

THE CAMBRIDGE DICTIONARY OF

*Judaism &
Jewish Culture*

EDITED BY
JUDITH R. BASKIN

THE
CAMBRIDGE
DICTIONARY OF JUDAISM
AND
JEWISH CULTURE

The Cambridge Dictionary of Judaism and Jewish Culture is an authoritative and accessible reference work for a twenty-first-century audience. Its entries, written by eminent scholars, define the spiritual and intellectual concepts and the religious movements that distinguish Judaism and the Jewish experience. They cover central personalities and places, formative events, and enduring literary and cultural contributions, and they illuminate the lives of ordinary Jewish women and men. Essays explore Jewish history from ancient times to the present and consider all aspects of Judaism, including religious practices and rituals, legal teachings, legendary traditions, rationalism, mysticism, and messianism. This reference work differs from many others in its broad exploration of the Jewish experience beyond Judaism. Entries discuss secular and political movements and achievements and delineate Jewish endeavors in literature, art, music, theater, dance, film, broadcasting, sports, science, medicine, and ecology, among many other topics from the ancient Near East to the Internet.

Judith R. Baskin is Philip H. Knight Professor of Humanities and Associate Dean for Humanities in the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Oregon. Her books include Pharaoh's Counsellors: Job, Jethro, and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1982) and Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002). She is the editor of Jewish Women in Historical Perspective (1991; 2nd edition, 1998) and Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing (1994) and is coeditor of The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture (with Kenneth Seeskin, 2010), which received the 2010 National Jewish Book Award for anthologies and collections.

THE CAMBRIDGE DICTIONARY OF JUDAISM AND JEWISH CULTURE

EDITOR:

Judith R. Baskin, University of Oregon

SUBEDITORS:

Glenda Abramson, St. Cross College, Oxford University: Literature

Zachary Braiterman, Syracuse University: Modern Jewish Thought

Joseph Dan, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Mysticism

David Engel, New York University: Antisemitism; Holocaust

Isaiah Gafni, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Rabbinic Judaism

Rela Mintz Geffen, Baltimore Hebrew Institute, Towson University, Emerita: Religious Life and Practice

Sara R. Horowitz, York University: Literature

Ephraim Kanarfogel, Yeshiva University: Medieval and Early Modern Europe

Carol Meyers, Duke University: Bible and Ancient Near East

Pamela S. Nadell, American University: Contemporary Religious Movements

Jonathan D. Sarna, Brandeis University: The Americas

Lawrence H. Schiffman, Yeshiva University: Second Temple Period

Jeffrey Shandler, Rutgers University: Popular Culture

Anita Shapira, Tel Aviv University: Modern Middle East; Israel

Norman Stillman, University of Oklahoma: The Muslim World

Steven J. Zipperstein, Stanford University: Europe, 1800 to the Present

THE
CAMBRIDGE
DICTIONARY OF JUDAISM
AND JEWISH CULTURE

Edited by
JUDITH R. BASKIN
University of Oregon

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, São Paulo, Delhi, Tokyo, Mexico City
Cambridge University Press
32 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10013-2473, USA www.cambridge.org
Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9780521825979

© Judith R. Baskin 2011

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2011

Printed in the United States of America

A catalog record for this publication is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication data

The Cambridge dictionary of Judaism and Jewish culture / [edited by] Judith R. Baskin.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-521-82597-9 (hardback)

1. Judaism – Dictionaries. I. Baskin, Judith Reesa, 1950– II. Title.

BM 50.C26 2011

909'.04924 – dc22 2010047383

ISBN 978-0-521-82597-9 Hardback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet Web sites referred to in this publication and does not guarantee that any content on such Web sites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

CONTENTS

Plates and Maps	page ix
Contributors	xiii
Preface	xxvii
How to Use This Book	xxix
A Note on Transliteration	xxxix
Abbreviations	xxxiii
Entries	1
Index of Names	677

PLATES AND MAPS

Plates

- 1 ASTARTE FIGURINES. Judah, Israelite period, 8th century–early 6th century BCE. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession numbers: 68.32.4, 64.67/3, 64.67/4 IAA 60–725, 80–2. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Slapak. See ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; CANAAN, CANAANITES; ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; and WOMEN, ANCIENT: BIBLICAL REPRESENTATIONS.
- 2 DEAD SEA SCROLL: The Community Rule (detail). Qumran, 1st century BCE–1st century CE. Parchment. The Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession number: 96.83/208A. Photo © The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. See ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; and QUMRAN.
- 3 SYNAGOGUE MOSAIC FLOOR (detail): The central shrine (possibly a Torah ark) and the menorahs, shofars, and incense shovels symbolize the Jerusalem Temple and expectation of messianic redemption. Beth Shean, Byzantine period, 6th century CE. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. IAA Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; BYZANTINE EMPIRE; DECAPOLIS CITIES; MENORAH; MESSIANISM: BIBLICAL AND SECOND TEMPLE ERAS; SHOFAR; and SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT.
- 4 THE REGENSBURG PENTATEUCH: This depiction of Aaron the High Priest lighting the Tabernacle menorah, with Tabernacle implements, invokes a rebuilt Temple and future redemption. Regensburg, Bavaria, Germany, ca. 1300 CE. Pen and ink, tempera and gold leaf on vellum. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Accession number: B05.0009; 180/05. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by David Harris. See AARON; ART: MEDIEVAL MANUSCRIPT ILLUSTRATION; MENORAH; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; and TEMPLE, SECOND.
- 5 PASSOVER PLATE. Spain, ca. 1480. Earthenware. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Jakob Michael, New York, in memory of his wife, Erna Sondheimer-Michael. Accession number: B65.12.0483; 134/057. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Slapak. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; PASSOVER; and SPAIN, CHRISTIAN.
- 6 BRIDAL CASKET (cofanetto) represents from right to left the three duties incumbent on Jewish women: ḥallah (putting aside a portion of the Sabbath dough); niddah; and hadlakat ha-ner (kindling Sabbath lights). North Italy, late 15th century. Cast and engraved silver, niello, partly gilt. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Astorre Mayer, Milan. Accession number: B51.04.0207; 131/030. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See ITALY; NIDDAH; SABBATH; IMMERSION, RITUAL: WOMEN; MIKVEH; and WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM.
- 7 MAḤZOR CORFU: Elijah sounding a shofar while leading the Messiah into Jerusalem. Corfu, Greece, 1709. Courtesy of The Library of The Jewish Theological Seminary. See ELIJAH:

- BIBLICAL AND POST-BIBLICAL TRADITIONS; GREECE; MESSIANISM: EARLY MODERN; PRAYER BOOKS; SHOFAR; and WORSHIP.
- 8 TORAH FINIALS (rimonim). Cochin, India, 18th century–19th century. Gold: repoussé, cutout and engraved; tin backing. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART64627. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; COCHIN JEWS; INDIA; and TORAH.
 - 9 Israel Dov Rosenbaum, MIZRAH (an ornamental plaque on the wall of a synagogue or home indicating east [mizrah], the direction of prayer). Podkamen, Ukraine, 1877. Paint, ink, and pencil on cutout paper. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Helen W. Finkel in memory of Israel Dov Rosenbaum and Bessie Rosenbaum Finkel. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NYART312632. See SYNAGOGUES: NINETEENTH CENTURY; SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN; and WORSHIP.
 - 10 ḤANUKKAH LAMP. Central Anti-Atlas Mountains (?), Morocco, 19th century–early 20th century. Copper alloy: cast and enameled. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Dr. Harry G. Friedman. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART392475. See CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; CEREMONIAL OBJECTS: ISLAMIC LANDS; ḤANUKKAH; and NORTH AFRICA.
 - 11 Ze'ev Raban (1890–1970), ḤANUKKAH LAMP. Bezalel School, Jerusalem, early 1920s. Copper alloy: die-stamped. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Dr. Harry G. Friedman, F 5455. Location: NY, U.S.A. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART392476. See ART, ISRAELI; CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; and ḤANUKKAH.
 - 12 Isidor Kaufmann (1853–1921), FRIDAY EVENING, ca. 1920. Oil on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Schweitzer, JM 4–63. Photo: John Parnell. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART58316. See ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY; SABBATH; and WOMEN, MODERN: EASTERN EUROPE.
 - 13 El (Eleazar) Lissitzky (1890–1941), HAD GADYA SUITE (Tale of a Goat): Depiction of “Father bought a kid for two zuzim,” 1919. Lithograph on paper. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Leonard E. and Phyllis S. Greenberg, 1986–121c. Location: NY, U.S.A. © Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART154902. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; ART: ILLUSTRATED YIDDISH BOOKS: “Modern Era”; and PASSOVER.
 - 14 Marc Chagall (1887–1985), WHITE CRUCIFIXION, 1938. Oil on canvas. The Art Institute of Chicago. Gift of Alfred S. Alschuler, 1946.925. Photography © The Art Institute of Chicago. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; POGROM; RUSSIA and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.
 - 15 Jacques Lipchitz (1891–1973), THE SACRIFICE, 1949–57. Bronze. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Albert A. List, JM 16–65. Photo: Richard Goodbody, Inc. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART312382. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.
 - 16 Max Weber (1881–1961), STILL LIFE WITH CHALLAH, ca. 1930. Oil on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Joy S. Weber, 1994–59. Photo Credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART392477. See ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; and SABBATH.
 - 17 Lee Krasner (1908–1984), SELF-PORTRAIT, ca. 1930. Oil on linen. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Purchase: Esther Leah Ritz Bequest; B. Gerald Cantor, Lady Kathleen Epstein, and Louis E. and Rosalyn M. Schecter Gifts. Location: NY, U.S.A. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART379662. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940.
 - 18 Ben Shahn (1898–1969), NEW YORK, 1947. Tempera on paper mounted on panel. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Purchase: Oscar and Regina Gruss Charitable and Educational Foundation Fund, 1996–23. Photo: John Parnell. Photo credit: The Jewish

- Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART132848. See ART, AMERICAN: BEFORE 1940; and ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and NEW YORK CITY.
- 19 Leonard Baskin (1922–2000), THE ALTAR, 1977. Lindenwood: carved and laminated. Location: The Jewish Museum, New York City. Photo credit: © Estate of the artist. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART.
 - 20 Deborah Kass (b. 1952), SIX BLUE BARBRAS (THE JEWISH JACKIE SERIES), 1992. Screen print and acrylic on canvas. The Jewish Museum, New York City. Gift of Seth Cohen, 2004–10. Photo: Richard Goodbody, Inc. Photo credit: The Jewish Museum, NY/Art Resource, NY ART334071. See ART, AMERICAN: SINCE 1940; and CELEBRITIES.
 - 21 Ephraim Moses Lilien (1874–1925), SKETCH FOR A CARPET (triptych; dedicated to Mr. and Mrs. David Wolffson): right: GALUT [exile], center: ALLEGORICAL WEDDING, left: LIBERATION, 1906. Oil and pencil on canvas. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. Accession number: B88.0279. See ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY; and ART, ISRAELI.
 - 22 Reuven Rubin (1893–1974), FIRST FRUITS (triptych): right: SERENITY (THE BEDOUINE); center: FRUIT OF THE LAND; left: THE SHEPHERD, 1923. Oil on canvas. Rubin Museum Collection, Tel Aviv. See ART, ISRAELI.
 - 23 Itzhak Danziger (1916–1977), NIMROD, 1939. Nubian sandstone. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of Dr. H. David Orgler, Zurich and Jerusalem. © Estate of the artist. Accession number: B81.0600. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem by Nahum Slapak. See ART, ISRAELI.
 - 24 Mordecai Ardon (1896–1992), AT THE GATES OF JERUSALEM (triptych): right: SIGN; center: LADDERS; left: ROCK, 1967. Oil on canvas. The Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Gift of the artist in honor of Israel's twentieth anniversary and the reunification of Jerusalem. © Estate of the artist. Accession number: B67.0546. Photo © The Israel Museum Jerusalem. See ART, ISRAELI.

Maps

1 Ancient Near East	page xxxv
2 Divided Monarchy (ca. 920–730 BCE)	xxxvi
3 Hasmonean Dynasty under Alexander Jannaeus (ca. 176–103 BCE)	xxxvii
4 The Mediterranean World in Late Antiquity (ca. 200 CE)	xxxviii
5 Jewish Centers in the Geonic Period (750–1040 CE)	xxxviii
6 Jewish Centers in Medieval Spain (ca. 1200)	xxxix
7 Jewish Centers in Medieval Europe	xl
8 Jewish Centers in Early Modern Europe (17th century)	xli
9 Jewish Centers in the Ottoman Empire (ca. 1600)	xl ii
10 Emancipation of European Jews	xl iii
11 Pale of Settlement (1791–1917)	xl iv
12 1947 UN Partition Plan for Palestine	xl v
13 State of Israel: Armistice Lines, 1949	xl vi
14 State of Israel and Occupied Territories, 1967	xl vii

Color plates follow page 336.

CONTRIBUTORS

- Philip I. Ackerman-Lieberman, Vanderbilt University: Masorah, Masoretes, Nagid
- Howard Tzvi Adelman, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario: Ascarelli, Devorà; Modena, Leon; Sulam, Sarra Copia
- Eliyana Adler, United States Holocaust Museum: Prostitutes, Prostitution: Modern Era
- Reuben Aharoni, The Ohio State University, Emeritus: Yemen
- Phyllis Cohen Albert, Harvard University: Antisemitism: France, 1789–1939; Emancipation: France; France: 1789–1939; France: Consistories (1806–1939); Jewish Studies: France (Nineteenth Century); Judaism, Reform: France; Synagogues: France; Zionism: France
- Natalia Aleksium-Madrzak, New York University: Yizkor Books
- Elizabeth Shanks Alexander, University of Virginia, Charlottesville: Mishnah
- Rebecca T. Alpert, Temple University: Judaism, Reconstructionist; Reconstructionist Rabbinical College
- Ziva Amishai-Maisels, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Holocaust Representation: Art
- Joyce Antler, Brandeis University: Szold, Henrietta
- Yaakov Ariel, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill: Interfaith Dialogue: United States
- Allan Arkush, Binghamton University, SUNY: Strauss, Leo; Zionism
- Nehama Aschkenasy, University of Connecticut, Stamford: Literature, Hebrew: Women Writers, 1882–2010
- Dianne N. Ashton, Rowan University: Philadelphia
- Karen Auerbach, University of Michigan: Poland; Warsaw
- Ilan Avisar, Tel Aviv University: Holocaust Representation: Film
- Merle Lyn Bachman, Spalding University: Poetry, Yiddish
- Gershon Bacon, Bar-Ilan University: Agudat Israel
- Carol Bakhos, University of California, Los Angeles: Ishmael: Rabbinic Traditions; Rabbinic Literature: Midrash
- Daphne Barak-Erez, Tel Aviv University: Israel, State of: Judicial System
- Israel Bartal, Hebrew University: Council of Four Lands and Council of Lithuania
- Judith R. Baskin, University of Oregon: Abortion; Abraham; Adoption; Adultery; Agunah; Alphabet of Ben Sira; Amos, Book of; Balaam; Beruriah; Betrothal; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Bride and Bridegroom; Chagall, Bella Rosenfeld; Death and Mourning; Divorce: Historical Development; Education, Girls: Medieval and Early Modern; Eve; Exilarch; Glückel of Hameln; Hagar; Hanukkah and Women; Hasidism, Europe: Women; Head Covering: Women; Herem ha-Yishuv; Immersion, Ritual: Women; Infertility; Isaac the Blind; Israel,

- Land of; Israel, State of: Immigration before 1948; Jacob ben Asher; Jethro; JEWISH STUDIES; Job: Rabbinic Traditions; Jonas, Regina; Judaism; Kallah Months; Ketubbah; Leiser, Isaac; Lilith; Marriage, Levirate; Palestine; Purity and Impurity; Rebbetzin; Rossi, Azariah dei; Samuel ibn Naghrela ha-Nagid; Sanhedrin; Simḥat Bat; Tikkun Olam: Contemporary Understandings; Torah; Verbermacher, Hannah Rachel; Wengeroff, Pauline Epstein; Women: Early Modern Europe; Women: Middle Ages; Women, Modern: Britain and North America; Women: Pre- and Post-State Israel; Zephaniah
- Samantha Baskind, Cleveland State University: Art, American: Before 1940; Art, American: Since 1940
- Sigrid Bauschinger, University of Massachusetts, Amherst: Lasker-Shüler, Else
- Diane Baxter, University of Oregon: Anthropology
- Michael J. Bazyler, Chapman University School of Law: Holocaust Reparations and Restitution
- Daniel Beer, University College London: Beilis Trial
- Michael Beizer, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Dubnow, Simon; Joint Distribution Committee; Saint Petersburg; Soviet Union: Jewish Movement, 1967–1989
- Dean Phillip Bell, Spartus Institute of Jewish Studies: Conversion: Early Modern Period; Court Jews; Messianism: Early Modern
- Elissa Bemporad, Queens College, CUNY: Belorussia
- Mara H. Benjamin, St. Olaf College: Rosenzweig, Franz
- Evelyn Rose Benson, Independent Scholar: Nursing: United States
- Michael Berenbaum, Sigi Ziering Institute: Holocaust Representation: Television
- Nancy E. Berg, Washington University: Memoir and Life Writing: Mizraḥi
- David Berger, Yeshiva University: Middle Ages: Jewish–Christian Polemics
- Wendy H. Bergoffen, Mount Holyoke College: Crime and Criminals: United States
- Joel Berkowitz, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee: Theater, Yiddish
- Andrew Berns, University of Pennsylvania: Medicine
- Paul F. Bessemer, Hillel Foundation, University of Oregon: Sabbateanism (Ottoman Empire and Turkey)
- Henry Bial, University of Kansas: Television: United States
- Asher D. Biemann, University of Virginia: Buber, Martin
- Gideon Biger, Tel Aviv University: Israel, State of: Agricultural Settlements, 1878–1948
- Ellen Birnbaum, Independent Scholar: Philo of Alexandria
- Miriam Bodian, University of Texas, Austin: Amsterdam
- Linda J. Borish, Western Michigan University: Sports, United States: Women
- Olga Borovaya, Stanford University: Journalism, Ladino (Ottoman Empire)
- Ra’anan Boustan, University of California, Los Angeles: Temple, Second
- Steven R. Bowman, University of Cincinnati: Byzantine Empire
- Zachary Braiterman, Syracuse University: Aesthetics; God; Rubenstein, Richard L.
- Ross Brann, Cornell University: Dunash ben Labrat; Ibn Gabirol, Solomon; Poetry, Medieval: Muslim World
- Michael Brenner, Ludwig Maximilian University, Munich: Graetz, Heinrich; Zunz, Leopold
- Marc Brettler, Brandeis University: Aramaic; Bible: Prayer Language; Hebrew, Biblical; Psalms, Book of
- Tobias Brinkmann, Pennsylvania State University: Chicago
- Adriana M. Brodsky, St. Mary’s College of Maryland: Argentina

- Robert Brody, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Gaon, Geonim, Geonic Academies; Hai ben Sherira; Pumbedita; Saboraim
- Daniel M. Bronstein, Congregation Beth Elohim, Brooklyn, New York: Comedy and Comedians; United States: Military Chaplaincy
- Judith Bronstein, University of Haifa: Middle Ages: Crusades
- Emily Budick, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Literature: United States (since 1900)
- Stephen G. Burnett, University of Nebraska, Lincoln: Christian Hebraism; Reformation
- Sean Burt, University of Arizona: Chronicles, Books of; Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of; Jacob; Jonah, Book of; Moses; Phoenicia, Phoenicians; Solomon
- Lisa Rubenstein Calevi, Independent Scholar: Luzzatto, Samuel David; Mortara Affair
- Eric Caplan, McGill University: Prayer Books: United States
- Nina Caputo, University of Florida: Naḥmanides (Moses ben Naḥman)
- Michael Carasik, Independent Scholar: Bible: Wisdom Literature; Ecclesiastes, Book of; Job, Book of; Proverbs, Book of
- Shalom Carmy, Yeshiva University: Berkovits, Eliezer; Soloveitchik, Joseph B.: Religious Thought
- Jerome A. Chanes, Brandeis University: Organizations: North America
- Yael Chaver, University of California at Berkeley: Literature, Yiddish: The Yishuv
- Robert Chazan, New York University: Middle Ages: Demography
- Carmel U. Chiswick, University of Illinois at Chicago, Emerita: United States: Economic Life
- Adina Cimet, YIVO Institute for Jewish Research: Mexico
- Amos Cohen, Independent Scholar: Film: Europe (Post–World War II)
- Beth B. Cohen, California State University, Northridge: Holocaust Survivors: United States
- Judah M. Cohen, Indiana University: Music, Popular
- Lisa Cohen, Abraham Joshua Heschel High School, New York: Shtetl; Women, Modern: Eastern Europe
- Michael R. Cohen, Tulane University: Boston; Marshall, Louis; Straus Family; United States: Fraternal Societies; United States: Sephardim
- John J. Collins, Yale University: Bel and the Dragon; Eschatology: Second Temple Period; Sibylline Oracles
- Sandra Collins, Byzantine Catholic Seminary: Esther, Book of; Lamentations, Book of
- Olivia Remie Constable, Notre Dame University: Benjamin of Tudela
- David M. Crowe, Elon University: Auschwitz; Bełżec; Chełmno; Holocaust; Holocaust: Camps and Killing Centers; Holocaust Rescuers; Holocaust: Roma; Kristallnacht; Majdanek; Schindler, Oskar; Sobibór; Theresienstadt; Treblinka; Wannsee Conference
- Joseph Dan, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Abulafia, Abraham; Adam Kadmon; Baal Shem; Bahir, Sefer ha-; Breaking of the Vessels; Cordovero, Moses; Devekut; Dov Ber of Międzyrzec; Dybbuk; Ein Sof; Golem; Kabbalah; Kabbalah, Lurianic; Luria, Isaac; Luzzatto, Moses Ḥayyim; Metatron; Moses de Leon; Mysticism: Ancient; Mysticism: Hekhalot and Merkavah Literature; Naḥman of Bratslav; Numerology (Gematria); Safed; Samael; Scholem, Gershom Gerhard; Sefer Yetzirah; Sefirot; Tikkun Olam; Tzimtzum; Zalman, Schneur ben Baruch, of Liady; Zohar
- Robert Daum, Vancouver School of Theology: Tosefta
- Marni Davis, Georgia State University: Banking and Banking Houses; Baron de Hirsch Fund

- Sergio DellaPergola, Hebrew University of Jerusalem and The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute: Demography
- David deSilva, Ashland Theological Seminary: Apocrypha
- Elliot N. Dorff, American Jewish University: Capital Punishment; Courts; Ethics, Medical; Ethics, Sexual; Halakhah
- Jean Duhaime, University of Montreal: Dualism: In Ancient Judaism
- James D. G. Dunn, Durham University: New Testament
- Aminadav Dykman, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Hebrew, Translation into
- Glenn Dynner, Sarah Lawrence College: Family and Marriage: Early Modern Period; Frank, Jacob, and Frankism; Ḥasidism: Europe
- Marsha Bryan Edelman, Gratz College: Cantor, Cantorate: Contemporary; Music: Synagogue
- Martin Edelman, University at Albany, SUNY, Emeritus: Israel, State of: Political Institutions; Israel, State of: Political Parties
- Carl S. Ehrlich, York University: Archeology, Land of Israel: Ancient Times to Persian Period; Philistines
- Susan Einbinder, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, Cincinnati: Poetry, Medieval: Christian Europe
- Ellen Eisenberg, Willamette University: United States: Agricultural Settlements
- David Engel, New York University: Antisemitism
- Marc Michael Epstein, Vassar College: Art: Medieval Manuscript Illustration
- Harley Erdman, University of Massachusetts, Amherst: Theater: United States
- Ruth Eshel, University of Haifa: Dance: Pre- and Post-State Israel
- Anat Feinberg, College of Jewish Studies, Heidelberg: Theater: Europe
- Shmuel Feiner, Bar-Ilan University: Haskalah
- Marjorie N. Feld, Babson College: Social Work: United States; Wald, Lillian D.
- Michael Feldberg, The History Consultancy, LC: Center for Jewish History
- Jackie Feldman, Ben-Gurion University: Tourism
- Steven Fine, Yeshiva University: Art: Late Antiquity; Synagogues, Ancient
- Sylvia Barack Fishman, Brandeis University: Film: United States
- K. E. Fleming, New York University: Balkans; Greece
- Jerold C. Frakes, University at Buffalo, SUNY: Literature, Yiddish: Beginnings to 1700
- Barry Freundel, Baltimore Hebrew Institute, Towson University: Beit Din; Confession of Sin; Eruv; Head Covering: Men; Omer; Omer, Counting of the; Shaving
- Ken Frieden, Syracuse University: Literature, Yiddish: 1800 to Twenty-First Century
- Harriet Pass Friedenreich, Temple University: Women, Modern: Central Europe
- Kate Friedman, Editorial Assistant: Ahab; Almohads; Almoravids; Ark of the Covenant; Asher ben Jehiel; Ashkenaz, Ashkenazim; Bahia ben Joseph ibn Pakuda; Bathsheba; Cain and Abel; Damascus Affair; Deborah; Eldad ha-Dani; Flood; Frankel, Zacharias; Hammurabi; Hezekiah; Hittites; Host, Desecration of; Jericho; Jonah ben Abraham Gerondi; Josiah; Judah ben Asher; Levinsohn, Isaac Baer; Lilienthal, Max; Nazirite; Newport, Rhode Island; Queen of Sheba; Radhanites; Red Heifer; Rehoboam; Ruth, Book of
- Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Toronto: Arama, Isaac; Dina de-Malkhuta Dina; Gersonides (Levi ben Gershon); Halevi, Judah; Thought, Medieval
- Kirsten A. Fudeman, University of Pittsburgh: France: Middle Ages
- Michael Galchinsky, Georgia State University: Human Rights

- Alexandra Garbarini, Williams College: Holocaust Diaries
- Rela Mintz Geffen, Baltimore Hebrew Institute, Towson University, Emerita: Bar Mitzvah; Bat Mitzvah; Circumcision; Confirmation; Consecration; Custom (Minhag); Judaism, Conservative; Judaism, Masorti; Kittel; Life-Cycle Rituals; Philanthropy; Synagogue Sisterhoods; United States: Community Center Movement
- Mark H. Gelber, Ben-Gurion University: Literature: Central Europe
- Dov Gera, Ben-Gurion University: Tobiads
- Jane Gerber, Graduate Center, CUNY: Spain, Muslim
- Nurit Gertz, The Open University of Israel: Film: Israel
- Barry Gittlen, Baltimore Hebrew Institute, Towson University: Canaan, Canaanites
- Carole Glauber, Independent Scholar: Photography
- Edward Bernard Glick, Temple University, Emeritus: Israel, State of: Arab–Israeli Conflict, 1948–2010; Israel, State of: Diaspora Relations; Israel, State of: Founding of the Modern State; Israel, State of: Wars (1948)
- Nora Glickman, Queens College and the Graduate Center, CUNY: Film: Latin America
- Matthew Goff, Florida State University: Hasmonean Dynasty; Wisdom of Ben Sira, Book of
- Motti Golani, University of Haifa: Israel, State of: Military and Paramilitary Bodies; Jerusalem, 1948–1967
- Peter B. Golden, Rutgers University: Khazars
- Simha Goldin, Tel Aviv University: Middle Ages: Childhood
- Gabriel Goldstein, Yeshiva University Museum: Ceremonial Objects
- Elaine Goodfriend, California State University, Northridge: Canaan, Canaanites; Egypt and Ancient Israel; Exodus, Book of; Mesopotamia and Ancient Israel; Near East, Ancient; Prostitutes, Prostitution: Hebrew Bible through Middle Ages
- Rachel Gordan, Harvard University: Havurah Movement; Jewish Theological Seminary of America; Judaism, Humanistic; Judaism, Progressive; Workmen’s Circle; World Union for Progressive Judaism; Yeshiva University; Zionism: United States
- Peter E. Gordon, Harvard University: Benjamin, Walter; Freud, Sigmund; Psychoanalysis
- Alon Goshen-Gottstein, Bet Morasha of Jerusalem: Elisha ben Abuya
- Evelyn Gould, University of Oregon: Dreyfus Affair
- Lisa D. Grant, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Education, North America: Adult
- Alyssa M. Gray, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Talmud, Jerusalem
- Abigail Green, Brasenose College, University of Oxford: Montefiore, Moses Haim and Judith Barent Cohen
- Deborah A. Green, University of Oregon: Anointment; Incense
- Elizabeth E. Greenberg, Independent Scholar: Fashion
- Gershon Greenberg, American University: Holocaust: Theological Responses
- Yudit Kornberg Greenberg, Rollins College: Love
- Rachel L. Greenblatt, Harvard University: Prague
- Frederick E. Greenspahn, Florida Atlantic University: Bible; Bible: Modern Scholarship; Deuteronomy, Book of; Genesis, Book of
- Leonard Greenspoon, Creighton University: Bible: Translations and Translators; Cities of Refuge; Ten Commandments
- Michael Greenstein, Independent Scholar: Literature: Canada

- Adam Gregerman, Institute for Jewish and Christian Studies, Baltimore: Hellenism; Jerusalem: Biblical and Rabbinic Sources; Pharisees; Sadducees
- Grace Cohen Grossman, Skirball Cultural Center, Los Angeles: Museums
- Samuel D. Gruber, Jewish Heritage Research Center, Syracuse, New York: Synagogues, Europe: Medieval to Eighteenth Century; Synagogues: Twentieth Century
- Naomi Grunhaus, Yeshiva University: Kimḥi Family
- Jeffrey S. Gurock, Yeshiva University: Sports and Americanization
- Aviva Halamish, The Open University of Israel: Israel, State of: Youth Movements
- Chaya T. Halberstam, Indiana University: Bible: Prophets and Prophecy; Law: Ancient Near East and Hebrew Bible
- David J. Halperin, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, Emeritus: Shabbatai Zevi
- Mark W. Hamilton, Abilene Christian University: Israelites: Kingship; Kings, Books of
- Rachel S. Harris, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign: Holocaust Literature: Poetry; Literature, Hebrew: The Yishuv, 1880–1948; Poetry, Modern Hebrew
- Steven Harvey, Bar-Ilan University: Science and Mathematics: Middle Ages and Early Modern Period
- Rachel Havrelock, University of Illinois at Chicago: Israelites: Tribes; Joshua, Book of; Judges, Book of; Samuel, Books of
- Kenneth Helphand, University of Oregon: Gardens; Israel, State of: Landscape Architecture
- Marc Hirshman, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Epikoros
- Leah Hochman, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, Los Angeles: Krochmal, Nachman; Maimon, Salomon; Mendelssohn, Moses
- Brian Horowitz, Tulane University: Society for the Promotion of Enlightenment among the Jews of Russia (OPE)
- Sara R. Horowitz, York University: Holocaust Literature; Holocaust Literature: Fiction; Wiesel, Elie
- Thomas C. Hubka, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee: Synagogues, Wooden
- Tal Ilan, Freie Universität, Berlin: Talmud Study: Feminist Approaches; Women, Ancient: Rabbinic Judaism; Women, Ancient: Second Temple Period
- Stanley Isser, University at Albany, SUNY: David
- Andrew S. Jacobs, Scripps College: Church Fathers: Attitudes toward Jews and Judaism
- Benjamin M. Jacobs, University of Minnesota, Twin Cities: Education, North America: Day Schools
- Martin Jacobs, Washington University: Travel Writing: Middle Ages and Early Modern Period
- Jenna Weissman Joselit, George Washington University: Menorah Association
- Ava Fran Kahn, California Studies Center, Berkeley: Los Angeles; San Francisco; United States, Western
- Ephraim Kanarfogel, Yeshiva University: Education, Boys: Medieval and Early Modern; Meir ben Barukh (Maharam) of Rothenburg; Middle Ages: Ḥasidei Ashkenaz; Tosafists
- Dana Evan Kaplan, Temple B’nai Israel, Albany, Georgia: Judaism, Reform: North America
- Edward K. Kaplan, Brandeis University: Heschel, Abraham Joshua
- Gregory Kaplan, Rice University: Secularism
- Jonathan Karp, Binghamton University, SUNY: Commerce: Modern Europe (1700–1900); Emancipation
- Claire Katz, Texas A&M University: Levinas, Emmanuel
- Martin Kavka, Florida State University: Messianism: Modern Approaches

- Robert S. Kawashima, University of Florida: Bible: Narrative Literature
- Ari Y. Kelman, University of California, Davis: Radio: United States
- Mark Kligman, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Music, Folk; Music, Religious
- Sharon Koren, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Mysticism, Women and; Shekhinah
- Daniel P. Kotzin, Medaille College: Magnes, Judah L.
- Carol Herselle Krinsky, New York University: Synagogues: Nineteenth Century
- Robert Kugler, Lewis and Clark College: Alexandria, Ancient; Aristeas, Letter of; Egypt: Heracleopolis Papyri; Pseudepigrapha; Ptolemies
- Jenny R. Labendz, Jewish Theological Seminary: Dietary Laws
- Gail Labovitz, American Jewish University: Marriage and Marriage Customs
- Matthew LaGrone, University of Delaware: Chosenness
- Berel Lang, Wesleyan University: Levi, Primo
- Ruth Langer, Boston College: Worship
- Daniel J. Lasker, Ben-Gurion University: Karaism; Saadia ben Joseph Gaon
- Aliza Lavie, Bar-Ilan University: Prayer: Women's Devotional
- Eric Lawee, York University: Abravanel Family
- Peter Lawson, Open University, United Kingdom: Poetry: Britain; Theater: Britain
- Anson Laytner, Seattle University: China
- Arlene Lazarowitz, California State University, Long Beach: United States: Political Involvement; United States Presidents
- Oliver Leaman, University of Kentucky: Evil and Suffering
- Jeffrey Lesser, Emory University: Brazil
- Mark Leuchter, Temple University: Israelites: Religion; Temple and Temple Cult
- Vladimir Levin, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Chmelnitzki, Bogdan; Pogrom; Ukraine
- Stephanie Wellen Levine, Tufts University: Ḥasidism: North America; Schneerson, Menachem Mendel
- Avigdor Levy, Brandeis University: Mendes-Nasi Family; Ottoman Empire
- Judith Lewin, Union College: Literature: Women Writers (Europe and North America)
- Gideon Libson, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Responsa Literature
- Tatjana Lichtenstein, University of Texas, Austin: Czechoslovakia
- Laura S. Lieber, Duke University: Poetry, Liturgical (Piyyut); Song of Songs, Book of
- Yehiel Limor, Tel Aviv University: Journalism: Israel
- Naomi Lindstrom, University of Texas, Austin: Latin America
- Vivian Liska, University of Antwerp: Kafka, Franz; Literature: Contemporary Europe
- Elizabeth Loentz, University of Illinois, Chicago: Pappenheim, Bertha
- Steven M. Lowenstein, American Jewish University: Berlin
- Anthony MacFarlane, MD, Independent Scholar: Caribbean; Jamaica
- Shaul Magid, Indiana University: Antinomianism; Kook, Abraham Isaac
- David Marc, Syracuse University: Broadcasting: Radio and Television; Sports, United States: Baseball; Sports, United States: Basketball; Sports, United States: Football; Sportscasters
- Evyatar Marienberg, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill: Baraita de-Niddah; Mikveh; Niddah

- Steve Mason, York University: Josephus, Flavius
- Mary McCune, State University of New York, Oswego: Organizations, Women's: North America
- Keren McGinity, University of Michigan: Intermarriage: Historical Perspectives; Intermarriage: Twenty-First-Century United States
- Rafael Medoff, David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies: Holocaust: United States Jewish Response
- Esther Meir-Glitzenstein, Ben-Gurion University: Israel, State of: Jewish Immigration Post-1948
- Yitzhak Y. Melamed, Johns Hopkins University: Crescas, Ḥasdai ben Abraham
- Renée Levine Melammed, Schechter Institute, Jerusalem: Inquisition, Spanish
- Adam Mendelsohn, College of Charleston: Australia; New Zealand; South Africa; United States: African American–Jewish Relations; United States: Civil Rights Movement
- Amitai Mendelsohn, Israel Museum, Jerusalem: Art, Israeli
- Ted Merwin, Dickinson College: Entertainment
- Michael A. Meyer, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, Cincinnati, Emeritus: Geiger, Abraham; Germany; Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion; Judaism, Reform: Germany
- Carol Meyers, Duke University: Adam; Bible: Ancestral Narratives; Bible: Music and Dance; Hannah; Illness and Disease: Bible and Ancient Near East; Israelites: Marriage and Family; Menorah; Miriam; Rebekah; Women, Ancient: Biblical Representations; Women, Ancient: Israelite
- Eric M. Meyers, Duke University: Babylonian Exile; Daniel, Book of; Malachi, Book of; Zechariah, Book of; Zerubbabel
- Deborah Dash Moore, University of Michigan: New York City; World War II: Impact on American Jews
- Menachem Mor, University of Haifa: Jewish War, Second
- Milton Moreland, Rhodes College: Archeology, Land of Israel: Second Temple Period
- Samuel Morell, Binghamton University, SUNY: Karo, Joseph
- Michael L. Morgan, Indiana University: Fackenheim, Emil Ludwig
- Daniel Morris, Purdue University: Poetry: United States
- Robin R. Mundill, University of St Andrews; Glenalmond College: England: Middle Ages
- Yael Munk, The Open University of Israel: Film: Israel
- Pamela S. Nadell, American University: Priesand, Sally; Rabbinic Ordination of Women
- Allan Nadler, Drew University: Judaism, Orthodox: Ultra-Orthodox
- Steven Nadler, University of Wisconsin: Spinoza, Baruch
- Beth Alpert Nakhai, University of Arizona: Ammon; Beth El; Edom; Hazor; Hebron; Lachish; Moab; Samaria; Shechem; Shiloh
- Alice Nakhimovsky, Colgate University: Literature: Russia and Soviet Union (in Russian)
- Chaim Meir Neria, University of Chicago, Divinity School: Musar Movement; Talmud Study: Modern Approaches; Vilna Gaon, Elijah ben Solomon Zalman
- Susan Niditch, Amherst College: Bible: Representations of War and Peace
- Vered Noam, Tel Aviv University: Megillat Ta'anit
- Thomas Nolden, Wellesley College: Literature: France
- Julius Novick, Purchase College, SUNY, Emeritus: Theater, United States: Playwrights
- Dalia Ofer, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Emerita: Holocaust: Role of Gender
- Adri K. Offenberg, Bibliotheca Rosenthaliana, Amsterdam University, Retired: Printing

- Jess Olson, Yeshiva University: Frankfurt am Main; Friedländer, David; Hirsch, Samson Raphael Ranen Omer-Sherman, University of Miami: Arabs: Representations in Israeli Literature; Literature: Graphic Novels; Oz, Amos; Yehoshua, A. B.
 Aharon Oppenheimer, Tel Aviv University: Bar Kokhba
 Michal Palgi, University of Haifa and Emek Yezreel College: Israel, State of: Kibbutz Movement
 Avinoam J. Patt, University of Hartford: Displaced Persons
 Moshe Pelli, University of Central Florida: Literature, Hebrew: Haskalah
 William Plevan, Princeton University: Revelation
 Eddy Portnoy, Rutgers University: Internet
 Hannah S. Pressman, University of Washington: Memoir and Life Writing: Hebrew
 Alon Raab, University of California, Davis: Israel, State of: Peace Movements; Sports: Israel
 Moshe Rachmuth, University of Oregon: Bialik, Hayyim Nahman; Isaac; Joseph Amnon Ramon, Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies: Jerusalem: Since 1967
 Randi Rashkover, George Mason University: Redemption; Theology
 Lucia Raspe, Goethe-Universität, Frankfurt am Main: Cemeteries: Medieval and Early Modern Europe
 Benjamin Ravid, Brandeis University: Venice
 Martha A. Ravits, University of Oregon: Frank, Anne Jonathan Ray, Georgetown University: Conversos/Crypto Jews; Spain, Christian
 Uzi Rebhun, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: United States: Demography
 Annette Yoshiko Reed, University of Pennsylvania: Christianity and Second Temple Judaism
 Bernard Reich, George Washington University: Israel, State of: Wars (1956–1967)
 Stefan C. Reif, University of Cambridge: Amram bar Sheshna; Genizah, Cairo
 David M. Reis, Bridgewater College: Alexander the Great; Gnosticism; Ptolemies: Impact on Jewish Culture and Thought; Samaritans; Seleucids
 Ira Robinson, Concordia University: Adler, Cyrus; Judaism, Orthodox: Modern Orthodox Meri-Jane Rochelson, Florida International University: Zangwill, Israel
 Leonard Rogoff, Jewish Heritage Foundation of North Carolina: United States, Southern Freddie Rokem, Tel Aviv University: Theater: Israel
 Lilach Rosenberg-Friedman, Bar-Ilan University: Hebrew: Modern Revival; Israel, State of:
 Military Roles of Women
 Dale Rosengarten, College of Charleston: Charleston, South Carolina
 Laurence Roth, Susquehanna University: Literature: Popular Fiction
 Evie Levy Rotstein, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Education, North America: Supplemental Schools
 Adam Rovner, University of Denver: Literature, Hebrew: Israeli Fiction
 Marsha L. Rozenblit, University of Maryland: Inter-marriage: Modern Europe and United States; Vienna
 Joshua Rubenstein, Amnesty International and Davis Center, Harvard University: Ehrenburg, Ilya;
 Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee; Trotsky, Leon
 Jay Rubin, Jewish Community Association of Austin: Hillel Foundations
 Marina Rustow, Emory University: Egypt: Middle Ages
 Leonard V. Rutgers, Utrecht University: Catacombs
 Yona Sabar, University of California, Los Angeles: Kurdistan

- Angel Sáenz-Badillos, Universidad Complutense, Madrid, and Real Colegio Complutense, Harvard University: Grammarians and Lexicographers
- Jeffrey K. Salkin, The Temple, Atlanta, Georgia: Judaism: Jewish Renewal Movement
- Rivanne Sandler, University of Toronto, Emerita: Iran; Iraq; Judeo-Persian Language and Literature
- Marianne Sanua, Florida Atlantic University: Fraternities and Sororities: North America
- Marc Saperstein, Leo Baeck College, London: Ethical Wills; Sermons
- Jonathan D. Sarna, Brandeis University: Columbus, Christopher; Jewish Publication Society; United States: Civil War
- Lawrence H. Schiffman, Yeshiva University: Dead Sea Scrolls
- Jonathan Wyn Schofer, Harvard University: Avot De Rabbi Natan; Ethics, Rabbinic
- Laura S. Schor, Hunter College: British Mandate over Palestine; Rothschild, Baroness Betty de; Rothschild Family
- Daniel J. Schroeter, University of Minnesota: North Africa
- Yechiel Y. Schur, University of Pennsylvania: Communal Organization: Medieval and Early Modern Eras; Councils and Synods: Medieval and Early Modern
- Diane Tickton Schuster, Claremont Graduate University: Education, North America: Adult
- Daniel R. Schwartz, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Maccabees, Books of
- Dov Schwartz, Bar-Ilan University: Thought, Early Modern
- Marcus Mordechai Schwartz, Jewish Theological Seminary: Mitzvah; Rabbinic Ordination
- Jan Schwarz, University of Chicago: Memoir and Life Writing: Yiddish
- Ora Rodrigue Schwarzwald, Bar-Ilan University: Ladino; Literature, Ladino
- Kenneth Seeskin, Northwestern University: Autonomy and Heteronomy; Maimonides, Moses (Moses ben Maimon); Reason
- Alan F. Segal, z"l: Afterlife: Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Period; Messianism: Biblical and Second Temple Eras; Resurrection
- Zohar Segev, University of Haifa: Silver, Abba Hillel
- Jonathan Seidel, University of Oregon: Magic
- Shlomo Sela, Bar-Ilan University: Abraham bar Hiyya; Astrology
- Robert M. Seltzer, Hunter College and the Graduate Center, CUNY: Kaplan, Mordecai M.; Thought, Modern
- Bülent Şenay, Uludağ University, Turkey: Turkey
- Arvi Sepp, University of Antwerp: Kafka, Franz
- Jeffrey Shandler, Rutgers University: Celebrities
- Joshua M. Shanes, College of Charleston: Bund; Galicia
- David Shatz, Yeshiva University: Soloveitchik, Joseph B.
- Shmuel Shepkaru, University of Oklahoma: Martyrdom
- Rona Sheramy, Association for Jewish Studies: Holocaust Education: North America
- Ira M. Sheskin, University of Miami: United States: South Florida
- Avigdor Shinan, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: David: Post-Biblical Traditions; Elijah: Biblical and Post-Biblical Traditions; Targum; Torah Reading
- Ephraim Shoham-Steiner, Ben-Gurion University: Pilgrimage
- Marci Shore, Yale University: Bolshevism: Russian Empire and Soviet Union; Communism: Eastern Europe

- Devorah Shubowitz, Indiana University: Film: Europe (Post–World War II)
- Elizabeth Shulman, Editorial Assistant: Aaron; Abraham ben David of Posquières; Akiva ben Joseph; Arabia; Assyria; Babylon/Babylonia; Barak, Ehud; Begin, Menachem; Belgium; Blessing of the Moon; Covenant; Decapolis Cities; Denmark; Elisha; Film: Yiddish-Language; Firstborn Son, Redemption of (Pidyon ha-Ben); France, Contemporary; Galilee; Haftarah; Havdalah; Herod and Herodian Dynasty; Herzl, Theodor; Hillel; Judah, Kingdom of; Kaddish; Kiddush; Kindertransport; Leo Baeck Institute; Meir, Golda; Menasseh ben Israel; Mezuzah; Rabin, Yitzhak; Sharansky, Nathan; Sharon, Ariel; Shofar; Tabernacle; Tallit; Tefillin; Tel Aviv; United States: American Revolution; Yahrzeit; YIVO Institute for Jewish Research; Yizkor; Yom Ha-Atzma'ut; Yom Ha-Shoah or Yom Ha-Shoah Veha-Gevurah
- Efraim Sicher, Ben-Gurion University: Literature: Britain
- Laurence J. Silberstein, Lehigh University: Post-Zionism
- Edward Silver, Wellesley College: Jeremiah, Book of; Joel, Book of
- Larry Silver, University of Pennsylvania: Art, Europe: Nineteenth Century; Art, Europe: Twentieth Century
- Shlomo Simonsohn, Tel Aviv University, Emeritus: Sicily
- Helene J. Sinnreich, Youngstown State University: Holocaust: Ghettos
- Alexei Sivertsev, DePaul University: Zealots
- Robert Skloot, University of Wisconsin: Holocaust Representation: Drama
- Mark Slobin, Wesleyan University: Cantor, Cantorate: Historical Development
- Naomi Sokoloff, University of Washington: Agnon, S. Y.
- Moshe Sokolow, Yeshiva University: Ibn Ezra, Abraham; Ibn Ezra, Moses
- Benjamin D. Sommer, Jewish Theological Seminary: Habakkuk, Book of; Haggai, Book of; Hosea, Book of; Isaiah, Book of; Micah, Book of; Obadiah, Book of
- Daniel Soyer, Fordham University: Journalism, Yiddish: North America; United States: Labor Movement
- Nina Spiegel, American University: Dance: United States
- David Starr, Me'ah Hebrew College, Newton, Massachusetts: Education, North America: Hebrew Colleges; Schechter, Solomon
- Ilan Stavans, Amherst College: Literature: Latin America
- Richard Stein, University of Oregon, Emeritus: Disraeli, Benjamin
- Naomi Steinberg, DePaul University: Dinah; Leah; Rachel; Sarah; Tamar (Genesis 38); Tamar (2 Samuel)
- Paul Steinberg, Valley Beth Shalom, Encino, California: Fast Days; Festivals; Firstborn, Fast of; Five Scrolls (Hamesh Megillot); Hallel; Hanukkah; High Holidays; New Years; Passover; Purim; Repentance; Rosh Hodesh; Shabbat ha-Gadol; Shavuot; Simhat Torah; Sukkot; Tu B'Shevat
- Günter Stemberger, University of Vienna, Emeritus: Rome, Roman Empire; Tannaim
- Christopher M. Sterba, San Francisco State University: World War I: Impact on American Jews
- Gregg Stern, University of Massachusetts, Amherst: France, Southern: Middle Ages
- Michael Stern, University of Oregon: Literature: Scandinavia
- Sacha Stern, University College London: Calendar
- Kenneth Stow, University of Haifa: Ghetto; Italy

- Marvin A. Sweeney, Claremont School of Theology and Claremont Graduate University: Ezekiel, Book of; Leviticus, Book of; Numbers, Book of
- Susan L. Tananbaum, Bowdoin College: Britain: Early Modern and Modern
- Magda Teter, Wesleyan University: Ritual Murder Accusation
- Hava Tirosh-Samuelson, Arizona State University: Ecology; Ethics, Environmental; Israel, State of: Ecology
- Michael Toch, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Commerce: Medieval and Early Modern Europe; Money Lending: Medieval and Early Modern Europe
- William Toll, University of Oregon: United States: Immigration
- Emanuel Tov, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Septuagint
- Amram Tropper, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Avot
- Gerald Tulchinsky, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario: Canada
- Ellen M. Umansky, Fairfield University: Jewish Science; Judaism, Feminist
- Christine Schmidt van der Zanden, University of Maryland: Holocaust Denial; Holocaust Documentation; Holocaust Resistance; Holocaust Trials
- Sharon Vance, Northern Kentucky University: Judeo-Arabic Language and Literature
- Kati Vörös, University of Chicago: Habsburg Empire; Hungary
- Saul Wachs, Gratz College: Blessings; Blessings Before and After Meals
- David A. Wacks, University of Oregon: Literature, Hebrew: Medieval Spain
- Felicia Waldman, University of Bucharest: Romania
- Barry Dov Walfish, University of Toronto: Biblical Commentary: Middle Ages to 1800; Encyclopedias; Rashi
- Harold S. Wechsler, New York University: United States: Higher Education
- Judith Romney Wegner, Connecticut College: Islam and Judaism
- Shalva Weil, Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Bene Israel; Cochin Jews; Ethiopia; India; Tribes, Ten Lost
- David Weinberg, Wayne State University: Urban Life
- Robert Weinberg, Swarthmore College: Birobidjan
- Dvora E. Weisberg, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, Los Angeles: Aggadah; Amoraim; Rabbinic Hermeneutics
- Kalman Weiser, York University: Journalism, Yiddish: Eastern Europe; Yiddish Dictionaries
- Andrea L. Weiss, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York: Bible: Poetry
- Anton Weiss-Wendt, Center for the Study of the Holocaust and Religious Minorities, Oslo, Norway: Baltic States
- Steven H. Werlin, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill: Jewish War, First; Masada; Qumran
- Libby K. White, Baltimore Hebrew Institute, Towson University: Bulgaria; Periodicals: Canada (English Language); Periodicals: United States (English Language); Vilna
- Stephen J. Whitfield, Brandeis University: Journalism: United States (English Language)
- Shohama Wiener, Academy for Jewish Religion: Academy for Jewish Religion
- Barry Wimpfheimer, Northwestern University: Rabbinic Literature: Mishnah and Talmuds; Talmud, Babylonian
- Ora Wiskind-Elper, Lander Institute of Jewish Studies, Jerusalem: Folktales
- Diane Wolfthal, Rice University: Art: Illustrated Yiddish Books
- Yaakov Yadgar, Bar-Ilan University: Judaism, Israeli Forms of

Bracha Yaniv, Bar-Ilan University: Ceremonial Objects: Islamic Lands

James E. Young, University of Massachusetts, Amherst: Holocaust Memorials

Michael Zank, Boston University: Atonement; Cohen, Hermann

Joshua Zimmerman, Yeshiva University: Marx, Karl

Steven J. Zipperstein, Stanford University: Aḥad Ha-Am; Pale of Settlement; Pinsker, Leon; Russia

Gary Phillip Zola, Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, Cincinnati: Summer Camping

PREFACE

The Cambridge Dictionary of Judaism and Jewish Culture is an authoritative reference work for a twenty-first-century audience. Its entries, written by eminent scholars, define the spiritual and intellectual concepts and the various religious movements that distinguish Judaism and the Jewish experience. Their subjects include central personalities, formative events, and enduring literary and cultural contributions. Essays outline Jewish history from ancient times to the present, and they also illuminate the daily lives of Jewish women and men in many eras and locations. Contributions discuss legal teachings and legendary traditions, and they explain the roles of rationalism, mysticism, and messianism within Jewish thought. The religious rituals and customs of Judaism – and the texts and contexts that explain, expand, and animate them – are a major focus as well. Many entries focus on geographic regions, countries, and cities, documenting the distinctive characteristics of Jewish life and cultural production in these specific places. Yet what makes this reference different from many others is that it also explores Jewish activities and contributions outside the religious boundaries of Judaism.

Articles in this dictionary explore Jewish secular and political movements, Jewish achievements beyond the confines of the traditional Jewish world, and the often disregarded lives of Jewish women. Discussions of numerous events of the modern era, including the Holocaust, Zionism, and the founding of the State of Israel, and Jewish involvement in numerous aspects of mainstream culture, demonstrate the inadequacy of defining Jews only from a religious viewpoint. Entries in this book consider manifestations of religious disaffection and secularism, as well as the impact of intellectual, social, and political tendencies in the larger societies of which Jews have been a part. Authoritative essays delineate Jewish expressions and achievements in a variety of languages and literatures and in the visual and lively arts. Readers of this compendium will find new and compelling approaches both to Judaism and to the intellectual and cultural development of the Jewish people.

The Cambridge Dictionary of Judaism and Jewish Culture reviews Jewish participation in a wide variety of areas, including journalism, literature, art, music, theater, dance, film, sports, travel, and other forms of popular culture from periodicals, radio, and television to the graphic novel and the Internet. Topics of interest include the involvement of Jews in medicine, politics, science and mathematics, ecology and the environmental movement, and the academic world of higher education. Authors of articles in this volume employ the insights of art history, cinema studies, musicology, social sciences, cultural studies, women's studies, and gender studies, in addition to more traditional approaches centered on historical, philosophical, literary, religious, and textual scholarship and analysis.

A one-volume dictionary of Judaism and the Jewish experience could never claim to be fully comprehensive, and this work is no exception. However, the sixteen subeditors have endeavored to provide coverage of topics ranging from the ancient Near East to Jewish demography in the twenty-first century. Most important, The Cambridge Dictionary of Judaism and Jewish Culture is designed for ease of use. Its articles are succinct, clearly written, and accessible to general readers.

In many cases, authors have suggested further reading from reliable and readily available primary and secondary sources in English for those who would like to explore a topic in more depth.

This volume would not have been possible without the contributions of the subeditors, who chose the subjects to be covered in their areas of expertise and who recommended colleagues as potential authors. I am grateful for their efforts in helping make this dictionary a reality. Most essential to this project's success, of course, are the hundreds of contributors whose entries reflect both cutting-edge scholarship and perceptive analysis. I am in their debt, as are all who make use of this book. Special thanks are due to my assistants over the years: Peter Calley, Noah Mullin, Moshe Rachmuth, Brianna Bridegum, Kate Friedman, Elizabeth Shulman, and Sara Waltemire. Without their much appreciated help, this volume would never have been completed.

I am most grateful for a very generous gift from the Harold and Arlene Schnitzer Care Foundation of Portland, Oregon, which made possible the inclusion of color plates. These images significantly enhance a number of the articles on art and ceremonial objects. Harold Schnitzer died on April 27, 2011, just a few months before the publication of this volume. His vision in establishing the Harold Schnitzer Family Program in Judaic Studies at the University of Oregon was typical of his many extraordinary acts of philanthropy. Certainly it transformed my life and I will always be grateful to Harold and his family for bringing me to Oregon in 2000 to head this exciting academic program and for their ongoing support of my academic endeavors. I know that Harold's memory will be a blessing for many generations to come. A research leave in 2007 and a sabbatical in 2009 allowed me to do essential work on this project. I am grateful to the University of Oregon and particularly the College of Arts and Sciences for providing me with these gifts of time. As always, I am deeply appreciative of the sustaining love and patience of my husband and children, Warren, Sam, and Shira Ginsberg; they help make the impossible possible.

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Entries in this volume are arranged alphabetically. Within each entry, asterisks (*) identify people, places, literary works, and concepts and movements for which separate articles exist. Often, in the course of an essay or at its conclusion, references to other relevant entries are indicated in UPPERCASE letters. Articles often refer to interesting and important individuals for whom there are no designated entries. A comprehensive Index of Names at the end of the volume directs readers to all the entries in which a particular person is mentioned. The Contributors listing at the beginning of the book identifies each author and the entry or entries she or he has written.

Some articles have been grouped by topic for the reader's convenience. For example, substantive entries about Jewish writers and writings in various times and places appear alphabetically under Literature. Similar groupings are found under Art, Bible, Film, Holocaust, Israel, State of, Journalism, Middle Ages, Music, Poetry, Sports, Theater, United States, and Women, among others. Articles related to one or more of these topics also stand alone, but cross-references direct readers to them.

The entries in this volume are relatively brief; none is longer than 3,000 words and most are far shorter. They are also highly focused, exploring specific subjects in some detail. In many ways, this book complements The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture (ed. Judith R. Baskin and Kenneth Seeskin, 2010), whose far longer historical and thematic essays provide comprehensive overviews of particular eras and subjects. The entries in The Dictionary address in detail topics that essays in The Guide could only mention in passing. Together the two volumes provide in general and specific ways a sense of the immense richness and diversity of Judaism and the bountiful expressions of Jewish culture and creativity through the ages.

A NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

Generally, the Hebrew letter het is represented in this volume by h, the Hebrew letter khaf by kh, and tzadei by tz. However, an effort has been made to balance the demands of consistency with those of familiarity. Thus, biblical names and places are spelled here as they are in The Jewish Bible: Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures. The New Jewish Publication Society Translation according to the Hebrew Text (1985). Similarly, the names of individuals from the eighteenth century on are spelled as they most commonly appear in English. The name Ḥayyim, for instance, may be spelled Chaim, Chayim, Haim, or Haym depending on the individual involved. Names of individuals have been standardized as much as possible across entries, although this occasionally leads to inconsistencies in transliteration within entries. Names of places in the State of Israel generally follow conventional English spellings. Transliterations of other languages, such as Arabic, Ladino, Russian, and Yiddish, usually respect the choices of the authors of specific entries.

ABBREVIATIONS

Abbreviations appear throughout the volume in the following categories:

CHRONOLOGY

b.	Born
BCE	Before the Common Era
CE	Common Era
ca.	Latin circa (“approximately”)
d.	Died
fl.	Latin floruit (“was active”)
r.	Reigned

BIBLICAL BOOKS (in the order in which they appear in the Hebrew Bible)

Gen	Genesis
Exod	Exodus
Lev	Leviticus
Num	Numbers
Deut	Deuteronomy
Josh	Joshua
Judg	Judges
Sam	Samuel
Kgs	Kings
Isa	Isaiah
Jer	Jeremiah
Ezek	Ezekiel
Hos	Hosea
Hab	Habbakuk
Hag	Haggai
Zech	Zechariah
Ps	Psalms
Prov	Proverbs
Song	Song of Songs
Lam	Lamentations
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Dan	Daniel
Neh	Nehemiah
Chron	Chronicles

APOCRYPHAL BOOKS

Macc	Maccabees
Sira	Wisdom of Ben Sira

NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS

Matt Matthew
Cor Corinthians
Rev Revelations

RABBINIC LITERATURE (these abbreviations precede the names of specific tractates of the Mishnah and Talmuds; a chart of these tractates appears in the entry MISHNAH: ORDERS AND TRACTATES)

b. Hebrew ben ("son of")
BT Babylonian Talmud
JT Jerusalem Talmud
M. Mishnah
R. Rabbi
T. Tosefta

Map 1. Ancient Near East (ca. 2000–1800 BCE)

Map 2. Divided Monarchy (ca. 920–730 BCE)

Map 4. The Mediterranean World in Late Antiquity (ca. 200 CE)

Map 5. Jewish Centers in the Geonic Period (750–1040 CE)

Map 6. Jewish Centers in Medieval Spain (ca. 1200)

Map 7. Jewish Centers in Medieval Europe

Map 8. Jewish Centers in Early Modern Europe (17th century)

Map 9. Jewish Centers in the Ottoman Empire (ca. 1600)

Map 10. Emancipation of European Jews

Map 11. Pale of Settlement (1791–1917)

Map 12. 1947 UN Partition Plan for Palestine

Map 13. State of Israel: Armistice Lines, 1949

Map 14. State of Israel and Occupied Territories, 1967

A

Aaron is the brother of *Moses and *Miriam; he speaks for Moses and performs signs on his behalf before the Exodus from *Egypt (Exod 4:10–17, 27–31; 7:19; 8:1; 8:12). Aaron is also the father of the levitical *priesthood (Exod 28:1); Leviticus 8–10 describes the ordination of Aaron and his sons as the priests (kohanim) of the *Tabernacle. Nadab and Abihu, two of Aaron's sons, die in the course of this event (Lev 10:1–3), apparently because they disobey God by incorporating foreign elements into the cultic service. Numbers 18 affirms the primacy of the priestly roles of Aaron and his direct descendants: They alone are responsible for maintaining the purity of the sanctuary (18:1), while the other members of the tribe of Levi are to provide support services and “do the work of the Tent of Meeting” (Num 18:2–7). Aaron sometimes challenges his brother's leadership. When Moses ascends Mount Sinai, Aaron stays behind and is persuaded to build the golden calf; he is spared, however, from the plague that strikes the idolaters (Exod 32). Numbers 12 relates that both Aaron and Miriam speak against Moses and challenge the unique nature of Moses' prophetic relationship with God. Both are verbally chastised by God, but only Miriam is punished with a skin affliction and a week's expulsion from the camp. Aaron, like Moses, is barred from entrance to *Canaan for his failure to sanctify God as commanded at the waters of Meribah (Num 20:1–13). Numbers 20:22–29 describes Aaron's death at Mt. Hor and the thirty days of communal mourning that follow. See also DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF; EGYPT AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; EXODUS, BOOK OF; INCENSE; LEVITICUS, BOOK OF; NUMBERS, BOOK OF; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT; WORSHIP.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Abarbanel: See ABRAVANEL

Abel: See ADAM; CAIN AND ABEL; EVE.

Abortion. Judaism respects the sanctity of life and of potential life and has generally prohibited abortion. When a pregnant woman's life was endangered, however, rabbinic and medieval authorities permitted abortion on the basis of Exodus 21:22–25. This text was understood to make a distinction between the actual human status of the pregnant woman and the potential human status of her fetus, which was not considered an independent entity before its birth (BT Yevamot 69b; BT Hullin 58a). Because the fetus is not an autonomous being, abortion is not regarded as murder. Once most of the child has emerged from the mother's body, M. Ohalot 7:6 rules that “it is not to be touched, for one [life] is not [to] be put aside for another.” Moses *Maimonides wrote that when the mother's life was at risk the fetus should be regarded as a pursuer (rodef) attempting to kill her and be dealt with accordingly (Mishneh Torah, Rotze'ah* 1:9).

Although most legal authorities permitted abortion when it was judged essential for a woman's physical or mental health, debate focused on permissible conditions and situations. Rabbi Jacob Emden (1697–1776), among others, permitted abortion “as long as the fetus has not emerged from the womb, even if not to save the mother's life, but only to save her from the harassment and great pain which the fetus causes her,” ruling that abortion was permitted when a pregnancy resulted from *adultery or another prohibited sexual union (She'elat Yavez 1:43).

There is no monolithic attitude toward abortion in modern Judaism, and contemporary Jews hold diverse opinions. However, various movements have formulated denominational positions. All streams of Orthodox Judaism endorse the rabbinic position (based on Exod 21:22–25) that abortion is permitted when there is a high probability that the mother's life is at risk, whether for physical or psychological reasons (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX; JUDAISM: ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX). However, most Orthodox legal authorities prohibit abortion when the fetus has a significant abnormality or a fatal genetic condition. One recent exception is Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg (1915–2006), who allowed the first-trimester abortion of a fetus with a deformity that would cause it to suffer and permitted abortion up to the end of the second trimester of pregnancy of a fetus with a lethal defect such as Tay-Sachs disease (Tzitz Eliezer 9:51:3).

The position of Conservative Judaism, expressed in 1983, is that “an abortion is justifiable if a continuation of pregnancy might cause the mother severe physical or psychological harm, or when the fetus is judged by competent medical authorities to be severely defective.” Conservative authorities, as well as some Orthodox rabbinic decision makers, would permit abortion when pregnancy resulted from rape or from illicit sexual relations such as adultery or incest (See JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE).

Reform Judaism allows the option of abortion in all of the instances mentioned above, as well as for additional reasons in individual cases. In a 1967 statement approved at the 49th General Assembly, a lay policymaking body, the movement declared abortion permissible “under such circumstances as threatened disease or deformity of the embryo or fetus, threats to the physical and mental health of the mother, rape and incest and the social, economic and psychological factors that might warrant therapeutic termination of pregnancy.” In a 1975 statement, passed at the 53rd General Assembly, Reform Judaism expressed confidence in the right and ability of a woman to exercise her ethical and religious judgment in making her own decision (See JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA).

In Israel, the 1977 penal code permits legal abortions by appropriately trained physicians in medical facilities that are “specifically and publicly recognized” as providers of abortions. A termination committee must approve abortion requests. Acceptable grounds include the following: a pregnant woman younger than seventeen, the legal age for marriage; physical, emotional, or psychological damage to the mother; a pregnancy resulting from irregular circumstances (rape, incest, pregnancy outside of marriage); and the probability that the fetus is severely disabled or otherwise unlikely to live a normal life. The committee approves almost all requests. Liberal political parties in Israel favor legalized abortions on the basis of a woman's right to choose; Orthodox political parties and other traditionally oriented and right-wing groups argue that, except for rare cases, abortion should not be permitted in a Jewish state.

For further reading, see ETHICS: MEDICAL; and R. Biale, Women and Jewish Law (1984); A. L. Mackler, Life and Death Responsibilities in Jewish Biomedical Ethics (2000); and D. Schiff, Abortion in Judaism (2002). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Abraham is the ancestral father of the Jewish people through *Isaac, his son with his wife *Sarah, and of the Arabs through *Ishmael, his son with the Egyptian maidservant, *Hagar. Abraham's origins are in *Mesopotamia in Ur of the Chaldeans (Gen 11:28); later he settles with his father Terah, his wife Sarai, and his nephew Lot in Haran. According to Genesis 12, Abraham set out with his wife and nephew for the land of *Canaan in obedience to a divine mandate; there, *God promised, his progeny would become a great people. Abraham's relationship with God progresses through a series of *covenants in which Abraham's faith is tested in various ways. These covenants require transformations, including the change of name from Abram to Abraham (and Sarai to Sarah) and the institution of male *circumcision (berit milah) within Abraham's household (Gen 17). Abraham is characterized by his obedience to God's commands, yet he also questions divine decisions, as in his bargaining with God to save the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah from destruction (Gen 18). Abraham is also portrayed as less than admirable in certain circumstances; one example is when he yields his wife Sarah to another man to save his own life (Gen 20).

Despite the divine promises of untold numbers of descendants who would inherit the land of Canaan, Abraham and his wife Sarah remain childless for many years, another test of Abraham's devotion to God. The less patient Sarah attempts to provide her husband with an heir by giving him her maidservant, Hagar (Gen 16); however, after Hagar conceives and gives birth to *Ishmael, tensions escalate within the household, ultimately leading to the expulsion of Hagar and her son (Gen 21). Finally, when Sarah is beyond the normal age of pregnancy, divine promises (Gen 18) are fulfilled with the birth of Isaac (Gen 21). This biblical motif of female *infertility overcome by divine intervention also appears in other narratives about the births of important figures such as *Jacob, *Joseph, and *Samuel.

Perhaps the greatest challenge to Abraham's faith is the divine commandment to sacrifice Isaac in Genesis 22. The binding of Isaac (akedah*), a literary masterpiece of concision and terror, establishes indisputably both the depth of Abraham's devotion and the kind of faith that God demands. This biblical episode is followed by Sarah's death and Abraham's purchase of a family burial place at Machpelah (Gen 23). In his old age, Abraham marries Keturah (Gen 25) and fathers six more sons, although Isaac remains his sole heir (25:5–6).

Scholars who advocate some level of historicity to the figure of Abraham point out that place names associated with the Syro-Mesopotamian (Amorite) region that are found in

Mesopotamian literature of the late second and early first millennium BCE correspond to names in Abraham's ancestry. Nevertheless, most would agree that the Genesis narratives about Abraham should be understood as ancestral narratives that developed over a long period of time and were shaped to express themes that were important to Israelite religion and culture. See also BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; GENESIS, BOOK OF. Map 1 JUDITH R. BASKIN

Abraham bar Ḥiyya (ca. 1065–ca. 1140), mathematician, philosopher, and astrologer, was born in Barcelona and died in Provence. In an epistle he reports that he was held in high esteem by grandees and kings and that he was engrossed from youth in learning, dealing with, and teaching the so-called science of the stars. Bar Ḥiyya's reference to grandees and kings is borne out by his appellation, Savasorda, a corruption of sahib al-shurta (chief of the guard). Abraham Bar Ḥiyya's work has a scientific and encyclopedic character; it is written entirely in Hebrew, an indication that he developed his career principally among Jews.

His Yesodei ha-Tevuna u-Migdal ha-'Emuna (Foundations of Understanding and Tower of Faith) is the first medieval Hebrew encyclopaedia of science (it was edited by J. M. M. Vallicrosa in 1952). Ḥibbur ha-Meshiḥah veba-Tishboret (Treatise on Mensuration and Calculation) is a mathematical work intended for the use of landholders and judges (ed. M. Guttman [1913]). Bar Ḥiyya described Surat ha-'Aretz (The Shape of the Earth) as presenting the "shape of the configuration of the heavens and the earth, and the order of the motion visible in the skies and in the stars" (ed. Munster [1546]). He drew up a set of planetary tables called Luhot ha-Nasi (Tables of the Prince), the canons of which appear in Heshbon Mahalakhot ha-Kokhavim (Computation of the Motions of Stars; ed. J. M. M. Vallicrosa [1959]). As for the Jewish *calendar, Bar Ḥiyya wrote Sefer ha-'Ibbur (Book of Intercalation), which was in all likelihood the first Hebrew work of this type. This treatise also includes vigorous polemics and rich astronomical materials (ed. T. Philipowsky [1851]).

Megillat ha-Megalleh (Scroll of the Revealer) is devoted to foretelling the exact date of the coming of the *messiah, mainly by means of scriptural data (ed. J. Guttmann [1924]). Its fifth chapter, the largest in the entire work, includes a voluminous and impressive Jewish and universal astrological history. He also wrote a long, apologetic epistle to Rabbi Judah Barzilai of Barcelona, justifying the study and use of a specific astrological approach (ed. Z. Schwarz in Festschrift Adolf Schwarz, ed. S. Kraus [1917]), and see S. Sela, "Abraham Bar Ḥiyya's Astrological Work and Thought," Jewish Studies Quarterly 12 (2005): 1–31. Abraham Bar Ḥiyya expounded his Neoplatonic philosophy in Hegyon ha-Nefesh ha-Atzuvah (Meditation of the Sad Soul; ed. E. Freimann [1860]).

See also ASTROLOGY; SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD.

SHLOMO SELA

Abraham ben David of Posquières (ca. 1125–1198), also known by the acronym Rabad, was a halakhic authority in southern *France. Born in Narbonne, Rabad received most of his talmudic education from Moses b. Joseph and Meshullam b. Jacob of Lunel. Rabad used some of his significant wealth, possibly acquired through dealings in textiles, to establish and direct an important school in Posquières. A number of his students, including his son *Isaac the Blind, went on to become major scholars. Rabad's commentaries on rabbinic texts and his *responsa were particularly influential. So, too, were his annotations (hassagot) to *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah; they were frequently published together, beginning in 1509. In his hassagot, Rabad expands and reconstructs many of Maimonides' halakhic arguments; he is critical of Maimonides both for excluding the references and explanations from earlier sources that informed his legal decisions and for some of his philosophical views. Rabad left no mystical writings, but is known to have transmitted kabbalistic teachings to his sons (see KABBALAH). See also FRANCE, SOUTHERN; MIDDLE AGES; ISAAC THE BLIND; MONEYLENDING; MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Abraham ibn Daud [ben David] (ca. 1110–1180) was a philosopher, historian, and astrologer in *Spain; he was probably born in Cordova and is said to have died as a martyr in Toledo. The first of three scholars known by the acronym Rabad, he is sometimes designated as Rabad I. Strongly influenced by the Muslim Aristotelians, al-Farabi and Avicenna, Ibn Daud was the first to introduce the Aristotelian system and form into Jewish philosophy in Ha-Emunah ha-Ramah (The Exalted Faith, trans. with commentary, N. M. Samuelson [1986]), written in Arabic around 1160. The original text is no longer extant, but two fourteenth-century Hebrew translations survive. Ibn Daud's philosophical impact was overshadowed by *Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, which appeared a few decades later. Ibn Daud's important Hebrew chronicle, Sefer ha-Kabbalah (Book of Tradition, trans. with commentary, G. D. Cohen [1967]), is a defense of the chain of rabbinic tradition against the *Karaites. This work, which has messianic undertones, includes the story of the "Four Captives," *Babylonian sages who established centers of learning in Spain, *North Africa, and *Egypt. See also THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Abravanel (also Abarbanel) Family. Despite their claim to *Davidic descent, members of the Abravanel family first appear in history as eminent figures at a number of medieval courts in *Spain. In addition to prominent financier-politicians and Jewish communal leaders, the family produced two illustrious scholars, Isaac (1437–1509) and his eldest son Judah (ca. 1460–c. 1521), although only the former had a significant impact on later Jewish thought and literature.

ISAAC ABRAVANEL, born in Lisbon in 1437, spent most of his life in *Portugal; he moved to Spain in 1483, nine years before Spanish Jewry's 1492 expulsion. A leader of Spanish Jewry at the time, he chose departure from Spain over conversion to Christianity and lived the rest of his life in *Italy. Abravanel was one of late medieval and early modern Judaism's most prolific and versatile Hebrew scholars. His premier work is his commentary on the *Torah; he interpreted prophetic literature and the book of *Daniel as well. Abravanel's other writings are theological tomes, although they also often took the form of commentaries. His commentary on the *Passover haggadah is the best known example.

Isaac Abravanel's political thought included strong opposition to monarchy. His three lengthy messianic works contain much anti-Christian argumentation. Isaac Abravanel employed Renaissance methods and ideas in both his Iberian and Italian works, attracting the attention of a wide range of Jewish scholars and many Christians, some of whom translated excerpts into Latin.

JUDAH ABRAVANEL, Isaac's son, better known as Leone Ebreo, wrote the Dialoghi d'amore (Dialogues of Love), a Renaissance Neoplatonic tract whose original language is a matter of dispute. After its posthumous publication in Italian in 1535, it was translated into other languages, including French and Latin. The work comprises three dialogues on love between the characters Philo and Sophia. Its style and contents bear strong affinities to literary and intellectual currents associated with contemporaneous Florentine Neoplatonist trends. Its later readership included Giordano Bruno, *Spinoza, and Friedrich Schiller. Judah's wrenching Hebrew lament to a son living in Portugal as a forced convert to Christianity also survives.

Various Abravanel continued to hold eminent positions in *Sephardic *Diaspora communities during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. BENVENIDA (ca. 1473–after 1560) of Naples and later Ferrara, daughter of Jacob Abravanel (d. 1528), one of Isaac's two brothers, and wife of Isaac's son Samuel (d. 1547), was one of the most influential and wealthy Jewish women in early modern Italy. A supporter of the *messianic pretender David Reuveni (d. 1538), Benvenida had close ties with Eleanor of Toledo, who became the wife of Cosimo the Great of the Medici family. The Abravanel family's contemporary descendants live on several continents and many proudly identify with the family motto: "Basta mi nombre que es Abravanel" (It is enough that my name is Abravanel).

For further reading, see E. Lawee, Isaac Abarbanel's Stance toward Tradition (2001); and B. Netanyahu, Don Isaac Abravanel (5th ed., 1998).

ERIC LAWEE

Abulafia, Abraham (1240–ca. 1291) was one of the greatest mystics among medieval Jewish *kabbalists. He developed an intensely individual type of mystical contemplation based on a mystical attitude toward language. Born in *Spain, Abulafia wandered in several countries, reaching Acre in 1260; he lived and taught in *Sicily, *Greece, and *Italy. Gershom *Scholem characterized his work as "ecstatic" or "prophetic" *kabbalah; indeed, Abulafia sometimes described himself as a "prophet," and the aim of his mystical contemplation was the achievement of *prophecy. Abulafia rejected the prevalent kabbalistic set of symbols describing the ten divine attributes, the *sefirot, as personalized elements of the divine pleroma. To assist in achieving perception of the divine, he developed mystical methodologies, including some physical exercises, a rare element among Jewish mystics.

Abulafia was versed in rationalistic philosophy, but in Sitrei Torah (The Secrets of the Torah), a commentary he wrote on *Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, he attributes kabbalistic ideas to Maimonides. He wrote more than a score of treatises, among them a commentary on the divine name of seventy-two letters, Sefer ha-Shem (The Book of the Name); commentaries on the ancient Sefer Yetzirah* (Book of Creation); and polemical works against his opponents (who included Solomon ben Adret). In 1280 Abulafia was sentenced to death in Rome after he attempted to meet the Pope, Nicholas III, to convince him to be more tolerant toward the Jews; he was saved by the Pope's death. Messianic elements became dominant in his activities in his last years, and he was accused of pretending to be the *Messiah.

Abulafia's writings influenced some of the Christian kabbalists of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, especially Pico della Mirandola and Johannes Reuchlin. Some of the *Safed kabbalists of the sixteenth century made use of his works, and several later Jewish mystics derived ideas from his writings.

For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954); M. Idel, Mystical Experiences of Abraham Abulafia (1988); and idem, Language, Torah and Hermeneutics in Abraham Abulafia (1989). JOSEPH DAN

Academy for Jewish Religion (AJR), with campuses in metropolitan New York (www.ajrsem.org) and Los Angeles, California (www.ajrca.org), trains and ordains rabbis and cantors to serve across denominations, as well as in unaffiliated synagogues and community organizations. AJR's flexible scheduling allows part-time extended study and attracts many mature and second-career students.

AJR was founded in 1956 as an independent rabbinical seminary after the nondenominational Jewish Institute of Religion merged with Hebrew Union College (Reform). AJR pioneered in promoting a pluralistic and spiritual view of Judaism, while its curriculum remained grounded in text and tradition. A cantorial school was added in 1992. In 2002, a campus was opened in Los Angeles, which currently operates independently of the New York campus while maintaining the same ethos. SHOHAMA WIENER

Adam is the name of the first human being in the Eden narrative of Genesis 2–3. Because the Hebrew word 'adam can be a collective noun meaning a generic "human being" (as in Gen 1:26–28), its use in Genesis 2:7 to describe the first human can be understood as denoting a genderless or androgynous being. When God divides the first human being by removing one "side" (rather than "rib"), both "woman" ('ishah) and "man" ('ish) are created as gendered beings (Gen 2:23). Throughout the narrative (except Gen 2:5) until the divine surgery, 'adam is used with the definite article and should be understood as "the human." The proper name Adam appears unambiguously in 3:17, when Adam is told that he must undertake difficult labor to grow crops. Adam names his wife *Eve in 3:20; she gives birth to three sons, *Cain and Abel (Gen: 4:1–2), and Seth (Gen 4:25). The hard life of Israelite farmers, as well as the reunion of male and female in *marriage, is explained in this etiological narrative. CAROL MEYERS

Adam Kadmon (literally "primordial man," anthropos) is a kabbalistic term that came to represent, in the *Kabbalah of the thirteenth century and later, the concept of the uppermost, hidden essence of the totality of divine powers – the pleroma – when it is conceived in anthropomorphic terms. It is a counterpart to the ancient term shiur komah, which expresses the concept of divinity in hekhalot *mysticism (both terms coexisted within the Kabbalah). The term became a potent mystical symbol in the *Zohar, and especially in the *Lurianic myth of the late sixteenth century, in which it is described as the first emanation from the eternal divine light. Adam Kadmon often designates the highest stages in the divine hierarchy of powers and appears mostly in cosmogonic contexts. This concept expresses the kabbalistic perception of the different divine powers as limbs of an enormous, mystical anthropomorphic entity. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954); and idem, Kabbalah (1974). JOSEPH DAN

Adar is the twelfth month of the Jewish calendar; it is equivalent to February or March on the Gregorian calendar. In the process called intercalation, which maintains synchronization between the festivals and their appropriate seasons, a leap month is added to the calendar seven times in a nineteen-year cycle. In the years when this leap month is added, it follows Adar and is called Adar II (Adar Bet). In leap years the festival of *Purim (Adar 14) takes place in Adar II (M. Megillah 1:4). See also CALENDAR and CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Adler, Cyrus (1863–1940) was an academic administrator and communal leader. The first American-trained PhD in Semitics (1887), Adler was librarian of the Smithsonian Institution (1892) and its assistant secretary (1905). Adler helped found the *Jewish Publication Society of America (1888), the American Jewish Historical Society (1892), and the *American Jewish Committee (1906). In 1908 Adler became president of Dropsie College, an institution devoted to advanced Judaic and Semitic scholarship; in 1915, he succeeded *Solomon Schechter as president of the *Jewish Theological Seminary while retaining his presidency of Dropsie. He remained president of both institutions until his death. Adler helped found both the *Jewish Welfare Board and the *American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and chaired the committee that produced the Jewish Publication Society translation of the Hebrew Bible (1917). In 1919, he represented the American Jewish Committee at the Versailles Peace Conference and participated in negotiations for an enlarged Jewish Agency for *Palestine. He went on to serve as president of its council and chair of its administrative committee (1930–31). See also ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA; UNITED STATES: MILITARY CHAPLAINCY.

IRA ROBINSON

Adoption. Historically, there has been no process of adoption in Jewish law because identity in the traditional Jewish community is determined by lineage and bloodlines. A male whose birth father is of priestly descent is also a *priest, regardless of the status of the adoptive father; an adopted son cannot become a priest even if his adoptive father is of priestly descent. The status of the birth mother is also crucial: A child born of a Jewish mother is a Jew. However, a child born from an illicit sexual relationship such as incest or *adultery (i.e., the mother's husband is not the father of her child) is a *mamzer ("illegitimate") and is permanently limited in his or her standing and marital options in the traditional Jewish community.

An individual may be appointed a guardian (apotropos) who assumes permanent responsibility for a child's well-being, undertaking all obligations that natural parents have toward their offspring. Jewish tradition teaches that a person who raises an orphan is equivalent to a natural parent (BT Sanhedrin 19b and BT Megillah 13a). Legal sources addressing the guardian include BT Ketubbot 101b; *Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, Ishut 23:17–18; and *Karo, Shulhan Arukh, Even Ha-Ezer 114 and Hoshen Mishpat 60:2–5; 207:20–21.

In contemporary Jewish life, adoption of children according to the laws of the country of residence occurs frequently; perhaps 3% of contemporary Jewish families are formed by adoption. Halakhic concerns focus on the child's Jewish status, because any uncertainty may affect the child's ability to marry into the traditional Jewish community. Adoptive parents are often advised to obtain documentation on the natural parents' backgrounds and marital status. Proof of the birth mother's Jewish status is also necessary should the child move to Israel and/or wish to be married there; it is also important to know if a Jewish father was of priestly descent. To avoid many of these complexities, potential adoptive parents may choose to adopt a Gentile infant who can then be formally converted to Judaism, although conversions of adopted children may also raise halakhic questions.

Until 1998, all adoptions in *Israel were handled by the Adoption Service of Israel's Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs and had to be approved by both secular and rabbinical courts. Court-sanctioned adoptions remove all family ties with the natural parents and create family ties with the adoptive parents equivalent to those between natural parents and their child. In recognition of halakhah, however, adoption does not affect the consequences of the blood relationship between the adoptee and his or her birth parents: Prohibitions and permissions regarding marriage and divorce based on the child's bloodlines continue to apply. Only Israeli citizens may adopt Israeli infants and the process is difficult. Few healthy Jewish infants are available and adoption requirements are stringent. Israeli legislation as of 1998 allows adoptions from other countries if arranged by private, licensed, nonprofit agencies. Foreign adoptees need not have Jewish parentage or be converted to Judaism after adoption. For further reading, see M. Gold, And Hannah Wept: Infertility, Adoption, and the Jewish Couple (1988); and S. K. Rosenberg, Adoption and the Jewish Family (1998).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Adultery. In Judaism, adultery refers to sexual relations between a man, married or single, and a married woman (or a woman bound in some other way by halakhah* to a particular man). A married man's sexual involvement with a single woman, Jewish or Gentile, although morally problematic, is not adulterous. This gender inequity reflects the patriarchal contexts of biblical and rabbinic Judaism, as well as the importance placed on purity of lineage; a man wanted to be sure that his wife's children were also his own. Fear of adultery led to rabbinic strictures on women's free movement beyond the home, the expectation that modest women would be veiled outside the house, and efforts to restrict women's contacts with men beyond the family circle.

In medieval Muslim environments Jewish religious and community ideals continued to dictate that women should remain at home. Although *marriages were often unhappy and divorce was not uncommon, accusations of adultery against wives rarely appear in sources from this milieu. In Germany and elsewhere in Northern Europe, where women were far less sequestered than in the Muslim world, concern with adultery was more frequent. The Hasidei Ashkenaz, the pietistic authors of the twelfth-century Sefer Hasidim (Book of the Pious), are preoccupied with illicit encounters, whether real or imagined, in which Jewish men have sexual contact with single and married Jewish women (both minors and adults), Jewish and Christian maidservants, and other Christian women. These encounters are presented as temptations of everyday life, and the pietistic response is to set up as many barriers as possible to men's contacts with women, including women of their own families. The *responsa of R. Meir of Rothenburg (d. 1293) contains a number of queries in which men accuse their wives of adultery, sometimes with Jews and sometimes with Gentiles; in at least one case a wife admits adultery. In almost every instance, R. Meir rejects the veracity of the evidence and rules against the right of the husband to divorce his wife without returning her ketubbah (contracted financial settlement), even in a case where a woman bore a child twelve months after her husband's departure on a business trip. R. Meir's evident motivations were to preserve the public sanctity of the family, to deter men from making false accusations in order to rid themselves of unloved wives without significant expense, and to discourage women from engaging in or pretending to engage in adulterous behavior to instigate a divorce to escape an unhappy marriage.

In *Spain and *Italy, sexual mores, particularly among wealthy acculturated Jews, were often far from halakhic ideals; archival records indicate that both men and women were involved in adulterous relationships. Accusations of adultery also figure in divorce cases in early modern and modern Eastern Europe, although here, too, they may have reflected other family tensions and anxieties (Freeze, 182).

The theme of adultery appears frequently in modern Jewish literature, often symbolizing social and historical crises affecting individuals and communities. Examples include I. J. Singer's Yoshe Kalb (Yiddish, 1932), set in a Hasidic court; I. B. Singer's short stories and novels; S. Y. Agnon's novel Shira (Hebrew, 1971), set in 1930s Palestine; the late-twentieth-century American novels of Saul Bellow and Philip Roth; and novels of Israeli writers Amos Oz (My Michael) and A. B. Yehoshua (The Lover), among others.

For further reading see Y. Assis, "Sexual Behaviour in Mediaeval Hispano-Jewish Society," in Jewish History: Essays in Honour of Chimen Abramsky (1988) 25–59; J. R. Baskin, "From Separation to Displacement: The Problem of Women in Sefer Hasidim," AJS Review 19 (1994): 1–18; D. Biale, Eros and the Jews (1992); C. Y. Freeze, Jewish Marriage and Divorce in Imperial Russia (2002); S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society, vol. 3: The Family (1978); and A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2004).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Aesthetics. Unlike *ethics and epistemology, the central role played by aesthetics in modern Jewish *thought remains little studied. Despite its low reputation (identified with pleasure, subjectivism, relativism, and pagan idolatry), aesthetics was central to the actual practice of modern Jewish thought, starting in the eighteenth century with Moses *Mendelssohn. Once the arbiters of Jewish law lost the political power to coerce communal conformity in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the expression of Jewish life and thought (its conception of *God, law, ethics, and community) turned into a type of applied art. Understood broadly, aesthetics refers not just to the disinterested, autonomous study of art, poetry, and beauty. Rather, it calls for sustained attention to the full gamut of aesthesis, showing how sensation and sign organize subjects and objects into visual, sonic, and dramatic patterns. Viewed through a holistic prism, a fundamental connection is presumed between aesthetics, ethics, and truth. These signs and the patterns they shape are constituted by physical acts, mental images, and intellectual forms.

ARTISTIC REPRESENTATION: Modern Jewish intellectual history has been particularly unsympathetic to visual aesthetics. The notion that Judaism is fundamentally aniconic and hostile to visual expression reflects a German philosophical cliché in which *poetry and time were privileged over plastic art and space. This conception began with Lessing, Kant, and Hegel, but liberal German-Jewish historians and philosophers such as Heinrich *Graetz and Hermann *Cohen identified it with Judaism as well. It enters into the arts and theory of German modernism via Arnold Schoenberg and Theodor Adorno. However, the notion of an aniconic Judaism is out of step with Jewish scholarship of the twenty-first century. Historians of Jewish *art have convincingly demonstrated that the ban on idolatry in the second of the *Ten Commandments (Exod 20:4–5) applies only to graphic representation of God and the use of images in *worship and does not comprehensively prohibit all figurative expression. That Judaism lacks an extensive fine arts tradition has less to do with the second commandment than with political realities and social exclusions unique to Jewish history and to the practice of art in Christian Europe (see also entries under ART).

AESTHETICS AND RITUAL: The ritual act was the first and primary figure that preoccupied modern Jewish thought at its inception in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Having lost its law-based, coercive character, “*Torah” became “ceremonial.” As ceremony, the force of “law” is no longer legal. Its authority is as much, if not more, aesthetic as it is cognitive and moral. According to Mendelssohn (Jerusalem, Philosophical Writings), language is a system of signs, first oral and then written, that forms knowledge out of sense impression. The sign sets an object, phenomenon, or other characteristic apart from the surrounding mass of sense impressions into which it would otherwise vanish. Understood as a living script composed of visible signs, the ceremonial law points the mind to reflect on universal philosophical truths. For Cohen (Religion of Reason), Judaism is a pure pattern (Gebild). Despite his own excoriation of art, he compared the Mosaic law to the fine detail of Persian miniature painting. The notion that law constituted an allusive pattern for the cultivation of spiritual and ethical goods continued into the twentieth century in works by Franz *Rosenzweig (The Star of Redemption) and Abraham Joshua *Heschel (Man Is Not Alone; God in Search of Man). The Orthodox thinker Joseph *Soloveitchik (Halakhic Man; The Halakhic Mind) does not reject aesthetic rapture as much as he finds it on halakhic cognition, referring repeatedly to the beauty of *mitzvot (commandments) and of the behavior of those who study and uphold them. For Soloveitchik, the value of mitzvah was not instrumental, but rather innate (l’shma), enjoying the same autonomy as a Modernist work of art.

GOD: As a figure of thought, *God was the subject of the most radical aesthetization in early-twentieth-century Jewish thought. Straining against the second commandment, Martin *Buber (I and Thou) and Franz Rosenzweig (The Star of Redemption) evoked the visual character of religious experience with words. The key word is Gestalt. For Buber, God is the Eternal You, eluding all the limited and limiting categories of language and instrumental reason. And yet, Buber made clear that the revelation of an evanescent, shapeless presence creates its own form in time and space: The living forms of God known through the history of religions are an index to a divine reality that transcends their own historical nature. These forms are the product of the human image-making power in response to *revelation and are subject to generation, decay, and regeneration in concrete human situations. For Rosenzweig, Jewish and Christian ritual practice constellate into a meta-cosmos, in which six figures (God, world, “man,” creation, revelation, and *redemption) assemble into an integrated star-shaped figure. At the end of Rosenzweig’s system, a now visible manifestation of God’s face, a palpable image of absolute truth, confronts the soul at death’s border and ushers it back into life. In short, despite the divine resistance to representation, some simulacral appearance (or discourse about such an appearance) is present in twentieth-century Jewish thought.

EMBODIMENT: Physical sensation and the physical body, and the images and ideas that shape them, are the heart and soul of aesthetics. In classical Jewish thought, God’s presence is inseparable from *covenant and human community. Philosophically, modern Jewish thought’s emphasis on peoplehood and bodies results from the decline of idealism and metaphysics in twentieth-century western philosophy. The body of Israel is a central figure from the work of Buber, Rosenzweig, and Leo Baeck to post-Holocaust thinkers (Richard *Rubenstein, Eliezer *Berkovits, Emil *Fackenheim, Arthur Cohen), and Michael Wyschogrod, Arthur Green, and *feminist thinkers (Judith Plaskow and Rachel Adler [see JUDAISM, FEMINIST]). Contemporary Jewish thought cannot be imagined apart from the creation of personae: the biblical *prophet, Judah *Halevi, the *Hasidic sage, the Israeli, the Jewish *woman.

The self-conscious attention to aesthetics in modern Jewish thought signals an increasingly expansive view of human culture and Jewish community, in tandem with an increasingly expansive view of human reason. For this tradition, committed to *reason, but not bound by it, aesthetics provides an embodied notion of human intelligence that is thoroughly imbricated in human sensation and imagination and, more broadly, in community, tradition, and politics. As an aesthetic practice, modern Jewish thought creates out of Judaism an image space from which to think about the inter-face among God, Torah, and Israel.

For further reading, see Z. Braiterman, The Shape of Revelation: Aesthetics and Modern Jewish Thought (2007); and THOUGHT, MODERN. ZACHARY BRAITERMAN

Afterlife: Hebrew *Bible and *Second Temple Period. Ancient Israelite thought made no strict distinction between body and soul; the idea that something of importance could survive death is not prominent in biblical writings. The Hebrew word nefesh, often translated as “soul,” did not pertain to something that could be separated from the body. The word might be better translated as “person,” because although *Adam is called a living soul, a corpse is described as a dead soul (Lev 21:11; Num 6:6). The life-sustaining essence of creatures was normally understood to be their blood, as the *dietary laws demonstrate. Yet the disappearance of breath was also observed as a characteristic of dying, abetting the idea of the spirit (ruah, “wind” or “breath”) of the dead. No sense of reward or desirability was attached to the idea of becoming a spirit. According to various passages in the Hebrew Bible, the dead reside together in a dark and silent underworld called Sheol, in greatly attenuated form (Gen 37:36; 1 Sam 28:7–20). Sheol is not equivalent to heaven or hell; rather it is the grave itself, a place of weakness and estrangement from God.

Ancient Israelite society generally did not believe that there would be life after death. According to *Ecclesiastes 3:19, “For the fate of the son of man and the fate of the beasts is the same; as one dies, so dies the other. They all have the same breath, and man has no advantage over the beasts; for all is ephemeral.” *Job 14:14 asks directly whether human beings live again after they die and answers that there is nothing else (14:20–22). Job 19:25–27, a passage that has suffered in transmission, is often read as a prediction of Job’s *resurrection. However, the passage only affirms that Job wants to be vindicated while still alive in a heavenly court by a heavenly advocate or lawyer, as the logical outcome of his challenge to the justice of *God. In fact, the book of Job appears to argue against any simple pietistic notion of immortality.

Some intimations of immortality do appear in the Hebrew Bible. In the later prophetic books especially, the *Canaanite mythological battle between Death and *Baal is used as a metaphor for God’s power. *Isaiah 25:8 says, “God will swallow up death forever.” Isaiah 26 and *Ezekiel 37 speak of the restoration of the people as a resurrection of buried bones. Yet these verses do not imply the expectation of a literal resurrection; rather, resurrection is a metaphor for the people’s national and spiritual rebirth under the influence of *prophecy. The first indubitable reference to physical resurrection in biblical literature comes from the visions in the book of *Daniel, which date to the period of the *Maccabean revolt. Daniel 12:2–3 states, “And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And those who are wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament; and those who turn many to righteousness, like the stars forever and ever.” These verses do not articulate any general theory of immortality, only the resurrection of the many, which satisfies the Israelite concept of justice. Those who suffered and died while remaining true to God’s *Torah will be vindicated. The reference to the saved as “those who sleep in the dust” may be a reinterpretation of Isaiah 26:19. Those who persecuted the righteous of God will also be resurrected so that they can be punished.

Second Temple Judaism evidently developed this doctrine of resurrection in response to the problem of righteous suffering and *martyrdom. Resurrection of this type, the most frequent type in Jewish thought, focuses on rebirth in this world at a time when present injustices have been righted and removed. Another aspect of the tradition of resurrection is the theme of ascension to the eternal, deathless heaven where the most deserving and righteous go. The story of the seven martyred sons in 2 Maccabees 7 clarifies the importance of this idea (see MACCABEES, BOOKS OF). Several of the sons, who are tortured because they will not eat pork, report that after their short time of pain and suffering on earth they expect to be transported to heaven as an eternal reward for their martyrdom.

In none of these stories is the journey to heaven itself an important motif. However, the heavenly journey motif is central in I *Enoch and other *apocalyptic and *pseudepigraphical writings (see ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD). In most cases, a journey to heaven is assumed to take place at death, for paradise and hell are both located in one of the several heavens. Great personages or mystics could undertake heavenly ascent during life by means of an ecstatic trance or other extracorporeal experiences. Mystical techniques appear in some Jewish *apocalyptic texts, and the resulting heavenly journey functions as verification for the eschatological beliefs of the community. Once a credible *prophet has visited heaven and seen the ultimate rewards there, he vividly communicates these notions of eternal life and compensation to the community.

In the first century CE, the concept of resurrection was very much debated. The *Sadducees rejected it entirely, but the *Pharisees accepted the idea, as did early Christians (see CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM). In ensuing centuries, resurrection became a general belief in both rabbinic Judaism and *Christianity. For further reading, see A. F. Segal, Life After Death: A History of the Afterlife in Western Religion (2004), and see also MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE.

ALAN F. SEGAL

Aggadah (plural: aggadot; variant: haggadah; Aramaic: aggad'ta, from the Hebrew nagad, “to tell, relate”) refers in the broadest sense to nonlegal rabbinic traditions. This term, in Hebrew and *Aramaic, appears in early rabbinic works as distinct from or in contrast to *Mishnah, *Talmud, and *halakhah. Aggadah describes a broad variety of literary forms. Much of aggadah can also be categorized as *midrash, exegesis of scripture. This type of aggadah seeks to explain the meaning of biblical verses, usually focusing on those portions of the *Bible that are nonlegal in nature. The term is also used to describe expansions of *biblical narratives: Rabbinic stories that focus on the lives of biblical characters are characterized as aggadah, even when they do not cite specific biblical verses. There is also a fair amount of aggadic material that is unrelated to the biblical text. Accounts of historical events, stories about rabbis, folktales, maxims, and ethical aphorisms – all of these fall under the rubric of aggadah. It is the wide variety of genres within aggadah that has led some scholars to assert that whatever cannot be categorized as halakhah should be considered aggadah.

Many aggadot may have originated in folk traditions, but the versions found in *rabbinic literature have been shaped and reworked by the Rabbis. The willingness not only to transmit stories but also to revise them to function in new contexts is evident when we compare multiple versions of the same story within a rabbinic work or in several rabbinic works. Although individual *Tannaim and *Amoraim are often credited with both halakhic and aggadic teachings, some Rabbis were associated primarily with aggadah. Several rabbinic texts identify individuals as ba'alei aggadah, “masters of aggadah.” Popular affection for aggadah is evident in a story about two sages who came to a town to teach; the one who offered a halakhic lecture found himself alone, while crowds flocked to hear his colleague give an aggadic presentation (BT Sotah 40a). One tradition identifies halakhah as the “essence of *Torah” and aggadah as that which appeals to the heart (Sifre Deuteronomy, Ha’azinu).

Aggadah can be found in all the major works of classical rabbinic literature. Even “legal” texts like the *Mishnah and *Tosefta contain aggadic material. Although the Palestinian Amoraim are more closely associated with aggadah than their Babylonian counterparts, the Babylonian *Talmud contains significant amounts of aggadah. There are also works that are almost exclusively aggadic in nature; these include the major collections of amoraic midrash such as Genesis Rabbah and Exodus Rabbah.

Aggadah and halakhah were recognized as distinct by the early Rabbis but they should not be read in isolation in those texts in which both appear. The Mishnah, the most “legal” of rabbinic works, uses aggadic accounts of individuals’ behavior to support or challenge legal rulings. Aggadah may serve to highlight a problem with a law or to commend behavior that goes beyond the letter of the law. A talmudic story is best understood in the context of the larger unit (sugya) of which it is a part, a unit that is likely to include legal material as well. Post-talmudic authorities often expressed discomfort with the fluidity and creativity of aggadah and with the willingness of creators and redactors to generate and preserve multiple meanings from a word or phrase without reaching a consensus. This discomfort began in the period of the *Geonim and led to a growing emphasis on halakhah and the publication of works that were wholly halakhic in nature, even when they were based on earlier texts that contained both aggadah and halakhah.

For further reading, see J. Heinemann, “The Nature of Aggadah,” and J. Goldin, “The Freedom and Restraint of Haggadah,” both in Midrash and Literature, ed. G. H. Hartman and S. Budick (1986); J. Rubenstein, Talmudic Stories (1999); G. Hasan-Rokem, Web of Life: Folklore and Midrash in Rabbinic Literature (2000); and A. Shinan, The World of the Aggadah (1990).

DVORA E. WEISBERG

Agnon, S. Y. (1888–1970) was the most celebrated Hebrew prose writer of the twentieth century and the recipient of the 1966 Nobel Prize for Literature. Agnon is renowned for fiction that combines thematic scrutiny of modern crisis with abundant echoes of traditional Jewish sources. He produced numerous novels and short stories, and his daughter Emuna Yaron has published many posthumous volumes of his work, including letters, sketches, legends, and the unfinished novel, Shira (1971).

Born Shmuel Yosef Czaczkes in *Galicia, he moved to *Palestine in 1907; he spent periods of his life in *Germany, but from 1924 on lived in *Jerusalem. Agnon’s writing memorializes Buczacz, his hometown, and laments its destruction during the *Holocaust; he also recounts stories of Jewish life in Germany between the world wars (in, for example, A Guest for the Night [1938]) and portrays the *Yishuv in the early days of *Zionist settlement (importantly, in Only Yesterday [1945]). His art displays probing psychological realism; highly symbolic, dreamlike sequences; and elements of folktale and the picaresque. Yet these generically diverse narratives are all tied to a central concern with loss, especially communal collapse, and *redemption. Agnon cultivated a distinct prose style, closer to rabbinic language than to modern spoken Hebrew. Notable for its musicality and allusive richness, his writing is also suffused with ironies. The author rebelled against Orthodoxy in his youth but later returned to it, along the way fashioning a sophisticated literary wit that slyly plays religious and secular perspectives against one another. As a young man Agnon also published in *Yiddish.

In his lifetime Agnon became an iconic figure. After his death, his house in Jerusalem became a museum; an Agnon archive was established at Israel’s National Library, his picture appeared on Israeli currency, and streets are named after him throughout *Israel. He himself promoted his image as the master storyteller of modern Jewish upheaval and continuity. The name he invented for himself, Agnon, testifies to that self-construction. It is based on the title of an early story, “Agunut,” which describes Jews who are both anchored in community and alienated from it.

NAOMI SOKOLOFF

Agricultural Settlements: See BARON DE HIRSCH FUND; CANADA; FILM: LATIN AMERICA; ISRAEL: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS; LATIN AMERICA; UNITED STATES: AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS

Agudat Israel (also AGUDAS ISRAEL; AGUDAH) is a worldwide movement of *Orthodox Jewry founded in 1912. Branches were established in most countries of Europe, as well as in the *United States and *British Mandate *Palestine. Agudat Israel reached its apogee of political achievement and institutional development in interwar Eastern Europe, electing representatives to national parliaments in *Poland, Latvia, and *Romania; to city councils and Jewish communal boards and boards administering educational systems; and to youth and workers’ movements. The initiative for the founding of Agudat Israel (and several of its important ideologues) came from the separatist Orthodox community of *Germany, which tried to enlist Eastern European Orthodoxy and its leaders in the fight against *Zionism and *Reform Judaism. This effort coincided with the first steps by Orthodox Jews in Eastern Europe toward political organization. The supreme body of Agudat Israel is the Kenessiah Gedolah, the movement’s grand assembly, first convened in 1923. In Agudah’s ideology, however, the movement is ultimately guided and legitimated by its Council of Torah Sages (Moetzet Gedolei Ha-Torah), which determines policy on all matters political, social, or educational. In the post-*Holocaust era, this doctrine of rabbinic authority, known as Da’at Torah (first popularized in the interwar period by rabbis and *Hasidic rebbes associated with Agudat Israel in Eastern Europe), became widespread in Orthodox Jewry. Another innovation adopted and developed by Agudah was the Beis Yaakov schools (see SCHENIRER, SARAH), offering formal religious education for young women. After World War II, *Israel and the *United States became the main centers for the movement. In Israel, Agudat Israel continues to function as a political party, offering a joint list of parliamentary candidates with another religious party, Degel ha-Torah, under the rubric “United Torah Judaism.” In the eighteenth Knesset (elected 2009), United Torah Judaism won five seats. In the United States, Agudah serves as an effective lobbying group, uniting much of Ḥasidic and non-Ḥasidic non-Zionist Orthodoxy under its banner. GERSHON BACON

Agunah. The designation agunah (“anchored” or “chained” woman) applies to women in several situations, including a married woman whose husband has disappeared but whose death cannot be proven for lack of physical remains or witnesses to his death. Such a woman may never remarry according to Jewish law. A woman whose estranged husband refuses to give her a get (divorce document), either out of malice or in an effort to extort funds from the woman or her family, is in a similar predicament, because divorce has always been a prerogative restricted to men in Jewish law (halakhah). A third instance occurs in the case of the levirate widow (see MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE). Even though levirate marriages virtually never occur in the contemporary era, Orthodox Judaism (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX) requires a childless widow to undergo the ceremony of ḥalitza to be free to remarry. If her brother-in-law refuses to cooperate or makes exorbitant financial demands, this woman may also find herself an agunah. Should an agunah make a civil marriage or become involved with a man outside of marriage, any children of this union will be considered illegitimate (mamzerim) according to halakhah. This is a permanent disability; the mamzer may only marry another Jew of similar “illegitimate” status. Contemporary Orthodox communities attempt to resolve the situation of the agunah on a case-by-case basis and by exerting pressure on the reluctant men involved, but many thousands of women remain in this situation of significant disability. In recent years, a number of Orthodox advocacy groups have been established to address the plight of the “chained woman.” JUDITH R. BASKIN

Ahab, king of *Israel in the ninth century BCE, succeeded his father Omri and ruled for twenty-two years (1 Kgs 16:29). He was a contemporary of the prophet *Elijah. Ahab’s alliances with *Judah (to the south), *Phoenicia (to the north), and particularly with Tyre, through his marriage to Jezebel, the king’s daughter, resulted in periods of significant economic prosperity. Ahab was killed in an effort to recover Ramoth-Gilead from the Arameans (1 Kgs 22) ca. 850 BCE and was succeeded by his son Ahaziah (1 Kgs 22:40). Despite his accomplishments, Ahab is admonished for doing “what was displeasing in the eyes of God, more than all who had preceded him” (1 Kgs 16:30 and 22:25–26), a reference to his support of Jezebel’s introduction of widespread worship of *Baal (16:31–33). 1 *Kings 22 recounts how Jezebel arranged the death of the innocent Naboth so that Ahab could possess his vineyard. Confronted by Elijah, who predicted the disasters that would befall his house, Ahab repented (22:27–29), delaying the fulfillment of Elijah’s prophecies. Map 2 KATE FRIEDMAN

Aḥad Ha-Am (1856–1927) is the pen name of Hebrew essayist and Zionist ideologue Asher Ginzberg; the name means “one of the people.” An austere master of Hebrew prose, Aḥad Ha-Am wrote expositions on morality and politics in the vein of Herbert Spencer or the Russian populist intellectual Piotr Lavrov. These essays, mostly rather brief, remain among the most influential Hebrew works of their kind. Aḥad Ha-Am was also the father of “cultural *Zionism”; he believed that Jews must carve out for themselves a national state where, because of Jewish values more fundamental than those of *theology, the requirements of decency would forever overshadow those of pragmatism. He was the founding editor of the most important Hebrew periodical of its time, Ha-Shiloah, and led a semi-secret group within the Zionist movement, the B’nei Moshe. Aḥad Ha-Am’s best known essays include “The Truth from the Land of Israel” and “The Supremacy of Reason.” He was one of the first important Zionists to call attention to the primacy of the Arab question. For further reading see RUSSIA; ZIONISM; and S. J. Zipperstein, Elusive Prophet: Aḥad Ha’am and the Origins of Zionism (1993). STEVEN J. ZIPPERSTEIN

Akedah (“Binding” of Isaac): See ABRAHAM; ISAAC

Akiva ben Joseph (ca. 45–135 CE) was a third-generation *Tanna and one of the most influential rabbinic sages. Rabbinic tradition holds that he spent his early life as a shepherd and remained uneducated until the age of forty; subsequently he devoted himself to study with the support of his wife Rachel. Akiva developed a method of biblical *hermeneutics in which every word, sign, orthographic variation, and grammatical peculiarity had a significance that could be used to make *halakhic decisions (see RABBINIC HERMENEUTICS). He defended the holiness of the biblical book *Song of Songs, which he interpreted as an allegory of the relationship between *God and the people of Israel, and he supported its canonization. Akiva appears to have originated the organization of rabbinic legal teachings by subject matter, a method later used in the *Mishnah. Among his students were many of the leading fourth-generation Tannaim. An avid Jewish nationalist, Akiva traveled to *Rome in an attempt to reverse Domitian’s legislation against Jews, and he is said to have been an enthusiastic supporter of *Bar Kokhba’s revolt and of his messianic claims. Akiva was arrested for defying the Emperor Hadrian’s decree against the study of *Torah and was one of the ten Rabbis martyred by the Romans at Caesarea. See also AVOT DE RABBI NATAN; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; FOLK-TALES; JEWISH WAR, SECOND; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE; LOVE; MARTYRDOM; REDEMPTION; TRIBES, TEN LOST. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Alexander the Great. The son of Philip II and Olympias, Alexander III (356–323 BCE) became king of Macedonia in 336 after the assassination of his father. Seeking revenge on the Persians for their earlier wars against the Greeks, Alexander embarked on a ten-year campaign in which he conquered Asia Minor, the Levant, *Egypt, and *Mesopotamia while establishing footholds in Bactria and the Indus River valley. Between his victories over Darius III at Issus (333) and Gaugamela (331), Alexander marched through *Phoenicia to Egypt, where the oracle of Amon confirmed his claims of divine ancestry. Bolstered by his military victories and a growing confidence in his status as the son of Zeus, Alexander sought to incorporate the heritage of the Greeks into the cultures of the East. This emerging syncretism had a profound impact on Jewish life and would polarize later generations of Jews. Not surprisingly, Jewish literature treats Alexander in an ambivalent manner. Both 1 *Maccabees (1:1–8) and *Daniel (7:7; 8:5–7, 20–22; 11:3) highlight his military ruthlessness, with the latter text placing his empire within an apocalyptic framework. Yet *Josephus (Antiquities 11.321–347) and the Babylonian

*Talmud (Yoma 69a) describe Jews and *Samaritans contending with one another for Alexander's patronage. Josephus' longer account has Alexander visit *Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices to the Jewish God and conferred economic privileges on the Jews after learning that their scripture (attributed anachronistically to *Daniel) prophesied his victory over the Persians. Still other talmudic sources (BT Tamid 32a–b) contain legendary stories about the king, a phenomenon that reflects late antiquity's interest in romanticizing Alexander's life. See also HELLENISM; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT; PERSIA, ANCIENT; PTOLEMIES; SELEUCIDS.

DAVID M. REIS

Alexandria, Ancient. Founded by *Alexander the Great in 331 BCE, Alexandria became the dominant city in the Mediterranean world. Its location at the Nile's outlet to the sea made it the point of departure to the wider world for the agricultural riches of *Egypt, while the *Ptolemies' passion for gathering great scholars and literature in the city made it the cultural capital of the *Hellenistic world. Thus, Alexandria was a magnet for émigrés from around the region, including Judeans who came there from the Levant, *Mesopotamia, and even Asia Minor.

In fact, Judeans appear to have been among the earliest settlers of Alexander's city; *Aramaic burial inscriptions have been found in the city's east necropolis from as early as the beginning of the third century BCE. If *Josephus is to be believed, Alexander himself settled some Judeans there (War 2.487; Apion 2.35); others may have arrived as slaves taken in war (*Letter of Aristeas 12–13) or as economic immigrants from both outside of Egypt and from existing Jewish settlements in Egypt such as Elephantine. Although the evidence is ambiguous, Jews in Alexandria were apparently given the right to form a politeuma, which offered limited form of self-government (cf. Letter of Aristeas 310; Corpus papyrorum judaicarum 2.143), during the reign of Philometor (d. ca. 145 BCE). By the end of the Hellenistic period, *Philo reports that Jews in Egypt numbered around one million (Against Flaccus 43); even allowing for hyperbole, the Jewish population in Alexandria must have been considerable. Josephus (Antiquities 14.117) quotes the Greek geographer Strabo (d. ca. 24 CE) to the effect that the Jews were (favorably) quartered in a single portion of the city, although Philo's report that Jews were not confined to a single part of Alexandria during the disturbances in 38 CE seems to contradict this (Against Flaccus 54–56). In any case, by all accounts the period of Hellenistic rule over Alexandria was a mostly peaceful time when Jews prospered and experienced socioeconomic mobility, in large part through military service.

Roman hegemony brought unwelcome changes to Jews living in Alexandria. Almost immediately *Rome rescinded many privileges enjoyed by the Jews and instituted the laographia (a tax on native Egyptians and other non-Greeks) in 24/23 BCE. In 38 CE, Rome mismanaged a dispute that broke out between Jews and Greeks, and the ensuing rioting and violence continued on and off until 41, when Claudius issued an edict that stabilized Jewish rights in the city. An uneasy peace prevailed until 66 when Tiberius Alexander, Philo's apostate nephew, put down a revolt with force (War 3.487–498). Both violent interludes diminished Jewish prospects in Alexandria; further unrest broke out in 115, leading to the virtual destruction of the Jewish presence in the city in 117. Jews returned to live in the city in the fourth century CE, but only under tense conditions. In 415, violence against the Jews instigated by the Christian Patriarch of the city, Cyril of Alexandria, once more essentially ended the Jewish presence there. See PTOLEMIES; IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT; SEPTUAGINT. Map 4

ROBERT KUGLER

Algeria: See NORTH AFRICA

Aliyah: See ISRAEL, STATE OF: IMMIGRATION entries; TORAH READING

Alliance Israélite Universelle (AIU) is an organization formed in 1860 in *France to help Jews in other countries gain civil rights and *emancipation. Its establishment was prompted by outrage at the 1840 *Damascus blood libel and the 1858 *Mortara Affair. The AIU established a network of schools that extended from Morocco to *Iran, brought talented young men and women from their home communities to be trained as teachers in France, and provided academic, religious, and vocational training to tens of thousands of Jewish young people. Alliance schools provided late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century Jews of the Middle East and *North Africa with a modern education and fluency in French and other European languages, as well as technical skills. Through these advantages, Jews achieved a new and unprecedented mobility in the economic life of the Muslim world that was far out of proportion to their numbers or their traditional social status. For further reading, see ARGENTINA; FRANCE: 1789–1939; IRAN; IRAQ; NORTH AFRICA; and A. Rodrigue, Images of Sephardi and Eastern Jewries in Transition: The Teachers of the Alliance Israélite Universelle, 1860–1939 (1993).

Almohads (Arabic: al-Mowahhidum) were a *North African Berber sectarian reform movement started by Muhammad ibn Tumart (d. 1128) at the beginning of the twelfth century. Tumart's successor, Abd al-Mumin (d. 1163), expanded the dynasty's political power to *Egypt and *Spain, and in 1170 the Almohads established Seville as their capital city. Intolerant of all non-Muslims, the Almohads offered Jews and Christians in Spain the choice of conversion, exile, or death; many Jews fled to Christian *Spain or more tolerant locations in the Muslim world. In 1212, an alliance of Castille, Aragon, Navarre, and *Portugal decisively stopped further Almohad expansion on the Iberian Peninsula. The impact of Almohad rule on Jews in *North Africa, where many adopted *Islam outwardly and practiced Judaism secretly, was devastating and long lasting. Map 6 KATE FRIEDMAN

Almoravids were a Berber dynasty from the southwest Sahara that adopted a fundamentalist form of *Islam in 1080 and established a capital at Marrakesh in Morocco. The Almoravids conquered parts of *North Africa. In 1086, Muslims in *Spain invited the Almoravids to help defend them against the invasion of Alfonso VI, the Christian king of Castile. The successful Almoravids remained in Muslim Spain, assuming power by 1090. Almoravid rulers appear to have been tolerant of Jews in both North Africa and in Spain, although the situation may have deteriorated somewhat by the mid-twelfth century in North Africa. Jewish soldiers, diplomats, and physicians commonly served Almoravid rulers. Maps 5, 6 KATE FRIEDMAN

Alphabet of Ben Sira is an anonymous midrashic work, probably composed in a Muslim country during the period of the *Geonim (possibly as early as the eighth century CE). This rather mysterious text, falsely attributed to the author of the *Wisdom of Ben Sira, consists of two collections of twenty-two proverbs; one collection is in *Aramaic and the other is in *Hebrew and both are arranged as alphabetic acrostics. Each proverb is followed by an *aggadic commentary. Many of the themes in these commentaries are bawdy, satirical, and often misogynistic. Among other folklore traditions, the Alphabet identifies *Lilith with the “first *Eve” and explains her refusal to submit to *Adam as a consequence of her equal creation with him in *Genesis 1.

A translation of parts of the Alphabet by N. Bronznick appears in Rabbinic Fantasies: Imaginative Narratives from Classical Hebrew Literature, ed. D. Stern and M. J. Mirsky (1990), 167–202. For a critical Hebrew edition of this text, see E. Yassif, Sippurei Ben Sira (1984). JUDITH R. BASKIN

American Jewish Committee: See ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA

American Jewish Congress: See ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA

American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee: See JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE

Amidah (Hebrew for “standing”) is the central prayer of communal Jewish *worship; it is also known as “the prayer” or the Eighteen Benedictions (shemoneh esrei).

Ammon was an ancient region located east–west between the Jordan River and the Syro-Arabian desert, and north–south between the Jabbok (Wadi Zerqa) and Arnon (Wadi Mujib) rivers. Its precise boundaries fluctuated in response to shifting regional dynamics, including those with *Moab to the south and Israel to the west. Occupied as early as the Middle and Late Bronze Ages, Ammon is best known from Iron Age remains, found through the excavation of sites such as the Amman Citadel, Tall al-ʿUmayri, Tall Sahab, and Tall Jawa. In the Iron Age II, Ammon became a nation ruled from Rabbat Ammon. Ammonites were polytheistic; their chief god was Milcom. The economy was based on a mix of agriculture and animal husbandry.

The relationship between Ammon and the Israelites was complex. The Bible describes kinship (through *Abraham and Lot in *Gen 19:38 and through *Solomon and *Rehoboam in 1 *Kgs 14:21), as well as conflict (*Josh 13:8–10; *Judg 3:12–14, 10:7–9; 1 *Sam 11:1–11; 2 Sam 8:11–12, 11:1). Like Israel, Ammon suffered under the onslaught of the *Assyrian Empire. Beginning in the *Babylonian period, Ammon became home to a small population of Jews (Jer 40:10–15; for post-exilic conflict, see *Neh 2:19, 4:7–8); it was briefly part of the *Hasmonean Kingdom (1 *Macc 5:6–8). In later years its capital, renamed Philadelphia, numbered among the important cities of the *Decapolis, the group of ten Greco-Roman cities on the *Roman Empire’s eastern frontier. See also ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD. Map 2

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Amora, Amoraim (from *Aramaic and *Hebrew amar, “to say, speak”) are rabbinic teachers from the formative periods of the Palestinian and Babylonian *Talmuds (the Yerushalmi and Bavli, respectively). The amoraic period begins with the completion of the *Mishnah and its introduction as the focus of rabbinic study and teaching (early third century CE). Scholars place the last of the Amoraim in the first half of the fifth century, with the period ending slightly earlier in *Palestine than in *Babylonia. Palestinian Amoraim are usually counted in five generations, whereas Babylonian Amoraim are assigned to six generations.

Although sages are generally associated either with Babylonia or Palestine, rabbis and students traveled between the two communities. The first of the Babylonian Amoraim, Rav, studied for many years in Palestine. R. Joḥanan, the first of the Palestinian Amoraim, was said to have studied with the prominent Babylonian sages, Rav and Samuel, and had many students from Babylonia. A small number of rabbis frequented both of the two centers, transmitting the teachings from one community to the other; the best known of these rabbis, known as naḥutei (“those who go down” [from the Land of Israel to Babylonia], from the Aramaic naḥat, “to go down”), were R. Zeira, Ulla, and Rabbah bar bar Ḥana.

The central figure among first-generation Palestinian Amoraim was R. Joḥanan b. Napāḥa. Joḥanan was one of the last students of Rabbi *Judah ha-Nasi. Joḥanan had many associates and students; the most prominent among them included Simon b. Lakish, who was also Joḥanan’s brother-in-law; Eleazar b. Pedat; R. Ammi; and R. Assi. Another important figure in the early amoraic movement in Palestine was R. Joshua b. Levi, who studied with one of the last of the *Tannaim, Bar Kappara. R. Joshua b. Levi was particularly interested in *aggadah. Important figures in subsequent generations included R. Jeremiah and R. Zeira. During this period, Palestinian Rabbis were increasingly associated with larger towns and cities, especially Tiberias, Sepphoris, Caesarea, and Lod. Students studied with Rabbis in small groups, often meeting in their homes. There appear to have been strong ties between Rabbis and the *Patriarch, who at times appointed Rabbis to communal positions.

The major Amoraim in the first generation in Babylonia were Rav and Samuel. Rav was the nephew of R. Ḥiyya, one of the last of the Tannaim; he studied with his uncle and R. Judah ha-Nasi in Palestine before returning to Babylonia. The Babylonian Talmud traces Rav’s lineage back to a brother of King *David or to David himself. It places Rav on the level of the Tannaim; he alone among the Amoraim is permitted to contradict a Tanna. Rav’s school was in Sura, whereas Samuel’s was in Nehardea. The house of study in Sura was subsequently headed in the second and third generations by R. Huna, R. Ḥisda, and Rabbah. R. Judah, a student of Samuel, founded a school in *Pumbedita that was later headed by R. Joseph, Abbaye, and R. Zevid. In the fourth generation, Abbaye, a contemporary of Rava, taught in Mehoza. R. Pappa, a fifth-generation Amora, taught in Naresh. The major figures of the sixth and final generation of Babylonian Amoraim were Ravina and R. Ashi. These two Amoraim are traditionally associated with the completion of the Babylonian Talmud, although modern scholars now believe that the Bavli was in fact completed after the amoraic period by the *Saboraim or *Stammait. As in Palestine, rabbinic schools in Babylonia in the amoraic period were small, often meeting in the home of the teacher. Structure within these schools was loose; students could leave one teacher and go to another. Babylonian Amoraim were apparently less involved in the synagogue than their Palestinian counterparts, but did give public lectures. The *Exilarch sometimes appointed Rabbis as judges, and others presided over informal courts.

The Palestinian and the Babylonian Talmuds contain many stories about the lives of the Amoraim, especially their interactions with their students and colleagues. These stories have been used to write biographical sketches of the Amoraim, but contemporary scholars have challenged the historicity of such material. However, some scholars are willing to use talmudic discussions to date Amoraim and to establish relationships between teachers and students, and, to some degree, to consider rabbinic pedigrees. The teachings of the Amoraim are found in the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds and in midrash collections on the *Torah (Genesis Rabbah, Exodus Rabbah, Leviticus Rabbah, Numbers Rabbah, and Deuteronomy Rabbah) and the *Writings (Song of Songs Rabbah, Ruth Rabbah, Lamentations Rabbah, Ecclesiastes Rabbah, and Esther Rabbah).

The Talmuds are heavily redacted documents so it is difficult to make definitive statements about amoraic style. Scholars have observed that statements attributed to earlier Amoraim are often in Hebrew, whereas those attributed to later Amoraim are usually in Aramaic. Statements of early generations of Amoraim frequently respond to, explain, or complement the Mishnah. The comments of later Amoraim are more likely to respond to earlier amoraic material. Although the Talmuds do record exchanges among Amoraim, much of the dialogic structure found in the Bavli is the result of redaction. A secondary use of the word amora denotes a "speaker" for a sage giving a lecture. The amora in this setting essentially functions as a translator or announcer for the lecturer, conveying his spoken softly words to the audience. Although this term, unlike the secondary use of tanna, is not derogatory, it describes a position that requires less learning or ability for original thought than the ability to repeat accurately what one hears.

For further reading, see The Cambridge Companion to the Talmud and Rabbinic Literature, ed. C. E. Fonrobert and M. Jaffee (2007); R. Kalmin, The Sage in Jewish Society of Late Antiquity (1999); L. Levine, The Rabbinic Class of Roman Palestine in Late Antiquity (1989); S. Schwartz, Imperialism and Jewish Society 200 B.C.E. to 640 C.E. (2001); and G. Bader, Encyclopedia of Talmudic Sages (1988).
DVORA E. WEISBERG

Amos, Book of. This biblical book, the third of the "Twelve Prophets," records prophecies attributed to Amos, a sheep breeder (Amos 1:1) and tender of sycamore trees (7:14), who came from the Judean village of Tekoa. Amos, whose prophetic career is dated around 750 BCE, was the first "classical" or "literary" prophet; that is, he is the first prophet whose words were collected and preserved in a book that carries his name (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]; and PROPHETIC BOOKS). Although he was a native of the southern kingdom of *Judah, his active prophecy, probably of short duration, took place in *Beth El and *Samaria in the northern kingdom of *Israel. At some point in his life, Amos, who had no connection with professional prophetic guilds (7:14), was inspired to deliver a series of prophecies predicting the divine punishment and coming destruction both of neighboring peoples and of the Israelites themselves. Among Amos' themes is the unique bond that exists between God and the children of Israel, an intimacy that has preserved Israel since the Exodus from *Egypt. Yet he insisted that this special connection did not excuse the Israelites' sins; on the contrary, their punishments would be more severe because they had rejected this special relationship. This theme is clearly expressed in Amos 3:2: "You only have I know of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all of your iniquities." Contrary to popular expectations of a future time when Israel would be elevated above the other nations, Amos predicted a "day of the Lord" (5:18–20) that would bring divine wrath and terror on God's erring people. His oracles condemned a nation that had repudiated righteousness and tolerated the exploitation of the needy. Amos was especially critical of ritual that was not accompanied by ethical behavior (5:21–23), and he famously declaimed, "But let justice well up like water,/ Righteousness like an unfailing stream./ Did you offer sacrifice and oblation to Me/Those forty years in the wilderness,/ O House of Israel?" (5:24–25). His excoriation of the priestly cult infuriated the religious leadership. According to 7:10–13, Amaziah, the priest of Beth El, sought royal support to have Amos expelled from the kingdom of Israel. The final literary unit of the book of Amos (9:11–15) looks to a time of *redemption, rebuilding, and overwhelming fertility, when "the fallen booth of David" will be restored, when "the mountains shall drip wine," and Israel "nevermore to be uprooted/From the soil I have given them." Although many scholars believe that these verses are a later addition by an exilic or post-exilic editor, others maintain that they are part of the original book, arguing that promises of restoration of the Davidic monarchy and the establishment of a time of lasting peace and bounty were already long-standing traditions in Amos' time. For further reading, see BIBLE: REPRESENTATIONS OF WAR AND PEACE; and S. Paul, Amos: A Commentary on the Book of Amos (1991).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Amram bar Sheshna (d. about 875), set himself up as an alternative *Gaon to Natronai b. Hilai, the head of the recognized academy in *Sura; he may have returned to head the mother institution after Natronai's death. Amram issued numerous *responsa on halakhic problems and talmudic interpretation, including one concerning the legal status of *tannaitic material outside the *Mishnah. His most famous responsum was sent to a Spanish community anxious to have an "order of prayers and benedictions for the whole year." His text, Seder Rav Amram, is generally considered the first *prayer book or *siddur; it became so popular that it was often copied and adjusted throughout the Jewish world, thus losing much of its original format. See also WORSHIP.

STEFAN C. REIF

Amsterdam is the capital and largest city in the Netherlands. The pioneers of documented Jewish settlement in Amsterdam were New Christians (conversos*), descendants of baptized Jews from *Portugal and *Spain, who migrated to Amsterdam in the 1590s. Amsterdam was then the commercial center of the Dutch Republic, recently formed in the wake of the Netherlanders' revolt against Spanish domination. New Christian merchants and their families were attracted by commercial opportunities and by Amsterdam's environment of religious toleration, established by the city's ruling regent class. By the early seventeenth century these émigrés practiced Judaism openly but discreetly and encountered no opposition from the civic authorities. Although their status remained unclear, they began organizing communal life, bringing an *Ashkenazi rabbi from *Germany to conduct worship and instruct the émigrés, who had been isolated from Jewish life for generations.

After a 1609 truce between the Netherlands and Spain, many more emigrants arrived. In 1639, when Spanish and Portuguese Jews numbered about one thousand, they united into a single and highly organized community. Rabbinic leadership was provided by *Sephardi rabbis from the Mediterranean area who made special efforts to bring the "re-judaizing" community into conformity with rabbinic law. Not everyone complied: Among those banned by the communal leadership for nonconformist views were Uriel da Costa and Baruch *Spinoza. *Ashkenazim fleeing *Central Europe came to Amsterdam during the Thirty Years War (1618–1648). Dependent at first on the Sephardim, they formed their own community in 1635; the two communities, which had deep cultural and socioeconomic differences, maintained strict separation up to modern times.

Given Amsterdam's commercial wealth and religious freedoms, the Amsterdam Sephardim emerged as one of the most powerful Jewish communities in seventeenth-century Europe. They provided leadership for the entire western Sephardi Diaspora, and the Amsterdam Sephardi community became a center of *printing, polemical writing, and intercommunal activity. However, by the eighteenth century, the Sephardim entered an irreversible process of economic decline and demographic stagnation; their population peaked at about 3,000 in the mid-eighteenth century. The Ashkenazim, initially a community of impoverished refugees, gained ascendancy; their numbers grew to about 10,000 in 1750 and continued to increase into the early twentieth century.

During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, *Haskalah, *emancipation, and assimilation took their particular course among the Jews of Amsterdam. By this time, neither Amsterdam nor its Jews played a leading role on the European scene, and the community experienced significant poverty. Conditions improved in the 1870s, with the growth of the diamond industry (and labor movement), and migrants came from the provinces and elsewhere. Amsterdam's Jewish population in 1900 was about 60,000; subsequently, emigration and a low birth rate led to declining numbers. Jewish community life in Amsterdam came to a halt in 1940 with the Nazi occupation. By the end of the war, 100,000 Dutch Jews had been deported and killed, and the Jewish quarter of Amsterdam was devastated. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, about 25,000 Jews live in Amsterdam of a total population of approximately 750,000. They mainly reside outside the historic Jewish quarter, which boasts the elegant 1665 Portuguese Synagogue and nearby Jewish Historical Museum, housed in a complex of four Ashkenazi synagogues from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

For further reading, see SYNAGOGUES: MEDIEVAL TO EIGHTEENTH CENTURY; J. C. H. Blom, R. G. Fuks-Mansfeld, and I. Schoeffel, eds., The History of the Jews in the Netherlands (2002); and M. Bodian, Hebrews of the Portuguese

Nation: Conversos and Community in Early Modern Amsterdam (1997). Maps 8, 10 MIRIAM BODIAN

Anointment. The Hebrew Bible describes the anointment of kings and priests with perfumed oil (a mixture of aromatic spices and olive oil) during installation rituals as an indication of divine *election. The term "messiah" derives from the root, mashah, "to anoint." Although only one spice, opal-balsam, was indigenous to the Land of *Israel, spices were available from foreign merchants traversing the area from south to north. Spices and perfume were a precious commodity, closely associated with royalty. *Solomon received precious spices from the *Queen of Sheba (1 Kgs 10:10); *Hezekiah displayed his cache of spices and fragrant oil to *Babylonian visitors (2 Kgs 20:13); and Asa was buried with "all kinds of spices mixed in an ointment pot" (2 Chron 16:14).

Anointment with perfumed oil after bathing was common. Naomi directed her widowed daughter-in-law, *Ruth, to bathe, anoint herself, and dress up in order to entice a potential husband (Ruth 3:3). After mourning his son's death, *David arose, bathed, and anointed himself (2 Sam 12:20). In the book of *Esther, maidens prepared to enter the king's bed chamber by bathing for "six months in oil of myrrh and six months in spices" (2:12). The close association between oil and love making is most dramatic in *Song of Songs, where the lover's oil is more pleasing than his name (1:3) and the beloved's hands are "dripping with myrrh" (5:5).

During the *Roman period scented oils were used at the public bathhouse, at home, at the market, and in burials. In addition to its use in anointment, oil was rubbed on the hands to remove odors, dripped or sprinkled on the floor before cleaning, and rubbed or inhaled medicinally (JT Berakhot 6:6 10d, T. Shabbat 5:9–10). Spices and oils were purchased from perfumers, who probably also served as apothecaries (T. Shevuot 5:12; BT Hullin 55b). Perfume was used to anoint corpses before burial and containers of perfume were sometimes buried with the deceased (M. Berakhot 8:6, M. Shabbat 23:5). See also INCENSE.

DEBORAH A. GREEN

Anthropology, literally "an account of man," is the comparative study of human societies and cultures. Jews played a significant role in the founding and development of cultural anthropology (defined as the study of contemporary cultures and societies and the study of human behavior that is learned rather than genetically transmitted) in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Among these early figures was Marcel Mauss (1872–1950), nephew of influential sociologist Emile Durkheim. His most influential work, The Gift (1925), explored religious, legal, economic, mythological, and other aspects of giving, receiving, and repaying in different cultures. Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939) wrote a series of ethnological works on various aspects of preliterate culture. The German-born Franz Boas (1858–1942) is often considered the "father of American anthropology"; he came to the *United States in 1886 and became professor of anthropology at Columbia University (*New York City) in 1899. Boas did extensive field research in North America and helped make fieldwork a hallmark of anthropology. His theory of "historical particularism" stresses the biological and "psychic unity" of humans and explains cultural diversity by appeal to specific cultural histories and environments. He introduced the concept of cultural relativism, which holds that cultures cannot be evaluated on an evolutionary scale but should be examined in relation to the environment in which they are found. Boas, a prolific writer, spoke out forcefully against racism and intolerance and wrote and lectured widely in opposition to the Nazis. In his classic Anthropology and Modern Life (1928), he examined the topic of race and culture, demonstrating the fallacies of claims of racial and ethnic superiorities. His outstanding American students included Margaret Mead, Ruth Benedict, and many more, including many scholars of Jewish origin. Under the tutelage of Benedict, the Columbia University Research in Contemporary Cultures was inaugurated shortly after the end of World War II. A goal of this project was to encourage the study of changing and, in some cases, disappearing cultures. Life is with People: The Jewish Little-Town of Eastern Europe by Mark Zborowski and Elizabeth Herzog, was an outcome of this effort. Published in 1952, this book documented the religious rituals and daily observances of the vanished shtetl culture of pre-WWII Eastern Europe and was one of the first anthropological studies of Jews.

Jewish psychoanalysts have been highly influential in the study of the interrelationships between culture and psychology and pivotal in the development of the culture and personality subfield of cultural anthropology. Of particular importance is the work of Geza Roheim (1891–1953), Abram Kardiner (1891–1981), Theodor Reik (1888–1969), and Erich Fromm (1900–1980).

Claude Lévi-Strauss (1908–2009) born in Brussels, was the most distinguished social anthropologist in twentieth-century France. His most original and significant contribution is his theory of structural anthropology. Heavily influenced by linguistics, it assumes that the most effective way to understand human societies is to investigate the structures, rather than the content, of their organization. His book, The Elementary Structures of Kinship (1949), is regarded as one of the most important works on this topic.

Contemporary Jewish anthropologists in the United States include a number of influential women who have examined issues related to Jews and Jewish identity. Barbara Myerhoff (1935–1985), a renowned scholar, writer, and filmmaker, helped popularize anthropology with her works Peyote Hunt (1974), Number Our Days (1978), and the autobiographical film, In Her Own Time (1985). In the book and film, Number Our Days, Myerhoff explores the lives of poor, aged Jews in Venice, CA. Karen Brodtkin's How Jews Became White Folks and What That Says About Race in America (1999) analyzes the interrelationships among Jewishness, gender, and class. Riv-Ellen Prell's Fighting to Become Americans: Jews, Gender and the Anxiety of Assimilation (1999) examines challenges to identity faced by Jewish women. Ruth Behar, writer, poet, and filmmaker, has written about the relationship between her Jewish identity and her anthropological work. Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett's Destination Culture (1998) lays the foundation for studies of Jewish museums, exhibits, and material culture. Other significant American anthropologists who addressed issues of Jewish interest include Melford Spiro (b. 1920), who has written extensively about the Israeli kibbutz; Jack Kugelmass, who has written on various topics dealing with American Jews; and Jonathan Boyarin, whose collection Thinking in Jewish (1996) broke new ground in applying theoretical issues to the study of Jewish communities.

In recent years, there has been increasing interest in examining the profound influence that Jews have had in the development of anthropology in the United States, France, and Britain. Analysts assume that Jews' marginality and sometimes vulnerable positionality in their societies are what led many Jewish anthropologists to focus on issues of race, ethnicity, culture, nationalism, and identity. In the past, the silence surrounding this subject resulted from several factors, including antisemitism. When anthropology was becoming established as an academic discipline, there was concern that its strong association with Jews could discredit its reputation. Some Jewish anthropologists downplayed their religious heritage in their pursuit of academic positions, at a time when there was broad discrimination in hiring practices. Additionally, Boasian anthropology was premised on the insignificance of race, ethnicity, and religion; the corollary was that the ethnic/religious identity of anthropologists was irrelevant. However, in recent years, anthropologists have acknowledged that they, like others, are influenced by their various heritages and that their backgrounds may affect their disciplinary choices and conclusions. Anthropology has become more reflective as scholars have become increasingly aware of how their own cultural and personal backgrounds have an impact on their work.

DIANE BAXTER

Antinomianism (contra-nomos) is a term that may refer to any religious movement claiming that fulfillment of the divine will does not need to conform to accepted religious norms or doctrine. Some forms of antinomianism suggest that the divine will can be fulfilled outside the law, and more radical branches argue that the divine will is fulfilled only through the abrogation of the law. It has been argued that the first real antinomian movement in Judaism rose with the apostle Paul in conjunction with the transition of Judaism to a religion of law in the first centuries of the Common Era. Paul's polemic, waged largely against the Jewish-Christian communities of his time, argued that Christ's death and resurrection overcome the need for the law or, more strongly, erase the law as a category of salvation. This is not to suggest that Christianity is a form of Jewish antinomianism. Jewish antinomianism would require that the law still serve as a category that is broken or overcome by another avenue of worship. Because Jewish law no longer functions as a category in Christianity, the term "antinomianism" would not apply (See CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM).

There have been numerous antinomian movements throughout Jewish history depending on how one understands the limits of the term. One could posit that the medieval Karaite movement that rebelled against rabbinic authority was antinomian if we specify nomos (in this case, law) as being confined to the dictates of rabbinism. More common forms of antinomianism apply to movements or individuals who claim some direct access to God, making legal norms inapplicable. In Christianity, the famous 1637 dispute of Anne Hutchinson with the Massachusetts Bay Colony is a case in point. Hutchinson claimed that her immediate relation to God enabled her to circumvent church authority and practice in the name of true religion (see David Hall, ed., The Antinomianism Controversy 1636–1638: A Documentary History [1990]).

Many Jewish forms of antinomianism are mixed with both *mysticism and *messianism. The anonymous late-fourteenth- or early-fifteenth-century books Sefer Temunah and Sefer Peliah are a case in point. Both argued that the law is particular to that historical epoch and would be overcome with the movement into a new era (although neither claimed such a move was imminent). Although these obscure works are not antinomian in practice, one might claim that they are antinomian in principle. The most famous case of antinomianism in Judaism is the false messiah *Shabbatai Zevi (1626–1676?) and the movement that grew around him. Shabbatai Zevi revealed himself as messiah in 1666, converted to *Islam under duress soon after, and lived the rest of his life under the protection of the *Ottoman Sultan. Some of his disciples argued that his conversion was a holy act whereby, as *messiah, he descended into the depths of the demonic to liberate the final holy sparks and bring about *redemption. The notion of “sin for the sake of heaven” (a rabbinic term deployed by the *Sabbateans) or, as Gershom *Scholem preferred, “redemption through sin,” became the underlying principle of the Sabbatean movement. The idea that the Righteous One (as messiah) had to sin in order to redeem the world was expanded by radical Sabbateans such as Jacob *Frank (1726–1791) to suggest that the community must sin with the intention of completing redemption. This led to overt transgression and sexual promiscuity among his disciples. The Frankist movement essentially died out when most of his disciples converted to Christianity around 1759.

Moderate Sabbateanism, however, has a more complex history. Some have argued that some forms of *Hasidism, especially early Hasidism before 1815, contained certain Sabbatean and thus antinomian tendencies. Its focus on *devekut (experiential cleaving to God) as the goal of the religious life and its encouragement of joyous worship instead of austere and uncompromising devotion to the law have led some to see Sabbatean strands in some early Hasidic communities. Alternatively, one could say that Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM) and most non-Orthodox Judaism that followed also contain some dimensions of antinomianism in that they posit that fulfilling the divine will requires activity that does not conform to the law and, in fact, may require abrogation of the law in certain circumstances. Support of gender equality, positive attitudes toward a range of sexual orientations and preferences, and an accepting stance toward non-Jews (including *intermarriage) can all be framed as antinomian in some form. These behaviors are quite different from the Frankist idea of sin as mitzvah (*commandment) but may be closer to a more moderate Sabbatean notion that changing times require a reformulation, sometimes radical, of the nomos of the tradition. This is not to suggest any direct historical link between Reform and Sabbateanism since such a link is tenuous at best. Rather, it is to say that Judaism, construed as a religion of nomos, at least from the rabbinic period on, always contained within it forces that questioned the exclusivity and even primacy of law and sought to provide alternative avenues of worship and practice beyond its bounds.

Recent scholarship includes S. Magid, Hasidism on the Margin: Reconciliation, Antinomianism, and Messianism in Izbica/Radzin Hasidism (2003); and E. R. Wolfson, Venturing Beyond: Law and Morality in Kabbalistic Mysticism (2006).

SHAUL MAGID

Antisemitism is a word that came into common usage during the 1880s in German-speaking Europe to signify activities aimed at ending what proponents believed was undue influence exercised by Jews over European cultural, social, economic, and political life. Although it is often asserted that German writer Wilhelm Marr (1819–1904) coined the term, no persuasive evidence has been adduced to this effect. The stem antisemit- was used in *Germany since 1860 as a characterization for statements asserting the inferiority of cultures belonging to the *Semitic language family, as compared to those employing an Indo-European language. That usage appears to have been current when a group called the Antisemiten-Liga (League of Antisemites) came into being under the leadership of Marr and Hector de Groussillier in September 1879. This small society was one of several such organizations, all founded more or less around the same time, that expressed dissatisfaction with the consequences of the provision of Germany's 1871 imperial constitution that had abolished all legal restrictions on Jews and Jewish communities. In November 1879, Heinrich von Treitschke, a leading German historian of his day, labeled these groups collectively as Antisemitenvereine (antisemitic associations), and the name caught on quickly.

People joined the Antisemitenvereine for many reasons: some because of religiously inspired notions about the proper role of Jews in Christian society, some because they identified Jews with *capitalism, and others because they thought that attacking Jews might bring them political advantage. In other words, no single set of ideas about Jews united them. “Antisemitism” thus originally meant little more than “acting like an antisemite” – that is, engaging in activities that the so-called antisemitic associations espoused. The widespread belief that the word conveyed opposition to alleged Jewish influence in society because of Jews' purported racial characteristics instead of their religious beliefs has no basis in fact.

The first antisemitic associations arose in Germany. Their earliest intervention in German politics was the presentation of the so-called Antisemites' Petition to Chancellor Bismarck in April 1881. The petition made four demands: restriction of Jewish immigration from other countries, a ban on the appointment of Jews to positions of authority, preservation of the Christian character of schools, and separate registration of Jews in official statistics. Although the document garnered more than 250,000 signatures, none of its demands was implemented. During the following decade several political parties were formed to ensure that the petition's goals were implemented through legislation. By any measure these parties were a failure: Their parliamentary representation never exceeded 4%, and in almost three decades of activity they managed to bring only seven bills to the Reichstag floor and none was enacted. Nevertheless, they attracted considerable public attention, both in Germany and beyond. In the early 1880s, groups espousing similar political platforms appeared in *Hungary, *Habsburg Austria, and *France. These groups, too, were soon labeled “antisemitic.” In 1882, German, Austrian, and Hungarian activists convened an International Anti-Jewish Congress, which called for boycotting Jewish-owned newspapers, refusing membership in any organization of which Jews were members, and shunning Jews in social and economic life. The Congress signaled the beginning of a Europe-wide “antisemitic movement,” although those who took part in it were not able to agree on a definition of the term.

Indeed, in popular usage the word’s referents were already expanding. By mid-1882 Jewish newspapers in Germany were referring to the pogroms in southern Russia that had broken out the preceding year as “antisemitic” acts. The 1882 ritual murder accusation in the Hungarian town of Tiszaeszlár was also widely given the same designation, as was the agitation in France conducted by journalist Édouard Drumont, especially after the publication of his 1886 book, La France juive (Jewish France). The basis for classifying these phenomena together with activities in the political sphere was evidently the belief that all of them challenged the notion that Jews could be integrated into European society in a way that would benefit society as a whole. In turn, that challenge was widely presumed to be rooted in the same sort of hostile attitudes and prejudices toward Jews that had been evident in medieval Christendom (and, according to some, in pre-Christian antiquity as well). Jewish observers quickly assimilated “antisemitism” to the traditional Jewish notion of sin’at yisra’el (“hatred of Israel”), according to which “Esau always hates Jacob” (Genesis Rabbah 78:9), and understood it as a well-known, age-old phenomenon. As a result, virtually any present or past act or expression by non-Jews that Jews found threatening was readily dubbed “antisemitic” and attributed to aggressive hatred. Moreover, by the end of the nineteenth century the word was widely used as a designation for the emotion itself, as well as for the broad range of behaviors, statements, and cultural artifacts that it was supposed to produce. In this way it came to point simultaneously to cause and effect. Such usage remains dominant in common parlance at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

From the early twentieth century, however, some observers, both Jewish and non-Jewish, noted that many actions or statements that Jews perceived as inimical to their collective security or interests might not stem from hatred or a desire to harm Jews. Instead, they could be the result of ordinary intergroup tensions in which the specific identity of the contending groups was secondary to the perception of differences between them. In consequence, analysts sought criteria for distinguishing phenomena that warranted the label “antisemitic” from those that did not, no matter how unwelcome Jews might find them. The task has proven daunting; twenty-first-century scholars have reached no more agreement than nineteenth-century self-proclaimed “antisemites” on how the term should be delimited and how “antisemitic” acts or utterances should be identified.

Since World War II, efforts at refining usage of the term have generally posited the existence of a “special hatred” – distinct from normal xenophobic prejudices – that has generated stock images depicting Jews, the Jewish religion, or Jewish culture as inevitably harmful to the well-being of humankind. Scholars who have studied those images have done so largely under the impact of the Holocaust, in the conviction that only a truly exceptional hatred could have motivated the Nazi regime in Germany to seek to kill every Jewish man, woman, and child within reach. They have thus understood “antisemitism” as synonymous with a set of antagonistic beliefs about Jews both sufficiently powerful to arouse murderous impulses and sufficiently well known through familiar imagery to lend them widespread credence.

Much effort has gone into ascertaining how such beliefs have come about. Historians and social scientists have catalogued and classified the images through which hostile beliefs about Jews have been figured, examined when and where the images were created and deployed, and tried to explain why they have appeared more commonly in some times and places than in others. Psychologists have probed the mental processes that might make people accept such fanciful representations as true. No clear picture has emerged from their investigations, however. For example, psychological studies have not established that people who profess powerful hostility toward Jews display a fundamentally different emotional makeup from people who indicate powerful hostility toward other groups. Nor have they shown that acceptance of images presumably generated out of such powerful hostility necessarily indicates psychopathology. In other words, psychological methods have not demonstrated the existence of a special hatred toward Jews, marked by a unique mental configuration. Historical methods have similarly come up short. To begin with, historians have been unable to agree about when the purported special hatred that merits the label “antisemitism” first appeared. Opinions include the Greco-Roman era; the time of the separation between Judaism and Christianity; the high Middle Ages in western Christendom (especially the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when identifications of Jews with beasts and the devil initially surfaced in Christian anti-Jewish polemics); the later Middle Ages (when Jews were associated with witchcraft and sorcery); and the nineteenth century (when Jews were first branded incorrigible by virtue of their race). More significantly, however, they have not managed to identify which of the many hostile acts and utterances toward Jews were motivated by the ostensible special hatred, which by more mundane conflicts, and which by ordinary social processes.

Indeed, studies of the Nazi Holocaust have found that many who participated in mass killings of Jews did not display any particular animus toward their victims, but instead were driven by such commonplace emotions as the desire for self-aggrandizement, peer pressure, or deference to authority. Even those who conceived and ordered the murder campaign evidently responded more to general ideas about race, culture, and the biological basis of human behavior that circulated widely in Europe toward the end of the nineteenth century than to long-standing images of Jews allegedly born of special hatred. In short, the belief that it is possible to separate from the set of present and past activities that Jews have found threatening a subset motivated by an uncommon emotion that gave rise to the Holocaust appears to be illusory.

Another approach to determining what might constitute an “antisemitic” act or utterance takes into account that, after World War II, the label has generally been deemed pejorative; few wish to be known as “antisemites.” As a result, some have proposed reserving the label “antisemitism” for expressions of hostility toward Jews that exceed the bounds of legitimate criticism. In this connection, efforts have been made to enumerate behaviors of this kind, including one by the European Union Monitoring Center on Racism and Xenophobia (later renamed the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights) in January 2005. The “Working Definition of Antisemitism” produced by this body notes that “contemporary examples of antisemitism . . . could include . . . calling for, aiding, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews in the name of a radical ideology or extremist view of religion; making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as a collective . . . ; accusing Jews as a people of being responsible for real or imagined wrongdoing committed by a single Jewish person or group . . . ; denying the fact, scope, mechanisms . . . , or intentionality of . . . the Holocaust; accusing Jews as a people, or *Israel as a state, of inventing or exaggerating the Holocaust; [and] accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel, or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide, than to the interests of their own nations.” The document also identifies certain attitudes and behaviors toward the State of Israel as “ways in which antisemitism manifests itself,” including “denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination . . . ; claiming that the existence of a state of Israel is a racist endeavor; applying double standards by requiring of it behavior not expected or demanded of any other democratic nation; using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism . . . to characterize Israel or Israelis; drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis; [and] holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the State of Israel.” In contrast, it also notes that “criticism of Israel similar to that leveled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic.” (The document can be viewed at <http://eumc.europa.eu/eumc/material/pub/AS/AS-WorkingDefinition-draft.pdf>.)

This definition is a prescriptive statement about behaviors that might be regarded as socially unacceptable. According to the EU body it was prepared “to provide a practical guide for identifying incidents, collecting data, and supporting the implementation and enforcement of legislation dealing with antisemitism.” Indeed, most of those using the term “antisemitism” since its introduction in the late nineteenth century have done so because they found it a useful vehicle for analyzing the relations between Jews and non-Jews in their day. As the character of those relations has changed, so have the meanings attached to the word. No single definition can be regarded as correct or incorrect; the test of the various definitions can be only the extent to which they aid or inhibit understanding of how Jews and non-Jews have interacted and continue to interact with one another.

DAVID ENGEL

Antisemitism: *France (1789–1939). Although the *emancipation decrees of 1790 and 1791 that emerged from the French Revolution should have quelled challenges to Jews’ equal status in *France, resistance developed in the nineteenth century to their expression of lawful political rights. In several localities of eastern France there were attempts to prevent Jews from taking the civic oath, a requirement for citizenship. Similarly, the refusal of the new French republic to nationalize the debts of the formerly autonomous Jewish communities, although it did assume the debts of other communal groups, left the Jews with a financial disability that belied their equality. This discriminatory situation, which lasted longest in the eastern provinces, disappeared only when those regions were annexed by *Germany after the Franco-Prussian War (1870). Another form of fiscal inequity was the lack of state funding for Jewish institutions until 1831, whereas Christian institutions had benefited from public funding from the time of Napoleon.

An old and humiliating symbol of Jewish disability that was retained throughout much of the nineteenth century was the special Jewish oath, known as an oath “moré judaico,” which was frequently imposed on Jewish litigants and Jews taking political office. Such discriminatory treatment had no basis in French law and could easily have been eliminated by a simple order of the government’s justice department. In fact, court decisions, beginning as early as 1826, ruled repeatedly that regular oaths were valid for Jews, although alternative forms were never actually repudiated. As the century wore on the oaths became generally less offensive than the degrading medieval practices that had survived into the early nineteenth century, but for those eager to see Jews treated on a par with others in France, any oath specific to Jews remained problematic. The refusal of some rabbis to administer moré judaico oaths, combined with legal challenges brought by attorney Adolphe Crémieux, resulted in a series of local court decisions and a ruling of the supreme appeals court in 1846 that rabbis could not be forced to preside over discriminatory oaths. Special Jewish oaths finally disappeared some time after the last known instance, which took place in Paris in 1872.

In 1840, when *ritual murder charges were lodged in Damascus against Jews of that city, the French consul endorsed the claims (see DAMASCUS AFFAIR). Foreign Minister Adolphe Thiers, motivated by his Middle East strategy, failed to condemn the consul’s behavior, and some French Jews feared that it was a short step from their government’s tacit approval of its consul’s behavior to degradation of Jewish status at home. Adding to Jewish concerns about their public image at home was the fact that the French press reported the ritual murder story as credible. Again in 1860, the press accepted as fact another false accusation that Syrian Jews had massacred Christians. The climate of prejudice against Jews resulted in discriminatory hiring practices throughout the middle of the century. Such disabilities differed by region, but were especially significant in the teaching and judicial careers. In at least one case Jewish children were barred from enrolling in a public secondary school. Nor was France free of episodic virulent or even violent antisemitism. Attacks on Jews were most frequent in eastern France; they occurred in several locations at the time of the French Revolution and again during the revolutions of 1830 and 1848. In 1848 Jewish houses were pillaged in Alsace, some Jews fled to Switzerland, and the army was called out to restore order. In 1853 the Central Consistory (see FRANCE: CONSISTORIES [1806–1939]) concluded that it was useless to expect governmental assistance in response to the repeated threats menacing the Jews of Alsace.

From the 1830s through the 1850s, a series of Catholic publications vilified Jews, but the Consistories abstained from prosecution because they were afraid of defeat in court. In 1845 Catholic proselytizers enacted a deathbed conversion on Lazare Terquem, a member of a prominent Jewish family of Metz, and the Consistory proved powerless to prevent his burial in a Catholic cemetery. In 1859 a young rabbi, Elie-Aristide Astruc, broke with the Consistory's policy of silence and published a rebuttal to the popular Catholic conservative antisemitic journalist, Louis Veuillot. Much of the antisemitic literature before 1880 came from the left. Socialists, seeking an end to exploitation, discrimination, and the Catholic Church's temporal powers, attacked Judaism, which they considered the source of Christianity. With the Jewish banking families as mental models, socialists also made a facile equation of Jews with financial capitalism. Charles Fourier, Pierre Joseph Proudhon, and Alphonse Toussenel were among those who produced French socialist antisemitic writings. Preceding Marx's On the Jewish Question, Fourier introduced a full catalogue of charges against Jews, including usury, avarice, parasitism, deceit, betrayal, intolerance, and resistance to assimilation. It is thought that his hostility derived from competition with a rival utopian group, the Saint Simonians, which had attracted many Jews. Toussenel's 1845 Les juifs rois de l'époque added the charge that Jews were anti-nature and blamed *Rothschild's railroads for ruining the forests.

In the last two decades of the nineteenth century, right-wing, royalist, and Catholic political antisemitism was born. Building on traditional anti-Judaism, socialist stereotypes, and rejection of the Third Republic's universalism and anticlericalism, it responded to the fact that Jews were active members of the movement to separate church and state, secularize schools, and institute civil divorce. Perhaps the success of Jewish mobility and integration also fueled the attacks, as political antisemitism fed on the socioeconomic and political dislocations caused by the new regime. One of the earliest evidences of antisemitism under the Third Republic was an 1881 article on German antisemitism in the influential Revue du monde catholique. In that same year Father Chabauty, a country priest, published Les juifs, nos maîtres! His theme was that Jewish leaders were organizing the Jewish nation and all secret societies against Christianity with the aim of obtaining Jewish dominion over the world. In 1883 Catholic antisemitic newspapers began to appear. La Croix, an inexpensive, popular antirepublican Catholic daily, took as its premise the concept that the French Revolution had been the work of Jews allied with Freemasons. This claim had enormous influence with the lower clergy and popular masses, although it was severely criticized by higher levels of the church.

The landmark antisemitic publication of the period was La France juive (1886) by Édouard Drumont. It portrayed Jews as materialistic, sordid, corrupt, and the primary cause of all France's misfortunes. Only Aryans, Drumont claimed, possessed notions of justice, the sentiment of good, and the idea of liberty. Ugly "Semites" were spies, traitors, criminals, and carriers of disease. La France juive quickly became not only the most widely read book in France but it also introduced a whole series of books and a journal by Drumont on the same theme. Within three years, in 1889, Drumont's ideas stimulated the formation of the French National Antisemitic League, and Adolphe Willette ran (unsuccessfully) for the Chamber of Deputies from Paris on an antisemitic ticket. Political antisemitism continued to gather momentum. In 1891 thirty-two deputies called for Jews to be expelled from France. The following year, with Jesuit support, Drumont founded La Libre Parole, a daily that immediately launched a defamation campaign against Jewish army officers, accusing them of having plotted treason and of trafficking in secrets of the national defense. Drumont repeatedly fabricated and disseminated accusations that a "World Jewish Syndicate" aimed at world domination.

Antisemitic prejudice, albeit more discreetly stated, was found even in republican publications and in nonpolitical journals and romantic literature, especially drama. Although there were also philosemitic themes in such material, negative depictions of Jews included Jews as evil, conspiring, money-grubbing, foreign (oriental), wandering (juif errant), and inassimilable. Alphonse Daudet, Edmond de Goncourt, and Émile Zola (before his transformation into a leading Dreyfusard) are examples of popular writers who furthered negative stereotypes of Jews. Daudet even intervened to have Drumont's La France juive published after it had been rejected by several presses. It has been suggested that antisemitism sufficiently permeated society to serve as the glue uniting disparate factions into a single French national identity.

Yet in 1891 Rabbi Simon Debré represented the overconfidence of a faction of French Jewry when he wrote that this movement would die a rapid death. His view of France at the end of the century was that brotherhood and acceptance generally prevailed and that Drumont and his "meager following" had no influence on ideas and customs in France. Such optimistic perceptions changed by the mid-1890s. The 1895 *Dreyfus Affair was the best known milestone in French antisemitism before Vichy. When Alfred Dreyfus was falsely convicted of military treason and stripped of his commission, crowds throughout France rioted against Jews, pillaged and boycotted Jewish stores, and, in many cities, including Paris, rallied to cries of "death to the Jews." Despite clear proof of his innocence, the army did not reinstate Dreyfus until 1906, and it was only in 1995 that the French army officially declared him innocent.

Already in 1893, rebelling against the more conservative behavior of Jewish institutions, Isidore Singer founded a biweekly newspaper, La Vraie Parole, to provide a counterbalance to Drumont's Libre Parole. Through the intermediary of Chief Rabbi Zadoc Kahn, Edmond de Rothschild agreed to fund the paper when no other Jewish bankers would help (see ROTHSCCHILD FAMILY). Long articles on the history of antisemitism did not, however, prove an effective means of combating Libre Parole, and Vraie Parole failed within a year.

By the time Dreyfus was reinstated, France was on the eve of *World War I, which brought with it consensus for a "union sacrée," or internal harmony and solidarity against external enemies. Despite the continued existence of nationalist right-wing factions, antisemitism remained quiescent through the 1920s, only to erupt with great force again in the following decade. Nevertheless the seeds were being laid for the next outbreak, including the appearance in 1920 and 1921 of the first French edition of what has become the essential and perennial antisemitic text, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion (see RUSSIA). By the eve of World War II a large and hostile literature had developed around the theses of this forgery. Political antisemitism was rare, but not unheard of. In 1923, within the Chamber of Deputies, Léon Blum was the recipient of an antisemitic insult; in his public response Blum asserted his pride in belonging to the Jewish "race."

The 1920s saw a flourishing of Jewish literature and culture, but at least one Jewish leader publicly expressed fear of so much public notice. Writing in a popular Jewish journal in 1925, and reacting especially to the burgeoning *Yiddish press, *theater, and *film, Jules Meyer titled his article, “They are talking too much about us.” He called for a lower profile, warning that the currently hospitable atmosphere toward Jews could quickly disappear. Although it is doubtful that Jewish cultural production caused the eventual tragedies that befell a large part of the Jews in France, it is conceivable that the very nature of Jewish self-portrayal of the 1920s may have contributed to the sense of Jews as outsiders. Jewish characters in fiction by Jewish authors were frequently presented as “semitic” or “oriental,” were often portrayed as torn between embracing and rejecting their Jewish heritage, and were sometimes involved in doomed mixed marriages.

Events around the world contributed in multiple ways to the evolution of a reinvigorated French antisemitism. The Paris Peace Conference of 1919 took up the issue of national minorities, and some French Jews, defending the notion, introduced a philosophy of multiculturalism into a France that was not prepared to accept such a premise or believe in an ethnic or national form of Judaism. *Zionism began also to attract adherents, thereby providing additional fodder for the suspicion of a lack of Jewish loyalty. As the world fell into a major economic crisis, Eastern European antisemitism and the imposition of immigration restrictions by the *United States stimulated the arrival of refugees, including Jews. The Jewish population of France doubled, from 150,000 to 300,000, in the twenty years that preceded World War II. Immigration, in turn, brought foreign antisemitism into France, stimulating public discussion and reaction. One example was the very public and dramatic trial in 1927 of Sholom Schwartzbard, a Ukrainian-born French citizen, for the 1926 murder of Ukrainian exile Simon Petlura. Schwartzbard was acquitted by the jury, which accepted the argument that he was rightfully avenging family members killed by Ukrainian nationalists under Petlura’s command. France and the world were divided on the relative guilt of each man and there were repercussions. A Ligue Internationale Contre l’Antisemitism (LICA) was created in 1926, influenced by the model and teachings of Schwartzbard and extolling the creation of a new Jew, one who would not allow himself to be victimized or enslaved but would fight in his own defense and break the cycle of anti-Jewish hatred and violence.

The 1930s marked the return of political antisemitism, which went well beyond any prior manifestations. The responsible factors included the 1933 accession of Hitler to power in *Germany; economic depression; the 1936 emergence of a government by the “Popular Front,” a coalition of socialists and communists under the leadership of Léon Blum; and the growing fear of war. It did not help the Jewish cause that Alexandre Stavinsky, a Jewish swindler with ties to several members of the government, was discovered to have been the embezzler whose schemes caused huge financial losses for many people. A riot in February 1934 portrayed Jews as stateless invaders, eternally inassimilable, who were corrupting the economic and political order, sapping France’s economic strength, and leading the country into war.

Violence increased, with episodes of attacks in immigrant Jewish neighborhoods and businesses often orchestrated by the Action Française and other nationalist organizations. Anti-Jewish propaganda blossomed, with calls for a halt to immigration, rejection of refugees from Nazism, and proposals for legislation to make Jews second-class citizens. By the end of the 1930s there were approximately fifty antisemitic newspapers and magazines, with a total circulation in the millions. Numerous well-respected and prize-winning authors, including Louis-Ferdinand Céline and Jean Giradoux, wrote antisemitic literature. Although most of this material came from the right, the left and labor also occasionally disseminated anti-Jewish tracts. The way was being paved for the 1940 Vichy government law (Statut des Juifs), which initiated the loss of Jewish political and civil rights and culminated in the deportation and murder of nearly a quarter of the Jewish population living in France.

For further reading, see P. C. Albert, The Modernization of French Jewry: Consistory and Community in the Nineteenth Century (1977); P. Birnbaum, The Anti-Semitic Moment: A Tour of France in 1898 (2003); J. Frankel, The Damascus Affair, (1997); P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (1998); and M. Winock, Nationalism, Antisemitism, and Fascism in France (1998).

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Apocalyptic Writings: See AFTERLIFE: HEBREW BIBLE AND SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD; APOCRYPHA; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND *TEMPLE PERIOD; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA

Apocrypha refers to a collection of Jewish texts written between the fourth century BCE and first century CE. The existence of this collection as a discrete corpus (distinguished from the many other para-biblical texts written during this period) reflects the reading practices of early *Christian communities. Many of these communities read some of these books alongside the Hebrew *Bible as their “Old Testament,” as attested by fourth- and fifth-century codices of the *Septuagint (the Greek “Old Testament”). Others preferred to follow the stricter canon of the Hebrew Scriptures. The term “apocrypha” – Greek for “hidden things” – came to be applied to these books by communities that followed the latter practice.

CONTENTS: The limits of the collection are somewhat fluid owing to the slight variations in canon among Christian communions. The discussion here follows the broadest delineation of the collection, as found, for example, in modern printed editions of the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible. In most cases, the individual books that came to be included in the Apocrypha follow the pattern of classic texts of the Hebrew canon. They are discussed here according to major genres also found in the Hebrew Scriptures.

HISTORICAL WORKS: Several apocrypha resemble the historical books (e.g., 1 and 2 *Samuel). 1 Esdras, composed in *Aramaic or *Hebrew in the second or first century BCE, retells events recounted in 2 *Chronicles 35–36, *Ezra, and select chapters of *Nehemiah. It gives increased prominence to *Zerubbabel, who is victorious in the contest of the three bodyguards (a “wisdom” contest in which contestants were asked to identify the strongest force in the world) and takes over the role of Nehemiah. This revision may be an effort to affirm that the Davidic throne was indeed restored, in a sense, by the ascendancy of Zerubbabel, a descendant of *David.

1 *Maccabees, originally written in Hebrew, offers an account, written in a biblical idiom, of the tumultuous period of 175–141 BCE. Topics include the initiatives to refound *Jerusalem as a Greek city, the repression of the distinctive practices of *Judaism, and the revolutionary movement that led to the removal of the occupying forces and the establishment of the *Hasmonean dynasty. The approach taken by the author of this work, a supporter of the Hasmonean regime, is counterbalanced by 2 Maccabees, a work that covers much of the same period (through the death of Judas Maccabaeus), but is more keenly interested in the *theology of history revealed in these events. 2 Maccabees was originally composed in Greek, in the late second or early first century BCE, as an abridgement of a much longer work by Jason of Cyrene. Together, these writings provide a window into a crucial period in Jewish history and consciousness. 3 Maccabees, composed in Greek and set mainly in *Alexandria, *Egypt, acquired its title because it closely resembles the themes and events of 2 Maccabees 3–8 (an attack on the *Temple in Jerusalem, the subsequent repression of Judaism in *Ptolemaic Egypt, and God's miraculous deliverance), but it does not deal with the Maccabees and it is questionable whether it reflects historical events at all. Instead, it may be a work of historical fiction encouraging *Diaspora Jews to believe that *God is also attentive to their plight (See also MACCABEES, BOOKS OF).

PROPHETIC WRITINGS: The Apocrypha contains relatively little in the way of *prophetic literature, save for two books attached to the name and career of the prophet *Jeremiah and his scribe. Baruch, a composite work most of which was originally written in Hebrew, summarizes biblical traditions that were pertinent to life under Gentile domination. It consists of a liturgical confession of sin resembling *Daniel 9, a *wisdom poem celebrating *Torah as the path to life, a lament by *Jerusalem mourning for her children, and reaffirmations of prophetic texts of hope for their regathering. The Letter of Jeremiah, written in Hebrew and perhaps representing the oldest text in the Apocrypha, emphasizes the artificiality of idols and the foolishness of worshiping them; it may have attempted to insulate Diaspora Jews from the religious practices of their neighbors.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE: The post-prophetic period saw the rise of apocalypticism, a development of the prophetic and wisdom traditions whose literary legacy included visionary literature that is also intensely scribal in its interest in the Scriptures as a form of discerning a "word from the Lord." 4 Ezra (2 Esdras 3–14) is a witness to this ongoing development. Written near the close of the first century CE, this book places the devastation of Jerusalem and the ongoing success of *Rome in the context of the destruction of the First *Temple, giving assurance that God's justice will be manifested both in the *afterlife and in the forthcoming indictment and destruction of the Roman Empire. Despite all appearances, following the *Torah remains the only path to life.

WISDOM WRITINGS: In addition to historical and "prophetic" writings, there are important contributions to *wisdom and *prayer literature among the Apocrypha. The *Wisdom of Ben Sira preserves firsthand the "curriculum" of a Jewish sage who maintained a school in Jerusalem in the earliest decades of the second century BCE. His book, written on the eve of Judaism's confrontation with *Hellenism, taught the sons of the Jerusalem elite that Torah observance remained the path to wisdom, honor, and national security. The Wisdom of Solomon, written in *Egypt in Greek during the early part of the first century CE, presents extended reflections on several themes: the postmortem vindication of the godly and their way of life, the role and nature of wisdom, the folly of Gentile religions, and God's providential care for God's people.

Several events in Israel's history provided poets with the inspiration to write liturgical literature of stunning beauty. The Prayer of Manasseh is inspired by the story of the repentance of *Judah's most wicked king (2 Chron 33:21–25) and supplies his lost confession (2 Chron 33:18–19). The story of the three young men in the furnace (Dan 3) attracts two liturgical pieces: a corporate confession of sin (The Prayer of Azariah), now placed on the lips of the exile Azariah, and a psalm of praise (The Song of the Three), sung by the youths from the midst of the flames. *Psalm 151 celebrates the election of David and his victory over Goliath.

NARRATIVES: In addition to wisdom and liturgical works, the Apocrypha contains several narratives. Tobit, written in *Aramaic perhaps in the third century BCE, tells the story of two pious Jewish families in the Diaspora, whose personal tragedies God resolves by means of a guardian angel and a fish. It is an important witness to Jewish ethical teachings and eschatological hopes, as well as the development of angelology and demonology. *Judith, written some time after the Maccabean revolution, tells the story of how God delivered his people "by the hand of a woman" and illuminates female roles, the acceptable use of deceit, and the persistence of *deuteronomistic theology. The story of *Esther is also retold, and substantially expanded, in the Apocrypha, this time with plentiful references to God, to distinctively Jewish practices, and to the causes of Jewish–Gentile tension. Similarly, two additional tales appear in the Greek version of Daniel: The first (Susanna) glorifies Daniel's wisdom and the second (*Bel and the Dragon) further criticizes and debunks Gentile religious practices especially known to Egypt (idolatry and zoology).

4 MACCABEES: Finally, the collection has come to include a thematic treatise known to the early church alternatively as "On the Supremacy of Reason" and 4 Maccabees. The author, writing from Asia Minor in perfect Greek in the later first century CE, presents the Torah-observant way of life as the God-given means by which to achieve the Greco-Roman ethical ideal of the mastery of the passions and consistency in virtue. The larger portion of this discourse focuses on the examples of the *martyrs from 166 BCE, whose story is first found in 2 Maccabees 6–7, as the supreme proof of the value of Torah's training in virtue, because it produces individuals who match the best ideals of the Greek philosopher-sage. This work is a testimony to how fully an author can acculturate without assimilating.

SIGNIFICANCE: The books of the Apocrypha do not appear to have been serious candidates for inclusion in the Hebrew Bible. One *rabbinic text declares that the Wisdom of Ben Sira "does not defile the hands" (T. Yadayim 2:13), meaning that it did not possess the sanctity of the canonical texts (and suggesting, indirectly, that its canonicity might have been discussed). Several Apocrypha books, however, were clearly held in high regard and exerted a significant influence on early Jewish circles. Substantial fragments of two copies of Ben Sira, five copies of Tobit, and one copy each of Psalm 151 and the Letter of Jeremiah were found among the caves near the Dead Sea, attesting to the reading and preservation of these texts by the community at *Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Rabbinic texts frequently quote Ben Sira with approval, although his words are not always attributed directly to him. The establishment of the Feast of Dedication (*Hanukkah) as a major festival of the Jewish liturgical *calendar attests to the impact not only of the events of the Maccabean revolt but also to the texts used to promote the observance of the festival among the Diaspora (e.g., 2 Maccabees).

The influence of the Apocrypha on Jewish *Christians, beginning with the founder of the early Christian movement, is even more remarkable. Ben Sira and Tobit have left a clear impression on the sayings attributed to Jesus in the synoptic gospels (see CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; NEW TESTAMENT). To the extent that these sayings are authentic, Jesus is seen to have learned from these teachers (directly or indirectly) such “distinctive” religious and ethical tenets as the necessity of extending forgiveness to others if one hopes to be forgiven by God (Sira 28:1–4; Matt 6:12, 14–15, 18:23–35), the superiority of charity and almsgiving as the means by which to lay up treasure before God rather than allowing wealth to “rust” through hoarding (Sira 4:4–5, 29:1–12; Tobit 4:7–9; Matt 5:42, 6:19–21, 19:21; Luke 12:33, 18:22), and the danger of presuming God’s forgiveness or favor on the basis of one’s pious works (Sira 7:8–9; Luke 18:10–14). Similar influence can be discerned on James, who, like Ben Sira, removes God from temptation and human sin (James 1:13–14; Sira 15:11–12, 20) and cautions against the dangers of the tongue (James 3:6, 9–12; Sira 22:27, 28:12). The apocryphal literature also provided resources for Jewish Christian interpretation of the death of Jesus as an act of atonement in Jewish martyrological literature (2 Macc 6–7; 4 Macc).

The texts that comprise the Apocrypha are important historical sources for the later *Second Temple Period and the ongoing interpretation of Jewish tradition and sacred literature. The challenge of adapting to the new environment of *Hellenism while preserving a distinctive religious and cultural identity is a central theme throughout these books. These works also attest to major religious developments, including a clear articulation of a belief in *resurrection immortality, and the *afterlife, as well as to the ongoing renewal of dedication to Torah and its interpretation in the face of Gentile domination. The stories of the Apocrypha frequently appear in the history of western art, music, and literature.

For further reading, see D. A. deSilva, Introducing the Apocrypha: Context, Message, and Significance (2002); and B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha (1957); See also ESCHATOLOGY: SECOND *TEMPLE PERIOD; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA. DAVID A. DESILVA

Apostasy: See CONVERSION

Arab–Israeli Conflict: See BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB–ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2010; Maps 12, 13, 14

Arab–Israeli Reconciliation: See BUBER, MARTIN; ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENT; MAGNES, JUDAH L.; SZOLD, HENRIETTA

Arabia refers to the peninsula west of *Mesopotamia that is bounded by the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean, the Persian Gulf, and the Gulf of Oman, and in the northeast by the Syrian desert. The *Roman province of Arabia, established by Emperor Trajan in 106 CE, contained the former Nabatean kingdom that occupied modern-day Jordan, parts of modern Syria and Saudi Arabia, and the Sinai peninsula (Arabia Petraea); the interior areas of southern modern Syria and northwestern modern Saudi Arabia (Arabia Deserta); and the regions bordering the Indian Ocean, including modern Yemen and Oman (Arabia Felix). Arabia remained under Roman/*Byzantine control into the seventh century and had both Jewish and *Christian populations, although the majority of inhabitants were polytheistic. During the sixth and seventh centuries CE, Arabia was subject to increasing cultural and religious influences from Sassanian *Iran to the east, as well as ongoing military competition between the Byzantine and Sassanian Empires for political control of the region.

Jews had a long history of residence in Arabia; Jewish communities spoke Arabic, were organized into clans and tribes like their Arab neighbors, and were generally assimilated into the surrounding culture. Medina, in particular, had a large Jewish population of farmers and artisans. Despite their overall acculturation, Jews were regarded as a separate group because of their distinctive religion and customs, yet were also seen as an ethnic community with kinship ties to the Arabs. According to biblical tradition, the Arabs were the descendants of *Abraham, through his son *Ishmael, and this belief also became central to Islam. It is generally accepted that Jewish religious practices, ethical concepts, and homiletic lore played a significant role in the formative traditions of Islam (see ISLAM AND JUDAISM).

Relations between Muhammed, the founder of Islam, and the Jewish tribes grew increasingly hostile during his years of residence in Medina (622–632). Between 625 and 627, Muhammed and the adherents of the new religion expelled two of Medina’s Jewish tribes and killed the men and enslaved the women and children of the third. In 628 Muhammed and his forces marched against the Jewish oases of Khaybar, Fadak, and Wadi al-Qura to the north and subdued them, establishing the precedent for later Islamic rule over all tolerated non-Muslim scriptural peoples. The Jews of these oases were allowed to remain in their homes and carry on their lives in return for the payment of tribute (see DHIMMI). When all of Arabia submitted to Muhammad and most Arabs accepted his new religion, the Jews and Christians of the peninsula became subjects of the new Islamic polity, the Umma, under these conditions. For further reading, see G. N. Newby, A History of the Jews of Arabia (1989). Map 5 ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Arabic: See ISLAM AND JUDAISM; JUDEO-ARABIC

Arabs in Israel: See DEMOGRAPHY; ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES; ZIONISM

Arabs: Representations in Israeli Literature. Modern Hebrew *literature’s preoccupation with the figure of the Arab is expressed in a staggering range of narratives that present a variety of responses, including envy, fear, regret, distrust, empathy, and frequently complex combinations of all of these. Literary responses to the Arab, especially after the 1948 war, reveal Israel's capacity for self-interrogation and for encountering uncomfortable truths. In the earliest waves of Jewish immigration (see BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF: JEWISH IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948), writers often presented a romanticized image of indigenous Arabs (particularly the Bedouin and rural peasantry), with some even fantasizing that both peoples shared Hebrew or biblical roots. Their literature deemphasized the likelihood of armed strife. An important exception is Yosef Haim Brenner (1881–1921), a prominent literary figure whose novel Breakdown and Bereavement (1920) pointed to inevitable conflict. Ironically, he himself was murdered by Arabs during the 1921 riots. Narratives written between the two world wars gradually turned away from the romantic view of Palestine toward pessimism.

Writers of the 1948 generation identified the treatment of the native Arab as the crux of the ideological crisis of Zionism, and their works express a sense of loss and disillusionment, featuring protagonists conflicted by moral dilemmas. For example, in Benjamin Tammuz's "The Swimming Race" (1951) the anguished narrator recalls his childhood visit to a hospitable Arab village near Jaffa where he has now returned as a conquering soldier helpless to prevent the murder of the Arab who had been his friend. S. Yizhar (pen name of Yizhar Smilansky [1916–2006]) fought in Israel's War of Independence as an officer. Although Yizhar served as a member of the Knesset for seventeen years, his most lasting impact on Israeli society may well be that of witness to the displacement of Palestine's native Arab population. Even before the war was over, he wrote his famous controversial novella, Khirbet Khizeh, which has had a powerful impact on Israelis ever since (it was only translated into English in 2008). The soldier-narrator (often identified as a surrogate for the author) recounts how he and his comrades receive orders to capture the Arab village of Khirbet Khizeh. Although the village appears peaceful, intelligence reports indicate that it has been infiltrated by enemy combatants. After some hesitation and debate, the soldiers assault the village, load its Arab residents onto trucks, and blow up their homes. At the time of its publication in 1949, there were calls for the work to be censored; however, over the years, Khirbet Khizeh has enjoyed tremendous popularity even among soldiers of Yizhar's generation for its honest portrayal of the moral complexities of Israel's War of Independence. Yizhar's The Days of Ziklag (1958) also portrays the brutality of war and, although sympathetic in its presentation of Israeli soldiers heroically defending a hilltop position against an Egyptian armored attack, is unsparing in depicting destruction of Arab villages (ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1948]).

The early careers of both A. B. Yehoshua (b. 1936) and Amos Oz (b. 1939), two of Israel's most internationally acclaimed authors, include milestones in the historical representation of Israel's Arab minorities. Yehoshua's "Facing the Forest" (1963) is highly regarded not only for its representation of the figure of the Arab but also for its provocative portrayal of the troubled history of the landscape itself and the erasure of the past. In this story, a rootless and disaffected student accepts an appointment as a fire-watcher in a remote forest south of Jerusalem. There he encounters an aging Arab and a young girl who cares for him. The Arab is mute, his tongue having apparently been cut out during the 1948 War of Independence, although it remains unclear which side committed the atrocity. By the end of the story, the forest is burned, and the ghostly ruins of a Palestinian village are exposed. Oz's "Nomad and Viper" (1963) is a slyly subversive retelling of the biblical tale of Dinah (whose ostensible rape leads to the massacre of the male inhabitants of Shechem). Geula, a troubled member of a young Negev kibbutz, accuses a local Bedouin youth of rape. Juxtaposing the putative values (liberalism, egalitarianism, and democracy) embodied by the "civilized" rational society of the kibbutz members with those of the "savage" Bedouins, Oz's story brilliantly deconstructs the Zionist meta-discourse of enlightening and uplifting the indigenous population.

By the late twentieth century, writers had largely moved away from portraying the Arab as a distant, adversarial stranger and began to examine the complex identities of those living within Israel, often portraying the plight of the Arab citizen trapped between irreconcilable worlds. Yehoshua's The Lover (1977) is often singled out for its humane and appealing portrayal of the young Arab Israeli boy Na'im. Set before, during, and in the traumatic aftermath of the Yom Kippur War, the novel quietly insinuates that the neglect of Israel's Arab minority constitutes a growing crisis for the Jewish state. Na'im, a young mechanic, is struck by the disparity between his fluency in Hebrew, his education in Jewish literature and history, and the majority culture's abysmal ignorance of his people's language and culture. Because of his physical appearance he is often taken for a Jew and finds himself torn between belonging to his village and the opportunities he believes may await him in the Jewish society. Na'im falls in love at first sight with the daughter of his Jewish boss, and Yehoshua's poignant treatment of their transgressive romance is unforgettable.

Savyon Liebrecht's acclaimed short-story collection, Apples from the Desert (1986), includes narratives about the relations between Jewish Israelis and Arabs that are notable both for their social realism and psychological depth. In particular, three stories draw fascinating connections between the external politics of occupation and the relations between men and women. "A Room on the Roof" presents a classic scene of Jewish Israeli and Arab relationships – the former as employer and the latter as employee. When an Israeli woman's husband leaves the country she arranges for a crew of Arab workers to add a room to her house. At first an uneasy coexistence prevails, and there are hints of deeper bonds developing. Yet the woman vacillates between being a nurturer and a stern taskmaster to the men, and their tense relations are complicated further when she discovers that she is romantically attracted to one of them. By the conclusion, the woman's construction scheme is successfully completed, but the real "project" of the story – understanding and trust between disparate peoples – collapses. In "The Road to Cedar City," two families, Jewish Israeli and Palestinian, find themselves sharing a ride while vacationing in the United States, and the men of both families argue bitterly about politics and history. The Jewish woman, who is treated with aggressive male scorn by her husband and son, discovers that she feels solidarity with the Palestinians. In "Reserve Duty" (which appears only in the original Hebrew version of this collection) the commander of an Israel Defense Forces (IDF) unit investigating hostile action in an Arab village finds himself inexplicably drawn to crossing the barrier that separates the peoples and fantasizes about living in the village as a “native son.”

Born in *Iraq in 1926, Sami Michael became involved in underground leftist activity against the repressive regime and escaped arrest by fleeing to *Iran, eventually reaching Israel in 1949. Michael considers Arabic language and culture to be intrinsic to his own identity. His novels exploring the interwoven lives of Jewish and Arab characters include Trumpet in the Wadi (1987), a tale combining pathos and high comedy in which a Russian Jewish immigrant courts a reticent Arab Israeli; Victoria (1993), an expansive family saga set largely in a single courtyard in Bagdad; and Doves in Trafalgar (2005), a sequel of sorts to Palestinian writer Ghassan Kanafani’s “Returning to Haifa” (1969), in which a Palestinian couple fleeing the 1948 war is forced to abandon their child to a Jewish couple who survived the Holocaust.

Although primarily a novelist, David Grossman first came to international attention with The Yellow Wind (1987), a searing account of what he observed on the West Bank. This work and Sleeping on a Wire: Conversations with Palestinians in Israel (1992) are considered essential reading for any introduction to the Israel–Arab dispute, mediating between the complex collective myths and political animosities on both sides of the Palestinian–Israeli conflict. Grossman’s Smile of the Lamb (1983), a memorably prescient novel set largely in a small Palestinian village, considers the moral cost incurred on occupier and occupied through the relationship of an idealistic soldier and an old Arab storyteller who regales the young man with richly mythic tales that create a tapestry of Palestinian life and culture until their friendship (like that of so many of the Jewish and Arab protagonists examined here) is destroyed by violence.

Sayed Kashua, an Arab citizen of Israel and native speaker of Palestinian Arabic, chooses to write his novels in Hebrew; in this he was preceded by Anton Shammas, whose novel Arabesques appeared in 1986. Born in 1975 in Tira, a northern village, Kashua writes for the daily newspaper Ha’aretz and lives in Jerusalem. Kashua’s first novel, Dancing Arabs (2002), became a best-seller in Israel. Its anonymous Arab protagonist grows up in Tira and wins a scholarship to a Jewish high school. Like Yehoshua’s Na’im, he experiences a taboo and ultimately hopeless love with a Jewish girl. After this and subsequent disappointments, he grows to despise himself, other Arabs (he even feels alienated from his family’s proud history resisting the Jews), and the Israelis themselves. In his inherently stagnant life, the protagonist seems to embody the collective condition of Israel’s Arab minority. Let It Be Morning (2005) was written in the wake of the Al-Aksa Intifada and reflects the author’s sense of the worsening status of Israeli Palestinians within the dominant Jewish society. It is narrated by a Palestinian journalist with Israeli citizenship (a figure resembling Kashua) who reluctantly leaves *Tel Aviv and returns to the village where he grew up. There he is depressed by his sense of how little has changed. This novel, which also examines the rift between Israeli Arab and Palestinian identities, is especially striking in its depiction of a loyal village that wakes up one day, bewildered to find itself under siege by the Israeli army. Kashua’s novels address the complex interplay among language, identity, and the Israeli Arab’s growing sense of disenfranchisement in the twenty-first century.

Valuable resources include the anthology E. Ben-Ezer, ed., Sleepwalkers & Other Stories (1999); R. Domb, The Arab in Hebrew Prose: 1911–1948 (1982); G. Ramras-Rauch, The Arab in Israeli Literature (1989); R. Feldhay Brenner, Inextricably Bonded: Israeli Arab and Jewish Writers Re-Visioning Culture (2003); and G. Z. Hochberg, In Spite of Partition: Jews, Arabs, and the Limits of Separatist Imagination (2007).

RANEN OMER-SHERMAN

Arama, Isaac (1420–1495), a rabbi in Castile and Aragon, was part of a movement of Jewish thinkers in *Spain (post-1391) who sought to reinvigorate Judaism by emphasizing faith as a willful act of fidelity to God extending beyond the limitations of reason. This movement also stressed spiritual closeness with the divine and ultimate salvation through classical Jewish practice of the commandments (*mitzvot). In advocating this linkage of faith and behavior, Arama sought to go beyond the concept of medieval Aristotelianism that correct belief was propositional and that ultimate happiness (Hebrew, osher; Greek, eudaimia) was available only to the philosophical elite. Arama identified six basic beliefs, but linked them to the embodied observance of the six biblical holy days by the entire community.

Arama, who accepted Aristotelian ethics and some ideas from *Kabbalah, argued against dissident Jewish intellectuals and disputed core Christian beliefs. However, he spoke respectfully of the culture of Christian faithfulness. His major work, Akedat Yitzhak, is a philosophical and exegetical commentary on the *Torah. He also composed commentaries on *Proverbs, studies on the *Five Scrolls, and a polemical essay, Ḥazut Kashah (Terrible Vision). After the 1492 expulsion from Spain, he spent the rest of his life in Naples. See also BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800.

BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Aramaic is an ancient *Semitic language, cognate to Biblical Hebrew. Approximately ten chapters of the Hebrew *Bible are in *Aramaic. Although *Hebrew was the main language spoken by the Judeans and Israelites throughout the biblical period, it was slowly replaced during and after the *Babylonian Exile by Aramaic, the dominant language of western Asia at that time. By the end of the biblical period (second century BCE), Aramaic had become the main Jewish spoken language and Hebrew was used in formal, liturgical, and written contexts rather than in everyday speech. This is reflected in the fact that most late biblical and early *rabbinic works are written in Hebrew, albeit a Hebrew that betrays significant Aramaic influence. Exactly when Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language is debated. Both Aramaic and Hebrew have consonantal writing systems that use the alphabet developed in *Phoenicia in the late second millennium BCE; they differ from Akkadian and Egyptian, which had much more complex writing systems. The Hebrew and Aramaic systems developed differently over time. The current script for the Bible is an Aramaic script borrowed during the *Babylonian Exile that displaced the earlier Hebrew script, sometimes called paleo-Hebrew.

The following biblical passages appear in Aramaic: two words in *Genesis 31:48, one verse in *Jeremiah 10:11, four chapters in *Ezra (4:8–6:18, 7:12–26), and six in *Daniel (2:4–7:28). The material in Daniel reflects a late author more comfortable in Aramaic. Some of the Ezra material purports to contain official documents of the *Persian chancellery, which would have been written in Aramaic, and it may have influenced the surrounding material, which is also in Aramaic. The verse in Jeremiah is aimed at a non-Jewish audience, and the words in Genesis are in Aramaic because they are spoken by Laban, an Aramean. MARC BRETTLER

Arbeter Ring: See WORKMEN'S CIRCLE

Archeology, Land of Israel: Ancient Times to Persian Period. The Land of Israel is an amorphous entity, encompassing not only the geographical borders of the eponymous modern state but also a larger region that figures in some manner as the homeland of Israelite/Judean/Jewish history. The Land of Israel itself is concentrated in the region west of the Jordan River and is bounded by the mountains of Lebanon in the north and by the Red Sea in the south. However, its larger geographic matrix encompasses the whole of the ancient *Near East, from *Mesopotamia in the east in a northwesterly direction toward Anatolia and south/southwestward to *Egypt.

The discipline of archeology of the Land of Israel arose out of the field of biblical or Syro-Palestinian archeology, which itself is a subfield of archeology, a social science closely allied with *anthropology. Archeology seeks to understand the development of human society based on its material remains. In contrast to biblical archeology, archeology of the Land of Israel maintains both a broader temporal focus and more limited geographical boundaries.

Archeological excavation is a complex process involving specialists active both in the field and in the subsequent analysis of finds. In addition to the actual physical toil, which is performed by both hired laborers and "volunteers," who pay for the privilege of doing the dirty work, the fieldwork is overseen by a hierarchical structure of trained field archeologists. Because archeology is the science of destruction – one generally has to destroy one's evidence as one uncovers it – the careful and accurate recording of each find, architectural feature, and level is paramount. To have both horizontal and vertical control over the excavation and recording process, excavation is usually carried out in a grid-like pattern of excavation squares providing horizontal exposure, whereas the baulks (the unexcavated grid lines) between them provide vertical exposure. Specialists analyze the various types of material, faunal, and floral finds. In addition, various types of scientific analyses, including C¹⁴ analysis, thermoluminescence, and neutron activation, allow studies of the age and provenance of finds.

Most excavations in the Land of Israel are conducted at artificial mounds known as "tells" (from the Arabic) or "tels" (from the Hebrew), which may contain dozens of layers or levels of habitation. The two major sources of relative dating of an archeological site are stratigraphy, the isolation and comparison of the layers of habitation, and pottery chronology, the sequential analysis of the changing forms of pottery over time. Because the sequence of pottery development may also be dated on an approximate absolute scale, and because of pottery's ubiquity at archeological sites as of the middle of the Neolithic Age (9500–6400 BCE), pottery chronology serves as the most important tool in identifying and dating a site. Although there are a number of slightly differing schemes for dating and naming archeological periods, this article follows the conventions of the New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 5: Supplementary Volume (2008).

The Land of Israel forms a geographical bridge between Africa and Asia. This fact has played a major role in determining the course of human habitation there. As a resource-poor link between the great river valley civilizations of Egypt and Mesopotamia, the Land of Israel has often been a pawn caught between these mighty geopolitical entities. Its location has also determined its economic importance as a conduit of trade to and from Egypt, Mesopotamia, Anatolia, Cyprus, and the *Arabian Peninsula.

As Africa's outlet to Asia, it is not surprising that the oldest evidence for hominids and early human beings (Neanderthals, Homo erectus, and Homo sapiens) outside of the African birthplace of humanity has been found at sites in the Land of Israel, including Ubeidiya in the Jordan Valley and the Carmel Caves. These remains date to the Paleolithic or "Old Stone" Age (from ca. 1,500,000 to 20,000 BCE). Human society was characterized during this extensive period by social organization into hunting and gathering societies. In addition there is evidence for the use of the rudimentary stone tools from which this age gets its name.

During the subsequent Epipaleolithic or Mesolithic ("Middle Stone") Age (20,000–9,500 BCE), we find the first evidence of the transition from hunter and gatherer societies to settled communities. A first tentative step in this direction was identified at the site of Ohalo II on the shores of the Sea of Galilee from the beginning of this period. During the last two millennia or so of the Epipaleolithic, the so-called Natufian period, evidence exists of the rise of more complex village communities.

However, it is during the Neolithic ("New Stone") Age (9500–6400 BCE) that the transition to settled village communities was completed. Society became more complex, which presumably entailed the division of labor and functions beyond a conjectured differentiation between gender roles. The first plants and animals were domesticated, and permanent dwellings were built. During the course of the Neolithic the technology of firing pottery was invented, which allowed for the safer storage and transportation of food products. Artistic expression and possibly religious belief are evidenced by plastered skulls with lifelike features found at *Jericho and throughout the Levant and by relatively large anthropomorphic figures made of straw overlaid with clay found at 'Ain Ghazal east of the Jordan River. At sites such as Çatalhöyük in Turkey, painted walls and statuary were found. The function of a stone tower uncovered at Jericho has not been satisfactorily explained.

As its name indicates, the Chalcolithic or "Copper-Stone" Age (6400–3600 BCE) is characterized by the introduction of metal working, in particular for luxury items. During this period one may identify the continuation of earlier social and technological processes. Characteristic of this age is the development of regional cultures. In the Golan Heights, basalt was worked into small altars(?) with human features. Walls painted with intricate geometric designs and fantastic creatures were found at Teleilat Ghassul in the Jordan Valley northeast of the Dead Sea. Beersheba in the south had a thriving industry in ivory carving and metallurgy. Burials appear in necropolises near the Mediterranean coast, where bones were interred secondarily – after the flesh had decomposed or been boiled off – in small clay containers; these containers often had the shape of a house. Round stone graves called nawamis are found in the Negev Desert. Uniquely formed pottery styles have been interpreted as conveying the importance of milk and a dea nutrix or nurturing mother goddess in the Chalcolithic cult. Arguably the most intriguing finds are those of En Gedi and Nahal Mishmar. A building found at En Gedi has been identified as a temple overlooking the Dead Sea. Nearby, in the Nahal Mishmar, a horde of hundreds of copper objects, including crowns, scepters, and mace heads, was found neatly wrapped in a cave. The presumption is that these were objects removed from the En Gedi temple for safekeeping, but never recovered.

The Early Bronze Age (3600–2000 BCE) was the first great urban age in the ancient Near East. Although the cities of the Land of Israel did not reach the size of those in other regions, they do represent a sizable advance over what existed previously. By the second phase of the Early Bronze Age, large walled cities had begun to spring up throughout the land. The presence of fortifications indicates both war between the cities and, as is known from Egyptian sources, invasions from outside the immediate region. The increasing complexity of society and its stratification are indicated in city quarters of differing size and quality and by the contrasts among cities, towns, and villages. Among the major sites are Arad in the Negev, Ai in the central hill country, Jericho in the Jordan Valley, and *Hazor and Megiddo in the north. At Megiddo a large temple complex with an open-air altar was uncovered. Burials were either in underground burial chambers or in charnel houses for the burial of bones; an example is the necropolis at Bab edh-Dhra' on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea.

After an intermediate period (2400/2300–2000 BCE), which some ascribe to the Early Bronze Age and some to the Middle Bronze Age, during which the urban culture collapsed, a new urban age was ushered in by the Middle Bronze Age (2000–1550 BCE). In effect, the Middle Bronze Age is continuous with the subsequent Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 BCE). The differentiation between the two is mainly historical and not archeological. Together they represent the heyday of *Canaanite culture. Metallurgy and pottery technology reached new heights. There is evidence of active foreign trade, particularly with Egypt. The so-called Execration Texts from Egypt indicate that it had political and economic designs on the Land of Israel and its produce. Cities, such as Dan, Hazor, Megiddo, Tel Batash/Timnah, and *Lachish, received massive fortifications, consisting in the main of thick mud brick walls. Also characteristic of Middle Bronze Age fortifications are the earthen ramparts that surrounded a number of the cities and determined their shape and extent in subsequent periods. More or less complete mud brick city gates have been excavated at Ashkelon and Dan. Temples and intricate ritual objects are found at major sites throughout the land. The end of this period is associated with the Egyptian campaigns to Canaan at the end of Egypt's Second Intermediate Period and beginning of its New Kingdom.

Egypt reasserted control over the Land of Israel during the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 BCE). Cities shrank in size and number. No new fortifications were built, which raises the question whether the Middle Bronze fortifications remained in use or whether the Egyptians prohibited the fortification of their Canaanite vassals to maintain unfettered control. Although this period is viewed as the decline of Canaanite culture, there are two aspects that make it worthy of special attention. First, the Late Bronze Age is characterized by extensive international trade connections. One can find beautiful fragments of imported wares from *Egypt, *Syria, Cyprus, and the Mycenaean culture of the Aegean world in the Land of Israel from this period. Second, it was during this age that the alphabet, one of the greatest human inventions, was developed. It vastly simplified written communication and ultimately would lead to the prospect of universal literacy. Cultic (i.e., religious) finds from the Late Bronze Age provide insight into the richness of Canaanite practice and the Canaanite pantheon. A cache of just under four hundred cuneiform tablets dating to the mid-fourteenth century BCE was found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt. In large part these tablets were sent from the rulers of the Canaanite city-states, including *Jerusalem, *Shechem, *Hazor, and others, to the Egyptian pharaoh. Hence, this is the first period for which one has hard and fast historical information from the Land of Israel. Ultimately, however, Bronze Age Canaanite culture was to fall victim to the general decline of civilization throughout the eastern Mediterranean world around 1200 BCE. Scholars have speculated that this cultural collapse was due to a combination of environmental, economic, and political factors.

Despite the decline in material culture, the Iron Age I (1200–1000 BCE) is a complex period. Egyptian control over the land of Israel came to an end. A few Canaanite cities in the valleys and lowlands – such as Gezer – managed to survive. After their arrival shortly after 1200 BCE, the *Philistines settled on the southwestern coastal strip of Canaan. In the central hill country, small agricultural villages began to take root; scholars see the eventual origin of the Israelites in this phenomenon. There are, however, no material remains that would allow one to identify the ethnicity of the village dwellers, so the identification of a settlement as Israelite rather than Canaanite is impossible. Nor is there any evidence for a massive invasion or influx of people as recounted in the biblical book of *Joshua.

The Iron Age II (1000–586 BCE) is characterized by the rise of small national states in the land of Israel and its immediate environs. The Philistines and associated “Sea Peoples” appear to have retained a city-state organization along the Mediterranean coast, whereas *Israel and *Judah formed small states centered around *Samaria and *Jerusalem. To the northwest, the *Phoenician coastal cities (Tyre and Sidon) were heirs to the Canaanite tradition. To the northeast, an Aramean state formed with Damascus as its capital city. East of the Jordan River the *Ammonites, *Moabites, and *Edomites formed states that rivaled the Israelite ones and yet were similar in many respects. Their languages were related, and their material culture and religious structures appear to have been similar.

Both Israelite and foreign inscriptions give insight into the life, economics, and history of the Israelites. In the Land of Israel itself, hundreds of tiny seals and seal impressions document the names in use among the Israelites. Important collections of ostraca (broken pieces of pottery with writing on them) have been found at Samaria, Lachish, and Arad. Monumental inscriptions have been found in Jerusalem and at Tel Dan. The inscription at Tel Dan, an *Aramaic inscription dating to the late ninth century, mentions the "house/dynasty of *David"; it is the first, albeit indirect, reference to David outside the *Bible. One of the major current controversies in the archeology of the Land of Israel is whether the archeological evidence supports the existence of a Davidic empire or whether it is more likely that David was a local chieftain whose exploits were exaggerated during the course of oral transmission.

Israelite cult centers, cultic objects, and inscriptions have been found from Tel Dan in the north to Tel Arad and Kuntillet 'Ajrud in the south. The preponderance of evidence suggests that religious life in ancient Israel tended much more toward the polytheistic than the Bible would indicate (Plate 1). Among the most impressive finds from this era are the tunnels built through bedrock to secure access to sources of water at Gibeon, Megiddo, Hazor, and Jerusalem. Graphic remains of the destructions of both Israel by the *Assyrians in 721 BCE and Judah by the *Babylonians in 586 BCE have also been discovered.

Although previous excavations tended to concentrate on the largest tells and architectural features, more recently work has been dedicated to uncovering the lives of the broad mass of common people living in poorer town quarters or in villages (P. J. King and L. E. Stager, Life in Biblical Israel [2001]). Moreover, although earlier generations of archeologists paid greater attention to reconstructing the lives of men, in recent years appreciable attention has been devoted to reconstructing the lives of women (see C. Meyers, Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite Women in Context [1988]; and ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY).

While the kingdom of Israel disappeared from history and its territory was transformed into the Assyrian province of Samaria, post-destruction Judah remained sparsely inhabited at sites such as Mizpah and Jerusalem. The *Persian conquest of Babylon in 539 BCE led to a small revival of life in Judah, but it would not be until the *Hellenistic period (332–37 BCE) that the material culture of the Land of Israel would begin to rival that of the Iron Age and it was not until the early *Roman period (37 BCE–132 CE) that it would be exceeded.

Among the many works dealing with the archeology of the land of Israel, E. Stern (ed.), New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land (4 volumes 1993 with supplement 2008), is the essential guide to individual sites. A broader cultural matrix is provided by E. M. Meyers, ed., The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East (1997). Synthetic introductions to the archeology of the land of Israel include A. Ben-Tor, ed., The Archaeology of Ancient Israel (1992); T. E. Levy, ed., The Archaeology of Society in the Holy Land (1995); A. Mazar, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible, 10,000–586 BCE (1990, 1992); and E. Stern, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible, Volume II: The Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian Periods (732–332 B.C.E.) (2001); information on the latest finds and analyses can be found in the Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, Israel Exploration Journal, Near Eastern Archaeology (formerly Biblical Archaeologist), and Tel Aviv. Maps 1, 2

CARL S. EHRLICH

Archeology, Land of Israel: *Second Temple Period.

Archeological artifacts that date from the end of the sixth century BCE to 70 CE, when the Second *Temple was destroyed, reveal a great deal about the culture of nascent Judaism in ancient *Judah-*Palestine. This period is divided according to the three dominant cultural influences in the eastern Mediterranean: *Persian (539–332 BCE), *Hellenistic (333–63 BCE), and early *Roman (63 BCE–70 CE).

Archeological remains from the Persian period are relatively sparse. Sites on the coast provide clear evidence for significant contact between the *Near East and the rest of the eastern Mediterranean world. In parts of *Samaria and *Galilee there was noteworthy contact with *Phoenicia to the north. Inland, in the hills of ancient Judah, the artifacts reveal a more isolated cultural setting. The area around *Jerusalem was not heavily affected by other cultures, other than the locally operated Persian administration. Persia did not overtly colonize this area, and thus there was not a major influx of new pottery styles and technology. Instead, excavations at Persian period sites have revealed many similarities to the earlier Iron Age (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD). However, major differences are found in the number and size of the sites: The *Babylonians devastated much of the population in the region of Judah, and it took centuries before the number of residents equaled what it was before 586 BCE when the First *Temple was destroyed.

The history of the region can be reconstructed from both texts and archeological remains. Nearly fifty years after the Babylonian destruction of the First Temple, the Persian Empire reconstituted the province of Judah, calling it *Yehud. The rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple began after Cyrus, the Achaemenid Persian ruler (559–530 BCE), allowed the exiled Judeans to return to Yehud. *Ezra-*Nehemiah is our best literary source for the period. It is likely that most of the Judeans who returned from Babylon resettled in and around Jerusalem and took up subsistence farming practices, without much interaction with the cosmopolitan settings that were found in many of the coastal cities.

The first seventy years of Persian rule were a period of stability and slow growth in and around Yehud and Samaria. After Artaxerxes I came to power in 465 BCE, Persia used Yehud as a staging ground for military incursions into *Egypt. The Persian military presence increased exponentially in the middle of the fifth century, as seen in the excavations of dozens of fortresses and military outposts, particularly in the region of the Judean hill country (shephelah) near Egypt. This was also the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, a period of social and religious reforms in Yehud, and the rebuilding of the walls of *Jerusalem. Although archeological evidence for Jerusalem in the Persian period is still scarce, excavations have revealed enough evidence to postulate a city of approximately 2,500 people.

During the period of the *Babylonian Exile many rural inhabitants remained in the region. Archeologists have found significant continuity in the material culture remains of people living in Judah-Yehud during the Neo-Babylonian and the Persian administrations. The major change in Yehud was not in pottery forms and building techniques, but in population size. Archeologist Oded Lipschits suggests that the population of the region dropped from 108,000 before the Babylonian destruction to less than 32,000 in the fourth century BCE. The majority of this population decline occurred in cities like Jerusalem. Small village sites were more abundant in the Persian period, suggesting a time of relative peace for the rural agriculturalists. Although pottery forms did not change significantly from the seventh to the fifth centuries, the impact of the Persian administration is evident in the large quantity of seal impressions and coins found in the region.

Along the Mediterranean coast the cultural situation was quite different. Many Persian military outposts and fortresses, used to guard coastal and inland routes, have been excavated. Cities like Shikmona, Ashdod, Ashkelon (with its massive dog cemetery), Gaza, Jaffa, Dor, and Acco prospered as ports for increased trade connections with the rest of the Mediterranean world. These cities had significant economic and cultural contacts with both the Persians and Greek city-states, as indicated by the Attic and Corinthian pottery found in almost every Persian period site in the Land of Israel, particularly in coastal areas. Many of the vessels would have been used in meals, particularly for mixing and drinking wine (decorated bell kraters, or large mixing bowls, and cups are found in large quantities).

When *Alexander the Great moved through Palestine in 332 BCE on his way to take control of Egypt, Greek influence was already a significant feature in Palestine – especially along the coast. Archeological evidence of Alexander's military and political occupation of the region is meager, because the transition from Persian to *Hellenistic rule was relatively peaceful. After Alexander's death in 323 BCE, as the Land of Israel made the transition from the rule of the *Ptolemies to that of the *Seleucids at the end of the third century BCE, many aspects of life remained the same. No major destruction layers have been found, an indication that the Hellenistic kingdoms did not destroy local cities as they vied for power in the region. Rather they wished to maintain the ongoing economic success achieved in the area through wine and olive oil production, as well as trade through the coastal cities. Although the Persian Empire built small administrative buildings around Yehud, its rulers did not significantly alter the landscape or introduce radically different cultural configurations. In contrast Hellenistic cities brought new customs, institutions, and ideas, including diverse forms of education (gymnasium), language (koine, Greek), religion (the heroes and gods of the new empire), and lifestyles (physical culture and public bathing).

In the south, Gaza became a major trade center, and new Nabatean outposts were built on the trade routes across the Negev from the Mediterranean coast to Petra. Further up the coast, port cities like Dor grew and prospered in the Hellenistic period as urban residents embraced Hellenism and international trade expanded. More than forty-five miles inland, the city of Marisa (Mareshah) was built in the region of Idumea. Excavations at Marisa have revealed a lively center of commerce, dove breeding, and olive oil production, with well-decorated homes stocked with imported dishes and wine amphora.

Other Hellenistic cities in the wider region include Gerasa and Philadelphia (*Ammon) in the Trans-Jordan – an area known as the *Decapolis. Nearer to the Sea of Galilee, Hellenistic settlements include the cities of Scythopolis (next to the ancient city of Beth Shean), Hippos, and Philoteria. Two excavated sites in northern *Galilee have revealed the extensive trade networks of this era. In the ongoing work at the site of Tel Kedesh, excavators have revealed a significant Phoenician outpost and administrative center. The discoveries of several thousand small stamped seals and a massive governmental building at the site reveal that the center was used throughout the Hellenistic era to control trade and commerce in the area. The presence of imported pottery from Greece, Italy, and Egypt illustrates the area's vast trade networks and diverse population. Approximately fifteen kilometers northeast of Tel Kedesh, the site of Tel Anafa became a wealthy center of trade in the middle of the Hellenistic period. With ties to the port city of Tyre, these sites reveal the increasingly cosmopolitan nature of the inland areas that had been sparsely populated during the Persian period (see also HELLENISM).

In the hills north of Jerusalem, Macedonian soldiers stationed in Samaria constructed large towers and introduced a Hellenistic temple; an inscription indicates that it was dedicated to Serapis and Isis. Nearby, the newly rebuilt city of *Shechem was located below the sacred *Samaritan Temple site on Mt. Gerizim. Excavations of its walled, sacred precinct revealed considerable building activities during the early second century BCE. Further north, in the regions of northern Samaria and Galilee, subsistence farmers lived on small farms and in villages. This northern area continued to have strong ties to *Phoenicia in the north until the period of the *Hasmonean revolt.

In the Hellenistic period, Jerusalem continued as a small, relatively poor city, devoted primarily to the work of the Temple. The city occupied only the Temple Mount and the area known as the City of David. Only later did the city grow and begin to add new neighborhoods to the southwest. Culturally, Jerusalem was insular, although the growing amount of imported pottery from the third to the second centuries BCE demonstrates increasing contact with wider Mediterranean trade networks. Excavations have also revealed signs of the local system of taxation in the form of more than one hundred stamped storage jars that bear the stamp YHD or YRSLM (for Yehud or Jerusalem). These jars were likely used for wine, wheat, or oil, paid as a tax to the Temple or the local administrator.

As this era progressed, the local population in the Land of Israel had to decide between maintaining their traditions or adopting Greek customs. Becoming an ally of the Greek administration could mean prosperity and luxurious lifestyles. For example, excavations at the site of Iraq el-Emir in Trans-Jordan have revealed the elaborate palace of the *Tobiads, a Jewish family that benefited from the decision to embrace Hellenism. Many wealthy Judeans, including residents of Jerusalem, made similar decisions. *Josephus and the authors of I and II *Maccabees report that in the early years of Seleucid control aristocratic families were drawn to Hellenism. The high priest Jason built a gymnasium in the city in 175 BCE. In 168 BCE, Antiochus IV – the Seleucid ruler – built the Acra, a new fortress for the foreign mercenary garrison he stationed in Jerusalem.

In contrast to the Tobiads and the Hellenized Judeans in the cities, supporters of more traditional Judean practices reacted violently to the introduction of Hellenism, particularly when Antiochus IV brought worship of Zeus into the Jerusalem Temple. In the archeological record, the Hasmonean revolt (also known as the Maccabean revolt) and its aftermath left a significant mark. Excavations in Jerusalem and surrounding regions show that there was a steady population growth and the construction of many new buildings.

Judeans increasingly moved into the region of Galilee and into coastal cities that were once dominated by Gentiles; archeological surveys date more than ninety-three new settlements to this period. Hasmonean outposts were established to protect the new settlements and trade routes, and many non-Judeans appear to have moved out of the region of Palestine, sometimes by force. Archeologists have found destruction layers at sites like Tel Kedesh, Dor, and Strato's Tower. The types of pottery that were used during the Hasmonean period also suggest that some Judeans were intentionally differentiating themselves from their more Hellenized and cosmopolitan neighbors around the region. Large quantities of a high-quality, imported type of pottery called Eastern Sigillata A have been found in all the regions surrounding the Hasmonean kingdom, but this ware is much less plentiful and is often absent in Hasmonean-controlled territory (A. M. Berlin). Similarly, pig bones are much rarer in Hasmonean sites, suggesting that Hasmonean Judeans avoided pork.

By 63 BCE the *Roman Empire had annexed the region. The Roman general Pompey began the transfer of power when he conquered the Seleucids, followed by *Herod who was appointed by the Emperor Augustus to oversee the remnants of the Hasmonean kingdom. Herod's impressive building projects were the primary means by which he controlled the economic climate of his small Roman tributary territory. His massive building program honored Rome and his patrons and also bolstered his comfort, political security, and personal pride. In the 20s BCE Herod undertook more than a dozen major building projects in Judea, with the Temple in Jerusalem as his crowning achievement. Herod appeased portions of the Judean population and bolstered his reputation in Rome by transforming the Temple and surrounding public spaces into a major cultic, economic, and tourist center.

From a very small population in the early Hellenistic period, Jerusalem grew steadily under the Hasmonians, particularly throughout the early first century CE, into a city that on the surface looked very much like a typical Roman urban center. By the middle of the first century the size of the city's residential area was approximately 58 hectares. The growth of the residential area that occurred with the construction of the so-called second wall expanded the potential population of the city to approximately 25,000 people. With the addition of the so-called third wall, the population of the city may have doubled again just before the beginning of the war against Rome in 66 CE. Excavations of Jerusalem residences of the late Second Temple period demonstrate a high standard of living. Elite priestly families were no doubt the occupants of many of these private houses in Jerusalem, especially in the region of the upper city immediately surrounding the Temple. Although some homes are less elaborate than the private mansions near the Temple, items such as frescoes, mosaics, fine ceramic wares, glass objects, and well-made stepped, plastered pools (most likely Jewish *ritual baths), are commonly found and speak to significant economic prosperity.

In the middle of the first century CE, entering Jerusalem on any of the five roads that led into the city was similar to visiting any major Greek or Roman city of the age. Cemeteries, with monumental tomb structures, would have been seen outside of the walls. These were reminders of the great families and patrons of Jerusalem from the past two centuries, including the Hasmonean royal family and elite members of Jewish communities from Judea and the *Diaspora. A visitor to the city would certainly have noticed the large stone blocks that were constantly being pulled into the city from the nearby limestone quarries. Archeologists have revealed that major construction activities, including paving the roads and constructing new buildings in and around the Temple Mount, continued to be a feature of the city's urban scene throughout the decades before the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE.

*Herod's reconstruction of the Temple Mount dominated the urban landscape in Jerusalem. The extant sections of the retaining walls give us our primary clues about this massive building complex. The average stone in the walls was two to three meters in length and about three to five tons in weight. Some stones at the base of the walls were as long as ten to twelve meters. Josephus' descriptions of the Temple are the primary source for our knowledge of the components of the compound.

*Josephus clearly indicates that during and after the time of Herod the urban landscape also included a huge stoa or basilica building, grand palaces, many elite residences, a Roman theater, an amphitheater, a hippodrome, and the Roman military fortress (Antonia) that dominated a position next to the Temple. The walled city, ruled by either a Herodian client-king loyal to Rome or by one of thirteen different Roman governors, was tightly controlled. The Roman administration commanded garrisoned troops, held sway as the supreme judicial authority, and directed financial affairs on behalf of Rome.

Archeology has also shown that the local Judean population was highly concerned with ritual purity. Evidence for ritual baths (mikveh) and stone vessels that were used in Jewish purity rituals have been found throughout the region. Yet this interest in purity ritual was combined with typical signs of Roman culture. Private Roman-style baths (caldaria) have been found in several elite houses in the city, the Greek language was well known in Jerusalem, and typical Roman urban features were mixed into the landscape in a way that nearly defies any attempt to neatly separate and distinguish "Roman" and "Jewish" cultural features.

Archeologists have discovered similar patterns of social and cultural development throughout Judea and adjacent regions. Herod's new port city of Caesarea was a massive building project that used the newest Roman technology to alter the coastline and establish a Roman-style city, complete with a Roman temple, palace, theater, amphitheater, and hippodrome. Herod built additional Roman temples in Sebaste in Samaria, as well as the beautiful city of Pnias in northern *Galilee. Herod Antipas followed his father's pattern and built two major Roman cities in Galilee. The excavations at Sepphoris have revealed a Roman-style city in the middle of a region that was still dominated by dozens of small agrarian villages. The existence of stone vessels and ritual baths in Sepphoris indicates that the residents were primarily Jewish. Antipas also built the city of Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee and moved his administrative headquarters there just before 20 CE. Excavations at the sites of Gamla and Jotapata (Yodfat) have provided a great deal of information about Jewish villages in the region during the late

*Second Temple period. The Roman army destroyed both villages before 70 CE, marking the end of the Second Temple period and the beginning of a new era of destruction, population shifts, and rebuilding efforts in Palestine.

For further reading, see A. M. Berlin, "Between Large Forces: Palestine in the Hellenistic Period," Biblical Archaeologist 60:1 (1997): 2–51; J. W. Betlyon, "A People Transformed: Palestine in the Persian Period," Near Eastern Archaeology 68:1–2 (2005): 4–58; M. A. Chancey and A. Porter, "The Archaeology of Roman Palestine," Near Eastern Archaeology 64:4 (2001): 164–201; O. Lipschits, "Demographic Changes in Judah between the Seventh and the Fifth Centuries B.C.E.," in Judah and the Judeans in the Neo-Babylonian Period, ed. O. Lipschits and J. Blenkinsopp (2003); and E. Stern, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible II: The Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian Periods (732–332 BCE) (2001).
Maps 3, 4
MILTON MORELAND

Argentina. Although a few Jews arrived in Argentina after it achieved independence from *Spain in the early nineteenth century, organized Jewish life dates to 1862, when a group of French and German Jews (later joined by a handful of Moroccan Jews) founded the Congregación Israelita de la República Argentina in Buenos Aires. By the end of the nineteenth century there was a significant Jewish presence, both in Buenos Aires and in the rest of the country (mostly in the center and north). An 1881 decree by Argentine president Julio A. Roca opened the door to "Israelite immigration," and the arrival of the Wesser in 1889, a ship carrying 816 Eastern European Jews, marked the beginning of a steady flow of *Ashkenazic immigrants. Heading mostly to the interior of the country, Jewish families settled in *agricultural settlements created with the aid of the Jewish Colonization Association (JCA), a philanthropic organization founded in Paris in 1891 by *Baron Maurice de Hirsch. By 1937, there were sixteen JCA colonies in the provinces of Buenos Aires, Santa Fé, La Pampa, Entre Ríos, and Santiago del Estero. Life in the colonies was initially hard, as the settlers had little knowledge of how to work the land. They faced adverse weather conditions and a bureaucratic organization that hindered their progress. Yet Jewish life flourished, and these communities maintained the *Yiddish language and a distinctive identity by founding libraries, theaters, Jewish schools, cemeteries, and many other Jewish cultural and political societies. Many of the immigrants' children and grandchildren, however, left the colonies to pursue academic and professional careers in larger cities.

In contrast to Ashkenazic immigration, which was aided by the JCA and other organizations created to help the newcomers, *Sephardic immigration was not organized. Moroccan Jews started moving into northern areas of Argentina from *Brazil in the late nineteenth century; by 1895 they had founded two communities (in Buenos Aires and in Santa Fé) and a cemetery (in Santa Fé.) Other Sephardic groups also settled in Buenos Aires and interior cities during the early years of the twentieth century. These Jews came mostly from the *Ottoman Empire (Rhodes, Smyrna, Constantinople, Aleppo, and Damascus), but Sephardim from *Bulgaria, *Italy, and *Jerusalem joined the community as well. A second wave of immigrants (mostly of Moroccan Jews) came to Argentina after the creation of Israel in 1948 (see NORTH AFRICA).

In the interior cities, Sephardim created their own communal institutions wherever they settled, usually separate from the Ashkenazim but not from other Sephardim. By contrast, each Sephardic group in Buenos Aires settled in a different part of the city, built its own synagogues, and founded philanthropic societies and cemeteries. During the first half of the twentieth century, these separate Sephardic communities seldom mixed with other Sephardic groups or with Ashkenazic Jews.

A whole host of Jewish institutions were created in Buenos Aires during the years of massive immigration. Among others, they included Bikur Jolim, a Jewish soup kitchen; SOPROTIMIS (Society for the Protection of Immigrants); the Jewish Anti-Tuberculosis League (the Sephardim organized their own); Jewish orphanages for girls and boys; a home for the elderly; a Jewish hospital; and the Argentine Zionist Federation. These organizations were financially supported by the various Jewish communities in Buenos Aires and in the rest of the country. As stated earlier, Sephardic Jews tended to use their own societies.

Jewish education was provided since the early years. For the JCA colonies, the *Alliance Israélite Universelle sent graduates from their schools in Morocco and the Ottoman Empire who taught both "Jewish" topics and the Argentine curriculum. The Argentine government, however, later took on the responsibility of teaching secular education, and Jewish education became optional after Argentine schools were done for the day. These Talmudei Torah were linked to religious congregations and were under the supervision of rabbis. After 1917, a debate emerged around what constituted Jewish education, and secular Jewish schools (led by leftist *Zionists) were created. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, there are about seventy educational institutions under a Central Committee of Jewish education (Vaad Hajinuj).

Jewish cultural life in Buenos Aires and in the cities in the interior of the country was varied. Certain neighborhoods in Buenos Aires, like Once, Barracas, Flores, Villa Crespo, had a high concentration of Jews. Yiddish *theater was very popular, and Argentina boasted various local theater companies and enjoyed visits from international troupes. Jewish writers (in Yiddish or Spanish) enjoyed a very active publishing scene and avid readers. Elie *Wiesel's original Yiddish version of his famous memoir Night (originally titled And the World Kept Silent), for example, was first published in 1956 in Buenos Aires as part of a collection of Polish Yiddish works edited by Mark Turkow, a renowned local editor and writer. Many Jewish newspapers and monthly/biweekly papers were available as well, both in Yiddish (Yiddishe Tzeitung, Di Presse, among several others) and in Spanish (Mundo Israelita, Israel, La Luz).

Various Jewish sports clubs, imbued with *Zionist ideology, sprang up in Buenos Aires and in some cities in the interior. Sociedad Hebraica Argentina, Macabi, and Nautico Hacoaj are some of the institutions that still provide sports, recreation, and cultural options for Jewish families.

Although Argentine Jewry did not split into Reform, Conservative, or Orthodox denominations, at the beginning of the twenty-first century Argentina has both Conservative synagogues (usually led by graduates from the Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano founded by American Conservative rabbi Marshall Meyer in 1962) and Orthodox congregations. There were various attempts at centralizing Sephardic and Ashkenazic Jewish organizations during the first decades of the twentieth century, and in 1935, the Delegación de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas (DAIA) was created for that purpose. Although its role was briefly challenged during the late 1940s and 1950s by other groups, its legitimacy has been unquestioned since 1955. In 1931, in another centralizing move, the Ashkenazic community consolidated its social and philanthropic activities with the creation of the AMIA (Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina), originally the Ashkenazic Chevra Kadisha. This organization's building (which also housed the DAIA and the Instituto (IWO) archive and library) was bombed in 1993, causing the deaths of eighty-five men and women. Today, most of the estimated 200,000 Argentine Jews live in the city of Buenos Aires.

For further reading, see H. Avni, Argentina and the Jews: A History of Jewish Immigration (1991); and V. Mirelman, Jewish Buenos Aires, 1890–1930: In Search of an Identity (1990); See also LATIN AMERICA; FILM: LATIN AMERICA; and LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA. ADRIANA M. BRODSKY

Aristeas, Letter of. This Greek text, apparently written by an Alexandrian Jew, purports to describe the origins of the *Septuagint. According to the Letter, *Ptolemy II (reigned 281–246 BCE) was assembling a library of the world's great works in *Alexandria and believed that a translation of the Jewish *Torah should be included. To entice translators from the Land of *Israel, he freed Jewish prisoners of war (1–81). The Letter goes on to describe the *Temple in Jerusalem, defends the integrity of the Jewish law, and reports on the journey of seventy-two scribes to Alexandria. During a seven-day banquet the king learned of the high quality of the translators' religion by questioning them (83–300). Lastly, the Letter recounts the actual translation, accomplished in seventy-two days, and its approval by the Jewish community (301–21). Written some time in the second or first century BCE in Alexandria, the work likely aimed to situate Jewish *law favorably within the context of the other legal systems available in Ptolemaic *Egypt and to justify the translation of the *Torah for Jews of the Greek-speaking *Diaspora. ROBERT KUGLER

Ark of the Covenant (aron ha-berit) is the sacred chest, said to have been finely crafted of acacia wood (shittim) by Bezalel according to divine instructions (Exod 25:9–22) as a repository for “the pact which I shall give you” (25:16). Presumably this verse refers to the stone tablets on which the *Ten Commandments (Decalogue) were inscribed. Stored in the portable *Tabernacle (mishkan) used during the wilderness wanderings, the ark was overlaid with gold, had a gold cover (kapporet) adorned with cherubim (25:17–22), and was carried through the desert on gold-plated poles by *priests. According to Exodus 25:22, the ark was the location of divine communication to Israel. Other passages relate that the ark accompanied the *Israelites in the wilderness (Num 4:5–20), across the Jordan River (Josh 3:6–17), and into battle (Josh 6:4–14; 1 Sam 4:3–7; 2 Sam 11:11). When it was captured by the *Philistines (1 Sam 4: 11), the ark brought them only misfortunes and was ultimately returned (1 Sam 6:1–15). King *David brought the ark into *Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:1–17), and eventually it found a permanent home in *Solomon's *Temple (1 Kgs 8:1–9). The ark's known history ends when Jerusalem was captured by the *Babylonians in 586 BCE, but it has had an active afterlife in Jewish, Christian, and Muslim folklore traditions. KATE FRIEDMAN

Aron Ha-Kodesh (Holy Ark) is the repository in which the *Torah scrolls are placed in the *synagogue. See also CEREMONIAL OBJECTS.

Art, American: Before 1940. The term “Jewish American art,” like the more generalized term “Jewish art,” is fraught with complications and variously understood. Critics debate whether Jewish American art need only be art made by a Jewish American, independent of content, or if both the artist's and the artwork's identity must be Jewish. Indeed, working in myriad styles and adopting both figuration and abstraction, some artists of Jewish origins address Jewishness and the more specific Jewish American experience, whereas others make art that is indistinguishable in theme and content from their Gentile counterparts. Whether a Jewish American artist should be defined sociologically or by subject matter remains an open question; in the discussion that follows Jewish American artists are accepted according to either criterion.

Jews did not participate in American visual art in a meaningful way until the nineteenth century. They were certainly free to do so, but religious constraints, as well as uneasiness about the respectability of a career in art, disappeared slowly. This hesitancy was sometimes the result of the prohibition against graven images in the second commandment of the biblical *Decalogue; for centuries, some Jews understood it as prohibiting the creation of visual art of any kind. However, close reading of the text shows that the commandment was directed against figuration used for idol worship and not other types of artistic expression.

In the nineteenth century, some Jewish American artists designed *ceremonial objects, which was considered religiously acceptable. For example, Myer Myers (1723–1795), an eighteenth-century silversmith, made both secular and religious objects for colonial merchants. He created rimonim (literally “pomegranates”; these were ornaments for the tops of the wooden rollers of Torah scrolls) for several synagogues, including *New York's Congregation Shearith Israel and the Jeshuat Israel Congregation in *Newport, Rhode Island. In the nineteenth century, a handful of Jews were painters. Wealthy patrons commissioned the brothers Joshua and John Canter (or Canterson) to paint their portraits. Theodore Sidney Moïse (1808–1885), Frederick E. Cohen (1818–1858), and Jacob Hart Lazarus (1822–1891) are other nineteenth-century Jewish portraitists of note.

Solomon Nunes Carvalho (1815–1897) is the best known artist from this period. In addition to making portraits of members of the Jewish community, he also painted allegorical portraits, including one of Abraham Lincoln (1865). Carvalho created a few biblical paintings and landscapes as well, but his fame rests on his work as a daguerreotypist for John C. Frémont's 1853 exploratory expedition through Kansas, Utah, and Colorado. Primarily known in his time as a printmaker, Max Rosenthal (1833–1919) was the official illustrator for the U.S. Military Commission during the Civil War. Later, Rosenthal painted Jesus at Prayer for a Protestant church in Baltimore, presenting Jesus with phylacteries on his forehead and right arm. The altarpiece was promptly rejected. Henry Mosler (1841–1920) began his career as an artist correspondent for Harper's Weekly during the Civil War. Like many non-Jewish artists, Mosler went to Europe for artistic training. He soon became a painter of genre scenes, frequently picturing peasant life in Brittany, France. His canvas The Wedding Feast (ca. 1892), which was exhibited at the Paris Salon, records Breton marriage customs.

The eminent sculptor Moses Jacob Ezekiel (1844–1917) made numerous portrait heads, including a bronze bust of Isaac Mayer Wise (1899). The Wise commissioned Ezekiel's large marble Neoclassical group Religious Liberty for the Centennial Exhibition of 1876, and in 1888 he designed the seal for the recently established Jewish Publication Society of America. Ephraim Keyser (1850–1937) created commemorative sculptures, including President Chester Arthur's tomb at the Rural Cemetery in Albany, New York. Katherine M. Cohen (1859–1914) studied with the famous sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens and made portrait busts, as well as sculptures with Jewish themes such as The Vision of Rabbi Ezra and The Israelite. These early painters and sculptors worked independently and were not known to each other. They created in relatively divergent styles, following the same trends as the larger American artistic community. It was not until the twentieth century that Jewish American artists began interacting and taking art classes together.

Among the large influx of immigrants to the United States between 1880 and 1920 were two million Jews. Mostly from poor communities in Eastern Europe, these immigrants were eager to assimilate. The Educational Alliance, a settlement house on the Lower East Side of New York City, where many immigrants went to learn American manners and customs, offered art classes starting in 1895; discontinued in 1905, the classes resumed in 1917. From the school's reopening until 1955, Russian immigrant Abbo Ostrowsky served as director. Many artists who later achieved great success studied at the Alliance, including sculptors Saul Baizerman (1899–1957) and Jo Davidson (1883–1952) and painters Peter Blume (1906–1992) and Philip Evergood (1901–1973). The Alliance sponsored art exhibitions as did other venues in New York that were identified with Jewish life. In 1912, the Ethical Culture Society's Madison House Settlement arranged a show of Jewish Russian immigrant artists, such as Samuel Halpert (1884–1930), in which Gentile artists also participated. The People's Art Guild held more than sixty exhibitions from 1915 to 1918. In May 1917, three hundred works by eighty-nine artists were exhibited at the Forverts Building, home of the Yiddish daily newspaper, the Forward; more than half of the artists were Jewish. Well-known Jewish community leaders Stephen Wise, Judah Magnes, and Jacob Schiff helped sponsor the exhibition. The Jewish Art Center, directed by artists Jennings Tofel (1891–1959) and Benjamin Kopman (1887–1965), held exhibitions focusing on Yiddish culture from 1925 to 1927.

In the early decades of the twentieth century some artists, such as Abraham Walkowitz (1878–1965), William Meyerowitz (1887–1981), and Jacob Epstein (1880–1959), began their careers by portraying the Lower East Side. The Gentile observer Hutchins Hapgood described East Side imagery in his book, The Spirit of the Ghetto (1902), as typically Jewish. Characterizing this work as "ghetto art," Hapgood named Epstein, Bernard Gussow (1881–1957), and Nathaniel Loewenberg as exemplars of the mode. To illustrate Hapgood's evocation of the cultural and religious nature of the Jewish people, Epstein made fifty-two drawings and a cover design for the book. Epstein later became an expatriate, settling in London and gaining fame as a Modernist sculptor.

The photographer Alfred Stieglitz (1864–1946) championed Modernism in the 1910s. Although most of the artists whom Stieglitz supported were not Jewish, his coreligionists Max Weber (1881–1961) (Plate 16), an avant-garde painter and sculptor, and the Modernist Walkowitz, enjoyed his patronage. An underlying tone of antisemitism, or at least an intense nativism, pervaded some discussions of Modernism at this time; the conservative critic Royal Cortissoz described Modernism as "Ellis Island art." Certainly, Modernism was frequently associated with Jews, especially in Europe; Adolf Hitler later adopted this position.

In addition to taking many innovative pictures, Stieglitz nearly single-handedly legitimized photography as a rightful counterpart to painting and sculpture. Moreover, Stieglitz mentored several important photographers in their own right, including Arnold Newman (1918–2006) and Paul Strand (1890–1976). In the 1930s, artist Ben Shahn (1898–1969) took documentary photographs for the Farm Security Administration, a government program enacted to chronicle the poverty and desperation in Dust Bowl America for urban Americans.

Often called "the father of modern photojournalism," Alfred Eisenstaedt (1898–1995) was one of the four original staff photographers at Life magazine. Working for Life for forty years starting in 1936, the prolific and self-taught Eisenstaedt took photos for approximately 2,500 assignments, and his work appeared on more than ninety covers. Eisenstaedt is especially known for his ability to capture the salient moment in rich detail, whether the character of an important figure or a slice of everyday life, such as the reactions of women purchasing undergarments in a department store. Also a photojournalist, Weegee (born Usher Fellig, 1899–1968) achieved fame chronicling crime and disaster; he specialized in capturing the effects of these tragedies on the people of New York, subsequently selling his images to newspapers and tabloids. Weegee's sensationalized, lurid, nocturnal pictures of bloody corpses, distraught tenement dwellers watching as their meager homes were engulfed in flames, car accidents, and additional agonies – as well as his other photographic subjects – number in the thousands; 5,000 negatives and around 15,000 prints were counted after his death, and more have been discovered since. In the latter half of the twentieth century, Jews continued to play a large role in photography, especially in the fashion industry.

Many artists addressed political, social, and economic issues, especially during the Great Depression. It has been argued that traditions of social justice impelled Jewish artists to create imagery of the underdog. Although secular in theme, these works, influenced by the Jewish experience, would be recognized as Jewish American art even by critics who define the term in its strictest sense. Working as Social Realists in the thirties, the Soyer brothers (Raphael, 1899–1987; Moses, 1899–1974; and Isaac, 1902–1981) represented mundane details of life, including waiting in an unemployment line, with gentleness and compassion. Peter Blume, Ben Shahn (Plate 18), Mitchell Siporin (1910–1976), and Harry Sternberg (1904–2001) were more emphatic about their political commitments; Shahn made more than twenty images decrying the ethnically biased trial and executions of Italian American anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. William Gropper (1897–1977) expressed his political sympathies as a cartoonist for the left-wing publication New Masses and the Yiddish daily Morning Freiheit. The desire of several of these artists for social change encouraged them to find a like-minded community; some joined socialist or communist organizations, such as the John Reed Club.

In 1935, nine Jewish artists formed a group they dubbed “The Ten” (the tenth spot was reserved for a guest artist). Ben-Zion (1897–1987), Ilya Bolotowsky (1907–1981), Adolph Gottlieb (1903–1974), Louis Harris (1902–1970), Jack (Yankel) Kufeld (1907–1990), Marcus Rothkowitz (Mark Rothko, 1903–1970), Louis Schanker (1903–1981), Joseph Solman (1909–2008), and Nahum Tschachbasov (1899–1984), members of the original group, exhibited together for four years. That the artists shared a Jewish background is typically understood as a coincidence. No common style or theme pervades the group’s work, but most members were committed to Modernist developments.

During the 1940s, Jack Levine (1915–2010) worked as a Social Realist, although he painted more satirically and expressionistically than practitioners of the mode in the 1930s. Beginning in 1940, Levine painted and made prints of biblical figures and stories in addition to his politically motivated art. Since his first biblical painting, Planning Solomon’s Temple, Levine rendered hundreds more images inspired by the Bible’s narrative. Often employing Hebrew labels to identify figures, Levine explained that his biblical works attempted to augment Jewish pictorial expression, which he felt was hampered by the second commandment. The Boston-born Levine began a lifelong friendship with Hyman Bloom (1913–2009) when the pair studied art together at a Jewish Community Center in their early teens. Bloom also retained the human figure in an increasingly abstract art world, painting secular and religious matter in brilliant colors. David Aronson (b. 1928), who like Levine, frequently painted biblical subjects, and Philip Guston (1913–1980), an abstract artist who moved to New England late in life to teach at Boston University, are associated with the Boston Expressionist school. After his arrival in Boston, Guston adopted Jewish themes – painted representationally – on a more consistent basis.

Clearly, all these artists have contributed to the rich field of Jewish American art in diverse fashions. They paved the way in the second half of the century for a more overt embrace of Jewishness, often rendered in an avant-garde manner, in the wake of the trauma of the Holocaust and the later rise in ethnic consciousness.

Recent research includes M. Baigell, American Artists, Jewish Images (2006); S. Baskind, Raphael Soyer and the Search for Modern Jewish Art (2004); idem, Encyclopedia of Jewish American Artists (2007); J. Gutmann, “Jewish Participation in the Visual Arts of Eighteenth- and Nineteenth-Century America,” American Jewish Archives (April 1963): 21–57; N. Kleeblatt and S. Chevlowe, eds., Painting a Place in America: Jewish Artists in New York, 1900–1945 (1991); M. Kozloff, New York: Capital of Photography (2002); and O. Soltes, Fixing the World:

Jewish American Painters in the Twentieth Century (2003); and see also PHOTOGRAPHY. SAMANTHA BASKIND

Art, American: Since 1940. As painters, sculptors, print-makers, and photographers, as well as artists who engage in newer forms of visual expression such as video, conceptual, and performance art, Jewish American artists, considering their small numbers in the general population, have had an exceptionally large presence in the art world from the mid-twentieth century onward.

Several of the leading Abstract Expressionists were Jewish. Adolf Gottlieb (1903–1974), Philip Guston (1913–1980), Lee Krasner (1908–1984; Plate 17), Barnett Newman (1905–1970), and Mark Rothko (1903–1970) are among several Jewish artists who eschewed representation in the late 1940s and 1950s. The styles in which the artists worked are difficult to generalize, but they typically painted on large canvases and were interested in spontaneous expression. Although abstract, Newman’s painting has been understood as shaped by his Jewish sensibilities, in part because of titles like Covenant and The Name, and also because, it has been argued, his knowledge of *Kabbalah (Jewish mysticism) influenced his “zip paintings,” which can be read as symbolic of God and Creation. The only photographer aligned with the Abstract Expressionists was Aaron Siskind (1903–1991). Some second-generation Abstract Expressionists were Jewish. Helen Frankenthaler (b. 1928) and Morris Louis (1912–1962) stained unprimed canvases with thinned color that seems to float on and through the canvas, and over many years Jules Olitski (1922–2007) experimented with abstraction in several media. Currently, Tobi Kahn (b. 1952) paints abstract canvases that convey landscape through color. Clement Greenberg (1909–1994) and Harold Rosenberg (1906–1978), two of the major art critics who promulgated Abstract Expressionism in its beginnings, were Jewish.

Some artists who worked as Social Realists during the thirties turned their sensibilities toward the civil rights movement of the sixties. Raphael Soyer (1899–1987) made a lithograph titled Amos on Racial Equality (1960s), which quotes the biblical prophet Amos in Hebrew and English and depicts a white woman carrying a black infant. Ben Shahn’s (1898–1969) lithograph Thou Shalt Not Stand Idly By (1965) portrays an oversized interracial handshake; the title comes from Leviticus 19:16 and is printed in Hebrew and in English at the top of the image. Artists of the next generation also engaged social issues. After the fact, R. B. Kitaj (1932–2007) – who made a large body of richly allegorical imagery representing Jewish concerns – commented on the integration of blacks into professional baseball with his painting Amerika (Baseball) (1983–4). Jewish-Black relations have become strained since the *civil rights movement, a situation cartoonist Art Spiegelman (b. 1948) tackled with his cover design of a black woman kissing a Hasidic man for a February 1993 issue of the New Yorker.

Two Jewish artists initiated the *feminist art movement. At the height of the women’s liberation movement in 1971, Judy Chicago (b. 1939) and Miriam Schapiro (b. 1923) jointly founded the Feminist Art Program at the California Institute of the Arts. Chicago is especially known for her enormous multimedia installation, The Dinner Party: A Symbol of Our Heritage (1974–9). Made with more than 400 collaborators, The Dinner Party was created to raise awareness of forgotten women's history in a world that privileges men. Eleanor Antin (b. 1935), Audrey Flack (b. 1931), Barbara Kruger (b. 1945), and Nancy Spero (1926–2009) are other important feminist artists; Flack's photorealist paintings comment on stereotypes of femininity, and Kruger deconstructs power relations, often related to gender, in her photomontage images. Recent scholarship has argued that many of the early feminist artists were Jewish because as perennial outsiders and as the children or grandchildren of radical immigrants, fighting for justice and equality was their natural heritage.

In the sixties, seventies, and eighties, Jewish artists worked in diverse manners. Jim Dine (b. 1935) and Roy Lichtenstein (1923–1997) first adopted a Pop idiom during the sixties. Emerging into the public eye in the seventies, Philip Pearlstein (b. 1924) paints figures in a flat, unemotional style that treats the human form with the same objectivity as the inanimate objects surrounding the model. Also painting figuratively, Alex Katz (b. 1927) typically fills his large canvases with the flattened, simplified heads and shoulders of his sitters rendered in crisp color. Sol LeWitt (1928–2007) explored and wrote about Conceptual Art in addition to making Minimalist sculpture, and Jonathan Borofsky (b. 1942) continues to make multimedia site-specific installations using his own life as source material. In contrast, sculptor and Process artist Richard Serra (b. 1939) asserts that his focus on the physical qualities of materials and the act of creation leaves little room for expressions of the artist's personality. At the same time that LeWitt, Borofsky, and Serra experimented with avant-garde modes of artistic expression, they made works investigating or memorializing the Holocaust.

Some artists who mostly worked within the mainstream for the majority of their careers became interested in Jewish matters late in life. Raphael Soyer illustrated two volumes of Isaac Bashevis Singer's memoirs (1978, 1981) and two short stories by Singer for the Limited Editions Club (1979). Larry Rivers (1923–2002) also illustrated a Singer story for the Limited Editions Club (1984) and painted an enormous three-paneled painting, History of Matzah (The Story of the Jews) (1982–4), tackling the nearly four millennia of Jewish experience. In his eighties, Harry Sternberg (1904–2001) worked on a series of prints, drawings, and paintings delineating Jewish prayer and study as part of his Tallit Series (1980s), named after the prayer shawl worn by observant Jews when they pray. Husband and wife William Meyerowitz (1887–1981) and Theresa Bernstein (1890?–2002) traveled to Israel thirteen times after 1948 and painted many images of the land after having previously pursued a more traditional American art trajectory. Chaim Gross began sculpting Jewish subjects in the 1960s. Although Shahn and Leonard Baskin (1922–2000) explored some Jewish topics early on, they more consistently embraced Jewish identity in the visual arts as they aged, notably with Passover haggadah illustrations done in 1965 and 1974, respectively. Baskin's subject matter, both in his sculpture and his graphic images, frequently addressed biblical figures and Holocaust themes (Plate 19). Earlier in the century Saul Raskin (1878–1966) illustrated a haggadah with woodcuts (1941).

Several Jews worked as photojournalists, including Richard Avedon (1923–2004) and Irving Penn (1917–2009).

Avedon's career spanned sixty years, beginning as a fashion photographer for Harper's Bazaar in the 1940s when he was barely twenty years old. His pioneering pictures set standards for the fashion industry, and his subsequent portraits, most not taken on commission but as part of the artist's own project, chronicle the faces of major twentieth-century celebrities and public figures. Avedon shoots his portraits against a plain white background and without accoutrements in an effort to convey his sitters' personalities in an unidealized manner. Considered one of the most versatile photographers of the twentieth century, Penn produced more than one hundred covers for Vogue magazine, myriad fashion and advertising spreads for various magazines, and many other photographs in genres such as still life and portraiture.

Later in the century, photographers used the medium to varying ends. Popularly described as a photographer of misfits and freaks, Diane Arbus (1923–1971) is recognized for a body of black-and-white photographs that explore and question the fine line between normalcy and difference. In opposition to the suggested objectivity of documentary photography, Arbus's work is clearly subjective. Moreover, the America she depicts is disturbing and unsentimental, much like the vision presented earlier in the century by Weegee (Arnold Felig, 1899–1968) and Robert Frank (b. 1924). Indeed, Frank is best known for his book The Americans (1959), a Guggenheim-funded project that exposes the divisions and alienation of his era, as opposed to the sentimental and celebratory photographs of America more popular at that time. Frank's innovative style, the "snapshot aesthetic" – a then-unconventional style deliberately employing odd angles, occasional blurriness, and seemingly spontaneous scenes – influenced several important photographers in addition to Arbus; these include Lee Friedlander (b. 1934) and Garry Winogrand (1928–1984), two of the original street photographers.

The Holocaust has been a major preoccupation of later twentieth-century Jewish artists. One of Seymour Lipton's (1903–1986) last representational sculptures responded to news of Nazi persecution of the Jews. Titled Let My People Go (1942), based on a divine command in Exodus, Lipton's sculpture portrays a bust of a pious Jewish male wearing a prayer shawl. Ben-Zion (1897–1987) was a poet who turned to painting because he felt that words could not adequately express the horrors of fascism and later the Shoah. Exhibited as a whole in 1946, the series De Profundis (Out of the Depths): In Memory of the Massacred Jews of Nazi Europe comprises seventeen Expressionistic works conveying the artist's distress at the events of the Holocaust; it pays homage to those who perished by Nazi hands. Leon Golub's (1922–2004) lithograph Charnel House (1946) and his Burnt Man series of the early 1950s describe murdered victims, also in an Expressionist fashion.

Interest in the Holocaust as a subject for art has only increased in the years since. Audrey Flack's photorealist canvas World War II (Vanitas) (1976–77) presents a still life in collage format, including a Jewish star from her key chain and a photograph of the 1945 liberation of Buchenwald taken by Life magazine photographer Margaret Bourke-White. Alice Lok Cahana (b. 1929), a survivor of concentration and labor camps, uses visual art to work through her memories of the Holocaust in semi-abstract mixed media collages.

Cahana's art, she explains, is her kaddish* for those who perished. The sculptor George Segal (1924–2000) symbolically employs the biblical figures Eve*, Abraham*, Isaac*, and Jesus in his Holocaust Memorial (1983), which overlooks the Pacific Ocean in San Francisco's Legion of Honor park. Another Holocaust sculpture group by Segal is in the permanent collection of the Jewish Museum in New York (1982). Judy Chicago's enormous installation Holocaust Project: From Darkness into Light (1985–93) is anchored by a 4 1/2 by 18-foot tapestry titled The Fall, which portrays the disintegration of rationality. More recently, Shimon Attie (b. 1957) worked on a series of projects in Europe collectively called "Sites Unseen" (1991–96). In several countries, Attie projected photographs onto or from public buildings, and in one case on a body of water, all using images from World War II. Although united by an interest in imagining the unthinkable, Holocaust works by Jewish American artists differ greatly in approach, conception, and style (See also HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART).

In the last decades of the twentieth century, Jewish identity became an increasing concern in the visual arts. New York City's Jewish Museum initially investigated this phenomenon in two exhibitions, the first in 1982 and the second four years later in 1986. The eighteen living artists in the premier show, Jewish Themes/Contemporary American Artists, and the twenty-four in the subsequent exhibition, Jewish Themes/Contemporary American Artists II, explored aspects of Jewishness in media ranging from video installation to painting. The coolness and impersonality of the movements preceding the eighties – Pop art and Minimalism, for example – were also eschewed in the art world in general, when pluralism and subjectivity became a focus of artists from all backgrounds. Indeed, the work in these two exhibitions investigated religious and cultural elements of Judaism, sometimes in an autobiographical manner. Hebrew text, Jewish literature, religious ritual, and explorations of the Holocaust can be found in the imagery of these artists, including Flack, Kitaj, and Archie Rand (b. 1949).

A decade later, the Jewish Museum mounted the exhibition Too Jewish?: Challenging Traditional Identities. Again paralleling a larger interest in multicultural difference by other marginalized groups, the eighteen artists in the show explored Jewish consciousness, while testing the viewer's and the art world's (dis)comfort with what was perceived by some as excessively conspicuous Jewishness. These highly assimilated younger artists portray vastly different concerns from those of their immigrant and first-generation predecessors. Long after Andy Warhol, Deborah Kass (b. 1952) appropriates Pop techniques and a fascination with celebrity in her portraits of Barbra Streisand (1992) and Sandy Koufax (1994). Titling her Streisand silkscreens Jewish Jackies, playing on Warhol's iconic silkscreens of Jackie Kennedy, Kass proffers the ethnic star while subverting American norms of beauty (Plate 20). Also influenced by Warhol, Adam Rolston's (b. 1962) Untitled (Manischewitz American Matzos) (1993) asserts ethnicity into a once "pure" American consumer culture. Dennis Kardon's installation Jewish Noses (1993–95) presents an array of noses sculpted from forty-nine Jewish models, destabilizing the notion that the Jew can be categorized as a monolithic type.

Just as Kardon demonstrates that the Jew's body cannot be homogenized, neither can Jewish American art. As this essay has described, Jewish American artists have worked in manifold fashions, partly and sometimes entirely influenced by larger trends, and at the same time making significant contributions in style and content.

For further reading, see Z. Amishai-Maisels, Depiction and Interpretation: The Influence of the Holocaust on the Visual Arts (1993); M. Baigell, Jewish Artists in New York: The Holocaust Years (2002); S. Baskind, Raphael Soyer and the Search for Modern Jewish Art (2004); idem, Encyclopedia of Jewish American Artists (2007); S. Goodman, Jewish Themes/Contemporary American Artists (1982); idem, Jewish Themes/Contemporary American Artists II (1986); N. Kleblatt, Too Jewish?: Challenging Traditional Identities (1996); O. Soltes, Fixing the World: Jewish American Painters in the Twentieth Century (2003); and S. Zalkind, Upstarts and Matriarchs: Jewish Women Artists and the Transformation of American Art (2005); and see PHOTOGRAPHY.

SAMANTHA BASKIND

Art, Europe: Nineteenth Century. To the extent that our modern concept of art is chiefly defined by paintings, modern Jewish art began in Europe in the early nineteenth century and flourished mostly in the German-speaking countries of Europe's center, while also extending outward to the margins of the continent. Even in their earliest creations, emerging out of the historical moment of the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah*) and political emancipation*, Jewish painters presented distinctly Jewish subjects as well as imagery suited for a wider audience. Most of their work was formulated in the same vividly descriptive naturalist mode that dominated nineteenth-century painting.

Indisputably, the first Jewish painter was Moritz Oppenheim* (1800–1882) who was active near Frankfurt am Main. Oppenheim accompanied other young German artists, self-styled "Nazarenes," to Rome, but his career was well supported back home by the Rothschilds*; they commissioned family portraits that led to other commissions of culturally significant figures, including the converts to Christianity Ludwig Börne and Heinrich Heine, as well as the Jewish emancipation advocate, Gabriel Riesser. Oppenheim also painted images of contemporaneous Jewish life, beginning with Return of the Jewish Volunteer from the Wars of Liberation (1833–34; Jewish Museum, New York). His 1850s genre series, Scenes from Traditional Jewish Family Life, represented life-cycle* events and Sabbath* rituals situated in both synagogue and home. These images became still more popular and widespread through subsequent reproduction as prints that were reissued in numerous editions.

The same pattern of the self-invention of the Jewish artist recurred in other locations. Following Oppenheim's lead, Isidor Kaufmann (1853–1921) capitalized on an urban nostalgia in Vienna* for images of traditional Jews of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. After making visits to traditional centers in Eastern Europe, Kaufmann forged an entire oeuvre of meticulously rendered genre studies; these included scenes of Talmud study, synagogue worship, and family rituals in spare domestic settings (Plate 12). More than Oppenheim, Kaufmann's art attempted to preserve images of a vanishing shtetl* life that was newly threatened by modernity. Kaufman also painted landscapes, portraits, and genre images with non-Jewish content.

The tragic early death of Maurycy Gottlieb (1856–1879) robbed the nineteenth century of a supremely talented Jewish artist. Born in Drohobycz in *Galicia, Gottlieb attempted the seemingly impossible task of forging a composite artistic identity as both a Pole and a Jew, when neither a Polish nor a Jewish state existed to mitigate tensions between those communities. Gottlieb took Rembrandt as an inspiration, apparently because the great Dutch artist had portrayed Jews sympathetically in historical scenes and portraits. Gottlieb developed both of these categories, producing numerous self-portraits in various historical guises. A massive unfinished Christ before his Judges (1877–79; Jewish Museum, Israel) shows a biblical scene of the Passion while nevertheless emphasizing the Jewish features and identity (with *tallit) of Jesus; his Christ Preaching at Capernaum (1878–79; Museum Narodowe, Warsaw) reprises Rembrandt's etchings of Jesus preaching to Jew and Gentile alike. Among Gottlieb's projects was an uncompleted cycle to illustrate Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice in both small paintings and prints. Movingly, a scene made in his final year of life shows a Gottlieb self-portrait (with a self-conscious inscription in Hebrew) among Jews Praying in the Synagogue on Yom Kippur (1878; Tel Aviv Museum of Art).

The *Pale of Settlement continued to produce its share of Jewish painters in the waning nineteenth century. Recording the unhappy social tensions of the region, Maurycy Minkowski (1881–1930) produced works like After the Pogrom (1905; Tel Aviv Museum of Art), a painting depicting the alienation and dislocation of a silent family gathering of sufferers. More overtly political and socially active, Samuel Hirszenberg (1865–1908), a native of Lodz, followed Gottlieb's path by training in Kraków and Munich. However, Hirszenberg used his art in response to tsarist *Russia's persecution of Jews with such works as Wandering Jew (1899; Israel Museum, Jerusalem) and Exile (1904; lost). The latter, a representation of refugees in the snow, quickly became a *Zionist icon. Hirszenberg's own Zionist sympathies were fulfilled when he immigrated to Palestine in 1907, assuming a teaching position at the new Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design in *Jerusalem.

In contrast to this politicized radicalism and Jewish identity, the major painter Camille Pissarro (1830–1903), born to a French *Sephardic family in the *Caribbean, in the Danish Virgin Islands, would not be recognizable as a Jewish painter from his themes. Pissarro, who would eventually marry a Catholic, professed to be a secular Modernist and a political radical – even an anarchist – who had no religion whatsoever. Nevertheless, he was identified by many contemporaries, especially Renoir, as a Jew. Pissarro, of course, is most closely associated with the Impressionist painting circle, with whom he exhibited in the 1870s and 1880s in Paris, but he expressly chose to live in the countryside around such villages as Pontoise and Eragny and to paint images of peasant life as well as rural landscapes. In his final decade he moved to the capital and painted street scenes of modern Paris. He is also remembered for his mentoring of younger artists, notably van Gogh and Gauguin.

One of the most famous and successful late-nineteenth-century Jewish artists, the Dutchman Josef Israëls (1824–1911), also drew on the precedent of Rembrandt for his somber interiors. However, Jewish subjects make up a relatively small portion of his sentimental domestic genre paintings, which chiefly depict poor-but-honest peasants and fishermen. Israëls was a member of The Hague School of painters, and his themes tend to feature deathbeds or frugal repasts, although sometimes his dignified picturesque subjects are given a Jewish character (A Son of the Ancient Race, ca. 1889; Jewish Museum, New York). His later work takes on more expressly Jewish subjects (A Jewish Wedding, 1903; Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam). Israëls remained a lifelong friend of his younger colleague, the Berlin Jewish painter, Max Liebermann (1847–1935).

Liebermann represents both the social and the artistic gains of Jewish painters over the course of the nineteenth century. Born to a prosperous manufacturing family in *Berlin, he was a member of a liberal and culturally active elite. Liebermann achieved fame and artistic leadership in his region for his translation of French Impressionist brushwork to Dutch genre themes and modern leisure subjects for German galleries. Like Oppenheim, he painted portraits; like Gottlieb he also produced self-portraits, albeit usually representing himself in dapper bourgeois suits. Liebermann seldom painted Jewish subjects, although he did feature the Judengasse of *Amsterdam in a series of works (1908). He was, however, embroiled in bitter antisemitic culture wars in the early twentieth century, when Kaiser Wilhelm led a new cultural chauvinism that tarred foreign, and, by extension, "Jewish" art, which was associated with "internationalism and cosmopolitanism." Nevertheless, Jewish museum curators and private collectors continued to avidly collect Liebermann's works. For further reading, see S. T. Goodman, ed., The Emergence of Jewish Artists in Nineteenth-Century Europe (2001).

LARRY SILVER

Art, Europe: Twentieth Century. Although nineteenth-century Jewish artists were relatively few in number and often beset by difficulties because of their religio-cultural heritage, the early twentieth century saw a considerable increase in opportunities in Jewish art across Europe. These possibilities were curtailed traumatically by the horrors of the *Holocaust. The story of Jewish artists in twentieth-century Europe involves discussion more of urban cultural centers and communities of artists than of isolated individuals. Their aesthetic innovations, particularly in Paris and *Saint Petersburg, often overlapped with new political movements, ranging from *Zionism to the Russian Revolution, as Jewish artists formed a cosmopolitan avant-garde in major centers.

Pre-*World War I *Berlin, where Jews were part of an emerging Modernism in all the arts, also percolated with a variety of political movements, including Zionism. Many Jewish artists joined the clarion call of Martin *Buber and others to foster a new cultural assertion of Jewish identity and advocacy for a Jewish state in *Palestine. Boris Schatz (1867–1932) would soon emigrate to found the Bezalel School of Arts and Crafts in *Jerusalem (1906). Some other leading Zionist artists used printmaking and publishing (especially the journal East and West) as their media of outreach. Ephraim Moses Lilien (1874–1925) designed Zionist graphic images with lettering in Jugendstil, the organic and flowing linear contemporary style, with an orientalist cast (Plate 21). Lesser Ury (1861–1931) emphasized muscular, dark isolated figures – *Jeremiah, *Moses – as heroic cultural leaders in his Zionist pastels, but (like Pissarro in Paris or the Soyer brothers in *New York) he also recorded modern urban street life in the German capital. Inspired by Rembrandt and Josef Israëls, virtuoso printmaker Hermann Struck (1876–1944) made etchings and lithographs of picturesque observant Jews as well as landscapes, including scenes of Palestine, where he would eventually settle.

Struck also mentored a younger generation of German Jewish artists. Most prominent among those were Jacob Steinhardt (1887–1968, a later émigré to Israel) and Ludwig Meidner (1884–1966); both were closely associated with the jagged forms and acid colors of contemporary Expressionism. Steinhardt and Meidner produced apocalyptic landscapes and elongated suffering figures, even in urban settings; their work evoked pathos and an ominous foreboding in viewers.

Despite social barriers in the *Pale of Settlement, many talented Jewish artists emerged in *Russia, the location of Europe's largest Jewish population. At the turn of the twentieth century, Russian culture was discovering new cosmopolitan links through a movement known as Mir Iskusstva ("The World of Art") that was led from Saint Petersburg by Francophile Serge Diaghilev. Diaghilev and the influential Ballets Russes that he had founded eventually enjoyed great success after they left Russia for Paris. Diaghilev's chief designer of exotic costumes and spectacular sets was a Jewish painter, Leon Bakst (1866–1924); Bakst, whose work emphasized either Asiatic or ancient body-hugging garments, also participated in a contemporary aesthetic of nostalgic rediscovery of Slavic artistic roots in Russian art.

Against this movement, other Jewish artists sought to find their own visual heritage and establish a truly "Jewish" art, within a more sharply defined ethnic identity. Inspired by Semyon Ansky, ethnographer and playwright of The Dybbuk, this search for Jewish folk art led to documentation and study of the decorations of painted synagogues. (see SYNAGOGUES, WOODEN). Two young artists, Issachar Ryback (1897–1935) and El Lissitzky (1890–1941), who were particularly involved in this project, went on to exhibit graphics with Jewish motifs; Ryback also produced Cubist-inspired paintings of the buildings themselves. Lissitzky would later combine the stylized motifs of Jewish folk art with decorative Cubist angular forms in his 1917–19 Had Gadya illustrations (based on the song, "An Only Kid," from the Passover haggadah*), which have been interpreted as an allegory of Jewish liberation from tsarist oppression (Plate 13).

Fusing all of these impulses, Marc Chagall (1887–1985), surely the most famous Jewish painter of the twentieth century, dominated Russian modern art. Chagall first studied in his beloved hometown of Vitebsk and then sought out Bakst in Saint Petersburg. Between 1910 and 1914, Chagall, like Bakst, moved to Paris, where he exhibited in leading salons. Some of Chagall's art displayed a nostalgic, yet magical representation of shtetl* life with representative figures, such as his celebrated fiddlers on the roof, infected by an arbitrary coloristic brilliance and Modernist simplification of forms. Chagall returned to Russia before the revolution, where a number of Jewish artists formed a Jewish Society for the Encouragement of the Arts in 1916; the society's logo was designed with traditional motifs and Hebrew script by Natan Altman (1889–1970), designer of Jewish Graphics (1913–14). In 1918 the Kultur Lige was formed as an organization of Jewish artists in Kiev; before he went on to work with the new State Jewish Theater in Moscow (1920), Chagall founded a short-lived Vitebsk art academy, where Lissitzky taught. There Chagall made celebrated murals, and Altman designed costumes and sets for the staging of The Dybbuk.

Around the time of the revolution, Russian artists offered a powerful response, Suprematism, to the abstraction pioneered in Paris and Munich to serve as a radical break with representational art of the past. Altman and Lissitzky, who were particularly sympathetic to the secular goals of the Russian Revolution and to Lenin as its leader, adapted the new artistic forms to the new political era. Altman, who served as Director of Fine Arts of the People's Commissariat (1921), designed public spectacles of "agit-prop" (agitation and propaganda) to celebrate the new state in Palace Square, Saint Petersburg; he also made portraits of Lenin. Lissitzky, strongly influenced by the radical abstraction of Kasimir Malevich, developed formal designs, sometimes in three dimensions, that he called "Prouns" (acronym for "Project for the Affirmation of the New") and also created an abstract propaganda poster, "Beat the Whites with the Red Wedge" (1919). By 1922, however, most of these Jewish artists had emigrated to Berlin and largely abandoned their works with expressly Jewish content. Although Lissitzky and Altman returned to Russia, Ryback and Chagall remained in *France. Two avant-garde abstract sculptors, the brothers Naum Gabo (1890–1977) and Antoine Pevsner (1886–1962), exemplify Russia's increasing cosmopolitanism as well as the migrations of Jewish artists in the wake of the revolution. Pevsner, who was also a painter, studied in Kiev; he then traveled to Paris in the teens, where he was exposed to Cubism as well as the growing community of Jewish artists in the city. Both brothers left an innovative sculptural legacy of dynamic constructions in plastic, wood, and metal wires, often created for public projects. Pevsner's successful career was made in Paris after 1923, whereas Gabo settled in London after 1936.

The longest lasting community of émigré Jewish artists from Eastern Europe, who have come to be known as the "School of Paris," were active from the teens until the outbreak of World War II. Although Marc Chagall continued to paint his trademark colorful shtetl subjects, most of the others did not paint Jewish themes. For the most part Francophilic art historians have regarded this group as distinctive and creative artists but also as unassimilated and marginal. Emblematic of this group is Chaim Soutine (1894–1943), born in *Lithuania and a legendarily penniless recluse. His slashing brushwork and vibrant colors energize twisting representations of single figures, still lifes (often of butchered meat), and dynamic landscapes. He almost defiantly worked on neutral subjects with self-consciously modern forms. In similar fashion, Amadeo Modigliani (1884–1920), a portrait and figure painter, especially of female nudes, and a sculptor at times, used a distinctively elegant linear outline and simplified features. Arriving in Paris from northern *Italy, he created portraits of his close circle of fellow Jewish artists, including Soutine, whose early death from tuberculosis left a gaping void in the Paris community. Jules Pascin, born Julius Pincas in *Bulgaria in 1885, was also a leader among Jewish artists. His paintings popularized late Impressionist brushwork, and he was a prolific graphic artist with both watercolors and prints. Although his reputation has diminished, this prolific figure and portrait artist enjoyed considerable success with collectors in Europe as well as the United States (where he lived during World War I) before his suicide in 1930.

Paris also fostered several important Jewish sculptors, led by Jacques Lipchitz (1891–1973) from Bialystok and *Vilna, who, following Picasso's lead in the teens, became noted as the leading Cubist sculptor of heads and bodies in faceted components. His long productive career included a final phase in *New York City after World War II, where his powerful late bronze figures embodied mythic subjects and primal passions as if in allegorical commentary on a century filled with tragedy (Plate 15). Female artists also made their mark in Paris, led by Sonia Terk (1885–1979) from the Ukraine, wife of the pioneer color abstractionist Robert Delaunay, with whom she sometimes collaborated. In her own right, Terk produced significant collages and fiber works, textiles, and costumes (including work for the Ballets Russes). A creative force in multiple media, American-born Man Ray (Emmanuel Radnitsky, 1890–1976) made his main career in Paris, albeit with little acknowledgment of his Russian Jewish roots. His principal associations included Marcel Duchamp and the conceptually minded Dadaists, who challenged the premises and commodification of art with “found objects” and assemblages. Man Ray is also celebrated for his photo experimentation, including “rayographs,” ordinary objects placed on exposed negative plates.

Many Jewish artists working in Paris were able to find safety in the United States during World War II; among them were Man Ray, Jacques Lipchitz, and, most notably, Marc Chagall. Chagall had already painted a memorable reaction to the Nazi persecution of German Jews in White Crucifixion (1938; Art Institute of Chicago); the painting presents Jesus on the cross, wearing a tallit loincloth, amid the flames of a chaotic shtetl *pogrom (Plate 14). These intimations of further tragedy would be echoed by several significant German-Jewish artists who were caught up in the tentacles of the *Holocaust (See HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART).

Jankel Adler (1895–1949) left Poland to study in Germany, and his career was similar to those of other leading German artists; however, with the Nazi ascent to power in 1933, he left his teaching job in Düsseldorf and eventually settled in London. His images partake of the arbitrary colors and geometrical simplifications of Paul Klee, but starkly depict expressly Jewish figures of rabbis or musicians. Charlotte Salomon (1917–1943) exemplifies the trauma and dislocation of World War II; she is an older, artist equivalent to Anne *Frank. Born and raised in a culturally rich and fashionable setting in Berlin, she escaped to safety in France in 1939, where she produced a vast series of 1,325 gouache paintings, Life? Or Theater? (1940–42; Joods Museum, Amsterdam), before she was deported to her death in *Auschwitz. These stark images of active figures in expansive spaces with explanatory texts recount the entire story of Salomon's tragically short lifetime. Surely the most poignant imagery was created by the mature artist Felix Nussbaum (1904–1944) of Osnabrück. His haunted and gaunt figures suggest loneliness, fear, and the anxiety of exiles or fugitives. Indeed, Nussbaum was interned early in the war and escaped, only to be recaptured and killed in Auschwitz. Nussbaum painted one self-portrait in which he displays his own Jewish identity card (1943; Kulturgeschichtliches Museum, Osnabrück). This haunting bust image presents the distraught artist wearing a hat and coat, complete with yellow badge, while standing outdoors against a high, gray, featureless wall. His last works present apocalyptic horrors.

One of the great losses to both art and literature during the war was Bruno Schulz (1892–1942), known as the “Polish *Kafka” for his disturbing short fiction. Equally disturbing are some two hundred ink drawings reminiscent of Goya, some of them illustrations of his fiction (Sanatorium under the Sign of the Hourglass [1937]). Many of these works show disorienting urban scenes in a German Expressionist idiom, often situating unequal encounters between the sexes, dominated by the power of femmes fatales. Schulz was shot by a Gestapo officer in his native Drohobycz and is buried in an unmarked grave in the local Jewish cemetery.

For further reading, see A. Kampf, Chagall to Kitaj: Jewish Experience in 20th Century Art (1990); E. Bilski, Berlin Metropolis: Jews and the New Culture 1890–1918 (1999); S. T. Goodman, ed., Russian Jewish Artists in a Century of Change 1890–1990 (1995); and K. Silver, The Circle of Montparnasse: Jewish Artists in Paris, 1905–1945 (1985). LARRY SILVER

Art: Illustrated Yiddish Books. Illustrated books written in *Yiddish, the vernacular language of *Ashkenazi Jews, had two golden ages, first in early modern Europe, especially sixteenth-century *Italy, and then in the *Soviet Union, from 1916 to 1923. Only a few scattered remnants survive from the earliest illuminated Yiddish manuscripts. A scene of a cat holding a mouse accompanies the *Passover song “Had Gadya,” which was written in alternating stanzas of *Aramaic and Yiddish in an Italian haggadah of the fifteenth or sixteenth century. Decorative animals embellish a Yiddish translation of the Torah and haftarot (prophetic readings) from sixteenth-century Germany. Disembodied heads and pointing hands adorn the initial words of a mahzor (festival *prayer book) completed with Yiddish instructions in Kraków in 1558–60; scenes illustrating a collection of Yiddish stories were produced in Germany beginning in 1580.

MANUSCRIPTS: The most important illustrated Yiddish manuscript is a book of customs (Sefer Minhagim), completed in northern Italy around the year 1503; it is profusely illustrated with drawings depicting Jewish holidays and life-cycle events, landscapes, animals, fantastic creatures, and scenes from Jewish history. These images are remarkable in their depiction of a wide range of Jewish holidays, which are generally constructed as joyous events. Although the text only briefly cites eating, dancing, and drinking, the drawings emphasize these aspects of festival celebration. Significantly, no rabbis are depicted, but women appear in a third of the scenes. They perform a wide range of ritual roles, and the images construct a complex, positive, and active spiritual role for women. For example, one drawing shows men and women standing on the same floor of the synagogue for *Rosh Ha-Shanah, not separated by a divider. Each individual holds an open *prayer book, suggesting general literacy. Because the artist was the Jewish scribe and not a trained illuminator, his remarkable images are strikingly unconventional. Independent and original, they suggest the multilayered richness of Jewish rituals.

PRINTED BOOKS: The production of profusely illustrated *printed Yiddish texts began in 1546, when the Christian humanist Christoph Froschauer published an edition of Josippon in Zurich. This was a translation of Sefer Josippon (see JOSIPPON, BOOK OF), a popular tenth-century Italian Hebrew work loosely based on the historical writings of *Josephus. Two other secular Yiddish texts, both heavily illustrated, were published in Verona in 1594–95: the chivalric romance Paris un Viene and a collection of fables called the Kuh-Bukh. In 1593 and 1600, two illustrated books of customs were published in *Venice. Although the later edition is more famous because of its finer illustrations, it is the earlier version that was repeatedly reprinted with very little variation well into the twentieth century. Reading the same books and viewing the same imagery helped shape Jewish collective memory and common identity in Europe. Yet these printed books, like the Josippon, inhabit the borders of Jewish life: Published by Christians and illustrated most probably by Christian artists, these books were written in Yiddish and produced for Jews. In short, they belong to both cultures.

MODERN ERA: In modern times, illustrated Yiddish books were produced in great numbers and variety, from children's books to avant-garde literature. Published in the major centers of Jewish book production, including *Warsaw, Kiev, Paris, and *New York, these books were mostly modest, inexpensive works. However, some were beautifully illustrated by superb Jewish artists of the twentieth century, such as El Lissitzky (1890–1941), Marc Chagall (1887–1985), Henryk Berlewi (1894–1967), and Louis Lozowick (1892–1973).

A renaissance in illustrated Yiddish books took place in *Russia over the years 1916–23, thanks to the Kultur Lige, an artists' collective in Kiev devoted to creating a Jewish national art. This movement of at least thirteen artists, which included Chagall and Lissitzky, illustrated more than fifty books. Chagall illustrated Troyer, a collection of poems by David Hofstein (1889–1952) expressing pain and sorrow over recent *pogroms in the *Ukraine. Lissitzky's Had Gadya, published in 1917, is probably the most famous book the group produced. Pointing the way to Constructivism and combining Fauvist and Cubist elements with Yiddish writing, Lissitzky's colorful illustrations present an idealized vision of the *shtetl (Plate 13). Other Yiddish books by Lissitzky show his brilliant typography, as in the cover of the book of poems Achsen. However, when the Kultur Lige dispersed, the second flowering of illustrated Yiddish books came to an end.

Recent research includes R. Apter-Gabriel, ed., Tradition and Revolution: The Jewish Renaissance in Russian Avant-Garde Art 1921–1928 (1987), 61–70; and D. Wolfthal, Picturing Yiddish: Gender, Identity, and Memory in Illustrated Yiddish Books of Renaissance Italy (2004). See also ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY. DIANE WOLFTHAL

Art, Israeli. What is generally called Israeli art first appeared about fifty years before the 1948 founding of the State of *Israel. Its deeper roots go back to the emergence of Jewish artists in nineteenth-century Europe and to the early days of *Zionist activity. When the Russian-born sculptor Boris Schatz (1867–1932) approached Theodor *Herzl in 1903 about establishing an art school in Jerusalem, Herzl recognized the need for visual representation of the Zionist cause. In 1906 the Bezalel School of Arts and Crafts was created in Jerusalem, named after Bezalel ben Uri, who built the *Tabernacle in the desert (Exod 31). Under Schatz's directorship and the influence of teachers such as Ephraim Moses Lilien (1874–1925) (Plate 21) and Ze'ev Raban (1890–1970) (Plate 11), the school developed a style that combined eastern and western imagery and patterns, Hebrew script, and biblical and Zionist themes. Its artists were mainly influenced by the popular Central European Jugendstil movement (the equivalent of French Art Nouveau). The objects made at Bezalel were mostly handicraft products and included Judaica artifacts, carpets, and souvenirs depicting biblical stories, the landscape of *Palestine, the holy sites, and portraits of Zionist leaders and Jewish pioneers.

The fusion of techniques and elements originating in *Persia, *Yemen, and Syria with western aesthetic values and Zionist and Jewish themes made the Bezalel style unique. Bezalel artifacts were displayed at major exhibitions in centers such as London and *New York. Schatz envisioned Bezalel as an artistic and cultural center in Palestine that would connect the Jewish people to their old-new land. As part of this vision, the school opened the first *museum in Palestine and collected works by Jewish artists, *archeological finds, and flora and fauna of the Holy Land. This museum was the basis for the collection of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem (inaugurated in 1965).

In the 1920s the prestige of the Bezalel School and style began to decline, and the school temporarily closed in 1929. It reopened in 1935 and has been the leading art school in Israel ever since. The Bezalel style, a turn-of-the-century, pre-Modernist idiom, was challenged by new trends animating the Zionist *Yishuv especially after 1919, when the immigrant wave known as the Third Aliyah (1919–23) began arriving in the early *British Mandate era (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948). Intellectuals including poets such as H. N. *Bialik and Uri Zvi Greenberg and artists such as Reuven Rubin (1893–1974) (Plate 22), Arie Lubin (1897–1980), Menahem Shemi (Schmidt) (1898–1951), Nahum Gutman (1898–1981), Ziona Tajar (1900–1988), and Yisrael (Feldman) Paldi (1893–1979) formed the core of a secular culture in *Tel Aviv, overshadowing the Jerusalem-based Bezalel School.

Some of these artists had acquired knowledge of the Modernist style of Picasso, Chagall, and others. These artists – especially Rubin and Gutman (who both studied at Bezalel in the first decade of the twentieth century, but later broke with the style taught there) – sought to create a new style, that of the “new Jew.” Their Modernist vision opposed the old world of religion, Jewish customs, and nineteenth-century artistic values, including the academic realism and the Jugendstil manner favored at Bezalel. They depicted landscapes using bright palettes, flattened color surfaces, and simple forms, inspired by trends such as Naïve art, Fauvism, and Picasso's 1920s classicist style. Many works depicted idealized images of Arabs as strong men connected to the soil or as full-bodied, sensual women. For these artists, the Arab was a symbol of the close connection to land and body that was seen as the ideal for the “new Jew,” in contrast with the image of the suffering, weak, and rootless diasporic Jew. Many artists portrayed *Tel Aviv (founded in 1909) and its people as young, energetic, and secular, free of the tribulations and hardship experienced in the homelands and religious background in which they were reared.

The outbreak of violent clashes between Arabs and Jews in 1929 had a marked effect on the young Jewish community in Palestine in general, and on the artistic realm in particular. Many artists changed their palettes and began painting in darker shades. Instead of landscapes, they focused on interiors. The École de Paris, a group of Parisian-based painters that included Chagall, Modigliani, and Pascin, and, especially, the Expressionistic art of Chaim Soutine, had a major influence on artists living in Palestine in the 1930s, many of whom traveled to Paris to study. This trend is seen most clearly in works by Moshe Mokady (1902–1975) and Haim Atar (1902–1953).

The 1930s also marked the beginning of abstract art, an important trend that was later to become the leading art movement in the young country. The most important artist working in this style was Yossef Zaritsky (1891–1985). Zaritsky, who arrived in Palestine from Kiev in 1923, moved away from themes of national or Jewish interest. His paintings, although rooted in the surrounding landscape, were attuned mainly to correlations between color and form, becoming more and more abstract over the years. In 1948, the year of the founding of the State of Israel and the end of the British Mandate, he founded the “New Horizons” group whose members were mostly abstract artists. This group was to be the leading Israeli art circle in the 1950s and into the 1960s, with Zaritsky as its authoritative leader. Zaritsky, Yehezkel Streichman (1906–1993), and Avigdor Stematzy (1908–1989), the prominent artists of the New Horizons group, scoffed at art that dealt directly with Jewish, national, or local themes using symbolic or narrative means. They were preoccupied with issues of color and form and saw themselves as the country’s avant-garde Modernist group, aware of artistic trends in the international art world. They looked to Paris, especially to lyrical abstract artists such as Jean Fautrier, Alfred Manessier, and Georges Braque. The highly abstract art of the principal New Horizons members drove other abstract-oriented artists to develop an ideologically milder, more local approach. Semi-abstract efforts to capture the Israeli light and landscape can be seen in the works of Eliahu Gat (1919–1987), Michael Gross (1920–2004), and Ori Reisman (1924–1991).

The late 1930s and the 1940s saw the emergence of yet another force in Israeli art, which was in its essence opposed to the New Horizons group. An alliance of writers, poets, and artists – led by poet Yonatan Ratosh and dubbed, pejoratively at first, the “Canaanites” – sought a connection with the cultural realms of the ancient civilizations of the Middle East. This poetically resonant approach appropriated ancient history to create a unique cultural stance, opposed to the European heritage in general and to the old Jewish world in particular. The artists influenced by Canaanism drew their inspiration from ancient Near Eastern visual cultures, from ancient Egypt to Mesopotamia. They believed that, in this way, the new Jews could reconnect with their origins in the region, overcome the negative influence of the millennia of exile, and construct a new identity based on and incorporating their ancient past. The most important example of this trend is Itzhak Danziger’s (1916–1977) statue “Nimrod,” from 1939 (Israel Museum, Jerusalem). The image of the biblical hunter (Gen 10:8–10), carved from red sandstone, is influenced chiefly by ancient Egyptian sculptures (Plate 23). The adolescent youth holding a slingshot behind his back and with a falcon perched on his shoulder is literally “of the land,” connected to the soil by his very substance and to the fruit of the land by the shape of his eyes, which are modeled on wheat seeds. He generates a powerful impression of primal force, very much the opposite of the figure of the old European Jew (as depicted, for example, in Chagall’s works). This powerful idol, a pre-Jewish hunter (who in the Jewish tradition was an enemy of Abraham, the forefather of the Israelites), was created on the eve of the greatest tragedy in Jewish history, the Holocaust. “Nimrod” became a symbol of the ideally formed Israeli youth – the Sabra.

In the 1950s, the formative years of Israel’s statehood, the country faced complex issues and a growing military threat. In addition, it was only beginning to come to terms with the Holocaust. Although overshadowed by the dominant abstract idiom of the New Horizons school, Social Realist artists such as Avraham Ofek (1935–1990), Ruth Schloss (b. 1922), and Naftali Bezem (b. 1924) engaged thematically with the Arab–Israeli conflict, the hardships encountered by new immigrants, and the memory of the Holocaust. These artists worked in a realistic style, influenced by 1950s Italian Social Realists and by Mexican artists such as Diego Rivera, who sought to advance their social and political agendas through art. They were opposed to the idea of “art for art’s sake,” especially in the wake of World War II.

Other artists, such as Mordecai Ardon (1896–1992), Jakob Steinhardt (1887–1968), and Yosel Bergner (b. 1920), incorporated Jewish narratives and symbols in their art (Bezem’s later work is very much of this kind). The most important artist in this context was Ardon, who had studied at the Bauhaus school in Weimar in the 1920s where he was a pupil of Paul Klee and Wassily Kandinsky. In his works, Ardon combined Modernist abstract ideas with Jewish themes, Hebrew script, and kabbalistic symbols (Plate 24) (and see KABBALAH).

Thus, in the 1950s and into the 1960s, two major opposing forces were active in the Israeli art world. On one side were artists inclined toward abstract trends, who thought art should not concern itself with national or symbolic issues or with the immediate political and social reality. On the other hand were artists who aimed to incorporate Jewish-identity themes in their work or who engaged with local, social, and political issues as a means of defining their artistic stance.

A number of artists found themselves between these major conflicting groups. They included the Russian-born Arie Aroch (1909–1974); a member of the New Horizons group, he was also influenced by other trends of modern art such as the child-like works of Paul Klee. In the 1960s he became influenced by Neo-Dada art and especially by Robert Rauschenberg, a major predecessor of Pop art who combined everyday objects in his works. Aroch’s work throughout the 1960s and 1970s includes ready-made objects, texts, child-like scribbles, and elements related to his early childhood experiences in Kharkov, Russia (now Ukraine). Some of his works incorporate Jewish elements such as the use of Yiddish text and Jewish iconography. This combination of Pop-oriented art style, themes from his personal memories, and Jewish motifs differentiated Aroch from the other artists in the New Horizons group and made him an important influence on a generation of young artists beginning to be active in the 1960s.

The hegemony of the New Horizons school and its abstract inclinations was challenged in the 1960s, and ultimately the group lost its dominant role as new and younger forces came to the foreground. Worldwide, abstract art was yielding to the return of the figure in Pop art and to its European equivalent, New Realism, both of which sought to connect art to everyday life. In 1961, artist Igal Tumarkin (b. 1933) returned to Israel from Europe, after working as assistant to the stage director in Bertolt Brecht's *Berlin theater troupe and spending time in Holland and Paris. Tumarkin's work combined everyday objects with traditional techniques of painting and sculpture, infused with a strong sense of political awareness. Many of his works of this period were figurative sculptures incorporating weapons and expressing a sense of violent urgency and a sharp antiwar message. After the victorious 1967 Six Day War, Tumarkin sculpted a human figure with guns emerging from his abdomen – one of the first examples of a new sort of political art that challenged the mainstream sense of post-war national euphoria.

Other young artists followed suit; between 1969 and 1973, artists such as Joshua Neustein (b. 1940), Avital Geva (b. 1941), and Micha Ullman (b. 1939) addressed the negative outcomes of war and the occupation of territories, whereas others, such as Michael Druks (b. 1940), explored the influence of mass culture on Israeli society. These were the first attempts at a political avant-garde art that was to flourish during the 1970s.

The Yom Kippur War of October 1973 is considered a turning point in Israeli history (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, 1948–2010). This war dealt a serious blow to the way Israeli society viewed the army and its political leadership, leading eventually to the first political shift of power in Israel's history in 1977. The war and the subsequent political and social changes had a profound influence on the Israeli art world. The dominant art scene became more political, confronting social matters and the continuing adverse effects of the occupation. Gender and the body became important and central themes in the work of young artists. Artistic media, influenced by international trends, shifted from the classical forms of painting and sculpture to environmental, performance, installation, and video art. Even artists engaged with more traditional Jewish and national themes began to employ avant-garde media such as performance art and open-air installations. Young artists engaged in conceptual art, with the creative process itself coming to the fore in works on paper and sculptures that unveiled the process of their own making. These artists' works dealt as much with artistic borders as with political ones and with the connection between these two realms. Some of the central artists of these years were Pinchas Cohen-Gan (b. 1945), Michal Naaman (b. 1951), Tamar Getter (b. 1953), Gideon Gechtman (1942–2008), Benni Efrat (b. 1936), and Motti Mizrahi (b. 1946).

Continuing the Pop-influenced trends of the 1960s, many artists of the 1970s and into the 1980s used crude materials to form a typically coarse surface, in works unconcerned with national or Jewish themes; rather, they explored "low," everyday experience. This style found its most definitive expression in the works of Raffi Lavie (1937–2007) who was also an important teacher and critic. Influenced by Arie Aroch and the powerful Expressionist drawings of Aviva Uri (1922–1989), he combined childlike scribbling and text with daily materials such as newspaper clippings on plywood to create a unique artistic idiom.

As in the international art scene, the 1980s were years when many Israeli conceptual artists of the 1970s and younger artists turned to figurative painting and sculpture and to photography; they tackled issues of otherness (whether national, ethnic, sexual, or gendered), engaging in political criticism and post-modern reflections. As in other art centers of the world, many of their works addressed internal artistic issues, incorporating quotes from art history and other cultural references. The Israeli art world became more pluralistic; prominent artists now took up issues that had previously been shunned, such as narrative works engaging with Jewish issues and the trauma of the Holocaust (often by artists who were the offspring of Holocaust survivors) or painting from nature.

Among them was Moshe Gershuni (b. 1936), who had been a conceptual artist in the 1970s, mostly addressing political issues. In the early 1980s Gershuni turned to Expressionistic works in the wake of a personal crisis and began exploring identity issues such as homoeroticism. This approach constituted a break with the conceptual aesthetics of the 1970s that had produced monochromatic, cerebral works. Gershuni's new paintings were full of color and bodily Expressionistic drama; at the same time, they evinced an interest in Jewish texts and symbols. They marked a new direction in Israeli art, providing painting with renewed legitimacy.

Young artists such as Larry Abramson (b. 1954), Yitzhak Livneh (b. 1952), Gabi Klasmer (b. 1950), and Joshua Borkovsky (b. 1952) became a central force in the painting revival, and painters of an earlier generation, such as abstract painter Moshe Kupferman (1926–2003), came to the foreground. Some artists engaged in realistic painting from observation, most notably Israel Hershberg (b. 1948). At the same time, artists such as Zibi Geva (b. 1951), David Reeb (b. 1952), and Arnon Ben-David (b. 1951) tackled political issues, offering sharp criticism of the mainstream Zionist ideals and addressing the 1982 Lebanon War and the First Intifada (1987–93). It was during these years that Menashe Kadishman (b. 1932), one of Israel's leading sculptors, created his major works dealing with the binding of Isaac as a symbol of the horrors and futility of war. These were also the years when Arab artists such as Asim Abu-Shakra (1961–1990) began exhibiting in major art spaces in the country.

The 1990s saw the waning of the style dubbed "Want of Matter" (of which Raffi Lavie was the leading exponent), in favor of meticulous, highly polished works by young artists such as Hilla Lu-Lu Lin (b. 1964) and Nir Hod (b. 1970). Their concern with issues of personal versus collective identity and gender-related themes, with a strong emphasis on visual values, was evident in a wide array of artistic fields, from photography and painting to sculpture and video art. Young artists who became active in the mid-1990s and toward the end of the century, such as Sigalit Landau (b. 1969), Gil Marco Shani (b. 1968), Ohad Meromi (b. 1967), Yehudit Sasportas (b. 1969), and Gal Weinstein (b. 1970), have continued these trends. Their at times idiosyncratic and fantastic creations call to mind escapist realms and apocalyptic visions; in other cases, seemingly otherworldly works in fact allude to Israeli political and social reality, employing indirect, mythic undertones that can be understood both locally and universally. As elsewhere, video art and large-scale installations have become a prominent part of the Israeli artistic landscape. Many of these works are not only meticulously finished but also are spectacular, offering an overpowering visual experience.

The art made in Israel in the early-twenty-first century continues to display a perpetual tension between ideas and qualities unique to Israeli society, as well as international influences that erase national, cultural, and religious boundaries. Developments in the global art scene – the huge and ever growing scope and number of art fairs, biennials, and international exhibitions, and technological advances in communication, most notably the internet – afford young Israeli artists greater exposure to the latest trends and forms of art worldwide. The works of young Israeli artists exhibiting at major art centers abroad are charged with both Israeli and Jewish themes, alongside international, universal messages that can appeal to audiences everywhere. This tension, between the local and the international, between Jewish and Israeli issues and an overall human message, was and still is one of the driving forces of Israeli art.

For further reading, see G. Ofrit, One Hundred Years of Art in Israel (1988); D. Manor, Art in Zion: The Genesis of National Art in Jewish Palestine (2005); A. Barzel, ed., Israele Arte e Vita, 1906–2006 (exhibition catalogue, Milan, 2006); and 60 Years of Art in Israel, a joint project of six exhibitions and catalogues, each dedicated to a different decade of Israeli art from 1948 until 2008: The First Decade: 1948–1958, Museum of Art, Ein Harod (G. Ofrit and G. Bar Or); The Second Decade: 1958–1968, Ashdod Art Museum – Monart Center (Y. Fischer and T. Manor-Friedman); The Third Decade: 1968–1978, Tel Aviv Museum of Art (Curator: M. Omer); The Fourth Decade: 1978–1988, Haifa Museum of Art (Curator: I. Tenenbaum); The Fifth Decade: 1988–1998, Herzliya Museum of Contemporary Art (Curator: D. Rabina); and The Sixth Decade: 1998–2008, The Israel Museum, Jerusalem (Curators: A. Mendelsohn and E. Natan).

AMITAI MENDELSON

Art, Late Antiquity: In the Land of Israel and the Diaspora. The surviving Jewish art that was created in the Roman and Persian worlds during late antiquity (ca. 200–700 CE) is preserved mainly in burial contexts and monumental *synagogue remains. The most important remains are the Jewish catacombs in *Rome and Beth Shearim in the *Galilee; more than 150 synagogues in the Land of Israel (including, for example, Capernaum, Kefar Baram, Hammath Tiberias B, Sepphoris, and Beth Alpha); and the *Diaspora synagogues at Dura Europos (*Syria), Sardis (Asia Minor), Ostia Antica (the port of *Rome), Hamman Lif (Tunisia), and elsewhere. References to ancient Jewish art appear in *rabbinic literature, which is often useful in providing contexts for interpreting the material evidence.

Late antique Jewish art was a minority art in which Jews generally used the same forms of visual communication as their non-Jewish neighbors. Thus, Jews in fourth and fifth century CE Rome buried their dead in catacombs that were indistinguishable from those of other Romans, and synagogue architecture reflected the places where Jews lived. The standard art of the Greco-Roman period was made “Jewish” through the adaptation of specific Roman imagery (such as the zodiac), the avoidance of art deemed to be “idolatrous,” and the use of unique Jewish imagery. Jewish imagery includes *Torah shrines (by the third century called an “ark”) and the symbolic representation of Torah shrines in synagogue mosaics, on carved architectural synagogue elements (e.g., Chorazin, Capernaum, Sardis), as catacomb decoration (Rome, Beth She’arim), and, in Rome, on oil lamps. In Rome and Sardis the Torah shrine is shown with its doors open so that scrolls may be seen within. In Palestine the doors are closed, with a hanging textile before the shrine (e.g., Hammath Tiberias B, Beth Alpha). By far the most widespread Jewish symbol was the seven-branched *menorah, a visual reminder of the Jerusalem *Temple (Plate 3). Menorahs appear flanking Torah shrines in Rome and in Palestine, on their own throughout the Roman world within synagogues and tombs, and in decorative contexts on jewelry, seals, oil lamps, and other artifacts. Three-dimensional menorahs have been discovered at sites including Hammath Tiberias A, Maon [Judah] and Sardis. Menorahs appear on Jewish seals from Sassanian *Persia. The menorah is often flanked by a palm frond bunch (lulav and etrog), an incense shovel (in Palestine), and other imagery.

Biblical representations first appear in the synagogue at Dura Europos in Syria (ca. 245 CE), where the wall paintings of biblical scenes appear in three registers. Dura is the most important single artifact of ancient Jewish art, providing the earliest biblically themed paintings in existence. Approximately 60% of these paintings are extant. The iconography interprets biblical themes through the prisms of both biblical interpretation and the local environment. Represented events include the discovery of *Moses by Pharaoh’s daughter, crossing the Red Sea, the tribes encamped around the *Tabernacle, *Ezekiel’s vision of the dry bones, and *Esther before King Ahashuerus. The painting technique is typical of the art of Dura and is stylistically of a piece with Persian and Roman art of Mesopotamia and the Syrian desert.

Biblical scenes appear in fifth- and sixth-century synagogue mosaics from Palestine; they include *Aaron before the Tabernacle, the first fruits and table for showbread in Sepphoris, the binding of *Isaac at Sepphoris and Beth Alpha, the angels’ visit to *Abraham and *Sarah at Sepphoris, *Noah’s ark at Gerasa, *Daniel in the lion’s den at Na’aran and perhaps Khirbet Susiya, and *David playing the harp at Gaza. Rabbinic sources suggest the existence of wall paintings from as early as the third century. Hebrew characters also served as markers of Jewish identity within both Palestinian and *Diaspora contexts, although Greek inscriptions are often found as well.

Recent research includes R. Hachlili, Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Land of Israel (1988) and Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Diaspora (1998). S. Fine, Art and Judaism in the Greco-Roman World: Toward a New Jewish Archaeology (2005) details past scholarship and presents a comprehensive view of the extant literary and archaeological evidence. See also SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT.

STEVEN FINE

Art: Medieval Manuscript Illustration. Jewish books in both medieval *Sepharad and *Ashkenaz were always at risk. In 1242, six ox carts of Jewish manuscripts were burned in the Place de Grève in Paris, destroying nearly every Jewish book in the Île de France, a great center of Jewish manuscript production. Given such deliberate acts of obliteration, as well as confiscations, censorship, and the vagaries of expulsions and migrations, it is not surprising that relatively few volumes have survived. Nevertheless, many of the major iconographic themes of Jewish illumination can be reconstructed from what remains.

Medieval Jewish manuscripts both in Sepharad and Ashkenaz fall very much within the general stylistic parameters of the surrounding cultures. Medieval Jews shared the same cultural milieu as their neighbors and made use of identical stylistic and iconographic elements. It is the analysis of how those raw elements were fashioned into something Jewish that distinguishes the study of Jewish manuscript illumination.

Narrative art existed among the Jews of late antiquity. The most notable examples are the wall paintings of the synagogue at Dura Europos in *Syria. However, the iconographic traditions represented there never made their way to Europe. During the early thirteenth century, concomitant with the emergence of Christian narrative art from monastic contexts into urban workshops, Jews in both Ashkenaz and Sepharad seem to have developed a renewed interest in narrative painting. By the early fourteenth century, the rebirth of figurative art in Jewish culture had reached its most articulated development (Plate 4).

The greatest creativity occurred within the realm of iconography. Medieval Jewish iconography is first and foremost concerned with the illustration of narrative themes in the Hebrew *Bible and other Jewish literature. These illustrations are sometimes fairly straightforward and literal depictions of the biblical stories – an illustration of the Israelites crossing the Sea of Reeds, for instance. However, these scenes are always filtered through the imagination of the authorship of each manuscript, whether patron or artist, who had to interpret in visual terms the usually narratologically sparse biblical episodes. Accordingly, illuminations often depict their subjects through a midrashic lens. Thus, the Sea of Reeds might be shown divided into twelve paths or the Israelites represented bearing arms, traditions found in rabbinic legends.

The depictions were sometimes part of a sequence, such as a series of images illustrating the narrative events leading up to the Exodus from Egypt, but artists also represented discrete scenes from the text being illustrated. The choice to depict particular narratives or series of events often had an extratextual significance that was rooted in specific historical contexts. For example, most illustrations of the crossing of the Sea of Reeds appear in haggadot, in manuscripts containing all or part of the Bible, or in *prayer books (which include the “Song at the Sea,” Exod 15:1–18). Yet whoever determined the content of a book’s illustrations had a myriad of scenes from which to choose. Thus, the choice to include an illumination of crossing the Sea of Reeds may have been for reasons specifically linked to the particular history of a given manuscript. Perhaps the name of the manuscript’s patron was Moses, or the community in which the manuscript was illuminated had just gone through a particularly traumatic engagement with the surrounding culture from which it had emerged triumphant, like the Israelites from the Sea of Reeds.

Scholars are now beginning to analyze medieval Jewish illumination in the same ways they consider medieval illumination in general: as a repository of the larger cultural outlook and context of its creators, rather than as a striving toward some aesthetic ideal. Manuscript illumination provided a forum for Jews to express, often in occluded language, deeply held feelings that were theologically or politically dangerous to articulate explicitly. In their engagement with art, Jews reen countered and grappled with all the classical Jewish questions of self-definition, including their place in history, their relationship with *God and their neighbors, and their hopes for *redemption.

A comparison of illuminated fourteenth-century haggadot from *Spain and Ashkenaz demonstrates how these concerns were expressed in manuscript iconography. In medieval illuminated haggadot of the Sephardic realms, the text is accompanied by what we might call static or “iconic” illustrations: Figures representing various rabbis are displayed next to the words attributed to them, with a similar arrangement for the “Four Children.” Illustrations of central elements of the *Passover ritual meal – matzah (unleavened bread) and maror (bitter herbs) – are depicted on the pages that contain the blessings to be recited over them. Yet in a series of Sephardic manuscripts from the fourteenth century, the text, with these iconic illustrations, is preceded by a series of narrative illuminations depicting selected events and incidents from the creation of the world until the Exodus from *Egypt, as well as images of ancient, contemporary, and future Passover celebrations. In the so-called Golden Haggadah (London, British Library, MS Add. 27210), illuminated in Catalonia, ca. 1320–30, the Genesis-to-Exodus sequence contains scenes that are deliberately selected and related to each other in terms of physical placement on each folio to emphasize particular aspects of history and theology. Close readings of the illuminations – not only in literal sequence but also in the way the eye is led across the page by apparently stylistic elements like strong verticals and horizontals, and in the way particular illuminations relate, thematically and in their physical disposition, to others that appear later in the sequence – attune us to the iconographic richness of this manuscript. It is evident that it was created as the result of intensive and concerted planning, thorough knowledge of the tradition, and meticulous attention to detail. The illuminations, which appear so similar to those in contemporary Christian manuscripts, are not only stylistically refined but also Jewishly sophisticated. Representations of the Exodus story remind us that the Rabbis understood that the Exodus was present in God’s mind even before its first scriptural mention to *Abraham at the “Covenant of the Pieces” (Gen 15:7–21). *Rabbinic literature positions the events of Israelite slavery and *redemption as a part of the sacred destiny of the people who would become the Children of Israel, even from the moment of the creation of the world. The iconographic strategy of prefacing the haggadah and the depictions of the contemporary Passover with a sequence of narratives beginning with the Garden of Eden parallels this rabbinic tradition by demonstrating the centrality of the Exodus in the Jewish sacred story and by emphasizing that it was foreordained and inevitable.

In Ashkenazic haggadot, narrative illustration is less panoramic and more selective. Throughout the Middle Ages illustrations remained fairly limited and tended to be based on the narratives contained in the text of the haggadah itself, with illustrations based only on elements referred to explicitly in the text, like the Rabbis of B’nai B’rak, the “Four Children,” the labors of the Israelites, the plagues, and the drowning of the Egyptians. Illumination in Western and Central Europe opens up more in the aftermath of *printing, and the magnificent courtly manuscripts produced in the eighteenth century are testimony to great iconographic richness.

Yet distinctive emphases and agendas can be detected even in the apparently straightforward sequences of illumination in medieval Ashkenazic manuscripts. For instance, scholars have characterized the sequence of narrative illustrations in the earliest known surviving illuminated haggadah, the so-called Birds’ Head Haggadah (Jerusalem, Israel Museum, MS 180/57), illuminated in Mainz, *Germany, around 1300, as “confused” and “disjointed.” On closer examination, however, one notes that instead of a single linear narrative of the Exodus, the manuscript contains five fairly distinct groups of images, including (1) depictions of events that form a sort of prehistory of the Exodus, (2) images depicting the Exodus and the desert wandering narratives, (3) illustrations of the poem “Dayenu” (“It would have been enough!”), and (4) a cluster of illuminations revolving around the making of matzah. A fifth strand of iconography that runs through the manuscript, overlapping these other groups of images, depicts five different Passovers that are discussed in rabbinic and medieval literature. The first “Passover” in this group is represented by a series of events that the Rabbis understood to foreshadow the actual historical Exodus. Next are Passovers that occur in two historical eras: the very first, or Egyptian Passover, and the Passover of *Temple times. Next, the Passover of post-Temple times, up to and including the present day, is represented. Finally, the iconography depicts a Passover at the end of history, the Passover of Redemption.

If we expect a single, simple, continuous “story” in the sequence of illuminations of the Birds’ Head Haggadah, we are bound to be disappointed. However, if we read the “five Passovers” as they intertwine with the Exodus prehistory, Exodus and desert wanderings, “Dayenu,” and matzah-baking sequences, we observe that together they form a complex, interlinked, and polyvalent narrative. The manuscript’s iconography continually affirms its authorship’s understanding that the tradition, although grounded in historical events, simultaneously transcends history and points toward *messianic redemption, a theme that pervades medieval Jewish visual culture as a whole, both in Ashkenaz and in Sepharad (Plate 7).

Although biblical narrative is the dominant source for images in medieval Jewish manuscripts, the closely related iconographic theme of eschatological redemption is often intertwined with biblical representations. Because the Jewish worldview was suffused with historical memory and eschatological hope, illuminations depicted scenes from history that incorporated future consolation: They looked back at a time when Jews possessed political and cultural sovereignty while simultaneously pointing to the restoration of that status. This dissonance between the reality of religious and political subjugation and the historical memories and future hopes of the Jewish people is what gives Jewish art its uniqueness – as far back as Dura Europos, and probably before.

Jewish illumination mirrors Jewish texts in making the connection between past redemptions and the great redemption yet to come, while also reflecting on the continuing persecution of Jews in an as-yet unredeemed world. A subtheme of eschatological imagination is that of fantasies of vindication. Just as the redemption would bring salvation for Jews, it would represent the downfall of their enemies. Such subversive and revolutionary ideas, which would not have gone over well with the majority culture, were veiled in symbolic images or indicated by the use of a politically pointed narrative iconography meant primarily for an internal Jewish audience. For instance, by commissioning images that represent Pharaoh and his courtiers in the garb of a contemporary monarch and his entourage, the patrons of one fourteenth-century Sephardic haggadah may have been expressing a rather explicit dream of subversion. By depicting the plagues afflicting some figures in contemporary dress and some in more “archaic” clothing, the patrons of an eighteenth-century Ashkenazic haggadah made the message somewhat more ambiguous. And by generalizing the figures so thoroughly that the landscape completely dominates, the patrons of yet another haggadah, a Moravian example of the eighteenth century, softened any explicit subversive message, while maintaining the implicit message of the plagues that strike enemies and spare God’s chosen ones.

The embodiment of sacred narrative in manuscript art was one of the ways in which medieval Jews testified to the continuity of the *revelation at Sinai. Alongside their traditional modes of text commentary, medieval Jews could employ iconography as exegesis, using images as another mirror of revelation in history.

Recent research on Hebrew manuscript illustration includes M. M. Epstein, Dreams of Subversion in Medieval Jewish Art and Literature (1997); idem, The Medieval Haggadah: Art, Narrative, and Religious Imagination (2011); E. Frojmovic, ed., Imagining the Self, Imagining the Other: Visual Representation and Jewish-Christian Dynamics in the Middle Ages and Early Modern Period (2002); and K. Kogman-Appel, Illuminated Haggadot from Medieval Spain (2006).

MARC MICHAEL EPSTEIN

Ascarelli, Devorà (sixteenth century) was an Italian poet and translator of Hebrew liturgical texts. The only information about her is her thirty-one page book (1601 and 1609), perhaps the first published volume by a Jewish woman. Its dedication indicates that she was the wife of Joseph Ascarelli, a member of a Roman family associated with the leadership of *Rome’s Catalan Jewish community. Ascarelli’s book was apparently intended for use on *Yom Kippur; the liturgical pieces appear in both Hebrew and Italian. The volume is usually identified by its first selection, L’abitacolo degli Oranti (Maon ha-Shoalim, [The Abode of the Suppliants]), a rhymed translation of a liturgical poem for Yom Kippur by Moses Rieti of Perugia (1388–1459), from his Mikdash Me’at (Il Tempio [The Small Sanctuary], part 2, canto 2). Other prose translations include Barekhi Nafshi, or Benedici il Signore o anima mia (May God Bless My Soul), which is a prayer in the Roman rite by Rabbenu Bahia ben Joseph the Pious (eleventh century) of Saragossa; La Grande Confessione (The Great Confession) by Rabbenu Nissim, identified as the head of the *Babylonian Academy; and an avodah prayer for the Sephardic Yom Kippur service. Also included in the work are two original sonnets, “Il Ritratto di Susanna” (The Picture of Susannah), based on the story in the *Apocrypha of Susannah and the Elders, and “Quanto è in me di Celeste,” (Whatever in Me Is of Heaven); as well as one anonymous short poem dedicated to Ascarelli: “Ape, ingegnosa voli,” (Fly, Clever Bee).

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

Asher ben Jehiel (ca. 1250–1328), also known as the Rosh, was a halakhic authority, talmudist, and moralist. A pupil of *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, he was seen as the leader of German Jewry after his teacher’s imprisonment. He survived the Rindfleisch massacres of 1298, in which two hundred Jews were murdered. In 1303 he left *Germany with his family, probably to escape government persecution; he became the rabbi of Toledo, *Spain, in 1305. The Rosh introduced the *Ashkenazic approach to Talmud study to Spain and attempted a synthesis of Ashkenazic and *Sephardic practices and customs. He was opposed to philosophical studies and was a leader of those who opposed the writings of *Maimonides. His published works include Piskei ha-Rosh, commentaries on large parts of the *Mishnah and *Talmud, and Orkhot Hayyim, an ethical treatise written for his sons.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Asherah: See CANAAN, CANAANITES: CANAANITE MYTHOLOGY; and PLATE 1.

Ashkenaz, Ashkenazim; adj. Ashkenazi or Ashkenazic. Ashkenaz is a biblical place name mentioned in Genesis 10:3, Jeremiah 51:27, and 1 Chronicles 1:6. In the tenth century CE, Jews identified their settlements in *Germany (the Rhineland) with this location, and Jews in northern Europe became known as Ashkenazim. Over the course of the next six hundred years, Ashkenazim spread into other parts of Europe, settling particularly heavily in *Eastern Europe. Ashkenazim are differentiated from *Sephardim, Jews of Iberian descent, and *Mizrahim, Jews of Middle Eastern descent. Each group developed distinctive liturgical customs (nusakh), rituals, and social practices, as well as differing Hebrew pronunciations, and vernacular languages, with numerous internal variations.

See also YIDDISH; Maps 7, 8, 10, 11 KATE FRIEDMAN

Assyria was a Mesopotamian empire centered on the upper Tigris River in what is now *Iraq. Assyria’s origins date back to at least the twentieth century BCE, and its name derives from its original capital city Assur. Over the centuries, Assyria had periods of political dominance and of subordination in its relations with neighboring peoples. *Babylon, to the south, and *Egypt were perennial rivals. The main language was a dialect of Akkadian, a *Semitic language; a great deal is known about Assyrian society and beliefs from cuneiform writing on clay tablets and from Assyrian art (see MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL and NEAR EAST, ANCIENT).

In the Neo-Assyrian era (911–612 BCE), military power grew under Ashurnasirpal II; during his reign the northern kingdom of *Israel benefited from Assyria’s defeat of the Arameans (2 Kgs 13:5). When the next Assyrian king, Shalmaneser III, attacked Ben-Hadad II of Damascus in 853 BCE, King *Ahab of Israel opposed his efforts, but his successor, Jehu, paid tribute to Assyria. Assyria declined during the late ninth and early eighth centuries BCE until Tiglath-Pileser II came into power in 745. He invaded Israel in 738 during the reign of Menahem, requiring a heavy tribute (2 Kgs 15:19). Ahaz, king of *Judah, allied with Assyria against Israel and *Syria, and Tiglath-Pileser occupied Damascus in 732 and deported its inhabitants to Assyria. Shalmaneser V succeeded Tiglath-Pileser II in 727, and King Hoshea of Israel allied with Egypt against Assyria in 725, which led to Shalmaneser V’s invasion of Syria and *Samaria (Israel’s capital). Shalmaneser V died in 722 while in Samaria, and Sargon II succeeded him, taking 27,000 Israelites into Assyrian captivity (see TRIBES, TEN LOST).

Judah remained loyal to Assyria until 701 when King *Hezekiah allied with Egypt against Sennacherib (702–681 BCE). In response Sennacherib sacked a number of cities in Judah, including *Lachish, and laid siege to *Jerusalem. However, before Jerusalem was captured, Sennacherib returned to Nineveh, his capital city, to put down a rebellion. Biblical writers interpret this unexpected rescue as a miracle effected by an angel (2 Kgs 19:35). An Assyrian version of these events, which are presented as a victory that yielded rich tribute from Hezekiah, is found on the clay hexagonal “Taylor prism,” found in the ruins of ancient Nineveh in 1830 and now in the Oriental Institute in *Chicago. The Assyrian empire collapsed by the end of the seventh century BCE after its defeat by *Babylon in 612. Map 1

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Astrology. Two Hebrew treatises with astrological themes, the Baraita de-Shmuel and Baraita de-Mazzalot, survive from the transition period between antiquity and the Middle Ages. Both draw on Hellenistic astrology and use Greek terminology. From the mid-eighth century to 1000, important Jewish astrologers who wrote in *Arabic include Mash’allah (d. ca. 815), Sahl ibn Bushr ibn Habib al-Yahd (fl. early ninth century), Ali ibn Dawud al-Yahd (fl. end of the ninth century), and Dunash ibn Tamim of Kairouan (fl. ca. 950).

During the twelfth century, many Jews were active in astrology. The fifth chapter of Megillat ha-Megalleh (Scroll of the Revealer) by *Abraham bar Hiyya (d. 1140) is an impressive Jewish and universal astrological history. Bar Hiyya also wrote a letter to Judah ben Barzilai, the leading rabbinic authority of Barcelona, setting forth a detailed halakhic defense of his version of astrology. The most prominent medieval Jewish expert on astrology was Abraham *ibn Ezra (1089–1167). His seventeen treatises address the main genres of Arabic astrology. Ibn Ezra also incorporated a significant astrological component into his biblical commentaries, thereby integrating astrological concepts into mainstream Jewish culture. Ibn Ezra’s subsequent influence is evident in an epistle addressed to *Maimonides from southern France (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES).

Moses Maimonides (1135–1204) attacked the study of astrology, emphasizing its strong connection to star worship and its implied denial of free will. Nevertheless, scholarly astrology spread widely within Jewish society after Maimonides’ death. Ibn Ezra’s astrological treatises were transmitted as components of astrological compilations or collections. Hebrew translations of astrological texts, mainly from Arabic, grew in number in the thirteenth and particularly in the fourteenth centuries. Astrological sections appeared in some Hebrew encyclopedias of sciences and medieval rabbinic writings.

Like Ibn Ezra, *Gersonides (1288–1344) incorporated astrology into his biblical commentaries. He also wrote a prognostication for the 1345 conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter. The anthropocentric view that the celestial bodies were purposely created to emanate influences that perfect the sublunar world is a cornerstone of The Wars of the Lord, his great philosophical work.

For recent research, see S. Sela, “Abraham Bar Hiyya’s Astrological Work and Thought,” Jewish Studies Quarterly 12 (2005):1–31; idem, “Queries on Astrology Sent from Southern France,” Aleph 4 (2004): 89–190; idem, Abraham Ibn Ezra and the Rise of Medieval “Hebrew Science” (2003); G. Freudenthal, “Maimonides’ Stance on Astrology in Context: Cosmology, Physics, Medicine, and Providence,” in Moses Maimonides: Physician, Scientist, and Philosopher, ed. F. Rosner and S. Kottick (1993), 77–90; and T. Langermann, “Gersonides on Astrology,” in The Wars of the Lord, trans. S. Feldman (1999), 3:506–19.

SHLOMO SELA

Astronomy: See SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD

Atonement. Rituals of atonement aim to restore cultic *purity and remove guilt. Many ancient communities shared the underlying belief that the gods, as guardians of law and order, were angered by transgression and required appeasement. In the *Torah (*Lev 16), one day of the year is set aside for the cultic system to be restored to its original purity and for the sins of the community to be “wiped away” or “covered” (the etymology of kapper is uncertain). On the Day of Atonement (*Yom Kippur), as practiced in *Second Temple *Jerusalem, the High Priest (cf. *Wisdom of Ben Sira 50) entered the Holy of Holies, the most sacred space in the *Temple, in his official vestments while the people (who had been fasting since nightfall) awaited his successful return. Celebration followed the solemn ritual observances; the *Mishnah (Ta’anit 4:8) mentions that when the Day of Atonement concluded, the young women of Jerusalem would dance in the vineyards in hopes of attracting a husband.

After the Second Temple’s destruction (70 CE), the Rabbis found consolation in other means of atonement, such as acts of lovingkindness. Medieval spirituality focused on *repentance, forgiveness, and inner purification. The trope of kol nidre, chanted on the eve of Yom Kippur, is among the most haunting tunes of the liturgical year. Concluding a period of “ten days of repentance” (asseret yemei teshuvah [see HIGH HOLIDAYS]) that begins with Rosh Ha-Shanah, the New Year (see NEW YEARS), the mythological arc of Yom Kippur worship extends from the proclamation of divine kingship to the collective confession of guilt to the hope that God will move from the throne of judgment to the throne of mercy. Jewish tradition teaches that the heavenly books are opened, and each individual’s name is inscribed for life or for death (hence the pious wish for a “benevolent inscription” [hatimah tovah]). Immediately after the heavenly gates are closed at sunset (ne’ilah), families traditionally begin to build the sukkah required for the celebration of the feast of *Sukkot (Tabernacles), which follows the *High Holidays and confirms that God has forgiven and that life has once again been granted and provided for.

The ethical-legal potential of the liturgical drama of atonement was first recognized by Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918), who saw the restoration of innocence and purity as a religious contribution to an ethical conception of the human being. The Jewish conception of atonement models what jurisprudence merely demands; namely, the transformation of the transgressor to a restored moral self. For Cohen, confession of wrong, repentance, and atonement can rehabilitate the individual who, by accepting guilt and punishment, begins a process of return to innocence and moral value. Mindful of the social and psychological dimensions of crime, modern legal scholars have also highlighted other elements of atonement, such as remorse and apology.

For further reading see S. Agnon, Days of Awe (1938; rep. 1995); and S. Bibas and R. A. Bierschbach, “Integrating Remorse and Apology into Criminal Procedure,” Yale Law Journal 114/1 (2004): 85–148.

MICHAEL ZANK

Auschwitz (Oświęcim), a camp in Poland where the *Nazis murdered almost a million Jews, along with 70,000–75,000 Poles, 21,000 *Roma, and 15,000 Soviet prisoners of war. More than two-thirds of the Jewish victims were from *Hungary (438,000) and *Poland (300,000). Auschwitz was unique both for its size (25 square miles) and sense of permanency. In addition to its three major camps, Auschwitz I, II, and III, Auschwitz had a large network of Nebenlager or subcamps. Auschwitz I was the Stammlager (main camp) or concentration camp, Auschwitz II–Birkenau was the death camp, and Auschwitz III–Buna/Monowitz was the I. G. Farben complex in which slave labor manufactured synthetic rubber. There were four large gas chamber and crematorium complexes in Birkenau with plans for a fifth. There was a single gas chamber–crematorium at Auschwitz I. The *Theresienstadt “Czech” Family Camp and the Roma Family Camp were also located in Birkenau. Once prisoners arrived in Birkenau through the infamous arched rail entranceway, they were herded off the train cars and then forced to pass through a small line of SS physicians, who, with a gesture to the left or right, decided who would be gassed or who would live briefly as slave laborers. Those chosen for death were quickly marched to a nearby gas chamber–crematorium, where they were ordered to undress. As they entered the anteroom to the gas chambers, signs directed them zu den Bädern (“to the baths”) and zur Desinfektion (“to disinfection”). If there was a backlog of victims or one of the gas chambers was not operating, some would be taken outside and shot. Once the gassings ended, SS physicians selected some bodies for dissection.

The SS forced a large contingent of inmates to work as Kapos (prisoner trustees), Blockälteste (block or barracks elders), and Vorarbeiter (workers’ foremen) throughout the Auschwitz complex. In addition, they used inmate Sonderkommandos (special detachments) in Birkenau to remove the bodies from the gas chambers and burn them in the crematoria or nearby pits. Once the chambers were aired out, Sonderkommandos entered to look for gold and other hidden items among the bodies. After the bodies were cremated, the ashes were dumped in the Vistula River or in local streams or ponds. Bones were crushed and buried in nearby pits. Inmates sorted and stored the victims’ food, clothing, and other personal items in special Kanada barracks. These goods were either stolen by the SS or sent to ethnic German colonists in Poland or Ukraine. When the Soviets entered Auschwitz in early 1945, they found 350,000 men's suits, more than 800,000 women's dresses and other personal items, children's clothing, and almost seven tons of human hair.

The SS conducted gruesome medical experiments at Auschwitz. Dr. Carl Clauberg performed sterilization experiments on inmates, and Dr. Josef Mengele experimented on twins, Roma children, dwarfs, and others. He worked closely with Berlin's prestigious Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Anthropology, Human Genetics, and Eugenics, sending it copies of his research reports and human specimens. Dr. Miklos Nyiszli, a Jewish physician from Hungary who was forced to work as Mengele's assistant, described his work with Auschwitz's "angel of death" in his memoir, Auschwitz: A Doctor's Eyewitness Account.

The last major act of *Holocaust resistance took place in Auschwitz in the fall of 1944 when three hundred Sonderkommandos, who had just learned of Himmler's plans to close Auschwitz, blew up crematorium IV and fought the SS with hammers and axes. The SS killed 451 Jews during the uprising and executed others involved in the plot. Two weeks later, a smaller rebellion took place after a Jewish woman shot two SS guards. Himmler ordered the destruction of the crematoria at Auschwitz I and II after the October 7 rebellion. When the Soviet army liberated Auschwitz on January 17, 1945, all that remained of its once vast prisoner population were 7,000 sick or dying inmates. See also HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; HOLOCAUST TRIALS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Australia. Australian Jewry proudly traces its origins to the bedraggled Jewish convicts who were shipped in the First Fleet to the penal colony of New South Wales in 1788. More than three hundred Jews were among the chained prisoners transported to Australia between 1788 and 1830. The first Jewish free settlers began arriving in the 1820s and soon outnumbered the Jewish convict population. They began to organize regular religious services and the first communal institutions, closely modeled along Anglo-Jewish lines. Although some Jews scattered throughout the countryside, working as hoteliers, pub owners, shopkeepers, and tradesmen, most clustered in Sydney, Melbourne, and Hobart. The discovery of gold in 1851 brought substantial numbers of Jewish fortune seekers, and during the 1850s, the Australian Jewish population more than doubled in size to more than 5,000 in the early 1860s. Men made up roughly two-thirds of this early community.

Australia's remoteness limited the scale of Eastern European Jewish immigration from 1880s until the outbreak of World War I. Nonetheless, the new arrivals, disapproving of their acculturated and largely irreligious counterparts, created their own religious and cultural institutions, as well as the first *Zionist organizations. By 1914, well over half of the total Jewish population was native-born; the communal leadership was dominated by an Anglicized elite that also found success in politics, commerce, and cultural life. Acculturation and acceptance – strident *antisemitism was all but absent until the late 1930s – ensured high rates of *intermarriage. The Australian government's acceptance of Jewish refugees from *Germany between 1936 and the outbreak of war – about 5,000 in 1939 alone – created a tide of hostility and xenophobia. Over time, the infusion of these outsiders revitalized Australian Jewish life, introducing the first Liberal synagogues and strengthening Orthodoxy, spurring Jewish education and philanthropic initiatives, providing Zionist activity with new life, and broadening and democratizing the communal leadership. These trends gained further momentum after the end of World War II as Australia initially welcomed the immigration of Jewish *displaced persons from Europe, most of whom settled in Sydney and Melbourne. Largely because of this influx, the Australian Jewish population doubled between 1933 and 1945 to more than 48,000. These numbers were bolstered by more than 23,000 additional Jewish refugees between 1946 and 1960.

In the post-war decades, Australian Jewish life was marked by rapid upward social mobility, suburbanization, professionalization, and embourgeoisement. Intermarriage rates, which had been of great concern in the 1920s, declined significantly in the 1950s and 1960s. Over the last four decades, the Jewish community has thrived as Australia has become increasingly multicultural and prosperous. It has also continued to attract significant numbers of Jewish immigrants, mostly *Russians, *South Africans, and *Israelis. Given the relatively small size of the total Jewish population and the residential clustering of immigrants, this influx has had a significant impact on the community. As of 1996 more than 9% of the Australian Jewish population of 106,000 was born in South Africa; ex-South Africans made up more than half of the Jewish community of Perth. These immigrants have helped sustain the post-war blossoming and diversification of Jewish life in Australia.

For further reading, see S. Rutland, Edge of the Diaspora: Two Centuries of Jewish Settlement in Australia (1997); and H. Rubinstein and W. D. Rubinstein, The Jews in Australia: A Thematic History (1991).

ADAM MENDELSON

Austria, Austro-Hungarian Empire: See HABSBURG EMPIRE; PRAGUE; VIENNA; Maps 8, 9

Autobiography See entries under MEMOIR AND LIFEWITING

Autonomy and Heteronomy. The etymology of autonomy (auto + nomos) suggests the imposition of law on oneself; its opposite, heteronomy (heteros + nomos), is the imposition of law on (or from) another. In the history of philosophy, the distinction between the two is associated with Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). His basic insight is that the individual alone bears responsibility for her or his actions. To be responsible for oneself is in some sense to be master of oneself or, as Kant characterizes it, autonomous. Taking this idea to its logical extreme, Kant concludes that every moral agent is both an end in itself and a being capable of legislating morality for itself.

Suppose *God commands me to do something. Why I should obey? A reason often given is that my life will be uncomfortable if I do not. Yet the central question is not “What is it in my interest to do?” but “What am I obliged to do?” Kant’s point is that obligation can only come from within: Neither God nor anyone else can create obligation for me. Rather than say, “Do this” and “Don’t do that,” as a person in authority, I must be allowed to see for myself what is right. Not to do so is heteronomous and therefore degrading.

The classic statement of autonomy reads, “The will is thus not merely subject to the law but is subject in such a way that it must be regarded also as legislating for itself and only on this account as being subject to the law (of which it can regard itself as the author)” (Kant, Grounding of the Metaphysics of Morals, 431). To say that I must be able to regard myself as the author of the law is not to say that I must be the author of the law in fact. I did not draft the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution; however, because it prohibits torture, it articulates a principle to which I am committed, and thus I have no trouble adopting it as if I were the author.

How is autonomy compatible with the idea of divine *commandment? According to Kant, I can obey God as long as my reason for doing so is that the commandment I have been given is morally valid; what I cannot do is obey blindly. Proponents of autonomy point out that the typical way for God to issue commandments is to enter into a *covenant or berit, an arrangement that requires the consent of both parties. Unlike Pharaoh, God does not simply say “Do this,” but asks, “Will you pledge yourself to the claim that this ought to be done?” The difference is critical because only the latter approach respects the dignity of both parties.

Opponents of autonomy reply that if I must be able to regard myself as the author of the law, its status as God-given becomes irrelevant. If, for example, I can see on my own that murder is wrong, why do I need God to point it out? The answer is that, although God can serve as a moral teacher, God must still recognize that I am a moral agent.

Closely connected to the issue of autonomy is the question of whether God commands something because it is right or whether it is right because God commands it. Typically a proponent of autonomy will assert the former, an opponent the latter.

Thinkers who address this issue include I. Kant, Grounding of the Metaphysics of Morals (1785), H. *Cohen, Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism (1919), and K. Seeskin, Autonomy in Jewish Philosophy (2001).

KENNETH SEESKIN

Av. Fifth month of the Jewish calendar; takes place in July or August of the Gregorian calendar. See also CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR; AND TISHA B’AV.

Avot (or Pirkei Avot; “Chapters of the Fathers” or “Ethics of the Fathers”), the sole nonlegal tractate in the *Mishnah, is found in the Order Nezikin. Its content is more closely akin to biblical *wisdom literature than to the legal materials comprising the bulk of the Mishnah. The tractate’s timeless lessons and straightforward language have rendered the work highly popular beyond the learned few who have traditionally studied rabbinic legal literature. The custom of studying Avot on the *Sabbath, which spread from *geonic *Babylonia (see GAON; GEONIC ACADEMIES) to Jewish communities around the globe, enhanced the public profile of the work and led to its inclusion and mass circulation in the *prayer book. Over the centuries, Avot has inspired numerous commentaries and has been translated into many languages.

The first four of the tractate’s five chapters are an anthology of wisdom sayings attributed to rabbinic (and proto-rabbinic) sages; the fifth is comprised of similarly nonlegal though mostly anonymous materials. The sayings in Avot highlight ethical precepts and establish study of *Torah and observance of its precepts as fundamental Jewish values. Typical is the saying, attributed to Simon the Righteous in 1:2, that the three pillars on which the world stands are Torah, worship, and deeds of lovingkindness.

The central structuring principle of chapters one through four is the chain of transmission that begins the tractate: “Moses received the Torah from Sinai and passed it on to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets passed it on to the Men of the Great Assembly” (Avot 1:1). This opening statement constructs the earliest stages of the transmission of the Torah in its fullest sense – that is, the Hebrew *Bible and extrabiblical oral traditions, from its initial reception on Mount Sinai until the early *Second Temple period. This chain of transmission explicitly structures the first two chapters of Avot, tracing the history of the Torah’s transmission via a teacher–disciple schema from biblical times until the early *tannaitic period. Chapters three and four continue the chronological theme until the end of the tannaitic period, but are structured along generational lines rather than by a teacher–disciple pattern. Avot’s chain is not a straightforward reflection of historical reality but rather a rhetorical construct designed to establish the continuity of the rabbinic enterprise and thereby ground rabbinic teachings in the ancient past.

Avot was produced by rabbinic sages in third-century Roman *Palestine, and the Greco-Roman setting provides an illuminating backdrop for the tractate. For instance, Avot’s chain of transmission is a fine example of a *Hellenistic scholastic succession list; collections of sayings were also quite popular in Greco-Roman antiquity. In fact, the interspersing of attributed sayings (chreiai in Greek) within a succession list was apparently an ancient Greek practice. Avot thus reflects a rabbinic community that was embedded within the overarching cultural environment of the Greco-Roman Near East.

AMRAM TROPPER

Avot de Rabbi Natan. (AdRN), “The Fathers According to Rabbi Nathan,” is one of the minor tractates of the Babylonian *Talmud. The core of AdRN is made up of wisdom teachings found in Mishnah Avot*. Sometimes AdRN comments directly on the passages of Avot (like gemara*), and at other times we find additions and supplements (like the Tosefta*). AdRN may preserve the earlier phrasing of key passages. For example, in M. Avot the first saying is attributed to the “men of the Great Assembly”: “Be deliberate in judgment, raise up many disciples, and make a fence for the Torah.” In AdRN the order of items is different: The phrase “make a fence for the Torah” comes before “raise up many disciples.” Judah Goldin suggested that such alternate versions may enable reconstruction of the original meaning.

The commentary can be extensive. In AdRN, the instruction to “make a fence” inspires an elaborate discussion of fences contributed to by eight figures or documents: *God, *Adam, the *Torah, *Moses, *Job, the *Prophets, the *Writings, and the Sages. The images of distance and boundary conveyed by a fence are also developed in several ways. The most basic fence establishes a standard for practice stricter than a given biblical commandment in order to guard against transgression. AdRN describes men distancing themselves from transgression or reining in their own desires. Long digressions are common; discussion of *Adam’s fence includes midrashic traditions concerning the events in Eden.

AdRN raises several technical difficulties because it is not one text but a family of texts that includes several manuscripts and Cairo *Genizah fragments; their relationships are difficult to specify. Scholars have labeled the printed edition and similar manuscripts as “Version A,” and another group as “Version B,” but this division is contested. Similarly, the dating is hotly debated. AdRN initially appears to be a *tannaitic work, but scholars have long been aware that it was compiled over a much longer period. Menahem Kister’s recent analysis makes clear that post-talmudic editing of the material is also extensive.

Scholars have highlighted various prominent literary and thematic features of AdRN. Jacob Neusner has discussed the emphasis on the narratives of sages, including edited compilations concerning Hillel and Shammai, Rabban Johanan ben Zakkai, R. Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, and R. *Akiva. Anthony Saldarini characterizes the text as distinctly “scholastic,” presuming the context of a disciple circle that is comparable to Greco-Roman philosophical schools; Jonathan Schofer studies AdRN as a collection of *ethical literature that offers instruction in character and actions for rabbinic disciples. Judith R. Baskin analyzes AdRN version B as emphasizing *women’s alterity and subordination, particularly through midrashic reflection on *Eve.

For further reading, see J. Goldin, Studies in Midrash (1988); M. Kister, Studies in Abot de-Rabbi Nathan ([Hebrew with English summary], 1998); J. Neusner, Judaism and Story (1992); A. Saldarini, Scholastic Rabbinism (1982); J. W. Schofer, Making of a Sage (2005); and J. R. Baskin, “She Extinguished the Light of the World,” in Current Trends in the Study of Midrash, ed. C. Bakhos (2005).

JONATHAN WYN SCHOFER

Ayn Sof: See EIN SOF

B

Baal: See CANAAN, CANAANITE; CANAANITE MYTHOLOGY

Baal Shem, “Master of the Holy Name,” is a term used in medieval and Early Modern times to denote a master of magical powers who employed holy names, divine or angelic, for supernatural purposes. The earliest citation for this term is an epistle of *Hai ben Sherira *Gaon of Babylonia. The twelfth-century Judah the Pious of Regensburg, a major figure in the pietist Hasidei Ashkenaz, described a certain Rabbi Joseph as a master of holy names who used his powers to move miraculously from place to place. Several scholars, poets, and halakhists were described by this title in the Middle Ages, but beginning in the sixteenth century it was most commonly applied to mystics, healers, and magicians in Central and Eastern Europe. Among them was R. Joel Baal Shem of Zamoscs, who is credited with treatises dealing with *magic and popular *medicine. The eighteenth-century Shmuel Jacob Hayyim Falk was known as the Baal Shem of London. R. Adam Baal Shem of Bingen, a seventeenth-century figure, was later described as the mysterious teacher of the founder of the Hasidic movement, R. Israel *Baal Shem Tov (the Besht). There is no real difference in meaning between the terms baal shem and baal shem tov (“Master of the Good Name”). See also DOV BER OF MIĘDZYRZECZ; ETHICAL WILLS; FOLKTALES; HASIDISM, EUROPE; HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA; KABBALAH; NAḤMAN BEN SIMḤA OF BRATZLAV; SCHNEUR ZALMAN BEN BARUCH OF LIADY; UKRAINE. JOSEPH DAN

Baal Shem Tov, R. Israel Ben Eliezer (1698–1760), the charismatic founder of the Hasidic movement, was born in Międzybóž, Podolia (present-day Ukraine); he is often known by the acronym, the Besht. As his title indicates, he was renowned among his followers as a healer and magician. The Besht was not a scholar in a traditional sense and had limited knowledge of mystical teachings, but he attracted others with his piety and his enthusiasm for ecstatic prayer. The Besht taught that connection with God (devekut) is the goal of religious life for all Jews and that prayer should be characterized by joy and humility. He attracted many disciples, some of whom went on to found their own study centers and gather followers. See also HASIDISM: EUROPE.

Babylon/Babylonia was a Mesopotamian city-state between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers (modern-day Al Hillah, Babil Province, *Iraq). Initially a small town, by the seventeenth century BCE, Babylon had become the capital of *Hammurabi’s empire; it was around this time that Marduk became its chief diety. Babylonian mythology, literature, legal writings, and social customs had a significant impact on ancient Israel.

Babylon and the kingdom of *Judah were closely involved in the middle centuries of the first millennium BCE. Although Babylon was besieged by *Assyria throughout the seventh century BCE, it finally broke free from Assyrian rule in 626 BCE under Nabopolassar. Nebuchadnezzar II (604–561 BCE) inherited the Neo-Babylonian Chaldean Empire and led successful military campaigns against Judah in 597 and 586 BCE. He dissolved the monarchy, destroyed the *Jerusalem *Temple, and exiled much of Judah’s population to Babylon. The *Babylonian Exile was a crucial event in the history and future of the Jewish people; the immediate pain of dislocation is reflected in *Psalm 137 and *Lamentations. The biblical books of *Ezekiel and *Daniel have a Babylonian setting, whereas the books of *Ezra and *Nehemiah detail the return of some of the exiles’ descendants to Jerusalem. Although the enforced exile was relatively short-lived, ending with the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus the Great of *Persia in 539 BCE, a large and important Jewish community remained in *Diaspora in Babylon for centuries to come. See also MESOPOTAMIA AND ANCIENT ISRAEL; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT; IRAN; IRAQ; TALMUD, BABYLONIAN.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Babylonian Exile. The Neo-Babylonians under King Nebuchadnezzar completed their destruction of *Judah by capturing *Jerusalem in 586 BCE and taking many captives and deporting them to *Mesopotamia. This period of removal from the land is known as the “exilic period,” and the captivity in Mesopotamia as the “Babylonian Exile.” Among the most important captives and deportees were the elites of the Jerusalem establishment: the *priests and the ruling class. Among those who were exiled were deposed King Jehoiachin and his family in 597 BCE, along with military personnel and craftsmen (2 Kgs 24: 15–16), as well as other survivors including deserters (2 Kgs 25:11) in 586, and still others in 582 (Jer 52:30). The tragic impact of these events on the nation is reflected in *Psalm 137 and *Lamentations; it is not known how many remained in the land. The exilic experience produced surprising results in a very short time, partly because the Neo-Babylonian Kingdom was replaced by the *Persian Empire in 539 when Cyrus defeated King Nabonidus of Babylonia.

Among the accomplishments of the exilic era were the editing of the *Pentateuch and of the Former *Prophets, learning to worship in small groups without a *Temple, and integrating successfully into a new society far away from the homeland while maintaining a distinctive identity. When Cyrus the Great of Persia announced in 538 that it would be possible for the dispersed to return to the Land of Israel under the governor Sheshbazzar (Ezra 1:8; 5:14), not many of the exiles responded. A more significant return began under the leadership of the Persian-appointed governor *Zerubbabel (Hag 1:1, 14) in 520 BCE. The Babylonian Exile did not end even then, however, since many Jews chose to stay in Mesopotamia; that group formed the nucleus of the community that produced the Babylonian *Talmud a millennium later. The “period” of the exile came to a conclusion in 515 BCE when the Second *Temple was rededicated, nearly seventy years after the destruction of Jerusalem. The many Jews who chose to remain in their newly acquired places of residence made the *Diaspora a permanent feature of Jewish life. See also EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF; IRAQ; and YEHUD; Maps 1, 4, 5 ERIC MEYERS

Babylonian Talmud: See TALMUD, BABYLONIAN

Baeck, Leo: See LEO BAECK INSTITUTE

Baghdad: See IRAQ; Map 5

Bahir, Sefer Ha- (The Book of Brilliance), also known as the Midrash of Rabbi Neḥunia ben ha-Kanah (after the name of the second-century sage to whom the first paragraph in the book is attributed), is the earliest work of the *Kabbalah. It was written around 1185 by an anonymous author, probably in *Provence or northern *Spain. It comprises about two hundred paragraphs, attributed to various talmudic sages, and written in imitation of classical *midrash. It is the first work to present the divine powers as made up of ten layers, one above the other (although the number three also plays a prominent part). These powers are often pictured as an upside-down tree, whose roots are high above and whose branches extend toward the world. Exegeses of the names and shapes of the letters of the alphabet characterize many sections of the book; satan and *Samael, the source and nature of evil, are central subjects, as is the process of creation. The two main elements that justify characterizing Sefer ha-Bahir as the first kabbalistic treatise are the layered image of the divine pleroma (malei, "fullness") and the feminine characterization of the seventh or tenth divine power (Shekhinah*), neither of which appears in any previous Jewish work.

The author of the work reinterpreted many biblical verses, midrashic statements, and especially ancient Hebrew esoteric and mystical works, including Sefer Yetzirah* (Book of Creation) and hekhalot treatises. It is unclear whether he used unknown sources to formulate the concepts of the ten-power pleroma and the feminine nature of one of those powers or if these are his original contributions. It was from these concepts, however, that the kabbalistic image of the ten sefirot* developed in the next several decades.

Gershon *Scholem described the Bahir as an eruption of mythical thought within rabbinic Judaism and attributed its unique features – the sefirot, the feminine Shekhinah, and the divine tree – to influence from *gnostic-type thought. He did not decide whether the gnostic sources were originally Jewish, secretly transmitted from generation to generation, or the result of non-Jewish teachings. Attempts to find some influence from the contemporaneous Cathar heresy in southern *France have not been successful. It is uncertain whether the school of kabbalists that appeared in Provence at the end of the twelfth century and the beginning of the thirteenth used the ideas of the Bahir or whether the school was an independent and strikingly similar phenomenon. These two sources – the Bahir and the Provençal teachings – were united in the kabbalistic school of Gerona in the first half of the thirteenth century, which laid the foundations for classical Kabbalah (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE).

For further reading, see G. Scholem, The Origins of the Kabbalah (1987); J. Dan and R. Kiener, The Early Kabbalah (1986); D. Abrams, The Book Bahir (1994). JOSEPH DAN

Bahia ben Joseph ibn Pakuda was a rabbinic judge in eleventh-century Saragossa, in what was then Muslim *Spain. A major figure in medieval Jewish *thought, Bahia was the author of the first Jewish ethical treatise, Ḥovot ha-Levavot (Duties of the Heart), written in Arabic around 1080 and translated into Hebrew by Judah ibn Tibbon between 1161 and 1180. Deeply influenced by Sufi mystical teachings, Bahia's approach contrasted with that of his predecessors and contemporaries, who focused more on the physical performance of the laws (duties of the body) than on inner observance. His book of ten chapters is a manual for the ascension of the spiritual self in the service of God. In these ten "gates," Bahia provides a philosophical and theological basis for the unity and existence of *God, much of which was borrowed from the philosophical proofs of the Muslim Kalam and *Neoplatonism (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL); he addressed topics including divine service, the complexity of trust in God, repentance, moderate asceticism, the importance of study to conquer the evil inclination, love and gratitude to God, and other critical articles of faith. Bahia also composed liturgical piyyutim (such as Barekhi Nafshi), a penitential prayer, and a more recently recovered manuscript called "Reflections of the Soul." Ḥovot ha-Levavot has enjoyed enduring popularity in Judaism as a devotional work. A recent scholarly study is D. Lobel, Philosophy and Mysticism in Bahya ibn Paquda's "Duties of the Heart" (2006).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Balaam is a complex biblical figure who first appears in *Numbers 22 as a seer who is invited by Balak, king of *Moab, to curse the Israelites. Balaam, "son of Beor," is presented as in communication with God, and he sets out on his mission with apparent divine permission. However, in a satirical interlude, not unlike Jonah's encounter with the whale (see COMEDY AND COMEDIANS; JONAH), God sends an angel to block Balaam's path; Balaam cannot see the angel, but his ass does and steps off the road. When Balaam beats his animal, the ass answers in human speech, and Balaam finally perceives the heavenly messenger, who reprimands Balaam but allows him to proceed. After Balaam arrives at his destination he attempts to curse Israel, but he utters blessings instead (Num 22–24). According to *Deuteronomy 23:4–7 and *Joshua 24:9–10, God turned Balaam's curses into blessings. Numbers 31:16 blames Balaam for the seduction of Israelite men into immorality and idolatry by Midianite women at Baal Peor (Num 25:1–9); when the Israelites take revenge against the Midianites, Balaam is listed among those who are killed (Num 31:8).

The primary difficulty Balaam posed to later commentators was the contrast between his prophetic powers and his moral depravity. Numbers 22–24 presents Balaam in relatively neutral terms but other Hebrew *Bible (Josh 13:22; Neh 13:2) and *New Testament references (Rev 2:4; Jude 1:11; 2 Peter 2:15–16) vilify him. Thus, the Balaam who emerges from biblical literature is a puzzling combination of evil actions and undoubted visionary and even magical abilities. Early Qu'ranic commentaries attribute similar qualities to Balaam. Balaam's prophecy of a star emerging from Jacob (Num 24:17) was a further complication because both Jews (see BAR KOKHBA) and Christians gave it messianic meaning. Christian biblical exegetes often linked Balaam's prediction with the star followed by the Magi in Matthew 2:1–12.

In *rabbinic literature, Balaam came to represent the personification of the malice that the nations of the world directed toward Israel. Throughout rabbinic literature, the wicked Balaam advises the kings of the nations on how to destroy Israel. The Rabbis affirm that Balaam had prophetic powers and the facility to bless and curse effectively, but he used these gifts for evil and sorcery. According to Numbers Rabbah 14:20, God bestowed these special abilities on Balaam so that the nations of the world should not say, “Had we possessed a prophet like Moses we [too] would have worshipped the Holy One, blessed be He.”

The 1967 discovery at Deir ‘Alla in Jordan of fragmentary inscriptions on plaster in a *Canaanite dialect (published in 1976 by J. Hoftsijizer and G. van der Kooij as Aramaic Texts from Deir ‘Alla) has directed new attention to Balaam. These inscriptions, dated to approximately 800 BCE, record “The chastisements of the book of Balaam, the son of Be’or, the man who sees the gods.” The inscriptions include a number of striking parallels to the narrative in Numbers and indicate that Balaam was a well-known seer in the larger Canaanite cultural context.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, Pharaoh’s Counselors: Job, Jethro and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1983); and G. H. van Kooten and J. van Ruiten, eds., The Prestige of the Pagan Prophet: Balaam in Judaism, Early Christianity and Islam (2008). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Balfour Declaration. This November 2, 1917, statement by *Britain’s Foreign Secretary, Arthur James Balfour, was made in a letter to Lord Walter *Rothschild, a prominent British Zionist leader. It was a result, at least in part, of material support provided to the Allied cause in *World War I by Jewish soldiers and by the notable contribution of Dr. Chaim *Weizmann (1874–1952), who aided the British war effort through his discovery of a process for producing acetone (a vital element in gunpowder). Weizmann, a Russian Jewish immigrant to Great Britain and a leader of the World Zionist Organization, gained access to the highest levels of the British government and helped secure this declaration: that “His Majesty’s Government view with favor the establishment in *Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.” This statement was the first recognition of Jewish national aspirations and of *Zionism as a political movement by one of the “Great Powers” and was greeted with enormous elation in many sectors of the world Jewish community. In 1922 the League of Nations recognized “the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine” and incorporated the Balfour Declaration into its “Mandate for Palestine,” which it awarded to Britain. See also BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE; ISRAEL, STATE OF; FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ZIONISM.

Balkans. The Balkans, the region of Europe incorporating *Greece, the former Yugoslav republics, and *Bulgaria, has been home to a Jewish population for millennia. At its peak at the end of the nineteenth century, the Jewish population of the region numbered about 250,000.

The region’s Jews fall into three broad categories: *Romaniote, *Ashkenazic, and *Sephardic. The Romaniote is the oldest but smallest group; they are “indigenous” Jews whose origins in the region lie in the *Roman period, in the centuries before and after the start of the Common Era. According to legend, many of these early Jews first came to the Balkans as Roman slaves, but sources on early Romaniote history are scarce and the actual time and circumstances of Jewish arrival are difficult to establish.

Ashkenazic Jews first arrived in the Middle Ages, over the course of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, in the wake of expulsions from *England, *France, and *Germany. A later wave of Ashkenazim came toward the end of the eighteenth century, after the partition of *Poland and *Lithuania. Most of the migrating Ashkenazim, from both the Middle Ages and the later period, settled in the northern Balkans (that is, today’s *Romania and *Hungary) but some moved further south into the Balkan peninsula.

The *Sephardim are the third and largest group of Balkan Jews; they came to the region in waves after the decrees of Jewish expulsion from *Spain (1492) and *Portugal (1497). In terms of the distribution of Jewish communities in the region, the northern portion of the former Yugoslavia, now Slovenia and Croatia, was historically dominated by Ashkenazim and the southern areas, which are today Serbia and Montenegro, were a center for Sephardim, with about 70,000 total in the region in the early twentieth century.

Overwhelmingly, the Jewish history of the Balkans is an *Ottoman history. It was during the Ottoman period that Jews settled in the region in greatest numbers, and this is when they enjoyed their greatest economic, cultural, and spiritual prosperity. After the expulsions from the Iberian Peninsula at the end of the fifteenth century, the Ottoman Empire famously encouraged Jews to settle in newly conquered Ottoman lands, mainly in the Balkans. The Ottoman Empire provided an environment in which Jews were treated with a high degree of tolerance and granted a number of privileges. Of course, the degrees of “tolerance” and “privilege” are widely debated, as is the extent to which Ottoman lands were truly a place of peaceful religious cohabitation; however, it is widely accepted that, compared to contemporaneous regimes, the Ottomans provided a significantly persecution-free haven.

The relative comfort of Jewish life in the region is reflected in the fact that Western Jewish culture reached one of its cultural and economic peaks in the Ottoman Balkans. It is in the Ottoman Balkans that a rich *Ladino literary tradition developed, with Ladino *printing and a widely varied Ladino press that was disseminated throughout the region. Balkan Jews also developed a powerful and hugely learned Sephardic rabbinic establishment and created a far-flung and influential trade network that was largely sustained by Jewish merchants.

Jewish fortunes were largely propelled by the Ottoman context; with its demise, Jewish security went into decline. After *World War I and the dismantling of the Ottoman Empire, the Balkan territories were carved into numerous smaller states, with Bulgaria, Greece, and Macedonia battling to gain control of the region’s most important city, Salonika, where the plurality of the population was Sephardic. Despite unsuccessful efforts in the interwar period to turn Salonika and its hinterland into an autonomous international zone, Jewish interests were swept away in the region's fierce commitment to nation-building.

With the arrival of *World War II, close to half of Balkan Jewry was deported. Only Bulgaria, a German ally, did not permit deportation of its Jewish citizens. This was in response to popular protests and after Bulgaria agreed to the deportation of non-native Jews in Bulgarian-occupied zones. Although Bulgaria's 50,000 Jews survived the war, virtually all emigrated to *Israel after the creation of the state in 1948. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, there are well under ten thousand Jews in the Balkans, once home to one of the most prosperous and intellectually accomplished Jewish communities in history.

Recent research includes E. Benbassa and A. Rodrigue, The Jews of the Balkans: The Judeo-Spanish Community, 15th–20th Centuries (1995); P. B. Gordiejew, Voices of Yugoslav Jewry (1998); and S. Schwartz, Sarajevo Rose: A Balkan Jewish Notebook (2005). Map 9 K. E. FLEMING

Baltic States. Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia emerged as separate geographic and political entities in 1918. Jewish settlement in Lithuania goes back to the fourteenth century; in 1388 local Jews, also known as Litvaks, received their first charter from the Grand Duke of Lithuania. By the second half of the eighteenth century, the Commonwealth of *Poland-Lithuania was home to the world's largest Jewish population. Between 1623 and 1796 Lithuanian Jews regulated their affairs through the *Council of Lithuania (Va'ad Medinat Lita). The rabbinic leader and talmudic scholar Elijah, the *Vilna Gaon (1720–1797), was instrumental in halting the spread of *Hasidism in Lithuania. The territories of the former Grand Duchy of Lithuania were incorporated into the Russian *Pale of Settlement after the third partition of Poland in 1795. By 1897 the Jewish population of Lithuania was 753,000, 14.4% of the total population. In the nineteenth century *Vilna (Vilnius), the capital city, was a preeminent center of Jewish learning, informally referred to as the "Jerusalem of Lithuania"; the first government-sponsored rabbinical seminary in the Russian Empire opened in Vilna in 1847. The *Musar movement, which was highly influential in the non-Hasidic yeshivah world of *Eastern Europe, originated in Lithuania. Lithuania may also be considered the cradle of modern Jewish politics. Both the largest Jewish socialist organization, the *Bund, and the religious *Zionist party, *Mizrahi, were founded in Vilna, in 1897 and 1902 respectively.

Jews in Latvia were fewer in number and less homogeneous. As a center of foreign trade, the city of Riga attracted Jewish merchants, who tended to be well educated and spoke German and Russian. In 1914 the Latvian Jewish population was 185,000. The first Jewish communities in present-day Estonia were founded by former Jewish soldiers (cantonists) in the 1860s. At its peak, the Estonian Jewish population numbered 5,500. During World War I, the Russian Army expelled 240,000 Baltic Jews on charges of disloyalty.

The proportion of Jews in the general population was highest in interwar Lithuania (7.5%), followed by 5.3% in Latvia; Jews were never more than 0.4% of the population in Estonia. All three countries enacted a limited cultural autonomy for their Jewish minorities, most extensively in Estonia in 1925. The Lithuanian authorities were particularly eager to cultivate Jewish voters in an attempt to recover Vilnius from Poland. The descent into authoritarianism (in Lithuania in 1926, in Estonia and Latvia in 1934) increased economic pressure on the Jews, who had hitherto controlled a substantial share of industry and foreign trade. Simultaneously, the Baltic governments cracked down on local fascist parties, which had pursued antisemitic agendas. Anti-Jewish *pogroms had broken out during the struggle for Vilnius in 1919; they recurred in 1939 when the city was incorporated into Lithuania. The Soviet occupation and annexation of the Baltic States in the summer of 1940 enabled Jews to enter government service in large numbers. Jews constituted more than 10% (17% in Lithuania) of the individuals deported by Russian security forces from the Baltic States on June 14, 1941.

Up to 15,000 Latvian Jews and three-quarters of Estonian Jews managed to flee to Russia before the arrival of German troops in July and August 1941. Partially instigated, but sometimes spontaneous, a series of pogroms rolled over Lithuania and Latvia (but not Estonia). One of the best documented, as well as most vicious, massacres took place on June 27 in Kaunas. However, most of the killing in 1941 was carried out, under the auspices of the German Security Police, by the Arājs Commando in Latvia and the Hamann Commando in Lithuania. Staffed with Latvians and Lithuanians, these two units murdered approximately 22,000 Jews in Latvia and 39,000 Jews in Lithuania. The largest mass executions of Jews took place on October 29 at 9th Fort in Kaunas (ca. 10,000) and on November 8 and December 12 at Rumbula near Riga (25,000). Later during the war, Lithuanian, Latvian, and to a lesser extent Estonian police battalions participated in atrocities in *Belorussia (White Russia) and *Ukraine. The 963 Jews who stayed in Estonia were apprehended and executed by the Estonian Security Police acting on German orders. Estonia thus became the first country in Europe proclaimed "free of Jews" at the notorious *Wannsee Conference in January 1942. By that time close to 90% of Latvian Jews and 80% of Lithuanian Jews were dead as well.

The remaining Baltic Jews were confined to *ghettos, most of which were established in the autumn of 1941. The largest were in Vilnius, Kaunas, Šiauliai, Riga, Daugavpils, and Liepāja. In late 1941 and 1942, the Germans deported 22,000 German and *Czech Jews to ghettos in Latvia and Estonia. The ghetto population was gradually reduced, and the ghettos themselves were liquidated on Himmler's order of June 21, 1943. About 10,000 Jews from the Vilnius and Kaunas ghettos were deported to Estonia where they were imprisoned in nineteen forced labor camps, working in synthetic oil production and building defenses. Some 45% of camp inmates survived, having been shipped to Stutthof concentration camp in Poland in the summer of 1944. The last mass execution on Baltic soil, of 1,634 Jews, took place at Klooga camp near Tallinn on September 19, 1944. The death toll of Jews in Estonia in 1941–44 is estimated at 8,500, with a survival rate of 37%. In Latvia, at the same time, 65% of the pre-war Jewish population or 61,000 Jews perished. The death rate among Lithuanian Jews was the highest anywhere in Nazi-occupied Europe, reaching 95% or 195,000. The "Righteous Among the Nations" database contains the names of 693 Lithuanian, 103 Latvian, and 3 Estonian rescuers.

The Latvian Jewish community was the largest (36,592 in 1959) and most vital of the Soviet Baltic Republics. Riga became a center of the *Soviet Union Jewish movement; nine defendants in the 1970 Leningrad hijacking trial were from Riga. In the second decade of the twenty-first century, approximately 3,200 Jews are living in Lithuania, 9,800 in Latvia, and fewer than 2,000 in Estonia. Major Jewish cultural institutions include the Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum (est. 1988) and the Jewish Museum in Riga (est. 1990). In 2006 a new *synagogue was unveiled in downtown Tallinn, Estonia.

For further reading, see E. Mendelsohn, The Jews of East Central Europe (1983); idem, On Modern Jewish Politics (1993); J. Šteimanis, History of Latvian Jews (2002); A. Ezergailis, The Holocaust in Latvia (1996); A. Nikzentaitis et al., eds., The Vanished World of Lithuanian Jews (2004); and A. Weiss-Wendt, Murder without Hatred (2009). Maps 8, 11

ANTON WEISS-WENDT

Banking and Banking Houses. Jews began taking up banking and *money lending during the medieval period in areas under Christian and Muslim rule. In Europe, Jews' occupational choices were limited by injunctions against Jewish participation in crafts and agriculture. Simultaneously, ecclesiastic rulings prohibited Christians from charging interest on loans, although many continued to do so. Jews thus came to rely on loan banking and currency exchange as a source of income, often as a supplement to other commercial enterprises. Both women and men were engaged in banking, mostly on a modest scale, making small amounts of capital available to local merchants, craftsmen, and farmers.

On a far grander scale, the *Central European “*Court Jews” of the Early Modern period were generally attached to a specific absolutist regime. These wealthy Jews were retained to manage the royal treasury, facilitate tax collection, fund a ruling monarch's military operations, and import luxury items for his court. Jewish experience with transferable capital, their international connections with commercially active Jewish communities in cities throughout the *Diaspora, and their literacy and multilingualism gave them a decisive advantage in this early developmental phase of global capitalism. Modern banking houses, defined as independent transnational financial institutions engaged in capital investment, commerce, and industry, without attachment to any government, emerged during the Napoleonic Wars of the early nineteenth century. The *Rothschild family is generally credited with having established the first modern Jewish banking house. Founded in the 1780s by Mayer Amschel Rothschild, a Frankfurt-based coin dealer, the company was tapped by the British government to fund its anti-Napoleonic efforts. The House of Rothschild opened branches in London, Naples, *Vienna, and Paris; each office was run by one of Mayer's five sons. They were at the forefront of the creation of the international bond market, which enabled capitalists to subsidize government loans. The bond market made new capital available for national projects and proved fantastically profitable for the Rothschilds.

Although Jews did not hold a monopoly on European banking in the nineteenth century, many of the era's most prominent banking houses were founded and run by Jews. In Germany, the Oppenheim, Bleichröder, Bischoffsheim, Mendelssohn, and Warburg families each established successful firms, financing industrial development (and especially railroad construction) on nearly every continent. In England, the Goldsmid family firm predated the Rothschilds, and Ernest Cassel and Moses *Montefiore collaborated and competed with Nathan Rothschild's London office. In *Russia, the Günzberg family of *Saint Petersburg established commercial banks in Kiev and Odessa, as well as in their home city. A few of these bankers were granted hereditary titles of nobility, attaining status and access to circles of power unimaginable for the vast majority of European Jewry.

Jewish financial services played a role in events across the Atlantic as well. Haym Salomon, a Polish immigrant and commission merchant in Great Britain's North American colonies, became a leading financier of the revolutionary cause. He helped the Continental Congress procure loans from *France and subscribed a great deal of his own capital to American nationalizing efforts. It is said that Salomon was never able to collect on those debts and died penniless.

In the nineteenth century, partly as a result of increased German Jewish immigration to the United States, American Jewish banking practices came to resemble the European model. The Seligman brothers, the Lehman brothers, August Belmont, Abraham Kuhn, and Solomon Loeb, all immigrants from *Central Europe, invested in nineteenth-century American industrial and commercial expansion. Although some of these bankers created their vast fortunes from nothing, others began their American careers with significant backing; Belmont, for instance, arrived in North America as an agent of the Rothschilds.

The social practices of these most prominent Jewish bankers varied. Endogamy, which had been practiced by Europe's Court Jews, from whom some nineteenth-century Jewish bankers were descended, was common. Many Jewish banking firms sought to increase their available capital by creating kin relationships with other Jewish houses, fortifying their connections to one another and creating an international and close-knit Jewish socioeconomic elite. Others, however, married out of the Jewish faith or converted to Christianity. *Philanthropy and advocacy were other common undertakings. Some Jewish bankers used their access to power to press for the *emancipation of Jewish communities from occupational and residential restrictions. They also used their personal fortunes to relieve poverty, fund the construction of *synagogues, and underwrite Jewish entrepreneurial endeavors.

Jewish bankers, in their roles both real and imagined, became central characters in European and American *antisemitic rhetoric. Their rapid accumulation of wealth engendered widespread resentment and fed long-standing Gentile suspicions of Jewish financial practices. The Rothschild name was frequently cited in the nineteenth century by those who saw Jews in positions of power as a threat to the public good. The family was collectively referred to as “King of the Jews” and despised by many as bankrollers of tyrants. The role of privately held Jewish banking houses declined in the early decades of the twentieth century, as governments increasingly relied on national or central banks.

For further reading, see S. W. Baron, A. Kahan et al., "Banking and Bankers," and "Moneylending," in Economic History of the Jews, ed. N. Gross (1975); M. Keil, "Public Roles of Jewish Women in Fourteenth and Fifteenth-Century Ashkenaz: Business, Community and Ritual," in C. Cluse, ed., The Jews of Europe in the Middle Ages (2004); N. Ferguson, The House of Rothschild: Money's Prophets, 1798–1848 (1998); and see also COMMERCE: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE; COMMERCE: MODERN EUROPE (1700–1900); and UNITED STATES: ECONOMIC LIFE.

MARNI DAVIS

Bar Kokhba. The Bar Kokhba Revolt, sometimes called the Second Jewish War, took place between 132–135/6 CE and was the final act of Jewish opposition to *Roman rule in the Land of Israel. A large number of rebels joined together under the leadership of Simon bar Koseva; he was also known, in writings of the *Church Fathers, by the *Aramaic term Bar Kokhba, "son of a star," based perhaps on messianic understandings of one of *Balaam's prophecies in Numbers 24:17. Bar Kokhba formed some sort of independent political entity for the rebellion's duration; it had ruling authorities, minted coins (secondary minting over Roman coins), and leased land. Roman victory was achieved only after the Emperor Hadrian sent his most senior general, Julius Severus, the governor of *Britain, to Judea, as well as army units from Pannonia (modern *Hungary).

No ancient literary or historical work provides a firsthand account of the revolt; rather, partial and separate pieces of evidence, sometimes contradictory and sometimes rhetorical, are found in *talmudic literature, the works of Roman historians, the writings of the Church Fathers, and in *Samaritan chronicles. Exceptional archaeological discoveries from this period include Bar Kokhba's letters, discovered in caves in the Judean desert. These caves, including tunnels and underground hideouts, were used throughout the revolt and served as a refuge for the rebels in the war's final days. Also important are numismatic finds, inscriptions on milestones and tombs, as well as research into Roman roads, the fortifications of Beitar, the last stronghold of the rebels, and the Roman camps around it.

According to the Roman historian Cassius Dio (d. ca. 230), in his book on the history of Rome, the direct cause of the rebellion was Emperor Hadrian's decision, when he passed through *Judea in 130 on his way to *Egypt, to reconstruct *Jerusalem as a pagan city with a temple to Jupiter. He also planned to change its name to Aelia Capitolina – Aelia after his own name, Hadrianus Publius Aelius, and Capitolina in honor of Jupiter, whose temple was located on the Capitoline hill at Rome. The revolt did not break out spontaneously; preparations took place over two years, while Hadrian was in the East.

Bar Kokhba himself was more than a simple army commander. His coins designate him nasi, and he also signed his letters with this title, whose meaning is near to "king." In fact, nasi may indicate a status above that of a king, for the prophet *Ezekiel uses this term for the king who will rule at the end of days. According to the Jerusalem *Talmud, when Rabbi *Akiva saw Bar Kokhba, he said, "This is the King *Messiah" (JT Ta'anit iv 68d). The attribution of messianic qualities to Bar Kokhba can be explained in two ways; the first possibility is that he was seen as an eschatological messiah; that is, a redeemer and savior with a divine and supernatural nature. The second, more realistic option is that "messiah" ("anointed one") is simply a title indicating the kingship of Bar Kokhba as an earthly general and leader. The facts that the revolt did not break out spontaneously, that Bar Kokhba's letters deal with small aspects of day-to-day life in different military units, and his style of leadership tilt the balance toward the second possibility. Decisive evidence for this explanation appears in a parallel passage to the reference from the Jerusalem Talmud cited earlier. After Rabbi Akiva's declaration that Bar Kokhba was the messiah, the *midrash compilation Lamentations Rabbah 2.4 relates, "And what did Bar Kokhba do? He received stone missiles on his knee and returned them and killed several people, and this is what Rabbi Akiva was talking about here." In other words, the *messianism of Bar Kokhba was expressed in his exceptional physical strength. Bar Kokhba did not belong to rabbinical circles, but it is clear from his letters that he took care to observe the commandments. He appears as an aggressive general and ruler, involved in the everyday life of his army units. Christian sources describe Bar Kokhba as a murderer and robber and at the same time credit him with supernatural miracles and deeds. It seems unlikely that this literature reflects authentic traditions; instead, it is intended to blacken his reputation and present him as a sort of anti-Christ.

Most of the evidence and finds relate to the area of Judea, where the main part of the Bar Kokhba revolt likely took place. This is reasonable, because the revolt broke out over Jerusalem and its main goal was to free Jerusalem from the Romans. Scholars are divided over whether the revolt also extended to *Galilee and perhaps even to Trans-Jordan. Similarly, there is debate over whether Jerusalem was conquered by the rebels, because almost no coins of the revolt have been discovered in Jerusalem. However, the contemporary historian Appian relates that the city fell into the hands of the rebels and the Roman army had to conquer it again.

The last rebel stronghold was Beitar, located eleven kilometers southwest of Jerusalem on the site of the present-day Arab village called Battir. Bar Kokhba's death there and the fall of the settlement after a siege marked the end of the revolt. The mound or tell next to the village is called Hirbet al-Yehud by the Arabs. An epilogue to the revolt was the attempt by Bar Kokhba's men in the area of Ein Gedi to flee and take refuge in the barely accessible caves found in the rock crevices around the wadis (dry river beds) descending from the Judean desert to the Dead Sea.

After the revolt, the Romans imposed repressive legislation on the Jews of the Land of Israel in general and on the area of Judea in particular. The reactions of the *Rabbis and the people varied: Some tried to carry out forbidden *commandments with modifications or in secret; others contravened the legislation in public and were ready to be killed. Some also left Judaism altogether. See also ELISHA BEN ABUYA; JEWISH WAR, SECOND; MARTYDOM.

AHARON OPPENHEIMER

Bar Mitzvah, literally "son of the commandments," refers to the legal coming of age of a Jewish boy at thirteen. Now an adult according to Jewish law, the boy has responsibility for his own transgressions and is obligated to fulfill all applicable commandments (mitzvot*). He may count in a quorum for communal worship (minyan*) and lead a congregation in prayer. To demonstrate the change in legal status, it became customary for boys to fulfill publicly a ritual obligation on behalf of a congregation. This usually involved a *Torah honor and/or reading from the Torah scroll. In some communities boys would also deliver learned speeches. Parents would generally follow the rite with a festive meal. These celebrations became so lavish in some communities that sumptuary laws were enacted by rabbis to limit spending. This *life-cycle ritual is so important in the mind of Jewish parents that it has been used as leverage to require a minimum of five years of religious *education by the Reform and Conservative movements (see JUDAISM entries). See also BAT MITZVAH. RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Baraita (Aramaic for “external”) refers to a legal tradition from the era of the *Tannaim that is not preserved in the *Mishnah. Many baraitot are compiled in the *Tosefta; others appear in halakhic *midrash collections.

Baraita De-Niddah is a text mentioned by several medieval authors. In 1890, Chaim Horowitz published a manuscript that opened with the statement, “This is the Baraita de-Niddah,” together with shorter, related texts he had found in print and in manuscripts. The long text published by Horowitz (BdN/a) is peculiar. It discusses at length possible consequences to descendants of couples who are not meticulous regarding the laws of the niddah* (the legislation pertaining to a husband’s separation from his menstruating wife), as well as the rewards for those who are. BdN/a insists that strict observance of these laws will ensure clever, healthy, and beautiful sons, whereas negligence may result in offspring deficient in body and spirit. BdN/a also discusses ways in which the menstruating woman (niddah) transmits impurity via breath, nails, hair, saliva, touch, clothes, food, and the like. In many areas, BdN/a is more severe than the canonical talmudic literature; it tries to relate itself to an ancient authority by claiming links to the more rigorous teachings of the school of Shammai against the school of *Hillel, the tradition generally endorsed by talmudic literature.

Horowitz was unsure of the authenticity of the text and of its origins. In Guide of the Perplexed (3:47), Maimonides had declared that practices similar to those in BdN/a were non-Jewish. Horowitz finally opted for a rabbinic origin, concluding that BdN/a was composed around the fourth century CE in *Palestine. He based this attribution on the fact that all the sages mentioned were Palestinian and that the latest among them was Rabbi Tanḥuma of the fourth century. However, the language and the content of BdN/a strongly indicate that it is a later composition, likely from the later part of the first millennium CE. The core was probably composed in Palestine (which might explain its lack of *Aramaic and its fidelity to Palestinian sages) or at least by an author (or authors) with strong Palestinian ties, perhaps from other centers of Hebrew scholarship such as *Italy. Further research is necessary to ascertain BdN/a’s precise date and the location of its composition.

Some scholars have suggested that BdN/a was a direct influence on medieval authorities regarding the laws of niddah, but this cannot be proven. Except perhaps for some short quotations, this work was not widely accessible. Its direct impact was therefore, at best, limited. It is possible, however, to say that the spirit of BdN/a – that severity with regard to the niddah is always the best approach – did influence later authors, even if they had never seen Baraita de-Niddah itself.

For further reading, see E. Marienberg, La Baraita de-Niddah: Un texte juif pseudo-talmudique sur les lois religieuses au sujet de la menstruation, traduit de l’hébreu et présenté (2011).

EVYATAR MARIENBERG

Barak, Ehud (b. 1942 as Ehud Brog) served as Israel’s tenth prime minister between 1999 and 2001. Born on Kibbutz Mishmar Hasharon, Barak changed his name when he joined the Israel Defense Forces in 1959. During a thirty-five-year military career, he served as commander of an elite unit, tank brigade commander, armored division commander, and head of the Military Intelligence Directorate; he is among Israel’s most highly decorated soldiers. In 1991 he was appointed Chief of the General Staff. After his election as prime minister, Barak withdrew Israeli troops from Lebanon in 2000. In the same year, he undertook peace negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization, participating in the ultimately unsuccessful negotiations at Camp David under the leadership of President Bill Clinton. His party was defeated in elections held in 2001. Barak regained leadership of the Labor Party in 2007 and holds the role of Defense Minister in the coalition government elected in 2009.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Baron de Hirsch Fund, one of several philanthropic entities to facilitate the emigration of Eastern European Jews, was created by German financier and railroad magnate Baron Maurice de Hirsch (1831–1896). Founded in 1891, the organization focused on Jewish immigrants in *New York City, funding a range of Americanizing efforts, including English-language classes for children and adults, classes in hygiene for mothers, and technical and industrial training opportunities. The Fund is best remembered for its *agricultural colonies; it was the Baron’s hope that Jewish immigrants would leave the crowded Lower East Side for rural climes and choose a life of farming over trade-oriented occupations. The Fund established a Jewish farming community and agricultural college in Woodbine, New Jersey, and organized dozens of Jewish farming associations in the Northeastern and Midwestern United States, as well as in *Argentina and *Canada. Few of these farming communities and associations lasted beyond a generation or two.

MARNI DAVIS

Baseball: See SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL

Basketball: See SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASKETBALL

Bat Mitzvah, literally “daughter of the commandment,” refers to the legal age of twelve and a half, at which time a Jewish girl is considered an adult. Originally linked to puberty, it marked the moment when the responsibility for a girl’s transgressions passed to her and when she became obligated to observe *commandments incumbent on Jewish women. No public ceremony was linked to this rite of passage until the early twentieth century in America when Rabbi Mordecai *Kaplan decided that the eldest of his four daughters should mark the occasion in his *synagogue. Since then Bat Mitzvah has become a parallel rite to *Bar Mitzvah in the more liberal movements of *Judaism, with girls having *Torah honors and leading the congregation in prayer. Among the Modern Orthodox, girls may give learned speeches at a festive meal or have a Torah honor in an all-women's service. Because few women had the opportunity to celebrate a public coming of age ceremony before the 1960s, adult Bat Mitzvah has been instituted in many Reform and Conservative synagogues. Often, after several years of study a group of women conduct the *Sabbath service for their congregation. RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Bathsheba was the daughter of Eliam (or Ammiel, 1 Chron 3:5) and wife of Uriah the Hittite. 2 Samuel 11–12 describes how King *David invited Bathsheba into a sexual relationship while her husband Uriah the Hittite was absent, fighting with David's army. Bathsheba conceived a child and David recalled Uriah to *Jerusalem, attempting to cover up the affair. When Uriah refused the opportunity to sleep at home, David engineered his death in battle. After David's marriage to Bathsheba, the *prophet Nathan delivered *God's rebuke through a parable about a wealthy man who took a poor man's sole ewe lamb; Nathan predicted that henceforth "the sword shall never depart from your House." Although David repented, his prayers that God spare the child conceived in adultery were unsuccessful. Bathsheba's second son is *Solomon, who is "favored" by God (2 Sam 11–12). 1 Kings 1:11–31 details Nathan's and Bathsheba's interventions with the dying David to ensure that Solomon would succeed to the throne rather than his half-brother Adonijah. KATE FRIEDMAN

Bavli: See TALMUD, BABYLONIAN

Begin, Menachem (1913–1992). Born in Brest-Litovsk, *Poland, Begin attended a *Mizrachi (*Orthodox *Zionist) Hebrew school and then a Polish gymnasium (high school). He earned a law degree from Warsaw University in 1935. A leader of Betar, the youth movement associated with the Zionist Revisionist movement, Begin traveled extensively on the organization's behalf. In 1939 he became head of the Betar movement in Poland. At the start of *World War II, Begin was arrested and held in Russian prisons and labor camps until he was released under the Sikorski-Mayski Agreement. In 1941, he arrived in *Palestine and soon began working with Irgun Zvati Leumi (Etzel); by 1944 he was leading the organization's operations against the *British Mandate over Palestine. When the State of *Israel was established, Begin agreed to disband the Irgun and deploy its fighters and weapons to the Israel Defense Forces. This was accomplished, although not without conflict with the new Prime Minister David *Ben-Gurion. In August of 1948, Begin and other Irgun leaders formed the Herut party. In 1965, Herut and the Liberal Party were combined into the Gahal party with Begin as its leader. In June 1967, Begin joined the Government of National Unity and served as Minister without Portfolio for more than three years. In 1973, Begin agreed to Ariel *Sharon's plan to combine Gahal and other opposition parties to form the Likud party. In 1977, Likud became the largest party in the Knesset, and Begin became prime minister of the State of Israel. With the help of his cabinet, Begin negotiated the Camp David Accords and signed the Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty in 1979. He was later awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his role in the negotiations, although the Likud party was critical of his willingness to cede territory. In 1981, he ordered the destruction of Osirak, Iraq's nuclear reactor. He authorized the Israel Defense Forces to invade Lebanon in 1982, hoping for a short involvement that would force the Palestine Liberation Organization out of southern Lebanon. However, there was no quick victory, and support for the war waned, particularly after the Sabra and Shatila Massacre in 1982. Begin retired from politics in 1983 and was succeeded as prime minister by Yitzhak Shamir. See also ISRAEL, STATE OF; FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE; ISRAEL, STATE OF; MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY BODIES; ISRAEL, STATE OF; POLITICAL PARTIES. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Beilis Trial. The 1913 blood libel trial of Menahem Mendel Beilis (1874–1934) in Kiev was one of the most notorious episodes of *antisemitism in Imperial *Russia.

In March 1911 the body of a thirteen-year-old boy, Andrei Iushchinskii, was discovered in a cave. He had died from multiple stab wounds. A gang of thieves had committed the murder because they feared that the boy, their lookout, would report their activities to the police.

Mendel Beilis, a clerk at a brick factory on whose property Iushchinskii's body was found, was arrested on suspicion of the murder in July 1911. Beilis was identified as the "man with the black beard," whom witnesses claimed they saw with Iushchinskii. Beilis was brought to trial in September and October 1913. The indictment charged that he had committed the murder "out of religious fanaticism, for ritual purposes," to harvest the maximum possible quantity of blood from the body so that it might be consumed.

Beilis was indisputably the victim of a web of political intrigues among tsarist officials. Some sought to win favor with Nicholas II; others were responding to pressure from antisemitic journalists and rabble-rousers. Yet, there is little evidence of a deliberate conspiracy at the highest levels of the tsarist state. The prosecution's case rested on hearsay, dubious "expert" opinion about the Jews' blood-drinking proclivities, and a number of witnesses who were either rabid antisemites or deranged. The defense boasted some of the finest lawyers in late Imperial Russia, and they had no difficulty in proving Beilis's innocence and the guilt of the criminal band who had actually committed the murder. As the prosecution's case unraveled, even some leading antisemites spoke out against the trial as a farce besmirching Russia's reputation. Although the jury of mostly peasants acquitted Beilis of the crime, they upheld the prosecution's indictment that Iushchinskii had probably been killed to harvest his blood. Thus, the possibility was left open that some Jews, if not Beilis, did indeed commit *ritual murder to collect the blood of Christian children. After his acquittal, Beilis emigrated first to *Palestine and then, in 1920, to the *United States where he lived until his death. See also RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION.

DANIEL BEER

Beit Din, literally, "house of law," is the Hebrew term for a court of law (see also COURTS). The plural form is batei din. Traditionally, batei din have been made up of rabbis or other scholars of Jewish law. In *Second Temple times, there was a supreme beit din of seventy-one sages called the *Sanhedrin, lesser Sanhedrin courts of twenty-three judges, and minor courts of three adjudicators. Today, one only finds courts of three. The contemporary courts generally convene on civil or family matters. In the past, criminal and capital crimes were handled in the larger twenty-three- and seventy-one-member courts. Even in rabbinic times, the courts of three could be staffed by people who were not rabbis. Since these courts dealt with less serious matters, the determination was made that the flow of commerce required available adjudication, which would be made easier by allowing laypeople to serve.

In contemporary Jewish life, cities with a large Jewish population both in *Israel and the *Diaspora have permanently constituted rabbinic courts. These courts are constituted as binding arbitration panels in places like the *United States and *Britain. Both litigants accept the decision of the court as determinative. In Israel, the authority of the courts is given by the government. Those who do not prefer to use a sitting court may use a method known by its acronym, pronounced zabla. Under this system, each litigant chooses one judge, and the two judges agree on the third. The parties then sign a binding arbitration agreement to accept this panel's decision.

Proceedings in a rabbinic court are usually much quicker (usually no more than one or two days) and generally much less expensive than those in secular courts. Although a litigant may have a representative (to'evin), the participants generally are encouraged to speak, and rules of evidence are much looser than in secular courts. Independent evaluations have shown that these proceedings generally produce fair and equitable results. This is particularly true because a beit din can be empaneled to decide the case in a way that allows for each side to score a partial victory. The decision will reflect how well each side has made its case instead of simply determining that one litigant is the winner and the other the loser. For example, if it is appropriate, the beit din may allow for a 75/25 split of disputed property. This practice is called peshara karov le'din. BARRY FREUNDEL

Belarus: See BELORUSSIA

Bel and the Dragon is an apocryphal addition to the book of *Daniel, found in the Greek *Bible and other versions; it consists of two stories. In the first, Daniel proves that the offerings given to the statue of Bel are consumed by the priests, not by the god, and he causes the sacred snake to burst by feeding it a lethal mixture. In the second story, Daniel is cast into the lions' den, as in Daniel 6, but *Habakkuk is transported from *Judea by the hair of his head to bring Daniel a stew. In the end, the king acknowledges the *God of Daniel.

These stories were composed in either *Hebrew or *Aramaic. There is a medieval Aramaic text, but its authenticity is disputed. The apocryphal work is not necessarily dependent on canonical Daniel, although it shares the motif of the lions' den. For further reading, see J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (1993), 405–439.

JOHN J. COLLINS

Belgium. The earliest written evidence of Jews in Belgium dates from 1261 when Duke Henry III ordered all Jews and usurers expelled from the Brabant province. Christian efforts at forced conversion in 1309 led to the murders of many Jews, but under the protection of Duke John II the community was rebuilt and grew when expelled Jews from other areas of Europe began settling there. The medieval community was largely destroyed by persecutions prompted by the outbreak of the Black Death in 1348 and by host desecration charges in 1370. In the sixteenth century, conversos from *Spain and *Portugal settled in Antwerp and played an important role in building the diamond, sugar, and banking industries. By the seventeenth century, Antwerp Jews held synagogue services in secret and were often visited by Jewish merchants from *Amsterdam.

After Belgium came under Austrian rule in 1713 many *Ashkenazi Jews settled there; subsequent French (1794–1814) and Dutch (1814–1830) rulers further enhanced the freedom and autonomy of Belgian Jews. When Belgium declared its independence in 1831, it instituted religious *emancipation, and the Jewish community flourished, particularly in Antwerp and Brussels. The Jewish population in Belgium numbered between 65,000 and 75,000 in 1940 when the country was invaded by *Nazi *Germany. Most were Jews from other European countries who had found refuge in Belgium after World War I. Non-Jews made unusual efforts to hide Jews during the German occupation; perhaps as many as 25,000 Jews were hidden in Belgian homes. At the same time, some Belgian officials actively cooperated with *Nazi directives to register, round up, and deport Jews. By the time Belgium was liberated from the *Nazis in September 1944, about 44% of its Jewish population had been deported to concentration camps, primarily *Auschwitz, and approximately 25,000 perished. After World War II, the Jewish community in Belgium slowly rebuilt, and the government remained supportive. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, about 40,000 Jews live in Belgium; the largest communities are in Antwerp and Brussels.

For further reading, see D. Michman, Belgium and the Holocaust: Jews, Belgians, Germans (1998).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Belorussia (BELARUS; WHITE RUSSIA). Referred to by Jews as Raysn (in *Yiddish), Belorussia was part of *Poland-*Lithuania from the fourteenth to the eighteenth century and was annexed to the *Russian Empire between 1772 and 1795. In 1920, eastern parts of Belorussia were brought under Soviet rule and became the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR). The Republic of Belarus was established in 1991 after the collapse of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR).

Jews first settled in the towns of Belorussia during the fourteenth century. The Lithuanian Grand Duke Vitautas granted charters to the Jews of Brest (Brisk) and Grodno as early as 1388 and 1389, respectively. The Jewish communities of Pinsk (1506) and Nowogrodek (1539) were among the first to be founded. In the eighteenth century, 40% of Lithuanian Jewry lived in the territory of Belorussia; the largest and most important communities were those of Minsk, Pinsk, and Shklov. During the nineteenth century Jews formed the majority of the population in the main cities of the region (52.3% in Minsk, 52.4% in Vitebsk, 74.2% in Pinsk, and 54.8% in Gomel). They engaged primarily in commerce, handicrafts, tax collection, lease-holding, small trade, and peddling; the vast majority were relatively impoverished.

Belorussia became an important center for Jewish religious scholarship. The first yeshivot were founded in Brest and Grodno at the end of the sixteenth century, and the distinguished talmudist I. Heilperin (1660–1746) taught in late-seventeenth-century Minsk. Two of the most celebrated yeshivot in Eastern Europe were located in Volozhin and Mir. At the end of the 1800s, Jeroham Judah Leib Perelman (1835–1896), known as the “great scholar of Minsk,” taught in the Blumkes kloyz, one of the largest yeshivot in Minsk. Although the “litvish” (Lithuanian) tradition, which took a rational approach, was dominant, one of the fathers of Hasidism*, Schneur Zalman* of Liady, founded Habad* Hasidism in Belorussia.

Jewish Enlightenment, the Haskalah*, penetrated the larger urban centers of Belorussia in the mid-nineteenth century; by the end of the 1800s, modern Jewish political movements (in particular, the socialist Bund* and Zionism*) had emerged in Minsk, Bobruisk, Gomel, and Vitebsk. In 1902, the Second Conference of Russian Zionists was held in Minsk. Bundists and Labor Zionists established self-defense organizations in every town of the region to protect Jews during the wave of pogroms*, especially after the 1903 Gomel pogrom.

Under Soviet rule, the Jews of Belorussia were granted unprecedented political freedoms, civil rights, and opportunities for upward mobility. At the same time Jewish communities were disbanded and all Jewish political parties dismantled. The Jewish sections of the Communist Party* (Evskeksiia) systematically persecuted Jewish religious and Zionist groups, closing down synagogues* and pursuing religious leaders. They also supported the establishment of communist institutions with a Soviet orientation that functioned in the Yiddish language; these included schools, newspapers, clubs, theaters, and courts. Belorussia was the only republic in the USSR whose constitution guaranteed an official status to Yiddish as one of the state languages. However, Yiddish institutions were gradually closed down in the late 1930s and by the late 1940s had been liquidated.

In the eastern part of Belorussia, which was under Soviet rule, Jewish social and economic life remained unchanged, as Jews continued to engage in commerce and crafts. Unlike the Jews of Soviet Belorussia, the Jews of western Belorussia (under Polish rule) experienced social discrimination but enjoyed more cultural freedoms. They established the Tarbut network of Hebrew-language schools, as well as several Zionist youth movements (Betar, Ha-Shomer ha-Tzair, etc.). Jewish religious life continued to flourish here. In 1931, 9.7% of the total population of western Belorussia was Jewish. In September 1939, western Belorussia was annexed to the USSR. Religious activities and Zionist groups were liquidated, and the Hebrew-language schools were turned into Soviet Yiddish schools.

After the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, the Einsatzgruppen* B, under the command of General A. Nebe, and in collaboration with Lithuanian, Ukrainian*, and Belorussian nationalists, identified, concentrated, and killed the great majority of the Jews of Belorussia, as well as the thousands of German, Austrian, and Czech Jews who had been deported there. About 10,000 Jews succeeded in escaping from the Minsk ghetto (established on July 20, 1941), a proportion without parallel in the history of the Holocaust* (H. Smolar, The Minsk Ghetto: Soviet-Jewish Partisans against the Nazis [1989]).

According to the 1959 census, there were 150,000 Jews living in the BSSR (1.9% of the total population); in 1970, the Jewish population was 148,011. With the emergence of the Soviet Union* Jewish revival movement in the 1970s and 1980s, many Jews became active in the struggle for the right to repatriate to Israel*, and thousands emigrated to Israel, North America, and Germany*. In 1999, there were 10,141 Jews living in the Republic of Belarus. Map 11

ELISSA BEMPORAD

Bełżec was one of three temporary Nazi* death camps (the others were Sobibór* and Treblinka*) that were established in response to a 1941 directive, Aktion Reinhard, an SS program designed to murder the remaining 2.3 million Jews in the General Government area of occupied Poland*. Located eighty-five miles southeast of Lublin, Bełżec was chosen for its remoteness, access to rail lines, and close proximity to Jewish populations in the General Government and occupied parts of the Soviet Union*. The Germans, who had built a small forced labor camp for Jews in Bełżec, began construction of the death camp in late 1941. Christian Wirth, Bełżec’s commandant, constructed permanent gas chambers because he did not like bottled carbon monoxide gas and wanted to use diesel engines in his gas chambers.

Once the gassings began in late February 1942, Wirth did everything possible to delude the arriving victims into thinking that they were being sent to a forced labor camp in Germany. He also moved victims quickly to the gas chambers and counted on the confusion and shock of arrival to deter outbursts and protests. It normally took between twenty and thirty minutes to kill everyone in the gas chambers. After the chambers were cleared of carbon monoxide, the bodies were put in mass graves that were covered with small layers of dirt. Between February and December 1942, 600,000 Jews were murdered there. By the end of December 1942, the Germans had killed most of the Jews in the General Government and ordered Bełżec closed. The camp was demolished and converted into a farm to prevent the villagers from plundering the area. The farm was given to one of the camp’s former Ukrainian guards.

See also HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Ben-Gurion, David (1886–1973) was the central figure of the Yishuv* administration throughout the period of the British Mandate* and served as prime minister in Israel*’s first decades (1948–54; 1955–63). Born David Green in Poland* into an ardently Zionist family, Ben-Gurion became a teacher in Warsaw* in 1904 where he joined the socialist Zionist organization, Poalei Zion; he immigrated to Palestine* in 1906 and worked on a collective agricultural settlement. Expelled from Palestine by the Ottomans in 1915 for his political activities, Ben-Gurion advocated for Zionism* in the United States. In 1919, after serving in the Jewish Legion, a unit of the British army created by Vladimir Jabotinsky*, he returned to Palestine, now under British rule. In the 1920s Ben-Gurion worked in Labor Zionist politics (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: POLITICAL PARTIES) and helped establish the Histadrut, the national federation of trade unions. As Secretary General of the Histadrut, Ben-Gurion oversaw the Jewish economy in *British Mandate Palestine and represented the Histadrut in the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency (both of which he chaired in 1935). Associated with Ben-Gurion in the Yishuv leadership and in his tumultuous years as Israel's leader, beginning in 1948, were other prominent figures such as Levi Eshkol (1895–1969), Golda *Meir (1898–1978), and Yitzhak Ben-Zvi (1884–1963). With these colleagues and others, Ben-Gurion built the institutions necessary for the new state, oversaw the settlement of hundreds of thousands of immigrants from Europe and the Middle East, and set the tone for Israel's relations with other countries. Revered as the "Father of the State of Israel," Ben-Gurion spent his retirement years at Kibbutz Sde Boker in the Negev, where he died in 1973. For a recent appraisal of Ben-Gurion and his larger context, see S. Aronson, David Ben-Gurion and the Jewish Renaissance (2010).

Bene Israel ("Children of Israel"), *India's largest Jewish community, numbered 28,000 before Indian independence in 1947. They claim that their ancestors were shipwrecked off the Konkan coast as early as 175 BCE. The survivors took up the occupation of oil pressing, but, as shan-war telis (Saturday oilmen), refrained from work on the Sabbath. When discovered by David Rahabi (possibly in the eighteenth century), the Bene Israel only remembered the shema prayer, which proclaims divine unity. They observed *dietary laws, *circumcision, and many Jewish *festivals, but their religious customs and beliefs were also influenced by local Hindu and Muslim practices.

From the eighteenth century on, the British enlisted members of the Bene Israel in their armies and encouraged them to move out of the villages to the metropolis of Bombay (today Mumbai) and to other urban centers in the Indian subcontinent. A relatively large number of Bene Israel community members pursued higher education and contributed to Indian cultural life. After the establishment of the State of *Israel in 1948, the majority began to emigrate there. In Israel, their Jewishness was questioned, but after a 1964 sit-down strike, Israel's chief rabbis recognized them as "full Jews." Today, more than 60,000 Bene Israel reside in Israel; 4,500 remain in India.

Studies include S. B. Isenberg, India's Bene Israel: A Comprehensive Inquiry and Sourcebook (1988); and S. Weil, "Bene Israel Rites and Routines," in idem, India's Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle (2004).

SHALVA WEIL

Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century). Very little is known about Benjamin ben Jonah of Tudela beyond the information found in his famous Hebrew travel narrative, Sefer ha-Masa'ot (The Book of Travels), which records his journey through Europe and the Islamic world ca. 1166–73. Benjamin's journey started in eastern *Spain, presumably his homeland, and took him through southern *France and *Italy, *Byzantium, *Syria, *Iraq, *Iran, *Arabia, and *Egypt. His account contains valuable observations about people and places along his route, especially about the Jewish communities that he encountered. For a modern edition with an English translation by M. N. Adler, see The Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela: Travels in the Middle Ages (2004); and TRAVEL WRITING: MIDDLE AGES AND EARLY MODERN PERIOD.

OLIVIA REMIE CONSTABLE

Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940), a highly influential literary and cultural critic, was born into a prosperous and acculturated Jewish family in *Berlin. Benjamin was unsuccessful in gaining a Habilitation (post-PhD degree) in German literature at the University of Frankfurt with his study on The Origin of German Tragic Drama. His essay on Goethe's Elective Affinities, published in 1924, brought him his first public recognition, followed by speculative essays on such diverse topics as Proust, Baudelaire, and the theory of translation. Although early friendships with Theodor W. Adorno and Siegfried Kracauer eventually earned him a membership and modest salary from the Institute for Social Research, he remained by temperament a peripatetic and largely independent intellectual, publishing most of his essays in newspapers and literary journals. Benjamin maintained close personal ties with Gershom *Scholem, and some of his writings reveal an interest in the *messianic elements of the Jewish *mystical tradition. He was also drawn to the left-modernist playwright Bertolt Brecht, whose influence can be detected in works such as "The Author as Producer" (1934) and "The Work of Art in the Age of its Mechanical Reproducibility" (1935). In 1933 Benjamin moved to Paris and continued work on his monumental (and never completed) study of the Paris arcades. When the *Nazis invaded *France, Benjamin fled southward, hoping to reach Portugal via Spain. However, at Portbou, on the French border with Catalonia, his group of refugees met the Spanish police. Fearing capture by the Gestapo, Benjamin took an overdose of morphine and died. In one of his final works, "On the Concept of History" (later published by Adorno and Horkheimer in the Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung), Benjamin developed a dramatic and now-famous image of the angel of history as a traumatized figure blown forward in time, even while it gazes backward on the catastrophe called "progress." With their inimitable style of critical-revolutionary insight tinged by melancholy, Benjamin's various works continue to inspire new efforts in philosophy and in literary and cultural criticism. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Walter Benjamin: The Story of a Friendship (1981); and S. Buck-Morss, The Dialectics of Seeing: Walter Benjamin's Arcades-Project (1989).

PETER E. GORDON

Berit: See COVENANT

Berit Milah: See CIRCUMCISION

Berkovits, Eliezer (1908–1992), was a *Romanian-born rabbi and theologian who studied at the Orthodox Hildesheimer Rabbinical Seminary under Rabbi Yeḥiel Weinberg and at the University of *Berlin where he wrote his dissertation on Hume. Berkovits escaped *Germany in 1938. After serving in rabbinical positions in Leeds, Sydney, and *Boston, he taught philosophy at Hebrew Theological Seminary (*Chicago) until 1975. Subsequently he lived and worked in *Jerusalem. He also lectured widely in North America. Berkovits' theological contributions fall under three headings: critical, constructive, and *halakhic. Although he worked in all three areas throughout his career, his publications focused on different facets at various times.

Berkovits' criticism of non-Orthodox Jewish philosophies is primarily found in the studies contained in Major Themes in Modern Philosophies of Judaism (1974). He takes to task thinkers as varied as Hermann *Cohen, *Rosenzweig, *Buber, *Kaplan, and *Heschel for failing to appreciate sufficiently the transcendence of *God. His own positive doctrine is found in God, Man and History: A Jewish Interpretation (1959), Prayer (1962), and Man and God: Studies in Biblical Theology (1969). He also wrote a book-length response to Toynbee's characterization of Judaism (Judaism, Fossil or Ferment? [1956]).

Berkovits' philosophical Faith after the Holocaust (1973) and the narrative With God in Hell: Judaism in the Ghettos and Death Camps (1979) comprise his major contribution to *Holocaust theology. One distinctive thesis is his claim that any theological justification or theodicy in response to evils like the *Holocaust can only be authentically made by persons who have experienced them, not by bystanders. It is for this reason that the testimony of those who endured the Holocaust is so important, and those who suffered and lost their faith cannot be judged. This caveat does not prevent Berkovits from also formulating a version of the free will defense as an interpretation of evil.

Conditions in Marriage and Divorce ([Hebrew] 1966), Berkovits' first halakhic book, is a conventional rabbinic argument for a radical conclusion: He argued that by making *marriage conditional on future compliance with arbitration, those marriages where one partner's recalcitrance prevents the execution of a halakhically valid divorce can be annulled retroactively. Despite a letter of approbation from the venerable Rabbi Weinberg, this solution did not receive serious attention. Another book-length monograph is on causality in halakhah.

Additional books on the method and content of halakhah include Halakhah: Authority and Role ([Hebrew] 1981) and a parallel English volume, Not in Heaven, as well as Jewish Women in Time and Torah. In these works, Berkovits strove to identify an unchanging, objective set of principles underlying biblical and rabbinic teaching. He argued that practical halakhic rulings must be measured against that standard and that, in some instances, established case law must be revised to conform to the higher principles. Notable examples are some laws distinguishing between men and *women regarding marriage and the performance of commandments, which Berkovits regarded as unjust, and the requirement of full commitment to Jewish practice as a condition of *conversion, which today may undermine the ideal of Jewish unity.

SHALOM CARMY

Berlin, founded in the thirteenth century, was the capital of Prussia (originally the Electorate of Brandenburg) until 1871 and then the capital of *Germany from 1871 to 1945 and from 1991 to the present. Jews, who first settled in Berlin and its vicinity in the late thirteenth century, were expelled several times, notably in 1510 and 1573. They were readmitted in 1671 under extremely strict economic and demographic restrictions, which favored the settlement of wealthy Jews.

In the late eighteenth century, Berlin was the site of the first major Jewish Enlightenment movement (Haskalah*), which was associated with Moses *Mendelssohn and his followers. After Mendelssohn's death in 1786, this movement went into a radical phase, lasting until about 1830, which was marked by the rejection of traditional Jewish practices, freer sexual mores, and the *conversion to Christianity of a considerable number of Berlin Jews, especially among the elite. After Prussian Jews were given most of the rights of citizens in 1812, the city was one of the centers of the fledgling Reform movement until the government closed the Reform Temple in 1823 (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY).

The Jewish population of Berlin, which hovered between three and four thousand until the 1820s, grew at an accelerated pace to 9,604 in 1849, 36,015 in 1871, and 90,013 in 1910. By that year there were also another 40,000 Jews in the wealthy western Berlin suburbs that were incorporated into Greater Berlin in 1920. In 1925 the Jewish population reached its highest point of 172,674 (more than 4% of the total Berlin population and nearly one-third of all the Jews of Germany). In the early twentieth century, the Jews of central Berlin, consisting to a considerable extent of recent *Eastern European immigrants, differed greatly from the wealthy and more acculturated Jews of the city's western sections near the Kurfürstendamm, a broad boulevard known for its fine shops, hotels, and restaurants.

The organized Jewish community had an extensive network of institutions, including more than a dozen large *synagogues. Some were *Orthodox, but most were Liberal (moderately Reform), including the Fasanenstrasse and Oranienburgerstrasse synagogues with several thousand seats each. Most of Germany's Jewish organizations had their headquarters in Berlin. However, a large percentage of the city's Jews rarely took part in religious activities; by the late 1920s the rate of *intermarriage in Berlin was just above one-quarter of all Jews marrying. In addition to their important contributions to the city's economy (especially in the clothing industry, department stores, the press, retail and wholesale *commerce, and the legal and medical professions), Jews played a major role in Berlin's thriving cultural life during the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Among numerous leading Jewish names in Berlin public life were the scientists Fritz Haber and Albert *Einstein, the painters Lesser Ury and Max Liebermann, the theater director Max Reinhardt, the statesman Walther Rathenau, the publishers Mosse and Ullstein, and the musicians Kurt Weill, Bruno Walter, and Otto Klemperer.

The situation of Berlin Jews deteriorated rapidly after the *Nazis gained power in 1933. The anonymity of the big city and the rich network of Jewish institutions helped cushion the blow, but more than half of Berlin's Jews departed by 1939. Between late 1941 and early 1943, most remaining Jews were deported to ghettos and extermination camps in *Poland from which few returned. A few thousand Jews were able to survive in hiding (see HOLOCAUST entries).

After World War II the community was reestablished by camp survivors and returnees from abroad, but the Jewish population numbered only a few thousand and was concentrated in West Berlin. Beginning in the mid-1990s, migration from the former *Soviet Union led to rapid growth; Berlin's Jewish population in 2008 numbered more than 12,000. The new Jewish *museum, the memorial to the victims of the *Holocaust (see HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS), and the Centrum Judaicum in the restored Oranienburgerstrasse synagogue building are among the signs of a revived Jewish presence in Berlin.

STEVEN M. LOWENSTEIN

Beruriah. According to rabbinic tradition, Beruriah was the wife of the second-century sage, R. Meir, and she is said to have been unusually learned. Certainly, a number of rabbinic passages portray a woman named Beruriah as demonstrating a profound knowledge of rabbinic biblical exegesis, a sophisticated ability to manipulate traditional texts, and a quick wit. Examples of her astuteness appear in BT Pesahim 62b, BT Berakhot 10a, and BT 'Eruvin 53b-54a. Yet aggadic praises of Beruriah's supposed halakhic skills have something of an illusory quality because, except for one ruling in *Tosefta Kelim Bava Metzia 1:6, no actual legal traditions attributed to her appear in rabbinic literature. This single ruling reappears in Mishnah Kelim 11:4, but this time with no reference to Beruriah. It seems that, over time, Beruriah's reputed scholarly expertise became a problem for *rabbinic Judaism. In a medieval reference she is shown to reap the tragic consequences of the "lightmindedness" inherent in women: The eleventh-century commentator Solomon ben Isaac (*Rashi) relates a tradition in his commentary on BT Avodah Zarah 18b that Beruriah was seduced by one of her husband's students and subsequently committed suicide.

Recent scholarship has shown that the Beruriah who appears in the Babylonian *Talmud is a literary construct with little historical reality. Nor can any credence be given to Rashi's account of her ignominious downfall. However, Tal Ilan has convincingly argued that the early *tannaitic Tosefta ruling attributed to someone named Beruriah must be taken as historical and that in many ways the Rabbis of the amoraic period were as amazed by this citation as modern readers. She suggests that the composition and preservation of the later Babylonian Talmud traditions about Beruriah, built around the faint historical memory of an actual woman capable of making subtle legal distinctions, reflect the Rabbis' astonishment at such a "wonder-woman." Others have suggested that the Beruriah narratives express rabbinic dubiousness over the possibility of a woman fitting into a male scholarly world in which her gender was bound to be a source of havoc. Rabbinic society insisted on sharply defined and controlled categories of being in which each gender had a particular set of roles and obligations; this is why later teachings downgraded and denigrated the contributions and character of the anomalous Beruriah. For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, Midrashic Women (2002); T. Ilan, Integrating Women into Second Temple History (1999); and WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Beth El ("house of God"), is a religious site located some twelve miles (19 km) north of *Jerusalem, on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin (Josh 16:1-4). Formerly named Luz, its biblical stature as a holy place was second in importance only to Jerusalem. God appeared there to *Abraham (Gen 12:8) and to *Jacob ("Jacob's ladder" in Gen 28:10-22). Later narratives continue to emphasize its importance as a site sacred to the Israelites. *Deborah (Judg 4:5) and the Israelites (Judg 20:18, 26) consulted God there. *Samuel included Beth El in his annual circuit (1 Sam 7:16). King *Jeroboam built sanctuaries there and at Dan, complete with "golden calves," so that the people of the northern kingdom of Israel would have places where they could worship God (1 Kgs 12:25-33). The Beth El sanctuary, often condemned (1 Kgs 13; Amos 3:14), was destroyed by King *Josiah (2 Kgs 23:15-18). Map 2

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Betrothal. The *Talmud, at BT Ketubbot 57a, presents three steps to *marriage: engagement (shiddukhin), betrothal ('erusin / kiddushin), and consummation (nissu'in). Betrothal, which constituted a legally binding marriage, was affirmed by the reading of the marriage contract (ketubbah*), expressing the groom's obligations toward the bride. The engaged man then presented the ketubbah to his fiancée, along with an object of value, in the presence of two witnesses. The marriage was finalized through nissu'in (literally, "elevation"), also known as huppah, when the bride was escorted to her husband's home and benedictions were recited. Often, nissu'in did not take place until a year after the betrothal.

The ketubbah (BT Kiddushin 2a), a rabbinic innovation, protected the wife's financial interests in case of *divorce or widowhood. Although the Babylonian Talmud implies that a woman must agree to her betrothal, from ancient to early modern times, young girls almost always entered into the marriages contracted for them by their parents or guardians. A financially independent adult woman, whether widowed, divorced, or previously unmarried, could usually negotiate her own marriage.

During the Middle Ages, it became usual for betrothal and marriage to take place at the same time. The combined betrothal/wedding ceremony became a public event, authorized and attended by community leaders and celebrated in a *synagogue or communal hall. The earlier ceremony of escorting the bride to the groom's home was replaced with the symbolic public huppah ("marriage canopy"), under which the seven wedding benedictions were recited.

The combined betrothal/marriage was generally preceded by a period of engagement. At the engagement ceremony (shiddukhin) a legal document (tenna'im or "conditions"), fixing the terms of the marriage and defining the penalties and damages to be paid if one of the parties should wish to abandon the match, was signed. Sometimes the endorsement of the tenna'im, which had been negotiated previously, was also advanced to right before the wedding.

Betrothal is invoked throughout Jewish religious literature as a metaphor for the relationship between God and the people of Israel, as in Hosea 2: 21-22, which begins, "And I will betroth you forever."

For further reading, see M. Satlow, Jewish Marriage in Antiquity (2001); R. Biale, Women and Jewish Law (1984); and J. R. Baskin, "Medieval Jewish Models of Marriage," in The Medieval Marriage Scene, ed. S. Roush and C. Baskins (2005), 1-22.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Bialik, Hayyim Nahman (1873-1934), "the national poet" of the *Zionist movement, was the most influential figure in moving Hebrew *poetry into a modern idiom. Also an essayist, story writer, editor, and translator, Bialik was born in Radi, a village in northern *Ukraine. After his father died when he was seven, Hayyim Nahman was raised by his paternal grandfather. Bialik's early childhood appears in his poetry at times as a lost paradise, as in "Zohar" (Radiance, 1901); other poems, however, recall poverty and pain, as in "Shirati" (My Song, 1901).

Bialik's first published poem, "El ha-Tzipor" (To the Bird, 1891), reflects a longing for Zion, which became a major subject in his later work. In 1897 he published "Akhen Hatzir ha-Am" (Surely the People Is Grass), which invokes prophetic language to condemn popular indifference to the Zionist movement. After the 1903 Kishinev *pogrom he published “Al ha-Sheḥitah” (On the Slaughter) and “Be-Ir ha-Harigah” (In the City of Killing, 1904) in which he wrote, “The sun rose, the rye bloomed and the slaughterer slaughtered,” contrasting the innocence of nature with the horror of the massacre. In addition to ideological poetry, Bialik also wrote lyrical poems, such as “Zanah lo Zalzal” (A Twig Fell, 1911), which includes these lines: “Alone I’ll search in the dark and beat/ my head against my wall.”

In 1924, Bialik immigrated to *Tel Aviv where he was received with adulation; the street where he settled was named after him the day he arrived. In Tel Aviv, Bialik wrote very little poetry, but edited, with Y. H. Ravnitsky, Sefer ha-Aggadah (The Book of Legends), an anthology of rabbinic *midrash rendered into modern Hebrew. In 1937 Bialik’s widow, Manya, donated their home to the city of Tel Aviv. Bialik House continues to be open to the public and is often a venue for cultural events. MOSHE RACHMUTH

Bible. The Hebrew Bible comprises twenty-four books (or thirty-nine, if originally combined books such as 1 and 2 *Samuel are counted separately) and is divided into three sections: “*Torah” (Five Books of Moses or Pentateuch), “*Prophets” (Nevi’im), and “*Writings” (Ketuvim). The entire collection is designated by the resulting acronym Tanakh (TaNaKh). Early *Christians, who also considered these books sacred, called them the “Old Testament” to set them apart from the distinctly Christian books that were called the “*New Testament.” Many people today avoid the term “Old Testament,” because they do not wish to imply that the Jewish *covenant (“testament”) was replaced or supplemented by a newer one. However, a satisfactory alternative has not really been found: “Hebrew Bible” overlooks the fact that parts of *Daniel and *Ezra are in *Aramaic, whereas “First Testament” implies the existence of an additional collection of covenantal writings. In what follows, I use the word “Bible” or the term “Jewish Bible.”

The Jewish Bible includes several different kinds of books. Some recount the history of ancient Israel, beginning with the creation of the world through the fall of the Israelite kingdoms and the exiles’ eventual return from *Babylonia (*Genesis through *Kings, *Ezra, *Nehemiah, and *Chronicles). Other books contain *prophetic teachings; the three longest (*Isaiah, *Jeremiah, and *Ezekiel) are designated “Major Prophets,” whereas the remaining twelve shorter books are called the “Minor Prophets” (or “Book of Twelve”). There are also three poetic books, two of which (*Psalms and *Lamentations) contain liturgical *poetry. The third (the *Song of Songs) is a collection of love poems that have traditionally been understood as an allegory; according to Jewish tradition, the book describes God’s relationship with Israel, while Christian interpreters have understood it as portraying Christ’s relationship with the Church. Three other books (*Proverbs, *Job, and *Ecclesiastes/Kohelet) belong to a genre termed *wisdom literature and explore ethical and philosophical issues. *Ruth and *Esther contain short stories; in each the eponymous heroine plays a crucial role in the continuing destiny of Israel. The first half of Daniel is also a narrative, but the book ends with a series of apocalyptic visions of dramatic events prophesied for the future. These categories are not always distinct; significant sections of Exodus-Deuteronomy contain law rather than *narrative (see LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST and HEBREW BIBLE). The book of Job and much of prophetic literature are actually poetic and both Chronicles and Genesis include extensive genealogies as well as narratives.

Modern *biblical scholarship and theology take a variety of approaches to the Hebrew Bible. These include investigations of (1) the original text (“lower criticism”); (2) how biblical books were composed (“higher criticism”); (3) the meanings of individual words and constructions, typically in light of ancient Semitic languages and literatures; (4) the history of ancient Israel and its neighbors; (5) literary features of biblical literature; (6) the ideology of the Bible and its authors, including both its own religious teachings and topics that are of special interest today, such as attitudes toward women; (7) how the Bible has been interpreted over the centuries since it was written; and (8) contemporary religious messages that can be derived from the Bible.

This research has yielded significant insights into each genre of biblical literature. For example, contemporary scholarship agrees that the first eleven chapters of Genesis, often called the “Universal” or “Primordial History,” are more mythlike than historical. Our understanding of them has been greatly illuminated by comparison with literature from other ancient societies that *archeologists have uncovered over the past century and a half.

Wisdom literature is also found in other ancient *Near Eastern cultures. Its pragmatic approach rests on the belief in a universal organizing principle called hokhmah (“wisdom”), which is described in several of the discourses that open the book of Proverbs. Hokhmah resembles the ancient Egyptian concept of Ma’at, which was sometimes personified as a goddess. The books of Ecclesiastes (Kohelet) and Job challenge Proverbs’ view of life as not accurately reflecting the reality of human experience.

Biblical poetry also resembles that of other Near Eastern cultures. Since the eighteenth century, scholars have been particularly attuned to its use of parallelism, in which a single idea is repeated in successive lines using different words. This technique requires an extensive array of synonym pairs; similar word pairs also occur in poetic texts from the ancient Near Eastern city of Ugarit, demonstrating the genre’s international character. Recent scholarship has identified other features in biblical poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY; CANAAN, CANAANITES).

The historically oriented sections of the Bible contain important artistic and religious features. For example, the accounts of *David and *Solomon (the “United Monarchy”) do not present events in the order in which they actually occurred, but in a sequence that makes certain religious points. Narratives in Genesis also present the fathers and mothers of the Israelites in ways that foreshadow the later period of David. These characteristics have led some to question the reliability of the biblical accounts; many scholars think that the stories about everything before the time of David are at least exaggerated and probably intended to make Israelite history appear to have unfolded in a simplistically linear fashion. Although the Bible’s account of the subsequent “Divided Monarchy” period reflects a southern (Judahite) point of view, with particular emphasis on the reign of the seventh-century king *Josiah, it is considered generally reliable, particularly because much of its data are in accord with information preserved in *Assyrian and *Babylonian records.

The prophetic books are attributed to individual figures who lived between the eighth and sixth centuries; some books, such as *Isaiah and *Zechariah, include writings by authors from several different periods. The prophetic speeches that fill these books present theological interpretations of contemporary events, such as the Assyrian invasion of Israel, *Jerusalem's fall to the Babylonians, and the Judeans' return from exile. These interpretations, which rest on the prophets' individual understandings of what God expects, emphasize social justice and religious fidelity. The prophetic books also contain varying amounts of narrative; indeed, the entire book of *Jonah and the first half of Daniel, which Christian Bibles include among the prophets, are devoted entirely to stories. The books of Samuel and Kings contain narrative material about the prophets Nathan and *Elijah.

Although the books of the Bible were written at various times between the twelfth and second centuries BCE, their authors drew on earlier documents. This is obvious for books like Psalms and Proverbs, which are plainly collections (the headings scattered throughout them are later additions), as well as the prophetic books, with their numerous speeches. However, it is equally true of the Bible's legal passages, which incorporate earlier documents such as the Covenant Code (Exod 20:22–23:33), and of narrative works such as Genesis and Job.

The process whereby these books came to be considered sacred, "canonization," stretched over centuries. It is widely thought to have taken place in three stages, beginning with the Torah (Pentateuch) in the time of Ezra (fifth century BCE), then the Prophets (around the second century BCE), and finally the Writings (by the first century CE). However, the evidence for each stage is limited, and some scholars dispute this entire process. In their opinion, the three-part arrangement found in Jewish editions of the Bible reflects the books' different styles and levels of authority rather than the historical process through which they came to be considered holy.

The Christian Old Testament is based on a Jewish translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek (the *Septuagint) that was begun in the third century BCE. The biblical books are arranged in a different order in the Septuagint, which also includes several books not found in "normative" Jewish Bibles. The Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century removed these books, calling them "Apocrypha" ("hidden"), a term that originated in the time of the *Church Father Jerome (fourth to fifth century CE).

The sequence of books in the Hebrew Bible also developed over centuries. This is clear because the Babylonian *Talmud (sixth century CE) lists the books in a different order from the one that prevails today. For example, only in the Middle Ages were the *Five Scrolls (the books of Song of Songs, Ruth, *Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther) grouped together and arranged in the sequence of the holidays on which each is read in the synagogue (*Passover, *Shavuot, *Tisha B'Av, *Sukkot, and *Purim, respectively).

The *Dead Sea Scrolls demonstrate that various versions of biblical books existed side by side in antiquity. That can also be seen by comparing passages that are preserved in more than one book of the Bible (for example, the books of Kings and Chronicles) or in the traditional Hebrew text and various ancient translations. Some of these differences are as small as matters of spelling; however, others are more extensive. For example, a copy of the book of Samuel that was found among the Dead Sea Scrolls begins 1 Samuel 11 with a brief episode that is not included in our Bible but is mentioned by the first-century-CE historian *Josephus. Other differences have to do with the order in which passages are arranged (especially in *Jeremiah). Modern scholars compare these versions to determine how the different readings arose and which is most likely to be original.

The accepted Hebrew edition used today (Masoretic text) was established in medieval times by authorities known as *Masoretes. Over a period of centuries, they determined a standard consonantal text. In addition, they developed systems of vowels and accents, which also indicated punctuation and liturgical melody.

Useful introductory works include D. W. Baker and B. T. Arnold, The Face of Old Testament Studies, A Survey of Contemporary Approaches (1999); A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler, eds., The Jewish Study Bible (2004); and D. N. Freedman et al., Anchor Bible Dictionary (1992). See also BIBLE: LANGUAGES; BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP; BIBLE: POETRY; BIBLE: PRAYER LANGUAGE; BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS; ISRAELITE RELIGION; LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND HEBREW BIBLE; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT.

FREDERICK E. GREENSPAHN

Bible: Ancestral Narratives. The narratives of *Genesis 12–50 comprise a series of interlocking family stories, tracing a line from *Abraham and *Sarah through *Isaac and *Rebekah to *Jacob with his four wives and twelve sons who are the eponymous ancestors of the twelve *Israelite tribes. Collateral lineages representing the peoples around ancient Israel are also accounted for: Abraham's nephew Lot is the ancestor of *Moabites and *Ammonites, Abraham's sons with his other wives (*Hagar and Keturah) are ancestors of Arabian peoples (see ARABIA), and Jacob's brother *Esau is the ancestor of the *Edomites. The dramatic sibling and co-wife rivalries of the tales signify the tensions within Israel and between Israel and its neighbors. Similarly, the theme of movement in and out of the "Promised Land" foreshadows later biblical narratives of departure to and Exodus from *Egypt and also of *exile to and return from *Babylon. However, the overarching theme is the idea, embodied in *covenantal promises, that all of the rivalries and movements are part of God's scheme to establish a people, Israel, in its own land.

Although the narratives have long been believed to be authentic historical accounts of the precursors of the *Israelites, the discrepancies between the "facts" of the story and what is known about the pre-Israelite period from *archeology and ancient *Near Eastern history have led to a reassessment. The ancestor narratives are now understood to be a complex amalgam of traditions. They represent ancient Israel's self-understanding of its past, formed many generations if not centuries after the period they purport to describe; they were formulated to serve the needs of the period(s) of their formation while drawing on remembered tales. Abraham may well be an authentic figure, for a place name in a tenth-century inscription is equivalent to "Abram" (or "Abiram") and perhaps reflects Abraham groups in the northern Negev. Similarly, the names of Abraham's ancestry correspond with place names in the Syro-Mesopotamian (Amorite) region that appear in *Mesopotamian literature of the late second and early first millennium BCE. However, the episodes attached to the ancestors are at best legendary rather than historical; they have been imagined and embellished by storytellers over long periods of time before reaching a final form that was essential to the shaping and expression of Israelite identity and culture.

The ancestor narratives notably present themes that serve the national and religious interests of Israelites; they also vividly convey the fathers and mothers of Israel as heroic yet flawed humans, thus capturing the attention and sympathies of their audiences. Although the society depicted is patrilineal, matriarchs as well as patriarchs struggle to achieve family goals and are active participants in the unfolding story of divine promise. In the first generation Abraham's unyielding faith and manipulation of Sarah stand out; in the second generation Rebekah's active agency in arranging her own marriage and in securing the prominence of her favored second son overshadows Isaac's passivity; and in the third generation Jacob and his wives are caught up in a web of trickery and deceptions that continues among their sons, propelling *Joseph and his brothers into Egypt and setting the scene for the Exodus story.

CAROL MEYERS

Bible: Languages. The vast majority of the Jewish Bible is written in *Hebrew; approximately ten chapters are in *Aramaic. Hebrew was the main language that the Judeans and Israelites spoke throughout the biblical period; it was slowly replaced by Aramaic during and after the *Babylonian Exile, since Aramaic was the language most commonly in use in western Asia. Over several centuries, Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the main Jewish spoken language, and by the end of the biblical period (second century BCE), Hebrew was used in formal, written contexts rather than in everyday speech. This is reflected in the fact that most late biblical and early rabbinic works are written in Hebrew, albeit a Hebrew that betrays significant Aramaic influence. Exactly when Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language is debated.

The main source of Biblical Hebrew is the Bible. We have a small number of inscriptions from the First *Temple period; there are more from the *Second Temple era, thanks especially to the *Dead Sea Scrolls. We also have some knowledge of pre-Biblical Hebrew from pre-Israelite *Canaanite tablets written in Akkadian, the language of *Mesopotamia; some gloss or explain an Akkadian word with a pre-Israelite Canaanite word. Given that we do not have original versions of any biblical text, and the final form of the Bible is post-biblical, these nonbiblical sources act as important controls as we try to understand the actual Hebrew of the biblical period. Akkadian, Hebrew, and Aramaic are also categorized as Semitic languages, one of the related language groups among Afro-Asiatic languages. "Semitic" is a linguistic category, coined in the nineteenth century; the word originates in the name "Shem," one of Noah's sons (Gen 9–11). Other ancient Semitic languages that are relevant to biblical literature are Amorite, Ugaritic, the Canaanite languages, and *Phoenician. Syriac, a descendant of Aramaic, became the literary language of early Christianity in the early centuries of the Common Era. Like Hebrew and Aramaic, these are all considered Northwest Semitic languages, whereas Akkadian, the earliest attested Semitic language, is classified as an Eastern Semitic language; after the Muslim conquests in the beginning of the seventh century CE, Arabic, categorized as a West Semitic language, largely replaced Aramaic dialects.

The Bible contains several dialects, which are typically defined chronologically. Most biblical texts are written in Standard Biblical Hebrew, which is close to the Hebrew spoken in *Judah at the time of the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE). A small number of earlier texts such as the Song of the Sea (Exod 15) and the Song of Deborah (Judg 5) are in Archaic Biblical Hebrew – these have certain old forms rarely found in other texts and show some similarity to Ugaritic, a language spoken in *Syria in the pre-biblical period. A sizable section of the Bible, including *Chronicles, *Ezra-*Nehemiah, *Daniel, *Esther, and *Ecclesiastes, is written in Late Biblical Hebrew, which shows similarities to both Aramaic and Rabbinic Hebrew. There are other ways of defining dialects as well; we know especially from inscriptions that the Hebrew of *Israel, the northern kingdom, differed slightly from that of Judah. The extent of northern Hebrew now found in the Bible is debated; it appears that much of it was normalized to Judean Hebrew. As in other languages, *poetry is different from prose: The former has many more rare and difficult words and has slightly different grammatical rules.

Both Aramaic and Hebrew are consonantal languages, having borrowed the alphabet developed in Phoenicia in the late second millennium BCE; they differ from Akkadian and Egyptian, which had much more complex writing systems – cuneiform in the case of Akkadian and hieroglyphics in the case of Egyptian. The fit between Hebrew and Phoenician consonantal sounds was not perfect, which explains why there are twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet, but one of these letters is pronounced in two different ways. The Hebrew and Aramaic systems developed differently over time. The current script for the Bible is an Aramaic script that was borrowed during the Babylonian Exile and displaced the earlier Hebrew script, sometimes called Paleo-Hebrew. Both Hebrew and Aramaic eventually incorporated vowel letters; these were certain consonants that can indicate vowels. In the second half of the first millennium CE, various vowel systems written above or below the line were developed; the one ultimately adopted is called the Tiberian system, after the city Tiberias in the *Galilee in northern Israel. We have several transliterations of Hebrew into Akkadian or Greek from the biblical or early post-biblical period; these indicate that the vowel system now used for chanting the Bible is relatively accurate, but it does not date to the biblical period.

The following passages appear in Aramaic in the Bible: two words in *Genesis 31:48, one verse in *Jeremiah 10:11, four chapters in Ezra (4:8–6:18; 7:12–26), and six in Daniel (2:4–7:28). The material in Daniel reflects a late author more comfortable in Aramaic. Some of the Ezra material purports to contain official documents of the Persian chancellery, which would have been in Aramaic, and this may have influenced the surrounding material, which is also in Aramaic. The verse in Jeremiah is aimed at a non-Jewish audience, and the words in Genesis are spoken by Laban, an Aramean (explaining why they are in Aramaic).

Our present solid understanding of the structure of Hebrew began with medieval Jewish commentators and *grammarians; they understood Hebrew in relation to Arabic and Aramaic and tried to show in polemical contexts that the Bible rather than the Qur'an was written in the most beautiful pristine language. The discovery of how to decipher other Semitic languages in the last century and a half has also helped significantly to clarify many obscure words and grammatical structures of Biblical Hebrew.

MARC BRETTLER

Bible: Modern Scholarship refers to scholarly approaches that read the Bible as any other written text, without reliance on religious tradition or any preconceptions. Its origins are in the Protestant *Reformation and subsequently the Enlightenment, which regarded reason as the standard of measurement. This approach created the unfettered environment in which modern biblical scholarship has flourished in the various forms discussed in this entry.

BIBLICAL TEXT: Various editions of the Bible differ, raising questions as to which reflects the original text. Already in ancient times, Jewish tradition reported that the ancient *Temple housed three *Torah scrolls, each with its own distinctive readings. This textual diversity was confirmed by the *Dead Sea Scrolls, which include Hebrew manuscripts of numerous biblical books that are a thousand years older than previously known versions. Modern scholars have produced several critical editions of the Hebrew Bible, which display the relevant data from these different documents in a convenient format. The best known is the Biblia Hebraica, now entering its fifth edition; another is being produced at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

During the second century CE, one textual tradition became normative. At that time, Hebrew was written without vowels or punctuation, although certain consonants were sometimes used to mark vowels. Medieval scholars, known as *Masoretes, developed several systems for indicating vowels and punctuation; they also noted various textual oddities. The resulting texts, therefore, are called masoretic. The system now in use was developed in the *Galilee city of Tiberias between the sixth and ninth centuries.

Close attention to the text led to questions about the authorship of biblical books, a topic of interest since antiquity. The disunity of the *Pentateuch (the *Torah or Five Books of Moses) and the book of *Isaiah has prompted scrutiny, and multiple authorship for other books has also been suggested. For example, the last six verses of *Ecclesiastes are widely thought to be additions. The Dead Sea Scrolls also provide important insights into the process by which the book of *Psalms was put together.

Most modern scholars think that a redactor (R) wove the Pentateuch together from four discrete sources, labeled J, E, D, and P on the basis of various stylistic features. According to some scholars, these sources were themselves composite (hence J¹ and J², etc.); others have proposed the existence of additional sources (e.g., K, N, and H). The exact nature of each source and how they came to be combined are more speculative topics. Although J is usually thought to have been written near the time of *David, some scholars place it after the return from the *Babylonian Exile. The question of whether P (the "priestly source") preceded or followed D (*Deuteronomy) and H (the Holiness Code) is particularly contentious. One widespread theory holds that D originally introduced the books of *Joshua, *Samuel, and *Kings

(the "Deuteronomistic History") but was later detached and placed at the end of the Pentateuch. Although these issues are still being debated, there is little argument about the composite origin of the Pentateuch and, probably, other biblical books.

Scholars also examine individual episodes within the Bible. By comparing different versions of the same story, they are able to trace the history of individual traditions over time.

IMPACT OF SCIENCE: Modern science has had a profound impact on our understanding of the Bible. Biblical credibility was severely damaged by Copernicus' discovery that the earth travels around the sun, Charles Lyell's determination that our world is millions of years old, and Charles Darwin's theory of evolution. However, the most dramatic impact has come from *archeology, which opened up vast repositories of information about Israel's ancient *Near Eastern environment, including both written and material finds. Excavations have yielded direct information from cultures previously known only from the Bible's critical accounts. These finds include texts written in ancient languages that were spoken during biblical times and are related to Biblical Hebrew, including Akkadian, the language of the *Assyrians and *Babylonians, and Ugaritic, from *Ugarit, a city that flourished north of Israel during the centuries preceding the emergence of the Israelite state. These texts cast light on many biblical passages. For example, Psalm 68:5 speaks of God as riding the 'aravot (v. 5). Although that word appears to be the plural form of 'arava, which means "desert," Ugaritic texts refer to the *Canaanite god Baal as a rider of the 'rpt (like the original Bible, the Ugaritic texts do not indicate vowels). The Ugaritic word, which resembles the Hebrew 'aravot, means "clouds"; that meaning fits Psalm 68:34, which speaks of God as riding in the sky (see also Deut 33:26 and Isa 19:1). It would appear that, to describe his God, the psalmist borrowed a phrase that the Canaanites used for their deity, Ba'al.

The records of nearby nations include numerous references to people and events mentioned in the Bible. Although most of these inscriptions are from the period of Israel's Divided Monarchy (930–586 BCE), the earliest comes from the Egyptian pharaoh Merneptah, who reigned near the end of the thirteenth century BCE. He claims to have decimated the people Israel, who were then living near the *Galilee. A monument erected by Mesha, who ruled over *Moab several centuries later, describes his confrontation with ancient Israel, an event that is mentioned in 2 Kings 3. Another monument from Tel Dan in northern Israel mentions two biblical kings, apparently Jehoram and Ahaziah.

Archeological evidence has raised questions about several biblical accounts, especially from early periods of Israelite history (these include the activities of the Patriarchs, the Exodus, and, most dramatically, the conquest), as well as the extent to which Israel differed from its neighbors. The Israelite nation emerged at the same time as several other groups. Canaan was then in disarray; Egypt, which had previously dominated the region, was in decline; and the Mesopotamian empires that would eventually replace it had not yet arrived. Scholars draw on social scientific theories about cultural development to understand the dynamics that contributed to Israel's social and political structures as well as to literary prophecy. This approach was pioneered in the nineteenth century, when biblical stories, such as that of Samson, were compared with mythological traditions from other cultures and the *Song of Songs was interpreted in the light of Palestinian wedding practices.

Recent dramatic developments in scholarship pertain to *Israelite religion. Archeological discoveries and a fuller understanding of how religion develops suggest that Israelite beliefs and practices were probably more diverse than what is represented in the Bible, with different practices in different regions and among different social classes. Monotheism apparently developed over time, as characteristics from several different deities were combined.

LITERARY ANALYSIS: Uncertainty about Israel's history has led to increased interest in the Bible's literary features, an approach with roots in the Middle Ages. Literary scholars usually look at the Bible holistically to understand the structure of such patently composite works as the book of Psalms and the Minor *Prophets (which Jewish tradition calls "the Book of the Twelve"). Close attention to repeated words (Leitwörter) and narrative patterns (type scenes) has illuminated the purpose and relationship of biblical passages. Scholars have also discovered standard formats; as a result, it is possible to categorize poems and appreciate the literary background of prophetic speeches. Several sections of the Bible mimic the structure of ancient vassal treaties, presenting God as Israel's overlord.

Sensitivity to the Bible's literary characteristics has also heightened awareness of its ideological premises. Some scholars consider the Bible's male orientation (androcentrism) to be inherently patriarchal, whereas others regard it as more supportive of women's concerns. The Bible's relevance to disabilities and environmental and Third World concerns has also attracted increasing attention.

CANON FORMATION AND HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION: Awareness of the complex history of biblical composition has led scholars to study how the Bible took shape (canon) and how it has been interpreted. In fact, the Bible was being interpreted even before it was complete; for example, later books, such as *Daniel and *Chronicles, interpret statements in earlier ones. Biblical interpretation became a thriving enterprise during the *Second Temple period. The Dead Sea Scrolls, discovered in 1948, provided a wealth of new material and sparked interest in other post-biblical Jewish works, such as the *Apocrypha and *Pseudepigrapha. Scholars now study the Bible's role within the religious communities that cherish it.

All this activity makes biblical studies a lively field, involving scholars from many different countries and traditions, who heatedly debate the early history of Israel and the history of the Bible as a whole. What is not in dispute is the fundamental notion that the Bible should be studied like any other work. That assumption is part of our contemporary culture, where nothing is immune from challenge and where consensus and certainty are often beyond our grasp; it is unlikely to give way in any but the most cloistered communities.

For further reading, see S. D. Sperling, B. A. Levine, and B. B. Levy, Students of the Covenant: A History of Jewish Biblical Scholarship in North America (1992); and J. H. Hayes, ed., Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (1999).

FREDERICK E. GREENSPAHN

Bible: Music and Dance. *Genesis 4:21–22 attributes the invention of musical instruments to Jubal and song to Na'amah ("tuneful"), the seventh generation of naturally born humans. This is an indication that the *Israelites understood music to be a foundational part of their culture. Using biblical data and *archeological evidence, musicologists have identified four categories of musical instruments in the biblical period: (1) five different kinds of idiophones (e.g., rattles and bells), in which sound is produced by parts moving against other parts; (2) a dozen or so different aerophones (wind instruments); (3) nine different chordophones (stringed instruments); and (4) one membranophone (percussion instrument), the frame drum or tōp.

These instruments appear singly, such as the use of the *shofar (ram's horn) in military or religious contexts (e.g., Josh 6:4–5; Lev 25:9); they also appear in various combinations in religious (e.g., 2 Sam 6:5; Ps 81:2–3), prophetic (1 Sam 10:5), and secular (e.g., Gen 31:27; 1 Kgs 10:12; Isa 5:11–12) contexts. Many of these texts mention song and/or dance along with specific instruments. Song and dance without instruments are also mentioned in the Bible (e.g., Exod 32:18–20). Given the intrinsic connections among vocal expression, movement, and instrumentation, with traditional songs composed and performed using all three modes of musical expression, it is likely that some references to only one or two of these expressive forms might elliptically imply the presence of all three.

Vocal music appears in the biblical lament tradition (Jer 9:17, 21; Ezek 32:16; 2 Chron 35:25), in several texts indicating secular performance (Eccl 2:8; 2 Sam 19:36; and possibly Ezra 2:64 and Neh 7:67), and also in reference to *Temple singers (Ezra 2:41; Neh 7:44). Indeed, musical terminology appears (especially in superscriptions) so frequently in *Psalms that the psalms can be understood as songs sung or chanted for various personal or communal purposes, including thanksgiving, praise, lament, celebration, liturgy, and commemoration (perhaps with instruments, as in Psalm 61:1, and movement). Also, in light of biblical references using "song" (shirah) in reference to *poetry (e.g., Deut 31:19, 21, 30, 32:44), biblical poetry and teachings in general may be understood as chants or songs, since the oral transmission of tradition involves rhythmic recitation and poetic forms as memory aids.

Both women and men participated in communal events involving music. They also would have personally sung lullabies, love songs (such as the passages attributed to the female and male lovers in the *Song of Songs), laments, and prayers (the so-called Song of *Hannah in 1 Sam 2 is introduced as *prayer). Biblical references to female and male singers in secular contexts imply that women and men performed together publicly; Psalm 68:4 refers to "musicians" and "singers" (both masculine plural forms but possibly used inclusively) surrounding female drummers in a Temple procession. Single-gender professional ensembles may have been more common, based on representations in ancient art depicting ensembles of all men or all women. A number of passages (Exod 15:20–21; Judg 11:34; 1 Sam 18:6; cf. Jer 31:4; Judg 5:1) depict a musical tradition involving women who perform with drums, dance, and song to celebrate the victory of Israelites through divine intervention. These passages, along with archeological evidence for the frame drum as a woman's instrument, suggest that female musicians were part of the musical ensembles, at least those having drums, mentioned in the Bible.

For recent research, see J. Braun, Music in Ancient Israel/Palestine: Archaeological, Written, and Comparative Sources (2002).
CAROL MEYERS

Bible: Narrative Literature. The corpus of “classical” narratives in the Hebrew *Bible consists of the *Torah (*Pentateuch) and the Former *Prophets (*Deuteronomistic History); that is, the books of *Genesis through 2 *Kings. Broadly speaking, they were written during ancient Israel’s monarchical period (1000–586 BCE) in Classical Biblical Hebrew, although they originated in pre-monarchical and even pre-Israelite traditions, and continued to be supplemented and edited into the *Babylonian Exile and later (Friedman, 1987). The books of *Ruth, *Jonah, and the frame-story of *Job, although of relatively late provenance, still conserve (or affect) both the language and conventions of classical narrative. Such is not the case, however, with the books of *Chronicles, *Ezra-*Nehemiah, *Esther, and *Daniel, which belong to a recognizably post-classical literary culture. Narrative elements are also occasionally found in biblical *poetry (e.g., Exod 15 and Judg 5), but here other linguistic and poetic factors predominate. The following mostly literary observations restrict themselves to classical prose narrative.

Biblical narrative developed out of the narrative poetry of surrounding West Semitic ancient *Near Eastern cultures, traditions attested to in particular by *Ugaritic myths and epics, which date roughly to the latter half of the second millennium BCE. Thus, *Abraham stands in a long line of *Canaanite patriarchs, resembling such Ugaritic heroes as Danel and Keret. Like his predecessors, he is a prosperous and powerful warrior-ruler (Gen 14); to his great dismay he lacks a son; God therefore promises, in a prophetic annunciation, to grant him a son. This literary development is also suggested by evidence within the Bible itself. So-called archaic biblical poems such as *Exodus 15 and *Judges 5 likely constitute the oldest passages in the Bible, and in various ways their accompanying prose narratives (Exod 14 and Judg 4, respectively) recast these traditional poems in historicized form. Within this history of narrative, it was the particular achievement of Israelite writers to translate a poetic, possibly oral, tradition into the radically different medium of literary (written) prose. In fact, the Hebrew Bible contains what is arguably the first extended prose narrative composition in the history of literature (Friedman, 1998). The shift from traditional poetry to literary prose had profound consequences for narrative representation and accounts for biblical narrative’s distinctively literary qualities within the ancient world (Auerbach).

The change in verbal medium is reflected in the language and style of biblical narrative. Classical prose is characterized by two strictly literary constructions: a preterite (past tense) that is restricted to narrative uses and a form of represented consciousness. More precisely, the so-called converted imperfect (wayyiqtol) form, which expresses completed action in third-person narration, appears to have been restricted to the written language. Conversely, the perfect tense (qatal) is used to describe past action only in direct speech. Second, the “presentative” (hinnēh) in third-person narration represents individual characters’ private points of view. In this way, biblical narrative, like the modern novel, creates a dualism comprising objective facts about the narrative world and subjective facts residing in the minds of characters, thus achieving a strikingly early example of literary realism. It is the medium of literary prose that makes these novelistic effects possible.

Alongside such comparisons to modern literature, it must always be kept in mind that biblical narrative was composed upward of three millennia ago. Not surprisingly, ancient Israelite writers employed various narrative conventions that are no longer directly available to modern readers. Rather, they must be historically reconstructed on the basis of literary inferences drawn from the corpus itself (Alter). For example, biblical narrative, in contrast to most modern literature, is characterized by a pronounced use of repetition. At the level of prose style, this is especially visible in what Martin *Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig identified as the Bible’s Leitwortstil: A “leading word” recurs within a scene or sequence of scenes, creating a cumulative thematic resonance. At the level of compositional form, repetition shapes both dialogue and type-scenes. Thus, a character nearly repeats what has just been reported by another character or what has just been recounted in narration. Or a set sequence of events (the annunciation of the birth of the hero, for example) is nearly repeated on several different occasions (Gen 18; Judg 13; 1 Sam 1). In both cases, the qualification “nearly” is crucial. For the deviation from pure repetition generally provides the key to discerning the specific point of an apparently redundant snippet of dialogue or the particular emphasis of a seemingly typical instance of a recurring scene. The marked presence of repetition is sometimes mistaken as evidence that biblical narrative is still essentially tied to oral tradition. Although it is entirely possible that the origins of biblical narrative are to be found in oral epics – a thesis associated in particular with the names Umberto Cassuto and Frank Moore Cross – the verbal maneuvers encountered in biblical narrative itself derive from the manipulation of a text. Writing enabled the biblical authors to play with and even against the inherited tradition. The art of biblical narrative ultimately resides in a post-traditional aesthetic principle, a “technique” that the Russian formalists referred to as “defamiliarization.” In stark contrast, traditional storytellers (Ugaritic, Homeric, etc.), however perfected their craft, remained within familiar terrain.

Finally, one must consider the complex process of writing and redaction by which biblical narrative assumed its present form. According to the documentary hypothesis put forward by source criticism, the Pentateuch consists of four primary sources, which were combined in two principal stages by two different redactors, all over the course of several centuries. The documentary hypothesis (and related theories) continues to have its detractors but it remains the most convincing account of Pentateuchal composition, as well as an enduring achievement of nineteenth-century philology (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP). Recognition of the literary artistry of biblical narratives provides corroborating evidence for the existence of underlying written sources.

For further reading, see R. E. Friedman, Who Wrote the Bible? (1987); idem, The Hidden Book in the Bible (1998); S. B. Parker, The Pre-Biblical Narrative Tradition: Essays on the Ugaritic Poems Keret and Aqhat (1989); E. Auerbach, Mimesis (1953), 3–23; R. S. Kawashima, Biblical Narrative and the Death of the Rhapsode (2004); and R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981).

ROBERT S. KAWASHIMA

Bible: Poetry. The earliest example of biblical poetry appears in the account of creation in *Genesis 2: As soon as God forms woman, man begins to speak. He declares, “This one at last is bone of my bone, / and flesh of my flesh; / this one shall be called ‘Woman’ (’ishah) / for from man (’ish) was this one taken” (2:23). In most contemporary versions of the *Bible, this verse is set apart from the surrounding prose narrative and laid out in poetic verse. But what distinguishing features mark this utterance as poetry?

In this example, distinguishing characteristics include the repetition of the phrase, “this one” (zot), at the beginning of two consecutive lines, a poetic device called anaphora. The word zot recurs a third time, in the Hebrew at the very end of the verse, which makes it an inclusio, a word or phrase that appears at the beginning and end of a passage, framing the poetic unit. The word pairs, “bone of my bone” and “flesh of my flesh,” parallel one another semantically and grammatically; the words “woman” and “man,” which are etymologically distinct in Hebrew but share a similar sound, create a word play. Thus, with this finely crafted verse, human speech is initiated in the elevated style that characterizes poetry.

Poetry constitutes approximately one-third of the Bible. The *Torah includes several lengthy poetic texts, including Genesis 49:2–27, *Exodus 15:1–18, and *Deuteronomy 32 and 33, as well as shorter poetic compositions such as Exodus 15:21, *Numbers 10:35–36, and isolated poetic verses (e.g., Gen 4:6–7, 24:60). In the books of *Joshua through *Kings (often known as the Former *Prophets), poems are interspersed throughout the narrative account of Israel’s history (e.g., Judg 5; 1 Sam 2:1–10; 2 Sam 23:1–7). In most of the books that record the prophets’ actual discourse (the so-called Latter Prophets), poetic verse predominates (with the exception of the books of *Jonah and *Ezekiel). The third division of biblical books, *Writings (Ketuvim), contains the largest amount of poetic material, mainly in the books of *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Job, *Song of Songs, and *Lamentations.

A survey of these poetic texts reveals a considerable diversity in poetic form, including celebratory songs to God (e.g., Exod 15:1–18), mournful dirges (e.g., 2 Sam 1:19–27), aphorisms (Proverbs), and love songs (Song of Songs). Within the Psalms alone are hymns of praise (e.g., Ps 145), psalms of thanksgiving (e.g., Ps 30), laments (e.g., Ps 6), and pedagogical teachings (e.g., Ps 1). The poetry of the prophets is equally varied, with prophecies of condemnation found alongside prophecies of comfort (e.g., Hosea 2).

The Bible itself lacks any definition of poetry or discussion of poetics. Although certain poetic passages are labeled as a “song” (shirah, Deut 31:30), “dirge” (kinah, 2 Sam 1:17), “psalm” (mizmor, Ps 68:1), or “song of praise” (tehillah, Ps 145:1), such classifications are not used consistently or comprehensively. Furthermore, the convention of visually distinguishing poetic passages through stichography (special spacing) evolved over time; the visual layout of poetic verse cannot be relied on as a decisive indicator of poetry in the Hebrew Bible. Nonetheless, certain central indicators have enabled scholars to gain a consensus as to what qualifies as biblical poetry.

Since the mid-eighteenth century, scholars have highlighted parallelism as a key characteristic of biblical poetry. In his influential work, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (originally published in 1778), Robert Lowth defined poetic parallelism as “a certain equality, resemblance, or parallelism, between the members of each period,” and he distinguished between synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic parallelism. Although Lowth’s understanding of parallelism dominated the field for many years, more recent studies have called attention to the nuances and complexities of biblical verse. Most notably, Adele Berlin has characterized parallelism as a multifaceted phenomenon, one that involves grammatical, lexical-semantic, and phonological aspects on the level of individual words, as well as of clauses and larger expanses of a text. Instead of drawing a stark contrast between synonymous and antithetical elements, Berlin asserts that parallelism achieves its effectiveness from the interplay of equivalence and contrast along these various aspects and levels. Take, for example, Exodus 15:11: “Who is like You, O YHWH, among the gods? / Who is like You, mighty in holiness, / awesome in accomplishments, worker of wonders?” The opening words of the first two lines are nearly identical, which gives them the impression of synonymy; however, the second halves of these two lines differ both semantically and grammatically. The third line adds two phrases, “awesome in accomplishments” and “worker of wonders,” that resemble the expression in the second line, “mighty in holiness,” in structure and meaning (although with some differences), thus creating a chain of two-word divine descriptors that illustrate why God is beyond compare. This combination of equivalence and contrast on multiple levels animates the verse.

Another distinguishing feature of biblical poetry is an abundance of imagery and metaphor. One example is the well-known “YHWH is my shepherd” (Psalm 23:1); another is the depiction of wisdom as a “tree of life” (Proverbs 3:18). Biblical poetry also contains various forms of repetition and patterning, with many passages displaying an artful, clever recurrence of key words, sounds, and other elements. These features are evident in Genesis 2:23, discussed earlier. Scholars have long debated whether biblical poetry exhibits some sort of metrical system. Of late, many have concluded that, although biblical poetry does not contain conclusive evidence of meter, it does display a certain degree of rhythm or sound repetition and regularity. All of these literary devices also appear in biblical prose but they occur in poetry with greater frequency and intensity.

In addition, biblical poetry is marked by terseness. The parallel lines in each two- or three-part poetic unit tend to be short and concise. Because the language is dense and poetic elements are woven together, reading biblical poetry requires effort and skill. Yet precisely because of these features, deciphering the artistic, elevated discourse of biblical poetry yields rich rewards.

For further reading, see A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (1985); and R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985).

ANDREA L. WEISS

Bible: Prayer Language. *Prayer, by which I mean speech to (or, in some cases, about) *God, is very common in the Hebrew *Bible. Some prayers are short: *Genesis 17:18, “O that Ishmael might live by Your favor!” is only four words long in Hebrew, whereas *Psalm 119, at 176 verses, is the longest biblical chapter. Most prayers are in *poetry and are found in the book of *Psalms, although approximately one hundred are in prose and are spread throughout the Bible.

Prose texts suggest that men and women could pray anywhere, although they also suggest that special prayers were often recited in a shrine or *Temple setting, where God was believed to be more proximate. There was no siddur or *prayer book in the biblical period, although there were certain typical forms in which prayers were recited. For example, petitionary prayers, whether in poetry or prose, typically began with an invocation of God and contained a request and a reason or reasons why God should heed the request. Such prose prayers were spontaneous in nature and were typically recited out loud (see *Hannah's prayer in 1 Sam 1:11). On special occasions, especially when commemorating a special event or offering significant petitions, the person might recite a ready-made poetic prayer in a religious setting in the belief that these special words would be especially efficacious. Upraised hands was the typical position of prayer in the biblical period.

We do not know exactly when people prayed. There is little indication of regular statutory prayer in the Bible, and the First Temple has been called the "Sanctuary of Silence," although this is surely an exaggeration. There are no indications that the amidah, the central prayer of rabbinic Judaism, was recited in the biblical period. Although the shema, the quintessential Jewish statement of divine unity, is biblical in origin (Deut 6:4–9), there is no intimation that it was used as a prayer in biblical times. The *synagogue likely developed late in the biblical period, several centuries after the *Babylonian Exile, but it is unknown what prayers, if any, might have been recited in the earliest synagogues (see WORSHIP).

Both prayer and animal sacrifice were seen as legitimate ways of serving deities in the ancient *Near East, including Israel. Exactly how these two means of *Israelite religion functioned together or side by side in the biblical period is unknown. Biblical theology assumes the efficacy of prayer; in the words of Psalm 145:18, "The LORD is near to all who call Him, to all who call Him with sincerity." It also assumes that disinterested praise of God is virtuous, as in Psalm 92:2: "It is good to praise the LORD, to sing hymns to Your name, O Most High." The Bible rarely sees prayer as more efficacious than sacrifice, however (see Ps 51:18), and biblical authors condemn the insincere prayer or prayers of the wicked that accompany insincere sacrifices (Isa 1:1–17). Many sections of the Bible insist on divine freedom; thus no prayer is automatically effective. Prayer became more important after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, but evidence indicates that it already served as an important religious expression throughout the biblical period.

MARC BRETTLER

Bible: Prophets and Prophecy. The most frequent word used for "prophet" in the Hebrew *Bible is navi. Although its etymology is uncertain, the word has been linked to the verb nabu in the Mesopotamian language, Akkadian, which means "to call, proclaim." It remains unclear, however, whether the word navi would have been understood in the active sense as "one who proclaims [YHWH's message]" or in the passive sense as "one who is called [by YHWH]." In either case, these two connotations of navi most accurately define the prophet in the Hebrew Bible: one who is called by YHWH to proclaim the divine word to the Israelite or Judahite king and/or people. Predictions of the future were often part of the message that YHWH charged the prophet to deliver but they were not the main themes of biblical prophets. Rather, advocacy for social justice and exclusive YHWH-worship dominates prophetic discourse.

PROPHECY IN THE ANCIENT *NEAR EAST: The discovery of a vast collection of omen texts from ancient *Mesopotamia suggests that prediction of the future in the ancient Near East was frequently accomplished by interpreting omens and performing divination, whether by experts or laypeople. References to prophetic oracle giving can be found throughout the region, but the Mari letters (early second millennium BCE) and the Nineveh oracles (seventh century BCE) stand out as examples of prophetic activity that parallel ancient Israelite prophecy.

HISTORY OF PROPHECY IN ISRAEL: Although the biblical text suggests that *Moses and *Miriam were among the first prophets, it is likely that such language is a retrojection from a later time; understood loosely, however, as intermediaries between YHWH and the Israelite people, both could be seen as early prophets. The institution of prophecy most probably arose alongside the early monarchy, with (among others) the figures of Samuel and Nathan in 1 and 2 *Samuel functioning as prophetic advisors to *Saul and *David, respectively. The history of prophecy is divided into two eras: "pre-classical" (or "nonclassical") and "classical" prophecy. Pre-classical prophets functioned during the tenth and ninth centuries BCE. Narratives about them appear in the biblical histories, particularly the books of Samuel and *Kings, and they are depicted as miracle workers who worked alone or banded together in guilds; prophets rebuked the king when necessary, and they also responded to the requests of ordinary individuals. The charismatic figures of *Elijah and *Elisha are paradigmatic of the pre-classical prophet.

Although the figure of the pre-classical prophet undoubtedly persists beyond the ninth century, "classical" prophets, such as *Hosea, *Amos, *Isaiah, and *Jeremiah, appear for the first time in the eighth century BCE. They are distinguished by having entire biblical books (scrolls) devoted to their actions and prophetic message. Classical prophets are far less likely to be portrayed as wonder workers and instead are depicted delivering oracles, at times punctuating their message with a symbolic activity, such as Jeremiah's donning of a wooden yoke to represent submission to *Babylon (Jer 27).

There is much variation among prophets of both eras. Some prophets emerge as fringe figures from the periphery of society (e.g., Elijah; see 1 Kgs 18:13, which portrays the Israelite monarchy as actively persecuting prophets of YHWH); others are tied to central institutions such as the royal court (e.g., *Isaiah; see 2 Kgs 19, which depicts King *Hezekiah consulting with the prophet Isaiah). Some prophets, primarily from the periphery, excoriate the monarchy and demand radical reform, whereas central prophets are generally conservative, advising maintenance of the social order or a return to older social institutions. Prophets addressed both cultic concerns, such as worship, and political matters, such as whether to resist or surrender in an upcoming battle; some focused on the former (e.g., Hosea) and others the latter (e.g., Jeremiah). Prophets with different positions in society and diverging messages appear to have coexisted and competed with one another. 1 Kings 22 relates a story in which the kings of *Judah and *Israel consult numerous prophets before embarking on a military campaign: Several central royal prophets delivered one message, whereas a peripheral prophet, Micaiah ben Imlah, conveyed divergent and more ominous advice.

According to Jewish tradition, prophecy ended around 400 BCE, after the restoration of the Second *Temple and the re-inauguration of the dynastic *priesthood. Prophetic activity undoubtedly continued through the late ancient era, but for reasons that are unclear prophets were no longer perceived as significant enough for their work and words to be recorded for posterity.

PROPHETIC LITERATURE: The second section of the Hebrew *Bible, Nevi'im (*Prophets), contains the works attributed to the classical prophets, fifteen in all. The prophets do not seem to have written down their own words, but rather to have delivered them orally; at a later date, they were collected, written down, and edited into complete works that often include some biographical material and historical narrative. A narrative in the book of Jeremiah gestures toward this process as it depicts the prophet dictating his words to the scribe Baruch, who wrote the oracle on a scroll and delivered it to the king (Jeremiah 36). Few of the prophetic books are seamless; in addition to the mixing of genres exemplified by the book of Jeremiah, oracles from different time periods are often collected and placed side by side. The book of Isaiah, for example, contains the oracles of either two or three different prophets, with the most notable disruption occurring between chapters 39 and 40; the first thirty-nine chapters clearly address a nation on the brink of destruction, and the fortieth chapter begins with an oracle of comfort to a nation in exile.

Much of prophetic literature is written in elevated, poetic language and includes word play, complex extended metaphors, and visual-verbal punning in the accounts of visions. References to prophetic books as part of the sacred canon can be found as early as the second century BCE.

For further reading, see J. Blenkinsopp, A History of Prophecy in Israel (1983); and R. R. Wilson, Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (1980). CHAYA HALBERSTAM

Bible: Representations of War and Peace. The Hebrew *Bible is steeped in war. Like the foundation tales and national epics of many cultures, stories of Israelite heroes and accounts of historical eras are often seen in terms of military victory or defeat, alternating with much hoped for periods of stability and peace. Scholarship on war in the Hebrew Bible has addressed the historicity of various biblical war accounts, the military tactics and material culture of war in a comparative ancient *Near Eastern context, the worldviews implicit in biblical portrayals of war, and, more specifically, the theological and ethical implications of images of *God as divine warrior.

The Hebrew Bible, in fact, reveals a complex variety of ideologies of war; many, if not most, reflect, in Michael Walzer's terms, the desire "even in war . . . to act or to seem to act morally" (Just and Unjust Wars: A Moral Argument with Historical Illustrations [1977], 20). Even the shocking ideology of the mandated herem was understood in religious terms. Herem, translated in the biblical context as "ban" or "devotion to destruction," meant that when the Israelites achieved victory over the inhabitants of the land of Canaan during the conquest era they were required to sacrifice to God all that would normally be understood as the spoils of war; they were banned from benefiting from their victory in any way. This meant destroying not only the enemy's possessions, including their animals, but the enemy, including women and children, as well. This was justified as either a sacrifice vowed to God (Num 21:2–3, Deut 2:34–36; Josh 6:17–21; 8:2, 24–28; 11:11, 14; 1 Kgs 20:35–28) or as an execution of divine justice requiring the extirpation of the idolatrous "other" (Deut 7:2–5, 23–26). The herem as God's justice can be turned against Israelites themselves should they break their covenant with God (Deut 13:12–18).

Another ideology, the bardic tradition, is preserved in traditional biblical narrative style and portrays war as men's honorable sport or a contest in which a code of fair play operates. Combatants expect to fight their equals, as shown by General Joab's words to the younger, inexperienced warrior, Asahel (2 Sam 2:21–22), and the reaction of Goliath to the youthful David (1 Sam 17:43). A degree of respect and reciprocity is evident among enemies (Judg 8:18–21).

The ideology of tricksterism was a war ideology of the oppressed, who used deception to defend themselves or prevail. No code governs the fighting, but the cause is always just from the perspective of the underdogs. Examples of warrior tricksters include Samson (Judg 14–15), Ehud (Judg 3:12–30), and Jael (Judg 4–5). The ideology of expediency accepts that "war is hell." Any degree of cruelty is permissible to defeat the enemy, and brutal aggression is regarded as the activity of kings, including David (2 Sam 5:7–8, 8:2). The Hebrew Bible offers no true ideology of pacifism, but a tendency toward peace is implied in the ideology of non-participation. Rooted in biblical miracle accounts, this ideology suggests that Israel need not fight; God will defend and rescue His people. "Nonparticipation" is reflected in 2 Chronicles 20, which describes a scene in which the Judeans led by their king, Jehoshaphat, admit helplessness, confess their sins, and pray. They turn themselves over to the power of God, who soundly routs the enemy, causing the various invading groups to destroy one another (2 Chron 20:23).

Matching these ideologies with the actual conduct of wars in biblical times or with specific biblical contributors is difficult. The ideology of the ban is described by a ninth-century BCE *Moabite king on his victory stele; he claims to have "devoted Israel to destruction." There is no reliable evidence that Israel actually established itself in the land via the ban or conducted wars in this way during the monarchy, but the motif of "devotion to destruction" does provide an important ideological framework for biblical tales of conquest. The ban is a leitmotif in narratives concerning kings *Saul (1 Sam 15) and *Ahab (1 Kgs 20) and an important symbol in late biblical poetry (Isaiah). The bardic ideology is biblically set in the days of Israel's early heroes, the judges, and the early kings. Although this heroic ideology of war contributes to an ancient Israelite epic genre, it may not reflect the ways in which wars were actually fought. The ideology of expediency seems to be the most rooted in the realities of ancient Near Eastern warfare. All the ideologies, however, reflect an ongoing Israelite interest in security, the justification for killing, and the role of war in Israel's history.

Reports of war in the Hebrew Bible are balanced by contemplations on peace. Implicit in the bardic ideology is the concern with limits and codes, and implicit in nonparticipation is the possibility of not fighting at all. Deuteronomy 20 offers a code of sorts in which the possibility is, at least, offered for the enemy's surrender and for sparing his life (20:10–11). Fruit-bearing trees are to be spared (20:19–20), and some degree of status is offered to the unfortunate women who become spoils of war (Deut 21:14). The speech of the hero Jephthah in Judges 11:4–28 provides a virtual "just war" argument for fighting the *Ammonites; he does not desire war, but is justified for defensive reasons to fight if necessary. Overt critiques of warring behavior are offered by the eighth-century-BCE prophet *Amos (1:6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1) and the poet of *Genesis 49. Several passages enjoin proper and reconciliatory treatment of the enemy (2 Kgs 6; 2 Chron 28:15). The priestly passage of Numbers 31 acknowledges that war, with its inevitable death, defiles the fighters, who then need to mark ritually the passage from war status to peace status, from defilement to wholeness.

Post-biblical Jewish thinkers of the *rabbinic period continued to reflect on biblical texts dealing with war and peace. Creative exegeses bring forth significant nuances and suggest developments in attitudes to war and peace. For example, interpretive traditions in Sifre D'varim 194–196 push the biblical passage describing divinely commanded war in Deuteronomy 20 in the direction of nonparticipation, whereas midrashic traditions in Deuteronomy Rabbah 5:14 have the effect of turning *Joshua, the biblical imposer of the ban, into a leader who always sues for peace before fighting.

For further reading, see S. Niditch, War in the Hebrew Bible: A Study in the Ethics of Violence (1993); and G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (2000).

SUSAN NIDITCH

Bible: Translations and Translators. The Tanakh* or Jewish Bible is written primarily in Hebrew (with substantial portions of the books of *Ezra and *Daniel, plus phrases in *Genesis and *Jeremiah, in *Aramaic). However, whenever it has been perceived that large numbers of Jews were no longer well acquainted with Hebrew, translations into more readily understood languages have been undertaken. Such a situation is noted within the Hebrew Bible itself, as narrated in *Nehemiah 8. The scribe Ezra arrives in *Jerusalem in the mid-fifth century BCE with perhaps the earliest completed version of the *Torah (the Five Books of Moses) in Hebrew. The first language of the crowd that assembles at the Water Gate to hear him is Aramaic. Hence, translators, or we might say interpreters, provide a simultaneous rendering into Aramaic as Ezra reads the Torah in Hebrew.

The Hebrew word meaning "to translate," found in Nehemiah 8:8, also has the connotation of "to interpret," a reminder that even the most literal translation involves some degree of interpretation. The fact that an oral Aramaic translation/interpretation accompanied the reading of the Hebrew indicates that some translations, even written ones, were intended to accompany the Hebrew, rather than serve as independent versions. This may well have been the case when Aramaic biblical translations, known as Targumim*, were later recorded in writing.

The first written translation of the Hebrew Bible was in *Greek. This process took perhaps a century, beginning in *Alexandria, *Egypt, in the first quarter of the third century BCE. As related in the *Letter of Aristeas (written in the mid-second century BCE), *Ptolemy II Philadelphus, the ruler of Egypt, requested a version of the Jewish Law – that is, the Torah – in Greek, to be placed in his great library. Seventy-two elders were said to have been sent from Jerusalem by the High Priest to accomplish this task. Working as a committee, these individuals, chosen for their high morality as well as linguistic skills, completed their work in exactly seventy-two days.

Later retellings of this story by Jews such as *Philo and by Christians expanded on the "miraculous" aspects of the account. For the Letter of Aristeas, it was sufficient to record that the Jews of Alexandria accepted and acclaimed this Greek version much as the Israelites had done for the Hebrew text at Mount Sinai. To further strengthen the unique status of this text, which came to be known as the *Septuagint and to include the entire Hebrew Bible plus other materials now found in the *Apocrypha, a curse was put on anyone who would change as much as a letter of the Greek rendering.

It cannot be known with certainty exactly when and by whom the remainder of the Septuagint was produced. Many of its books follow the essentially literal approach taken by the translators of the Torah. Others diverge considerably. The reasons for these differences in approach are not known. Furthermore, the extent of the differences is difficult to chart because modern scholars are often uncertain about the nature of the Hebrew text available to the translators. For some books, it was very close to the *Masoretic text (the traditional text of the Hebrew Bible), although without vowels; for other books, it differed in length, order of material, and content. For some biblical books, Hebrew versions similar to what the Greek translators read have been found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls.

In spite of the view promoted by the Letter of Aristeas that the Greek should in no way be altered, many revisions were made, often to bring the Greek into closer alignment with the Hebrew then in use. Three revisers known by name are Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, all of whom were Jews. Their work began in the first century BCE and may have continued until the third century CE.

When the great codices that we know as Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Sinaiticus were compiled within third- and fourth-century-CE Christian communities, some of the work of the revisers (for example, Theodotion's version of Daniel and Aquila's version of *Ecclesiastes) were included, thereby increasing the heterogeneous nature of the Septuagint. The Septuagint's adoption by early Christians as their Old Testament led to a diminution of its use among Jews, although Greek-speaking Jews continued to use a form of Aquila's version for many centuries.

For the most part, the Septuagint was intended to replace, rather than accompany, the Hebrew text, unlike the Aramaic versions in written or oral form. Although written Targumim did not develop until the first or second century CE in *Palestine and *Babylonia, several Aramaic versions of biblical texts have been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Overall, the Targumim follow the Hebrew texts they are translating, but they are prone to substantial paraphrases and to tendencies such as the avoidance of anthropomorphisms relating to *God.

During the centuries that followed, Jews moved into many different lands with many different languages, typically producing one or more versions of the Hebrew Bible in the process. For Arabic-speaking Jews, the tenth-century translation prepared by *Saadia Gaon in Baghdad, the center of Jewish life in medieval *Iraq, is both representative and exemplary. Originally written in the Arabic language but with Hebrew characters (*Judeo-Arabic), Saadia's renderings reflected his view that, when confronted by substantial differences between the base text (here, the Hebrew Bible) and the language of the target audience (Arabic), one should place greater emphasis on what would be easiest for contemporary readers to understand. Thus, his version is often situated closer to the free rather than the literal "zone" on what might be called the "translation continuum."

On the European continent, there is an extensive history of translation of the Hebrew Bible into forms of German. Many of the earliest attempts display only rudimentary knowledge of either Hebrew or German. The *Judeo-German Tzene-rene from the mid-1600s, was promoted as a "woman's Bible," in keeping with the long-standing view that only women and children (and unlearned men, who were like women in their lack of an education in Hebrew) would need vernacular texts. At the end of the eighteenth century, Moses Mendelssohn, a major Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah) figure, produced a version that combined the best German diction and styling of his day with a distinctively Jewish exegetical stance. Like Saadia's translation, his earliest German version was rendered in Hebrew letters. Mendelssohn was convinced that his work would allow Jews, as Jews, to learn German and to integrate into the German-speaking majority culture. As is often the case, this translator had social, cultural, and political, as well as theological aims in mind.

In very much the opposite direction, philosophers Martin *Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig collaborated on a German-language translation in the 1920s that privileged the Hebrew to such an extent that the result was very difficult to understand without recourse to the original. Their purpose, which has been shared by other translators, was to emphasize the essential foreignness of the biblical text in modern society. By the time Buber had completed this mammoth task, many potential readers had been lost in the *Holocaust. This loss of readership was even more true for the *Yiddish version that Yehoash (pen name of Solomon Bloomgarden [1879–1927]) labored over for decades.

For Jews in *Britain, the King James Version (KJV) of 1611 seemed to suffice as a translation until the end of the eighteenth century. Along with the introduction of English- and Spanish-language sermons and prayer books, the earliest English versions of the Bible for Jewish readers appeared in the late 1700s. At first, they consisted of little more than a page of the KJV facing a page of Hebrew, with a sprinkling of notes from Jewish exegetes, especially *Rashi. Over the next century, the Anglo-Jewish community produced lists of passages that needed to be modified, new renderings of specific books, and a few complete translations. Rarely parting company with KJV style, these versions are mostly distinguished by the increasing prominence of those who produced or sponsored them.

In America, Isaac *Leeser (1806–1868), rabbi, newspaper editor, and organizer, prepared a new English version, beginning with the Torah, in the 1840s. Although his style was at times criticized as wooden, his rendering, in successive editions, served the American Jewish community until the early part of the twentieth century. In 1917, the *Jewish Publication Society of America (JPS), under the editorship of Max Margolis (1866–1932), issued its English translation. It looked and sounded very much like the KJV; indeed, for the most part, it retained the wording of the KJV, through the Revised Version of 1885, except where Christological or other explicitly Christian renderings were found.

In the late 1950s, the JPS embarked on an ambitious new project that, under the editorship and leadership of Harry M. Orlinsky (1908–1992), culminated in Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures, The New JPS Translation According to the Traditional Hebrew Text (1985). Orlinsky championed an approach to translation that was initially termed "dynamic equivalence," but is now most often known as "functional equivalence." In this view, the most important goal of a translation is to reflect for contemporary audiences how a given word or phrase would have functioned for its ancient hearers or readers. The results are less literal than renderings that exemplify formal equivalence, in which the form of the original is maintained wherever possible. In 2006, JPS published The Contemporary Torah: A Gender-Sensitive Adaptation of the JPS Translation, edited by D. E. S. Stein.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, there are a number of options, in addition to the JPS translations, for English-speaking Jews. They include the ArtScroll Tanach, whose target audience encompasses Orthodox Jews; its publisher, Mesorah, has also come out with editions of individual books of the Bible. Another version aimed at traditional Jews is Aryeh Kaplan's The Living Torah; his followers prepared three successive volumes, The Living Nach, which cover the remainder of the Hebrew Bible. Moreover, several Jewish scholars, following distinctive approaches to the biblical text, have come out with their own renderings of the Torah and other biblical materials. Among these works are the Schocken Bible: The Five Books of Moses, by Everett Fox; Richard E. Friedman, Commentary on the Torah; and Robert Alter, The Five Books of Moses: A Translation with Commentary.

Translations of the Bible are important indicators of how Jews have read and interpreted the text, and they, along with the translators responsible for them, should be valued and studied. At the same time, a Jewish translation should never be thought of as an end in itself but rather as a means to the highest possible familiarity with the Hebrew original. Thus, it is desirable that the Hebrew and the English (or other modern language) always appear together, so as to keep their proper relationship constantly in mind.

LEONARD GREENSPOON

Bible: Wisdom Literature. Wisdom literature is the technical name for the biblical genre exemplified by the books of *Proverbs, *Job, and *Ecclesiastes. The post-biblical books, *Wisdom of Ben Sira (also known as Ecclesiasticus) and Wisdom of Solomon, also fall into this category (see *APOCRYPHA). *Jeremiah 18:18 identifies the three categories of knowledge in the biblical era as priestly tradition, prophetic oracles, and wisdom: "Instruction shall not fail from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor oracle from the prophet." The source of wisdom is not divine, but human. The three biblical wisdom books were placed into the third section of the Hebrew Bible, the "Writings," because they were neither *Torah nor prophecy. As such, they are not read as part of the annual synagogue Torah reading/haftarah cycle, although Ecclesiastes is read on the *Sabbath that falls during *Sukkot, and scattered verses from all three books have found their way into the *liturgy.

The essence of wisdom literature is the application of human understanding to the question of how to live a prosperous, happy, and righteous life. In Proverbs, this question is answered by conveying moral teachings in short, memorable, sometimes thought-provoking maxims. Job and Ecclesiastes tackle darker, more troubling aspects of the human condition. The book of Job asks, "Why do bad things happen to good people?" or, as Jewish tradition frames this conundrum, tzaddik v'ra lo ("a righteous man who has it bad"). Ecclesiastes wonders whether true wisdom is attainable at all, at least amidst the illusory, ephemeral, material world, in the endless cycle of life "under the sun."

What all three works share is the conclusion that the ultimate source of human wisdom is the fear of *God: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov 1:7); "Fear of the Lord is wisdom; to shun evil is understanding" (Job 28:28); "The sum of the matter, when all is said and done: Revere God and observe His commandments!" (Eccl 12:13). It is the attitude behind these pronouncements that differs. In Proverbs, it is confident; in Ecclesiastes, the author comes to this position out of sophisticated resignation. The book of Job, more complicated still, oscillates between irony and a profound awareness of the gap between finite humanity and its infinite Creator.

Various passages elsewhere in the Bible have been linked to the wisdom tradition. It is likely that *Deuteronomy was quite influenced by it (compare Deut 1:15 with Exod 18:21). There are clearly some wisdom psalms as well, although there is no agreement on which ones they are. Yet Psalm 1 is certainly among them, suggesting that this tradition had a great deal to do with framing the book of *Psalms as a whole.

The Wisdom of Ben Sira, written at the beginning of the second century BCE, was originally written in Hebrew but survives completely only in Greek; about two-thirds of the original Hebrew text have now been discovered, partly in the Cairo *Genizah and partly among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Unlike its predecessors, this book unites the maxims of wisdom teaching with a survey of Jewish history in the section beginning, "Let us now praise famous men" (44:1). Although Jewish tradition excluded Wisdom of Ben Sira from the biblical canon, and one opinion, cited in BT Sanhedrin 100b, declares that it is forbidden to read it, statements from the work appear elsewhere in the *Talmud, sometimes cited with the formula that introduces biblical quotations. The Greek translation of Ben Sira was made by the author's grandson, who immigrated to *Egypt where there was a large Greek-speaking Jewish community. The Wisdom of Solomon may have been composed in in *Alexandria, Egypt, in the first century CE, most likely in Greek. Here, too, traditional wisdom is combined with a description of God's actions in history.

The closest continuation of wisdom literature in *rabbinic writings is the Mishnah tractate Avot. It is sometimes known in English as "Ethics of the Fathers," but is more properly understood as "Basic Principles." Here the Rabbis offer their own guidance about how life is best lived (see ETHICS, RABBINIC). As in rabbinic literature in general, they understand every biblical reference to "wisdom" as a reference to *Torah – God's *revelation to the Jewish people as understood by its interpreters within the rabbinic tradition. Elsewhere in later *Judaism, one may trace the continuation of wisdom literature in medieval thought; in the moralistic writings of the Musar movement; and, via Sefer Yetzirah*, in the theosophic and *mystical tradition.

MICHAEL CARASIK

Bible: Women: See entries under WOMEN

Biblical Commentary: Middle Ages to 1800. During the rabbinic period, the Sages produced a steady stream of *aggadic (nonlegal) commentary on the *Torah and other biblical books, interpreting the text in a creative, homiletical fashion that offered moral, didactic, and theological instruction. These works of *midrash were compiled into books arranged either as verse-by-verse commentaries (e.g., Midrash Rabbah on the *Torah and *Five Scrolls) or as collections of sermons (e.g., Pesikta Rabbati or Pesikta de-Rav Kahana).

It was not until the *Geonic period, when major Jewish centers flourished under Islamic rule, that commentaries as we know them began to be produced. They were preceded by grammatical treatises, paraphrases, and glossaries in *Judeo-Persian and *Judeo-Arabic, many of which were of *Karaite provenance. The earliest commentary that has survived more or less intact is Pitron Shenem 'Asar (Commentary on the Twelve [Minor Prophets]) by Daniel al-Kumisi, a Karaite communal leader and scholar, who immigrated from northern Persia to Jerusalem ca. 880 CE. Daniel's sophisticated exegetical work was a distinct departure from his *Rabbanite and Karaite predecessors; written in Hebrew, it was characterized by a strong philological sensibility, cohesive analysis, and sensitivity to the Bible's stylistic qualities (e.g., the use of metaphor or simile). Although not yet called so by name, this was the beginning of peshat or contextual interpretation.

A wealth of Judeo-Arabic commentary was produced in the tenth century. *Saadia Gaon (882–942) wrote translations and commentaries for many biblical books, as well as grammatical and lexicographical treatises. His extensive introductions discussed grammatical, exegetical, and philosophical issues and polemicized against the Karaites. He advocated interpreting the text according to its contextual meaning, unless common sense, experience, reason, or tradition demanded otherwise. Although his Karaite opponents advocated absolute freedom of interpretation, Saadia feared this approach would lead to religious anarchy and argued for maintaining a balance between freedom and the demands of tradition. This debate would reverberate in Jewish intellectual circles for many centuries.

A flourishing Karaite community in tenth-century *Jerusalem became a center of learning and inspiration for Karaites throughout the Middle East. There, the prolific exegete Japheth ben Eli, the only scholar to have translated and commented on the entire biblical corpus, wrote voluminous commentaries in the peshat tradition. These commentaries were influential among both Karaites and Rabbanites of succeeding generations, the latter gaining access to Japheth's work mainly through the mediation of Abraham *ibn Ezra.

In the tenth and eleventh centuries the intellectual and spiritual center of medieval Jewry shifted to Muslim *Spain where grammarians such as Menaḥem ben Saruk, *Dunash ben Labrat, and especially Judah Ḥayyuj and Jonah ibn Janah refined the study of biblical Hebrew *grammar and philology. By the time of Abraham ibn Ezra (1089–1164) this golden age was drawing to a close. Ibn Ezra, a prominent grammarian, biblical commentator, philosopher, and poet, left his homeland in 1140 for points east, bringing the sophisticated grammatical, exegetical, and philosophical learning of Muslim Spain to the European Jewish communities through which he passed (including *Italy, *France, and *England). His commentaries, based on a thorough knowledge of Hebrew grammar and lexicography, are grounded in reason and logic. Ibn Ezra believed that Scripture uses human language and conforms to the rules of grammar, syntax, and rhetoric. A steadfast opponent of the Karaites and loyal defender of the oral tradition, Ibn Ezra never accepted as peshat an interpretation that contradicted Jewish law. He incorporated his philosophical views into his commentaries, especially about creation and God's relationship with the land and people of Israel (see GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; and THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL).

In the twelfth century, the *Kimḥi family emigrated from Spain to Narbonne, *Provence, joining a growing community of scholars who followed the intellectual traditions of Spanish Jewry. The grammarian and exegete, David Kimḥi (Radak; ca. 1160–1235), wrote commentaries on the Torah, *Prophets, *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Job, and *Chronicles. His grammatical works, Mikhlol and Shorashim, contain considerable material of exegetical value. His commentaries, which often relied on his predecessors, represent the best of the Spanish peshat tradition but also are sensitive to the midrashic tradition as exemplified in the commentaries of *Rashi (see later). He peppered his commentaries with philosophical ideas of the *Maimonidean rationalist school and also applied certain biblical prophecies and verses from Psalms to the Jews of his own day; many of his writings include prayers and hopes for the *messianic era and ultimate *redemption.

In the second half of the eleventh century another school of peshat exegesis began to develop in northern France, drawing on the work of anonymous glossators, or poterim. The founder of the school was Solomon ben Isaac, commonly known as *Rashi (1040–1105), who wrote commentaries on almost the entire biblical corpus as well as an indispensable commentary on the *Talmud. The majority of Rashi's Torah commentary is based on midrashic sources, but it also includes many grammatical and lexicographical comments as well as comments on aspects of daily life and geographical locations. Its genius lies in its clarity of language, felicity of expression, and skillful editing of its sources. Rashi's purpose in his commentaries is to explain the text in its context; he usually avoids midrashic comments that stray too far from the plain meaning of the text but does use them on occasion for didactic or polemical purposes. His commentary has enjoyed unparalleled popularity and has been translated and commented on numerous times.

Rashi's students and younger contemporaries in the northern French peshat school of exegesis moved away from his approach, severely restricting midrashic elements and focusing on contextual exegesis. Thus, Joseph Kara (1050–1125) argued for understanding the text on its own terms without midrashic embellishment. Rashbam (Samuel ben Meir; ca. 1080–ca. 1160), Rashi's grandson, was the foremost figure of this school. He is best known for his Torah commentary (he also probably commented on most of the *Five Scrolls and possibly *Job) in which he shows himself to be a radical adherent of peshat interpretation, favoring it over rabbinic tradition when the two clashed. He distinguished between halakhic commentary, used to establish Jewish practice, and peshat commentary, used to determine the meaning of the text, claiming a legitimate role for both. Interested in grammar and style, Rashbam was remarkably sensitive to literary aspects of the text. Eliezer of Beaugency (mid-twelfth century), the third major exponent of the peshat school, commented on many books, although only his commentaries on the Latter *Prophets have survived. His style is paraphrastic, and he pays a great deal of attention to matters of redaction. Joseph Bekhor Shor (1130–1200), the last member of the school, was a transitional figure between the peshat school and the Tosafists. His Torah commentary included midrashic material and gematria, the latter a feature it shared with those of the German pietists (Ḥasidei Ashkenaz*) of the thirteenth century. Later generations mostly neglected the peshat school; its work was only rediscovered in the nineteenth century. In recent years it has been the subject of renewed interest and study.

The thirteenth century witnessed the maturation of the mystical trend in Judaism called the Kabbalah (tradition), culminating in the production of the Zohar, which is generally attributed to *Moses de Leon and his circle. It is in the Zohar and other writings of Moses de Leon that one first encounters the acronym pardes (pardes is also word meaning "orchard" in Hebrew), referring to four levels of interpretation of the biblical text: peshat, remez, derash, and sod, or historical, philosophical, homiletical, and mystical. The kabbalists seem to have introduced the fourth level to validate the work of their predecessors and to claim pride of place for their innovative mode of interpretation. The mystic, Baḥia ben Asher (d. 1340), was one of the few medieval exegetes to use all four levels of interpretation in one commentary, although he was not yet familiar with the term pardes.

*Naḥmanides (Moses ben Naḥman; Ramban; 1194–1270), the preeminent figure of mid-thirteenth-century Spanish Jewry, was best known for his commentary on the Torah. This commentary marks a new stage in the history of biblical interpretation because it was influenced by both the Spanish and *Ashkenazic traditions. Although trained in grammar and philology, Naḥmanides found the grammatical approach of the Spanish school, exemplified by Abraham ibn Ezra, too narrow and limiting. Sympathetic to Rashi's selective use of midrashic material, he struck a balance between the two approaches, incorporating theology, ethics, history, and character analysis into a holistic approach that operates on several levels. Ramban, who is famous for his psychological insights and deep understanding of human nature, was also a genuine kabbalist, steeped in the mystical traditions of the Provençal school of Kabbalah, and he makes numerous allusions to esoteric meanings of various biblical texts. In addition, he was among the few medieval commentators who made use of typology, the method of ascribing long-term influence and significance to the deeds and actions of biblical figures, a theological notion articulated in the expression, ma'aseh avot siman le-vanim ("the deed of the ancestors is a sign for their children").

This period also produced a number of Aristotelian philosophers, who sought to harmonize their philosophical learning with the teachings of the Torah. The Provençal philosopher and biblical commentator, Levi ben Gershon (Ralbag, *Gersonides, 1280–1344), the greatest of these philosophers, was arguably the most original Jewish thinker of the late Middle Ages. His commentaries on the Torah, Former *Prophets, *Five Scrolls, and Job are laced with philosophical insights, but contain straightforward peshat interpretations as well.

Fifteenth-century Spain produced a number of prominent biblical scholars, including Isaac *Arama (ca. 1420–1494) whose commentary 'Akedat Yitzhak, a fine example of philosophico-homiletical exegesis, has retained a loyal following to this day. His student Isaac Abarbanel (also spelled Abrabanel or *Abravanel; 1437–1508), was a statesman, philosopher, and master exegete who produced voluminous commentaries on the Torah, Prophets, and *Daniel, arranged in problem–solution fashion. His primary focus was peshat, but Abarbanel also incorporated midrashim that he found acceptable. Although his theology preferred faith over reason, as a Renaissance humanist he was open to new ideas and introduced much contemporary thought into his writing. His commentaries on *Samuel and *Kings are full of his ideas about monarchy, which, based on his personal experience, he did not hold in high esteem.

The Early Modern period (sixteenth to eighteenth centuries) was not an era of great innovation but it produced a number of commentaries of lasting importance. Obadiah Sforno (1475–1550), rabbi, physician, and Renaissance humanist, was the most famous Italian biblical commentator of the sixteenth century. His commentaries on the Torah and Psalms, written in the peshat tradition with a humanist sensibility, are still widely read. Ephraim Solomon ben Aaron of Luntshits (1550–1619), rabbi, preacher, and communal leader in *Prague, was the author of Keli Yekar (Precious Vessel), a very popular and insightful homiletical commentary on the Torah. The Moroccan rabbi, Ḥayyim ben Moses ibn Attar (1696–1743), was the author of the compendious Torah commentary Or ha-Ḥayyim (The Light of Life), which included elements of peshat interpretation, as well as psychological analyses of biblical characters and their motives, interpretations of rabbinic statements, moral instruction and admonition, mystical lore, halakhic discussions, and historical and personal reflections. In Jaworow, *Galicia, David Altschuler and his son Jehiel produced immensely popular commentaries on the Prophets and Writings, Metzudat David and Metzudat Tziyyon. All of these commentaries are included in various editions of the Mikra'ot Gedolot, the "Rabbinic Bible," which has been produced in countless editions since the early 1800s.

Toward the end of the eighteenth century, the Haskalah* (Jewish Enlightenment) was under way in *Berlin. Moses *Mendelssohn (1729–1786), its most famous proponent, produced a new edition of the Bible, called Netivot ha-Shalom (Paths of Peace), intended for the educated German-speaking Jewish laity. It featured a carefully edited Hebrew text, a German translation in Hebrew characters, and a commentary in Hebrew called the Bi'ur (commentary), culled mainly from medieval peshat commentators (Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Rashbam, Ramban), but also including new linguistic and literary insights. Mendelssohn was assisted in this enterprise by other scholars, including Naftali Herz Wessely (1725–1805) and Solomon Dubno (1738–1813). They went out of their way to include both halakhic and aggadic rabbinic interpretations, demonstrating their beauty and value to an audience that may have had little exposure to rabbinic literature. Netivot ha-Shalom, which went through many nineteenth-century editions, paved the way for more critical works incorporating the findings of contemporary non-Jewish scholarship.

For further reading, see A. Y. Finkel, The Great Torah Commentators (1990); M. Saebo, ed., Hebrew Bible/ Old Testament: The History of its Interpretation, vol. I/2: The Middle Ages (2000), vol. II: From the Renaissance to the Enlightenment (2008); and B. D. Walfish, "Medieval Jewish Interpretation," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (2003), 1876–1900.

BARRY DOV WALFISH

Birobidjan is a geographic territory in *Russia's Far East, adjacent to the Chinese border. In the late 1920s the *Soviet Union designated certain territory in this region as the national homeland of Soviet Jewry. The Kremlin hoped that Birobidjan, officially known as the Jewish Autonomous Region since 1934, would become the center of a Soviet Jewish culture rooted in *Yiddish and *communist values and would serve as an alternative to *Palestine as the center of Jewish state-building. Yiddish, the nationally designated language of Soviet Jewry, was seen as the key to the secularization of Jewish society and culture. The Soviet government tried to foster the region's specifically Jewish nature by setting up Yiddish schools, newspapers, and cultural institutions. Street signs, railway station signs, and postmarks appeared in both Yiddish and Russian, and the teaching of Yiddish was obligatory in schools where Russian was the language of instruction. However, given its remote location and inclement living conditions, Birobidjan never attracted many Jews; the government's campaign against Jewish culture and intellectuals after the mid-1930s also undermined efforts to realize Birobidjan's goal as a center of Soviet Jewish society. For further reading, see R. Weinberg, Stalin's Forgotten Zion (1998).

ROBERT WEINBERG

Blessing of the Moon (kiddush levanah) is a *blessing established by the *Tannaim to be recited on seeing the New Moon. The new month (Rosh Ḥodesh) was based on the observation of the moon and was to be formally blessed by the head of the Jewish court (Beit Din*). It has become customary in traditional Jewish practice to recite this blessing with a minyān* at the conclusion of the *Sabbath. The blessing is to be recited between the third and fifteenth day of the month, ideally when the moon is visible.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Blessings. A berakhah (pl. berakhot), or liturgical benediction, is a Jewish *prayer that contains the words barukh atah adonai (Blessed" or "Praised are You, O Ruler"). When this formula appears at the beginning of the berakhah, it is usually followed by the words, eloheinu melek ha-olam ("Our God, King [or Sovereign] of the Universe [or Eternal Sovereign]").

A berakhah is the Jewish response to a sense of awe in the presence of a divine gift, which might be as simple as a piece of bread or as important as a major life-cycle event. The first three words of the formula, which appear only twice in the Hebrew *Bible, were universally accepted as normative by the third century CE. Some have connected the word berakhah with the word berekh, which means "knee," and see the act of blessing as related to kneeling or genuflecting as a symbol of devotion to *God.

Judaism validates the physical dimension of life and sees physical gratification as an appropriate experience for religious devotion. There are berakhot for smell, sight, hearing, touch, and taste. One interesting example calls for a berakhah when one is in a place where one feels a miracle was performed; because the individual makes that decision, it is clear that the perception of the miraculous is understood to be subjective.

SAUL WACHS

Blessings: Before and After Meals. These benedictions express long-standing Jewish traditions of offering thanksgiving. The *blessing (berakhah) that precedes any substantial meal (defined by many as including bread) is called Birkat ha-Motzi. It consists of the usual petiḥah or opening formula: "Barukh atah Adonai Eloheinu melek ha-olam" ("Blessed" or "Praised are You Adonai, our God, King, or Sovereign of the Universe . . .") and ends with the words, "ha-motzi leḥem min ha-aretz" ("who takes out" or "brings forth bread from the earth"). Most berakhot that are recited before eating describe God's act with the verb "borei," which is understood as "creates." An example is "... borei peri ha-gafen" ("who creates the fruit of the vine"), which is recited before drinking wine or grape juice. This verb is only used to describe divine creativity. Perhaps one reason why the berakhah for bread employs a different verb is that the production of bread involves a combination of human and divine activity.

*Psalm 104:15 notes the distinctiveness of bread: "bread sustains human life." Psalm 104:14 serves as a source for the text of the berakhah: "You cause grass to grow for cattle and plants for people to cultivate, bringing forth bread from the earth." Therefore, the blessing offers a hidden *midrash or rabbinic interpretation. In Psalm 104:14, human labor produces the bread. In the berakhah, God brings forth the bread, a reminder that human beings have a partner in producing the food that they eat.

Finally, the berakhah before meals uses the verb motzi ("takes out" or "brings forth"). The infinitive form, l'hotzi, from which motzi derives, is most commonly used in the Hebrew *Bible in connection with the Exodus from *Egypt and recalls the gift of freedom. Use of this verb in the blessing before a meal evokes the many places in the Bible where its meaning is attached to the transition from slavery to freedom. The *commandment to recall the Exodus is mentioned more frequently than any other in the Hebrew Bible and is usually accompanied by an injunction to care for the poor. Thus, the verb motzi also reinforces the idea, embedded in every berakhah, of the commandment to share so that no one is without sustenance.

Birkat ha-Mazon (grace after meals) consists of a collection of berakhot and other texts. The mandate to recite Birkat ha-Mazon is considered to be biblical, which makes it unique among all liturgical benedictions. The proof-text is Deuteronomy 8:10: "When you have eaten your fill, you shall give thanks to the Lord your God for the good land which He has given you." It is striking that there is a mandate to give thanks after eating. The context in Deuteronomy 8:11–18 makes clear the danger that, in a state of satiation, one might be tempted to forget God and celebrate only human achievements. A shared sense of dependence on God is more likely to express itself in acts of generosity and responsibility.

Although shared meals and religious fellowship are very old, it is generally accepted that the first three berakhot of Birkat ha-Mazon stem from the period of the *Second Temple. Talmudic tradition, however, ascribes them to biblical figures (*Moses, *Joshua, *David, and *Solomon) and connects the texts with major events in their lives (Moses gave thanks for the food as the manna fell from heaven, etc.). It seems likely that the text in its current form developed in stages, with spontaneous formulations gradually incorporating fixed topics and then fixed phrases. The first berakhah, cast in universal language, thanks God for providing sustenance for all. The second berakhah speaks to the experience of the Jew and expresses thanks for the Land of *Israel, for freedom from bondage in Egypt, for the berit (*covenant) between God and Israel, the *Torah, life, and food. The third blessing, petitionary in nature, asks God's compassion for the Jewish people, *Jerusalem, and the *Temple and requests that no one go hungry or be dependent on the gifts of others. The fourth and final berakhah, understood to have been added after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, recapitulates some of the earlier themes, expressing the goodness of life and God's beneficence to all living creatures.

According to the Babylonian *Talmud (Berakhot 48b), this final blessing was added to the original three in gratitude for the burial of those who died at Beitar, the site of the final battle in the Second *Jewish War against *Rome (132–135 CE) (see also BAR KOKHBA). It is an expansion of a short berakhah to be recited when one hears good news. Its status as an addition to the original three blessings is reflected in the fact that it starts with a petiḥah or opening formula, an indication of a new beginning. A series of petitions follow that vary in different rites (that is, liturgies associated with specific Jewish communities). Each begins by calling God "ha-Raḥaman" (the merciful one). They reiterate themes of sustenance, freedom, and *redemption.

It is customary for a guest to lead Birkat ha-Mazon and to invoke God's blessings on the host and hostess. As in other major Jewish prayers, the final theme is shalom (peace). When three or more people eat together, Birkat ha-Mazon is introduced by a formula stating that all that is enjoyed belongs to God and therefore it is appropriate to express thanks for these gifts. This section is more fluid than most parts of Jewish *worship, and some people have added petitions that invoke God's blessings on the host country, the State of *Israel, the governments that protect us, and on all who work for peace. At the end of the grace are a series of biblical verses that reiterate the Jewish belief that God cares for everyone. Thus, Birkat ha-Mazon concludes as it began, expressing appreciation for God's role in sustaining life.

SAUL WACHS

Blood Libel: See BEILIS TRIAL; RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION

B'nai B'rith. See ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA; UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES

Bolshevism: *Russian Empire and *Soviet Union. Bolshevism, the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary movement that took power in the Russian Empire, was frequently seen, especially by its opponents, as "Jewish." This connection contained elements of both truth and falsehood. Jews who became Bolsheviks frequently Russified their names and rejected any identification with either Judaism or Jewishness. Such a rejection was in harmony with the Bolshevik project. That is, Bolshevism, which promised racial blindness and equality for all, was receptive to Jews as individuals; the Bolshevik Revolution abolished the *Pale of Settlement, together with all residency and professional restrictions on Jews. However, Bolshevism was not, either in theory or in practice, receptive to Judaism, which it condemned together with all religions as an "opiate of the masses." Moreover, Bolshevik ideology demanded that national identities be abandoned in favor of Marxist internationalism (see MARX, KARL).

Jews in the Russian Empire who became *communists comprised a small minority of the overall Jewish population; likewise, communists of Jewish origin were never the majority of Bolshevik Party members, either before or after the Bolshevik Revolution. Yet Jews were overrepresented in the Bolshevik Party: In 1927, when Jews comprised 1.8% of the total Soviet population, communists of Jewish origin represented 4.3% of the membership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Only 5% of Jewish Communist Party members in 1922 had been Bolsheviks before the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. Before that event, most Jews active in the Russian left had been Mensheviks or *Bundists. After 1917, the Bolsheviks monopolized the Russian left, and options such as Menshevism and Bundism were effectively foreclosed.

More striking was Jewish overrepresentation in the upper ranks of the party leadership, especially during the early decades of the Soviet regime when Jews played a prominent role. Of twenty-one Central Committee members in August 1917, six – Lev Kamenev, Grigory Sokolnikov, Yakov Sverdlov, Leon Trotsky, Moisei Uritskii, and Grigory Zinoviev – were of Jewish origin. In January 1937, the 111 highest ranking officers in the Soviet secret police, the NKVD, included 42 Jews, 35 Russians, 8 Latvians, and 26 individuals of other nationalities. During the Stalinist purges, known as the "Terror," the ethnic balance shifted quickly. By July 1939, ethnic Russians filled 67% of the highest ranking positions in the Soviet NKVD, ethnic Ukrainians 12%, and Jews 4%. Soviet *Ukraine followed a not dissimilar model: In 1936, sixty of ninety ranking officers in the Ukrainian branch of the NKVD were Jews. By 1939 this number had fallen dramatically.

In 1918, "Jewish sections," or Evsektzii, were established within the Bolshevik Party, together with an administrative leadership, the Jewish Commissariat, or Evkom. The Evsektzii, which remained in existence until 1930, were intended to facilitate the integration of Russian Jews into the Soviet project. Practically speaking, the Evsektzii were charged with overseeing the destruction of traditional Jewish life, translating communism into *Yiddish, bolshevizing the Jewish proletariat, and reconstructing Jewish life in accordance with Lenin's korenizatsiia (indigenization) campaign and its slogan: "National in form, socialist in content." (Leninist policy on nationalities was predicated on the idea that, just as the proletarian dictatorship was a stage toward the eventual withering away of the state, so was the blossoming of national cultures a stage toward the eventual withering away of national differences.) Thus, the Bolshevik Party and the Evsektzii, in particular, promoted the *Yiddish press, Yiddish publishing, and Yiddish schools; the Moscow State Yiddish *Theater flourished. *Hebrew, conversely, was identified with the "bourgeois-clerical-*Zionist camp" and accordingly was persecuted. In 1928, the Soviet government approved the creation of an autonomous Jewish agricultural settlement in *Birobidjan, a remote region in the Soviet Far East distant from existing centers of Jewish settlement. In the following decade some 43,000 Jews settled in Birobidjan; of these, only 19,000 decided to remain. *Judaism was condemned in the Jewish Autonomous Region, while Yiddish culture was championed. The Yiddish novelist Dovid Bergelson dedicated his story "Barg-aruf" (Uphill) to Birobidjan, where it was published in 1936 (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY).

During World War II, Soviet authorities supported the establishment of the *Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC) whose chairman, Solomon Mikhoels, was also the director of the Moscow State Yiddish Theater. The purpose of the Committee was to disseminate pro-Soviet propaganda among Jewish communities abroad and in this way to garner Western political and financial support for Soviet war efforts against *Nazi Germany. Among the results of the Committee's work was the publication of the so-called Black Book, documenting both the *Holocaust and the Jewish resistance movement.

The role of Jews in the Soviet regime decreased significantly after the war. Solomon Mikhoels was murdered in 1948 on Stalin's orders. That same year Stalin initiated an antisemitic campaign against so-called rootless cosmopolitans, Soviet support for the new State of *Israel ended, and the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was disbanded. The Moscow State Yiddish Theater was liquidated in 1949. In August 1952, during the "Night of the Murdered Poets," thirteen JAC members, including prominent Yiddish writers and poets, were executed. By this time Jews had ceased to play a prominent role in the Bolshevik Party.

Scholarship on this topic includes B.-C. Pinchuk, Shtetl Jews under Soviet Rule: Eastern Poland on the Eve of the Holocaust (1990); S. Redlich, War, Holocaust and Stalinism (1995); Y. Slezkine, The Jewish Century (2004); and R. S. Wistrich, Revolutionary Jews from Marx to Trotsky (1976).

MARCI SHORE

Boston, a port city founded in 1630, is the capital of Massachusetts and the largest metropolitan area (approximately 4.5 million) in New England. Boston's Jewish community emerged much later than those in other major Eastern Seaboard cities; as a result, its character was quite different. Few Jews passed through Boston during the colonial era; there was neither an organized Jewish community nor a significant Jewish presence in Boston's port. Similarly, the German Jewish immigration of the mid-nineteenth century had a limited impact on Boston. Only in the 1880s and 1890s, when Jewish immigration from Eastern Europe to America intensified, did Boston's Jewish community grow significantly.

The first East European Jews to settle in Boston worked primarily in the textile and shoe industries. They first lived in the South End, but the North End soon became a center of Jewish life; Jews lived alongside other minorities and many social and religious organizations emerged. The Federation of Jewish Charities, established in Boston in 1895, is considered the first federated Jewish philanthropy in the United States. Many Jews later moved to Chelsea and Boston's West End, and then in large numbers to Dorchester and Roxbury. By 1917, Boston's Jewish population was approximately 75,000, making it the fifth largest Jewish community in the United States.

These immigration patterns shaped Boston's character in several ways. The battles between German and East European Jews that defined most other large cities were drastically reduced because there was no entrenched German Jewish elite. This lack of a German Jewish presence also meant that Reform Judaism grew more slowly in Boston than it did elsewhere and that the debate over Zionism in Boston was much less contentious than in other American Jewish communities. One estimate suggests that 90% of Boston's Jews supported Zionism, and Louis D. Brandeis, one of America's leading Zionist voices, was a key leader of Boston's Jewish community.

Boston was a homogeneous city, and its Jews faced the same xenophobia as the city's other minorities. This initially made Boston a much less appealing place for new immigrants to settle. Antisemitism was a significant concern, particularly during the 1930s, and anti-Jewish violence in the 1960s impelled many Jews to move to new Jewish suburban centers in Newton and Brookline.

According to the 2005 Boston Community Survey conducted by the Steinhardt Social Research Institute, the Greater Boston Jewish community numbered approximately 210,000 Jews, comprising 7.2% of the population. The community was well educated: 91% of Jewish adults aged twenty-five and older were college graduates, and 27% had advanced degrees. Boston's intermarriage rate was 37%, nearly identical to that of New York City, but below the national average. According to the survey, the overwhelming majority of Boston Jewish adults were connected to Judaism in some way – for example, 85% donated to Jewish organizations, and 74% identified with Judaism through religious practice. Nearly half of all Boston Jewish adults in 2005 belonged to a religious congregation.

For further reading, see J. Sarna, E. Smith, and S. Kosofsky, eds., The Jews of Boston (1995); and Steinhardt Social Research Institute, The 2005 Boston Community Survey.

MICHAEL R. COHEN

Brandeis, Louis Dembitz (1856–1941), American jurist and Zionist leader, was born in Louisville, Kentucky, but established his career in Boston after graduating from Harvard Law School in 1876. President Woodrow Wilson appointed Brandeis, an outspoken reformer, to the Supreme Court in 1916, where he served until his retirement in 1939. He was the first Jew appointed to the court, and his confirmation was highly contentious. Brandeis was a supporter of Zionism, and he played an important role in persuading Wilson to support the Balfour Declaration, a British statement of support for an eventual Jewish homeland in Palestine, despite opposition from the State Department and Wilson's other advisors. As leader of the Federation of American Zionists beginning in 1914, Brandeis was able to reconcile support for Zionism with living in America in a way that made the movement acceptable to many Jews who had no intention of moving to Palestine. For a recent biography, see M. Urofsky, Louis D. Brandeis: A Life (2009); and see UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS; and ZIONISM: UNITED STATES.

Brazil. Although the Brazilian census of 1872 recorded no Jewish inhabitants in Brazil, perhaps two thousand Jews were settled there at that time. They made significant social and economic progress in the capital city, Rio de Janeiro, and established some communal institutions. Most Jews in late-nineteenth-century Brazil were the descendants of Ladino-speaking Sephardic North Africans who settled in Belém do Pará, with a smaller group going to Rio de Janeiro. Many were merchants who had discovered that they could easily obtain Brazilian naturalization certificates and thus return to Morocco with a sense of security.

The first proposal for Jewish colonization of Brazil was formulated in 1881 but was never acted on. The Jewish Colonization Association formed two agricultural colonies in Rio Grande do Sul between 1904 and 1924. These Eastern European Jewish colonists numbered no more than a few thousand, yet were critical to orienting Jewish migration toward Brazil, especially after World War I. Jews made up about 45% to 50% of immigrants arriving in Brazil from Eastern Europe after 1920. Between 1924 and 1934, Eastern European immigration to Brazil increased almost tenfold, and by the end of the 1930s the Jewish population of Brazil approached 60,000.

Eastern European Jews settled primarily in the states of São Paulo, Rio Grande do Sul, and Rio de Janeiro; they achieved a level of economic success matched only by immigrants from the Middle East and Japan. This combination of economic success and cultural difference made Jews particular targets of Brazilian nativists during the Great Depression. By 1934 immigration quotas had been established, and criticism of Jewish immigration became a regular component of political discourse. Beginning in 1935, Brazil began to deny visas to Jews, an indication that antisemitism was common among Brazilian intellectuals and policymakers in the 1930s. However, Jewish immigration continued according to established patterns, largely because Jewish leaders in and out of Brazil were able to convince important politicians that refugees from German-speaking Europe could bring skills and capital. In 1938 more Jews entered Brazil than in any of the ten previous years.

Jewish settlement expanded in the 1950s when significant numbers of Middle Eastern Jews, notably from Egypt and Syria, arrived after the Suez Crisis. According to the 2000 census, Brazil's Jewish population is 86,825; virtually all live in urban areas. Some Jewish organizations in Brazil place the number between 100,000 and 140,000.

The largest Jewish community is in São Paulo, Brazil's largest city, with 60,000 members in a population of 10.4 million. The second largest Jewish community is in Rio de Janeiro (25,000–30,000 Jews in a population of 5.85 million); the third is in Porto Alegre (in the southern state of Rio Grande do Sul) with about 10,000–12,000 Jews in a population of about 1.36 million. There are also communities in Belo Horizonte (5,000), Curitiba (3,000), Santos (1,500), Salvador (1,000), and Recife (1,000).

For further reading, see J. Lesser, Welcoming the Undesirables: Brazil and the Jewish Question (1995).

JEFFREY LESSER

Breaking of the Vessels (shevirat ha-kelim) is the central dramatic event in the detailed myth of the evolution of divine and earthly realms in *Lurianic *Kabbalah. The *Safed kabbalist, Moses *Cordovero, introduced the term kelim (vessels), a generation before Luria, to describe the structure of the divine *sefirot as vessels into which divine essence is poured to form divine powers of specific character and function. This process may be perceived as an inverse presentation of the Aristotelian concepts of matter and form; here, the more divine element is the essence, the counterpart of formless matter. Luria transformed this theosophical conception into a mythical creation narrative: After the *tzimtzum, the contraction of the infinite Godhead into itself, a line of divine light entered the empty space and began to form the vessels and to fill them with pure divine light, the essence. A catastrophe occurred when the created vessels could not contain the essence and shattered; their shards created the lower realms in which the universe later came into being. One of the explanations for this event is that the vessels contained within them the potential seeds of evil, which rebelled against the attempt to integrate them in the positive process of creation. After this shattering, the process of *tikkun, mending the vessels, began. It will culminate in the eradication of evil and constitute the true, final, divine unity. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1955); and idem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1965).

JOSEPH DAN

Bride and Bridegroom. Biblical prophets use bridal imagery to characterize both Israel's unfaithfulness to *God (e.g., *Jer 2:32) and Israel's future *redemption when "a sound of joy and gladness, the voice of bridegroom (hatan) and bride (kallah)" (Jer 33:11) will be heard in the land. *Isaiah 62:4–5 imagines both the redeemed people and the restored Land of *Israel as a beloved bride. This metaphorical association of *marriage with joy and prosperity, fertility, and national rebirth became a part of Jewish life and practice. The seven blessings (sheva berakhot) recited at traditional Jewish weddings (found in BT Ketubbot 7b–8a) incorporate Jeremiah's prophecies of a messianic future with the happiness of the present, praising God who creates "joy and gladness, groom and bride, mirth, glad song, pleasure, delight, love, brotherhood, peace, and companionship" and "who causes the groom to rejoice with his bride." According to BT Berakhot 6b, gladdening the bride and groom is considered a legal obligation. Amusing the bride and groom with singing, dancing, and joking became traditional ways of celebrating Jewish weddings.

The *Song of Songs uses the Hebrew word kallah, generally translated as "bride," as a term of endearment for the female beloved (4:6–12, 5:1). Traditionally Jews understood this biblical book as an allegory referring to the loving intimacy between God and Israel. Some Jewish traditions connected with the festival of *Shavuot, which is linked with the revelation of the *Torah at Mount Sinai, celebrate the metaphorical marriage between God and Israel. In *Sephardic communities, the Sabbath before Shavuot is called Shabbat Kallah (Sabbath of the Bride).

The theme of the *Torah as bride and Israel as bridegroom, with God serving as divine matchmaker, is also found in traditional rituals connected with the autumn festival of *Simḥat Torah: The reader of the final section of the Torah is called hatan Torah (bridegroom of the Torah), and the reader of the first section of Genesis is known as hatan bereshit (bridegroom of the beginning). In other traditions the *Sabbath is personified as Israel's bride. According to the midrash collection Genesis Rabbah 11:8, the Sabbath is the bridal partner of the Jewish people. The ceremony of Kabbalat Shabbat (Welcoming the Sabbath) began in the sixteenth-century community of *mystics in *Safed. There, Solomon ha-Levi Alkabetz (ca. 1500–1580) wrote the famous invocation to the Sabbath bride, "Lekhah dodi likrat kallah, penei Shabbat nekabbalah" (Go, my beloved, to meet the bride, let us receive the presence of the Sabbath), that is still a part of the Sabbath eve liturgy.

For further reading, see E. Ginsburg, The Sabbath in the Classical Kabbalah (1989); M. Idel, "Sexual Metaphors and Praxis in the Kabbalah," in The Jewish Family, ed. D. Kraemer (1989), 197–224; and B. A. Holdrege, "Bride of Israel," in Rethinking Scripture, ed. M. Levering (1989), 180–261.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Britain: Early Modern and Modern. The modern history of Jews in the United Kingdom of Great Britain [England, Scotland, and Wales] and Northern Ireland (UK) begins in the mid-seventeenth century when a number of Converso merchants, among them some crypto-Jews, settled in England (see also ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES). In 1655, rabbi and scholar *Menasseh ben Israel traveled to England from *Amsterdam to promote the official recognition of Jews. In his Hope of Israel, he argued that Jews had to reside in England for the *messiah to come. Britain's ruler at that time, Oliver Cromwell, a devout Puritan influenced by both theological and mercantile considerations, was open to Jewish readmission and called the "Whitehall Conference" in December 1655 to consider whether and under what conditions it was lawful to admit Jews. Although millennarians supported readmission, merchants feared commercial competition; *antisemitic literature probably influenced public opinion as well. Rather than have a negative decision on record, Cromwell dismissed the gathering.

Despite the failure of formal readmission, the Jewish community grew. *Sephardic Jews established a *synagogue in Creechurch Lane in 1657 and a cemetery shortly thereafter. In 1701, when the old synagogue proved too small, the community opened Bevis Marks Synagogue; its interior strongly reflects the influence of the 1677 Amsterdam synagogue. British Jews elected a governing body after Cromwell's death (1658) and the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne (1660) and accompanied William of Orange to England in 1688, during the Glorious Revolution.

Although some tension existed between *Ashkenazim and *Sephardim, they lived in close proximity and worshiped together until the founding of the Ashkenazi Great Synagogue in Duke's Place (1690). Marriages between the two communities increased as Ashkenazim became wealthier. By the mid-eighteenth century, synagogues cooperated on a scheme of charitable relief for immigrant Jews. During this period, Jewish observance appears to have been lax and Jewish knowledge limited. Behavior among the wealthy reflected English morés.

In the eighteenth century, Jewish occupations varied widely. Although Jewish merchants and contractors helped provide supplies for the Seven Years War, Christian merchants succeeded in limiting Jews to 12 places (of 124) on the Royal Exchange. Jews depended on the Crown and Lord Mayor to maintain their position. Ashkenazim, largely from *Central Europe, became numerically dominant early in the eighteenth century, but power remained in the hands of the "more respectable" and acculturated Sephardim. Most Ashkenazim were poor and worked as hawkers, peddlers, and rag and used clothing sellers; a small percentage was involved in crime.

As early as 1746, the Sephardi and Ashkenazi synagogues appointed a standing Committee of Deputies to lobby for change in naturalization laws. The test case for English *emancipation occurred in 1753 with debates over the Naturalization Bill, known as the "Jew Bill." Most of England's 8,000 Jews were foreign born; they suffered from special taxes and could not hold land, vote for Parliament, hold public office, be Freeman of the City, or attend university. The bill enabled Parliament to naturalize professing Jews. Although Tories and London merchants campaigned against it, the bill passed in May 1753. In November, Parliament reassembled and in December 1754 it repealed the bill. Tories feared an influx of Jews but used the unpopular legislation in their political battle against the Whigs. Despite a tradition of asylum, England also harbored an opposition to foreigners; some believed it inappropriate to legitimize Jews and *Judaism in England, a Christian country. While acceptance of Jews increased, efforts at *conversion also continued. The London Society for the Promotion of Christianity among Jews (established 1809), the first missionary society devoted exclusively to converting Jews, was well funded, although largely unsuccessful.

Initially, most Jews lived in the City of London; after 1820 some began moving north and west, and important centers developed in provincial towns and cities. During the eighteenth century, small clusters of Jews settled especially in the south and east and, in the nineteenth century, in Manchester and Leeds. Several leading families, collectively dubbed "The Cousinhood," played key roles in business, religious, and charitable institutions. Their actions reflected the Jewish tradition of *philanthropy and the English ideal of personal service. Levi Barent Cohen (1747–1808) came to London from Amsterdam before 1778. Prominent in the Jewish community, Cohen served in all the offices of the Great Synagogue. *Rothschild family connections in England also date to the end of the eighteenth century. Lionel Louis Cohen (1832–1887) was a founder of the Jewish Board of Guardians (1859), which sought to systematize philanthropy, and of the United Synagogue (1870).

Despite setbacks, on the eve of the French Revolution, Jews in England had the most favorable status in Europe. Between the 1780s and 1810, when Prussian and French Jews were actively seeking civil rights, Britain's Jews remained relatively inactive. Jews began a more conscious campaign for the franchise after Catholic emancipation in 1829. Offices began opening to Jews in the 1830s, and bills to emancipate Jews passed in the Commons from 1833 on, but failed in the House of Lords. The Jewish Board of Deputies (founded 1760), an organization claiming to represent Jews in all political matters and led by Moses *Montefiore, increased its efforts to gain *emancipation beginning in 1845.

Starting in 1847, London repeatedly elected Lionel de Rothschild to Parliament, but the wording of the oath and opposition from the Lords prevented him from taking his seat. In 1858 the Jewish Relief Act gave each house of Parliament power to determine its oath, finally enabling Rothschild to be sworn in. Jews gained permission to attend Oxford and Cambridge in 1871 (all ancient universities barred non-Anglicans until 1854–56.) Benjamin *Disraeli, a convert to Christianity, first became prime minister in 1868; although he supported efforts to end Jewish disabilities, he voted against Jewish emancipation in 1850 and 1854.

From the late nineteenth century, Jewish *women played key roles in philanthropic endeavors, education, and the arts. Absorbing a Victorian ethos, privileged women established organizations and charities to aid the poor, acculturate immigrants, and provide respectable recreation. Lady Louisa Goldsmid and Mrs. Fanny Hertz helped open higher education to young women, and women, including Grace Aguilar (1816–1847) and Amy Levy (1861–1889) made important contributions to Anglo-Jewish literature (see LITERATURE: BRITAIN).

British Jews founded and developed several communal institutions during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, including schools, among them the Jews' Free School; an orphanage at Norwood; the Jewish Chronicle (1841), the oldest continuing Jewish publication; and Jews' College (1855), a seminary for training Anglo-Jewish "ministers." Synagogues grew in number, and so too did approaches to Judaism. The Reform movement schism in Britain dates from the 1830s when requests for limited reforms from a number of anglicized families went unheeded and the Goldsmid family left the Great Synagogue and joined the Reform congregation (see JUDAISM, REFORM). It was not until the beginning of the twentieth century that Claude Montefiore and Lily Montagu founded the Liberal Jewish Religious Union.

As the Jewish community in England was settling into its new status, Russian Jews faced increased antisemitism and severe economic restrictions. Between 1881 and 1914, approximately 250,000 Jews from Russia immigrated to England and 120,000 settled there. Those who chose to stay in England did so because of its tradition of asylum and the existence of a native Jewish community. Immigrants gravitated to the East End of London, Liverpool, and Manchester where there were other Jews, synagogues, and kosher butchers. Jewish immigrants were urban semi-skilled laborers; they included more women and children and tended to have higher literacy rates than other immigrant groups. Most entered the garment and furniture trades or became peddlers and hawkers of used clothes. Jews became pioneers in mass production of ready-made, inexpensive, stylish clothing in Britain.

British Jewry did not offer these newcomers an unqualified welcome. The Jewish Board of Deputies earmarked funds to send immigrants on to the *United States or to repatriate them, and community leaders sent notices to *Eastern Europe indicating that their cities could not absorb any more immigrants. About 1886–87, when restriction became an issue in Parliament, the Jewish community feared that a large influx of aliens might bring latent *antisemitism to the surface. British advocates of restriction argued that further immigration would lead to unsanitary and unhealthy neighborhoods, impede assimilation, decrease wages, and displace natives from home and work. Charles Booth, the famed social reformer, suggested that foreign Jews lacked “class loyalty and trade integrity.” As early as 1884, the Jewish Board of Guardians responded by establishing a Sanitary Committee. Others, however, considered Jewish temperate, industrious, if to a fault, and law abiding.

Still, demands for restriction on Jewish immigration increased and led to the 1903 Royal Commission. Some Jews, including members of the Jewish Board of Guardians, agreed that restriction would benefit England. The Royal Commission acknowledged the problem of overcrowding, but their investigation found less disease than anticipated, suggesting that neighborhoods were more sanitary than they appeared. With the dissent of Lord Rothschild and Sir Kenelm Digby, the Commission recommended restrictive legislation. Throughout 1904 and 1905, the Jewish Chronicle defended immigrants and the established Anglo-Jewish community responded by creating an extensive anglicization program. Schools, clubs, and organizations taught hygiene and English and tried to refine the immigrant masses. Despite the seriousness of these concerns, 1870 to 1914 was also a golden age for British Jews. A number of Jews held high office, and a few had the friendship and patronage of King Edward VII. Although Jews’ entry to elevated social circles indicates a high level of integration, some argue that association with aristocracy aroused antisemitism.

At the outset of World War I, Parliament passed an Aliens Restriction Bill. Aliens were required to register with the police, and some 40,000 Germans were interned. The shops of many German-born British residents and those with German-sounding names, including many Jews, were attacked. In November 1917, the *Balfour Declaration, communicated by Foreign Secretary Arthur Balfour to Lord (Walter) Rothschild, stated support for a Jewish homeland in *Palestine while affirming the rights of non-Jews in Palestine and Jews living in other parts of the world. Shortly afterward, British troops supplanted the *Ottomans in Palestine, and in 1922 the *British Mandate to govern Palestine was officially affirmed by the League of Nations.

The rise of *Nazism challenged the Jewish community in numerous ways. Generally, European governments were hesitant to take action against *Germany’s systematic disenfranchisement of its Jewish citizens. Great Britain decided not to support the 1933 boycott, claiming it would prove detrimental to Germany’s Jews. Despite the fact that British Jewry underestimated the dimensions of Hitler’s plans, they did offer rescue and relief to refugees. Early in 1933, British Jews formed the Jewish Refugees Committee, the Academic Assistance Council, and the Central British Fund for World Jewish Relief, which guaranteed that no Jewish refugee would become a public charge. British concerns over mass unemployment and antisemitism would likely have limited immigration without the guarantees from the Jewish community. More virulent forms of antisemitism emerged during the 1930s when the British Union of Fascists, led by Sir Oswald Mosley, attacked Jews in East and North London.

Britain’s refugee policy changed over time. Initially, Britain took small numbers of Jewish refugees. In 1938, they imposed visa requirements on German nationals and at the Evian Conference, the same year, offered neither refuge nor financial assistance to refugees. Churchill feared that Jews fleeing from Nazism would arouse antisemitism in Great Britain, and political factors eliminated Palestine from consideration as a haven. Kristallnacht*, German government-incited attacks on Jewish homes and businesses in November 1938, is seen by many as a turning point; whereas most countries became more restrictive, Britain became more liberal. One outstanding British effort, the 1938–39 Kindertransport*, saved approximately 10,000 children. In December 1942, the Chief Rabbi proclaimed a Week of Mourning and Prayer and held a service in Bevis Marks. Jews organized various mass meetings and met with the Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden. On December 17, 1942, the government denounced the atrocities, and Parliament rose for a minute of silence, an unprecedented action. However, the Bermuda Conference (April 1943) convened by Britain and the United States failed to provide safe havens for Jews. Britain made small concessions to alter some of the restrictions of the 1939 *White Paper limiting immigration to Palestine, but by this time Jews could not get out of Europe.

During the war, significant information about Nazi atrocities was available. The Jewish Chronicle reported on ghettoization and the Final Solution. Although the Foreign Office considered Gerhardt Reigner’s famous August 1942 telegram, which exposed Nazi plans for total elimination of the Jews, to be “a rather wild story,” they forwarded it to the chairman of the British Section of the World Jewish Congress. In 1944, British Jews encouraged the government to respond to rescue proposals from *Hungary, but the government was suspicious. As the war continued, the Central Fund became inadequate, and by 1945 the government covered all resettlement expenses, a figure that declined as refugees became integrated into the economy.

Some scholars have criticized the British government for its policy with regard to *Palestine, the limited number of refugees that Britain accepted, and the refusal to bomb railway lines to *Auschwitz. They also see failure on the part of Jewish leaders because the community lacked cohesion, *Zionism caused some dissension, and there were not enough Jewish homes for refugee children. However, Anglo-Jewish leadership faced significant challenges: Churchill refused to authorize controversial policies, especially with regard to Palestine; antisemitism was on the increase; and the war effort itself always took priority in policy decisions. Seen in context, many argue that Anglo-Jewry’s actions compared favorably with those of Jews in other countries.

During the years after World War II, many Jews began moving from exclusively Jewish communities into the suburbs and became increasingly acculturated. Approximately two-thirds of Great Britain's 350,000 Jews (as of 2001) live in London. There are large communities in North London, Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow. London's Stamford Hill is home to a significant *Hasidic population. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, three organizations represent *Orthodox Jews: the United Synagogue, the largest group, with 35,000 families; the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations, which has a large Hasidic contingent; and the Federation of Synagogues (founded in 1887 by Russian-Polish immigrants). On the left are the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain (founded in 1840) and the Union of Liberal and Progressive Synagogues (1902). By the 1960s, there was an important growth in support for Zionism and diminishing fears about charges of dual loyalty.

In recent years, inner city communities have largely disbanded; the overwhelming majority of Jews now live in the suburbs of London, Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow. More important, however, is the decline of Jewish life in provincial cities and the centralization of Jews in London, accounting for 70% of British Jews by the mid-1990s. North London is home to a number of Jewish communal institutions, among them the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Jewish Care, the Jewish Museum, Progressive Judaism's Leo Baeck College, the Jews Free School, and Adler House, the seat of the Chief Rabbi and London's Beit Din* (Jewish *court). Although significant *intermarriage and falling birth rates have led to an absolute decline in the number of British Jews, Jewish schools have been very robust and ultra-Orthodox Judaism has seen substantial growth. Map 10

For further reading, see G. Alderman, Modern British Jewry (1992); E. C. Black, The Social Politics of Anglo-Jewry, 1880–1920 (1988); D. Cesarani, ed., The Making of Modern Anglo-Jewry (1990); T. M. Endelman, The Jews of Georgian England: 1714–1830 (1979); idem, The Jews of Britain, 1656–2000 (2002); D. Feldman, Englishmen and Jews: Social Relations and Political Culture, 1840–1914 (1994). SUSAN L. TANANBAUM

British Mandate Over Palestine. The *Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917, announced the policy of the British government, “favoring the establishment in *Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people... it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine.” Issued during World War I, the Declaration had broad support from English Christian *Zionists who had been lobbying for greater British involvement in Palestine for decades. It also had strong support from a minority of British Jews, led by Dr. Chaim *Weizmann and the British *Rothschild family, and it soon garnered support from American Jews led by Justice Louis *Brandeis. The feelings of the *Arab population of Palestine, who made up 90% of its inhabitants, were only briefly considered. Zionists, Jews and Christians alike, generally assumed that Arabs would benefit economically and culturally from new investment in Palestine.

Six weeks after the publication of the Declaration, General Allenby established British rule in Palestine. Within a few months the *Ottoman forces that had patrolled the area for four hundred years were routed. A provisional military government, the Occupied Enemy Territory Administration (OETA), remained in place through the summer of 1920 when Sir Herbert Samuel, the first British High Commissioner for Palestine, was appointed. Samuel had previously been the first Jewish member of the British Cabinet. The League of Nations officially affirmed the British Mandate to govern Palestine in 1922.

The history of the British Mandate in Palestine has three main story lines: the economic, political, and social development of the area by an influx of Jewish Europeans bringing human resources and capital investment; the establishment by the British of infrastructure in the areas of law, transportation, communications, public health, and the development of education and cultural life; and the growing opposition of the Arab population to these changes. These stories intersected in hopes for peaceful solution and in periodic violence.

PALESTINE'S JEWS AND MANDATORY RULE: The narrative of Jewish immigration to Palestine and their establishment of the Yishuv*, the Jewish community of Palestine, is a story of early successes. These include the development of the Jewish Agency, a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the British administration of Palestine; the establishment of a unified response to increasing Arab hostilities; and ultimately the declaration of statehood. From the end of World War I, the Jewish population of Palestine, which had been stagnant for hundreds of years, began a steady growth, increasing from 55,000 in 1918 to nearly 600,000 in 1948. The proliferation of agricultural settlements, as well as industrial and commercial enterprises, accompanied the population growth. The revival of the *Hebrew language, a dream of early Zionists, became a reality in new Jewish schools funded largely by the Jewish Agency and in the new villages of Palestine, settled by enthusiastic pioneers. In 1925, the cornerstone of the Hebrew University was laid, demonstrating broad support by the world Jewish community for the revival of a homeland in Palestine (see entries under ISRAEL, STATE OF).

During the ensuing years of the Mandate, growth of the Jewish population of Palestine was fueled by *antisemitism in Europe. Economic investment was supported at first by Jews who agreed with the goals of political Zionism and later more broadly by those who saw Palestine as a refuge for Jews escaping *Nazi Germany. The British policy on immigration reflected the desires of Jews and the fears of Arabs. The British planned to allow limited immigration to show good will to their Jewish supporters while maintaining the status quo of an Arab majority. However, a significant stream of visitors, primarily Jews, decided to remain in Palestine, circumventing legal immigration throughout the years of the Mandate. The proportion of immigrants to population as a whole was without precedent. By the end of the 1930s, the Jewish population in Palestine had grown more than 400%. During the critical pre-war years of 1933–37, Palestine absorbed more Jews from Axis-dominated areas than any other country, including the *United States.

ARAB RESPONSES TO JEWISH IMMIGRATION: The Arab response to Jewish immigration was designed to pressure the British to change the immigration policy of the Balfour Declaration, which Arabs feared would lead to a Jewish majority in Palestine. As a result of Arab riots in 1921 and 1929 as well as the sustained boycotts and rioting in 1936–39, the British appointed commissions to study the situation and promulgated *White Papers (government policy statements). The White Paper of 1922 included the proviso that immigrants should not be a burden on the people of Palestine as a whole and that they should not deprive any section of the present population of employment. The White Paper of 1930 set forth more stringent controls on immigration and land transfer. Finally, the White Paper of 1939 limited Jewish immigration to 75,000 people within a five-year period, after which time future immigration would require Arab consent.

In April 1942, at a Zionist conference in *New York City, David *Ben-Gurion and his supporters overrode the pro-British gradualist policy of Chaim *Weizmann and promulgated the Biltmore Programme, an explicit call for a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine that would be open to all Jews. After the end of World War II, the Jewish leadership of Palestine expected a change in British policy that would admit the hundreds of thousands of European Jews who had survived the *Holocaust. Yet the British adhered to their White Paper policies. A Jewish resistance movement was created to facilitate illegal immigration. An Anglo-American Commission was sent to Palestine and Europe to look into the problem of Jewish *displaced persons. Tension mounted as British troops continued to resist immigration and Jewish forces continued to encourage hunger strikes by refugees. The sympathies of British troops stationed in Palestine were frequently with the Arabs. Hundreds of Palestinian Jews were interned on suspicion of illegal activities. In retaliation, British offices in the King David Hotel were blown up in July 1946. A year later the Exodus, a ship carrying 4,500 refugees, arrived in Haifa and was forced to return to Europe. Publicity about the ship caused an international outcry against Britain. Eager to relieve themselves of the burden of the Mandate, the British brought the Palestine problem to the United Nations in May 1947.

BRITISH ADMINISTRATION OF THE MANDATE: From the outset, British rule in Palestine faced significant challenges in meeting the basic needs of a civilian population that had suffered greatly from famine and disease during World War I. The British brought years of experience in colonial administration, and they were aided by growing financial support for the Yishuv from the world Jewish community. Thus, although Palestine was poor in every respect – a small population, little industry or commerce, and no natural resources – the British were able to make significant progress in many critical areas during their thirty-year rule. The British administration addressed lawlessness, disease, lack of communications, and the paucity of education or social services. It created a new police force to establish basic public security, with British officers commanding both Arab and Jewish members. The British also established a new system of justice, eliminating the ubiquitous bak-sheesh (general bribery and corruption) prevalent under the Ottomans.

The British speedily established civilian telephone, telegraph, and postal services and began to provide jobs for unemployed Palestinians, both Jews and Arabs. Likewise, the British expanded the railroad system and built roads passable by civilian cars. This work also provided employment for the local population. Public health was a serious problem all over the region. In Palestine there were few public hospitals, although there were several private hospitals funded by missionary societies and by Jewish philanthropic societies. The government set up a Department of Health to respond to widespread malaria and trachoma and to educate expectant mothers. The average death rate of 23.8 per thousand in 1922 fell to 12.3 in 1946; life expectancy rose about 16.5 years among Arabs and Jews. These efforts virtually eradicated plague and smallpox and reduced malaria considerably. A new water supply was inaugurated in 1936, making proper sanitation possible and reducing disease.

The British created a Department of Education and substantially increased the number of primary schools in towns and villages. Schools for Jewish children taught in Hebrew were primarily run by a Jewish Board of Education, funded by the Jewish Agency. Missionary schools continued to teach primarily Arab children. Government funding for public schools was also directed at Arab children, accommodating about half of those eligible. There were fewer schools for girls than boys and more schools in towns than in villages.

While making progress in each of these areas, the Mandatory government failed in one of its important objectives: “to place the country under such political, administrative and economic conditions as will secure . . . the development of self-governing institutions.” The Jewish Agency worked with the Mandatory government to establish structures that would result in the creation of a Jewish national home, but the leadership of the Arab population resisted this idea. Although they appeared to collaborate with the British, they made it clear that the development of self-governing institutions must depend on majority rule. The British repeatedly rejected the principle of majority rule because that would have given the Arabs control over the government of Palestine.

In an effort to meet some of the demands of Arab notables, the British created new Islamic institutions. The Supreme Muslim Council (SMC) was given control over vast revenues that traditionally were distributed to religious and judicial institutions and schools and orphanages. The position of Grand Mufti of Jerusalem was created; the Grand Mufti was appointed by the High Commissioner to head the SMC. This led to opportunities for patronage appointments on a large scale. In addition, educated Arabs were given employment opportunities in the Mandatory government. Nevertheless, the peaceable demands by Arab leaders soon gave way to more aggressive expressions by people who resisted changes to their traditional way of life. These grievances included the purchase of land farmed by Arabs by Jewish farming cooperatives, the literacy requirement for obtaining employment in towns, rising prices for housing and essential needs, and increasing challenges to Arab men as their wives received public health education.

In May 1921 Orthodox Easter Sunday fell on May Day. A minor conflict in *Tel Aviv ignited serious riots and looting in Jaffa that spread to other parts of the country. Arabs attacked Jews at random and looted shops. It took a week to quell the riots and required the intervention of the Royal Air Force. A second major confrontation occurred in late August 1929 on the occasion of a religious fast by Jews commemorating the destruction of the Jerusalem *Temple (*Tisha B’Av). A procession of Jews marched to the Wailing Wall and demanded their rights to ownership of this holy site. A rumor spread that the Jews planned to seize the Dome of the Rock and Al-Aqsa mosque on the Temple Mount (Haram al-Sharif), and the ensuing violence spread to Hebron, Jaffa, Haifa, and *Safed. In the end, 133 Jews were murdered and 116 Arabs were killed, mostly by the military or police. Jews blamed the Arabs and the failure of the British to protect them; Arabs blamed the Jews and the pro-Jewish sentiments of the police. This violence deepened the chasm between Palestinian Arabs and Jews.

Despite continued hostility toward Jews, the British became the main object of Arab attacks beginning in 1933. In April 1936 the Arabs declared a general strike involving work stoppages and boycotts of British and Zionist parts of the economy. It lasted for six months. This was the beginning of a three-year armed revolt against the British that erupted all over Palestine. A British Royal Commission of Inquiry (the Peel Commission, 1936–37) was appointed to review the situation and concluded that the basic premise of the Mandate was unworkable. The commission proposed a partition of the land, giving the Jews those areas along the coast in which they were the majority, and the remainder to the Arabs. Jerusalem, Nazareth, and Bethlehem, centers of Christian pilgrimage, and Haifa, the only important port, were to remain under the British Mandate. In September 1937, four hundred delegates from all parts of the Arab world met near Damascus and resolved unanimously that Palestine was an integral part of the Arab fatherland. They demanded the annulment of the Balfour Declaration and the conclusion of an Anglo-Palestine treaty establishing an independent Palestine with safeguards for minorities. The Arab leadership continued to support this position long after the Mandate ended.

END OF THE MANDATE PERIOD: On November 29, 1947, thirty years after the Balfour Declaration, the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into three parts: a Jewish state along the Mediterranean, an Arab state inland, and the international city of Jerusalem. This vote confirmed the recognition by the world community of the rights of Jews and of Arabs to respective national homelands, but it did not change the belief of the Arabs of Palestine and the surrounding countries that they were losing their homeland to the Jews. Hostilities between the two sides intensified during the spring. On April 9, 1948, armed Jewish gangs destroyed the village of Deir Yassin, near Jerusalem, killing 250 Arabs. Four days later, a Jewish convoy of medical personnel proceeding up Mt. Scopus on the way to Hadassah Hospital was attacked and thirty-nine people were killed. On May 14, 1948, when the last British officials left Haifa, Ben-Gurion declared the establishment of the State of Israel.

Recent research includes A. J. Sherman, Mandate Days: British Lives in Palestine, 1918–1948 (2001); N. Shepherd, Ploughing the Sand: British Rule in Palestine, 1917–1948 (2000); A. Ayalon, Reading Palestine: Printing and Literacy, 1900–1948 (2004); and R. Khalidi, Palestinian Identity (1997). Map 12

LAURA S. SCHOR

Broadcasting: Radio and Television. Guglielmo Marconi's 1890 demonstration of a wireless telegraph is often cited as the beginning of the radio and television broadcasting industry. Over the next two decades, wireless transmission of a range of sounds, including voice and music, was achieved. Initially, key industry figures feared that mass broadcasting would taint their branch of engineering with the brush of low-brow amusement. However, surging interest after World War I opened the new medium for popular entertainment and retailing purposes and loosened arrangements that had barred ethnic minorities from executive leadership positions in radio companies. As commercial broadcasting emerged as a part of American show business in the 1920s, doors were opened to the talents and creativity of immigrants and their children. Jewish Americans benefiting from these opportunities included David Sarnoff, William S. Paley, and Leonard Goldenson, the eventual leaders of companies that defined commercial broadcasting during the radio era and oversaw the diffusion of television as a technology, industry, and art.

David Sarnoff (1891–1971) was born near Russian Minsk (now part of *Belarus) and immigrated to America at the age of nine. He left school at fifteen and ultimately found employment at the American subsidiary of the British Marconi Company, which became the Radio Corporation of America (RCA) in 1914. Sarnoff's rise to power at RCA was furthered by his support of mass broadcasting and his proposal for a network of stations that would transmit a shared signal capable of reaching every radio in the United States. RCA formally launched the National Broadcasting Company (NBC) on New Year's Day, 1927, with two network services: NBC-Red, directed at the higher end of the cultural spectrum, and the Blue Network, which had no such pretension. Their overwhelming success led to Sarnoff's election to the RCA board of directors in 1928. In 1930, he became company president, a position he held until his retirement in 1968.

Under Sarnoff's leadership, RCA was arguably the most powerful commercial communications company in the world – dominant in research, development, and manufacture of communications technologies for industrial, military, and consumer use. RCA also shaped production, promotion, and distribution of American electronic entertainment media for much of the twentieth century through its subsidiaries and partnerships, including NBC (television and radio), RCA Victor (recorded music), and RKO Pictures (cinema).

Sarnoff internalized the patrician values of the radio industry's founders. He formed the NBC Symphony Orchestra and lured Arturo Toscanini from Italy to lead it, and he facilitated radio adaptations of classical dramas on NBC. Denied a naval commission during World War I, most likely because of *antisemitism, Sarnoff was commissioned as a U.S. Army officer in 1942; his work in coordinating Allied communications efforts in Europe won him promotion to the rank of brigadier general.

William S. Paley (1901–1990) was Sarnoff's chief rival in commercial broadcasting. The Chicago-born son of Samuel Paley, a Ukrainian Jewish immigrant who had founded the Congress Cigar Company, Paley studied the latest mass marketing techniques and theories at the Wharton School of Business and persuaded his father to use radio advertising, doubling Congress Cigar's retail sales during the mid-1920s. Paley entered the radio business in 1927 when the Columbia Phonograph Broadcasting System, a would-be competitor to NBC, came close to failing just months after its launch. Convinced his father to buy the operation, Paley assumed the presidency in 1928 and changed the network's name to the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS). With an infusion of cash from Congress Cigar, he began to expand the fledgling network from its base in the Northeast, organizing a coast-to-coast string of affiliated stations.

Paley made CBS the equal of NBC, despite overwhelming competitive disadvantages. NBC operated two networks, each larger than CBS, and its parent, RCA, held so many radio patents that CBS had to buy much of its equipment from its main competitor. Paley established a Columbia Workshop for radio writers and launched a weekly series to produce their scripts on the air. The Columbia Artists Bureau gave representation to new performers and functioned as a casting resource for CBS programs. Paley recruited academics to develop methods of audience measurement that would reassure CBS advertisers about how effectively they were spending their money.

Paley's most daring long-term strategy was establishment of a radio news gathering organization at CBS. Sarnoff had chosen to ignore news programming at NBC, believing editorial decisions would inevitably lead to conflicts with advertisers, audience segments, and, worst of all, the federal government, which licensed broadcasting. In contrast, Paley understood broadcasting's capabilities, especially instantaneous speed and mass distribution, for journalism. During the 1930s, Paley built the world's first international commercial broadcast journalism enterprise, hiring proven newspaper reporters as on-air personalities, including Edward R. Murrow, William Shirer, and Eric Severeid. When World War II began, CBS was ready to report events from around the world before newspapers could go to press. By the late 1940s, as the introduction of television began, war reporting had created a public image for CBS that was second to none.

Paley raided some of the most popular comedy stars on NBC radio, such as George Burns and Gracie Allen, Jack Benny, and Red Skelton, offering them innovative deals at CBS, including ownership of their programs. While popular NBC television stars, such as Milton Berle and Sid Caesar, were saddled with impossible work schedules, Paley made every effort to accommodate CBS talent and paid market prices to performers appearing on The Ed Sullivan Show. This policy helped make the series and CBS a portal into American show business for international acts ranging from Moscow State Circus performers to the Beatles and the Rolling Stones. CBS leaped past NBC in the ratings during the television era, beating its old rival season after season for some thirty years. As CBS achieved dominance in television with its entertainment offerings, Paley turned away from the news division. Paley was a founder of the Museum of Television and Radio, which was renamed the William S. Paley Center for Media Arts in 2007.

The least known Jewish broadcasting mogul is Leonard H. Goldenson (1905–1999), the son of Russian immigrant shopkeepers in Scottsdale, Pennsylvania. Goldenson attended Harvard and Harvard Law School in the early 1920s and did legal work for Paramount Pictures bankruptcy proceedings. Impressed with his work, Paramount officials offered him a full-time job with the studio's theater division, where he rose through the ranks to a leadership position. In 1948, a federal antitrust suit forced film studios to divest their theater holdings, and Goldenson became the head of the newly independent United Paramount Theaters (UPT).

While the Hollywood studio old guard was fighting the looming threat of television with air conditioning, drive-in theaters, and 3-D movies, Goldenson had already concluded that television would inevitably dominate American entertainment. U.S. network television was a four-company oligopoly in the late 1940s, and it appeared likely to become smaller, not larger. The Dumont Network, owned by a television manufacturer with no experience in radio, ultimately failed in 1955, and the American Broadcasting Company (ABC), which was formed in 1943, seemed destined for the same fate. Goldenson focused on taking over ABC, raising hundreds of millions of dollars by selling off more than half of UPT's 1,425 theaters. In 1951, he made ABC management a generous offer that saved the company. Government approval came two years later, with Goldenson heading the merged company.

Goldenson used his connections in Hollywood to create a working relationship that served both movies and television for decades and led to their lateral integration. Walt Disney, who was seeking capital to construct a theme park near Los Angeles, was an eager partner, breaking ranks with other studio heads to make the first deal to supply prime-time television programs for a broadcasting company. Goldenson's next deal, with Warner Brothers, had a pivotal impact in the transformation of television from a theater-based medium presenting live word-dependent teleplays into a film-based medium offering action series such as westerns and police shows with outdoor settings.

Between 1948 and 1978, Goldenson achieved parity with his competitors in sports, news, prime-time entertainment, and daytime entertainment; he built ABC into a prototype of the contemporary multimedia entertainment company, bringing music recording, publishing, and electronics companies under the corporate umbrella. Having bought control of ABC for $8 million in 1953, Goldenson authorized its sale in 1985 for $3.5 billion.

DAVID MARC

Buber, Martin (1878–1965), German Jewish philosopher, is best known for his book I and Thou (1922) and his philosophy of dialogue. Buber was a prolific writer on the Hebrew *Bible, *Hasidism, Jewish *thought, and *Zionism. He played a formative role in the German Jewish cultural renaissance between 1900 and 1938, in the development of cultural Zionism, and in Jewish–Arab relations. His early writings, especially Daniel: Dialogues on Realization (1913), influenced German literary expressionism. Forced to emigrate in 1938, Buber and his family settled in *Jerusalem, where he lived and taught until his death in 1965.

Born to an assimilated Jewish family in *Vienna, Buber grew up in the observant home of his grandfather, rabbinics scholar Salomon Buber (1827–1906), in Lemberg (Lvóv). He returned to Vienna in 1896 to study philosophy and art history. After extended visits at the universities of Leipzig (1897–99), Zurich (1899), and *Berlin (1899–1901), Buber graduated from the University of Vienna in 1904 with a doctoral dissertation on Nicholas of Cusa and Jakob Böhme (unpublished). An avid reader of Schopenhauer, Plato, Kant, Feuerbach, and, most importantly, Nietzsche, the young Buber was also influenced by his Berlin teachers Georg Simmel (1858–1918) and Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911). His lifelong friendships with Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929), Fritz Mauthner (1849–1923), and Gustav Landauer (1870–1919) attuned Buber to the fin-de-siècle “crisis of language” and the significance of the “spoken word.”

As a student, Buber became active also in Zionism. With Chaim *Weizmann and others, he organized the culture-oriented Democratic Fraction in the spirit of *Aḥad Ha-Am (1856–1927). Buber's ideas of ethical nationalism and liberated Judaism (Heruth: On Youth and Religion [1919]) influenced the *Prague Circle led by Hugo Bergmann, Felix Weltsch, and others. In 1904 Buber began working on a series of popular German adaptations of Ḥasidic texts, *mysticism, and other *folklore, including The Tales of Rabbi Nachman (1906), The Legend of the Baal-Shem (1908), Tales of the Hasidism (completed in 1946), Ecstatic Confessions (1909), Tschuang-Tse (1910), and the Finnish national epic Kalevala (1914). Between 1906 and 1912, he edited the series Die Gesellschaft; from 1916 to 1924, the journal Der Jude; and from 1926 to 1930, Die Kreatur (with Joseph Wittig and Viktor von Weizsäcker).

Simultaneously with Ferdinand Ebner (1882–1931), Hermann *Cohen (1842–1918), Franz *Rosenzweig (1886–1929), and Eugen Rosenstock-Huussy, Buber developed his dialogical philosophy around 1918, arguing that “I–You” and “I–It” are different modes not only of speech but also of being in and toward the world. He refined his conception in Dialogue (1929), The Question to the Single One (1936), and Elements of the Interhuman (1954). In 1925, based on the idea of “spokenness,” Buber and Rosenzweig undertook a new translation of the Hebrew Bible into German, which was completed in 1961 (see BIBLE: TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS).

Between 1933 and 1938, Buber used his writings and directorship of the *Frankfurt Freies jüdisches Lehrhaus to promote a new “biblical humanism” as a form of intellectual resistance to *Nazism. From 1938 to 1951 he taught social thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, writing on *anthropology (The Problem of Man [1942]) and political theory (Paths in Utopia [1947]). An ever controversial voice, Buber worked with Judah *Magnez toward *Arab–Jewish reconciliation (A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs, ed. Paul Mendes-Flohr [1983]) and was among the first to advocate Israeli Jewish relations with post-war *Germany (Genuine Dialogue and the Possibilities of Peace [1953]). Important works on Buber include H. Kohn, Martin Buber, sein Werk und seine Zeit (1961); and P. Mendes-Flohr, From Mysticism to Dialogue (1989).

ASHER D. BIEMANN

Bulgaria. Jews have lived in Bulgaria since Imperial *Roman times, and there appears to have been Jewish influence on early Bulgarian Christianity. Before the fifteenth century, Bulgarian Jews followed the *Byzantine or *Romaniote rite; later, *Ashkenazic and *Sephardic Jews arrived with their own customs. Eventually the community was unified under a single rabbinate, adopting the Sephardic rite and the *Ladino language. In the fourteenth century, Bulgaria became a part of the *Ottoman Empire. Medieval Jews were traders and tax farmers and owned quarries and leather tanneries. The celebrated scholar Joseph *Karo wrote some of his Bet Yosef in Nikopol, where he established a *yeshivah. Bulgarian Jews were enthusiastic supporters of *Shabbetai Zevi, the seventeenth-century false messiah.

When Bulgaria became independent in 1878, equal rights were promised to Jews. However, discrimination persisted; Jews were barred from the military academy, the state bank, and the municipal service. In the mid-1930s Bulgarian Jews numbered almost 60,000. Most worked in commerce and were self-employed. The community was strongly pro-*Zionist. In the years before World War II, *antisemitism increased, and nationalist fascist organizations were active.

During World War II Bulgaria was allied with *Germany; it declared war on the Western Allies, but not on the *Soviet Union (USSR). An antisemitic “Law for the Defense of the Nation” was enacted. In 1941 German army units were stationed in the country, and Germany demanded the deportation of Bulgarian Jews. The government cooperated in the seizure of Jews living in Macedonia and Thrace, areas annexed by Bulgaria, and most of this population was murdered. However, a protest led by Dimiter Peshev, vice president of Parliament, delayed deportations of Jews from Bulgaria proper. Other parliamentarians, the Greek Orthodox Church, professional groups, and cultural figures joined the protest. Although cruel anti-Jewish measures were enforced, the Jews of Bulgaria proper did survive. These events took place during a period of uncertainty when the Germans had begun to lose the war and elements of Bulgarian society hoped to disengage from the German alliance. The sudden, mysterious death of King Boris was a complication; his role in negotiations about the fate of Bulgaria's Jews has never been clear. While secret talks went on with the West, the USSR declared war on Bulgaria and invaded the country. At the end of the war, Bulgaria was ruled by the communist Fatherland Front.

Under *communism Jews were allowed only limited contact with other Jewish communities. The Bulgarian Peoples' Courts did mete out severe punishment to those who had harmed Jews during the war. When the USSR threw its support to the UN Partition of *Palestine, Bulgaria followed suit and permitted emigration. Many Jews left for the newly established State of *Israel, resulting in a near disappearance of Jewish life. With the end of communism in 1990, the Shalom organization was created to reinvigorate and coordinate cultural activities. *B'nai B'rith and *Habad both lent assistance. In 2007, there were two *synagogues in Bulgaria, in Sofia and in Plovdiv, supervised by a chief rabbi; a Jewish school and religious schools; camps; and organizations for children and young adults. About 5,000 Jews live in Bulgaria, mainly in Sofia, and relations with Israel are good. A bronze plaque adjacent to the Parliament building honors Gentiles who resisted the deportations. Prominent Jews who were born in Bulgaria include the painter Jules Pascin (1885–1930) and writer Elias Canetti (1905–1994), the 1981 Noble laureate for literature.

For further information, see M. Bar-Zohar, Beyond Hitler's Grasp: The Heroic Rescue of Bulgaria's Jews (1998); D. J. Elazar et al., ed., Balkan Jewish Communities: Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey (1984); and T. Todorov, Fragility of Goodness: Why Bulgaria's Jews Survived the Holocaust (2001); and BALKANS; BYZANTINE EMPIRE; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS; OTTOMAN EMPIRE. Maps 9, 10 LIBBY K. WHITE

Bund. The General Union of Jewish Workers in *Lithuania, *Poland, and *Russia (Der Algemeyner Yidisher Arbeter Bund in Lite, Poyln, un Rusland) was a revolutionary *socialist party founded in *Vilna in October 1897, one year before the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, which it helped organize. Its founders included both workers and acculturated middle-class Jewish intellectuals who sought to build class consciousness among the emerging Jewish proletariat and to integrate these workers into the broader revolutionary movement in Russia. Although initially espousing *Marxist internationalism, by 1903 the group had become a leading advocate of Jewish national-cultural autonomy in Russia. Its successful organization of armed self-defense units against *pogroms and its unique blend of *Diaspora Jewish nationalism, Yiddishism, and struggle for Jewish workers' rights earned the Bund significant popularity, well beyond its chief political competitor, the *Zionists. Despite its turn toward Jewish nationalism, the secular Bund remained radically anticlerical as well as anti-Zionist. Its support of *Yiddish as the Jewish national language and its insistence that Jewish rights (individual and national) must be won where Jews lived, an ideology known as doikeit or "here-ness," contrasted sharply with the Zionist veneration of *Hebrew and ultimate hopes for a Jewish political entity in *Palestine.

Bundist fortunes in interwar Europe varied greatly. In post-revolutionary Russia, Bundists who refused to join the Communist Party were quickly suppressed or murdered. In newly independent Poland, in contrast, the Bund enjoyed spectacular growth, developing a secular Yiddish school system (Tsisho), youth groups, sports clubs, libraries, cultural centers, vibrant Yiddish (and Polish) *journalism, and more. It rose to political prominence in the late 1930s, as violent Polish *antisemitism, economic ruin, and looming war pushed Polish Jews to support the radical party. Bundists were active in armed resistance to the Nazis during the *Holocaust, but most ultimately suffered the same destruction as their Polish brethren, as did their leaders caught in the *Soviet Union.

For further reading, see J. Jacobs, Jewish Politics in Eastern Europe: The Bund at 100 (2001); and J. Frankel, Prophecy and Politics: Socialism, Nationalism, and the Russian Jews, 1862–1917 (1981). JOSHUA M. SHANES

Byzantine Empire. The Roman Emperor Constantine I dedicated his new capital, Nea Roma, also known as Constantinoupolis or I Polis (the City), in 330 CE, on the site of the ancient city of Byzantium, effectively dividing the *Roman Empire into western (Latin-speaking) and eastern (Greek-speaking) realms. In Greek *Hebrew sources, the city is called Kosta, usually read as Kushta.

During the eleven centuries of the Eastern Roman Empire (designated the Byzantine Empire by modern scholars), the degradation of Jews and *Judaism was codified and consequently perpetuated. From the fourth to the sixth century, *Church Fathers (both before and after the Council of Nicaea of 325 CE) developed their theological arguments against Judaism and emphasized the necessity for social barriers to exclude Jews from the emerging Christian society. The law codes of Theodosius II (438 CE) and Justinian I (534 CE) followed this imperative, mandating the exclusion of Jews from political, economic, judicial, educational, military, and social participation (with some exceptions, such as the decurionate) in public life. Palestina (*Palestine/the Land of Israel) was Christianized by huge building projects (churches, monasteries, pilgrim hostels, etc.), and Christian claims were extended to all biblical sites. Palestina was further divided into three provinces, and Jews, their centers of population already relocated to the *Galilee, were restricted from living in the environs of *Jerusalem. Finally, the office of the *Patriarch of the Jews, since the second century CE the political representative of Jews in the Roman Empire and the religious center for the development of post-mishnaic Judaism, was abolished in 439. This act completed the fragmentation and isolation of Jews subsequent to the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE. Some later emperors, from Justinian in the sixth century to Romanos Lekapenos in the tenth, and briefly John Vatatzes in the thirteenth century, forcibly baptized Jews.

Notwithstanding legal limitations and persecutions of Jews in the Byzantine Empire, Judaism remained a permitted religion in all official Roman law codes. The Orthodox Church, although subject to the emperor (who, as Pontifex Maximus was officially the head of the church), followed *New Testament sources and refused to accept forcibly baptized Jews. During periods of persecution in the ninth and tenth centuries, Byzantine Jews fled to the *Khazar Empire.

After the mid-tenth-century Byzantine *Crusades, Jewish communities, which had been depleted in numbers by conversion and emigration, began to flourish, attracting Arabic-speaking *Rabbanite and *Karaite immigrants. From the eleventh to fifteenth centuries, Jews, who were primarily urban, were fully integrated into the economy of the empire; they specialized in cloth manufacture, dyeing, and trade. After the fragmentation of the empire in the wake of the conquest of Constantinople in the Fourth Crusade of 1204, *Romaniote Jews (Greek-speaking Jews from the Byzantine Empire) played an important role in the various states that emerged in the Christian and Muslim *Balkans and Anatolia.

On the intellectual level, Byzantine Jews wrote piyyutim* (see POETRY: LITURGICAL) and *midrashic works; these latter traditions were preserved by *Rashi and others. They contributed to the spread of *Kabbalah, especially in the Palaeologue period (1261–1453), and regularly experienced *messianic movements. From the twelfth century on, Romaniote and Karaite Jews studied and commented on Aristotelian philosophy, and numerous Byzantine commentaries on the *Bible and *halakhah are extant. Byzantine Jews also excelled in *medical studies. Shabbetai Donnolo of Oria in southern Italy (913–942) wrote the first "Western" pharmacopia, Sefer Ha-Mirkakhot (Book of Remedies). An anonymous contemporary wrote Sefer Yosippon (Book of *Josippon) a tenth-century history of the *Second Temple period; a later rendition (ca. 1356), by the Romaniote Judah ibn Mosconi, became the major inspiration for a nationalist Jewish identity until the twentieth century. In sum, Romaniote Jewry played a major role in transmitting Jewish memory and culture to contemporaneous and subsequent Jewish cultures. For further reading, see S. R. Bowman, The Jews of Byzantium: 1204–1453 (1985). Map 5 STEVEN R. BOWMAN

C

Cain and Abel are the first two sons of *Adam and *Eve; their story unfolds in Genesis 4. First-born Cain, whose name is linked to his mother's statement that she "acquired" (kaniti) a son with God's help (4:1), is a farmer; Abel is a shepherd. When Cain's vegetable offering to *God is ignored while Abel's animal offering is favored, God warns Cain against giving in to sin. Nevertheless, the jealous Cain kills Abel. Confronted by God, he famously responds, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (4:9). Protectively marked by God and sentenced to wander the earth, Cain settles in the land of Nod, east of Eden. There he marries and becomes the father of *Enoch, for whom he names his newly founded city (4:16–17). The story makes clear that fratricide is a crime against self, God, and society. Cain and Abel's sibling rivalry also becomes an important motif in Jewish, Christian, and Muslim interpretative traditions and in folklore, art, and literature. For some scholars, the story reflects the conflict between wandering herdsman and land-bound farmers.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Cairo Genizah: See GENIZAH

Calendar (See also CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR). The biblical *festivals have always been at the center of the Jewish calendar. Enumerated in several passages in the *Torah (esp. Lev 23, Num 28–9, and Deut 16), these special days include *Passover (Pesah or the Festival of Unleavened Bread; it is always first in the list, because it takes place in the first month of the year); the Festival of Weeks (*Shavuot); the Day of Remembrance (later known as *Rosh Ha-Shanah, the New Year); the Day of Atonement (*Yom Kippur); and Tabernacles (*Sukkot). Later additions include various fast days, such as the 9th of *Av (*Tisha B'Av, the anniversary of the destructions of the Jerusalem *Temples) and minor festivals such as *Purim (based on events recounted in the book of *Esther) and *Hanukkah. These minor festivals usually commemorate historical events of importance to all Jews or to specific Jewish communities. Megillat Ta'anit (ca. first century CE) provided an early calendar of such minor festivals. Many *fast days and minor festivals have fallen into oblivion over the centuries, but new ones continue to be instituted by various Jewish communities (these include fast days to commemorate the destruction of *Polish Jewry in 1648 and the Nazi *Holocaust and festivals such as the Israeli Day of Independence). Beginning in the Early Modern period, it has become customary for Jewish communities to publish annually a local Jewish calendar of such observances (known as a luah).

The structure of the Jewish calendar and the way it is reckoned are not explained in the Hebrew *Bible; however, it is likely that the ancient Israelite calendar was lunar, as were all calendars of the ancient *Near East. The months probably began at the *new moon, with an average length of twenty-nine or thirty days. The year ordinarily consisted of twelve such lunar months, but occasionally a thirteenth month was added to maintain the ordained festivals in appropriate synchronization with the seasons. This practice of adding leap months is called intercalation. In the post-exilic period (from the sixth century BCE on), the Jews adopted the standard *Babylonian calendar, a lunar calendar that was used for official, imperial purposes throughout the *Persian and (later) *Hellenistic empires of the Near East. Babylonian month names have remained in use until today, although by the *Roman period, the Jewish calendar had acquired a separate identity of its own.

However, Jewish literary sources from the late Hellenistic and early Roman periods (late third century BCE to first century CE), including the books of *Enoch and Jubilees (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) and the *Dead Sea Scrolls, assume a dissident, nonlunar calendar. This calendar consisted of a fixed year of 364 days (with months of 30 or 31 days), with exactly 52 weeks; in this calendar the New Year and festivals recurred on the same day of the week every year. Since it is slightly shorter than the solar or seasonal year of approximately 365 1/4 days, this dissident calendar gradually drifts away from a correct alignment with the seasons. It also differs from the lunar Babylonian Jewish calendar in the lengths of years and months, its disjunction from the moon and seasons, and, most importantly, its dates for festivals. The extent to which it was actually used, for example at *Qumran, and its relevance to Qumran sectarianism remain unclear. However, the dissident calendar is the earliest calendar to be explicitly described in any Jewish source; its description in the Dead Sea Scrolls achieves a level of complexity and sophistication that was hardly matched in any other culture of the same period.

After the first century CE, the lunar calendar prevailed entirely, although Jewish communities in both *Palestine and the *Diaspora reckoned it in very different ways. Disagreements often arose as to when the month had begun, depending, for example, on when the new moon had first been sighted, and Passover might be celebrated in two different months, depending on whether a thirteenth, intercalated month had been added to the year. Although most Jewish authorities do not appear to have regarded this diversity as a problem, the *Rabbis opposed calendar diversity and claimed that only a designated rabbinic *court in Palestine had the right to determine new moons and decide about the year's intercalation. The *Mishnah, in tractate Rosh Ha-Shanah, describes in detail the procedure of this court: Whoever sighted the new moon traveled to the court and testified before it; the judges then delivered their verdict ("the month is sanctified!"). Subsequently, the news was disseminated to the communities of Palestine and – somehow or other – the Diaspora. It is unclear to what extent this procedure was actually observed. However, because they wished to enforce a united calendar among all Jewish communities, the Rabbis very gradually abandoned this empirical system in favor of a fixed calculation, which was finalized in the tenth century (largely by *Saadia Gaon in *Iraq). This fixed calendar was widely disseminated among all Jewish communities, thus establishing uniformity of practice across the Jewish world.

The complex and, in astronomical terms, remarkably accurate calculations that underlie the fixed calendar were expounded in a number of twelfth-century rabbinic monographs (for example the “Laws of Sanctification of the Month” in *Maimonides’ Mishneh Torah), and they have regulated the Jewish lunar calendar ever since. The calendrical system consists of the computation of the molad (a medieval astronomical concept also known as the mean conjunction of the sun and moon) as the basis for determining the new moon; a lunar-solar cycle of nineteen years during which leap months are intercalated seven times (in years 3, 6, 8, 11, 14, 17, and 19); and additional rules that prevent the occurrence of certain festivals on certain days of the week. However, calendar diversity persisted well into the medieval period. Calendar disputes and differences between adherents of rabbinic Judaism, or *Rabbanites, are still attested in the tenth century (most famously the Saadia-Ben Meir controversy of the 920s) and may well have gone on for some centuries later. This calendar diversity sometimes resulted in disputing Jewish groups celebrating festivals on different dates. The *Karaites, in this period and later, rejected the rabbinic calendar altogether and relied, by and large, on the empirical observation of the new moons and seasons. This resulted in deviations not only from the Rabbanite calendar but also among Karaite communities themselves. Recently, the practice of new moon sighting has been revived in some circles in *Israel, in a *messianic expectation of its future restoration.

For further reading, see S. Stern, Calendar and Community: A History of the Jewish Calendar: 2nd Century BCE to 10th Century CE (2001); and J. VanderKam, Calendars in the Dead Sea Scrolls: Measuring Time (1998).

SACHA STERN

Calendar: Months of the Year (See also CALENDAR). The months of the Jewish calendar, beginning with the spring, are as follows: Nissan, Iyar, Sivan, Tammuz, Av, Elul, Tishri, Heshvan, Kislev, Tevet, Shevat, and Adar. This ordering is based on *Exodus 12:2, which identifies the first day of the spring month of Nissan (March-April) as the start of the year; in fact, Jewish tradition designates four distinct new year observances throughout the conventional twelve-month cycle (M. Rosh Ha-Shanah 1:1) (see NEW YEARS).

A leap month is added to the calendar seven times in a nineteen-year cycle to maintain synchronization between the festivals and their appropriate seasons. This process is called intercalation and this is why the Jewish calendar is best described as “lunar-solar.” In the seven years in which the additional month is added, the leap month follows the final winter month of Adar and is called Adar II (Adar Bet). In leap years the festival of *Purim (Adar 14) takes place in Adar II (M. Megillah 1:4). The names of the months have their origins in the months of the Babylonian calendar.

Canaan, Canaanites. The neighboring civilizations of *Mesopotamia and *Egypt significantly influenced Israel’s religious culture but the beliefs and practices of the native peoples of Canaan had an even greater impact. Although *Deuteronomy demands the extermination of the Canaanites (Deut 20:17) and other portions of the *Torah command their expulsion (Exod 23:27, 28; Num 33:53) they appear to have remained a significant minority and some individuals and clans certainly integrated into the people of Israel. While

*Israelite religion was unique in its imageless cult and the exclusive worship of one *God, many aspects of Israelite religion were held in common with West Semitic peoples in general and are discussed in this entry.

THE TEMPLE: One of *Solomon’s greatest achievements was the construction of a monumental *Temple in *Jerusalem, which the Bible describes in great detail (1 Kgs 6–8). His architectural models, construction techniques, and even artistic detail followed Canaanite tradition. After a comparison of the various features of the Temple (as described in *Kings and *Chronicles) with archeological discoveries in Syria-Palestine, William Dever concluded, “We now have direct Bronze and Iron Age parallels for every single feature of the ‘Solomonic Temple’ as described in the Hebrew Bible, and the best parallels come from, and only from, the Canaanite-*Phoenician world of the fifteenth to ninth centuries BCE.”

CULT TERMINOLOGY: The titles of functionaries at Israelite holy places are the same or similar to designations for servants at Canaanite shrines. Texts found at a site called Ugarit in modern *Syria, just north of the boundaries of biblical Canaan, dating to the thirteenth century BCE, indicate that their priests were called khn̄m, like the kohanim or *priests in the Bible; other servants in their temples are called yt̄nm and kdsh̄m, like the netinim and kadesh mentioned in the Bible. (Kadesh, “holy ones,” are condemned in Deuteronomy 23 and the books of Kings; some modern scholars, probably erroneously, believe the term refers to cultic male *prostitutes.) The offering of animals and other food commodities played as crucial a part in the religious life of Canaan as it did in Israel, and there is substantial overlap regarding the vocabulary of sacrifice (Hess, 104). Cuneiform texts from Emar, a city that flourished in northern Syria in the fourteenth and thirteenth centuries BCE, provide descriptions of rituals and religious festivals similar to those of ancient Israel.

CULTIC INSTALLATIONS: MATZEVOT. The Bible describes the early ancestors of Israel erecting stone pillars (matzevot) as an act of worship (Gen 28, 35:14; Exod 24) or to memorialize the dead or an important event (Gen 31:51, 35:20; 2 Sam 18:18). This practice seems to have been an accepted practice in later Israelite history as well. The prophet *Isaiah speaks positively about the erection of a matzevah for Israel’s God (Isa 19:19), and the books of *Kings record the proliferation of these uncarved standing stones in the period of the monarchy (1 Kgs 14:23; 2 Kgs 17:10). The Torah commands Israelites to smash the standing pillars of the land of Canaan and prohibits the erection of new ones because of their association with the worship of other gods (Exod 34:13; Lev 26:1; Deut 16:22). In this case, *archeology confirms the rationale for the Torah’s prohibition, as standing pillars have been found in hundreds of sites throughout Syria-Palestine from the fifth to the first millennium BCE, including some that are definitely Israelite.

BULL FIGURINES: The Bible presents the Israelites’ worship of a bull in two crucial episodes, the story of the “golden calf” in Exodus 32 and in 1 Kings 12, when the newly crowned king of Israel, *Jeroboam, erects golden calves at *Beth El and *Dan. Archeologists have discovered a bronze bull, seven inches long by five inches high, in a worship site in northern Israel dating to the twelfth century BCE. Ugaritic mythological texts use the title “Bull” for the chief god of the city, El. The representation of a god as a bull seems to have been a traditional component of Canaanite worship incorporated into *Israelite religion in the northern kingdom of *Israel, despite its strong condemnation in the Torah.

COPPER SNAKES: Numbers 21 describes how *Moses manufactured a copper snake as an antidote to the plague of poisonous snakes that God sent against the people as punishment for their complaining. “Copper snake” in Hebrew is nahash nehoshet, a wonderful example of alliteration. 2 Kings 18:4 records the destruction of Moses’ metal serpent by King *Hezekiah, who was prompted by the popular worship of the ancient icon. Archeological discoveries suggest that metal snakes played a role in the worship of Israel’s neighbors. A copper snake was found at a cultic site at Timna, near the Red Sea, and because of the pottery nearby, it is thought to have been used by Midianites, the kin of Zipporah, Moses’ wife. A bronze snake figurine was found at Tel Mevorakh, a cultic site in northern Israel that is dated to the Late Bronze Age, before the Israelites’ appearance in the land.

CANAANITE MYTHOLOGY: The mythological and ritual texts found in the archives of Ugarit have shed light on the religious thought of the people of Syria-Palestine before the emergence of Israel, as well as on biblical references to Canaanite religion. The language of the tablets is a West Semitic dialect very close to biblical *Hebrew, and the literary style of the mythic texts is similar to biblical *poetry. The chief god at Ugarit was El, linguistically related to the Hebrew term for God, Elohim. El was an aged, wise, creator god and husband of the goddess Asherah. He is described as “the Kind” and “the Compassionate,” as is Israel’s God in Exodus 34:6. The divine assembly over which El presides is called the “sons of El,” similar to the Bible’s term for angels (Gen 6:1; Ps 29:1, 82:1, 89:7). El’s home is a tent at the source of freshwater rivers. Israel’s God is also at home in a tented dwelling, and several prophets describe the abundance of freshwater that will flow from Jerusalem in a future, ideal time (Ezek 47:1–12, Joel 4:18, Zech 14:8). Although the dominant name for Israel’s God in the period after Moses is Yahweh, the book of Genesis reflects an era during which the God of the ancestors had many names, almost all compounded with the term “El” (El Shaddai in Gen 17:1, El Elyon in Gen 14:19, El Olam in Gen 21:33, and El Roi in Gen 16:13). These points of correspondence testify to the influence of the Canaanite god El on the emerging religion of Israel.

The other major god at Ugarit was Baal, which means “lord”; this designation is found in the Bible as the rival of Israel’s God during the period of the monarchy. At Ugarit, Baal is a fertility god and is associated with storms. That some Israelites thought that Baal could bring rain is obvious in the description of the prophet *Elijah’s contest with the devotees of Baal in 1 Kings 18. Israel’s God was probably worshiped by the name Baal during the period of the early monarchy. Both Baal and Yahweh are called “Rider on the Clouds” (Ps 68:4), and both are victorious in their conflict with the sea (Gen 1; Ps 74, 89:10–11, 104).

The family of gods at Ugarit included three prominent goddesses: Asherah, Astarte, and Anat. Anat is mentioned in the Bible as a personal name and a place name (Judg 3:3, Josh 21:18, Neh 11:32), whereas Astarte is referred to as the “god of the Sidonians” (1 Kgs 11:5, 33). The plural form is used in combination with baal as a derisive term for prohibited gods (Judg 10:6, 1 Sam 7:4) but also as a term for the young of the flock (Deut 7:13, 28:4, 18, 51). Asherah at Ugarit was the wife of El and the mother of the gods. She is the most interesting of the three because of archeological finds in the Negev and Sinai regions of Israel that date to the eighth or seventh centuries BCE. At these two sites, inscriptions mention Asherah (or Asherata) alongside the God of Israel, leading some scholars to conjecture that popular religion in Israel considered Asherah the consort or “wife” of Yahweh (Hess, 283–90, Zevit, 350–80). Asherah is mentioned in the Bible both as a goddess (1 Kgs 18:19; 2 Kgs 13:6) and as the term for a pole or tree that was planted near altars and symbolized the goddess or a “tree of life” in general (Deut 16:21; Judg 6:25, etc.). The hundreds of pillar-based female figures with prominent breasts found at Israelite archeological sites are also associated by some scholars with the worship of Asherah, although others have connected them with concern for successful motherhood and lactation (Plate 1). *Jeremiah castigates his fellow Jerusalemites for the worship of the “Queen of Heaven” (Jer 7:18, 44:18), but her identity is unclear.

It is evident that Israelite religion incorporated aspects of Canaanite religion in its description of Yahweh. At the same time, the distinctiveness of Israel’s religion is obvious. The God of Israel is nowhere depicted in the Bible as a sexual creature, as are the gods of Ugarit; nor is Israel’s deity a god who dies and comes back to life, as Baal does in a Ugaritic mythological text. The gods of Ugarit are personified powers of nature and are reliant on food and drink, in contrast to Israel’s God who stands outside of nature and has no physical needs. Biblical Hebrew has no feminine word for goddess corresponding to the term “Elohim,” as does Canaanite, with its title elat for the goddess Asherah. This suggests that the basic concept might be lacking. In addition to the relatively modest female figurines mentioned earlier, the near absence of male or other human representation in the archeological remains from seventh and sixth century BCE *Judah is striking. Further, scholars note the almost complete absence of the names of other gods in the personal names of the period. The Israelites’ unique religious culture, with its worship of one God who tolerates no images, emerged in the centuries before Jerusalem’s destruction in 586 BCE despite the enormous pressures exerted on this small nation not only by the great civilizations of the ancient Near East, but also by the indigenous peoples who lived among them.

For further reading, see M. D. Coogan, Stories from Ancient Canaan (1978); W. G. Dever, What Did the Biblical Writers Know and When Did They Know It? (2001); R. Hess, Israelite Religions: An Archaeological and Biblical Survey (2007); and Z. Zevit, Religions of Ancient Israel (2002), 256–60; and ARCHEOLOGY: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; NEAR EAST, ANCIENT. Maps 1, 2 ELAINE GOODFRIEND

Canaanites was the designation for a school of artists in the *Yishuv. See ART, ISRAELI.

Canada. When fourteen Jewish merchants gathered in Montreal in 1768 to form Shearith Israel congregation, nine years after the capitulation of New France to the British conquerors, they founded what would be a unique Jewish community different in important respects from its future counterpart in the *United States. As Quebec and other

North American territories remained British after the American Revolution and united as the Dominion of Canada in 1867, immigrants slowly came to perceive these differences. Canada evolved as a binational state under the British Crown, not an independent nation that imposed allegiance to a distinctive identity. This reality created the special political and social contexts in which the Canadian Jewish community evolved.

The Montreal settlers, who were followed in the mid-1800s by immigrants arriving in Toronto, Quebec City, Hamilton (Ontario), and Victoria (British Columbia), were mainly small merchants. Because Canada did not attract significant numbers of German Jews, the Reform movement had little influence. Canada's first Reform synagogue was founded in Hamilton in 1873. By century's end Canada's established communities were confronted with newly arrived East European immigrants. While some settled in existing communities, others were helped to move on; some homesteaded in Canada's western territories. These colonization projects, only a few of which lasted, as well as urban social services, were strongly supported for many years by the *Baron de Hirsch Foundation, the Jewish Colonization Association, the *Alliance Israélite Universelle, and British philanthropies.

The clothing industry was the major focus of Jewish industrialists, who usually started out as contractors for manufacturers; it was also a significant employer for men, women, and children immigrant workers. Piecework, low wages, crowded garrets in back alley slums, sexual harassment, and other features of the hated "sweating system" resulted in bitter and bloody strikes and lockouts in what amounted to open intra-communal warfare. Militant trade unions helped ameliorate some of these conditions, but agreements often broke down, and some employers moved production to rural areas to escape unionization.

*East European immigrants were often loyal to one or more of *Zionism, *communism, and *socialism. The Federation of Zionist Societies of Canada was formed in 1898 to advance the goal of establishing a Jewish state in *Palestine; Canadian Jews avidly raised money for the Jewish National Fund and other projects. Women were active through Hadassah (Hadassah-WIZO), Pioneer Women, and Mizrahi Women in campaigns targeting women's and children's projects (see ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA). Zionism in its various formations became the normative form of Canadian Jewish identity, and the Federation of Zionist Societies of Canada and its successor, the Zionist Organization of Canada, served as the first pan-Canadian Jewish organization. During World War I, however, many Canadian Jews put the dire situation of Jews in Eastern Europe temporarily ahead of Zionism. Recent immigrants emphasized the need for a Canadian Jewish alliance or congress to organize immediate relief in *Russia and *Poland; with the establishment of the Canadian Jewish Congress in March 1919, such aid was mobilized. The Congress also addressed pressing domestic issues such as the confessional school question in the Province of Quebec, where Jews had second-class status, as well as the Canadian government's increasingly restrictive immigration policies. Although the organization lapsed for more than a decade, the Congress was reestablished in 1933 to confront *antisemitism at home, in conjunction with *B'nai B'rith, and abroad, as well as the almost complete official blockage of Jewish immigration.

Antisemitism in French Canada was fueled by influential nationalists who saw Jews as posing unique dangers to Quebec's cultural survival in a secular, English-speaking continent. Antisemitism in English Canada was evident in restrictions on university enrollment, property purchases, and many aspects of social life. Once World War II began, the Congress also devoted enormous efforts to organizing chaplaincy and other services for Jewish members of the Canadian armed forces.

Beginning in 1948, when government immigration policy was liberalized, *Holocaust survivors arrived in significant numbers. Next to *Israel, Canada quickly became the second largest home per capita of such persons, generally known as "refugees" or "displaced persons." Most were able to get on with their lives, some with significant material success, despite disturbing evidence of vestigial antisemitism in the 1950s and 1960s. Canadian Jewry also responded vigorously to the mounting threats to Israel's security in the 1960s and to help *Soviet "refuseniks" in the 1970s and imprisoned and abused Syrian Jews in the 1980s. Marches, visitations, demonstrations, fundraising, and delicate behind-the-scenes rescue accompanied these concerns. Meanwhile, as overt antisemitism in Canada diminished, Jews became increasingly accepted and integrated into the mainstream; by the late 1970s, it was no longer unusual for qualified Jews to be elevated to the highest levels in public service, the judiciary and other professions, the universities, and business. At the same time, the community enjoyed unprecedented prosperity.

By the last third of the twentieth century, Canadian Jewry had matured. Gone were the severe economic struggles of the early immigrants, although significant pockets of poverty remained, especially among the elderly. The sons and daughters of once embattled garment workers entered the professions, moved to the suburbs, and in many ways lived upscale lifestyles. The old radical left still survived, but had lost much of its feistiness and, increasingly, its membership. The *Yiddish press had declined (see JOURNALISM, YIDDISH: NORTH AMERICA), and an English-language weekly, the Canadian Jewish News, spoke for the community. The Zionist organizations, too, had faded as their relevancy seemed dubious in the context of a strong Israel. In terms of relationships between Jews and non-Jews, toleration – even warm acceptance – had replaced antisemitism. This was true in Quebec as well, where secular nationalism seemed to pose few problems for a community that now included significant numbers of Francophone Jews.

Although Canada's Jews were in large measure confident and secure at the beginning of the twenty-first century, living in an atmosphere of peace, freedom, opportunity, and official multiculturalism, deep complexities and far-reaching challenges remained. Many Jews were increasingly concerned with "identity" and "survival," as assimilation and out-marriage increased to alarming proportions. Many of these trends appeared parallel to similar Jewish concerns in the United States, but knowledgeable observers pointed to Canadian structural differences. One of these was the relatively high level of Jewish day school *education, which received significant public support in some provincial jurisdictions; this promised well for the persistence of Jewish identity in Canada. Concerns also included the possibility that renewed nationalist sentiment could result in Quebec's separation from Canada as well as fears of reemerging anti-semitism from some newer immigrants.

For further reading, see G. Tulchinsky, Canada's Jews: A People's Journey (2008); I. Abella and H. Troper, None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe 1933–1948 (1982); F. Bialystok, Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community (2001); and M. Weinfeld, Like Everyone Else . . . But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews (2001); and LITERATURE: CANADA and PERIODICALS: CANADA.

GERALD TULCHINSKY

Cantor, Cantorate: Contemporary. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, a cantor is the music professional who leads Jewish worshipers in *synagogue *prayer (usually in tandem with a rabbi). However, the term is a relatively recent one, only used among *Ashkenazic Jews since the nineteenth century and borrowed from Christianity. *Reform Jews who were trying to modernize and raise the aesthetic level of Jewish religious services hoped they could find Jewish musicians who not only possessed beautiful voices but could also write stirring compositions to inspire both reverence and congregational participation. Although most of the men who filled the post fell short of this ideal, Cantor Salomon Sulzer (1804–1890), the first to be called by that title, set a high standard. Renowned for his beautiful voice (which drew non-Jews as well as his co-religionists to Vienna's Seitenstettengasse Shul), Sulzer published two volumes of new music covering the entire liturgical cycle. Some of his melodies (most famously, his settings of "Shema Yisrael" and "Ki MiTziyon") remain in use in most Ashkenazic synagogues (see JUDAISM, REFORM entries).

The "cantor" exemplified by Sulzer was very different from the "hazzan" whose role and function were rejected by the Reform movement. Traditional hazzanim were well versed in the nusakh (melody) and cantillation (chanting) practices that had defined Ashkenazic worship for centuries; many had sung as boy soloists in the company of an older relative who would travel from town to town, presiding at services on *festivals and other special occasions. Knowledge of the texts and the laws governing Jewish ritual was one of the most important criterion for designation as a hazzan and most received a good Jewish education, although few had any formal training in music (see MUSIC, RELIGIOUS). In contrast, cantors were trained in newly established "cantorial schools" and received a thorough education in music theory, sight-singing, and composition, sometimes at the expense of some traditional aspects of Jewish studies.

The designation of the cantor as Jewish music professional par excellence is one more step in the evolution of a position that has undergone substantial change in the course of Jewish history. In the post-*Temple era any knowledgeable layman could function as a shaliah tzibbur, a "representative of the community," who would lead a gathering of worshipers. As the liturgy evolved, it became customary to expect the officiant to compose and chant extemporaneous prayers. The first use of the term "hazzan" was actually pejorative, alluding to those who lengthened worship services with their elaborate displays of poetic and vocal prowess. These early hazzanim may have been asserting a liturgical role for themselves among their many tasks. Those responsibilities might include arranging and exchanging *prayer books, *Torah scrolls, and other *synagogue accoutrements for the changing liturgical season; performing ritual *circumcisions; slaughtering animals to provide *kosher meat; and teaching children. In the nineteenth century cantors adopted more purely musical roles: selecting music for *worship services (or composing their own), overseeing the work of the organist and choral director, and of course engaging the congregation in song.

The use of the title "cantor" was initially limited to the Reform movement, with professionals in the more traditional movements preferring to be known as "hazzanim." Ironically, it was the *Orthodox performers of the "Golden Age of Hazzanut" who helped make the term "cantor" essentially an English translation for "hazzan." Throughout the first half of the twentieth century, Columbia and RCA Records issued a string of recordings by "Cantors" Joseph 'Yossele' Rosenblatt (d. 1933), Gershon Sirota (d. 1943), Moshe Koussevitzky (d. 1966), and a host of others chanting traditional "cantorial" music. In the twenty-first century, some individuals (especially those associated with the Conservative movement) still prefer to be known as "hazzan," but the term "cantor" has become synonymous with "Jewish music professional."

The contemporary cantorate has continued to evolve, both in the styles of music performed in synagogues and in the expectations of services to be rendered by the cantor. Today cantors serve a variety of functions beyond being the "voice of the community." They play an important role in selecting and presenting liturgical music, usually in collaboration with a rabbi and a congregational ritual committee that may advocate for changes in the music of the service, adding or subtracting instrumental accompaniment, choral singing, and preferred melodies in response to popular preferences. If the position of cantor has lost some autonomy in the musical realm, however, it has gained in other areas. Cantors are welcomed as chaplains who counsel the needy, visit the sick, and comfort the bereaved. They are also active in various educational enterprises, preparing children and adult b'nei mitzvah (see BAR MITZVAH; BAT MITZVAH), providing music instruction in the religious school, and contributing choral and other musical expertise to a host of other community programs. Some smaller congregations that cannot afford to engage multiple full-time professionals have cantors who double as religious school principals or as the synagogue's executive director.

The largest change in the modern cantorate has come with the acceptance of *women as cantors. In the 1940s and 1950s there were isolated instances of women performing as cantors (occasionally in congregations, but more often singing liturgical music on recordings and in concert settings). The Reform movement led the way with the formal ordination of female cantors in 1975; the Conservative movement followed in 1987. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, women constitute at least half of the student body in the various non-Orthodox cantorial training programs and, as their older male colleagues retire, will soon represent the majority of active Jewish music professionals. Female cantors have successfully performed much of the most famous cantorial repertoire of the past, but the growing presence of women in the cantorate, combined with changing preferences in ritual music, will likely inspire the creation of new liturgical compositions in years to come.

MARSHA BRYAN EDELMAN

Cantor, Cantorate: Historical Development. Cantor is a term of Christian origin applied to the professional sacred singer of the Jewish *synagogue, termed “hazzan” in Hebrew. The latinate term indicates the intersection of modernity – the Jewish entry into civil European society around 1800 – with ancient traditions.

The hazzan emerged as a prominent figure around the ninth century CE as a singer or singer/composer of expressive hymns – piyyutim* (liturgical poetry) – based on earlier models of individuals who led the congregation in *prayer. Not mandated by Jewish law, the cantor was selected as an expressive spokesman by a communal prayer group; he was also called shaliah tzibbur, the “messenger of the congregation,” because he could amplify and direct the group’s supplication. Part of this power originally rested on the injunction of hiddur mitzvah, the beautification of a sacred obligation, in this case prayer. Thus, the aesthetic element was crucial in a congregation’s decision to engage a cantor (see also CEREMONIAL OBJECTS).

The cantor played a role in the liturgical experience of both *Ashkenazic and *Sephardic Jews. In nineteenth-century *Central Europe, powerful cantor-composers established new forms of composition, including choral settings. Salomon Sulzer in *Vienna (1804–1890; a friend of the composer Franz Schubert) and Louis Lewandowski in *Berlin (1823–1894) were among the most influential. In *Eastern Europe, cantors often began as apprentices, meshorerim, learning the repertoire and possibly music notation from senior figures. Operatic style shaped cantorial vocal and compositional style. In the late nineteenth century, top cantors became well-paid stars of synagogues and communities, moving internationally from congregation to congregation and recording their music for wide dissemination: Gershon Sirota (1874–1943) was the first such star. However, ordinary cantors had a difficult time making a living. The figure of the cantor appeared in early *films, most notably in The Jazz Singer of 1927, featuring the Broadway star Al Jolson, himself a cantor’s son, as a singer torn between his father’s cantorial heritage and the call of the theater (see FILM: UNITED STATES).

The burgeoning of American Jewish synagogue life after World War II led to the development of professional cantorate organizations staffed by graduates of the new training institutes of the Reform, Conservative, and Orthodox Judaisms. The cantor attained a co-clergy status with the rabbi in congregational life, greatly broadening the job description. In the 1970s and 1980s, the Reform and Conservative movements opened cantorial training and ordination to *women, a radically egalitarian move for a previously all-male profession. Cantors learned newer song styles based on American folk music, from singer-songwriters such as Debbie Friedman (1951–2011), and *Hasidic melodies from Shlomo Carlebach (1925–1994). The 1980s and 1990s saw a move away from the cantor’s centrality, as congregants demanded more active participation in worship services or broke away from large synagogues to form egalitarian prayer groups without professional clergy. The cantorate has declined among *Ashkenazic Orthodox Jews, but continues unabated among smaller communities such as the Syrian Jews of Brooklyn, New York.

MARK SLOBIN

Capital Punishment is the state-sanctioned execution of individuals convicted of specific crimes. Capital punishment is mandated in the *Torah not just for murder (Exod 21:12), but for many other offenses. These other offenses include what most modern people would consider moral, ritual, and theological violations. For example, immorality in the forms of *adultery, incest, bestiality, and male *homosexuality brings the death penalty (Lev 20:10–21); so, too, does rape (Deut 22:25) and, for a woman, premarital intercourse (Deut 22:20–21). Similarly, striking (Exod 21:15) or even cursing one’s parents (Exod 21:17; Lev 20:9) warrants death, as does being a “stubborn and rebellious son” (Deut 21:18–21). The Torah demands the death penalty for violating some ritual *commandments, such as working on the *Sabbath (Exod 31:14), worshiping *God in the *Tabernacle while drunk (Lev 10:9), and, if being “cut off from one’s people” (koret) also means death, working or failing to fast on *Yom Kippur (Lev 23:28–30). Theological misdeeds that bring the death penalty include witchcraft (Exod 22:17); worshiping the sun, moon, stars (Deut 17:2–7), or foreign gods (Lev 20:2; Deut 13:7–12); blasphemy (Lev 24:10–16); and worshiping God in the wrong way (Lev 10:1–2; 22:9).

The Bible records two acceptable methods of capital punishment: stoning (eighteen cases cited in *Maimonides’ Mishneh Torah Sanhedrin 15:10) and burning (two instances in Lev 20:14; 21:9). Hanging is reported in the Bible as a mode of execution used by non-Jews (e.g., *Egyptians [Gen 40:22]; *Philistines [2 Sam 21:6–12]; *Persians [Esther 7:9]); as a non-Jewish law to be applied in Israel (Ezra 6:11); or as an extralegal measure (Josh 8:29). After execution, every person found guilty of a capital offense was to be impaled on a stake (Deut 21:22), but the body had to be taken down by nightfall, “for an impaled body is an affront to God” (Deut 21:23).

RABBINIC LITERATURE: The *Mishnah and *Talmud report the following four modes of execution: stoning, burning, slaying, and strangling (M. Sanhedrin 7:1). In describing how these penalties were to be executed, the Rabbis invoked two general principles. The first was that God’s command to “Love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev 19:18) also applies to those condemned to death; this requires that the condemned be given the most humane (“beautiful”) death possible (BT Sanhedrin 45a, 52a; BT Pesahim 75a; BT Ketubbot 37a). The second principle was that judicial execution should leave the body externally unchanged, as much as possible, just as natural death does (BT Sanhedrin 52a; Sifra 7:9). This whole discussion, however, was probably academic, because the *Romans deprived the Rabbis of the right to carry out capital punishment “forty years before the destruction of the *Temple” in 70 CE (BT Sanhedrin 41a; JT Sanhedrin 1:18a).

More instructive for later times is a general rabbinic reticence to use capital punishment altogether. This reluctance is evident in the Rabbis’ narrow interpretations of the laws that authorized the ultimate penalty, their invention of rules of evidence that were virtually impossible to satisfy, and the following reflections on the topic in M. Makkot 1:10: “A court that puts a person to death once in seven years is called a murderous court. Rabbi Eleazar ben Azariah says,

'Or even once in 70 years.' Rabbi Tarfon and Rabbi *Akiva said: 'If we had been on the court, no death sentence would ever have been passed.' Rabban Simeon ben Gamliel said: 'If so, they would have multiplied murderers in Israel'" (see TANNAIM).

POST-TALMUDIC TIMES: There are a few instances, primarily in Muslim Spain, where Jewish courts were empowered to inflict the death penalty, not only for the offenses recorded in earlier law but also for actions considered dangerous to the Jewish community at the time, especially informing on Jews to the government (Mishneh Torah, "Injury and Damage" 8:11; responsa of *Asher ben Jehiel, 17:1, 2; 32:4).

In modern *Israel, capital punishment for murder or other crimes has never been carried out and was officially abolished in 1954. The death penalty remains in force only for genocide, as in the case of Adolf Eichmann, and for treason committed in times of actual warfare. The mode of execution is hanging for civilians and shooting for soldiers.

For further reading, see H. H. Cohen and L. I. Rabinowitz, "Capital Punishment," Encyclopedia Judaica (1972) 5:142–147; and E. Spitz, "The Jewish Tradition and Capital Punishment," in Contemporary Jewish Ethics and Morality: A Reader, ed. E. N. Dorff and L. E. Newman (1995), 344–49.

ELLIOT N. DORFF

Caribbean. The earliest Jewish communities in the Caribbean were established by Sephardic Jews, many of whom came to the New World as conversos. In some locations they established successful sugar plantations; in other areas they were heavily involved in trade, importing supplies and luxury items. The earliest place where Jews were allowed to settle as Jews and to enjoy full political rights was the Dutch community in Surinam, which had Jewish inhabitants as early as 1639. Jews were among Dutch settlers in northern *Brazil between 1630 and 1654. When the Portuguese retook this area, these Jews went to various Dutch colonies in the Caribbean and to New Amsterdam (*New York). They had learned sugar production in Brazil, and this expertise was very useful in their later undertakings in Surinam and other parts of the Caribbean (including Martinique, Guadeloupe, Barbados, Cayenne, and Pomeroy). In 1685 King Louis XIV instituted the Code Noir, ordering Jews to leave all French possessions within three months. The community in Cayenne (French Guiana) left for Surinam and other areas where Jews had established themselves.

In time, Jewish communities were established in Cuba, *Jamaica, St. Thomas and St. Croix in the Virgin Islands (originally controlled by Denmark), St. Martin, St. Eustatius, St. Christopher, Nevis, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Barbados, Tobago, Curaçao and its dependencies (Aruba, Bonaire), Trinidad and Tobago, and Haiti. In *Latin America communities existed in Colombia (Baranquilla), Panama, Venezuela (Coro), Tucacas, and Surinam (Joden Savannah [Jewish Savannah] and Paramaribo). These communities went through stages of enrichment and later descended into poverty; they were in touch with each other and with the Sephardic communities of New York, *Philadelphia, London, and *Amsterdam. French Impressionist painter, Jacob-Abraham-Camille Pissarro (1830–1903) was born on St. Thomas to a Sephardic family (see ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY).

A number of these communities had sufficient wealth at various times to bring in rabbinic leaders from Europe. The congregation in Amsterdam sent out Torah scrolls to the new congregations as well as rabbis. The Portuguese synagogue in Curaçao was built in 1723 and is the oldest synagogue structure in the Caribbean. In the nineteenth century a *Reform congregation developed there, and a synagogue continues to function. However, these communities lacked the institutional structures that were in place in Europe and struggled to keep traditions intact in an atmosphere that did not lend itself to observance. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, four surviving congregations in *Jamaica, Surinam, Panama, and Curacao still have remnants of Portuguese traditions. The organization, Jewish Congregations in the Caribbean and Latin America, attempts to keep Judaism alive in the region.

The community in Surinam is particularly interesting. In the "Jewish Savannah" Jews owned sugar plantations and slaves. In a letter to Governor Frederici on March 7, 1794, Abraham Bueno de Mesquita, Moses Hoheb Brandon, and Samuel Haim de la Parra wrote, "Several among the Portuguese Jewish Nation, out of private affection, begot children with some of their slave females and mulattos. Out of particular love for the Jewish Religion, the boys were properly circumcised and the girls instructed by a teacher, as were their descendants. Some of these were manumitted at the request of their Patrons, and others, having them born out of wedlock, after manumission, were instructed by their mothers of whom they were born and took the names of Portuguese Jews" (Arbell). Notwithstanding the conflicts in Jewish status (the mothers were not Jewish) the haskamot (communal decisions) of 1754 established rules by which individuals of mixed race would be admitted to the synagogue as congreganten but not as yehidim (full-fledged members). In 1759, Darkhe Yesharim (Paths of the Righteous), a siva (brotherhood) of Jewish mulattos was established. Eventually (in 1794) they assimilated into the Jewish community.

In Curaçao, Jews initially had small plantations, but later moved to the city and established extensive trade connections. Their imports from Europe included instruments, machinery, building materials, boat supplies, comestibles, books, and sometimes arms and munitions. In exchange, they imported tobacco, lemon juice, indigo, ginger, vanilla, hides, cotton, coffee, cacao, sugar, silver, and gold from various colonies for export to Europe. The main markets for Curaçao Jewish merchants were the Spanish colonies in Venezuela and Colombia (see LATIN AMERICA). Although this trade was clandestine and considered illegal by the Spanish, it was permitted because it filled a need for goods.

Jewish activities in the Caribbean can be divided into three general areas of endeavor: plantations (from the mid-seventeenth century); commercial enterprises (eighteenth to mid-nineteenth centuries and subsequent settlements in liberated Spanish colonies); and, in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, involvement in economic development on a national scale, including construction, roads, transportation, shipping, aeronautics, refineries, and industry coupled with international commerce and banking. These patterns persist in Baranquilla, Santo Domingo, Panama City, and Jamaica. Caribbean Jews remain active in sugar plantations, coffee growing, and cattle breeding in Panama and El Salvador. Curaçao is a commercial center, and Panama's Colón Free Trade Zone, one of the largest centers of contemporary Caribbean commerce, is mostly in Jewish hands. In agro-industries, such as edible oil extraction, tropical fruit extracts, canning, spices, and juices, Jewish involvement continues in Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, El Salvador, and Jamaica.

*Ashkenazic Jews did not come to the Caribbean in any numbers until the late eighteenth century, and they tended to follow the same occupational patterns as Sephardic Jews. Jews of Ashkenazic descent are active today in commerce and manufacturing. During World War II the Dominican Republic and Jamaica absorbed Jewish refugees. The Jewish community in Cuba, which numbered 15,000 in 1959, now has a population of around 1,500. Cuban-born anthropologist Ruth Behar has written about Cuban Jewish life (An Island Called Home: Returning to Jewish Cuba [2007]).

Recent research includes M. Arbell, The Spanish-Portuguese Jewish Settlements in the Caribbean and the Guianas (2002); R. Cohen, Jews in Another Environment: Surinam in the Second Half of the Eighteenth Century (1991); and A. Ben-Ur and R. Frankel, Remnant Stones: The Jewish Cemeteries of Suriname: Epitaphs (2009).

ANTHONY MACFARLANE

Caro, Joseph: See KARO, JOSEPH

Catacombs are subterranean cemeteries consisting of underground burial chambers and of long winding galleries that also were used for burial. Although Jews in *Roman times normally preferred to be buried in smaller family-type tombs known as hypogea, catacombs were used when conditions demanded the construction of large community cemeteries. This happened in Beth She'arim, near Haifa in modern Israel, where a series of Jewish catacombs have been brought to light dating from the second through fourth centuries CE. Similarly, several Jewish communities in *Rome created four large catacombs that were used exclusively by Jews. Recent radiocarbon dating of materials from the Jewish catacombs of Rome suggest that they predate Rome's more famous early Christian catacombs. This finding suggests that Jews may have invented this particular type of burial. Both the Beth She'arim and Rome catacombs contain many important funerary inscriptions and are important sources of information about Jewish life and artistic production in Roman times. Recent research includes L. Brink and D. Green, eds., Commemorating the Dead: Texts and Artifacts in Context: Studies of Roman, Jewish and Christian Burials (2008); and see CEMETERIES, MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE.

LEONARD V. RUTGERS

Celebrities have been an important new aspect of Jewish culture since the beginning of the twentieth century, in response to larger cultural innovations in mass media and public relations. Although sages and heroic figures have long been fixtures of Jewish *folklore and popular religion, Jewish celebrities are a modern phenomenon, both because of the fields in which they are recognized (including the arts, sciences, *sports and athletics, politics, *commerce, *philanthropy, and *crime) and because of new notions of Jewishness and of the Jewish presence in public culture generally. The inventory of Jewish celebrities includes those acclaimed for achievements that are generally thought of as separate from their Jewishness (for example, biologist Jonas Salk, who developed a widely used polio vaccine, or Olympic champion swimmer Mark Spitz); those whose achievements are regarded as related to their Jewishness (such as "star *cantors" or acclaimed authors who write *literature or *drama about Jewish life); and those whose Jewishness is regarded as being in a provocative relationship with their renown. Examples of this last kind of celebrity range from nineteenth-century British Prime Minister Benjamin *Disraeli, who, although baptized and a practicing Anglican, maintained a sense of Jewish identity, to chess champion Bobby Fisher, who became an outspoken antisemite in the final years of his life.

The interrelation of fame and Jewishness in celebrities' lives can be complex. Tenor Richard Tucker (1913–1975), whose career embraced both cantorial and operatic singing, was forthright in proclaiming his Jewishness and, at the same time, felt that it hindered his opera career. Public declarations of celebrities' Jewishness have sometimes engendered larger public conversations on the interrelation of identity and culture. The crowning of Bess Myerson (b. 1924) as Miss America in 1945, amid reports that she resisted pressure to change her last name to obscure her Jewish identity, became a landmark event in postwar American Jewish popular culture; so, too, did the refusals of baseball players Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax to play in World Series games that coincided with *Yom Kippur (see SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL). All three had triumphed in nationwide competitions in which their being Jewish was essentially irrelevant but they had done so forthrightly as Jews. By publicly demonstrating the limits to which they would compromise their Jewishness for the sake of competition, they presented personal profiles in which being a Jew enhanced their status as American celebrities, adding their manifest respect for their ethnic and religious heritage to their roster of accomplishments.

Jewish entertainers are known for especially elaborate public profiles, what Richard Dyer terms "star texts" – an aggregation of their performances and their "private" lives (Stars [1979]). Some entertainers crafted elaborate false biographies to obscure their Jewishness (an early example is silent screen actress Theda Bara [1855–1955], née Theodesia Goodman); others, such as Al Jolson (1886–1950; né Asa Yoelson) and Fanny Brice (1891–1951; née Fania Borach) incorporated autobiography into their performances, blurring the line between on-stage and off-stage personas. These and other star texts of nationally renowned performers evince the dynamics and range of possibilities for positioning Jewishness in the forum of public culture.

At the same time, Jews have elevated figures to celebrity status within their own communities. For example, avid readers of acclaimed Yiddish writers followed their lives and work closely in the Yiddish press, reproduced their portraits on postcards, named schools after them, attended their funerals in mass numbers, and demonstrated other practices of modern celebrity culture. Only occasionally, however, has the renown of Yiddish writers extended beyond the confines of the Jewish world, and in most of those cases – Morris Rosenfeld (1862–1923), Sholem Asch, Isaac Bashevis Singer – the consequences have proved controversial within the Jewish community (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY).

Jewish celebrities occasionally figure in public discourses of morality. The exploits of infamous Jewish gangsters and spies have prompted larger discussions of Jewish ethics and patriotism, while Jewish performers who test the limits of public decency sometimes raise questions about Jews' sense of propriety. Conversely, some Jewish victims of anti-semitism, especially during the *Holocaust, have become figures of renown and, as exemplified by author Elie *Wiesel, have used their celebrity stature to address larger moral issues.

Listing Jewish celebrities has become a fixture of popular culture in the form of books, websites, halls of fame, collectibles, and the like. As J. Hoberman and Jeffrey Shandler note in Entertaining America: Jews, Movies and Broadcasting (2003), this is not only a Jewish pastime but is also a pursuit common to both philo- and antisemites, who keep registers of famous politicians or actors of Jewish origin who use different names professionally. Jews and their admirers claim these inventories as evidence of Jewish accomplishment within a variety of cultural mainstreams but their detractors cite these achievements as indicative of organized Jewish intentions to exploit and deceive.

JEFFREY SHANDLER

Cemeteries, Medieval and Early Modern Europe.

Although no early medieval Jewish cemeteries have been preserved anywhere in Europe, single gravestones of the seventh through ninth centuries with *Hebrew inscriptions have been found outside their original contexts in both *Italy and *Spain. In southern Italy, remains unearthed at Venosa document the transition from the *catacombs of late antiquity to the individual graves characteristic of medieval Europe.

Historic Jewish cemeteries within the *Ashkenazic realm include those of Worms, home to the earliest gravestone preserved in situ (1077), *Prague (1439), and Kraków (sixteenth century). Often, gravestones were confiscated for building purposes when a medieval cemetery was destroyed. Some of these gravestones have since resurfaced, most notably so at Würzburg, where about 1,500 medieval headstones came to light in 1987. One cemetery that has been excavated is that of medieval York, where work was suspended when findings demonstrated the Jewishness of the site (see ENGLAND: MIDDLE AGES); another is the Montjuich (Jews' Mount) of medieval Barcelona.

One apparently early difference between Ashkenazic and *Sephardic grave culture is the position of grave markers. Sephardic Jews place slabs horizontally to cover the entire grave while grave markers are positioned in an upright position, usually above the deceased person's head in Ashkenazic tradition. When Jewish populations mixed in the wake of large-scale migrations, communities often maintained separate burial places. Notable cemeteries of the Sephardic Diaspora include Hamburg-Altona (1612) and Ouderkerk near *Amsterdam (1614). Elsewhere, for example at *Venice, the various traditions are represented side by side. Medieval epigraphs were short and uniformly in Hebrew; their phraseology often followed local and regional convention. Inscriptions became more expansive in early modernity, as gravestones became a vehicle of artistic expression. The vernacular began to make inroads among Sephardic Jews after 1492; western Ashkenazic Jews followed suit about three centuries later. Among both groups, bilingual inscriptions remained the rule well into the nineteenth century.

The layout of cemeteries often reflected social hierarchies, with kinship as a key criterion. There were separate areas for *priestly families (kohanim), often situated near the entrance to accommodate *purity laws, as well as special locations for children, suicides, and *martyrs (kedoshim, later interpreted to include the victims of any sort of violent death). Burial near martyrs or great scholars appears to have been a privilege reminiscent of the Christian practice of burial ad sanctos ("near the saints"). Visits to the cemetery were part of communal custom, especially on *fast days; it was widely believed that prayers offered near the graves of the righteous would be especially efficacious. Time and again, rabbis cautioned against directing prayer to the deceased themselves.

Recent studies include A. Bar-Levav, "We Are Where We Are Not: The Cemetery in Jewish Culture," Jewish Studies 41 (2002); and C. Weissler, "Measuring Candles and Laying Wicks," in Judaism in Practice, ed. L. Fine (2001). A comprehensive, multilingual bibliography is F. Wiesemann, Sepulcra judaica: Bibliographie zu jüdischen Friedhöfen und zu Sterben, Begräbnis und Trauer bei den Juden von der Zeit des Hellenismus bis zur Gegenwart (2005).

LUCIA RASPE

Center for Jewish History. This *New York City home to a number of major American Jewish cultural and scholarly organizations opened to the public in January 2000. Its founding partners include the American Jewish Historical Society, the American Sephardi Federation (with Sephardic House), the Leo Baeck Institute, the Yeshiva University Museum, and the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research. Several smaller organizations are also located at the Center, including the American Society for Jewish Music, the Primo Levi Foundation, the Association for Jewish Studies, and Gomez Foundation for Mill House. Occupying 120,000 square feet on W. 16th Street in Manhattan, it is the largest facility for the collection and preservation of original materials relating to modern Jewish history in the western hemisphere. Each institution or organization at the Center retains its independence, maintains its own holdings, and mounts its own programs. The partners also conduct joint programs and exhibitions.

MICHAEL FELDBERG

Central Europe is a region of Europe whose boundaries are not clearly defined and are much disputed. For the purposes of Jewish history and culture, Central Europe encompasses German-speaking Europe (present-day *Germany and Austria) and areas that came under German or *Habsburg rule during the Early Modern period where German was one of the languages of officialdom and culture. Thus, Central Europe could also include *Hungary, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, and parts of *Poland. Maps 8, 10

Ceremonial Objects. Many types of appurtenances have been crafted for use in ritual ceremonies. Some are essential to the ritual; others are used to beautify the religious practice. The precept of hiddur mitzvah ("beautification of the commandment"), requiring the performance of religious commandments in a beautiful way (BT Shabbat 133b), is based on Exodus 15:2, "This is my Lord and I will beautify Him." Jewish ceremonial objects often stylistically resemble secular or religious artifacts crafted of the same materials or having parallel functions in contemporaneous locales and eras, and they tend to incorporate local decorative motifs and approaches. In Islamic countries, where the consumption of alcohol was prohibited, Jewish ceremonial cups and goblets often followed Western models.

LIFE-CYCLE EVENTS: Decorated instruments (knives, shields, medicine bottles) are often used by the mohel performing ritual *circumcisions. Silver trays associated with the pidyon ha-ben (redemption of the firstborn son) ceremony frequently depict the akedah (the binding of *Isaac narrative of Genesis 22). Ceremonial objects associated with *marriage include the huppah (canopy) under which the ceremony takes place, special cups (often interlocking), rings, and ornamented ketubbot* (marriage contracts). Water vessels, combs, and nail-cleaning implements for use in ritually cleansing a corpse are often ornamented with inscriptions or images related to *death.

DOMESTIC RITUALS: Many decorated objects are associated with *Sabbath meals, including *kiddush cups and various objects related to the hallah (Sabbath loaves), including plates, knives, and covers. Special lamps or candlesticks are used for kindling the Sabbath lights; the star-shaped hanging oil lamp known as a Judenstern was popular before the modern period. Adorned plates, cups, candleholders, and spice containers are used in the Havdalah* ceremony, which concludes the Sabbath. In *Ashkenazi communities, tower-shaped spice containers, echoing Central European architecture, are very common, as are fruit- and flower-shaped containers. Decorative containers, frequently of silver, are used to store the etrog on *Sukkot.

Ḥanukkah* lamps (ḥanukkiyah/ḥanukkiyot) are essential to the celebration of the holiday. The two basic types of Ḥanukkah lamps are (1) eight-branch candelabras resembling the seven-branched *menorah of the biblical *Tabernacle and *Temples and (2) bench-type lamps, with eight lights arranged along a slightly elevated horizontal surface, often with a decorative backplate (Plates 10, 11). Decorative vessels are also used for the foods of the *Passover seder. They include wine cups and decanters, matzah covers or bags, and special plates (often three-tiered) for the distinctive food items invoked during the ceremonial meal (Plate 5). Scrolls of the book of *Esther (megillah), read on *Purim, are often ornamented with decorative borders or illustrations and may be housed in ornamental cases. Also associated with Purim are decorative noisemakers and plates for sending gifts (mishloah manot).

SYNAGOGUE: Early sources indicate that *Torah scrolls were ornamented and protected with appurtenances. The *Mishnah discusses “figured” wrappers that covered Torah scrolls (Kelayim 28:4). Today, most *Sephardi and *Mizraḥi communities both house and read the scroll upright within a tik, a rigid, hinged case. A tik is mentioned in a document, dated 1075, found in the Cairo Genizah and is first depicted in early-fourteenth-century Spanish haggadot. A tik is generally crafted of wood or metal and is cylindrical or polygonal, often twelve-sided to symbolize the twelve *Israelite tribes. Many examples feature ornamentation typical of Islamic metalwork; lavish carved and gilded wood examples from *Italy and *North Africa are also known. Finials ornament the top or sides of the tik, and it is often draped with scarves that are used to cover the open scroll before it is read. The reader often uses a pointer (yad; literally “hand”) to follow the text and to avoid directly touching the Torah scroll.

Scrolls in both Ashkenazi and Sephardi congregations are generally attached to carved or inlaid Torah staves called atzei ḥayyim (“trees of life”), and lengths of fabric are used as binders to hold the two sides of the scroll together. Torah binders are generally crafted of beautiful fabrics. In Italy and elsewhere, they were often made and dedicated by women. The Roman liturgy includes a prayer for “every daughter of Israel who makes a mantle or cover in honor of the Torah.” It was customary among many Jews in *Central Europe to create Torah binders from swaddling cloths that wrapped a male infant at his circumcision. This type of binder, often known as a wimpel, has been understood as a physical link between the *covenantal relationship established through circumcision and the Torah. The swaddling cloths were embroidered or painted with an inscription specifying the child’s name, birth date, and a blessing for his future cited from the circumcision liturgy. The wimpel was often presented when the boy was first brought to the synagogue.

In many communities, a length of fabric is rolled with the Torah to cover the outside of the area opened for reading. A textile cover may also be placed over an open scroll. A closed scroll is covered with a fabric mantle (meil) generally of velvet or fine silks. Extant full-skirted mantles from the seventeenth century on, featuring soft or rigid circular or oval tops with two holes for insertion of the staves, are known from Sephardi communities in Western Europe, the *Ottoman Empire, and the Americas. This form is portrayed in the Sarajevo Haggadah (Spain, thirteenth century). Early Ashkenazi mantles were flat, joined segments of fabric, resembling a pillow case, with spaces at the top for staves. A 1582 example of this type is found in *Prague, and similar mantles appear in the fourteenth-century German Ulm maḥzor (*High Holiday and *festival *prayer book). Most Ashkenazi mantles feature a rigid oval top and a tight straight skirt, often decorated with dedicatory inscriptions and symbols such as crowns, lions, and the *Decalogue. A decorated fabric curtain known as a parokhet often hangs on the ark (aron kodesh) housing the Torah scrolls, evoking the covering of the biblical *Ark of the Covenant and the parokhet curtain that separated the Holy of Holies from the public spaces in the Jerusalem Temple.

Other Torah ornaments, generally crafted of metal, usually silver, are also frequently used. The Torah staves are topped with a crown (keter) or a pair of finials; many communities use both simultaneously. Torah crowns made out of jewelry to be used on *Simḥat Torah are discussed in a *responsum by *Hai ben Sherira *Gaon (939–1038); the earliest extant crowns are sixteenth-century Italian examples. Torah finials are generally known as rimonim (“pomegranates”) or sometimes as tappuḥim (“apples”), suggesting their fruit shapes (Plate 8); in the Spanish and Portuguese communities of *Britain and the Americas they are also known as bells because of the bells attached to most examples. Other finials resemble towers, corresponding to the vertical form of the staves and often reflecting local architectural traditions. Crown-shaped finials are also known. First mentioned in twelfth-century texts, the earliest extant example of Torah finials are a late-fifteenth-century pair now in the cathedral of Palma de Mallorca. A shield (tas) is often suspended on a chain over the staves in front of the mantle. Torah shields were originally used to label the reading to which a scroll was turned, but were later used for purely decorative purposes. A pointer is usually suspended on a chain over one stave. Pointers were often made of silver, although carved ivory and wood examples are also known; they generally terminate in a hand shape, often with an extended finger. Inscribed, decorated shofars (rams' horns) were used in some communities on *Rosh Ha-Shanah.

GABRIEL GOLDSTEIN

Ceremonial Objects: Islamic Lands. Ceremonial objects for *synagogue use in Islamic lands focused on the *Torah scroll with the purpose of protecting it, honoring it, and decorating it. These objects, which developed over a long period of time and throughout vast geographical regions, differ from community to community in both materials and design. There are two general types of Torah scroll coverings. One is a textile covering consisting of a wrapper, a Torah binder, and a mantle, all made from precious materials and usually patterned. The scroll itself is wound together with the wrapper, whose length is about three meters and whose width is the height of the Torah scroll parchment. A long binder is girded over the wrapper, and the mantle is placed over all. This type of covering is common to *Sephardic communities in the *Balkans, *Italy, *Morocco, and *Algeria and to the Portuguese communities, located mainly in *Holland and *England. Although it is similar to that of *Ashkenazi communities in Europe, what distinguishes the textile Torah covering in the Sephardic communities is the wrapper, which is not found in Ashkenazic practice, and the opening, which is down the front of the mantle. In the Ashkenazi mantle, the openings are to the sides. While the Torah scroll is being read these three items are taken off, and the scroll is placed horizontally on a slightly tilted table.

The second type of Torah scroll covering is the cylindrical or faceted case of wood or metal that opens down the front. Known as a tik, this protective covering has three subtypes. The most ancient, characterized by a flat top and two rolling staves that emerge from it, is found mainly in the communities of *Yemen, eastern *Iran, and the Cochin and *Bene Israel communities in *India. The second kind is distinguished by an onion-shaped crown attached to the top of the case. The crown is separated into two sides when the case is opened, and two diagonal staves are driven through it, on which two finials are placed. This subtype is common to the communities that follow the Babylonian tradition: *Iraq, *Kurdistan, western *Iran, and the dispersions of these communities. One example of this subtype is the Torah scroll of the Kurdish communities of western Iran, with four or six staves emerging above its crown. The third subtype is characterized by a coronet around the edges of the case's top, and the staves for rolling the scroll come out from its top. It is used by the communities of the eastern Mediterranean basin. All the Torah scroll cases are decorated or overlaid in precious materials, in vegetal or geometric patterns; on top of many cases a kerchief is placed or tied, a remnant of the ancient custom of wrapping the Torah scroll in a kerchief.

Another decorative object connected with the Torah scroll is the finial. Finials are placed above the Torah scroll and developed from the practice of decorating the tops of the scroll's rolling staves. At some point in time the decoration was separated from the stave tops, and a hollow rod was added to it. The rods were placed on top of the rolling staves in most communities, although in communities following the Babylonian tradition, they were placed on top of the slanted staves above the cases. Apparently the original decoration was ball-shaped, which accounts for its being named for a round fruit, the "apple" (tappuah) in Sephardic communities and the "pomegranate" (rimon) in all others. These names are still in use, but the ball-like shape has changed over time. In Yemen the finial became taller and taller, and then another elongated ball, reminiscent in shape of the crown of the actual pomegranate, was added to it. In Iraq the round shape was preserved, and bells were added to it. The ball shape was preserved in the finials of the Middle Eastern communities. Each community had its own form, expressed in the style, size, and shape of the ball and in the number of bells. The finials of the Sephardic *Diaspora developed in a different direction and were influenced by the architectural shape of the tower that is typical of non-Jewish ritual objects in Europe. This type is characterized by a semi-round base topped by a tower-like form (Plate 8).

Other important ceremonial objects are the Torah crown (keter) and Torah shield (tas) placed above and in front the Torah scroll in *Turkey; plaques for inviting a person to read the Torah in Iraqi Kurdish communities; and the pointer (yad), used in every Jewish community by all readers of the Torah scroll, to follow the text and avoid losing one's place.

BRACHA YANIV

Chabad: See HABAD

Chagall, Bella Rosenfeld (1895–1940), writer and wife of artist Marc Chagall (1887–1985; see ART, EUROPE: TWENTIETH CENTURY), was born in Vitebsk, White Russia (see BELORUSSIA), the youngest of eight children of Shmuel Noah and Alta Rosenfeld. Her parents, owners of a successful jewelry business, were members of the *Hasidic community and conducted their family life according to Jewish tradition. However, they also sought out secular education and opportunities for their children. Chagall, who was educated in Russian-language schools, became a student in the Faculty of Letters at the University of Moscow in her teens; she was particularly interested in theater and art, and as a university student she contributed articles to a Moscow newspaper. In 1909, while visiting friends in *Saint Petersburg, Bella met Marc Chagall; their attraction was instantaneous and they were soon engaged. Although both were from Vitebsk, their social worlds were far apart, and the Rosenfelds were unhappy with the engagement. The couple finally married in 1915, and their only child, Ida, was born the next year. In 1922, Marc Chagall moved his family to *France. Bella was a constant subject in her husband's art, often represented as a beloved bride. The Chagalls fled to the United States after the outbreak of World War II, arriving in *New York in 1941. Bella Chagall died in 1944 in the United States, apparently of a viral infection.

Bella Chagall's literary work included the editing and translation of her husband's 1922 autobiography from Russian into French (Ma Vie, 1931; English translation, My Life, 1960). Her major book, Brenendike Likht (Burning Lights, trans. N. Guterman [1946; reprinted 1996]), was written in

*Yiddish in France in 1939; it was published posthumously in English. Chagall said that her visits to Jewish communities in *Palestine in 1931 and *Vilna in 1935 prompted her to write in Yiddish, her “faltering mother tongue.”

In Brenendike Likht Chagall arranges her reminiscences according to the *calendar and observances of the Jewish year. Writing in the voice of her childhood self, Basha, she places female experience at the center of her luminous narrative. Chagall’s selective portrait of her well-to-do urban family – living among and employing Gentiles, successful in business, religiously active, and communally philanthropic – contrasts with contemporaneous depictions of the contained and impoverished Jewish life of the Eastern European *shtetl. A great part of the genius of Brenendike Likht is Chagall’s ability to convey simultaneously the timelessness of traditional Jewish life and a dark foreboding prompted by the existential reality of Eastern European Jewry in the 1930s. A second posthumous autobiographical volume, First Encounter, was published in 1983. For recent scholarship, see J. R. Baskin, “Piety and Female Aspiration in the Memoirs of Pauline Epstein Wengeroff and Bella Rosenfeld Chagall,” Nashim 7 (Spring 2004): 65–96; and see also MEMOIR AND LIFEWRITING: YIDDISH. JUDITH R. BASKIN

Charleston, South Carolina, boasts one of the oldest Jewish communities in the *United States. Attracted by economic opportunities and by a degree of religious tolerance remarkable for the time, *Sephardic Jews began settling in the port town as early as the 1690s. In 1749, Charleston’s Jews chartered Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim, one of the first five Jewish congregations in America. By 1800 Charleston was home to the largest, wealthiest, and most cultured Jewish community in North America, with a population of upward of five hundred individuals, or one-fifth of all the Jews in the United States at that time.

Charleston produced the first movement to modernize *Judaism in America: the Reformed Society of Israelites founded in 1824. In 1840, in a dispute with traditionalists, the reform faction at Beth Elohim prevailed. With the blessing of Beth Elohim’s popular minister, Gustavus Poznanski, a proposal to install an organ in the *synagogue was narrowly adopted. The traditionalists seceded and formed Shearit Israel, with its own burial ground.

Meanwhile, a new group of immigrants introduced another brand of Judaism to Charleston. These residents were mainly of modest means – peddlers, artisans, metalworkers, and bakers – and they gave the city’s Jewish population a more foreign appearance. As early as 1852, a *minyan, or prayer group, began meeting under the leadership of Rabbi Hirsch Zvi Levine, himself recently arrived from *Poland. In 1855 the newcomers organized as Berith Shalome (now Brith Sholom) or “Covenant of Peace.” This was the first *Ashkenazic congregation in South Carolina and one of the first in the American South (see UNITED STATES, SOUTHERN).

Between 1905 and 1912, Charleston’s Jewish community, which had maintained itself for decades at around seven hundred people, doubled in size. At one time some forty stores on upper King Street were closed on Saturday, in observance of the Jewish *Sabbath. The men held prayer services above their stores. The women kept *kosher homes, training their African American employees to make potato kugel and gefilte fish, and learning, in turn, to fix fried chicken and okra gumbo.

After *World War II, an expansion of military facilities, port development, and the growth of educational and medical institutions and tourism brought new prosperity to Charleston. The Jewish population tripled from about 2,000 in 1948 to approximately 6,500 in 2008. At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Charleston supports three congregations: Brith Sholom Beth Israel (Orthodox), Emanu-El Synagogue (Conservative), and K. K. Beth Elohim (Reform), as well as a Hebrew day school, Addlestone Hebrew Academy. The College of Charleston’s Jewish Studies Program has attracted the largest Jewish enrollment in the state, and its Jewish Heritage Collection, initiated in 1995, serves researchers from around the world.

For further reading, see S. Breibart, Explorations in Charleston’s Jewish History (2005); J. W. Hagy, This Happy Land: The Jews of Colonial and Antebellum Charleston (1993); and T. Rosengarten and D. Rosengarten, eds., A Portion of the People: Three Hundred Years of Southern Jewish Life (2002).

DALE ROSENGARTEN

Chełmno (German, Kulmhof) was the only fully operational death camp located within the *Nazi Third Reich. Himmler opened it in late 1941 to murder Jews and Roma (see HOLOCAUST: ROMA) in the Łódź *ghetto and the Warthegau district of Greater *Germany. The central camp was located in an old castle in the village of Chełmno, where the SS murdered the victims in special gas vans. The bodies were then taken about 2.5 miles to the Waldlager (forest camp) for burial and, later, cremation. The mass murders at Chełmno took place in several phases. The first was between December 1941 and March 1943. The camp was reopened in the summer of 1944 to kill the remaining Jews in Łódź and then closed. The Germans murdered 147,000 Jews and 5,000 Roma at Chełmno from 1941 to 1944. See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS.

DAVID M. CROWE

Chicago, a major city of the American Midwest, is located on Lake Michigan in the state of Illinois. Chicago’s origins as a small town on the western frontier reach back only to the 1830s. The first Jews who settled there, shortly after 1840, hailed from the *Central European regions of Bavaria, Bohemia, and Posen. Between 1860 and 1900 no American city matched either Chicago’s rapid growth, dynamism, and optimism or its social inequality and brutality. Most Jewish immigrants successfully participated in the city’s rise, especially in the production and wholesale of various textiles. Early on, Jews were active in local politics and enjoyed much respect. During the *Civil War (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL WAR), Chicago Jews organized their own company under the wings of the 82nd Illinois Volunteer Regiment. The small Jewish community remained distinct from the diverse population of German-speaking immigrants. Yet individual Jews were among the leaders of the Chicago German community; some also occupied prominent positions in the Czech community.

Chicago was a new city without established Jewish and Christian elites and this may partially explain why it became a center of the radical (or “German”) Reform movement. The Reform movement in Chicago owed much to David *Einhorn’s theology; Cincinnati Reform leader, Rabbi Isaac Mayer *Wise, was a fierce critic. Under the auspices of Rabbis Bernhard Felsenthal, and later Kaufmann Kohler and Emil G. Hirsch, Sinai Congregation (founded in 1861), which strongly influenced several other Chicago *synagogues, emerged as one of the most radical Reform congregations in America and beyond. Hannah Solomon, co-founder of the *National Council of Jewish Women, and Julius Rosenwald, philanthropist, Sears and Roebuck magnate, and NAACP co-founder, were members of Sinai. They and other established “German” Jews promoted social reforms and worked closely with Hull House founder Jane Addams and other Progressives (see JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA).

Between 1880 and 1890 the number of Chicago’s inhabitants doubled from 500,000 to more than one million. In 1890, 80% of Chicagoans consisted of foreign-born immigrants and their American-born children. Many new Chicagoans were Jews from *Eastern Europe. The Jewish population increased from around 10,000 in 1880 to approximately 300,000 in 1925, making Chicago the city with the third largest Jewish population in the world, trailing only *New York and *Warsaw. Jewish immigrants settled on the Near Westside in the “ghetto” neighborhood around Maxwell Street, working in particular in textile factories and sweatshops. The area was famous for its *Yiddish theaters. Nobel Laureate Saul Bellow, who grew up in this neighborhood, created unique descriptions of the Chicago Jewish immigrant experience in his novels (see LITERATURE, UNITED STATES: SINCE 1900). Chicago was an early center of *Zionism; Chicagoan Leon Zolotkoff was the only American delegate at the First Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897.

By the 1920s Jews were leaving the “ghetto,” many for Lawndale, a Westside neighborhood known in Yiddish as “Deutschland” (Germany) – an indication of the high degree of assimilation and social mobility associated with the mid-nineteenth-century arrivals from Central Europe. After the late 1940s Jews moved overwhelmingly to the northern suburbs or left Chicago for Sunbelt cities. Metropolitan Chicago remains one of the largest Jewish communities in the United States with an approximate population of 270,000. Chicago elected its first Jewish mayor, Rahm Emanuel, in 2011.

TOBIAS BRINKMANN

Childhood: See MIDDLE AGES: CHILDHOOD

China. There has been a continuous, if small, Jewish presence in China for well over a thousand years, and five distinct ripples of immigration can be identified. In the medieval period, Jews journeyed to Kaifeng and other cities via ancient trade routes. In the wake of the nineteenth-century opening of Chinese ports to foreigners in response to British coercion, *Mizrahi (Baghdadi) Jews from *Iraq made their way to Hong Kong and Shanghai; at the turn of the twentieth century, Russian Jews traveled to Harbin and other northeast Chinese cities. A fourth settlement occurred during World War II when German, Austrian, and Polish Jews fled to Shanghai. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, there is a community of North American, European, and Israeli Jews who are employed in China. With the exception of the Harbin and latter Shanghai experiences when China provided a place of refuge, Jews have primarily come to China for economic opportunities.

KAIFENG: Jews traveled from West Asia over the Silk Road and by sea, probably in the Tang dynasty (618–907 CE). Some scholars think they may have arrived even earlier, during the later Han dynasty (25–220 CE), which would coincide with *Roman persecution in *Judea. By 960 CE, Jews were certainly established in Kaifeng, which was then called Bianliang and served as a capital of the Song dynasty. At this time, China was a center of civilization and trade. Jews also settled in major shipping cities, such as Guangzhou (a southern coast port with access to Southeast Asia and *Persia), Quanzhou (in Southeast Fujian), Ningpo, Yangzhou (a Grand Canal port near the sea on the Yangzi River), and Hangzhou (also on the Grand Canal; a city known to have had a *synagogue). There is also evidence of a Jewish presence inland along the Silk Road in such locations as Dandan Uiliq, Dunhuang, and Ningxia.

In 1163, a synagogue was built in Kaifeng, and the community lived close by on what were called the North and the South “Teaching Torah” lanes. The Jewish community prospered despite repeated disasters, such as fires and the flooding of the Yellow River, which frequently destroyed the synagogue. In the wake of each of these calamities, the community erected a stele to commemorate their rebuilding of the synagogue; there are four in total, from 1489, 1512, 1663, and 1679. These stelae, except that of 1663 (which is lost), are currently kept in the Kaifeng Municipal Museum. They relate how the Jews believed they entered China, their history in Kaifeng, their view of the development of their religion and their religious beliefs, and their practice of the mitzvot (*commandments), which was, for centuries, very traditional.

In his diary, Marco Polo describes meeting with Jews in China in 1286. He reported that Kublai Khan celebrated Jewish, Christian, and Muslim festivals. However, it was not until 1605 that the Jewish presence in China was really “discovered” by the West when a Kaifeng Jew named Ai Tian went to Beijing to take a civil service examination and serendipitously met Fr. Matteo Ricci, the first Jesuit priest to visit China. After this meeting, the Vatican sent other Jesuits to Kaifeng. The missionaries left excellent sketches and notes about what they observed, and they confirmed that the Jews of Kaifeng had exactly the same *Torah and observed the same religious observances as the Jews of Europe. Contact with Jesuits ended when China closed itself off from missionaries in 1723.

By the seventeenth century, all the Jewish coastal communities had disappeared, leaving only Kaifeng. It is not known whether Jews in these other areas assimilated, moved to Kaifeng, or left China altogether. As China entered a period of decline, so, too, did the Kaifeng community. The last rabbi passed away in 1810, leaving little Jewish knowledge in the community. By 1854 the synagogue had fallen into ruins, but the impoverished community lacked the means to restore it. Shortly thereafter, they were “rediscovered” by Protestant missionaries and other Western travelers. At the turn of the twentieth century, William Charles White, an Anglican bishop from Toronto, tried unsuccessfully to revive the community.

Kaifeng was a closed city from after the communist victory until the early 1980s when its Jews were once more “rediscovered” by journalists and Jewish tourists. These visitors noted that Jewish self-identity persisted, most notably in the form of insisting on being registered as Jews in their identity papers, but that Jewish customs and practices had become a faded memory. The interest of contemporary Jews in Kaifeng in becoming more actively Jewish has yet to be determined, because of the skittishness of the local authorities regarding foreign interference. In recent years, a young Kaifeng Jew studied in Israel and has returned home to serve his community. Regardless, the community's one thousand years of continuous existence in relative isolation from the larger Jewish world in a welcoming but culturally powerful host country is an extraordinary display of commitment to Jewish heritage and tradition.

HONG KONG AND SHANGHAI: There has been a Mizrahi (Middle Eastern) Baghdadi Jewish presence in Shanghai and Hong Kong since the Opium Wars of the mid-nineteenth century when Britain forced China to open five port cities for trade. Baghdadi Jewish traders arrived in 1844. By 1862 they had a cemetery, and a synagogue was built by 1887. Some Kaifeng Jews visited Shanghai in 1851, and exchanges between the two Jewish communities culminated in a second visit in 1900 following the establishment by the Baghdadi community of a society to "rescue" their Kaifeng siblings from cultural oblivion.

By World War I, Shanghai had about seven hundred Jews, more than half of Mizrahi origin. In 1932, nearly 40% of the Shanghai Stock Exchange's one hundred members were Mizrahi Jews. They joined the city's finest clubs and financed some of Shanghai's finest colonial architecture, including the magnificent Children's Palace (formerly the Kadoorie estate), the art deco Peace Hotel (then the Cathay Hotel), Shanghai Mansions (a Sassoon building that later was used to process hundreds of Jewish refugees), and two synagogues, Bet Aharon and Ohel Rachel.

As in Shanghai, Hong Kong's first Jews initially came from *Iraq and *India and were British subjects. The Ohel Leah Synagogue was built by Jacob Sassoon in 1901–02. There were 80 Jews in Hong Kong in 1900 and 250 in the 1960s, split between those of *Ashkenazi and Mizrahi origins. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Hong Kong's Jewish population stands at about 3,500, with several synagogues, a Jewish day school, and an active community center.

HARBIN AND POINTS SOUTH: Russian Jews first came to Harbin in 1898. They were seeking better economic opportunities in the Russian concession in connection with the building of the Chinese Eastern Railroad. After the Russo-Japanese War, decommissioned Jewish soldiers joined these settlers; they were soon followed by refugees from the Russian *pogroms of 1905–07. By 1908, some 8,000 Jews lived in Harbin, and the central synagogue was built in 1909. The deprivations and persecution that Jews suffered during WWI, the Russian Revolution, and the White Russian counterrevolution led to further Jewish immigration to the Far East. Harbin's Jewish population, which grew to between 10,000 and 15,000, supported schools, newspapers, a library, *Zionist groups, and four synagogues.

However, the 1928 transfer of the railroad to the Chinese and escalating White Russian violence led many Jews to move south to Shanghai, Tianjin, and other southern Chinese cities. For example, in Tianjin the Jewish population reached five hundred to six hundred families between the wars. In 1945, the Soviet Army invaded Manchuria and occupied Harbin. The Soviet administration arrested prominent members of the Jewish community, returning many to the USSR. All Zionist and other Jewish organizations were suspended. Between 1951 and 1953 most Jews from Harbin immigrated to *Israel; by 1962 the community had disappeared.

REFUGEE IN SHANGHAI: Harbiners moved south to Shanghai, Tianjin, and elsewhere after the Japanese captured Manchuria in the early 1930s. Many settled in the French concession, where they ran their own stores and restaurants, read Russian newspapers, and enjoyed their own music, theater, and synagogue, the Ohel Moishe. By 1939, there were about 5,000 Russian Jews in Shanghai. They were mostly people of modest means, working in restaurants, coffee houses, bookstores, and other shops; many became bus drivers, although some were engineers, lawyers, or musicians. Others engaged in criminal activities, such as drug smuggling and *prostitution. However, between 1938 and 1941, an influx of refugees from *Nazi *Germany increased the Jewish population of Shanghai to an estimated 18,000. Thousands arrived in rags, without entry permits or any means of support.

Shanghai, despite its perilous political situation in the 1930s, was an attractive destination because it was a free transit port, with no requirements for visas or other documentation. Jewish refugees came in three waves. The first, in 1933–34, were mostly well-educated German Jews; their flight was not made in haste, and they were able to bring their financial resources to use to reestablish their professional lives in China. The second wave, during 1938–39, lasted until the Japanese and Western powers imposed restrictions on immigration. Up to 15,000 Jews came during this period, more than one thousand per month, mainly from Austria and Germany. Their rapid flight prevented them from taking more than minimal belongings. The last wave occurred in 1939, when a few thousand Jews escaped from *Poland after it was attacked by Germany. Traversing Siberia and Japan, they arrived in Shanghai penniless.

With help from Shanghai's Mizrahi Jews, a refugee resettlement program was organized that opened schools, organized sports teams, published newspapers and magazines, and even started a band, scout troops, and football teams. It established seven synagogues, a Jewish school, four cemeteries, and a performance hall. After Pearl Harbor in 1941, the Japanese sent foreigners from the Allied nations to prison camps. But German and Austrian Jews were considered stateless refugees. Early in 1943, the Japanese promulgated a bulletin announcing the establishment of a "designated area" for "all refugees who had arrived after 1937." By May, nationless refugees were moved to designated locations by the military police "for security reasons." About 8,000 Jews were moved into the Hongkou "ghetto," joining the approximately 8,000 impoverished Jews already residing there in an area of less than two square kilometers. Although there was no barbed wire and only light patrols, adults needed officially approved passes to exit the area.

During World War II, approximately 24,000 Jews lived in Shanghai. Given the high population density in the Hongkou "ghetto," living conditions deteriorated rapidly. Some people begged on the street, whereas others worked in Chinese mills. Still, Shanghai was preferable to the alternative in Europe. This "ghetto" lasted from May 1943 until Japan's surrender in August 1945. When the civil war between the Chinese nationalists and communists resumed after World War II, an exodus of foreigners began almost immediately. Jews left for Israel, the *United States, *Canada, *Australia, and other countries. In 1948, about 10,000 Jews still lived in Shanghai; by 1953, only 450 remained. In 1976, there were only about ten Jews in Shanghai; the last remaining Jew died in 1982.

CONTEMPORARY PERIOD: In the 1980s, China began opening up to the West, and Jewish businesspersons were among the many Westerners who flocked to Shanghai, Guangzhou, and Beijing. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, the Jewish communities of China consist primarily of those in Hong Kong, with about 3,500; Shanghai, with about 1,000; and Beijing, with at least 200. The Jewish descendants in Kaifeng number perhaps one thousand. Hong Kong has a long-standing, permanent Jewish community as well as a transitory business one; the Shanghai and Beijing Jewish communities are mostly transitory. Except for Kaifeng Jews, Jews are not considered, nor do they consider themselves, to be citizens of China.

China's educated elite is fascinated by the similarities between the Jewish Diaspora and Overseas Chinese experiences and the resemblances between Chinese and Jewish cultures. Many are knowledgeable about the Jewish experiences in China and are proud of their country's role in providing a refuge for Jewish refugees from Nazism. *Jewish studies are flourishing in China, with formal programs at universities in Shandong, Shanghai, Beijing, Nanjing, Kaifeng, and Kunming.

The most important studies of the Kaifeng Jews are W. C. White, Chinese Jews (1966); M. Pollak, Mandarins, Jews and Missionaries (1998); Xu Xin, The Jews of Kaifeng, China (2003); and T. Weisz, The Kaifeng Stone Inscriptions (2006). See also M. Pollak, The Jews of Dynastic China: A Critical Bibliography (1993); J. Goldstein, ed., The Jews of China (2000); R. Malik, From Kaifeng to Shanghai (2000); and Pan Guang, The Jews in China (2002). On WWII Shanghai, see D. Kranzler, Japanese, Nazis and Jews (1976); a number of memoirs have also appeared. Since 1986, the Sino-Judaic Institute has published a thrice-yearly journal, Points East, as well as intermittent scholarly publications; useful websites are www.sino-judaic.org and www.jewsofchina.org.

ANSON LAYTNER

Chmelnitzki (Khmel'nyts'kyi; also Chmielnicki), Bogdan (1595–1657), was the leader of the Cossack uprising of 1648 in *Ukraine. Chmelnitzki was from an Eastern Orthodox noble family that served in the Cossack units of the *Polish army, and he rose to a high position in the Chyhyryn Cossack regiments; he fled to Zaporizhian Sich, an independent Cossack republic in 1646 because of a personal dispute. There he was elected as hetman and initiated an uprising against Polish landlords. With the help of Crimean Tatars and the support of Ukrainian peasants, Chmelnitzki's Cossacks defeated the Polish regular forces. The outrage of the rebels was channeled toward Polish nobles, who possessed huge estates worked by Ukrainian serfs; Catholic priests, who persecuted the Eastern Orthodox Ukrainians; and Jews, who served as administrators and tax collectors for the Poles.

The Cossack armies captured the majority of fortified towns in the Ukraine; only the strongest towns in Ruś Czerwona withstood their onslaughts or succeeded in paying the attackers to move on. The rebels killed Poles and Jews, while their Tatar allies took prisoners to sell in the markets of Crimea and Istanbul. The bloodiest massacres took place in Nemirov, Tulchin, and Bar in 1648, where Jewish residents were completely annihilated. Recent research by Shaul Stampfer (Jewish History 17) shows that approximately 20,000 Jews were killed by the Cossacks, whereas another 20,000 fled to cities that were not captured or abroad, as far as *Italy and *Holland.

The Peace of Zborov, concluded in August 1649 between Chmelnitzki and the Polish king, established a semi-independent hetmanate on both banks of the Dnieper, in which Jews were forbidden to live. However, under the treaty of Bila Tserkva in 1651, Jews were allowed to return to the Cossack territories. After an attempt to become an *Ottoman vassal, Chmelnitzki turned to Moscow and in 1654 concluded the Pereyaslav treaty, transferring Ukrainian lands to Russian protection. This brought *Russia into a war with Poland that ended in 1667 with the establishment of the Dnieper as the border between the two states. Until his death in 1657 Chmelnitzki remained the hetman and directed the Cossacks' military and diplomatic activities.

In Jewish tradition the atrocities committed by Chmelnitzki's Cossacks were called "the [evil] decrees of 1648–49," and they were remembered as among the most horrible events in Jewish history. The most influential of the six chronicles about these atrocities was Nathan Hanover's Even Metzulah (Abyss of Despair), which appeared in 1653. The 20th of *Sivan, the day of the massacre in Nemirov, was established as a fast day, and special prayers in memory of the victims were written. In the Ukrainian community, the legacy and mythologizing of the anti-Jewish violence of Chmelnitzki's Cossacks significantly influenced further waves of anti-Jewish violence from the eighteenth to the mid-twentieth century.

For further reading, see Jewish History 17 (May 2003), which is devoted to the Chmelnitzki massacres. Also see Abyss of Despair, trans. A. J. Mesch (1983); and J. Raba, Between Remembrance and Denial (1995). VLADIMIR LEVIN Chosenness, or the doctrine of election, is central to Jewish self-understanding. Its roots are biblical. In *Exodus 19, *God calls for Israel's fidelity to the *covenant. If Israel is faithful to the covenant, then Israel will be God's "treasure from among all peoples" (19:5). Elected from all the nations, Israel will become a "kingdom of *priests" (19:6), appointed to observe and guard the *Torah and its moral and ritual obligations. God's election of Israel is not attributed to any distinctive essential or numerical advantage but because "God loved you [Israel]" (Deut 7:8).

Medieval Jewish philosophers assumed the truth of chosenness, but divergent understandings of election were common. The two most enduring theories emerge from the writings of Judah *Halevi (1075?–1141) and Moses *Maimonides (1135–1204). Halevi held an almost biological understanding of election. God chose the Jews by reason of their special, native spiritual qualities, qualities absent in other peoples. In contrast, Maimonides denied that inherent factors played any role in election. He believed that anyone by dint of reason and belief could enter into the covenant. Maimonides had a much more positive view of *conversion than Halevi.

Baruch *Spinoza (1632–1677) presented the most thoroughgoing critique of the idea of chosenness. Excommunicated from his native *Amsterdam Jewish community, he was the first Jew to seriously challenge the concept of election. In the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, Spinoza reversed the traditional hierarchy of election, suggesting that Israel, through its desire for a properly ordered society, chose God. In Spinoza's understanding, the covenant between God and Israel is of human design and made for distinctly human purposes.

Later, Reform *Judaism attempted to reinterpret chosenness as a universalist concept. Building on Isaiah 42:6, in which Israel is commanded to be "a light to the nations," Reform leaders such as Abraham *Geiger (1810–1874) in *Germany and Kaufmann Kohler (1843–1926) in America identified chosenness with mission. This mission charged Jews with the task of circulating the belief in ethical monotheism throughout the Gentile world. This ideal justified the *Diaspora with the insistence that the Jewish role among humanity can be fulfilled outside of the Land of *Israel. Reform Jews applied the concept of mission as well to the correspondence of Jewish ethics and the moral ideals of Christianity. By demonstrating the mutuality of ethical concern, they were able to make a rational claim for full civic and political equality.

Two of the most significant contemporary works on chosenness are M. Wyschogrod, The Body of Faith (1996), and D. Novak, The Election of Israel (1995). Wyschogrod accepts the idea that God chose Israel because of a special love even before it received the Torah. Although Novak agrees with Wyschogrod that God forms a singular relationship with the Jewish people, he argues that the Torah, which is the record of election, also establishes God's moral covenant with the rest of the world.

MATTHEW LAGRONE

Christian Hebraism was an intellectual movement whose adherents borrowed and adapted texts, ideas, and literary forms from Jewish literature to meet Christian cultural and religious needs. There were several important Christian scholars who learned and used *Hebrew during the Middle Ages, including Nicholas of Lyra (ca. 1270–1349) and Raymond Martini (1220–1284), and a number of others who learned Hebrew for biblical interpretation or missionary purposes, but they were isolated experts. Only in early modern Europe (1500–1750) can we speak of Christian Hebraism as a broad-based intellectual movement.

Both biblical humanism and the Protestant *Reformation (beginning in 1517) with its doctrine of sola scriptura (the belief that the Bible is the only source of religious authority) motivated large numbers of Christians to learn Hebrew so they could read the original text of the Old Testament. Greater interest in Hebrew learning encouraged *printers to produce substantial numbers of books on Hebrew for non-Jewish customers; similarly, rulers, patrons, and university authorities were convinced to create professorships in Hebrew. Jewish scholars such as Elijah Levita (1468–1549), Leon *Modena (1571–1648), and *Menasseh ben Israel (1604–1657) aided the growth of Christian Hebraism by tutoring Christian students in Hebrew and *Aramaic and by making Jewish books and manuscripts available to them. Christian Hebraism had a broader cultural and religious impact on Protestants because of the greater availability of Hebrew instruction in Protestant lands and its greater importance for Protestant theology, but a number of gifted Catholic Hebraists such as Egidio di Viterbo (1469–1532), Jean Morin (1591–1659), and Richard Simon (1638–1712) were also active throughout this period.

Christian Hebraists made accessible what they considered "useful" Jewish knowledge to other Christians. Their encounter with Judaism focused primarily on *Bible commentary (above all study of the exegetical writings of *Rashi, David *Kimhi, and Abraham *ibn Ezra), Christian *Kabbalah, the translation of Jewish classics into Latin and other European languages, and the study of living Judaism.

Christian Hebrew study involved close cooperation with Jews, especially in *Italy and the *Netherlands. The work of some Hebraists such as Johann Buxtorf (1564–1629) also began a scholarly reevaluation of Judaism and the place of Jews within European society that resulted in a more realistic assessment of both. Christian writers also used this new knowledge of Judaism to create better informed anti-Jewish polemical books such as Johann Andreas Eisenmenger's Entdecktes Judentum (1700).

For recent research, see P. Beitchman, Alchemy of the Word: Cabala of the Renaissance (1998); S. G. Burnett, From Christian Hebraism to Jewish Studies (1996); D. C. Klepper, The Insight of Unbelievers: Nicholas of Lyra and Christian Reading of Jewish Text in the Later Middle Ages (2007); P. T. Van Rooden, Theology, Biblical Scholarship and Rabbinical Studies (1989); and A. P. Coudert and J. S. Shoulson, eds., Hebraica Veritas? Christian Hebraists and the Study of Judaism in Early Modern Europe (2004).

STEPHEN G. BURNETT

Christianity and Second Temple Judaism. Among the significant events of the last century of the *Second Temple period was the emergence of the Jesus movement. The birth of Jesus can be dated around 6–4 BCE and his death around 30–33 CE. The earliest surviving writings by a follower of Jesus are the letters of Paul; they are dated to the 50s and 60s. The oldest written accounts of the life of Jesus (Gospels of Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John) and of the deeds of the first generation of his followers (Acts) date from after the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE. These and other texts in the *New Testament preserve evidence that the Jesus movement originated as a movement within *Judaism, even as they also reflect its increasing appeal to Gentiles.

In research on Christianity, it was once common to treat Jesus and Paul as founders of a new "religion." Consistent with the theological training and institutional settings of most New Testament scholars, nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century studies often took for granted a supersessionist model of history. They read the origins of Christianity as the restoration of biblical piety from the alleged corruption of "late Judaism" (the older label for what is now termed "Second Temple Judaism"). In the wake of World War II and the *Holocaust, however, concerted efforts were made to shed such theological biases, and there has emerged a new understanding of Second Temple Judaism and Christian origins. In addition, the discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls brought new attention to noncanonical sources, exposing the rich variety in Jewish belief and practice in Second *Temple times. Scholars have increasingly understood the Jesus movement as one among many *apocalyptic and *messianic movements in Second Temple Judaism. Accordingly, they have read the New Testament literature as evidence both for the diversity of Second Temple Judaism and for the origins of Christianity.

Much about the historical Jesus remains debated. Was he a wisdom teacher, political revolutionary, or apocalyptic prophet? Did he see himself as the Messiah (Greek: christos)? Among the few points of consensus are that Jesus was a Jew, he was born of a Jewish mother, and he lived and died as a Jew in the Land of *Israel. For instance, *Josephus' account of Jewish history includes a passing reference to Jesus and depicts him as a wise man and wonder worker (Antiquities 18.63–64). Likewise, in the stories about his life in the Gospels, we find no hint that Jesus saw himself as anything other than a Jew. Even though the Gospels were written at a later time when some of Jesus' followers were developing a self-definition in distinction from their Jewish contemporaries, these texts preserve traditions about Jesus preaching in *synagogues, celebrating *Passover, interpreting Jewish writings, and debating halakhic issues with *Pharisees. Jesus is described as teaching by means of parables that recall, in form and content, the meshalim ("proverbs" or wise sayings) of Jewish *wisdom literature and rabbinic *midrash. Many of his parables concern the coming of the "kingdom of God." In this too, Jesus fits well with the Judaism of his time, an age of uncertainty and upheaval when many charismatic leaders warned of the impending "end of days." There are also some hints that Jesus understood his message as meant for Jews; according to the Gospel of Matthew, for instance, he initially instructed his followers to preach only to "the lost sheep of Israel" (10:6).

Jesus' Jewishness is also evident in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5–7), a set of teachings that later Christians understood as exemplifying Jesus' break from Judaism. However, the statements attributed to Jesus include exhortations to observe the whole of the *Torah (5:17–20). Such statements shed an interesting perspective on his polemics against Pharisees (e.g., Matthew 23), raising the possibility that he and his followers were engaged in internal Jewish controversies akin to the debates among other sects in Second Temple times.

According to the Gospels and Book of Acts, the Jesus movement initially consisted of Jews who believed that Jesus was the messiah foretold in the Jewish Scriptures. It was centered in Jerusalem and led by Peter. Followers of Jesus frequented the Temple and preached their message in synagogues (e.g., Acts 3, 13; 17–18). Like members of other Jewish apocalyptic and messianic movements of the time, they supported their claims with biblical proof-texts, drawing on the writings of the prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY) in particular. Like other such groups, they met with resistance from other Jews who did not share their particular beliefs.

Those who believed in Jesus as messiah, however, faced an additional challenge in persuading other Jews since Jesus had been executed by the *Romans. Jesus' followers proclaimed that he had been resurrected (see RESURRECTION), and they developed an understanding of his death as inaugurating a series of end-time events that included his future return. Many of their fellow Jews seem to have met such claims with skepticism (cf. Matthew 28:15).

Some members of the Jesus movement understood the coming of the messiah as marking the inclusion of Gentiles in God's promises to Israel, consistent with biblical and Second Temple Jewish ideas about the ingathering of "the nations" at the end of time (e.g., Isa 2:2–4, 14:1–2, 19:18–25; Jer 3:17; Micah 4:1–5; 1 Enoch 90). The inclusion of Gentiles was promoted particularly by Saul/Paul, who was a Pharisee and possibly a student of R. Gamaliel the Elder (Acts 22:3). Although Paul was not a disciple of Jesus during his lifetime, he later came to believe that Jesus was the messiah. In his letters, he describes how a vision prompted him to change his name from Saul to Paul and to become the "messenger/envoy (Greek: apostolos) to the Gentiles" (Romans 11:13; Galatians 2:2). Paul argued that Gentiles could be saved through faith in Jesus, even apart from Torah observance (e.g., Romans 1–9; Galatians 1–3). He traveled throughout the Roman Empire spreading his message and founding communities.

However, others in the Jesus movement did not share Paul's approach to Gentile inclusion. Some appear to have believed that Gentiles could join the Jesus movement only if they first converted to Judaism. In the letters of Paul and Acts, we find references to those who required *circumcision of Gentile male converts (Galatians 2:12; Acts 15:1–5). Contestation surrounding the inclusion of Gentiles is also evinced by debates about observance of the *dietary laws. For instance, Jesus' brother James apparently believed that Jewish followers of Jesus had to maintain their ritual *purity through separation from Gentiles, particularly at meals (Galatians 2:11–14; cf. Acts 10:28; Colossians 2:21). Initially, Peter seems to have embraced a similar position – that Torah observance was incumbent on all members of the Jesus movement (Galatians 2:12; Acts 10–11) – and only later became convinced that circumcision was unnecessary for Gentile converts (Acts 15:6). According to the Book of Acts, Peter ruled that they need only avoid fornication, improperly slaughtered meat, and food offered to idols (15:20), thus voicing a view of Gentile salvation that resonates with later rabbinic traditions about the Noachide commandments (T. Avodah Zarah 8:4).

Scholars continue to debate whether Paul believed that the coming of the messiah had negated the need for ritual observances for Jews as well as Gentiles. Paul may have maintained the efficacy of Torah observance for Jews, even as he also believed that a separate path to salvation for Gentiles had been opened with the coming of Jesus. In any case, it may be significant that Paul continued to self-identify as a Jew and as a Pharisee (Galatians 2:15; Philippians 3:5; Acts 22:3, 26:4–5). Eventually, the Pauline Epistles would be interpreted in terms of Christian claims that Torah observance had been abrogated by the Gospels and that Israel had been superseded by the church. Paul's own position on such questions, however, is less clear.

After the deaths of James, Paul, and Peter, the Jesus movement became increasingly displaced from its original Galilean and Judean settings. In the wake of the *Bar Kokhba Revolt, the Jerusalem church waned in power. The communities founded by Paul and others elsewhere in the Roman Empire flourished, and the movement attracted more and more Gentile converts. In the New Testament literature, we can discern the first traces of a long process by which some believers in Jesus distinguished themselves first from other Jewish groups and then from “Judaism” more broadly.

Nevertheless, it is perhaps not coincidental that so many Second Temple Jewish writings were preserved and transmitted by late antique and medieval Christian scribes (e.g., *Apocrypha; *Pseudepigrapha; writings of *Philo and *Josephus). Nor should it be surprising that there are so many parallels to early Christian traditions in Second Temple Jewish literature. The Jesus movement’s origins in Second Temple Judaism continued to resonate in Christian belief and practice, leaving open lines for contact, conflict, and competition between Christians and Jews for many centuries.

Recent research includes P. Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth (1999); J. G. Gager, Reinventing Paul (2002); A. J. Levine, The Misunderstood Jew (2004); and S. Westerholm, Perspectives Old and New on Paul (2004).

ANNETTE YOSHIKO REED

Christians, Christianity: See CHRISTIAN HEBRAISM; CHRISTIANITY AND SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM; CHURCH FATHERS: ATTITUDES TOWARDS JEWS AND JUDAISM; INQUISITION, SPANISH; INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: UNITED STATES; NEW TESTAMENT; MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH - CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; REFORMATION

Chronicles is the final book in the *Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible. An account of history from creation to the downfall of *Babylon, it is also known by the titles “Events of the Days” (Hebrew, Divrei Hayyamim) or “Supplements” (Greek, Paraleipomena). Although it is now generally separated into two books (1 and 2 Chronicles), Chronicles was originally a single historical work composed in the post-exilic period, most likely in the fourth century BCE. It appears to have some relation to *Ezra-Nehemiah (which begins where Chronicles leaves off), but most likely was not written by the same author. The book opens with an extensive set of genealogies (1 Chron 1–9) starting with *Adam that focus on the descendants of *Judah, Benjamin, and Levi. Chronicles initiates the narrative proper with a brief condemnation of *Saul’s reign (1 Chron 10) and continues with an account of *David’s career (1 Chron 11–29) and *Solomon’s reign and efforts to build the Jerusalem *Temple (2 Chron 1–9). The last major section is a history of the kingdom of *Judah, in which there are virtually no references to the northern kingdom of *Israel (2 Chron 10–36).

Chronicles makes extensive use of known written sources, including *Psalms and *Joshua. Most prominently, it contains lengthy near-verbatim passages from the books of *Samuel and *Kings or from precursors of those books. Notwithstanding its reliance on earlier texts, Chronicles tells a story all its own in which David, Israel’s quintessential political and religious leader, becomes the central figure. In this version, which contains little of the intrigue and precariousness of the Samuel account, David ascends the throne to overwhelming popular acclaim, consciously designates his son Solomon as his heir, makes extensive preparations for the construction of the Temple, and presides over the establishment of the duties and rotations of priests, Levites, singers, and gatekeepers. Yet the David of Chronicles is not a flawless, one-dimensional character; he is also a leader capable of sin and *repentance. Among other notable divergences from Samuel and Kings are the recounting of *Hezekiah’s extensive physical and spiritual preparations for Sennacherib’s siege, culminating in a celebration of the long-neglected *Passover festival, as well as the story of Manasseh’s exile to *Assyria where he humbles himself for his transgressions (see also the *apocryphal Prayer of Manasseh).

The narrative related in Chronicles is not disconnected from the realia of the past, but it offers a vision of Israel’s history that is deeply imaginative, perhaps utopian. In this account, the turbulent history of the northern kingdom is irrelevant, and Judah was always Israel’s predominant tribe. Additionally, the central aspect of Israel’s public life is and always has been centralized Temple *worship – not sacrifice alone, but also the liturgies of *prayer and *music. Although formally a history, Chronicles marks a break from its past and present contexts and deemphasizes corporate and generational responsibility for sin. Written in an era when *Persia and its Judean governors exercised control over Judah’s political and religious institutions, Chronicles theologically liberates the cult, reclaiming it as Israel’s own.

SEAN BURT

Church Fathers: Attitudes Toward Jews and Judaism. By the Middle Ages, mainstream churches throughout Europe and the Near East (“Catholic” and “Orthodox” Christians, respectively) understood their religion to be substantively different from *Judaism. When compiling the writings of authoritative early Church Fathers on whom they might rely for guidance, these medieval churches selected those authors who would bolster and reflect their sense of religious distinction.

Ineligible for this collection, therefore, were ancient Christian groups, now practically lost to history, who attempted to view Christianity and Judaism as continuous or even identical. These included the so-called Ebionites, who observed the *Torah and believed in Jesus as the *messiah; the readers of such texts as the Clementine Homilies, who rejected the anti-covenantal stance of the apostle Paul; or even urban Christians who found power and mystery in the rituals of the *High Holidays and *Passover well into the fourth century. It has even been argued that a great many so-called Christians and Jews throughout late antiquity viewed their practices and beliefs along a continuous spectrum, which was only broken apart by the polemical discourse of hard-line Christian bishops and Jewish Rabbis.

For later Christians, however, the “fathers of the faith” who became authoritative were those who made suitable distinctions between Christianity and Judaism. Such voices, which appear early on, include Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165 CE). Writing in the Greek-speaking East, he laid down some of the fundamental patterns of “orthodox” Christian anti-Judaism that prevailed throughout the late ancient period. Justin was one of the earliest sources to look to a common Scripture (the Jewish Tanakh/Christian Old Testament) as a dividing line between Christian truth and Jewish falsity. Thus, Justin insisted that *Isaiah 7:14 speaks of a virgin birth; he and his younger contemporary Melito of Sardis (d. ca. 180 CE) also vigorously argued against Jewish literal observance of the “Law.” Melito’s Easter homily On the Pascha not only insisted that the Christian Easter had forever fulfilled and abnegated the Jewish Passover (an approach known as supersessionism) but also introduced the insidious accusation of Jewish deicide.

Stereotypes hardened. In the Christian imagination, Jews continually replayed their gospel roles: In treatises adversus Iudaeos (against the Jews) they were represented as deniers of the faith who must be refuted, like the *Pharisees, or as shadowy crowds calling for the death of Christian martyrs in chilling echoes of the Passion. At the same time, early Christian apologists appropriated Judaism's antiquity and authenticity in defending the new religion against accusations of novelty and illegitimacy by pagan detractors. Even though it was rejected, Judaism remained fundamental to Christianity because of what both religions shared: common Scriptures, common ritual patterns, and common beliefs in the singularity of divinity and the inexorable path of history.

The public promotion of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire after Constantine the Great (d. 337) added urgency to the desire among Christian leaders to distinguish the new faith from the old, but a deep ambivalence surrounding Judaism remained. By the fourth century, the otherness of Judaism had become so internalized that Christians who held insufficiently orthodox positions on Christological doctrine could be tarred as "Judaizers." Some Christians did indeed "judaize," deliberately introducing Jewish practices into Christian life and ritual. Well into the fifth century, some Christians still regularly consulted their Jewish neighbors to determine the date for Easter in relation to the date for Passover (they were frequently condemned as quartodecimani or tessareskaidekatitai, "fourteeners" who calculated Easter around the fourteenth day of the Jewish month of *Nissan). John Chrysostom's venomous sermons "Against the Judaizers" (delivered in 386–87) attacked Christians who frequented *synagogues at festival times; his condemnations speak both to the horror that "orthodox" leaders felt at the otherness of Judaism and the allure that Jewish customs retained for Christians.

Ambivalence persisted. The hymnist and preacher Ephrem (d. 373), who wrote in Syriac on the Roman/Persian border, regularly lambasted Jews in his public hymns as blind and reprobate and having committed deicide; however, he had close contact with Jewish informants when composing his prose commentaries. The ascetic scriptural scholar Jerome (d. 420), who migrated from *Rome to Bethlehem in the 380s, consulted with Jews in producing his biblical commentaries and his new translation of the Jewish Scriptures from Hebrew to Latin, even as he castigated them and preached their eternal exile from Jerusalem. Perhaps no one encapsulated more acutely the ambivalent attitude of the Church Fathers toward Jews as reviled yet desired than Jerome when he wrote, "If it is expedient to hate any people and to detest any nation, I have a notable hatred for the circumcised [Jews]. . . . Yet, can anyone object to me for having had a Jew as a teacher?" (Jerome, Letter 84.3)

There seem to have been few incidents of outright conflict between Jews and Christians, although fantasies of persecuting Jews lasted throughout antiquity. Only one account from the early fifth century, left by Bishop Severus of Minorca, describes what may have been the forced conversion of a Jewish community. Nonetheless, as the world became more Christianized, the place of Jews and Judaism (desired yet feared, necessary yet abominated) grew increasingly incongruous. If Christianity had "triumphed," some asked, why were there still Jews in the Christian world?

The brilliant Christian thinker Augustine (d. 430), notable for his innovative theologies, attempted to address this incongruity. Augustine maintained that Jews must exist in a Christian world as witnesses to the truth of the Scriptures and the God of creation; in their subordinated state, increasingly marginalized by Christian governing powers, they also testified to the fate of a people once divinely chosen who had rejected God's final *redemption. Although this position may have been mainly theoretical in Augustine's own days, his "witness theology" later became standardized doctrine toward the Jews in the Catholic West. It led eventually to a dual policy, combining limitations and marginalization with preservation of Jewish life and property; this compromise position lasted well beyond the medieval period. In the Orthodox East, the militant Christian authority of the *Byzantine Empire seemed poised to move in less tolerant directions, as when Emperor Heraclius (d. 641) attempted a forced conversion of Jews. The rise of a new monotheistic power, however, altered interreligious relations in the East, and the views of the Church Fathers on Jews and Judaism were ultimately appropriated to shape Christian responses to Muslims and *Islam.

For further reading, see A. H. Becker and A. Y. Reed, eds., The Ways That Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages (2007); D. Boyarin, Border Lines: The Partition of Judaeo-Christianity (2004); P. Fredriksen, Augustine and the Jews: The Story of Christianity's Great Theologian and His Defense of Judaism (2008); and A. L. Williams, Adversus Iudaeos: A Bird's-Eye View of Christian "Apologiae" until the Renaissance (1935).

ANDREW S. JACOBS

Circumcision. Male circumcision is the first *commandment specific to Jews mentioned in the *Torah. In Genesis 17 *Abraham is commanded to circumcise himself and his older son *Ishmael and to circumcise *Isaac on the eighth day after birth. Berit milah (literally "covenant of circumcision") may be the most universally observed commandment. Although mandated to occur on the eighth day, circumcision can be postponed for health reasons. The biblical text sees it as a physical sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish people rather than as a hygienic measure. Circumcision is traditionally performed as a home ceremony, by a mohel, a pious, observant Jew educated in the relevant Jewish law and in surgical techniques. *Blessings are recited, including one over wine, and a drop of wine is placed in the infant's mouth. The child is then given a formal Hebrew name. A festive meal follows, with special prayers incorporated into the blessings after the meal. Male *converts to Judaism undergo circumcision as part of the conversion rite. If they have already been circumcised, a symbolic drop of blood is drawn by a mohel. Although women are permitted to perform circumcisions, only the Reform and Conservative movements in North America have sponsored training programs that prepare both mohalim and mohalot (see JUDAISM entries).

Despite the antiquity and centrality of berit milah in Jewish tradition, twenty-first-century Judaism is facing increasing challenges to this practice. These challenges include Jewish feminist demands to eliminate male circumcision on the grounds of gender equity, growing attacks from the larger culture that routine male circumcision is a form of mutilation, and ongoing debates over whether circumcision offers sufficient hygienic and health advantages to justify the practice.

Recent research includes S. J. D. Cohen, Why Aren't Jewish Women Circumcised? (2005); L. Glick, Marked in Your Flesh (2005); I. G. Marcus, The Jewish Life Cycle (2004); and E. Wyner Mark, ed., The Covenant of Circumcision (2003).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Cities of Refuge. Biblical law clearly distinguished between murder, which involves premeditation and predisposition, and other instances of the taking of human life, which would include manslaughter. However, as a practical matter, residents of ancient *Near Eastern societies, including biblical *Israel, were likely to take direct, immediate action to avenge the loss of kinfolk. Biblical law thus established six cities of refuge (from among the forty-eight assigned to the Levites), to which individuals could flee and find protection until it was determined whether theirs was a capital offense. If it was, they were handed over to the deceased's avenger. If not, they were to stay in the city of refuge until the death of the high *priest, whose blood, as it were, atoned for the admittedly accidental shedding of blood by the one who committed involuntary homicide.

The relevant legislation is found in *Numbers 35, *Deuteronomy 19, and *Joshua 20 (see also 1 Chron 6). Only the Joshua section lists the cities by name: Three are west of the Jordan River (in the "Promised Land"), and three are east of the Jordan (where two and a half of the tribes had settled). There are points of disagreement, as well as broad agreement, among these biblical passages. Modern scholars dispute the origins and precise means of implementing the laws.

LEONARD GREENSPOON

Civil Rights Movement: See UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Cochin Jews. This community from Kerala, in southern *India, one of the smallest Jewish ethnic groups in the world, is divided into two caste-like subgroups. The "White" (Paradesi) Jews are the descendants of European and other Jews, who arrived on the Malabar coast from the sixteenth century on. The "Black" (Malabar) Jews may have arrived with King *Solomon's merchants. Local southern Indian Christian legends mention Jews in the first century CE. Documentary evidence of Jewish settlement on the southern Indian coast can be found in copperplates in ancient Tamil script, in which seventy-two privileges were bestowed on the Cochin Jewish leader Joseph Rabban and his descendants. Ezekiel Rahabi (1694–1771), a Paradesi, acted as the principal merchant for the Dutch East India Company.

The Jews lived in several congregations, including Ernakulam, Mala, Parur, Chennemangalam, and Cochin. There was no intermarriage between Paradesi and Malabari Jews. The community never experienced any *antisemitism from their Indian neighbors. The religious observances of the Cochin Jews conform in every way to other Jewish communities, although they incorporated some unique "Indian-style" customs. From the eighteenth century on, emissaries from the Holy Land began to visit Cochin. Urged on by *Zionist fervor, 2,400 Cochin Jews immigrated to *Israel in 1954, where they settled in moshavim (agricultural settlements). Today, 8,000 Cochin Jews live in Israel; less than 50 remain in Kerala.

Important studies of this community include N. Katz and E. S. Goldberg, The Last Jews of Cochin: Jewish Identity in Hindu India (1993); S. H. Hallegua, "The Marriage Customs of the Jewish Community of Cochin," and G. Hacco, "The Ritual Cycle of Cochin Jewish Holidays: A Malabari Perspective," both in India's Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle, 2nd edition, ed. S. Weil (2004), 60–67, 68–77. SHALVA WEIL

Codes: See HALAKHAH; JACOB BEN ASHER; KARO, JOSEPH; MAIMONIDES

Cohen, Hermann (1842–1918), a Jewish thinker, was born in Coswig in the German principality of Anhalt. Cohen, who remains among the most creative and influential modern Jewish philosophers of religion, was educated by some of the greatest philological, historical, and philosophical scholars of mid-nineteenth-century *Germany. He attended the newly founded Jewish Theological Seminary in Breslau and later studied in *Berlin. Among his teachers were Heinrich *Graetz, Jacob Bernays, Zacharias *Frankel, August Boeckh, and Adolf Trendelenburg. His Berlin mentor H. Steinthal (1823–1899) combined a commitment to the philological ideal of the "recognition of what had once been known" with dedication to a linguistic and psychological penetration of Jewish textual and liturgical traditions. Steinthal and Cohen also shared intimate memories of the devotional practices of the small but sophisticated Jewish community of Anhalt, where Cohen's father was a *cantor and melamed (teacher).

After a number of studies in which he applied the innovative psycho-linguistic method of Steinthal and Moritz Lazarus to the origins of Greek philosophical and mythological ideas, Cohen turned his attention to Kant. In 1871, he published the first of three studies on the interpretation of Kant's philosophy (Kants Theorie der Erfahrung [2nd ed., 1885], Kants Begründung der Ethik [1877], and Kants Begründung der Ästhetik [1889]). These works brought him to the attention of the Marburg philosopher and socialist pedagogue Friedrich Albert Lange, who brought him to teach in Marburg. Cohen succeeded to the chair in philosophy after Lange's death in 1876. Although Cohen established an international reputation as a founder of the distinctive Marburg school of neo-Kantianism, he never received a call to another university and was subjected to other indignities that increased as *antisemitism among academics increased. In 1903, Cohen became curator of the Berlin Lehranstalt für die Wissenschaft des Judentums and taught there intermittently on Bible and the philosophy of religion. In 1912, after his retirement from Marburg, Cohen moved to Berlin, continuing to teach at the Lehranstalt on a regular basis. As a public speaker Cohen represented the anti-*Zionist agenda of the major German Jewish cultural and political associations such as the Central-Verein and Bnai Briss.

Among Cohen's most significant philosophical publications are Logik der reinen Erkenntnis (1902), Ethik des reinen Willens (1904), and Ästhetik des reinen Gefühls (1912). Notable works on philosophy of religion include Der Begriff der Religion im System der Philosophie (1915) and Die Religion der Vernunft aus den Quellen des Judentums (1919). Only the latter has been translated into English: Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism, transl. by S. Kaplan, with an introduction by Leo *Strauss, (1972). For Cohen's complete works, see Werke, published by the Hermann-Cohen-Archiv am Philosophischen Seminar der Universität Zürich, ed. H. Holzhey (1977ff).

A full appreciation of Hermann Cohen as a Jewish thinker has been hampered by the fact that posthumous publications of many of his writings, including the three volumes of Jewish writings (Jüdische Schriften, 1924), two volumes of essays on philosophical and political topics (Schriften zur Philosophie und Zeitgeschichte, 1928), and a 1935 edition of letters, appeared in a climate of extreme hostility toward the Jews. At that time, it seemed advisable to emphasize Cohen's German patriotism; this one-sided image led many students of Jewish thought to dismiss Cohen as naïvely assimilationist and needlessly anti-Zionist.

Until recently, scholars have asked if Cohen's philosophy of religion constituted a departure from his systematic philosophy or whether he continued to be committed to the method of critical idealism. Franz Rosenzweig stated that, although Cohen believed he had maintained his system, he objectively broke through the "veil of idealism," driven by his living connection with the Jewish faith. Alexander Altmann countered that the concept of correlation prominent in Religion of Reason tied the doctrine of God, as developed in the course of the history of Jewish religious thought, to the doctrine of humankind and that Cohen succeeded in maintaining the Kantian connection between ethics and religion. Steven Schwarzschild went further, stating that Cohen's entire philosophy of religion was already contained in his systematic ethics. However, Cohen himself expressly conceded that not all problems of ethics can be worked out within the parameters of the law and that religion was necessary to accomplish the transformation of the self that is postulated, but not delivered, in the context of ethics. More recently, scholars such as Robert Gibbs (Correlations in Rosenzweig and Levinas [1992]) and Reinier Munk ("Alterity in Hermann Cohen's Critical Idealism," Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy 9 [1999]: 251–65) have drawn attention to the fact that Cohen was the first modern Jewish thinker to shift from a Cartesian type of self-constitution to an ethics of alterity when he grounded ethical self-consciousness in the principles of contractual law. Another recent debate concerns Cohen's aesthetic theory of liturgical performance. As Steven Kepnes points out, "Cohen places liturgy at the crucial bridge points between the self and the community, the self and God, and the self and its growth to moral autonomy" and thus generates what Kepnes calls a "liturgical self" (Jewish Liturgical Reasoning [2007], 45).

Recent comprehensive studies on Cohen in English are A. Poma, The Critical Philosophy of Hermann Cohen, trans. J. Denton (1997); and M. Zank, The Idea of Atonement in the Philosophy of Hermann Cohen (2000).

MICHAEL ZANK

Columbus, Christopher (d. May 20, 1506) was an explorer who was thought by some to be of Jewish origin. Columbus began his 1492 voyage three days after the final expulsion of Jews from Spain. On board his ship was a Jewish-born interpreter, Luis de Torres, who underwent baptism just before sailing. Columbus's writings mention Jews, and several sixteenth-century Jewish sources refer to his discoveries. Columbus's reputation grew in the nineteenth century, particularly in America, where he came to be seen as a symbol of national ideals. On the occasion of the 400th anniversary of his landing in the Americas (October 12, 1892), Jews highlighted their ties to the event. Two years later, the Hungarian scholar Meyer (Moritz) Kayserling published a book detailing Jewish participation in the voyages of Columbus and other New World explorers, hoping that this would counter antisemitism. Subsequent research led some twentieth-century scholars to claim that Columbus himself was a secret Jew. The evidence, however, was weak, and current biographers scoff at such claims. Recent research includes F. Fernández-Armesto, Columbus (1991) and J. D. Sarna, "The Mythical Jewish Columbus and the History of America's Jews," Studies in Jewish Civilization 5 (1996): 81–95.

JONATHAN D. SARNA

Comedy and Comedians. In the contemporary era comedy and Jews have become inextricably intertwined, and some have suggested that "even the word Jewish has become laden with humorous overtones" (Altman). Although the term "comedy" is derived from the Greek word komedía and referred in antiquity to a specific theatrical form, and humor and comedy are universal to humanity, in the modern world and particularly in the United States, Jewish writers, performers, and artists have played a pre-eminent role in shaping the comedy of the majority culture, far out of proportion to their small number in the population.

Jewish comedy emerges from a series of tensions: the dichotomy between self-deprecation and social criticism, distinctions between Jews and Gentiles, and conflict between the sacred and profane. Most observers of Jewish comedy agree that Jewish comedy is grounded in anxiety, but grasping the essence of Jewish comedy is more difficult. There is a long history of discussion about whether Jewish comedy is simply comedy written and performed by those who happen to be Jewish or if the Jewishness of Jewish comedy is determined by particularly "Jewish" content. Similarly, analysts debate whether the Jewishness of Jewish comedy stems from the methodology behind the humor and the manner of delivery of a joke or if the unique elements of Jewish comedy are a combination of all of the elements already mentioned.

In general, Jewish comedy may be defined as comedy that is generated and performed by Jews on Jewish subject matter and is strained through a bifurcated worldview; whereas Jewish comedy usually revolves around self-parody, it often involves a critique of the host or majority culture as well. In this regard, Jewish comedy can appeal to a culturally broad audience and is not directed solely toward a Jewish audience. Beyond these generalities, arguments persist over the definition of Jewish comedy. Among the most basic questions are who and what to include under the rubric of Jewish comedy.

Over the past century, Jewish comedy has been extremely diverse, located both in "high" and "low" cultural forms and encompassing both physical comedy and more cerebral forms of humor. Expressed through literature and graphic novels, Jewish comedy has also been featured in every modern entertainment medium, including vaudeville, theater, Broadway musicals, comic books, cartooning, animated film, radio, television, film, the internet, and even museum exhibitions.

In the realm of performance alone, Jewish comedians and Jewish comedy can be further divided among several subcategories, including “sketch” comedy, the culturally Jewish-specific “Borscht Belt” mode of comedy, as well as the culturally neutral forms of “stand-up” comedy and “roasting.” A short listing of the luminaries of American Jewish comics and comedians includes performers who began their careers on the stage and vaudeville and later crossed over to film and television, such as George Burns (1896–1996), Jack Benny (1894–1974), the Marx Brothers, and the Three Stooges, as well as mid-twentieth-century television comedy pioneers such as Milton Berle (1908–2002), Sid Caesar (b. 1922), and Carl Reiner (b. 1922). From vaudeville to the small screen, all of these comedians embedded particularly Jewish material in their work while also setting the standards for American comedy as a whole. Stand-up comedians such as Henny Youngman (1906–1998) and Shelley Berman (b. 1925), Borscht belters such as Buddy Hackett (1924–2003) and Jackie Mason (b. 1936), and insult comics like Don Rickles (b. 1926) have also performed explicitly Jewish comedy while becoming part and parcel of the broader American culture. Finally, writer/performers such as Mel Brooks (b. 1926) and Woody Allen (b. 1935) through late-twentieth/early-twenty-first-century writer/performers such as Garry Shandling (b. 1949), Jon Stewart (b. 1962), and Larry David (b. 1947) continue exploring and relating Jewish themes while also playing a decisive role in shaping American comedy in its totality. Modern Jewish comedy has also been an equal opportunity employer, with Jewish women – from Fanny Brice (1891–1951), Totie Fields (1930–1978), Belle Barth (1911–1971), and Sophie Tucker (1884–1966) to Joan Rivers (b. 1933), Gilda Radner (1946–1989), and Madeline Kahn (1942–1999) in the late twentieth century to Sarah Silverman (b. 1970) and Susie Essman (b. 1955) in the new millennium – playing a coequal role in the world of Jewish comedy in quality if not always in quantity.

In the literary world, Philip Roth (b. 1933) is widely regarded as among the greatest of American writers, but his writing maintains an identifiably Jewish sense of humor; other American literary figures whose writing transcends ethnic boundaries but still maintains a specifically Jewish comedic outlook include Bernard Malamud (1914–1986), Joseph Heller (1923–1999), Bruce Jay Friedman (b. 1930), Cynthia Ozick (b. 1928), and most recently Michael Chabon (b. 1963) (see LITERATURE: UNITED STATES). American Jewish comedy in written form has also been expressed via more popular vehicles such as Mad magazine, most especially in the work of Harvey Kurtzman, Will Elder, and Albert Feldstein, among many other contributors. Although Mad is most certainly not a Jewish journal, its influence on postwar American humor and popular culture cannot be denied. Even so debate continues over the sources and history of Jewish comedy.

A standard perspective has been that Jewish comedy is a modern phenomenon largely traceable to *Eastern European Jewry of the nineteenth century in particular and to modernizing Jewish communities in general. Eastern European Jewish humor was preserved and transmitted orally in *Yiddish through Jewish folk traditions, including the insult form. Writer Sholem Aleichem captured some of this sensibility in his short stories and novels (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH: 1800 to TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY). Still others argue that Jewish humor can be traced back to biblical and rabbinic literatures; many scholars believe that the incident of *Balaam and his talking ass (Num 22) and parts of the book of *Jonah, among other biblical passages, were intended to be humorous. There is, however, wide agreement that modern Jewish forms of comedy such as the “sketch” format stem from the traditional Jewish ritual of the purimshpiln or *Purim show that played a role in the development of Yiddish theater (see THEATER, YIDDISH). The shpil, like its modern descendants, is an exercise in bifurcation, often satirizing the Jewish community while at the same time functioning as a nonviolent assault against antisemites as embodied through the biblical figure of Haman. Indeed, the shpil often targeted traditional sources of Jewish authority such as rabbis, venerated institutions such as the Jewish family, and Judaism in and of itself, just as targets of modern Jewish comedy include contemporary sources of authority, both individual and institutional, as well as general notions of civility. Likewise, stand-up comedy has often been linked to the badkhan and other such performers associated with Jewish weddings (see ENTERTAINMENT; MARRIAGE).

Most would agree that modern Jewish comedy generally expresses Jewish “otherness”; it reflects the marginality of Jews who are neither grounded in traditional Jewish society nor fully integrated into the majority culture. Taken a step further, Jewish comedy serves as a means for satirizing and critiquing the majority culture’s relationship to the Jewish minority. In this sense, Jewish comedy is analogous to the comic forms of other minority cultures, most especially *African American comedy, which often melds “uplifting race pride” with “self-mockery” (Watkins). In fact, an additional topic of debate has been whether Jewish comedy is simply a manifestation of self-hatred. Because comedy in general and Jewish comedy in particular are about “making a scene,” at times comedians cause embarrassment by exposing the “dirty laundry” of Jews. Such comedy is necessarily discomfiting, and the lines separating self-hatred and self-criticism can blur. Nevertheless, self-deprecation is at its heart self-criticism, which itself is a Jewish tradition preached explicitly by the Hebrew *prophets and other sages throughout Jewish history. Woody Allen, Mel Brooks, and Philip Roth are among the most notable Jewish comedians accused of self-hatred. Yet Jewish comedic expressions of self-criticism are generally interlaced with a critique of the majority culture and general standards of civility. Typically divorced from the traditional Jewish community and not fully part of the majority culture, purveyors of modern Jewish comedy offer a unique perspective on Jews and Gentiles alike and often act as social critics. This satiric role of the Jewish comedian stretches from the Marx Brothers to Lenny Bruce (1925–1966) and continues through the work of comics such as Sacha Baron Cohen (b. 1971). Thus, even while Jewish comedy skewers Jewish tradition, it is still part of Jewish tradition. And although Jewish comedy assaults the majority culture from the periphery of mainstream society, Jewish comedy has also become an essential piece and widely recognized slice of popular, North American culture.

For further reading, see S. Altman, The Comic Image of the Jew (1971); L. J. Epstein The Haunted Smile (2001); N. L. Kneebly, ed., Too Jewish: Challenging Traditional

Identities (1996); W. Novak and M. Waldoks, The Big Book of Jewish Humor (1985); H. D. Spalding, Encyclopedia of Jewish Humor (1969; rep. 2001); J. Telushkin, Jewish Humor (1992); and M. Watkins, African American Humor (2002); and see CELEBRITIES; ENTERTAINMENT. DANIEL M. BRONSTEIN

Commandment, Commandments: See MITZVAH, MITZVOT; TEN COMMANDMENTS

Commerce: Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Commerce, the buying and selling of goods for profit, is usually seen with *money lending as the central occupation of Jews in medieval and early modern Europe. Although there is much truth in this view, there is also a good measure of exaggeration; moreover, the connection of Jews and Judaism with commercial activities in both learned opinion and the popular imagination has had a troubling history. In fact, it is impossible to quantify the Jewish share in the commerce or economy of the pre-modern era. In all periods and regions, sizable parts of the Jewish population made their living as craftsmen and craftswomen and as providers of menial and skilled services to the well-to-do and to community institutions. These individuals were in the lower classes of Jewish society, estimated in some places to have made up as much as one third of the total population. Many people practiced several occupations side by side; most conspicuous, however, are commerce and credit.

Jews were involved in commerce throughout the medieval era. However, the significance of commercial activities as the most important form of livelihood was especially pronounced during the early Middle Ages and again in the Early Modern period. Between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries, money lending eclipsed commerce. Like money lending, commerce was not necessarily practiced by the greatest number of Jews, but its profits, as those of money lending, placed Jewish communities as a whole in the higher income brackets. This facilitated the comfortable standard of living characteristic of medieval European Jewry and enabled Jews to purchase from rulers the wide-ranging judicial and legal independence characteristic of Jewish status. However, because their livelihoods were so dependent on exchanges with the majority society, Jews were especially vulnerable to economic, political, and religious crises.

Until recently, Jews have been portrayed as long-distance traders who connected Christian Europe with the Middle East and Muslim *Spain. In late antiquity they did so alongside other Middle Eastern merchants, but from the eighth to the eleventh century, they were believed to have been on their own. According to this picture of early medieval trade, Jews were uniquely equipped to engage in long-distance trade by talmudic law, *communal organization, and family ties, as well as by the Diaspora experience and their special relationships with rulers. Many scholars have suggested that Jews possessed a veritable monopoly over commerce, particularly in the slave trade, because they were seen as the only ones capable, by virtue of their religious neutrality, to travel between the two monolithic blocs of Christianity and Islam. Such views, which reflected nineteenth- and twentieth-century polemics and apologetics, are now discarded. They assumed a system and purpose where none existed and disregarded the rich sources on non-Jewish merchants, conferring on the very few documented Jewish merchants a weight and influence incommensurate with their slight population numbers and very limited spatial distribution across Europe. Wide-ranging conclusions had been drawn from an exceedingly thin documentary basis in Latin. Taking Hebrew documents into account has resulted in a more convincing, if less glamorous, interpretation.

In the Hebrew record from *Ashkenaz, from the second half of the tenth century onward, commerce is the evident mainstay of Jewish livelihood in central and northern *France, as well as in western *Germany. This was succinctly stated by *Gershom ben Judah, "Light of the Exile" of Mainz, the foremost religious authority of his time (ca. 960–1028), who wrote, "Because their (the Jews') livelihood depends on their commerce/merchandise." Merchants moved often, but mostly along local circuits and well-known itineraries between inland markets. At times Jews traveled abroad, to and from *Hungary, *Poland, and possibly also *Russia. Even without intercontinental ventures, these merchants were hardy travelers; to be on the move was their normal condition, as one of them explained in a legal argument, "I wished to take to the road, like all other men." In their inventories, one finds very little of the glittering treasures of intercontinental commerce and nothing at all of the slave trade. A blend of staple goods and more costly merchandise – salt, wine, dyes, medicine, salted fish, cattle, hides and pelts, ready-made garments and textiles, including silk, gilded and copper vessels, and some precious metals – was bought, transported, and sold. The customers were bishops and priests, and in one case the treasurer of a bishop; affluent ladies, including a queen of Hungary (the only royalty mentioned in the sources); and magnates and counts: in short, the upper classes. In *Italy, the few Jewish merchants on the record definitely did not participate in the thriving overseas trade of their cities of domicile; they seem to have been engaged mostly in local ventures. The most important mercantile centers, such as *Venice and Genoa, did not allow Jewish residence at all, whereas the handful of Jews admitted to the bustling port of Amalfi were all textile artisans. In southern Europe, as in the north, Jewish trade appears more as an ordinary local and regional matter than as an intricate and far-flung system linking continents.

In this period, the rich sources of the Cairo *Genizah do reveal that a small but lively set of Jewish merchants from Muslim *Spain were actively involved in Middle Eastern trade. These Arabic-speaking traders were part of a network that was centered in Tunisia and *Egypt and also took in Muslim Spain and *Sicily. However, it did not connect and work in tandem with Jewish merchants from Christian lands in northern Europe or in Italy.

By the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, trade by Jews appears to have declined in northern Europe in favor of an ever increasing engagement in credit operations. In these regions, there is no evidence that Jews were barred from trade by the rising power of Christian merchant guilds, as has been assumed for a long time. Rather, they were pushed out of trade by a set of new circumstances that combined strong demographic growth, rapid urbanization, and the broad expansion of market ties. Under these booming economic conditions, the task of entrepreneur and merchant underwent a marked change, shifting from provisioning the aristocracy with exotic merchandise to organizing the production and handling of mass consumer goods. The servicing of such huge and growing systems – in size, complexity, and capital outlays far in excess of the earlier model – was beyond the resources of a numerically still tiny Ashkenazic Jewry.

The rising tide of religious enmity also played a role in making the traveling Jewish merchant into an endangered species. Conversely, the same set of circumstances made the sedentary handling and lending of money increasingly attractive and inevitable. In the south of Europe, Jewish trade activities, including maritime ventures, appear to have continued in some parts, at least initially. By the thirteenth century, however, Jews in eastern Spain were clearly blocked from participating in the expansion of Catalan overseas trade. In some islands of the Mediterranean, the Italian masters allowed an exception to their policy of exclusion back at home and employed native Jews as local agents.

By the later Middle Ages, the clientele of Jewish merchants and money lenders was no longer confined to the well-to-do and powerful. As Jews increasingly became professional pawnbrokers, a petty trade in forfeited pawned goods, mostly household objects and used garments, developed all over Europe. In the regions where Jews lived in the sixteenth century, mainly Italy, Germany, and increasingly *Eastern Europe, the medieval pattern of urban settlement changed into a much more dispersed pattern of habitation. In addition to Jewish communities in some large towns, such as Rome, Venice, or *Frankfurt, they were also found in a host of small towns and villages. As has been shown for Frankfurt and its surroundings, the Jews of the city supplied rural Jews carrying out petty itinerant trade with an increasing range of cheap goods of daily consumption – garments, metal vessels, and other household goods. In return, the rural Jews would supply their co-religionists of the urban center with foodstuffs, both for home consumption and for the market.

One outgrowth of these new demographic and economic structures were the Jewish cattle and horse dealers characteristic of the Early Modern period and, in some areas of Germany, even of the nineteenth century. Such regional networks formed the organizational basis for the commercial ventures of a new upper class of merchant Jews, some of whom also served as *Court Jews at the numerous capitals of early modern German principalities and Polish noble estates. They supplied rulers and courts with luxury goods and jewelry. During the frequent wars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, they also provisioned armies with the essentials of grains, wine, horses, and horse fodder. After the expulsion from the Iberian Peninsula (1492–97), one larger part of the *Sephardic Diaspora found refuge in the *Ottoman Empire; some of these exiles worked in crafts, whereas others became an important part of the local merchant classes. Sephardic Jews who settled in the Netherlands, and later in *Britain and northern parts of Germany were wholly engaged in international commercial and financial ventures. Some went on to found small but important merchant settlements in the overseas colonies of European powers in the Americas. In stages, the commerce of Jews grew to be part of a modern world economy. On the way, it became even less of a “Jewish commerce” than it had ever been.

For further reading, see J. I. Israel, Diasporas within a Diaspora: Jews, Crypto-Jews and the World Maritime Empires, 1540–1740 (2002); M. Toch, “The Jews in Europe, 500–1050,” in The New Cambridge Medieval History of Europe, ed. P. Fouracre (2005) 1: 547–570; idem, The Economic History of Medieval European Jews. Vol. I: The Early Middle Ages (forthcoming).

MICHAEL TOCH

Commerce: Modern Europe (1700–1900). The expulsions of Jews from *Spain and *Portugal in the 1490s established *Sephardi and *converso communities throughout the Mediterranean and Atlantic worlds. At a time of growing competition among northern Italian city-states for access to Levantine and Asian goods, these new Jewish communities were able to barter their services both as overland and seaborne traders.

In *Ashkenaz, however, the preceding century and a half of local *expulsions had effectively depleted the financial resources of *Central European Jews. The core of Jewish *money lending was now limited to pawn brokerage and related petty credit services, increasingly conducted in the countryside and as a sideline to the peddling, old clothes business, and livestock trading that would be characteristic of the so-called Landjuden well into the nineteenth century. This development helped create the conditions for the rise of Central European *Court Jews in the aftermath of the Thirty Years War. Court Jews combined financial services to the crown with the cheap provisioning of military supplies, including clothing and victuals, endeavors that drew directly on their links to rural Jewish traders. The interlocking relationship of court and country helped revitalize the German Jewish economy and expand Jewish settlement rights.

A quite different situation prevailed further east. In late-seventeenth-century *Poland, after the devastation caused by the *Chmelnitzki uprising and foreign invasions, Jewish economic ties with the nobility actually strengthened. Throughout the Early Modern era, Jews served as lessees of noble monopolies, particularly of grain and alcohol. This was “commerce” of a peculiar sort, far more rigorously managed and monopolistic than most of the activities of Jews in the Mediterranean and Central Europe. However, more conventional Polish Jewish merchants did play an important role in the river trade, shipping grains, timber, furs, and other raw materials to *Baltic ports such as Danzig throughout the eighteenth century. Although these Jews did not comprise the most powerful merchant stratum in the Baltic trade, they were significant at the secondary levels. Jews were also amply represented in the overland trade between Eastern and Central Europe, especially through fairs such as Leipzig and Breslau.

Although Jews in all of these areas did not constitute a single, integrated commercial network, the parallel activities of Jewish merchants in the *Balkans, Mediterranean, Atlantic-colonial, Baltic river, and east–west overland trade contributed to the growing impression in early modern Europe that Jews represented a commercial people par excellence. Jews themselves helped promote this image, since their reputation as economic assets helped them secure and expand settlement rights. In spite of these efforts, however, developments in the second half of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries contributed to a counter-image of the Jew as economically extraneous and in need of occupational reform.

This negative image not only drew on traditional *antisemitism but also reflected a downturn in Jews' economic fortunes for a variety of reasons. First, the fortunes of Court Jews declined in the face of an increasing rationalization of state finances and bureaucracy. Second, by the middle of the eighteenth century, centers of Atlantic trade, such as *Amsterdam and Hamburg, both with significant Jewish merchant populations, were eclipsed by London, which contained only a small Jewish commercial elite, thus limiting opportunities for expanded colonial trade. Third, late mercantilist policies favoring home production over imports hit Jews hard. Lastly, Jewish population expansion in *Eastern Europe, which peaked in the late nineteenth century, was already in evidence by the late eighteenth; at the same time, economic opportunities in these lands were extremely limited. Throughout Europe, Jewish communities could not cope with the increased obligations of poor relief. The phenomenon of itinerancy, evident for centuries, became more visible and urgent.

With the onset of modernity, poverty became a core feature of the so-called Jewish Problem, as well as an object of state policy and a matter of serious concern for Jewish reformers. Jews' overrepresentation in petty commerce and the perceived deficit among Jews of so-called productive laborers were frequently identified as sources of these social ills. At the same time, cultural and ideological changes during the eighteenth century reinforced hostility to Jewish commerce. The Enlightenment favored meritocratic over corporate values; insofar as Jews resembled a commercial estate they became associated with the backwardness of the ancien régime. Similarly, *emancipation along the *French Revolutionary model established a tacit (and sometimes overt) expectation that Jewish incorporation into the body politic would be met with Jews' proportionate integration into the general occupational structure. Their evident failure to shift out of commerce in large numbers thus became a rationale for many of the economic tensions that intermittently erupted throughout the nineteenth century.

Nineteenth-century industrialization accelerated the breakdown of a Jewish economy that for centuries had been weighted toward rural commerce. This was a far more gradual process than has often been assumed and one that was partly offset by Central European Jewish immigration to the Americas during the first half of the nineteenth century. Yet the overall effect was to exacerbate the economic dislocation already apparent, especially in Eastern Europe. Industrialization eroded long-standing Jewish niches in transport, tavern keeping, artisan crafts, and estate management, although some new fields did open up for Jews in the upper echelons of manufacturing and in some crafts.

Yet, even when industrialization was well under way by the end of the nineteenth century, and despite the profound transformation it brought to European economies, Jews still remained heavily overrepresented in commerce. This was a cause of initial hardship but ultimately proved to be an advantage. Although Jews were impoverished and temporarily enmeshed in working-class environments, their long commercial apprenticeship fueled the upward mobility they eventually achieved in many locales during the twentieth century.

For further reading, see J. Israel, European Jewry in the Age of Mercantilism, 1550–1750 (1991); A. Kahan, Essays in Jewish Social and Economic History (1986); J. Karp, The Politics of Jewish Commerce: Economic Thought and Emancipation in Europe, 1638–1848 (2008); and idem, "Economic History and Jewish Modernity – Ideological versus Structural Change," Simon Dubnow Yearbook 6 (2007), 249–68; see also UNITED STATES: ECONOMIC LIFE. JONATHAN KARP

Communal Organization: Medieval and Early Modern Eras.

Medieval and early modern Jews lived in various locations, but the structures of their community organizations were strikingly similar. As a minority group dominated by other religions, mainly Christianity and Islam, Jews retained cultural autonomy through an effective community organization (kehillah, pl. kehillot). The major kehillot throughout the Jewish *Diaspora were organized as autonomous units with extensive discretionary powers. The kehillah dictated many aspects of Jewish communal life by establishing religious institutions and by facilitating communication with the surrounding non-Jewish world. It solidified social relations and was instrumental in confronting the constant threat of *conversion.

Members of the kehillah established and maintained different religious institutions such as a synagogue, a school, a ritual bath (mikveh), a slaughterhouse, and other institutions essential for conducting Jewish life in accordance with halakhah*. The range of religious functions that each community provided depended on the size of the kehillah, available resources, and external conditions. Whereas small kehillot, numbering at times only a few Jewish families, provided the most basic religious facilities, large kehillot often operated several synagogues, a yeshivah*, a beit din* (*court), and a *cemetery.

The synagogue was the central religious institution of the kehillah. Jews gathered there daily for communal worship, and the synagogue also functioned as an assembly house for community discussions, announcements, and debates. In northern Europe, any member of the community could interrupt public prayer if she or he felt wronged by another community member; prayer was not resumed until the matter was settled (ikuv tefillah). When members of the kehillah decided that someone had violated the norms of the community, the sacral act of excommunication (herem*) took place in the synagogue.

The kehillah regularly collected money from community members to cover ordinary costs such as maintenance of religious institutions or payment of functionaries. It also disbursed special charitable funds to assist the needy with food and shelter, redeem prisoners, and provide dowries for poor *brides. Through mutual aid the kehillah cemented communal responsibility and reinforced Jewish values of *philanthropy and good deeds.

The kehillah also facilitated and governed interactions between Jews and non-Jews. Appointed Jewish representatives negotiated with non-Jewish authorities in all matters concerning community life, including permission to settle in a place, the construction of community buildings, and the protection of Jews. Non-Jewish authorities demanded that a representative body govern the life of Jews, and community leaders were recognized as that representative body. Jewish delegates also ensured the exact and timely payment of taxes owed to local non-Jewish authorities.

The leaders of the kehillah, who were often called parnasim, were ordinarily elected by the members of the community. The number of elected officials, the election process, the involvement of non-Jewish authorities in their appointment, and the social status of the officials varied from place to place. Depending on the size of the community, the number of parnasim varied from one to more than ten. Attempts to undermine the authority of community leaders were more common in *Spain than in northern Europe, which has led some scholars to assume that the election process in northern Europe gained broader approval and was thus more “democratic.” In reality, the parnasim in most places normally came from affluent and influential families. In addition to the leaders of the community, other functionaries involved in governing the life of the kehillah included treasurers (gizbarim), the warden of the synagogue (gabai), messengers (shelikhim), and rabbinic leaders.

Rabbis played an important role in the kehillot by ensuring that Jews strictly followed the demands of halakhah* and by finding creative solutions to numerous problems that resulted from evolving needs. In fact, one area that involved particular creativity, especially in northern Europe, was the conceptualization of the legal authority of the kehillah over its members. Some authorities attributed it to the right of the people of the town (benei ha-ir [T. Bava Metzi'ah 11:23]) to execute community decisions; others grounded it in the right of the court to confiscate property (hefker beit din hefker [T. Shekalim 1:3]). Like parnasim, rabbis were often challenged, and their appointments were based not only on erudition but also on community power struggles within the kehillot.

Members of the kehillah were technically those who were born in the place or, under certain circumstances, those who had relocated there permanently. In some localities only those who registered officially as permanent residents of the town and regularly paid taxes were permitted to remain. According to Jewish law, permanent members of the kehillah were given priority in liturgical matters such as the right to lead the community in prayer during the mourning period. Only adult males who were permanent residents could participate in the election of functionaries for the community. Sometimes economic interests restricted the possibility of becoming a member. For instance, to reduce economic competition among Jews, northern European communities limited the right of other Jews to settle permanently in certain areas (herem ha-yishuv*).

Members of the kehillah supervised the normative behavior of Jews, arbitrated between rival parties, and levied and collected taxes. When certain individuals violated community norms or transgressed religious rules, the kehillah confronted such deviations by punishing the perpetrators. Depending on the severity of the offense, punishments ranged from fines to various corporal punishments. Excommunication was another common sanction. The excommunicant could not participate in the religious and social activities of the community until he or she repented. In extreme and rare cases a malefactor was handed over to the non-Jewish authorities. Through such sanctions the kehillot were able to establish and maintain their authority.

Despite the relative autonomy of kehillot in governing Jewish life, Jewish communities were largely interdependent. For example, representatives from large kehillot convened councils and rabbinic synods that, through binding ordinances (takkanot), addressed issues common to several communities. Additionally, the authority of some rabbinic figures contributed to the dominance of certain kehillot as centers of spiritual and halakhic instruction for Jews living in different locations.

By the middle of the eighteenth century the traditional autonomous kehillah began to decline and disintegrate, especially in Western Europe. The undermining of medieval social control, increasing mobility, and the gradual breakdown of social and legal boundaries between Jews and non-Jews undercut the traditional roles of the kehillah and paved the way for the appearance of new forms of community organization in modern times.

For further reading, see S. W. Baron, The Jewish Community: Its History and Structure to the American Revolution (1942); L. Finkelstein, Jewish Self-Government in the Middle Ages (1964); J. Katz, Tradition and Crisis: Jewish Society at the End of the Middle Ages (1961); and K. R. Stow, Alienated Minority: The Jews of Medieval Latin Europe (1994), 157–95.

YECHIEL Y. SCHUR

Communism: *Eastern Europe. Communism was one of a variety of revolutionary options available to East European Jews who rejected traditional Jewish life in favor of modern politics; these options included Herzlian *Zionism, Labor Zionism, Revisionist Zionism, and *Bundism. Although Jews who became communists never comprised more than a small minority of the Jewish population in any given country, Jews were overrepresented in East European communist movements and strikingly overrepresented among the leadership of these movements. On the non-Jewish political right, an antisemitic stereotype identified Jews with communism. The Polish term żydokomuna, roughly “Judeo-*Bolshevism,” referred to a Jewish communist or, more broadly, to a Jewish Bolshevik conspiracy. Although non-Jews generally perceived communists of Jewish origin as Jews, these individuals saw themselves as internationalists who vehemently rejected any association with their Jewish backgrounds. Many changed their names; for instance, Polonizing or Magyarizing them. “A Jew who becomes a communist ceases to be a Jew,” the saying went.

Rosa Luxemburg (1871–1919) famously said, “I have no special corner in my heart for the ghetto.” Luxemburg and Adolf Warski (1868–1937), both Polish Jews, were leaders of the Social Democratic Party of *Poland and *Lithuania; Max Horwitz-Walecki (1877–1938) and Alfred Lampe (1900–1943) were important figures in the interwar Communist Party of *Poland; Béla Kun (1886–1937) was the founder of the Hungarian Communist Party and leader of the short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic (see HUNGARY); Georg Lukács (1885–1971) was among the most important Marxist philosophers of the twentieth century.

During the interwar years, communist parties were illegal everywhere in Eastern Europe except *Czechoslovakia; these parties’ small membership fluctuated, and available statistics on party membership are only approximate. According to the most reliable estimates, membership in the Communist Party of Poland oscillated between perhaps 5,000 and 30,000. Jews and other minorities (in particular ethnic Ukrainians and Belarusians) were overrepresented; between one-quarter and one-third of Polish communists were of Jewish origin. Even so, in a population of some three million Polish Jews, at most some 7,000 to 7,500 were communists in the interwar years. Many more Jews voted for Jewish political parties, and a plurality of Polish Jews voted for the pro-government party, the Non-Party Bloc for Cooperation with the Government.

Jews were also overrepresented among Romanian, Lithuanian, and Hungarian communists. In 1918–19, some two-thirds of the original fifteen members of the Hungarian Communist Party's Central Committee and three-quarters of two hundred high officials in Béla Kun's short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic were Jews by birth. Throughout the interwar years, the Communist Parties of *Romania and Hungary remained small and illegal; each was estimated to have had some thousand members on the eve of World War II. Available statistics suggest that the composition of the Romanian Communist Party in 1933 was 26.58% ethnic Hungarian, 22.65% ethnic Romanian, and 18.12% ethnically Jewish at a time when there were approximately 757,000 Jews in Romania, or 4.2% of the population. According to the Lithuanian secret police, there were 1,120 Lithuanian Communist Party members in 1939; of these just over 30% were Jews. Jewish participation is estimated to have been proportionally even higher in communist youth movements.

When the Soviet Red Army invaded eastern Poland and incorporated these lands into the Belarusian and Ukrainian Soviet Republics in 1939, many Poles believed that local Jews welcomed the Red Army and collaborated with the Stalinist occupiers. Among the motivations cited for the *pogroms and massacres of Jews that occurred in Polish towns such as Jedwabne and Radziłów immediately following the German attack on the *Soviet Union (and the Red Army's retreat from these areas) was revenge for real or perceived Jewish collaboration with the Stalinist regime. During the twenty-one months of Soviet rule in eastern Poland, more than 300,000 Polish citizens, including large numbers of Polish Jews, were deported to labor camps in the Soviet interior. While the death rate in these labor camps was high, survival rates were much higher than in Nazi extermination camps, built after Nazi *Germany attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941. Thus, many Polish Jewish *Holocaust survivors owed their survival to having been sent to a Soviet camp or having fled into the Soviet interior; for this reason, many Jews who returned to Poland after the war were not hostile to either communism or the Soviet Union. It was among the macabre perversities of this period that being a victim of Stalinism could save one's life.

The arrival of the Red Army in Eastern Europe at the end of World War II was a much less ambiguous liberation for the Jews than it was for their Polish, Czech, Slovak, Hungarian, and Romanian fellow citizens. Two-thirds of the Hungarian Jewish population did not survive the Holocaust. Of the approximately 150,000 Jewish survivors, an estimated one-quarter voted for the communists in the 1945 elections. At this time Jews made up 1–2% of the Hungarian population, but comprised 14–15% of the Hungarian Communist Party membership. In 1945 it was very clear to East European Jews that it was Stalin who was responsible for Hitler's defeat. This drew much Jewish support for communism, even as the postwar Hungarian and Romanian Communist Parties recruited (allegedly repentant) ex-fascists as members.

After the communist takeovers, communists of Jewish origin occupied high-profile positions in post-war Eastern Europe. These communist leaders included Rudolf Slánský, General Secretary of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (1901–52); Hilary Minc and Jakub Berman, two of a triumvirate of Stalinist leaders in post-war Poland; Ana Pauker, communist Romania's foreign minister and the unofficial leader of the post-war Romanian Communist Party; and four men at the top of the Hungarian Communist Party – Mátyás Rákosi, Ernő Gerő, Mihály Farkas, and Józef Révai. Most resented was the overrepresentation of Jews in the upper echelons of the Stalinist security apparatus. A post-war joke alluded to the composition of the Hungarian Communist Party leadership: "Why is there one Gentile in the Hungarian Politburo?" "They need someone to sign decrees on Shabbat." The paradox was that even at a moment when Jewish communists were so visible in the party leadership, the Communist Party was itself not free of *antisemitism. Within a short time, the revolution began to devour its young. Stalin's "anti-cosmopolitan" campaign, initiated in 1948, was directed against Jews. Eleven of the fourteen defendants in the 1952 Czechoslovak communist show trial were Jews, including Rudolf Slánský. They were charged, among other things, with Zionist conspiracy. All were found guilty; eight of the eleven executed were Jews.

In 1967 Poland, the outbreak of the Six Day War in *Israel became the pretext for purging the Polish military of officers of Jewish origin. In January 1968, communist authorities claimed that student demonstrations were incited by Zionist conspirators. The party-led antisemitic campaign that subsequently peaked in March 1968 popularized a theory of a Nazi-Zionist conspiracy, leading to the purging of the remaining Polish Jewish communists from their positions; some 13,000 Polish Jews left Poland after March 1968.

In Die Judenfrage (The Jewish Question), Karl *Marx had written, "The social emancipation of the Jew is the emancipation of society from Judaism." Marx here invoked Judaism to stand for bourgeois capitalist exploitation; like many others, he associated Jews with *money lending and the rise of capitalism. Marxism was hostile to Judaism in another sense as well: Judaism, like all religions, was condemned as an "opiate of the masses." The embrace of communism, sometimes analyzed in Freudian terms as an oedipal rebellion, was a rejection of Jewish identity.

A substantial literature has sought to explain the attraction of Jews to communism. One set of explanations points to the historical-political context. In interwar Eastern Europe, despite the fact that the East European states whose borders were drawn at Versailles were made to sign minority protection treaties, Jews and other ethnic minorities were discriminated against by the nationalist regimes under which they resided. Quotas in higher education, ghetto benches (segregation of Jewish university students in Poland in designated sections of lecture halls), economic boycotts, and antisemitic violence led to a desire among Jews for revolutionary change. Like *Zionism, communism was seen by many Jews as an antidote to traditional Jewish emasculation. Communism also promised racial blindness and equality for all. Moreover, in the manichean world of the 1930s, many believed that communists represented the most decisive opposition to the Nazis. Holocaust survivors have noted that in Nazi camps, the communists presented the most inspiring model of *resistance. In a situation for which no one was prepared, they were the best prepared: They were uncompromising, organized, disciplined, and schooled in conspiracy and resistance. Many survivors embraced the Communist Party as their liberator.

A second set of explanations probes deeper affinities between Marxism and traditional Jewish culture. Writers have pointed to the inherent "Jewishness" of communism, particularly the rationalism and moralism central to both Marxism and Jewish theology. Marxism can be understood as a secular Jewish *messianism wherein the proletariat plays the role of the messiah. Others have pointed to the parallels between talmudic learning and the text-based nature of the communist movement, particularly the focus on the study of Marxist writings. Isaac Deutscher, most famously, has described Jewish communists as models of the cosmopolitan "non-Jewish Jew." In Deutscher's reading, the essence of Jewish culture was the tradition of crossing boundaries, synthesizing diverse cultures, and transcending limitations. Victimized time and time again by religious intolerance and nationalist sentiments, Jews have longed for a universalist Weltanschauung (worldview). For Deutscher, communism was the quintessential universalist Weltanschauung.

For further reading, see E. Mendelsohn, The Jews of East Central Europe between the World Wars (1983); M. Shore, "Children of the Revolution: Communism, Zionism, and the Berman Brothers," Jewish Social Studies 10:3 (2004): 23–86; J. Schatz, The Generation: The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communists of Poland (1991); M. Chęcinski, Poland: Communism, Nationalism, Anti-Semitism (1982); and I. Deutscher, "The Non-Jewish Jew," in The Non-Jewish Jew and Other Essays, ed. T. Deutscher (1968), 25–41.

MARCI SHORE

Community Center Movement: See UNITED STATES: COMMUNITY CENTER MOVEMENT

Confession of Sin. *Repentance, or teshuvah, is one of the major belief principles of *Judaism. If someone does something wrong, the capacity to apologize, to be granted *atonement, and to be given a second chance is always available. That process begins with confession, or viddui, of one's sins. The confession must detail precisely what one did, and it is preferable to make it while standing. The confession is not made to any human being, but rather is offered to *God. The one caveat is that if a sin against another person is involved, one must first seek forgiveness from that individual.

On *Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, there is a section in the liturgy called viddui that is recited several times. It lists many types of sins and reflects a public confession of the community's shortcomings. It is also the custom that those who are terminally ill recite a viddui so that they leave this world cleansed of the things that they have done wrong in this life.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Confirmation. Initiated by the Reform movement in nineteenth-century *Germany, confirmation is a ceremony marking the public commitment to Judaism of teenagers, usually between age sixteen and eighteen. In early-twentieth-century America most classical Reform congregations eliminated public celebration of *Bar Mitzvah in favor of confirmation. It was felt that thirteen was too early an age to assume adult responsibilities in the modern world and also that confirmation was preferable because it included girls and boys. Always a group ceremony, confirmation generally takes place on *Shavuot, the pilgrimage festival marking the *covenant between the Jewish people and *God at Mount Sinai. In the middle of the twentieth century the *Conservative movement instituted confirmation for girls. In recent decades, as individual B'nei Mitzvah have become the norm at Reform synagogues, confirmation has faded in importance. It has now become a way to encourage boys and girls to extend their religious education and is similar to a Hebrew High School graduation. See JUDAISM: REFORM entries.

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Consecration. In medieval Europe it was customary to sweeten the first day of *Torah study for young boys by putting honey on letters and letting them lick it off. In early-twentieth-century America *Reform Judaism developed the consecration ceremony with a similar purpose in mind: to mark the significance of kindergarten or first-grade boys and girls beginning their religious studies. Consecration often takes place at a Friday night service and may include the recital of the *shema (affirmation of divine unity) by the children. Since a fixed time was never set for this ritual, some synagogues hold it on the autumn festival of *Simhat Torah, while others choose the late spring festival of *Shavuot. The children receive small replicas of Torahs or some other gift to mark this important moment. More recently some *Conservative *synagogues have introduced consecration with a short performance by the children during a *worship service; the children are presented with *prayer books inscribed for the occasion. For further reading, see I. Marcus, Rituals of Childhood: Jewish Acculturation in Medieval Europe (1996); and EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN.

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Conservative Judaism: See JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE

Conversion: Early Modern Period. Conversion away from Judaism to another religion, or apostasy, is discussed extensively in rabbinic and medieval literature, where various *halakhic and social issues are addressed. The reasons for early modern apostasy could vary widely. Some individuals were genuinely convinced by the religious tenets of *Christianity or *Islam. Others sought material or professional gain, since converts could pursue social and vocational opportunities that were closed to Jews; in some cases, Jews were offered financial incentives for conversion. Some apostates, however, were quickly disillusioned because they continued to be seen as Jews by their new co-religionists. In other cases, Jews were forcibly converted to Christianity, as in *Spain and *Portugal between the late fourteenth and early sixteenth centuries. Although some Jews successfully returned to Judaism later, significant numbers remained Christian. This situation led to complicated Jewish, Christian, and crypto-Jewish identities. In Spain, as elsewhere, some apostates maintained close affiliation with the Jewish community. One of the main charges associated with the expulsion of the Jews from Spain was the contention that Jews were corrupting apostates and attempting to bring them back to Judaism.

Apostasy has generally been seen as a relatively limited phenomenon until the assimilation and secularization of modernity, but there are examples in the Early Modern period of both high-profile conversions from Judaism and, at times, relatively large numbers of apostates. Although women could apostasize, before the eighteenth century they did so less frequently than men. The social background of apostates varied widely; some scholars have suggested that particular groups of Jews were more inclined to apostasy at certain times. For example, in early modern *Germany, many apostates were second-rank religious functionaries who were accorded little respect within the Jewish community.

Some apostates became well-known and vigorous opponents of Judaism and Jewish communities. These individuals wrote about alleged anti-Christian sentiment and actions engaged in by Jews, and they were frequently instrumental in censorship of Jewish writings, legal discrimination against Jews, coerced religious *disputations, and in some cases expulsions of Jews or attacks against them. In early modern Germany, for example, Johannes Pfefferkorn (1429–1563) was involved in instigating proceedings against Jewish books, whereas the sixteenth-century convert Anthony Margaritha, who wrote about allegedly anti-Christian aspects of Judaism, was an influential source for many Christian scholars, including Martin Luther. Some converts taught *Hebrew to Renaissance and *Reformation Christians who had a growing interest in Hebrew and rabbinic writings; some collaborated on scholarly works. Although non-Jewish communities often encouraged Jewish apostasy, they generally looked very unfavorably at co-religionists who converted to Judaism. Such conversions could result in legal prosecution and at times attacks against Jewish communities.

For further reading, see E. Carlebach, Divided Souls: Converts from Judaism in Germany, 1500–1750 (2001); S. L. Gilman, Jewish Self-Hatred (1986); and M. Teter, “Jewish Conversions to Catholicism in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries,” Jewish History 17:3 (2003): 257–83. See also INTERMARRIAGE. DEAN PHILLIP BELL

Conversos/ Crypto-Jews. Small numbers of Jews in *Spain voluntarily converted to Christianity throughout the Middle Ages. Although some, such as Pablo Christiani (thirteenth century) and Abner of Burgos (d. 1348), became polemicists against their former religion, the overall impact of such converts remained negligible. This paradigm changed drastically in 1391 when a combination of Christian religious fervor and anti-Jewish sentiment erupted in a wave of attacks on Jewish communities. These assaults resulted in the conversion of roughly one-third of Spanish Jewry, giving rise to an entire society of conversos (also called New Christians and Marranos), who occupied an ambiguous space between Christianity and Judaism for centuries.

Disagreement over the proper treatment of the Spanish conversos persisted throughout the fifteenth century. No social or religious mechanisms existed to facilitate their integration into Christian society or to prevent their contact with Iberian Jewry. As a result, the fate of the Jews became bound up with that of the conversos over the course of the fifteenth century. Intense missionary activity was aimed at those who remained Jewish, including the year-long *Disputation of Tortosa (1413–14), while restrictive legislation and outbreaks of violence were directed against those who had already converted. Suspicion that the New Christians engaged in the clandestine practice of Jewish rituals fueled debate over their integration into Christian society. Some Old Christians argued that baptism could not remove the “impurity” of Jewish blood, whereas others fought hard to allow conversos into guilds, universities, and governing institutions as the only reasonable course of action. The dilemma provoked the establishment of a new, royally controlled office of the *Inquisition in 1478 that sought to distinguish believing Christians from crypto-Jews.

Both Jews and conversos echoed this general ambivalence toward the conversos' religious identity. The dominant rabbinic stance was to view conversos as having been forcibly converted and thus still Jews, but popular Jewish attitudes toward them were often less positive. As for the conversos themselves, some wrote treatises defending the unity of the Christian faith and their right to be accepted as full members of Christian society. Others maintained close ties to the Jewish community and sought to practice Judaism to the extent that they were able. The activities of the Inquisition severely inhibited their public religious expression, relegating most crypto-Jewish practices to the home. As a result, conversa women assumed a prominent role in the preservation and transmission of Jewish rituals and beliefs. The Spanish Inquisition championed the Christian conviction that Jews actively encouraged heresy (judaizing) among the New Christians, and this belief became the major motivation for Ferdinand and Isabella's decision to expel the Jews of Spain in 1492.

In 1497, the Jews of *Portugal were forcibly converted by royal edict, greatly increasing the ranks of converso society. Many among this later wave of converts eventually fled to the *Ottoman Empire, *Amsterdam, and various Italian cities in order to return to Judaism. For those who remained in Iberia, contact with Jews and general knowledge of Judaism diminished sharply from the sixteenth century onward. Many conversos intermarried into Old Christian families and assumed positions of political, intellectual, and economic prominence. Although most eventually assimilated into Hispano-Christian society, some continued to emigrate and revert to Judaism in more hospitable lands. They brought with them a sense of cultural distinctiveness, combining pride in their Jewish heritage with Spanish notions of blood purity to form the basis of a new “nation” of former Christians within the Jewish world.

For further reading see R. L. Melammed, Heretics or Daughters of Israel: The Crypto-Jewish Women of Castile (1999); H. Beinart, Conversos on Trial: The Inquisition in Ciudad Real (1981); and M. Bodian, Hebrews of the Portuguese Nation: Conversos and Community in Early Modern Amsterdam (1997).

JONATHAN RAY

Cordovero, Moses (1522–1570) was the greatest kabbalist in sixteenth-century *Safed prior to Isaac *Luria, who may have been his disciple. Although his birthplace is unknown, it is clear that his family originated in *Spain. Cordovero was the disciple of Shlomo Alkabetz, one of the founders of the school of *Kabbalah in Safed, and he also collaborated with the leading legal scholar of the period, Joseph *Karo. Cordovero saw himself as continuing the classical Spanish Kabbalah; his main work is Or Yakar (Precious Light), a multi-volume commentary on the *Zohar. The work was preserved only in one manuscript (in Modena) and was printed for the first time in the last decades of the twentieth century in *Jerusalem.

In his twenties Cordovero wrote his best known and most influential work, Pardes Rimonin (An Orchard of Pomegranates [Kraká, 1592]). It is an impressive and systematic presentation of kabbalistic thought with each chapter elucidating a major subject. One large chapter provides an extensive dictionary of the Zohar's kabbalistic terminology. Cordovero wrote many other monographs; they include Tefilah le-Moshe (The Prayer of Moses [Przemysl, 1892]); Sefer Gerushin (Book of Wanderings [Venice, 1587]), describing his wanderings in the Safed mountains in search of spiritual inspiration; and Or Neerav (Delight of Light [Venice, 1587]), a methodological introduction to the kabbalah (I. Robinson, Moses Cordovero's Introduction to Kabbalah: An Annotated Translation of his Or Neerav [1994]). Cordovero's Tomer Devorah (The Palm Tree of Deborah [Venice, 1589]) was the first attempt to construct a system of ethics based on kabbalistic concepts; it advocated imitation of the "ways of God" as epitomized in the characteristics of each *sefirah. This brief work served as a cornerstone for the literature of kabbalistic ethics, which flourished in the Middle East and Europe in the following centuries (L. Jacobs, The Palm Tree of Deborah [1960]).

Although he believed that he was presenting the teachings of the Zohar, Cordovero's views were often original and innovative. He tried to reconcile the different kabbalistic systems of the past centuries with some of the main conceptions of rationalistic philosophy (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL), defining the system of the sefirot as the means for bridging the distance between the Godhead and the universe. His system emphasizes divine immanence in all parts of creation and the workings of the divine will in all divine and earthly realms. He attempted to establish a demythologized kabbalistic system by denying the concept of antagonistic dualism within the divine world and by minimizing the references to erotic processes that were characteristic of the Zohar. Cordovero's kabbalistic system dominated the Safed Kabbalah, spread to *Italy and other centers in the second half of the sixteenth century, and was gradually replaced by Lurianic Kabbalah during the 1600s.

JOSEPH DAN

Council and Synod: Medieval and Early Modern. Councils and synods (kinus, kinusim or va'ad, ve'adim) were two forms of intercommunal assemblies of representatives from different Jewish communities. Although no formal definition distinguished the two, the participants in councils were often lay community leaders, while the participants in synods were rabbinic figures who convened to discuss issues concerning religious ritual and practice. Both institutions provided authoritative guidance and met the current needs of Jews in medieval and early modern times.

References to assemblies of community leaders already appear in eleventh-century sources. A council held in Mainz circa 1307 raised funds for the resettlement in *Germany of Jewish refugees from *France. Jewish communities in Germany, *England, and *Spain convened regularly to allocate taxes, raise money, and, in times of crisis, reinstitute social and religious values. Two particularly famous councils were the *Council of Four Lands in Poland and the *Council of Lithuania, which were the central intercommunal institutions in these countries from the middle of the sixteenth century until the middle of the eighteenth century.

In modern times, with the growing integration of Jews into national states and the diminishing role of traditional modes of life, Jewish organizations of various kinds have assumed the traditional role of intercommunal councils. Nonetheless, the gathering of Jews to discuss issues central to modern Jewish identity such as *Zionism, *Israel–Diaspora relations, and Jewish identity shows that, despite the diversified nature of modern Jewish society, solidarity and shared values still are a characteristic of Jewish life.

Synods convened in different parts of Europe during the Middle Ages. The first known synod in northern France convened in Troyes (ca. 1150) and was followed by a series of other intercommunal rabbinic assemblies. Beginning at the end of the twelfth century, rabbis from the three important Jewish communities in the Rhineland – Speyer, Worms, and Mainz – assembled regularly and made various rulings, called takkanot (ordinances effecting changes in law and practice). Synods addressed various pressing issues such as informers, litigation in non-Jewish courts, and problems related to marital discord. The main sanction against anyone who did not follow the synods' ordinances was a ban of excommunication (herem*), which was formally executed by the *communal organizations (kehillot).

Several synods convened in Spain and *Italy to reinforce religious principles or to issue particular ordinances; for example, a synod in Ferrara in 1554 issued regulations regarding the *printing of Hebrew books. During the modern period, *Reform Jews challenged the traditional role of synods by questioning the legitimacy of rabbinic authority. Subsequently, the ordinances of synods only obligated those who accepted rabbinic authority and, with the disintegration of the traditional Jewish kehillah, alternative means of sanction other than the herem had to be used to enforce rabbinic regulations. For further reading, see L. Finkelstein, Jewish Self-Government in the Middle Ages (1964).

YECHIEL Y. SCHUR

Council of Four Lands (Va'ad Arba Aratzot [VDA]) and Council of Lithuania (Va'ad Medinat Lita [VML]) were federative, intercommunal Jewish self-governance organizations that functioned in the Polish-Lithuanian Kingdom from the second half of the sixteenth century until 1764. They were the largest and most developed of the supra-communal *councils in the medieval and early modern *Ashkenazi Diaspora. Made up of representatives of local communities who coordinated mutual interests and negotiated collectively with the authorities, these councils were similar to other corporate organizations representing ethnic and/or religious groups. The Jewish regional councils and the councils of the Polish-Lithuanian Kingdom paralleled to a great extent the regional parliaments of the Polish nobility (Polish, Sejmiki) and the kingdom's parliament (the Sejm).

The VDA and VML originated when the Polish monarchy attempted to regularize tax collection from Jewish communities and establish a centralized leadership. Parallel to these efforts, judicial bodies were established and recognized as intercommunal courts of law (initially at the Lublin Fair). In this way, a regular gathering of representatives of major communities was established to deal with tax issues and intercommunal disputes. The first known regulation of the VDA is from 1580. Although a hierarchical structure characterized the councils, there was no symmetry or uniformity in how Jewish communities were represented. Additionally, representation was subject to change, reflecting the relative strength of various communities at particular times.

The basic unit of the council was the individual community, each of which was led by a kahal (see COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN ERAS). The strongest and wealthiest communities were called Main Kehilla and were represented in the Va'ad Hagalil (district council). The boundaries of each district usually followed those of the administrative divisions of the Polish-Lithuanian Kingdom. The district council would convene on market days, and its structure was similar to that of the local kahal. The district councils and the main communities were represented in a nonsymmetric manner in the Council of the Four Lands: The lands (Hebrew, aratzot) were Great and Little Poland, Volhynia, and Red Russia, although sometimes there were three lands and at times five. In 1717 the VDA comprised eighteen units (nine main communities and nine district councils), ostensibly representing the entire Jewish population under the Polish crown. In Lithuania the representation was even more restricted: Only representatives of the main communities participated regularly in the Council's assemblies. Initially, the three "Communities of Heads of Courts of Law" were Brisk, Grodno, and Pinsk; later Vilnius and Slutsk were added.

The VDA and VML were oligarchic organizations; for example, only 1% of the eligible voters in the local communities participated in the elections for the VDA representatives. The structure of both councils was similar to that of the local kahal: The community elder (Polish, marszałek) headed the council; the "trustee" (Polish, wiernik) attended to financial matters; the lobbyist (Pol: syndyk generalności) handled contacts with the authorities and influencing taxation issues; the assessors (Polish, sympłarzy) determined the division of tax portions among the various communities; and the scribe managed the registration of regulations, decisions, and verdicts of the Council's court of law. The Councils' minute books (Heb., pinkasim) were binding documents that validated all their decisions and actions. The VML minute book from the years 1623–1765 has been preserved (published in 1925); the VDA books are lost, except for a few pages (reconstructed and published in 1945; second, expanded edition in 1990).

However, the Polish authorities never officially recognized the Councils as institutions of self-rule. The only function officially recognized by the authorities was organizing the collection of the poll tax from the Jews. The Councils maintained a direct connection with the Polish and Lithuanian treasuries, and they determined the internal division of the tax (which was subdivided into equal units of payment called portions [Hebrew, skhumot; Polish, sympła]). At times, Councils collected the tax directly and passed the revenues on to the royal treasury; other times the communities directly paid the treasury or the military units that were funded by the poll tax.

Unofficially, the two Councils fulfilled a variety of functions in the religious, cultural, and economic life of the Jewish population in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth that were of common concern. The Councils made "supra-regulations" concerning morals and traditions, *commerce and financial activities, and *philanthropy, which were supposed to be binding on every community. Their courts of law were the highest legal authority, although acceptance of their decisions and judgments was contingent on the agreement of the representatives of the main communities and the district councils. The Councils issued approbations to books and protected the rights of their authors, actively opposed religious heresy (as in the case of the *Frankist movement in the middle of the eighteenth century) and supported immigrants from *Eastern Europe who settled in *Palestine. Communities from abroad (such as *Amsterdam, Hamburg, and *Frankfurt) approached the VDA with requests for aid in settling their internal disputes.

The Councils, like the local Jewish community, were also financial organizations that borrowed monies (mainly from church institutions and religious orders) to fund their own activities. Their main effort was directed toward defending Jewish interests, beginning with protecting their financial interests and including fighting blood libels (see RITUAL MURDER ACCUSATION), a matter that became pivotal in the eighteenth century. In one case, the journey of a VDA emissary to Rome following a blood libel in 1756 entailed significant expenses, which made it necessary to impose a special tax on the Jewish population of the kingdom. The restricted authority of the Councils and their limited ability to influence the behavior of communities or individuals were at times in complete contradiction to their ideal image in the minds of the Jews of the Polish-Lithuanian Kingdom, who viewed them as a "miniature kingdom" and as a moral and rabbinical authority (Map 8).

Modern Jewish historiography has seen the intercommunal Councils as a manifestation of a pre-modern, national entity. Simon *Dubnow (1860 – 1941), the most prominent scholar of the Jewish-Russian school of history, favored the renewal of Jewish autonomy within the multinational empires in which most of the Jews resided before World War I. Dubnow, who published the VML minute book, saw the VDA and VML as links in the chain of Jewish self-rule and as models for the renewal of an array of parliaments that would represent Jewish communities throughout the empires in which they lived and manage their internal affairs. These trends, which were combined within a *Zionist worldview, were carried on in the research of the Jerusalemite historian, Israel Halpern (1910–1971). Recent research includes I. Bartal, The Jews of Eastern Europe, 1772–1881 (2006); and G. D. Hundert, Jews in Poland-Lithuania in the Eighteenth Century: A Genealogy of Modernity (2004). ISRAEL BARTAL

Counting the Omer: See OMER, COUNTING OF THE

Court Jews (Hoffjuden). Some Jews served in important economic and administrative capacities at various princely and imperial courts throughout medieval Europe. With growing mercantilism and centralization of political power in the seventeenth century, the role of the Court Jew expanded, particularly in the many independent political entities of German-speaking *Central Europe. Court Jews in the Early Modern period worked to overhaul administrative and tax systems, develop industry, secure and deliver provisions for armies, and create uniform coinage. They also helped in a wide range of political endeavors, at times serving as diplomats and helping rulers secure new crowns or lands. The particular role of the Court Jew depended on the personality and resources of the specific individual, as well as the needs of the ruler and the conditions of the court and the region.

One particularly well-known Court Jew of the seventeenth century was Samuel Oppenheimer (1630–1703) who, among other things, supplied the garrisons for the Elector of the Palatinate and later helped organize the successful defense of *Vienna against the Turks. Although most Court Jews appear to have been men, we do have evidence of some women serving in this role. One example is the famed late-seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century Esther Schulhoff Liebmann (ca. 1645–1714), who worked with her husband Jost (also known as Judah Berlin; ca. 1640–1701); she continued to serve in a variety of capacities at the Prussian court after his death.

Dispersed networks of contacts with other Jews and Jewish communities helped facilitate the work of Court Jews, who also interacted vigorously with the non-Jewish world around them. Court Jews were often granted special privileges to assist them in their work, including freedom of travel or exemption from Jewish communal regulations. Some scholars have seen the early modern Court Jew as a prototype of the secularized Jew of the modern period. In fact, most Court Jews appear to have continued traditional Jewish observance, and many maintained important connections with their Jewish communities, serving frequently as political defenders and economic supporters. Many Court Jews were learned in Jewish law and were patrons of Jewish scholarship.

Court Jews often formed family dynasties, marrying among themselves and serving regional rulers for generations. The position was not without inherent risks. Joseph Süß Oppenheimer (1698–1738), Court Jew for Duke Charles Alexander of Württemberg, was tried and executed shortly after the death of his benefactor for his harsh and unpopular policies; his tragic fate serves as a poignant reminder of the challenges facing even the most affluent and influential Court Jews in the pre-modern period.

A classic overview of the Court Jews is S. Stern, The Court Jew: A Contribution to the History of the Period of Absolutism in Central Europe (1950). Also valuable are J. Israel, European Jewry in the Age of Mercantilism, 1550–1750 (3rd ed., 1998); and the various essays in V. B. Mann and R. I. Cohen, eds., From Court Jews to the Rothschilds (1996).

DEAN PHILLIP BELL

Courts (Hebrew beit din, batai din [pl.]; see also BEIT DIN). Ever since *Moses adjudicated cases among the *Israelites in the wilderness (Exod 18), courts have been a central way in which Jews have settled their disputes and determined guilt or innocence. The goal of such courts rings through the ages: “Justice, justice shall you pursue” (Deut 16:20).

Court procedures were instituted in the *Torah. To forestall collusion, at least two witnesses were required to establish a fact in court (Deut 17:6, 19:15). To emphasize its proscription of false testimony, the Torah includes this prohibition in the *Ten Commandments (Exod 20:13; see also Exod 23:1–2; Deut 5:17). Moreover, a 20% fine is levied against witnesses who knowingly lie in a civil case (Lev 5:20–26), and full retribution is required of those who testify falsely in a criminal case (Deut 19:15–21). A judge’s acceptance of bribes is roundly condemned, “for bribes blind the clear-sighted and upset the pleas of those who are in the right” (Exod 23:8; Deut 16:19). Each person is to be judged for his or her own actions exclusively (Deut 24:16), despite widespread practices in ancient, medieval, and modern times that punish relatives for the crimes of family members. The Torah insists that neither rich nor poor may be favored: “You shall not be partial in judgment; hear out low and high alike. Fear no man, for judgment is God’s” (Deut 1:17; see also Exod 23:2, 6). The alien, too, is to be treated fairly: “Decide justly between any man and a fellow Israelite or stranger” (Deut 1:16).

The Rabbis of the *Talmud and Middle Ages added many more procedural rules to ensure impartial treatment in judicial proceedings. For example, one litigant may not be required to stand while the other is sitting, both parties to the case must wear clothing of similar quality, judges must understand the languages spoken by the people before them, and witnesses may not be related to each other or to the litigants (M. Sanhedrin 3–4; BT Sanhedrin 17a; and *Maimonides’ Mishneh Torah, “Laws of Courts” [Sanhedrin] 26:1–3).

Furthermore, the character of the judges must be beyond reproach. They must be “capable men who fear God, trustworthy men who spurn ill-gotten gain” (Exod 18:21), “tribal leaders, wise and experienced men” (Deut 1:15). In addition, “Rabbi Johanan said: ‘None are to be appointed members of the court except men of stature, wisdom, good appearance, mature age, with a knowledge of sorcery [so they can determine who is violating the law by practicing it], and who are conversant with all the seventy languages of mankind in order that the court should have no need of an interpreter’” (BT Sanhedrin 17a).

JURISDICTION: The Torah (Deut 17:8–13) grants judges the authority not only to rule on specific cases but also to interpret and apply the law as they see fit in each generation. The Rabbis maintain that the phrase “in charge at the time” (17:9) indicates that one may not argue that current judges lack the authority of earlier judges but rather “Jerubaal [Gideon] in his generation is like Moses in his” (T. Rosh Hashanah 1:17; BT Rosh Hashanah 25a–b). Because the Torah forbids adding to or subtracting anything from its body of legislative rulings (Deut 4:2; 13:1), it was through judicial interpretation that Jewish law changed over time to meet the needs of new circumstances. In other words, “judge-made law” is standard operating procedure in this legal system.

*Mishnah Sanhedrin depicts a legal system that is competent to judge civil, criminal, and even capital cases and to carry out their judgments. Whether such a system existed under *Roman rule is questionable. Under Muslim and Christian rule, however, Jews were generally granted a measure of autonomy according to which their courts had authority, backed by the government, to adjudicate civil, criminal, and, in Muslim *Spain, apparently even capital cases on the condition that the Jewish community pay substantial taxes to the government (see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT). Jewish judicial autonomy weakened with political *emancipation; as Jews became citizens of the countries in which they lived, jurisdiction over civil and criminal cases was ceded to secular courts.

Jewish courts continue to function in the *Diaspora in matters of Jewish *marriage and *divorce. In all modern Jewish movements, rabbis and central courts issue rulings on the whole gamut of issues that arise in Jews' lives. They may also serve as mediation or arbitration panels if both disputants agree to abide by the court's decision.

For further reading, see E. N. Dorff and A. Rosett, A Living Tree: The Roots and Growth of Jewish Law (1988); M. Elon, Jewish Law: History, Sources, Principles (1994); and I. Goldstein, Jewish Justice and Conciliation (1981). ELLIOT N. DORFF

Covenant (Hebrew, berit) is a formal alliance that may be concluded between individuals, nations, or, in the biblical context, between *God and an individual or between God and the *Israelites as a national entity (see also ISRAELITES: RELIGION; THEOLOGY). Comparisons with ancient *Near Eastern documents, such as treaties from the *Hittite Empire in the period 1500–1400 BCE and the Neo-*Assyrian era (750–610 BCE), demonstrate that biblical covenant forms that convey Israel's relationship with God follow contractual models that express a vassal king's exclusive relationship with his overlord (see MESOPOTAMIA).

Biblical covenants between *God and individuals or God and the people of Israel promise prosperity, fertility, and military victory in return for worship and obedience to divine *commandments; these covenants sometimes included ritual performance, such as animal sacrifice (Gen 9, 15:9–11), and are often accompanied by an external sign. Thus, the covenant between God and *Noah after the flood (Gen 9) obligates Noah and his sons to populate the earth, gives them stewardship over plants and animals, and forbids murder and the eating of meat that has not been drained of blood. It further ordains punishment for murder. In return, God promises never again to disrupt the natural order or to destroy life on earth by flood; the rainbow is the sign of this covenant. In Genesis 17, the covenant effects a change in the names of the ancestral couple and requires an alteration to the male body: Abram becomes Abraham (17:5) and Sarai becomes Sarah (17:15), and the commandment of *circumcision (berit milah) is henceforth ordained for all males within the Israelite community (17:9–14).

The covenant at Mount Sinai includes all of the children of Israel; in it, God promises to make the Israelites a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (Exod 19–24). National covenants, associated with spiritual renewal or revival, can be found throughout the Hebrew *Bible (Exod 19:8; Deut 29–30; Josh 24:24; 2 Sam 7; 2 Kgs 23:3; 2 Chron 15:8–15, 23:16, 34:31–32; Neh 10:29; Jer 50:5).

Biblical covenantal *theology, which develops from this treaty model, assumes that the divine–human relationship is predicated on human free will. Obedience to divine laws is the prerequisite to fulfillment of God's promises; failure to comply will lead to catastrophe on a national scale. Thus, disaster is interpreted as deserved divine punishment.

This theological approach is central to most biblical writings, including the prophetic books. Biblical wisdom literature, however, especially the books of *Job and *Ecclesiastes, as well as some later Jewish *thought, calls divine justice into question in cases of innocent suffering (see also BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE; CIRCUMCISION). ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Covering the Head: See HEAD COVERING, MEN; HEAD COVERING, WOMEN

Crescas, Ḥasdai ben Abraham (1340–1410), a native of *Spain, was one of the most important, and arguably the most incisive of medieval Jewish philosophers (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL). Educated in rabbinic, kabbalistic, and philosophical literatures, Crescas served briefly as a rabbi in Barcelona, and in 1389 he was appointed as rabbi of Saragossa, the capital city of Aragon. Two years later, in the fateful Iberian anti-Jewish riots of 1391, Crescas' only son was murdered. Crescas composed several books, some of which do not survive. His two major extant works are polemical in nature (see also MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS). In both, he applies sharp and rigorous argumentation to refute what he considered to be major threats to the continuity of Jewish life and thought. His 1398 treatise, The Refutation of Christian Principles, written in Catalan, is a straightforward and pointed attack on the tenets of Christian theology. Crescas seems to have been in contact with contemporary scholastic philosophers whose style and ideas both exerted a crucial influence on his thought and helped sharpen his understanding and criticism of Christianity.

His major philosophical work, Or ha-Shem (The Light of the Lord), was written in Hebrew (the most developed extant manuscript is dated 1410, shortly before his death). In this work, Crescas employs a series of nuanced and subtle arguments against the foundations of Aristotelian physics and metaphysics. His aim is to reaffirm the autonomy of Jewish thought against the Maimonidean synthesis of Aristotelian (and Arabic) philosophy with the precepts of rabbinic *Judaism. Crescas expresses sincere admiration for *Maimonides, yet, he believed that the latter's claim that the innermost secrets of rabbinic thought, ma'aseh bereshit (account of creation) and ma'aseh merkavah (account of the chariot), are expressions of Aristotelian physics and metaphysics made Judaism servile to Aristotelianism. Crescas also expresses dissatisfaction with Maimonides' authoritarian style in the Mishneh Torah, where Maimonides avoids providing justifications for most of his rulings. To refute the foundations of Aristotelian physics and metaphysics, Crescas provides several powerful arguments showing that the Aristotelian rejection of actual infinity and the void is ill founded. His analysis of infinity is particularly impressive in its precision and boldness. Crescas also argues against the Aristotelian rejection of the plurality of worlds, expressing moderate support for the possibilities both of temporally successive and temporally coexisting (but spatially distinct) worlds.

The influences of *Kabbalah and Christian scholastic thought can be discerned in Crescas' acceptance of the kabbalistic doctrine of the infinity of divine attributes and the Christian doctrines of divine love and original sin. *Spinoza's discussions of the nature of infinity, extension, and divine attributes seem to be strongly indebted to Crescas' views. Crescas' philosophy also had a significant impact on subsequent Jewish thinkers. One of his students was Joseph Albo (1380–1444), the author of the popular philosophical work, Sefer ha-Ikkarim (The Book of Principles). Crescas also exerted considerable influence on the thought of Leone Ebreo (see ABRAVANEL FAMILY), the Florentine humanist Pico Della Mirandola, and Salomon *Maimon.

For further reading, see Crescas, The Refutation of the Christian Principles, tr. D. J. Lasker (1992); and W. Z. Harvey, Physics and Metaphysics in Hasdai Crescas (1998).

YITZHAK Y. MELAMED

Crime and Criminals: United States. The arrival of more than two million *Eastern European Jewish immigrants at the turn of the twentieth century coincided with a period of rapid industrialization, urban overcrowding, and mass unemployment. In the ghettos of *New York, *Chicago, and *Boston, among other cities, these conditions created a fertile environment for organized crime. Like other newcomers to America, some Jewish immigrants and their children chose lives of crime as a way to escape poverty. They became pickpockets, gamblers, bootleggers, drug runners, and extortionists, with names like “Kid Twist,” “Longy” Zwillman, and “Dopey” Benny. Criminals were part of the fabric of Jewish immigrant communities, with thieves, *prostitutes, and murderers living side by side with garment workers, shop owners, and future doctors, educators, and intellectuals.

Young Jewish gang members robbed pushcarts and extorted money from successful shop owners in their neighborhoods. Hoodlums preyed on other Jews and later turned their attention to weightier criminal endeavors, such as extorting money from unions, bootlegging during Prohibition, and executing witnesses. Crime provided these ghetto youth with a way to move up the economic ladder and become American. A few graduated to the upper echelon of organized crime. The gambler, Arnold Rothstein (1882–1928), was purportedly responsible for the “Black Sox” scandal of 1919 (fixing the outcome of the World Series [see SPORTS, UNITED STATES: BASEBALL]). Jewish women were also members of the underworld. Organized Jewish *prostitution, what some sensational journalists and reformers called the “white slave” trade, spanned the Atlantic, connecting major cities in Europe with those in the Americas. Prostitution offered Jewish women a means to assert independence from the restrictive customs of the older generation and Jewish tradition and to avoid sweatshop labor. Some women willingly entered the business, while others were coerced by young Jewish men (“cadets”) who promised marriage or better opportunities.

New York Police Commissioner Theodore A. Bingham brought national attention to Jewish criminality on New York City's Lower East Side when he published an article in the North American Review (September 1908) in which he claimed that Jews were responsible for 50% of the city's crime. This negative publicity prompted members of the German Jewish community in New York to challenge Bingham's accusations, including the implication that Jews were inherently drawn to crime. To address the problem of Jewish crime and to repair the damage inflicted by these “black sheep” on American images of Jews and Jewish immigrants, they helped establish the Society to Aid the Jewish Prisoner, the Hawthorne School to rehabilitate wayward Jewish youth, and the Kehilla, a communal organization that united major segments of the Jewish community into a loose confederation that functioned between 1908–1922 to address shared concerns.

Organized Jewish crime reached its peak in the 1920s, during the era of prohibition, but declined precipitously in the 1930s and 1940s. As the children and grandchildren of immigrants improved their economic standing and moved to urban residential and suburban neighborhoods, the great majority left the criminality of the ghettos behind. Jewish gangsters and criminals are primarily remembered as a product of the *urban social ills that afflicted the immigrant generation (also PROSTITUTES, PROSTITUTION: MODERN ERA).

For further reading, see A. Fried, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Gangster in America (1993); R. Rubin, Jewish Gangsters of Modern Literature (1990); E. Bristow, Prostitution and Prejudice: The Jewish Fight Against White Slavery, 1870–1939 (1983); and J. Joselit, Our Gang: Jewish Crime and the New York Jewish Community, 1900–1940 (1983).

WENDY H. BERGOFFEN

Croatia: See BALKANS

Crusades: See MIDDLE AGES: CRUSADES

Custom (minhag). Although *Judaism is most often characterized as a religion of law, custom is a powerful factor both in individual and communal life. A *Yiddish folk maxim states, “A minhag brecht a din”; literally, a custom breaks a law. Minhag can refer to a traditional mode of practice handed down within a family or to the communal liturgical customs of an entire community, region, or form of Jewish practice (see COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION; COUNCIL AND SYNOD). Thus, one can find *prayer books that are clearly labeled as following the minhag of Rome or of *Amsterdam or of a defined movement within Judaism such as *Hasidism. In the nineteenth century pioneering *Reform Rabbi Isaac Mayer *Wise tried to create a “minhag America.” There is great respect for the power of custom. In his proposals for the reconstruction of Judaism in the first half of the twentieth century, Mordecai *Kaplan suggested that the term minhag, which he translated as “folkways,” replace mitzvah* (commandment).

RELA MINTZ GEFFEN

Czechoslovakia. In 1918, after the collapse of the *Austro-Hungarian Empire in World War I (see HABSBURG EMPIRE), the Jews of the Austrian provinces of Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia and of the northern regions of the kingdom of *Hungary, known as Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia, became residents of the newly established Czechoslovakia. The history of these Jewries in the twentieth century is one of simultaneous social, cultural, and political integration and separation (Map 8).

Interwar Czechoslovakia was a multinational state dominated by the Czechs and Slovaks, but inhabited by significant minority populations of Germans, Hungarians, Jews, Ruthenians (Ukrainians), and Poles. The majority of the country's Jews lived in Slovakia (136,737 [1930]) and Subcarpathian Ruthenia (102,542), whereas there were 117,551 Jews in the western provinces of Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia. As a result of the post-World War I amalgamation of these culturally diverse territories, the Jews of Czechoslovakia belonged to a multitude of linguistic, national, social, and political communities. Jews in the western part of the country were urban and secular with pockets of social and religious traditionalism. In eastern regions, Jews lived in small towns and rural enclaves that were strongholds of Orthodoxy with some reformist (see JUDAISM, NEOLOG) and *Hasidic adherents as well. Although German and Czech were the dominant languages among the western Jews, those in Slovakia spoke German, Hungarian, Slovak, and *Yiddish. Among Jews in Subcarpathian Ruthenia, Yiddish was the dominant language. In the course of the interwar years, the state expanded the public school system, a process of particular importance in the eastern provinces, and more Jews were educated in Czech- and Slovak-language schools. This development might have facilitated a gradual cultural homogenization of the country's Jews. The Czechoslovak government's recognition of Jews as a national minority is often upheld by historians as a significant indication of the state's tolerant and forthcoming attitude, but there was, in fact, considerable resistance to this designation among Jews in both the acculturated western communities and in the more traditional eastern ones. Nevertheless, Jews held generally positive attitudes toward the state because of their relative socioeconomic prosperity, expanded educational opportunities, and absence of state-sponsored *antisemitism. In the course of the 1920s and 1930s, socioeconomic mobility in the western provinces facilitated the entry of some Jews into the country's cultural and economic elite.

Beginning in the fall of 1938, Czechoslovakia gradually dissolved. Its Jews, including thousands of Jewish refugees from *Germany and Austria, became subjects of three different states: Germany, independent Slovakia, and Hungary. Most of Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia were incorporated into *Nazi Germany as the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in March 1939. At the same time, an independent authoritarian Catholic Slovak state emerged in parts of Slovakia. Hungary annexed southern Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia. Thus, by 1939, the Jews of the western provinces were under direct German control and the Jews of Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia were in the hands of hostile and openly antisemitic German allies. Although every Jewish community was subject to the processes of material dispossession, social isolation, and degradation, their roads to deportation took different forms. Between 1938 and 1941, more than 25,000 Jews fled the Protectorate; deportations of the remaining Jewish population began in October 1941. Some were sent immediately to killing centers in the East but most were assembled in the transit camp *Theresienstadt. From there they were sent to ghettos and camps in *Poland, the *Baltic States, and the *Soviet Union and, from October 1942, to *Auschwitz (see also HOLOCAUST entries). In Slovakia, the local authorities rounded up and handed over the majority of the country's Jews to the Germans who sent them to Auschwitz, *Majdanek, and *Sobibór for immediate extermination in October 1942. After this first wave of deportations, the Slovak authorities stalled the deportation of the country's remaining Jews. They, as well as most Jews living under Hungarian control, remained out of reach of the Germans until late spring 1944 when the German army occupied first Hungary and then Slovakia in August 1944. In the course of the next six months, about a half-million Jews living in Hungary were deported to Auschwitz; these included 140,000 Jews from the former Czechoslovak territories of southern Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia. By spring 1945, 263,000 (74%) of the Jews living in the former Czechoslovak territories were dead. Paradoxically, however, more Jews had survived in Slovakia than in either the Protectorate or the territories occupied by Hungary. About 68% of the Jews of independent Slovakia perished, while approximately 85% of the Jews of the Protectorate and in southern Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia died in camps and on death marches. In all areas, however, the persecution and deportation of Jews depended on the cooperation and at times the initiative of local authorities who assisted the Germans in their genocidal policies.

When fighting ended in May 1945, Czechoslovak Jewry had been all but destroyed. In the former Protectorate, less than five thousand Jews had been able to evade deportation; half of these were Jews married to non-Jews. In Slovakia several thousand Jews survived the war in hiding. They were joined by returning refugees and by survivors making their way home from camps across *Central Europe. In the following years, almost 30,000 Jews emigrated from Czechoslovakia, leaving behind a community of about 20,000. As in the interwar period, the largest community was in *Prague; it had been diminished from its pre-war Jewish population of 35,000 to a mere 3,000 Jews, many of whom came from other parts of the country, including Slovakia. Further east, Bratislava and Košice became the centers for Jews in Slovakia; many Subcarpathian Jews moved to the western part of Czechoslovakia after the ceding of the country's easternmost region to the Soviet Union in 1945. In the wake of the war, the government was determined to reconstitute Czechoslovakia as a state for Czechs and Slovaks, devoid of the unwanted pre-war minorities. This policy resulted in the expulsion of Czechoslovakia's ethnic German and Hungarian citizens. Although Jews were not expelled, they were considered "foreigners," much like the despised Germans and Hungarians. This attitude was complicated not only by the restitution of Jewish property that had been confiscated during the Nazi regime but also by the reintegration of Jews into Czech and Slovak societies. The fact that many ordinary Czechs and Slovaks had benefited materially from the dispossession and deportation of Jews also fueled the hostility toward Jews in the post-war years.

After the establishment of the communist regime in Czechoslovakia in 1948, Jewish associational life was severely circumscribed, and only the formal religious community was permitted to continue its activities (see COMMUNISM). As public displays of Jewish identity or religious practice were stigmatized, Jews relocated their cultural activities to the private sphere where Jewish cultural and religious traditions could be cultivated among family and friends. At the same time, secularization and social integration characterized Jewish life in all parts of Czechoslovakia, leading to a decline in religious practice and an increase in marriages between Jews and non-Jews (see INTERMARRIAGE). During this era, as well, the socio-cultural differences between Jews in the eastern and western parts of the country, which had been so prominent in the interwar period, diminished; in many ways Czechoslovak Jewry emerged as a relatively homogeneous community. As the state idealized cultural and social homogeneity, Jewish distinctiveness rested significantly in a remembrance of a recent past that differed dramatically from the memories of the non-Jewish population. Indeed, any public commemoration of the *Holocaust was suppressed throughout the communist period, although on a few occasions artists and activists broke the taboo. In the early communist period, some Jews achieved prominent positions in the new political and administrative elite; however, this trend was curbed when the Communist Party initiated purges of Jews from its membership in the early 1950s. Riding a wave of popular hostility toward Jews fed by an intense antisemitic propaganda campaign, the authorities prosecuted and imprisoned communist leaders and bureaucrats of Jewish origin, most vividly embodied in the Rudolf Slánský show trial in 1952. However, although state-sponsored *antisemitism became a staple of communist Czechoslovakia, especially after 1968, it is unclear to what extent it met with a favorable public response.

The collapse of communism in 1989 allowed for the reconstitution of Jewish religious and social institutions in Czechoslovakia. In the following years, a significant revival of Jewish communal life has occurred among the estimated fewer than 10,000 Jews living mainly in Prague, Brno, Bratislava, and Košice. Still, the processes of socio-cultural change that transformed Czech and Slovak Jews in the postwar period continue to shape Jewish life. This is evident in the secular Jewish culture that predominates and thrives in these communities. Indeed, even though Czechoslovakia itself was replaced in 1993 by two new states, Slovakia and the Czech Republic, Czech and Slovak Jews in some ways still constitute one community united by kinship ties and social circles shaped by their shared historical experience as Czechoslovak Jews.

For further reading, see H. J. Kieval, Languages of Community: The Jewish Experience in the Czech Lands (2000); T. Lichtenstein, "Making Jews at Home: Zionism and the Construction of Jewish Nationality in Interwar Czechoslovakia," East European Jewish Affairs 36:1 (2006): 49–71; H. Margolious Kovály, Under a Cruel Star: A Life in Prague 1941–1968 (1997); L. Rothkirchen, The Jews of Bohemia and Moravia: Facing the Holocaust (2005); and A. Heitlinger, In the Shadows of the Holocaust and Communism: Czech and Slovak Jews since 1945 (2006).

TATJANA LICHTENSTEIN

Czerniakow, Adam (1880–1942), was a leader of the *Warsaw ghetto Jewish council (Judenrat) and diarist. He committed suicide on July 23, 1942, rather than comply with Nazi orders to begin mass deportations of children and the elderly. See HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST DIARIES; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS; HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE, etc.

D

Damascus Affair refers to an 1840 *ritual murder accusation in Syria, then under the rule of Muhammad Ali of *Egypt. The disappearance of an Italian monk and his Muslim servant was blamed on Jews due to Christian and Muslim hostility. On the basis of false accusations and the encouragement of the French consul, Egyptian governor Sherif Padia arrested and tortured a number of Jews, including community notables, some of whom died. The “Damascus Affair” outraged Jews worldwide and several governments, including that of *Austria-Hungary, attempted to intervene. French and English Jews sent a delegation (including Sir Moses *Montefiore) to Muhammad Ali that successfully led to the release and exoneration of the nine surviving prisoners. The delegation next traveled to the *Ottoman ruler, Sultan Majid, in Istanbul, who declared the blood libel accusation absurd. This event played a role in the eventual creation of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle in *France and a heightened Jewish recognition of the need for international cooperation. A recent analysis is J. Frankel, The Damascus Affair, “Ritual Murder,” Politics, and the Jews in 1840 (1997).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Dance: Hebrew Bible: See BIBLE: MUSIC AND DANCE

Dance: Pre- and Post-State Israel. Between the first Jewish immigration waves in 1882 and 1920, there was no artistic dance company in the *Yishuv, the Jewish settlement in *Palestine, nor any aspirations to have one. The pioneers rejected classical ballet, the only artistic dance form historically practiced in Europe, as outdated and elitist. Only after World War I, with the emergence of a revolutionary modern dance in *Central Europe known as Ausdruckstanz (“dance of expression”), and the growing urban and cosmopolitan population in *Tel Aviv, could an artistic dance tradition begin. Ausdruckstanz flourished in the *Yishuv from the 1920s until the second half of the 1950s.

In 1920 Baruch Agadati presented a modern dance recital in Neve Tzedek on the outskirts of Tel Aviv. Wishing to create “Hebrew Dance,” he turned for inspiration to the dances of the *Yemenite, *Arab, and *Hasidic communities, combining western and Middle Eastern motifs. Two years later, Margalit Ornstein, who had immigrated from *Vienna, established the first dance studio in Tel Aviv; she taught Dalcroze eurythmics, Isadora Duncan’s style, and Rudolph von Laban dance theories. Rina Nikova immigrated in 1924 from *Saint Petersburg and became ballerina in the Eretz Israeli Opera, founded that year by the conductor Mordechai Golinkin. In 1933, she established the Yemenite Company, in which young Yemenite girls performed theatrical dances on biblical themes based on traditional songs and dance. The company successfully toured Europe between 1936 and 1939. The early 1930s also saw the rise of a second generation of dancers. Among them were twins Yehudit and Shoshana Ornstein, Deborah Bertonoff, Dania Levin, and Yardena Cohen.

The rise of the *Nazis to power brought highly professional dancers to the Yishuv. Among them were Tille Rössler, who had been a principal teacher at Gret Palucca’s school in Dresden, and the dancers Else Dublon, Paula Padani, and Katia Michaeli, who had danced in Mary Wigman’s company. In 1935, at the peak of her artistic success as a notable dancer and creator in the Ausdruckstanz style in Central European modern dance, Gertrud Kraus decided to immigrate to Eretz Israel where she founded the Peoples’ Dance Opera Company, which operated from 1941 to 1947. Despite opposition to classical ballet in the Yishuv, Valentina Archipova-Grossman from *Latvia founded a classic ballet studio in Haifa in 1936, training many teachers. In 1938, Mia Arbatova, a former ballerina at the Riga Opera, founded her ballet studio in Tel Aviv, where many choreographers and artists studied.

After World War II broke out, all cultural links to Europe were severed, and the dance artists in the Yishuv entered a period of cultural isolation that lasted into the early 1950s. By the end of the 1940s a third generation of dancers was performing. They included Naomi Aleskovsky, Rachel Nadav, Hilde Kesten, and Hassia Levi-Agron, who later founded the faculty of dance at the Jerusalem Academy of Music and Dance. Isolation during the war increased the need for cultural self-reliance. Side by side with universal themes about humankind and society, choreographers created dances inspired by the landscape of the country and based on biblical themes that connected modern and ancient Israel. When the State of *Israel was founded in 1948, however, artistic dance was not among the cultural endeavors supported by the government; it was still viewed as elitist, whereas folk dances were considered acceptably socialist.

The founding of Israel brought dancers from the United States such as Ruth Harris, Rina Shaham, and Rena Gluck. A visit by the American modern dancer Martha Graham in 1956, courtesy of the Baroness Bathsheba de *Rothschild, was a turning point. Dancers of the older generation were confused by her American modernist style, while many younger dancers signed up to study in Graham’s school in *New York. During the transition period between European and American influence, Sara Levi Tanai founded Inbal Dance Theatre (1949), an artistic Yemenite dance group inspired by traditional culture. During the 1950s Noa Eshkol invented the Eshkol/Wachman Dance Notation system, and Dr. Moshe Feldenkrais created his system for improving movement ability.

In ensuing years there were a number of unsuccessful attempts to establish a professional modern dance company, including the Israeli Ballet Theatre founded by Kraus and the Lyric Theatre founded by Anna Sokolow. In 1964, Bathsheba de Rothschild founded the Batsheva Dance Company with Graham as artistic advisor. The 1970s saw the establishment of several dance companies, such as Bat-Dor (1967) by de Rothschild; the Israeli Ballet (1968) by Berta Yamposky and Hillel Markman; the Kibbutz Contemporary Dance Company (1969), with artistic director Yehudit Arnon; and Koldmama (1978) by Moshe Efrati, originally employing both deaf and hearing dancers. Between 1964 and 1976, all professional dance activities in Israel took place in these companies. Israeli dancers' technical and teaching standards improved, and their tours placed Israeli dance on the global map. Batsheva and Bat-Dor, the leading companies, imported internationally known choreographers. Unfortunately, this practice limited opportunities for Israeli choreographers and local creativity diminished.

In the mid-1970s, modern dance in Israel began to show signs of weariness. The dramatic, thematic approach, as well as the movement idiom and artistic concepts, had become repetitive. At that time, several young female choreographers, who had studied abroad, brought American post-modern influences to Israel. Post-modern dance legitimized a revolt against the canons of modern American dance as performed by Israel's major dance companies. In 1981, Pina Bausch came to Israel with the Wuppertal Dance Theater for the first time, and the local dance community became familiar with the Tanztheater style. There was an immediate creative upsurge after Bausch's visit to Israel. The following year, Nava Zuckerman founded Tmu-Na Theater, and Oshra Elkayam founded Movement Theater. Fringe dance in Israel was enriched by more dancers and creators in the 1980s, including Mirali Sharon (who was among the few choreographers who created for Batsheva and Bat-Dor), Amir Kolben (the Ramle Dance Company [Tamar], later the Tamar-Jerusalem Company), and Barak Marshall Dance.

In recent decades, Israeli creators and dancers have worked both in established companies and in marginal, fringe frameworks. Among the most notable creators and companies are Ohad Naharin, an enormous influence on the young generation of Israeli choreographers, who created "gaga" – a training system for professional dancers and amateurs (Batsheva Dance Company). In 1998 Valery Panov established the Ashdod Ballet; all of its dancers are immigrants from the former *Soviet Union. The Beta Dance Troupe studies *Ethiopian dance and creates contemporary dance inspired by *folklore. Flamenco is very popular, and there are several prominent flamenco dancers such as Silvia Doran, Neta Sheazaf, and Michal Natan. In 1989, the Susan Dellal Center was founded in Neve Tzedek, directed by Yair Vardi. This central home of Israeli dance is only a few blocks from where Agadati gave his first recital in 1920.

Recent research includes R. Eshel, Dancing with the Dream – The Development of Artistic Dance in Eretz-Israel 1920–1964 (1991); G. Manor, Agadati – The Pioneer of the Modern Dance in Israel (1986); Y. Cohen, The Drum and the Dance (1963); G. Manor, The Life and Dance of Gertrud Kraus (1978); R. Sharett, A Queen without Palace: Mia Arbatova: Pioneer of Classical Ballet in Israel (2005); G. Toledano, The Story of A Company: Sara Levi Tanai and Inbal Dance Theatre (2005); and R. Gluck, Batsheva Dance Company 1964–1980: My Story (2006). RUTH ESHEL

Dance: United States. MODERN AND POST-MODERN DANCE: American Jews have had a significant impact on modern and post-modern dance in the United States as teachers, performers, choreographers, organizers, and activists. They were also heavily represented in the major twentieth-century dance companies. Solidified as a new art form in the 1930s, modern dance attempted to create an American dance style, based on the rhythms of American life.

Helen Tamiris (born Helen Becker; d. 1966), the daughter of Russian Jewish immigrants, was among the founders of American modern dance. In 1928, Tamiris was the first American dancer to tour Europe since Isadora Duncan. In addition to creating dances addressing race and social justice for her company, Tamiris also choreographed for Broadway. Other prominent American-born Jewish choreographers who also created their own troupes included *New York City natives Sophie Maslow (d. 2006), Lillian Shapero (d. 1988), and Anna Sokolow (d. 2000), as well as the younger Pearl Lang (d. 2009), born in Chicago. Before forging their own groups, each danced with the Martha Graham Company, which had a large number of Jewish dancers, including Robert Cohan, Stuart Hodes, Linda Margolis Hodes, and Bertram Ross.

New York City, the center of American modern dance in the early twentieth century, was also home to the recent influx of *Eastern European Jewish immigrants. The Henry Street Settlement House on the Lower East Side of New York City, founded by Lillian *Wald in 1893, and its theater, the Neighborhood Playhouse, established in 1915, provided an important entry into dance. Under the artistic directorship of sisters Alice and Irene Lewisohn, Henry Street offered a range of dance classes, including those of the Jewish teacher Blanche Talmud, whose students included many important American Jewish choreographers.

In the 1930s, the newly emerging modern dance milieu embraced radical leftist values. American Jewish dancers and choreographers were active in the formation of dance organizations that were dedicated to social change and to the idea that dance should be available to everyone. The New Dance Group was established in 1932 with the slogan, "Dance is a weapon in the class struggle." Jewish members of the group included Anna Sokolow, Sophie Maslow, Miriam Blecher, Nadia Chilkovsky, Eve Gentry, Hadassah Spira, Daniel Nagrin, Muriel Mannings, and Edna Ocko. In that same year, Anna Sokolow, Edith Segal, Nadia Chilkovsky, and Miriam Blecher founded the Workers Dance League. Helen Tamiris was vital in creating the Federal Dance Theater (FDT) that granted federal aid to dance during the Depression.

Throughout the first half of the twentieth century, Jewish modern dancers choreographed America, presenting visions of America's opportunity and social critiques of American society. Tamiris' Walt Whitman Suite (1934), Maslow's Dust Bowl Ballads (1941) and Folksay (1942), and Sokolow's Rooms (1955) are examples of this choreography. Jews also created works that responded to world events such as the rise of fascism. Sokolow's 1937 Slaughter of the Innocents (revised in 1943 and called Madrid, 1937), Maslow's Women of Spain (1938) choreographed with Jane Dudley, Tamiris' Adelante (1939), and Pauline Koner's Tragic Fiesta all addressed the Spanish Civil War. Most American Jewish choreographers did not focus on Jewish themes until after the *Holocaust. One exception was Benjamin Zemach, who arrived from Russia in 1927. His experiences in the Habima Theatre in Moscow, and especially his participation in the production of The Dybbuk, shaped his dance career in the United States that spanned New York and *Los Angeles. Zemach was at the forefront of what was then referred to as Jewish dance, as evident in his signature pieces Ruth and Farewell to Queen Sabbath, created between 1928 and 1932 in New York. Polish-born Nathan Vizonsky pioneered in this arena of Jewish dance in *Chicago, where he arrived in 1926. Other Jewish dancers working with Jewish themes in those years included Lillian Shapero, Lasar Galpern, Dvora Lapson, and Corinne Chochem.

In the 1940s, several Jewish dancers and choreographers arrived in the United States after escaping Nazi-occupied Europe. They included Fred Berk, Katya Delakova, Claudia Vall, Pola Nirenska, Trudy Goth, Truda Kashmann, and Hans Wierner (or Jan Veen). Judith Berg, known for her choreography and performance in the 1937 Polish film of The Dybbuk, and her husband, Felix Fibich – a performer, choreographer, and teacher dedicated to preserving Jewish gesture – arrived in 1950.

Through its dance division, the New York City 92nd Street Y played an important role in fostering modern dance as well as dance works based on Jewish themes. Fred Berk, a modern dancer from *Vienna, performed with his partner Katya Delakova at the 92nd Street Y and also established the Jewish Dance Guild there. After the 1948 establishment of *Israel, Berk worked to spread Israeli folk dance in America. He initiated the Jewish (later, Israeli) folk dance evenings at the Y in 1951 and an annual Israel Dance Festival in New York in 1952. In that year he was one of the founders of the Merry-Go-Rounders (with Doris Humphrey and Bonnie Bird), a children's dance performing group at the Y. Ruth Goodman, along with Danny Uziel, later led the Israeli dance sessions at the Y. Israeli-born Dani Dassa brought Israeli folk dance to Los Angeles, where he became a well-known teacher.

During and after the devastation of the *Holocaust, American Jewish choreographers showed increased interest in creating dances based on Jewish history, identity, and culture. Noted works created in these years included Anna Sokolow's Kaddish (1945) and Sophie Maslow's The Village I Knew (1950). *Jerusalem-born Hadassah Spira's Shuvi Nafshi (1947) was based on an excerpt from Psalm 116, "Return O My Soul." Pearl Lang's signature piece Shirah (1960) rests on a *Hasidic parable. Sokolow, Maslow, and Lang each also choreographed a version of S. Ansky's well-known play, The Dybbuk.

This attention to Jewish themes continued into the late twentieth and early twenty-first century and entered the arena of post-modern dance as well. This movement, which emerged in the 1960s, challenged modernism and the concept of what constitutes a dance. Interdisciplinary artist Meredith Monk investigated the horrors of World War II in her landmark Quarry: An Opera (1976); Jews in the Middle Ages and beyond in her film Book of Days (1988); and immigration in her film Ellis Island (1981). In the San Francisco Bay Area, Anna Halprin pioneered the arena of dance and healing, including dance in community rituals. She explored and questioned Jewish ritual and heritage in Kadosh (1971) and The Grandfather Dance (1994).

Maryland-based Liz Lerman established her cross-generational and multidisciplinary company in 1976. Lerman investigates issues of social justice and aims to build community through dance. Harvard Law School commissioned Small Dances about Big Ideas (2005), a work on the Nuremberg Trials and genocide. Lerman explores Jewish identity and tradition in works such as The Good Jew? (1991), Shehechianu (1997), 613 Radical Acts of Prayer (2007), and The Hallelujah Project (2000). Since establishing her company in 1982, Carolyn Dorfman has created numerous modern dance works on Jewish history, memory, and experience, such as Mayne Mentschen (My People, 2001), Odissea (2005), and The Legacy Project (2008). David Dorfman created his company in 1985 and has choreographed dances such as Dayeinu (1992) that investigate Jewish identity. He and choreographers Dan Froot, Stuart Pimsler, David Gordon, and Daniel Shapiro use comedy and techniques from vaudeville to challenge conceptions of Jewish men and masculinity.

Other American Jewish modern and post-modern choreographers who address, question, or critique their Jewish identity and background in the late twentieth and early twenty-first century include Tamar Rogoff, Risa Jaroslow, Victoria Marks, Amy Sue Rosen, Ellen Bromberg, Nina Haft, Beth Corning, Heidi Latsky, dance historians Judith Brin Ingber and Rebecca Rossen, and video artist Douglas Rosenberg. Arnie Zane (1948–1988), who created a company with African American choreographer Bill T. Jones, incorporated Jewish references into a few of his works.

Many modern and post-modern Jewish choreographers throughout the twentieth and early twenty-first century have felt a sense of the Jewish concept of tikkun olam*, "repairing the world," which they have expressed through social activism and their creations, regardless of whether they overtly addressed Jewish themes. Jewish choreographers who do not directly address their Jewish identity in their work, but who have expressed social messages, include Margaret Jenkins, Martha Clarke, and Los-Angeles-based modern dance pioneer, Bella Lewitsky (1916–2004).

Israeli-born choreographers who have played an important role in the United States include Ze'eva Cohen, who performed with the Anna Sokolow Dance Company before creating her own troupe and heading the Dance Program at Princeton University; Neta Pulvermacher, who formed the Neta Dance Company with peers in New York in 1986; and Zvi Gotheiner, who founded his troupe, ZviDance, in New York in 1989. Yemenite-born Israeli Margalit Oved, after performing in the Inbal Dance Company in Israel, taught in the dance program at UCLA and founded the Margalit Oved Dance Theater Company. Her son, Barak Marshall, choreographs in Israel and lectures at UCLA.

In the late twentieth and early twenty-first century, prominent non-Jewish dance companies have created works based on Jewish history and culture. One example is Paul Taylor's Klezmer Bluegrass (2005), commissioned by the Foundation for Jewish Culture (formerly the National Foundation for Jewish Culture) as part of Celebrate 350: Jewish Life in America 1654–2004. Pilobolus Dance Theatre's A Selection (1999), a collaboration with Maurice Sendak and Arthur Yorinks based on the Holocaust, is featured in the film Last Dance. In 2000, on the occasion of its fortieth anniversary, the Foundation for Jewish Culture commissioned Pilobolus Dance Theatre's Davenen.

BALLET: American Jews also played a role in the development of ballet. Impresario Lincoln Kirstein (1907–1996) founded the New York City Ballet together with choreographer George Balanchine. The renowned choreographer

Jerome Robbins (1918–1998) created numerous ballets for companies around the world during his tenure at the New York City Ballet. He also choreographed Broadway musicals and plays including West Side Story and Fiddler on the Roof (premiered 1964), based on the stories of Sholom Aleichem. His version of The Dybbuk premiered in 1974.

Allegra Kent (b. 1937) was a prominent dancer in the New York City Ballet for whom Balanchine created several roles. Other noted American Jewish ballet dancers include Muriel Bentley, Nora Kaye, Melissa Hayden, and Joanna Berman.

CHOREOGRAPHY: Leading Jewish choreographers include Eliot Feld, born in New York in 1942, who founded Ballet Tech (formerly known as the Eliot Feld Ballet) in 1974. That year, he explored his Jewish heritage in Tzaddik and Sephardic Song. In 1978, following in the social activist tradition of many American Jewish dancers, he opened a tuition-free ballet school for students in New York City's public schools. Canadian-born Julia Adams choreographed Ketubah, about a Jewish wedding, for the Houston Ballet in 2004.

Jewish choreographers in all dance forms in America have incorporated a range of approaches to Jewish themes including nostalgia, critique, and memorialization. They have choreographed on topics such as the Eastern European Jewish shtetl*, Jewish rituals and life-cycle* events, the Holocaust, the State of Israel, contemporary American Jewish life, questions of identity, and stereotypes of Jews.

For further reading, see E. Graff, Stepping Left: Dance and Politics in New York City, 1928–1942 (1997); J. B. Ingber, Victory Dances: The Story of Fred Berk, A Modern Day Jewish Dancing Master (1985); N. Jackson, Converging Movements: Modern Dance and Jewish Culture at the 92nd Street Y (2000); R. Rossen, "The Jewish Man and His Dancing Shtick: Stock Characterization and Jewish Masculinity in Postmodern Dance," in You Should See Yourself: Jewish Identity in Postmodern American Culture, ed. V. Brook (2006), 137–53; C. Schlundt, Tamiris: A Chronicle of Her Dance Career, 1927–1955 (1972); and N. S. Spiegel and L. Warren, Anna Sokolow: The Rebellious Spirit (1998).

NINA S. SPIEGEL

Daniel, Book of. In the Hebrew Bible*, the book of Daniel is in Ketuvim or Writings*; in the Septuagint*, Daniel is located in the Prophets*. Narrated in the third person, chapters 1–6 are set in the Babylonian* and Persian* courts; chapters 7–12 are a series of apocalyptic visions and revelations that are narrated in the first person. The first part of the book is replete with historical mistakes and anachronisms, whereas the second part may be set in the time of the Maccabean* revolt and Antiochus IV Epiphanes, which is probably the date for the composition of the whole book. Daniel 2:4–7:28 consists of five tales involving Jews and an apocalyptic vision; this section is written in Aramaic* and is the most important source for our knowledge of biblical Aramaic of the period (cf. Ezra 4:8–6: 18 and 7:12–26). The Dead Sea Scrolls* cite Daniel as authoritative scripture, and the "son of man" vision in 7:13 has played an important role in both Jewish and Christian apocalyptic* literature. In calculating the end of days (12:7, 11–12) the book is also most unusual, and chapter 12:2 is thought to contain the first explicit reference to resurrection* in the Hebrew Bible.

ERIC MEYERS

David, the second king of biblical Israel, was the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem in Judah; his life is depicted in heroic but not idealized terms in 1 Samuel* through 1 Kings* 2. David founded an independent state after the failure of his predecessor Saul*. He emerges in 1 Samuel 8–16 during the reign of Saul when Samuel, following divine direction, anoints him as the future king. The talented young David, "a musician and man of valor and a soldier and clever in speaking and handsome, and YHWH was with him" (16:21), is invited to Saul's court. In 1 Samuel 17, he accepts the Philistine* giant Goliath's challenge and kills him. The new hero becomes a successful military officer, befriends Saul's son Jonathan, and marries the king's daughter Michal. Jealous of David's growing popularity and fearing his ambition, Saul makes several attempts to kill him (18–20). 1 Samuel 21–26 recounts how David flees to the Judean highlands, becoming the head of an outlaw band. During this period he marries Abigail, the widow of Nabal, and takes another wife, Ahinoam. (Saul had annulled David's marriage to Michal.) Subsequently (27–30), David offers his services to Achish of the Philistine city of Gath; however, when the Philistines are about to engage Saul in battle they exclude David from their ranks, suspicious of his loyalty. Consequently, when Saul and his sons are defeated and die at Mt. Gilboa, David is absent.

David becomes the sole ruler after a successful war against the northern tribes; he captures Jerusalem* from the Jebusites, making it his capital, defeats the Philistines, and moves the ark of the covenant* to Jerusalem. A prophet*, Nathan, mediates a covenant* between YHWH and the king, under which an eternal dynasty is promised for David and his descendants (2 Sam 7).

David's decline is narrated in 2 Samuel 11–20 and 1 Kings 1–2. Nathan denounces his abuse of power in the seduction of Bathsheba* and the murder of her husband Uriah. A series of tragedies follow, including rape and murder within the royal family; the exile of David's son and chief heir, Absalom; and, after Absalom's return, his surprise coup d'état that sends David into flight across the Jordan. These disasters conclude with Absalom's defeat and death. 1 Kings 1–2 describes both an old and senile David, who is persuaded by Nathan and Bathsheba to name her son Solomon* king, and a politically ruthless David, who provides Solomon with pragmatic advice about the uses of power. Taken out of the chronological narrative and added in 2 Samuel 21–24 are uncomplimentary accounts of David's elimination of Saul's heirs and his responsibility for a plague, abridged notices about the great deeds of his warriors, and samples of poetry attributed to him (see BIBLE: POETRY).

In the Hebrew Bible and beyond, David is the paradigmatic ruler who follows YHWH's commandments* "except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite" (1 Kgs 15:5). From David's descendants would arise the ideal king ("a shoot from the stump of Jesse" [Isa 11:1] or "branch from David's line" [Jer 23:5]) to preside over a future Israelite state. This hope is based on the covenant of 2 Samuel 7:11–16 (expressed in poetic form in Psalm 89) and on the popular tradition of David as the king of Israel's golden age (ISRAELITES: KINGSHIP).

Critical scholarship at the beginning of the twenty-first century is divided on the nature of these texts and the question of their historicity. As a segment of the Deuteronomic*

History (Joshua through 2 Kings), the story of David did not take final written form until just before or during the *Babylonian Exile, four centuries or more after the events it depicts. Some scholars commonly called “minimalists” have argued that the lateness of the text and the sparseness of archeological evidence from the tenth century BCE call into question the entire narrative, which they maintain created a fictional past for the post-exilic Jewish community (e.g., T. L. Thompson, Early History of the Israelite People [1992]; P. Davies, In Search of Ancient Israel [1992]). The majority of scholars reject this approach, citing a reference to the “house of David” in a ninth-century inscription from Tel Dan, which implies the existence of a Judean dynasty founded by David, as well as other archeological evidence; they also argue for the early date of many of the sources used by the Deuteronomist (e.g., W. G. Dever, What Did the Biblical Writers Know and When Did They Know It? [2001]). Those who date sources to the reign of David or Solomon have argued that the story of David as king (or the “succession history”) should be seen as an eyewitness or near-eyewitness account. Other arguments suggest that the narrative is a collection of prose and poetic elements, including abridged references to more extensive traditions, which reflect the long-term growth of Davidic romance, legend, and folklore. Such materials are less likely to reveal historical details (D. Gunn, The Story of King David: Genre and Interpretation [1978]; S. Isser, The Sword of Goliath: David in Heroic Literature [2003]). Between the minimalists and those who see the evidence as supporting the basic biblical narrative are scholars who suggest that the account of David’s rule is historical but exaggerated (D. W. Jamieson-Drake, Scribes and Schools in Monarchic Judah [1991]).

STANLEY ISSER

David: Post-Biblical Traditions. The image of King David underwent a significant shift in post-biblical literature, mainly in *rabbinic sources (surprisingly, David is not a significant figure in the *apocryphal books of the Hebrew Bible). Rabbinic writings focus on David’s spiritual qualities; the emphasis is on David as the “sweet singer of Israel” (2 Sam 23:1), the builder of the *Temple in *Jerusalem, and the founder of the Israelite monarchy. For the Rabbis, David is also the father of the future *messiah (if not the messiah himself) and someone whose virtues are equal to those of *Moses. In clear contradiction to the biblical account, rabbinic texts praise David as a modest man, a pious person who kept all the *commandments and who devoted himself to learning Torah and composing psalms. Supplementing the biblical narratives, which detail David’s life only from his young adulthood (1 Sam 16), the Rabbis describe him as chosen by God in his mother’s womb, as a young prophet, and as a gracious shepherd. They also attribute to David the composition of the entire book of *Psalms, because his name is mentioned in that book around ninety times.

However, rabbinic interpreters could not ignore the biblical record of David’s less positive actions, especially the account about *Bathsheba and Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam 11–12). Therefore, they employed complicated exegetical techniques to justify David’s acts, or alternatively, they admitted his sins but placed much more emphasis on his remorse, punishment, penitence, and God’s forgiveness. Rabbinic treatment of David is marked by a general apologetic tendency to purge specific biblical protagonists of sin. This need to repair David’s image was reinforced for the Rabbis by the fact that David was the alleged ancestor of the contemporaneous *patriarchate in *Babylonia and the *Land of Israel.

This positive portrayal persists in post-rabbinic literature. David is among the biblical guests who are said to visit each sukkah on the holiday of *Sukkot, and his tomb on Mount Zion in *Jerusalem is still a popular pilgrimage site. The image of “David, King of Israel” is indeed “alive and vigorous,” as a famous Hebrew song affirms. For further reading, see A. Shinan, “King David of the Sages,” in From Bible to Midrash: Portrayals and Interpretative Practices, ed. H. Trautner-Kromann (2005), 53–78.

AVIGDOR SHINAN

Day of *Atonement: See HIGH HOLIDAYS; YOM KIPPUR

Days of Awe: See HIGH HOLIDAYS

Dead Sea Scrolls. The term “Dead Sea Scrolls” designates the corpus of manuscripts discovered more than sixty years ago in the Judean Desert in caves along the shore of the Dead Sea. The main body of materials comes from *Qumran, located at the northern end of the Dead Sea, 13.7 km (8.5 miles) south of *Jericho, and was discovered between 1947 and 1956. Although archeologists have periodically returned to the site, very few scrolls have been discovered since those early years. In addition to the manuscripts found in the caves, archeological excavations of the plateau immediately below the caves have revealed a complex of residential buildings. Numismatic evidence and carbon-14 dating show that the complex flourished from around 100 BCE to 68 CE when it was destroyed in the unsuccessful Jewish revolt against Rome (66–74 CE). Paleographic studies of the Hebrew writing on the scrolls and carbon-14 dating have dated a few scrolls to the third century BCE, most to the second and first centuries BCE, and some to the first century CE. This indicates that many older scrolls were brought to Qumran by those who used the buildings and hid their scrolls in the caves. The large clay food storage pots, in which some of the major scrolls were protected, are almost unique to Qumran. Cave 4 held shelves in antiquity on which scrolls were arranged. Mikvaot (ritual pools), pottery that could have served two hundred people at a time, scribal ink wells, and tefillin are some of the physical objects that might have been used by this Jewish group. Therefore, the majority of scholars link the library in the caves with the nearby community.

The scrolls were first unearthed in 1947 by Bedouin, and the Hebrew University of *Jerusalem acquired seven of the major scrolls from Cave 1. In 1965 the Shrine of the Book was constructed as a separate building in the Israel Museum to house these scrolls and others subsequently acquired by *Israel. As a result of Israel’s War of Independence that broke out in May 1948, Qumran was in Jordanian territory until 1967. Because the Bedouin continued to find scrolls and bring them to the antiquities market, the Jordanians sent an archeological team into the desert to look for more scrolls and to excavate the residential buildings. Thus, scrolls of the Judean Desert found after 1948 eventually came to the Palestine Archaeological Museum (PAM) in East Jerusalem owned by Jordan. As a result of the 1967 Six Day War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS [1956–67]), the area of Qumran reverted once more to Israel, as did East Jerusalem. The PAM was renamed the Rockefeller Museum and still maintains some of the Dead Sea Scrolls in its collection. In addition, there are Dead Sea Scrolls in Amman (including the Copper Scroll), some fragments with private collectors, and small fragments of scrolls in libraries around the world.

The history of research on the scrolls began with an international team of scholars appointed by the Antiquities Department of Jordan. They worked in the PAM piecing together the numerous fragments, guided by the continuity of the text, the appearance of the parchment, the handwriting, and the shapes of the pieces. Their work came to a virtual standstill in 1960 when the funding ran out. After 1967, Israel controlled the museum but allowed the same scholars to continue to control access to the scrolls. The international team, composed exclusively of Protestant and Catholic scholars, withheld the scrolls from view and did not publish them in a timely fashion. Scholars clamored for open access, and in 1991, the Israel Antiquities Authority appointed a new editor-in-chief of the official scrolls publication series, Discoveries in the Judean Desert (Oxford University Press). Since then, the entire corpus of scrolls, even the tiniest fragments, has been published with plates and in translation. More recently, the scrolls have been digitally photographed and made available on the web.

The contents of the manuscripts may be categorized into three main, approximately equal, divisions: biblical books, apocryphal compositions, and sectarian documents.

BIBLE: Evidence of every book of the Hebrew *Bible (Old Testament) has been found with the exception of the book of *Esther. Although many of these texts are fragmentary, others are complete scrolls. Two Isaiah scrolls, one complete, and fragments of *Leviticus and *Samuel are among the most important finds. Biblical materials at Qumran come in three varieties: proto-Samaritan, a tradition similar to the earlier Hebrew text that served as the basis of the *Samaritan Torah; proto-Septuagintal, a Hebrew version similar to that which underlies the Greek translation known as the *Septuagint; and proto-Masoretic, the version that later developed into the *Masoretic text. The rabbinic authorities of the first century CE finalized the Masoretic version in an effort to standardize the Bible and eliminate any competing traditions. It is the version seen in the Hebrew Bibles in use today. The Qumran manuscripts have helped scholars reconstruct the process of standardization that took place in the Second Temple period.

APOCRYPHA AND *PSEUDEPIGRAPHA: The apocryphal compositions are works that are similar to biblical texts but are not part of the biblical canon. They represent books that were being read generally in the Land of *Israel at the time that the Dead Sea Scrolls library was collected. Most of these books were previously unknown, whereas others were known only in Greek or Latin translations before the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Portions of *Ben Sira, Jubilees, *Enoch, and apocryphal *Daniel literature can now be read in the original Hebrew or *Aramaic.

SECTARIAN DOCUMENTS: The third division of texts has generated the most controversy. These are the documents of the sect that is usually identified with the residential buildings in the area of the Qumran caves. It was these people who produced a group of unique compositions embodying their own theology, law, eschatology, customs, prayers, hymns, and specific regulations outlining membership in their group. Many scholars have identified them with the *Essenes, a group described by the Jewish historian *Josephus and the Jewish writer *Philo of Alexandria. Both spoke about a group who lived a spiritual existence in isolation; the Roman writer Pliny the Elder placed this group at a location near the Dead Sea north of Ein Gedi.

The documents of the Jewish sectarians come in a variety of genres. The “Rule of the Community” defined membership in the sect. Admission was governed by regulations specifying the duties of a member and his gradual acceptance into full membership by a series of steps, each of which was expressed through purity laws. As a member demonstrated his careful observance of the sectarian way of life, he passed into different stages of purity that allowed him access to the pure food of the community and then to the pure drinks. Similarly he progressed in the ranks of officialdom and in the ranks of the troops preparing for the eschatological battle. If, however, he was accused of backsliding, his ritual purity was diminished and penalties were imposed. The ultimate penalty was expulsion from the sect.

The “Damascus Document” (formerly known as the Zadokite Fragments) is a two-part work, made up of a hortatory “historical” introduction followed by a compilation of laws dealing with the *Sabbath, oaths and vows, courts and testimony, *purity and impurity, and relations with non-Jews and with the perceived enemies of the sect, as well as a large number of sectarian internal procedural regulations. This document was already known from medieval copies found some hundred years earlier in the Cairo *Genizah.

The “Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness” is a description of the eschatological war that was expected to end the conflict with the enemies of the sect. The scroll describes the forces that will be arrayed one against the other as the Sons of Light, the sectarians, battle their enemies, the Sons of Darkness or the forces of evil. After a great battle lasting forty years, the Sons of Light will be victorious, and then the End of Days will be ushered in by a great messianic banquet.

The “Temple Scroll” is a text based on the Bible but reformulated to express the views of its author. It describes an idealized, huge Temple that covers practically the entire city of Jerusalem and a reformed polity headed by a righteous king. This scroll might not have been composed by the Dead Sea sect, but it was found in their library and reflects their views on many areas of Jewish law.

*Prayer, liturgy, and *poetry are represented in numerous compositions from Qumran. The “Thanksgiving Scroll” expresses the theology of the sect; parts of it may have been written by the “teacher of righteousness,” an early leader of the sect. The “Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifices” were prayers meant to be recited weekly in a cycle specific to each *Sabbath of the year. They are actually a form of early Jewish *mysticism. Other scrolls detail the liturgy that was recited on *new moons and other *festivals.

Although it is not surprising that this scripturally oriented sect produced commentaries on the Bible, their use of the biblical text was quite unusual. In Bible study sessions they produced legal rulings based on their understanding of biblical passages that often are in agreement with the priestly, Zadokite/*Sadducean approach to Jewish law known from *Second Temple times. There are also commentaries on the prophetic books, such as *Habakkuk, known as pesharim. The pesharim understand the prophetic books as pointing to contemporary events rather than referring to the time in which the prophets actually lived. In this way, the peshtarim yield information about historic events in the Second Temple era.

Numerous texts explain the theology of the sect, which maintained that there is a very sharp line between good and evil, expressed in a very strong dualism. People belong to one of two groups – the Sons of Light or the Sons of Darkness – and even in heaven, the cosmic forces of good and evil do battle with one another. In the end of days God will wage war with Belial (leader of the forces of evil), while on earth the sectarians will vanquish all evildoers with the help of the angels. Those who participate in these battles must be ritually pure members of the sect. At the same time, the sect believed in complete predestination. Therefore, the pure and righteous Qumranites had been foreordained by God to be among those who would attain salvation and live to see the messianic era. Then the world would be governed by the messiahs of *Aaron and Israel.

The “Copper Scroll,” the only manuscript not written on parchment or papyrus, is incised into a sheet of copper that was then rolled up. It describes hidden treasure, purportedly in the Judean Desert, but none of the objects it describes or their locations have ever been found. Its treasure lies rather in what can be learned about the history of the *Hebrew language from its vocabulary and philology.

With such a variety of texts representing more than nine hundred manuscripts, it would seem plausible that the identity of the sect could be delineated rather clearly. In fact, there is scholarly debate over whether the term “Essenes” applies to the sect and whether it actually dwelt at Qumran or placed the manuscripts in the adjacent caves. Some say that the sect was a celibate religious order, whereas others maintain that Qumran was the center of a group whose members lived in scattered locations throughout the Land of Israel and included married individuals as well.

The Dead Sea Scrolls are a missing link between the biblical period and the talmudic period in Judaism. As such, they provide a wealth of information about the evolution of Judaism in Second Temple times and the subsequent development of rabbinic *Judaism. They also illuminate the variegated nature of the Judaism that is the background for the development of *Christianity. The scrolls reveal how some Jewish religious concepts – for example, an intense, immediate *messianism – were translated into early Christianity. The scrolls have also contributed to the interpretation of certain *New Testament passages. In the scrolls there is evidence for various versions of the Hebrew Bible before the text took its final, standardized form. The scrolls refer to an array of legal issues that were being debated during Second Temple times; although they present the Essenes’ approach to Jewish law, they also preserve much information about the *Pharisees and Sadducees, their authors’ philosophical rivals.

Although the sectarian materials emphasize their disagreements with other Jews, these texts prove that many customs and practices of Judaism were already being widely observed before 70 CE (date of the destruction of the Second *Temple). These include the three daily prayer services, the wearing of tefillin (phylacteries), the recitation of the shema*, the form of the *festival prayers, the *blessings before and after meals, legal procedures in the *courts, *dietary laws, the Sabbath, and purity regulations. At the same time, the scrolls demonstrate that, although Jews observed the basic religious laws commanded in the Bible, understanding of the specific details of these laws differed from sect to sect. This situation obtained until, in the aftermath of the destruction of the Temple, the ancient sects were either annihilated or consolidated into what became rabbinic Judaism.

Surveys of the Dead Sea Scrolls and their significance are found in L. H. Schiffman, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls: The History of Judaism, the Background of Christianity, the Lost Library of Qumran (1994); J. VanderKam and P. Flint, The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls (2002); and Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls (2000), ed. L. H. Schiffman and J. VanderKam, 2 vols. (2000). For the texts themselves, see G. Vermes, The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English (1997); and M. G. Abegg, P. Flint, and E. Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible (1999).

LAWRENCE H. SCHIFFMAN

Death and Mourning. Traditionally, deceased individuals have been cared for by members of a hevrah kadisha (“holy society”) who prepare the body for burial according to Jewish practice. To preserve the modesty of the deceased, members of this group include both men and women. Participation in a hevrah kadisha is considered a great honor and a significant good deed. In some communities, Jewish funeral homes or non-Jewish funeral homes that follow Jewish burial traditions have replaced the hevrah kadisha.

Judaism encourages burial within twenty-four hours after death whenever possible, and certainly within three days. However, funerals do not take place on the *Sabbath, *Yom Kippur, or generally on the first day of *festivals. It is traditional for the deceased to be buried in a linen shroud; rabbinic authorities encourage the use of a simple wooden coffin (aron). Viewing the body before burial is contrary to Jewish tradition because it is considered disrespectful of the deceased. Funeral services include readings of *psalms and other biblical passages (often *Proverbs 31:10–31 for a woman) and a eulogy or eulogies by family members, friends, and/or the officiating clergy. Funeral services held at a *synagogue or funeral home conclude with the chanting of the memorial prayer, El malei rahamim (“God full of compassion”), which asks that the deceased find complete rest. At the cemetery, mourners shovel symbolic amounts of dirt on the coffin and recite the kaddish*. Judaism has traditionally opposed cremation.

A seven-day intensive period of mourning, known as shivah (from the word “seven” in Hebrew) follows the funeral and burial. During these seven days the bereaved remain at home, away from daily activities and concerns. Shivah begins with mourners sharing a “meal of consolation” prepared by friends; this reminder of life’s continuity initiates the healing process. Friends and relatives visit the house of mourning throughout shivah, offering condolences and sharing remembrances; callers often bring prepared food to relieve the bereaved of daily chores. Mourners are required by Jewish law to recite the kaddish; to make this possible, services with the required minimum of ten worshipers (minyan*) are held in the home. Although the *Sabbath counts as a day of mourning, shivah is suspended from sunset Friday to sunset Saturday, and mourners recite kaddish at synagogue services. Recognizing the demands of work and family, many contemporary liberal American Jewish communities reduce shivah observance to three days.

Traditional observances for mourners during the seven days of mourning include sitting on the floor or low furniture; rending garments; and abstention from bathing, cutting hair, shaving, wearing leather, using cosmetics, or sexual activity. In some homes mirrors are covered. Shivah ends on the morning of the seventh day. The twenty-three days after shivah complete the shloshim or thirty-day mourning period; during this time many mourners curtail activities and avoid celebrations. Those who are mourning a parent traditionally continue reciting the kaddish during communal worship for an additional ten months. See also ETHICS, MEDICAL; and YAHRZEIT. Useful sources include M. Lamm, The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning (1972); and R. L. Eisenberg, The JPS Guide to Jewish Traditions (2004). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Deborah (Judg 4–5), from the tribe of Issachar or Ephraim, “wife of Lappidoth” or, alternatively, “woman of torches,” was a *prophet, leader of Israel, and judge in the conquest and settlement period. Also named “mother in Israel” (5:7), she rendered her decisions in the hill country of Ephraim, beneath the “Palm of Deborah” (Judg 4:4). Deborah relayed God’s commandment to the general Barak to take 10,000 men to confront the troops of Sisera, who was the general of King Jabin of *Canaan. At Barak’s insistence, Deborah accompanied him into battle, although she warned him that he would be diminished through her presence, because “the Lord will deliver Sisera into the hands of a woman” (4:9). Indeed, the defeated Sisera fled to the tent of Jael, who offered him shelter and then killed him while he slept (4:17–22, 5:24–27). Deborah’s military success was followed by forty years of tranquility (5:31). “Deborah’s Song” (Judg 5), a poetic account following the narrative, is one of the earliest extant examples of Hebrew poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY) and is considered one of the most ancient biblical passages (possibly from the eleventh century BCE).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Decalogue: See TEN COMMANDMENTS

Decapolis Cities. In ancient times, these ten cities, located in modern-day Jordan and *Israel, controlled the trade route from *Arabia to *Syria. The cities traditionally include Philadelphia (Rabbath-Ammon), Raphana, Scythopolis (Beth Shean), Gadara (Umm Qais), Gerasa (Jerash), Hippos, Pella (Pehal), Kanatha (Qanawat), Dion, and Abilene, although Pliny the Elder’s list substitutes Damascus for Abilene. During the *Hellenistic period, they became centers of Greek culture; each had the right of coinage, and many of their coins call their cities “autonomous,” “free,” or “sovereign.” After the Roman conquest of 63 BCE, they came under the supervision of the *Roman governor of Syria. In the second century CE, the cities were absorbed into the Roman provinces of Syria, Palestina Secunda, and *Arabia. Although some of the cities were abandoned after the Umayyad Caliphate’s conquest in 641 CE, others were inhabited well into the Islamic period.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Demography. When the State of Israel celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of its founding in 2008, its total population was 7.3 million. Of these, 5.5 million were Jews (with an additional 300,000 non-Jews, mostly immigrants from the republics of the former *Soviet Union [FSU] who entered Israel under the framework of the Law of Return as spouses or other relatives of Jewish immigrants); about 1.5 million were *Arabs, of whom 1.2 million were Muslims, 150,000 were Christians, and 120,000 were Druze; in addition there were some other small minorities. These figures relate to Israel’s territory before the June 1967 Six Day War, plus East *Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, and the West Bank (the Jewish population figures include the approximately 275,000 Jewish residents of localities within the West Bank).

With Jewish population growth in Israel, world Jewry’s distribution has become radically different from what it was in 1948. Some eleven million Jews were left in the world after World War II and the *Shoah, in contrast to the 16.5 million before the war. The recovery of Jewish population size was quite slow. It took thirteen years for the post-war Jewish population to grow by one million and another forty-seven years to add a second million. Over the last sixty years world Jewry grew overall by 15% percent, in contrast to a 173% increase in the global population. Consequently, despite their numerical increase, Jews were only 2 per 1,000 of the world’s total population in 2008, whereas they constituted 4.5 per 1,000 in 1948. The fifteen largest Jewish communities in 2008, ranked from smallest to largest (all population figures approximate), were *Belgium (31,200), *Mexico (39,800), *Hungary (49,700), *South Africa (72,000), *Ukraine (80,000), *Brazil (96,500), *Australia (103,000), *Germany (118,000), *Argentina (194,500), *Russia (228,000), *Britain (297,000), *Canada (373,500), *France (491,500), *United States (5,275,000), and Israel (5,313,800).

Slow global Jewish population growth reflected several factors: relatively low fertility; growing rates of out-marriage of Jews with non-Jews, the majority of whose children grow up without being identified as Jews; and Jewish population aging. Two important consequences stem from these trends.

The first is that frequent out-marriages across the *Diaspora have increasingly blurred the frontiers of Jewish identification, while Jewish population definition and the effort to estimate its size have become more complex and less conclusive. The so-called core Jewish population includes those who are ready to define themselves as such in censuses and social surveys, with the addition of many others who do not readily declare their Jewish identity but have Jewish parents and do not hold an alternative religious identity. Further population belts around the core include persons of Jewish origin with a declared non-Jewish identity, all other non-Jewish members of nuclear households that contain a person of Jewish origin, and the many others who are eligible for the Law of Return, namely third-generation descendants and spouses. Today, these Jewishly connected non-Jews include many millions of people (see INTERMARRIAGE entries).

A second consequence is the significantly different patterns of Jewish population development in different regions of the world. Jewish demography has actually evolved along two different and contrasting tracks, one in Israel and the other across the Jewish Diaspora. In 2008, as noted, some 5.5 million Jews lived in Israel. This figure stands against the 650,000 Jews who lived in Israel on Independence Day in May 1948. This means a growth in the Jewish Israeli population by a factor of nearly 8.5, which is a unique feature internationally. About half of this total growth can be attributed to the balance of immigrants versus emigrants, whereas the other half reflected the balance of births and deaths. By contrast, the number of Diaspora Jews decreased from 10,850,000 in 1948 to 7,750,000 in 2008, a diminution of more than three million or nearly 30%. Part of this reduction reflects migration to Israel, but, especially during the most recent decades, it represents a growing deficit between Jewish birth rates and death rates that has emerged across the Jewish Diaspora as a consequence of low fertility, assimilation, and aging.

Jewish population distribution across major geographical regions also has changed significantly. The share found in the "Old World" – Europe, Africa, and Asia without Israel – diminished from 44% in 1948 to 30% in 1970 and 12% in 2008. The "New World" – including North and South America and Oceania – hosted 50% of world Jews in 1948 and in 1970, and 47% in 2008. Israel's share of the total Jewish population rose from 6% in 1948 to 20% in 1970, and 41% in 2008. The Jewish presence virtually disappeared from entire regions, such as *Eastern Europe and the *Balkans, the FSU in Europe and Asia, and Muslim countries in Asia and Africa. In these areas Jewish population diminished by 83 to 99% between 1948 and 2008. In *Latin America and *South Africa more moderate shrinkages occurred (approximately 25–30%). Moderate Jewish population increases occurred in Western Europe and North America (+8–11%), whereas Jews in Oceania had the highest increase (+188%). The other country with a major Jewish population increase was *Germany, where the number of Jews rose from 30,000 in 1989 to 120,000 in 2008. The main reason for these changes was international migration. There was a strong relationship between the number of Jews and their share of total population in a given country and measures of life quality and human development in the same country.

Family patterns, too, played a central role in Jewish population change. Against a current fertility rate of 2.7 children among Jewish women (regardless of marital status) in Israel, worldwide fertility stands at 1.5 Jewishly raised children. Low fertility results from later marriages, growing numbers of unmarried individuals, and increasing frequencies of divorce. Out-marriages of Jews with non-Jews generate further demographic erosion. Their frequency is quite low in *Mexico (10% or less) and rises to 20% in *Australia and South Africa; more than 30% in *Canada; more than 40% in *France, *Britain, and the larger communities in Latin America; more than 50% in the *United States; and 70–80% in the republics of the FSU – but is virtually nil in Israel. The results affect Jewish population composition by age groups. Declining percentages of children reflect low Jewish fertility levels plus those individuals lost to assimilation, while the percent of people aged sixty-five and over constantly grows. Thus, the share of the elderly among the Jewish population increased from 4% in 1948 to 12% in 2006 in Israel; from 10% in 1957 to 19% in 2001 in the United States; and from 8% in 1957 to 37% in 2002 in the Russian Republic.

The continuation of current demographic trends is likely to bring about further growth of Israel's share of the total identified Jewish population and a further shrinkage in the number of Jews in most other countries. At the same time, the faster demographic growth among Israel's Arabs is expected to generate higher shares of Muslims among Israel's total population. In 2030, about 6.9 million Jews in Israel would constitute 49% of the total Jews in the world versus 41% in 2008, and 72% of Israel's total population versus 76% in 2008.

SERGIO DELLAPERGOLA

Denmark. The first known Jewish settlement in Denmark dates to the early seventeenth century when Christian IV permitted a small community of merchants to settle in the newly founded city of Glückstadt. They were promised protection and the right to hold private religious services and maintain their own cemetery. By the 1680s there were both *Sephardic and *Ashkenazic communities in Fredericia and Copenhagen. The 1,600 Jews in Denmark in 1780 were subject to social and economic restrictions, but they were not confined to ghettos. During the final decades of the century, many of these limitations eased, and Jews were permitted to join guilds, attend universities, own real estate, and establish schools. By the early nineteenth century Danish Jews were fully emancipated, and many became active participants in Denmark's economic and cultural life (see LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA). The Great Synagogue of Copenhagen was completed in 1833.

In the early twentieth century, approximately three thousand Jewish immigrants settled in Denmark, seeking refuge from *Russia's pogroms and the Russo-Japanese War; restrictive legislation enacted in the 1920s prevented further immigration. In 1940, Denmark was occupied by *Nazi Germany as a "protectorate." Aware of Danish support for the Jewish population, the Nazis did not immediately institute anti-Jewish actions. However, as Danish anti-Nazi resistance increased, Werner Best, the German plenipotentiary in Denmark, issued orders that all Danish Jews be arrested and deported on October 1 and 2, 1943 (which coincided with *Rosh Ha-Shanah). A German diplomat made this information available to a Danish political leader, who in turn alerted the Danish resistance and the Jewish community. The result was that more than 7,000 Jews were able to flee by boat to Sweden with the significant support of their fellow Danes (see HOLOCAUST RESCUERS). Fewer than five hundred Danish Jews were arrested and deported to *Theresienstadt; of these, fifty-two, mostly elderly individuals, perished. The numbers were so small (less than 1% of Denmark's Jewish population and less than in any other country in occupied Europe) because Danish authorities were permitted to provide food and medicine to imprisoned Jews, as they did for all Danes in Nazi custody. Moreover, Danish political pressure and the regular presence of the Danish Red Cross persuaded the Nazis not to deport Danish Jews to extermination camps. After the war, Denmark remained sympathetic toward foreign Jews, allowing refugees from *Hungary and *Czechoslovakia to settle during the 1960s, as well as several thousand *Polish Jews between 1969 and 1972. In the early twenty-first century, there are approximately 7,000 Jews in Denmark; most live in and around Copenhagen. See also LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA.

For further reading, see E. E. Werner, A Conspiracy of Decency: The Rescue of the Danish Jews During World War II (2004). Map 10

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Deuteronomy, the fifth book of the Hebrew Bible and the final book of the *Torah (Pentateuch or Five Books of Moses), refers to itself several times as sefer ha-torah hazeh ("this book of the law"). In modern times it is called Devarim ("words") or sometimes by its full opening phrase, eleh devarim ("these are the words"). The English name comes from deuteronomion, the ancient Greek translation of the book's ancient Hebrew name, mishneh torah. That phrase occurs in Deuteronomy 17:18 (and Josh 8:32), where it refers to a copy of the law; however, the Greek translators understood it as "second law," because the book purports to be *Moses' repetition of the laws the Israelites received while wandering in the wilderness (see LAW: ANCIENT NEAR EAST and HEBREW BIBLE).

The bulk of Deuteronomy comprises three speeches (1:3–4:43, 4:44–28:68, and 29–30) that Moses is said to have given before his death. They are followed by a poem (32) and a series of blessings (33); the book concludes with the report of Joshua's appointment and the death of Moses. In its overall structure, Deuteronomy resembles ancient *Near Eastern vassal treaties, which typically begin by naming the suzerain king and then recounting his beneficent deeds (cf. 1–4:40). After that, the vassal's obligations, which typically include loyalty and support for his overlord, are enumerated (cf. 4:4–26), followed by provisions for depositing the treaty document in a temple (cf. 31:26) and reading it periodically (31:10–13). Finally, the gods are invoked as witnesses (cf. 4:26, 30:19, 31:28, 32:1) and a series of blessings and curses proclaimed (cf. 28). The book's commandment to love God (6:5) comes from that context, in which similar terminology is used as a metaphor for loyalty.

It has been recognized since antiquity that Moses could not have written everything in Deuteronomy, especially its description of his death (34:5–12). By the Middle Ages, the authorship of other passages (e.g., 1:1 and 3:11) was also questioned. In 1805, Wilhelm deWette adopted an insight first articulated by several early *Church Fathers, who connected Deuteronomy with the book discovered in the Jerusalem *Temple during the reign of *Josiah, a king of *Judah (2 Kgs 22–23). This was the first time that a book was considered to be the repository of divine *revelation, an important development in the history of religion. Josiah's reliance on that book marks the beginning of the process of canonization; that is, a book's elevation to the status of Scripture. It also provides a firm date (ca. 621 BCE) for the appearance of a biblical book, which can then be used for assessing when other biblical books were written, depending on whether or not they were familiar with the ideas in Deuteronomy.

Although Deuteronomy claims to be a summary and repetition of earlier biblical books, its legal provisions differ from those found elsewhere. One of its key teachings is the call for worship to be centralized at "the place where God will set His name" (12:11, cf. 14:23, 16:2, 6, 11, and 26:2). According to 2 Kings 23, Josiah carried out that mandate by destroying all Judean places of worship outside of *Jerusalem. The restriction of worship to a single sanctuary had significant consequences, including making it impractical to treat animal slaughter as a religious ritual (compare Lev 17:3–4, cf. Deut 12:15). Deuteronomy's commitment to centralizing worship, therefore, led it to "secularize" activities that other books treated as sacred.

Deuteronomy also insists that all Israelites abide by restrictions that other books apply only to *priests, such as not shaving the corner of their beards or not eating animals that were killed by other animals or died of natural causes (Deut 14:1, 21; cf. Levi 21:5, 22:8). In this, it imputes to all Israelites the level of sanctity that other biblical traditions apply to priests alone. It also extends regulations beyond what earlier sources required. For example, female slaves are to be freed after six years' service just like males (Deut 15:12; cf. Exod 21:2–7), and whoever finds a lost animal must care for it until it is claimed (Deut 22:1–3; cf. Exod 23:4). Some scholars also believe that Deuteronomy's statements about the place where God will set His name shows heightened theological sophistication in comparison to other biblical books.

Although Deuteronomy insists that worship be centralized, it never names Jerusalem as God's chosen place. This has led many scholars to suspect that it actually originated in the northern kingdom. They support that hypothesis by noting several similarities between Deuteronomy and the northern prophet Hosea (cf. Deut 8:12–14, 11:28, and 12:2 with Hos 4:13 and 13:6, 14), for whom *love was also a major theme; its reference to Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal (Deut 27), which are located in the north; and its dependence on the Pentateuch's E source, which is widely thought to have originated in the northern kingdom. If that is true, it is possible that Deuteronomy was brought to Jerusalem after Israel fell to the *Assyrians in 721 BCE and then hidden during the reign of the wicked king Manasseh. Some scholars think that it originated within the ancient *wisdom movement because several of its teachings resemble passages in *Proverbs (e.g., 1:12, 19:14, 25:13–16, and 23:22).

Deuteronomy has a distinctive, sermonic style that uses many standardized words and phrases. Similar features are found in other biblical books (most notably *Jeremiah), suggesting that they were edited by followers of the deuteronomic school. Deuteronomic influence is especially pronounced in *Joshua, *Judges, *Samuel, and *Kings, which are therefore called the "Deuteronomic History." Some scholars believe that those books may once have constituted an independent corpus introduced by Deuteronomy. According to this line of thought, Deuteronomy 1–4:40 and 31–34 were added later, when Deuteronomy was detached from this collection and joined to the other books of the Pentateuch. For further reading, see J. H. Tigay, The JPS Torah Commentary: Deuteronomy (1996); and M. Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic School (1972).

FREDERICK E. GREENSPAHN

Devekut literally connotes "cleaving" or "clinging to." The verbal root DVK appears several times in biblical literature to denote proximity of an individual or the people of Israel to *God (Deut 4:4, 13:5, etc.). It was not used systematically in classical *rabbinic literature, but in medieval and modern Hebrew it became the central term (especially in the noun form, devekut) to describe communion with God. It was used by the Gerona kabbalists, especially *Nahmanides, and later by Rabbi Isaac of Acre (died first half of the fourteenth century) and others in ways approaching the Christian meaning of unio mystica. The term also frequently appears in Jewish ethical works (*sifrut musar) to signify a supreme achievement of devotion. G.*Scholem maintained that descriptions of devekut in *kabbalistic literature do not denote a full union with God, but I. Tishby, M. Idel, and others have pointed out contexts in which the term is indeed used for supreme union. Scholem also maintained that the use of this term to indicate the initial, rather than final, state of a person's approach to God was introduced by early *Hasidic teachers in the late eighteenth century. However, there are examples of this usage in pre-Hasidic ethical literature. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1954); I. Tishby, The Wisdom of the Zohar (1989); and M. Idel, Mystical Union and Monotheistic Faith, ed. B. McGinn and M. Idel (1989).

JOSEPH DAN

Dhimmi: This Arabic term for "protected persons" referred to Jews and Christians and other tolerated minority groups in Muslim lands. As long as they submitted to Muslim supremacy as humble tribute (jizya) bearers, they were not only to be tolerated but were also entitled to the protection of the Muslim commonwealth. The rules governing the status of the dhimmi were enumerated in a document known as the Pact of Umar. This model treaty with a minority community was probably based on the capitulation agreement in 639 between the second caliph, Umar ibn al-Khattab, and the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem, Sophronios; this document probably assumed its final form during the caliphate of Umar II (717–20). In addition to poll and land taxes, dhimmis were not to bear arms, ride horses, or use normal riding saddles on their mounts. They were not to build new synagogues or churches or repair old ones. They were not to pray too loudly or hold religious processions in Muslim streets. They were never to raise a hand against a Muslim and had to wear clothing that set them apart. See also ISLAM AND JUDAISM; N. Stillman, "The Jewish Experience in the Muslim World," in J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin, eds., The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture (2010), 85–112.

Diaspora, from the Greek word for "dispersion" or "scattering," refers to the geographical diffusion of the Jewish people over the ages and more generally to Jewish communities living outside the Land of *Israel. Since the destruction of their First *Temple and the exile of much of the population of the southern kingdom of *Judah to *Babylonia in 586 BCE, most Jews have lived in the Diaspora, as minority communities living among a range of cultures on every continent. Although the Hebrew word galut ("exile") has historically been seen as equivalent to "Diaspora," golah is a neutral alternative. In recent decades the Hebrew word tefutsot ("scattered") has been increasingly accepted. Thus, the Hebrew name for the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in *Tel Aviv is Beit Ha-Tefutsot (see also DEMOGRAPHY).

Dietary Laws (kashrut). Food that is permitted according to halakhah* is referred to as kosher ("fit"); unfit food is considered treif, a *Yiddish word derived from the *Hebrew terefah ("torn"). The laws of kashrut are complex; they originate in biblical sources and were further developed over time. No overarching principle underlies the broad range of laws related to eating in the Hebrew *Bible and *rabbinic literature. Certain foods are prohibited outright: These include animals that do not have cloven hoofs or do not chew their cud (Deut 14:7–8); a variety of birds (Lev 11:13–19; Deut 14:7–8, 12–18); fish without fins and scales (Lev 11:9–12); and most insects (Lev 11:20–23). Permitted species are referred to as "pure" (tahor) and prohibited species as either "impure" (tamei) or "abomination" (sheketz); no explanation is provided for these categorizations. Jewish writers from antiquity to modernity have offered their own rationales, often relating to hygiene or *ethics, but the Bible's intent is impossible to ascertain (see also ECOLOGY).

The Bible also prohibits the consumption of "pure" animals that have not been prepared properly. Specifically, biblical injunction forbids the consumption of carrion (nevelah) (Lev 17:15, 22:8; Deut 14:21); this prohibition became the basis for rabbinic laws of ritual slaughter (shehitah) as the only means of rendering meat permissible. Biblical law also prohibits consuming an animal killed by another animal (terefah, literally, "torn apart") (Exod 22:30; Lev 17:15, 22:8). Rabbinic tradition expanded this prohibition to include any animal that had a fatal injury or sickness at the time of ritual slaughter, and methods were developed to check for such conditions.

In addition to prohibiting numerous species, the Bible prohibits the consumption of specific parts of permitted animals, each part for its own reason. All blood is forbidden (Lev 3:17, 7:26–7, 17:10–14; Deut 12:16, 23) on the grounds that "the life of the flesh is in the blood" (Lev 17:11; cf. v. 14; Deut 12:23). In addition, animal fat called helev may not be consumed (Lev 3:17, 7:23–25). The sciatic nerve (gid hanashev) is forbidden in Genesis 32:33 in commemoration of the patriarch *Jacob's injury at the hands of the mysterious "man" who wrestled with him one night.

The rabbinic tradition is responsible for the broad application of the prohibition of boiling a kid in its mother's milk (Exod 23:19, 34:26; Deut 14:21). In rabbinic literature, "a kid" is taken to represent any meat and poultry (excluding fish and grasshoppers), "its mother's milk" includes any dairy product whatsoever, and "boiling" is equivalent to any form of cooking or consumption. Moreover the Rabbis established additional restrictions to prevent consuming meat and dairy together, such as not placing them on the same table. As Jewish tradition evolved through the medieval period, other laws of this sort were introduced or expanded. Today, most rabbinic authorities require waiting between one and six hours (depending on the community's *custom) before eating any dairy products after having eaten meat. Also common is using separate dishes, pots and pans, sponges, sinks, and the like for meat and dairy, with a great deal of variation in practice among communities and individual households. No explicit reason is given in the Bible or rabbinic tradition for separating meat and milk, but theories abound. Some believe it was a response to pagan ritual practices. Others hold that milk, like blood, was seen as a life source and that it was considered unethical to mix it with meat, which symbolizes death.

According to the dietary laws all produce is potentially permissible, but a number of unrelated biblical laws limit its consumption. The law of "mixed species" (kilayim) prohibits sowing a field or vineyard with different types of seeds (Lev 19:19; Deut 22:9–11). The rabbinic tradition elaborates on the status of the resultant produce, in certain cases forbidding its consumption. The biblical law of "uncircumcised" fruit (orlah) prohibits consuming fruit picked from a tree in the Land of *Israel within three years of its planting (Lev 19:23). According to rabbinic interpretation of "fourth-year planting" (neta revai), fruit in the fourth year of a tree's life may only be eaten in *Jerusalem unless it is “redeemed” (Lev 19:24); only in the fifth year is fruit permitted unconditionally (19:25). Traditional Jews in Israel continue to observe these laws.

Several dietary laws are related to the ancient *Temple cult and the biblical requirement of giving tithes to *priests and Levites (Num 18:21–24; Deut 14:22–29). It is not permitted to eat produce from the land of Israel from which the appropriate tithes have not been separated (tevel). Furthermore, food set apart for priests may not be eaten by those who are not priests (Lev 22:10–15; Num 18:8–19, 25–32). Today food separated as priestly tithes is simply discarded; there is no genealogical distinction among Jews with regard to dietary laws. Also related to the Temple cult is a law restricting the consumption of grains from the spring crop (hadash – literally, “new” grain) until after the offering of the *omer sacrifice in the Jerusalem Temple on the second day of *Passover (Lev 23:14). There is a difference of rabbinic opinion as to whether this law applies in the *Diaspora; traditional Jews in Israel wait until after the second day of Passover before consuming new grain.

A rabbinic injunction against consuming the wine, oil, milk, and bread of Gentiles (M. Avodah Zarah 2:3, 5–6) is based partly on suspicions about the potential admixture of forbidden substances into these products and partly on a general desire to avoid contact with Gentiles, as when drinking together. Subsequent Jewish tradition, as promulgated in the *Talmud, by medieval rabbinic authorities, and also in modern communities, has variously limited and expanded these and other such restrictions. Much of the permissiveness in this area among some medieval and modern communities stems from the conviction that contemporary Gentiles are not to be mistrusted or avoided in the way that their predecessors were. Still, many Jewish communities maintain a high level of restriction with regard to foods not prepared or supervised by Jews.

Helpful resources include S. Dresner and S. Siegel, Jewish Dietary Laws (1980); L. Stern, How to Keep Kosher: A Comprehensive Guide to Understanding Jewish Dietary Laws (2004); and see ECOLOGY. JENNY R. LABENDZ

Dina de-Malkhuta Dina. This rule, “the law of the land is the law,” declares that the laws of a country of residence are binding on Jewish inhabitants. This dictum, attributed to the third-century *Babylonian *Amora, Samuel, had important legal and political ramifications for the relationship of Jews with Gentiles throughout the *Middle Ages. It was applied to monetary, civil, and real estate laws of host countries, but not to ritual or personal status laws.

Samuel’s principle appears several times in the Babylonian *Talmud (Gittin 10b, Nedarim 28b, Bava Kamma 113a, Bava Batra 44b) without legal sources or justification. Later rabbinic authorities sought grounding for it. An anonymous *geonic responsum (Babylonia, ninth to tenth century) cited *Nehemiah 9:37 as proof that obedience to temporal rulers is based on divine will (Teshuvot ha-Geonim, no. 66, ed. Assaf (1942). *Rashi saw the source in a generally recognized obligation to maintain social order (commentary on Gittin 10b). *Maimonides and Rashbam (France, twelfth century) rooted the principle in the notion of a political contract between residents and ruler (Mishneh Torah, “Theft” 5:18; on Bava Batra 54b). Rabbenu Nissim of Gerona (fourteenth century) asserted that a sovereign has territorial hegemony over all residents (on Nedarim 28a). Rabbi Yom Tov ibn Asevilla (Ritva, fourteenth-century Seville) contended that there is a legal equivalence between non-Jewish monarchs and Jewish sovereigns (on Ketubbot 52b). The *Tosafists of Franco-Germany extended the scope of this rule beyond the decree of sovereigns to argue that even customary law was authoritative (on Bava Batra 55a). These explanations provided internal justification for non-Jewish legal authority and played an important role in post-medieval debates about political *emancipation and citizenship.

BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Dinah, the daughter of *Jacob and *Leah, was born after her parents had six sons (Gen 30:21, 46:15). When Jacob was camped by the city of *Shechem, Dinah went to meet some of the local women. Shechem, the son of Hamor, the city’s founder, saw Dinah and had sexual intercourse with her (modern interpreters disagree on whether the relationship was consensual). Shechem fell in love with Dinah and initiated marriage negotiations between Jacob and Hamor. A condition for the marriage was the *circumcision of the adult males in Hamor’s community. Dinah’s brothers Simeon and Levi took advantage of the circumcision and killed the Hamorite adult males when they were in a weakened state and, with their brothers, took their possessions, including the women and children.

Genesis 34 never indicates how Dinah felt about Shechem or the events that surround her. The text says, “Simeon and Levi . . . took Dinah out of Shechem’s house,” indicating Dinah and Shechem lived together for several days. Jacob accused Simeon and Levi of making Jacob and his household “odious to the inhabitants of the land,” but they replied, “Should our sister be treated like a whore?” The biblical narrator appears to agree that the event brought disgrace to the family: Even if the sexual relationship was consensual, *Israelites must form unions with those inside their patrilineal group (endogamy) rather than those outside of it (exogamy). Dinah’s story also illustrates male control of family honor as ideologically expressed in the virginity of unmarried women. NAOMI STEINBERG Displaced Persons or She'erit Hapletah (“surviving remnant”), emerged from the catastrophe of the *Holocaust to form a vibrant, active, and fiercely independent community that played a prominent role in diplomatic negotiations leading to the creation of the State of *Israel.

Immediately following the liberation of *Germany by the victorious Allied forces on May 8, 1945, the roads were filled with up to ten million forced laborers, prisoners of war (POWs), and other displaced persons (DPs) who desired to return home. According to statistics prepared by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA), there were 1,488,007 DPs in Germany, *Austria, and *Italy immediately after the war; of these, 53,322 or 3.6 percent were Jews. Allied policy defined a displaced person “as any civilian who because of the war was living outside the borders of his or her country and who wanted to but could not return home or find a new home without assistance.” Displaced persons were initially divided into categories by place of origin. At that time, Germany and Austria were divided into American, British, and Soviet zones of occupation, with a small area in the southwest of Germany as a French zone of occupation. The majority of the Jewish population, perhaps some 35,000 out of 50,000, was in the American zone of occupation in Germany, many of them around Munich.

Soon after liberation, Jewish survivors began to search for family members, although most found that few had survived. For those Jewish DPs who made the decision to remain in Germany, the majority chose to live in a DP camp (generally German military barracks, former POW and slave labor camps, tent cities, industrial housing, and the like); approximately 15,000 German Jewish survivors chose to rebuild their pre-war communities in German cities. Those survivors who remained in the camps faced deplorable conditions: poor accommodations, no plumbing, no clothing, rampant disease, continuing malnourishment, and a lack of any plan on the part of the American military. Of the approximately 50,000 Jewish survivors at the time of liberation, many thousands perished within the first weeks after liberation from complications arising from disease, starvation, and the poor camp conditions.

The Jewish survivors organized quickly among themselves to advocate for their needs. In the summer of 1945, the Central Committee of Liberated Jews formed in the American zone under the leadership of Samuel Gringauz and Zalman Grinberg, and the Central Committee of Liberated Jews was organized in the British zone, under the leadership of Josef Rosensaft. The reports of continuing deprivation and poor recovery support sent by the DPs and Jewish chaplains eventually prompted American officials to take a greater interest in their problems. President Truman dispatched Earl Harrison to survey conditions; in his scathing report to Truman, Harrison concluded that we are "treating the Jews as the Nazis treated them except that we do not exterminate them." He proposed that Jews, who until then had been forced to live with other national groups and former collaborators, be separated in their own camps. He also proposed that 100,000 immigration certificates to *Palestine be granted immediately to the Jewish DPs to resolve their refugee status. After Harrison's report, American authorities, under the leadership of General Eisenhower, worked to ameliorate conditions for Jewish DPs, moving Jews to separate camps and agreeing to the appointment of an Advisor for Jewish Affairs.

With the arrival of more than 100,000 Jews fleeing continued persecution and *antisemitism in *Eastern Europe, the Jewish DP population had reached 250,000 in Germany, Italy, and Austria by the beginning of 1947 (approximately 185,000 were in Germany, 45,000 in Austria, and 20,000 in Italy.) The surviving population had a highly youthful demographic: Reports and surveys consistently estimated that more than half the Jewish DPs, and sometimes as many as 80%, were between the ages of fifteen and thirty. In the absence of families, many survivors quickly created new families, as evidenced by the many weddings and the remarkable birthrate among the surviving population in the first year after liberation.

While still living in a transitional situation and hoping for the possibility of emigration, DPs succeeded in creating a dynamic community in hundreds of DP camps and communities across Germany, Italy, and Austria. With the assistance of representatives from UNRRA, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Jewish Agency, and other organizations, schools were established throughout the DP camp. The largest camps, including Landsberg, Feldafing, and Föhrenwald in the American zone of Germany, and *Bergen-Belsen in the British zone, boasted an active social and cultural life, with a flourishing DP press, theaters, active *Zionist youth movements, athletic clubs, historical commissions, and *yeshivot testifying to the rebirth of Orthodox *Judaism. The DPs took an active role in representing their own political interests: Political parties (mostly Zionist in nature, with the exception of the Orthodox *Agudat Israel) administered camp committees and met at annual congresses of the She'erit Hapletah. The Zionist youth movements, with the assistance of emissaries from *Palestine, created a network of at least forty agricultural training farms throughout Germany on the estates of former Nazis, demonstrating their ardent desire for immigration to *Palestine.

The Harrison report linked the resolution of the Jewish DP situation with the situation in Palestine, thereby elevating the diplomatic implications of the Jewish DP political stance. International observers from the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry and the United Nations deemed DP Zionist enthusiasm central to the resolution of the political conflict over Palestine. As their stay dragged on in Europe, DPs staged mass protests condemning the British blockade of Palestine and participated in the illegal immigration (aliyah bet) movement to Palestine, most noticeably in the Exodus Affair of 1947 (see BRITISH MANDATE OVER PALESTINE).

Eventually, the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) recommended that the problem of the 250,000 Jewish DPs be dealt with through the partition of Palestine. After the passage of the UN Partition Plan (November 29, 1947) and the creation of the State of Israel in May 1948 (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: FOUNDING OF THE MODERN STATE), approximately two-thirds of the DP population immigrated to the new state, with a sizable percentage of the younger segment fighting in the 1948 war. Most of the remainder went to the United States, which had only become a realistic immigration option after passage of the Displaced Persons Act in 1948 and the amended DP Act of 1950, which authorized 200,000 DPs (Jewish and non-Jewish) to enter the United States. By 1952, more than 80,000 Jewish DPs had immigrated to the United States under the terms of the DP Act and with the aid of Jewish agencies. Almost all of the DP camps were closed by 1952.

Studies of Jewish DPs in the American and British zones include Z. Mankowitz, Life Between Memory and Hope: The Survivors of the Holocaust in Occupied Germany (2002); and H. Lavsky, New Beginnings: Holocaust Survivors in Bergen-Belsen and the British Zone in Germany, 1945–1950 (2002). See also A. J. Patt, Finding Home and Homeland: Jewish Youth and Zionism after the Holocaust (2008); and A. Grossmann, Jews, Germans, and Allies: Close Encounters in Occupied Germany (2007). On post-war refugee diplomacy, see A. Kochavi, Post-Holocaust Politics: Britain, the United States, and Jewish Refugees, 1945–1948 (2000).

AVINOAM J. PATT

Disputations: See MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; NAHMANIDES

Disraeli, Benjamin (1804–1881) was a British politician and writer. Celebrated as a dandy, novelist (eighteen novels in all), wit, and vocal Member of Parliament, he served three times as Chancellor of the Exchequer and twice as Prime Minister, in 1868 and again from 1874 to 1880. He is the only person of Jewish descent to have served as Britain's prime minister. Although converted in 1817, Disraeli was seen (and attacked) as a Jewish outsider. Yet he skillfully exploited his ethnicity, as in his claim that Judaism's "racial" heritage (as well as his own) created the foundation of enlightened modern thought. When he spoke in favor of the Jewish Disabilities Bill in 1847, he argued that Christianity is "completed Judaism."

With a group of "radical Tories" who criticized their party from within, Disraeli supported the Chartists in their 1839 protest. From 1843 he was associated with the "Young England" movement, promoting its romantic traditionalism (and an alliance of the aristocracy with the working class) in such novels as Sybil: or the Two Nations (1845), a critique of industrialism; Coningsby (1844); and Tancred (1847). The latter two works include a character named Sidonia, a wealthy and influential *Sephardic Jew whose political and historical wisdom echoes the views of the author.

As prime minister, Disraeli arranged the British purchase of the Suez Canal in 1875 and persuaded Queen Victoria to accept the title of Empress of India in 1876. He was named Earl of Beaconsfield and elevated to the House of Lords in 1878. Recent scholarship includes S. Weintraub, Disraeli (1993); T. M. Endelman and T. Kushner, eds., Disraeli's Jewishness (2002); and A. Kirsch, Disraeli (2008).

RICHARD STEIN

Divorce: Historical Development. Biblical and rabbinic traditions view divorce, the legal termination of a *marriage, as a tragic event. BT Gittin 90b quotes the biblical prophet Malachi 2:13–14 in support of the assertion, "If a man divorces his first wife even the altar sheds tears." Nevertheless, marital breakdown is a reality, and both Israelite custom and rabbinic legislation (halakhah*) permitted the dissolution of marital bonds.

Details of how and why a marriage should be dissolved do not appear in the Hebrew *Bible. Deuteronomy 24:1–4, the single biblical legal text on divorce, considers only the particular circumstances in which a man seeks to remarry someone to whom he had previously been married. This case, as well as indirect information (e.g., the departure of the Levite's wife in Judges 19:2), suggests that women as well as men could terminate a marriage. Isaiah 50:1 mentions a bill of divorce, an indication that written documents may have been a part of some marriages and divorces, especially those of the well-to-do (see ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY LIFE).

Tractate Gittin (Bills of Divorce) in the *Mishnah and *Talmud delineates the halakhic parameters of divorce. The salient feature of divorce in rabbinic *Judaism is its unilateral nature: Just as marriage is constructed as a man's acquisition of a wife, so divorce is understood as a man's dismissal of what he had acquired. A divorced woman receives her get (divorce document) from her former husband, but she cannot divorce him or be divorced from him if he is unwilling to end the marriage. In the contemporary era, this inequality continues to be a significant disability for women in Orthodox and Ultra-Orthodox communities (see AGUNAH; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX; JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX).

In response to some of these inequities, rabbinic halakhah introduced various protections for women into the marriage process. To address women's economic vulnerability in case of divorce or widowhood, a husband was obligated to promise his wife a financial settlement in the ketubbah (marriage contract). Rabbinic requirements that a get be written with permanent ink on an enduring surface in a standard form, including the names of the man, the woman, and the date, shielded a woman against later claims that her divorce was not valid. Similarly, if a man canceled a get without informing his wife, his marriage could be annulled by the court; a man who falsely claimed he issued a get under duress could be subject to corporal punishment. These were protections for women against financial blackmail from ex-husbands, and they also were ways of guarding against children of a later marriage being declared illegitimate (mamzerim), a highly complicated and irrevocable status in halakhah. The need for such rulings is also indicative of a divorced woman's unequal and vulnerable status.

The Rabbis ruled that, although a husband may divorce his wife for vaguely defined "unseemly matters," he must divorce her if she commits a sexual transgression. If a wife is divorced for a sexual or religious infraction, including refusing conjugal relations, her husband is generally not obligated to make the promised ketubbah payment. Sometimes a woman would deliberately refuse to immerse in the mikveh following her state of niddah, precluding marital relations, to engineer a way out of an uncongenial marriage, even though this meant losing her financial settlement. R. *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenberg tried to combat this stratagem in thirteenth-century *Ashkenaz by ruling that a moredet, a rebellious wife, had to give up not only her ketubbah but also all personal property and private wealth that she had inherited or acquired through her business undertakings.

The Talmud does allow certain conditions when a woman may request the rabbinic court (beit din) to compel her husband to divorce her; an example is a childless marriage (see INFERTILITY). By the period of the *Geonim, women were also successful in petitioning the court to compel a divorce if a husband had a repulsive physical condition or violated his marital obligations. Some authorities were sympathetic to women who claimed sexual incompatibility or spousal abuse.

Evidence from the Cairo *Genizah indicates that in medieval Muslim lands some Jews did not follow the unilateral rabbinic ketubbah issued in the husband's name, but used an alternate marriage contract originating in the Land of *Israel based on a statement of mutual obligations. These contracts defined marriage as a partnership and promised a wife the right to initiate divorce proceedings if she found herself unable to live with her husband; this ketubbah was unknown among Jews in Christian countries and did not survive in mainstream Jewish practice.

The medieval Jewish communities of *France and *Germany enacted important reforms in divorce law. R. *Gershom of Mainz (eleventh century) is credited with ruling that a man could not divorce his wife against her will, an indication of the high status of women in this milieu. A thirteenth-century innovation declared that divorce was a public matter requiring approval by community representatives as well as by the couple involved; this development protected women by making divorce more difficult to obtain.

For further reading, see R. Biale, Women and Jewish Law (1995); Z. W. Falk, Jewish Matrimonial Law in the Middle Ages (1966); M. Friedman, "Marriage as an Institution: Jewry under Islam," in The Jewish Family: Metaphor and Memory, ed. D. Kraemer (1989), 31–45; A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2004); J. R. Baskin, "Male Piety, Female Bodies: Men, Women, and Ritual Immersion in Medieval Ashkenaz," Journal of Jewish Law 17 (2007): 11–30.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Documentary Hypothesis. See BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP

Dov Ber of Międzyrzecz (d. 1772), known as the Maggid (preacher) of Międzyrzecz, was the best known and most influential disciple of Israel *Baal Shem Tov (the Besht), the founder of the *Hasidic movement. In 1760, after the Besht's death, Dov Ber established, in Międzyrzecz, Poland, the first Hasidic court, in which the foundations of a Hasidic community were outlined. His meeting with the Besht is described in Shivhei ha-Besht (The Praises of the Besht [1815]), as an encounter between two mystics who dedicated themselves to the study of ancient Hebrew texts. The conduct of Dov Ber's court is described in the autobiography of the philosopher Salomon *Maimon, who spent time there in his youth. The Maggid, like his teacher, did not write books, but his sermons were collected by his disciples and published in several volumes, the best known of which is Maggid devarav le-Yaakov (Preaching to [the Sons] of Jacob [1781]). The unusual group of charismatic, inspiring leaders who came out of his court and established the network of Hasidic communities in the last decades of the eighteenth century included Elimelech of Lizhensk, Levi Isaac of Berdichev, Schneur ben Baruch *Zalman of Liady, and others. For further reading, see R. Shatz, Hasidism as Mysticism (1992).

JOSEPH DAN

Drama: See entries under THEATER

Dreyfus Affair is a landmark event in the histories of modern *France and of European *antisemitism. In 1894, Captain Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish army officer, was falsely charged with treason. This sensational accusation and the guilty verdict of a closed-door military tribunal resulted in the formal court-martial and degradation of Dreyfus in 1896. Journals that appeared overnight enflamed public opinion, splitting the nation into pro- and anti-Dreyfusard camps and elevating disputes over Dreyfus's guilt into an international media affair. The Dreyfus Affair reinforced traditional distinctions in class and party that had divided French society since the end of the French Revolution and strengthened powerful affiliations among the military, the church, and the state. New social designations such as the "intellectual" and the "nationalist" emerged to define public spokespersons in the pro- and anti-Dreyfus camps.

Caught in the tense fray, the "Jew" became the stereotypical focal point for both sides. At once an exemplar for the defense of les droits de l'homme ("the rights of man") and a scapegoat for the ills of the Republic, including financial scandals, the "Jew" also became the centerpiece of new forms of antisemitic propaganda that combined past prejudices with new fears. After much public pressure to appeal the case, handwriting experts discounted clear evidence of forged documents, and a second guilty verdict was returned.

The victimized Dreyfus continued his solitary confinement on Devil's Island and was fully exonerated only in 1906.

Emmanuel *Levinas considered the Dreyfus Affair the "great psychological turning point" for modern *emancipated Jewry. Although the case ended in the triumph of morality, it also revealed the fragility of reason in modern democracies and suggested the need for a new vigilance among assimilated Jews in modern nations. The idea of the "Jew" that emerged during the Dreyfus Affair – an idea at once religious, ethnic, racial, and cultural – created new socio-political relationships for Jews, their supporters, and their enemies. Bernard Lazare, the "first Dreyfusard" and one of very few outspoken Jews to support Dreyfus's appeal, went on to battle Jewish poverty and oppression throughout *Eastern Europe. The writer Émile Zola, one of Dreyfus's most celebrated intellectual supporters, condemned government-sponsored discrimination; the Dreyfus Affair figures significantly in Marcel Proust's magisterial novel, À la recherche du temps perdu (1913–1927). Witnessing the degradation of Dreyfus, Theodore *Herzl conceived the *Zionist project in *Palestine as a response to what he believed was widespread and ineradicable European antisemitism. French leftist anarchists and right-wing reactionaries united in antisemitic nationalism with long-term and devastating effects (see ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE).

The Dreyfus Affair challenged the democratic culture of Western Europe, the limits of tolerance, and definitions of national identity. It helped shape legislation in France to separate state and religion that was signed into law in 1905. The French secular state that grew from this legislation maintains unique characteristics to the present day. Recent scholarship includes M. Winock, Nationalism, Anti-Semitism, and Fascism in France (1998); and R. Harris, Dreyfus: Politics, Emotion, and the Scandal of the Century (2010).

EVLYN GOULD

Dualism: In Ancient Judaism. The Latin duo [two] postulates two irreducible principles, one good and one evil, as the ultimate causes of the world and its constitutive elements. Ancient Judaism used dualistic language but never adopted a full dualistic system integrating cosmic, ethical, and temporal dimensions. The Hebrew *Bible contains dualistic elements, but no dualistic doctrine, because *God always remains the unchallenged authority. In the creation narrative, God alone acts: Light and darkness are opposed, but darkness is never considered an autonomous source of *evil (Gen 1:2–4; cf. Isa 45:7). On the ethical level, humankind is not divided between two camps, good and evil; rather, human beings are responsible for their own decisions (Deut 30:15–20; Ezek 18). In terms of temporality, good and evil presently coexist, but God is expected to bring every deed into judgment, to exterminate the wicked, and to grant happiness, *resurrection, or everlasting life to the righteous (Joel 1:15; Ps 112; Eccl 12:14; Dan 12:3).

Divine transcendence is never questioned in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. However, a "soft" dualism is developed, namely in the "Instruction on the Two Spirits" (1QS 3:13–4:26). According to this text, God "created humankind [...] and He has provided it with two spirits according to which to behave until the fixed time of His visitation." These spirits, truth and deceit, have their origins in light and darkness, respectively. Their leaders, a Prince of Light and an Angel of Darkness, extend their dominion over two separate groups of human beings (their “sons”) and influence their behavior. At the time of God’s visitation, the followers of each spirit will be either rewarded or punished, truth will rise up forever, and deceit will be totally destroyed. Similar ideas are found in the “War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness” (1QM) and in several additional texts.

Dualistic thinking appears in other writings of the *Second Temple period. The Ethiopic Apocalypse of *Enoch attributes the origin of evil to fallen angels; it describes the present time as a struggle between the cosmic powers, parallel to the one opposing the righteous and the wicked, until the final judgment (1 Enoch 6–16; 91–107). The Book of Jubilees (found in the *Pseudepigrapha) identifies the prince of the demons, Mastema, as responsible for both the problem of evil and the tension between Israel and the nations (Jubilees 17:15–18:13; 48:1–4, 9–19). The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (also found in the Pseudepigrapha) implies a sharp division between the spirit of truth and the spirit of error: The Patriarchs teach their descendants an elaborated doctrine of the two ways, one led by the Angel of the Lord, the other by Belial, until the last days, when evil will be definitely eradicated (Testament of Judah 20:1–5; Testament of Dan. 6:1–10; Testament of Asher 1:3–9; Testament of Joseph 20:2). In ancient Judaism, dualistic terminology was a tool through which various groups elaborated worldviews to make sense of their own situation, legitimated their particular interpretation of the *Torah and their commitment to it, and nourished their hope to be finally vindicated by God.

JEAN DUHAIME

Dubnow, Simon (1860–1941), a self-taught Jewish historian, publicist, and ideologue was born in Mstislavl, *Belorussia. From 1880 until 1922 he lived in *Russia (mostly in *Saint Petersburg); subsequently he resided in *Berlin. In 1933 he moved to Riga, *Latvia, where he was murdered by the *Nazis during the liquidation of the Riga ghetto (see HOLOCAUST entries).

Dubnow was one of the founders of the Jewish Historico-Ethnographical Society and an editor (1909–18) of its quarterly Yevreiskaya Starina. From 1908 through 1914 he taught Jewish history at the Courses on Oriental (Jewish) Studies established by Baron David Guenzburg in Saint Petersburg and, from 1919, at the Jewish People’s University. Dubnow’s three-volume History of Jews in Russia and Poland (1916–20) influenced a generation of Jewish historians. His major work was the ten-volume World History of the Jewish People (1925–29). His memoirs-diary, Kniga zhizny (Book of my Life), is a valuable testimony of his era seen from a Jewish viewpoint.

Dubnow saw Jews as one people with one history that had developed in a succession of “hegemonic centers” (*Babylon, *Spain, *Poland, etc.). He developed a theory of Jewish ex-territorial autonomy, based on modernized democratic communities, as a tool for Jewish national survival in the *Diaspora. He founded the Jewish People’s Party (1906) with his autonomist political platform. Dubnow was ambivalent toward *Zionism, which he saw as an appealing but dangerous political adventure.

MICHAEL BEIZER

Dunash ben Labrat, tenth-century Hebrew *grammarian and poet, is commonly credited with introducing Arabic-style prosody, poetics, and themes to the Jews of tenth-century *Spain. Accordingly, he is regarded as the founder of the Andalusian school of Hebrew *poetry. Ben Labrat was born in Morocco (see NORTH AFRICA) and later studied in Baghdad under *Saadia Gaon, the communal leader and most important rabbinic intellectual of the period (see *IRAQ). By mid-century, Ben Labrat was drawn to Umayyad Cordoba and the circle around the influential Jewish courtier and communal leader Ḥasdai ibn Shaprut (see SPAIN, MUSLIM). There he managed to displace Ibn Shaprut’s previous court-poet and secretary, Menaḥem ibn Saruk, and he went on to engage Ibn Saruk’s students in a fierce debate over his Arabic-style Hebrew metrics as well as the introduction of comparative (i.e., Arabic) philology to the study of *Biblical Hebrew. Only thirteen of Dunash’s poems have survived intact, and they include both liturgical and social compositions. See P. Cole, The Dream of the Poem (2007), 23–27.

ROSS BRANN

Dura Europos, the site of a late antique city in present-day Syria, contains the most important single artifact of ancient Jewish art. The walls of its synagogue (ca. 245 CE) are covered with the earliest surviving biblically themed paintings. See ART: LATE ANTIQUITY; and SYNAGOGUES, ANCIENT.

Dybbuk, “attachment,” is a popular term, which is used mainly in *Yiddish, from the Hebrew root DVK. It indicates the entrance of a second soul to a person’s body (often used in the form dybbuk-ra, an “evil affliction”). This belief originated in the concept of reincarnation of souls, which developed in *Kabbalah at the end of the twelfth century. The original term for this phenomenon was ibbur, another soul that was conceived within a person’s body; the term gilgul referred to the transportation of a soul from body to body. Since the sixteenth century a score or more narratives have been written describing the procedure of extracting the intruding soul from the body it entered; many of these narratives were written by well-known scholars, including figures like Ḥayyim Vital, the great disciple of Isaac *Luria in sixteenth-century *Safed. In most cases the dybbuk is the soul of a sinner who was refused entrance to the treasury of souls (see G. Scholem, On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead [1991]).

This mystical tradition inspired S. Ansky’s 1914 Yiddish play, “The Dybbuk or Between Two Worlds,” which was extremely popular in the first half of the twentieth century. The 1937 film version, produced in *Warsaw and directed by Michał Waszyński, is considered a masterpiece of Yiddish *film (see THEATER, YIDDISH).

JOSEPH DAN

E

Eastern Europe. There is no generally accepted definition of the regions and countries that constitute Eastern Europe. For the purposes of Jewish history and culture as they are discussed in this volume, Eastern Europe refers to the pre-1917 Russian Empire, including the areas of *Poland and *Lithuania that became part of *Russia after the late-eighteenth-century partitions of Poland. In addition, this designation includes the Polish province of *Galicia and other parts of Poland that became part of the *Habsburg Empire after the first partition of Poland in 1772, as well as those parts of Poland that fell under Prussian control (see *Germany).

Ecclesiastes, a book in the *‘‘Writings’’ section of the Hebrew *Bible is found in the collection of *Five Scrolls that follows the books of *Psalms, *Proverbs, and *Job. With Proverbs and Job, it comprises biblical ‘‘wisdom literature’’ (see BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE). Jewish tradition identified King *Solomon as the author, but the book attributes itself more ambiguously to ‘‘Kohélet son of *David, king in *Jerusalem’’ (1:1), and the book’s language shows that it was written no earlier than the *Persian period. ‘‘Ecclesiastes’’ is simply Greek for kohélet, ‘‘one who convenes an assembly.’’ Uniquely in the Hebrew Bible, this book is framed as a first-person description of one man’s search for wisdom. The kingly persona enables the author to portray his search as aided by limitless wealth and power.

Yet the search is portrayed as futile. ‘‘There is nothing new under the sun’’ (1:9), and life can best be described with Kohélet’s theme word, hevel. This is the word famously translated in the King James Version as ‘‘vanity’’; it has also been understood as ‘‘futility’’ and ‘‘existential absurdity.’’ However, its basic meaning in Biblical Hebrew is ‘‘vapor’’ or something that is ephemeral. Life, for Kohélet, offers nothing solid to be grasped. Rather, it is ‘‘utter illusion’’ – for ‘‘the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill; but time and chance happen to them all’’ (9:11).

Despite its skeptical tone, Ecclesiastes is read in the synagogue on the *Sabbath that falls during *Sukkot, perhaps because of its essentially autumnal quality. Moreover, the words, ‘‘man has no superiority over beast, for they all are hevel’’ (3:19), are traditionally recited every morning – immediately followed by the assertion, ‘‘but we are your *covenant people.’’ According to BT Shabbat 30b, the Rabbis wished to exclude Ecclesiastes from the Bible; indeed, the *midrash compilation Leviticus Rabbah points out that Kohélet’s advice to follow one’s own desires (11:9) directly contradicts Numbers 15:39, repeated twice a day as part of the third paragraph of the shema*. Ultimately, the book was saved by its attribution in 1:1 to ‘‘the son of David, king in Jerusalem’’ and its conclusion, in 12:9–14, a later addition: ‘‘The sum of the matter, when all is said and done: Revere God and observe His commandments!’’

In the twentieth century, author Ernest Hemingway drew on Ecclesiastes for his title, The Sun Also Rises (1:5), and folksinger Pete Seeger used its words for a twentieth-century popular song, ‘‘Turn, Turn, Turn’’ (based on 3:1–8). This modern usage was only fitting, because Ecclesiastes itself, as is characteristic of wisdom writings, drew on ancient *Near Eastern literature, most famously in the advice to ‘‘Let your clothes always be freshly washed, and your head never lack ointment. Enjoy happiness with a woman you love’’ (9:8–9), originally from the Epic of Gilgamesh. For further reading, see M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Re-Reading of Ecclesiastes (1999). MICHAEL CARASIK

Ecclesiasticus: See WISDOM OF BEN SIRA

Ecology. The literary and religious sources of Judaism offer an abundance of theological principles about nature that support an ecological worldview. All are based on the belief that *God created the world and all its inhabitants.

BIBLICAL AND RABBINIC SOURCES: The creation narrative of Genesis 1–2:3 depicts creation of the material world as an act of ordering unordered chaos (tohu va-vohu). This act involves the separation of light from darkness, water above from water below, dry land from the seas, vegetation from animals, aquatic animals from air and land animals, and finally humans from other land animals. The final act of creation is the institution of the *Sabbath. In this narrative, created nature is not divine, nor is it identified with the Creator. However, one created being, the human, is presented as different from all others, because it was made in the ‘‘divine image’’ (tzelem elohim, 1:26). The meaning of this phrase has been much debated, but it is evident that it is creation in the divine image that empowers humans to have dominion over other created entities. Although the human species is privileged, the earth belongs to God, and humans do not have the right to exploit its natural resources.

This doctrine of creation, which recognizes the gulf between the Creator and the created world, facilitates an interest in the natural world. As Psalm 19:1 proclaims, ‘‘The heavens declare the glory of God/ and the firmament proclaims God’s handiwork.’’ Psalm 148 depicts all of creation praising God and God’s commanding power over nature. In these and other psalms, awareness of nature’s orderliness, regularity, and beauty always points to the divine Creator. Prophetic texts are rich with metaphors and similes from the plant world. In *Jeremiah the almond tree represents old age, the vine and the fig tree depict coming desolation and destruction, and the olive tree is a common reference for longevity. In one famous parable, fruit trees and vines serve humans by providing oil, fruit, and wine (Judg 9:8–13). Conversely, nature does God’s bidding when it punishes the people of Israel when they sin; indeed, ungodly behavior leads to ecological punishment. God is the sole Creator who may sustain or destroy nature (Ps 29:5–6; Zech 11:1–3; Hab 3:5–8). Mostly the *Bible emphasizes divine care of all creatures: God provides food to all (Ps 147:9), is concerned about humans and beasts (Pss 104:14, 145:16), and extends care to all; and they turn to God in time of need (Pss 104:21, 27, 147:9; Job 38:41).

The Rabbis taught that God “did not create a single thing that is useless. Even those creatures that may appear superfluous, such as serpents, scorpions, flies, fleas, or gnats, they too are part of the entirety of creation” (BT Shabbat 77b; Genesis Rabbah 10:7; Exodus Rabbah 10:1). Various rabbinic tales remind humans that the gnat was created first (BT Sanhedrin 38a). In daily prayers, the worshiper sanctifies nature by expressing gratitude to the Creator “who in goodness creates each day.” The prayers recognize the daily changes in the rhythm of nature – morning, evening, and night – and acknowledge God’s control of the natural world, as do the *blessings that Jews are required to utter when they witness a storm or observe a tree. The observant Jew blesses God for the natural functions of the human body and for the food that God provides for nourishment. It is the consecration of the natural order to God that endows all activities with proper religious meaning.

This sanctification of nature is evident in the rabbinic reinterpretation of the biblical pilgrimage *festivals. *Sukkot (Festival of Booths, Feast of Ingathering) celebrated the harvest of summer crops and the preparation of the fields for winter; Pesah (*Passover; Feast of the Unleavened Bread) began with the *New Moon of the month just preceding the hardening of the barley, and *Shavuot (Feast of Weeks, Pentecost) celebrated the barley harvest, when reaping began (Exod 34:22; Deut 16:10). These agrarian activities were given historical-religious meaning in the Bible, linking them to the wilderness experience, the Exodus from *Egypt, and the giving of the *Torah at Sinai, respectively. Sukkot in particular illustrates how the Rabbis reinterpreted the natural origins of the pilgrimage festivals after the destruction of the *Temple. The Rabbis elaborated the symbolic meaning of the sukkah, viewing it as a sacred home and the locus for the divine presence. They homilectically linked the four species associated with the festival – the citron (etrog) and the willow, myrtle, and palm that comprised the lulav – to parts of the human body, to types of people, to the three *patriarchs, the four matriarchs, and even to God. The festival of Sukkot concluded with another festival, *Shemini Atzeret (Eighth Day of Assembly), which included prayers to God to deliver rain.

Placing limits on human consumption of animals and regulating all food sources are major concerns of the Bible and its Holiness Code. The laws of Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14 are part of an elaborate system of *purity and impurity that affected the *Temple and the *priesthood, as well as the lives of individual Israelites. In general, the Torah prohibits eating the meat of certain creatures that are classified as impure or unclean, ingesting the blood of any animals, consuming animal fat (helev), and eating meat of the carcass (nevelah) of dead animals and fowls. More particularly, the Bible spells out which animals are permitted and which are forbidden for human consumption. The differentiation between “clean” and “unclean” animals, which is the core of Jewish *dietary laws (kashrut), has generated significant discussion about their internal logic. Some scholars explained that the unclean animals were a threat to life, whereas others suggested that forbidden animals were those regarded as deities in neighboring cultures. Still others considered the means of locomotion as the crucial classification principle. Yet it is also possible to understand the prohibition on consuming certain animals as ecologically motivated. The Bible permits the husbandry and consumption of ruminants, animals that make the most efficient use of vegetation. Other animals (the horse, mule, and camel), which were domesticated, could be kept by farmers for transportation and fieldwork, but not for consumption. The cow was used for work and for milk and meat, the sheep and goat for milk and meat only. Permitted aquatic animals must have fins and scale (i.e., fish) but frogs, toads, and newts were not to be eaten, perhaps because the biblical authors were aware that they are beneficial to the ecosystem and cut down on the mosquito population. Lobsters, oysters, and mussels are also forbidden, most likely because the coast of *Palestine is not suited for them. All birds of prey, including owls, were forbidden for human consumption, as well as all storks, ibises, herons, and species of bats. Because many of the forbidden species were common in the Land of *Israel, it is possible to view these prohibitions as extended environmental protection in the interest of maintaining ecological equilibrium.

Deuteronomy 22:6–7 is concerned with the lives of non-human animals. If one finds a nest on the ground or on a tree with young ones or eggs in it and “the mother [is] sitting upon the young or upon the eggs, you shall not take the mother with the young; you shall let the mother go, but the young you may take to yourself, that it may go well with you and that you may live long.” By saving the mother, the law enables the species to continue to reproduce itself and avoid potential extinction. This law is elaborated in Deuteronomy Rabbah 6:5, BT Hullin 138b–142a, and Sifre Deuteronomy 227, specifying that the person who finds the nest is only allowed to take the nestlings if they are not fledged. This concern suggests a notion of the sustained use of resources.

Attentiveness to the needs of animals was also a major concern of rabbinic tradition. On the basis of Deuteronomy 22:6, the Rabbis articulated the general principle of tza’ar baalei hayyim (literally “distress of living creatures”) that prohibits the affliction of needless suffering on animals. They considered this one of seven commandments given to the sons of Noah that are binding on all human beings. The obligation to release the ass from its burden (Exod 23:5) – that is, to assist the owner in unloading merchandise or materials from a beast of burden – and a similar obligation to come to the assistance of a fallen animal (Deut 22:4) are understood by rabbinic sources (BT Bava Metzia 32b) as duties rooted in the concern for the financial loss that would be suffered by the animal’s master were the animal to collapse under the weight of the burden. Although human needs generally take precedence over the suffering of animals, there are cases in which the Rabbis privilege the needs of animals. Thus, Deuteronomy 1:15 is understood as forbidding a person to eat before his or her animals have been fed (BT Berakhot 41a; Gittin 62a). Similarly, one is permitted to buy animals only if one can provide assurance that they will be fed (JT Yevamot 15:3; Ketubbot 4:8). The medieval rabbinic leader, physician, and philosopher, Moses *Maimonides, codified these traditions and taught that the concern for animal welfare is linked to the cultivation of a moral human personality (Guide of the Perplexed 3:17).

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS: Since the 1970s, Jews have confronted the charge that the Judeo-Christian tradition is the primary cause of the current environmental crisis. This is said to be because Genesis 1:28 gives humans “dominion” over the earth and its inhabitants. Orthodox thinkers were the first to defend *Judaism, demonstrating that such readings of the Bible are based on misunderstandings of the text or attest ignorance of the post-biblical Jewish tradition. In the 1970s and 1980s Jews from all branches of modern *Judaism – Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Humanistic – began to reflect on ecological concerns in light of Jewish religious sources. Jewish voices are now a part of the well-established discourse on religion and ecology and the ecological wisdom of the Jewish tradition is widely recognized.

By the 1990s Jewish environmentalism had also begun to affect the organized Jewish community. In 1993 the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL) was founded as an umbrella group of twenty-nine Jewish organizations with thirteen regional affiliates. COEJL has promoted environmental education, scholarship, advocacy, and action in efforts to deepen the Jewish community’s commitment to the stewardship of creation and to mobilize Jewish life and learning to protect the Earth and all its inhabitants. COEJL emphasizes environmental justice; the prevention of harm; energy independence; equitable distribution of responsibility among individuals, corporations, governments, and nations; pollution prevention; proper treatment of nuclear waste; energy conservation; utility regulation; and the promotion of sustainable development. COEJL is part of a larger network of religious *interfaith organizations that attempt to shape environmental policies on municipal, state, and federal levels. In *Israel too, there are significant attempts to anchor environmentalism in the sources of Judaism.

In the early-twenty-first century, Jewish environmentalism continues to grow, especially on a grassroots level. Many communities now celebrate the festival of *Tu B’Shevat as a “Jewish Earth Day,” and Jewish newspapers regularly report on environmental issues in connection with this festival. A growing body of scholarly literature makes it possible to teach college-level courses on Judaism and ecology. Awareness of environmental concerns has also led to the “greening” of Jewish institutions. Still, Jews have found that certain assumptions, widely taken for granted by secular environmentalists, conflict with Jewish tradition. For example, a Jewish environmental philosophy and ethics cannot be based on a simplistic version of pantheism that does not acknowledge anything beyond the world itself. From a Jewish perspective, “biocentrism” constitutes an idolatrous worship of nature. To speak from the sources of Judaism, one must affirm that God created the world and that divine *revelation is possible. It is precisely because humans are created with the capacity to transcend nature that they are commanded by God to protect the world. Therefore, a Jewish environmental philosophy and ethics cannot give up the primacy of the human species in the created order, notwithstanding the fact that some proponents of “deep ecology” now regard “species-ism” as an unacceptable view. In a view true to Jewish teaching, human beings must first love and respect themselves if they are going to be able to love and respect other species. Yet the love of one’s fellow human beings goes hand in hand with human responsibility toward other species created by God. Similarly, Jewish environmentalism cannot simplistically preach zero population growth. The obligation to procreate is unambiguously articulated in Genesis and has become a necessity after the *Holocaust. Of course, it is possible to interpret the injunction “to be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth” to mean “to reach the maximum population sustainable at an acceptable standard of living but do not exceed it.”

The main challenges to Jewish environmentalism come from within. In Israel and in the United States, the religious sources of Judaism do not inform the identity of most Jews, and secular Jews do not appeal to them in their attempt to address environmental concerns. Jews who come to environmentalism from a Jewish religious commitment face other challenges because contemporary environmental philosophy and ethics are predominantly secular. Religiously committed Jews must become familiar with a vast literature whose worldview and philosophical assumptions not only conflict with the beliefs of Judaism but are also in some cases self-consciously “neo-pagan.” This is especially evident in nature-based feminist spirituality that promotes goddess worship to overcome the deterioration of nature allegedly caused by the masculinist “Judeo-Christian tradition.” Likewise, the biocentrism of “deep ecology” conflicts with the anthropocentric stance of Judaism, which is the basis of its ethics of stewardship and responsibility toward nature. Jews can develop a Jewish eco-theology for the twenty-first century, but doing so will require a significant reinterpretation of Judaism in light of contemporary science, especially the biological sciences, which are in the midst of a major transformation.

For further reading, see R. Aubrey, ed., Judaism and Ecology (1992); E. Bernstein, ed., Ecology and the Jewish Spirit: Where Nature and the Sacred Meet (1998); idem, The Splendor of Creation: A Biblical Ecology (2005); E. Eisenberg, The Ecology of Eden (1998); A. Elon, N. M. Hyman, and A. Waskow, eds., Trees, Earth and Torah: A Tu B’Shevat Anthology (1999); R. H. Isaacs, The Jewish Sourcebook on the Environment and Ecology (1998); H. Tirosh-Samuelson, ed., Judaism and Ecology: Created World and Revealed Word (2002); A. Waskow, ed., Torah of the Earth: Exploring 4000 Years of Ecology in Jewish Thought (2000); and M. D. Yaffe, ed., Judaism and Environmental Ethics: A Reader (2001). See also ETHICS: ENVIRONMENTAL; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ECOLOGY.

HAVA TIROSH-SAMUELSON

Edom refers to a region extending north–south between the Zered (Wadi el-Hesa at the southern border of Moab) and the Red Sea. Its eastern border was formed by the Aravah; to the west, Edom extended to the Arabian Desert. The “kings’ highway” (Num 21:22) ran north–south. Edom first appears in *Egyptian records in the thirteenth century, when much of the population was pastoralist. Copper mining in the Aravah was also important. Not until the eighth–seventh centuries BCE were permanent settlements established, at sites such as the capital Buseirah and the port of Tall al-Kheleifeh. Agriculture sustained the northern part of the country.

According to the *Bible, Edom shared roots with Israel through *Isaac’s son *Esau (Gen 25:29–30). Subsequent narratives reflect military tensions between Israel and Edom (obstacle to *Moses [Num 20:14–21]; conquest by *David [2 Sam 8:13–14; 1 Kgs 11:14–16] and Uzziah, [2 Kgs 14:7]; and independence under Jehoram [2 Kgs 8:20–22] and Ahaz

[2 Kgs 16:6]). The *prophets reflected this hostility. Even as Edom fell under the control of *Assyrians and *Babylonians, Edomites pushed west into the Negev Desert. They settled at sites such as Horvat `Uza and Horvat Qitmit, where sanctuaries to their god Qos have been uncovered. The Edomites/Idumeans were conquered by the *Hasmoneans in the late second century BCE and forcibly converted to Judaism. It was to them that the *Herodian dynasty, the *Roman client-rulers of Judea in the first centuries BCE and CE, traced their ancestry. In rabbinic writings, Edom is used as a euphemism for *Rome; in later Jewish texts, it refers to Christians and *Christianity. Maps 2, 3

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Education, Boys: Medieval and Early Modern. Education in the medieval and Early Modern periods, as throughout Jewish history before the twentieth century, was gendered. This entry discusses education for males; female education is discussed in the following entry. In medieval *Ashkenaz (*Germany and northern *France), boys began *Torah study at age five or six with an initiation ceremony at the *synagogue, often on *Shavuot (see CONSECRATION). The child was instructed to recite certain letters and verses that were written on a honey-covered tablet; he would then eat the honey, symbolizing the Torah he would incorporate. Education took place in informal settings; fathers would hire a tutor for a specific period of time or to teach a particular skill or text. Beyond occasional calls for affluent parents to include the children of those without means, communities had no formal mechanism to ensure that every child was taught. More formal educational structures and arrangements were established in both *Spain and *Provence and in Muslim lands on the elementary and more advanced levels.

A child was typically taught to recognize the (Hebrew) letters and then to understand how they formed words before moving on to the weekly Torah (together with the *Aramaic *Targum and *Rashi's commentary) and *haftarah portions. More extensive biblical readings and eventually *Talmud study followed. At thirteen or so, the capable child might join a local study hall or travel to an academy. Tutors were usually senior students, who often lived in the homes of their employers. Jewish boys in Muslim environments were often taught the rudiments of secular studies as well. It is not clear how young men advanced from elementary to more advanced studies; economic factors probably prevented many from making this transition. Local study halls (usually in the synagogue) enabled men to engage in some form of daily morning and evening study before or after communal *worship. Sefer Ḥasidim advises that informal study ought to be commensurate with the abilities of the student and according to his interests and proclivities. Those who prefer to study Scripture or *midrash rather than the Talmud should do so, and the study of practical Jewish law should also be encouraged (see MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ).

A document of uncertain provenance entitled Sefer Hukkei ha-Torah describes a possibly theoretical system of tutors and schools that advanced promising younger students to elite study halls. Passages in Sefer Ḥasidim and other *Tosafist works suggest that some students traveled to an academy to study Talmud around the age of thirteen. They brought funds for their sustenance and probably returned home for the holidays; such students often wandered from *yeshivah to yeshivah. The leading academies were relatively small, and typically their students lodged in the home of the teacher, and perhaps in several surrounding dwellings as well. The dining area in the teacher's home was the place of learning. Although these conditions may have ensured that the students were of similar (high) ability, it remains unclear exactly what was being taught in the large number of non-Tosafist academies or study halls spread throughout medieval Ashkenaz.

Tosafist academies were centers of vigorous debate with many similarities to contemporaneous cathedral schools in France and Germany. Indeed, virtually all of the most important cathedral schools and masters in northern France, as well as the leading Tosafist academies, were within eighty miles of Paris in varying directions. Certainly, the rules and extent of debate differed somewhat in these institutions, but both the cathedral schools and the Tosafist academies featured charismatic teachers as well as students who could at times equal or best their teachers in their reasoning and argumentation.

Evidence for educational structures in Spain and Provence during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries suggests that the leading talmudic academies were somewhat larger and more formal institutions than in Ashkenaz; often they were supported by local communities or regions. Students in these schools did not challenge and debate their teachers to the same extent as in Ashkenaz. Unlike Tosafist literature, in which students are often cited for the questions that they raised and the responses that they offered, the extensive commentaries of the leading Spanish talmudists in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (such as R. Meir Abulafia, *Naḥmanides, and R. Solomon ben Aderet [Rashba]) assign a much smaller role to students. It appears that the larger, more formal (and more supportive) academies in Spain were necessary to attract students to high-level talmudic study.

Recent research has demonstrated that Ashkenazic rabbinic scholars were also engaged in *biblical interpretation, in the writing and interpretation of piyyut (see POETRY, LITURGICAL), and in certain forms of *mysticism and rationalistic conception. However, it is evident that the educational paths available in Spain, Provence, and Muslim lands were far more variegated. In these lands, full-fledged philosophers, mystics, biblical exegetes, and *grammarians coexisted with talmudic scholars, and they often encouraged syntheses among these disciplines as well. These educational and curricular differences explain why the passions raised by the *Maimonidean controversy, for example, as well as the excesses that sometimes resulted from intense philosophical or mystical study, were barely felt in Ashkenazic lands.

In the Early Modern period, the extent to which talmudic studies should be blended with these other areas of intellectual inquiry remained a central question, especially as large-scale *expulsions and other tumultuous events brought Ashkenazic and Sephardic Jews together in new configurations and locales. Pre-modern Jewish communities took a greater interest in ensuring that as many of their sons as possible were provided with the rudiments of education. In the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, R. Judah Loew, Maharal of Prague, for example, proposed a form of educational revisionism, derived principally from a series of passages in Avot, that would match a boy's abilities and his age with the material to be studied.

For further reading, see E. Kanarfogel, Jewish Education and Society in the High Middle Ages (1991); I. Marcus, Rituals of Childhood: Jewish Acculturation in Medieval Europe (1996); and S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society 3: The Family (1978); and see MIDDLE AGES: CHILDHOOD.

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

Education, Girls: Medieval and Early Modern. The majority of Jewish girls in Christian Europe were instructed at home. Mothers taught their daughters cooking, needlework, and household management, as well as the dietary laws, practices related to domestic Sabbath and festival observances, and the commandments relevant to marital and family life. Sefer Hasidim ordains that young women must learn practical commandments and halakhic rules, but goes on to warn that "an unmarried man should not teach a girl, not even if the father is present, for fear that he will be sexually aroused or she will be overcome by her passions." Rather a father should teach his daughter, and a husband should teach his wife (Bologna version, par. 313).

Most medieval Ashkenazi rabbis maintained that women should not be taught the complexities of Jewish law. Typical is the teaching in Sefer Mitzvot Gadol, written in the early thirteenth century by Moses of Coucy, explaining that although "a woman is exempt from both the commandment to learn Torah and to teach her son, even so, if she aids her son and husband in their efforts to learn, she shares their reward for the fulfillment of that commandment" (Positive Commandment 12). Both the talmudic opinion that women earn merit by enabling male scholarly attainments through their economic endeavors and domestic support (BT Berakhot 17a) and the view that a woman must be instructed in the laws that apply to her life are cited by R. Moses Isserles as accepted practice in his glosses for Ashkenazic Jewry to the sixteenth-century law code, the Shulhan Arukh.

R. Jacob ben Moses Moellin (d. 1427), the Maharil, a German Jewish authority of the fifteenth century, opposed any formal religious education for girls, either from books or a tutor. In a responsum he indicated that girls can learn what they have to know from observing their parents in the home, only resorting to the local rabbi in instances of uncertainty. He gives his reasons as the rabbinic fear that an instructed woman will come to bad ways because "women's minds are weak," as well as his observation that the women of his generation seem to be adequately "knowledgeable about the laws of salting and rinsing and taking out the nerve, and the laws of the menstruating woman, and so forth" purely on the basis of home teaching (responsum 57). Although few girls were taught Hebrew, this was not seen as an impediment to women's religious practice and prayer. The statement in Sefer Hasidim – "It is better that a person pray in whatever language [the person] understands" – reflects the halakhic mainstream in its assumption that prayers in the vernacular are acceptable (Sefer Hasidim, Bologna, par. 588; Shulhan Arukh, Orah Hayyim 101). Whether medieval Jewish women in Ashkenaz had access to written texts of vernacular prayers is unknown because no manuscripts of vernacular prayers are extant from the period before the invention of printing (see PRAYER: WOMEN'S DEVOTIONAL; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN: MODERN CENTRAL EUROPE).

Education of girls may sometimes have gone beyond the minimum knowledge necessary to fulfill legal obligations. In his fourteenth-century ethical will, Eleazar b. Samuel of Mainz, urges all his children to attend synagogue in the morning and evening and to occupy themselves a little afterward with "Torah, the Psalms or with works of charity." He insists that his children "must not let the young of either sex go without instruction in the Torah." A few Jewish women from rabbinical families were educated beyond the norm for their sex. Some of these women of the scholarly elite led prayers for the other women of their communities; these women include the twelfth-century Dolce, the wife of R. Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (see MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ) and Urania of Worms of the thirteenth century.

It should be emphasized that Jewish women in medieval and early modern Ashkenaz were literate in the vernacular and also had a significant degree of numeracy. These were skills that were essential for their extensive business undertakings (see MONEY LENDING: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE).

S. D. Goitein, whose magisterial studies of the documents of the Cairo Genizah have illuminated Jewish society in the medieval Muslim realm, writes that the education of Jewish girls in this milieu was neglected to a degree not found in other periods of Jewish history. Because traditional Jewish attitudes did not advocate significant female learning, efforts to give girls a substantive religious education were rare. Moses Maimonides (d. 1204) opposed exposing girls to traditional texts because women had no halakhic obligation to study; moreover, he believed that women lacked the mental skills required for serious Torah study. He wrote that women should never study rabbinic legal teachings (oral Torah) because they would turn "the words of Torah into frivolity." Although he discouraged fathers from teaching their daughters written Torah, "if he did so, it is not considered as if he taught her frivolity" (Mishneh Torah, "Study of Torah" 1:13). Maimonides' views remained influential, not only throughout the Middle Ages but also well into the modern period. Goitein believes that the education of most Jewish women in the Muslim milieu was extremely limited, that illiteracy in all languages was common, and that knowledge of Hebrew was usually confined, at best, to being able to recite a few prayers from memory. Moreover, in some regions such as Yemen, he notes that women were not even taught to repeat prayers. However, there were exceptions in elite learned households, particularly when there were no sons (see KURDISTAN).

Prosperous parents of girls who wished their daughters to learn essential Hebrew prayers often hired private teachers, some of whom were women. They probably also hired female teachers to instruct their daughters in needlework and other domestic skills. Embroidery and other forms of needlework were extremely important accomplishments because married women at all levels of Jewish society were expected to earn income through their handiwork. Usually a wife was permitted to keep her earnings for private use, although clauses in some Genizah marriage agreements stipulate that she provide her own clothing out of her profits. Sometimes one tutor might teach a group of girls. A responsum of Maimonides refers to a blind male teacher in Alexandria who taught Hebrew prayers to young girls. Because he was blind, the girls could dispense with their veils when studying with him (Responsa of R. Moses b. Maimon, 4 vols. [Hebrew], ed. Joshua Blau [Jerusalem, 1957–86], vol. 2: 524–25, no. 276). Yet, even though women were not learned, Genizah writings reveal that they were anxious to further the educations of their sons, even when doing so entailed significant financial sacrifice; this was how a Jewish woman in the Muslim world could earn approbation in the eyes of her family and her society.

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, “The Education of Jewish Girls in the Middle Ages in Muslim and Christian Milieus” [Hebrew], Pe’amim: Studies in Oriental Jewry 82 (2000): 1–17; S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society, 5 volumes (1978–88); idem, Jewish Education in Muslim Countries: New Sources from the Geniza (1962; [Hebrew]); A. Grossman, Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe (2004); and see also MIDDLE AGES: CHILDHOOD; WOMEN: MIDDLE AGES; WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN: MODERN CENTRAL EUROPE. JUDITH R. BASKIN

Education, North America: Adult. Although study has traditionally been valued as an essential component of Jewish life, adult Jewish learning did not routinely occur outside of the *Orthodox community for most of the twentieth century. By the 1980s, however, more and more Jews began to realize that their Jewish educations had failed to keep pace with their high levels of general education. At that same time, Jewish communal leaders began to place greater priority on increasing adult Jewish literacy as a means of enhancing Jewish identity and ensuring the Jewish knowledge base of policymakers. Since then, adult Jewish study programs have proliferated. Adults are motivated to engage in Jewish study for diverse reasons, which might include learning how to be a more active participant in communal worship or a search for personal meaning. Some may be seeking a greater connection to community, whereas others may be inspired by a thirst for knowledge or the desire to become Jewish role models for their children or grandchildren.

Many models and venues for adult Jewish study have developed in response to these varying motivations. In North America, programs exist in *synagogues, through institutional sponsorship by *Federations and Jewish *Community Centers, through independent programs and retreat centers, through *interfaith institutional partnerships, in private homes and offices, and through organized tours to sites of Jewish interest. Approaches to study include lectures and scholar-in-residence programs, text study groups, skill-building programs (e.g., how-to-make-Shabbat workshops, adult b’nai mitzvah programs), Jewish literacy offerings (ranging from single-topic programs to ongoing courses), experiential learning programs (e.g., Jewish cooking classes, Torah “yoga,” social action study-and-do projects), travel programs (in local Jewish communities and to *Israel), retreats, cultural activities (including film festivals, book groups, and museum and music events that have Jewish themes), and “journey” groups that focus on Jewish identity or life transitions (e.g., workshops on “telling your Jewish story” and Jewish childbirth preparation classes). In addition to classes that meet face to face, there are distance-learning classes (including degree programs in Jewish studies), online learning opportunities (both for self-study and e-discussion), and private tutorials (including spiritual direction activities).

Recent research points to a number of trends. Overall, the more advanced an individual’s general education, the greater the likelihood of involvement in Jewish adult education. In-married Jewish adults are more involved in learning than the intermarried; however, non-Jewish partners (especially wives) are frequent Jewish learners who see themselves as the key purveyors of Jewish tradition in the family. Married adults who reside with children are more likely to be involved in adult Jewish education (especially family education) than other groups (such as childless young adults, single parents, and elderly adults with no children). Jewish women are more likely to engage in study than men, particularly in longer term programs and adult b’nai mitzvah preparation. Even with this wide array of venues, most adult Jewish learning takes place in synagogues. Synagogue members are more likely to participate in Jewish educational programs than unaffiliated Jews.

Although long-term courses in Jewish literacy (such as the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School and Me’ah) have attracted large numbers, most Jewish adults prefer shorter term programs that do not require a lengthy time commitment. This is demonstrated in the popularity of retreat programs such as Limmud New York and the biannual Aleph Kallah that combine serious Jewish learning with spiritual, cultural, and social activities. Yet, at the same time, in communities where long-term programs have succeeded, many “alumni” seek ongoing Jewish learning opportunities. Moreover, advanced learners are a growing communal resource who can teach others what they have learned.

Adult Jewish learning is now a central part of the Jewish communal landscape but few leaders have clearly articulated its goals. What kinds of changes should adult Jewish learning activities promote? Should they enhance Jewish identity, build leadership skills, strengthen Jewish communal commitments, increase Jewish literacy, or change Jewish practice? How should teachers of Jewish adults negotiate between teaching about Judaism and teaching students how to lead a Jewish life? At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, there appears to be an unspoken consensus that increasing Jewish literacy and learning inherently and automatically leads to more meaningful involvement in Jewish practices, philanthropy, and communal life. Indeed, many communal leaders accept the Talmudic dictum that “study leads to action” (BT Kiddushin 40b). However, little consensus has been achieved on the purposes, curriculum, and instructional philosophy of adult Jewish learning.

For further reading, see National Jewish Population Survey (2003); L. Grant et al., A Journey of Heart and Mind (2004); D. Schuster and L. Grant, “Adult Jewish Learning,” Journal of Jewish Education 71 (2005): 179–200; L. Grant, “Finding Her Right Place in the Synagogue,” in R. Prell, ed., Women Remaking American Judaism, (2007), 279–301; and D. Schuster, Jewish Lives, Jewish Learning (2003).

DIANE TICKTON SCHUSTER AND LISA D. GRANT

Education, North America: Day Schools. Jewish day schools are private, full-time early childhood, elementary, middle, and/or secondary schools that provide Jewish children with instruction in both Jewish studies and general studies subjects within an environment purposefully directed toward the cultivation of Jewish identity. Every Jewish educational institution that provides an all-day program is ostensibly a Jewish day school but each school is unique. Among contingent and highly variable factors with respect to the mission, curriculum, and organization of any particular Jewish day school are a number of questions about how Jewish identity is defined (religious? national? cultural? linguistic? secular?), how it is meant to be developed (didactically? cooperatively? constructivistically?), with what type of curricular emphasis (Jewish literacy? general academic competence?), which personnel (composition of student body? background of teachers?), what infrastructure (administrative arrangements? financial supports? facilities and resources? relationships to the community?), and, above all, for what purposes (knowledge acquisition? behavioral modification? values clarification?).

The range of Jewish day schools includes Hasidic* and Haredi* (*Ultra-Orthodox) yeshivot that focus on teaching classical Jewish texts almost exclusively; *Modern Orthodox schools that value a balance between Jewish and secular studies but maintain a distinctly religious tenor throughout the school program; Solomon Schechter (*Conservative) and *Reform movement schools that promote the dictates of their denominational movements while also placing considerable emphasis on a rigorous general education; and transdenominational (or “community”) schools that attempt to meet the needs of all members of the surrounding Jewish community regardless of religious affiliation. Indeed, Jewish day schools are as variegated as the Jewish community itself and represent the entire spectrum of Jewish life.

Modern (i.e., non-Haredi) day schools typically offer a bifurcated “dual curriculum” in which the school program is divided proportionately between general (secular) studies and Jewish studies. The general studies curriculum consists of the subject areas commonly found in any public or private school, including language arts, mathematics, sciences, social studies, foreign languages, and fine arts. The Judaic studies curriculum consists of some of the very same subjects that have been taught in Jewish schools for centuries, such as the Hebrew *Bible, *rabbinic literature, *Hebrew language, Jewish law codes (see HALAKHAH), Jewish history, Judaism, and *prayer. Generally speaking, the aim of the dual curriculum is to provide students with an adequate knowledge base both in traditional Jewish culture and modern western culture. As parodied by the novelist Cynthia Ozick in The Cannibal Galaxy (1983), the dual curriculum is a “scheme of learning luminous enough for a royal prince or princess,” providing “lordly civilization enmeshed with lordly civilization, King David’s heel caught in Victor Hugo’s lyre, the metaphysicians Maimonides and Pascal, Bialik and Keats, Gemara hooked to the fires of algebra” (57). More than providing the basic instructional arrangement of the day school, however, the dual curriculum fundamentally represents a particular vision of education. The ideal product of the Jewish day school is someone who can comfortably navigate life within both the Jewish community and society at large.

In this sense, the Jewish day school is an eminently modern construct, the product of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Haskalah* thinking about the necessity of Jews to adopt the social mores of the countries in which they live while still maintaining their Jewish commitments. Including secular studies in the Jewish school program would effectively demonstrate to the surrounding society that Jews were willing, capable, and deserving of the rights and privileges of citizenship, while also affording Jewish children the knowledge, skills, and dispositions they needed for full participation in modern Jewish life. What is more, it would preclude Jewish children from having to receive their secular education in state-sponsored schools that were officially nonsectarian but essentially Christian in character. The first modern day schools offering a dual religious and secular program began cropping up in the early to mid-nineteenth century in Western and *Eastern Europe and eventually in North America. By the beginning of the twentieth century, however, the burgeoning day school movement was already in decline, particularly in the United States. Public schools were becoming increasingly secularized and pluralistic, and they were progressively more geared toward the integration of new arrivals, including masses of Jews, into American society. Furthermore, in contrast to tuition-based Jewish schools, public schools were free of charge, which was no small enticement to the financially strapped yet economically striving immigrant population. Although many Orthodox Jews continued to shy away from public schooling and instead developed an extensive system of yeshivot, liberal and secular Jews for the most part forsook the notion of day schooling and preferred to supplement their children’s public school education with Jewish afternoon and/or weekend schools.

Community priorities shifted once again in the mid-twentieth century in the aftermath of the *Holocaust and the establishment of the State of *Israel. Intensive Jewish education came to be viewed as a crucial way to promote Jewish identity, by inspiring an affinity toward Jewish customs and peoplehood, and to ensure Jewish continuity by serving as a buttress against assimilation and *intermarriage. As a result, communities and philanthropists began investing heavily in the prospect of day schooling (by 2000, the combined annual budget of North American day schools was more than $2 billion). Other factors, such as the increasing affluence, prominence, and self-actualization of the Jewish community, along with the real or perceived decline of public education and supplementary Jewish schooling, combined to propel a massive expansion of the day school enterprise. Between 1940 and 1965, the number of day schools in North America grew from thirty-five to more than three hundred, and enrollment rose from approximately 7,700 to more than 65,000 students (A. I. Schiff, The Jewish Day School in America [1966]). By the turn of the twenty-first century, more than seven hundred North American day schools were enrolling more than 200,000 students, and day schools were operating in Israel, *Britain, *Mexico, *South Africa, *Australia, *Russia, *Germany, and elsewhere (see www.peje.org). Although the majority of day schools are Orthodox in affiliation, the largest upsurge of late has been among the non-Orthodox.

BENJAMIN M. JACOBS

Education, United States: Hebrew Colleges. These transdenominational institutions, founded by local Jewish communities, were established to train teachers for Jewish supplementary schools in the *United States. Early examples include Gratz College in *Philadelphia (1887); Teachers

Institute of the *Jewish Theological Seminary in *New York City (1909); the Mizrahi Organization of America/ Rabbi Isaac Elchanan in New York (1917); and Baltimore Hebrew College, now the Baltimore Hebrew Institute of Towson University (1919). Within the next decade five “sister” entities appeared: Hebrew College of *Boston (1921), now in Newton, Massachusetts; the now defunct Teacher Training School of the Hebrew Institute of Pittsburgh (1923); the College of Jewish Studies (now Spertus) in *Chicago (1924); the Hebrew Teachers Seminary (today Siegel College of Jewish Studies) in Cleveland (1926); and the Teachers Institute for Women, later part of *Yeshiva University, in 1929. Two new schools were added after World War II: the Teachers Institute of the University of Judaism in *Los Angeles in 1947 and Stern College for Women of Yeshiva University in 1954.

The colleges, founded primarily by Hebraists, *Zionists, and legatees of the East European *Haskalah, involved new approaches to education as a vehicle for cultural and ethnic transmission. Committed to *Hebrew language and culture, they also continued the work of Eastern European institutions like the heder metukan, modernized Hebrew-language schools introduced in *Russia in the early twentieth century. At the same time Hebrew colleges filled a gap in American Jewish life. The considerable energy that immigrants had expended in integration and acculturation and the establishment of ethnic social welfare institutions had not been matched by equal investment in Jewish educational institutions. This gap stemmed from a lack of funds, a shortage of rabbis and trained educators, and some degree of both popular disinterest and disagreement about what Jewish education should be. The establishment of a series of local Bureaus of Jewish Education after World War I created a momentum for routinizing and standardizing Jewish education, including building modern Talmud Torahs and some oversight of teacher training.

The American context was also important. The colleges deemphasized religious ideology and embraced the Jewish cultural heritage; this approach dovetailed with contemporaneous social ideologies of cultural pluralism and of progressivism, which saw rational organization as a key to solving the myriad challenges of modern life, including higher education. Samson Benderly, the head of the New York City Jewish Kehillah's Bureau of Jewish Education, inspired a whole generation of future Jewish educational leaders with this ethos. These men and women went on to found schools and *summer camps like Yavneh and played key roles in the emerging Hebrew college movement. Camp Yavneh in particular signaled the belief that culture must be actualized through living experience, in formal and informal contexts. These educators also believed that modernized culture required intellectual deliberation. New methodology was necessary to rethink and reengineer teacher training, write new textbooks, and build new schools.

Trends in post-war America have contributed to the reformulation of Hebrew college programs, if not their larger purposes. For example, the founding of *Israel and the declining interest in intensive Jewish supplementary education led to the weakening of Hebraism as an ideology and as an approach to Jewish education. At one time, the colleges were the one place where interested intellectuals could seriously pursue advanced academic Judaic studies. The explosion of academic *Jewish studies challenged the Hebrew Colleges' mission in that regard, and they now place a new emphasis on *adult Jewish learning.

The surviving Hebrew Colleges maintain Jewish life even as they alter it, incorporating and responding to the modern tensions between ethnicity and religion, Jewish tradition and modern notions of pluralism. They value classical notions of what constitutes Jewish culture – for example, biblical and rabbinic texts – even as they welcome new genres such as Modern Hebrew *literature that serve to expand our notion of the Jewish cultural canon. DAVID STARR Education, United States: Supplemental Schools. An estimated 230,000 children in *Canada and the United States receive their Jewish education in supplementary schools. According to Jack Wertheimer's 2008 report, A Census of Jewish Supplementary Schools in the United States: 2006–2007, published by the Avi Chai Foundation, there are approximately 2,000–2,100 Jewish supplementary schools. The majority of these schools are supported by *synagogues: 57% are affiliated with the *Reform movement, 26% with the *Conservative movement, 4% community or pluralistic, 3% *Reconstructionist, and another 4% sponsored by the *Habad movement.

The congregational school model that exists in the early twenty-first century is an adaptation of the Talmud Torahs founded in the early twentieth century by Jewish educator Samson Benderly and his disciples. They believed that religious education should be structured much like education in public schools where a standardized curriculum with textbooks was required. They envisioned a system supported by local bureaus of Jewish education that would train professional Jewish teachers and determine a unified vision. Although Benderly advocated for a communal, centralized Talmud Torah system, it never developed; as Jews moved to the suburbs they looked to *synagogues to provide Jewish education in a less centralized context. Thus, the transmission of Jewish culture and knowledge to American Jewish children in an afterschool and weekend context has remained primarily in the denominational domain.

Since the 1970s a great deal of discussion has centered around the impact of the congregational school on the Jewish lives of adults. Two separate studies published by Geoffrey Bock (1976) and Harold Himmelfarb (1975) concluded that supplemental Jewish learning, whether for 1,000 or 3,000 hours over a period of years, respectively, was ineffective in fostering Jewish identity or Jewish practice. The results of these studies propelled communities to focus on the Jewish day school to achieve these goals. Jewish *Federations throughout the country began to pour financial resources into both denominational and community day schools, leading to significant growth in the last three decades of the twentieth century. Despite this increase, however, a significant majority of children still participate in “supplementary” schools. This reality has generated communal attention and funding for congregation-based Jewish learning.

The field of Jewish supplementary education has experienced major shifts in the first decade of the twenty-first century, with a different set of expectations and a renewed sense of possibility. Educators realize that the acquisition of *prayer skills and a basic knowledge of holiday rituals are not sufficient. Innovative efforts focus on connecting Jewish learning to Jewish living, thereby providing students with a stronger sense of Jewish community; parents are asked to be active partners in the process.

In a monograph entitled "Redesigning Jewish Education for the 21st Century" (2007), the Jewish Education Service of North America outlined a strategy to maximize the reach and impact of Jewish supplementary education. The authors write that effective Jewish education must build on mutual commitment among students, their parents, educators, and a strong interconnected Jewish community of clergy and lay leadership; Jewish learning must also be relevant to the lives of the students, addressing their concerns and questions.

EVIE ROTSTEIN

Educational Alliance: See ART, AMERICAN TO 1940; DANCE: UNITED STATES

Egypt and Ancient Israel. Egypt appears to have had significant influence on ancient Israel: Some fundamental Israelite institutions seem to be based on Egyptian models, and important people in Israel's early history bear Egyptian names. Egypt's impact on Israel is also discernible in the areas of *wisdom literature and *poetry, as well as in religious architecture.

*MOSES AND AKHENATEN: Moses' requirement that Israel exclusively worship one *God has been linked to the religious reforms of Akhenaten, a fourteenth-century-BCE king of Egypt. In Moses and Monotheism (1939), Sigmund *Freud, the father of modern *psychoanalysis, famously portrays Moses as an Egyptian priest who, in an attempt to save Akhenaten's religious legacy, imposed the Pharaoh's severe monotheism on a mob of Semitic slaves, who then rebelled and murdered their liberator. Although most modern scholars dismiss Freud's reconstruction, some think it plausible that Moses' beliefs were somehow related to Akhenaten's exclusive worship of the sun disc, the Aten. Akhenaten introduced radical religious reform on taking the throne of Egypt in 1353 BCE. He changed his name, originally Amunhotep IV ("the god Amun is satisfied"), to Akhenaten ("effective for Aten"). With his wife Nefertiti, he prohibited the worship of gods other than the Aten or the sun disc, whom the royal couple praised as the sole creator deity. Names of other gods and even the word "gods" were chiseled out of existing inscriptions. However, the worship of other deities seems to have continued throughout Egypt, and Akhenaten's religious revolution mostly ended with his death. No reliable evidence exists that allows us to establish when Moses was born and died; however, it is plausible that his life-span coincided with that of Akhenaten or fell somewhat later, so a connection is possible. Although it is true that the monotheism attributed to Moses in biblical texts differs from that of the Pharaoh regarding the use of representational art (Aten was depicted as a sun with hands) and the divine nature of Akhenaten himself (the king was thought to be the incarnation of the sun god), monotheistic intolerance of other deities remains the defining factor of their respective religions. A notable remnant of this relationship may be the strong resemblance between *Psalm 104 and Akhenaten's "Hymn to Aten." On this topic, see W. Propp, Exodus 19–24 (2006), 762–93.

PROVERBS 22:17–24:22 AND "INSTRUCTION OF AMENEMOPE": *Proverbs 22:17–24:22 is noteworthy for its affinity to the Egyptian "Instruction of Amenemope," a collection of wise sayings dating to the twelfth century BCE. Both begin with exhortations to listen to the guidance that follows, and both contain similar admonitions; for example, to avoid the company of angry men and to desist from removing landmarks or robbing the poor. A connection between the two wisdom collections is also suggested because the Egyptian instructions are divided into thirty units and Proverbs 22:20, according to one reconstruction of the difficult text, could be translated, "Have I not written for you thirty sayings?" However, the similarities between the two do not necessarily mean that the Israelite scribe adapted the "Instruction of Amenemope" for his Hebrew-speaking audience, but rather that Israelite wisdom was part of an international literary form. The *Bible acknowledges the standard of excellence set by Egypt's wisdom tradition (1 Kgs 5:10), so it would not be surprising if a scribe in *Jerusalem's royal court emulated his Egyptian counterpart (see BIBLE: WISDOM LITERATURE).

THE SONG OF SONGS AND EGYPTIAN LOVE POETRY: Although the *Song of Songs functions in the Jewish canon as an allegory for God's *covenantal relationship with Israel, its secular origins and intent are suggested by the sensual and erotic nature of the poetry, but even more so by its neglect of anything cultic or ritual. The name of the Israelite God appears only once, in 8:6, as a superlative way of describing human love as a blazing flame. Although ancient *Mesopotamia offers literature about love that is comparable to the Song of Songs, this love poetry, mostly of Sumerian origin, is embedded in "sacred marriage" texts that describe the mystical union of king and goddess during the festivities for the New Year. From Egypt, however, about fifty love poems survive, dating to the period 1300–1150 BCE. This group shares many characteristics with the Song of Songs, including the use of "sister" as a term of endearment and the focus on sensual pleasures and the sensual power of nature. In each case, the lovers are single, are sexually egalitarian, and show no hesitation regarding premarital sex; in addition, although the lovers praise each other's beauty, there is no real dialogue as they do not respond to each other's remarks. Michael Fox writes that these many similarities justify the supposition that the Song of Songs is at least indirectly dependent on the Egyptian model. He suggests that this literary type would have entered *Canaan in the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 BCE), when Egypt controlled Canaan through a network of garrison towns and administrative centers. Although Jewish tradition dates the Song of Songs to the tenth-century-BCE reign of King *Solomon, modern scholars tend to attribute it to a much later date, possibly even as late as the *Hellenistic period. This long period of incubation can be accounted for if we assume, with Fox, that this kind of erotic and sensual poetry became incorporated into the popular literary tradition and blossomed as the Song of Songs centuries later. On this topic, see M. V. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (1985), 186–93.

EGYPTIAN PERSONAL NAMES IN THE BIBLE: Although many modern scholars challenge the Torah's claim that the people of Israel experienced a prolonged stay in the land of Egypt, the Egyptian origins of the names of several significant people in the book of Exodus suggest that at least some Israelites had sojourned there. It is likely that the names of Moses' siblings, *Aaron and *Miriam, have Egyptian origins. "Miriam" is related to the Egyptian root mry, and means "love" or "beloved," just like the name of a son of Levi, Merari, mentioned in Genesis 46:11 and Exodus 6:16. Assir is mentioned as a son of the Levite Korah in Exodus 6:24, and it is likely that his name is connected to the Egyptian Osiris or the Egyptian word isr, the term for a tamarisk tree. The name Hur, given to the leader who assisted Moses and Aaron in the battle with Amalek (Exod 17:10, 12), is probably related to the name of the Egyptian sky god, Horus. Phineas, the zealous grandson of Aaron in Numbers 25, has a name that in Egyptian means "the Nubian," perhaps because he had a dark complexion. The name of Israel's greatest prophet Moses is also thought to be derived from the Egyptian root msi, which means "born of." Names with this element were popular during the New Kingdom (1570–1070 BCE) and include Thutmose, Ramose, and Amenmose.

THE TENT OF MEETING AND ITS ACCESSORIES: James Hoffmeier has shown that Israel's portable sanctuary or *Tabernacle (mishkan) described in Exodus 25–30 was inspired by an Egyptian model and that a significant number of Hebrew terms related to the mishkan probably originated in Egypt. The Egyptian origin of these items and the terms for them attests to their antiquity, for it shows that they are rooted in Israel's experience in Egypt. For example, the wood used in the construction of the Tabernacle and its components – the ark, poles, planks, and altars – is from the acacia tree, which grew in dry regions such as the Sinai wilderness. This contrasts with the extensive amount of cedar, a wood imported from Lebanon, used for Solomon's *Temple (1 Kgs 5:22, 6). In addition, the Hebrew term for acacia, shittim, is a loan word from Egyptian. The extensive use of thin gold overlay in the Tabernacle was an art that was well developed in Egypt, and the word used in the *Torah for this practice, pakh (Exod 39:3) comes from Egyptian. The term for linen, the cloth used for the curtains in the Tabernacle and the priestly garments, is shesh, also of Egyptian origin. Portable shrines carried on poles, similar to the *Ark of the Covenant, are depicted in Egyptian art from the New Kingdom period, and one was found in the tomb of Tutankhamun. Thus, Egyptian technology and design played a significant role in the fashioning of the ark and Tabernacle, the focal points of Israel's early religious life.

For further reading, see J. K. Hoffmeier, Ancient Israel in Sinai: The Evidence for the Authenticity of the Wilderness Tradition (2005); and R. Hess, Israelite Religions: An Archaeological and Biblical Survey (2007). Maps 1, 2 ELAINE GOODFRIEND

Egypt: Heracleopolis Papyri. The Heracleopolis Papyri, also known as the "Jewish Politeuma Papyri" (P. Polit. Iud.), date from 144/3 to 133/2 BCE and provide a detailed snapshot of the daily life of Egyptian Jews living under the *Ptolemies. The papyri include citizen petitions to the officials (archons, politarchs, and elders) of a Jewish politeuma; that is, a self-governing community of resident aliens. The petitions address disputes regarding personal honor, marriage arrangements and dowries, the law of persons, and business transactions.

The petitions definitively establish that the Jews of Ptolemaic Egypt had the right to form politeumata. The uses of this term in association with Jews in documents known before publication of the papyri in 2001 were ambiguous in their meaning (*Letter of Aristeas 310; CIG 5361–5362 [two inscriptions of the first century BCE from Berenice in Cyrenaica]). In contrast, there is no ambiguity in the case of the Heracleopolis papyri. The phrase "the politeuma of the Ioudaioi" (P. Polit. Iud. 8.5, 20.8–9), a politeuma member's explicit self-identification as a Ioudaios ("Jew/Judean"; 2.2, 4), and the wealth of theophoric names (e.g., Dorotheos [7.2, 26, 29, 38; 8.13, 38] and Theodotos [6.2, 41; 8.6, 37; 13.2; 17.2–3]) leave no doubt as to the ethnicity of the politeuma members.

That said, the legal reasoning reflected in the papyri indicates that the petitioners only lightly embraced the right granted by the Ptolemies to use ethnic politeumata to govern their corporate life according to their ancestral *law. Evidence of the petitioners' reliance on non-Jewish normative systems abounds. For example, the disputes regarding *marriage arrangements and dowries reflect Greek and Egyptian practices and omit the biblical mohar or "bride price" (P. Polit. Iud. 3–5; cf. Gen 34:12; Exod 22:16; 1 Sam 18:25). A petition requesting the return of an orphan to her proper guardian depends on Greek common law. Loans are made at the standard Ptolemaic business interest rate of 24% (P. Polit. Iud. 8; cf. Exod 22:24; Lev 5:35–38; Deut 23:20–21). A Jew eschews his own ethnic label for that of a Perses tes epigones ("Persian of the Succession/Younger Generation"), a fictive identity taken by poor credit risks to qualify for a loan in the early second century BCE (P. Polit. Iud. 8). According to Greek custom a woman is represented by a kyrios (6).

Still, close analysis of the legal reasoning in the papyri uncovers evidence that the petitioners also appealed to the *Torah when doing so could strengthen their legal arguments. For example, in P. Polit. Iud. 7 a guardian seeking the return of his ward under Greek common law cites his keeping of the levitical law concerning care for one's destitute kin (Lev 25:35–38) as evidence of his suitability as a guardian. Likewise, in P. Polit. Iud. 4, a petitioner contesting the giving of his fiancée by her father to another man, courted the woman according to Egyptian norms and made a pre-marital pact with her father typical of Greek practice. Yet the same petitioner invoked Numbers 30:3 to remind the father of the binding nature of his promise to give his daughter to him, and he cited Deuteronomy 24:1 to argue that the father had not issued the "customary writ of separation" necessary to free a woman from *betrothal to another man.

For further reading, see J. M. S. Cowey and K. Maresch, eds. Urkunden des Politeuma der Juden von Heracleopolis (144/3–133/2 v. Chr.) (P. Polit. Iud.): Papyri aus Sammlungen von Heidelberg, Köln, München und Wien (2001); and R. Kugler "Dispelling an Illusion of Otherness? A First Look at Juridical Practice in the Heracleopolis Papyri," in D. C. Harlow, M. Goff, K. M. Hogan, J. S. Kaminsky, eds, The "Other" in Second Temple Judaism: Essays in Honor of John J. Collins (2011).

ROBERT KUGLER

Egypt: Middle Ages. Egypt was an important place of medieval Jewish settlement and home to an innovative office of Jewish self-government. The chronicler Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam reports that at the time of the Arab-Islamic conquest of *Alexandria in 642, 40,000 Jews resided in the city. Although the actual figure was most likely a fraction of that, the report reflects the Jews' disproportionate urbanization compared both to the Coptic Christian population of Egypt and to the Jews of *Palestine and *Iraq, who would not urbanize until the ninth century. Therefore, the history of the Jews in medieval Egypt is found in cities and towns, especially Fustat, Alexandria, and the Nile Delta.

The Jewish community of early-tenth-century Egypt seems to have been capable of educating young men in biblical and *rabbinic literature, to judge by the philosopher, exegete, and halakhic scholar *Saadia ben Joseph, who would later serve as *Gaon of *Sura (928–42): he came from the town of Dīlās (Coptic Tilōj) in the southeastern Fayyūm and lived in Egypt until he was twenty-three. The tenth-century historian al-Masʿūdī corroborates this in reporting that the Abbasid governor of Egypt Aḥmad ibn Ṭulūn (868–905) staged a religious disputation between a Copt and his Jewish physician. A Jewish congregation also bought a church in Fustat from the Coptic patriarch Michael III (895–909), most likely to found a Babylonian-rite *synagogue to house the numerous Iraqīs who had begun to migrate westward in pursuit of economic stability.

The most important center of Jewish population was Fustat, which had been founded as an Arab military garrison in 641–42. By the Fatimid period (969–1171) it was the largest population center in Egypt, and it continued to grow after the Fatimids founded Cairo (al-Madīna al-qāhira, “the city victorious”) as their capital and built their palace compound just north of the city in 972. The Jewish population of Fustat at the turn of the millennium was about 4,000. The geographer al-Maḡdisī (d. ca. 990) wrote that Fustat had displaced Baghdad as “the greatest glory of the Muslims” and the hub of world culture and commerce. The sense of living at the very center of civilization pervades the correspondence of both traders and administrators of the Jewish community during this period. The vast number of books preserved in fragments or as titles in book lists from the Cairo *Genizah attest to the Palestinian congregation’s important role in Fustat’s robust cultural life. The Genizah storage-room preserved some 280,000 folio pages or manuscripts, mainly from the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. About fifteen thousand are documents (letters, contracts, receipts, amulets, lists, accounts); the rest are fragments of literary manuscripts (*Bible and *Bible commentary, rabbinic literature, philosophical writings, *science, *poetry, and belles lettres).

Jews’ political status under Fatimid rule was in principle governed by the same dhimma (pact of protection and subordination) that governed the People of the Book elsewhere in Islamic-ruled territory. The dhimmi* was required to pay the jizya tax and abide by various strictures of subordination in exchange for protection and religious tolerance. In practice, except for the years of anti-Christian and anti-Jewish edicts under al-Ḥākim (1009–21 and 1012–21, respectively), the Fatimids refrained from enforcing sumptuary laws and appointed Jews and Christians to high-ranking bureaucratic posts and as retainers at the court in Cairo.

The Jews, for their part, profited from the Fatimids’ general liberality. Many Jews served the court not only in formal appointments but also in informal positions; for example, the *Karaites merchant and banker Abū Saʿd Abraham ben Yashar al-Tustarī, who purveyed luxury goods to the Fatimid court. Al-Tustarī provided the caliph al-Zāhir (1021–36) with a slave girl of Nubian, Abyssinian, or Sudanese origin named Raṣād, who bore the future caliph al-Mustanṣir (1036–94); during her regency she maintained al-Tustarī as her financial manager. Al-Tustarī’s brother Abū Naṣr, together with the Karaite Abū Naṣr David b. Isaac ha-Levi (a bureaucrat in the tax office), mediated between the Jewish community, *Rabbanite and Karaite alike, and the Fatimid administration. Jews benefited widely from the Fatimids’ use of the petition as a means of rule: Anyone could petition the court for redress in personal or collective issues. That the Genizah also preserved petitions of Muslims and Christians suggests that Jewish courtiers used their co-religionists’ petitions as models.

Although it remains unclear whether the Iraqi yeshivot, the Palestinian yeshivah, or some combination of forces governed Egypt’s Jews in the tenth century, by century’s end, all three were already engaging in stiff competition over the loyalty of long-distance merchants in Fustat, especially those engaged in the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean trade. Some Jews also chose to join the Karaites; the rabbinic leadership was well aware of the possibility of their doing so and worked actively to retain their loyalty.

Like most Mediterranean Jewish centers, Egypt housed three distinct Jewish communities: the Palestinian Rabbanites, the Iraqi Rabbanites, and Karaite. However, in Egypt, they introduced an important change to Jewish communal organization. Having worked together closely over the first Fatimid century (with Karaites becoming central players in rabbinic politics in both Egypt and *Syria), they founded a new leadership office called the raʾīs al-yahūd (head of the Jews) of the Fatimid empire. The first incumbents were a series of Egyptian notables, including Rabbanite physicians at the Fatimid court, but through the political marriage of David ben Daniel (1082–94) to the daughter of a Karaite notable, the office came to serve all three Jewish communities. It also filled a vacuum in Jewish leadership: The rabbinic academies (yeshivot) in Baghdad had closed after 1040, and the Palestinian yeshivah had disbanded after the Seljuk conquest of *Jerusalem in 1073 and reconstituted itself in Tyre and then Damascus; many Jews fled to Egypt after the Crusader conquest of Jerusalem in 1099. The Fustat Jews who created the new office therefore replaced the old centralized leadership offices in *Jerusalem and Baghdad and ultimately persuaded the Palestinian yeshivah itself to move to Fustat around 1127. As the Latin Crusader kingdoms took over the eastern Fatimid realm and the Jews concentrated their administration in Egypt, the old ecumenical structure of governance centered on the yeshivot in Palestine and Iraq now gave way to a local administration centered on Egypt and transcending the local interests of the congregation.

The strength of this centralized Jewish community emerged particularly clearly in its institutions of communal governance, such as care for the indigent. Although Fustat and Cairo are overrepresented in Genizah material attesting to poverty relief, the community also loomed large among Mediterranean Jews seeking aid, and many migrated there to benefit from the communal dole. Charity lists also include numerous converts to Judaism, some of whom, such as peasants hoping to better their lot in the city, may have converted to benefit from the extensive Jewish system of poor relief. The indigent benefited from private benefactors, fines, taxes, foundations, bequests, and occasional collections, which funded distributions of food, clothing, and outright grants of money and met exigencies such as the ransom of captives and books after the First Crusade of 1096.

The community's reputation attracted the poet Judah *Halevi (ca. 1085–1141) and the philosopher, physician, and jurist Moses Maimonides (1138–1204). Although Halevi merely visited over a period of months on his way to Palestine, Maimonides settled in Fustat for good around 1166 and served the Ayyubid vizier al-Qāḍī al-Fāḍil as physician. He wrote two of his three major works, the Mishneh Torah and the Guide of the Perplexed, in Fustat, and draft pages have surfaced in the Genizah in his own hand, in addition to numerous *responsa. Maimonides also served as ra'īs al-yahūd (1171–ca. 1177 and ca. 1195–1204), although he was forced out of office temporarily by Abū Zikrī Sar Shalom ben Nathanel ha-Levi.

During the Ayyubid period (1171–1250), the office of ra'īs al-yahūd continued to be held by a series of Maimonides' descendants. These included his son Abraham, also a physician at the Ayyubid court (1205–37); his grandson David (1238–1300); his great-grandson Joshua; and his great-great-grandson David. The dynasty came to an end in the 1370s when David b. Joshua (d. 1410) left Egypt for Aleppo, Syria, bringing a large library of *Judeo-Arabic manuscripts with him and adding important works to the already distinguished legacy of Maimonidean Sufism. Edward Pococke (1604–1691) and Robert Huntington (1637–1701), both chaplains to English merchants in Aleppo, eventually acquired and donated many of these manuscripts to the Bodleian Library in Oxford, England.

The Mamluk era (1250–1517) witnessed a progressive deepening of state and judicial interference in dhimmi affairs, although in large part this continued the previous pattern whereby Jews took the initiative in inviting government intervention in settling intracommunal disputes. After 1391, many Iberian Jews and conversos* fleeing forced conversions and anti-converso riots in *Spain migrated to Egypt. Over the course of the Mamluk period, the population of Fustat shifted northward to Cairo, and the population of Egypt generally declined; the Genizah materials accordingly become less numerous.

For further reading, see: M. R. Cohen, Jewish Self-Government in Medieval Egypt: The Origins of the Office of Head of the Jews, ca. 1065–1126 (1980); idem, Poverty and Charity in the Jewish Community of Medieval Egypt (2005); P. Fenton, "The Literary Legacy of David ben Joshua, Last of the Maimonidean Nēgīdim," Jewish Quarterly Review 75 (1984): 1–56; S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, 6 vols (1967–93); G. Khan, Arabic Legal and Administrative Documents in the Cambridge Genizah Collections (1993); and M. Rustow, Heresy and the Politics of Community: The Jews of the Fatimid Caliphate (2008); see also MEMOIRS AND LIFEWRITING: MIZRAHI. Map 5 MARINA RUSTOW

Ehrenburg, Ilya (1891–1967), poet, journalist, and writer, was born in Kiev. He joined the *Bolshevik underground and was arrested in 1908. Released from jail, he moved to Paris where he met Vladimir Lenin and also worked with Leon *Trotsky in *Vienna. Disillusioned with the Bolsheviks, he became a bohemian poet and journalist. Ehrenburg returned to Moscow in 1917 and barely survived the civil war. He went back to Europe in 1921 where he wrote his first novel, The Adventures of Julio Jurenito and His Disciples; one chapter foretells the *Holocaust.

During World War II, Ehrenburg was the most prominent journalist in Moscow, urging soldiers to fight the Germans and decrying *Nazi atrocities against the Jews. After Stalin's death in 1953, Ehrenburg became the leading liberal voice in the country. His memoirs, People, Years, Life (1960–65), were a major source of inspiration for Soviet Jewry. For further reading, see J. Rubenstein, Tangled Loyalties: The Life and Times of Ilya Ehrenburg (1999). JOSHUA RUBENSTEIN Einhorn, David (1808–1879), led the movement for "radical reform" in the development of Reform *Judaism in the *United States. See CHICAGO; JUDAISM, REFORM: NORTH AMERICA.

Ein Sof (or Ayn Sof) literally, "no end," is a term used in Kabbalah to denote the most supreme divine entity, beyond the realm of the sefirot, which cannot be described by any positive symbol. Ein Sof is an abbreviation of a long series of negative phrases like "no beginning," "no boundary," and "no measurement"; an accurate translation is "infinity." The concept was derived by early mystics, mainly from the circle in Gerona, *Spain, in the first half of the thirteenth century, who were familiar with Jewish rationalistic thought; they used it as a counterpart of the Aristotelian conception of the First Cause or Unmoved Mover who is the original source of all movement without itself moving or being moved. Some kabbalists, as indicated in some sections of the Zohar, identified Ein Sof with the first sefirah, Keter ("crown"), which is called ayin ("nothingness"), although it is really the essence and source of everything. For further reading, see G. Scholem, Kabbalah (1974); and I. Tishby, The Wisdom of the Zohar (1989). JOSEPH DAN Einsatzgruppen. During World War II *Nazi occupying forces in Eastern Europe made use of "special operation units" to kill various categories of "undesirable" civilians, including Jews, *Roma, and communists. Specially trained Einsatzgruppen were given principal responsibility for these mass murders in territories that fell under German control; they were aided by other units drawn from Himmler's paramilitary SS units, the Wehrmacht, and native collaborators throughout western Russia. These killings took on immense proportions, culminating in the slaughter of more than 33,000 Jews at Babi Yar, just outside of Kiev, on September 29–30, 1941. By the end of 1941, these units had gunned down between 500,000 to 800,000 Jews in mass executions. See HOLOCAUST.

Einstein, Albert (1879–1955), a theoretical physicist and recipient of the Nobel Prize for Physics in 1921, among many other awards, was one of the most important scientific figures of the twentieth century. Born in *Germany into a secular Jewish family and educated in Switzerland, he was forced to flee *Nazi Germany in 1933, ultimately emigrating to the United States where he became a citizen in 1940. Einstein spent the remainder of his career at the Institute for Advanced Studies at Princeton University. In 1952, after the death of Chaim *Weizmann, Prime Minister David *Ben-Gurion offered Einstein the ceremonial position of president of the State of *Israel. Einstein declined the position, writing, "All my life I have dealt with objective matters, hence I lack both the natural aptitude and the experience to deal properly with people and to exercise official function. I am the more distressed over these circumstances because my relationship with the Jewish people became my strongest human tie once I achieved complete clarity about our precarious position among the nations of the world" (W. Isaacson, Einstein: His Life and Universe [2007], 522). Einstein bequeathed his personal papers to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Together with Hebrew University, Princeton University Press is engaged in publishing The Collected Papers of Albert Einstein; it is anticipated that thirty volumes will ultimately appear.

Eldad ha-Dani was a traveler in the late ninth century CE who claimed to be a descendant of the lost Israelite tribe of Dan (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES; TRIBES, TWELVE). In the 880s Eldad appeared in the Jewish community of Kairouan in *North Africa and then in *Spain, relating tales in Biblical *Hebrew about his adventures and the other lost *Israelite tribes he had encountered. He also reported their quasi-halakhic ritual slaughter practices and dietary regulations, which were similar to normative halakhah. Many Jews believed his stories and found *messianic implications in his accounts of independent Jewish kingdoms. Although some rabbinic authorities, such as *Meir ben Barukh of Rothenburg and Abraham *ibn Ezra, were convinced that Eldad was an imposter, others cited his halakhic teachings without reservation. Modern scholarship continues to debate Eldad Ha-Dani's origins and authenticity. *Travel writings, attributed to him, which exist in several different medieval manuscript versions, were popular and influential; the first printed edition is from Mantua in 1480. An English translation appears in E. N. Adler, Jewish Travellers (1930). For a recent survey of scholarship, see D. J. Wasserstein, "Eldad ha-Dani and Prester John," in Prester John, The Mongols and the Ten Lost Tribes, ed. C. F. Buckingham and B. Hamilton (1995); see also TRAVEL WRITING. KATE FRIEDMAN

Election: See CHOSENNESS

Elijah: Biblical and Post-Biblical Traditions. The *prophet Elijah, who is believed to have lived in the northern kingdom of *Israel in the ninth century BCE, stands out for his zealotry in support of monotheism and against idolatry. His sudden appearance on the biblical stage (1 Kgs 17:1), his miraculous ascent to heaven (2 Kgs 2:11), and the miracles that he performed (such as multiplying food [1 Kgs 17:10–16] and resurrecting the dead [1 Kgs 17:17–24]) add to his mysterious image. Elijah is also mentioned in *Malachi 3:23–24 as the prophet who will come at the end of days, before the "Day of the Lord," to call for *repentance. His confrontations with *Ahab, king of Israel, and his wife Jezebel (especially 1 Kgs 21) and a short furious letter, sent to one of the Judean kings (2 Chron 21:12–15), further strengthen his image as a warrior for the sake of heaven.

Elijah's biblical image underwent a drastic shift in post-biblical literature. Although Elijah still maintains his fiery persona in the *Wisdom of Ben Sira 47–48, written at the beginning of the second century BCE, in *rabbinic literature he is generally portrayed quite differently. On the one hand, the Rabbis condemn him for his jealousy; on the other, they portray him as a scholar of *Torah, who frequents their academies and participates in their discussions. He reveals heavenly secrets to human beings and comes to the rescue of communities and individuals, wherever and whenever needed, appearing in a range of disguises (as an old man, a warrior, a harlot, a Roman minister, etc.). Elijah's transformation fits the general tendency of the Rabbis to portray biblical figures as part of their world and ways of life. It is also a rabbinic response to the bitter outcomes of the First and Second *Jewish Wars against *Rome, which were instigated by religious and nationalistic *zealots. The rabbinic portrayal of Elijah continued to develop in the generations to come: Elijah is a welcomed guest at every *circumcision ceremony, and the door is opened for him at every *Passover seder (and a cup of wine is left for him on the seder table). Most important, Jews have anticipated his arrival and his proclamation of the coming of the messiah in every given moment (Plate 7), particularly at the Saturday evening havdalah ceremony, which marks the separation between the *Sabbath and ordinary days of the week. For further reading, see L. Ginzberg, Legends of the Jews (1956), index.

AVIGDOR SHINAN

Elisha was an Israelite *prophet who became *Elijah's attendant, disciple, and successor. In 1 Kings 19, God commanded Elijah to anoint Elisha as his successor. Elijah found Elisha plowing with twelve yoke of oxen and threw his mantle over him; Elisha slaughtered his oxen and followed Elijah. After Elijah was elevated to heaven (2 Kgs 2:11), the prophets of *Jericho declared that his spirit rested on Elisha. Elisha settled in *Samaria and held the office of prophet in the northern kingdom of *Israel for sixty years. A cycle of legends has been incorporated into 2 Kings describing his many miracles, including multiplying oil and food (2 Kgs 4), healing barrenness and leprosy (2 Kgs 5), and resurrecting the dead (2 Kgs 4, 13:20–21). Elisha continued Elijah's campaign against the house of *Ahab, ordering the anointing of Jehu, son of Jehoshaphat, as king of *Israel (2 Kgs 9) and charging him with the destruction of Ahab's family.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Elisha ben Abuya was a second-century-CE Rabbi who has caught the Jewish imagination from the rabbinic period to contemporary times. This interest stems from his image as a heretic and sinner: Talmudic sources accuse him of a range of misdeeds, including the murder of young Torah scholars (JT Hagigah 2,1), harlotry and desecration of the *Sabbath (BT Hagigah 15a), theological denial of retribution (BT Kidushin 39b), and holding *dualistic beliefs (BT Hagigah 15a). These various reports have led to a number of historical conjectures about Elisha ben Abuya being an apostate, as well as efforts to identify his alternate religious identity. Possibilities include *Gnosticism, *Christianity, and *Persian *Dualism. Elisha ben Abuya is the only rabbinic figure about whom such reports are preserved in the *Talmud; rabbinic texts sometimes refer to him by the unique sobriquet, aḥer, "the other." This otherness has been a source of fascination for modern Jews in search of precedents for contemporary rebellion from traditional *Judaism and Jewish practice. In Milton Steinberg's 1939 historical novel, As A Driven Leaf, Elisha ben Abuya is imagined as a man so entranced by the intellectual freedom of Greco-Roman culture and the apparent possibility of achieving philosophical certainty that he not only abandons his faith but also betrays his beleaguered people.

Close examination of the rabbinic sources suggests there is little we can learn about a historical Elisha ben Abuya; he can only be considered as a literary exemplar. The key question, therefore, is what message the rabbinic storytellers wished to convey by means of this figure. There is a strong distinction between *tannaitic traditions (up to the early third century) and the later *amoraic texts. The tannaitic materials treat Elisha ben Abuya as a legitimate member of the rabbinic class and show no awareness of his sin or heresy. Moreover, if there is any historical lesson to be derived from these traditions about him, it is that he died a *martyr's death. Subsequent amoraic sources completely rework his image and actions; the primary drive for this reworking is interpretative. An enigmatic expression, occurring in T. Hagigah 2, a passage that is essentially a parable, speaks of Elisha ben Abuya's having "entered the orchard and cut the shoots." This expression required explanation by later Rabbis, which in turn generated the host of reports about his sinful behavior. Once his sinful image had been established, succeeding editors employed his figure to work out theological issues that were of concern to them, specifically the power of Torah being put to the test in the case of a sinful sage (Babylonian Talmud) and the ideal relations between master and disciple (Jerusalem Talmud). Thus, the various stories told at this layer of the tradition have little to do with the historical man and reflect the ideological agenda of subsequent generations. Nineteenth- and twentieth-century reworkings of Elisha ben Abuya have continued the process of recasting his image in accordance with contemporary concerns. For a detailed analysis of these traditions, see A. Goshen-Gottstein, The Sinner and the Amnesiac (2000).

ALON GOSHEN-GOTTSTEIN

Elul is the sixth month of the Jewish calendar, equivalent to August and/ or September on the Gregorian calendar. Since Elul precedes Tishri, when the *High Holidays take place, it has traditionally been considered a time of *repentance. See CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Emancipation refers here to the acquisition by Jews of the civil and political rights granted to the majority populations of modern nation-states. It was a process fraught with ambiguities and contradictions. Scholars disagree over whether Jewish emancipation is best understood as a single moment within the life of a given country or whether it proceeded in stages, with expansion of privileges and granting of legal equality, and culminating in full political rights. Moreover, no single model for achieving emancipation is paradigmatic. In *France, the French Revolution offers a case of a legislative assembly deliberating and eventually passing specific laws allowing for Jewish citizenship (see EMANCIPATION: FRANCE). In other areas, such as northern *Italy, the Rhineland, and southern *Germany, emancipation was imposed by foreign occupier. In the *Ottoman Empire, Jews obtained a high degree of formal equality through two governmental decrees (1856 and 1869) promulgated by a reformist bureaucracy. Jews in *North Africa received legal equality (in contravention of established Islamic law [see DHIMMI and ISLAM AND JUDAISM]) through the diplomatic pressure imposed by European colonial powers. In an extreme instance of colonialist interference, the French government declared Algerian Jews, but not Algerian Muslims, citizens of France in 1870.

In the *United States, Jewish emancipation required no special deliberation or legislation (with the exception of a few states): Jews simply benefited from the federal prohibition on religious criteria for exercising political rights. In *Britain, in contrast, Jewish disabilities were whittled away over the course of many decades; the last vestiges (the eligibility of Jews to be seated in Parliament or elected as Fellows of Oxford and Cambridge) were only legislated away between 1858 and 1871. Expectations directed at Jews also differed. In France it was tacitly assumed that Jewish citizens would undergo voluntary régénération (e.g., cultural assimilation, religious reform, occupational restructuring), whereas most German states of the Restoration and Vormärz periods passed laws requiring Jews to undertake such changes prior to and as a pre-condition for emancipation.

Jewish emancipation generally proceeded in three stages: an era of pre-emancipation amelioration of Jewish status, a classical era of Jewish emancipation, and a post-emancipation period. The pre-emancipation era began when Jews were granted expanded residential and occupational liberties in areas of northern Italy and Western Europe during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. The most explicit case was that of Livorno (Leghorn), established in the late sixteenth century as a Ligurian free port by the Grand Duke of Tuscany. The 1593 "Livornina" document granted Jews full religious freedom (and permitted conversos* to revert to Judaism without fear of Inquisitorial prosecution), among other benefits. Livorno was a trading zone devoid of established guilds and Jews had a range of occupational choices, although the document encouraged Jewish merchant activity above all. The "Livornina" did stipulate a requirement for periodic renewal, a limitation compared with most classical emancipation laws; the Jewish population, however, was never expelled.

Britain's Jewish Naturalization Act or "Jew Bill" of 1753 has also been cited as a milestone on the path to emancipation. Yet even had the bill not undergone quick repeal, its narrow provisions would have benefited only a handful of individuals. More significant was the 1740 Plantation Act, which permitted Jews and dissenting Protestants to become naturalized British subjects (foregoing religious oaths offensive to either group) in return for seven years of residence in Britain's western hemisphere colonies. By comparison, Emperor Joseph II's 1782 Edict of Toleration, which historians have touted for advancing Jewish claims to legal equality in *Habsburg lands, was modest in its aims and inconsistent in application. It removed long-standing restrictions on Jewish dress and eliminated formal prohibitions on Jews' entry into Christian guilds. At the same time it subjected Jews to a series of regulations geared more to advancing the administrative prerogatives of the absolutist regime than Jewish equality. Nevertheless, the Edict of Toleration, along with such individual reforms as Louis XVI's 1784 revocation of the special body toll on Jews, attests to a fresh humanitarian spirit on the eve of the French Revolution.

If the French Revolution ushered in the period of classical emancipation, it was quickly followed by a phase of backtracking. Prussia, which had removed most restrictions on Jews in 1812, imposed new ones after 1816, establishing a multi-tiered policy with more onerous disabilities directed at Jews living in newly acquired and less Germanized territories like Posen. Other German states, notably, Württemberg, Bavaria, and Saxony, took severe measures to undercut Jewish status after the fall of Napoleon. Yet Germany's multiple sovereignties and the consequent patchwork character of Jewish rights made it a laboratory for Jewish adaptation to modernity during the first half of the nineteenth century. Especially in the western parts of the country, Jews had briefly enjoyed full citizenship status under French influence only to see it withdrawn. In subsequent decades they created a cultural dynamic to demonstrate their worthiness as citizens; this era saw the emergence of *Reform and Modern Orthodox Judaism, as well as Wissenschaft des Judentums, the movement to reexamine Judaism and Jewish history using modern academic tools.

The 1840s witnessed a shift in public opinion regarding the "Jewish Question," despite the failures of the 1848 Revolutions (emancipation in Prussia and Habsburg Austria, for instance, was reversed when the uprisings were put down). The increasingly liberal orientation of the middle class in *Central Europe strongly facilitated the goal of equalizing Jewish status on a local and regional level, and emancipation advanced with the fortunes of Austrian (1867) and German unification (partly in 1869 and finally in 1871).

The situation in the *Russian Empire, where the majority of world Jewry resided in the second half of the nineteenth century, was quite different. Traditions of natural law had barely penetrated, and rights were not part of the political vocabulary. Jews, like other peoples, were subjected to shifting policies based on imperial exigency alone. Catherine the Great's early benevolent example was not followed; the draconian policies of Nicholas I (1827–55) were followed by the more benign approach of Alexander II (1855–81). However, emancipation along western lines was entirely inconsistent with tsarist absolutism. Relief in Russia came only under the revolutionary regime headed by Alexander Kerensky in 1917. With the division of the empire after World War I, successor states like *Poland, *Lithuania, and *Latvia instituted formal equality for their Jewish subjects (although bitterly contesting the "minority group rights" written into their constitutions by foreign powers).

Although Russia was the last major case of Jewish emancipation, questions of Jewish status in European nations remained. In fact, in the post-emancipation period *antisemitism could be more demoralizing to Jews than previously, because it now occurred in a context in which legal redress had already been achieved. The *Dreyfus Affair in France and the outbreak of political party-based antisemitism in Germany and Austria during the 1870s and 1880s suggested ominously that formal emancipation was not quite the panacea that many Jews had assumed.

For further reading, see P. Birnbaum and I. Katznelson, eds., Paths of Emancipation (1995); J. Karp, The Politics of Jewish Commerce: Economic Thought and Emancipation in Europe (2008); and R. Mahler, Jewish Emancipation: A Selection of Documents (1941).

JONATHAN KARP

Emancipation, France. *Emancipation was bestowed on Jews residing in *France and French-held territories by the French Revolution. The fact that French Jews, in stages, if not all at once, acquired the rights and privileges accorded other Frenchmen determined the nature of the Jewish community that evolved during the nineteenth century. It also provided a model for Jews of *Central and *Eastern Europe, who aspired to similar status in their countries of residence. Four basic documents defined the emancipation of French Jews. The first two – the August 26, 1789, "Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen" and the subsequent constitution of the new republic – did not address the Jews directly, but implicitly granted Jews the same rights as other French people. Some National Assembly deputies, nevertheless, did seek to restrict Jews to "passive" citizenship, whereas "active" citizenship alone conferred the right to vote and hold office and was by law a prerogative determined solely by financial status. Despite the lack of grounds for discriminating in any way other than financial, the question, once open, festered during the remainder of the National Assembly sessions.

Fearful that they would find themselves reduced to second-class citizenship, Jews in southern France of *Sephardic origin and from the former Papal States, who were more likely to have the financial means to qualify for active citizenship and who were more culturally integrated into the fledgling nation, vigorously campaigned for legal recognition of their right to active citizenship. Their success was embedded in an emancipation decree of January 28, 1790, which applied only to them. It then became essential for the *Ashkenazim to seek an equivalent measure. On September 27, 1791, shortly before the dissolution of the National Assembly, with the support of Count Mirabeau, Count Clermont-Tonnerre, Abbé Grégoire, and attorney Jacques Godard (whose influence in revolutionary circles was considerable), deputy Adrien du Port made the definitive argument that led to full emancipation. Reasoning that freedom of worship does not permit any distinction in the political rights of citizens on the basis of their creed and that any other interpretation would be inconsistent with the new constitution, du Port demanded that a decree be passed granting all Jews of France the privileges of full citizens. His argument was persuasive and the proposition was enthusiastically accepted. For more on this topic, see P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (1998); and S. Schwarzfuchs, Napoleon, the Jews and the Sanhedrin (1979).

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

Encyclopedias. In the nineteenth century, with the accumulation of scholarly literature generated by the German Wissenschaft des Judentums* movement, the need was felt for an encyclopedia on Jews and Judaism to summarize this emerging body of knowledge. However, none of the many European efforts came to fruition. The first successful venture, the twelve-volume The Jewish Encyclopedia (JE; New York, 1901–09), was produced in North America by European and North American scholars under managing editor Isidore Singer. Although generally considered a success, its coverage of modern Hebrew *literature and *Eastern European Jewry was poor. The Russian language Evreiskaia entsiklopediia (1909–1916), based on the JE and edited by Russian scholars, addressed these deficiencies.

In the 1920s, Jakob Klatzkin and Nahum Goldmann began planning a new encyclopedia in German, English, and Hebrew. The German version, called Encyclopaedia Judaica (EJ) and projected to total sixteen volumes, began appearing in *Berlin in 1928 under Klatzkin's editorship. Sadly the rise of the *Nazi regime in Germany put an end to the project, and the tenth volume, published in 1933, completing the letter "L," was the last one. Two volumes of the Hebrew version Eshkol were also published during this period, but the English version was postponed because of financial constraints. Many consider the EJ, with its high-quality entries and sumptuous production, to be the finest Jewish encyclopedia ever produced.

A project to produce a general encyclopedia in *Yiddish, with some Jewish content, was spearheaded by a committee at *YIVO, headed by Nachman Meisel and underwritten by the Simon *Dubnow Fund in the 1930s. Unfortunately World War II intervened, and the potential audience for such a work was all but eliminated. Still, five volumes of the Algemeine entsiqlopedye, covering the first two letters of the alphabet, ultimately appeared (1934–44), as well as seven volumes of Yidn, the section devoted to Jewish subject matter (1939–66). Although the quality was uneven, this encyclopedia testified to the advances made by Yiddish as a medium for scholarly discussion. The four-volume Jewish People Past and Present (1946–55) incorporated a good deal of material from the Yidn volumes. The Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, published in ten volumes from 1939–43 and edited by Isaac Landman, aimed at a popular audience. Although some of the articles suffered from a lack of scholarly expertise, special attention was devoted to American Jewish history and biography and other topics not covered by the EJ, thus assuring its place among the important Judaic reference works of the twentieth century.

The founding of *Israel coincided with the launch of a major Hebrew encyclopedia, Entsiqlopedyah ha-'Ivrit (EI). This general encyclopedia, with about one-quarter Judaic content, was initiated in 1949 with a projected length of sixteen volumes. By the time it was completed in 1985 it extended to thirty-five volumes, including two supplementary volumes (1966, 1983) and an index volume (1985). Volume 6 was devoted entirely to the Land of Israel. Among its editors were Judah Kaufman (Even-Shemuel), Joseph Klausner, Ben-Zion Netanyahu, Isaiah Leibowitz, and Joshua Prawer. Despite some deficiencies, this encyclopedia is generally considered a major achievement of modern Israeli scholarship.

In the late 1950s Nahum Goldmann revived his plan to produce an English-language version of the EJ. A company with a large staff was established to produce an up-to-date English-language encyclopedia; it turned out to be, for the most part, an independent publication. Unique among such ventures, the entire work was to appear at one time. Despite difficulties, volumes two to sixteen of the Encyclopaedia Judaica were published in 1971; the index volume appeared in 1972. Large articles that missed the deadline were included at the end of Vol. 16. Publishing the entire encyclopedia at once meant that it was up-to-date but it suffered from numerous mistakes and typographical errors. Nonetheless, the English-language EJ has enjoyed tremendous success and acclaim. A number of yearbooks also appeared, with new or updated articles, summaries of current events, and necrologies; a 1982 Decennial Book summarized the previous ten years in Jewish life and letters. In 1997, a CD-Rom version, including material from all the yearbooks, was released.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century the publisher Thomson Gale undertook the publication of a new edition of the EJ, under the editorship of Michael Berenbaum and Fred Skolnik. The new EJ, which appeared in January 2007 in print (twenty-two volumes) and online versions, is not a complete revision: Only a portion of the articles were revised or rewritten, at the discretion of the editors. Hundreds of new entries reflect new areas of interest and importance, such as women and aspects of popular culture. Critics have noted that the coverage is uneven, that some editors were more diligent in their work than others, and that the whole work was rushed to publication without correcting mistakes and typographical errors, many of which survive from the first edition. For better or for worse, this encyclopedia will be the primary point of entry to the world of Judaic scholarship for the foreseeable future.

Along with the multi-volume encyclopedias, a number of one-volume reference works have been published over the years. Worthy of mention are The Standard Jewish Encyclopedia (1959); New Standard Jewish Encyclopedia (1970), edited by Cecil Roth and based on the EI, widely considered the best one-volume Judaica reference work of its era; and the Encyclopedic Dictionary of Judaica (Everyman's Judaica) (1974) a spinoff of the English EJ, with 15,000 entries and many illustrations, intended as a quick-reference tool.

A number of important specialized dictionaries and encyclopedias have appeared since World War II. Among the most important are the nine-volume Entsiqlopedyah miqra'it (1965–88), summarizing the best of Israeli biblical scholarship; Entsiqlopedyah talmudit (1949–), twenty-seven volumes to date, an encyclopedia of the Talmud and rabbinic literature; The Encyclopedia of Judaism, edited by J. Neusner, A. Avery-Peck, and W. S. Green (1st ed., three volumes, 2000; 2nd ed., four volumes, 2005); Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, edited by I. Gutmann (1st ed., 1990); Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, edited by P. E. Hyman, D. Ofer, and A. Shalvi (CD-ROM; ed., 2006); The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, edited by R. J. Z. Werblowsky and G. Wigoder (1997); and The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe, edited by G. D. Hundert (two volumes, 2008).

For further reading, see S. Brisman, Jewish Research Literature. vol. 2: A History and Guide to Judaic Encyclopedias and Lexicons (1987); and T. Wiener, "Encyclopedias," Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (2007).

BARRY DOV WALFISH

Engagement: See BETROTHAL; MARRIAGE

England: Middle Ages. Jews lived in medieval England for more than two centuries; the first settlers arrived at what Hebrew sources referred to as the "Isles of the Sea" from the small French Jewish community of Rouen in the wake of William the Conqueror in 1066. England's Jews were summarily expelled in 1290. For a short period in the twelfth century, contemporary chroniclers commented that the Jews were accepted and "ministered much to the prosperity of this country." They were regularly granted royal charters from the reign of Henry I (1100–35) onward. Some of the richer Jews, like Aaron of Lincoln, lent money to members of high society and to the new Cistercian monasteries. Some monasteries, which had once taken loans from Jews, went on to buy up the encumbered mortgaged estates of Jewish debtors.

In 1189, at the coronation of Richard I in London where Jewish elders had gathered to pay their respects, a brawl ensued that turned into a massacre. Attacks on Jews spread northward over the next three months through Colchester, Norwich, Thetford, and Stamford, ending tragically in 1190 at York with the infamous massacre occurring on *Shabbat ha-Gadol. Besieged in the castle of York and urged on by Rabbi Yom Tov of Joigny, the majority of the York Jews took their own lives rather than surrender to the Christian mob. In two years, more than four hundred Jews died. There can be no doubt that at York the massacre was premeditated and inflamed by the machinations of a monk and by Richard Malebisse, a local nobleman, who was indebted to the Jews.

Out of the embers of York came a government incentive to control and regulate England's Jewish communities. Beginning in 1194, Hubert Walter, the King's Justiciar and the father of English archives, set up archae or chests in which any written deed or agreement between Jew and Christian had henceforth to be deposited. The kings of England, who virtually owned the Jewish communities, could now control their *money lending. In return the Jews were frequently taxed and their debtors squeezed; this was particularly so under John (d. 1216) and Henry III (d. 1272). In the most infamous tallage or tax of 1210 a Jew had his teeth extracted day by day until he paid up. The greatest tallage came in 1240 and the last was collected in 1287. The Jewish community became known to subsequent historians as the "King's Milch Cow."

A view has prevailed that all medieval Jews were fabulously wealthy and that they became money lenders because Christians were forbidden from lending. In fact, many Christians lent money, and there were poorer Jews who found work as pawnbrokers, physicians (see MEDICINE), vintners, fishmongers, cheese mongers, goldsmiths, jewelers, soldiers, and even servants or wet nurses. Records of medieval English Jewry are particularly good because of the 1194 establishment of a separate government department, the Exchequer of the Jews. The Jewish Exchequer, which controlled other officials in the towns that had archae, regulated and recorded all Jewish lending and had two appointed Justices to try all legal cases involving Jews or their debtors. Much of its work was concerned with collecting the profits from Jewish money lending for the king. It has left behind a unique and unparalleled record of the lives of medieval England's Jews.

The Jew was also the target of specific legislation. In 1194 the Ordinances of the Jewry systematized how Jewish lending would be tolerated. In 1215, in accordance with the Fourth Lateran Council, Jews were compelled to wear badges with the sign of the *Ten Commandments. Subsequent legislation modified how Jews were to lend money and laid down exactly where they were to live. Earlier laws had limited the amount of interest that a Jewish creditor could charge to 43.5% per annum. By 1269, Jews were banned from lending money in return for rent charges and revenues from mortgages and, by 1271 from investing in property other than the houses in which they lived. Finally, in 1275, they were forbidden to lend money at interest, which led to some Jews advancing loans on wool or grain.

Hatred of Jews led to accusations of *ritual murder. The first was the case of William of Norwich in 1144. This was followed by accusations and arrests at Bury (1181), Gloucester (1186), Worcester (1192), and London (1244) and culminated in the cult of Little St. Hugh of Lincoln in 1255. At least four shrines to Christian boys who had allegedly been crucified by Jews at Easter were ultimately established. Accusations of *host desecration and blasphemy followed. There were often local outbursts of anti-Jewish violence. In 1278–79, the Jewish community as a whole was accused of clipping the coinage and melting down silver into ingots. Many were tried and brought to the Tower of London where some 279 were hanged.

Although English Jewry looked to rabbinical authorities in *France and *Germany for legal guidance, over several generations Jews developed their own rituals, traditions, and customs. There is evidence of more than twenty-four private and public synagogues, several *mikvaot (ritual baths), and ten burial grounds. Certainly Jews celebrated the main Jewish *festivals – even when incarcerated in the Tower of London some Jewish prisoners paid bribes so that they might celebrate their sacred days. They also imported kosher wine. Elegies written by English Jews to the martyrs of massacres at Blois and York are extant. Most Jews were trilingual, but for those who were not, the *Passover haggadah was translated into French. Jewish communities were highly organized; the Northampton community, for example, possessed a communal seal and had rental income from houses it owned that paid for the upkeep of the *synagogue and the *cemetery.

Medieval Anglo-Jewry left behind epitaphs, graffiti, marriage contracts, and business deeds in Latin, French, and Hebrew. The community bred its own legal experts who wrote *responsa on various topics. Rabbi Moses of London wrote a treatise on punctuation (c. 1234) and Jacob of London on the "Tree of Life." Just before the 1290 expulsion, Meir of Norwich wrote a poem, "Put a Curse on My Enemy," describing the deteriorating conditions of Jewish life. On November 1, 1290, under Edward I, all Jews were expelled from England. They were not officially readmitted until 1656.

Important studies include C. Roth, History of the Jews in England, 3rd ed. (1978); R. B. Dobson, The Jews of York and the Massacre of March 1190 (1974); P. Skinner, ed., Jews in Medieval Britain: Historical, Literary and Archaeological Perspectives (2003); R. R. Mundill, England's Jewish Solution: Experiment and Expulsion 1262–1290 (1998); and idem, The King's Jews: Money, Massacre and Exodus in Medieval England (2010). See also COMMERCE: MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN EUROPE; FRANCE: MIDDLE AGES; FRANCE, SOUTH-EAST: MIDDLE AGES; and BRITAIN, EARLY MODERN AND MODERN; Map 8. ROBIN R. MUNDILL

Enlightenment, Jewish: See HASKALAH

Enoch, Books of: See ESCHATOLOGY; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE

Entertainment. "Love and marriage," according to the 1950s hit song of the same title by Jewish songwriter Sammy Cahn, "go together like a horse and carriage." The same could be said of Jews and the entertainment business in America. Jews have been so active in every field of American popular culture that one could hardly imagine American society without them. This has made Jews a ready target for antisemites, beginning with Henry Ford in the 1920s and continuing to the present day, who have accused them of "controlling" the entire entertainment and media industry. An article in Time Magazine (October 2, 1978) once estimated that 80% of the professional comedians in the United States were Jewish (see COMEDY AND COMEDIANS).

Vaudeville was the most popular form of entertainment beginning in the mid-nineteenth century in America, and there were many prominent Jewish vaudevillians, including Barney Bernard, Irving Kaufman, and Monroe Silver. These comedians used heavily accented routines, known as dialect humor, to poke fun at Jewish mannerisms. They were exceedingly popular among both Jews and non-Jews; Silver's 1913 landmark recording, "Cohen on the Telephone," was purportedly the first comedy recording to sell a million records.

By the turn of the twentieth century in *New York City, Jews had developed an entire theatrical culture of their own, known as the Second Avenue *Yiddish *Theater. On the eve of *World War I, two dozen Yiddish theaters were operating simultaneously in New York (including those that specialized in Yiddish-language vaudeville), with dozens of others scattered throughout the country. Jews flocked to classic plays, often translated into Yiddish from European languages, as well as to what were called shund (literally, "trash") – light entertainments from melodramas to operettas. Many of the most famous performers of the Yiddish stage, like Jacob Adler, Paul Muni, and Molly Picon, crossed over to Broadway in the 1920s and 1930s, in a move that was decried by Yiddish newspapers as going avek tsu di goyim – "off to the Gentiles." However, by the 1920s, comedians like Fanny Brice, Eddie Cantor, and George Jessel, all American-born children of Jewish immigrants, had risen to the heights of American popular culture. Much of their success derived from comic material that, although still relying to a large extent on Jewish stereotypes, presented Jews as more fully rounded human beings.

Harley Erdman has speculated that fully half of the entertainment business in New York was "in Jewish hands" at the turn of the twentieth century, meaning that Jewish producers, theater owners, and agents were as heavily involved in the theater as they would be in the *film industry in succeeding decades. The only comparable industry, in terms of the extent of Jewish participation, was the garment trade; it is not surprising, then, that many Jewish comedy routines revolved around clothing, including Brice's signature song, "Second-Hand Rose," and Cantor's much reprised vaudeville routine, "A Belt in the Back."

By the middle of the twentieth century, Jews had gravitated to *television comedy; Milton Berle, Jack Benny, and George Burns adapted their vaudeville and *radio routines to the new medium with great success, and Sid Caesar's Show of Shows relied on the comic genius of writers like Mel Brooks, Neil Simon, Larry Gelbart, and Carl Reiner for its brilliant skits. The 1950s and 1960s were the high-water mark of Jewish comedy as well; most stand-up comedians were Jewish, including Mort Sahl, Lenny Bruce, Woody Allen, Myron Cohen, Don Rickles, and the team of Mike Nichols and Elaine May.

Such overrepresentation of Jews in the cultural life of a society is not unprecedented. As Oscar Schorske has argued, cultural life in *Vienna in the last decade of the nineteenth century was in large part the product of middle-class, largely assimilated Jewish artists. Steven Beller has recently validated this claim through statistical analysis and extended it to show that Jews shaped Viennese culture for more than seventy years – from 1867 until the Anschluss, the 1938 political union of Austria and *Nazi Germany.

Historical reasons are often adduced for the rise of the Jewish entertainer. The role of clown or jester has deep roots; Jewish weddings, particularly as they developed in Eastern European tradition, were occasions for broad comedy. The badkhan, or master of ceremonies, developed in the thirteenth century out of the tradition of the Jewish leyts, or fool, who was a kind of medieval troubadour. The status of the Jew as perennial outsider in western Christian culture is also frequently cited as a reason for Jews having an ironic lens on human experience. It is argued that their very marginality gives them a desperate desire to belong to society, but also makes them despair of ever being able to do so. This tension leads to the construction of an absurdist philosophy that flouts reason and logic.

Such psychological theories for the preponderance of Jewish entertainers generally depend on an analysis of Jewish humor, which is often characterized as self-deprecating. This humor is typically explained as a Jewish mode of coping with powerlessness and vulnerability by turning their rage inward, on themselves. Literary scholar Sanford Pinsker sees Jews as "laughing through their tears," finding solace from their pain in a rueful sense of irony. In this way, the schlemiel, or "loser," became an important figure in Jewish literature; as John Limon has put it, the schlemiel "inhabits his defeats rather than just suffers them." He embodies the very idea of defeat, or perhaps he "seems to be standing up, even if unconsciously, for some other definition of success" (unpublished paper, 2007 Association for Jewish Studies Conference).

In a now classic study, folklorist Dan Ben-Amos pointed out that the idea that Jewish wit is based on self-criticism is comparatively recent in origin (The "Myth" of Jewish Humor [1973]). It originated in Sigmund *Freud's Jokes and the Their Relation to the Unconscious (1905), in which the founder of *psychoanalysis argued that "a number of the most apt jokes... have grown up in the soil of Jewish popular life," adding, "They are stories created by Jews and directed against Jewish characteristics." However, Ben-Amos argued that Jewish humor is much more complicated than Freud's thesis. He noted that Jews who moved away from traditional Jewish lifestyles most often used humor to denigrate other Jews who were less assimilated than they were, as a way of identifying with (and seeking acceptance by) the dominant culture. In addition, Ben-Amos adduced many examples of Jews using humor to put down other groups.

There are also sociological explanations for Jewish involvement in American entertainment. In World of Our Fathers (1976), his landmark study of life in the immigrant Jewish neighborhoods on the Lower East Side of New York, Irving Howe wrote that second-generation Jewish entertainers defined themselves through the process of moving out of the ghetto. It was precisely in their "cutting loose" and "breaking out" from life on the street that their work was shaped. This led to what Howe called the "almost hysterical frenzy" with which they worked, "their need to perform under the highest possible pressure, as if still heeding the Jewish folk view that for a Jew to succeed, he must do things twice as well, or as hard, as a Gentile."

In the first decade of the twenty-first century a majority of American Jews, at least according to some surveys, have increasingly come to define themselves in “secular” rather than religious ways. Many of them find a source of pride in the number of prominent Jews in entertainment since popular culture with Jewish themes (like Jewish food) provides a foundation for a nonreligious, secular Jewish identity. Books like Darryl Lyman’s Great Jews in Entertainment (2005) and websites like www.jewwatch.com foster this kind of ethnic pride and also allow Jews to play parlor games about the possible Jewish origins of various celebrities. Film actor Ben Stiller may not always play overtly Jewish roles, but his humor still springs from Jewish stereotypes about the clumsy, clueless, Jewish man whose innate sweetness wins him the (usually non-Jewish) girl. Other popular Jewish comedians play in more complex ways with their Jewish identities. Sacha Baron Cohen pokes vulgar, gleeful fun at antisemitism by impersonating antisemites, whereas Sarah Silverman’s sexually explicit routines explode the myth of the “nice Jewish girl.”

It is essential to recognize that Jews have achieved success in the entertainment business through collaborating with many non-Jews. In the early decades of the twentieth century, Jews often teamed up with individuals of Irish origin to create and perform vaudeville, theater, music, and film. The relationship between Jews and African Americans in popular music has been especially tangled and controversial, with black and Jewish composers working together, borrowing from each other, and often profiting from each other’s music.

Thus, the history of American Jews in entertainment is bound up with the history of other Americans as well. Look again at the song, “Love and Marriage,” cited in the first sentence of this essay. Although Cahn wrote the lyrics, the music was written by Protestant musician Jimmy van Heusen (christened Chester Edward Babcock), and the song was made famous by Italian American singer Frank Sinatra. More than a half-century later, Jews continue to be heavily overrepresented in every realm of American popular culture, but they also continue to find success through collaboration with non-Jews of every background.

For further reading, see H. Erdman, Staging the Jew (1997); O. Schorske, Fin-de-Siècle Vienna (1980); S. Beller, Vienna and the Jews: A Cultural History (1989); S. Pinsker, The Schlemiel as Metaphor (1971); and D. Ben-Amos, The “Myth” of Jewish Humor (1973); and see CELEBRITIES; COMEDY and COMEDIANS; RADIO; TELEVISION.

TED MERWIN

Epikoros. Although the Greek loanword philosophos appears in numerous contexts in both tannaitic and amoraic texts, the only contemporary philosopher cited by name in rabbinic literature is the second-century-CE Oenomaus of Gadara. As for founders of philosophical schools, Epicurus (epikoros) is the only one who is mentioned. The meaning of epikoros differs significantly in the more than twenty rabbinic sources in which it appears. Judah Goldin believed that the word epikoros was eventually used in rabbinic literature to suggest any kind of heretic or unbeliever, similar to its usage in late antique Greco-Roman writings, but he insisted that its earliest appearances in the Mishnah (Sanhedrin 10:1; Avot 2:14) reflected full awareness of the Epicureans’ denial of providence and their penchant for exhaustive argumentation. As Goldin noted, the most accurate manuscript of Avot* reads, “know how to refute an Epicurean” (“A Philosophical Session in a Tannaite Academy,” Traditio 21 [1965]; repr. in Studies in Midrash and Related Literature [1988]).

This association with argumentation appears in several Palestinian texts in which both the serpent in Eden (Gen 3) and the rebellious Korah (Num 16) are called epikoros (Sifre Deuteronomy 12; Genesis Rabbah 19; JT Sanhedrin 10:4, 27a). Hans Jürgen Becker has pointed out an apparent affinity between JT Sanhedrin 10:4, 27a, and Josephus’ usage of key Epicurean terms in his characterization of Korah (“Epikureer im Talmud Yerushalmi,” in The Talmud Yerushalmi and Greco-Roman Literature, ed. P. Schäfer [1998]). J. Labendz has traced the evolution of the word epikoros, showing that over time it came to refer to anyone who demonstrated disrespect for Torah or Torah scholars, and eventually, in the stammatitic literature, denoted general irreverence (“Know What to Answer the Epicurean’: A Diachronic Study of the ‘Apiqoros in Rabbinic Literature,” Hebrew Union College Annual 74 [2003]). S. Lieberman pointed out that later rabbinic literature preserved a key technical term of the Epicurean school, automaton; this term had already appeared in the writings of Josephus (“How Much Greek in Jewish Palestine,” in A. Altman ed., Biblical and Other Studies [1962]).

MARC HIRSHMAN

Eruv. Carrying any object, such as keys or a handkerchief, in a public domain is prohibited on the Sabbath. In truth, most, if not all, of the world as presently constituted does not match the biblical definition of a public domain. Nonetheless, the Rabbis prohibited carrying in any open area. However, they allowed the construction of an eruv that would allow carrying within a specific enclosed area. The area in question must be surrounded with walls on all four sides; these can be actual walls or fences, cliffs, or even inclines such as riverbanks. Where nothing that passes as a wall exists, doorways can be installed. These are defined as two side posts and a crossbeam that crosses over them. Often, two telephone poles and an electric wire can serve this purpose with only slight modification. Once the area has been enclosed, communal food such as matzah (unleavened bread that will not go stale for a long time) is placed within the boundaries of the space that has been enclosed. This food is the actual eruv, a word that means “mixing” or “mixture.” It is the communal matzah that joins all the households into one eruv structure. Once all of this has been done, carrying is then permitted within the boundaries that have been created.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Esau was the firstborn son of Isaac and Rebekah and the favorite of his father. Through the machinations of his mother and brother Jacob, he was displaced and lost the rights and blessing due him (Gen 25, 27). Esau became the father of the Edomites. See also BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; EDOM; GENESIS; ROME, ROMAN EMPIRE.

Eschatology: Second Temple Period. Eschatology, from the Greek word eschatos (“last”), refers to the final days of human history. Eschatological writings are found in the Hebrew Bible, the Apocrypha, and the pseudepigraphical books (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). After the Babylonian Exile, ca. 586 BCE, *prophets hoped for definitive restoration to the Land of Israel. *Haggai and *Zechariah hailed *Zerubbabel as a *messiah (anointed king) of the *Davidic line who would restore the kingship, but he disappeared abruptly from history. The oracles in *Isaiah 56–66 show increasing disillusionment with the political order and speak of a new heaven and new earth (65:17), where people would live longer happier lives, although they would still die. Many of the prophetic books contain passages added in the *Second Temple period predicting universal judgment on the Day of the Lord (*Joel) and even speaking of the defeat of death (Isaiah 25:8). Occasional passages speak of a messianic king (Jer 33:14–16; Zech 9). Many of these passages lack historical context and are difficult to date.

The rise of *apocalyptic literature in the *Hellenistic period marks a dramatic change in Jewish eschatology. The earliest examples are found in the books of Enoch (see *PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), which relate the *revelations that Enoch received when he ascended to heaven. There are accounts of remote regions at the ends of the earth, of the chambers where the dead await judgment, and of the place where *God will sit while judging the earth (The Book of the Watchers, 1 Enoch 1–36). Dated in the late third or early second century BCE, The Book of the Watchers may be the earliest Jewish text that speaks of a differentiated fate for the righteous and wicked after death. It seems to locate the final abode of the righteous on a transformed earth. The Epistle of Enoch (1 Enoch 91–104) promises the righteous that they will become companions to the host of heaven. The Animal Apocalypse (1 Enoch 85–90) and the Apocalypse of Weeks (1 Enoch 93:1–10 and 91:11–17) provide overviews of the course of history in the guise of prophecy, ending with a time of divine intervention and judgment. These apocalypses within the books of Enoch date from the time of the *Maccabees in the second century BCE.

Also from the time of the Maccabees is the canonical book of *Daniel, although the Aramaic stories in chapters 2–6 are somewhat older. Already in Daniel 2 we encounter Nebuchadnezzar's dream of a statue with metals of declining value (head of gold, feet of iron mixed with clay). Daniel interprets this statue to refer to a sequence of four kingdoms in declining order, after which the God of heaven will set up a kingdom that will never be destroyed. In Daniel 7, this vision is reworked. Instead of four metals, we now have four beasts rising from the sea, and the fourth is the most violent and terrible. It has ten horns and sprouts a little horn that makes war on the holy ones. Then "one like a son of man" appears on the clouds and approaches the Ancient of Days. The beasts are judged and condemned, and dominion is conferred on the "one like a son of man." An angel explains to Daniel that the beasts represent kingdoms, and eventually earthly dominion is given to "the people of the holy ones." The significance of this vision is made clearer in chapters 10–12, which relate an ongoing struggle between the prince of Israel, the archangel Michael, and the "princes" of the other nations. Eventually, Michael rises in victory. Chapter 11 describes a period of persecution at the end of history and explains that "some of the wise will fall," a reference to *martyrdom in the Maccabean era. In the end, however, there will be a *resurrection, and the wise will shine like the splendor of the firmament. This means that they will be exalted to the stars.

Neither Daniel nor the early Enoch apocalypses have any place for a human messiah. The "one like a son of man" is a heavenly figure, most probably the archangel Michael. This figure is further developed in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71), where he sits as judge on the throne of glory. In the *New Testament, Jesus is identified with the "son of man." In an addition to the Similitudes, Enoch seems to be so identified. In later Jewish tradition (3 Enoch), Enoch is enthroned in heaven as *Metatron, a kind of super-angel.

Messianic expectation plays a significant, but not dominant, role in the *Dead Sea Scrolls, which often refer to two messiahs, a priestly one descended from *Aaron and a royal one from the tribe of *Judah. It is probable that this messianic expectation developed in reaction to the *Hasmoneans, the dynasty initiated by the Maccabees, who made themselves both *kings and High *Priests. The Dead Sea Scrolls insist that the offices should be separate and contrast the Hasmonian kings with the messianic king in the Psalms of Solomon (first century BCE; see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). The Scrolls also speak of angelic deliverers such as Michael.

The early apocalypses envision a judgment of the dead and promise the righteous eternal life with the angels. The idea of bodily *resurrection after death appears clearly in the story of the *martyrs in 2 *Maccabees 7. The authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls clearly envision reward and punishment after death, although whether they expect bodily resurrection is disputed. Rather, they claim to be participating already in angelic life. In the Hellenistic *Diaspora, especially in *Egypt, the standard expectation was immortality of the soul, at least in circles influenced by Greek philosophy (*Philo, Wisdom of Solomon [see APOCRYPHA]).

Several apocalyptic texts were written in the aftermath of the destruction of *Jerusalem. Some (4 Ezra, 2 Baruch [see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA]) make an attempt to synthesize different strands of expectation. Thus in 4 Ezra 7 the messiah will reign for four hundred years and then die, followed by a resurrection and judgment. Later visions in the book speak both of a Davidic messiah (chapters 11–12) and of a figure like the "son of man" who comes on the clouds (chapter 13), but this figure is also identified as the messiah. Jewish eschatological belief was never uniform and apocalyptic eschatology was not universally accepted, but its view of the last things has remained influential both in Judaism and in Christianity down to the present. For more on this topic, see J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination (1998).

JOHN J. COLLINS

Essenes. One of many diverse groups of Jews during the late *Second Temple period, the Essenes are described by *Josephus and *Philo of Alexandria as a community that lived in isolation and practiced an ascetic lifestyle that emphasized purity and taught a variety of eschatological doctrines. The Roman writer Pliny the Elder placed this group at a location near the Dead Sea north of Ein Gedi. Many scholars identify the Essenes with the *Qumran community at the Dead Sea and connect them with the *Dead Sea Scrolls that were discovered nearby; others suggest that the designation may refer to several separatist communities. Debate continues as well over whether the sect was a celibate religious order or whether it also included married members. Also unresolved is the relationship between the Essenes and the Therapeutae or “Healers,” mentioned by Philo. Philo described them as a group of Alexandrian Jews, apparently including men and women, who lived a monastic life and attempted to observe all of the Mosaic commandments.

If the Qumran communitarians were, in fact, the Essenes, then they are distinguished from other contemporaneous sectarian groups by their *priestly identification. According to Dead Sea documents, the group separated from the mainstream priestly community when a High Priest not to their liking was appointed in Jerusalem. With their leader, the “Teacher of Righteousness,” they established themselves in the Judean wilderness to create their own center of priestly purity. They believed that they would become the saving remnant of Israel, after the priests in Jerusalem were destroyed in an imminent apocalyptic upheaval. For further reading, see A. F. Segal, “The Second Temple Period,” in The Cambridge Guide to Jewish History, Religion, and Culture, ed. J. R. Baskin and K. Seeskin (2010).

Esther, Book of (Hebrew, Megillat Esther). Part of the *Writings section of the Hebrew *Bible and one of the *Five Scrolls, this biblical book recounts the story of Esther (Hadasah) who, as the narrative begins, lives with her uncle Mordecai in the *Diaspora community of Susa in *Persia. Ahashuerus, the king (identified as Xerxes I, reigned 486–465 BCE) is described as throwing a six-month-long drinking party; during the festivities, he commands his queen, Vashti, to appear before the drunken revelers. She refuses; the king dismisses her and initiates an all-Persia contest to pick his next consort. Esther wins the king’s favor, but conceals her Jewish identity from him. Meanwhile, the grand vizier Haman despises Esther’s uncle Mordecai because Mordecai will not bow down to him. Haman dupes the weak Ahashuerus into issuing an edict that spells death for all the Jews. When Mordecai hears of it, he appeals to Esther to intervene, saying, “Maybe you have come to royal position for just such a time as this” (4:4). Esther prepares a banquet for the king and Haman. By chance, Ahashuerus discovers that Mordecai once foiled an assassination plot against the king, but was never properly rewarded. The king asks Haman what should be done to honor a loyal servant. Thinking the king is speaking of himself, Haman envisions an elaborate and reverential procession. The king orders it on Mordecai’s behalf, to Haman’s humiliation. At her banquet, Esther pleads for the Jews; Ahashuerus claims no memory of such a brutal decree. When Haman is identified as the engineer of the edict, the king leaves the room. Haman throws himself on Esther, begging for mercy. The king returns, is outraged at Haman’s effrontery, and has Haman hanged. Esther and Mordecai convince the king that the Jews should be permitted to defend themselves (because no royal edict can be withdrawn). Thousands of Persians die as the Jews fight off their enemies. The Jewish festival of *Purim is based on these events.

Although Esther, a faithful Jewish woman living in the Diaspora, may be seen as symbolizing Israel – the underdog who overcomes – her story presents many historical and textual problems and is generally seen as fictional. Beginning with the *Rabbis, many scholars have claimed that Mordecai is the true hero and Esther is merely his agent. Some feminists have decried the way in which Esther uses her sexual appeal to gain access to power; for some, Vashti, the disposed queen who resists male authority, is the greater gender hero. The narrative lacks any mention of observance of Jewish *dietary laws, the *Temple, or the Land of Israel and expresses no anxiety over Esther’s marriage to a Gentile. God-language is completely absent, appearing only obliquely in 4:13–15 where Mordecai claims that “relief and deliverance will rise for the Jews from another quarter.” Disturbingly, the Esther narrative ends with horrific violence and vengeance. The *Septuagint (LXX, or Greek version of the Hebrew Bible) intentionally added material of a more devout and noticeably religious nature to correct these perceived deficiencies and softened the slaughter into a time of celebration and gift giving. Finally, Esther is the only biblical book not found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, suggesting that this Jewish community of the first century BCE to the first century CE either did not know of Megillat Esther or felt that it was not a divinely revealed religious text. Helpful resources include A. Berlin, JPS Commentary on Esther (2001); and S. A. White, “Esther,” in The Women’s Bible Commentary, ed. C. Newsom and S. Ringe (1992); see also FIVE SCROLLS.

SANDRA COLLINS

Estonia: See BALTIC STATES

Ethical Monotheism: See GOD; JUDAISM: REFORM, NORTH AMERICA

Ethical Wills are a genre of Jewish literature in which the writer, in contemplation of death, articulates a legacy of spiritual values to bequeath to survivors. It may be considered a subcategory of Jewish ethical or conduct literature. The most common Hebrew term, tzava’ah, derived from the root meaning “to command,” suggests instructions to the survivors. However, these instructions do not concern how to divide the material inheritance but rather how to live their lives in accordance with the values of the deceased. Some writers have used the term musar* (“ethical admonition”) to describe what they are writing. The literary roots of this genre are biblical, with a paradigm in *David’s deathbed instructions to his son *Solomon (1 Kgs 2: 1–9), although some of these directives appear to be anything but “ethical.” *Rabbinic literature also contains accounts of final summations of a sage’s wisdom intended for his disciples or addressed to his children. A collection of such material is found in BT Pesahim 112a–b.

Medieval texts are more extensive. Some are explicitly addressed to a son (Eliezer the Great, Judah ibn Tibbon, *Nahmanides, Joseph ibn Kaspi) or to all the writer’s children (Eleazar ben Samuel of Mainz; Elijah de Veali) and other members of the family (*Vilna Gaon), providing counsel, guidance, and instruction drawn from the writer’s experience. Others are general statements of the writer’s wisdom and worldview, providing guidance addressed to no one in particular. Many contain important autobiographical and historical content, including in one case (Ibn Kaspi) a detailed educational curriculum for the writer’s son to follow. Tzava’at ha-Rivash, containing instructions in spiritual living from R. Israel *Baal Shem Tov, was the first *Hasidic work of conduct literature to be published (1793). The classic collection of texts in this genre, Jewish Ethical Wills (1926), selected, translated, and edited by Israel Abrahams, seems to have popularized the English term. An extensive bibliography of 180 Hebrew tzava'ot was published by D. Wachstein in Kiryat Sefer 11–12 (1935–36).

In recent years, the ethical will has become fashionable as a genre that can be emulated. A collection of modern texts is J. Reimer and N. Stampfer, Ethical Wills: A Modern Jewish Treasury (1983); a revision, So That Your Values Live On: Ethical Wills and How to Prepare Them, appeared in 1991. This volume includes a text by the *Yiddish writer Sholom Aleichem (see LITERATURE: YIDDISH), instructing that he be buried among ordinary Jewish workers and requesting that members of his family come together and read one of his humorous stories on the anniversary of his death. There are also several texts from the *Holocaust period and many examples written by *women. Some *synagogues have instituted workshops encouraging members to study and then prepare texts that will be read by members of their family as an enduring statement of what they held important; these ethical wills are preserved in the records of the synagogue for reference after the death of the author.

MARC SAPERSTEIN

Ethics, Environmental. The core of Jewish environmental ethics is the notion that human beings are responsible for the natural world. The ethics of responsibility follows from the dual aspect of creation: Human beings are created entities, yet Judaism teaches that humans care for nature through their creation in the “divine image.” Jewish legislation (halakhah*) about various aspects of nature constitutes sound conservation policy. Jewish environmental ethics stress the causal connection between the moral quality of human life and the vitality of *God’s creation. The corruption of society is closely linked to the corruption of nature. Thus, the just allocation of nature’s resources is a religious issue of the highest order. Parts of the land’s produce – the corner of the field (peah), the gleanings of stalks (leket), the forgotten sheaf (shikhekhah), the separated fruits (peret), and the defective clusters (olelot) – are given to the poor, the hungry, the widow, and the orphan (Lev 19:9–10, 23:22; Deut 24:19–21; Ruth 2:2). The failure to treat other members of society with justice is integrally tied to the fate of the land.

Concerns about *ecology figure prominently in the writings of several modern Jewish thinkers. Samson Raphael *Hirsch (1808–1888), the founder of Modern Orthodoxy (see JUDAISM: MODERN ORTHODOXY), advocated the rabbinic ethics of responsibility toward nature. Supportive of Jewish civic and intellectual integration into the modern world, Hirsch noted the negative impact of exile on the Jewish people in that it removed them from involvement with nature. In his discussion of *Tu B’shevat, the Jewish festival that celebrates the *new year for trees, Hirsch declared that “Jewish law continually invites us to the observation of the laws and ways of nature, and is ever leading us from nature to the life of man and there teaching us to use the products of the soil for bringing to ripeness the still nobler blossoms and fruits of a free human life permeated with the idea of God.” Hirsch had no qualms, however, in speaking about the human “conquest of nature” and referred to *God as “Creator, Lawgiver, and Controller of Nature.”

The ethics of responsibility toward nature informs the thought of Joseph Dov *Soloveitchik (1903–1992), the spiritual leader of Modern Orthodoxy in the twentieth century. In his famous essay, “The Lonely Man of Faith,” Soloveitchik interpreted the two creation narratives in the Bible as two paradigmatic human postures toward nature. The first narrative presents “the majestic man” (*Adam I) who celebrates the unique position of the human in creation. Adam I is creative, functionally oriented, and enamored of technology; his aim is to achieve a “dignified” existence by gaining mastery over nature. By contrast, the second creation narrative presents the “covenantal man” (Adam II), the human who was commanded “to till and tend” the earth. Adam II eschews power and control; he is a nonfunctional, receptive, submissive human type who achieves a redeemed existence by bringing all his actions under God’s authority. The two postures exist simultaneously and remain permanently at war with one another within every religious Jew. Soloveitchik thus warned against the modern glorification of humanity (Adam I) that brought about the destruction of nature and pointed to religious commitment (Adam II) as the only response to our ecological and existential crisis.

Attempts to link moral consciousness to environmentalism characterized the Jewish environmental movement that emerged in the 1970s and 1980s when some of Abraham Joshua *Heschel’s disciples followed his call to return to Jewish sources and created the *Jewish Renewal movement. This movement involves various strands and intellectual sources, but on the whole it has been very instrumental in putting ecological awareness on the map of Jewish consciousness. Some environmental activists, who were born Jews, found their way back to the sources of Judaism by recognizing their ecological wisdom. The organization, Shomrei Adamah (Keepers of the Earth), popularized the idea of Jewish environmentalism; revived nature-based Jewish rituals, such as the ritual meal for the minor holiday *Tu B’Shevat; and organized wilderness trips with a strong Jewish component.

The most significant ecological thinker in the Jewish Renewal movement is Arthur Waskow, who popularized the concept of “eco-kosher” to highlight the connection between human mistreatment of the natural world and social mistreatment of the marginal and the weak. His concern for ecology is part of a deep passion for justice, and his recommendations include the cultivation of self-control, moderation in material consumption, sustainable economic development, and communitarianism. Whereas Waskow’s environmentalism is linked to Heschel’s social activism and indebted to social ecology, another disciple of Heschel, Arthur Green, has attempted to anchor Jewish ecological thinking in *Kabbalah and *Hasidism, the other dimension of Heschel’s legacy. Adopting the ontological schema of Kabbalah, Green maintains that all created entities are in some way an expression of God and are to some extent intrinsically related to each other. Contrary to those who hold that nature per se is not sacred in Judaism, Green blurs the distinction between Creator and the created by adopting the monistic and immanentist ontology of Kabbalah. He suggests that the world and the *Torah are both God’s self-disclosure; each is a linguistic structure that requires decoding – an act that humans can accomplish because they are created in the image of God. From the privileged position of the human, Green derives an ethics of responsibility toward all creatures that acknowledges their diversity and insists on the need to defend those that are weakest and most threatened. For Green, a Jewish ecological ethics must be a torat hayyim, namely, a set of laws and instruction that truly enhances life.

For further reading, see J. Helfand, "The Earth is the Lord's: Judaism and Environmental Ethics," in Religion and Environmental Crisis, ed. E. C. Hargrove (1986), 38–52; A. Waskow, Down to Earth Judaism: Food, Money, Sex, and the Rest of Life (1995); idem, ed., Torah of the Earth (2000); and M. D. Yaffe, ed., Judaism and Environmental Ethics: A Reader (2001); see also ECOLOGY; ISRAEL, STATE OF: ECOLOGY.

HAVA TIROSH-SAMUELSON

Ethics, Medical. Modern medical progress has radically increased physicians' ability to produce, improve, and extend life. These advances raise many problematic ethical questions for Judaism that have generally not been addressed by previous generations of legal experts. Some Jewish ethicists maintain that if Jewish tradition does not address these specific topics, Jews should look elsewhere for guidance. This approach is honest, but denying Judaism the ability to offer guidance on crucial issues renders it irrelevant to much of life. Conversely, others would quote the rabbinic text, "Turn it over, and turn it over again, for everything is in it" (M. Avot* 5:22), empowering Jewish tradition to provide direction on everything. However, this approach has the potential to distort the tradition by reading into it much that is not there. These opposing points of view have forced Jews to ask how Jewish teachings can be interpreted honestly and responsibly, yet still provide ethical guidance on contemporary medical concerns. Jews differ widely on how to do this, depending on which methodological approach they adopt. This accounts for the range of opinions on any given topic.

THE BEGINNING OF LIFE: Jewish texts depict children as a great blessing in life. God's first command is "be fruitful and multiply" (Gen 1:28). At the same time, Sarah*, Rebekah*, Rachel*, Leah*, and Hannah* all had trouble conceiving and bearing children, an indication that infertility* was understood as both a heartbreaking and common phenomenon. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, as large numbers of Jews extend their educations, many postpone marriage and attempts to have children until their late twenties or thirties. This is the primary reason why many Jewish couples encounter infertility problems. Rabbis have generally supported assisted reproductive techniques that use the husband's sperm and the wife's egg, but most Orthodox rabbis (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX entries) forbid the use of donor gametes (sperm or eggs). The Conservative movement (see JUDAISM, CONSERVATIVE) permits the use of donor gametes, but only when the donor's identity is ultimately made known to the child or when the donor reveals not only his or her medical history but also hobbies, traits, and other facts that will help the child gain a sense of his or her genetic heritage and identity.

Sometimes couples want to prevent or abort pregnancies. On the basis of Exodus 21:22–25, the Rabbis distinguished between the status of a fetus and an infant. They ruled that, during the first forty days of gestation, the embryo is "merely liquid"; from the forty-first day to the moment of birth, the child is "like the thigh of its mother." The fetus becomes a full human being only at the moment of birth – specifically, when the head emerges from the vaginal canal or, in a breech birth, when most of the body emerges. This view of fetal development, combined with the strong Jewish mandate to heal, has led Jews across the spectrum to support embryonic stem cell research strongly, because this research uses embryos that would otherwise be discarded when they are five to eight days old and are thus still "merely liquid." All Jewish legal authorities generally allow birth control, with those forms that prevent conception in the first place preferred over methods that prevent implantation thereafter. At the same time, rabbis warn married couples not to wait too long to procreate, lest they encounter infertility problems.

*Abortion is required if the mother's life or health is at stake. It is permitted, but not required, when there is an elevated but not dire risk beyond that of a normal pregnancy (e.g., when the pregnant woman has diabetes). Some rabbis permit abortion when the fetus has a lethal or significantly disabling genetic disease or condition. Exactly what constitutes sufficient danger to the mother or fetus to justify abortion is a matter of debate. Otherwise abortion is forbidden in traditional Jewish approaches, not because it is an act of murder, but because it is seen as an act of injuring oneself, which one may not do to a divinely created body.

END OF LIFE: In Jewish law the general principle is that a person's death may not be hastened; however, the process of dying should not be prolonged. This distinction was much easier to discern in the past, but it remains the line that separates murder from medical aid. In applying this principle, some Orthodox rabbis require every possible intervention to save a person's life and maintenance of life support until the person dies. Others maintain that such intervention is not mandatory but should be continued once it has been initiated. Some suggest attaching a timer to the machine so that a new treatment may be chosen each time the timer is about to run out. Still other rabbis would allow both the withholding and withdrawing of machines and medications at the end of life, just as one does during any other time when an intervention is not for the patient's benefit.

Orthodox rabbis universally classify artificial nutrition and hydration as food and require it whenever the patient cannot eat independently. Conservative rabbis disagree on this definition: Some classify artificial nutrition and hydration as food, whereas others define it as medicine. The latter group permits physicians to withhold or remove artificial nutrition and hydration when they are no longer in the best interests of the patient. Rabbis permit and encourage Jews to donate their body parts for transplant after their deaths. In 1989, Israel's Chief Rabbinate allowed even heart transplants, the hardest donation to justify given the need to ensure that one is not taking a life to help another live.

DISTRIBUTION OF HEALTH CARE: Given its strong commitment to justice and its vision of members of a community as bound to each other, Jewish tradition advocates access to health care for everyone.

Useful resources include E. N. Dorff, Matters of Life and Death: A Jewish Approach to Modern Medical Ethics (1998); A. Steinberg, Encyclopedia of Jewish Medical Ethics (2003); and M. Washofsky, Jewish Living: A Guide to Contemporary Reform Practice (2001), chapter 6.

ELLIOT N. DORFF

Ethics, Rabbinic. The juxtaposition of "rabbinic" and "ethics" inspires comparative reflection, for late ancient rabbinic sources have no term equivalent to “ethics” in the range of meanings employed today. The notion of rabbinic ethics, moreover, is contested in modern contexts. Some consider ethics to be at the heart of *Judaism, perhaps its essence. This view appeared in formulations of “ethical monotheism” first voiced by theologians of Reform Judaism (see JUDAISM, REFORM), and it is found as well in the primacy that Emmanuel Levinas attributed to ethics in his phenomenology. Others have assigned a higher value to Jewish law (halakhah) and have questioned whether the category of ethics is appropriate for classical Judaism at all. Such positions often turn on very different understandings of what ethics entails.

In *Hellenistic philosophical schools, roughly contemporaneous with the late ancient Rabbis, ethics addressed the achievement of well-being or flourishing. Certain rabbinic anthologies show similar strong concerns with character, motivation, and ideal ways of living. These collections have often been labeled as ethical, and in many respects they represent the rabbinic inheritance of biblical and ancient *Near Eastern wisdom literature. The distinctive literary form in these anthologies is the short maxim: a dense, compact statement that is often attributed to a specific sage. These maxims are frequently elaborated through commentaries that include *midrash, narrative, and further maxims.

The entirety of rabbinic ethics is not encompassed in ethical anthologies, but they are a good starting point for the definition and study of ethics in rabbinic culture. Rabbinic ethical instruction is a form of aggadah*, or nonlegal teaching, that both presumes and orients a person to the law or halakhah. Ethical matters include the appropriate mental and emotional states that one should maintain while engaging in legally prescribed action, the ways that rabbinic practice transforms character in accord with specific ideals, and exemplary behavior that goes beyond legal requirements. Ethical instruction may be broad, with general calls to avoid sin and perform good deeds, or it may address specific virtues of character or intellect, particularly responses to others and matters of etiquette.

The most influential ethical anthology is Mishnah Avot*, and its earliest commentary is the family of texts known as Avot de Rabbi Natan* (AdRN). Two other ethical texts are Derekh Eretz Rabbah (DER) and Derekh Eretz Zuta (DEZ): the “large” and “small” collections concerning derekh eretz. This phrase literally means “way of the land” and has a number of quite divergent meanings, including worldly or business matters, sexual activity, etiquette, and supererogatory activity (actions that go beyond basic legal or ethical requirements). Both anthologies are made up of smaller manuals that probably circulated independently as guides for conduct. Commentary to large portions of DER and DEZ appears in Kallah Rabbati (“the large text concerning brides”). Kallah Rabbati differs from AdRN in its considerable use of *Aramaic and is closer in style to the Babylonian *Talmud. DEZ has also been associated with a midrashic anthology addressing ethical themes entitled Tanna Devei Eliyahu (Teachings of the School of Elijah); this work is divided into two texts known as Seder Eliyahu Rabbah (SER) and Seder Eliyahu Zuta (SEZ). The topics of scholastic behavior and virtue are also addressed throughout the Talmuds and in midrashic collections. For example, the Babylonian Talmud emphasizes the importance of virtue in BT Makkot 23b–24b, and other literary units use vivid narratives to uphold modesty and respect for fellows (BT Eruvin 13b, BT Bava Metzia 59a–b).

Rabbis understood ethical cultivation as a communal activity within a scholastic setting that required the guidance of a teacher. Ethical writings often address interpersonal relationships within these contexts. Teachers of Torah must be careful with their words (M. Avot 1:11). Students are told, “Let your house be a meeting place for the sages, sit in the very dust of their feet, and drink with thirst their words” (M. Avot 1:4). Commentary to this maxim specifies the student’s response to a sage: “For every word that emerges from your mouth, let him receive it upon himself in awe, fear, trembling, and shaking.” The same text also describes *Moses’ similar state when he received the *Torah at Sinai (AdRNA, chs. 1, 6). Ethical instruction often addresses the everyday life of students. A maxim instructs, “Appoint for yourself a teacher, acquire for yourself a fellow (haver), and judge every man with the scales weighted in his favor” (M. Avot 1:6). Commentary on this saying asserts that fellows should eat together, worship together, read together, and sleep together if unmarried (AdRNA, ch. 8). Other teachings prescribe behavior at the dining table, when walking between houses, when entering others’ homes, in the bath house, and at the toilet (DER, chs. 4–10). All social space offers the opportunity and responsibility to learn appropriate behavior from the sages.

Rabbinic communities emphasized the commandment to “be fertile and increase” (Gen 1:28) and deprecated celibacy; therefore, scholastic values existed alongside concerns with marital and family relationships. Many rabbinic norms concerning *marriage (see also ETHICS: SEXUAL) and *family appear in legal discussions. Two examples address the work a woman does for her husband (M. Ketubbot 5:5; BT Ketubbot 59b–61b) and the obligations of father to son and son to father (M. Kiddushin 1:7). The ketubbah* (marriage contract; BT Kiddushin 2a) delineates a husband’s obligations toward his wife. The command of the Decalogue (*Ten Commandments) to honor one’s parents is integrated into M. Peah 1:1 and BT Shabbat 127a. In ethical anthologies, the most notable treatments of family are chapter-length discussions of marriage and brides in DER, ch. 1, and Kallah Rabbati, ch. 1, 2. Other passages in ethical literature reveal the Rabbis’ dependence on their wives, whether for practical needs or to fulfill ideals such as hospitality (AdRNA, chs. 6, 7; AdRNB, ch. 14). Some sources present wives as a distraction from study (M. Avot 1:5; AdRNA, ch. 7; AdRNB, ch. 15), revealing a tension between two realms of ethical concern – scholastic pursuits and marriage – that remains unresolved in rabbinic writings. At some points as well, ethical literature addresses fathers’ relationships with their children, as in teachings that criticize Rabbis who marry off their daughters when they are too young (AdRNB, ch. 48).

For further reading, see J. W. Schofer, The Making of a Sage: A Study in Rabbinic Ethics (2005); idem, “Rabbinic Ethical Formation and the Formation of Rabbinic Ethical Compilations,” in The Cambridge Companion to the Talmud and Rabbinic Literature, ed. C. Fonrobert and M. Jaffee (2007), 313–35; and D. Sperber, “Manuals of Rabbinic Conduct,” in Scholars and Scholarship, ed. L. Landman (1990), 9–26.

JONATHAN WYN SCHOFFER

Ethics, Sexual. The *Torah articulates two goals for sex that are expressed in these commandments: “Be fruitful and multiply” (Gen 1:28), and “he must not withhold from her food, clothing, or conjugal rights” (Exod 21:10). Thus, procreation and the mutual enjoyment and bonding of the couple are understood as two independent divine imperatives for sexuality within marriage. Accordingly, a husband’s duty to offer to engage in conjugal relations with his wife applies even when procreation is not likely – for example, when they are using birth control or after her menopause. Conversely, artificial techniques that insert the man’s sperm into the woman’s womb medically or that bring together sperm and eggs in a petri dish rather than through intercourse may be used to procreate. Judaism conceives of sex as a great gift of God that enhances intimacy between committed partners. Jewish law (halakhah) restricts sexual activity to private quarters, and it demands modesty in both clothing and speech.

MARITAL COMPANIONSHIP: According to Genesis 2:4ff., *Adam and *Eve, the progenitors of all humanity, were specifically created for each other, “for it is not good that a person be alone, . . . and therefore a man leaves his father and his mother and clings to his wife so that they become one flesh” (Gen 2:18, 24). One aspect of the basic human need for intimate companionship is its sexual expression. Exodus 21:10 assumes the sexual desires of women, as well as those of men. The Torah and its later rabbinic interpreters structure the laws of marriage so that both spouses have rights to regular marital sex. Specifically, the couple is forbidden to engage in sexual relations during the wife’s menstrual period and for seven days thereafter (see NIDDAH); during the rest of the month the husband could refuse to engage in sex with his wife for no more than a maximum of one week. The one exception is for students, who are permitted to study Torah elsewhere for up to thirty days without their wives’ permission. In general, however, the frequency of marital duties enjoined for men by Jewish law is as follows: “for men of independent means every day, for workmen twice weekly, for ass-drivers once a week, for camel-drivers once every thirty days, for sailors once every six months” (M. Ketubbot 5:6).

A husband also has rights to sex within marriage, although the Rabbis forbade him to force himself on his wife (BT Eruvin 100b). However, if a woman refuses to engage in conjugal relations with her husband, “he may reduce her marriage settlement by seven denars every week . . . until it reaches the full amount of her divorce settlement” (M. Ketubbot 5:7). He can then divorce her without repaying her ketubbah (the amount specified in his marriage contract) and marry someone else. Jewish law permits couples to have sexual relations in any way they wish (BT Nedarim 20b). Marital companionship is more than sexuality – it should extend over a wide scope of activities and topics of conversation. In the Jewish *marriage ceremony, the only explicit reference to the couple being married describes them as re’im ha-ahuvim, “the loving friends.”

CHILDREN: The Rabbis determined that the command “be fruitful and multiply” is fulfilled when the couple has borne two children, specifically, a boy and a girl (M. Yevamot 6:6). However, based on Ecclesiastes 11:6, “Sow your seed in the morning, and do not hold back your hand in the evening,” the Rabbis – interpreting “morning” as youth and “evening” as later in life – maintained that a couple should have as many children as they can (BT Yevamot 62b). This imperative has become particularly important for the contemporary Jewish community, which is only 0.2% of the world’s population, which lost six million members in the *Holocaust, and which, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, is not even reproducing itself.

If a couple cannot reproduce, however, the commandment to procreate does not apply (see INFERTILITY). Nevertheless, infertile couples may consider *adoption, converting the child to Judaism if he or she was not born to a Jewish woman. The Talmud states that adopting and raising children are equivalent to giving birth to them and that adoptive parents “follow the Lord at all times” (BT Megillah 13a; BT Ketubbot 50a). Couples suffering from *infertility may also consider using artificial reproductive techniques. Children, of course, are not only an obligation; they are a blessing. Indeed, the Bible is so filled with statements that define a blessed person as one with children (e.g., Gen 15:5; Deut 7:13; Ps 128) that infertile couples all too often feel like failures. The Jewish community must ensure that the tradition’s positive attitude toward children does not translate into feelings of alienation for those who cannot produce them.

Marriage also provides the primary context for Jewish education. *Abraham, the Patriarch of the Jewish people, was already charged with teaching his children (Gen 18:19); the commandment for each Jew to do likewise, which appears several times in the Torah, is enshrined in the first two paragraphs of the shema prayer (Deut 6:4–9, 11:13–21).

LEGITIMATE PARTNERS AND CONTEXTS FOR SEX: The Torah (Lev 18, 20) prohibits both incest and *adultery, and it defines the relationships that constitute incest. The Rabbis ban sexual relations between people in more distant family relationships as well (sheniyyot, “secondary relatives”; BT Yevamot 21a–b; Mishneh Torah*, “Laws of Marriage” 1:6). Although the tradition frowns on sexual activity by single people, it does not punish it nearly as severely as incest or *adultery. It was precisely to prevent sex out of wedlock that Jewish parents into the twentieth century arranged for their teenaged children to marry. Extended periods of education have made such early marriages rare in the twenty-first century, and sexual activity among the unmarried has become much more common among Jews. Some modern commentators recognize this reality and stress the need for maturity and commitment before entering into a sexual relationship, a sense of responsibility towards one’s sexual partner, and concern and respect for the sexual health of oneself and one’s partner.

The Torah (Lev 18:22) prohibits homosexual sex by men, and the Rabbis forbade women from engaging in sexual activities with other women as well (Sifra, Aḥarei Mot 9:5; Mishneh Torah, “Laws of Forbidden Intercourse” 21:8). However, all denominations in modern Judaism except the Orthodox (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX entries) have eliminated or limited these bans. Again, for liberal Jews, the emphasis is on the cultivation of mature and lasting relationships, respect for oneself and one’s partner, and concern for maintaining sexual health.

Useful resources include S. Boteach, Kosher Sex: A Recipe for Passion and Intimacy (1998); E. N. Dorff, Love Your Neighbor and Yourself: A Jewish Approach to Modern Personal Ethics (2003); and D. Shneer and C. Aviv, eds., Queer Jews (2002).

ELLIOT N. DORFF

Ethiopia. Jews of Ethiopia are known as Beta Israel (House of Israel), Israelawi (Israelites), or Falasha. This last designation is derogatory, indicating their outsider status in Ethiopia. The Beta Israel lived in hundreds of villages in northwest Ethiopia, scattered throughout the provinces of Simien, Dembeba, Begemder, Tigray, Lasta, and Qwara. They spoke two principal local languages, Amharic and Tigrinya, mixed with some Agau, a Cushitic language. The Beta Israel were monotheistic, practicing a *Torah-based Judaism; unlike other Jewish communities, they did not observe the Oral Law (rabbinic *Judaism). They followed both the lunar and solar *calendar, observed a complex cycle of *fasts and *festivals, *circumcised their sons on the eighth day, and refrained from work on the *Sabbath. Their religious practices were influenced by Ethiopic Christians; many ritual elements, such as praying to *Jerusalem, the common liturgical language of Geez, and the longing for Zion, characterized both religious communities.

According to many authorities, the inhabitants of the kingdom of Aksum were Jewish before the advent of Christianity in the third to fourth century CE. A popular Ethiopian belief is that the Beta Israel are descendants of Israelite henchmen, who returned to Ethiopia with Menelek, the son of the union of King *Solomon and the *Queen of Sheba. Another theory is that they are descendants of the "lost" Israelite *tribe of Dan (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES; TRIBES, TWELVE).

Some suggest that the Beta Israel emerged as an identifiable Jewish group between the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries. Travelers, from *Eldad ha-Dani in the ninth century to *Benjamin of Tudela in the twelfth, reported the presence of Jews in Ethiopia. Documentary evidence of a Judaized group opposing the Ethiopian Orthodox Church is found in a royal chronicle from the reign of Emperor Amde Zion (1314–44). During the reigns of Emperors Ishaq (1413–38) and Susenyos (1607–32), there were reports of "Aylud," who resisted conversion to Christianity. They were defeated, lost their rights to land (rist), and became a subjugated people, employed as blacksmiths, weavers, and potters and accused of possessing buda, or magical evil eye powers. An apparent rebellion in Woggera in the reign of Emperor Sarsa Dengel (1563–97) ended in the captivity, massacre, and enslavement of hundreds of Beta Israel. During the reign of Emperor Fasilades (1632–37), Gondar became the political capital of the empire, and the situation of the Beta Israel improved. They were employed in higher ranking professions, as carpenters and masons in the churches and royal castles; this practice was continued by Emperors Yohannes I and Iyasu I. Although the economic position of the Beta Israel subsequently deteriorated, they continued to work as craftsmen well into the twentieth century.

The encounter with the western world began in the nineteenth century. Protestant missionaries, from the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews and from other European missions, succeeded in converting some Beta Israel while challenging their beliefs and religious practices, such as monasticism, sacrifices, and a strict code of *purity laws. In 1867, Joseph Halévy (1827–1917), a scholar of *Semitics from the Sorbonne in Paris, met with Beta Israel in Ethiopia and described their degenerate condition. The Kifu-Qen, or Great Famine, hit Ethiopia between 1888 and 1892, and many Beta Israel either starved to death or converted to Christianity. Dr. Jacques Faitlovitch (1881–1953), Halevy's student, left Paris for his first expedition to Ethiopia in 1904–05. He returned to *Palestine and Europe with two "Falasha" boys, Taamrat Emmanuel and Gete Hermias. During the next thirty years Dr. Faitlovitch brought twenty-five young men from Ethiopia and educated them in different Jewish communities in Palestine and Europe. He hoped they would return and educate their fellow Ethiopian Jews in the tenets of normative Judaism. In 1923, Dr. Faitlovitch established a "Falasha school" in Addis Ababa, which operated until the Italian occupation of Ethiopia in 1935–36.

There was no mass emigration from Ethiopia by the Beta Israel after the establishment of *Israel in 1948. In the 1950s, Emperor Haile Selassie allowed two groups of young Beta Israel pupils to study in a dormitory school in Israel, on condition that they return. In 1973 and then again in 1975, Israel's chief rabbis declared that the Beta Israel could be recognized as descendants of the tribe of Dan and return to their historic homeland, Israel. Before 1984, however, only a few hundred Beta Israel had managed to reach Israel. Finally, in 1984–85, the Israeli government, through Operation Moses airlifted 7,700 Beta Israel from refugee camps in the Sudan to Israel. An estimated 4,000 had died on the way to Sudan. Once knowledge of the airlift reached the press, the Sudanese government suddenly terminated it. Diplomatic relations were restored between Ethiopia and Israel in 1989 and Israel coordinated Operation Solomon in May 1991 in response to international pressure demanding the rescue and emigration of the Beta Israel. In Operation Solomon, 14,310 Jews were airlifted out of Ethiopia to Israel in thirty-six hours, as the fate of the Ethiopian government headed by Mengistu Haile Mariam hung in the balance. During the 1990s, other Beta Israel groups in Ethiopia began claiming the right to immigrate to Israel; in response there was an airlift of a few thousand Beta Israel from the remote area of Qwara. Thousands of "Felesmura," claiming descent from Beta Israel who had converted to Christianity beginning in the nineteenth century, have since migrated to Israel and converted to Judaism; more are still waiting in Ethiopia.

In 1986 Ethiopian Jews in Israel staged a strike opposite the offices of the Israeli Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem, objecting to the symbolic conversion they had to undergo to be accepted as "full" Jews. Today, there are still obstacles in registering Ethiopian Jewish marriages. Kessotch (Ethiopian priests) act as spiritual leaders for the older generation, alongside young Modern Orthodox (see JUDAISM: MODERN ORTHODOX) Ethiopian rabbis, who have been ordained in Israel. New immigrants from Ethiopia are entitled to subsidized public housing, free Hebrew instruction, an initial cash payment for absorption expenses, and special educational advantages. They serve in the Israel Defense Forces. The majority of Ethiopian Jewish adults in Israel live beneath the poverty line. The laws of ritual impurity observed in Ethiopia are being modified, and married women are encouraged to go out to work to assist with family income. The seven-generation kinship unit is beginning to break down, and the Ethiopian divorce rate (30%) is far higher than in the general population. However, members of the community have been increasingly successful in attaining high-ranking jobs in politics, the media, sports, and education. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, there are 105,000 Jews of Ethiopian origin in Israel. Their average age is 20.1 compared to 30.5 in the general Jewish population. More than 20% of the Ethiopian Jewish community was born in Israel.

Important studies of this community include S. Kaplan, The Beta Israel (Falasha) in Ethiopia (1992); W. Leslau, Falasha Anthology, Yale Judaic Series 6 (1951); T. Parfitt and E. Trevisan-Semi, eds., The Beta Israel in Ethiopia and Israel: Studies on the Ethiopian Jews (1999); J. Quirin, The Evolution of the Ethiopian Jews: A History of the Beta Israel (Falasha) to 1920 (1992); S. Weil, "Ethiopian Jewish Women: Trends and Transformations in the Context of Trans-National Change," Nashim 8 (2004): 73–86; and idem, "Religion, Blood and the Equality of Rights: The Case of the Ethiopian Jews in Israel," International Journal on Minority and Group Rights 4 (1997): 397–412.

SHALVA WEIL

EVE. The initial chapters of Genesis contain two versions of human creation. In the first, unnamed human creatures, male and female, are simultaneously created by God's word in the divine image and likeness (1:26–27), as the ultimate act of six days of creation. The second narrative describes how the Lord God formed a man from the dust of the earth, animated him with the breath of life, and placed him in the garden of Eden. Noticing the man's solitary state, the Lord God formed woman from his sleeping body. The man proclaims this female to be "Bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh/This one shall be called woman, for from man was she taken" (2:23). The man, who is not explicitly called Adam until Genesis 3:17, names his wife Eve (Ḥavvah) after the couple leave the garden. The biblical writer connects her name with the word for life (ḥai), since "she was the mother of all the living" (3:20). In Genesis 3, Eve is persuaded by a being called "the serpent" to disobey God's command and to eat fruit from a forbidden tree, and she convinces Adam to do so as well. The result is the expulsion from Eden and the human burdens of frustration, suffering, and mortality. A further consequence of this narrative is the lasting Jewish and Christian association of Eve (and by analogy all women) with sexual seduction, moral weakness, and blame for the human condition. Eve bears three sons, Cain and Abel (4:1–2) and Seth (4:25). For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002); and A. L. Lerner, Eternally Eve: Images of Eve in the Hebrew Bible, the Midrash, and Modern Hebrew Poetry (2007).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Evil and Suffering are issues of constant significance in the Hebrew Bible and its commentaries and in the various philosophical and theological reflections that have emerged within Jewish culture (see THEOLOGY; THOUGHT, MODERN). In the Bible there are a variety of approaches to the topic. God creates a world that God repeatedly says is good or very good, but creatures in the form of Adam and Eve rebel and are expelled to live in a world that is full of difficulties and hardships. They might well be seen as having brought their sufferings on themselves. Yet, if God could have foreseen what they were to do, then how free were they to make the choices that they made? The contrast between an omniscient, omnipotent, and benevolent deity and the sorts of things that happen in the world that God created is a major concern in a number of later biblical works, in particular Job and Psalms. In more optimistic passages from the latter book, the psalmist has confidence in God's support for the virtuous and punishment of the wicked, but in more gloomy verses he questions the ubiquity of divine justice. Throughout Job the role of God's justice in the world is thrown into doubt, and although Job himself is satisfied with God's appearance toward the end of the book, hardly anyone else is. It does not answer the central question of why existence is so difficult and painful, nor does God address the apparently arbitrary distribution of evil and suffering in the world.

A significant difficulty in Job is the absence of a clear doctrine of an afterlife. Later Jewish writings address this omission to a large extent, perhaps in reaction to the emphasis on the next world in Christianity. Thus, thinkers could argue that undeserved suffering in this life could be compensated by future and more enduring rewards in a world to come. Saadia Gaon, for example, argues in his commentary on Job that it is only fair for God to reward the virtuous and punish the wicked, and if there is no evidence that this happens in this world, then it must happen in the next. Yet in Jewish thought and, in particular, the writings of Moses Maimonides, this sort of approach did not find many supporters. It was often rejected as banal and as implying too great a resemblance between divine and human justice. Divine providence certainly flows through the universe, Maimonides argues, and it is up to us to acquire it and use it in positive ways, but precisely what it is apart from the functioning of the laws of nature is difficult to specify. Because Maimonides holds that there is no point of comparison between divine and human attributes, we cannot really think of God as like a king who is trying to provide assistance to his subjects; this would make God far too similar to his creatures. However, in popular Judaism a belief in the afterlife has become entrenched, and many prayers in the liturgy refer to the next world and the resurrection of the dead. Of course, this afterlife can be allegorized and understood to represent something like the survival of part of us in our descendants or those whom we influence. However, many Jews literally interpret these prayers and the texts on which they are based, and they locate the evil and suffering of this world within an acceptable religious context.

The idea that suffering is a test or a punishment for some crime has been popular with many commentators. Such an explanation makes individual and collective distress part of the divine plan and easier to accept. Over the course of Jewish history, however, it became increasingly difficult to see suffering in this way; it is difficult to see any religious rationale for a history so replete with persecution and murder. Some mystics (see BREAKING OF THE VESSELS; KABBALAH) saw suffering and the prevalence of evil as prefiguring the coming of the messiah; in their view, God would have to prevent the world from sinking into total darkness.

In modern times the debate has become heightened in response to the Holocaust. Some have argued that it was just one disaster among the many that have occurred in Jewish history and that it raises no new questions of why God allows such suffering to occur. Yeshayahu *Leibowitz suggests that the Holocaust was an extreme period of suffering not unlike in quality the many previous such disasters in Jewish history and therefore not calling for a radical change in theology. Some, particularly from the Orthodox community, have suggested that Jews deserved punishment because of their lax performance of halakhah, or that God has a plan but we do not know what it is, or that the face of God is sometimes hidden, allowing human beings who are capable of great evil to exercise that evil. To do otherwise would be to interfere in our freedom of action. Other modern theologians, such as Richard *Rubenstein, have suggested that after the Holocaust it is impossible to believe in a personal God who has a *covenant with the people of Israel. This is a radical view, which suggests that the Holocaust represents a break with history. The amount of suffering that it brought about means that an entirely different understanding in Jewish theology is necessary, not only of the role of evil but also of the divine role in the fate of the Jewish people. Others have supported the view that the Holocaust led directly to the creation of *Israel and so was not futile but rather represented a period of necessary suffering before the successful event that it brought about.

For further reading, see O. Leaman, Evil and Suffering in Jewish Philosophy (1995); Y. Leibowitz, Judaism, the Jewish People and the State of Israel, trans. E. Goldman (1992); R. L. Rubenstein, After Auschwitz: History, Theology and Contemporary Judaism (1966); and see HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES. OLIVER LEAMAN

Exile: Hebrew, galut. See BABYLONIAN EXILE; DIASPORA

Exilarch ("Head of the Exile"; Hebrew, rosh ha-golah; Aramaic, resh galuta), was a Parthian or Sassanian imperial designation for the head of all the Jews in the ancient community of exiles in *Babylon. The origins and development of this institution are obscure; rabbinic traditions about the Exilarch in Babylonia and the *Patriarch (nasi) in the land of Israel are closely linked: Both institutions descended from King *David and had access to non-Jewish rulers, great wealth, and the power to appoint judges. The exilarchate may predate the patriarchate, and it is possible that Patriarchs and those who told stories about them looked to Babylonia for a model of inherited Jewish leadership. The conquering Muslims reconfirmed the authority of the Exilarch (as they did with the Nestorian Christian Catholicos) over his co-religionists. The process of consolidating and centralizing Jewish authority under Muslim rule was facilitated when the *Sura and *Pumbedita academies relocated to Baghdad shortly after the city was established and the Exilarch became a regular courtier at the Abbasid court. See also GAON AND GEONIC ACADEMIES; and IRAQ.

Exodus, Book of is the second of the five books in the *Torah (Pentateuch), the first section of the Hebrew *Bible. The English name "Exodus" (departure) is derived from the Greek title for the book; Israel's departure from *Egypt is the central theme of the book. In Hebrew the book is called Shemot, "names," after its first significant word: "These are the names of the sons of Israel who came down to Egypt" (1:1). Exodus contains forty chapters, according to the medieval Christian division, and eleven weekly portions (parashot; see TORAH READING) according to the traditional Jewish classification. Geographically, Exodus begins in Egypt and ends with the Israelites encamped around Mount Sinai, located either in the Sinai Peninsula or across the Gulf of Eilat in the mountains of *Arabia. Chronologically, Jewish tradition holds that only 129 years elapsed from the death of *Joseph (1:4) to the completion of the *Tabernacle (40:2), despite verses that give the impression of a longer period of time (12:40).

STRUCTURE AND CONTENTS: Although the story of Israel in Egypt continues from that told in the last chapters of *Genesis and the completion of the Tabernacle (mishkan) in the last chapter sets the stage for *Leviticus, the book of Exodus is an independent literary work with an introduction and conclusion. It is a complex narrative, interspersed with *laws, instructions for rituals, and exact specifications for the structure of the Tabernacle and its paraphernalia. The narrative sections contain irony, rich characterizations, and evocative literary links to other sections of the Hebrew *Bible. Three major divisions can be discerned in Exodus. The first section focuses on the enslavement and liberation of Israel (1–18), including the emergence of *Moses (Exodus 1–2); the revelation at the burning bush (3:1–6) and Moses' commissioning (3–7:13); the plague narrative (7:14–11:10); the Exodus itself and laws regarding the *Passover (12–13); the journey to Mount Sinai, with the dramatic crossing of the Reed Sea and the triumphant Israelite victory song (14–17); and *Jethro's visit and the organization of a judicial system (18). The middle section of Exodus concentrates on the *covenant at Mount Sinai (19–24). Distinct themes encompass the preparation for the covenant (19), the giving of the *Ten Commandments (20:1–14), legislation regarding proper *worship (20:15–24), the "Book of the Covenant" (21–23), and the covenant ratification ritual (24). The final division, Exodus 24–40, is devoted to the Tabernacle (mishkan). Central incidents include instructions for building the Tabernacle, its accessories, and garments for the priests (25–31); the episode of the *golden calf (32–34); and the Tabernacle's construction (35–40).

SIGNIFICANCE: Exodus introduces many of the events and institutions crucial for the subsequent development of the Israelite nation and *Israelite religion. Among them is the affirmation of Israel's nationhood in Exodus 1, in fulfillment of God's promises to the patriarchs (Gen 12:2, 13:16, etc.). In Exodus as well, a more complete perception of Israel's *God as YHWH, sovereign over nature and history, is achieved. In Genesis, Israel's deity was known by several names, including YHWH (usually translated "Lord"). In Exodus, YHWH becomes the chief name for God in the Hebrew Bible, specifically through the revelation to Moses (3:6), the ten plagues, and the *redemption of the Israelites from slavery.

Central to the book is the Exodus event itself: Through it, God demonstrates the power to liberate Israel from oppression, to intervene in human events, and to make human history the stage for the unfolding of the divine will. The Exodus is henceforth the basis of God's authority to command Israel's undivided allegiance (Exod 20:2) and marks the beginning of Israel's history as a free nation. Leviticus 23:4–8 declares that the first month of the *calendar is the spring month of Nissan, in remembrance of the Exodus. Similarly, Moses' mediation between God and the Israelite nation at Mount Sinai and his repeated defense of the people define the *prophetic role for the rest of Israelite history. Exodus also describes the establishment, at Sinai, of God's covenant, a contractual, legal relationship with the people of Israel, who attain a new status as a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation." Conditional to Israel's role as God's covenant partner is its adherence to divinely ordained law (see LAW: ANCIENT *NEAR EAST and HEBREW *BIBLE). Finally, God's presence among the people is established by the construction of the Tabernacle, a movable dwelling place for the deity. It allows Israel access to God for leadership, worship, and prophetic inspiration. At the same time, Exodus establishes a religious leadership: The Levites, the tribe of Moses and Aaron, are given charge of the Tabernacle as a reward for their zeal for Israel's God, and Aaron and his sons inaugurate a hereditary priesthood (kohanim; see ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT).

HISTORICITY: Whether the book of Exodus reflects historical reality is an issue hotly debated by modern scholars. Modern scholarship assumes that the book was written hundreds of years after the described events, with a theological rather than historical focus. It mentions no names of the pharaohs of the enslavement or Exodus eras and offers little in the way of an exact chronology of events. In Exodus 12:40, for example, Israel's stay in Egypt is 430 years; Genesis 15:13–16 mentions 400 years and four generations for the enslavement alone. Further, the number of Israelites who participated in the Exodus would have been more than two million souls, based on the Exodus statement that 600,000 adult males left Egypt (12:37). These numbers support the religious claim that Israel's God had the capability to "take one people out of the midst of another" (Deut 4:34), but the objective historian must greet these figures with skepticism. Folkloric elements, such as Moses' salvation in a reed basket in Exodus 2 (similar to a legend about the *Mesopotamian king Sargon), also suggest that caution is necessary when using the book as a historical record. Compounding these problems on the Egyptian side is the complete absence of any corroborating evidence for the presence and enslavement of Israel in Egypt or of their departure en masse.

Yet, although Egyptian texts do not mention the name "Israel," there is ample evidence for the presence of Asiatics – those who spoke *Semitic languages akin to Hebrew – in New Kingdom Egypt, and many of these were slaves. Egyptian texts mention the presence in *Egypt (and *Canaan) of Apiru/Habiru, a class of mercenaries and renegades, and because this term bears a similarity to "Hebrew," it offers tentative evidence of the presence in Egypt of those who would later constitute Israel. That some Israelites had their origins in Egypt is attested by the fact that several members of the tribe of Levi bear Egyptian names, including Moses, Phineas, Hophni, and Merari. Further, Egyptian historical texts speak of the expulsion of the Hyksos, a ruling class with Canaanite origins, back into *Canaan around the year 1550 BCE. This event, along with less significant departures of Canaanites, including runaway slaves, may have been condensed into the Torah's memory of a large-scale Exodus from Egypt.

Recent scholarship includes W. H. C. Propp, Exodus 1–18 (1999); idem, Exodus 19–40 (2006); and N. Sarna, The Jewish Publication Society Torah Commentary: Exodus (1991).

ELAINE GOODFRIEND

Ezekiel generally appears as the third book of the Major *Prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY) in the Hebrew *Bible, immediately following *Isaiah and *Jeremiah. However, some authorities consider it to be the second book and place Isaiah in the third position (BT Bava Batra 14b). The book presents the words of Ezekiel ben Buzi, a *priest of the Zadokite line, who was exiled to *Babylonia together with the king of *Judah, Jehoiachin ben Jehoiaakim, by the Babylonian monarch, Nebuchadnezzar, in 597 BCE (2 Kgs 24:8–17). Rabbinic tradition raises questions about the canonical status of the book of Ezekiel because it frequently conflicts with legal statements found in the *Torah. R. Ḥanina ben Ḥezekiah reportedly burned three hundred barrels of oil while working nights to reconcile the interpretation of Ezekiel with that of the Torah so that Ezekiel might be accepted as a legitimate biblical prophet (BT Shabbat 13b; BT Ḥagigah 13a; BT Menaḥot 45a).

Ezekiel's exile to Babylonia prevented him from serving as a Zadokite priest in the *Jerusalem *Temple. During his thirtieth year (Ezek 1:1–3), the age when a Zadokite priest would normally begin Temple service (Num 4:3; cf. Num 8:23–25, which states that priestly service begins at age twenty-five), Ezekiel began his prophetic career by experiencing visions of *God. Because his inaugural vision took place during the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's exile (i.e., 592 BCE), his final vision of the restored Temple in the twenty-fifth year (Ezek 40:1) must have taken place when Ezekiel was fifty (Ezek 40:1), the age when a priest would normally retire from active service. His birth in 622 BCE would then correspond to the eighteenth year of *Josiah, king of Judah, who sought to restore the sanctity of the Jerusalem Temple at the center of a reunited Israel. Ezekiel's own career constituted a continuation and expansion of Josiah's program, even after the death of the king, the destruction of the Temple, and the exile of the people, until the holy Temple was reestablished at the center of a reunited twelve *tribes of Israel and a reconstituted and purified creation.

The book of Ezekiel consists of thirteen units, each introduced by a date formula and each presenting his visions and oracles. Filled with Temple imagery and priestly concepts, these units indicate that Ezekiel adapted his priestly identity and role in his prophetic career, even in a foreign and unclean land. Ezekiel is a watchman for the people; his priestly and prophetic task is to instruct them to sanctify themselves according to the divine will. He interprets the *Babylonian Exile and the destruction of the Temple as a process through which God purges the world in preparation for the reestablishment of a purified Temple with Israel at the center of a purified creation. Ezekiel 1–7 presents his inaugural vision of God borne through the heavens by four heavenly creatures (ḥayyot); they are identified in Ezekiel 9–10 as the cherubs (kerubim) who guard the *Ark of the Covenant placed in the Holy of Holies of the Jerusalem Temple. Ezekiel's divine vision is based on the imagery of the Ark of the Covenant, a symbolic representation of God's presence in the Temple that would be experienced by the High Priest when he entered the Holy of Holies to present the *Yom Kippur purification offering (Lev 16; cf. M. Yoma). On the basis of this vision, Ezekiel was commissioned as a prophet of God to speak to Israel once he returned to his home in Tel Aviv, a known site in Babylonia.

Ezekiel 8–19 presents the vision of God’s departure from the Temple. Ezekiel once again sees the divine throne chariot hovering above Jerusalem as God commands heavenly figures, dressed in white linen like priests, to destroy the city as if it were the Yom Kippur purification offering. Indeed, those persons killed in the city are likened to the goat slaughtered for the offering, and those persons who survived to go into exile are likened to the goat released into the wilderness to carry away the sins of the people (Lev 16). Successive units of the book present Ezekiel’s oracles concerning the punishment of Israel (20–23); symbolic actions concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the punishment of neighboring nations (24–25); oracles concerning Tyre and its rulers (26–28); oracles concerning *Egypt (29:1–16; 29:17–30:19) and Pharaoh (30:20–26; 31; 32); and final oracles concerning the nations and Ezekiel’s role as the watchman warning of impending punishment (32:17–33:20).

Ezekiel 33:21–39:20 presents a series of oracles concerned with the restoration of Israel, such as the rise of a new Davidic monarch, the reunification of the kingdoms of *Israel and *Judah, the *resurrection of the dead bones, and the purification of the land from the impurity caused by the corpses of the army of Gog defeated by Magog, a symbolic representation of the forces of evil in the world that must be overcome as part of the process of divine purification. With the purification of the land from death, Ezekiel 40–48 presents a final vision of the restoration of the Temple, the twelve *Israelite tribes, and creation at large. This vision of the restored Jerusalem Temple does not correspond to either the Temple of *Solomon or the Second *Temple; this prompted later commentators such as *Rashi and David *Kimḥi (Radak; see also, BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800) to declare that Ezekiel’s vision represents the Third Temple that is yet to come. Ezekiel’s visions of punishment and restoration served as an important model for the development of the rabbinic hekhalot (palaces) and merkavah (chariot) teachings (see MYSTICISM: HEKHALOT AND MERKAVAH LITERATURE). His statement that God will become “a small sanctuary” (11:16) for the exiles is the basis for the development of the *synagogue. The modern city of *Tel Aviv was named for Ezekiel’s home in Babylonia to symbolize the restoration of Israel.

Recommended reading includes M. A. Sweeney, “Ezekiel,” The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Brettler (2003); M. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1–37. Anchor Bible 22, 22A (1983, 1997); and J. D. Levenson, Theology of the Program of Restoration of Ezekiel 40–48 (1976).

MARVIN A. SWEENEY

Ezra and Nehemiah are the titular protagonists of the biblical book of Ezra-Nehemiah (or, as is often the case in modern Bibles, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah). Included in the Writings section (see BIBLE), Ezra-Nehemiah is an account of the restoration of *Jerusalem after the Persian defeat of *Babylon (sixth to fifth centuries BCE). The initial part of the book recounts the first waves of returnees from Babylon and their efforts to rebuild the *Temple in response to the decree of Cyrus of *Persia (Ezra 1–6). After the completion of the Temple, the text introduces the priest and scribe Ezra who travels from Babylon on a commission from the Persian king to restore the Temple vessels and install a legal system. On arriving in *Jerusalem, Ezra discovers that some Judean men had married women from outside the community and he extracts a pledge from those who have done so to expel their wives and children (Ezra 7–10).

Following the book of Ezra, the book of Nehemiah opens with a first-person narration of the Israelite Nehemiah, a courtier in the palace of Persian king Artaxerxes I, who travels to *Judah to become its governor. Amid local resistance emblemized by Sanballat and Tobiah (possibly governors of *Samaria and *Ammon, respectively), he leads a project to refortify Jerusalem and, in response to popular outcry, relieves the debt belonging to struggling small farmers (Neh 1–7). At this point in the story, Ezra reappears and undertakes a public reading of the “Book of the Torah of Moses.” The community responds with a public confession of penitence and a written agreement to maintain the Temple (Neh 8–10). The final chapters of Nehemiah (11–13) are an eclectic mix of lists and short narratives, including the dedication of the newly built wall and the reemergence of Nehemiah’s story, in which he institutes Temple and tithe reforms and, like Ezra, condemns exogamous marriages.

As this summary of the book suggests, Ezra-Nehemiah is a complex text that interweaves earlier sources with original writing. These sources include narratives, such as the “Nehemiah Memorial” (Neh 1–7, 13), and extensive lists, including two nearly identical lists of returnees in Ezra 2 and Nehemiah 7. Ezra-Nehemiah employs these diverse sources to create a purposeful, if complicated, story. The people of Jerusalem, led by the former exiles, make a unified, deliberate, and comprehensive effort to restore the city and its religious and social institutions. This story is a profoundly theological retelling of history and, as such, reflects the post-exilic community’s understanding of itself as much as actual events. At times, the text resorts to creative and ambiguous chronology (Ezra 4 obscures the differences between the sixth and fifth centuries; the time frame of Ezra’s activities is far from clear). Additionally, the notion that the exiled Judeans responded immediately and single-mindedly to Cyrus is tempered by archeological evidence that suggests that Jerusalem remained depopulated and desperately poor well into the fifth century and did not thrive until the *Hellenistic era. See ARCHEOLOGY: ANCIENT TIMES THROUGH THE PERSIAN PERIOD; BABYLONIAN EXILE; RUTH, BOOK OF; SAMARITANS.

SEAN BURT

F

Fackenheim, Emil Ludwig (1916–2003), philosopher and theologian, was born in Halle, Germany. He entered the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in 1935, studied at the University of Halle, and fled *Germany to *Britain in 1939, after several months of detention in Sachsenhausen. After a year at the University of Aberdeen and a lengthy period of incarceration as an enemy alien in Britain and *Canada, he continued his studies at the University of Toronto. He taught at the University of Toronto from 1948 until his retirement in 1982, when he moved to *Jerusalem.

Fackenheim's philosophical work on Kant, Schelling, and Hegel focused on the problem of faith and reason and especially on the way in which philosophical thought confronted the reality of transcendence. The Religious Dimension in Hegel's Thought (1968) discusses how Hegel's philosophical system understands and incorporates religion and the divine. His early essays on German Idealism were edited by John Burbridge and published as The God Within: Kant, Schelling, and Historicity (1996). Their central theme is the problem of the historicity of human existence and the claim to transcendence offered by philosophy.

His Jewish theological work defended the primacy of faith and revelation for a responsible understanding of Jewish existence and the relationship between freedom and tradition in modern Jewish life. Adapting the conception of *revelation articulated by *Buber and *Rosenzweig in the Weimar period, Fackenheim argued against secular rejections of religion and naturalistic interpretations of Judaism. His essays written between 1948 and 1967 are collected in Quest for Past and Future (1968).

In the late 1960s Fackenheim began to confront the horrors of *Nazi atrocities. His study of Hegel had shown him that even the most comprehensive philosophical thought could not adequately find a place for radical *evil, and his study of the *Holocaust convinced him that even Hegel, were he alive today, would not be a Hegelian, because no philosophical, theological, or social scientific thought could satisfactorily grasp the meaning or purpose in those events. Although Fackenheim became persuaded of the radical historicity of thought in the face of such evil, he nevertheless argued that opposition to the aims of Nazi criminality could be hermeneutically articulated. The result, for Jewish thought, was Fackenheim's statement of the 614th commandment: Jews are forbidden to grant Hitler any posthumous victories. His most developed defense and formulation of this imperative of opposition are expressed in God's Presence in History (1970).

During the 1970s Fackenheim elaborated this obligation to recover the past. To Mend the World (1983) provides his most philosophically sophisticated demonstration of the necessity of post-Holocaust Jewish existence, its possibility, and the conceptual contribution of Judaism to the very understanding of the process of "mending" that must follow radical historical ruptures. In that work, Fackenheim shows how a dialectical inquiry into the agency of the Nazi atrocities and into the responses of its victims exposes both the limitations of thought to comprehend the evil and the necessity of life to resist it. Fackenheim's essays and books written after 1983 continued to elaborate the character of Jewish life in a post-Holocaust world and to explore the implications of the Holocaust for Christians, Germans, and others. See also, HOLOCAUST: THEOLOGICAL RESPONSES; and THOUGHT, MODERN.

MICHAEL L. MORGAN

Family: See also ISRAELITES: MARRIAGE AND FAMILY LIFE; MIDDLE AGES: CHILDHOOD; entries under WOMEN

Family and Marriage: Early Modern Period. The pre-modern Jewish family is popularly imagined as consisting of an arranged but stable marital union that produced many children and maintained strong bonds with an extended family. Yet sources reveal that Jewish family size between 1500 and 1800 was on average relatively modest (4.4 in *Poland-Lithuania) and that deviations from traditional standards of married life did occur. Adulterous affairs (see ADULTERY), sexual liaisons with non-Jews, spousal abuse, male absence because of extensive travel for *yeshivah study or trade, and sexual dysfunction or impotence could result in marital breakdown and divorce. Women were particularly vulnerable in such cases, since Jewish law and custom usually proscribed their ability to initiate divorce and prevented abandoned wives (agunot) from remarrying. Yet traditional Jewish marriage practices remained the norm and were never seriously challenged until the appearance of Jewish advocates of Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) in the late eighteenth century.

Arranged marriages (age sixteen for women and eighteen for men) were considered the ideal, because it was assumed that young people possessed neither the ability to postpone sexual activity until a more mature age nor enough life experience to choose proper partners. For families of means, matchmaking strategies were dictated by considerations of yihus, familial prestige emanating from the scholarly accomplishments and, to a lesser extent, wealth of one's forebears and living relatives. *Betrothal negotiations were accompanied by an examination of the potential groom's talmudic expertise. Some young men of humble backgrounds managed to acquire yihus independently by earning a scholarly reputation, enabling them to marry daughters of wealthy families. After the wedding, a young married couple and their offspring might be fed and housed by the wife's or husband's parents for a period of two to eight years; this support, known as kest, enabled the couple to learn a trade or the groom to continue his studies. In reality, only parents with the economic means for a dowry and kest could afford yihus-based matches for their teenaged children.

After the kest period husband and wife typically both worked, with the wife functioning as a junior partner in the family economic enterprise. The stereotypical arrangement whereby the wife supported her husband financially while he studied all day was only practiced among certain elites.

Both *Ashkenazic and *Sephardic elite families used marriage strategies to create continental familial trade networks, as well as inheritable rabbinical posts for the families' scholars. The most successful families took on surnames, including Horowitz, Shapiro, Margalio, and Landau, and formed a Jewish aristocracy based predominantly on yihus, wealth, and, most important, *Torah knowledge. Unlike non-Jewish markers of nobility like land and titles, Torah knowledge could not be automatically transferred; hence there was an added urgency to educate one's sons. When, as a child, the Polish/Moravian memoirist Phineas Katzenellenbogen was unable to explain a certain passage, his father shamed him by reciting each scholar in his ancestral line. The education of daughters was usually less formal and rigorous; their value on the marriage market was determined by their yihus, mercantile abilities (including knowledge of non-Jewish languages), and physical attractiveness. Daughters were also treated differently in their fathers' wills, receiving one-half of the male's portion in Ashkenazic society.

Early modern memoirists, like Leon *Modena (Italy, 1574–1648) and Ber of Bolechow (Poland, 1723–1805), evinced discomfort with arranged marriages and strove to marry women of their own choosing. Yet *Glückel of Hameln (Germany, 1646–1724), who was betrothed at age twelve and married at fourteen, praised her husband as a good provider, pious Jew, and a “good and true father” who “loved his wife and children beyond all measure.” Whether he displayed his affection is doubtful, however, because contemporaneous Jewish child-rearing manuals discouraged such a display on the grounds that it would cause disobedience. There are some indications that deference and respect for authority began to break down in eighteenth-century *Eastern Europe. Lower infant mortality rates fueled rapid demographic expansion, resulting in growing numbers of young people and increased generational conflict. The emergence of *Hasidism was central in shaping the youth culture of the period. Although Hasidic leaders maintained the traditional value of yihus and even established dynasties, their traditionalist opponents' bans against marriage into Hasidic families had an impact on matchmaking. Maskilim, supporters of Jewish Enlightenment, attacked arranged marriages in principle and sometimes encouraged growing disenchantment with them. The Polish maskil Salomon *Maimon (ca. 1752–1800) effectively abandoned his wife to pursue secular studies in Germany. Yet most of Jewish society in this era continued to adhere to traditional familial practices.

GLENN DYNNER

Fashion. From the mid-nineteenth-century influx of *Central European Jews to the later mass *immigration of *Eastern Europeans, Jews played a fundamental role in the development of the nineteenth- and twentieth-century American fashion industry. In Europe, many Jews had been peddlers, tailors, seamstresses, and fabric merchants; this experience eased their entry into the trades concerned with the making and selling of clothing, as did extended family networks. Jews may also have been so successful in the fashion industry exactly because of their outsider status: They combined an entrepreneurial spirit and business acumen with a distinct understanding of how status and acceptance could be gained, or faked, through the clothes one wore.

Many Jews began as peddlers and then became dry goods merchants as they settled in towns and cities across the nation. The most successful developed larger retail establishments and department stores. At the same time, growing *urban environments encouraged the marketing of fashion. Merchants often became producers as well; others stayed entirely on the production side, as both workers and owners. The initial investment needed to start a garment-making business was low compared to other industries, allowing many workers eventually to become owners.

UNDERWEAR: American Jews were leaders in the manufacture of foundation garments, including corsets, hoop-skirts, and cotton underclothes in the nineteenth century and the modern brassiere in the twentieth. In the late nineteenth century, the American corset industry was based largely in and around Bridgeport and New Haven, Connecticut, where a vibrant German Jewish community and sewing machine factories contributed to its development. Firms such as Strouse, Adler & Co. were pioneers in the mass manufacture of corsets, first operating as a “home industry” and later centralizing production in large-scale factories, while continuously developing new designs to appeal to fashionable American women.

The manufacture of hoopskirts in the 1850s and 1860s offered another niche industry in which American Jews were heavily involved. To create the full-skirted modes of the time, the hoopskirt was made by attaching fabric-covered metal hoops, which graduated in size from hip to ankle, to vertical strips of linen. This contraption allowed women to maintain a fashionable silhouette without the added weight and constriction of numerous layers of petticoats. Manufacturers such as Abraham J. Ash, Baruch Mordecai Garfunkel, Moses Garfunkel, and Abraham Isaac Trager were typical of the hoopskirt entrepreneurs who were often connected through religion and family. In the twentieth century, the brassiere, the girdle, and the slip would replace the corset and the hoopskirt as staples of a woman's wardrobe, driving an industry that accounted for an estimated annual earnings of $216 million by 1935. Jews continued to be at the forefront of the design and manufacture of these garments.

The modern-style bandeau brassiere (as an alternative to the corset) was developed in the 1920s, encouraged by the tube-shaped fashions of the time and a greater focus on ease of movement for increasingly active women. The Rosenthals at Maidenform, the Bienenfelds at Bestform, and the Garson family at Lovable were just a few of the companies pioneering bra design and manufacture. Technological advances, such as stretch fabrics and new fastenings to create a better fit, were particularly important and new marketing techniques and powerful advertising campaigns encouraged customer loyalty.

WOMEN'S WEAR: By the mid-nineteenth century, *New York City was the acknowledged American fashion center. A variety of factors, including the presence of small workshops that could change production quickly and a willing and able workforce, created a positive environment for the developing women's wear industry. As the end of the nineteenth century neared, 65% by value of women's garments in the United States were being produced in the lofts and tenements that dotted the cityscape (Soyer). By 1890 the garment industry was firmly entrenched around Broadway, between Canal Street and Ninth Street. Located close to the tenements of the Lower East Side, where piecework was done in so-called sweatshops, this area was a bustling center of both retailing and manufacturing. In the 1920s, the garment industry moved uptown, settling in newly constructed buildings along Seventh Avenue. Although the New York City garment district extends approximately from 30th Street to 42nd Street and from Sixth Avenue to Tenth Avenue, the most successful ready-to-wear designers and manufacturers had showrooms and design studios located in the buildings along a short stretch of this thoroughfare. From the 1920s through the 1960s, the majority of fashionable garments made for American women either originated on Seventh Avenue or were directly influenced by those that did.

The physical movement of the industry reflected changing attitudes toward American fashion as well. The fashion industry did not truly develop until the first decades of the twentieth century. Before then, American designers were generally not known or respected. American manufacturers relied on Europe – Paris, London, and *Vienna – for inspiration, and their products were seen as exact copies or close adaptations, rather than original ideas. However, even though inspiration may have come from Europe, Americans were fully able to produce and market high-quality fashions, both custom-made and ready-wear, and the 1910s and 1920s saw the emergence of a new class of designers, who garnered greater respect and customer loyalty; they included Max Meyer, Edward Mayer, Hattie Carnegie, Nettie Rosenstein, Miss E. M. A. Steinmetz, and Sally Milgrim.

Well-known and respected Seventh Avenue firms raised the bar for American fashion, but low- and mid-priced apparel companies disseminated it to the average American woman through adaptations of the latest styles from Paris and New York. Designers like Maurice Rentner and Nettie Rosenstein may have represented the highest quality and creativity that Seventh Avenue had to offer, but firms such as Leslie Fay (Fred Pomerantz), Puritan (Carl Rosen), and Jonathan Logan (David Schwartz) made up in volume what they lacked in originality or luxury. These men, and many others like them, were manufacturers and businessmen rather than designers and artists, but they were able to take luxurious fashions and adapt them to the American market.

MEN'S WEAR: Although men's wear is rarely subject to the fashion vagaries that affect the women's industry, nineteenth-century ideals of respectability and gentility played a powerful role in the development of the fashionable male in western societies. The relative stability of men's wear styles in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries allowed for the development of regional centers of manufacture outside New York City, including Rochester, New York; Baltimore; and *Chicago. Firms based in these cities pioneered one of the major American contributions to men's fashions – the production of high-end ready-to-wear suits and coats.

Rochester, New York, especially, became an important hub of men's clothing production and fine tailoring. In the late 1840s and early 1850s, a handful of German Jewish and Anglo-Jewish immigrants and their families founded Rochester's ready-made men's wear industry. From Rochester's first such firm, Greentree and Wile (est. 1847), to those established later such as Hickey-Freeman, Adler-Rochester, Stein-Bloch, and Michaels Stern, the city's manufacturers developed numerous systems to simplify and increase production. Although manufacturing was eventually consolidated in large-scale factories, where unskilled workers could be given specific tasks to perform on each garment (facilitating faster, less expensive production), these companies also employed many highly skilled tailors to maintain production standards. Of the owners of these firms, all but Jeremiah Hickey were Jewish; Hickey's partnership with Freeman represented a relatively rare pairing of Jew and non-Jew as co-owners of a clothing company.

In *Chicago, too, firms such as Hart, Schaffner & Marx and Kuppenheimer produced quality men's wear. Hart, Schaffner & Marx (founded 1887) was one of the largest and most important men's wear manufacturers in the country, because of the quality of their product and innovations such as standard pricing, selling from swatches rather than fabrics carried in weighty trunks, and advertising in the first national men's apparel magazine.

The men's ready-wear industry soon produced other types of clothing, such as sports and leisure attire. The so-called Ivy League look was made famous by J. Press of New Haven, Connecticut. Originally geared toward well-to-do college boys, his finely tailored clothing was gradually adopted by men of all ages who favored a traditional American style.

CALIFORNIA: The western United States, and California in particular (see UNITED STATES, WESTERN), became important to the American fashion industry in the early to mid-twentieth century when several distinct regional influences, including traditional western work wear, Hollywood glamour, and the casual southern Californian lifestyle, created a new fashion vernacular.

The needs of miners flocking to Gold Rush-era California supported an early industry that provided strong and durable work wear. The best known purveyor of such clothing, Levi Strauss, came from Bavaria to New York City in 1847, where his brothers owned a wholesale dry goods business. He eventually ended up in *San Francisco where he started his own firm, first selling and then manufacturing clothing. His partnership with Jacob Davis, a Jewish tailor originally from Latvia and the inventor of riveted denim overalls (patented 1873), resulted in the famed jeans still worn today. Although Levi Strauss & Co. initially manufactured functional work wear, its clothing styles became virtually ubiquitous as casual wear in the twentieth century.

A similar reinvention of traditional western work wear can be seen in the flashy outfits made for rodeo stars and performers and produced by three Eastern European Jewish immigrant entrepreneurs: Nathan Turk (born Teig), Rodeo Ben (Bernard Lichtenstein), and Nudie Cohn (born Nutya Kotlyrenko). They capitalized on the increasing popularity of the cowboy as a symbol of "rugged individualism" in American myth and popular *entertainment while introducing a "cowboy" style that combined fine tailoring with decorative embroidery (based on Central and Eastern European motifs), fringes, and rhinestones. Movie, music, and rodeo stars such as Gene Autry, Roy Rogers, Hank Williams, and Elvis Presley became loyal customers, projecting the ornate styles across the country.

Although work wear was being produced in California in the nineteenth century, a full-fledged garment industry geared toward "fashion" did not develop until the 1920s and '30s. As Eastern European immigrants and garment workers from the East Coast moved to California after *World War I, they opened new firms, benefiting from the booming economy centered on real estate, oil, and the movie industry. At the same time, well-established firms moved away from producing work wear. In Los Angeles, Jewish manufacturers drew on the distinctive southern Californian lifestyle centered on the car, the beach, and outdoor recreational activity for design inspiration. They used comfortable and easy-wear fabrics like cotton, denim, and gingham, creating youthful and inexpensive sportswear that became emblematic of an emerging "American Style" and a mainstay of the ready-to-wear industry in the twentieth century.

Frederick Cole (born Cohn) focused his attention on knitting colorful and fashionable swimsuits that reflected the southern California lifestyle. The company, renamed Cole of California in 1941, transformed women's swimwear through important innovations. These included the lowered back and defined bust in the late 1920s; the introduction of Malatex (Cole's exclusive process of stitching rubberized thread through fabric) in the 1930s; the design of the two-piece "Swoon Suit," which laced up the sides of the trunk and featured a tie-bra; and exclusive contracts with Esther Williams and Christian Dior in the 1950s.

Originally based in New York City, the *film industry moved to *Los Angeles after World War I, and Hollywood became the center of world movie production and distribution. Several of the early studio heads were Jews who had worked in the garment industry. Understanding the appeal that fashion had for women, they featured glamorous clothing in their movies and entered into cross-marketing arrangements with Los Angeles' garment manufacturers, who were also predominantly Jewish. The studios would often invite manufacturers to see a film before it opened, encouraging them to produce affordable copies of the dresses in conjunction with the film's release. Many labels incorporated the words "Hollywood," "Movie," or "Film" into their names, further promoting the idea that anyone could feel as glamorous as a big-screen star. At the same time, Hollywood costume designers became known across America as their styles were adapted for the average woman. As in other areas of the clothing industry, many of the best known designers were Jewish. Adrian (Adrian Adolph Greenberg), Helen Rose, Edith Head, and Bernard Newman all had an enormous influence on American fashion in the mid-twentieth century.

ACCESSORIES: Accessories, including footwear, handbags, gloves, belts, hats, and jewelry, have always constituted a significant part of the fashion business, and Jews have played a vital role here as well. In the nineteenth and first half of the twentieth centuries, hats and gloves were considered essential for both men and women. The glove industry, centered in and around Gloversville, New York, was initially dominated by owners and workers of Anglo-Saxon origin. By the 1890s, however, Jews had become the significant ethnic group in this niche industry. German Jewish immigrants like Nathan Littauer entered the field in the 1850s and 1860s, opening the door for later waves of Eastern European immigrants. Well-known Gloversville firms included Bachner-Moses-Louis (producers of Bacmo and Elite gloves) and the S. Schrecker Glove Co. (today the Grandoe Corp.).

Both men and women wore hats outside the home until the mid-twentieth century. From high end to low, millinery formed an important part of the fashion trades and employed many Jewish immigrants. At the top, firms such as Bes Ben and John-Frederics were heralded for their innovative designs; cheaper brands like Betmar produced fashionable models at more reasonable prices. While the status of hats and gloves declined over the course of the twentieth century, the fortunes of shoes continued to rise. By the 1920s, shoe design became significantly linked to fashion; in the 1930s, Jewish-owned companies such as Delman and I. Miller became major trendsetters of the women's shoe industry. Similarly, handbag manufacturers have produced a broad range of products for an equally diverse clientele, from low-priced firms such as Garay, to more upscale makers like Koret, to luxury brands like Judith Leiber.

For further reading, see E. E. Greenberg, "Fashion," in P. Buhle, ed., Jews and American Popular Culture (2006); Yeshiva University Museum, A Perfect Fit: The Garment Industry and American Jewry (2005); M. Gottesman, Hoopskirts and Huppas (1999); H. Cobrin, The Men's Clothing Industry: Colonial through Modern Times (1970); H. George-Warren and M. Freedman, How the West Was Worn (2000); J. Farrell-Beck and C. Gau, Uplift: The Bra in America (2002); and D. Soyer, A Coat of Many Colors (2005). ELIZABETH E. GREENBERG

Fast Days. Fast days (known as a ta'anit or tzom) are periods of self-denial for three purposes: (1) to achieve *atonement for one's sins, (2) to commemorate a sorrowful moment in history, or (3) to show gratitude to God. There are six statutory, public fasts on the Jewish *calendar. Only *Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, is obligated by the *Torah itself. The Fast of Esther (13th of *Adar) is alluded to in the book of *Esther, but was rabbinically mandated as a means of commemorating the three-day fast Esther ordered on account of Haman's decree (Esther 4:16). The other four fasts are the 9th of *Av (*Tisha B'Av), the 17th of *Tammuz, the Fast of Gedaliah, and the 10th of *Tevet, all of which are associated with the destruction of *Jerusalem and the *Temple. They were extrapolated by the Rabbis on the basis of *Zechariah 8:19, which refers to four fasts that will be transformed into days of joy during the *messianic age.

Public fasts fall into two categories: major and minor. Yom Kippur and Tisha B'Av are the two major fasts; they require a complete day of abstention from eating, drinking, bathing, sexual intercourse, and wearing leather shoes. The four minor fasts are observed from sunrise to sunset and require the same abstentions, excluding bathing. Except for Yom Kippur, fasts are prohibited on the *Sabbath and are moved to another day. The *Mishnah (Ta'anit 4:6) explains the significance of both Tisha B'Av and the 17th of Tammuz. Tisha B'Av primarily memorializes the destruction of both the First and Second Temples, yet many calamities throughout Jewish history, subsequent to the *Mishnah, have also become associated with that day. The 17th of Tammuz primarily memorializes the events that led to the destruction of the First Temple. The Fast of Gedaliah is held on the day after the two days of *Rosh Ha-Shanah, the 3rd of Tishri. It memorializes the assassination of Gedaliah ben Aḥikam, a righteous Jewish governor, after the Babylonian conquest of Jerusalem. His death destroyed any hope for Jewish self-government after the Babylonian siege. The 10th of Tevet memorializes the actual siege of Jerusalem in 586 BCE, connecting it to the destruction of the Temple.

Jewish law obligates Jews over the age of *Bar or *Bat Mitzvah to fast. However, certain exceptions are noted to the rules of self-denial, including for pregnant and nursing women, people who are ill, and those who are very delicate or feeble. Other common fasts are the Fast of the *Firstborn (14th of *Nissan), the fast of the *bride and groom on their wedding day, fasting on an anniversary of *death (*yahrzeit), and Yom Kippur Katan. This rarely observed fast, inspired by sixteenth-century *kabbalists, is held on the day before the *New Moon. There is also a prominent tradition of holding individual or communal fasts to protect against disasters, such as drought. Moreover, some pietists fast as a means to combat the inner evil inclination or as personal atonement for improper dreams, thoughts, or behavior. For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Spring and Summer Holidays (2009); and E. Ki Tov, The Book of Our Heritage (1979).

PAUL STEINBERG

Federations: See ORGANIZATIONS: NORTH AMERICA

Feminism: See JUDAISM, FEMINIST

Festivals. There are six biblically based holidays: *Passover (Pesah), *Shavuot, *Rosh Ha-Shanah, *Yom Kippur, *Sukkot, and *Purim. Five are derived from the *Torah and Purim is based on the book of *Esther. Of the six, the *Bible only designates the agriculturally based festivals of Passover, Shavuot, and Sukkot with the term ḥag ("festival"; pl. ḥagim). These holidays are also distinguished as the three "Pilgrimage Festivals," or the shalosh regalim, when Israelites would travel to the *Temple in *Jerusalem to make a pilgrimage offering.

Since the end of the Temple era, rabbinic *Judaism expanded the character of the pilgrimage festivals from their original agricultural origins to attain profound historical and spiritual significance. Thus, Passover is the "Season of Our Freedom"; Sukkot is the "Season of Our Rejoicing"; and Shavuot, identified as the date of the *revelation at Mount Sinai, is the "Season of the Giving of the Torah." Elevating the status of these festivals helped ensure their relevance to Jews after the Temple was destroyed in 70 CE and the majority of Jews lived outside the Land of *Israel and were no longer involved in agricultural labor. Sukkot and Passover are observed for seven days in *Israel but for eight days outside of Israel. This is because of the two-day extension of sacred days in the *Diaspora. Shavuot is observed for one day in Israel and two in the Diaspora. The eighth day of Sukkot, *Shemini Atzeret, deemed a day of sacred assembly, is biblically ascribed its own sanctity. Whether Shemini Atzeret is its own holiday or an extension of Sukkot itself is debatable. In Israel and among Reform Jews in the Diaspora, Shemini Atzeret is combined with *Simḥat Torah; other Jews in the Diaspora observe Simḥat Torah separately on the following day. The pilgrimage festivals, as well as Shemini Atzeret and Simḥat Torah, each have unique observances, yet they all share the work restrictions that apply on the *Sabbath, with the exception of food preparation, transference of fire, and carrying. The first and last days of Sukkot and Passover have this sacred significance, whereas the intermediate days (ḥol ha-mo'ed) are categorized as semi-festivals and allow for various additional forms of work.

The holiest days of biblical origin are Rosh Ha-Shanah (the *New Year) and Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement). They frame the "Ten Days of Repentance," marked by intense self-reflection, prayer, and penitence. Rosh Ha-Shanah is observed for two days both in Israel and in the Diaspora; most of the observances of the pilgrimage festivals apply. Yom Kippur is the final day of *repentance and judgment, which the Torah describes as a day of spiritual purification. Consequently, Yom Kippur is a day of self-denial and fasting (see HIGH HOLIDAYS).

Although Purim is a biblically derived holiday, it does not share the same sanctity as the aforementioned festivals. Rather it is a minor festival, akin to *Ḥanukkah, a post-biblical holiday. Several other minor holidays of rabbinic origin include Hoshanah Rabbah (the seventh day of Sukkot), *Tu b'Shevat, Lag ba-*Omer, and, in modern times, *Yom Ha-Atzma'ut (Israel Independence Day) and Yom Yerushalayim (commemoration of the 1967 unification of Jerusalem). The celebration of the New Moon (*Rosh Ḥodesh), is also intended to be a semi-festival, as demonstrated by its liturgical additions.

Useful resources are P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Spring and Summer Holidays (2009); T. H. Gaster, Festivals of the Jewish Year (1952); and I. Klein, A Guide to Religious Jewish Practice (1979).

PAUL STEINBERG

Film: Europe (POST-WORLD WAR II). The *Nazi era and World War II had an overwhelming impact on the roles and images of Jews in European cinema. A significant number of Jewish directors and actors perished in the *Holocaust, and others joined the exodus from Europe in the 1930s and did all of their subsequent work in Hollywood, the center of the U.S. film industry. The substantial majority of post-war European films with Jewish content concern the *Holocaust. Documentaries on this subject depict Jews in radically different ways. The relatively early Night and Fog (Nuit et Brouillard; directed by Alain Resnais, 1955) presents Jews as a passive historical presence; while a narrator explains the horrors of the Holocaust, the corpses of murdered Jews appear on the screen. In contrast, the monumental Shoah (directed by Claude Lanzmann, 1985) contains no still footage of the past. Instead, the Jews in the film are survivors who bear witness by relating their own experiences. Rather than being asked for judgments, these interviewees simply relate their recollections of the events they lived through, overwhelming the audience with inexplicable horror.

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (Il giardino dei Finzi Contini; directed by Vittorio de Sica, 1970), a joint Italian/West German production based on the novel by Italian author Giorgio Bassani (see LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE), won the Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film. Focused on Bassani's native Ferrara, the narrative chronicles the passivity, obliviousness, and resulting destruction of a wealthy Jewish family that barricades itself behind the walls of its villa until it is too late to escape Nazi deportation. A later Italian movie, The Truce (La Tregua; directed by Francesco Rosi, 1997), is based on Primo *Levi's 1963 memoir of the same title (also published in English as The Reawakening) and stars John Turturro. The film begins with powerful images of the Soviet liberation of *Auschwitz and chronicles the nine subsequent months of "Primo's" wanderings through Europe before he was finally able to return to his home in Turin.

Many recent European films include Jewish characters largely as the occasion for non-Jews to experience the Holocaust. In the Czech film, Divided We Fall (directed by Jan Hřebejk, 2000), a young Jewish man, David, hides while Gentile characters act out the roles of an enthusiastic Nazi collaborator, a man who intellectually opposes the Nazis but does nothing, and the heroic Marie who insists on concealing David and saving his life. David only acts at the end, after Marie falsely claims to be pregnant to explain her suspicious behavior to the authorities; because her husband is incapable, David must impregnate Marie. Rather than focusing on David, this climax serves as a metaphor for Europeans' impotence to stop the Holocaust. Similarly, in the French romantic comedy, God Is Great and I'm Not (Dieu est grand, je suis toute petite; directed by Pascale Bailly, 2001), Jews serve as a foil for a young woman to work through her psychological pain. Her story becomes a commentary on European antisemitism in that the special status of Jews highlights the non-Jew's feelings of deep insignificance, which could lead to suicide or murder. Several German dramas such as Aimée & Jaguar (directed by Max Färberböck, 1999) and Rosenstrasse (directed by Margarethe von Trotta, 2003) suggest a kinship in love and oppression between Jews and Germans during the Holocaust. In Aimée & Jaguar, the Christian Lilly complains to her lesbian Jewish lover Felice about the façade of her life as a heterosexual married woman. The movie further equates their positions as targets of oppression by having Felice declare that Lilly is "no better or worse than any of us." Despite Felice's death in a concentration camp, the movie continues this theme by focusing primarily on Lilly, who identifies her suffering with that of Felice. Rosenstrasse develops the theme of Jewish and German kinship, when Ruth, a Holocaust survivor, must consider the implications of having been saved by a non-Jew. Early in the movie, Ruth prevents her daughter, Hannah, from marrying her non-Jewish lover. After Hannah learns that a non-Jewish woman, Lena, saved Ruth, she travels to Germany to meet her. Lena convinces Hannah to reconcile with her mother, who in turn reverses herself and approves Hannah's marriage.

Other Holocaust dramas, such as Europa Europa (Germany; directed by Agnieszka Holland, 1991), Life Is Beautiful (Italy; directed by Roberto Benigni, 1997), and The Pianist (France/Germany/Poland/UK; directed by Roman Polanski, 2002), present Jews as active protagonists. Europa Europa portrays a Jewish teenager, Solly, struggling to survive by integrating further and further into Nazi society. Although Solly could superficially be characterized as wanting to erase his Jewish identity, the movie instead conveys that he is only trying to survive, and he deserves no criticism. Unlike God Is Great, Europa Europa counters negative images of Jews, specifically the stereotype that Jewish men desire non-Jewish women sexually. Here, instead, a Christian girl pursues Solly, who must flee because his circumcision would reveal him as a Jew. The movie dramatizes the classic struggle to be German on the outside while remaining Jewish on the inside, extending it to its absurd limit in a scene where the Jew serves as the example for a Nazi scientist's lesson on Aryan anatomy. The movie also questions the circumcised penis as defining Jewish identity. In the final scene when the war is over, Solly urinates in public, exposing his penis entirely as a functional organ.

In Life Is Beautiful, co-written, directed by, and starring Roberto Benigni, the main character is a happy-go-lucky man who spends the first half of the movie courting and marrying a non-Jewish woman; after their deportation to a Nazi work camp, he spends the second half of the film trying to shield his son from the Holocaust experience by convincing him that it is all a game. Controversial for its overtly humorous approach to the Nazi murder of European Jewry, Life Is Beautiful adapts the Aryan anatomy scene in Europa Europa for comical purposes. Here, the Jew masquerades as a fascist Italian school superintendent who lampoons the pseudo-science of Nazi doctrine throughout his demonstration. The twenty-first-century audience identifies with the main character in this scene, because he, like them, knows that the racial science of that time was nonsense.

The Pianist (2002), directed by Roman Polanski, who himself survived the Holocaust as a child in Poland, portrays the experience of Polish Jewish pianist Wladyslaw Szpilman (played by Adrien Brody in an Oscar-winning performance). Along with its enormous violence and destruction, the implication of the Holocaust is that it kills not just musicians, but music itself. Although the silencing of Jewish voices is expressed by silencing the piano, in one scene Szpilman is saved when he plays for a Nazi officer and the universality of the music trumps the particularity of his Jewishness.

An interesting theme in French cinema is the representation of positive relationships between Jews and Arabs; an early example is Madame Rosa (directed by Moshé Mizrahi, 1977; Oscar for best foreign film, 1977), based on the 1975 novel The Life before Us (La vie devant soi) by Romain Gary (see LITERATURE: FRANCE). Simone Signoret (1921–1985; born Simone Kaminker) plays an aging prostitute and Auschwitz survivor who cares for the children of her younger colleagues, including the Arab Momo (Mohammed), who becomes her sole support and comfort as she faces death. A Jewish boy known as Momo (Moïse) plays a similar role in Monsieur Ibrahim (Monsieur Ibrahim et les fleurs du Coran; directed by François Dupeyron and starring Omar Sharif, 2003). Here, the orphaned Momo forms a close relationship with the Turkish grocer Monsieur Ibrahim, who becomes his surrogate father.

The 2003 German comedy Go for Zucker (Alles auf Zucker; directed by Dani Levy) is about estranged brothers in contemporary Germany who must reconcile and follow Jewish religious ritual if they are to inherit their deceased mother's estate. This immensely popular slapstick, "politically incorrect" film has been described as "the first German-Jewish comedy since World War II"; it has been lauded for portraying Jews in a non-Holocaust context and for reviving the German Jewish humor that once played a central role in German popular culture.

Another trend in European films with Jewish themes is historical sagas. The 1999 international co-production Sunshine (written and directed by István Szábo and starring Ralph Fiennes), traces the triumphs and tragedies of a Hungarian Jewish family, the Sonnenscheins, during the course of the twentieth century as they encounter Hungarian nationalism, the Holocaust, and the communist regime. Sofie (directed by Liv Ullman, 1992) is based on a portion of the 1932 Danish novel, Mendel Philipsen and Sons by Henri Nathansen (see LITERATURE: SCANDINAVIA). Its powerful and sympathetic portrait of a loyal Jewish daughter torn between her family's traditions and the new possibilities offered by late-nineteenth-century *emancipation is a sensitive portrayal of Jewish life in *Denmark. Among a number of other Scandinavian films with Jewish characters and themes are Freud flyttar hemifrån (Freud's Leaving Home) directed by Susanne Bier (1991); God afton, herr Wallenberg (Good Evening, Mr. Wallenberg), directed by Kjell Grede (1990); Opphav ukjent (Origin Unknown), directed by Nina Grünfeld (2005); Mendel, directed by Alexander Røsler (1997); and Kådisbellan (The Slingshot), directed by Åke Sandgren (1993).

For further reading, see I. Avisar, Screening the Holocaust: Cinema's Images of the Unimaginable (1988); O. Bartov, The "Jew" in Cinema: From "The Golem" to "Don't Touch My Holocaust" (2005); M. Marcus, Italian Film in the Shadow of Auschwitz (2007); S. Taberner, "Philo-Semitism in Recent German Film: Aimée and Jaguar, Rosenstrasse, and Das Wunder Von Bern," German Life and Letters 58:3 (2005): 357–72; and R. Wright, The Visible Wall: Jews and Ethnic Outsiders in Swedish Film (1998).

AMOS COHEN AND DEVORAH SHUBOWITZ

Film: *Holocaust. See HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM

Film: Israel. The history of Israeli film production is linked to the political and ideological changes that have taken place since the beginning of *Zionism. The first Zionist propaganda films, directed in *Palestine by Russian-born Jewish filmmakers who were acquainted with Soviet cinematic techniques, emphasized the value of working the land and overcoming its hardships. This approach accompanied the idea of the "New Jew" who, as opposed to his oppressed and persecuted ancestors in the *Diaspora, had returned to his historical homeland to reclaim it through physical labor. Most of these films were documentaries for raising funds in *Diaspora communities. The few fiction films directed soon after Israel's independence had similar themes, retracing the Zionist pioneers' heroic tales and focusing on the collective efforts of the new settlers to make the desert bloom. Baruch Dinar's feature film, They Were Ten (1960), embodies these heroic ideas: Set at the end of the nineteenth century, the film retraces the many challenges that a group of Zionist pioneers, composed of nine men and one woman, faced on their arrival in Palestine, as they encounter the hardships of tilling an arid land and dealing with the local Arab population.

This national heroic cinema did not last for long. During the 1960s, as a result of western influences and the development of individualization and bourgeois tendencies in Israeli society, Israeli cinema began to reject collective aspirations and depict a more individual society. Joseph Miloh's film, He Walked in the Fields (1967), demonstrates the changes that had taken place in the national ethos. Adapted from Moshe Shamir's novel written twenty years earlier, this film reveals the first breaches in the national narrative through the story of its protagonist Uri (played by the leading Israeli actor, Assi Dayan), who does not automatically support national goals; on the contrary, he is hesitant about the Zionist ideological engagements of building a country, laboring on the land, and taking part in defending it. However, in contrast to the kind of heroes who would follow, Uri finally makes the "right" choice and meets his death in a dangerous and heroic operation against the soldiers of the *British Mandate.

This moment of hesitation was soon translated into the narratives and iconography of the next movement of Israeli cinema – "Personal Cinema" (also known as the "New Sensitivity") – a unique and influential cinematic movement that appeared between the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: WARS). Personal cinema chose to detach from the heroic values of previous films and create new protagonists and new narratives supported by a new cinematic language largely influenced by western cinematic new waves. Like their predecessors in the national cinema movement, the heroes of personal cinema bear no traces of the Diaspora. Moreover, they convey the experience of a generation born in this land, who therefore consider Israel as their only lived experience. Shot according to the style of the French new wave, these films exhibit new heroes, devoid of any kind of past, with a predilection for defining a new and nonpolitical urban Israeli identity. This urban predominance reflects the protagonists' rejection of their parents' conception of labor and heroism, a conception that was still dominant in the heroic national cinema.

Uri Zohar's film, Three Days and a Child (1968), exemplifies this new trend. Based on the modernist 1965 novella by A. B. *Yehoshua, the film tells the story of a Jerusalem student who is asked to take care of the son of his *kibbutz ex-girlfriend for three days. His love-hate relationship with the boy is expressed throughout the film by the changes in his attitude toward the innocent child, alternating between warm love and care to a strong desire to kill him. The protagonist's attempt to reconstruct past values and memories through his contacts with his lost lover in the kibbutz fails. At the end of the film he acknowledges that, by relinquishing his past on the kibbutz, he is left with a purposeless urban life, with no memory or identity.

Personal cinema was not the only cinematic genre in Israel during the 1960s. These years were also marked by the appearance of a new popular cinema named after a Middle Eastern pastry, the burekas films. Most of this genre's characteristics can be detected in the famous precursor, Sallah Shabbati, directed in 1964 by the Hungarian Jewish satirist Ephraim Kishon. Sallah Shabbati tells the adventures of Sallah, a *Mizrahi emigrant, and his large family, from their first day in bureaucratic Israel to his final triumph over its hegemonic system. As opposed to the New Jew incarnated in the sabra image, Sallah does not consider labor to be the highest value, refuses to contribute to any form of collectivity, and spends his time playing cards with his neighbor. Yet Sallah ends up a winner, leading his family to the new housing project, and all without having worked one single day in his new country. Kishon's popular comedy showed the deeply rooted gaps between the newcomers and the Israelis and the unwillingness of the former to overcome them. Although Sallah Shabbati is not a typical burekas film, it invented the basic parameters of the genre by revealing the flaws of the Zionist ideology, mainly the separations among different groups in Israeli society: Middle Eastern Jews vs. European Jews, the kibbutz vs. government temporary housing, and, finally, the highly motivated workers vs. those who refuse to turn work into a religion. The burekas genre repeated and developed most of these themes, especially the oppression of the poor by the rich that, in the Israeli context, was translated into the oppression of the Mizrahi Jew by his European brother. Underestimated by local critics, these films gained a large popularity and contributed to the normalization of Israeli society. However, neither personal cinema nor burekas cinema, both of which reflected a natural reaction to the ideological national cinema, lasted long; both came to a sudden end with the outbreak of the Yom Kippur War in 1973, which was to be remembered as Israel's most traumatic war with far-reaching implications for the entire political system.

After some nostalgic youth films, Israeli cinema reinvented itself after 1977, when the right-wing Likud party attained power for the first time since the establishment of the state. Israeli filmmakers, who mostly belonged to the dethroned elites of the left, reacted by creating the first political films that openly criticized the ways in which Zionism chose to implement itself among the country's various populations: Ne'eman's Paratroopers (1977), Moshinson's Wooden Gun (1979), Wollman's Hide and Seek (1980), and Bukai's Avanti Popolo (1986), among others, denounce some of the acts committed in the name of Zionism since Israel's earliest days. Barabash's Once We Were Dreamers (1987) goes one step further, using the basic narrative structure of the canonical national film They Were Ten to return to the past and provide another perspective on the heroic Zionist narrative. Like the earlier film, Once We Were Dreamers tells the story of a group of pioneers and how they cope with the hardships of the land, as well as their many confrontations with its Arab inhabitants. However, it also focuses on the pioneers' inability to realize their dream and create a new form of society based on collectivity and equality; finally it presents their disappointment as they come to understand the gaps between their utopian vision and reality.

During the 1980s, other important films such as Noa Is 17 (Yeshuron, 1982), Rage and Glory (Nesher, 1984), Late Summer Blues (Shor, 1987), and Himo, King of Jerusalem (Gutman, 1987) turn to the past and, like Once We Were Dreamers, reveal a crisis in the Zionist ideology. Adopting the point of view of the "other," these films depict various Israeli-Palestinian interactions, emphasizing a reversal of the roles of the parties involved. Whereas, the early national cinema had offered a picture of the Israeli willing to sacrifice him- or herself for the birth of the nation, in the 1980s it was the Palestinian who was allotted the same heroic role, with the same motivations. Ne'eman's Fellow Traveler (1983) and Streets of Yesterday (1989), Barabash's Beyond the Walls (1984), and Haim Buzaglo's Fictive Marriage (1988), among others, tell how the encounter between Israelis and Palestinians led to an assertion of the humanistic standpoint vis-à-vis those who once were enemies.

Israeli cinema gave up its political discourse during the 1990s, after the end of the first Intifada and the signing of the Oslo accords, and began to focus on the investigation of more personal narratives related to particular ethnic, gender, and age identities. Films such as Life According to Agfa (Dayan, 1992), Lovesick on Nana Street (Gabison, 1995), Sh'chrur (Hafari, 1995) and Walk on Water (Fox, 2003) – all conveying the experience of specific identities in Israeli society and their feelings of internal exile – mark a new stage in Israeli cinema that became highly popular. The main difference between this cinema and the personal cinema of the 1960s, both of which deal with private experiences, is that these later films are reflections of a general atmosphere of alienation, guilt, and disappointment in Zionism. While focusing on private lives, these films also continue the tendencies of the political cinema of the 1980s in daring to deconstruct the founding mythologies of the national historiography and so confronting them with a universal morality.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Israeli films once more have returned to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, although with a profoundly different approach from the 1980s. Not only are the political realities very different but Israeli filmmakers are also more critical in their reflections on the harm caused to both sides by the Israeli occupation. Amos Gitai's Kedma (2001), for example, takes a revisionist approach to Israel's 1948 War of Independence in its depiction of Jewish refugees from European antisemitism who expel Palestinians from their homes. Udi Aloni's Forgiveness (2006) takes place on the site of the massacred Palestinian village Dir Yassin where an Israeli psychiatric hospital has been established. In this multilayered site, Holocaust survivors continue to relive their nightmares, and a young Israeli soldier, weighed down by his responsibility for the death of a Palestinian child, sinks into madness.

Beaufort (2007), directed by Yosef Cedar, focuses on actual events that took place during the Israeli military's evacuation from south Lebanon in 2000 and asks critical questions about some of the basic assumptions of the Israeli security police and its responsibility for superfluous casualties. Ari Folman's Waltzing with Bashir (2008) takes Israeli guilt one step further in its meditation on the trauma of the first Lebanon war in which Folman participated as an eighteen-year-old soldier. Folman made the radical decision to use animation for most of the film, but his animated world abruptly ends with documentary footage of the brutal attacks on the Sabra and Shatila Palestinian refugee camps. Although Israel was not directly involved in these massacres, they were enabled by the wartime situation. In a quite different tone, Eran Kolorin's debut film, The Band's Visit (2007), recounts the story of an Egyptian police band that becomes lost in Israel and ends up in a remote development town. This bittersweet comedy points out the similarities between the Egyptians and their Jewish hosts. Another film that returns to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict with a different approach is Lemon Tree (2008) directed by Eran Riklis. As in his previous movie, The Syrian Bride (2004), Riklis has chosen a Palestinian woman as his protagonist, hinting that changes in both Israeli and Palestinian attitudes will only come with a different, feminine approach.

For further reading, see N. Ben-Shaul, Mythical Expressions of Siege in Israeli Films (1977); N. Gertz, Motion Fiction: Israeli Fiction in Film (1993); N. Gertz and Y. Munk, "The Representation of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict in Israeli Cinema," in Encyclopedia of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, ed. C. Rubenberg (forthcoming); A. Kronish and C. Safirman, Israeli Film: A Reference Guide (2003); and E. Shohat, Israeli Cinema: East/West and the Politics of Representation (1989).

NURIT GERTZ AND Yael MUNK (Research for this chapter was supported by the Israel Science Foundation [ISF] (grant number 786/03) and by the Israeli-Palestinian Science Organization [IPSO])

Film: Latin America. Jews have been significantly involved in Latin American cinema as writers and directors (see also LATIN AMERICA; LITERATURE: LATIN AMERICA). Many Latin American films with Jewish themes depict historical events. Films that emphasize the saga of *Sephardi Jews include The Jew (directed by Jom Tob Azulay, 1999), an exploration of the fate of seventeenth-century Jews who practiced their religion in secret under the threat of the Spanish *Inquisition. Azulay re-creates the trial and execution of the Brazilian playwright Antonio José da Silva, whose martyrdom became a symbol of freedom when *Brazil gained its independence from *Portugal in 1829. The Longing: The Forgotten Jews of South America (2007), a documentary directed by Gabriela Böhm, presents the struggles of a small group of South American crypto-Jews (see CONVERSOS/CRYPTO-JEWS), who secretly maintained their faith until contemporary times. *Ladino, the Judeo-Spanish language, is preserved in Like a Bride, directed by Guita Schyfter (1974), a film that surveys the *Turkish immigration to *Mexico in the early twentieth century. It is a sensitive portrayal of the friendship between two Jewish girls and their families, one Sephardi, the other *Ashkenazi. This cinematic adaptation of Rosa Nissan's novel also explores interactions between conservatives and liberals and between *communist and *Zionist Jews in *Mexico, up to the late 1960s. Ruth Behar, a Cuban *anthropologist living in the United States, produced Adío Kerida (Goodbye My Love, 2002), a testimonial film in which she rediscovers her own Turkish and Polish roots in *Cuba (see also CARIBBEAN). Guita Schyfter's The Labyrinth of Memory (2007) contrasts Schyfter's journey to *Poland to find her own Jewish background with the voyage of a non-Jewish woman from Cuba to Mexico. Through interviews and mutual exchanges both women fill in gaps in their family histories and reconstruct their lives.

The immigration of Ashkenazi Jews to Latin America at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century is also a central cinematic theme. Films explore ethnic and religious conflicts and difficulties in achieving integration, not only between Jews and Gentiles but also between Sephardi and Ashkenazic Jews. The pioneering experience of Ashkenazic Jews who settled in *agricultural colonies in *Argentina purchased by the *Baron de Hirsch Fund is recorded in several documentaries featuring oral histories and archival footage. These films about the "Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas" include Yiddische Gauchos (directed by Mark Freeman and Alison Brysk, 1989). Legacy (directed by Marcelo Trotta and Vivian Imar, 2001), which is narrated in Spanish and Yiddish, vividly recounts the struggles of the Wesser, the ship that brought the first Jewish immigrants to Argentina in 1889. Other Argentine and Chilean documentaries of this kind are From Bessarabia to Entre Ríos (Pedro Banchik, 1974); 7 Days in El Once (Daniel Burman, 2001); A Kiss to This Land (Daniel Goldberg, 1995); Chevel Katz and his Landsmen (Alejandro Vagnenkos, 2005); Jews in Chile: Emigrants in Time (Cristian Leighton, 2002); and Be a Patriot (David Blaustein, 2007). A 1974 musical adaptation of Alberto Gerchunoff's stories, The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas (first published in 1910), was directed by Juan José Jusid and was a major commercial success.

The somber subject of the Jewish "white slave trade" – the *prostitution traffic that took place from *Eastern Europe to Argentina between the late 1890s and the mid-1930s – is featured in Naked Tango, a 1990 American–Argentine co-production, directed by Leonard Schrader. This violent thriller is set in Buenos Aires against a background of tango dancing. Another film on this topic is The Road South (Juan Bautista Stagnaro, 1988), which follows the route described by French journalist Albert Londres in his 1927 The Road to Buenos Aires, a journalistic account of the tricks employed by traffickers to ensnare innocent girls in Europe and force them into prostitution in Argentina. "The Tragic Week" is the term that identifies a violent attack against Jews that took place in Buenos Aires during January 1919. A Pogrom in Buenos Aires (Herman Szwarcbart, 2007) examines the conflicts between the victims' recollections and the official accounts of the same events. This hunt, targeted against "rusos" (a term used for Jews) who were regarded as communists, was provoked by upper class youths. The documentary includes a Yiddish text by Pinie Wald, one of the victims, who was tortured by the police.

The *Holocaust is addressed in films like Jews in Many Lands: Sosúa, a Heaven in the Caribbean (1981), a documentary from the Dominican Republic about the resourcefulness of a group of Holocaust survivors who found shelter in that country, where they created a prosperous agricultural community. A personal account of the suffering of Jews hiding from the *Nazis during *World War II is depicted in Under the World (1986, Beda Docampo Feijóo and Juan B. Stagnaro). Filmed in Poland, with Argentine Spanish-speaking actors, it tells the story of a family who spent the war in inhuman conditions, hiding in a hole in a forest while being hunted by both Nazis and local Poles, and their final escape to Argentina. Ana's Trip (2007), directed by Alan Jais, from Chile, documents individual journeys back to sites of extermination. Poor Butterfly (Raúl de la Torre, 1986) is a fictional film that covers the turbulent period at the end of World War II, when the conservative government of Argentina was fighting communists and harboring Nazis. The film explores the pervasive antisemitism within Argentine society in its treatment of an assimilated Jewish woman married to a Catholic surgeon; she is murdered while attempting to reveal her father's secret list of Nazi war criminals hiding in Argentina.

Whereas Latin American cinema from the 1960s onward revealed the decline in Jewish cultural and religious values within a predominantly Catholic society, more recent films depict a rebirth of Jewish identity. This is particularly the case in Argentina, the largest Jewish community in Latin America and the country where Jewish cinema has been most prominent. The Proceso Years (1976–82) and their aftermath, marked by repressive military dictatorships, are featured in The Friend (Jeanine Meerapfel, 1988), a film that develops the long-standing bond between two childhood friends, a Jewish actress who sings *Yiddish songs while in exile, and the mother of a "desaparecido," in their futile search for her son. The women's desperate attempt to find justice prepares the ground for the future Madres de la Plaza de Mayo.

J/18 (2004) commemorates the 2004 bombing of the AMIA (Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina) in Buenos Aires (see ARGENTINA). In it, ten Argentine filmmakers (Daniel Burman, Adrián Caetano, Lucía Cedrón, Alejandro Doria, Alberto Lecchi, Marcelo Schapces, Carlos Sorín, Juan B. Stagnaro, Mauricio Wainrot, and Adian Saer) explore the impact of the attack and attest to a resurgence of vitality in Argentine Jewish life. Their vignettes use diverse artistic forms: *photography, *dance, monologues, fictional dramatizations, and testimonial accounts. The Brazilian film The Year My Parents Went on Vacation (Cao Hamburger, 1980) takes place in 1970, and both the military dictatorship and sports (Pelé and the World Cup) play a part in it. Set in the Jewish neighborhood of Sao Paulo, it depicts the trauma of a twelve-year-old boy whose parents are involved in political conflict and forced to flee the country (see BRAZIL).

Assimilation to the local culture is apparent in the comedy, My Mexican Shiva (Alejandro Springall, 2007); it depicts the death of a Jewish patriarch, whose mourners include his Catholic ex-lover and his newly *Orthodox son, against a background of Mexican mariachi and klezmer *music. A touch of magical realism is introduced by two Yiddish-speaking Hasidic Jews – two spirits who observe the events – who pass judgment on the unfolding situations and ultimately intercede for the soul of the dead man. The subject of *intermarriage, present in many Latin American Jewish films, is poignantly depicted as a fragile relationship in Poor Butterfly. A more conciliatory view is offered in Autumn Sun (Eduardo Mignona, 1996); in this film the mixed couple searches for harmony in both religions and moves toward integration into mainstream society. At first, mutually suspicious of each other (the man pretends to be a Jew), the couple develops a positive relationship, enhanced by discussions about Jewish gastronomy and Yiddish expressions.

Jewishness as a secondary theme first appears in the 1948 production of Rag Ball (Leopoldo Torre Ríos) contrasting the Jewish privileging of mind over body. In Assassination in the Senate of the Nation (1984) Juan José Jusid focuses on the internal political corruption of Argentina during the 1920s. The gruesome depiction of the meat market acts as a metaphor for the exploitation by corrupted officials of the “polacas” (a term used at the time to describe Jewish prostitutes). In Suzana Amaral’s 1986 production of Hour of the Star, adapted from a story by the renowned Brazilian novelist Clarice Lispector, the protagonist’s origin and courageous character are suggested by her name, Macabea. Nine Queens (Fabián Belinsky, 2000), satirizes the speech and behavior of a secondary character, an elderly Jewish woman. In addition, memorable literary adaptations include Leopoldo Torre Nilsson’s 1954 Días de Odio, based on “Emma Zunz” by Jorge L. Borges, and his 1972 Los siete locos, based on Roberto Arlt’s story of the same name.

Many Latin American films with Jewish themes take an autobiographical approach; this is particularly evident in the auteur films of Daniel Burman, an Argentine director, producer, and screenwriter who places issues of Jewishness at the center of his movies. Burman explores the development of Jewish identity in the *Diaspora, and his films have gradually departed from Jewish stereotypes. Although some of his themes such as the generation gap, identity conflicts, and assimilation were previously examined in other Latin American Jewish films, Burman also delves into wider Jewish urban experiences, responses to *homosexuality, and the effects of recurrent economic crises on the population of Argentina. The influence of Hollywood is most clearly seen in Burman’s Samy and I (2000), in which the protagonist is inspired by Woody Allen’s schlemiel. He is an aspiring writer who lives and struggles in Buenos Aires; the son of a domineering mother, he uses his own neurotic life as a model and becomes a great comedian, despite himself.

Burman’s trilogy – Waiting for the Messiah (2000), Lost Embrace (2004), and Family Law (2006) – is given unity by Ariel, his anti-hero and alter ego. Played in all three films by the same actor, Ariel is a character drawn from the director’s third-generation Argentine Jewish, middle-class background. In Waiting for the Messiah, which shows the painful effects of the financial crisis of the 1990s, Ariel’s personal preoccupation with his Jewish identity is shared with that of a second protagonist, Santamaría. Both men go through serious personal losses before they can move on. Throughout the film, Burman’s protagonist is attached to his inner circle and seeks opportunities to photograph Jewish celebrations (*bar mitzvahs, Jewish weddings, and other festivities) in his neighborhood of El Once, yet he feels displaced. Although the protagonist of Lost Embrace begins as a marginal figure unable to define himself as a Jew or to commit to any serious relationship, he finally reconciles with his long-lost father and with himself. In Family Law both father and son are lawyers; however, rather than follow his father’s model, the protagonist defies him by marrying a Gentile woman and becoming a “normal” Argentine. The relationship between Ariel and his spouse represents an inversion of traditional roles, as he comes to accept women’s economic independence and adapts himself to new social responsibilities, sharing parenting with his wife and performing domestic chores. The Empty Nest (2008), Burman’s latest film, moves even farther away from Jewish issues, focusing on a couple’s readjustments when their children leave their home and their country.

NORA GLICKMAN

Film: United States. In his 1988 book, An Empire of their Own, Neal Gabler famously suggested that the “Jews invented Hollywood” in its business, mechanical, logistical, and creative and artistic aspects, from its beginnings in nickelodeon theaters at the turn of the twentieth century. Such extensive Jewish involvement, and public reactions to it, had profound effects on images of Jews in American film.

The nascent film industry began with scientific inventors in several locations who experimented with “magic lantern” type moving pictures in the mid-1890s (i.e., America’s Armet and Jenkins’ Phantoscope, Woodville Latham’s Panoptikon and Latham Loop, and William Selig’s Polyscope Company; France’s Lumière Brothers’ Cinématographe). Fascinated entrepreneurs, including many Jews in the United States and Europe, frustrated the efforts of Thomas Edison’s company, the Edison Trust, which had purchased and renamed many products in an attempt to squelch competition. Most Jews first entered the growing industry as distributors, including Marcus Loew (1870–1927), Adolph Zukor (1873–1976), and William Fox (1879–1952), who banded together to form the Moving Picture Exhibitors Association (MPEA); Carl Laemmle (1867–1939), a German Jewish immigrant who founded the Independent Motion Picture Company of America (IMP) and produced and distributed his own moving pictures; and others. By 1904, William Fox formed a distribution company, Warner Brothers founded the Duquesne Amusement Supply Company and toured Pennsylvania with The Great Train Robbery, and Carl Laemmle opened the Chicago Nickelodeon. Three years later Sigmund Lubin, a German Jewish immigrant, released The Unwritten Law, the first American documentary about a sensational murder story. For only five cents, at any time of the day, patrons of all ages and financial means could escape into a world of fantasy and *entertainment at nickelodeons that featured not only the short films that were their official rationale but also songs, live acts, and sometimes amateur nights. Almost immediately the Jews in the nascent film industry and their products were labeled “morally objectionable” and the “cause of social unrest and criminal behavior” by newspaper critics, who called for censorship.

Nevertheless, the industry thrived and grew, moving to California in the early decades of the twentieth century. William Selig (1864-1948) became the first West Coast filmmaker in 1909, and by 1912, when Warner Brothers Pictures opened its Los Angeles office, there were fifteen film companies in Hollywood. The Edison Trust (Motion Pictures Production Company, MPPC) tried to limit their expansion, but an antitrust suit brought by Fox, Paramount, and Universal broke its hold in 1915. That same year D. W. Griffith released the powerfully xenophobic, anti-ethnic immigrant film, Birth of a Nation, criticizing immigrants as crude interlopers threatening to swamp America and presenting the Ku Klux Klan as upright defenders of American values. Disproportionately led by Jews, and attracting many Jews on all levels of employment, the Hollywood motion picture industry developed rapidly.

Many early silent films sympathetically represented the struggles of poor immigrants. The Jazz Singer (1927), for example, often called the “first talkie” (although only the musical portions of the film had sound, and the dialogue was posted onscreen in silent-film-style placards), spotlighted the American spirit in the heart of a young Jewish immigrant. Al Jolson’s Jack Robins personifies the immigrant struggle between Old World tribalism and piety and universalistic, individualistic striving. Robins is a talented Jewish youth who is torn between his *cantor father, who urges him to remain in the *synagogue and “not debase the voice God has given you,” and his non-Jewish show business girlfriend who encourages him to abandon the synagogue, sing the jazz tunes he adores, and give his voice to the world.

Less positive Jewish film images in the following years included Jewish gangsters, played by actors like James Cagney, who spouted *Yiddish out of the sides of their mouths. More commonly, studio heads encouraged Jewish actors not to appear “too Jewish,” to change their names, and to play mostly non-Jewish roles. Theda Bara, born Theodosia Burr Goodman in 1885, is just one example of a long line of renamed Jewish film stars; her name became synonymous with the expression “vamp,” meaning a predatory femme fatale.

Critics attacked these portrayals of steamy sexual liaisons and savvy criminals as seductively dangerous, and many of the campaigns to rein in the “depravity” of these unsupervised entertainments were openly antisemitic. Jewish Hollywood studio heads such as Samuel Goldwyn (1882–1974), Jesse Lasky (1880–1958), and Louis B. Mayer (1885–1957) – later joined by Harry and Jack Warner (1881–1958; 1892–1978), Harry Cohn (1891–1958), Irving Thalberg (1899–1936), and David O. Selznick (1902–1965) – were denigrated as uneducated, crude, and vulgar autocrats. American Jewish leaders were mortified by the films and their detractors and joined in the chorus urging the Hollywood film industry either to govern itself or submit to outside censorship. After several groups jockeyed for power in the creation of such codes in the 1920s, Postmaster General Will Hays joined together with the Catholic Legion of Decency, which had been lobbying against the “pernicious” Jewish influence, to create and implement the 1930 Motion Picture Codes. Automobile magnate Henry Ford financed an English translation of the 1905 Russian antisemitic tract, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, in response to what he perceived as “Jewish Hollywood,” charging that Jews were ruining the Christian youth of America through their control of popular entertainment. Among other charges, Ford’s publications accused Jewish filmmakers of being motivated by communist sympathies. This accusation recurred decades later during the notorious 1950s U.S. House Un-American Activities Committee hearings. Overtly Jewish content virtually disappeared from films after the creation of movie codes that prohibited or severely restricted representations of ethnicity. In response to an atmosphere of rising *antisemitism, films written, directed, or produced by Jews promoted a melting pot philosophy in which marriage across cultural boundaries (demographically few in number at that time) symbolized tolerance. *Intermarriage was also a practical step for men in the industry to accelerate American acceptance, as they acquired symbolic Christian status by marrying Christian women.

After Adolph Hitler became German Chancellor in 1933, *Nazi *Germany fired Jewish filmmakers, demanding that American film offices in Germany do likewise. In America, too, film companies were pressured not to articulate anti-Nazi sentiments. Catholic Hollywood reporter Joseph I. Breen, head of the Production Code Administration from 1934 on, saw the rise of the Nazis as useful in lessening Jewish influence in Hollywood. He wrote that Jews, “the scum of the earth, think of nothing but money-making and sexual indulgence.” When Warner Brothers’ 1937 film, The Life of Emile Zola, focused on the French antisemitic persecution of Captain Alfred Dreyfus (see DREYFUS AFFAIR) without ever uttering the words “Jew” or “antisemitism,” Breen privately complained about the film’s “propaganda.” Some Hollywood figures formed the Hollywood Anti-Nazi League (HNL) in 1936. When fifty-eight individuals in the industry petitioned for an anti-Nazi boycott in 1938, Breen and others accused Jews of trying to drag America into a Jewish war as well as promoting communism. Nevertheless, some studios continued to promote anti-Nazi films – some dramas and some comic – which enjoyed box office success. Significantly, none of these films referred to Jews as victims of Nazi aggression. Filmmakers wishing to emphasize Jewish stories were forced to do so unobtrusively. Ernst Lubitsch (1892–1947), for example, directed Jack Benny and Carole Lombard in a brilliant black comedy, To Be or Not to Be (1942), a film about the invading Nazis taking over a *Warsaw theater, scarcely mentioning the Jewish dimension of the story.

Film performers over the decades have been disproportionately Jewish. During the years of massive immigration, Jewishness was played for laughs. Many Jewish film actors learned to perform in front of Jewish audiences in the *Yiddish *theater or in the Catskill Mountain resorts. Unusually successful was Molly Picon (1898–1992), who acted, sang, and danced for decades in Yiddish plays, musicals, and films and later was also in demand in English-language commercial plays and films. Gertrude Berg (1899–1966), whose radio and television portrayals of the wise Jewish matriarch

Molly Goldberg first aired in 1929, was similarly successful. In contrast, most performers who could find work on the nonsectarian stage and screen left Jewish venues behind. Paul Muni (1895–1967, Muni Weisenfreund), Judy Holliday (1922–1965, Judith Tuvim), and John Garfield (1913–1952, Jacob Julius Garfinkle) were among the many performers who began in Jewish environments and went on to wider careers. None of these particular performers denied their Jewishness; Garfield was especially active on behalf of Israel and in diverse Jewish causes, playing the fearless Jewish soldier Dave Goldman in Gentleman's Agreement (1947). Some, like Shelley Winters (born Shirley Schrift, 1920–2006), at first played generic young women's roles and then depicted Jewish women as she aged. Although Jack Benny (Benjamin Kubelsky, 1894–1974), George Burns (Nathan Birnbaum, 1896–1996), Milton Berle (Mendel Berlinger, 1908–2002), Eddie Cantor (Israel Iskowitz, 1892–1964), Sophie Tucker (Sophie Kalish, 1884–1966), Sid Caesar (b. 1922–), and Danny Kaye (David Daniel Kaminsky, 1913–1987) all started on vaudeville stages, they shaped American comedy as American comics. Fanny Brice (1891–1951, Fania Borach) discovered that Jewish humor did not always translate into new environments. Her radio audiences, beginning in 1937, liked her nonethnic “Baby Snooks” far more than her earlier Yiddish-accented characters.

Even Groucho (1890–1977), Chico (1887–1961), and Harpo Marx (1888–1964) encoded their Jewishness, with Chico and Harpo taking on vaguely ethnic, but not Jewish, mannerisms. In film after film, as the zany and clever Marx Brothers outwitted their antagonists, Jewish audiences understood the Jewish subtext, which was safely invisible to Christian audiences. Similarly, in his television hit, Your Show of Shows (1950–54), Sid Caesar portrayed many foreign characters, none of them specifically Jewish. His skits often encoded Jewish materials or perspectives in ways that would only be visible to Jews. In one skit, for example, non-Jewish businessmen all order items such as “bacon and raisin” and “ham hock sandwiches” for lunch – unlikely pork-based combinations that reflect what Jews might imagine that non-Jews would eat. Many of these performers, however, perceived a Jewish dimension to their work. Slapstick comic actor Jerry Lewis was seldom perceived as Jewish; he saw himself as a universal defender of the human spirit.

Overtly Jewish themes and concerns went underground during the 1930s and 1940s, finding expression in films that pleaded for tolerance but seldom mentioned Jews. Like the Broadway original shows on which many of these films were based, these films trumpeted the wrongheadedness of prejudice against persons of African American or Polynesian – but never Jewish – backgrounds. Playwright and Jewish activist Ben Hecht (1894–1964), author of numerous prize-winning and popular screenplays, wrote of his disgust at “the almost complete disappearance of the Jew from American fiction, stage, radio and movies” in his A Guide for the Bedeviled (1944).

After the Allied victory in World War II, overtly Jewish materials reappeared, at first in critiques of anti-Jewish prejudice. Gentleman's Agreement and Crossfire, both of which appeared in 1947, portray the evils of antisemitism. A romantic, sanitized version of the The Diary of Anne Frank appeared in 1959, followed by the Holocaust drama, Judgment at Nuremberg. In Exodus (1960), based on Leon Uris' sprawling historical novel about events leading up to the founding of *Israel, a handsome and masculine Paul Newman epitomizes the Jewish Israeli hero. The Pawnbroker, directed by Sidney Lumet (1924), painfully brought the Holocaust and its psychological aftermath to the commercial screen in 1965, daring to portray an unpleasant Jewish title character. In 1971, a melodic, earnestly didactic, and nostalgic version of the 1960s stage musical Fiddler on the Roof gave viewing audiences the Israeli actor Topol as an utterly likeable, wisecracking, and not-too-pious *Diaspora Jewish everyman. Hollywood's suppression of overt Jewishness had come to an end.

As open portrayals of Jews and Jewish themes appeared in film, television, and literature, satiric portrayals became the dominant trope. Exemplars of middle-class mores, Jews were the butt of cinematic critiques of consumerism. Film-makers like Paul Mazursky (b. 1930) made fun of pretentious Jews preoccupied by their possessions, devoted to their own self-gratification, and oblivious to the suffering of others or to deeper concerns in life. In cinematic renditions of the works of Jerome Weidman (1913–1998) and Canada's Mordecai Richler (1931–2001), to cite two of many examples, Jewish men were depicted as ruthlessly ambitious and amoral businessmen. A more frequent caricature of Jewish men in American media, however, was of the fearful, inept, and overly intellectual nebbish. Both of these stereotypes were common in nineteenth-century antisemitic writings, but in twentieth-century America they were almost always produced by Jewish artists.

Liberated by the rise of multiculturalism, humorist film-makers, such as Mel Brooks (Melvin Kaminsky, b. 1926), and stand-up comics like Alan King (Irwin Alan Kniburg, 1927–2004), Jackie Mason (Yacov Moshe Moaza, b. 1931), Joan Rivers (Joan Sandra Molinsky, b. 1933), and others found that overtly (and sometimes abrasive) Jewish humor was immensely salable; they began including Jewish materials in the language, plots, and references in their comic routines. Both types of Jewish men, the “hustler” and the “wimp,” appear in Mel Brooks' original comedy, The Producers (1968), starring Zero Mostel (1915–1977) and Gene Wilder (b. 1933). Indeed, the transition from Mostel's hilarious but not specifically Jewish performance in the musical comedy film, A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum (1966) only two years earlier, to the edgy, transgressive Jewish humor of The Producers marks a shift in cultural paradigms.

The artistic image of the scrawny, neurotic Jewish male was indelibly fixed in twentieth-century western culture through the films of Woody Allen (Allen Stewart Konigsberg, b. 1935). Although his first hilarious films in the 1960s included few if any overtly Jewish materials, by the late 1970s Allen satirized the foibles of Jewish – and non-Jewish – families in Annie Hall (1977), as the obsessive Jew Alvy Singer travels to Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, to encounter the healthy, bland American family of his non-Jewish girlfriend, complete with a “Jew-hater” grandmother and a sociopathic brother. Younger television-personalities-turned-film-stars, such as Adam Sandler (b. 1966), took the inclusion of often edgy and offensive Jewish references as a given. As a result, Yiddish words and Jewish *life-cycle symbols and events became part of the American cultural heritage. In marked contrast to the mid-twentieth-century image of Jews emulating a non-Jewish America, by the early twenty-first century non-Jewish Americans routinely used words like chutzpah (nerve), shlep (drag), schlemiel (unsuccessful person), tchochkeh (kitschy bric-a-brac), as well as saltier terms such as tokhes (rear end) and putz (penis), that had once been limited to Jewish environments.

Jewish men were often portrayed as sensitive and responsible, if overly anxious souls, but Jewish women characters were more savagely satirized. Novelists Herman Wouk (b. 1915) and Philip Roth (b. 1933) and filmmaker Woody Allen, among others, promulgated two negative stereotypical images of Jewish women: the overbearing Jewish mother and the spoiled Jewish daughter. In his 1955 novel, Marjorie Morningstar, Wouk introduced readers to the Jewish daughter, the "Shirley," as the ultimate bourgeois consumer who wanted a "big diamond engagement ring, a house in a good neighborhood, furniture, children, well-made clothes, furs," etc. In the hands of other writers and filmmakers, as well as popular culture and jokes, this spoiled and demanding Jewish girl became known as the "Jewish American Princess," the JAP. Brenda Patimkin, a similar character, is featured in Roth's 1959 novella "Goodbye Columbus" (film version, 1969; directed by Larry Peerce). Roth's 1969 novel Portnoy's Complaint (film version, 1972; directed by Ernest Lehman), contributed domineering Jewish mother Sophie Portnoy. Woody Allen developed the Jewish mother's power even further. In "Oedipus Wrecks," part of the 1989 trilogy, New York Stories, a Jewish mother's pudgy face fills the sky to better control her son's every move. Cinematic plots showed Jewish men saving themselves by escaping the clutches of Jewish mothers and daughters.

Interestingly, Jewish women have been involved in a range of films that offer nuanced and diverse pictures of Jews and Jewish life. Prominent among them is singer and filmmaker Barbra Streisand (b. 1942). In films like Funny Girl (1968), The Way We Were (1973), Yentl (1983), and Prince of Tides (1991), Streisand portrayed Jewish women as talented singers and comedienues, loving social activists, religious scholars, and committed healers. Streisand also made history by shortening neither her name nor her nose. Similarly, films featuring singer, actor, and performance artist Bette Midler (b. 1945) followed Streisand's lead in exhibiting, rather than playing down, her sassy mouth, her comic talents, her enterprise, and her intelligence. Director Joan Micklin Silver (b. 1935) created Hester Street (1974), lovingly based on Abraham Cahan's novella, "Yekl," and the romantic comedy, Crossing Delancey (1988), which turned feminist platitudes on their heads and slyly recommended that Jewish women look for sweet men who pray in the synagogue. *Sephardic Jews in *Britain – and the struggles of intelligent women without money – were the subjects of The Governess (1998), directed by and starring Minnie Driver. Harvey Fierstein's (b. 1954) wrenching Torch Song Trilogy (based on his stage play) depicted a Jewish homosexual yearning to be a devoted Jewish parent while earning a living as a drag queen singer (1988). In recent years, Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX) have received detailed cinematic scrutiny in American films. Although sometimes flattering, as in Sidney Lumet's A Stranger Among Us (1992), their portrayals have also been uncomfortably critical, as in A Price Above Rubies (1998).

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Jews continue to be significantly involved in North American film production as writers, directors, producers, and actors, among other roles. Given the enormous diversity of these individuals, and the reality that their attitudes toward Judaism and Jewish life fall across a broad spectrum from positive and involved to negative and even self-hating, it is not surprising that both stereotypical and nonstereotypical portrayals of Jews continue to be presented in contemporary films.

For further reading, see N. Gabler, An Empire of Their Own (1988); J. Hoberman and J. Shandler, Entertaining America: Jews, Movies, Broadcasting (2003); S. Carr, Hollywood and Anti-Semitism: A Cultural History Up to World War II (2001); and F. Couvares, Movie Censorship and America Culture (1996).

Sylvia Barack Fishman

Film: Yiddish-Language. Cinematic versions of some of the Yiddish plays of Jacob Gordin, including Mirele Efros and Hasa the Orphan (see THEATER, YIDDISH), were produced in *Poland before *World War I; Poland remained a major production center for Yiddish-language films, both silent and "talkies," until the outbreak of World War II in 1939. During the 1920s, films in Yiddish were produced in the *Soviet Union, and Yiddish-language films were also made in the *United States during the 1920s and 1930s.

Silent films made in Poland in the 1920s for Yiddish-speaking audiences include the romance, Tkies-Kaf (The Hand Contract, 1924); Der Lamedvovnik (One of the Thirty-Six, 1927); and In the Polish Woods (1928). The 1932 Travelog series by Shaul and Itzhak Goskind, documentaries filmed in *Warsaw, Łódź, *Vilna, Lwów, Kraków, and Białystok, offers invaluable portraits of Jewish life in Poland before the *Holocaust. Writer Joseph Green (1900–1996) was responsible for four of the most popular talkies of the 1930s: Yidl mit'n Fidl (dir. Green and Jan Nowina-Przybylski, 1936) and Mammele (dir. Green, 1938; both with Molly Picon); Purim Shpiler (dir. Green and Nowina-Przybylski, 1937); and A Brivele der Mammen (A Letter to Mama; dir. Green, 1938), which was the last Yiddish-language film made in Poland before World War II. Other films were based on works by Jewish writers and playwrights, including Jacob Gordin, Peretz Hirshbein, Sholem Aleichem, Sholom Secunda, Isidore Zolotarefsky, Dovid Pinski, and Sholem Asch (see LITERATURE, YIDDISH). The Dybbuk (directed by Michal Waszynski, 1937), based on the play by S. Ansky (see DYBBUK; and THEATER, YIDDISH), is among the most ambitious and best known motion pictures in Yiddish. Important Yiddish-language films made in the Soviet Union include Der Mabul (The Deluge, 1925) and what many consider the masterpiece of Soviet Yiddish cinema, Yidishe Glikn (Jewish Luck, dir. Alexander A. Granovsky, 1925), based on a Sholem Aleichem character, Menaḥem Mendl. The film starred Solomon Mikhoels (ca. 1890–1949) of the Moscow State Yiddish Theater.

Yiddish films produced in the United States featured actors from *New York City's Artef and Yiddish Art Theaters, including Celia Adler, Leo Fuchs (known as the "Yiddish Fred Astaire"), Molly Picon, and Maurice Schwartz, and well-known *cantors such as Josef "Yossele" Rosenblatt, Moishe Oysher, Louis "Labele" Waldman, and Mordechai Hershman. Directors included Boris Thomashefsky (also a popular actor) and Henry Lynn. These motion pictures covered a range of genres, including drama, romance, and comedy. In Uncle Moses (dir. Sidney Goldin and Aubrey Scotto, 1932), written by and starring Maurice Schwartz, Asch's immigrant tale of a man redeemed by love takes place in a contemporary Depression-era setting. Schwartz also wrote, directed, and starred in Tevye der Milkhiker (Tevye the Milkman, 1939), based on two short stories by Sholem Aleichem. Other Yiddish films of this era were adaptations of theater standards such as Gordin's Mirele Efros (dir. Joseph Berne, 1938) and Grine Felder (Green Fields; dir. by Edgar G. Ulmer and Jacob Ben-Ami, 1937), based on the play by Peretz Hirschbein.

The genre known as shund, melodramatic and sentimental depictions of Jewish American immigrant life, was particularly popular with filmgoers. Examples include Bar Mitzvah (dir. Henry Lynn and Joseph Green, 1935), Vu Iz Mayn Kind (Where is My Child?; written and directed by Henry Lynn and starring Celia Adler, 1939), and Hayntike Mames (Mothers of Today; dir. Henry Lynn, 1939). Hayntike Mames includes the only motion picture performance by Esther Field, a *radio performer known as the "Yiddishe Mama." Shund films often dealt with the plight of Jewish mothers caught between the values of the Old World and the New and forced to mediate between their husbands and their Americanizing children.

The production of films in Yiddish came to an end in the 1940s, a result of the *Nazi destruction of the Yiddish-speaking communities of Europe and the waning of secular Yiddish-language culture in the United States. The National Center for Jewish Film, located at Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts, preserves a significant library of Yiddish films and restores rare Yiddish film footage for rerelease on DVD. Valuable resources include J. Hoberman, Bridge of Light: Yiddish Film between Two Worlds (1991); and the film documentary, The Yiddish Cinema (USA, 1991; directed by Rich Pontius).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Firstborn Son, Fast of. A fasting period for every firstborn male begins at sunrise on the eve of *Passover (14th of Nissan). Halakhic authorities debate whether this minor fast should also include firstborn females (Shulhan Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim 470:1). The fast commemorates the tenth plague mentioned in *Exodus, when all Egyptian firstborn males were killed, while the firstborn sons of the Israelites were saved. Compared with other fast days, this one is lenient. One prevalent custom, which sidesteps the fast entirely, is to hold a special learning session called a siyyum bekhörim ("concluding study period for firstborn") during the morning. This custom stems from the Jewish tradition of eating a festive meal after completion of a special event, such as a berit milah (*circumcision), or the completion of an entire text or course of study. Therefore, eating at the siyyum effectively supersedes the requirement to complete the fast.

PAUL STEINBERG

Firstborn Son, Redemption of (PIDYON HA-BEN). This ritual originated in the biblical period when firstborn sons were to be consecrated to God to serve as priests (Num 3:12). When the *priesthood was assigned to the Levites (see ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT), firstborn sons in nonpriestly families were redeemed from the priesthood at the price of five shekels (Num 3:46–48). Biblical *commandments also required that firstborn unclean animals be redeemed and that firstborn clean animals be sacrificed (Num 18:15–17). Redemption of firstborn sons is also explained as a commemoration of the slaying of the firstborn sons of the *Egyptians before the Exodus (Exod 13:15; Num 3:13). The redemption is to occur on the thirtieth day after birth, although it may be postponed if that day is a *Sabbath, *festival, or *fast day. The ritual includes the recitation of a *blessing followed by the sheheḥeyanu prayer of thanksgiving; the father redeems his infant by giving five silver coins of a specific minimum weight to a guest of high priestly descent (kohen). Often the coins are returned to the family as a gift. Redemption does not apply if the child was born by cesarean section or if the mother had a miscarriage or stillbirth after the first forty days of a previous pregnancy; this is because the biblical commandment refers specifically to the firstborn son's opening of the mother's womb (Num 3:12).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Five Scrolls (Hamesh Megillot) comprise the following books from the *Writings (Ketuvim) section of the Hebrew *Bible: *Song of Songs, *Ruth, *Lamentations, *Ecclesiastes, and *Esther. Although all of the ancient writings of the Bible were on scrolls, these five are specifically distinguished, most likely because they are read publicly and because of the role they play in the cycle of the year by their assignment to a particular *festival. Only Esther and Lamentations are read in both *Sephardic and *Ashkenazic communities, whereas the other three are primarily read in Ashkenazic communities.

Song of Songs (Shir ha-Shirim) is read on the *Sabbath that falls during ḥol ha-mo'ed (the intermediate days) of *Passover. Traditionally, the book has been understood allegorically, describing a loving, intimate relationship between *God and the Jewish people. The Rabbis drew deep meaning from the title, the Song (singular) of Songs (plural), and taught that it is a summary account of all the "songs" – the moments when God spoke to Israel, as, for example, at the splitting of the Reed Sea and at Mount Sinai. The vivid natural imagery of the language is also well suited to Passover's spring setting and themes of rebirth. The custom of reading Ruth on *Shavuot (on the second day of the festival in the *Diaspora) is derived from a medieval work called Tractate Soferim (Scribes). The book may be read on Shavuot because it has a strong agricultural association with the late spring barley harvest and because of its theme of persistent faith. Lamentations, Eikhah in Hebrew (literally, "alas"), is read on *Tisha B'Av, the fast day memorializing the destruction of both *Temples. The book is a collection of five poetic laments, each specifically bemoaning the *Babylonians' destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE with vivid imagery and emotional expressiveness.

Ecclesiastes or Kohelet (the self-ascribed name of the author) is read on the Sabbath that falls during ḥol ha-mo'ed (the intermediate days) Sukkot. The most commonly understood correlation between Sukkot and Ecclesiastes is that both the holiday and the book speak to the transitory nature of existence. Just as Sukkot commemorates the fall harvest and the end of the agricultural year, so, too, Ecclesiastes has the autumnal tone of a wise elder looking back on life. The reading of Esther, commonly referred to simply as "the Megillah," is the central observance of *Purim. The observance of the commandment is exceptional because its reading is mandated both at night and the following morning. The holiday's customs and observances are based on the story's account of the heroism of Esther and Mordecai in the face of Haman's evil plot to destroy the Jews. Helpful resources include H. L. Ginsberg, Five Megilloth and Jonah: A New Translation (1969); and Shlomo Yosef Zevin, The Festivals in Halakhah (1999). PAUL STEINBERG Flood. Genesis 6:5–9:17 describes how *God destroyed human beings with water because of their violence and corruption; the sole survivors in a rudderless ark were the righteous Noah, who “walked with God” (6:9), and his immediate family, along with pairs of all living creatures (6:19) or, in an interpolated alternate version, seven pairs of all ritually clean creatures and one pair of all other beings (7:2–3). When the flood ended, Noah freed a raven and a dove to determine whether land had surfaced in addition to the ark's perch, Mt. Ararat. After he and his family emerged from the ark, Noah made an offering to God (8:20); in a *covenant sealed by a rainbow, God promised that never again would the order of nature be disturbed and all living things destroyed. In return, human beings, who were now given permission to eat animal meat under certain circumstances, were required to refrain from murder and to be fruitful and multiply (8:21–9:17). Many cultures have flood legends, and the biblical account clearly reflects similar themes and details found in older *Mesopotamian narrative cycles, including the Epic of Gilgamesh, which would have been well known in the biblical world. However, scholars have noted that, despite the common ancient *Near Eastern elements, the biblical flood story is unique in its emphasis on divine demands for human righteousness and ethical standards. KATE FRIEDMAN

Folktales. Throughout history, in a variety of languages and dialects, Jews have told stories. As in all literate societies, Jewish narrative traditions pass from one generation to the next in oral or written form; storytellers choose and adapt elements from tales of the past, at times including material from non-Jewish sources. Some Jewish folktales are conservative and show minimal creative innovation; others exploit traditional themes and motifs to articulate a new ideology or worldview to their audience. Jewish folktales integrate symbols and other elements of Jewish tradition, including *life-cycle events, *festivals, historical circumstance, and textual allusions. They often deal with basic concepts such as divine providence, free choice, and moral responsibility, as well as the sufferings of the righteous and interrelationships between Jews and their Gentile neighbors. Every folktale has a particular socio-religious and cultural context and reflects the values, theological views, and moral ideas of a specific narrator.

One controversial issue is which genres of Jewish literary tradition in which periods should be considered folktales. Most scholars consider biblical *narratives, such as the *Abraham and *Joseph stories and the book of *Esther, to be folktales. The mention of “the tales that our fathers told us” (Judg 6:13) would suggest that oral narratives were used in the biblical period itself to preserve the collective memory of Jewish society. Inarguably, the figures, motifs, themes, plots, and literary forms that appear in the Hebrew *Bible are building blocks used in all later Jewish folktales. As for the rabbinic period, some scholars (Yassif; Hasan-Rokem) treat the parables and stories in the *Talmud and *midrash as folk creations; others (Fraenkel) argue that classic *aggadic stories, despite their use of folk motifs, are constructed literary creations that reflect social and spiritual rabbinic concerns.

Folk traditions evolved around figures such as *Hillel the Elder and Rabbi *Akiva and social roles such as the leader and the holy man. Later, these traditions served as models for biographical tales portraying famous personalities such as *Rashi and *Maimonides (Shalshelet ha-Kabbalah, late sixteenth century), Judah the Pious (Mayse-Bukh, *Yiddish, early seventeenth century; see MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ), and Shalom Shabazi (*Yemen, seventeenth century). Hagiographic tales, or shevaḥim, developed in the seventeenth century around the legendary, mystical figure of Rabbi Isaac *Luria and soon became a widespread genre, particularly in the early nineteenth century with tales of *Hasidic masters, most prominently R. Israel *Baal Shem Tov.

Another popular genre of folktales is the moral story, often used as a didactic device inserted in a non-narrative context, as in Sefer Hasidim (*Ashkenaz, thirteenth century). Similarly, the medieval genre of exemplum seeks to reinforce normative cultural values such as sin and punishment, virtue and its rewards, and loyalty to the commandments. Other common genres of Jewish folktales are historical and martyr legends, fables and animal tales, wisdom tales, humorous anecdotes, and romantic and magic stories. Modern, stylized folktales, written in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries by authors such as I. L. Peretz and Sholem Aleichem, use the tools and themes of Jewish storytelling, often with a “subversive twist” to express a sense of fragmentation “in a world that had broken with tradition” (Roskies). Yet Jewish folktales remain a living aesthetic form, and Jews everywhere will doubtless continue to tell stories, to share, and to remember.

Recent research includes E. Yassif, The Hebrew Folktale: History, Genre, Meaning (1999); G. Hasan-Rokem, Web of Life: Folklore and Midrash in Rabbinic Literature (2000); Y. Fraenkel, Sipur Ha'agadah (2001); D. Ben-Amos and J. Mintz, In Praise of the Baal Shem Tov. Shivhei Ha-Besht: The Earliest Collection of Legends about the Founder of Hasidism (1994); and D. Roskies, Against the Apocalypse (1984). ORA WISKIND ELPER

Football: See SPORTS, UNITED STATES: FOOTBALL

France: 1789–1939. About 40,000 Jews lived in France at the start of the French Revolution in 1789. The vast majority (about 80%) resided in the eastern provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Another 5,000 lived in the south, in two major groupings: (1) Sephardim who had settled as conversos in Bordeaux but eventually returned to Judaism and (2) Papal Jews, who had lived for centuries in the Papal States before the area was annexed by France. A small group of about five hundred Jews lived in Paris. Jewish urbanization and movement toward Paris began soon after the revolution and accelerated by 1835. In 1841 France's total Jewish population had increased to 70,000, of whom 8,000 resided in Paris. The second largest community, Bordeaux, numbered 3,000. Data for 1861 show the Paris Jewish population at 25,000, whereas the size of Bordeaux's community had remained stable. By 1880 the Jewish population in metropolitan France numbered 70,000. The figure would have been higher had the 1871 loss of Alsace-Lorraine to

*Germany not siphoned off that sizable community. However, a quarter of these Alsatian Jews migrated into remaining French territory to retain their citizenship. Some formed new communities in Vesoul, Lille, and Besançon; many more moved to Paris, boosting the Parisian Jewish population to 40,000. Paris thereafter remained home to the majority of the French Jewish population.

In 1914, on the eve of World War I, France had 150,000 Jews. Immigration from *Eastern Europe and the *Balkans had swelled the Parisian Jewish population to about 75,000, of whom half were immigrants. Immigration picked up again after the war and accelerated when the *United States closed its gates in 1924, and again after 1933 when the *Nazis came to power in Germany. In 1939 there were approximately 300,000–330,000 Jews in France; 180,000 of that number were in Paris, with immigrants comprising more than two-thirds of the population.

A growing contingent of Algerian Jews also supplemented France's Jewish population. At the time of the 1830 French conquest there were about 16,000 Algerian Jews. By 1851 there were 21,000, and in 1870, when Algerian Jews were granted French citizenship, there were 33,000 Jews. Despite migration to metropolitan France, the Jewish population in French Algeria continued to climb, and there were about 50,000 in 1880, 58,000 in 1900, and 102,000 in 1931.

The percentage of Jews in the total French population never increased beyond 1% and never reached great proportions, even in urban areas. Except for the city of Toul, in the eastern province of Lorraine, whose Jewish population in 1861 was more than 8% percent of the total, the Jewish population in urban areas rarely reached 5% and then only in eastern towns. The Jewish population density in Paris reached about 3% in 1914, which was never exceeded. By 1939 Paris housed the largest Jewish community in Western Europe and the third largest in the world after *New York and *Warsaw. A section of central Paris known affectionately as the pletzel (Yiddish for "little square") was home to numerous *synagogues, small prayer houses, Jewish bookstores, kosher restaurants, and bakeries, serving mainly the large immigrant population. That same neighborhood had been the Jewish quarter in the thirteenth century. A second major area of Jewish settlement opened in Belleville, an eastern section of Paris.

In the early nineteenth century, French-speaking Sephardim of southern France had higher socioeconomic status and were more integrated into French society than *Yiddish-speaking Jews of the eastern provinces. However, high levels of poverty among Jews everywhere continued until the 1870s. Among the first and most active Jewish institutions were the many charity boards developed to address this problem. In Paris the economic advancement of Jews occurred somewhat faster than that of non-Jews, but slower than is often imagined. Jews in eastern France had a lower socioeconomic status; in 1856 Alsatian Jews were said to have a greater proportion of indigents than either the Catholics or Protestants. Beginning with their *emancipation (see EMANCIPATION: FRANCE), Jewish leaders sought to "regenerate," or improve, the socioeconomic status of their constituents. A series of initiatives, both private and communal, created institutions that offered financial support to families, educated children, trained skilled workers, and sought to eradicate begging.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made at preparing Jews to enter agriculture, but this project never materialized.

By the 1880s, Parisian Jews were mainly in middle-class occupations, working as merchants, professionals, gardeners, hairdressers, and skilled artisans (including tailors, shoemakers, and hatters). Very few remained in unskilled labor. Yet most were barely making ends meet. As native-born Jews began to climb out of poverty, immigrants replaced them at the bottom of the ladder. A large contingent of these immigrants consisted of foreign students who flocked to Paris to receive the training Jews were unable to receive elsewhere. Entire families arrived with consequent financial difficulty, but found assistance from the many landsmanschaften* (immigrant social and charitable societies). Several wealthy Jewish families founded *banking houses. The *Rothschilds, whose Paris house opened in 1812, were followed in the next decades by the Péreires, the Bambergers, the Reinachs, the Goudchauxes, and the Bischoffsheims. In addition to banking, new sectors opened to Jews. They developed railroads (Rothschilds, Pereires, Foulds), the tradition of inexpensive newspapers (Moïse Polydore Millaud), and a successful publishing house (Michel and Calmann Lévy). By the early twentieth century André Citroën had founded the famous auto company.

Nineteenth-century French Jews were visible in political life. In the 1830s, banker Benoît Fould became the first Jew elected to the Chamber of Deputies. He must have felt fairly secure, because he had the courage to publicly chastise Foreign Minister Adolphe Thiers in the Chamber for not condemning the support of French consul Ratti Menton for *ritual murder accusations against Jews in *Damascus in 1840. By 1842 Fould's son, Achille Fould, also a financier, and attorney Adolphe Crémieux had become the second and third French Jewish deputies. The 1848 Revolution produced a government that named the first two Jewish ministers: Crémieux as Justice Minister and the banker Michel Goudchaux as Finance Minister. Achille Fould subsequently became the third Jewish minister, holding the posts of Finance Minister and then Minister of Culture during the Second Empire. During the Third Republic, Crémieux again served as Justice Minister. Jewish presence and influence in government institutions reached their pinnacle during the Third Republic (1871–1940), when at least 171 Jews served as deputies, senators, ministers, army generals, prefects, and magistrates. Jews, including Camille Sée and Alfred Naquet, along with Protestants, energetically sought the separation of church and state, secularization of education, free public secondary school education for girls, and the institution of civil divorce. By 1905 these aims had all been achieved. In 1936, Léon Blum became the first Jewish prime minister (there have since been three others). Despite the fact that official notice was taken of Jewish identity in nineteenth-century personnel records, and although the government refrained from posting Jewish officials to certain strongholds of Catholicism where they would encounter opposition, and despite the travesty of justice during the *Dreyfus Affair, there were no longer significant obstacles to Jews' career advancement. Their presence in the army of the Third Republic was notable, with hundreds of Jewish military officers and twenty-five serving as generals. At times as much as 3% of the regular army corps were Jewish.

Ethnic solidarity, exhibited at local, national, and international levels, was a significant characteristic of French Jews between 1789 and 1939. Although there were some spectacular conversions among high-profile figures, neither the number of conversions nor the number of *intermarriages seriously affected the natural increase of Jewish population. On the local level Jews established many charitable institutions. On the national scale, communities intervened to defend or support those with whom they were bound in a nationwide hierarchical administrative system.

Internationally, beginning early in the post-emancipation period and increasingly throughout the nineteenth century, French Jews intervened to assist less fortunate Jews around the world. Such efforts were the result of both private and communal initiative. In the 1830s a “Lafayette Committee” brought Jews and Poles together over the issue of Polish Jewish emancipation, and cooperation between the groups continued during the 1848 revolution. In 1863, when an Alliance Polonaise was established, seven of the first thirty-one members were French Jews, including Crémieux, Adolphe Franck, Salomon Munk, and the Chief Rabbi of Paris, Lazare Isidor. French Jews notably intervened on behalf of Levantine Jewry. In response to the accusation of *ritual murder launched against Damascus Jews in 1840 (see DAMASCUS AFFAIR), Jews of that region and around the world turned to the Rothschilds and French Jews for help. In response, and with the indispensable assistance of Albert Cohn and Salomon Munk, Adolphe Crémieux (together with Sir Moses *Montefiore of England) undertook an international diplomatic mission. During a subsequent trip in 1854, Albert Cohn, on behalf of both the Rothschilds and the French Jewish *Consistory, obtained from Sultan Abdulmejid a promise that Jews in the *Ottoman Empire would be extended the same rights that had been negotiated by the French emperor for Christians.

From 1840, French Jews, as part of a process of extending the benefits of emancipation beyond their borders, began creating schools in lands where Jews lacked secular education and civil and political rights. Crémieux established Jewish schools during his trip to Egypt on behalf of the Damascus Jews. The Rothschilds, through the work of Albert Cohn, founded schools in *Jerusalem, Smyrna, *Alexandria, and Constantinople. In Jerusalem, the Rothschilds provided money to open a school, and the Consistory agreed to raise maintenance funds. In 1854 the Consistory considered initiating a project to bring young Ottoman Jews to Paris to be trained as teachers for those schools, but it was only when the *Alliance Israélite Universelle became involved that such a scheme materialized.

French Jews, sometimes working through the Alliance, repeatedly attempted to assist the Jews of *Romania. In 1866 Crémieux traveled there to seek alleviation of Jewish civil and political disabilities. In 1878, under pressure from French Jewry, the French delegation to the Congress of Berlin obtained minority rights recognition as a condition of Romanian independence. Similar provisions were again made after World War I in the Versailles treaty, but Romania failed to implement these agreements. In 1900, Bernard Lazare visited Romania and denounced the terrible fate of Romanian Jews in the French press. In the 1920s a Conseil pour les droits des minorités juives was still working to remedy the situation.

For further reading, see P. C. Albert, The Modernization of French Jewry (1977); P. Birnbaum, The Jews of the Republic: A Political History of State Jews in France from Gambetta to Vichy (1996); M. Graetz, The Jews in Nineteenth Century France (1996); P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (1998); N. L. Green, The Pletzl of Paris: Jewish Immigrant Workers in the Belle Époque (1986); L. M. Leff, Sacred Bonds of Solidarity: The Rise of Jewish Internationalism in Nineteenth-Century France (2006); N. Malinovich, French and Jewish: Culture and the Politics of Identity in Early Twentieth-Century France (2008); and D. H. Weinberg, A Community on Trial: The Jews of Paris in the 1930s (1977). See also ANTISEMITISM: FRANCE (1789–1939); FRANCE: CONSISTORIES, 1806–1939; JEWISH STUDIES: FRANCE; JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE; LITERATURE: FRANCE; SYNAGOGUES: FRANCE; ZIONISM: FRANCE; Map 10. PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

France: Consistories, 1806–1939. In the wake of the chaos that devastated religious institutions during the revolutionary period, a hierarchical administrative structure was introduced by imperial edict on March 17, 1808, changing forever the character of Jewish communities in *France. The resulting local and national “consistories” were at once a measure of equality and a symbol of disability. They were modeled after Napoleonic institutions for the Catholic and Protestant churches. The details of the Jewish consistories were hammered out in Paris between 1806 and 1808, in discussions between the government and an “assembly of Jewish notables” followed by a “*Sanhedrin” of Jewish leaders. The goal was to reassure the emperor that Jews would be good citizens, that Jewish law would not conflict with Napoleonic law and civic obligation, and that there would be a mechanism for supervising and controlling the Jews. Regional consistories, comprising both rabbis and laymen, were supervised by a Central Consistory in Paris. Their assigned tasks were to administer and police the Jewish population and *synagogues, but they expanded their purview to include self-protection, redefinition of Judaism as a religion, and modernization of the rabbinate. For financial reasons, as well as to control the outward appearance of Judaism, the consistories sought, and partially gained, suppression of alternative synagogues. Regional consistories existed not only on French territory but also in French-controlled areas of *Italy, *Germany, *Belgium, and Algeria (see NORTH AFRICA).

Catholic and Protestant churches benefited from state subsidies instituted by Napoleon, but financial aid to Jewish institutions lagged by a full generation. The inequality was corrected by a law signed by King Louis-Philippe on February 8, 1831, in response to Jewish pressure, and with the help of deputies Comte de Rambuteau and Jean Viennet. Synagogues and rabbis then became recipients of state aid, but the new legislation rapidly proved a mixed blessing. From 1808 to 1831 the consistories had been authorized to tax their members, but this prerogative was lost under the new funding law, although governmental subsidies were chronically and severely insufficient. Governing a largely impoverished population with increasingly expensive needs, the consistories and their constituent local communities struggled perpetually. They relied on traditional sources of funding, such as taxes on kosher food and private voluntary donations. Eventually local municipalities assumed a significant part of the burden of funding religious edifices. These revenues, combined with spottily collected membership fees, combined to keep the institutions operating, but they were always in financial peril.

In addition to policing Jews through the consistory system, Napoleon introduced several restrictive measures in 1808, later dubbed “the infamous decrees,” which reinstated limitations on Jews’ civil liberties in regard to residential rights and freedom to exercise trades and commerce. At the same time Jews were disadvantaged in regard to their options concerning conscription to military service. These disabilities were removed ten years later when the “infamous” laws were allowed to lapse.

As part of their responsibility for “improving” the Jewish population, the consistories also oversaw Jewish education. By 1821 twelve primary schools had been established for Jewish children. In 1820 the Central Consistory adopted as the official textbook on religion Samuel Cahen’s Précis élémentaire, often referred to as a “catechism,” by analogy with the Catholic texts whose question-and-answer format it imitated. An 1833 law mandated the creation of public primary schools, but did not require that municipal funding be made available for the Jewish schools. Public financial aid was therefore spotty. After they learned reading, writing, and arithmetic in the free primary schools, the children of the poor needed vocational training. Beginning in the 1820s societies emerged to encourage, place, and assist apprentices; Jewish trade schools were also established. Their advantage was that parents could be sure that their children would not be forced to violate Jewish religious requirements while learning their trades. These schools opened in Strasbourg (Alsace) in 1825, Mulhouse (Alsace) in 1842, and Paris in 1865.

The consistories lost much of their authority at the beginning of the twentieth century. In 1905, as a result of the efforts of anticlerical intellectuals, many of whom were Jews, a law was passed separating church and state. Along with other recognized religions, the Jewish religion lost its official status, and state financial support was withdrawn. The organization of the Jewish community of France now rested on the voluntary acceptance of a central authority. The Central Consistory transformed itself into an association, preserving its earlier framework as far as possible. Synagogues built with public subsidies were nationalized, but placed at the disposal of the successor religious associations. The path was now open for both *Reform and strictly *Orthodox Jewish movements to establish themselves alongside consistorial Judaism. For further reading, see P. C. Albert, The Modernization of French Jewry: Consistory and Community in the Nineteenth Century (1977); and JUDAISM, REFORM: FRANCE; SYNAGOGUES: FRANCE.

PHYLLIS COHEN ALBERT

France: Contemporary. After *World War II the Jewish population in France numbered around 180,000, including refugees from *Eastern Europe. During the war, more than 77,000 Jews who had been deported from France were murdered in *Nazi camps. Of these, one-third were French citizens, and more than 8,000 were children under the age of thirteen. However, more than three-quarters of the Jews who resided or had found refuge in France in 1939 managed to survive. This high survival rate was due to many factors, including dispersal of Jews in many localities, a minimal German police presence, and assistance from some non-Jews. The French government was slow to acknowledge the wartime Vichy regime’s collaboration with the Nazis in these deportations; however, in early 2009, France’s highest court issued a ruling recognizing the state’s complicity in the deportation of tens of thousands of French and foreign Jews (see HOLOCAUST; HOLOCAUST RESCUERS).

Many refugees from elsewhere in Europe settled in France after World War II; by the early 1950s the Jewish population had reached 250,000. *Sephardi and *Mizrahi Jews from *North Africa also immigrated to France in the post-war decades as the French colonial empire declined; by 1968 Jews of North African origin constituted the majority of French Jewry. Today, the Jewish population of France, approximately 600,000, is the largest in Europe. Significant communities are in Paris (375,000), Marseilles, Lyons, Toulouse, Nice, and Strasbourg. Contemporary French Jews face a constant and visible level of *antisemitism, some of which is generated by anti-*Israel sentiment; since the late 1970s there have been a number of attacks on Jewish sites and *synagogues, as well as on individuals. There is a high degree of assimilation and *intermarriage but also an active Jewish religious, educational, and cultural life. Communal organizations include the Consistoire Central Israélite de France et d’Algérie; the Conseil Représentatif des Juifs de France; and Fonds Social Juif Unifié, which was founded in 1949 and is particularly involved in addressing social welfare needs. For further reading, see S. Zuccotti, The Holocaust, the French, and the Jews (1999); and P. E. Hyman, The Jews of Modern France (2000).

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

France: Middle Ages. The territory roughly corresponding to modern *France sheltered two very different cultural and linguistic territories in the Middle Ages: northern France and Occitania in the south (see FRANCE, SOUTHERN: MIDDLE AGES). This article deals primarily with northern French Jewish culture, often studied within the larger cultural entity of *Ashkenaz.

Jews settled in the area corresponding to modern France beginning in *Roman times. *Herod’s son Archelaus, banished to Vienne (a Roman city in what is now southeastern France) from Judea in 6 CE, is the first Jewish settler in Gaul mentioned in written sources. His brother, Herod Antipas, was sent to Lyon in 39 CE. Emigration to Gaul probably increased after the destruction of the *Temple of Jerusalem in 70 CE and after the *Bar Kokhba rebellion of 132–35, with many of the settlers passing first through *Italy. The Jews of medieval France had strong ties to Jewish communities in the Rhineland (see GERMANY) and, between 1066 and 1290, with Jewish communities in *England.

Information about Jewish life and Jewish–Christian relations during early medieval times comes in part from canons issued by ecclesiastical councils. Common themes include the prohibition of marriage or conjugal relations between Christians and Jews (e.g., Orleans 533 CE, Clermont 535, Orleans 538); prohibitions against clerics or Christian laymen taking part in banquets given by Jews (e.g., Vannes 461–91, Orleans 538); and the establishment of guidelines regarding Christian slaves who fled to churches for protection from Jewish masters (e.g., Orleans 538, Orleans 541). The Council of Clermont (535) declared that Jews should not be placed as judges over Christians. Later councils, such as Paris (614) and Clichy (626–27), prohibited Jews from holding a public office or function. Similar prohibitions can be found in other legal sources from the same period. Also in the seventh century, King Dagobert is said to have led a forced conversion of Jews to Christianity (ca. 631–39) at the urging of Emperor Heraclius. In the ninth century, Agobard, archbishop of Lyon, participated in forced conversions of Jews to Christianity, even targeting large numbers of Jewish children. The imperial court intervened against Agobard to prevent forced conversions and protect the Jewish community. In later centuries, urban centers, such as Paris, Rouen, and Troyes, sheltered the largest northern French Jewish communities. Many smaller towns and villages were home to small Jewish communities or even to individual Jews or Jewish families. Although many Jews prospered, all were subject to episodes of persecution and violence. An unconfirmed act of anti-Jewish violence is reported to have taken place in Limoges or Le Mans at the end of the tenth century. Between 1007 and 1012, northern French Jewish communities were affected by the widespread persecutions of Jews that took place across northern Europe.

During the First *Crusade (1096–99), at least one major attack on French Jews took place, in Rouen; a description by the French cleric and memoirist Guibert of Nogent survives. Jews of all ages and both genders were put to the sword; others saved themselves by converting to Christianity. In 1171 in Blois, more than thirty Jews were falsely accused of the *ritual murder of a child and then burned en masse under Count Thibault V. Jews were also accused of the 1163 murder of Richard of Pontoise, who was later canonized as Richard of Paris. Little is known of the murder accusations reported to have been leveled against the Jews of Loches-sur-Indre, Janville, and Épernay during the 1160s and 1170s. In 1191–92, the execution of a Christian for murdering a Jew had disastrous consequences for the Jewish community of Brie-Comte-Robert or Bray-sur-Seine (the exact location of the incident is debated by scholars), where King Philip Augustus subsequently had as many as eighty Jews executed. In 1288 in Troyes, thirteen Jews were burned to death, apparently falsely accused of murdering a Christian. In the thirteenth century, beginning with the reign of Louis IX (1226–70), Jews were required to wear the rouelle, a round badge, on their clothing. During this era as well, copies of the *Talmud were seized and the so-called Talmud trial was held (1240). This was followed by a mass burning of Jewish books in Paris in 1242.

Jews living in northern France suffered various expulsions, some affecting larger territories than others. In 1182, King Philip Augustus expelled the Jews from the French royal domain but readmitted them in 1198. Other major expulsions occurred in 1306, 1394, and perhaps 1322. Also in the fourteenth century, popular responses to the Black Death included numerous attacks on Jews, with the most violent persecutions taking place in Dauphiné and Savoy. In the early Middle Ages the Jews practiced a variety of professions, including viticulture and *medicine; some worked in the administrations of bishops or kings. By the twelfth century, many northern French Jews were confined to earning their living through *money lending at interest.

Among the great intellectual and cultural figures of medieval Jewry in northern France are *Rashi (Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, 1040–1105); Joseph ben Simon Kara (1050/55–1120/30); Rashbam (Rabbi Samuel ben Meir, 1080–1160); Eleazer of Beaugency (mid-twelfth century); and Joseph ben Isaac Bekhor Shor (mid- to late-twelfth century). Although Jews were often criticized by Christian scholars, Jewish and Christian scholars sometimes collaborated; the Victorines of Paris, who focused on biblical exegesis, were particularly known for working with Jewish scholars. Most Jewish literature surviving from medieval France is in Hebrew. Nonetheless, Jews also recorded glosses, *poetry, and other short texts, as well as longer glossaries and a treatise on fever, written in Old French in Hebrew letters. Rashi's biblical and talmudic commentaries contain hundreds of glosses in Old French explaining difficult Hebrew and Aramaic terms. An elegy to the martyrs of Troyes is generally considered the most famous medieval Jewish literary work in Old French (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: CHRISTIAN EUROPE).

Selected studies dealing with medieval French Jewry include E. Benbassa, Histoire des Juifs de France (1997); R. Chazan, Medieval Jewry in Northern France (1973); W. C. Jordan, The French Monarchy and the Jews (1989), and idem, Ideology and Royal Power in Medieval France (2001); K. A. Fudeman, Vernacular Voices: Language and Identity in Medieval French Jewish Communities (2010); and A. Linder, The Jews in the Legal Sources of the Early Middle Ages (1997). Map 7

KIRSTEN A. FUDEMAN

France, Southern: Middle Ages. Common descent and shared cultural patrimony led the Jews of medieval Occitania to regard themselves as belonging to a single region, extending across the counties of Roussillon, Languedoc, Comtat Venaissin, and Provence, which are today part of southern France. At times, Jews referred to this territory as Provincia [Narbonnensis] – after Narbonne, its ancient Roman center. Unfortunately, some have confused Provincia with Provence, a distinct major county of the region. In fact, beyond the words “this land,” the Jews of Occitania never coined a definitive name for their territory, perhaps because it traversed the jurisdictions of many sovereigns, including, at times, the kingdoms of Aragon, Majorca, France, and *Sicily; the Duchy of Toulouse; and the Papal See. Successfully exploiting their central geographic position, the Occitan Jews absorbed and transmitted Jewish culture from communities to the south (Andalusia, Castile, Catalonia) and to the north (France and Germany), in addition to making their own significant contributions. Beginning in the twelfth century, perhaps a century after the birth of other medieval Jewish intellectual centers in Western Europe, Occitania was distinguished by more than 250 years of diversified achievement in Jewish legal scholarship, the study of Hebrew language and biblical *commentary, preaching, polemics, and *poetry (see MIDDLE AGES: JEWISH-CHRISTIAN POLEMICS; SERMONS).

Initially, the Jewish communities of Occitania seem to have been most closely connected to those of Catalonia. The first major work of rabbinic law from Occitania, Sefer ha-'Eshkol of Abraham ben Isaac, Av Beit Din of Narbonne (d. 1179), is a précis of Sefer ha-'Ittim, the work of Abraham's teacher, Judah ben Barzilai of Barcelona. A portion of another early Occitan legal work, Ha-'Ittur of Isaac ben Abba Mari of Marseilles (d. 1190), was commissioned by Sheshet ben Isaac Benveniste of Barcelona. The following generation of scholars, in contrast, viewed their academy at Lunel as distinct from Catalonia. This generation included Occitania's masters of the Jewish legal tradition, Zerahiah ha-Levi (Razah) and *Abraham ben David (Rabad) of Posquières (d. 1198). Royal France had begun to bring Occitania into its orbit by this time (see HALAKHAH).

Simultaneously with these legal innovations, a monumental Hebrew translation movement began in Occitania. Over five or six generations, Jewish translators made available a vast corpus of *Judeo-Arabic and *Arabic philosophical and scientific texts, creating a Hebrew philosophic culture that affected all other areas of creativity and formed a distinct communal identity. This philosophic transformation was catalyzed by the arrival, in the middle of the twelfth century, of a small but significant group of Jewish refugee scholars from Muslim *Spain, including Judah ibn Tibbon (d. 1190) and Joseph *Kimḥi. The intellectual elite of Occitan Jewry, such as Meshullam ben Jacob of Lunel and Rabad of Posquières, welcomed their colleagues and were receptive to their learning. Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, which reached Occitania not long after 1180, impressed scholars with its legal and philosophical innovations and eventually changed the landscape of Jewish legal studies in Occitania. However, this transformation took time. Rabad of Posquières, esteemed for his Talmud commentary, among other works, immediately wrote critically about the Mishneh Torah in ways that defined his image in coming generations. Although Jonathan ha-Kohen and his academy at Lunel corresponded with Maimonides regarding his legal and philosophic views, Occitania focused its legal study on the interpretation of the Halakhot of Isaac of Fez (d. 1103). This is evident from the legal writings of Jonathan ha-Kohen, at the turn of the twelfth century, and Meshullam ben Moses of Béziers, at the beginning of the thirteenth century. It was not until the middle of the thirteenth century that Meshullam's student, Meir ben Simon of Capestang, returned to the Babylonian *Talmud as his central text. At the end of the thirteenth century, Menahem ha-Meiri of Perpignan (d. 1315) wrote his encyclopedic anthology of Jewish legal interpretation organized around the *Mishnah and Talmud. In contrast, Meiri's contemporary, Manoaḥ of Narbonne, directed his legal commentary to the Mishneh Torah, as did David ben Samuel of Etoile in the next generation.

Maimonides' interpretation of the meaning of Jewish tradition also had a profound impact in Occitania. Samuel ibn Tibbon of Marseilles (d. 1232) was a major agent in the transmission of Maimonidean perspectives, both as a translator of Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed from Arabic to Hebrew, completed in Arles in 1204, as well as a daring exponent of the philosophic interpretation of Scripture in Hebrew in the ensuing decades. Over the course of the thirteenth century, the diverse Maimonidean commitments of Occitan Jewry became well established, although not without controversy. The Jewish scholars of Occitania were at the center of much high-profile correspondence that included the leading scholars of neighboring Jewish communities; issues of debate included Maimonides' understanding of the *resurrection of the dead (before Maimonides' own death in 1204); Maimonidean teaching as a whole (in the 1230s); and the work of the Tibbonide stream of the philosophic interpretation of Scripture, in the wake of Maimonidean influence (1304–06). In this final controversy, Meiri stood prominently against any condemnation of Occitan Jewish scholarship or restriction of the curriculum of Jewish philosophic study, despite his more moderate Maimonidean orientation (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL).

At the turn of the twelfth century, just as Maimonides' work had begun to arrive, the Sefer ha-Bahir*, the first book of *Kabbalah, emerged in Occitania. Rabad of Posquières' son, *Isaac the Blind (d. 1235), is history's first known kabbalist. He claimed to have received secret kabbalistic teachings from his father, who received them from his father-in-law, Abraham ben Isaac – Av Beit Din of Narbonne (Rabi); there is some support for this line of transmission. However, for unclear reasons the history of Kabbalah in Occitania was brief. It is known that Occitania's ruling rabbinic elite, Meshullam ben Moses of Béziers and Meir ben Simon of Capestang, regarded the Bahir and the teaching of the ten sefirot* as a polytheistic heresy utterly foreign to Judaism, and they presumably played a major role in successfully expelling Kabbalah from Occitania. In fact, in a letter to his former students, Moses ben Naḥman (*Naḥmanides) and Jonah of Girona, Isaac warned against the improper dissemination of Kabbalah in *Spain.

Throughout the thirteenth and into the first half of the fourteenth century, Occitan philosophic translation and interpretation produced the first and only full-fledged medieval Jewish philosophic culture in Hebrew. From the influential philosophic sermons of Jacob Anatoli (d. 1256) and the magisterial aggadah* commentary of Isaac ben Jedaiah, in the first half of the thirteenth century, to philosophical Torah commentaries of Levi ben Gerson of Orange (*Gersonides) and Nissim ben Moses of Marseilles, in the first half of the fourteenth century, Occitan Jews reshaped the tradition of the Bible, Talmud, and Midrash in a philosophic mold. Gersonides' monumental Wars of the Lord, one of the most important works of Jewish philosophy in Hebrew, emerges from this context. The philosophic works of Occitan Jews range from the translations of Averroes into Hebrew by Moses ibn Tibbon (d. 1283), to the medical and astronomical treatises of Jacob ben Makhir ibn Tibbon (d. 1306), to the vast encyclopedia of philosophic learning and interpretation by Levi ben Abraham ben Ḥayyim. Meiri's dramatic designation of Christianity and Islam as "civilizing religions" must be situated in this late-thirteenth-century Jewish philosophic cultural matrix. The 1306 expulsion of Jews from sections of Occitania that were newly subservient to royal France did not quell philosophic engagement. Hebrew versions of Aristotle's Ethics and Plato's Republic by Samuel ben Judah of Marseilles, based on Averroes' commentaries, were produced subsequently. So, too, were the mathematical and astronomical works of Jedaiah ha-Penini and the philosophic Bible commentaries of Joseph ibn Kaspi, as well as the translations and commentaries on the works of Averroes by Kalonymus ben Kalonymus (d. 1328) and Todros Todrosi (see SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS: MIDDLE AGES).

A large portion of the Occitan Jewish interpretive legacy became submerged or disappeared during the later Middle Ages and Early Modern period. It seems likely that the gradual dissolution of Occitan Jewish identity in the second half of the fourteenth century significantly contributed to this loss. Even today, the Occitan Jewish community's momentous cultivation of and acculturation to Greco-Arabic scientific and philosophic teachings are underappreciated.

For further reading, see I. Twersky, "Aspects of the Social and Cultural History of Provençal Jewry," Journal of World History 11 (1968): 185–207; and G. Stern, Philosophy and Rabbinic Culture: Jewish Interpretation and Controversy in Medieval Languedoc (2009). Map 7 GREGG STERN

Frank, Anne (1929–1945), who is known for the diary she kept while in hiding from the *Nazis with her family in *Amsterdam, was born in *Frankfurt, *Germany, the younger daughter of Edith and Otto Frank. When Hitler assumed power in 1933, the family fled to Holland where Otto Frank had a business. Anne attended Dutch schools until the German occupation of Holland in 1940 introduced anti-Jewish measures. When Anne's sister Margot received a "call up" notice in the summer of 1942, the family quickly moved into a hiding place above Otto Frank's offices on Prinsengracht Street, which Anne called "the Secret Annex" in her diary. Anne received the diary as a thirteenth birthday gift just weeks before the move. In hiding, she used her diary to express her adolescent musings, literary aspirations, and fears. In its pages she reveals that the civilian population knew of the concentration camps and describes round-ups of Jews in the streets below her windows. In March 1944, the family heard a radio broadcast in which the Dutch government in exile announced its intentions to publish civilian accounts of suffering after the war. Anne began to revise her diary in hopes of publication.

Anne's writing gives a lively account of adolescent resilience and psychological dramas during two years of duress. Her family shared its few rooms with the van Pels family (renamed Van Daan in the diary), whose son Peter became a love interest for Anne. Later, the girl was forced to share a bedroom with an uncongenial newcomer, Friedrich Pfeffer, a dentist. Anne's diary describes how hunger, confinement, and boredom magnified tensions among the sequestered Jews. Personal reflections on identity, her struggle for independence under constant adult scrutiny, and her dawning sexuality are recorded, along with the terrors of break-ins to the building and night-time bombings of Amsterdam. In August 1944, the family was betrayed by an anonymous informant, arrested by the Gestapo, and held at Westerbork detention camp in Holland before being transported to *Auschwitz. Anne and Margot were sent on to *Bergen-Belsen in Germany, where the sisters died of typhus just weeks before the Allied liberation in 1945. Of the eight occupants of the Secret Annex, only Otto Frank survived. On his return to Amsterdam, Frank received Anne's diary from Miep Gies, the family protector who had rescued it from the annex. Frank published an edited version of the diary in Europe, but it became a literary sensation only after the English translation appeared in America in 1952, with an introduction by Eleanor Roosevelt. Its popularity led to a Pulitzer-Prize-winning Broadway play (1955) adapted from the diary by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett and a Hollywood film version (1959) directed by George Stevens that won three Oscars (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM).

The diary was one of the first widely read *Holocaust documents, and it has been particularly inspiring to successive generations of young people worldwide. It also became a model of women's memoir writing in the era before feminist literary studies, and it helped open the floodgates for Holocaust literature to follow. The Anne Frank House in Amsterdam has been a museum since 1960 and receives as many as a million visitors a year; devoted to promoting tolerance and education, it supports research on the Holocaust and racism and sponsors international exhibits. In 1989 the Netherlands State Institute for War Documentation brought out a critical edition of the diary, edited by David Barnouw et al., which assembles three versions of the diary: the original, Anne's revised version, and Otto Frank's edited version. See also HOLOCAUST DIARIES. MARTHA A. RAVITS

Frank, Jacob and Frankism. Jacob Frank (ca. 1726–1791) was the *messianic leader of a Polish Jewish group known for its *antinomian rituals, public challenges to rabbinic Judaism, and subsequent mass conversion to Catholicism. Born Jacob ben Judah Leib Frank in Podolia (the *Ukraine) in either Korolówka or Buczac, Frank married in Salonica and joined a radical group known as "Dönmeh," crypto-Jewish Muslims who believed that *Shabbetai Zevi had been the messiah. In 1755, he returned to *Poland and sought out *Sabbatean leaders. On the night of January 27, 1756, in the town of Lanckoronie nad Zbruczem, Frank and some followers were discovered conducting antinomian rituals. Frank was permitted to return to *Ottoman territories, where he converted to Islam. His followers, who admitted to ritualistic wife swapping, studying Sabbatean books, and holding Sabbatean beliefs, were placed under ban (herem) by the Brody rabbinical assembly and the *Council of Four Lands. The rabbinic authorities asked Bishop Mikołaj Dembowski to condemn the Frankists and suggested they be burned at the stake. However, Bishop Dembowski sided with the Frankists, who presented themselves as anti-talmudists with trinitarian beliefs. They produced a manifesto that called for a public disputation on nine principles of their faith, several of which seemed to uphold Christian doctrine. A disputation between nineteen Frankists and forty rabbis was held in Kamieniec Podolski from June 20–28, 1757. The "anti-talmudists" were declared the winners, their rabbinic opponents were fined and flogged, and copies of the *Talmud were burned.

After Bishop Dembowski's death on November 9, 1757, deprived the Frankists of their main protector, persecutions were renewed with a vengeance. Many Frankists fled to *Turkey and joined up with Frank himself but Bishop Kajetan Sołtyk, who had orchestrated a *ritual murder trial in Żytomierz four years earlier, persuaded King Augustus III to bring the Frankists back to Poland in order to hold another public disputation. The Frankists, now regarded as potential converts to Christianity, promised to prove that Jews used Christian blood for ritual purposes. The disputation was held from July 17 to September 19, 1759, in Lwów, but owing to an intervention by the Vatican no decisive verdict was issued. On September 17, Frank was baptized in the Lwów cathedral, and three thousand of his followers subsequently converted as well. Frank began to travel in aristocratic circles with great pomp but the sincerity of his conversion was questioned, and the adulation of his followers aroused further suspicion. Frank was arrested on January 7, 1760, and secluded in a Czeszochowa monastery for thirteen years. Freed by the Russians, who took the Czestochowa fortress in 1772, Frank moved to Brünn (Brno) in Moravia and resumed his visits to aristocrat courts. After falling out of favor with Joseph II in 1786, Frank left the *Habsburg Empire and settled in Offenbach am Main. He died on December 10, 1791. His daughter Eva (1754–1816) assumed leadership of his Offenbach court, but most followers left for *Warsaw (see MYSTICISM, WOMEN AND).

The most famous compilation of Frank's teachings is Zbiór słów pańskich (The Collection of the Words of the Lord). For further reading, see essays in R. Elior, ed., Ha-Halom VeShivro: The Sabbatean Movement and Its Aftermath: Messianism Sabbatianism and Frankism (2001). GLENN DYNTER

Frankel, Zacharias (1801–1875), rabbi and historian, is considered the founder of what ultimately became *Conservative Judaism. Born in *Prague, Frankel was the first Bohemian rabbi to complete university studies, graduating in Budapest in 1831. He served Jewish communities in Leitmeritz (Litomerice), Teplitz (Teplice), and Dresden, where he remained from 1836 to 1854; in 1843 he declined an invitation to serve as the Chief Rabbi of *Berlin.

In a time of religious ferment and pressure for reform among Jewish communities in German-speaking Europe, Frankel took a cautious middle ground and was resistant to demands for changes from the laity. He believed that reforms in Jewish practice were possible if they were based on historical precedent, but he broke with the nascent *Reform movement in 1845 when radical reformers supported the elimination of the Hebrew language from communal worship. Despite opposition from both the liberal and traditional camps, Frankel promoted a "Positive-Historical" approach that supported the gradual "organic" evolution of halakhah. He argued that historical study demonstrated that Jewish law had always changed over time in response to new circumstances. In 1854 Frankel became the first president of the Jüdisch-Theologisches Seminar in Breslau, which he led for twenty-one years. As part of his effort to bring modern scholarly approaches to the study of Jewish legal texts, Frankel edited the journal Die Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums between 1851 and 1868.

Frankel was an active scholar with a particular interest in comparative exegesis; he also prepared critical introductions to various rabbinic works, including the *Mishnah and the Palestinian *Talmud, using modern scholarly methods.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Frankfurt am Main, the largest city in the *German state of Hesse, is home to a Jewish community that has existed almost continuously from medieval times into the twenty-first century. A free imperial city and coronation site for the Holy Roman Emperors until the early nineteenth century, Frankfurt was formally annexed by Prussia in 1866. Although evidence shows the city to be far older, detailed records of its Jewish community emerge by the thirteenth century. Buffeted during the medieval and Early Modern periods by anti-Jewish attacks (most prominently in 1241, 1349, and the Fettmilch Riots of 1616) and by disasters such as the fire of 1711, Frankfurt nevertheless grew to be a center of Jewish economic, cultural, and intellectual life. In the mid-fifteenth century, the community of around one hundred individuals maintained a *synagogue, ritual bath (*mikveh), "dance hall" (Tanzhaus), and a study hall. In 1462 the community was relocated to a newly created, walled Judengasse (Jews' street) – one of very few classic "ghettos" in *Central Europe. Although the ghetto signified increased restriction, its establishment also marked the beginning of a period of significant demographic and cultural growth. By 1798, when the ghetto was dismantled, Frankfurt's Jewish population had grown to five hundred families, the maximum number allowed by law. Frankfurt was a major center of Jewish learning, and its rabbinic personalities included Rabbi Isaiah ben Abraham ha-Levi Horowitz (ca. 1565–1630), author of Shnei luhot ha-brit; Meir ben Jacob ha-Kohen Schiff (the MaHaRam Schiff, 1605–1631); Aaron Samuel ben Israel Koidonover (the MaHaR-ShaK, 1614–1676); his son, Zevi Hirsh (d. 1712); and Jacob Joshua ben Zevi Hirsch Falk (1680–1756), author of P'nei Yehoshua.

Frankfurt Jews were sustained largely by petty trade, both in the city itself and in the surrounding countryside. For many, work in *commerce replaced peddling as the primary Jewish occupation in the modern period. *Banking also emerged as a small but important economic sector; the *Rothschild family, beginning with patriarch Mayer Amschel, emerged as a prominent symbol of the economic life of Frankfurt Jewry.

The Jewish population of Frankfurt grew from 4,900 in 1848 to more than 22,000 by 1900. In the mid-nineteenth century, the city was a focal point of German Jewish denominational struggle. It was the birthplace of prominent reformer Abraham *Geiger and the location of the second of the three foundational *Reform congresses in 1845. Frankfurt was also home to the first *Orthodox community in Germany to legally sever itself from the official community, the Israelitische Religionsgesellschaft (IRG), led by Samson Raphael *Hirsch. Throughout this period, Frankfurt's Jewish infrastructure and culture blossomed; by the end of the century, it boasted many *synagogues, including multiple Reform synagogues (such as the Hauptsynagogue, built 1860) and the Orthodox Schützenstrasse Synagogue of the IRG (built 1853). The city was also home to Moritz Daniel *Oppenheim, a renowned painter of nineteenth-century German Jewry (see ART, EUROPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY).

In the twentieth century, Franz *Rosenzweig's Freies Jüdisches Lehrhaus (free Jewish learning center) made Frankfurt an important center of Jewish thought; its teachers included Martin *Buber, Gershom *Scholem, and Leo *Strauss. Also prominent in the flowering of Jewish intellectual creativity was the Frankfurt Institut für Sozialforschung, the Frankfurt School of Social Research, whose members included Theodor Adorno, Max Horkheimer, Herbert Marcuse, and Leo Löwenthal.

After 1933, the approximately 26,000 Jews of Frankfurt were besieged as the Nazi regime consolidated power. Jewish institutional buildings were plundered during the Kristallnacht pogroms of November 1938; in the war years the community was destroyed through a combination of emigration (approximately 16,000 left) and mass deportation to concentration and death camps in *Poland. Around one hundred and fifty Jews and other individuals subject to racial restrictions survived to 1945.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Frankfurt is home to 7,000 Jews, one of the largest Jewish communities in Germany; many of its members are Jews from the former *Soviet Union. The Westendsynagogue, built in 1910 and fully restored in 1994, is the central synagogue of Frankfurt and the city's sole surviving pre-war synagogue.

For further reading, see R. Gay, The Jews of Germany: A Historical Portrait (1992); R. Lieberles, Religious Conflict in Social Context: The Resurgence of Orthodox Judaism in Frankfurt am Main, 1838–1877 (1985); and M. Brenner, The Renaissance of Jewish Culture in Weimar Germany (1996). JESS OLSON

Fraternal Societies: See UNITED STATES: FRATERNAL SOCIETIES

Fraternities and Sororities: North America. The terms “fraternity” and “sorority” – from the Latin frater (brother) and soror (sister) – may describe many social, charitable, service, professional, and honorary societies. In the *United States and *Canada these terms most commonly refer to organizations for college and university students that provide room, board, social life, and life-long networking after graduation. Known collectively as “the Greek system,” such groups go back to the dawn of North American higher education. Phi Beta Kappa, founded in 1776 at the College of William and Mary, began as a social group but eventually evolved into a scholarship society. Others followed from the 1820s onward. By custom, the founding organization would take on a two- or three-letter Greek name representing a motto known only to initiated members. Subsequent chapters at other schools in turn received additional letter designations, usually in Greek alphabetical order; for example, the “Alpha” chapter of Delta Phi, the “Beta” chapter, and so forth. Ancient Hellenic and Roman ideals, language, and secret mottoes allowed young men and women to identify with the romance and glory of past civilizations and also to distinguish themselves from the “barbarians” in their midst. Over the course of the nineteenth century, Greek-letter societies spread across the United States and developed an extensive culture that included passwords, secret handshakes, insignias, special ceremonial robes, and often elaborate esoteric rituals with details and symbols borrowed from Freemasonry and ancient Greek, Roman, and Christian traditions. At least fifty national men's college fraternities and twelve national sororities were established by 1900. By the 1920s, just when Jewish students by the thousands were moving into higher education, Greek-letter societies dominated student life on scores of American campuses.

However, the mainstream Greek system was virtually closed to all but the most exceptional or hidden Jewish students, as it was to African American and Asian students and, in many cases, Roman Catholics as well. The strong and explicitly Christian content of the insignia and initiation rituals of many of the existing fraternities and sororities were enough to discourage Jewish membership. However, barriers of race and religion were also enforced by a “gentleman's agreement” or spelled out explicitly in the groups' constitutions and initiation rituals. In one Christian fraternity in the late 1920s, possession of one-eighth Jewish blood disqualified a student for membership. A Jewish student might try to hide his background and “pass” as a Gentile through various means, but this path was fraught with difficulty. As late as the early 1950s, “rushing booklets” at the University of Pennsylvania made the religions of entering students a matter of public record by publishing a P, a C, or an H after each freshman's name, indicating Protestant, Catholic, or Hebrew, for the specific purpose of steering students to the right fraternity. The university also maintained two separate inter-fraternity councils, A for Gentiles and B for Jews.

Jewish college students reacted by forming their own Jewish Greek subsystem of college fraternities and sororities. These flourished in the United States and Canada, reaching virtually every state. This network also included a “sub-sub” system of fraternities and sororities for Jewish students attending professional schools. At its height in the late 1920s, there were as many as twenty multi-chapter undergraduate national groups for men and five for women. Many more chapters existed solely on the local level; it is estimated that these organizations had initiated as many as 250,000 male and female students by 1968. Pi Lambda Phi, founded at Yale University in 1895 by three Jewish students, was the first national college fraternity in this subsystem, although its aim was to be nonsectarian. Zeta Beta Tau was founded as a student *Zionist organization at the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1898 by Professor Richard J. H. Gottheil and by fourteen young men who combined rabbinics with study at several local New York universities. Known at first simply as “ZBT” – the letters of its Hebrew motto, “Zion Bemishpat Tipadeh” (“Zion shall with judgment be redeemed” [Isaiah 1:27]) – Zeta Beta Tau soon evolved into the premier Jewish Greek-letter society, catering to the wealthy sons of *Reform Jews of German origins. The younger sister of a ZBT member helped found Iota Alpha Pi, the first Jewish college sorority, at New York's Hunter College in 1903. In English letters “Iota” became “J”; thus members were known as “JAPs,” and their publication was entitled The J.A.P. Bulletin. Alpha Epsilon Phi, which in many ways served as the female counterpart of ZBT, was founded six years later at Barnard College.

By the end of *World War I, the entire Jewish subsystem had been formed. The roll of men's national college social fraternities, in order of their founding, included Pi Lambda Phi (1895, Yale), Zeta Beta Tau (1898, JTS), Phi Epsilon Pi (1904, City College of New York), Sigma Alpha Mu, or the “Sammies” (1909, CCNY), Phi Sigma Delta (1910, Columbia), Tau Epsilon Phi (1910, Columbia), Tau Delta Phi (1910, CCNY), Beta Sigma Rho (1910, Cornell), Kappa Nu (1911, University of Rochester), Phi Beta Delta (1912, Columbia), Omicron Alpha Tau (1912, Cornell), Phi Alpha (1914, George Washington University), Alpha Epsilon Pi (1914, New York University), Alpha Mu Sigma (1914, Cooper Union), Sigma Omega Psi (1914, CCNY), Sigma Lambda Pi (1915, NYU), and Sigma Tau Phi (1918, University of Pennsylvania). Jewish women's sororities included Iota Alpha Pi (1903, Hunter College), Alpha Epsilon Phi (1909, Barnard), Phi Sigma Sigma (1913, Hunter), Sigma Delta Tau (1917, Cornell), and Delta Phi Epsilon (1917, NYU Law School). Jewish Greek-letter societies for professional students had been founded for medicine, Phi Delta Epsilon (1904, Cornell) and Phi Lambda Kappa (1907, University of Pennsylvania); for dentistry, Sigma Epsilon Delta (1901, New York College of Dentistry) and Alpha Omega (1909, University of Maryland); for law, Nu Beta Epsilon (1919), Tau Epsilon Rho (1920), and Lambda Alpha Phi (1919); for pharmacy, Alpha Zeta Omega (1919) and Rho Pi Phi (1919); for osteopathy, Lambda Omicron Gamma (1924); for optometry, Mu Sigma Pi, (1932); and for veterinary medicine, Sigma Iota Zeta (1933).

In the early years of the Jewish Greek system a clear hierarchy operated based on such factors as wealth, family origin (where one's parents came from in Europe and being born in the United States were important determinants), appearance, and athletic ability. Much intra-Jewish snobbery and discrimination were practiced when choosing and rejecting members. However, Jewish fraternities and sororities served important community functions by providing places for Jewish students to eat and sleep in small college towns where landlords and fellow students did not want to live with Jews. It was not uncommon for parents to cooperate in helping buy fraternity houses for this purpose. Because dating and eventual marriage were key parts of any social fraternity, the Jewish system served as a national match-making bureau, bringing Jewish students together, especially at annual conventions and house parties, and keeping the Jewish *intermarriage rate among college students unusually low. They were also an important factor in achieving upward mobility, because members would often go into business together and alumni would help recent graduates find good positions. It was not uncommon for entire firms to be dominated by members from a single fraternity.

The insularity of the separate Gentile and Jewish Greek systems began breaking down in the 1950s with the enactment of laws forbidding publicly supported educational institutions from discriminating on the basis of race or religion. The years of student protest on college campuses in the 1960s and early 1970s also had a negative impact on the Jewish Greek system. At least three-quarters of formerly all-Jewish fraternities had to merge or go out of business; those few that remain came to accept large numbers of non-Jews. In the 1980s and 1990s the Greek system as a whole, as well as its Jewish segment, enjoyed a modest revival. At the turn of the twenty-first century four of the men's groups and four of the women's groups continue to function. One fraternity, Alpha Epsilon Pi, specifically embraces a Jewish mission and aims to train young men for leadership in the Jewish community. Many of the others are reasserting their traditional Jewish identity, a trend that has been encouraged by the wider American Jewish community. However, it is doubtful that Jewish fraternities and sororities will ever be able, legally or practically, to return to the insularity they enjoyed in the first half of the twentieth century. For a recent study, see M. Sanua, Going Greek: Jewish College Fraternities in the United States, 1895–1945 (2003). MARIANNE SANUA

Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939), the founder of *psychoanalysis, was born into a Jewish family in Moravia, then a province of the *Austro-Hungarian Empire. When Freud was still young, his family moved to *Vienna; there he excelled in school and graduated from the University of Vienna School of Medicine. After a short period of study with Charcot at Salpêtrière Hospital in Paris (1885–86), Freud returned to Vienna where he married Martha Bernays and opened his own clinical office in neurology, specializing in the treatment of hysteria. With his colleague Josef Breuer he developed the therapeutic technique known as “*psychoanalysis,” which he went on to refine in a rich body of clinical and theoretical writings. Freud's early career was deeply marked by ascendant political *antisemitism in Vienna. His earliest and most revolutionary work, The Interpretation of Dreams (1899), documents his own dreams of his father Jakob's humiliation by antisemites. Although the early membership of the psychoanalytic movement was largely Jewish, Freud was a principled atheist and remained wholly convinced of the scientific character of psychoanalysis. His hopes that his disciple Carl Jung (a non-Jew) would help secure the movement's broader legitimacy were eventually frustrated when their relationship came to an end. In his later years, Freud suffered a painful cancer of the palate (causing a disfigurement hidden beneath his beard). He continued to revise his psychoanalytic theory and technique while also addressing more creative themes in *anthropology and the philosophy of history. With the *Nazi invasion of Austria, Freud sought refuge in London in 1938, where he composed his final and most speculative work, Moses and Monotheism (1939). PETER E. GORDON

Friedländer, David (1750–1834), was a Haskalah* figure, *Berlin Jewish communal leader, and writer and major participant in *emancipation debates of the late eighteenth century. Friedländer was born in Königsberg, Prussia, to a wealthy merchant family, and his controversial life illustrates the struggles of a transitional figure in the early emancipation period. Starting his business career in the early 1770s, Friedländer moved to Berlin, home to the blossoming *German Jewish enlightenment movement centered around Moses *Mendelssohn. Young and affluent, Friedländer quickly gained an influential presence as a maskil and a central role in the leadership of both the Berlin Jewish and mercantile communities. Although he believed deeply in the unique position of the Jewish people and religion, Friedländer, in contrast to Mendelssohn, advocated a critical attitude toward Jewish law and practice and believed that religious reform was key to Jewish social and moral improvement, and ultimately to political emancipation. He helped fund the Berlin Jewish Freischule (free community school and publisher) in 1778, a flagship Haskalah effort to reform Jewish society through enlightened education, and he prepared a Lesebuch für jüdische Kinder, a primer for Jewish children. Friedländer translated the traditional *prayer book into modern German and authored a number of ethical essays, which he viewed as crucial tools for the reform of German Jewry. He published repeatedly in the prestigious Enlightenment journal Deutsche Monatschrift, and his collected essays such as Reden der Erbauung (Edifying Discourses) attest to the depth of his religious and philosophical ideas.

After 1786 and the death of Moses Mendelssohn, Friedländer and the Berlin Haskalah movement entered a period of crisis. His close relationship to Mendelssohn, passionate interest in the intellectual enlightenment of German Jewry, and wealth and contacts in the highest strata of Berlin society made Friedländer the most credible heir to Mendelssohn. However, because he was more receptive to fundamental religious reform than his mentor, Friedländer attracted attacks from traditionalists. Simultaneously, Friedrich Wilhelm II rebuffed the efforts of Friedländer and other elite Berlin Jews toward Jewish legal emancipation in 1790. Despairing of the future of both the maskilic project of reforming Judaism and of the possibility of Jews achieving civic equality, Friedländer authored a Sendschrift (open letter), signed by several prominent Prussian Jews, to liberal Protestant theologian Wilhelm Abraham

Teller, volunteering their conversion to liberal Protestantism in exchange for full political equality and citizenship. Although Friedländer understood conversion to mean simply nominal Protestantism based on antidoctrinal deism, the letter sparked heated debate across religious lines, enraging maskilim, traditionalists, and even some Christian thinkers. Although it had little impact on Friedländer's later communal career, the letter significantly diminished his prestige as a leader of enlightened Jewish thought and has made him a figure of much controversy in modern Jewish history.

For further reading, see M. Meyer, The Origins of the Modern Jew: Jewish Identity and European Culture in Germany, 1749–1824 (1967); and S. Lowenstein, The Jewishness of David Friedländer and the Crisis of Berlin Jewry (1994). JESS OLSON

G

Galicia (*Yiddish, Galitsye) is a region in southeastern *Poland and northwestern *Ukraine. Part of the old Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, Galicia entered *Habsburg Austria as a result of the Polish partitions beginning in 1772 (both its borders and the name itself, Galizien, were Austrian constructions). The region remained the Habsburg Empire's largest crown land, or province, until the empire's collapse in 1918, at which time it ceased to exist as a political entity.

At the time of its annexation, Galicia included nearly 200,000 Jews; the Jewish population increased to 575,000 in 1869 (10.6% of the population) and 873,000 in 1910 (10.9%). Galicia was an ethnically divided territory. The western part was overwhelmingly Polish with a significant Jewish minority (~9%). In contrast, Poles constituted the elites in the east, but numbered only 20% population, which was about 13% Jewish and 65% "Ruthenian" (the Austrian designation of later-day Ukrainians). Jews typically constituted more than a quarter of the population of Galicia's two largest cities, Lemberg (Lwów) and Kraków, and formed either a majority or a plurality in scores of other towns, including Brody, Buczacz, Stanislaw, Kolomea, and Drohobycz. As a result, Jews often played a critical role in elections.

*Yiddish speaking and overwhelmingly commercial in a Slavic, agrarian environment, Galician Jewry largely retained its traditional *Eastern European character throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Hasidism, including the Belz, Sandz, and Czortkow dynasties, struck deep roots in Galicia but so too did the Haskalah, many of whose earliest luminaries hailed from Galicia, including Yehuda Miseses, Joseph Perl, and Nachman *Krochmal. Partially as a result of the Haskalah, progressive Jews gravitated toward *German culture during the first half of the nineteenth century. However, as Poles gained control of the province after 1868, Jewish acculturation among the elites shifted toward Polish.

Galician Jewry experienced *emancipation differently from Jews in other regions of pre-partition Poland. Already in the 1780s, the enlightened Habsburg absolutist Joseph II began the process of breaking down Jewish communal autonomy and opening up previously forbidden occupational and residential opportunities. By 1867, all legal restrictions based on religion were abolished. As a result of these unique freedoms in Eastern Europe, a broad array of modern political and cultural movements, as well as a vibrant Jewish press, developed in Galicia. The first *Orthodox political party, Maḥsike Hadas, was founded in Galicia in 1878. *Zionism and other forms of Jewish nationalism emerged early (beginning in 1883), partially as a reaction to *antisemitism but mostly because of the Habsburg Empire's hypernationalist atmosphere in the waning years of its existence. Jewish socialism likewise emerged early in Galicia; Jews organized their first labor strike in 1892, and a Galician version of the *Bund formed in 1905. Economically, Galicia was the least developed province in the empire. The Jewish situation grew especially dire toward the end of the nineteenth century as Polish and Ukrainian agrarian cooperatives deliberately cut Jewish middlemen from the economy. Mass migration was one result; 120,000 Jews emigrated during the 1890s alone, mostly to the *United States.

After *World War I, Polish victories against the Ukrainians secured the incorporation of Galicia into the new Polish state. Interwar Jewish life reflected the general Jewish experience throughout Poland, with a vibrant political and cultural life but rapidly declining economic conditions. Galician Jews were disproportionately Polish and far more politically moderate than other segments of interwar Polish Jewry. Its population suffered disproportionately under *Nazi occupation, particularly in eastern Galicia, and the communities for the most part did not reconstitute themselves after the *Holocaust.

Negative references to the Galitsianer (Yiddish for Galician Jew) as cunning, unlearned, coarse, or a religious fanatic are still heard in the early twenty-first century; these images were created by nineteenth-century Germanized Jews to highlight their own acculturation. In reality, in addition to its nineteenth-century Hasidic, rabbinic, and Haskalah celebrities, Galicia produced countless Zionist and socialist leaders as well as a cadre of literary and academic stars in the twentieth century, most notably S. Y. *Agnon, many of whose stories describe life in his hometown of Buczacz. Map 8

For further reading, see I. Bartal and A. Polonsky, eds., Focusing on Galicia: Jews, Poles, and Ukrainians, 1772–1918, Polin 12 (1999); S. Redlich, Together and Apart in Brzezany: Poles, Jews, and Ukrainians, 1919–1945 (2002); and O. Bartov, Erased: Vanishing Traces of Jewish Galicia in Present-Day Ukraine (2007).

JOSHUA M. SHANES

Galilee (Hebrew, ha-Galil) is an extensive hilly region in the northern part of *Israel bounded by the Mediterranean in the west and the Jordan rift valley in the east; the northern boundary is the base of Mount Hermon, and the southern boundaries extend to Mount Carmel and Mount Gilboa. The region of Galilee was separated from biblical *Israel by *Assyrian ruler Tiglath-Pileser III in 732 BCE, and it was only reunited with Judea by *Hasmonean king Aristobulus I in 104 BCE. The Galilee later became the largest of the three districts (with *Judea and *Samaria) under the rule of *Rome's client-kings, the *Herodian dynasty.

During the First *Jewish War against *Rome (66–73 CE), the Galilee joined the revolt under the military leadership of *Josephus. After a forty-seven-day siege, the fortified village of Yodfat was captured, and Josephus surrendered to Vespasian, the Roman general. Major Galilean cities in Roman times included Sepphoris, Pnias, and Tiberias, which Herod Antipas (see HEROD AND HERODIAN DYNASTY) built on the shore of the Sea of Galilee (Lake Kinneret) in honor of his patron, the Emperor Tiberius (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD). All of these cities, as well as the region's villages and towns, had diverse populations. In the second century CE, after the destruction of the *Jerusalem *Temple in 70 CE and the depredations of the Second *Jewish War, Galilee became the center of *rabbinic activity in the Land of Israel. In *Byzantine times, the region also had a large Christian population. Between the eighth and tenth centuries, after the region had come under Muslim rule, Tiberias became one of the centers of the textual and *grammatical activities of the *Masoretes. After the 1492 expulsion from *Spain the Galilean city of *Safed became a center of *halakhic scholarship (see HALAKHAH) and Jewish *mysticism.

Galut (Hebrew, “exile”): See DIASPORA

Gaon, Geonim, Geonic Academies. The Geonim were scholars and religious leaders who presided over Babylonian institutions known as the academies (yeshivot) of *Sura and *Pumbedita during the geonic period (approximately 550–1050 CE) in what is now *Iraq. The Geonim functioned alongside the *Exilarch (Rosh Galut), a secular political figure, as the leaders of Babylonian Jewry. The Babylonian academies were named after their original locations, although both had relocated to Baghdad by the turn of the tenth century. The academies were dedicated primarily to *Talmud study and the application of talmudic sources to legal decision making; they were also administrative centers for the Jewish population of much of Iraq and *Iran. As the most important institutions of higher learning in the Jewish world, they attracted students from great distances. Only a relatively small number attended year-round; many others studied in their home towns most of the year and came to the academies for concentrated study sessions during the *kallah months of *Adar and *Elul. The senior members of the academy, under the direction of the Gaon, also wrote *responsa, legal answers to questions sent to them from distant communities, especially those located in Islamic lands.

There was also a Gaon who served as head of the central academy in the Land of *Israel, located in Tiberias for most of this period. Unlike his Babylonian colleagues, he appears to have dedicated more of his energies to communal politics and less to talmudic learning. Around the middle of the tenth century, the Tiberian academy relocated to *Jerusalem. The constitutional basis of the Palestinian school was the Jerusalem Talmud, and Palestinian practice differed from Babylonian on various points of law and ritual. For example, in the Palestinian rite, the *Torah was read in the synagogue according to a three-year cycle, whereas in the Babylonian rite, the Torah was read in its entirety in one year. Palestinians celebrated only the one biblically ordained day for each holiday, whereas the Babylonians celebrated two. During worship, Palestinians recited the *shema prayer, the invocation of divine unity, while standing; Babylonians recited it while seated.

Despite differences of custom and legal interpretation, the three academies recognized one another's religious authority. At the time of the Muslim conquest of the Land of Israel in 635, the Palestinian academy's authority extended throughout *Italy and the territories of the *Byzantine Empire, whereas the Babylonian academies held sway in the *Sassanian lands. However, after the shift of the Islamic world's political, economic, and cultural center of gravity to Iraq, and the steady flow of Jews from the east into the Mediterranean region, the Palestinian yeshivah was increasingly overshadowed by Sura and Pumbedita. By the twelfth century, the Babylonian form of rabbinic Judaism had become dominant throughout the Jewish world, due in significant part to the activism, creativity, and intellectual quality of such influential Geonim of the ninth, tenth, and early eleventh centuries as *Amram bar Shesna (d. 875), *Saadia ben Joseph (d. 942), and *Hai ben Sherira (d. 1038). For further reading see R. Brody, The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture (1998). Map 5

ROBERT BRODY

Gardens. In Jewish tradition gardens are actual places, but they also have a range of symbolic meanings. Gardens on any scale, from single plants to encompassing all of creation, employ the immutable elements of nature – stone, water, plants, and climate – along with the various meanings we ascribe to nature's qualities. *Genesis 2:5–3:24 situates the story of creation in gan eden (the garden of Eden). This biblical garden, which has *Mesopotamian precedents, is a microcosm of creation. It is a peaceful and innocent place where humans talk with *God, yet it also contains the seeds of its own destruction. The garden of Eden contains everything that is pleasant to look at and good to eat (2:9), and human beings are commanded to tend it. It is an implicit commentary on the idea of gardens that the aesthetic qualities are noted first and then coupled with utility. This essential linkage of artistry and pragmatic function is fundamental to garden creation; not surprisingly, the garden of Eden story is central to western thinking about gardens and garden design.

The Hebrew *Bible also mentions palatial gardens, including the royal garden of Uzza, where kings Manasseh and Amon were buried (2 Kgs 21:18, 26), and the palace garden of Ahasuerus of Shushan (*Esther 1). *Ecclesiastes 2:4 describes the garden of *Solomon, “in which I planted every kind of fruit tree. I constructed pools of water, enough to irrigate a forest shooting up with trees.” The larger landscape is also referred to as a garden; as Lot looks across the Jordan valley, he says it is “like the garden of the Lord” (Gen 13:10).

The biblical paradise (Hebrew pardes, from the Persian paridaiza, “walled garden”) is modeled on actual Middle Eastern desert gardens and oases that are in dramatic contrast to their arid surroundings. These sites of abundant vegetation, flowing waters, and sensory delight were surely the prototypes for the gan eden tale. The multisensory richness and physical pleasures of the oasis serve as a physical and emotional respite from the surroundings and embody a state of being. All of these qualities are transposed to the beloved female of the book of *Song of Songs, in which the garden is the central metaphor and there are profound associations to women, the female body, and garden imagery. She – and her body, “a garden locked” – is a site of pleasure and comfort. The garden is a locale and a metaphor for the female beloved: “the garden, my sister, my bride.” The woman, the “fountain of gardens,” is the wellspring of all of the poem's emotions; the garden also symbolizes the relationship that grows between the lovers – they are both in the garden and they create the garden.

Although most modern commentators read the Song of Songs as a collection of ancient love poetry, Jewish interpreters throughout the ages have often understood it as an allegory of the love between God and the people Israel in which God is the lover and Israel the bride. Mystical interpretations emphasize images of the Shekhinah, the indwelling divine presence, as a female alter ego of an infinite and eternal male aspect of the divine (Ein Sof*). For Jewish mysticism, the reconciliation of the male and female lovers in the Song of Songs garden setting represents the ultimate unification of the separated elements of God (see KABBALAH; KABBALAH, LURIANIC).

The garden's qualities of pleasure, sensory richness, and life-sustaining properties are also evoked elsewhere in biblical literature and Jewish tradition; the Torah itself is referred to as a "Tree of Life" (Prov 3:18), and the psalms abound with descriptions of the fecundity of nature. The Jerusalem *Talmud quotes Rabbi Jose ben Bun to the effect that "it is forbidden to live in a town in which there is no greenery" (Kiddushin 4:12). The Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds offer practical garden advice and glimpses into late antique garden practice for both ornamental and agricultural gardens. The appearance of gardens can be extrapolated from discussions of specific plantings, irrigation practice, the use of tools, and even the dimensions of walls and fences and the distance between seedbeds.

In the modern era of *emancipation, gardens took on new significance with the development of Labor *Zionism, whose call for the return to the Land of Israel included the imperative of working the land (see ISRAEL, STATE OF: ECOLOGY). The Israelitische Gartenbauschule in Ahlem, *Germany, founded in 1893, was established to train workers in horticulture and agriculture. In 1930s *Eastern Europe Zionist organizations established haksharah (training farms) to prepare and train Jewish agricultural workers. Even during the horrors of the *Holocaust gardens emerged. The Toporol (Society to Encourage Agriculture among Jews), founded in 1933, planted gardens in the *ghettos of *Warsaw and Łódź.

In the Palestinian Yishuv* and, as of 1948, the State of *Israel, gardens and gardening were and continue to be of fundamental importance. Zionist theorists, notably A. D. *Gordon, extolled the value of hard labor and the relationship to the land for Jews historically alienated from such work. The agricultural school at Mikve Israel, founded in 1870, trained gardeners and garden designers and established a botanical garden; a similar program was later established at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. European immigrants founded a professional gardeners association and on virtually every *kibbutz there are gardeners trained in design and maintenance. Making the desert bloom and planting trees, the credo of the Jewish National Fund, embodied garden ideology applied on a national scale. At the popular and professional level a distinctive Israeli garden design has emerged that combines Jewish tradition with historic Mediterranean and desert design sensibilities. It is common in Israel and the *Diaspora to create biblical gardens, featuring plants mentioned in the *Bible. The most striking example in Israel is Neot Kedumim (Biblical Landscape Reserve), founded in 1984 by Nogah Haruveni, son of noted botanist and biblical scholar, Ephraim Haruveni.

For further reading, see K. Helphand, Defiant Gardens: Making Gardens in Wartime (2006); for rabbinic references, "Horticulture," Jewish Encyclopedia (1906); and see also ECOLOGY; ETHICS: ENVIRONMENTAL; ISRAEL, STATE OF: LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE. KENNETH HELPHAND

Geiger, Abraham (1810–1874), religious reformer and Jewish scholar, was born in *Frankfurt am Main. Geiger had a traditional upbringing but his university studies led him to consider the role of *Judaism within modernity and the reforms that would be necessary to sustain its vitality. As a rabbi, successively in Wiesbaden, Breslau, Frankfurt, and *Berlin, he argued for a progressive Judaism, based especially on the biblical *prophets, that stressed a universal message of ethical monotheism. He was the leading intellectual among the Liberal rabbis of *Germany, influential among his colleagues and disciples both in Europe and America. His broad scholarship extended to such areas as the text of the Hebrew *Bible, *biblical commentary, and medieval Hebrew *poetry. He edited two scholarly periodicals and compiled a modified *prayer book that omitted references to the reinstitution of the sacrificial service. During the last two years of his life he taught at the Liberal seminary in Berlin. See also JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY. MICHAEL A. MEYER

Gemara (Aramaic term for "study") refers to expansions, analyses, and legal rulings based on the *Mishnah that were formulated by generations of scholars known as *Amoraim. The scholars were located in both the *Galilee and *Babylonia in the third to the fifth centuries CE. Their discussions of the Mishnah brought in a range of content, both legal and homiletic, including much that was only loosely connected to the texts under discussion. Ultimately, through the redaction efforts of later generations of sages (see SABORAIM; STAM), the *Talmuds emerged, comprising Mishnah and gemara. The gemara of the Palestinian Talmud differs in content, arrangement, and length from the gemara of the Babylonian Talmud.

Gematria: See KABBALAH; NUMEROLOGY

Genesis, Book of is the first book of the Hebrew *Bible. In Hebrew it is called by its first word, bereshit, which means "in the beginning." The English name comes from the Greek word for "origin," which appears in an ancient translation for the Hebrew word toledot in Genesis 2:4. This name more accurately describes a book that discusses the beginnings of the universe, the human species, and the Israelite nation and tribes, as well as the origins of a host of specific phenomena, including the challenges of the human condition, the diversity of languages, and the origins of place names, such as *Babylon and Beersheba.

The *narratives of Genesis are woven together by genealogy; this is evident in the tenfold repetition of the phrase beginning eleh toledot ("these are the generations" or "story of...") at 2:4, 6:9, 10:1, 11:10, 11:27, 25:12, 25:19, 36:1, 36:9, and 37:2. The first eleven chapters are often called the "universal history," because they describe the creation of the world and of all living beings, the great *flood, and the division of humanity into nations that then spread out over the earth. After *God creates the world, which God repeatedly calls "good," things quickly go awry. First, *Adam and *Eve eat the forbidden fruit; then one of their sons kills the other (see CAIN AND ABEL); then general violent disorder ensues. *God responds by wiping out creation and starting over with a new family and a new *covenant, in which the initial arrangements are modified so as to accommodate the problems that arose earlier. Yet still things go poorly. After *Noah is mistreated by his son, his descendants defy God's will by constructing the Tower of Babel. So God again chooses a single family, through which the divine message will be spread.

The central founders of the *Israelites are *Abraham (12–25:18) and his grandson *Jacob (also called Israel; 25:19–36). They are linked by *Isaac, although he receives very little independent attention. Finally, the story of Jacob's son *Joseph (37–50) explains how the Israelites came to *Egypt, thereby setting the stage for the events recounted in the books of *Exodus through *Deuteronomy. Narratives about Abraham center on his faithfulness to God and his need for an heir. They culminate in Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his favorite son at God's command. Isaac's son Jacob, a consummate trickster, is eventually given the name Israel, in recognition of his struggle with God and to signal his role as father of the twelve tribes (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES; and TRIBES, TWELVE). By contrast, the story of Joseph contains little explicitly divine activity; however, the narrator makes it clear that human behavior is the vehicle through which God protects the Israelites from the famine that engulfs their homeland (45:5–8 and 50:20).

Although Genesis is the first of the "Five Books of Moses" (or *Pentateuch) it contains no internal evidence of having been written by *Moses. Already by medieval times, scholars had found several passages that could not have been written in his lifetime (12:6, 14:14, 36:31). By the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the book's repetitions, contradictions, and stylistic diversity were major factors in the development of the documentary hypothesis (see BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP), which argued that the Pentateuch was woven together from several independent sources. The most common version of this theory posits four primary sources, designated as J, E, D, and P (although D is limited to the book of Deuteronomy). It is generally agreed that these sources were composed long after the events they describe and that they reflect the periods in which they were written. For example, God's announcement that Abraham's descendants will be enslaved for four centuries (15:13) points to their eventual escape from Egypt under Moses; similarly, divine promises to the patriarchs were fulfilled in the time of *David and *Solomon. The story of creation resonates with the construction of the *Tabernacle (Exod 25–40), which, in turn, foreshadows the building of the *Temple. Other passages allude to the rise of David's tribe *Judah (49:10) and *Jerusalem as David's capital city (14 and 22).

Over the past century and a half, scholars have found several ancient *Near Eastern texts that shed light on various biblical passages. Among the most notable are *Mesopotamian stories about creation and the *flood, which closely resemble the biblical accounts. In fact, the Babylonian flood story is so similar to the biblical account that it may actually have influenced it, while the Mesopotamian creation myth is reflected in the account of the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11. For a long time, scholars relied on similarities between several distinctive practices in the patriarchal accounts and customs attested in various Near Eastern cultures during the Middle Bronze Age (ca. 2000–1550 BCE) to determine when the patriarchs lived. However, on closer scrutiny, the parallels turned out to be less striking than first thought. As a result, the likely historical setting for these stories is no longer certain. Some scholars think that the patriarchs lived during the Late Bronze Age (ca. 1550–1150 BCE); others place the stories in the post-exilic period.

It has even been suggested that they are symbolic of Judean history after the sixth century BCE exile in Babylonia (see BABYLONIAN EXILE).

One argument for the antiquity of the patriarchal stories is the religion they describe, which includes practices that are very different from those endorsed in other biblical books. The most notable example is the concept of God, who is often indicated by compounds based on "El" (e.g., Ishmael and Israel), which was the name of a *Canaanite deity. Elsewhere, the patriarchs' God is identified in terms of relationship to the clan leader; that is, "God of Abraham" (26:24), "Fear of Isaac" (31:42), and "Mighty One of Jacob" (49:2).

For further reading, see N. M. Sarna, The JPS Torah Commentary: Genesis (1989); and C. Westermann, Genesis: A Commentary (1984–86); see also ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; BIBLE; BIBLE: ANCESTRAL NARRATIVES; BIBLE: MODERN SCHOLARSHIP; BIBLE: NARRATIVE LITERATURE; CANAAN, CANAANITES; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; and NEAR EAST, ANCIENT. FREDERICK E. GREENSPAHN

Genizah. This term, which is probably *Persian in origin and has linguistic precedents in the Hebrew *Bible, was used in early *rabbinic literature describing the dignified disposal place for a sacred text that could no longer be used or for a text regarded as heretical that contained some sacred content. Many Jewish communities adopted the principle (usually through burial or inaccessible storage). GENIZAH, CAIRO. This storage place, which was established during the Middle Ages in the Ben Ezra Synagogue in Cairo (Fustat), *Egypt, preserved about 210,000 fragmentary texts, amounting to a total of about half a million folios. The relatively stable history of its Ben Ezra Synagogue and Cairo's dry climate, as well as the presence of Jews in the same location for many centuries, led to this unique survival. Many documents in the Cairo Genizah date from about a thousand years ago; they are written in various languages, especially *Hebrew, Arabic, and *Aramaic, mainly on vellum and paper, but also on papyrus and cloth. Most of the Arabic documents are written in Hebrew characters, in a Jewish dialect designated as *Judeo-Arabic. There are also items in other languages that were unique to Jews, including *Judeo-Persian, Judeo-Greek (see BYZANTINE EMPIRE), Judeo-Spanish (see *LADINO), and *Judeo-German. *Synagogue officials in Cairo sold some of the texts in the second half of the nineteenth century to dealers, orientalist scholars, and visitors. Famous libraries in *Saint Petersburg, *Paris, London, Oxford, *New York, and *Philadelphia acquired major collections but it was Solomon *Schechter, Reader in Talmudic and Rabbinic Literature at the University of Cambridge in *Britain from 1890 until 1902, who obtained communal permission to remove 140,000 items to Cambridge University Library in 1897.

Genizah fragments represent the most important discovery of new material for every aspect of scientific Hebrew and Jewish studies in the Middle Ages, particularly between the tenth and thirteenth centuries. As a result of the conservation, deciphering, and description done for more than a century, but particularly in recent years at Cambridge, previous ignorance has been dispelled and theories drastically modified. The daily lives of Jewish men and women in the eastern Mediterranean and their relationships with other groups, as well as various aspects of their literacy, have been intriguingly illuminated.

Among the various subjects that have benefited substantially from Genizah documents are the evolution of the vowel systems and *Masoretic methods that were designed to protect and transmit the text of the Hebrew *Bible; the development of synagogal lectionaries originating in *Babylon and the Land of *Israel; and translations and interpretations of the Hebrew Bible especially into Aramaic, Judeo-Arabic, and Greek. The literary history of such “sectarian” works as the Damascus Document, the *Wisdom of Ben Sira, and the Testament of Levi (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) is also known from *Qumran (see *DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Major advances have also been made in the textual and exegetical study of talmudic, midrashic, liturgical, and poetic literature and in the evolution of Jewish religious law. Forgotten works, prolific personalities, and unusual decisions have been discovered. Texts related to the *Karaites-Rabbanite controversy, the Fatimid Egyptian court (see EGYPT: MIDDLE AGES), and pre-Crusader *Palestine and an unexpectedly large range of writings on *mysticism, *magic, and *medicine have significantly increased our knowledge of medieval Jews and *Judaism and their larger environment. Recent scholarship includes S. Reif, A Jewish Archive from Old Cairo (2000); and S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, 6 vols. (1967–93).

Map 5

STEFAN C. REIF

Germany. The first references to Jewish communities in German lands (*Ashkenaz) come from the early fourth century. It is thought that Jews migrated northward from *Italy, settling especially along the Rhine and its tributaries. They were involved in *commerce in such towns as Cologne, Trier, Mainz, Metz, and Strasbourg. Their economic situation during the early centuries was comparatively good, and there are no recorded instances of persecution. By their own choice Jews in each city lived in a separate quarter. Jewish legal status varied according to the jurisdiction in which they lived; it was determined by charters of privilege and restriction that were issued by local nobles or higher clergy. Political authorities favored the granting of residence to Jews because of their commercial talents. They were allowed to bear arms and to adjudicate their own quarrels in accordance with Jewish law.

In the early medieval period, Jews in Germany were allowed to own both fields and vineyards. However, they were excluded from the craft guilds, which possessed a Christian character. By the late Middle Ages they were increasingly concentrated in *money lending, either dealing on a small scale with pawned objects or offering loans against the mortgage of land. Unlike prominent Jews in Muslim lands, medieval German Jews did not play any political roles (see, for example SPAIN, MUSLIM).

Jewish community institutions included one or more *synagogues, a *cemetery, a *mikveh (ritual bath), a hospital and inn for itinerants and the poor, and a bridal chamber for newly married couples. German Jews initially looked to the Land of *Israel for religious guidance and later to the academies in Babylonia (see GAON, GEONIM, GEONIC ACADEMIES). By the tenth century, German Jews were beginning to gain independence in matters of religion. Their first significant talmudic scholar was Rabbi *Gershom ben Judah of Mainz (960–1028), whose influence stretched well beyond his city of residence. Questions were addressed to him from *France, Germany, and Italy. He was able to promulgate regulations (takkanot) for all of Ashkenazic Jewry; among the best known are his prohibitions of bigamy and of the *divorce of a wife against her will. German Jewry was thus developing its own religious customs, which needed to be reconciled with the dicta of the Babylonian *Talmud.

The most important religious figure of Ashkenazi Jewry was Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac (known by the acronym *Rashi; 1040–1105). Although he lived in Troyes in *France, Rashi spent many years as a student in Mainz and Worms. He deeply influenced German Jewry through his establishment of a correct text of the Talmud and his biblical and talmudic commentaries (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: FROM THE MIDDLE AGES TO 1800). In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries an ascetic and otherworldly form of pietism developed by the Hasidei Ashkenaz gained limited popularity in Germany (see MIDDLE AGES: HASIDEI ASHKENAZ). With the exception of *medicine, the learning and creativity of German Jewry were found almost exclusively in the religious realm, with great emphasis placed on male literacy (see EDUCATION, BOYS: MEDIEVAL).

The First *Crusade (1096) brought plunder and slaughter to German Jewish communities. As Crusaders traveled through Rhineland towns, they attacked the local Jews, claiming thereby to avenge the blood of Jesus with the blood of Israel. Some Jews converted to Christianity to escape their attackers, and others defended themselves or hid; still others chose self-inflicted death over conversion. After the First Crusade, Jewish life for a time returned to what it had been earlier. However, by the thirteenth century, the Jewish position was deteriorating, as manifested in false accusations of various kinds, popular outbreaks of hostility, and diminution of legal status. Charges of *ritual murder and *host desecration were leveled against Jews in various places; at the time of the Black Death, in 1348, Jews were accused of poisoning wells. By the middle of the thirteenth century they were required to wear distinctive garb, prohibited from bearing arms, and referred to as “chamber serfs,” subject entirely to the arbitrary will of the emperor or his vassals. Although Jews were never expelled from German territory as a whole, between 1300 and 1500 it is estimated that there were as many 150 local expulsions. During these centuries many German Jews chose to migrate eastward, where *Poland offered economic opportunities and relatively greater safety.

During the sixteenth-century “wars of religion,” German Jews supported the Holy Roman Emperor against the Protestant princes; this was because the emperors (and popes) represented stability and support of Jewish long-term interests in contrast to the caprice of local authorities. Moreover, by mid-century the Protestant leadership, especially Martin Luther, had shown itself hostile to the Jews (see REFORMATION). The leading German Jew of the period was Josel of Rosheim (1478–1554), who served all Jewish communities in the Holy Roman Empire as their representative and advocate before various levels of government.

A thin stratum of German Jews emerged from the Thirty Years War (1618–48) with considerable accumulated capital. During the next century and a half, these *Court Jews were able to gain positions of economic and, in some cases, political influence at the courts of the numerous petty states of *Central Europe. They not only lent money but also provided supplies for armies, luxury goods for the wealthy, and served as mint masters, coining the local currencies. Often gaining the rights and privileges of Christian merchants and participating in the life of the courts, they came to regard themselves as a Jewish aristocracy and, in some cases, became lax in observance and alienated from the Jewish community. Some were tragically torn personalities, many of whose children or grandchildren converted to Christianity.

With the notable exception of the long-established Jewish community of *Frankfurt am Main, most seventeenth-century German Jews lived in small rural communities where they engaged in various forms of peddling or acted as middlemen between farm and town. They continued to be subject to economic restrictions and special taxes. Some were penurious vagrants dependent on charity or criminal activities. For nearly all German Jews their religious lives and culture remained much as they had been in the past.

By the middle of the eighteenth century, however, contacts began to develop between Jews and representatives of the German Enlightenment. The most prominent Jewish enlightener, Moses *Mendelssohn (1729–1786) of *Berlin, gained a broad reputation as a popular philosopher and literary critic. Although challenged by non-Jews for choosing to remain an observant Jew and by Jews for weakening barriers protective of Judaism, especially through his German translation of the *Pentateuch, Mendelssohn persisted in his attempt to reconcile Judaism with the natural religion of reason. He became the model for an identity that was both German and Jewish (see THOUGHT, MODERN).

The nineteenth century in German Jewish history was characterized by a protracted struggle for political *emancipation in the various German states. After initial progress was made during the period of French domination at the beginning of the century, emancipation efforts faltered during the post-Napoleonic era only to revive at the time of the 1848 revolution; they again slipped backward in the 1850s. Finally, political equality for all Jews in Germany was achieved with the establishment of the Second Empire in 1871. Among Jewish advocates, the most prominent was the widely respected Gabriel Riesser (1806–1863), who served as a vice president of the Frankfurt National Assembly in 1848.

During these years German Jews rapidly acculturated, gaining mastery of the German language, whereas earlier they had spoken western *Yiddish; they increasingly gave their children a secular education. However, Jews did not integrate economically. Efforts to establish Jews in crafts or in farming failed as most chose to remain within the sphere of *commerce. The Frankfurt *Rothschild family soon became the most powerful banking house in Europe. Likewise in their social lives, German Jews remained separate from their non-Jewish environment, socializing with their co-religionists and marrying fellow Jews.

German Jews now began to define their Jewish identity strictly in religious terms even as they retained bonds of communal solidarity. To varying degrees they modified religious belief and practice to better harmonize with their new position within the modern world. A variety of religious positions appeared, each differing from the insular traditionalism of the past. Samson Raphael *Hirsch (1817–1894) became the proponent of a modern *Orthodoxy that allowed for cultural integration along with such synagogue innovations as the German edifying sermon and clerical garb. Other rabbis, such as Zacharias *Frankel (1801–1875), the first head of the first modern rabbinical seminary, established in Breslau in 1854, and Abraham *Geiger (1810–1874), the principal figure in the broadening movement for religious reform in Germany, were to varying degrees willing to move beyond the religious status quo. University-trained scholars began to examine Jewish tradition with the tools of critical scholarship, an approach that considered classical Jewish texts within their historical contexts. The most prominent of these scholars, who represented a new and very different elite of Jewish learning from the older rabbinical model, was Leopold Zunz (1794–1886), the principal progenitor of what became known as Wissenschaft des Judentums.

The second half of the nineteenth century witnessed the growth of the German Jewish population; by 1871, it stood at more than a half-million, 1.25% of the general population. The Jewish population continued to grow until World War I, although its proportion of the total German population declined. Toward the end of the century German Jewry was augmented by East European Jews fleeing deteriorating conditions in *Russia. During this period German Jews also gained in wealth and were increasingly concentrated in the larger cities, especially Berlin, where a large majority engaged in commerce and trade. As the community became increasingly bourgeois, Jewish *women confined their activity mostly to the domestic sphere, although some followed Jewish men into higher education. As Jewish identity became increasingly a matter of the home, the family, and Jewish social circles, women played a large role in maintaining it (see WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE).

During the last decades of the nineteenth century, the growth of the Jewish population, its greater visibility in the large cities, and the increased penetration of Jews into German economic and cultural spheres precipitated an *antisemitic reaction. This was expressed in religious, ethnic, and racially motivated agitation. In 1893, to protect their interests, German Jews created a Central Association of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith; this became the largest Jewish organization and soon stood in opposition to the small minority of German Jews who were drawn to *Zionism.

During the Weimar period the general cultural productivity of German Jews reached an apogee. Jews played major roles as scientists, most prominently Albert *Einstein (1879–1955); in the visual and performing arts; and in cultural criticism. A specifically Jewish renaissance, marked especially by religious philosophers such as Martin *Buber (1878–1965) and Franz *Rosenzweig (1886–1929), reached the more actively Jewish among German Jews. However, the majority relegated Judaism to a small role at the edge of their consciousness as Germans, and an increasing number married non-Jews.

With the ascent of the *Nazi party and Hitler's rise to power in 1933, German Jewish wealth was gradually expropriated; Jews were driven from positions of cultural influence and deprived of political equality. The Nuremberg Laws of 1935 erased their status as citizens. On November 9, 1938, a major pogrom, popularly known as Kristallnacht, destroyed synagogues and Jewish businesses throughout Germany. Newly defined in racial terms, many Jews initially reasserted their Jewish identity, flocking to synagogues and adult education classes and joining the Zionist movement. However, in time, morale faltered as some were able to emigrate and others were frustrated by the immigration restrictions imposed by nearly all countries. At least 125,000 German Jews perished in the *Holocaust.

A new German Jewish community, composed of survivors, *displaced persons from other European countries, and some returnees, began to emerge after World War II. The majority lived in West Germany. Until the demise of the *Soviet Union, the community remained relatively small, estimated at 33,000 in 1988. However, beginning in the 1990s a large number of Russian Jews migrated to the newly united Germany, which offered them economic incentives. By 2004 the Jewish population had reached 118,000 and was continuing to grow. This new community lacks roots in Germany and has yet to connect with the heritage of pre-war German Jewry. The principal comprehensive history of German Jewry, especially of the modern period, is M. A. Meyer and M. Brenner, eds., German-Jewish History in Modern Times, 4 vol. (1996–98). Maps 7, 8, 10 MICHAEL A. MEYER

Gershon ben Judah of Mainz (960–1028), also known as the Ragma, was the first great rabbinic authority of *Ashkenazic Jewry. The study house he established in Mainz educated generations of students who were able to spread rabbinic learning throughout areas of Jewish settlement in the German Rhineland and northern *France. Subsequent generations of scholars referred to him as Rabbenu Gershom, meor ha-golah (“Our Rabbi Gershom, Light of the Exile”). His halakhic authority was such that he was able to institute takkanot (singular, takkanah; alterations to Jewish law) that had long-lasting consequences for the Jews of Christian Europe. These included a ban on polygamy and the ruling that no woman could be divorced against her will (see DIVORCE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT). He also liberalized rules pertaining to Jews who had converted to Christianity under pressure.

Gersonides (Levi ben Gershon; 1288–1344), born in southern *France, was a mathematician, scientist, biblical commentator, and philosopher. His biblical exegesis is full of philosophical ideas, but his main philosophical works were supercommentaries on Averroes’ commentaries on Aristotle and Millhamot Ha-Shem (Wars of the Eternal). This book criticizes *Maimonides for adopting a conservative position toward Aristotle in regard to certain questions of *science and religious tradition and for refusing to carry his philosophical agenda to its reasonable conclusion. Influenced by Averroes’ acceptance of virtually all of Aristotelian science and metaphysics and his subsequent reinterpretation of the Qur’an, Gersonides took a philosophical and religious stance that was more radical than Maimonides yet more critical of Aristotle than was Averroes.

Gersonides argued against creation ex nihilo, but used astronomical observation to reject the Aristotelian position of the eternity of the world; instead, he claimed that science and Torah were most truthfully aligned by a version of the Platonic theory of creation from primordial matter. Gersonides rejected all previous resolutions of the tension between divine knowledge and human freedom by arguing that *God could not logically know the outcome of particular contingent events. Divine knowledge extended to general laws, but not to particular human actions that were unconditioned and freely chosen. Regarding miracles and prophecy, Gersonides developed positions that preserved divine perfection by distancing God from active engagement in the world.

At the same time, contrary to Averroes, Gersonides argued for individual immortality, contending that at the highest level of human intellect, when the individual knower attains some sort of conjunction with the divine Agent Intellect, the independent identities of the human and the divine are preserved. As with Abraham *ibn Ezra before him, Gersonides believed in *astrological determinacy, but contended that one may avoid one’s astral destiny by the exercise of reason. He defended a version of specific divine providence for those who have acted in such a way as to merit divine attention. Despite those modified traditional positions, Gersonides’ synthesis of science and religion was generally rejected by later Jewish thinkers. Indeed, his magnum opus was criticized as the “Wars against the Eternal” by Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov and others who adopted a more conservative outlook. In contrast, philosophers such as Joseph ibn Kaspi and Moses Narboni were more radical than Gersonides and closely identified with Averroism. Recent research includes extensive introductions in The Wars of the Lord, trans. S. Feldman, 3 vols. (1984–99); Commentary on Song of Songs, trans. and ed. M. Kellner (1998); R. Eisen, Gersonides on Providence, Covenant, and the Jewish People (1995); and see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL. BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Gef. Document certifying the legal dissolution of a Jewish marriage. See DIVORCE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT.

Ghetto. Technically, the first ghetto was decreed in 1516 when *the political leadership of Venice, which had never wanted Jews to live permanently in the city, finally agreed to their fixed settlement on the condition that the Jews reside separately, on an island that was known as the “ghetto.” This preexisting name recalled the metal foundry that once existed in this location (hence, gettare, “to throw the liquid”). There have been many other suggestions as to the name’s origin, but this is probably the correct one. The era of the ghetto in *Italy ended in 1870 with the fall of the Papal State and its replacement by the Italian monarchy. Today, the term “ghetto” has been universalized to mean any area of urban crowding, often populated by a specific population group. It also has the connotation of a city area in a deteriorated condition, most of whose residents are poor. During the *Holocaust, ghettos were intentionally established in urban areas as sites where Jews were concentrated and confined. From there, the next move was deportation to a death or labor camp.

Venice was not the first place where Jews were required to live in a fixed area. There were such areas by the fifteenth century in *Spain and *Germany. Certainly, medieval cities always had Jewish quarters, where Jews lived separately by their own choice. This is evident in Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Prioress’s Tale,” in which he writes about a Jew’s quarter or street. Thus, even though Chaucer was writing in fourteenth-century *England where there were no Jews at all, he was well aware that in places where Jews did live, they lived in separate areas. The boundaries of such Jewish neighborhoods, however, were not totally fixed, nor were the areas necessarily surrounded by a wall with gates that could be locked, as came to be the case in Italy.

The age of ghettos began in earnest in 1555. In July of that year, Pope Paul IV ordered all of Rome's Jews to live in a specific quarter – it was, in fact, where most Jews already lived. Within a few months, walls and gates surrounded that area. We even know how much cement was used to create those barriers. The Jews were mystified. A similar order to live in one place had been issued eleven years earlier, but never enforced. However, Paul IV, obsessive on the subject of heresy, refused to allow Rome's Jews to live as they pleased. He also wanted to convert them and believed their enforced enclosure – they could go out by day to conduct business, which was now also restricted – would prompt conversions. His successors agreed. Even Sixtus V, in the later 1580s, who allowed Jews to live temporarily throughout the Papal State, insisted on maintaining their enclosure in the ghetto. Jews began to call the enclosed area, which heretofore they had called “the Jews' quarter,” nostro ghet. This half-Hebrew/half-Italian pun translates as “our bill of *divorce,” a document given to a divorced wife, and so the Jews saw themselves, Another ghetto was established in Florence in 1569, perhaps to appease Pope Pius V. More ghettos followed, but neither rapidly nor consistently. In Leghorn (Livorno), the same Grand Dukes of Tuscany who maintained a ghetto in Florence encouraged Jews from the Levant to come and settle to promote commerce. These Jews never were ghettoized. A ghetto did not appear in Modena, near Bologna, until 1638. These variations reflect the interaction of the growing lay state with ecclesiastical powers. The process of enforced ghettoization was slow and delayed by negotiations, and by the seventeenth century the Jews knew how to hold their own, insisting on a central open square and adequate water facilities. In fact, from the first, the Jews in the Roman ghetto were concerned about public sanitation, toilet facilities, and even drainage and sewers. By the time the Roman ghetto was definitively abandoned in 1870, on the very day the Italian monarchy replaced the Papal State, conditions had become so bad and the squalor caused by overcrowding and inadequate services was so great that the Roman municipality razed the ghetto to the ground. Its buildings and precincts had become a health hazard. The last ghetto in Italy was established in Correggio (in the province of Reggio Emilia) in 1738, at a time when the rest of Europe was headed toward broadening Jewish rights.

Thus, the phenomenon of the ghetto may be seen as both an indication of modernity and a symbol of its absence. Its initial establishment occurred during the Protestant *Reformation of the sixteenth century, a moment of crisis for all of Europe. Old patterns, in which Jews could live openly, if with restrictions, were now deemed insufficient. Jews had always symbolized potential threats to Christian unity, and the ghetto demonstrated that those threats might be controlled by walling them off.

Conversely, the continuation of the ghetto in the eighteenth century signified resistance to modernity in all its forms. Advocacy of Jewish civil rights and *emancipation was a component of the evolution of European states into secular entities, unified through common laws and the devotion of their citizens, rather than social bodies held together by shared religious beliefs. Modernizers argued that isolating Jews in the ghetto encouraged a Jewish propensity for isolation and delayed the modernization of both the Jews and the state. This is why the closing of ghettos during Napoleon's short reign in Italy could not be sustained once conservative and reactionary forces regained ground. Resisting the perceived dangers of modernity and secularism to its own prerogatives, the Papal State maintained the ghetto for another seventy years, until its own demise.

Nor was Italy the only place where the ghetto came to symbolize competing forms of governance. In *Frankfurt am Main, in Germany, the emperor and city heads constantly disputed authority over the city's Jews, living in the Juden-gasse (Jewish street or neighborhood).

In addition to seeing the ghetto's establishment as a bill of divorce from the larger culture, Jews also developed positive views of their separation from the mainstream. The ghetto permitted development of a Jewish sacred space. Jews could regulate to some degree who came in and out, and they could establish methods of consensual, but in fact virtually obligatory, arbitration for resolving intra-Jewish disputes. This translated into real internal governance, more than Jews had previously enjoyed. The ghetto also allowed for hiding those marked out to be seized and taken into various “Houses of Converts”; this occurred when individuals were “offered” to the church by converted relatives. No wonder that, in a mixture of cynicism and optimism, the founding of the ghetto was often compared to the events of *Purim, a moment of salvation and rejoicing, of making the most of a difficult predicament. For further reading, see K. Stow, Theater of Acculturation: The Roman Ghetto in the Sixteenth Century (2001); and idem, Jewish Life in Early Modern Rome: Challenge, Conversion, and Private Life (2007). KENNETH STOW

Ghettos, Holocaust Era: See HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS

Glückel of Hameln (also GLIKL HAMELN; GLIKL BAS JUDAH LEIB; 1646/7–1724) is the author of the earliest surviving memoir written by a Jewish woman. Her extensive account of her life, in *Judeo-German, was written to drive away the melancholy that followed her husband's death and to let her children know about their ancestry. Born into the prosperous *Court Jew milieu of *Central Europe, Glückel was well read in Judeo-German literature and had some knowledge of Hebrew and German as well. Her memorial notice characterizes her as “a learned woman” (melumedet), unusual praise in her time and place.

Glückel was betrothed at twelve and married at fourteen; she was the mother of fourteen children. She also worked with her husband in the jewelry business, and after his death, when she was forty-four, Glückel continued the business and arranged marriages for her children into distinguished families across Europe. She later remarried and suffered grave financial and emotional hardship when her second husband became bankrupt.

Glückel autobiography is imbued with a strong feeling of connectedness to the Jewish community and a palpable sense of religious conviction. In many ways it is an *ethical will, a genre with which she was well acquainted. However, in her recollections Glückel goes far beyond the limited boundaries of that literature. As N. Z. Davis (1995) has shown, her originality lies in her use of stories she culled from her voluminous reading and incorporated into her narrative to provide challenging moral and religious commentary on difficult events in her own life. Glückel profited from the new technology of *printing, which allowed her to be a reader, and her extensive and deeply engaged reading, together with her immense energy and strong sense of self, empowered her to express her feelings and her piety through writing.

As Davis points out, all translations of Glückel's memoirs, whether in German, French, Hebrew, or English, omit significant amounts of the actual text. Two English translations are The Life of Glückel of Hameln, 1646–1724, Written by Herself, trans. and ed. B. Z. Abrahams (1963; 2010); and The Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln, trans. M. Lowenthal (1932; 1977). For further reading, see N. Z. Davis, Women on the Margins: Three Seventeenth-Century Lives (1995), 5–62; and see LITERATURE: WOMEN WRITERS (EUROPE AND AMERICA); WOMEN: EARLY MODERN EUROPE; WOMEN, MODERN: CENTRAL EUROPE.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Gnosticism. Derived from the Greek adjective gnostikos (“knowing” or “knowledgeable”), the term “Gnosticism” was coined by the Cambridge philosopher Henry More (1614–1687), who used it to describe both the specific Christian “heresy” found at Thyatira (Rev 2:18–29) at the end of the first century CE and the “false” religious practices found within the Catholic tradition. Gnosticism thereafter became a pejorative term in the study of early *Christianity to characterize various early Christian movements emphasizing salvation through knowledge (gnosis).

In Greek philosophy, gnosis represented a distinct form of understanding based on theoretical rather than practical knowledge (Plato, Statesman 258e). For Plato and other philosophers, a gnostic exercised the soul's intellectual faculties to apprehend truth or reality. Later *Hellenistic religions, including forms of post-biblical Judaism, regarded gnosis as a divine gift, reserved for a privileged few, that leads to an understanding of *God (Wisdom of Solomon 2:13; 15:3; *Philo, On the Virtues 215). It is this view of gnosis that may underlie the claim of a group within Paul's Corinthian community that their acquisition of knowledge made them a spiritual elite (1 Cor 2:13–15, 8:1).

Based on various early Christian sources, contemporary scholars suggest that Gnosticism included belief in a plurality of divine beings, with a distinction made between a transcendent God and other lesser divinities (including the creator god); cosmological and anthropological dualism; and a redeemer (often Jesus or Christ) who descends into the world to deliver a message of salvation. This redemptive message centered on the reality of the “unknown” God and the divine origin of the soul. Gnostics also appear to have believed in the separation of the spiritual and material elements at death and the post-mortem ascent of the soul. From a Christian standpoint, these teachings put gnostics in conflict with proto-orthodox writers who articulated an alternate set of beliefs grounded in an emerging “Rule of Faith.”

Christian opponents of Gnosticism, including Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, sought to clarify Christian “truth” by uncovering and ridiculing the various “errors” found among their rivals. They investigated the origins and development of gnostic thought, identifying the source of gnosis-based theologies in the teachings of Simon Magus, a *Samaritan arch-heretic who was said to have defiled the pristine character of the apostolic church (Acts 8:9–24). They then constructed genealogies that linked his false teachings to subsequent “gnostics” of the second century CE (e.g., Saturninus, Basilides, and Valentinus) whom they believed threatened the purity of authentic Christianity.

This model for understanding ancient Christian gnosis has exercised a strong hold on modern scholarship. Drawing on these ancient reports, scholars have assumed that the gnostic worldview coalesced into a distinct (heretical) religion called Gnosticism by the middle of the second century. In the late nineteenth century, Adolf von Harnack described Gnosticism as the “acute Hellenization of Christianity,” because of its affinity for applying Greek philosophy to the Christian story. Subsequently, the “History of Religions” school challenged Harnack by claiming that Gnosticism's roots lay in the mythic world of *Babylonian, *Persian, and *Egyptian thought. For these researchers, Gnosticism was pre-Christian and non-Christian.

This conclusion coincided with the hypothesis that *Second Temple Jewish literature was the main source for Christian Gnosticism. Moritz Friedländer was the first to advance this position at the end of the nineteenth century, arguing for the existence of a pre-Christian Jewish Gnosticism by the early first century that developed among Hellenized Jewish communities of the *Diaspora. Heterodox scriptural interpretations from these Jewish groups directly inspired the forms of Christian Gnosticism found among the Ophites, Cainites, Sethians, and Melchizedekians. Friedländer supported this hypothesis on the basis of the writings of *Philo, who distinguished between true and false gnosis (Sacrifices of Abel and Cain, 2; Posterity and Exile of Cain, 52–53) and polemicized against *antinomian Jews who spiritualized scriptural meaning (Migration of Abraham, 86–93). Friedländer also surmised that this type of heterodox Judaism influenced Palestinian thought, prompting the Rabbis to criticize those who believed in the existence of two powers in heaven and to condemn the use of books circulating among (non-Christian) gnostic heretics to whom they referred as minim (Ecclesiastes Rabbah 1.8.4; BT Shabbat 116a).

Scholars continue to identify the Jewish contours of Gnosticism. The 1945 discovery of a library of gnostic literature from Nag Hammadi in Egypt has demonstrated that Friedländer's instincts were generally correct. These papyrus documents written in Coptic, approximately forty of which are relevant for the study of Gnosticism, have confirmed that Judaism left a deep imprint among the authors of these writings. The Apocryphon of John and the Hypostasis of the Archons, for example, display a sophisticated exegetical engagement with the Hebrew *Bible, particularly Genesis 1–8, and contain names (e.g., Yaldabaoth and Saklas) that probably originated within a Semitic linguistic milieu. At a broader level, Jewish *apocalyptic texts (e.g., 1 *Enoch and the writings from *Qumran) offer a framework for appreciating Gnosticism's interest in cosmic and social dualism. *Wisdom traditions, such as *Proverbs 8:22–31 and 1 Enoch 42, foreground the gnostic interest in the character of Wisdom (Hokhmah in Hebrew; Sophia in Greek), a divine emanation instrumental in gnostic salvation history. Jewish merkavah *mysticism contains cosmic imagery and descriptions of the soul's ascent that parallel ideas found in Sethian Gnosticism.

These investigations have sharpened the scholarly study of Gnosticism, yet it is important not to let these advances obscure the fact that virtually every aspect of Gnosticism remains under debate. Michael Williams has effectively demonstrated that the early Christian typologies cannot encompass the wide range of beliefs about the cosmos, the human condition, and salvation found in the Nag Hammadi sources, and he considers the term "Gnosticism" too damaged to continue as a scholarly category. Others prefer to retain "Gnosticism," but continue to dispute the precise relationship among Gnosticism, Judaism, and Christianity. On this point, Karen King has argued that investigations into Gnosticism's origins are ultimately fruitless, for they simply reproduce the tendentious modes of argumentation advanced by the ancient Christian polemicists and "essentialize" traditions that were fundamentally variegated and marked by hybridity.

For further reading, see K. King, What Is Gnosticism? (2003); G. Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition (1965); A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven (1977); and M. Williams, Rethinking "Gnosticism": An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category (1996).

DAVID M. REIS

God. Discourse about God in modern Jewish *thought is caught in productive tension between the God of the philosophers and the God of *Abraham, *Isaac, and *Jacob. For Jewish thought, God is first and foremost a concept used to solve metaphysical, ontological, epistemological, and ethical quandaries. In the history of philosophy and metaphysics – first in late ancient Greece and then in the Greco-Roman world, Islamic East, and Christian West – God appears as an abstract principle (the Good beyond Being, First Cause, Prime Mover, necessary existent, Infinite Substance, a postulate of practical reason, Geist). In the history of *Judaism, God is a particular person (and only then a more universal, cosmic principle or potency) around whose *Torah and redemptive force the existence of Israel, God's people, revolves. Insofar as their thought is both "philosophical" and "Jewish," most modern Jewish thinkers refuse to choose between *reason and *revelation. Instead, they simultaneously embrace two competing and contradictory forms of theological expression. Even as God remains a formal figure of thought, a deep and abiding intimacy defines the image of God in modern Jewish thought (see also THEOLOGY).

In the so-called age of rationalism (exemplified by Descartes, *Spinoza, and Leibniz) the basic truths about God, in contrast to the particular mysteries unique to each historical religion, are universal and open to the exercise of human reason. God, as such, was the subject of natural theology. Baruch Spinoza (Political-Theological Treatise [1670]; Ethics [1677]) developed his conception of God according to a geometric method that drew on Cartesian rationalism. However, he rejected mind/body *dualism in favor of a radical monism that posits thought and extension as aspects of a single overarching, infinite substance, which he identified as "God" or "Nature." In his view, only the most basic theological truths in the *Bible, expressed as they are in the most primitive and philosophically inadequate form, are compatible with reason. Scripture is no longer revelation, but rather a product of the human imagination. Not only the ideas of God that Scripture contains, but also the *laws purportedly revealed to *Moses and the political commonwealth based on that law are products of humans. For his part, Moses *Mendelssohn (Jerusalem [1783], Morgenstunden [1785], Die Sache Gottes, An die Freunde Lessings [1786]) followed Leibniz and Wolff against Spinoza, developing a dualistic *theology based on the contention that after (but not before) the initial act of creation God and world constitute separate substances. Mendelssohn agreed with Spinoza that truths about God are not specific to Judaism or to any other historical religion. However, unlike Spinoza, Mendelssohn affirmed the abiding reality of revelation. Revelation persists, not qua theological contents but as ceremonial law, which Mendelssohn embraced as a living, poetic form that points the mind to consider universal religious truths, including the existence of God and providence and the immortality of the soul.

The idea of God assumed pride of place in nineteenth-century liberal Judaism. As reformers, thinkers like Saul Ascher and Abraham *Geiger had no option but to refuse the notion that law constitutes the unique feature of Judaism. Against Spinoza and Mendelssohn, they considered the essence of Judaism to be its idea – namely, the idea of God that they equated with ethical monotheism (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY). Everything else (law, social constitution, etc.) represents the historical accident of mere form. Rejecting the classical enlightenment position that basic theological truths are universal, they located the origin of ethical monotheism not in the ideas of reason, but in the particular history of Judaism. Revelation is now inspiration. Reflecting the emergent historicism in German culture, the proponents of this scheme assumed that the Jews have a special genius for religion; their mission was to spread throughout the world, not as a national community, but as a *Diaspora community. The idea of ethical monotheism remains a constant element unique to Judaism (in distinction to *Christianity, whose theology was considered not as strictly monotheist, and *Islam, whose practice was considered not as strictly ethical). Although "the idea" takes on different form in different historical contexts, ethical monotheism remains the constant sine qua non without which there is no Judaism. The Modern Orthodox thinker Samson Raphael *Hirsch and the leader of Positive-Historical Judaism, Zacharias *Frankel, rejected the contention that the essence of Judaism is an "idea." The former saw law (i.e., ritual practice) and the latter saw peoplehood as components that were just as "essential" to Judaism as its God idea.

In contrast to the nineteenth century, the twentieth century was a heyday in modern Jewish theology, understood narrowly as a distinct discourse about God. The fresh currents in modern Jewish theology were made possible by a theoretical shift from the focus in nineteenth-century German Idealism on essence, idea, and spirit to an emphasis in phenomenology and existentialism on existence and relationship. A new model of reason embedded in lived human reality changed the discourse about God in western religious thought: God no longer appeared as a disembodied figure of thought or an object of historical development but took shape as a lived presence in the human here and now. Twentieth-century Jewish thought supported Kant's famous contention that the destruction of scholastic metaphysics (i.e., a dogmatic belief in God as an object of pure reason and theoretical knowledge) makes room for faith (i.e., belief in God as a postulate of practical reason, guiding human moral reason and action). Yet it did so with a warmth and intensity that escaped Kant.

In twentieth-century German Jewish thought, God was both a philosophical and intimate figure. As a philosophical figure, God forms part of a purely intellectualist program. For Hermann *Cohen, God is the guarantor of social ethics and a standard of intersubjective relationship (Ethik des reinen Willens [Religion of Reason]). For Martin *Buber (I and Thou) and for Franz *Rosenzweig (The Star of Redemption), God is a theoretical figure of thought in opposition to "world" and to "humans." At the same time, a profound intimacy supplemented the more philosophical discussion about God. The idea of God advanced in Cohen's "religion of reason" is associated with the lyrical poetry of *prayer, supplementing the idea of God in "philosophical ethics." The "holy" God shared by *ethics and religious piety (i.e., God as regulative, a moral archetype) grounds social ethics and the alleviation of suffering ("my concern for the neighbor"). The "good" God who is unique to religion qua religion, especially in the religion of lyric prayer, satisfies the individual's personal cry for *redemption from guilt and from the fear of *death (peace secured by *atonement). For Buber and Rosenzweig, revelation means not the revelation of reason as it does for Cohen, but the revelation of divine presence to a human being in his or her unique individuality and human wholeness. God speaks through human forms of dialogue, language, and *love.

American Jewish theology in the twentieth century was less philosophical (and less metaphysical) than Jewish thought in Germany. Against a transcendent, supernatural conception of God, Mordecai *Kaplan (The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion) proposed faith in the cosmos and "enthusiasm for living." What Kaplan meant by God was the power within nature that makes for emergent salvation, social and human regeneration, righteousness, and freedom. Kaplan's rejection of the special privileges invoked by Jewish *chosenness and covenantal theology was meant to keep pace with modern science and democratic values. This emphasis on divine immanence was to become more influential in the 1980s and 1990s with the entry of *mysticism and *feminism into modern Jewish thought. Yet Kaplan's rationalism always seemed to fall short for most readers. In contrast, Abraham Joshua *Heschel and Joseph *Soloveitchik reworked the biblical image of a transcendent, personal God. For Heschel (Man is Not Alone; God in Search of Man) and Soloveitchik (Lonely Man of Faith; Kol Dodi Dofek: Listen – My Beloved Knocks; Uvikaštem mi sham), God is the covenantal partner of beloved Israel, who constitutes an answer to the experience of human wonder before existence (especially the alienated life of "modern man"). God gives meaning to the problem of human *suffering, but is the One before whom the human person always seems to fall short.

The post-Holocaust theology of Richard *Rubenstein (After Auschwitz), Eliezer *Berkovits (Faith after the Holocaust; With God in Hell), Emil *Fackenheim (God's Presence in History; To Mend the World), and Arthur Cohen (The Tremendum) challenged American Jewish theology in the late 1960s and 1970s. For these theologians, the scale and intensity of the *Holocaust called into question the goodness, justice, and perfection of God and more specific claims regarding God's *covenant with Israel. Whether outside or inside the framework of covenantal theology, each thinker proposed different ways to think through the problem of God and Jewish intellectual history by abandoning ancient and modern forms of theodicy (just deserts in this world or the next, afflictions of love, vicarious atonement, messianic recompense, free will). They exhibited less willingness to uphold the justice and goodness of God against perceived human shortcomings. For them, the relationship between God and human beings was more morally fraught. The theology driving the work of Emmanuel *Levinas ("Loving Torah more than God"; "Useless Suffering") belongs to this stage in post-Holocaust thought. The commanding face of the other is more human than divine per se.

Since then, Jewish discourse about God has remained a mixed bag. In the Jewish theology that emerged in the late 1970s and 1980s, the embrace of mysticism and divine immanence accompanied a sharp move away from the rationalist philosophical tradition. Often skirting close to New Age theology, thinkers like Arthur Green, Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, Judith Plaskow, Marcia Falk, Neil Gilman, and Lawrence Kushner have yet to create a Jewish theology that is rigorously philosophical. In contrast, participants in the more narrowly rarified circles of academic Jewish philosophy tend to focus on historical studies. As a philosophical figure, God gives way to "texts" and to ethics, meaning, law, politics, and the body. All recent academic Jewish philosophy is in this respect a Straussian exercise (see STRAUSS, LEO), in which God has not yet dared come out into the open. See also THOUGHT, MODERN.

ZACHARY BRAITERMAN

Golden Calf: See AARON; CANAAN, CANAANITES; EXODUS

Golem. Two commentaries on the Sefer Yetzirah*, both of them written in the first half of the thirteenth century in *Central Europe, describe in detail the creation of a human being out of earth and its animation through recitation of the Hebrew *alphabet. One is a work attributed to Saadia Gaon, but actually written by a writer of the esoteric "Unique Cherub Circle"; the second is by Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (d. 1238), a leading figure in the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz. In the first of these commentaries, as well as in several other contemporaneous sources, the creation of the golem is associated with *Abraham and Shem, who are said to have studied Sefer Yetzirah together. However, many scores of other commentaries on Sefer Yetzirah, from the tenth to the twentieth century, do not refer to such a practice. Gershom *Scholem, followed by Moshe Idel, understood Sefer Yetzirah itself to contain instructions for creating a golem, and they connected it to two paragraphs in Babylonian *Talmud Sanhedrin 65b. This connection was refuted in a detailed study by Peter Schaefer, who proved that there is no valid reference to this practice before the High Middle Ages. Beginning in the sixteenth century scattered narratives describe great sages who created such beings to serve them (the earliest, from the late fifteenth century, attributes this ability to Samuel ben Kalonymus, the father of Judah the Pious).

This legend inspired the 1909 fictional narrative by Judah Judel Rosenberg (1859–1935) about the creation of a golem by the sixteenth-century rabbi, Judah Loew, the Maharal of *Prague. This became a Jewish bestseller throughout the twentieth century, and many creative works, Jewish and non-Jewish, have been based on it. For further reading, see J. Dan, The Unique Cherub Circle: A School of Mystics and Esoterics in Medieval Germany (1999); G. Scholem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1965); M. Idel, Golem: Jewish Magical and Mystical Traditions on the Artificial Anthropoid (1990); P. Schäfer, "The Magic of the Golem," Journal of Jewish Studies 46 (1995): 249–61.

JOSEPH DAN

Gordon, Aharon David (1856–1922) was the spiritual leader of Labor *Zionism. Settling in *Palestine in 1904, Gordon joined the agricultural movement to create a new kind of Jewish life and Jewish person. He believed that through physical productive labor, in accord with the divinely ordained rhythms of nature, humanity would become a partner with God in the process of creation. See also GARDENS; ISRAEL, STATE OF; ECOLOGY.

Graetz, Heinrich (1817–1891) was the best known nineteenth-century historian of the Jewish experience. Born in the Prussian province of Posen, he received a traditional Jewish education and attended a yeshivah*. He later came in close contact with the founder of *Modern Orthodoxy, Samson Raphael *Hirsch, and lived for a while in his house in Oldenburg. Their friendship fell apart, and Graetz went to study at the University of Breslau but could not obtain a doctorate there as a Jew. He thus submitted his thesis to the University of Jena. It dealt with Jewish *Gnosticism and was a thinly revealed polemic against contemporary religious reformers. Graetz became allied with Zacharias *Frankel and his Positive-Historical Judaism. In 1854, Graetz was appointed lecturer in Frankel's newly established Jewish Theological Seminary in Breslau. In 1846, he published his theoretical conception of Jewish history (Construction der jüdischen Geschichte); the first volume (it was actually the fourth volume) of his magisterial Geschichte der Juden (History of the Jews), which would total eleven volumes, appeared in 1853. Graetz's History has often been characterized as a "Leidens- und Gelehrten-geschichte," a history of suffering with regard to relations with the outside world and of intellectual achievements where it concerns internal Jewish history. The conservative German historian Heinrich von Treitschke accused Graetz of spreading anti-German and anti-Christian sentiments. Although these accusations stemmed from von Treitschke's own *antisemitism, Graetz was indeed a passionate and often emotional historian who, in addition to profoundly rejecting Jewish *mysticism, was very outspoken about any anti-Jewish sentiments. Graetz had sympathies for the renewed Jewish settlement in *Palestine but his writings should not be seen as a precursor of political *Zionism.

MICHAEL BRENNER

Grammarians and Lexicographers. Systematic interest in the grammar and meaning of Biblical *Hebrew started among ninth-century Jews living in Muslim lands. In Basora, Kufa, and later in Baghdad (see IRAQ), Muslim scholars created important centers of study of the Arabic language, particularly focused on the Qu'ran, its true readings, and its meaning. Jewish scholars learned from Arab grammarians how to use linguistic tools to analyze the sacred text and then began their own linguistic studies of *Hebrew. Two particular groups played an important role in these first grammatical approaches to the *Bible. The first were the *Karaites, sectarians who rejected the oral tradition and based their religious life exclusively on the biblical text; the second were the *Masoretes, who maintained an orthodox position and devoted their efforts to preserving and transmitting the received text of the Scripture.

In Iraq, Jewish scholars initiated the scientific study of the Hebrew language. As with Arabic grammarians, Jewish tradition considered grammar to be a component of biblical exegesis. At the beginning of the tenth century, *Saadia Gaon translated the Bible into Arabic with a commentary. In doing so, he established the basis for the scientific study of the grammar and lexicon of Biblical Hebrew. Interest in this field spread quickly to *North Africa: Dunash ibn Tamim and Judah ben Kuraish were major scholars of biblical language. The latter promoted a comparative study of Hebrew vocabulary. Al-Fasi, a Karaite scholar born in the Maghreb, wrote a dictionary of Hebrew roots in *Judeo-Arabic at the middle of the tenth century. Soon thereafter, interest in Hebrew philology also developed in al-Andalus, Muslim *Spain. In the middle of the tenth century in Cordova, Menaḥem ben Saruk wrote the first Hebrew–Hebrew dictionary, explaining the meaning of most of the roots used in the Bible and creating an adequate linguistic terminology in Hebrew. The novelties and limitations of Menaḥem's dictionary, the Maḥberet, spurred passionate discussion on grammatical and lexical problems, led by *Dunash ben Labrat and the disciples of Menaḥem. These questions were not simply of academic interest; rather, they were crucial for understanding the Hebrew Bible and applying it to Jewish life. At the same time, Spanish Jews were also using Hebrew to write a new kind of Arabized poetry (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD).

The study of Hebrew reached its peak at the end of the tenth century and during the first half of the eleventh century. Thanks to a deep reflection on Hebrew with the help of the grammatical works of the Arabs, first Judah Ḥayyuj and then Jonah ibn Janah a few years later provided the necessary instruments to identify and group the roots of the Bible in Hebrew, explain their flexion and uses, distinguish the linguistically correct forms from the incorrect ones, and interpret their senses. Ḥayyuj initiated the scientific study of Hebrew by applying the linguistic analyses of Arab grammarians to its roots and by overcoming all previous doubts and inadequacies. Ḥayyuj, who saw the language from a diachronic perspective, argued that there is no Hebrew verb with fewer than three letters. He believed that one of the main activities of the linguist is to discover the basic form that can explain all the other forms. Ibn Janah tried to complete and improve the work of Ḥayyuj, writing one of the most complete grammars of the epoch as well as a dictionary that was translated and used by many generations of scholars.

Jewish grammarians of the tenth and eleventh centuries played a decisive role in initiating the study of Semitic comparative grammar; because they were familiar with Arabic, Hebrew, and *Aramaic, they used linguistic comparison as a tool to study the Bible and its lexicon. Their contributions to the first comparative semitics were particularly important. Indeed, with the exception of some ideological reluctance found in the work of a few grammarians like Menaḥem, most medieval Jewish linguists compared Hebrew with Arabic and Aramaic. Saadia, Ben Kuraish, Ḥayyuj, and Ibn Janah discussed the degree of affinity among the three languages in treatises on grammar and lexicography. At the end of the eleventh century, Isaac ibn Barūn made a detailed comparison between Hebrew and Arabic grammar and lexicology.

During the twelfth century, two Jews of Andalusian origin played an important role in the European diffusion of Hebrew grammar and lexicography. Abraham *ibn Ezra was a true linguist who not only transmitted the philological knowledge of the eleventh century to European Jews but also created his own grammatical system. David Kimḥi systematized Hebrew grammar and wrote the most popular dictionary in Hebrew. European conversos and Christian scholars in the Renaissance primarily used the books of David Kimḥi, while the Judeo-Arabic dictionary written by the last scholar of Arabic Muslim Granada, Saadia ibn Danan, remained almost unknown.

Recent scholarship includes A. Dotan, "Saadia Gaon – A Master Linguist," Jewish Studies at the Turn of the Twentieth Century (1999): 26–30; G. Kahn, The Early Karaite Tradition of Hebrew Grammatical Thought (2000); A. Maman, Comparative Semitic Philology in the Middle Ages (2004); and A. Sáenz-Badillos and J. Targarona, Gramáticos hebreos de al-Andalus (siglos X-XIII), Filología y Biblia (1988).

ANGEL SÁENZ-BADILLOS

Graphic Novels: See LITERATURE: GRAPHIC NOVELS

Gratz, Rebecca (1781–1869), was a *Philadelphia native who played a major role in establishing institutions that benefited women and children and served as models for many other communities. Gratz helped found the Philadelphia Orphan Asylum in 1815, and concerned about evangelical overtones in other charities, she opened the Female Hebrew Benevolent Association in 1819; it remains active in the early twenty-first century. In 1838 she founded and was superintendent of the first Hebrew Sunday School; it served both male and female students. Gratz assisted women in *Charleston, Savannah, and Baltimore in organizing similar schools, and Jewish Sunday Schools were also founded in many other places. Gratz established the Jewish Foster Home in 1855; it eventually became the Association for Jewish Children in Philadelphia. Gratz, who never married, devoted herself to the organizations she established and maintained literary correspondences with writers such as Washington Irving and Grace Aguilar (see LITERATURE: BRITAIN). For further reading, see D. Ashton, Rebecca Gratz: Women and Judaism in Antebellum America (1997); and see also ORGANIZATIONS, WOMEN'S: NORTH AMERICA; PHILADELPHIA.

Greece. The Jewish community in the region that today comprises Greece, one of the oldest and most influential in Europe, falls into three general groups – *Romaniotes, *Sephardim, and *Ashkenazim – although there is great diversity within each of these categories.

Broadly speaking, Romaniotes are those Jews who trace their origins in the region to the early *Roman period. Communities of Romaniotes were found most notably in Didymoticho, Halkis, Jannina, the Peloponnese, Salonika, Serres, and Verroia. Most Romaniote communities are thought to date from the first century of the Common Era, although there is evidence for the presence of Jews in the region well before then. Romaniotes, then, are rightly considered "indigenous" and may indeed be one of the most continuous presences in a region that has experienced several waves of migration and invasion, particularly in the late medieval and Early Modern periods. Romaniote Jews today are particularly associated with the city of Jannina, in northwestern Greece. Before World War II, Jannina was Greece's largest Romaniote community, but today there are virtually no Jews left in that city. Romaniotes historically have spoken Greek; after the formation of the Greek nation-state they were, for the most part, more readily integrated into Greek society than other Greek Jews, largely because of their cultural "Greekness."

Sephardim are Jews originally from *Spain and *Portugal (and in smaller numbers from southern *France and northern Italy) who left the Iberian peninsula in a series of waves following various decrees of mandatory conversion and expulsion. In Spain, the Alhambra Decree, or Edict of Expulsion of 1492, and a similar decree in 1497 in Portugal triggered migratory waves of Iberian Jews and Jewish converts (conversos) toward *North Africa and southeastern Europe in search of religious freedom and freedom from the *Inquisition. In the wake of these migrations Salonika rose to prominence as the *Ottoman Jewish city par excellence and became the world Sephardic center from the sixteenth century through the start of World War II. Most people think of Greek Jews as these Sephardic descendants of the Iberian expulsions, who settled in Ottoman Salonika (Selanik) during the sixteenth century and formed a vibrant community that was destroyed during the *Holocaust. Although depicted as one group, the Sephardim have diverse origins in literally hundreds of different communities of southwest Europe.

Ashkenazim, *Central, and *East European Jews, made up the smallest portion of Greek Jewry. It is thought that some hundreds came to the *Balkans in the 1400s, after being ejected from the kingdom of Bavaria. Hungarian-speaking Jews settled in northern Greece, in Kavala, at around the same period. Another very small wave of Ashkenazim migrated to the region in the early nineteenth century in search of economic opportunities in Athens, newly established as the Greek capital. Although Romaniote Jews continue to maintain a separate identity, most other Greek Jews assimilated to one extent or another to Sephardic practice and rabbinic authority. This process was most clearly marked around Salonika, where the rabbinic establishment long held authority not only over most Jews in the immediate region but also across the Mediterranean Jewish world as a whole.

Such, in broad historical strokes, are the contours of Jewish presence in Greek lands. Yet in framing a category of "the Jews of Greece," it is important to remember that Greece did not emerge as a nation-state until the end of the Greek War of Independence (1821–33); at the time of its inception there were very few, if any, "Greek Jews." The city of Salonika, the largest Jewish community in the *Balkans, only became part of Greece in the wake of the Balkan wars of 1912–13, with annexation by Greece in 1912; the horrors of the *Holocaust came just thirty years later. So Greece has been home to a sizably significant Jewish population for only a small part of its two-century history. One of the greatest struggles faced by the region's Jews was the transition from being Ottoman imperial subjects to being Greek national citizens; the implications of integration into a largely Christian state were extremely complex. Since Greece's creation, there has been a constant friction between Greek Jews and a state that defines itself in largely Christian (Orthodox) terms.

At the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, there are roughly 5,000 Jews in Greece. In contrast, on the eve of World War II, there were close to 80,000. More than 65,000 Jews from Greece were murdered in the course of the war, most in *Auschwitz-Birkenau. Of those who survived, more than half ultimately emigrated in the post-war period, most to *Israel or the *United States. Emigration to Israel, in particular, continues, although the Greek Jewish population is now stable. Today's community tends to be highly secularized; much of its group cultural practice consists of commemorating the Greek Jewish past and remembering the community of the pre-war period. As with a number of European countries where the Jewish population was all but eradicated, Jewish post-war consolidation has been largely juridical: In Greece, the Central Board of Jewish Communities (KIS, Kentriko Israelitiko Symvoulío Ellados) was established as a legal state entity in 1945, largely to represent the community in its various legal battles over Jewish-owned properties stolen during the war. Today it serves as the Jewish community's corporate representative body vis-à-vis foreign entities and the Greek state, and it coordinates the activities of Greece's nine Jewish communities or congregations. Formal communities exist today in Athens, Thessaloniki, Larissa, Halkis, Volos, Corfu, Trikkala, Jannina, and Rhodes, but only those in Athens, Thessaloniki, and Larissa are large enough to support regular worship and other communal activities (Maps 4, 9).

For further reading, see S. Bowman, Jewish Resistance in Wartime Greece (2006); R. Dalven, The Jews of Jannina (1990); K. E. Fleming, Greece – A Jewish History (2007); A. Levy, The Sephardim in the Ottoman Empire (1994); M. Mazower, Salonica: City of Ghosts (2004); idem, Inside Hitler's Greece: The Experience of Occupation, 1941–44 (1993); N. Stavroulakis, The Jews of Greece (1990); and see also BYZANTINE EMPIRE.

K. E. FLEMING

Gypsies: See HOLOCAUST: ROMA

H

Ḥabad (also Chabad): A formulation of Ḥasidism shaped by R. Schneur *Zalman of Liady (1745–1813), Ḥabad is an acronym for hokhmah (“wisdom”), binah (“understanding”), and daat (“knowledge”). Lubavitch Ḥasidism, the major branch of Ḥabad, emerged as a dynasty in 1813 when R. Dov Ber of Lubavitch (1773–1828), the son of R. Schneur Zalman, prevailed in a succession conflict. See ḤASIDISM: EUROPE and ḤASIDISM: NORTH AMERICA.

Habakkuk is the eighth of the twelve “minor” prophetic books (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS). Because it mentions Chaldeans (a biblical term for *Babylonians), scholars date the book after the rise of the neo-Babylonian Empire in the late seventh century BCE. This would make the author (about whom nothing else is known) a contemporary of *Jeremiah. Like Jeremiah, Habakkuk sees the Babylonians as divinely commissioned to punish *Judah, but Habakkuk emphasizes that they attribute their might to their own god. Consequently they will be punished for their treatment of Judah (cf. *Isaiah’s attitude in 10:5–19). The first section (1–2) is a dialogue between *God and the prophet, who bemoans the *suffering of the innocent – whether at the hands of corrupt Judean leaders or of Babylonians is not clear. Similarities between the prophet’s questions and those in *psalms of lament are noteworthy. The critique of idolatry at the end of chapter 2 (which displays knowledge of Babylonian attitudes towards cult statues) could be intended against Judean idolaters or against the Babylonians. The second section (3) is a psalm petitioning God to act and describing a theophany, a vision of God. Its imagery resembles that of *Exodus 19, *Deuteronomy 33.2, *Judges 5.4, Psalm 29, and Canaanite texts describing the theophany of the god *Baal.

A commentary on Habakkuk found at *Qumran identifies the Chaldeans with the Kittim or *Romans. *Rabbinic literature (Seder Olam Rabbah 20.5) maintains that Habakkuk lived in the time of King Manasseh, whereas the *Zohar identifies him with the son of the Shunammite woman whom *Elisha saved in 1 Kings 4 (Zohar 1.7b). However, these dates are too early, because they precede the rise of neo-Babylonian power. Habakkuk 3 is read on the second day of the festival of *Shavuot because of its description of a theophany.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Habsburg Empire. The history of East-Central European Jewry is closely bound up with that of the multinational Habsburg monarchy. In addition to *Austria, the monarchy also incorporated *Hungary and the *Czech lands (Bohemia and Moravia) in 1526. With the annexation of *Galicia (1772) and Bukovina (1775), the Habsburg monarchy came to include the largest Jewish population in Europe west of the *Russian Empire.

EARLY MODERN PERIOD: Before 1526 the only significant Jewish settlement under Habsburg rule was in *Vienna. In 1421 the flourishing medieval Jewish community of that city was destroyed, and it was renewed only in the sixteenth century. The Czech lands became the cultural and demographic center of Habsburg Jewry in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Jews of Bohemia were expelled from the royal cities in 1541, but they were allowed to remain in *Prague, and the rest spread out into small towns and villages. Moravian Jews lived in private towns ruled by magnate families. The reigns of Maximilian II (1564–76) and Rudolph II (1576–1612) created favorable conditions for the expansion of Jewish life in the Czech lands. Rudolph II gave the Jews of Prague new privileges, and the Jewish population of the city grew from a few dozen in 1564 to 3,000 by 1600. The most important cultural figure of this period was Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel (the Maharal, ca. 1520–1609).

The Thirty Years War (1618–47) improved the position of Jews, as the Habsburgs needed them to finance military needs. The number of Jewish families who could settle in Vienna grew, and Ferdinand II (1619–37) extended the privileges of the Jews of Bohemia and Moravia in the 1620s. In Vienna, however, he ordered the Jews to move to a separate quarter (Leopoldstadt) in 1625. The end of the war saw a long-term negative turn in Habsburg Jewish policy. Leopold I (1658–1705) ordered the expulsion of the Jews from Vienna in 1669. The Jewish community was destroyed once again, and those expelled settled in Hungary, Moravia, and also *Berlin. Wealthy Jews were soon readmitted to Vienna, as the Habsburgs desperately needed money to finance their wars with *France and the *Ottoman Empire. The Jews, however, were not allowed to form an organized community and could hold prayer services only in private homes. The small Viennese community was dominated by the *Court Jews, who had a crucial role in managing Austrian state finances. Samuel Oppenheimer (1630–1703) became army contractor in 1672, and he provisioned the advancing Austrian troops against the Turks in Hungary in the 1680s. Oppenheimer was followed by Samson Wertheimer (1658–1724), who was also a scholar and philanthropist.

Charles VI (1711–1780) and his daughter Maria Theresa (1740–1780) considered the presence of Jews harmful for the monarchy, and they introduced a series of restrictive laws. In 1726/27 the infamous Familiants Laws limited the number of Jewish families that could legally reside in Bohemia and Moravia. Only one male member of each family could legally marry, and many young men had to leave as a result. Thirty thousand Moravian Jews settled in Hungary in the eighteenth century, where the Jewish population grew from 11,621 in 1735 to 80,775 in 1787. When the Habsburgs annexed Galicia in 1772, the Jewish population of the empire doubled overnight. A series of regulations and special taxes were introduced for the 200,000 Galician Jews, who lived in towns under the rule of Polish nobles and fulfilled important economic functions.

1780–1848: The reign of Joseph II (1780–90) marked the beginning of the transformation of internal Jewish life and the end of communal autonomy. The emperor's Jewish legislation was part of a larger system of reforms to modernize the state. Joseph II issued a series of Edicts of Tolerance for the Jews of the various provinces between 1781 and 1789. The emperor encouraged Jews to found factories and to take up handicrafts, agriculture, and professions like *medicine. Joseph II also forbade the use of *Yiddish and *Hebrew in public and commercial records (1781), abolished rabbinical judicial authority (1784), obliged Jews to adopt German-sounding personal and family names (1787), and introduced compulsory military service (1788). He urged Jews to set up government-supervised German-language elementary schools and declared secondary schools and institutions of higher learning open to Jews.

Germanization was also furthered by the spread of the Haskalah*, and German culture became the primary context of acculturation for Jews in the entire monarchy until the mid-nineteenth century. The German Jewish schools enjoyed the support of Ezekiel Landau (1713–1793), the conservative chief rabbi of Prague, and they became a permanent feature of Jewish cultural life in Bohemia and Moravia. The school system soon collapsed in Hungary and Galicia, but Germanization did continue in both provinces. Galician maskilim, among them Nachman *Krochmal (1785–1840) and Solomon Judah Leib Rapoport (1790–1867), furthered Germanization and opened schools (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH).

*Hasidism quickly gained popularity among Galician Jews and spread to Hungary through a massive wave of immigration in the first half of the nineteenth century. Religious reform also found supporters. Isaac Noah Mannheimer (1793–1865), who came to Vienna in 1826, introduced moderate ritual reforms (see JUDAISM, REFORM). Aaron Chorin (1766–1844) brought Reform Judaism to Hungary, where an organized and influential Orthodox resistance also emerged. The yeshivah established by Moses Sofer (the Ḥatam Sofer, 1762–1839) in Pressburg (Bratislava, Pozsony) became a major center for traditional learning.

The legal situation of Habsburg Jews did not change until the 1840s, despite their growing economic role and the increasing acculturation of a significant segment of Jewish society. It was primarily Jewish businessmen and financiers who contributed to the development of the modern capitalist economy in Bohemia, Moravia, and Austria from the last third of the eighteenth century, for which they received special privileges (see COMMERCE). The Eskeles and Arnstein families led the leading *banking house in Vienna; both the Jewish and non-Jewish elite frequented the famous salon of Fanny von Arnstein (1754–1818). Salomon Mayer *Rothschild (1774–1855) came to Vienna in 1816 and was ennobled six years later. Many members of the highly acculturated and ennobled Jewish families, however, converted to Christianity. In Hungary in the first half of the nineteenth century, Jews contributed to the expansion of agricultural production and trade as merchants, lease-holders, and petty traders on the estates of the nobility. The Hungarian parliament granted the Jews freedom of residence and the right to own urban real estate in 1840.

1848–1918: A new era began with the revolutions of 1848, which held the promise of freedom and equality. Many Jews participated in the revolution in Kraków, and they were especially prominent in Vienna, where Jews came to study from every corner of the empire. Several Jews, such as Hermann Jellinek, Ignaz Kuranda, and Adolf Fishof, were among the leaders of the Vienna revolution. The Moravian chief rabbi, Samson Raphael *Hirsch (1847–51), also played an active role, and many Jews enthusiastically supported the Hungarian war of independence. In Bohemia, Moravia, and Hungary, however, there were also serious anti-Jewish disturbances. In the end it was the imperial constitution of Emperor Francis Joseph (1848–1916) that first granted legal equality to the Jews in March 1849. It was repealed in 1851, but the special residential restrictions and taxes, gradually abolished in the 1840s, were not reinstated, even though a fine was levied on the Jews of Hungary and Galicia and their right to own landed property was suspended between 1853 and 1860.

Habsburg Jews finally gained civic equality in 1867, the year of the compromise between Austria and Hungary. Hungary received almost full independence, and Galicia was granted autonomy within the Austrian half of the monarchy, which also included the Czech lands. During the second half of the nineteenth century there were increasing migrations of Hungarian, Bohemian, and Moravian Jews to the urban centers of Budapest, Prague, Brünn (Brno), and Vienna. The imperial capital also became a magnet for Galician Jews. Prague lost its leading position in Habsburg Jewish life (with 29,107 Jewish residents in 1910), and Vienna (with 175,318 Jews in 1910) became the center of Jewish culture and politics in the monarchy. Poverty forced masses of Jews to emigrate outside the monarchy, primarily to the *United States.

After 1867, following Jews in the more advanced parts of the empire, Jews in Galicia and Hungary entered *banking, industry, and the free professions. Jews were especially prominent in the creation of the modern economy and culture in Budapest, which had the largest Jewish population in the monarchy by 1910 (203,618). Jews also contributed to the emergence of modern science, culture, and literature in Vienna. Sigmund *Freud, Gustav Mahler, Karl Kraus, Arthur Schnitzler, and Stefan Zweig (see LITERATURE: CENTRAL EUROPE) were among the cultural innovators of the time.

Jewish life and politics in the post-1867 period were dominated by fierce national conflicts and the emergence of modern *antisemitism. The Jews were caught up in the Czech–German conflict in Bohemia and Moravia. Most Moravian Jews allied with the Germans culturally and politically. In Bohemia, however, the increasing Czech political pressure initiated a new phase of acculturation. A Czech Jewish movement emerged in the 1890s, and German Jewish schools were closed down. German Jewish culture did live on, however, as demonstrated by the life and work of Prague writers such as Franz *Kafka, Max Brod, and Franz Werfel.

In Galicia, dominated by the Polish nobility, Jews were affected by the political struggle between *Poles and *Ukrainians. Jews mainly allied with the Poles in politics, and both were loyal to Austria. Polish acculturation also accelerated after emancipation, especially in the urban centers of Krakow and Lemberg (L'viv, Lwów). Yiddish retained its primacy among the Jewish masses, but German culture also remained influential. Bukovina became a separate province in 1846; Jews comprised 13% of the population by 1910, which was the highest percentage in the monarchy. Bukovina was both a Ḥasidic stronghold and the home of a politically influential and Germanized urban Jewish elite among Germans, Romanians, and Ukrainians.

The Hungarian political elite put much pressure on the Jews and the nationalities to assimilate. Jews allied with the ruling Hungarians in politics, and by the early twentieth century 77% declared Hungarian as their mother tongue. In 1868 the Hungarian government convened a Jewish congress to define the organizational structure of the Jewish community. The congress aggravated the conflict between the Neolog (the followers of moderate Reform Judaism) and the Orthodox, which resulted in an institutional schism in 1871 (see JUDAISM, NEOLOG). No such separation happened anywhere else in the monarchy. The diverse Viennese community remained institutionally intact, served by rabbis like the liberal Adolf Jellinek (1821–93) and the conservative Moritz Güdemann (1835–1918).

Antisemitism emerged all over the empire in the 1880s, and its intensification in the 1890s disrupted acculturation and accelerated the development of Jewish politics. In 1886 Rabbi Samuel Bloch (1850–1923) founded the Austrian Israelite Union, a self-defense organization. Nationalist conflicts also contributed to the emergence of Jewish nationalism, which offered a third way for Jews caught between nationalities. The first organization to promote Jewish settlement in *Palestine was founded in Galicia in 1875, where Hovevei Zion (“Lovers of Zion”) groups also started springing up in the 1890s. Jewish nationalism was the strongest in Galicia and Bukovina, where the whole spectrum of Jewish politics, from politically active Orthodoxy to socialism, flourished. The Zionist student organization Kadimah was founded in Vienna in 1882. Theodor *Herzl (1860–1904) formulated the program of political Zionism in Vienna, but most of the followers of the movement came from Eastern Europe. Bohemian Zionism emerged from the student Zionist organization, Bar Kokhba, which was founded in 1899 in Prague. The Hungarian Zionist societies convened their first congress in 1903, but *Zionism in Hungary was much weaker than in the Czech lands and Galicia.

The Jewish population of the Austro-Hungarian Empire numbered more than 2.2 million in 1910. The majority lived in Galicia and Hungary: 871,895 and 911,227, respectively. World War I (1914–18) brought much suffering for Habsburg Jews, 300,000 of whom fought in the imperial army. After the collapse of the monarchy in 1918, Jews had to adapt to the new political and national contexts of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the *Balkans, *Romania, and Poland.

For further reading, see H. J. Kieval, Languages of Community: The Jewish Experience in the Czech Lands (2000); O. McCagg, Jr., A History of Habsburg Jews, 1670–1918 (1992); R. S. Wistrich, The Jews of Vienna in the Age of Franz Joseph (1989); I. Bartal and A. Polonsky, eds., Focusing on Galicia: Jews, Poles, and Ukrainians, 1772–1918, Polin: Studies in Polish Jewry 12 (1999); and M. L. Rozenblit, Reconstructing a National Identity: The Jews of Habsburg Austria during World War I (2001). Maps 8, 10 KATI VÖRÖS

Haftarah (pl. haftarot) is a selection from the *Prophets section of the *Bible that is chanted or read in the *synagogue after the *Torah reading on *Sabbath and *festival mornings and on both the mornings and afternoons of the *fast days of *Yom Kippur and *Tisha B'Av. The haftarah is usually read by the maftir, the final Torah reader; this reader may be a *Bar or *Bat Mitzvah. Special blessings introduce and conclude the haftarah, and it is chanted according to a system of cantillation (trop) that differs from that used for the Torah. The origins for this custom are unknown; some scholars believe the haftarah was added after 168 BCE when Torah reading was prohibited by Antiochus IV Epiphanes prior to the *Hasmonean era and that the word comes from Greek, meaning “addition.” Others suggest that the haftarah was created as a response to Jewish sects who rejected the canonicity of the Prophets. Originally, there were no set haftarot, and the selection would be chosen by the final Torah reader. After the Torah was divided into weekly portions in rabbinic times, corresponding haftarot were chosen for each Torah portion, generally based on shared thematic elements with the Torah reading or the festival or fast day being observed (BT Megillah 29b). The haftarot do not include the Prophets section in its entirety, and the specific weekly haftarah may vary among different Jewish communities. ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Hagar first appears in *Genesis 16 as *Sarah's *Egyptian maidservant. As a remedy for her *infertility, *Sarah (Sarai) asks *Abraham (Abram) to have intimate relations with Hagar; she assumes that if Hagar bears a child, that child will be seen as her own. When Hagar becomes pregnant, however, it soon becomes evident that “her mistress is lowered in her esteem” (16:4). Sarah responds by treating Hagar harshly and Hagar flees into the wilderness. There she encounters an angel of *God who tells her to return to Sarah and to submit to her harsh treatment. The angel promises that Hagar will have many offspring and that she will bear a son named *Ishmael. Hagar returns and gives birth but after Sarah bears *Isaac, she finds the presence of Hagar and her son in Abraham's household unbearable (Gen 21: 9ff). God tells a reluctant Abraham to accede to Sarah's request to expel Hagar and Ishmael. In the wilderness once more and fearing for her son's survival, Hagar again has an encounter with an angel of God, who reassures her that Ishmael will become a great nation. Genesis 21:21 relates that when Ishmael grew up, his mother obtained a wife for him from Egypt.

This problematic story seems to have several purposes. On an etiological level, it explains the paternal connection between Abraham and the Arab people, who are said to descend from Ishmael. It establishes the tradition of infertile wives (see INFERTILITY) who bear children only when God deems the moment propitious and emphasizes the necessity of faith in divine promises. The narrative also introduces the motif of the triumph of the younger son over the elder, another indication of God's direction of history. The biblical author paints an unpleasant portrait of Sarah, who demonstrates unjust harshness to Hagar and cruelly demands Hagar's expulsion. Missing is any significant concern about Hagar's lack of agency in becoming Abraham's sexual partner or her inability to protect her position in Abraham's household. This is because this story also introduces a polemic against exogamy and the dangers of foreign women to the destiny of Israel, which, at the very moment of its birth as a nation, was threatened with contamination from an outside source. This narrative is another example of how Genesis recounts a lineage and succession constantly in jeopardy and miraculously preserved by the intervention of God.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Haggai is the tenth of the twelve minor prophetic books (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS). The prophet is named in 1:1 of the book and mentioned also in *Ezra 5:1 and 6:14. His message is dated to 520 BCE in the second year of Darius I, king of *Persia, and addressed to the high priest, Joshua, and the governor, *Zerubbabel. With soaring rhetoric Haggai exhorts the people of *Yehud, the community of returned Jewish exiles in *Jerusalem, to rebuild the *Temple, which has lain in ruins nearly seventy years; he explains that many of their difficulties in the post-exilic community arise from their failure to do so (1). Haggai goes on to promise the people future blessings when the Temple is repaired and rebuilt (2:1–9); he then seeks a ruling of the *priests on a matter of ritual *purity (2:10–14). He concludes with a messianic passage that designates Zerubbabel, a descendant of King *David, as the symbol of future hope, by calling him “signet” (2:23).

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Hai ben Sherira was one of the last and greatest of the Babylonian *Geonim (d. 1038). He succeeded his father as head of the *Pumbedita academy and for more than thirty years served as its head and as the most prominent scholar in the Jewish world. His surviving writings include more than a thousand *responsa on a wide range of talmudic and legal topics, two important legal monographs (on sales and judicial oaths), and a number of poems. His other writings, of which only fragments survive, include additional legal monographs and what may have been the first dictionary of *Hebrew and *Aramaic ever written.

ROBERT BRODY

Halakhah, the word used to refer to Jewish law, comes from the Hebrew root meaning “to walk” or “to go”; this indicates that Jewish law prescribes a path through life, detailing what an individual should and should not do, according to divine commandments (mitzvot*) as they have been interpreted and applied by legal scholars throughout the ages.

Halakhah occupies a central place in Jewish identity. Although theological convictions define Jewish understandings of *God, humanity, the *environment, and the relationships among them, Judaism has never defined itself in terms of official creeds. Instead, the focus is on actions. At the same time, *Judaism, in general, and Jewish norms of conduct, in particular, are not defined exclusively by halakhah. Stories, proverbs, *prayers, *thought, history, and ethical and theological convictions all shape how Jews understand themselves and determine how they should act.

According to traditional count the *Torah contains 613 commandments (BT Makkot 23b; also Yevamot 47b, Nedarim 25a, Shevu'ot 29a). In addition, some biblical *narratives serve as models for human actions. *Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah to bury *Sarah (Genesis 23) demonstrated how to acquire property; the marital negotiations between Abraham's servant and Laban in securing *Rebekah as a wife for *Isaac (Genesis 24:47–61) exemplified the legal expectations of both sides in a *marriage. These stories, and the fact that *Moses was judging cases (Exodus 18) before the *Decalogue was announced (Exodus 19–10), indicate that in addition to the stated commandments, there was also a long oral tradition of accepted social norms, a form of “common law” or *custom (minhag).

The first officially recognized collection of legal traditions is the *Mishnah, edited by Rabbi *Judah ha-Nasi (“president” or “prince”) of the *Sanhedrin, in approximately 200 CE. Divided into six sections or orders (sedarim), and subdivided into sixty-three tractates (masekhtot), the Mishnah organizes Jewish law by topic and records the law as it was lived in response to both written and oral traditions. These traits made it the basis for all future discussions of halakhah, especially the *Jerusalem Talmud (c. 400 CE) and the more complete and authoritative *Babylonian Talmud (c. 500 CE). Both of these legal compilations discuss the basis in the Torah for the Mishnah's laws, define the parameters of its rulings, and apply them to new circumstances.

During the Middle Ages, Jewish law took two primary forms. The most important way in which Jewish law developed was through *responsa literature, or teshuvot – literally, “answers” to questions posed to rabbis. In addition to the responses to questions recorded in the Talmud, separate questions and their answers have been recorded in responsa from the early Middle Ages to our own time. The great advantage of this genre of literature is that a rabbi in one community could consult an expert in a given area of law and receive an answer responding to his specific case. This practice continues in the present, and now both the questions and answers are often communicated through phone conversations and e-mail, as well as in writing. The great disadvantage of this genre has been that until recently it was difficult to know about all the responsa written on a given topic. Now, however, there are computer programs that give access to more than 300,000 responsa up to the Early Modern period, and contemporary responsa are often available on the internet.

From time to time rabbis would write restatements of the law, or *codes, in which they tried to summarize some or all of Jewish law. The most famous and authoritative of these codes are *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah (1180), *Jacob ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim (the “Tur,” d. 1340; printed 1475), and Joseph *Karo's Shulhan Arukh (1565), with glosses by Moses *Isserles to indicate where the practices of Jews of northern Europe (*Ashkenazim) differed from those of the Jews of the Mediterranean basin (*Sephardim) that Karo had recorded. The codes have the advantage of summarizing the law in one place, but they cannot deal with the specifics of a particular case. Thus, they lead to a deductive kind of reasoning that is foreign to the case-based foundations of Jewish law in the Torah and Talmud and the casuistic mode of reasoning that characterizes the responsa.

In modern countries that maintain a separation of church and state, the laws of the country govern most areas of life. Religious laws of various denominations apply only to those who choose to abide by them and then only in matters of ritual and personal status matters such as *marriage and *divorce. Jewish law, however, is a complete legal system, with laws governing not only rituals and family law but also civil and criminal law. Thus, the Torah and all the subsequent iterations of halakhah mentioned here include norms defining how one can acquire or sell property, rent an apartment, and recover compensation for property damages or personal injuries, as well as the penalties for a variety of crimes. Halakhah also includes laws governing *court procedures to ensure that justice is done.

In earlier eras, Jews were generally granted internal autonomy over their own communities, as long as they paid taxes to the ruling power. This meant that Jewish law was enforced on Jews by Jewish authorities through a system of *communal organization that was backed by the government. Now that Jews are citizens of the countries in which they live, they are governed by the state in civil and criminal matters. This means that individual Jews must determine for themselves how much authority halakhah will have in other areas of their lives. This has led to great diversity in Jewish practice and in Jewish interpretations of the ongoing authority of halakhah. Orthodox, Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform *Judaisms differ on these issues, within denominations as well as with the other movements. For further reading about Jewish law and its development, see E. N. Dorff and A. Rosett, A Living Tree: The Roots and Growth of Jewish Law (1988); M. Elon, Jewish Law: History, Sources, Principles, 4 vols. (1994); and E. N. Dorff, The Unfolding Tradition: Jewish Law after Sinai (2005); see also DINA DE-MALKHUTA DINA. ELLIOT N. DORFF

Halevi, Judah (ca. 1085–1141), was one of the most renowned and prolific Hebrew poets of medieval *Spain (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD) and the author of the highly influential philosophical treatise Kuzari, written in *Judeo-Arabic. Halevi, a physician and communal leader, was born and lived most of his life in Toledo, then under Christian rule. In 1140 Halevi decided to leave Spain and spend the rest of his life in the Land of *Israel. Documents preserved in the Cairo *Genizah indicate that he spent time in *Egypt before leaving for the Land of Israel in May 1141; he apparently died there not long after his arrival.

Halevi initially began the Kuzari, also known as The Book of Refutation and Proof in Defense of the Despised Faith, to respond to the claims of *Karaism, but over a twenty-year period, the book developed into a complex discussion of religious, intellectual, and cultural issues. The framework of the work is a reported historical event – the conversion of the *Khazars to Judaism. In Halevi's version, the Khazar king is told in a dream that his intentions are worthy, but his actions are deficient. To discover the proper path of action, he calls a philosopher, an imam, a priest, and a rabbi to help him determine what to do. The philosopher's exposition of Aristotelian theory is identified as persuasive, but not what the king is seeking. The claims of *Islam and *Christianity are subsequently seen as derivative from the primary *revelation of *Torah, leading the king to focus on *Judaism. The remainder of the book is a dialogue between the king and the haver, a representative of the Jewish tradition.

In the course of the discussion, the haver differentiates between a propositional statement of belief arrived at through rational speculation (it'aqad) and faith (iman) derived through a prophetic experience. Ha-Levi does not negate the value of *reason and metaphysics and recognizes the importance of mathematics and logic. He acknowledges philosophy as a valuable process through which human beings can come to an advanced understanding of God and the world. Nonetheless, Aristotelian methodology is seen as ultimately deficient because human beings with their limited rational abilities are unable to determine absolute truth. Philosophy is accepted as an epistemological precursor to a higher stage of knowledge. However, the highest level of understanding is limited to members in a divine order (al-'amr al-'ilâhî); it is revealed through *prophecy and governs all of existence. Halevi argues that the revelation experienced by the Jewish people at Sinai was an historical event preserved by an unbroken tradition; it is anchored in the biological heritage of Israel and is kept vibrant through ritual behaviors and practices. This argument allows Halevi to defend Jewish particularity – the chosenness of individual *prophets, the people of Israel, the Land of Israel, the *Hebrew language, and the *commandments – as part of this supernatural order of being. The faithfulness of Jews to the prophetic tradition, their observance of revealed commandments, and the certainty of *messianic *redemption – despite the humiliation of present exile – convinces the king to accept Judaism as true.

Some paradoxes are evident. Although Halevi argues that only those born into Judaism can become prophets, his work is a narrative about conversion, and he affirms that the true religion is open to all who seek to join its adherents. In addition, Halevi is usually portrayed as an anti-Aristotelian thinker, but his sophisticated argumentation uses philosophy and recognizes its value, even if it has inferior status to the knowledge of God that comes through the revelation of the divine order that determines and defines existence.

For further reading, see R. P. Scheindlin, The Song of the Distant Dove (2007); A. Shear, The Kuzari and the Shaping of Jewish Identity, 1167–1900 (2008); Y. Silman, Philosopher and Prophet: Judah Halevi, the Kuzari, and the Evolution of His Thought (1995); and B. S. Kogan, "Judah Halevi and His Use of Philosophy in the Kuzari," in The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Jewish Philosophy, ed. D.H. Frank and O. Leaman (2003); see also THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL.

BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Hallel, literally "praise," refers to *Psalms 113–118 and is recited in the *synagogue on *festivals and *Hanukkah. This particular grouping of psalms is also known as the "Egyptian Hallel" because it mentions the Exodus from *Egypt (Ps 114:1). These psalms were apparently sung as Jewish pilgrims brought *Passover offerings to the *Jerusalem *Temple. On the last six days of Passover and on *Rosh Hodesh (the *New Moon), a "half hallel" is recited, omitting the first halves of Psalms 115 and 116. Since the establishment of the State of *Israel, many congregations also recite hallel on Israel Independence Day; hallel is omitted on *Purim because the reading of the book of *Esther itself is deemed hallel (BT Megillah 14a). There is also a "daily hallel" (Pss 145–150) recited each morning and a "great hallel" (Ps 136) recited as part of the Passover seder and each *Sabbath morning.

PAUL STEINBERG

Hammurabi was a *Babylonian king who ruled for forty years in the seventeenth or sixteenth century BCE. A stele containing his legal rulings, the most extensive collection of laws recovered from Babylonian society, was discovered in 1901 and is now in the Louvre Museum in Paris. Hammurabi's code resembles biblical law, although it is more casuistic (case-oriented) and retributive and not as broadly applicable as Mosaic legislation. The code does not link religious service or ethical behavior to obedience to its precepts.

The majority of its laws regard property, personal damage, and human relationships, and the laws are flanked by a prologue and epilogue praising the righteousness of the king and invoking the Babylonian pantheon of deities. See also LAW: ANCIENT *NEAR EAST and HEBREW *BIBLE. Map 1

KATE FRIEDMAN

Hannah is the main character in the story of *Samuel's birth in 1 Samuel 1:1–2:21. The wife of Elhanan and co-wife of Peninah, she overcomes *infertility through a vow made at the *Shiloh shrine during her family's annual journey there to offer *sacrifices. In fervent *prayer she promises that, if she bears a son, the child will be dedicated to *God as a *Nazirite. Her prayer is answered, and when the son is weaned, she brings him to Shiloh to begin his life of service to God; she also offers a sacrifice in gratitude. This narrative of a woman overcoming barrenness conveys the importance of Samuel, who will play a leading role in Israel's transition to statehood. At the same time, it provides a poignant insight into the activities of a good woman, illuminates the pain of infertility, and reveals a woman's agency and autonomy in approaching God and securing divine help.

CAROL MEYERS

Ḥanukkah, literally "dedication," also known as Ḥag Ha-Urim or the Festival of Lights, is an eight-day holiday commemorating the rededication of the Second *Temple in the second century BCE. Ḥanukkah's great appeal lies in its unique symbols and its message of freedom from religious oppression. It takes place from 25 *Kislev to 2 *Tevet.

The earliest sources for Ḥanukkah are the First and Second Books of *Maccabees (ca. 100–125 BCE), which provide parallel accounts of the Maccabean history, from approximately 180–160 BCE. They recall a Jewish rebellion under the Maccabee family against the *Seleucid ruler Antiochus and his attempts to impose aspects of *Hellenism on the Jewish population in the Land of Israel. The Maccabees achieved several military victories over Antiochus's army, finally recapturing Jerusalem and cleansing and rededicating the Temple on the 25th of Kislev, 165 BCE, precisely three years to the day after Antiochus erected a statue of Zeus in the Temple. Ḥanukkah commemorates this triumphant moment and the eight days of celebration that followed, which was probably a correlation to the eight-day festival of *Sukkot (2 Macc 10:5–7).

Rather than emphasizing the military victories, rabbinic *Judaism focused on the survival of Jewish spiritual values. The *Talmud claims that when the Maccabees rededicated the Temple and rekindled its *menorah, one day's worth of oil miraculously lasted for eight days, representing God's presence in the victory (BT Shabbat 21b). Thus, oil and candles serve as significant Ḥanukkah emblems and are found in the practice of lighting the ḥanukkiyah or Ḥanukkah *menorah, beginning with one light on the first night and culminating in eight illuminations on the final night (in fact, there is always an additional ancillary light, the shamash, from which the other lights are kindled). It is customary to eat food fried in oil, such as potato pancakes (latkes in Yiddish) and fried doughnuts. A minor festival from a religious perspective, Ḥanukkah is intended to be a joyous occasion, with songs, games (e.g., the dreidl, a spinning top), sweets, and gift giving to children, especially monetary gifts (gelt in Yiddish). In recent times, particularly in North America, there has been an attempt to equate Ḥanukkah to Christmas because they occur at the same general time and to offer Jewish children a parallel experience. Of course, the holidays are completely different, and this comparison accentuates an inherent contradiction, because Ḥanukkah represents the historic Jewish insistence against assimilation.

For further reading, see Paul Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Winter Holidays (2007); Noam Zion and Barbara Spectre, eds., A Different Light: The Hanukkah Book of Celebration (2000); and Philip Goodman, The Hanukkah Anthology (1992).

PAUL STEINBERG

Ḥanukkah and Women. Several traditions tie women to the Ḥanukkah miracle. The book of Judith in the *Apocrypha, which describes how Judith of Bethulia killed the military commander Holofernes, is connected with the Maccabean victory because her act was believed to have taken place during the rebellion (see HASMONEAN DYNASTY; MACCABEES) that the festival commemorates. Similarly the heroism of Hannah, the mother of seven sons, who saw all her children slaughtered in one day for refusing to apostasize (2 Macc 7; 4 Macc 8–18), is linked with Ḥanukkah. The Kitzur Shulḥan Arukh 139:3 preserves the following tradition about women's key role in the festival, apparently conflating the story of Judith with other literary elements: "It is permitted to do work during Ḥanukkah, but women observe the custom not to work while the Ḥanukkah lights are burning in the synagogue, and it is not proper to be lenient with them about it. Women are more scrupulous about it because the decree affected them severely, for they decreed that a maiden before her marriage must first have conjugal intercourse with the governor. Another reason for this is that the miracle was performed through a woman. The daughter of Joḥanan the High Priest was a very beautiful maiden and the cruel king requested that she lie with him. She told him that she would fulfill his request, and she fed him dishes made of cheese so that he would become thirsty and drink wine until he fell asleep, drunk. Thus it happened, and she cut off his head and brought it to Jerusalem. When their general saw that their king had been killed, they all fled. Therefore it is customary to eat dairy dishes on Ḥanukkah, in memory of the miracle performed by means of dairy foods."

Several customary practices in various Jewish communities during Ḥanukkah gave special attention to women and girls. These included bestowing special gifts on daughters and wives among Tunisian Jews, and women's gatherings that featured consumption of delicacies made with cheese, singing, and dancing in Eastern Europe. JUDITH R. BASKIN Ḥaredi (pl. Ḥaredim; literally, "Those who tremble" (in awe at the word of God [Isa 66:2 and 66:5])," is a term used to describe the most stringent forms of Orthodox Judaism. See JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX.

Ḥasdai ibn Shaprut: See SPAIN, MUSLIM

Ḥasidei Ashkenaz: See MIDDLE AGES: ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ

Ḥasidism: Europe. This pietistic movement, based on popularized forms of Jewish *mysticism, originated in the teachings of R. Israel ben Eliezer (ca. 1700–1750), known as the *Baal Shem Tov (or by the acronym, Besht) of Międzybórz, Podolia (present-day *Ukraine). The Besht and his disciples radically simplified the *Kabbalah and renounced asceticism, asserting that God should be worshiped with a joyful countenance. They held that uniquely endowed individuals known as tzaddikim ("righteous ones"; *rebbe*s in Yiddish) could achieve devekut, the ecstatic state of supreme communion, even through apparently mundane activities, and then draw down divine bounty to benefit their followers. As Hasidism was forged into a mass movement by disciples like R. *Dov Ber, the "Great Maggid" (preacher) of Międzyrzecz, even ordinary Jews were said to be capable of attaining spiritual heights and receiving divine bounty by associating with a tzaddik. Hasidic courts and eventually dynasties emerged with distinctive teachings, modes of worship, songs and melodies (niggunim), dances, and political stances. After the partitions of *Poland-*Lithuania (1772, 1793, 1795) by *Russia, *Prussia, and *Austria, these dynasties exhibited pronounced regional characteristics as well.

Two related historical phenomena also led to Hasidism's emergence. The dissemination of printed kabbalistic works led to an increase in mystical praxis throughout the Jewish communities of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (see PRINTING). Elitist kabbalists known as hasidim established mystical cells, studied privileged kabbalistic texts, favored ascetic practices, and employed the kabbalistic liturgy of the sixteenth-century *Safed mystic Isaac *Luria (1534–1572). Itinerant mystical healers known as baalei shem ("Masters of God's Names") became increasingly prominent as well, performing exorcisms, selling amulets, and offering herbal remedies for illness, difficulty in childbirth, and so on. The Besht himself was famous as a baal shem*. However, he increasingly took on a more public role, conveying prayers to their destinations, attempting to stave off catastrophes like *ritual murder accusations, intervening in appointments of ritual slaughterers and arrendas (leases on manorial estates), and propounding his nonascetic hasidism. The expanded role of the baal shem evolved through his disciples into the role of tzaddik.

The second precursor to Hasidism was *Sabbateanism – the messianic mysticism of *Shabbetai Zevi, and later of Jacob *Frank, who appeared in Poland-Lithuania in 1755. Sabbateans embraced an increasingly antinomian doctrine, claiming that *God could be worshiped by committing sinful acts, including sexual deviance. The Besht and his disciples neutralized Sabbateanism's more radical *antinomianism and apocalypticism. Because divine sparks were present in all things, they taught that God could be worshiped through mundane but licit activities like eating, drinking, singing, dancing, engaging in business, and even engaging in marital sexual intercourse, if accompanied by proper intention (kavannah). The tzaddik replaced the messianic pretender. His authority was still charisma based, and he still demanded complete devotion, but he usually stopped short of making apocalyptic claims. However, several tzaddikim did tacitly accept messianic attributions; thus, three hundred Hasidim under the leadership of R. Menahem Mendel of Vitebsk did embark on a messianic-inspired journey to the Land of *Israel in 1777. However, most tzaddikim strove to provide their followers with temporary redemption in the here and now.

With the emergence of the tzaddik as a public leader by the end of the eighteenth century, Hasidism became a full-fledged movement. The tzaddik amalgamated several preexistent spiritual leadership roles: baal shem, rabbi, preacher (maggid), and judge. He established a court to which pilgrims would travel for inspiration, blessings, and miracles and granted followers personal audiences regardless of their social status. Pilgrims, who were disproportionately women and young men, approached the tzaddik with written requests for his divine intercession, accompanied by a fee known as "redemption money" (pidyon). The tzaddik was believed capable of miracles like healing, exorcisms, and guaranteeing business success or fertility. He demonstrated his attainment of devekut by performing standard Jewish rituals with extreme devotion, usually accompanied by convulsions and gesticulations. He was also revered for his mystical homiletics delivered in *Yiddish at the third meal (seudat shlishit) of the *Sabbath, after which disciples would rush to record the sermons in *Hebrew. The translations were compiled, circulated in manuscript form, and eventually published to promote the movement, inspire adherents, and, if the tzaddik was deceased, honor his memory. Visits to the graves of tzaddikim with written petitions for divine intercession also became standard practice.

R. Dov Ber, the Great Maggid of Międzyrzecz, was the most successful early tzaddik. Each of his own major disciples became a recognized tzaddik with his own court, regional jurisdiction, and distinctive style. So popular was R. Aaron of Karlin (d. 1772) that Hasidim in historical Lithuania became known as "Karliners." After R. Menahem Mendel of Vitebsk emigrated, his disciple R. Schneur *Zalman of Liady (1745–1813) assumed leadership in what is today northern *Belarus and propagated the systematic Hasidic formulation known as Ḥabad (an acronym for hokhmah [wisdom], binah [understanding], and da'at [knowledge]). R. Elimelech of Lezajsk (1717–1786), who first set the tzaddik idea on a theoretical foundation, established the first Hasidic court in *Galicia (Austrian Poland). The Besht's great-grandson R. *Naḥman of Bratslav (1772–1810), whose allegorical tales are often considered the first works of modern Jewish literature, carried Hasidism southeastward into the Bratslav Palatinate. Among the most famous Hasidim in the more urbanized and industrialized region of Central Poland were R. Levi Isaac of Żelechów (later, of Berdyczów, 1740–1810), R. Israel "the Maggid" of Kozenice (1733/7–1815), and R. Jacob Isaac "the Seer" of Lublin (1745–1815). Several disciples of the Seer of Lublin, including R. Jacob Isaac "the Holy Jew" of Przysucha (1765–1814) and R. Simḥa Bunem of Przysucha (1766–1827), broke away and formed a more rationalistic, *Talmud-centered school of Hasidism. Yet other disciples of the Seer, including R. Meir of Opatów/Stopnica (1760–1831), rejected this internal reform and preserved the miracle-centered approach.

The first attempted bans against Hasidism, initiated by R. Elijah, the *Vilna Gaon (1720–1797), complained that Hasidim established separate prayer houses that employed the Lurianic liturgy; changed the prescribed times of *prayer; behaved flamboyantly during prayer, even turning somersaults; performed ritual slaughter with specially honed knives; neglected Torah study and disrespected Torah scholars; had Sabbatean ties; indulged in excessive merrymaking and pipe smoking; and followed greedy miracle-working tzaddikim. Subsequent bans followed the publication of the first Hasidic theology, Toldot Ya'akov Yosef (1780) and of R. Shneur Zalman of Liady's Tanya (1796). The latter inspired the publication of classic anti-Hasidic pamphlets like R. Israel

Loebel of Sluck's Sefer Vikuah and R. David of Maków's Zemir Arizim (both published in 1798). Because the specific allegations of mitnaggedim (opponents of Hasidism) rarely constituted outright ritual infractions, it is likely that they were informed more by anxiety over the movement's popularization of privileged kabbalistic practices, successful institutionalization of magic and folk religion, and eventual displacement of non-Hasidic communal leaders. When the Vilna kahal* issued a herem* (ban of excommunication) in October 1797, the Hasidim appealed successfully to the tsarist government, which had outlawed such bans in 1795. The resulting denunciations and counter-denunciations culminated in the arrest and brief imprisonment of R. Schneur Zalman of Liady in 1798 and 1801. Yet Hasidic congregations were explicitly permitted by the 1804 statute of Tsar Alexander I. Vigorous opposition gradually gave way to tolerance and accommodation, possibly as a result of the appearance of a common enemy: advocates of Enlightenment-based reform known as maskilim. Anti-Hasidism emerged as a central and defining feature of Haskalah* literature. Galician maskilim like Mendel Lefin and Joseph Perl were especially assertive, with the latter writing the famous Hasidic satire, Revealer of Secrets, in 1819. However, maskilic polemics did little to stem the spread of Hasidism, because absolutist Eastern European rulers ultimately preferred the political quietism of Hasidim to the potential radicalism of maskilim.

Notwithstanding their insularity, Hasidic communities were deeply affected by the partitions of Poland. In the Ukraine, Belarus, and Galicia, now ruled by absolutist Russia and Habsburg* Austria, tzaddikim emulated the regal style and hereditary-based succession patterns of their absolutist monarchs. R. Barukh of Międzybóž (d. 1811) established his own court, employed a jester, drove a carriage in regal display, and emphasized his hereditary descent from the Besht. Lubavitch Hasidism, despite its rationalistic and systematic approach to theology, first institutionalized a dynasty in 1813 when R. Schneur Zalman of Liady's son, R. Dov Ber of Lubavitch (1773–1828), prevailed in a succession conflict. Each of R. Mordecai of Chernobyl's (1770–1837) eight sons established his own royal court. R. Israel of Ruzhin (1797–1851) exceeded all in his regal behavior, basing his authority on his descent from the Great Maggid of Międzyrzecz and presiding over a luxurious court in a palace, funded by donations, pidyonot, and taxation of communities under his domain. The dangers of such visibility were revealed in 1838, when R. Israel was implicated in the deaths of two alleged informers against the Jewish community and imprisoned for nearly two years. R. Israel fled tsarist Russia in 1842, reestablishing his court in Sadigora, under Habsburg control.

In contrast, Hasidism in Central Poland emerged predominantly under constitutional regimes like the Napoleonic Duchy of Warsaw* and the "Congress" Kingdom of Poland; it was shaped by the region's economic liberalism and the industrial revolution. Polish tzaddikim were groomed, funded, and defended by the region's premier entrepreneurs, in particular a woman named Temerel Sonenberg-Bergson. These patrons preferred succession by star disciples rather than by sons and enabled the emergence of a more worldly Hasidic leadership. The multilingual R. Simḥa Bunem of Przysucha (1766–1813) was initially a lumber merchant and licensed pharmacist. R. Isaac Kalish of Warka (1779–1848) became one of the premier lobbyists on behalf of Polish Jewry by capitalizing on constitutional guarantees. Even more insular tzaddikim, like R. Jacob Isaac, the Seer of Lublin (1745–1815); R. Jacob Isaac Rabinowicz, the Holy Jew of Przysucha (1766–1813); and R. Menaḥem Mendel of Kotsk (Kock, 1787–1859), eschewed the royal displays and the hereditary claims of tzaddikim who lived under absolutist rule. Although sons of Polish tzaddikim attempted to succeed their fathers, most followers gravitated to a premier disciple on their deaths. This regional distinctiveness waned with the incorporation of the kingdom of Poland into the Russian Empire in the wake of the failed Polish Insurrection of 1863. One of R. Menaḥem Mendel of Kotsk's disciples, R. Mordecai Leiner (1800–1854), broke away from the reclusive tzaddik, moved to Izbica, and established a dynasty known for radical teachings. On R. Menaḥem Mendel's death, another premier disciple, the scholarly R. Isaac Meir Alter (1789–1866), founded the Ger dynasty. When R. Isaac Meir died in 1866, R. Hanokh Henokh of Aleksander (1798–1870) assumed leadership. However, R. Isaac Meir's grandson, R. Judah Leib Alter (1847–1905), the Sefat Emet, eventually became the Gerer tzaddik.

After Polish independence in 1918, the Ger and Aleksander dynasties were the most popular ones. In this period, the Gerer tzaddik R. Abraham Mordecai Alter (1866–1948) helped form the political party Agudat Israel* (established in Katowice, 1912), which published a party newspaper, elected representatives to the Polish Sejm, and won control of many local educational and religious institutions. R. Abraham Mordecai was also unique in endorsing the Beit Yaakov school for Hasidic girls, whose education had until now been largely neglected, and in his relative toleration of Zionism*, which was vilified by other Hasidic leaders. The sixth Lubavitcher tzaddik, Joseph Isaac Schneerson (1880–1950), surreptitiously supplied underground yeshivot and abetted religious observance in the newly formed Soviet Union at the height of its antireligious campaign. R. Joseph Isaac later fled to Poland; he escaped from the Warsaw* ghetto to Riga, Latvia*, in 1940 and then to America with the assistance of a half-Jewish Nazi officer, Abwehr Major Ernst Bloch. One of the few other Hasidic leaders who survived the Holocaust* was Rabbi Joel Moshe Teitelbaum of Satmar (Satu Mare, Romania*/Hungary*; 1887–1979), who was rescued from the Bergen-Belsen* concentration camp through a transport arranged by Zionist leader Rudolf Kastner (1906–1957). Nevertheless, the Satmar tzaddik continued to condemn Zionism, which he believed had provoked the Holocaust by inciting God's destructive wrath.

Recent scholarship includes M. Rosman, Founder of Hasidism (1996); D. Assaf, The Regal Way: The Life and Times of Rabbi Israel of Ruzhin (2002); G. Dynner, Men of Silk: The Hasidic Conquest of Polish Jewish Society (2006); and G. Hundert, ed., Essential Papers on Hasidism (1991). Map 11

GLENN DYNNER

Hasidism, Europe: Women. The development of the pietistic/mystical movement Hasidism in eighteenth-century Poland* had a profound and lasting impact on Eastern* European Jewry. Hasidism brought no improvements for women's status, however, and in some ways intensified negative views of women already present in Jewish mysticism* and traditional rabbinic* Judaism. Yet, Hasidic tradition does preserve descriptions of daughters, mothers, and sisters of rabbinic leaders who are said to have themselves led Ḥasidic communities and to have adopted rigorous standards of personal piety. Among them was Sarah Frankel Sternberg (1838–1937), daughter of Rabbi Joshua Heschel Teumim Frankel and wife of the tzaddik Ḥayyim Samuel Sternberg of Chenciny, a disciple of the famed Seer of Lublin. After her husband's death, she is said to have functioned successfully as a rebbe in Chenciny and was highly regarded for her piety and asceticism. Her daughter, Ḥannah Brakhah, the wife of R. Elimelekh of Grodzinsk, was an active participant in the life of her husband's court. A. Rapoport-Albert has pointed out that there is little written documentation about these women and that their authority was based on their connection to revered male leaders.

The one apparent example of a woman who crossed gender boundaries to achieve religious leadership in a Ḥasidic sect with some success was the well-educated, pious, and wealthy Ḥannah Rachel *Verbermacher (1815–1888?), known as the Holy Maid of Ludmir. Verbermacher, who acquired a reputation for saintliness and miracle working, attracted both men and women to her “court,” to whom she would lecture from behind a closed door. Reaction from the male Ḥasidic leaders of her region was uniformly negative, and pressure was successfully applied on Ḥannah to resume her rightful female role in marriage. Although her marriages were unsuccessful, they had the intended result of ending her career as a religious leader, at least in *Poland. Around 1860, Verbermacher moved to Jerusalem where she reestablished herself as a holy woman. Here, too, she attracted a following of Ḥasidic women and men, as well as *Sephardi and possibly some Muslim Arab women, and led gatherings at the Western Wall, the Tomb of Rachel, and her own study house.

Hasidism, with its emphasis on mystical transcendence and on male attendance on the rabbinic leader – the tzaddik or rebbe – to the exclusion of the family unit, contributed to the breakdown of Jewish social life in nineteenth-century Eastern Europe. Similar tensions between family responsibility and devotion to Torah were also present among the non-Ḥasidic learned elite of this milieu, where wives tended to assume the responsibility for supporting their families while husbands were studying away from home. D. Biale has noted that the sexual asceticism of the homosocial Ḥasidic courts and rabbinic yeshivot of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries offered young men a welcome withdrawal from family tensions and the threats of modernity. However, attitudes toward human sexuality they found in these environments were often openly misogynistic, incorporating many demonic images of women from rabbinic, *kabbalistic, and Jewish *folklore traditions.

For further reading, see D. Biale, Eros and the Jews (1992); N. Deutsch, The Maiden of Ludmir (2003); and A. Rapoport-Albert. “On Women in Hassidism...” in Jewish History, ed. A. Rapoport-Albert and S. Zipperstein (1988), 495–525.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Hasidism: North America. Before World War II, Ḥasidism was centered in *Eastern Europe with only a few thousand Ḥasidism living in *New York City and *Jerusalem. Since Ḥasidic culture was flourishing in Eastern Europe, and most Ḥasidic rebbes there strongly discouraged their followers from emigrating, the overwhelming majority of Ḥasidim did not join early-twentieth-century waves of Jewish immigration to North America. For these reasons, only a small remnant of Eastern Europe's Ḥasidim survived the *Holocaust. The majority of these survivors emigrated either to *Israel or to the *United States. Many of the pre-war sects vanished, but some managed to set up new roots in North America. Members of sects whose leaders had perished in Europe often affiliated with one of these surviving groups.

Brooklyn, New York, is home to the major Ḥasidic communities in North America. Estimating population numbers for Ḥasidim as a whole and for specific sects is difficult; different writers come up with different figures. R. Eisenberg suggests that there are about 250,000 Ḥasidim in North America, 150,000 of whom live in Brooklyn alone. In Brooklyn, about 80,000 Ḥasidim live in Borough Park, 45,000 in Williamsburg, 15,000 in Crown Heights, and 10,000 in other neighborhoods like Flatbush. The rest of *New York City, Long Island, and New Jersey are home to about 25,000 Ḥasidim.

Rockland County, about forty miles north of New York City, includes some notable suburban Ḥasidic enclaves. A. L. Nadler has estimated the population size of several of these communities: Kiryas Joel, in Monroe, is home to about 10,000 Satmar Ḥasidim; Squaketown, near Spring Valley, has about 4,000 Skverer Ḥasidim; and Monsey has a range of Ultra-Orthodox Jews, including approximately 15,000 Ḥasidim, who come from Lubavitch, Satmar, Skverer, Belzer, Gerer, and other groups. Beyond the New York area, Ḥasidic enclaves can be found in *Los Angeles, *Chicago, Baltimore, Detroit, Cleveland, Miami, St. Louis, *Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Denver, and *Boston. Eisenberg estimates that 20,000 Ḥasidim live in *Canada, predominantly in Montreal or Toronto. Satmar is the largest Ḥasidic group in North America, with approximately 50,000 members. Bobov and Lubavitch each claim about 20,000 to 25,000 adherents. Belzers, Gerers, Vishnizers, Skverers, and other groups have fewer members.

The Lubavitcher Ḥasidim have created a Ḥasidic presence throughout North America (and, for that matter, the world), even where no full-fledged Ḥasidic communities exist. Lubavitchers, also known as *Ḥabad (or Chabad) Ḥasidim (“Ḥabad” is an acronym representing the Hebrew words hokhmah [wisdom], binah [understanding], and da'at [knowledge]), are the most socially activist of the major North American Ḥasidic sects. Their last rebbe, Menahem Mendel *Schneerson (d. 1994), emphasized outreach to secular Jews to help them learn about Judaism and ideally become more religiously observant. This outreach is highly unusual among Ḥasidic sects; most have little interest in influencing Jews outside their communities. Lubavitchers are centered in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, where they comprise the overwhelming majority of the neighborhood's Ḥasidim. However, many North American Lubavitchers live outside Crown Heights. It is typical for bright young Lubavitch couples to leave their communities and set up outreach centers, known as Ḥabad houses, generally near colleges and universities, which offer classes, holiday celebrations, and other activities designed to teach other Jews about observant Judaism. They see themselves as emissaries of their rebbe, who felt passionately about this sort of outreach. Lubavitch now has emissary couples living in forty-five U.S. states; they are also active in Canada and throughout the world.

The Satmar Hasidim, whose North American members live predominantly in Williamsburg, Brooklyn, and Kiryas Joel in Monroe, New York, differ radically from the Lubavitchers in some key ways. They are much more insular and generally avoid social contact with non-Hasidim. North American Satmars typically speak *Yiddish as their first language. Although many Lubavitchers are fluent in *Yiddish, English is their tongue of choice in North America. Lubavitchers are strongly *Zionist, whereas Satmars oppose the establishment of a Jewish state before the coming of the messiah. Satmar Hasidim – and, for that matter, many non-Lubavitch Jews – have also disdained the large, often vocal sector of Lubavitch society that believes their most recent rebbe will reveal himself as the *messiah. Lubavitchers themselves are divided about this issue; many are unsure about the messiah's identity, and some are certain that Schneerson will not be the messiah. However, because those who believe that he will be the messiah have often promoted their stance aggressively, Satmars and others sometimes see them as representing Lubavitch society. Tension between Lubavitch and Satmar has become well known and bitter.

Satmar Hasidim have enjoyed tremendous population growth since arriving in North America. In 1947, they numbered just a few hundred families; in the twenty-first century the group is far larger than it had been in pre-war Europe. A high birthrate and relatively low attrition help explain this remarkable success. The Bobover Hasidim, based in Borough Park, Brooklyn, and the Skverer Hasidim, centered in Squaretown (near Spring Valley, New York), have also seen impressive growth. Indeed, Hasidim in general seems poised to thrive in North America for generations to come.

Many outsiders assume that virtually all members of a given Hasidic group will think and behave in predictable ways but getting to know a range of Hasidim in depth will typically disprove that notion. S. W. Levine has written about her year spent among teenaged girls from Crown Heights' Lubavitch community. The girls included mainstream teens who combined a love of fun and partying with deep religious conviction; rebels who visited a strip club, experimented with drugs, and spent many hours commiserating together over their loss of faith; and a girl whose mystical focus was unusual even among her Hasidic peers. H. Winston's research uncovers unexpected rebellion among the Satmar Hasidim.

The Hasidic path of early marriage, large families, and strict rules for dress, diet, and religious ritual alienates some individuals, who then often choose to leave the community. These include unbelievers, gays, asexuals, and others. However, for most Hasidim, whose personalities mesh with their sect's expectations, life within their communities can be deeply fulfilling and infused with an overarching sense of meaning that sometimes eludes North Americans from more mainstream backgrounds.

For further reading, see R. Eisenberg, Boychiks in the Hood: Travels in the Hasidic Underground (1996); A. L. Nadler, The Hasidim in America (1994); S. W. Levine, Mystics, Mavericks, and Merrymakers: An Intimate Journey among Hasidic Girls (2004); and H. Winston, Unchosen: The Hidden Lives of Hasidic Rebels (2006).

STEPHANIE WELLEN LEVINE

Haskalah, the Jewish Enlightenment movement of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, was the first organized Jewish endeavor to promote consciously and intentionally the modernization of the Jewish people. Led by engaged and critical intellectuals, the maskilim, the movement initiated a cultural revolution that reconstructed the face of Jewish *education, *literature, and popular thought, as well as Jewish roles in the larger society. Haskalah was part of the mosaic of the general European Enlightenment period, but it retained a unique Jewish character. It incorporated modern European values of the era, such as belief in human progress, criticism of earlier ideas and familiar beliefs, humanism, and an aspiration toward freedom, while also retaining a commitment to Jewish tradition. Maskilim were revolutionary in challenging the Jewish establishment and rabbinic leadership, but they valued Jewish collective identity and solidarity and rejected the option of assimilation.

The European Enlightenment was an eighteenth-century phenomenon. The Jewish Enlightenment, however, reached its climax in *Eastern Europe exactly halfway through the nineteenth century, in the era of nationalism and romanticism. Haskalah was a multifaceted movement, carried out by moderates and radicals, sensitive poets, profound philosophers (Moses *Mendelssohn, Nachman *Krochmal), ordinary teachers in provincial schoolhouses, critics of *Hasidism (Joseph Perl, Isaac Erter), linguists (Solomon Judah Rapoport), counter-maskilim who opposed rationalism (Samuel David *Luzzatto), socialist-inclined reformers with well-developed social sensitivities (Judah Leib Levine, Moses Leib Lilienblum), deists (David *Friedländer, Lazarus Bendavid, Judah Leib Mises), anticlericals (Judah Leib Gordon, Joshua Heschel Shorr), nationalists (Peretz Smolenskin, David Gordon), and conservatives (Samuel Joseph Fuenn, Eliezer Zweifel, Kalman Shulman). Yet, these individuals were united by the Haskalah process itself, a social-cultural stance against the rabbinic elite, a critical and liberal mentality, and membership in a communication network (most importantly, through letters and journals) that established a public forum for action. Moreover, there was an awareness of continuity that connected successive generations of maskilim from the eighteenth-century early Haskalah through the “*Berlin Haskalah” and to the *Habsburg and *Russian Empires in the late nineteenth century.

The Haskalah was not a consolidated and organized movement; rather it is best understood as a literary undertaking, linking writers, poets, journalists, publishers, students, doctors, and teachers who were committed to the unique project of modernizing Jews. This intellectual community imbued their historic endeavor, unprecedented in Jewish history, with utopian dimensions, as if they were redeemers bringing messianic perfection to the world. Maskilim were committed to educating younger generations for a life as active and recognized citizens who were part of European society and culture; they were impelled by values of tolerance and a love of humanity based on belief in a shared human nature, and they were convinced of the potential of every human being to fashion a respectable, productive, and ethical life.

EARLY HASKALAH: This phase of the movement began in the eighteenth century in various corners of European Jewish society among traditionally educated young men who were curious about *science and philosophy and could not find intellectual satisfaction within the institutional boundaries of elite *Torah study. Social exclusion caused by their Jewishness increased their feelings of inferiority and cultural exclusion from the development of science and the broadening of knowledge in the surrounding culture. Such young men protested the neglect of Jewish scientific tradition and Jewish philosophy and the exclusive Jewish focus on the study of *Talmud and *Kabbalah.

The most well known and influential of these early reformers was the Berlin Jewish philosopher, Moses *Mendelssohn (1729–1786). He was the first modern Jewish humanist and the most outstanding Jewish liberal of the German Enlightenment; he was also the first modern Jewish philosopher to deal with the dilemmas of Jewish existence in the larger world. Mendelssohn was sensitive to what he saw as the insularity of the traditional Jewish community and its culture. One of his most important undertakings, a translation of the *Pentateuch to German (Bi'ur), was intended to draw Jews closer to mainstream society through inculcating knowledge of German; he hoped, as well, to distance Jews from understanding the Torah through either *Yiddish translations or German translations prepared by and for Christians. In his book Jerusalem (1783), he recommended that membership in the Jewish community be based on choice and will, and he advocated against enforcing religious allegiance and practice by coercion. In Mendelssohn's opinion, one should observe the commandments out of personal persuasion, not from the enforced pressure of the rabbinic authorities. Mendelssohn also demanded that the political state and Christian society show tolerance toward the Jewish minority and banish their own superstitions and hatreds.

In his religious thought, Mendelssohn taught that God can be recognized through the human ability to *reason, and he insisted that belief in a beneficent universal God was essential to humanist convictions. Mendelssohn also believed in the particularity of the divine *revelation to the Jews at Mount Sinai and in the unique obligations that stemmed from it: to uphold the commandments and to guard the historical inheritance and framework of Jewish national life. Nevertheless, Mendelssohn believed that God is first and foremost the creator of the world who desires the success and well-being of all created beings. By means of their intelligence, human beings can recognize God without revelation, the holy books, or the guidance of the assembly. Mendelssohn was the first Jewish thinker to advocate values of religious tolerance of others for both Jews and Christians, to imagine a multicultural society in which religion and the state were separated, and to explain that Judaism contained equal measures of rationalism and tradition. Nevertheless, he was not the actual impetus behind the Haskalah movement, which became increasingly organized and institutionalized in the 1780s. Even so, the maskilim themselves, in every generation, saw him as their founder and inspiration.

PHASES OF HASKALAH: The history of the Haskalah as a cultural and social movement may be divided into five phases, spreading over one hundred and twenty years – from 1778 until the late decades of the nineteenth century. In the first phase, which was intense yet relatively short (1778–97), maskilim in Berlin and in Königsberg, in Prussia, burst on the scene and challenged the authority of the rabbinic leadership. Their arguments and objectives were expressed in Naphtali Herz Wessely's "Words of Peace and Truth" written between 1782–84. Young people – private teachers and students in communities in Central, Western, and Eastern Europe – organized the activities of the Haskalah in this stage. These reformers sought unity through shared statements of principles, and they created literary vehicles to spread their ideas and formulate an alternative to the rabbi and communal leadership. The motivating spirit behind these initiatives was Isaac Euchel (1756–1804), a native of Copenhagen and a student of Kant at the University of Königsberg. In the latter part of 1782, he brought together a very small circle of reformers, the Society of the Friends of the Hebrew Language. The following year, Euchel and others edited and published the first periodical edition of the "The Gatherer" (Ha-Me'assef). By means of this printed periodical, the Haskalah spread from a concentrated group to a broader community from *Vilna to London. Several years earlier, in 1778, the Jewish Free School (Freischule), the first modern Jewish school, had been founded in Berlin. Its educational program was divided between Torah and secular subjects. As the young movement expanded, the Society for the Promotion of Goodness and Justice was formed in 1787 with the goal of organizing the maskilim into broadly defined frameworks and by field.

Toward the end of the 1790s, the Haskalah faded in Berlin; Ha-Me'assef was shut down in 1797, and activities declined as the maskilim failed to find many who sympathized with their proposed cultural renaissance of Hebrew literature. However, the Haskalah would not end here; its ideas, programs, and literary creations were reborn in communities in which the processes of modernization were relatively slow or had yet to begin.

In its second phase (1797–1824), the Haskalah flourished in Breslau, Dessau, Posen, *Prague, *Vilna, *Amsterdam, and London. Toward the end of this period, lively and militant maskilim founded a center of Jewish Enlightenment in Austrian *Galicia. There, they invested significant and sophisticated literary efforts in the struggle against *Hasidism, which was seen as the central obstacle to modernization of the Jews. Thus, Haskalah writings portrayed Hasidism as a worrisome deviation in Jewish history that perpetuated the ignorance of the multitudes, nurtured false faith, and inhibited the forward march of progress. Maskilim in Galicia repeatedly petitioned the Austrian state to impose measures to curb the success of the Hasidim and their expansion.

The third stage of the Haskalah movement was centered in *Russia and Congress *Poland. These regional movements had objectives similar to those of the Berlin Haskalah: Maskilim hoped to decrease communal autonomy, encourage a shift in Jewish occupations from financial brokerage to agriculture, mandate children to attend Jewish government schools, and implement laws regarding Jewish citizenship and army service obligations. The Haskalah movement in Russia consolidated in the reign of Tsar Nicholas I (1825–55), and activities were also organized in a number of communities in *Ukraine, in *Belorussia, and especially in *Lithuania. Isaac Baer *Levinsohn was considered the source of inspiration of the Haskalah in Russia; his programmatic "A Testimony in Israel" (1828) called for changes in education, economic life, and the position of the Jews vis-à-vis the state and non-Jewish society. The support of the maskilim in the 1840s for Russian government modernization programs in Jewish education alienated many Orthodox Jews who saw Haskalah as a threat and danger (see JUDAISM: ORTHODOX).

Jewish Enlightenment reached its peak in the second half of the nineteenth century, especially during the reign of Tsar Alexander II (1856–81). In these years the activities of the maskilim became an established part of the cultural milieu; Hebrew literature blossomed in a number of forms, and new journals in Hebrew, Yiddish, Polish, and Russian were developed. At this time a number of women (most prominently Miriam Markel-Mosessohn) began to take prominent roles in the movement, publishing newspaper articles, as well as songs, translations, and literary works. By the end of this fourth chapter, in 1881, The Love of the Righteous, the first part of an original Hebrew novel by Sarah Foner Menkin – and the first Hebrew fiction composed by a woman – had appeared.

Modern Hebrew literature was enriched during this fourth phase of the Haskalah with the emergence of novels, poetry, and textbooks and teaching guides for geography and history. Literary and ideological criticism by radical maskilim (especially Abraham Uri Kovner) insisted that literature should be mobilized to address the social problems and daily distresses of so many poor Jews; these appeals inspired some maskilim (Isaac Kaminer, Aaron Liberman, and others) to decry class differences and economic inequity. At the same time, in the 1860s and 1870s, Lilienblum and Judah Leib Gordon ran a cultural campaign (“Religion versus Life”) against rabbinic authority. Their intent was to lighten the yoke of religious law that they believed caused significant daily difficulties to many Jews. Others, including Peretz Smolenskin, the editor of the journal “The Dawn” (Ha-Shahar), were concerned about the disintegration of Jewish unity and solidarity in the era of *emancipation. Warning of assimilation and the dangerous character of modern *antisemitism, they fostered a nationalist current in Haskalah (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH).

The fifth and last chapter of the Haskalah period took place in the last two decades of the nineteenth century. In this period, critical voices from within the movement and a post-Haskalah tendency that undermined the enterprise or, at least sought to move beyond it, strengthened. Many of the issues that were central to the Haskalah’s agenda had already been realized; for example, widespread acceptance of the necessity of Jewish enlightenment and professional education. Moreover, as a result of the *pogroms of the 1880s and the beginning of a Jewish nationalist movement, the urgent concerns of the Jewish public had changed. Haskalah was overwhelmed by new issues, including efforts to overcome skepticism about humankind’s ability to construct a complete and just world free of injustice, evil, and oppression; the growth of a modern national consciousness; “the New Movement,” a post-Enlightenment and revisionist protest against Haskalah literature championed by young authors; controversy surrounding emigration and *Zionism; increased involvement in social radicalism; and the spread of secularism. In the past, the ideas of the Haskalah had supplied the intellectual bridge that allowed a passage from tradition to modernity; by the end of the nineteenth century, only the old-fashioned and the second-rate still resisted the accomplishments of the Enlightenment era.

CONCLUSION: The Haskalah gave birth to the self-consciousness and identity of the modern Jew. With its prophetic optimism, it represented an historic turning point toward the challenges of a new era. The Haskalah movement was not the first attempt to introduce processes of modernization; rather it was the first to suggest an ideology that justified modernization, to mobilize common knowledge that would support it, and to suggest “road maps” and practical means of implementation in many areas of Jewish life. From a historical viewpoint, the Haskalah was a revolution that established precedents and templates for many trends in modern Jewish history that remain central to the lives of contemporary Jews. It shaped modern Jewish culture’s receptivity to a series of concepts that encompassed a wide range of meanings. The journalist, the author, the publicist, the literary critic, and the teacher are just some of the modern types formed by the Haskalah. In addition, the Haskalah is also responsible for some central cultural creations: the modern Jewish school, teaching manuals, journals, the newspaper, the Hebrew novel, the renewal of the Hebrew language, and also for the introduction of the values of the general European Enlightenment, such as tolerance, humanism, freedom, and rational thought, into Jewish discourse. The Haskalah also produced a new German translation of the Hebrew Bible, updated Jewish thought, and founded the Wissenschaft des Judentums, the scientific study of Jewish history and geography. Some of these contributions were restorative; that is, they returned neglected forms of culture to legitimacy and to significant places in the intellectual discourse of the time (an example is a rediscovery of rationalism in Jewish thought, particularly as exemplified by *Maimonides’ Guide of the Perplexed).

As a cultural process, the Haskalah brought rejuvenation and a focus on the innovative and revolutionary to European Jewry. The first innovation was the maskil. These individuals represented a new type of intellectual, people of the modern Jewish spirit who maintained the spark of faith for teaching Torah and performing the commandments. They appeared in the guise of author, doctor, philosopher, student, newspaper editor, and publisher. In their celebration of the value of knowledge of the wider world and of human beings, in their cultivation of rationalist Jewish thinkers, in their criticism of deficiencies in Jewish society and the foolishness and false beliefs of Jewish piety, in their championing of an identity that combined the individual of general culture and the Jew, and in their project to renew Jewish culture and to create the modern public sphere – using journals, *poetry, *literature, and the establishment of a new Jewish library – we identify the growth of a modern Jewish intellectual elite that continues to exist in the present day.

For further reading, see S. Feiner, The Jewish Enlightenment (2004); S. Feiner and D. Sorkin, eds., New Perspectives on the Haskalah (2001); A. Altmann, Moses Mendelssohn: A Biographical Study (1973); D. Sorkin, Moses Mendelssohn and the Religious Enlightenment (1996); idem, Orphans of Knowledge: The Berlin Haskalah and German Religious Thought (2000); idem, The Transformation of German Jewry, 1780–1840 (1987); S. Lowenstein, The Berlin Jewish Community, Enlightenment, Family and Crisis, 1770–1830 (1994); N. S. Sinkoff, Out of the Shtetl: Making Jews Modern in the Polish Borderlands (2004); M. Stanislawski, Tsar Nicholas I and the Jews (1983); M. Wodzinski, Haskalah and Hasidism in the Kingdom of Poland (2005); T. Cohen and S. Feiner, eds., Voice of a Hebrew Maiden: Women's Writing of the Nineteenth Century Enlightenment Movement (2006; [Hebrew]); and S. Feiner, Haskalah and History: The Emergence of a Modern Jewish Historical Consciousness (2002); see also LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH. Map 9 SHMUEL FEINER (Translated by Kate Friedman)

Hasmonean Dynasty refers to the ruling family of the first independent Jewish state in the Land of Israel after the collapse of the Davidic kingdom in the sixth century BCE. The Hasmoneans ruled from 142 to 63 BCE. Beginning as rebels, they became High Priests and kings. Jewish sects, such as the *Essenes and the *Pharisees, emerged in the second and first centuries BCE, in part in response to Hasmonean rule. The Hasmonean dynastic rulers were descended from Mattathias, a Jew of priestly descent. *Josephus states that the term "Hasmonean" comes from the Greek name of Mattathias' great-grandfather, Asamoniaios (Josephus, Antiquities 12.265); this name in turn may stem from a place name such as Heshmon or Hasmonah. Mattathias, who had five sons – John, Simon, Judah, Eleazar, and Jonathan (1 Macc 2:2–5) – began a rebellion in the town of Modein (seventeen miles northwest of *Jerusalem) against the *Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE) and his anti-Jewish policies. The onset of the uprising is associated with Mattathias' refusal to offer a pagan sacrifice (1 Macc 2:19–22; Josephus, Antiquities 12.268–78; cf. 2 Macc 8:1–7). After Mattathias died in 165 BCE, Judah the "Maccabee" (the "hammer") assumed leadership of the revolt. Judah successfully conducted several military campaigns against Seleucid forces in Palestine and oversaw the rededication of the *Temple in 164 BCE, which had become defiled with the installation of a foreign idol by Antiochus IV (1 Macc 1:54, 4:52; cf. 2 Macc 10:1–9).

After Judah was killed in battle at Elasa in 160 BCE, his brother Jonathan became leader of the movement, a position he held until 142 BCE. In this period King Demetrius I and Alexander Balas, who claimed to be the son of Antiochus IV, vied against one another for dominance within the Seleucid Empire. Both factions gave privileges to Jonathan in an effort to win his favor. From Demetrius he received the authority to muster an official army; this enabled him to occupy Jerusalem in 152 BCE, except for the Akra, a portion of the city controlled by a Seleucid garrison (1 Macc 10:6–8; Josephus, Antiquities 13.42). Alexander appointed Jonathan as High Priest, an office that subsequent Hasmonean rulers retained. Their retention of the *priesthood remained controversial throughout the Hasmonean period because the family was not from the Zadokite line. Anti-Hasmonean sentiment is evident in the *Dead Sea Scrolls, documents that are associated with a movement that flourished in the first half of the first century BCE. Members of this group expected the arrival of "the *messiahs of Aaron and Israel." This belief in two messiahs, one associated with the priestly *Aaron and the other with King *David, may be implicit criticism of the Hasmonean practice of having the same person hold the offices of king and High Priest.

Simon (142–135 BCE) succeeded Jonathan, who had been killed by Trypho, a pretender to the Seleucid throne. Simon formally declared the independence of Judah from the Seleucid Empire in 142 BCE (1 Macc 13:41). He also arranged the surrender of the Akra. Simon was murdered, along with two sons, while drunk at a banquet near *Jericho. His son John Hyrcanus I (135–104 BCE) then became high priest and ruler. Emboldened by the death of the Seleucid king Antiochus VII Sidetes in 129 BCE, who had attempted to besiege Jerusalem, Hyrcanus initiated numerous military campaigns and expanded Hasmonean military control of the Land of *Israel. Hyrcanus also conquered Idumea (*Edom) and required its inhabitants to convert to Judaism.

After a brief reign by Hyrcanus' son, Judah Aristobulus I (104–103 BCE), his other son Alexander Jannaeus (Jannai) ruled for nearly thirty years (103–76 BCE). His tenure as king was turbulent and chaotic. He launched wars against numerous cities in *Phoenicia, *Syria, *Moab, and elsewhere (Josephus, Antiquities 13.395–397). According to Josephus, the populace pelted Jannaeus with citrons (etrogim) during the *Sukkot festival, reflecting resentment over his status as High Priest (13.372–373). In response he had more than 6,000 Jews killed. This led to a bloody period of unrest and rebellion. In 88 BCE, opponents of Jannaeus, who were probably Pharisees, asked the Seleucid king Demetrius III Eukarios to intervene, although no lasting alliance was formed (13.376). Jannaeus had eight hundred of the rebels crucified and their families slaughtered while he watched, dining with his concubines (13.380–381).

On his death Jannaeus bequeathed power to his widow Salome Alexandra (76–67 BCE), the only Hasmonean queen. Unlike her husband, she had good relations with the Pharisees, who wielded a great deal of political power during her reign. A leading Pharisee of this period was Simon ben Shetah. Alexandra had two sons, Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II. A war of succession broke out between them when their mother died. Aristobulus II, the younger son, won the struggle to be king, although Hyrcanus II had already been appointed as High Priest during his mother's reign. The tenure of Aristobulus II as king was brief, from 67 to 63 BCE, because *Rome eventually switched its favor from him to Hyrcanus II, whose claim to the throne was encouraged by his advisor Antipater (the father of *Herod the Great).

Hasmonean rule ended in 63 BCE when the Roman general Pompey conquered Judah. According to Josephus, when Pompey took Jerusalem, 12,000 Jews were massacred (Antiquities 14.70), and the general entered the Holy of Holies, the most sacred part of the *Temple compound, killing the priests while they offered sacrifices. Hyrcanus II remained High Priest from 63 to 40 BCE. The Parthians invaded Jerusalem in 40 BCE and cut off Hyrcanus II's ears, a blemish that prevented him from serving as High Priest (Antiquities 14.366). His son Antigonus briefly ruled as king under the Parthians from 40 to 37 BCE, at which point Herod the Great successfully occupied the land. Herod's reign, from 37 to 4 BCE as a client-king serving the *Roman Empire, brought an effective end to the Hasmonean dynasty as a political force in Israel. However, Herod the Great married a Hasmonean princess, Mariamne, with whom he had several sons. His grandson from this union, Agrippa, who ruled Judea from 10 BCE to 44 CE, was therefore a Hasmonean descendant. Map 3 MATTHEW GOFF

Havdalah (literally, "distinction") is a brief ceremony concluding the *Sabbath that marks the transition from a consecrated day to the ordinary days of the new week. It is traditionally a home ceremony, but is also used to conclude Saturday evening worship in many *synagogues. The havdalah service takes place after three stars are visible in the night sky; if for some reason it must be postponed, it may be observed as late as Tuesday evening. The ceremony includes *blessings over wine, spices, and the kindling of a braided havdalah candle with multiple wicks (often there are six) that are to be lit from at least two different flames. In addition, there is a central blessing that praises God who distinguishes between the holy and the mundane, light and darkness, Israel and the nations, and the Sabbath and the six days of work. A havdalah that closes a *festival on a weekday includes the blessing over the wine and the main benediction, but not the blessings for kindling light or spices. When a festival immediately follows the Sabbath, the Sabbath is concluded with a special havdalah that incorporates the kiddush*; the spices are not included, and festival candles are lit in place of the havdalah candle. It is customary to place the spices in a decorative container called a besamim box or hadas. The havdalah ceremony is often followed by the songs Eliyahu ha-Navi ("Elijah the Prophet") and Shavua Tov ("A Good Week"). Communities observe varying practices regarding havdalah; they include looking at the light's reflections on one's fingernails and palms when the candle is lit, filling the wine cup until it overflows, extinguishing the candle in the wine cup, and dipping one's fingers in the wine to put drops on the forehead or in one's pockets.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Havurah Movement. Although the concept of the havurah ("fellowship group") originated in *Second Temple times among the *Pharisees and *Essenes, it was in the late 1960s that havurot arose as gatherings for worship, study, and fellowship. Havurot were seen as alternatives to established Jewish modes of worship that were perceived as formal, cold, and nonegalitarian. Generally, the younger generation preferred havurot over their parents' more institutionalized *synagogue-based style of Judaism. The first havurah, Havurat Shalom, was organized in Somerville, Massachusetts, in 1968; among its founders were Zalman M. Schachter-Shalomi, a leader in the Jewish Renewal movement (see JUDAISM: JEWISH RENEWAL MOVEMENT), of which the havurah was one manifestation, and Arthur Green, who later became president of the *Reconstructionist Rabbinical College. A second havurah was started in *New York City in 1970, and other havurot followed, often in university communities.

In accordance with the counterculture movement of the late 1960s, the search for cultural authenticity determined havurot norms, which were often in sharp contrast to those of suburban synagogues. Instead of employing rabbis, havurot emphasized equality of participants. Denominational labels were dropped, as havurot stood in the vanguard of what became known as "post-denominational Judaism." Havurot displayed several commitments, including maintaining small-sized groups, experimenting in worship, and striving toward spirituality and meaning in Jewish practice. Havurot members believed that they could re-create Judaism in their own generation's image. Havurah ideals permeated American Jewish life in the 1970s, in part because of the 1973 publication of The Jewish Catalogue, edited by Richard Siegel, Michael Strassfeld, and Sharon Strassfeld, a guide to becoming "personally involved in aspects of Jewish ritual life, customs, cooking, crafts, and creation." This "hands-on" approach to Judaism was often accomplished institutionally as synagogues formed their own havurot, thus satisfying their members' desires for more intimate prayer and study experiences.

In the 1980s havurot entered the mainstream as hundreds were established throughout the United States and other countries. As Jonathan Sarna has noted, this rise of havurot was part of a larger movement of revival within American Judaism that manifested, among other things, a quest for more Jewish knowledge as well as a desire to experience the spiritual dimensions of religious life. Often, study and socializing, rather than *worship, were the primary objectives of these havurot. Crucial to understanding the role of the havurah in American Judaism, as well as in American religious culture more generally, is an appreciation of the desire for Jewish survival these groups embodied. Coming as it did in the wake of the 1950s suburbanization of American Judaism, the havurah movement was a rejection of a middle-class Judaism, seemingly constructed on Protestant models. As Riv-Ellen Prell has observed, havurah members were not rejecting Judaism, "only their parents' version of it."

In the early twenty-first century, there are several hundred independent havurot, primarily in the United States, but also in *Canada, *Israel, and European countries. Since 1974, an annual summer retreat has been sponsored by the National Havurah Committee, the organizing body of these fellowship groups. For further reading, see J. Sarna, American Judaism (2004); and R. Prell, Prayer and Community: The Havurah in American Judaism (1989). RACHEL GORDAN

Hazor (Tell el-Kedah), the largest ancient site in Israel, is located in the Upper *Galilee at the western edge of the Jordan Valley. Settlement began in the Early Bronze Age. Mentioned in Syrian texts from the Middle Bronze (MB) Age, Hazor remained strategically important throughout the Late Bronze (LB) Age as well. During the MB/LB, this great walled city was home to a diverse population of *Canaanites and other Near Eastern peoples. A major destruction, occurring some time toward the end of the Late Bronze Age, ended Canaanite control. Although the Bible claims *Joshua and the Israelites (Josh 11:10–13) brought about this destruction, archeologists are less certain. The next major settlement at Hazor was *Israelite. *Solomon rebuilt the city, making it into an Israelite district capital (1 Kgs 9:15). A later king, perhaps *Ahab, also engaged in major building projects in Hazor. A highlight of Israelite Hazor was its monumental water system. The city was destroyed by the *Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III late in the eighth century BCE (2 Kgs 15:29). Map 2

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Hazzan: See CANTOR, CANTORATE: CONTEMPORARY; and CANTOR, CANTORATE: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Head Covering: Men. There is no legal requirement for a man to cover his head. Rabbinic literature tells the story of Rabbi Naḥman, whose mother was told at his birth that he would grow up to be a thief. To prevent that, she was advised to make sure that his head remained covered at all times. One day, after he had grown up and become a rabbi, he was teaching in a garden when a wind blew off his head covering. He proceeded to absent-mindedly reach across the fence and take fruit from someone else's yard (BT Shabbat 156b).

From this story, and the practice in many countries of men covering their heads, the idea developed that head covering was a sign of respect for God and God's commandments. Covering one's head, particularly while eating or praying, became a widespread and deeply ingrained male practice. In recent years, and especially after the founding of *Israel, the desire to wear a visible symbol of Jewishness has increased. For this reason, many observant men wear head coverings at all times.

BARRY FREUNDEL

Head Covering: Women. It was customary for respectable women in the ancient *Near East and in the Greco-Roman world to be veiled when they went outside the home. Married Jewish women followed this practiced as well, covering their hair as a sign of modesty (tzniut) and as an indication of their marital status. According to BT Gittin 90a–b, a woman who goes out in public with unfastened hair and uncovered shoulders must be divorced for her immodesty; BT Ketubbot 65a recalls a widow whose veil slipped during a court proceeding. She was perceived by other women as making sexual advances to their husbands and was chased out of town. Female hair covering was an absolute requirement in a society so highly conscious of sexuality and its dangers; nevertheless, it was a personal imposition and restriction from which men were glad to be exempt (Genesis Rabbah 17.8; M. Sotah 3:8).

Married women from various contemporary traditional communities cover their hair when they are in public. Different communities have different degrees of stringency; in some, women may wear wigs, and in others they might wear snoods, scarves, berets, or hats. Some women also cover their hair at home whenever a male other than their husband is present; others, including many Modern Orthodox women (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX), have more moderate customs such as only covering the head during worship.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Hebrew, Biblical. The vast majority of the Jewish *Bible is written in Hebrew; approximately ten chapters are in *Aramaic. Hebrew was the main language that the Judeans and Israelites spoke throughout the biblical period; it was slowly replaced by Aramaic during and after the exile in *Babylon, where Aramaic was the common language. Over several centuries, Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the main Jewish spoken language, and by the end of the biblical period (second century BCE), Hebrew was used in formal, written contexts, rather than in everyday speech. This is reflected in the fact that most late biblical and early *rabbinic works are written in Hebrew, albeit a Hebrew that betrays significant Aramaic influence. Exactly when Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language is debated.

The main source of Biblical Hebrew is the Bible. A small number of inscriptions from the First *Temple period survive; there are more from the Second *Temple era, found in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. We also have some knowledge of pre-Biblical Hebrew from pre-Israelite *Canaanite tablets written in Akkadian, the language of *Mesopotamia; these inscriptions sometimes gloss or explain an Akkadian word with a pre-Israelite Canaanite word. Given that we do not have original versions of any biblical text and that the final form of the Bible is post-biblical, these nonbiblical sources act as important controls as we try to understand the actual Hebrew of the biblical period.

The Bible contains several dialects, which are typically defined chronologically. Most biblical texts are written in Standard Biblical Hebrew, which is close to the Hebrew spoken in *Judah at the time of the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE). A small number of earlier texts such as the Song of the Sea (*Exodus 15) and the Song of *Deborah (*Judges 5) are in Archaic Biblical Hebrew – these have certain old forms rarely found in other texts and show some similarity to Ugaritic, a language spoken in *Syria in the pre-biblical period. A sizable section of the Bible, including *Chronicles, *Ezra–*Nehemiah, *Daniel, *Esther, and *Ecclesiastes, is written in Late Biblical Hebrew, which shows similarities to both Aramaic and rabbinic Hebrew. There are other ways of defining dialects as well. Inscriptions written in the Hebrew of *Israel, the northern kingdom, differ slightly from the Hebrew used in *Judah. The extent of northern Hebrew now found in the Bible is debated; it appears that much of it was normalized to Judean Hebrew. As in other languages, poetry (see BIBLE: POETRY) is different from prose: The former has many more rare and difficult words and has slightly different grammatical rules.

Both Aramaic and Hebrew are consonantal languages, having borrowed the alphabet developed in *Phoenicia in the late second millennium BCE; they differ from Akkadian and Egyptian, which had much more complex writing systems. The fit between Hebrew and Phoenician consonantal sounds was not perfect, which explains why there are twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet, but one of these letters is pronounced in two different ways. The Hebrew and Aramaic systems developed differently over time. The current script for the Bible is an Aramaic script that was borrowed during the *Babylonian Exile and displaced the earlier Hebrew script, sometimes called paleo-Hebrew. Hebrew (and Aramaic) eventually incorporated vowel letters in the form of certain consonants that can indicate vowels. In the second half of the first millennium CE, various vowel systems written above or below the line were developed; the one ultimately adopted is called the Tiberian system, after the city of Tiberias in the *Galilee in northern Israel. We have several transliterations of Hebrew into Akkadian or Greek from the biblical or early post-biblical period; these indicate that the vowel system now used for chanting the Bible is relatively accurate, but it does not go all the way back to the biblical period.

Knowledge of the structure of Hebrew has developed over the centuries, beginning with medieval Jewish commentators and *grammarians. These scholars understood Hebrew in relation to Arabic and Aramaic and tried to show in polemical contexts that the Bible rather than the Qu'ran was written in the most beautiful pristine language. The discovery of other ancient Semitic languages in the last century and a half has also helped significantly to clarify many obscure words and grammatical structures of Biblical Hebrew.

MARC BRETTLER

Hebrew Literature: See LITERATURE, HEBREW entries

Hebrew: Modern Revival. The revival of Hebrew as a spoken language is a unique and unprecedented phenomenon. Although Hebrew was the language of the ancient *Israelites and of most of the Hebrew *Bible, in post-exilic times it was rarely used in ordinary spoken discourse. Instead, Jews spoke the languages of the peoples among whom they lived, although they tended to write Jewish versions of those languages in Hebrew characters. Hebrew itself became the language of *prayer and study and was used by a male scholarly elite for legal writings (see HALAKHAH) and *biblical commentary. Hebrew was also a language for poetry – both for liturgical uses (see POETRY: LITURGICAL [PIYYUT]) and, in Muslim *Spain, for secular enjoyment as well (see POETRY, MEDIEVAL: MUSLIM WORLD).

The Hebrew language revival began in the latter part of the eighteenth century as part of the Jewish Enlightenment movement, Haskalah* (see LITERATURE, HEBREW: HASKALAH), in *Central Europe; it developed primarily in the second half of the nineteenth century in *Russia. The Haskalah revival of Hebrew had no initial connection to nationalist revival; rather it was part of the effort to demonstrate that the Jewish people had a cultural heritage and their own language and literary traditions. A major figure in the revival of Hebrew literature in this period was Mendele Mokher Seforim (Shalom Jacob Abramovich; 1835–1917; see also LITERATURE: YIDDISH, 1800 TO TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY). The second stage of Hebrew language revival is identified with political Zionism and the establishment of Jewish life in the Yishuv. The commitment to Hebrew, the language of the Jewish people in biblical times, as the language of a new Zionist society in *Palestine was implemented gradually, beginning with the First *Aliyah (1882–1903; see ISRAEL, STATE OF: JEWISH IMMIGRATION BEFORE 1948).

Eliezer (Perelman) Ben-Yehuda (1858–1922), who immigrated to Palestine in 1881, played the central role in transforming Hebrew into a modern language. Ben-Yehuda wrote a dictionary that expanded Hebrew vocabulary substantially, providing important words for transforming Hebrew into a spoken language and adapting the style of literary Hebrew for modern use. He also promoted spoken Hebrew through Hebrew language newspapers and he initiated activities to make Hebrew the daily language of Jewish life in Palestine. In 1890 Ben-Yehuda established the Committee of the Hebrew Language, now the Academy of the Hebrew Language, to modernize the Hebrew language while preserving its distinct qualities.

The national Hebrew education system that began in 1887 in Jaffa and in Jewish agricultural colonies was crucially important in the successful adoption of Hebrew in the Yishuv. Students were taught in Hebrew from a young age by trained Hebrew-speaking teachers. The Herzliyah Hebrew High School (known as the Gymnasias Ha-Ivrit Herzliyah) established in Jaffa in 1906, the Hebrew High School established in Jerusalem in 1908, and additional educational institutions in which studies were conducted in Hebrew all contributed to the fostering of a generation of people who spoke Hebrew as their mother tongue.

Nevertheless, at the beginning of the twentieth century, Hebrew was still a foreign language in many private houses and public places in the Yishuv. Further progress came with the pioneers of the Second Aliyah (1904–14), who understood that using Hebrew was a fundamental element of the nationalist revival and the formation of a new society in the Land of *Israel. The victory of Hebrew in the 1914 “War of the Languages,” which occurred as a result of efforts to impose the Hebrew language on educational institutions, solidified its identity as the language of the Yishuv. In 1922, the *British Mandate government declared Hebrew an official language in Palestine together with English and Arabic, an important recognition of the national rights of the Yishuv. For further reading, see M. Brinker, “Hebrew Literature and Zionist History,” Zmanim: A Historical Quarterly 105 (Winter 2009): 16–23; and E. Y. Kutscher, A History of the Hebrew Language (1981).

LILACH ROSENBERG-FRIEDMAN

Hebrew Poetry: See BIBLE: POETRY; POETRY, LITURGICAL; POETRY, MEDIEVAL entries; POETRY: MODERN HEBREW

Hebrew Translation. When considered as a mode of cultural communication with cultures other than one’s own, translation was a major factor in the shaping of modern Jewish life. However, any attempt at providing an overall description of the role of translation in Jewish culture is highly problematic given the diversity of languages used by Jews. In many respects, the problem is similar to discussions about what is Jewish literature, a question for which there is no one satisfactory answer. Given the pivotal role of *Hebrew for all Jews, this essay offers a succinct description of the role of translation into that language.

The emergence of the Jewish Enlightenment, the Haskalah*, at the end of the eighteenth century marked the first time that translation came to occupy a pivotal position in Jewish culture as an ideologically motivated activity. Since one of the principal aims of the Enlightenment movement was to narrow the gap between Jewish life and the surrounding European cultures, it was only natural for translation to become a central vehicle for the realization of this ambitious endeavor. Early translators into Hebrew had to work within unique cultural conditions. The “cultural importation” of foreign literature was done under strict restrictions. In principle, no textual element contradicting Jewish faith was to enter the “vineyard of Israel.” This dictum affected both the choice of texts for translation and the actual translation strategies. A central point in the ideology of the Haskalah was the glorification of the pure Hebrew of the *Bible (see HEBREW, BIBLICAL): In general, any text translated into Hebrew was considered automatically upgraded. This principle, however, was paired with a strong inner sense of the relative inferiority and the limited capabilities of Biblical Hebrew as a language.

Texts dealing with Jewish themes were the first choice for translators (e.g., the biblical plays of Racine); on a par with these texts were those considered to hold (moral) “usefulness” (toelet). Aesthetic considerations were rarely a reason for translation. Following European literary hierarchies, poetry and drama were translated much more often than prose. The quintessence of Hebrew translation strategy in this period may be described as an act of “Hebraizing” or “Judaizing” texts, with varying degrees of intensity. All texts were carefully expurgated of Gentile components. Hebrew nomenclature often replaced titles and names of protagonists (e.g., Ithiel ha-Kushi for Othello). The ideologically motivated linguistic purism of translators (as well as of the original authors) of the first generations of the Haskalah sustained an emphasis on the Bible as the supreme source for literary production. Notwithstanding a few major exceptions, most of the translations of this period are of little literary value. However, translation contributed a great deal to the revival and development of Modern Hebrew literature (see entries under LITERATURE, HEBREW), especially in the emergence of hitherto nonexistent genres, such as children's literature and ballads.

The subsequent history of translation into Hebrew up to the present follows three main lines of development. During the first phase a gradual enlargement and deepening of contact with foreign literatures developed. During the Enlightenment period the general orientation of Hebrew literature moved eastward, from German to Russian literature and toward the end of that era, stable publishing organs emerged. At this point, translators and publishers began a more or less systematic effort to introduce entire works, and even bodies of literature, into Hebrew. The particular history of Hebrew translations of Greek and Roman classics, undertaken around the middle of the nineteenth century, is a case in point. Finally, with the rise of *Zionism and the immigration of Hebraists to *Palestine (and the *United States), the normalization of translation into the Hebrew language commenced, with the adaptation of regular European translation norms. During this final period, the range of languages of origin grew steadily, with literature in English becoming a major source in the 1930s. This tendency toward Anglo-American writing (especially since the 1950s) resulted in a general change of translation policies and practices, which had previously been influenced by Russian culture.

Over the more than two centuries that have passed since the emergence of the Haskalah, translation has been central in fulfilling the ambitious project of bringing Jewish culture up to date with the rest of Europe. In this context, it was also a major agent in the continual process of Jewish *secularization. However, much of the initial gap (in terms of what remains to be translated into Hebrew) has still not been filled.

AMINADAV DYKMAN

Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIR). Established in Cincinnati, Ohio, by Rabbi Isaac Mayer *Wise in 1875, this institution is the oldest rabbinical seminary in the *United States. In the early twenty-first century, HUC-JIR trains men and women to become *rabbis and *cantors and also has broadly based programs in advanced *Jewish studies, communal service, and Jewish *education at campuses in *Los Angeles, Cincinnati, *New York City, and *Jerusalem. More than sixty scholars are on the combined faculty. HUC-JIR publishes the journal Hebrew Union College Annual, as well as scholarly books through its Union for Reform Judaism (formerly Hebrew Union College) Press. Its principal library, located in Cincinnati, contains close to a half-million volumes of printed Judaica, plus more than six thousand manuscripts. In 1972, HUC-JIR became the first rabbinical seminary to ordain women as rabbis. Under its current president, Rabbi David Ellen-son, it is strongly oriented to *Zionism, to high academic standards, and to pastoral education.

MICHAEL A. MEYER

Hebron, This city, 30 kilometers (19 miles) southeast of *Jerusalem, features in several biblical narratives. *Abraham settled "by the terebinths of Mamre at Hebron" and built an altar to *God (Gen 13:14–18). There, too, he was informed of the imminent birth of his son *Isaac (18:1–15), and nearby, he pled for Sodom (18:16–33). *Sarah died at "Kiriath-arba, which is Hebron" (23:1–2), and Abraham purchased a burial cave at Machpelah, from its *Hittite owners (23:3–20). Hebron was one of a coalition of Amorite cities conquered by *Joshua and the Israelites (Josh 10:1–11); it was allocated to the tribe of Judah (Josh 15:13). *David was anointed king over *Judah there and ruled from Hebron for seven and a half years (2 Sam 2:1–4). Hebron was fortified by *Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:5–12) and resettled in the post-exilic period (Neh 11:25). Map 2

BETH ALPERT NAKHAI

Hellenism (from hellenes, the word Greeks used to describe themselves) was the process of cultural diffusion, or hellenization, by which Greek culture mixed with native cultures in the Asian and North African regions ruled by *Alexander the Great of Macedon (d. 323) and his successors in the last three centuries BCE to create new "Greek-like" cultures. Its roots lie in the changed political and military circumstances of these lands that had formerly been under *Persian rule (although Greek culture had penetrated these areas even before Alexander). After his death, Alexander's generals (the diadochi or "successors") carved up conquered territories into new empires. Jews in the Land of Israel fell first under the political rule of the *Ptolemies, who were centered in *Egypt (323–198 BCE) and then of the *Seleucids of *Syria (198 BCE–ca. 165 CE). During this era, many Jews settled throughout the Hellenistic world, especially in cities like *Alexandria and Antioch, forming a significant Greek-speaking *Diaspora.

With these political changes came profound cultural changes, as conquered peoples, Jews among them, embraced the Greek language. In addition, the arrival of Greek troops and traders and the founding of Greek-style cities led to the spread of Greek forms of education and entertainment (gymnasiums, theaters), as well as literary styles and philosophical ideas. This merger of local and Greek cultures produced new ways of worshiping, governing, learning, and living. Jews, like others, faced remarkable challenges to traditional ways of life. The vibrancy and creativity of this foreign culture prompted complex responses of acceptance and resistance. Greek culture was appealing to many Jews, both in *Judea and the Diaspora; scholars no longer suppose Judaism in the Land of Israel to have been largely untouched by Hellenism. Most Jews welcomed some of these new cultural and political ideas, adapting them to fit their own needs. However, they were wary of other aspects of Hellenism, especially those that might clash with Jewish religious beliefs.

By the third century BCE, many Jews read Greek literature and had begun to use Greek for writing and translating Jewish texts. The *Septuagint translation of the *Bible was a response to the needs of Diaspora Jews who were unable to read *Hebrew. Many Jews adopted Greek names and eagerly moved into newly founded Greek cities in Judea and the Diaspora, where they interacted with and learned from Gentiles. They arbitrated disputes according to Hellenistic (non-Jewish) law; Jewish material remains (coins, monuments, tombs) contain Greek inscriptions and Hellenistic, and sometimes pagan, images. Jewish writers adapted Greek literary genres and philosophical ideas. For example, 4 *Maccabees and perhaps *Ecclesiastes were influenced by Stoicism; Ezekiel the Poet was influenced by Greek tragedies, and Demetrius by Greek histories. Some Jews (Aristobulus, Eupolemus) even argued that the greatest Greek thinkers were dependent on the religious and philosophical insights of biblical heroes. This paradoxical claim, seeking to find Jewish roots for Greek accomplishments, reflects an uncomfortable recognition of the depth of Hellenistic influence on contemporary Jewish thought. Even groups one might think were hostile to Hellenism were undeniably influenced by it. The *Hasmoneans, who violently defended traditional Jewish practices, nonetheless used Greek names, minted Greek-style coins, and adopted Greek titles and political structures. The conservative *Qumran community focused on topics formerly of little interest to Jews but reflective of Hellenistic thought, such as communal ownership, celibacy, and utopianism (see also PTOLEMIES: IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURE AND THOUGHT).

However, only a few Jews unreservedly adopted all aspects of Greek life (1 Macc 1:43; 2 Macc 4:13). The emergence of a shared language and practices and of trends that minimized ethnic and cultural differences prompted a Jewish counterreaction, particularly against aspects of Hellenism that appeared to threaten Judaism and Jews' distinctive religious identities. Rituals that separated Jews from Gentiles, like *Sabbath observance, *circumcision, and *dietary restrictions, increased in prominence (1 Macc 1:60–63; 3 Macc 3:4; Joseph and Asenath 7:1; Jubilees 15:11; see APOCRYPHA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA). Hellenistic idolatry and polytheism were harshly decried (Joseph and Asenath 7:3; Wisdom of Solomon 13–15). Jews excoriated Gentile sexual practices (e.g., homosexuality; *Letter of Aristeas 152). This counterreaction reinforced the boundaries between Jews and Gentiles at a time when such boundaries were being lowered. Ironically, some of the harshest attacks appear in texts written in Greek and influenced by Hellenistic rhetoric (e.g., Wisdom of Solomon), highlighting the tension between Jewish acceptance and rejection.

For further reading, see V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews (1959); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism (1974); J. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora (1996); and L. Levine, Judaism and Hellenism in Antiquity (1998).

ADAM GREGERMAN

Herem is a ban of excommunication. It was the ultimate sanction available to Jewish *communal organizations in the Middle Ages and Early Modern Period to discipline recalcitrant members of the community. Offenses could be in a range of areas, including business and civil matters and family disputes, as well as doctrinal disagreements (see *SPINOZA. BARUCH). Excommunicants were cut off from any contact with local and neighboring Jewish communities in all realms of life until they expressed remorse for their actions (and made compensation where appropriate).

Herem ha-yishuv (literally, “ban on settlement”) was a restriction on residence imposed by established medieval and early modern Jewish communities on other Jews, mainly for economic reasons. It appears to have originated in Rhineland Jewish settlements in the eleventh century, spread throughout Europe, and persisted as late as the eighteenth century in *Italy. The right to forbid other Jews from settlement in a particular location was understood to fall within the autonomy Jews were granted by regional authorities. Such communal controls restricting settlement of newcomers were also common among non-Jews. The ordinance protected the economic livelihood of Jewish residents by limiting competition and permitted a community to reject paupers and individuals of questionable moral character. Since the concept of closed communities conflicted with the Jewish value of hospitality, some leaders and scholars supported a herem ha-yishuv only when it excluded violent men, informers, or other individuals perceived as problematic. A hezkat ha-yishuv (“right of settlement”) could sometimes be acquired from the Jewish communal organization (kehillah) by purchase or hire, as well as by inheritance.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Herod and Herodian Dynasty. Herod the Great (ca. 74 BCE–4 BCE) was a local ruler (or “client-king”) in the Land of Israel put in place and supported by *Rome. He was the second son of Antipater II, a powerful courtier of Idumean origins (see EDOM), who served the *Hasmoneans and made alliances with various Roman leaders after 63 BCE. Herod was appointed tetrarch (the ruler of a portion of a province) of *Galilee at age twenty-five. Antigonus II Mattathias, also known as Antigonus the Hasmonean, seized control of *Jerusalem in 40 BCE, and Herod fled to Rome to ask for support in regaining control of Judea. He was appointed “King of the Jews” in 40 BCE by the Roman Senate, but did not recapture Jerusalem and defeat Antigonus until 37 BCE. This victory marked the end of the Hasmoneans and the beginning of the Herodian Dynasty, although Herod attempted to maintain both his family's link with the Hasmoneans and favor with his Jewish subjects by marrying Mariamne, a member of the royal family. Herod's kingdom comprised *Judea, *Samaria, *Galilee, Idumea, Batanea, and Perea. In 20 BCE, Herod began an extensive reconstruction of the Second *Temple; his many other building projects included the port city of Caesarea, Pnias in Galilee, as well as many religious shrines and fortresses (see ARCHEOLOGY, LAND OF ISRAEL: SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD). Throughout his reign, Herod imposed heavy taxes and used brutal methods to maintain his power; he executed his wife Mariamne, three of his sons, a mother-in-law, and a brother-in-law, among many others.

After Herod's death in 4 BCE, Emperor Augustus apportioned a section of the kingdom to each of Herod's three surviving sons by various wives. Archelaus ruled briefly in Judea and Samaria, but was replaced by a Roman procurator in 6 CE. Herod Antipas, the Herod who figures in the *New Testament, became tetrarch of Galilee and Perea and ruled until 39 CE when he was exiled by Emperor Caligula; among other projects, he built Tiberias as his capital and the city of Sepphoris. Philip was appointed over the provinces between the Jordan and Damascus where he ruled until his death in 34 CE. Agrippa I (10 BCE–44 CE), a grandson of Herod through his son Aristobulus (whom Herod executed in ca. 7 BCE) and Berenice (daughter of Herod's sister Salome), succeeded his uncle Philip. He was subsequently given control over the territories of Herod Antipas and parts of Judea that had been ruled by Herod Archelaus. Agrippa's son Agrippa II (d. ca. 92 CE), the last of the dynasty, was educated at the court of Emperor Claudius in Rome. He was appointed ruler of the northern parts of his father's kingdom. Maps 3, 4

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Herzl, Theodor (1860–1904) was the founder of modern political *Zionism. Born in Budapest, he moved to *Vienna with his family when he was eighteen; although he earned a doctorate in law from the University of Vienna, he focused his career on literature and journalism. Herzl was transformed by the vicious *antisemitism that was a feature of Vienna and by the onslaught of anti-Jewish feeling he observed during the *Dreyfus Affair in Paris, where he was a correspondent for Vienna's Neue Freie Presse. In his 1896 Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State), he argued that Jews must declare themselves a nation, leave Europe, and create a Jewish state in *Palestine. With virtually no knowledge of others who shared this goal, Herzl began to construct the necessary institutional framework for a Zionist entity. He founded Die Welt, a Zionist newspaper; called for an international Zionist congress to assemble in 1897; and undertook negotiations with the *Ottoman Empire, Great *Britain, and *Germany for a "charter" for a Jewish state. The First Zionist Congress, held in Basel, Switzerland, in August 1897, adopted the Basel Program, a statement of the goal of the Zionist movement to establish a home for the Jewish people in Palestine secured under public law. The Congress also established the World Zionist Organization, and elected Herzl president. Herzl convened the Zionist Congress yearly; during these meetings the Jewish National Fund was developed. Although world leaders were generally not receptive to his proposals, the British government offered Herzl the possibility of a large autonomous Jewish settlement in East Africa. In 1903, at the Sixth Zionist Congress, he proposed the Uganda Program as a temporary solution for Russian Jews seeking refuge. This proposal, which caused significant controversy within the movement, was ultimately rejected by the Seventh Zionist Congress in 1905 after Herzl's untimely death. In 1949, Herzl's remains were reinterred on Mount Herzl in *Jerusalem.

ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Heschel, Abraham Joshua (1907–1972), philosopher, theologian, and social activist, was born in *Warsaw and immigrated to the *United States in 1940. A descendant of distinguished Ḥasidic dynasties (see ḤASIDISM: EUROPE), he was named after his great-great-grandfather, Abraham Joshua Heschel, the rebbe of Apt (Opatow). A child prodigy who mastered *Bible and *Talmud, as well as Jewish *mysticism and Ḥasidic traditions, Heschel published talmudic commentaries (novellae) in a Warsaw Orthodox monthly when he was fifteen. He received rabbinic ordination at sixteen, but left Warsaw for the secular, *Yiddish-language Real-Gymnasium in *Vilna, Lithuania, to prepare for university study. In *Berlin, he earned a degree from the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, a liberal rabbinical institute, and completed a PhD in philosophy at Friedrich Wilhelm University in 1933, with a minor in the history of art. In the same year, a collection of Heschel's Yiddish poems, Der Shem Hameforash: Mentsh (God's Ineffable Name: Man), which anticipate his mature theological system, was published in Warsaw.

Heschel remained for several years in Berlin, teaching and writing book reviews and essays for the Berlin Jewish community newspaper. His second book, a biography of *Maimonides, appeared in 1935. Impressed by Heschel's learning and personal piety, Martin *Buber invited Heschel to replace him at the Central Organization for Jewish Adult Education in *Frankfurt where he taught at the Jüdisches Lehrhaus, founded by Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig. In October 1938, Heschel was expelled from *Germany, along with thousands of other Jews with Polish passports. He returned to Warsaw and taught at the Institute for Jewish Studies for one academic year; in July 1939 he left for London on a transit visa. Invited to join the faculty of the *Hebrew Union College, the *Reform rabbinical seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio, Heschel reached *New York City in March 1940. He learned two years later that his mother and two sisters had perished in the Warsaw ghetto. In the United States, Heschel initially taught at Hebrew Union College; in 1945 he joined the faculty of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America, the Conservative seminary (see JUDAISM: CONSERVATIVE), in New York, where he remained as Professor of Jewish Ethics and Mysticism until his death. In December 1946 he married Sylvia Straus, a concert pianist; they had one daughter, Hannah Susannah, herself a Judaic scholar and activist.

A consummate literary stylist, Heschel elaborated a vivid *theology of divine presence, a "God of pathos" emotionally concerned about human events. Heschel's writings uniquely explore the intellectual and experiential foundations of traditional Judaism, combining philosophical polemic and lyrical prose to express the passion of a personal faith. The Earth is the Lord's: The Inner Life of the Jew in East Europe (1950) memorializes the Yiddish-speaking culture destroyed in the *Holocaust. The Sabbath: Its Meaning for Modern Man (1951) both analyzes and evokes the sanctification of time, not space, as the cornerstone of Jewish spirituality and culture.

Heschel's international renown began with the publication of Man Is Not Alone: A Philosophy of Religion (1951), and he clarified his Jewish sources in the companion volume, God in Search of Man: A Philosophy of Judaism (1955), which guides readers toward religious insight and the ethical and spiritual meaning of Jewish observance. Man's Quest for God (1955; reprinted as Quest for God) challenges contemporary religion to regain contact with the living God through *prayer. An anthology of Heschel's writings, Between God and Man (1959; bibliography revised in 1975), with an introduction to Heschel's life and works by editor Fritz A. Rothschild, defines the coherence of Heschel's philosophy of religion. Heschel also published a Hebrew multi-volume study on the multiplicity of talmudic theologies, Torah min ha-shamayim be-aspaklaryah shel ha-dorot (1962, 1965, 1996); it was translated and edited by Gordon Tucker with Leonard Levin as Heavenly Torah as Refracted through the Generations (2004).

In the 1960s, Heschel became a public intellectual; the mass media recognized him as a prophetic figure. His book, The Prophets (1962), an expansion in English of his 1933 Berlin doctoral dissertation, presents his identification with those ancient Hebrew critics of moral complacency. Heschel spoke dramatically at national events such as White House Conferences on Children and Youth (1960) and on Aging (1962), and the first National Conference on Religion and Race (1963). As a theological consultant during the Second Vatican Council in *Rome (1962–65), Heschel played a crucial role in the formulation of Nostra Aetate (In Our Times), the official document of the Roman Catholic Church that affirmed the autonomy of Judaism in its own right and rejected the mission to convert the Jews. Heschel was one of the first Americans to protest against the persecution of Jews in the *Soviet Union.

Heschel joined Martin Luther King, Jr., at the Selma–Montgomery *civil rights march of 1965 and became the first Jew to join the faculty of Union Theological Seminary (1965–66) in New York City as the Harry Emerson Fosdick Visiting Professor. Many of his speeches and essays on contemporary issues are collected in The Insecurity of Freedom (1966) and Moral Grandeur and Spiritual Audacity (1996). In Who Is Man? (1965), based on his 1963 Fred West Memorial Lectures at Stanford University, Heschel summarizes his biblical philosophy of human holiness in terms that reject atheistic existentialism.

The last years of Heschel's life were painful and intense. As a co-founder in 1965 of the antiwar organization, Clergy and Laity against the War in Vietnam, he participated in demonstrations, prayer meetings, and rallies. The 1967 war in which Israel was threatened with destruction by its Arab neighbors affected him deeply; his book, Israel: An Echo of Eternity (1969), attempts to explain to Christians the depth of Jewish attachment to the Holy Land. Despite a massive heart attack in 1969, Heschel continued to teach, write, and advance *interfaith dialogue and cooperation. In 1972, the last year of his life, he completed two books, A Passion for Truth (1973) and Kotsk: In gerangl far emesdikayt (Struggle for Integrity, 1973); both are about Heschel's heretofore implicit role model, the dissident and uncompromising Ḥasidic rebbe, R. Menahem Mendel of Kotzk, whom he compared to Søren Kierkegaard. His other model, the optimistic and generous *Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Ḥasidism, exemplified Heschel's faith in and love of God and humankind.

Abraham Joshua Heschel's charisma derived from historical experience as well as faith and religious learning. He embodied the complete Jew, a person possessing immense religious and secular learning yet capable of profound emotion. His insistence on humankind's moral responsibility included an agonizing awareness of the Nazi destruction of *Eastern European Jewry and the conviction that political action must advance God's involvement in human life.

Important works about Heschel and his thought include J. Merkle, The Genesis of Faith: The Depth Theology of A. J. Heschel (1985); H. Kasimow and B. Sherwin, eds., No Religion Is an Island: A. J. Heschel and Interreligious Dialogue (1991); E. K. Kaplan, Holiness in Words: Abraham Joshua Heschel's Poetics of Piety (1996); E. K. Kaplan and S. H. Dresner, Abraham Joshua Heschel: Prophetic Witness (1998); and E. K. Kaplan, Spiritual Radical: Abraham Joshua Heschel in America, 1940–1972 (2007).

EDWARD K. KAPLAN

Heshvan is the eighth month of the Jewish calendar, usually falling in October or November of the Gregorian calendar. It is sometimes called Mar Ḥeshvan, "bitter Ḥeshvan" because there are no holidays in this month. See also CAL-ENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Hezekiah was the thirteenth king of *Judah, who reigned for twenty-nine years beginning ca. 715 BCE, succeeding his father, Ahaz (2 *Kgs 18:1–2). Praised as Judah's most God-fearing king (2 Kgs 18:5–7), Hezekiah repaired the *Temple, removed idolatrous elements from *Israelite religion, and expanded Judah's territory (2 Kgs 18:4). Hezekiah combined religious reform with political unification by centralizing worship in *Jerusalem. During his reign, Sennacherib of *Assyria invaded Judah, and Jerusalem was besieged until Hezekiah agreed to pay tribute. In anticipation of the possibility of a siege, the Gihon Spring had been diverted by underground tunnels into the Siloam pool within the Jerusalem city walls (2 Kgs 20:20; 2 Chron 32:2–4, 30). The Siloam inscription in "Hezekiah's tunnel," discovered in 1880 and now in Istanbul, records the meeting of two teams of stonecutters working from opposite directions and is dated to Hezekiah's reign. See also ARCHEOL-OGY: ANCIENT TIMES TO PERSIAN PERIOD; ISRAELITES:

KINGSHIP; LACHISH. Map 2 KATE FRIEDMAN

High Holidays (also High Holy Days) are the most hallowed period of the Jewish year. Spanning ten days from *Rosh Ha-Shanah (1st of *Tishri) until *Yom Kippur (10th of Tishri) and generally occurring between late August and early October according to the secular calendar, the High Holidays are a time of self-examination, judgment, and *prayer. Also known as the Ten Days of Repentance (aseret yemei teshuvah), they mark a holy season of spiritual renewal when human beings are to contemplate their relationship with God. The *Bible does not use the designation "High Holidays"; rather it is an English derivation from the term yamim noraim (literally, "Days of Awe"), coined by the fourteenth-century Ashkenazic authority, Jacob Moellin, known as the Maharil. In addition, the Bible does not refer to Rosh Ha-Shanah as the "Head of the Year," which is a rabbinic development. The Torah simply identifies Rosh Ha-Shanah as the first day of the seventh month, which should be observed as a sacred occasion with "loud blasts" (Lev 23:23–25). This description would eventually become the source for sounding the *shofar (ram's horn). Some scholars, however, suggest that the sounding of the shofar was to indicate the arrival of *Sukkot, a pilgrimage *festival exactly two weeks later.

Around the time of the destruction of the Second *Temple in 70 CE, the day was named Rosh Ha-Shanah and was said to be a time when human beings are judged (M. Rosh Ha-Shanah 1:2). The three primary themes of the holiday – God's sovereignty, remembrance, and shofarot – were also established then. The theme of God's sovereignty is associated with the acceptance of God as creator and Rosh Ha-Shanah's designation as the "birthday" of creation. The theme of remembrance denotes God's special relationship to those individuals "remembered" and thus deemed worthy of fulfilled promises and reward. Shofarot recalls the ascribed biblical reading for Rosh Ha-Shanah (Gen 22) – the *akedah ("binding") – which tells of *Abraham sacrificing a ram instead of his son *Isaac and alludes to the divine promise that God would forgive Abraham's descendants if they sounded the shofar. Simultaneously, the Rabbis established connections between Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. Yom Kippur, a biblically mandated day of *atonement, expiation of sins, and purification, was related to Rosh Ha-Shanah when the Rabbis wrote, "All are judged on Rosh Ha-Shanah and the verdict is issued on Yom Kippur"

(T. Rosh Ha-Shanah 1:13). Thus, the concept of High Holidays or yamim nora'im was born.

The medieval codes of Jewish halakhah* (law) specify particular observances for the days between Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur, which help maintain the proper spirit of the season. They include the recitation of additional prayers* and supplications (e.g., avinu malkeinu ["our father, our king"]) and fasting, most notably on the Fast of Gedaliah* (3rd of Tishri). The day before Yom Kippur has its own unique significance. Customs for the day include the controversial practice of kapparot ("expiatory offerings" – swinging and slaughtering a fowl as a form of atonement), reciting a confessional, and eating a large, festive meal prior to the Yom Kippur fast.

For further reading, see P. Steinberg, Celebrating the Jewish Year: The Fall Holidays (2007); T. H. Gaster, Festivals of the Jewish Year (1952); R. Hammer, Entering the High Holidays: A Guide to Origins, Themes, and Prayers (1998); and I. Klein, A Guide to Religious Jewish Practice (1979). PAUL STEINBERG

Hillel, also known as Hillel the Elder (ca. 70 BCE–ca. 10 CE), was a leader of the Pharisees* during the reign of Herod*. He is among the most famous sages of the Second Temple* period, founder of a tannaitic* school (Beit Hillel [House of Hillel]), and ancestor of a dynasty of Patriarchs* who held office in the Land of Israel for the next few hundred years. He was born in Babylon* into a family claiming Davidic* lineage and studied there before moving to Jerusalem*. He was said to have paid for his schooling with his earnings from manual labor before his appointment as Patriarch* (nasi) and head of the Sanhedrin*. Hillel is usually linked with his contemporary, Shammai, who also led a group of disciples (Beit Shammai). Although their disagreements were generally minor, Hillel is regarded as a more lenient interpreter of halakhah*, and his rulings are usually favored. Hillel developed a system of rabbinic* hermeneutics with seven rules of biblical interpretation that were later expanded to thirteen rules by R. Ishmael ben Elisha. He also enacted the prosbul; this word, of Greek origin, refers to a legal strategy that eliminated the cancellation of debts in the biblically ordained sabbatical year (Deut 15:1–6). The prosbul allowed lenders to protect their investments and enabled the poor to obtain essential loans (BT Gittin 36a). When asked to explain the entire Torah* while standing on one foot, Hillel's classic response was, "What is hateful to you, do not do to your fellow; this is the whole Torah; the rest is commentary – go and study" (BT Shabbat 31a). ELIZABETH SHULMAN

Hillel Foundations. Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life is the principal organization serving Jewish college and university students in the United States* and Canada*. Founded in 1923 at the University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign, Hillel began as a classic campus ministry designed to meet the spiritual needs of Jewish students studying away from home. The organization grew rapidly under the aegis of B'nai B'rith* and the leadership of historian Abram Sachar, expanding across the continent during the next several decades. Sachar would later serve as the founding president of Brandeis University.

The B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundations benefited from a pluralist religious framework engaging rabbis from multiple movements, a national-local partnership under the B'nai B'rith banner, social restrictions to full Jewish participation in university life, and a virtual monopoly given the relatively low level of Jewish communal interest in university students. Hillels offered a proverbial "home away from home" in an overwhelming Christian environment, providing Jewish students with religious, social, cultural, and leadership opportunities. Hillels also pioneered serious university-level Jewish learning in the pre-Jewish* studies era. Hillel Foundations played a heroic role before, during, and after World War II* in helping rescue and resettle European Jewish faculty and university students. They emerged on more and more campuses as a result of the post-war GI Bill and the entry of increasing numbers of Jewish families into the middle class.

The countercultural forces unleashed in the 1960s had a profound impact on Jewish life on campus. Mainstream organized religious activities, identified as part of "the establishment," attracted fewer students. As discriminatory barriers fell, Jewish students attended elite colleges in larger numbers and participated more fully in every aspect of university life. B'nai B'rith, the principal funder, like other fraternal organizations, also fell on hard times as a result of changing social norms. Although a number of campus Hillel Foundations adapted to these major cultural changes and planted the seeds of organizational transformation, Hillel as a movement fell into a steep decline.

If Abram Sachar shaped and nurtured the organization during its formative stages, another future university president, Richard Joel, a former prosecutor and law school dean, dramatically reshaped and rejuvenated Hillel during the 1990s. Joel downplayed the "synagogue on campus" model and inspired a vision of campus communities engaging a wide variety of Jewish interest groups. He encouraged Hillels to focus less on membership numbers and more on increasing participation or "doing Jewish." He also urged Hillels to become less concerned with constructing buildings, even as new Centers for Jewish Life were opening from coast to coast, and urged that they connect with Jewish students in a range of campus and community settings. Joel's approach attracted large numbers of talented professionals from a variety of backgrounds into Hillel's salaried ranks at the local and national level. He spearheaded Hillel's independence from B'nai B'rith and attracted major funding from Jewish philanthropists, foundations, and federations.

In the early twenty-first century, Hillel has become a prototype of Jewish organizational transformation and renewal with a new national headquarters in Washington, DC; a growing presence in Israel*, the former Soviet Union*, and Latin America*; affiliates at virtually every major university in the United States with a significant Jewish student population; and signature programs and partnerships in the areas of Israel, community service, arts and culture, student engagement, Jewish learning, celebration, and global exchange. JAY RUBIN

Hirsch, Samson Raphael (1808–1888) was an Orthodox rabbi (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: MODERN ORTHODOX), theologian, community leader, educator, and publisher. Hirsch was the leader for most of his life of the Frankfurt am Main Israelitische Religionsgesellschaft* (Israelite Religious Society [IRG], also known as Adass Jeschurun), and played a central role in articulating "Neo-Orthodoxy," a response to Jewish religious reform in mid-nineteenth-century *Germany. His theology combined limited modernization of religious practice; strict fidelity to halakhah; deep commitment to the German language, culture, and social integration; and, ultimately, separation of Orthodox communities from larger, *Reform-dominated official Jewish communities.

Born in 1808 in Hamburg, Hirsch received both a religious and Gymnasium education. The chief rabbi of Hamburg was Isaac Bernays (1792-1849) and the religious milieu he established there had a decisive impact on Hirsch's enthusiasm for the harmony of Orthodox belief and practice with limited modernization. Hirsch attended university at Bonn for a year in 1829-30, and along with classmate Abraham *Geiger, founded a university society for German Jewish students. Opting to pursue a rabbinical career, Hirsch studied in Mannheim under the tutelage of Rabbi Jacob Ettlinger, a preeminent German halakhist and early experimenter in Orthodox popular publication. In 1830, Hirsch accepted the position of district rabbi in Oldenburg, an auspicious beginning to an impressive rabbinic career that took him ultimately in 1851 to Frankfurt am Main via Aurich and Osnabruch in Hannover (1841) and Nikolsberg, Moravia (1846).

It was during Hirsch's early career that religious reform, a simmering issue in Jewish communities throughout the German territories, intensified, and Hirsch emerged as one of its most vocal foes (see JUDAISM, REFORM: GERMANY). His opposition was highly nuanced, however. He embraced many cosmetic modernizations favored by reformers; like Bernays, Hirsch adopted German clerical dress, emphasized decorum in religious worship, accepted some rearrangement of *synagogue interiors, and advocated the use of German in *sermons. He believed that intimate Jewish participation in German culture was wholly compatible with committed Orthodox belief. At the same time, Hirsch defended the centrality of the entirety of Jewish law in his earliest treatises, the 19 Letters (1836) and Horeb (1837). The emergence of a sophisticated German Jewish reading public proved to be among Hirsch's most potent tools; he reached out to his readers through his monthly Jeschurun (launched in the fall of 1855), a journal of Orthodox thought and culture, in which he aimed at creating a full sense of the meaning of being an Orthodox Jew in German society. Topics covered in the journal included discussions of religious education, home life, engagement with German political and social issues, and, in serialized form, a comprehensive commentary on the *Torah, the Jewish *calendar, and ritual.

As head of the IRG, Hirsch's greatest legacy was a key component of his thought: that secession by the Orthodox minority from the official Jewish community was justified to preserve the standards of Orthodox practice. This secession was accomplished for the IRG in 1876, after lengthy debate in the Prussian parliament, in an act that set a significant precedent for the interaction of Orthodox and non-Orthodox communities in Germany and beyond.

For further reading, see N. Rosenbloom, Tradition in an Age of Reform: The Religious Philosophy of Samson Raphael Hirsch (1976); and R. Lieberles, Religious Conflict in Social Context: The Resurgence of Orthodox Judaism in Frankfurt am Main, 1838-1877 (1985).

JESS OLSON

Hittites designates two different ancient peoples, one originating in Anatolia (modern *Turkey) and the other a *Canaanite nation said to be descended from *Noah's great-grandson, Heth (Gen 10:15); it is unclear whether there is any connection between the two groups. *Abraham purchased *Sarah's burial place, a field and cave in *Hebron, from Ephron the Hittite (Gen 23). *Esau married two Hittite women (Gen 26:34); King *David enlisted Uriah, a Hittite soldier (2 Sam 11); and *Solomon married Hittite women (1 Kgs 1:11). From *exile in *Babylon, *Ezekiel invoked Israel's Hittite (and Amorite) antecedents to remind the people of their lowly, idolatrous beginnings and to admonish their faithlessness (16:3).

KATE FRIEDMAN

Holland/Netherlands: See AMSTERDAM; ANNE FRANK; HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS; LITERATURE: CONTEMPORARY EUROPE; MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL

Holocaust comes from the word holokauston, the Greek translation of the Hebrew olah, which is used in the *Torah to denote sacrificial offerings that were totally consumed by fire. The English word "holocaust" was first used in the sense of genocidal murder by the New York Times in 1895 to describe a Turkish massacre of Armenians. Today, the term is most often used to describe the *Nazi persecution and murder of Jews throughout Europe between 1933 and 1945, although some have used it to describe other genocidal crimes as well. During World War II, some Jewish commentators used another Biblical Hebrew word, shoah ("catastrophe," "disaster," "suffering,"), to describe the Nazi genocide of Europe's Jews, and this word continues to be used in this more specific designation.

The origins of the Holocaust lie deep in European history and can be traced to the growing body of anti-Jewish prejudice that evolved in the early centuries of *Christianity. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, a new form of anti-Jewish prejudice, *antisemitism, emerged that blended religious prejudice, traditional folklore, cultural stereotypes, and economic resentment with new pseudo-scientific theories about race. This "racial" antisemitism became one of the cornerstones of a political movement that developed in *Germany after World War I and was led by Adolf Hitler. However, antisemitism and its corollary prejudices alone could not have produced the Holocaust. It was the success of Hitler's National Socialist (Nazi) Party in German elections in the early 1930s that transformed these pernicious ideas into German public policy between 1933 and 1945. Historians have long argued about the intentions of Hitler and the Nazi Party regarding Germany's Jews. What is certain is that from the moment that Hitler became chancellor of Germany on January 30, 1933, he and his Nazi movement began to implement a broad policy to force Germany's half-million Jews out of the country.

Initially the term "Holocaust" was applied only to Jewish victims of Nazi persecution. In the past few decades, however, scholars have pointed to other genocidal victims of the Nazis, particularly the handicapped or disabled and the *Roma. In addition, gays, Polish Christians, Soviet POWs, and others were caught up in the growing net of Nazi persecution and death. However, for the Germans, the Jews were always the principal group of victims. Hitler considered them a threat to his dream of creating a pure Aryan world. From the Nazi perspective, the Jew's supposed "principal crime" was a lust for power. Drawing from the fictitious late-nineteenth-century tsarist document, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion (see RUSSIA), which claimed that there was a secret Jewish plot to take over the world, Hitler embraced the idea of an international Jewish conspiracy and linked it to Vladimir Lenin's seizure of power in Russia in late 1917. In the 1920s and 1930s, the Nazis, who blamed the Jews for everything that had gone awry in the aftermath of the German defeat in World War I, insisted on a connection between Jews and *Bolshevism, linking Germany's Jews with the hated and feared *Soviet Union.

DOMESTIC PHASE, 1933–1939: The Holocaust officially began on January 30, 1933, and ended with the defeat of Germany in the spring of 1945. The evolution of Nazi policy can best be understood by dividing the Holocaust into three distinct phases. The first is the German domestic phase, between 1933 and 1939, when the Nazis cautiously developed a series of policies designed to force as many Jews as possible to leave Germany. However, the Jewish question was secondary at this time to the German leadership's main efforts to consolidate their power and prepare Germany for a war of expansion that would give Hitler the lebensraum or "living space" he felt he needed to build his Thousand Year Reich. Nazi hostility toward the Jews remained controversial within the party until the "Night of the Long Knives" purge by the virulently antisemitic SA (Sturmabteilung) in the summer of 1934. By the fall of 1934, Hitler was secure enough in power to give his top leadership the authority they needed to pressure Germany's Jews to leave.

By 1935, German Jews, who had been stripped of most of their political, social, and economic rights, had little reason to stay in Germany. From Hitler's perspective, what was called for was a set of laws to define and legislate the diminished status of Jews in the Reich. The result was the Nuremberg Laws. Hastily written (and later expanded), they were passed by the Reichstag during the Party Days in Nuremberg in September 1935. There were three laws: the Blutschutzgesetz (Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor), the Reichsbürgergesetz (Reich Citizenship Law), and the Ehegesundheitsgesetz (Marital Health Law). These laws and their supplements defined who was Jewish and declared that Jews could only have rights in Germany as "subjects of the state." They also outlawed *marriage between Jews and non-Jews and created a mechanism to prevent such marriages.

However, the Nazi leadership was not successful in forcing large numbers of Jews to leave in the mid-1930s, partly because few countries were willing to open their doors during a worldwide economic depression. In addition, the uneven nature of Germany's anti-Jewish policies caused some Jews, who would lose everything if they left, to imagine that the worst of Germany's antisemitic persecution had passed. Moreover, there was a lull in the persecution of Jews, driven in large part by Germany's desire to show the world a civilized face while it hosted the 1936 Winter and Summer Olympics. However, once the Olympics ended, pent-up Nazi frustration with the Jews exploded into a growing crescendo of violence, which culminated in the Kristallnacht* pogrom on November 9–10, 1938.

It is important to understand the psychology that drove much of Nazi policy regarding Germany's Jews. Once Hitler had consolidated his hold on power in 1934, he constantly gambled internationally to see what he could get away with. With the announcement of the reestablishment of the draft and German rearmament in 1935, the unchallenged occupation of the Rhineland, and the successful Olympics a year later, Hitler and his inner circle became more and more convinced of his genius. Emboldened by Hitler's international successes, particularly in 1938 when he took over *Austria and then later convinced the Western powers to give him part of *Czechoslovakia as well, some of his top followers such as Joseph Goebbels decided to respond disproportionately to the Paris murder of a lower level German diplomat, Ernst vom Rath, by a young Jew, Herschel Grynszpan, in early November 1938. The Kristallnacht pogrom that followed was a Nazi-sponsored riot that destroyed or damaged 1,500 synagogues and thousands of Jewish businesses and homes; scores of Jews were murdered as well. On November 16, the Gestapo rounded up 30,000 Jewish men and sent them to the Dachau concentration camp outside of Munich. Kristallnacht, which means "night of broken glass," was controversial in and outside of Germany; it infuriated some of Hitler's closest associates who were concerned about its impact on the German economy and the country's image abroad. However, Nazi leaders were in agreement when it came to assigning blame: The Jews were responsible for the pogrom, and Germany's Jewish community should be required to pay 1 billion Reichsmarks ($401 million) for the murder of vom Rath and the damages caused by the riot. Kristallnacht also represented a major turning point in German policy toward its Jews. On January 30, 1939, Hitler told the Reichstag that if Jewish financiers "once again" plunged Europe into war, the result would not be the bolshevization of the world, but the "annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."

INVASION OF POLAND, 1939: The second phase of the Holocaust began with the German invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, which triggered the outbreak of World War II. From the Nazis' perspective, Poland consisted of two racially inferior groups: Jews and Polish Christians. As a nation, it stood in the way of Hitler's dreams of creating an Aryan-pure Europe. Once German troops moved into Poland, they, in league with the Einsatzgruppen (paramilitary mobile killing units), began to murder Polish political, educational, and religious leaders in an effort to destroy any sense of Polish nationhood. Poland itself was divided, with a little more than half of the country turned over to Germany's new ally, the Soviet Union. Western Poland was integrated into the Greater Reich, whereas what remained under German occupation was transformed into the General Government for the Occupied Areas of Poland. The General Government became Nazi Germany's dumping ground for persecuted minorities such as Jews and Roma. Five of the Germans' six death camps were opened in the General Government in 1942.

In the midst of the Nazi campaign against Poland's Christians, the Germans also began to develop policies toward Poland's Jews. Pre-war Poland had a Jewish population of 3.3–3.5 million. About two million Polish Jews were trapped in the German zone at the beginning of the war, and the rest found themselves under Soviet rule. Jews living in those parts of western Poland integrated directly into the Reich were forced into the territory of the General Government. At the end of September 1939, Reinhard Heydrich, the Chief of the Security Police and the SD and one of Heinrich Himmler's principal associates, ordered the creation of Judenräte (Jewish Councils) and Ältestenräte (Elders Councils) to act as liaisons between the SS and Jewish communities within the General Government to ensure that Poland's Jews obeyed German dictates. During the first year of the German occupation, the Nazis stripped Polish Jews of all of their property and rights, leaving them desperate and impoverished. In addition, the Jews in the General Government were forced into ghettos to isolate them from the rest of the Polish population. The ghetto system was designed to exploit Jews as slave labor, a policy intended to kill Poland's Jewish population (see HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS).

By the summer of 1940, Nazi leaders were frustrated by the fact that they had still not developed a policy to deal with the growing Jewish populations under their control. Nazi leaders developed two plans for shipping Europe's Jews to Madagascar, which had been taken over by the Germans after the conquest of France in June 1940. By the end of the summer, however, the SS had lost interest in Madagascar and began to develop new ideas for dealing with the Third Reich's growing Jewish population.

In the fall of 1940, Hitler began to develop plans for the invasion of Soviet Union, a country he saw as the center of "Jewish Bolshevism." This German plan, Operation Barbarossa, envisioned a quick victory that would destroy Joseph Stalin's armed forces and give Germany control over the Soviet Union's vast economic resources. Russia would then become a prime Aryan breeding ground for Hitler's Thousand Year Reich. Stimulated by their track record of easy victories in other parts of Europe and by Hitler's growing sense of invincibility, the Germans planned an invasion that would really be an extermination, intended to eliminate not only Soviet Russia's hated communist elite but also the country's five million Jews. Specially trained Einsatzgruppen were given principal responsibility for the initial mass murder of Jews in territories that fell under German control; they were aided by other units drawn from Himmler's paramilitary units, the Wehrmacht, and native collaborators throughout western Russia. By the end of 1941, these units had murdered between 500,000 to 800,000 Jews in mass executions. Those Jews not murdered on the spot were sent to new ghettos in occupied parts of the Soviet Union.

The initial successes of German forces in the Soviet Union triggered a new discussion about how to deal with Russia's Jews. After talks with Hitler in July 1941, Himmler told Rudolf Höss, the commandant of the Auschwitz concentration camp, that the Führer had ordered the Endlösung der Judenfrage (Final Solution of the Jewish Question). He added that Höss, working closely with Adolf Eichmann, Himmler's specialist on Jewish deportations, was just the person to carry out Hitler's wishes. On July 31, 1941, Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring, who was still technically in charge of Germany's Jewish policies, signed a decree that many scholars think provided Heydrich with the authority to begin planning for the "Final Solution." Over the next six months, the SS experimented with various methods of murder, using Zyklon B at Auschwitz I and gas vans at Chełmno near Łódź. The SS also began to recruit specialists from the earlier T-4 program in Germany, which had been developed to engage in mass murder of the handicapped and the disabled. These "euthanasia" specialists in mass death and body disposal provided the SS with the expertise needed to develop the final stages of the Final Solution.

FINAL SOLUTION, 1942–45: By the end of 1941, the mass murder of Jews in Russia was common knowledge to most top-ranking government and Nazi party leaders. Consequently, Heydrich decided to call a meeting at an SS villa in Wannsee, a suburb outside of Berlin, to ensure coordination between the various government and party agencies involved in various aspects of the Final Solution. Initially planned for December 9, the Wannsee Conference was postponed after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor two days earlier and rescheduled for January 20, 1942. By this date, plans for the implementation of the Final Solution were almost complete. Once the meeting began, Heydrich announced that the SS was now fully in charge of the "Jewish Question." His goal was to oversee the complete annihilation of Europe's eleven million Jews. He planned to use the Nuremberg Laws to determine who was Jewish, which prompted a discussion about mischlinge (individuals who were partly Jewish).

What followed was the mass movement of Jews from various parts of German-occupied Europe to the General Government, where five of Nazi Germany's six death camps were opened. The first was at Chełmno (Kulmhof) in the Greater Reich near Łódź (Litzmannstadt). Three camps—Bełżec, Sobibór, and Treblinka—were opened as part of Aktion Reinhard to murder the 2.3 million Jews now in the General Government. The SS opened Majdanek in the suburbs of Lublin as both a death camp and forced labor camp. Yet it was Auschwitz, Hitler's "factory of death," that became the symbol of the Final Solution (see HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS).

Approximately half of the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust met their fate in these death camps. The Germans and their collaborators murdered the rest in mass field killings, in ghettos and occupied communities, in forced or slave labor camps, or in transit to the "East." Estimates are that the Germans murdered 1.1 million Jews in Auschwitz, 874,000 in Treblinka, 600,000 at Bełżec, 250,000 at Sobibór, 147,000 at Chełmno, and 80,000 in Majdanek.

Initially, German policy focused on murdering all Jews in Europe. Jews were deported to death camps from all areas and regions occupied by the Nazis. However, there was a constant struggle between the SS and other organs of state about the efficacy of murdering Jewish slave laborers who had become an important part of the German war economy. Those Jews who managed to survive the mass killings of 1941–1943 generally did so as slave laborers working in unimaginably horrible conditions. Their survival was due in large part to efforts at spiritual resistance that helped Jewish workers and inmates maintain a sense of dignity and humanity (see HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE).

The Germans did everything possible to delude Jews into thinking that their transfers to death camps were moves to better living conditions in labor camps. Such policies worked to a point, but by the time that the Germans began to liquidate the major ghettos in the General Government, word had spread about the real purpose of the transports. It was in the midst of these transfers that some of the most heroic acts of resistance took place in Warsaw, Treblinka, Sobibór, and other ghettos and camps. The most famous of these Jewish uprisings was in the Warsaw ghetto between April 19 and May 16, 1943, when a handful of young Jewish rebels held out against several thousand crack German troops.

The Holocaust ended once Allied troops liberated the scattered death and concentration camps in what remained of German-occupied Europe in 1944 and 1945. The Red Army liberated Majdanek in July 1944 and Auschwitz in January 1945. By this time, the Germans had forced most Jews in the East to participate in death march to camps in the Greater Reich. When World War II ended on May 7–9, 1945, 3.3 million Jews were still alive in Europe out of a pre-war population of 9.5 million.

For further reading, see M. Berenbaum and A. J. Peck, eds., The Holocaust and History: The Known, the Unknown, the Disputed, and the Reexamined (1998); R. Breitman, The Architect of Genocide: Himmler and the Final Solution (1991); C. Browning, The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942 (2004); D. M. Crowe, The Holocaust: Roots, History, and Aftermath (2008); Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, I. Gutman, editor in chief, 4 vols. (1990); and R. Hilberg, The Destruction of the European Jews, 3rd edition, 3 vols. (2003).

DAVID M. CROWE

Holocaust: Camps and Killing Centers. Immediately following Adolf Hitler's elevation to power as Germany's chancellor on January 30, 1933, the *Nazi Party began to open concentration, forced labor, and other types of camps to incarcerate individuals deemed to be criminal, political, biological, or racial enemies of the state. Over the next twelve years, the Nazi government expanded this network to include *ghettos and death camps in which Jews throughout German-occupied Europe were incarcerated and murdered.

The Nazis opened Dachau, their first major concentration camp (Konzentrationslager), in the spring of 1933. Its first commandant, Theodor Eicke, developed a strict administrative system that became the model for similar camps throughout Nazi-occupied Europe. These camps were run by the SS (Schutzstaffel; "security squad") and its death's head units (Totenkopfverbände). The SS built crematoria at Dachau, but there is some controversy over whether a gas chamber was used there. Dachau was the site of some abhorrent military-related medical experiments by SS and Luftwaffe physicians who infected some inmates with malaria and subjected others to deadly high altitude and low temperature experiments. Others were forced to drink large quantities of seawater.

Initially, Jews were not sent in large numbers to concentration camps because German policy was intended to drive the Third Reich's half-million Jews out of the country by gradually depriving them of civil, economic, and political rights. This all changed after Kristallnacht* ("Crystal Night" or "Night of Broken Glass") on November 9–10, 1938. Soon after, the Gestapo (secret state police) rounded up 30,000 Jewish men and sent them to the Dachau, Buchenwald, and Sachsenhausen concentration camps. Germany had already occupied Austria in the spring of 1938 and opened the Mauthausen concentration camp. About a third of the 119,000 inmates who died there during the Holocaust were Jews. After the German takeover of what remained of *Czechoslovakia in the spring of 1939, the region was transformed into the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia and the SS began to persecute Czech Jews. In October 1941,

Reinhard Heydrich, the Protectorate's deputy Reichsprotektor, and Adolf Eichmann, one of Heinrich Himmler's top deportation specialists, decided to open a new camp north of Prague in the town of Terezín (Theresienstadt). This was initially a ghetto for elderly and privileged Reich Jews, but Eichmann later transformed it into a special "show" camp to dispel rumors about the "Final Solution."

To maintain this façade, Eichmann, who kept an office at Theresienstadt, allowed the ghetto's large community of scholars, writers, musicians, and artists a certain amount of creative freedom to study, write, and compose. In 1944, Joseph Goebbels' propaganda office produced a film, Theresienstadt: Ein Dokumentarfilm aus dem jüdischen Siedlungsgebiet (Documentary Film of the Jewish Resettlement), that was later shown to a visiting Red Cross delegation. Fifteen thousand children passed through Theresienstadt on their way to death camps in occupied Poland. Some of their art and poems has been published in I Never Saw Another Butterfly, edited by Hana Volavkova. More than 33,000 Jews died in Theresienstadt, and more than 87,000 were sent on to death camps.

The Germans and the Soviets conquered and divided *Poland in the fall of 1939. Two million Polish Jews were trapped in the German zone in the west, and 1.3–1.5 million came under Soviet control. After the integration of certain portions of western Poland into the Greater Reich, the Germans transformed what remained into a region they called the General Government. Five of Nazi Germany's six death camps were opened in the General Government in 1942 as part of the "Final Solution of the Jewish Question." The deadliest of these camps was *Auschwitz (Oświęcim) where the Germans murdered almost a million Jews, along with 70,000–75,000 Poles, 21,000 *Roma, and 15,000 Soviet POWs. More than two-thirds of the Jewish victims were from Hungary (438,000) and Poland (300,000). Auschwitz was unique both for its size (25 square miles) and sense of permanency. In addition to its three major camps, Auschwitz I, II, and III, Auschwitz had a large network of Nebenlager or subcamps. Auschwitz I was the Stammlager (main camp) or concentration camp, Auschwitz II–Birkenau was the death camp, and Auschwitz III–Buna/Monowitz was the I. G. Farben complex that used slave labor to manufacture synthetic rubber. *Chełmno (German, Kulmhof), not Auschwitz, was the only fully operational death camp in the Third Reich. Himmler opened it in late 1941 to murder Jews and Roma in the Łódź ghetto and the Warthegau district of Greater Germany. The Germans murdered 147,000 Jews and 5,000 Roma at Chełmno from 1941 to 1944. Unlike Chełmno, *Majdanek was a sprawling (676 acres) death and forced labor camp. It opened in the summer of 1941 as the Waffen-SS POW Camp Lublin and later as the Waffen-SS Concentration Camp Lublin. More than 360,000 of Majdanek's half-million prisoners would die there; 16% were Jews.

In late 1941, Himmler asked Odilo Globocnik, the Higher SS and Police Leader in the Lublin district, to develop Aktion Reinhard, an SS program designed to murder the remaining 2.3 million Jews in the General Government in three temporary death camps: *Bełżec, *Sobibór, and *Treblinka. Six hundred thousand Jews died in Bełżec between February and December 1942. Sobibór was located about sixty-five miles northeast of Lublin. Commandant Franz Stangl and his staff murdered 250,000 Jews between April 1942 and September 1943 before transforming it into a farm. The concentration camp Treblinka, located in a remote area northeast of Warsaw, was the deadliest of the Aktion Reinhard death camps. From July 1942 until early August 1943, the Germans murdered 874,000 Jews and several thousand Roma at Treblinka. The camp was shut down after an uprising on August 2, 1943. Although the SS shot many of the camp's remaining prisoners during the escape, the rebels were able to destroy part of the camp. Unfortunately, the brick gas chambers remained intact and were used for several more weeks before Treblinka was closed and totally demolished. Ten weeks later, a similar rebellion took place at Sobibór. Hundreds of Jewish inmates attacked their guards and escaped, although the SS later captured about half of them. Himmler ordered Sobibór closed and the site turned into a farm. He then initiated Operation Erntefest (Harvest Festival) to murder all of the Jews still alive in the Lublin district. On November 3, 1943, the SS and Order Police murdered 42,000 to 45,000 Jews in the Trawinki, Pontiatowa, and Majdanek forced labor camps.

The last major rebellion of the Holocaust took place in Auschwitz in the fall of 1944. On October 7, 1944, three hundred Sonderkommandos, who had just learned of Himmler's plans to close Auschwitz, blew up crematorium IV and fought the SS with hammers and axes. The SS killed 451 Jews during the uprising and executed others involved in the plot. Two weeks later, a smaller rebellion took place after a Jewish woman shot two SS guards. Himmler ordered the destruction of the crematoria at Auschwitz I and II after the October 7 rebellion. When the Soviet army liberated Auschwitz on January 17, 1945, all that remained of its once vast prisoner population were 7,000 sick or dying inmates.

For further reading, see M. T. Allen, The Business of Genocide: The SS, Slave Labor, and the Concentration Camp (2002); Y. Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka; The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (1987); Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum, Auschwitz, 1940–1945, 5 vols. (2000); D. Cesarani, Becoming Eichmann: Rethinking the Life, Crimes, and Trial of a "Desk Murderer" (2004); D. M. Crowe, The Holocaust: Roots, History, and Aftermath (2008); H. Langbein, Against All Hope; Resistance in the Nazi Concentration Camps, trans. H. Zohn (1994); L. Poliakov, Harvest of Hate: The Nazi Program for the Destruction of the Jews of Europe (1979); and W. Sofsky, The Order of Terror: The Concentration Camp, trans. W. Templer (1997).

DAVID M. CROWE

Holocaust Denial is the attempt to refute the fact that approximately 5.1 to 6 million Jews were targeted simply because they were Jews – deprived of their legal rights, employment, homes, and possessions; dehumanized; and systematically murdered by the Nazi regime and its collaborators before and during World War II (1939–45). Holocaust denial is not a homogeneous ideology; those who deny the Holocaust have diverse motivations, and statements of denial can be made in many different ways. The Holocaust is refuted by a broad range of groups, from radical right-wing hate mongers, to "revisionists" seeking scholarly legitimacy, to radical Muslim groups desiring the destruction of Israel.

The origins of Holocaust denial can be traced to the Nazi perpetrators themselves. Nazi policies to murder the Jews were cloaked in secrecy, and the Nazis attempted to cover up or eliminate evidence of their destructive aims even while the process was under way. Official Nazi language regarding the planning and the process of murdering Europe's Jews was shrouded in euphemism; terms like "special treatment" were used to signify murder by gassing. When defeat became inevitable the Nazis tried to erase evidence of their plans by destroying documentation and eliminating forensic evidence, such as the crematoria in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

These Nazi attempts to hide their crimes deprived prosecutors, historians, and others of significant evidence that could have been used to re-create the events of the Holocaust in full. This missing documentation accounts for much of the historiographical debate on the Holocaust that has continued since the Germans were defeated. Even today, the exact number of Jews murdered remains elusive, and there is no extant documentation of a clear order by Hitler or anyone else to destroy European Jewry. These gaps in the historical record have led some to question whether the Nazis actually intended the deliberate elimination of Europe's Jews. These deniers often state that, although many Jews lost their lives during World War II, there was no official Nazi policy to murder the Jews and that the Jews who were killed were casualties of war.

Many deniers want their theories popularized, seeking attention in hopes of opening a "legitimate debate" on whether the Holocaust happened. They want to be considered scholars or historical "revisionists," allegedly using historical methodology to prompt reconsideration of generally accepted assumptions about an historical event. Yet, deniers stray far from accepted methodological approaches; for instance, by falsifying evidence or disregarding overwhelming evidence that counters their claims. They often focus on discrediting one piece of evidence in order to argue that the entire event never happened at all. Robert Faurisson, who denied the existence of gas chambers, and David Irving, who was deemed a Holocaust denier by a British court in 2000 after an unsuccessful libel case he brought against historian Deborah Lipstadt, are two prime examples of Holocaust deniers.

Deniers often begin their claims with the illogical credo that the Holocaust was a "hoax" and lapse into solipsism, basing their "proof" that the Holocaust did not happen on other deniers' false claims and unsubstantiated arguments. Because deniers present an irrational negation of a historical event, legitimate historians – who operate within the realm of accepted logic and methodology – have little ability to counter their claims. Holocaust deniers are often motivated by antisemitism, racism, or particular political beliefs. Thus, some argue that the Holocaust is an invention of a "world Jewish conspiracy" to advance the interests of world Jewry and specifically Israel. Often they use the denial or severe minimization of the Holocaust as a means of questioning Israel's legitimacy. Others negate the Holocaust because they are true believers in Nazi ideology and hope for its resurgence in the political realm, seeking to remove the "negative stigma" of claims of genocide against the Nazi regime. These deniers include radical right-wing groups, neo-Nazis, and others who believe that Nazism was an effective political philosophy.

Holocaust denial is prevalent on the internet, especially on sites based in the United States where the First Amendment guarantees freedom of speech. In contrast, in some countries like Germany and Austria, Holocaust denial is illegal, and those who would deny the Holocaust in public are subject to prosecution.

For further reading, see D. Lipstadt, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (1994); M. Shermer and A. Grobman, Denying History: Who Says the Holocaust Never Happened and Why Do They Say It? (2002); R. Evans, Lying about Hitler: History, Holocaust, and the David Irving Trial (2002); and R. J. van Pelt, The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial (2002).

CHRISTINE SCHMIDT VAN DER ZANDEN

Holocaust Diaries. Jewish men, women, and youth from throughout Europe wrote diaries during the years of the *Holocaust. Although we will never know precisely how many people kept diaries, the hundreds of diaries that have turned up since the war's end suggest that thousands likely existed. Diary writing was thus a widespread phenomenon that constituted one significant component of Jewish cultural responses to persecution by *Nazi Germany and its collaborators. Unlike *memoirs and post-war testimonies, diaries reveal Jewish victims' perceptions and self-understandings in the midst of their increasingly desperate situations.

Diaries reflect the diversity of European Jewry on the eve of World War II as well as their varied wartime circumstances. The most widely read Holocaust diary, that of Anne *Frank, illuminates the situation of those acculturated *Central and Western European Jews who understood that their lives were in danger and who had the means and opportunity to go into hiding. These individuals had little comprehension of what awaited them in *Poland should they be captured and deported. The well-known diaries of Adam *Czerniakow, Emanuel *Ringelblum, and Chaim Kaplan attest to the range of Polish Jewish identities during this period and offer a multifaceted portrait of life in the *Warsaw ghetto, from the Polonized engineer (Czerniakow) who worked on a daily basis to improve the situation of his co-religionists in his capacity as head of the Jewish Council in Nazi-occupied Warsaw; to the leftist Poalei Zion community activist and historian Ringelblum who spearheaded the creation of the Oyneg Shabes underground archive and played a leading role in the Warsaw ghetto uprising; to Kaplan, the Hebrew elementary school principal who made it his mission to chronicle with candor the unprecedented crisis confronting Polish Jews. The diary of Victor Klemperer meticulously describes the experience of a university professor and German Jewish convert to Protestantism who was never deported from Dresden because of his "privileged status" as the spouse of a non-Jewish German. What even this brief summary of a few of the best-known diaries reveals is the complexity of Jewish identities during the Holocaust. Many individuals underwent subtle or even radical transformations in their conceptions of what it meant to be Jewish and German – or Polish or French, etc. – as a result of the persecution they were experiencing and their realization that they were facing death. We are privy to their wartime struggles because of the deliberate efforts of Jews to document their experiences.

The heterogeneity of Jewish victims is also evident in the different motivations that compelled people to write diaries. Many Jews turned to diary writing because they sought to connect their present suffering to the deeply rooted Jewish literary tradition of writing in response to catastrophe. Jewish diary writing also confirms the transformation of Jewish cultural practices in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries as part of the process of Jewish acculturation to European societies, in which diary writing had become a means of autobiographical reflection, intellectual exploration, and historical documentation. Some individuals were prompted to bear witness to their wartime experiences in hopes that their diaries would furnish evidence in the pursuit of justice after the war and in the writing of history. And for individuals with relatives abroad, diaries became a vehicle for imparting information about the fate of their family members to be delivered at war's end.

The content of diaries was largely determined by the diarists' reasons for writing. As a result, the body of source materials grouped under the rubric "diaries" is quite varied in subject matter and style of writing. Diarists who sought to contribute evidence for future historians, such as Herman Kruk in the *Vilna ghetto, Philip Mechanicus in the Dutch transit camp Westerbork, David Sierakowiak in the Łódź ghetto, as well as Kaplan, Ringelblum, and Klemperer, described everything from daily efforts to procure food, family and social relations, Jewish leadership, educational and cultural activities, religious responses, and news and rumors about the war and the fates of other Jews. Some diaries focused on intimate thoughts and feelings, especially, although not exclusively, those written by adolescents. Some diaries were written anonymously and others were signed; some diaries were written by individuals acting independently, and others were written by individuals participating in underground group efforts to record Jewish experiences. Finally, some diaries were revised or edited by their writers, whereas others remained unedited.

Certain aspects of Jewish victims' experiences during the Holocaust barely register in diaries. The impossibility of procuring writing supplies, as well as the lack of privacy and hiding places, meant that few people wrote diaries in concentration and extermination camps. Anne Frank's diary is a perfect illustration of this lacuna in the evidence; her diary stops three days before her deportation from *Amsterdam, which means that we must turn to other sources for information about her experiences in Westerbork, *Auschwitz, and Bergen-Belsen. At the same time, there are some notable exceptions. Among them are the diaries and notes written by three Jewish men who worked in the gas chambers and crematoria in Auschwitz-Birkenau. The manuscripts had been buried on the grounds of the crematoria and were discovered after the war.

Even in ghettos and in hiding, writing a diary proved emotionally and physically difficult. Paper, writing instruments, and privacy were in short supply in those settings where staving off hunger and evading round-ups for forced labor or deportation took precedence. Moreover, diaries endangered the lives of diarists and their helpers. As a result, some individuals discontinued their diaries. Others wrote in guarded language or avoided certain topics altogether out of consideration for other people's lives.

Although Holocaust diaries, taken together, are not a complete chronicle of Jewish experiences and perceptions during the Holocaust, they nonetheless open up aspects of Holocaust history that are otherwise inaccessible. Diarists' interpretive efforts are also significant because they reveal many Jews' efforts to translate their experiences into language and transmit them to others. In so doing, diarists attempted to empower themselves within the tremendous constraints imposed on them. They tried to allay the fear that nothing would remain of their lives and their worlds by recording their experiences, hoping that doing so would be affirming to themselves as well as to future readers.

For further reading, see R. Feldhay Brenner, Writing as Resistance: Four Women Confronting the Holocaust (1997); A. Garbarini, Numbered Days: Diaries and the Holocaust (2006); S. Kassow, Who Will Write Our History? Emanuel Ringelblum, the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Oyneg Shabes Archive (2007); and A. Zapruder, Salvaged Pages: Young Writers' Diaries of the Holocaust (2002).

ALEXANDRA GARBARINI

Holocaust Documentation is the collective term for the written, visual, and tangible documents regarding the antecedents, events, and aftermath of the *Holocaust; that is, the systematic disenfranchisement, dehumanization, and murder of five to six million Jews by *Nazi Germany and its allies and collaborators during the World War II era.

It is often said that the Holocaust is one of the most well documented crimes in human history. Because the Holocaust affected nearly every level of European society that came under Nazi occupation or influence in the 1930s and 1940s, documentation about or related to the Holocaust was generated by many sources. Much Holocaust documentation has survived, although it is scattered around the world in myriad archives, libraries, personal collections, and other repositories. There is no way to measure accurately the amount of documentation generated about the Holocaust, nor is there any way to discern with close certainty the amount of Holocaust documentation that was destroyed during the war or after, whether purposefully, unwittingly, or due to the ravages of time.

TYPES OF DOCUMENTATION: Documentation related to the Holocaust was generated for various reasons. Jewish victims sometimes kept *diaries, took photographs, conducted correspondence, and kept other kinds of documentation as part of their daily existence. One of the most famous diaries is that of the young German girl, Anne *Frank, who kept a journal while hiding in *Amsterdam for two years before she was deported. Concentration camp prisoners were able to keep some records (these include manuscripts written and hidden by the members of the Sonderkommando in *Auschwitz-Birkenau or the photographs taken by the camp *resistance). Official Jewish authorities (Jewish community bodies, "Jewish Councils," etc.) and legal and illegal organizations (aid organizations inside and outside Nazi rule, underground organizations, etc.) created a significant amount of documentation as well.

There were some organized efforts to catalogue eyewitness accounts and other evidence during the Holocaust itself. One prime example of this is the so-called Ringelblum archive, or Oyneg Shabes (Joy of Sabbath) collection. In 1939, historian Emanuel *Ringelblum formed a group of clandestine archivists who gathered all sorts of records (testimony, photographs, poetry, essays, music) chronicling the horrific daily events of the *Warsaw ghetto. Within the confines of the *ghetto, the group buried the documentation in milk cans, which were only partially recovered after the war. The Ringelblum archive remains one of the most valuable collections of primary source documentation about the Holocaust. Another famous example of the attempt to document the mass murder was the "Auschwitz Protocols," a manuscript compiled by escapees from Auschwitz-Birkenau in the spring of 1944 to inform the world about the genocide. Witnesses to the horror often recorded what they saw clandestinely in various art forms, including visual (drawings, paintings, and sketches in different media), musical (for example, concerts, musical scores), and literary forms (poetry and plays, for instance). Felix Nussbaum, David Olère, and Joseph Nassy drew and painted painful scenes from the camps and ghettos where they were imprisoned. Nussbaum did not survive Auschwitz, although his numerous works, which depict graphic images of life in the camp, did (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: ART).

In the post-Holocaust era many survivors wrote recollections and memoirs about their Holocaust experiences. In addition, extensive testimonial collections were created; one of the largest is the USC Shoah Foundation Institute, which holds tens of thousands of video testimonies. In the decades following the Holocaust, the survivors of many destroyed communities compiled so-called memorial books (Yizkor* books) consisting of contemporary documents, recollections, photographs, lists of names of the victims, etc.

Perpetrators of the Holocaust and those who collaborated in its perpetration also created documentation for various reasons and in many forms. The German Nazi party and state organizations, including financial, medical, administrative, transportation, law enforcement, military, and terror agencies (SS, SD, Gestapo, etc.), created a plethora of documents. Reports of the Einsatzgruppen*, the mobile killing squads that were responsible for the murder of hundreds of thousands of Jews in *Eastern Europe, were one of the most prominent types of such documents. In the course of disenfranchising, looting, deporting, and murdering Jews, the authorities and organizations of the collaborating and pro-Nazi European governments produced a large amount of visual and written documents. The diaries of prominent top Nazis have also survived, among them, those of Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda Joseph Goebbels and of Hans Frank, "General Governor" of occupied *Poland. Many perpetrators were called to account in trials (see HOLOCAUST: TRIALS) in the post-Holocaust years. These trials not only necessitated gathering thousands of pages of documentary and visual evidence to build cases against the accused perpetrators but also resulted in the creation of an immense amount of new documents pertaining to the perpetrators (interrogations, testimonies, and so on).

A third group of Holocaust documentation was created by bystanders and rescuers. Such documents include eyewitness accounts; contemporary diaries; individuals' correspondence; and materials produced during and right after the Holocaust by neutral and allied governments, military authorities, diplomatic corps, and aid organizations.

Holocaust documentation not only includes visual (photography, film, and artistic images) and written materials (letters, notes, diaries, orders, laws, reports, correspondence, press articles, recollections, trial materials) but also tangible or material "documents" such as cattle cars, barbed wires, concentration camp buildings and facilities, and textiles such as yellow stars and concentration camp clothing.

ARCHIVES AND REPOSITORIES: The most extensive archives and repositories of Holocaust-related documentation can be found in the *United States (the most prominent are at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, National Archives and Records Administration, and the *YIVO – Institute for Jewish Research); *Israel (*Yad Vashem – The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, Central Zionist Archives, Ghetto Fighters' House, among others); and *Germany (Bundesarchiv, International Tracing Service, and archives in former concentration camps). The two largest archives are at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and Yad Vashem in Israel; both have specific and sustained plans and programs that seek out valuable and often neglected collections around the world to preserve and digitize. The archives in the former *Auschwitz concentration camp (Oświęcim, Poland) also hold a significant amount of documentation relevant to the Holocaust.

In addition to the specific collections, many documents (especially those created by administrative, military, and law enforcement agencies) can be found in various national, municipal, governmental, provincial, communal, military, and Christian ecclesiastical archives of European countries. Jewish communities across Europe also preserve Holocaust-related documents.

An increasing number of documentation collections are becoming available on the *internet (see, for example, the websites of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and Yad Vashem, as well as more specialized projects such as the Avalon Project at Yale University's website, which makes available a considerable amount of documentation from the Nuremberg trials). However, despite this growing trend in open access on the internet, documents are still often closed because of stringent data regulation laws and for political reasons, issues of state security, and economic reasons. This is especially true in the former Communist Bloc countries, where, despite the changes in the political system in recent decades, document collections are only slowly becoming open. Yet these kinds of restrictions on sensitive or potentially implicative documentation apply to a certain extent everywhere, as, for instance, with the Vatican archives and, until recently, the International Tracing Service collection of documents.

Lastly, there is no way to estimate accurately the amount of potentially millions of pages of documentation stored in the personal collections of individuals. In 2007–08, for example, the photo album of SS officer Karl Höcker, a member of the staff of Auschwitz-Birkenau, was found in a private collection, as was a previously unknown blueprint of the gas chambers of the Birkenau death camps. These examples show that, in the years to come, more and more documentation will probably be discovered, yielding further information about the events of the Holocaust.

For further reading, see the descriptions, finding aids, and archival inventories of the largest Holocaust-related archives: www.ushmm.org, www.its-arolsen.org, www.yadvashem.org, <http://college.usc.edu/vhi/>, and <http://www.auschwitz-muzeum.oswiecim.pl/>.

CHRISTINE SCHMIDT VAN DER ZANDEN

immediately following *World War II. Still, curricular materials used in the *Reform, *Conservative, and *Yiddish school systems discussed the Jewish experience under *Nazism in a manner that conformed to early post-war American Jews' ideals and values. Drawing on the patriotism, optimism, and anti-totalitarianism of the wider American culture, and the emphasis on Jewish strength and bravery that characterized *Zionist thought, early Holocaust education in the American Jewish community emphasized Jewish wartime heroism, especially the *Warsaw ghetto uprising and the rescue mission of Hannah Senesh.

The Holocaust began to move from the periphery to the mainstream of American culture and education in the 1960s. A wave of media events and scholarly debates, most notably the capture of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in 1960, brought the Holocaust into the public spotlight. The destruction of European Jewry became an event distinct from the general destruction of World War II. This reconceptualization filtered down into the Jewish and secular classroom, as educators felt the need to help their students understand events being discussed in newspapers, magazines, and the new medium of *television. In the politically and ideologically charged climate of the 1960s, teachers in the Reform and Conservative movements, which experienced the most dramatic growth in the post-war period, found lessons in the Holocaust relevant to the civil rights movement (see UNITED STATES: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT), the anti-war movement, and other issues facing American society. *Israel's victory in the Six Day War (1967), with its redemptive imagery of Jewish soldiers defending the Jewish state, emboldened teachers to examine the greatest period of Jewish victimization. The 1973 Yom Kippur War heightened feelings of isolation and vulnerability among Israelis and American Jews, reinforcing the view that one could not understand the importance of Israel without understanding the Jewish experience under Nazism.

The moral education and civic education movements of the late 1970s, closely tied to the national introspection arising out of the Vietnam War and Watergate scandal, played important roles in promoting Holocaust education in the wider American public. Advocates of civic education, oriented toward teaching tolerance and individual responsibility, adopted the Holocaust as an ideal case study for exploring citizens' duties in a democratic, nonracist society. Attention surrounding the 1978 television mini-series Holocaust further spurred calls for education in America's public schools, as politicians, teachers, clergy, artists, and others saw in the Holocaust lessons relevant to contemporary American society. Following Steven Spielberg's film Schindler's List (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM) and the opening of the *United States Holocaust Museum (see HOLOCAUST MEMORIALS; MUSEUMS: Holocaust Museums and Memorials), both in 1993, several states passed legislation mandating Holocaust and genocide education in their public schools. By the end of the twentieth century, Jewish educators had come to see study of the Holocaust as critical to inculcating ethnic identity in their students, and teachers in public and private schools across the religious and political spectrum regarded Holocaust education as essential not only to teaching American and world history but also to conveying lessons that reinforced their community's values.

RONA SHERAMY

Holocaust Education: North America. The Holocaust did not exist as a discrete topic of study in the years

Holocaust: Ghettos. “Ghettos” in this context refers to the residential districts in which the Germans and their allies forcibly interned Jews as a means of congregating and separating them from the main population. Their function was to hold Jews until such time as they could be deported elsewhere for forced labor or to be killed. Typically, ghettos were located in a poor section of a city with inadequate facilities to house the imprisoned inhabitants; population density often ranged from five to eight persons per room. These crowded conditions, coupled with inadequate food supplies and poor quality housing, led to the rapid spread of disease and high mortality rates. Ghettos were usually found in cities; Jewish populations from surrounding rural areas were forced to relocate to the designated area. However, some ghettos were located in small towns and the countryside. The majority of these rural ghettos were eventually emptied or liquidated, and Jews who were not deported to labor camps or to their deaths were sent to urban ghettos.

There were a variety of ghettos during the Holocaust period, including those under the jurisdiction of the German government in Nazi-occupied Europe as well as ghettos controlled by German allies *Romania and Japan. The three major types were closed ghettos, open ghettos, and destruction ghettos. The closed ghetto had guarded walls or barbed wire fences. Jews were not permitted to leave, and the authorities controlled food supplies and other necessities. Open ghettos were not necessarily closed off with a wall or fence, but movement in and out was restricted. Often inmates in open ghettos obtained food supplies through local markets. The destruction ghettos were small (usually one or two buildings), sealed, temporary ghettos in which victims were held for a few days to a month before deportation or massacre. Often no food supplies or other necessities were permitted to enter.

Ghettos were generally ruled internally by a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which often had been formed earlier to serve as an intermediary between the German authorities and the larger Jewish population and continued in that role after the ghetto was formed. The Jewish Councils controlled the internal day-to-day functioning of the ghetto, which could include distributing food supplies, maintaining sanitation, providing medical care, and in some cases overseeing labor and production. In a few of the larger ghettos, the internal Jewish administration produced ghetto currency and stamps for internal postal service.

Nazi ghettos varied depending on regional geography and when they were set up. The first ghettos were established in Nazi-occupied *Poland by the September 21, 1939, order of Reinhard Heydrich, the Chief of the Security Police, which required the concentration of Jews into urban residential areas. The first ghetto was set up in Piotrków Trybunalski, following an October 8, 1939, order by Oberbürgermeister Hans Drexel. Jews from the surrounding areas were brought to the ghetto in Piotrków Trybunalski, increasing its population to more than 25,000 people. The ghetto itself comprised 182 buildings with a total of 4,178 rooms. On average, this would have forced eight people to live in each room in the ghetto. In July 1943, the Piotrków Trybunalski ghetto was liquidated; a sign posted at the train station read Pietrikau ist Judenrein (“Piotrkow is clean of Jews”).

The first major ghetto was the Litzmannstadt ghetto in occupied Łódź, Poland; on December 10, 1939, SS Brigadeführer Friedrich Übelhoer ordered its establishment, noting that “[t]he creation of the ghetto is of course only a transition measure. I reserve to myself the decision concerning the times and the means by which the ghetto and with it the city of Łódź will be cleansed of Jews.”

As envisioned in Übelhoer’s memorandum, the ghetto included a sealed-off ghetto area, as well as barracks of Jewish laborers elsewhere in the city; the latter part of this plan was short-lived. The Litzmannstadt ghetto was soon sealed, with more than 160,000 individuals within its barbed wire border, making it the second largest ghetto in Nazi-occupied Europe. Its Jewish Council was headed by the infamous Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, who developed a system that attempted to divide resources equally among all ghetto residents. As the German authorities, particularly Hans Biebow, who was in charge of the ghetto, took a more direct hand in its administration, laborers received resources and those not engaged in labor were deported to death camps. Because of its transformation into a work camp, the Litzmannstadt ghetto survived the longest of all the Nazi ghettos; it was liquidated in 1944, and most of its inhabitants were sent to *Chełmno death camp.

The *Warsaw ghetto, with 400,000 Jews interned within its walls, was the largest in Nazi-occupied Europe. Its leader, Adam *Czerniakow, committed suicide on July 23, 1942, rather than comply with orders to begin mass deportations of children and the elderly. On April 19, 1943, resistance organizations in the Warsaw ghetto staged an uprising against deportations, which resulted in a six-week battle with the German authorities. The Warsaw ghetto fighters were eventually defeated and the remaining ghetto population deported to concentration camps. Other uprisings took place in the ghettos of Łachwa (probably the first ghetto rebellion) and Białystok. There were also resistance fighters in ghettos in *Vilna, Kovno, Kraków, and elsewhere.

Not all ghettos were controlled by the Germans. The *Romanians controlled a vast network of ghettos. In *China the Japanese established specific areas for Jewish residence within the International zone in Shanghai, where numerous European Jews were stranded after the bombing of Pearl Harbor and the entry of the United States into the war. The Jews themselves referred to their restricted area in Shanghai as the “Shanghai ghetto,” but this was not a ghetto in the same sense as those in Europe.

Internal life in the ghettos depended on size and geography, as well as the German and Jewish leadership. The open or closed nature of a ghetto also often dictated the level of starvation in the ghetto. In all ghettos, however, there was an active underground dealing in black market goods and disseminating information.

A number of the larger ghettos also had educational, cultural, social, and religious activities. Many had schools, whether conducted openly or underground. Depending on the politics of the ghetto dwellers or the specific teachers, these schools ranged from traditional *yeshivot to underground academic high schools (gymnasiums), complete with diplomas for graduates. Languages of instruction included *Yiddish, *Hebrew, and various European languages. Classes met in private homes, in special ghetto schools, and even, in ghettos where education was forbidden, inside a clothes closet.

Theater and musical performances were among ghetto cultural activities. Some of the larger ghettos mounted theatrical productions with sets and costumes; others were limited to traditional plays for the *Purim holiday or street theater. One famous example of a major theatrical undertaking was the children's opera, Brundibár, with music by Czech composer Hans Krása and libretto by Adolf Hoffmeister, performed fifty-five times by children of the *Theresienstadt ghetto in 1943 and 1944. Music varied from performances in concert halls, to jazz trios in ghetto cafes, to street minstrels composing satirical lyrics about ghetto life set to popular tunes. Socially, people gathered formally and informally. A number of pre-war youth organizations continued to function, meeting in special collective farms organized inside the ghetto perimeter or secretly in apartments. Informally, people chatted with neighbors in courtyards or crowded kitchens.

Religious observance varied, based on the backgrounds and affiliations of the inhabitants. Worship took place in private homes as well as in *synagogues. In some of the larger ghettos, multiple congregations from a variety of Jewish traditions held separate services. Christians of Jewish descent and their families, who were also interned in some ghettos, successfully petitioned the authorities to hold Christian services. *Sabbath, *High Holiday, and *festival observances took place in the ghettos, and seders were held during *Passover. Matzah was even baked and distributed for Passover, although much of the starving ghetto population opted for the more filling option of bread. Traditional rituals for *death and mourning, including the preparation of the dead for burial and recitation of memorial prayers, were among the most frequently held religious observances.

Important research includes I. Trunk, Judenrat (1975); G. Corni, Hitler's Ghettos: Voices from a Beleaguered Society, 1939–1944 (2002); E. J. Sterling, ed., Life in the Ghettos during the Holocaust (2005); and Ghettos 1939–1945: New Research and Perspectives on Definition, Daily Life, and Survival: Symposium Presentations at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (2005).

HELENE J. SINNREICH

Holocaust Literature. A product of the encounter of the literary imagination with historical memory, *Holocaust literature is a term that has come to refer to a body of works that reconstruct, memorialize, and mediate a set of events whose horrors have been termed unspeakable and unrepresentable. Encompassing a range of genres, languages, styles, and perspectives, Holocaust literature utilizes narrative strategies and aesthetic techniques to convey complex aspects of life, loss, survival, death, and memory of the *Nazi genocide and to contend with its psychological, philosophical, and ethical ramifications.

Already during the war years, literature offered its writers a way to preserve, understand, and mourn the ongoing destruction of lives and communities and to resist the assault on their humanity. Through almost impossible conditions, with meager resources, and under the threat of death, literary production continued in ghettos, labor camps, and in hiding. Motivated in part by an imperative to preserve a record of Jewish lives and communities even as they were being destroyed, the writing asserts confidence in the writer's ability to capture ongoing events and communicate them to readers elsewhere or at a later time. The Łódź Ghetto Chronicle, published in the early 1940s, asserts, "The hand does not waver in writing this down. The hand is guided by a brain that reliably preserves all impressions of the eye and the ear." Fiction, poetry, plays, and journals written during the Holocaust offer glimpses of daily life under the shadow of death, detailing the effects on intimate relationships, family and community dynamics, and the writer's inner life.

Leyb Goldin's (1900–1944) 1941 short story, "Chronicle of a Single Day," for example, preserved as part of Emanuel *Ringelblum's Oyneg Shabbes project, imagines a dialogue between a starving ghetto inhabitant and his demanding stomach. Set in the *Warsaw ghetto where Goldin himself died, the story conveys the challenge that unlivable conditions posed not only to one's life but also to one's dignity and humanity. Rachel Auerbach's (1903–1976) eulogy for the murdered Jews of the Warsaw ghetto, "Yizkor 1943," written after the liquidation of the ghetto, which she narrowly escaped; Simcha Bunim Shayetitch's (1907–1944) 1942 epic "Lekh Lekho," composed just before his family's deportation from the Łódź ghetto; Itzhak Katzenelson's (1886–1944) "Song of the Murdered Jewish People"; and other wartime works use Jewish texts, images, and traditions to lament, to challenge *God, and to depict their utter desperation. The Hungarian poet Miklós Radnóti (1909–1944) left behind a notebook of poems that depict his experiences and anticipate his own murder during the forced marches at the end of the war. Among the most prolific poets is Abraham (Avrom) Sutzkever (1913–2010), whose sustained literary corpus encompasses the war years and continues in the sixty years after the war. In more than eighty poems composed in the *Vilna ghetto between 1941 and 1943, Sutzkever's modernist technique captures the desperate resistance of the ghetto to pervasive doom, bereavement, and suffering. In "The Lead Plates at the Rom Press" (1943), the plan of the ghetto underground to produce bullets from printing plates taken from the publisher of the definitive edition of the *Talmud becomes the springboard for reflecting on different kinds of Jewish *resistance: The "liquified bullets" produce ammunition charged with "the spirit" of Jewish learning and creativity that the metal once imprinted. Other poems anticipate the struggle with language and memory that the survivor will contend with after the war, as well as the gap between survivors and those who come after. In "Burnt Pearls," (1943) the poet contemplates the remains of an unrecognizable corpse and reflects on the impossible charge of the poet, whose "written word" must "substitute for my world." "How" (1943) imagines the poet on the day of liberation, rendered mute by the irreversible losses made permanent by the passage of time – "jammed locks." While at Starzysko Kamienna and other slave labor camps, Ilona Karmel (1925–2000) and her sister, Henia Karmel-Wolfe (1922–1984), composed poetry in Polish on the backs of stolen paper forms. Published in a volume shortly after their liberation, the poems depict the inner lives of slave laborers – "robots" whose rebellion is controlled with brutality but who nonetheless resist dehumanization; they anticipate the grief, rage, and pain of survival, the future "collapse in silence."

Written in the Jewish languages (*Yiddish, *Hebrew, *Ladino) as well as in the European languages spoken by the Jews victimized by the Holocaust, the variety of tongues in wartime literature convey the vast reach of the Nazi genocidal net and the different histories and cultures of its victims. Poignantly, this body of writing reveals the futile hopes of many writers who did not survive.

Although it is common to refer to a body of writing that encompasses both wartime and post-war works as Holocaust literature, the term itself has been a contentious one not only among literary scholars but also among writers of works commonly included under its rubric. Beginning in the post-war period, Holocaust literature has been variously defined to include only wartime literature, only literature by Jewish victims and survivors of the Nazi genocide, only works in Jewish languages, or only works by victims and survivors of Nazi concentration camps, or it has been described more expansively to include all of those, as well as works by writers without direct experience of the war but who engage it in their writing. In addition to debates about the scope of Holocaust literature, discussions have centered on the accountability of the literary imagination to historical fact, the ethics of producing aesthetic pleasure based on brutality and mass murder, the inadequacy of language to represent the extremities of suffering, and the appropriateness of particular genres, modes, approaches, and works. The German political philosopher Theodor Adorno's (1903–1969) statement, "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric," has become a touchstone for a range of concerns about the propriety, function, and adequacy of literary production in the aftermath of the Nazi genocide. More than in other contexts, literature of the Holocaust has been viewed as weighted with an obligation to the past, to historicity, to memorialization, to ethics.

Struggling to understand the place of the literary imagination in mediating the Holocaust has been a topic not of critical debate alone. It permeates the very fabric of literary writing, from memoirs to post-war poetry and fiction. Much of this literature is characterized by a tension between what we might call the testimonial impulse and the sense that the experience of life and death in the Holocaust is essentially impossible to represent. French philosopher Maurice Blanchot (1907–2003) expresses this tension cogently: "The wish of all, in the camps . . . : know what has happened, do not forget, and at the same time never will you know." Two influential memoirs about surviving Auschwitz – Primo Levi's (1919–1987) Survival in Auschwitz (1968) and Charlotte Delbo's (1913–1985) Auschwitz and After (1970) – illustrate this dynamic. Levi's memoir charts the Italian chemist's struggle to survive the harsh physical conditions of the concentration camp, as well as the Germans' deliberate brutality, aimed not only at murdering but also at dehumanizing its inmates and thoroughly crushing their spirits. He observes, "Our language lacks words to express this offense, the demolition of a man." At one moment, Levi spontaneously recollects, and feels compelled to say aloud, verses from Canto 26 of Dante's Divine Comedy. Levi's recitation of poetry in *Auschwitz becomes a point of resistance against his forced "demolition" and argues for the enduring place of poetry, even – or perhaps especially – in the face of extreme brutality. Levi's evocation of the Italian poet points to the very structure of the memoir, set up as a modern descent into Dante's inferno. The use of Dante as model and counterpoint anchors Levi to the European literary tradition, suggesting both the value and failure of Western humanistic culture.

Delbo's memoir exemplifies a similar tension. Deported to Auschwitz on a convoy of 230 non-Jewish French women imprisoned for anti-Nazi activities, Delbo wrote her memoir soon after her return to *France. It takes the form of a trilogy that experiments with the boundaries between prose memoir, poetry, and imagination. Impelled by the compulsion to make those who were not there understand the suffering at Auschwitz, she writes repeatedly, "Il faut donner à voir" – insisting that readers "see" what happened through her writing. At the same time, she insists on the incapacity of language to do the work she requires: "Words do not necessarily have the same meaning" for her as they do for her readership.

Poetry by Holocaust survivors indirectly addresses Adorno's statement about the writing of poetry after Auschwitz. Years later, Adorno conceded that his earlier conclusion "may have been wrong," as "perennial suffering has as much right to expression as the tortured have to scream." Yet Holocaust poetry offers more than a response to torment; it meditates in complex ways about ethics, philosophy, and memory and uses language in particular ways to convey what is otherwise inexpressible. Dan Pagis (1930–1986), for example, draws on Jewish sources – biblical figures, medieval Hebrew texts – to pose questions about human and divine nature and good and evil that are both particularly Jewish and universal. "Testimony" ironically contrasts perpetrators "created in the image" of God with incinerated victims, whose "different creator" becomes "omnipotent smoke." His most famous poem, "Written in Pencil in a Sealed Railway Car," drawing on the biblical instance of fraternal murder, poses as an artifact of the war – an incomplete message by a Jewish woman condemned to death. Paul Celan's (1920–1970) complex body of poems explore loss, good and evil, and theodicy. A series of poems, including "Psalm" and "Tenebrae," use traditional prayer forms to question the nature of God. His best known poem, "Todesfuge" (Death Fugue), juxtaposes the perpetrator culture – represented by an SS officer who "plays with his vipers" as he makes a game of killing Jews, by the "golden" haired Margarete, and by Death himself, depicted as "a master from Deutschland" – with the Jewish victims, who are represented by dying and dead Jews who "drink . . . and drink" the "black milk" and by "ashen" haired Shulamith.

Not all Holocaust poetry was written by those with personal experience of the Nazi genocide. Already during Hitler's rise to power and the promulgation of increasingly aggressive restrictions on the rights of Jews in Europe, writers elsewhere responded to the deteriorating situation. The shared language, family connections, and personal roots of Yiddish writers in North America made them particularly aware of the growing crisis in Eastern Europe. For example, the poetry of Jacob Glatstein (1896–1971) took a sharp turn in the late 1930s from an introspective and universal focus to a collective Jewish mandate, announcing in "Good Night, World" his return to "the ghetto" of Jewish culture, rejecting the cosmopolitan but "polluted cultures" and intellectual traditions of the West. A later poem, "The Dead Do Not Praise God," inverts the language of Psalms and posits the Holocaust as a radically negative revelation. Canadian poet A. M. Klein (1909–1972) composed dark epic poems, including the 1944 “The Hitleriad,” which traces the failure of modernity in the endurance of *antisemitism. Kadya Molodowsky’s (1894–1975) poetry mourns the ghetto victims, the lost faith in the *covenant, and the wounding of the *Yiddish language in the European catastrophe. They and others continue to struggle with the meaning of the Jewish God, covenant, and culture after the Holocaust.

In the post-war years and continuing into the twenty-first century, fiction writers have experimented with narrative styles and novelistic structures to explore the aftereffects of the Holocaust, and poets have pushed the capacity of language to convey the resonances of trauma and brutality. Holocaust literature probes the psychological, philosophical, and ethical challenges posed to Western culture. If cultural critic Walter *Benjamin imagines the “angel of history” turning his face to the past, which he sees as a “pile of debris,” an irredeemable “single catastrophe which keeps piling wreckage upon wreckage,” Holocaust literature has the capacity to bridge historical and geographic distance, bringing the events of the past unnervingly close while maintaining a space for reflection on the aftermath of catastrophe and destruction.

For further reading, see L. L. Langer, The Holocaust and the Literary Imagination (1975); A. Mintz, Hurban: Responses to Catastrophe in Hebrew Literature (1984); D. Roskies, Against the Apocalypse: Responses to Catastrophe in Modern Jewish Culture (1984); J. Young, Writing and Rewriting the Holocaust: Narrative and the Consequences of Interpretation (1988); S. R. Horowitz, Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction (1997); H. Flanzbaum, The Americanization of the Holocaust (1999); M. Rothberg, Traumatic Realism: The Demands of Holocaust Representation (2000); S. Gubar, Poetry after Auschwitz: Remembering What One Never Knew (2003); and M. Hirsch and I. Kacandes, Teaching the Representation of the Holocaust (2004); see also HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: FICTION; HOLOCAUST LITERATURE: POETRY; HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: DRAMA.

SARA R. HOROWITZ

Holocaust Literature: Fiction. Fiction by survivors and refugees of Nazism develops literary strategies to mediate what cannot be narrated directly. Through a coalescence of fragmentary images; narratives that circle around events that are never fully articulated; the repeated destabilization of chronological, memorial, and other structures; and other techniques, Holocaust literature suggests the world of chaos, loss, randomness, and brutality that cannot be fully represented. Novels and stories respond to personal and collective trauma and bereavement, and they negotiate the complexities of memory as well as philosophical, ethical, psychological, and cultural crises in Western and Jewish cultures.

Ida Fink’s (b. 1921) short stories, most notably in A Scrap of Time (1987), present narrative slivers that isolate small but revealing details that unfold the complexities of memory, victimization, and survival. Her writing focuses on moments of shocking realization – that one’s future, one’s intimate relationships, one’s world has unraveled. In “A Spring Morning,” a father awakens abruptly in the early morning, suddenly understanding that the “buzzing fly” of his dream was the sound of trucks sent to deport Jewish families, and “a terrible feeling of regret tore through him...and he understood that he had overslept his life.” Jacob Lind’s (1927–2007) set of sardonic stories in Soul of Wood (1964) convey the chaotic but bureaucratized world of Nazi fascism that gives some the right to murder and denies others the right to live at all. In “Journey through the Night,” a man on a night train to Paris must justify his desire to live to the cannibal who wants to eat him; in “Soul of Wood,” the narrator notes, “Those who had no papers entitling them to live lined up to die.” Jorge Semprun’s (b. 1923) novel The Long Journey (1963) centers on the long train ride to *Buchenwald, using a series of interlocking flashbacks, “flash forwards,” and shifting images of “inside” and “outside” to convey the impossibility of adequately transmitting his memories of the Nazi landscape of death to those without personal experience. To outsiders, the corpses left in the camp courtyard at liberation are horrifying but depersonalized signs of horror, whereas to survivors, they are “comrades,” the “fraternal dead.” Using the device of a found manuscript, Piotr Rawicz’s (1919–1982) novel, Blood from the Sky (1961), presents the memoirs of a Ukrainian Jew fleeing from Nazi round-ups, commented on and retold by a not entirely sympathetic editor in Paris. The novel layers factual and imaginative detail, suggesting the limitations of historical accounts, the profound effects of brutality, and the legacy of despair.

In addition to treating the complexities of memory and narrative, fiction set in ghettos, labor camps, or situations of refuge conveys the experience of living and dying under Nazi atrocity and captures its brutal and dehumanizing face. Jurek Becker’s (1937–1997) novel, Jacob the Liar (1969), gives a sense of the vulnerability and uncertainty of the Łódź ghetto, sealed off from the outside world without access to reliable information. Jacob “lies” to the news-hungry ghetto inhabitants, fabricating optimistic broadcasts from an imaginary (and forbidden) radio. The novel warns against false comforts that shield one from the harsh implications of the Holocaust. Other novels that detail life during the war include Tadeusz Borowski’s (1922–1951) biting collection of short stories, This Way for the Gas, Ladies and Gentlemen (1948), which looks at the brutalizing effects of atrocity on the more privileged non-Jewish prisoners at Auschwitz, based on the author’s own experiences there as a political prisoner. The 1972 Yiddish trilogy set in the Łódź ghetto, The Tree of Life, by Chava Rosenfarb (1923–2011) follows ten people from the creation through the destruction of the ghetto. The interwoven short stories, Auschwitz: True Tales from a Grotesque Land (1985), by Sara Nomberg-Przytyk (1915–1996) present a complex vision of human behavior among a group of women who face choices such as abortions and infanticide to save the lives of mothers. Ka-Tezetnik is the pseudonym for Yehiel Dinur (1909–2001), a survivor who took his pen name from the German abbreviation for concentration camp. His novels, including Salamanca (1946) and The House of Dolls (1953), depict the humiliation and suffering of Holocaust victims and their fierce struggle to survive. Arnošt Lustig (1926–2011) wrote more than a dozen novels focusing on the possibility of human ethics and the survival of the human spirit under oppression. His best known works are Diamonds in the Night (1958) and A Prayer for Katerina Horovitzova (1964).

A number of works explore the challenges that the Holocaust poses to *Judaism, Jewish culture and history, and the concepts of *God and *covenant. Elie *Wiesel's (b. 1928) Night (1958) presents *Auschwitz through the memory of a religious young man's struggle not simply for physical survival, but with a God whose silence ruptures his faith in Jewish covenant and continuity. Wiesel's subsequent writing grapples with the nature of God, Jewish faith, and the possibilities of human ethics after the Holocaust. The Yiddish writer Chaim Grade (1910–1982) takes a different approach to theodicy (see EVIL AND SUFFERING). His novella "My Quarrel with Hersh Rasseyner" (1950) presents a dialogue between two Holocaust survivors, a secular and an Orthodox Jew, about the possibilities of faith – whether in the Jewish God or in Western secular values – after the Holocaust. André Schwarz-Bart's (1928–2006) epic novel, The Last of the Just (1959), integrates the Holocaust into the long history of European *antisemitism by following the destiny of a single Jewish family over the course of centuries. Using the legend of the lamed-vav (thirty-six) just men whose existence guarantees the perpetuation of the entire world, Schwarz-Bart moves from the massacre of Jews in the *Middle Ages to the Nazi genocide and the gassing of the final just man. The novel brings together Jewish and Christian tropes for suffering and *redemption, leaving unresolved the possibility of human or divine meaning after the Holocaust. Although these works engage with issues of Jewish meaning and culture, at their heart are also universal questions about the reconstruction of ethics and values after the Holocaust.

The experiences of children form a recurrent theme in Holocaust fiction. In fiction written from the perspective of a child or adolescent, or tracing the resonances of atrocity later in adulthood, the child serves as an emblem of the innocence of the victims, in the dual sense of being unknowing and undeserving of their harrowing destiny. Their confrontation with brutality during their formative years speaks to the shattering and recalibration for the survivor not only of the self but also of the world. The Hebrew writer Aharon Appelfeld (b. 1932) insists that literature and, indeed, all art forms of the Holocaust have their genesis in the spontaneous play of child victims like himself, who took in their experience not only psychologically but also bodily, absorbing it into their very being. He observes, "Children sucked the horrors, not through their minds, but through their skin, intuitively . . . ; they were not able to think, to re-think, to evaluate, to analyze. . . . It was inside their body, all the darkness and all the horror." Appelfeld's spare yet expressive fiction renders the inner life of children during the war (e.g., Tzili: The Story of a Life, 1983; All Whom I have Loved, 2007; Laish, 2009); the enduring but inexpressible trauma in adulthood (e.g., The Immortal Bartfuss, 1983; The Iron Tracks, 1991); or the childlike illusions of the acculturated Jews of Europe (e.g., Badenheim 1939, 1975; The Age of Wonders, 1983). Jerzy Kosinski's (1933–1991) brutal story of a young boy abandoned to the harsh landscape and the extreme cruelty of strangers, The Painted Bird (1965), uses the muteness of the child as an emblem not only of trauma but also of the collapse of all systems of meaning. Imre Kertész (b. 1929; Nobel Prize in Literature, 2002) draws on autobiographical memory for Fatelessness (1975) and Kaddish for a Child Not Born (1990), novels that explore an adolescent attempt to come to terms with the random chaos of Nazi victimization and the residue of guilt and trauma after the war. For Georges Perec (1936–1982), whose mother was murdered in *Auschwitz, the years spent in hiding are a blank, and the attempt to recover them form the basis of his 1975 experimental novel, W., or the Memory of Childhood. Harry Mulisch (1927–2010), son of an Austrian Nazi father and a Jewish mother whose family was deported from the Netherlands and murdered, probes the impact of unacknowledged childhood trauma in The Assault (1982). An anesthesiologist who has evaded the childhood memory of the deportation of his family comes to symbolize the way that refuted traumatic memory nonetheless resurfaces and shapes one's life. Similarly, Louis Begley's (b. 1933) Wartime Lies (1991) suggests the devastating after-effects of the dissimulation, shame, and disconnection experienced by a child who was saved by assuming false identities during the war.

Although the Holocaust was perpetrated on European soil, North American writers, too, addressed the profound and disturbing issues it raised in the decades after the war. Jewish American fiction writers such as Saul Bellow (1915–2005; Mr. Sammler's Planet, 1970), Edward Lewis Wallant (1926–1962; The Pawnbroker, 1961), Norma Rosen (b. 1925; Touching Evil, 1969), Philip Roth (b. 1933; The Ghost Writer, 1979), and Cynthia Ozick (b. 1928; The Shawl, 1989), and poets such as Irene Klepfisz (b. 1941), Anthony Hecht (1923–2004), Charles Reznikoff (1894–1976), and Shirley Kaufman (b. 1923) have used the Holocaust as a fulcrum for the exploration of antisemitism, contemporary racism, good and evil, the human condition, and the complexities of personal and collective memory. However, the integration of the Holocaust into belles lettres was not limited to Jewish writers. Writers and poets such as William Styron (1925–2006), Don DeLillo (b. 1936), W. D. Snodgrass (1926–2009), William Heyen (b. 1940), and Sylvia Plath (1932–1963) have used Holocaust imagery to examine issues ranging from moral responsibility to personal trauma.

Israeli literature, too, brought the Holocaust into the compass of the literary imagination. In the decades after World War II, writers who had been in the *Yishuv (pre-state Israel) during the Nazi genocide explored the impact of the European catastrophe and the influx of war refugees on the development of Israeli identity and national memory and on the relationship to the Jewish past. Fiction writers include Haim Gouri (b. 1923; The Chocolate Deal, 1965), Yoram Kaniuk (b. 1930; Adam Resurrected, 1968), Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000; Not of This Time, Not of This Place, 1963), Hanoch Bartov (b. 1926; The Brigade, 1965), and Aharon Megged (b. 1920; "The Name," 1950).

Works by writers born after World War II sometimes come under the rubric of "second-generation" literature. Originally used to refer to writers who are direct descendants of Holocaust victims or survivors, second-generation literature may be conceptualized as a broader category of writing that reflects the repercussions of the genocide of the Jews of Europe for generations who come later. The category encompasses writing from Israel – such as David Grossman's (b. 1954) See under Love (1986), Michal Govrin's (b. 1950) The Name (1998), Nava Semel's (b. 1954) Glass Hat (1985) – and European writing, such as Henri Raczymow's (b. 1948) Writing the Book of Esther (1995), and Patrick Modiano's (b. 1945) La Place de l'Étoile (1968), and Dora Bruder (1997). A number of those works examine the Nazi genocide from the perspective of the perpetrator or explore the inheritance of the perpetrator culture, including Martin Amis's Time's Arrow (1991), Jonathan Littell's The Kindly Ones (2006), W. G. Sebald's (1944–2001) Austerlitz (2001), and Bernhard Schlink's (b. 1944) The Reader (1999). North American second-generation literature includes Art Spiegelman's (b. 1948) graphic novel MAUS (1986, 1991), Anne Michael's (b. 1958) Fugitive Pieces (1996), Michael Chabon's (b. 1963) The Final Solution (2004), Thane Rosenbaum's (b. 1960) Second Hand Smoke (1999), Melvin Bukiet's (b. 1953) After (1997), Marcie Herschman's (b. 1951) Tales of the Master Race (1992), and Aryeh Lev Stollman's The Far Euphrates (1997).

Refracted by the prism of the literary imagination, Holocaust fiction mediates memory, narratives, and images of the Jewish catastrophe across cultures and generations. In his 1936 essay "The Storyteller," cultural critic Walter Benjamin (1892–1940) draws a distinction between the modern historian, who is "bound to explain" the flow of human events by relating "an accurate concatenation of definite events," and the "storyteller" of an earlier era, whose narrative reveals the way these events "are embedded in the great inscrutable course of the world." Although Benjamin decries the degeneration of storytelling into the contemporary novel, Holocaust fiction may be said to exemplify some of the force and contextualizing power of the older storytelling mode, representing a past that, while receding in the distance, deeply marks contemporary culture.

SARA R. HOROWITZ

Holocaust Literature: Poetry. Poetic responses to the atrocities of the Holocaust have been written from divergent perspectives, in a variety of languages, in many different countries, and by Jews and non-Jews. Some of this poetry was written by individuals who were victims or witnesses of Nazi brutality. Other poets, without personal experience of the Holocaust, chose to imagine or evoke various elements of its dimensions in their works. There are also poems written by those who were active participants in the atrocities or who stood by as passive observers. There is no uniformity to Holocaust poetry in style or theme. Some poets depict death camps, systematic shootings, pit burnings, and partisan trench warfare; others evoke survival under oppression or life as refugees, or they portray the heroism of individuals in desperate situations. There are also those who record the world before and after these events, leaving a blank where the horrors of history were perpetrated.

Unlike historical writing or fiction, poetry is not necessarily concerned with accurate or realistic representations of actual events. Thus, the best Holocaust poetry succeeds in conveying instances of authentic experience or "fugitive pieces," in the phrase of Canadian poet and novelist, Anne Michaels. Lawrence Langer has claimed that "history imposes limitations on the supposed flexibility of artistic license." However, because poetry functions in the realm of art, representing emotion and transcending horror to create beauty, it is able to sidestep questions about the legitimacy of bearing witness to the Holocaust. As Berel Lang has noted, literature and art have the capacity to "occupy new vantage points and to invent new modes of representation."

The German critic Theodor Adorno claimed in 1949 that "after Auschwitz, to write poetry is barbaric," because he believed that using art in a world where culture and education had proven unable to prevent a descent into atrocities would be a meaningless act. He asked, "How could poetic language itself be anything but superficial, irrelevant, marginal, in a world of such horror since language was incommensurate to express it?" (cited in Schiff, xix). Paul Antschel (1920–1970), known by the pen name Paul Celan, offered an alternative response, insisting that silence in the face of the evils of the Holocaust was tantamount to complicity. Instead he claimed there was a requirement to bear witness. Born to a German-speaking Jewish family in the culturally rich city of Czernowitz in Bukovina (then part of Romania, now in Ukraine), Celan was deported to a Nazi work camp. He was liberated in 1944, and after the war he lived in France. His complex and powerful poem, "Todesfuge" (Death Fugue), in which death is personified as "a master from Germany," begins with these words: "Black milk of daybreak we drink it at evening/ we drink it at mid-day and morning we drink it at night/ we drink and we drink/ we shovel a grave in the air there you won't lie too cramped."

The German Jewish poet and dramatist Nelly Sachs (1891–1970) fled to Sweden with her mother in 1940 to avoid conscription to a forced labor camp. Sachs was a close friend of Paul Celan; her poignant representations of the Jewish people's destruction integrate biblical and mystical imagery drawn from Jewish sources. Her well-known poem, "O The Chimneys," concludes, "O you chimneys, / O you fingers / And Israel's body as smoke through the air!" (trans. Michael Hamburger). In 1966, Sachs shared the Nobel Prize in Literature with S. Y. Agnon, observing that he represented Israel, whereas "I represent the tragedy of the Jewish people."

The themes of silence and political apathy in the face of Nazi persecution are conveyed in the poem, "First They Came," attributed to Pastor Martin Niemöller (1892–1984); it is a critique of the inactivity of German intellectuals following the Nazi rise to power and the purging of their chosen targets. Known in several versions, copies are inscribed at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and the New England Holocaust Memorial in Boston, Massachusetts.

Many poems were written during the Holocaust by poets who did not survive; these include works by David Vogel (1891–1944), a Russian-born Hebrew poet, novelist, and diarist who was arrested by the Nazis and disappeared in 1944. Vogel's innovative poetry is based in the Expressionist and Impressionist movements of Central European pre-war poetics. Shot and buried in 1944 during a Nazi death march, Miklós Radnóti was an illustrious poet from Hungary. When his body was excavated from a mass grave, poems were found in a notebook in his jacket. These poems developed the themes that he had been using since 1936 when he wrote about the inevitability of violent death in the war sweeping Europe. His poetry draws on biblical prophets to convey his antifascist ideals. Anne Sexton (1928–1974) and W. H. Auden (1907–1973) are among modern non-Jewish poets who employed Holocaust imagery in specific poems, such as Auden's "Refugee Blues" and Sexton's "After Auschwitz." Czesław Miłosz (1911–2004) addresses the Holocaust from an outsider's perspective in "A Poor Christian Looks at the Ghetto," on the 1943 destruction of the Warsaw ghetto, whereas "Daddy" by Sylvia Plath (1932–1963) reveals the extent to which Holocaust imagery has been reappropriated to convey other forms of horror or trauma. Serbo-Croat, Russian, Polish, and Hungarian poets who write in sympathy or even in response to their involvement as Holocaust perpetrators include Jerzy Ficowski, János Pilinszky, and Vasko Popa. The works of many of these poets have only recently become available in English translation.

Writing about the Holocaust has provided an opportunity for some non-Jewish writers to contest the behavior of contemporaneous regimes. Russian poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko's famous "Babi Yar" (1961) denounced the massacre of more than 33,000 Jews over two days in Kiev, Ukraine, during September 1941. In recalling this atrocity, Yevtushenko was also calling attention to the persistence of antisemitism in the post-war Soviet Union. This politically radical poem was subsequently set to music by Russian composer Dmitri Shostakovich (1906–1975) in his Symphony No. 13. As the survivor generation gives way to a new generation of writers removed from direct experience with the historical events, poetry continues to engage with the horrors of human actions through evocative images of the Holocaust.

For further reading, see Selected Poems and Prose of Paul Celan, trans. J. Felstiner (2000); J. Felstiner, Paul Celan: Poet, Survivor, and Jew (2001); E. E. George, Miklós Radnóti: The Complete Poetry (1980); B. Lang, ed., Writing and the Holocaust (1988), 14; L. L. Langer, ed., Art from the Ashes: A Holocaust Anthology (1995); and H. Schiff, ed., Holocaust Poetry (1995); see also HOLocaust LITERATURE. RACHEL S. HARRIS

Holocaust Memorials. In keeping with the iconoclastic tradition in Jewish art and culture, the first "memorials" to the Holocaust period came not in stone, glass, or steel, but in narratives and in commemorative fast days. Yizkor Bikher*, memorial volumes, remembered both the lives and destruction of European Jewish communities during World War II (1939–45) according to the most ancient Jewish memorial medium: the book. For a murdered people without graves, without even corpses to inter, these memorial books often came to serve as symbolic tombstones. Their scribes hoped that Yizkor Bikher would turn the site of reading into memorial space, thus making interior spaces and imagined gravesites the first sites for memory.

At the same time, traditional commemorative days on the Jewish calendar recalling ancient catastrophes, primarily the destructions of the First and Second Temples of Jerusalem on Tisha B'Av* (9th day of Av), were enlarged by Jewish religious communities after the Holocaust to encompass the destruction of Europe's Jews during World War II. With the founding of Israel in 1948, just three years after the liberation of the death camps, the religious explanations for catastrophe (e.g., divine punishment) attending the traditional fast days of the Ninth of Av or Tenth of Tevet came widely to be regarded as politically and philosophically untenable. The State of Israel thus created new remembrance days, such as Yom Ha-Shoah v'Ha-Gevurah* (Holocaust and Heroism Remembrance Day).

During the period between 1948 and 1960, dozens of other institutional forms of remembrance were also generated at both state and local levels, in Israel, as well as in Europe and the Americas. Holocaust memorials would come to include museums and monuments, the sites and remnants of destruction, as well as religious and secular commemorative days. In fact, the farther that events of World War II and the Holocaust have receded into time, the more prominent its physical memorials have become.

Thousands of monuments, preserved ruins, plaques, museums, and study centers devoted to Holocaust remembrance now dot European, North and Latin American, Australian, and Israeli landscapes. They come in all shapes, forms, and aesthetic styles: from figurative statuary (see Nathan Rapoport's "Warsaw Ghetto Monument," 1948), to monolithic abstract sculpture (see Viktor Tolkin's "Majdanek" in Lublin, Poland, 1969); from minimalist architecture (see Henri Pingusson's "Memorial to the Deported" in Paris, 1959) to deconstructivist architecture (see Peter Eisenman's "Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe" in Berlin, 2005); from realized conceptual installation art (see Jochen Gerz and Esther Shalev-Gerz's vanishing "Memorial for Peace and against War and Fascism" in Harburg-Hamburg, 1986) and to unrealizable agit-prop proposals (see Horst Hoheisel's "Blow Up the Brandenburger Tor," for Berlin, 1995); to large national landscapes, such as the planting of six million trees in Israel's "Forest of the Six Million Martyrs," to the dozens of local "memorial gardens" installed on synagogue properties and in town parks everywhere.

Depending on where these memorials are constructed and by whom, these sites remember the past according to a variety of national myths and ideals and religious and political needs. Some recall war dead, others political resistance, and still others mass murder. All reflect both the past experiences and current lives of their communities, as well as the state's memory of itself. At a more specific level, these memorials reflect the aesthetic temper of their time, their designers' training, and their physical locations in national memorial landscapes.

The reasons given for Holocaust memorials, as well as the kinds of memory they generate, are as various as the sites themselves. Some are built in response to traditional Jewish religious injunctions to remember, others according to a government's need to explain a nation's past to itself. Where the aim of some memorials is to educate the next generation and to inculcate in it a sense of shared experience and destiny, other memorials are conceived as expiations of guilt or as self-aggrandizement. Still others are intended to attract tourists. In addition to traditional Jewish memorial iconography, every political entity has its own institutional forms of remembrance. As a result, Holocaust memorials inevitably mix national and Jewish figures, political and religious imagery.

The very first material Holocaust memorials were the places of destruction themselves. Liberated by the Red Army in July 1944, the intact remains of the concentration camp at Majdanek, just outside Lublin in Poland, were turned into the first memorial and museum of its kind. Early the next year, the Polish Committee of National Liberation conferred similar status on the ruins of Stutthof, the first concentration camp in Poland, and on the gargantuan complex at Auschwitz-Birkenau, commonly regarded as the "epicenter" of the Holocaust. Still other death camps in Poland, destroyed by the Germans in their retreat, such as Treblinka, Chełmno, Sobibor, and Bełżec, were turned into shrines of national martyrdom. In Poland, countless other memorials in destroyed and abandoned Jewish cemeteries and at former sites of synagogues across the countryside commemorate the entirety of Polish destruction through the figure of its murdered Jewish part. They recall the mass murder of Jews in Poland as an intrinsic part of Poland's own national landscape of martyrdom, often through images of irreparable breaches and shattered vessels.

In *Germany, by contrast, memorials to this time often recall Jews by their absence and German victims by their political resistance. Yet between 1945 and 1989, German Holocaust memorials and their meanings depended completely on whether they were located in the Federal Republic (West Germany) or in the German Democratic Republic (socialist East Germany). What was officially regarded in the West as Germany's disastrous defeat was recalled in the East, at the behest of its Soviet liberators-turned-occupiers, as a communist victory over fascism and as the redemption of socialist martyrs in the founding of the German Democratic Republic. Post-war German governments in the East and West thus preserved the ruins of concentration camps in Germany – at *Dachau, *Bergen-Belsen, and *Buchenwald – to tell both the histories of these sites and to explain how each new state came into being.

After Germany's 1989 reunification and the subsequent return of the nation's capital to *Berlin, the new national Holocaust memorial in Berlin, a gargantuan, undulating field of stelae designed by Peter Eisenman, had to address Germany's double-edged memorial conundrum, even if it could not answer it: How does a nation remember a people murdered in its name? How does a nation reunite itself on the bedrock memory of its crimes? Indeed, these questions have spawned a genre of memorials in Germany that might be called counter-monuments: They challenge not just the conventional contours of the monuments but also the very premise of their being. Rather than finding consolation in their Holocaust memorials, contemporary German artists have attempted to formalize the irreparable void of Germany's lost and murdered Jews, a permanent hole in the heart of German culture. In addition to the more conventional and often still powerful sculptural and landscape designs located throughout German sites of destroyed synagogues, places of deportation, and concentration camps, new and contemporary memorials are built into the ground, disappear, or make absence their defining motif. Rather than attempting to resolve Germany's memorial conundrum in their designs, contemporary artists and architects, such as Jochen Gerz and Esther Shalev-Gerz, Horst Hoheisel and Hans Haacke, Renata Stih and Frieder Schnock, Sol LeWitt and Richard Serra, Daniel Libeskind, and Peter Eisenman, have striven for formal articulation of the questions themselves.

Outside of Poland and Germany, the best known site-specific Holocaust memorial in Europe is probably the Anne *Frank House in *Amsterdam. The house and annex at Prinsengracht 263, where Anne and her family hid from July 1942 until August 1944 when they were betrayed by Dutch collaborators to the Germans and sent to Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen (where Anne died), have been preserved as a national shrine and museum to Anne *Frank, her acclaimed diary, and a universal vision of tolerance. The Anne Frank House reminds the Dutch that, even though they harbored her, they also betrayed her in the end, along with another 100,000 Dutch Jews. By reflecting back to the Dutch their own mixed record of resistance and neutrality, victimization and complicity, Anne Frank effectively became Holland's patron saint of Holocaust memory, an archetypal figure for all of *Holland's war memory.

In *Israel, where half of the 1948 Jewish population had survived the Holocaust, martyrs and heroes are often remembered side by side. Israel's national Holocaust remembrance day, *Yom Ha-Shoah V'ha-Gevurah, commemorates both the mass murder of Europe's Jews and the heroism of ghetto fighters, all seemingly redeemed by the birth of the state. Whereas memorials and museums in Europe, especially those located at the sites of destruction, focus relentlessly on the annihilation of Jews and almost totally neglect the millennium of Jewish life in Europe before the war, those in Israel locate events in a historical continuum that includes Jewish life before and after the destruction. Israeli museums at kibbutzim, like Loḥamei Hageta'ot (Ghetto Fighters), Tel Yitzhak, Givat Chaim, and Yad Mordechai, emphasize Jewish life before and during the Holocaust over the killing itself. With the ingathering of hundreds of thousands of new immigrants from the former *Soviet Union, Israel's memory of the Holocaust has also grown more plural and inclusive, as reflected in the redesign of *Yad Vashem, Israel's national Holocaust memorial museum.

Just as political, aesthetic, and religious coordinates determine the shape that Holocaust memory takes in Europe and Israel, so, too, is Holocaust memory in the *United States guided by distinctly American ideals and experiences, such as liberty, pluralism, and *immigration. Whether in *New York City's Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust (in lower Manhattan, within sight of the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island), or on *Boston's Freedom Trail, or at Liberty State Park in New Jersey, or in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum located just off the National Mall in Washington, D.C., or nestled in Miami's community of Latin American immigrants, American Holocaust memorials and museums enshrine not just the history of the Holocaust but also American democratic and egalitarian ideals. In such monuments, American memory itself is enlarged to include the histories of its immigrants and the memory of events on distant shores that drove these immigrants to America in the first place. Other Holocaust memorials are built in much smaller scales in American Jewish cemeteries, small town squares, and synagogue courtyards to reflect the sensibilities of particular survivor communities. *Landsmanschaftn organizations have built simple tombstone memorials in local Jewish cemeteries to honor members of their communities who were murdered during the Holocaust but whose graves remain unknown.

CONCEPTUALIZING MEMORIALS: Artists and architects of Holocaust memorials face many dilemmas: How to remember horribly real events in the abstract gestures of geometric forms? How to create a focal point for remembrance among ruins without desecrating the space itself? How to embody remembrance without seeming to displace it? Moreover, Holocaust memory is always "contested" as long as more than one group or individual remembers. Open competitions with competing memorial conceptions and designs make such competing memories especially palpable by throwing into relief the complex, nearly impossible questions for those attempting to conceive of such monuments.

These questions and others arose with the very first open competition for a memorial at Auschwitz-Birkenau in 1957. "The choice of a monument to commemorate Auschwitz has not been an easy task," the sculptor Henry Moore wrote as head of the internationally acclaimed design jury assembled for the Auschwitz competition. "Essentially, what has been attempted here has been the creation... of a monument to crime and ugliness, to murder and to horror. The crime was of such stupendous proportions that any work of art must be on an appropriate scale. But apart from this, is it in fact possible to create a work of art that can express the emotions engendered by Auschwitz?" (Henry Moore, pamphlet published at Auschwitz, 1958, n.p.).

As was clear to Moore in 1957 and to many critics and artists since then, public art in general and Holocaust memorials in particular tend to beg traditional art historical inquiry. Until recently, most discussions of Holocaust memorial spaces ignored the essentially public dimension of their performance, remaining either formally aestheticist or almost piously historical. So although it is true that a sculptor like Nathan Rapoport (designer of the Warsaw Ghetto Memorial) will never be regarded by art historians as highly as his contemporaries, Jacques Lipshitz and Henry Moore, neither can his work be dismissed solely on the basis of its popular appeal. Unabashedly figurative, heroic, and referential, his work seems to be doomed critically by precisely those qualities – public accessibility and historical referentiality – that make it monumental. Yet in fact, it may be just this social and political resonance in the public mind that finally constitutes the Holocaust memorial's aesthetic performance. Instead of stopping at formal questions or at issues of historical referentiality, students of Holocaust memorials now ask how memorial representations of history may finally weave themselves into the course of ongoing events.

As the meanings of Holocaust memorials necessarily evolve over time, depending on the needs and preoccupations of every new generation that visits them, so too have the aims of critical inquiry into Holocaust memorials evolved. No longer content to examine only these memorials' formal and aesthetic qualities or their historical referents, critics now also ask how public history of Jewish life and death is being shaped through these memorials and to what interpretive ends. Instead of concentrating on finished or monolithic Holocaust memory, visitors to Holocaust memorials increasingly look at the process by which public history and memory are constructed. They ask, Who creates this memory, under what circumstances, for which audience? Which events are remembered, which are forgotten, and how are they explained? What are these memorials' places in national and religious commemorative cycles? What is the contemporary architect's role in shaping public memory? What are the consequences of these memorials for both Jewish and other religious and national identities?

To this end, the life and texture of Holocaust memorials have been enlarged to include the times and places in which they were conceived, their literal construction amid historical and political realities, their finished forms in public spaces, their places in the constellation of national memory, their ever-evolving lives in the minds of their communities and of the Jewish people over time – and even their eventual destruction. With these dimensions in mind, it is important to understand how individual monuments create and reinforce particular memories of the Holocaust period as well as the ways events reenter political life shaped by monuments.

Over time, a new post-war generation will necessarily visit these memorials under new circumstances and invest them with new meanings. The result will be an evolution in these memorials' significance, generated in the new times and company in which they find themselves. Rather than fixing ideology and memory in hard and impermeable forms, as has traditionally been the goal in the creation of monuments, contemporary designers strive to open a space in the landscape that will open a space within visitors for memory. Holocaust memorials in this vein are thus designed to accommodate all the disparate and changing reasons, both present and future, that will impel people to visit these memorials in the first place.

For further reading, see M. Bohm-Duchen, ed., After Auschwitz: Responses to the Holocaust in Contemporary Art (1995); H. Gerth, Materials on the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe (2005); A. Konneke, ed., Das Harburger Mahnmal gegen Faschismus (The Harburg Monument against Fascism; 1994); K. Frahm, Denkmal für die ermordeten Juden Europas (Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe; 2005); E. Linenthal, Preserving Memory: The Struggle to Create America's Holocaust Museum (1995); S. Milton, In Fitting Memory: The Art and Politics of Holocaust Memorials (1991); A. Rieth, Monuments to the Victims of Tyranny (1969); J. E. Young, The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning (1993); idem, At Memory's Edge: After-Images of the Holocaust in Contemporary Art and Architecture (2000); and idem, ed., The Art of Memory: Holocaust Memorials in History (1994).

JAMES E. YOUNG

Holocaust Reparations and Restitution. All genocides are accompanied by looting and theft, and the *Holocaust is no exception. Accurate figures of the current value of the thievery perpetrated by the *Nazi regime and its allies are difficult to determine, but the best estimate is that between $230 billion and $320 billion in today's dollars was stolen from Europe's Jewish population.

With the end of World War II, the Allies, led by the *United States, set out to return stolen land and property to both nations and individuals. The process was imperfect and came nowhere close to returning even a significant share of what had been misappropriated. One significant milestone was the Washington Accord, signed in 1946, by which Swiss banks agreed to return approximately one-half of the gold they had taken from Nazi Germany, knowing that it was stolen from the treasuries of conquered Europe. In the western zones of Germany, military governments enacted laws requiring the return of all properties that had been confiscated or transferred under Nazi duress.

Between 1933 and 1945, the Germans stole approximately 600,000 artworks from both museums and private collections throughout Europe. This included paintings, sculpture, objets d'art, and tapestries. When rare books, stamps, and coins and fine furniture are considered, the number of items stolen goes into the millions. According to records from the Nuremberg trials, 29,984 railroad cars were required to transport all the German-stolen art to Germany. The value of the art plundered during the Holocaust, which exceeded the total value of all artworks in the United States in 1945, is astounding: $2.5 billion in 1945 prices, or $20.5 billion in 2008 dollars. The Nazi art confiscation program was the greatest displacement of art in human history.

The Allies, led by the United States, also undertook to return art and other cultural objects but the task was enormous. A dedicated team of art experts from the United States and the United Kingdom, known at the "Monuments Men" because they sought to minimize damage to European monuments and other architecture, attempted to track down Nazi-looted artworks. Hidden stashes of art and sculptures were located in salt mines, castles, and trains and returned to their countries of origin. For example, 60,000 artworks were returned to *France, with 45,000 returned largely to their Jewish owners. However, for a variety of reasons, the effort was only partially successful.

With the onset of the Cold War in the 1950s, the theft that had accompanied the Nazi genocide was largely forgotten. At the end of the occupation, the Federal Republic of *Germany did enact indemnification laws. In 1952, *Israel, along with representatives of American Jewry and the West German government, reached an agreement whereby Germany would provide $715 million in goods and services to the State of Israel as compensation for taking in survivors; $110 million would go to the newly created New York-based Claims Conference (formally known as the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany) to pay for programs focusing on relief, rehabilitation, and resettlement of Holocaust survivors; and direct reparations would be made through the Claims Conference to selected survivors, with more than 250,000 survivors receiving lifetime pensions. By 2000, Germany had paid more than $60 billion to Holocaust survivors. Yet that indemnity has been limited, and additional categories of elderly individuals eligible for compensation have been added only in recent years.

A totally unexpected development took place at the end of the 1990s. Even as the number of remaining Holocaust victims was dwindling, the Cold War ended, the *human rights movement was born, government doors flew open, and *Holocaust representations in *film, *television, and *museums transfixed the public imagination. Thefts from Jewish victims also came into the spotlight, particularly in the United States. The U.S.-based Holocaust restitution movement, launched in the late 1990s against European corporations and governments for their wrongful wartime activities, yielded more than $8 billion in payouts as compensation for the monetary losses and other injuries suffered by Jews during World War II. The settlements were achieved with three sets of entities. One was with Swiss and other European banks for failure to return funds deposited with the banks by Jewish depositors and (in the case of the Swiss) for trading in looted Nazi gold. The second was with European insurance companies for failure to pay on life insurance and other policies purchased by Jewish policyholders. The third settlement was with German industry for exploiting Jewish and non-Jewish victims as forced laborers, which for the Jews meant extermination through work, and for other misdeeds in which German business participated during World War II.

A wholly separate component of the Holocaust restitution movement has been claims for the return of Nazi looted artworks to their pre-war Jewish owners or heirs. The most notable settlement occurred in 2006, with the conclusion of litigation by Maria Altmann (d. 2011), a survivor from *Austria who resided in Los Angeles, against Austria and its Belvedere Gallery for the return of five valuable paintings by the Austrian Modernist, Gustav Klimt. The paintings, which had belonged to Altmann's aunt and uncle, Ferdinand and Adele Bloch-Bauer, were confiscated by the Nazis in 1938 when Ferdinand fled Austria after the Anschluss. Altmann filed her suit in Los Angeles federal court after being denied relief by both a government claims commission in *Vienna and the Austrian courts. After the U.S. Supreme Court refused to dismiss the case and an Austrian arbitration panel unanimously ruled that the paintings belonged to Altmann and her fellow heirs, Austria shipped the Klimts to Los Angeles.

Although reparations paid to Holocaust survivors and heirs and the restitution of stolen Holocaust assets to survivors or heirs cannot come close to fully compensating the personal and material losses of the Holocaust, return of stolen property and payment of damages for pain and suffering can provide a small measure of justice to the Jewish victims of World War II. MICHAEL J. BAZLYER

Holocaust Representation: Art. Although philosophers have concluded that it is neither possible nor warranted to portray an event as horrific as the *Holocaust, many artists of different religions and nationalities have felt the need to express their reaction to the attempted destruction of the Jews and the horrors of *Nazi persecution. These artists can be divided into several categories: camp and ghetto inmates, survivors, refugees, and those who were in hiding; Nazis who took photographs; partisans; liberators; non-participants in *Germany and abroad; and members of the second and third generations (children and grandchildren of survivors, refugees, and Nazis) (see HOLOCAUST DOCUMENTATION).

Art was produced in camps and ghettos under impossible conditions with improvised materials at the risk of the artists' lives. Such art was a form of spiritual resistance to Nazi dehumanization: it allowed artists to maintain a link with their former identities and gave them some measure of control in a situation of powerlessness. Art also affirmed life in another way. József Szajna stated that the trace of himself that he left on paper would survive even if he perished. This explains the large number of self-portraits and inmate portraits whose purpose was to indicate that the models had existed, even if they died as nameless victims. Some wished to be remembered in an idealized fashion, but there are also realistic portrayals of the old and sick. Self-portraits by survivors created after the war reveal the traumas they underwent. On liberation from *Auschwitz in 1945, Halina Olomucki drew herself contemplating her skeletal body in a mirror and asking in shock, "Is this me?" Samuel Bak's haunting "Self-Portrait at the Age of Thirteen" (1946) depicts the boy-artist wide-eyed in horror, still seeing before him the hell he had survived.

However, the main goal of this art was to provide documentary evidence of the brutal acts of the Nazis and the inhuman conditions in which their victims were forced to live and die. The works illuminate details about daily life in the camps and ghettos that are not otherwise known: from the cattle cars, selections, brutal camp labor, and the miserable living conditions to the death marches, gas chambers, and corpses. Most artists chose naturalistic styles, seeing their works as reportage rather than art. Others chose to heighten reality expressionistically to convey how their experiences actually felt. For instance, in depicting the many-tiered bunk beds in Buchenwald, Boris Taslitzky realistically drew inmates lying in them, whereas Auguste Favier revealed their deeper meaning by setting living “skeletons” in front to suggest the enervation and slow death that characterized that camp. In Theresienstadt*, naturalism was the style artists produced for their Nazi overseers to help them create the fraud of the “model camp.” In works they did in secret, they assumed the moral duty to expose the death that lay behind this façade.

Art also involved catharsis, the attempt to cleanse oneself of anger and pain. As survivors recuperated they repeated scenes from the camps with increasing expressionism until they felt freed from their terrible experiences. Some survivors continued to document the Holocaust, believing it was their duty to the dead to record their agony. Many others eventually returned to Holocaust themes, inspired by events such as the Eichmann trial. Artists who were in hiding, such as Felix Nussbaum, expressed their subjective feelings of alienation and loneliness. Partisans depicted their fight against the Nazis, while documenting the deportations and ruins they observed. Army and professional photographers such as Margaret Bourke-White and Lee Miller documented these sights, and Corrado Cagli and Leon Golub repeatedly drew these images, both on the spot and after the war.

Refugees who had escaped to safe havens remained emotionally afflicted. Feeling guilty because they had escaped, they had an overwhelming desire to impart the truth about the Holocaust. Artists such as Marc Chagall, Jacques Lipchitz, and George Grosz created allegories of their own escape and wanderings. However, in the main, in their themes as well as in the myriad artistic styles and personal iconography they used to express their ideas, their art parallels that of other artists who had no direct contact with the Holocaust. Despite the diversity of these artists, they used similar stereotypes and symbols to depict and interpret the Holocaust. The aim of these representations was to encapsulate an experience into a single image that would resonate meaningfully for the spectator. Instead of portraying camp life, from 1933 on, these artists used the only information they had: Camps were surrounded by barbed wire fences. Ben Shahn (1939), Leonard Baskin (1952), Audrey Flack (1976–77), and George Segal (1982–83) all depicted inmates behind barbed wire. This image was so closely identified with the camps that photographers accompanying the liberators filmed the inmates in this way, thus moving the image from art into reality and reinforcing its documentary value. From 1945 on, even a single strand of barbed wire in front of a head or hand was enough to represent the camps, and soon a strand of barbed wire could conjure up this image by itself. Igaël Tumarkin used such strands to give a Holocaust context to his abstract reliefs in the early 1960s, and Sigmar Polke's Camp (1982) portrays a barbed wire fence. This symbol could also be used in other contexts to suggest the Holocaust: in 1974–75 Marc Klionsky wrapped barbed wire around a Russian Jew to liken his imprisonment in Russia* to being in a concentration camp. Later artists, often inspired by visits to camp sites in Europe, used barbed wire or photographs of the fences to create camp installations, such as Pearl Hirschfield's Shadows of Auschwitz (1989) and Gerda Meyer-Bernstein's Shrine (1991), into which the public was invited to enter.

Another early symbol, the crematorium chimney, stood for the most idiosyncratic form of Holocaust murder: death in the gas chamber and burning corpses in the crematorium. The chimney was especially important in the art of survivors, such as Yehuda Bacon, Naftali Bezem, Samuel Bak, and Friedensreich Hundertwasser, whether or not they had seen them. In Hundertwasser's Blood Garden – Houses with Yellow Smoke (1962–63), chimneys belch yellow smoke that turns the blood-filled windows of the barracks black, as the life within them is burnt in the crematorium. R.B. Kitaj's Passion 1940–1945: Girl/Plume (1985) places a fragile girl in a chimney that recalls a coffin.

Other widespread Holocaust symbols also demanded only minimal knowledge from the spectators. Cattle cars and railroad lines were used to represent deportations; skeletally thin but living figures were identified immediately through the liberators' photographs as survivors; and children, sometimes accompanied by their mothers, were used to express the innocence of the Holocaust's victims.

The second generation developed different symbols, focusing on what they had encountered at home and subverted the methods of Nazi dehumanization – the numbers tattooed on their parents' arms and preserved camp uniforms – to memorialize their parents' identities. From 1979 on, Mindy Weisel and Haim Maor repeatedly used these numbers in various contexts, in 1992 Tatana Kellner used casts of her parents' arms that accent their camp numbers, and from 1995–98 Yosef Lemel created enormous photographs of the numbers on survivors' arms. Such artists also used family photographs and their parents' drawings and memoirs to express a feeling of loss and to preserve their parents' experiences.

The image that created the deepest, most lasting impression on artists, whether or not they had experienced the Holocaust, was the gruesome mound of skeletally thin corpses. This image also posed the greatest aesthetic and emotional problems. Witnesses depicted these corpses as individuals, and as with the photographs, most spectators avert their eyes from these works. Haunted by photographs of such images seen in news reports, artists sought to translate them into art. Pablo Picasso fragmented the corpses, softening the image to help spectators overcome their repugnance. In contrast, Jews usually decided not to base such works on photographs: their identification with the dead precluded them from using these corpses to create art about the Holocaust. Instead, they substituted other visual sources for these images or gave them other meanings. Thus Hyman Bloom based the corpses he painted on autopsies, Baskin called his serene corpses Dead Men, and Shahn used children's corpses from a Holocaust photograph in Allegory (1948) to depict victims of a tenement fire.

In the concluding decades of the twentieth century, it became obvious that the world had learned nothing from the past. Massacres and genocide proceeded apace and some even denied that the Holocaust had occurred. Clearly, semi-abstract and generalized works had not succeeded in forcing people to confront the Holocaust. Zoran Music and Robert Morris opted for a more striking use of this imagery to shock the spectator into renewed realization of the Holocaust's lessons, creating harsh images that evoke a gut-wrenching experience reminiscent of that caused by the original contact with the corpses. Several children of survivors adopted an opposite tactic, turning the dead into ghosts that haunt us in a gentler fashion. Natan Nuchi's life-sized skeletally thin corpses from 1985–95 are ethereal specters, haunting rather than shocking us. Aharon Gluska's seemingly innocent Black Boxes of 1992–93 lie scattered on the floor like minimalist sculptures. Standing beside them, we are shocked to discover that each box contains a camp photograph of an inmate whose hazy features are barely discernible through the black fabric, but whose eyes stare at us hauntingly.

Other artists identified with the Holocaust dead. First-generation artists Bezem and Tumarkin placed self-portraits among the corpses in the 1950s and 1960s, whereas second-generation artists explored what their own fate would have been. Yocheved Weinfeld portrayed herself in 1979 as an inmate, and from 1975 on, Haim Maor depicted himself naked, about to be shot and thrown into a pit. Their tendency to explore what their own fate would have been was reinforced by their parents seeing them as “memorial candles” or replacements for relatives who had perished in the Holocaust.

Other themes in nonwitness art had a shorter life-span. Refugees were a popular subject in the 1930s and 1940s, as artists either were or had seen refugees firsthand. Depictions of *resistance, especially of the *Warsaw ghetto uprising, are found during and after the war. Artists stressed that the fighters were Jewish by including a bearded man among them. Both refugees and partisans almost completely disappeared from art after 1948, being amalgamated into a new iconography concerning *Israel, which was understood as solving many of the problems raised by the Holocaust.

Artists, however, wished not only to document or describe events but also to understand them by putting them into symbolic or religious frameworks that would elucidate their significance. They developed archetypes to represent victims, partisans, and Nazis. This was already apparent in the works of Germans such as Otto Dix, Grosz, and John Heartfield who warned the public of the dangers inherent in Nazism in the 1920s, and of Chagall, Lipchitz, and Max Beckmann who did so in 1933 after Hitler's rise to power. *Job, the righteous man who unjustifiably lost his possessions, children, and health, became the archetype of the innocent Holocaust victims who were helpless before the evils that befell them. Ivan Mestrovic's emaciated Job (1945) accuses *God, while Nathan Rapoport's Job (1967), with a number on his arm, retains his faith despite everything. In contrast, artists took liberties to make the binding of *Isaac applicable to the Holocaust (Plates 15 and 19). In 1947, Mordecai Ardon portrayed *Sarah crying out against God because Isaac lies dead on the altar; in 1973 Frederick Terna, a survivor, had *Abraham kill himself rather than sacrifice his son; and in Segal's The Holocaust (1982–83), both Abraham and Isaac lie dead, linked by a final gesture. In such works, artists did not express unquestioning faith, but rather their anger against God for not saving His people.

Beginning in the 1930s, many artists such as Otto Pankok and Chagall also used the crucifixion, Christianity's major symbol, to warn Christians that they crucified Christ anew when they slaughtered his Jewish brothers (see Plate 14).

After the war this image was used to denounce the church for not doing enough to save the Jews.

Artists who tried to represent the Nazis realistically soon found that they had only expressed the “banality of evil.” Instead they decided to reveal the Nazis' true nature by symbolizing them as monsters, Death, or Moloch. Solutions ranged from Paul Klee's Voice from the Ether: And Thou Shalt Have Thy Fill! (1939) to Grosz' Cain (1944) and Kitaj's maniacal The National Socialist (1980–81). After the war, some artists – such as Matta, Francis Bacon, and Maryan S. Maryan – comprehended that evil was not just a Nazi trait but was inherent in human nature, and they began to portray all men as monstrous.

Another level of understanding the Holocaust led to the affirmation of Jewish identity, even by artists who had previously disdained religion. In Germany in the 1930s, Ludwig Meidner began depicting Jews praying and signing his works in Hebrew. In New York in the 1940s, Jack Levine turned to the Bible and William Gropper began to portray Jews praying as a yearly memorial to the Holocaust victims. Shahn and Baskin added Hebrew and Yiddish inscriptions to their works, and Barnett Newman translated the titles of his abstract works from Hebrew into English. To those who knew Hebrew, these artists transmitted “hidden messages” that would be incomprehensible to the general public. Younger Jewish artists, including Kitaj, Jonathan Borofsky, Nancy Spero, and Judy Chicago, underwent an opposite process: lacking any religious background, the Holocaust became for them the epitome of Judaism. Others lost their faith, representing the absence of God and the inability of Judaism to be restored.

This difference in generations can also be seen in artists' reactions to the connection between Israel and the Holocaust. In the late 1940s, Chagall and Lipchitz saw the creation of the State as a solution to the survivors' plight. However, Israel's constant wars and the threats to its existence led artists such as Bak, Bezem, and Erich Brauer to see a new Holocaust in every conflict. Leftist artists applied similar generalizations to other conflicts. In 1951 Picasso adapted the image of Nazis shooting naked women and children to the Korean War, thus evoking instinctive sympathy for the North Koreans and hatred for the Americans. Matta's poster Auschwitz 1941–1945 – Palestine 1948–1968 (1968) and Joan Snyder's Women in the Camps (1988) equate Israelis with the Nazis and Palestinians with the Jews, whereas Jörg Immendorff's Café Deutschland (1978) uses Holocaust imagery to stress the differences between East and West Germany. These examples raise moral issues. Applying the lessons of the Holocaust to contemporary events rightly warns how hatred and the immoral use of technology lead to genocide. However, applying Holocaust imagery to inherently different situations in order to elicit an unthinking response does not further these aims; it distorts the Holocaust's lessons. Moreover, the common use of these images diffuses their meaning: one forgets that the Holocaust was a singular event that occurred at a given time to a specific people, and this becomes part of the process leading to *Holocaust denial.

The inability of some artists to confront the Holocaust and its implications was clear already at the end of the war. From the late 1940s through the 1970s, a generation of West German artists withdrew into abstraction and refused to deal with the war period. At that time, many Jewish artists also turned to abstraction, although residual symbolism can be found in some of their works. For instance, Morris Louis's Charred Journal: Firewritten alludes to Nazi book-burning; flames and burning images appeared in the abstract works of Avigdor Arikha and Bak, whereas Jimmy Ernst used spiky forms that evoke barbed wire.

More recently, artists have stressed the persistence of memory despite attempts to forget. In the series Shulamith and Margarete (1981–83), Anselm Kiefer demonstrates that the ashes of Jewish victims will always shadow, underlie, and affect the German people. In 1991–93, Shimon Attie filled German sites with black and white “Jewish ghosts” by projecting pre-war photographs of Jews onto buildings they had inhabited in Berlin and onto the trains and tracks of the Dresden station from which they had been deported to their deaths.

Works by younger artists can sometimes be offensive because they involve post-modernist irony and an analysis of the way people reinvent history for their own ends. Some artists raise ethical questions by glorifying the Nazis, eroticizing scenes of murder, and using dolls or Lego blocks to portray the Holocaust.

In conclusion, the Holocaust has become part of our collective memory and continues to be expressed in art both in traditional and nonconventional ways.

For further reading, see Z. Amishai-Maisels, Depiction and Interpretation: The Influence of the Holocaust on the Visual Arts (1993); D. Apel, Memory Effects: The Holocaust and the Art of Secondary Witnessing (2002); M. Baigell, Jewish-American Artists and the Holocaust (1997); J. Blatter and S. Milton, Art of the Holocaust (1981); B. Brutin, “The Inheritance: Responses to the Holocaust by ‘Second Generation’ Israeli Artists” (in Hebrew, 2005); M. S. Costanza, The Living Witness (1982); M. Novitch, L. Dawidowicz, and T. Freudenheim, Spiritual Resistance: Art from the Concentration Camps 1940–1945 (1981); G. Green, The Artists of Terezin (1969); E. van Alphen, Caught by History: Holocaust Effects in Contemporary Art, Literature, and Theory (1997); and J. E. Young, At Memory's Edge: After-Images of the Holocaust in Contemporary Art and Architecture (2000). Important anthologies and exhibitions include M. Bohn-Duchen, ed., After Auschwitz: Responses to the Holocaust in Contemporary Art (1995); S. C. Feinstein, ed., Absence/Presence: Critical Essays on the Artistic Memory of the Holocaust (2005); S. C. Feinstein, ed., Witness and Legacy: Contemporary Art about the Holocaust (1995); K. Holtzman, ed., Burnt Whole: Contemporary Artists Reflect on the Holocaust (1994); S. Hornstein and F. Jacobowitz, eds., Image and Remembrance: Representation and the Holocaust (2003); S. Hornstein, L. Levitt, and L. J. Silberstein, eds., Impossible Images: Contemporary Art after the Holocaust (2003); and N.L. Kleeblatt, ed., Mirroring Evil: Nazi Imagery/Recent Art (2002). ZIVA AMISHAI-MAISELS

Holocaust Representation: Drama. Playwrights did not begin to describe and interpret the Holocaust experience until a decade after the end of World War II. The most influential and lasting effort was the 1956 adaptation of Anne Frank's Diary of a Young Girl by two Hollywood screenwriters, Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett. Otto Frank, Anne's father, the only survivor of the family, had given them permission to create a universal story from his daughter's journal. Their play became a kind of American urtext for the Holocaust experience, one that was invisibly Jewish and ultimately optimistic, two reasons for the play's seemingly inexhaustible popularity. The play, The Diary of Anne Frank, and its 1959 Hollywood film version have influenced all other dramatic representations of the Holocaust in the United States (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: FILM).

In Europe, plays on Holocaust themes departed from the upbeat tone and generally realistic form favored by American playwrights. An early example is the prize-winning one-act play, Korczak and the Children (1957), by Erwin Sylvanus, a German war veteran; it recounts the story of a Holocaust hero, the Polish Jewish doctor-educator Janusz Korczak, through a chronologically disrupted, allegorical meta-theatrical form. The impetus to depart from realism stemmed from the challenge of confronting the Holocaust in the countries where its devastation had occurred, together with the recognition that realism could not artistically portray the “concentratory universe” in which millions of victims had been slaughtered.

The countries most affected by the Holocaust tended to produce plays reflecting localized cultural and political concerns; these changed over time with the emergence of new knowledge of atrocities and new assumptions about their causes and effects. Most controversial were dramatic efforts to account for the deaths of so many innocent victims and the shattering of deeply valued ethical assumptions about humanity. In France, Charlotte Delbo, a non-Jewish survivor of Auschwitz, wrote Who Will Carry the Word? (1974); this play attempts to identify and analyze Delbo's own complicated presence among compatriots who were themselves implicated in the betrayal and murder of innocent people. In plays like The Workroom (1979), Jean-Claude Grumberg has sought to assess France's complicity with the Holocaust's perpetrators and its legacy of antisemitism. Among German-speaking writers, Rolf Hochhuth in The Deputy (1963), Peter Weiss in The Investigation (1965), and Thomas Bernhard in Eve of Retirement (1979), in styles ranging from documentary to the poetic, explore the nature and source of evil in Nazism and German culture. Hochhuth's greatest condemnation is reserved for the Vatican's indifference to Jewish suffering.

The most problematic Holocaust dramas present Jews as accomplices to their own murder, an idea first raised by the historian Raul Hilberg in The Destruction of the European Jews (1961) and by the philosopher Hannah Arendt in Eichmann in Jerusalem (1963). Plays such as Harold and Edith Lieberman's Throne of Straw (1978), Joshua Sobol's Ghetto (1984), and Roy Kift's Camp Comedy (1996) depict the lethal moral conundrums faced by Jewish leaders (Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski in Łódź, Jacob Gens in Vilna, Jacob Eppstein in Theresienstadt, respectively) whose efforts to save as many Jews as possible from Nazi annihilation required the sacrifice of others. The critic Lawrence Langer has called their dilemma one of “choiceless choice.”

The Liebermans and Kift make use of “Brechtian” or “epic theater” techniques to disrupt the audience's emotional involvement as a way to force engagement with the ethical “gray zone,” evoked by Primo Levi in his famous essay about Rumkowski (in The Drowned and the Saved, [1986]). Other playwrights link Jewish victims to the criminal behavior of their abusers more explicitly; for example, Robert Shaw in The Man in the Glass Booth (1969) and Rainer Werner Fassbinder in Garbage, the City and Death (1975).

In the dramatization by Christopher Hampton of the 1981 novella, The Portage to San Cristobal of A. H. by the brilliant critic George Steiner, the character of Hitler voices the deliberately provocative and unanswered argument that he was responsible for establishing the State of *Israel.

Since the 1970s, the theater of the Holocaust has been used to affirm the distinctive experiences of specific groups. Delbo's theatrical work, as well as that of her French colleague Lillian Atlan (Mr. Fugue or Earth Sick, 1967), has been studied and praised for its focus on the experience of women; Martin Sherman's Bent (1979), a "coming out play," has come to stand for the suffering of male homosexuals in the concentration camps. Yet the most important change among the second- and third-generation playwrights, aside from the dramatization of stories about the children and grandchildren of Holocaust victims, has been the proliferation of plays that produce theatrical effects through *comedy, once thought to be demeaning or destructive to the telling of an exclusively tragic Holocaust experience. Peter Barnes's Laughter (1978), Joan Schenkar's The Last of Hitler (1982), Roy Kift's Camp Comedy (1996), and Eugene Lion's Sammy's Follies (2006) all use humor to make the performances of their plays more transgressive of conventional theatrical forms and ethical assumptions. No writer has so consistently or outrageously employed mordant wit and outrageous farce than George Tabori (whose father was murdered in Auschwitz); his long career includes Holocaust-themed tragicomedies like The Cannibals (1968) and Mein Kampf (1986).

In fact, changes in Holocaust representation over sixty years can be gauged in the various ways that Anne Frank's story has been adjusted and adapted for the theater according to national need, historical pressure, aesthetic preference, and thematic focus. Wendy Kesselman's realistic updating of the original version in 1997, together with Bernard Kops' surrealist "play for young people," Dreams of Anne Frank (1992); Bobby Box's puppet play Anne Frank: Within & Without (2006); and Enid Futterman and Michael Cohen's musical theater piece Yours, Anne (1985) are only a few examples of the ways one historical victim's story has been represented dramatically. Yours, Anne is also an example of the important use of music in many dramatic depictions of the Holocaust; others include the Liebermans' klezmer, Kift's cabaret, C. P. Taylor's pastiche of classical to schmaltz in Good (1981), and Nicholas Maw's 2002 full-length opera based on William Styron's 1982 novel, Sophie's Choice.

For further reading, see E. Isser, Stages of Annihilation (1997); C. Schumacher, ed., Staging the Holocaust (1998); R. Skloot, The Darkness We Carry (1988); idem, ed., The Theatre of the Holocaust, 2 vols. (1981, 1999); and N. Watts, ed., A Terrible Truth, 2 vols. (2003); and entries under THEATER. ROBERT SKLOOT

Holocaust Representation: Film. The unimaginable horrors and the monumental scope of the mass murder of the concentration camp universe pose a special challenge to efforts of comprehension, expression, or representation. Any Holocaust text is constrained in its ability to provide a truthful account or to transmit the unique "unreality of the other planet" by the codes of its artistic form, by technical possibilities, and by the cultural norms and socio-political ideologies of its time. At the same time, the representation of the Holocaust is essential to inform and to enlighten, to pay homage to the victims and their sufferings, and to warn against the dangers of ideologies of hatred. Cinema has been a witness to the Holocaust in documentary images, a participant in the unfolding of the Holocaust in propaganda films, and a repository of collective memory in popular movies. Films have played a central part in how the Shoah has been understood and remembered, just as the subject of the Holocaust has played a role in the evolution of cinema as an art form and as a major medium of cultural discourse and social communication.

Cinema was already used for propaganda purposes during the earliest years of *Nazism. Film crews headed by the talented filmmaker Leni Riefenstahl documented the first national Nazi rallies. Victory of Faith (Sieg des Glaubens, 1934) about the 1933 Nuremberg party convention was followed by Triumph of The Will (Triumph des Willens, 1935), a film designed to transform ordinary viewers into impassioned Nazis through stunning spectacles, fiery speeches by Adolf Hitler, and a musical soundtrack based on national and party anthems, military marches, and Wagnerian themes. After the outbreak of the war, antisemitic German films such as Jew Suss (Jud Süß, 1940), about an eighteenth-century *Court Jew, and the pseudo-documentary The Eternal Jew (Der ewige Jude, 1940) revealed the Nazis' genocidal intentions as early as the fall of 1940, nearly a year before the actual systematic killing of the Jews began. Both of these extraordinary hate films were shown to German troops assigned to carry out the genocide programs (see ANTISEMITISM).

Hollywood wartime movies tried to warn the free world about the dangers of Nazism and the need to fight and win the war, but very few films addressed the predicament of the Jews. During the war years, the Jewish heads of the major Hollywood studios feared antisemitic backlashes and accusations of double loyalty or Jewish war mongering to help the Jews in Europe. Charles Chaplin's The Great Dictator (1940) was a remarkable exception, produced with the artist's own money and outside the studio system (Chaplin was not Jewish). The film satirizes Hitler and Nazi Germany, and it features Nazi persecution of a Jewish barber and his community. Chaplin plays both the great dictator and the Jewish barber; the movie ridicules racial theories when, in a mistaken identity plot twist at the end of the film, the fanatic followers of the dictator hail the barber as their leader. Although the shocking revelations of the magnitude of suffering and destruction at the end of the war prompted Chaplin to express regret for his humorous approach, his genius made The Great Dictator a classic film and a rare early treatment of the plight of the Jews in the Third Reich.

During World War II, photographic images, both moving and still, played a major role as sources of information and communication. Newsreels shown in movie theaters, as well as published photographs of barbed wires, watchtowers, barracks, chimneys, and smoke, informed millions of people about the Holocaust's horrors, and they continue to evoke the Nazis' network of concentration and death camps. The most graphic images of the Holocaust are those of the victims at the liberated concentration camps. The astounded commanders of the Allied forces ordered the filming of these terrible scenes so that they could be recorded, widely distributed, and also preserved as evidence of Nazi atrocities and mass murder. Photographs of emaciated living bodies and stacked corpses have become the ultimate images of genocide and dehumanization.

In the immediate post-war years, aspects of the Holocaust were portrayed in realistic dramas, which were motivated by the desire to inform, to remember, and to learn the lessons of the past while asserting a commitment to a better world. The idea of “a better world” took many political forms. In the communist regimes of *Eastern Europe, national cinemas treated the Nazi horrors as the crucible for the ideological triumph of Russian-inspired socialism. Such films include the Polish Border Street (dir. Alexander Ford, 1947) and The Last Stage (dir. Wanda Jakubowska, 1947). Post-war films, such as The Great Promise (dir. Josef Lejtes, 1946), My Father's House (dir. Herbert Kline, 1947), and The Illegals (dir. Meyer Levin, 1948), have a Zionist emphasis, showing survivors recovering from their traumas in what would soon become the State of *Israel. In the United States, Hollywood followed years of ignoring the Jewish genocide with films like Gentleman's Agreement (dir. Elia Kazan, 1947) and Crossfire (dir. Edward Dmytryk, 1947), which address the problem of antisemitism and the need to eradicate racism and prejudice from post-war American society. The first major American film on the Holocaust was *The Diary of Anne Frank (dir. George Stevens, 1959). Based on the published diary and the Broadway *theater version, the Hollywood production sentimentalizes the Holocaust, promoting shallow forms of optimism. Its final message is of hope; the legacy of the universalized Anne appears in her words that “in spite of everything” she believes in human goodness. Contemporary discomfort with the simplistic sentimentality of the Hollywood presentation of Anne Frank also applied to productions in other parts of the world in the 1950s, as they were usually dramas that celebrated heroic and self-justified national ideology. However, many of these films represented their locations realistically. The Diary of Anne Frank was filmed in a replica of the authentic attic and included exterior pictures of the original site in *Amsterdam. Gilo Potecorvo's Kapo (1959) was shot in camps in operation during the war years.

Alain Resnais' Night And Fog (Nuit et Brouillard, 1955) is an artistic reflection on the newsreel footage and documentary evidence of Nazi atrocities. In less than 30 minutes, this exemplary documentary features the horrors of the concentration camp universe, employing wartime images and pictures of *Auschwitz in the present. Its dualistic structure and double perspective serve two purposes. On the one hand, the film exposes details of the Holocaust: the daily routine, the infernal organization, and the victims' helplessness once they were caught up in the process of the extermination system. On the other hand, the brooding camera, as it films Auschwitz in the 1950s, accompanied by cryptic narration and probing flute melodies, expresses the anguished recognition that the images of the unimaginable cannot represent the universe of atrocities.

In the 1960s, Modernist existentialist attitudes generated visions that regarded the concentration camp universe as an incarnation of the human condition in general. Thus, the Holocaust was invoked to offer insights and metaphors for understanding the human predicament. Luchino Visconti's The Damned (1969), Bob Fosse's Cabaret (1972), Joseph Losey's Mr. Klein (Monsieur Klein, 1976), and H. J.

Syberberg's Hitler – A Film from Germany (Hitler, ein Film aus Deutschland, 1977) confront those aspects of Western civilization that created Nazism and the Holocaust. Ingmar Bergman (Serpent's Egg, 1977) and François Truffaut (The Last Metro [Le dernier métro], 1980) explore the complexity of character in light of the human experience under Nazi menace. American movies like Judgment at Nuremberg (dir. Stanley Kramer, 1961) and The Pawnbroker (dir. Sidney Lumet, 1965) address the ethical dimension of social behavior vis-à-vis injustice and racism.

In Europe, the critical attitudes of Modernism led to a new, harsh reckoning with the past. The 1960s Czech cinematic new wave produced a remarkable combination of humanistic realism, as in The Shop on Main Street (dir. Jan Kadar, 1965), and surrealist Modernism inspired by Alfred Radok's Distant Journey (1950) in films like Transport from Paradise (Zbyněk Brynych, 1963), Diamonds of the Night (Jan Němec, 1964), and The Fifth Horseman Is Fear (Brynych, 1965). In *France, The Sorrow and the Pity (Le chagrin et la pitié; dir. Marcel Ophüls, 1969), a documentary on the conduct of French society during World War II, counters national traditions of heroic resistance with details of widespread collaboration and antisemitic actions. The film spurred a new wave of “retro” films that subvert the heroic historical narratives that had been fostered by French official institutions and political leaders since the end of the war. Louis Malle explores the character of a young collaborator in Lacombe Lucien (1973) and personal guilt over the treatment of Jews in Goodbye Children (Au revoir les enfants, 1987). Jewish filmmakers, recalling personal experiences from the war years, feature the plight of the Jews in occupied France in Violins at the Ball (Les violons du bal; dir. Michel Drach, 1974) and Black Thursday (Les guichets du Louvre; dir. Michel Mitrani, 1974).

In the 1970s, a young generation of German filmmakers created movies that tried to deal with the history of their country from the perspective of a personal confrontation with the burden of Nazism. These films include the self-pitying Germany Pale Mother (Deutschland, bleiche Mutter; dir. Helga Sanders Brahms, 1980), the subversive Lili Marleen (dir. R. W. Fassbinder, 1980), and the reclaiming of a German past in the film series Homeland (Heimat; dir. Edgar Reitz, 1980–84). Israeli filmmakers also began to examine the legacy of the Holocaust in the national psyche and the effects of the historical trauma on the political behavior of the Jewish state in Operation Jonathan (dir. Menahem Golan, 1978) and Wooden Gun (dir. Ilan Moshenson, 1979).

The completion of Claude Lanzmann's Shoah in 1985 marks the appearance of a canonical text in the discourse of the Holocaust as well as a unique film masterpiece. In more than nine hours of film, Lanzmann focuses on the core of the horrors: the death camps and the methods and details of the killing process. The film presents the Holocaust as a watershed historical event, a singular human experience, and a unique challenge to the possibilities of artistic expression. The dramatic content occurs in two levels – the excruciating accounts of the past and their painful recounting in the present – that interact with each other. Thus, the film explores a past whose scars inform a tormented presence. Although it appears to be a lean documentary, seemingly limited to interviews and images of the sites of the genocide, avoiding narration, music, or any sound effects, Shoah is a highly artistic text, rich with significant aesthetic decisions and a sophisticated Modernist poetics. Most remarkably, the film has no documentary historical photographs or archival footage from the war years, underscoring Lanzmann's conviction that the Holocaust's heart of darkness is beyond representation and that documentary images might suggest that there are images of the unimaginable and that the unrepresentable can be shown. In recent decades Lanzmann's cautious approach to the visual image as a record of reality has been replaced by a post-modern celebration of spectacle and the power of images. This challenge to the notion of grand narratives, together with the new technologies of computer and video, is evident in numerous works on multiple and diverse aspects of the Holocaust. Many members of the second generation have used inexpensive film production methods to explore their family roots and the special predicaments of their parent survivors. Several ambitious projects established large collections of video testimonies by tens of thousands of survivors.

The popularity of the Holocaust as a subject for cinematic imagination was underscored by the success of Schindler's List (1993; Academy Award for Best Picture, 1993). Steven Spielberg, the most popular filmmaker in the world, created an epic account of the struggle to survive in the infernal ghettos, labor camps, and extermination centers of Poland. The story focuses on Oskar Schindler, a real person who used his position in the German economy and Nazi circles to save thousands of Jews. Spielberg's Schindler's List is a powerful realistic presentation, shot in black and white to match the newsreel images from the past. He offers the project as a work of a Modernist artist, burdened by the personal angst and tragic recognitions of a Jew in the post-Shoah modern world. Ultimately, Schindler's List is a post-modern media event and a post-modern text celebrating the preservation of life, capitalism, and the power of the cinematic medium.

Schindler's List marks a shift from the engagement with victimizers and victims to saviors and survivors. Post-modernism is also characterized by the withdrawal from anguished reflections on the tragic aspects of existence, as manifested in Roberto Benigni's Holocaust drama, Life Is Beautiful (La Vita è bella [1999]). Holocaust comedy, arguably an impossible oxymoron, became a popular option, with films like Train of Life (Train de vie; dir. Radu Mihaileanu, 1998) and Jacob the Liar (dir. Peter Kassovitz, 1999). Rather than irreverence or mockery, these works attempt to offer the life-enhancing vision of comedy in connection with the Holocaust. As such, they echo numerous post-Shoah films that celebrate human virtues and resistance under pressure. These include Weapons of the Spirit (Les armes de l'esprit; Pierre Sauvage, 1989), a documentary on Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, a small Protestant farming village in France that hid Jews, and Triumph of the Spirit (Robert Young, 1989) a dramatic film about an actual individual who survived Auschwitz by winning boxing matches. Claude Lanzmann's last film, Sobibór, October 14, 1943, 4 P.M. (2001), recounts the heroic prisoners' revolt in Sobibór that put an end to the functioning of the death camp. A recent example of this genre is Defiance (Edward Zwick, 2008) about the four Bielski brothers who saved 1,200 Jews in a settlement in a Polish forest while waging a campaign of armed resistance (see HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE).

Filmmakers have found rich material and intense dramatic situations in the Holocaust. The chief historical and moral lessons of the event fall into the categories of victims, bystanders, and perpetrators. Holocaust films feature the victims' predicament and human suffering and resistance in the face of genocidal assaults, or they examine the conduct of bystanders that may range from collaboration to indifference to righteous action. Films dealing with perpetrators have established Nazism as the ultimate evil of human experience. Notable examples include Roman Polanski's exploration of the plight of the victim survivor in The Pianist (2002); Costa Gavras' investigation of the role and ethical dilemmas of bystanders in Amen (2002), an adaptation of Rolf Hochuth's celebrated play on the conduct of Pope Pius XII and the Catholic church during the Holocaust; and German director Oliver Hirschbiegel's spectacular presentation of the last days of Hitler and the Nazi regime in Downfall (Der Untergang; 2004).

The Shoah continues to fascinate filmmakers and viewers around the world. The extensive personalization of the Holocaust by numerous young filmmakers exploring their family roots is evident in historical sagas like Claude Lelouch's Bolero (Les uns et les autres [1981]) and István Szábo's Sunshine (1999), films that feature the unfolding of the twentieth century through the sagas of individual characters but also highlight the centrality of the Holocaust in modern experience. By 1960, fewer than 120 feature films about the Holocaust had been made, in a total of fourteen countries. In the 1990s alone, more than two hundred Holocaust movies were produced in thirty-one countries. Since 1980, many films dealing with the Holocaust have won the American Academy Awards (Oscar) in the categories of documentaries and foreign films; these include the 2008 Austrian/German foreign film, The Counterfeiters (Die Fälscher; dir. Stefan Ruzowitzky; 2007).

In the present age of multichannel telecommunication, television has become the site for many Holocaust films, with numerous channels showing dramatic material based on historical events and real life (see HOLOCAUST REPRESENTATION: TELEVISION). The Shoah continues to inspire a variety of films, including historical sagas; morality tales; dramas of adolescent crises, social prejudice, and political conflicts; and adventure fantasies. In most cases, filmmakers are sensitive to the imperatives of historical memory, the limits of representation, and the risks of vulgarization and trivialization – due in great part to the public discourse and critical discussion about adequate representations and their ethical implications that have been generated by the apparently unending stream of Holocaust movies.

For further reading, see I. Avisar, Screening the Holocaust: Cinema's Images of the Unimaginable (1988); L. Baron, Projecting the Holocaust into the Present: The Changing Focus of Contemporary Holocaust Cinema (2005); T. Haggith and J. Newman, eds., Holocaust and the Moving Image: Representations in Film and Television since 1933 (2005); A. Insdorf, Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust (2002); and J. Hirsch, Afterimage: Film, Trauma, and the Holocaust (2004).

ILAN AVISAR

Holocaust Representation: Television. The Holocaust was first communicated visually to 1940s American and British audiences in newsreels and popular photojournalist magazines such as Look and Life. Over the next six decades various documentary and fictionalized representations of the Holocaust appeared on television. The visual image, most often black and white, has remained central to consciousness of the Holocaust.

The first dramatic invocations of the Holocaust usually depicted an individual story, often tangential to the Holocaust, in which the larger event loomed in the shadows. Although these storylines may have indicated an initial unwillingness to confront the magnitude of the topic, the reduction of a major subject to fit the small screen may also reflect the nature of television. Some television programs of this era sought to fit the Holocaust narrative into their own format. In 1953 Ralph Edwards used his popular program This Is Your Life to tell the story of one survivor, Hanna Bloch Kohner. The story echoed major American themes: innocent youth interrupted by the trauma of persecution and incarceration, and separation and loss crowned with a love story and the triumph of survival. In this episode Kohner was reunited with her brother who had been flown in secretly from Israel.

Some prominent writers of 1950s television dramas were Jewish but the custom of the time permitted depictions of only one Jewish character and one African-American character per year, per series. Programs with overtly Jewish themes were only scheduled on Sunday mornings when religious broadcasting was offered as a public service. These annual Jewish-centered programs usually coincided with a major Jewish holiday, and Jewish writers, directors, and producers used their skills to craft impressive work. Thus, Judgment at Nuremberg (1961) was presented on television before it became the classic movie; The Diary of Anne Frank was broadcast in 1952 as a half-hour Sunday morning Frontier of Faith program, even before its Broadway appearance and only months after it had first appeared in English. This program included Anne's proclamation of faith in the future that made her story palatable to contemporary American sensibilities: "I still believe that people are really good at heart. I simply can't build up my hopes on a foundation consisting of confusion, misery, and death." It was another forty years before an ABC docudrama followed Anne into concentration camps at Westerbork and Auschwitz and on the death marches to Bergen-Belsen, where she died during the typhus epidemic in March 1945, only weeks before its liberation. By then the Holocaust had become American culture's paradigmatic manifestation of evil within the world.

Judgment at Nuremberg focused on the United States and its Allies as judges of Nazi war criminals; it did not refer to American indifference to the fate of Europe's Jews during the war. Its most memorable moment was a word that was not said: The American Gas Company, sponsor of Playhouse 90, forbade the word "gas," the modality of Nazi killing, to be spoken. Over the next decades, the nature of the event being depicted would frequently clash with those financing the new industry. Only in 1998, when the Holocaust had emerged as a paradigmatic, seemingly sacred event, would the networks broadcast Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List without commercial interruption. (The sponsor was the Ford Motor Company, whose founder Henry Ford had financed antisemitic publications including the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. His descendants and his successors were not unmindful of this past as they undertook this "public service.")

A significant change in Holocaust consciousness was marked in 1961, sixteen years after the camps' liberation, when the trial of Adolf Eichmann (see HOLOCAUST TRIALS) brought an unprecedented number of journalists to Jerusalem and television coverage was provided. As background for the trial a number of documentaries about the Holocaust were produced; daily news broadcasts brought the trial into America's homes. Israel, which did not yet have television (David Ben-Gurion, Israel's founding prime minister was wary of its potential cultural and materialistic impact on the state), broadcast the trial on closed-circuit television as Israelis sat glued to their radios. If Nuremberg was a trial by documents, the Eichmann trial was a trial by survivors, who narrated the entire history of the Holocaust whether it had relevance to the defendant's deeds or not. Over the next decade some important films were produced, and the Holocaust slowly made its way out of the ghetto of Sunday morning television.

In 1977 the mini-series Roots, an African American family saga, was broadcast on American television with great success. One year later, NBC, newly confident that minority programming could attract a large viewership, broadcast the docudrama Holocaust over a four-night period; some 250 million Americans watched at least part of it. Despite historical and aesthetic criticisms of aspects of the mini-series, the Holocaust had become mainstream. Fears that the Holocaust would be forgotten disappeared, and the only issue remaining was whether it would be remembered appropriately, with due deference to the power of the event, or whether television would reduce its real human drama to soap opera. In Germany, where it was seen by a younger generation who had not lived through these events, the mini-series Holocaust also had a great impact. In its wake, the German Parliament rescinded the statute of limitations for the prosecution of Nazi war criminals. In the United States, the broadcast of Holocaust created the climate that led to the creation of the Office of Special Investigations of the Department of Justice to bring Nazi war criminals to justice and the establishment of the President's Commission on the Holocaust, which subsequently recommended the creation of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. The mini-series coincided with the emergence of Holocaust courses and research on college and university campuses, which increased fiftyfold in the 1970s.

In the late 1980s, the mini-series, War and Remembrance, based on Herman Wouk's 1978 epic novel, was broadcast; this series was far more graphic in its treatment of the Holocaust than anything seen before. By then, television had entered the cable era, which segmented the television audience while permitting greater program diversity. Stories of resistance particularly fascinated American television networks. Escape from Sobibor (1987) portrayed resistance in a death camp. Jon Avnet's mini-series Uprising, the narrative of the Warsaw ghetto, was a far more graphic and nuanced representation than previous work. It was broadcast on the same night as the Emmy Awards and the seventh game of the World Series in 2001, just weeks after 9/11. The rescue of Denmark's Jews was depicted on national television, and so, too, was the story of Raoul Wallenberg in Wallenberg: A Hero's Story (1985). By the late twentieth century, topical shows routinely presented themes connected to the Holocaust. Thus, one of the episodes of Brooklyn Bridge (1991–93), a Jewish family drama set in the 1950s, was entitled the "Last Immigrant," about the arrival of a Holocaust survivor and family efforts to keep a young boy from learning the fate of Europe's Jews (1992).

The cable channel Home Box Office (HBO) has played a unique role in broadcasting documentaries, both its own creations – such as One Survivor Remembers: The Gerda Weismann Klein Story (1995), winner of an Oscar and an Emmy, and Into the Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransport (2000) – and serving as an outlet for the broadcast of documentaries created for other purposes, such as The Long Way Home (1997) or Last Days (1998), both Academy-Award-winning films. It also created Conspiracy, the Emmy-winning ninety-minute reenactment of the Wannsee Conference. The History Channel has also paid significant attention to the Holocaust. Both cable and network channels routinely rebroadcast major theatrical films with Holocaust themes.

For many decades the Holocaust was considered a sacred event, off limits to comedy or comedians. Hogan's Heroes (1965–71), a television comedy about American prisoners of war and their foolish German captors, presumed the evil of the Nazi cause, but steered clear of the Holocaust. Jewish comedians, in particular, began to break this taboo, from Mel Brooks' The Producers (film [1968], Broadway musical [2001], and film [2005]) to Jerry Seinfeld's "Soup Nazi" episode (Seinfeld, 1995, season 7). Larry David's television comedy, Curb Your Enthusiasm, routinely evokes the Holocaust, whether he pits a Holocaust survivor against a contestant on a television show (2004) or shows the tattoos on a chef's arm, which he mistakes for tattoos of an Auschwitz survivor (2002). David uses the Holocaust's very sacredness as a comedic tool: Nothing is out of bounds, nothing too holy to touch.

Through television, the film industry has the unique capacity to shape the perceptions of historical events for the nonscholarly and nonliterary public (Shandler). Danny Anker's television documentary, Imaginary Witness: Hollywood and the Holocaust (AMC 2004), explores this very basic issue and its uniquely American dimension. Because of its status as the paradigmatic manifestation of twentieth-century evil, the Holocaust is often used as a backdrop to other instances of mass murder and genocide. Thus, Elie Wiesel was featured as a commentator on The Day After (1983), the story of the morrow of nuclear conflagration. Television commentators invoked the failure to bomb Auschwitz when Kosovo was bombed by NATO forces.

The proliferation of creative approaches to the Holocaust by men and women of greater and lesser talent and sensitivities in commercial contexts raises ongoing concern about the subject's trivialization and vulgarization. However, for the most part the Holocaust has been handled on television with respect and dignity; for many who have worked with this material, it has elicited some of their finest work. Because of the compelling nature of this event in human history, as well as the abundance of visual images and recorded testimony, the Holocaust is bound to continue to fascinate filmmakers and documentarians for decades to come. For further reading, see J. Shandler, While America Watches: Televising the Holocaust (1999). MICHAEL BERENBAUM

Holocaust Rescuers. In the early 1960s, Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial authority, began to recognize non-Jews who helped save Jews during the Shoah. To date, Yad Vashem has recognized more than 22,000 individuals and one country, Denmark, as "Righteous Gentiles" or "Righteous among the Nations." In this entry, rescuers are dealt with country by country; there are many more documented rescuers in these and other countries who are not mentioned here.

BULGARIA: There were about 50,000 Jews in Bulgaria on the eve of World War II, and most would survive the Holocaust. A Nazi ally during most of the war, the Bulgarian government began to implement anti-Jewish legislation in 1941. However, there was widespread opposition to these policies, particularly to plans to deport Jews to Poland. In the spring of 1943, Alexander Belev, the head of Bulgaria's Commissariat for Jewish Questions, decided to include Bulgarian Jews in transports of Jews from Bulgarian-occupied Macedonia and Thrace to fill his quota of 20,000. Metropolitan Kiril of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church in Plovdiv immediately asked King Boris III to halt the transports from Bulgaria proper and threatened to lie down on the city's railroad tracks to stop the deportations. Similar protests took place elsewhere in Bulgaria. As a result, Belev decided not to include Bulgarian Jews in the transports, but he did send the 11,500 Jews in Macedonia and Thrace to death camps in Poland. He also forced 19,000 Jews in the capital, Sofia, to move to twenty towns and villages throughout the country in May 1943. Metropolitan Kiril was among nineteen Bulgarians later named Righteous Gentiles.

DENMARK: There were about 7,500 Jews in Denmark in 1940. After the German occupation, the Danish government told the Germans that the "Jewish question" was off limits for discussion. This all changed in the fall of 1943 when Dr. Werner Best, Germany's new ambassador to Denmark, began to plan the round-up and deportation of Denmark's Jews for October 1–2. Georg Ferdinand Duckwitz, an attaché at the German legation in Copenhagen, informed Swedish, Jewish, and Danish underground leaders of Best's plans, which prompted a Danish national rescue effort in October 1943. The Danes were able to smuggle 7,220 Jews into Sweden, although another 461 Danish Jews were unable to escape Best's dragnet and were sent to Theresienstadt. Duckwitz was named a Righteous Gentile in 1971.

FRANCE: France was conquered by the Germans in the spring and early summer of 1940 and divided into two occupation zones. Northern France was under Wehrmacht control, whereas southern France was governed by the collaborationist Vichy government. More than half of France's 330,000–340,000 Jews were trapped in the Vichy zone. Huguenots in the Vichy hamlet of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, guided by Pastor André Trocmé, hid three to five thousand Jews. Pastor Marc Donadille and his wife Françoise saved another eighty Jews in Alsace and sent another one hundred to Le Chambon.

In Lyon, Father Pierre Chaillet, a Jesuit priest who worked with the resistance movement, searched for orphaned Jewish children and placed them with French families who agreed to hide them. He was supported by Cardinal Archbishop of Lyon, Pierre-Marie Gerlier, and his advisor on Jewish affairs, Abbé Alexandre Glasburg. Abbé Glasburg was credited with saving 180 children in the Vénissieux detention camp from deportation. French Quakers, the YMCA, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee also played active roles in saving French Jews. Varian

Fry, an American journalist working with the American Emergency Rescue Committee, helped smuggle more than 2,000 refugees out of Marseilles before he was arrested and deported by the Vichy government in the fall of 1941. All of these French heroes, including Fry, were later recognized as Righteous Gentiles.

GERMANY: Father Bernhard Lichtenberg, a staunch critic of the Nazis as rector and later provost of St. Hedwig's Cathedral in Berlin, became involved in efforts to stop the persecution of Jews soon after Hitler took power. Constantly watched and threatened by German authorities, he initiated daily public prayers for Jews and Christians and argued that Nazi teachings about the Volks were un-Christian. In 1941, the Gestapo arrested Lichtenberg and charged him with attacks against the state and Nazi party. During their search of his apartment, Gestapo agents found a copy of a sermon he planned to deliver that said that Nazi ideas were incompatible with Catholic teachings. He was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison for his religious activities. His bishop, Konrad von Preysing, convinced the Gestapo to allow Lichtenberg to regain his freedom after he completed his sentence in return for a promise not to preach until the war was over. Lichtenberg refused and was sent to a work camp where he was badly beaten. He died on the way to Dachau in 1943.

HUNGARY: The Hungarian government of Admiral Miklós Horthy, a Nazi ally, initially refused Germany's demand in 1942 that it deport its 725,000 Jews and 100,000 Jewish converts to Christianity to the East because, it argued, they were too important to the country's economy. This all changed when Germany occupied Hungary in the spring of 1944. Heinrich Himmler, the Reichsführer SS and principal architect of the "Final Solution," sent Adolf Eichmann, his deportation specialist, to Budapest to oversee the round-up and transport of Hungary's Jews to Auschwitz. Eichmann, working closely with Hungarian officials, sent more than 437,000 Jews to Auschwitz between May 15 and July 8, where most were murdered.

Rescue efforts began almost immediately, led by the Jewish Agency of Palestine's Relief and Rescue Committee of Budapest (RRCB). Joel Brand, a controversial RRCB leader, held three meetings with Eichmann, who agreed to sell Brand one million Jews in a "goods for blood" deal that involved the transfer of ten thousand new trucks and various foodstuffs to the SS. News of Eichmann's offer quickly reached the Allies, who, in league with the international press, condemned the scheme as a "Gestapo plot" and "humanitarian blackmail." A number of diplomats in Budapest did everything possible to save Hungary's Jews. Swedish diplomats Per Anger, Carl Ivan Danielsson, and Raoul Wallenberg went to extraordinary efforts to help, as did Swiss diplomats Carl and Gerturd Lutz, Papal Nuncio Angelo Rotta, Italian diplomat Giorgio Perlasca, and Swiss International Red Cross representative Friedrich Born. Yad Vashem later named each of them Righteous Gentiles. The diplomats issued fake Schutz (protection) briefe or Schutzpässe (protection passes) to Hungarian Jews, which identified them as Swedish subjects awaiting repatriation. Wallenberg and Anger also rented thirty buildings in Budapest to house "Swedish" Jews awaiting transfer, declaring the buildings inviolable Swedish territory. Wallenberg, who was later arrested by the Soviets as an American spy and died in Soviet captivity, risked his life over and over to save as many Jews as possible.

LITHUANIA: The first major effort to help Jews in the early years of World War II came in the summer of 1940 after the Soviet Union conquered the Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. There were 260,000 Jews in Lithuania at this time. In early August 1940, Jewish refugees in Lithuania flooded foreign legations seeking exit visas to Palestine or the United States. Jan Zwartendijk, the acting Dutch consul, worked closely with Japanese diplomat Sempo Sugihara to issue Dutch and Japanese transit visas to thousands of Jews for Dutch Curaçao via Japan. Although Zwartendijk's efforts were supported by his government, Sugihara was criticized by Japanese authorities for violating strict Japanese immigration guidelines. Regardless, their work saved the lives of thousands of Jews, which led to their recognition as Righteous among the Nations. The following year, Ona Simiate, a librarian at the University of Vilnius, began to do everything she could to help the city's Jews. She got permission to enter the Vilnius (Vilna) ghetto after explaining that she needed to recover books checked out by former Jewish students. She tried to retrieve as many books as she could from the famed YIVO Institute, hiding them outside the ghetto. She also brought food, medicines, and other supplies to Jewish friends there and helped hide Jews who escaped from the ghetto. The Germans arrested Simiate in 1944 and brutally tortured her. After friends at the university bribed the police to prevent her execution, she was sent to Dachau and then to France. Although she refused any recognition for her rescue efforts, Yad Vashem later declared her a Righteous among the Nations.

POLAND: Occupied Poland was both Nazi Germany's racial laboratory and principal killing field during the Final Solution. The Germans not only murdered 90% of pre-war Poland's 3.3–3.5 million Jews but they also killed three million Christian Poles. To help a Jew meant death to any Gentile. To date, Yad Vashem has recognized more than 6,000 Christian Poles as Righteous among the Nations.

One of the most famous Righteous Gentiles was Irena Sendlerowa, a leader of Żegota or Council for the Aid to Jews, a Catholic-Jewish organization committed to doing everything possible to save Jews. Sendlerowa was responsible for hiding Jewish children outside the Warsaw ghetto. She placed most of them in foster homes or hid them in Catholic convents and orphanages. Over time, she had about 3,000 Jews under her care. She worked closely with other Żegota leaders such as Julian and Halina Grobelny and Irena Schutz, who helped her obtain illegal documents from the city of Warsaw's Sanitary-Epidemiological Office that allowed daily access to the ghetto. Children were smuggled out through underground tunnels, taken briefly to "safe" apartments, and then placed with Polish families, who risked a great deal to help them. Żegota also worked with the Zionist Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ZOB) to save adults, particularly those involved in daily work details outside of the ghetto. Żegota gave ZOB the addresses of safe houses for adults who escaped from the ghetto. Once in the safe houses, the escapees were given forged Aryan papers and then integrated into the local Polish population. Irena Sendlerowa, Julian and Halina Grobelny, and Irena Schutz were all declared Righteous Gentiles after the war.

For further reading, see A. L. Bauminger, The Righteous Among the Nations, trans. A. Oved (1990); P. Friedman, Their Brothers' Keepers (1978); M. Gilbert, The Righteous: The Unsung Heroes of the Holocaust (2003); and M. Paldiel, The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews During the Holocaust (1993); see also BELGIUM; KINDERTRANSPORT.

DAVID M. CROWE

Holocaust Resistance. During the *Holocaust, both Jews and non-Jews across Europe opposed the *Nazis and their collaborators in many different ways. The goals and motivations of those who participated in resistance varied greatly, and not all resistance focused specifically on ending the war against the Jews. In what follows, I distinguish between resistance to Nazism (for example, political resistance on the far left, such as that of the communist underground) and direct resistance to the Holocaust through acts that sought to mitigate or end the dehumanization, expropriation, and murder of the Jews.

Within the historiography and public consciousness of Holocaust resistance, the best known cases of resistance are organized acts of collective armed revolt, especially in the last days of certain ghettos in Eastern Europe (see HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS). Although these rebellions created reverberations around the world and are often cited as prime examples of Jewish heroism, more nuanced historiographical approaches have expanded the notion of resistance to include other acts. These include the valiant attempts by Jews to retain shreds of human dignity in the face of utter dehumanization in the camps and ghettos, escapes and attempts to escape, efforts to go into hiding, endeavors to preserve religious observance, the extension of Jewish cultural and educational activities, as well as Jewish rescue efforts.

Resistance during the Holocaust was widespread, even if it ultimately failed to prevent the mass murder of millions of Jews. That it was attempted at all within the brutal conditions of war-torn and occupied Europe is significant. Both Jews and non-Jews participated in Holocaust resistance, even though non-Jews caught assisting Jews were punished to varying degrees, including death. Jewish armed struggle was carried out by a dispersed, poorly armed, untrained population that was far outnumbered by powerful, well-equipped trained militaries and paramilitary apparatuses. Collective armed resistance, especially in the ghettos, was organized and implemented in the last moments before final liquidation. Unarmed resistance in its various forms was also carried out, often under the brutal conditions of starvation, violence, severe restrictions in movement, forced separation, and isolation.

ARMED RESISTANCE: Armed resistance was implemented for a variety of reasons; its end goal was not always to save lives or to ensure the survival of a particular Jewish community or individual. Often, it was carried out to avenge the murder of other Jews and to ensure that Jewish heroism and bravery in the face of death would be remembered by future generations. Jewish armed resistance was carried out in the ghettos of Eastern Europe, within the Nazi network of concentration and death camps, and among the partisan groups that fought in territories in Eastern Europe and the *Balkan states, as well as in pockets of Western Europe, such as *France.

Perhaps the most well-known examples of collective armed resistance were organized by Jewish civilians in the ghettos of Poland and the occupied Soviet Union. One renowned instance is the *Warsaw ghetto uprising of April–May 1943. Between July and September 1942 about 270,000 Jews were deported from the ghetto to the *Treblinka death camp. In spring 1943, rumors spread that the ghetto was about to be liquidated and that the remaining residents would be deported as well. Faced with this impending reality, and despite the fact that the ghetto residents had been forced to live for months in deplorable conditions, members of the *Zionist Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa) and other Jewish groups organized an armed attack against the German SS and police as they entered the ghetto to begin the deportations. The Germans, who far outnumbered the poorly armed Jewish fighters, were taken by surprise and forced to make an initial retreat. The major resistance lasted for a few days, with pockets of fighters holding out for a month. Although the Warsaw ghetto uprising did not prevent the liquidation of the ghetto or the murder of a majority of its residents, news of the conflict spread throughout Europe, encouraging other revolts.

In the *Vilna ghetto, the United Partisan Organization (Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatsye; FPO) organized resistance to the Germans. Although it did not succeed in organizing an armed revolt within the ghetto, the FPO smuggled out several hundred fighters to join the partisans in the nearby forests. The leader of the FPO, Abba Kovner, issued a call for armed struggle against the Nazis, and his partisan forces succeeded in mounting guerrilla-type attacks on German forces and local Polish and Lithuanian collaborators.

Armed resistance was particularly difficult to organize collectively within the Nazi network of camps. Prisoners were strictly guarded at all times, their movement was restricted, they were forced to work in abysmal conditions, and they were subject to the brutality of the guards. Collective activities or communications of any sort were strictly forbidden. Moreover, the policy of “collective punishment” reigned, further discouraging attempts to resist. Still, the few cases of organized armed resistance in the Nazi camp network were implemented by Jewish prisoners. Escapes from the camp also accompanied some of these revolts. The uprising in the *Treblinka death camp was organized several months in advance, and the prisoners gathered crude weapons (axes, hammers, and so on) to be used against the mostly Ukrainian guards to break out of the camp. Some six hundred prisoners took part in the revolt on August 2, 1943, and although most were brutally murdered, several dozen prisoners managed to escape in the aftermath. Several months later, in October 1943, rebelling prisoners in *Sobibór killed ten SS men and seized their weapons. As elsewhere, most of the rebels were murdered, but some managed to escape to join partisans and continue the fight. Jewish prisoners belonging to the Sonderkommando (a special detachment that was assigned to cremate the bodies of Jews who had been gassed) revolted in *Auschwitz-Birkenau on October 6–7, 1944. They succeeded in destroying one of the crematoria in Birkenau and killing several SS men. The SS identified a group of five women prisoners (four of them Jewish) who had supplied the Sonderkommando with explosives to carry out the destruction of the crematoria, and all were executed for their resistance.

In addition to armed resistance in the camps and ghettos, guerrilla partisan groups focused on sabotage against the Germans and revenge against collaborators. Sometimes as members of Gentile units and sometimes creating separate Jewish formations, Jews participated in partisan groups throughout Eastern Europe and the Balkans, as well as in France. Generally speaking, only able-bodied Jews already possessing weapons would be accepted by a partisan group. An exception was the Bielski partisan group in the forests of western *Belorussia, which also sought to provide safe haven for Jewish women, children, and the elderly in addition to fighting. The Bielski partisans rescued 1,200 Jews. Other partisan groups ran “family camps” that were protected by armed guards. An independent Jewish unit, the Armée Juive (Jewish army) in France, took revenge against traitors and sabotaged Germany military vehicles and transports. The non-Jewish partisan groups were not organized to prevent the genocide against the Jews, and in Eastern Europe, nationalist partisan groups were known to murder Jews.

UNARMED RESISTANCE: Unarmed resistance took many forms. Since a major Nazi goal was to dehumanize the Jews as well as to erase all traces of their presence, Jewish efforts to preserve human dignity and extend the legacy and memory of the Jewish people may be considered a form of Holocaust resistance. Attempts to maintain dignity and to preserve one’s physical and spiritual existence by smuggling food, continuing religious observance, and organizing cultural events in secret have been characterized as kiddush ha-hayyim or “sanctification of life,” a form of spiritual resistance. Other forms of unarmed resistance included the formation of underground, clandestine groups that helped prolong survival through the creation of a black market and the dissemination of information that spurred others to resist or raised morale. Finally, rescue efforts organized by Jewish and non-Jewish organizations and individuals across Europe saved many lives (see HOLOCAUST RESCUERS).

Spiritual and cultural resistance took many forms. The creation of Jewish schools, theaters, orchestras, and other cultural expressions (the Vilna ghetto had a particularly vibrant cultural life) maintained human dignity and preserved Jewish traditions. Conscientious attempts were made to preserve evidence of Jewish life and history: In the Warsaw ghetto, the clandestine Oyneg Shabes archives organized by Emanuel *Ringelblum collected contemporary materials, including eyewitness accounts, poetry, art, and underground newspaper clippings, and stored them in buried milk jugs so that the story of the Warsaw ghetto would survive its destruction. Underground ghetto newspapers published not only fiction and poems but also calls to resist.

Holocaust resistance also took the form of rescue. Individual and collective acts of rescue were implemented throughout Europe. Underground groups, consisting of both Jews and non-Jews, often relied on intricate and disparate networks that created and obtained false identity papers for Jews in hiding and ran smuggling operations to transport Jews to other countries. In France, for instance, the Jewish-organized and run Children’s Aid Society (Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants) focused predominantly on rescuing Jewish children by placing them in group homes, hiding them under assumed non-Jewish identities, and getting them out of transports and internment camps. Likewise the Council for the Aid to Jews (Żegota), run by both Jews and Christians, hid thousands of Jewish children with non-Jewish families and in orphanages across Poland. Youth movements also assisted greatly in rescue initiatives, as did several Christian ecclesiastical organizations. Even though individual efforts to rescue Jews were not typical of the non-Jewish population during the Holocaust, significant numbers of Gentiles did risk their lives to save Jews.

Attempting escape from the confines of the ghetto or camp and placing one’s child in the hands of strangers in the hope that he or she would survive can also be classified as individual acts of Holocaust resistance. So, too, those who dared to violate imposed curfews or compulsory wearing of the Jewish star or who sabotaged the work they were forced to perform were resisting. Most of these “small” acts of resistance will never be known because those who were caught doing them were usually immediately executed. Many Jewish leaders who refused to comply with Nazi orders were killed: One example is Moshe Jaffe (d. 1942), the last leader of the Minsk Judenrat (Jewish Council), who warned the Jews who had been gathered for deportation to flee. Others, such as Adam *Czerniakow (1880–1942), leader of the Warsaw Judenrat, committed suicide rather than give in to Nazi demands. Trying to inform the world about the realities of the Final Solution was also a form of resistance. The most famous case is that of two Slovakian Jews, Rudolf Vrba and Alfred Wetzler, who escaped from Auschwitz-Birkenau in April 1944 to share their extensive knowledge. Their report, along with other eyewitness accounts of mass murder, was sent to Switzerland through *Hungary and ended up in the world press.

For further reading, see N. Tec, Defiance: The Bielski Partisans (2008); Y. Gutman, Fighters among the Ruins: Stories of Jewish Heroism during World War II (1988); S. Krakowski, The War of the Doomed: Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944 (1984); Y. Arad, Ghetto in Flames (1983); I. Gutman, The Jews of Warsaw, 1939–1943: Ghetto, Underground, Revolt (1982); Y. Bauer, They Chose Life: Jewish Resistance in the Holocaust (1973); J. Rudavsky, To Live with Hope, To Die with Dignity: Spiritual Resistance in the Ghettos and Camps (1997); H. Langbein, Against All Hope: Resistance in the Nazi Concentration Camps, 1938–1945 (1996); N. Levin, Rescue and Resistance by Jewish Youth during the Holocaust (1983); I. Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (1996); A. Latour, The Jewish Resistance in France, 1940–1944 (1981); L. Lazare, Rescue as Resistance: How Jewish Organizations Fought the Holocaust in France (1996); S. D. Kassow, Who Will Write Our History?: Emanuel Ringelblum, the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Oyneg Shabes Archive (2007); and M. Paldiel, The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust (1992). CHRISTINE SCHMIDT VAN DER ZANDEN

Holocaust: Role of Gender. While it is evident that gender was subordinate to racism in the *Nazi determination to annihilate all Jews, asking questions about gender, listening to women’s stories, and incorporating discussions of the different ways in which men and women experienced the Nazi onslaught have expanded knowledge of this tragic epoch in crucial ways.

Holocaust researchers only began considering gender as a social category in the historical narrative of the Holocaust in the 1980s. This approach originated with feminist scholars, including Joan Ringelheim and Sybil Milton, who sought to present a missing voice in Holocaust research. The main objective of the editors of the first anthology that considered gender, Different Voices (ed. C. Rittner and J. K. Roth, 1993), was to understand where women were during the Holocaust and how the particularities of their experiences compared and contrasted with those of men. The 1998 coedited volume, Women in the Holocaust (ed. D. Ofer and L. Weitzman), demonstrated that, although women's experiences during the Holocaust were not totally different from those of men, there were many instances where gender shaped an individual's ordeal. Thus, a complete accounting of the Holocaust could only be achieved by understanding what was unique to women and what was unique to men. As Joan Ringelheim wrote in her chapter in that book, both Jewish men and Jewish women experienced unrelieved suffering during the Holocaust, but their paths were not always the same: "Jewish women carried the burdens of sexual victimization, pregnancy, abortion, childbirth, killing of newborn babies in the camps to save the mothers, care of children, and many decisions about separation from children" (350).

In Women in the Holocaust, Ofer and Weitzman organized Jewish experiences of Nazi occupation into four categories that illuminate the continuity and rupture that each of the sexes experienced. The first category focused on the pre-war roles and responsibilities of men and women. Before the war Jewish men and women in both Western and Eastern Europe lived in gender-specific worlds that endowed them with different spheres of knowledge, expertise, social networks, and opportunities. These socialization patterns would affect the different ways in which men and women confronted Nazi aggression. The second category looked at anticipatory reactions of men and women to the Nazi regime and occupation. Because most Jews believed that the Nazis would treat men and women differently and because they assumed that only men were in "real" danger, they devised gender-specific strategies to protect men through plans for migration, hiding, and escape.

The third category considered German policy and treatment of men and women. Even though they planned to eradicate all Jews, the Nazis, especially during the early war years, issued different regulations and work requirements for men and women that provided distinctive opportunities and diverse constraints. The final category examined the responses of Jewish men and women to Nazi persecution. As they tried to cope with the calamity they were facing, Jewish men and women responded to Nazi persecution by drawing on gender-specific skills and resources.

This approach required careful study of the several stages of the war and the different arenas in which Jews faced persecution and murder. It also required scrutiny of the historical backgrounds of the Jews in different European communities, as well as an examination of public and private patterns of behavior, social class, education, and age. When all of these factors were taken into account, this methodology demonstrated that gender as a category of analysis was a necessary component in any comprehensive interpretation of human behavior during the Holocaust.

In recent years, publications on women and their experiences in the Holocaust have increased, taking a number of disciplinary approaches. This scholarship has created a greater awareness of how to integrate and disseminate personal documentation such as letters, diaries, and post-Holocaust memoirs and oral history into the record of the past, and it has demonstrated that the absence of women's experiences in earlier research resulted in an incomplete reconstruction of events and prevented a comprehensive understanding of the Holocaust.

1933–1939: In her 1998 study of Germany's Jews under Nazi rule between 1933 and 1939, Marion Kaplan described the turmoil that invaded daily life. Until 1937, most men were able to keep their businesses, although they confronted significant changes in their working environment and were disappointed by colleagues and former friends. Women, however, sensed hostility earlier and more directly in their daily activities, whether grocery shopping or taking young children to the park; if they were involved with women's organizations they were soon excluded. They were also aware of the difficult situation that their children faced at school. This is why many women concluded earlier than men that emigration was essential. They also understood the need to restrain their anxiety and rage, behaving carefully and calmly with children and establishing a pleasant atmosphere at home.

During the pogrom of November 1938 (Kristallnacht), more than twenty thousand Jewish men were arrested while women witnessed the vandalizing of their homes. Women had to rescue their husbands, deal with the authorities, pull together immigration papers, and, where possible, extricate their families from increasingly certain disaster. If men emigrated from Germany first, women were often left to take care of children and aged parents and to arrange for the departure of the rest of the family. Moreover, gender also played a role in who left Germany; by 1939, women, mostly elderly, were 57.5% of Germany's Jewish population. These women were far less likely to emigrate, and they died disproportionately in Hitler's camps.

EASTERN EUROPE: After the occupations that began with Germany's 1939 invasion of Poland, the condition of Jews in Eastern Europe was a continual process of degradation and humiliation. Jews were deprived of all rights and were ultimately isolated economically and socially in ghettos that were characterized by poverty and want. Hunger and diseases often developed into epidemics, killing many people long before deportation. The majority of the Jews shared the suffering, although in different degrees; men and women experienced want in both different and similar manners. Men were the first to be sent to forced labor, which entailed much humiliation and cruelty. Ample documentation testifies to the physical harassment of men in both the forced labor camps and in labor brigades in the cities. Husbands and fathers who returned from forced labor camps were often unable to function normally as heads of families, and young men were unable to assist their parents. As Sara Horowitz writes in her chapter in Ofer and Weitzman's anthology, "The Nazi genocide destabilized the boundaries of the self, unmaking the gendered self." During the ghetto period, families were uprooted from their homes and forced to live in extremely crowded dwellings; often a few families shared one room, and all families in the apartment shared one kitchen and bathroom. Many families did not have a male provider because men were in military service or in forced labor camps or had fled to Soviet territories. Everyone believed that men confronted greater danger than women, so mothers encouraged their young sons to escape and wives encouraged their husbands to leave, at least for a while.

Women were often more daring in testing the boundaries between what was legal and illegal, believing their situation to be less vulnerable than that of men. They were often inventive in creating situations in which they could disguise themselves as non-Jews, a task that was easier for women. They pretended to be Polish domestic help in Jewish homes (when this was still allowed) and were willing to change their external characteristics, such as coloring their hair or wearing rustic dress. Young girls were smuggled out of the ghettos and did not hesitate to use feminine charm to pass through the gate.

In these situations, women expressed a sense of satisfaction that they were able to maneuver and support their families, defend their husbands, engage in smuggling, and approach the Jewish authorities – or even the Nazi rulers – to get information about what had happened to their men and arrange their release. The hostile public sphere became a major arena for women's activities to help their loved ones. Sources also describe families sitting around a dinner table to create a semblance of a regular meal despite the meager food and of an attempt to bake a birthday cake for a family member. These, too, were efforts to maintain family cohesion and normalcy against the forces of rupture. In this new situation where mother, father, and children had to work together to ensure survival of the family unit, women took on new, stronger roles. Ofer and Weitzman have suggested that such family strategies for survival should be seen as a manifestation of resistance by ordinary men and women who were unprepared and unable to join in armed resistance.

However, there was very little that women could actually do to improve their situations. Contemporaneous sources disclose the frustration of mothers who were unable to provide basic cleanliness or food for their families and who helplessly observed the deteriorating health of children and adults. They also tell of a growing number of mothers who deserted their children, leaving them on an orphanage doorstep or near a self-help institution. Some mothers were absolutely desperate and unable to endure their own and their child's suffering any longer; others hoped that their child's chance of survival might be improved by leaving them with an institution. However, children were also deserted when mothers tried to escape during the deportations. Some families made the difficult decision to entrust a child to a non-Jewish family, regarding separation as a lesser evil. There are only a few surviving testimonies of such deliberations between couples; often the decision had to be made by mothers who had already been left alone.

UNDERGROUND AND ARMED RESISTANCE: Women were part of the underground and armed resistance from its outset. In Eastern Europe, the youth movements were the cradle of underground activities. In a number of communities young women assumed leadership of the youth movements, because the danger for females was considered to be less. Only when men began returning in the winter of 1940 from Soviet territories did a new kind of dual leadership of young men and women emerge. Some women adapted to male roles, including physical work and later participation in fighting, whereas others took on female roles, such as nurturing refugee youngsters who were strangers in the community and children whose families had become impoverished or split up.

Youth movement leaders, among them many young women, turned the movements' soup kitchens in the ghettos into more than a supplementary source of food; they were also cultural and educational centers providing members with nurturing and warmth. Underground papers and memoirs record the maternal character of key leaders such as Zivia, of the Dror he-Halutz movement, who eventually became the leader of the *Warsaw ghetto uprising together with Mordecai Anielewicz, Tema Schneiderman from Bialystok, and many others. Young women were sent as couriers or emissaries from one ghetto to another, passing underground papers, exchanging messages, and distributing educational materials. They also became deeply involved in the problems of daily living experienced by the members of the movements. The groups visited by the emissaries described these meetings as beacons of light that provided a sense of belonging to a larger body, strengthened local initiatives, and supplied spiritual encouragement. When the mass killings began in the East the female couriers passed along this information.

Female couriers were the first to contact the non-Jewish underground to get armaments and smuggle in parts of weapons that would be assembled in the ghetto when the idea of armed resistance was initially formulated. Leaders of the movement and of the armed resistance valued the contribution of the couriers, as well as of the other young women who participated in the actual fighting in Warsaw and in the smaller direct clashes in Bialystok and other ghettos. The groups of Jewish partisans that were formed from among members of the youth movements and the underground in the ghettos also valued the contributions of young women. Although women's central roles in the youth movements and the Jewish resistance have been acknowledged, these young women have usually been called couriers rather than fighters. A number of female scholars have challenged how such women have been remembered, arguing that they have not received the heroic status to which they are entitled.

THE CAMPS: Research on women in Nazi camps is uneven and does not always distinguish among concentration camps, forced labor camps, and death camps. True, all were a particular hell for men and women alike. However, conditions were different in each type of camp and changed in different stages of the war (see HOLOCAUST CAMPS).

From the outset, research on women in the camps has stressed female socialization as a source for differences in female and male conduct and experience. It has claimed that each of the sexes developed coping mechanisms according to their distinctive cultural baggage. Women's caretaking and homemaking skills were assets that enhanced their chances of survival. Women bonded more than men, cherished family memories, exchanged recipes, and were more inclined than men to create a "surrogate family." Such small support groups, according to female and male survivors, made survival a little more likely. The composition of such "families" changed according to the situation. Sometimes they were made up of biological family members: mothers and daughters, fathers and sons. However, when relatives were absent, surrogate families comprised fellow prisoners, often individuals who shared something in common. Women paid more attention to personal hygiene than men; they kept their bodies and hair clean and mended their clothing. In *Theresienstadt, for example, women attempted to re-create their homes in their living spaces. In many camps women tried to prepare additional foods from what they were able to sneak from garbage cans or from the camp's kitchen. Some scholars have concluded that men suffered more from hunger and women more from filth and vermin. Similarly, scholars have held that pregnant women and women with young children were marked for immediate death.

Recent research on women in *Auschwitz by Na'ama Shik refutes a number of these contentions. On the basis of memoirs written in the first few years after World War II by women who survived Auschwitz, Shik claims that women fought for food, a major battleground for survival, as much as men did. In her opinion this fighting demonstrated that the daily reality of Auschwitz transcended lines of gender. In the same vein she dismisses the idea that women bonded more than men or that the formation of surrogate families was more common among women. Shik maintains as well that bitter and desperate struggles between female prisoners contradicted the theory of friendships between women. Such relationships, like those between men, were more likely when conditions of imprisonment improved or when prisoners had spent a longer time in the camp. It is probable that Shik's scholarship on Auschwitz will prompt further research that will concentrate on comparisons of the male and female experience and that will be "gender-oriented" in the full sense of the word.

For further reading, see S. K. Cohen, "The Experience of the Jewish Family in the Nazi Ghetto: Kovno – A Case Study," Journal of Family History 31(3) (2006): 268–88; J. T. Baumel, Double Jeopardy: Gender and the Holocaust (1998); M. A. Kaplan, Between Dignity and Despair: Jewish Life in Nazi Germany (1998); D. Ofer, "Her View through My Lens: Cecilia Slepak Studies Women in the Warsaw Ghetto," in Gender, Place and Memory in Modern Jewish Experience, ed. J. T. Baumel and T. Cohen (2003), 29–50; D. Ofer and L. Weitzman, eds., Women in the Holocaust (1998); L. Pine, "Gender and the Family," in The Historiography of the Holocaust, ed. D. Stone (2004): 364–82; E. Herzog, ed., Life, Death and Sacrifice: Women and Family in the Holocaust (2008), 41–68; C. Rittner and J. K. Roth, eds., Different Voices: Women and the Holocaust (1993); N. Tec, Resilience and Courage: Women, Men, and the Holocaust (2003); L. Weitzman, "The Kashariyot (Couriers) in the Jewish Resistance during the Holocaust," in Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, ed. P. Hyman and D. Ofer (2006, electronic resource); N. Shik, "'Here Mothers Are No Longer Mothers to Their Children': Mothers' and Daughters' Relations in Auchwitz-Birkenau," Tel Aviv Yearbook for German History 36 (2008): 108–27; idem, "Infinite Loneliness: Some Aspects of the Lives of Jewish Women in the Auschwitz Camps According to Testimonies and Autobiographies Written between 1945 and 1948," in Lessons and Legacies 8: From Generation to Generation, ed. D. L. Bergen (2008), 125–56.

DALIA OFER

Holocaust: Roma. The fates of the Roma (Gypsies) and the Jews during the *Holocaust are inextricably linked, although the nature of the prejudice against them, as well as *Nazi policies toward both groups, was quite different. The Nazis viewed the Roma as an itinerant criminal element who, like Jews, were racially inferior "asocials" with artfremdes blut ("foreign" or "alien blood").

There were a half-million Jews and 26,000 Roma in Germany when Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933. At first, the Nazis relied heavily on pre-1933 German laws to monitor the movements and behavior of the two principal German Roma groups, the Roma and the Sinti. In late 1935, they began to apply all three Nuremberg Laws to the Roma; these outlawed marriages and extramarital relations between Aryans and non-Aryans, excluded non-Aryans from full Reich citizenship, and required couples who wished to marry to obtain a certificate of fitness to determine if one of the applicants might "racially damage" the marriage. In 1936, the Nazis opened the Reich Center for Combating the Gypsy Nuisance in *Berlin and ordered the detention of all Roma nationwide in Zigeunerlager (Gypsy concentration camps). The same year, Dr. Robert Ritter's new Research Institute for Racial Hygiene and Population Biology began to gather data on the Roma and Sinti and other "asocials" to determine who was a "Gypsy." Ritter's team ranked Roma and Sinti according to blood purity and developed a detailed racial classification system for them. He concluded that 90% of Germany's Roma, like the Jews, were a mixture of various "oriental" races and suggested sterilizing Roma mischlinge (mixed-blooded Roma). His assistant, Eva Justin, concluded in her 1943 doctoral dissertation on Zigeunermischlinge who had been raised by non-Roma that the "Gypsy problem" differed from the "Jewish problem" because the "Gypsy breed" (Zigeunerart), unlike "Jewish intellectuals" (jüdischen Intelligenz), was not a threat to the Aryan race.

On December 8, 1938, Reichsführer SS Heinrich Himmler issued Nazi Germany's first major Roma decree, "Combating the Gypsy Plague." He ordered police to register all Roma and Sinti older than age six, as well as all others who lived a similar itinerant lifestyle. Roma were now required to carry identification papers that designated by color their specific racial status or lifestyle, and new restrictions were also placed on their occupations and travel. Foreign Roma were to be expelled from Germany. Reinhard Heydrich, Himmler's right-hand man, announced in 1939 that Hitler planned to deport all of Germany's Roma to *Poland during the next year. About 2,500 Austrian Roma were sent to Poland in the spring of 1940. The following year, the Germans deported almost 5,000 Roma to the Łódź ghetto. They were put in a separate section of the ghetto where disease was rampant. In late 1941, the Germans decided to close the Roma compound, shipping its remaining inmates to *Chełmno, where they were gassed.

Roma were also caught up in the web of mass killings by the Einsatzgruppen* and Wehrmacht during the campaign in the Soviet Union from 1941–45. Otto Ohlendorf, the commander of Einsatzgruppe D, testified at his trial after the war that he saw no difference between Jews and Roma; he considered both as dire threats to Wehrmacht security in Russia. In late 1942, Himmler ordered that all Greater Reich Zigeunermischlinge be sent to *Auschwitz, although he thought that pure Roma such as the Sinti should be exempt from the decree because they provided a possible key to the origins of Aryanism, being originally from India. The first transports of German Roma were sent to Auschwitz in early 1943, where they were interned in the Gypsy Family Camp (Zigeunerlager BIIe) in Auschwitz II-Birkenau, which ultimately housed 20,946 Roma.

Life in the Gypsy Family Camp was harsh and disease was rampant. Dr. Josef Mengele, the physician at BIIe, performed gruesome experiments on Roma children with noma, a disease that ate away the face, as well as on Roma twins. Himmler decided to close the Gypsy Family Camp in the spring of 1944, but hesitated after Roma inmates challenged SS units. Instead, the SS sent most of its inmates to labor camps in the Reich. On August 2–3, the SS rounded up Birkenau's remaining 2,897 Roma and gassed them, a tragedy memorialized by Roma each year as Zigeunernacht ("the night of the Roma").

There has been considerable debate over the number of Roma who died during the Holocaust. The best estimate is that hundreds of thousands were murdered and many more were persecuted by the Nazis and their allies throughout Europe. Many Roma were able to escape death because they lived in parts of Eastern Europe that did not come under German control until late in the war. Recent research includes D. M. Crowe, The Holocaust: Roots, History, and Aftermath (2008); G. Lewy, The Nazi Persecution of the Gypsies (2000); and G. Margalit, Germany and Its Gypsies: A Post-Auschwitz Ordeal (2002).

DAVID M. CROWE

Holocaust Survivors: United States. In the Holocaust's immediate aftermath, many survivors looked to the *United States as a haven. At the time, however, restrictive immigration laws and fixed quotas, unchanged since the 1920s, did not allow their entry. When the deplorable conditions in the displaced persons camps became known and Jewish refugees' quick entry into *Palestine appeared unlikely, President Truman bowed to pressure and issued a directive in December 1945 that allowed 39,681 refugees, including 28,000 Jews, to enter the United States. In 1948, the Displaced Persons Act permitted entry to 205,000 *displaced persons (DPs). This law permitted the majority of those 140,000 Jewish survivors destined for America to reach this country in the immediate post-war period.

Within a national mood of lingering *antisemitism and nativism, Jewish leaders promised President Truman that they would help shoulder the burden of Jewish DPs so that none would become a public charge. To this end, a new Jewish agency, United Service for New Americans (USNA), was formed. USNA's goal was to work with local cooperating Jewish communal agencies around the nation to sponsor newcomers and ease their resettlement in as many locales as possible. Because of USNA's diligence, Jewish communities in nearly every state in the country were persuaded to accept a quota of refugees. From 1946 on, the media regularly captured the newcomers' stories, emphasizing the speed with which they became model citizens and blended easily into the fabric of American life with the help of their hosts. However, survivors have noted that the assistance they received often fell short of their expectations and needs. The reality of survivors' adjustment was far less seamless and their reception less warm than the contemporary media depicted.

Certainly, many survivors quickly became "self-sustaining." This was due in part, to the newcomers' determination. It also resulted from the withdrawal of financial support by communal agencies after a year's time.

Records reveal that, even as the refugees moved forward during this period, they were beset with illness, fought discrimination by employers, and perceived themselves as socially marginalized. A common theme in survivors' testimonies is bitter disappointment with the Jewish community in general and American relatives in particular who distanced themselves from the newcomers. During their early years in the United States many survivors tried to tell their American hosts about their recent pasts, but these attempts generally fell on deaf ears. It was only in "New American" groups that survivors could recall their Holocaust experiences with each other. These meetings also fueled the first Holocaust commemorations in the United States. In the late 1940s and early 1950s, survivors erected monuments, prepared *yizkor books (memorial volumes), and held memorial programs. Only in the 1980s, when a wave of oral history ventures, *museums, and other Holocaust education and memorial projects swept America did significant numbers of American Jews demonstrate a willingness to listen to survivors speak about their long-repressed wartime memories.

Some survivors have achieved spectacular success in America, both personally and financially. Many have become prominent advocates for Holocaust remembrance and education – speaking publicly, recording testimony, and writing about their experiences. At the same time, significant numbers live in dire poverty, at society's margins, largely ignored by mainstream American Jews. Recent research includes B. B. Cohen, Case Closed: Holocaust Survivors in Post-War America (2007).

BETH B. COHEN

Holocaust: Theological Responses. The first religious responses to the *Holocaust were formulated by Ultra-Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX: ULTRA-ORTHODOX). They formulated these responses so quickly because they drew on a spiritual tradition and metahistorical framework that allowed them to draw a line between themselves and the war and to objectify the catastrophe. As memory diffused the immediacy of the Holocaust and as Jewish life revived, Jewish thinkers outside the Ultra-Orthodox community, whose religious identities were tied to empirical historical reality, also attempted to respond. These initial responses may be understood according to seven central areas of concern: silence, divine presence, assimilation, "Amalek" (Israel's enemies), *suffering and teshuvah (*repentance), the Land of *Israel, and *redemption. Later responses as well, including those outside Ultra-Orthodoxy, lend themselves to alignment with these themes.

SILENCE: The very questions that at first silenced thinkers (How could *God let six million die? allow the righteous to suffer? or permit world history to be run by Hitler?) opened a path to answers. Some responded that, although answers could not be articulated in terms dictated by the horrible events, they could be provided by *Torah (Elhanan Wasserman, Baranowicz). Others taught that one could find answers deep within the self, with a leap to *God and God's wisdom (Shlomoh Zalman Unsderfer, Bratislava). One could also remain silent in the present time, confident that redemption would come and bring wisdom and the language to express it (Shlomoh Zalman Ehrenreich, Simleul-Silvaniei, Transylvania). Such silence allowed Yehezkel Sarna (*Jerusalem) to hear God's weeping, enabling him to cry and then to speak; it moved Ya'akov Mosheh Harlap (Jerusalem) to the truths of Kabbalah (Jewish mystical teachings). After the war, silence in the face of the tribulations pressed Simhah Elberg (Shanghai) to conclude that Israel's very nature was that of suffering, beginning with the akedah (binding) of *Isaac in Genesis 22 and carried forward to actual sacrifice. Although pious Jews were able to emulate *Abraham's silence before the looming tragedy of Isaac's sacrifice, Hayim Yisrael Tsimmerman (*Tel Aviv) provided explanations for those who needed them. Meir Feuerverger-Meiri (Brussels) anticipated that in time, when they were no longer enveloped by catastrophe, Jews would be able to comprehend the events.

Outside Ultra-Orthodoxy were those who could not get beyond silence. Elie *Wiesel struggled to find answers but failed. Emil *Fackenheim (Toronto) and Arthur A. Cohen (New York) projected silence back onto wartime thinkers, believing that the very collapse of history and reason that defined the Holocaust made verbal articulation impossible.

DIVINE PRESENCE: One religious response to the Holocaust was the affirmation of God's presence. On the individual level, Kalonymous Kalman Shapiro (*Warsaw) spoke of diminishing human, finite pain through immersion into the presence of God, who suffered infinitely over Israel's tribulations. Aharon Rokeah (Belz) announced that God became present to enable him to flee Budapest for *Palestine and to serve as a vessel for the redemption of those left behind. Sarna held that God's presence was objectively real, ready to manifest itself once people no longer removed themselves from God. On a collective level, Unsdorfer (and Reuven Katz, Petah Tikvah) spoke of the divine presence in terms of punishing Israel to bring about the deconstruction of assimilation. After the war, Joseph *Soloveitchik (*Boston) wrote that God was present during the tragedy, insofar as He absented Himself to accommodate the human freedom to sin.

There were divergent views on this theme outside Ultra-Orthodoxy after the war. Martin *Buber spoke of the eclipse of God's presence, which precluded *revelation. Fackenheim identified a divine presence that existed from a perspective deep within Jewish victims and commanded the Jew to survive lest the world succumb to Hitler. At the other extreme, Richard *Rubenstein (Pittsburgh) and Alexander Donat (New York) found it impossible to discern any divine presence in *Auschwitz unless one wished to make God evil; they turned to the Jewish people and the principle of social justice for religious meaning. In between the two, Hans Jonas (New York) spoke of God's developing relationship to Israel, comprehended processionally. Most Ultra-Orthodox wartime thinkers thought in metahistorical rather than historical terms (Yehudah Layb Gersht in Lodz and Gedaliah Bublick in New York were exceptions). For example, Wasserman related the Nazi chaos to the failure of Jews to follow the commandments and spoke of catastrophic pains leading to the *Messiah's birth, and Harlap identified the Holocaust as the struggle between light and dark of the era of the Messiah, son of Joseph, which set the stage for the absolute light of the Messiah, son of David. After the war ended, Feuerverger-Meiri attributed the Holocaust to a total breakdown of faith in God as creator of the moral universe, which opened the door to unlimited murder. Yosef Taytlboym (Monsey, New York) asserted that once Israel violated its oath not to rebel against its masters or precipitate the end of history or immigrate en masse to the land of Israel, God's oath not to let the nations overly oppress His nation no longer held (BT Ketubbot 111a). Tsevi Yehudah Kook (Jerusalem) interpreted the coincidence of the Holocaust and birth of the Jewish state as meaning God's termination of exilic history. Redemption began with Palestine's interwar restoration, and when Jews resisted alignment with the process, God severed them from the *Diaspora (i.e., through the Holocaust) to finalize the redemptive process. For Chief Sefardi Rabbi Hayim David Halevi (Tel Aviv), the Holocaust took place when humankind's naturally troublesome inclination combined with divine inducements to end the exile in time to prevent an Arab demographic takeover of the Land of Israel. Elazar Man Shakh (Benei Berak) introduced the notion that the Holocaust was God's measure-for-measure response to the debt to Him, which Israel compounded with its sins over all the generations.

Outside the Ultra-Orthodox camp, Yitzhak Greenberg (New York) outlined how God was the active *covenantal partner and Israel the passive one in the biblical era; the partnership, which had balanced out after the destruction of the Second *Temple, became a matter for Israel's initiative when no covenant under God could be discerned during the Holocaust. Leo Baeck (*Theresienstadt-London-Cincinnati) placed the Holocaust within the chain of destruction that followed from Israel's role as teacher of God's word to humanity. As a nation of moral right and light, however, Israel would survive its darkness. For Ignaz Maybaum (London), Israel was a suffering servant (*Isaiah 53) sent to the world to teach and rescue humankind from sin. He believed that God brought the crucifixion of the Holocaust to atone for human sin. For Eliezer Schweid (Jerusalem), the Holocaust and other destructions were tied to Israel's destiny and covenantal mission, to be fulfilled with the *Zionist state. Finally, Zalman Schachter (Philadelphia) took the radical position that the Holocaust served to purge a form of *Torah that had arrested Israel's growth from history and enabled construction of a new Torah, one with a universal message.

ASSIMILATION: For Ultra-Orthodox wartime thinkers, the metahistorical context evolved around assimilation, Amalek (Israel's enemies), teshuvah (repentance), and redemption. They were inclined to blame fellow Jews for the disaster, thereby keeping it within the covenantal framework of divine reward and punishment and indicating that Jews could also work to stop the calamity. Remaining within the metahistorical mindset, they targeted assimilation as a violation of the divinely set separation between Israel and the nations. Jewish assimilation had provoked God to respond in fury to restore Israel in its holiness, apart from the profane. The severity of divine rage depended on how deeply the holy and the profane had mixed together. Examples of violations included *intermarriage (Ehrenreich) and secularism in the Land of Israel (Mosheh Avigdor Amiel, Chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Tel Aviv). Speaking historically, Joseph Henkin (New York) contended that assimilation gave the enemy the opportunity to imagine that Jews were out to undermine Christianity and led to their decision to attack. After the war, Abraham Weinfeld (Monsey,

New York) blamed Jewish disasters throughout history on the adulteration of transcendently anchored Torah wisdom with outside literature; he cited the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah*) as the reason for the Holocaust.

AMALEK: The symbolic figure of biblical Amalek (Gen 36; Num 12–14; I Sam 15; I Chron 1:36) is emblematic in Jewish tradition of Israel's enemies throughout history. For wartime Ultra-Orthodox thinkers, Amalek represented the effort to attack Israel's God through His people, while (unknowningly) purging them of their sin. In this way, Amalek was understood as a divine instrument to force Israel back to its Torah-true self (Amiel). Wasserman also identified anti-Torah Jews (*communists, nationalists, assimilationists) with Amalek. Nevertheless, Amalek's service to Israel did not lessen his evil or protect him from eventual destruction by God (Shlomoh Zalman Shragai, Jerusalem). As the war climaxed, Amalek's instrumental status was set aside. Instead, Amalek became the epitome of Israel's metaphysical evil-other (Shalom Noah Brazovsky, Slonim-Jerusalem) and was to be hated absolutely (Bentsiyon Firer, Ulm). Determined to obliterate the people of Israel lest redemption come through them, Amalek would ultimately destroy himself because Israel's holy being was the source of all life. Later on, the philosopher Shalom Rosenberg (Jerusalem), unable to explain the absurd and absolute evil of the Holocaust, settled on the aggadic terminology of Satan (Amalek) who set out to annul the God of goodness and His chosen people. Amalek was not a subject of deliberation for the non-Orthodox.

SUFFERING AND TESHUVAH (REPENTANCE): There were varied interpretations of suffering. For some, it was punitive and intended to frighten Jews into doing teshuvah (Schneersohn). Wasserman focused on suffering's messianic implications; he observed that the onset of the Messiah involved birth pains – and the closer the birth, the greater the suffering. Katz identified suffering as collective sacrifice, by the strength of which God would fulfill His promise to restore the Land of Israel. Musar* (moralistic) thinkers probed the moments before death and dying itself from an existential perspective. As with Hannah and her seven sons (ḤANUKKAH AND WOMEN) and the Ten Martyrs under Roman rule (see MARTYRDOM), the deaths of Holocaust victims were sacred moments when the soul of Torah escaped the inevitably sin-infected body and leaped in trust to God. The blending of suffering and *love between God and the martyrs was so intense that physical suffering was transcended (Ya'akov Lesin, America; Avraham Grodzensky, Lithuania; and Efrayim Sokolover and Hillel Vitkind, Palestine).

After the war, *Hasidic thinkers identified the sufferings-unto-death with the akedah (biblical binding of Isaac). The collective akedah of the nation atoned for sin, mended the universe, and displaced tumah (pollution) with the kedushah (holiness) of messianic redemption (Grinvald, Belz-Paris; and Brazovsky). Harlap believed that with each akedah-death, the body shattered and the soul ascended into the light of the Messiah, son of Joseph – as it blended into the universal illumination of the Messiah, son of David. Later on, Eliezer *Berkovits combined the akedah with the biblical motif of the suffering servant (Isaiah 53). Together, they reflected divine suffering over humankind's wickedness and Israel's pain and also atoned for that wickedness, thereby preventing world chaos and enabling history to go on.

There were also explanations for why the pious suffered: Whenever calamities occurred, the pious were the first victims. Or the sins were so great that punishment overflowed to the innocent. Or the trespasses outweighed the generation's merits, leading to global punishment. Or lastly, when Torah-failure became severe, God let the nations act for Him, and they made no distinction between the pious and non-pious (Tsimmerman).

Ultra-Orthodox thinkers identified teshuvah as the primary means to alleviate suffering. For Sarna, it belonged to a higher triad where hurban (suffering), teshuvah, and geulah (redemption) implied one another. The suffering of the Holocaust was so overwhelming, he added, that God first had to open a place for teshuvah in the sufferer's heart to begin the process. In the view of Eliyahu Dessler (Gateshead, England), teshuvah failure had separated Israel from the objective reality of God's moral universe. As that reality comprehended life and order, the separation created the chaos of the Holocaust; new teshuvah would restore life to Israel. Schneersohn believed that the intention of exile was to induce teshuvah and qualify Israel for return to the Land of Israel. When this did not happen, God confronted the Jewish people with a choice between teshuvah or death – with teshuvah as a metaphysical certainty awaiting alignment with Israel's teshuvah in history. An exceptional position was voiced by Shragai, who confined teshuvah to God and His people, dismissing the idea that it evoked persecution from outside. After the war, Mordekhai Atiyah (Mexico City) identified teshuvah with aliyah* (immigration to the land of Israel), to which God would respond with redemption. The philosopher Emmanuel *Levinas gave precedence to the ethical imperative to draw from resources within the individual self and alleviate the suffering of the other, before any theological teshuvah.

LAND OF ISRAEL: At one end of the Ultra-Orthodox spectrum, Ehrenreich condemned any humanly initiated attempt at restoration, religious or secular, as a violation of divine authority. At the other, Yissakhar Taykhtahl (Munkacz-Budapest) interpreted the catastrophe as God's instruction that the moment had come to shut down the *Diaspora and move en masse to the Land of Israel. Between the two, Wasserman regarded settlement with adherence to the commandments of Torah as fulfilling a divine command, but settlement in secular terms as a trespass. The differences sharpened after the war. After Joel Teitelbaum (Monsey) blamed all Zionists for violating the oaths of BT Ketubbot 111a, his followers identified them with Amalek and Nazis. At the other extreme, Tsimmerman and Kook blamed the Holocaust on the failure to recognize the flowering of the land during the interwar period as the revealed end to history and to align with it by restoring the land completely. Later on, Halevi alleged that Israel's failure to initiate return over the generations precluded miraculous intervention by God, leaving the inevitable return to the bitter impetus of a Hitler.

REDEMPTION: From within the war zone, the Ultra-Orthodox remained certain of the advent of redemption. Unable to comprehend or verbalize the path to it out of current historical conditions, they urged silence and called for prayer and pious action to bridge present and future (Ehrenreich, Unsderfer). Some cognition became possible from beyond the areas of war, where the path to redemption was identified with Torah study (Eliezer Silver, Cincinnati), religious settlement (Shragai), and teshuvah (Schneersohn). After the war, Elberg could not see beyond the eclipse of world history brought about by Hitler. At the other extreme, Menahem Mendel Schneersohn (Brooklyn) was convinced that his generation was the end of exile and beginning of redemption. According to Schneersohn, redemption was already in place in this world, God's residence was established, and all that remained was for the individual to perform mitzvot* so as to manifest the messianic reality in daily life. In between these points of view, Atiyah sensed a universe throbbing with redemption, because so many holy sparks had been sifted from the tumah of exile with the catastrophe. Once all pious Jews ascended to the Land of Israel*, the process would be complete.

A non-Orthodox view was articulated by the philosopher Yehoyada Amir (Jerusalem), for whom global injustice constituted exile and righteous human actions coupled with divine support meant redemption. The Holocaust, therefore, was an imperative to remove injustice.

Many of the sources identified here have been gathered together and translated into English (Wrestling with God: Jewish Theological Responses during and after the Holocaust, ed. S. T. Katz, S. Biderman, and G. Greenberg [2007]); see also THOUGHT, MODERN. GERSHON GREENBERG Holocaust Trials. Post-World War II trials related to the Holocaust* can generally be grouped into three categories: the prosecution of perpetrators of the Holocaust immediately after the war through the present, trials related to Holocaust* denial and deniers, and trials associated with compensation and restitution* claims on behalf of victims of the Holocaust.

After World War II, both international and domestic courts made efforts to convict Axis perpetrators of war crimes. Trials that aimed to seek justice for the victims of war crimes began immediately after war's end in Europe, stemming from declarations agreed on by the Allies during the war. On January 13, 1942, representatives of nine countries signed the Inter-Allied Declaration, announcing their determination to prosecute Axis war criminals. The Moscow Declaration, signed by Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union in October 1943, stated that at the time of the signing of an armistice ending the war, high-ranking German officials of the state and military accused of war crimes would be sent back for trial to the countries in which they committed the crimes. War criminals whose crimes could not be assigned to any national jurisdiction were to be tried and punished by the International Military Tribunal (IMT). Based in Nuremberg, the IMT was established in August 1946 by Britain, the Soviet Union, the United States, and France.

NUREMBERG TRIALS: U.S. Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson grouped the defendants into four categories: major war criminals whose offenses had no particular geographic location; those responsible for war crimes against U.S. servicemen; those who could be prosecuted in line with the Moscow Declaration, in the country where the crimes were committed; and those accused of collaboration or treason against their own nation. Between October 18, 1945, and October 1, 1946, the IMT tried twenty-two "major" war criminals, accused under any of these four counts: crimes against peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity, or conspiring to commit any of the foregoing in a "common plan." Crimes against humanity were defined as "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation...or persecutions on political, racial, or religious grounds."

The focus of the Nuremberg Trials was not on crimes against humanity in general or the murder of the Jews in particular: The perpetration of the Holocaust, the systematic murder of the Jews by the Nazis and their collaborators, was not on trial. Rather, the Nuremberg trials aimed to bring to justice those who had waged a war of pure aggression, thereby upsetting the international balance of peace. Concentration camps and killing centers figured prominently in the evidence presented in cases against the Nazis on trial, but the centrality of the camps to the Holocaust was not examined. Most of the prosecutors equalized the victims, failing to distinguish the Jews as a group who had been targeted by the Nazis in a singular, destructive way. Although the Nuremberg trials have become synonymous with the Holocaust because of the testimony and evidence brought forth, the trials did not actually present a judgment on the Holocaust as such.

Twelve of the accused were found guilty on all four counts and were sentenced to death; they included high-ranking Nazi leaders Hermann Göring, Hans Frank, and Alfred Rosenberg and the Nazi journalist and propagandist Julius Streicher. Another seven were given prison terms of varying lengths, including life imprisonment. Three defendants were acquitted. The United States conducted twelve other trials of high-ranking German officials under the aegis of the IMT, which were called the Subsequent Nuremberg Proceedings (December 1946–April 1949). These proceedings included the Doctors' (or Medical) case, the IG Farben case, the Krupp case, and the Einsatzgruppen* case, among others.

OTHER POST-WWII TRIALS IN OCCUPIED GERMANY: In addition to the IMT, trials related to World War II crimes were held in the four zones of occupation by each Allied member state (United States, United Kingdom, France, and Soviet Union). The earliest trials in the occupation zones tended to focus on those responsible for the murder of Allied personnel; however, later trials included concentration camp guards and others who committed crimes against the Jews and other victims. In the framework of the so-called camp trials, military authorities of Allied member states tried perpetrators associated with major concentration camps; for example, the (Bergen-)Belsen trial (September–November 1945), the Ravensbrück trials (December 1946–July 1948), and the Dachau trials (November 1945–December 1947). In the Dachau trials, U.S. military authorities tried crimes committed in the Dachau, Flössenbürg, Mauthausen, Buchenwald, Mühldorf, and Nordhausen camps. Auschwitz* perpetrators were tried in the course of two trials. The first Auschwitz trial was held in Poland in November–December 1947 under Polish jurisdiction. (Polish authorities had already sentenced and executed camp commandant Rudolf Höss in the spring of 1947.) The second (or "Frankfurt") Auschwitz trial was conducted by a West German court between December 1963 and August 1965.

To implement the Allies' goal to "denazify" Germany, the Allied Control Council Law No. 10 was passed in December 1945, allowing for the reestablishment of the German court system. Crimes that were perpetrated by German nationals against other German nationals – for example, so-called euthanasia cases – were left to the jurisdiction of the new German tribunals. Both the German Federal Republic (West Germany) and the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) continued to try Nazi war criminals.

TRIALS ELSEWHERE IN EUROPE: In the immediate post-war years, efforts to call Nazi collaborators to account spread throughout Europe. From the murders of real or alleged collaborators without trial in *France to the conviction and execution of four former pro-Nazi prime ministers in *Hungary, from the tarring and feathering of women who slept with occupying Germans in *Holland, to the collective punishment of ethnic Germans in East Central Europe, this wave of reckoning took many forms. Many countries held national trials of both Germans and local collaborators. In countries under Soviet rule, trials conducted by so-called People's Courts served propagandistic purposes, removing those who were potential risks to the upcoming communist takeover. Nevertheless, the number of those convicted justly far exceeds those who were not. In France former high-ranking officials of the collaborating Vichy state, Paul Touvier (1994) and Maurice Papon (1997), were tried for collaboration and crimes against humanity; their trials helped bring the role of the collaborating French state into public discourse and urged the country to face its past. Similarly, the 1998 trial of Dinko Šakić, former camp commander of the Jasenovac concentration camp in Zagreb, triggered debate about Croatia's role in the Holocaust.

Like the Nuremberg trials, this national reckoning in the immediate post-war years did not focus on genocide committed against the Jews. However, cases in the following decades were crucial in revealing facts about the Holocaust.

EICHMANN TRIAL: The most significant trial was conducted in Jerusalem in 1961 against former SS Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann. Eichmann, who played a major role in the implementation of the Nazis' genocidal plans, had fled to *Argentina after the war where he remained in hiding. He was captured by Israeli Secret Service agents who brought him to Jerusalem to be tried in an Israeli court. Eichmann was convicted and executed in 1962, having been charged with fifteen counts, including crimes against humanity and crimes against the Jewish people. This trial helped thrust the Holocaust into wider public discourse.

HOLOCAUST DENIAL: Trials against Holocaust deniers can be considered another category of Holocaust trials. Holocaust denial is considered illegal in several countries, including Germany and Austria. Ernst Zündel, a prominent Holocaust denier who, in the 1990s, published several relatively widely circulated pamphlets questioning the veracity of the Holocaust, was indicted and tried in *Canada in the 1980s and in Germany in 2005 on charges of inciting Holocaust denial. In 2007, Zündel was convicted and sentenced to five years in prison.

One of the most prominent denial trials was that of the unsuccessful libel case that David Irving brought against historian Deborah Lipstadt. In her book, Denying the Holocaust, Lipstadt had written that Irving was a dangerous Holocaust denier. Irving sued Lipstadt in 1996 for defamation of his reputation as a historian. The trial began on January 11, 2000, and ended on April 11 with a judgment in favor of Lipstadt. The judge deemed Irving a racist, an active Holocaust denier, and an antisemite. The trial, which called on a vast array of historical expertise to prove that Irving's methodology and claims were ahistorical and false, had a significant impact on the understanding of Holocaust denial and reinforced the importance of responsible scholarship in sustaining historical truth.

REPARATIONS AND RESTITUTION TRIALS: The bulk of the Holocaust-related reparations/restitution compensation process has been conducted based on laws passed by various national parliaments. In some cases, however, the claims have been settled in court. The first such case took place as early as 1949, when a Holocaust survivor sued a Dutch-American enterprise for the forcible transfer of his business during WWII. (Relief was granted.) The first class action suit, later a common form of litigation, was filed in 1985 in the United States by Holocaust survivors from Yugoslavia against a former Croatian official. (Their case was dismissed.) The main wave of such cases commenced in October 1996 when three class action lawsuits were filed in the United States against Swiss banks regarding their handling of assets of Holocaust victims. A similar class action lawsuit was filed against Ford Motor Co. in March 1998 regarding its involvement in Nazi slave labor during the Holocaust. Later French financial institutions, Austrian enterprises, the French railways, and the U.S. government were also sued with regard to their WWII or immediate post-war activities related to the Holocaust or the assets of Holocaust victims. Some cases were not admitted, some were denied, and those that were successful have resulted in settlements.

A special subgroup of such cases is that focusing on the restitution of Nazi-looted artworks. The first lawsuit of this kind was filed in the United States in August 1998. Probably the most well-known case is that involving five famous paintings of Austrian artist Gustav Klimt, restituted in 2006 after an arbitration panel decided in favor of the original owner against the Austrian government (see HOLOCAUST REPARATIONS AND RESTITUTION).

For further reading on Holocaust trials, see M. S. Bryant, The Revenge of Power: US and West German "Euthanasia" Trials, 1945–1953 (2005); L. Douglas, The Memory of Judgement: Making Law and History in the Trials of the Holocaust (2005); D. Lipstadt, History on Trial: My Day in Court with a Holocaust Denier (2006); B. Ferencz, Less than Slaves: Jewish Forced Labor and the Quest for Compensation (2002); M. Bayzler and R. Alford, eds., Holocaust Restitution: Perspectives on the Litigation and Its Legacy (2006); G. Hausner, Justice in Jerusalem (1977); and I. Deák, J. T. Gross, and T. Judt, The Politics of Retribution in Europe: World War II and its Aftermath (2000).

CHRISTINE SCHMIDT VAN DER ZANDEN

Holocaust: United States Jewish Response. American Jewry's response to *Nazism and the *Holocaust was rooted in long-standing traditions of Jewish communities assisting one another in times of hardship. However, it was also affected by organizational rivalries, Jewish leaders' fears of domestic *antisemitism, and the Jewish community's relationship with President Franklin D. Roosevelt (FDR).

FDR regarded the Nazi persecution of German Jews in the 1930s as an internal matter in which the United States should not intervene. Although dismayed by FDR's stance, American Jewish leaders hesitated to publicly challenge a president whose other policies they strongly supported. The Jewish leadership also refrained from challenging the tight U.S. immigration quotas, fearing that asking for admission of more refugees, especially during the Depression years, would cause antisemitism or provoke even stricter anti-immigration laws.

One major defense organization, the American Jewish Congress, staged anti-Hitler rallies and led a boycott of German goods. The other major defense group, the American Jewish Committee, opposed such protests. The Congress represented ethnically assertive East European immigrants who favored an activist response when Jewish interests were threatened while the Committee was led by wealthy, acculturated Jews of German descent who preferred backstairs diplomacy to public agitation. American Zionists sought creation of a Jewish national home in British Mandate Palestine to serve as a haven for European Jewish refugees. However, under Arab pressure, the British in the late 1930s began restricting Jewish immigration. At a U.S.-initiated international refugee conference in Evian, France, in 1938, the British refused to discuss Palestine, and the other participants reaffirmed their unwillingness to admit more refugees.

The Germans' mass murder of European Jewry, underway since mid-1941, was officially verified by the Allies in late 1942. Eight major U.S. Jewish organizations set aside their disagreements to establish a Joint Emergency Committee on European Jewish Affairs and sponsored rallies urging the Allies to find havens for refugees. The committee made little headway as the Roosevelt administration insisted that nothing could be done until the war was over. An Anglo-American conference on the refugee problem, held in Bermuda in the spring of 1943, failed to initiate meaningful steps to aid the Jews. The Bermuda debacle deeply frustrated the Jewish community, but fresh conflicts between Zionists and non-Zionists distracted Jewish leaders and undermined the community's political effectiveness. Several organizations sought to aid European Jewry through direct philanthropy. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee sent funds to Europe for relief efforts and to facilitate emigration. An Orthodox group, the Va'ad ha-Hatzalah, assisted endangered rabbis and their students. Meanwhile, a maverick political action committee known as the Bergson Group launched its own campaign for American action to rescue refugees. It sponsored more than two hundred newspaper advertisements, lobbied Washington, and organized rallies, including a march by four hundred rabbis to the White House in 1943. This effort won the endorsement of many celebrities, intellectuals, and political figures. Some mainstream Jewish leaders, who feared the Bergson Group's high-profile criticism of the Allies would cause antisemitism, urged U.S. officials to draft or deport Bergson and sought to persuade public figures to withdraw their support from the group.

The Bergson effort culminated with the introduction of a congressional resolution asking the president to create a government agency to rescue Jews from the Nazis. With the resolution nearing passage and under behind-the-scenes pressure from the Treasury Department, President Roosevelt decided, in early 1944, to establish the War Refugee Board. Financed by the Joint Distribution Committee and other Jewish groups, the War Refugee Board played a key role in rescuing some 200,000 Jews during the final fifteen months of the war. Scholarship on this topic includes D. S. Wyman,

The Abandonment of the Jews: America and the Holocaust 1941–1945 (1984); and D. S. Wyman and R. Medoff, A Race Against Death: Peter Bergson, America, and the Holocaust (2002).

RAFAEL MEDOFF

Holocaust, Women and: See HOLOCAUST: ROLE OF GENDER

Homosexuality: See ETHICS, SEXUAL

Hosea, Book of, is the first book of the Minor Prophets (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; and PROPHETIC BOOKS). According to its first verse, Hosea was written in the eighth century BCE. It is the only prophetic book wholly from the northern kingdom of Israel (a few glosses from later Judean scribes notwithstanding). Hosea is the most passionate prophet; in vivid anthropopathic terms he describes God's love for the nation Israel as well as God's anger and disappointment.

The book divides into two main parts: chapters 1–3 and 4–14. Its language is often difficult, perhaps because the Hebrew text has not been transmitted accurately, perhaps because it is written in a northern dialect of Hebrew that differs significantly from the southern dialect in which most of the Bible is written. The first part focuses on YHWH's anger over Israel's frequent worship of the Canaanite god Baal. The first and third chapters describe symbolic acts that God commands Hosea to perform. In the first chapter, Hosea marries a promiscuous woman and has several children with her; God directs the prophet to give the children names symbolizing God's rejection of Israel. In the third chapter, Hosea loves a promiscuous woman; she is forced to remain without her lovers and without a husband for many days as punishment. The second chapter interprets these actions: God is the husband, and Israel (or Israel's leaders) is the adulterous wife who goes astray by worshiping Baal and attributing prosperity to him. God rejects Israel and shames her, but eventually He takes her back out of extraordinary grace. These chapters do not mention main themes of classical prophecy such as the primacy of ethics. Further, they may regard the leaders of Israel (the wife in the metaphor) rather than the populace (the children) as guilty. Consequently, some scholars date this section to the reign of Ahab in the ninth century, when the royal court promoted the worship of Baal; if this is the case, the first three chapters of Hosea are essentially an example of pre-classical prophecy.

The second part (ch. 4–14) is more typical of classical prophecy; it refers to events from the last decades of the northern kingdom's existence in the eighth century. Here the marital metaphor disappears. Instead God is portrayed as a parent (whether a mother or father is not specified) and Israel as a disobedient child (ch. 11). As in Hosea 1–3, God's love ultimately overcomes God's anger. Nonetheless, frightening portrayals of divine anger are common in this section.

Hosea had a profound influence on later biblical literature. Chapters 1–3 are the first introduction of a marriage metaphor for the relationship between YHWH and Israel; this metaphor is picked up in the prophecy of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Deutero-Isaiah and also in rabbinic and Jewish mystical literature. The author(s) of Deuteronomy was especially influenced by the covenant ideology found throughout Hosea and borrows and reworks a great deal of vocabulary from Hosea.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Host, Desecration of. In medieval and early modern Europe the libel that Jews desecrated the host (the communion wafer used in the Eucharist ritual and believed to be the body of Christ) was sometimes conflated with the *ritual murder accusation (blood libel). The Roman Catholic Church first recognized the doctrine of transubstantiation at the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, and the first accusation occurred in 1243 at Belz, *Germany, resulting in the murder of a number of Jews. After the *Reformation, during which this doctrine was challenged, accusations gradually diminished in Protestant areas. In many Catholic countries, however, they continued into the nineteenth century.

KATE FRIEDMAN

Human Rights. During the past two hundred years, Jews have played every possible role in the human rights drama, as victims, advocates, violators, and judges. For modern Jews, securing human rights played a constant part in Jewish political decision making, both in the world at large and in the State of *Israel. During and after the French Revolution, Jews did not merely embrace Enlightenment universalism; they were in many instances the occasion for its expression, and they often made the universal their particular contribution to world politics. Whether in their capacities as state officials, members of voluntary associations, or empowered individuals, Jews stood for and stood up for human rights.

In the first two decades after the *Holocaust, Jews made some of the earliest and most important contributions to the formation of the international human rights system. In 1945, the *American Jewish Committee (AJC) led a coalition of organizations that convinced national representatives at the San Francisco Conference that human rights should be a central component of the United Nations Charter. Raphael Lemkin, an international lawyer who was also a Polish Jew, coined the term “genocide”; his lobbying efforts almost singlehandedly achieved the General Assembly’s adoption of the UN Genocide Convention in 1948. René Cassin, president of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle, played a key role in the drafting of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a founding document of the international human rights movement. Throughout the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, Jewish activists contributed to drafting and ratifying human rights treaties, monitoring states’ compliance, lobbying states, establishing international tribunals, and creating coalitions with other human rights activists.

Jews could succeed in advocating for universal rights protections because their suffering conferred moral standing on their cause, because they could plumb a rich religious and philosophical tradition to find support for a cosmopolitan and pluralist worldview, and because they nurtured generations of experienced organizers. Many Jews saw their activism as the natural outgrowth of core Jewish values like tikkun olam (repair of the world), b’tzelem elohim (the belief that all human beings were created in God’s image), and ger lo tilhaz (the command not to oppress the stranger). Not all Jews, however, sought, found, or emphasized the universalism in their tradition. For example, while human rights activists interpreted “Never Again” as an imperative to work on behalf of the rights of all people, *Zionists often interpreted the phrase as a clarion cry to enable Jews to defend their own rights by building up a Jewish state. Many Jewish activists found themselves living in the contact zone among commitments to international human rights, Jewish nationalism, and domestic pluralism.

Often, these activists were associated with Jewish non-governmental organizations (NGOs) involved at the United Nations, in the *Soviet Union and its successor states, or in *Israel. At the international level these NGOs included the AJC, World Jewish Congress, the International Council of Jewish Women, *B’nai B’rith, *Agudat Israel, and the *World Union for Progressive Judaism. In Israel they included such groups as the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, B’Tselem, HaMoked, Rabbis for Human Rights, and Physicians for Human Rights-Israel. As members of a globally dispersed set of political communities, Jewish rights activists sometimes worked collaboratively, sometimes independently, and sometimes at cross-purposes.

*Diaspora activists embraced international human rights during the 1950s and 1960s but their enthusiasm began to decline in the mid-1960s. The primary reason was that the new UN majority, including the Communist Bloc, Arab states, and newly independent African and Asian states, began to use the human rights system not just to criticize but also to ostracize Israel. The General Assembly’s infamous “Zionism=Racism” resolution of November 10, 1975, led to forty years of claims of Israeli rights violations by various UN bodies. The Commission on Human Rights adopted more resolutions condemning Israel than it did for any other state, including those that sponsored genocide. Jewish activists often struggled over whether to participate in human rights forums that were dedicated to worthy causes but were often commandeered by anti-Zionists for other purposes. Until May, 2000, when it was admitted to the Western European and Others Group, Israel was denied access to a UN regional group, through which committee assignments were allocated. It was the subject of two resolutions to expel it from the international community. The International Committee of the Red Cross prohibited its Israeli affiliate from using the Star of David as its identifying symbol.

Starting in the 1970s Jewish NGOs began to identify such behavior as a “new *antisemitism,” designed to turn Israel into a pariah and to deny the Jewish people their right to self determination. Even in the face of international condemnations, however, Jewish activists continued to put the human rights system to use where there they perceived a need to protect a vulnerable part of the Diaspora (e.g., in *Ethiopia, *Iraq, or the *Soviet Union), or where, as in the cases of the genocides in Bosnia and Darfur, Jewish history demanded action on behalf of non-Jewish victims.

While anti-Zionist activities challenged Jewish human rights advocates from one side, Israel’s sometimes questionable practices with regard to the rights of Palestinians and Israeli minorities challenged activists from the other. Human rights bodies, both in Israel and at the UN, found Israel in violation of some of its treaty obligations to protect Palestinians’ and Israeli Arabs’ rights. In the context of the first Palestinian intifadah (1987–89), such allegations spurred the development of a domestic human rights sector in Israel. Using legal petitions, public campaigns, official advocacy, site monitoring, and individual casework, Israeli activists argued, among other things, against the use of torture, punitive house demolitions, destruction of Palestinian olive groves, and arbitrary detentions. Jewish international activism declined after the Six Day War of 1967, but at the same time Israeli domestic activism increased.

Allegations of Israeli violations caused excruciating tensions for many activists. For example, in the late 1970s, activists in the American Jewish Committee responded to the Zionism=Racism resolution with ambivalence. In public, they mounted a substantial public defense of Israel's rights record. Privately, however, they helped establish the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, the state's first liberal-centrist rights organization. They sought to balance national and international interests carefully. Although Israel helped draft the statute of the International Criminal Court (est. 1998), the state nonetheless declined to ratify the treaty. The sticking point was a clause criminalizing a state's resettlement of its own civilians in territory it occupies. Israel interpreted this clause as the world community's attempt to restrain the West Bank settlement enterprise. Hence, it decided not to join a court designed, among other things, to punish the perpetrators of genocide.

Although Jewish activists stood in solidarity with Israel against its enemies, many continued working for a fairer and more effective human rights system. They did so because they believed it was better to struggle for human rights than to revert to a world of unquestioned state power; because they carried deep historical memories and had witnessed recent instances of Jewish suffering; because they sought to answer their tradition's call for universal justice; because they hoped to strengthen Israel's democracy; and because they believed that no one should ever again become the victim of genocide. For further reading, see M. Galchinsky, Jews and Human Rights: Dancing at Three Weddings (2007); see also ISRAEL, STATE OF: PEACE MOVEMENTS.

MICHAEL GALCHINSKY

Humanistic Judaism: See JUDAISM, HUMANISTIC

Hungary. The end of World War I marked the beginning of a new era in the history of Hungarian Jewry. The collapse of the multinational *Habsburg Austro-Hungarian monarchy was accompanied by two revolutions in Hungary. The liberal regime set up in October 1918 was replaced in March 1919 by a *communist government, and both had several prominent Jewish members. The communist regime became identified with "the Jews," even if it was opposed by most Hungarian Jews and their leaders. The overthrow of the communists in the summer of 1919 was followed by a year-long white terror, with deadly antisemitic violence in more than fifty towns. Hungary lost vast territories (mostly inhabited by non-Hungarian nationalities) as a result of the 1920 peace settlement. Its Jewish population shrank from more than 900,000 in 1910 to 473,355 in 1920. Hungarian Jewry lost its most religious and least assimilated communities, along with 80% of its Orthodox yeshivot. The majority of Jews now affiliated with Neolog Judaism (the Hungarian version of moderate reform; see JUDAISM: NEOLOG), and almost half of Hungarian Jews lived in Budapest.

*Antisemitism became a defining element in the ideology of the nationalistic reactionary regime of the interwar period, which defined Hungary as "Christian" in direct opposition to "Jewishness." A numerus clausus law in 1920 limited the number of Jews in institutions of higher learning to 5%, their proportion within the general population. Many Jewish students were forced to attend universities abroad. The consolidating regime mitigated the law in 1928 for practical reasons, because it needed the support of the Jewish economic elite and was concerned about Hungary's image abroad. Both the Neolog and the Orthodox (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX) leadership remained loyal to the regime, and the majority of Jews continued to follow the path of acculturation. There was a revival of Jewish cultural and organizational life and *Zionist activism in the second half of the 1920s, but no significant Jewish nationalist alternative emerged until the 1940s. There was also a proliferation of Jewish periodicals of all kinds in the 1920s and 1930s, and the Hungarian Jewish *Museum in Budapest became an important center of Jewish cultural activity from 1931.

The 1930s saw the further advance of antisemitism, the growing influence of fascistic extreme right groups, and Hungary's increasingly close relationship with *Nazi Germany. The Jews were gradually stripped of their civic equality, rights, and livelihood after 1938. The first and second so-called Jewish laws in 1938 and 1939 restricted the participation of Jews in the economy, limited their number in all professions and occupations, and narrowed their political and property rights. The third Jewish law of 1941 aimed at the social separation of Jews as an inferior and alien race, banning marriages and sexual relations between Jews and non-Jews. Jewish organizations responded by organizing aid to alleviate the devastating effects of the legislation. The Neolog, the Orthodox, and the Zionists worked together in the Protection Office of Hungarian Israelites from 1938. An active Jewish cultural life survived in Budapest under the aegis of the National Hungarian Israelite Educational Association into the 1940s.

After the annexation of much of the territory lost in 1920, with the help of Nazi Germany, the Jewish population of Hungary grew to more than 800,000. Jews were drafted to military labor service beginning in 1941, and 50,000 to 70,000 died in the cruel labor battalions during the war. After the German occupation in March 1944, the Hungarian government immediately introduced a series of restrictive and humiliating measures. Ghettoization started in April, and 437,000 Jews were deported to concentration camps by the Hungarian authorities within six weeks (see HOLOCAUST: CAMPS AND KILLING CENTERS; HOLOCAUST: GHETTOS). Regent Miklós Horthy (1868–1957) stopped the deportations in July, when only the Jews of Budapest remained. With the rise to power of the fascist Arrow Cross regime in October 1944, the Jews of Budapest were also ghettoized. Tens of thousands fell victim to mass shootings, death marches, illness, and hunger until their liberation in February 1945. It is estimated that 550,000 Jews in territories under Hungarian rule perished during the Holocaust.

Of the approximately 200,000 Hungarian Jews who survived the Holocaust, 144,000 lived in Budapest at the end of the war. Antisemitism remained strong and those Jews who returned had to face considerable resentment. There were several instances of bloody and deadly antisemitic violence in 1946. Many Jews joined the Communist Party, and *Zionism gained unprecedented popularity. However, Zionism was suppressed in 1949 after the communist takeover, and several prominent Jews were arrested in the anti-Zionist atmosphere of the early 1950s. The Orthodox and the Neolog were forced to merge under the leadership of the state-controlled administrative body of the National Representation of Hungarian Israelites in 1951. Many Jews lost their property and livelihood again as a result of liquidation of the private sector and nationalization. Jewish life was restricted to religious observance, and all forms of community life were suppressed. Only a few welfare institutions, one high school, and the rabbinical seminary in Budapest were permitted to remain open.

Around 60,000 to 75,000 Jews left Hungary during two waves of emigration in 1945–48 and 1956–57; many of them were Orthodox and Zionist. The overwhelming majority of remaining Jews lived in Budapest, and they were mostly highly assimilated.

With the general easing of the dictatorship in the 1980s, Jewish history and tradition, as well as the Holocaust, could be discussed with increasing openness in public lectures and publications. The first alternative secular Jewish organization, the Hungarian Jewish Cultural Association, was founded in 1988. Two Jewish publishers were established in 1989, a year that also saw a renaissance of Jewish communal and cultural activity. Two new Jewish high schools (Orthodox and Liberal) were founded in 1990. Democratic changes also brought about the resurgence of antisemitism; the process of coming to terms with Hungary's role in the Holocaust has been slow and controversial. The Holocaust Memorial Center (a museum and educational facility) was opened only in 2004. Jewish life has continued to expand in the form of various religious, Zionist, and secular cultural organizations, institutions, and publications. The present Jewish population of Hungary is estimated at between 60,000 and 150,000.

For further reading, see R. Patai, The Jews of Hungary: History, Culture, Psychology (1996); N. Katzburg, Hungary and the Jews: Policy and Legislation, 1920–1942 (1981); R. L. Braham, The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary (1981); T. Cole, Holocaust City: The Making of a Jewish Ghetto (2003); and A. Szalai, ed., In The Land of Hagar. The Jews of Hungary: History, Society and Culture (2002). Maps 8, 10 KATI VÖRÖS

Iberian Peninsula: See PORTUGAL; SPAIN, CHRISTIAN; SPAIN, MUSLIM; Map 6

Ibn Ezra is the patronymic shared by several scholars of the eleventh and twelfth centuries in Muslim *Spain. The most prominent among them were Moses and Abraham.

IBN EZRA, MOSES [BEN JACOB] (1070–1138) was a poet, philosopher, and author of a singular work on Hebrew prosody. Born in Granada, Moses had three brothers, who were also distinguished scholars, and was a relative of Abraham ibn Ezra, discussed later in this entry. Moses' book on poetics includes advice on rhetoric and literary creativity, a critique of other Andalusian poets, and autobiographical reflections. His own liturgical *poetry is well represented in the *Sephardic rite, particularly that of the *High Holidays; therefore, he is often called by the nickname ha-Sallah: composer of seliḥot (penitential prayers). In his philosophical discussions of creation, nature, and the individual as a microcosm, Moses displays the influence of the Islamic "Brethren of Purity" (Ikhwan al-Safa) and quotes liberally from their "Epistles" (rasa'il). Recent research includes M. Z. Cohen, "The Aesthetic Exegesis of Moses ibn Ezra," Hebrew Bible/Old Testament 1:2 (2000); and R. P. Scheindlin, "Moses ibn Ezra," in The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. M. R. Menocal, R. P. Scheindlin, and M. Sells (2000).

IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM [BEN MEIR] (1093–1164) was a biblical exegete (see BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800), translator, *grammarian, *poet and literary critic, *astronomer, mathematician, and *astrologer. Born in Tudela, Abraham made a precarious living as a poet. He was an acquaintance of Judah *Halevi, whom he cites occasionally in his Bible commentary and who is reported to have become his father-in-law. Forced to flee Tudela in 1140 after the *Almohad invasion, his life of wandering took him to *France (Narbonne, Beziers, Rouen), *Italy (Rome, Lucca, Mantua, Verona), and even *England (London). Due to his constant penury, Abraham grew dejected, and the heterodox religious proclivities of his son Isaac (a passage in al-Ḥarizi's Tahemoni implies that he converted to Islam) could only have deepened his despondency.

Ibn Ezra's biblical commentaries (extant for all but the Early *Prophets, *Jeremiah, *Ezekiel, *Proverbs, *Ezra, and *Chronicles; some in multiple editions) are noteworthy for their adherence to the simple sense of the text (peshat), determined by affinity to the rules of Hebrew grammar and syntax; he has disdain for those who rely unquestioningly on aggadah*. He regularly cites works by earlier exegetes, particularly *Saadia Gaon, as well as several *Karaites, whom he largely derides. Abraham played a pivotal role in the transmission of the *grammatical and lexicographical discoveries of his predecessors, including Judah Ḥayyuj and Jonah ibn Janah, some of whose works he translated from Arabic into Hebrew. His poetry, both religious and secular, is notable for its linguistic and structural simplicity and is especially well represented among the zemirot recited traditionally on the *Sabbath. Although he wrote only one philosophical work, the Neoplatonic Ḥayy ben Mekitz, he is considered a significant figure in medieval Jewish *thought.

For further reading, see I. Twersky and J. M. Harris, eds., Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra: Studies in the Writings of a Twelfth-Century Jewish Polymath, (1993); N. Sarna, "Hebrew and Bible Studies in Medieval Spain," in The Sephardi Heritage, ed. R. D. Barnett (1971); and S. Sela and G. Freudenthal, "Abraham ibn Ezra's Scholarly Writings: A Chronological Listing," Aleph 6 (2006); see also ASTROLOGY; BIBLICAL COMMENTARY: MIDDLE AGES TO 1800; GRAMMARIANS AND LEXICOGRAPHERS; POETRY, MEDIEVAL; MUSLIM WORLD.

MOSHE SOKOLOV

Ibn Gabirol, Solomon, an eleventh-century *Hebrew grammarian and Neoplatonic philosopher from Malaga, *Spain, was arguably the most creative and perplexing of the Andalusian Hebrew poets. Ibn Gabirol composed highly idiosyncratic Arabic-style Hebrew poetry on social themes and a huge corpus of profound devotional lyrics and sublime liturgical poems for recitation in the *synagogue. Although ibn Gabirol found a place in the circles of several prominent members of the Jewish elite, his poetic output gives the impression that he was very much an alienated loner who was drawn to philosophical speculation and spiritual introspection. In both his meditative poetry and his philosophy, ibn Gabirol is preoccupied with the place of the soul, its imprisonment in the material world, and its longing to be reunited with God. Ibn Gabirol's poetic masterpiece, "Kingdom's Crown," devoted to God's majesty in relation to creation, is still recited in *Sephardi and *North African congregations on *Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Resources include P. Cole, Selected Poems of Solomon ibn Gabirol (2001); and R. Loewe, Ibn Gabirol (1989); see also POETRY, MEDIEVAL; MUSLIM WORLD; THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL.

ROSS BRANN

Illness and Disease: Bible and Ancient Near East. An extensive medical literature appears among the documents of the ancient *Near East, and Israelite concepts of illness and healing can be gleaned from biblical texts. The concept of "illness" as a psychological and physical experience is more appropriate in considering biblical times than is "disease," which refers to a biological or mental condition itself. Diseases can sometimes be recognized in ancient texts, but more often they are obscured by imprecise descriptions or are mislabeled by traditional translations. A case in point is biblical "leprosy" (e.g., Lev 13; 2 Kgs 5), which is almost certainly not Hansen's disease as defined in contemporary medical practice.

Like peoples everywhere, Israelites and their neighbors were concerned with maintaining and recovering health. They had health care systems – strategies for preventing and curing illness – that can be understood by examining relevant texts as well as by considering the discoveries of osteo-archeologists (who subject human skeletal remains to paleopathological analysis) and medical anthropologists. The beliefs of the ancients about the etiology of illness and their concomitant concern for the suffering of afflicted individuals affected their approach to treatment or therapy. Many held what has been called a “utopian” position – that is, they believed that illness has a cause that can be understood by the patient and is thus potentially curable. In the Bible, this view is most directly stated in *Deuteronomy 28 (vv. 15, 20–22, 27–28, 35, 45, 59–62) where illness is said to come from God as punishment for disobeying God’s *commandments (mitzvot). Because of the dominant biblical view that illness is related to sin, a number of *priestly texts also connect the idea of *purity, or rather impurity, with illness. Infirm Israelites would thus have been denied access to the *Temple precincts until they were properly purified (e.g., Lev 14). Another, “realist” model is exemplified by *Job, who cannot understand the cause of his afflictions, rejects the idea that they are punitive, and claims they are the result of divine purposes that are not arbitrary but cannot be comprehended.

Those who believed that illness was related to sin sought relief by consulting health care specialists, who included religious personnel (priests) or other practitioners of folk medicine. Or, they may have carried out familiar *prayers and procedures themselves. Communication with the deity and the application of remedies were regarded as essential aspects of treatment, which comprised three steps. The first step, petitionary, involved a set of prayers or rituals to confess sins, beseech forgiveness, and request healing (e.g., Pss 38 and 39). The second, perhaps most akin to modern medicine, might be termed therapeutic; it consisted of physical procedures or the application of “medicinal” substances (e.g., the remedy for snake bite in Num 21:5–9). The final step, thanksgiving, entailed obligatory prayers, purification rituals, or *sacrifices; being freed from illness required expressions of gratitude to the deity (e.g., Ps 107:17–22). Because the human being was considered a whole entity, restoration to health required a holistic approach, using both appeals and thanks to God, as well as physical procedures. For further reading, see H. Avalos, Illness and Health Care in the Ancient Near East: The Role of the Temple in Greece, Mesopotamia, and Israel (1995); see also MEDICINE. CAROL MEYERS

Immersion, Ritual: See MIKVEH; PURITY

Immersion, Ritual: Women. Immersion for women following menstruation and childbirth is a rabbinic not a biblical requirement (see NIDDAH). The halakhic regulations appear particularly in BT Niddah, which discusses the practical consequences for male ritual purity of women’s menstrual and nonmenstrual discharges. On the eighth “white day” following the cessation of menstrual flow, the wife must immerse in the *mikveh (ritual bath) before marital relations can resume. Jewish girls were traditionally taught to comply strictly and promptly with the regulations connected with the niddah (the menstruating woman). Immersion, which took place only after the body and hair had been thoroughly cleansed, had to be complete. Halakhah* demanded a single immersion, but three became customary. Postmenstrual and postpartum women usually visited the mikveh at night, often accompanied by other women.

In the first half of the twentieth century, the practice of female ritual ablution declined significantly in North America, even among nominally traditional families, despite Orthodox exhortations in sermons and written tracts on the spiritual and medical benefits of taharat ha-mishpahah (family purity regulations), as these laws came to be called. Factors militating against ritual immersion included disaffection of Americanized children of immigrants with their parents’ Old World ways, the success of liberal forms of organized Judaism that did not advocate such ablutions, and the deterrent effect of ill-maintained and unhygienic mikvaot. Many Jewish feminist writers of the late twentieth century also condemned taharat ha-mishpahah regulations as archaic expressions of male anxiety about the biological processes of the female body that reinforced the predominant construction in rabbinic *Judaism of women as other and lesser than men (see WOMEN, ANCIENT: RABBINIC JUDAISM).

The 1980s and 1990s saw a resurgence in the numbers of Orthodox Jews and a new sympathy among non-Orthodox denominations for various previously discarded practices of traditional Judaism. In this era, positive new interpretations of ritual ablution developed, accompanied by construction of attractive modern mikvaot. Orthodox advocates of taharat ha-mishpahah regulations praised the ways in which they enhanced the sanctity of *marriage and human sexuality and extolled the feeling of personal renewal and rebirth that followed each immersion.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, ritual ablution has become a symbolic expression of a new spiritual beginning for both women and men in all branches of North American Jewish practice beyond the domain of taharat ha-mishpahah. In addition to conversion to Judaism, rituals developed incorporating mikveh immersion as part of *Bar and *Bat Mitzvah; before Jewish *festivals; prior to *marriage; in cases of miscarriage, *infertility, and illness; and after *divorce, sexual assault, or other life-altering events. An indication of the probable long-term impact of this trend is the increased construction of mikva’ot by non-Orthodox communities.

For further reading, see R. Adler. “‘In Your Blood, Live’: Re-Visions of a Theology of Purity,” in Lifecycles 2, ed. D. Orenstein and J. R. Litman (1997), 197–206; J. R. Baskin, “Women and Ritual Immersion in Medieval Ashkenaz,” in Judaism in Practice, ed. L. Fine (2001), 131–42; and R. R. Wasserfall, ed., Women and Water (1999).

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Incense, a mixture of aromatic resinous spices laid atop burning coals, was used from the time of the First *Temple into the *rabbinic period. Ketoret, a special incense restricted to cultic uses, was lit in the Temple morning and evening and was used by the High Priest in the inner sanctum on *Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement (Exod 30:34–38; Lev 16:12–13). Incense was also associated with the divine election of the priesthood; the insurrection of the Levite clan of Korah was resolved by a duel between Aaron and Korah in which the two priests burned incense before the Lord. Aaron’s incense was accepted, but Korah and his followers were swallowed by the earth (Num 16).

The Hebrew *Bible refers to the use of incense to fumigate rooms, bedding, and clothing. The adulterous woman in *Proverbs tells her potential lover, “I have waved myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon [over] my bed” (7:17). The prophet *Ezekiel compares Israel’s sins to those of an *adulterous wife and describes the banquet she lays out for her lovers (the foreign powers), drawing an analogy between the Temple incense and the incense burned at the feast (Ezek 23:41). From this reference, we may deduce that the Jerusalemites living in *Babylonia in the fifth and sixth centuries BCE lit incense as part of elaborate meals. No doubt, this practice accompanied the exiles when they returned to the vicinity of *Jerusalem.

Practices surrounding incense continue well into the rabbinic period. The substance lit was more akin to oil than to incense that is used today (JT Berakhot 6:6). Rabbinic legal texts refer to fumigation of clothing and lighting incense (mugmar) after festive meals (e.g., M. Berakhot 6:6; JT Berakhot 6:6 10d). In some cases, Rabbis went to great lengths to preserve the scent of incense on the *Sabbath, lighting it shortly before the Sabbath began (T. Yom Tov/Beitzah 2:14). There are also references to lighting incense in the privy (BT Berakhot 53a) and for the dead (T. Niddah 9:16; JT Berakhot 8:6 11d). A scent that is created to provide a pleasant odor, such as incense lit after meals, is blessed; however, scents for other purposes, such as covering another odor or idolatry, are not blessed (BT Berakhot 53a). Although it does not appear that the spices for havdalah* (the ritual concluding the Sabbath) were ignited, it is likely that they were similar to those used in fumigants (M. Berakhot 8:5). See also ANOINTMENT; ISRAELITES: RELIGION; TEMPLE AND TEMPLE CULT.

DEBORAH A. GREEN

India. Linguistic evidence confirms the possibility of ancient Jewish settlement in India and commercial connections between India and the Land of Israel. The articles brought on King *Solomon's ships, mentioned in 1 Kings 10:11 and 10:22 (also 2 Chron 9:10, 9:21), such as kofim (apes) tukim (peacocks), and almag (sandalwood = valgum), were of Indian origin. Travelers' tales in the *Talmud mention trade with India, including ginger and iron. In *Esther 1:1, King Ahaseuerus' kingdom is said to stretch from Hoddu (generally, India) to Kush (generally, *Ethiopia). From the ninth century CE, Jewish merchantmen known as *Radhanites traded between the Middle East and South Asia. Jewish texts from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries, discovered in the Cairo *Genizah, include documentation of trade in spices, pharmaceuticals, metals, gold, and silks between Arabic-speaking Jews and Hindu partners.

In the seventeenth century, Jewish merchant centers were established in Madras, Calicut, and elsewhere. During the nineteenth century, Jewish emissaries reached India in hopes of finding members of the Ten Lost *Tribes, who were exiled from the kingdom of *Israel by *Assyrian kings in the eighth century BCE. In the twentieth century, Indian Jews were not particularly active in the Indian freedom struggle against the British, who had acted for the most part as their benefactors. However, several individuals supported Mahatma Gandhi and the nationalists in pre-partition India. Some European refugees reached India before, during, and after *World War II.

There are three major Jewish communities in India: the Bene Israel*, the *Cochin Jews, and the "Baghdadis." These small communities, which, in their heyday before Indian independence in 1947, numbered only 28,000 in all, never suffered from *antisemitism. In recent years, other groups such as the Shinlung or Bnei Menashe of the Indo-Burmese borderlands are claiming Israelite status and identifying as Jews. To date, nearly 1,000 members of these groups have converted to Judaism and live in *Israel.

The largest of India's Jewish communities is the Bene Israel ("Children of Israel"), who claim that they came from the "North," as early as 175 BCE. According to their legend, their ancestors were shipwrecked off the Konkan coast and lost all their holy books; they only remembered the shema* prayer, which declared their faith in monotheism. The survivors were offered hospitality by local Hindus and took up the occupation of oil pressing as Shanwar Telis (Saturday Oilmen), because they refrained from work on the Jewish *Sabbath. The Bene Israel observed the Sabbath, *dietary laws, *circumcision, and many of the Jewish *festivals. From the eighteenth century on, under the influence of the British, they began to move out of the Konkan villages south of Bombay (today Mumbai). By the twentieth century, the majority of the Bene Israel had set up synagogues and communities in urban centers, such as Bombay, Pune, Ahmedabad, New Delhi, Karachi, and Aden.

The religious customs of the Bene Israel were unique. On *Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement), known as the "Festival of the Closing of the Doors," the Bene Israel, influenced by local Hindu and Muslim customs, arrived in *synagogue before dawn so as to avoid contact with other people. Their folk customs included hair-shaving ceremonies for babies, *pilgrimages, and special ways of celebrating the festivals. An unusual feature of Bene Israel religious worship is the strong belief in Eliyahu Ha-Navi (*Elijah the prophet).

The Bene Israel community boasted a relatively large number of army and navy personnel, lawyers, professors, doctors, mayors, and authors, who contributed to the progress of India. After the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the majority emigrated to Israel. At first, they were not fully accepted by Israel's Chief Rabbis as Jews for *marriage purposes. In 1962, they staged a strike in Jerusalem claiming that they were "full Jews in every respect," and in 1964, they received official recognition.

Today, some 4,000 Bene Israel remain in India, largely in the Maharashtra region, and more than 60,000 live in Israel.

The miniscule community of Cochin Jews numbered 2,400 souls before 1948; less than fifty souls remain on the Malabar coast today. Some attribute the settlement of the Cochin Jews to King Solomon's merchantmen, although a popular south Indian Christian legend holds that Cochin Jewry arrived in India at the time of Thomas the Apostle in the first century. Documentary evidence of Jewish settlement in Kerala can be found in Cochin Jewish copperplates inscribed in an ancient Tamil script (dated 1000 CE). During the reign of Bhaskara Ravi Varman (962–1020 CE), the Jews were granted seventy-two privileges, including the right to use a day lamp, to erect a palanquin, to blow a trumpet, and to be exempt from and to collect certain taxes.

After Vasco de Gama's expedition to India, some European Jews (called Paradesi, meaning "foreigners," and sometimes referred to as "Whites") from *Spain, Holland, Aleppo, and *Germany settled in Cochin. A prominent member of that community was Ezekiel Rahabi (1694–1771), the principal merchant for the Dutch East India Company in Cochin. The Cochin Jews were dispersed in five major settlements in eight communities in Kerala: Cochin, Ernakulam, Chendamanglam, Mala, and Parur. Among the unique customs of the Jews in all these communities is the Cochin Jewish wedding ceremony, in which the groom himself recites the benedictions.

The Cochin Jews were acclaimed in 1968 when Prime Minister Indira Gandhi celebrated the 400th anniversary of the Paradesi synagogue, established in 1568; the Indian government issued a commemorative stamp on the occasion. After the establishment of Israel, most of the Jews from Cochin, motivated by *Zionism, decided to emigrate. Eight thousand Malabar Jews live largely in moshavim (*agricultural settlements); some have also moved to the cities. In 2005, the Kerala government completed the restoration of the synagogue in the village of Chennaman-galam in Kerala. An exhibition on the Jews of Chennaman-galam before and after their immigration to Israel was inaugurated on the premises in 2006.

The “Baghdadi” Jews migrated from *Iraq and *Syria to two major urban centers, Calcutta and Bombay, from the eighteenth century on. These Jewish merchants and their dependents escaped deteriorating conditions in Iraq and the pogroms of Daud Pasha in the mid-nineteenth century. They were followed by other Jews, who established thriving businesses in the East, as far afield as Singapore, Hong Kong, and Shanghai. The Sassoon dynasty built prayer houses, synagogues, hospitals, libraries, and schools in India for the benefit of Jews and non-Jews alike. In Calcutta, as many as eight Baghdadi synagogues operated regularly, as well as several *Hebrew and *Judeo-Arabic printing presses, which translated holy texts into local vernacular and published original works. After the British withdrew from India in 1947, many of the Baghdis decided to emigrate to England and other countries; several thousand went to Israel. Today, there are less than two hundred Jews of Iraqi origin left in India.

In 1992, Israel and India renewed diplomatic relations. Today, 50,000 Israelis, mainly backpackers, visit India each year. Hindu-Jewish studies are beginning to develop as a field of study and there is new interest in syncretic religious practices combining spirituality, meditation, and *mysticism.

Important studies include B. Holdrege, Veda and Torah: Transcending the Textuality of Scripture (1996); S. Weil, “Judaism-South Asia,” in Encyclopedia of Modern Asia, ed. D. Levinson, K. Christensen, et al., 3: 284–286; S. Weil, “The Heritage and Legacy of Indian Jews,” in idem (ed.), India’s Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle (2004), 8–21; H. Goodman, ed., Between Jerusalem and Benares: Comparative Studies in Judaism and Hinduism (1994); and N. Katz, R. Chakravarti, B. M. Sinha, and S. Weil, eds., Indo-Judaic Studies in the Twenty-First Century: A Perspective from the Margin (2007).

SHALVA WEIL

Infertility. The inability to beget or bear children has been seen as a great misfortune throughout Jewish history. In the Hebrew *Bible, fertility is strongly linked with divine blessing. The theme of the barren wife who becomes a joyful mother of children through *God’s favor (Ps 113:9) is a motif in the stories of a number of ancient Israel’s most important figures. Thus, three of the four matriarchs of *Genesis – *Sarah, *Rebekah, and *Rachel – suffered from infertility, as did *Hannah. The unexpected aspect of the births of *Isaac, *Jacob, *Joseph, and *Samuel emphasized their exceptionality and demonstrated God’s role in Israel’s destiny. At the same time, these narratives illuminate the unhappy state of the woman who did not fulfill her primary social role of bearing her husband’s children.

Classical Jewish texts consider childlessness a grave misfortune for both men and women. For the Rabbis, procreation was a male expression of potency as opposed to the female role of bearing and giving birth to the fruit of male seed. The childless man is said to be “cut off” from contact with God (BT Pesahim 113b) or “already dead” (BT Nedarim 64b). Thus, a man’s failure to procreate is understood to violate the biblical *commandment to be fruitful and multiply (Gen 1:28) but a woman’s infertility does not (M. Yevamot 6:6; further elaborated in BT Yevamot 65b–66). After ten years of an infertile *marriage, a man “may no longer abstain” from procreation (M. Yevamot 6:6). This mishnah is based on Genesis 16:3, where, after ten years of living in the land of *Canaan, *Sarah [Sarai] accepted her infertility and arranged for *Hagar to be her surrogate (BT Yevamot 65b). Although T. Yevamot 8:5 states that a man in an infertile marriage must divorce his wife and return her marriage settlement (ketubbah), BT Yevamot 65a suggests taking a second wife as an alternative.

A wife who is divorced after ten years of a marriage without offspring is not automatically assumed to be at fault. According to M. Yevamot 6:6, “If he divorced her, she is permitted to marry another and the second husband may also live with her for ten years.” However, a childless woman who does not become pregnant during ten years of a second marriage is presumed to be barren and must once again be divorced. The Rabbis rule that she may marry once more if her third husband already has children from a previous union (BT Yevamot 65a). The *Talmud also records instances of wives who successfully petitioned rabbinic *courts to compel reluctant husbands to divorce them after ten years of an infertile marriage. Even though they were not legally required to procreate, these women feared an impoverished old age without the support of offspring and wished to try to have children with another husband (BT Yevamot 65b).

Rabbinic aggadah* generally deplores the dissolution of marriages, even when male procreation is at stake. Many passages present the childless marriage as a situation in which human needs and feelings should overrule legal prescriptions. Thus, aggadic *midrash about infertile couples, including the biblical patriarchs and matriarchs, stresses the efficacy of *prayer and the necessity of faith, while emphasizing that infertility is never more than a presumption (e.g., Pesikta de Rav Kahana 22:2 and Song of Songs Rabbah 1:1–2).

Rabbinic midrash also acknowledges the domestic suffering of childless women, because “it is children who assure a wife’s position in her home” (Genesis Rabbah 71:5; see also Genesis Rabbah 45:4; Pesikta Rabbati 42:5). Although the Rabbis offer various explanations for infertility, they agree that only God can open the womb (BT Ta’anit 2a–b), even though human beings can play a role through prayer. Seven biblical barren women whose yearnings for children were ultimately satisfied through supplications to God became important rabbinic models of consolation and comfort: Sarah, Rebekah, *Leah, Rachel, the wife of Manoh (Samson’s mother), and Hannah, as well as the personified *Israel in the time of *redemption (based on the characterization of Zion as a barren woman in *Isaiah 54:1).

In these traditions, the repeated fulfillment of the prayers of the childless points to the ultimate restoration of the people and Land of Israel (Pesikta de Rav Kahana 20.1).

The theme of forced divorce in cases of infertility appears in modern Yiddish and Hebrew *literature by authors such as I. B. Singer and Devorah Baron and is the focus of the Israeli *film Kadosh (directed by Amos Gitai, 1999); Yiddish writers sometimes invoked the trope of infertility as a metaphor for perceived Jewish passivity (I. L. Peretz).

Infertility is a growing human problem in twenty-first-century Jewish communities, partly because of later ages of marriage. All contemporary forms of *Judaism are supportive of most forms of reproductive technology, including in vitro fertilization. S. M. Kahn has documented how Orthodox Jews (see JUDAISM, ORTHODOX) in Israel have created collaborations among rabbis, doctors, and medical support staff to ensure that fertility treatments are conducted according to halakhah (Jewish law).

For further reading, see J. R. Baskin, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature (2002); J. Cohen, “Be Fertile and Increase, Fill the Earth and Master It”: The Ancient and Medieval Career of a Biblical Verse (1989); M. Gold, And Hannah Wept: Infertility, Adoption, and the Jewish Couple (1993); and S. M. Kahn, Reproducing Jews: A Cultural Account of Assisted Conception in Israel (2000); see also ETHICS: MEDICAL.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Inquisition, Spanish. The main concern of the Papal Inquisition, an intensive inquiry conducted outside the realm of normal legal procedure, was to discover and extirpate heretics within the Roman Catholic church. During the Middle Ages, temporary courts would be established in problematic locales to deal with suspected aberrations. The 1478 decision to request a Papal Bull and establish an inquisition in Spain (see SPAIN, CHRISTIAN) resulted from the forced conversion of tens of thousands of Jews beginning in 1391. Once baptized, these converts (conversos*) had the rights and privileges due all Christians; this turn of events and the subsequent social, vocational, and economic successes of many conversos resulted in hostility and suspicions toward former Jews. Although the church attempted to educate these converts, Spanish society did not accept them as faithful Catholics; this lack of acceptance was exemplified by the discriminatory purity of blood (limpieza de sangre) laws passed in Toledo in 1449 (which eventually were universally accepted throughout Iberia) and by the term “New Christians.”

The Spanish Inquisition was instituted in 1481 to discover and deal with conversos who were still loyal to Judaism. Its rationale was the presence of judaizers among the New Christians and their continued contacts with Jews. The first court was established in Seville, considered a hotbed of crypto-Jewish activity, and eventually twenty-one central and peripheral tribunals were set up throughout Castile and Aragon. By 1483, the National Suprema, or Council of the Supreme and General Inquisition, was established with Tomás de Torquemada as the Inquisitor General. A centralized bureaucracy was created in which each local court reported to the Suprema. Before the expulsion of Spain’s remaining Jewish population in 1492, the inquisitorial court had limited jurisdiction over Jews. It could only charge those suspected of blasphemy against Christianity or Christian beliefs, usury, proselytizing among Christians, magic, or sorcery, or those who aided or received relapsed Jewish converts to Christianity; technically, a Jew was forbidden to bear witness against a Christian. Between 1481 and 1550, the Inquisition mainly dealt with supposed crypto-Jews. Ninety-five percent of those tried during this stage were accused of judaizing; 1,500 of those convicted were burned at the stake. Unlike other temporal inquisitions, the Spanish Holy Tribunal, which coordinated inquisitorial activities, continued to function even after it had successfully dealt with this heresy. After 1550, it sought out other heretics, including Lutherans, Erasmian humanists, Christianized Moors, Moriscos, and pietists, and it also began to supervise the clergy.

Judaizers again became the main focus in the mid-seventeenth century, due to the arrival in Spain of numerous Portuguese conversos. Native Portuguese Jews, as well as Spanish exiles in *Portugal, had been forcibly converted to Catholicism in 1497, and the Portuguese Inquisition was established in 1536. When the two Iberian nations united in 1580 and borders were opened, numerous conversos who returned to Spain were suspect. Consequently, from 1630–1730, the Inquisition once again focused on judaizers, most of whom had Portuguese names; again, about 95% of those tried at this time were accused of judaizing and 250 were burned at the stake.

Technically only baptized Catholics were under the Inquisition’s jurisdiction; however, all the conversos and their descendants, whether judaizers or not, had been baptized. The Jewish world has traditionally defined those who were tried and convicted as *martyrs, because accusations of Jewish beliefs and practices led to their deaths. Some historians doubt the sincerity of the Inquisition’s motives, assuming that greed played a major role in its decision-making process. In fact, despite attempts to maintain uniformity, there were discrepancies in procedures over the years. For instance, the personality of a particular inquisitor or the make-up of a particular court might influence the outcome of a given trial; likewise, there were periods of religious fanaticism as well as periods of abatement that resulted in differing sentences for identical transgressions. Nevertheless, a study of court procedures reveals a sophisticated legal system striving for the utmost secrecy in order to conduct serious trials with a minimum of outside interference.

The Spanish Inquisition diverged from papal standards; before it began actual trials, the court declared a set grace period of one to three months during which confessions and testimonies were accepted. Although the Pope advocated unlimited accessibility to confession for every Catholic, the Spanish church believed this policy would impede the trial process. In addition, the prosecution withheld the names of witnesses from the defense to protect those witnesses. Lastly, although the Pope objected to including the testimony of “untrustworthy” servants, such testimony appears frequently in the Iberian records. The Spanish Inquisition was not officially abolished until the nineteenth century; it became the quintessential symbol of European religious intolerance and medieval ethnic *antisemitism. It continues to be a topic of interest in contemporary historical writing, literary works, and film.

For further reading, see E. Peters, Inquisition (1989); H. Beinart, Conversos on Trial (1981); W. Monter, Frontiers of Heresy (1990); and M. Giles, ed., Women in the Inquisition: Spain and the New World (1999).

RENÉE LEVINE MELAMMED

Intercalation: See CALENDAR; CALENDAR: MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

Interfaith Dialogue: United States. The relationship between the Jewish community and other communities of faith, especially Protestants and Catholics, has stood at the center of the American Jewish experience. Already in colonial times Jews encountered more welcoming brands of Christianity than they had in Europe, often because of these groups' more literal reading of the Hebrew *Bible/ Old Testament. Yet negative stereotypes and civil restrictions persisted, and Jews struggled throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to combat unfavorable images and gain full equality.

Interfaith dialogue, which began in the latter decades of the nineteenth century, helped Jews bring about fundamental changes in the relationship between the Jewish community and other religious groups. A special moment occurred in 1893, when the World Parliament of Religions (WPR) convened in *Chicago, bringing together representatives of Christianity, Judaism, and other faiths. The WPR offered Jewish religious leaders an opportunity to defend Judaism against what they considered to be unjustified views of the Jewish faith. Attempts at dialogue took a more organized form in the 1920s, when the rise of hate groups in America impelled Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish activists to establish a Committee on Good Will; the 1928 creation of the National Council of Christians and Jews was a further advance. Although many of the issues discussed were not spiritual or theological, rabbis generally represented the Jewish community in dialogue with representatives of other faiths. Simultaneously, similar attempts were taking place in other English-speaking countries. This early dialogue points to a more open and tolerant atmosphere in the English-speaking world, especially in comparison to the deteriorating situation of Jews in continental Europe during the period. However, while the interfaith dialogue in America progressed, the 1920s and 1930s also saw the rise of virulent *antisemitic expressions in America. A number of Christian groups and individuals joined in attacking Jews, blaming them for the nation's problems. These included Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen, such as the reactionary Protestant minister Gerald L. K. Smith and Father Charles Coughlin, a Catholic priest, who used his radio program as a vehicle to attack the Jews. During that precarious era, Jewish organizations institutionalized their involvement with interfaith relations, attempting to combat bigotry and improve relationships with other communities of faith.

For the most part, Jewish and non-Jewish participants in the dialogue have been representatives of liberal wings of their faith. Christian representatives in the dialogue were often sympathetic to Jewish feelings and opposed bigotry. However, mainstream churches in America still maintained that Judaism was not equal to Christianity and could not offer its members adequate moral guidelines and salvation for their souls. Not only conservative groups but also mainstream Christian churches continued their efforts at evangelizing Jews. In contrast, the Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr was an early proponent of an attitude that recognized Judaism as a legitimate religious tradition. Concluding in 1926 that Jews had high moral standards, Niebuhr militated against the propagation of the Christian gospel among the Jews (Reinhold Niebuhr, "The Rapprochement between Jews and Christians," Christian Century, January 7, 1926, 9–11). Until that time, most Protestant and Catholic theologians had followed the traditional Christian line, which claimed that, having rejected their *messiah, the Jews had lost their position as the chosen people and that God's promises to Israel were inherited by the Christian church. A number of Jewish thinkers also began to change their views on the relationship between Judaism and other faiths; few, however, followed Mordecai *Kaplan, who suggested that Jews give up their claim to be the *chosen people.

Interfaith relations burgeoned after *World War II. The spirit of tolerance created by the war, including the camaraderie that developed between Jewish and non-Jewish soldiers serving in the armed forces, as well as among Jewish, Protestant, and Catholic chaplains, helped change the relationships among the faith communities. The GI Bill helped hundreds of thousands of Jews obtain education and move to the middle class and the suburbs, a socioeconomic development that made Jews more acceptable to the white Christian elite. The Cold War also enhanced the atmosphere of interfaith reconciliation because the American struggle against *communism helped legitimize all varieties of religious expression, including Judaism. In the 1950s, Judaism became one of the three "public religions" in America. Dialogue between Jews and Christians intensified and took a variety of forms. The most remarkable interfaith activity took place in the context of the *civil rights movement, in which Jewish leaders and thinkers, including Abraham Joshua *Heschel, participated alongside Protestant and Catholic clergy in the struggle for civil rights for all Americans. Still, a sociological survey conducted at the initiative of the Anti-Defamation League in the early 1960s discovered that prejudices against Jews were still prevalent among the majority of Christians in America.

Interfaith relations in America improved in the wake of Vatican II, the Roman Catholic general council that convened between 1962 and 1965 and promoted reconciliation between the Roman Catholic Church and other faiths. Vatican II came out with an historical resolution on the relationship between Christians and Jews, asserting that "the Jews should not be presented as rejected or accused by God." This document also rejected the claim that the Jews as a people were responsible for the killing of Jesus. A number of American Protestant churches, as well as Christian ecumenical groups, followed Vatican II in issuing similar statements, often going much further theologically. Like their counterparts in Europe, American Christians were motivated, at least in part, by a sense of guilt over the historical role of Christian anti-Jewish accusations in contributing to the *Holocaust, the mass murder of Jews during World War II. Since the 1970s, a growing number of Protestant and Catholic theologians have come to characterize Judaism as a religious community in *covenant with *God, alongside Christianity. This outlook, which places Judaism on an equal spiritual and moral footing with Christianity, has become the province of Americans and other English-speaking countries more than of European and Third World Christians. The new climate of interfaith dialogue motivated a keen Christian attempt to eradicate prejudices and establish a new basis for a relationship among faiths.

In the 1960s and 1970s, Protestants and Catholics systematically examined textbooks used in their religious schools and removed passages that drew a negative portrait of the Jews. However, this effort does not mean that old accusations against Jews disappeared in Christian popular culture. Jews have continued to be portrayed as the slayers of Jesus or as the motivating cause behind his death in popular productions and films, such as The Passion of the Christ (2004). Yet the Catholic Church, as well as mainline Protestants churches, decided to shut down their missionary enterprises among Jews. Evangelizing the Jews remained the declared agenda of the more conservative Protestant churches that did not take part in the dialogue movement.

The atmosphere of reconciliation has developed further. An impressive development in recent decades has been the growing curiosity among Christian scholars about Jewish tradition, which is considered important because, among other things, it sheds light on the history of Christianity. Since the 1980s, *synagogues in America have become attractive to non-Jews, who in groups or as individuals have begun visiting Jewish services in relatively large numbers. Some have come at the invitation of Jewish friends, and others have come in search of a new community of faith. In the open market of religions in the first decade of the twenty-first century, Judaism has become an option that some American spiritual seekers, most of them from educated middle-class Christian backgrounds, have come to consider. *Conversions to and from Judaism as well as *intermarriages between Jews and non-Jews have also become common. Many Jews today share their lives with non-Jews, often maintaining Jewish or semi-Jewish households. Non-Jewish spouses often join synagogues. This new reality affects the relationship between Jews and Christians. For example, many mixed couples get married in ceremonies officiated by both Jewish and non-Jewish clergy.

Although interfaith relations in America have undergone huge transformations, Jewish observers have complained that old anti-Jewish sentiments have not been fully eradicated and have, at times, been replaced by anti-*Israel rhetoric. Since the 1970s, liberal Christian groups in America, including the National Council of Churches, have developed a strong commitment to movements of national liberation, viewing the Israelis as oppressors. Christian activists differ considerably in their relationship to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Although liberal theologians have been concerned about *Palestinian rights, conservative evangelicals have supported Israel ardently. Many evangelical Christians subscribe to a messianic hope in the second coming of Jesus and view the Jews as the object of biblical prophecies about the *messiah's arrival and Israel's restoration to its land.

Especially since the 1967 Six Day War, evangelical views of Israel have been very positive. At the same time, evangelical missions to the Jews have persisted and a movement consisting of Jews who have adopted evangelical Protestant beliefs while retaining a Jewish identity has emerged. Virtually all Jewish leaders object to evangelical missionary work but many Jews and evangelicals cooperated in supporting Israeli causes.

During the past forty years, interfaith relationships and dialogue in America have expanded to include Middle Eastern and Far Eastern religious communities. Establishing a good relationship with Muslims has become a major item on the Jewish interfaith agenda. For many Muslims, American Jews are associated with Israel, a country they often resent. However, in the wake of the September 11, 2001, attack on the World Trade Center, a number of Jewish leaders raised their voice against the vilification of *Islam and the harassment of Muslims. In contrast, Jewish American organizations have refrained from establishing relationships with new religious movements (NRMs), which they have viewed as "cults." However, non-mainstream Jewish leaders, such as Zalman Schachter, of the *Jewish Renewal movement, have been happy to dialogue with leaders of NRMs. Representing a Jewish movement of spiritual revival and return to tradition, Schachter and others have been interested in learning what attracts young Jews to alternative religious groups, as a means of revitalizing their own tradition.

Important books include Y. Ariel, Evangelizing the Chosen People (2000); M. Braybooke, A History of the Council of Christians and Jews (1991); H. Croner, ed., More Stepping Stones to Jewish Christian Relations, (1985); E. Feldman, Dual Doctrines: The Jewish Encounter with Protestant America (1990); A. Gilbert, The Vatican Council and the Jews (1968); and A. J. Rudin and M. R. Wilson, eds., A Time to Speak: The Evangelical Jewish Encounter (1987).

YAAKOV ARIEL

Intermarriage: Historical Perspectives. The classic biblical prohibition of Jewish-Gentile intermarriage is Deuteronomy 7:3-4: "You shall not intermarry with them: do not give your daughters to their sons or take their daughters for your sons. For they will turn your children away from me to worship other gods, and the Lord's anger will blaze forth against you and He will promptly wipe you out." As this statement makes clear, the primary motivation behind forbidding Israelite marriages with non-Israelites was the fear that the non-Israelite spouse would encourage worship of deities other than the Israelite God. This prohibition was strongly restated in the fifth century BCE, the period of return to *Jerusalem from the *Babylonian Exile. The leaders *Ezra and *Nehemiah insisted that Israelite men abandon their foreign wives and the children of those marriages as a sign of *repentance and allegiance to God (Ezra 10; Neh 13).

During the rabbinic period, the principle of matrilineal descent was established, according to which only the child of a Jewish mother was considered a Jew. Although there was dissent, with some rabbis ruling the child of a Jewish father and a Gentile mother Jewish, and others who considered the child of a Jewish mother and a Gentile father Gentile, this principle was nearly universally accepted until 1983 when the *Reform movement declared that, for Reform Jews, Jewish commitment and a Jewish upbringing, regardless of the *gender of the Jewish parent, determined the Jewishness of a child in an intermarried household.

Recent research includes S. D. Cohen, The Beginnings of Jewishness (1999).

KEREN MCGINITY

Intermarriage: Modern Europe and United States. Intermarriage, a *marriage between a Jew and a non-Jew, is a feature of modernity. Before the invention of the concept of civil marriage in the modern era, all marriages were conducted under religious auspices, and intermarriage in the technical sense did not take place. If Jews converted to Christianity, they could, as Christians, marry other Christians, and the reverse was also true, but such marriages were not intermarriages. Only when civil marriage made it possible for Jews and Christians to marry could intermarriage proper take place (see CONVERSION: EARLY MODERN PERIOD).

The earliest public discussion of intermarriage and its relationship to the process of assimilation and integration into the larger society took place in 1806 when Emperor Napoleon of France convened the Assembly of Notables and asked the rabbis and Jewish lay leaders who assembled in Paris to answer twelve questions. Their answers became the guiding principles of a recently emancipated French Jewry. The questions were designed to prompt Jewish leaders to assert that they identified as Frenchmen and regarded French law as primary over Jewish law (see HALAKHAH). Question three inquired if Jewish law permitted Jews to marry Christians, a form of marriage recently made possible by the introduction of civil marriage in France. Seeking the full assimilation of Jews, Napoleon wanted Jewish leaders to advocate intermarriage, but they refused to do so. Although they noted that Jews who intermarried would remain Jews and that their marriages would be valid under civil law, French Jewish leaders announced that they would not perform or encourage intermarriage. They advocated acculturation, but they drew the line at total assimilation.

In the nineteenth century, intermarriage between Jews and non-Jews was rare. Jews in Western and Central Europe acculturated, adopting the culture and lifestyles of the societies in which they lived, but they nevertheless socialized with other Jews, with whom they shared business, family, and communal ties. The widespread practice of arranged marriage in the Jewish middle classes virtually guaranteed that Jews married other Jews. So, too, did the laws in countries like Habsburg Austria, which permitted civil marriage but not civil intermarriage. In Austria a Jew could not marry a non-Jew unless one of them converted to the religion of the other or to a neutral category, "without religion," a step that inhibited intermarriage. In Eastern Europe, where most Jews remained enmeshed in the traditional Jewish community, intermarriage was unknown. In the United States, most Jews were recent immigrants from traditional backgrounds who almost never married outside the Jewish community.

Intermarriage grew in significance only in the twentieth century as a result of the spread of civil marriage, widespread assimilation, and the decline of antisemitism. In the newly created Soviet Union, for example, the introduction of civil marriage, governmental suppression of religious institutions, and pressure to assimilate led to growing rates of intermarriage between Jews and non-Jews. By the 1930s, about a quarter of those Soviet Jews who married, married Gentiles. Weimar Germany also witnessed a rapid growth in intermarriage, probably caused by the decline of arranged marriage and the new practice of marrying for love. By 1930, about 25% of German Jews who married, married a non-Jew; the rate was about 33% in the larger cities. In the United States, however, Jews were still close to their immigrant origins, and thus, despite rapid Americanization, intermarriage rates remained insignificant before World War II. Only after several generations of Americanization did Jews begin to marry non-Jews in substantial numbers. In the 1970s, about 25% of Jews who married, married non-Jews. By the 1990s, that figure had doubled to 52%, although it remained lower in cities with large Jewish populations.

Jewish communities in Europe, as in America, have long opposed intermarriage. Before World War II, most Jews who intermarried did not raise their children as Jews. In the post-war years, Jewish leaders, concerned about Jewish survival, tried to develop strategies both to discourage intermarriage and to encourage those who intermarried to remain Jews. More recently, many Jews who intermarry continue to identify as Jews and raise their children as such, although this presents problems in Jewish law when the non-Jewish parent is the mother. Although Orthodox and Conservative rabbis do not perform intermarriages, some Reform rabbis do so in the hope that intermarried couples will raise Jewish children (see DEMOGRAPHY).

For further reading, see Z. Gitelman, A Century of Ambivalence: The Jews of Russia and the Soviet Union, 1881 to the Present (1988); and M. Kaplan, The Making of the Jewish Middle Class: Women, Family and Identity in Imperial Germany (1991).

MARSHA L. ROZENBLIT

Intermarriage: Twenty-First-Century United States. The rising rates of intermarriage in twentieth- and early-twenty-first-century America seem, on the surface, to indicate the inevitability of total Jewish assimilation. Before 1940, the rate of Jews married to non-Jews was estimated to be between 2 and 3.2%; this rate doubled to approximately 6% between 1941 and 1960. It rose to 28% between 1970 and 1979 and then from 38% between 1980 and 1984 to 43% between 1985 and 1995. The proportion of intermarriage reached an all-time high of 52% according to the 2001 National Jewish Population Survey, the last year for which statistics are available (see UNITED STATES: DEMOGRAPHY).

Before the 1970s, most Jews who married non-Jews were men; in recent decades, Jewish women have married non-Jews at a rate nearly equal to that of Jewish men. Thus, the openness of American culture has also enabled Jewish women to blend into the mainstream, should they choose to do so. Research indicates that the parent's gender plays a significant role in decisions to raise the offspring of an intermarriage as Jews. Intermarried Jewish women are far more likely than Jewish men to maintain religious and social ties to the Jewish community and to incorporate Jewish activities and Jewish education into their children's lives (Barack Fishman). This reconciliation between the selection of a Gentile husband and the maintenance of a Jewish self may reflect twentieth-century social changes that have empowered American women in terms of education, vocational options, and political rights. These transformations have also resulted in women's increased personal power within their most intimate relationships and may explain why Jewish women in intermarriages have increasingly asserted their Jewishness and a commitment to raise Jewish children (McGinity).

For further reading, see S. Barack Fishman, Double or Nothing: Jewish Families and Mixed Marriage (2004); E. Mayer, Love & Tradition: Marriages between Jews and Christians (1985); and K. R. McGinity, Still Jewish: A History of Women and Intermarriage in America (2009).

KEREN R. MCGINITY

Internet. It is all but impossible to determine when material with Jewish content was first posted on the internet. In addition to Jewish-oriented material on various online bulletin boards, which began their postings and discussions during the late 1980s, usenet groups such as soc.culture.jewish, began providing contributors and readers with serious reading lists and often incisive discussions during the early 1990s. These lists have continued to grow. Additionally, the Lubavitch *Hasidim, also known as *Habad, staked out an early presence on the internet thanks to the activities of Rabbi Yosef Kazen. Kazen was one of the first to post digitized versions of traditional Jewish texts online, doing so as early as the late 1980s.

With the advent of the World Wide Web in the early 1990s, the amount of material on the internet grew at an exponential pace. Specifically Jewish material grew as well, and aggregators of Jewish websites began to appear. These included Andrew Tannenbaum's "Judaism and Jewish Resources" site, which began in 1993 with less than ten links. By 2009, there were millions of Jewish-related sites, with denominational, commercial, educational, periodical, and personal content. Spanning an incredibly wide range, these sites deal with virtually any and every topic that can be connected to Judaism, ranging from the digital publication of many traditional texts to all manner of popular culture phenomena and everything in between. This material comes from a vast number of different locations, although most originate in *Israel and the *United States.

Specifically Jewish responses to internet use have varied according to community. From its inception, the vast majority of individual Jews have used the internet without reservation, but also without any ethnic or religious intent. However, Ultra-Orthodox Jews, also known as *Haredim, have taken issue with what they consider to be invasive issues mostly related to modesty. As a result, the Haredi community has taken steps to deal with the burgeoning use of the internet among its constituents. In early 2000, a group of prominent Haredi rabbis in Israel representing Hasidic, Lithuanian, *Sefardic, and *Mizrahi precincts, issued a ban on use of the internet. They argued, "The Internet is a danger 1,000 times greater [than television, which was banned in the 1970s], and is liable to bring ruin and destruction upon all of Israel." In spite of this most daunting claim, the rabbis did manage to issue a dispensation for business use, a fact that clearly underscores the understanding that the internet is an indispensable tool. However, the rabbis specifically noted in their halakhic document that even if the internet was required for business, it should, under no circumstances, be available in the home.

As the ability to control internet content via filters became more advanced, Haredim began to make use of a variety of such technologies, some of which were created for other religious fundamentalist groups that feared the open, uncensored universe of the internet, and others that were created specifically for themselves. Technologies created specifically for Haredi internet use included companies such as Yeshiv-anet, which, as an Ultra-Orthodox internet service provider (ISP), required customers to submit URLs (web addresses) to their staff to determine whether the site was morally acceptable before they would be given access to it. However, the vast majority of Haredi internet users tended toward the use of filtering companies, such as TheJnet.com, Koshernet.com in America, and the Rimon ISP in Israel. As use of the internet became indispensable for business and personal communications, certain Ultra-Orthodox courts, the Belz Hasidim among them, relented and, realizing that their adherents were using the internet regardless, decided to permit its use under strict supervision. One of the significant issues troubling the Ultra-Orthodox is the anonymity provided by the internet. This anonymity has resulted in a number of bulletin board discussion groups and blogs that openly deal with issues that Haredi communities would prefer to deal with privately or not at all.

Another precinct wherein Jewishness plays a role is in online virtual reality games. Second Life, which has millions of players, is the largest of these games in which players create an "avatar," or game piece, and interact in a world of their own invention. Second Life has multiple *synagogues, Jewish *museums, and many Jewish activities that its players engage on many levels.

Just as numerous aspects of human life have migrated in some way to the internet, *antisemitic websites can also be found there. Their presence became evident early in the twenty-first century on Google, a popular search engine, when the top result for the word "Jew" turned out to be Jewwatch.com, a notoriously antisemitic website. Concerned about these results, Google currently posts a notice that says, "We're disturbed about these results as well. Please read our note here." This link leads to an "offensive search results" document that explains how Google's search algorithms result in a large number of antisemitic results. To counter this problem, the website Jewschool.com organized a "google-bombing" of the Wikipedia entry for "Jew" in 2004. This was a grassroots movement that placed links to the Wikipedia entry on a large number of websites, causing it to outnumber the antisemitic sites and take the top spot in Google's search results. As the internet continues to grow at an exponential rate, it can be anticipated that the amount of Jewish material will also continue to expand.

EDDY PORTNOY

Iran. Jewish communities existed in Iran before the Arab Muslim conquest of the seventh century CE. Between 637–644 the heartland of Iran (*Persia) was slowly incorporated into the emerging Islamic hegemony over the Middle East, and *Islam replaced Zoroastrianism as the official state religion. The jurists of Islam developed the legal concept of dhimma (protection) for adherents of monotheistic faiths other than Islam. Jews were among these dhimmi*, "protected people," within the dominant Islamic system. They could practice their religion and preserve their identity as separate social and legal entities, albeit with certain restrictions.

Nevertheless, the history of the Jews of Iran is one of suppression, harassment, and persecution, interspersed with periods of tolerance and well-being. Jews and Muslims lived in distinct and separated communities. Jews earned a living as merchants, artisans, agriculturalists, weavers, and dyers, among other occupations associated with the medieval Islamic world. Increased urbanization and international trade during Arab Abbasid rule (758–1258), centered in Baghdad (see *IRAQ), led to the emergence of wealthy Jewish merchants in Iranian cities such as Ahvaz, Shiraz, Rayy, and Ardabil (Levy). By the tenth century, Jews lived in virtually every Iranian city. Under the Safavid dynasty (1501–1731), Shi'i Islam became the state religion. There was a prolonged period of intolerance (Shi'ism stresses Muslim purity vis-à-vis non-Muslim impurity), and Jews were isolated from Sunni countries and the centers of *Torah study, especially Baghdad.

There is a dearth of Jewish historical sources about the community in Iran. A seventeenth-century versified history by Baba'i ben Lotf of Kashan details the tribulations of the Jewish communities during the years 1613–60; an addendum adds information about the Jews of Kashan and Isfahan between 1729–30. It seems that, from the fourteenth century onward, Jews were an increasingly impoverished community. Iranian Jewish oral tradition transmits the vulnerability and miserable circumstances of the Jews in Iran, especially in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries when the majority Shi'i culture was also in decline. At that time Jews were artisans, craftsmen, small-scale merchants, and wine makers; they also bought and sold all sorts of items and made and sold medicine and magic. Jewish women had access to households of the elite and specialized in selling potions to women.

The isolation of the Iranian Jewish community persisted until the political, social, and educational changes of the early twentieth century. Jews participated in the Constitutional Revolution of 1906. The *Alliance Israélite Universelle, which established modern Jewish educational facilities throughout the Middle East, opened a school in Tehran in 1898. The following year, a school for girls was established, as were evening classes for adults. Alliance schools were also opened in the cities of Hamadan and Shiraz. Jews were allowed to attend government schools established in the 1920s by the government of Reza Shah Pahlavi (1925–41). This shah opened the doors of society to Jews, and the government hired Jews with language skills and education in the expanding economy under the second Pahlavi shah (1941–79). At that time, the Jewish community had its own schools and social and cultural organizations, and religious life flourished. Courses in the Hebrew language were offered, cultural contacts with *Israel increased, and Israeli scholars were invited to lecture in synagogues in Iran. However, although many in the Jewish community prospered, the majority continued to live in miserable conditions; their main occupation was peddling.

The culture of Persian Jews was similar to the culture of Muslim Persians. Jewish women tended to be veiled, and there was separation of the sexes. During the Pahlavi age, modernized Jews became as differentiated from the bulk of the population as were westernized Muslims. In the Islamic Republic, established in 1979, the situation of the remaining Jewish community in Iran is once again highly problematic (see also JUDEO-PERSIAN).

Recent research includes P. Banooni and S. Simnegar, "History of Jews in Iran: 1500-Present," Teruā: The History of Contemporary Iranian Jews, Center for Iranian Jewish Oral History 1 (1996): 13–43; H. Levy, Comprehensive History of The Jews of Iran: The Outset of the Diaspora (1999); D. Menashri, Education and the Making of Modern Iran (1992); V. B. Moreen, Iranian Jewry's Hour of Peril and Heroism: A Study of Babai ibn Lutf's Chronicle 1617–1662 (1987); and H. Sarshar, ed., Esther's Children: A Portrait of Iranian Jews (2002). Map 5

RIVANNE SANDLER

Iraq. Iraq was the location of a large Jewish community from the time of the Babylonian Exile in the sixth century BCE. Founded by the second 'Abbāsīd Caliph al-Manṣūr in the mid-eighth century CE as the Babylonian Empire's capital city, Baghdad—the capital of present-day Iraq—became the main crossroads for connecting trade routes and the political and cultural center of the Muslim world. Under the law of dhimma (protection for subjects who adhere to monotheistic faiths other than Islam), Jews could practice their religion and preserve their identity as a separate social and legal entity, with certain restrictions. However, the experience of the Jewish minority was variable and highly dependent on the tolerance of the authorities and on the material and political circumstances of the Muslim majority.

Jews participated in the burgeoning urban and commercial life of the empire. A Jewish consortium in Baghdad in the early tenth century provided the 'Abbasid rulers with loans and other banking and mercantile services. Arab chronicles describe the vital services of these merchant-bankers. Jews pursued a broad range of occupations; many were merchants, artisans, agriculturalists, physicians, and government clerks. By the tenth century Arabic was the shared vernacular of Muslims and Jews.

Jewish intellectual life in Abbasid Iraq continued trends developed in earlier times. The Jewish Babylonian academies of Sura and Pumbedita moved to Baghdad in the late ninth century, and Baghdad became an important political and intellectual center for world Jewry. Responsa (legal opinions in response to written questions) were issued from Baghdad based on the customs and traditions of Baghdadi Jews. A fundamentally conservative community, the Jews of Baghdad passed on family traditions and communal customs from generation to generation. The Jewish quarter provided all the necessities of Jewish life.

The Jewish community suffered along with the majority population when the Mongols destroyed the Arab caliphate and much of Baghdad in 1258. By the first half of the fourteenth century the Jewish community in Baghdad was no longer a thriving community, and it experienced the general stagnation of subsequent centuries that affected both Muslims and non-Muslims.

Modernization and exposure to European culture came to the Baghdadi Jewish community when the first school of the *Alliance Israélite Universelle opened in December 1864. It offered coeducational training in language and skills that prepared Jews to meet the needs of the civil service and economy during the British Mandate in Iraq (1921–32). Educated Jews applied for posts of clerks and senior officers requiring knowledge of both Arabic and English. Many Jews were employed in the postal service, railroads, ports, customs, banking, and courts. The community prospered and underwent change. European dress gradually replaced traditional clothing, and modern Jewish women did not cover their faces in the street.

However, whether the authorities were Persians, Arabs, Mongols, or Turks, or even the more benign British who took over from the Turks in 1917, the Jewish community was vulnerable. In post-1932 independent Iraq there was a developing chasm between Jews and Muslims. *Zionist activities both inside and outside Iraq were viewed as problematic both by members of the Iraqi Jewish community and the authorities. *Nazi activity in Baghdad and Arab nationalism fueled the 1941 anti-Jewish *pogrom (farhud). The majority of Iraqi Jews were airlifted to *Israel during 1950–51.

For further reading, see J. Kraemer, Humanism in the Renaissance of Islam: The Cultural Revival during the Buyid Age (1986), 75–89; and G. S. Golany, Babylonian Jewish Neighbourhood and Home Design (1999). Map 5 RIVANNE SANDLER

Isaac was the second patriarch, second son of *Abraham and only son of *Sarah, husband of *Rebekah, and father of *Esau and *Jacob (*Genesis, mainly 21–2, 25:19–27). Isaac was born in accordance with God's promise to Abraham (18:10), when Abraham was one hundred years old and Sarah was ninety years old. Isaac plays a passive role in several crucial events in his life, particularly when God tests Abraham's faith by ordering him to sacrifice "his beloved son" (22:2). Isaac is also comforted after his mother's death when Abraham obtains Rebekah for him as a wife (24). Later in his life, Isaac misunderstands the divine plan for Abraham's descendants by preferring his older son Esau over the younger twin, Jacob (25:28). However, Jacob and Rebekah deceive the old and blind Isaac to obtain the blessing of the firstborn for Jacob (27:19). Isaac's weakness has led some modern interpreters to suggest that the three major figures among the patriarchs and matriarchs are Abraham, Rebekah, and Jacob. MOSHE RACHMUTH

Isaac the Blind (c. 1160–1235), also known as Sagi Nahor (*Aramaic, "full of light") was a prominent early *kabbalist in southern *France and the first scholar known by name to devote himself fully to mystical studies. He was the son of the talmudist Abraham b. David of Posquières (Rabad); little is known about his life or the extent of his blindness, but elements of his thought have been derived from his surviving writings and from traditions preserved by his disciples and their students. Isaac's extant works include a commentary on Sefer Yetzirah and fragments on communion with God (devekut), intention (kavannah*) in prayer, and mystical meanings of light and colors. His commentary on Sefer Yetzirah presents a complex and original vision of three levels within the Divine (ein sof* [infinity], maḥashavah [thought], and dibbur [speech]). The sefirot* flow from the latter two and through dibbur constitute and animate the created world. Contemplation, through *Torah study and prayer, enables human beings to communicate with the upper realms. For further reading, see J. Dan and R. Keiner, The Early Kabbalah (1986). JUDITH R. BASKIN

Isaiah is the first of the three major prophetic books (see BIBLE: PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; PROPHETS [NEVI'IM]) and one of the most popular books in later *Judaism. It is cited more than any other prophetic text in *rabbinic literature, and more synagogue readings (haftarot) are taken from Isaiah than from any other prophetic book, even though other prophetic books (*Jeremiah and *Kings) are longer. The book, which has sixty-six chapters, is a composite document, made up of contributions from several sources and time periods.

Chapters 1–39 are largely the product of Isaiah, son of Amotz, a prophet who lived in *Jerusalem during the eighth century BCE. Many modern scholars regard substantial sections of 1–39 as the product of scribes working as late as the *Persian and *Hellenistic periods. These scholars, however, take well-structured poems that make sense as they stand and divide them into a series of nearly unreadable fragments. In fact, most of these chapters can be understood in an eighth-century context, and only a few sections need to be dated later than the eighth century: Chapters 13–14 were reworked by scribes in the sixth century or later; 24–27 were added in the post-exilic era and reflect the beginnings of an apocalyptic worldview; 34–35 belong to the same corpus as 40–66 (see the later discussion); and 36–39 contain narratives about Isaiah and are similar though not identical to 2 Kings 18–22.

Isaiah's central idea is that only YHWH can be exalted; any attempt by earthly beings to achieve greatness constitutes a sin and will be corrected. Almost all the offenses criticized by Isaiah attest to this central idea. Isaiah objects to the creation of large agricultural estates in eighth-century *Judah and *Israel that impoverish small farmers and enrich wealthy landowners. The injustice resulting from the economic chasm between rich and poor is one of Isaiah's main concerns (1, 5, 10). Similarly, he objects to the creation of empires by *Egypt and *Assyria (although he sees Assyria as having a divinely ordained role to punish the errant Israelites); these empires were the geopolitical equivalent of the vast estates of the aristocrats. Isaiah's dislike for anything overweening extends as far as his condemnation of tall trees and large ships (ch. 2); in the perfect future, God's own mountain (the *Temple Mount) would be raised up so that it alone was elevated. Isaiah criticizes the abundant *sacrifices brought by the wealthy (ch. 1); although he is not opposed to sacrificial *worship as such, he regards the ostentatious offerings of the wealthy as ridiculous, because these offerings exemplify the hubris at the root of all sin. Human self-aggrandizement is most obvious in idolatry when people turn away from the one true deity to worship one supposedly manifest in an object fashioned by human hands.

Isaiah bitterly criticizes the Judeans, especially the wealthy, and predicts that they will undergo catastrophe. Nonetheless, he does not predict the nation's end: A remnant will endure and return to God. This remnant will include the city of Jerusalem, which Isaiah regards as inviolable; he predicts (wrongly, it turned out) that Jerusalem will be surrounded by foreign armies sent by God to punish Judah, but will never be conquered. Isaiah expects an era of universal peace to emerge, probably within the near future: All nations, including the Assyrians and Egyptians, will recognize the one true God and worship Him at altars in their own land. Great empires, now reduced to their proper size, will enjoy their own covenantal relationships with YHWH, much like the Israelites already did (ch. 19). Distinct ethnicities will not disappear in this future; indeed, tensions among nations might persist, but they will not be solved through violent conflict. Rather, nations will seek arbitration from YHWH at his Temple in Jerusalem, as a result of which warfare will disappear (2:1–4). The Judean king, a descendant of *David, will rule all Israel in perfect justice, issuing divine rulings to the nations and to Israel (ch. 9, 11). From this set of ideas, later Judaism would construct the idea of the *messiah and the messianic era.

Chapters 40–66 represent a different voice. As early as the Middle Ages, Abraham *ibn Ezra recognized that chapters 40 and following were written by a Judean exile in *Mesopotamia in the sixth century BCE, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. Similarly, Samuel David *Luzzato, who lived during the nineteenth century, maintained that chapters 40–66 were addressed to the Judean exiles in *Babylonia and were not published until some time after 586 BCE (although Luzzato maintained that the eighth-century Isaiah had written them). All modern scholars share ibn Ezra's perspective and believe that chapters 40–66 (and also 34–35) were composed during and after the *Babylonian Exile in the sixth century. Many regard chapters 40–55 (or, according to a more likely theory, 40–53) as having been written by a single prophet in the Babylonian Exile in the 530s BCE. For want of any other name, scholars refer to this prophet as Deutero-Isaiah or Second Isaiah. According to these scholars, chapters 56–66 (or, more likely, 54–56) were written by another prophet (called Trito-Isaiah or Third Isaiah) or a group of prophets, who lived a generation or two later in the Land of Israel. However, because a single poetic style and theology run through all these chapters, it is likely that all of 40–66 and also 34–35 were written by a single prophet who lived in the Babylonian Exile and who returned to the Land of Israel as soon as the Persian emperor Cyrus, who conquered Babylon in 539 BCE, allowed the Judean exiles to return (PERSIA, ANCIENT).

These chapters address a people who has experienced catastrophic losses – of land, *Temple, and king. The prophet reassures Judeans that the God of Israel is still powerful; this deity alone created the world and brings *redemption. The prophet refers to God using both masculine and feminine metaphors (42:13–14, 45:10, 49:14–15, and 66:13). Deutero-Isaiah anticipates a new era without looking forward to the renewal of the Davidic monarchy in the rebuilt Jerusalem: This prophet believes in a messianic era, but not in a personal messiah. In the early chapters of this corpus, Deutero-Isaiah predicts that the return to Zion under Cyrus will be accompanied by the arrival of an era of universal peace and recognition of Israel's God by all nations. In fact, the restoration did not have far-reaching effects. Judah became a relatively poor and insignificant province under Persian rule, not an independent kingdom that was the center of all humanity worshipping the one God. Few exiles availed themselves of the opportunity to return to Zion. Peace did not become the world's norm. Deutero-Isaiah continues to predict in chapters 49 and following that a larger scale ingathering of exiles will take place eventually and that the era of universal peace and monotheism will ultimately arrive.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Ishmael is *Abraham's firstborn son; his mother is *Hagar, *Sarah's Egyptian maidservant (Gen 16). After the birth of her son *Isaac, Sarah demands that Abraham expel Ishmael and his mother (Gen 21:9) to protect Isaac's inheritance. God advises the distraught Abraham to agree to Sarah's wishes and promises that Ishmael, too, will become a great nation (21:13). God sustains Hagar and Ishmael in the wilderness of Paran (21:17–20) and his mother arranges a marriage for him with an Egyptian woman (21:21). When Abraham dies, Ishmael and Isaac bury him in the cave of Machpelah (25:9); Ishmael's descendants are listed in Genesis 25:12–18; he is seen in Jewish and Muslim traditions as the father of the Arab people. This identification first appears in Jubilees 20:13 (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA).

RABBINIC TRADITIONS: Rabbinic literature portrays Ishmael as a beloved yet displaced offspring, *Isaac's sibling rival, and the Arab forefather of robbers who engage in sinful behavior. He is depicted both specifically as Isaac's adversary and more generally and generically as Israel's "other." A few *tannaitic and *amoraic sources characterize Ishmael's descendants as Arab; however, more often, he and his descendants are depicted as Israel's imagined antipode, much like *Esau and the children of Keturah, the wife of Abraham's old age.

Rabbinic *aggadah of the *amoraic period attests less to a sibling conflict (Genesis Rabbah 55:4 and 56:4 [see MIDRASH]) than an affirmation that the *covenant is maintained through Isaac, not Ishmael (Genesis Rabbah 46:2 and 47:5). For example, Genesis Rabbah 53:12 unequivocally states that Abraham's seed will be through Isaac. Furthermore, especially in amoraic literature, Ishmael is paired with Esau. To reiterate the chosen stature of Israel/*Jacob, both Ishmael and Esau are deemed unworthy issue (e.g., Sifre Deuteronomy 312 and 343; Genesis Rabbah 67:13; and BT Ta'anit 10b; see also BT Shabbat 145b; BT Pesahim 56a and 119b; and BT Bava Kamma 92b). The figure of Esau generally symbolizes *Rome (both imperial and Christian) or is portrayed as Jacob's nemesis throughout rabbinic literature but the elusive figure of Ishmael is multivalent (with the exception of some tannaitic and amoraic material [Genesis Rabbah 2:3, 66:4, 67:13; Leviticus Rabbah 36:5]). In Genesis Rabbah 53:12, Ishmael is said to represent anyone who does not believe in the world to come (see AFTERLIFE); in this way, the midrash emphasizes the covenantal primacy of Isaac by depicting Isaac and Ishmael as metaphors for orthodox and unorthodox theological tenets.

Since the medieval period, Ishmael has often, but not exclusively, symbolized *Islam. As Islam emerged as a hegemonic power in the Near East, the Rabbis drew on long-standing traditions associating Ishmaelites with Arabs and used Ishmael metonymically to refer to Islam. When Islam's genealogical and theological contentions became more widespread, it is reasonable to assume that rabbinic exegetes addressed these challenging socio-political and religious matters in much the same way as they had confronted foreign rule in the past. References to Ishmael after the rise of Islam, however, are not always about the Arabs or Islamic rule. As with rabbinic invocations of any biblical figure, each reference must be understood contextually, in light of philological, cultural, and historical concerns – that is, with textual and extratextual factors in mind. Thus, the diverse ways in which Ishmael appears in rabbinic literature strongly indicate that the Rabbis did not systematically set out to use him for one purpose. Although his marginal status is implicitly recognized, he is neither embraced nor disavowed. In many instances Ishmael represents non-Jews in general and is portrayed negatively, yet his treatment as a member of Abraham's household also yields neutral and positive depictions. For further reading, see C. Bakhos, Ishmael on the Border: Rabbinic Portrayals of the First Arab (2006).

CAROL BAKHOS

Islam and Judaism. Islam emerged in the *Arabian peninsula in the early seventh century CE. Islamic tradition teaches that the Prophet Muhammad (570–632 CE) brought "the [true] religion in God's eyes" (Qur'an 3:19) to the Arabs in the form of divine revelations conveyed to him over a twenty-two-year period by the angel Gabriel (Jibrīl), who appeared to Muhammad from time to time when he fell into a trance. These revelations, memorized by early believers known as the Prophet's "Companions," were collected into a scripture during the century after his death in 632 CE. That scripture calls itself the Qur'an (Q.2:185) and specifies the name of the new religion as Islam (Q.3:19). The name of the deity Allah (Q.1:1), like its biblical cognate Elohim, means simply "God." The word "Islam," from the Semitic root s-l-m common to Arabic, *Hebrew, and *Aramaic (meaning "whole, complete, entire"), connotes wholehearted surrender or submission to God's will. The word qur'an, likewise from a root common to all three languages, means literally "recitation" or "proclamation" of God's word (cf. the Bible's use of the identical Hebrew root k-r-' in *Isaiah 40:6).

From the inception of Islam in the early seventh century, Muslims and Jews have enjoyed varying degrees of interaction and cross-fertilization. Extensive parallels between the core beliefs and practices of Judaism and Islam are evident both in the Qur'an itself and in the oral ḥadīth traditions that evolved to supplement the Muslim scripture. This is especially true of the "five pillars of Islam": daily declaration of strict monotheism, daily prayer at set times, giving of charity, fasting in repentance, and observance of pilgrimage. After Muhammad's death, his revelations were collected and edited into the Qur'an, and oral traditions evolved rapidly as the new religion spread eastward from *Arabia to *Syria, *Iraq, and *Iran and westward through *Egypt to the *North African region known as al-Maghrib ("the West"). Later, throughout the period that historians dubbed the European "Dark Ages," most of the world's Jews lived under the hegemony of Islam; thus, Jewish scholars from the tenth to thirteenth centuries, including luminaries like *Saadia Gaon, Judah *Halevi, Abraham *ibn Ezra, *Maimonides, and *Nahmanides, participated in what was then arguably the world's most flourishing culture. Medieval Islamic *medicine, philosophy, and language arts left an imprint on intellectual and spiritual developments within Judaism, especially in the fields of Hebrew *grammar, Hebrew *poetry, *thought, and *mysticism.

In Muhammad's day, numerous religious groups inhabited the Arabian peninsula. These groups included pagan Arabs, for whom Mecca with its sacred Ka'ba shrine was the focal point of an annual pilgrimage; Arabic-speaking Jews (based 200 miles to the north in the city of Yathrib, later to be renamed Medina, but founded by Jews centuries earlier), and Christians (centered in Najran, 375 miles south of Mecca on the border with *Yemen). The concept of monotheism was not unknown in pre-Islamic Arabia, and Islam, like Judaism, explicitly rejects the Christian doctrine of the trinity (Q.4:171). Muhammad himself, whom the Qur'an portrays as "unlettered" (Q.7:157), may have absorbed Jewish and Christian religious folklore from oral traditions circulating in Arabia. The Qur'an names most of the major figures in the *Hebrew Bible and *New Testament, from *Adam and *Noah in Genesis, through the Hebrew patriarchs and Israelite *prophets, to John the Baptist, the Virgin Mary, and Jesus Christ – identifying all but Mary (the sole woman mentioned by name in the Qur'an) as prophets. In addition to Jews and Christians, the Qur'an also specifies Zoroastrians ("Magians," Q.22:17) and "Sabians" (Q.2:62, a group still unidentified by scholars) as ahl-al-kitāb, "People of the Book" (Q.3:199), to whom God had sent earlier revelations – in particular the *Torah (tawrah) and the Christian Gospel (injīl from Gk. Evangelion; Q.3:3). The Qur'an makes clear that ahl-al-kitāb are not subject to forcible conversion, but enjoy the protected (albeit inferior) legal status of dhimmi*, so long as they pay a special poll tax called jizya ("tribute") "until they are utterly subdued" (Q.9:29).

The Qur'an explicitly endorses the major doctrines of earlier scriptural religions (Judaism, Christianity, and Zoroastrianism), including divine creation, revelation, and salvation, and it appropriates for Muslims (Q.3:110) the doctrine of election or "chosen peoplehood" – which the Torah bestows on the Israelites (Deut 7:7) and the *New Testament on Christians (1 Peter 2:9). Other doctrines adopted by Islam include (from Judaism) predestination, the day of judgment (Arabic yawm al-din from Hebrew yom ha-din) and divine retribution (reward and punishment), and (from Zoroastrianism via Christianity) eternal life spent either in paradise (Gk. paradeisos from Persian pairidaeza, "garden"; Arabic jannat-'adn, "Garden of Eden," from Hebrew gan-'eden), or burning in hell (Greek gehenna and Arabic jahannum from Hebrew gehinnom). Doctrines rejected by Islam include the Jewish teaching that the gift of prophecy ended with the prophet Malachi in the fourth century BCE (which led the Jews, contrary to Muhammad's initial expectations, to deny his prophethood) and the Christian teaching that Jesus of Nazareth was the long-awaited Jewish "messiah" (Hebrew, mashiah; Arabic masih). The Qur'an (Q.3:45) specifies that one name of Jesus is masih, but the name lacks the theological significance of the Hebrew term mashiah. In addition, Muslims (like Jews) reject the Christian belief in Jesus as the begotten "son of God" (Q.112:1–4) and sole savior of humankind; however, unlike Jews, Muslims do acknowledge him as a prophet. Two new doctrines propounded in the Qur'an are the divine appointment of Muhammad as both nabi (the Biblical Hebrew term for prophet) and rasul (translating apostolos [messenger], the New Testament Greek term for the twelve disciples of Jesus who preached his message) and the Qur'an's status as the sole authentic text of al-Kitab, God's "Book," which by definition supersedes the earlier revealed scriptural texts "corrupted" by Jews and Christians alike.

The Qur'an adopts (mostly by brief references) many biblical stories, including the six days of creation, the *Flood, and the near-sacrifice of *Abraham's son *Isaac (Gen 22); however, the Qur'an's version of the last episode (Q.37:101ff) omits the son's name (even though it names Isaac frequently elsewhere). Hence, most Muslims identify the intended victim with *Ishmael, portrayed both in the Hebrew Bible and in Jewish tradition as the ancestor of the Arabs through Ishmael's son Qedar. The Qur'an speaks of the miraculous dry-land crossing of "the Sea" and of the covenant God made with the Israelites on "the mountain" (Q.20:77–80). In some places it recounts events not found in the Bible at all, but only in later *midrashic traditions; these include the story of Abraham smashing his father's idols, as well as certain details in the qur'anic version of the story of *Cain and Abel (Q. 5:30ff) and of *Joseph (Q.12:30–31). Most midrashic traditions antedate Islam, suggesting that they may underlie the qur'anic version, but sometimes the reverse is the case, as where the Qur'an antedates a late midrash with nonbiblical details of the *Queen of Sheba's visit to King *Solomon (Q.27:44).

The interchange of ideas between Jews and early Muslims reflects ongoing economic and social interaction between Jews and Arabs in the region, generated not only by geographic proximity but also by their common linguistic heritage from Mesopotamia; three Semitic languages still extant in Muhammad's time were Arabic, Hebrew, and Aramaic. Indeed, Aramaic would remain the common language of the entire region throughout the first millennium CE, facilitating communication among Jews, Christians, and Muslims beyond the confines of Arabia, where adherents of all three religions were already native Arabic speakers in Muhammad's day.

The socio-cultural intercourse between Jews and Muslims that continued throughout the Middle Ages, and in many countries until modern times, has been aptly characterized by historian Shlomo Dov Goitein as a "creative Jewish-Arab symbiosis." For more than a thousand years, Jews residing in the Middle East lived under the political hegemony of Islam, during successive Arab caliphates (seventh through thirteenth centuries) and later in the *Ottoman Empire (fourteenth through twentieth centuries) until 1917, when that empire's alignment with the losing side in World War I led to its demise. In the Middle Ages, the cross-fertilization of ideas between Jews and Muslims was extensive and mutually fruitful, both in the sphere of religion and in secular fields like medicine, science, philosophy, philology, and poetry. Yet the most extensive evidence of Judaism's influence on Islam undoubtedly appears in the theocratic legal systems that form an integral part of both religions to this day.

Of Islam's four surviving schools of jurisprudence, the closest to rabbinic (talmudic) Jewish law is the Ḥanafī system that flourished in the Iraqi cities of Kufa and Basra, located along the trade route of the Fertile Crescent. These cities were not far from the Jewish academies of Sura and *Pumbedita where the Talmud was completed about the time of Muhammad's birth and continued to be studied throughout the formative centuries of Islam. We find extensive correspondences between talmudic halakhah and Islamic sharī'a, both as theocratic systems and at the level of individual rulings on specific topics. The numerous parallels reflect in part the legacy of a common ancestral Mesopotamian culture and in part the influence of the dominant surrounding Zoroastrian culture. However, abundant evidence in Islamic oral tradition – in the work of early Muslim jurists like Muḥammad Idrīs al-Shāfi'ī (767–820 CE) – and in halakhic rulings by Jewish jurists like Moses *Maimonides (1135–1204 CE) points to intellectual cross-fertilization in the thought processes of Rabbis on the one hand and Muslim religious scholars and jurists ('ulamā' and fuqahā') on the other.

At the systemic level, Muslim jurists analyzed uṣūl-al-fiqh, "The [Four] Roots of Jurisprudence" – namely, qur'an, sunna, ijmā', and qiyās (written scripture, oral tradition, juristic consensus, and argument by analogy). These four roots bear a close linguistic and conceptual correspondence to the main sources of talmudic law: mikra, mishnah, gemara ("divrei ha-kol"), and hekkesh (scripture, oral law, talmudic consensus, and argument by analogy). Moreover, as regards qiyās and hekkesh, I have proposed that the term qiyās itself was artificially constructed through a grammatical misreading of the root of the Hebrew talmudic term hekkesh by an Arab Muslim jurist unfamiliar with Hebrew or Aramaic grammar.

As for individual topics of the law, the greatest overlap between the two systems occurs in rules governing the status of *women, namely the laws of *marriage, *divorce, and inheritance. Thus, both systems permit polygyny in principle (although Judaism banned its practice in the lands of Christendom since about 1025 CE and in Israel in the early 1950s), whereas both forbid polyandry; in both systems, the groom acquires exclusive use of the bride's sexual and reproductive function by payment of a bride price (biblical mohar, Arabic mahr). Most jurisprudential concepts and much of the technical terminology are the same in both halakhah and sharī'a. Thus, the Islamic law term muqaddasah (from a Hebrew root not native to Arabic) is modeled on the halakhic term mekuddeshet, "betrothed woman" (from the Hebrew root k-d-sh signifying "set apart" or "sacred"), indicating that the bride's sexual function is reserved for her husband's sole use. In sharī'a as in halakhah, divorce is unilateral; technically, only the husband can release the wife, because both systems treat the husband's exclusive claim on the wife's biological function as a valuable property, which the husband alone can relinquish. (Incidentally, the same Hebrew root k-d-sh generated both the Arabic name for *Jerusalem, al-Quds, from the biblical term 'ir ha-kodesh, "the Holy City," and the Arabic name for the Jerusalem Temple, bayt-al-maqdis, transliterating its talmudic name, beit ha-mikdash, "the House of the Sanctuary.")

At the same time, much cultural influence flowed from Islam to Judaism. In early medieval times, Islam – the dominant surrounding culture for Jews living under successive caliphates and sultanates that extended from Mesopotamia to the Iberian peninsula – was the world's most advanced civilization. Relations between Muslims and Jews were far more harmonious than between Jews and Christians in medieval Europe. Some Jews in Arab lands reached high social positions; *Samuel ibn Naghrela (ha-*Nagid) was appointed vizier to the Muslim ruler in eleventh-century Granada (see SPAIN, MUSLIM), and *Maimonides was private physician to Sultan Saladin in Egypt. Arab scholarship informed much of Jewish intellectual life, including science and medicine as well as philological disciplines like philosophy, poetry, and grammar. Medieval Hebrew poetry like that of Abraham ibn Ezra modeled its rules of prosody on Arabic counterparts, and the Hebrew names of verb conjugations were adopted directly from the terminology of Arabic grammar. Maimonides, Nahmanides, and other Jewish philosophers absorbed Aristotelian and Platonic worldviews conveyed to them by Arab philosophers, and *Hebrew translations mediated these philosophical ideas to scholars residing in Christendom; in particular, Maimonides influenced Thomas Aquinas, who refers to him as "Rabbi Moses" and displays familiarity with his philosophical work.

For further reading on the creative Jewish-Muslim symbiosis, see S. D. Goitein, Jews and Arabs: Their Contacts through the Ages (1955); R. Firestone, Journeys in Holy Lands: The Evolution of the Abraham-Ishmael Legends in Islamic Exegesis (1990); idem, Children of Abraham: An Introduction to Judaism for Muslims (2001); idem, An Introduction to Islam for Jews (2008); B. Lewis, The Jews of Islam (1984); N. A. Stillman, The Jews of Arab Lands (1979); idem, The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times (1991); S. M. Wasserstrom, Between Muslim and Jew: The Problem of Symbiosis under Early Islam (1995); J. R. Wegner, "Halakhah and Shari'a: Roots of Law and Norms of Conduct in Theocratic Systems," CCAR Journal: A Reform Jewish Quarterly (Fall 2000): 81–95; and idem, "The Status of Women in Jewish and Islamic Marriage and Divorce Law," Harvard Women's Law Journal 5 (1982): 1–33.

JUDITH ROMNEY WEGNER

Israel: See JACOB

Israel, Kingdom of was founded ca. 931 BCE, when *Jeroboam led a secession of ten of the twelve Israelite tribes (see ISRAELITES: TRIBES; TRIBES, TWELVE) from the *United Monarchy and the sovereignty of Solomon's son *Rehoboam. The northern kingdom that Jeroboam established was larger, richer, and more populous than the remaining portion of Solomon's realm, which became the southern kingdom of *Judah. Jeroboam established his capital at *Shechem, but later moved the kingdom's center to Tirzah. He also erected shrines at Dan and *Beth El to replace the *Jerusalem Temple. No consistent dynasty maintained power in Israel. The Omride dynasty (1 Kgs 16:24) established close ties with *Phoenicia when Omri's son *Ahab married Jezebel, daughter of the ruler of Sidon. Ahab, who ruled from 871–52 BCE, was a strong monarch but was killed in battle. Succeeding kings were generally less successful. Israel had to negotiate constantly between the competing powers of *Egypt and *Mesopotamia and in 722–721 BCE, *Assyria conquered the northern kingdom, and the population was sent into exile. From that point on, the ten tribes were lost to history (see TRIBES, TEN LOST). Map 2

Israel, Land of (Hebrew, Eretz Yisrael) refers to the geographical region of the Middle East with which the Jewish people have been connected since biblical times. It is a designation that transcends politics or political sovereignty or even exact boundaries; rather it expresses the deep historical and spiritual ties that Jews have maintained with the land that was promised to *Abraham and *Sarah and their descendants as part of the *covenant Abraham established with *God. The "Land of Israel" has long been linked with the promise of *messianic *redemption implicit in Jewish *theology and liturgy (see WORSHIP) and has been understood by many thinkers and *mystics as the only place in which Jews can live most fully as Jews (see THOUGHT, MEDIEVAL). *Diaspora Jews throughout the ages contrasted their exile (galut) among the nations with the enhanced holiness that would one day enhance their lives in Eretz Yisrael.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Israel, State of: Agricultural Settlements, 1878 to 1948. For nineteenth-century Zionists, founding successful agricultural settlements in the Land of Israel was a major objective. They were convinced that changes in traditional Jewish occupations were necessary to create a "normal" society and that "the return to the land" was one step toward this goal. Establishing agriculture settlements was also seen as a way to acquire large portions of land that would ultimately constitute the considerable territory needed for a permanent, independent state. The dispersion of these settlements all over the country, which could be accomplished by relatively few people settling on large tracts of land, was also intended to establish a widespread Jewish presence.

