United States in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Despite a number of large strikes, the movement's early years were marked by instability. The radical intellectuals who assumed leadership of the movement found that Jewish workers made willing strikers, but that once the moment of crisis was past the unions would melt away along with the gains achieved in the strikes. Nevertheless, the United Hebrew Trades (UHT), a federation of predominantly Jewish unions, was established in 1888.

The garment industry was home to the greatest concentration of Jewish workers. By 1900, the year the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU) was founded, Jews made up a majority of its workers and employers. A decade later, two dramatic strikes greatly expanded the union's membership and influence. The first came in 1909–10 as 20,000 shirtwaist makers, mostly young women, walked off the job. Although the strike ended without official union recognition, it won higher wages and improved conditions and established a precedent for collective bargaining. A few months later, 60,000 cloak makers struck, leading to the establishment of the "Protocol of Peace," a pioneering agreement that set up a structure for mediating disputes in the industry. Between 1910 and 1914, furriers, millinery workers, and men's tailors also engaged in large strikes that strengthened their unions. In 1914 the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (the ACWA) was founded as a militant alternative to the United Garment Workers, which had been formed in 1891 for workers in the men's ready made clothing industry, and soon outstripped the older union in size and importance.

A number of other institutions contributed to the success of the labor movement. The Forverts (Jewish Daily Forward) appeared in 1897 and within a decade became the most widely read Yiddish daily newspaper in the world and the largest socialist daily in the country (see JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA). Not only did it serve as the most prominent voice of the Jewish labor movement but it also offered material support to unions and striking workers. Founded as a radical workers' mutual aid society in 1892, the Workmen's Circle (Arbeter Ring) reorganized itself as a multibranch fraternal order in 1900. Led by socialists, it provided its members with medical and death benefits, a venue for social interaction, and a forum for cultural development. It also supported members when they were on strike and provided material aid to striking unions. By the 1920s, it sponsored a network of Yiddish children's schools and summer camps, a theater group, a tuberculosis sanatorium, and other institutions (see US: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES).

The success of the Jewish labor movement, in turn, contributed to the success of the Socialist Party in the 1910s. In 1914 the Lower East Side sent socialist labor lawyer Meyer London to Congress. Other socialists represented working-class Jewish districts on the New York City Board of Aldermen, in the New York State legislature, and on the municipal bench. In the 1920s, factional fighting between *Communist Party members and noncommunists (mainly socialists and anarchists) nearly wrecked the ILGWU, especially in the wake of a disastrous communist-led cloak makers' strike in 1926. The ACWA fared better, beginning its experiments in "new unionism" by taking a leading role in regulating conditions in the men's clothing industry, building a cooperative housing project, and establishing a bank.

In the 1930s, the labor movement emerged stronger than ever, even as it drew closer to the American mainstream. The ILGWU, under noncommunist leadership, took advantage of the New Deal's pro-labor policies after 1933. By the end of the decade, it and the ACWA each claimed hundreds of thousands of members, making their leaders, David Dubinsky (1892–1982) and Sidney Hillman (1887–1946), two of the most powerful labor leaders in the country. The rejuvenated ILGWU followed the example of the ACWA in providing services for members, including a summer resort. It even sponsored Pins and Needles (1937), a commercially successful musical revue. Both unions helped form the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), but the ILGWU soon returned to the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Seeking a path to political respectability, many of the Jewish unions and labor leaders helped establish the American Labor Party (ALP), which played an important role in the electoral successes of progressive politicians in New York State. In 1934, the Jewish unions, the Workmen's Circle, and other groups formed the Jewish Labor Committee (JLC) to wage propaganda campaigns against the *Nazi regime in *Germany and help socialist and labor leaders escape Europe for the United States.

Even as the movement reached new heights of membership and influence, however, it was beginning to lose momentum. Few American-born Jews followed their immigrant parents into the needle trades, instead choosing white-collar careers, a trend that accelerated after *World War II. Although many individual Jews remained active in the labor movement as leaders and staffers, Jewish union members now tended to concentrate in teacher, public employee, and other white-collar unions. In the early twenty-first century, both the Jewish Labor Committee and the Workmen's Circle remain active, although their memberships are small. Outside of the remnants of its core institutions, the abiding influence of the Jewish labor movement is evident in the relative liberalism of the Jewish community, in the institutions of the general labor movement, in the cooperative housing projects that dot New York City, and in other surviving social programs of the New Deal. On this topic, see M. Epstein, Jewish Labor in the USA, 2 vols. (1950, 1953); H. Kosak, Cultures of Opposition: Jewish Immigrant Workers, New York City, 1881–1905 (2000); and T. Michels, A Fire in Their Hearts: Yiddish Socialists in New York (2005).

DANIEL SOYER

United States: Military Chaplaincy. The rabbinical chaplaincy of the U.S. armed forces is one of the most significant examples of pan-denominational cooperation in American Jewish history. It demonstrates American Jewry's full participation and acculturation into American society, while also illustrating American Jewry's perpetuation of cultural and religious distinctiveness within a largely Christian society.

Although the American military chaplaincy dates to the *Revolutionary War, the first official rabbinical chaplain was not appointed until the *Civil War. Before that, American law required that chaplains be ordained by a "Christian denomination." With congressional support and following American Jewish advocacy, the legislation was amended to state that chaplains possess ordination from "some denomination." In 1862, President Abraham Lincoln appointed Rabbi Jacob Frankel as the first of three rabbis to serve as Civil War chaplains. Like their Christian counterparts, the rabbi-chaplains were tasked with facilitating ritual observance and *worship, teaching wartime moral conduct, and boosting morale. The modern American Jewish chaplaincy emerged in 1917, during preparations for the American entry into *World War I, when the *Jewish Welfare Board (JWB) was established to serve the religious needs of the 250,000 Jews then in the U.S. armed forces. Composed of the Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Associations and other national Jewish organizations – most significantly the Reform movement's Central Conference of American Rabbis and Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Conservative movement's United Synagogue of America, and the Union of Orthodox Congregations and Agudas ha-Rabbanim, the Orthodox rabbinical organization (see entries under JUDAISM) – the JWB was led by Cyrus Adler. Rabbi Elkan C. Voorsanger became the first rabbi commissioned as a chaplain and officer in 1917; he was followed by twenty-four others serving in the Army and Navy. Along with distributing ritual items including Bibles and mezzuzot, the rabbis created a uniquely multid denominational JWB prayer book.

In 1941, in response to the military build-up preceding World War II, the rabbinically led Committee on Army Navy Religious Affairs (CANRA) was established as a distinct organization within the JWB and was later expanded to include Orthodox and Conservative rabbinical organizations. The CANRA, chaired by Orthodox Rabbi David de Sola Pool, commissioned more than three hundred rabbi-chaplains. Across the United States and in every theater of war from Europe to the Pacific, they served the 500,000 Jews in the armed forces during World War II. Perhaps the CANRA's greatest challenge was responding to Jewish religious diversity. Although most servicemen were traditional in background, the majority of chaplains were Reform. However, despite profound differences over ritual practice and ideology, liturgy (see WORSHIP) and halakhah were adapted to wartime realities and divergent needs. In addition to providing ritual items, including revised *prayer books, the chaplains also endeavored to enable a modicum of accommodation to Jewish *dietary laws (kashrut) for Jewish servicemen. Although never again on the same scale as during World War II, the rabbinical chaplaincy has continued since then, meeting the needs of Jews in the armed services and fostering American religious ecumenism. For further reading, see B. W. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War (2001); A. I. Slomovitz, The Fighting Rabbis (1998); and P. S. Bernstein, Rabbis at War (1971). DANIEL M. BRONSTEIN

United States: Political Involvement. Except for the colonial period and the early years of the Republic, when Jewish voting rights were restricted and Jews could not hold office, Jews in the United States have enjoyed full political rights. In the early nineteenth century, Jews, concentrated in Atlantic port cities, generally supported the party of Thomas Jefferson and the Democratic Republicans.

The Jewish percentage of the population remained small until the arrival of immigrants from Central Europe in the mid-nineteenth century (see UNITED STATES: IMMIGRATION). Subsequently Jewish involvement in civic affairs was active, but tended to be at the local level, especially in small towns in the west, where many Jews were merchants (see UNITED STATES, WESTERN). On the eve of the Civil War (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR), sectionalism typically dictated Jewish partisan identification. In the south, Jews were Democrats, and they supported the Confederacy (see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN). In the north, they affiliated with the Whig Party and later the new Republican Party. In their quest for acceptance, southern Jews generally supported slavery. Although the majority of northern Jews were not abolitionists, some were fervent critics of slavery. Judah P. Benjamin (1811–1884) was the first Jewish senator, elected from Louisiana in 1853. An ardent states' rights advocate and defender of slavery, Benjamin served the Confederacy as Attorney General, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State. When the Confederacy surrendered, he fled to England.

The stresses of the Civil War provoked *antisemitism, generally expressed in allegations of treachery and charges of profiteering. In Kentucky, Union General Ulysses S. Grant accused Jews of smuggling and speculation and ordered them expelled. Jewish activists organized protest rallies in several northern cities. Under this political pressure, President Abraham Lincoln revoked the order. From this episode, Jews learned that, although antisemitism existed in America, they could fight back against such discrimination. For the next half-century, Jews generally voted Republican, the party of Lincoln, although they had not yet emerged as an identifiable political bloc.

In the nineteenth century, Jews exhibited an interest in politics that would come to exemplify their political behavior. Central European and later Eastern European Jewish immigrants at the local level worked as election workers and ward bosses in urban political machines. A few, such as Abe Reuf in *San Francisco, would lead citywide machines.

The vast numbers of Eastern European Jews who emigrated to the United States beginning in the 1880s expanded the Jewish impact and involvement in politics. Those immigrants, emigrating from industrial cities, had prior political experience with the Russian *Bund, which promoted a progressive agenda for the advancement of rights for workers. Many Jews were already imbued with the *Marxist philosophy apparent in the Socialist Labor Party. While Jews, especially in major urban centers such as *New York City, were politically liberal, most were not socialists or communists. However, a disproportionate and vocal percentage of the leaders of leftist and radical organizations in this era were Jews.

Many Jews were employed in the garment industry in New York City, an example for many radicals of the worst characteristics of industrial capitalism. The Jewish labor movement (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT), created and led by these radicals, also served as a political forum and movement, providing a foundation for Jewish political identity and action. Although women would not gain the right to vote until 1920, Eastern European Jewish women garment workers were in the forefront of the crusade for structural reforms and improved working conditions, efforts that often coincided with the Progressive movement. Some would join the fight for female suffrage, setting a precedent for the preponderance of Jewish involvement in the Second Wave of feminism in the 1960s (see later). Others were more radical. Rose Schneiderman (1882–1972), Pauline Newman (1889–1986), and Clara Lemlich Shavelson (1886–1982) were labor and women's rights advocates who devoted themselves to improving the conditions of working women. Anarchists, the political extreme among Eastern European Jews, were best epitomized by Emma Goldman (1869–1940), a polemicist, labor organizer, enemy of capitalism and militarism, and crusader for social and economic justice, who was deported to Russia in 1919.

In the early twentieth century, Eastern European Jews comprised nearly 40% of those who voted for Socialist Party candidates. One was Meyer London (1871–1926), elected to represent the Lower East Side of New York City in Congress in 1914. Beginning with the election of Woodrow Wilson in 1912 and continuing through the 1920s, this voting behavior would begin to change as urban Jews voted increasingly for Democratic Party candidates. In 1928, they gave an unprecedented percentage of their votes to Al Smith, the party nominee. Others would continue voting socialist until 1932, when their support for Franklin D. Roosevelt marked the beginning of overwhelming Jewish support for the Democratic Party. Jewish radicals, influenced by the despair of the Great Depression, would continue to comprise 40% of the membership in the American Communist Party in the 1930s. Ultimately, however, pragmatists among radical leaders recognized that progressive reforms were more appealing to Jewish voters than the goal of restructuring society. Jewish defections from the Communist Party began with the antisemitic persecutions and imprisonments in the Soviet Union during the Stalinist era. Desertions from the party accelerated with the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939, and Jewish support of communism generally ended with the persecution of leftists in the anti-communist crusade of the early Cold War years.

In the aftermath of *World War II, amid revelations of the *Holocaust and the recognition that American Jews had been unable to persuade President Roosevelt to do more to help European Jewry, Jews became active political advocates for U.S. recognition of the State of *Israel. Although President Harry S. Truman did not send arms shipments to the new nation, the importance of the Jewish vote, among other issues, persuaded him to recognize Israel. For many Jews, the American relationship with Israel remains the primary factor influencing their political behavior. This collective voice, along with the lobbying effectiveness of the American Israel Political Action Committee (AIPAC), has ensured American support for Israel (see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA).

Throughout the twentieth century, Jews held leadership positions in national civil rights organizations (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT). Jews formed a significant segment of the white, northern civil rights activists working in the south for voting rights and against segregation in the 1950s and 1960s. In creating a more just society, many Jewish activists believed they would help ensure a society that was welcoming to Jews. In the 1960s, many among the New Left were of Jewish background. On university campuses, Jews constituted nearly half of the national membership of the Students for a Democratic Society; similarly, Jews made up a disproportionate share of those who protested the Vietnam War.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Jewish women, liberal and well educated, played an important leadership role in the second wave of the feminist movement. They demanded equality, an end to discrimination, and control over their own bodies, among other issues. Betty Friedan (1921–2006), author of The Feminine Mystique (1963) and co-founder of the National Organization for Women, advocated for expanded public roles for women. Jewish feminists involved in the women's rights movement would also address the role of women within Judaism (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). Jewish women serving in the U.S. Congress, such as Congresswoman Bella Abzug (1920–1998; D-New York) and Senator Barbara Boxer (D-California), have worked to advance issues relevant to all women.

In recent years, the neoconservative movement has attracted prominent Jewish proponents. Some were former Marxist intellectuals who shifted to the right in response to the social ferment of the 1960s. By the 1980s, many supported the Cold War policies of President Ronald Reagan. In the early twenty-first century, neoconservatives were important figures in the construction of an activist American foreign policy and a strong national defense.

Nevertheless, except for 1980, when Jews turned against President Jimmy Carter on issues related to his policies toward Israel, the economy, and the Iranian hostage crisis, Jews have voted overwhelmingly Democratic in all presidential elections since 1932, and they have become an influential and key constituency group within the party. Only in local and statewide elections, on specific financial or public policy issues, have significant numbers of Jews cast votes for centrist Republican candidates. Despite economic advancement, social acceptance, and suburbanization, American Jews, more than any other religious and ethnic group, remain consistently liberal. They vote for Democratic candidates in national elections on questions of civil liberties, civil rights, and social justice for the disadvantaged. Except for those who are religiously traditional, a group that is increasing in size and influence, Jews strongly support the separation of church and state, public education, and *abortion rights. They continue to be disproportionately involved in politics as generous campaign contributors, political fundraisers, and informed and frequent voters; in large urban states, they form a critical group within the electorate. In recent decades, Jews have been elected to state and national office in increasing numbers. In 2000, Senator Joseph Lieberman (D-Connecticut) was the vice-presidential candidate on the Democratic presidential ticket.

For further reading, see M. Dollinger, Quest for Inclusion: Jews and Liberalism in Modern America (2000); L. S. Maisel, Jews in American Politics: Essays (2003); and M. E. Staub, Torn at the Roots: The Crisis of American Liberalism in Postwar America (2002).

ARLENE LAZAROWITZ

United States Presidents. From the first years of the Republic, American Jews looked to American presidents to support their right to practice *Judaism and to guarantee their inclusion in the body politic. Several *synagogues sent letters to the first president, expressing uncertainty about their status in the new nation. In an often quoted letter, President George Washington assured “the children of the Stock of Abraham” they would be safe to practice Judaism (see NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND). Thomas Jefferson championed equal political rights for Jews, not because of his particular respect for Judaism, but because he respected the rights of all to hold disparate religious beliefs.

Until the mid-nineteenth century, very few American Jews were named to federal positions. An exception was the appointment in 1813 by President James Madison of Mordecai Noah as ambassador to Tunis, the first diplomatic post awarded to a Jew. Given American difficulties with Barbary pirates, this was an important position. However, the State Department recalled Noah two years later because of protests from Muslim Tunisia over the appointment of a Jew. Although anti-Jewish sentiments may have deterred other appointments, this is the only case when overtly antisemitic reasons were cited in rescinding a Jewish presidential appointment.

The upheavals of the *Civil War also exposed antisemitic feelings. By this time, immigration from *Central Europe had augmented the Jewish population. When General Ulysses Grant issued Order Number 11, expelling Jews from areas of Kentucky for alleged profiteering, Jews appealed to President Abraham Lincoln, who revoked the order (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR). When Grant was elected president after the Civil War, he maintained good relations with American Jews.

The vast immigration of *Eastern European Jews in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries gave Jews increased political influence. President Theodore Roosevelt selected Oscar Straus (see STRAUS FAMILY) for his cabinet, the first such appointment of a Jew. President Woodrow Wilson took the political risk of appointing Louis *Brandeis, an outspoken reformer, to the Supreme Court. Brandeis played an important role in persuading Wilson to support the *Balfour Declaration, a British statement of support for an eventual Jewish homeland in *Palestine, despite opposition from the State Department and his other advisors. In response, in 1916, a substantial number of Jews, who had generally voted Republican, the party of Lincoln, voted for Wilson.

The striking shift in Jewish voting behavior would occur during the Great Depression, when Jews overwhelmingly supported Franklin D. Roosevelt. Roosevelt's New Deal programs benefited Jews, and the New Deal also granted Jews leadership roles in government agencies and as advisors. As the size of the federal bureaucracy increased, Roosevelt appointed more Jews to government positions than all prior presidents combined. Roosevelt's response to the *Holocaust and American reluctance to admit significant numbers of European Jews to the United States remain controversial. Many question whether Roosevelt did as much as he could to assist Jewish refugees. Under pressure to address the Jewish refugee crisis, he convened a conference of world leaders at Evian-les-Bains, France in 1938, but it did not offer any solutions. Throughout the war, the State Department actively obstructed Jewish immigration, even though the government was well informed about *Nazi plans to exterminate European Jews. Roosevelt did not establish the War Refugee Board until 1944. More recently, Robert Rosen has maintained that the climate of the times explains Roosevelt's cautious approach. Antisemitic feelings were pervasive in the 1930s and many Americans blamed Jews for the Depression. The anti-immigrant sentiment that led to the 1924 legislation that restricted immigration to the United States from Eastern and Southern Europe remained high, and there was popular feeling that Jews were pressuring the United States into war with *Germany (see HOLOCAUST: UNITED STATES JEWISH RESPONSE).

After *World War II, Jewish political efforts, combined with the shock of revelations about the Holocaust, persuaded President Harry S. Truman to recognize *Israel in 1948, despite opposition from the State Department. When war broke out between Israel and the Arab states, however, Truman embargoed any arms sales to Israel.

Since 1948, Israel has dominated the relationship between Jews and American presidents. The Eisenhower administration generally sided with Arabs in the region. President John F. Kennedy departed from this policy when he sold Hawk anti-aircraft defensive missiles to Israel. President Lyndon B. Johnson had good relations with American Jews, who had become adept at lobbying for Israel. In the period before and after the 1967 Six Day War, Johnson developed a special patron-client relationship between the United States and Israel, an unwritten security guarantee that identified Israel as a critical strategic Cold War asset in the Middle East.

Few Jews voted for President Richard M. Nixon, whose aversion to Jews is evident in the antisemitic comments on the tapes of his White House conversations. Nevertheless, Nixon appointed Henry Kissinger, a Jew, as his national security advisor and later as Secretary of State. After the 1973 surprise Arab attack on Israel, Nixon sent weaponry that made a critical difference in Israel's ability to turn the tide.

President Jimmy Carter alienated important segments of the Jewish population. The praise he received in 1978 for his instrumental role in reaching a peace agreement between Israel and Egypt was eclipsed by his support for a Palestinian homeland. In his failed 1980 reelection bid, Carter received only 45% of the Jewish vote, which had been consistently Democratic since 1928. President Ronald Reagan, Carter's Republican successor, strengthened relations with Israel and had generally good relations with Jews. President Bill Clinton appointed Jews to his Cabinet, the Supreme Court, and ambassadorships; Jewish support for his administration was strong. Despite his often unquestioning support for the policies of the Israeli government, President George W. Bush did not have wide support among most American Jews. Aside from traditionally religious Jews, most did not share his conservative social agenda. According to exit poll data, 78% of Jewish voters supported Barack Obama in the 2008 presidential election.

For further reading, see D. G. Dalin and A. J. Kolatch, The Presidents of the United States and the Jews (2000); F. Hirschfeld, George Washington and the Jews (2005); and R. Rosen et al., Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Jews (2007).

ARLENE LAZAROWITZ

United States: Sephardim. *Sephardic Jews, descendants of those who had been expelled from Spain or who had become conversos in Spain or *Portugal, were the first Jews to arrive in the Americas. Fearing the *Inquisition, these Sephardic Jews had learned to practice crypto-Judaism, shedding all outward signs of Jewishness while creating new forms of Jewish practice that were invisible to the outside world. They took these traditions with them as they scattered to new locations where they were often welcomed because they were involved in international trade.

The road to Sephardic Jewish settlement in North America ran through Recife, *Brazil. In an effort to attract Jewish merchants to their colonies in Brazil, the Dutch government promised them the right to practice Judaism. Within a decade, the Jewish community had grown to between 1,000 and 1,450. When the Portuguese recaptured Brazil, however, Jews were given three months to leave. Although most went to *Amsterdam and the *Caribbean, in 1654 a small group of twenty-three arrived in New Amsterdam (which became *New York when the settlement was ultimately ceded to *Britain in 1674), marking the first Jewish settlement in what would become the United States.

These first American Jews were allowed to settle because of their economic networks. For example, New York's Jewish merchants traded goods as diverse as cotton, rum, bricks, and onions in the North American colonies, the Caribbean world, Europe, and beyond. One colonial Jew owned a fleet of ships and dealt in rum, textiles, lumber, and ginger throughout the world. Other merchants shipped goods like corn and lumber to *England and in turn imported English products. With such mercantile backgrounds, it is not surprising that these Sephardic Jews settled primarily in major port cities such as *Newport, Rhode Island; New York City; *Philadelphia; *Charleston, South Carolina; and Savannah, Georgia – all of which were somewhat tolerant of outsiders. They avoided other port cities, however, such as *Boston, which was particularly homogeneous and rather unwelcoming to immigrants, and New Orleans, which officially barred Jews from settlement. These Sephardic Jews also settled based on mercantile and familial ties.

Despite the importance of their trade, most Sephardic Jewish port city communities developed slowly, remaining small in size on the eve of the *American Revolution. The first twenty-three Jewish settlers in New York, for example, had grown to only about three hundred by the mid-eighteenth century. Similarly, Newport, the northernmost Sephardic Jewish community, which emerged in 1658 with fifteen families, had only approximately thirty families before 1776. Philadelphia's Jewish community did not begin to grow until the 1740s and 1750s; by 1770, it numbered only about a hundred. Charleston's Jewish community emerged in 1697 and by the second half of the eighteenth century had just fifty Jewish families. Jews also settled in Savannah beginning in 1733, but significant growth did not begin until the 1790s.

With a heritage of practicing Judaism either discreetly or clandestinely, Sephardic Jews in America sought to maintain the duality between their public and private religious lives. They were free to practice Judaism openly within their homes, so many kept *kosher kitchens and observed such rituals as kindling *Sabbath lights. Jews were also permitted to build *synagogues, so *worship was a key component of American Judaism. Yet, as they practiced Judaism in the private sphere, they also tried valiantly to shield Judaism from the public eye. For example, their synagogue buildings, although awe inspiring and beautiful on the inside, were very plain on the outside, hardly distinguishable from ordinary buildings. Moreover, the portraits of themselves that they commissioned showed virtually no outward signs of their Jewish heritage.

Although Sephardic Jews hoped to shield Judaism from the public eye, they soon discovered that such neat compartmentalization was impossible. They especially found conflicts with *dietary laws and Sabbath and *festival observance because the rhythms of daily life in America did not follow the Jewish calendar. Should an individual observe the Sabbath, turning away business on Saturdays while Christian neighbors could earn money? It was relatively easy to maintain dietary observances within one's own home, but should a Jew spurn the opportunity to break bread in the home of a Christian neighbor? Sephardic Jews were the first to face what would soon become the quintessential American Jewish dilemma – how to balance Judaism with the American environment.

After 1776, the dominance of the Sephardic Jews waned considerably. Old trade networks collapsed, the peddler replaced the merchant as the primary Jewish businessperson, and German Jewish immigration, and later East European Jewish immigration, overwhelmed the Sephardic community and its leadership (see UNITED STATES:

IMMIGRATION). Since then, Sephardim have been a significant minority of American Jews.

For further reading, see A. Ben-Ur, Sephardic Jews in America (2009); E. Faber, A Time for Planting: The First Migration, 1654–1820 (1992); J. Sarna, American Judaism (2004); and R. Brilliant and E. Smith, eds., Facing the New World: Jewish Portraits in Colonial and Federal America (1997).

MICHAEL R. COHEN

United States: South Florida. The 555,000 Jews in south Florida, including 255,000 in Palm Beach County, 186,000 in Broward County, and 113,000 in Miami, represent about 10% of the population of south Florida and the third highest percentage of Jews in any major U.S. metropolitan area; they also constitute almost 10% of Jews in the United States.

Jewish settlement began in the late 1890s when twenty-two Jews migrated to Miami from other U.S. locations; soon, twelve of the sixteen merchants in downtown Miami were Jewish. *Antisemitism severely restricted the residential options of south Florida's Jews in the 1920s and 1930s. However, by the early 1930s, a Jew served on the Miami Beach City Council, and by the early 1940s a Jew was elected mayor. Significant Jewish population growth occurred between 1950 and 1975, and Miami Beach, a place where Jews once faced significant discrimination, is now known as an important Jewish area throughout the world. In 2008, the Jewish population of Miami was 113,000, a significant decrease from a peak of more than 200,000 in 1975.

In the early 1900s, some Jewish merchants moved northwards into Broward County, and opened department stores. By 1923, however, there were still only seven Jewish families in the county. The first religious service was held in 1926, and the first *synagogue was built in 1937. Explosive growth in the Jewish population occurred in the 1970s and 1980s, but the Jewish population began a slow decline during the early 1990s, a decline that accelerated with the loss of 55,000 Jews from 1997–2008.

The first Jews settled in Palm Beach County in the 1890s, opening retail stores. In 1923, Temple Israel, a Reform congregation, was formed, and a Jew became mayor of the city of West Palm Beach that same year. The largest increases in south Florida's Jewish population occurred after *World War II, when Jews from the Northeast and Midwest moved in large numbers to Florida. In Palm Beach County, for example, more than half of the Jewish households derive from New York or New Jersey. In the late 1950s, thousands of Cuban Jews found refuge in south Florida. Problems in *Argentina, Columbia, Venezuela, and other *Latin American countries in the late 1990s bolstered the adult Hispanic Jewish population of south Florida to more than 15,000 persons. South Florida is also home to more than 22,000 *Israeli adults.

Three Jewish entrepreneurs started the first Century Village development in West Palm Beach in 1967, developing the concept of the large planned retirement community that has since spread throughout south Florida and attracted many Jewish full or part-time residents. About 275,000 elderly Jews live in the area. "Snowbirds," who spend three to seven months in Florida and the remainder of the year in the northeast or midwest, form more than 10% of the population. Explosive growth in the Jewish population occurred in the 1980s and 1990s. Much of the growth in the 2000s is occurring in Boynton Beach, which now has more Jews than St. Louis, Missouri. Miami Beach, North Miami Beach, and Boca Raton have significant concentrations of Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX). A recent collection of scholarly studies is A. Greenbaum, ed., Jews of South Florida (2005).

IRA M. SHESKIN

United States, Southern. Jews settled early and extensively in the American south, although rarely in large numbers. Generally welcomed, Jews influenced the south's society and economy beyond their numbers.

In colonial days, Jews settled on the southern coast as early as 1585, and communities formed in fledgling port cities. Trading networks linked Jewish traders to *Newport, Rhode Island, and to *New York City, to the *Caribbean, and to London (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN). In 1733, London's Bevis Marks congregation sponsored the immigration of forty-two poor, mostly *Sephardic Jews to Savannah; these settlers organized a *synagogue, Mickve Israel, in 1735. Jews had arrived in *Charleston in 1695, and in 1749 founded Kahal Kadosh (holy congregation) Beth Elohim. Baltimore had a Jewish cemetery by 1786, and Richmond Jews organized Beth Shalom congregation in 1789. Charleston's Jewish community of seven hundred was the nation's largest in 1820.

Although Maryland and North Carolina included religious requirements for citizenship in their state constitutions, Jews gained acceptance in those states. In 1775 Francis Salvador became the first American Jew elected to public office when he took a seat in the South Carolina Provincial Congress. David Emmanuel served as governor of Georgia in 1801. In 1845 David Yulee became Florida's first senator, and Judah P. Benjamin was elected to the Senate from Louisiana in 1852. Philanthropist Judah Touro (1775–1854) resided in New Orleans.

Jews followed the nation's expansion into the southern heartland. With the German immigration in the mid-nineteenth century (see UNITED STATES: IMMIGRATION), Jewish peddlers and merchants created commercial networks from Baltimore and Cincinnati along rivers, canals, roads, and railways. By 1860, cities like Louisville and New Orleans had Jewish populations of 2,000, and the Baltimore community had grown to 8,000. Alsatian and Bavarian Jews migrated up the Mississippi from New Orleans.

German Jews arrived as the south was developing a distinct regional identity in response to abolitionism. Jews owned and traded slaves, but not significantly. Their slaveholding was typical of their class and place as an urban people. When the Civil War came (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR), several thousand Jews fought for the Confederacy, and rabbis sermonized in support of states' rights. Judah P. Benjamin served in the Confederate cabinet.

In forming congregations, southern Jews followed tradition, first organizing benevolent societies and purchasing burial grounds. Charleston's Hebra [hevrah] Gemilut Hasadim Society of 1784 and its Hebrew Orphan Society of 1801 were the first such societies in America. As communities grew and prospered, these societies evolved into congregations. The Gemilath Chesed of Atlanta, founded in 1860, became the Hebrew Benevolent Congregation, later known as The Temple. Memphis dedicated a cemetery in 1847, followed by a benevolent society in 1850 and a congregation in 1853.

Southern Jews lived distant from communal and rabbinic authority. Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: UNITED STATES) in America began in Charleston in 1824 when twenty-four young Jews, led by playwright Isaac Harby, organized the Reformed Society of Israelites that sought to rationalize theology and introduce Protestant decorum into worship. In 1840, Abraham Rice, the first ordained American rabbi, arrived in Baltimore, but his Orthodoxy was countered by German-born Rabbi David *Einhorn, who advocated radical Reform. When Isaac Mayer *Wise of Cincinnati convened a Union of American Hebrew Congregations in 1873, nearly half the delegates were southerners. The Conference of Rabbis of Southern Congregations, founded in 1885, endorsed the Pittsburgh Platform that espoused classical Reform Judaism. By 1900 almost three-quarters of the South's Jewish communities had a Reform temple. Rabbi Edward B. M. Browne published a newspaper, The Jewish South (1877–ca. 1881), which reported from 177 communities in thirteen states. An 1878 census listed 290 southern towns with Jewish populations, comprising nearly one-fifth of America's Jews.

From the 1880s to 1920s, some two million East European Jews immigrated to America; of these, a small but persistent number headed south. The Galveston Plan directed 10,000 immigrants to Texas after 1907 (see also ZANGWILL, ISRAEL). Levantine Jews settled in Mobile and Atlanta. East European Jews spread across the region, and by 1927 fourteen southern cities claimed more than 1,000 Jews. Atlanta's Rabbi Tobias Geffen, a Lithuanian immigrant, served as religious arbiter for Orthodox Jewry in the south.

Jewish peddlers, merchants, and capitalists were instrumental in helping create an urban and commercial New South after the Civil War. The Burdine, Godchaux, Hecht, Maas, Rich, and Thalhimer families became department store magnates in urban centers. Jewish industrialists like the Cone brothers of Greensboro, North Carolina, built textile mills that transformed the region. With the New South came a new color line that reordered racial and social relations. In Louisiana and Mississippi mobs of angry farmers burned the stores of Jewish merchants who held crop liens. In 1913 a Jewish factory manager in Atlanta, Leo Frank, was wrongly convicted of murdering a child laborer, a girl from a farm family. Two years later, after the Georgia governor overturned the unjust verdict, a mob lynched Frank. In the 1920s, a revived Ku Klux Klan often mixed *antisemitism into its racist, anti-Catholic rhetoric.

Yet, Jews, as white people, met wide acceptance. Southern universities were less inclined to impose quotas than some of their northern counterparts (see UNITED STATES: HIGHER EDUCATION). During *World War II Jews flocked to growing cities and camp towns as the Roosevelt administration built military bases and industrial installations in the south. In the post-war years, southern Jews, like Jews nationally, prospered, and the region saw new Jewish institution building.

However, Jewish comfort as acculturated southerners was challenged by the *civil rights movement. A few Jews were prominent segregationists, but others, like attorney Morris Abrams and journalist Harry Golden, forthrightly advocated integration. While national Jewish defense agencies endorsed desegregation and northern Jews were disproportionate among white activists, southern Jews spoke quietly, fearing a white backlash. In the 1950s, racial extremists bombed synagogues, most notably The Temple in Atlanta.

Southern Jews remained linked to global Jewry through affiliates of B'nai B'rith and the National Council of Jewish Women (see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA; ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA). With its German and Reform heritage, the south is often described as non- or anti-Zionist, but important *Zionist leaders, including Louis *Brandeis of Louisville and Henrietta *Szold of Baltimore, emerged from the region. Zionist societies were established in six southern states by 1900, and *Hadassah counted twenty-four chapters in 1933. By 1913, Atlanta, Baltimore, Dallas, Little Rock, Memphis, and New Orleans had organized Jewish federations. In the early twenty-first century, the Jewish Federations of North America has fifty-six affiliates in the south.

Whether southern Jewry reflects a unique culture that differs from the American Jewish mainstream is a contentious topic. Eli Evans in The Provincials: A Personal History of Jews in the South (rev. ed., 2005) and Alfred Uhry in his play, Driving Miss Daisy, portray a culturally distinct people. Local and regional Jewish heritage societies have proliferated, and Jewish museums featuring local history can be found in a half-dozen cities. In 1976, a Southern Jewish Historical Society was organized, and an Institute for Southern Jewish Life located near Jackson, Mississippi, serves regional communities. Day schools, high schools, summer camps, Jewish Community Centers, and academic Jewish studies programs have proliferated.

As a region once noted for its racial and economic backwardness was transformed into the prosperous Sunbelt, Jews, like other Americans headed southward. Communities in Sunbelt cities have grown exponentially, while those in agrarian small towns have languished. Almost one-quarter of America's Jews now reside in the south. Atlanta holds some 100,000 Jews, and the south Florida communities of Miami and Boca Raton-West Palm Beach rank among the nation's largest, although they are culturally northern (see UNITED STATES: SOUTH FLORIDA). A core of self-identifying southern Jews with generational roots in the region persists, but the larger number comprises relative newcomers who migrated to the south to retire, to enjoy the lifestyle, or to find economic opportunity. For further reading, see M. I. Goldberg and M. Ferris, eds., Jewish Roots in Southern Soil: A New History (2006). LEONARD ROGOFF

United States, Western. Providing the catalyst for western settlement, the California Gold Rush of 1849 coincided with heightened Jewish *immigration to the United States. The growing economy drew both men and women from the eastern United States, *Poland, *Britain, *Central Europe, and *France. All joined in creating diverse Jewish communities in the west. Like the well-known Levi Strauss, who arrived in California in 1853, many Jews became merchants, selling necessities to miners and settlers. By the 1870s, California's Jewish population numbered more than 20,000, more than any other state outside of New York. These first settlers established a strong, diverse community that provided the framework for all that followed. After the rush, Jewish immigration slowed, but never stopped; at the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, the second largest Jewish urban population in the United States is in *Los Angeles and its environs.

In contrast to Jewish immigrants in the eastern United States, most Jews who settled in the west were already acculturated to American life because many had already gained English-language skills and citizenship. In the west, where all were newcomers and there was no Protestant hegemony, Jews participated in civil leadership, becoming mayors, judges, and educators, even while they were founding Jewish community life. *San Francisco, the major port and an instant city, became the nineteenth-century center for western Jewry. With a population that had reached 3,000 by 1855, San Francisco's Jews built a complex community life, including social, religious, educational, and fraternal organizations. Often, chain migration brought brothers, sisters, and cousins to the area as well. It was common for one family member to remain in San Francisco while others established stores in other parts of the region; relying on extended families, western Jews built regional businesses and social networks. In San Francisco, men bought merchandise, made social and business connections, and frequently found wives. Before the twentieth century, the majority of the observant settled in San Francisco, where they could take advantage of *synagogues, kosher butchers, and community organizations. San Francisco's Jewish newspapers, including The Gleaner, and The Hebrew, informed the region and beyond about western life. To serve their community, San Francisco Jews organized an orphan asylum (1871) and a Jewish hospital (1887).

Jews traveled readily among western cities. By 1868, a transcontinental rail terminus sat in Oakland, just across the bay from San Francisco. Some who chose to leave San Francisco settled in the mining towns and river cities that dotted the region, establishing shops and participating in establishing local governments, and also organizing Jewish institutions such as benevolent societies and a few congregations. Others settled in the burgeoning urban centers, including San Diego, Los Angeles, Portland, and Seattle. When these cities grew and prospered, so did their Jewish communities.

Many western communities organized benevolent and burial societies, soon followed by congregations. The history of these early congregations illustrates the distinguishing features of western cities. San Francisco's Emanu-El started as an Orthodox congregation in 1851; a little more than a decade later, it began to introduce reforms. Seating became family style, rather than gender segregated, and the *Torah was read in three-year rather than yearly cycles. Many of Emanu-El's merchant founders gained success in the community, moving from dry goods stores to nationally known companies. The founders of the Alaska Commercial Company and Levi Strauss, the manufacturer of denim jeans, all joined Emanu-El. Successful financially, they became philanthropists, funding the orphan asylum, the hospital, and settlement houses. Its members supported the theaters, museums, and music venues. Although the members of other congregations played important roles in community development, the names of Emanu-El's members mark the prominent parks, buildings, and cultural institutions of the city. However, the community has always been diverse. Today, a multiplicity of Reform, Reconstructionist, Conservative, Orthodox, gay, and Renewal congregations (see JUDAISM entries), and Jewish *community centers serve the city's multifaceted Jewry.

In Los Angeles, Congregation B'nai B'rith (known as Wilshire Boulevard Temple), for many years defined that city's Jewry for the outside world. Founded as Orthodox in 1862, it soon became more liberal. With connections to founding families as well as members of the film elite, B'nai B'rith was an influential place. This status was reinforced by the 1915 hiring of the flamboyant Edgar Magnin, who served as the congregation's rabbi for more than 60 years. Magnin, a western native with an outgoing style, became the embodiment of Los Angeles Jewry for Angelinos. However, although it was the most visible, B'nai B'rith was only one of many congregations. Continued immigration from the eastern United States, Europe, *Iran, and *Israel led to the establishment of a wide variety of synagogues, organizations, and institutions representing all elements of Jewry, including *Sephardic, *Habad, and *secularist. Los Angeles became the center of western Jewish life in the twentieth century and is home to premier institutions, among them *Hebrew Union College, the American Jewish University, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and the Skirball Cultural Center (see MUSEUMS).

Reflecting the interconnections among western communities, the Jews of Portland, Oregon, maintained close ties with San Francisco Jewry. Reform congregation Beth Israel, founded in Portland in 1858, even adopted Emanu-El's constitution. Later congregations mirrored the origins of their founders from Posen, Russia, and Sephardic communities. Eastern European immigrants built a significant community in south Portland, with stores and institutions that catered to the early-twentieth-century immigrants. Jewish Seattle also formed commercial and social networks with Jews in other western cities. In addition to its *Central European founders, Seattle became home to a Sephardic community from Rhodes and Marmara, as well as to Eastern European Jews. As a port city, Seattle attracted immigrants who formed their own community organizations and synagogues. Unlike those in other western cities, Seattle's first Jewish house of worship was Reform, while Orthodox and Sephardic congregations developed later and built ethnic communities.

Although Jews settled predominantly in cities, exceptions did exist. Some lived in small towns and others in agricultural communities, most notably in New Odessa, Oregon, and in Petaluma, California (see UNITED STATES: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS).

Scholars have noted that Jewish innovation often starts in the west and moves eastward. Florence Prag Kahn (1866–1948), the first Jewish congresswoman, hailed from San Francisco. In 1890 the charismatic female Jewish journalist, Rachel (Ray) Frank (1861–1948), a San Francisco native, preached a High Holiday sermon in Spokane, Washington; she was hailed in the press as “the girl Rabbi of the Golden West” (see RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN). Jewish adventurers and nonconformists helped build western communities. The open west, with little antisemitism, facilitated Jewish success in commercial, philanthropic, and political spheres and fostered Jewish diversity as well.

For further reading, see A. F. Kahn, Jewish Voices of the California Gold Rush: A Documentary History, 1849–1880 (2002); idem, E. Eisenberg, and W. Toll, Jews of the Pacific Coast:

Reinventing Community on America's Edge (2010); and W. Toll, The Making of an Ethnic Middle Class: Portland Jewry over Four Generations (1982).

AVA FRAN KAHN

Urban Life. No aspect of human activity has been as significant in the shaping of modern Jewish history as urban life. In the relatively free and open atmosphere of the modern cities that emerged in Europe and America in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Jews were strongly influenced by and influenced the currents of political, social, economic, and cultural change that arose in the wake of the French and Industrial Revolutions.

Jewish communities could already be found in the developing cities of medieval Europe. In the early modern era, Jews played an important role in the economic growth of cities, although they were generally restricted in their mobility, their professions, and their places of residence. With their *emancipation in Western and *Central Europe in the nineteenth century, individual Jews found new opportunities for individual advancement in major capitals like *Berlin, Paris (see FRANCE: 1789–1939), London (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN), and *Vienna.

Urban Jews tended to gravitate toward those businesses and professions that were increasingly in demand among the growing European middle class, such as ready-made clothing and retailing and the liberal professions of law, education, and *medicine. They were also active in movements of political change and in the Modernist cultural movements that flourished in cities. Although most governments no longer placed restrictions on where they could live, Jews in urban areas continued in large part to socialize with and live among other Jews.

As Jews slowly integrated into Western and Central European society, the relative openness of urban life led to changes in both individual and collective thought and behavior. Traditional Jewish observance loosened its hold on young men and women, and movements of religious reform arose that sought to find a balance between commitment to Judaism and participation in the larger world. Influenced by *secularizing tendencies that were increasingly evident in European cities, some Jews created new forms of collective identity that rested on cultural and ethnic ties rather than religious observance. As a result, Jewish communities became increasingly pluralistic and decentralized.

In *Eastern Europe, the pace of Jewish urbanization in the nineteenth century was far slower, due in large part to the many restrictions placed on Jews by tsarist regimes. Nevertheless, small circles of young intellectuals who had managed to escape the Russian *Pale of Settlement took advantage of the opportunities offered them in cities like Odessa, *Vilna, and *Saint Petersburg to create a modern Hebrew and later Yiddish *literature. The outbreak of the Russian Revolution in 1917 lifted many of the limits that had previously been placed on Jews and allowed significant numbers to participate in the modernization of Soviet society in urban settings.

In North America, Jews settled in major port cities during the colonial era. The arrival of hundreds of thousands of *immigrants from *Germany and later from Eastern Europe in the nineteenth century strengthened Jewish urban life in the *United States. Beginning in the 1880s, Polish and Russian Jews congregated in areas like the Lower East Side of

*New York City, where they developed their own distinctive social, economic, and cultural life. After *World War II, the lure of new economic opportunities, affordable housing, and quality education for their children led American Jews to move to the suburbs. By the 1970s, American Jews were migrating beyond the suburbs to the “exurbs,” as well as to new urban and suburban communities in western, southwestern, and southeastern states (see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN; UNITED STATES, WESTERN).

Jewish urban concentration led to a backlash in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. In Germany and France, the association of Jews with urban life was a central theme of a new and virulent *antisemitism, especially among more traditional elements of the lower middle class who viewed the modern city as a center of moral corruption and decay. Within the Jewish community, newly created *Zionist movements condemned what they regarded as the parasitic and physically debilitating nature of urban Jewish life and preached the virtues of agricultural labor in communal farms in *Palestine. Yet the attractions of the city continued to draw Jews. It is not coincidental that the State of *Israel has one of the most highly concentrated urban populations in the world.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, the cities of Europe and America no longer have the magnetic appeal they once had for Jews. Jews have largely abandoned the “inner city”; their apartments, stores, and houses of worship have been taken over by newer immigrants from Africa and Asia. Those who remain represent differing and contrasting populations including *Ultra-Orthodox communities, newer immigrants from the former *Soviet Union, young professionals, and growing numbers of retirees.

For further reading, see E. Lederhendler, New York Jews and the Decline of Urban Ethnicity, 1950–1970 (2001); D. D. Moore, To the Golden Cities: Pursuing the American Jewish Dream in Miami and L.A. (1994); and “People of the City: Jews and the Urban Challenge,” Studies in Contemporary Jewry 15 (1999).

DAVID WEINBERG

V

Venice. While there is evidence from as early as the tenth century that Jewish merchants did business in the Italian city of Venice, the first Jewish settlements were not established until the thirteenth century. They were located on the island of Spinalonga (later called the Giudecca), away from the main part of the city. The first group of Jews allowed to live within central Venice were money lenders, who had been granted a charter in 1382. However, they left Venice in 1397 when their charter was not renewed. Any Jew who entered Venice was required to wear a yellow circle on his outer clothing; this was changed to a yellow head-covering in 1496.

In 1509, after numerous Jews living on the Venetian mainland fled across the lagoon to Venice in the face of invading armies, the government realized that allowing them to stay in the city would be doubly beneficial. They could provide the hard-pressed treasury with annual payments, and their pawnbroking services were convenient for the urban poor. Consequently, in 1513 the Venetian government granted the Jews a charter allowing them to lend money; that permission was periodically renewed until the end of the Venetian Republic in 1797 (see MONEY LENDING: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE).

However, many Venetians, especially clerics, objected to Jews residing throughout the city, so in 1516 the Senate required all Jews to move to the island known as the Ghetto Nuovo (new ghetto), which was walled up and provided with two gates that were locked from sunset to sunrise. The word “*ghetto,” which is of Venetian origin, initially referred to a municipal copper foundry (il geto) that ceased operation in the mid-fifteenth century. The area where it had been located became known as the Ghetto Vecchio (old ghetto); the foundry dumping grounds across the canal was called the Ghetto Nuovo. The word “ghetto” then became the common designation for the many compulsory, segregated, and enclosed Jewish quarters established throughout Catholic *Reformation *Italy.

In 1541, visiting Levantine Jewish merchants complained to the Venetian government that they did not have sufficient space in the Ghetto Nuovo. Because of their importance in trade with the East, the government assigned them the Ghetto Vecchio, which was also walled up with a gate at each end. In the following decades, many New Christians (conversos*) who had left *Spain and *Portugal settled in Venice. The government usually did not concern itself with the origin and background of those New Christians as long as they resided as Jews in the ghetto. In 1589, in response to the serious decline in Venetian maritime commerce, the government issued a ten-year safe-conduct charter allowing both Levantine Jewish merchants and New Christian merchants from the *Iberian Peninsula to settle in Venice as Venetian subjects. Euphemistically referring to the New Christian merchants as Ponentine, meaning “western” Jews, rather than as New Christians, the government required them to reside in the ghetto and wear the special Jewish head covering.

Venice became a vibrant center of Jewish culture. Several *synagogues using the Italian, *Sephardi, and Levantine rites were established, and the community maintained a cemetery, established in 1386, on the Lido. Among well-known rabbis was the prolific Leon *Modena (1571–1648). His numerous works include a remarkably frank autobiography written in Hebrew that recorded the everyday life, practices, and values of the Jews in early modern Venice, including their extensive relationships with their Christian neighbors on all levels, from intellectual exchanges to joint participation in alchemy experiments and gambling. Venice also became a major center of Jewish *printing, especially in Hebrew.

By the eighteenth century, Venice had declined economically, and the financial condition of the Jewish community declined accordingly. In 1722, the Venetian government, concerned because it needed the Jewish community to provide loans, established the Inquisitorato sopra l’Università degli Ebrei to restore and maintain the Jewish community’s financial solvency and to promote the smooth functioning of its money-lending operations.

The French occupation of Venice in May 1797 led to the abolition of the restrictions on the Jews, the destruction of the ghetto gates, and freedom from wearing the special head covering. When *Habsburg Austria took control of Venice later that same year, it reinstituted some restrictions, but not the ghetto. In 1805, when Venice became a part of the Napoleonic kingdom of Italy, the rights of the Jews were restored. The Austrians returned in 1814 and so did many restrictions against Jews. The Republic of Venice led by Daniele Manin, who was of Jewish descent and appointed two Jewish ministers, briefly restored Jewish rights during the Revolution of 1848–49. Yet it was only after Venice became a part of the emerging kingdom of *Italy in 1866 that the Jews received complete *emancipation. In the following decades, the size of the Jewish community decreased because of emigration and intermarriage. Deportations during the *Holocaust further reduced the population. Today, Venice has an active Jewish community of around 500 members. It holds services in the old synagogues and sponsors a Jewish museum and bookstore in the ghetto.

For further reading, see B. Ravid, “The Venetian Government and the Jews,” in The Jews of Early Modern Venice, ed. R. C. Davis and B. Ravid (2001), 3–30; idem, Studies on the Jews of Venice, 1382–1797 (2003); and U. Fortis, The Ghetto on the Lagoon, rev. ed. (2000); see also SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. Map 8

BENJAMIN RAVID

Verbermacher, Hannah Rachel (ca. 1815–1895), known in *Hasidism as “the Holy Maid of Ludomir,” is one of the few *women who achieved a position of religious leadership in any form of Judaism before the twentieth century. The only child of a wealthy merchant, Hannah was unusually well educated and demonstrated exceptional piety, studying holy texts and adopting religious practices ordinarily reserved for men. After she had a mystical vision, the young Hannah broke off her engagement and devoted herself to learning and prayer. When her father died, she used her sizable inheritance to build a study house with an attached dwelling in Ludomir, where she lived in complete solitude. She soon acquired a reputation for saintliness and miracle working, attracting both men and women to her “court,” where she delivered learned lectures on the *Sabbath from behind a door.

Verbmacher’s achievements reflect a profound spirituality that found communal expression despite a lack of leadership, contemplative, or ascetic options for women in her society. Her success was facilitated by her personal wealth and the cultural influences of a larger Christian environment familiar with “holy maidens” and female saints, but it certainly did not go unopposed. Hannah’s rejection of a conventional female role presented a direct affront to the Hasidic leaders of her region, who believed that Jewish women should serve as enablers of their husbands’ religious activities. Ultimately Hannah acceded to rabbinic pressure and entered into two brief and unsuccessful marriages. Although apparently unconsummated, these marriages had the intended result of ending her religious leadership. Hannah spent the latter part of her life in the Land of Israel where she was involved with mystical and messianic circles and continued to attract followers; nothing she may have written survives. A recent study is N. Deutsch, The Maiden of Ludmir: A Jewish Holy Woman and Her World (2003).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Vienna, the capital of the *Habsburg Monarchy until 1918 and of the Austrian Republic afterward, contained one of the largest and most creative European Jewish communities in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The site of a Jewish community in the late Middle Ages and again in the Early Modern period, Vienna expelled its Jews in 1670 and thereafter refused to allow Jewish settlement in the city. Despite this ban, wealthy Jews could purchase residence rights. In the 1820s, 135 Jews possessed the right of “toleration”; including their families, servants, and employees, Vienna’s Jewish population numbered 2,000–4,000. The community grew substantially after the Revolution of 1848, when restrictions on Jewish movement and residence in Vienna were lifted. Jews migrated to Vienna from the Habsburg provinces of Bohemia and Moravia (today’s *Czech Republic); from *Hungary, especially from western Hungary and western Slovakia; and, beginning in the 1890s, from *Galicia, the region of southern *Poland that Austria annexed at the end of the eighteenth century. In 1910, 175,318 Jews lived in Vienna, forming 8% of the total population. During World War I, tens of thousands of Jewish refugees fled to Vienna when the Russian army invaded Galicia. In the interwar years, about 200,000 Jews resided in the city.

All restrictions against Jews ended in the 1860s, culminating in *emancipation in 1867. Jews entered all branches of *commerce, and some became industrialists, mostly in textiles, clothing, and furniture manufacture. Many became commercial employees – clerks, salesmen, and managers – and some entered the professions, especially *medicine and law. Jews attended the public schools, including the elite secondary schools and the university, in very large numbers. They adopted an identity as German Austrians, loyal to the Habsburg Monarchy and devoted to German culture. A very large percentage of Vienna’s writers, journalists, intellectuals, and composers, including Arthur Schnitzler, Stefan Zweig, Sigmund *Freud, Gustav Mahler, and Arnold Schoenberg, were Jews or of Jewish origin (see LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE).

Although some Jews attempted to assimilate utterly, even converting to Christianity, most remained Jews. Despite a decline in the level of Jewish religious observance, Jewish religious life flourished, both in the modernized traditionalism of the community’s *synagogues and in the small synagogues that catered to religiously observant Jews. Most Jews lived in three contiguous districts, one of which, the Leopoldstadt, was affectionately called Die Mazzesinsel (the island of matzah) because so many Jews lived there. Jews also created many charitable, social, and political organizations in which they could articulate various forms of Jewish identity and socialize primarily with other Jews.

Vienna was the birthplace of Jewish nationalism. In 1883, a group of Jewish university students led by Nathan Birnbaum created Kadimah, the first Jewish nationalist dueling fraternity. Vienna was also the home of Theodor *Herzl, founder of political *Zionism. Although Zionism was a minority movement during Herzl’s lifetime, it nevertheless attracted many young Jews. By 1932, Zionists formed the majority on the board of the Jewish community of Vienna.

Zionism flourished in Vienna because of the model provided by other national movements in the Habsburg Monarchy and also in reaction to *antisemitism in local politics. Led by Karl Lueger, Vienna’s Christian Social Party, which catered to the resentments of lower-middle-class artisans, shopkeepers, and low-level civil servants, won a majority of seats on the Vienna City Council in 1895; it held a majority until 1919. Lueger served as mayor of Vienna from 1897 until his death in 1910. Although the city government did not enact any anti-Jewish measures, antisemitic rhetoric permeated political life and made Jews nervous about their place in Viennese society.

In the interwar period, the situation deteriorated as Jews confronted rising antisemitism in the rump Austrian Republic and, after 1933, the threat of a *Nazi takeover. Ultimately, the Christian Social government of Austria, which opposed the Nazis, proved incapable of preventing Austrian Nazis and their German allies from arranging the union (Anschluss) of Austria with *Germany in March 1938. Immediately afterward, the Nazis imposed the anti-Jewish measures that were already in place in Germany, pushing Jews out of culture, public life, and the economy. Adolf Eichmann, the head of the Jewish section of the Gestapo, came to Vienna to organize Jewish emigration. Many Jews managed to get visas for *Palestine, *Britain, and the *United States, but at least half could not do so. In 1942, the remaining Jews in Vienna were deported to the death camps, often via *Theresienstadt or a ghetto in *Poland (see HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS).

A small Jewish community formed in Vienna after World War II, comprised of people who had successfully hidden or returned from the camps, as well as survivors from *Eastern Europe. Later arrivals included refugees from *Hungary in 1956 and the *Soviet Union in the 1970s. By 2000, the approximately 8,000 Jews in Vienna maintained all the institutions of a flourishing Jewish community. For further reading, see M. L. Rozenblit, The Jews of Vienna, 1867–1914: Assimilation and Identity (1983); and H. P. Freidenreich, Jewish Politics in Vienna, 1918–1938 (1991).

MARSHA L. ROZENBLIT

Vilna (Wilno in Polish, Vilnius in Lithuanian) was the capital of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from 1325 and of the Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic from 1940–91; it has been the capital of independent Lithuania since 1991 (see BALTIC STATES). Jewish Vilna was celebrated for its scholarship, its *Hebrew and *Yiddish literature and press, its religious creativity, and its political activism.

An organized Jewish community existed in Vilna by 1568, and by the late eighteenth century, the city was a hub of Torah study. The rabbinic leader Elijah ben Solomon Zalman, known as the Vilna Gaon, and his followers influenced developments in both halakhah and Kabbalah*. The Gaon's Hasidic* opponents also maintained a strong presence in the city. In the 1800s, Vilna was simultaneously a center of the Haskalah* (the Jewish Enlightenment) and of traditional yeshivot*, including one established by the Musar* movement. Despite this vibrant Jewish activity, *antisemitism was a constant reality. Maps 8, 11

In the late nineteenth century, a census found more than 60,000 Jews in Vilna, more than 40% of the city's population. Local authorities and *Russian imperial rulers discouraged Jewish participation in government; overcrowding and lack of economic opportunities led to high *immigration, mainly to the *United States and South Africa. Many Jews who remained were involved in Jewish political movements; the Jewish socialist Bund was founded in Vilna, and the city was also a headquarters of political Zionism*. The Historical Ethnographic Society, led by Semyon Ansky, and the *YIVO Research Institute for Yiddish Language and Culture were established in Vilna. In the interwar years, Vilna became the world center of secular Yiddish culture. However, the community's economic situation declined after Vilna became part of *Poland in 1922 and antisemitism intensified.

The 1941 *Nazi invasion doomed Jewish Vilna. In the first days of the occupation, much of Vilna's estimated Jewish population of up to 80,000 was murdered in the Ponary woods. A fighting organization was set up in the Vilna ghetto; one of its commanders was Abba Kovner, later a well-known poet in *Israel (see POETRY, MODERN HEBREW). After the Russian liberation of Vilna in July 1944, 6,000 survivors attempted to set up a community. The liberators suppressed manifestations of Judaism, and under Soviet rule specifically Jewish *Holocaust losses were ignored. Independent Lithuania has been slow to return confiscated communal property and to face up to charges of Lithuanian collaboration with the German invaders during World War II.

For further reading, see Y. Arad, Ghetto in Flames: The Struggle and Destruction in the Holocaust of the Jews in Vilna (1980); L. S. Davidowicz, From that Place and Time: A Memoir, 1938–47 (1989); and D. Katz, Lithuanian Jewish Culture (2004).

LIBBY K. WHITE

Vilna Gaon, Elijah (1720–1797). Elijah, the son of Solomon Zalman, is known as the *Gaon (genius) of Vilna. He was the most accomplished rabbinic figure and *Talmud scholar produced by Eastern European Jewry. Living an ascetic life and holding no public office, the Gaon of Vilna dedicated himself entirely to the intensive study of all layers and areas of biblical, rabbinical, and mystical writings, achieving an unprecedented mastery of this literature. Armed with new methods, vast knowledge, and a towering reputation, he changed the intellectual focus and curriculum of Lithuanian Jewry and helped reinvigorate and expand the study of Torah as the ideal way of life. The Gaon is accurately described as the founding father of the mitnaggedim, the movement that stood in opposition to Hasidism*. He carried on the fight against Hasidism* personally and exercised all his power and authority to put an end to it, although without success.

The Vilna Gaon was also the most important rabbinic forerunner of the Eastern European Haskalah*. Most of his influence spread through his disciples, themselves rabbinical scholars of the highest stature, such as R. Chayim of Volozhin, the founder of the first modern yeshivah*, and R. Yisroel of Shkelov, the leader of a group of the Gaon's students who emigrated together to the Land of *Israel, in anticipation of the coming *redemption. Recent research includes I. Etkes, The Gaon of Vilna: The Man and His Image (2002).

CHAIM MEIR NERIA

W

Wald, Lillian D. (1867–1940), nurse, social worker, and political reformer, was born in Ohio to parents of Polish and German origins (see NURSING: UNITED STATES; SOCIAL WORK: UNITED STATES). Her prosperous family subsequently moved to Rochester, New York, where Lillian attended a private French-language boarding school. Wald graduated from the New York Hospital School of Nursing in 1891 and then attended the Women's Medical College. While teaching home nursing classes to immigrants on *New York City's Lower East Side, she first witnessed urban poverty and the lack of health services for the poor. In 1893, Wald and a colleague established residence in an immigrant neighborhood and founded the Nurses' Settlement. Relying on her nursing and settlement movement connections, Wald enlisted the funding and friendship of financier and philanthropist Jacob Schiff, who introduced her to the city's elite networks.

Wald's institution grew into the Henry Street Settlement House, which offered visiting nursing, as well as citizenship classes and amateur theater. She campaigned for parks, playgrounds, and school lunch programs and pioneered public school nursing and classes for disabled students. Completely *secular and at times criticized for the lack of Jewish content in her work, Wald contributed to the increasing secularization and professionalization of social work and nursing. Alongside other political progressives, she linked her local efforts to broader reform campaigns for labor (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT), women's, immigrant, and civil rights (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS; for global anti-militarism; and for public health. Her intimate relationships with women continued to sustain her after her retirement in 1933. The two institutions she founded, Henry Street Settlement House and the Visiting Nurse Service of New York, continue to serve the needs of all New Yorkers.

MARJORIE N. FELD

Wannsee Conference was a meeting arranged by *Nazi security chief Reinhard Heydrich at an SS villa in Wannsee, a suburb outside of *Berlin, to ensure coordination among various government and party agencies involved in aspects of the deportation and murder of European Jewry. Initially planned for December 9, 1941, the Wannsee Conference was postponed after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor two days earlier and took place instead on January 20, 1942. By that time, plans for the implementation of the "Final Solution" were almost complete. See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Warsaw, which became the capital of *Poland in the sixteenth century, was a major center of Jewish life in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Warsaw's earliest known Jewish community, established in the late fourteenth or early fifteenth century, probably consisted of no more than fifteen families. In 1527 Warsaw prohibited Jewish settlement, but Jews lived in private enclaves of noblemen and others, called jurydyki, and for a payment were allowed to live and trade elsewhere in the city when the Polish Diet (parliament) convened. Jews also settled in right-bank Praga as early as the mid-seventeenth century, and an authorized community was established there in 1775.

Only after the late-eighteenth-century partitions of Poland, when Warsaw initially came under Prussian rule, was the prohibition against permanent Jewish settlement lifted and a kehillah (see COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION) established. The Jewish population and its institutions grew; a *cemetery was founded in 1806 (a Jewish burial ground already existed in right-bank Praga). Under *Russian rule after the Napoleonic wars, the Jewish population increased from 12,000 (17% of Warsaw's population) in 1805 to 72,000 (32%) in 1864. The number of Jews doubled again by 1887 and had reached 301,268 by 1911, constituting 38% of Warsaw's population.

Warsaw developed into Europe's largest Jewish center after the 1862 *emancipation of Jews in the Russian-controlled, semi-autonomous Polish kingdom. A mix of *Ḥasidim, *mitnaggedim, and maskilim (see HASKALAH) at the outset of the 1800s became a largely Ḥasidic population as the century progressed, with an increasing minority of Polonized (acculturated) Jews. This latter group controlled the kehillah, the communal government, in the last decades of the century. Beginning in 1868, an influx of Jews from the Russian interior, so-called Litvaks, deepened internal Jewish divisions.

Polish-Jewish relations fluctuated with political and economic conditions. Anti-Jewish riots occurred in 1790 and 1805, but Warsaw Jews also took part in the 1794 Kościuszko insurrection and in nineteenth-century Polish uprisings against Russian rule. The city was the center of a "Polish-Jewish brotherhood" beginning in 1861, yet relations deteriorated in the late 1860s and 1870s and two Jews were killed in a *pogrom that began on Christmas Day, 1881. The industrializing city subsequently became a center of Jewish politics, particularly between 1905 and 1914. Warsaw became a *Yiddish literary center in the 1880s and was the heart of the Yiddish literary world by the mid-1890s (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH). Five-sixths of Warsaw Jews reported Yiddish as their native language at the beginning of the twentieth century. Map 11

During World War I, 80,000 Jewish refugees arrived in Warsaw, even as Jews confronted worsening economic conditions. Interwar Warsaw Jewry, numbering 333,300 in 1931, experienced increased *antisemitism and impoverishment in the 1930s. However, Jewish cultural and political life flourished in the capital of newly independent Poland with two mass-circulation Yiddish *journals, Polish- and Hebrew-language periodicals, and a vibrant Yiddish theater (see THEATER, YIDDISH). By 1926 more than four hundred *synagogues and prayer houses operated, including the Great Synagogue, built in 1876–78 by Polonized Jews.

On the eve of World War II, approximately 60% of Warsaw Jews lived in the northwest Muranów district, adjacent Grzybów, and nearby areas, which had been predominantly Jewish since the late nineteenth century. Another 8% lived in right-bank Praga, whereas a small number of Jewish bankers and industrialists lived in Warsaw's most prestigious districts.

Persecution of Jews began soon after the 1939 *Nazi invasion that began World War II. In November 1940, the Nazis established a *ghetto in which as many as 445,000 Jews, including small-town refugees, were confined. Beginning July 22, 1942, 265,000 ghetto residents were sent to *Treblinka and killed, leaving behind about 70,000 Jews. The Warsaw ghetto uprising broke out on Passover 1943, after which the Nazis destroyed the ghetto and deported the surviving Jews (see HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS; HOLOCAUST: RESISTANCE).

After the Holocaust, an estimated 18,000 Jews lived in Warsaw, but the population decreased as a result of post-war emigration waves. Early-twenty-first-century Warsaw has seen a small-scale revival of Jewish communal life, centered on the Nożyk synagogue, two congregations, and Jewish cultural and academic institutions.

For further reading, see W. T. Bartoszewski and A. Polonsky, eds., The Jews in Warsaw: A History (1991); G. S. Paulson, Secret City: The Hidden Jews of Warsaw, 1940–1945 (2002); and M. Shore, Caviar and Ashes: A Warsaw Generation's Life and Death in Marxism, 1918–1968 (2006). KAREN AUERBACH

Weizmann, Chaim (1874–1952), along with Theodor *Herzl and David *Ben-Gurion, is one of the three men most responsible for achieving the aspirations of political *Zionism. He was born in *Russia and trained in biochemistry in Switzerland and *Germany. Weizmann became involved in Zionism while a student in Switzerland. He settled in *Britain in 1904 and taught in the Chemistry Department at the University of Manchester. His research led to a process for producing acetone from corn that proved essential to Britain in the production of artillery shells during World War I.

Weizmann, who was a highly effective public speaker and an accomplished diplomat, is credited with facilitating the *Balfour Declaration of 1917, which expressed British support for a Jewish "National Home" in *Palestine. He was president of the World Zionist Organization between 1920 and 1931 and 1935 to 1946. As the center of Zionist leadership shifted to Palestine, Weizmann was somewhat marginalized by Ben-Gurion and his supporters. However, he continued to be a crucial advocate for the establishment of the State of *Israel, both in Britain and with the U.S. president Harry Truman. In 1949, Weizmann was named president of the State of Israel, a mainly ceremonial position. The garden of his home in Rehovot, where he is buried, is now part of Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science.

Wengeroff, Pauline Epstein (1833–1916), whose autobiography, Memoiren einer Grossmutter (Memoirs of a Grandmother), is an important source on Jewish life in nineteenth-century *Russia, was born in Bobruisk into the upper economic echelon of Russian Jewry; her entrepreneurial grandfather and father served as contractors to the Russian government, and her husband, Hönon Wengeroff, became a successful banker. The Epsteins were strict in their religious observance; they were mitnaggedim, upholders of traditional rabbinic Judaism and opponents of Hasidism. Pauline's father was an early enthusiast of the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) in *Eastern Europe and encouraged his daughters in their study of German, the language Pauline chose decades later for her memoir. The first edition of Memoiren einer Grossmutter, published in 1913 when Pauline was in her seventies, depicted the life of a privileged and pious Jewish family in the 1840s. It describes in detail the observance of the Jewish holy days and *festivals in her parental home. After this volume's unexpected success, Wengeroff expanded her portrait of traditional Jewish family life into a far more substantive and complex autobiography detailing her problematic marriage and her bitterness over her children's conversions. It was published in 1919 as the second edition of Memoiren. Translations include Memoirs of a Grandmother: Scenes from the Cultural History of the Jews of Russia in the Nineteenth Century, Vol. One, trans., intro., S. Magnus (2010); and B. D. Cooperman, ed. and introduction, Rememberings: The World of a Russian-Jewish Woman in the Nineteenth Century (2000). See also WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE. JUDITH R. BASKIN

White Paper, 1939. In May 1939, *Britain issued a White Paper (a policy document) on British policy in *Palestine, then under *British Mandate authority. It stated that Britain's objective was "the establishment within ten years of an independent Palestine state." To accomplish this objective, Arabs were to be given "an increasing part in the government of their country," and between 1939 and 1944 Jewish immigration into Palestine was to be limited to 75,000 persons. After that date, "no further Jewish immigration will be permitted unless the Arabs of Palestine are prepared to acquiesce in it." Finally, the Palestine government would be granted "powers to prohibit and regulate [further private] transfer of land [from Palestinian Arabs to Palestinian Jews]." These restrictions on Jewish immigration and land purchase were strictly enforced throughout World War II, despite the *Nazi persecution and murder of European Jewry, and remained in effect until the end of the *British Mandate in 1948. See also ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING.

White Russia: See BELORUSSIA

Wiesel, Elie (b. 1928), thinker and author of more than forty books, was born in Sighet in the Carpathian Mountains of Transylvania, then part of *Hungary and now in *Romania. In 1944 he was deported with his family to *Auschwitz, where his mother and younger sister were murdered. He and his father were later taken to *Buchenwald, where his father was killed. After the war Wiesel was moved to *France with other orphans. There, he studied philosophy and literature at the Sorbonne and Jewish texts with a private tutor and mentor. His writing reflects an amalgamation of secular and religious traditions. In 1956, he moved to *New York City.

In 1956, Wiesel published a memoir of his wartime experiences written in *Yiddish, Un de velt hot geshvign (And the World Was Silent). Although he continued to publish essays and stories in Yiddish, his major works were written in French. Night (1958) presents Auschwitz through the memory of a religious young man's struggle not simply for physical survival, but with a *God whose silence ruptures his faith in the Jewish *covenant and continuity. The first of a trilogy, Night, was followed by Dawn (1960) and The Accident (1961), which contemplate the ethics of violence and the will to live in the aftermath of the *Holocaust. In The Town beyond the Wall (1962) a Holocaust survivor who returns to his native town confronts the disturbing indifference to the deportation of Jews; The Gates of the Forest (1964) and A Beggar in Jerusalem (1970) expand on topics introduced in Night through the reflections of a Jewish child survivor whose experiences have damaged his capacity for communion with God and with other people.

In Wiesel's oeuvre, mystical and mysterious storytellers help negotiate the gap between despair and faith. He also retells stories about biblical characters (Messengers of God [1975], Five Biblical Portraits [1981]), the Talmud and other classic Jewish texts (Sages and Dreamers [1991]), along with *Hasidic rebbes and mystical figures (Souls on Fire [1972]; Four Hassidic Masters [1982]; Somewhere a Master [1982]). Several themes run through all of Wiesel's writing, regardless of genre: the nature of God and faith, the human and the Jewish relationship with God, the place of *evil in human existence, and the possibility of *ethics and human good in a post-Holocaust world. In the late 1990s, Wiesel published two volumes of memoirs, All the Rivers Run to the Sea (1994) and And the Sea Is Never Full (1996).

Wiesel has been active against persecution and genocide globally, speaking out on behalf of *Soviet Jewry in the 1960s and 1970s, and later on behalf of blacks in apartheid *South Africa, the victims of the Cambodian and Rwandan genocides, and other oppressed peoples. In 1986 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. SARA R. HOROWITZ

Wisdom of Ben Sira, also known as Ecclesiasticus, is a sapiential instruction that was written, according to Sira 50:27, in *Jerusalem in the second century BCE by a Jewish scribe named Jeshua ben Eleazar ben Sira (see also APOCRYPHA; BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE). Wisdom of Ben Sira is not canonical in *Judaism, but is cited more than eighty times in *rabbinic literature (e.g., BT Sanhedrin 100b; Genesis Rabbah 91:3). In Catholic tradition it is a book of the Old Testament while Protestant denominations consider it part of the Apocrypha.

Hebrew manuscripts of Ben Sira came to light in 1896 among Cairo *Genizah documents. Additional Hebrew scrolls of the book have been discovered among the *Dead Sea Scrolls and at *Masada. To date, approximately 64% of the text is available in Hebrew. A Greek translation was written in *Alexandria by a grandson of Ben Sira in 132 BCE, according to the prologue of the composition. This date, along with the book's silence regarding Antiochus IV and the *Maccabean revolt (175–164 BCE), suggests it was written before this crisis, around 180 BCE.

A lengthy work of instruction, Wisdom of Ben Sira comprises fifty-one chapters; the last contains hymns that were probably added to the book at a later time. The text contains proverbs, sayings, and longer units of poetry and instruction. Its author, a scribe and member of the retainer class, encouraged students to acquire wisdom from him (24:34). In chapter 51, apparently by a secondary author, people are urged to study at a "house of instruction" (beit midrash; 51:23). Ben Sira praises the profession of scribe as superior to menial professions (38:24–39:11). It is likely that his students were wealthy; he urges them to lend money and to help the poor (29:1–20). He is loyal to the aristocratic *priests of Jerusalem (7:29–31), and the poem ends with a paean to the High Priest Simon (probably Simon II, 219–196 BCE; 50:1–24).

The book's themes are wisdom, Torah, and piety. Pursuing and cultivating wisdom, which signifies the ability to understand the world and live an ethical life, should be defining and ongoing personal endeavors (6:18–37; cf. 1:1–10, 4:11–19, 14:20–15:10). The personification of wisdom as a woman is adapted from *Proverbs 8 (ch. 24), and *Torah is portrayed as a major source of wisdom (24:23; 15:1). Ben Sira teaches his students to venerate the law and follow its *commandments (1:26), to cultivate "fear of the Lord," and to maintain an attitude of reverence and humility before God, the "crown" and "root" of wisdom (1:18, 20; cf. Proverbs 1:7). Two lengthy hymns praise God and the work of creation, which reflects divine grandeur and wisdom (39:12–15, 42:15–33). The history of Israel is also a major topic of instruction, especially in chapters 44–49, a section known as "the Praise of the Fathers." In addition, Wisdom of Ben Sira contains teachings on various spheres of ordinary life, such as *marriage (25:13–26:27), filial piety (3:1–16), and table manners (31:12–32:13).

MATTHEW GOFF

Wise, Isaac Mayer (1819–1900) was the first leader of American Reform Judaism. He arrived in the United States from Bohemia in 1846. He was the main influence behind the establishment of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) in 1873; the Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1875 (the first seminary for rabbinic training in North America); and the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) in 1889. He was regarded as the leader of the moderate wing of the Reform movement, which battled with more radical reformers (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA).

Wissenschaft Des Judentums (Scientific Study of Judaism) is a post-Enlightenment European Jewish movement dedicated to promoting the rational, scientific, and critical study of Jewish religion, history, and culture. Originating in mid-nineteenth-century *Germany, Wissenschaft des Judentums reshaped Jewish learning into an academic endeavor that was compatible with the scientific methodologies of the German university while arguing that the Jewish experience had a place in higher education and scholarship. Although pervasive *antisemitism tended to deny Jewish Studies a secure place in the European university curriculum, the Wissenschaft approach, furthered by nineteenth-century scholars like Leopold *Zunz, Abraham *Geiger, and Heinrich *Graetz, found an institutional home in the academic rabbinic seminaries of Central Europe. See also JEWISH STUDIES.

Women, Ancient: Biblical Representations. The Hebrew *Bible is a document produced mainly by male elites, including priests, prophets, sages, and courtiers, and its contents were directed largely toward adult males of ancient Israel and *Yehud, the post-exilic community in the Land of *Israel (see BABYLONIAN EXILE). Its gender language thus reflects the orientation of the text toward the male heads of the corporate households that comprised Israelite society and does not necessarily reflect the way women were regarded in social reality. As a literary work, therefore, the Bible is not a comprehensive source of information about women in Israelite history or society. Female figures in the Bible are best understood in relation to their position and role in the canon, rather than as exemplars of actual women in Israelite antiquity (for what is known about Israelite women's actual lives, see WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE; and ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY LIFE).

NAMED WOMEN: The names of 137 women appear in the Hebrew Bible; they represent 8% of all named individuals. The relatively small number of named women is an indication of the overall male orientation of the shapers of the canon. It also reflects the biblical focus on political events and national institutions (*Temple, *priesthood, the military, and kings and kingship [see ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP]), which were almost always the domains of men rather than women. In addition, this paucity of named females highlights the way the text reinforces the patrilineages, which were the decisive factors in property allocations and ownership and which, in turn, determined the economic viability of families and their place in the social order. For example, large groups of male names in the extensive genealogies of *Genesis, *Numbers, and 1 *Chronicles represent male lineages reflecting ancient Israel's male-based kinship structures. Even so, among the hundreds of male names in 1 Chronicles 1–9 are also the names of forty-seven women. Their presence serves to highlight the men with whom they are linked; however, occasionally it is a function of their own importance, as is the case for Zeruiah and Abigail, sisters of *David who are themselves progenitors of lineages (1 Chron 2:16–17), and the Ephraimite woman She'erah who built three cities, one of which bore her name (1 Chron 7:24).

The distribution of named women is fairly even across the three sections of the Hebrew Bible: forty-five are in the *Pentateuch, forty-nine in *Prophets, and forty-one in *Writings. Most women appear only once, and fleetingly. However, nearly a third (forty-seven) are mentioned in several biblical books: Thirty-three appear twice; eight are in three books; three – Michal (daughter of *Saul and wife of *David), Serah (daughter of Asher and granddaughter of *Jacob), and the *Tamar of Genesis – are found in four books; and one, *Miriam, is found in five different books. Miriam reappears most often because of her prominence in the Exodus account, and Tamar and Michal are also important narrative figures. However, the recurrence of Serah and of most women mentioned twice is a function of their relationship to a significant male figure, usually a king.

Unlike named biblical men, who are identified by their patrilineages, the named women are identified relationally, typically as someone's wife, secondary wife, or concubine. Occasionally, a named woman is said to be the daughter of a certain man, usually for a significant narrative reason. Examples are the tragic story of Jacob's daughter *Dinah (Gen 34), the account of Caleb's daughter Achsah and her acquisition of property (Josh 15:16–17; Judg 1:12–15), the five daughters of Zelophehad (Hogah, Mahlah, Milcah, Noah, and Tirzah) who also acquire property (Num 27:1–11; 36), and the daughters of leading monarchic figures (Saul's daughters Merab and Michal, David's daughter *Tamar, *Solomon's daughters Basemath and Taphath, Jehoram's daughter Jehosheba, and *Ahab's daughter Athaliah). Similarly, a few women are identified as the sister of an important figure such as David, who also is the only male for whom a niece (Abihail) and a granddaughter (another Tamar) are named. Indeed, the clustering of named women around key male figures highlights the prominence of those men.

Many wives are also identified as mothers, especially in genealogies. The mothers of virtually every Judean king and of several Israelite kings are mentioned; a few bear the title "queen mother" (g'birâ), which probably denotes a female court function, not simply parentage. In only four instances are the identities of named women provided without direct reference to a man: *Rebekah's nurse Deborah (Gen 35:8); the two midwives, Puah and Shifrah (Exod 1); and Rahab, the harlot of *Jericho (Josh 2). *Deborah the judge may be a fifth instance if the name "Lappidoth" associated with her (Judg 4:4) is a town, rather than a spouse.

Of the named women, thirty are pre-Israelite or foreign women; only eight of these play sustained narrative roles. *Eve is preeminent in this respect as the "mother of all the living" (Gen 3:20). The others include strong female figures: the Egyptian slave-wife *Hagar, who bears *Abraham's first son (Gen 16, 21:9–21, 25:12); the Midianite woman Zipporah, who marries *Moses and saves him from death (Exod 2:21–22, 4:20–26, 18:2–6); the *Canaanite *prostitute Rahab of Jericho, who protects Joshua's spies (Josh 2:1–21; 6:17, 22–25); the Kenite woman *Jael, who slays the Canaanite general Sisera (Judg 4:17–21, 5:24–27); and the infamous *Phoenician princess Jezebel, who became Ahab's wife and co-ruler (1 Kgs 16:31, 18, 19:1–2, 21; 2 Kgs 9). In addition, foreign women are significant narrative figures in the two biblical books bearing women's names: Ruth and Orpah, both Moabites, in *Ruth, and Vashti, a Persian, in *Esther.

Of the one hundred and seven named Hebrew or Israelite women, thirty-three have an active role in a biblical story. All appear in prose accounts; only one woman, the wayward Gomer (in *Hosea 1–3, much of which is prose), appears in the largely poetic prophetic books. A significant concentration of female narrative figures appear in the family stories of Genesis, which account for the origins of the Israelite lineages; these stories include the matriarchs and handmaids of Genesis – *Sarah, Rebekah, *Rachel, *Leah, Bilhah, and Zilpah – along with Dinah and Tamar. Several more with sustained narrative roles – namely Miriam, Deborah, Delilah, and *Hannah – appear in accounts of the pre-monarchic era and may attest to prominent community roles for women in pre-national life. Additional narrative figures appear in the accounts of the royal families of *Israel and *Judah: *Bathsheba, Michal, the Abigail who is David's second wife, the Tamar who is David's daughter, Athaliah who reigned as queen (2 Kgs 11), and Huldah the prophet (2 Kgs 22:14–20). As with the women of Genesis, the interest in lineage accounts for most of the attention to female figures of the monarchic period; still, in both instances, the narratives provide a glimpse into the lives of women in privileged contexts. Finally, Naomi (see RUTH) and *Esther have commanding and perhaps heroic roles in biblical novellas.

UNNAMED WOMEN: In addition to the named women, unnamed female figures as individuals or as groups are mentioned more than eight hundred times in the Hebrew Bible. Of these, about two hundred are part of gender pairs (and are discussed later, along with common-gender terms). Most of the other six hundred citations are representatives of the female gender in legal texts, where issues of sexuality relating to patrilineality or *purity predominate, and in the figurative language of poetic texts. Indeed, their frequent appearance in poetic imagery means that 39% of the unnamed female figures appear in Prophets, especially in the poetry of the Latter Prophets (although five prophetic books – *Obadiah, *Jonah, *Habakkuk, *Zephaniah, and *Haggai – do not mention any women; see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY), whereas 32% are in the Pentateuch and 29% in *Writings.

The focus of the Bible on kinship relationships is evident in the identity of these unnamed women. Well more than half are mentioned by familial designations: Wives appear most often (some one hundred and fifteen times); daughters and daughters-in-law occur eighty-four times; mothers, stepmothers, and mothers-in-law are specified forty-five times; and others (granddaughters, sisters, sisters-in-law, concubines, widows, divorcées, and aunts) account for the rest. Another 22% of the unnamed women are generic figures, called variously women, young women, or maidens; miscellaneous others, including about twenty designated foreign women and twenty labeled servants, account for 8%.

The other 12% of the unnamed women – seventy-two in all – are those whose sole or primary identification is related to seventeen different occupational or public roles. These include sixteen prostitutes, fourteen royal figures, and other occupations appearing six or fewer times (nurses, midwives, bakers, perfumers, cooks, skilled or weaving women, cult servants, wizards or sorcerers, mediums, lamenters, wise women, heralds, and prophets). More than half of these women are found in Prophets, especially in the narratives of Former Prophets, with the others about equally distributed between the Pentateuch and Writings.

Unnamed female figures have noteworthy narrative roles in only twenty-eight passages. Women in pairs or groups figure rather briefly in eight texts: Lot's two daughters in Genesis; Zipporah's six sisters in Exodus; the two prostitutes of 1 *Kings; the two mothers of 2 Kings; the women in *Jeremiah who worship the Queen of Heaven; also in Jeremiah the women who seek refuge in Egypt; the daughters of Jerusalem who are foils to the Shulammitte throughout the *Song of Songs; and the prophesying women in *Ezekiel. Thirteen of the other twenty unnamed women are featured in extended narratives in Former Prophets: in *Judges the daughter of Jephthah, Samson's mother, the mother of Micah, and the unfortunate concubine of the Levite; in 1 *Samuel the medium of Endor; in 2 Samuel the wise woman of Tekoa and the wise woman of Abel of Beth-Maakah; and in the books of *Kings the *Queen of Sheba, the widow of Zarephath, and the Shunammite. The remaining seven (such as the woman of Thebez in Judges) have briefer but no less important narrative roles. In addition, three women – Lemuel's sagacious mother, the valorous woman of *Proverbs 31, and the sensuous Shulammitte of the *Song of Songs – are important poetic figures.

WOMEN IN GENDER PAIRS AND COMMON-GENDER TERMS: In two other kinds of references, women are linked with males as equivalent persons. One is the set of about two hundred gender pairs – instances in which female figures are paired with their male counterparts to indicate the totality of that category. Again, family relationships predominate: daughter-son in seventy-nine instances, mother-father thirty-one times, *bride-groom in five texts, and sister-brother in three passages. In some thirty-five instances, the pair is simply woman-man or female-male; in fourteen cases, opposing age groups (old women-old men; maiden-youth) form pairs. Finally, some six texts use women-men-children to indicate a sizable group.

Several concentrations of these gender pairs are notable. More than half, especially the daughter-son pairs, appear in Major Prophets, where they serve to focus and intensify the meaning of parallel poetic lines; the dozen mother-father pairs in Proverbs serve a similar function. That another twenty-eight are found in Genesis can be attributed to the general family context as well as to the unusual presence of daughters along with sons in the genealogies of Genesis 5 and 11.

Women also appear indirectly in many common-gender Hebrew nouns, which have only one form but can refer to both genders either collectively or in reference to individuals. Examples are 'ādām (humankind), 'am (people), 'ēdāh (community), banīm (offspring), gōy (nation), nepeš (person), kāhāl (community, congregation), and zera' (seed, offspring). Many of these terms have a wide semantic range and are not always gender inclusive; thus, each usage must be evaluated according to its context. Doing so indicates that women offer sacrifices, participate in community events, and are involved in a variety of other group experiences.

PERSONIFIED OR METAPHORIC AND DIVINE WOMEN: Female figures appear in the Hebrew Bible in several other ways. One is the personification of women as polities (cities, villages, or countries), especially in poetic passages and usually using family relationships. "Daughter" appears some eighty-four times, representing eight different countries or peoples (including *Judah) and five different cities (especially *Jerusalem/*Zion, which is represented some thirty-four times). The most frequently personified place is Jerusalem, which also appears as a whore, princess, queen, mother, wife, bride, maid, and woman. Jerusalem and *Samaria are called sisters named Oholibah and Oholah in the extended marital metaphor of Ezekiel 23 (cf. chap. 16); marriage imagery also figures in the four epithets for Jerusalem – Azubah (Forsaken), Shemamah (Desolate), Hephzibah (I delight in her), and Beulah (Espoused) – in Isaiah 62:4.

Women are also personified as abstract qualities, mainly in *Proverbs, where Wisdom along with Folly, Strange Woman, and Adulteress are recurring images; Wickedness is a woman in Zechariah 5:8. Finally, notably but not exclusively in Former Prophets, a number of female deities (*Asherah, Anath, Astarte, Ashimah, *Lilith) are mentioned by name; the designation "Queen of Heaven" appears five times in *Jeremiah (see CANAAN, CANAANITES; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT).

Recent scholarship includes C. Meyers, T. Craven, and R. S. Kraemer, eds., Women in Scripture: A Dictionary of Named and Unnamed Women in the Hebrew Bible, the Apocryphal/Deuterocanonical Books, and the New Testament (2000); and C. A. Newsome and S. H. Ringe, eds., Women's Bible Commentary, expanded edition (1998). CAROL MEYERS

Women, Ancient: Israelite. Most Israelite women (and men) lived in agrarian settlements; their daily existence centered on the myriad tasks required for survival in a world in which virtually all of a family's foodstuffs, clothing, and other basic commodities were produced in the household. Women's lives were thus embedded in the economic functions of their self-sufficient households, and their religious and social lives were also integrally related to family life. Indeed, senior women in a family held managerial roles, organizing and supervising the labors of children and other family members. Elite women, including female relatives of the royal, priestly, and military bureaucracies and wives of well-to-do landowners, had the assistance of servants or slaves. Yet, the roles of most women as wives, mothers, and daughters were subsumed into the productive activities of their households.

Some Israelite women also engaged in "professional" activities. Unlike household life, which is largely invisible in the Hebrew Bible, many (but perhaps not all) extra-household community functions for women are known from biblical texts. The one mentioned most frequently is that of *prostitute, a profession occurring in virtually every culture. Biblical texts discourage sex-for-hire in several ways, such as not allowing the earnings of a prostitute to be used for a *Temple donation (Deut 23:18) and by forbidding fathers to exploit their daughters by profiting from their sexuality (Lev 19:29). In addition, *priests, but not others, are forbidden from marrying prostitutes (Lev 21:7, 14). However, the Bible never explicitly proscribes prostitution, and two biblical heroes, *Tamar (Gen 38) and Rahab (Josh 2), act as prostitutes and are not condemned.

Women also practiced crafts or trades that were often outgrowths of their household activities. Groups of women weave fabrics for the *Tabernacle (Exod 35:26). Young women are conscripted to work in the royal precincts as bakers, cooks, and perfumers (1 Sam 8:13). The well-to-do woman of *Proverbs 31 markets garments she produces (31:13, 24); the discovery of seals (used in commercial transactions) inscribed with women's names further suggests the presence of Israelite businesswomen. Women are even said to have been construction workers in the post-exilic period (Neh 3:12).

Community service included leadership roles. *Deborah is prominent among the judges, perhaps the only one of these military heroes who also adjudicates (Judg 4:4–5). Also on the national level are royal women (e.g., Jezebel and Athaliah) who, by virtue of their class, exercise political power. A few (*Solomon's mother *Bathsheba and Asa's mother Maacah) are designated "queen mother" (g'birâ), probably the title of a female court functionary. Unnamed but no less significant are the two "wise women" whose sagacity, knowledge of traditional sayings, and psychological acumen play a national role (2 Sam 14:1–20, 20:14–22); other such women likely existed but go unmentioned.

Communications in biblical days were carried out by couriers, such as the servant girl bearing messages between Jonathan and *David (2 Sam 17:17). However, people usually dispatched messengers of the same gender, such as the girls conveying dinner invitations for Woman Wisdom (Prov 9:3–4). These messengers were important personnel, responsible for conveying the exact words of their employers and then returning with an accurate response. The female heralds who made announcements to a wider audience (Isa 40:9; Ps 68:12) played a similar message-bearing role.

Several community religious roles for women also appear in the Hebrew Bible. The enigmatic women stationed at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting (Exod 38:8; cf. 1 Sam 2:22; see TABERNACLE) were likely menial laborers in the national shrine. More prominent are the female prophetic figures who communicated God's will to the people (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY); several are significant actors in biblical narrative (*Miriam, Deborah, Huldah [2 Kgs 22], and Noadiah [Neh 6:14]), and others are unnamed and referred to only briefly (Isa 8:3; Ezek 13:17–23; Joel 3:1). Also mentioned are female sorcerers, wizards, and necromancers who apparently used special divinatory powers to help their clients (see MAGIC). Despite the negative biblical perspective on these women (Exod 22:17; Lev 20:27), they were skilled in the occult arts; moreover, the medium of Endor helps King *Saul without narrative censure (1 Sam 28:7–14). Indeed, those women provided a valuable service in assisting with what would be considered medical problems today (see ILLNESS AND DISEASE: BIBLE AND ANCIENT NEAR EAST; MEDICINE). A more explicitly medical practitioner, the midwife (Gen 35:17, 38:28; Exod 1:15–21), also had a religious role, for reciting chants and prayers was likely part of midwifery. However, women called "nurses" (Gen 24:59, 35:8; 2 Kg 11:2–3) were wet nurses and not medical attendants; they appear infrequently, usually as a sign of status for the women said to employ them.

Finally, women were active in the cultural realm. *Biblical poems with important religious messages are attributed to women (the songs of Miriam [Exod 15], Deborah [Judg 5], and Hannah [1 Sam 2]), and some or all of the love poetry in the *Song of Songs is probably a woman's composition. Women performed with frame drums (Ps 68:26), sometimes while also dancing and singing in victory celebrations (Exod 15:20–21; 1 Sam 18:6–7; Jer 31:4). They likely played other musical instruments, and they were vocalists in secular (2 Sam 19:36; Eccles 2:8; Ezra 2:65; Neh 7:67) and perhaps religious (1 Chron 25:5–6) contexts. Women were also experts in a specialized vocal performance, namely, singing laments for the dead (Jer 9:16–19; Ezek 32:16; cf. 2 Chron 35:25; see also BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE).

Although not attested in the Hebrew Bible, evidence from ethnography or ancient Near Eastern texts suggests that some women were vintners and others produced many kinds of artifacts, including ceramic vessels, terracotta figurines, amulets, baskets, textile implements, and even ground stone tools, that have been recovered from Iron Age sites. Because at least some elite women apparently could write (1 Kgs 21:8–9; Esther 9:29), Israelite women, like their sisters elsewhere, may have served as scribes.

Overall, the relative infrequency with which women with activities beyond the household appear in the Hebrew Bible is a function of the agendas of the text and should not be taken as a sign that those women lacked importance in Israelite life. As for the women themselves, the significance of having professional or community roles lay partly in the prestige and satisfaction of serving a general constituency. In addition, professions involving technical skills or group performance gave those with expertise the opportunity to mentor others and experience concomitant status. Moreover, such work provided women with the opportunity for creativity, self-expression, and the positive regard of those they served.

Scholarship on this topic includes A. Brenner, The Israelite Woman: Social Role and Literary Type in Biblical Narrative (1985); M. I. Gruber, "Women in the Ancient Levant," in Women's Roles in Ancient Civilizations: A Reference Guide, ed. B. Vivante (1999), 115–52; and C. Meyers, T. Craven, and R. S. Kraemer, eds., Women in Scripture: A Dictionary of Named and Unnamed Women in the Hebrew Bible, the Apocrypha/Deuterocanonical Books, and the New Testament (2000); see also ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY LIFE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS.

CAROL MEYERS

Women, Ancient: Rabbinic Judaism. Jewish women in the late ancient period lived not only in *Palestine but also in *Babylonia, as well as in Jewish *Diaspora communities throughout the *Hellenistic world; their lives were regulated by the norms of a "common Judaism" of which we know next to nothing. The vast body of *rabbinic literature, which was composed by Jews in the first five or six centuries of the Common Era, formulated new approaches to Jewish women's lives and behavior. The foremost rabbinic composition is the *Mishnah, which was published in Palestine ca. 200 CE. It became an authoritative text in subsequent eras, not least because it served as the thematic framework and provided the content for discussion and expansion in both the Jerusalem and Babylonian *Talmuds. The Mishnah is divided into six orders, one of which is called "Women" (Nashim). The existence of a separate order devoted to women (with no parallel division devoted to men) indicates the androcentric character of the document. The Mishnah is about Jewish men and, as Jacob Neusner has shown, the ways in which they must act to assert their Jewishness. Authority over women – and their orderly transfer from one male authority figure to another – is one of these areas of male concern.

The order Nashim is divided into seven tractates: Yevamot (Levirate Widows [see MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE]), Ketubbot (*Marriage Contracts), Nedarim (Vows), Nazir (Nazirite Vows), Sotah (*Adultery), Gittin (*Divorce Documents) and Kiddushin (*Betrothals). At least two of these tractates (Nedarim and Nazir) are not devoted to women at all. Jacob Neusner has suggested that Nashim is not really about women but rather about their relations to men and about how the latter exert control over them. Judith Romney Wegner's work supports his conclusions, which are further substantiated by the existence of another tractate in the Mishnah, Niddah, that is devoted to a uniquely feminine topic – menstruation. This tractate is not found in Nashim, but is situated in the order Tohorot (Purities), probably because its main themes are the ways in which a menstruating woman can transmit a state of ritual impurity to a man (see PURITY).

The entire order of Nashim and Tractate Niddah have complementary tractates in the *Tosefta, as well as commentaries in the Jerusalem and Babylonian *Talmuds. There are no commentaries on the other tractates in Tohorot in either Talmud, likely because most issues relevant to ritual purity in Judaism ceased to be operative after the destruction of the Second *Temple, but the belief that a menstruating woman could impart ritual impurity never lost its potency in Jewish life and thought. Feminist scholars such as Tirzah Meacham and Charlotte Fonrobert have suggested another reason for the existence of commentaries to Niddah: Men used menstruation regulations to control women and limit their autonomy, even over their own bodies.

The parallel traditions to Nashim in the Tosefta indicate that certain issues that were debated by the Rabbis were then eliminated or reworked to fit the ideology of the Mishnah. The status of women is a prime example of this sort of transformation. As amply demonstrated by Judith Hauptman, the Tosefta includes many lenient references to women that were then reworked or completely eliminated from the Mishnah, which maintains a more stringent approach to women's opportunities. Studies carried out by other scholars, including Gail Labovitz, Ishay Rosen-Zvi, and myself, substantiate Hauptman's conclusions. The most likely explanation for this phenomenon is that, as the Rabbis gained ascendancy in Jewish society in the centuries following the destruction of the Second *Temple, they felt an increasing need to control women's lives, because they viewed them as inherently unruly and dangerous.

Subsequent studies have demonstrated that a similar trend to reduce women's public obligations and independence can be observed in other layers of rabbinic literature. Thus, major segments of the Mishnah and the Tosefta are dedicated to disputes between two "houses" or schools of rabbinic opinion: Beit Shammai and Beit Hillel. Rabbinic literature declared Beit Hillel as the authoritative voice that Jews should follow. A comparison of their rulings about women indicates a consistent tendency of Beit Shammai to treat women as possessing personhood and agency. Thus, the wholesale rejection of the rulings of Beit Shammai did much to diminish women's status.

A similar picture emerges from the halakhic midrashim*, compositions dating to the time of the Mishnah. Scholars divide these midrashim into two schools – that of Rabbi *Akiva and that of Rabbi Ishmael. Rabbi Akiva is by far the more prominent of these two rabbis, and the Mishnah is a product of his school. A comparison of the two corpora demonstrates that the school of Rabbi Ishmael far more often than the school of Rabbi Akiva sought to include women in its interpretation of biblical verses where no women are mentioned.

This tendency, found in the early strata of rabbinic literature, changes somewhat in the exegesis of these texts found in the Talmuds. As Hauptman shows, many leniencies that were rejected by the Mishnah and are only found in the Tosefta are reintroduced in baraitot* in the Talmuds. Thus the halakhah* that emerges from the Talmuds is often less harsh toward women than that of the Mishnah. Yet a tendency of denigration is also found in the Talmuds. These compositions give ample attention to the literary genre of aggadah*, which preserves many stories about women and their daily lives. As Judith Baskin has demonstrated, however, many of these narratives are used to reinforce patriarchal control of women. In this genre, too, a development for the worse can be seen. Stories about women in the earlier Jerusalem Talmud are subsequently retold much less favorably in the Babylonian Talmud. Yet, because the genre of aggadah is more suited than halakhah to portray actual events and situations, women often come through in a more human light. Later rabbinic midrashim, such as Genesis Rabbah, Leviticus Rabbah, and Lamentations Rabbah, and even significantly late documents such as the Tanḥuma are, as Galit Hasan-Rokem has demonstrated, an excellent resource for the portrayal and reflection of real women and their exploits and achievements.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002); C. Fonrobert, Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender (2000); G. Hasan-Rokem, Tales of the Neighborhood: Jewish Narrative Dialogue in Late Antiquity (2003); J. Hauptman, Rereading the Rabbis: A Woman's Voice (1997); T. Ilan, Integrating Women into Second Temple History (2001); idem, Silencing the Queen: The Literary Histories of Shelamzion and Other Jewish Women (2006); G. Labovitz, "These are the Labors': Constructions of the Woman Nursing Her Child in the Mishnah and Tosefta," Nashim 3 (2000): 15–42; T. Meacham, "An Abbreviated History of the Development of the Jewish Menstrual Laws," in Woman and Water: Menstruation in Jewish Life and Law, ed. R. Wasserfall (1999), 23–39; J. Neusner, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Women IV (1980); I. Rosen-Zvi, "Measure for Measure as a Hermeneutical Tool in Early Rabbinic Literature: The Case of Tosefta Sotah," Journal of Jewish Studies 57 (2006): 269–86; and J. R. Wegner, Chattel or Person: The Status of Women in the Mishnah (1988).

TAL ILAN

Women, Ancient: *Second Temple Period. Important sources on women for this era (530 BCE–70 CE) include *Josephus and *Philo of Alexandria, as well as the *Apocrypha, the *Pseudepigrapha, and the *Dead Sea Scrolls. The *New Testament gospels, which represent the Jesus movement – a Jewish Second *Temple sect – are also a valuable resource. In addition, documentary collections of inscriptions and papyri demonstrate the changing status of women in *marriage, *divorce, and other aspects of Jewish life.

The marriage contract (ketubbah*), which regulates the financial relationship between husband and wife, emerged during the Second Temple period, as indicated both by a group of Persian-period Jewish papyri from Elephantine, *Egypt, and the apocryphal book of Tobit (7:13). Thereafter, the marriage contract, which is not mentioned in the Hebrew *Bible, is attested both by documentary evidence and the *Mishnah (see M. Ketubbot and also T. Ketubbot 12:1; JT Ketubbot 8:11, 32b–c; BT Ketubbot 82b).

Although the Hebrew Bible allows a husband to divorce his wife, this issue was apparently hotly debated in the Second Temple period. The Dead Sea Scrolls recognize divorce, but not remarriage thereafter (for both partners; CD IV 20–1; 4Q271). Jesus rejected the concept of divorce altogether (e.g., Mark 10:11–12), but a modified version of this opposition is found in Matthew (5:32; 19:9), which allows divorce in cases of *adultery. According to the New Testament (Mark 10:2–3), the *Pharisees recognized a liberal interpretation of divorce, albeit unilateral divorce – that is, it could be only initiated by the husband. Yet at least one reference in the writings of Josephus (Antiquities 15.259–60) and at least one document (XHev/Se 13) from the early second century CE suggest that Judaism also knew of wife-initiated divorce.

Incest regulations were also debated during this era. Although the incest laws enumerated in the Bible (Lev 18) are quite detailed, they do not mention some relationships.

For example, a man is not forbidden to marry his niece. The Pharisees apparently condoned such a marriage, whereas the Dead Sea sect condemned it (CD V 9–11).

Josephus also specifically states that women may not serve as witnesses or judges in Jewish law *courts (Ant. 4:219). This assertion was carried over to rabbinic halakhah*, in sources including M. Rosh Ha-Shanah 1:8 and the *midrash collection Sifre Deuteronomy 17.

Little is known about women's participation in Temple rituals and observances. The Temple was an all-male institution, and there are few sources describing its functions. The late Mishnah informs us that women wove the Temple curtain (M. Shekalim 2:6) and participated in Temple celebrations of *Sukkot (M. Middot 2:5; T. Sukkah 4:1) and *Passover (M. Pesaḥim 8:1); it also relates that Queen Helene of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, donated money to adorn the Temple (M. Yoma 3:10). However, these sources may be anachronistic and unreliable.

Yet, religious and national expressions were not restricted to the Temple. Important religious concepts such as *martyrdom (sacrifice of oneself for spiritual ideals) and zealotry (active personal participation in the destruction of the enemy) were developed and became dominant in this era. Various sources describe women acting in both these capacities. The fictional book of Judith, in the *Apocrypha, tells of a woman who assassinates the enemy's general in an act of personal zealotry. In 2 *Maccabees 6:12–17, a mother witnesses the deaths of her seven sons, and she herself dies as a martyr rather than transgress the Jewish *commandments (see HANUKKAH AND WOMEN).

Second Temple Jewish politics was characterized by religious splintering that led to the creation of many sects. Women were probably present and active in most of these religious/political groups. Philo relates the active membership of women in a local Jewish sect, the Therapeutai, who retreated from the world to engage in contemplation and worship (De Vita Contemplativa [The Contemplative Life]). The New Testament reports the presence of women in the group that followed Jesus and assigns them a vital role in the founding of *Christianity after the crucifixion (e.g., Matt 28:1–10; Luke 23:55–24:11). It is now generally accepted that the Dead Sea sect also counted females among its members, and it is likely that even the Pharisees and the *Zealots welcomed women. It was during this period that the reign of the only legitimate queen in Jewish history, Shelomzion (Salome) Alexandra (ruled ca. 76–67 BCE), occurred. She succeeded her husband, the *Hasmonean ruler Alexander Jannaeus, and sources suggest that her reign was one of peace and prosperity.

For further reading, see T. Ilan, Integrating Women into Second Temple History (2001); idem, Jewish Women in Greco-Roman Palestine: An Inquiry into Image and Status (1994); idem, Silencing the Queen: The Literary Histories of Shelamzion and Other Jewish Women (2006); J. E. Taylor, Jewish Women Philosophers of First Century Alexandria: Philo's 'Therapeutae' Reconsidered (2003); and C. Wassen, Women in the Damascus Document (2005).

TAL ILAN

Women: Early Modern Europe. During the years between 1492 and 1750, the Jews of Europe underwent significant social, religious, and demographic changes that had an impact on women's lives in a number of locations.

SEPHARDI DIASPORA: Benvenida *Abravanel (ca. 1473–after 1560), niece of the statesman-philosopher Isaac *Abravanel, married her first cousin Samuel. The couple left *Spain in 1492 for *Italy where Don Samuel became head of the Jewish community in Naples. Benvenida was an educated woman who established a good relationship with the Duchess of Tuscany. When the Jews of southern Italy were threatened with expulsion in 1541, Benvenida used her influence to negotiate a postponement of the decree. After her husband's death in 1547, she took over his business concerns and attained important trade privileges. Benvenida also gained renown as a pious and charitable woman, much given to fasting, whose home was a center of study and culture. In 1524–25, Benvenida became an enthusiastic supporter of the messianic pretender David Reuveni (d. 1538). She is said to have sent him financial support, a silk banner with the *Ten Commandments written in gold on both sides, and a Turkish gown of gold cloth (see MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN).

Gracia Nasi (see also MENDES-NASI FAMILY) was born a *conversa and was baptized as Beatriz de Luna in *Portugal. Her husband Francisco, whom she married in 1528, left her half of his property when he died in 1536. Once the *Inquisition was established in that same year, Doña Gracia resolved to move elsewhere, taking care to move slowly to preserve the maximum amount of their fortune. Ultimately, the family ended up in Constantinople (see OTTOMAN EMPIRE) where Doña Gracia supported numerous scholars and rabbis and aided in the publication of scholarly works. Because of her connections, wealth, mobility, and foresight, Doña Gracia managed to escape the reach of the Inquisition. However, many other crypto-Jewish women were not so fortunate.

As the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisitions became obsessed with discovering unfaithful New Christians, women were particularly at risk, because they played a crucial role in perpetuating Judaism in this period. Without communal institutions or leadership, the home became the sole source of Jewish continuity, and women were central in preserving Jewish domestic rituals, especially the *dietary laws and *Sabbath observance. Such practices were always dangerous, because servants often testified to the Inquisition about their employers' judaizing activities. Numerous crypto-Jewish women were arrested and tortured, and many sacrificed their lives as martyrs for their faith in the course of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

ITALY, 1600–1800: At least two Jewish women in seventeenth-century Italy became distinguished published writers in Italian. Devorà *Ascarelli translated Hebrew liturgical poetry into rhymed Italian, presumably for use by female worshipers. Her Abitacolo degli oranti (The Abode of the Supplicants), completed in 1537 and published in 1601, may be the earliest published Jewish literary work written by a woman. The most accomplished Jewish woman of this period in terms of education and literary productivity was the writer and poet Sarra Copia *Sulam (1592–1641). A member of a wealthy and prominent family in *Venice, she married Jacob Sulam, a local Jewish leader. She formed a salon of mostly Christian men of letters for whom she provided financial support, as well as intellectual friendships that later soured. Another talented woman of this period was the professional singer known as Madama Europa Rossi, a highly accomplished performer in the court of the Gonzaga family in late-sixteenth- and early-seventeenth-century Mantua and the sister of the composer and musician Salamone Rossi (see MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE).

As early as the thirteenth century in Italy, certain rabbis allowed girls to receive a Jewish education. Most young women learned to read and write Italian at school or at home, and some learned Hebrew as well. Many of the teachers of girls were women, and those who taught Hebrew were known as rabbat or rabbanit. Other women, often widows, offered instruction in domestic skills. Two women of this period exceptional for their learning were sisters, Fioretta (Bat Sheva) Modena and Diana Rieti. According to the Venetian rabbi Leon *Modena (1571–1648), who was Fioretta's nephew, the women had mastered Torah, Mishnah, Talmud, midrash, Jewish law, and Kabbalah (Modena, Hayyei, fol. 15b). At the age of seventy-five, after the death of her husband Solomon da Modena, Fioretta set out to live in *Safed, a city known for its many mystics.

An interesting feature of the early modern Italian Jewish community is the licensing of specific women to act as ritual slaughterers and porgers of meat (nikkur or treibern [remove veins and sinews]). This contrasts with efforts by rabbis elsewhere in Christian Europe to limit women's rights to be involved in kosher slaughtering and porging. The probable reason for this liberality was to enable women to provide food for their families in isolated locations, such as summer houses in the mountains, or in distressed circumstances (see DIETARY LAWS).

CENTRAL EUROPE: The invention of *printing in the fifteenth century, which made the dissemination of popular literature practicable and inexpensive, played an important role in expanding Jewish women's religious lives and increasing their piety in *Central and *Eastern Europe in the Early Modern period. Access to reading matter in the vernacular had a transformative effect on many women, deepening their knowledge of Judaism and Jewish traditions; it even empowered a few women to become writers themselves. Rabbinic injunctions against women's learning were believed to apply to Talmud study, but not to the Bible or legal rulings necessary for women's everyday activities. Although Jewish women were generally ignorant of Hebrew, most were literate in Jewish vernaculars (Judeo-German [Western Yiddish] in Central Europe and *Yiddish in Eastern Europe, written in Hebrew characters), which had long been essential to women's economic activities. Translations of the Hebrew *Bible, the first books to be printed in the Jewish vernacular, gave women, as well as less learned men, access to Judaism's holy texts. Particularly popular were the Taytsh-khumes (Vernacular Five Books [of Moses]), first published by Sheftl Hurwitz in Prague in 1608 or 1610, and the Tzene-rene (the title is derived from Song of Songs 3:11: "Go out and see [Daughters of Zion]"), by Jankev ben Isaac Ashkenazi (ca. 1590–1618), both of which included homilies on the weekly biblical readings from the *Torah and *Prophets, as well as stories, legends, and parables drawn from rabbinic literature; the *Zohar and other mystical texts; and histories and travel accounts. Also available to female readers was *musar literature: ethical treatises that discussed proper conduct, a woman's religious obligations, and her relations with her husband, such as the Brantshpigel (Burning Mirror) by Moses ben Henoch Altschuler (1596) and the Meneket Rivkah (Rebecca's Nurse) of Rebecca bas Meir Tiktiner of *Prague (d. 1550; posthumously published in the early seventeenth century). These vernacular books intended for women were also read by Jewish men, many of whom did not possess significant Jewish scholarship; they were printed in a special typeface, vayber taytsh ("women's vernacular") based on the cursive Hebrew handwriting that women were taught for business contracts, marriage agreements, and correspondence.

Although all the Hebrew and Aramaic prayers of the standard liturgy were translated into Judeo-German/Yiddish, they were never as central to women as tkhines*, supplicatory prayers that were intended for female use in Jewish rituals and in worship, both in the synagogue and at home. Collections of such prayers began to appear in the sixteenth century. Chava Weissler has pointed out that, although much of this literature was written by men for women and represents men's conceptions of women's religious lives, tkhines do demonstrate what women prayed about and offer insight into how they understood the meanings of their religious acts. Sarah Rebecca Rachel Leah Horowitz (ca. 1720–ca. 1800), the highly educated author of the Tkhine imohes (Tkhine of the Matriarchs), emphasizes the power and importance of women's prayer. In the Shloyse sheorim (Three Gates), Sarah bas Tovim (probably eighteenth century) makes use of rabbinic and mystical texts in Yiddish to construct a new vision of women's religious lives in which women's prayer was as significant as men's (see also PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL).

COURT JEWS: One early modern woman who wrote in her own voice was *Glückel of Hameln; (also Glikl bas Judah Leib; 1646–1724). Born into the prosperous *Court Jew milieu of Central Europe, Glückel was well read in Judeo-German literature and had some knowledge of Hebrew and German as well; her memorial notice characterizes her as "a learned woman" (melumedet), unusual praise in her time and place. Betrothed at twelve, married at fourteen, and the mother of fourteen children, Glückel was active in business and pious in religious observance, including regular synagogue attendance. Glückel was at the threshold of modernity, both as a woman and as a Jew, and her business activities reflect the growing economic participation of Jews in the non-Jewish world, whereas her religious and secular educations speak to the broader horizons and new educational opportunities available to some seventeenth-century Jews – including women.

Esther Schulhoff Aaron *Liebmann (ca. 1645–1714) came from the same milieu as Glückel. Married first to Israel Aaron (d. 1673), supplier to the Brandenburg court and founder of the *Berlin Jewish community, Esther subsequently wed Jost Leibmann. Liebmann's first wife, Malka, was Glückel's niece, and Liebmann himself learned the jewelry business from Glückel's husband, Ḥayyim Hameln. Esther and her husband were the court jewelers to Frederick I of Prussia and the leading family in the Berlin Jewish community. Esther worked actively alongside her husband and successfully carried on their business after her husband's death. Like many Court Jews, Liebmann's fortunes depended on the favor of the ruler. After the death of Frederick I and the accession of Frederick William I in 1713, Esther Liebmann was put under house arrest and released only after she had paid the king a substantial fine.

MYSTICISM AND MESSIANIC MOVEMENTS: Women are connected with both mysticism (see also MYSTICISM: WOMEN) and the messianic movements that are a significant feature of Jewish history in early modern Europe. This phenomenon first appeared among crypto-Jewish women in Spain. As R. Melammed has written, conversas, observing secretly in the hope of salvation, were likely candidates to have a mystical or messianic penchant. During the post-expulsion period, several women and girls experienced visions and delivered messianic prophecies, particularly in the La Mancha and Extremadura regions of Castile. From 1499 to 1502, Mari Gómez of Chillón and Inés, a twelve-year-old from Herrera, inspired a renewal of Jewish observance, with special emphasis on fasting, based on their predicting of the imminent arrival of *Elijah, heralding messianic *redemption in the Land of Israel. The Inquisition quickly extinguished this movement: Inés was burned at the stake in 1500, and Mari Gómez escaped to Portugal.

Rachel Aberlin (fourth quarter of the sixteenth century, lead of *Israel) was active in Safed, Jerusalem, and Damascus. She figures as a mystic in Sefer ha-Hezionot (The Book of Visions), the memoir of her contemporary, Ḥayyim Vital. Vital, the most prominent disciple of the greatest sixteenth-century kabbalist, Isaac *Luria, refers to "Rachel Aberlin" and "Rachel ha-Ashkenaziah" frequently in entries that provide rare insight into the mystical religiosity of early modern Jewish women in the period preceding *Sabbateanism. Aberlin is portrayed in Sefer ha-Hezionot as a woman who regularly experienced mystical visions, from pillars of fire to Elijah the prophet. She is said to have been "accustomed to seeing visions, demons, souls, and angels." Aberlin seems to have been an important figure to other women in her community, who regarded her as a spiritual leader.

Sarah, one of the wives of the preeminent messianic figure of the Early Modern period, *Shabbetai Zevi (1626–1676), continues to be an enigma to historians. Apparently a survivor of the 1648 *Chmelnitzki pogroms in *Poland who had been brought up as a Christian, Sarah attracted attention with her beauty and her claims that she was destined to marry the messiah. According to some reports, Sarah was an erstwhile prostitute, who had traveled from Poland to *Amsterdam and then to Italy, where she worked as a servant for various Jewish families and institutions. Exactly how she and Shabbetai Zevi were brought together is unknown. However, the couple was married in Cairo in March 1664. At least one source reports that Shabbetai married her because of her ill repute, so as to fulfill the words of the Prophet Hosea: "Take yourself a wife of whoredom" (1:2). Sarah, who subsequently gave birth to a son and a daughter, converted to *Islam shortly after her husband's conversion in 1666. In 1671, Shabbetai divorced Sarah, even though she was pregnant, and arranged a marriage with another woman. He then changed his mind and took Sarah back. She died in 1674.

An interesting facet of Shabbetai Zevi's messianic claims was his promise to ameliorate the secondary status of women in Judaism. He allowed women in synagogues he visited in Constantinople, Smyrna, and Salonika to be called up to the *Torah. According to Gershom *Scholem, Shabbetai is reported to have promised in 1665 that he would lift the "curse of Eve" from women and added, "Blessed are you, for I have come to make you free and happy like your husbands, for I have come to take away Adam's sin." Scholem has suggested that Shabbetai may have been attracted by "the audacity of Sarah, the reputed harlot, because he cherished the dream of the reparation of Adam's sin and of the consequent restoration of woman to her original freedom" (405). Scholem goes on to argue that the idea that the *messiah would repair *Adam's sin was current in Lurianic mystical writings, but Shabbetai seems to have been the first to make the connection in terms of the emancipation of women.

Eva Frank (1754–1816), daughter of the charismatic Sabbatean leader Jacob *Frank (1726–1791), played a major role in the messianic and *antinomian Frankist movement. Originally named Rachel, she is referred to in Frankist writings as the Lady, the Virgin, or Matronita, the Aramaic name of the mystical female entity, the Shekhinah*. She became known as Eva after the conversion of her family to Christianity in 1760. Jacob Frank saw himself as the eternal messiah and told his followers to recognize Eva-Rachel as the mystical royal figure of the Shekhinah, who would lead them as a messianic redeemer in his temporary absence. Ultimately, Frank claimed, he would be reborn and united with his daughter in "the unity of Messiah and Shekhinah." After Jacob Frank's death in 1791, Eva led the Frankist community in its hopes of imminent messianic redemption. Even after she died, many Frankist families continued to keep her portrait and honored her as a saintly woman who was falsely reviled.

For further reading, see H. Adelman, "Finding Women's Voices in Italian Jewish Literature," in Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing, ed. J. R. Baskin (1994), 50–69; idem, "Italian Jewish Women," in Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, ed. J. R. Baskin (1998), 150–68; J. R. Baskin, "Jewish Women's Piety and the Impact of Printing in Early Modern Europe," in Culture and Change: Attending to Early Modern Women, ed. M. Mikesell and A. Seeff (2003), 221–40; R. L. Melammed, Heretics or Daughters of Israel? The Crypto-Jewish Women of Castile (1999); M. Keil, "Public Roles of Jewish Women in Fourteenth and Fifteenth-Centuries Ashkenaz," in The Jews of Europe in the Middle Ages (Tenth to Fifteenth Centuries), ed. C. Cluse (2004), 317–30; G. Scholem, Sabbatai Sevi (1973); and C. Weissler, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women (1998).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Women: Middle Ages. In medieval times most Jews lived in the *Diaspora. Significant Jewish populations were in the Muslim worlds of *North Africa, *Iraq, and *Spain (*Sepharad), and there were far smaller numbers of Jews in Christian Europe (*Ashkenaz). All Jewish communities governed themselves by the Babylonian *Talmud; halakhic sources confirm that medieval Judaism continued rabbinic patterns in ordaining separate gender roles and religious obligations for men and women and in relegating females to secondary, enabling positions (see WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM). However, norms and customs of local environments were also factors in how Jewish social life developed, because Jews assumed the language, dress, and many of the mores of their Gentile neighbors, including cultural attitudes toward appropriate female behavior. Virtually no documents written by medieval Jewish women, beyond personal correspondence, survive

(see also EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN).

Jewish social life in the Muslim realm was strongly influenced by *Islamic customs and polygyny was not uncommon. Although Jewish women of prosperous families were not literally isolated in women's quarters, community norms dictated that women remain out of the public eye. The observation of the preeminent sage of medieval Judaism, Moses *Maimonides (1135–1204), who lived much of his life in *Egypt – "There is nothing more beautiful for a wife than sitting in the corner of her house" – reflects the high degree of Jewish acculturation to their environment. As accounts of marital disputes in Cairo *Genizah documents indicate, however, Jewish women had significant freedom of movement for visits to the synagogue and bathhouse, social and condolence calls, and business activities, such as the buying and selling of flax. Women, who were married quite young, frequently to considerably older men and often to relatives, were often protected by social safeguards written into the marriage contract (ketubbah); these altered Jewish laws and practices unfavorable to women, particularly in instances of desertion and *divorce. Such additions to the standard contract attempted to provide security against many of the known pitfalls of married life; some ketubbot included guarantees that, in case of separation, a divorce document (get) freeing the wife would be produced by her husband without delay and that the husband would not marry another wife, not beat his wife, not separate her against her will from her parents, nor travel anywhere without her consent. Quite frequently, the contract also stipulated that the husband would write a conditional bill of divorce before setting out on a journey so that his wife would be free to remarry should he fail to return after a specified length of time. Following biblical custom, Jewish grooms in the Muslim milieu also contributed a marriage gift (mohar), part of which was payable to the bride's father at the time of the wedding, with a portion reserved for the bride in the event of a divorce or her husband's death. Similarly the bride brought property into the marriage in the form of her dowry and trousseau. This dowry, which was also to be returned to the wife in case of divorce or her husband's death, was generally far more valuable than the husband's marriage gift; it gave a wealthy family significant leverage in finding a suitable match for their daughter and ensuring her proper treatment.

The small Jewish communities of medieval Christian Europe lived in an atmosphere of religious suspicion and legal disability. After the Crusades (see MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES), Jews were prohibited from virtually any source of livelihood but *money lending and were often compelled to wear distinctive clothing and badges. By the end of the medieval period, Jews had been expelled from areas where they had long lived (including England in 1290 and Spain in 1492) or were forced to live in crowded *ghettos (see ITALY). Despite their political insecurity, Jews enjoyed a high standard of living and were significantly acculturated. Jewish women participated in the family economy; as Jews prospered in trade and money lending, particularly between 1100 and 1300, women played an increasingly vital and often autonomous part in their family's economic lives, both as merchants and as financial brokers. Indeed, Jewish women's influential position and activities during the High Middle Ages parallel those of Christian women within the upper bourgeoisie, as both groups of women achieved literacy, had financial skills, and ran their households and economic affairs effectively during their husbands' absences, whether on mercantile or military endeavors. Indications of the high status of Jewish women in *Ashkenaz include large dowries, significant freedom of movement, and the eleventh-century rabbinic ruling (takkanah) attributed to Rabbi Gershom ben Judah of Mainz, forbidding polygyny for Jews in Christian countries; he also ruled that no woman could be divorced against her will. It was also the custom in Ashkenaz for husbands to leave their wives with a conditional divorce document when they set out on journeys so that their wives would be free to remarry should they fail to return after a specified length of time. Otherwise, a woman whose husband disappeared with no witness to his fate would become an agunah and would be forbidden from marrying another man.

Women's high status and economic success in Ashkenaz are attested as well by their increased involvement in Jewish religious life, including the voluntary assumption of religious practices from which they were exempt in rabbinic Judaism. A. Grossman has connected women's insertion of themselves into areas of Jewish practice that were previously exclusively male not only to their economic success but also to contemporaneous religious revivals in which Christian women took part in reshaping prayers and religious worship in the church. One example is the insistence of prominent women in serving as godmother (sandeka'it) at the *circumcision of a son or grandson. R. *Meir of Rothenburg, a major rabbinic leader of the fourteenth century, attempted to abolish this practice because he believed the presence of perfumed and well-dressed women in the synagogue among men was immodest. His failure to eliminate this custom, which continued until the beginning of the fifteenth century, indicates women's social power. Yet, it is important to note that, as the political and economic situation of European Jewish communities worsened beginning in the mid-fourteenth century and traditional authority was reasserted, most of the privileges that Jewish women had achieved were gradually curtailed.

Jews in Christian *Spain retained significant Islamic cultural influences, as in the attitude that women should remain at home, a feature of Sephardic life well into the Early Modern period, even when Jews lived in very different places after the 1492 expulsion. The Muslim practice of polygyny also had a significant impact on Spanish Jewry, who never wholly accepted Rabbi Gershom's ban. Even under Christian rulers, Spanish Jews who wished to take second wives, usually because of fertility problems or unhappy relationships with their first spouse, could obtain special royal permission by paying a fee. Although second marriages were more frequent among the wealthy, who could most easily afford the expenses of an expanded household, their prevalence indicates the lower status of the Sephardic woman as compared to Jewish women in the rest of Europe.

However, this lower status was not true in all areas. Under halakhah, widows do not inherit their husband's property, but instead either receive back their dowry or are supported by the estate of their deceased spouse. Widows who chose to remarry generally had to give up custody of their minor children to their late husband's family. However, during the late medieval period, some Jewish men in Spain filed Latin wills with Christian courts to ensure that their wives could inherit their property and maintain custody of their children. This is an example of the Jewish willingness to circumvent the disadvantages for women inherent in halakhah when it conflicted with personal circumstances and the norms of the majority culture. Widows, especially those who benefited from their husbands' recourse to the generous inheritance laws of Christian Spain, were often in control of significant resources.

Positive Jewish attitudes toward marriage and sexuality were at odds with medieval Christian teachings, which enjoined celibacy on the representatives of the church, frowned on second marriages, forbade divorce, and taught that the only purpose of marital sexuality should be procreation. Influence from the Christian environment may account for the ambivalence toward sexuality characteristic of the German Jewish pietists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the Hasidei Ashkenaz*, whose writings, such as Sefer Hasidim* (Book of the Pious), express not only an obsessive concern with the ubiquity of extramarital sexual temptations but also a profound ambivalence about the joys of marital sexuality. Although a happy marital relationship lessened the likelihood of involvement in illicit sexual temptation or activity outside marriage and was, therefore, a good thing, the Hasidei Ashkenaz were concerned that connubial pleasure might distract a man from God, who should be the focus of his greatest and most intense devotion.

Although celibacy and monastic living allowed a significant number of Christian women and, to a certain extent, some Muslim women to cross gender boundaries and secure a place alongside men as scholars, saints, and mystics in both Christianity and Islam, rabbinic insistence on universal marriage forbade any access to such life alternatives for Jewish women. Formal Judaism offered no adult avenues through which Jewish women could express their spiritual aspirations beyond marital devotion, maternal solicitude, observance of domestic Jewish rituals, and acts of charity to others. As A. Rapaport-Albert has observed, despite a Jewish ambivalence toward asceticism in general, Jewish mystical circles sanctioned ritualistic practices for men, which could include prolonged periods of sexual abstinence. Conversely, religious leaders criticized women who adopted such ascetic practices as fasting, prayer, and acts of personal deprivation. These signs of single-minded devotion to God were seen as a dereliction of a woman's primary duties to her husband and family and were suspect even in the unmarried girl and the widow (cf. BT Sotah 22a). Given these prohibitions, it is not surprising that medieval Jewish *mysticism was an essentially male endeavor.

A great deal is known about one medieval Jewish woman's activities from a poetic elegy written by Eleazar ben Judah of Worms for his wife Dolce, who was murdered along with her two daughters by intruders in their home in 1196. Dolce was the economic support for an extensive household, including children, students, and teachers. Her husband praises her needlework, recounting that she prepared thread and gut to sew together books, Torah scrolls, and other religious objects. He writes that the pious Dolce taught other women and led them in prayer; she prepared brides for their marriages and bathed the dead and sewed their shrouds, meritorious endeavors in Jewish tradition.

More than anything, R. Eleazar reveres his wife for facilitating the spiritual activities of the men of her household; the reward he invokes for Dolce at the conclusion of his lament (based on Proverbs 31:10–31) is to be wrapped in the eternal life of Paradise, a tribute to her deeds on which so many depended.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, “Dolce of Worms: The Lives and Deaths of an Exemplary Medieval Jewish Woman and Her Daughters,” in Judaism in Practice, ed. L. Fine (2001), 429–37; E. Baumgarten, Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Ashkenaz (2007); S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society. 5 vols. (1978–88); A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2001; trans. 2004); R. L. Melammed, “Sephardi Women in the Medieval and Early Modern Periods,” in Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, ed. J. R. Baskin (1998); E. Taitz, S. Henry, C. Tallan, The JPS Guide to Jewish Women (2003). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Women, Modern: Britain and North America. As many European and American Jews entered the middle class in the course of the 1800s, Judaism’s preferred positioning of women in the domestic realm, which conformed well to nineteenth-century Christian bourgeois models of female domesticity, was preserved. Jewish literature and the Jewish press of the late nineteenth century, both in *Britain and the *United States, described the Jewish woman as the “guardian angel of the house,” “mother in Israel,” and “priestess of the Jewish ideal” and assigned her primary responsibility for the Jewish identity and education of her children. Women were encouraged to express their spirituality in domestic activities such as traditional Jewish cooking and home-based observance of the *Sabbath and *festivals. However, making women rather than men responsible for inculcating Jewish identity and practices in children led from praise to criticism, as commentators began to blame mothers for their children’s increasing acculturation to the larger non-Jewish culture.

In England a significant number of Jewish women worked in the public domain to hasten the Jewish Enlightenment and *emancipation and to further religious reform. These women included social activists and advocates of liberal Judaism like Lily Montagu (1873–1963), as well as writers of both fiction and non-fiction with Jewish themes directed to Jewish and Gentile audiences, such as Grace Aguilar (d. 1847), and Marion and Celia Moss (1840s). In her popular book, The Women of Israel, Aguilar described the exalted position of women in Judaism, highlighting what she saw as women’s traditional role in hastening *redemption through instructing children and through other domestic activities (see LITERATURE: BRITAIN). Despite these uplifting messages, Jewish women’s success in the world of literature was upsetting to the men of their milieu; although male Jewish reformers in England supported a degree of female emancipation in principle, they tended to limit and undermine women’s writing and influence in the public sphere.

Nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century male leaders also discouraged efforts by women to work with men for Jewish communal goals, but they did not object to women banding together for various public purposes that benefited the Jewish community. In emulation of bourgeois Christian models of female *philanthropy and religious activism, middle-class Jewish women established service and social welfare organizations in Germany, England, and North America, including the Jüdischer Frauenbund in Germany (founded in 1904), the Union of Jewish Women in Great Britain (founded in 1902), and the National Council of Jewish Women in the United States (founded in 1893). For many Jewish women, whose synagogue roles remained limited, organizational involvement became a spiritual undertaking (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN’S: NORTH AMERICA). These groups cooperated in the international campaign against coercion of poor women into *prostitution, worked for female suffrage, instituted social welfare services (see SOCIAL WORK: UNITED STATES), and argued for greater recognition of women within their respective Jewish communities. In the process, as women acquired administrative expertise and assumed authoritative and responsible public roles, they blurred the boundaries between traditional male and female spheres of action. In North America, Jewish women’s organizations included *synagogue sisterhoods, which devoted themselves to the domestic management of the *synagogue – decorating the sanctuary for festivals, catering synagogue events, and performing many other housekeeping functions. National organizations of sisterhoods, separated by denomination, encouraged local groups in their activities and provided a forum for public female leadership. Sisterhoods of all denominations, however, recognized that females had to be Jewishly educated to strengthen Jewish observance at home and instill Jewish values in their children, and they encouraged expanded educational opportunities for women of all ages. Similarly, American Jewish women played a central role in establishing, supervising, and teaching in synagogue religious schools (see GRATZ, REBECCA).

The first generation of Jewish immigrants from *Eastern Europe who arrived in the United States between 1880 and 1914 were not, on the whole, middle class. Of these immigrants, 43% were women, a far higher proportion than among other immigrant groups. The values these immigrants brought with them, even as they were gradually transformed by America, permitted women to play a complex role in helping their families adjust to their new environment. Thus, most women contributed to the family income in one way or another. A significant number sought the benefits of higher education, whereas others took advantage of a variety of public secular activities. Young Jewish immigrant women were influenced by the world of work where they were exposed to union issues and socialist ideas; many were ardent participants and leaders in labor activism (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT). Even after they married, Jewish women continued their public roles through leading rent strikes, organizing the 1902 kosher meat boycott, and agitating for the availability of birth control information and support for women’s suffrage. In the period after *World War II, Eastern European Jewish immigrants and their children became increasingly successful economically and began to enter the middle class. They tended to follow the educational, occupational, residential, and religious patterns of previous waves of Jewish settlers in North America, including affiliation with Conservative and Reform synagogues (see JUDAISM entries) and a preference that women should not work outside the home. Many women now had leisure for volunteer activities and became members of the national Jewish women’s organizations founded earlier in the American Jewish experience or became involved in synagogue sisterhood activities.

CONTEMPORARY REALITIES: In the early twenty-first century, women's roles in Jewish organizational life are in a period of significant transformation. In this more egalitarian era, where women are often highly educated and hold professional jobs, it is not unusual to see women leaders in synagogues and in other Jewish communal groups that are not limited to women. This integration of the sexes in general communal leadership has called into question the continued existence of same-sex organizations such as synagogue sisterhoods and brotherhoods. Moreover, at a time when many women are employed outside the home, it is far more difficult for middle-class women to spare the hours they once devoted to volunteer activities; this may also affect the continued existence of Jewish women's organizations.

In the last three decades of the twentieth century and in the first decade of the twenty-first, Jewish women's religious and educational opportunities and roles in Judaism and the Jewish community have expanded in a number of ways, such as the ordination of women as rabbis in the liberal wings of Judaism (see RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN), women becoming *cantors, the transformations of synagogue liturgy to include women as worshipers and to incorporate gender-neutral language about God (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST; WORSHIP), and the development of new *life-cycle rituals. Many women who did not receive substantial Jewish educations in childhood are taking advantage of adult education opportunities (see EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: ADULT), and a number participate in adult *Bat Mitzvah ceremonies.

Rabbinic ordination for women is still far from imminent in Orthodox communities (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX), although educational opportunities for women have expanded impressively in traditional Judaism in the past hundred years. The first religiously oriented schools for Jewish girls from Orthodox families were established in 1918 in Eastern Europe under the leadership of Sarah *Schenirer (1883–1935). Although the Bais Yaakov school network that Schenirer inspired emphasized modesty and humility more than rigorous study, it set a precedent for female education in Orthodox Judaism that has endured. In the present day, the secular opportunities that have transformed women's educational and vocational expectations in the wider world have had a decided impact on some sectors of the traditional community as well. Orthodox girls and women now have many options for serious study of traditional Jewish texts, and some have also become authors on Jewish topics of all kinds. In the early twenty-first century, halakhically knowledgeable women serve as rabbinic assistants in a number of Modern Orthodox synagogues in North America and are trained to act as expert advocates on legal issues connected with women's status in *Israel.

Contemporaneous and in many ways linked with the growth and development of Jewish feminism is the visibility of identified gay and lesbian Jews, as well as of single Jews regardless of sexual orientation, as active participants within the Jewish community. Although Jewish domestic life has historically been centered around family units consisting of male and female parents and their children, the delayed age of marriage and the growing numbers of unmarried Jews, as well as contemporary openness regarding homosexuality, have changed the demographic make-up of many Jewish communities. Most liberal approaches to Judaism agree that Jewish ethical teachings and the future of the Jewish people require communal institutions to welcome and value formerly marginalized individuals and groups who do not conform to traditional family models (see ETHICS, SEXUAL).

For further reading, see M. Galchinsky, The Origin of the Modern Jewish Woman Writer: Romance and Reform in Victorian England (1996); E. M. Umansky, Lily Montagu and the Advancement of Liberal Judaism: From Vision to Vocation (1983); P. E. Hyman, Gender and Assimilation in Modern Jewish History: The Roles and Representation of Women (1995); L. G. Kuzmack, Women's Cause: The Jewish Woman's Movement in England and the United States, 1881–1933 (1990); S. B. Fishman, A Breath of Life: Feminism in the American Jewish Community (1993); D. Orenstein, ed., Lifecycles: Jewish Women on Life Passages and Personal Milestones (1994); and V. L. Ochs, Inventing Jewish Ritual (2007).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Women, Modern: Central Europe. Before 1750, the lives of Jewish women in the various *German states and the *Habsburg Empire did not differ greatly from those of other *Yiddish-speaking *Ashkenazi women within *Poland or the *Russian Empire, but thereafter their paths diverged considerably. Growing up in towns or villages with small, traditional Jewish communities, Jewish women before 1750 generally married in their late teens or early twenties and raised fairly large families, while helping their husbands run a business at home or in the marketplace. Young Jewish girls learned household and economic skills from their mothers; most could read *Yiddish and some learned *Hebrew or secular subjects with tutors in the home, but usually they received little formal instruction.

The first Central European Jewish woman we know about from her own writings is Glikl bas Judah Leib (1747–1824), often referred to as *Glückel of Hameln, who wrote a memoir (see also LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA): LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1800; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE). Her family belonged to the elite group of wealthy *Court Jews involved in international trading of jewels and other goods. Married at fourteen and the mother of twelve children who survived to adulthood, she was very actively involved in her husband's business, especially when he was traveling. She was also greatly preoccupied with arranging suitable *marriages for her children and providing her daughters with dowries. Glückel was knowledgeable about Jewish ritual and values; she maintained a traditional Jewish home, strictly observing *dietary laws and the laws of *niddah. As a widow, she often attended *synagogue, sitting in a separate women's gallery cut off from the men (see also FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD).

By the end of the eighteenth century, however, some wealthy and well-educated Jewish women began to distance themselves from their traditional roles and to interact with non-Jews in social settings. Some of these women ultimately left the Jewish community. In early nineteenth century *Berlin, a small group of "salon women" entertained leading German intellectuals and noblemen in their homes; some of these women, including *Moses Mendelssohn's daughter Dorothea Veit von Schlegel ([born Brendel] 1764–1839), divorced their Jewish husbands and converted to Christianity so they could marry non-Jewish men. Another woman of this circle was Rahel Levin Varnhagen, (1771–1833), a woman of letters who converted and married a Christian diplomat, Karl August Varnhagen von Ense. Although *divorce and *intermarriage remained quite rare in Germany and Austria-Hungary before World War I, baptism was generally a prerequisite for a Jewish woman to marry a Christian. The vast majority of Jewish women, however, married Jewish men and raised their children as Jews.

During the course of the nineteenth century, German Jewish women became increasingly urbanized and adopted a more middle-class lifestyle. Gradually, they abandoned their significant economic role in the family business and focused their attention on their household and on child rearing. M. Kaplan has shown that women became responsible for preserving Jewish tradition in the home, especially through preparing *Sabbath eve and *festival family dinners and creating what has become known as “domestic (or gastronomic) Judaism,” while at the same time inculcating German language and culture (Bildung) in their children. Jewish women also became involved in voluntary philanthropic activities and formed Jewish women’s clubs.

Yet, women did not take part in the leadership of the organized Jewish community (or Gemeinde), nor did they engage in the study of Jewish texts. As the Reform movement developed in nineteenth-century Central Europe, synagogue worship became more accessible for women: German *sermons became the norm, prayer services were conducted in the vernacular, and *confirmation ceremonies were introduced for both girls and boys (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY). Married women often frequented synagogues, sometimes outnumbering the men, but separate seating for men and women continued to prevail in Central European synagogues. As B. M. Baader has pointed out, German Jewish women did not become as learned as Jewish men had been, but instead Jewish men became less knowledgeable about *Torah and *Talmud and more like the women in their level of Jewish education.

In Central Europe, Jewish girls were more highly educated than Christian girls; they attended Jewish communal and public coed elementary schools and also private secondary schools for girls. In the early twentieth century, Jewish women began attending university in disproportionately large numbers, following the examples of their fathers and brothers. Both unmarried and married Jewish women were discouraged from working outside the home for pay, but single women, including widows and divorcées, often sought employment in commerce, teaching, social work, and other professions to support themselves and their families, especially after World War I.

Jewish women played a very prominent role in the late-nineteenth-century German women’s movement and in 1904 created the Jüdischer Frauenbund (League of Jewish Women), led by Bertha *Pappenheim. They were in the forefront of the establishment of modern kindergartens, the fight against the coercion of women into *prostitution, the struggle for women’s suffrage, and the promotion of birth control. Some also became quite visible in Central European politics, especially within the Social Democratic and *Communist Parties.

By the twentieth century, Jewish women in Central Europe were marrying in their mid- to late twenties, and some never married, whether by choice or because of a lack of suitable partners. Arranged marriages were no longer common, dowries played less of a role, and most marriages had at least the appearance of being love matches. After World War I, *intermarriage increased, while the number of Jewish marriages declined; more Jewish men married outside the faith than Jewish women. German Jewish women were among the pioneers in family planning in Central Europe; the Jewish birth rate began to decline about a generation earlier than the overall German birth rate. By the interwar years, having two or three children was becoming the norm in Jewish families.

Jewish women were highly acculturated into middle-class German society and often served as patrons of the arts and the theater; for the most part, they identified both as Germans (or Austrians) and as Jews. However, they were all aware of *antisemitism and tended to socialize primarily with other Jews. After the *Nazis assumed power, Jewish women were more willing than Jewish men to leave Central Europe; however, proportionately more women than men remained when World War II began, whether because they felt less threatened personally, because they were elderly, or because they chose to remain with elderly parents. Even during the Nazi era, women continued to take care of their families and to work on behalf of others in the Jewish community as long as this was possible (see also HOLOCAUST: ROLE OF GENDER).

For further reading, see D. Hertz, Jewish High Society in Old Regime Berlin (1988); M. Kaplan, The Making of the Jewish Middle Class (1991); idem, Between Dignity and Despair: Jewish Life in Nazi Germany (1999); B. M. Baader, Gender, Judaism, and Bourgeois Culture in Germany (2006); and H. P. Friedenreich, Female, Jewish and Educated: The Lives of Central European University Women (2002). HARRIET PASS FREIDENREICH

Women, Modern: Eastern Europe. The domestic and communal roles, religious lives, and educations of the Jews of Eastern Europe were highly gendered. This traditional model prevailed well into the nineteenth century, when new ideologies and economic factors led to the opening of unprecedented opportunities for Eastern European Jewish women.

In traditional Jewish life, women were absent from communal leadership, study, and worship. Just as women were not able to hold public office in non-Jewish society, so, too, they could hold no office within the structure of the kahal or kehillah, the local Jewish self-government (see COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION). However, women could serve as members of certain communal organizations (hevrot), such as the burial society (hevra kadishah). Their activity within these groups increased significantly in the later nineteenth century. However, women remained excluded from traditional communal religious life, which maintained its dominance until the late nineteenth century. Sitting in a separate section of the *synagogue, they could attend public worship, but were not religiously obligated to do so. For the benefit of those women who did not know the prayers and perhaps could not read, a literate woman might recite the service aloud, whether in *Hebrew or *Yiddish, in the women’s section (see WORSHIP).

Women's major religious activities were home-based, rather than centered on the synagogue or study house. They were expected to observe those *commandments that applied especially to them, to run their homes according to Jewish norms, and to raise and ensure the education of their children. Most girls did not receive any formal education, although some did spend a few years at heder, the traditional primary school. Female education was primarily of a practical, domestic nature, transmitted from mother to daughter. If women were literate, it was likely to be in Yiddish, not Hebrew. In their home rituals and practices, they were able to express their spirituality through tkhines*, personal supplications in Yiddish that were specifically written for women (see PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL). As an informal religious-social activity, women often met together on *Sabbath afternoons to read devotional literature, particularly the Tzene-rene, a Yiddish retelling of the weekly *Torah portion with moralistic and narrative elaborations (see LITERATURE: YIDDISH [BEGINNINGS TO 1700]). The *Hasidic movement, which spread rapidly from the early 1800s on, did not improve women's position. Not only did *Hasidism retain traditional gender roles but it also encouraged men to leave their families to spend holidays and other extended periods in the courts of their *rebbe*s, leaving women and children home alone (see also HASIDISM, EUROPE: WOMEN; VERBERMACHER, HANNAH RACHEL).

As the nineteenth century unfolded, however, formal educational opportunities expanded, at least for some women. Although males were safeguarded from secular subjects, particularly foreign languages, which were seen as the gateway to non-Jewish ideas and society, girls were often allowed and even encouraged to learn other languages. Women in the lower classes needed these skills to enhance their earning opportunities; for Jewish woman in the middle and upper classes, linguistic facility was a sign of their family's culture and prosperity and also had economic benefits as well.

As the nineteenth century progressed, the division between women's and men's roles widened because of demographic and socioeconomic factors. While the population grew rapidly, economic circumstances worsened, and more men devoted their time to study. Traditional Jewish society placed a high value on this activity because it provided a meaningful occupation and reduced the competition for employment. Many women became the breadwinners, earning religious merit vicariously by enabling their men to participate in a life of piety.

Leading figures of the Haskalah*, the Jewish Enlightenment, such as Judah Leib Gordon, championed the cause of women, underscoring what they viewed as their victimization by traditional rabbinic culture. Proponents of the Jewish Enlightenment (maskilim) attacked arranged *marriages, early marriages, men who did not support their families, and women working outside the home. The maskilic vision was not of a world of gender equality; rather they sought to remake Eastern European Jewish society on the model of western middle-class (bourgeois) society in which women were homemakers, nurturing the next generation. To educate and shape the future molders of the Jewish people, maskilim established schools for Jewish girls. Given the traditional value system, modern education for girls was not controversial. However, efforts to reform traditional modes of education for boys were strongly opposed.

As nineteenth-century Jewish women were increasingly exposed to new ideas through education and the growing availability of popular Yiddish novels, a small number of women became writers themselves. This minority of educated Jewish women, such as Miriam Markel-Mosessohn and Pauline Epstein *Wengeroff, served as "agents of acculturation" (Balin). Jewish women wrote in Russian, Polish, and German, as well as in Yiddish. However, many Jewish women found that their literary aspirations led to estrangement from a Jewish society that was not accepting of female encroachment into what were considered male realms of achievement.

The *Russian government severely limited opportunities for higher education for women in general; only an elite minority obtained higher education through special courses for women. When educational opportunities for girls opened at the time of the Russian Revolution (1917), Jews availed themselves of these new options. Some also went to Western Europe for professional training. In reaction to the increasing number of Jewish girls gaining a secular education in the interwar period, a network of Orthodox schools for girls, the Bais Yaakov schools, was founded to offer an education steeped in traditional values that would keep girls within the fold (see SCHENIRER, SARAH).

For the most part, women worked by helping their husbands in their work. Some also had market stalls or ran inns. The primary route to financial and economic independence was through widowhood. Along with educational opportunities, however, employment opportunities for Jewish women in both *Poland and Russia increased over the course of the nineteenth and into the twentieth century. Women also obtained professional training in occupations that were considered less prestigious, more poorly compensated, and less desirable for men, such as pharmacy and dentistry.

*Marriage ages underwent a shift in the course of the nineteenth century. Initially, Jewish society still valued early arranged marriages: boys at thirteen and girls at twelve (although only the wealthy could afford to marry their children off so early). By the late nineteenth century, marriages more often took place at a later age, and although they were still arranged, the young people involved were sometimes allowed to have input into the choice. The primary criteria employed in the matchmaking process for elite families were family wealth and lineage, in addition to "the state of health, appearance, talents, and temperaments of the candidates for marriage" (Etkes). Major considerations were the prospective groom's level of learning and facility for study. It was considered meritorious, if one could afford it, to obtain a bridegroom for one's daughter who would devote himself to full-time study.

Because the couple was often very young and the groom was usually studying and not earning a living, the couple often lived with the bride's parents for a few years. Their marriage document specified the number of years the couple would live with and be supported by the bride's parents. Sometimes a husband would travel and spend prolonged periods in other cities to pursue his Torah studies, leaving his wife behind. If the couple already had children, the wife had to raise the children alone, while also supporting the family. In a typical home, there was no shared responsibility for caring for children, educating children, or any household business. A Jewish woman was expected to fulfill these roles happily, as her part in supporting a scholar, although sources indicate that marital tensions often developed because of this gendered division of labor. Yet, the number of Jewish men who devoted themselves to scholarship was always relatively small. Jews at the lower end of the social ladder, possessing neither financial resources nor learning, would often make their own matches. Young women might work as household servants, seamstresses, or laundresses to earn their own dowries so that they could arrange a marriage for themselves.

Women became active members in the various types of political organizations that emerged in the second half of the nineteenth century. They participated in disproportionate numbers in the general revolutionary movements in tsarist Russia, as well as in the *Zionist movement and the *Bund, the Jewish labor movement. Examples include Puah Rakovsky and Anna Rozental, respectively. It was only in the Bund, however, that women had significant opportunities to hold positions of leadership.

Recent research includes E. R. Adler, In Her Hands: The Education of Jewish Girls in Tsarist Russia (2010); C. B. Balin, To Reveal Our Hearts: Jewish Women Writers in Tsarist Russia (2000); I. Etkes, "Marriage and Torah Study among the Lomdim in Lithuania in the Nineteenth Century," in The Jewish Family: Metaphor and Memory, ed. D. Kraemer (1989); C. R. Freeze, Jewish Marriage and Divorce in Imperial Russia (2002); P. E. Hyman, "Gender," The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe (2008); P. Rakovska, My Life as a Radical Jewish Woman: Memoirs of a Zionist Feminist in Poland, ed. P. E. Hyman (2003); S. Stampfer, "Gender Differentiation and Education of the Jewish Woman in Nineteenth-Century Eastern Europe," Polin 7 (1992); and C. Weissler, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women (1999).

LISA COHEN

Women: Pre- and Post-State Israel. The pioneers of the First *Aliyah (1882–1903) and Second Aliyah (1904–18) included both men and women (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: JEWISH IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948). Most of the women of the First Aliyah accompanied their husbands and settled into domestic roles in agricultural settlements or urban environments. The women of this immigration wave, most of whom were deeply committed to their new lives in *Palestine, achieved little public recognition or participation. Many of the idealistic young people of the Second Aliyah, inspired by Labor *Zionism, had been trained to work the land in *Russia in Zionist training schools that stressed the equality of women and men. On arriving in *Palestine, most young single women, a significant minority among the second wave of immigrants (17–18%), found their options limited and their choices narrowed, simply as a result of their gender. Unmarried women were virtually unemployable as agricultural workers and were forced to survive by providing men with kitchen and laundry services. Denied membership as single women in most collective settlements and refused employment as agricultural workers, a few women founded successful female agricultural and urban collectives.

In the years after World War I, the majority of single women in the *Yishuv ended up working in cities as cooks or laundresses, seamstresses or clerks, or maids in private homes. Under the immigration regulations imposed by the *British Mandate on the Third Aliyah (1919–23), women were allowed to enter Palestine as dependents, wives, and elderly mothers, but only a few could enter as prospective workers and receive a labor immigration permit. Fewer women than men immigrated to Palestine (36% were women) and two-thirds to 90% of all women came as dependents, as compared to 10–20% of all men. Labor permits were allocated to more than 50% of all men and to only 10% of immigrant women. In the Yishuv, traditional gendered divisions of labor and patterns of authority tended to be preserved, and these patterns continued after 1948 as well.

The kibbutz (collective agricultural settlement) movement provided an alternative for the relatively few single women who were accepted into these communities. Many kibbutzim were dedicated to bold social restructurings of the family to create a society in which each individual would achieve economic independence. In such a setting, wives would not be dependent on their husbands and would no longer be subservient to them. The family was to be renewed in such a way that men and women would be equal and independent partners sharing common goals, and women would be emancipated from domestic demands to work with men in building the land. Yet even on the kibbutz, women mainly worked in kitchens and laundries, and their role in child care was difficult since children were often raised collectively in children's houses under the care of nurses and teachers. Parents only saw their children for an hour or two each day. In this way, mothers were freed to function as independent members of the collective, and children were to benefit from feeling that all the adults were concerned for their welfare. Yet, there is a general acknowledgment now that collective child rearing was problematic for both children and parents. In the twenty-first century, the kibbutz children's house is a thing of the past (see STATE OF ISRAEL: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT).

Modern Israel continues to be far from progressive where the status of women is concerned. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, it is more conservative than most other western democracies on women's issues. Despite significant achievements and a high level of education, Israeli women continue to earn less than their male counterparts, are less visible and influential in the political arena, do not share equal responsibilities or privileges in the military, have unequal rights and freedoms in family life, and are secondary in shaping the nation's cultural orientation. This inequality is a result of entrenched attitudes towards women in Jewish tradition in general, as well as the impact of highly conservative Middle Eastern cultures on many Israelis from Muslim countries.

Although women are eligible for military service, most women in the army are assigned to education, clerical work, and training. Fewer than half of all eligible women are actually conscripted because they are not really needed in the military, although army technology is beginning to create more equal tasks for the Israeli woman soldier and in recent years women's opportunities in the military have been expanding. Given the historical pattern of secondary roles, however, women remain poorly represented in the upper echelons of the military, as they are in public and political life, in the civil service, and in academia. Because a military background has come to be a necessary prerequisite for public office, women have found it very difficult to break into politics. One consequence of the emphasis on national security is that what are seen as women's issues, particularly in areas like health, education, and welfare, have received low priority.

The Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women and individual female members of the Knesset (Israeli parliament) are attempting to advance women's status through legislative initiatives addressing equality at work, violence against women, and welfare, health, and fertility concerns. The growing awareness of the unequal status of women in the early-twenty-first century has led to an increasing presence of women in managerial and decision-making positions. In recent decades, Israel's growing feminist movement has begun to bring cases to Israel's Supreme Court on issues as diverse as access to *abortion, women's right to be elected to and hold seats on municipal religious councils, and the ability of women's prayer groups to hold services at the Western Wall (see also ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT).

This increased feminist activity, influenced by the women's movement throughout the western world, has illuminated the gender and religious tensions that characterize modern Israeli society. Although legal advocacy and political activities constitute alternative approaches to combating women's unequal roles, fundamental transformations in Israel's governmental structure are necessary if gender equality is to be realized. Similarly, true change for women will only come when the adjudication of family law and personal status issues is removed from the sole control of the Orthodox rabbinate, which has been inflexible in easing the discriminations against women inherent in halakhic tradition.

Important scholarship includes D. Bernstein, ed., Pioneers and Homemakers: Jewish Women in Pre-State Israel (1992); idem, The Struggle for Equality: Urban Women Workers in Prestate Israeli Society (1986); E. Fuchs, ed., Israeli Women's Studies: A Reader (2005); M. Palgi et al., Sexual Equality: The Israeli Kibbutz Tests the Theories (1983); and K. Misra and M. Rich, eds., Jewish Feminism in Israel: Some Contemporary Perspectives (2000). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Workmen's Circle (Arbeter Ring). Founded by *Eastern European Jewish immigrants in *New York City in the late 1890s, this fraternal society (see UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES) offered its members mutual aid, health and death benefits, and educational and cultural activities. The order supported international labor and socialist movements (see UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT) and championed *Yiddish as the Jewish language. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, the group highlights its Jewish identity, but originally it did not espouse explicitly Jewish goals.

In 1900, the Workmen's Circle became a national organization and grew rapidly. Members played a significant role in the development of the trade union movement, and the organization provided a range of social, educational, and health services, including a tuberculosis sanatorium that operated from 1910 to 1955. In 1916 it founded a network of secular supplementary schools for children that stressed the study of Yiddish language and Jewish history. The Workmen's Circle also maintained summer camps (see SUMMER CAMPING), choruses, and dramatic societies and sponsored lectures. The years 1920–26 marked the high point for membership, followed by a subsequent decline as a result of restrictive U.S. immigration laws. Despite efforts to avoid a rift over *communism, thousands of pro-communist members left the order and created a rival group, the International Workers Order, in 1929.

*World War II brought change as many young Jews reared in a Workmen Circle milieu entered the military and gradually became estranged from the order's socialist ideals. Reflecting this reality, the post-war Workmen's Circle began adopting positions that were liberal and allied with the Democratic Party.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, with a membership composed primarily of American-born Jews, the order operates a summer camp for children, a summer resort for adults, and several homes for the elderly; it also works on behalf of liberal and leftist positions. Although membership has declined, branches operate in several American Jewish communities. RACHEL GORDAN

World Union for Progressive Judaism was founded in London (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN) in 1926 as the international body of Reform, Liberal, Progressive, and Reconstructionist Jews (see JUDAISM entries). Since 1973 its international headquarters has been in *Jerusalem. The World Union membership encompasses more than one and a half million Jews in more than thirty countries. In *Israel, the World Union for Progressive Judaism has established synagogue-community centers, settlements, schools, and a World Education Center in Jerusalem. The newest centers of activity are in *Eastern and *Central Europe. In the former *Soviet Union, many new congregations and leadership training programs have been established. The World Union publishes *prayer books and liturgical and educational materials, helps recruit rabbinic and professional leaders, and assists new congregations throughout the world. RACHEL GORDAN

World War I: Impact on American Jews. American Jews were deeply divided about World War I (1914–18) until late in the conflict. Only by confronting a series of dramatic events overseas and the demands of wartime life could the nation's three million Jews unite in their support for the Allies, a turbulent process that underscored their changing identities in the *United States.

American Jewish opinion rested most heavily on the fate of the Jewish *Pale of Settlement and the *Russian Empire. During the war's first three years, a majority of the Jewish population, *immigrants from *Eastern Europe, wished above all for the end of tsarist rule and its notorious *antisemitism. Thus, there was strong American Jewish sentiment in favor of a German victory. With the Russian Revolution of February 1917 and the entry of the United States into the war that April, many were able to shift their support to the Allies. Initially the opposition to the American war effort from the Jewish left was one of the largest sources of dissent in the country. Yet, the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk signed by *Germany and the new *Bolshevik government in Russia soon reversed this remaining opposition. Under that agreement, Germany occupied much of Eastern Europe in early 1918, placing millions of Jews under military rule. In stark contrast, Woodrow Wilson's championing of national self-determination and Anglo-American approval of a Jewish homeland in *Palestine (in the *Balfour Declaration of 1917) made Allied war aims acceptable across the diverse political spectrum of American Jewry.

This consensus mirrored Jewish cooperation on a variety of war-related activities, most urgently on efforts to aid Jewish refugees along the Eastern Front and in *Palestine. Displaying remarkable unity, the Eastern European and Central European communities, together with Jewish labor, formed the American Jewish *Joint Distribution Committee, which between 1914 and 1924 administered more than $60 million in critical services to 750,000 Jews in Eastern Europe alone. Unprecedented Jewish cooperation also strengthened the American war effort. Approximately 200,000 Jews served in the U.S. armed forces. To meet their cultural needs, a diverse group of Jewish religious bodies created the Jewish Welfare Board, providing military locations worldwide with rabbis, social workers, and recreational activities (see UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY). Jews also served in homefront agencies and contributed millions of dollars to the nation's Liberty Loan and Red Cross campaigns.

American Jewish opinion converged most dramatically in the desire to secure a haven for the world's oppressed Jews. Before 1914, *Zionism had few American advocates, but the war's devastation made the goal of a Jewish homeland both critical and realistic. By November 1918, membership in American Zionist organizations totaled 200,000, and a nationally elected *American Jewish Congress prepared to attend the Versailles peace negotiations.

As a result of World War I, American Jews further distanced themselves from their European pasts, increased their attachment to life in the United States, and became a powerful influence in international Jewish affairs. Despite the tragedy of Versailles and the rise of American antisemitism during the 1920s, the war years produced enduring sources of strength and unity in American Jewish life.

For further reading, see C. M. Sterba, Good Americans: Italian and Jewish Immigrants during the First World War (2003); G. Sorin, A Time for Building: The Third Migration, 1880–1920 (1992); and A. Gal, "The Mission Motif in American Zionism, 1898–1948," American Jewish History 75(4) (1980): 363–85.

CHRISTOPHER M. STERBA

World War II: Impact on American Jews. American Jews had been watching the spread of *antisemitism in Europe since Hitler's rise to power in 1933. Unlike the situation of divided loyalties during *World War I, American Jews were united in their opposition to *Nazism, although they differed on how best to oppose Germany. These differences evolved over the course of the war's six years, colored by ideologies that ranged from fervent communism to deeply pious Orthodoxy, with most American Jews positioned as strong proponents of the New Deal. American Jews voted overwhelmingly to support President Franklin Delano Roosevelt for an unprecedented third term in 1940 and a fourth term in 1944. They believed in the four freedoms: freedom of speech and religion and freedom from want and fear. The Jewish commitment to defeating Hitler contributed to their enthusiastic embrace of military service once the United States entered the conflict after the bombing of Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. More than a half-million Jews served in all branches of the armed forces, roughly one-half of those eligible for the draft.

Jews also sought to rescue European Jews, especially during the years when the United States was not at war. Here, too, American Jews differed on the best ways to respond to escalating Nazi persecution, detention in concentration camps, ghettoization of Polish Jews, reports of mass murders of hundreds of thousands of Jewish civilians after the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, and, finally, extermination of millions in death camps (see HOLOCAUST and related entries). This final devastating news reached American Jews late in 1942, during the first year of American participation in the war, which had been filled with defeats inflicted by Japan. The unfolding of the *Shoah, coupled with extensive military service, transformed American Jews. They emerged from the war as the largest, most prosperous, politically engaged Jewish community in the world, eager to build a different world for their children.

Sharp disagreements divided American Jews regarding how to rescue European Jews. These intracommunal conflicts erupted as *antisemitism flourished in the United States, finding expression on the floors of Congress, in boardrooms and clubrooms, in popular culture, and within many Christian churches. Often accused of exercising too much power in the United States and of goading the nation to war, Jews discovered how little influence they possessed to loosen restrictive *immigration quotas or persuade President Roosevelt to challenge British policy limiting Jewish immigration to Palestine (see WHITE PAPER, 1939). Even within such ideological groups as *Zionists or left-wing radicals, Jews proposed alternative solutions designed to advance their goals. These included opening a second front, supporting the Allies in their efforts to win the war, advocating for a Jewish army, bombing *Auschwitz, ransoming *Hungarian Jews, and admitting refugees into camps in the United States. Each Jewish group raised funds, agitated in the press, lobbied Congress and the executive branch, staged rallies, petitioned, and protested.

Liberation of the death camps in 1945 revealed how their efforts had been unsuccessful in stopping or even slowing the murder of European Jews. Historians continue to debate whether American Jews could have done more and whether the failure stemmed from a lack of determination, flawed policies, lack of power, or from antisemitic individuals in the Roosevelt administration (see also HOLOCAUST: UNITED STATES JEWISH RESPONSE).

Although most American Jews watched the war unfold from the security of the homefront, almost all of them also worried about a relative in uniform who was fighting. Military service introduced young Jews who had grown up in big cities to a country they had never seen. They encountered fellow citizens who had never met Jews, as well as Jews from American small towns and from parts of the world considered exotic, like *North Africa and *India. Jews in uniform learned how to fight the enemies of the United States as well as the prejudices of their fellow soldiers. Jews in the military met all challenges to prove their bravery and manhood. They sustained substantial losses and casualties, fighting in all theaters of war. They also discovered that their Jewishness was integral to their identities, as integral as their American patriotism.

The armed forces propagated the concept of an American Judeo-Christian tradition: Judaism was represented as one of the three fighting faiths of democracy, symbolized in the sacrificial heroism of the four chaplains on the USAT Dorchester (two Protestants, a Catholic, and a Jew), who gave up their life preservers that other men might live when the ship was torpedoed in February 1943. Jewish GIs learned to pray together with Protestant and Catholic soldiers, especially at memorial services. The 311 Jewish chaplains who served during the war not only ministered to men of all faiths and championed the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, central tenets of the emerging Judeo-Christian tradition, but also established a Jewish ecumenism among Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform Jews (see JUDAISM entries), expressed in the joint *prayer book they developed and used during the war (see also UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY). These experiences dramatically changed perceptions of Jews and Judaism in the United States after the war and encouraged cooperation among diverse American Jewish rabbis, as well as non-Jewish clergy (see INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES).

The end of the European war in May 1945 revealed the staggering losses that world Jews had sustained and embittered the taste of victory. Liberating the death camps sickened and angered even combat-hardened veterans; the Third Reich was worse than they had ever imagined. Although the war did not end until the Japanese surrender in August, images of the stacks of emaciated bodies, mounds of hair and eyeglasses, and pitiful stares of living skeletons endured as the ultimate horrors of World War II for American Jews, rather than the agonies of the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

When the United States entered World War II, American Jews expected the war would change the world. They did not realize how the war would change them. Secure in their American identity in the post-war era, they accepted their new position as leaders of the most powerful community of the Jewish *Diaspora. As they extended their hands in support of Jews struggling for a Jewish state, they also addressed the unfinished business of rectifying the injustices of American democracy. They recognized that the fight against anti-Semitism involved preserving and defending democracy and seeking full equality for all Americans in a free society. For further reading, see D. D. Moore, GI Jews (2004); Y. Bauer, American Jewry and the Holocaust (1981); and H. Feingold, Bearing Witness (1995).

DEBORAH DASH MOORE

Worship. BIBLICAL PERIOD: Israelites, like the peoples in surrounding cultures, worshiped through sacrifices. The Hebrew *Bible presents Israelite worship (as opposed to individual devotional acts) as beginning after the revelation of the *Torah at Mount Sinai and the erection of the desert *Tabernacle (mishkan) that housed the *ark containing the *Ten Commandments. There were also secondary places of worship. King *David brought the ark to *Jerusalem (2 Sam 6), and his son, King *Solomon, built the magnificent First *Temple to house it (1 Kgs 6–8). When the kingdom split after Solomon's death, Jeroboam built new temples in his northern kingdom of *Israel, explicitly to discourage pilgrimage to Jerusalem, now capital of the southern kingdom of *Judah (1 Kgs 12:28ff). Centralization of Israelite religion in Jerusalem followed the fall of the northern kingdom to the *Assyrians in 722 BCE. The First Temple was destroyed by the *Babylonians in 586 BCE. In 516 BCE, two decades after the *Persians permitted Jewish leaders to return to Judah and Jerusalem, construction of the Second Temple began. This Temple, rebuilt and expanded over the years, stood until its destruction during the First *Jewish War against *Rome in 70 CE.

Temple worship on behalf of the entire nation revolved around morning and evening offerings by the priests of a sheep or goat, the tamid, accompanied by a meal offering and a libation. An additional or musaf offering of the same sort, as well as other animal offerings specific to the day, marked most holidays. The priests (kohanim), descendants of Moses' brother *Aaron, were assisted by Levites, also members of the tribe of Levi. Jewish households, both in the Land of Israel and the *Diaspora, paid annual taxes to support sacrificial worship. Generally, portions of sacrificed animals fed the priests or formed the heart of a communal meal for those making offerings. Individuals also brought occasional sacrifices according to their means to cleanse themselves from sin or impurity or as a special mark of thanksgiving. Daily offerings included wine, fine flour, and agricultural products. Male Jews were expected to attend the Temple for the three *pilgrimage *festivals: *Passover, *Shavuot (Weeks), and *Sukkot; most, however, attended infrequently (see also TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT).

By the late *Second Temple period, the *synagogue (Greek for "gathering place"; Hebrew, beit keneset, with the same meaning) emerged as the center of local Jewish communal life, both in the Land of Israel and the Diaspora. Similar institutions, often called associations or colleges, were normal parts of the social, political, and religious structure of Greco-Roman society.

RABBINIC PRAYER: The Rabbis, the leaders of *rabbinic Judaism, shaped the foundations of contemporary Jewish liturgy. Their fundamental prayer structures appear in the *Mishnah, the earliest rabbinic text (ca. 200 CE), although there is almost no evidence for widespread participation in rabbinic worship practices until the third or fourth centuries. After the Temple's destruction, R.*Johanan ben Zakkai issued decrees adapting non-sacrificial Temple rituals for use outside of the Temple (M. Rosh Ha-Shanah 4:1–4). His successor, Gamaliel, decreed that "every day, each person must recite (the) eighteen benedictions" (M. Berakhot 4:3). Rabbinic texts refer to these benedictions as "The Prayer" (ha-tefillah); later, Jews commonly called it the shemoneh esrei (eighteen) or the amidah* (standing), for the posture in which it is recited. The amidah was recited facing Jerusalem, and its times of recitation were correlated to the times for the Temple's perpetual offerings (BT Berakhot 26a–b; JT Berakhot 4:1, 7b); in the absence of the Temple it now functioned as Israel's covenantal worship of God.

The separate paragraphs of this prayer were recited in order and, ideally, in Hebrew. When at least ten adult male Jews (a minyan) were present, one person could serve as the community's representative before God, reciting the prayers aloud while the others fulfilled their obligations by responding "amen." The amidah begins with three benedictions of praise, establishing the worshiper's relationship with the monarch/God; only then is it appropriate to voice personal petitions, followed by three final blessings offering thanksgiving before leaving the monarch's presence. The weekday petitions collectively call on God to fulfill the messianic promise of restoring Jewish sovereignty in the Land of Israel, complete with a Davidic monarch and a rebuilt Temple in Jerusalem. The Talmud teaches that Rabban Gamliel called for adding another petition, a nineteenth benediction, known as the birkat ha-minim, the malediction of the sectarians (BT Berakhot 28b–29a).

Less is known about the origins of the rest of rabbinic liturgy. At some point, the pre-rabbinic synagogue's reading of scripture became a cyclical reading of the entire *Torah (Pentateuch/Five Books of Moses), accompanied by thematically appropriate prophetic passages (haftarah). Housing for the Torah scroll, required for the liturgical proclamation of the text, became an architectural feature of the Jerusalem-facing wall of the synagogue. By the late first millennium, elaborate Torah scroll processions and liturgies for moving it from the ark to the reading desk and back became standard. The Torah has come to embody or channel divine holiness, accessible in every synagogue and not just in the Jerusalem Temple. Consequently, prayers requesting divine blessings for healing, the well-being of the community, local rulers, and the deceased, are recited near the scroll. Medieval mystics understood the opened scroll and the opened ark to be gateways to Heaven (see KABBALAH).

The shema* and its blessings are also a rabbinic liturgical element. These consist of three biblical passages (Deut 6:4–9, 11:13–21; Num 15:37–41) surrounded by rabbinic blessings. The shema is an affirmation of divine unity; its name is simply the first word of the first verse, "Hear!" Recitation of the shema twice daily follows the command, in Deuteronomy 6:7, to speak these words "when you lie down and when you rise up"; it was probably originally a home ritual, recited at bedtime and on arising. Deuteronomy 6:8 commands that these words should be bound on one's person – on one's arm and between the eyes (tefillin*) – and Deuteronomy 6:9 commands their writing on the doorposts and gates of one's house (mezuzah*). According to Numbers 15:38–40, Jewish males are commanded to tie fringes (tzitzit) on the corners of their garments as a constant reminder of their relationship with God. Traditional Jews wear this fringed tallit* all day as an undergarment and in shawl form for morning prayers. Two blessings precede the shema, and one follows it in the morning; two follow it in the evening. The prior blessings speak of God as creator of the world who expresses love for Israel by revealing Torah. The subsequent blessing evokes God's work in redeeming Israel from *Egypt. Later thinkers recognized these three themes of divine creation, *revelation, and *redemption as the core of Jewish *theology. The fourth evening blessing speaks of God's protection through the night. The shema and its blessings gradually merged with the amidah into a single rabbinic prayer service that takes place three times each weekday: shaharit (morning), minḥah (afternoon), and ma'ariv or arvit (evening); the afternoon service consists primarily of the amidah.

MEDIEVAL DEVELOPMENTS: Rabbinic leaders, especially in Babylonia, but also in the Land of *Israel, began to ensure that their liturgical systems were standardized during the period of the *Geonim (ca. 600–1038). The first formal Jewish *prayer book (siddur; pl. siddurim, from seder, the Hebrew word for "order") – the Seder Rav Amram Gaon (ca. 875) – was the response of the Babylonian Gaon, Rav *Amram bar Sheshna, to a Spanish Jewish community's request that he detail the annual order of prayers (see RESPONSA). Local variations were common until the development of *printing centralized the production of prayer books regionally. Iberian (*Sephardi) Jews, expelled from *Spain in 1492 and *Portugal in 1497, also imposed their own rite or prayer practices in their new communities, leading to the virtual disappearance of the local liturgies of *North Africa, the *Balkans, and the entire Middle East (except *Yemen). Printed Sephardi-rite prayer books, usually produced in *Italy, become standard in these regions.

Today most Jews pray either according to the Sephardi rite (minḥag sefarad), often in a version deeply influenced by mystical teachings, or according to the Ashkenazi rite of *Central and *Eastern Europe (*minḥag Ashkenaz). Ashkenazi liturgy contains a subgroup of rites adopted by the eighteenth-century *Ḥasidic movements in imitation of the sixteenth-century *Safed mystic, Isaac *Luria; these rites have Sephardi elements (nusakh sefarad). Yemenite and some Italian Jews also preserve their historical rites.

IMPACT OF MODERNITY: Reform Judaism, which began in early-nineteenth-century *Germany (see entries for JUDAISM, REFORM), initiated a variety of liturgical changes; Reform Jews tended to discard ritual garb like the tallit and tefillin and, in America, men's head coverings. In America, family seating also became the norm. Various prayers were reworded for both theological and political reasons, virtually eliminating the Temple-centered cluster of ideas that had driven the liturgy's initial construction.

Responses to Reform in Western Europe and North America established the map of Jewish liturgies persisting today. Those rejecting change froze their practice, including elements that were purely customary; others compromised to varying degrees. Modern Orthodoxy (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX; MODERN ORTHODOX) eliminated poetic additions to the service except for on the *High Holidays and adopted the vernacular *sermon, but maintained all other prayers. Conservative Judaism (see JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE) retained most traditional prayers, but made subtle changes, usually based on some historical precedent. Thus, references to Temple sacrifices became memories of the past and not prayers for the future; some prayers for peace voiced universal hopes. Some Conservative congregations added instrumental music to Sabbath services and occasional vernacular prayers.

The rise of political *Zionism, the destruction of European Jewry in the *Holocaust, and the founding of the State of *Israel created a new reality to which all Jews needed to adapt liturgically. Since the 1950s, very few at the liberal end of the spectrum still consider references to the Land of Israel to be irrelevant, although most continue to emphasize universal redemption rather than the personal *messiah or a restoration of the Temple cult. The eschatological meaning of the modern State of Israel also generated liturgical issues for traditional Jews. According to some, this state lacks messianic qualities and cannot be accepted as a fulfillment of millennia-long prayers and dreams. According to others, it is "the beginning of the sprouting of our redemption."

Demand for greater "spirituality" beginning in the 1960s generated selective retrievals of liturgical traditions, including in Reform Judaism, and encouraged less formal worshipping communities. Synagogue *music (see MUSIC, RELIGIOUS; MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE) became less formal, encouraging congregational participation. In some twenty-first-century settings, leading the service is once again the responsibility of the community as a whole and not of its paid clergy. In the last three decades of the twentieth century the feminist movement changed the face of the synagogue and elements of its worship texts (see JUDAISM, FEMINIST). With the *ordination of women as rabbis and *cantors in Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist Judaism (see JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST), women achieved full liturgical participation in non-Orthodox synagogues as prayer leaders, Torah readers, speakers, and congregational leaders. Feminist challenges to gendered language about humans and God prompted liturgical changes, first in the English translations in the American liberal prayer books, and then more limited changes to the Hebrew texts. Modern Orthodox women, too, have become more present in the synagogue, engaged in Jewish learning, worship, and communal leadership; the traditional liturgy itself, however, remains virtually unchanged.

For further reading, see R. Langer, To Worship God Properly: Tensions between Liturgical Custom and Halakhah in Judaism (1998); L. A. Hoffman, The Canonization of the Synagogue Service (1979); S. C. Reif, Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History (1993); and J. Tabory, "The Piety of Politics: Jewish Prayers for the State of Israel," in Liturgy in the Life of the Synagogue: Studies in the History of Jewish Prayer, ed. R. Langer and S. Fine, 225–46 (2005); see also BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT.

RUTH LANGER

Writings (Ketuvim) is the third section of the Tanakh* (see BIBLE). The thirteen books of this division, in the order in which they now appear, are *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Job, *Song of Songs, *Ruth, *Lamentations, *Ecclesiastes, *Esther, *Daniel, *Ezra, *Nehemiah, and 1 and 2 *Chronicles.

Y

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, was founded in *Jerusalem by the Israeli government in 1953. It is now an extensive center for documentation, research, education, and commemoration of the *Holocaust. It takes its name from Isaiah 56:5: "And to them will I give in my house and within my walls a memorial and a name (yad va-shem) . . . that shall not be cut off." See also HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION; HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS; MUSEUMS.

Yahrzeit (also yortsayt). This *Yiddish word (literally "anniversary") refers to the yearly commemoration (according to the Hebrew date) of the death of a close family member (see DEATH AND MOURNING). Among observances associated with yahrzeit are kindling a twenty-four-hour candle on the evening before the date of death, visiting the cemetery, making a donation to a worthy cause, and studying Torah. Parents, children, siblings, and the spouse of the deceased traditionally recite the kaddish sanctification during one or more *synagogue services, either on the date of death or the preceding *Sabbath. Fasting on the anniversary of the death of a parent was customary during talmudic times (BT Nedarim 12a; BT Shevuot 20a), and some individuals continue this practice. In the first year after a death, yahrzeit takes place on the anniversary of the funeral. In subsequent years, it is observed on the actual date of death. Modern yahrzeit rituals originated in fifteenth-century *Germany, and the word has its origins in the German Jahrzeit, which had similar associations in Christian practice. In *Sephardic communities, yahrzeit may be called naḥalah (inheritance) or meldado (study session).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Yehoshua, A. B. (b. 1936), a major Israeli writer, was born in *Jerusalem to a *Sephardic family that had lived in the city for five generations. After studying Hebrew literature and philosophy at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, he taught for many years at the University of Haifa. Yehoshua's widely translated and numerous novels, short fiction, plays, and polemics have been awarded many literary prizes in Israel and abroad. Many critics regard him as Israel's boldest and most politically erudite writer; his art has influenced generations of average Israelis who grew up reading works such as The Lover (1977) in high school. A Faulknerian work that examines the interiority of a dysfunctional Jewish family and those who come into their lives, The Lover established Yehoshua's genius for approaching issues of national importance through the foibles of private individuals whose neuroses often serve as an urgent allegory of Israel's maladies. Even Yehoshua's earliest works have enjoyed an unwavering reputation. His frequent engagement with the entwined destinies of Jews and Arabs in Israel began with his 1963 story, Mul ha-Ya'arot (Facing the Forests), and figures significantly in later novels such as The Liberated Bride (2004) and Friendly Fire (2008). Other highly acclaimed novels include

Mr. Mani (1992), an epistolary story of several generations of Sephardic Jews living in the Land of Israel and the Mediterranean, and A Journey to the End of the Millennium (1999), a subtle examination of the contrasting communities of Sephardic and *Ashkenazi Jews in the medieval world that also manages to wink slyly at Israel's religious and social tensions in the present. A sometimes controversial figure, Yehoshua is well known for his consistent disavowal of Jewish identity in the *Diaspora as well as for his staunch opposition to Israel's occupation of *Palestinian territories.

RANEN OMER-SHERMAN

Yehud is the *Aramaic term for the tribal territory of *Judah that was applied by *Persia after its conquest of the *Babylonian Empire in the 530s BCE. From this word came the Greek, Latin, and English words for the area, Judea. An inhabitant of this region was known as Yehudi, a Judean. The English designations "Jew" and "Jewish" derive from this word.

Yemen. Yemenite Jews trace their origins to the period of the *Babylonia Exile (587 BCE). Until modern times, the community was mainly known through *Maimonides' "Epistle to Yemen" (ca. 1172; see A. S. Halkin, Moses Maimonides' Epistle to Yemen [1952]), which addressed a period of persecution in the life of Yemenite Jews, and the Bustan al-'Ukul, a twelfth-century ethical, philosophical, and theological work by Natanel ibn Fayyumi. Map 5

There was little knowledge about Yemenite Jews because the Jews of Yemen were cut off both from the outside world and from the mainstream of Jewish culture with the rise of the Zaydi regime in the early tenth century (see "al-Zaidiya," Encyclopedia of Islam 4:1196–98). As a result of this isolation, they developed specific cultural traits and peculiarities; they also preserved an archive of documents and literary works that would otherwise have been lost. Yemenite Jewry was "rediscovered" by Rabbi Jacob Saphir (1822–1886), an extensive traveler, who visited this long-secluded Jewish community in 1859. He recorded his travels and experiences in Yemen in a book entitled Even Sappir (2 vols., 1866, 1874), in which he characterized the Yemenite Jews as "the most authentic Jews in the world" (2: 68). Saphir described several customs related to family life, including very early marriages. He wrote that it was not unusual to see a twelve-year-old Yemenite girl who was already a mother. He also indicated that it was customary for Yemenite men to have two or three wives. Locusts, which were rampant in Yemen and are considered kosher, were a popular source of food (see Lev 11:22). Like their Arab neighbors, Yemenite Jews were fond of chewing the leaves of the kat (catha edulis), a mildly narcotic shrub.

The discovery of the Cairo *Genizah documents has significantly enhanced scholarly knowledge of the Jews of Yemen between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, shedding light on multifaceted relationships and merchant alliances (particularly in Aden) with Jewish communities in *Iraq, *Egypt, and elsewhere. Jewish Yemenite writings about their own history are scant, perhaps due in part to the scarcity of writing materials. The resulting shortage of books apparently accounts for the marvelous ability of some Yemenite Jews to read a book from all possible angles, a capability that developed when several children seated around one single copy of a book learned to read the Hebrew *Bible and other sacred writings.

Yemenite Jewry did not generate scholars and writers of universal renown. Their writings focused mainly on the pervasive atmosphere of hostility and contempt and the occasional outbreaks of violence they experienced. They also wrote religious poetry (see POETRY, LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) and *midrash (homilies based on biblical passages). Particularly noteworthy is Midrash ha-Gadol, compiled by Rabbi David ben Amram ha-Adani in the thirteenth century. The greatest and most famous Yemenite poet was Rabbi Shalom Shabazi (1619–after 1679) who was venerated as a poet and saint. Many of his poems continue to be chanted by Yemenite Jews on various occasions.

In 1949, about fifty thousand Yemenite Jews, virtually the entire community, were flown to *Israel in a gigantic operation known as “On Eagles’ Wings” (very often referred to as “Operation Magic Carpet”). Many Israelis viewed this exotic, religious people with their dangling earlocks as “prophets stepping out of the Bible” (S. Barer, The Magic Carpet [1952], ix). Their rich repertory of *dance, *music, and *folklore, which seemed to reflect ancient Hebrew culture, made them an object of emulation and source of inspiration for the newly developing Israeli culture. Despite the relatively small numbers of Yemenite Jews in the general Israeli population, they have made significant contributions to contemporary Israeli life. A valuable compendium on this community is R. S. Simon, M. M. Laskier, and S. Regeur, eds., The Jews of the Middle East and North Africa in Modern Times (2003).

REUBEN AHARONI

Yerushalmi: See TALMUD, JERUSALEM

Yeshiva University (YU), a research university in *New York City whose motto is Torah uMadah (Torah together with secular studies), has graduate schools in business, *education, *social work, *medicine, law, and other fields. Students combine Jewish studies with the arts and sciences, and men may also pursue *rabbinic ordination, sometimes while also earning advanced degrees in secular subjects.

YU began as the Rabbi Isaac Elhanan Theological Seminary (RIETS), founded in 1896–97 as the rabbinical school of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada (UOR) and named for Rabbi Isaac Elhanan Spektor. The school trained rabbis according to the educational practices of the great Lithuanian yeshivot. In 1915 Rabbi Bernard Revel (d. 1940) became leader of the institution; he aspired to make traditional Jewish study meaningful in America, harmonizing the best of modern culture with the learning and spirit of the *Torah and traditional *Judaism.

As RIETS graduates competed for rabbinical positions with graduates of the *Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), which was still considered an Orthodox school in the early twentieth century, they found themselves at a disadvantage because, unlike JTS, RIETS did not teach practical rabbinics, homiletics, and related subjects. Student strikes demanding instruction in these subjects resulted in their eventual implementation at RIETS.

In 1928, YU established Yeshiva College, a degree-granting undergraduate institution integrating Jewish subjects and secular studies. At that time, YU left its Lower East Side site and moved to Washington Heights in upper Manhattan. In 1936, the school established its first graduate school (in Jewish studies), while Revel worked to bring faculty from Europe. Revel was succeeded by Rabbi Samuel Belkin (d. 1975); under his leadership, YU expanded rapidly, obtaining university status in 1945. Over the years new schools were opened, including Stern College for women (1954), as well as secular, nonsectarian divisions, including the Albert Einstein Medical School, the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, and the Wurzweiler School of Social Work. Richard M. Joel, a legal scholar, became Yeshiva University’s fourth president in 2003, succeeding Dr. Norman Lamm.

RACHEL GORDAN

Yeshivah (pl. yeshivot), from the Hebrew root y/sh/v meaning to “sit,” is a school or academy devoted to the advanced study of classical Jewish texts.

Yiddish is a Germanic-based vernacular Jewish language written in Hebrew script. It developed in German-speaking *Central Europe in the *Middle Ages and became the primary language of most Jews living in *Eastern Europe in early modern and modern times; it is also known in its western forms as Judeo-German. See LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM ITS BEGINNINGS TO 1700; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM 1800 TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: YISHUV; as well as relevant entries under JOURNALISM, POETRY, and THEATER.

Yiddish Dictionaries. Dictionaries reflecting modern *Eastern European Yiddish first appeared in the nineteenth century. Y. M. Lifshits based his Rusish-yudisher verter bikh (1869) and his Yudesh-rusisher verter bikh (1876) largely on the Ukrainian dialect. Alexander Harkavy compiled his 1928 Yiddish-English-Hebrew Dictionary, which strongly reflected Lithuanian and literary Yiddish, while an immigrant in *New York City. Later, a number of dictionaries paired literary Yiddish with Hebrew, Russian, Belorussian, Ukrainian, Polish, English, Spanish, French, German, Japanese and Esperanto. Before World War II and shortly thereafter, dictionaries mainly helped Yiddish speakers learn other languages. In recent decades, they more often serve the needs of students of the language and propagate the norms of Standard Yiddish. The most significant dictionaries include Harkavy (1928); Uriel Weinreich, Modern Yiddish-English English-Yiddish Dictionary (1969); the Yiddish-Yiddish Groyser verterbukh fun der yidisher shprakh (ed. Yudel Mark [1961–80], as yet incomplete); the Russko-evreiskiy (idish) slovar’ (ed. M. A. Shapiro [1984]); and the Dictionnaire Yiddish-Français (ed. Y. Niborski [2002]). Dictionaries of specialized terminologies, rhyming and spelling dictionaries, and lexicons of Yiddish’s Semitic component also exist. KALMAN WEISER

Yishuv, from the Hebrew word for “settlement,” refers to the Jewish community in *Palestine from the late nineteenth century to the founding of the State of *Israel in 1948.

Yivo Institute for Jewish Research (YIVO) was founded as the Yiddish Scientific Institute in *Vilna, *Poland (now Vilnius, Lithuania) in 1925. Its headquarters were relocated to *New York City in 1940. In 2000, YIVO became one of the constituent members of the *Center for Jewish History. Dedicated to the history and culture of *Ashkenazi Jewry and to its influence in the Americas, YIVO is a resource center for East European Jewish Studies; *Yiddish language, literature and folklore; and the American Jewish immigrant experience. The YIVO library holds over 385,000 volumes in twelve languages, and the archives contains more than 24,000,000 items, including manuscripts, documents, photographs, sound recordings, art works, films, posters, sheet music, and other artifacts. Among the Institute's publications are Yidishe shprakh, a Yiddish linguistics journal; YIVO-bleter, a Yiddish-language scholarly journal; and the English language YIVO Annual of Jewish Social Science. Recently published books (both 2008) include a revised edition, now with a translation of the complete text and notes, of M. Weinreich, History of the Yiddish Language, and G. D. Hundert, ed., The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Yizkor (Hebrew, "May [God] remember") is a communal *synagogue memorial service that takes place four times a year. Originally only recited on *Yom Kippur, Yizkor services are now also traditionally held in *Diaspora synagogues after the *Torah and *Haftarah readings on *Shemini Atzeret, the eighth day of *Sukkot; the eighth day of *Passover; and the second day of *Shavuot. In *Israel and in Reform congregations (see JUDAISM, REFORM), Yizkor takes places on the combined day of Shemini Atzeret/Simḥat Torah; the seventh day of Passover; and the single day of Shavuot. Yizkor services include both communal readings and prayers and silent devotions during which mourners can recall their loved ones. The *cantor chants El Malei Raḥamim (God, Full of Compassion), the memorial prayer that is also voiced at a funeral. The last prayer in the Yizkor services, Av ha-Raḥamim (Compassionate Father), recalls all Jewish *martyrs throughout the ages. The *Kaddish sanctification is not a traditional component of Yizkor, but many congregations choose to recite it. In some communities it is customary for those whose parents are still alive to leave the sanctuary while Yizkor is being recited and to return for the final prayer.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Yizkor Books (memorial books) are a special category of books devoted to the commemoration of particular Jewish communities destroyed in the *Holocaust. Most appear under one of three names: yizker bukh (*Yiddish), sefer zikaron (*Hebrew), or pinkas (chronicle). These works commemorate cities, towns, and regions in *Eastern Europe – especially in *Poland, *Ukraine, and *Belarus – by bringing together personal *memoirs and testimonies, historical narratives, biographical sketches, original documents, literary works, statistical analyses, maps, photographs, and paintings. Varying in length and format, most share a similar structure, presenting the history of the local Jewish community from its beginning until the Holocaust; discussing important sites, prominent families and leaders, renowned *synagogues, religious life, and educational, political, and cultural institutions and organizations; and describing the destruction of the community, with accounts of survival and resistance (see HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE). Some include descriptions of post-war visits and reports on the activities of the town's *fraternal societies (landsmanshaftn), organizations formed by immigrants from the same town or region. Most volumes include a list of local Jews murdered during the Holocaust. Although some of these books are written by a single author (and at times closely resemble a memoir or a local history), most result from collaborations among former residents who formed a special book committee, collected materials over a period of time, and sometimes employed an editor or commissioned a historian. Some historians, such as N. M. Gelber and N. Blumenthal, were regularly involved in these initiatives. Although Pinkas ha-kehillot (Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities), published by *Yad Vashem, is devoted to whole countries or regions, most memorial books commemorate smaller areas, usually individual cities or towns and their immediate vicinity. In some cases, more than one book dedicated to a certain community was created, usually as a result of geographic, linguistic, or ideological divisions among former inhabitants.

A book about Łódź was published as early as 1943 and a few others appeared in the immediate aftermath of the war, but the majority of yizkor books were published in the 1950s and 1960s, with numerous volumes added in the subsequent two decades. Most were published in *Israel or in *New York City. New books sometimes take innovative forms, such as community reconstructions or websites. Although the exact number of memorial books depends on their precise definition, there are estimated to be more than six hundred titles.

Large collections of memorial books can be found in research libraries in the United States and Israel. The Dorot Jewish Division of the New York Public Library has digitized its entire collection and provides online access on its website. A bibliography by Z. M. Baker is included in From a Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry, ed. J. Kugelmass, J. Boyarin, and Z. M. Baker (2nd ed., 1998). Other lists of books can be found online at various websites, especially those dedicated to Jewish genealogy. The bulk of memorial books are written in Hebrew and Yiddish with sections or summaries in English; a few are written in other languages. Although the editors of the books frequently declared their aim as preserving and transmitting the knowledge of their community to future generations, their format and language target a relatively narrow audience. Attempts to make the books more accessible have led to several translation projects, most notably a JewishGen initiative launched in 1994. In addition to translations into English, it also coordinates translations into other languages; for example, Polish. Because of the collective character and commemorative function of yizkor books, as well as the often idealized, romanticized, or reconciliatory images they present, some historians warn against using them uncritically. Further analysis of this genre can be gleaned from the comprehensive introduction to From a Ruined Garden.

NATALIA ALEKSIUN-MADRZAK

Yom Ha-Atzma'ut (Independence Day) is the Israeli national and religious holiday celebrating the proclamation of the establishment of the State of *Israel on May 14, 1948. It is observed according to the corresponding date on the Jewish *calendar, the 5th of Iyar. In Israel, Yom Ha-Atzma'ut events include an official evening ceremony on Mount Herzl in *Jerusalem; related events include the International Bible Contest for Jewish Youth, the Hebrew Song

Festival, and the awarding of the Israel Prize. The day before Yom Ha-Atzma'ut is Yom Ha-Zikaron (Day of Remembrance) in memory of Israeli soldiers who died in battle. Rituals and liturgy to commemorate Yom Ha-Atzma'ut are still being shaped; no formulations have yet achieved universal acceptance.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Yom Ha-Shoah or Yom Ha-Shoah Veha-Gevurah (Holocaust and Heroism Remembrance Day) is a day of commemoration for Jews who were murdered during the *Holocaust and for those who resisted *Nazi persecution (see HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE). In *Israel it is observed on the 27th of Nissan, the anniversary of the *Warsaw ghetto uprising (see HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS). In 1951, Prime Minister David *Ben-Gurion and President Yitzhak Ben-Zvi instituted Yom Ha-Shoah in Israel. It begins at sundown with a ceremony at *Yad Vashem in *Jerusalem. At ten o'clock the next morning, sirens sound for two minutes and people throughout Israel stand in silence.

Many *Diaspora communities observe Yom Ha-Shoah with *synagogue worship and special communal programs and vigils. Ritual and liturgy to address the specific theological and historical resonances of the Holocaust are still being formed; one custom is to light a twenty-four-hour *yahrzeit candle. Some Orthodox Jews choose to commemorate the victims of *Nazi genocide on traditional mourning days, such as *Tisha B'Av and the 10th of Tevet, rather than on Yom Ha-Shoah.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement): See HIGH HOLIDAYS

Z

Zalman, Schneur Ben Baruch, of Liady (1745–1813) was the founder of the *Ḥasidic Lubavitch community (*Ḥabad). Rabbi Zalman was a disciple of the Maggid, Rabbi Dov *Ber of Miedzyrzecz, the heir of the founder of Ḥasidism, Rabbi Israel *Baal Shem Tov. His two closest colleagues, Menachem Mendel of Vitebsk and Abraham of Kalisk, immigrated to *Safed in 1777, and he assumed the leadership of the community in southern *Russia and provided support for Ḥasidic groups in the Holy Land. His influence grew, and thousands flocked to his court. He tried to resolve the conflict between the Ḥasidim and the *mitnaggedim (“opponents” of Ḥasidism) by arranging a meeting with Rabbi Elijah, the *Vilna Gaon, in 1774, but was unsuccessful. He was arrested by the Russian police on suspicion of making foreign contacts; to this day, Lubavitch Ḥasidim celebrate the day he was released, the 19th of Kislev in 1798.

Zalman’s exoteric spiritual work, usually known as the Tanya (It Was Taught; 1st ed., 1787, definitive ed., 1814) is held sacred by the Ḥabad Ḥasidim; his teachings, including esoteric ones, are presented in his sermons collected in Torah Or (The Light of the Torah; 1837) and Likutei Torah (Selections of the Torah; 1848). He taught an intense *mystical doctrine, holding all existence as an illusion and advocating identification with ayin, the absence of all worldly elements, which brings the worshiper to communion with *God. For further reading, see N. Loewenthal, Communicating the Infinite: The Emergence of the Habad School (1990); and R. Elier, The Paradoxical Theology of Habad (1996).

JOSEPH DAN

Zangwill, Israel (1864–1926) was an Anglo-Jewish writer and founder of the Jewish Territorial Organization (JTO). Born to Jewish immigrants in London, Zangwill attended the Jews’ Free School and graduated in 1884, with honors, from the University of London (see BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN). At first a journalist and humorist, he gained fame with his 1892 novel, Children of the Ghetto, a trenchant study of Jewish life in Britain. The comic King of Schnorrers followed in 1894, and throughout the 1890s Zangwill published stories on Jewish themes and other fiction not specifically Jewish. As one of the “Wanderers of Kilburn,” Zangwill associated with Solomon *Schechter, Joseph Jacobs, and other prominent Jews who went on to found the Jewish Historical Society of England. His friends included other notable men and women, both Jews and Christians, in the arts, literature, and theater. Zangwill became a leading English *Zionist in 1895 after Max Nordau introduced him to Theodor *Herzl.

In 1903 Zangwill married writer and feminist Edith Ayton and became active in the British women’s suffrage movement. He translated the mahzor* (High Holiday *prayer book) with Arthur Davis, Nina Davis Salomon, and others (1904–09) and the religious poetry of Solomon *ibn Gabirol (1923). Among numerous contributions to *theater in this period, The Melting Pot (1908) has been the most enduring (see THEATER: BRITAIN). In 1905, Zangwill split with the mainstream Zionist movement and formed the JTO, the goal of which was to establish a Jewish homeland wherever one could be found; the organization was best known for its advocacy of East Africa, although it considered many locations. Ultimately its greatest success was in working with Jacob Schiff’s Galveston Plan to settle 10,000 immigrants in Texas and other western regions of the *United States (1907–14; see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN).

Zangwill briefly returned to the Zionist fold at the time of the *Balfour Declaration. He warned, however, that Jews needed a homeland with autonomy, not just a place of refuge under British or other rule. Recognizing the difficulty of the Arab presence in *Palestine, Zangwill criticized Zionist leadership in a major 1923 address and alienated many Jews. At his death, however, the Jewish world mourned the loss of a prominent literary interpreter, defender, and public figure. For further reading, see M. Rochelson, A Jew in the Public Arena: The Career of Israel Zangwill (2008); and J. H. Udelson, Dreamer of the Ghetto: The Life and Works of Israel Zangwill (1990); see also LITERATURE: BRITAIN.

MERI-JANE ROCHELSON

Zealots. The Jewish War (JW) by *Josephus is the only source of information on a group called “Zealots” and their activities during the First *Jewish War against *Rome (66–73 CE). According to Josephus (JW 4.128–140), the Zealots emerged as an alliance of armed groups that fled the countryside and converged on *Jerusalem in the winter of 67–68 CE in an attempt to escape the advance of Roman troops. There is no explicit evidence that the Zealots existed as a distinctly identifiable political and military force before that time, even though some of their leaders such as Eleazar, son of Simon, were active at earlier stages of the uprising and probably belonged to Jerusalem’s priestly elite (JW 2.564–65; 4.225; 5.5). While in Jerusalem, the Zealots launched a series of purges against scions of the old *Herodian aristocracy, seized control of the *Temple, and challenged established high priestly authority by electing a new High Priest by lot (JW 4.139–57). The Zealots’ actions provoked a military backlash spearheaded by Jerusalem’s aristocracy. The initial success of the aristocratic party, however, was short-lived as some of its members (John of Gischala), as well as forces that arrived from the Idumean countryside, helped the Zealots break out of the Temple and effectively take control of Jerusalem. In the ensuing bloodbath, the Zealots took revenge on their opponents (JW 4.158–388). When the alliance broke down, the Zealots, under Eleazar, son of Simon, were cornered in the inner court of the Temple; eventually, John of Gischala managed to take full control of the Temple and tricked the Zealots into surrendering (JW 4.389–97, 577–84; 5.98–105). Afterward they effectively disappeared from the scene as a distinct group, probably sharing in the final defense of Jerusalem against Roman troops and perishing in the process (JW 6.92, 148; 7.215).

Research on the Zealots has been to a large degree shaped by M. Smith ("Zealots and Sicarii, Their Origins and Relation," Harvard Theological Review 64 [1971]: 1–19; and "The Troublemakers," in The Cambridge History of Judaism, ed. W. Horbury et al. [1999], 3:501–68).

Rejecting earlier conceptualizations of the "Zealots" as an umbrella term for groups and movements that had resisted Roman rule in Judea on religious grounds after Herod's death in 4 BCE (see M. Hengel, The Zealots: Investigations into the Jewish Freedom Movement in the Period from Herod I until 70 A.D. [1989]), Smith suggested that the Zealots were a specific and relatively short-lived group of rebels from the countryside that emerged in Jerusalem in the winter of 67–68 CE. R. Horsley developed Smith's argument by portraying the Zealots as a peasant revolutionary movement ("The Zealots: Their Origin, Relationships and Importance in the Jewish Revolt," Novum Testamentum 28 [1986]: 159–92). In contrast, M. Goodman noted the organizing role of the Jerusalem aristocracy in the formation of the Zealots (The Ruling Class of Judaea: The Origins of the Jewish Revolt against Rome A.D. 66–70 [1987]). Although most scholars have embraced Smith's historical assessment, his apparent neglect of a religious component within Zealot ideology remains problematic (see D. Rhoads, Israel in Revolution [1976] on possible priestly influences).

ALEXEI SIVERTSEV

Zechariah is a post-exilic biblical book that is part of the twelve Minor Prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]). Zechariah 1–8 (First Zechariah) reflects the period just before the rededication of the *Jerusalem *Temple in 515 BCE; it is separate and distinct from Zechariah 9–14 (Second or Deutero-Zechariah), which dates at least to the middle of the fifth century.

The core of First Zechariah's message is conveyed in a series of visions in chapters 1–6 that are amplified and clarified in the oracles that surround them; chapters 7 and 8 conclude with a series of individual oracles. Zechariah 3 is set in the heavenly court where Satan unsuccessfully challenges Joshua the High Priest before God; God reaffirms the *covenant through a symbolic cleansing of Joshua's garments and pledges to remove iniquity from the land. Chapter 4 depicts the Temple symbolically by a golden lamp stand (*menorah) flanked by two messianic figures. Second Zechariah consists of a series of oracles including chapter 9 in which *God is depicted as Divine Warrior. Although the character of these chapters is decidedly *apocalyptic, many of the themes are carried forward from First Zechariah. The dramatic end-of-time battles depicted in Zechariah 12–14 culminate in an image of pilgrims going up to Jerusalem to celebrate the *pilgrimage *festival of *Sukkot, the Feast of Booths (14:16–19), when the land will become pure and there will be peace in Jerusalem (14:20–21).

ERIC MEYERS

Zephaniah, Book of. This biblical book appears ninth among the twelve Minor Prophets (see PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]). Zephaniah is identified in a detailed genealogical superscription (1:1) as living in the days of *Josiah, king of *Judah (640–609 BCE), the same era in which *Jeremiah was also active. He is said to be a descendant of *Hezekiah, presumably a reference to the Judean king who died in 687 BCE. This short book of three chapters denounces the people of Judah and *Jerusalem for their self-satisfaction and shamelessness and for their participation in the worship of *Baal. Drawing on language from *Genesis, Zephaniah warns that God, in a reversal of creation, will destroy "mankind from the face of the earth" (1:3), a reference that also evokes the *flood. The prophet goes on to exhort other nations of the region, warning them of the day of anger that will soon overtake them for their haughtiness, "for insulting and jeering at the people of the Lord of Hosts" (2:10). The book ends on a note of consolation (3:8–19) for the "remnant of Israel" who seek God and obey God's commandments and who "need fear misfortune no more" (3:15). *Repentance will annul the divine judgment, and God "will soothe with his love those long disconsolate" (3:17); the prophet promises, "At that time I will gather you/And at that time I will bring you [home]" (3:20). Then, Judah will be "renowned and famous/Among all the peoples on earth/When I restore your fortunes/Before their eyes (3:20).

Scholars are divided as to when this book was written. Many believe that the concluding prophecy of consolation was written after the *Babylonian Exile, but that earlier sections may have originated in *Josiah's reign, before his religious reforms that occurred ca. 622 BCE. For further reading, see A. Berlin, Zephaniah: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (1994); and M. A. Sweeney, Zephaniah: A Commentary (2003); see also BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Zerubbabel was governor of the *Persian province of *Yehud during the first wave of Judean restoration, ca. 520–510 BCE. Serving jointly with the High Priest Joshua ben Johazadak, he was instrumental in persuading the Judean population to rebuild the *Jerusalem *Temple. His name is a common east Semitic *Babylonian name, and he was apparently raised in the *Persian court. Because Zerubbabel was a descendant of King *David, his appointment by the Persian government aroused expectations that the Davidic kingdom would be reestablished. The book of *Zechariah, however, makes it quite clear that his role in the newly established province of Yehud was to be more limited and that hopes for the reestablishment of a Davidic kingship would have to be delayed to the distant future (4:6–10).

ERIC MEYERS

Zion (Hebrew, Tziyyon) was the pre-Israelite name for the central fortress in the Jebusite city of *Jerusalem that was conquered by King *David. It became a synonym in biblical and later Jewish tradition for the city of Jerusalem, for the site of the *Temple, and for the Land of *Israel in general. Signal examples include Psalms 137 and 147. Zion is mentioned frequently in biblical poetry as the holy mountain on which God has founded a divine city (e.g., Psalms 46, 76, 78, 87) and in prophetic writings as the source of divine teachings, as in Isaiah 2:3, "For out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Since medieval times, Mount Zion has designated a hill south of the walled city of Jerusalem, not the area of the Temple Mount. See also JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES.

Zionism, a term coined in the 1890s by the *Vienna-born intellectual Nathan Birnbaum (1804–1937), betokens the modern Jewish nationalist movement that is characterized by a complicated if not contradictory relationship to the Jewish past. Zionism echoes the age-old *messianic expectation of a restoration of the Jews to the Land of *Israel, but departs from tradition by affirming that the Jews can emancipate themselves from exile without awaiting explicit and manifest support from God for the launching of such an operation. It likewise replaces the eschatological vision of a Jewish kingdom governed in accordance with divine law with the effort to construct a state along fully modern lines. Dismissing these innovations as heresies, the very man who named the movement turned wholly against it after his return to Orthodox Judaism (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX). Yet an important segment of religious Jewry has also played a part in the political Zionist movement from its beginnings to the present, and many *secular forces within the movement remain thoroughly imbued with quasi-messianic aspirations.

Although there were some resourceful nineteenth-century Orthodox thinkers who endeavored to undermine traditional quietism from within and can justly be regarded as precursors of Zionism, the true parents of the movement were secularized, more or less assimilated intellectuals who were activated not by a fresh understanding of God's wishes but by a new conception of the Jewish people's needs. The increasingly desperate situation of the Jewish masses in *Eastern Europe and the reemergence of *antisemitism in the west convinced Leon *Pinsker, Theodor *Herzl, and many others that "the Jewish problem" could be solved only through the reconstitution of the Jews as a normal nation in a territory of their own: Herzl expressed this idea in The Jewish State (1896). For most proponents of this belief, the optimum location for the fulfillment of such an endeavor was their ancestral homeland.

Zionism before Herzl, known as "Palestinophilism" and led by the Russian physician Pinsker, achieved only very limited success. At the first congress of the World Zionist Organization in 1897, convened by Herzl and held in the Swiss city of Basel, the new organization prudently refrained from declaring its intention of creating a state and called only for the establishment of "a home for the Jewish people in *Palestine secured under public law." How that goal was to be attained and what kind of a home was to be built became the primary questions over which Zionists differed in ensuing decades.

Differences between "practical" Zionists, who focused on concrete efforts to establish a growing Jewish presence in *Ottoman *Palestine, and "political" Zionists, who gave priority to diplomatic endeavors to obtain effective control of the entire land, diminished in the aftermath of Herzl's death in 1904. Chaim Weizmann and others developed a "synthetic Zionism" that stressed the importance of both paths. They fostered the development of Jewish Palestine (the Yishuv) in the years before World War I and achieved a crucial success in 1917, with the British issuance of the *Balfour Declaration recognizing the right of Jews to establish their national home there. Only the Revisionists, established in 1925 and led by Vladimir Jabotinsky (1880–1940), found the League of Nations-sanctioned *British Mandate over Palestine to be essentially unsatisfactory. They continued to demand the rapid creation of a Jewish state that would include not only the territory demarcated in the early 1920s as Palestine but also what became known as Trans-Jordan (present-day Jordan) – by force, if necessary.

Political Zionists envisioned a Jewish state modeled on the best achievements and dreams of the modern West, a state that would lack any peculiarly Jewish characteristics. Cultural Zionists, inspired by the Russian-born thinker Asher Ginzberg, who styled himself "Aḥad Ha-Am" (One of the People), deplored the alienation of Herzl and his followers from Jewish tradition; they hoped to resolve the "problem of *Judaism," not the "Jewish problem." What was of the highest importance and was actually attainable, they argued, was the creation of a spiritual and cultural center in Palestine that could serve as the base for a modern, secular, but still deeply Jewish culture that would bind together the world's Jews and prevent their assimilation.

This program was anathema to the small minority of Orthodox Jews who found ample support in Jewish tradition for a pre-messianic return to the Holy Land and established within the Zionist movement the *Mizrachi organization, which was dedicated to reconstructing "the Land of Israel for the people of Israel according to the Torah of Israel." This camp was able to form a tactical alliance with political Zionists, who showed respect for their religious beliefs and strove to cooperate with them, but it regarded the cultural Zionists as ideological adversaries. Aḥad Ha-Am and his followers also faced comparably strong criticism from a different direction. Intellectuals like Micah Joseph Berdichevsky (1865–1921) chastised them for their half-measures; they repudiated the legacy of rabbinic *Judaism in its entirety and utterly "negated the Exile." For them, the goal of Zionism was to create a "new Hebrew" who would represent a revivification of the noblest exemplars of biblical heroism.

Their deep-seated differences notwithstanding, all of these Zionists and others (apart from the Revisionists, who created a rival organization of their own) were able to collaborate on the central task of building a Jewish community in Palestine, even as they pursued their disparate aims within a variety of institutional frameworks. They did so increasingly under the leadership of socialist Zionists and in conflict with the country's *Arab residents.

Blending Zionism with socialism was not difficult in principle; however, formulating a *Marxist version of Zionism required considerable ingenuity. The Russian Ber Borokhov (1881–1917) was endowed with just enough Marxism to compose a corpus of writings that "scientifically" demonstrated the inevitability of the transference of the Jewish people's class struggle to Palestine and the ultimate success of the relocated Jewish proletariat in installing socialism in their own country. In the course of their first decades in Palestine, however, the Marxist Zionists largely outgrew their contorted dogmatism and joined together with non-Marxists to formulate a "constructivist socialism" that relied on the worldwide Jewish bourgeoisie for financial support and was flexible enough to live fairly harmoniously with out-and-out capitalists in Palestine itself. By the mid-1930s, the proponents of this new ideology, the socialist Mapai Party (the party of the workers of the Land of Israel), constituted the dominant force in the Zionist movement.

As Zionism developed, it became a divided but cohesive movement. Nevertheless, its considerable worldwide support represented, at least at first, only a minority of the world's Jews. In the indigenous population of Palestine, Zionism found an intransigent enemy that disputed its claim to the land and struggled to prevent its realization. Most Zionists, for their part, justified what they considered to be their superior right to the Land of Israel on the basis of one or more of the following considerations: divine authority, international law, the Jews' unbroken historical ties to the land, their pressing need for a physical and cultural homeland, and the Zionists' investment of labor and material. However, a few acknowledged that the local Arabs possessed a right to Palestine that was not inferior to that of the Jews, that the land belonged to two different peoples in equal measure, and that future political arrangements had to reflect this situation. Ready to compromise and circumscribe Zionism's domain, these irenic forces lacked any Arab counterparts and were soon confined to the margins of their movement (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT).

Most other Zionists continued to profess that their movement would ultimately prove beneficial to the Arabs of Palestine, but simultaneously devoted their best efforts to constructing an entity that would be powerful and prosperous enough to take control of the country once the Jews constituted the large majority of the population. When Zionist growth inevitably provoked Arab hostility, the mainstream of the movement reluctantly began to develop a combative attitude and a military capacity. The development of this force eventually made it possible for the Zionist movement, with the support of most of the world's Jews, to attain its fundamental end goal (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES). The United Nations-authorized establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 in part of what had been British Mandate Palestine marked the fulfillment of the wishes of Herzl and the political Zionists, even if it failed to achieve all of the mutually incompatible aims of cultural, religious, and socialist Zionists (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING).

In subsequent years, even some of the movement's most noteworthy leaders have declared that Zionism, having accomplished its purpose, has become obsolete. Many of the children of Zionist pioneers developed the habit of enclosing the term in parentheses and pronouncing it sarcastically. The World Zionist Organization has survived, however, and the term "Zionism" has been largely redefined to mean support for the State of Israel. The persistence and intensification of opposition to the state's very existence have left Zionist spokespersons with a task to perform. They continue to defend their movement and the state it has produced as forces that enabled the Jewish people to implement its right of self-determination and to provide a refuge for the victims of persecution.

In recent years Zionists have faced the new challenge of a tendency styled post-Zionism. Some of its proponents, within and outside Israel, have acknowledged that Zionism once represented a legitimate expression of Jewish nationalism. Others, however, describe Zionism as a movement rooted in an unfortunate and contrived redefinition of an ancient religious group as a modern nation and tainted from the outset by colonialist aims. Both groups have focused not so much on debating the original legitimacy of the Zionist idea as on deploring the way in which the entanglement of Zionist and Israeli identities has generated unjustifiable violations of liberal values and accorded second-class citizenship to Israel's non-Jewish citizens. The remedy post-Zionists propose is the transformation of the Jewish state into "a state of all its citizens." In response to their criticisms and proposals and to mounting anti-Zionist calls for the creation of a binational state in all of what was once Mandate Palestine, Zionists in Israel and elsewhere have risen to defend their movement. Some have done so by seeking primarily to discredit post-Zionists. Others have sought to restate and revitalize their ideological principles and to justify the continued existence of Israel as a Jewish state while simultaneously addressing what they take to be the valid concerns of the post-Zionists (R. Gavison, "The Jews' Right to Statehood: A Defense," Azure 15 [2003]: 71–109).

In other respects, too, those still committed to Zionism remain, as always, at odds with each other. As the Israeli writer Amos Oz has frequently declared, Zionism has always been "not a first name but a surname, a family name and this family is divided, feuding over the question of a 'master plan' for the enterprise" (In the Land of Israel [1982]). Over the years, the feud has evolved, and some of the more prominent participants in it have disappeared. For instance, the socialists are all but gone. Between the secular Zionists and the religious camp, however, there is an unending kulturkampf, a struggle over the proper relationship between Judaism and the Jewish state, which seems to lend itself more readily to resolution on paper than in the streets of Israel (see JUDAISM, FORMS OF ISRAELI).

For more on this topic, see A. Ravitzky, Messianism, Zionism and Religious Radicalism (1996); C. S. Liebman and E. Don-Yehiya, Religion and Politics in Israel (1984); J. Myers, Seeking Zion: Modernity and Messianic Activism in the Writings of Tsevi Hirsch Kalischer (2003); D. Vital, The Origins of Zionism (1975); idem, Zionism: The Formative Years (1982); idem, Zionism: The Crucial Phase (1987); W. Laqueur, A History of Zionism (1972); S. Zipperstein, Elusive Prophet: Ahad Ha'am and the Origins of Zionism (1993); E. Luz, Parallels Meet: Religion and Nationalism in the Early Zionist Movement: 1882–1904 (1988); J. Frankel, Prophecy and Politics: Socialism, Nationalism and the Russian Jews, 1862–1927 (1982); G. Shimon, The Zionist Ideology (1995); P. Mendes-Flohr, ed., A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs (1983); A. Shapira, Land and Power: The Zionist Resort to Force, 1881–1948 (1992); R. Wistrich, ed., Anti-Zionism and Antisemitism in the Contemporary World (1990); L. Silberstein, The Postzionism Debates: Knowledge and Power in Israeli Culture (1999); and Y. Hazony, The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul (2000).

ALLAN ARKUSH

Zionism: France. Between 1789 and 1939, French Jews were more deeply engaged with Palestine than with other places of Jewish settlement (see FRANCE: 1789–1939). The Holy Land not only represented a religious center and place of historic origin but also retained its potential as a future homeland. As early as 1801, Michel Berr suggested that a revival of Jewish nationalism could provide an alternative to the possible failure of emancipation. Rather than live in slavery in the Diaspora, he said, Jews could revive their nationality by taking up arms and recapturing their ancient land. It is possible that Berr had been influenced by a proclamation attributed to Napoleon during his siege of Acre in 1799 when he is said to have called on Jews to join his army and reestablish themselves in Palestine. This story continued to circulate long after Napoleon's time and may have influenced others to consider the possibility of reestablishing a Jewish nation.

Mid-nineteenth-century French republicans supported the national liberation of many peoples, including Poles, Italians, and Greeks. L. M. Lambert, the chief rabbi of Metz, endorsed Jewish nationalism in the 1840s, arguing that Jews have as much right to their own nation as the Greeks and Poles; he argued that the potential for Jews to leave France and reenter their ancient homeland in no way created a conflict with French patriotism. In the same decade, Jan Czynski, a Polish exile of Jewish ancestry living in Paris, published a journal, Réveil d'Israël, whose sole purpose was to call on Jews (whom he described as the oldest nation) to reclaim their homeland.

Ernest Laharanne, a minor official of the regime of Emperor Napoleon III, revived the idea in his 1860 La Nouvelle Question d'Orient. At that time France had troops in Syria and Lebanon, and imperialist motives were likely behind the suggestion that Jews reestablish their nation. Laharanne suggested that Jews might “serve as the intermediary between Europe and East Asia.” By the 1860s all the major Jewish journals of the period gave space and credence to those who argued for Jewish national restoration. Lazare Lévy Bing, a member of the Jewish school committee in Nancy, and later of the Paris Consistory, stressed the importance of Jewish children learning the Hebrew language by predicting its role in a future unification of the world, with *Jerusalem as its center.

In 1897, however, when Theodor *Herzl founded the *World Zionist Organization and sought international support for the creation of a state, the French Jewish establishment opted for *emancipation, rather than Zionism, as a goal for world Jewry, although some prominent French Jews did join the movement. Nor did the French Jewish establishment support political Zionism at the end of World War I. Sylvain Lévi, president of the *Alliance Israelite Universelle, went so far as to advise the Foreign Ministry to prevent representatives of French Zionism from speaking at the 1919 peace conference. Claiming that French Zionism was not French at all, but reflected only the views of foreign Jews in France, he argued that a Jewish national homeland would endanger the status of Jews elsewhere by raising the notion of dual loyalty. In that year, the Central Consistory (see FRANCE: CONSISTORIES, 1806–1939) even determined to make a “declaration of war against Zionism.”

The Jewish press, in contrast, responded positively to the 1917 *Balfour Declaration, and French Jews were more influenced by Zionism than the stance of its official institutions might suggest. By the 1930s the Consistories recognized the power of Zionism to encourage Jewish identity and so minimized their opposition. Eventually, with the growing refugee problem, it became more acceptable for Consistory members and rabbis to support Zionist activity. For more on this topic, see P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (1998).

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Zionism: United States. As a movement dedicated to reestablishing a Jewish homeland in *Palestine, *Zionism needed to engage the interest and support of American Jews uninterested in moving to Palestine. After the establishment of Hibbat Zion (Love of Zion), a proto-Zionist group formed in 1880s *Russia in response to *pogroms, small chapters emerged in American cities. When Theodor *Herzl took over the reins of world Zionism, these chapters debated his ideas and raised money for the *Yishuv (Jewish settlement) in Palestine. However, Zionism did not capture the imagination of many American Jews before the second decade of the twentieth century because many Jews, particularly of *Central European descent, believed that support of Zionism jeopardized their status as American citizens. This question of dual loyalty required resolution before Zionism could appeal to American Jews.

A watershed moment in Zionist history occurred when Louis *Brandeis became chairman of the Federation of American Zionists (FAZ) in 1914. Brandeis called on Zionists to stop debating ideas and to start recruiting new members and raising funds. FAZ membership grew, and by 1918 chapters had formed in every major American Jewish community. American Zionism was also strengthened through the work of Zionist organizations affiliated with FAZ such as *Hadassah, socialist Zionists, and religious Zionists (*Mizrachi).

Brandeis finally resolved the conflict between Zionism and American identity by arguing that Palestine offered an opportunity to create an egalitarian, democratic society along the model of Jeffersonian ideals. All Americans had dual loyalties, Brandeis argued, and this was only a problem if these loyalties conflicted, which was not the case for American Zionists. Brandeis’s focus on the practical – on helping European Jews settle Palestine – provided a clear purpose for American Zionists who had no desire to leave their country. Brandeis himself seemed to embody the idea that one could be both a good American and a Zionist when President Wilson appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1916.

Eventually, Brandeis’s indifference to the religious aspects of Zionism left a void that was filled by Chaim *Weizmann, his successor in the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA). Weizmann’s support came from Jews of Eastern European background who saw him as the embodiment of yiddishkeit (Jewishness). Although the 1920s and 1930s were not a good time for Zionism, as *Britain weakened its commitment to the *Balfour Declaration and Hitler rose to power, World War II and subsequent post-war prosperity galvanized American Zionism as a new and more militant leadership took over. With European Zionism destroyed, America and Palestine became the centers of world Zionism.

In post-war America, the ZOA under Rabbi Abba Hillel *Silver became the greatest ally of the Yishuv in its fight for independence. American Zionists also played a central role in helping convince President Harry S. Truman to recognize Israel when it declared independence in 1948. Ironically, this moment also marked the beginning of the decline of American Zionism as the new state began to speak for itself and most American Jews continued to evince little interest in moving to Israel. Still, support for Israel has continued to serve as a rallying point for many of the diverse segments of American Jewry (see ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA). For further reading, see M. Urofsky, American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust (1975); and M. Raider, The Emergence of American Zionism (1998).

RACHEL GORDAN

Zohar (splendor or brightness) is the most important and influential work of the *Kabbalah. It was written in northern *Spain in the last decades of the thirteenth century, but has traditionally been regarded as expressing ancient esoteric teachings, given to *Moses on Mount Sinai. Many Jews place it alongside the *Bible and the *Talmud as the third source of divine wisdom given by *God to Israel. In fact, the principal author of the Zohar was the kabbalist *Moses de Leon (d. 1305), who may have collaborated with his colleague, Joseph Gikatilla, and possibly some other kabbalists of that period. The earliest quotations from the Zohar appear in 1291, and soon after that it dominated other works of Jewish *mysticism, both in the Middle Ages and in modern times. The Zohar was printed twice in *Italy in the sixteenth century: in one volume in Cremona (1559) and in three volumes in Mantua (1558–60). The latter became the standard edition of the work. Two more volumes were added to the Zohar library: Zohar Hadash (The New Zohar) first printed in Salonika in 1597, which is a collection of segments of the work taken from many manuscripts, and Tikkunei Zohar (Emendations of the Zohar), first printed in Mantua in 1558. This is a separate work, written by an early-fourteenth-century kabbalist who imitated the language and style of the Zohar.

The Zohar is written in a unique version of *Aramaic, many aspects of which were created by its author. The body of the work is a series of homiletical commentaries on the weekly *Torah readings in the order in which they are read in the *synagogue throughout the year. These commentaries are attributed to *Tannaim, the rabbinic sages associated with the production of the *Mishnah in the second century CE. Their leader, according to the Zohar narratives, was R. *Simon bar Yoḥai, assisted by his son Eleazar. According to talmudic legend, R. Simon and his son hid from the *Romans in a cave for seven years. The Zohar embellishes this narrative, adding to it other talmudic legends, and presents a fictional framework within which its homiletical interpretations are interwoven. Additional characters include a wondrous old man and a brilliant child (yenuka), who reveal celestial secrets.

Other treatises are also included in the Zohar. One is the Midrash Ha-Ne'elam (The Esoteric Midrash), written partly in Hebrew; this seems to be the earliest part of the work. Another is the Sava de-Mishpatim (The Old Man in the Torah Portion of Mishpatim). Two highly esoteric sections are the Idra Rabba (The Great Assembly) and Idra Zuta (The Small Assembly). The first includes a complex presentation of the secrets of the divine world as reflected in the anthropomorphic structure of that realm. In the second, there is a description of the mystical ceremony surrounding R. Simon's death. Another highly esoteric section is Sifra de-Zeniuta (Book of Concealment), dealing with the secrets of the cosmogonic process (an explanation of the origins of the cosmos). In several sections of the Zohar another treatise is preserved: the Ra'aya Mehemna (The Faithful Shepherd). This text about *Moses was written by a later kabbalist, the author of the Tikkunei Zohar.

Moses de Leon distributed copies of sections of the Zohar, claiming that they originated from an ancient manuscript. After his death, however, his widow denied the existence of such a document. Thus, the belief in the antiquity of the Zohar became a test of Jewish orthodoxy; doubting it, as some Jewish scholars have done since the end of the fifteenth century, continues to be regarded as heresy in some circles.

For good English translations, see the anthology, I. Tishby, ed., The Wisdom of the Zohar, 3 vols. (1989), arranged by subject, with detailed introductions and commentaries; and the Pritzker Zohar, translation and commentary by D. Matt (2004–09); five volumes have thus far appeared. Also useful is A. Green, A Guide to the Zohar (2004).

JOSEPH DAN

Zunz, Leopold (Yom Tov Lipmann), born in Detmold in 1794 and died in Berlin in 1886, was the founder and an important representative of Jewish academic scholarship (Wissenschaft des Judentums) in nineteenth-century *Germany. Zunz was educated at the Samsonsche Freischule in Wolfenbuettel, which during his attendance was profoundly reformed by Samuel Meyer Ehrenberg. After completing his studies at a local high school Zunz taught at the Samsonsche Freischule between 1810 and 1815. In 1815 he began his studies at the recently established University of Berlin, where his most influential teachers were the classicists Friedrich August Wolf and August Boeckh. They inspired his interest in philology, the main area of his future research. His ground-breaking essay of 1818, "Etwas über die rabbinische Litteratur" (On Rabbinic Literature), can be seen as an outline for the future discipline of *Jewish Studies. In 1819, Zunz was among the co-founders of the Verein für Cultur und Wissenschaft der Juden (Association for the Culture and Science of Judaism), and he edited the short-lived journal of the association (1822). Zunz initially favored religious reforms and served for a brief time as a preacher in the Berlin Reform congregation (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY) and later in *Prague (1835–36). He earned his living as editor of a Berlin newspaper, director of the primary school of the Jewish community, and director of a Jewish teachers' seminary. His attempts to establish a chair for Jewish Studies at the University of Berlin failed. Zunz was an active supporter of the aborted Revolution of 1848. In Namen der Juden (1837) Zunz tried to combat the Prussian government's restriction on the names Jews could bear. In his most important scholarly works, Zunz analyzed medieval religious *poetry and the history of Jewish *worship (Die synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters [1855] and Der Ritus des synagogalen Gottesdienstes [1859]). His edition of Nachman *Krochmal's Moreh nevukhei ha-zeman (Guide of the Perplexed of the Time) appeared in 1851.

MICHAEL BRENNER

INDEX OF NAMES

*indicates that there is an entry for this individual

*Aaron: ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; EXODUS, BOOK OF; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; INCENSE; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; MIRIAM; MOSES; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP
 Aaron ben Elijah: KARAISM
 Aaron ben Joseph: KARAISM
 Aaron of Karlin: HASIDISM: EUROPE
 Aaron of Lincoln: ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES
 Aaron, Israel: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Aaronson, Lazarus: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Abbaye, R.: AMORAIM
 Abdullah I: ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; JERUSALEM, 1948–1967
 Abécassis, Eliette: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Abel: ADAM; CAIN AND ABEL; EVE; JACOB
 Aberlin, Rachel: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Abernathy, Ralph: UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
 Abigail: DAVID; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Abihu: LEVITICUS, BOOK OF Abimelech: JUDGES, BOOK OF; SHECHEM
 Aboab, Immanuel: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
 *Abraham: AMMON; ARABIA; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BETH EL; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE; CIRCUMCISION; COVENANT; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ETHICS, SEXUAL; FOLKTALES; GENESIS, BOOK OF; GOD; GOLEM; HAGAR; HEBRON; HITTITES; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; ISAAC; ISHMAEL; ISHAMEL: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; ISRAEL, LAND OF; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; LOVE; MARTYRDOM; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; MOAB; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; PTOLEMIES; REVELATION; SAMAEL; SARAH; SHECHEM
 *Abraham bar Hiyya: AMORAIM; ASTROLOGY; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 *Abraham ben David of Posquières (Rabad): FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; ISAAC THE BLIND; MONEY LENDING: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Abraham ben Garton: PRINTING
 Abraham ben Hayyim of Pesaro: PRINTING
 Abraham ben Isaac: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
 Abraham ha-Levi: PRAGUE
 *Abraham ibn Daud: SABORAIM; TANNAIM; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Abraham ibn Ezra: See IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM
 Abraham of Kalisk: ZALMAN, SCHNEUR BEN BARUCH

Abraham, Pearl: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Abrahams, A.: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Abramovich, Sholem Jacob: See MendeLe Mokher Seform
 Abramovitch, Bina: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Abrams, Morris: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
 Abrams, Nate: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Abramson, Larry: ART, ISRAELI
 *Abravanel, Benvenida: ABRAVANEL FAMILY; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
 *Abravanel, Isaac: ABRAVANEL FAMILY; BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Abravanel, Jacob: ABRAVANEL FAMILY
 Abravanel, Judah: ABRAVANEL FAMILY; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Abravanel, Samuel: ABRAVANEL FAMILY
 Abse, Dannie: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Absalom: DAVID; LOVE; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; TAMAR (2 SAMUEL)
 Abu Aaron: ITALY
 Abu'l Harun al-Faraj: KARAISM
 Abu Lashin, Johar: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Abū Naṣṣr David b. Isaac ha-Levi: EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES
 Abu-Shakra, Asim: ART, ISRAELI
 Abu Zayyad, Ziad: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 *Abulafia, Abraham: KABBALAH; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA); POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; SEFIROT
 Abulafia, Meir: EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN Abulafia, Samuel Halevi: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
 Abulafia, Todros: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Abzug, Bella: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Achish: DAVID; PHILISTINES
 Achsah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Aciman, André: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Ackerman, Paula: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
 *Adam: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; CAIN AND ABEL; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; ETHICS, SEXUAL; EVE; EVIL AND SUFFERING; GENESIS, BOOK OF; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; LILITH; RESURRECTION; SAMAEL Adam Baal Shem of Bingen: BAAL SHEM
 Adams, Julia: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Addams, Jane: CHICAGO
 Adler, Celia: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 *Adler, Cyrus: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY
 Adler, Dankmar: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Adler, Jacob: ENTERTAINMENT
 Adler, Jankel: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY

- Adler, Rachel: AESTHETICS; JUDAISM, FEMINIST; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Adonijah: BATHSHEBA; DAVID; SOLOMON
- Adorno, Theodor: AESTHETICS; FRANKFURT AM MAIN; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
- Agadati, Baruch: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- *Agnon, S. Y.: ADULTERY; GALICIA; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; OZ, AMOS
- Agosín, Marjorie: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Agranat, Simon: ISRAEL, STATE OF: JUDICIAL SYSTEM
- Agrippa: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
- Aguilar, Grace: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; GRATZ, REBECCA; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); WOMEN, MODERN: BRITAIN AND NORTH AMERICA
- Aguinis, Marcos: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- *Ahab: ASSYRIA; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; ELIJAH: BIBLICAL AND POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; HOSEA, BOOK OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF; SAMARIA
- *Aḥad Ha-Am: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; KAPLAN, MORDECHAI M.; RUSSIA; THOUGHT, MODERN; ZIONISM
- Ahashuerus: ART, LATE ANTIQUITY: IN THE LAND OF ISRAEL AND THE DIASPORA; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ESTHER, BOOK OF; GARDENS
- Ahaz: ASSYRIA; EDOM; HEZEKIAH; KINGS, BOOKS OF
- Ahaziah: AHAB
- Ahijah: SHILOH
- Aḥimaaz ben Paltiel: ITALY
- Ahinoam: DAVID; TAMAR (2 SAMUEL)
- Akhenaten: EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL
- Akhmatova, Anna: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Akiva ben Joseph, R.: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; BAR KOKHBA; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; FOLKTALES; LOVE; MARTYRDOM; MISHNAH; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; OMER; RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS; REDEMPTION; SONG OF SONGS, BOOK OF; TANNAIM; TOSEFTA; TRIBES, TEN LOST; WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM
- Aksensfeld, Israel: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Aksenov, Vasily: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Alantansi, Eliezer: PRINTING
- Al-Hariri: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN
- Alashkar, Moses: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Albalag, Isaac: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Albeck, H.: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
- Albert, Marv: SPORTSCASTERS
- Albo, Joseph: CRESCAS, ḤASDAI BEN ABRAHAM; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Alcalay, Yehuda ben Shlomo Hai: LITERATURE, LADINO
- Alcott, Amy: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
- Alderman, Naomi: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Aldrophe, Alfred: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Aleskovsky, Naomi: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- *Alexander the Great: ALEXANDRIA, ANCIENT; ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; HELLENISM; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT; PERSIA, ANCIENT; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA; PTOLEMIES; SELEUCIDS
- Alexander Jannaeus: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
- Alexander, John: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Alexander, Joseph: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Alfarabi: SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Al-Fasi, David ben Abraham: GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS
- Alfasi, Isaac: MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG; RESPONSA LITERATURE
- Alhadeff, Gina: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
- Ali ibn Dawud al-Yahd: ASTROLOGY
- Alkabetz, Solomon: BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM; CORDOVERO, MOSES; KARO, JOSEPH; OTTOMAN EMPIRE; SABBATH; SAFED; SHEKHINAH
- Allen, Gracie: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
- Allen, Mel: SPORTSCASTERS
- Allen, Woody: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES
- Allon, Yigal: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Allouche, Jean Luc: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Almog, Ruth: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
- Almosnino, Moses: LITERATURE, LADINO; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Almqvist, Carl Love Jonas: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Aloni, Ami: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Alpert, Rebecca: JUDAISM, FEMINIST
- Alsheikh, Moses: SAFED
- Altenberg, Peter: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Alter, Abraham Mordecai: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
- Alter, Robert: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Altman, Natan: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW; SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Altman, Natan: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Altmann, Alexander: COHEN, HERMANN
- Altschuler, David: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
- Altschuler, Jehiel: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
- Altschuler, Moses ben Henoch: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
- Al-Tustarī, Abū Sa'd Abraham ben Jashar: EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES
- Amalek: SAMUEL, BOOKS OF
- Amar, Marlène: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Amaral, Suzana: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Amarilio, Solomon: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Amichai, Yehuda: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Amiel, Moshe Avigdor: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Amir, Aharon: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
- Amir, Eli: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Amir, Yehoyada: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Amir-Pinkerfeld, Anda: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
- Amis, Martin: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Amitai: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Ammi, R.: AMORAIM
- Amnon: LOVE; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; TAMAR (2 SAMUEL)
- Amon, King of Judah: GARDENS
- *Amos: BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; JEREMIAH, BOOK OF; JOEL, BOOK OF
- *Amram bar Sheshna: GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES; PRAYER BOOKS; WORSHIP
- Amsterdam, Morey: TELEVISION: UNITED STATES
- Anan ben David: KARAISM
- Andersen, Hans Christian: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Anger, Per: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS

- Anielewitz, Mordechai: HOLOCAUST: ROLE OF GENDER; MUSEUMS
- Anissimov, Myriam: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Anker, Danny: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION
- Ansky (An-Ski), Semyon: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; DYBBUK; FILM: YIDDISH- LANGUAGE; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIA); LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MUSEUMS; RUSSIA; THEATER, YIDDISH; VILNA
- Antigonos: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY; PTOLEMIES; SELEUCIDS
- Antin, Eleanor: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Antin, Mary: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Antiochus IV Epiphanes: DANIEL, BOOK OF; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF; MARTYRDOM; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; SELEUCIDS; TOBIADS; WISDOM OF BEN SIRA, BOOK OF
- Antiochus VII Sidetes: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
- Antipater: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
- Anton, Maggie: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Antonelli, Alessandro: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Antoninus Pius: JEWISH WAR, SECOND
- Antschel, Paul See CELAN, PAUL
- Apollonius: TOBIADS
- Appelfeld, Aharon: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Aquila: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Aquinas, Thomas: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Arad, Yael: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Arafat, Yasser: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948 – 2010; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; RABIN, YITZHAK
- *Arama, Isaac: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Aranha, Oswaldo: BRAZIL
- Arbatova, Mia: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Arbus, Diane: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Archelaus: FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
- Archipova-Grossman, Valentina: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Ardon, Mordecai: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; ART, ISRAELI; PLATE 24
- Ardutiel, Shem Tov: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Arendt, Hannah: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Argov, Zohar: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Arieli, Yehoshua: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Arikha, Avigdor: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Aristoboulus: HELLENISM; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT
- Aristobulus: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
- Aristobulus II: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
- Aristotle: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; GERSONIDES; LOVE; MAIMONIDES; REVELATION; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Arlt, Roberto: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Armelin, Antoine: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
- Armelin, Pierre: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
- Arnold, Eve: PHOTOGRAPHY
- Arnon, Yaakov: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Arnon, Yehudit: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Arnstein, Fanny von: HABSBURG EMPIRE
- Arnstein, Margaret: NURSING: UNITED STATES
- Aronson, Boris: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Aronson, David: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Aronson, Shlomo: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Artapanus: PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT
- Artzi, Shlomo: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Asa: ANOINTMENT
- Asa, Abraham ben Isaac: LITERATURE, LADINO
- Asahel: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE
- Asaph ben Berekhiah: MEDICINE
- *Ascarelli, Devorà: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
- Ascarelli, Joseph: ASCARELLI, DEVORÀ
- Asch, Sholem: CELEBRITIES; FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; THEATER, YIDDISH
- Ascher, Felix: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Ascher, Saul: GOD
- Aseneth: PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA
- Ash, Abraham J.: FASHION
- Asher: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
- *Asher ben Jehiel: JACOB BEN ASHER; JUDAH BEN ASHER; MARTYRDOM; RESPONSA LITERATURE; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; TOSAFISTS
- Ashkenazi, Bezalel: LURIA, ISAAC
- Ashkenazi, Dan: SPAIN, CHRISTIAN
- Ashkenazi, Eliezer ben Isaac: PRINTING
- Ashkenazi, Joseph ben Eliezer Lipman: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700
- Ashkenazi, Nathan: KABBALAH; SHABBETAI ZEVI
- Ashkenazi, Zvi Hirsch: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Ashi, R.: AMORAIM
- Ashlag, Judah: KABBALAH
- Asimov, Isaac: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Askowith, Dora: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
- Assi, R.: AMORAIM
- Astro, Alan: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Athaliah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Athias, Abraham, Immanuel, and Joseph: PRINTING
- Atiyah, Mordechai: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Atlan, Lillian: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Atrahasis: MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL
- Attie, Shimon: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Atzmon, Shmuel: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Auden, W. H.: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Auerbach, Arnold "Red": SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Auerbach, Berthold: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Auerbach, Rachel: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Augustine: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM
- Avayou, Shlomo: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Avedon, Richard: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
- Averbuch, Alex: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Averroes: GERSONIDES; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Avner of Burgos: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL

- Avneri, Uri: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Avnet, Jon: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION
 Avrech, Robert J.: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Ayrton, Edith: ZANGWILL, ISRAEL
 Azariah: APOCRYPHA
 Azriel: KABBALAH
 Azulai, Hayim Joseph: TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND
 EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Azulay, Jom Tob: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 *Baal Shem Tov, Israel ben Eliezer: BAAL SHEM; DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ; ETHICAL WILLS; FOLKTALES; HASIDISM: EUROPE; HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; KABBALAH;
 NAHMAN BEN SIMHA OF BRATSLAV; UKRAINE; ZALMAN,
 SCHNEUR BEN BARUCH
 Bab, Julius: THEATER: EUROPE
 Baba'i ben Lotf: IRAN
 Babel, Isaac: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); RUSSIA
 Bachman, Lev: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Bacon, Francis: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Bacon, Yehuda: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Baeck, Leo: AESTHETICS; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY; LEO BAECK INSTITUTE; THOUGHT, MODERN Bagritsky, Eduard: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Bahia ben Asher: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
 *Bahia ben Joseph ibn Pakuda: ASCARELLI, DEVORÀ; LOVE; MUSAR MOVEMENT; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
 Bailly, Pascale: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
 Baizerman, Saul: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Bak, Samuel: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Baker, Jesse: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Bakst, Leon: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 *Balaam: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; JETHRO; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; MAGIC; NUMBERS, BOOK OF Balak: BALAAM
 Balaban, Avraham: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
 Balanchine, George: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Balas, Alexander: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
 Balfour, Arthur: BALFOUR DECLARATION; BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE
 Bally, Davicion: ROMANIA
 Baltard, Victor: SYNAGOGUES: FRANCE
 Balter, Sam: SPORTSCASTERS
 Bamberger, Dov: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX Banchik, Pedro: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Bankier, Abraham: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; SCHINDLER, OSKAR
 Bar Kappara, R.: AMORAIM; TANNAIM; TOSEFTA
 *Bar Kokhba, Simon: JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC
 SOURCES; JEWISH WAR, SECOND
 Bar Moshe, Itzhak: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Bar-Zohar, Michael: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Bara, Theda: CELEBRITIES; FILM: UNITED STATES
 Barak: DEBORAH
 Barak, Aharon: ISRAEL, STATE OF: JUDICIAL SYSTEM
 *Barak, Ehud: ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS;
 ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2010
 Barash, Asher: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Barbie, Klaus: LATIN AMERICA
 Bardin, Shlomo: SUMMER CAMPING
 Barnay, Ludwig: THEATER: EUROPE
 Barnes, Peter: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Baron, Devorah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
 1882–2010; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Baron, Salo: JEWISH STUDIES; MENORAH ASSOCIATION
 Barth, Belle: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Barth, Karl: SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.
 Bartov, Hanoch: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; MEMOIR
 AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Baruch ben Neriah: JEREMIAH, BOOK OF Barukh ben Isaac: TOSAFISTS
 Barukh ben Samuel: TOSAFISTS
 Barukh of Międzybóž: HASIDISM: EUROPE
 Barzani, Asnat: KURDISTAN; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL
 Barzilai, Judah: ABRAHAM BAR HIYYA; ASTROLOGY; FRANCE,
 SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; SEFER YETZIRAH
 Bas Tovim, Sarah: See Sarah bas Tovim
 Basemath: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Bashyatchi, Elijah: KARAISM
 Basilea, Aviad Sar Shalom: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Baskin, Leonard: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: ART; PLATE 19
 Basloe, Frank: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Basola, Moses: TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Bassani, Giorgio: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Bassman, Lillian: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Bassman-Chaim, Rivka: POETRY, YIDDISH
 Bat-Miriam, Yocheved: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN
 WRITERS, 1882–2010
 *Bathsheba: DAVID; DAVID: POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; LOVE; SOLOMON; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS; WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE
 Bauer, Felice: KAFKA, FRANZ
 Baum, Harry: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Bausch, Pina: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Beatriz de Luna: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Beck, Julian: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Becker, Jurek: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION;
 LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Beckmann, Max: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Bedersi, Abraham: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN
 EUROPE
 Beer, Haim: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Beer, Peter: PRAGUE
 Beer, Rami: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Beer-Hofmann, Richard: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE;
 THEATER: EUROPE
 Beg, Isaac: ROMANIA
 *Begin, Menachem: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2011; ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS; ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES; SHARON, ARIEL
 Begley, Louis: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Behar, Ruth: ANTHROPOLOGY; CARIBBEAN; FILM: LATIN AMERICA; LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Behrens, Peter: SYNAGOGUE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Beilin, Yossi: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Beilis, Mendel: BEILIS TRIAL; RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION; RUSSIA
 Bejerano, Maya: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Belasco, David: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Belev, Alexander: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Belial: DEAD SEA SCROLLS; DUALISM: IN ANCIENT JUDAISM; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE
 Belinsky, Fabián: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Belisario, Isaac Mendes: JAMAICA
 Belkin, Samuel: YESHIVA UNIVERSITY

- Bellow, Saul: CHICAGO; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE;
LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); LITERATURE,
YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Belmont, August: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES
- Ben-Ami, Jacob: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
- Ben Aych, Gil: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE;
LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Ben-David, Amon: ART, ISRAELI
- Bendavid, Lazarus: HASKALAH
- Ben David, Mordecai: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Ben Ghiat, Alexander: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE); LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Ben-Ami, Tami: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Ben-Ezer, Ehud: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Ben-Gal, Nir: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- *Ben-Gurion, David: BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE;
EINSTEIN, ALBERT; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
TELEVISION; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES; JERUSALEM, 1948–1967; MEMOIR AND LIFE
WRITING: HEBREW; MUSEUMS; SILVER, ABBA HILLEL; WEIZMANN, CHAIM; YOM HA-SHOAH
- Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer (Perelman): HEBREW: MODERN REVIVAL;
LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
- Ben-Yehuda, Hemdah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
- Ben-Zion: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Ben-Zvi, Yitzhak: BEN-GURION, DAVID; ISRAEL, STATE OF:
MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; YOM HA-SHOAH
- Bénabou, Marcel: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE;
LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Benayoun, Yossi: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Benderly, Samson: EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: HEBREW
COLLEGES; EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: SUPPLEMENTAL SCHOOLS; SUMMER CAMPING
- Benedict, Ruth: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Benigni, Roberto: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Benjamin: CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; ISRAELITES: TRIBES;
JOSHUA, BOOK OF; RACHEL; TRIBES, TWELVE
- Benjamin al-Nahawendi: KARAISM
- Benjamin of Rome: PRINTING
- *Benjamin of Tudela: ETHIOPIA; PILGRIMAGE; ROMANIA; TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Benjamin, Judah P.: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS; UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR; UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES,
SOUTHERN
- Benjamin, Marina: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
- *Benjamin, Walter: BERLIN; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE;
HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; SCHOLEM, GERSHOM
- Benny, Jack: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION;
COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM:
UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES
- Bentley, Muriel: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Benveniste, Immanuel: PRINTING
- Benveniste, Joshua: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Benveniste, Sheshet ben Isaac: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
- Benveniste, Vidal: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN;
POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Ber, Baruch: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
- Ber of Bolechow: FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Berab, Jacob: RABBINIC ORDINATION
- Berardelli, Alessandro: SULAM, SARRA COPIA
- Berdichevsky, Micah Joseph: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING:
HEBREW; ZIONISM
- Beregi, Oszkár: THEATER: EUROPE
- Berekhia ha-Nakdan: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Berenbaum, Michael: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
- Berenice: HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
- Berenson, Senda: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
- Berg, Gertrude: FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES;
TELEVISION: UNITED STATES
- Berg, Judith: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Berg, Morris “Moe”: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Bergelson, Dovid: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH
- Bergman, Ingmar: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Bergmann, Hugo: BUBER, MARTIN
- Bergner, Elizabeth: THEATER: EUROPE
- Bergner, Hinde: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Bergson, Henri: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
- Berinsky, Lev: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Berk, Fred: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Berkéwicz, Ulla: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Berkoff, Steven: THEATER: BRITAIN
- Berkovich, Eyal: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Berkovich, Miki: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- *Berkovits, Eliezer: AESTHETICS; GOD; HOLOCAUST:
THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT,
MODERN
- Berkson, Isaac B. and Libbie S.: SUMMER CAMPING
- Berle, Milton: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION;
COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM:
UNITED STATES
- Berlewi, Henryk: ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS
- Berlin, Adele: BIBLE: POETRY
- Berlin, Irving: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL; THEATER:
UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Berlin, Judah (see also Jost Liebmann): COURT JEWS
- Berlin, Saul: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Berman, Jakub: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
- Berman, Joanna: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Berman, Saul: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX
- Berman, Shelley: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
- Bermant, Chaim: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Bernal, Mestre: JAMAICA
- Bernard, Barney: ENTERTAINMENT
- Bernays, Isaac: HIRSCH, SAMSON RAPHAEL
- Bernays, Jacob: COHEN, HERMANN
- Berne, Joseph: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
- Bernhar, Thomas: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Bernhardt, Sarah: THEATER: EUROPE
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
- *Beruriah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM
- Bernstein, Berl: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Bernstein, Charles: POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Bernstein, Leonard: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER,
UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Bernstein, Theresa: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Berr, Berr Isaac: SECULARISM
- Berr, Michel: JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE; ZIONISM: FRANCE
- Bertonoff, Deborah: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Best, Werner: DENMARK; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Bezalel: ARK OF THE COVENANT

- Bezem, Naftali: ART, ISRAELI; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Bezmozgis, David: LITERATURE: CANADA
- *Bialik, Hayyim Nahman: ART, ISRAELI; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; POETRY: UNITED STATES; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Bibago, Abraham: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Bichovsky, Elisheva: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS
- Bielski Partisans: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE
- Bier, Susanne: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Bilhah: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; LEAH; RACHEL; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Billar, Maxim: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Bimko, Fishl: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Binder, A. W.: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Bing, Lazare Lévy: ZIONISM: FRANCE
- Bingham, Theodore A.: CRIME AND CRIMINALS: UNITED STATES
- Binyamin ben Misha'el: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
- Biouw, Hermann Gunther and Joanna: PHOTOGRAPHY
- Bird, Bonnie: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Birnbaum, Nathan: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; VIENNA; ZIONISM
- Birnbaum, Phillip: PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES
- Birshteyn, Yosl: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Biton, Erez: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Black, Hughie: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Blainsten, Isidoro: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Blanc, Mel: RADIO: UNITED STATES
- Blanchot, Maurice: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Blau, Herbert: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Blaustein, David: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Blecher, Miriam: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Blitzstein, Marc: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Bloch, Jean-Richard: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Bloch, Pedro: LATIN AMERICA
- Bloch, Samuel: HABSBURG EMPIRE
- Bloch-Bauer, Ferdinand and Adele: HOLOCAUST REPARATIONS AND RESTITUTION
- Bloom, Harold: POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Bloom, Hyman: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Bloom, Mike: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Bloomgarden, Solomon: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; POETRY, YIDDISH
- Blumenthal, Arthur "Bluey": SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Blum, Léon: FRANCE: 1789–1939
- Blum, Moshe: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Blume, Peter: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Blumenfeld, Yitzhak: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Blumenthal, N.: YIZKOR BOOKS
- Blumenthal, Oscar: THEATER: EUROPE
- Bluwstein, Rachel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Boas, Franz: ANTHROPOLOGY; UNITED STATES: HIGHER EDUCATION
- Boaz: ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; RUTH, BOOK OF
- Bock, Geoffrey: EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: SUPPLEMENTAL SCHOOLS
- Bock, Jerry: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Boeckh, August: COHEN, HERMANN
- Bogrov, Grigory: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Bohm, Gabriela: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Böhme, Jakob: BUBER, MARTIN
- Bohne, Sammy (Cohen): SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Bois, Curt: THEATER: EUROPE
- Bolaño, Roberto: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Bolotowsky, Ilya: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Boltansky, Christian: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Bombert, Daniel: PRINTING
- Bonafed, Solomon: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Bonifacio, Baldassare: SULAM, SARRA COPIA
- Booth, Charles: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN
- Borchardt, Rudolf: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Borer, Tamar: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Boreysho, Menakhem: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Borges, Jorge Luis: FILM: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Borkovsky, Joshua: ART: ISRAEL
- Born, Friedrich: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Börne, Ludwig: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Borofsky, Jonathan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Borofsky, Philip: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Borokhov, Ber: ZIONISM
- Borowitz, Eugene: THOUGHT, MODERN
- Borowski, Tadeusz: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Bosco, Monique: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Bostwick, Henry (Lifschitz): SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Botta, Mario: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Bouganin, Ami: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Boukhobza, Chochana: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Bouman, Elias: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
- Bourke-White, Margaret: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Bouwmeester, Louis Frederik Johannes: THEATER: EUROPE
- Box, Bobby: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Boxer, Barbara: SAN FRANCISCO; UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
- Boyarin, Jonathan: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Brahe, Tycho: SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Brahm, Otto: THEATER: EUROPE
- Brahms, Helga Sanders: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Brand, Joel: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- *Brandeis, Louis Dembitz: BOSTON; BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA; SUMMER CAMPING; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS; UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN; ZIONISM: UNITED STATES
- Brandes, Edvard: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; THEATER: EUROPE
- Brandes, George: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; THEATER: EUROPE
- Brandon, Moses Hoheb: CARIBBEAN
- Brandstädter, Mordechai David: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Brandwein, Naftule: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Braque, Georges: ART, ISRAELI
- Braudes, Reuven Asher: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Brauer, Erich: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Brazovsky, Shalom Noah: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Brecht, Bertolt: ART, ISRAELI; BENJAMIN, WALTER

- Brenner, Joseph Haim: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Breuer, Isaac: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA- ORTHODOX
- Breuer, Josef: PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA
- Brice, Fanny: CELEBRITIES; COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Bril, Jehiel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Brill, Joel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Brod, Max: HABSBURG EMPIRE; KAFKA, FRANZ
- Broder, Henryk: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Brodkin, Karen: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Brodsky, Joseph: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Brody, Tal: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Brøgger, Suzanne: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Brokhes, Zalmen: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV
- Bromberg, Ellen: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Bronstein, Lev Davidovich: TROTSKY, LEON
- Brookner, Anita: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Brooks, Mel: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION; THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Browne, Edward B. M.: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
- Bruder, Dora: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Bruce, Lenny: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT
- Brukman, Shimshon: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Brunner, Arnold: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Brunner, Emil: SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.
- Bruno, Giordano: ABRAVANEL FAMILY
- Brunschwig, Léon: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
- Brustein, Robert: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Brynnych, Zbyněk: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Brysk, Alison: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- *Buber, Martin: AESTHETICS; ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; BERKOVITS, ELIEZER; BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; FACKENHEIM, EMIL LUDWIG; FRANKFURT AM MAIN; GERMANY; GOD; HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; LEVINAS, EMMANUEL; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; NAHMAN BEN SIMHA OF BRATSLAV; PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA; REDEMPTION; REVELATION; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ; RUBENSTEIN, RICHARD L.; SCHOLEM, GERSHOM; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Buber, Salomon: BUBER, MARTIN
- Bublick, Gedaliah: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Bueno de Mesquita, Abraham: CARIBBEAN
- Bukiet, Melvin Jules: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- Buloff, Joseph: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Bunche, Ralph: UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
- Burla, Yehuda: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
- Burman, Daniel: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Burns, George: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION; COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES
- Burns, Richard: POETRY: BRITAIN
- Burstein, Michael: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Bush, George W.: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
- Buxtorf, Johann: CHRISTAIN HEBRAISM
- Buzaglo, Haim: FILM: ISRAEL
- Caesar, Sid: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION; COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; TELEVISION: UNITED STATES
- Cafri, Rachel: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Cagli, Corrado: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Cahan, Abraham: FILM: UNITED STATES; JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Cahana, Alice Lok: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Cahn, Sammy: ENTERTAINMENT
- *Cain: ADAM; JACOB
- Campe, J. H.: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Canetti, Elias: BULGARIA
- Canter, John: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Canter, Joshua: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Cantor, Eddie: ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Capa, Robert: PHOTOGRAPHY
- Carasso, Emmanuel: OTTOMAN EMPIRE
- Cardozo, Abraham: SHABBETAI ZEVI
- Carlebach, Shlomo: CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Carmel, Zefania: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Carmi, Ted: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Carmona, Elia: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
- Carnegie, Hattie: FASHION
- Carter, Jimmy: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
- Carvalho, Solomon: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
- Caslari, Crescas: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Cassel, Ernest: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES
- Cassin, René: HUMAN RIGHTS
- Cassius Dio: BAR KOKHBA
- Cassuto, Umberto: BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE
- Castel-Blum, Orly: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
- Castro, Abraham: OTTOMAN EMPIRE
- Ceba, Ansaldo: SULAM, SARRA COPIA
- Celan, Paul: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Céline, Louis-Ferdinand: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Chabon, Michael: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- *Chagall, Bella: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Chagall, Marc: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS; ART, ISRAELI; CHAGALL, BELLA ROSENFELD; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; RUSSIA; PLATE 14
- Chaikin, Joseph: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Chaillet, Pierre: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Chalfi, Rachel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
- Chaney, James: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
- Chaplin, Charles: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Charles, Gerda: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Chaucer, Geoffrey: GHETTO; RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION
- Chayefsky, Paddy: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Chayim of Volozhin: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES; VILNA GAON
- Chekhov, Anton: OZ, AMOS
- Chelouche, Yosef Eliyahu: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Chetrit, Sami Shalom: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW

Chicago, Judy: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Chilkovsky, Nadia: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Chochem, Corrine: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Chocrón, Isaac: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Chodorov, Yaakov: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Chorin, Aaron: HABSBURG EMPIRE
 *Chmelnitzki, Bogdan: ROMANIA; UKRAINE
 Christiani, Pablo: CONVERSOS/CRYPTO JEWS; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS
 Chronegk, Ludwig: THEATER: EUROPE
 Chrysostom, John: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM; SERMONS
 Churchill, Winston: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Clarke, Martha: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Citroen, André: FRANCE: 1789–1939
 Clauberg, Carl: HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS
 Clement of Alexandria: PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA
 Cleveland, Grover: STRAUS FAMILY
 Clinton, Bill: BARAK, EHUD; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948 – 2010; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Clurman, Harold: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Cobb, Ty: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Cohan, Robert: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Cohen, Albert: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Cohen, Arthur: AESTHETICS; GOD; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
 Cohen, David: KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC
 Cohen, Frederick E.: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Cohen, Gershon ben Solomon: PRAGUE; PRINTING
 *Cohen, Hermann: AESTHETICS; ATONEMENT; AUTONOMY AND HETERONOMY; BERKOVITS, ELIEZER; BUBER, MARTIN; GOD; JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; REDEMPTION; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ; SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN Cohen, Isaac: KABBALAH
 Cohen, Jacob: KABBALAH
 Cohen, Judith Barent: MONTEFIORE, MOSES HAIM
 Cohen, Katherine M.: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Cohen, Leonard: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Cohen, Levi Barent: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Cohen, Lionel Louis: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Cohen, Matt: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Cohen, Michael: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Cohen, Myron: ENTERTAINMENT
 Cohen, Sacha Baron: ENTERTAINMENT
 Cohen, Sasha (Alexandra): SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Cohen, Yardena: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Cohen, Ze'eva: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Cohen-Gan, Pinchas: ART, ISRAELI
 Cohen-Mintz, Tanchum: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Cohn, Albert: FRANCE: 1789–1939
 Cohn, Haim: ISRAEL, STATE OF: JUDICIAL SYSTEM
 Cohn, Harry: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Cohn, Linda: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Cohn, Nudie: FASHION
 Cole, Frederick: FASHION
 *Columbus, Christopher: JAMAICA; MEXICO
 Conat, Abraham and Estellina: PRINTING
 Constantine: BYZANTINE EMPIRE; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM
 Cooper, Chuck: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Cooper, Sybil (Syd) Koff: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Copeland, Lillian: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Copernicus: BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP; PSYCHOANALYSIS

*Cordero, Moses: BREAKING OF THE VESSELS; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC; LURIA, ISAAC; SAFED; TURKEY
 Corning, Beth: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Cortázar, Julio: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Cortisoz, Royal: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Cosell, Howard: SPORTSCASTERS
 Costa-Gavras: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Coughlin, Charles: INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES
 Cover, Robert: JUDAISM, FEMINIST
 Cowen, Sir Frederic Hyman: JAMAICA
 Cozen, Samuel: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Craz, August: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Crémieux, Adolphe: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; FRANCE: 1789–1939; NORTH AFRICA
 *Crescas, Ḥasdai ben Abraham: MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Croci, Pascal: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
 Cromwell, Oliver: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES; UNITED STATES: IMMIGRATION
 Cross, Frank Moore: BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE
 Curtis, M. B.: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Cusi, Meshullam: PRINTING
 Cygielman, Victor: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Cyrus the Great: BABYLONIAN EXILE; EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF; ISAIAH, BOOK OF; PERSIA, ANCIENT Czarny, Norbert: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 *Czerniakow, Adam: HOLOCAUST DIARIES; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE Czyski, Jan: ZIONISM: FRANCE
 Da Costa, Uriel: AMSTERDAM
 Da Silva, Antonio José: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 D'Alemand, Antoine: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
 Dambrot, Irwin: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Dan: ETHIOPIA; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; RACHEL; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Danel: BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE
 *Daniel: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BEL AND THE DRAGON; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; JOB, BOOK OF; MARTYRDOM; MESSIAH; RESURRECTION
 Daniel al-Kumisi: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; KARAISM
 Daniel', Yuly: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Danielsson, Carl Ivan: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Danzig, Abraham: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL
 Danziger, Itzhak: ART, ISRAELI; PLATE 23
 Dapiera, Meshullam: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Dapiera, Solomon: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Dari, Moses: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD
 Darius I: HAGGAI, BOOK OF; PERSIA, ANCIENT Darius II: ALEXANDER THE GREAT
 Darmesteter, Arsène and James: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Darmon, Paule: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Darwin, Charles: BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP; PSYCHOANALYSIS
 Darwishe, Salman: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Dassa, Dani: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Da'ud ibn Marwan: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
 *David: AMORAIM; ANOINTMENT; APOCRYPHA; ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; ARK OF THE COVENANT; ART: LATE

- ANTIQUITY; BATHSHEBA; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; BLESSINGS: BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; DAVID: POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EDOM; ETHICAL WILLS; EXILARCH; GENESIS, BOOK OF; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEBRON; HITTITES; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; ISAIAH, BOOK OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JOSHUA, BOOK OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF; LOVE; LUZZATTO, MOSES ḤAYYIM; MESSIANISM: BIBLICAL AND SECOND TEMPLE ERAS; MOAB; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS; PATRIARCH; PHILISTINES; PROSTITUTES, PROSTITUTION: HEBREW BIBLE THROUGH MIDDLE AGES; PSALMS, BOOK OF; RUTH, BOOK OF; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SHAVUOT; SOLOMON; TABERNACLE; TAMAR (GENESIS 38); TAMAR (2 SAMUEL); TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; UNITED MONARCHY; WORSHIP; ZERUBBABEL
- David ben Amram ha-Adani: YEMEN
- David ben Daniel: EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES
- David ben Samuel: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
- David ben Zimra: LURIA, ISAAC
- David of Maków: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
- David, Larry: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION; TELEVISION: UNITED STATES
- Davidson, Avram: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Davidson, Jo: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Davidson, Melech: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Davis, Al: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Davis, Arthur: ZANGWILL, ISRAEL
- Davis, Jacob: FASHION
- Davis, Moshe: SUMMER CAMPING
- Dawison, Bogumil: THEATER: EUROPE
- Dayan, Assi: FILM: ISRAEL
- Dayan, Moshe: ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS; ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- De Goncourt, Edmond: ANTISEMITISM: France, 1789–1939
- De Grouillier, Hector: ANTISEMITISM: France, 1789–1939
- De la Parra, Samuel Haim: CARIBBEAN
- De la Torre, Raúl: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- De Sica, Vittorio: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
- De Winter, Leon: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- *Deborah (Judges): BETH EL; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JUDGES, BOOK OF; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS; WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE
- Deborah (GENESIS): WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Debré, Simon: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Dedi: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Dekal, Zvi: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Delakova, Katya: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Delanoë, Nelcy: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Delaunay, Robert: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Delbo, Charlotte: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Delilah: JUDGES, BOOK OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Delmedigo, Joseph Solomon: MEDICINE; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- D'Ennery, Adolphe: THEATER: EUROPE
- Demetrius: HELLENISM
- Derenbourg, Joseph and Hartwig: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
- Descartes, René: GOD; SPINOZA, BARUCH
- Dessoir, Ludwig: THEATER: EUROPE
- Dessler, Eliyahu: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- DeVaux, Roland: QUMRAN
- DeWette, Wilhelm: DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF
- Deutsch, Ernst: THEATER: EUROPE
- Deutsch, Naomi: NURSING: UNITED STATES
- Deutscher, Isaac: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
- Deutschlander, Leo: SCHENIRER, SARAH
- Dever, William: CANAAN, CANAANITES
- Di Castro, Angelo: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Diaghilev, Serge: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Diamant, Anita: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Diamant, Dora: KAFKA, FRANZ
- Dickens, Charles: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
- Dienemann, Max: JONAS, REGINA
- Digby, Kenelm: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN
- Dilthy, Wilhelm: BUBER, MARTIN
- Dimov, Osip: THEATER, YIDDISH
- *Dinah: ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; LEAH; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; SHECHEM; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Dinar, Baruch: FILM: ISRAEL
- Dine, Jim: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Dineson, Jacob: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Dinur, Yehiel: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Dio Cassius: JEWISH WAR, SECOND
- Dischereit, Esther: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Disney, Walt: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
- *Disraeli, Benjamin: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; CELEBRITIES
- Dix, Otto: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Dizengoff, Meir: MUSEUMS
- Dmytryk, Edward: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Döblin, Alfred: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Dohm, Wilhelm von: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
- Dolce of Worms: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
- Domecq, Alcina Lubitch: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Domin, Hilda: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Donadille, Françoise and Marc: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Donat, Alexander: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Donin, Nicholas: MIDDLES AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS
- Donnolo, Shabbetai: BYZANTINE EMPIRE; MEDICINE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; SEFER YETZIRAH
- Doran, Silvia: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Doron, Shay: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Dorfman, Ariel: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Dorfman, Carolyn: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Dorfman, David: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Dortas, Samuel: PRINTING
- Dositheus: SAMARITANS
- Dostrovski, Yaakov: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
- *Dov Ber of Międzyrzecz: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; MAIMON, SALOMON; UKRAINE; ZALMAN, SCHNEUR BEN BARUCH
- Dov Ber of Lubavitch: ḤABAD; ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
- Dovlatov, Sergey: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Drach, Michel: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Draigor, Anat: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Dreyer, Carl: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA

*Dreyfus, Alfred: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; DREYFUS AFFAIR; EMANCIPATION; FILM: UNITED STATES; FRANCE: 1789–1939; HERZL, THEODOR; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
Dreyfuss, Barney: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
Driver, Minnie: FILM: UNITED STATES
Dropkin, Celia: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY, YIDDISH
Dror, Liat: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Druks, Michael: ART, ISRAELI
Drumont, Édouard: ANTISEMITISM; ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
Dryfoos, Orvil: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
DuPlessis, Rachel Blau: POETRY: UNITED STATES
Dubinsky, David: UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT
Dublon, Else: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Dubno, Solomon: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
*Dubnow, Simon: COUNCIL OF FOUR LANDS and COUNCIL OF LITHUANIA; THOUGHT, MODERN Duchamp, Marcel: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
Duckwitz, Georg Ferdinand: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
Dudley, Jane: DANCE: UNITED STATES
*Dunash ben Labrat: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
Dunash ibn Tamim: ASTROLOGY; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; SEFER YETZIRAH
Duncan, Isadora: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL; DANCE: UNITED STATES
Dupeyron, François: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
Duran, Profiat: MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS
Duran, Solomon ben Simon (Rashbash): RESPONSA LITERATURE
Durkheim, Emile: ANTHROPOLOGY; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY); KAPLAN, MORDECHAI M.
Durlacher, Gerhard L.: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
Dushkin, Alexander M. and Julia: SUMMER CAMPING
Dyer, Richard: CELEBRITIES
Dymshits, Mark: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
Ebner, Ferdinand: BUBER, MARTIN
Edelstadt, Dovid: POETRY, YIDDISH
Edelstein, Yuli: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
Eden, Anthony: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Ederle, Gertrude: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
Edvardson, Cordelia: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
Edwards, Ralph: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION
Egidio di Viterbo: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM
Efrat, Benni: ART, ISRAELI
Efrati, Moshe: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
*Ehrenburg, Ilya: JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
Ehrenkrantz, Dan: JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST
Ehrenreich, Shlomoh Zalman: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
Ehud: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE
Eichelbaum, Samuel: LATIN AMERICA
Eichmann, Adolph: CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST EDUCATION: NORTH AMERICA; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; HOLOCAUST TRIALS; LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; THERESIENSTADT; VIENNA
Eicke, Theodor: HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS
Eidlitz, Leopold: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
Eilberg, Amy: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN

*Einhorn, David: CHICAGO; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA; UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN–JEWISH RELATIONS; UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
*Einstein, Albert: BERLIN; GERMANY; SCHOLEM, GERSHOM
Einstein, Arik: MUSIC, POPULAR
Eisen, Arnold: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE
Eisendrath, Maurice: JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
Eisenhower, Dwight: DISPLACED PERSONS; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
Eisenman, Peter: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
Eisenmenger, Johann Andreas: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM
Eisenstaedt, Alfred: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
Eisenstein, Bernice: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
Eisenstein, Ira: JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST; RECONSTRUCTIONIST RABBINICAL COLLEGE
Eisner, Will: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
Eitinger, Leo: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
Elberg, Simhah: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
*Eldad ha-Dani: ETHIOPIA
Eldad, Israel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
Eldan, Anadad: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Eleazar: ZEALOTS
Eleazar ben Azariah, R.: TANNAIM
Eleazar ben Judah of Worms: EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; GOLEM; MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ; MYSTICISM: ANCIENT; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA); POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
Eleazar ben Kallir: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Eleazar ben Pedat, R.: AMORAIM
Eleazar ben Samuel of Mainz: EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; ETHICAL WILLS
Eleazar ben Simeon, R.: ZOHAR
Elder, Will: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
Elhanan: HANNAH
Elhanan ben Samuel: TOSAFISTS
Elhanan ben Jakar: MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
Eli: SAMARITANS; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SHILOH
Elias, Henry Hart: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
Eliashib: TOBIADS
Eliav, Lova: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
Eliezer, R.: TRIBES, TEN LOST
Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, R.: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; TANNAIM
Eliezer ben Nathan: TOSAFISTS
Eliezer ben Joel Ha-Levi: TOSAFISTS
Eliezer of Beaugency: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES
Eliezer of Touques: TOSAFISTS
Elihu: JOB, BOOK OF
*Elijah: AHAB; BIBLE; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; CANAAN, CANAANITES; ELIJAH: BIBLICAL AND POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; ELISHA; MOSES
Elijah ben Solomon Zalman: VILNA; VILNA GAON
Elijah de Veali: ETHICAL WILLS
Elimelekh: RUTH, BOOK OF Elimelech of Lizhensk: DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ; ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
*Elisha: BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; HABAKKUK, BOOK OF; MAGIC
*Elisha ben Abuya: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; METATRON
Ellenson, David: HEBREW UNION COLLEGE-JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION
Ellison, Harlan: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION

Ellstein, Abe: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Elte, Harry: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Elzas, A.: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Emden, Jacob: ABORTION
 Emmanuel, David: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
 Engel, Fritz: THEATER: EUROPE
 Englander, Nathan: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
 Enoch: ESCHATOLOGY; METATRON; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT
 AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA
 Ephraim: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; JOSEPH; SHILOH; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Ephraim Solomon ben Aaron: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY:
 MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
 Ephraim of Regensburg: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN
 EUROPE; TOSAFISTS
 Ephrem: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM
 Epicurus: EPIKOROS
 Epiphanius: Gnosticism; SEPTUAGINT
 Eppel, Asar: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Eppstein, Jacob: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Epstein, Charlotte: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Epstein, Henry Moses: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Epstein, Jacob: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Epstein, J. N.: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
 Epstein, Yitzhak: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Erdman, Harley: ENTERTAINMENT
 Erekat, Saeb: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT
 (1948 TO 2010)
 Ernst, Jimmy: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Erter, Yitzhak: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 *Esau: ANTISEMITISM; EDOM; GENESIS, BOOK OF; ISAAC;
 JACOB; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; LOVE; RASHI;
 REBEKAH; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE
 Eshed, Eli: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
 Eshel, Ruth: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Eshkol, Levi: BEN-GURION, DAVID; ISRAEL, STATE OF:
 MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF:
 POLITICAL PARTIES; MEIR, GOLDA
 Eshkol, Noa: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Essman, Susie: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 *Esther: ANOINTMENT; APOCRYPHA; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; FIVE SCROLLS; FOLKTALES;
 INDIA; LITERATURE, LADINO; PERSIA, ANCIENT; PURIM;
 WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Ettinger, Solomon: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Ettlinger, Jacob: HIRSCH, SAMSON RAPHAEL
 Etzioni-Halevy, Eva: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Euchel, Isaac: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH;
 MENDELSSOHN, MOSES; THEATER, YIDDISH
 Eusebius: PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA
 Evans, Eli: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
 *Eve: ADAM; ALPHABET OF BEN SIRA; AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; CAIN AND ABEL; ETHICS, SEXUAL; EVIL AND SUFFERING;
 GENESIS, BOOK OF; LILITH; SAMAEL; WOMEN, ANCIENT:
 BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Eve, Nomi: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Evergood, Philip: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Eytan, Rachel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
 1882–2010
 *Ezekiel: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE
 PERIOD; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BABYLON, BABYLONIA; BAR KOKHBA; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; HOSEA, BOOK
 OF; INCENSE; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JERUSALEM:
 BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; MYSTICISM, ANCIENT;

MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; PROPHETS; PTOLEMIES; RESURRECTION; SEFIROT; TRIBES,
 TWELVE
 Ezekiel the Poet (or Tragedian): HELLENISM; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA;
 PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT
 Ezekiel, Moses Jacob: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 *Ezra: BABYLON, BABYLONIA; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; GOD; INTERMARRIAGE:
 HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVES; MOSES; NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF; PERSIA, ANCIENT; RUTH, BOOK OF; SAMARITANS;
 SPINOZA, BARUCH
 Ezra ben Solomon: KABBALAH
 *Fackenheim, Emil Ludwig: AESTHETICS; GOD; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT,
 MODERN
 Fagen, Cary: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Fainlight, Ruth: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Faitlovitch, Jacques: ETHIOPIA
 Faktor, Emil: THEATER: EUROPE
 Falaquera, Shem Tov: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Falk, Jacob Joshua ben Zevi Hirsch: FRANKFURT AM MAIN
 Falk, Marcia: GOD; JUDAISM, FEMINIST; PRAYER BOOKS:
 UNITED STATES
 Falk, Shmuel Jacob Hayyim: BAAL SHEM
 Fanta, Berta: PRAGUE
 Färberböck, Max: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
 Farer, Louis: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Farjeon, Benjamin: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Farkas, Mihály: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Farrakhan, Louis: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 DRAMA; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Faurisson, Robert: HOLOCAUST DENIAL
 Fautrier, Jean: ART, ISRAELI
 Favier, Auguste: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Fefer, Itsik: JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE
 Feierberg, Mordecai Ze'ev: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Feierstein, Ricardo: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Feiffer, Jules: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Feijóo, Beda Docampo: FILM: LATIN AMERICA Fein, Leonard: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Feinman, Dina: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Feinman, Sigmund: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Feinstein, Diane: SAN FRANCISCO
 Feinstein, Elaine: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Feiwel, Berthold: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Feld, Eliot: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Feldenkrais, Moshe: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Feldman, Zev: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Feldmann, Wilhelm: THEATER: EUROPE
 Félic, Eliza Rachel: THEATER: EUROPE
 Fellig, Arthur: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
 Felsenthal, Bernhard: CHICAGO; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
 Ferber, Edna: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Ferdowsi: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
 Feuchtwanger, Lion: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; THEATER:
 EUROPE
 Feuerbach, Ludwig: BUBER, MARTIN
 Feuerverger-Meir, Meir: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Fibich, Felix: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Fichandler, Zelda: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Ficino, Marsilio: KABBALAH
 Ficowski, Jerzy: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY

Field, Esther: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 Fields, Lew: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Fields, Totie: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Fierstein, Harvey: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Figes, Eva: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Fink, Ida: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Fink, Uri: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION
 Finkel, Note Hirsh (Natan Tsevi): MUSAR MOVEMENT
 Finkelkraut, Alain: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Finkelstein, Louis: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
 Finkelstein, Norman: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Firer, Bentsiyon: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Firkovitch, Abraham: KARAISM
 Fischel, Arnold: UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR
 Fisher, Bobby: CELEBRITIES
 Fishman, Rukhl: POETRY, YIDDISH
 Fishof, Adolf: HABSBURG EMPIRE
 Flack, Audrey: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: ART
 Flapin, Simha: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Fleg, Edmond: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Fleischer, Max: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Fleischmann, Elizabeth: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Fleishman, Jerry: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Fliegel, Bernard: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL Foa, Eugénie: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Folman, Ari: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
 Ford, Alexander: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Ford, Henry: ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE);
 SPORTS AND AMERICANIZATION; SPORTS, UNITED STATES:
 BASEBALL
 Forman, Zadik: LITERATURE, LADINO
 Förster, Ludwig von: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Fosse, Bob: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Fould, Benoît and Achille: FRANCE: 1789–1939
 Fourier, Charles: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
 Fox, Everett: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
 Fox, Michael: EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL
 Fox, William: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Fraenkel, David: GOD; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Franck, Adolphe: FRANCE: 1789–1939; JEWISH STUDIES:
 FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Franck, Henri: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 *Frank, Anne: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY;
 HOLOCAUST DIARIES; HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION;
 HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 DRAMA; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM;
 HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION; MUSEUMS
 Frank, Eva: FRANK, JACOB AND FRANKISM; MYSTICISM,
 WOMEN AND; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Frank, Hans: HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION
 *Frank, Jacob: ANTINOMIANISM; HASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND; UKRAINE; WOMEN:
 EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Frank, Leo: UNITED STATES: SOUTHERN
 Frank, Edith, Margot, and Otto: FRANK, ANNE; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Frank, Rachel (Ray): RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN;
 UNITED STATES, WESTERN
 Frank, Robert: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
 Frankau, Gilbert: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Frankau, Julia: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Frankel, Ellen: JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY
 Frankel, Jacob: UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY

*Frankel, Zacharias: COHEN, HERMANN; GERMANY; GRAETZ, HEINRICH; JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY; THOUGHT,
 MODERN
 Frankenthaler, Helen: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Franzos, Karl Emil: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Freed, Isadore: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Frelander, Daniel: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Freeman, Mark: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Freilich, Alicia: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Frémont, John Charles: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940;
 PHOTOGRAPHY
 Fresco, David: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 *Freud, Sigmund: EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL;
 ENTERTAINMENT; HABSBURG EMPIRE; LITERATURE:
 CENTRAL EUROPE; MEDICINE; PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA;
 PSYCHOANALYSIS; VIENNA
 Fried, Avraham: MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Fried, Hédi: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Friedan, Betty: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Friedland, Sally-Anne: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Friedländer, David: HASKALAH; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Friedlander, Eytan: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Friedlander, Lee: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Friedländer, Moritz: GNOSTICISM
 Friedman, Benny: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Friedman, Bruce Jay: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Friedman, Carl: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Friedman, Debbie: CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Friedman, Gal: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Friedman, Kinky: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Friedman, Marty: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Friedman, Richard E.: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
 Friedman, Robert: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Friedman, Thomas L.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Friedmann, Mira: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION
 Friedsel, Louis: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Frisch, Efraim: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Fromm, Erich: ANTHROPOLOGY
 Fromm, Herbert: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Froot, Dan: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Froschauer, Christoph: ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS
 Fry, Varian: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Fuchs, Leo: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 Fuenn, Samuel Joseph: HASKALAH
 Fuentes, Carlos: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Fug, Semyon: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Fuller, Jake: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Fün, Shmuel Yosef: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Futterman, Enid: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Gabler, Neal: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Gabo, Naum: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Gad: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Galante, Abraham: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 Galpern, Lasar: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Gamaliel, R.: CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; PATRIARCH; TANNAIM; WORSHIP
 Gamaliel II, R.: PATRIARCH; TANNAIM
 Gans, David: PRAGUE; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Gaon, Yehoram: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Gardner, Herb: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS

Garfield, John: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Garfinkel, Jack "Dutch": SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Garfunkel, Baruch Mordecai and Moses: FASHION
 Gary, Romain: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Gat, Eliahu: ART, ISRAELI
 Gat, Emanuel: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Gates, Pop: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Gavron, Jeremy: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Gechtman, Gideon: ART, ISRAELI Geffen, Aviv: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Geffen, Tobias: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
 *Geiger, Abraham: CHOSENNESS; FRANKFURT AM MAIN;
 GERMANY; HIRSCH, SAMSON RAPHAEL; GOD; JUDAISM,
 REFORM: GERMANY; THOUGHT, MODERN; *WISSENSCHAFT
 DES JUDENTUMS*
 Gelbart, Larry: ENTERTAINMENT
 Gelber, N. M.: YIZKOR BOOKS
 Gens, Jacob: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Gentry, Eve: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Gerchunoff, Alberto: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Gerlier, Pierre-Marie: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Gernsheim, Helmut: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Gerő, Ernő: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 *Gershom ben Judah of Mainz: COMMERCE: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE; DIVORCE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; GERMANY; MARRIAGE AND MARRIAGE
 CUSTOMS; MARTYRDOM; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; RASHI; RESPONSA LITERATURE; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
 Gershon, Karen: KINDERTRANSPORT; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Gersht, Yehudah Layb: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Gershuni, Moshe: ART, ISRAELI
 Gershwin, George: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER,
 UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Gershwin, Ira: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 *Gersonides (Levi ben Gershon): ASTROLOGY; BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; FRANCE,
 SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS; MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
 Gerz, Jochen: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
 Gessner, Solomon: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Getter, Tamar: ART, ISRAELI
 Geva, Avital: ART, ISRAELI Geva, Zibi: ART, ISRAELI
 Giacon, Samuel: PRINTING
 Giardino, Vittorio: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
 Gideon, Jerubaal: COURTS
 Gies, Miep: FRANK, ANNE
 Gikatilla, Joseph: KABBALAH; ZOHAR
 Gilboa, Amir: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Gilgamesh: MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL
 Gillman, Neil: GOD; THOUGHT, MODERN
 Gillman, Sid: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Ginsberg, Allen: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Ginzberg, Asher: See AḤAD HA-AM
 Ginzberg, H. L.: JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE
 Ginzberg, Louis: JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; SZOLD, HENRIETTA
 Giordano, Ralph: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Giradoux, Jean: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
 Girsdansky, Joseph "Gid": SPORTS, UNITED STATES:
 BASKETBALL
 Girsdansky, Max: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Gitai, Amos: INFERTILITY

Glantz, Jacobo: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Glantz, Margo: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Glanville, Brian: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Glasburg, Alexandre: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Glatstein, Jacob (Yankev Glatshetyn): HOLOCAUST LITERATURE;
 LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; POETRY: UNITED STATES; POETRY, YIDDISH
 Glikl bas Judah Leib: See Glückel of Hameln
 Glickman, Marty: SPORTSCASTERS
 Glickman, Susan: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Glickstein, Shlomo: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Globocnik, Odilo: HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS Glück, Louise: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Gluck, Rena: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 *Glückel of Hameln: FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE:
 WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA);
 LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA; WOMEN:
 EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Glückstein, Alain: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Gluska, Aharon: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Gnessin, Uri Nissan: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Godbey, A.: TRIBES, TEN LOST
 Godder, Yasmeen: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Goebbels, Joseph: HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION;
 THERESIENTSTADT
 Golan, Eyal: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Golan, Menahem: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Gold, Michael: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
 Goldberg, Daniel: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Goldberg, Leah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
 1882–2010; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948;
 POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Goldblatt, Emanuel: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Goldemberg, Isaac: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Golden, Harry: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN Goldenberg, Shmuel Leib: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Goldenson, Leonard: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
 Goldfaden, Avrom: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Goldin, Farideh: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
 Goldin, Sidney: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE
 Goldin, Leyb: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
 Golding, Louis: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Goldman, Emma: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Goldman, Mo: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Goldmann, Annie: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Goldmann, Nahum: ENCYCLOPEDIAS; ISRAEL, STATE OF:
 DIASPORA RELATIONS; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Goldreich, Gloria: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Goldsmid, Francis: MONTEFIORE, MOSES HAIM
 Goldsmid, Louisa: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Goldschmidt, Meir Aron: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Goldstein, Maksymilian: MUSEUMS
 Goldstein, Moritz: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Goldstein, Rebecca: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); LITERATURE: UNITED STATES
 (SINCE 1900)
 Goldwyn, Samuel: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Goliath: APOCRYPHA; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; DAVID; PHILISTINES

- Golinkin, Mordechai: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Goller, Izak: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Goloboff, Mario: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Golomb, Eliyahu: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
 Golub, Leon: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: ART
 Gomer: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Goodman, Allegra: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Goodman, Andrew: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS
 MOVMENT
 Goodman, Benny: CHICAGO
 Goodman, Percival: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Goodman, Ruth: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Goodrich, Frances: FRANK, ANNE; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Gorbachev, Mikhail: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT,
 1967–1989
 Gordin, Jacob: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION; SECULARISM; THEATER, YIDDISH
 *Gordon, Aharon David: GARDENS; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ECOLOGY; KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC
 Gordan, David: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Gordon, David: HASKALAH
 Gordon, Judah Leib: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW:
HASKALAH; SECULARISM; THOUGHT, MODERN; WOMEN,
 MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE
 Gordon, Samuel: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Göring, Hermann: HOLOCAUST
 Goskind, Shaul and Itzhak: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE
 Goth, Trudy: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Gotheiner, Zvi: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Gotlieb, Phyllis: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Gottheil, Richard J. H.: FRATERNITIES AND SORORITIES: NORTH AMERICA
 Gottlieb, Adolph: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART,
 AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Gottlieb, Eddie: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Gottlieb, Lynn: JUDAISM, FEMINIST
 Gottlieb, Mauryey: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Gottlober, Avrom Ber: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH;
 THEATER, YIDDISH
 Gottwald, Norman: TRIBES, TWELVE
 Gouri, Haim: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Govrin, Michal: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE,
 HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Grade, Chaim: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 *Graetz, Heinrich: AESTHETICS; COHEN, HERMANN; JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY; MARX, KARL; THOUGHT, MODERN;
WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS
 Graham, Martha: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL; DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Granach, Alexander: THEATER: EUROPE
 Granovsky, Alexander: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; THEATER,
 YIDDISH
 Grant, Linda: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: WOMEN
 WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Grant, Ulysses S.: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE); UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR; UNITED STATES:
 POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Gratz, Michael and Barnard: UNITED STATES: AMERICAN REVOLUTION
 *Gratz, Rebecca: LEESER, ISAAC; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); NURSING:
 UNITED STATES; ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA; PHILADELPHIA
 Graubart, Philip: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Grede, Kjell: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Green, Arthur: AESTHETICS; ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; GOD;
HAVURAH MOVEMENT; JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL
 MOVEMENT; JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST; THOUGHT,
 MODERN
 Green, Adolph: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Green, Joseph: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 Green, Shawn: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Greenberg, Clement: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Greenberg, Henry Benjamin "Hank": CELEBRITIES; SPORTS,
 UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Greenberg, Joanne: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Greenberg, Sydney: PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES
 Greenberg, Uri Tzvi: ART, ISRAELI; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW; POETRY,
 YIDDISH
 Greenberg, Yitzhak: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES;
 THOUGHT, MODERN
 Grinberg, Zalman: DISPLACED PERSONS
 Gringauz, Samuel: DISPLACED PERSONS
 Grobelny, Halina and Julian: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Grodzensky, Avraham: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Gropper, William: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; HOLOCAUST
 REPRESENTATION: ART
 Gross, Chaim: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Gross, Michael: ART, ISRAELI
 Grossman, David: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION;
 LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; MUSIC, POPULAR
 Grossman, Vasily: JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Grosz, George: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Grumberg, Jean-Claude: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 DRAMA; THEATER: EUROPE
 Grunberg, Arnon: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Grunfeld, Ernie: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Grünfeld, Nina: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Grunzweig, Emil: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Grynszpan, Herschel: HOLOCAUST; KRISTALLNACHT Guberman, Igor': LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Gucci, Matteo: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO
 EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
 Guimard, Hector: SYNAGOGUES: FRANCE; SYNAGOGUES:
 TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Gumpertz, Aron: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Günzburg, Mordecai Aaron: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Günzburg, Barons Yevzel, Horace, and David: DUBNOW, SIMON; SAINT PETERSBURG; SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF ENLIGHTENMENT AMONG THE JEWS OF RUSSIA (OPE)
 Gunzenhauser, Joseph ben Jacob Ashkenazi and Azriel: PRINTING
 Gur, Batya: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS;
 LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Gurevich, Lev: SAINT PETERSBURG
 Gussow, Bernard: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Guston, Philip: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART,
 AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Gutman, Claude: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Gutman, Nahum: ART, ISRAELI
 Gutfreund, Amir: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
 Guthrie, Tyrone: THEATER: UNITED STATES

Haacke, Hans: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
 *Habakkuk: BEL AND THE DRAGON
 Haber, Fritz: BERLIN
 Habor, J. G.: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
 Hackett, Albert: FRANK, ANNE; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Hackett, Buddy: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Hacohen, Shalom: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Hadassah: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Hadassi, Judah: KARAISM
 Hadrian: BAR KOKHBA; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JEWISH WAR, SECOND; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; SAMARITANS
 Ha'e'frati, Joseph: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Hafez: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
 Haft, Nina: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Hagai, Baruch: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 *Hagar: ABRAHAM; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; GENESIS, BOOK OF; INFERTILITY; ISHMAEL; ISHMAEL: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; SARAH; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS *Haggai: ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; PERSIA, ANCIENT
 *Hai ben Sherira Gaon: GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES; RESPONSA LITERATURE
 Haile Selassie: ETHIOPIA
 Ha'im, Victor: THEATER: EUROPE
 Hakak, Lev: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Hakakian, Roya: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 *Halevi, Judah: AESTHETICS; CHOSENNESS; EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES; IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JUDEO-ARABIC; LOVE; MEDICINE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; SHEKHINAH; SPAIN, MUSLIM; STRAUSS, LEO; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Halevi, Hayim David: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Halevi, Solomon ben Moses Alkabits: PRINTING
 Halevi, Uri Feiwesh: PRINTING
 Halévy, Betzalel Saadi: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 Halévy, Jacques Fromental: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); THEATER: EUROPE
 Halévy, Joseph: ETHIOPIA; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Halévy, Ludovic: THEATER: EUROPE
 Halévy, Shmuel Saadi: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 Halkin, Hillel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS
 Halkin, Simon: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Halle-Wolfssohn, Aaron: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Halpart, Samuel: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Halpern, Israel: COUNCIL OF FOUR LANDS and COUNCIL OF LITHUANIA
 Halprin, Anna: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Hamburger, Cao: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Hamburger, Michael: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Hameiri, Avigdor: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Hammerstein, Oscar I: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Hammerstein, Oscar II: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 *Hammurabi: LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND HEBREW BIBLE Hamon, Moses: OTTOMAN EMPIRE
 Hamor: DINAH
 Hampton, Christopher: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Ḥananiah ben Ḥezekiah, R.: EZEKIEL, BOOK OF Ḥananiah ben Teradion, R.: MARTYRDOM

*Hannah: ETHICS, MEDICAL; INFERTILITY; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Hannah, Mother of Seven Sons: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; ḤANUKKAH, AND WOMEN; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; MARTYRDOM
 Ḥaninah ben Dosa, R.: MEDICINE
 Hansson, Ola: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Hapgood, Hutchins: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Harby, Isaac: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
 Hareven, Shulamit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Harden, Maximilian: THEATER: EUROPE
 Harkavy, Alexander: YIDDISH DICTIONARIES
 Harlap, Mosheh Ya'akov: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Harnack, Adolph von: Gnosticism
 Harnick, Sheldon: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Harris, Louis: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Harris, Ruth: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Harrison, Earl: DISPLACED PERSONS
 Harrison, Lester: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Hart, Lorenz: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Hart, Moss: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Hartman, David: THOUGHT, MODERN
 Haruveni, Ephraim and Nogah: GARDENS
 Ḥasdai ibn Shaprut: DUNASH BEN LABRAT; MEDICINE; SPAIN, MUSLIM
 Haukeland, Jon: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Hayden, Melissa: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Ḥayyim ben Moses ibn Attar: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
 Ḥayyim ha-Kohen: MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
 Ḥayyuj, Judah: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM
 Haza, Ofra: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Hazaz, Haim: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Head, Edith: FASHION
 Heartfield, John: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Hecht, Anthony: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
 Hecht, Ben: FILM: UNITED STATES; JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Hecker, Zvi: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Hegel, Georg: AESTHETICS; FACKENHEIM, EMIL LUDWIG; KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; THOUGHT, MODERN Heijermans, Herman: THEATER: EUROPE
 Heine, Heinrich: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA; SECULARISM
 Heise, Heinz: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Heldman, Gladys: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Heldman, Julie: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
 Helene of Adiabene: WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD
 Helfman, Hesiah: RUSSIA
 Helfman, Max: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Hellen, Elkhonon: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700
 Heller, Max: JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
 Heller, Michael: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Heller, Yom-Tov Lipmann: PRAGUE
 Hellman, Lillian: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Ḥen, Zerachiah: ITALY
 Hendel, Yehudit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Henkin, Joseph: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES

Heraclius: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM

Hermann, Georg: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE

Hermelin, Stephan: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE

Herrnfeld, Anton: THEATER: EUROPE

Herrnfeld, Donat: THEATER: EUROPE

*Herod the Great: ARCHELAUS; ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JOSEPHUS; MASADA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; SAMARIA; TEMPLE, SECOND; ZEALOTS

Herod Antipas: ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY

Herrmann, Max: THEATER: EUROPE

Hershberg, Israel: ART, ISRAELI

Hershman, Marcie: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION

Hershman, Mordechai: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE; MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS

Hertz, Fanny: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

Hertz, Henrik: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; THEATER: EUROPE

Hertz, Robert: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)

Herzberg, Abel: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE

Herzfeld, Jacob: THEATER: EUROPE

*Herzl, Theodor: ART, ISRAELI; DREYFUS AFFAIR; HABSBURG EMPIRE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS, 1878–1948; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; JERUSALEM: 1948–1967; KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC; MUSEUMS; RUSSIA; TEL AVIV; THOUGHT, MODERN; WEIZMANN, CHAIM; ZANGWILL, ISRAEL; ZIONISM; ZIONISM: FRANCE; ZIONISM: UNITED STATES

Herzog, Elizabeth: ANTHROPOLOGY

*Heschel, Abraham Joshua: AESTHETICS; BERKOVITS, ELIEZER; ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; GOD; INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT; REVELATION; RUBENSTEIN, RICHARD L.; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Heschel, Susannah: HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; JUDAISM, FEMINIST; THOUGHT, MODERN

Hess, Amira: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW

Hess, Moses: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; MARX, KARL; SECULARISM; THOUGHT, MODERN

Heusen, Jimmy van: ENTERTAINMENT

Hever, Hanan: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION

Heyen, William: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE

*Hezekiah: ANOINTMENT; ASSYRIA; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; CANAAN, CANAANITES; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JOSHUA, BOOK OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; MAGIC; MEDICINE; ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF

Hickey, Jeremiah: FASHION

Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA

Hilberg, Raul: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA

Hildesheimer, Esriel: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX

*Hillel: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; FOLKTALES; MAGIC; MISHNAH; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; TANNAIM

Hillel II: Rosh Hodesh

Hillel of Verona: ITALY

Hillman, Sidney: UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT

Himmelfarb, Harold: EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: SUPPLEMENTAL SCHOOLS

Hiram of Tyre: PHOENICIA, PHOENICIANS

Hirsch, Emil: CHICAGO; SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL

Hirsch, Baron Maurice de: ARGENTINA; BARON DE HIRSCH FUND; LATIN AMERICA

*Hirsch, Samson Raphael: ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; FRANKFURT AM MAIN; GERMANY; GOD; GRAETZ, HEINRICH; HABSBURG EMPIRE; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES; THOUGHT, MODERN Hirschbein, Peretz: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE; THEATER, YIDDISH

Hirschbiegel, Oliver: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Hirschfeld, Harry: RADIO: UNITED STATES

Hirschfeld, Pearl: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART

Hirszenberg, Samuel: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY
Hsida, R.: AMORAIM

Hitler, Adolph: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; ART, AMERICAN (BEFORE 1940); BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE; FACKENHEIM, EMIL LUDWIG; HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE; LEVINAS, EMMANUEL; NAZI, NAZI PARTY; ROMA; WORLD WAR II: IMPACT ON AMERICAN JEWS

Hivi ha-Balkhi: SAADIA BEN JOSEPH GAON

Hiyya, R.: TANNAIM; TOSEFTA

Hobab: See JETHRO

Hobsbaum, Philip: POETRY: BRITAIN

Hochhuth, Rolf: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA

Höcker, Karl: HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION

Hod, Nir: ART, ISRAELI

Hodes, Stuart and Linda Margolis: DANCE: UNITED STATES

Hofmannsthal, Hugo von: BUBER, MARTIN; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE

Hoffmeier, James: EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL

Hoffmeister, Adolf: HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS

Hofshteyn, Dovid: ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; POETRY, YIDDISH

Hogah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Hoheisel, Horst: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS

Holberg, Ludvig: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA

Holdheim, Samuel: JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY; THOUGHT, MODERN

Holländer, Felix: THEATER: EUROPE

Holland, Agnieszka: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)

Holliday, Judy: FILM: UNITED STATES

Holman, Nat: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Holzer, Rochl: THEATER, YIDDISH

Holzman, William “Red”: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Homburg, Herz: PRAGUE

Honigmann, Barbara: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE

Hophni: SAMUEL, BOOKS OF

Horkheimer, Max: FRANKFURT AM MAIN

Horn, Dara: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)

Horn, Shifra: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010

Horowitz, Beila: PRAGUE

Horowitz, Chaim: BARAITA DE-NIDDAH

Horowitz, Isaiah ben Abraham Ha-Levi: FRANKFURT AM MAIN; KABBALAH, LURIANIC

Horowitz, Sarah Rebecca Rachel Leah: PRAYER: WOMEN’S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

Horthy, Miklós: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; HUNGARY

Horwitz-Walecki, Max: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE

*Hosea: ASSYRIA; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; JEREMIAH, BOOK OF

Hoshaiah, R.: TOSEFTA

Höss, Rudolf: HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST TRIALS

Howe, Irving: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)

Hoz, Dov: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
Hřebejk, Jan: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
Hugh of Lincoln: RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION
Hughes, Langston: THEATER: UNITED STATES
Hughes, Sarah: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
Hughes, Ted: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Huldah: JOSIAH; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Hume, David: BERKOVITS, ELIEZER
Humphrey, Doris: DANCE: UNITED STATES
Huna, R.: AMORAIM; EXILARCH
Hundertwasser, Friedensreich: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
Hurvitz, Yair: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Hurwitz, Haikl: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
Hurwitz, Moyshe: THEATER, YIDDISH
Hurwitz, Sheftl: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
Hussein, King of Jordan: ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1956–1967); ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT (1948–2010)
Hyrceanus II: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
*Ibn Ezra, Abraham: ASTROLOGY; BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM; ELDAD HA-DANI; GERSONIDES; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; ISIAH, BOOK OF; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; KIMḤI FAMILY; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; LOVE; NAḤMANIDES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; SHEKHINAH; SONG OF SONGS, BOOK OF; SPAIN, MUSLIM; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
*Ibn Ezra, Moses: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; SPAIN, MUSLIM
*Ibn Gabirol, Solomon: LOVE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; SPAIN, MUSLIM; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Ibn Naḥmias, David and Samuel: PRINTING; TURKEY
Ibn Tibbon, Jacob ben Makhir: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Ibn Tibbon, Judah: ETHICAL WILLS; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; KIMḤI FAMILY
Ibn Tibbon, Moses: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Ibn Tibbon, Samuel: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
Idelsohn, Abraham Z.: MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Il'f, Ilya: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
Imar, Vivian: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
Immanuel of Rome: ITALY; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Immendorff, Jörg: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
Imrani: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
Ingber, Judith Brin: DANCE: UNITED STATES
Iranaeus: GNOTICISM
Irving, David: HOLOCAUST DENIAL; HOLOCAUST TRIALS
*Isaac: ABRAHAM; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EDM; ESAU; GENESIS, BOOK OF; GOD; HAGAR; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATIONS: ART; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; ISHMAEL; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; JACOB; LOVE; MARTYRDOM; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; REBEKAH
Isaac bar Sheshet (Ribash): RESPONSA LITERATURE
Isaac ben Abba Mari: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Isaac ben Abraham: KABBALAH; KARAISM
Isaac ben Asher: TOSAFISTS
Isaac ben Eliakim: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700
Isaac ben Jedaiah: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES

Isaac ben Moses of Vienna (Riaz): MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG; MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ; PRAGUE; TOSAFISTS
Isaac ben Samuel: TOSAFISTS
Isaac ben Solomon Israeli: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Isaac ha-Cohen: SAMAEL
Isaac ha-Gorni: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Isaac ha-Levi: RASHI
Isaac ha-Seniri: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Isaac ibn Barun: GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS
Isaac ibn Sahula: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Isaac of Acre: DEVEKUT
Isaac of Corbeil: MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
Isaac of Dampierre (Ri): MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
*Isaac the Blind: ABRAHAM BEN DAVID OF POSQUIÈRES; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; SEFIROT
Isaac, Aaron: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
Isaacs, Jorge: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
Isaacson, Michael: MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Isaak, Levi: DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ
*Isaiah: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; MICAH, BOOK OF; THEOLOGY
Isaiah di Trani: TOSAFISTS
Iscovescu, Barbu: ROMANIA
*Ishmael: ABRAHAM; ARABIA; CIRCUMCISION; HAGAR; ISHMAEL: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JACOB; SARAH Ishmael, R.: MARTYRDOM; MEDICINE; METATRON; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS; TANNAIM; WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM
Isidor, Lazare: FRANCE: 1789–1939
Israel: See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, STATE OF Israel: See JACOB
Israel of Kozienice: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
Israel ben Eliezer: See BAAL SHEM TOV
Israel of Ruzhin: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
Israel of Shklov: VILNA GAON
Israel Loebel of Sluck: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
Israëls, Josef: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY
Issachar: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
*Isserles, Moses (Rema): EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; HALAKHAH; SHULḤAN ARUKH; TEFILLIN; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Iushchinskii, Andrei: BEILIS TRIAL
Izban, Samuel: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV
Jabin: DEBORAH
Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev): BEN-GURION, DAVID; ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; RUSSIA; ZIONISM
Jackson, Henry: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
Jackson, Robert H.: HOLOCAUST TRIALS
*Jacob: ABRAHAM; ANTISEMITISM; BALAAM; BETH EL; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; DIETARY LAWS; DINAH; ESAU; GENESIS, BOOK OF; GOD; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JOSEPH; LEAH; LOVE; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; RACHEL; REBEKAH; REDEMPTION; SHECHEM; TAMAR; TRIBES, TWELVE
Jacob al-Kirkisani: KARAISM; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Jacob Anatoli: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
*Jacob ben Asher: ASHER BEN JEḤIEL; HALAKHAH; ISSERLES, MOSES; JUDAH BEN ASHER; PRINTING

Jacob ben Elazar: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN;
POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE

Jacob ben Jakar: RASHI

Jacob ben Meir Tam (Rabbeinu Tam): MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ; MARTYRDOM; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; RASHI; RESPONSA LITERATURE; TEFILLIN; TOSAFISTS

Jacob ben Nethanel ha-Cohen: PILGRIMAGE

Jacob ben Reuben: MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS

Jacob ben Solomon: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE

Jacob Isaac of Lublin: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE

Jacob Isaac of Przysucha: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE

Jacob of London: ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE

Jacob, Max: LITERATURE: FRANCE

Jacobi, Lotte: PHOTOGRAPHY

Jacobs, Joseph: ZANGWILL, ISRAEL

Jacobs, Monty: THEATER: EUROPE

Jacobsohn, Siegfried: THEATER: EUROPE

Jacobson, Gershon: JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA

Jacobson, Howard: LITERATURE: BRITAIN

Jacobson, Israel: JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY

Jacobson, Simon: SCHNEERSON, MENACHEM MENDEL

Jacoby, Alfred: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY

Jael: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; DEBORAH; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JUDGES, BOOK OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Jaffe, Kalonymos ben Mordecai: PRINTING

Jaffe, Moshe: HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE

Jaffe, Norman: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY

Jais, Alan: FILM: LATIN AMERICA

Jakobovits, Tobias: PRAGUE

Jakubowska, Wanda: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

James: APOCRYPHA; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM

Jankev ben Isaac Ashkenazi: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

Janowski, Max: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS

Janowsky, Oscar: UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTER MOVEMENT

Japheth ben Eli ha-Levi: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; KARAISM; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL

Jaroslow, Risa: DANCE: UNITED STATES

Jason of Cyrene: APOCRYPHA; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF

Jefferson, Thomas: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS

Jedaiah Bedersi ha-Penini: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL

Jefet ben Eli: KARAISM

Jehiel ben Jekutiel: TALMUD, JERUSALEM

Jehiel ben Joseph of Paris: MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; TOSAFISTS

Jehiel of Pisa: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN

Jehoahaz: JOSIAH

Jehoiachin: BABYLONIAN EXILE; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF

Jehoram: EDOM

Jehoshaphat: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; ELISHA

Jehosheba: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Jehu: ASSYRIA; ELISHA; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; KINGS, BOOKS OF

Jenkins, Margaret: DANCE: UNITED STATES

Jephthah: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; JUDGES, BOOK OF; LITERATURE, LADINO

Jellinek, Adolf: HABSBURG EMPIRE

Jellinek, Hermann: HABSBURG EMPIRE

*Jeremiah: APOCRYPHA; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM; CANAAN, CANAANITES; HABAKKUK, BOOK OF; HOSEA, BOOK OF; LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF; MICAH, BOOK OF; REDEMPTION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; THEOLOGY

Jeremiah, R.: AMORAIM

*Jeroboam: BETH EL; CANAAN, CANAANITES; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; REHOBAM; SHECHEM; SHILOH; UNITED MONARCHY; WORSHIP

Jerome: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; SEPTUAGINT

Jesenská, Milena: KAFKA, FRANZ

Jeshua ben Judah: KARAISM

Jesse: DAVID

Jessel, George: ENTERTAINMENT; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS

Jessner, Leopold: THEATER: EUROPE

Jesurum, Stefano: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE

Jesus: APOCRYPHA; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM; GnosticISM; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; MESSIANISM entries; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; MOSES; NEW TESTAMENT; PASSOVER; PHARISEES; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; SADDUCEES; SAMARITANS; SHABBETAÏ ZEVI; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

*Jethro: EXODUS, BOOK OF; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; MOSES

Jezebel: AHAB; ELIJAH: BIBLICAL AND POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; OBADIAH, BOOK OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Jhabvala, Ruth Prawer: LITERATURE: BRITAIN

Jian, Sylvie: SPORTS: ISRAEL

Joab: BATHSHEBA; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE

*Job: AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE; EVIL AND SUFFERING; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; JEREMIAH, BOOK OF; JETHRO; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA

*Joel: PROPHETS

Joel Baal Shem of Zamoscs: BAAL SHEM

Joel, Richard: HILLEL: FOUNDATIONS; YESHIVA UNIVERSITY

Johanan, R.: COURTS; MISHNAH; TOSEFTA

Johanan bar Napaḥa, R.: AMORAIM

Johanan ben Zakkai: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; COURTS; JUDAISM; TANNAÏM; WORSHIP

John the Baptist: HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY

John Hyrcanus: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF; PHARISEES; SADDUCEES; SAMARITANS

John of Gischala: ZEALOTS

Johnson, Lyndon B.: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS

Jolson, Al: CANTORS, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; CELEBRITIES; FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS

*Jonah: BALAAM; COMEDY AND COMEDIANS

*Jonah ben Abraham Gerondi: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; TOSAFISTS

Jonah ibn Janah: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM

Jonas, Hans: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES

*Jonas, Regina: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN

Jonathan: DAVID; LOVE; SAUL

Jonathan ha-Kohen: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES

- Jones, Bill: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Jose ben Bun, R.: GARDENS
 Jose ben Ḥalafta, R.: TANNAIM
 Jose ben Jose: PRAYER BOOKS
 Josel of Rosheim: GERMANY
 *Joseph: ABRAHAM; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; FOLKTALES; EXODUS, BOOK OF; GENESIS, BOOK OF; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; LITERATURE, LADINO; LOVE; LUZZATTO, MOSES ḤAYYIM; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA; PTOLEMIES; RACHEL; SHECHEM; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Joseph (son of Tobiah): TOBIADS
 Joseph II: EMANCIPATION; HABSBURG EMPIRE; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Joseph al-Basir: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
 Joseph bar Samuel Tov Elem: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Joseph bar Solomon: MARTYRDOM
 Joseph ben Isaac Bekhor Shor: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; TOSAFISTS
 Joseph ben Meir ibn Migash: RESPONSA LITERATURE
 Joseph ben Simon Kara: FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES
 Joseph ben Tanḥum Yerushalmi: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD
 Joseph ben Uziel: KABBALAH; TARGUM
 Joseph ha-Kohen: ITALY
 Joseph ha-Nagid: SAMUEL IBN NAGHRELA HA-NAGID
 Joseph ibn Kaspi: ETHICAL WILLS; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; GERSONIDES
 Joseph ibn Tabul: LURIA, ISAAC
 Joseph ibn Zabara: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Joseph, Jacob: KABBALAH
 Joseph, Jenny: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Josephson, Erland: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 *Josephus, Flavius: ALEXANDER THE GREAT; ALEXANDRIA, ANCIENT; ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS; BIBLE; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; EPIKOROS; ESSENES; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JEWISH WAR, FIRST; JOSIPPON, BOOK OF; LITERATURE, SCANDINAVIA; MARTYRDOM; MASADA; MENORAH; PHARISEES; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; QUMRAN; RESURRECTION; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; SAMARITANS; SANHEDRIN; TANNAIM; TRIBES, TEN LOST; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; ZEALOTS
 *Joshua: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; HAZOR; HEBRON; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JERICHO; JUDGES, BOOK OF; LACHISH; MOSES; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA; RABBINIC ORDINATION; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Joshua ben Ḥananiah, R.: AVOT; BLESSINGS: BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS; TANNAIM
 Joshua ben Levi, R.: AMORAIM
 *Josiah: BETH EL; BIBLE: DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JOSHUA, BOOK OF; MOSES; ZEPHANIAH
 Joyce, James: LITERATURE: CANADA; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Jubal: BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE
 Judah: CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; LEAH; MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; PROSTITUTES AND PROSTITUTION: HEBREW BIBLE THROUGH MIDDLE AGES; TAMAR (GENESIS 38); TRIBES, TWELVE
 Judah, R.: AMORAIM; PUMBEDITA; TALMUD, BABYLONIAN
 Judah al-Ḥarizi: IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM; LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD
 *Judah ben Asher: ASHER BEN JEḤIEL; JACOB BEN ASHER Judah ben Baba, R.: MARTYRDOM
 Judah ben Isaac: TOSAFISTS
 Judah ben Jacob: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Judah ben Kuraish: GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS
 Judah ben Nathan: RASHI
 Judah ben Samuel: NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA)
 Judah ben Solomon ha-Kohen: SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Judah ben Tabbai: RESPONSA LITERATURE
 *Judah ha-Nasi (the Patriarch): HALAKHAH; MISHNAH; PATRIARCH; RABBINIC LITERATURE: MISHNAH AND TALMUDS; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; TANNAIM
 Judah ibn Mosconi: BYZANTINE EMPIRE
 Judah ibn Shabbetai: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Judah Romano: ITALY
 Judah the Pious: BAAL SHEM; FOLKTALES; GOLEM; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA); PILGRIMAGE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
 *Judith: APOCRYPHA; ḤANUKKAH AND WOMEN; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD
 Jusid, Juan José: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Justin, Eva: ROMA
 Justin Martyr: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM; Gnosticism
 Justinian I: BYZANTINE EMPIRE
 Kadar, Jan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Kadishman, Menashe: ART, ISRAELI
 *Kafka, Franz: HABSBURG EMPIRE; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; THEATER: BRITAIN
 Kahana-Carmon, Amalia: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Kahane, Arthur: THEATER: EUROPE
 Kahanoff, Jacqueline: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
 Kahn, Annette: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Kahn, Madeline: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Kahn, Florence Prag: SAN FRANCISCO; UNITED STATES, WESTERN Kahn, Julius: SAN FRANCISCO
 Kahn, Sharon: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Kahn, Tobi: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Kahn, Zadoc: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY); JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE
 Kaledin, Sergei: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Kalganov, Michael: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Kalish, Isaac: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE
 Kalisky, René: THEATER: EUROPE
 Kalonymus Family: KABBALAH; MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
 Kalonymus ben Kalonymus: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
 Kaminer, Isaac: HASKALAH
 Kaminer, Vladimir: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Kaminska, Ida: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Kaminsky, Stuart: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Kanafani, Ghassan: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE
 Kanar, Tsvi: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Kandinsky, Wassily: ART: ISRAEL
 Kane, Klondike (Harry Cohen): SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Kaniuk, Yoram: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION

- Kant, Immanuel: AESTHETICS; AUTONOMY AND HETERONOMY;
BUBER, MARTIN; COHEN, HERMANN; GOD; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; MAIMON, SALOMON; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Kantor, Tadeusz: THEATER: EUROPE
- Kanovich, Grigory: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
- Kaplan, Aryeh: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Kaplan, Chaim: HOLOCAUST DIARIES
- *Kaplan, Mordecai M.: BAT MITZVAH; BERKOVITS, ELIEZER;
CUSTOM (MINHAG); GOD; INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS;
JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; JUDAISM,
RECONSTRUCTIONIST; MENORAH ASSOCIATION;
THOUGHT, MODERN; UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTER MOVEMENT
- Kaplan, Rose: NURSING: UNITED STATES
- Kaplowitz, Ralph: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Kara, Avigdor: PRAGUE
- Kara, Joseph: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; RASHI
- Karavan, Avraham: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Kardiner, Abram: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Kardon, Dennis: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Karmel, Ilona: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Karmel-Wolfe, Henia: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Karni, Yehuda: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- *Karo, Joseph: BULGARIA; CORDOVERO, MOSES; HALAKHAH;
ISSERLES, MOSES; LITERATURE, LADINO; OTTOMAN EMPIRE; RABBINIC ORDINATION; SAFED; SHULHAN ARUKH; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; TURKEY
- Kashmann, Truda: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Kashua, Sayed: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE
- Kass, Deborah: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PLATE 20
- Kassovitz, Peter: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Kastner, Israel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
- Kastner, Rudolf: HASIDISM: EUROPE
- Katchor, Ben: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
POPULAR FICTION
- Katin, Miriam: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
- Kattan, Naim: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Katz, Alex: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Katz, Reuven: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Katz, Shmulik: ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT
- Katz, Jacob: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Katzenellenbogen, Phineas: FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Katzir, Yehudit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
1882–2010
- Katznelson, Berl: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Katzenelson, Itzhak: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Kaufman, George S.: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER,
UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Kaufman, Irving: ENTERTAINMENT
- Kaufman, Judah: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
- Kaufman, Moisés: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Kaufman, Shirley: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
- Kaufmann, Isidor: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY;
PLATE 12
- Kaufmann, Ezekiel: THOUGHT, MODERN
- Kaye, Danny: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Kaye, Nora: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Kayserling, Meyer: COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER
- Kazakov, Yaakov: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
- Kazan, Elia: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Kazen, Yosef: INTERNET
- Kazin, Alfred: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Keleti, Agnes: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Kellerman, Faye: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Kellner, Tatana: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Kemelman, Harry: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Kenan, Amos: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Kenaz, Yehoshua: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Kennedy, John F.: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
- Keret, Etgar: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Kern, Jerome: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Kerr, Alfred: THEATER: EUROPE
- Kertész, Imre: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE:
CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Keshet, Yehudit Kirstein: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Kesselman, Wendy: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Kessler, Daniel: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Kest, Itamar Ya'oz: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Kesten, Hilde: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Keturah: ABRAHAM; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; GENESIS, BOOK OF
- Keyser, Ephraim: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Kharik, Izi: POETRY, YIDDISH
- Kholmyansky, Alexander: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
- Khuli, Jacob: LITERATURE, LADINO
- Kiefer, Anselm: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Kierkegaard, Søren: HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA;
LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.
- Kift, Roy: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Kimchi, Alona: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- *Kimḥi, David: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; KIMḤI FAMILY; PRINTING
- *Kimḥi, Joseph: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; KIMḤI
FAMILY; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS
- *Kimḥi, Moses: KIMḤI FAMILY
- King, Alan: FILM: UNITED STATES
- King, Dolly: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- King, Martin Luther, Jr.: HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
- King, Phil: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- King, Ruchama: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Kingsley, Sidney: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, Barbara: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Kirstein, Lincoln: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Kishon, Ephraim: FILM: ISRAEL
- Kissinger, Henry: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
- Kister, Menahem: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN
- Kitaj, R. B.: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST
REPRESENTATION: ART
- Klasmer, Gabi: ART, ISRAELI
- Klatzkin, Jakob: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
- Klausner, Joseph: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
- Klee, Paul: ART: ISRAEL; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Klein, A. M.: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE: CANADA
- Klein, Georg: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Klein, William: PHOTOGRAPHY
- Kleinstein, Rami: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Klemperer, Victor: BERLIN; HOLOCAUST DIARIES
- Klepfisz, Irena: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE:
WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA);
LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY;
POETRY: UNITED STATES

Klepper, Jeffrey: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Klimt, Gustav: HOLOCAUST REPARATIONS AND RESTITUTION;
 HOLOCAUST TRIALS
 Kline, Herbert: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Klionsky, Marc: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Klopstock, Frederick: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Knoblauch, Dieter: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Kobrin, Leon: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Kohler, Kaufmann: CHICAGO; CHOSENNESS; THOUGHT,
 MODERN
 Kohnner, Hanna Bloch: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 TELEVISION
 Kohut, Alexander: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
 Koidonover, Aaron Samuel ben Israel (Maharshak): FRANKFURT AM MAIN
 Koidonover, Zvi Hirsch: FRANKFURT AM MAIN
 Kolben, Amir: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Kollek, Teddy: JERUSALEM: SINCE 1967
 Kolton, Batia: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION
 Kompert, Leopold: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Koner, Pauline: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 *Kook, Abraham Isaac ha-Kohen: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX; MODERN ORTHODOX; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Kook, Tsevi Yehudah: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES;
 KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES
 Kopman, Benjamin: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Kops, Bernard: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN
 Korah: INCENSE
 Korczak, Janusz: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Korn, Rachel: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Kornfeld, Paul: THEATER: EUROPE
 Kortner, Fritz: THEATER: EUROPE
 Kosinski, Jerzy: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Koskas, Marcos: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Koster, Serge: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Kotik, Yekhezkel: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
 Koufax, Sandy: CELEBRITIES; SPORTS, UNITED STATES:
 BASEBALL
 Koussevitzky, Moshe: CANTOR, CANTORATE: CONTEMPORARY Kovner, Abba: HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW; VILNA
 Kovner, Avraham Uri: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW:
HASKALAH
 Kozer, José: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Kracauer, Siegfried: BENJAMIN, WALTER
 Kramer, Lotte: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Kramer, Stanley: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Kranz, Jacob: SERMONS
 Krása, Hans: HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS
 Krasner, Lee: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PLATE 17
 Kraus, Gertrud: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Kraus, Karl: HABSBERG EMPIRE; THEATER: EUROPE
 Kreisel, Henry: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Kreitman, Esther Singer: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING:
 YIDDISH
 Krich, Rochelle: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 *Krochmal, Nachman: GALICIA; HABSBERG EMPIRE;
HASKALAH; LEVINSOHN, ISAAC BAER; LITERATURE,
 HEBREW: HASKALAH; THOUGHT, MODERN; ZUNZ, LEOPOLD
 Kruk, Herman: HOLOCAUST DIARIES
 Kruger, Barbara: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940

Kubert, Joe: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION
 Kufeld, Jack (Yankel): ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Kulbak, Moyshe: POETRY, YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH Kumin, Maxine: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Kun, Béla: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Kunitz, Stanley: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Kupferman, Moshe: ART, ISRAELI
 Kuranda, Ignaz: HABSBERG EMPIRE
 Kurtzer, Sophie: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Kurtzman, Harvey: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Kushner, Lawrence: GOD; JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL
 MOVEMENT
 Kushner, Tony: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Kutner, Itzhak: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
 Kuznetsov, Edward: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT,
 1967–1989
 Kvitko, Leyb: JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; POETRY,
 YIDDISH
 Kwartin, Zavel: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Laban: ARAMAIC; BIBLE: LANGUAGES; JACOB; LEAH; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; RACHEL
 Laban, Rudolph von: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Laemmle, Carl: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Lagnado, Lucette: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Lambeau, Earl “Curly”: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Lambert, L. M.: ZIONISM: FRANCE
 Lamdan, Isaac: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Lamm, Norman: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX;
 YESHIVA UNIVERSITY
 Lampe, Alfred: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Land, Ronit: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Landau, Ezekiel: HABSBERG EMPIRE; PRAGUE
 Landau, Jacob: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Landauer, Fritz: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Landauer, Gustav: BUBER, MARTIN
 Landman, Isaac: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
 Landoy, Zisha: POETRY, YIDDISH
 Landy, Rae: NURSING: UNITED STATES
 Lang, Berel: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Lang, Pearl: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Lange, Friedrich Albert: COHEN, HERMANN
 Langer, Lawrence: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY;
 HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Langfus, Anna: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Lann, Staffan: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Lanzmann, Claude: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Laor, Isaac: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Lapid, Shulamit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
 1882–2010
 Lappin, Elena: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Lapson, Dvora: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 L’Arrogne, Adolph: THEATER: EUROPE
 Larrson, Zenia: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 *Lasker-Schüler, Else: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE;
 THEATER: EUROPE
 Lasky, Jesse: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Lateiner, Joseph: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Latte, Haim: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
 Lavater, Caspar: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Lavrov, Piotr: AHAD HA-AM

- Lawson, John Howard: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Layton, Irving: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Lazare, Bernard: DREYFUS AFFAIR; FRANCE: 1789–1939; LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Lazar, Moshe: LITERATURE, LADINO
- Lazarov, Lydia: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Lazarus, Emma: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Lazarus, Jacob Hart: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Lazarus, Moritz: COHEN, HERMANN
- Lazewnik, Libby: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- *Leah: DINAH; ETHICS, SEXUAL; INFERTILITY; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; RACHEL; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Lebensohn, Adam Hacohen: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Lebensohn, Michah Yosef: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- *Leeser, Isaac: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE); PHILADELPHIA
- Lefin, Mendel: HASIDISM: EUROPE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Leftwich, Joseph: POETRY: BRITISH
- Lehman, Ernest: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Lehmann, Marcus: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Leibowitz, Isaiah: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
- Leibowitz, Yeshayahu: EVIL AND SUFFERING; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Leigh, Mike: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN
- Leighton, Cristian: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Lein, Yevgeny: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
- Leivick, H.: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Lejtes, Josef: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Lelouch, Claude: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Lemel, Yosef: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Lemkin, Raphael: HUMAN RIGHTS
- Lemlein, Asher of Ruetlingen: MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN
- Lempel, Blume: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Lenin, Vladimir: EHRENBURG, ILYA; SOVIET UNION; TROTSKY, LEON
- Lensky, Haim: SAINT PETERSBURG
- Lerner, Alan Jay: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Lerner, Michael: JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT
- Lerner, Yoysef-Yude: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Leshem, Ron: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Lesin, Ya'akov: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Lessing, Gotthold: AESTHETICS; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
- Letteris, Meir Halevi: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Levanda, Lev: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Levertin, Oscar: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Levi: CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; DINAH; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; MOSES; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; TRIBES, TWELVE; WORSHIP
- Levi ben Abraham ben Ḥayyim: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
- *Levi ben Gerson: See Gersonides
- Levi Isaac of Żelechów: HASIDISM: EUROPE
- Lévi, Israël: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY); JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE
- *Levi, Primo: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Lévi, Sylvain: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY); ZIONISM: FRANCE
- Levi, Tikva: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Levi-Agron, Hassia: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Lévi-Strauss, Claude: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Levin, Dania: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Levin, Hanoch: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Levin, Meyer: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Levin, Mona: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Levin, Robert: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- *Levinas, Emmanuel: DREYFUS AFFAIR; ETHICS, RABBINIC; GOD; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; JUDAISM; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; THOUGHT, MODERN; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
- Levine, Jack: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Levine, Jonathan D.: PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES
- Levine, Judah Leib: HASKALAH
- Levine, Norman: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Levine, Myra: NURSING: UNITED STATES
- *Levinsohn, Isaac Baer: HASKALAH; RUSSIA; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Levinthal, Helen: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
- Levinthal, Bernard: PHILADELPHIA
- Levita, Elijah Bokher: CHRISTAIN HEBRAISM; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Levy, Amy: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); POETRY: BRITAIN
- Lévy, Clara: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Levy, Clifton Harby: JEWISH SCIENCE
- Levy, Dani: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
- Levy, Isaac: PHILADELPHIA
- Levy, Marv: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Lévy, Michel and Calmann: FRANCE: 1789–1939
- Levy, Nathan: PHILADELPHIA
- Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien: ANTHROPOLOGY; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
- Lewald, Fanny: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Lewandowski, Louis: CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS; MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE
- Lewis, Jerry: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Lewisohn, Alice: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Lewisohn, Irene: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Lewisohn, Ludwig: LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- Lewitsky, Bella: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- LeWitt, Sol: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Leyb, Mani: POETRY, YIDDISH
- Leyb-Halpern, Moyshe: POETRY: UNITED STATES; POETRY, YIDDISH
- Leyeles, A.: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY, YIDDISH
- Leyvik, H.: POETRY, YIDDISH
- Liberman, Aaron: HASKALAH
- Libeskind, Daniel: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Libicki, Miriam: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
- Libin, Zalmen: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Lichtenberg, Bernhard: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Lichtenstein, Bernard: FASHION
- Lichtenstein, Morris: JEWISH SCIENCE
- Lichtenstein, Rachel: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Lichtenstein, Roy: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Lichtenstein, Tehilla: JEWISH SCIENCE
- Lieb, Charles: JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST

Lieben, Salomon Hugo: PRAGUE
 Lieberman, Edith and Harold: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Lieberman, Joseph: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Lieberman, Saul: JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES; TOSEFTA
 Liebermann, Max: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; BERLIN; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Liebmann, Esther Schulhoff Aaron: COURT JEWS; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Liebmann, Jost (Judah Berlin): COURT JEWS; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Liebowitz, Annie: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Leibovitz, Karen: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Liebrecht, Savyon: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
 Liepmann, Heinz: THEATER: EUROPE
 Lifshits, Y. M.: YIDDISH DICTIONARIES
 Likht, Mikhl: POETRY: UNITED STATES; POETRY, YIDDISH
 Lilien, Ephraim Moses: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ISRAEL; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; PLATE 21
 Lilienblum, Moses Leib: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; THOUGHT, MODERN
 *Lilienthal, Max
 *Lilith: ALPHABET BEN SIRA; SAMAEL; SEFIROT; SHEKHINAH
 Limberg, Joanne: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Lin, Hilla Lu-Lu: ART, ISRAELI
 Lincoln, Abraham: ART, AMERICAN: TO 1940; UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR; UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Lind, Jacob: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Lindheim, Irma Levy: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
 Lion, Eugene: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Lipchitz, Jacques: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; PLATE 15
 Lipkin, Semyon: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Lippmann, Walter: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Lipschits, Oded: ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD
 Lipstadt, Deborah: HOLOCAUST DENIAL; HOLOCAUST TRIALS
 Lipton, Julius: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Lipton, Seymour: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Lispector, Clarice: FILM: LATIN AMERICA; LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Liss, David: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Lissitzky, El: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS; RUSSIA; PLATE 13
 Littauer, Lucius: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Littauer, Nathan: FASHION
 Littell, Jonathan: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Litvinoff, Emanuel: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Litwack, Harry: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Livneh, Yitzhak: ART, ISRAELI
 Llosa, Mario Vargas: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Loeb, Isidore: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Loesser, Frank: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 *Loew, Judah ben Bezael (Maharal): EDUCATION OF BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; GOLEM; HABSBURG EMPIRE; PRAGUE; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Loew, Marcus: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Loewe, Frederick: THEATER: UNITED STATES

Loewenberg, Nathaniel: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 London, Meyer: UNITED STATES: LABOR MOVEMENT; UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Londres, Albert: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Longhena, Baldassare: SYNAGOGUES, EUROPE: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
 Lopez, Aaron: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS
 Losey, Joseph: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Lot: ABRAHAM; AMMON; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; GENESIS, BOOK OF; MOAB
 Louis, Morris: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Low, Seth: UNITED STATES: HIGHER EDUCATION
 Lowth, Robert: BIBLE: POETRY
 Loy, Mina: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Lozowick, Louis: ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS
 Lubin, Arieh: ART, ISRAELI
 Lubin, Sigmund: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Lubitsch, Ernst: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Luckman, Sid: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Ludwig, Jack: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Lukács, Georg: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Luke: SAMARITANS
 Lumbroso, Joseph: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Lumet, Sidney: FILM: UNITED STATES; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Lunel, Armand: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 *Luria, Isaac: BREAKING OF THE VESSELS; CORDOVERO, MOSES; DYBBUK; FOLKTALES; HASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; SAFED; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA); THEOLOGY; TURKEY; TZIMTZUM; WORSHIP
 Luria, Solomon: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Lusitanus, Amatus: MEDICINE
 Lustig, Arnošt: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Luther, Martin: CONVERSION: EARLY MODERN PERIOD; GERMANY; PRINTING; REFORMATION
 Lutski, Simḥah Isaac: KARAISM
 Lutz, Carl and Gertrud: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Luxemburg, Rosa: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 *Luzzatto, Moses Ḥayyim: KABBALAH; MUSAR MOVEMENT
 *Luzzatto, Samuel David: HASKALAH; ISAIAH, BOOK OF; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Luzzatto, Simone: ITALY
 Lyell, Charles: BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP
 Lynn, Henry: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE
 Lysimachus: SELEUCIDS
 Maacah: TAMAR (2 SAMUEL); WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE
 *Maccabee, Eleazer, John, Jonathan, Simon: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF *Maccabee, Judah: ḤANUKKAH; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE
 Machir: TRIBES, TWELVE
 Madsen, Kenneth: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Madison, James: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 *Magnes, Judah L.: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; BUBER, MARTIN; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Magnin, Edgar: UNITED STATES, WESTERN Mahlah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Mahler, Gustav: HABSBURG EMPIRE; VIENNA
 Mahr, Eric: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 *Maimon, Salomon: CRESCAS, ḤASDAI BEN ABRAHAM; DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ; FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW

- *Maimonides, Moses: ABORTION; ABRAHAM BEN DAVID OF POSQUIÈRES; ABULAFIA, ABRAHAM; ASTROLOGY; BARAITA DE-NIDDAH; CHOSENNESS; DINA DEMALKHUTA DINA; ECOLOGY; EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES; EVIL AND SUFFERING; FOLKTALES; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; GERSONIDES; HASKALAH; HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JONAH BEN ABRAHAM GERONDI; JUDEO-ARABIC; KABBALAH; KARO, JOSEPH; KIMḤI FAMILY; KOOK, RABBI ABRAHAM ISAAC; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; LOVE; MARTYRDOM; MEDICINE; MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ; MISHNEH TORAH; MOSES DE LEON; MYSTICISM: ANCIENT; NAḤMANIDES; NORTH AFRICA; PHILANTHROPY; PRINTING; REASON; REDEMPTION; RESPONSA LITERATURE; REVELATION; SAADIA BEN JOSEPH GAON; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; SHEKHINAH; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; SPAIN, MUSLIM; SPINOZA, BARUCH; STRAUSS, LEO; TEFILLIN; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL; TOSEFTA; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES; YEMEN
- Malamud, Bernard: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- Malevich, Kasimir: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Malina, Judith: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Malle, Louis: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Mamet, David: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Manasseh: CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; JOSEPH; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; SAMARIA; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
- Manasseh, King of Judah: GARDENS; HABAKKUK, BOOK OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP
- Manasseh of Rome: PRINTING
- Mandel, Arnold: LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Mandel, Eli: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Mande'lstam, Osip: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); RUSSIA
- Manessier, Alfred: ART, ISRAELI
- Manger, Itzik: POETRY, YIDDISH
- Manin, Daniele: VENICE
- Mankowitz, Wolf: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Mann, Emily: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Mann, Theodore R.: ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS
- Mannheimer, Isaac Noah: HABSBURG EMPIRE
- Mannings, Muriel: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Manoach, Hillel: ROMANIA
- Manoah of Narbonne: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
- Manor, Ehud: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Mansdorf, Amos: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Maor, Haim: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Mapu, Abraham: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; THOUGHT, MODERN; RUSSIA
- Marber, Patrick: THEATER: BRITAIN
- Marcena, Rabbani: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL
- Marconi, Guglielmo: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
- Marconi, Leandro: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Marcuse, Herbert: FRANKFURT AM MAIN
- Margaritha, Anthonius: CONVERSION: EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Margolin, Anna: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY, YIDDISH
- Margolin, Eliezer: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
- Margolin, Yaron: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Margolis, Max: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Margulies, Donald: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Mariamne: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
- Markbreit, Jerry: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
- Markel-Mosessohn, Miriam: HASKALAH; WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE
- Markish, Peretz: JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); POETRY, YIDDISH
- Markish, Simon: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Markman, Hillel: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Marks, Victoria: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Marr, Wilhelm: ANTISEMITISM
- Marshall, Barak: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Marshall, Hezekiah: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Marshall, Jack: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
- *Marshall, Louis
- Martini, Raymond: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM
- Marx, Alexander: JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE
- Marx, Chico, Groucho and Harpo: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; FILM: UNITED STATES; RADIO: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES
- *Marx, Karl: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE; LITERATURE, CENTRAL EUROPE; SECULARISM
- Maryan, Maryan S.: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Mash'allah: ASTROLOGY; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
- Maslow, Sophie: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Mason, Jackie: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; FILM: UNITED STATES
- Mason, Frances: TRIBES, TEN LOST
- Massary, Fritzi: THEATER: EUROPE
- Matalon, Ronit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Match, Pinky: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Mauss, Marcel: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Mauthner, Fritz: BUBER, MARTIN
- Maw, Nicholas: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- May, Elaine: ENTERTAINMENT
- Mayakovsky, Vladimir: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
- Maybaum, Ignaz: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Mayer, Edward: FASHION
- Mayer, Erskin: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Mayer, Gerda: POETRY: BRITAIN
- Mayer, Louis B.: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Mayer, Nathan: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Mayne, Seymour: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Mazursky, Paul: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Mead, Margaret: ANTHROPOLOGY
- Mechanicus, Philip: HOLOCAUST DIARIES
- Medici, Cosimo: ABRAVANEL FAMILY
- Meehan, Thomas: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Meerapfel, Jeanine: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Megged, Aharon: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948

Meidner, Ludwig: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY;
HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
Meilhac, Henri: THEATER: EUROPE
Meinecke, Friedrich: ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
Meir, R.: BERURIAH; MISHNAH; TANNAIM
Meir ben Samuel: TOSAFISTS
Meir of Norbonne: MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS
Meir of Opatów/Stopnica: HASIDISM: EUROPE
*Meir ben Barukh of Rothenburg (Maharam): ADULTERY; DIVORCE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; ELDAD HA-DANI;
MARTYRDOM; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE;
RESPONSA LITERATURE; TOSAFISTS; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
Meir ben Elias: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Meir ben Simon: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
*Meir, Golda: BEN-GURION, DAVID; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE;
MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; RABIN, YITZHAK
Meir of Norwich: ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES
Meisel, Nachman: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
Melammed, Siman Tov: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
Melchizedek: JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; RESURRECTION
Melguerri, Solomon: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Melikhov, Alexandr: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
Melito of Sardis: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM
Melitzer, Samuel: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
Memmi, Albert: LITERATURE: FRANCE; MEMOIR AND LIFE
WRITING: MIZRAHI
Menahem: ASSYRIA; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP
Menahem ben (ibn) Saruk: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; DUNASH BEN LABRAT; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS
Menahem Ha-Meiri: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Menachem Mendel of Kotzk: HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA
Menachem Mendel of Vitebsk: HASIDISM: EUROPE; ZALMAN,
SCHNEUR BEN BARUCH
Menasse, Robert: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE:
CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
*Menasseh ben Israel: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM; MENDELSSOHN, MOSES;
MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; PRINTING; REFORMATION
Mendele Mokher Seform (Sholem Jacob Abramovich): HEBREW:
MODERN REVIVAL; LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE,
HEBREW: HASKALAH; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION;
LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY;
MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; RUSSIA; SHTETL;
THEATER, YIDDISH
Mendelsohn, Eric: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
Mendelssohn, Abraham, Chaim, Joseph, Mendel, Nathan, Recha, Sisa, Yente: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
Mendelssohn, Dorothea (Brendel): See SCHLEGEL, DOROTHEA VEIT VON
*Mendelssohn, Moses: AESTHETICS; BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; FRIEDLÄNDER, DAVID; GERMANY; GOD;
HASKALAH; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; LITERATURE:
CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH;
LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY;
MAIMON, SALOMON; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN Mendès, Catulle: THEATER: EUROPE
Mendes, Henry Pereira: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
*Mendes-Nasi Family: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
Menelaus: TOBIADS

Menelik: ETHIOPIA; QUEEN OF SHEBA
Mengele, Josef: AUSCHWITZ; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; LATIN AMERICA; ROMA
Menkin, Sarah Foner: HASKALAH
Merab: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Merneptah: BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP
Meromi, Ohad: ART, ISRAELI
Mesha: BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP; MOAB
Meshullam bar Kalonymos: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN
EUROPE
Meshullam ben Jacob: ABRAHAM BEN DAVID OF POSQUIÈRES; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Meshullam ben Moses: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
Meshullam of Volterra: TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
Mestrovic, Ivan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
*Metatron: MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH
LITERATURE
Meyer, Jules: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
Meyer, Marshall: ARGENTINA
Meyer, Max: FASHION
Meyer-Bernstein, Gerda: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
Meyerovitch, Dovid: THEATER, YIDDISH
Meyerowitz, William: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART,
AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
Meyerson, Morris: MEIR, GOLDA
*Micah: TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT
Michael: ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD
Michael, Sami: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
Michaeli, Katia: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Michaels, Anne: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION;
HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
*Micah: PROPHETS (NEVI'IM); PROPHETS AND PROPHECY
Micaiah ben Imlah: BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY
Michal: DAVID; LOVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Midler, Bette: FILM: UNITED STATES
Mielziner, Jo: THEATER: UNITED STATES
Mises, Yehuda: GALICIA
Mignona, Eduardo: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
Mihaileanu, Radu: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
Mikhoels, Solomon: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION; FILM: YIDDISH- LANGUAGE; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; THEATER, YIDDISH
Milcah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Milgrim, Sally: FASHION
Mill, John Stuart: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
Millaud, Moïse Polydore: FRANCE: 1789–1939
Miller, Alice: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY ROLES OF WOMEN
Miller, Arthur: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
Miller, Lee: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
Miller, Louis: JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA
Miller, Risa: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
Miller, Zvi: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
Miloh, Joseph: FILM: ISRAEL
Milosz, Czesław: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
Milstein, Uri: ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1948)
Minc, Hilary: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
Minkov, N. B.: POETRY, YIDDISH
Minkowski, Mauryey: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY
Mirandola, Pico della: ABULAFIA, ABRAHAM; KABBALAH;
NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA)

*Miriam: AARON; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; MOSES; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Miriam, Rivkah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN'S WRITING, 1882–2010

Mirvis, Tova: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION

Mises, Judah Leib: HASKALAH

Mish'al, Khalid: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948 – 2010

Mishkowsky, Zelda Shneurson: See Zelda

Misrach, Richard: PHOTOGRAPHY

Mitrani, Michel: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Mizrachi, Limor: SPORTS: ISRAEL

Mizrachi, Motti: ART, ISRAELI

Mizrachi, Moshé: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)

Mizrachi, Osnat: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL

Mnouchkine, Arianna: THEATER: EUROPE

Modan, Rutu: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION

Modell, Art: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL

Modena, Fioretta (Bat Sheva): WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

*Modena, Leon: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM; FAMILY AND MARRIAGE: EARLY MODERN PERIOD; ITALY; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS; SECULARISM; SULAM, SARRA COPIA; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; VENICE; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

Modiani, Patrick: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; LITERATURE: FRANCE

Modigliani, Amadeo: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY

Moellin, Jacob ben Moses (Maharil): EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; HIGH HOLIDAYS

Mogulesco, Zelig: THEATER: EUROPE

Moïse, Penina: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)

Moïse, Theodore Sidney: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940

Mokady, Moshe: ART, ISRAELI

Molkho, Solomon: KARO, JOSEPH; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN

Molnár, Ferenc: THEATER: EUROPE

Molodowsky, Kadya: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY, YIDDISH

Monis, Judah: JEWISH STUDIES

Monk, Meredith: DANCE: UNITED STATES

Montagu, Lily: WOMEN, MODERN: BRITAIN AND NORTH AMERICA

Montefiore, Claude: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

*Montefiore, Moses Haim and Judith Barent Cohen: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES; BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; DAMASCUS AFFAIR; RUSSIA

Moore, Henry: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS

Moos, Herman: MORTARA AFFAIR

Morais, Sabato: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; PHILADELPHIA

Mordecai: ESTHER, BOOK OF; FIVE SCROLLS; PURIM

Mordecai of Chernobyl: HASIDISM: EUROPE

Morin, Jean: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM

Möring, Marcel: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE

Morpurgo, Lucia: LEVI, PRIMO

Morris, Benny: ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1948)

Morris, Robert: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART

Morse, Samuel F. B.: PHOTOGRAPHY

Mortara, Edgar: MORTARA AFFAIR; PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)

Mortara, Salomone and Marianna Padovani: MORTARA AFFAIR

Moscato, Judah: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN

Mosco, Maisie: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION

*Moses: AARON; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; AVOT; AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; BALAAM; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BLESSINGS: BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS; CANAAN, CANAANITES; COURTS; DAVID: POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EDOM; EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; ETHICS, RABBINIC; EXODUS, BOOK OF; GENESIS, BOOK OF; GOD; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JETHRO; JOB: RABBINIC TRADITIONS; JOSHUA, BOOK OF; KABBALAH; LAW: ANCIENT NEAR AND HEBREW BIBLE; LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; LUZZATTO, MOSES HAYYIM; MAGIC; MAIMONIDES; MIRIAM; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; PASSOVER; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; PSYCHOANALYSIS; PTOLEMIES; RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS; RABBINIC ORDINATION; RESURRECTION; REVELATION; SPINOZA, BARUCH; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; TEN COMMANDMENTS; TRIBES, TWELVE; WORSHIP; ZOHAR

Moses ben Eliezer: MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ

Moses ben Maimon: See Maimonides, Moses

Moses ben Nahman: See Nahmanides, Moses

Moses ben Solomon: MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS

*Moses de Leon: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; KABBALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; ZOHAR

Moses of Coucy: EDUCATION, GIRLS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ; TOSAFISTS

Moses of Evreux: MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ

Moses of London: ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES

Moses Narboni: GERSONIDES

Moses, Alfred Geiger: JEWISH SCIENCE

Moshe, Haim: MUSIC, POPULAR

Moshenson, Ilan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Mosler, Henry: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940

Mosley, Oswald: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

Moss, Celia and Marion: WOMEN, MODERN: BRITAIN AND NORTH AMERICA

Mossanen, Dora Levy: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION

Most, Johnny: SPORTSCASTERS

Most, Johann: SPORTSCASTERS

Mostel, Zero: FILM: UNITED STATES

Muenster, Sebastian: KIMHI FAMILY

Mulisch, Harry: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION

Mumford, Lewis: MENORAH ASSOCIATION

Muni, Paul: ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS;

Muñiz-Huberman, Angelina: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA

Munk, Salomon: FRANCE: 1789–1939; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)

Murrow, Edward R.: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION

Music, Zoran: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART

Myer, Charles Solomon “Buddy”: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL

Myerhoff, Barbara: ANTHROPOLOGY

Myers, Myer: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940

Myerson, Bess: CELEBRITIES

Naamah: BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE; REHOBOAM

Na'aman, Michal: ART, ISRAELI

Nabonidus: BABYLONIAN EXILE

Naboth: AHAB

Nabal: DAVID

Nadav, Rachel: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL

Nagrin, Daniel: DANCE: UNITED STATES

Nagy, Bela: THEATER: EUROPE

Naharin, Ohad: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Nahman, R.: HEAD COVERING: MEN
 *Nahman ben Simḥa of Bratslav: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH
 *Nahmanides, Moses: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; DEVEKUT; EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; ETHICAL WILLS; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; KABBALAH; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; PILGRIMAGE; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; RESPONSA LITERATURE; SAMUEL; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL; TOSAFISTS
 Nahai, Gina: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
 Naismith, James: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Najara, Israel: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; SAFED
 Naomi: ANOINTMENT; RUTH, BOOK OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Naphtali: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; RACHEL; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Napoleon: EMANCIPATION; FRANCE: CONSISTORIES, 1806–1939; GHETTO; INTERMARRIAGE: MODERN EUROPE AND UNITED STATES; NAḤMAN BEN SIMḤA OF BRATSLAV; SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY; ZIONISM: FRANCE
 Nasi, Gracia: MENDES-NASI FAMILY; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES
 Nasi, Joseph: MENDES-NASI FAMILY
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1956–1967)
 Nassy, Joseph: HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION
 Natan, Michal: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Natanel ibn Fayyumi: YEMEN
 Nathan: BATHSHEBA; BIBLE; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; DAVID; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SOLOMON
 Nathan, R.: MISHNAH; TANNAIM
 Nathan of Gaza (Nathan Ashkenazi): KABBALAH, LURIANIC; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; SHABBETAI ZEVI
 Nathan, Abie: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Nathansen, Henri: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Natronai ben Hilai, Gaon: AMRAM BAR SHESHNA; RESPONSA LITERATURE
 Nattel, Lilian: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Nebe, A.: BELORUSSIA
 Nebuchadnezzar: BABYLON/BABYLONIA; BABYLONIAN EXILE; ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; JEREMIAH, BOOK OF; LACHISH; PHILISTINES
 Nefertiti: EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL
 Nehama, Yehuda: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 *Nehemiah: APOCRYPHA; BABYLON/BABYLONIA; EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF; INTERMARRIAGE: HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVES; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; PERSIA, ANCIENT; RUTH, BOOK OF; SAMARITANS; TOBIADS
 Nehemiah, R.: TANNAIM; TOSEFTA
 Nehemiah ben Solomon: MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ
 Nehunia ben ha-Kanah: BAHIR, SEFER HA-
 Némec, Jan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Nemerov, Howard: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Ner-David, Haviva: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
 Nero: JEWISH WAR, FIRST; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA)
 Netanyahu, Benjamin: SHARON, ARIEL
 Netanyahu, Ben-Zion: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
 Netsky, Hankus: MUSIC, POPULAR

Netter, Charles: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Neuda, Fanny: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL
 Neumark, Martha: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
 Neusner, Jacob: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; MISHNAH; TOSEFTA
 Neustein, Joshua: ART, ISRAELI
 Newhouse, Samuel I.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Newman, Arnold: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
 Newman, Barnett: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Newman, Bernard: FASHION
 Newman, Paul: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Newman, Pauline: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Nichols, Mike: ENTERTAINMENT
 Nicolai, Friedrich: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES
 Nicholas of Lyra: CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM
 Niebuhr, Reinhold: INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES
 Niemöller, Martin: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Nieto, David: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
 Nietzsche, Friedrich: BUBER, MARTIN; LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Nikova, Rina: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Nilsson, Leopoldo Torre: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Nirenska, Pola: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Nissan, Rosa: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Nissim ben Moses: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Nissim ibn Shangi: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Nissim of Gerona: DINA DEMALKHUTA DINA
 Nixon, Richard: ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS; JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Noah: ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ECOLOGY; FLOOD; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JOB, BOOK OF; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; REVELATION
 Noah (Daughter of Zelophehad): WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Noah, Mordecai M.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE); LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; THEATER: UNITED STATES; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Noll, Chaim: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Nomborg-Przytyk, Sara: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Nordau, Max: ZANGWILL, ISRAEL
 Norworth, Jack: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Noth, Martin: KINGS, BOOKS OF; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Novak, David: THEOLOGY
 Nowina-Przybylski, Jan: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 Nuchi, Natan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Nudel, Ida: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
 Nusseibeh, Sari: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Nussbaum, Felix: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Nyiszli, Miklos: AUSCHWITZ; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS
 *Obadiah
 Obadiah of Bertinoro: TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Obadiah of Rome: PRINTING
 Obama, Barack: UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Ochs, Adolph S.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES
 Ocko, Edna: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Odets, Clifford: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Ofek, Avraham: ART, ISRAELI
 Ogden, Rollo: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Ohlendorf, Otto: HOLOCAUST: ROMA

Oirich, Alan: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Olczak-Ronikier, Joanna: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Olère, David: HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION
 Olitski, Jules: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Ollman, Arthur: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Olmert, Ehud: ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES
 Olomucki, Halina: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Olsen, Tillie: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Omri: AHAB; KINGS, BOOKS OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; MOAB; SAMARIA
 Onkelos: TARGUM
 Ophuls, Marcel: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Oppen, George: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Oppenheim, David: PRAGUE
 Oppenheim, Moritz Daniel: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; FRANKFURT AM MAIN Oppenheimer, Joseph Süß: COURT JEWS
 Oppenheimer, Samuel: COURT JEWS; HABSBURG EMPIRE
 Oppert, Jules: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Oppler, Edwin: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Or, Amir: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Orbach, E. A.: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
 Oren, Heda: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Oren-Weinberg, Shlomo: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
 Örkeny, István: THEATER: EUROPE
 Orlinsky, Harry M.: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
 Ornstein, Margalit: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Ornstein, Shoshana: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Ornstein, Yehudit: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Orpah: RUTH, BOOK OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Osten, Suzanne: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Osterman, Rosanna: NURSING: UNITED STATES
 Ostriker, Alicia: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Ostrowsky, Abbo: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Otto, Rudolf: SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.
 Oved, Margalit: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Oysher, Moïshe: FILM: YIDDISH – LANGUAGE; MUSIC, POPULAR
 *Oz, Amos: ADULTERY; ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; ZIONISM
 Ozick, Cynthia: EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: DAY SCHOOLS; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Padani, Paula: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Pagis, Dan: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
 Pahlavi, Reza Shah: IRAN
 Pa'il, Meir: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Paldi, Yisrael: ART, ISRAELI
 Paley, Grace: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Paley, Samuel: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
 Paley, William S.: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION; RADIO: UNITED STATES
 Pallenberg, Max: THEATER: EUROPE
 Palucca, Gret: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Paluzzi, Numidio: SULAM, SARRA COPIA
 Pankok, Otto: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Panov, Valery: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Papiernikov, Yosef: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV

Papo, Yehudah Eliezer: LITERATURE, LADINO
 Papon, Maurice: HOLOCAUST TRIALS
 Papp, Joseph: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Pappa, R.: AMORAIM
 Pappé, Ilan: ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1948)
 *Pappenheim, Bertha: BREUER, JOSEF; BUBER, MARTIN; FREUD, SIGMUND; GLÜCKEL OF HAMELN; JÜDISCHER FRAUENBUND; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ; WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Pascal, Julia: THEATER: BRITAIN
 Pascin, Jules: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; BULGARIA
 Passon, Harry: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Pasternak, Boris: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Pauker, Ana: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Paul: ANTINOMIANISM; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM; GnosticISM; NEW TESTAMENT
 Pearlman, Ruthie: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Pearlstein, Philip: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Peer, Shahr: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Peerce, Larry: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Peixotto, Jessica Blanche: UNITED STATES: HIGHER EDUCATION
 Peled, Mati: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
 Peltz, Barney: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Pember, Phoebe Yates: NURSING: UNITED STATES
 Penn, Irving: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
 Perec, Georges: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Perelman, Jeroham Judah Leib: BELORUSSIA
 Perera, Victor: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Peres, Shimon: ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS; RABIN, YITZHAK
 Peretz, I. L.: FOLKTALES; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; RUSSIA; THEATER, YIDDISH; THOUGHT, MODERN
 Perez of Corbeil: TOSAFISTS
 Perl, Joseph: GALICIA; HASIDISM: EUROPE; HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Perlasca, Giorgio: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Perle, Yehoshua: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Perlmutter, Arnold: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Peshev, Dimiter: BULGARIA
 Petahiah of Regensburg: PILGRIMAGE; TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Peter: CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM
 Petlura, Simon: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; POGROM; UKRAINE
 Petrov, Yevgeny: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Pevsner, Antoine: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Pfefferkorn, Blanche: NURSING: UNITED STATES
 Pfefferkorn, Johannes: CONVERSION: EARLY MODERN PERIOD
 Philip: HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY
 *Philo Judaeus of Alexandria: ALEXANDRIA, ANCIENT; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ESSENEs; GnosticISM; MARTYRDOM; PTOLEMIES; SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD
 Philo the Poet: PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT
 Phinehas: NUMBERS, BOOK OF; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SHILOH
 Picasso, Pablo: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Picon, Molly: ENTERTAINMENT; FILM: UNITED STATES; FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; MUSIC, POPULAR Piechotka, Maria and Kazimierz: SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN

Piesman, Marissa: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Piercy, Marge: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Pike, Jacob: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Pike, Lipman "Lip": SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Piket, Frederik: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Pilinszky, János: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Pimsler, Stuart: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Pinchik, Pierre: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Pingusson, Henri: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
 Pinkus, Yirmi: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 *Pinsker, Leon: THOUGHT, MODERN; RUSSIA; ZIONISM
 Pinski, Dovid: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; THEATER, YIDDISH
 Pinsky, Robert: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Pinter, Harold: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; POETRY: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN
 Pissarro, Jacob-Abraham-Camille: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; CARIBBEAN
 Plain, Belva: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Plaskow, Judith: AESTHETICS; JUDAISM, FEMINIST; GOD; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN Plath, Sylvia: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Plato: BUBER, MARTIN; FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; GnosticisM; REVELATION
 Pliny the Elder: DEAD SEA SCROLLS; DECAPOLIS CITIES; ESSENES; TRIBES, TEN LOST
 Podoloff, Maurice: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Podhoretz, Norman: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Polanski, Roman: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Polgar, Alfred: THEATER: EUROPE
 Polke, Sigmar: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Pomerantz, Fred: FASHION
 Pomis, David de: MEDICINE
 Pompey: ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; HASMONEAN DYNASTY; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; SELEUCIDS
 Pool, David de Sola: PRAYER BOOKS: UNITED STATES; UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY
 Popa, Vasko: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Porat, Yehoshua: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Porzecanski, Teresa: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Posnak, Max: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Potash, Rikuda: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV
 Potecorvo, Gilo: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Potiphar: JOSEPH
 Potok, Chaim: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; SPORTS AND AMERICANIZATION
 Pound, Ezra: POETRY: UNITED STATES; POETRY: BRITAIN
 Poznanski, Gustavus: CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
 Prager, Marcia: JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL
 Prager, Regina: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Prawer, Joshua: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
 Prell, Riv-Ellen: ANTHROPOLOGY
 Presley, Elvis: FASHION
 Pressburger, Giorgio: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Preysing, Konrad von: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 *Priesand, Sally Jane: JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA; RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
 Prilutski, Noyekh: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Prince, Harold: THEATER: UNITED STATES

Prinz, Joachim: JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
 Proudhon, Pierre Joseph: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
 Proust, Marcel: DREYFUS AFFAIR; LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Ptolemy I: PTOLEMIES; SELEUCIDS
 Ptolemy II Philadelphus: ALEXANDRIA, ANCIENT; PTOLEMIES; SEPTUAGINT; TOBIADS
 Puah: MEDICINE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Pukhachevsky, Nechama: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN'S WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Pulvermacher, Neta: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 *Queen of Sheba: ANOINTMENT; ETHIOPIA; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; SOLOMON
 Raab, Esther: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Raban, Ze'ev: ART, ISRAELI; PLATE 11
 Raanan, Yoav: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Rabbah: AMORAIM
 Rabban, Joseph: COCHIN JEWS
 Rabbeinu Tam: See Jacob ben Meir Tam
 *Rabin, Yitzhak: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2010; ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; SHARON, ARIEL
 Rabinovich, Osip: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Rabinovici, Doron: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
 Rabinovitch, Anne: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Rabon, Yisrael: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 *Rachel: ETHICS, MEDICAL; JACOB; JOSEPH; INFERTILITY; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; LOVE; MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Rachel: See Bluwstein, Rachel
 Raczymow, Henri: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Rad, Gerhard von: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE
 Radner, Gilda: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Radnóti, Miklós: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Radok, Alfred: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Ragen, Naomi: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Rahab: JERICHO; PROSTITUTES, PROSTITUTION: HEBREW BIBLE THROUGH MIDDLE AGES; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS; WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE
 Rahabi, David: BENE ISRAEL
 Rahabi, Ezekiel: COCHIN JEWS; INDIA
 Rakosi, Carl: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Rakov, Nokhem: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Rakovsky, Puah: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE
 Rand, Archie: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Raphael: MAGIC
 Raphael, Frederic: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Raphaelson, Samson: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Raphall, Morris: UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR
 Rapoport, Nathan: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Rapoport, Solomon Judah Leib: HABSBURG EMPIRE; HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; PRAGUE

*Rashi: BERURIAH; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS;
BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800;
BYZANTINE EMPIRE; DINA DE-MALKHUTA DINA;
EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN;
EZEKIEL, BOOK OF; FOLKTALES; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES;
GERMANY; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700;
MARTYRDOM; NAHMANIDES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL:
CHRISTIAN EUROPE; PRINTING; RABBINIC LITERATURE:
MISHNAH AND TALMUDS; RESPONSA LITERATURE; SONG
OF SONGS, BOOK OF; TOSAFISTS; TOSEFTA
Raskin, Saul: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
Rath, Georg von: HOLOCAUST
Rathenau, Walther: BERLIN
Ratosh, Jonathan: ART, ISRAELI; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
Rau, Heinz: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
Raudnitz, Rachel: PRAGUE
Rauschenberg, Robert: ART, ISRAELI
Rav: AMORAIM
Ravel, Edeet: LITERATURE: CANADA
Ravikovitch, Dahlia: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
1882–2010; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Ravina, R.: AMORAIM
Ravitsh, Melekh: POETRY, YIDDISH
Ravvin, Norman: LITERATURE: CANADA
Rawet, Samuel: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
Rawicz, Piotr: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE:
FRANCE
Ray, Man: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY;
PHOTOGRAPHY
Raynal, Clément Weill: LITERATURE: FRANCE
Raziel, David: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
Reagan, Ronald: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
*Rebekah: BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; ESAU; ETHICS, MEDICAL; GENESIS, BOOK OF; INFERTILITY; ISRAELITES:
MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; ISAAC; JACOB; LOVE; PRAYER:
WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; RACHEL; WOMEN, ANCIENT:
BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Reeb, David: ART, ISRAELI
Reggio, Yitzhak Shmuel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
*Rehoboam: AMMON; HEBRON; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF;
JEROBOAM; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; LACHISH; SHECHEM;
UNITED MONARCHY
Reich-Ranicki, Marcel: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
Reick, Theodor: ANTHROPOLOGY
Reigner, Gerhard: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN
Reinach, Théodore and Salomon: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE
(NINETEENTH CENTURY)
Reiner, Carl: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT;
TELEVISION: UNITED STATES
Reines, Isaac Jacob: MIZRACHI
Reinhardt, Elaine Rosenthal: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN
Reinhardt, Max: BERLIN; THEATER: EUROPE
Reinharz, Yehudah: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
Reisman, Ori: ART, ISRAELI
Reitz, Edgar: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
Rejwan, Nissim: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
Remos, Moses: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
Rennert, Itzik: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
POPULAR FICTION
Resnais, Alain: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
Reuben: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
Reuben bar Isaac: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE

Reuchlin, Johannes: ABULAFIA, ABRAHAM; KABBALAH;
NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA)
Reuel: See JETHRO
Reuf, Abe: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT Reuveni, Aharon: LITERATURE, MODERN HEBREW: THE
YISHUV, 1880–1948
Reuveni, David: ABRAVANEL FAMILY; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
Reuveni, Aharon: LITERATURE, MODERN HEBREW: THE
YISHUV, 1880–1948
Révai, Józef: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
Revel, Bernard: YESHIVA UNIVERSITY
Revivo, Chaim: SPORTS: ISRAEL
Reyzen, Avrom: POETRY, YIDDISH
Reznik, David: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
Reznikoff, Charles: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; POETRY: UNITED STATES
Ricci, Matteo: CHINA
Rice, Abraham: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN Rice, Elmer: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
Rich, Adrienne: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); POETRY, UNITED STATES
Richler, Mordecai: FILM: UNITED STATES; LITERATURE:
CANADA
Rickert, Heinrich: ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
Rickles, Don: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT
Riefenstahl, Leni: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
Rieger, Eliezer: ISRAEL, STATE OF: DIASPORA RELATIONS
Riesser, Gabriel: ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY;
GERMANY
Rieti, Diana: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN
Rieti, Moses: ASCARELLI, DEVORÀ; POETRY, MEDIEVAL:
CHRISTIAN EUROPE
*Ringelblum, Emanuel: HOLOCAUST DIARIES; HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE; THEATER,
YIDDISH
Ríos, Leopoldo Torre: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
Riskin, Shlomo: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX
Rita: MUSIC, POPULAR
Ritter, Robert: ROMA
Rivera, Diego: ART, ISRAELI Rivers, Joan: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; FILM: UNITED STATES
Rivers, Larry: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
Rivess, Avrom: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV
Rizpah: SAMUEL
Robbins, Jerome: DANCE: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
Robeson, Paul: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
Robin, Régine: LITERATURE: CANADA
Roca, Julio A.: ARGENTINA
Roden, Claudia: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
Rodgers, Richard: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
Rodker, John: POETRY: BRITAIN
Rogers, Roy: FASHION
Rogoff, Tamar: DANCE: UNITED STATES
Roheim, Geza: ANTHROPOLOGY
Rokeah, Aharon: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
Rokhman, Leyb: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
Rolston, Adam: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
Romanelli, Samuel: TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD
Romanesky, Marilyn: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: WOMEN

Romano, Joseph: JOURNALISM, LADINO (OTTOMAN EMPIRE)
 Romm Family: PRINTING
 Roosevelt, Eleanor: FRANK, ANNE
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano: HOLOCAUST: UNITED STATES JEWISH RESPONSE; RADIO: UNITED STATES; UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES
 PRESIDENTS; WORLD WAR II: IMPACT ON AMERICAN JEWS
 Roosevelt, Theodore: STRAUS FAMILY; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Rose, Helen: FASHION
 Rosen, Al: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Rosen, Amy Sue: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Rosen, Carl: FASHION
 Rosen, Michael: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Rosen, Norma: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Rosenbaum, Israel Dov: PLATE 9
 Rosenbaum, Thane: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
 Rosenberg, Chava: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Rosenberg, Douglas: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Rosenberg, Harold: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Rosenberg, Isaac: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Rosenberg, Joel: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Rosenberg, Petey: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Rosenberg, Shalom: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Rosenberg, Yehuda Yudel: GOLEM
 Rosenblatt, Joseph "Yossele": CANTOR, CANTORATE:
 CONTEMPORARY; FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; MUSIC, POPULAR; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Rosenblum, Naomi: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Rosencof, Mauricio: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Rosenfarb, Chava: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION;
 LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Rosenfeld, Jonah: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
 Rosenfeld, Morris: CELEBRITIES; POETRY, YIDDISH
 Rosengarten, Albert: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Rosensaft, Josef: DISPLACED PERSONS
 Rosenstein, Nettie: FASHION
 Rosenstock-Huessy, Eugen: BUBER, MARTIN; ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
 Rosenthal, A. M.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
 Rosenthal, C. D.: ROMANIA
 Rosenthal, Jack: THEATER: BRITAIN
 Rosenthal, Joe: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Rosenthal, Max: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Rosenwald, Julius: CHICAGO; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
 Rosenzweig, Edith Hahn: ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ
 *Rosenzweig, Franz: AESTHETICS; BERKOVITS, ELIEZER; BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; BUBER, MARTIN; COHEN, HERMANN;
 FACKENHEIM, EMIL LUDWIG; FRANKFURT AM MAIN;
 GERMANY; GOD; HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; LEVINAS,
 EMMANUEL; LOVE; PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA; REDEMPTION;
 REVELATION; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN
 Rosi, Francesco: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
 Rösler, Alexander: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
 LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Ross, Bertram: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Rossen, Rebecca: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 *Rossi, Azariah dei: ITALY; PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA
 Rossi, Leone: MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE
 Rossi, Madama Europa: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Rossi, Salamone: ITALY; MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Rössler, Tille: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL

Rosten, Leo: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Roth, Cecil: ENCYCLOPEDIAS; MUSEUMS
 Roth, Henry: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
 Roth, Joan: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Roth, Joseph: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Roth, Philip: ADULTERY; FILM: UNITED STATES; HOLOCAUST
 LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE:
 UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
 Roth-Sahamov, Esther: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Rothenberg, Jerome: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Rothko, Mark: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART,
 AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Rothschild, Alphonse: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Amschel Mayer: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Bathsheba de: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE
 ISRAEL
 Rothschild, Carl (Kalman): ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Edmond James de: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE,
 1789–1939; ISRAEL, STATE OF: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS (1878 TO 1948); ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 *Rothschild, James and Betty de: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY Rothschild, James (Jimmy) and Dorothy Pinto de: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, James Edouard de: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE
 (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
 Rothschild, Kalman: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Lionel: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN;
 ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Mayer Amschel and Gudule Schnapper: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES; FRANKFURT AM MAIN; GERMANY;
 ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Nathan: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES;
 MONTEFIORE, MOSES HAIM; ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Nathaniel Mayer: ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Salomon Mayer: HABSBURG EMPIRE; ROTHSCHILD FAMILY
 Rothschild, Walter: BALFOUR DECLARATION; BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN
 Rothstein, Arnold: CRIME AND CRIMINALS: UNITED STATES;
 SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
 Rothstein, Arthur: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Rotta, Angelo: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Rousset, David: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Rozeanu, Angelica: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Rozenmacher, Germán: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Rozental, Anna: WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE
 Rubens, Bernice: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 *Rubenstein, Richard L.: AESTHETICS; EVIL AND SUFFERING; GOD; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; THEOLOGY;
 THOUGHT, MODERN
 Rubin, Joel: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Rubin, Reuven: ART, ISRAELI; PLATE 22
 Rubina, Dina: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN); LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE Rubinshtein, Lev: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
 Rubinstein, Katia: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Rukeyser, Muriel: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Rumkowski, Mordechai Chaim: HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS;
 HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Rumshinsky, Joseph: MUSIC, POPULAR; THEATER, YIDDISH
 *Ruth: ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL
 REPRESENTATIONS
 Ruzowitzky, Stefan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Ryback, Issachar: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY

*Saadia ben Joseph Gaon: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; DUNASH BEN LABRAT; EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES; EVIL AND SUFFERING; GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES; GOLEM; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JUDEO-ARABIC; LOVE; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH – CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; PRAYER BOOKS; RESPONSA LITERATURE; SEFER YETZIRAH; SEFIROT; SHEKHINAH; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL

Saadia ibn Danan: GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD

Sabar, Ariel: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI

Sacco, Nicola: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940

Sachar, Abram: HILLEL: THE FOUNDATION FOR JEWISH CAMPUS LIFE

Sachs, Nelly: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY

Sachs, Shneur: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH

Sadat, Anwar el: ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB–ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2010

Sadeh, Pinchas: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW

Sa'di: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE

Sahal ben Matzliah: PILGRIMAGE

Sahl ibn Bushr ibn Habib al-Yahd: ASTROLOGY

Sahl, Mort: ENTERTAINMENT

Sâ'id al-Andalusî: SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD

Saker, Maria: RUSSIA

*Salamon, Nina Davis: ZANGWILL, ISRAEL

Salanter, Israel: MUSAR MOVEMENT; RUSSIA

Salk, Jonas: CELEBRITIES; MEDICINE

Salome Alexandra: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; PHARISEES; WOMEN, ANCIENT: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Salomon, Charlotte: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY

Salomon, Erich: PHOTOGRAPHY

Salomon, Haym: BANKING AND BANKING HOUSES; UNITED STATES: AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Salvador, Francis: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN

*Samael: MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; SEFIROT

Samoscz, Israel: MENDELSSOHN, MOSES

Samson: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; JUDGES, BOOK OF; NAZIRITE

Samson ben Abraham: TOSAFISTS

Samson ben Zadok: MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG

Samson of Chinon: TOSEFTA

*Samuel: ABRAHAM; BETH EL; HANNAH; MAGIC; NAZIRITES; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; SHILOH

Samuel, R.: AMORAIM; DINA DE-MALKHUTA DINA

Samuel ben Abba ha-Cohen: MEDICINE

Samuel ben Hofni: RESPONSA LITERATURE

Samuel ben Judah: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES

Samuel ben Kalonymus: GOLEM; MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ

Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam): BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; DINA DE-MALKHUTA DINA; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; RASHI; TOSAFISTS

Samuel ben Musa: PRINTING

Samuel ben Solomon: MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG

Samuel ibn Danan: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN

*Samuel ibn Naghrela ha-Nagid: NAGID; SPAIN, MUSLIM; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD

Samuels, Diane: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN

Sanbel, Nahman: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE

Sandberg, Carl: POETRY: UNITED STATES

Sanderson, Danny: MUSIC, POPULAR

Sandgren, Åke: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA

Sandler, Adam: FILM: UNITED STATES

Sandler, Boris: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH

Sandler, Peretz: THEATER, YIDDISH

Saperstein, Abe: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Saphir, Jacob: YEMEN

*Sarah: ABRAHAM; ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; COVENANT; DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; ETHICS, MEDICAL; GENESIS, BOOK OF; HAGAR; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; INFERTILITY; ISAAC; ISHMAEL; ISRAEL, LAND OF; PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS

Sarah bas Tovim: PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE

Sarai: SARAH

Sarasohn, Kasriel: JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA

Sargon II: ASSYRIA

Sarig, Gideon: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE

Sarna, Yehezkel: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES

Sarnoff, David: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION; RADIO: UNITED STATES

Saruk, Israel: KABBALAH, LURIANIC; LURIA, ISAAC

Sasportes, Yehudit: ART, ISRAELI

Sasso, Sandy Eisenberg: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN; RECONSTRUCTIONIST RABBINICAL COLLEGE

Sassoon, Jason: CHINA

Satanow, Yitzhak: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH

Saturninus: Gnosticism

*Saul: BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; DAVID; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; LOVE; MAGIC; PHILISTINES; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; TRIBES, TWELVE; UNITED MONARCHY

Sauvage, Pierre: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Saxe, Michael: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman: GOD; HAVURAH MOVEMENT; JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT; INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES

Schalit, Heinrich: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS

Schanker, Louis: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940

Schapiro, Miriam: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940

Schatz, Boris: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART, ISRAELI; MUSEUMS

Schayes, Adolph "Dolph": SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Schayes, Danny: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Schechner, Richard: THEATER: UNITED STATES

*Schechter, Solomon: ADLER, CYRUS; EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA: DAY SCHOOLS; GENIZAH, CAIRO; JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY; JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE; THOUGHT, MODERN; ZANGWILL, ISRAEL

Scheer, Eva: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA

Scheler, Max: SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.

Schenfeld, Rina: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL

*Schenirer, Sarah: AGUDAT ISRAEL; WOMEN, MODERN: BRITAIN AND NORTH AMERICA; WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE

Schenkar, Joan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)

- Scheuer, Mathilda: NURSING: UNITED STATES
- Schiff, Jacob: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; NURSING: UNITED STATES; UNITED STATES: HIGHER EDUCATION; WALD, LILLIAN; ZANGWILL, ISRAEL
- Schiff, Meir ben Jacob Ha-Kohen: FRANKFURT AM MAIN
- Schiller, Benjie Ellen: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Schindel, Robert: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Schindler, Alexander: JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
- *Schindler, Emilie and Oskar: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Schlegel, Dorothea Mendelssohn Veit von: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); MENDELSSOHN, MOSES; WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Schlink, Bernhard: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Schnock, Frieder: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Scholander, Vilhelm: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Schoolman, Albert P.: SUMMER CAMPING
- Schneerson, Chana: SCHNEERSON, MENACHEM MENDEL
- Schneerson, Chaya Mushka: SCHNEERSON, MENACHEM MENDEL
- Schneerson, Joseph Isaac: HASIDISM: EUROPE
- Schneerson, Levi Yitzchak: SCHNEERSON, MENACHEM MENDEL
- *Schneerson, Menachem Mendel: HASIDISM: NORTH AMERICA; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; NAḤMAN BEN SIMḤA OF BRATSLAV
- Schneerson, Yosef Yitzchak: SCHNEERSON, MENACHEM MENDEL
- Schneiderman, Rose: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
- Schnitzler, Arthur: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; THEATER: EUROPE; VIENNA
- Schoenberg, Arnold: AESTHETICS; VIENNA
- *Scholem, Gershom: ABULAFIA, ABRAHAM; ANTINOMIANISM; BAHIR, SEFER HA-; FRANKFURT AM MAIN; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; METATRON; MOSES DE LEON; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND; SHABBETAI ZEVI; SEFIROT; THOUGHT, MODERN
- Schopenhauer, Arthur: BUBER, MARTIN
- Schorr, Yehoshua Heschel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Schrader, Leonard: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Shreider, Grigory: SAINT PETERSBURG
- Shtok, Fradel: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Schück, Henrik: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Schulz, Bruno: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Schutz, Irena: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Schwab, Moise: JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE (NINETEENTH CENTURY)
- Schwartz, David: FASHION
- Schwartz, Lynn Sharon: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Schwartz, Maurice: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; THEATER, YIDDISH
- Schwartz, Y. Y.: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Schwarz-Bart, André: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE: FRANCE
- Schwartzbard, Sholom: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Schwarzschild, Steven: COHEN, HERMANN
- Schweid, Eliezer: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Schwerner, Armand: POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Schwerner, Michael: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS; UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
- Schyfter, Guita: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Sciuto, Lucien: OTTOMAN EMPIRE
- Scotto, Aubrey: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
- Scliar, Moacyr: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Sebald, W. G.: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Secunda, Sholom: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; MUSIC, POPULAR; THEATER, YIDDISH
- Sedran, Barney: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Seeger, Pete: ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF
- Segal, Edith: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Segal, George: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Segal, Joseph: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Segal, Yechiel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
- Segall, Lasar: LATIN AMERICA
- Seghers, Anna: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Seinfeld, Jerry: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION
- Sela, Yoel: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Selig, Bud: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Seligmann, Rafael: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Selnick, David O.: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Semel, Nava: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS (1882–2010)
- Semper, Gottfried: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Semprun, Jorge: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION
- Sendak, Maurice: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Sendlerowa, Irena: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- Sennacherib: ASSYRIA; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; LACHISH
- Senesh, Hannah: HOLOCAUST EDUCATION: NORTH AMERICA; MUSEUMS
- Serah, daughter of Asher: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Serdatsky, Yente: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Sereni, Clara: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Sernhartz, Nathan: NAḤMAN BEN SIMḤA OF BRATSLAV
- Serra, Richard: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Setton, Ruth Knafo: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Severid, Eric: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
- Severus of Minorca: CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TO JEWS AND JUDAISM
- Sexton, Anne: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
- Seymour, David: PHOTOGRAPHY
- Sfar, Joann: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Sforno, Obadiah: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800
- Sha-al, Adi: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Shababo, Shoshannah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
- Shabazi, Shalom: FOLKTALES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD; YEMEN
- *Shabbetai Zevi: ANTINOMIANISM; HASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700; LUZZATTO, MOSES ḤAYYIM; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; MESSIANISM: MODERN APPROACHES; SABBATEANISM; SCHOLEM, GERSHOM; TIKKUN OLAM; TURKEY; UKRAINE; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
- Shabtai, Yaakov: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Shaham, Rina: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Shahar, David: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
- Shahin: JUDEO-PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE

Shahn, Ben: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; PHOTOGRAPHY; PLATE 18
 Shaked, Gershon: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Shakespeare, William: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; MONEY LENDING: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE; THEATER: BRITAIN
 Shakh, Elazar Man: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Shalev-Gerz, Esther: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
 Shalev, Meir: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
 Shalev, Zeruya: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
 Shalom, Abraham: THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
 Shalom, Shin: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Shamash, Violette: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Shamir, Moshe: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; FILM: ISRAEL; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Shamir, Yitzhak: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
 Shammai: AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; HILLEL; MISHNAH; TANNAIM
 Shammas, Anton: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE
 Shamri, Aryeh: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: THE YISHUV
 Shandling, Garry: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
 Shani, Marco: ART, ISRAELI
 Shapero, Lillian: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Shapira, Amitzur: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Shapira, Anita: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
 Shapira, Hayyim Elazar: JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX
 Shapira, Shalom Joseph: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Shapiro, Alan: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Shapiro, Danial: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Shapiro, Kalonymous Kalman: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Shapiro, Karl: POETRY: UNITED STATES
 Shapiro, Lamed: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
 Shaposhnikov, Ivan: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
 Sharett, Moshe: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES
 *Sharansky, Nathan (Anatoly): SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
 *Sharon, Ariel: BEGIN, MENACHEM; ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1973–2010); ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES; SHARANSKY, NATHAN Sharon, Mirali: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Shatz, Meir bar Isaac: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Shaul, Anwar: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
 Shavelson, Clara Lemlich: UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT
 Shaw, Irwin: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Shaw, Robert: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Shayetitch, Simcha Bunim: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
 Shaykevitch, Nokhem Meyer “Shomer”: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; THEATER, YIDDISH
 Sheazaf, Neta: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Shechem: DINAH; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA
 She’erah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Shefatiah: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Shelomzion: See SALOME ALEXANDRA
 Shem: BIBLE: LANGUAGES

Shem Tov ben Isaac ibn Ardutieli: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Shem Tov ibn Joseph Falaquera: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov: GERSONIDES; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Shemaiah: RASHI
 Shemer, Naomi: MUSIC, POPULAR
 Shemi, Menahem: ART, ISRAELI
 Sherira Gaon: BAAL SHEM; GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES; HAI BEN SHERIRA; PUMBEDITA; RESPONSA LITERATURE; SABORAIM; TANNAIM; TOSEFTA
 Sherman, A. J.: BRITAIN: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN Sherman, Allie: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL
 Sherman, Jason: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Sherman, Kenneth: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Sherman, Martin: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Sheshbazzar: EXILE, BABYLONIAN; PERSIA
 Shifrah: MEDICINE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
 Shirer, William: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
 Shishak: REHOBOAM
 Shkop, Shimon: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
 Shlaim, Avi: ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS (1948)
 Shlonsky, Abraham: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Shlumil, Shlomo: KABBALAH, LURIANIC; LURIA, ISAAC
 Shochat, Israel: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
 Sholem Aleichem (Sholem Rabinowitz): COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; DANCE: UNITED STATES; ETHICAL WILLS; FILM: YIDDISH LANGUAGE; FOLKTALES; LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; RUSSIA; THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, YIDDISH
 Shorr, Joshua Heschel: HASKALAH
 Shoshani, Mordechai: LEVINAS, EMMANUEL
 Shostakovich, Dmitri: POETRY, YIDDISH
 Shragai, Shlomoh Zalman: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Shúa, Ana Maria: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
 Shubert, Jacob, Lee, and Sam: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Shulman, Kalman: HASKALAH
 Shulsinger, Shlomo: SUMMER CAMPING
 Shwarts, Hayyim: PRINTING
 Shweky, Yaakov: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Sierakowiak, David: HOLOCAUST DIARIES
 Silano: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Silberman, Eliezer: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Silken, Jon: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Silva, Daniel: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 *Silver, Abba Hillel: ZIONISM: UNITED STATES
 Silver, Eliezer: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Silver, Joan Micklin: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Silver, Monroe: ENTERTAINMENT
 Silverberg, Robert: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Silverman, Ira: JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST
 Silverman, Sarah: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; ENTERTAINMENT
 Simḥa Bunem of Przysucha: HASIDISM: EUROPE
 Simeon: DINAH; ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; TRIBES, TEN LOST; TRIBES, TWELVE
 Simon bar Lakish: AMORAIM
 Simon bar (ben) Yohai: KABBALAH; MOSES DE LEON; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE; SAFED; TANNAIM; ZOHAR
 Simon ben Gamaliel, R.: PATRIARCH; TANNAIM

Simon ben Gamaliel II, R.: PATRIARCH; TANNAIM
 Simon ben Shetaḥ, R.: HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MAGIC Simḥah of Speyer: TOSAFISTS
 Simiate, Ona: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Simmel, Georg: BUBER, MARTIN
 Simon ben Isaac ben Abun: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Simon Magus: GNOSTICISM; SAMARITANS
 Simon, Neil: ENTERTAINMENT; TELEVISION: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Simonson, Lee: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Sinatra, Frank: ENTERTAINMENT
 Sinclair, Clive: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Sinclair, Ian: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Sinclair, Jo (Ruth Seid): LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
 Singer, Israel Joshua: ADULTERY; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; THEATER, YIDDISH
 Singer, Isaac Bashevis: CELEBRITIES; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
 Singer, Isadore: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; ENCYCLOPEDIAS
 Singer, James: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Siporin, Mitchell: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Siriro, Samuel Saul: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN Sirotta, Gershon: CANTOR, CANTORATE: CONTEMPORARY; CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS Sisera: DEBORAH
 Siskind, Aaron: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Skolnik, Fred: ENCYCLOPEDIAS
 Slánský, Rudolf: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE; CZECHOSLOVAKIA
 Slonimsky, Hayim Zelig: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Smadja, Oren: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Smashnova, Anna: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Smilansky, Moshe: LITERATURE, MODERN HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
 Smith, Gerald L. K.: INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES
 Smolenskin, Peretz: HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH; THOUGHT, MODERN Snodgras, W. D.: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE
 Snyder, Joan: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Sobol, Joshua: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
 Sofer, Dalia: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
 Sofer, Moses: HABSBURG EMPIRE; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA ORTHODOX Sokolnikov, Grigory: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION
 Sokolov, Mikhoel-Ber: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Sokolov, Nahum: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
 Sokolover, Efrayim: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Sokolow, Anna: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL; DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Sokolow, Nahum: TEL AVIV
 Solman, Joseph: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 *Solomon: AMMON; ANOINTMENT; BATHSHEBA; BLESSINGS, BEFORE AND AFTER MEALS; CANAAN, CANAANITES; CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF; COCHIN JEWS; DAVID; ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF; ETHICAL WILLS; ETHIOPIA; GARDENS; GENESIS, BOOK OF; INDIA; ISLAM AND JUDAISM; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JEROBOAM; JERUSALEM: BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; KINGS, BOOKS OF; MAGIC; PHOENICIA, PHOENICIANS;

 PROSTITUTION: HEBREW BIBLE THROUGH MIDDLE AGES;
 PROVERBS, BOOK OF; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; QUEEN OF SHEBA; REHOBAM; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SHECHEM; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD; SONG OF SONGS, BOOK OF; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; TRIBES, TWELVE; UNITED MONARCHY; WORSHIP
 Solomon ben Abraham: JONAH BEN ABRAHAM GERONDI
 Solomon ben Aderet (Rashba): EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN; TEFILLIN
 *Solomon ben Isaac: See Rashi
 Solomon ben Meshullam Da Piera: LITERATURE, HEBREW: MEDIEVAL SPAIN
 Solomon ha-Bavli: ITALY; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Solomon ha-Levi: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
 Solomon ibn Verga: ITALY
 Solomon, Hannah: CHICAGO
 Soloveitchik, Chaim of Brisk: SOLOVEITCHIK, JOSEPH B.; TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
 *Soloveitchik, Joseph Baer: AESTHETICS; ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; GOD; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX; TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN Soloveitchik, Moshe: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
 Someck, Ronny: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Somekh, Sasson: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAḤI
 Soncino, Gershom, Joshua Solomon, and Solomon: PRINTING
 Sondheim, Stephen: THEATER: UNITED STATES; THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Sonenberg-Bergson, Temerel: HASIDISM: EUROPE
 Sonnenthal, Adolf von: THEATER: EUROPE
 Sonntag, Jacob: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
 Soutine, Chaim: ART, ISRAELI; ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Soyer, Isaac: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Soyer, Moses: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Soyer, Raphael: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Soyfer, Zalman: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700
 Spahn, Moe: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
 Spektor, Isaac Elhanan: YESHIVA UNIVERSITY
 Spero, Nancy: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Spiegelman, Art: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
 Spiegler, Mordechai: SPORTS: ISRAEL
 Spielberg, Steven: HOLOCAUST EDUCATION: NORTH AMERICA; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
 Spingarn, Joel: UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
 *Spinoza, Baruch: ABRAVANEL FAMILY; AMSTERDAM; CHOSENNESS; GOD; LITERATURE: CANADA; CRESCAS, HASDAI BEN ABRAHAM; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA; SECULARISM; THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN; THOUGHT, MODERN Spire, André: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Spira, Hadassah: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Spiro, Melford: ANTHROPOLOGY
 Spitz, Mark: CELEBRITIES
 Springall, Alejandro: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Stagnaro, Juan Bautista: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
 Stalin, Joseph: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE; EHRENBURG, ILYA; JEWISH ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE; HOLOCAUST; SOVIET UNION; TROTSKY

- Stangl, Franz: HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; SOBIBÓR; TREBLINKA
- Stanton, Frank: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
- Stavans, Ilan: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Stavinsky, Alexandre: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Steel, Ronald: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
- Steinberg, Alicia: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Stein, Gertrude: POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Stein, Joseph: THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
- Steinberg, Jacob: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
- Steinberg, Milton: ELISHA BEN ABUYA; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Steiner, George: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Steinfeld, J. J.: LITERATURE: CANADA
- Steinhardt, Jacob: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART, ISRAELI
- Steinmetz, E. M. A.: FASHION
- Steinsaltz, Adin: RABBINIC ORDINATION
- Steinthal, S.: COHEN, HERMANN
- Stematzky, Avigdor: ART, ISRAELI
- Stenberg, Peter: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Stern, Aaron: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Stern, Avraham (Yair): ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
- Stern, Bill: SPORTSCASTERS
- Stern, David: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Stern, G. B.: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Stern, Mendel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
- Stern, Steve: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- Sternberg, Harry: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
- Sternberg, Sarah Frankel: HASIDISM, EUROPE: WOMEN
- Sternharz, Nathan: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Sternheim, Carl: THEATER: EUROPE
- Stevens, George: FRANK, ANNE; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Stevens, Wallace: POETRY: UNITED STATES
- Stewart, Jon: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
- Stieglitz, Alfred: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
- Stih, Renata: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Stiller, Ben: ENTERTAINMENT
- Stollman, Aryeh Lev: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; LITERATURE: CANADA; LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900)
- Stone, George: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL
- Strabo: ALEXANDRIA, ANCIENT
- Strand, Paul: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Strasberg, Lee: THEATER: UNITED STATES
- *Straus, Isidor, Jesse, Lazarus, Nathan: STRAUS FAMILY
- *Straus, Oscar: STRAUS FAMILY; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
- Straus, Sylvia: HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA
- *Strauss, Leo: FRANKFURT AM MAIN; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL
- Strauss, Levi: FASHION; UNITED STATES, WESTERN
- Streichman, Yehezkel: ART, ISRAELI
- Streisand, Barbra: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; FILM: UNITED STATES; PLATE 20
- Streusand, Ira: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Strindberg, August: LITERATURE, SCANDINAVIA
- Struck, Hermann: ART, TWENTIETH CENTURY EUROPE
- Sturym, James: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Styron, William: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Sugarman, Lou: SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL
- Sugihara, Chiune (Sempo): HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- *Sulam, Sarra Copia: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
- Sullivan, Louis: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY
- Sulzberger, Arthur Hays: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES
- Sulzberger, Arthur (Punch) Ochs: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES
- Sulzberger, Arthur Ochs, Jr.: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES
- Sulzberger, Mayer: PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
- Sulzer, Salomon: CANTOR, CANTORATE: CONTEMPORARY; CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS; MUSIC, SYNAGOGUE
- Süsskind von Trimberg: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
- Sussman, Eliezer: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Sutro, Adolph: SAN FRANCISCO
- Sutzkever, Avrom: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE; LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY; POETRY, YIDDISH
- Sverdlov, Yakov: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION
- Svirsky, Gila: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Swope, Herbert Bayard: JOURNALISM: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE)
- Syberberg, H. J.: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Sylvanus, Erwin: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Sylvia, Sarah: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Symmachus: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Szábo, István: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II); HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Szajna, József: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Szichman, Mario: LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Szirtes, George: POETRY: BRITAIN
- Szold, Benjamin and Sophie Schaar: SZOLD, HENRIETTA
- *Szold, Henrietta: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY; NURSING: UNITED STATES; ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA; UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
- Szpilman, Wladyslaw: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
- Szwarcbart, Herman: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Tabak, David: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Tabib, Mordechai: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Tabick, Jacqueline: RABBINIC ORDINATION OF WOMEN
- Tabori, George: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; THEATER: EUROPE
- Tafdup, Pia: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Taitatzak, Joseph: OTTOMAN EMPIRE; THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Tajar, Ziona: ART, ISRAELI
- Talmon, Yaakov: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
- Talmud, Blanche: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- *Tamar (Genesis 38): MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; PROSTITUTES, PROSTITUTION: HEBREW BIBLE THROUGH MIDDLE AGES; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS; WOMEN, ANCIENT: ISRAELITE
- *Tamar (2 Samuel): LOVE; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Tamiris, Helen: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Tammuz, Benjamin: ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Tanai, Levi: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Tannenbaum, Andrew: INTERNET
- Taphath: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Tarfon, R.: CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
- Tartas, David de Castro: PRINTING
- Tarras, Dave: MUSIC, POPULAR
- Taslitzky, Boris: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Taubman, Craig: MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
- Tavares, Morton: JAMAICA
- Taykhtahl, Yissakhar: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Taylor, C. P.: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA
- Taylor, Paul: DANCE: UNITED STATES

- Tchernikhovsky, Saul: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW; SECULARISM
- Tehomi, Avraham: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
- Teitelbaum, Joel: ḤASIDISM: EUROPE; HOLOCAUST:
THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA ORTHODOX
- Tekinalp, Moïse Cohen: OTTOMAN EMPIRE
- Teller, Y. L.: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: FROM 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
- Tenn, William: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Terah: ABRAHAM; SARAH
- Terk, Sonia: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Terna, Frederick: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
- Terquem, Lazare: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Terquem, Olry: JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE
- Teutsch, David: JUDAISM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST
- Thaarup, Thomas: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Thalberg, Irving: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Theodotion: BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS
- Theodotos: SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT
- Thiers, Adolphe: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
- Thing, Morton: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Thomashefsky, Bessie: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Thomashefsky, Boris: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; THEATER,
YIDDISH
- Tiberius Julius Alexander: PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA
- Tian, Ai: CHINA
- Tiempo, César: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA
- Tiglath-Pileser II: ASSYRIA
- Tilzer, Albert (Gumbinski) von: SPORTS, UNITED STATES:
BASEBALL
- Timerman, Jacobo: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN
AMERICA
- Tiktiner, Rivkah bas Meir: PRAGUE; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN
EUROPE
- Tirosh-Samuelson, Hava: THOUGHT, MODERN
- Tirzah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Titus: JEWISH WAR, FIRST; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE
- *Tobiads
- Todrosi, Todros: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES
- Tofel, Jennings: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Toledano, Eliezer: PRINTING
- Tolkin, Viktor: HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS
- Toller, Ernst: THEATER: EUROPE
- Tolstoy, Leo: KOOK, ABRAHAM ISAAC; OZ, AMOS
- Topol: FILM: UNITED STATES
- Torres, Luis de: COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER; JAMAICA
- Touro, Isaac: NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND
- Touro, Judah: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
- Tousk, Jacob: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS TO 1700
- Toussenel, Alphonse: ANTISEMITISM: France, 1789–1939
- Touvier, Paul: HOLOCAUST TRIALS
- Tracy, Arthur: RADIO: UNITED STATES
- Trager, Abraham Isaac: FASHION
- Treitel, Jonathan: POETRY: BRITAIN
- Treitschke, Heinrich von: ANTISEMITISM; GRAETZ, HEINRICH
- Trendelenburg, Adolf: COHEN, HERMANN
- Trilling, Lionel: MENORAH ASSOCIATION
- Trocme, André: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS
- *Trotsky, Leon: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION; EHRENBURG, ILYA; RUSSIA; SAINT PETERSBURG
- Trotta, Marcelo: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Trotta, Margarethe von: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
- Truffaut, François: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
- Truman, Harry S.: HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS IN AMERICA;
ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE;
UNITED STATES: POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT; UNITED STATES
PRESIDENTS; WEIZMANN, CHAIM; ZIONISM: UNITED STATES
- Trumpeldor, Yosef: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF: YOUTH MOVEMENTS
- Trunk, Y. Y.: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Trypho: HASMONEAN DYNASTY
- Tsalka, Dan: LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
- Tschacbasov, Nahum: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Tsvetaeva, Marina: LITERATURE: BRITAIN
- Tsimerman, Hayim Yisrael: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Tucker, Richard: CELEBRITIES
- Tucker, Sophie: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; FILM: UNITED STATES; THEATER: UNITED STATES
- Tumarkin, Igaël: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART; ART, ISRAELI
- Tur-Malka, Ayin (Aliza Greenberg): LITERATURE, HEBREW:
WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010
- Turk, Nathan: FASHION
- Turk, Rifat: SPORTS: ISRAEL
- Turkov, Mark: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH
- Turkow, Jonas: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Turkow, Mark: ARGENTINA
- Turkow, Zygmunt: THEATER, YIDDISH
- Turturro, John: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II)
- Tuviah ha-Cohen: THOUGHT, EARLY MODERN
- Uhry, Alfred: MORTARA AFFAIR; THEATER: UNITED STATES;
THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS; UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN
- Ulitksaya, Lyudmila: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION
(IN RUSSIAN); LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE
- Ullman, Liv: FILM: EUROPE (POST-WORLD WAR II);
LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
- Ullman, Micha: ART, ISRAELI
- Ulmer, Edgar G.: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
- Umar II: DHIMMI
- Unsdorfer, Shlomoh Zalman: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
- Uri, Aviva: ART, ISRAELI
- Uri, Bezalel ben: ART, ISRAELI
- Uriah: BATHSHEBA; DAVID; DAVID: POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS
- Uris, Leon: FILM: UNITED STATES; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
- Ury, Lesser: ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY
- Utevsky, Lev: SOVIET UNION: JEWISH MOVEMENT, 1967–1989
- Uziel, Danny: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Uziel, Judah: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
- Uzziah: EDOM
- Vagnenkos, Alejandro: FILM: LATIN AMERICA
- Valabrègue, Albin: THEATER: EUROPE
- Valentinus: GNOSTICISM
- Vall, Claudia: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- Valle, David: LUZZATTO, MOSES ḤAYYIM
- Vanzetti, Bartolomeo: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
- Vapnyar, Lara: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
- Vardi, Yair: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
- Varnhagen, Rahel Levin: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); WOMEN, MODERN:
CENTRAL EUROPE
- Vashti: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
- Veen, Jan: DANCE: UNITED STATES
- *Verbmacher, Hannah Rachel: ḤASIDISM, EUROPE: WOMEN;
MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND
- Verbitsky, Bernardo: LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA

- Vertlib, Vladimir: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Vespasian: JEWISH WAR, FIRST; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE
 Veuillot, Louise: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
 Victor, Meir: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
 *Vilna Gaon, Elijah ben Solomon Zalman: BALTIC STATES; ETHICAL WILLS; ḤASIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; MUSAR
 MOVEMENT; TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES;
 VILNA; ZALMAN, SCHNEUR BEN BARUCH
 Visconti, Luchino: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
 Vishniac, Roman: PHOTOGRAPHY
 Vital, Ḥayyim ben Joseph: DYBBUK; KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC; LURIA, ISAAC; NUMEROLOGY (GEMATRIA);
 SAFED; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND
 Vital, Shabetay ben Yaacob: LITERATURE, LADINO
 Vitkind, Hillel: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Vivelin “The Red” of Strasbourg: MONEY LENDING: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 Vizonsky, Nathan: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 Vogel, David: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
 Vogel, Julius: NEW ZEALAND
 Voinovich, Vladimir: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION
 (IN RUSSIAN)
 Voorsanger, Elkan C.: UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY
 Vrba, Rudolf: HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE
 Waszynski, Michal: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE
 Waddington, Miriam: LITERATURE: CANADA
 Wajcman, Gérard: LITERATURE: FRANCE
 Wajsbrot, Cécile: LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE;
 LITERATURE: FRANCE
 *Wald, Lillian: DANCE: UNITED STATES; NURSING: UNITED STATES; SOCIAL WORK: UNITED STATES
 Waldenberg, Eliezer: ABORTION
 Waldman, Ayelet: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Waldman, JT: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS; LITERATURE:
 POPULAR FICTION
 Waldman, Louis Labelle: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; MUSIC, RELIGIOUS
 Waldman, Suzyn: SPORTSCASTERS
 Walkowitz, Abraham: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940
 Wallach, Yonah: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS,
 1882–2010; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Wallant, Edward Lewis: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE:
 FICTION
 Wallenberg, Raoul: JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE;
 HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 TELEVISION
 Wallich, Isaac: LITERATURE, YIDDISH: BEGINNINGS
 TO 1700
 Walter, Bruno: BERLIN
 Walter, Hubert: ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES
 Walzer, Michael: BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE
 Wandor, Michelene: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Warburg, Felix M.: JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE
 Warburg, Frieda Schiff: JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
 Warfield, David: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Warhol, Andy: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940
 Warner, Harry and Jack: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Warski, Adolf: COMMUNISM: EASTERN EUROPE
 Washington, Booker T.: UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT
 Washington, George: NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS
 Waskow, Arthur: ETHICS, ENVIRONMENTAL; JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT
 Wasserman, Elhanan: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Wasserman, Jacob: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Wasserstein, Wendy: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); THEATER: UNITED STATES;
 THEATER, UNITED STATES: PLAYWRIGHTS
 Wästberg, Per: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Waszynski, Michal: DYBBUK
 Weaver, Pat: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION
 Weber, Joe: THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Weber, Max: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; PLATE 16
 Weichert, Mikhl: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Weidman, Jerome: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Weil, Godchaux: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
 Weill, Kurt: BERLIN; THEATER: UNITED STATES
 Weinberg, Yehiel: BERKOVITS, ELIEZER
 Weinfeld, Abraham: HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES
 Weinfeld, Yocheved: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Weininger, Otto: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Weinreich, Uriel: YIDDISH DICTIONARIES
 Weinstein, Gal: ART, ISRAELI
 Weisel, Mindy: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART
 Weislitz, Yankev: THEATER, YIDDISH
 Weiss, Peter: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA;
 LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Weissbort, Daniel: POETRY: BRITAIN
 Weissler, Chava: WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE
 *Weizmann, Chaim: BALFOUR DECLARATION; BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; BUBER, MARTIN; EINSTEIN, ALBERT; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS; JERUSALEM, 1948–1967; ZIONISM; ZIONISM: UNITED STATES
 Weltsch, Felix: BUBER, MARTIN
 *Wengeroff, Pauline: WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE
 Wentworth, Frederick: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Werfel, Franz: HABSBURG EMPIRE; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
 Wergeland, Henrik: LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA
 Wertheim, Noa: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Wertheimer, Jack: EDUCATION, NORTH AMERICA:
 SUPPLEMENTAL SCHOOLS
 Wertheimer, Samson: HABSBURG EMPIRE
 Wesker, Arnold: LITERATURE: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN
 Wessely, Naphtali Herz: BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES
 TO 1800; HASKALAH; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
 Wetzler, Alfred: HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE
 White, William Charles: CHINA
 Wieler, Jossi: THEATER: EUROPE
 Wiener, Hans: DANCE: UNITED STATES
 *Wiesel, Elie: ARGENTINA; CELEBRITIES; HOLOCAUST
 LITERATURE: FICTION; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION:
 TELEVISION; HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES;
 LITERATURE: FRANCE; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: YIDDISH; PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE); THEOLOGY
 Wieseltier, Meir: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Wigman, Mary: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
 Wilbushewitz, Mania: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
 Wilder, Gene: FILM: UNITED STATES
 Willette, Adolphe: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939
 Williams, Sir Evan Owen: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
 Williams, Hank: FASHION
 Williams, William Carlos: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
 Wilson, Woodrow: BRANDEIS, LOUIS D.; STRAUS FAMILY; UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS; WORLD WAR I: IMPACT ON AMERICAN JEWS
 Wimpfin, Alexander: MEIR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG
 Wine, Sherwin: JUDAISM, HUMANISTIC
 Winograd, Garry: ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; PHOTOGRAPHY
 Winston, H.: ḤASIDISM: NORTH AMERICA

- Winters, Shelley: FILM: UNITED STATES
Wirth, Christian: BEŁŻEC
*Wise, Isaac Meyer: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; CHICAGO; CUSTOM (MINHAG); HEBREW UNION COLLEGE-JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA; PERIODICALS: UNITED STATES (ENGLISH LANGUAGE); UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN Wise, Stephen: ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA
Wiseman, Adele: LITERATURE: CANADA
Witch of Endor: MAGIC Wohl, Herman: THEATER, YIDDISH
Wolf, Emma: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
Wolfe, Humbert: POETRY: BRITAIN
Wolfskehl, Karl: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE
Wolfssohn, Aaron: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
Wolpe, Michael: ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT
Wouk, Herman: FILM: UNITED STATES; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION; LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
Wright, Frank Lloyd: SYNAGOGUES: TWENTIETH CENTURY
Wyschogrod, Michael: AESTHETICS; THOUGHT, MODERN Xiphilinus: JEWISH WAR, SECOND
Yaffe, James: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
Yahalom, Lipa: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
Yahia, Mona: MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: MIZRAHI
Yamposky, Berta: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Yanait, Rahel: LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948
*Yehoshua, A. B.: ADULTERY; ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; FILM: ISRAEL; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION
Yelin-Mor, Nathan: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES
Yellin, David: ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT
Yellin, Tamar: LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA)
Yevtyshenko, Yevgeny: HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY
Yeziarska, Anzia: LITERATURE: UNITED STATES (SINCE 1900); LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA); LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY
Yizhar, S. (Yizhar Smilansky): ARABS: REPRESENTATIONS IN ISRAELI LITERATURE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; LITERATURE, HEBREW: ISRAELI FICTION; LITERATURE, HEBREW: THE YISHUV, 1880–1948; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
Yom Tov Joigney: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE; TOSAFISTS
Yom Tov ibn Aseville: DINA DE-MALKHUTA DINA
Yona, Moshe: LURIA, ISAAC
Yorinks, Arthur: DANCE: UNITED STATES
Yosef, Ovadia: ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES
Young, Andrew: UNITED STATES: AFRICAN AMERICAN – JEWISH RELATIONS
Young, Boaz: THEATER, YIDDISH
Young, Clara: THEATER, YIDDISH
Young, Robert: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM
Youngman, Henny: COMEDY AND COMEDIANS
Youngman, Yossi: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Yulee, David: UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN Yungman, Moshe: POETRY, YIDDISH
Yushkevich, Semyon: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN) Zach, Natan: POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Zadek, Peter: THEATER: EUROPE
Zadok: SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; SADDUCEES
Zahalon, Joseph: MEDICINE
Zaid, Alexander: ISRAEL, STATE OF: MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES Zajczyk, Szymon: SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN
Zakkar ben Ammar: NAGID
*Zalman, Schneur ben Baruch of Liady: DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ; HĀBAD; HĀSIDISM: EUROPE; KABBALAH; LOVE
Zane, Arnie: DANCE: UNITED STATES
*Zangwill, Israel: JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY; LITERATURE: BRITAIN; THEATER: BRITAIN
Zarchi, Nurit: LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; MEMOIR AND LIFE WRITING: HEBREW
Zborowski, Mark: ANTHROPOLOGY
Zebulun: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; LEAH; TRIBES, TWELVE
*Zechariah: ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; PERSIA, ANCIENT; ZERUBBABEL
Zechariah al-Dahiri: POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD
Zederbaum, Alexander: JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: EASTERN EUROPE; LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
Ze'ev, Yehuda Leib ben: LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH
Ze'evi, Arik: SPORTS: ISRAEL
Zeffren, Ilana: LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS
Zefira, Bracha: MUSIC, POPULAR
Zehavi, David: ISRAEL, STATE OF: KIBBUTZ MOVEMENT
Zeira, R.: AMORAIM
Zeira, Mordecai: MUSIC: POPULAR
Zelda (Shneurson Mishkowsky): LITERATURE, HEBREW: WOMEN WRITERS, 1882–2010; POETRY, MODERN HEBREW
Zelophehad: ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Zemach, Benjamin: DANCE: UNITED STATES
Zerah: TAMAR (GENESIS)
Zerahiah ha-Levi: FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES; POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE
*Zerubbabel: APOCRYPHA; ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; EXILE, BABYLONIAN; HAGGAI, BOOK OF; PERSIA, ANCIENT Zeruiah: WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Zev, Yitzhak: TALMUD STUDY: MODERN APPROACHES
Zevid, R.: AMORAIM
Zevit, Ziony: NEAR EAST, ANCIENT
Zhvanetsky, Mikhail: LITERATURE: RUSSIA AND SOVIET UNION (IN RUSSIAN)
Zilpah: ISRAELITES: TRIBES; JACOB; LEAH; TRIBES, TWELVE; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Zimler, Richard: LITERATURE: POPULAR FICTION
Zinberg, Israel: SAINT PETERSBURG
Zinger, Arie: THEATER: EUROPE
Zinoviev, Grigory: BOLSHEVISM: RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND SOVIET UNION
Zipporah: JETHRO; MOSES; WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS
Ziv-Ayal, Ruth: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Zohar, Uri: FILM: ISRAEL
Zola, Émile: ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE, 1789–1939; DREYFUS AFFAIR
Zolotarevsky, Isidore: FILM: YIDDISH-LANGUAGE; THEATER, YIDDISH
Zolotkoff, Leon: CHICAGO
Zorn, John: MUSIC, POPULAR
Zubari, Shahar: SPORTS: ISRAEL
Zuckerman, Nava: DANCE: PRE- AND POST-STATE ISRAEL
Zuckerman, Samuel: TOSEFTA
Zuckor, Adolph: FILM: UNITED STATES

Zukofsky, Louis: POETRY: UNITED STATES

Zündel, Ernst: HOLOCAUST TRIALS

*Zunz, Leopold: GERMANY; KROCHMAL, NACHMAN; THOUGHT, MODERN; WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS

Zur, Dan: ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE

Zwartendijk, Jan: HOLOCAUST RESCUERS

Zweifel, Eliezer: HASKALAH

Zweig, Arnold: LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; THEATER: EUROPE

Zweig, Stefan: HABSBURG EMPIRE; LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE; VIENNA

Zwick, Edward: HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Zwirner, Ernst: SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY

Zworykin, Vladmir: BROADCASTING: RADIO AND TELEVISION