MINUCIUS FELIX (second or third century). African author of the apology Octavius, an elegant, attractive defense of Christianity, which takes the form of a dialogue between a pagan, Caecilius, and a Christian, Octavius, Caecilius echoes the general calumnies against Christians, and Octavius corrects these views, stressing at the same time the virtues of Christianity. The relationship between this work and Tertullian's apology is very close. There are such striking affinities that some interdependence is certain, but it is impossible to say which work is prior.

MIRACLE PLAY, see MYSTERY PLAY

MIRACLES. In the ancient world, miracles were regarded as a normal, though extraordinary, feature of life. Supernatural powers were looked upon as intervening in the human situation. Remarkable cures were reported, e.g., from temples and centers of healing dedicated to Aesculapsius. Certain individuals such as Apollonius of Tyana* (almost contemporary with our Lord) were credited with outstanding gifts in this respect. Emperors and kings were regarded as endowed with the same kind of gift.

A miracle, in the Bible, is an event which, when we are confronted with it, forces us to say, "This is the LORD'S doing; it is marvellous in our eyes" (Ps. 118:23). The hand of God can be clearly seen at work, and His purpose in working is understood. Various words for "miracle" are used in Hebrew and Greek. Some remind us of the fact that miracles can be either extraordinary or ordinary events. Some are used to stress the extraordinary nature of the phenomenon. Some illustrate that the omnipotence of God is at work. Some underline that the miracle attests the word and mission of the teacher or preacher.

In the OT, miracles are regarded as due to the direct intervention of Yahweh in human affairs and are linked up with His purpose of redemption. In the NT, they are aspects of the proclamation of the good news that the nearness of the kingdom of God has made available within this world's life here and now the kind of power that He will ultimately use to restore all things to their proper order, to banish earth's corruption, to destroy death, and to restore human life to its true integrity. The life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Himself is the supreme miracle of this nature, and the miracles which accompany this life draw their significance entirely from this connection. Jesus' physical miracles are signs that redemption involves body as well as soul. They are acts of His compassion and of His kingly power. They are also signs which have to be interpreted by the word which accompanies them and by the whole purpose of His life. They thus belong to the priestly, kingly, and prophetic ministry of Jesus. They are themselves (as D.S. Cairns has said) integral parts of the revelation, and not adjuncts to it.

The early church for some time experienced power to continue in every respect, through prayer and the laying on of hands, the whole miraculous ministry of Jesus. Such miracles seemed especially to accompany missionary preaching. It came to be understood, however, that the ultimate restoration of the physical realm to order would take place at the second coming of Jesus, and that Christian faith was strong enough to wait for this event. It was realized that the greatest work of the church in this interim period was to reconcile men to God and bring them to repentance. When miracles occurred in the pursuit of this central task, they took place as remarkable answers to prayer, and signs confirming the Word especially in the missionary situation. They were regarded as events to be received thankfully by faith, rather than as aspects of the present program of the church.

Gradually, however, the view arose that the seeking of such miracles should be given a more regular and central place in the church's ministry. Pagan views of supernatural powers inherent in persons, shrines, and streams, etc., replaced the belief that men have direct access to a God who hears and answers prayer. At the Reformation it was emphasized that though all things were possible with God, and though the way of prayer was always open, nevertheless after the Apostolic Age the power magisterially to work miracles had been withdrawn, and the place of outward miracles as seals of the Word had been taken by the sacraments, in which the miraculous element was much more hidden.

In early days God was thought of as so related to the natural realm that every occurrence was due to His direct intervention. Miracle was simply a sign that He now willed in this instance to act differently than He had otherwise hitherto acted. When the idea of laws of nature arose, nature could still be viewed as a plastic medium in the hand of God. But when nature was viewed as a closed and rigid system, miracle had to be regarded as violating the laws of nature. Some theologians stress the fact that miracles are not contrary to nature, but contrary to nature as it is known by us. Explanations have been sought of miracles, stressing that most miracles are due to remarkable coincidence or insight. In this case, what would be to one person an explainable event would be to another a miracle. But there is no doubt that in the thought of the ordinary Christian the idea of what can take place will arise out of what has already taken place in the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The Christian experience of forgiveness, providence, and prayer is often so full of miracle that it is inconsistent to be theologically skeptical on the subject.

MISSIONS, CHRISTIAN. The term has usually applied to foreign missionary activity, but development of the world church has led to fresh appreciation of mission as the task of the church wherever it is found. Mission is the joyous and loving response of the Christian community to the universal and exclusive claims of the triune God who has revealed Himself definitively in Jesus Christ. It involves crossing all human boundaries, by Christians who are called individually and corporately to proclaim God's purposes. By their witness and service they summon fellow-sinners to turn to God and share in His promised kingdom, for right response to God is inseparable from the calling of the nations and offer of new life to all who will hear.

The NT concentrates on Paul's missionary activity, but he was only one of many who traveled the Roman Empire witnessing to the risen and coming Lord. The ministry of Jesus and Paul provide classic examples of the exacting nature of proclamation of the Gospel, the varied methods used, and the historic content of the Christian message. There are fragile boundaries between loyalty to what is historically revealed and cultural exclusiveness. Accommodation can lead to syncretism or conservatism and, despite the presence of the Spirit, the risk of misrepresenting Christ demands constant scrutiny of the message.

During the first three centuries the church faced and partly resolved issues which have continued to test her missionary vocation: disagreement about God's nature, definition of the unique historicity of Christ, relation to the state, exposition of the Christian ethic, relationship to other religions, refutation of misunderstanding and slander, development of a pattern of authority which allowed local adaptation without destroying unity, initiation into mission, and worship.

By the end of the second century the work of the Apologists, the triumph of Catholic Christianity over Gnosticism,* and the development of written Scriptures and creeds had given Christians a defined and readily communicable message, which was greatly assisted by a common political framework and the popularity of koine Greek. Judging by the strictures of Celsus, even ordinary Christians developed successful methods for communicating their faith. Initially Christianity mainly appealed to urban groups, especially those already interested in monotheism and accessible to trade routes. Pliny's* letters suggest more widespread impact in Bithynia, and there were major movements in Egypt and North Africa (see AFRICA, ROMAN) by the third century. In Rome, Callistus's pastoral problems suggest that the church included a cross-section of society. Though there were wide regional variations in church growth, there was a Christian presence in most imperial provinces and in Edessa, Armenia, and Ethiopia.* In Asia Minor and Egypt, Christians were too strong to ignore and too numerous to eliminate.

Spasmodic persecution contributed to church growth, giving powerful testimony to the manner in which Christianity freed men and women from the fear of death, demons, and fate. The joyous certainty and vitality of Christian literature contrasted strikingly with the pessimism of much pagan writing, while strong traditions of mutual help on an empire-wide scale enabled believers to meet illness and misfortune far more effectively than pagans who saw little connection between religion and responsibility. Official recognition by Constantine* and his successors posed fresh problems, because of the political and cultural overtones conversion acquired after 313, as barbarians like the Goths moved inside Roman frontiers; but the attempted revival of paganism under Julian the Apostate* showed that Christianity did not depend on official support for its growth. The task of translating Jesus' message into Greek and Latin cultures was almost complete by the end of the fifth century, but the church was seriously weakened by barbarian invasions, the slow collapse of political order in the West, and bitter theological divisions in the East.

By the seventh century large Christian communities were dominated by Islam, though the Nestorians spread Christianity through central Asia and as far as China.* An even more significant movement was under way in the West. Following the conversion of Ireland* by Patrick,* Celtic missionaries (Columba,* Columbanus,* Aidan*) moved into Scotland and the N English kingdoms, throughout and beyond Frankish territory, where Clovis* had become a Catholic Christian in 496. The Gregorian mission to Kent in 597 gradually expanded into other kingdoms, and Anglo-Saxon Christians sent a number of notable missionaries like Wilfrid* and Winfrith (or Boniface*) to their kin among the German tribes and Scandinavia, with markedly successful results. The correspondence of Boniface is a missionary classic, and the pattern of tribal conversion with a minimum of cultural disturbance resulted in the development of strong churches within a Roman framework. The sharp division between clergy, religious, and laity meant that the work of conversion was largely regarded as the responsibility of clerics, and it was long before Christianity penetrated isolated rural areas. Illiteracy, lack of vernacular worship, and ineffective pastoral care meant considerable confusion between paganism and Christianity. The work of conversion continued steadily eastward, and official paganism ended with the baptism of Jagellio in Poland* (1386), though groups like the Lapps and the Romany remained largely untouched, as did the Jews.

Orthodox missionaries, Cyril* and Methodius, penetrated Moravia and, by their translations of Scripture and liturgy, played a formative part in the entry of Slavs into Christendom. Further east, the baptism of Vladimir* of Kiev about 988 was a turning point in Christian history, for Russian Orthodoxy has expanded steadily eastward with the extension of Russian territory, and remained in continuous contact with other religions until the present century (see RUSSIA). Great missionaries like J. Veniaminov (1797-1879) and N. Kasatkin* are too little known in the West.

One of the most powerful inspirations for missionary activity has been the rediscovery of apostolic Christianity and the message of Jesus. In the twelfth century, groups like the Waldenses* traveled widely to communicate this, but were proscribed. It was not until Innocent III recognized the followers of Francis of Assisi* that zeal to convert infidels and heretics, inspired by the Crusades, was briefly redeemed by a truly Christlike spirit, which rejected force as a means of conversion. Raymond Lull,* a Franciscan tertiary and a pioneer theologian of mission as Christians' basic responsibility, saw conversion as a work of love, demanding careful intellectual preparation. Kublai Khan's request for teachers in 1260 was not taken seriously in Rome, but John of Montecorvino* reached Peking in 1294 and was sent other Franciscans as bishops. Some converts were made prior to a change of dynasty in 1368, but these Roman missionaries remained a royal chaplaincy, dependent on imperial favor for survival.

European colonial expansion and the renewal of the church during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries underlay the next major phase of Christian expansion, dominated by Roman Catholic orders. Mission was clerical, inseparable from political goals, increasingly under Roman control after the foundation of the Propaganda* (1622), and only partly successful in dealing with a new missionary problem—preaching the Gospel and establishing churches in primitive cultures in Africa and parts of Latin America. Brutal exploitation of natives by colonists and administrators was partly redeemed by the struggle for the human dignity of the Indians fought by B. Las Casas* and others against official apathy and the theologians who taught that the Indians had no souls. A more permanent solution was found in the Jesuit* "reductions," which were a noble attempt to create Indian Christian communities; but they collapsed with the dissolution of the Jesuit Order (1773). Paternalism has remained one of the most serious missionary problems. In Japan,* F. Xavier* adopted a different approach, attempting to build on local culture, and was followed elsewhere by M. Ricci,* R. de Nobili,* and A. de Rhodes (1591-1660).

Significant gains were made in Japan, China, and India* until political changes led to the virtual extermination of Christianity in Japan by 1650 and its proscription in China in 1723. European colonies in India enabled Roman Christianity to take root, but local adaptation was proscribed by Omnium sollicitudinum (1744). Until 1938 all missionary priests took an oath of submission, with the result that there was excessive Romanization in Roman Catholic missions. They received another setback with the abolition of the Jesuits, but revived after the French Revolution. Many new missionary orders, like the Marists,* were founded to take advantage of French imperialist expansion in Asia, Africa, and the Pacific. Great missionary statesmen like Cardinal Lavigerie (1825-92), with his White Fathers* (1868), were remorseless opponents of slavery, intrepid explorers, and contributors of African education and technical advancement. Catholic missions were particularly strong on institutional work, and their doctrine of the church made it easier for them, than for some Protestants, to deal with African tribalism, though they did not escape the dangers of paternalism and over-identification with colonialism which characterized the nineteenth-century missions.

Protestant churches displayed little interest in the heathen during the Reformation,* though their rediscovery of the Gospel, stress on the vocation of all Christians, recovery of vernacular Scriptures and liturgy, and emphasis on a literate and responsible laity were to prove profoundly important for the development of Christian missions once Protestant countries acquired colonies and came into contact with other religions. Initially visionaries like A. Saravia* and J. von Welz (1621-68) won no official support. Such initiatives as were taken by J. Eliot* and T. Bray* were personal and based on the voluntary principle. The Danish Tranquebar Mission (1706) was the pioneer Protestant foreign mission, though the Moravians were the first church to undertake foreign missions (1732).

Evangelical revivals during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries combined with European imperialist expansion to open up vast new areas to the Christian message. European Protestants concerned about missions formed voluntary societies, beginning with the Baptist Missionary Society (1792), the London Missionary Society (1795), the Netherlands Mission Society (1797), the Basel Mission (1815), and many others. The entry of churches like the Wesleyans (1818) into missionary activity marked a fresh development, as did the founding of the China Inland Mission by J.H. Taylor,* for it repudiated connection with any one church, was resolutely nondenominational, and was the forerunner of a host of "faith missions." Many missions placed great stress on civilization as a partner of evangelism, and the godly artisan or teacher sent overseas was a new missionary phenomenon. W. Carey* exemplified this approach and set a sterling example by translation work, study of local religion and culture, and determination to develop an educated local ministry and people.

This pattern of Protestant mission was repeated throughout Africa, Asia, and Oceania (see SOUTH SEAS; AUSTRALIA; NEW ZEALAND). Usually it led to strict preparation for baptism, probation before admission to the Lord's Table, and restriction of local ministry to teaching and catechizing, with the unspoken assumption that European standards of literate faith were the norm. Often there was a sharp rejection of local culture wherever it impinged on religion, but critics of the Westernness of Christianity like N.V. Tilak* were not taken seriously. The Boxer Rising in China (1900) and the Nyasaland Rising (1915) led by J. Chilembwe showed the depth of resentment at the confusion of colonialism and Christianity. In Africa* the desire for authentically local Christianity has led to the formation of rapidly growing Independent churches. The No-Church movement in Japan has similar roots. H. Venn* and R. Anderson* looked forward to self-governing indigenous churches, but many missionaries did not. The consecration of S.A. Crowther* in 1864 reflected Venn's goals, but inadequate CMS assistance led many to consider the experiment a failure, and there were no more consecrations until the twentieth century. The Nevius Plan (1890) in Korea was more successful in allowing room for local initiative, but unity has suffered considerably (see NEVIUS, J.L.).

By the beginning of the twentieth century, Christianity was a genuinely international religion and had decisively broken out of its Western boundaries. Missionaries had played an important part in the legal abolition of slavery; had championed natives against white exploitation (J. Philip,* G. Scott); pioneered medical services through groups like the Edinburgh Medical Mission Society (1841), or individuals like P. Parker* and I.S. Scudder*; founded schools, colleges like Serampore (1818) and universities like Doshisha (1875); while the personal influence of educators like A. Duff* and T. Richard* was profound. D. Livingstone* was one of many explorers, and notable contributions were made to linguistics (H. Martyn*), ethnography (H.A. Junod, 1863-1934), and comparative religion (J. Legge*), to mention only a few of the missionary contributions to scholarship.

New perspectives were given on family life and the role of women, economies revolutionized through introduction of products like cocoa into Ghana (1857) by the Basel Mission, cannibalism and infanticide checked, and above all, countless lives transformed by the power of Christ and vigorous Christian communities established, especially in animist societies, but also in ancient Asian cultures. Islam* alone remained largely resistant to Christianity.

The very success of Christian missions raised important questions about the nature of Christian faith. Men and women who wished only to preach the Gospel found it necessary to come to terms with the oversight of churches and ancillary institutions. Mass movements in India, Africa, and Oceania created great problems for missionaries, though H. Whitehead (1853-1947) and B. Guttmann (1877-1966) led the way in suggesting solutions which have raised important issues about the relation of mission, church, and society. This also emerged with local criticism of denominationalism, which seemed superfluous in a largely pagan context where European comity agreements had already established one church in particular regions. In addition, practical matters like preparation of missionaries, relations with governments, and need for biblical translations encouraged cooperation on the field and at home.

Between 1860 and 1963 there were ten major international conferences and a host of local and regional ones. Edinburgh (1910)* was a new beginning, for it institutionalized and internationalized cooperation in national missionary councils and by the formation of the International Missionary Council* (1921) which has played a vital role in the missionary and ecumenical movements. The integration of the IMC and the World Council of Churches at New Delhi (1961) was a symbol of the growing recognition that mission is more than a dedicated Christian minority crossing geographical frontiers, but a task for every Christian and the whole church. Increasingly this partnership has extended to leaders of the "younger" churches; men like V.S. Azariah,* D.T. Niles (1908-1971) and T. Kagawa* have helped Western Christians to realize anew the implications of the universality of Christ.

During the nineteenth century, Protestant theologians paid little attention to the theology of missions, or the relation of Christianity to other religions and ideologies. The erosion of Western Christianity, the resurgence of other religions, the growth of anti-Christian ideologies like Marxism, and the development of liberal Protestantism, which denied the uniqueness of Christianity and the need for conversion, caused a great deal of heart-searching about the real motives for missions. W.E. Hocking (1873-1966) and a team of lay investigators produced Re-thinking Missions (1932), which was a persuasive statement of the new views. H. Kraemer* produced a powerful statement of the traditional views in The Christian Message in a non-Christian World (1938), informed by his own experience in Indonesia* and the inspiration of Karl Barth,* but the Uppsala* statement on mission and the response of the Frankfurt Declaration (1970) show that there is deep disagreement about the nature of mission in churches associated with the World Council of Churches.*

Since 1945 an increasing proportion of missionaries have come from North America, and many of these regard the WCC and its agencies with deep suspicion, though the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association* (1917) and the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association* (1945) joined forces for a notable conference at Wheaton in 1966. A series of Congresses on Evangelism (from 1966) sponsored by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association has also initiated important evangelical cooperative ventures and examined the relation between the historic Gospel and the need for indigenous, but catholic, response to the risen Lord.

There are still many nations closed to Christianity, other areas where contact has been slight. Massive population growth, urbanization and rapid social change, and rival religions and ideologies are problems common to all Christians. Political independence in former colonial territories and the closure of China (1949) have brought rapid localization of authority. As never before, Christianity is feeling the strains of its historicity and universality, but the decisive feature of Christian missions is not only conversion of men and nations, but obedient witness everywhere to the Lord who makes all things new, for ultimately the goal of missions is the glory of God and confession of His sovereignty.

MITER (Gr. mitra, "turban"). A form of hat or headdress, made of embroidered satin and worn by bishops and some abbots in the Western Church. In the East they wear metal crowns. The usage goes back to the eleventh century and to the camelaucum, the papal tiara. Worn at all solemn services and occasions, but taken off during prayers and the canon of the Mass, it is found in three types. First, the Precious Miter, worn on Feasts and ordinary Sundays and adorned with precious stones and/or gold. Second, the Golden Miter, used in penitential seasons and made of golden cloth. Third, the Simple Miter, worn at funerals and on Good Friday and made of plain white silk or linen. Since the nineteenth century, Anglican bishops have also used them. They are shaped like a shield. MIXED MARRIAGE. A marriage between Christians and non-Christians, or between members of different Christian denominations. Generally it is understood as indicating marriages between a Roman Catholic and a baptized non-Roman Catholic. The Roman Catholic Church still continues to discourage such marriages, arguing that although they are a consequence of the division among Christians, they do not, except in some cases, help in reestablishing unity among Christians. This view is reciprocated in Protestant denominations, but not unanimously accepted.

Until 1966 it was maintained that mixed marriages could be acceptable only after episcopal dispensation, conditional on the promise of both Catholic and non-Catholic party—normally in writing—that the children of such a union would be baptized and instructed in the Catholic faith, based on Codex Iuris Canonici. In that year the "Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith" issued an instruction, Matrimoni Sacramentum, which sought to find a more realistic norm for a worthy reappraisal of mixed marriages. One of the significant changes was that "excommunication for attempting marriage before a non-Catholic minister is abrogated."

In 1970 Paul VI issued an Apostolic Letter, the Motu Proprio, determining norms for mixed marriages, in which he confronted two major issues: (1) that no human authority has the right to dispense a Catholic from the duty of keeping the faith and handing it on to his children; (2) that the church has no right to require a non-Catholic to make a promise against his conscience. The letter indicates certain changes while still holding as firm a position as possible. Marriage between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic still requires an episcopal dispensation, without which the marriage is deemed invalid. The dispensation is granted on condition that the Catholic partner "as far as possible" ensures Catholic instruction for children. This is incumbent now on the Catholic party only, but the non-Catholic party must be informed of it. It is now also possible that at the wedding service there is some form of cooperation between priest and minister, subject to previous episcopal sanction, and that the ceremony conducted in the church of one partner be followed by a service of blessing or thanksgiving in the church of the other, so long as there is no second exchange of marriage vows.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

MOBERLY, ROBERT CAMPBELL (1845-1903). Anglican theologian. Son of a bishop, he was educated at Winchester and Oxford where, after service in a parish and two theological colleges, he returned as professor of pastoral theology from 1892 till his death. One of the *Lux Mundi school of liberal Anglo-Catholics, he wrote Ministerial Priesthood (1897), a study of the Christian ministry from a strongly Anglo-Catholic standpoint which criticizes the views of Bishop Lightfoot as too favorable to Protestantism. His other best-known work is Atonement and Personality (1901), a difficult book which defines personality in Hegelian terms and veers towards pan-theism, develops a moral satisfactionist theory of the Atonement out of an inadequate treatment of sin, and advocates a high doctrine of the church and sacraments. Moberly also defended Anglican orders against Roman Catholic critics and church courts, and the dual system in education against the Nonconformists. IAN SELLERS

MODALISM, see SABELLIANISM

MODERATES. The name given to various groups of Scottish divines in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. Their basic position was that because of "our present happy constitution in Church and State" secured by the Revolution Settlement of 1690, hardships such as the presentation of ministers to parishes by lay patrons and the necessity of subscribing the Westminster Confession* of Faith could be endured. Their opponents regarded lay patronage as a serious infringement of the rights of the church, and many seceded from the "prevailing party" in the Church of Scotland in 1733, in 1761, and most notably in the Disruption* of 1843. The earlier Moderates were very critical of "man-made creeds and confessions" and tolerant of "infidels" such as David Hume and Lord Kames, but did not press for the removal of the legal requirement of subscription to the Confession. A later Moderate, George Hill, wrote a classic textbook of Calvinist doctrine, but the Moderates were more interested in science, history, and philosophy. They helped to found the Royal Society of Edinburgh. William Robertson's histories gained a European reputation, while Thomas Reid and the "Common sense" school of philosophers were influential in America. HENRY R. SEFTON

MODERATOR. The title given to the presiding officer of the various courts in Reformed churches. The term was used occasionally by John Calvin, but with the formation of the Reformed Church of France in 1559 it became the formal title of the chairman of official church gatherings. It seems to have been adopted in order to emphasize the equality of all presbyters. It was adopted by the Scottish Reformed Church in 1563 and has been generally employed by all Presbyterian bodies since. The attempts at different times to have permanent moderators, sometimes bearing the title of "bishops," has usually been successfully resisted as being contrary to the belief that Jesus Christ alone is head of the Church. W.S. REID

MODERNISM. The term was used of a movement within the Roman Catholic Church at the beginning of the century which accepted biblical "higher criticism" and reacted against Scholasticism and traditional Roman Catholic dogmatics, regarding dogmas only as symbols of high moral value. The leading figures of the movement were A.F. Loisy,* who advocated the Wellhausen "reconstruction" of the OT, F. Von Hügel,* and G.H. Tyrrell.* The movement was condemned by the encyclical Pascendi of Pius X in 1907. At about the same time a similar movement was formed in the Church of England, centered around the Modern Churchman's Union.

Used more loosely, "modernism" has been used in a derogatory sense to characterize the varieties of post-Kantian theology that have become popular in Protestant churches during the last century or more. These have uniformly adopted a "higher critical" attitude toward Scripture and toward the very idea of revelation as providing men with knowledge of God. The historic Christian faith, embracing Creation, Fall, and gracious redemption through Jesus Christ, was abandoned. In its place successive attempts have been made to reconstruct the Christian faith along largely ethical lines in accordance with "modern findings" of science and history, and to understand the progress of the kingdom of God simply in terms of social and political amelioration. In NT studies, "modernism" expressed itself in the quest for a de-supernaturalized historical Jesus in the gospels. The term "liberalism" is often used interchangeably with "modernism" even though "liberal" attitudes in Protestantism considerably antedate the rise of modernism.

Theologically the source of modernism is largely to be found in the work of F.D.E. Schleiermacher* and A. Ritschl* who followed Kant's* strictures on traditional metaphysics and were in turn followed by a host of popularizers such as R.J. Campbell in Britain and H.E. Fosdick* in the USA. Other sources lay in S.T. Coleridge, T.H. Green and the Broad Church Anglicans (England), the Cairds (Scotland), and later New England Theology* (USA).

Antimodernist attitudes and arguments are represented (in various phases) by Tractarianism,* the "Downgrade" controversy among British Baptists, and the publication and wide distribution in the USA of The Fundamentals (1909-15). American "fundamentalism," though antimodernist in its stance, is not to be identified with historic Protestantism due to its anti-intellectualism and its willing cultural isolation. The most brilliant analysis and indictment of modernism from the standpoint of the historic Reformed faith is probably J.G. Machen's Christianity and Liberalism (1923).

World War I, Karl Barth,* and the rise of the "biblical theology" movement with its more constructive attitude toward Scripture brought about the decline of modernism in its "classic" form, though some would regard Barthianism as proceeding on essential modernist presuppositions. Many, such as Reinhold Niebuhr,* working on "modernist" assumptions about Scripture and Christian theology, have adopted less optimistic views of human nature and culture. Since the decline of modernism, those who attempt modern reconstructions of the Christian faith in accord with recognizably post-Kantian premises, such as P. Tillich* and J.A.T. Robinson, prefer to think of themselves as "radical" theologians.

PAUL HELM

MOFFAT, ROBERT (1795-1883). Scottish missionary to Africa. Born in East Lothian, he had scanty education, but after conversion he was, after some hesitation, accepted by the London Missionary Society for work in Africa. There he went in 1816, and in 1825 settled at Kuruman, Bechuanaland, which became the headquarters of all his activities for forty-five years.

Moffat saw his work as fourfold. (1) Evangelization, which he strongly believed must always precede civilization. Acting on this he made Kuruman a center from which Christian influence radiated over a wide area. When he left in 1870, a whole region had been Christianized and civilized, and many African Christian congregations, ministered to by trained African ministers, had been formed; (2) Exploration, in order to extend missionary work. In 1816 only the relatively small Cape Colony was known. The Orange River was the northern limit of partially known territory; the Kuruman River, on which Moffat's headquarters were established, was beyond that. By 1870 Africa was largely explored as far as and beyond the Zambesi, much of it by Moffat and his son-in-law David Livingstone*; (3) Literature. Through his complete mastery of Sechuana, he translated the whole Bible, composed hymns, and wrote books, providing the Bechuana Africans with a basis for education, tools for worship and study, and the beginnings of a literature; (4) Civilization, especially in agriculture. He introduced irrigation, the use of natural fertilizers, forest preservation, and new crops. In this as in other ways his work was largely preparing the way for others.

Complete consecration, perfect disinterestedness, shrewdness, simplicity of character, and unwavering faith in the power of the Gospel—these were some of the qualities which made Moffat a man of God and an outstanding Christian leader. Failing health forced him to leave Africa in 1870; he died in Kent, England, thirteen years later.

MOFFATT, JAMES (1870-1944). Bible translator. Born and educated in Glasgow, he was ordained in the Free Church of Scotland in 1896. In 1911 he left parish work and became professor of Greek and NT exegesis at Mansfield College, Oxford. In 1915 he transferred to the United Free Church college in Glasgow to teach church history, and after twelve years went to Union Theological Seminary, New York, as Washburn professor of church history, where he took a leading part in the preparation of the Revised Standard Version. He was a prolific writer of books reflecting biblical criticism.

His fame rests on his single-handed translation of the entire Bible. His NT was published in 1913, the Old in 1924, and the whole revised and reissued in 1935, known popularly as the "Moffatt Bible." It was the first unofficial translation to acquire widespread readership, although regarded as somewhat literary. His OT relied overmuch on critical theories which were subsequently disproved by archaeological or philological discovery; this weakness prevented acceptance by evangelicals on either side of the Atlantic. He was also prone to alter the order of verses or chapters when the Hebrew seemed to him unintelligible; here too he jumped to hasty conclusions which are no longer tenable. His translation was nevertheless a great achievement which still led its field at the time of his death, and was not finally superseded until the New English Bible was completed.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

MOGILA, PETER (1596-1646). Metropolitan of Kiev. From a noble Moldavian family, he studied in Poland and perhaps at Paris, returned to take monastic vows, became abbot of a Kiev monastery in 1627, and was elected metropolitan in 1633. To him the Russian Orthodox Church owes a more progressive attitude toward education of both clergy and laity. He came under criticism because his policies involved Western emphases, including the teaching of Thomist thought. On the other hand, it was he who produced the Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church which, accepted by Orthodox patriarchs and endorsed by the 1672 Synod of Jerusalem, outlines Eastern Orthodox doctrine against Roman Catholic and Protestant claims.

MÖHLER, JOHANN ADAM (1796-1838). German scholar. Born at Igersheim, he read philosophy and theology at the Catholic Academy, Ellwangen, and then at Tübingen. He was ordained in 1819 and later was professor of church history at Tübingen from 1828 and at Munich from 1835. He became dean of Würzburg Cathedral just before he died from cholera, pneumonia, and general exhaustion. His principal works are Die Einheit in der Kirche (1825), Athanasius der Grosse (1827), Symbolik (1832), and Neue Untersuchungen (1834). He took seriously Schleiermacher, Hegel, and Schelling, which offended his more conservative colleagues. His efforts to understand and be understood by Protestants manifested his deep ecumenical interests. He was falsely accused of heterodoxy on infallibility and of being a precursor of modernism.

MOHR, JOSEPH (1792-1848). Composer of "Stille Nacht." Born at Salzburg, he was a chorister in the cathedral there, was ordained to the Roman Catholic priesthood in 1815, and held several parish posts near Salzburg. In 1828 he became vicar at Hintersee and in 1837 at Wagrein. His "Stille Nacht" was composed in 1818 for a Christmas Eve serve in Oberndorf, near Salzburg, and set for guitar accompaniment by the organist and schoolmaster, Franz Grüber (1787-1863). The carol became popular before publication when sung by wandering Tyrolese singers. At least five English versions of the words, each with three of the five original stanzas, are current. The most widespread in Great Britain, by S.A. Brooke, begins "Still the Night." The translation commonly used in the USA begins "Silent Night! Holy Night!"

JOHN S. ANDREWS

MOKITIMI, SETH MOLEFI (1904-1971). South African Methodist minister. Born near Quthing, Lesotho, he entered the ministry in 1931. He served as chaplain of the educational institution at Healdtown (1936-51) and warden of the institutions at Osborn (1952-61) and Bensonvale (1962-65). In 1941 he became an official member of the Methodist conference and was its first African president in 1964. His balanced leadership and quiet dignity won wide respect. He attended many ecumenical gatherings in South Africa and abroad, was the first African president of the Christian Council of South Africa, and a vice-president of the All-Africa Council of Churches. In a period of growing racial animosity he consistently advocated reconciliation and interracial cooperation. He always remained an effective preacher and a zealous evangelist, and he was a staunch upholder of ministerial standards.

MOLINOS, MIGUEL DE (1640-1697). Spanish Quietist. Born at Muniesa of noble parents, he was educated at Coimbra and settled at Rome in 1663 where he became a noted priest and confessor and won the friendship of prominent ecclesiastics, including the future Pope Innocent XI. In 1675 he produced his famous Guida Spirituale. This work, deeply influenced by Neoplatonism and medieval mysticism, traces a path to perfection, the annihilation of the will, and oneness with God, to which all external observances, even the overcoming of temptation, are an obstacle. At once the word was attacked by the Jesuits as Jansenist and Quietist in character, but was approved by the Inquisition. In the early 1680s, however, its fame spread over the Christian world and its teachings were applied, with devastating results, in some religious houses. In 1685, at the instigation of Louis XIV, Innocent XI—who felt himself threatened because of his friendship with Molinos—was urged to arrest the authors, who in 1687 was tried and condemned and, although forced to recant, was immured for the rest of his life on a charge of immorality. Molinos's fate aroused deep sympathy in the Protestant world and intense anti-Jesuit feeling among Catholics.

MOMMSEN CATALOGUE. An early canon of biblical books, known also as "the Cheltenham List." Discovered by Theodor Mommsen in 1885 at Cheltenham, England, in a tenth-century Latin manuscript, it was first published in Hermes XXI (1886), pp. 142-56. It dates from 359 and appears to come from Africa. The OT list counts the Wisdom of Solomon and Ecclesiasticus among Solomon's books, and includes Maccabees, Tobit, Esther, and Judith. It has 151 Psalms. In the NT, four gospels are accepted in the order Matthew, Mark, John, Luke. Hebrews, James, and Jude are omitted, but Revelation is included. The scribe seems to demur at the assignment of three epistles to John and two to Peter, adding after the enumeration which he found "una sola" ("one only"). According to the number of verses indicated, three Johannine epistles and two Petrine were in the original list. The canon is thought to be of Western origin.

MONARCHIAN PROLOGUES. Short introductory statements which are prefixed to each of the four gospels in many manuscripts of the Vulgate. Also known as the Arguments, they contain brief accounts of each evangelist and his reasons for writing his account. These Latin introductions are involved, and their meaning is often remote and vague. The fact that these documents are known from antiquity as the Monarchian Prologues indicates that they have been held to date from the second or third centuries. But more recent critics have shown them to belong to the fourth century, and that perhaps they are in fact dependent upon the Anti-Marcionite Prologues.

MONARCHIANISM. The name is applied to a second- and third-century theological movement centered chiefly in Asia Minor and Rome, but also common elsewhere. The term "Monarchians" was coined by Tertullian in the third century. While the word can sustain an orthodox view of the Trinity, it usually described those who opted for a unipersonal rather than trinitarian view of the divine nature in order to preserve the unity of God.

Two forms of the doctrine are discernible. First, Adoptianist or Dynamic Monarchianism, which centers on the problems raised by Christology in early Christian times. In this view Jesus is regarded as a unique man who was divinely energized by the Holy Spirit (usually thought of as occurring at his baptism) and called to be the Son of God. Theodotus of Byzantium expounded such a view at Rome, about A.D. 210. Similar views were held by Paul of Samosata.* Much earlier the Ebionites* and Cerinthus* (a contemporary of the Apostle John at Ephesus) maintained that Jesus was a divinely energized Galilean. 1 John condemns this viewpoint (cf. 5:6).

Second, Modalistic Monarchianism, Patripassianism, or Sabellianism.* The incarnation of God the Father was put forward in an effort to maintain both the divinity of the Son and the unity of God. This view was influential at Rome about A.D. 200 through Noetus,* Praxeas,* and Sabellius. It was vigorously opposed by Tertullian* in North Africa and Hippolytus* at Rome. The Patripassian nickname relates to Tertullian's gibe that by his teaching Praxeas "put the Paraclete to flight and crucified the Father." The Modalist appellation concerns their representation of God as revealed at one time under the mode of Father, at another under the mode of Son, and at another under the mode of the Holy Spirit. According to Hippolytus, Noetus taught that if Christ is God, he is surely the Father, or else not God; therefore, if Christ suffered, then God suffered.

Dynamic and Modalistic Monarchianism represented erroneous early attempts to assimilate the empirical facts of the Christian faith associated with the person of Jesus Christ and the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit to an unrevised notion of unity. The facts of the biblical revelation demanded recognition to the full personhood of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Only gradually did Christians acquire categories and a language adequate to the new revelation.

MONASTERY. The abode of a community of persons living secluded from the world, dedicated to a life of asceticism and prayer in pursuit of personal sanctification, generally united under a superior to obey a common rule by vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. The term covers both eremitic (hermit) and cenobitic (communal) foundations for men or for women. Following its appearance in the fourth century, the Christian monastery became an important civilizing and evangelizing force—sometimes despite the intention of the monks—especially through the encouragement given to study and the copying of manuscripts. Traditionally the monastery has sought to be self-sufficient, incorporating all the buildings necessary for community life, including its own chapel and the cloister, from which outsiders are excluded, within a walled enclosure.

MONASTICISM. The Greek term monachos at first probably meant "celibate, single," rather than "alone, solitary" (see ASCETICISM). Ascetics, especially women, tended to separate themselves from congregation as well as society long before monasticism proper began. Total withdrawal from the world, following Jewish and Christian traditions of wilderness spiritually and pagan conventions of "dropping-out" to escape social burdens, emerged in the East in the late third century with the hermits (eremites) or anchorites like Antony* of Egypt—who was not the first (even disallowing Jerome's Paul of Thebes) but the most influential. Retreat in pursuit of perfection was stimulated by growing laxity within the church—Hellenized, at peace, and imperially patronized—and by lay ambitions for the heroism of the martyr in face of increasing episcopal domination. The hermits, in Egypt mainly Coptic fellahin, abandoned both civilization and church, but as admirers and imitators sought them out, informal colonies developed, especially in the deserts of Nitria and Scete SW of the Nile delta, where in the fourth and fifth centuries a rudimentary corporate life was observed by the solitaries. Manual tasks predominated, learning remained minimal.

Cenobitic ("common life") monasticism was pioneered in Egypt by Pachomius* (d.346), who subjected his several communities to an elementary common "rule." Monks multiplied in these and in independent monasteries and around centers like Oxyrhynchus, and were forward in the eradication of heresy and paganism from rural Egypt. The spirituality of the Desert Fathers, rooted in Origen's* teaching, was preserved in collections of Sayings of the Fathers (Apophthegmata Patrum) and systematized supremely by Evagrius Ponticus* (d.399), who influenced Palladius* (the historian of monastic origins), John Cassian* (who transmitted anchoritic piety to the West), and later ascetic-mystical Byzantine theologians.

In Palestine, Antony's disciple Hilarion* (d.371) propagated anchoritism near Gaza, and Epiphanius,* future bishop of Salamis (d.403), founded the first cenobitic establishment nearby. Biblical sites attracted hermits and communities, and Jerome and Rufinus of Aquileia were associated with Roman matrons in nunneries at Bethlehem and Jerusalem late in the fourth century. A major Palestinian development was the laura, combining a chiefly eremitic regimen with a common subjection to one "Father." Euthymius the Great (d.473) and Sabas* (d.532) led famous lauras.

Monastic origins in Syria were independent of Egyptian models. Jacob of Nisibis (d.338) and Juliana Saba near Edessa (d.366/7) were prominent early anchorites. Syria's inveterate asceticism, latterly vitiated by the Manichaean-type dualism observable in the Messalians,* bred extreme, even suicidal, manifestations in eremitic stylites,* "browsers" (who lived like animals), and vagrant exiles. Cenobitism, resisted by Ephraem the Syrian,* eventually emerged through Egyptian and Manichaean influences. Syria's primary significance in monastic development, evident in Egyptian use of the Syriac abba, "father," extends to the missionary monasticism of the Persian Church and beginnings in E Asia Minor. Here the exaggerations of Eustathius* of Sebaste condemned at the Council of Gangra (c.343) as well as Messalian aberrations fostered suspicions largely overcome by Basil* of Caesarea (d.379). Abjuring solitude and ascetic athletics in favor of a "brotherhood" of love and service modeled on primitive ascetic groups, Basil guaranteed the ecclesiastical acceptance of monasticism in Asia Minor, e.g., in Constantinople in the 380s. Basil's informal Rules influenced most subsequent Eastern developments.

The independence and individualism of early Eastern monasticism were progressively eliminated through the discipline of rules and subjection to the church's hierarchy, notably by the canons of Chalcedon. The monks were prominent in the Origenist controversies, intervened tempestuously in the fifth-century christological disputes, and became Byzantine Church's "democratic front."

Monasticism came to the West from the East with travelers like the exiled Athanasius* and Jerome* and through accounts of Egyptian happenings. From the first its impact was felt in clerical and cultured circles as nowhere in the East. The clerical groups in N Italy around Eusebius of Vercelli* (d.371) and later Jerome and Rufinus* were followed by the championship of monasticism by Ambrose* in Milan and Augustine* in North Africa. (In North Africa the Circumcellions* had earlier largely cornered asceticism for the Donatists.* Similarly in Spain the heretical Priscillianists* discredited asceticism.) Jerome's ascetic propaganda attracted a following among the Roman artistocracy, though also ecclesiastical disfavor. Anchoritic ideals had most influence in Gaul through the early efforts of Martin of Tours* (d.397) and later John Cassian (d.435), and in Celtic Ireland where in the sixth century through influences deriving in part directly from the E Mediterranean, the whole church assumed a monastic mold in which penitential rigors and (missionary) exile were prominent.

Monastic rules multiplied in the fifth and sixth centuries (cf. Augustine, Caesarius of Arles,* Columban), only to be overshadowed in due course by the Rule of Benedict* (c.540), now agreed to be largely based on the Rule of the Master (c.530). The Benedictine pattern, delivered from Benedict's isolationism, dominated developments in medieval Europe. In the Byzantine Church Basil was revered as the patriarch of monasticism, while Theodore of Studium* (d.826) was a significant later monastic organizer.

MONICA (331/2-387). More correctly "Monnica," a Berber name. Mother of Augustine of Hippo.* The child of Christian parents, strongly influenced by her nurse, she married Patricius of Tagaste (in Numidia), a pagan with civic (curial) responsibilities, limited means and a disorderly temper, who became a Christian shortly before he died in 372. Their children included Navigius (converted with Augustine); a daughter who as a widow headed a convent in Hippo for which Augustine later wrote the basis of the "Rule of St. Augustine"; Augustine (probably the youngest); and possibly another son and daughter. Augustine's Confessions depict Monica as his spiritual mother who pursued him with prayers, tears, and admonitions to Carthage and Milan, une femme formidable of strong but simple piety, whose designs for his career sometimes conflicted with her purposes for his religious advancement. In Augustine's Cassiciacum writings she possesses an uncomplicated oracular wisdom, and she died at Ostia after sharing with Augustine a vision of (Neoplatonic?) mystic ecstasy. Part of her original epitaph inscription was rediscovered there in 1945. Her cult was promoted by the translation of her relics to near Arras (1162) and to Rome (1430). She remains a hagiographers' favorite.

MONK. A word of uncertain origin, probably from Greek monos ("alone") through Latin monicus and Old English munuc. It denotes a member of a religious community living under the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. It has never acquired a clear-cut technical sense, but its use is properly confined to groups in which community life is an integral element, and not extended to later developments, e.g., the Mendicant orders.

MONOD, ADOLPHE (1802-1856). The greatest French Protestant preacher of the nineteenth century, he was the leader of Le Réveil, a powerful orthodox movement within the Reformed Church and other churches. At first Monod shunned the Geneva revival espoused by his brother Frédéric. After theological study (1820-24), he was pastor of a French congregation in Naples (1825-27). Contacts with the Scot, Thomas Erskine,* led him to conversion and the acceptance of orthodox theology. Although he briefly held to a schismatic position while a pastor at Lyons, after serving as a theological professor (1836-47) at Montauban he defended the Reformed Church. His greatest influence was reached while pastor of the prestigious Oratoire Church in Paris (1847-56). His published sermons were very popular in France and abroad.

ROBERT P. EVANS

MONOD, FRÉDÉRIC (1794-1863). French Protestant pastor. Brother of Adolphe,* he contributed heavily to the success of the French Protestant Réveil as editor, pastor, and leader. His own faith was kindled under the teaching of Robert Haldane while a theological student at Geneva. After briefly assisting his father, Pastor Jean Monod, in Paris, he became pastor of Oratoire Church in 1832. As editor for forty-three years of the periodical Archives du christianisme au dix-neuvieme siècle, Monod helped to formulate the orthodox views of an enlarging element of French Protestantism. He fought church subservience to the state and demanded a conservative Reformed creed. In 1849 Monod led dissident Reformed congregations into a union of free churches, based on strict orthodoxy, which still exists today. ROBERT P. EVANS

MONOPHYSITISM. Monophysitism was a controversial issue in the Eastern Church causing lasting divisions. Included in this controversy are not just religious factors, but political ones also.

The fourth ecumenical council, at Chalcedon* (451), was called into session in order to pacify the spirit of conflict which arose in regard to the nature and person of Jesus Christ. Pope Leo of Rome had written his Dogmatic Tome for the Ephesus meeting held two years prior to the Chalcedon Council. Since the Ephesus conference turned out to be such a disgrace, often referred to as the Council of Robbers (see EPHESUS, ROBBER SYNOD OF), the Chalcedon session condemned the action in Ephesus and accepted Pope Leo's document as the rule of faith. The council went on to approve and to present the famous text of the dogma of Chalcedon.

This text issued at Chalcedon presented both sides of the Incarnation clearly, without getting involved in a philosophical explanation as to how the two natures of Christ are united. They proclaimed him "truly God and truly man." At the same time the council was careful to point out that part of the uniqueness of Christ was that He was one in person and substance, not divided into two persons.

Unfortunately, unity did not proceed from the Council of Chalcedon. Instead of ending the controversy, it was but the beginning of a dispute which would have an immediate effect on the Christian church over the next two centuries as well as a lasting effect. The opposition to the two natures of Christ became known as "Monophysitism." The name comes from the two Greek words monos ("only") and fusis ("nature"). The main emphasis of this movement was that there is but one nature in the Incarnation and not two. This, they felt, was the only way to protect the teaching of the unity of Christ's person. To ascribe two natures to Christ was a denial that man could gain ultimate oneness with God which was the goal of salvation. The result of this emphasis is to play down the manhood of Christ and relegate it to the realm of unimportance.

This reaction to orthodoxy which seems to suddenly emerge after Chalcedon in reality goes back to previous aspects of Christian history. Part of its roots can be traced to Christian monasticism as practiced in the Syro-Palestinian region and in Egypt. The monks were in constant battle against their own human weakness and sinfulness. To overcome one's humanity was to gain Christian victory. That which was identified as human had to be destroyed within one's character. For Christ to have a similar human nature as their own would be unthinkable to the Eastern monk.

Monophysitism was also a reaction to Nestorianism.* Nestorius, who became patriarch of Constantinople in 428, was opposed to the expression applied to Mary as "the mother of God." Mary, he felt, was the mother of Christ, but not the mother of the eternal Logos.* Nestorianism took the views of its founder a bit further than he intended. It pressed the distinction of the two natures of Christ to the extent of a double personality. Jesus was not the God-man, but instead, the God-bearing man. This led to a definite duality in the person of Christ.

Monophysitism was extremely popular among the laity of the Eastern churches. This mob popularity often found expression in many outbursts of violence such as in Alexandria, Antioch, and other church centers in the Middle East. Even to this day this issue on the nature of Christ is one of the main theological divisions between several of the Eastern churches.

See W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (1972). GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

MONOTHEISM. The belief that there is one, personal, transcendent God, who is the creator and ruler of the universe. Monotheism is apparently solely the outcome of revelation and is represented by Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The claim for a primitive monotheism finds support among certain primitive tribes, but if true it has not influenced the world religions. There is no evidence for any development in nature religions from animism through polytheism to monotheism; the final goal of development seems always to have been pantheism, or exceptionally dualism. Equally, philosophical speculation and mysticism seem incapable of reaching the concept of a single, personal God, separate from matter.

Though the OT ridicules polytheism, it does not seek to establish monotheism by intellectual argument, but rather bases it on the experience of God's acts for those who trust Him alone. This attitude, displayed first by the patriarchs and Moses, is called "ethical monotheism," for it shows itself primarily in a life of trust; its rejection of polytheism bases itself primarily on the impotence of the heathen, nature deities. While popular Christianity has often compromised its claims to monotheism, the NT, the Christian creeds, and the standard theologians have throughout maintained a strictly monotheistic position, the reconciliation of it with the doctrine of the Trinity being regarded as a divine mystery.

MONOTHELITES. The question whether there were two wills (Dyothelitism) or one will (Monothelitism) in the Word made flesh was inevitable. The Chalcedon* settlement had insisted on the doctrine of the two natures in the incarnate Son. But some of the followers of Cyril* of Alexandria, believing that any suggestion of a duality must lead straight back to Nestorianism* were dissatisfied. These opponents of Chalcedon became known as Monophysites. Holding that the term "nature" and "person" are synonymous, they sought to secure the Cyrillian formula, "one nature in the Word made flesh." Cyril had accepted the Chalcedon terms, but in his endeavor to overcome any idea of a Nestorian juxtaposition of natures, had allowed himself to use the phrase "one nature." His Monophysite followers were less concerned to maintain the two-natures doctrine. Under the influence of Leontius of Byzantium* (sixth century), however, an interpretation of Chalcedon in a Cyrillian sense was effected. But dissatisfaction with the settlement continued and found expression in a renewed conflict over whether there were two wills or one possessed by the "two-natured" Christ.

Clearly the ethical complement of Monophysitism* is Monothelitism. Thus to allow one will would be to sanction Monothelitism. In order to clear up the issue—which, like the preceding controversy over Dyophysitism and Monophysitism, nearly tore the empire asunder—the emperor Heraclius instructed Sergius* (d.638), patriarch of Constantinople, to find a formula of mediation, which would pacify the Monophysites. Sergius thereupon advanced the thesis that the Word-made-flesh did all things through the action of a single divine-human energy.

The formula was however, opposed by Sophronius,* later to become patriarch of Jerusalem, and this compelled Sergius to restate his position. He then set aside the idea of "energy" and affirmed the existence of one will in the divine-human Christ. But to the upholders of the Chalcedon doctrine, two natures implied two centers of volition. A heated controversy over the issue followed until the Council of Constantinople* (681), the sixth ecumenical council of the church, ruled out—though probably wrongly—Monothelitism, and settled for Dyothelitism—for two wills—as being more in harmony with that of two uncompounded natures in Christ for which Chalcedon had declared. MONTANISM. Shortly after the middle of the second century Montanus proclaimed the imminent advent of the New Jerusalem, the signal for which was to be a new outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The movement that followed had its chief strength in Phrygia.

Montanus, a new convert to Christianity, believed himself to be the appointed prophet of God, and his followers were encouraged to regard themselves as an élite of "spiritual" Christians. Preparation for the advent was to be preceded by withdrawal from the world. Special fast-days were called, and persecution was to be expected, even encouraged, so that the church would be a purified and fit Bride for the coming Christ.

Opposition to the movement was initiated by Pope Eleutherus and taken up by writers such as Miltiades* and Apollinarius.* In 230, the group was virtually excommunicated: the Synod of Iconium refused to recognize the validity of Montanist baptism. Montanism continued as an underground movement, chiefly as a protest against growing formalism and worldliness in the official church. The most illustrious product of Montanism was Tertullian.* The movement bears resemblance to the many illuminist and millenarian sects that flourished at the time of the Reformation and subsequently. MONTEVERDI, CLAUDIO (1567-1643). "Creator of modern music." Perhaps the greatest musical genius of his generation, he excelled in all the musical forms of his day. If not an innovator, he had the ability to seize on new ideas and modes of musical expression and bring them to fruition. He composed church music both in the older Renaissance style (prima prattica) and in the new Baroque style (secunda prattica) with its freer use of dissonance and chromaticism, and he defended his methods eloquently in print against his critics. He succeeded Giovanni Gabrieli at St. Mark's in Venice, where Heinrich Schütz returned, a mature composer, to learn further from him. Much of his exciting church music had just recently been explored. In the secular field, he was the last great madrigalist and the first great writer of opera. J.B. MAC MILLAN

MONTGOMERY, JAMES (1771-1854). Hymnwriter. Born at Irvine, Scotland, son of a Moravian missionary, he worked in Yorkshire stores before joining the Sheffield Register as an assistant in 1792. Four years later he became editor, and for thirty-one years he continued to edit the renamed Sheffield Iris. Twice he was imprisoned for radical political opinions. He advocated foreign missions, the Bible Society, and the abolition of slavery. At various times he associated with Moravians, Wesleyans, and Anglicans. Over fifty of his 400 hymns were contributed to Thomas Cotterill's Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1819 ed.), whose publication led to the quasi-legalization of hymn-singing in the Church of England. Over thirty of Montgomery's hymns are still sung, including "Angels, from the realms of glory," "For ever with the Lord," "Hail to the Lord's Anointed," "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire," and "Stand up and bless the Lord."

MOODY, DWIGHT L(YMAN) (1837-1899). American evangelist. Born at Northfield, Massachusetts, he attended school there until he was thirteen, when he went to work. At seventeen he left Northfield for Boston where he secured employment in a shoestore. Though baptized by a Unitarian minister in Northfield, Moody began attending the Mount Vernon Congregational Church in Boston. Through the influence of his Sunday school teacher, Edward Kimball, he was converted to faith in Christ. Because of his ignorance of church doctrine, he was refused full membership in the church for a year, but was finally received in 1856.

Dissatisfied in Boston, he left for Chicago (1856) where as a traveling salesman he became a successful businessman. He joined Plymouth Church and soon rented four pews for men invited from the hotels and street corners. In 1858 Moody organized the North Market Sabbath School and induced John V. Farwell, a prominent businessman, to serve as superintendent. Two years later he decided to give up business and spend his full time in Sunday school and YMCA work.

During the Civil War he threw himself into work among soldiers while continuing his Chicago Sunday school. He soon established the undenominational Illinois Street Church and traveled often to national Sunday School conventions. At one of these he met Ira D. Sankey,* whom he enlisted as a musical associate.

In 1873 Moody sailed for the British Isles, his third visit. This two-year tour was destined to make him a national figure. Beginning inauspiciously at York, he and Sankey met minor successes in N England and then sudden major victories at Edinburgh and Glasgow. When they invaded London for a four-month period, total attendance at their meetings reached more than 2-1/2 million. Moody returned to the United States in triumph. After a brief time in Northfield he undertook campaigns in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and New York. Careful preparation, cooperation of the churches, and generous publicity became marks of a Moody meeting. After success in these cities he moved on to preach to throngs in Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, St. Louis, Cleveland, and San Francisco.

Moody was not merely a preacher; he was a doer. In 1879 he established a school for girls, Northfield Seminary; two years later a school for boys, Mount Hermon School, followed. In the summer of 1880 he began a summer conference ministry on the grounds of the Northfield Seminary, and in 1886 he started the Chicago Evangelization Society, later to be known as the Moody Bible Institute.

Throughout his life, however, Moody's greatest contribution was evangelism. Some have established that he traveled more than a million miles and addressed more than 100 million people. In the midst of his last evangelistic campaign in Kansas City he became ill. A few days later, in December 1899, death overtook him.

MOORE, GEORGE FOOT (1851-1931). American OT scholar. Born in West Chester, Pennsylvania, he was educated at Yale College, then pursued graduate study at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and Tübingen, Germany. In 1878 he became minister of the Putnam Presbyterian Church of Zanesville, Ohio. He was named Hitchcock professor of Hebrew language and literature (1883) and lecturer in the history of religions (1893) at Andover Theological Seminary, of which he became president in 1899. He moved to Harvard University as professor of theology (1902) and was named Fotheringham professor of the history of religions (1904), which post he held until retirement. Firmly committed to the documentary hypothesis of the Hexateuch, he initially extended these notions to a detailed analysis of Judges (1895; "Polychrome Bible," 1898; Hebrew text, 1900). A transition in his work is marked by publication in 1914 of his Literature of the Old Testament and the first volume of his History of Religions (vol. 2, 1919). Thereafter he studied Judaism and its normative development, culminating in his Judaism in the Christian Era (2 vols., 1927). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MOOREHEAD, WILLIAM GALLOGLY (1836-1914). American biblical scholar. Born in Rix Mills, Ohio, he was educated at Muskingum College and Xenia Seminary, was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1862, and held pastorates in Ohio and Pennsylvania. For some eight years from 1862 he was a missionary to Italy, and on his return was pastor, 1870-85. From 1873 to 1914 he was professor of Greek exegesis and biblical literature in Xenia Seminary, where he was president also from 1899. An editor of the "Scofield Bible," leader in the Bible Conference and Student Volunteer movements, he was visiting lecturer at several Bible schools. He was also a dispensationalist and wrote many tracts and essays as well as biblical commentaries.

MORALITY PLAY. This, like the mystery and miracle plays, was a distinct genre of religious drama which developed in the early fifteenth century with particular popularity in England, France, and the Netherlands. The morality plays perhaps developed from the sermon or homily and taught practical truth at a popular level. Their distinctive element is the portrayal of the cosmic struggle for the soul of man in his lifelong quest for salvation through the allegorical dramatization which personifies virtues (or the forces of good) and vices (the forces of evil).

Perhaps the earliest morality play is The Castle of Perseverance (c.1400-1420) which is characteristic of the early plays since nearly all the themes, later singly presented, are combined. The Castle presents the various stages of the life of Mankind (Humanum Genus) from birth and baptism through a life of sin till about forty, a period of about twenty years of sanctity, and finally old age and the dominance of the vice of covetousness, to death and a post death debate for Mankind's soul before God's throne. Other fifteenth-century morality plays are The Pride of Life; Wisdom; Mankind (which introduces comedy into this genre); Mundus et Infans; and the very popular Dutch play, Everyman. In the sixteenth century the themes are fewer, the plays more elaborate, and the messages more adapted to propaganda and secular motifs, as in Skelton's Magnyfycence (1533) portraying a political prince; John Bale's Protestant polemic King Johan (about 1538); or its Catholic counterpart Respublica (1553). The morality plays heavily influenced later English drama. For example, Marlowe's Doctor Faustus or Dekker's Old Fortunatus.

MORAL THEOLOGY. The application of the Christian teachings of natural law and revelation to ethical issues. It has largely been associated with the Roman Catholic Church as the infallible guide and interpreter of revelation and (sometimes) understood as casuistry in the pejorative sense of elaborate and petty legalisms. Moral theology can best be regarded, not as an attempt to provide detailed answers in advance, but as the provision of a cumulative wisdom derived from its sources which can be useful to Christians facing moral problems. These sources are Scripture, reason illuminated by faith, and the teaching of the church (specially as found in Thomas Aquinas* and Alphonsus Liguori*), but the weight attached to these sources varies, the Catholic tradition putting more emphasis than the Protestant on the last.

Some Protestants have written works of moral theology, notably the Anglican Jeremy Taylor* and the Puritan Richard Baxter,* while twentieth-century Anglicans in the Catholic tradition —such as K.E. Kirk,* R.C. Mortimer, and Herbert Waddams have sought to revive interest in the subject. In general, Protestant theologians use the term "Christian ethics," which concerns itself largely with general principles, over against "moral theology," which applies general principles to particular cases. The Protestant tradition, reacting against the danger of legalism in moral theology, stresses the individual and subjective aspects of the moral life—personal devotion and obedience to God's will.

The history of moral theology suggests there is a recurrent danger of a type of legalistic casuistry which is divorced from the wholeness of Christian living and which, at its worst, appears concerned to discover how much moral responsibility can be evaded. The connection of moral theology with the confessional and the inevitable links with canon law regulations tended to foster the legalistic and external aspects in the Roman tradition, but recent writing has shown a trend toward a wholeness of approach in moral theology involving the related subjects of ascetic, sacramental, and pastoral theology. HOWARD SAINSBURY

MORAVIAN BRETHREN (Unitas Fratrum). Church of the United Brethren, reborn following the decline of the Bohemian Brethren* after the Thirty Years' War. Fugitives from Moravia found refuge on the estates of N.L. Count von Zinzendorf* in Saxony (1722). Joined by others from Bohemia, in association with some German Pietists, they worshiped at Bertholdsdorf Lutheran church under Pastor J.A. Rothe. About 1724 they decided to set up a church constituted according to the old Unitas Fratrum; an agreement permitted them to manage their own spiritual affairs while still worshiping at Bertholdsdorf (1727). Zinzendorf, gradually drawn into their affairs, became superintendent, and succeeding months saw a great spiritual awakening. Their orders of ministry were restored when David Nitschmann* was consecrated bishop by Daniel Jablonski*, bishop of the sole remaining branch of the Bohemian Brethren in Poland (1735). After Zinzendorf's death (1760) the movement was reorganized under a governing body, the "Unity Elders' Conference," whose influential president for many years was A.G. Spangenberg.* The Moravians led eighteenth-century German evangelicalism in the controversy with rationalism.

It was essentially a missionary movement. As early as 1732, Nitschmann and J.L. Dober* went to St. Thomas, Virgin Islands; work followed in Greenland (1733), North America (1734), Lapland and South America (1735), South Africa (1736), Labrador (1771), among Australian aborigines (1850), and on the Tibetan border (c.1856). The proportion of missionaries to home communicants has been estimated as 1:60 compared with 1:5000 in the rest of Protestantism. Moravian influence was a major factor in the Evangelical Revival in Britain. John Wesley owed his conversion largely to the Moravian Peter Boehler.* The movement grew in Britain and was legally recognized as a church in 1749. Concern for education had been inherited from the Bohemian Brethren, and numerous boarding schools were established in Germany, Holland, England, Switzerland, and America.

The Brethren did not always encourage the establishment of local churches, preferring to remain as "a Church within a Church"—e.g., in Lutheranism and Anglicanism. This "Diaspora concept" militated against the survival of the movement in many areas. It is an episcopal church with presbyterian government; the Unity Elders' Conference is appointed by the General Synod. It is divided into autonomous "Home" Provinces (Continental, British, and American), and "Mission" Provinces in transition to autonomy. Each congregation manages its own affairs subject to the general laws of the province. Worship combines liturgy with freedom in extempore prayer. In the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter, and deacon, the bishop is the minister of ordination. Infant and believer's baptism are both provided, followed by confirmation. The Moravians had the earliest Protestant hymnbook. Doctrine is basically that of the Augsburg Confession,* though liberty of view is permitted in nonessentials. Strongly evangelical, the movement considers Scripture to be the only rule of faith and conduct.

MORE, HANNAH (1745-1833). English writer and philanthropist. She was born near Bristol and spent the early part of her life in the city, where she and her sisters had a successful school. An unexpected settlement gave her financial independence and enabled her to exploit a remarkable range of literary and artistic gifts, which were combined with marked administrative ability. The abilities were exploited differently in two phases of her life. In the first phase she was part of the London literary scene, in which she was much admired, and an associate of Samuel Johnson, Horace Walpole, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and above all of David Garrick, who aided the production of her plays. In the second phase of her life, from the 1780s, John Newton* became a strong influence and she was brought into close contact with the entire evangelical community centered on Clapham.*

Though her later philanthropic and evangelistic activities were centered on the Mendip hills, her influence was widespread. She was much inspired by W. Wilberforce,* who together with Henry Thornton financed many of her activities. The local action was based on a Sunday school at Cheddar, to which was attached a school of industry, with training first of all in spinning and later in domestic service. The effort was extended throughout the Mendips. Hannah More's wider influence came through the use of her literary gifts in producing religious tracts, notably from about 1788 when she aimed at producing cheap tracts for a wide range of readers. The result, financed by Thornton, was the series of Cheap Repository Tracts. Though the connection is not clear, some of the inspiration of the Religious Tract Society can be traced to the success of Hannah More's work.

It is not surprising that a woman of Hannah More's ability encountered controversy. Partly her troubles arose from personal determination, for she was not easily thwarted once she embarked on a course of action. Hence the significance of William Cobbett's description of her as the "Old Bishop in Petticoats." Subsequent commentators have been as critical, especially because she failed to denounce many injustices and in particular assumed that the existing social structure was divinely ordained. She held that, though the condition of the poor should be relieved as far as possible, they had to accept their position and be comforted with the thought of future recompense. But that was an attitude shown by many, especially as fears of revolution became widespread at the end of the eighteenth century.

Hannah More never married but, following the custom of the time, assumed the designation of "Mrs."

MORE, HENRY (1614-1687). English philosopher and poet. Educated at Eton and Cambridge, he was one of the more famous members of a seventeenth-century group of English ministers, moralists, and scholars known as the Cambridge Platonists.* At Cambridge he was elected to a fellowship at Christ's College, where he remained until his death. Heavily influenced by Joseph Mede,* More rejected a rigorous Calvinism and read widely in Aristotle and the Scholastics. However, he felt they did not give a satisfactory explanation of the relationship of the soul to God, so he turned to mysticism and Neoplatonism. He came to believe that knowledge of the eternal was dependent on moral perfection achieved through subduing egoism. On this basis he tried to defend Christianity against its greatest "enemies": atheism, Roman Catholicism, and "enthusiasm." His writings include An Antidote Against Atheism (1653); Conjectura Cabbalistica (1653); A Brief Discourse of the Nature, Causes, Kinds and Cure of Enthusiasm (1656); The Grand Mystery of Godliness (1660); and An Antidote Against Idolatry (1674).

MORE, SIR THOMAS (1478-1535). English lord chancellor. Of a prominent London burgess family, he was educated at Oxford, at one time thought of becoming a priest, but eventually turned to law, although at all times he sought to live a very ascetic life. In 1504 he entered Parliament and subsequently rose to the position of chancellor after the fall of Wolsey in 1529. He was knighted in 1521. Although a devout Roman Catholic, he was very much taken with the humanism of the time, as indicated by his large circle of friends such as Dean Colet, Erasmus, Holbein, and others who were prominent in literary and artistic circles.

Noted for his fairness and clemency as a judge, More also became greatly interested in social reform. Out of this concern came his book Utopia, in which he sought to describe an ideal state where there was no private property or money, but all things were in common. Religious freedom, with a few exceptions, was also maintained. Yet, his advocacy of religious toleration and his close connection with many of the Renaissance humanists notwithstanding, he was no Protestant, and he wrote a number of books against William Tyndale and Martin Luther. He may also have helped Henry VIII* write his defense of the seven sacraments. Because of his strong Roman Catholic beliefs he came into conflict with Henry over the latter's desire to have his marriage to Catherine of Aragon annulled—and because of his refusal to take the oath renouncing the authority of the pope. As a result he was executed. He was beatified by Leo XIII in 1886. W.S. REID

MORGAN, G(EORGE) CAMPBELL (1863-1945). Bible teacher and preacher. Born in a Gloucestershire village, son of a Baptist minister who had resigned his living to start a faith mission in a hired hall, he was reared in a religious atmosphere, preaching his first sermon at thirteen. Without academic training, he joined the staff of a Jewish school, learning much from the headmaster, a rabbi. After rejection by the Salvation Army and the Methodists, he was accepted by the Congregationalists as a fulltime minister and was pastor of many churches, including Westminster Chapel, London (1904-17 and 1933-45), and president of Cheshunt College, Cambridge (1911-14). Morgan traveled much, especially during 1919-32; his preaching and Bible expositions attracted great crowds with numerous conversions. His literary output of Bible notes, sermons, and commentaries was immense. R.E.D. CLARK

MORGAN, WILLIAM (1541?-1604). Welsh bishop and Bible translator. Born at Ty Mawr, Wybrnant, in the parish of Penmachno, Caernarvonshire, about 1541, he was the son of a tenant on the Gwydir estates. Graduate of Cambridge, he probably began his career as a clergyman in 1572 and served in a number of livings, including Llanrhaeadr-ym-Mochnant (1578-95?), the place with which his name is most closely associated. He was harassed by critics and personal enemies with the result that he was implicated in suits and countersuits in the Court of Star Chamber and before the Council of the Marches, 1589-91. In 1595 he was consecrated bishop of Llandaff and was translated in 1601 to St. Asaph, where his zeal to defend the privileges of his diocese brought him into bitter conflict with local magnates.

Although he had a troubled career, the evidence seems to reveal him as a man of principle and a conscientious promoter of the good of his flock, not least in his emphasis on the need for preaching. His greatest title to the gratitude of Welsh people, however, was his work as translator of the Bible. John Whitgift* warmly patronized the work, and it was printed in London and published in 1588. By any standard it is a superb piece of work. Although subsequently revised, it is substantially still the Bible used by Welsh readers.

Morgan was an ideal man for the task of translating. His training at Cambridge under such scholars as Immanuel Tremellius, and his familiarity with the work of translating already done on the Continent and in England, provided him with the necessary academic equipment. On the other hand, his deep roots in the classical tradition of Welsh literature give his prose a rare dignity. His Bible is the virtual basis of modern Welsh prose-writing and the foundation for modern Welsh Protestantism. In that way William Morgan's Bible has had a more profound influence on the creation of modern Wales than any other single book in the nation's history.

R. TUDUR JONES

MORISON, JAMES (1816-1893). Founder of the Evangelical Union. Born at Bathgate, son of a Secession minister, he was educated at Edinburgh, licensed to preach by the United Secession Church* in 1839, and in the following year became minister of Clerk's Lane Church, Kilmarnock. His views on the universal nature of the Atonement soon led to suspension from the ministry of his denomination, but joined by three others, including his own father, he founded the Evangelical Union in 1843 (popularly known as Morisonians). His remarkable gifts as a preacher drew huge congregations, and this continued after he moved to Glasgow to become the first minister of Dundas Street Church, with which post he combined the principalship of the theological hall he established.

Initially regarded as a heretic, he became one of the most trusted and outstanding theologians of his time, a fact acknowledged by Glasgow University, which made him a D.D. in 1883. When he visited America he was warmly welcomed by the Cumberland Presbyterians,* who shared his dislike of strict Calvinism. His ministry is summarized on the monument erected to him in Glasgow. Among his published works was a remarkable exposition of Romans 9, a new edition of which was called for forty years later, and commentaries on Matthew (1870) and Mark (1873).

Early on, the Evangelical Union was joined by others leaving the Scottish Congregational Union. Four years after its jubilee, the Evangelical Union brought to its union with Scottish Congregationalists some ninety congregations, ranging from Orkney to Dumfriesshire.

MORMONISM. On 6 April 1830, the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," more commonly known as the "Mormon Church," was organized at Fayette, New York. Soon the group moved to Kirtland, Ohio, not far from present-day Cleveland. Under the leadership of Joseph Smith,* the community now moved to Jackson County, Missouri. Because of opposition encountered there, the group went on to Nauvoo, Illinois. After Smith was killed by a mob, most members of the Mormon Community followed Brigham Young,* the new leader, and settled in what is now Salt Lake City, Utah, where the church still has its headquarters. Independence, Missouri, is the headquarters of the largest of the splinter groups: the "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," the current membership of which is about 200,000. The world membership of the Mormon Church at present is approaching the three-million mark, of which rather more than two-thirds reside in the USA. Mormon temples are found, not only in the USA, but in four foreign countries.

The Mormon Church uses, in addition to the King James Version of the Bible, the following sacred books as its main sources of authority: The Book of Mormon; Doctrine and Covenants; and The Pearl of Great Price. It is also believed that the president of the church may receive revelations for the guidance of the church as a whole. By thus adding to the Bible their own additional sacred books, Mormons have placed themselves outside of historic Christianity, which recognizes the Bible alone as the final source of authority.

An examination of the doctrines taught by the Mormon Church will reveal that they deny most of the cardinal teachings of the Christian faith. Mormonism rejects the spirituality of God, claiming that God the Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's. Further, it is taught that there are a great many gods in addition to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; these gods are in an order of progression, some being in a more advanced stage than others. Mormonism also teaches that the gods were once men, and that men may become gods. If a man faithfully observes all the precepts of the Mormon religion, he may advance to godhood in the life to come. One of the early presidents of the Mormon Church, Lorenzo Snow, summed it up: "As man is, God once was; as God is, man may become."

In the area of the doctrine of man, Mormonism teaches man's preexistence. All men existed as spirits before coming to this earth. This preexistent life was a period of probation. Those who were less faithful or less valiant than others during this period of probation are born on this earth with black skins. In Mormon teaching, further, the fall of man is considered a fall upward! If Adam had not eaten the forbidden fruit, he would have had no children; because he ate the fruit, man is now able to propagate the race. "Adam fell that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy" (2 Nephi 2:22-25).

Though Christ is called divine in Mormon teaching, his divinity is not unique, since it is the same as that which any man may attain. Christ's incarnation, too, is not unique, for all the gods, after having first existed as spirits, came to an earth to receive bodies before they advanced to godhood. Christ is said to have made atonement for our sins; what this means, however, is that Christ earned for all men the right to be raised from the dead. On the doctrine of salvation, Mormon teaching says that justification by faith alone is a pernicious doctrine which has exercised an influence for evil. One is saved through faith in Christ (plus faith in Joseph Smith), but especially through works. By the works one does in this life he merits his salvation.

The entire Christian Church is said to have been apostate until 1830, at which time it was restored under the leadership of Joseph Smith. The Mormon Church, therefore, claims to be the only true church. Baptism is said to be absolutely necessary for salvation; it must be done by immersion. Though infant baptism is rejected, Mormon children are usually baptized when they are eight years old. The Lord's Supper is administered weekly, though water is substituted for wine.

Mormons believe in a literal millennium during which Christ will reign over the earth from two capitals: Jerusalem and Independence, Missouri. In the final state the devil, his angels, and a small portion of the human race will be consigned to hell. Most human beings, however, will be assigned a place in one of three heavenly kingdoms: the celestial, the terrestrial, or the telestial.

MORNAY, PHILIPPE DE (Seigneur du Plessis-Marly; Duplessis-Mornay) (1549-1623). French Huguenot* leader. Born at Buhy in Normandy and originally intended for the priesthood, he adopted Protestantism upon his father's death (1559), largely through his mother's influence. He excelled in classical studies at the University of Paris (1560-67), then was a traveling scholar at the universities of Geneva, Basle, Heidelberg, Padua et al. (1567-72). This wide experience may explain his characteristic tolerant and broad-minded spirit. Returning to France convinced that the nation's foreign policy must be anti-Hapsburg, he associated with Coligny* and narrowly escaped the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre.* He fled to England, but returned in 1573 counseling moderation. In 1576 he married the remarkable Charlotte Arbaleste, shortly thereafter entering the serving of Henry IV* (of Navarre) as soldier, diplomat, and adviser. He served Henry so brilliantly he became known as the "Huguenot Pope." In 1589 he was appointed governor of the Huguenot stronghold of Saumur where he founded the greatest of the Huguenot Academies (1603). Bitterly disappointed by Henry IV's conversion (1593), he served him faithfully till callously disgraced in 1600. He was instrumental in the drafting of the Edict of Nantes* (1598). In 1600 he retired to Saumur, but continued to exert a powerful, moderating voice in the turbulent Huguenot affairs till he died at his castle of La Forest-sur-Sèvre.

MORONE, GIOVANNI (1509-1580). Bishop of Modena. While bishop of Modena from 1529 Morone became close friends with the group of Catholic reformers gathered around Pole,* Contarini,* Cortese,* and Flaminio. Pope Paul III sent Morone to Germany as a nuncio in 1536. After attending Ratisbon with Contarini in 1541, Morone submitted an important memorandum to Rome. When he became a cardinal in 1542, heresy broke out in Modena. The academy signed a confession of faith prepared by Cortese and Contarini which involved Morone as bishop. Unpublished letters from his vicar in Modena prove that Morone knew what was happening and approved of its progress. As cardinal he became papal governor in Bologna at Contarini's death. From 1553-55 he studied the English problem and attended the Diet of Augsburg (1555). Paul IV seized Morone and cast him into the Castel Sant' Angelo during 1557-59. As president at the Council of Trent* during 1563, Morone made possible the effective reforms of the church. His latter work in Germany deserves a full-scale study. Among other tributes in his founding of the German College in Rome (1552) and his work at the 1576 Regensburg Diet.* MARVIN W. ANDERSON

MORRIS, GEORGE FREDERICK BINGLEY (1884-1965). Anglican bishop. Born in Edinburgh and graduate of Cambridge, where he was active in student evangelistic work, he led a pioneer party of the Africa Inland Mission into the NE Belgian Congo in 1913, later becoming field director of the AIM in the Congo and West Nile Uganda. From 1932 he served the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society in Morocco, followed by some years of parish work in England before consecration by William Temple* in 1943 as bishop in North Africa. He resigned in 1954 to become rector of Christ Church, Hillbrow, Johannesburg, and the following year accepted election as bishop of the Church of England in South Africa which had long been without episcopal ministrations. His action was condemned by the archbishop of Canterbury, who claimed that he had put himself out of communion with the Church of England (which body was later to insist on reordination of a clergyman ordained by Morris). This did not modify Morris's stand; in 1959, acting alone, he consecrated Stephen Bradley, who continued as bishop in South Africa after Morris's death. D.G.L. CRAGG

MORRISON, ROBERT (1782-1834). Missionary to China. Born in Northumberland of Scottish Presbyterian artisan parents, he was converted when an apprentice at Newcastle. He educated himself and in 1802 went to a Dissenting academy near London, became a Congregationalist, and offered to the London Missionary Society, then looking for someone to translate and distribute the Bible in the almost totally closed Chinese Empire. Morrison learned the rudiments of a language nearly unknown in England, was ordained, and in 1807 sailed to Canton via the USA and Cape Horn, because the controlling East India Company refused to transport missionaries.

He could never get farther than the (trading) "Factories" at Canton. He saw scarcely any converts; he could remain only because he learned Chinese so well that he swiftly became the official Company interpreter. But his single-minded, rather dour devotion was eminently suitable for the lonely, discouraging task of laying the necessary foundation on which others could build when China opened to the West. He completed a translation of the whole Bible by 1818. His dictionary (1821) was the standard work until long after China opened fully. He wrote tracts and hymns.

When he obtained an assistant, William Milne,* in 1813, Morrison sent him to found an Anglo-Chinese college in Malacca, an important element in the eventual growth of missions in China. He encouraged work among expatriate Chinese and dreamed of opening Japan. On his one return to Britain, in 1824, now famous, he promoted understanding of China and concern for its evangelization. Dying alone in Canton eight years before missionaries were admitted anywhere else, this austere Scot is the father of Protestant missions in China.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

MORTMAIN. The third reissue of Magna Carta (1217) forbade subtenants to donate lands fraudulently to "any religious house" and then receive them back at a rent. Such donations enabled subtenants to evade paying their superior lords feudal incidents like wardships and reliefs, legally due from the lands. These donations were known as gifts into mortmain. In 1279 Edward I's famous statute of mortmain forbade any gifts of land to ecclesiastical corporations, regardless of whether they were to be received back or not, or whether the superior lords had consented. In practice a license permitting such gifts was obtainable from the king for a fee, and thousands of licenses were granted. Mortmain Acts were also passed in 1290, 1391, 1531, 1736, and 1888. The 1960 Charities Act abolished mortmain. PETER TOON

MORTON, JOHN (d.1912). Founder of the Canadian Presbyterian Mission to the East Indians in Trinidad, brought in as indentured labor for the sugar industry after emancipation. Social and religious factors inhibited their integration into Trinidadian Christianity, and Morton was sent to open a special mission to them. From 1868 until his death he was the leader of the mission which included, besides Trinidad, work in Guyana, St. Lucia, Grenada, and Jamaica. His approach was based on both education and evangelism. Although the Indian churches are small, his emphasis on schools enabled the Indians for the first time to make their way in the West Indies.* Considerable assistance came almost inadvertently from the Trinidad government which in Morton's time began to encourage the Indians to stay in the island. On the question of indentured immigration, Morton was conservative, accepting the system as he knew it, and was particularly enthusiastic about independent Indian settlement.

GEOFFREY JOHNSTON

MOSHEIM, JOHANN LORENTZ VON (1694-1755). Lutheran church historian. Born in Lubeck of a Roman Catholic father and a Lutheran mother, he became a Lutheran, was educated in Lubeck and at the University of Kiel, where he became a faculty member. Later he moved to Helmstadt (1723), thence to Göttingen (1747) where he became chancellor. Theologically mediating between the Pietists and the Deists, he opposed both groups. Although he contributed to most fields of theology, his principal works were in church history, which he endeavored to make more scientific and objective. His interests extended even to Chinese church history. His most important work was Institutiones historiae ecclesiasticae antiquae et recentioris (1755), of which a number of English translations were published in the nineteenth century. W.S. REID

MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH (1865-1955). Pioneer of the twentieth-century ecumenical movement. Born in New York, he was converted through the ministry of J.E.K. Studd at Cornell. He became in 1888 general secretary of the Student YMCA and chairman of the Student Volunteer Movement* for Foreign Missions. Thereafter he toured the world ceaselessly, promoting Christian missions, and (what he saw as strategically the same question) Christian ecumenism. He was instrumental in the convening of the 1910 Edinburgh* Missionary Conference, and he presided at most of the sessions and chaired the continuation committee. He thus became in turn chairman of the International Missionary Council* (1921), chairman of the second Life and Work* Conference at Oxford (1937), and vice-chairman of the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches* (1938). Finally in 1948 he became a co-president of the World Council itself.

Methodist and a layman, he possessed both vision and energy in enormous quantities. He helped into being not only world institutions such as those mentioned above, but also a host of national councils of churches, particularly in Asia and Africa, specialist studies in Christian mission (e.g., on the confrontation with Islam), and a whole series of initiatives in relation to Life and Work. His international ecumenical career covered over seventy years, and more than any other man he was the international ecumenical movement in the formative period from 1910 to 1948. His Addresses and Papers (6 vols.) was published in 1946-47.

COLIN BUCHANAN

MOULE, HANDLEY CARR GLYN (1841-1920). Bishop of Durham. Youngest of eight sons of the vicar of Fordington, Dorchester, he like the others was educated at home. After a brilliant career at Cambridge he taught at Marlborough (1865), was ordained (1867), and was curate at Fordington until going to Trinity as junior dean (1873). He became the first principal of Ridley Hall Theological College, Cambridge, in 1881, and Norrisian professor of divinity in 1899. In 1901 he succeeded Westcott as bishop of Durham. Moule was a convinced evangelical, but was able to understand other views. He represented evangelicals at the Round Table Conference on the Holy Communion (1900) and in 1908 chaired the missionary section of the Pan-Anglican Congress. He was closely associated with the Keswick Convention.* A profound scholar, he could speak and write for ordinary people. He wrote many hymns and poems, and his works include expositions and commentaries on nearly all the Epistles, as well as books on devotion and a down-to-earth work, Outlines of Christian Doctrine.

MOULTON, JAMES HOPE (1863-1917). Greek and Iranian scholar. Elder son of W.F. Moulton,* he entered the Methodist ministry in 1886 and in 1902 was appointed NT tutor at the Wesleyan College, Disbury, Manchester. In 1908 he became Greenwood professor of Hellenistic Greek and Indo-European philology in the University of Manchester. He gave the Hibbert Lectures for 1912 which were published as Early Zoroastrianism (1913), but he is best known for his work on the language of the NT. He was to have undertaken a NT grammar with his father, who died before anything was done. He himself managed to produce only the first volume, the Prolegomena to the Grammar of New Testament Greek (1906), but had written much of the second volume. The work was eventually finished by W.F. Howard and N. Turner. He also saw the publication of the first two fascicles of his Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, illustrated from the Papyri and other non-literary Sources (1914-15), which he undertook with G. Milligan (the whole being completed in 1930). His work was especially important for showing the kinship between the Greek of the NT and that of the recently discovered papyri, even if his conclusions were at times overstated. Moulton died from exhaustion after the ship on which he was traveling was torpedoed in the Mediterranean. R.E. NIXON

MOULTON, WILLIAM FIDDIAN (1835-98). Headmaster and biblical scholar. He was born at Leek, Staffordshire, of a strongly Methodist family. In 1858 he entered the Wesleyan ministry and became tutor in classics at Wesley College, Richmond, Surrey. In 1870 he translated from German Winer's Grammar of New Testament Greek, with corrections and a number of additional notes which revealed his competence as a grammarian. There was a new edition of this in 1876, and he had begun a complete revision of it at the time of his death. In 1870 he was appointed to the NT committee working on the Revised Version of the Bible, and was by far its youngest member. In 1875 he was appointed headmaster of the newly founded Leys School, Cambridge, and he stayed there for the rest of his life. In 1897 there was published A Concordance of the Greek Testament which he had undertaken with A.S. Geden, but his own part was restricted through illness and Geden received some help from his colleague's son, J.H. Moulton.* He was president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1890. R.E. NIXON

MOUNTAIN, JACOB (1749-1825). First Anglican bishop of Quebec. He was educated at the Cathedral Grammar School in Norwich and at Caius College, Cambridge, and after being ordained in 1780 held several livings in England. Appointed bishop of the new diocese of Quebec in 1793, he quickly became the center of controversy, for he considered the Anglican Church to be the established church and held that the proceeds from the clergy reserves* were therefore at his disposal—which thinking was deeply resented by the other denominations. His jurisdiction extended over Upper and Lower Canada, and for over thirty years he faithfully administered his large diocese, traveling from one end to the other by sleigh, carriage, canoe, and foot. ROBERT WILSON

MOWINCKEL, SIGMUND OLAF PLYTT (1884-1965). Norwegian biblical scholar. Son of a pastor, he became after theological studies (1902-8) junior curate at Egersund before studying OT theology and Assyriology at Marburg and Giessen (1911-13). His doctor's thesis (1916) was on Nehemiah. He taught OT theology at Oslo University from 1917, having professorial status, 1922-54. Some of his most influential work was done on the Psalms. The Royal Psalms in the Bible (1916) was followed by Psalmenstudien (1921-24), which placed the psalms in their cultic context, interpreting them in the light of this background. His Offersang og Sangoffer (1951) translated into English as The Psalms in Israel's Worship (1963). J.G.G. NORMAN

MOWLL, HOWARD WEST KILVINTON (1890-1958). Archbishop of Sydney. After graduation from Cambridge (1912) and ordination by Bishop E.A. Knox, he became a tutor at Wycliffe College, Toronto, where he taught, apart from one year as an army chaplain in France, until 1922. In that year he was consecrated as an assistant bishop for the diocese of West China, and succeeded William Cassels* as diocesan four years later. His ten years in China were full of travel, adventure, excitement, and development. He was captured and held by brigands; he was attacked and wounded by river pirates. His great contribution to West China was that he saw the need for a strong Chinese Church, and he planned accordingly. He was the bridge from the paternal rule of Bishop Cassels to the progressive aims of Chinese bishops, and he transferred the real control from the missionary conference to the diocesan synod. He went as far as the times would permit; but he looked still further ahead and planned for a division of the diocese so that Chinese bishops might be diocesans in their own right.

In 1933 Mowll was elected archbishop of Sydney, and enthroned in the cathedral in 1934. He entered at once upon a life of such unremitting activity that it left his clergy breathless. He proved himself a great administrator, with a flair for imaginative leadership and organization. The war years brought out all his latent strength in directing church enterprise to the spiritual, moral, and social welfare of men in uniform. He was never afraid to accept and shoulder responsibility, and his aptitude for leadership grew with experience. In 1947 he was elected primate of the Church of England in Australia, and this broadened his whole field of action. Always inspired by fresh thought and distant vision, his creative ministry brought a tremendous stimulus to all kinds of work both in Sydney and in Australia as a whole. He was a convinced and devoted evangelical in faith and churchmanship, but his remarkable gift for friendship enabled him to establish cordial relations with all kinds of people. His death marked the close of the greatest episcopate the Sydney diocese has ever seen.

MARCUS LOANE

MOZART, WOLFGANG AMADEUS (1756-1791). Austrian composer. The meteoric and tragic career of this unique musician began in Salzburg, where his father Leopold was court composer to the ruling archbishop. Taught by his father, and briefly by several outstanding musicians encountered during his childhood travels to the leading musical centers of Europe, Mozart learned to compose with a rapidity and sureness of technique that are almost beyond comprehension. Much of his childhood and youth was spent in musical tours planned by his ambitious father. In his later teens and early twenties he wrote much church music in the classical symphonic style that has since been looked upon as frivolous. As with the similar music of Haydn,* recent criticism has tended to judge it on its true musical merit rather than according to nineteenth-century canons of churchly propriety. In 1782 Mozart's relations with the archbishop, Count von Colloredo, reached an impasse, and he moved to Vienna, where his inability to obtain a secure income and the attendant worry and debt contributed to shorten his amazingly productive life.

A number of works written before leaving Salzburg, i.e., the "Coronation" Mass, the two vesper services, the Miseracordias Domini, and the "Munich" Kyrie, exhibit a depth and richness seemingly beyond a youth of twenty. Only three sacred works were written after he left Salzburg: the unfinished Mass in C minor, the exquisite miniature Ave Verum, and the Requiem, which others finished after his death. It can only be wished that circumstances had offered him an inducement to write more church music in his full maturity, when these few examples suggest what riches in this form he might have left to posterity along with his incomparable instrumental works and operas.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

MOZLEY, JAMES BOWLING (1813-1878). Anglican theologian. Educated at Grantham Grammar School and Oriel College, Oxford, he early acquired the reputation of a formidable if ponderous academic theologian. He was closely associated with the Tractarians* and was joint editor of the Christian Remembrancer. The Gorham case, however, caused him to reexamine baptismal theology more profoundly, and in A Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination (1855) and A Review of the Baptismal Controversy (1862) he conceded the validity of the Evangelicals' case, and was thereby estranged from many of his former colleagues. By this time he was agitated by the dire effects of unorthodox thinking within his church and, as a reply to Dean Stanley and his followers, gave the Bampton Lectures on Miracles in 1865, which defended miracles in a traditional manner reminiscent of Bishop Butler. Mozley was made a regius professor of divinity at Oxford in 1871 and died, a rather isolated figure, seven years later.

IAN SELLERS

MUGGLETONIANS. A sect taking its name from Ludowicke Muggleton (1609-98) who came under Puritan religious influence while working in London before the Civil War. Between 1640 and 1650 he came under a variety of further influences—e.g., the theology of J. Boehme* and the views of the Ranters.* He also formed an association with his cousin, John Reeve (1608-58), who shared similar views. They saw themselves as the "two witnesses" of Revelation 11, who received visions from heaven; they were to seal the elect in preparation for the forthcoming judgment of God on the world. Their views were set forth in a series of tracts. Their theology was antitrinitarian and dualistic (i.e., teaching the eternity of matter). The unforgivable sin was to disbelieve the "two witnesses." After Reeve's death, Muggleton and his followers continued to propound their views and to engage in controversy, especially with Quakers. Small groups survived into the nineteenth century.

PETER TOON

MÜHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR (1711-1787). Father of American Lutheranism. Born at Einbeck, Hanover, son of a master shoemaker, he had a hard upbringing, especially after his father's death in 1723, but graduated from Göttingen in 1738, studied briefly at Jena, and was then appointed to the Weisenhaus at Halle. In 1739 he was ordained and appointed co-pastor and inspector of an orphanage at Grosshennersdorf. He had at first contemplated going as a missionary to the East Indies, but in 1741 was called to serve the United Lutheran Congregations of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, New Providence, and New Hanover). He hastily learned as much English and American geography as he could.

Landing in America in 1742, he found the churches in a sorry plight and about to surrender to Count Zinzendorf's* far-reaching ecumenical schemes. These he frustrated after a short but inevitable struggle, then set himself to build up the three isolated congregations into a church. An expert linguist, a tireless traveler in almost impossible terrain, urbane yet full of evangelistic zeal, he summoned the first Lutheran Synod in America in 1748—the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania, which supervised the growing number of churches throughout the middle colonies, many of these planted as a result of Mühlenberg's own missionary labors. A man of immense physical strength and organizing ability, he spent the Revolutionary years in semi-retirement, but managed to edit the Ministerium's Gesangbuch in 1787, just before his death.

MÜLLER, FRIEDRICH MAXIMILIAN (1823-1900). Comparative philologist and Orientalist. Son of a lyric poet of the Romantic movement who took inspiration from the Greek War of Independence, Max was born at Dessau, matriculated at Leipzig (1841) where he studied Sanskrit, and thereafter went on to Berlin (1844) and the study of philology and metaphysics. At Paris in 1845 Eugene Burnouf introduced Müller to Zen Buddhism and recommended him to edit the Rig Veda. This was published at Oxford (6 vols., 1849-74), where he taught modern languages from 1850 and became professor in 1854. There he was to remain for the rest of his life. In 1856 he produced his Essay on Comparative Mythology, the first of the studies which sought origins of myth in natural, especially solar, phenomena, and correspondingly, the origins of "gods." He failed to receive the chair of Sanskrit (1860) because of foreign birth and liberal connections, but his reputation was such that there was created for him a chair of comparative philology (1868). His voice was of considerable importance in the further development of oriental studies and of comparative religion in England. Müller created the science of religion, giving Hibbert (1878) and four series of Gifford (1888-92) lectures. His Life and Letters was edited by his widow in 1902.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MÜLLER, GEORGE (1805-1898). Pastor, philanthropist, and leader in the Christian Brethren movement. He was born at Kroppenstadt, Prussia, and trained for the Lutheran ministry. After a dissolute early life, in 1825 he was converted during a prayer meeting in a private house. He came to London in 1829 to train for missionary service among the Jews. During a period of convalescence in Teignmouth, he met Henry Craik, a gentle, scholarly Scot of the same age who had been tutor to the children of A.N. Groves,* and through him made acquaintance with Groves's teaching, eventually sharing Groves's views on ordination and establishment. As a result, he amicably severed his connection with the Jews' Society and accepted a call to minister at Ebenezer Chapel, Teignmouth, and married Groves's sister, Mary. In 1832, Müller and Craik began a united ministry, first at Gideon Chapel and then at Bethesda Chapel, Bristol, where he was to remain until his death.

In 1834 he formed "The Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad," to stimulate education "upon scriptural principles," to circulate Bibles, and to help missionary work. Early in his life he had observed the orphan work of Auguste Francke* in Halle, and in 1835 he began in Bristol the orphanage for which he is chiefly remembered. This grew from a rented house to a great complex of buildings on Ashley Down, Bristol. In later years he traveled widely.

With Groves, Craik, and Robert Chapman of Barnstaple, Müller was a leading representative of the more moderate tendencies which grew into what is known as the Open or Independent Brethren, in contrast with the views of J.N. Darby* which developed into Exclusivism. In his early ministry he adopted believer's baptism, the weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper, and the principle of freedom to speak at meetings of the church. He renounced a regular salary and refused throughout the rest of his life to make any requests for financial support either for himself or for his philanthropic projects, even though sometimes he was penniless. His attitude was generally adopted in the movement. Through the wide support given by the Scriptural Knowledge Institution to work at home and overseas, he can justly be claimed as "the architect of the growth of independent Brethren" (F.R. Coad).

J.G.G. NORMAN

MÜLLER, JULIUS (1801-1878). German Protestant theologian. Born in Brieg, Silesia, he studied law at the universities of Breslau and Göttingen, but changed from law to theology at Göttingen in 1821. Influenced by his friend and later colleague, F.A.G. Tholuck,* Müller began his career as a pastor. Ordained in Breslau in 1825, he served a parish in Schönbrunn in his native Silesia before accepting appointment as university preacher at Göttingen (1831-35). He was called as professor of dogmatics at Marburg (1835) and later at Halle (1839). Müller opposed both the theology of Schleiermacher and the Hegelianism of the Tübingen School. His largest and most important work, which he earned for him the nickname "Sünden-Müller," was a two-volume study, Die christliche Lehre von der Sünde (1839, 1844).

Müller described the essence of sin as selfishness (Selbstsucht) against God, occasioned by personal decision, and attempted to explain the origin of sin by positing an extratemporal fall. He supported the Prussian Evangelical Union of Lutheran and Reformed Churches and in his book, Die evangelische Union, ihr Wesen and ihr göttliches Recht (1854), attempted to draw up a formula of consensus to serve as the doctrinal basis for the Evangelical Church of Prussia. This formula united elements from the Old Lutheran and Reformed confessions, especially where those symbols were in agreement. Together with A. Neander and K.I. Nitzsch, he founded in 1850 the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft und christliches Leben.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

MULLINS, EDGAR YOUNG (1860-1928). Southern Baptist theologian and educator. Born the son of a Mississippi minister, he graduated in 1879 from Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College and in 1885 from Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. He intended to become a foreign missionary, but poor health altered his plans. He held pastorates in Kentucky, Massachusetts, and Maryland until 1899, then joined the faculty of his own seminary and subsequently became its president. He was president also of the Southern Baptist Convention from 1921 to 1924, the stormy years of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy that divided other Baptist groups, and of the financial crisis. For five years from 1923 he was president of the Baptist World Alliance.* His theology was clearly conservative, but he avoided the polemics of fundamentalism. His main interest was in apologetics. Paradoxically his standard work on systematic theology contains no section on ecclesiology. His major works include Why Is Christianity True? (1905), The Axioms of Religion (1908), Baptist Beliefs (1912), The Christian Religion in its Doctrinal Expression (1920), and Christianity at the Crossroads (1924).

MÜNSTER, SEBASTIAN (1489-1552). German biblical scholar. After studying in Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Vienna, Münster took vows as a Franciscan monk, but in 1529(?) he joined the Evangelical cause and assumed a teaching position at the University of Basle. He was an outstanding scholar of the Semitic languages, writing Hebrew and Chaldean grammars. His two-volume edition of the Hebrew Bible was printed in Basle in 1534 and 1535. It was supplied with a literal Latin translation and notes. Miles Coverdale is known to have used this edition for his English translation of the OT. Münster is remembered too for his German geography, Cosmographia Universalis (1544).

CARL S. MEYER

MÜNZER, THOMAS (before 1490-1525). A leader in the "Radical Reformation."* He was born at Stolberg in the Harz Mountains, but little is known of his early life. He attended the universities of Leipzig and Frankfurt an der Oder, then lived at Leipzig. He was there when Luther's disputation took place and seems to have made a favorable impression on the great Reformer. Münzer's interest in Protestantism led him to study Eusebius, Jerome, Augustine, the Acts of the Councils of Constance and Basle, and the works of mystics like Tauler.*

With Luther's approval he received a call to preach at Zwickau, where Egranus had introduced the Reformation. Münzer became acquainted with a radical group called the Zwickau Prophets,* and he preached in a violent way against the clergy. He emphasized the importance of the Holy Spirit's guidance and the need for lay involvement in the work of the church. This led to conflict with Egranus, and Münzer was deposed. Next he appeared at Prague, where he issued a statement calling upon the people of the land of Hus to help him bring in a new age. When little interest was expressed in his message at Prague, he left for Allstedt, Germany, where he became parish priest. Here he introduced a series of liturgical reforms which attracted a good deal of attention. He also organized his followers into bands ready to take up arms for the cause of the Gospel. In May 1524 some of these disciples destroyed a shrine near the city. This action coupled with the warnings of Luther caused Duke John and Duke Frederick of Saxony to order Münzer to preach before them. In his sermon based on Daniel 2, he demanded that the rulers use force to establish the true Gospel. The rulers ordered him to a hearing at Weimar, and when the city council joined the opposition against him, he left Allstedt. After some months in S Germany he appeared at Muhlhausen, where he preached to the townsmen and helped to involve them in the Peasants' Revolt.* This led to the defeat of the rebel forces and Münzer's execution.

Although his revolutionary ideas were discredited, his teaching against infant baptism and his emphasis on the inspiration of the Holy Spirit influenced other Anabaptists. Originally a follower of Luther, he later turned against him when he failed to support a social revolution. He called Luther such names as "Brother Fattened Swine," "Dr. Liar," "Brother Soft Life," and "Pope of the Lutheran Scripture Perverters." Marxist historians emphasize Münzer because he anticipated later social revolutionaries.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

MURATORIAN CANON. A fragmentary list of NT books known at Rome about 200 is called after its discoverer, L.A. Muratori, who in 1740 published the document in Milan. The text is in Latin, but with sure signs that it is a translation, most likely from Greek. The sense is not always clear, and the list is broken off certainly at the beginning and probably at the close.

The fragment attests the books which were received in the Catholic Church in the West and were authorized to be read out in public. Books to be excluded from the canon are also identified. The four gospels are present, Mark at least by implication at the (lost) head of the list. Differences in the gospels are admitted, but declared to be of no importance since they derive ultimately from the "one guiding Spirit." The Acts of the Apostles is from Luke, whose presence at most of the events he records is attested. Paul's letters are addressed to seven churches which, like the sevenfold church of the Apocalypse, signify the totality of Christendom. Letters sent to individuals (Philemon, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus) deal with church discipline and are so to be accepted. On the other hand, spurious letters (like a letter to Laodiceans, recognized by Marcion) are to be refused. The Catholic epistles are accepted without discussion, as is the Wisdom of Solomon. The Apocalypse of John is recognized as acceptable, but the Apocalypse of Peter is not to be read in church. The Shepherd of Hermas may be read, but not in church worship, since it was of recent origin.

Attempts to identify an author of the canon—Hippolytus of Rome is the most promising candidate (so Zahn)—are not proven.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN (1617-1688). Spanish painter. Born in Seville and an orphan at the age of ten, he first studied under a mediocre painter and earned a living by sargas, a cheap painting on a canvas, sold in country fairs. After a visit to Cadiz in 1640, he set out to study the great masters, getting no further than Madrid where he was befriended by Velázquez, through whom he was able to study Titian, Veronese, Tintoretto, Rubens, and Velázquez himself. He spent three years in Madrid, returning to Seville in 1644. He revisited Cadiz once only, to paint an altar for the Capuchins, but an accident caused him to go back to Seville, where he later died. As a member of an austere brotherhood, dedicated to serving the dying, pain and misery were for Murillo objects of pity and not curiosity; unlike other painters of his race, his genius is tenderness and affection. Like Rembrandt, he saw the language of the Gospel as the language of the people, and sought to portray the Gospel in human terms. Most of his work was done for convents in Seville, with a number of devotional paintings for individuals. His preeminence lies in his painting of the Immaculate Conception, which theme he treated over twenty times without repetition. These are among the most markedly feminine paintings in Spain. GORDON A. CATHERALL

MUROMA, URHO RAFAEL (1890-1966). Finnish pastor. His early career included work among seamen in New York and participation in the labors of the Finnish Missionary Society. Gradually he realized that evangelization needed an organization of its own. Thus in 1940 the Evangelical Lutheran Inner Mission Foundation was started. Muroma held that those who became Christians needed to be grounded in God's Word, and therefore instruction became an important part of the foundation's work. Muroma was leader of the foundation and the Bible school and also published a large number of books, including some in which he boldly criticized the modern trends both in theology and in the church.

MURRAY, ANDREW (1828-1917). South African Dutch Reformed leader. Born at Graaff Reinet, he was educated in Scotland and Holland, then ordained in 1848. He served in Bloemfontein (1850-60), Worcester (1860-64), Cape Town (1864-71), and Wellington (1871-1906), and was six times moderator of the DRC in the Cape Colony. Theologically conservative, he led the opposition to liberalism in the DRC during the 1860s. Mystically inclined, he was greatly influenced by William Law* and led a profound devotional life. He undertook frequent evangelistic tours in South Africa and addressed the Keswick and Northfield conventions in 1895. He wrote much for the spiritual guidance of converts, and initiated the Bible and Prayer Union, the holiness conventions, and the Student Christian Association. His interest in education issued inter alia in the Huguenot Seminary (1874) and the Mission Institute at Wellington (1877). He was the moving spirit in the missionary awakening which led to DRC missions in the Transvaal and Malawi, and he also supported the South Africa General Mission. The most famous of his 250 publications was Abide in Christ, which appeared in numerous translations. Murray was the most influential leader of his own church in the nineteenth century, and an evangelical Christian of international stature.

MURRAY, JOHN (1741-1815). Founder of American Universalism. He was born into a well-off, Calvinistic family in Hampshire, England. His parents moved to Cork, Ireland, where this emotional man became a Calvinistic Methodist* shortly before he rejected Calvinism for the Universalism preached by John Relly. He was excommunicated by the Methodists; his wife and child died. He migrated in 1770 to America and preached his Universalist ideas throughout New England. After serving as a chaplain in the Revolutionary War, he settled in Gloucester, Massachusetts, and organized a Universalist congregation. After founding another church in Oxford, Massachusetts, he served as pastor from 1793 to 1809 of the Universalist Church in Boston. Paralysis in 1809 stopped his preaching that all men would ultimately be saved. EARLE E. CAIRNS

MUSCULUS (Mäuslein), WOLFGANG (1497-1563. Reformer. Born in Dieuze, Lothringen, he studied among other places in the humanists' school in Schlettstadt, where he met M. Bucer.* In 1512 his family urged him to enter the Benedictine monastery near Lixheim. In 1518, while still there, he was sent a packet of Luther's books, perhaps by Bucer, that made him "the Lutheran preacher." He left the monastery in 1527 and came to Strasbourg, where he became Bucer's secretary, and deacon in the cathedral church under Matthew Zell. In 1531, through Bucer's recommendation, he went as preacher to Augsburg.

Here Musculus was part of the struggle between the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans, the Anabaptists, and the Bucerian version of the Reformed faith. Two of the major issues were the interpretation of the Lord's Supper and the question of the relationship of the magistrates to the church. Musculus stood with Bucer, and since he could not be reconciled to the Interim of Charles V (1547), he left Augsburg in 1548. Through H. Bullinger's* influence he was appointed professor of theology at the old Franciscan college in Bern in 1549 after preparing an acceptable doctrinal statement on the Supper question. He began his theology lectures where he had left off preaching in Augsburg—on Psalm 104. His extensive commentary on the Psalms was published in 1550.

Bern was in continual conflict with Geneva over the relationship of the church to the magistrates: who was to control church appointments, who was to exercise church discipline, and who had control of church goods. Musculus supported the magistrates' right to control the churches and to order discipline. Of the major Reformation centers in Switzerland, Bern was the only one that did not sign the Zurich Agreement* of 1551. On many issues, however, Musculus insisted upon the principle of adiaphora: "let us be tolerant where nothing is unsuitable to the glory of God, the purity of our faith or the salvation of souls." During the Bern years Musculus published a number of commentaries, translations of various patristic sources, and his important Common Places of 1560 (ET 1562). The influence of these works were felt in the Low Countries, Hungary, and England, as well as in Germany and Switzerland.

ROBERT B. IVES

MUSIC, CHRISTIAN. Music is a form of communication, albeit nonverbal and hence without exact meanings. It has aspects analogous to spelling, grammatical structure, and in its more spacious forms syntax. It consists of sounds explicable by the natural phenomena of acoustics, which are no more inherently moral than mathematics. Nonetheless the power of music to call forth strong emotional response has many witnesses from antiquity to the present. Ancient mythologies credited it with supernatural powers, often therapeutic. The classical Greek concept of ethos clung to Western thinking to a degree that the rise of rationalism failed to erase except in part, and it still colors the thinking of many today.

Western music today exists in three "dimensions". The first of these is rhythm, the most essential to music of the three and the one that provides the strongest and least intellectual stimulus to the hearer. Melody, the second dimension, can hardly be said to exist without some recurrent stress patterns of a rhythmical nature. Harmony, as we know it in Western music since the Middle Ages, arose in the context of Christendom and until late Renaissance times found its theoreticians almost exclusively among the clergy. It was primarily the clergy who evolved our system of notation to preserve the revered music of the Gregorian tradition.

Gregorian chant, which is identical with plainsong, consists of a vast repertory of monophonic (i.e., in pure, unharmonized melody) music with Latin text. Every aspect of the Roman liturgy for both Mass and office is provided for. Contrary to tradition, Gregory I had little connection with any of this music, although he had much to do with the liturgical reforms of his day. The music comes from many sources, as we know today, from the simple chant formulas (psalm tones) that the early church inherited from the synagogues of the Middle East in Roman times; the music of the Ancient Byzantine Church; the Old Roman chant, the Gallican chant of pre-Carolingian times; and the elaborate and beautiful creations of unknown monks at such centers as St. Gall in the eighth and ninth centuries. Indeed, the repertory continued to grow even after this "golden age" was passed.

Although the Greeks employed a form of musical notation, the musicians of the church had no exact pitch symbols at their command until the advent of staff notation about the eleventh century. Much elaborate melody of earlier times was lost or greatly modified, since its retention depended upon the memory of the singers, with at best a few rhetorical accent symbols (staffless neumes) above the words to refresh the executant's mind. It seems reasonably clear to scholars now that the bulk of the melodies that come down to our day do so in the form they assumed in the Frankish domains of Charlemagne and his heirs, rather than in the Rome of Gregory's time. Plainsong is preserved in nonmetrical neumes upon a four-lined staff, a system referred to as "Roman choral notation."

Gregorian chant is essentially sacerdotal music. It was evolved for the use of trained singers: monks in the canonical hours of the abbeys; choirs and celebrants in princely chapels, larger city churches, and cathedrals. It exhibits a great variety of forms: simple recitation tones for prayers, Epistles, and Gospels, with their slight terminal inflections; the chants for the Psalms and canticles; the slightly more elaborate antiphons that relate the Psalms to the ecclesiastical calendar; the largely syllabic tunes of the hymns of the office and the sequences of the Mass; the luxuriantly melismatic melodies that abound in graduals and alleluias of the proper; and in many settings of the Kyrie and Agnus Dei in the ordinary. There are also the responsaries, processionals, and tracts—all with characteristics of their own.

Other systems of Christian chant must be mentioned. In Milan there persisted the Ambrosian chant, which is somewhat similar to but distinct from the Gregorian. The Byzantine chant of the Greek Orthodox Church presents another great system of considerable antiquity. In Russia there developed the Znamenny chant. The Syrian, Armenian, and Coptic churches likewise possessed other types. All represent priestly liturgical repertories. The Roman Church developed and encouraged scholae cantorum from before the time of Gregory I to train singers for the performance of the music of the liturgy.

The beginnings of polyphony, the simultaneous performance of more than one melodic line, came at least by the ninth century. At first the practice consisted of singing a plainsong with one or more voices duplicating the melody four or five scalesteps below or above. Soon the added part took on a melodic independence, and still later would sing several notes in the time space allotted to each note of the original melody. With such music, notation indicating exact pitches became indispensable. Such music was known as organum and seems to have been limited to the participation of a few skilled singers performing those sections of graduals and certain other parts of the proper of the Mass that were normally sung by a single voice. Organum developed primarily in France at Limoges and came to its highest development at Notre Dame in Paris about 1200, where a third, and even a fourth, part was added above the original plainsong.

In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the new art of polyphony made great strides. From organum grew the motet, in which each voice-part (usually three) had its own text. The lowest, or tenor, which was almost always a rhythmatized passage of plainsong, was probably performed instrumentally. Much of this music would seem to have filled a social or ceremonial function away from the church, but it must not be overlooked that a seemingly secular text could have had for that day a religious symbolism not apparent to a modern observer. Nevertheless, the fourteenth century has left us little church music. The thirteenth century also produced the polyphonic conductus. Unlike the motet, these pieces usually do not make use of plainsong tenors, and require all voice-parts to sing the same text as in a modern chorale. The texts are usually moralizing or ceremonial, and conductus seems to have been intended for religious or other ceremonial processions.

More popular religious music must surely have existed, but little that did not have ecclesiastical or political status was committed to parchment. Many princes and not a few clerics read not at all, and fewer could read music. Religious lyrics that are clearly intended to be sung spring from Francis of Assisi and his followers. These laude show to some extent the influence of the love-lyrics of the Troubadours. Similar songs of flagellants and pilgrims have survived in some number both in Italy and Germany, and in their wake such songs as would be called carols* today. Some such songs, often with mixed Latin and vernacular, of slightly later vintage, influenced Luther (e.g., In dulce jubilo) and were adapted into the vast Lutheran hymnody. In areas of Calvinistic influence they were not welcome.

In the fourteenth century, polyphonic settings of the choral sections of the ordinary of the Mass begin to appear, most of them anonymous. About 1360 Guillaume de Machaut, most widely known as a literary figure, composed an extraordinary and elaborate Mass in four-part counterpoint, containing the Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei. Curiously, no other such works are known until the beginning of the next century.

If the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries produced little music for the church, in the fifteenth century there began a great tide that continued to rise and swell on into the seventeenth and beyond. The second quarter of the fifteenth century saw a great change in the texture of music. The Englishmen, notably John Dunstable,* who were drawn to France in the wake of Agincourt brought to the Franco-Burgundian composers a new richness of sound. The musical intervals of the third and sixth increasingly replaced the austerity of late medieval sound, and the triad became the basis of harmony. Though cultural historians have generally written little of music, it no less than literature and the visual arts entered upon a period of unsurpassed creative vitality. With few exceptions, its composers of genius were churchmen who devoted to the music of the liturgy their highest powers, though secular music of merit was also abundant.

Composers from the French-speaking Netherlands almost completely dominated the European scene from about 1420 until the middle of the sixteenth century. The Vatican choir and the great churches and courts of the Italian states were full of them. Leonel Power, an Englishman, has left us the oldest known cantus-firmus Mass, in which the famous "Alma Redemptorus Mater" melody forms the tenor of each of its sections. It was the Burgundian Guillaume Dufay* (d.1474) who made the cantus-firmus Mass the touchstone of musical creative achievement for nearly a century and anomalously often employed a secular melody as his tenor! In his numerous works the techniques of the late Middle Ages are fused with the new spirit and manner of the Renaissance. The motet becomes a vehicle of high religious devotion, as in his dedicatory work for the Florentine Duomo, or in the touching simplicity of his office hymns. Ockeghem,* his junior by some thirty years, in his few carefully wrought masterpieces achieved a richer texture and deeper sonority. One of his Masses is in five voice parts of extraordinarily low range.

Of the many distinguished Franco-Netherlandish composers of the later fifteenth century, Josquin Desprez* more than any other individual displayed leadership and mastery in the composition of both Masses and motets, exhibiting to perfection all the technical procedures of the mature Renaissance. The four pitch-ranges of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass become normative, with imitative counterpoint becoming a pervasive structural principle. The sixteenth-century motet is a choral setting of a text, usually liturgical, but not from the ordinary of the Mass. Contrary to widely held opinion, unaccompanied performance was by no means the norm in the sixteenth century. Instruments as often as not supported the voices or substituted for missing ones.

A great multitude of talented composers were active at courts and in larger churches during the sixteenth century. The invention by Petrucci in 1501 of music printing from movable type, and the introduction of copper engraving later in the century, vastly accelerated the dissemination of music. The works by such geniuses as Lassus* and Palestrina* were known from Stockholm to Naples and from Warsaw to Lisbon, and were even carried to the Spanish colonies of the New World. Such music required the presence of skilled choirs of boys and men, and were largely beyond the possibilities of the ordinary parish, where plainsong prevailed if indeed any music was performed. The influence of humanism caused composers to strive for careful accentuation of the text, and the Counter-Reformation called for more homophonic part-writing in the interest of making the words more audible to the listeners. The Spaniard, Victoria, and the Italian, Palestrina, were among the leading figures influenced profoundly by the latter movement. Palestrina composed over one hundred Masses, and his music continued to be regarded as representative of the best sacred style long after his time.

The advent of the Reformation brought great changes in those countries where it triumphed. Luther introduced the chorale for the congregation to sing after the precedent of the Hussites in Bohemia. He adapted and translated from the traditional Latin hymnody and from the popular nonliturgical songs mentioned earlier. He also wrote hymns himself that were set to tunes composed or adapted by Johann Walther* and other musicians among his supporters. From this beginning developed a vast hymnic literature which reached its zenith with the work of Johann Crüger about 1650. Luther also encouraged the musical training of the clergy and of choirboys in parochial schools. Thus the Lutheran church developed a great musical tradition of congregational song and choral repertory. Along with these grew up an equally great literature of organ music, much of it based on the chorale melodies, and reaching its height of attainment with the creative genius of J.S. Bach* in the eighteenth century.

Very different was the course of music in those areas dominated by Calvin's teachings. Polyphonic composition together with instruments and "hymns of human composure" were totally rejected. The metrical versions of the 150 Psalms by Marot* and Beza* completed in 1562, with its store of tunes edited by Bourgeois* and others, was translated into German and Dutch and long remained the sole church song of the Reformed churches in Europe. The metrical psalms were sung only in unison and without the support of "popish" instruments. Only in Holland did the organ continue in use, and there amid much controversy. There the Genevan Psalter is still used, albeit with a recent redaction of the text—the "Nieuwe Berijming" of 1967.

Both England and Scotland followed the lead of Geneva with complete metrical psalters. The Scottish version of 1564 was replaced by a simpler version in 1650 which still survives. In England the "Old Version" (Sternhold and Hopkins) of 1562 was partially superseded by the "New Version" (Tate and Brady) at the beginning of the eighteenth century, but was fated to be eclipsed by the new hymnody of Isaac Watts* and his successors. Although the British psalters and their American counterparts had some fine tunes, they were much inferior in both text and music to the Genevan. In the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries Huguenot and even some Catholic composers made a great number of polyphonic arrangements of the Genevan psalms. These were not for church use, but provided music-loving citizens with highly artistic music of an edifying character for their recreation. In the English-speaking countries the performance of the Psalms sank to an abysmal level, in which all were "lined out" most unmusically to a handful of well-worn tunes, until the era of Watts and the Wesleys brought new life and reform.

After the Reformation in England, while metrical psalmody prevailed in the parish churches, the chapel royal and the cathedrals continued to share in the great age of Elizabethan polyphony until they were suppressed by the Puritan revolution. The Anglican liturgy found a place for the anthem. At first adaptations of Latin motets were used, but a generation of great composers headed by Tallis* and Byrd* evolved a new genre which is among the glories of the English choral heritage —the cathedral service, consisting of the canticles for Matins and Evensong, and the choral parts of the Communion service inaugurated a new tradition, to which Byrd, Gibbons,* and Tomkins contributed fine examples.

After the restoration of the monarchy, cathedral music was too dependent upon the vagaries of royal taste and suffered from ecclesiastical indifference during the Age of Reason. Apart from Purcell* and the Chandos anthems of Handel,* little of great artistic significance appeared in the English choral repertory for the church until comparatively recent times. The rise of Methodism in the eighteenth century brought congregational hymn-singing to England. The Wesleys (see especially WESLEY, CHARLES) received their impetus from their contact with the Moravians, whose tradition went back to the Hussites and was refreshed by German Pietism. They lacked, however, an outstanding composer, and their tunes were borrowed or adapted from many sources; many tended to be very florid, with many passing notes and verbal repetitions. Hymn-singing spread rapidly throughout Nonconformist groups, and by the early nineteenth century the Anglican Church could no longer resist the demand for hymns among its rank and file. Then an era of avid hymntune composition began, bringing in a simpler, largely syllabic type of tune.

As the century progressed, many tunes tended to depend more upon their harmonic part-writing and seductive chordal progressions than upon the virility of their melodies. These aspects of many of the tunes of Dykes* and Barnby* and much of the music of the influential Hymns, Ancient and Modern (1861) brought a strong reaction at the end of the century. The Yattendon Hymnal (1899) and even more the English Hymnal (1906; rev. 1933) exerted a wide and continuing influence upon hymnbook editors of the major denominations throughout the English-speaking world. Strong tunes with active melodies, often specified for unison singing, have continued to appear—notably those of R. Vaughan Williams.* In fact the hymntune is by far the most important type of church music in Protestant worship.

In the seventeenth century, both Lutheran and Catholic composers continued to produce a great deal for the church. Much of this was in the new concertato manner, with independent and important parts for instruments that both combined and contrasted with the voices. This style had its first important flowering in Venice. Schütz,* the greatest Lutheran composer before Bach, studied there with its greatest exponents at St. Mark's, Gabrieli* and Monteverdi.* From this style developed the Lutheran church cantata. Blended later with the recitative and aria of Italian opera, it reached its fulfilment in the church works of J.S. Bach. A by-product of the new Italian "drama per musica," or opera, was the oratorio, beginning its existence as religious opera, but developing into a type of work with a dramatic theme, usually of biblical origin, performed without the appurtenances of the stage. Carissimi* developed the form in a definitive manner toward the middle of the century. Schütz cultivated it in his old age in his Story of Christmas and other works. In the following century, Handel wrote his great succession of English oratorios, which led to the later works of Haydn,* Mendelssohn,* and others. Elgar, Vaughan Williams, Walton, and others bring it down to our own day. Oratorio is not church music, but rather belongs in the realm of edifying entertainment.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as the influence of the church decreased and the rationalistic tide of humanism rose higher, fewer composers of first magnitude devoted a significant portion of their creative activity to church music. Indeed, J.S. Bach was the last truly great genius to whom music for the sanctuary was his major concern. The later eighteenth century, the Age of Reason, saw only muddled illogic in polyphony, which Rousseau likened to the simultaneous delivery of several speeches. The affective styles and symbolism of the past were repudiated. Clarity and natural simplicity were the paramount virtues of music. In this "classical" era much church music was written, particularly in the Catholic countries. The aristocratic chapels and metropolitan churches of the Austrian Empire resounded to symphonic Masses and vespers, with skilled soloists, choruses, and orchestras. The music was joyful and spritely, and as such was attacked by the Cecilian movement of the nineteenth century as indecorous if not blasphemous. Pope Pius X expressly forbade their use. Today the Victorian vogue for disparaging as secular and flippant the best music of this era is gone, especially in view of the current trends in religious music. During the Romantic era, religious music of all types continued to be written, but little of it aspired to the artistic significance of former times. Some of it was chaste, some theatrical as with Berlioz, much dolorous and sentimental.

The religious music of the United States largely parallels that of Great Britain, but has enjoyed a degree of freedom from official restraint. Here the folk tradition of the Baptists surfaced and reached print in the shaped-note publications of the South, and the singing-school movement of post-Revolutionary times produced simple congregational music with a distinctive flavor. The "Gospel song" carried to Britain by such figures as Ira D. Sankey* adapted the popular idiom of such writers as Stephen Foster to capture the ear of the unchurched multitudes, and became the normal style of large segments of the less institutionalized churches of Protestantism. This music possesses optimistic rhythms and exceedingly simple harmonies, and lends itself readily to highly improvisatory performance.

An account of the religious music since World War II is almost impossible at this proximity. It remains to be seen whether the present trend toward popularization in religious music will continue, with the acceptance of a closer and closer identification with pseudo-folk and "rock" idioms, not only among younger Christians of evangelical persuasion, but in the larger historic denominations and in the Roman Catholic Church.

While much functional church music which goes little beyond the idioms of the late nineteenth century continues to be written, many professional church musicians are composing in styles closer to the early twentieth century. That these are difficult for any but highly trained musicians must be conceded. "Serious" professional composers of secular art music have never before been so far removed from the general listening public. There is beyond question a need for devoted and gifted composers to provide leadership in this as in all eras, so that the scriptural mandate of singing "psalms, hymns and spiritual songs" may be fittingly fulfilled.

MYCONIUS, FRIEDRICH (1490-1546). German Reformer. Born in Lichtenfels, he entered the Franciscan Order in Annaberg in 1510. He was transferred to the monastery in Leipzig and then to Weimar. He was an assiduous student of theology and the Scripture; the doctrine of predestination troubled him greatly. In 1516 he was ordained priest and with the onset of the Lutheran movement found himself greatly in sympathy with it. Feeling himself threatened, he fled the monastery (1524) and went to Zwickau. From there, on the invitation of Duke John he went to Gotha. Here he furthered ecclesiastical and educational reforms, winning the friendship of Luther and Melanchthon, and later of Justus Menius.

He won the respect of Elector John Frederick of Saxony. He participated in visitations in Thuringia, the Marburg Colloquy* (1529), the Wittenberg Concord* (1536), the Smalcald* synod (1537), and the Colloquy of Hagenau* (1540). In 1538 he went with Francis Burkhardt and George von Boyneburg to England for the dialogues with the English theologians, but was disappointed with Henry VIII's attitude. He was especially gratified to be instrumental in aiding the establishment of the Reformation in Ducal Saxony, particularly in Annaberg. He wrote a Historia Reformationis, 1517-42—a valuable account by a contemporary—and German tracts, among them Wie man die Einfältigen, und sonderlich die Kranken, im Christenthum unterrichten soll. His own spiritual struggles, the integrity of his character, and his irenic spirit make him one of the most appealing figures of the Reformation era.

CARL S. MEYER

MYCONIUS, OSWALD (1488-1552). Swiss humanist, Reformed minister, and theologian. Born Oswald Geisshäusler at Lucerne, he studied at Basle where he became a humanist friend of Erasmus* (who gave him the name "Myconius"). He taught classics at the canons' school in Zurich from 1516 and was the decisive voice in the call of Ulrich Zwingli* to Zurich as people's priest in 1519. From 1520 to 1523 he taught in Lucerne and Einsiedeln, then returned to Zurich. He quietly but solidly supported Zwingli in the work of reform. Though neither ordained nor possessing an academic degree, when Oecolampadius* died in 1531 he moved to Basle, where in 1532 he became Antistes (chief pastor) and professor of NT at the university, two crucial posts he held until his death. Myconius wrote the first biography of Zwingli and is the principal author of the First Basle Confession of Faith (1534), a firm but broadminded Reformed theological statement. He followed Oecolampadius on the separation of church and state, and on discipline, and took a middle position between Zwingli and Luther on the Eucharist problem, believing the two positions could and should easily be reconciled.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

MYERS, FREDERIC WILLIAM HENRY (1843-1901). English writer, classicist, and psychical researcher. Born at Keswick and educated at Cheltenham and Trinity College, Cambridge, he taught classics at that university from 1865 until he became a school inspector in 1872. In 1882 he became a co-founder and president of the Society for Psychical Research. In its early days he helped collect a mass of alleged evidence for survival, much of it published in the Phantasms of the Living (1886). He made the first deep studies of the relations between hallucination, hypnotism, and mediumship, published posthumously as Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death (2 vols., 1903). As a result of his great desire to put religion on an empirical basis, Myers drifted slowly away from his early faith in Christ as exemplified by his beautiful poem Saint Paul (1867).

R.E.D. CLARK

MYNSTER, JAKOB PIER (1775-1854). Danish bishop. From Pietistic circles, he turned his back on them in his youth, adopting the theological and political radicalism of the so-called Enlightenment. Afterward the influence of Kant and German Romanticism made him skeptical of rationalism. In 1803 he had a spiritual experience that led to personal conversion and acceptance of the Christian faith. He developed into an eminent preacher, attracting a large section of the "cultural élite," and through his works influencing still greater numbers. He was rector of Copenhagen Cathedral (1811-28), personal chaplain to the king from 1828, and bishop of Zealand from 1834 until his death.

By most of his contemporaries Mynster was regarded as the great central figure in Danish church life, standing between rationalists on one side, revivalists on the other. Though individualistic, he was a conservative, authoritarian champion of the state church in opposition to N.F.S. Grundtvig* and the Pietistic conventicle Christians. He even introduced compulsory baptism of Baptist children. He with H.L. Martensen* and the national church as a whole was later attacked fiercely by S. Kierkegaard.*

N.O. RASMUSSEN

MYSOS DEMETRIUS (1719-1750). Born in either Montenegro or Thessaloniki, he was probably a deacon sent from Constantinople to Wittenberg in 1559 by Patriarch Joasaph II to study at first hand the Reformers and their teaching. He stayed six months, studying under Philip Melanchthon, attending services and lectures, and studying the Reformers' creedal documents. Leaving Wittenberg for Constantinople in 1559, he carried with him a letter from Melanchthon* to the patriarch and also a Greek translation of the Augsburg Confession. Mysos Demetrius wrote a letter to Melanchthon in October 1559, revealing the effect his contact with the Reformers had upon him. Some authorities suggest that he spent three years trying to introduce Lutheranism into the villages of Transylvania; whatever the case, he was one of the first of the Orthodox clergy to have any real contact with the Reformers.

MYSTERY PLAY. Early medieval religious dramas based upon some part of the biblical narrative were called "mystery plays." In England the term is often used synonymously with "miracle plays," but the latter term should be restricted to drama based upon the life or miraculous deeds of Christian saints. Perhaps the term "mystery" is derived from the Latin ministerium, in the sense of service or function. The earliest record of medieval drama is a simple Easter playlet consisting of four characters—one priest symbolizing the angel at Christ's tomb while three other priests similarly symbolize the Marys—and the dialogue consists of four Latin lines. The popularity of the plays grew and their use in church services at special occasions was expanded until they assumed a form and existence of their own. The plays were banished from within the church in the thirteenth century. The laity immediately seized the opportunity and began organizing performances and presenting them in the vernacular. Eventually the performances were given on movable stages that were drawn from place to place.

The plays, centering around various narratives, were popular all over Europe and especially in England. Soon they were molded into elaborate cycles consisting of thirty or more separate pieces based on principal biblical themes from the Creation to the Day of Judgment. These cycles were presented at the Feast of Corpus Christi, at Whitsuntide, and in other special seasons. Only four of these cycles are extant: The York Cycle (forty-eight plays), the Towneley (thirty-two plays), the Chester (twenty-five plays), and the Coventry (forty-two plays). The use of mystery plays gradually disappeared by the end of the sixteenth century. There has been a modern revival of this type of play, especially on the Continent. Probably the most famous of these is the Passion Play at Oberammergau.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS. In the last few centuries B.C. a plethora of cults, mostly from the Middle East, began to spread throughout the Greco-Roman world by means of migration, trade, and military service abroad. Their popularity continued well into the Christian era. Occasionally assimilated into the official religion of their new locations, they more often stood apart as minority "clubs" of individual initiates, representing personal rather than civic religion. The name "mystery religion" derives from the secret symbols and rites revealed to members only, but initiation is probably the more significant factor: it promised salvation now or bliss hereafter, and it certainly gave the security and identity of belonging to an "in-group." Unlike Judaism and Christianity, adherents were not required to give up their traditional religion; initiation into several cults was even possible.

Adaptations of national religions of the Middle East, they only became mystery cults when transplanted. Most were originally fertility religions with a death-resurrection mythology representing the annual cycle of nature. Their underlying similarities encouraged a syncretistic tendency, particularly in the fourth- and fifth-century struggles against Christianity (e.g., the Mithraeum discovered in London in 1954 contains statues relating to Isis, Dionysus, and the Olympian gods); borrowing of the practices of another cult (e.g., taurobolium, see "Cybele" below) occurred even earlier.

The most important cults are treated individually here. Others include the Eleusinian mysteries (an important but local Athenian cult) and the Kabiri (Phrygian deities worshiped extensively by sailors from the fourth century B.C.). The worship of Mâ (Cappadocia), Atargatis ("the Syrian goddess"), and Hadad (a Syrian Baal) came to Rome not as mystery-cults (Roman citizens were forbidden to take part), but as bizarre and frenzied public spectacles. For other parallels see HERMETIC BOOKS and GNOSTICISM.

(1) Dionysus. An ecstatic cult from Thrace (European Turkey), which flourished among women in classical Greece, had become a mystery-cult involving initiation of both sexes when it appeared in Rome early in the second century B.C. It was suppressed as corrupt, but reintroduced in mid-first century B.C. There were hierarchical grades of initiation and the promise of an afterlife.

(2) Cybele ("The Great Mother"). Introduced officially to Rome from Phrygia in 205 B.C. during a national emergency, the splendid but wild processions to Cybele were originally restricted to non-Romans yet were very popular as spectacles. Later the cult, merged with Mâ, offered initiation to all. Priesthood involved castration. At Rome the taurobolium seems to have been associated first with Cybele, later with Mithra: candidates were sprinkled with bulls' blood for either national or personal salvation. Some texts refer to rebirth "for ever" or "for twenty years."

(3) Isis. A major Egyptian goddess, whose cult became extraordinarily popular throughout the Roman Empire, often taking the form of a mystery religion. Initiation (e.g., see Apuleius, Metamorphoses 11) involved abstinence, and promised salvation from disease, fate, and fear of death.

(4) Mithra. Mithraism is puzzling, an apparently artificial though extraordinarily successful creation, and perhaps Christianity's most serious rival in antiquity. Mithra was an old Persian god of light, but the cult also draws on the Zoroastrian dualism of Good and Evil, between which Mithra mediates. The first evidence of mysteries or of the bull-slaying myth depicted prominently in the shrines comes from a group of pirates in first-century B.C. Cilicia. Shrines are common from the late first century A.D., particularly in military camps, even on Hadrian's Wall, but they are tiny, often underground. Men only were initiated, to seven grades of membership, in rites involving ordeal, the taurobolium, a communal meal, etc. The cult demanded high ethical standards.

MYSTICISM. The term is difficult to define because of its often confessedly ineffable and inexplicable nature. It has no limits historically or geographically, nor can it be contained philosophically or theologically. It concerns the interior life of the spirit, that pilgrimage with the divine which begins outside its awareness and proceeds to the highest stages of personal development possible.

Immediate relation with the ultimate is the essence of mysticism. This may be a psychological or an epistemological experience in which the mystic, apart from a religious institution or sacred book, has religious knowledge directly from the divine. Quakerism stressed this approach; other mystics believed that the contemplative experience led to temporary union of essence now or permanent at death with ultimate reality or God. The Hindus, Buddhists, Neoplatonists, and to some extent Meister Eckhart* illustrate this view. Prayer, contemplation, and ascetic acts promote this experience.

Christian and biblical mysticism usually stresses the personal reality of Christ as compared with the impersonal approach of Hinduism. It subordinates nature to the Creator rather than linking Him with nature as pantheistic mystics do. The union is not one of merging essence which destroys personality, but the biblical one of union of human love and will with God, which does not lose the subject-object relationship. Such mysticism was contemplative, personal, and practical: action on the plain followed retreat to the mountain.

Mysticism is simply a life of prayer, even from the outset when personal confession is paramount because of realization that one stands before God and must beg forgiveness before any growth in Him can begin. Once begun, and life's purpose shifted from self to God, the "scale of perfection" or "steps leading to the mind of God," has also begun. Many stages exist in mystical experience, however, and they are individually determined. Three are common: awareness and confession before God, life lived totally under God, and a most personal experience of God. The last is not often achieved, nor is it expected: referred to sometimes as a mystical marriage or Beatific Vision, it is the most intimate of divine relationships and therefore is usually not expressed in words.

Mysticism usually arose in an era (e.g., in the Middle Ages) when religion became too much institutionalized, and it sought a more individualistic and personal relationship with God. This helps to explain the rise of medieval mystics—such as Meister Eckhart, Julian of Norwich,* and Thomas à Kempis*—and later, of Madame Guyon* and Fénelon.* They did not leave the church, but had these experiences in the fold of the church as they sought to recall it to a more personal and individual approach to God. It also often appeared when theology was overemphasized at the expense of experience and practice.

Mysticism often led to heresy because of ignoring the biblical norm, or to social passivity that concentrated on personal salvation without any idea of service to God in society. Bernard of Clairvaux* seemed to link biblical truths, mystical experience, and practical service.

NAASSENES. The name given to a Christian-Gnostic sect, derived from their supposed object of worship—the "serpent" of Genesis 3:1ff., the alleged divine seducer and impregnator of Eve. The materials concerning this group, however, give little evidence of their own self-image as being expressible in such terms, and the title may well be their opponent's deprecation. What is known is given in Hippolytus's Refutation, where one of their hymns is cited. This shows that remnant of awareness of a more ancient but exterminated Near Eastern religiousness undergoing the Gnosticizing interpretation of quasi-philosophical allegorization, with the assistance of scriptural data. *The Gospel of Thomas may originate from within this circle.

NAG HAMMADI. A town in central Egypt on the western bank of the Nile about forty miles north of Luxor, which has given its name to a Coptic Gnostic library unearthed a few miles away in 1945-46 in a jar in a Greco-Roman cemetery. The scene, so far uninvestigated archaeologically, is near the ancient sites of Chenoboskion, an important fourth-century center of Pachomian monasticism (which originated not far distant at Tabennisi), and the Roman regional capital of Diospolis Parva. The documents, probably interred in the later fourth century, perhaps when Pachomian monks were establishing Catholic orthodoxy in the area, consist of thirteen papyrus codices, one (XII) very fragmentary and another (XIII) now quite short, totaling over 1,100 pages. Ten manuscripts are in Sahidic Coptic and three in a sub-Akmîmic dialect. Palaeographic and other evidence suggests they were written c.330-50. They contain in whole or part fifty-three works, most if not all translated from Greek originals. Three were already known: The Sophia of Jesus Christ, The Sentences of Sextus, and The Apocryphon of John. Of this typical Gnostic "summa," W.C. Till published in Texte und Untersuchungen 60 one (short) recension, which Nag Hammadi has duplicated (III) along with two texts of a longer version (II, IV). The collection includes doublets of The Letter of Eugnostos the Blessed (III, IV), The Egyptian Gospel (III, IV), an untitled treatise "On the Origin of the World" (II, XII), and The Gospel of Truth (I, fragments in XII). Thus we have forty-four completely new treatises, some of whose titles were recognized from patristic and other sources, and some identical with, or similar to, those of other extant Christian apocrypha.

The manuscripts reside in the Coptic Museum in Cairo, except for part of I—known as the Jung Codex because most of it was acquired in 1952 for the Carl Jung Institute in Zurich—which awaits return to Egypt. Its accessibility led to early publication of The Gospel of Truth, a Valentinian meditation known to Irenaeus. Publication of the Cairo manuscripts was delayed by political vicissitudes, but has quickened since 1960. To date, about half of the treatises have been printed. A complete facsimile edition under UNESCO auspices was initiated in 1972, and a complete ET is planned by the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity of Claremont, California.

This massive accession of new material is bound to prove enormously significant for the study of Gnosticism (hitherto documented chiefly by its opponents), heterodox Judaism, and primitive Christianity and their interrelations. The texts span a wide spectrum of Gnostic thought—Iranian, Hermetic, Jewish, as well as brands of Christian Gnosticism, Valentinian, Basilidian, and Barbelo-Gnostic or Sethian. If vindicated, the claim that The Sophia of Jesus Christ is a secondary Christianized version of The Letter of Eugnostos, and that other works—e.g., The Apocryphon of John, The Book of Thomas the Athlete (II), and The Hypostasis of the Archons—are Christian recensions of non-Christian originals, may illumine the much-debated existence of a pre-Christian Gnosticism. Scholars disagree whether The Apocalypse of Adam (V) is one such pre-Christian (syncretistic Jewish) Gnostic text. The Gospel of Thomas (II), whose markedly less Gnostic character is not unparalleled in the collection, is important for the development of the gospel tradition and early Syrian Christianity.

NANTES, EDICT OF (1598). Agreement signed between Henry IV of France* and the Huguenots,* after Henry (formerly the Protestant ruler of Navarre) had become a Catholic in order to bring to an end the Wars of Religion. It codified and enlarged rights granted to French Protestants by previous measures—e.g., Edict of Poitiers (1577), Convention of Nerac (1578)—permitting them free exercise of their religion in certain areas, civil equality, and fair administration of justice, and granting them a state subsidy for the support of their troops and pastors. By it they remained in complete control of two hundred towns, including La Rochelle, Montaubon, and Montpellier. Elsewhere in Europe, rulers chose and maintained one religion and one only for their subjects, but this edict introduced a new principle of toleration, establishing freedom for two religions to exist side by side. It was revoked by Louis XIV (1685). J.G.G. NORMAN

NARSAI (Narses) (399-502). Nestorian* theologian and poet. A monk who lived to a ripe age, Narsai headed the theological school in Edessa after 437. Exiled about 457, he established a new school at Nisibis on plans laid by Bishop Barsumas* and at his request. The school became the teaching center for Nestorian theology. Among his writings were dialogue songs, liturgical hymns (including a poem on baptism), rhyming and metrical sermons, and OT commentaries which are no longer extant. His poems are still used in Nestorian services.

NASH PAPYRUS. This single-leaf papyrus containing the entire Decalogue (part from Exod. 20:2-17, part from Deut. 5:6-21) and the Jewish confessional statement known as the Shema' (Deut. 6:4,5) was published by Stanley A. Cook in 1903. An early report on the find which was purchased by W.L. Nash from an Egyptian dealer was given in Revue biblique 1 (n.s.) 1904, pp. 242-50, which contains also an untouched photocopy of the manuscript. A convenient summary of the evidence, including a translation into English, is given by R.H. Charles, The Decalogue (1923).

From its extant form it is clear that it did not come from a roll of the Pentateuch, but was written on a separate sheet and used probably for liturgical or teaching purposes. The ancestor of the leaf is clearly a synagogue scroll from which it was copied. It is therefore a valuable witness to the ancient text of Scripture and was hailed in the day of its publication as "the oldest Hebrew biblical papyrus," a description which has now been antiquated by the discovery of the Qumran manuscripts.

Arguments which maintain that it reflects a knowledge of the Deuteronomic Decalogue (in Codex Vaticanus) and that its origin is to be placed, on epigraphical grounds, in the second half of the second century B.C. (c.165-137) are offered by W.F. Albright. R.H. Charles and F.C. Burkitt incline to a first-century A.D. dating, while S.A. Cook argued for a second-century A.D. date.

NATALIS ALEX (Noel Alexandre) (1639-1724). French historian and theologian. Born in Rouen, he entered the Dominican Order in 1655 and studied philosophy and theology at the Convent of St. Jacques in Paris, gaining a doctorate from the Sorbonne in 1675. Persuaded by Jean Baptiste Colbert, he entered the Society of Savants, lecturing on historical subjects of which twenty-four volumes were published between 1677 and 1688. The first volumes were welcomed, but later ones gave offense to Rome because of the author's Gallicanism,* causing the works to be placed on the Index, until later revised. His work included six octavo volumes on OT history, ten volumes on the Catechisma Romanus, including sermons and instructions to preachers. In 1704 he fell into Jansenism* by signing the Cas de Conscience, but soon recanted. He debated the Dominican and Jesuit doctrines of grace and predestination. His literary work ended through blindness.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS. A lineal descendant of the creedal Evangelical Alliance* of 1867. Evangelical leaders, called together by Ralph T. Davis and J. Elwin Wright, met at Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, in 1941. They planned another meeting of nearly 150 leaders at St. Louis in 1942, at which the National Association of Evangelicals was organized with a creedal statement. The first convention was held in May 1943. The organization serves over two million members and claims a constituency of ten million. Subsidiary groups such as the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association* and the National Sunday School Association promote missions and Sunday schools. Other groups fulfill other service functions. Members of the Association worked with evangelicals from other lands to organize the World Evangelical Fellowship* in Holland in 1951 to coordinate worldwide efforts of evangelical service. Denominations, churches, and individuals which are willing to sign the statement of faith are admitted to the organizations. EARLE E. CAIRNS

NATIONAL COVENANT (1638). A legal bond of association drawn up by Scottish Presbyterians against Charles I.* It began by repeating the Negative or King's Confession* of 1581 which had condemned Roman Catholic errors and "the usurped authority of that Roman antichrist upon the Scriptures of God, upon the Kirk, the Civil magistrate, and consciences of men; all his tyrannous laws made upon indifferent things against our Christian liberty." The Covenant went on to detail numerous Acts of Parliament which had established the Reformed faith and church government. Thereafter, more specifically, the subscribers bound themselves to maintain the freedom of the church, to defend the Presbyterian religion, "and the King's majesty . . . in the preservation of the foresaid true religion, liberties, and laws of the kingdom." There was no explicit condemnation of Episcopacy. Charles I was nevertheless incensed, but his law officers advised that the Covenant was not a contravention of statute law. Some 300,000 were estimated to have subscribed to this document, which gave its name to the Covenanters.* J.D. DOUGLAS

NATURAL THEOLOGY. This asserts a knowledge of God from the creation outside the bounds of revealed theology in the Bible. Psalm 19; Romans 1:19-21; Acts 14:15-17 and 17:24-29 imply a natural revelation of God available from nature and creation. Usually the question is not whether there exists some form of natural revelation, but rather what theology, if any, can be developed from it. Augustine* asserted that all knowledge of God was revealed. Anselm* developed the ontological argument for God's existence which was essentially a rationalistic argument divorced from revelation. Thomas Aquinas* modified Augustine and others considerably with his Scholastic view of reason and revelation, borrowing heavily from Aristotle.* Between Tertullian* and Aquinas a change had developed, with reason displacing revelation as the starting point of theological discovery.

The Reformers generally emphasized a strong view of special revelation with a natural theology limited by man's fallen condition. David Hume* assaulted the theistic arguments of Aquinas, and since then the debate has shifted back and forth. Karl Barth* and Emil Brunner* carried on a bitter dialogue, with Barth refuting natural theology by stressing special revelation within the context of his Crisis Theology. Brunner countered with a limited natural theology available from creation. Among conservative theologians the trend has been toward a limited natural theology stemming from natural revelation, sufficient to reveal God but insufficient to redeem man, hence the need for special revelation—especially as depraved man has perverted this natural knowledge (cf. Rom. 1). The conservative would also stress a strong view regarding the infallible character of this special revelation. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

NAUMBURG CONVENTION (1561). A conference of twelve Protestant princes and other German Protestant representatives held at Naumburg, Saxony, which sought to secure doctrinal unity, particularly on eucharistic doctrine. It agreed to recognize afresh the Augsburg Confession in both the Invariata (unaltered) edition of 1531 and the Variata (altered) edition of 1540, together with Melanchthon's Apology of 1531. Strict Lutheran divines such as M. Flacius* and T. Heshusius attacked the Invariata as heretical. A violent theological war ensued, ending in the triumph of strict Lutheranism in the Formula of Concord.* The convention also received and rejected an invitation to send delegates to the third session of the Council of Trent.*

NAVIGATORS, THE. An organization that fosters Christian fellowship, witness, and systematic Bible study and memorization. It began informally in 1933, when Dawson Trotman discipled a converted sailor, with 2 Timothy 2:2 as his guiding principle. He organized the Navigators as a nonprofit organization in California in 1943. Members worked primarily with servicemen until 1949, when work was begun in the Far East, and a year later in Europe. Their program fosters person-to-person recruitment training and guidance of servicemen, college students, and businessmen into effective Christian witnesses, especially through systematic Bible study and memorization. Headquarters are in Colorado Springs, Colorado. EARLE E. CAIRNS

NAYLOR, JAMES (c.1617-1660). English Quaker. Born near Wakefield of yeoman stock, he joined the parliamentary army in 1642 and served under both Fairfax and Cromwell. By 1650 he was respected in the ranks as an able preacher. Returning home after the Battle of Dunbar, he took up farming and joined a Congregational church. When George Fox* visited his area, he was much impressed with the doctrine of the inner light and became a Quaker. Later he felt a call to the itinerant ministry and began this in Westmorland, a Quaker stronghold, but later moved southward. Often in prison and much occupied in preaching, traveling, and writing tracts, he seems to have been particularly attractive to women. In 1656 he allowed his followers to treat him as though he were the Messiah, making the Bristol authorities think he was reenacting Christ's entry into Jerusalem. He was arrested. His case aroused national interest and was discussed in Parliament. After being pilloried and whipped, he was eventually released. He returned to the Quakers, but died soon afterward. PETER TOON

NAZARENE, CHURCH OF THE. An international denomination largely the result of the merger of approximately fifteen religious groups originating from the nineteenth-century Wesleyan Holiness Movement and whose organization, within the USA, took place at Pilot Point, Texas, in 1908. Originally called (in 1907) the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, the term "Pentecostal" was dropped from the title in 1919 due to its association with "speaking in tongues," a practice not in favor with its members.

The Church of the Nazarene began in the British Isles in 1906 through the ministry in Glasgow, Scotland, of George Sharpe, a native of Lanarkshire, who had been profoundly influenced by the Holiness Movement while in the United States. Originally called the Pentecostal Church of Scotland, it united with the Church of the Nazarene in the USA in 1914 to give birth to the vision of an international holiness communion. Congregations were founded throughout the USA by 1933 in a program of extension, and in the following thirty years 2,812 churches were founded worldwide. Where Methodism had flourished in the nineteenth century in the USA, the Church of the Nazarene flourished in the twentieth. A vigorous missionary program involved forty-two overseas fields. The Church of the Nazarene places great emphasis on Christian education in local churches, operates a publishing house, a theological seminary, several theological colleges, a number of liberal arts colleges, and numerous mission schools and hospitals.

The Church of the Nazarene combines congregational autonomy with superintendency in a representational system. Its governing body is the church assembly which meets every fourth year in the USA. In its major emphasis of entire sanctification as a work of grace following conversion, it stands firmly in the Wesleyan tradition. An emphasis is placed on tithed giving, and its members are bound by a Manual of General Rules which binds them to renounce alcohol, tobacco, the theater, the cinema, the ballroom, the circus, and also lotteries and games of chance. The members are also required to renounce "the profanity of the Lord's Day, either by unnecessary labor or business or . . . by the reading of Sunday papers or by holding diversions."

JAMES TAYLOR

NEAL, DANIEL (1678-1743). Best known as the historian of the Puritans. Educated at Merchant Taylor's School and in a Dissenting academy, he later studied at Utrecht and Leyden. In 1704 he became assistant minister of a Congregational church in Aldersgate Street, London. Two years later he himself became pastor and the church flourished. For his History of New England (1720) Harvard College gave him the honorary M.A. degree. His interests were wide and included the commendation of the practice of inoculation against smallpox. The first volume of his History of the Puritans was published in 1732; other volumes followed in 1733, 1736, and 1738, covering the period from the Reformation to 1689. It was severely criticized by some Anglicans—e.g., Zachary Grey. Nevertheless it has often been reprinted and is best used in the revised edition prepared by Dr. Joshua Toulmin. Neal was buried in Bunhill Fields.

PETER TOON

NEALE, JOHN MASON (1818-1866). Anglican scholar and hymnwriter. Born in London, he was educated at Sherborne and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He became a fellow of Downing College and was eleven times Seatonian Prize winner. Although his parents were Evangelicals, he adopted High Church ideals. To further these he helped in 1839 to found the Cambridge Camden (later Ecclesiological) Society, which greatly affected the style of Anglican buildings and worship. Lifelong ill-health prevented him in 1843 from accepting the living of Crawley, Sussex, but in 1846 he assumed the wardenship of Sackville College, East Grinstead, a refuge for indigent old men. There he remained for the rest of his life, declining the offer of the provostship of St. Ninian's Cathedral, Perth. His ritualism caused the bishop of Chichester to inhibit him for many years. Despite bitter Protestant opposition, Neale founded for the education of girls and the care of the sick the Sisterhood of St. Margaret at Rotherfield in 1854; he transferred it to East Grinstead in 1856.

He was a voluminous writer, with works including A Commentary on the Psalms (with R.F. Littledale, 4 vols., 1860-74); The History of the Holy Eastern Church (5 vols., 1847-73); and Essays on Liturgiology and Church History (1863). He wrote numerous sermons and children's stories. His fame rests chiefly on his many hymns and carols, some original, some paraphrases or translations mainly from Greek and Latin (though he knew about twenty languages). Examples are translations from Bernard of Cluny*; "All glory, laud, and honor" (Theodulf of Orléans,* d.821); "Art thou weary"; "Good King Wenceslas"; "O come, O come, Immanuel" (Latin, eighteenth century); "O happy band of pilgrims"; "Of the Father's love begotten" (Aurelius Prudentius* Clemens).

He translated 94 of the 105 hymns in The Hymnal Noted (1852-54). Among his other collections were Hymns for Children (1842-46); Mediaeval Hymns and Sequences (1851); and Hymns of the Eastern Church (1862), in which he broke entirely new ground.

See biographies and assessments by E.A. Towle (1906) and A.G. Lough (1962); also M. Donovan, "John Mason Neale," Church Quarterly Review 167 (1966), pp. 317-22, and J.E. Holroyd, "Victorian Hymn-Writer's Gothic Zeal," Country Life 140 (1966), pp. 1518-20.

JOHN S. ANDREWS

NEANDER, JOACHIM (1650-1680). German hymnwriter. Born at Bremen, he was converted there through a Pietist preacher and in 1671 became a tutor at Frankfurt. There he was influenced by P.J. Spener.* When appointed in 1674 to the headship of the Düsseldorf Lateinschule, a Reformed grammar school, he organized unofficial gatherings for instruction and preaching. This led to his suspension. In 1679 he returned to Bremen as a preacher, and the renewed opposition to his preaching was cut short by his premature death. Accomplished in literature, music, and theology, he was the first important poet of the German Reformed Church. He wrote some sixty hymns with tunes in a volume published in 1680. Although many are still sung in Germany, only two have become well known in Britain: "All my hope on God is founded" (R.S. Bridges*) and "Praise to the Lord, the Almighty" (C. Winkworth*).

JOHN S. ANDREWS

NEANDER, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM (1789-1850). German Protestant church historian. Born David Mendel, he changed his name after his conversion to Christianity in 1806. He studied under Schleiermacher and afterward was professor of church history at Berlin for nearly four decades (from 1813), where he was a determined opponent of the rationalistic views of F.C. Baur,* D.F. Strauss,* and others. He is generally regarded as the founder of modern Protestant historiography. His two-volumed Geschichte der Pflanzung und Leitung der christlichen Kirche durch die Apostle (1832-33; ET of 2nd ed., History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church by the Apostles, 2 vols., 1887-88) was a model for subsequent histories of the apostolic age. He authored many church-historical monographs, including works on Julian the Apostate (1812), Bernard of Clairvaux (1813), Gnosticism (1818), Chrysostom (1822), and Tertullian (1824). His multivolumed church history (6 vols., 1826-52) concentrated on personalities rather than institutions and set the tone for subsequent evangelical historical work (e.g., P. Schaff).

W. WARD GASQUE

NECTARIUS (d.397). Bishop of Constantinople from 381. Born at Tarsus, Cilicia, he was a jurist who rose to the office of praetor at Constantinople. When Gregory of Nazianzus resigned under pressure from the see of Constantinople, Emperor Theodosius I nominated Nectarius to succeed, despite the fact that he was entirely remote from church affairs and had not been baptized. He was baptized forthwith and unanimously elected and installed, and he took over from Gregory the presidency of the closing stages of the second ecumenical council (381). J. Kunze suggested that his formal profession of faith at the council in the words of the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed accounts for the association of that creed with the council. J.G.G. NORMAN

NECTARIUS (1605-c.1680). Patriarch of Jerusalem, 1661-69. Educated by the monks of Sinai, he became a monk and later studied at Athens under the Neo-Artistotelian, Theophilus Corydalleus. He vigorously opposed all Western theology, attacking both the claims of Roman Catholicism and the Calvinism of Cyril Lucar,* patriarch of Constantinople (1621-38). In 1662 he approved the "Confession" of Peter Mogila.* He took a prominent part in the Synod of Jerusalem (1672), which repudiated Lucar's doctrines and approved Mogila's "Confession." He wrote a treatise against the papacy published in 1682 by his successor, Dositheus.

NEESHIMA, YUZURU (1843-1890). Japanese Christian leader. Born of Samurai stock in Edo (now Tokyo), he was determined to bring the learning of the West to Japan and secretly fled his country in 1864. He finally reached Boston, where the ship's owner befriended him. Schooling and seminary followed his conversion, and in 1874 the sensitive and frail Neeshima, fired with a desire to evangelize his own people, was commissioned as a missionary by the Congregational Church. In 1875 he founded in Kyoto, the stronghold of Buddhism, the first Christian school in Japan, calling it the Doshisha ("one purpose society"). Undaunted by broken health, he worked passionately to give his students an education that united sound biblical teaching with the highest academic standards. He died from overwork when only forty-six. DAVID MICHELL

NEMESIUS (fl. c.400). Christian philosopher and bishop of Emesa in Syria. Despite chronological coincidence, this Nemesius, author of a remarkable Christian philosophical work On the Nature of Man, is probably not identical with the pagan governor of Cappadocia (386) and friend of Gregory of Nazianzus. Beyond his treatise nothing is known of his life. Eclectically incorporating or rejecting Platonic, Aristotelian, Stoic, and Neoplatonic thought including Porphyry, and relying on Galen's medical theories, the work of this highly cultured man embodied that Helleno-Christian intellectual synthesis of the fourth century and was a source for medieval knowledge of classical philosophies. Discounting his belief in the soul's preexistence, his treatise provided an early articulation of Scholastic views on the soul's nature, its relation to the body, and free will as a natural concomitant of reason and basis of human acts. DANIEL C. SCAVONE

NEOORTHODOXY. A loose term used to designate certain forms of twentieth-century Protestant theology which have sought to recover the distinctive insights and themes of the Reformation. The latter are seen as relevant to our modern predicament and as an essential part of the church's witness. Nevertheless, they require some restatement in the light of modern knowledge. The term is generally used by those who would not identify themselves with such a theology, either because it seems to deviate too much from the orthodoxy of the Reformation theologians and the classical Protestant confessions of faith, or because it is too narrowly orthodox.

The term indicates a reaction against the liberalism of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, with its reduction of Christian faith to general human and religious truths and moral values, and its relativization of Christianity through historical criticism and theories of the history of religions. By contrast, Neoorthodoxy represents an attempt to recover biblical perspectives. Stress is laid (in varying degrees) on the transcendence of God, man's responsibility as a creature, sin and guilt, the uniqueness of Christ as mediator of revelation and grace, and personal encounter with God in revelation.

These themes were sounded by the Dialectical Theology* or Theology of Crises of the twenties and thirties. They were given almost classic expression in Barth's* commentary on Romans (1919). God is seen as the Wholly Other who is not to be identified with anything in the world. He breaks into our world like a vertical line intersecting a horizontal plane in the person of Jesus Christ. But even so He remains incognito, for to encounter Jesus on a merely human level is to know only the man. God is hidden in Him even in the act of revelation. Full revelation occurs only in the risen Christ. Its truth is not perceived on the level of historical investigation, but through encounter by faith. Christ's coming is also the crisis of judgment of the world. It is both the revelation of God and the revelation of man's sin. This act of judgment is also the means of grace.

A Catholic theologian described Barth's work as a bomb falling on the happy playground of the theologians. The liberal historian Harnack* regarded Barth's teaching as unscientific theology. Nevertheless, Barth found himself at the head of a theological revival in Europe. He soon, however, modified his position and eventually abandoned Dialectical Theology. He spoke of the Kantian-Platonic crust which had encased his teaching. After various revisions, he felt his views of the 1920s were still too much influenced by Kierkegaard* and existentialism.* His stress on the difference between God and man was replaced by a doctrine of analogy, albeit one that could only be known by faith through revelation. At the same time Barth continued to distinguish his view of revelation from that of Protestant orthodoxy. He felt that the latter stressed revealed truth and the verbal inspiration of Scripture, whereas he wished to stress that revelation is essentially God revealing Himself in Christ, even though this is human only through the witness of the biblical writers. In his later teaching, especially in the Church Dogmatics, Barth paid particular attention to the exegesis of Scripture and the great theologians of the church.

The teaching of Emil Brunner* tended in a similar direction, though their latent differences came into the open through their dispute over natural theology in 1934. Brunner accused Barth of going too far in denying that man had no knowledge of God apart from that mediated by Christ. He urged that man must have some knowledge which would serve as a ready-made point of contact for the Gospel. He saw grounds for this in the image of God in man and man's awareness of such divine institutions as the state and marriage. Brunner pleaded for a new, reformed natural theology, but his case remained unconvincing in view of the concessions he was willing to make to Barth. Brunner's teaching on revelation focused on the element of divine, personal encounter and attacked even more strongly than Barth the concept of objective, revealed truth.

Also associated with Dialectical Theology were Rudolf Bultmann* and Friedrich Gogarten.* But whereas Barth and Brunner developed theologies which had a framework of biblical theism, Bultmann and Gogarten sought to reinterpret biblical themes in terms of an existential philosophy. The former were primarily concerned with exegesis, the latter with a radical demythologizing hermeneutic. Paul Tillich* has also been considered to be Neoorthodox. His sermons, in particular, are often concerned with biblical themes. But his Systematic Theology makes it clear that the basis of his thought is his existential ontology. In the USA, Reinhold Niebuhr* has been regarded as Neoorthodox in view of his use of biblical categories in his moral philosophy and interpretation of history. But in their different ways both Tillich and Niebuhr are more concerned with what they conceive to be the underlying principles of Protestantism than with a modern restatement of a corpus of doctrine.

NEOPLATONISM. This comprised probably the most important intellectual vehicle of the ancient world after the third century, though unlike Gnosticism* it never acquired a comprehensive religious guise. Its roots lie in the prolific Platonic culture of Alexandria, which had displaced Athens as the intellectual center of the world. Its founder, Plotinus,* was influenced by the unknown philosopher Ammonius Saccas.* There followed an outstanding philosophical progeny, including Porphyry* and Boethius.*

Neoplatonic influences on Christian thought were more as a catalyst and vehicle of thought than as a religion. Christian writers who employ Neoplatonic methods include Basil the Great,* Nemesius* of Emesa, Synesius* of Cyrene, Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM), Augustine,* and the treatises of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite.* In Neoplatonism the ultimate divine principle is above being. The divine light streams from the superabundance of the divine perfections and fades into the inexhaustible void. Existence is like a ladder with the top near to the light, but the bottom mired in the realm of the irrational and lifeless. By abstracting the particulars of existence or by sheer mystical illumination (a form of transcendental meditation) the mind can overcome the hindrances of the psyche to experience the sublime.

Neoplatonism aimed to overcome the duality between thought and ultimate reality by direct union of the soul with God. It maintained an infinite qualitative distinction and distance between the material world (including the flesh) and divine goodness; hence the ascription to Christ of a phantasmal body by some Neoplatonists because a real incarnation was unthinkable. Religious questions were of the utmost importance, based on a dualistic view of reality. Man should turn his face upward; science turns man's face to what is below him. They refused totally to see in the world the manifestation of a spiritual or divine principle. By contrast, Christianity brought the divine goodness down into the world in discrete personal, bodily form by the Incarnation. Salvation is by redemption through the Cross, based upon the creation of the world by God and His personal coming into it in human life, not by aspiration.

NEREUS and ACHILLEUS (first century). Roman martyrs. Their remains are in the cemetery of St. Domitilla on the Via Ardeatina. The church built over their tomb dates from the fourth century. According to the inscription on the tomb by Pope Damasus, they were soldiers. According to their legendary Acta, however, they were eunuchs in Domitilla's household, and with Domitilla* were transported to the island of Terracina, where Domitilla was burnt, and Nereus and Achilleus beheaded. The Acta also purport to tell the story of Petronilla, the Apostle Peter's daughter.

NERO CLAUDIUS CAESAR (37-68). Roman emperor from 54. He was an enthusiast for the arts and sports. The early part of his reign was stable enough, for he was under the influence of Burrus and Seneca and had the service of able governors in the provinces; but he was soon free from the restraints of more astute men and, as the result of numerous blunders, became extremely unpopular with the nobility and populace alike. His vanity and lust for power seemed limitless, and his suspicions led him to have his closest friends and relatives executed. The fire during July of 64 that destroyed one-half of Rome increased his unpopularity. In response to rumors that he had started the fire and recited his own poetry over the burning city, he tried to pass the blame on to the Christians, many of whom were arrested and executed in a most horrible manner.

Nero was the "Caesar" to whom Paul appealed for justice (Acts 25:10) and whose God-given authority he had carefully supported (Rom. 13:1-7). The details are uncertain, but it is probable that Paul was acquitted by or even released before the trial at the end of his two years in Rome (Acts 28) and that he was arrested again a few years later and was executed (c. A.D. 66-67). The Apostle Peter was probably executed at about the same time or a little later.

The unofficial policy of opposition to Christianity instigated by Nero was later to become the official policy of the empire.

NERSES (Narses the Great) (c.326-373). Armenian catholicos. Born perhaps of royal stock, he married a princess and after her death was ordained a priest. In 353 he became catholicos (or patriarch) of Armenia, which marked a new era in Armenian history. Until then the church had been identified with the royal family and the nobility; Nerses brought it closer to the people, promulgating numerous laws on marriage, fast-days, and divine worship. He built schools and hospitals, and sent monks throughout the land preaching the Gospel. Some of his reforms brought him into conflict with King Arshak III, who exiled him to Edessa. On the king's death he returned at the command of King Pap (or Bad) in 369, only to repeat his offense. Tradition says he was poisoned at the instigation of the king.

NESTLE, EBERHARD (1851-1913). German biblical scholar and textual critic. He held professorships at Ulm, Tübingen, and the Protestant seminary at Maulbronn (from 1898). Nestle did a considerable amount of work on the text of the Septuagint, but it is for his edition of the Greek NT that he is best known today. First published in 1898 by the Württemberg Bible Society, it has gone through twenty-five editions and is the standard text used by the majority of theological students and teachers, especially in Germany (though the new Bible Societies edition, edited by K. Aland et al., is also very popular). Subsequent editors have been Erwin Nestle, his son, and Kurt Aland.

NESTORIANISM; NESTORIUS. Nestorianism is usually regarded as the heresy, taught originally by Nestorius, which split Jesus Christ, the God-man, into two distinct persons, one human, one divine. Born of Persian parents, Nestorius was probably a pupil of Theodore of Mopsuestia before becoming a monk and presbyter at Antioch. Because of the fame he achieved as a preacher, Theodosius II* elevated him in 428 to the patriarchal see of Constantinople. Soon after, he was called upon to pronounce on the suitability of Theotokos ("God-bearing") as a title for the Virgin Mary. He ruled that it would be best not to use the title unless it was balanced with anthrōpotokos ("man-bearing"); however, the best title for her was Christotokos ("Christ-bearing"). His doctrine, and the vehement way in which he expressed it, led Cyril* of Alexandria to oppose him and the Council of Ephesus* (431) to anathematize him as a heretic and to declare him deposed. The emperor exiled him to his monastery in Antioch and later to the Great Oasis in Egypt, where he died about 451.

Naturally Nestorius claimed that he was no heretic. As his writings were thought only to exist in fragments, it has been difficult to judge his claim. But the discovery in 1910 of The Book (Bazaar) of Heracleides in a Syriac translation has provided us with greater understanding of his views. Nevertheless, modern scholars are not in agreement in their assessment of his doctrine. For some he was the unfortunate victim of ecclesiastical politics; for others he remains guilty of the theological errors charged against him by Cyril and others.

What was his teaching? This can only be understood against the background of the traditional Antiochene Christology which stresses the fact that Jesus Christ was truly a man. First of all, he taught that the human and divine natures remained unaltered and distinct in their union within Jesus of Nazareth. He could not conceive of the divine Logos* being involved in human suffering or change, and so he wanted to hold the natures apart. Secondly, he emphasized that Jesus Christ lived a truly human life which involved growth, temptation, and suffering. This would have been impossible, he argued, if the human nature had been fused and overcome by the divine nature. He believed that the Alexandrian Christology overstressed the divinity of Jesus Christ.

To solve the problem of the union of the two natures of Christ—and to emphasize that he taught the doctrine of the one Person, who combined in Himself two distinct elements, Godhead and manhood—Nestorius explained that Jesus Christ, the person described in the gospels, was the "common prosōpon," the prosōpon of union. The humanity had the form of Godhead bestowed upon it, and the divinity took upon itself the form of a servant: the result was the prosōpon of Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, one Person but with two natures. In view of this, Mary his mother was best described as Christotokos. While the strong point of Nestorianism is its attempt to do full justice to the manhood of Christ (a true Savior of men), its weak point is that it places the two natures alongside each other with little more than a moral and sympathetic union between them.

After the Council of Ephesus those Eastern bishops who could not accept the views of the majority gradually formed themselves into a separate Nestorian Church. Its center was in Persia, and a school of Nestorian theology developed under Ibas,* a friend of Nestorius, at Edessa. Later the center of Nestorian theology moved to Nisibis in the school founded there by Barsumas,* the pupil of Ibas. The ecclesiastical center and see of the (Nestorian) "Patriarch of the East" was at Seleucia-Ctesiphon on the Tigris until about 775, when it moved to Baghdad. Nestorians were active missionaries and founded communities in Arabia, India (Malabar Christians*), and Turkestan. During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the Nestorian churches suffered badly in the Mongol invasions, but a remnant lived on in the mountains of Kurdistan. Today there still exist the "Assyrian Christians" who claim to be the continuation of the Nestorian Church. They still forbid the use of Theotokos, and they treat Nestorius as a saint.

NETTER, THOMAS (c.1372-c.1430). Carmelite theologian. Known also as Thomas Walden from his birth at Saffron Walden, he is best known for his confutation of Wycliffe and the Lollards.* From his ordination in 1396, study at Oxford where Netter received the theological doctorate, and attendance in 1409 at the Council of Pisa, he gained a love for royalty and a hatred for the Lollards. As provincial of the Carmelite Order, Netter asked prayers for the young king Henry VI. His love made him thus bold, for Henry V had died in his arms and Netter preached the funeral sermon at Westminster. At Henry V's wish, Netter commenced his Doctrinale Fidei Ecclesiae Catholicae contra Wiclevistas et Hussitas in 1421. This major work approved by Martin V at Rome demolished the Lollard theses point by point. Martin requested a second book on the sacraments and a third on rites. Netter also prepared with help the Fasciculus zizaniorum, a fully documented source book of Lollardy, the only contemporary account to survive. He died in Rouen. Netter was a learned defender of Catholicism and a worthy opponent of Wycliffe.

NEUTRAL TEXT. The name given by Westcott and Hort to a type of text of the Greek NT which they felt to be near the original autograph. They distinguished the Western text as a clearly separate stream and saw the Neutral Text as sharing a common ancestor with the Alexandrian, but being free from later corruption and mixture. The two leading representatives were Codex Vaticanus (B) and Codex Sinaiticus (X), and when these two agreed Westcott and Hort thought themselves to be very near the original reading. They never rejected such readings unless there were strong reasons for preferring something else. Most textual critics today think their dependence upon these two MSS to have been excessive.

NEVIN, JOHN WILLIAMSON (1803-1886). German Reformed theologian. Descendant of wealthy Scotch-Irish farmers, he prepared for the Presbyterian ministry under Princeton's Charles Hodge.* While teaching at Western Theological Seminary, he developed an interest in church history, particularly through the writings of J.A.W. Neander.* In 1840 he was called to teach at the German Reformed Seminary at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. With Philip Schaff,* another convert to the German Reformed Church, he created the Mercersburg Theology.* His major works were The Anxious Bench (1843), which attacked the superficiality of revivalism, and The Mystical Presence (1846), which presented the Eucharist, the "spiritual real presence," as central to the church's life. Plagued by illness, he retired in 1853, but later taught at his church college, Franklin and Marshall, where he was president (1866-76). His anti-individualistic thinking had much influence on later American Christianity.

DARREL BIGHAM

NEVIUS, JOHN LIVINGSTON (1829-1893). American missionary to China. Educated at Princeton Seminary, he went to China in 1854 under the Presbyterian Mission Board and served mainly in the Shantung area. He is best known for the "Nevius method" of self-support and propagation. Its principles were: (1) each Christian should support himself by his own work and be a witness for Christ by life and word in his own neighborhood; (2) church methods and machinery should be developed only so far as the indigenous Christians could take responsibility for these; (3) the church should select for fulltime work those who seemed best qualified and whom it was able to support; (4) churches were to be built in native style and by the Christians from their own resources. The Korean missionaries adopted this approach, and a vigorous church rapidly developed there which maintained an independent spirit virtually unmatched in the non-Western world.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH. In 1863 the senior apostle of the Catholic Apostolic Church,* F.V. Woodhouse, excommunicated the movement's German prophet, Heinrich Geyer, for recognizing new apostles to replace those who had died. In consequence the New-Apostolic Church was founded in Germany. It laid less emphasis on the Second Coming and was distinguished from its predecessor by the establishment of a successional apostolate subject to a senior apostle or patriarch with quasi-papal powers, regarded as "the visible incarnation of Christ on earth." The New Apostolic Church continued to flourish in Germany—even under Hitler, whom Johann Bischoff (patriarch 1932-60) claimed to be God's special emissary. Since 1925 the German branch of the community has nearly trebled in size and Neoapostolics are to be found also in Switzerland, France, South Africa, Java, and the Americas. TIMOTHY C.F. STUNT

NEW DELHI ASSEMBLY (1961). The third assembly of the World Council of Churches,* held in India with its theme "Jesus Christ the Light of the World." Decisions and features of the assembly included a merger of the WCC with the International Missionary Council*; approval given to membership applications from twenty-three churches, including the Russian Orthodox Church and two Pentecostal churches from Chile, adding seventy-one million members to the movement; and the admission of five official Roman Catholic observers.

Some 577 delegates and 1,006 participants were present. Presidents elected were Archbishop A.M. Ramsey,* Sir Francis Ibiam of Eastern Nigeria, Archbishop Iakovos of the Greek archdiocese of North and South America, Dr. Martin Niemöller,* Dr. David Moses of the United Church of North India, and Mr. Charles Parlin, Methodist layman from the USA. Overwhelmingly accepted was a required Trinitarian formula: "The WCC is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit."

A variety of problems was encountered, among them the language barrier, time pressures, the subordination of delegates to preparation for the assembly, verbose papers, and distinctions between clergy and laity. Anti-Semitism, proselytism, religious liberty, and concern for refugees were discussed. Reports of the three study groups, concerned respectively with witness, service, and unity, were "approved in substance and commended to the churches for study and appropriate action."

Witness proceeded on these bases: Jesus Christ is the light of the world; the peoples of the world are interdependent; evangelism must proceed in new ways. Proclamation of Christ as Lord and Savior has "deep implications," and differences among WCC members must be studied. Any evangelism must take specific cognizance of youth, the worker, the intellectual. New ways might include dialogue, small groups, listening, mass media, use of laymen, examination of church structures to see if they help or hinder evangelism, and the embodiment of the message in lives.

Service was concerned about technology, social change, and political order. Since government gives a necessary order to society, Christians must work for political institutions which protect individual freedom and oppose governments which deny rights for racial and other reasons. The group was concerned to promote racial equality; international trust, especially between Russia and America; international institutions which promote peace; disarmament; integrity and honesty in political life.

In the unity section it was concluded that "the unity which is both God's will and his gift to his church is being made visible" in various ways "in the fully committed fellowship" which yet leaves many questions unanswered, including the inability to have intercommunion and one baptism.

NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY (c.1750-c.1850). Calvinist movement begun under Jonathan Edwards.* Regarded as one of America's greatest thinkers, Edwards set out to reformulate Puritan Calvinism to render it more harmonious toward the spiritual experiences of the Great Awakening.* In order to justify the results of the latter, Edwards set about to wrestle with freedom versus sovereignty. In his monumental work Freedom of the Will he introduced a subtle change into Calvinism which taught that man's role in salvation was negligible. Edwards conceived his doctrine of the inclined will, having borrowed heavily from John Locke's philosophy as an aid. In essence, Edwards said that God, in sovereign disposition, through the Holy Spirit's work, makes man's will able to respond to grace. In short, God inclines the will to render man able to respond to salvation. He sought middle ground between the "enthusiasts" of revival and Charles Chauncy,* who accused the revival of mindless emotion. Edwards agreed that "heat without light" was wrong, but one could not divorce truth from experience. He hoped to pacify the older Calvinists who spurned the revival and the opposite party of Arminian extremists.

This "New England Theology" of Edwards dominated conservative Congregational schools, such as Edwards's Yale, from about 1750 to the late 1800s, when German critical theology won the day. Later exponents were Jonathan Edwards, Jr. (1745-1801), Timothy Dwight,* Samuel Hopkins,* and Nathaniel Taylor.* The last-named seriously modified the doctrine of original sin. The movement was a gradual retreat from Calvinism in the face of greater emphasis on self-determination. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY. An American theological position associated with N.W. Taylor,* his students, and Yale Divinity School in New Haven, Connecticut. Sometimes known as "Taylorism," the theology of this school was a modified Calvinism used to provide an apologetic for the revivalism of the Second Great Awakening.* The New Haven Theology stood in contrast to the somewhat older theology of Samuel Hopkins* known as "Consistent Calvinism," the system stressing divine sovereignty, total human depravity and inability, and the idea of "disinterested benevolence"—the willingness to be damned for the glory of God. The New Haven Theology developed at a time when the Unitarian controversy was dividing many New England churches. Taylor and his followers attempted to use a rationalistic apologetic to defend Trinitarianism and to support experiential religious conversion. Taylor made a distinction between certainty and necessity: man sins inevitably and certainly, but not necessarily. Thus sin is voluntary. The reaction against Taylorism, or the New Haven Theology, led in 1834 to the formation of Hartford Theological Seminary, but Taylorism lent its support to a growing number of modifications in the older Puritan, Calvinistic theology. Gradually the "governmental" replaced the "satisfaction" theory of the Atonement: a universal atonement, and the idea of "limited atonement" and original sin came to be understood as moral or dispositional rather than imputational.

NEW JERUSALEM, CHURCH OF THE. (The New Church, commonly called "Swedenborgians.") A group organized in London in 1787 by followers of the theological teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg.* The organization and growth of the church is peculiar because the movement was started by books without the influence of any personal leadership. Swedenborg never preached a sermon and made no effort to gather followers about him, but he left his Latin works in twenty volumes to ministers and university librarians. These were translated and won disciples who were organized by Robert Hindmarsh, a Methodist. Ministers were ordained, other groups were started, and by 1789 the first general conference was held at their chapel in Great Eastcheap, London. By 1792 a Swedenborgian church was established in Baltimore, Maryland, and in 1817 the General Convention of the New Jerusalem met in Philadelphia. A division of the church (1897) resulted in a branch, the General Church of the New Jerusalem, with headquarters at Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania. The emphasis in their worship is liturgical, concentrating on Jesus Christ with preaching based on the "inspired" parts of the Bible, twenty-nine books of the OT and five in the NT.

Baptism and the Lord's Supper are observed, and in addition to the usual Christian holidays, New Church Day (June 19) is observed. Worldwide membership is about 40,000 with 4,500 in Britain and 5,800 in the General Convention in America. The General Church has about 2,000 members and concentrates its activity at Byrn Athyn, where it supports an academy and a theological seminary. The General Convention seminaries are at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Islington, London. The New Churches maintain an active missionary program and have had very successful work in Africa. There is a foundation in New York that distributes Swedenborg's writings, and the churches publish the monthly New Church Messenger and Journal of the General Convention.

NEWLIGHTISM. New England Congregational preachers who supported the Great Awakening* of the 1740s with its emphasis on an instantaneous or sudden conversion experience and attendant emotional and mystical features became known as "New Lights"—because they sought to get their congregations "new-lighted" by the Spirit of God. A majority of these men were moderates (e.g., Jonathan Edwards*) and took an irenic approach, but many became radical separatists, vehemently critical of the established churches and advocates of the complete separation of church and state. Later, followers of B.W. Stone* became known as New Lights.

NEWMAN, FRANCIS WILLIAM (1805-1897). English scholar. Younger brother of John Cardinal Newman,* he was converted to the evangelical faith at fourteen, and in 1822 went to Oxford, where John was already an established don. Francis soon came to doubt the efficacy of infant baptism and so declined to take his M.A. degree. He associated with the early Brethren and joined A.N. Groves* in the mission to Baghdad; he was stoned by Muslims and just escaped martyrdom. Returning in England in 1833 to collect funds for the mission, he suffered intensely as a result of rumors of his "unsoundness," which culminated in an attack by J.N. Darby* and exclusion from Brethren circles. Spiritually isolated for many years, though earnestly longing for Christian fellowship, he eventually lost his faith and, though remaining a theist, became for a time England's foremost anti-Christian writer. Newman, who became professor of classics at University College, London, was a highly original thinker, an expert in many fields, including mathematics. His knowledge was encyclopedic, but his judgment was often warped, and he became renowned as a defender of lost causes. R.E.D. CLARK

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY (1801-1890). Tractarian and cardinal. He was born into a family with Evangelical sympathies, and this was the strongest influence upon him until entering Oxford University in 1817. In 1822 he was elected to a fellowship at Oriel College, then a center of influence. He gradually relinquished Evangelicalism under the influence of R. Whateley,* who impressed upon him the divine appointment of the church, and Hawkins, who taught him to value tradition. E.B. Pusey,* J. Keble,* and above all R.H. Froude* took him further in High Church beliefs.

In 1828 he was appointed vicar of St. Mary's, the University Church in Oxford. The aim of Newman and his friends was to show that the Church of England was a via media between Protestantism and Romanism, a position based upon the teaching of the early "undivided church." His pulpit and the wider distribution of his sermons under the title of Parochial and Plain Sermons with the publication of Tracts for the Times provided the means for disseminating these views. The tracts came to an end when Tract 90—attempting a reconciliation between the Thirty-Nine Articles* and Romanism—came under widespread criticism. His researches into the early church had resulted in a book, The Arians of the Fourth Century, and also led to doubts about the Church of England which were raised again in 1839 while he was studying the Monophysite controversy. In 1843 he resigned St. Mary's and in 1845 was received into the Roman Church.

At first his career in the Roman Church seemed destined to be a succession of failures. Although the rectorship of the newly founded university in Dublin led to another book, Idea of a University, this scheme was to founder. The editorship of The Rambler was short-lived; a scheme to build a hostel for Catholics in Oxford in which Newman would have been warden was forbidden. But in 1864, in response to a personal attack upon him by Charles Kingsley,* Newman replied in an autobiographical sketch, Apologia Pro Vita Sua. This once again brought him into prominence. In 1870 he published the Grammar of Assent in defense of religious belief, and in 1879 he was made a cardinal.

His influence, within both the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church, has been immense. In the former it is seen in the subsequent influence of the Anglo-Catholic tradition within the Church of England, and in Rome particularly in regard to theories about the development of doctrine (cf. his Development of Christian Doctrine, 1845).

NEW TESTAMENT. A translation of two Greek words which, better rendered "new covenant," occur in 1 Corinthians 11:25; 2 Corinthians 3:6; Hebrews 8:8, 9, 13. The term is based upon the prophecy of Jeremiah 31:31-34 that God would make a new covenant with his people. The apostolic church believed that He had done so in Christ. When the writings of the apostles and their companions were collected and put on a similar footing to the scriptures of Israel, it was natural for Christians to refer to "the old covenant" and "the new covenant." The NT canon was finally fixed to include twenty-seven books. The first four are the gospels, with details of the life, death and resurrection, and teaching of Jesus. Then there is the Acts of the Apostles, showing how after Pentecost the Gospel was taken from Jerusalem to Rome, followed by the epistles, letters of apostles and others to Christian congregations, and finally the apocalyptic Book of Revelation.

NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM. The application to the NT of techniques used by scholars in the study of ordinary literature in the attempt to determine the original wording of the various documents and to decide questions of date, authorship, literary composition, and the like. Although "criticism" has particularly negative connotations in some Christian circles—partly due to the hostility of some leading critics to orthodox theology and partly to an inadequate understanding of the nature of the biblical writings—the task of the NT critic is an essentially positive one. In the broadest sense a critic (from Gk. krisis, "judgment") is one who seeks to make intelligent judgments about fundamental questions which arise out of a serious study of the NT. Thus the distinction between "the critics" and "Bible-believing scholars" is a false one: anyone who studies the NT in any depth is by definition a biblical critic, for he must deal with the same necessary questions that others face.

For convenience, NT criticism may be divided into the areas of textual, linguistic, historical, literary, form, and redaction criticism.

Textual criticism seeks to ascertain the original wording of a book, particularly in the event this has been altered in the process of transmission (as in the case in all documents which have been copied by hand over the course of centuries). The discipline has been developed into a carefully scientific enterprise during the past two hundred years by men such as Griesbach,* Lachmann,* Tischendorf,* Tregelles,* Westcott,* and Hort,* von Soden, and a host of more recent scholars. Textual criticism is sometimes called "lower" criticism, since it represents the primary stage in the study of the NT and is therefore foundational for all subsequent work.

Linguistic criticism seeks to understand the nature of the words of a document. Here one is concerned with matters of Greek grammar and philology, idiomatic expressions and connotative overtones of words and phrases, precise relationships of words to one another in a particular context, the special vocabulary of an individual author, and so forth. In this area great advances have been made by scholars like Blass,* J.B. Lightfoot,* Westcott,* Deissmann,* G. Milligan,* J.H. Moulton,* A.T. Robertson, W. Bauer,* and the many contributors to the monumental Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (ed. Kittel-Friedrich, 1932ff.). The language of the NT is now identified as basically the ordinary Greek of the Eastern Roman Empire of the first century, but with a very strong Semitic flavor; this latter element is due both to the Aramaic mother-tongue of the earliest Christians (as also Jesus) and to the profound influence of the OT on the writers' vocabulary and style.

Historical criticism is the attempt to understand a document, a concept, or even a word in its historical setting. This is profoundly important, for a failure to grasp the historical background of a text may lead to grossly misleading interpretations. Thus one cannot understand Revelation without knowledge of the situation facing the church in Asia Minor toward the end of the first Christian century, or the fourfold prohibition of the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:20, 29) apart from the problem of Jewish-Gentile relations in the early church, or the sayings and parables of Jesus independently of knowledge of the basic features of Semitic rhetoric and Palestinian Jewish customs. The greatest advances have been made in this area during the past two centuries of criticism.

Literary criticism—sometimes called "higher" criticism, because it builds on the results of textual or "lower" criticism—is concerned with questions about authorship, sources, composition, literary form, date, and place of writing, etc. As a comprehensive term it includes the whole scope of what goes under the rubric of "NT Introduction."

Redaction criticism represents the latest phase in the development of gospel criticism. It aims at understanding the special contribution of each evangelist, i.e., the way he (the redactor) has shaped the traditional material with which he works and how his approach differs from that of the other evangelists.

Form criticism—see separate article.

NEWTON, BENJAMIN WILLS (1807-1899). Early Plymouth Brethren* leader. Of Quaker stock, he had a distinguished academic career at Oxford where also he was influenced by J.N. Darby* who came on a visit. He began his ministry in Plymouth, and also traveled throughout the county preaching. About 1835 he was used in the conversion of his cousin S.P. Tregelles,* the textual critic, to whose researches he gave generous financial aid. Newton and Darby differed over prophetical interpretation and church order; in 1847 Newton was charged with heresy through some teaching on Christ's humanity, but he withdrew the doctrine. That year he left Plymouth and for many years ministered in a chapel in Bayswater, where he drew large congregations. His written ministry continued till he was nearly ninety. An austere man of Calvinist views and high personal honor, Newton influenced many leading ministers of his time. G.C.D. HOWLEY

NEWTON, SIR ISAAC (1642-1717). Scientist, theologian, and master of the Mint. Born of a Lincolnshire farming family, Newton early showed a mechanical bent. Converted as a student at Cambridge, his paramount aim was to understand Scripture. Science was a "garden" given him to cultivate; every discovery he made was, he believed, communicated to him by the Holy Spirit. Though an Anglican, he rejected infant baptism, believed that Scripture taught Arianism,* and held that all who believed simply in the love of God were entitled to Communion in church. His unorthodoxy was rarely suspected; he avoided controversy in religion as in science. Among his main interests were church history, chronology, alchemy, prophecy, mathematical science, and the relation of science to religion. In science he is remembered for the law of gravity, the infinitesimal calculus (with Leibnitz), the separation of white light into colors by the prism, Newton's rings, and his work as president of the Royal Society.* In earlier years he was lovable and generous and helped in the distribution of Bibles to the poor. In later years with the acquisition of power, his character seemed to deteriorate, and he could be singularly ungenerous to those (such as Whiston and Hooke) who ventured to disagree with him. At the Mint he was merciless to counterfeiters of coin. Newton was knighted by Queen Anne in 1705.

NEWTON, JOHN (1725-1807). Anglican clergyman and hymnwriter. Son of a merchant sea captain, he had an unsettled childhood and turbulent youth, including several periods of intense religious experience. He was forced to join the Royal Navy, tried to escape, was arrested in West Africa, and eventually became virtually the slave of a white slavetrader's black wife. She humiliated him, and he lived hungry and destitute for two years, involved in the slave trade. In 1747 he boarded a ship for England, but a violent storm in the North Atlantic nearly sank them. For Newton it was a moment of revelation, and he turned to God.

Nevertheless, further slave trading followed, but in 1755 he gave up the sea, and in 1764 became curate of Olney in Buckinghamshire. There, in a successful ministry of fifteen years, he befriended the poet William Cowper* and also became widely known. The two produced the Olney Hymns, of which a number are still in general use, including "Amazing grace," "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds," and "Glorious things of thee are spoken." In 1779 Newton moved to London, becoming vicar of St. Mary, Woolnoth. His influence was widely felt, especially in the evangelical world. Handel's Messiah had made an enormous impact on London, and Newton preached a famous series of sermons on the texts Handel had used as libretto. After one of these the young William Wilberforce* sought his counsel. In his latter years, Newton played a leading part in Wilberforce's political campaign which led to the abolition of the slave trade.

NEW ZEALAND. Christianity was founded in New Zealand by nineteenth-century European missionaries and settlers, with a leaven of American influence. Anglican missions (1814) followed by Wesleyans (1822) and Roman Catholics (1838) made slow progress. Missionaries were frequently used by astute chiefs like Hongi (1777-1828) to further their political aims. Communication was difficult, and missionary lives were more persuasive than their preaching. They were often peacemakers in tribal wars, and freed slaves frequently assisted the work of conversion ahead of missionaries. The King Movement inspired by W. Tamihana (1802-66) combined Christian and Maori ideas, but aroused deep official suspicions. Bitter land wars and unjust confiscations gave the missions an irrevocable setback and inspired Hauhauism (c.1863) and Ringatu founded by Te Kooti (c.1830-93). By 1900 there were few Maori clergy, and even in the heavily Maori Waiapu Diocese no native synodsmen till 1900.

The healer, T.W. Ratana (1870-1939), inspired a significant independent church combining Maori and Christian religion, which had by 1931 linked with the Labour Party and played a vital role in improving the social lot of the Maori, as did those like Sir A. Ngata (1874-1950) educated at Te Aute College (1854). Ngata's important religious ideas had more influence on J.G. Laughton (1891-1965) and the Presbyterian Church than his own Anglican Church, which belatedly consecrated F.A. Bennett (1871-1950) as suffragan bishop to counter the impact of Ratana. Numerical European dominance hampered the development of indigenous Maori Christianity, though K. Ihaka (1921- ) and R.H. Rangiihu (1912- ) are significant leaders. After World War II, migrants from Samoa and the Cook Islands introduced a vigorous Polynesian Christianity, since 1969 largely Presbyterian.

European Christianity was dominated by Anglicans, Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, and Methodists. Outside Wakefield colonies like Presbyterian Otago (1848) or Anglican Canterbury (1850), there was no attempt to create an established church. Formerly national churches often found it difficult to adjust to being free churches. Even after the abolition of the provinces, regional loyalties remained strong and nationwide denominations developed slowly, especially among nonepiscopal churches. Presbyterians united in 1901 and Methodists in 1913. Shortage of clergy, isolation, and egalitarianism all contributed to greater lay participation than in Britain, notably among Anglicans, due to the Constitution of 1857, the first in the British Empire to reestablish synodal government.

Despite strong resistance to establishment, cooperation of churches and government has always been important in medical and welfare work and is increasing. Initially churches played a major educational role, but the 1877 Education Act established a free, secular, and compulsory primary system which effectively ended Protestant Schools and left religious instruction on a voluntary basis of doubtful legality till 1962. Led by Bishop P. Moran (1832-96), Roman Catholics established at great sacrifice a virtually complete school system. Apart from some notable secondary schools like Christ's College (1851), Protestants have worked within the state system. In Dunedin and Christchurch, churchmen were active in foundation of universities, though no faculty of theology emerged till 1945 at Otago. Theological colleges like St. John's College (1844), the Theological Hall (1876), Holy Cross College (1900), and halls of residence like Knox College (1909) have been the main Christian contribution to tertiary education. Scholars like J. Dickie (1875-1942), H. Ranston (1878-1971), J.A. Allan (1897- ), and E.M. Blaiklock (1903- ) have been of more than local importance. New Zealand culture has not been strongly influenced by Christianity, though writers like J.K. Baxter (1926- ) are a sign of change.

Interdenominational cooperation has grown steadily from the Bible in Schools movement, through the first National Council of Churches in the Commonwealth (1941) to reunion negotiations which since 1964 have included Anglicans, Associated Churches of Christ, Congregationalists, Methodist, and Presbyterians. Protestant-Roman Catholic relations varied from bad to correct, but since 1945, the leveling influence of war and rapid population growth has strengthened previous tendencies to shed inherited and imported denominational differences. Vatican II and the establishment of a Joint Working Committee in 1967 led to important cooperative ventures like Inter-View '69 and an ecumenical faculty of theology at Otago University (1972).

Radicals like O.E. Burton (1893- ) or L.G. Geering (1918- ) have been rare, but R. Waddell (1850-1932), J. Gibb (1857-1935), C. Julius (1847-1938), C. West-Watson (1877-1951), J.J. North (1871-1950), J. Liston (1881- ), and P.B. McKeefry (1899- ) have been distinguished national religious leaders, while A.A. Brash (1913- ) and A.H. Johnston (1912- ) have contributed to the international ecumenical movement. Sir W. Nash (1882-1967) and A.H. Nordmeyer (1901- ) have made important Christian contributions to politics. New Zealand Christianity is sober, conservative, and practical, still very British, but increasingly aware of its Pacific and Asian brethren.

NIAGARA CONFERENCES. Gatherings for Bible study at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, in the closing decades of the nineteenth century. These assemblies marked the beginning of the Bible Conference movement. The idea of the conferences probably originated in 1868 when eight men associated with the premillennial (or millenarian) periodical Waymarks in the Wilderness met informally in New York City. Other conferences followed, but early in the seventies several of the original group died, and the meetings were interrupted until younger men assumed leadership.

In 1875 another small group met near Chicago. Nathaniel West, James H. Brookes, W.J. Erdman, H.M. Parsons, and two other men agreed to meet the following summer. In July 1876, these six along with A.J. Gordon* and others met at Swampscott, Massachusetts, for fellowship and Bible study. They agreed to call their group "Believers' Meeting for Bible Study." This Swampscott meeting marked the birth of the Bible Conference Movement, for each year following these men and a growing company met for Bible study. From 1883 to 1897 the conference gathered at Niagara-on-the-Lake from which it received its name.

The conferences usually opened with a Wednesday evening prayer meeting. Then, for the next week the participants heard two Bible lessons each morning, two each afternoon, and another each evening. Topics studied during the Swampscott meetings were typical: "The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit," "How to Study the Bible," and "The Second Coming of Christ." Both the method of "Bible readings" and the topics of the conferences strongly suggest that the gatherings were a result of J.N. Darby's* travels in the United States and the influence of the Plymouth Brethren.*

Due to differences in the 1877 conference, Brookes drew up a fourteen-point doctrinal statement in 1878 which was officially adopted in 1890. The first article affirms that "the Holy Ghost gave the very words of the sacred writings," and the last article professes belief in "the premillennial advent" after "a fearful apostasy in the professing Christian body." Thus the confession reflects its background in the teachings of Darby and anticipates twentieth-century fundamentalism.

NICEA, COUNCIL OF (325). This was called by Emperor Constantine* to deal with Arianism,* which was threatening the unity of the Christian Church. The bishops assembled at Nicea (modern Isnik, in Turkey), a city of Bithynia close to Constantine's capital. According to tradition, the emperor formally opened the proceedings on 20 May. The council was hardly representative of the Western Church. Of some 300 bishops present, almost all were from the Eastern half of the empire. The Latin West seems to have been represented by four or five bishops, and two priests delegated by the bishop of Rome. One of the Western bishops, Hosius* of Cordova, presided over the council, probably because he was a confidant and respected friend of the emperor.

After an examination of the charges against Arius, the council sought a formula to express orthodoxy. A submission by Eusebius of Nicomedia* was rejected because of its blatant Arian teaching. Then Eusebius of Caesarea,* a moderate churchman, produced the baptismal creed of his church. This creed may have become the basis of the Nicene Creed,* but it is more likely that the creed of the council was a conflation from many sources, especially the baptismal creeds of the churches of Antioch and Jerusalem.

The main emphases of the Nicene Creed are: (1) the "sonship" of Christ is preferred to the Logos* concept; (2) the phrase is inserted that Christ is of the being (ousia) of the Father; (3) to the phrase "begotten" is added "not made," to deny the Arian contention that the Logos was "made"; (4) the Son is "one substance" (homoousios) with the Father—a momentous anti-Arian phrase; (5) to the words "became flesh" was added "and was made man"; (6) anti-Arian anathemas were appended to the creed.

The Nicene faith was received and signed by the majority of the bishops although not a few signed with hesitations. Arius and his friends were then anathematized along with two bishops who refused to accept the creed. Then, with a dangerous precedent, Constantine banished those anathematized to Illyricum.

Other matters dealt with by the council included the Melitian Schism* and the date of Easter.* The canons of the council are concerned with the problems of clerical discipline, heresy, and schism.

NICEA, SECOND COUNCIL OF (787). This seventh ecumenical* council was convoked to deal with the question of iconoclasm. In 730 Emperor Leo III* issued a decree forbidding the veneration of images or pictorial representations of Christ and the saints. Despite Jewish and early Christian beliefs, the practice of veneration of images had grown up gradually in both East and West, and by the eighth century it was well established throughout the empire; therefore Leo's decree met with fierce opposition. Both the patriarch of Constantinople and Pope Gregory III opposed the emperor, and Gregory held a synod in Rome in 731, where he excommunicated all who destroyed images. Leo's successor, Constantine V, nevertheless continued the iconoclastic policies and instituted a violent persecution of those who venerated images (see ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY). Only when Constantine's widow Irene became regent for her minor son was there a change in imperial policy. In 786 she convoked a council in Constantinople to deal with the question, but it was broken up by iconoclastic soldiers. In the following year she reconvened the council at Nicea.

The council met in eight sessions over a month and was attended by over 300 prelates, mostly from the West, and included two legates sent by the pope. The position of the iconoclasts was condemned, and a statement was produced which declared that pictorial representations were lawful. They might receive "veneration" which honored the persons represented by the image, but not "adoration" which was due to God alone. In addition the council promulgated twenty-two disciplinary decrees. The decrees of the council on images were, however, not quickly accepted. Charlemagne rejected them at the Synod of Frankfurt (794), and in the West the council was not officially acknowledged as an ecumenical council until the late ninth century. In the East a number of emperors continued the iconoclastic policies until 843, when a local synod finally confirmed the decrees at Nicea.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

NICENE CREED. The Nicene Creed (N) was promulgated in 325 by the Council of Nicea* to defend the orthodox faith against the Arian heresy and to assert the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father. This relatively short creed was probably based upon creed(s) of Syro-Palestinian origin into which the Nicene emphases were interpolated.

But the term Nicene Creed is also used ambiguously of the creed used in the eucharistic worship of the church which is not only longer but different in many respects from N. The former is known as the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (C). The hybrid title reflects the popular, although mistaken, view that at the second ecumenical council at Constantinople* (381) another creed was put forward which enlarged the Nicene formulary. A number of considerations, however, shed considerable doubt about the identity of C and its relationship to N: (1) no mention of a creed is made in the four canons of the Council of Constantinople or in the official letter to Theodosius.* The first appearance of C is, in fact, at the Council of Chalcedon* (451) where "the faith of the 150 fathers" was read out. There is, then, an absolute silence regarding a Constantinopolitan creed from 381 to 451; (2) a comparison of C with N shows that key formulae of the Nicene faith, such as the Son's participation in the "substance of the Father," are missing. Such omissions make it difficult to accept that it is a modified version of N; (3) the Creed of Jerusalem which Epiphanius incorporates in his tract Ancoratus (c.374) is practically identical to C.

Among the many suggestions for the solution of this mystery are: that C was used at the baptism and episcopal consecration of Nectarius*; that Cyril of Jerusalem presented the revised creed of Jerusalem at the Council as testimony to his orthodoxy; that the second ecumenical council reaffirmed N; and C, a creed of Syro-Palestinian origin, was embodied as an illustrative formula in its tomos.

The famous and divisive Filioque clause was added to C at the Third Council of Toledo in Spain in 589, but the Church of Rome continued to use the creed in its original form until the start of the eleventh century.

NICEPHORUS (c.758-829). Patriarch of Constantinople. Like his father, he was an imperial secretary and strong defender of icons, a cause bringing the older man torture and banishment. In his secretarial post Nicephorus was commissioned to the Second Council of Nicea* (787), signing its promulgation sustaining the veneration of images. Shortly thereafter he withdrew to a monastery which he had founded on the Propontis, but without taking orders. Having returned to Constantinople as director of a home for the indigent, he was appointed by Emperor Nicephorus to succeed Tarasius as patriarch. His lay background, and his exoneration of a priest earlier deposed for countenancing the adulterous marriage of Emperor Constantine VI, evoked stiff opposition to him from the strong, renascent Studite Order.

With the revival of iconoclasm under Emperor Leo V, however; Nicephorus and Theodore the Studite joined forces against their mutual enemy. A majority of the clergy endorsed the policy of the emperor, who in 815 deposed and exiled Nicephorus to his monastery. Here he continued his polemic against the iconoclasts. Apologeticus minor (perhaps predating his exile), Apologeticus major, three Antirhetikoi, and several unedited writings constitute an apologetic corpus for icon veneration which is dogmatically definitive, apologetically thorough, and rich in its interpretation of patristic sources and preservation of imperial statements. His history of Byzantium from 602 to 769, Historia syntomos, acclaimed for objectivity and rhetorical style, wrestles with a theological explanation for the scourge of Islam. Chronographia is his chronology from Adam until 829.

JAMES DE JONG

NICEPHORUS GREGORAS (1295-c.1359). Byzantine historian. At the age of twenty he went to Constantinople where he studied under Patriarch Glykys and the Grand Logothete Theodore Metochites. He soon gained a reputation for his ability and intelligence. He was a prolific writer, and his works treat a variety of subjects such as theology, astronomy, hagiography, philosophy, grammar, and history. In addition, his large correspondence has also been edited and preserved. He is best known for his Roman History, a history of the period from 1204 to 1359 in thirty-seven books, which includes not only factual material but interesting insights on the political and cultural developments of this period. During the Hesychasm* controversy, surrounding the extreme mystical claims by Eastern monks at being able to arrive at a vision of the Uncreated Light of the Godhead, a claim which Gregoras opposed, he was confined to the monastery near Chora. Released in 1355, he died about four years later.

DONALD M. LAKE

NICETA (c. 335-414). He became bishop of Remesiana in the Balkans c. 370, but little is known about his life and work. Information about his work is gleaned from the writings of his contemporary and friend, Paulinus of Nola,* particularly in his poem commemorating Niceta's pilgrimage to Nola to visit the grave of St. Felix, in which is described Niceta's missionary success among the Goths, Scythians, and Dacians. Jerome also writes of the apostolic labors of Niceta, while Gennadius of Marseilles mentions that Niceta wrote at least six books, including instructions for baptismal candidates. There was also an important exposition on the Apostles' Creed, and a short work on the value of Psalm singing in which he makes some interesting remarks about people's attitude when singing in church: "Sing wisely, that is, understandingly, thinking of what you are singing . . . not savouring of the theatre. . . . do not show off. . . . our worship must be done as in God's sight, not to please men." Paulinus of Nola praises his ability as a hymnwriter, and some scholars attribute the *Te Deum to Niceta and not to Ambrose. GORDON A. CATHERALL

NICETAS ACOMINATOS (d. after 1210). Byzantine historian and theologian. Born at Colossae into a rich family and educated at Constantinople, he eventually became governor of Philippopolis. When the members of the Third Crusade (1189) passed through his region, he became friendly with the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and this connection allowed him to rise to prominence in the Eastern court of Constantinople. He remained here until its fall in 1204. Then he fled to Nicea. His two most famous writings are Thēsauros Orthodoxias (A Treasury of Orthodoxy) and Chronikē Diēgēsis (a history of Constantinople 1180-1206). The former is a valuable source of information for the decisions and councils of the Eastern Church from 1156 to 1166, while the latter has a valuable account of the taking of Constantinople by the Latins. PETER TOON

NICHOLAS I (the Great) (d.867). Pope from 858. He owed his election to Louis II. The Roman clergy wanted Anastasius, son of the bishop of Orte, whom Nicholas named as his secretary of state—an important choice in the subsequent schism with Photius* and the struggle with Hincmar of Reims.* During his pontificate the question of universal primacy of jurisdiction over the church was reopened. The diocese of LeMans about 850 forged a whole body of law by assigning to each decree a papal or conciliar decision as far back as the second century. These False Decretals* brought new detail to the defense of papal primacy as LeMans invoked the historical prestige of Rome. In two synods at Aix (860) and Aachen (860-62), Lothair II had his wife Theutberga repudiated. A synod at Metz (863) authorized his marriage to Waldrada. Hincmar supported Theutberga. Nicholas convened a synod at the Lateran which quashed the Metz decree and Aachen divorce. When in 862 Hincmar deposed Rothad II, bishop of Soissons, the pope ordered an examination which restored Rothad in 865. Nicholas now used the False Decretals. Together with his deposition of John, bishop of Ravenna, these events explain the papal claims to authority over Western sees.

Nicholas invited the Moravian Byzantine missionaries Cyril and Methodius* to come to Rome after 863. In March 862 Nicholas had ordered a trial of Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. This so infuriated the latter that he deposed the pope in 867. Nicholas died before learning of this action or the subsequent Photian schism which his own actions had precipitated. Rome's authority over the West increased, and so did its imperious attitude toward the brilliant Christian civilization at Constantinople. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

NICHOLAS V (1397-1455). Pope from 1447. Born Tommaso Parentucelli, son of a physician, he studied at Bologna and Florence. He became bishop of Bologna and negotiator to the Holy Roman Empire to secure the enforcement of the reforming decrees of the Council of Basle.* In 1447, on the death of Eugenius IV, he was elected pope. Nicholas then proceeded to secure the dissolution of the Council of Basle and the abdication of the antipope, Felix V (1449). In 1450 he proclaimed a Jubilee which attracted many pilgrims to Rome, thus strengthening papal prestige and finances. The pope's chief claim to fame is the encouragement he gave to the Renaissance in Rome. The city which had been neglected for over a century during the period of the Avignon* papacy and the Great Schism* was now made the center of a magnificent building program. Bridges, roads, palaces, churches, and fortresses were built. To decorate the buildings artists were brought in, including Fra Angelico.*

Nicholas's principal interest, however, was in books. Papal agents searched for rare manuscripts throughout Europe, copyists were employed to reproduce these finds, and many outstanding humanists were employed to translate them. Many of the ancient Greek authors—such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Homer, Polybius, and Strabo—and several of the Greek Fathers were translated into Latin in this effort. The pope left a large collection of manuscripts to be the foundation of the Vatican Library. The year 1453 which featured the twin blows of a plot on the pontiff's life and the fall of Constantinople led to his death. He claimed on his deathbed that the papal patronage of the Renaissance was necessary to increase Rome's reputation and thus insure its religious leadership. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

NICHOLAS, HENRY (c.1502-c.1580). Also Heinrich or Hendrik Niclaes, founder of the Family of Love or Familist* sect. Born at Münster, he was reared in a devout Christian home and as a boy demonstrated theological precocity and claimed to receive visions from God. The son of a merchant, he too became a businessman. Around 1540 he founded a religious movement which emphasized communality, mystical enlightenment, experiential holiness, the possibility of immanent union with God, the second coming of Christ, and a church comprising believers only. This last belief often led to Familists being misidentified as Anabaptists.* Nicholas spent much of his adult life in Amsterdam and Emden where he was constantly in trouble because of his aberrant religious views. However, his clandestine movement grew to substantial numbers in Germany, the Netherlands, and England. Nicholas nurtured the Familists with his many books and his pastoral travels, which probably included a trip to England in 1552-53. Having experienced consistent persecution, he died in Cologne around 1580.

ROBERT D. LINDER

NICHOLAS OF BASLE (fourteenth century). Proponent of the Free Spirit Movement. Nicholas won followers for the movement along the Rhine River from Constance to Cologne. Some of his adherents were burnt in Heidelberg and Cologne; among those executed was Martin of Mainz, a renegade monk. Nicholas claimed to be a new Christ and viewed himself as the sole source of authority and ordination; he could interpret the gospels better than the apostles; lacking his sanction, the church's hierarchy could perform no valid act. He called that person sinless who executed any one of his commands, including an order to murder or fornicate. Full submission to him would give a man his primal innocence. For his views Nicholas was apprehended and burnt in Vienna about 1395. JOHN GROH

NICHOLAS OF CUSA (1401-1464). German philosopher and cardinal. A native of Kues, he studied at Heidelberg and Padua, and became a doctor of canon law of Cologne in 1423. After lecturing at Cologne he became dean of St. Florin's, Coblenz (1431). At the Council of Basle* he wrote De concordantia catholica, which supported the superiority of the council over the pope. Annoyed with the proceedings of the council and its unconcern for Greek union, he supported Eugenius IV's move to Ferrara. In 1437-38 he was sent to Constantinople in the interests of reunion, and later served the papal cause in Germany (diets of Mainz, 1441; Frankfurt, 1442; Nuremberg, 1444) until settlement between pope and emperor came in the Concordat of Vienna (1448), by which time Nicholas V had made him cardinal.

Created bishop of Brixen (1450), he was appointed papal legate to Germany to preach the Jubilee indulgence, reform religious and diocesan clergy, and hold synods. He visited Vienna, Magdeburg, Haarlem, and Trier. Taking up his post in 1452, he worked hard at preaching, synods, and visitations until opposition from Duke Sigmund of Austria forced him to flee in 1457. He took refuge at Buchenstein in the Dolomites, where he wrote De beryllo, an essay on human knowledge; he resigned in 1458. Pius II appointed him vicar-general in 1459. With his father and sister he built a hospital in Kues which still exists and contains his library. He spent his final years as camerarius of the Sacred College in Rome. Having read the Fathers and contemplated mathematical, philosophical, and theological matters, he wrote De docta ignorantia (1440); De Coniecturis (1442); and four dialogues, Idiota (1450). The fall of Constantinople inspired his De pace fidei. More than 300 sermons and other writings remain. His non-Scholastic work was inspired by Augustine, Dionysius the Areopagite, Bonaventure, and Eckhart. Contributing to mathematics and astronomy, and responsible for the first geographical map of central Europe, he was also a legal historian, questioning the Donation of Constantine* and the Pseudo-Isidorian decrees.

NICHOLAS OF FLÜE (Bruder Klaus) (1417-1487). Hermit. Born near Sachseln, Switzerland, he pursued a military career in early life and worked as a deputy and judge. Influenced by the Friends of God,* he decided in 1467 to leave his wife and ten children and live a hermit's life. Visionary experiences influenced him to locate in Ranft near his birthplace. He prayed twelve hours daily and gave advice to his many visitors. Governmental officials also sought his counsel. He urged them to admit Fribourg and Soleure to the newly independent Swiss Confederation. He was canonized in 1947.

NICHOLAS OF HEREFORD (d. c.1420). Lollard writer. While a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and engaged in translating the Latin Bible into English, he became an ardent supporter of Wycliffe* and in 1382 began to preach Lollard doctrines. Condemned and excommunicated by the archbishop of Canterbury, he journeyed to Rome to petition against the sentence, but was imprisoned by the pope. Having escaped during a popular uprising in 1385, he returned to England and soon became the leader of the Lollard party in the west country, appealing especially to the common people by addresses and handbills. He was captured in 1391, was imprisoned at Nottingham, was tortured, then suddenly recanted, leaving his followers depressed and bewildered. Royal and episcopal favors were now heaped upon him. He was made chancellor and treasurer of Hereford Cathedral, but ended his life as a Carthusian monk at Coventry. He probably played an important part with John Purvey* in a revision of Wycliffe's English Bible.

NICHOLAS OF LYRA (c.1265-1349). Franciscan scholar. Born in Lire (now Vieille-Lyre, Eure), he entered the Franciscan Order at Verneuil (c.1300). He studied theology at Paris, becoming a doctor (c.1308) and a regent master at the university. From 1319 he was provincial of his order in France, being present in that capacity at the general chapter of Pérouse (1321). In 1325 he was provincial of Burgundy. As executor of the estate of Jeanne of Burgundy, widow of Philip VI, he founded the college of Burgundy at Paris, where he died. The best-equipped biblical scholar of the Middle Ages, knowing Hebrew and acquainted with Jewish commentaries, notably Rashi, he was especially concerned to expound the literal sense of Scripture as against the current allegorical interpretation. He wrote two commentaries on the whole Bible, one being the first biblical commentary printed. He wrote a treatise on the Beatific

Vision, directed against Pope John XXII, and other works. J.G.G. NORMAN

NICHOLAS OF MYRA. Very little is known about Nicholas, from whom Santa Claus is derived, and of one of the most popular of all the saints in Christendom the prototype. He is reputed to have suffered imprisonment under the Roman emperor Diocletian,* only to be released to serve as one of the bishops at the Council of Nicea* (325), a supposition which is not supported by any of the records of Nicea. The patron saint of Russia as well as of sailors and children, he was believed to bring gifts to children on his feast day, 6 December. The first clear evidence of Nicholas is in the Church of St. Priscus and St. Nicholas built by Emperor Justinian at Constantinople. Veneration for this saint spread to the West after 1087, when his remains were claimed to have come into the possession of the people of Bari. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

NICHOLSON, WILLIAM PATTESON (1876-1959). Irish evangelist. After a wild youth spent at sea, he was converted in 1898, trained at the Bible Training Institute, Glasgow, and served as an evangelist with the Lanarkshire Christian Union. In 1914 he was ordained as an evangelist in the Presbyterian Church in the USA, and subsequently joined the staff of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles. His greatest work, however, was done in Ulster, where his preaching—vivid, uncompromising, and unconventional—brought about a significant spiritual awakening in the 1920s. Thousands were converted, and the moral tone of Belfast's dockland was raised. In 1926 he deputized for J. Stuart Holden as CICCU missioner in a united mission to Cambridge University (another missioner was William Temple). Nicholson's preaching created a sensation and led to numerous conversions. He campaigned also in Australasia and South Africa.

NICOLAI (Ivan Kasatkin) (c.1835-1912). Russian Orthodox missionary bishop to Japan. He offered as chaplain to the Russian Consulate at Hakodate, Hokkaido, became a monk, and took the name Nicolai. Arriving in Japan in 1861, he acquired a deep knowledge of the Chinese and Japanese languages. Christianity being a prohibited religion, he proceeded cautiously. Not until 1868 did he baptize his first three converts—a Samurai named Sawabe, a physician Sakai, and one Urano. Returning to Russia in 1869, he was responsible for the constitution of the Orthodox Mission. The penal laws against Christianity were abrogated (1873), so he moved to Tokyo where he built a cathedral. He was consecrated bishop (1880) and archbishop (1906). He encouraged the indigenous aspect of the church, selecting promising young men as catechists to evangelize their own people. The Russo-Japanese War (1904-5) severely tried the work, but at his death there were over 30,000 converts. J.G.G. NORMAN

NICOLAI, PHILIPP (1556-1608). Pastor and hymnwriter. Son of a Lutheran pastor, he was born at Mengeringhausen, Waldeck, studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg, and was appointed Lutheran preacher at Herdecke (1583). When Spanish troops invaded in 1586, the Mass was reintroduced and he resigned. After a pastorate at Niederwildungen, he became chief pastor at Altwildungen, then court preacher to Countess Margaretha of Waldeck (1588). He took part in the Sacramentarian Controversy and was forbidden to preach for a time (1592-93). In 1596 he became pastor at Unna, where he wrote his celebrated "Watchet auf, ruft uns die Stimme" ("Sleepers wake"), based on Matthew 25:1-13, during a terrible pestilence. In 1599 he wrote "Wie schön leuchet de Morgenstern," marking the transition in German hymnody from the objective churchly period to the subjective experimental period. His last pastorate was St. Katherine's Church, Hamburg (1601-8). J.G.G. NORMAN

NICOLAITANS. Followers of one Nicolaus, they formed a sect in the early church at Ephesus and Pergamum and were condemned by John in Revelation 2:6, 15. They appear to have been a heretical group who retained the pagan practices of idolatry and immorality, which were contrary to Christian thought and conduct. Virtually nothing is known about these sectaries beyond John's references to them. Their works are hated and rejected, but not described, in the letter to Ephesus, while in Pergamum their teachings are held in like manner to those of Balaam (Num. 24:1-25; 31:16). Irenaeus asserts that this sect was founded by that Nicolaus who was the proselyte from Antioch, one of the seven appointed by the apostles in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5); but the weight of recent scholarship seems to be against this view. The sect disappeared after the second century, although in the Middle Ages the term was sometimes applied to married priests by those who were staunch supporters of clerical celibacy.

NICOLE, PIERRE (1625-1695). French theologian. Native of Chartres, he took degrees in philosophy and theology at Paris, and taught at Port-Royal where began the close association with Antoine Arnauld.* Sometimes using a pseudonym, as with his Latin version of Pascal's Lettres provinciales (1658) signed "William Wendrock," he was a moderate Jansenist despite his extreme rejection of mysticism. He wrote also Traité de l'oraison (1679) and (his last work) Réfutation des principales erreurs des quiétistes (1695), prompted by Bossuet. Nevertheless he was keen to defend Jansenism,* opposing the Jesuits. Other volumes include a defense of transubstantiation which attacks the Calvinist as well as the general Protestant position, and his posthumous publication Traité de la grâce générale (2 vols., 1715) which revealed his absolute abandonment of Jansenism. C.G. THORNE, JR.

NICOLL, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1851-1923). Religious journalist. Son of a Free Church of Scotland minister, he was educated at Aberdeen and subsequently entered the ministry, serving charges at Dufftown (1874-77) and Kelso (1877-85). Ill-health caused his demission. Moving to London, he edited The Expositor (1885-1923) and The British Weekly (1886-1923). He wrote also for the secular press and published many books—scholarly, expository, devotional, and literary. A friend of Lloyd George, he supported World War I, doing much to overcome Nonconformist pacifist inclinations. He was a formidable opponent of Erastianism and the Roman Catholic theory of "tactical succession" of bishops. He was knighted by Edward VII in 1909.

R.E.D. CLARK

NICOMEDES. Early Christian martyr. The date and circumstances of his death are unknown. He is mentioned in the Roman Martyrology (the official record of the Roman Catholic Church) issued in 1584, but omitted from the Hieronymian Martyrology (compiled in the fifth century). Moreover, there is mention in the fifth century of a titular church at Rome dedicated to him. The Book of Common Prayer, listing his feast day as 1 June, spells his name "Nicomede."

NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD (1894-1962). Neoorthodox theologian. Missouri-born Niebuhr, professor of Christian ethics at Yale University from 1931 to 1962, personified American Neoorthodoxy,* the product of social and intellectual travail between the two world wars. An Evangelical minister, he brought to Yale much experience as seminary professor, college president, pastor, and author, and continued there to struggle with historicism, a task reflected in his doctoral dissertation at Yale, "The Religious Philosophy of Ernst Troeltsch" (1924). His Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929) attacked the church's gullible acceptance of middle-class values and described the socioeconomic origins of sect, denomination, and church. Various factors led him away from his early liberalism, however, and in The Kingdom of God in America (1937) he hoped for the restoration of Reformation roots in American Christianity. The Meaning of Revelation (1941) and Radical Monotheism and Western Culture (1961) grappled with the nature of religious experience, and Christ and Culture (1951) further explored the nature of Christian association with the world. More scholarly than his elder brother Reinhold,* he attempted to explore the relationship of faith and civilization by combining belief in God's sovereignty with modern scholarship, in order to effect a creative tension between the church and society.

DARREL BIGHAM

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD (1893-1971). Neoorthodox theologian. An Evangelical (now United Church of Christ) pastor who left a Detroit industrial parish in 1928 to begin thirty-two years on the faculty of Union Theological Seminary, New York, he struggled throughout his life with the question he raised in lectures at Edinburgh in 1939: "Man has always been his most vexing problem. How shall he think of himself?" Niebuhr thought of man as both nature and spirit, neither damned nor perfectible, but capable of transcending himself. A polemicist as well as a scholar, he contributed hundreds of articles to magazines and journals, was active in the creation of the National Council of Churches, New York's Liberal Party, and Americans for Democratic Action, and wrote seventeen major books, including Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932), The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941 and 1943), Faith and History (1949), and Christian Realism and Social Problems (1953). Thoroughly American, he was as critical of Karl Barth's* bibliolatry and aloofness from society as he was of doctrinaire reformers, although he believed that God and man were radically separate and that society needed fundamental changes.

Always sensitive to problems of church and nation, he chose the ministry in 1915 after theological studies at Eden Theological Seminary and Yale Divinity School because he wanted to work in society rather than toward an advanced theological degree. His pastorate taught him the meaning of modern technocracy, and for a time he was a member of the Socialist Party. He ran for Congress as a Socialist in 1930. The New Deal and imminent world war, however, cured him of socialism and pacifism, and in 1941 he founded Christianity and Crisis to bring realism into American Christianity's view of world ills. After the war he helped to create Americans for Democratic Action to keep Communists out of liberal Democratic affairs. A dynamo who slowed slightly after a 1952 heart attack, he opposed those who deluded the American people. Critical of reformers who ignored human self-glorification, and impatient with theologians who were pessimistic about man's chances of self-improvement, he united pragmatism and Christian orthodoxy to effect a theology that accepted God's sovereignty and encouraged men to reform institutions. A major figure in recent American Protestantism, he brought a needed sense of tragedy into American progress and influenced many secular thinkers.

NIELSEN, FREDRIK KRISTIAN (1846-1907). Danish bishop and theologian. In his youth he was for some time affected by neo-rationalism, but later he found his permanent position in the conservative and ecumenically minded tradition of N.F.S. Grundtvig.* In his views of church order and in his practical ecclesiastical work and policy, he was strongly influenced by the Anglican Church. In 1877 he became professor of church history at Copenhagen University and there was characterized more by a staggering amount of knowledge and great narrative skill than by a sense of historical and doctrinal coherence and development. He became bishop of Aalborg in 1900 and was transferred to the see of Aarhus in 1905. His writings include a history of the Roman Church in the nineteenth century (ET 1906), and he edited a Scandinavian dictionary of the church. N.O. RASMUSSEN

NIEMÖLLER, MARTIN (1892- ). German theologian. Born in Lipstadt, Westphalia, son of a pastor, he received his education at Elberfeld Gymnasium and the University of Münster. During World War I he served as a submarine commander in the German Navy. He was ordained to the ministry in 1924.

In 1931 Niemöller became pastor of the fashionable church in Berlin-Dahlem. He soon joined with others such as Bonhoeffer* and Hildebrandt to oppose Hitler's Nazi rule and use of the Evangelical Church. This led him to help form and become the president of the Pfarrer-Notbund (Pastor's Emergency League) in 1933 which voiced its opposition to the Nazi anti-Jewish laws. He made a brave protest to Hitler in person, but was unsuccessful. As a further move of protest he became active in Die Bekennende Kirche (Confessing Church*). After several years of increasing restrictions and difficulties, he was arrested and imprisoned first at Sachsenhausen and then at Dachau concentration camps (1937-45).

After the war he served as president of the Kirchliches Aussenamt (Office for External Relations of the Evangelical Church in Germany) from 1945 to 1956, and president of the Evangelical Church in Hesse and Nassau from 1947 to 1964. In 1961 he was elected one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches, and served until 1968. JOHN P. DEVER

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH (1844-1900). Philosopher and philologist. Born in Röcher, Prussia, son of a Lutheran minister, he showed early brilliance. Before passing his final examination he was appointed an associate professor of classical philology at the University of Basle on the recommendation of F.W. Ritschl. He resigned from this post in 1870, volunteering as a medical orderly in the Franco-Prussian war. Due to ill-health, he returned to the university the same year, finally retiring on a small pension in 1879. He went insane in January 1889. He had been "awakened" by the work of Charles Darwin* and what he took to be the nihilistic implications of evolutionary theory. Nietzsche attacked Christian dogma (e.g., in The Antichrist, 1895), but more especially he attacked the prevalent idea that Christian ethics could survive the overthrow of the Christian view of man which he believed the work of Darwin had brought about. "Supernature" is not something that men have in virtue of their creation in the divine image, it is a goal for the future. The "superman," capable of self-mastery, must go "beyond good and evil," beyond the values of a defunct Christianity. Several factors make Nietzsche's thought hard to grasp: his aphoristic, wide-ranging, immensely fertile work; misrepresentations of (for example) the superman idea, by fascists; and difficulties over the authenticity of several of his writings. NIKON (1605-1681). Patriarch of Moscow. He had a monastic education and became a monk after the early deaths of his three children, separating from his wife, who became a nun. On a visit to Moscow in 1643 he became friendly with Czar Alexis, who subsequently promoted him to the patriarchate (1652-60) and allowed him to exercise considerable power: he acted as regent in the czar's frequent absences from Moscow. Nikon quickly reformed the Russian liturgy, bringing it into conformity with Greek and Ukrainian practice, thus aiding the czar politically in the absorption of the Ukraine (1654-67). Nikon's reforms were made permanent, but much opposition was aroused, the Old Believers* continuing to observe the traditional forms of worship. Feelings were so strong that both Nikon and the czar were variously identified with Antichrist, and bloodshed more than once ensued. Nikon was deposed in 1660 and exiled to a remote monastery. He was pardoned shortly before his death by the next czar, Fedor III. A man of immense energy and influence, though lacking in tact, Nikon is reckoned the greatest of the Russian patriarchs.

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT (1920). This Constitutional Amendment instituted nationwide woman suffrage, prohibiting the United States or state governments from denying or abridging citizens' right to vote "on account of sex." It culminated the national suffragist movement begun in 1848 by the Women's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, New York. Supported by organized labor and prohibitionists, the National Association for Woman Suffrage of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony and the American Woman Suffrage Association of Henry Ward Beecher,* Lucy Stone, and Julia Ward Howe* crusaded after 1869, merging in 1890 as the National American Woman Suffrage Association. Carrie C. Catt, Anna H. Shaw, and Alice Paul pressed the Amendment through Congress (1919) exactly as written by Susan Anthony when first submitted in 1878. Voting patterns remained substantially unchanged after passage.

NINETY-FIVE THESES, THE (1517). The generally accepted view that this episode marks the first public declaration of Reformation principles requires some modification. On 31 October (or 1 November) 1517, Martin Luther, angered at deceptions practiced on the common people by Tetzel's* sale of indulgences* at Jüterborg and Zerbst near Wittenberg, and agitated by the spiritual crisis through which he was then passing, nailed Ninety-Five Theses upon Indulgences to the door of the castle church, as a preliminary to a disputation which was never in fact held. The theses, which are heavily theological though shot through with outbursts of outrage and anguish, are really quite conservative in character. Justification by faith is not mentioned therein, nor were they intended to force a breach with the papacy, but merely to direct the pope's attention to a particular scandal in the confident expectation that it would be suppressed.

Briefly, the theses affirm that penance implies repentance, not priestly confession; mortification of the flesh is a useless exercise unless accompanied by inward repentance; the merits of Christ alone avail for the forgiveness of sins, penances and works prescribed by the Church having validity only insofar as they proclaim and confirm this divine pardon; the real "treasure of the Church" is the gospel of the grace of God in Jesus Christ. Though Luther would thus have strengthened the authority of the church by placing it upon a proper basis, the papal authorities were in no mood to distinguish attacks on ecclesiastical abuses from attacks on the church itself, and Luther's action led directly to the Curia's proceeding against him on the grounds of suspected heresy in June 1518. NINIAN (c.400). British saint. According to Bede he was the son of a British chieftain, trained for the church in Rome. He settled in SW Scotland at Whithorn where he built a white church, Candida Casa, named in honor of Martin of Tours.* There has been considerable controversy over Ninian's work recently, as some Scottish historians have maintained that the Picts of Scotland were Christianized by Columba (521-97) while others, using the evidence of place-names and similar materials, believe that Ninian was largely responsible for the conversion of the Picts of E Scotland.

NITRIAN DESERT. Site of fourth-century Christian monasticism, known also as Nitrian Valley and Desert of Scete. A shallow desert valley about 50 miles south of Alexandria, it extends diagonally across the NE tip of the Libyan desert for some thirty miles. The name derives from "natron," the sodium carbonate found in its numerous lakes. The founder of its monastic settlements was reputed to be Amun (c.320), one of the Tall Brothers. The colony of hermits, living in lauras (i.e., clusters of windowless cells), numbered about 5,000 in the time of Macarius the Egyptian. According to Cassian, there were four churches, each with a presbyter. The colony became a center of learning; there Origenism* flourished, the Apothegmata Patrum began to be recorded, and Evagrius Ponticus wrote. Barbarian attacks in the fifth century brought it low, but four ninth-century Coptic monasteries remain.

NITSCHMANN, DAVID (1696-1772). Moravian missionary and bishop. Born in Moravia and a carpenter by trade, he joined the Herrnhut* community as an evangelist. In 1732 he accompanied J.L. Dober* on the first Moravian Brethren* mission to the Negro slaves on St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, but returned to Germany after a few months. In 1735 he was the first Moravian to be consecrated bishop, thus establishing the principle of historical succession among the Brethren. Immediately after this he led a group of sixteen missionaries to Georgia and made a deep impression on John Wesley,* who was on the same ship. Constantly active as a bishop, he made at least fifty sea voyages before his death in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, a settlement he had founded.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

NITZSCH, KARL IMMANUEL (1787-1868). German Lutheran theologian. Son of a general superintendent of the Lutheran Church and professor at Wittenberg, he was educated at Schulpforta and Wittenberg. He became a privatdozent in Wittenberg in 1810 and assistant preacher at the Castle Church in 1811. In 1822 he was called to a chair in theology at the University of Bonn and in 1847 succeeded P.K. Marheineke as professor of theology at the University of Berlin. As provost of the Nicolaikirche (1854) and a member of the supreme church council of the Prussian Evangelical Church, Nitzsch was a vigorous and articulate supporter of the Evangelical Union. As a theologian he represented the ecclesiastical-pietistic wing of the Vermittlungstheologie, a movement which sought to mediate between the culture of the early nineteenth century and the tradition of historical Christianity. He stressed the immediacy of religious feeling as the basis of religious knowledge, uniting elements of Schleiermacher's* theology with classical Protestant dogmatics. His chief works include the System der christlichen Lehre (1829) and his System der praktischen Theologie (1847-67). He was a co-founder of three theological journals: Theologische Studien and Kritiken (1828), the Bonner Monatschrift, and the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft und christliches Leben (1850). NOETUS. He died about the end of the second century, and was considered heresiarch by the early patristic writers, but no direct evidence of his thought has survived. Even the polemic which recalls him is minimal, restricted to the cataloging of heresies which can be reconstructed for Hippolytus,* and to the few fragments of the latter's detailed refutation which survive. Noetus is identified with the position that so related the Father with the Son that the Father was considered to have suffered in the crucifixion. Sometimes called Patripassian Monarchianism this view Noetus held in common with Praxeas,* Victor I,* and Sabellius (see SABELLIANISM). Noetus, whose date must precede the work of Hippolytus, was thought to have come to Rome from Smyrna.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

NOMINALISM (Lat. nominalis, "belonging to a name"). The theory of knowledge which insists that universals are created by reason. Essences have no independent reality of their own, but are only names or mere vocal utterances. Reality attributed only to particulars or individual things. This epistemological position is in opposition to Platonic realism, which insisted that universal essences existed. The nominalistic pattern of thought was first introduced by Porphyry* (233-304) who attributed it to Aristotle.

In the Middle Ages, nominalism emerged as a strong reaction to realism and was championed by Roscellinus* of Compiègne (c. 1050-1125). Abelard* gave these early disputes prominence when he tried (somewhat successfully) to find a middle position. His efforts led to a moratorium until William of Ockham* (1280-1349) revived nominalism and established the first frankly nominalistic system (ontological nominalism). He taught that terms are mental realities and are universals only insofar as they can stand for many. The terms themselves are like any reality, singular and unique. This universality is purely functional and does not refer to a common essence possessed by many things outside the mind. Reality was a collection of absolute singulars and, therefore, could not give evidence or provide scientific support for God's existence. This is clearly anti-Thomistic. Faith became the grounds of belief. The Ockhamist School eventually faded away, but nominalistic thought has continued to have its effect on philosophical thought. The teachings of John Locke,* David Hume,* and certain branches of logical positivism incorporate some of the thought of the Ockhamists. JOHN P. DEVER

NOMMENSEN, LUDWIG INGWER (1834-1918). German missionary to Sumatra. Born on Nordstrand and apprenticed to a schoolmaster, he entered the Rhine Mission's school at Barmen in 1857. Four years later he was sent out to the mission's new field of Sumatra and soon proved to be a man of indomitable resolution and faith. His ministry among the Bataks proceeded slowly until a number of chiefs were converted, and then Nommensen was overwhelmed by a great people's movement (103,500 Christians in 1911) and undreamed-of problems of church organization. He decided it should be a Batak, not a Western, church: for example, as much as possible of the traditional culture would be retained; Bataks were to be trained for the ministry; and congregations would establish systems of lay elders. Actually, the church organization was patriarchal, and the missionaries held all the positions of influence and authority until German control ended in 1940. RICHARD V. PIERARD

NONCONFORMITY. A term used generally to describe the position of those who do not conform to the doctrine and practices of an established church. The word "nonconformist" was first used in the penal acts following the Restoration (1660), to describe those who left the Church of England rather than submit to the Act of Uniformity* (1662). The earlier term "Dissenters" was superseded by "Nonconformist," and this to a certain extent by "Free churchmen." In England at present, nonconforming Protestants are composed largely of the Methodists, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, and the Presbyterians, but in Scotland the Church of Scotland is presbyterian, and the Episcopal Church in Scotland is therefore nonconformist. HOWARD SAINSBURY

NONJURORS. A title used to describe those members (usually clergy) of the Church of England and Episcopal Church of Scotland who refused to take the Oath of Allegiance to William and Mary after the Revolution of 1688. Six English bishops (and all the Scottish bishops) together with about 400 English clergy felt bound in 1689 by virtue of their oath to James II* to refuse the oath and were deposed in 1690. They set in motion a kind of High Church, episcopalian nonconformity, separate from the national church but claiming to be the true, historical church of England. The English prelates deprived were Archbishop W. Sancroft* and bishops T. Ken* (Bath and Wells), J. Lake (Chichester), F. Turner (Ely), T. White (Peterborough), and W. Lloyd (Norwich). With the permission of James II, three of these took part in the consecration of two bishops in secret—Thomas Wagstaffe (Ipswich) and George Hickes (Thetford). The latter consecrated three more.

In 1714 the ranks of Nonjurors were enlarged by the accession of those who did not swear allegiance to George I. Though agreeing in their opposition, the Nonjurors were divided among themselves on secondary matters. They disagreed as to the lawfulness of worshiping in parish churches and, after the death of Hickes, on whether or not they should use a new liturgy (based on early Christian liturgies and the 1549 Book of Common Prayer) written by a group of their own men, or continue to use the 1662 BCP. In the latter controversy the participants were called Usagers and Non-Usagers, but their quarrel was settled in 1732 in favor of the use of the new form. The four "usages" were the mixed chalice, the oblatory prayer, the offering of the elements to the Father, and the prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit on the elements.

Apart from their belief in the Divine Rights of Kings* and the doctrine of nonresistance to rightful authority, they held a high doctrine of the historical episcopate and of liturgical worship. They admired the Eastern Orthodox Churches and even made efforts to unite with them. Their movement, however, did not last much more than a century, the last congregation dying out in 1805. Not a few able laymen were attracted to the Nonjurors—e.g., Henry Dodwell, the Camden professor of history at Oxford. Because of their high doctrine of the ministry and emphasis on liturgy, they are usually classed with the seventeenth-century Caroline and the nineteenth-century Tractarian divines.

NORBERT (c.1080-1134). Founder of the Premonstratensians.* He was born of a noble family at Xanten, Germany. After a period as a member of Henry V's imperial court and a canon of Xanten, he renounced this official type of clerical life in 1115. He gave away his goods, received ordination, and went about preaching in poverty. In 1120 Norbert founded a community at Prémontré, which grew into the Premonstratensian Order. He preached in Germany, France, and Belgium, where his fame was responsible for his summons to Antwerp to win back its inhabitants from the heretic Tanchelm in 1124. In 1126, the year

Honorius II confirmed his order, Norbert became archbishop of Magdeburg and won great respect as a clerical reformer. He traveled to Rome with the emperor Lothair in 1132-33 and successfully supported Innocent II against the antipope Anacletus II. In 1133 Lothair made him chancellor of Italy. Norbert died at Magdeburg, and was canonized by Gregory XIII in 1582. PETER TOON

NORIS, HENRI (1631-1704). Roman Catholic scholar and cardinal. Born in Verona, Italy, of English descent, he studied with the Jesuits at Rimini but joined the Augustinian Hermits* there in 1646. Lecturing in theology and ecclesiastical history at Pesaro, Perugia, Florence, Padua, and Pisa (where he held the chair, 1674-92), he was then appointed by Innocent XII as the first custodian of the Vatican Library, consultor to the Holy Office (1694), and cardinal (1695). Historia Pelagiana and Vindiciae Augustinianae (1673) were his chief works, containing his interpretation of Augustine's soteriology and defending his doctrine of grace, which he believed Baianism and Jansenism misunderstood. The Spanish Inquisition later accused him of heresy, but in 1748 Benedict XIV ordered his books to be removed from the Index. C.G. THORNE, JR.

NORTH AFRICA. Unlike Egypt and the Lebanon, North Africa had no remnants of ancient churches to keep alive some semblance of Christian testimony. When Islam swept across the area in the early seventh century, the church of Augustine and many early martyrs (see AFRICA, ROMAN) was swept away and Christianity for centuries was repressed, apart from the Roman Catholic presence in some Moroccan coastal stations and neighboring islands. It was not until the 1860s that Roman Catholic missionaries were concerned with much more than ministering to the European population, and not until 1908 was the mission raised to the status of a vicariate apostolic. Meanwhile, in Algeria and Tunisia during that same century there was extensive immigration from France, Spain, and Italy, and this predominantly Roman Catholic population helped also the work of missions (there had been sporadic work in Algiers and Tunis from the mid-seventeenth century). By 1866 the archbishopric of Algiers claimed to have 187 parishes and 273 secular priests; by 1884 its head was designated archbishop of Carthage and primate of Africa; by 1930 the Roman Catholic population was reported to have been 805,000. Converts among non-Christians were few, and the work was made harder, not only by the hostility of Islam, but by the discouragement of the French civil authorities. J.D. DOUGLAS

Less than a century has passed since Protestant missionaries entered North Africa. An English businessman, Edward Glenny, was the prime mover in the establishment of a mission to the Kabyles. These people, who live in the central mountains of Algeria, were fully Islamized and formed part of the larger group of Berber people who live across North Africa. The stated aim of the mission was to give them the gospel of Jesus Christ. The work eventually spread to Libya, Tunisia, and Morocco, and became known as the North Africa Mission.

Other work followed. Lilias Trotter* was responsible for the formation of the Algiers Mission Band, which made special efforts to reach the oases dwellers of the south. In the same year (1888) John Anderson founded the Southern Morocco Mission, seeking especially to evangelize the Berbers and Arabs of that large area. More recently these three missions have combined to form the North Africa Mission, with an international structure and headquarters in the south of France.

Over the same period the American Methodists, the Emmanuel Mission, Mennonite Mission, Sahara Desert Mission, Southern Baptist Convention, Gospel Missionary Union, Bible Churchman's Missionary Society, and the Christian Brethren have all worked in various parts of North Africa. Most of them, if not all, have suffered setbacks in the past decade, due to an aggressive nationalism which has been strongly Islamic and, generally speaking, unfavorable to the West.

Islam, both socially and religiously, has been fiercely resistant to the Gospel, and from the beginning faithful personal witness and testimony has been the pattern. Classes for all ages gradually became possible; such skills as carpet making, woodwork, pottery, embroidery, and knitting usually formed the popular appeal which enabled the missionaries to make their first friendly contact with the people. Large-scale medical work has never been allowed, but in Morocco and Algeria small but intensely busy clinics have been maintained, with many smaller ones in the interior. Often they have specialized in midwifery. There are two hospitals run by missionaries in the same two countries.

Arabic is the main language of North Africa, and the literary or Van Dyke Bible has been widely distributed. The NT and various portions have been published in the colloquials, and the whole Bible has been published in North African Arabic by the British and Foreign Bible Society, whose agents have long worked in North Africa. Bookshops, as selling bases and centers of testimony, have been established. Sometimes the work has been of a polemical nature, but there has been a more positive outreach to students.

Two world wars saw the emergence of Islamic nationalism and a resentful feeling that Christianity was the religion of the occupying power and that the latter and its religious emissaries should go. There have been no mass expulsions of missionaries, but many individuals and some complete groups have ceased to function. During the period of intense nationalism, the radio and Bible correspondence course ministry of the North Africa Mission based in Marseilles has proved a powerful means of gospel penetration, permitting thousands to study the basic facts of the Gospel and its implications in a way unknown before. The Muslim authorities are well aware of this and lose no opportunity by press and radio of warning the masses against the Christian impact. Earlier there were scattered converts, often without contact with other Christians and rarely able to form worshiping groups. These combined ministries have resulted in the establishment of many small groups, often meeting informally and frequently facing much opposition, all over North Africa.

The criticism has been made that though there were converts here and there over the area, the missionaries of different evangelical societies had rarely been able to bring them together to form witnessing, functioning churches. It should be said, however, that there have been various emphases in the whole approach to the building of the church. The Methodists have been church-conscious from the beginning, and through their hostels and training centers have sought to provide a trained, recognized leadership of national churches. Evangelical missions generally tend nevertheless to be individualistic, with their policies reflecting the patterns of the countries from which the missionaries have come. North Africa presents a background of ideological conflict and spiritual inquiry, and it is against this that the Christian is called to fulfill his mandate to preach the Word of reconcilation, and to plan afresh in strength the true church of Jesus Christ.

NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF. A union of six denominations inaugurated on 29 November 1970 at Nagpur. The six were: Anglicans (the Church of India), with an estimated membership of 280,000; the United Church of Northern India, 230,000; Baptists, 110,000; Methodists of the British and Australian Conferences, 20,000; Church of the Brethren, 18,000; Disciples of Christ, 16,000. These figures were greatly modified by provisional statistics of the CNI, giving total membership as only 569,546, with 230,959 communicants. Initially nineteen dioceses were formed, stretching from Assam in the north to Nandyal in Andhra Pradesh (which is more "South" India than "North"). There were seventeen bishops, eight of them former Anglican bishops, and 917 presbyters. The synod comprised all the bishops plus equal lay and clerical representation from dioceses.

Efforts for union had begun in 1929; one of the bodies, the United Church of Northern India, was itself a union of Presbyterians and Congregationalists in 1924. A late development which greatly altered the complexion of the united church was the decision not to join by the Methodist Church in Southern Asia, numbering about 600,000. Other churches, such as the Lutherans, remained outside the union, and the churches of NE India (where the UCNI had half its membership) were yet to form a separate union. Although limited, the CNI union was nevertheless an important landmark in Indian church history and was generally regarded as a stage to still further union in making an All-India Church. In two respects the CNI union differed from that of the Church of South India* (1947) and had significance for other parts of the world:

(1) The CSI began with a "mixed" ministry, some ministers having been ordained by bishops and some not; and congregations could insist on having only an episcopally ordained minister celebrate Holy Communion. Thirty years were given for this problem to sort itself; all new ordinations were to be by bishops. Meanwhile the CSI had limited recognition by some other churches. The CNI avoided such a "mixed" ministry by a "representative act of unification of the ministry" at the inauguration of the church. Three CNI ministers, one a bishop, had hands laid on them by ten other ministers. The ten were (a) six representatives of the uniting churches, and (b) four ministers from outside the CNI area, including two bishops in the historic episcopate. The ten said, "May (God) continue in you his gifts and, in accordance with his will, may he bestow on you grace, commission and authority for your ministry, whether as a presbyter or as a bishop. . . ." The ten laid hands in silence on the three. After this, the three laid hands in turn on representative ministers of the uniting churches, including the aforementioned six, using the same words. At later services in the dioceses, the remainder of the ministry was "unified." It was a rite which seemed to satisfy all around. An Anglican statement had recognized that "it is on the human level legitimate to place different interpretations upon what God does in the act." And differ they did.

(2) The CNI permitted both infant baptism and believer's baptism (the latter having been practiced by Baptists, Disciples, and Church of the Brethren). Where there was no infant baptism, there was to be a service of infant dedication, and believer's baptism was to be followed by a service admitting to communicant membership, and including laying on of hands, which paralleled the Confirmation service for those baptized as infants. The mode of baptism could be immersion, affusion, or sprinkling.

NORWAY. Norwegians came under Christian influence through the contacts of Vikings with Christian countries and through missionary efforts from Denmark* and England. The first Christian kings (such as Olav*) promoted the Christianization of the country. An archiepiscopal see was established in Trondheim in 1153. The Reformation was introduced in 1537 by command of the king of Denmark and Norway. The seventeenth century was characterized by Lutheran orthodoxy. Pietism* came shortly after 1700 and left a lasting influence upon Norwegian church life. Confirmation was introduced by royal command in 1736, and was made compulsory.

The Pietistic "Explanation" to Luther's shorter catechism written by Erik Pontoppidan in 1737 was used in Norway for more than 150 years.

The era of Enlightenment lasted in Norway from 1750 to 1820. The theology professors of the newly established university of Oslo (1811) and the awakening by H.N. Hauge* heralded a period of richer spiritual life. In 1842 lay preaching became lawful, and in 1845 a "Dissenters' Law" for the first time gave citizens opportunity to cancel membership in the state church and to organize free churches. Free churches, however, never became strong in Norway; Christian believers chose to stay and make their influence felt within the state church. The Norwegian Missionary Society was founded in 1842, later followed by several other organizations for foreign missions. The lay movement initiated by Hauge entered a stage of organization in the second half of the nineteenth century. The Pietistic theology of Professor Gisle Johnson (d.1894), who greatly influenced both clergy and laity, formed the "Luther Foundation" (1868) which in 1891 was reorganized under the name of Norwegian Home Mission Society.

New revival movements toward the end of the nineteenth century led to the foundation of a new type of free organization which took a critical attitude toward the state church, emphasizing their independence in relation to the clergy. The greatest of these new organizations was the Norwegian Lutheran Mission, whose spiritual leader was the lay preacher Ludvig Hope (d.1954). To a great degree church life in Norway is characterized by free organizations for home mission and foreign mission. Christian believers worship in "prayer houses," listening to lay preachers, and some also celebrate the Lord's Supper there. The same believers may or may not go to the parish church to worship there. This lay activity, which runs parallel to the activity of the established church, has been of vital importance for the missionary activity of Norwegians.

In the twentieth century, liberal theology has caused severe struggle, which led to the formation of the conservative Free Faculty of Theology (Menighetsfakultetet) where the majority of the pastors are educated (see HALLESBY). During the years of German occupation the church resisted the attempts to Nazify the schools, etc. (see BERGGRAV). By the middle of the twentieth century the life and thinking of the people were greatly influenced by modern secularism. By 1966 there were 1,078 pastors in the state church and 1,688 lay preachers and staff workers in the free organizations. There are ten dioceses in the country. By 1960 the free churches had a total of 134,551 members. Of the population of Norway (3,867,000 in 1970), some 96 percent belong to the state (national) church.

CARL FR. WISLOFF

NOTKER (c.940-1008). Bishop of Liège. Nephew of Emperor Otto I, Notker was born in Swabia. After entering monastic life at St. Gall in Switzerland he was named imperial chaplain in Italy in 969. Appointed bishop of Liège in Flanders in 972, he was an effective administrator. He played an important role in establishing the famous Liège schools, had a broad influence on monastic reform and educational affairs, and served in governmental posts under Otto III and Henry II.

NOVALIS (1772-1801). Pseudonym of Friedrich Leopold Freiherr von Hardenberg, lyric poet and early German Romantic. Coming from a Pietistic background, he came under the influence of Goethe, Schiller, and Fichte at Jena, and became with Schlegel a spokesman for early German Romanticism. In Die Christenheit oder Europa (1799) he attacked both the Reformation and the Enlightenment, the first because it was responsible for what Novalis regarded as the fragmented character of present culture in comparison to the Middle Ages, the second because of its worship of reason. Novalis's own religion was that of a Romantic mystic with no clear distinction between finite and infinite, nor between immanence and transcendence. In his view poetry is an attempt to display the infinite, the source of the meaning of the universe, which cannot be conceptualized, only hinted at.

PAUL HELM

NOVATIANISM. Novatian of Rome is noteworthy for two reasons. In the first place he was the "antipope" of the "Puritan" party in the church. Secondly, he gave to the Western Church the first full-length treatment of the Trinity. Perhaps disappointed by the elevation of Cornelius* as pope (251), Novatian joined those who demanded that the Christians who had apostatized during the Decian persecutions (249-50) should not be welcomed back into the fellowship of the church. Novatian's group formed themselves into their own party, under strict discipline. This separatist movement continued for many centuries. Their orthodoxy was never in doubt: Acacius,* one of their leading bishops during the Arian controversy, strongly repudiated Arianism. The Council of Nicea, which set out terms for the reception of the Novatians back into the church, demanded no change of doctrine. Novatian's work on the Trinity was strongly Trinitarian in character and maintained the full deity of Christ, though inclining to a form of the "kenotic" theory. Men such as Cornelius were not unnaturally critical of Novatian, who was nonetheless a vigorous champion of true Christology. Novatian died as a martyr during the persecutions under Valerian.

H.D. MC DONALD

NOVATUS (third century). Presbyter of Carthage. An implacable enemy of Cyprian, he opposed his election as bishop and intrigued constantly against him. In the problem of the Lapsed after the Decian persecution, he attacked Cyprian's deprecation of the libelli pacis and championed the right of "confessors" to grant them. As leader of an anti-Cyprian faction he gained control of relief funds by appointing Felicissimus, a wealthy layman, as a deacon. In Rome he supported Novatian as bishop in opposition to Cornelius. Cyprian supported Cornelius, and when a delegation of Novatianists led by Novatus came to Carthage, the anti-Cyprian group appointed Novatian's delegate, Maximus, rival bishop of Carthage. J.G.G. NORMAN

NOVENA (Lat. novem, "nine"). A Roman Catholic practice intended to encourage devotion and piety by means of nine successive days of prayer, public or private, to obtain special favors and grace. Unlike the more festal octave, and though recommended by the church, the novena has no place in the liturgy. The scriptural prototype is seen in the nine days of apostolic waiting in Jerusalem prior to the descent of the Holy Spirit in Acts 2. Although the observance is practiced as a preparation of the soul for some event of spiritual significance, it is primarily associated with a period of mourning. Since the early nineteenth century, novenas have been enriched by the granting of indulgences.

H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

NOVICE. The term for a candidate (male or female) for admission to a religious order during the probationary period which customarily follows the postulancy, prior to the profession of any vows. Throughout the noviciate, established by the Council of Trent as not less than a full and continuous year, the novice lives according to the rule of the order, under the direction of the novice-master, and separate from the rest of the community, although he enjoys its privileges, immunities, and indulgences. He is free to leave, as the order is free to dismiss him, and therefore may not renounce his property.

NOYES, JOHN HUMPHREY (1811-1886). Religious and social reformer. Born in Brattleboro, Vermont, he graduated from Dartmouth College (1830), and after conversion, studied at Andover Theological Seminary and Yale Divinity School. Developing perfectionist and adventist views contrary to Calvinism, he was ousted from Yale and the ministry when he pronounced himself sinless in 1834. He established two communes—at Putney, Vermont (1840-48), and Oneida, New York (1848-81)—to practice and propagate his ideas of perfectionism, biblical communism, complex marriage, male continence, population control, mutual criticism, and education. Under public pressure he emigrated in 1876 to Niagara Falls, Ontario, where he died. His classic History of American Socialisms (1870) was based on wide acquaintance with contemporary communitarians. D.E. PITZER

NUELSEN, JOHN LOUIS (1867-1946). Methodist bishop. Born of American parents in Zurich, he was educated at Drew Theological Seminary, at Halle, and at Berlin. An ordained Methodist, he held pastorates in Missouri and Minnesota, lectured in ancient languages and exegetical theology, and was made bishop in 1908. From 1912 he was in charge of the Methodist Church's work in Europe with Zurich as his headquarters. In 1936 he organized the first Methodist Central Conference of Germany at Frankfurt. A member of the Central Bureau for Relief of Evangelical Churches of Europe, he was also known for his preaching. He wrote widely on Methodism and biblical criticism and was an editor of major theological works. C.G. THORNE, JR.

NUN. The term for a woman who has professed vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience—precisely applied only to women living in strictly cloistered communities, and less accurately used for religious women engaged in service in the world, properly termed "sisters." The three great monastic leaders, Pachomius, Basil, and Benedict, each established a foundation for women under his sister, and Augustine prepared an influential letter of direction for a community of women. The rigorous seclusion of religious women imposed by the Eastern Church had no counterpart in the West until the bull Periculoso of Boniface VIII, confirmed at the Council of Trent. By its terms, nuns may neither leave their cloisters nor receive outsiders, including females. MARY E. ROGERS

NUNC DIMITTIS. The song of Simeon (Luke 2:29-32), which derives its name from the first two words in the Latin version. Simeon was an aged Israelite who cherished the messianic expectation and was under the inspiration of the Spirit. When he saw Joseph and Mary bring Jesus into the Temple for the rites of purification forty days after his birth, he took hold of the baby Jesus and uttered the words of his song. This consists of (1) a statement that he can now die in peace because he has at last been granted what he was promised—a view of the Messiah, and (2) a description of the salvation which the Messiah brings—light for the Gentiles and glory for Israel. This is appropriate to its setting and it is unnecessary to read into it a Christian theology of the Gentile mission and then to dismiss it as unauthentic. It has been used as an evening canticle in the worship of the Eastern and Western churches since at least the fourth century. R.E. NIXON

NUNCIO AND LEGATE, PAPAL. A nuncio is an official permanent papal representative from the Holy See to both the state and the church of a given area. Usually a titular bishop or archbishop, he relates to the Holy See through the Cardinal Secretary of State. As papal envoy to the state, he has duties diplomatic in character, not unlike an ambassador in international relations; his ambassadorial status was recognized by the Congress of Vienna (1815). As papal envoy to the area church, he has duties ecclesiastical, like those of an apostolic delegate in areas where there is no nuncio.

"Legate" was the usual designation of a papal representative during the era of the seventeenth century and earlier. Three or four types are at times distinguishable: Legate nati, the principal resident bishop, who also held certain special authority from the pope, duties partially retained by a primate today; Legates missi, sent by the Pope on ad hoc missions; and Legate a latere, the highest rank of special papal envoy, today a title usually reserved for ceremonial functions. A fourth type, the nuncii et collectores, were financial officials charged with gathering papal funds. The modern nuncio gradually replaced and absorbed duties drawn from all such earlier legates as the structures of the papacy, the area churches, and the states became more distinct.

See R.A. Graham, Vatican Diplomacy, A Study of Church and State on the International Plane (1959), and I. Cardinale, Le Saint-Siège et la diplomatie; aperçu historique, juridique, et pratique de la diplomatie pontificale (1962).

NUREMBERG DECLARATION. A German Old Catholic* theological statement. It was drafted by fourteen German Catholic professors, including Johannes Friedrich,* Ignaz von Döllinger,* and F.H. Reusch,* at a meeting in Nuremberg in 1870 which J.F. von Schulte of Prague had called to protest the decrees of the Vatican Council. It declared: (1) Vatican I* was not a true ecumenical council because it was neither free nor morally unanimous; (2) chapters three and four of the dogmatic constitution Pastor Aeternus (which defined the primacy of the pope in the church and asserted that papal statements when made ex cathedra are infallible) were not dogma because they had not been universally believed and taught; (3) papal infallibility would stir up conflicts between church and state, Catholics and non-Catholics; and (4) an unfettered general council should meet in Germany. The thirty-three academic and clerical signatories of the manifesto constituted the nucleus of the Old Catholic movement. RICHARD V. PIERARD

NUTTALL, ENOS (1842-1916). First archbishop of the West Indies. English-born, he went to Jamaica first in 1862 as a Methodist probationer, but in 1866 was ordained in the Anglican Church. He first appears as a man with sensible suggestions in the complex negotiations surrounding disestablishment in 1870. Ten years later he was elected bishop of Jamaica. He became archbishop in 1893. His interests cover the range of contemporary problems. He regarded the British Empire as, on the whole, a good thing, advocated an institutional connection with Canterbury, recruited clergy first in England, but in 1893 founded the first diocesan theological college in Jamaica. He advocated a modified system of public education, including secondary schools, with religious instruction at all levels. He pressed also for agricultural education. Eminently Victorian, he regarded Jamaican revivalism with suspicion, but blamed the church for its existence. He pioneered in the founding of a church nursing home in 1893. A competent man, convinced of the virtues of British culture, but without racial inhibitions, he was primarily concerned with individual rather than social problems.

GEOFFREY JOHNSTON

NYE, PHILIP (1596-1672). Congregational minister and theologian. Born in Sussex and educated at Oxford, where he graduated, he entered the ministry and by 1630 was at St. Michael's, Cornhill, but fled to Holland in 1633 to escape Laud's rigid ecclesiastical policies. Back in England by 1640, he became minister of a Congregational church in Kimbolton, Huntingdonshire. In June 1643 he was appointed to the Westminster Assembly,* there taking a leading part among the "dissenting brethren." Eventually he worked harmoniously with the Presbyterians and helped shape the Confession of Faith. With Stephen Marshall* in 1643 he established a working agreement between Scots and parliamentary forces, strongly promoting the Solemn League and Covenant.* He was very active in Cromwell's protectorate, was a leader at the Savoy Declaration* of 1658, was deprived at the Restoration, and during his latter years ministered privately among dissenting churches. BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

NYGREN, ANDERS THEODOR SAMUEL (1890- ). Swedish theologian. Born in Göteborg, he studied at Lund and was ordained in the Church of Sweden in 1912. He was deputy pastor in Ölmevalla (1914-20) before returning to Lund as instructor in the philosophy of religion until 1924, when he became professor of systematic theology. He was active also in Lutheran world affairs, and in the formation of the World Council of Churches, having been a delegate at the conferences held at Lausanne (1927), Oxford and Edinburgh (1937), Amsterdam (1948), and Lund (1952). He was president of the Lutheran World Federation (1947-52) and was chairman of the WCC's Faith and Order Commission on Christ and the Church (1953-63). He served as bishop of Lund from 1949 until his retirement in 1958. His writings include Agape and Eros (1930; ET 1953), Commentary on Romans (1941), Christ and His Church (1955; ET 1957), and Meaning and Method (1972). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

OAK, SYNOD OF THE (403). When Theophilus,* patriarch of Antioch, was summoned to Constantinople by imperial order to answer charges of persecution against a group of pro-Origenist monks, he formed alliances with those, including Empress Eudoxia, who disliked John Chrysostom's* reforming zeal. Helped by John's political innocence, Theophilus maneuvered the trial away from Constantinople to a suburb of Chalcedon called "The Oak." There, with the help of some thirty-six anti-Chrysostom bishops, he was able to turn it into a trial of John on forty-six indictments ranging from living like Cyclops to insulting the imperial majesty. John would not appear before judges who were his declared enemies and was therefore condemned and was exiled by Emperor Arcadius. He was recalled within a few days, however, partly because of the disquiet of the people of Constantinople, partly because of Eudoxia's disturbed conscience.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

OATES, TITUS (1648-1705). A leader of the 1678 Popish Plot.* Born at Oakham, Rutland, son of a Baptist minister of checkered career, he received Anglican ordination in 1673 without an academic degree, was converted to Catholicism but expelled from their schools in Spain, and returned to London with alleged information of a plot to assassinate Charles II and place the Roman Catholic duke of York on the throne. With Israel Tonge he produced documentary "proof" which caused a great stir and for a time made him a hero. The plot was discounted, Oates was convicted of perjury in 1685, and died in obscurity.

OATHS. An oath is an appeal to something held sacred as support for the truthfulness or sincerity of a statement or vow. It is held by many ethicists that swearing, whatever the circumstances and conditions, is not desirable but an evil necessity of the present age—a really Christian morality would require only a simple "yes, yes" and "no, no" (Matt. 5:33-37). Reformers and certain Protestant communities have held that only when oaths issue from the lower egotistical affections and impulses of human nature are they sinful. If they are pronounced for the sake of high ethical interests, then they are valid. These would interpret Matthew 5:33-37 as a prohibition against the frivolous and promiscuous oaths practiced in the everyday life of the Jews in the time of Christ (see Exod. 20:7; 1 Chron. 12:19; Matt. 23:16-22). The canon laws of the Roman Catholic Church and the Anglican Church have taken their cue from Jeremiah 4:2 which states that an oath should be given in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness. All these moral theologians would deem an oath before God as binding under grave punishment. Throughout the history of the church there have been those who have interpreted Matthew 5:33-37 as totally forbidding all oaths—Waldensians, Quakers, Jehovah's Witnesses, etc. Some governments have acknowledged the rights of these groups to refuse to take oaths.

OBERAMMERGAU. The location in upper Bavaria of the noted passion play. Such religious dramas were common in Bavaria, and legend holds that the Oberammergau villagers were spared from a plague in 1633 and in gratitude vowed to reenact the passion of Christ every ten years. From 1680 it was held on the decennial year, but was canceled in the war years 1870 and 1940. Originally it was staged in the church, then in the churchyard, and in 1830 the present site, a special theater, was occupied. Hitler admired the play for its alleged anti-Semitic qualities, and it was rewritten for the tricentennial performance in 1934 to make Jesus and the disciples appear as Aryan heroes. The text in current use, with some minor changes, was written by J.A. Daisenberger (1799-1883) in 1860. Performed by 700 villagers, the play lasts more than seven hours and is a lucrative community enterprise. In 1970 there were nearly 100 performances before a total audience of 500,000. RICHARD V. PIERARD

OBERLIN, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC (1740-1826). Alsatian Lutheran minister and philanthropist. Born in Alsace, he studied theology at Strasbourg and in 1769 became a pastor in Waldersbach. He soon gained distinction as a community servant and social reformer through his endeavors in the formation of schools, building roads and bridges, encouraging better agricultural techniques, and establishment of factories, stores, and savings-and-loan associations. Although deeply pious and devoted to his parishioners, he had an ecumenical outlook which embraced both Catholics and Calvinists. He welcomed the French Revolution and saw in republican ideals the earthly realization of the spirit of Christianity. He commanded the respect of the various French regimes for his philanthropies, while his work was admired and imitated elsewhere. Those contemporaries who were dissatisfied with rationalism in the church regarded his love for Christ and deep mystical devotion combined with a desire to promote the welfare of mankind as a symbol of hope.

OBERLIN THEOLOGY. The work of C.G. Finney* and Asa Mahan (1799-1889), this was a moderate form of Christian perfectionism.* In Scripture Doctrine of Perfection (1839), Mahan, the first president of Oberlin College, wrote that the Christian might eventually attain unbroken peace and not come into condemnation. Finney, the Presbyterian evangelist who in 1835 began a second career as Congregationalist and professor of theology at Oberlin, indicated in Lectures on Systematic Theology (1846) that he had gone far beyond N.W. Taylor* and brought liberal Calvinism close to Methodist perfectionism. To him, God was benevolent and man capable of growing toward perfection, although not absolute perfection, and thus society was perfectible. At the little Congregationalist college in Ohio, Mahan and Finney trained professional evangelists and stimulated zeal for social reform, but their approach rested on faith in individual conversion as the key to social justice. This was transcended by the organicism of Horace Bushnell* and his supporters.

DARREL BIGHAM

OBLATE (Lat. oblatus, "one who has offered himself"). A term used in different historical periods with different connotations, but always with reference to monasteries. In the contemporary Roman Catholic Church it describes the member of a specified religious community, e.g., the Oblates of St. Charles Borromeo founded in 1857 by H.E. Manning, archbishop of Westminster. In medieval and modern times it referred either to children placed in a monastery by their parents in order to learn from the monks (cf. Benedictine Rule, chap. 49), or to those who shared in the common life of a monastery without taking the vows.

OBOOKIAH (Opukahaiah), HENRY (1792-1818). Hawaiian Christian who inspired American missionary interest in what were then the Sandwich Islands. Born on the island of Hawaii, at twelve years of age he saw his parents slain in a local war and himself taken prisoner. Later he found refuge with an uncle, a priest, who trained Obookiah for the same occupation. Discontented, however, the youth managed to leave the island for America in the ship of a Captain Brintnall, arriving in New York in 1809. Aided by some college students, he learned English, became a devoted Christian, and planned to return to Hawaii with the Gospel. He inspired the sending of the first missionary party, but himself died of typhus before he could return with them.

HAROLD R. COOK

OBRECHT, JACOB (1450-1505). Netherlandish composer. The first great composer to come from what is now Holland, he is the first important composer to leave compositions with Dutch text. He was organist at various centers in the Netherlands and had Erasmus as one of his choir boys in Utrecht. He is distinguished especially for his Masses and was one of the first to have such works appear in print at the press of Petrucci in Venice. He showed great individuality in handling the cantus firmi (preexistent melodies) in his Masses, and was one of the experimenters of his day.

OCCOM, SAMSON (1723-1792). Best-known American Indian preacher of the eighteenth century. Born in Mohegan, Connecticut, he was converted with his mother during the Great Awakening* in 1740. He studied theology with Eleazar Wheelock,* who began the Indian school that later developed into Dartmouth College. Occom served as teacher and minister to the Montauk Indians of Long Island from 1749 to 1764. Ordained in 1759, he also served as missionary to the Oneidas, 1761-63. From 1765 to 1768 he was in Great Britain, where he succeeded in raising £10,000 for Wheelock's school. He then returned to his preaching and missionary work with the Oneidas. He established the Indian town of Brotherstown, New York, in 1784, and published an Indian hymnal.

HAROLD R. COOK

OCHINO, BERNARDINO (1487-1564). Italian Reformer. From Siena, he entered the Franciscan Observants (c.1504) and later, desiring a yet stricter rule, the Capuchins* (1534), of whom he was elected vicar-general (1538-42). A popular penitential preacher, in 1536 he met Juan de Valdés* and his circle. He became convinced that ecclesiastical mediation could not gain salvation for man. Thus there arose a conflict between his convictions and his vocation which climaxed when he criticized the Inquisition* in a sermon at Venice (1542). Summoned to Rome, he escaped to Geneva where he was cordially received by Calvin. Licensed to preach, he ministered to the Italians of Geneva, 1542-45, and published several works including his Apologhi.

In 1545 Ochino settled at Augsburg, where he became minister of the Italian church. When the city fell to the imperial forces, he escaped to Basle and Strasbourg before finding refuge in England (1547-53). Thomas Cranmer received him kindly and secured for him a prebend in the church of Canterbury and a royal pension. Ochino in addition to writing preached to the Italians in London. His main works of this period were The Usurped Primacy of the Bishop of Rome and the Labyrinth, an attack on the Calvinist teaching of predestination. When Queen Mary came to the throne, he returned to the Continent, becoming minister of the Italian congregation in Zurich. In 1563 he issued the Thirty Dialogues, which treated the doctrine of the Trinity and monogamy in a free way, thus causing his expulsion. Moving next to Poland, he preached at Cracow for a time, but was forced to leave and finally settled in Slavkov, Moravia, where he died of the plague.

OCKEGHEM, JOHANNES (c.1420-c.1495). Musical composer. This great composer belongs to the second generation of highly talented musicians, born near what is now the French-Belgian border, who rapidly advanced the art of counterpoint until it became the expressive medium of the great Renaissance choral legacy. Unlike many of his great countrymen he did not go to Italy, and spent much of his career at the French court. Allowing for the loss of a number of his works, his output was surprisingly small. We have only eleven complete Masses by him, and a small number of motets and secular chansons. His work is noted in particular for his ability to write a "seamless web" of polyphonic voices interrupted by a minimum of cadences points. He was one of the first to write in five voice-parts. He enjoyed an extraordinary degree of esteem by his fellow musicians, and a number of déplorations were written upon his death. An exceptionally beautiful one was set to music by Josquin Desprez,* and there is also one with words by Erasmus,* who has also left witness to Ockeghem's worth as a man.

ODENSE, DIET OF (1527). A meeting in Denmark* of the Catholic majority and the Lutheran minority, marking a decisive turning point in the history of the Reformation in that country. At his coronation in 1523 Frederik I had promised to protect and preserve the Catholic Church and to oppose and suppress the Lutheran heresy. When the Reformation grew stronger, however, and spread throughout his kingdom, he followed a policy of tolerance and even extended his personal protection to Hans Tausen* and other Lutheran preachers. When at Odense the Catholics demanded that the king fulfill his obligations, withdraw protection from the Lutherans, and deliver them up to clerical jurisdiction, the king stated the principle that "the king's power and authority is good for life and property, not for the souls." The norm of the church is the Gospel, according to Scripture. When interpretations of the Gospel differ, it is not for the king to pass sentence or use coercion in matters of faith. The preaching of the Gospel must therefore be free, until an ecumenical council has finally decided which interpretation of the Gospel is the true one. This principle of religious toleration formed the legal foundation for Frederik's policy of coexistence of a national Catholic Church alongside free Lutheran congregations, until the final accomplishment of the Reformation in Denmark in 1536.

N.O. RASMUSSEN

ODILIA (Othilia) (d. c.720). Abbess and patroness of Alsace. She is reputed to have been the blind daughter of a Frankish nobleman, Adalric, and to have founded a nunnery at his castle of Hohenburg (Odilienberg) in the Vosges Mountains after recovering her sight. Her shrine in the abbey there became a great place of pilgrimage, especially for those with eye diseases. Famous people such as Charlemagne also visited it. In modern times it has enjoyed a revival as a place of pilgrimage.

ODILO (c.962-1049). Fifth abbot of Cluny. He became acting abbot in 994, three years after he entered the monastery, and was abbot for fifty years from 999. A man of outstanding ability, he was responsible for a significant building program at Cluny, a tremendous expansion of daughter houses, and more centralized control of the daughter houses by the main monastery at Cluny. In addition he was an active leader in diplomatic affairs, both as a counselor to Emperor Henry II* and as a mediator between Emperor Conrad II and the king of France, Robert II, in 1025. He introduced the commemoration of All Souls Day (2 November) at Cluny, which was later extended to the whole church, and was responsible for the extension of the Truce of God* to S France and Italy. Known for his concern for the poor, he sold treasures of the monastery to aid the poor during the severe famine of 1033. Odilo was canonized in 1063.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

ODO (879-942). Abbot of Cluny. Son of Lord Abbo I of Déols, he was educated at the court of William, duke of Aquitaine, and later in Paris under Remigius of Auxerre.* When nineteen years old he became canon of St.-Martin of Tours. Three years later he joined the Cluniac* community at Baume, where Abbot Berno placed him in charge of the monastery school. Odo succeeded Berno in 924, and became abbot of Cluny in 927. Under his leadership Cluny received a papal privilege from John XI which facilitated the spread of Cluniac reforms in numerous French and Italian houses. Several times he acted as Vatican negotiator in Italian political disputes. His alleged works include Occupatio, an extended poetic meditation on redemptive history; Collationes, three collections of moral essays; Vita S. Geraldi Auriliacensis comitas and Vita Gregorii Turonensis episcopi, two biographies; Moralia in Job; a number of musical pieces dedicated to St. Martin; and several sermons.

JAMES DE JONG

OECOLAMPADIUS (1482-1531). German Reformer. A native of the Palatinate whose original name was Hussgen or Hauschein, he became the leading Protestant Reformer of Basle. A brilliant philologist in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, he began his university studies in law at Bologna, but transferred to theology at Heidelberg. Employed for a time as a tutor, he later secured a prebend at Weinberg (1503-12). Further studies at Tübingen and Stuttgart led to his contact with Reuchlin* and Melanchthon.* In 1515 he was called as minister to Basle, where he met Erasmus* and assisted him in the publication of the Greek NT. Later (1518) Oecolampadius became a pastor at Augsburg, where he was deeply affected by Luther's teachings. Then the pressure of his work caused him to enter a monastery (1520), only to withdraw after a short while.

In 1522 he accepted the position of court chaplain to Franz von Sickingen,* but returned to Basle, becoming lecturer on Holy Scripture at the university in 1523. Later he became a minister in the city, and his influence through lectures and sermons led to the establishment of the Reformed Church. He also promoted the evangelical cause throughout Switzerland by his writings and participation in disputations such as those held at Baden (1526) and Bern (1528). He attended the Colloquy at Marburg* (1529) where he defended the eucharistic teaching of his friend Ulrich Zwingli.* When the city council of Basle ordered the removal of images from the church and abolished the Mass, he supervised the work. He also introduced the ban and organized a board of ministers and laymen to see that discipline was executed.

OECUMENIUS (early sixth century). Rhetor and philosopher, not to be confused with the tenth-century bishop of Tricca in Thessaly with the same name. An adherent and contemporary of Severus* of Antioch, Oecumenius wrote the oldest extant Greek commentary on the Apocalypse, discovered early in the twentieth century. The work in twelve parts approached the biblical text historically. A commentary on the same book by Archbishop Andrew of Caesarea, written sometime between 563 and 614, referred to Oecumenius's work repeatedly. Other writings attributed to him came from different pens, including a commentary on Acts and expositions of the General and Pauline epistles, as well as a commentary on the Apocalypse edited by Donatus of Verona in 1532. JOHN GROH

OENGUS (ninth century). Irish monk. Member of the monastic community at Tallaght, near Dublin, he is frequently referred to as Oengus the Culdee, a term that indicates his simple faith and earnest devotion to Christ. He is best known as the author of a litany which throws light on the influence of the Eastern Syrian Church on the monastic life of the Celtic Church.* It commemorates the fact that large numbers of scholars from the Middle East sought refuge in Ireland in the eighth and ninth centuries. They built round towers for their protection and introduced a study of Hebrew and Greek in the monastic settlement. Oengus gives lists of bishops and pilgrims who lived in groups of seven. The oldest copy of his work, about 1200, is in the Franciscan Convent on Merchant's Quay, Dublin. In addition he wrote The Martyrology of Tallaght and Saltair na Rann, a poem on OT history. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

OIKONOMOS, CONSTANTINE (1780-1857). Greek scholar and theologian. A keen patriot, he was active in politics as well as ecclesiastical affairs, and strongly opposed Western influences in Greek life which had assumed increasing importance in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. He wrote works on philology and the history of literature, but his most notable achievement was a massive four-volume study of the Septuagint in over 3,700 pages, published in Athens, 1844-49, entitled Peri tōn ho hermēneutōn. He believed the Septuagint text was canonical and inspired rather than the Massoretic text, an idea rarely held. Even so, it contained much useful information, e.g., concerning the difference in chronology between the Greek and Hebrew texts. J.G.G. NORMAN OLAV (995-1030). King and national hero saint of Norway. As a Viking chieftain he fought for Ethelred II in England, and for Richard in Normandy. He was baptized in Rouen. In 1015 he became king of Norway. In his zeal for the Christian religion he made considerable use of violence. His harsh rule caused discontent, and his chieftains in cooperation with the Anglo-Danish king Canute tured him out of the country. In 1030 he made an attempt to regain his kingdom, but died in the battle of Stiklestad. Very soon his death was regarded as a martyr's end, and he was invoked as a saint. Over his shrine was built the cathedral of Trondheim which was a place of pilgrimage. The legendary account of Olav has the usual medieval shape of a saintly king, formed in accordance with Augustine's conception of the "righteous king" (rex iustus).

OLD BELIEVERS. Dissident groups of Russian Orthodox, in schism (raskol, hence called also "Raskolniki") since 1666, when Nikon, patriarch of Moscow, introduced reforms of ritual in line with Orthodox practice elsewhere, but declared heretical at a council of 1551. The dissidents adhered to the older practices calling themselves staroveri, adherents of the old rite, misrendered "Old Believers." Avvakum,* their leader, went into exile from 1664; others were exiled, and fierce persecution led many to flee to remote parts, e.g., Siberia and Karelia. Monks, peasants, Cossacks, and townfolk were among them. They regarded the official apostasy and their persecution as works of Antichrist. They were brutally treated and many suicides—e.g., self-immolation of whole groups by fire—are known, to escape their certain fate.

Persecution lasted until the end of Peter the Great's reign; Peter III and Catherine II were more tolerant, but Nicholas I (1825-55) renewed efforts of coercion. Penal laws persisted until 1903 when alleviations were introduced. Their lot since the Revolution has been that of all religious communities, yet some of their remoter strongholds still succeed in retaining a vigorous life. There are two main groups: the popovtsy, i.e., with priests, were first supplied with priests leaving the Orthodox Church, but a hierarchy was established in 1846 by Ambrose of Bosnia at Bielo-Krinitz in the Austrian Empire. The second group, pezpopovtsy, i.e., without priests, evolved new ways of organization in the remoter places, sometimes with extravagances. They are both said to maintain a movingly sincere manifestation of traditional Russian Christian piety.

OLDCASTLE, SIR JOHN (Lord Cobham) (c.1378-1417). English Lollard.* Born on the Welsh border, he served as a soldier, represented Herefordshire in Parliament (1404), then through his second wife's title became a baron in 1409. In the following year, however, he incurred the displeasure of Thomas Arundel,* archbishop of Canterbury, for Lollard sympathies. The warning evidently went unheeded, for in 1413 Oldcastle was summoned before convocation, and handed over to the civil arm for trial, despite his friendship with Henry V. Among other things, he rejected transubstantiation and confession, denounced the pope as Antichrist, and denied the hierarchy's right to dictate what a man should believe. Sentenced to death, he somehow escaped, and with others conspired to seize the king and to organize a Lollard assembly. The plot came to nothing, many of the Lollards were captured, but Oldcastle evaded custody until taken late in 1417. He was "hung and burnt hung." J.D. DOUGLAS

OLD CATHOLICS. A movement in German-speaking Europe, especially Bavaria, which rejected the dogma of Papal Infallibility declared by the Vatican Council* (1870), and organized the Old Catholic Churches, in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, not in communion with Rome. The movement was motivated by Febronianism,* and then Jansenism,* when it associated with the already established Church of Utrecht by a common adoption of the Declaration of Utrecht* (1889). The First International Old Catholic Congress convened at Cologne (1890).

J.J.I. von Döllinger, excommunicated from Rome, led the initial break with Rome, joined by other scholars, including Johann Friedrich* and Johann von Schulte. A congress of 300 convened at Munich, September 1871, and began organization of a separate church. Their aim was to perpetuate true Catholicism, claiming the Vatican decrees and other modern enactments of the Roman Church had in fact created a new church; hence the name "Old Catholics." Meanwhile Dö llinger declined further participation. In 1873 they elected Joseph Reinkens* first bishop, with see at Bonn; he was consecrated by the bishop of Deventer of the Dutch Church of Utrecht. The Swiss elected a bishop in 1876, with see at Bern. The Bismarckian *Kulturkampf supported the Old Catholics in a play against Rome, by making available subsidies and some church buildings.

Adoption of the Declaration of Utrecht effected a bond with the Church of Utrecht, which had broken communion with Rome (1724) over Jansenism, and gave the Old Catholics a definite doctrinal tradition. The Declaration accepted as valid "the faith of the primitive Church" as specified by the first seven ecumenical councils, before the schism of 1054. The bishop of Rome was acknowledged as historically primus inter pares. It rejected: the Vatican decrees (1870); the dogma of Immaculate Conception* of Mary (1854); certain encyclicals including Unigenitus (1714) against Jansenism; the Syllabus of Errors* (1864); the decrees of the Council of Trent* except as they concur with the primitive church; and transubstantiation.* In church government and liturgy also they differed from Rome. Bishops were elected by synods; clergy and laity enjoyed equality in synods, councils, and courts; priests were elected by parishs; clergy may marry; liturgies were in the vernacular; auricular confession was not obligtory.

An international Old Catholic congress has met regularly since 1890, with the archbishop of Utrecht as president. Some other autonomous churches have affiliated, including the Polish National Catholic Church, founded in Scranton, Pennsylvania (1897), and the Yugoslav Old Catholic Church (1924). The Philippine Independent Church (Aglipay) established sacramental communion with Old Catholics in 1965.

From the start, Anglicans have been close to Old Catholics. The bishops of Ely and Lincoln sent communications to the Munich Congress (1871) and attended the second at Cologne (1872). Anglicans participated in an international conference of theologians, convened at Bonn by Old Catholics, to discuss reunion of churches outside Rome (1874). Old Catholics recognized Anglican ordinations (1925) and achieved full intercommunion with the Church of England (1932) and most other Anglican churches thereafter. Old Catholics number (in 1957) approximately 350,000 mainly in Germany, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, Poland, and North America.

OLDHAM, JOSEPH HOULDSWORTH (1874-1969). Ecumenical pioneer. Son of an army officer, he was educated at Edinburgh Academy and Trinity College, Oxford. A warm-hearted evangelical, he became secretary of the Student Christian Movement* in 1896, then secretary to the World Missionary Conference which paved the way for the famous Edinburgh Conference* of 1910 and of its continuation committee from 1910 to 1921. He was joint secretary of the International Missionary Council* from 1921 to 1938, in all these early ecumenical gatherings working as secretary in close accord with J.R. Mott* as chairman. He founded and edited the International Review of Missions from 1931 to 1938. In 1937 he organized the Universal Christian Council for Life and Work Conference at Oxford,* from which emerged the striking phrase "Let the Church be the Church." He edited the Christian Newsletter from 1939 to 1945, but his later years were mainly devoted to improving the educational and social standards of the native African peoples. IAN SELLERS rome.* Such translation was undertaken for the church in North Africa, Gaul, and N Italy from the second century onward. In time, the work of Jerome ousted the older versions, with the result that the Old Latin is not widely attested in manuscripts. The latest list enumerates 453, among which the largest group (41) represents MSS containing the gospels. Any other part of Scripture has far less attestation in this form. Quotations in Christian writings fill in the resultant lacunae. For some books we have no evidence.

Two main types of text are distinguished, named "African" and "European"; by this it is meant that the attestation of such-and-such a form is derived from quotations in African or European writings, not that particular forms originated in these regions. The distinction is on the basis of "rendering the same basic Greek by different Latin words." A gradual process of revision is to be seen by which original errors of translation, regional forms of speech, and textual differences are corrected and brought into line with Greek norms. Especially in the earliest strata many Greek words were, however, retained, producing at length such familiar words as "angel," "deacon," and "synagogue" in W European tongues. The antecedents of the translations were as a rule Greek (Septuagint in OT), but there may have been recourse to the Hebrew even in the Old Latin period, and in the NT some links with Aramaic traditions or Syriac texts have been discerned. For our knowledge of the Old Latin, the work of Pierre Sabatier* has long been a standard source. Many further advances have led to the establishment of the Vetus Latina Institut, Beuron, Germany, and to the work in progress there. We now possess definitive collections of the material for Genesis, the Catholic epistles, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians.

OLD ROMAN CREED. As early as the end of the second century, this archetype of the Apostles' Creed* was the official creed of the Church of Rome. The earliest extant copy of the creed is found in the Hippolytus's (d.235) Apostolic Tradition, although the creed is first referred to about 150 in Tertullian's De praescriptione. The first writer of the West to give the text with a commentary was Rufinus* in the fourth century. The creed may also be found in Codex $E^a$ (Codex Laudianus 35 of the Bodleian Library at Oxford) which dates from the late sixth or early seventh centuries. The creed no doubt grew out of the confession of Peter (Matt. 16:16), which furnished its nucleus. WATSON E. MILLS

OLD SYRIAC VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. These are represented by two incomplete texts of the four gospels: (1) a manuscript discovered by William Cureton and subsequently published by him in 1858; (2) a palimpsest found in 1892 by Mrs. A.S. Lewis in St. Catherine's Monastery, Mt. Sinai. The manuscripts date from the fourth or fifth century, but their texts are as old as the second or third century, the Sinaitic being the earlier. Differences between the texts show that we have two recensions of the Old Syriac gospels. "Western" readings may be attributed either to their Greek vorlage or to the influence of Tatian's Diatessaron. There is also some evidence of an Old Syriac gospel text of the Caesarean type. Traces of Palestinian dialect in the Sinaitic recension suggest that the authors were converts from Judaism; the Curetonian text has largely been purged of Palestinian elements and has been revised according to a later Greek text. Burkitt's opinion that the Old Syriac version originated in Edessa is rejected by Kahle in favor of Adiabene. Ephraim Syrus's commentary on Acts, extant only in an Armenian translation, is evidently based on a text which differs from the Peshitta and which may be identifiable as an Old Syriac recension.

OLD TESTAMENT. "Do you understand what you are reading?" (Acts 8:30). This question, raised early in the church's history, has been the key issue in OT study. Dispute over the contents of the OT canon was not sparked until the Reformation. The need for vernacular translations was acknowledged in the early centuries when missionaries turned the Greek* and Hebrew* into Syriac,* Coptic,* Latin,* Ethiopic,* Georgian,* Armenian,* Gothic,* and a host of other tongues. Only during the Middle Ages was such translation proscribed. Then John Wycliffe's* work presaged an era which has seen parts of the Bible rendered into some 2,000 languages. Higher criticism,* with its queries into date, background, composition, and authorship, has been prominent only in the past two centuries. Not "which books nor what languages nor who wrote them," but "how do we interpret them" is the continuing question.

(1) From the apostles to Augustine.

The Ethiopian eunuch asked Philip about the meaning of Isaiah 53; "Then Philip began with that very passage of Scripture and told him the good news about Jesus" (Acts 8:35). Following their Lord's example ("These are the Scriptures that testify about me," John 5:39) the apostles began to read their Scriptures through eyes opened to deeper meanings.

In the OT they found prophecies which Jesus fulfilled, types which He completed, shadows of which He is the substance. Without questioning the factual character of the earlier events, they saw in them pointers to the fullness of time. What God had done in limited fashion in rescuing Israel from Egypt and settling her in the Promised Land, He was now doing for the church in lavish measure through Jesus, the Messiah.

(a) Alexandria. Almost immediately the post-apostolic generation found in the OT, not only pointers, but full charts of the future and detailed guides to holiness. Clement of Rome* (fl.c.90-100) used lives of individual Israelites as examples of waywardness and righteousness, and Rahab's scarlet cord as a picture of Jesus' blood.

The roots of the allegorizing technique adopted and exported by scholars like Clement of Alexandria* (155-c.220) and Origen* (c.185-c.254) were at least three: (i) rabbinic exegesis which allows a text great elasticity; (ii) OT studies of Philo,* who allegorized the Scriptures to find in them eternal verities akin to those of Greek philosophy; (iii) Plato's* teachings which separated what we know with our senses from eternal, real truths.

Planted in Christian soil, these roots were nourished by three convictions: (i) every word in Scripture was divinely inspired and, therefore, charged with hidden meaning; (ii) the OT everywhere spoke of Christ; (iii) where Christ was mentioned, His body, the church, was also in view.

Attempting to snatch the OT from his Jewish countrymen to protect it against the assaults of Marcion's* (second century) followers, Origen (whose comparisons of Greek and Hebrew versions made him a pioneer in textual criticism) devoted his monumental talents to the task of allegorizing it. Where the literal sense seemed absurd, unworthy, or immoral, he virtually disowned it in favor of the spiritual. As man is body, soul, and spirit, so Scripture has three senses: literal, moral, spiritual. The greatest of these is spiritual. The width of the gap between Origen's use of allegory* and the apostles' use of typology* is seen in the fact that Origen regularly allegorized the New Testament as well as the Old, setting a pattern that persisted through the Middle Ages.

(b) Antioch. Here Jewish tradition had interpreted the OT quite literally, and the influence of Plato and Philo was not dominant. Like Diodore of Tarsus* (d. c.392), the men of Antioch (including the gifted preacher, John Chrysostom,* d.407) distinguished between "theory" (theoria) and allegory, "theory" being the true meaning of the text. The Antiochenes, especially Theodore of Mopsuestia* (c.350-428), correctly sensed the importance of history as a foundation for theology and severely chided Origen for undermining this foundation: if Adam is not Adam, created and fallen, how can Christ be Last Adam, redeeming mankind from a fall that in allegorical exegesis did not really take place? When the Reformers sought to find a way back to apostolic methods of interpreting the OT, they took the road that passed near Antioch.

(c) The West. By allegorizing, Origen had sought to repel Marcion's attack on the OT as an unworthy Jewish book. Irenaeus* (fl.c.175-c.195), by contrast, answered Marcion by a system of typology in which the NT recapitulated and fulfilled the Old: Christ is the new Adam; Mary, the new Eve; the Cross, the new tree in the garden. Had the church-at-large adopted Irenaeus's scheme of progressive revelation, of continuity yet contrast between the two Testaments, the whole history of her understanding of the faith would have been altered for the better.

Tertullian* (c.160-c.220) tried to counter the Marcionites, Valentinians, and other heretics by depriving them of their right to the Bible, which he viewed as the legal possession of churches that remained true to apostolic teachings. He also gave to the church final authority in interpretation, anticipating the pattern of authority in Roman Catholicism. While not enthusiastic about allegories, Tertullian did not hesitate to use them in the service of orthodoxy's struggle with heresy or philosophy.

Jerome's* (c.345-c.419) knowledge of Hebrew (which set him apart from most of the Fathers), his familiarity with the geography of Palestine, his recognition of a Palestinian canon not containing the Apocrypha, his massive accomplishments in translation and revision of earlier Latin versions, his substantial commentaries on OT books—all indicate that, as philologist and biblical scholar, he had no peer for a thousand years. Although with Origen Jerome speaks of three senses of interpretation, most of the time he deals with only two—literal and spiritual. His insistence that the spiritual must be based on the literal, and his attention to the Hebrew text, gradually widened the gulf between him and Origen who, however, was not without his Western disciples like Hilary of Poitiers* and Ambrose.*

Augustine* (354-430) combined in his exegesis and preaching the approaches of a number of his predecessors. From Tyconius* the Donatist he borrowed rules for interpreting Scripture, especially OT prophecies, which had been carefully catalogued as to whether they referred to Christ or to His church or to both. Like Tertullian he stressed the church's authority in canon and interpretation. Holding that the OT was to be read both literally and figuratively, he frequently followed Ambrose's use of allegory as a weapon to resist the Manichaeans who derided the OT anthropomorphisms of God and accounts of patriarchal immoralities.

(2) From Gregory the Great to Nicholas of Lyra

(a) Gregory I and his successors.* Gregory's (d.604) commentaries on Job, Ezekiel, Kings, and parts of the gospels became a channel through which the knowledge and methods of the Fathers (especially allegorical interpretation) were conveyed to the Middle Ages, stripped of the polemics which had dominated much of patristic exegesis.

During the following centuries, the monasteries of Europe and England were beehives of literary activity, almost all of which consisted of fanciful applications or topical collections of patristic exegesis. Accomplishing more than this were Isidore of Seville* (d.636)—who compiled handbooks explaining difficult passages, proper names, dates, etc., based on material from Jerome—and the Venerable Bede* (d.735)—who sought to interpret figures of speech.

Charlemagne's* educational reforms (late eighth century) resulted in a number of commentaries, e.g., by Alcuin* (d.804) and Rabanus Maurus* (c.776-856). "The common characteristic in all this use of Scripture in the period from the seventh to the eleventh century was the constant link between the Bible and prayer, both public and private" (Cambridge History of the Bible, vol. 2, p. 188).

(b) Monasticism. Bernard of Clairvaux,* a Cistercian (1090-1153), wrote sermons on the Song of Songs and magnificent hymns which breathe with his mystical understanding of Scripture. Questions of history, chronology, and philology were largely beyond the monks' reach. Following Origen, they sought the NT's saving message of Christ in the OT, without clear agreement as to the number of senses a passage or word had: frequently four (literal or historical, typical, moral or allegorical, analogical or eschatological); sometimes three (historical, typical, moral).

(c) *Scholasticism. The Schoolmen taught from copies of the Scripture with explanatory comments (usually from the Fathers) in the margins or between the lines. The best of these glosses (used, e.g., by Peter Lombard,* c.1095-1169) had been produced by Anselm* (d.1117) and Ralph of Laon. Hugh of St.-Victor (1096-1141), an abbey in Paris, gave great impetus to the teaching of the whole Bible by placing it at the heart of the curriculum and developing guidelines for exegesis, a work nobly advanced by his pupil, Andrew. A secular teacher, Peter Comestor* (whose title indicates that he had "eaten" the Scriptures, d.c.1180), produced his Historia Scholastica (a summary of sacred history), which joined the gloss as a required textbook.

Some of the later doctors (e.g., Bonaventure,* 1221-74; Thomas Aquinas,* 1224-74; and Albertus Magnus,* 1193-1280), though largely devoted to the relationship between Aristotle's* philosophy and their theology, did produce commentaries, particularly on the wisdom literature, whose ethics fascinated them. More than his fellows, Thomas Aquinas labored to bring system to exegesis by clarifying the ways in which the senses of Scripture were to be defined and discovered.

If Thomas's preference of the literal sense in proving doctrines (despite his frequent use of allegory) left the door slightly ajar for later reformers, it was Nicholas of Lyra* (c.1265-1349) who opened it wide. A Franciscan, Nicholas produced a commentary on the whole Bible which paved the way for hermeneutical reform by stressing the literal meaning of the text. Ironically, it was Jewish commentators like Ibn Ezra (c.1055-1135), Rashi (1040-1105), and the Kimchis (Joseph, c.1105-70; Moses, d. c.1190; David, c.1160-1235) who pointed Nicholas away from the fourfold formula which had hobbled medieval exegesis. Attempting to rescue their faith from Christians bent only on allegorizing the law and finding Christ in the prophets, these Spanish Jews moved away from kabbalistic and Talmudic exegesis and sought the plain sense of the Hebrew words and sentences. The allegorical method had developed in Alexandria to save the OT from its Jewishness. Now it was Jews who provided the means to save the OT from the church for the church.

(3) The Reformers

(a) Luther. Martin Luther's* (1483-1546) vernacular translation opened the Bible to the common people, established the order in which books of the OT have been generally published since (history, devotion, prophecy), separated the Apocrypha* from the canonical books, and paved the way for the critical investigation of Scripture. More important, his exegesis of the OT, especially Genesis and Psalms, moved away (notably after 1525) from the fourfold medieval pattern and emphasized the history of God's dealings with His people. Luther stressed the unity, the diversity, and the clarity of the Scriptures: unity, because the one God spoke the Word of Christ in both Testaments; diversity, because of the sharp antithesis between Law (both ceremonial and moral) and Gospel; clarity, because the plain truth of justification could be read by all, even in parts of the OT. Books that did not ring with the Gospel or sound the stern warnings of Law—e.g., Esther, Ezra-Nehemiah—he relegated to secondary importance without removing them from the Bible.

(b) Calvin. Like Luther, John Calvin* (1509-64) stressed the plain meaning of the OT although he played down the disjunction between Law and Gospel and (in the later editions of his Institutes) stressed the unity of the two Testaments by viewing the moral law (not the ceremonial) as an eternal statement of divine demands and by finding one major covenant of grace from the Fall through the Incarnation. Calvin's commentaries on the OT are models of scholarly exegesis, honoring every part of Scripture, while refusing to gloss over critical problems. His strong attachment to the OT was encouraged both by his desire to find Christian guidelines for Geneva's government and by his opposition to Anabaptists,* who treated the OT as a Jewish book with only limited Christian value. Calvin's doctrine of the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit as the chief argument for Scripture's authority sprang from his desire to refute the Roman Catholic claim that Scripture's authority is derived from the church.

(4) From the Reformers to Schleiermacher

After the Reformation,* theological positions both Catholic and Protestant hardened into systems in which matters of inspiration, authority, and canon were precisely determined.

(a) The Council of Trent. The council (8 April 1546) decreed that (i) unwritten traditions of the church be received with an authority equal to the Bible's; (ii) the Apocrypha have canonical status; (iii) the Vulgate be the official version for public teaching or preaching; (iv) a definitive edition of the Vulgate be produced to settle the questions of textual variants; (v) all biblical books, in view of their divine inspiration, be accorded equal authority; (vi) the church have final say in interpretation.

(b) Eastern Churches. In 1672 a synod in Jerusalem defined the OT to include the Apocrypha, while forbidding unqualified lay people to read certain OT books.

(c) The Reformed Creeds (e.g., French, 1559; Anglican Thirty-Nine Articles, 1562; Belgic, 1566; Second Helvetic, 1566; Westminster, 1648). These set up their counter positions: (i) a fixed canon, excluding the Apocrypha (the reading of which was still permitted); (ii) the Spirit's inner witness, not ecclesiastical verdict, as the basis of Scripture's authority.

Lutherans who, in the Formula of Concord (1577), had affirmed Scripture's sole authority against the Catholic claims for tradition gradually moved closer to Calvinistic views of the Spirit's inner testimony and of the unity of Testaments, as Anglicans had already done.

(d) Seventeenth-Century Orthodoxy. Theological positions here were so minutely defined that the results have been labeled "Protestant Scholasticism." Dogmaticians like Johann Gerhard* (1582-1637), J.A. Quenstedt (1617-88), Leon Hütter (1563-1616), J.B. Carpzov (1607-57), and Abraham Calovius* (1612-86) used the OT as a collection of proof-texts to oppose groups like the Socinians who valued the OT historically but rejected its doctrine. Meanwhile, free churches, especially in England, found comfort in the prophets' indictments of Israel's political and religious establishments. "The Old Testament influence . . . helped to make the Anglo-Saxon mentality different from any other Western European mentality" (E.G. Kraeling, p. 42).

(e) Reactions to Orthodoxy. Both textual ("lower") and historical ("higher") criticism began to chip away at the orthodox opinions that the inspiration of Scripture was a process of divine dictation. J. Cocceius* (1603-69) derived a scheme of progressive revelation from the OT and questioned its normative role for dogmatics. Philip Spener* (1635-1705) and J.A. Bengel* (1687-1752) and other Pietists sought to turn orthodoxy's attention from polemic debate to the teaching of the Scriptures which alone could produce true love and holiness.

Rejecting the Bible's revelatory claims, rationalistic philosophers like Thomas Hobbes* (1588-1679) and Benedict de Spinoza* (1632-77) sought to build systems of truth and morality on reason alone. Spinoza, though a Jew, rejected the doctrine of Israel's election. G.E. Lessing* (1729-81) further undercut the OT's uniqueness by distinguishing between the eternal truths of Christianity and their temporal contingent foundation in history, and by propounding that through reason God had educated other peoples even more than the Jews.

Though Immanuel Kant* (1724-1804) refuted the rationalists, he continued their attack on the OT, branding its laws as inferior to conscience because they were imposed from without. In academic circles, the philosophers won the day. Intellectually the church is still recovering from their victory.

(f) *Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768-1834). He gave little more importance to the OT than to Greek wisdom, which he also saw as part of the preparation for Christianity. Defining true religion as the "feeling of absolute dependence on God," Schleiermacher treasured only parts of the OT that spoke of this new relationship (e.g., New Covenant in Jer. 31:31-34). For the first time since Marcion, a persuasive spokesman of the church encouraged her to close her first Scriptures.

(5) From Wellhausen to the Present

In the vast range of OT higher critics stretching back to J. Astruc* (1684-1766) and J.G. Eichhorn* (1752-1827), the highest peak is Julius Wellhausen* (1844-1918). Applying evolutionary canons stemming from Hegel* and Darwin,* Wellhausen reconstructed Israel's religious history as a naturalistic process that gradually matured from primitive animism and polytheism to the ethical monotheism of the prophets. The patriarchs had little historical basis; the Mosaic legislation was largely a product of the postexilic period; the prophets, not Moses, were the true pioneers; the Pentateuch, compiled from four main sources, was assembled only after the Exile.

Immediately a rash of critical studies broke out in the universities of Great Britain, Germany, and America, some of which led to sharp confrontation with churchly authorities. Scurrying to the aid of laymen and clergy who felt that higher criticism had snatched more than half the Bible from their hands came a flock of critical scholars who sought to point out the abiding relevance of the OT, e.g., G.A. Smith,* The Higher Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament (1901); A.S. Peake,* The Bible, its Origin, its Significance and its Abiding Worth (1913); H. Gunkel,* What Remains of the Old Testament? (1928).

Among the conservatives who sought to dull the impact of higher criticism by attacking its naturalistic presuppositions and by exposing weaknesses in its methods were William Henry Green (The Higher Criticism of the Pentateuch, 1895) and James Orr* (The Problem of the Old Testament, 1906).

In the decades since World War I some factors have combined to increase Christian understanding of the Old Testament:

(a) Archeology has confirmed the Bible's historical character and illuminated the setting and context of life in Bible times—cf. W.F. Albright, Archeology and the Religion of Israel (1942); G.E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957); D. Winton Thomas (ed.), Archeology and Old Testament Study (1967). John Bright (A History of Israel, 1959) and Martin Noth (The History of Israel, 1958) represent respectively the more confident and the more skeptical approaches toward OT archeology, particularly in the period before David.

(b) Philology has opened a window through which we can look at the thought processes, value systems, and religious beliefs of Israel's neighbors, e.g., the Egyptians, the Sumerians, Assyrians and Babylonians, the Syrians (especially in Ugarit), the Moabites, the Hurrians and the Hittites, and the Arameans. As no other generation in history, ours has the tools and skills to confront antiquity on its own terms.

While pioneers in comparative studies were impressed by the parallels between Israel's religious practice and thought and her neighbors', their successors have appreciated the contrasts which point to the uniqueness of Israel's revealed, historical, convenantal, moral faith—cf. G.E. Wright's The Old Testament Against Its Environment (1950) and W.F. Albright's From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940).

(c) The behavioral sciences—anthropology, sociology, psychology—have provided entrée to the sociopolitical systems and to the inner life of Israel. Customs and relationships puzzling to our Western modernity are beginning to become clear—cf. J. Pedersen's Israel: Its Life and Culture (2 vols., 1926, 1940) and R. DeVaux's Ancient Israel (1961).

(d) The study of literary forms (e.g., by H. Gunkel, S. Mowinckel,* C. Westermann, B. Childs) has pointed out the varieties of literary genre and the emotional connotations that they brought to the Israelite who heard them from priest or prophet: hymn, complaint, instruction; proverb, fable, parable, riddle; work song, love song, battle cry; defendant's plea, plaintiff's argument, judge's verdict, king's commission to a messenger.

(e) In theology, for the first time since Calvin, a major theologian, Karl Barth,* stressed the unity of the Testaments and the way in which the OT is a unique witness to revelation as it anticipates history's pivotal revelatory event—the Incarnation. Conservatives have, with good reason, criticized Barth's view of Scripture, which restricts revelation to divine encounter rather than extending it also to the inspired record of that encounter, the biblical texts; but they should be grateful for his emphasis on the creating, redeeming God of the OT in an era when that picture of God was much maligned.

Heartened by these recent insights and sobered by two world wars and a great depression, a distinguished company of scholars have tackled the massive task of writing OT theologies, where most of their predecessors had shied away from the very term "theology," daring to speak only of Israel's "religion." Writers who have been keenly conscious of the OT's contribution to the Christian faith include W. Vischer (The Witness of the Old Testament to Christ), O. Procksch (Theology of the Old Testament), Th. Vriezen (An Outline of Old Testament Theology), H.H. Rowley (The Unity of the Theology), H.H. Rowley (The Unity of the Bible), G.A.F. Knight (A Christian Theology of the Old Testament), F.F. Bruce (This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes), and especially G. von Rad (Old Testament Theology).

The debate continues. The teachers of the church struggle to examine the ties that unite and the uniqueness that separates the Testaments. Final resolution is probably out of reach. But the most promising approaches seem to combine a commitment of the reality of God's revelation in His words and deeds to Israel, a progress in that revelation through which more and more of God's ways and will are understood by His people, and a consummation of that revelation in the Incarnation of Christ, God's final Word to man. History and theology—event and the meaning of the event—must both be taken with full seriousness. We can be hopeful in the midst of the struggle: the Lord of the Testaments and of the church does not await scholarly consensus to get His speaking done.

OLEVIANUS, KASPAR (1536-1587). Reformed theologian. Born at Trèves (Trier), he studied at Paris, Orléans, and Bourges, where he accepted Reformation ideas. The drowning of a friend impelled him to become a preacher. He studied theology in Geneva, Zurich, and Lausanne, becoming acquainted with Farel, Calvin, Peter Martyr, Beza, and Bullinger. He returned to Trèves to teach in the Latin school (1559), but his fervent preaching led to imprisonment. Invited by Elector Frederick III to Heidelberg, he became pastor of St. Peter's Church and helped to reconstruct the church on Reformed lines. With Zacharias Ursinus,* he drafted the final revision of the Heidelberg Catechism. He was involved in an "Arian" controversy and voted for the death penalty for the "blasphemers." Banished during a Lutheran reaction under Louis VI, he went to Berleberg, Wittgenstein, and to Hernorn, Nassau, where he established a complete Presbyterian organization. He also wrote NT commentaries.

J.G.G. NORMAN

OLIER, JEAN-JACQUES (1608-1657). Founder of the Society of Priests of St.-Sulpice. Born in Paris, he studied theology at the Sorbonne. His spiritual renewal came between 1630 and 1632, and was due in part to the influence of Vincent de Paul* and a pilgrimage to Loreto. In 1641 he founded a seminary for priests at Vaugirard. As parish priest of St.-Sulpice in Paris (1642-52) he sought to reform the area with the help of the seminary which moved there in 1642. The seminary grew in size and fame, and in 1657 Olier's missionary zeal led him to send priests to Montreal. Probably his best-known book was the Catéchisme chrétien pour la vie intérieure (1656), but all his writings were valued and influenced the spiritual renewal of many clergy. PETER TOON

OLIVETAN (c.1506-1538). Protestant Reformer and cousin of John Calvin. His real name was Pierre Robert, and like his cousin he was a native of Noyon in Picardy and a student successively at Paris and Orléans, where he earned the nickname "Olivetanus" because he burned the midnight oil. An early French Protestant, he fled from Orléans to Strasbourg in 1528 following his evangelical conversion. Beginning in November 1531, he preached briefly at Neuchâtel, leaving the following year for Piedmont where he contacted the Waldensians.* Olivetan taught in Geneva from 1533 to 1535, but resigned to return to Italy, where he died. He is chiefly remembered for two things: his religious influence on young Calvin, and his translation of the Bible into French. Olivetan was one of several important sources which influenced his cousin toward evangelical Christianity. Further, his French Bible, originally prepared for the Waldensians of Piedmont, was the version used by the first-generation Calvinist Reformers as they preached the Gospel in France. Published in Neuchâtel in 1535, it contained a preface by Calvin in which for the first time he gave a public confession of his biblical faith.

ROBERT D. LINDER

OLIVI, PETRUS JOANNIS (c.1248-98). Augustinian philosopher and leader of Spiritual Franciscans. Born at Sérignan, he entered the Franciscan Order at Béziers (c.1260). He studied at Paris and possibly Oxford. Accused of heresy at Strasbourg (1282), he established his orthodoxy at Montpellier (1287) and Paris (1292). He became lector at the convents of Nîmes, Florence, and Montpellier. He was greatly venerated by the Spiritual Franciscans after his death. His commentary on Revelation, Postilla super Apocalypsim, with its overtones of Joachitism and identification of the papacy with Antichrist, was condemned by John XXII (1326). Anthropologically, he distinguished between ontological and conceptual orders, concluding that man is composed of matter and spirit, and that there is plurality of forms in corporal beings. Concerned to keep body and soul separate, he divorced the intellectual soul from the vegetative and sensitive souls, making the latter alone the body's form. This idea was condemned by the Council of Vienne* (1311-12).

OMAN, JOHN WOOD (1860-1939). Presbyterian theologian. Born in Orkney, and educated at Edinburgh and Heidelberg, he became minister at Alnwick, Northumberland, after which (1907) he joined the staff of Westminster College, Cambridge, where he was later principal (1925-35). He developed an early interest in Schleiermacher,* who held that religious experience is self-authenticating. Like Schleiermacher, Oman stressed feeling, defining religion as the direct feeling of the "supernatural." He did not mean the miraculous, but simply a wider environment than physical nature. This view is similar to that of R. Otto, who emphasized the feeling of the "awesome holy." Of his thirteen books the best known is The Natural and the Supernatural (1931). His obscurities, real or apparent, his inconsistencies, and his overindulgence in generalities do not make for easy reading, but sympathizers with German philosophy claim to plumb new depths of meaning in his carefully construed sentences.

R.E.D. CLARK

ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. First formulated by Anselm* (c.1033-1109) while abbot of Bec, and later by Descartes* (1596-1650), this is an a priori argument for the existence of God, based on the idea that the concept of God as the most perfect being requires His existence, since a god that existed only in intellectu would be less than perfect (would lack the perfection of existence), and so could not be God. Another version of the argument which Norman Malcolm finds in Anselm's Proslogion involves the predication of necessary existence of God: God is the sort of being who does not just happen to exist, but exists necessarily. As Kant showed, the first version of the argument involves the unacceptable premise that "existence" functions as a predicate, while the second version, given prominence by contemporary philosophers such as Malcolm and Charles Hartshorne, involves a confusion between logical and ontological senses of "necessity." God may be said to be ontologically necessary—i.e., His existence is not contingent upon other states of affairs —but the second version requires the idea of the nonexistence of God to be self-contradictory, which it obviously is not. The ontological argument has aroused considerable interest in modern analytic philosophers, partly because of the many independent conceptual issues it raises about perfection, necessity, existence, and so forth.

PAUL HELM

ONTOLOGISM (ontos, "being"; logos, "science"). A speculative system of philosophy which (in a theistic form) maintains that we know God immediately as the primary and natural object of human cognitive powers. The intuition of God is the first act of our intellectual knowledge. This system claims descent from Plato* and Augustine* and was advocated by Malebranche* in the seventeenth century on the basis of his Occasionalism, which maintained that finite things have no efficient causality of their own and that our sensations and ideas are caused not by body or mind but produced by God, the universal Cause. Vincenzo Gioberti* and Antonio Rosmini* were prominent exponents. The term itself first appears in Gioberti's Introduzione allo studio della filosofia (1840). Attacked on the grounds that our idea of God is analogical, not direct, and that such teaching leads to pantheism, seven propositions of the ontologists were condemned by the Holy Office in 1861. In 1887 forty propositions from the works of Rosmini were condemned by the Vatican Council.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

OOSTERZEE, JAN JAKOB VAN (1817-1882). Dutch Reformed minister and theologian. Born in Rotterdam, he was educated at the University of Utrecht and by 1862 had served churches at Eemnes-Binnen, Alkmaar, and the chief pulpit in Rotterdam. Well known as pulpit orator and evangelical leader, his piety and scholarship returned him to Utrecht to teach practical theology, which position he kept until his death. He rejected naturalistic, critical views and vigorously maintained biblical and supernatural presuppositions toward theological science. His writing career began in 1845 with the editorship of a theological journal. His published works included The Image of Christ as Presented in Scripture (1874); commentaries on Luke, the Pastoral epistles, Philemon, and James; and Praktische Theologie (1878), which covered the full range of his pastoral and tutorial prowess.

OPHITES. Gnostic sect. Origen, and Celsus through Origen, provide what is principally known about them: the Ophites' diagrammatic approach to the total cosmos, having at its highest level the Kingdom of God with the Son as inner core; and their liturgy, which is a symbolic rite of passage through the stages thus diagrammed. Theologically one sees further Gnosticization of the Apostle John's celestial geography, with corresponding denial of the reality of history and/or time.

OPTATUS (fourth century). Bishop of Milevis in Numidia and author of an untidy work known as On the Schism of the Donatists or Against Parmenian the Donatist (bishop of Carthage). Books 1-6 were written about 367 and revised when book 7 (incomplete) was added about 385. An appendix compiled between 330 and 347 comprises ten documents important for Donatist origins. A Christmas sermon also survives. Optatus's historical and theological rebuttal of Parmenian's lost Against the Church of "Traditores" advances arguments later developed by Augustine. The "endowments" (dotes) of the true church include catholicity (worldwide extension), unity (communion with the cathedra Petri of Rome and the bishops), and the holiness of God's gifts, especially the sacraments, not of a membership embracing good and evil alike. Baptism sanctifies by virtue of divine grace, not the minister's standing. Optatus's church belongs unashamedly to the Christian empire and approves its measures against schismatics. D.F. WRIGHT

ORANGE, COUNCILS OF. Two synods held at Orange (Arausio) in S France (Vaucluse) in 441 and 529. Hilary of Arles* presided at the first, with sixteen bishops attending, where thirty canons were issued on disciplinary matters. Caesarius of Arles* presided at the second, championing Augustinian prevenient grace in the struggle against Semi-Pelagianism.* In a contest with Felix IV he triumphed, submitting to thirteen bishops in Orange a declaration on grace and free will, in the form of capitula, which they signed and which Boniface II approved in 531. These upheld much of Augustine's* doctrine on grace as the corrective to the views of John Cassian* and Faustus of Riez,* stressing the need for grace and condemning predestination of man to evil. Theories, not persons, were condemned. The 529 council ended the Semi-Pelagian controversy in S Gaul. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ORANGEMEN. Members of the Orange Order, an organization of Protestants, originating in Ireland,* with lodges also in England, Scotland, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and Africa. The order derives its name from its attachment to the memory and achievements of William III,* Prince of Orange, whose victories over the Roman Catholic forces of James II, particularly at the Battle of the Boyne in 1690, are commemorated in annual processions.

The Orange Order was founded in 1795, at a time when there was considerable guerrilla warfare between Roman Catholic bodies such as the "Ribbonmen" and the "Defenders," and Protestant organizations such as the "Peep o' Day Boys," particularly in County Armagh. After a pitched battle at a place called "the Diamond," in which the Roman Catholics were defeated, the surviving Protestant victors formed an organization in Loughgall to pledge themselves to mutual protection and in defense of Protestantism. The movement grew rapidly both in Ireland and England in the early years of the nineteenth century, but its influence in England at that time waned when it was suspected of political intrigues involving the duke of Cumberland, uncle of Queen Victoria. Beginning as a largely defensive organization, with a decisively evangelical Protestant constitution, the Orange Order, with the passing of the years and particularly in opposition to Roman Catholic sympathies with Irish Republican politics, became itself increasingly a political movement and has wielded considerable influence on the political situation in Northern Ireland. HUGH J. BLAIR

ORATORIANS. The name of two associations of secular priests:

(1) Italian Oratory, founded by Philip Neri* in Rome out of an informal association of priests (1564). He was the first religious leader to add social and artistic aspects to devotional exercises. Palestrina,* one of his penitents, composed music for his external brotherhood, or "little oratory," thus giving the name to the art-form "oratorio." Formally approved in 1575, they spread through Italy, France, and Spain. J.H. Newman* introduced them to England at Old Oscott, 1847. They live in community without vows, supported by private means.

(2) French Oratory, founded by Pierre de Bérulle* at Paris (1611), approved as the Oratoire de Jésus-Christ (1613). Though inspired by the Italian Oratory, it is a separate institute, a centralized organization governed by a superior-general. Its principal activity was training priests in seminaries. During 1672-1733 it was dominated by Jansenism.* Dissolved in 1790, it was reestablished (1852) by L.P. Pététot and A.J.A. Gratry.* J.G.G. NORMAN

ORATORIO, see MUSIC, CHRISTIAN

ORATORY (Lat. oratorium, "place of prayer"). From its more general original meaning, the term is now associated in Roman Catholicism with a place intended for divine services, especially celebration of the Mass, primarily in connection with certain designated persons. Modern Roman Catholicism recognizes three types of oratory:

(1) A public oratory, chiefly for private individuals or a community, but open to all worshipers at least when divine services are held.

(2) A semi-public oratory is designed for the use of a particular community which may, however, at its pleasure admit or exclude others.

(3) A private or domestic oratory (the adjectives were previously distinguishable but are now virtually interchangeable) is set up in a private home for the use of a family or individual. In such instances they are a reversion to historical usage —i.e., places of prayer which are no substitute for the local churches and are used only exceptionably for Mass. J.D. DOUGLAS

ORDEALS. A form of trial whereby, according to God's will and judgment, the guilt or innocence of an accused person was determined by some feat of physical endurance. The practice predates the biblical era and was almost universal in scope. The ordeal by water is mentioned in the Code of Hammurabi (nos. 2, 132) and the bitter-water ordeal is recorded in Numbers 5:11-31. The ordeal was commonly used in medieval Europe and held the favor of the church until 1215 (Fourth Lateran Council), when the clergy was forbidden to take part in the practice. Up to that time the ordeals were usually preceded by Mass. There were many canonists who had opposed it before 1215, but they had been unable to have it abolished. The ordeal took many forms: ordeals by poison, by water, by hot iron, by fire, and by combat. The ordeal by poison is used particularly by the peoples of West Africa. Europeans often required the accused to carry a ball of hot iron in his hand for a certain distance or to plunge his arm to the wrist or elbow into a caldron of boiling water. Festering on the third day proved guilt. JOHN P. DEVER

ORDINATION. The separation and commissioning of particular persons by the church for the work of the Christian ministry; but the outward calling by the congregation should correspond to and be consequent on the inward calling of the Holy Spirit. There is general consent that essential to the form of ordination are prayer and the laying on of hands, in accordance with what seems to have been the practice of the apostolic church. It is true that in the accounts of the calling of the Twelve (Mark 3:13ff.) and the commissioning of the Seventy (Luke 10:1ff.) it is not said that Christ prayed and laid hands on them; but this does not rule out the possibility that He did so. On the other hand, it might be concluded that a direct dominical commissioning rendered these acts unnecessary.

There is specific mention of prayer and the laying on of hands in connection with the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6:6) and the setting aside of Barnabas and Saul for the work of evangelism (Acts 13:3, where fasting is added). It is important to notice that the Seven were men "full of the Spirit and wisdom" as a prerequisite to, not a result of, their appointment, and that Barnabas and Saul were set apart by command of the Holy Spirit and were "sent on their way by the Holy Spirit" (Acts 13:2, 4; cf.6:3). Paul himself insists that it was Jesus Christ who appointed him to the ministry and that his apostleship came to him, not through men, but from God and by the will of God (see 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 1:1). To the same effect Christ assures His apostles that it was not they who had chosen Him, but He who had chosen and appointed them (John 15:16); and Paul admonishes the Ephesian elders to take heed to all the flock over which the Holy Spirit had made them bishops or overseers (Acts 20:28). In the Pastoral epistles, Paul refers to the charism which was given to Timothy by prophetic utterance when the elders laid their hands on him (1 Tim. 4:14; cf. 5:22; 2 Tim. 1:6) and instructs Titus to appoint elders in every town of Crete (Titus 1:5). Within the biblical perspective, then, ordination is primarily an act of God's calling and appointment, and only secondarily an act of the church, which by prayer seeks to know and follow the will of God. PHILIP EDGCUMBE HUGHES

ORGAN. Traditionally known as "the King of Instruments," the organ today stands as a remarkable example of artistry and craftmanship. The early Christians associated it with their Roman persecutors; it is in fact probable that Nero's famous performance during the burning of Rome was actually on a water-organ rather than the proverbial fiddle. By the Middle Ages, however, organs were evidently in regular use in churches, a detail we know from pictures and manuscripts of the time. Since then it has been the instrument par excellence of the church and for the praise and adoration of Almighty God. One reason for this is the enduring quality of organ tone. On any other instrument the tone is born, fades away, and dies. But organ sound endures as long as the power is there; the subtle suggestion of a timeless eternity is felt. Another reason is the ensemble effect of the organ: the many voices and colors of the organ give a full, rich sound impossible of achievement in any other way. This has always been so with the pipe organ; now at last it is beginning to be true also of the best of the electronic organs. No longer need the latter be considered a poor substitute for pipes; it has now, in at least a few fine examples, graduated to the position of being a musical instrument worthy of acceptance on its own terms.

The literature of the organ spans many centuries. The clean, bright sound of a well-voiced Diapason or Principal Chorus is ideal for the performance of contrapuntal music. The rich, more romantic sound of the massed strings gives life to music of the Romantic Era. The many varieties of flute, and the solo and chorus reed stops, enrich the tonal palette of the instrument. In considering specific repertoire for the instrument, the name of J.S. Bach* naturally comes first to mind. But there were towering giants both before and after this great man. Pachelbel, Buxtehude,* Sweelinck,* and many others are among the predecessors of Bach whose music is heard frequently today. Since Bach, the list is long and constantly growing. Franck, Mendelssohn,* Liszt,* Schumann, and Reger are a few of the names of great stature that come to mind.

Today composers are writing music of the future for the organ as well as writing in the older forms and styles. How enduring the "music of the future" will be remains to be seen—certainly it is in a language foreign to many music-lovers. Yet without this experimentation in new forms and styles the art of music would stagnate; all of us must be grateful to the pioneers.

One criticism frequently directed at the organ is that it is by definition a mechanical instrument. Because of this, some maintain it is impossible to project any very deep sense of emotion through organ music. This is quite untrue. Although the performer is not as close to his tone as is, for example, the violinist, the truly artistic organist who masters the technical demands of his instrument can transcend these difficulties and project not only the spirit of the music but, if he possesses the Holy Spirit, also the Spirit of God. This is essentially the aim of all Christian music: to be a vehicle for the Holy Spirit. The organ, because of its traditional affiliation with the church and more especially because of its tonal qualities, is ideally suited to this noble purpose. ROBERT ELMORE ORGANIC ARTICLES (1802). A French law unilaterally amending and implementing the Concordat of 1801,* to which it was attached without papal agreement. On grounds of concern for "public tranquility" (Concordat, Article 1), Napoleon hereby succeeded in seizing total control of the French Church, tightly centralized under the state. The law contained seventy-seven articles arranged under four main titles. Title 1 required all papal communications and papal representatives, but also decrees of general councils and any French national or diocesan synods, to receive state approval to be valid. The last three titles provided for a total reorganization of the French Church and seminary structures to conform to secular statist interests, including mandatory acceptance of the four Gallican Articles* (1682) in the seminaries, and minute regulation of worship and salaries. Although condemned by Pius VII and later popes, the Organic Articles remained law, with some parts disused, until 1905.

ORIGEN (Origenes Adamantius) (c.185-c.254). Alexandrian theologian. Most of the information about his life is found in the sixth book of Eusebius's* Ecclesiastical History; a panegyric by Gregory Thaumaturgus,* a disciple of Origen; Jerome's* Of Illustrious Men; and in the fragment of an apology written by Eusebius and Pamphilus.* Origen, born in Egypt and raised by Christian parents, studied under Clement* in the Catechetical School in Alexandria. During the persecution of Septimus Severus in 202, his father, Leonidas, was captured and martyred. Origen's wish to die with his father was prevented when his mother hid his clothes. He was able to continue his study after his father's death because of the generosity of a wealthy widow. He became, and remained for twenty-eight years, the head of the Catechetical School while pursuing an ascetic and extremely pious life. In his early manhood he apparently took the passage of Matthew 19:12 literally (cf. KJV) and castrated himself.

While in charge of the school in Alexandria he became famous, and according to Eusebius, thousands came to hear him, including many prominent pagans such as the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus. A wealthy convert allegedly hired secretaries to copy down his lectures and then published them. He studied with the father of Neoplatonic thought, Ammonius Saccas*; he traveled to Rome and heard Hippolytus.* During the persecution of Caracalla in 215, Origen went to Palestine where he was invited to preach by the bishops of Caesarea and Aelia. Bishop Demetrius* of Alexandria was displeased with this invitation to preach, since Origen was still a layman. Consequently Demetrius recalled Origen to Alexandria; Origen then devoted himself to writing. In 230 he was back in Palestine and ordained a priest by the same two bishops who had invited him to come the first time. This time Demetrius declared Origen deposed as a priest, deprived him of his teaching post in Alexandria, and exiled him. The deposition was generally not recognized outside Egypt.

Origen then established a school in Caesarea which became famous. He continued to preach and write. The persecution of Decius in 250 caught him, and he was put in chains and tortured, suffered the experience of the iron collar, was placed in stocks and confined to a dungeon. He did not survive long after this ordeal was over and he was released.

Origen was one of the Greek Fathers of the church. He is considered to be one of the first textual critics of the Bible; one of the first to set forth a systematic statement of the Faith; and one of the first Bible commentators. He was an effective apologist. From his own example and from some of his writings one can find some of the early principles that spawned the monastic movement. The number of his works varies from the 6,000 reported by Epiphanius* to 2,000 reported by Pamphilus to 800 reported by Jerome. Most of the works are lost although fragments survive and some have been discovered recently. His most famous works include the Hexapla—an edition of the OT in Hebrew, Greek, Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion,* all arranged in six columns. De Principiis is another of his important works, being one of the first systematic theologies. Book 1 of De Principiis deals with the Heavenly Hierarchy of the Father, Word, and Spirit and their relation to earthly beings; book 2 deals with the material world including the place of man, his fall, and his redemption; book 3 deals with the freedom of the will in its struggle with the forces of good and evil; book 4 deals with biblical hermeneutics and the literal, moral, and allegorical interpretation of Scripture.

On Prayer was written later in his life and discusses prayer in general and the Lord's Prayer specifically. Here Origen argues prayer is not a petition, but a participation in God's life. Contra Celsus demonstrates that Origen could argue against his opponents using their philosophical grounds to prove the contrary of their position. He was accused of Subordinationism* by Jerome and Epiphanius and condemned by some synods, such as the Synod of Constantinople of 543. Perhaps one should not take these rejections too seriously, since he was the first of the systematic theologians and a seminal thinker.

ORIGENISM. Doctrines attributed to Origen which later became controversial. Methodius of Olympus* (d.311) rejected most of Origen's speculations, especially his concept of human preexistence and the temporary character of the body, in Symposium and De Resurrectione. Origen was defended by Eusebius of Caesarea* and Pamphilus.* Eustathius* of Antioch (d.336) was another prominent anti-Origenist, but most of his arguments were based on Methodius.

The Nitrian monks of Egypt were strongly Origenist, and one, John, became bishop of Jerusalem. His Origenism was attacked by Epiphanius* of Salamis (c.310-c.403), who included Origenism among heresies enumerated in his On Heresies. Epiphanius persuaded Jerome,* previously an ardent defender of Origen, to become a violent opponent. John, however, refused to condemn Origenism. Jerome attacked Origen's doctrines of the resurrection body, the condition of souls, the devil's ultimate repentance, and the Trinity. Rufinus* of Aquileia, Jerome's friend, continued to support Origen and published a Latin translation of De Principiis (c.397), in which he injudiciously named Jerome's former allegiance to Origen, which Jerome furiously rebutted. Siricius* of Rome supported Rufinus, but his successor Anastasius condemned him. Meantime, the Council of Alexandria (400) had condemned Origenism, and Theophilus* of Alexandria expelled the Origenist monks, "the Tall Brothers," who found refuge with Chrysostom* in Constantinople.

The fierce disputes of Origenist and orthodox monks for the possession of the monasteries of St. Saba in Palestine led to the emperor Justinian's* famous letter to Mennas of Constantinople in which the "errors" of Origen were anathematized, including the preexistence of souls, the Incarnation, the resurrection body, and Restorationism.* A synod at Constantinople (543) issued an edict giving effect to this condemnation. The Origenists themselves were in two parties: the Protoktistae, who regarded the soul of Christ as not equal to other souls but divine; and the Isochristi, who held that at the final restoration all souls would become like Christ's. The Protoktists made common cause with the orthodox after renouncing the doctrine of preexistence. The fifth general council at Constantinople (553) listed Origen among ancient heretics. All bishops submitted except Alexander of Abila, who was deposed.

ORIGINAL SECESSION CHURCH. More properly "The Synod of United Original Seceders," this was constituted in Scotland in 1842. It was a union of various groups which were heirs of the Secession of 1733 from the Church of Scotland. The term "church" was not officially used, as they considered themselves in secession from the national church and not as a separate church. They rejoined the Church of Scotland in 1956. The original secession had taken place because Ebenezer Erskine* and others had felt inhibited from protesting effectively against abuses in the Church of Scotland, particularly patronage. This meant that ministers were presented to parishes by patrons instead of being elected by the congregations as the seceders demanded. Later the Seceders divided into "Burghers"* and "Antiburghers" over the rightfulness of taking the Burgess Oath professing the "true religion," and then into "Auld Lichts"* and "New Lichts" over the interpretation of the clauses in the Westminster Confession* regarding the civil magistrate.

HENRY R. SEFTON

ORIGINAL SIN. There are in the OT several acknowledgments and confessions of the universal sinfulness of man (Gen. 8:21; 1 Kings 8:46; Ps. 130:3), of resignation or penitence that man is born into an inevitable sinful condition (Ps. 51:5; Job 15:14; 25:4), and of the impossibility that for any man it can be otherwise (Job 4:17; 14:4). These texts are all expressions of the fact of original sin. Man seems to inherit this bondage from his birth. He seems to sin involuntarily and inveterately, and yet feels responsible for so doing. Before he wakens up to the seriousness of his struggle with evil, the battle is already lost. Sin not only develops within him, it also envelopes him. He finds his community life warped and inhuman in its ideals and even in the best zeal it can muster for its own reformation or revolution.

The Jewish rabbis were aware of such problems in a limited way, and attributed the universal sinfulness of man to the fall of the sons of God described in Genesis 6:1-4. Thereby, they believed, man has developed an evil impulse or imagination in the soul, exerting the strongest pressure toward sin (Gen. 6:5; 8:21). It was Paul who first linked up the phenomenon of original sin with the story of the fall in Genesis 3. In Paul's thought, the fall was modeled on salvation. Thinking back from Christ to Adam, he saw that as mankind was somehow totally involved and thus saved in Christ, so also mankind was somehow totally involved in the fall of Adam, the true significance of Adam being revealed in Christ. Paul (Rom. 5:12-21) is thus original in his clear explanation of the universality of sin, but brought to light what was already implied by the OT writer. The sins of all men are thus the unfolding of the original sin of Adam.

Jesus Himself does not formulate such a doctrine. Its full expression had to wait until the revelation of His cross. Yet He speaks and acts often in such a way as to imply it. All men are lost (Mark 2:17; Luke 19:10) and need forgiveness. They are all "evil" (Matt. 7:11; Luke 11:4). The things of man's nature are contrary to God (Mark 7:23). Paul, continuing the rabbinical doctrine of an evil impulse inborn in man, speaks of sin as seated in the "flesh" which through sin has become a principle radically antagonistic to God, lying behind all man's activity apart from the grace of God. James speaks of an overwhelmingly powerful "desire" or "lust" within man (James 1:13, 14; Gal. 5:16-24).

The doctrine of original sin has been the center of much theological controversy. Tertullian* coined the term "concupiscence" for man's inborn evil desire. Augustine* insisted that the phrase translated often "because all sinned" (Rom. 5:12) implied that all men subsisted in Adam when he sinned, and that his sin was their sin. We are condemned, not by our willing assent, but by our ancestry. Moreover, ever since the Fall, man has lost all capacity to obey the will of God. In concupiscence itself we have original sin. Pelagius denied the doctrine of Augustine, insisting that God did not demand more than man can render, that we are born without virtue or vice and are free to choose the goal of our lives. We can live sinless lives. He believed that sin consists of bad acts rather than of bad dispositions, and is caused by bad example and deficient education (see PELAGIANISM).

During the Middle Ages, original sin tended to be defined as the absence of original righteousness—the privation of supernatural grace through the Fall—rather than as concupiscence. The latter was interpreted as the temptation to fleshly lusts which could become the material of sin if assented to—a weakness which could be helped, or even healed, by works. Among the Nominalists the will was regarded as possessing a synteresis —a tiny motion toward God which could be trained into the love of God. The Reformers, following Luther,* returned to the Augustinian teaching, insisting that concupiscence affected the whole of human life, including the intellect and will, inclining man to evil in everything he does.

As to the transmission of sin, theologians like Origen* have thought in terms of a personal pretemporal fall for each individual. Tertullian regarded the whole race as seminally present in Adam, the corruption being passed on through propagation. Augustine recognized the importance of the latter view, but regarded the passing on of sin as the punishment of Adam's sin. Adam's sin was imputed to his posterity. When Covenant Theology* became popular in the seventeenth century, the imputation of Adam's guilt to his successors was emphasized as well as the transmission of corruption.

OROSIUS, PAULUS (early fifth century). Historian and presbyter. In 414 he fled Vandal invasions of his home in Spain, coming to Augustine of Hippo, young but already a presbyter. He provided Augustine with a treatise against the errors of both Priscillianists and Origenists. As trusted messenger, Orosius was sent by Augustine to Jerome* in Palestine, to assist in the indictment of the Pelagianists, but in 415 the Council of Diospolis upheld Pelagius. On Augustine's advice, Orosius composed a Christian world history in seven books, the philosophy of which, designed to explain Alaric's sack of Rome in 410, appears in its title: Adversum Paganos. The turning points in history which delimit his books became normative for subsequent authors. His material from 378 takes on value since his sources have not survived, as does his occasional citation of otherwise lost portions of Tacitus and the epitome of Livy. After the final date he deals with (417), Orosius himself disappears. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

ORR, JAMES (1844-1913). Scottish theologian. Born in Glasgow, he graduated from the university there and studied theology under the United Presbyterian Church.* He was minister of East Bank Church, Hawick (1874-91), taught church history in the UP theological college (1891-1901), and thereafter was professor of apologetics and theology in the United Free Church* college in Glasgow (having been one of the promoters of the union between his church and the Free Church). He was appreciated as a lecturer and popularizer of evangelical truth on both sides of the Atlantic. Writing in the heyday of liberal Protestantism, Orr contended for historic evangelicalism from the standpoint of "modified Calvinism," both by his exposition and defense of key doctrines (The Resurrection of Jesus, God's Image in Man, 1905; The Problem of the Old Testament, 1906; Revelation and Inspiration, 1919) and by his analysis of the dominant Ritschlian theology. His chief work in apologetics is A Christian View of God and the World (1893). He contributed also to *The Fundamentals (1909-15). PAUL HELM

ORTHODOX PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (formerly known as the "Presbyterian Church of America"). It was founded in 1936 after a long struggle within the Presbyterian Church in the USA between theological conservatives who sought to conform the denomination to its doctrinal constitution, the Westminster Confession* of Faith, and their opponents who were willing to tolerate theological "modernism."* The conservative group was led by J. Gresham Machen* who in 1929 left his professorship at Princeton Theological Seminary to found Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, and in 1933 founded "The Independent Board for Presbyterian Foreign Missions." This latter act brought the suspension of Machen and several others from the ministry, which in turn precipitated the schism. The Orthodox Presbyterian Church, a relatively small group, emphasizes strongly the infallibility of Scripture and faithfulness to traditional Presbyterian doctrine. The general assembly in 1975 approved a merger with the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Evangelical Synod, but the latter denomination voted against union.

GEORGE MARSDEN

ORTHODOXY (Gr. orthos, "right," "true"; doxa, "opinion"). The closest NT concept is "truth" and correct belief; the NT writers declare an orthodoxy revealed and governed by the Spirit of God. A determined attack has been mounted in modern times by critic after critic, attempting to prove that the early church was divided into many camps, and the original "message of Jesus" was either altered or utterly lost (see, e.g., TÜBINGEN SCHOOL). While it would be untenable to hold that all of the universal church will be agreed on all points, the standard of orthodoxy—the Word of God set forth in the first Christian century—continually demands that all else be measured by it. KEITH J. HARDMAN

ORTLIEB OF STRASSBURG. Early thirteenth-century leader of the Ortlibarii, an ascetic, heretical sect known also as the Ortlibenses and Ortlibians. He taught abstention from material things and guidance by one's inner spirit. Identifying pope and church with the apocalyptic harlot, his followers rejected ecclesiastical authority and necessity of the sacraments. Heretical on the doctrines of creation, resurrection, incarnation, and the Trinity, they were condemned by Innocent III. Their historical obscurity is attested by historians associating them with such varying groups as Waldensians, Cathari, Brethren of the Free Spirit, and Amalricians. The movement was seemingly short-lived and is best described in the so-called Passau Anonymous. JAMES DE JONG

OSIANDER, ANDREAS (1498-1552). German Reformer. Born at Gunzenhausen, near Nuremberg, he studied at the University of Ingolstadt and was ordained priest in 1520. He revised the Vulgate on the basis of the Hebrew text. As a reformer in Nuremberg he promoted the distribution of the Lord's Supper under both kinds (bread and wine.) With Lazarus Spengler he furthered the Lutheran movement in Nuremberg in its doctrinal and liturgical forms. As a participant in the Colloquy of Marburg* (1529) he sided with Luther and Melanchthon against Zwingli and Oecolampadius regarding the Lord's Supper. He attended also the Diet of Augsburg (1530). He frequently faulted Melanchthon, particularly after the signing of the Leipzig Interim (1548).

George von Brandenburg requested him to conduct the visitation in Brandenburg. The twenty-three articles of the Schwabacher Visitation of 1528 were expanded by him and Schleufner. The Brandenburg-Nuremberg Church Orders, which contained the sermons on Luther's Catechism, were translated into Latin by Jonas and became the so-called Cranmer's Catechism (1548). After Osiander's appointment as pastor and professor at Königsberg (1549), he attacked Melanchthon on forensic justification, setting forth that in justification the new believers become partakers of the divine nature. In the ensuing controversy Osiander received little support, and his views were repudiated in Article III of the Formula of Concord* (1577). Osiander is noteworthy too because he wrote the anonymous preface to the first edition of Nicholaus Copernicus's De Revolutionibus Orbium Caelestium.

OSWALD (c.605-642). King of Northumbria. He was the son of Ethelfrith. Fleeing to Scotland after his father's death in 616, he became a Christian through the work of the monks on Iona.* On the death of King Edwin in 633, he returned to Northumbria. After prayer, he gained a victory over the British king Cadwalla at Heavenfield, near Hexham. He was determined to establish the Christian faith in his kingdom, and sent to Iona for missionaries. The first sent was unsuccessful, but the second was Aidan,* who took up his see on Lindisfarne. Oswald worked with him and sometimes accompanied him on missionary journeys, acting as his interpreter. He was killed in a battle with the heathen king Penda of Mercia at Maserfield (now identified as Oswestry: "Oswald's Tree or Cross"). He was a fine example of a leader influencing his people, and his relationship with Aidan set a primitive pattern of church-state cooperation. R.E. NIXON

OSWALD (d.992). Archbishop of York. Of Danish birth, he spent some time in the Benedictine monastery of Fleury in France. In 961 he succeeded Dunstan* as bishop of Worcester. Prominent in the introduction of the Benedictine way of life, he gradually reformed the church in his diocese, especially tightening up discipline among the clergy. He established or refounded a number of monasteries, including that at Ramsey in Huntingdonshire. In 972 he was appointed to York, continuing to hold the see of Worcester in plurality. With Dunstan (archbishop of Canterbury) and Ethelwold (bishop of Winchester) he played a great part in the revival of monasticism in England in the period before the Norman conquest. R.E. NIXON

OTTERBEIN, PHILIP WILLIAM (1726-1813). Co-founder of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.* He was born in Prussia, son of a Reformed minister, studied at Herborn, and was ordained to the ministry of the Reformed Church. In 1752 he responded to an appeal from Michael Schlatter to do missionary work in America. While serving as pastor to the German Reformed congregation of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, he struggled earnestly in his attempts to preach a vital message, but felt inadequate in explaining how one might know the assurance of salvation. A moving spiritual experience brought him into a more complete awareness of salvation in Christ, and he began to preach with more power and effectiveness the need for every person to experience repentance and a new birth. He organized prayer meetings, trained laymen for evangelistic work, and worked closely with ministers of other denominations, including Methodist bishop Francis Asbury,* in whose consecration service he participated. Bishop and co-founder with Martin

Boehm* of the United Brethren in Christ (1800), he served as minister of the German Evangelical Reformed Church in Baltimore from 1774 until his death. HARRY SKILTON

OTTLEY, ROBERT LAWRENCE (1856-1953). Anglican theologian. Born at Richmond, Yorkshire, he was educated at Canterbury and Oxford, where he was successively vice-principal of Cuddesdon College, dean of divinity at Magdalen College, principal of Pusey House, and regius professor of pastoral theology. He contributed the article on Christian ethics to Lux Mundi,* pleading for a recognition of personality in the sphere of economics. His book The Doctrine of the Incarnation (1896) is an essay in both historical theology and kenotic Christology, while his Bampton lectures, Aspects of the Old Testament (1897), followed by The Hebrew Prophets (1898) and The Religion of Israel (1905), introduced advanced critical ideas to a large section of the Anglican clergy. A liberal High Churchman and a severe critic of liberal Protestantism, Ottley devoted his later years to writings on Christian morals and ethics. His Studies in the Confessions of St. Augustine (1919) is a notable product of this period. IAN SELLERS

OTTO (c.1060-1139). Bishop of Bamberg. Born in Swabia of noble parentage, he was educated in monastic schools and served at the courts of several Polish nobles before entering the service of Emperor Henry IV. About 1101 he was appointed chancellor, and in 1102 bishop of Bamberg, but was not consecrated until 1106. He was involved in the Investiture Controversy* and suspended from office for a time. Within his diocese Otto was very active in building churches and monasteries—some twenty monasteries are said to have been founded or renewed by him. He was called on as arbiter in several disputes. As emissary to Pomerania he was eminently successful in establishing Christianity among the Slavs then inhabiting that region. In 1189 he was canonized by Clement III. CARL S. MEYER

OTTO I (the Great) (912-973). German king and emperor. A member of the Saxon dynasty, he succeeded his father, Henry I, in 936. By emphasizing his position as head of the Christians in Germany, Otto revived Charlemagne's alliance of church and state. He reasserted the old Carolingian rights over the appointment and control of ecclesiastical lords, established new bishoprics in frontier districts to support missionary activities, and patronized to a limited extent the cultural and scholarly endeavors of the church. Otto's policy was that of giving political power to the church in order to counterbalance the secular lords.

In foreign affairs he kept France weak and divided, defeated the Magyars at the Lechfeld in 955, pursued a Germanization policy east of the Elbe River, and extended his control over Italy. His coronation by John XII in 962 marked the foundation of the Holy Roman Empire, a union of the Roman imperial title with the German kingship which included only Germany and part of Italy. Although the Ottonian empire was based on an alliance of church and state, the two partners' interests were by no means identical. Otto's action in deposing and replacing the unpopular John set a clear precedent for imperial control of the papacy. RICHARD V. PIERARD

OTTO, RUDOLF (1869-1937). German theologian. Born in Hanover, he was educated at Erlangen and Göttingen, and taught theology at Göttingen (1907-14), Breslau (1914-17), and Marburg (1917-37). His book Kantish-Friessche Religionsphilosophie (1909; ET The Philosophy of Religion, 1931) reflected what became one of his chief interests. Otto's major work, however, was Das Heilige (1917; ET The Idea of the Holy, 1923), in which he stressed an approach largely neglected by liberal Protestantism and greatly influenced contemporary thinking. Not unconnected with this was his effort to deepen public worship in Lutheranism. He wrote extensively also on Hinduism after travel in the East. J.D. DOUGLAS

OTTO OF FREISING (c.1111-1158). Bishop of Freising. Maternal grandson of Emperor Henry IV and son of Margrave Leopold III of Austria, Otto moved in imperial circles all his life. Supported by a benefice near Vienna, he studied in Paris, perhaps with Hugh of St.-Victor, Gilbert de la Porrée, and Abelard. He entered the Cistercian monastery of Morimund, became abbot there about 1137, and a year later was consecrated as bishop of Freising, Bavaria. In this capacity Otto instituted diocesan reforms, chartered several monasteries, stimulated study of Aristotle among German contemporaries, and joined Conrad III, a stepbrother, in the Second Crusade, 1147-48. His interpretive rather than factual chronicle of world history, Historia de duabus civitatibus (1143-46) modified Augustine's thesis in Civitas Dei. Otto began a contemporary history of Frederick Barbarossa, but died before its completion. JAMES DE JONG

OUEN (c.609-684). Archbishop of Rouen. Known also as Owen, Dadon, and Audoin, he was born in Sancy near Soissons and educated at the abbey of St. Médard. He served the Merovingian monarchs Clothaire II and Dagobert I. As the latter's able chancellor he established the monastery of Rabais in 634. On Dagobert's death, Ouen was ordained and in 641 was consecrated as archbishop of Rouen. He built churches and monasteries, fostered theological education, and undertook evangelization in a diocese still infested with paganism and barbarism. Still the diplomat, he supported Ebroin, mayor of the palace, against the aristocracy, and negotiated peace between the Franks of Neustria and Austrasia. A life of Eligius, a scholarly friend at Dagobert's court, may be Ouen's work. JAMES DE JONG

OVERBECK, FRANZ CAMILLE (1837-1905). Theologian and church historian. Professor of church history at Jena (1864-70) and of NT and early Christian history at Basle (1870-97), he was an advocate of a totally secular interpretation of church history and particularly of early Christian origins. Although he was a member of a Protestant faculty of theology, he was a professed atheist from about 1870 and was an indefatigable critic of both orthodox and liberal theology. He was a close friend of Friedrich Nietzsche.* Among his most significant writings are a large commentary on Acts (1870); Studien zur Geschichte der alten Kirche (1875); and Christentum und Kultur (posthumous. 1919). W. WARD GASQUE

OWEN, JAMES (1654-1706). Dissenting Academy* tutor. Born in Wales of a Cavalier family, he was educated at Carmarthen and at Samuel Jones's academy at Brynllywarch. He became a Nonconformist preacher and in 1676 was fined for holding an illegal conventicle. In that year he became private chaplain to Mrs. Baker at Swinney near Oswestry, and had oversight of the Dissenting congregation in the town. Owen was a close friend of Philip Henry,* and both engaged in public debate with Bishop William Lloyd of St. Asaph in 1681. In 1690 Owen opened his academy, and moved it in 1700 to Shrewsbury when he became fellow-minister there to Francis Tallents. Owen had a wide reputation as a tutor who ruled his students strictly and insisted that their conversation should be in Latin. He was in everything a moderate, as his books, Moderation a Virtue (1703) and Moderation still a Virtue (1704), show. He was a Congregationalist with definite Presbyterian sympathies. In theology he favored Richard Baxter's* form of Calvinism. It was Owen who provided the material Edmund Calamy* used in his Account when describing the ministers ejected in Wales. He published books in Welsh, and composed hymns, one or two of which are still in use.

See C. Owen, Some Account of the Life and Writings of James Owen (1709).

R. TUDUR JONES

OWEN, JOHN (1616-1683). An advocate of the Congregational way and a Reformed theologian, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. Because of the Laudian innovations he left Oxford in 1637. His first parish was Fordham, Essex, to which he went in 1643. At this time he was a moderate Presbyterian, but the reading of a book by John Cotton convinced him of the biblical basis of the Congregational way. In his next parish, Coggeshall, he formed a gathered church. In the Civil War his sympathies were wholly with Parliament and he accompanied Cromwell in expeditions to Ireland and Scotland in 1649-51 as a chaplain. In 1651 Parliament appointed him dean of Christ Church, Oxford. A year later Cromwell made him a vice-chancellor, a post he held until 1657.

From 1651 to 1660 he devoted his energies to the production of "godly and learned" men, and to the reform of the statutes and ceremonies of the university. During this period he was also influential in national affairs. Apart from serving on many committees he was the chief architect of the Cromwellian State Church. He helped to compose the Savoy Declaration* of Faith and Order (1658), and he wrote important books against Arminian and Socinian views. Ejected from Christ Church in 1660, he settled temporarily at Stadhampton, the village of his youth, and gathered a church in his home. For the next twenty-three years he was an acknowledged leader of Protestant Nonconformity. He was pastor of a church in London, friend and guide to many ejected ministers, defender of the legal rights of Dissenters, expounder of the Congregational way, biblical commentator, and devotional writer. His books were treasured by Nonconformists and have constantly been reprinted. He was buried in Bunhill Fields, London.

OXFORD CONFERENCE (1937). Second conference of the Life and Work movement held at Oxford under the general title "Church, Community and State." There were 425 delegates representing most churches apart from the Roman Catholics and the German Evangelical (the latter under Nazi control). Younger churches had only twenty-nine representatives. It was directed by J.H. Oldham,* secretary of the International Missionary Council,* who had organized the Edinburgh Conference,* 1910. The chairman was John R. Mott.* Its watchword was "Let the Church be the Church," and statements were made on religious freedom, the criteria for a responsible economic order, and the Christian attitude to war. It went far beyond the first conference at Stockholm* (1925) in theological acumen and depth of social analysis, and it laid the groundwork for an ecumenical social ethic. It emphasized that the church must guard its moral and spiritual integrity and render a true critique of all social systems, especially those of Western civilization which it might be inclined to defend uncritically. Concurrently with the Faith and Order Conference (Edinburgh,* 1937) it proposed the formation of the World Council of Churches,* in which the concerns of both movements were integrated. A report was issued later that year under the title The Churches Survey Their Task.

OXFORD GROUP. Later called "Moral Re-Armament," the movement was instituted by Frank Buchman* as a moral and spiritual force to transform men and societies. The founder promoted spiritual conversion through the techniques of confession, surrender, guidance, and sharing. These techniques lead to the four absolute standards of life: absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, absolute honesty, and absolute love. The application of these principles through the Moral Re-Armament movement has brought Buchman decorations from France, Germany, Greece, Japan, the Republic of China, the Philippines, Thailand, and Iran for outstanding services rendered. Prime Minister Holyoake of New Zealand said, "He has done as much as any man of our time to unite the peoples of the world by cutting through the prejudices of color, class, and creed."

After a period of working out experimentally basic principles in the art of remaking men, Buch-man became convinced that the backbone of Christianity was a set of absolute moral standards and that men needed the courage to pursue these. In 1921 he embarked on the task of raising an army of men and women to overcome the world-wide breakdown of morals. Using the method of spiritual house parties where discussions, meditations, testimonies, recreation, quiet hours, and public confessions were the order of the day, Buchman began to appeal to students at many of the great universities—Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Oxford, and Cambridge. In 1928 he took a team of Rhodes scholars to South Africa, and while they were there the South African press referred to them as "the Oxford Group." The label became the name of Buchman's movement for the next ten years. Late in 1938 a new worldwide program was launched under a new label of Moral Re-Armament.

The Moral Re-Armament movement has produced hundreds of thousands of supporters around the world. Greatest success has come in England, Switzerland, Germany, Africa, and the USA. Greatest appeal has been to the very wealthy, but many people with more modest incomes have participated. Buchman's success can be attributed in part to his ability to train others and his use of drama, musicals, and films to present his message. The "Up With People" program has been especially popular in the United States and Germany. The corporate headquarters and finance office are located in New York, but various centers are located throughout the USA and the world. Two international training centers are located in Caux, Switzerland, and Odawara, Japan. Although the movement has its devoted crusaders, there is no claim of denominational status; rather, the movement claims to be "an expeditionary force from all faiths and races. . . ."

Peter Howard* assumed the leadership of the worldwide operations upon the death of Buchman in 1961. Howard died in 1965. The organization is now administered by a group of directors.

OXFORD MOVEMENT. The title given to the movement within the Church of England which opposed the growth of liberalism in the mid-nineteenth century. It had its roots in the High Church party of the seventeenth century. It was influenced by the Romantic Revival in its veneration of the medieval. Its leaders, such as J.H. Newman,* J. Keble,* and E.B. Pusey* (some of whom came from Evangelical families), were all members of Oriel College, Oxford, in the 1820s.

The movement began with an attack on the English government's bill to reduce the number of bishoprics of the Church of Ireland. Keble preached a sermon entitled "National Apostasy" in St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, in 1833. He saw the state's action as an attack on the church and a direct disavowal of the sovereignty of God. In their efforts to revive the church, the leaders of the movement published the first of the Tracts for the Times (1833). The name Tractarianism* soon attached to the movement. In its resistance to liberalism in the church, the appointment of R.D. Hampden as regius professor of divinity in the University of Oxford was opposed unsuccessfully in 1836. The movement created wider hostility as it became clear that its teaching ran counter to the spirit of the Reformation. Despite the publication of Tracts against Roman Catholic teaching, the anti-Reformation tendency seemed to be confirmed by the publication of R.H. Froude's* Remains in 1838-39. The revelation of Froude's spiritual and ascetic practices and his attacks on the Reformers incited a Protestant reaction. In Oxford this took the form of raising a subscription for a memorial to the Oxford martyrs of the Reformation.

From 1840 onward, part of the movement led by Newman moved in a Roman Catholic direction. In 1841 he published Tract 90 in which he argued for a Roman Catholic interpretation of the Thirty-Nine Articles. While the other leaders of the movement approved the Tract, they were startled by the instant storm of opposition. From 1843 Newman began to withdraw from the leadership of the movement. The condemnation of W.G. Ward's The Ideal of a Christian Church in 1845 by the University of Oxford led to the reception of some members of the movement into the Roman Catholic Church. At the end of 1845 Newman himself became a convert.

The defection of Newman marked the end of the dominance of Oxford in the movement. While Pusey, an Oxford professor, remained prominent, the titles "Anglo-Catholic" and "Ritualist" marked a new phase in the movement. The main interest of the Oxford Movement was in a revival of a high doctrine of the church and its ministry. The revival of ceremonial that later attached to the movement stemmed from the Cambridge Camden Society. In pursuing its goal the movement adopted such practices as frequent Communion, confession, and the renewal of the monastic life, which in time greatly affected the character of the Church of England.

OXYRHYNCHUS PAPYRI. In 1897 and thereafter numerous fragments of Greek papyri were discovered at Oxyrhynchus, one of the chief cities of ancient Egypt, by two archaeologists, B.P. Grenfell and A.S. Hunt. The most important finds are three collections of the sayings of Jesus, Numbers 1, 654, and 655. The close similarity of these texts to the Coptic text of the *Gospel of Thomas suggests that the Oxyrhynchus papyri are fragments of a Greek version of this gospel.

OZANAM, ANTOINE FRÉDÉRIC (1813-1853). French Catholic literary historian; founder of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul (1833, 1835) to work among the poor. The society, formed at first by students of the Sorbonne in Paris and composed exclusively of nonclergy, was more than mere charity, but an instrument to implement genuine social regeneration according to Catholic faith. Ozanam published (1831) his rejection of the social principles of Saint-Simon,* and later worked out the beginnings of Catholic societal theory in lectures as professor of law in Lyons (1839). He was open to participation in the new democratic republic (1848), but without absorbing its secularist basis as did Lamennais,* his contemporary. With Lacordaire* he established a newspaper Ère nouvelle to promote his ideas; he wrote for Montalembert's Correspondent. By the time of his death, the society had nearly 3,000 chapters in Europe, Africa, the Near East, and North America. As a literary historian he won a professorship in foreign literature at the Sorbonne (1844), published creative studies of Dante (1839), early Franciscan poetry (1852), and a history of Christian civilization among the Franks (1849). His education included doctorates in law (1836) and literature (1839).

PACHOMIUS (c.287-346). Egyptian pioneer of cenobitic monasticism. After a pagan upbringing at Latopolis in the Upper Thebaid, he was won to Christianity while a military conscript by the kindness of the Christians of Thebes, and after his release was baptized at Chenoboskion (Shenesit, near Nag Ḥammadi). For a few years he learned the solitary life under the anchorite Palamon before settling at the abandoned village of Tabennisi c.320 to fulfill his vision of an ascetic koinōnia patterned on the primitive Jerusalem community. By the time of his death thousands of monks in eleven monasteries within a radius of sixty miles to north and south along the Nile (not all of his foundation, some apparently antedating Tabennisi), including two for women (his sister Mary followed his example), obeyed his direction as superior of the congregation, observed his rudimentary rule, and gathered each Easter and August in general assembly at Pboou, his second settlement and headquarters from c.337.

Details of his life and evolving Pachomian monasticism remain contested while the value of various sources, especially Greek and Coptic Lives, is still debated. The Rule, which survives complete only in Jerome's Latin version, consists of four series of Pracepta and grew up as a collection of ad hoc regulations not only in Pachomius's lifetime but also under his successors Theodore (d.368) and Horsiesius (d.380). The moderate regime reflects the continuing appeal of the solitary ideal. The monasteries appear as self-sufficient, profitable agricultural colonies or manufacturing complexes, whose hierarchical organization perhaps bears a military stamp. Within the enclosure the monks were allotted according to their skills to houses of thirty-to-forty each which formed the basic unit of community life. Instruction in and memorizing of Scripture were prominent, two daily offices and a weekly Eucharist, were observed though Pachomius resisted ordained monks. His achievement, which through the Rule exerted a wide influence in East and West, still left to Basil the Great* a nobler realization of Christian ideals of community and service.

PACIAN (c.310-c.390). Bishop of Barcelona. He was praised for his learning, sanctity, and pastoral zeal in Jerome's De Viris Illustribus. Three authentic works of Pacian are known: De Baptismo, a sermon to catechumens; Contra Novatianos, three letters to Symphronian, who propagated Novatiansim, in which Pacian defended the Catholic doctrine of forgiveness (in the first letter appears the famous epigram, "My name is Christian; my surname is Catholic"); and Paraenesis ad Poenitentiam, an earnest plea for penitence.

PACIFISM. Although this term is usually related to the renunciation of war by the individual or a nation, it admits of no single definition. Historic or biblical pacifists argue their case on biblical grounds, but modern pacifists seem to confront the problem more on moral and philosophical bases. Currently the term "pacifist" is regularly reserved for anyone who renounces all war, specifically wars fought with modern weapons.

Historic or biblical pacifists, such as Quakers and Mennonites, have based their beliefs on the words of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7). The NT message may not be quite as explicit as some pacifists advocate. The basic message is one of peace among men of good will (Luke 2:14) and brotherhood, but Christ warns that He had come to bring a sword, not peace (Matt. 10:34). It is clear that He used some physical force when driving the merchants from the Temple (John 2:14-16). To add to this ambivalence, Paul wrote: "If it is possible, as far as it depends on you, live at peace with everyone" (Rom. 12:18), but he also advocated the use of the sword in defense of the state (Rom. 13:4). After Constantine's rapprochment with Christianity, Christians served in the army, and in medieval times Aquinas upheld the "just war" idea. The Anabaptists of the Reformation generally renounced war on biblical grounds.

The first widespread peace movement emerged after the Congress of Vienna (1814-15) and was the forerunner of many more to come. Some were dedicated to the personal rejection of all war; others advocated a progressive extermination of war through education, arbitration, and international organization. The mid-nineteenth-century wars brought most of these movements to an abrupt halt. During the latter part of the century, the Russian author of War and Peace, Leo Tolstoy,* emerged as an advocate of pacifism.

A strong peace movement also rode the tides of political optimism into the early 1900s in both Europe and the United States. The American Peace Society claimed such members as Andrew Carnegie, J.R. Mott,* and W.J. Bryan.* World War

I soon brought the capitulation of the society; patriotism and the "just war" philosophy won the day. Great Britain was less hysterical in its reactions and eventually recognized the conscientious objections to war of thousands of citizens. The Fellowship of Reconciliation,* the world's largest modern peace organization, was organized in England (1914).

Peace movements reached an all time high in popularity between 1914 and 1939. In England in the latter year the Peace Pledge Union claimed more than 100,000 members pledged never again to support war. Reinhold Niebuhr* joined the pacifist movement, but later resigned and founded his own group, Christian Action, and actively professed a "just war" doctrine. The USA and Britain recognized the conscientious objector more readily during World War II. In the USA, 12,000 were assigned to civilian public service camps and 25,000 more served in the armed forces as noncombatants; 6,000 were in prison. Britain's figures showed nearly 24,000 in civilian work and more than 17,000 noncombatants.

After 1945 the peace churches emphasized world relief programs, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation reported worldwide organizational growth. The total postwar peace movement was, however, quantitatively smaller, but committed to total disarmament, nuclear pacifism, and nonviolence, more on philosophical than on biblical grounds.

JOHN P. DEVER

PAGE, KIRBY (1890-1957). Social evangelist and author. Born in Texas, he was a Disciples of Christ minister who, after service with the YMCA in World War I and a brief term as pastor in New York City, turned to writing and lecturing to combat what he assumed were society's ills: war and capitalism. In addition to many tracts and articles, he wrote such books as Christianity and Social Problems (1921); War—Its Causes, Consequences, and Cure (1923); and Jesus and Christianity (1929). Pacifist and socialist, he represented many Protestants in the 1919-41 period, notably those who had been disillusioned by the Versailles Treaty and modern industrialism. The rise of Neoorthodoxy* and welfare capitalism in the 1930s, however, left Page with an ever-diminishing audience. DARREL BIGHAM

PAGNINUS, SANTES (1470-1536). Dominican scholar and disciple of Savonarola.* Born at Lucca, Italy, he went to Rome in 1516, was in Avignon from 1523 to 1526, and thereafter in Lyons. It was in the latter place that he finished his Latin version of the Bible made from the original languages. He compiled in 1529 a Hebrew lexicon (Thesaurus linguae sanctae) which was often reprinted. His Bible, republished in 1541 and 1564, was better then the Vulgate, but was not intended to supersede it. In 1542 Michael Servetus re-edited and used the Bible with notes to further his own views.

PAINE, THOMAS (1737-1809). Deistic writer and political propagandist. Born in Thetford, Norfolk, he had a monotonous life as corset maker, exciseman, teacher, and grocer until he sailed to America in 1774 with letters of introduction from B. Franklin.* In 1776 he published Common Sense, the 500,000 copies of which argued for a republic: "it must come to that some time or other." He was secretary to the foreign affairs commission in 1778-79. He returned to England in 1787, and 1792 was indicted for treason on publication of his book The Rights of Man. He escaped to France, where he had been made a citizen, and was elected to the Convention. The Age of Reason was published there (1794-96). This brought suspicion and imprisonment and roused British and colonial indignation with its Deistic arguments. He returned to America in 1802 and died there seven years later, having alienated most of his friends by his unpredictable allegiances.

PAKISTAN. In the first century, Greek traders used Barbarike, at the mouth of the Indus, for the export of Chinese silk and leather, Persian turquoise, and spikenard from Kashmir. The Acts of Thomas, * written about 230, is clearly fiction, but may contain echoes of a tradition that Thomas followed this trading route, and it is possible that he preached at Taxila during the reign of Vindafarna (Gondaphoros), about A.D. 20-48. About 196, Bardaisan speaks of Christians among the Kushans, whose empire included the Punjab. Attendance records at synods of the (Nestorian) Church of the East between 410 and 775 show an organized church in Afghanistan, with a metropolitan at Herat, and seven bishops south and east as far as Kandahar, but give no such proof of bishops in West Pakistan. Cosmas Indicopleustes writes of Christians among "the rest of the Indians" in 525, after speaking of Malabar* and Kalyan. In 1321 Friar Jordan does not speak of Christians further north than Broach in Gujarat, but in 1430 Niccolo di Conti states that "the Nestorians are scattered all over India, as the Jews among us." Probably there were unorganized groups of Christians in West Pakistan, engaged in trade, but there is no evidence of an organized church, and no certain Christian remains.

Armenian traders, soldiers, and artisans settled in Lahore from 1601, built a church, and for a time had a bishop. Lahore had an Armenian Christian governor in the 1630s, and in 1735 Armenians were "the elite of the Mughal army." An Armenian founder made the famous Zam-Zammah ("Kim's gun"). After 1750 the community dwindled, and there is no trace today of the organized church. From at least 1714 there were Armenians in Dacca, and their beautiful church (1781) is still extant. They were pioneers in the jute trade, but after 1947 most of them left East Pakistan.

Before 1600, Jerome Xavier and other Jesuit missionaries followed the court of Akbar the Great when he moved to Lahore. A church was built and many converts made, but in 1632 Shah Jehan closed the church, and it cannot be traced today. Louis Francis began Carmelite work in Thatta, Sind, in 1618, built a church and monastery, and in four years baptized some converts. Augustinians followed in 1624, but with the waning of Portuguese power all missionaries were withdrawn by 1672, and no trace of churches or Christian communities has survived. In East Pakistan there were chaplains in Chittagong from 1534, but Jesuit missionary work there (1598-1602) had to be abandoned because of political opposition to the Portuguese. Evangelism carried out in the Dacca area by Antony, an enslaved Rajah's son liberated by a missionary, was followed up by Jesuit missionaries in 1678-84, and though the missionaries had to withdraw, and many converts reverted to Hinduism, a church was established which has remained to this day.

In more modern times William Carey* preached in Dinajpur District between 1794 and 1800. Baptist work was begun in Dinajpur in 1800 by an ex-Catholic; in Jessore and Khulna in 1812; and in Barisal in 1829. The Church Missionary Society began work in Kushtia District in 1821, and about 5,000 baptisms followed a severe famine. Other missions followed. Since 1947 there have been small tribal movements in the Garo Hills, Sylhet, and the Chittagong Hill Tracts. The typical East Pakistan Christian (now, of course, a citizen of Bangladesh) is a clerk, artisan, mechanic, or small trader. In 1961 there were about 100,000 Roman Catholics, 40,000 Baptists, and 10,000 Anglicans in that area.

In West Pakistan, American Presbyterians began work in Lahore in 1849, followed by the (Anglican) CMS (1851), American United Presbyterians (1855), and Church of Scotland (1857). Roman Catholic work was resumed in 1843 in Karachi and 1852 in Lahore. The events of 1857 led to the death of Thomas Hunter, the first Church of Scotland missionary, with his wife and son, in Sialkot. In the mid-1870s a mass movement began among low-caste people in the Punjab, which brought thousands into the church, but slowed down after 1915. Since 1947 there have been group movements, especially among the Kohlis in Sind, and the Marwaris in Bahawalpur. In 1961 there were 584,000 Christians in West Pakistan, of whom perhaps three-fifths were Protestants.

In 1970 Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, and some Presbyterians united to form the Church of Pakistan, which claimed a membership of 200,000 in both sections of the country. The other main Protestant denominations in West Pakistan are Presbyterian, Salvation Army, and Seventh-Day Adventist. The church is drawn mainly from the lower stratum of the population, and though it has an increasingly educated leadership, it plays little part in the political life of the country.

The former East Pakistan became at the end of 1971 the independent state of Bangladesh ("The Land of Bengal"), and this densely populated area with seventy-five million people presented a new challenge to Christian missions. There were only 200,000 professed Christians in the country, half of them Roman Catholic. There is a Muslim majority, a Hindu minority. There were fears that the new state would be influenced by India's hostile attitude toward missionary work, but there have been reports also of a growing interest in Christianity, especially among Hindus. Many missionary societies were heavily involved in the extensive relief operations mounted after the end of the nine-month struggle.

PALESTINIAN SYRIAC TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. An Aramaic version used by Palestinian Christians and now preserved mainly in lectionaries; only the modified Estrangelo script may properly be called Syriac. It was begun about the beginning of the fifth century to meet the needs of Christians whose liturgy had been in Greek; alternatively, it may have originated with the secession of the Malkites from the Monophysite Syrian Church after the christological controversies of the fifth century. The version is independent of the Syriac translations identified with Edessa. Its underlying Greek text is of the Lucianic type, but it preserves many non-Byzantine variants; the influence of the Peshitta is often perceptible. ROBERT P. GORDON

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI SANTI DA (1525-1594). Italian composer. Palestrina (the name is actually that of the composer's native town) went early in life to Rome as a choirboy, but returned to Palestrina as organist, where he married and where his talented older sons were born. Most of his life was spent in Rome, however, where he held several important church appointments. The tragic death of his older sons and wife through an epidemic seemed for a time to stifle his genius. After his remarriage he became involved in his second wife's fur business for a time, but soon returned to music and to his greatest achievements.

His role in the musical developments of the Counter-Reformation have been romanticized and misrepresented. There is in his music, however, a consistent blend of seriousness and serenity, and the adherence to a disciplined technique which undoubtedly contributed to making it the traditional ideal of true church style to later generations. The demythologizing which has accompanied modern musicological research has tended toward an underestimate of Palestrina's true worth. His often-performed Sicut cervus (Ps. 42: 1,2) and his eight-part Stabat Mater are among his most representative works that are heard today. The short and popular O Bone Jesu is spurious.

Palestrina left over 250 motets, some of the most beautiful being on texts from the Song of Solomon. Lassus is considered his superior in this genre, but as a composer of Masses, Palestrina has no peer. Over one hundred of them survive. The little Missa Brevis and the majestic Missa Papae Marcelli are the best known, but are only two among many masterpieces. The latter was written before the Council of Trent and not as a demonstration piece for that august body, as was long believed. It is nevertheless true that Palestrina was one of the great musical voices of the Counter-Reformation. J.B. MAC MILLAN

PALEY, WILLIAM (1743-1805). Anglican scholar; archdeacon of Carlisle from 1780. Educated at Cambridge, he gained fame through his books, several of which had long-lasting influence as textbooks, especially in his own university, though their power to convince was eroded in the nineteenth century by scientific and philosophical developments. He was not an original or subtle thinker, but was an "unrivalled expositor of plain arguments." He claimed that his works formed a system; his thought drew upon and reflected the main elements of English theology as molded by eighteenth-century controversies. His Natural Theology (1802) sought to prove the being and goodness of God from the order of the world; the Evidences of Christianity (1794) argues on both internal and external grounds that Christianity is the true revelation of God; his Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785), based on Cambridge lectures, is concerned, like several other works, with the duties resulting from natural and revealed religion. Here his utilitarianism anticipated Bentham, except that Paley retained a supernatural sanction. Paley took a lax view of subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles,* perhaps he inclined to Unitarianism at certain points, and he was a conservative apologist for the Church of England and the British Constitution. Nevertheless the sincerity and strength of his faith has too often been underestimated.

PALLADIUS (c.363-425). Bishop and historian. Evidently a native of Galatia, he entered monastic life in Jerusalem at the age of twenty-three, and later went to Egypt to follow the ascetic life, first in Alexandria, then in the Nitrian Desert.* Returning to Palestine in 399 through illness, he was consecrated bishop of Helenopolis (400) by his friend John Chrysostom.* He appeared with the latter at the Synod of the Oak* (403) and in trying to defend Chrysostom's banishment was himself exiled to Egypt (406), where at Syene he almost certainly wrote the important Dialogus de vita Sancti Joannis Chrysostomi. He returned to his diocese when all opposition ceased (412), and five years later was transferred to the diocese of Aspuna, where he wrote Historia Lausiaca (419-20), a significant treatment of early monasticism. Epistola de Indicis gentibus et de Bragmannibus, which cannot, however, be confirmed as his, suggests a trip to India, and deals with the ascetical ideal. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PALLADIUS (fifth century). Missionary to Ireland. Native of Gaul and disciple of Germanus at Auxerre, he was sent as a delegate from Auxerre to Rome in 429. He made a good impression on Celestine and was commissioned by him to go to Ireland. The wording of the commission, recorded in the Chronicle of Prosper of Aquitaine, is significant: "Palladius, ordained by Pope Celestine, is sent as the first Bishop of the Scots who believe in Christ." The date was 431; the inference, that there were Christians in Ireland before the days of Patrick; the purpose, to combat the errors of Pelagius. Palladius had partial success on landing at Wicklow, and three churches were founded. But the hostility of Chief Nathi and the general unbelief of the people discouraged him and he left no enduring impression on Ireland or her church. He decided to return to Rome, but died in Britain on the way.

ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

PALLADIUS, PEDER (1503-1560). Danish bishop and Reformer. Seized by the Reformation movement about 1530, he pursued theological studies at Wittenberg (1531-37) where he became closely connected with Melanchthon and Bugenhagen. On the latter's recommendation Palladius was appointed the first Evangelical bishop of Zealand, the main diocese of Denmark. From 1538 he was also a professor of theology at the University of Copenhagen. As a man of solid theological learning, endowed with great administrative talents, and as a gifted and eloquent popular preacher, Palladius was highly qualified for the task of carrying out the Reformation in the local congregations. He worked at this with untiring energy and zeal; a very interesting and famous memorial of this is his Book of Visitations, with its many examples of blunt application of Evangelical teaching upon various life situations. Palladius was also the author of the 1556 Service Book and had a share in the translation of Christian III's Danish Bible (1550). N.O. RASMUSSEN

PALMER, BENJAMIN MORGAN (1818-1902). Presbyterian minister. Born in Charleston, South Carolina, he received degrees from the University of Georgia and Columbia Theological Seminary, served as pastor from 1841 to 1853, then became professor of ecclesiastical history and polity at Columbia Seminary. He preferred the pastorate, however, and in 1856 accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, where he remained until his death. Regarded as one of the great ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church, he was the first Presbyterian moderator under the Confederacy in 1861, and defended slavery.

PALMER, WILLIAM (1803-1885). Theologian and ecclesiastical antiquary. A graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and Magdalen, Oxford, he became a fellow of Worcester College, Oxford. In 1832 he wrote Origines Liturgicae, a learned treatise on the history of English liturgy. This brought him into touch with Keble,* Froude,* J.H. Newman,* and other Tractarian leaders. He was a rigid High Churchman and a doughty controversialist, who strongly opposed both Roman Catholicism and Dissent, and wrote against Cardinal Wiseman and others. His Narrative of Events connected with the Publication of Tracts for the Times precipitated the crisis which led to the secession of W.G. Ward and Newman from the Anglican Church. He was prebendary of Salisbury, 1849-58, and assumed the title of baronet on his father's death in 1865. J.G.G. NORMAN

PAMMACHIUS (d.410). Aristocrat and senator, he studied at Rome with Jerome.* When his wife died, he took monastic vows while remaining in the senate, and gave to the poor and the church. He helped Fabiola* establish a hostel for sea-travelers at Portus and left his home as a church (discovered in the Church of SS. John and Paul). Although he found Jerome's letter against Jovinian* too violent, he encouraged Bishop Anastasius (400) to condemn Origenism.* Jerome translated for him Origen's Peri Archon and dedicated to him such books as his commentaries on the Minor Prophets (406) and Daniel (407). He encouraged Numidians to return from Donatism* to the Catholic Church (401). He died in the siege of Rome by Alaric. G.T.D. ANGEL

PAMPHILUS (c.250-310). Christian martyr. Born in a wealthy home in Beirut, he pursued Hellenistic studies and engaged in Phoenician public affairs until his conversion to asceticism, philanthropy, and biblical studies. Tutored by Pierius at Alexandria, he moved to Palestinian Caesarea, where he founded a Christian school and restored the library of Origen, recopying biblical manuscripts, in particular the Hexapla edition of the Septuagint, and recovering the writings of Origen and others. His devoted pupil Eusebius of Caesarea* adopted the name "son of Pamphilus," wrote his life (not extant), and panegyrized him in the "Martyrs of Palestine." Arrested under Maximin Daza, he spent fifteen months in prison, working especially on five books of an Apology of Origen, to which Eusebius added a sixth. Pamphilus was beheaded early in 310.

G.T.D. ANGEL

PANTAENUS (d. c.190). First known head of the Catechetical School at Alexandria. He left no written indications of his own work or thought, but made a significant impact on the development of church theology. The direct succession from him provides the source of information. Clement's metaphor of the Sicilian bee makes probable his place of origin. His Christianity had taken him as missionary evangelist as far east as India. He is dated by the direct role he played as teacher of Clement (who succeeded him in 190) and of Alexander* (who studied under them both). Origen may have been too young to have been taught directly by him, but his martyred father was Pantaenus's contemporary and of like mind. Pantaenus's philosophy was Stoicism and his literary interests classical. Considering the exegetical writings of his successors, this would account not only for their strong emphasis upon a divine literature, but also for their allegorical methodology in interpreting the same. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PANTALEON (d. c.305). Christian martyr. Nothing certain is known of him, but he is said to have been physician to Emperor Galerius of Nicomedia. Converted in early life through his mother, he fell away through the worldly court life, but was restored to faith through one Hermolaus. He suffered martyrdom under Diocletian's purge of Christians from the court. His cult has been very popular, especially in the East, and he is regarded as one of the patron saints of physicians.

PANTHEISM. The view that the universe is to be identified with God, i.e., that there is only one reality, alternately describable as "God" or "nature." Pantheism is clearly incompatible with the Christian view of creation and of the creature-Creator distinction so fundamental to Christian theology. In the tradition of Western culture, Spinoza* is the classic exponent of pantheism, but it is capable of a great diversity of expression, such as materialistic pantheism (d'Holbach), or psychological or mystical pantheism as in some Eastern religions. Pantheism is also an important strand in absolute idealism (e.g., Josiah Royce's The Conception of God, 1893) and in the Romanticism of Goethe* and Lessing.* There are interesting remarks of a pantheistic kind in the early philosophical jottings of Jonathan Edwards.* The term "pantheism" is first used in Toland's Socinianism Truly Stated (1705). PAUL HELM

PAPAL LEGATE, see NUNCIO AND LEGATE

PAPAL STATES. From 756 to 1870, certain civil territories in Italy acknowledged the pope as their temporal ruler. Constantine* probably gave the Lateran Palace to the Church of Rome after 321, when it could legally own property. By 600, gifts of large estates formed the Patrimony of Peter,* around which grew the legend that Constantine had donated these lands to Pope Sylvester I. A forged document called "The Donation of Constantine"* buttressed these claims until proven a forgery in the fifteenth century. Laurentius Valla in particular exposed the use of oriental language such as "satraps" to describe fourth-century Rome.

Until the eighth-century dispute over Iconoclasm, the largest papal estates were in Sicily. Even with the loss of these properties to the Byzantine emperor, the pope still controlled more land than any other person in Italy. The Isle of Capri, Gaeta, Tivoli, and other properties in Tuscany and about Ravenna and Genoa speak of wealth and trouble. Pope Gregory I* used his income for charitable purposes as well as food for Rome. From the sixth to eighth centuries the popes supported Byzantine authority at Ravenna against the Lombards.

Under Gregory II,* the Roman popes filled the vacuum left by Byzantine collapse in central Italy. The exarchate about Ravenna and the duchy of Rome were central, especially the Pentapolis (Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, Ancona) and the fortress city of Perugia. When the Lombard king Liutprand* cut off Perugia in 738, Gregory II turned to Charles Martel.*

Pope Stephen II* (III) left Rome in 753 to travel to St.-Denis. There in January 754 he anointed Pepin,* giving him and his sons the title "Patrician of the Romans." Pepin promised in writing to give certain territories to the pope. Lands in central Italy perhaps stem from this last document of 754. In the summer of that year Pepin forced the Lombard king Aistulf to give up the Pentapolis and the exarchate. Pepin obtained such a deed for the pope, only to find necessary a second invasion and deed in 756. Pepin founded the States of the Church when in 756 he refused to return the territories wrested from the Lombards to the Byzantines. The pope was freed from foreign interference and entered into alliance with the West. In 781 Charlemagne* guaranteed to Pope Adrian I* the Pepin donations. The coronation of Charlemagne in 800 cemented this policy.

After this independence and Western policy the Papal States provoked a bitter quarrel among Roman nobility for control of this temporal authority and the papacy itself, and this in turn entailed internal turmoil for the church. Poverty of mind and political opportunism describe papal affairs until the sack of Rome in 1527. In modern times, papal administration or arbitration of direct control led one conqueror after another into central Italy, from Charles VIII of France and the emperor Charles V to Napoleon Bonaparte. The Congress of Vienna returned the confiscated properties of 1798, the Roman Republic, to the pope in 1815. The Austrians protected these properties until, first in 1846 under Massimo d'Azeglio and finally under Garibaldi from 1860, foreign influence ended. Italian troops of the Risorgimento entered Rome on 20 September 1870. On 13 May 1871, the Vatican, Lateran, and Castel Gandolfo were declared to be papal territory. Pius IX refused to accept the Papal Guarantee, though under Mussolini Pius XI* signed the Lateran Pact on 11 February 1929. After 1944 this pact became part of the Republican Constitution.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

PAPHNUTIUS (d. c.360). Bishop of Upper Thebaid, Egypt. A monk, and disciple of Antony,* he was badly mutilated during the persecution of Maximin Daza (305-13), and Constantine is said to have kissed his seared eye before the Council of Nicea (325). According to Socrates and Sozomen he dissuaded that council from enforcing celibacy on the clergy. He supported Athanasius* at the Synod of Tyre (335), walking out in protest at the unjust proceedings.

PAPIAS (c.60-c.130). Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. Said to be "a man of primitive age, a hearer of John [the apostle], a companion of Polycarp" (Irenaeus). Fragments survive, chiefly in Irenaeus and Eusebius, of the Exposition of Dominical Oracles in five books (c.110), for which he collected unwritten traditions (without setting oral tradition above apostolic writings in principle) from the circles of "the elders [presbyters]," associates of the apostles, including Aristion and "the elder John" in Asia and the daughters of Philip the apostle (or evangelist?) in Hierapolis. Such traditions transmitted historical reminiscence (much-discussed accounts of the origins of the gospels of Mark and Matthew, and of John's gospel activity and martyrdom), miracle stories, noncanonical pericopae (a variant on John 7:53–8:11 found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews by Eusebius and perhaps Papias too), but chiefly beliefs of primitive Judeo-Christianity, including the millenarian enjoyment of a miraculously fruitful earth, the fall of angels commissioned to govern the world, and interpretations of early Genesis in terms of Christ and the church.

Eusebius, despising Papias's millenarianism, disparages his material and intelligence and argues (his Church History here contradicting his earlier Chronicle) that Papias heard only "the elder John," whom he distinguished from the apostle. Papias's Exposition influenced later writers like Victorinus of Pettau to an extent probably no longer demonstrable.

PAPYROLOGY. The scientific study of papyrus, commonly narrowed to its use as a writing material and what is written thereon. There are NT references in 2 John 12; 3 John 13. Papyrology is a by-product of the archaeological recovery of antiquity. Ancient Upper Egypt has been the major source, since the dry desert climate provided the chief preservative factor in the survival of this material. Oddly, however, the initial finds were made at Herculaneum in 1752, when the charred remains of a library, sealed by the volcanic eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79, were uncovered. Beginning in 1815, bundles of papyri unearthed at Memphis and Thebes were acquired by museums in London, Paris, Turin, Vienna, and Leyden.

The winter of 1895-96 saw the first archaeological expedition undertaken specifically for the recovery of papyri—that of the Egyptian Exploration Fund in the north of the Fayum. Of importance to the history of Christianity, apart from the discovery of important examples of its major literary works, is the vast array of documentation illustrating nearly every facet of its inner life, as well as its conflict with the Roman state. The finding of fresh sources of koinē vocabulary and usage led not only to new understandings of the inherent meanings within the NT and other early Christian literature, but also to the obvious awareness that such literature could no longer be treated as an anomaly in the history of the Greek language. Papyrology had demonstrated that koinē, not academic Atticism, stood in the mainstream, more adequately representing the reality which was the ongoing, living speech of men.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PARABLES. The Greek word parabolē is used to translate the Hebrew māshal, which can refer to different kinds of sayings, including a byword or a proverb. The particular form of saying which biblical scholars refer to as a "parable" proper consists of a brief story involving some point of comparison with a situation in life to which the speaker wishes to draw the attention of his hearers. The usual purpose is that a judgment can be passed upon the situation through the exercise of the motions of indignation or ridicule. A classical example in the OT is the story of the ewe lamb told by Nathan to David (2 Sam. 12:1-10).

In the NT one of the most striking features about the ministry of Jesus is His teaching in parables. Christian commentators used to treat these as allegories, with every detail being supposed to have some significance. In reaction to that it was suggested by A. Jülicher that a parable had one point only. It seems wiser to allow that we must look for the main point, but that there may be subsidiary points of importance and that some parables may contain features of well-known symbolism which must, in a limited sense, be taken allegorically. The parables of Jesus are concerned with the nature and coming of the kingdom of God. C.H. Dodd has suggested that the whole of their original meaning was connected with the immediate situation of the ministry of Jesus, but there is no valid reason for denying some future reference in addition.

PARABOLANI. From the Greek meaning "to venture" or "to expose one's self," the name denotes members of a brotherhood which in the early church, first at Alexandria and then at Constantinople, nursed the sick and buried the dead. They risked their lives in their exposure to contagious diseases, and probably originated during an epidemic. They were also a kind of bodyguard for the bishop. Their number was never large: the Codex Theodosianus (416) restricted the enrollment to 500 in Alexandria, with a later increase to 600, while in Constantinople their number was reduced from 1,100 to 950, according to the Codex Justinianus. Chosen by the bishop and under his control, they probably had neither orders nor vows, although they were listed among the clergy and enjoyed those privileges. Their presence at public gatherings or in theaters was legally forbidden, but they did take part in public life. It appears they are not mentioned after Justinian's time. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PARACELSUS (1493-1541). Pseudonym of Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim, medical doctor, chemist, philosopher, and writer. Born in Switzerland, he later lived in Carinthia, a center of mining, smelting, and alchemy—interests that were to occupy him the remainder of his life. After study at various German universities, he completed his doctorate at Ferrara in 1515. For the next eleven years he traveled through Europe practicing medicine. Then in 1526-28 he was medical lecturer at the University of Basle, but after losing this post he wandered for the rest of his life. He was an innovator in the field of medicine, developing chemical urinalysis, a biochemical theory of digestion, chemical therapy, antisepsis of wounds, and new treatments for syphilis. His philosophy of alchemy and kabbalism grew from Neoplatonism, hermetic studies, and Gnosticism. Paracelsus's numerous books are mostly variants on the idea of man (the microcosm) in relation to nature (the macrocosm). A friend of Erasmus and Oecolampadius, he was accused by Erastus of the Dualist heresy, but he died a member of the Roman Church. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

PARAGRAPH BIBLES. In 1755 John Wesley published his NT in which he returned to the pre-Geneva Bible practice of paragraphing, as opposed to the arrangement in verses followed in the King James Version (Authorized Version) and other versions. The Religious Tract Society brought out an edition of the KJV (AV) in paragraphs in 1838, and there were two further editions in 1853. The Revised Version (1881) adopted the paragraph arrangement, and this is followed in most modern translations.

PARIS, MATTHEW, see MATTHEW PARIS

PARISH. Derived from the Greek paroikia, or "district," the term seems till about the fourth century to have corresponded to a whole diocese and only later to small subdivisions of the same. By the later Middle Ages the parish had emerged as a definite geographical district, its inhabitants restricted to a particular church to which they paid tithes and which had a single incumbent appointed either by the bishop, patron, or less usually, by the parishioners themselves. At the Reformation both Lutherans and Calvinists retained the parish system, the latter for administrative convenience only. In England the establishment of the parochial system has usually been attributed to Archbishop Theodore (seventh century) but its origins are now placed much earlier, even as far back as pre-Christian times.

From the Middle Ages onward the English parish became a unit of civil administration, the priest in his ecclesiastical duties being aided by constables, churchwardens, overseers of the poor, and elected vestries. This parochial pattern was changed only when the growth of the population led to the creation of new parishes by Acts of 1710, 1818, and 1824 and, more recently, through Orders in Council on the initiative of the Church Commissioners. In recent years, with the development of specialized and team ministries, the traditional parochial system has come under attack, but is often defended by Anglican Evangelicals who cherish the individual minister's freedom which it guarantees. The term was imported into the USA where, however, it is often applied in general to a Protestant minister's congregation or cure of souls without reference to geographical limitations. IAN SELLERS

PARK, EDWARDS AMASA (1808-1900). Congregational theologian. Professor of Christian theology at Andover Theological Seminary (1847-81), where he helped to found and edit Biblio- theca Sacra, Park was preeminent among those who tried to reconcile the thinking of Jonathan Edwards and Jacksonian America. To Lyman Abbott, he was the last of those striving "to relieve Calvinism of the objections apparent in the dawn of the more ethical and humanistic spirit of our times." Unlike Charles Hodge, who fused Edwards to Scottish philosophy, Park allied divine sovereignty to "theology of the heart." His former student, Frank Hugh Foster, described him as an eclectic who by 1881 had become an anachronism. Gallant in defeat, ironically he has encouraged the rise of modern liberalism by humanizing the deity. DARREL BIGHAM

PARKER, HORATIO WILLIAM (1863-1919). American composer. The most distinguished composer of church music born in America up to that time, he studied in Munich with Rheinberger. He held various organ posts about New York and in Boston. He taught at Yale, where he had many distinguished pupils, including Charles Ives. He was also a founder of the American Guild of Organists. Many of his hymn tunes and anthems were widely used. His most ambitious work was his Hora Novissima, using a portion of the great poem by Bernard of Cluny. The success of this impressive score brought him commissions from several of the British choir festivals, and Cambridge University awarded him an honorary doctorate. Parker's work marked a movement away from the quartet anthems then popular to a style of greater liturgical propriety.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

PARKER, JOSEPH (1830-1902). English Congregational preacher. Born of humble, pious stock in Hexham, he was ordained in 1853 to the ministry in Banbury Congregational Church, though his formal education had ceased when he was sixteen. He moved to Cavendish Street Chapel, Manchester, in 1858, then went in 1869 to Poultry Chapel, London, which congregation built the City Temple, opened in 1874. There Parker ministered until his death, preaching twice a Sunday and every Thursday morning, and earning a reputation as one of the city's greatest pulpit masters, alongside Spurgeon and Liddon. His theology was the whole system of evangelical truth enshrined in the Apostles' Creed. With an impressive appearance, regal personality, commanding voice, impeccable diction, and histrionic manner, he preached authoritatively and appealingly. During 1885-92 he preached through the Bible, and these discourses were published in the twenty-five volumes of The People's Bible.

ARTHUR CLARKE

PARKER, MATTHEW (1504-1575). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1559. Born in Norwich and educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, he became a fellow of his college and was ordained in 1527. He was probably attracted to the teaching of the Reformers by Thomas Bilney.* In 1535 he became chaplain to Anne Boleyn. He was appointed in 1544 as master of Corpus Christi College. As a reformer he courageously opposed the royal plan to seize the revenues of the chantries and colleges which appeared as a menace to the universities.

With the new freedom under Edward VI* Parker became a close friend of the continental Reformer Martin Bucer* while he worked in Cambridge. Parker was appointed dean of Lincoln Cathedral in 1552. During the reaction under Mary Tudor* he resigned his college post and was deprived of his preferments in 1554. For most of the reign he remained hidden in the house of a friend.

He enjoyed the years of quiet scholarly leisure and resisted Elizabeth I's* appointments as archbishop of Canterbury in 1559. Despite the controversy there is no doubt that he was properly consecrated. The service was performed by four bishops of Edward VI's reign, according to the ordinal attached to the 1552 Book of Common Prayer. Once the settlement of religion had been adopted by Parliament, Elizabeth expected Parker to enforce it. He consecrated and trained all the new bishops. Throughout the 1560s he struggled with the Puritans over vestments. He published the Advertisements of 1566 without royal support. He completed the Elizabethan Settlement* on the authority of the church alone. In 1572 the Admonition* controversy began. In this new phase of the struggle with the Puritans, Parker used J. Whitgift* as his chief agent. Parker was a good administrator, and despite powerful opponents he did much to form the character of the Elizabethan church. It was typical of him that he treated the deprived Marian bishops with tolerance and kindness. His scholarly interests continued to the end of his life, when he bequeathed his valuable collection of manuscripts and books to his college in Cambridge. In 1575 the fruit of his antiquarian researches was published in his De Antiquitate Britannicae Ecclesiae....

PARKER, PETER (1804-1888). First medical missionary to China. Born in Framingham, Massachusetts, he studied both medicine and theology. The American Board sent him out in 1834, and in the following year he opened an eye hospital in Canton, the first Christian hospital in the Far East. In 1838 he helped organize the Medical Missionary Society in China and opened a hospital in Macao. After the first Opium War he was drawn more and more into diplomatic affairs, though continuing his medical missionary work. He helped negotiate the first treaty between China and the USA in 1844. The next year he left the mission and became secretary of the American legation. From 1855 to 1857 he was commissioner and minister plenipotentiary to China and helped revise the treaty. Ill-health forced him to spend his last thirty years in Washington, D.C., where he was elected regent of the Smithsonian Institution and interested himself in Christian enterprises such as the American Evangelical Alliance. HAROLD R. COOK

PARKER, THEODORE (1810-1860). Congregational clergyman. Born in Lexington, Massachusetts, he studied in Harvard Divinity School (1834-36) and was ordained in 1837 as pastor in not-too-distant West Roxbury. His sermon, "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity," in 1841 denied biblical authority and the deity of Christ. He became minister in 1845 of the Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society of Boston. He moved from Unitarianism to transcendental ideas that Christianity rested on universal truths gained by intuition transcending revelation or Christ. Religion was essentially morality growing out of moral oneness with God. This practical ideology led him to support prison reform, temperance, and abolition of slavery.

PARTICULAR BAPTISTS. So called because of their belief in a particular atonement in which Christ died only for His elect people. Their origins in England can be traced to the adoption of believers' baptism by a group of Calvinistic London separatists in 1633. They retained the theological emphasis of the church from which they seceded and remained independent or congregational in polity. By 1660 there were 131 Particular Baptist churches in England. The first Particular Baptist Confession was published in 1644 and has been revised on numerous occasions, the last being in 1966. Apart from baptism, the theological emphasis of the confessions has always been Reformed. The Baptist Missionary Society was formed in 1792 by the Northamptonshire Association of Particular Baptist Churches at the call of William Carey,* so initiating the modern missionary movement. John Bunyan* and C.H. Spurgeon* were also associated with the Particular Baptists.

JAMES TAYLOR

PASCAL, BLAISE (1623-1662). Mathematical prodigy, physicist, religious thinker, inventor, and literary stylist. One of the great minds of Western intellectual history, he was born in Claremont in central France, where his father, a man of upper-class status, was a lawyer, magistrate, and tax commissioner of the area. When Pascal was three his mother died, and five years later the father moved with his three children to Paris, drawn there by the intellectual atmosphere which he cherished.

Instead of providing a tutor for his children, Étienne Pascal chose to educate them himself at home. History and science were taught through games, religion through reading the Bible. Geometry was to be the crowning study, withheld until Blaise was old enough to fully relish its beauty. But at age eleven he worked out on his own some of the basic Euclidian propositions. Building later on his mathematical knowledge, he was to create the theory of probability.

When the Pascal family moved to Rouen in 1640, where Étienne was to become tax collector, young Blaise observed the burdensome calculations which often kept his father up until two in the morning. Putting his remarkable mind to work to solve a practical problem, the son devised the first calculating machine, based on a series of rotating discs, a system that has been the basis of arithmetical machines up to modern times. In physics a notable discovery, known as Pascal's Law, states that pressure exerted on any part of an enclosed liquid is distributed equally to all parts of the liquid. This principle makes possible all modern hydraulic operations.

After his conversion in 1654 following a miraculous vision, Pascal set about preparing an Apology for the Christian Religion. The work was never finished, for Pascal died at the age of thirty-nine, leaving only a set of remarkable notes, later published as Pensées. The work is a classic of apologetics as well as literature. It undertakes to put the case for Christianity as against the rationalism of Descartes and the skepticism of Montaigne. For Pascal, God is to be known through Jesus Christ by an act of faith, itself given by God. Faith is not of reason; it is of the heart. Man's need for God becomes evident when he recognizes his misery apart from God. God is to be known by faith, but the evidences for validating Christianity are great: the prophecies, the miracles, the witness of history, the self-authentication of Scripture.

In 1657 Pascal's Provincial Letters appeared. This masterpiece of irony was directed against the Jesuits in defense of Jansenism,* a conservative reform movement within the Catholic Church which urged a return to the Augustinian emphasis upon grace alone as the basis of salvation.

PAUL M. BECHTEL

PASCHAL II (d.1118). Pope from 1099. An Italian monk, he lacked the worldly astuteness of his predecessor, Urban II.* He faced the unresolved problem of investiture, at first apparently successfully. In England the quarrel between Anselm and Henry I was settled in 1107 when Henry renounced investiture with the spiritual symbols, while retaining the right to receive homage for temporalities before consecration and to be present at episcopal elections. With Louis VI of France a similar agreement was reached, though he was satisfied with an oath of fealty rather than homage.

Paschal was not directly responsible for these settlements, but together with the First Crusade, they greatly enhanced the prestige of the papacy. In the empire he supported Henry V's rebellion against his father, only to find that he refused to surrender investiture. Paschal denounced him at several synods, but when Henry appeared in Rome for his coronation Paschal incredibly agreed to renounce the regalia—the secular rights and possessions of the church—if Henry would give up investiture. This produced incensed feelings in the church, and bishops and princes helped to create an uproar of riot proportions at Henry's coronation in 1111. Paschal's surrender was, however, unacceptable to the reforming conscience of the church, and by 1116 he was condemning his own concessions. Driven from Rome in 1117, he returned the following year and died. The fact that the regalia increasingly emerged during his reign as, in some sense, a royal right had important bearings on the concordat which was eventually agreed to.

PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES. These concerned the date for the celebration of Easter* and occurred from the second to the eighth centuries. From their earliest history, the Eastern and Western Churches used a different basis for determination of the date. The Eastern Church followed the custom of observing it on the day on which the Jews celebrated the Passover, i.e., the fourteenth day of the month of Nisan. This meant that it might be observed on any day of the week. The Western Church always observed Easter on a Sunday. It was not until the time of Charlemagne,* however, that the present custom of observing it on the first Sunday after the full moon on or next-after the vernal equinox was firmly established throughout the West.

Polycarp traced the Eastern custom back to the Apostle John; Eusebius, the Western custom back to Xystus, bishop of Rome early in the second century. Victor I,* later in the same century, attempted unsuccessfully to impose the Western custom on the church at large. In 325 the Council of Nicea* tried to stabilize the date of celebration, decreeing that it must be the first Sunday following the vernal equinox; but technical difficulties prevented a clear settlement of the issue. These difficulties stemmed from the use of different calendars.* Some churches followed the Jewish lunar calendar. Since this calendar was eleven days short, Easter could fall before the actual equinox, though 14 Nisan marked the full moon after the calendar equinox. Rome eventually fixed the equinox on 25 March; Alexandria, on 21 March, which was its correct date in the Julian calendar. But still other dates and methods of computation were used, especially in the Celtic churches. Though both Western and Eastern churches eventually resolved the technical difficulties and thus established a common practice within their respective jurisdictions, to this day a different method is followed in the East from that of the West, and the time of celebration can vary as much as five weeks.

MILLARD SCHERICH

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS (c.785-860). Abbot and scholar. From the vicinity of Soissons, he entered the monastery of Corbie under the direction of Adalhard, its first abbot. Well versed in the Scriptures, Church Fathers, and Latin classics, he became an instructor of younger monks. His exemplary humility refused to allow him advancement beyond the order of deacon. Following the death of Abbot Isaac, however, he accepted the abbacy of Corbie, a post he renounced for unencumbered study about 853. Meanwhile he attended the synods of Paris (847) and Quiercy (849). He produced several biographies and dogmatic works—especially contributions in Mariology—and extensive commentaries on Matthew, Psalm 44, and Lamentations; yet De corpore et sanquine Domini, written in 831 and revised in 844, is his most famous work. His realistic interpretation of Christ's presence at the sacrament, graphically depicted as being in the Lord's same crucified and risen flesh, was sharply opposed by Ratramnus* and Rabanus Maurus* and later gave way to a subtler, Aristotelian explanation.

JAMES DE JONG

PASSAVANT, WILLIAM ALFRED (1821-1894). American Lutheran clergyman, editor, and philanthropist. Of Huguenot and German ancestry, he began his ministry in 1843 as a New Lutheran of Schmucker's school, but later espoused Old Lutheranism. He was, in 1867, one of the founders of the conservative General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America. He lived for the last fifty years of his life in Pittsburgh, where he was pastor, until 1855, of the English Lutheran Church. To strengthen the missionary movement, in which he was deeply interested, he issued in 1848 the monthly Missionary which became a weekly in 1856 and was incorporated with the Lutheran of Philadelphia in 1861. He also edited, until his death, the Workman first published in 1881. He was largely responsible for introducing the order of deaconesses into the United States in 1849. He opened hospitals and orphan asylums in a number of American cities. He also founded the Chicago Lutheran Theological Seminary and Thiel College at Greenville, Pennsylvania.

JAMES TAYLOR

PASSIONISTS. Popular name for the "Congregation of Discalced Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ," founded in 1725 by Paul of the Cross.* The first house or "retreat" was opened on Mt. Argentaro (1737). After 1840 the order expanded, founding houses in thirteen countries in Europe and America. In England they were the first religious since the Reformation to lead a strict community life and wear their habit in public. Emphasizing the contemplative life, they take a fourth vow to further the memory of Christ's passion in the faithful. Their chief activities are missions and retreats. Their black habit bears the emblem of a white heart inscribed Jesu XPI Passio.

The Passionist Nuns, founded by Paul with Faustina Gertrude (Mother Mary Crucifixa), were approved by Clement XIV in 1770. Strictly enclosed and contemplative, they take the fourth vow, practicing devotion to the passion. They have convents in Europe, America, and Japan.

PASTOR, LUDWIG VON (1854-1928). Church historian. Born in Aachen of a Protestant father and Catholic mother, he had by 1874 decided to write a history of the popes. Early in his academic career he was befriended by the historian Johannes Jenssen; later the two would collaborate on some books. Pastor studied at Louvain, Bonn, Berlin, Vienna; his Ph.D. was earned at the University of Grosz in 1878. He apparently played a role in the opening of the Vatican Archives to all scholars in 1883. He taught at the University of Innsbruck between 1881 and 1901; was director of the Austrian Historical Institute in Rome; and finally Austrian Ambassador to the Holy See in 1920. His major work was The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (16 vols., 1886-1933; ET 40 vols., 1891-1953). This was based upon extensive research in the Vatican and in over 200 other European archives. He was of the opinion that only Roman Catholics could really understand and interpret papal history.

ROBERT SCHNUCKER

PASTORAL THEOLOGY. A practical application of the Scriptures to the relationship between a minister of the Gospel and the people for whose spiritual well-being he is responsible. It is theology because it deals with the things of God and His Word. It is pastoral, because it relates to a pastor and his people.

The basic precepts of pastoral theology are found in the NT. Paul addressed the elders of the Ephesian church at Miletus in words that showed his compassion and concern for the people and his own personal commitment to Christ and His service. This vital relationship between pastor and people is further emphasized in Paul's letters to Timothy and Titus. Details of organization and administration are given, but interwoven with them are solemn warnings and appeals that the minister's chief concern is the cultivation of mature Christian character in himself and his people.

The importance of this branch of theology is recognized by every denomination in the Christian Church, and every training college for ministers has a department of pastoral or practical theology. As a rule it embraces training in the art of preaching and the science of homiletics, but the main emphasis is on the character of the pastor and the care of souls. This care is exercised in different ways, such as the visitation of the homes for the discussion of spiritual problems, or personal interviews in the minister's home or in the office at the church. In recent years there has been a greater emphasis on psychology as an aid to pastoral care. Many of the larger churches have widened the scope of their pastoral concern by appointing chaplains for industry, schools, and colleges.

ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

PATARINES. A lay reform movement in N Italy during the late eleventh century, directed against clerical immorality. Centering in Milan, it was directed primarily at the archbishop and other simoniac priests, but also at the upper-class laity who had crept into the ranks of the religious by similar unethical means. Certain radical Patarines, as lay preachers, inveighed against these corrupt clergy, forbade the faithful to attend their ministrations, and by violent means removed refractory priests and bishops from their altars and their benefices. Papal encouragements angered German monarchs whose clergy had received only royal (lay) authority; the Reformation thus became an element in the bitter, centuries-long investiture* struggle between pope and emperor. By 1075, upon the excision of the more corrupt elements from the northern clergy, the movement soon disappeared. Patarine activity produced a strengthening of papal political authority in Lombardy, and served also to destroy an ecclesiastical network established upon simonaic practices.

H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

PATMOS. An island of the Sporades group in the Dodecanese, lying some thirty-seven miles WSW of Miletus on the coast of Asia Minor. It has an area of about twenty-two square miles, some eight miles long and six miles in its maximum width. It is of volcanic origin, with rocky slopes rising in three peaks of about 900 feet. Such islands of the Aegean Sea were used for political banishment, and the reference to Patmos in Revelation 1:9 suggests such a condition of exile for John the Seer. Tradition has it (Irenaeus, Eusebius, Jerome, and others) that the apostle was exiled there during the fourteenth year of Domitian's reign (A.D. 95) and was released during the reign of Nerva (A.D. 96), some eighteen months later. Much of the imagery of the Book of Revelation is about the sea. The island is close enough to Asia Minor to have kept John in touch with events there, as underscored in his letters to the seven churches (Rev. 2–3).

JAMES M. HOUSTON

PATON, JOHN GIBSON (1824-1907). Pioneer Presbyterian missionary in the New Hebrides. He was born in Kirkmahoe, near Dumfries in Scotland. He was educated at the University of Glasgow and studied theology at the divinity hall of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland. During 1847-57 he was a city missionary in Glasgow. At the end of this period he was ordained by his church as a missionary to the New Hebrides. He and his wife left Glasgow in 1858 for the island of Aneityum in the New Hebrides and subsequently became the pioneer missionaries on the island of Tanna. His wife died in childbirth in 1859. Paton was in almost daily danger of his life and was forced to leave the island in 1862. He became a traveling ambassador for the New Hebrides mission. In Scotland in 1864 he secured more recruits and remarried. In 1866 he moved to the island of Aniwa and saw the conversion of most of the islanders. After many years of hard labor on the islands, in the 1880s he made Melbourne in Australia his headquarters for work to support the mission. Until his death he traveled the world for the mission. At the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in 1900 at New York he was hailed as a great missionary leader. His autobiography (1889) published by his brother was an effective way of gaining support for the mission.

NOEL S. POLLARD

PATON, WILLIAM (1886-1943). Missionary organizer and writer. Born in England of Scottish parents, he became a minister of the Presbyterian Church of England after education at Pembroke College, Oxford, and Westminster College, Cambridge. From 1911 to 1921 he traveled Britain as missionary secretary of the Student Christian Movement,* then went to India for the YMCA. At the formation of the National Christian Council of India, Burma, and Ceylon he became general secretary for its seven formative years until brought back to be joint secretary of the International Missionary Council* for the rest of his life, based in Britain. He helped prepare the important conferences at Jerusalem (1928) and Madras (1938), and was an indefatigable worker toward making younger churches self-supporting and indigenously led. He took a considerable part in the formation of national Christian councils. A strong exponent of intermission cooperation and ecumenical relations, he was one of the architects of the World Council of Churches,* although he died before its inception. During World War II he did much for the Orphaned Missions Fund which helped the survival of missions and missionaries cut off from their home bases. Paton was editor of the International Review of Missions for sixteen years and an influential writer on missionary aims and methods. Among his better-known books are Jesus Christ and the World's Religions (1916) and The Church and the New Order (1941).

See M. Sinclair, William Paton (1949).

JOHN C. POLLOCK

PATRIARCH. The Septuagint translators of Chronicles had coined patriarchēs to define royal officers (always plural) variously expressed in Hebrew (1 Chron. 24:31; 27:22; 2 Chron. 19:8; 23:20; 26:12); Hellenistic Judaism applied the concept to those special ancestral progenitors narratively identified in Genesis—Abraham (Heb. 7:4), with Isaac and Jacob (4 Macc. 7:19), the latter's twelve sons (Acts 7:8,9; cf. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs)—and to David (Acts 2:29). While pre-Nicene authors retained this usage, enlarging its significance by their prevailing typological exegesis, in the late fourth century Epiphanius* also indicated the word was being used for the hereditary chief office of Judaism, from which by analogy it was introduced for the highest ecclesiastical office within Christianity. Patristic citation thereafter employs "patriarch" for the sees of Old and New Rome, Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch, though Socrates used it more widely to cover all imperial dioceses, and Gregory of Nazianzus for senior bishops (presbuteroi episkopoi) in general. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PATRICK, SIMON (1626-1707). Bishop of Ely. Educated at Cambridge, he was influenced by John Smith, the Cambridge Platonist.* He was ordained a Presbyterian minister in 1648, but in 1654 was episcopally ordained in private. From 1662 he was vicar of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, remaining throughout the Plague. In 1687 he opposed James II's Declaration of Indulgence,* and took the oath of allegiance to William and Mary in 1689, when he was appointed bishop of Chichester. His translation to Ely came two years later. Patrick founded schools in London, helped found the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and supported the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. His voluminous writings include an allegory, The Parable of the Pilgrim; commentaries on the OT up to the Song of Solomon; devotional works; and polemical works against Roman Catholics and Nonconformists. JOYCE HORN

PATRICK OF IRELAND (c.390-c.461). His dates, origin, and career have long provoked controversy among historians. The only reliable sources of information are his own short writings: The Confession and The Letter to the Christian Subjects of the Tyrant Coroticus, often called erroneously The Letter to Coroticus. These have been supplemented by many medieval traditions which are largely valueless. Part of the difficulty is that in the medieval sources Patrick may have been confused with Palladius,* who was sent by Pope Celestine to Ireland in 431. Patrick's writings indicate no connection whatsoever with Rome. Linguistic and other considerations suggest that he received his theological training in Britain; the peculiarities of the vulgar Latin which he used point to a British background.

The dates of Patrick's life cannot be fixed with certainty. His father Calpurnius was a deacon and a Roman magistrate (decurio), son of Potitus, a presbyter. The place of his birth is defined in The Confession as Bonavem Taberniae, and later he speaks of his parents as living in Britain, and calls it his country. It seems highly probable that his birthplace was Old Kilpatrick, near the Scottish town of Dumbarton. At sixteen he was taken captive by marauders from Ireland, and became a slave in East Antrim, near a hill called Slemish, to a farmer called Milchu. His conversion dates from this period, when, as he says, "The Lord opened to me the sense of my unbelief that I might remember my sins and that I might return with my whole heart to the Lord my God." After six years he escaped from captivity and procured a passage, probably to Scotland. But he did not remain long at home. A night vision called him back to Ireland, and he returned about 432. His ministry and wanderings in Ireland for the next thirty years are obscure, although the subject of many legends; but the view may be accepted that he traveled throughout Ireland and that he had a considerable influence on the Irish chieftains of his day. He had special links with Tara, Croagh Patrick, and Armagh. There is no doubt that he broke the power of heathenism in Ireland and that his teaching was scriptural and evangelical, and that the church which he founded was independent of Rome. He was buried probably in Downpatrick. HUGH J. BLAIR

PATRIMONY OF ST. PETER, THE. This denotes the material wealth and possessions of the Chuch of Rome. Historically it refers to gifts of land given to the Holy See in 754 and 756 by Pepin* the Short. These gifts comprised what was later known as the Papal States.* Pepin's gift is significant in that it launched the temporal power of the bishop of Rome, and its correlating events were the beginning of Rome's claim to papal supremacy over the crowns of France and Germany. Papal temporal power over this vast part of Italy ended in 1870, when during the Italian Risorgimento King Victor Emmanuel took possession of Rome as the capital of free and united Italy. Papal economic power was restored, however, by Mussolini when he signed the 1929 Lateran Treaty. This declared Rome a holy city, returned it to the spiritual domination of the Church of Rome, established the autonomous Vatican State, and granted the Holy See $90 million reparations for lands lost in 1870. These monies were invested in the economy of Italy and abroad.

Estimates in 1971 declared the Vatican to be the world's largest business corporation, and Nino Lo Bello puts the Vatican wealth in 1970 at $5.6 billion. In 1962 the Italian parliament investigated the Vatican's power over the Italian economy, and made the Roman Catholic Church liable for corporate taxes on its investments. The European Common Market ruled in December 1970 that the Vatican is ineligible for tax privileges inside the Common Market. Paul VI modernized the Vatican's financial administration in 1968 by establishing the prefecture of economic affairs of the Holy See, and under the prefecture he created the Administration for the Patrimony of the Holy See. This latter office is responsible for overseeing the Vatican's worldwide investments.

PATRONAGE. The right of a patron to nominate for appointment to, and to help to administer, a benefice. It originates from Anglo-Saxon times when a landowner felt it a duty to build a church and provide a priest for those who lived on his estate. These were approved by the bishops, who themselves set up similar churches on their own estates. Because patronage was often attached to land and carried with it income, it became a central feature in struggles between church and state. After the dissolution of the monasteries there was a distribution of patronage. In the Church of England it is now held by archbishops and bishops, private individuals, universities and colleges, trusts, cathedral chapters, the Crown, incumbents of mother churches, and diocesan boards of patronage. When a vacancy arises, the patron obtains the views of the churchwardens and the parochial church councils, who have the right to state the needs and conditions of the parish and to resist any nominee whom they do not consider suitable for their requirements. The patron must receive the support of the bishop for his nominee. In England patronage is now increasingly coming under the control of the ecclesiastical authorities.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

PATTESON, JOHN COLERIDGE (1827-1871). First missionary bishop of the Church of England in Melanesia. Educated at Eton and at Balliol College, Oxford, he became a fellow of Merton College and held a curacy in Devon. He was persuaded by G.A. Selwyn,* bishop of New Zealand, to go out to Melanesia as a missionary in 1855. In 1856 he made his first journey to Melansia to encourage boys to return with him to study at the college Selwyn had set up first at Auckland and later on Norfolk Island. The training given by Patteson and his ability to acquire the many languages of the islands provided a strong basis for the mission. In 1861 he was consecrated bishop of Melanesia and traveled constantly, supporting his English and native workers. On the main island of Mota he saw the conversion of most of the population. His work was often made dangerous by the activities of white traders, known as "black birders," who forcibly took natives to labor in Australia. In September 1871, unaware of a recent outrage by these traders, he landed on the island of Nukapu and was speared to death.

NOEL S. POLLARD

PAUL III (1468-1549). Pope from 1534. Born Alessandro Farnese at Canino of an influential Italian family, he was educated at Rome and Florence where he received instruction by well-known humanists. Rising rapidly in the church he was made a cardinal by Alexander VI in 1493 and eventually became dean of the Sacred College. He led a scandalous moral life, fathering four illegitimate children, until his ordination in 1519, after which he became somewhat reformed. When Clement VII died in 1534, he was elected pope.

Although nepotism was a prominent feature of his pontificate and he was an enthusiastic participant in such Renaissance activities as the hunt and art patronage, he nevertheless was instrumental in setting reform trends in motion. He appointed several men to the cardinalate who were dedicated reformers and in 1536 formed a commission of nine distinguished churchmen to examine abuses in the church and report on the necessary steps for reformation. This report, the Concilium de emendenda ecclesia (1538), was criticized by Protestants for being superficial but eventually became the basis for much of the work of the Council of Trent.* It was during the reign of Paul that the Society of Jesus was recognized (1540) and several other reform orders given encouragement, including the Ursulines, the Barnabites, and the Theatines.

Both religious and secular rulers often frustrated many of the reform attempts of Paul. In 1536 he issued a bull which called for an ecumenical council at Mantua in 1537, but the actions of Protestant rulers and the duke of Mantua prevented the council from convening. Opposition between Francis I and Charles V blocked further attempts at a conciliar movement, but with the peace of Crespy (1544) Paul was able to convene the successful Council of Trent in 1545.

PAUL IV (1476-1559). Pope from 1555. Born Giovanni Pietro Caraffa of a noble Neapolitan family, he received a good education in the home of his uncle, Oliviero Cardinal Caraffa, who was able to secure an appointment in the Roman Curia for him. Beginning as a chamberlain under Alexander VI, he became bishop of Chiete (Teate) in 1506. He also served as a papal envoy in several instances: in 1513 he was sent to England by Leo X to collect Peter's Pence* from Henry VIII; he then went to Flanders (1515-17) and Spain (1517-20). It was perhaps this last mission which provoked an anti-Spanish feeling which was to affect the policies of his pontificate. Always active in reform movements within the church, Caraffa was a member of the Oratory of Divine Love from 1520 to 1527 and co-founder of the Theatines in 1524. In 1536 he was made a cardinal by Paul III and remained a staunch supporter of the Counter-Reformation, serving on reform commissions and reorganizing the Italian Inquisition.

Elected pope in 1555, he displayed a zeal for reform that produced some drastic measures. His anti-Spanish and anti-imperial policies along with his fervent promotion of the Inquisition,* especially against holders of high office, and the publication of the Index* of Prohibited Books lessened his popularity. Nepotism also marred part of his pontificate, although he expelled his nephews before the end of his reign. In his attempt to apply medieval concepts of papal power to sixteenth-century politics he was unable to stem the tide of Protestantism throughout N Europe.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

PAUL V (1552-1621). Pope from 1605. Born Camillo Borghese in Rome, he studied canon law at Padua and Perugia and maintained a lifelong reputation as an able and strict canonist. He served in the Curia beginning about 1580 and rose rapidly to the top, being created cardinal in 1596, becoming vicar of Rome in 1603, and elected pope two years later as a compromise candidate. He supported educational reform, approved new reform orders, and sponsored improvements in the city of Rome.

But although he led a saintly life (except for nepotism), his pontificate was plagued with painful struggles: (1) the bitter Jesuit*-Dominican* dispute over grace, which he finally decided on the side of the Jesuits without condemning their opponents. His reaction was to ban all further discussions of the topic (1607); (2) the problem arising from the teachings of Galileo,* especially in the light of Bellarmine's* attacks. The Congregation of the Index decided this issue by condemning Galileo (1616); (3) a political struggle with Venice. Paul was forced to take action in Venice where in 1605 the "benefit of clergy"* provision was violated. The bitter struggle expanded into a pamphlet warfare on the old "Two Swords" issue, with Bellarmine siding with the papacy against the animated Paolo Sarpi.* Ultimately Paul placed an interdict on the city; the Venetians retaliated by expelling all groups supporting the pope. Matters were finally settled through the mediation of Henry IV of France; (4) a political struggle involving England. James I's* divine-right theories (especially the Oath of Allegiance, 1606) occasioned two papal briefs of condemnation. A fierce contention raged for many years; (5) finally, the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War. Paul sided with the Hapsburgs, but died shortly after the Battle of White Mountain (1620).

PAUL VI (1897- ). Pope from 1963. Born to an upper-class family whose father was editor (1881-1912) of the daily Il Cittadino di Brescia, Giovanni Battista Montini attended a Jesuit institute near Brescia (1903-14) and because of ill-health lived at home while studying in the diocesan seminary. After ordination (1920) he went to Rome for graduate study at the Gregorian University and the University of Rome. After a brief visit to Warsaw, Montini in 1924 entered the papal secretariate of state. In 1924 he became chaplain at the University of Rome. In 1925 as national moderator of the Italian Catholic University Federation he opposed a similar, Fascist group.

Montini rose in Vatican esteem when Cardinal Pacelli appointed him to his staff (1937). The future Pope Pius XII* used Montini rather than appoint a new secretary of state (1944). In 1952 Montini and Domenico Tardini refused elevation to the cardinalate, remaining as dual prosecretaries of state. In 1954 the pope appointed Montini archbishop of Milan. During 1955-1963 he attempted to reach the workers. In 1963 he published The Christian in the Material World, a plea for social justice. "From evangelical poverty flows liberty of the spirit," Cardinal Montini wrote, in defense of the workers. Named a cardinal by Pope John XXIII* in 1958, he became John's successor and heir of Vatican II* on 30 June 1963.

Vatican II reconvened on 29 September 1963 for its second session, opened with a remarkable papal appeal for renewal and unity. At the end of that session Pope Paul proclaimed the Constitution on the Liturgy. The third session led to promulgation also of the Constitution on the Church and Decree on Ecumenism. At the end of Vatican II (1965) Paul promised a reorganization of the Curia.

Pope Paul VI traveled widely, making a historic visit to the Holy Land (1964) and the United Nations in New York (1965). From Bombay in 1964 to South America and the Philippines, he traveled more than any other pope. Pope Paul VI continued his social concern expressed while archbishop of Milan. Especially in Rome he continued as pastor of his huge diocese, visiting the ill and those in prison. The furor over the papal encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968) perhaps continued the erosion of papal authority.

PAUL, ACTS OF, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

PAUL, APOCALYPSE OF. An apocryphal account of the apostle's journey in heavenly and infernal regions (cf. 2 Cor. 12:2ff.). Originally in Greek (not preserved in that form), it is best represented in the Latin tradition, and also known in Coptic, Syriac, Armenian, Georgian, and Slavonic versions, differing somewhat one from another. It evidently draws upon earlier works, such as the Apocalypse of Peter; consequently it is probably of fairly late composition. The document declares itself to have been hidden until 388, when its hiding-place was made known in a dream. Paul receives the divine commission and hears the complaint of creation against man, whose deeds are reported by angels. He sees the fate of righteous and wicked, and makes two visits to Paradise, meeting patriarchs and prophets on the first visit, and others on the second (doublet accounts), while Hell is visited and torments described in detail. The work is attested by Augustine, is used by some Latin poets, and influenced medieval imagery, including Dante's. J.N. BIRDSALL

PAULA (347-404). Roman matron and friend of Jerome; descended from the Gracchi and Scipio. The mother of five children, when aged thirty-three she dedicated herself to the ascetic life. In 385, with her daughter Eustochium, she followed Jerome* to Palestine, despite the pleas of her other children. After visiting the holy places and hermits in the Egyptian deserts, they settled at Bethlehem, where Paula founded three nunneries and a monastery. She gave away her remaining wealth and died in poverty.

PAULICIANS. Evangelical antihierarchical sect originating in the seventh century (possibly earlier) on Rome's eastern borders in Armenia, Mesopotamia and N Syria. Characteristic doctrines include: Adoptianist* Christology; rejection of mariolatry,* images, and hagiolatry; the authority of Scripture (especially esteeming Luke and Paul, and rejecting the OT, like Marcion); believers' baptism. Some, but not all, were dualists, though they repudiated Manichaeism.* The earliest reference to them occurs in 719, when John Otzin, catholicos of Armenia, warned against "obscene men who are called Paulicians." The name may be derived from their regard for Paul the Apostle, or from Paul of Samosata* (with whose teaching they had some affinity), or from an unknown Paul who learned the doctrine from his mother Callinike.

Their founder was probably Constantine-Sylvanus (c.640) of Mananali, a Manichaean village near Samosata, who labored at Cibossa for twenty-seven years before being stoned to death (c.684). His persecutor, Simeon, was himself converted and became Constantine's successor, only to be martyred (690). The sect was protected by Emperor Constantine Copronymus (741-775), himself probably a Paulician. Numbers increased greatly, especially under Sergius-Tychicus (801-35). Savage persecution under Empress Theodora (842-57), in which some 100,000 were martyred, developed into a war of extermination under Basil. Though victorious for a time under the leadership of Carbeas and Chrysocheir, with help from the Saracens, with whom they found refuge, after Chrysocheir's murder (873), the Paulicians were decimated and dispersed.

In 973 John Zimisces transported a great colony to Thrace, effectually introducing their thought to Europe. They continued to exist in scattered communities in Armenia, Asia Minor, and the Balkans, influential at least until the twelfth century, even spreading to Italy and France. Probably they developed into and amalgamated with sects like the Bogomiles,* Cathari,* and Albigenses.* The Crusaders found them everywhere in Syria and Palestine. Anabaptists in the sixteenth century had contact with apparent Paulicians. A colony holding their beliefs settled in Russian Armenia in 1828, bringing with them the manual of Paulician doctrine, The Key of Truth.

PAULINUS (c.730-802). Bishop of Aquileia. A Lombard born in Friuli, he excelled in juridical and theological scholarship. His reputation motivated Charlemagne to appoint him as master at the French court, where he became a firm friend of Alcuin,* and in 787 as bishop of Aquileia. Paulinus contended against Adoptianism at the synods of Regensburg (792), Frankfurt (794), and Cividale (796). At Frankfurt he wrote Libellus Sacrosyllabus, a refutation of the heresy, and he presided at Cividale, where the Filioque was adopted. Contact with the pagan Avars stimulated his significant contributions to medieval missionary theory and practice. Ecclesiastically he was a wise diplomat and progressive administrator, procuring the right of free episcopal elections. His writings include hymns or rhythms, poems, letters, and anti-Adoptianist pieces.
JAMES DE JONG

PAULINUS OF NOLA (353/4-431). Bishop of Nola. A rich Aquitanian landowner who, under the influence of Martin of Tours* and Ambrose,* with the consent of his wife, renounced the world and settled in 395 in Campania by the shrine of Felix of Nola. He lived a life of great austerity and built hospitals for monks and poor in addition to water works for Nola. Ordained priest in 394, he became bishop of Nola in 409. As one of the foremost Christian Latin poets of the period, he wrote a long poem for each annual festival of St. Felix. Thirty of his poems and fifty of his letters to his friends (including Augustine) are preserved. Many of his letters contain valuable notes on ecclesiastical architecture. JAMES TAYLOR

PAULINUS OF TRIER (d.358). Anti-Arian bishop. Succeeding Maximin as bishop of Trier, he was a staunch opponent of Arianism* when Constantius induced other Western bishops at the Synod of Arles (353) to accept an Arian formula. Paulinus alone stood firm, and was banished to Phrygia where he died in exile.

PAULINUS OF YORK (c.584-644). Monk and missionary. Probably a Benedictine at St. Andrew's Monastery in Rome, he was part of the second contingent of missionaries sent in 601 by Gregory the Great to assist Augustine in Britain. He worked in Kent, where he was consecrated bishop in 625, then traveled north as the chaplain of Ethelburga, the Christian wife of Edwin of Northumbria. His efforts were rewarded in 627 with the baptism of Edwin at York, where he established his see. His preaching and baptizing continued until Edwin was killed at the Battle of Hatfield (632). Paulinus administered the vacant bishopric at Rochester until his death. Since he deserted York before receiving the pope's pallium, it is disputed whether he was York's first archbishop. JOHN GROH

PAUL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (d. c.351). Native of Thessalonica who became bishop of Constantinople about 335, he was opposed by the Eusebian party, and on nontheological grounds was exiled shortly afterward. He returned after the death of Constantine (337), but when Constantius settled in Constantinople, an Arian synod met and banished Paul and elected in his place Eusebius of Nicomedia* (338). On Eusebius's death (341), Paul returned once again. The Arians consecrated Macedonius and a mob riot developed between the opposing supporters in which much life was lost, including that of Hermogenes —the master of cavalry—sent by Constantius to deal with the situation. Paul was exiled, but returned probably in 344 and 346, when Constantius was under Western pressure. He was finally exiled about 351, and soon died—possibly strangled, but more probably of natural causes. He was a courageous upholder of orthodoxy against the increasingly heretical tendencies of the East.

PAUL OF SAMOSATA (fl. 260-272). Bishop of Antioch. From Samosata on the Euphrates, he became bishop of Syrian Antioch c.260. His political role under Odenath and Zenobia of Palmyra —governor over tax collection—entitled him to a bodyguard, the position of judge, and a private council chamber. His critics charged him with encouraging adulation of himself and keeping virgines subintroductae. At local synods they failed to depose him in 264, but succeeded in 268, when they elected his successor, Domnus. Popular support retained Paul, and Antioch had two bishops until 272 when Aurelian recovered the city from the Palmyrene regime. Paulianists survived at least until the Council of Nicea (325).

The sources for his teaching are accepted with differing degrees of confidence by scholars. Apparently Paul distinguished the "heavenly Word" from the man Jesus, whereas his Origenist opponent Malchion* argued for a unity in Christ echoed later by Apollinarius.* Paul objected to attributing ousia to the Word, probably because two ousiai, of the Father and of the Word, would make a divided Godhead. Loofs interpreted Paul as an economic Trinitarian, foreshadowing Marcellus of Ancyra.* Fourth-century critics generally accused him of making Christ "a mere man" and stressing His human soul. Heretics later charged with his error include Marcellus of Ancyra, Theodore of Mopsuestia,* and Nestorius.*

PAUL OF THEBES (d. c.340). Traditionally the first Christian hermit. Jerome's Vita Pauli is the sole authority for his life. Born in the Thebaid, during the Decian persecution (249-51) he fled to a cave near the Red Sea at the age of sixteen, where he lived a life of prayer and penitence reportedly for about 100 years. He is said to have been visited by Antony when he was 113; there is no confirmation of this visit in the Vita Antonii, and much is doubtful regarding his life. In later art Paul is represented with a palm-tree, from the leaves of which he wove a tunic, and two lions, which dug his grave.

PAUL OF THE CROSS (1694-1775). Founder of the Passionists.* Born Paolo Francesco Danei at Ovada, Italy, he led a life of austerity and became a hermit in 1720. In a forty-day retreat he drew up a Rule for a religious order to honor Christ's passion. Benedict XIII permitted him to receive novices (1725), and he was ordained (1727). He labored as a missionary at Monte Argentaro. The first Passionist "Retreat" was opened (1737), his Rule was approved by Benedict XIV (1746), and Paul was elected superior-general (1747). From 1769 he lived in Rome. He founded the Order of Passionist Nuns (1771), and in 1773 the Church of SS. John and Paul in Rome became the headquarters of the Passionists. By the time of his death he had established twelve monasteries in Italy. An eloquent preacher, especially on the Passion, he was renowned also as a miracle worker and spiritual director. J.G.G. PAUL THE APOSTLE. Paul, or—to use his Jewish name—Saul, was born in Tarsus and educated in Jerusalem under a leading Pharisaic rabbi, Gamaliel. After coming to prominence as a leading persecutor of the infant Christian Church, he experienced an abrupt volte-face; he was confronted by the risen Jesus in an experience which was for him both a conversion from his former zeal for Judaism and its law and also a call to redirect that zeal into being a missionary to the Gentiles. He spent three years in Arabia, presumably as a missionary, then returned via Jerusalem to his native town where he spent the better part of fourteen years in evangelism.

When he was summoned by Barnabas to Antioch to assist in his work there, he entered upon a new, well-documented stage in his career which was of decisive importance in the expansion of the church. Along with Barnabas he was sent out by the church at Antioch to do missionary work in Cyprus and Galatia. Then with other companions he worked successively in Macedonia (Philippi and Thessalonica), Greece (Corinth), and Asia (Ephesus), planting churches and providing both them and posterity with a series of writings which have fundamentally shaped Christian theology. His plans for a further mission in the west of the Roman Empire were hindered by his arrest and imprisonment, first in Jerusalem and Caesarea, and then in Rome. Whether he was ever released from imprisonment, and, if so, whether he ever reached Spain, are questions difficult to answer. The evidence suggests an affirmative answer to the former (cf. the hopes expressed in Phil. 2:24 and Philem. 22), but a negative one to the latter (the Pastorals imply work in the Aegean area). In any case, he concluded his life as a martyr—according to tradition—during the Neronian persecution.

Because of his considerable personal correspondence we know Paul better than any other character in the NT. Though stylo-statistical studies have sometimes suggested doubts about the authenticity of all but four or five of his letters, the methods used are themselves doubtful in their reasoning, particularly when their results clash with those of other, well-tried methods of literary and historical study. We may fairly confidently accept the Pauline authorship of the thirteen letters traditionally attributed to him, although there must remain some uncertainty whether a few of them (the Pastorals, and perhaps Ephesians) come directly from him (see EPISTLES, PAULINE). The picture which they give of Paul's career and theology agrees closely with that given in Acts, thus demonstrating (over against skeptical viewpoints) the substantial reliability of that source (see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES).

The picture that emerges is primarily that of a missionary. This was how Paul regarded himself. The key to the man is his sense of apostleship (Gal. 1:1; Rom. 1:1-6), of being called by the risen Christ (1 Cor. 9:1) to be His missionary to the Gentiles (Gal. 1:15-17; Rom. 15:15f.); through this mission he hoped to make his fellow Jews envious of the blessings brought by the Gospel and so lead them to faith in Christ (Rom. 11:13f.). In this missionary task Paul saw himself as the missionary to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7f.), who could claim to have evangelized the whole of the Aegean area and Greece; by setting his sights on Spain he could look forward to having covered most of the northern half of the Roman Empire (Rom. 15:17-29).

There emerges incidentally a pattern of missionary preaching (1 Tim. 2:7) with the leader selecting strategic centers where he worked long enough to establish a self-propagating church and entrusted the detailed outworking of the campaign to his assistants, both local and itinerant like himself (e.g., Epaphras, Col. 1:7; cf. 2:1; Timothy and Titus). Paul also appears as a man with a tremendous pastoral concern for his churches, conscious of the responsibility of a father for their continued growth (2 Cor. 11:28; 1 Cor. 4:14-21).

Paul's basic theology rested firmly on that of the primitive church; he frequently is indebted to it for theological and ethical material. Throughout his career he was beset by opponents who were envious of his success or anxious to upset his work. His theology is thus very much shaped by polemics, and it owed its individual development to the exigencies of debate. Two main types of opponent may be distinguished.

On the one hand, there were Judaizers, men who insisted that in order to be saved Gentiles as well as Jews must keep the law of Moses, including circumcision and the observance of Jewish festivals and food regulations, and who forbade fellowship between Jewish Christians and uncircumcised Gentile Christians. Paul's refusal to tolerate such requirements nearly led to a break in fellowship with the Jewish Christians, but although the more extreme Jewish Christians may have kept to themselves, the leaders (Peter, James, and John) sided with Paul and accepted the principle of freedom for the Gentiles (Galatians; Phil. 3; the opponents of Paul in 2 Corinthians appear to have been Jewish Christians of a similar character).

On the other hand, there were Hellenistic Christians who held incipient Gnostic views. They postulated a sharp dualism of spirit and matter, holding that the latter was unsavable but that spiritual salvation was possible here and now for an elite group who possessed a higher "knowledge" not accessible to all Christians. This affected their attitude to bodily life, producing curious mixtures of asceticism and moral license. Such beliefs appear to have been held in Corinth (1 Corinthians reflects them; they are much less obvious in 2 Corinthians), Colossae, and the churches indirectly addressed in the Pastorals. It is not always easy to draw a firm line between Judaizing and Gnostic outlooks, since there were strong elements of syncretism in Diaspora Judaism.

The theology developed by Paul in this situation demonstrated an essentially Jewish background. It shows his constant indebtedness to the OT and to his rabbinical training as a disciple of the Hillelite teacher Gamaliel (Acts 22:3). Nevertheless, what he says is in conscious opposition to Jewish thinking. He strongly attacks the view that men can find favor with God by obedience to the Mosaic law, since on his view of it the effect of the law is actually to heighten human sinfulness (Rom. 7:7-12). Thus the advantage of the Jew is cut away at a stroke (Rom. 3:9). But although Gentiles may have the law in their hearts, they too have failed to keep it, and so the whole world is guilty before God (Rom. 3:22f.). It is a plight from which it can be rescued only through Christ, and only through a crucified Christ who takes on Himself the curse of human sin (2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13) and offers Himself obediently to God as a sacrifice for it (Rom. 3:24f.). Thus through the sheer grace of God (Rom. 5:8) men are reconciled to Him (2 Cor. 5:18-20) and redeemed from the power of sin to belong to Him (1 Cor. 6:19f.). On the human side the gift is to be received by faith alone, the attitude in which a man accepts humbly what Christ has done for him, instead of trying to please God (Rom. 3:27-31; Rom. 4; Gal. 2:15–3:9; Eph. 2:8). To describe this experience Paul developed the terminology of justification, a divine act tantamount to forgiveness (Rom. 4:4-8).

For Paul, however, being a Christian is more than having a new status before God. In a rich variety of ways he speaks of a new experience of God. Through faith in Christ, the Christian stands in a personal relationship to his new Lord. He can be said to have died with Christ to his old life of sin and to be alive with Christ (Rom. 6:1-11). Paul claims to "know" Christ in a relationship of close spiritual communion (Phil. 3:10). The very frequent phrase "in Christ" has often been understood in this "mystical" sense, but more probably it refers basically to having one's life determined by the "fact" of Christ. In any case, what is of supreme significance for Paul is the death and resurrection of Christ. He knows no other Christ than the crucified, risen, and returning Christ (1 Cor. 2:2; 15:3-5, 20-23), and almost lets His earthly life fade into insignificance.

At the same time the Christian life is characterized by the experience of the Spirit (variously called the Spirit of God and the Spirit of Christ, Rom 8:9), who comes and enters the life of the believer (Rom. 8:9-11). It seems that the practical difference between the presence of Christ (Rom. 8:10) and of the Spirit was minimal, although Paul was quite clear that they were distinct persons. Possession of the Spirit is the essential mark of the Christian; through the Spirit all the power of God leading to holiness and ultimate transformation to resurrection life is given to the believer.

Such thinking could lead Gnostics to a highly spiritual view of Christ, severed from historical reality, and suggest that salvation in all its fullness was already present (1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Tim. 2:18). Against such dangers Paul emphasized the historical reality of the crucifixion of Christ (1 Cor. 1:23), and the reality of temptation and suffering in the life of the Christian who is not yet perfect (Phil. 3:12) and looks forward to the coming of Christ (2 Cor. 4). And against the Gnostic depreciation of the body he stressed the hope of the resurrection of the body as the bearer of human personality (1 Cor. 15; 2 Cor. 5:1-10). He combated any suggestion that Christ was merely one divine power among many, and insisted that the fullness of deity was present in Him. He was preexistent (Phil. 2:5-11), the divine agent in creation (1 Cor. 8:6), the expression of divine love in redemption (Gal. 2:20), the very image of God (Col. 1:15-20; 2:9), the supreme Lord who is yet subordinate to His Father (1 Cor. 15:28).

None of the above should be understood in an individualistic manner. Paul's thought is basically corporate as he thinks of believers in the plural as sharers in a common salvation. Together they form the body of Christ (Rom. 12:4f.; 1 Cor. 12), subordinate to their Head (Col. 2:19); they are a temple indwelt by the Spirit (Eph. 2:20-22); they are the bride whom Christ loved and died to redeem (Eph. 5:25-33). As such, Christians exist to glorify and serve God (1 Thess. 2:12), and this they do, not only by worshiping Him, but also by a mutual love which leads them to fulfil God's commandments (Rom. 13:8-10) in every aspect of their family and social life (Eph. 4:17–6:9). Hence the church is a society of which all are at one and human divisions cease to divide (Gal. 3:28f.).

Paul's gospel was a message, to be preached. His basic activity was that of a preacher, leading men to salvation through what was not merely a human message but one empowered by the Spirit and thus itself the word of God (1 Thess. 1:5; 2:13). So great was Paul's emphasis on the word that he attached comparatively little significance to the sacraments; Christ sent him to preach, not to baptize (1 Cor. 1:17). The outward act of baptism was secondary in importance: what mattered was what it signified, cleansing from sin (1 Cor. 6:11) and union with Christ in His death and resurrection by faith (Rom. 6:1-11; Col. 2:12). Nor should we have heard about the Lord's Supper from him, divinely ordained rite though it also is, had it not been for disorders at Corinth (1 Cor. 11:23ff.); for Paul it was a means of proclaiming the Gospel, and of communion with Christ, although participation in it was no automatic guarantee of salvation.

This stress on preaching must not be misunderstood to mean that the message is everything, so that the historical Christ does not matter, and Christ becomes merely the content of a message challenging men to existential decision. This is the error of R. Bultmann,* who reduced Pauline theology to an anthropology of man's existence prior to faith and under faith. To think thus is to miss the essentially christological and theological orientation of Paul; it also misrepresents the place of the historical Jesus for Paul and the OT "history of salvation" that preceded Him. "If Christ has not been raised, our preaching is useless and so is your faith"; for Paul, theology derived from his meeting with the risen Christ, who was the historical Jesus and the eternal Son of God.

I. HOWARD MARSHALL

PAUL THE DEACON (c.720-800). Italian chronicler, known also as "Paulus Levita" and "Warnefridi." He was called "the Deacon" from 782 onward. After an excellent education he became the tutor of Adelperga, daughter of King Desiderius. Then he was a member for a brief period of the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter at Civate before settling at Monte Cassino Monastery. In 782 he visited Charlemagne and remained in Francia for four years, writing the history of the diocese of Metz. After his return to Monte Cassino he wrote the famous Historia Gentis Langobardorum (History of the Lombard People), which was translated and published at Philadelphia in 1907 by W.D. Foulke. He wrote also a history of Rome, Historia Romana, which continued the Breviarium of Eutropius, an exposition of the Rule of St. Benedict, and various poems, biographies, and liturgical pieces.

PEAKE, ARTHUR SAMUEL (1865-1929). English scholar and writer. Born in Leek, Staffordshire, son of a Primitive Methodist* minister, he graduated at Oxford from a scholarship, became in 1889 lecturer at the new Mansfield College, and soon thereafter achieved the rarity for a Nonconformist of a theological fellowship at Merton College. He gave up these prospects to become tutor of the Primitive Methodist (later Hartley) College, Manchester, in 1892, and held that tutorship for the rest of his life, transforming the college and its reputation. In 1904 he became also the first Rylands professor of biblical exegesis at Manchester University, and the first dean of its theological faculty. His many books, though scholarly, were principally directed to a wide, rather than a learned, audience. Best known was the one-volume commentary on the Bible which he edited (1919) and which introduced thousands of students and laymen to biblical criticism.

A member of a church of the Revivalist tradition, he combined a gentle personality, warm evangelical piety, broadly traditional theology, and frank acceptance of literary criticism. This combination enabled him to procure wide acceptance for critical methods. He was perhaps the main British mediator of biblical scholarship in his day, and—though always a layman—the most widely known member of his church. Of ecumenical spirit, he worked hard for the union of the British Methodist churches, though he died before its consummation.

PEARSON, JOHN (1613-1686). Bishop of Chester. Educated at Eton and Cambridge, he was ordained in 1639 and became a prebendary of Salisbury in 1640. He served as chaplain to the Royalist forces in 1645, devoting himself later to theological study until the Restoration. With Peter Gunning in 1658 he debated with two Roman Catholics whether England or Rome was schismatic at the Reformation. He promoted the Polyglot Bible, and his weighty learning was demonstrated in the publication of his Exposition of the Creed (1659), a closely reasoned statement of the faith, with copious notes and references to early Christian Fathers. This classic work went through numerous editions, abridgments, and translations. Pearson became archdeacon of Surrey and master of Jesus College, Cambridge (1660), and held other academic posts till his appointment to Chester in 1673. He strongly supported the Restoration settlement at the Savoy Conference* of 1661, rejecting comprehensiveness in favour of uniformity. Convocation appointed him to superintend the translation of the Prayer Book into Latin. In 1672 he wrote Vindiciae Epistolarum Sancti Ignatii, an elaborate defense of the authenticity of letters ascribed to Ignatius of Antioch. Other works defended the Church of England against Roman Catholics and Nonconformists.

PEASANTS' REVOLT (1524-25). German revolutionary mass movement. Unrest had spread among German peasants because the territorial princes ignored their customary rights and introduced new taxes. After vainly looking to a reformed and strengthened empire for justice, some engaged in sporadic violence (Bundschuh movement, 1502-17). Luther's theological views and attacks on greedy princes, merchants, and clergy, although misunderstood by the peasant leaders, helped to ignite the uprising. It broke out at Stühlingen (Black Forest) in June 1524 and spread rapidly over southern and central Germany until by late April 1525 some 300,000 peasants were under arms. Their program, Twelve Articles of the Peasantry, called for: congregational election of pastors, modification of tithes, abolition of serfdom, discontinuing enclosure of common lands, elimination of feudal dues, and reforming the administration of justice. Although some knights participated (Götz von Berlichingen and Florian Geyer), the peasants generally lacked capable direction and organization. Even Thomas Münzer* in Thuringia was a better preacher and agitator than military leader.

Luther's harsh, uncompromising opposition (Against the Murderous and Thieving Hordes of Peasants) and the combined forces of the Hessian, Saxon, and Brunswick princes led to Münzer's defeat at Frankenhausen on 15 May 1525. The Swabian League under Count Truchsess suppressed the movement in Swabia and Franconia, and within six weeks it had been brutally crushed almost everywhere. The revolt was extremely detrimental to the Reformation. Even though Luther soon moderated, the disillusioned peasants turned against him, and Lutheranism lost its popular appeal. It enabled princes to centralize their authority, including that over their churches. Catholics portrayed it as a divine judgment against Protestantism, thus discouraging further defections from Rome.

PECK, JOHN MASON (1789-1858). Pioneer Baptist missionary in Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana. Born in Litchfield, Connecticut, he gained scant early education. He moved with his wife to New York and joined a Baptist church, where he was soon licensed to preach. Ordained in 1813, he ministered several years as a pastor before hearing the missionary challenge through Luther Rice.* In 1817 he and James E. Welch were appointed by the Foreign Mission Board to start work in the Mississippi Valley. Three years later the Board dropped the mission, but Peck stayed on; the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society assumed partial support. Besides itinerating widely, Peck founded Rock Spring Seminary, which became Shurtleff College; edited The Pio- neer; helped start the American Baptist Home Mission Society; and for several years was connected with the Baptist Publication Society.

HAROLD R. COOK

PECKHAM, JOHN (c.1225-1292). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1279. Born at Patcham, Sussex, he joined the Franciscans about 1250 and studied at Oxford, then at Paris under Bonaventure. He returned to Oxford in 1270 and later became English provincial of the Franciscans. In 1276 he was summoned to Rome to be the first theological lecturer at the papal schools, but in 1279 Nicholas III appointed him archbishop of Canterbury, displacing the royal candidate, Robert Burnell. As archbishop, Peckham defended the papal position and sought to initiate church reforms. At a provincial synod at Reading (1279) he legislated against pluralities and other abuses. He tried to raise clerical standards, advanced the Dominicans and Franciscans, and used the Welsh War to bring the Welsh Church more closely under the control of Canterbury. His reforms brought him into conflict with Edward I and with many of the clergy. He was an able theologian and a poet, and wrote also on scientific subjects.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

PECOCK, REGINALD (c.1393-1461). Bishop of Chichester. Born in Wales, he was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, was made master of Whittington College, London, in 1431, bishop of St. Asaph in 1444, and of Chichester in 1450. An ardent but wayward defender of the church system of his day against the followers of John Wycliffe,* Pecock employed a doubtful apologetic which led as early as the 1430s to a suspicion of heresy, while prosecution was only narrowly avoided in 1447. In 1455 his Repressor of Over Much Blaming of the Clergy, while a useful guide to his Lollard opponents' standpoint, seems to exalt natural religion above Scripture, while the Book of Faith (1456) deals unsatisfactorily with the respective spheres of faith and reason. A year later Pecock's unorthodox defenses of "orthodoxy," his tampering with the Apostles' Creed, and his political attachment to the falling Lancastrian party led to a charge of heresy. He recanted and was confined in an abbey with a small pension for the rest of his life.

PECULIAR PEOPLE. The term is a concept deeply embedded in Scripture and the structure of the primitive church, and appears in Tyndale's translation of the NT (1526). The name was applied to themselves by the Quakers of the seventeenth century and by the Tractarians (by way of disparagement) to the Evangelicals. More particularly, the Peculiar People, or Plumstead Peculiars, were a small sect of evangelical faith-healers founded by William Bridges in London in 1838. A humble and pious folk, they are largely confined to Kent and Essex. The Society of Dependents or Cokelers of West Sussex are an offshoot of the Peculiars, founded by John Sirgood.

PÉGUY, CHARLES PIERRE (1873-1914). French Catholic writer and poet who reflected the spiritual conflict between Catholic faith and the socialist ideal under the Third Republic. He abandoned his Catholic upbringing in lycée, and soon was drawn into the debate over Dreyfus (1894). The affair convinced him of the decay of traditional church and social ideals and pointed him toward involvement with the poor and those left out of society. He joined the socialist party under Jean Jaurès, but by 1900 found himself out of line because of his criticisms of the leaders and policies. The Cahiers de la Quinzaine (225 issues, 1900-1914), occasional articles, and essays which he published from the bookshop he had established became his forum. He began to suspect that socialism of Jaurès's sort was only half-good without the dimension of mystique, which he began to find in medieval Catholicism; indeed the modern world lacked this crucial dimension. By 1908 Péguy called himself a Catholic again. Whereas his early version of Jeanne d'Arc (1897) conceived salvation secularly, his new version (1910) displayed a sincerely deepened awareness of Catholic spirituality. Eve (1913) was his principal expression of his Christian faith. Between 1909 and 1913 he published a variety of essays and poetic mystères on medieval themes. He was killed in battle (1914). Only much later (1940s) was wide interest in his work aroused.

PELAGIA (d. c.311). Martyred in Antioch when only fifteen, she threw herself into the sea from a window to preserve her chastity when her home was surrounded by soldiers probably during the persecution by Diocletian. The name is also associated with a fourth-century recluse living in a grotto on the Mount of Olives practicing severe penances, and also with a virgin martyr of Tarsus who was reputed to have been burnt for refusing to become the mistress of the emperor.

PELAGIANISM. An ascetic movement with distinctive theological emphases, named after Pelagius, a Christian moralist. A well-educated Briton, trained in law, Pelagius was active in Rome c.383-409/10, teaching Christian perfection to aristocratic circles associated with Rufinus of Aquileia and Paulinus of Nola. He attacked Jerome's denigration of marriage, without accepting Jovinian's equation of marriage and virginity, and inveighed against the implications of Augustine's prayer (Confessions 10:29:40), "Give what you command, and command what you choose." His Expositions of the Thirteen Epistles of Paul drew on Augustine (e.g., Free Will), "Ambrosiaster," and Origen-Rufinus, but perhaps already criticized Augustine's opinions. He also wrote The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart; Faith in the Trinity (anti-Arian and anti-Apollinarian); Virginity; and The Law; and ascetic manifestos to Demetrias and Celantia. Pelagius sought to be a catholic teacher, opposed especially to Manichaeism, which encouraged moral pessimism and fatalism and, like Jerome's extremism, discredited asceticism. He viewed the Church as the community of the (adult) baptized committed to perfectionist ideals, and magnified man's incorruptible created capacity for freedom from sin. Grace comprised this God-given ability, the illumination of instruction and example, and forgiveness of sins.

Marius Mercator says Pelagius was inspired by Rufinus "the Syrian,"* but Rufinus's influence is more evident in Celestius* and African Pelagianism. The oriental affinities of Pelagian ideas, e.g., in Theodore of Mopsuestia,* require further investigation.

The Gothic attack on Rome dispersed Pelagius's coterie; many passed via Sicily to Africa. The subsequent presence of Pelagians (including Celestius) in Sicily is attested by Augustine and by the writings (Riches; Evil Teachers; The Possibility of Sinlessness; Chastity, etc.) of an anonymous Sicilian, who inculcated a severe asceticism, denying salvation to the rich unless they renounced their wealth.

In Carthage, Celestius's views on infant baptism and original sin were condemned by churchmen traditionally sensitive on these issues. (It was 411, when Donatists* and Catholics convened in Carthage; similarities were discernible between Donatists and Pelagians, e.g., in ecclesiology.) Paulinus of Milan was the chief prosecutor.

Augustine's notice was first caught by Celestius's assertion that infants were baptized for sanctification, not forgiveness. He wrote The Merits and Remission of Sins in defense of original sin, but remained respectful toward Pelagius, with whom he shared friends and enemies, criticizing only extravagant ascetic claims. Nature and Grace, his reply to Pelagius's Nature (which depends on The Sentences of Sextus*), still refrains from attacking Pelagius by name (415).

Pelagius quickly left Africa for Palestine, welcomed by John of Jerusalem, Jerome's old opponent. Both Pelagius and Jerome wrote to Demetrias in 414, and Jerome, who with some justice viewed Pelagius as an Origenist, began his Dialogues against the Pelagians. In 415 the Spanish heresy-hunter Orosius brought news of Africa's excommunication of Celestius and possibly suspicions of the Syrian Rufinus, Jerome's presbyter. A Jerusalem synod cleared Pelagius and others of Orosius's accusations, but resolved on a reference to Rome, while Orosius's heavy-handedness furthered the concretion of "the Pelagian heresy" out of disparate elements. Pelagius was again acquitted at the Synod of Diospolis (415), but only after equivocating and disowning Celestian views. A raid on Jerome's monastery at Bethlehem was blamed on Pelagians (416).

Palestinian developments and Celestius's ordination at Ephesus cast Eastern aspersions on Africa orthodoxy, reasserted in conciliar condemnations of Pelagius's Free Will at Carthage and Milevis (416). Pope Innocent I* obligingly excommunicated Pelagius and Celestius (417), but Pope Zosimus* lifted the ban after appeals from Celestius in person and Pelagius in writing. Against an increasingly identifiable "Pelagianism," another Carthage council issued nine canons (418), denying salvation to unbaptized infants. Violence between Catholics and Pelagians in Rome resulted in their banishment by Honorius, which together with African pressure evoked a volte-face condemnation from Zosimus (418). Rome's rejection of Pelagian views did not endorse the full African position to whose defense Augustine progressively harnessed Catholic tradition.

The popes rejected further appeals, Boniface from Celestius (423), Sixtus III from Julian of Eclanum* (439), who led eighteen Italian bishops deposed for refusing to subscribe Zosimus's verdict. He prosecuted a polemical controversy with Augustine until the latter's death. The author of the Predestinatus was possibly an associate of Julian. (Another Italian Pelagian, Annianus, deacon of the unknown "Celeda," was the first identifiable Latin translator of Chrysostom.)

Pelagian ideas were propagated in Britain by men like Agricola, Bishop Severianus his father, and Bishop Fastidius, a likely author of parts of the Pelagian corpus. The theory that Pelagianism's success in Britain was that of a movement of social protest against unjust Roman rule has been severely criticized. Gallic clergy visited Britain to eradicate the heresy, notably Germanus of Auxerre in 429 (sent by Pope Celestine) and perhaps c.447. In Gaul, too, Pelagianism found supporters, such as Leporius.*

Barred from Palestine by a synod at Antioch (424), Pelagius disappeared, and probably died in Egypt. Julian and Celestius found refuge in Nestorius's Constantinople (429), but his inquiries on their behalf, Celestine's intervention and Marius Mercator's Commonitory on the Name of Celestius led to banishment by Theodosius II and condemnation with Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus (431). Rejection was now final in East and West. Later Pope Gelasius tried to flush out Pelagian pockets in Dalmatia and central Italy and wrote a refutation of Pelagianism.

Recent research has emphasized not only Pelagianism's diversity and relation to other controversies, e.g., over Origenism,* but also its preservation of features of primitive Christianity.

PELOUBET, FRANCIS NATHAN (1831-1920). Writer of Sunday school literature. Born in New York City, he graduated from Williams College (1853) and Bangor (Maine) Theological Seminary, and was ordained (1857) as a Congregational minister. He was pastor of several churches in Massachusetts from 1857 to 1883. He produced between 1875 and 1920 the annual volumes of Select Notes on the International Sunday School Lesson, as well as writing Sunday school quarterlies from 1880 to 1919. He also revised several Bible dictionaries.

PEMBERTON, EBENEZER (1704-1777). American pastor. Born in Boston, son of a Congregational minister, he graduated from Harvard College (1721), and after serving as a chaplain was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in New York City (1727), having been ordained in Boston by a Congregationalist council. He formed close ties with J. Dickinson,* Aaron Burr, and John Pierson, all based in New Jersey. These four, of New England Puritan background, represented a powerful element in the formative stages of the Presbyterian Church: a group which resisted the doctrinal mentality of the Scotch-Irish and fought against slavish subscription even to the Westminster Confession.* Pemberton became a close friend of George Whitefield,* and with Dickinson was prominent in the founding of the College of New Jersey (1746). In 1754 he left the Presbyterian Church for a twenty-year ministry in the famous (Congregational) Old South Church, Boston. KEITH J. HARDMAN

PENANCE; PENITENCE (from Lat. poena). Regarded as a sacrament in the Eastern and Roman churches, it originated as a development of the idea of repentance which included not only an inward feeling of contrition, but also an outward act of self-abasement. Gradually the latter predominated and ultimately took the place of the former. The penitent was required to confess his guilt (exomologesis), and submit to discipline (e.g., exclusion from the Eucharist; committal to prayer, fasting, almsgiving), eventually to receive absolution and restoration. It probably arose from NT passages on discipline (e.g., Matt. 18:18; 1 Cor. 5:3-5; 1 Tim. 1:20; Titus 3:10). Early references to such discipline can be found in 1 Clement 57 and Hermas, Visions 3.5.

After the irruption of Montanism,* penance was part of the regular discipline of the church. Prior to Novatianism,* the censures were short and administered simply, e.g., exclusion from participation in or in sight of the sacrament, exclusion from the church, for a few weeks. During the third to fifth centuries the time lengthened considerably. The practice was to permit only one penance after baptism, it was public and formal, and distinction was made between graver and lesser sins. The Novatianists refused to remit post-baptismal sins, and in reaction to them the penitential system tended to become more rigid and systematic (e.g., in the letters of Pacian to Symphronianus). Penance came to be regarded more as a penalty and less of a privilege. The Council of Elvira* (c.305) reveals the position at the end of the third century. The Penitential stages were developed, first laid down in the councils of Neocaesarea and Ancyra (314). Private penance eventually replaced public penance; the first reliable evidence for private penance as a sacrament was canon 2 of the Third Council of Toledo (589), which condemned it. In the East, after 1000 the pattern became (1) confession, (2) interrogation, (3) absolution, (4) assignment of penance. In the West, penance led to the growth of Indulgences,* whereby canonical penance for sin could be remitted by money payments.

At the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) private penance was made compulsory at least once a year. The Council of Trent* (1551) stated that the sacrament of penance was absolutely necessary for the forgiveness of postbaptismal sin, and consisted in confession, contrition, absolution, and satisfaction. (For the Protestant position see, e.g., Calvin's Institutes.)

PENINGTON, ISAAC (1616-1679). Quaker apologist. The eldest son of Sir Isaac Penington, lord mayor of London (1642-43) and a staunch Puritan. In 1654 he married Mary Springett, a widow; both had for some time been among the "Seekers," a group eventually amenable to Quakerism, and Isaac's "convincement" took place in London, 1658. He was imprisoned six times beginning in 1661 for refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance.* Several long imprisonments in the Reading and Aylesbury jails were borne with cheerful endurance, characteristic of his innocency of life universally recognized. As a leading Friend, he was a close acquaintance of George Fox.* Five children were born to him, one son, Edward (1667-1711), emigrating to Pennsylvania. His stepdaughter, Gulielma Springett, married William Penn.* KEITH J. HARDMAN

PENN, WILLIAM (1644-1718). English Quaker; founder of Pennsylvania. Born in London, he early became a Quaker and was expelled from Christ Church, Oxford, for Nonconformist views (1661). He traveled for a time in Europe, served briefly in the British navy, and studied law in London. In 1666 he went to Ireland to manage his father's property. He was imprisoned several times, using the occasions to write defenses of Quakerism. Finally freed in 1670, Penn made a missionary trip in Europe and married in 1672. He engaged in further missionary journeys, and by pen and pulpit advocated religious and political freedoms. He helped to send 800 Quakers to New Jersey (1677-78), and in 1681 secured a charter for Pennsylvania from Charles II because of a debt owed his father by the king. He later acquired the region of Delaware. Penn's finest accomplishment was the founding of Pennsylvania as a refuge for religious dissenters and freedom of expression. It was his "Holy Experiment," and his four "Frames of Government" (1682, 1683, 1696, 1701) and his fair and just treatment of the Indians set the pattern for Pennsylvania's colonial history. His friendship with James II cost him control of the colony from 1692 to 1694. In later years financial hardship plagued him, and for a time he was in a debtors' prison. In 1712 he almost completed transfer of the colony's control to the Crown when he became ill. His wife managed his affairs until his death in London. Among his writings are The Great Case of Liberty of Conscience (1670), Christian Quaker and His Divine Testimony Vindicated (1673), and An Address to Protestants of All Persuasions (1679).

PENRY, JOHN (1559-1593). Elizabethan Puritan divine. Born in Wales, he graduated from Cambridge, afterward becoming an itinerant preacher in Wales, calling the attention of the government to the need for the propagation of the Gospel there, in A Treatise addressed to the Queen and Parliament (1587). Archbishop Whitgift ordered his arrest and the seizure of the copies of this book. Penry himself received a short prison sentence. Later he was directly associated with the production of the Marprelate Tracts* (1588) in which the prelates were severely attacked. Being suspected as their author (which has not yet been verified), he fled to Scotland where he was protected by sympathetic clergy. When the controversy over the tracts had died down, he returned to London and joined a society of separatists. He was soon recognized and arrested. After a trial he was executed. PETER TOON

PENTECOST. The name is derived from the Greek word for "fiftieth" (pentēcostos), for it was seven weeks after Passover that the "Feast of Weeks" (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:10) or the "Feast of Harvest" (Exod. 23:16) was observed. It marked the end of the barley harvest and the beginning of the wheat harvest. It was one of the three occasions in the year on which male Israelites were to appear before the Lord (Deut. 16:16), but it was much less observed as an occasion of pilgrimage than the feasts of Passover and Tabernacles. Pentecost was regarded in later Judaism as the conclusion of the Passover rather than as a harvest festival. After the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70 it was taken to commemorate the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai. Acts 2 records how the Holy Spirit was given to the first Christians on the day of Pentecost, which no doubt symbolized both the completion of the redemptive act of Good Friday and Easter and the beginning of the harvest of the nations. Pentecost was observed by the second century as a Christian feast, second only in importance to Easter. The name "Whitsunday" came to be attached to it because of its being a major occasion for baptisms, the baptisands being clothed in white. New proposals for the calendar of the churches in England refer (as does the Church of South India) to "Sundays after Pentecost" instead of "after Trinity." R.E. NIXON

PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES. A number of fundamentalist Protestant sects that emphasize Spirit baptism as an experience different from conversion and evidenced by speaking in tongues (Acts 2:1-13). They also teach the inspiration of the Bible, salvation by conversion and revival, instantaneous sanctification, divine healing; and claim to be a restoration of original Christianity. Early Pentecostal meetings were characterized by outbursts of ecstatic enthusiasm featuring healings, speaking in tongues, and motoric movements.

Pentecostalism began as an outgrowth of the Holiness Movement.* In 1901 a Bible school called Bethel College was started at Topeka, Kansas, by Charles F. Parham who, using no texbook but the Bible, drilled his students in Spirit baptism teaching. These pupils carried the message of the Spirit into Kansas, and when the school closed both teacher and students went throughout the South preaching Pentecostalism. Houston, Texas, became the next center of "Spirit baptism" when Parham and a local minister, W.F. Carothers, opened a school. One of their converts, William J. Seymour, brought the teaching to Los Angeles in 1906 where he founded the Apostolic Faith Gospel Mission on Azusa Street. Seymour, a black with only one eye, was described by one who attended his mission as being "meek, plain spoken and no orator," in short, not a very charismatic personality. Despite his unimpressive appearance, the results of Azusa revival attracted nationwide attention. Besides the many visitors, including ministers, who were influenced by the revival, publications were put out from this headquarters which caused the rapid growth of the movement. As other churches were started in different parts of the United States, the importance of Los Angeles decreased.

Pentecostalism became an international movement early in its history. One of the important leaders in spreading its teaching to Europe was Thomas Ball Barratt, a Cornishman who was a pastor of a Methodist church in Oslo, Norway. Barratt came to the United States in 1905 to solicit funds so that he might build a larger church. Some believe he visited the Azusa Street Mission, but even though that is debatable it is certain that he attended a Pentecostal meeting in New York City and experienced a Holy Spirit baptism and spoke in tongues. He returned to Norway and became an evangelist for Pentecostalism. People thronged to his meetings, and by 1916 he was able to found the Filadelfia Church, which became the largest dissenter body in Norway. Barratt was also influential in spreading Pentecostalism in Denmark and Sweden. In 1907 an Anglican clergyman, Alexander A. Boddy, after visiting Barratt, returned to England determined to promote a similar Pentecostal awakening there. Boddy wrote a pamphlet, Pentecost for England, which was widely distributed, and he invited Barratt to Britain (September 1907). Within a few months there was a Pentecostal revival in England.

Later the movement spread into Germany also. Pentecostalism also appeared in India, where it centered in Mukti and the orphanage of Pandita Ramabai. In 1909 groups from Mukti and missionaries from the United States and Great Britain had extended its teachings throughout India. In addition to W Europe and India, Pentecostalism also spread to Latin America, where it is claimed that eight out of every ten evangelical Protestants are Pentecostal. In Chile the very successful Pentecostal work began with the ministry of Willis C. Hoover, pastor of a Methodist Church in Valparaiso. He began holding charismatic meetings until his church became the "Azusa" of Chile. Later he was forced from the Methodist pastorate and started the Methodist Pentecostal Church, beginning a movement which has swollen to the present 500,000 Pentecostals in the country. Another area of rapid growth has been Brazil, where the charismatic revival began in 1910 with the establishment of the Congregacioni Christiani which has burgeoned to 1,400 congregations with nearly 500,000 communicants. Other Brazilian groups such as the Assemblies of God have used purely indigenous workers and scored equally impressive gains.

Early Pentecostals never desired new denominations, but rather felt they should call all Christians back to what they believed to be apostolic faith. Everywhere the work was to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, which in practice meant the control of visiting evangelists. But as their teaching was opposed by other groups, especially the Holiness churches, they began to organize denominations. Among the more important Pentecostal churches one could list the Assemblies of God, the Church of God in Christ, the Church of God (Tomlinson), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, and the United Pentecostal Church International.

The Assemblies of God* is the largest of these groups, with a total of 645,000 members. Founded in Hot Springs, Arkansas (1914), it maintains a denominational headquarters in Springfield, Missouri. The church has been very active in foreign missions and publication activities. In contrast with early Pentecostalism, the Assemblies give careful attention to the training of ministers. The church combines congregational and presbyterian forms of government and represents the most cultivated group in movement. Their meetings while emotional have departed from the ecstatic form of the early Pentecostal revival.

The Church of God in Christ is the largest and most influential black Pentecostal body. Though C.P. Jones made a notable contribution, C.H. Mason was the founder and the original leader of this church as a Pentecostal body. The church, organized like the Assemblies of God, publishes a periodical called the Whole Truth and had 425,000 members in 1964. Among the other Pentecostal churches using the title "Church of God," one of the more interesting is that over which A.J. Tomlinson* was the general overseer. Starting as a Holiness church in 1886, this Church of God turned Pentecostal and suffered many divisions. Fragmentation is typical of the Pentecostal movement as a whole, and Elmer Clark claims that after Tomlinson's death in 1907 the Church of God divided into more than two dozen organizations.

The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, with its leader Aimee Semple McPherson,* is the best-known Pentecostal body. The church, organized in 1927, centers at the Angelus Temple located in Los Angeles. The colorful preaching of Mrs. McPherson started the movement, which continues today with 741 churches and over 90,000 members.

Recent developments have excited a lively interest in Pentecostalism. Its impressive growth while the major Protestant churches have been declining has caused concern in many circles. The fact that higher social classes are being attracted to its teachings—coupled with the building of attractive modern church buildings, accredited colleges (such as Oral Roberts University), orphanages, and other institutions—has also brought increasing public attention. In the post-World War II period a spate of new "independent" Pentecostal groups has appeared, including the New Order of the Latter Rain, Wings of Healing, the World Church, the Gospel Assemblies, and the Full Gospel Fellowship of Ministers and Churches, International. In addition to these, practically every major denomination, including the Episcopal, Roman Catholic, and Lutheran churches, now has its own charismatic element. The explosive growth of indigenous Pentecostal churches in Chile, Brazil, and South Africa has caused some to predict that the future center of Christianity will be in the southern hemisphere among non-Caucasian Pentecostals. The "Jesus people" have expressed interest in charismatic experiences, and the Pentecostal antiestablishment, egalitarian approach to women and blacks has made it attractive to a revolutionary age.

PEPIN III (the Short) (714/15-768). King of the Franks. Son of Charles Martel,* he with his brother Carloman succeeded in 741 to the office of major domus, "mayor of the palace." When Carloman retired to a monastery in 747, Pepin received the mayoralty title. Considering himself king in all but name, he secured the sanction of Zacharias,* bishop of Rome, to the setting aside of Childeric III, last of the Merovingians, who in order to maintain the legal fiction of that dynasty was named king of all the Franks in 743 (in fact all power had devolved on the Carolingian line). Zacharias died, however, before he ratified the new dynasty. Boniface* and several other bishops consecrated Pepin at Soissons in 751; his anointing with his two sons, Charles and Carloman, by Pope Stephen, thus confirming the dynasty, took place in 754 at St.-Denis, whose monks had educated Pepin and where he was to die.

Though the more dramatic creation of the new "Roman Empire" awaited the coronation of Pepin's son Charles (Charlemagne*) in Rome in 800, Pepin III had in fact brought into being that interrelationship of W European political power and W Christian religious structure which reshaped and revitalized the remnants of Latin Roman civilization. That such occurred in the face of Arabic Islamic expansion about the Mediterranean and of Eastern Christianity's Iconoclastic Controversy* showed how Pepin actively involved himself in affairs of both church and state. He thus assisted Boniface in the ecclesiastical reform of the whole Frankish church, and assisted Chrodegang,* his relative, in a comparable monastic reform and, through defeat of the Lombards and the recovery of the Eastern-claimed exarchate of Ravenna, in creating by "donation" the Papal States (756).

PERFECTIONISM. The teaching that moral or religious perfection (in some cases sinlessness) is not only an ideal toward which to strive, but a goal attainable in this life. Within the Christian tradition, perfectionism has attempted to be faithful to certain neglected scriptural themes (cf. Matt. 5: 48; 1 Cor. 2:6; Eph. 4:13; Col. 1:28; 4:12; Heb. 6:1; 1 John 4:18, etc.). Most proponents have identified Christian perfection with "perfect love." Perfectionism in the early church reveals Gnostic and Platonic influence (cf. Clement of Alexandria*). Origen* developed perfectionism in the direction of ascetic and monastic renunciation of the world. This monastic ideal was dominant in the Middle Ages and remains a powerful force in Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism. Jerome* revealed Pelagian influence, and Augustine's* teaching tended toward perfectionism though he drew back from such conclusions in controversy with Pelagianism.* Mysticism* influenced perfectionism and became intertwined with it in the Middle Ages. The Reformers were generally anti-perfectionistic, though perfectionism appeared among some forms of Anabaptism and to some extent in Arminius and his followers. In Anglicanism the perfectionism of William Law* and Jeremy Taylor* deeply influenced John Wesley,* whose teachings on the subject became the central concern of Methodism, the major advocate of Christian perfection. Wesley distinguished absolute perfection from Christian perfection, and defined the latter as freedom from sin only in the sense of "a voluntary transgression of a known law." For Wesley, perfection was received instantaneously by faith and confirmed by the witness of the Holy Spirit. In America a form of perfectionism was advocated by Asa Mahan and C.G. Finney* in the first half of the nineteenth century. At midcentury there emerged from Methodism the American Holiness Movement,* a more revivalistic and rigorist advocate of Wesley's perfectionism. From this developed the Church of the Nazarene, the Wesleyan Church, some forms of Pentecostalism, and other modern advocates of perfectionism.

PERKINS, JUSTIN (1805-1869). American Congregational missionary to Persia. Born in West Springfield, Massachusetts, and educated at Westfield Academy, Amherst College, and Andover Theological Seminary, he was ordained in 1833. He went to Persia under the American Board and there labored among Nestorian Christians. In 1835 he established his mission in Urumiah and founded several schools and a mission press from which issued many of his works, notably Missionary Life in Persia (1861). A noted scholar, Perkins translated the Bible into Syriac and was the first to reduce the Nestorian vernacular to writing. He acquired valuable Syriac manuscripts for European libraries.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

PERKINS, WILLIAM (1558-1602). English Puritan scholar. Born in Marston Jabbet, Warwickshire, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, he was fellow there till 1595. He was thereafter lecturer at Great St. Andrews, Cambridge, till his death. A noted preacher and pastor, he influenced many undergraduates who later became Puritan leaders (W. Ames* was perhaps the best known). Though associated with the classical movement, he never publicly advocated a presbyterian polity, but was concerned for pastoral renewal and practical piety. He wrote many popular spiritual guides like A golden chaine (1590), which went through numerous editions in England and abroad, as far away as Hungary. A notable systematic theologian, Perkins had a rare capacity for popularization and presenting important issues without trivializing them. In addition to writing substantial treatises like De Praedestinatione (1597), which provoked Arminius to reply, Perkins was a prolific commentator on Scripture, a formidable patristic scholar, and polemicist on subjects ranging from Roman Catholicism to witchcraft and astrology. His writing on preaching, the role of the ministry, and collection of cases of conscience had considerable influence in the Church of England and the Netherlands. He was one of the founders of the tradition of English practical divinity which considerably influenced continental Pietism during the seventeenth century.

PERPETUA (d.203). Young Carthaginian noble and martyr. Mother of a baby son, she was arrested with four fellow catechumens, all plausibly from one household, including Felicitas (perhaps a slave) who bore a daughter prematurely in prison. They were baptized and joined by their catechist Saturus, with whom four died in the amphitheater. The Passion of Perpetua incorporates accounts of their prison experiences, especially visions, by Perpetua and Saturus. Its compiler, probably not Tertullian, was Montanist like the martyrs, but both martyrs and Passion were revered in the African Church. The apocalyptic, movingly feminine Passion vividly reflects the eschatological conceptions, internal tensions, and liturgical customs of contemporary Carthaginian Christianity.

PERRY, CHARLES (1807-1891). First Church of England bishop of Melbourne, Australia. Educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was influenced by Charles Simeon,* he became a fellow of Trinity College. He gained pastoral experience by creating the new parish of St. Paul's, Cambridge, where he was vicar from 1842 to 1847. In 1847 he was chosen as first bishop of the new colony of Victoria. On his arrival in Melbourne there were only three colonial chaplains. During the gold rushes of the 1850s he found great difficulty in supplying clergy or churches for the vast increases of population. Perry's Evangelical convictions actuated him to involve the laity in the government of his diocese. His conference of 1851 was the first of its kind in Australia. He resigned from his diocese in 1876 and became a canon of Llandaff Cathedral. He played an important part in many Evangelical societies and in the foundation of Evangelical theological colleges in Oxford and Cambridge. He published many tracts and sermons against rationalism and ritualism, and he was a speaker at the church congresses from 1874 to 1888.

PERSECUTION. Persecution of Christians has occurred for a variety of reasons. Those persecuted have lost possessions, liberty, or life because they were considered dangerous or offensive. Responsibility for persecution has rested with individuals, mobs, the state, or the church.

In the early period, persecution was initiated partly by Roman emperors and partly by mobs. Reasons for the imperial opposition varied. Nero* (54-68) persecuted Christians to escape suspicion for burning Rome, Domitian* (81-96) out of fear of possible rivals and of Christian influence, Aurelius* (161-180) because he was sympathetic to Stoicism, Decius* (249-251) for the political threat of a growing Christian body, and Diocletian* (284-305) because he feared that Christians were disloyal and an impediment to a reorganization of the state.

The means of persecution similarly varied. Persecution was restricted to imprisonment and execution in Nero's time, but in Diocletian's an edict required that churches be demolished, Scriptures confiscated, clerics tortured, and Christian civil servants deprived of their citizenship and executed if unrepentant. Although mob violence was somewhat restrained during the reigns of Trajan (98-117), Hadrian* (117-38), and Pius (138-61), Christians nevertheless suffered. The legal grounds on which persecution was carried out are obscure. According to rumor, Christians were cannibals, atheists, and incestuous. No proof, however, was ever produced in substantiation. Apparently the nomen upsum of Christian became punishable without any other attendant vice, but the refusal to worship the emperor's nomen could easily be viewed as politically treasonous. A general law making Christianity a religio illicita was probably not in effect before the second century, contrary to what Tertullian* claimed. Galerius's edict of toleration in 311 ended this era of persecution.

With the growth of papalism in the Middle Ages, church and state became intermingled. Thus when Charlemagne* conquered the Saxons in the late eighth century, he forcibly Christianized them at the same time. In 1179 the Third Lateran Council ordered secular rulers to punish heretics, and in 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council gave the same charge to bishops. The notion that religious deviation was best settled by the sword was further confirmed by the Crusades against the Islamic people in Palestine in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Heretics, such as the Albigenses in S France and the Waldenses, were also the victims of crusades, many dying in the process.

At first the pursuit of heretics was disorganized, but in 1231 Gregory IX* established the Inquisition.* It reached its peak activity at the end of that century. In 1478 it was resuscitated in Spain, as it was later for the Counter-Reformation.* It survived officially until the nineteenth century, being suppressed in France, for example, in 1808, and in Spain in 1834. Convicted heretics who recanted were allowed to spend the rest of their lives in prison as penance, but those who persisted in their heresy were executed.

The martyrdom of John Hus* (1415) was an ominous reminder to the Protestant Reformers of the difficulties they could encounter. Many thousands are said to have died under Henry VIII.* In the reign of Mary Tudor,* Hugh Latimer,* Nicholas Ridley,* and Thomas Cranmer* were among those who perished. In Europe religious differences erupted in civil wars, principally in the Netherlands and France. Protestants also persecuted Catholics. In Lutheran lands such as Scandinavia, Catholics suffered greatly for their faith. Anabaptists* were also martyred by both Catholics and Protestants. Similarly the death penalty was passed on Michael Servetus* by both Catholics and Protestants, but the authorities in Geneva apprehended him and carried out the sentence.

During the Thirty Years' War (1618-48), persecution and intolerance did much to discredit Christian faith. The secular philosophy of the Enlightenment* resulted, and Christianity was immediately declared the enemy of the people. During the Revolution in France, the land was "dechristianized" and much suffering was incurred. In 1801, however, Napoleon ended this treatment of the church by entering into a concordat* with Rome.

In the nineteenth century, many countries sought to grant effective religious toleration to all. Despite this, harassment of the church still continued in some lands. In France, for example, it was done in the name of liberalism. In 1864 the pope countered by reasserting, in the name of God, his ancient theocratic claims over secular authority. But it was not until the twentieth century that carefully planned persecution was again undertaken by the state. Totalitarian regimes have ruthlessly and fanatically tried to eliminate Christianity. It is impossible to estimate the loss of Christian life under Nazism and Communism, but it would appear to be greater than at any other comparable period in history.

In summary, it may be said that persecution has occurred, first, for religious reasons as heresy or theological deviation has threatened the religious establishment which has then resorted to force as a means of self-protection; second, for political reasons when Christian actions or scruples were interpreted as disloyalty or treason; third, for racial or nationalistic reasons when, for example, the presence of Christians in the Roman Empire was felt to be the explanation of natural disasters and military defeats on the grounds that the nation's gods had thus been alienated; and finally, for ideological reasons as totalitarian regimes have found their philosophy opposed by Christian faith.

PERTH, FIVE ARTICLES OF (1618). A drastic innovation in Scottish Presbyterian ritual and worship passed by the general assembly under the direct coercion of James VI, who held that Episcopacy was more congenial to his policies. These Articles decreed kneeling at Communion, private Communion in cases of necessity, private baptism in similar cases, observance of the great annual festivals of the church, and confirmation by bishops. The Articles were abolished by the Covenanting assembly of 1638, but after the Restoration of Charles II in 1660 an even more stringent Episcopacy was forced upon Scotland. Such was the eventual reaction to the article on private Communion, nevertheless, that it was not until 1954 that the Church of Scotland general assembly revoked the Act of 1690 which, after the deposition of the Stuart dynasty, prohibited the private celebration of Communion. PETAVIUS, DIONYSIUS (1583-1652). French Jesuit scholar. Born Denis Pétau, native of Orléans, he took his master's degree at sixteen and lectured in philosophy at Bourges (1603-5), became a Jesuit, and read theology at the Sorbonne. He then lectured in rhetoric in the Jesuit colleges at Reims (1609-12), La Flèche, and the Collège de Clermont in Paris (1618), taking the chair of dogmatic theology there in 1621 and continuing as librarian after retirement. The editions he produced included works of the fourth-century bishop Synesius (1612), three orations of Julian the Apostate (1614), and the complete works of Epiphanius of Constantia (1622). He attacked Calvinists and Jansenists; the latter had resented his Dogmata theologia (4 vols., 1644-50), unfinished at his death. He upheld frequent confession and Communion, found the patristic tradition not infallible, and believed in the progressive development of doctrine. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PETER, PREACHING OF. A work, probably of the late second century, purporting to contain a collection of Peter's sermons written by the apostle himself. No copy of it has survived, but there are fairly extensive quotations in Clement of Alexandria* and Origen.* It seems to have been an orthodox book, which Origen considered might have been genuine, and to have originated in Egypt. It had an apologetic purpose to show the superiority of Christianity to Judaism and paganism. Christians find Christ to be the Law and the Word, and they worship God through Him with direct and perfect knowledge.

PETER COMESTOR (c.1100-c.1180). Scholar, exegete, and historian, hence known as "Peter the Eater" (of books). A priest at Notre Dame in Troyes, he was chapter dean there from 1145 to 1167. By 1160 he belonged to the chapter at Notre Dame in Paris; soon he became chancellor of the cathedral school (1164-68 and 1178-80) and teacher of theology (1164-68). Near the end of his life he retired to the abbey of St.-Victor in Paris as a canon regular (1169). With other Victorines he used allegory and etymology in his study of the Scriptures. His writings included 150 sermons; glosses and commentaries on Lombard's Sentences; commentaries on the gospels, Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians; and Sententiae de sacramentis. His most influential work was Historia scholastica (1169-73), a Bible history written in the perspective of ecclesiastical and world history. The work earned him the title "master of histories" and was popular for several centuries.

PETER DE BRUYS (d. c.1131). Heretical preacher. Beginning in the insignificant French village of Bruys, he preached against the church of the day. During twenty years he gained a considerable influence in S France, and toward the end of his life he joined forces with Henry of Lausanne.* His teaching is known largely from the hostile abbot of Cluny, Peter the Venerable,* who points to five heretical doctrines. Peter taught that infant baptism was not valid, as only personal faith could bring salvation; that churches are unnecessary, as God hears according to the worthiness of the individual and not of the place; that the cross should not be an object of veneration but rather of execration, as it pointed to Christ's torture; that there is not a Real Presence in the Sacrament; and that sacrifices, prayers, and good works on behalf of the dead have no effect. Underlying this teaching is the belief that the Christian should be prepared to interpret the gospels even against the church (other Scripture he evidently regarded as inferior to the gospels), and a remarkable emphasis upon personal faith as the sole means of salvation.

His following was part of the widespread evangelical ferment of the period, but the iconoclasm of his followers and his own burning of crosses enraged the conservative devotions of the mob, and he was burnt at St. Gilles. Attempts to identify him with the Cathari* fail to do justice to his distinctive teaching which relates faith to salvation more clearly than almost anybody before Luther. His followers were known as "Petrobusians."

PETER LOMBARD (c.1095-1169). Known as "the Master of the Sentences." Born in Lombardy, he was educated at Bologna and went to Paris, where by 1141 he had written a commentary on the Psalms and a gloss on Paul and had become a canon at Notre Dame. In 1159 he was elected bishop of Paris. His fame rests chiefly upon his Book of Sentences (Libri Quatuor Sententiarum), finished in 1157 or 1158. The book is basically a compilation with numerous citations to the Church Fathers and to near contemporaries such as Anselm of Laon,* Peter Abelard,* Hugh of St.-Victor,* the Decretum of Gratian,* the anonymous Summa Sententiarum, and the canons of Ivo of Chartres.* Lombard's great achievement was in organizing these materials into a sound, brief, objective summary of doctrine.

The work is divided into four books: (1) "On the mystery of the Trinity"; (2) "Concerning the creation and formation of corporal and spiritual things and many other items pertaining thereto"; (3) "Concerning the incarnation of the word and other matters pertaining thereto"; (4) "Concerning the sacraments and sacramental signs." He showed originality in arranging his texts, in using various currents of thought, in avoiding extremes between authoritarians and dialecticians, and in presenting the theology of the sacraments. He was one of the first to insist on the number seven as the proper group of sacraments, to distinguish them from sacramentals, and to state that they are not merely "visible signs of invisible grace" but also "the cause of the grace it signifies."

Lombard's work marked the culmination of a long tradition of theological pedagogy. By 1222 Alexander of Hales* had introduced it into his theological course as the standard text, and from here it passed into the curriculum of other universities in Europe to such an extent that all candidates in theology were required to comment on it as preparation for the doctoral degree.

The work continued to be used and commented upon (there were 180 commentaries written on it in England alone) until well into the seventeenth century, when it was finally replaced by the work of Thomas Aquinas* as amplified by Cajetan.* Despite the wide acceptance there were those who opposed Lombard's teachings both during and after his lifetime. Contemporaries such as Robert of Melun* criticized his apparent acceptance of Abelard's* teaching that, in Christ, God is not man, but has humanity. This understanding, called "christological nihilism," was condemned by Pope Alexander III* (1177). In the latter part of the twelfth century Lombard's Trinitarian teaching was opposed by Gilbert de la Porrée and Joachim of Fiore.* Efforts to have his work condemned were unsuccessful, and at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) Joachimism was anathematized and Lombard was acknowledged as orthodox. There were still disputes, however, and from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries there remain lists of "articles in which the Master of the Sentences is not commonly held by all."

PETER MARTYR (c.1205-1252). Dominican reformer. Born of Cathari* parents in Verona, he was converted to Romanism while a student in Bologna. He entered the Dominican Order in 1221, perhaps under Dominic's personal influence, and soon distinguished himself as an ardent, eloquent opponent of the Cathari. He won many back to Roman Catholicism in the cities of N and central Italy, organized cells of laymen to combat heresy, and successively held priorships of several Dominican houses. The papacy recognized his effectiveness and zeal by appointing him papal inquisitor in 1232 and again in 1251. En route from Como to Milan in 1252 he was assassinated by Cathari. The following year he was canonized by Innocent IV. His martyrdom became a favorite theme in late medieval art and was depicted by Titian's work in the Venetian church of SS Giovanni e Paulo. He was named a patron of the Holy See. JAMES DE JONG

PETER MARTYR (Pietro Martire Vermigli) (1491-1562). Protestant Reformer. Described by Beza* as "a phoenix sprung from the ashes of Savonarola," he was born in Florence and dedicated by his father to St. Peter Martyr* (d.1252). Educated by the Augustinian Order, he himself became a monk and later prior of the Neapolitan monastery of San Pietro-ad-aram. Influenced at first by Juan de Valdés,* he soon turned to the writings of Bucer* and Zwingli* and became a serious student of the Bible. B. Ochino* was his companion in his spiritual quest. Because of his unorthodox views he was transferred to Lucca as prior of San Frediano. Here his expository preaching attracted large crowds; and for the monastery he recruited such teachers as G.E. Tremellius and G. Zanchius.

Having fully adopted Protestant views, he fled Italy and took refuge first at Zurich, then at Basle. Then with the help of M. Bucer he became professor of theology at Strasbourg. During his five years here he married Catherine Dammartin, a former nun. With Ochino he answered T. Cranmer's* invitation to visit England. From the government he gained a pension of forty marks, and in 1548 he was appointed regius professor at Oxford. His preaching in Christ Church, where he was a canon, attracted much attention. He entered fully into English religion and had a part in the Prayer Book of 1552, the reform of canon law, and debates on Holy Communion. His views angered many Oxfordshire clergy.

After Mary's accession he was imprisoned, but with S. Gardiner's* help he was allowed to return to Strasbourg, where he regained his professorship. On account of his theology of Holy Communion, however, he felt it necessary to find a new home in Zurich. Here he enjoyed a happy relationship with Bullinger* and the English refugees who were there. He was appointed professor of Hebrew and had a small part in the preparation of the Second Helvetic* Confession.

PETER MONGO (Peter Mongus; "Peter the Hoarse") (fifth century). Monophysite bishop of Alexandria, 477-90. Assisting the Alexandrian patriarch Dioscorus* as deacon at the Robber Synod of Ephesus* in 449, Peter reportedly collaborated with other intransigent Cyrillians in the death of Flavian, bishop of Constantinople. Theodore of Antinoe consecrated him bishop of Alexandria. In 482 he accepted the Henotikon; subsequently he was recognized as official patriarch in communion with Constantinople. In a delicate balancing act over Christology he claimed to regard Pope Leo I and Chalcedon* with horror, but avoided terms that would startle officials. Initially the monks in his area opposed him for being too Chalcedonian, but eventually they yielded to him.

PETER NOLASCO (c.1182-1249 or 1256). Cofounder of the Order of Our Lady of Ransom (Mercedarians*). Born in Barcelona or Languedoc, probably of a merchant family, he lived a life later obscured by legend and falsified documents. Sometime between 1218 and 1234 (probably in the latter year) he established the Mercedarians on a constitution provided by a Dominican, Raymond of Penafort,* and with his assistance. In 1235 Gregory IX* approved the order under the Augustinian Rule, and King James of Aragon gave his help. The order worked in Spain and Africa to ransom Christians subjugated or terrorized by the Moors. Peter himself was imprisoned in Algiers. He died in Barcelona, and was canonized in 1628. His order now has about 1,000 members.

PETER OF ALCÁNTARA (1499-1562). Spanish ascetic. Nobly born Peter Garavita in Alcántara, he studied at Salamanca and joined the Franciscans in 1515. He was closely linked with the controversial discalced* movement within the order, and because of his association it spread to Italy, Mexico, East Indies, and Brazil. A statue in the Vatican acknowledges him to have been the restorer of the order. Known for the severity of his mortifications, he was honored in the autobiography of St. Teresa of Jesus, whom he encouraged latterly in her Carmelite reform. His authorship of the famous Tratado de la oración y meditación (1556) has been challenged (the book has gone through 175 editions and many translations). Canonized in 1669, he was made patron saint of Brazil in 1826 and named co-patron of Estremadura in 1962.

PETER OF ALEXANDRIA (d.311). Martyr. He served as head of the Catechetical School at Alexandria, and succeeded Theonas as bishop about 300. He administered the church from prison during Diocletian's* persecution, and drew up rules for readmission of the Lapsed into the church in his Paschal letter (306), reflecting the milder attitude. The usurpation of his duties by Melitius of Lycopolis led to the Melitian Schism.* Peter excommunicated Melitius at a synod in 306, deciding that Melitian baptism was invalid. He returned after the edict of tolerance (311), but was beheaded on 24 November in Maximin's persecution. He wrote treatises against certain Origenist doctrines, e.g., the preexistence of the soul, the premundane Fall.

Another Peter of Alexandria (d.380), a presbyter who succeeded Athanasius* in 373, is noteworthy for his opposition to the efforts of Basil of Caesarea* to restore unity after the Arian controversy. He later intrigued against the appointment of Gregory of Nazianzus* as bishop of Constantinople.

PETER OF BLOIS (c.1130-c.1204). Author, ecclesiastic, and royal officer. Born at Blois of a noble Breton family, he was probably a student of Robert of Melun.* He studied law at Bologna, and theology and Scripture at Paris, gaining a reputation as a theologian. After acting as tutor and councillor for William II of Sicily (1167-69) and returning to France, he went to England to become archdeacon of Bath, and served also Henry II and Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, whom he represented unsuccessfully at Rome. After the death of Henry II he was secretary to Queen Eleanor (1191-95). His last years were bitter, especially when he was deprived of his offices. His writings include sermons in the allegorical style, commentaries on Scripture, attacks on the morals of the clergy, an appeal to the Third Crusade, and a diatribe against the Jews, among others. He is best known, however, for his letters, addressed to such notable contemporaries as Henry II, John of Salisbury,* Thomas à Becket,* and Innocent III.* Despite Peter's vanity, the letters are generally factual and full of historic interest. MARY E. ROGERS

PETER OF LAODICEA (c.seventh-eighth century). Virtually nothing is known of this Greek theologian who is reputed to have written commentaries on the gospels. Although various passages in ancient manuscripts have been attributed to him, the only certain work of his that is extant is his Exposition of the Lord's Prayer, printed as Exposition in Orationem Domini in J.P. Migne, PG LXXXVI (2), pp. 3321ff.

PETER OF TARANTAISE (d.1175). Archbishop of Tarantaise. Exceptional devotion as a Cistercian monk led to his being made superior of a new house at Taimé before he was thirty. In 1142 he unwillingly became archbishop and immediately began to reform his lax diocese. Unwelcome fame as a reformer and miracle-worker caused him in 1155 to try to return to monastic life disguised as a lay brother. After a year he was discovered and brought back to his see, where he continued to establish hospices for the poor, the sick, and for travelers. He also inaugurated the custom of distributing free bread and soup in the lean months before the harvest (May Bread). He strongly supported Alexander III,* who sent him on a mission to reconcile Louis VII of France and Henry II of England. He died on the return journey to France. C. PETER WILLIAMS

PETER'S PENCE. A tax sent from England to the pope in Rome avowedly with the purpose of helping poor English pilgrims resident in the Schola Saxonum. Its origin is not clear, but probably the custom was begun by King Offa of Mercia in 787 on the occasion of the visit of two papal legates when the archdiocese of Lichfield was being created. Supposedly one penny was raised on each hearth (i.e., house). After the Norman conquest the tax continued to go to Rome, but now, it appears, exclusively for the pope. By agreement, £199.6s.8d. was the figure sent from England. After the rejection of papal supremacy by Henry VIII* and his Parliament, Peter's Pence was abolished in 1534. PETER TOON

PETER THE APOSTLE. Peter was among the first disciples whom Jesus called to follow Him. By profession a Galilean fisherman, he was promised that Jesus would make him a fisher of men, a prediction amply fulfilled in subsequent events. He possessed natural gifts of leadership and appears both in the gospels and the Acts as the leader among the twelve apostles. He is consistently portrayed as a man of impulse who could rise to the heights or be plunged to the depths.

Three events in which he figured prominently are significant during the ministry of Jesus. It was he who made the first confession of faith in Jesus as Christ and Son of God at Caesarea Philippi (e.g., Matt. 16:13-20); it was this event which marked the turning-point in the ministry of Jesus. Closely following this, Peter was one of the three who witnessed the Transfiguration and the one who wanted to preserve the experience by constructing booths (e.g., Matt. 17:4). Yet this was the man who denied his Master three times during the trial of Jesus, an action which led to bitter remorse (e.g., Luke 22:54-62). His impulsive nature is vividly illustrated by his action in striking off the ear of the high priest's servant on the occasion of the arrest of Jesus (John 18:10). Peter did not lack courage, and his denial must be judged against this background. The restoration of Peter is described in one of the Resurrection narratives. It came while he was fishing (John 21), a striking parallel to the circumstances of the original call. The instruction to him to become a shepherd of the people of God, given three times, is further borne out by subsequent experiences.

At Pentecost (Acts 2) his sermon, delivered in the power of the Spirit, resulted in the conversion of about three thousand people. He is notable also as the first apostle through whom the first Gentile convert, Cornelius, was admitted into the church (Acts 10). It needed a special vision to persuade him to undertake this mission in a Gentile home, although he had difficulty later over the same problem when he incurred Paul's remonstration because he withdrew from having fellowship with Gentiles at Antioch (Gal. 2:11ff.). In spite of the fact that his missionary work was eclipsed by that of the Apostle Paul, he remained a highly respected leader of primitive Christianity. Since Acts contains no details of his activities after the Council of Jerusalem, it is impossible to be certain what those activities were, and much must be left to conjecture.

Certain traditions concerning Peter have been preserved. Papias* speaks of Mark as Peter's interpreter, and the conviction that he was the eyewitness behind the gospel of Mark had wide support until challenged by the presuppositions of the Form Critics in their interpretation of gospel traditions. Moreover the NT canon contains two epistles under the name of the apostle, which if accepted as authentic enable a fair assessment of his theological position to be made. He was strongly influenced by Pauline theology. But some scholars dispute that either epistle is authentic, although many are prepared to accept 1 Peter but not 2 Peter.

Tradition also associates the death of the apostle with Rome, and this is usually dated at approximately A.D. 68. The further claim of the Roman Catholic Church that Peter founded the church at Rome and was for twenty-five years its bishop is without support in the earliest testimony. The growing ecclesiastical reverence for Peter, however, is reflected in the great quantity of pseudo-Petrine literature which circulated during the second and third centuries. This included among others a gospel, acts, and apocalypse attributed to his name (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT). His influence seems to have been particularly strong among Gnostic and other heterodox groups. DONALD GUTHRIE

PETER THE FULLER (d.488). Monophysite theologian. Reputedly a monk of the convent of the Acoemetae,* where he practiced the trade of fuller (so Alexander of Cyprus, sixth-century monk). Expelled for Monophysitism,* he eventually accompanied Zeno the Isaurian (emperor from 474) to Antioch. There he joined the Apollinarians* and, supported by Zeno, supplanted Martyrius as bishop during his absence in Constantinople (470). Gennadius of Constantinople, however, obtained from Emperor Leo a decree for Peter's exile, commuted later to imprisonment in the convent of the Acoemetae (471). Through Emperor Basiliscus he regained the see (475), only to be deposed again and interned with the Messalians* (477). By assenting to Zeno's *Henoticon (482), he again—and finally—became patriarch of Antioch. At a council he induced his bishops to assent to the Henoticon. According to Theodore Lector, he introduced the recitation of the Nicene Creed* at the Eucharist, the solemn blessing of the chrism,* and the commemoration of the *Theotokos at every service.

Peter is chiefly remembered for his addition of the words (here italicized) to the Trisagion, viz. "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, who wast crucified for us, have mercy upon us," i.e., Theopaschitism.* The formula became a test of Monophysitism. Despite being a dogmatically objectionable innovation, it ultimately was tolerated as a barrier against Nestorianism.* Pope Hormisdas* regarded it as heretical, but his successor, John II, agreed with Justinian in sanctioning the statement "unim crucifixim esse ex sancta et consubstantiali Trinitate" (533), approved by the Council of Constantinople (553).

PETER THE HERMIT (c.1050-1115). Preacher of the First Crusade. Born near Amiens, he was an ascetic middle-aged hermit when Urban II* announced the crusade, and immediately he began to preach it with evangelical fervor. He gained a remarkable following, mainly among peasants moved by eschatological hopes and economic hardship. In 1096 he set out with some 20,000 people for the Holy Land. Motley and lacking in discipline, they alienated many of the areas through which they passed, and eventually in Asia Minor their lack of military sense led to a horrible massacre at Civitot, at the hands of the Turks. Being absent at the time, Peter survived, and his involvement with the crusade continued and, though he deserted at the siege of Antioch (1098), he was present when Jerusalem was taken (1099). On his return to Europe he founded the monastery of Neufmoutier. As legends proliferated, in less than a century he rather than Urban was popularly regarded as the instigator of the crusade.

See CRUSADES. C. PETER WILLIAMS

PETER THE VENERABLE (c.1092-1156). French abbot and scholar. Born at Auvergne of noble family, he was educated at the monastery of Sauxillanges of the congregation of Cluny, making his profession under its abbot, Hugh of Cluny,* in 1109. He was successively claustral prior at Vézelay, conventual prior at Domène, and finally chief abbot (1122) over 2,000 dependent houses across Europe. Peter effected financial and educational reforms, but could not halt general decline. His interest in studies at Cluny brought opposition from his close friend, Bernard of Clairvaux,* who wanted only prayer and manual work enforced. Peter supported Innocent II against the antipope Anacletus II (a Cluniac monk) and won reconciliation for Peter Abelard* after the Council of Sens (1140). But his attempts to divert the crusading spirit from deed to word failed. Peter traveled to Spain and England twice each, and often to Rome, but frequently withdrew to the hermitage for meditation and study. His sermons and poems show a careful knowledge of Scripture. He wrote treatises against Peter de Bruys,* the Jews, and the Saracens, and he was the first to have the Koran translated into Latin. Both Bernard of Cluny,* who often eclipsed him, and Frederick Barbarossa called him "venerable." C.G. THORNE, JR.

PETRARCH (1304-1374). Early Italian scholar, called "the Father of Humanism." He left the study of law to devote his time to the classics. The great figures of the Greco-Roman period became so real to him that he called Cicero his father and Virgil his brother. A very influential scholar, he wrote many Latin works, searched tirelessly for classical manuscripts, and edited many of them. Although he could not read them, he saved many writings in Greek also. He was the first to call medieval times "the Dark Ages," for he felt that a golden age was dawning when men would "be able to walk back into the pure radiance of the past." He fell in love with a beautiful lady named Laura, but because she was happily married he had to worship her from afar. The sonnets that he wrote to her had a great influence in Italian literature. His religious feelings are expressed in a work called Secretum (1352), where he attempts to reconcile piety with a love of the world.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

PETRI, LAURENTIUS (1499-1573). Archbishop of Uppsala. Born at Örebro, he may have studied at the Carmelite monastery there. He was one of four royal scholars sent by Gustavus Vasa* to Wittenberg, and he helped in the translation of the 1526 Swedish NT. In 1531 he was, amid some protest, elected archbishop of Uppsala, a chapter still Catholic. Two Catholic bishops were, however, replaced by evangelicals in 1536. Petri contributed to the first complete Swedish Bible of 1541. He strove to protect church revenues from state expropriation. In 1558 he attacked Calvinism in his A Little Instruction ... concerning the Eucharist, and sought to transform the Swedish Church after the manner of his beloved Melanchthon* at Wittenberg. Finally in Johann III he found royal company for his biblical, liturgical, and apostolic work. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

PETRI, OLAVUS (1493-1552). Swedish Reformer. Also "Olaus" or "Olaf." Born at Örebro, he (like his brother Laurentius) was educated at Wittenberg and witnessed there the posting of the Ninety-Five Theses.* His 1529 manual was the first vernacular service-book of the Reformation. At the 1527 Diet of Västeras an order for preaching of the pure Word of God ended the Roman ascendancy. Petri prepared a Swedish Mass in 1531, and a collection of songs. His Postils also determined Swedish religious instruction. In 1540 he retired after a failure to report a murder plot against the king. Between 1526 and 1531 he produced sixteen Swedish books (there had before been only eight in the vernacular). He adapted Luther's work, and by his death had transformed the Swedish ecclesiastical scene.

PFAFF FRAGMENTS. Published in 1713 by C.M. Pfaff, these four fragments were said to have been found in the Turin library and, moreover, according to Pfaff, they were written by Irenaeus.* These documents dealt with diverse subjects ranging from the Eucharist to a synopsis of the "true gnosis." Since their first appearance in Maffei's Giornale de' letterati d'Italia, they were suspected to be pseudonymous, although until the nineteenth century they were regularly quoted and discussed by scholars. In 1900 A. Harnack* showed that they were a fabrication of Pfaff himself. He built his case primarily upon the theology reflected in the documents (it was Pfaff's own Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist) and certain linguistic considerations—e.g., he showed the dependence of these documents upon the Textus Receptus* and certain defective Greek editions of Irenaeus which were current and available to Pfaff in the early eighteenth century.

PFLEIDERER, OTTO (1839-1908). German Protestant scholar. Born in Württemberg, he studied at Tübingen (1857-61) under F.C. Baur* and became an adherent of the Tübingen School.* He studied also in Britain, and in 1870 became chief pastor and superintendent at Jena, then professor ordinarius of theology. In 1875 he took the chair of theology at Berlin. Already he had begun a series of influential works that was to include Der Paulinismus (ET 1873), The Development of Theology Since Kant (1890), and The Philosophy of Religion on the Basis of Its History (ET 1886-88). He lectured in London and Oxford "On the Influence of the Apostle Paul," differing not only with the orthodox position on the consistency of Pauline and other NT theology, but also later with the Tübingen School which posited hostility between the Pauline, Petrine, and Johannine factions in the early church. Pfleiderer considered Pauline theology a very logical outworking of Christian teaching. KEITH J. HARDMAN

PFLUG, JULIUS (1499-1564). Bishop of Naumburg. Born at Cytra, he attended the universities of Leipzig and Bologna and pursued humanistic studies also at Padua. He was in the service of Duke George of Saxony at the Diet of Augsburg (1530), hopeful that Erasmus* and Melanchthon* could find a peaceful solution to the religious split caused by the Lutheran movement. Duke George conferred various benefices on him. Even after death of the duke he continued his efforts at healing the rift. Giving the chalice in the Eucharist to the laity and allowing priests to marry would, in his opinion, bring about a return to Rome. His election as bishop of Naumburg was nullified by Elector John Frederick* for a period of eight years. Pflug attended the Diet of Ratisbon in 1541, where he made suggestions for concessions to Cardinal Contarini.* In 1548 he counseled Charles V* regarding the Interims and participated in the negotiations with the Lutherans. He attended the Council of Trent* in 1551. His Oratio de Ordiando republica Germaniae (1562) is a plea for religious unity, the furtherance of political peace, and the strengthening of imperial power. CARL S. MEYER

PHARISEES. With the spiritual failure of the Hasmonean priest-kings, the staunch upholders of the Law divided. An influential minority withdrew from society, becoming known as the Essenes*; the majority remained in ordinary life, though separated from laxer Jews by their strict views on ritual purity and tithing—hence their name Perushim ("separated ones"). They opposed Alexander Jannai bitterly, and he avenged himself by crucifying about 800 of their leaders. His widow, Alexandra Salome (76 B.C.) entrusted the leadership of the country to her brother Shimon ben Shetah, a leading Pharisee. He enforced their views, but they lost their political role once the Romans took control and they learned under Herod that their power must be spiritual. Since the Sadducees,* their main rivals, were Temple-centered, they concentrated on the Synagogue, and through it won the support, though not necessarily imitation, of the people at large.

Their spiritual leaders were the Scribes, later called Rabbis, who continued and developed Ezra's principles. Most were ordinary "laymen," but they were never numerous. Josephus* estimates their number in Herod's reign as something over 6,000. They formed a closely knit order into which one had to be initiated and from which one could be expelled for nonconformity. Some points of controversy between them and the Sadducees have been preserved. In most they were defending the interests of townsmen, especially in Jerusalem, against the aristocracy and richer priests. When bitter controversy broke out in their order between the followers of Shammai and of Hillel (early first century A.D.), though the former represented the richer and stricter Pharisees, the victory almost always went to the latter's accommodation of the Law to the needs of the poor. The disasters of A.D. 66-72 broke the power of the Sadducees and the influence of Essenes and Zealots.* So the Pharisaic system became normative Judaism, more especially as it was merely a stricter version of the generally accepted Diaspora outlook (see JUDAISM).

Much controversy has waged recently over the picture the Pharisees painted of themselves and that implied by Jesus' criticism of them. The answer lies firstly in recognizing that the criticism came from Jesus rather than the disciples or Paul. Second, it has been established that "hypocrite" meant at the time an actor rather than a deceiving pretender.

PHILADELPHIANS. Seventeenth-century English sect. John Pordage (1607-81), a Berkshire rector, impressed by mystical doctrines associated with J. Boehme,* gathered around him a group which in 1670 was formally named the Philadelphian Society for the Advancement of Piety and Divine Philosophy. A prominent member was Jane Lead (1623-1704), who from 1670 kept a diary entitled A Fountain of Gardens and subsequently published The Heavenly Cloud (1681) and The Revelation of Revelations (1683). The group was dependent on the personality first of Pordage (who had astrological interests), then of Mrs. Lead, and though Oxford graduate and surgeon Francis Lee (1661-1719) tried to extend the work, the sect did not long survive Mrs. Lead's death. J.D. DOUGLAS

PHILARET, DROZDOV (1782-1867). Metropolitan of Moscow. Son of a church cantor, he was educated at the Troitskii laura, near Moscow, became lecturer at its seminary in 1803, and took monastic vows in 1808. Ordained in 1809, he held the chair in philosophy in the seminary in St. Petersburg, also lecturing in theology in the Ecclesiastical Academy. Appointed to the Holy Synod (1818), he was made bishop of Jaroslav (1820), then archbishop (1821) and metropolitan (1826) of Moscow. His liberal episcopal career was restricted by the reactionary reign of Nicholas I (1825-55). The work of a gifted theologian, printed sermons rather than books preserve his thought, together with several volumes of letters which demonstrate his administrative judgments. Having early been exposed to and much appreciated Protestant thinking, he protested the Russian Church's insinuation of heresy, even declaring that their official pronouncements were only private opinions, doctrinal decisions being invalid so long as there were no administrative canons. With the liberal reforms of Alexander II he was honored by the production of a manifesto (1861) whereby the czar released the peasants from serfdom. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PHILARET, THEODORE NIKITICH ROMANOV (c.1553-1633). Russian patriarch. A respected soldier and diplomat under his cousin, Theodore I, the last czar of the House of Ruvik, he was later confined under Boris Godunov to the Antoniev monastery (1598-1605). When Godunov was overthrown by pseudo-Demetrius I, Philaret became metropolitan of Rostov (1605) and four years later was made patriarch of all Russia by the impostor pseudo-Demetrius II. Imprisoned by the Poles (1610-18), he was freed under the truce of Deulino, and in 1619 he was enthroned patriarch of Moscow, remaining virtually Russia's ruler until his death, even although his son Michael was the czar, a co-regency. Equalizing taxation, halting peasant migration off the land, and reorganizing the army, he established also theological projects such as a seminary in every diocese and the founding of a patriarchal library. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PHILEAS OF THMUIS (d.306). Martyr and first known bishop of Thmuis, Lower Egypt. Of noble birth and great wealth, he held important civil offices before his conversion. Imprisoned during Diocletian's* persecution with three other Egyptian bishops, he addressed a protest to Melitius of Lycopolis whose adherents had invaded their dioceses. Tried before the prefect, Culcianos, he was executed at Alexandria, in company with a Roman official, Philoromus. The Acta of his trial and a letter to his people written in prison survive.

PHILIP II (1527-1598). King of Spain from 1556. Only son of Emperor Charles V* and Isabella of Portugal, he was born in Valladolid and educated by clergy in Spain. He grew up grave, self-possessed, and distrustful, loved by his Spanish subjects, but not elsewhere. He married four times: (1) Maria of Portugal (1543), who died in childbirth (1546); (2) Mary I of England (1554)—a marriage of policy; (3) Elizabeth of Valois (1559); (4) Anne of Austria (1570).

On his father's abdication (1556), he became Europe's most powerful monarch, ruling Spain, Naples and Sicily, Milan, the Netherlands, Franche Comté, Mexico, and Peru. He governed his empire from his desk, possessed an unbounded power of work, and an absolute love of reading, annotating and drafting dispatches. He defeated the French at St. Quentin (1557) and assured Spain's ascendancy for a time. He defeated the Turks in the naval battle of Lepanto (1571). In 1580 he obtained the crown of Portugal and Brazil. He reactivated the Inquisition* in Spain, using it to establish his absolute power. Revolt, however, continued in the Netherlands, resulting in the independence of the Dutch republic (1579). He supported the Guises in France against Henry of Navarre, but his intrigues failed. His attempt to conquer England ended in hopeless disaster with the destruction of the Armada (1588).

He possessed great abilities, but lacked political wisdom. He crushed the chivalrous spirit of Spain, and destroyed its commerce by oppressive exactions and by bitter persecution of the industrious Moriscos (whom he expelled, 1570). He was bigoted, morose, and morbidly suspicious, though a tender husband and affectionate to his daughters. He encouraged art and built El Escorial. Under him, and supported by the Jesuits and the Inquisition, Spain became the intellectual, financial, and military spearhead of the Counter-Reformation.

PHILIP IV (the Fair) (1268-1314). King of France from 1285. He reigned when papal power was beginning its decline, and opposed the Roman Catholic Church's claim to temporal power. In 1296 he began his feud with Pope Boniface VIII over taxing the clergy, and this was renewed in 1301 in a dispute over Bishop Saisset of Pamiers, who had been accused of speaking against the king. In 1302 the latter summoned the States-General, which later approved his condemnation of the papal bull Unam Sanctum. Philip's agents captured Boniface and later humiliated him at Anagni. The king finally saw the papacy capitulate, elect Clement V,* and begin the Babylonian Captivity* of the church, namely, the removal of the papacy from Rome to Avignon. In 1307 Philip seized the riches of the church's Knights Templar* and arrested their grand master. At his insistence the order was abolished by Clement in 1312. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

PHILIP, JOHN (1775-1851). Scottish missionary to South Africa. Born at Kirkcaldy, he was a Congregational minister in Aberdeen (1804-19) before beginning his thirty years' work as resident director of the London Missionary Society in South Africa. He exercised strong personal control of all LMS work, making frequent tours and conducting a voluminous correspondence. He aimed to silence critics by improving the quality of missionary work. Eager for expansion, he assisted the Rhenish, Paris, and American Board missions to enter the field.

Philip played a controversial role in colonial politics. His vigorous campaign on behalf of the Hottentots prepared the ground for Ordinance 50 of 1828 which extended civil rights to colored people. He criticized the commando system on the Eastern Frontier, blamed the colonists for the Sixth Frontier War (1834-35), and vigorously opposed the proposed expulsion of the Xhosa from the Ciskei. His influence upon British philanthropists was sufficient to upset this policy, but he would have preferred the extension of British rule, without confiscation of land, to the unsatisfactory Treaty System which emerged. He likewise favored British protection for the Griqua, but obtained only treaties of friendship. He is often condemned as an ignorant negrophile. His information and judgments were sometimes faulty, but few men were better informed. His aggressive and intolerant manner did him harm, as did his unwillingness to admit mistakes and his unsympathetic attitude toward colonists. But these faults are outweighed by his passionate concern for justice and his acute understanding of the colony's true interests. D.G.L. CRAGG

PHILIP NERI (1515-1595). Founder of the Congregation of the Oratory. Born in Florence he was influenced in youth by Dominicans and Benedictines. In 1533 he went to Rome, where he earned his living as a tutor, wrote poetry, studied philosophy and theology. From 1538 he devoted himself to helping the city's sick and poor, and this resulted in the great Trinity hospital. There gathered around him a group which ministered to the needs of the many pilgrims who came to Rome. In 1551 he was priested, and was while living at the clergy house of San Girolamo that he began to establish the Oratory,* which work was later found also in Spain and France. His work did not go unchallenged, for his unconventional methods of talking about faith, his emphasis upon action, and his direct missionary methods horrified many. For him it was love and spiritual integrity, not physical austerity, that counted. It is reported that laughter was a word frequently linked with Philip Neri; this may well account for the success he had in his missionary work. He died in Rome, and was canonized in 1622.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

PHILIP OF HESSE (1504-1567). Landgrave of Hesse. The ablest of Luther's princely supporters, he was born at Marburg, his father dying when he was five. Following quarrels during his minority he assumed power in 1519. He soon proved himself a shrewd ruler and asserted his authority. He first met Luther in 1521 at the Diet of Worms,* but only after his marriage to Christina of Saxony in 1524 did he embrace Protestantism and encourage the Reformation in his state. He defended his new principles at the Diet of Speyer* (1526) and founded the University of Marburg in 1527. Suspecting that a League of Catholic princes was forming against him, he joined Saxony, Nuremberg, Strasbourg, and Uln in a secret understanding in 1529. About this time he became acquainted with Zwingli* and invited the Swiss Reformer to visit Germany to promote the unity of the Lutheran and Reformed churches.

In 1530 he formed with the elector of Saxony the Smalcald League* of Protestant powers for protection against the emperor. At first war with the empire was staved off by diplomacy, but fighting broke out in 1534, and the League was strengthened by the Concord of Wittenberg* in 1536. But the two Protestant confessions failed to agree, and this, together with Philip's bigamous marriage to Margarethe von der Saale in 1540, shattered the prospects of the League's political triumph throughout Germany. For a time Philip deserted his allies and made peace with the emperor, but within a few years he became aware once again of the dangers confronting Protestantism and formed a revived League which lead to the Smalcald War of 1546-47. Military defeat ensued, and Philip threw himself on the emperor's mercy in the interests of his state. Between 1547 and 1552 he was an imperial prisoner and was compelled to assent to the imposition of the Interim on Hesse, permitting Roman Catholic practices. On his release he renewed his efforts to bring about Lutheran-Calvinist unity, while at the same time he worked for a great Protestant federation and gave aid to the Huguenots.* Just before his death he gave a permanent organization to the Hessian Church by the great agenda of 1566-67.

PHILIPPINES. When in 1521 Magellan landed in the central Philippines, he planted a wooden cross on a hill and so "took possession of the country in the name of Spain," while Father Pedro de Valderrama said the first Mass. But serious Catholic missionary work did not begin until 1565, when five Augustinian missionaries arrived with the conquering Spanish army.

Muslim missionaries, however, had been at work for two centuries, and had established sultanates in the southern islands of Mindanao and Sulu. What emerged was an "Islamized paganism," with Islam superimposed on indigenous animism, spiritism, and polytheism. Similarly the Spanish friars achieved often little more than "Christianized paganism." During the early years of the Philippines' colonial experience, Spain was discouraged by the small economic returns from the islands, but the church persuaded the state to remain because of the great potential of the islands for missionary work. Thus most of the colonizing was left to the friars, who in the early years stood against Spanish exploitation and did much for cultural development. But they had so much power that they soon became corrupt and exploitative. By the early seventeenth century the Augustinians had been joined by Franciscans, Jesuits, Dominicans, and Recollects. And within a few years they could claim that most of the population had been baptized.

Because relatively few secular colonizers were prepared to go to the Philippines, the church became an integral part of the colonial government. The friars thus became very wealthy, receiving generous expenses from the state, and taking tribute, fees, food, free labor, and vast areas of land from the Filipinos. From the beginning there was strong prejudice against ordaining Filipinos. Various popes insisted on the need for a national clergy, but the friars successfully used the threat of mass resignation. Eventually, after pressure from the Spanish throne, the first Filipino priest was ordained in 1702. By 1750 about one-quarter of all the parishes were controlled by national priests, a process accelerated when the Jesuits* were expelled in 1768. The consequences were disastrous. Unprepared and unsuitable men were ordained. Resultant scandals led the king to issue a decree in 1776, suspending the secularization of the parishes and allowing Filipino clergy to become only assistants to the friars. Thus by the end of the nineteenth century, less than one-sixth of all parishes were controlled by Filipinos—and these were small, poor and in distant areas.

There were various Filipino protests and revolts against the corruption of the Spanish friars in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but it was the nineteenth century that really produced the freedom fighters of the Filipino Church. In 1841 Apolinario de la Cruz* became the first martyr, executed as a subversive. The revolution in 1868 and subsequent short-lived republic in Spain resulted in a brief spell of liberalism in the colony; but with the restoration of the monarchy in 1870, censorship was revived, the Filipinization of the church was reversed, and demand for political reform was declared treasonable and punishable by death. This seems to have included the demand for Filipino leadership of the church. In 1872 three priests—Jose Burgos,* Mariano Gomez,* and Jacinto Zamora—were executed for precisely this "crime."

But the friars could not reverse the clock. Filipinos had tasted liberalism. The Suez Canal had been opened in 1869, the telegraph had been invented, and new ideas were flowing quickly. A propaganda movement developed, with such inspiring writers as Jose Rizal* and Marcelo del Pilar daring to question traditional Catholic beliefs. They had been influenced by the rationalism and agnosticism of nineteenth-century Masonry, but were primarily opposed to foreign friars and their corruption, not to religion as such. Their writings paved the way in some measure for the arrival of Protestantism in 1899.

The revolution began in 1896; the Spanish-American war of 1898, when the U.S. Navy sank the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay, enabled the revolutionaries to proclaim the republic. But the Treaty of Paris, without consulting the Filipinos, ceded their country to the USA. The Filipinos revolted and were eventually suppressed, but such political upheavals inevitably affected the church. The 1898 revolutionary government expelled the friars, confiscated their lands, and appointed Gregorio Aglipay*—the only clerical member of the revolutionary congress—as head of the Philippine Church. He called an assembly of national clergy to set up a provisional government of the church until the pope would name Filipino bishops. Their request to Rome was ignored. Thus the Philippine Independent Church (PIC) was born, with Aglipay somewhat reluctantly taking the leadership. In 1902 the U.S. Congress paid the friars $7 million compensation for the loss of their lands, and the PIC severed its moorings from Rome. Carrying the torch of nationalism, it drew some two million former Roman Catholics into membership; but in 1906 the supreme court ruled that all the churches they were using should be returned to the Roman Church. This devastating blow seriously weakened the new denomination. Under the theological leadership of Isabelo de los Reyes* the PIC adopted a Unitarian, rationalistic stance, but after his death in 1938 it returned to a more Catholic position and entered (1961) into intercommunion with the Philippine Episcopal Church, with which it now shares a seminary.

The friars, meanwhile, who had vast financial power, invested it in establishing schools and colleges. At first American bishops replaced the Spanish ones, but in 1905 Jorge Barlin was consecrated first Filipino bishop. The religious orders, with the exception of the Jesuits, are still dominated by foreigners. In 1960 Rufinos J. Santos became the first Filipino cardinal.

The first Protestant missionary to settle was James B. Rodgers, an American Presbyterian, who arrived in 1899. He was quickly followed by others, representing most major denominations. They early agreed on a policy of mission polity and divided the country accordingly. The Episcopalians were unwilling to evangelize Roman Catholics, and went only to the Muslims in the south, the Chinese, the Caucasians, and the animistic tribes. The Seventh-Day Adventists, arriving in 1905, refused to observe any comity agreements. The only non-American arrival was the British and Foreign Bible Society. They had already begun translation into the vernacular from Europe in the 1880s, but much more was to be done: the Catholics had attempted no Scripture translation, and there are at least seventy languages.

There has been a strong ecumenical movement from the beginnings of Protestantism. The early founding of the Union Theological Seminary in 1907 led eventually to the forming of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines in 1948. But a stronger movement has been away from unity, aggravated by the militant nationalism of many Filipinos. Congregations often broke away from their too-foreign mother bodies. In 1909, for example, Nicolas Zamora, the first Filipino to be ordained by Protestants, led in the formation of a national independent Methodist Church. The picture is thus one of great fragmentation, seen notably in some seventy-five different Pentecostal groups.

The Philippines has produced its own cults, most significantly the Iglesia ni Kristo, or Church of Christ, founded in 1914 by Felix Manalo* and claiming a membership of several million. There are numerous smaller sects, like the Church of the Holy Savior, and a number of groups which venerate Jose Rizal as a "Second Christ."

PHILIPS, DIRK (Dietrich) (1502-1568). Mennonite theologian. Son of a Dutch priest, he was well educated and able to use Latin, Greek, and some Hebrew, though it is not known where he studied. He left the Franciscans and converted to Anabaptism in 1533. At the wish of the brethren at Groningen, his elder brother Obbe ordained him an elder in 1534. With Obbe and Menno,* he was a firm opponent of Münsterite doctrines. He wrote extensively and systematically and was probably the leading theologian of the early Dutch and N German Mennonites. But largely because of his greater severity and rigidity, he was somewhat less influential than Menno Simons, and was partially responsible for schism within the Mennonite brotherhood.

KENNETH R. DAVIS

PHILIPS, OBBE (c.1500-1568). Netherlands Anabaptist leader. Brother of Dirk Philips,* he studied medicine. At Leeuwarden he witnessed the execution of the first Anabaptist martyr in the Netherlands, Sicke Freercks (1531). Drawn to Anabaptists influenced by Melchior Hofmann, he was baptized (1533), began to preach and baptize, and was forced to move first to Amsterdam, and then to Delft where he baptized and ordained David Joris (1534). He also baptized and ordained Menno Simons* (c.1536). He remained aloof from the revolutionary Anabaptists responsible for the Münster catastrophe, and for a time led the peaceful Anabaptists, so that they were often called "Obbenites" or "Obbites." Later he withdrew, and Menno Simons became leader of this group. After his death, Philips's Confession was published, in which he described his religious development.

PHILIP SIDETES (early fifth century). Historian. Native of Side in Pamphylia, he was ordained deacon in Constantinople by his friend John Chrysostom,* and was later three times unsuccessful in his candidacy for the patriarchate of Constantinople. Between 434 and 439 he wrote Christian History, in thirty-six books, treating world history from the Creation to about 426. The ecclesiastical historian Socrates (c.380-450) and later Photius have commented upon it, remarking unsympathetically about his Asiatic style, poor chronological order, and the mass of often unrelated information. Only fragments of the work remain and are valuable as a supplement to Eusebius. These deal with Papias* of Hierapolis, his alleged assertion that the Jews had martyred both John the Divine and James, and the Catechetical School of Alexandria. A refutation of Julian the Apostate's treatises against Christianity and other tracts are apparently no longer extant.

PHILIP THE ARABIAN (Marcus Julius Philippus) (d.249). Roman emperor from 244. He succeeded after the army had murdered the boy emperor Gordian. He made peace with the Persian Shapur I, but had to deal with the serious invasions of Germanic peoples across the Danube. His troop commander in Illyrium, Decius,* was proclaimed emperor by his men, and in the ensuing battle at Verona, Philip was slain. The Christian Church later recalled Philip as the first Christian emperor, but there is some doubt about the accuracy of the description. Certainly he gave some benefits to the church, which was free of persecution during his reign. The tradition may have originated in the sharp contrast with the reign of Decius, when persecution was severe.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PHILO JUDAEUS (or Alexandrinus). Jewish writer. Living in the time of Christ, his blending of OT monotheism with Greek philosophy anticipated early Christian thought, notably on the "Word" in creation. Probably past middle age in A.D. 40, he was included then in a deputation to the Roman emperor after anti-Jewish rioting at Alexandria. Philo's extensive writings include Jewish apologetic, Pentateuchal criticism, and descriptions of Jewish monastic sects, e.g., the Essenes.* Philosophically he embraced the then fashionable amalgam of Stoicism and Platonism. He combined the abstractness of the philosophers' Supreme Being with the intensely personal, moral Yahweh. Similarly his concept of the divine "Word" (Logos*) unites Hebrew and Greek ideas—it represents the creative word of Genesis 1, the personalized "Wisdom" of Proverbs 8, the vehicle of God's activity (cf. Isa. 55:-11), the World of Forms (see PLATONISM), and the immanent principle of natural-cum-moral law which Stoicism also called logos. Elsewhere Philo uses such terms as Son of God, Ideal Man, and Paraclete.

More Greek than Hebrew, but also anticipating Christianity, is his stress on spirit (pneuma) at the expense of body; in Philo this is related to asceticism and to mysticism, a type of religious ecstasy ("sober drunkenness") typical of the age (see also PLOTINUS). Philo links philosophy to the Pentateuch through allegory, a method widely used in the Greek world for giving relevance to mythology and early poetry. Much early Christian exposition of Scripture follows his lead—see e.g., Ambrose* and Origen.* His Jewish loyalties were only intensified by his contact with Greek culture, which he saw as offering favorable conditions for the propagation of Judaism, with its monotheism and strong practical morality, as a world-religion.

PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. Since philosophy is a necessary activity of the human mind and religion an actual phenomenon of the human spirit, a philosophy of religion becomes an inescapable discipline. However much it may be emphasized with Bonaventura* that the heart makes the theologian, sooner or later head and heart must seek accord. It will not do for the religious man to be with himself at war. Besides, religion is more than a private monopoly of a privileged few; it is both a historical and universal phenomenon and as such must needs become the subject of inquiry and questioning. Philosophy, as man's reflection upon the existence of the world and the significance of human experiences, arose and could only do so in the context of a certain advanced state of civilized life. It is, therefore, the fruit of society's maturer age, not of its youthful springtime. Religion, on the other hand, is as old as man, so that there is cogency in the remark of Max Müller* that the true history of mankind is the history of religion. It is essentially a reality of human experience. Since, therefore, philosophy has been regarded historically as a reflection on experience in order to apprehend and understand its ultimate meaning, a philosophy of religion has been generally defined as a reflection on religious experience in an effort to discover its final ground.

In remote times there was no clear-cut distinction between religion, ethics, art, and other aspects of man's psychical life. It was when these began to assert their autonomy that many of the problems proper to a philosophy of religion emerged. A philosophy of religion arose consequently when religion came to be taken out of the domain of pure feelings or practical experience and became the object of reflective thought.

In Greek thought, however, the idea of a philosophy of religion did not arise, since hardly any distinction between religion and philosophy was recognized. In Judaism there was religion but little philosophy, although the great prophets did give meaning to the facts which underpinned their faith. It was within post-apostolic Christianity that the philosophical reflection on religious faith began. Yet here the result was not a philosophy of religion in the modern sense, since "religion" itself as a general fact of human experience was not the subject-matter of investigation. What first appeared was more properly a religious philosophy or a philosophical theology—the reflection upon a particular historical religion and that supremely from the perspective of an apologetic.

In Christianity the speculative movement was hastened by influence from without. The various Gnostic systems, for example, challenged the reflective Christian to consider the ultimate ground, meaning, and value of his faith. Thus the Greek Apologists, and the Alexandrian theologians, unashamedly used Greek philosophical concepts in the defense and propagation of the Gospel. The Middle Ages found the Schoolmen philosophizing in support of a foregone conclusion, the dogmas of the church. In the seventh century the English Deists began a search for the principles common to all religions and laid the foundation for a philosophy of religion in distinction from a religious philosophy. Kant* sought religion within the bounds of pure reason; and Schleiermacher* within pure feelings. Hegel* was the first to write a philosophy of religion in the modern sense. He saw all forms of religion as manifestations of the absolute religion in the process of becoming. He stressed that religion per se, and as a universal phenomenon, must be taken as the subject-matter of philosophical reflection.

The term "philosophy of religion" appeared in Germany for the first time at the close of the eighteenth century and occurs as a title in J.C.G. Schaumann's volume, Philosophie der Religion (1793), and J. Berger's Geschichte der Religionsphilosophie (1800). After Hegel, philosophies of religion separated into broad movements, speculative idealist, personal idealist, pragmatist, existentialist, empiricist, phenomenologist.

Consonant with the present dominant approach to the subject of philosophy which is concerned with the analysis of concepts and which operates on the basis of an empirical epistemology, contemporary philosophies of religion have been interested in the problem of theological language and with the empiricist challenge. In Roman Catholic circles, starting with the presupposition that reason is prior to faith, a philosophy of religion has often been equated with natural theology. With the Barthian school, in which reason is excluded as vitiated and depraved, and experience is regarded as an unsatisfactory basis for religious faith, a philosophy of religion is anathema. Christianity, it is here insisted, is not one of the religions, nor a particular manifestation of man's religious apriority. It is not some universal truth, nor some universal religious experience, but a definite fact which as such is opposed to every universal, be it religion or philosophy. But insofar as the Gospel becomes a fact of experience, it becomes at the same time a view on existence and a judgment about the world, and must at least meet challenges to these claims, and be prepared for inquiry into the nature, function, value, and truth of its religious experience, and the adequacy of its theistic faith as an expression of the nature of ultimate reality.

PHILOSTORGIUS (c.368-430). Native of Borissus in Cappadocia, he wrote an ecclesiastical history from the Arian heresy (300) to Valentinian II's rise to the Western throne in 425. Like most histories emanating from the late empire, that of the Eunomian Philostorgius was inaccurate and patently biased. According to Photius (Bibliotheca, Cod. XI), whose ninth-century epitome is our chief source, Philostorgius's lost work was "less a history than an eulogy of the [Arian and Eunomian] heretics and a defamation against the orthodox." By the early fourteenth century only this epitome reached Nicephorus Callistus. Other fragments survive in the Passion of Artemius, an Arian martyr (c.362). Philostorgius's twelve books began respectively with the letters of his name, forming an acrostic. His work has value for its accounts of several important Arians and as a corrective to the partisan views of orthodox church historians. He knew considerable geography and astronomy and had an elegant style.

PHILOXENIAN VERSION, see SYRIAC VERSIONS

PHILOXENUS (c.450-523). Monophysite theologion. Born at Tahal, Persia, he was natively named Xenaya. He studied in Edessa when Ibas* was bishop, rejecting the current Nestorianism* of that school. He went to Antioch, where his ardent championship of the Henoticon * led to his expulsion by the patriarch Kalanaion. Peter the Fuller* appointed him bishop of Hierapolis (Mabbug) in 485. One of the most learned Syrian theologians, he was spokesman for Monophysitism* in the Antioch patriarchate, his views approximating to those of Julian of Halicarnassus. His extensive writings include thirteen Discourses on the Christian Life, works on the Incarnation, many letters, and a Syriac version of the NT (508). He was exiled, first to Thrace (c.518), then to Gangra in Paphlagonia where he died violently.

J.G.G. NORMAN

PHILPOT, JOHN (1516-1555). Protestant martyr. Born at Compton in Hampshire and educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, he qualified in law and then traveled on the Continent. He was nearly arrested by the Inquisition* for expounding heretical (Protestant) notions in controversy with a Franciscan friar. Returning to England, he became archdeacon of Winchester in the reign of Edward VI; but after attacking transubstantiation he fell foul of his bishop and his queen (Mary) and was imprisoned. After examination at Newgate, London, he was burned at Smithfield. He admired Calvin and translated some of his homilies. His extant works were printed by the Parker Society in 1842.

PETER TOON

PHOEBADIUS. First known bishop of Agen in S France. His birth and death dates are uncertain. He became bishop after 347, and was alive in 392. He wrote Liber contra Arianos to refute the Arian heresy. At the Council of Arminum* he at first refused to sign the Arian Confession, but was tricked into doing so by Valens. When he discovered the deception he protested strongly and cleared himself. He attended the Council of Valence in 372 and probably that of Saragossa in 380. He also penned De Fide Orthodoxa contra Arianos (which may have been written by Gregory of Elvira) and the Libellus Fidei which were thought to be part of the Orations of Gregory Nazianzus. He was known to Jerome and written to by Ambrose.

HAROLD LINDSELL

PHOTINUS (fourth century). Bishop of Sirmium. Pupil and former deacon of Marcellus of Ancyra,* learned and eloquent, he was condemned with Marcellus at the Council of Antioch (c.344) and again at a synod in Sirmium (347), but each time remained quietly in Sirmium supported by adherents. He was finally deposed from his see, which he had held for some seven years, and exiled at the Council of Sirmium in 351, after a theological disputation with Basil of Ancyra.* None of his writings have survived, but he seems to have developed Marcellus's doctrine (tending toward Sabellianism*) to an approximation with the views of Paul of Samosata.* Augustine said that Photinus denied Christ's preexistence, though allowing His birth of a virgin and endowment with superhuman excellence. His followers ("Photinians") were condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 381. J.G.G. NORMAN

PHOTIUS (c.820-c.895). Patriarch of Constantinople. Born into an aristocratic iconodule family which had suffered persecution, he attained learning renowned in his own day for its breadth and depth, and confirmed by modern research. He taught in the imperial university and also, as was customary, functioned as a civil servant and diplomat. In 855 he was a member of a diplomatic mission to the Arabs, concerned with exchange of prisoners. After his return, palace intrigues between Theodora and Michael III led to the deposition of Ignatius from the patriarchate in 858. Photius, still a layman, was elected his successor, receiving the ecclesiastical orders within the space of one week, a procedure not without precedent. He was consecrated by Gregory Asbestas, whom Ignatius had deposed.

The whole history of what followed is vitiated by much misrepresentation, about which there is still debate. Photius had been accepted only by way of compromise and, when dissension broke out, canonically deposed Ignatius by a synod. Papal legates, present for a council in 861 dealing primarily with the residual problems of Iconoclasm, reopened the case of Ignatius and confirmed his deposition. But Pope Nicholas I would not accept the action and asked for a further investigation of the Ignatian case. Behind this lay some claims to jurisdiction over Sicily, Calabria, and Illyricum. A synod in Rome in 863 condemned Photius and declared Ignatius patriarch.

Although in 865 reconciliation might have come about, it was prevented by the new problem of the Christianization of Bulgaria, where the khan Boris* upon his conversion had requested missionaries from the West. The differences between East and West in matters of practice came to the fore with the result that Photius in an encyclical letter condemned Latin practices and especially the added phrase Filioque in the Nicene Creed,* and a council at Constantinople in 867 deposed and excommunicated the pope. But in the same year, Byzantine politics led to the murder of Michael and the accession of Basil. Photius was deposed, Ignatius restored. Yet the schism with Rome continued, as Ignatius stood firm about the Bulgarian issue. After some years and with papal changes, reconciliation might once more have been effected, but in 877 Ignatius died and Basil reinstated Photius. The legates of John VIII in the synod of 879-80 acknowledged Photius and reversed the earlier condemnations.

Controversy broke out again for obscure reasons. On his accession Emperor Leo VI deposed Photius (886), and Pope Formosus may have excommunicated him in 892. Photius's last years are unrecorded; he died in exile in the last decade of the century. He was a complex character, sometimes high-handed, but he remained on friendly terms with Ignatius, and after his death canonized him. The monuments of his scholarship are the Amphilochia, dealing with doctrinal and exegetical questions; the Bibliotheke, in which his reading is recorded and from which knowledge of many lost works can be gained; the Lexicon, of which the full text has lately come to light; and the books against the Manichaeans, of which the authenticity has been doubted. Photius is recognized as a saint in the Orthodox Church.

PIARISTS. A Roman Catholic order which provided for the free education of the young, especially boys. The name is based on the last word of its formal title, Regulares pauperes Matris Dei scholarum piarum, used when recognized as an order by Gregory XV in 1621. Its founder was Jose Calasanze (Joseph Calasanctius), a Spanish nobleman who was ordained in Rome in 1593 after studying law and theology at Lerida and Alcalá. In 1597 he opened the first free elementary school in Europe to educate the children from the streets of Rome. By 1612 he and his helpers were looking after 1,200 children. Following Gregory's recognition of the group as an order, it gained in 1622 the privileges of the Mendicant orders (e.g., the right of members to work or beg for their living). By 1631 the order was working in Italy, Germany, Poland, Hungary, and other places. Its success aroused the jealousy of the Jesuits. From 1645 to 1698 its status was unstable. First reduced to an association or secular brotherhood in 1646, it was restored to an order in 1669 and then to its full mendicant privileges in 1698. It flourished in the seventeenth century in Europe, especially in Spain and its empire. Calasanze was canonized in 1767 by Clement XIII. The order is now governed by a general with four assistant generals. PETER TOON

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI (1463-1494). Italian philosopher. Born count of Mirandola, he was fluent in Latin and Greek by the time he was sixteen, had studied at several universities, and was renowned for his remarkable memory. At the University of Padua (1480-82) he studied both Averroism* and the Kabbalah* the latter interest producing a current of Christian Kabbalism leading to J. Reuchlin* and the Hebrew studies of sixteenth-century Protestantism. After 1484 the Platonic Academy at Florence dominated his thought, but his major objective became the discovery of a unity underlying these various philosophical traditions, a unity that would accord also with Christianity. His major writings reflect both this objective and the humanist-Christian themes of the dignity of man and the incompatibility of astrology with human freedom. Though he became a follower of the Christian reformer Savonarola,* his last work, De ente et uno—unfinished—again sought to prove the essential unity of Plato and Aristotle and that all truth and knowledge are one. The depth and range of Pico's learning and vision have earned him the admiration of serious scholars.

KENNETH R. DAVIS

PIDGEON, GEORGE CAMPBELL (1872-1971). First moderator of the United Church of Canada.* Born in Quebec, he was educated at McGill University and Presbyterian College, and served as pastor of influential churches in Ontario for over fifty years, except for an interval teaching practical theology (1909-15). He was a key figure in the foundation of the United Church of Canada, being its first moderator and also the last moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada before the union. Pidgeon provided much of the spirit and direction for the new church in its early years. As scholar, preacher, and writer he was vitally concerned with the application of the Social Gospel* to the poor of the cities.

ROBERT WILSON

PIERSON, A(RTHUR) T(APPAN) (1837-1911). Presbyterian minister and writer. Educated at Hamilton College and Union Seminary, New York, he held pastorates in New York State, in Detroit, Indianapolis, and Philadelphia. At Bethany Presbyterian, Philadelphia, an institutional church, he organized what grew into the city's First Penny Savings Bank. He wrote for many periodicals, was editor of Missionary Review of the World, and was a student of prophecy, missionary history, and comparative religion, as well as a dispensationalist. From 1891 to 1893 he was minister of Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London. A leader in the Bible Conference Movement and the Student Volunteer Movement,* he was also a consulting editor for the Scofield Bible, lecturer in Moody Bible Institute from 1893, and one of the few Americans to speak at Keswick. The Pierson Bible Institute, Seoul, Korea, was an outgrowth of his ministry. His many books deal with biblical criticism, missions, and devotion.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

PIETISM. A movement among Protestants in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries which emphasized the necessity for good works and a holy life. It began in Germany shortly after the Thirty Years' War* (1618-48) when the churches had become entangled in confessional rigidity, and the time is often called the Age of Orthodoxy or the period of Protestant Scholasticism. The ideas of the Reformers had become so systemized and schematized that there was little comfort to be found in them.

The leader of the Pietist revival was Philipp Jakob Spener* (1635-1705). In 1674 he was invited to write an introduction to a new edition of sermons by Arndt. His work took the form of an independent tract prefixed to the book and entitled Pia desideria (Pious Longings). This manifesto of the Pietist Movement condemned the sins of the day and presented six requirements for reformation. These included a better knowledge of the Bible on the part of the people, the restoration of mutual Christian concern, an emphasis on good works, avoidance of controversy, better spiritual training for ministers, and a reformation of preaching to make it more fervent.

Spener's influence spread widely. Some praised and imitated him while others attacked him and even accused him of being a Jesuit. His prestige increased when he was called to be court preacher at Dresden (1686), and his teachings were taken up at Leipzig University where a group led by A.H. Francke* met for prayer and Bible study. When these men were expelled from Leipzig, Spener helped Francke secure an appointment at the University of Halle (1692).

The history of the Pietist Movement next revolves around Francke, who wrote the story of his activities in an account entitled Pietas Hallensis: or a Public Demonstration of the Footsteps of a Divine Being Yet in the World, in an Historical Narration of the Orphan House and Other Charitable Institutions at Glaucha near Halle in Saxony (1701; ET 1727). The work that he discusses grew out of his concern for the destitute and deprived people of Halle and its environs. A whole series of institutions were founded, including a school for the poor, an orphanage, a hospital, a widows' home, a teachers' training institute, a Bible school, book depot, and Bible house. Foreign missions were also emphasized, and in 1705 two young men, Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg* and Heinrich Plütschau,* went to serve in India. From their activities a mission work was established which was directed by Francke until his death. Several other Pietists—such as Count von Zinzendorf* who created the Moravian Church from refugee fragments of Hussitism; J.A. Bengel; and the community that fostered the "Burleburg Bible"—deserve mention.

Historians disagree as to the nature of Pietism. Some feel it was essentially a revival of medieval monastic and mystical piety stimulated by contact with the Puritans. Others believe it represented progress in Lutheranism and looked forward to the modern world. One author finds in it a force that made for the rise of German nationalism. Whatever view one takes, Pietism has fostered a desire for holy living, biblical scholarship, and missions without which Protestantism would be much poorer.

PIETROCOLA-ROSSETTI, TEODORICO (1825-1883). Italian poet and patriot. Born at Vasto (Abruzzi), he studied law at Naples University and joined Mazzini's organization, La Giovane Italia. Involved in the 1848 uprising, he had to flee and took refuge first at Leghorn, then Lyons, Paris, and London where he was warmly received by the many exiles in the Mazzinian circle and by his cousin and poet Gabriel Rossetti, whose surname he joined to his. He earned his living by giving Italian lessons and was invited by one of his pupils to attend an Open Brethren meeting, which led to a conversion experience. He did not entirely abandon political activity; he wrote articles in journals, and two very important treatises, La religione di Stato and Il problema religioso, but Christ became the center of his life. He renounced political success and devoted his life to the preaching of the Gospel, which he considered the only remedy for the sad plight of Italy.

In 1857, after a most solemn commendation meeting, Rossetti left London for Alessandria (Piedmont) to begin, amid all kinds of difficulties and persecution, a successful work of evangelism. This included the teaching and preparing of young converts who gave evidence of real vocation to become evangelists in the newly formed congregations. These were called Free Italian churches, and in spite of a sad division in 1863 (see GAVAZZI and RISORGIMENTO), by 1870 they had grown to more than thirty communities, some large, scattered throughout Italy. Rossetti spent the last years of his life in Florence; his death occurred on a Sunday at the morning meeting after giving a message which, in the words of the hearers, "had led the congregation up to heaven." Generous, warmhearted, impulsive, but also deeply spiritual and highly intelligent, he was also a great lover of children. He wrote many valuable commentaries and hymns still sung today, and which are the best in Italian both for content and poetry. DAISY RONCO

PIGHI, ALBERT (c.1490-1542). Roman Catholic apologist. Born in Kampen, the Netherlands, he graduated from Louvain in 1509 and lived in Paris until he went to Rome in 1522. He is remembered as an opponent of Martin Bucer* and a defender of papal infallibility. In 1538 appeared his Hierarchiae ecclesiasticae assertio; three years later came the Controversarium quibus nunc exagitatur Christi fides ... which was widely used to answer the Protestant challenge. A posthumous work (1543), Apologia A. Pighii ... adversus M. Bucer calumnias ..., was used by Richard Smith in 1550 to attack Peter Martyr* and Bucer, and Pighi was often cited at the Council of Trent.* Peter Martyr chose to answer Pighi in his 1551 Romans lectures at Oxford and his 1558 printed commentary. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

PIKE, JAMES ALBERT (1913-1969). American bishop. Born in Oklahoma City, he was educated at the University of Southern California and Union Theological Seminary. He practiced and lectured on law (1936-42). At one time he had studied for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but in 1944 he was ordained deacon in the Episcopal Church; he was "priested" in 1946. He was chaplain and head of the religion department of Columbia University (1952-58) and bishop of California (1958-66). A noted champion of civil rights, planned parenthood, and social reform, he was also a controversial figure, often assailed by fellow churchmen for his rejection of several basic Christian doctrines, including the Virgin Birth. After his son's suicide in 1966 he explored Spiritualism, and in the same year resigned his bishop's office. He was found dead in the Judean wilderness during a Palestinian visit. His writings include Beyond Anxiety (1953); A Time for Christian Candor (1964); and You and the New Morality (1967). ROBERT C. NEWMAN

PILATE, ACTS OF, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

PILATE, PONTIUS. Roman procurator or governor of Judea beween c. A.D. 26-36, appointed by Emperor Tiberius. Jesus's trial and crucifixion took place somewhere in the middle of Pilate's tenure. His attempt to evade responsibility here (Luke 23:1-25; John 18:28–19:22; and parallel passages), despite his recognition of Jesus' innocence of the Jews' charge of sedition, was caused by his fear of the high priest's power and by his difficult responsibility for the peace of Palestine. Pilate's headquarters were in Caesarea, and Herod Antipas' in Tiberias. The former usually came to Jerusalem with reinforcements at Passover to preserve order among the Jewish crowds, while the latter came to gain favor with his subjects, as the tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. A ruthless ruler, Pilate caused a massacre of Galileans (Luke 13:1), was removed for this, according to Eusebius, and committed suicide at Rome. He was tactless, hottempered, and often weak in ruling; to cover his weakness he often resorted to brutal acts. A fourth- or fifth-century book of the Pseudepigrapha, The Acts of Pilate (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT), tells of his ending as a Christian, but this is pure fancy. KEITH J. HARDMAN

PILGRIMAGE OF ETHERIA. Etheria was a late fourth-century or early fifth-century nun who made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Constantinople. On the journey she identified various sites traditionally linked with OT events. She also visited a number of churches built on greatly revered places in and around Jerusalem itself—Mount Zion, Calvary, Bethlehem, Gethsemane, the Mount of Olives, and the site of the Finding of the True Cross (which discovery Etheria is one of the first to attribute to Helena*). Her account has preserved valuable information about the liturgical practices of the period. Egypt and Jerusalem both celebrated the Nativity on 6 January, today the feast of the Epiphany. Lent had its own liturgy; so had Holy Week, Easter, Pentecost, and the whole Paschal period. Early references to the various offices of the day are also included—the office before dawn, tierce, sext, none, vespers. At first the manuscript, discovered in 1884, was attributed to St. Silvia, but it was now generally accepted as the work of Etheria. L. FEEHAN

PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE (1536-37). A revolt that began primarily against the ecclesiastical policies of Henry VIII* of England. It had, however, many other causes and facets, for social discontent in the north of England where it took place was rife. Led by Robert Aske* and a number of the leading members of the northern aristocracy such as Sir Thomas Darcy, the rebels who came primarily from Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and Durham demanded that Henry change both his councillors and his policies. In particular they demanded that the move toward Protestantism be arrested. Although the rebels professed great loyalty to him, Henry defeated them by dividing and then overwhelming them, after which in true Tudor style he exacted a bloody vengeance with over 200 executions. W.S. REID

PILGRIMAGES. Journeys undertaken for religious reasons, usually to shrines or holy places. The concept predates Christianity and is common to several religions, reaching its highest development in Islam.* Although the practice of pilgrimage barely appeared in the earliest Christian centuries, the desire to visit the actual scenes of Christ's earthly life was a natural one. Among the earliest well-known pilgrims to the Holy Land were Constantine* and his mother Helena,* both of whom built churches there. From the veneration of the sites of the Savior's earthly ministry, the concept of pilgrimage was extended to the sites of the martyrdoms of His witnesses, which quickly acquired miraculous associations.

As the cult of martyrs burgeoned, pilgrimages frequently became expeditions to collect relics. For Western Christians, the journey to the East was often out of the question, but Rome, a city associated with both Peter and Paul and many lesser saints, held an irresistible attraction, and pilgrimage was encouraged by the papacy, which eventually stipulated that every bishop must receive his pallium in Rome. Other popular shrines include those of St. Martin at Tours, St. James at Compostella, and St. Thomas at Canterbury. Charlemagne* indicated his concern for pilgrims by erecting a hostel in Jerusalem, with the cooperation of Haroun-al-Raschid.

As life became less precarious in the West, pilgrimages to the Holy Land became more frequent and more organized and included larger numbers of people. Pilgrimages thus formed an impetus to the Crusades, attacks on pilgrims helping to incite the papacy to initiate the movement. The church sought to aid and protect pilgrims by the creation of hostels and by ruling that the person of the pilgrim was inviolate, and that it was a pious act to assist him on his way. Indulgences* were promised to pilgrims to certain shrines, and became general with the crusading movement. This aspect was strengthened in 1300 with the establishment of the Year of Jubilee.* The denunciations of pilgrimages by the Reformers merely echoed the reservations expressed by John Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Gregory of Nyssa, and Boniface, among others. In Protestant areas the movement declined, though the motif reappeared in the great classic, Pilgrim's Progress.

PILKINGTON, GEORGE LAWRENCE (1865-1897). Missionary to Africa. Born in Dublin into an old Protestant landlord family, he was educated at Uppingham and Cambridge. A promising classical scholar, he was converted in 1885. Although lacking theological training, he felt called to Christian service and went to Uganda under the Church Missionary Society in 1890. Because of his keen linguistic skills, he undertook the task of translating the Bible into the Luganda tongue. In his personal ministry he stressed the need for the baptism of the Holy Spirit. He advocated in his writings the principle of the self-supporting and propagating indigenous church, and contended most European missionaries should go to those areas where a strong, aggressive national church was active. By reinforcing the work already undertaken by native Christians, they would enhance the effects of the existing spiritual momentum. He was killed in a Sudanese militia uprising in Uganda. RICHARD V. PIERARD

PILKINGTON, JAMES (c.1520-1576). Bishop of Durham. He was born near Rivington in Lancashire, and became a fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1539 and president in 1550. Being a warm supporter of the Reformation, during the persecutions of Mary he had to flee to the Continent and lived in Zurich, Basle, Geneva, and Frankfurt. He returned to England in 1558 and was the first to sign the "Peaceable Letter" to the English Church at Geneva. He was appointed to the commission for the revision of the Book of Common Prayer.* In 1559 he became master of St. John's College and regius professor of divinity. The following year he was appointed bishop of Durham, the first Protestant to hold that see. He had a hand in the drawing up of the Thirty-Nine Articles* in 1562 and in the diocese pursued a vigorous Protestant policy. He took action against superstitious ornaments, but also allowed many of the buildings in the diocese to fall into ruin. In 1566 he gave a charter to Durham city. In the 1569 northern rebellion he had to flee. He wrote some OT commentaries and a treatise entitled "The Burning of Paul's Church in London by Lightning." R.E. NIXON

PIONIUS (d.250). Martyr. An elder of the Church in Smyrna, he was killed in the Decian persecution. The Acta Pionii, recording his trial and burning, are extant in the Greek and in two divergent Latin versions. They represent an almost contemporary document, probably incorporating materials from the martyr's own writing in prison, and known to Eusebius, who erroneously makes Pionius a contemporary of his townsman Polycarp.* The narrative bears impressive testimony to the martyr's character and culture, and gives valuable insight into the treatment of Christians. The surviving Life of Polycarp ascribed to Pionius is considered spurious, though accepted by C.J. Cadoux. Itself a legendary compilation, it was apparently intended to be part of a Corpus Polycarpianum fathered on the pious and literary Pionius, to which we may owe the preservation of the Martyrdom of Polycarp. COLIN HEMER

PIRCKHEIMER, WILLIBALD (1470-1530). German scholar. Born at Eickstätt, he studied at Pavia and Padua. In Nuremberg he promoted the study of the classics as his father, Johann, before him had done. Willibald's sisters were said to have been among the best educated women of Germany. Six of the seven entered religious orders; the most famous was Charitas, who brought about Willibald's return to Roman Catholicism after he had for a few years followed Martin Luther. Three of his five daughters became nuns. His Bellum Helveticum seu Suitense, published in 1610, earned him the title of "the German Xenophon." His Oratio Apologetica, written a year before his death, is a defense of his sister's convent and the Old Religion. Pirckheimer and Albrecht Dürer* were close friends. Pirckheimer's translations of classical writers and his original historical, scientific, and artistic studies put him into the front ranks of the German humanists.

PISA, COUNCIL OF (1409). Convoked by cardinals in an effort to end the Great Schism.* Eight of Gregory XII's* cardinals deserted him and joined the Avignonese cardinals to summon this general council in June 1409. The assembly was attended by approximately 500 members, representative of much of the Western Church. England, France, Portugal, Poland, Bohemia, and Sicily were represented, but there was no approval given by Scotland, Scandinavia, Hungary, Castile, Aragon, Ladislas of Naples, or the emperor Rupert in Germany. The council claimed authority and legitimacy on the basis of arguments developed by Cardinal P. d'Ailly* (who had deserted Benedict XIII*), F. Zabarella (created cardinal in 1411), and Jean Gerson.* They declared that the assembly—although not called together by a pope—fully expressed the unity of the church and had power to end the Schism. Peace was maintained because of the presence of Cardinal Cossa (later John XXIII*). The council deposed the existing popes (Gregory XII and Benedict XIII) as heretics and schismatics, and authorized the cardinals to elect a new pope. They elected the Greek cardinal, Peter Philargi, who became Alexander V.* The council also made an effort to deal with Wycliffism and the Bohemian movement.

There has been much criticism of this council. It is not recognized by the Roman Catholic Church as being ecumenical, because of the irregularity of its convocation. It did not end the Schism, which was now further complicated by having three rival popes. It was unable to enforce its decrees because it lacked sufficient support from the secular rulers in the Christian world. It is, however, agreed that this council prepared the way for the final healing of the Schism, which took place at the Council of Constance* in 1415.

PISTIS SOPHIA. Gnostic writing in Sahidic. Probably a fourth- or fifth-century translation of a Greek original, a product of late Egyptian Gnosticism.* It has been variously ascribed to the Valentinians, the Ophites, and the Barbelo-Gnostics. It purports to be a revelation of esoteric mysteries made known by the risen Christ to the inner circle of disciples, showing how they may attain to the Light-world and escape the present mixed world which is doomed to destruction. The title is derived from the name of the heroine, "Pistis Sophia," a personification of Philosophy, who is delivered from Authadēs (= "self-will" or "arrogance") by Jesus during His ascension through the spheres and in conflict with the aeons. She is led from Chaos by a Power of Light sent by Jesus. Other unconnected sections are appended, including a Gnostic survey of hierarchies, aeons, and spheres, dialogues between Jesus and the disciples (especially with Mary), and discourses reflecting Gnostic sacramentalism. The work is miscellany of fantastic fragments loosely strung together, taking its name from one of the parts. In its own strange way it shows a real devotion to Christ. It exists in a single manuscript in the British Museum. J.G.G. NORMAN

PISTOIA, SYNOD OF (1786). Held under the presidency of Scipione de' Ricci,* and quietly manipulated by Leopold II, grand duke of Tuscany, this was a Jansenist attempt at ecclesiastical renewal. Its fifty-seven points of church reform included a deep desire for catechetical and liturgical revision, a de-emphasized episcopate, reorganization of clergy, just distribution of church goods, and purification of private and public piety. Initially a diocesan project, it attracted clergy and laymen from Europe as a whole. Doctrine was widely discussed, and the proceedings published in many languages. A proposed national council was thwarted, but the synod affirmed the views of Jansen (see JANSENISM), Arnauld,* Quesnel,* and Febronius (see FEBRONIANISM), adopted the Four Gallican Articles,* urged the vernacular, and decentralized authority throughout, thus enabling more popular participation in worship. The bull Auctorem fidei (1794) condemned many of the proposals, and Ricci recanted, but the theological concerns expressed through sources, writings, and seminary studies were to find positive development.

PITRA, JEAN-BAPTISTE (1812-1889). Cardinal and patristic scholar. After studying at the seminary at Autun, he became a Benedictine and in 1843 prior of St. Germain in Paris. He cooperated here for a brief period with J.P. Migne,* the patrologist. Then he traveled widely in search of Latin and Greek MSS and to raise money for the abbey of Solesmes. The pope sent him on an ecumenical mission to Rome after which he became Pius IX's adviser on oriental matters. In 1869 he was appointed librarian at the Vatican, where he cataloged precious Greek codices. In 1879 he was made bishop of Frascati and in 1880 cardinal legate of Monte Cassino. He published important material on the patristic period as well as in canonical law. PETER TOON

PIUS I (d.154). Bishop of Rome from about 140. Information about his life and pontificate is at best sketchy. The Muratorian Fragment lists his brother as the author of the *Shepherd of Hermas, while the Liber Pontificalis indicates that he was born in Aquileia. The tradition that he was a martyr does not extend to the early period of the church.

PIUS II (1405-1464). Pope from 1458. Born Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini near Siena, he was the most famous papal representative of Renaissance humanism. After studying at the University of Siena and at Florence, he became secretary to Domenico Capranica and accompanied him to the Council of Basle* (1431-35). Rising rapidly in the council's service due to his oratorical skill, he went on diplomatic missions to England and Scotland and became secretary to the conciliar pope, Felix V. Sensing the growing futility of the council, he entered the service of Frederick III* of Germany (1442). Personal suffering and his conviction that action must be taken against the Turks led him to adopt a more serious lifestyle. He submitted to Pope Eugenius IV (1445) and was ordained (1446) and made bishop (1447). After negotiating the Concordat of Aschaffenburg he was created a cardinal (1456).

Elected pope he preached a crusade against the Turks, who had recently captured Constantinople (1453). He convened a congress of Christendom at Mantua (1458) to formulate plans for the crusade, but received little support from the temporal princes for his project. When the Germans opposed his levy of a crusade tax by pointing to the sins of his youth, he issued his bull, Execrabilis (1460), condemning all appeals from the pope to an ecumenical council. In 1464 he personally led a crusade against the Turks, but was stricken with fever and died at Ancona, Italy.

Pius was a brilliant writer and produced a number of prose treatises in defense of conciliarism, poetry, history, fiction, and orations. Among his works are Historii Frederili Imperatoris; Historica Bohemica, Cosmographiae in Asiae et Europae; and Miseriae Curialum, a series of Latin poems that influenced fifteenth-century English satire. His Commentaries are a most valuable legacy as they consist of the only autobiography left by any pope.

PIUS IV (1499-1565). Pope from 1559; brought Council of Trent* to a successful conclusion. Gian Angelo de' Medici, son of a Milanese notary, studied law and medicine at Pavia, and entered papal service in 1527. He was made archbishop of Ragusa in 1545 and cardinal in 1549. He succeeded Paul IV as pope in 1559 and quickly ended nepotism in papal circles. No profound theologian, he was yet a skillful and amiable politician. He reassembled the Council of Trent in 1561. Negotiating privately with the emperor Ferdinand and the French and Spanish kings, he used the majority of Italian bishops in the council to maintain the power of the Curia. He conciliated Ferdinand by conceding Communion in both kinds to the laity in the Empire. The council was dissolved in 1563, thus completing the legal enactment of the Counter-Reformation.* Pius published a new Index* in 1564, and prepared an edition of the Roman Catechism.

J.G.G. NORMAN

PIUS V (1504-1572). Pope from 1566. Born Michele Ghislieri, he entered at the age of fourteen the Dominican Order wherein he later held the offices of master and prior, served the Inquisition in Milan, was appointed commissary general of the Inquisition in 1551, bishop of Nepi and Sutri in 1557, became a cardinal, and with the backing of Cardinal Borromeo* and the Ultramontane party, was elected pope. Fanatical and austere, Pius had as his ideal no less than the refashioning of the whole church on the model of his own household. To this end he vigorously enforced the recommendations of the Council of Trent, revised the Breviary and the Missal, and saw to the republication of the works of Aquinas.* He stamped out the Reformed faith in Italy while encouraging Spain to do likewise in the Netherlands, personally blessing the military campaigns of the duke of Alva. In France he acquired an ascendancy over Catherine de' Medici* and Charles IX, while in England his excommunication of Queen Elizabeth* led to divisions among and persecutions of the Catholic community. He helped promote the alliance of the Papal States,* Spain, and Venice which triumphed in the great naval battle at Lepanto in 1571. He was canonized in 1712.

PIUS VI (1717-1799). Pope from 1775. Born of noble parents, he was educated by the Jesuits. In 1740 he went to Rome as secretary to Cardinal Ruffo and became secretary to Benedict XIV and a canon of St. Peter's in 1755, but was not ordained until 1758. In 1773 he was created a cardinal despite his opposition to the suppression of the Jesuit Order which took place the same year. As pope he contrived by delicate diplomatic efforts to secure the Jesuits' resettlement in Prussia and Russia. His first years were taken up with domestic concerns, but soon he was threatened by an outbreak of national church movements similar to Gallicanism.* In the Holy Roman Empire, Febronianism* spread rapidly with the encouragement of the archbishop-electors, though at the Ems Congress* of 1786 their aims were cleverly frustrated by the pope, and the movement soon came to an end. In Tuscany the grand duke Leopold adopted a similar course which reached its height at the Synod of Pistoia* in 1786. By 1790, however, a clerical reaction was well under way. Most seriously, Josephinism in the Hapsburg Empire led to the pope's journeying to Vienna in 1782 to plead with the reforming emperor, though the following year, after a threat of excommunication, Joseph returned the visit and Pius partially reasserted his authority. Finally when in 1786 Joseph extended his policies to the Spanish Netherlands, the devoutly Catholic inhabitants rose in a clerical-nationalist revolt, and the pope had the satisfaction of seeing princely reforming attempts defied by the people themselves. The French Revolution and the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790) led the pope to anathematize the revolutionaries and those clerics who accepted their reforms; this in turn led to the Papal States* being included in the first anti-French Coalition (1796), the invasion and occupation of a portion thereof, the humiliating Peace of Tolentino (1797), the seizure of Rome itself (1798), and the carrying off of the pope's person by the French and his untimely death in the depths of an Alpine winter. It is sometimes asserted that under Pius VI the papacy reached its nadir, but the successes of the papal counter-revolution were considerable and public sympathy for his sufferings strengthened the institution in popular esteem. IAN SELLERS

PIUS VII (1740-1823). Pope from 1800. Born Barnaba Chiaramonti and trained as a Benedictine, when he took the name Gregorio, he held the sees of Tivoli (1782) and Imola (1785) before election to the papacy. There he was immediately confronted by the self-aggrandizing demands of Napoleon, who, in order to secure total hold over France, wanted a new concordat. The new pope was conciliatory and conceived the principle of remaining immovable in exercising and defending his spiritual authority while seeking to accommodate the church to the new forms of society. The Concordat* (1801) did restore the Church in France, but as amended by the Organic Articles* (1802), left Napoleon in complete charge. Pius protested, but then approved a similar Concordat (1803) with Napoleonic northern Italy. Pius, still conciliatory, agreed to give the authority of his personal presence to Napoleon's self-coronation as emperor in Paris (December 1804). The emperor was now intent on full expansion of his regime across Europe, including the universal extension of his statist ecclesiastical system and the absorption of the States of the Church.* The latter process was completed in February 1808; the pope, maintaining constant protest, was bodily seized (1809) and deported to Savona near Genoa, and finally to Fontainebleau (1812) near Paris. Napoleon, who never successfully dominated the pope. released him and Pius reentered Rome (May 1814).

Cardinal Consalvi,* the talented papal secretary of state, induced the Congress of Vienna (1814-15) to effect a near-complete reestablishment of the Papal States. With Pius's support he reorganized the government amid resistance from both Sanfedisti and Carbonari. The church was effectively restored by concordats with Bavaria and Sardinia (1817), Naples and Russia (1818), Prussia (1821), and other Italian and German states. Pius restored the Jesuits (1814) and revitalized Catholic missions in Asia and Latin America. His singular piety and resistance to Napoleon provided an example of devotion for masses of the faithful.

PIUS IX (1792-1878). Pope from 1846. Born Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, he was archbishop of Spoleto (1827) and bishop of Imola (1832) before his election as pope. He enjoyed the longest pontificate in history and consummated the spiritual renewal of the Roman Church in the nineteenth century. His central task was the identification and promotion of devoutly Catholic faith and practice in distinction from the many non-Christian and anti-Catholic philosophical or societal movements. Two world-historical events summarized his reign: the end of papal temporal power (1859-61, 1870), and the First Vatican Council (1869-70).

Pius IX experienced revolution firsthand in the Revolution of 1848-49 when he was forced by Mazzinians and Garibaldinians to flee Rome. French troops restored him (April 1850) and occupied Rome and its environs with only one interruption until 1870. Nevertheless, uprisings and Sardinian-Italian invasions terminated the temporal power over the States of the Church* (1859-61, 1870) after a thousand-year rule. He maintained a policy of nonrecognition (non possemus) of the Italian absorption of the Papal States, which he considered necessary to his spiritual independence.

Out of this experience, Pius identified the principles, including liberalism, democratism, rationalism, anticlericalism, which motivated anti-Catholic assaults, and condemned them in a series of addresses, excommunications, and encyclicals, notably the Quanta Cura and the appended Syllabus of Errors* (1864). These were consistent with his first encyclical Qui pluribus (1846); contrary to many liberal enthusiasts (1846-48), he never had a sympathy for secular liberalism.

Concomitantly he constructively promoted Ultramontane* renewal of his spiritual power by defining the Immaculate Conception* of Mary (1854), which encouraged wide popular Catholic revival among the faithful; by timely canonizations and papal jubilees; by urging extensive missionary work worldwide; by his own example of obvious piety and faith amid extreme adversity; and by convening the Vatican Council* (1869-70). Pius IX, supported by the mass popular revival, succeeded in centralizing the church in the papacy, especially in the promulgation of Papal Infallibility (1870), and undermining all attempts to continue Gallican and Febronian churches under the new motive of nationalism. He reestablished the hierarchies in England (1850) and the Netherlands (1853); secured favorable concordats with Russia (1847), Spain (1851), and Austria (1855); and established numerous new dioceses. In the process, Pius IX achieved for the church a remarkable independence from state domination.

Except for one diplomatic mission to Latin America (1823-25), he spent his whole life in the central Italian peninsula.

PIUS X (1835-1914). Pope from 1903. Born Giuseppi Melchiorre Sarto, he became bishop of Mantua in 1884 and patriarch of Venice in 1893. He devoted his pontificate to the continuing spiritual purification of the Catholic Church. His struggle against Catholic modernism in the writings of Loisy,* Houtin, and others, led to its condemnation in the encyclical Pieni l'animo (1906), in a sixty-five point summary of its errors (1907), and finally in the requirement that clergy takes an oath against modernism (1910). He followed Leo XIII in recommending Thomism as the Catholic philosophy (1910) and founded the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome (1909). He showed some favor to Bernigni's League of St. Pius V, which professed Integralism, but condemned, graciously, Charles Maurras and *Action Française (1926). To strengthen the faith of ordinary believers, threatened as he saw them by modernism, he promoted renewal in worship and personal devotion: he provided for enhancement of the church's music, including a revival of Gregorian chant (1904), a revision of the Breviary prayers (1911), new devotion to Mary (1904), more frequent Mass for the faithful (1905), an earlier First Communion for children, and better religious instruction (1905). He began the codification of canon law completed under Benedict XV.

The Catholic struggle with the secularist French Third Republic reached a new stage with the break in diplomatic relations (1904), and the French Law of Separation (1905), unilaterally terminating the Concordat of 1801*; among other things, the state confiscated further church properties and transformed its semi-favorable legal stance toward the church into active legal antagonism, Pius condemned the action in the encyclicals Vehementer Nos and Gravissimo officii munere (1906). He maintained, but softened, the papal non possemus policy against the Italian overthrow of papal temporal power, allowing limited Catholic participation in local elections (1905). Pieni l'animo (1906) also showed his favored model for politics: Catholic Action,* social action by nonclergy under effective hierarchical control, rather than independent Catholic movements advocated by the new Christian democracy. He was canonized in 1954.

PIUS XI (1857-1939). Pope from 1922. Born Ambrogio Damiano Achille Ratti, he earned three doctorates and before election as pope was archbishop of Milan. He significantly advanced Catholic formulation of the church's role in the secular post-World War I era. With the Lateran Treaties (1922), the long and complex question of the end of papal temporal power (1859-61, 1870) attained new status and apparently a conclusion: by mutual agreement between the papacy and Mussolini's Italy, the State of Vatican City was established, a Vatican-Italian concordat was signed, and Italy paid the Vatican a substantial indemnity. For Mussolini, the pact won initial Catholic support of his emerging totalitarian regime, while it gave the Vatican the independence it had sought.

The encyclical Quadragesimo anno (1931) developed Catholic societal principles, consistent with Leo XIII, along the lines of subsidiarity and corporativism: a pluralism of societal relationships arranged under the dogmatic and moral teachings of the church. His was a clear alternative to Communism or collectivist Socialism, individualism, and then Nazism. Mussolini eclectically tried to coopt some of the ideas into his Fascist system. Pius elsewhere condemned the principles of Fascism (1931), German Nazism (1937), and Soviet Communism (1937). Pius's advocacy of Catholic Action* (1922, 1928) provided a concrete way for nonclergy to join in social reconstruction in harmony with episcopal control and the church's teachings. He thought of it as "lay" sharing in the apostolic mission of the church. His encyclical Divini illius magistri (1929) defined the basis for Catholic school education and argued against exclusive state control of education.

He concluded many concordats, especially establishing the church in the new central E European states, like Poland (1925) and Romania (1927). He defined an accommodating role for the church in secularist France by resuming diplomatic relations (1921) and obtaining a new ecclesiastical agreement (1928). In missions he promoted indigenous episcopal leadership by naming six Chinese bishops (1926) and a Japanese bishop (1927). A number of World Eucharistic Congresses displayed the church's international character.

PIUS XII (1876-1958). Pope from 1939. Ordained priest in 1899, Eugenio Pacelli had his first taste of life in the Vatican in 1901 when he entered the secretariat under Leo XIII. He held a succession of important posts before being created a cardinal and the papal secretary of state by Pius XI in 1930. He served as a papal legate to the Eucharistic Congress in Buenos Aires and at other important events in the USA and Europe. Never before had a secretary traveled outside Italy. Pius XI unofficially made it known that he wished his secretary to succeed him, and at the conclave following his death his wishes were realized and Pius XII appeared to give his blessings Urbe et Orbi.

According to his admirers he was a very able statesman, a great teacher, a custodian of sound doctrine, a champion of neutrality and internationalism, a follower of Pius XI's policy of concordatory relations, and a militant anti-Communist. To his detractors he was a gifted politician who skillfully adapted traditional curial practice to the circumstances of World War II and its aftermath. On internal church affairs it seemed at first that Pius XII would respond to the call for renewal. This is seen, for example, in the encyclicals of 1943—Mystici Corporis (which emphasized the church as mystical body of Christ) and Divino Afflante Spiritu (which gave the hope of a return to biblical studies in the church)—and that of 1947, Mediator Dei, on the Liturgy. But in 1950 he issued Humani Generis, which revoked some concessions made in the sphere of biblical studies, and thereby prepared the way for the proclamation of the dogma of the Assumption* of the Virgin Mary (1950), and the promulgation of the Marian Year for 1954.

His conservatism also was revealed in his project to discover the tomb of Peter beneath the Vatican and his zeal to canonize his predecessors. He elevated Pius X and Innocent I, revived the cause of the sanctification of the Blessed Innocent V and Gregory X, and initiated the cause of Pius IX. He died at his villa in Castel Gandolfo, and his death seems to have been the end of an epoch in the history of the papacy.

PLAN OF UNION, THE (1801-1852). The scheme to prevent duplication of Presbyterian and Congregational work on the western American frontier fostered the development of Presbyterianism more than Congregationalism. John B. Smith, president of Union College in Schenectady, New York; Eliphalet Nott, a Congregational missionary; and the younger Jonathan Edwards all had a part in its adoption by the Presbyterian and Congregationalist denominations in 1801. The Plan united adherents of the two denominations in the West into congregations with local church government being that of the majority. The minister could be of either denomination. Larger disputes were to be resolved by the presbytery or association or a bidenominational council. Presbyterianism gained most adherents as the Plan developed from the Hudson River to Chicago. The Presbyterian general assembly ended cooperation in 1837, and the Plan was finally ended by its abrogation by a Congregational convention at Albany in October 1852.

PLATINA, BARTOLOMEO (Bartolommeo de Sacchi) (1421-1481). Humanist scholar and historian. Born in Piadena, Italy, he was a soldier and tutor who traveled to Florence to study Greek. In 1462 he joined the entourage of Francesco Cardinal Gonzaga in Rome, then was appointed to the College of Abbreviators by Pius II in 1464. Soon he was arrested for refusing dismissal by Paul II as a member of Pomponius Laetus's academy and a reputed pagan. Imprisoned again in 1468 for heresy and for plotting against Paul's life, he was acquitted and released in 1469. Sixtus IV named him librarian at the Vatican in 1472. His Lives of the Popes (1479), the first systematic history of the popes—by no means a dispassionate one—portrayed Paul II as an opponent of the arts.

PLATONISM. It is customary to distinguish three groups among the intellectual heirs in antiquity of the Athenian philosopher Plato (428-348 B.C.), the first his immediate successors, then Middle Platonism (first century B.C. to second century A.D.), and finally the Neoplatonists (third century A.D. onward), who profoundly influenced Augustine of Hippo,* and are discussed further under their most important representatives Plotinus* and Porphyry.* But beyond these bounds Plato's ideas were widely adopted, sometimes adapted to fit other creeds (for some early Christian thinkers who show a debt to Plato, see articles on ATHENAGORAS, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, JUSTIN MARTYR, and ORIGEN). In the Middle Ages Plato's description of the physical universe in his Timaeus was known (and largely accepted) through Chalcidius's Latin translation. The Cambridge Platonists* were seventeenth-century scholars and preachers who used Platonist and Cartesian ideas against Hobbes's materialism.

(1) Plato. To Socrates's original but down-to-earth stress on man as moral being, Plato gave an other-worldly twist. To justify an absolute morality, he postulated an eternal, changeless, absolute World of Forms, above and apart from our changing, material universe but related to it as model to imperfect copy. Morals, science, art, etc., must be derived from these eternal principles (known only to the philosopher), not from experience. The body is inferior to the soul, which is immortal, subject to reincarnation, akin to the Forms, and capable of achieving fulfillment only after death. One Form (or Idea) corresponds to each group of things in this world which we call by a common name—e.g., dogs, beds, triangles—but also good, justice, beauty. Plato introduced to Greece the idea of an actively good (but not omnipotent) God and of creation (not ex nihilo, but out of preexisting chaos and using the Forms as blueprint); rejected the more immoral myths but not polytheism as such; and developed a version of the cosmological argument (Laws 893b ff., see AQUINAS).

(2) Middle Platonism. Plato's doctrines were revived from the first century B.C. more with religious than philosophical motives. The moral absolutes, the other-worldly values, the Creator remain, but each thinker makes his own significant adaptations. Influenced by Aristotle,* all postulate a remote, transcendent God (or Mind), incomprehensible except in momentary revelations, indescribable except by negatives, and active in creation only through intermediaries, e.g., a second Mind, the World-Soul, and multifarious deities, planets, spirits (Albinus). The independent Platonic Forms now become thoughts in the divine Mind. Theories about the cause of evil—matter itself (e.g., Numenius) or an evil soul within matter (e.g., Plutarch)—resemble Gnosticism.*

PLESSIS, JOSEPH OCTAVE (1762-1825). Roman Catholic archbishop of Quebec. Born near Montreal, the son of a blacksmith, he received a classical education at Montreal College and trained for the priesthood at the Petit Séminaire in Quebec. Completing these studies, he taught for a time at Montreal College, became secretary to Bishop Briand,* and was ordained a priest in 1786. He became a leader in resisting the predominance of the British over the French, and the British party attempted to hinder his rapid rise in the hierarchy. He was consecrated as bishop-coadjutor in 1801 and as bishop of Quebec in 1806. Enmity between the two groups increased at this time, but at the outbreak of the War of 1812 he urged the French to be loyal to Canada, thus winning the appreciation of the government. In 1814 he was granted a seat in the legislative council, and he used this to further the position of the Roman Catholic population, especially those of French extraction. He was consecrated archbishop of Quebec in 1818. KEITH J. HARDMAN

PLINY'S LETTER TO TRAJAN. Pliny was sent by Emperor Trajan about 112 to reorganize the affairs of the province of Bithynia. In one of his letters to the emperor, Pliny asked questions about the treatment of Christians and thereby supplied information about early Christian life and worship—e.g., he referred to services before dawn and late in the evening on one day (Sunday). Admitting that the "contagion" of Christianity had penetrated both cities and villages and that he had executed some resolute Christians, he asked Trajan how he should deal with those who were accused of Christianity. In reply, Trajan advised him not to search out Christians, but only to punish those accused and convicted. PETER TOON

PLOTINUS (205-270). Originator of Neoplatonism.* A Greek-speaking Egyptian educated in Alexandria, he established a school in Rome in A.D. 245 which had a wide influence in antiquity and later notably on Augustine of Hippo* (for the later history of Neoplatonism, see PORPHYRY).

As in Middle Platonism, religious motives prevail, but as one of the more successful examples of philosophical monism, Plotinus's system was a useful ally against the dualism of Gnosticism.* He also influenced orthodox explanations of the Trinity, complementing Philo* in many ways, although direct dependence cannot be proved.

Plotinus's single ultimate being serves primarily as a focus for mystical meditation (religious ecstasy), but combines the transcendence of Aristotle's* Unmoved Mover with a creative role as sole cause of the universe, which however avoids the ambiguities attaching to divine Fire in Stoicism. He postulates distinct but inseparable levels ("hypostases") of being, the lower both proceeding from the higher and in turn aspiring toward it. At the top is the One (or the Good), pure Unity without any trace of duality, and therefore strictly nameless and engaged solely in self-contemplation, but producing as a necessary by-product (as the sun by being itself necessarily radiates light) the second hypostasis, the Divine Mind. This has two aspects: Intelligence and its object Truth (the Platonic Forms); it aspires towards Unity, but in doing so necessarily produces the third level, Soul (or Spirit). Soul has a higher aspect which contemplates Truth, and a lower on which the physical world, though itself eternal, depends for existence. This hierarchical "trinity" produces a universe in which neither evil nor matter is an independent principle, but is seen negatively as the point where, because of its distance from the One, creativity (inexplicably) fails.

The individual soul, like the cosmic, must aspire to Truth and avoid bodily indulgence. Because of an original "fall," our souls are subject to reincarnation until completely purified by asceticism, thought, and ecstasy (the soul transcending itself and achieving momentarily direct communion with the One). PLUMTRE, EDWARD HAYES (1821-1891). Theological writer, classical scholar, and poet. Born in London, he was educated at University College, Oxford, and later became a fellow of Brasenose. Subsequently he held the chair of pastoral theology at King's College, London. In later years he held benefices in Kent and in 1881 became dean of Wells. He enjoyed a high reputation for classical learning. Apart from his translations of classical plays and books of poems written by himself, he helped in the translation of the Bible for the Revised Version, and contributed commentaries to various series. Theologically he was an eclectic; in his eschatology (The Spirits in Prison, 1884) he showed leanings toward the "larger hope." R.E.D. CLARK

PLUNKET, OLIVER (1629-1681). Primate of Ireland. Born in Loughcrew, Meath, he studied in Dublin and Rome, and was professor of theology in Propaganda College (1657-69). After twenty-five years in Rome he was consecrated at Ghent and returned to Ireland in 1670 as archbishop of Armagh and titular primate. An ultramontane who favored the Jesuits, he established in Dublin a school under their management. He labored unceasingly within and beyond his diocese, often barely housed or fed, and had a good relationship with Protestants. During the persecutions, though guiltless, he was hanged for treason by Charles II. His head remains in the Dominican convent at Drogheda, founded in 1722 by his grandniece Catherine. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PLÜTSCHAU, HEINRICH (1677-1747). Co-founder with B. Ziegenbalg* of the Halle-Danish Mission, the first Protestant mission in India. When the two were summoned from theological studies at Halle to become missionaries of King Frederick IV of Denmark, they at first believed that West Africa was the destination. They went instead in 1706 to Tranquebar, the tiny Danish settlement on the coast of Tamil-speaking India. Plütschau concentrated on the Portuguese-speaking congregation, and proved himself an able partner of the more renowned Ziegenbalg. He returned to Europe in 1711.

PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. Though originating in Dublin, they were so named because their first congregation was formed in Plymouth (1831). The beginnings were essentially informal, with many showing a desire to return to the simplicity of apostolic days and worship, and to break down the walls that divided Christians. The movement was a protest against the prevailing conditions of spiritual deadness, formalism, and sectarianism marking the earlier years of the nineteenth century.

Edward Cronin, medical student at Trinity College, Dublin, withdrew from church attendance for a time because he was refused Communion unless he entered into membership with one of the dissenting churches. This he regarded as a denial that "the church of God was one, and that all that believed were members of that one Body." Joined by a small group of like-minded persons, he met with them "for breaking of bread and prayer" in a private house. Others equally disenchanted with existing ecclesiastical conditions soon associated with them, including A.N. Groves,* John Vesey Parnell (afterward Lord Congleton), John Gifford Bellett, and J.N. Darby.* Their studies confirmed them in their belief that they could observe the Lord's Supper without an ordained clergyman. They broke bread simply, recognizing that the Lord, who was present, would guide by His Spirit as to audible participation in the gathering.

The unique character of the meetings created considerable interest and many more attended to inquire further and learn for themselves from Scripture. Numbers grew rapidly, and they used a hired room to accommodate the people. Darby was the outstanding teacher of the group. The gatherings were marked by deep devotion to Christ, zeal for evangelism, and a strong leaning toward prophetic studies. Groves, observing the dominance of Darby, warned him against strengthening the very elements of legalism from which they had withdrawn, but there is no evidence that Darby gave heed to Groves's words.

Among the many who came under Darby's influence were Francis Newman* and B.W. Newton.* The latter began a ministry in Plymouth with others, and the congregation grew to be large and influential. Darby and Newton had never agreed on prophetical interpretation, and on his return from the continent in 1845 Darby visited Plymouth, wishing to change some of the established customs of the church. Later in 1845 Darby initiated a breakaway; but in 1847/8 a more serious division occurred through attacks made against Newton's teaching on Christ's humanity. Though Newton withdrew his doctrine and never taught it again, the tension, discussions, and charges continued, leading to a major division affecting all the churches.

Two members of the Plymouth church applied for fellowship at Bethesda Chapel, Bristol, where George Müller* and Henry Craik were joint pastors. A few demanded that they should be refused as unsound because they had sat under Newton's teaching. The elders, however, claimed the right to examine such visitors for themselves to ascertain if they actually held false doctrine. As an autonomous church they believed they should settle their own affairs without being stampeded into some joint action of which they might disapprove. Darby pressed for division, and those who followed him broke off all relations with those who agreed with Bethesda. From that time Brethren became two distinct groups, the mainstream of the movement (Open Brethren) maintaining its original principles, while the Darbyist group (Exclusive Brethren) became increasingly centralized in government and separatist in relation to other Christians.

Exclusive Brethren have had several divisions among themselves, these coming to a head in recent times through the extremist teachings of James Taylor (d. 1970). There are other, smaller groups who are much less extreme, in no way associated with Taylorism and who repudiate its doctrines. Many of these are hardly distinguishable from Open Brethren.

During the 1880s a movement developed among Open Brethren that sought to reduce to more formal terms matters such as baptism, the Lord's Supper, and church government. These teachings, propagated through a journal named Needed Truth, led to a division in 1889, with the movement's taking the name of its magazine. Highly centralized in structure, it tended in a few years to produce small splinter groups and many of its members withdrew, some returning to Open Brethren though not always shedding "Needed Truth" principles. In this way some of the narrower principles they had imbibed were reintroduced into the Open Brethren churches. Gatherings under this influence still refuse other than their own members a place at the Lord's Table, and practice separation from other Christians. The vast majority of the Open Brethren, however, maintain their original "open" principles, mixing freely with other believers.

Their most distinctive gathering is the weekly breaking of bread, when there is freedom for brethren to lead in thanksgiving and prayer, or to participate in other ways, everything bearing in some way on the central purpose of the service, the remembrance of Christ in the Lord's Supper. While no order of clergymen is acknowledged, those who are gifted by God for the public ministry of the Word are gladly recognized, some being set apart for full-time service in evangelism or Bible teaching. Eschatology had prominence in earlier years, but from the first, differing views were held by leaders, and no one prophetic scheme has been imposed on the churches. Open Brethren practice believer's baptism, while the majority of Exclusive Brethren observe infant (or household) baptism.

Missionary concern marked Brethren from the first. Groves, his wife, and some friends journeyed to Baghdad, and later to India, in the cause of the Gospel. From that small beginning has grown a missionary outreach, with a missionary body of about 1,150. This work, known as Christian Missions to Many Lands, is represented by the magazines Echoes of Service (Bath, England) and The Fields (New York).

Brethren have firmly rejected the term "Plymouth," believing that a distinctive name placed a barrier between them and other Christians. Today, however, many feel that the term "Brethren" or "Christian Brethren" could be used without establishing denominational status or plunging them into sectarianism. Brethren have always exercised an influence among evangelical Christians out of all proportion to their numbers; they can be found in most parts of the world today.

PNEUMATOMACHI (Gr. = "fighters against the Spirit"). A fourth-century group which denied the deity of the Holy Spirit. Anticipated by the "Tropici" answered by Athanasius in his letters to Serapion of Thmuis, they came to the fore in 373 when Eustathius* of Sebaste became their leader after breaking his friendship with Basil of Caesarea. They were condemned by Damasus of Rome (374), and their doctrines were attacked by the Cappadocian Fathers and Didymus the Blind of Alexandria. The more moderate among them accepted the consubstantiality of the Son, but the more radical (led by Eustathius) regarded both Son and Spirit as "like in substance" or "like in all things" to the Father. Formally anathematized with other heresies at the Council of Constantinople in 381, the sect disappeared after 383, victims of the Theodosian antiheresy laws. Some early writers (Socrates, Sozomen, Jerome, Rufinus) regarded Macedonius of Constantinople as their founder, and they are sometimes called Macedonians; but Macedonius disappeared from sight after his deposition by the Arian Council of Constantinople in 360, and there is no known connection with the later sect, unless he worked out the theories in retirement. Possibly his followers amalgamated with the Pneumatomachi. Occasionally they were also called "Marathonians," after Marathonius of Nicomedia, another supporter of this teaching. J.G.G. NORMAN

POISSY, COLLOQUY OF (1561). An assembly of French Roman Catholic prelates and Reformed Protestant theologians, ministers and laymen, convened by the regent and queen mother, Catherine de' Medici.* Since the Council of Trent* had been adjourned in 1552 and was, moreover, clearly not following a policy of compromise with Protestantism, Catherine hoped to achieve religious peace and unity for France by a national program of reform, doctrinal and disciplinary, by calling a national council of the Gallican Church. The papacy prevented such a council by reconvening the Council of Trent. But Catherine went ahead, giving her assembly the designation "colloquy." As neither the Roman Catholic Church nor Calvinism was purely national, and as Catherine was also incapable of appreciating the depth of the doctrinal differences, this attempt at a political solution failed. Instead the Protestants gained an aura of royal acceptance, and religious passions were intensified, leading to open hostilities by 1562. KENNETH R. DAVIS

POLAND. To a degree hardly true of any other modern nation, the history of the church in Poland has been bound up with the history of the state. In 1966 the Poles celebrated the millennium of the baptism of Prince Meiszko, a symbol of Poland's entrance into the Catholic fold. For over a thousand years the population has been ardently Roman Catholic.

Before World War II the Jews comprised about a tenth of the population, but since the Hitlerian massacres their numbers are negligible. The non-Catholic, mainly Protestant, population is only about a tenth of the whole. Their cultural unity seems to have been strengthened, rather than weakened, by the Reformation, which they forcibly resisted, and by the more recent pressures, first by the Germans and later by the Russians. To break down their resistance the Soviets worked through a group of Catholics who were willing to support government policy: the Pax Association, led by Boleslaw Piasecki. Pax engaged in an enormous propaganda campaign through daily, weekly, and monthly publications, giving tacit approval to the repressive measures undertaken. It did not even protest the imprisonment of priests and bishops, including the Polish primate, Stefan Cardinal Wyszynski. In 1958 the cardinal had said, "The Church is against any form of large-scale state ownership.... I see no elements of humanism in socialism." In 1962 he berated government authorities as "enemies of God." Following his imprisonment he was no less adamant. As late as 11 June 1972 he stated that "it was the new Polish leadership rather than the Church that would have to make major compromises," insisting that "real (national) unity can be achieved only through the faith," that it is "neither comprehensive nor justified when attempts are made to destroy unity by leading workers from unity with Jesus Christ."

In December 1970, the party chief, Wladyslaw Gomulka, was replaced by Edward Gierek. Gie-

rek, working through a group of Catholics conciliatory with the Soviets, known as Znaks, took the line that "it is now realized that the socialist system is not a temporary phenomenon, but at the same time it is also realized that Catholicism in Poland is not temporary either." Such a statement can only be understood as conciliatory, especially when it is coupled with accession by the government to the cardinal's major demand that full title be given to the church for nearly 7.000 buildings, most of them churches. In 1972 the cardinal began a campaign for the construction of several thousand new churches throughout Poland, fifty in Warsaw alone.

The Protestant Church is hardly a factor in national politics. Whether it will fare better under the present "normalization" of church-state relations is debatable. Government conciliation could open the way for greater acceptance of Soviet economic policies and to a lessening of resistance to the Protestant evangelical witness. There is some evidence that both of these effects are actually taking place.

POLE, REGINALD (1500-1558). Cardinal; archbishop of Canterbury from 1556. Son of the countess of Salisbury, niece of Edward IV, Pole studied at Oxford under Thomas Linacre and William Latimer, and received ecclesiastical advancement from Henry VIII* without being ordained. From 1521 he studied in Europe, corresponding with Thomas More* and Erasmus.* Made dean of Exeter in 1527, he refused the sees of both York and Winchester in 1530, and in order to avoid taking sides over the king's divorce went abroad in 1532. He was a friend of Gaspar Contarini* and knew Gian Pietro Caraffa (later Paul IV*). In 1536 Pole published Pro Ecclesiasticae Unitatis Defensione against Henry VIII's assumption of supremacy, and was appointed by Paul III* to a committee for the reform of church discipline.

After his ordination as deacon, the pope made him a cardinal and sent him as legate to persuade France and Spain to break with England. In 1540 an act of attainder was passed against him and his family in England, and his mother was executed. In 1542 he was among those appointed to preside at the Council of Trent,* and in 1549 he was nearly elected pope. On Mary's accession, Pole came to England as legate and absolved Parliament from schism. The day after Archbishop Cranmer* was burnt, and two days after being ordained priest, Pole was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury (1556). He supported Mary's persecution without taking an active part, but found the full restoration of Roman Catholicism impossible without the return of monastic property. He died twelve hours after Queen Mary.

POLLARD, SAMUEL (1864-1915). Missionary to China. Born in Cornwall, son of a Methodist minister, he reached China under the Bible Christian* Mission in 1887 and was appointed to the SW region. He soon began the evangelization of the Miao tribe on the Kweichow-Yunnan border and spent twenty years among them. He reduced the language to writing and prepared literature in the script he devised. His educational efforts were greatly resented by those who gained from their workers' illiteracy, and on one occasion at least Pollard was severely beaten. Before he died of typhoid he witnessed a mass movement of the Miao into the Christian Church.

LESLIE T. LYALL

POLLOCK, ALGERNON JAMES (1864-1957). Plymouth Brethren* minister. Born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne of a distinguished legal family, he was a banker until in his late twenties he was called to the ministry. For the rest of his life he "lived by faith," without stipend and traveling the world as evangelist and teacher. A member of the Glanton Brethren (a branch of Plymouth but not Exclusive), his influence kept them from divisions. He studied Spiritualism and wrote articles, tracts, and books on devotion and prophecy (he was a dispensationalist), and for many years edited The Gospel Messenger.

POLYCARP (c.70-155/160). Bishop of Smyrna and martyr. He is depicted in the sources as a faithful pastor, champion of apostolic tradition, and pillar of catholic orthodoxy. The young Irenaeus heard him in Roman Asia describing his conversation with John the Apostle (the Elder?) and other eyewitnesses of Christ, and later prized his link with the primitive era through Polycarp, allegedly made bishop by apostles.

While en route to Rome, Ignatius was warmly received at Smyrna about 110 and afterward wrote from Troas both to the Smyrnaeans and to Polycarp, already their bishop. In a letter to the Roman presbyter, Florinus, another former disciple of Polycarp, Irenaeus mentions his letter-writing ministry, but only one to the Philippians is extant, two-thirds in Greek but complete in a Latin translation. P.N. Harrison has convinced majority opinion that it consists of two letters—one sent soon after Ignatius passed through Philippi, to accompany Ignatius's collected letters requested by the Philippians, and another written after they inquired about (Paul's teaching on) "righteousness." Few accept Harrison's date (c.135-37) for the second letter, which may be little later than the first. It illumines the development of the Philippian community (still without monepiscopacy), but is virtually a catena of quotations and echoes covering at least thirteen NT books and 1 Clement. It warns against heresy, Docetism,* and avarice, which had corrupted a presbyter, Valens, and his wife. Polycarp visited Rome about 155, agreeing amicably to differ with Bishop Anicetus on the Quartodeciman* issue, and converting Valentinians and Marcionites. He clashed with Marcion* in person, at Rome or earlier in Asia.

The Martyrdom of Polycarp, a letter from the Smyrnaeans to the Church of Philomelium in Phrygia and "to all the Christian congregations in the world," is the earliest extant "acts" of a martyr, compiled by Marcianus (Marcion) within a year of the event from eyewitness accounts. Endless discussion of the dating in the appendix has yielded no consensus. The day was 23 February (22 if a leap year). Many argue for 154-60, others for the 160s or even 177. Precision would be invaluable because Polycarp professed to have been a Christian for eighty-six years, which probably indicates his age (and perhaps his infant baptism). The Martyrdom may have undergone interpolation or redaction. It presents Polycarp as an imitator of Christ, at times fancifully, but its historical value (e.g., on the embryonic martyr cult) and spiritual stature are unquestionable.

POLYCHRONIUS (d. c.430). Bishop of Apamea in Syria and brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia.* One of the most prominent of the exegetes of the Antiochene School, he wrote commentaries on Job, Daniel, and Ezekiel of which only fragments have been preserved. Considered a heretic though never formally condemned, he criticized the Alexandrine method of biblical exegesis.

POLYCRATES (fl. c.190). Bishop of Ephesus. He was excommunicated for his leadership of Asia Minor Quartodecimanian* churchmen against Pope Victor's* (188-99) encyclical placing Easter uniformly on Sunday. Victor's strong stand against Quartodeciman tradition, which allowed a variable feast day after Jewish custom, was disapproved by Irenaeus and generally. Passover was not celebrated at all in Rome until Soter, Victor's predecessor, first celebrated Easter on Sunday. Nothing more is known about Polycrates.

POLYGLOT BIBLES. Bibles which print the text in several languages. One might point back for the origins, at least in intention, to the Hexapla of Origen in the third century, but from Origen to printing no further known experiments of like proportions were attempted, because of the difficulties involved in hand-copying. Origen's work did not completely disappear, and various bilingual fragments of Scripture portions also survive. In 1502 Francisco Jiménes* de Cisneros began a comprehensive edition of Scripture; his death in 1517, and the delay in obtaining papal sanction, postponed publication of his six-volumed "Complutensian Polyglot"* until 1522. Its OT presented a revised Hebrew Massoretic Text, the Lucianic version of the Greek text, and the Vulgate Latin. Its NT offered Greek and Latin. The sixth volume added dictionaries and a grammar, completing a pattern which the derivative polyglots were to follow.

From Antwerp under the patronage of Philip II* (hence Biblia Regia) and the editorship of Arias Montanus, a polyglot was printed by Christopher Plantin (8 vols., 1569-72). There were added to the OT—except for Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles—Targumim with Latin translation; to the NT, the Syriac with Latin rendering; to the helps extended, treatises of a philological and archaeological nature.

From Paris under the editorship of J. Morinus, G.M. LeJay republished an enlarged Antwerp polyglot (10 vols., 1629-45). The NT had both Syriac and Arabic versions; additional volumes contained the Samaritan Pentateuch with its Samaritan Targum, Gabriel Sionita's edition of the Peshitta, and the Arabic version of the OT—each with a Latin translation.

From London with public subscription, Brian Walton,* assisted by Thomas Hyde, edited the Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (6 vols., 1653-57), which included Ethiopic Psalms and Persian gospels, and had available for notes from collation the first uncial manuscript—that of Alexandrinus, received by James I* from Cyril Lucar*—an addition which stimulated manuscript collection and modern textual criticism. In 1699 as two supplementary volumes E. Castellus's Lexicon heptaglotton, a dictionary of Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and Arabic, to which separate Persian and a pioneering effort at comparative Semitics were appended. Other than these four, while polyglots are numerous, only parts of Scripture have received this kind of multilanguage treatment.

PONTIFEX MAXIMUS. The term of highest office in the ancient religion of Rome, indicating the highest priest of the city and its cult, passed into the hands of Octavian in 12 B.C. Subsequent emperors, as is documented numismatically, bore the title until the termination of the Western half, by which time Rome itself had been abandoned as seat of government—though it had been refused by Gratian,* who is also noted for his supposed recognition of the Roman bishop's primacy. It was only natural, then, that the Christian bishop of the city should receive this designation among many others, just as he remained the ranking officer therein—a situation mockingly anticipated by Tertullian. A fascinating play with the term occurs in Erasmus's Julius Excluded.

POOLE, MATTHEW (1624-1679). Biblical commentator. Born at York and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he became rector of St. Michael-le-Querne in London. In 1658 he devised and set in motion a scheme for the training of young men for the Christian ministry, but this came to an abrupt halt at the Restoration. Of strong Presbyterian sympathies, he was ejected in 1662, but he did little Nonconformist preaching afterward. Rather, his energy was devoted to study and the production of the Synopsis, a Latin compendium of textual commentary and interpretation (Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque Sacrae Scripturae Interpretum, 5 folio vols., 1669-76). Later he wrote Annotations upon the Holy Bible in English, a work that was completed by his friends after his death in Holland.

PETER TOON

POOR CLARES (Les Clarisses). The second Order of St. Francis,* founded by him and St. Clare* about 1213. Beginning at the church of St. Damien, the order spread rapidly through Italy and into France and Spain. Cardinal Ugolino (later Gregory IX*) placed Clare and her nuns temporarily under the Rule of St. Benedict, adding some very strict austerities, e.g., perpetual fasting, lying on boards, and almost complete silence. In 1224 Francis gave a written rule to Clare easing some of these restrictions. In 1247 and in 1253 further rules were sanctioned calling for complete poverty of the individual and the group. In 1263 Urban IV sanctioned a rule which was less severe and was followed by the majority, the Urbanists. The minority, who adhered to the stricter rules, were known as Clarisses. In 1436 the reform of St. Colette brought back many of the houses to the strict observance of the Rule of St. Francis. The two branches of the order are the Urbanists and the Colettines. The life of the Poor Clares is contemplative and most austere, including penance, manual work, and severe fasts. They wear a dark frieze habit, black veil, and cloth sandals on bare feet.

JAMES TAYLOR

POPE, THE (Lat. papa from Gr. papas, "father"). The supreme head of the Roman Catholic Church. Formerly denoting all Christian bishops, the title in the West has from the ninth century been appropriated exclusively by the bishop of Rome. In the Eastern Orthodox Church, however, it is still used for the patriarch of Alexandria, and the term is applied also to ordinary priests.

POPE, WILLIAM BURT (1822-1903). Wesleyan divine. Born in Nova Scotia and educated in England, he trained at the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Hoxton and was ordained in 1842. He traveled in several circuits and established a reputation as a linguist and translator of German antirationalist critics. From 1867 to 1886 he was a tutor at Didsbury Wesleyan College, Manchester. In 1875-76 he produced his greatest work, A Compendium of Christian Theology (3 vols.). This, while containing several specifically Wesleyan features, especially a very high doctrine of the ministry and an elaborate exposition of Christian holiness, is dedicated to what Pope called "the old doctrines of the Reformation." Impeccably orthodox and the most powerful of all Wesleyan essays in dogmatic theology, it undoubtedly held back the impact of destructively critical ideas on English Methodism for several decades. Pope died after a long and painful illness.

POPISH PLOT. An alleged Jesuit conspiracy in England to assassinate Charles II* and to replace him by the Roman Catholic James, duke of York, sworn to by Titus Oates* in 1678. Oates, who had twice been expelled from Roman Catholic seminaries, fabricated the story for his own advancement, in association with a fanatical Jesuit called Israel Tonge. Their story was sufficiently credible to cause panic, and the ensuing witchhunt hurried some thirty-five suspects to the scaffold before Oates was discredited as liar and perjurer.

PORPHYRY (232-c.305). Neoplatonist writer. Born in Tyre and originally named Malchus, he was the pupil, successor, and editor of Plotinus.* A historian of philosophy and religion rather than an original thinker, he nevertheless initiated certain tendencies conspicuous in later Neoplatonism, e.g., in his own pupil Iamblichus (c.250-330), who taught mainly in Syria, and Proclus,* the most important of the Neoplatonists who took over Plato's Academy at Athens in the fifth century A.D.

Porphyry's work of fifteen books attacking Christianity has not survived, but was influential enough to merit suppression by the Council of Ephesus* in 431. We learn from Jerome that he rejected an early date for the Book of Daniel because it described second century B.C. events too accurately for prophecy. He evidently criticized the gospels for inconsistency, and although admiring Christ's teaching, felt that the apparent failure of His mission disproved His divinity. Porphyry himself wrote extensively on ethics, and preaches the cardinal virtues of "faith, truth, love (desire), hope." He may be credited with sparking the pedantic overelaboration, doctrinaire vegetarianism, and extravagant allegorizing which characterized much of later Neoplatonism.* Its interest in magic and divination should probably be blamed on Iamblichus.

GORDON C. NEAL

PORTEUS, BEILBY (1731-1808). Bishop of London. Educated at Cambridge, he became rector of Hunton which had had no resident incumbent for thirty years, and there displayed that pastoral concern, marked by residence, visitation, and catechesis, that he was to urge as a bishop. In 1762 he became chaplain to Archbishop Secker* (whose biography he wrote), and in 1769 a royal chaplain. He was appointed bishop of Chester in 1776 and of London in 1787. As bishop he encouraged residence of incumbents, better stipends for curates, regular preaching, and higher standards of clerical duty. In the House of Lords he battled for public morality and vainly tried to hedge divorce legislation. Responsible as bishop of London for the overseas interests of the church, he opposed slavery, founded the "Christian Faith Society" for West Indian slaves, and proposed other forms of church mission. He was more sympathetic to the Evangelicals (and to Evangelical enterprises like the Church Missionary Society and the Bible Society) than were most high ecclesiastics, while remaining apart, an orthodox churchman in the Secker tradition. His Collected Works were published in 1811.

PORTUGAL. The country secured freedom from Spanish rule in the twelfth century, when her independent political and ecclesiastical history can be said to begin. Though at first in bondage to the papacy, the nation under King Sanche I vigorously asserted its autonomy even against Innocent III,* the most powerful of popes. Disputes continued throughout the thirteenth century, the Friars and the widespread anti-Spanish sentiment helping the pope to maintain his authority. Under Prince Henry the Navigator, Portugal began in the later fifteenth century to build up her overseas empire, embarking on a policy of subjugation and conversion of the native peoples. During the first half of the seventeenth century she was again absorbed into Spain, but recovered her independence between 1640 and 1668, when the papacy was actively allied with Spain. Thereafter, as in Spain, the Catholic Church fell into a torpor from which it has never really recovered.

With the irruption of liberal and anticlerical movements into the country following the French Revolution, the history of Portugal closely resembles that of Spain. After the republican revolution of 1910 the church was disestablished and its power curtailed, but Dr. Salazar's New Constitution of 1933 and Concordat of 1940 restored harmonious relations between church and state. Since 1917 popular devotion in the country has been enormously strengthened by the cult of Our Lady of Fatima. This, which is now the hallmark of Portuguese Catholicism, began in a small town in the middle of the country in May 1917, when three poor children were alleged to have seen a vision of the Virgin on six occasions. The cult and the accompanying miraculous cures were at first frowned on by the church, but after 1930 were officially favored; Our Lady of Fatima is now identified, unofficially at least, as the queen of Portugal.

Portugal was immune to the Reformation, due to its isolation, the absence of pre-Reformation movements such as the Hussites, the complete hold of church and government over the common people, the feeling of national self-confidence in this particularly buoyant phase of expansion which discouraged expressions of dissent, and the Inquisition* (established 1536). Protestantism did not effectively reach Portugal till 1845 when meetings were commenced simultaneously in Lisbon and Oporto. Since then a large variety of missionary agencies has been active, and the progress of the Reformed faith has been similar to that in Spain, with English Methodism playing a more active role. The chief denominations are the Lusitanian Church (episcopal and Anglican in origin), the Evangelical Church (Congregational Presbyterian), the Baptists, Brethren, Methodists, and Pentecostalists who first arrived from Sweden in 1930. Persecution has never been as fierce as in Spain, and as a minority the Protestant population which now numbers about 33,000 is proportionately larger.

POSSIDIUS (d. c.440). Biographer and friend of Augustine.* He was a member of the monastery at Hippo until he was made bishop of Calama about 400. As such he was active in supporting Augustine's opposition to Donatism* and to the Pelagian* heresy. In addition to the biography he left a careful though incomplete list of Augustine's works.

POSTLAPSARIANISM, see SUPRALAPSARIANISM

POSTMILLENNIALISM. An optimistic type of theology which predicts a "golden age," a Christianized millennium of predominantly human achievement before the Second Advent and the subsequent eternal realm. The prophetic form of it is devout, the liberal form purely humanistic. An early exponent was Joachim of Fiore,* who in the twelfth century divided historical ages into an OT dispensation under the Father, a NT and early church one under the Son, and the Eternal Evangel (age of the Spirit) to begin in 1260. The modern term was popularized by the Unitarian freethinker Daniel Whitby,* later enjoyed immense vogue in Britain during the prosperous century from Waterloo to World War I, but was thereafter increasingly discredited by postwar realities, and even more so after World War II.

ROY A. STEWART

POSTULANT. One who lives in a religious house under the supervision of the religious superior in a probationary period before entering formally into the novitiate. The postulant can leave at any time, but postulancy is not required for either valid entrance into the novitiate or for valid profession of vows subsequently. Postulancy ends when the candidate is admitted to the novitiate.

POTHINUS (Potheinos) (c.87-177). Martyr and first bishop of Lyons (Lugdunum). Born probably in Asia Minor and a disciple of Polycarp,* he is said to have introduced Christianity into S Gaul. In the persecution that broke out in Lyons in 177, described in the Epistles of the Churches in Vienne and Lyons, the ninety-year-old bishop was questioned by the governor and so badly treated that he died within two days.

POTTER, JOHN (c.1674-1747). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1737. Educated at University College, Oxford, he was elected a fellow of Lincoln College in 1694 and regius professor of divinity at Oxford in 1707. As a High Church Whig he was a safe appointment to the bishopric of Oxford in 1715, hut his translation to Canterbury in 1737 was particularly unexpected, since Edmund Gibson, bishop of London and another High Church Whig, was the more popular candidate. Potter was an opponent of the Low Church party, particularly of Bishop Hoadly,* but his Whig political views ensured his good favor with the government. Among his works were A Discourse on Church Government (1707); Archaeologica Graeca (2 vols., 1697-99); and an edition of the works of Clement of Alexandria (1715).

JOHN A. SIMPSON

POWELL, VAVASOR (1617-1670). Welsh Puritan divine and activist. He was born in the hamlet of Knucklas in Radnorshire. He seems to have been educated at Oxford and served for some time as a schoolmaster at Clun, where he was converted under the influence of Walter Cradock's preaching and Richard Sibbes's Bruised Reed. By 1640 he was actively engaged in a vigorous preaching mission along the borders of Radnorshire and Brecknock, and as a result he came into conflict with the authorities.

With the outbreak of the Civil War he withdrew to London and in 1644 became Puritan vicar of Dartford, Kent. He participated in some of the military campaigns, but in 1646 he was authorized as a preacher by the Westminster Assembly* and named a preacher in N Wales by the Committee for Plundered Ministers. His status among the Puritan leaders is suggested by the fact that he preached before the lord mayor of London in December 1649 and before the House of Commons in the following February. He reached the zenith of his influence after his appointment as an approver under the Act for the Better Propagation of the Gospel in Wales, and he dedicated his uncommon energy to the task of making this Act successful. He saw it as a providential opportunity to make the Gospel known to the people of Wales, and in order to overcome the difficulty posed by a shortage of preachers, he devised the method of appointing itinerant preachers to serve fairly large areas of the country. His activities brought him the fierce hatred of his Anglican critics and accusations that he had misapplied the funds of the church in Wales to his own benefit. But the evidence points to his innocence. The Act was discontinued in 1653.

Like many other Puritans, Powell was a millenarian and believed in the early return of Jesus Christ to begin His personal reign upon earth. It was his millenarian activities that brought him into conflict with Cromwell's Protectorate, which he interpreted as a betrayal of Christ's sovereignty. He initiated a campaign in Wales against the Protectorate which culminated in the petition, "A Word for God" (November 1655).

With the collapse of the Puritan ascendancy, he became a marked man and was imprisoned in April 1660. Except for a period of eleven months in 1667-68 he spent the remainder of his life in jail. Some of the manuscripts that he wrote at this time are a moving proof of the way in which his fiery spirit continued to support the ideals of happier days while his concern for tolerance deepened. After his recapture in 1668 he was brought to trial and imprisoned in the Fleet, where he died. He was buried at Bunhill Fields. He was the author of some thirteen published works. His redoubtable character, tireless energy, and indomitable courage put him in the front rank of Welsh Puritans.

R. TUDUR JONES

PRAEDESTINATUS. A theological treatise, probably composed in Rome (c.432-40), against the Augustinian doctrine of predestination. Written from the standpoint of Semi-Pelagianism* (if not actually Pelagian), its bitter antipredestinarian views have been called "a cruel parody of Augustinianism." Of its three books, the first is a plagiarized reproduction of Augustine's De Haeresibus, the second purports to be written by a supporter of Augustine's doctrine, and the third is a refutation of the second. Edited originally by J. Sirmond in 1643, it was much discussed in the Jansenist controversies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

PRAEMUNIRE, STATUTES OF (Lat. praemunir, "to protect, to secure"). The first words of the writ (praemunire facias) used by Edward III in 1353 to protect the rights of the English crown against encroachments by the papacy give the basis for the title. This statute was revised in 1365 and followed in 1393 by the famous Statute of Praemunire, which was primarily aimed against Pope Boniface IX. The expression "praemunire" is now used to describe the statute, the offense against it, or the punishment under it. In essence the three statutes required that clergy were not to take to Rome matters that should be settled in England, and that papal bulls and excommunications were not to be promoted in England. As a result, appeals to the Vatican were diminished. The statute of 1393 was variously used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries by English monarchs to deal with Roman Catholics (e.g., by Henry VIII against Wolsey*). The Royal Marriages Act of 1772 is the last Act which subjects anyone to the penalties of praemunire.

PETER TOON

PRAEPOSITINUS OF CREMONA (c.1140-1210). Paris theologian. Born in Lombardy, he studied theology and canon law at Paris, then became a prebend of Mainz Cathedral. He held this post for about ten years (c.1194-1203), during which time he sought to convert the Cathari* to orthodox Catholicism. By 1206 he was chancellor of the University of Paris. His influential Summa Theologica contains the teaching he gave in this period and reveals that as yet Paris had not absorbed the Aristotelian philosophy that was beginning to be accepted in Europe. His other (certain) books include Summa super Psalterium and Summa de Officiis. Possibly he wrote also the Summa contra Haereticos, which is usually attributed to him.

PETER TOON

PRAETORIUS, MICHAEL (1572-1621). German composer. This prolific and influential Lutheran composer is known widely today for one tiny piece—"Lo, how a Rose e'er blooming" (Es ist ein' Ros entsprungen). It is taken from his monumental work Musae Sioniae, published in nine volumes and containing over 1,200 simple works covering the church year. He published several other collections of music for the Lutheran service. He was one of the first Germans to write in the new Venetian concertato style in up to twelve or fifteen parts, combining voices and instruments in glittering array. He applied this style to works based on the Lutheran chorales with fine effect. He also published his Syntagma musicum in three volumes (1615-19), which contains valuable information about performance practice and also about the instruments of the period, accompanied by accurate scale drawings. His section on the organ has been very influential in recent times on the movement of organ builders back to Baroque principles.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

PRAGMATIC SANCTION OF BOURGES (1438). This was issued by Charles VII of France following the National Synod at Bourges, which had close links with the Council of Basle* (1431-49). It was a statement of Gallicanist principles, contained in twenty-three articles, which effectively reduced the power of the papacy in France. Councils were superior to the pope, nomination of bishops and high ecclesiastical dignitaries was to be in the hands of the French king and princes, and French ecclesiastical affairs were to be settled in France. When Louis IX repealed the sanction in 1461, the parliament of Paris refused to endorse his action; however, in 1516 an agreement known as the Concordat of Bologna,* between Pope Leo X and Francis I, ended the sanction but preserved many Gallicanist principles.

PETER TOON

PRAGMATISM. An attempt to avoid Spencerian determinism and Hegelian metaphysics. It was born in late nineteenth-century America and stands as that nation's greatest contribution to Western philosophy. Combining empiricism with evolutionism's belief in an unfinished universe, it was given varied forms by its chief exponents—Charles Sanders Peirce (1839-1914), William James,* and John Dewey (1859-1952). Peirce's "pragmaticism," for example, was supposed to prevent the alleged mystical, individualistic approach of James. Dewey, in turn, created an "instrumentalism" to apply evolutionary science to democratic society's problems; he defined ideas as plans for action, and truth as that which best controlled the conditions and consequences of experience at any given moment. Often confused with expediency, pragmatism was an optimistic philosophical method which rejected dualism, stressed life's incompleteness and morality's relativity, and trusted the scientific method to cure every aspect of life. DARREL BIGHAM

PRAXEAS (fl. c.200). Modalist Monarchian. He is little known apart from Tertullian's treatise Adversus Praxeam (c.217) and has indeed been identified with Noetus and Epigonus, and even with Pope Callistus. He was said to have arrived in Rome toward the end of the second century from Asia where he had suffered imprisonment for his faith, and he may have gone later to Carthage. He was strongly anti-Montanist. He became leader of the so-called Patripassian* Monarchians—i.e., those concerned to maintain the unity of the Godhead even to the point of declaring that God the Father suffered. As Tertullian put it, "He drove out prophecy and introduced heresy: he put to flight the Paraclete and crucified the Father." Praxeas conceived of Father and Son as one identical Person, the Word's having no independent existence. Consequently it was the Father who entered the Virgin's womb, thus becoming, so to speak, His own Son who suffered, died, and rose again. J.G.G. NORMAN

PRAYER. When God approached men in OT times, they conversed with Him, confessed their sins, gave Him adoration and thanks, and asked things for themselves and others. Prayer is this conversation with God which arises out of communion with Him. Prayer has many elements. It can be a sacrifice of thanksgiving and adoration (e.g., Ps. 50:14,23; 107:22). It often begins with confession (e.g., Ps. 51), but it is essentially the element of asking—petition, supplication, and intercession—which constitutes prayer as prayer.

This asking arises out of the depths of human need. Prayer is a pouring out of the heart to God (1 Sam. 1:15) in all its moods and in the needs of the concrete human situation (Exod. 17:8ff.; 1 Chron. 5:20; Luke 22:44; Phil. 4:6). But prayer should arise more out of the promise and challenge of God's Word than out of the urgency of human need. Though the Word has its own power to go forth and fulfill itself, its fulfillment can be facilitated and hastened by such prayer as "Your kingdom come." Prayer is therefore an asking directed by the Word of God. The Lord's Prayer,* moreover, teaches that the first concern to be expressed in prayer should be for the hallowing of God's name. If prayer is thus directed by the Word, it is saved from triviality and self-centeredness (John 15:7).

Prayer is inspired by man's confidence that God has already drawn near to hear before men are there to speak (Ps. 27:8; 139:1-6). In the OT it is inspired by complete confidence in the faithfulness and power of God, man's Rock and Stronghold (Deut. 33:29; 2 Sam. 23:3; Ps. 46:1), who is appealed to in His omnipotence and eternity (Ps. 124:8). It is significant that in nearly all the prayers of Jesus, God is addressed as "Father." Paul's prayers are inspired by a filial trust in God's fatherhood (Rom. 8:15; Eph. 3:14). The presence and Word of God can arouse in men such boldness in prayer that it can take the form of importunate argument (Gen. 18:22-33; Exod. 32:11; Luke 18:1-7), or of an entreating of favor (1 Sam. 13:14; Ps. 119:58). Prayer can indeed be a striving with God, as Jacob strove with the angel (Hos. 12:3,4).

In the NT, prayer is in the name of Christ. This means prayer in union with the Christ who at the right hand of God continually makes intercession. Since prayer takes place in Christ and in the Spirit, the individual even though alone is praying in and with the community and is encouraged to say "our Father." True prayer thus tends to become communal (cf. Matt. 18:19,20; Acts 2:1, etc.), though it can nevertheless remain intensely private (Matt. 6:5,6). It is noteworthy that in the Psalms and the great prophetic writings the liturgical community prayer can perfectly express the personal needs and longings of the solitary individual also.

Prayer is essentially something within the heart and arising from the heart. The command to "pray without ceasing" suggests that prayer is a continuous attitude of heart (1 Thess. 5:17; cf. Luke 18:1). There can be "ejaculatory" prayers uttered when men are engaged in quite other than devotional tasks (Neh. 2:4,5). Yet prayer often demands expression in outward attitude. Various postures and gestures are described as the accompaniments of prayer—prostration, kneeling, standing, stretching out hands (Gen. 18:2; 2 Chron. 7:3; Ps. 28:2, etc.). Prayer also tends always to clothe itself in language. It can thus vary from a charismatic utterance in "tongues" to a carefully composed choral hymn. It tends to like music. At the best it remains simple (Matt. 6:8). To pray is a duty, and the prayer aspect of the Christian life remains the more healthy if times are set aside for prayer and the prayer life is brought under discipline (Ps. 5:3; Dan. 6:10; Acts 3:1). Jesus was familiar with the traditional prayers of Israel and made them His own. He prayed before meals and attended community worship. At times He spent whole nights in prayer—especially at times of decision and crisis.

PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD. The earliest Christian Father to refer to the practice of praying for the departed, Tertullian,* admits also that there is no direct biblical authority for doing so. Third-century inscriptions indicate the kinds of petitions made in these prayers, usually a simple and general request for the dead person to be with God or to know the forgiveness of sins. It is possible that such prayers arose out of the confused ideas over the consequences of postbaptismal sin, which caused much debate in the church of Tertullian's time. One suggested solution to this problem was the idea of a purgatorial discipline after death, which was discussed at Alexandria in the early third century and spread in the West through the powerful advocacy of Augustine* and Gregory the Great.* Meanwhile, at Jerusalem in the mid-fourth century the Eucharist came to be regarded as a propitiatory sacrifice which could be offered on behalf of both the living and the dead. Consequently intercessions for the departed came to be inserted in the anaphora, or canon of the Mass. In the Roman Church, a Mass offered specifically for a dead person is called a "requiem," although since the early Middle Ages the dead have also been remembered in the daily Mass.

In England, Cranmer's* second Prayer Book (1552) abolished all prayers for the dead; but a thanksgiving for the faithful departed was added to the intercessions in 1662. In modern times pastoral needs in the Church of England, where many non-churchgoers are given Christian burial, have led to the consideration of a form of prayer to include the unfaithful departed, and this has been included as an option in the Series 3 Orders for Holy Communion and Funerals. There remains a tension in Christian thought between the best way of expressing the biblical truth of an unbreakable fellowship of believers in Christ, and a sub-Christian desire to provide for, and communicate directly with, the spirits of the dead.

PREBEND; PREBENDARY. In most English medieval cathedrals and collegiate churches, endowments were divided into separate portions in order to support members of the chapter. Each portion was known as a "prebend," because it supplied (praebere) a living to its holder, who became known as a "prebendary." The territorial names of many cathedral prebendal stalls indicate that the revenue for the particular stall came from cathedral lands in that area. In cathedrals of the "Old Foundation," the names prebend and prebendary have been retained, though in most cases the office is only honorary, the income having been transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In cathedrals of the "New Foundation," there are canons, not prebendaries, though that title was used until the nineteenth century.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

PRECENTOR. Broadly, the official responsible for the singing of a church choir or congregation. In most English cathedrals of the "Old Foundation" (and many on the Continent), he ranks in the chapter after the dean. He has the oversight of the choral service and the choristers, but in practice customarily delegates his duties to a deputy (the succentor). In "New Foundation" cathedrals, however, the precentor is merely a minor canon or chaplain. In Scottish Presbyterian churches the precentor was a layman who literally led the singing, his function made necessary by the absence of any musical instrument. The office survives in some Highland and island congregations, and at the annual general assembly of the Church of Scotland a precentor leads the worship services. J.D. DOUGLAS

PRECISIAN. One who is rigidly precise or punctilious in the observance of moral and religious rules. It was a term in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries applied by critics and opponents to those who were otherwise styled "Puritans";

the abuse intended referred to both strict morals and "purity of worship."

PREDESTINATION. In theology, predestination refers to the predetermination by God of the individual's ultimate destiny. Controversies regarding predestination have centered on the apparent contradiction between such predetermination and man's free will. (As noted below, they are thus analogous to controversies regarding man's freedom in a universe seemingly determined by scientific law.) The doctrine of predestination is associated particularly with Christianity, but also occurs elsewhere; in Islam,* e.g., during its scholastic period, the orthodox position was strongly predestinarian, but some theologians stressed free will (the Mutazalites). In the first centuries of the Christian Church, predestination was not an issue. Theological energy was taken up with definitions of the Trinity and arguments regarding the nature of Christ. In the Orthodox Churches this has remained the case (with minor exceptions: notably Cyril Lucar in the 1500s).

In the Western Churches the issue was raised (as imperial rule in the West tottered) by Pelagius, who taught that man had the freedom to accept or reject God. This was countered by the great theologian Augustine,* who held that man's will was enslaved by sin, that grace was needed to choose for God, and that this grace was given to those whom God had predestined. The Augustinian position was upheld by the Synod of Orange (529)—but by this time the barbarian invasions were in full swing, and there was little talent or time for theology. An aftermath to the Pelagian controversy occurred in the age of Charlemagne*: the monk Gottschalk* held (apparently) that God actively willed the nonelect to be damned, a position which was rejected (Synod of Quiercy, 849).

The medieval revival of learning, from around 1050, produced schools and universities in abundance. Theology was held to be the "queen of the sciences," the key to the understanding of reality. The task of the Schoolmen, or Scholastics, was to reconcile Christianity with the newly rediscovered heritage of classical philosophy; in a sense, to harmonize reason and faith. By the late 1200s, after Peter Lombard,* Bonaventura,* Albertus Magnus,* Thomas Aquinas,* and a host of other scholars, the task seemed completed, briefly, with several Scholastic systems, differing in detail, available. Predestination generally was handled in the context of God seen as Supreme Intellect, who predestined on the basis of His foreseeing the choice the individual would make (for God, all temporal things are "present"; He is outside time).

But this "solution" was soon attacked. With Duns Scotus, and especially with William of Ockham* and his followers in the 1300s, God was seen as Sovereign Will, and the problem of predestination shifted. How can man's choice be free, if foreseen? How can God be called fully sovereign, if He is bound to follow a future which is already determined? How can God bind His will in advance? The tangled controversies which followed seemed to raise insoluble questions. There were reactions: Thomas Bradwardine* revived a rigid Augustinian view, stressing divine predestination as basic to an ordered universe. From a different vantage point, John Wycliffe* and John Hus* stressed election as a key theological concept and viewed the church as the community of the elect, those already saved, rather than the source of desperately needed aids to salvation.

The Protestant Reformers followed this emphasis also. Luther,* Zwingli,* Calvin*—all held to predestination, the true church as made up of the elect, the enslavement of the will (e.g., Luther against Erasmus*), the need for unconditioned grace to enable a choice for God. Yet this strongly Augustinian approach did not escape criticism. In the Lutheran churches the fierce "synergistic" controversy of the later 1500s resulted from Melanchthon's* attempt to save some role for the human will. Similar debates arose in Calvinism over the teachings of Arminius (condemned at the Synod of Dort,* 1618-19). Scholastic refinements in Protestant theology brought further disagreements: the Calvinist quarrels between sublapsarian* and supralapsarian* theologians, the controversy in the Huguenot* churches over Amyraut's teachings, and the like. As Protestant Scholasticism declined during the 1700s and Pietism arose to regain a "heart-felt" religion, the question arose in Methodism: John Wesley favored "Arminianism,"* George Whitefield* a "Calvinist Methodism."*

In postmedieval Catholicism the issue flared up several times. The Council of Trent,* though avoiding a definitive stand, leaned toward a Semi-Pelagian* position. The teachings of Luis de Molina (d.1600) aroused much controversy, with Jesuits tending to support, and Dominicans oppose, his complex attempt to give man's will a role in the process of salvation. Around the same time, Baius* at Louvain, followed by Cornelius Jansen, returned to a rigid Augustinian. Jansenism* produced a notable controversy (Port-Royal, Pascal's* defense of Jansenism, etc.) which finally produced a minor schism (the Old Catholic Church* of Utrecht, from 1713).

As interest in traditional theological argument faded into the background in the 1800s, the problem appeared in other areas. If the universe is determined by scientific law, how can man have free will? If man's actions are not in a sense determined by such law, how is any political science or economic science or science of history possible? If heredity and environment determine actions, how can the courts punish a man (for doing what was predetermined)? And the like. In the twentieth century, Karl Barth's* revival of a Scholastic Calvinism has raised again the theological issue of predestination. Barth attempts to cut through previous controversy by stressing God's election of man in Christ (which perhaps involves some sort of universalism).

In summary, predestination and the debates about it deal with a recurring problem, whether in theology or in other fields: the relation between man's freedom and a universe which seems in some sense determined.

PREMILLENNIALISM. The view which asserts that Christ will come a second time before the 1,000 years of His millennial rule, upholds a general chiliastic theology of Millennialism, and places the rapture of saints, the first resurrection, the tribulation, and Second Advent before the Millennium in prophetic time sequence, with the brief release of bound Satan, the second resurrection, and Last Judgment afterward. This view was held by early Church Fathers until Origen,* Eusebius,* and Augustine* modified it, and it has been revived in the modern era by J.N. Darby,* W.E. Blackstone,* and C.I. Scofield,* among others.

PREMONSTRATENSIANS. Norbert* founded the first community of Premonstratensians, or "White Canons," at Premontré, near Laon, in 1120. The Premonstratensians adhered strictly to the Augustine Rule, but Norbert, a friend of the Cistercian monk, Bernard of Clairvaux,* also adopted certain monastic features and the Cistercian federal organization. Premontré was the order's mother-house, and its abbot was the order's abbot-general. Houses were arranged into regional and national circaria, which in turn constituted the "Grand Congregation." The Premonstratensians undertook an "apostolic" role of parochial work and preaching, and their order rapidly spread throughout Christendom. Their missionaries played an important part in conversion and colonization east of the Elbe. At first they admitted women to double monasteries, but this practice had ceased by 1200. The Reformation and the French Revolution seriously affected the order's size. PETER TOON

PRESBYTER (Gr. presbuteros, "an older person"). In the Septuagint the term was applied to "the elders" of Israel who carried out various governing and administrative functions in both civil and ecclesiastical government. In the NT they were those mature Christian men who were appointed to supervise the work of the church (Acts 14:23). In this respect they fulfilled an official function as bishops (episkopos)—(cf. Acts 20:17, 28; Titus 1:5-9; 1 Pet. 5:1-4), although the relationship between the use of the two terms is not always clear. Gradually one elder, probably the teaching member of the group (1 Tim. 5:17) assumed presidency to become in the second century the "bishop," with special powers and privileges. During the Middle Ages the term "presbyter" was shortened to "priest," while the presbyter-bishop assumed a superior position, often becoming a feudal lord. Although neither the Lutherans nor the Anabaptists stressed the presbyterate, John Calvin and his followers did, believing that there were in the NT four orders: pastors, doctors (teachers), deacons, and presbyters (elders), the last being primarily responsible for discipline—the admission of new members and the supervision of the individual and corporate lives of the congregation. The minister or pastor was a teaching elder. This view is still held by most Reformed and Presbyterian churches.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA. Canadian Presbyterianism began in Nova Scotia just prior to the American Revolution and subsequently followed the patterns of migration from the United States and the United Kingdom. As with other Canadian denominations, American influence did not last long, and it was soon the arrivals from Scotland and Ireland who formed the backbone of the church.

The Secessionist bodies, who had followed the Erskines out of the Church of Scotland in the eighteenth century, and who would be known as the United Presbyterians in the nineteenth, were the first to see the growing population of Canada as a missionary responsibility. The Church of Scotland was much slower, but as the Evangelical or "popular" party gained the ascendancy, the Glasgow Colonial Society was formed in 1825 to encourage and support ministers in coming to Canada. Robert Burns of Paisley, later of Knox Church and Knox College, Toronto, poured his energy and vision into this movement, so that the arrivals of the 1820s and 1830s from Highlands and Lowlands, were often greeted by a congenial Evangelical ministry.

The Disruption* of 1843 in Scotland, with the formation of the Free Church,* was followed by a similar sympathy movement both in the Maritimes and in the province of Canada, today known as Ontario and Quebec. The Free Church Movement in Canada displayed remarkable vitality in the fields of home and overseas missions and theological education. A new country, however, could not long afford division, and in 1861 the "Free Church" and the United Presbyterians joined, and in 1875 the Church of Scotland amalgamated to form a national Presbyterian body of some 88,000 communicants.

The new church was absorbed in the opening of the West, under the dynamic leadership of James Robertson, while overseas missionaries such as Jonathan Goforth* made Canadian Presbyterianism known worldwide. The church continued to grow rapidly and threw itself wholeheartedly into the job of ameliorating the social problems of the day. Preoccupied with wresting a living from the country, and full of turn-of-the-century optimism, many paid little or no attention to the changes in thought that were taking place. Evolution, idealistic philosophy, and biblical criticism were creating a new mood. As the older Calvinism ebbed, the movement for union among Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians flowed. Church union was consummated in 1925, with 40 percent of the 380,000 Presbyterian members outside. Most of the large middle party had entered union while the continuing Presbyterians were an interesting and sometimes irreconcilable combination of traditionalism and evangelicalism.

Soon faced with the challenges of economic depression and war, it was amazing that the reconstruction of the Presbyterian Church proceeded as effectively as it did. The situation was complicated by the fact that there were strongly liberal elements in the two theological colleges. This emphasis was increasingly challenged by the charismatic W.W. Bryden of Knox College, who was virtually a Barthian before Barth. Today there is again an increasing evangelical movement in the denomination of almost 200,000 members, and a census constituency of over 800,000.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U.S. Popularly known as the Southern Presbyterian Church, it shares a common history and heritage with the larger nationwide Presbyterian Church. The southern presbyteries comprised more than a third of the Old School branch of the Presbyterian Church in the USA, and did not renounce their connection with it until the Old School assembly, meeting in Philadelphia (May 1861), adopted resolutions pledging the church's support to the Federal Union, even although most of the Southern states had already seceded and civil war had begun. The first assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States met in Augusta, Georgia (4 December), and was organized by commissioners from forty-seven Southern presbyteries. The United Synod of the South, comprising twenty-one presbyteries, was formed in 1858 by those who broke with New School Presbyterians.

The whole South suffered severely during the war. After the war the present name was adopted. Some of the early growth—slow during Reconstruction but substantial and steady thereafter—came by union of the southern branches of the New School and Old School in 1864. In 1969 there were some 4,000 churches, 4,593 ministers, and nearly a million communicants, primarily in urban areas, contributing a total of nearly $134 million. The assembly holds membership in the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* the National and World Councils of Churches, and the Consultation on Church Union. Union with the Reformed Church in America was defeated by that body in 1969. Union with the northern and United Presbyterians was defeated in 1954; another plan of union with the northern body is now being studied in draft form.

For the greater part of its history the denomination has been somewhat homogeneous and committed to Calvinistic orthodoxy, strict subscription to the Westminster Standards, scriptural authority and inerrancy, jure divino Presbyterianism, and the exclusively spiritual mission of the church. Increasing internal tension developed after 1935, as the leadership has tended to modify its position on these and other theological, social, and ecumenical issues. Recent years have witnessed a proliferation of dissenting conservative groups who pledge to maintain a continuing Southern Church despite efforts by the leadership to carry the denomination into church unions and to draft a new confession of faith. In late 1973 some members withdrew from the denomination to form a new, separate body, now called the Presbyterian Church of America.

PRESBYTERIANISM. The term derives from the word "presbyter."* Its reference is primarily to a church which is governed by presbyters, usually elected by the people of a congregation or of a group of congregations. Traditionally it is the general title given to the English-speaking Reformed or Calvinistic churches coming out of the Reformation and their daughter churches in many different lands.

Presbyterians trace their concept of church government back to the OT synagogue which was governed and directed by a group of "elders." Calvin held that since the NT church used the same form of organization, this is the structural pattern that the contemporary church too should follow in order to be as close to the NT as possible. This was in accord with his idea that the NT church provided the permanent example not only of the succeeding generations' beliefs but also of their ecclesiastical organization. Calvin did recognize, however, that other forms might be adopted, although he believed that the presbyterial was that closest to NT example.

According to Calvin, the NT church had four different offices: pastor, doctor or teacher, deacon, and presbyter or elder. The pastor was the preacher and the counselor of the Christians; the doctor taught in a more formal way than the pastor and might also hold the position of a theological professor. The deacon was primarily responsible for the material needs of the church and of the members, while the elders were those who had the oversight of the spiritual needs and the lives of the congregation. The pastors and doctors were usually elected and approved by the pastors and elders of other congregations, while the deacons and elders were elected by individual congregations on the advice of the existing consistory or session, made up of elders and sometimes deacons.

During the Middle Ages the NT organization had been radically changed with the establishment of a hierarchical organization consisting of priests, bishops, and pope, with many intermediate officials. While the Lutherans for convenience in administration had retained bishops or superintendents, the Genevan Reformer brought in a new and different pattern in seeking to reinstitute what he considered to be the proper NT form of church organization. Although he did not establish a completely presbyterial system as it came to exist later, he laid the foundation. The fact that his original structure dealt only with the four churches in Geneva meant that it would be different from the French and Scottish plans to devise an organization for a national church, covering a much larger area and a greater number of people.

The beginnings of an English-speaking church organized on the presbyterial basis took place in Geneva in the congregation of Marian exiles (1555-58) under the Scottish preacher, John Knox.* Unwilling to accept the Anglican Book of Common Prayer or the direction of the exiled bishops, they found it necessary to leave the congregation established in Frankfurt and move to Geneva where they could worship in accordance with their conscientious beliefs. In Geneva they set up a congregation ruled by elders and led by two elected pastors: John Knox and Christopher Goodman. They also adopted a confession of faith, an order of worship, and a form of discipline which followed the teachings of Calvin.

With the accession of Elizabeth* to the throne of England, the English Protestant exiles returned home, but Knox because of his earlier attack upon the idea of a woman's ruling a country was not permitted to go to England. Consequently he returned directly to Scotland, where the Reformation was beginning to come out into the open. Under his leadership the Protestant forces succeeded in having Parliament adopt a Reformed Confession (see SCOTS CONFESSION) in August 1560, but it did not accept the Book of Discipline submitted to it somewhat later, which would have established a Reformed structure of church order. The Reformed church, however, which was now established at least doctrinally, organized itself along lines that under Andrew Melville in the latter part of the century became fully presbyterian with a hierarchy of courts extending from the local session through presbytery and synod to the national general assembly.

In England the failure of the Genevan refugees to establish a presbyterial system was due largely to Queen Elizabeth and her advisers, who disliked the popular aspects of the presbyterian form of government, favoring instead an episcopal organization that left the ultimate authority over the church in the hands of the civil authorities. Although Thomas Cartwright,* trained in Geneva under Calvin's successor Theodore Beza,* led a strong campaign to bring about a more radical reform of the Church of England, he was unsuccessful. The same was true in the seventeenth century when the Presbyterians in Parliament attempted to set up a uniform presbyterian system throughout the British Isles. The Independents* under Oliver Cromwell* and then the Anglicans under Charles II* prevented this. Only in Scotland did Presbyterianism gain the day, and only after much suffering, particularly during the Anglican persecution of the Covenanters* (1665-88). Not until 1692 was Presbyterianism finally established, although after the Union of the Parliaments of 1707 various modifications were made in the establishment by the British Parliament. These in turn led to a number of divisions within the Church of Scotland.*

With the colonial expansion of Britain during the eighteenth century, Scots and Scotch-Irish from Ulster carried with them their presbyterian form of government, doctrine, and worship to the empire, resulting in the establishment of large Presbyterian churches overseas. Consequently one finds churches of presbyterian structure and belief scattered across the globe. Although some may have in some ways modified their doctrinal views and even their form of government, fundamental presbyterian characteristics still remain.

The primary presupposition of Presbyterianism is that the risen Christ is the only head of the church. He rules His people by His Word and Spirit, directing believers as a whole. Thus there is no idea of a special elite group which has received through direct revelation or by the laying on of hands extraordinary powers or authority. Those who govern the church are chosen by all the church members, who recognize that God has given them gifts and abilities to teach and to direct the church in its life upon earth. The foundation of the church's structure is the session of the local congregation, which is elected by all communicant members and is led by the minister or "teaching elder," also known as the "moderator." The minister is chosen and called by the congregation, but is inducted into his charge by the presbytery, which is composed of the minister and the "representative" elder of each congregation within the presbytery's geographical bounds. This body has the oversight with extensive powers over all the congregations under its jurisdiction. It in turn is responsible to the synod, which is made up of representatives either appointed by a number of presbyteries or directly by the various sessions. With increased ease of communication in many churches, synods are increasingly recognized as being of no real importance, particularly since presbyteries now usually deal directly with the general assembly, which is made up of equal numbers of ministers and elders who are presbyterial representatives. The assembly, the highest court in any Presbyterian church, has final authority in all matters legislative or judicial, but in most cases a change in doctrine, government, or worship must be referred back to presbyteries under a Barrier Act* for ratification by a majority of those courts. In this way every major change must be considered and approved at the most general level of the church.

Although each Presbyterian church has its own particular standards of faith, government, and worship, the first complete statement of the Presbyterian position came from the Westminster Assembly* of Divines (1643-49), which prepared a Confession of Faith, two catechisms, a Directory of Worship, and a Form of Government, on the instructions of the English Parliament. This English body later rejected the Westminster symbols, but they were adopted by the Scottish Parliament and Church, and have since been accepted as the base upon which all other Presbyterian structures have been erected.

PRESBYTERY. The central legislative and judicial body in presbyterian polity. It is composed of equal numbers of ruling elders and ministers (teaching elders) from each congregation within its geographical bounds. It exercises episcopal oversight over all the congregations under its jurisdiction, ordains candidates for the ministry, inducts ministers into congregational charges, acts as an appeal court from decisions of sessions, and transmits petitions and overtures to the provincial or national general assembly. Changes in the constitution (faith, polity, and worship) of the church are usually referred back to presbyteries under the Barrier Act* for their approval before the general assembly takes final action. The moderator or chairman is usually elected, although attempts have been made to have bishops as permanent chairmen. The classis in the Reformed churches corresponds to the presbytery in Presbyterian churches.

PRICHARD, RHYS (1579?-1644). Welsh clergyman and poet. Details of his family background and early education are uncertain, but he graduated from Jesus College, Oxford. He was ordained and given the living of Wytham in Essex (1602), but in August of the same year he was presented the vicarage of Llandovery and in 1613 added to it the rectorship of Llanedi—both in Carmarthenshire. In 1614 he was made a canon at Brecon Collegiate Church and in 1626 chancellor of St. Davids. He composed a substantial body of moral and religious poetry in a popular idiom, and it is symptomatic of their flavor that they were (posthumously) published by the Puritan Stephen Hughes between 1659 and 1681, the 1681 volume being a complete collection of his poetry bearing the title Canwyll y Cymru. The simplicity and directness of these poems, and their similarity to the folk poetry popular among the uneducated, commended them to a large public, and they soon became an integral part of the Welsh religious tradition. R. TUDUR JONES

PRIEST. The institution of priesthood is found in virtually all the great religions, usually in connection with some kind of sacrifice. The term "priest" either alone or in combination with "high" or "chief" occurs over 700 times in the OT and over 80 times in the New. Etymologically the English term "priest" is a contraction of presbuteros, which itself is rendered regularly in English as "elder." "Priest" renders hiereus, which never refers to a Christian minister in the entire NT, though in the gospels and Acts it usually refers to Jewish priests. In the OT, the pre-Mosaic order of the priesthood was patriarchal. Later a more formal priesthood appears to have emerged. Moses consecrated Aaron and his three sons (Exod. 28:1). Next, the tribe of Levi was set aside and consecrated to the Lord (Exod. 32:26-29) and given charge of the services in the tent of meeting while only the sons of Aaron exercised the function of the priesthood. Thus the Book of Deuteronomy, which reflects the period of the monarch, refers to the levitical priests (Deut. 18:1).

In postexilic times the priesthood was divided into three orders: (1) the high priest; (2) the ordinary priest; and (3) the Levites. In theory, the members of all three orders were descendants of Levi, one of the twelve sons of Jacob. Thus the priesthood proper was confined to those Levites who were descendants of Aaron, one of Levi's grandsons and sometimes known as Aaronites. Those who could not claim kinship with Aaron became a lower order whose task it was to minister to the Aaronites (Ezek. 44:14).

In the NT, the idea of Christ as the culmination of the high priesthood (a mediator between God and man) finds expression in the Book of Hebrews, the only NT book with a specifically Jewish name. Here Christ is a High Priest (Heb. 5:10) and through His sacrifice He is able to reconcile man to God, which was the purpose symbolized by the older Jewish sacrifices of sheep and goats. But He Himself became the victim (Rev. 13:8) as well as the intercessor. In the Christian Church the "priesthood" did not emerge as a function until well after the apostolic period. Apart from a questionable reference in Ignatius, the term does not appear to have been applied to Christian ministers until c.200. Perhaps by the early fifth century, the priest had accrued the authority to administer the sacraments, and thus the way opened for the doctrine of the priesthood which would reach full flower in the medieval period. The Reformers, in general, rejected the concept of the priesthood because it had come to be seen in connection with the Mass.

The present use of the term is not limited to the Roman Catholic Church. This is perhaps due to a rediscovery of the relationship of the priesthood to Christ, rather than merely to church authority.

PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH (1733-1804). A Nonconformist minister famous for his work in the chemistry of gases, and who also published his ideas on philosophy, religion, education, and political theory. Born in Yorkshire of a strict Calvinist family, he rejected the religion of the established churches, became a Dissenting minister, and by the age of twenty-seven was a teacher of classics and literature at a Dissenting academy in Warrington. While there he wrote A Chart of Biogra- phy (1765) and A New Chart of History (1769) which earned him a doctor of law degree from the University of Edinburgh and a fellowship of the Royal Society.* In 1767 he became the minister of a congregation at Mill Hill, Leeds, which shared his views. Although before this he had rejected the doctrine of the Atonement and of the Trinity, now he took the final step to Unitarianism* and argued that Christ was only a man. He subsequently wrote works such as History of Early Opinions Concerning Jesus Christ (1786) to try to demonstrate that Unitarianism was the teaching of the early church. By 1780 he was living in Birmingham, where he was active in the Lunar Society. When the French Revolution broke out, Priestley supported it, and because of this, a Birmingham mob broke into his house and destroyed his belongings. Discouraged by this turn of events, he went to America (1794), settling in Northumberland, Pennsylvania, where he spent the last ten years of his life.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

PRIMASIUS, (sixth century). Bishop of Hadrumetum, North Africa. He strongly supported pope Vigilius in the "Three Chapters"* controversy. He is chiefly remembered for his commentary on Revelation, in which he drew extensively on Tyconius and Augustine, written before 543-44 (when it was mentioned by Cassiodorus) and before he was embroiled in the controversy aroused in Africa by the "Three Chapters." Textually the commentary is important because it preserves almost completely the African Latin text of the Apocalypse.

PRIMATE. In an episcopally structured hierarchy, the title of one accorded first position or primacy for purposes of administration. It does not appear that the term was used before the seventh century. In the English Church, by ruling of Pope Innocent VI (1354), the archbishop of York was designated "Primate of England," the archbishop of Canterbury "Primate of All England."

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH. Formed in 1811 by the amalgamation of the Camp Meeting Methodists, led by Hugh Bourne,* and the Clowesites, followers of William Clowes.* These groups in turn derived from a revivalist movement which also produced the Independent Methodists in 1806. Bourne, a Staffordshire millwright, was impressed by the camp meetings* introduced into England by the revivalist preacher Lorenzo Dow, who had found them to be a great success in America and Canada. Bourne planned to hold such a gathering at Norton-on-Moors in 1807. In preparation for it members of the Harriseahead class meeting arranged for a "day's praying on Mow Cop"—a nearby promontory. This was where Primitive Methodism was born, although to call it a camp meeting is something of a misnomer.

Meanwhile, however, the Wesleyan Conference in Liverpool had passed a resolution condemning camp meetings as "highly improper" and "likely to be productive of considerable mischief." Bourne felt it right nevertheless to proceed with his plans for the Norton camp meeting, and as a result was expelled from the Burslem Quarterly Meeting. Thus in 1810 the Camp Meeting Methodists were formed. At the same time, Clowes had been similarly excommunicated, and in 1811 the two groups merged. In 1812 the name "Primitive Methodist" was officially adopted, the title being derived from the words of John Wesley* himself. The appointment of James Crawfoot as a traveling preacher is generally regarded as inaugurating the Primitive Methodist ministry. A set of rules was confirmed in 1814.

Growth was slow at first, but a revival in the Midlands led to a period of remarkable extension from 1819 to 1824. After weathering a crisis when lack of discipline threatened disintegration, the position was consolidated by the time a deed poll was executed in 1829. In 1843 the removal of the bookroom to London and the reorganization of the General Missionary Committee marked a transition toward connectionalism. Colonial missions were begun in the same year. There were already three Primitive Methodist conferences in America and a growing cause in Canada which in 1884 brought 8,000 members into the United Methodist Church of the Dominion. By 1901 a further development was recognized in the revised edition of the Consolidated Minutes with the replacement of the term "Connection" by "Church." In 1932 the Primitive Methodist Church joined with the Wesleyans and United Methodists to constitute the Methodist Church, bringing 222,021 members.

PRIMUS. The title given to the presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. Elected by the college of bishops and addressed as "Most Reverend," he is nevertheless not given metropolitical powers. His function resembles that of the moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland—i.e., he presides at his church's meetings—but unlike his Presbyterian counterpart he is not elected for one year only. The office is not attached to any one diocese.

PRINCE, H.J., see AGAPEMONISM

PRIOR. Head or deputy head of a monastery. During the early Middle Ages the word was used in a vague sense and could be applied to secular officials. Under Benedictine influence the title "prior" (or "claustral prior") came to denote the monk who ranked next to the abbot, deputizing for him and generally concerned with discipline. With the formation of the Cluniac Order in the tenth century there appeared the "conventual" prior who ruled as head of the monastery. The Canons Regular (Augustinians), Carthusians, Carmelites, Servites, and Dominicans so used the title. There is also the "obedientary" or "simple" prior, the ruler of a dependent priory.

PRIORESS. Head or deputy head of certain houses of nuns. In general the term corresponds to that of "Prior" in the equivalent male order—i.e., the "claustral prioress," assisting the abbess in the government of an abbey; the prioress of a dependent house; and the prioress of an independent or "conventual" priory. The terminology is preserved into modern times by Benedictines, Cistercians, Dominican nuns, Poor Clares, Carmelite nuns, various congregations of the Canonesses Regular, and the Brigittines.

PRIORY. Religious house presided over by a prior or prioress. In certain orders, especially those following the Augustinian Rule, the priory is the normal unit. The Benedictine and allied orders distinguish between "conventual" (self-governing) and "obedientary" (dependencies of abbeys) priories. In medieval England there was also the "cathedral" priory, where the bishop's chapter was constituted by an independent Benedictine priory.

PRISCA (Priscilla). The wife of Aquila the tentmaker (Acts 18:2). The best readings of the Pauline references give the form "Prisca"; Luke in Acts 18:2,18,26 uses the diminutive variant "Priscilla." Both writers give particular prominence to the wife, and this has been thought to show that she was of higher social standing or of greater importance in the church than her husband. Paul's association with the couple began in Corinth when they had come from Italy after Claudius's expulsion of Jews from Rome in A.D. 49. They were later his fellow-workers in Ephesus, where they instructed Apollos, and in Rome. Harnack* ingeniously urged the attribution to them of the epistle to the Hebrews. The name Priscilla is well attested, chiefly later and in Asia Minor, where its frequency may be due to the influence of Montanism.*

COLIN HEMER

PRISCILLIAN (d.385). Heretical bishop of Avila in "Hispania Tarraconensis." Of noble birth, rich, learned, pious, ascetic, and eloquent, he was seemingly influenced by Gnostic doctrines brought to Spain by an Egyptian named Marcus. In the eyes of the orthodox he was soon judged a heretic; he caused real problems to the church, since his views and influence were widely spread. Soon he had many followers (Priscillianists) who included a few bishops. Eight of the canons of the Council of Saragossa (380) were directed against them. They retaliated by consecrating Priscillian bishop of Avila.

In 381 the church and empire combined to force the Priscillianists, now accused of teaching Manichaeism, into exile in France. From this point began a complicated series of appeals by Priscillian and other leaders to ecclesiastical and secular judges, to Pope Damasus,* to Ambrose* of Milan, and to Macedonius, Gratian's master of the offices, who finally restored them. However, when Maximus came to power he agreed to a trial of Priscillian and Instantius* at a synod at Bordeaux. Instantius was condemned and later banished, but Priscillian unwisely appealed to the emperor at Trier. By the latter's order he was tried by the prefect Evodius and found guilty of using "magic arts" (associated with Gnosticism*). The emperor decided he should be put to death, and so with six others he was beheaded at Trier in 385, the first people to suffer death as heretics in the history of Christianity. The teaching of Priscillian was not thereby stopped, and his body and those of the six others were conveyed to Spain and given funerals worthy of martyrs. Priscillianism was condemned at the Council of Toledo* in 400 and was still flourishing in 447.

Modern scholarship is divided on the question of whether Priscillian was a heretic or merely an eccentric enthusiast. His doctrine is known only through the statements of others, since manuscripts attributed to him are probably not genuinely his.

PETER TOON

PROBABILIORISM (Lat. probabilior, "more likely"). A term used in Roman Catholic theology when the question was asked, What ought a Christian to do when duties seem to clash? What if Christian freedom suggests course A, but legalistic considerations point to course B? Two answers were given: (1) arguments in favor of A and B should be examined, and that course followed which seems more probably correct (hence Probabiliorism); (2) provided the nonlegalistic line of conduct can be defended, even as less probable than the legal, it may be followed (Probabilism*).

Acute controversy on the issue broke out in 1656 when Blaise Pascal,* the Probabiliorist Jansenist, in his Lettres provinciales lashed out at the Probabilist Jesuits for their hypocrisy, stressing that their view permitted a man to do anything, however wicked, which he could successfully rationalize. Probabiliorism was triumphant in the ensuing battle, but Probabilism was revived later (with some safeguards) by A. Liguori,* and is now official Roman Catholic teaching.

R.E.D. CLARK

PROBABILISM. The view that, if there is doubt about the rightness of any course of action, that action is to be preferred which is probably right, even though the action which is more probably right is also the action that is in accord with the law. ("Probably" is not used in a statistical sense: a probable opinion is the opinion of some doctor gravis et probus.) The view, which is one of several approaches that have been adopted in areas of moral uncertainty, was unknown before the end of the sixteenth century. It was formulated, or perhaps first given prominence, by Bartholemew Medina (1527-81) and rapidly gained hold.

The rationale of the view lies in the need for casuists in the Roman Catholic Church to balance the verdicts of conflicting church authorities.

Probabilism was developed as a casuistical device by the Jesuits, as against Probabiliorism,* the view that the libertarian course of conduct is to be preferred only if it is more probable than the view that is in accordance with the law. The presence of many contradictory moral authorities in the Roman Church created endless possibilities of going against the legally accepted view by this approach.

Other competing views, besides Probabiliorism, are Rigorism, which holds that only if the less safe opinion is most probable can it be practiced, and Laxism,* which maintains that an only slightly probable opinion could be followed with good conscience.

Probabilism was one of the matters strongly controverted by the Jansenists* in their battle with the Jesuits in the seventeenth century. The Jansenists took a Probabilioristic or Rigoristic view. Pascal made Probabilism, and the ethos in which it flourished, notorious in his Provincial Letters (1656). Pope Alexander VII* condemned the teaching in 1665 after continued protests from the Sorbonne, and in 1700 the Assembly of the clergy of France forbade it to be taught.

PAUL HELM

PROBATIONER. In Presbyterianism the term is used of one who, having completed his theological course, has received authority to preach the Word, but has not yet been by ordination given authority to administer the sacraments. Other denominations, notably Methodists and Baptists, make use of the term with substantially the same meaning.

PROBST, FERDINAND (1816-1899). German liturgical scholar. Educated at Tübingen under Karl Hefele, he afterward concentrated on liturgical studies. He was ordained into the Roman Catholic Church in 1840, becoming parish priest at Pfärrich in 1843, professor of pastoral theology at Breslau in 1864, and finally dean of Breslau Cathedral in 1896. Despite the rigid conservatism of his views, some of his conclusions were very speculative, and hence were treated with suspicion by other scholars, in particular his belief that the Liturgy of Book VII of the fourth-century *Apostolic Constitutions was the universal Christian eucharistic rite from the earliest days. Probst was a prolific writer, though few if any of his works were translated into English.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

PROCESSION OF THE SPIRIT. The distinguishing of the Holy Spirit from the Father and Son in the Godhead. Implied in the NT (e.g., John 15:26), it was asserted in the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed and first developed at length by the Cappadocian Fathers.* It signifies, as against the Macedonians, that the Spirit is not a "creature," but that His being is eternally derived from the one fount of deity.

According to the doctrine of Double Procession, the Spirit proceeds from both Father and Son. In the Eastern Church, Didymus the Blind,* Epiphanius,* and Cyril of Alexandria* ascribed the origin of the Spirit to both Father and Son, without actually using the term "procession" of the Spirit. This was expressly denied by Theodore of Mopsuestia* and Theodoret.* The Western Church added the formula Filioque (Lat. = "and the Son") to the clause in the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed, "the Holy Ghost which proceedeth from the Father." This arbitrary interpolation was first introduced at the Third Council of Toledo* (589). Western Fathers who supported the doctrine include Hilary of Poitiers,* Jerome,* Ambrose,* and especially Augustine* in De Trinitate, but Pope Leo III* (795-816) refused to authorize the use of the clause. Controversy flared when Photius* of Constantinople asserted it was contrary to the teaching of the Fathers (c.866). The interpolation received official sanction in Rome by Benedict VIII (1017) and the East-West schism followed (1054). Mark of Ephesus repeated Photius's assertion at the Council of Florence* (1439), when there was agreement on a compromise statement, but it came to nothing, as have all subsequent negotiations.

J.G.G. NORMAN

PROCLUS (d.446). Patriarch of Constantinople. Formerly secretary to and ordained priest by Atticus, patriarch of Constantinople, he was consecrated archbishop of Cyzicus in 426, though opposition kept him out of his see. A renowned preacher, he delivered a sermon on the Theotokos (428) before Archbishop Nestorius, which appears to have precipitated the Nestorian controversy, although his personal involvement was minor. In 434 he became patriarch of Constantinople, proved himself a moderate supporter of orthodoxy, and gained popularity by translating John Chrysostom's body there in 438. His writings are mostly sermons and letters, sometimes attacking Jewish beliefs and morals. His Tomus ad Armenios de fide, discussing Christ's two natures, while addressed to the Armenians, points to the errors of Theodore of Mopsuestia (he did not name him, however). A letter containing the famous formula "unum de Trinitate secundum carnem crucifixum," which became the center of the Theopaschite* controversy, is mistakenly ascribed to him.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

PROCOPIUS OF CAESAREA (d.565). Byzantine historian. Born in Palestine, he went to Constantinople at the accession of Justinian (527) and was appointed consiliarius (legal secretary) to the military commander, Belisarius (505-565), whom he accompanied on campaigns for the next fifteen years—details of which served as the basis of his history. After 542 his duties included that of senator in Constantinople, and probably that of city prefect from 562. His Wars in seven books are divided in sequence among Persian, Vandal, and Gothic campaigns, with an eighth (550-53) updating all fronts; the whole series showed a valuable objectivity. He produced also a panegyrized account of Justinian's architectural achievements in seven volumes, and Anekdota (commonly called "Secret History") which is a character assassination of the chief figures of the time based on unprovable accusations and at a level of scurrilous gossip.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PROCOPIUS OF GAZA (c.475-538). Man of letters and Christian exegete. He lived in Constantinople during the reign of Justin I (518-27), wrote poetry in the pagan tradition, and was one of the foremost members of the "School of Gaza," a group of Christian exegetes. His commentaries on the Octateuch, Isaiah, Kings, and Chronicles were constructed out of extensive extracts from the older commentators such as Philo, Basil, Theodoret, and Cyril of Alexandria. This type of commentary became known as a catena,* or chain, and achieved considerable popularity.

PROMOTER FIDEI, see DEVIL'S ADVOCATE

PROPAGANDA (Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith). The organization responsible for the direction and administration of Roman Catholic missionary activity. It was created in 1622 by Gregory XV to combat the lack of unity in missionary endeavors among the various religious orders and to weaken the firm control that Spain and Portugal exercised over missionary enterprises through the right of patronage. Under its first secretary, Francesco Ingoli, Propaganda gathered a wealth of data on missionary activities and, from this, formulated basic principles to govern later work. It laid down standards for the training of missionaries and founded a seminary (Collegium Urbanum), promoted the development of an indigenous clergy, and urged the preservation of the cultural traits of non-Western peoples. The Chinese Rites Controversy,* however, severely limited the extension of the principle of cultural adaption in mission work. It set up a press in 1626 and by 1800 was printing material in forty-four African and Asian languages. Propaganda had been given supreme and exclusive authority in every mission region, but this was substantially limited by Pius X in 1908. In recent years the congregation has done much to bring about the creation of indigenous hierarchies in mission lands.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

PROPHECY (Heb. nebuah; Gr. prophēteia). The word used in the OT to describe the message of men who spoke to the people of Israel under the inspiration of the Spirit of God. This message, often introduced with a "thus saith the Lord," came sometimes in the form of a commandment; sometimes as a promise of deliverance either in the immediate or more remote future; sometimes as a word of judgment and condemnation; and sometimes as a word of admonition, a lamentation, hymn of praise, or the like. In the written form in which OT prophecy has been preserved for us, these various types of oral utterance have been worked together either by the prophet himself or by later editors to convey his total message.

In declaring his message—be it one of reproof and admonition of the wicked, or one of comfort and consolation for the righteous—the prophet is always conscious of the fact that he speaks as God's mouthpiece, that his word is the word of Him who is the Lord of history, who declares "the end from the beginning" and makes His counsel to stand (Isa. 46:10). It is for this reason that the prophet's message embraces the future ("foretelling" as well as "forthtelling") and that the people know that what does not come to pass is not spoken of the Lord (Deut. 18:22). (The ultimate test of true prophecy, however, is not the outcome of a prediction, but faithfulness to the relevation given through Moses—Deut. 13.)

Much has been said about the nature of prophetic inspiration in an effort to understand how the word of the Lord came to certain men in a unique way; but it is doubtful that we can say more than that the prophets were personally aware of a mighty divine influence which came over them and gave the words that they used the ultimate authority of a message from God Himself. (Hence the New English Bible correctly concludes many prophetic oracles with: "This is the very word of the Lord.")

Whereas the spoken word is the primary form of prophecy, the prophets sometimes embodied the word in symbolic acts to convey their message. Isaiah walked naked and barefoot (Isa. 20); Jeremiah shattered a potter's vessel (Jer. 19); Ezekiel dug through a wall (Ezek. 12); and Ahijah rent his coat, giving ten pieces to Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:29f.). One might assimilate these symbolic acts to the visible word of the sacraments in the NT.

Prophecy, in the NT, means much the same things as in the Old, only now the word of consolation and admonition, as well as the word of prediction, relates to Christ and His kingdom and to His coming triumph over the powers of evil in the world. (In this sense the Apocalypse as a whole is called a word of prophecy—Rev. 1:3; 22:18,19.) In contrast with the OT, every Christian, in a sense, is a prophet, since the Spirit of Christ has come upon all flesh "and they shall prophesy." In the NT church, however, there seems to have been a special group called "prophets" who were next to the apostles in rank, though ministering to a single congregation ("in the church God has appointed first of all apostles, second prophets, third teachers"—1 Cor. 12:28). It would seem from this passage that Paul gave great weight to the gift of prophecy as uniquely edifying to the church. It was a gift used in the worshiping congregation; it involved the knowledge and communication of spiritual truths, resting upon inspiration; it was uttered, not in ecstatic, but rational, speech; and, in contrast with teaching, which was bound to the "tradition," prophecy had the character of revelation (see 1 Cor. 12–14 passim). However the "spirits" are to be "discerned" (1 Cor. 14:29), the criterion being the "analogy of the faith" (Rom. 12:6), that is, the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints by the apostles, who were the ultimate authoritative teachers in the church.

The exact content of these prophecies is difficult to ascertain, but evidently they consisted of utterances given by a sudden impulse in the form of a lofty discourse and in praise of the divine goodness and wisdom—utterances which illuminated the truth in a way that could not be achieved by reason alone. (Note the juxtaposition of "the gift of prophecy" and the understanding of "all mysteries and all knowledge" in 1 Corinthians 13:2.)

With death of the apostles, who had no successors, gradually those with the gift of prophecy also disappeared, so that from the third century onward, of the original triad of apostles, prophets, and teachers, there remained only the teachers. In the *Didache the church is admonished to respect apostles and prophets, if they are true prophets, and instructions are given concerning them which would indicate that they were wandering teachers who might settle with a given congregation for a certain length of time.

The author of the Didache, Justin Martyr,* and Eusebius all discuss the problem of false prophecy. With the rise of Montanism* in the second century claiming new prophetic insights which did not correspond with the tradition received from the apostles, the church began to distinguish such prophecies from the true prophecies contained in Scripture. From this time on, the prophetic gift appears here and there, but increasingly it gives place to teaching. By the time of Hippolytus (235) and Origen (250), the word "prophecy" is limited to the prophetic portions of Scripture. In the place of the prophet one finds the teacher, specifically the catechist and apologist, who oppose all false doctrine and seek to support their exposition of true doctrine by appealing to the authoritative word of Scripture.

Enthusiasts have arisen on the fanatical fringe of the church down through the ages, claiming prophetic inspiration. Their followers, however, like those of Theudas and Judas, have, for the most part, come to nought. In our own day, Pentecostal assemblies have revived what they believe to be the NT "gift of prophecy." It differs from tongues in that it is given in intelligible speech, but unlike conventional preaching, it is unprepared and spontaneous. It is not given to fanaticism.

PROPITIATION. This word is the correlative of "wrath" and can only be understood with reference to it. In theology it applies to the turning aside of divine wrath against sinful man. It is uncongenial to much modern thought; it is thought pagan and therefore to imply a sub-Christian view of God. In Scripture, however, it is related not only to the holiness of God (as in 1 John 2:2, noting the earlier context) but also to His love (as in 1 John 4:10). Paradoxically the God who is propitiated also lovingly provides the propitiation. The propitiation is Christ Crucified, and through His work God can be righteous and yet also (in grace) justify him who had faith in Jesus (Rom. 3:24-26). This NT idea has as its background the OT doctrine of sacrifice. There too, sacrificial blood is not only offered to God, but provided by Him (Lev. 17:11). The term is often replaced in modern translations by some weaker expression such as "expiation," but Leon Morris (The Atonement in New Testament Teaching, 1955, pp. 125-85) has demonstrated the inadequacy of such translation of the Greek and Hebrew words concerned. The use of the word "propitiation" serves to safeguard the penal element in the Atonement.* G.W. GROGAN

PROSELYTE. This technical concept, coined by the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew "sojourner," came also to describe those "who had come over" (prosēlutos) religiously from the Hellenistic environment (cf. Matt. 23:15; Acts 2:11, etc.). In the case of males the process entailed circumcision. Proselytism was a result of active efforts of a missionary enterprise which persisted throughout the Talmudic period in spite of the changing relations with the Roman state, and over against the emergence of Christianity which carried on the activity even more vigorously while simplifying the requirements. Subsequent usage makes the terminology synonymous with "conversion," which in the case of Judaism, under Christian domination, was often prevented, seldom pursued, but never impossible.

PROSPER OF AQUITAINE (c.390-c.463). A scholar whose background is unknown save that he had a classical education, was learned in theology, was married, and was part of a monastic community in Marseilles at the outbreak of the Semi-Pelagian controversy* (426), which he opposed. Together with a friend, Hilary, he wrote to Augustine* in Africa (428) concerning the opposition to his theology of grace and predestination, especially among the disciples of John Cassian,* to which Augustine's reply was the De praedestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae. In 431 he went to Rome to gain Celestine I's* support for Augustine's doctrines, then published several works in their defense, with attacks on Vincent of Lérins* (Pro Augustino responsiones) and Cassian (Contra collatorem), including the Capitula Caelestiana which went to the bishops of Gaul as part of a papal letter. While initially in agreement, he finally rejected Augustine's position (De vocatione omnium gentium), believing God willed to save all men.

As secretary to Leo I* after 440, he aided him with correspondence and theological writings against the Nestorians.* His own writings were of various forms: De ingratis, a poem of 1,000-plus hexameters on grace; probably Poema conjugis ad uxorem in sixteen anacreontic verses and fifty-three distichs; a series of epigrams including those against Semi-Pelagians and Epitaphium Nestorianae et Pelagianae haereseos; and Psalmorum a C ad CL expositio after the Council of Ephesus.* Epitoma chronicorum, a synthesis of the chronicles of Jerome,* Sulpicius Severus,* and Orosius,* reflecting also his own time (433-55), was edited and augmented by Cassiodorus* and Paul the Deacon.* C.G. PROTESTANT DISSENTING DEPUTIES. Since 1732 these have consisted of two members (chosen annually) from each congregation of the Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Baptist denominations in and within twelve miles of the City of London. From this large body, which has usually met only once or twice a year, the Committee of Twenty-one has been chosen in order by all legal means to lead the fight for the obtaining of full civil rights for Protestant Dissenters. The origin of the deputies is usually traced to a general meeting of Dissenters in 1732 at the Meeting House in Silver Street, London. Here the necessity of political representation to further the liberties enjoyed by Dissenters was emphasized —especially the need to gain freedom from the corporation and Test Acts (of Charles II's reign) which were still in force and were the basis for preventing Dissenters from playing full part in local government, etc. Through their committee the deputies were an effective force in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century politics; by their influence Nonconformists* gained the right to be buried in churchyards, to register their children in civil registers of births, and to enter the universities of Oxford and Cambridge without offense to their consciences. Also they saw the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts.

For full details see B.L. Manning, The Protestant Dissenting Deputies (1952). The manuscript records of the Deputies are located in the Guildhall Library, London. In the twentieth century the work of the Deputies has virtually ceased, since the original objectives have all been gained.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE USA. The first Anglican services on North American shores took place during Martin Frobisher's Hudson Bay expedition in 1578, when Chaplain Wolfall preached and administered the sacrament. In June 1579, in the course of Sir Francis Drake's voyage along the west coast, a similar service was held near San Francisco, at which Drake's chaplain, Francis Fletcher, officiated. Various attempts to establish colonies on North American territory during this period were, however, unsuccessful. In 1607 a small band of colonists succeeded in settling at Jamestown, Virginia. There they built the first Anglican church in America, and public worship was regularly conducted by their chaplain, Robert Hunt. By 1624 Anglicanism was firmly established in Virginia.

The colonial clergy and parishes were under the jurisdiction of the bishop of London. In America there was prolonged and sometimes fierce opposition to the appointment of bishops (though not generally to the Prayer Book and its worship) on the part of non-Anglicans, in which some Anglicans shared, particularly in the South. Many of the early settlers had left England in order to escape from Laudian intolerance and the combined might of church and state, and to win for themselves freedom and independence, ecclesiastical as well as civil, in the New World. They feared that the appointment of bishops would mean the extension across the Atlantic of the lordly prelacy and royal dictation from which they had fled—hence to the present day the unremitting American insistence on complete separation of church and state. Because of this, Anglicanism suffered heavily during the American Revolution. Many ministers went over to the English side.

On 14 November 1784, Samuel Seabury* was consecrated the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Connecticut and Rhode Island, by bishops of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. A general convention held in Philadelphia in 1789 drafted a constitution and canons and the revised Prayer Book for the PEC. The election of its bishops and the government of the church were organized along democratic lines. The church's highest council is its general convention, which meets ordinarily every three years, and its highest officer is the presiding bishop, who is elected by the general convention. The church has a membership of 3½ million members (baptized persons), of whom over 2¼ million are communicants. There are some 11,000 clergy.

The general convention's approval of the ordination of women in 1977 spawned the schismatic Anglican Church in North America amid considerable controversy.

PROTESTANTISM. The name came from the Protestation of the German princes and cities at the Diet of Speyer* in 1529. The verb protestari from which the adjective "Protestant" is derived means not simply "to protest" in the sense of "to raise an objection," but also "to avow or witness or confess." Protestants believed they were confessing the primitive faith of the early church, which had been obscured by the later innovations of medieval Catholicism. More specifically, they regarded their message as a recovery of Pauline theology. Their main points were these:

(1) Scripture and tradition. There is a single source of revelation from which the Christian Church draws its teaching, and that source is Holy Scripture. Every doctrine which the church wishes to teach is found in Holy Scripture of necessity. This does not mean that the Protestant appeal to Scripture alone (sola scriptura) implies a total rejection of the tradition of the church; on the contrary, tradition is highly respected as an aid for the understanding of Holy Scripture. The wisdom of the past is not rejected, but neither is it looked upon as a second source of revelation. The Protestant Christian attempts to understand Scripture with the assistance of all those who have labored on it before him. Nevertheless it is Scripture itself and not the exegetical traditions of the church which is the final norm of Christian doctrine.

(2) Justification by faith. In Catholic thought, justification is a gracious release of power which makes the Christian actually righteous. God considers the Christian to be righteous to the extent that he is conformed to the will of God and purged from the guilt of sin. That means that the Catholic expects at death to go to purgatory, where the satisfaction that he owes for his sins will be expiated. He cannot hope to enter heaven until this process is completed. The merits of Christ, which gained the sacraments for him, must be supplemented by his own merits, earned in cooperation with sacramental grace. Protestants had a quite different view. Righteousness is not a human property; it is not something which a man possesses. When a man trusts the Gospel, the good news of God's love in Christ, God pronounces him righteous, not because he already is, but because he possesses in faith the righteousness of another, the righteousness of Christ. All ideas of human merit are excluded from this understanding of justification.

(3) Certitude of salvation. While the Catholic Christian can have objective certitude of salvation—i.e., confidence that all the elect will be saved, that the sacraments of the church are reliable and do confer grace—he cannot have subjective certitude of salvation—i.e., confidence that he himself is elect and will finally be saved. At most he can have conjectural certitude, based on the reliability of the promises of God and the observable signs of his own growth in grace. Protestant Christians do not seek for certitude of salvation by examination of conscience or by an attempt to measure their own growth in grace. Certitude is based on the Word of God, which stands outside the self and which may even contradict the self's religious experiences. Luther* maintained that the Christian is like an invalid in hospital who has begun to get well. Looking at himself, the patient can only conclude that he is as ill as when he was admitted to hospital, but he clings to the word of the physician and trusts it. His comfort and certitude are found outside himself in the word of another. The same holds true for the Christian. He grounds his faith, not in the present state of his recovery, but on the Word of the divine Physician alone. He seeks his certitude and righteousness, not in himself, but in the absolutely naked Word of God.

(4) Sacraments. There is for Protestants only one means of grace: the Word. But this takes many forms; Scripture, preaching, pastoral conversation, and the sacraments. The sacraments are a visible Word of God. They do not offer the church something which it does not have when it trusts the Word of God in Scripture and proclamation, but they offer the church another mode or form of participation in that Word. Protestants accept as sacraments only those two sacraments for which there is NT warrant for believing they were established by Jesus Christ Himself: baptism* and the Lord's Supper.* Penance is rejected, or subsumed under baptism; repentance is a remembrance and reaffirmation of baptism. While there are very important differences between the various Protestant churches on the meaning of the Lord's Supper, there is fairly unanimous agreement: (a) that the Lord's Supper is not a sacrifice; (b) that there is no transubstantiation* of the elements into the body and blood of Christ—though Christ is in some sense really present, if not in the elements, at least in His body the church; (c) that living faith is important for participation in the benefits offered to the church in the Eucharist; and (d) that the service of Holy Communion* is a visible proclamation of the Gospel.

(5) The Church. The church is created by the gifts of God: His calling, election, Word, sacraments, and gifts of faith and love. Protestant churches, though they lack the juridical structure and hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, do not lack any of the elements essential to the existence of the church of Jesus Christ. Though election is hidden and faith is invisible, the church of Jesus Christ can be recognized by the signs of the proclamation of the Gospel and the proper administration of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

(6) Priesthood of all believers. The Protestant idea of the priesthood of all believers refers principally to the common right of all Christian brethren to hear the confession of sin. Luther was not opposed to confession; he was opposed to making it a clerical monopoly. All Christian brethren may hear confession, may be bearers to each other of God's Word of judgment and grace. To be such a priest is to be Christ to the neighbor, but this in no way, of course, supersedes the right of every man to have direct access to God through Christ, which needs no human intermediary.

(7) Order and ministry. Since every Christian is a priest, there is no spiritual difference between pastor and people, only a difference of function in the body of Christ. The Protestant minister bears an office. He may have gifts which differ from those of the layman whom he serves as pastor—but not necessarily. He does not bear an indelible sacramental character which sets him apart from laymen. He has been ordained to do publicly what all Christians have been commissioned through baptism to do privately: to bear witness to Jesus Christ. There is no question of higher and lower, but solely of order and function.

While Protestantism is a historical phenomenon which cannot be understood simply in terms of the theological convictions of the first generation of Protestant Reformers, these theological motifs have nevertheless remained in Protestantism, with greater or lessened intensity, throughout its history.

PROTESTERS. The name given to that section of the Scottish Covenanters* which regarded as criminal any dealings with Charles II* (who had been crowned on the first day of 1651 in Scotland) and which protested against the reinstatement of those formerly hostile to the Covenant. They opposed the majority of the clergy (see RESOLUTIONERS), accusing the latter of putting loyalty to the king above the rights of Christ in His church.

PROVENCHER, JOSEPH NORBERT (1787-1853). Roman Catholic bishop in Canada. He was educated at the Nicolet Seminary in Montreal and ordained in 1811. In 1818 he was sent to Fort Douglas (Winnipeg) to minister to the people of the Red River, and two years later became coadjutor to the bishop of Quebec for the northwest. He was thus responsible for Roman Catholic policy in the west, and sought to weld together a new nation of Métis,* French, and Germans in order to preserve the French culture and Roman Catholic religion in the west. Provencher labored over thirty years among the Métis, Indians, and Eskimos of the northwest. He became bishop in 1847 of the new diocese of the Northwest, later named St. Boniface. ROBERT WILSON

PROVIDENCE, see GOD

PROVINCE. The limits of an archbishop's* or a metropolitan's* jurisdiction. The word signifies also the territorial division of certain Roman Catholic orders wherein area chiefs are known as "provincials."

PROVISORS, STATUTES OF. This name is given to several Acts of Parliament which strove to check the practice of papal "provision" or nomination (principally of foreigners) to vacant benefices over the heads of the rightful patrons. The first Statute of Provisors (1351) stated this principle broadly and provided for the expulsion of intruders. The first Statute of Praemunire* (1353) imposed penalties for controverting the same in foreign courts. The Second Statute of Praemunire (1365) confirmed these laws which, however, Edward III with the support of the papacy chose to ignore. The anger of Parliament and laity in general broke out more violently against Richard II, who breached the statutes even more flagrantly than his grandfather, and led to the Second Statute of Provisors (1390) and the Third Statute of Praemunire (1393), which enforced the previous regulations more stringently. Despite this the practice of provision continued down to the Reformation and was revived under Queen Mary (Tudor). Catholic historians have explained away these acts by arguing that they were not clashes between pope and people but between royal and papal administrations, and that papal provision was positively beneficial in comparison with the native variety. But the evidence is clear: papal provision of nonresident aliens was a scandal and contributed directly to the Reformation. IAN SELLERS

PROVOOST, SAMUEL (1742-1815). First Protestant Episcopal bishop of New York. He graduated from King's College (Columbia), New York, and later went to England for study at Cambridge. He was ordained deacon in 1766 and priest shortly afterward. After resigning an assistant pastorate because he felt his pro-Whig politics offended Tory parishioners, he served in the Revolution as chaplain of the Continental Congress. In 1786 he was consecrated in England as a bishop, without the customary oath of allegiance to the king. He aided the formation of the new Episcopal Church, but was forced to resign in 1801 because of poor health.

PROVOST. This ecclesiastical title was used in pre-Reformation England to signify the head of some collegiate churches. It is still used in the Church of England to denote the head of the cathedral chapter in "New Foundations." In Scotland it was earlier used in a similar sense, and still is in the Episcopal Church.

PRUDENTIUS (Galindo) (d.861). Bishop of Troyes. He left his native Spain as a youth, probably due to the Saracen persecution, and went to the Frankish Empire, changing his name, Galindo, to Prudentius. Educated at the Palatine School, he was chaplain at the court of Louis the Pious before becoming bishop of Troyes about 845. He supported the Augustinian position in the controversy on predestination between Hincmar* and Gottschalk,* opposing the former first in an epistle and then in De Praedestinatione contra Johannem Scotum (852), clearly denying the general salvation of all men. At the Synod of Quiercy* (853), however, he apparently subscribed to the four anti-Augustinian propositions, either out of reverence for Hincmar or fear of Charles the Bald —only to negate that with Epistola tractoria (c.856), addressed to Venilo, archbishop of Sens, upholding his former Augustinian position even more strictly. He continued the Annales Bertiniani for the years 835-61, valuable for Frankish history, and wrote Vita Sanctae Maurae Virginis. C.G. THORNE, JR.

PRUDENTIUS CLEMENS, AURELIUS (348-c.410). Christian Latin poet. Born in Spain, he is best known for the hymn "Of the Father's love begotten." Lawyer and civil servant, he published his extensive collection of poems at the age of fifty-seven. He applied classical Latin verse-forms to Christian teaching, and although the educational and moral outweighs the imaginative and lyrical, his poetry has considerable artistic merit. Plain, but concise and effective in description, he writes with great fluency in an exceptional variety of meters (still quantitative, not accentual). He extends the allegorical method of biblical interpretation (e.g., see AMBROSE, ORIGEN) to nature, society, and wherever he sees the possibility of pointing a Christian moral.

In the Psychomachia (915 lines), an extended allegory, the virtues battle with the vices for possession of the soul. Three slightly longer poems defend orthodoxy against pagans and heretics, combining poetry and doctrine in a manner recalling Lucretius's exposition of Epicureanism.* Twelve hymns and fourteen poems on Christian martyrs exceed the usual length of classical lyric. But typical of his instructional aims are forty-eight four-line biblical "snapshots" (Dittochaei)—e.g., No. 30, "Christ is baptised":

> The Baptist plunges men in water, his diet
> Locust and honey, his clothing camel-skins.
> When Christ bathed with those bathers, heaven's Spirit declared
> That this bather absolves every bather's sins.

PRYNNE, WILLIAM (1600-1669). Puritan pamphleteer. Born in Somerset and educated at Bath Grammar School and Oriel College, Oxford, he was called to the bar in 1628. In Lincoln's Inn he was influenced by the preaching of John Preston. He developed a strong opposition to Arminianism,* the attacking of which was the subject of his early books. Also he sought to reform the morals of his age, his lengthy Histriomastix (1632) being an exposure of the immorality of stage plays. For his outspoken criticisms, which were resented at court, he was imprisoned, fined, and pilloried, losing both his ears. Nothing, however, could stop the flow of pamphlets from his pen.

When the Long Parliament met in 1640, he was soon released from prison and restored to his membership of Lincoln's Inn. He defended the parliamentary cause and attacked prelacy, being especially active in preparing the case against Archbishop Laud.* From 1645 he turned his attention to defending Erastian principles and attacking Independency* and, later, the Commonwealth government. Remaining fairly quiet in the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell,* he returned to active political activity in 1659 and helped to restore Charles II* to the throne. He was a member of the Convention and Cavalier parliaments and therein argued the case of the Presbyterians and of the need to comprehend them within the Church of England. His books and pamphlets total about 200.

PSELLUS, (CONSTANTINE) MICHAEL (1018-c.1078). Byzantine scholar and statesman. Born in Nicomedia, he lived through fourteen Byzantine administrations and provided character sketches of all the rulers from Basil II (d.1025) to Michael VII (abdicated 1078) in his Chronographia. The greatest detail covers Constantine IX (1042-55). In contrast with other writers over the same period, he avoided the context of universal history; thus his work became court annals weak in foreign affairs and without even the variety of natural disasters typical of Byzantine chroniclers. Psellus studied law at Constantinople and turned also to philosophy, including Plato, Aristotle, and the Neoplatonists. Under Michael IV (1034-41) he held an imperial appointment as judge at Philadelphia; under Constantine he was head of the faculty of philosophy at the newly founded Constantinople University. His preference for Aristotle was against the Platonic tendency of the church of the time.

The schism of Eastern and Western churches of 1054 left no apparent mark for his history, but Constantine's turning against him at that date and his withdrawal to the monastery of Olympus in Mysia (whence comes his monastic name Michael) can hardly be unrelated. In 1057 he was recalled by Theodora, and under Isaac Comnenus (1057-59) and his successors he held the office of imperial secretary. With the accession of his imperial pupil Michael VII (1071-78) he became prime minister. He was responsible for the dismissal of Michael Cerularius as patriarch in 1058, yet he made a laudatory oration at the latter's funeral in 1059. He was clearly a man of his times, a fact borne out by his ability to accommodate himself and be of service with increasing influence. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. The term is the technical designation of a large collection of Jewish writings not included in the OT canon, ranging from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200, some of which contain Christian additions. Written in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, they include apocalypses, legendary histories, psalms, and wisdom literature. The fact that some of them are ascribed to Adam, Enoch, Moses, Isaiah, and Ezra caused them to be known in Protestant circles as "Pseudepigrapha." In the Roman Catholic Church they are called "apocryphal," which is to be distinguished from those other writings known by Protestants as the "Apocrypha," since the latter are known to Roman Catholics as "deuterocanonical." The term "Pseudepigrapha" is unsatisfactory in that it fastens attention on a feature of the literature which is not of major importance. In any event, the material contains many works which are anonymous. The rabbinical designation, "outside books," is used by some scholars, but this also gives rise to difficulties since other such writings, particularly the Dead Sea Scrolls,* would properly come under this category. In view of its usage over the years it is probably wisest to retain the term "Pseudepigrapha," on the understanding that it is being used in a technical sense without any judgment being expressed as to the nature of the contents.

There is no agreed order in the arrangement of the material. Generally it is classified according to its Palestinian (written in Hebrew or Aramaic) or Hellenistic (Greek) origin, and dated as follows.

(1) Palestinian.

1 Enoch, or Ethiopic Enoch (165-80 B.C.)
Book of Jubilees
Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (140-110 B.C.)
Psalms of Solomon (70-40 B.C.)
Testament of Job (first century B.C.)
Assumption of Moses (A.D. 7-28)
Lives of the Prophets (first century A.D.)
Martyrdom of Isaiah (A.D. 1-50)

Testament of Abraham (A.D. 1-50)
Apocalypse of Abraham (A.D. 70-100)
Apocalypse of Baruch, or 2 Baruch (A.D. 50-100)
Life of Adam and Eve, or the Apocalypse of Moses (A.D. 86-110)

(2) Hellenistic.
Letter of Aristeas (200 B.C.-A.D. 33)
Sibylline Oracles (fifteen books, three of which are missing; written over six centuries, some by Christian authors; Book III dates 150-120 B.C., IV c. A.D. 80, V before A.D. 130)
3 Maccabees (toward end of first century B.C.)
4 Maccabees (toward end of first century B.C.
2 Enoch, otherwise known as Slavonic Enoch or the Book of the Secrets of Enoch (A.D. 1-50)
3 Baruch, or the Apocalypse of Baruch (A.D. 100-174)

The largest and most influential of the surviving Pseudepigrapha is 1 Enoch. The story in Genesis 5:18-24 gave rise to the belief that Enoch was taken into heaven and shown the secrets of God. 1 Enoch purports to describe Enoch's experiences. It contains visions, cosmology, angelogy, demonology, eschatology, the vindication of the Jews, the heavenly Jerusalem, the tree of life, eternal rewards and punishments. One is reminded of the Book of Revelation. Of particular interest to Christian readers is the description of the Messiah in the middle section of the book, chapters 37-71 which are known as the "Parables of Similitudes." He is called "the Elect One, the Son of Man." He is a preexistent heavenly being, who dwells close to God and pronounces judgment upon men and angels (46:1ff.).

By contrast, the Psalms of Solomon reflect the more staid Pharisaic background. Modeled on the canonical Psalter, these eighteen psalms contain such traditional themes as sorrow and consolation, exhortation and praise, human injustice and divine mercy, punishment for the wicked and rewards for the righteous. The nation is depicted as divided into two groups, the righteous (almost entirely the Pharisees to whom the author belongs) and the sinners (the Sadducees). Jerusalem has been captured and the Temple plundered by an arrogant Gentile invader (probably Pompey). The description of the Messiah in Psalms 17 and 18 is especially interesting: he is of the house of David, and will cleanse Jerusalem, gathering together the people of God and ruling both Jews and Gentiles.

Significant for its information of the origin on the Septuagint* is the Letter of Aristeas. The author claims to be an official of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whom, he claims, instigated what transpired to be a miraculous translation of the Scriptures into Greek. The legendary nature of the work detracts from its historical value, but the writing remains an interesting witness to the fusion of Jewish and Greek traditions in the Dispersion.

An ambitious example of Hellenistic Judaism is the Sibylline Oracles. Assuming the role of the great pagan prophetess Sibyl, the different authors of the Jewish Oracles sought on the one hand to keep alive the ancient hope of Israel and on the other hand to demonstrate to sophisticated Greeks that Zion easily vies with Hellas for the heart and mind of humanity. A few of the Oracles are either of Christian origin or edited by Christian writers.

Although the literary genre of the Pseudepigrapha differs greatly, it all has one common aim: to keep alive the faith of the Jews by offering a theology for the times.

The prophets of the OT had interpreted historical vicissitudes as the righteous judgment of God upon Israel for her sins. They promised forgiveness and restoration if Israel repented and obeyed God. Now a new interpretation seemed necessary. The centuries had passed, but Israel still suffered. It could not be reasserted that the nation was unfaithful, since the law was venerated and obeyed. Consequently faith was sorely tested. Hence the writers of the Pseudepigrapha, like those of the Apocrypha, sought to defend God and help Israel.

For the most part, they used the apocalyptic interpretation of history. They sought to explain the misfortunes of the nation by saying that God had consigned the world to evil. Deliverance would come not in this age but in the age to come. Since the world was irretrievably wicked, the most that the righteous could hope to do was to preserve their souls. This would be achieved by devotion to the law of God. At the great judgment day all will be called to give an account, the dead as well as the living. Thus those who grieve over the eclipse of righteousness can take comfort.

The message of the Pseudepigrapha made life tolerable for the Jews. It reaffirmed belief in the sovereignty of God and in His care for His dispossessed people. The description of the Messiah in 1 Enoch on the one hand and in the Psalms of Solomon on the other hand is evidence of the increasingly important role which this individual was expected to play in the great drama of the last days. But it is the doctrine of God in these writings which was most influential. God was now conceived of on a grand scale. Elaborate time schemes represent His rule as extending backward to Creation and forward to the age to come. It was this which gave history its unity and meaning. It also helped the Jews grow cosmopolitan in outlook. Israel was encouraged to see herself, not as an inferior downtrodden race, but as playing the central role in the panorama of world events. Prophetic insights were thus taken over and developed to meet the needs of the new situation.

The part played in this development by extraneous influence is often emphasized. Evidence of the Zoroastrian idea of a struggle between good and evil is clear enough in these writings. But the extent to which imported concepts were reshaped in terms of the traditional faith of Israel is more remarkable than is sometimes allowed. Thus the dualistic principle of Persian religion was strongly subordinated to the monotheistic one inherent in the Israelite tradition. Influenced as they were by ideas foreign to their biblical heritage, the pseudepigraphal writers sought to remain true to this heritage, while developing and enriching it in ways which would answer the questions of the times in which they lived. One may say that the theology of these writers is essentially a theology of hope.

The value of the Pseudepigrapha for Jews and Christians alike is considerable. No serious student can pass from a study of the OT to the study of either the NT or rabbinical Judaism without considering these writings. Along with the Dead Sea Scrolls they form an indispensable background for understanding the developments which took place after the OT was written. The discovery of fragments of these writings in the caves of Qumran serves to emphasize their importance.

PSILANTHROPISM (from Gr. = "a mere man"). The doctrine that Christ was only "man" and not "truly God and truly man" in one person. According to The Little Labyrinth, quoted by Eusebius, it was taught by Theodotus the Cobbler, the second-century Adoptianist Monarchian. Christ had the status of "a mere man" whom the Spirit inspired. The Ebionites,* Artemas,* and Paul of Samosata* all held similar views. The single word psilanthrōpos apparently occurs for the first time in Anastasius of Sinai, while the noun was probably of nineteenth-century origin, coined by S.T. Coleridge. "Humanitarianism" is also used to describe the doctrine.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. An attempt to apply scientific methods to the study of the facts of the religious consciousness. Interest in and concern for "religious affections" has always been present in the Christian Church, but the Romantic Movement, coming in the wake of Kant's* denial of the possibility of the knowledge of God, led to a concern for "religion" considered as a postulation or projection of the existence of God (for a variety of reasons) and for a delineation of those states of consciousness that ought properly to be called "religious." The views of Schleiermacher* and Feuerbach are of importance here.

Besides offering phenomenological accounts of religious experiences such as conversion, sanctification, and mystical experience, psychology of religion has been concerned also to offer explanations of such phenomena in causal terms correlating, e.g., conversion with factors such as age, sex, various personality traits, family upbringing, and so on. William James in his Varieties of Religious Experience is notable for his antireductionism, but usually the thrust of such explanations has been to show that religious experiences are nothing but compensatory devices, wish-fulfillment (Freud), etc. Another line of inquiry, more sympathetic to religion, attempts to isolate those features that all and only genuine religious experiences have—a feeling of absolute dependence (Schleiermacher), an awareness of the numinous (R. Otto*). But it may be that such attempts are doomed to frustration if it is denied (as it usually has been in post-Kantian Protestantism) that religious experiences have characteristic objects. Work in the psychology of religion has also been stimulated by comparative religion.*

Although students of religious psychology have unquestionably turned up much interesting data, and offered engaging hypotheses as explanations of religious phenomena, serious psychological explanation has often been vitiated by naturalistic and anti-Christian ideological assumptions.

PUFENDORF, SAMUEL (1632-1694). German philosopher. Born at Dorf-Chemnitz, son of a pastor, he became professor at Heidelberg (1661), at Lund (1670), historiographer to the court of Sweden (1677), and privy councillor to the elector of Brandenburg (1687). The first German professor of natural and international law, he elaborated, in a notable essay written in 1672, on the ideas of Grotius,* basing natural law on the instinctual responses of society and stressing its independence of revelation. Theology he treated as a type of mathematics, incurring the opposition of the orthodox theologians of Jena and Leipzig. In an essay on the relationship of the Christian religion to civil society (1687) he advocated the theory known as Collegialism,* asserting the voluntary nature of the church and criticizing the "territorialism"* of previous theorists. He also wrote historical accounts of the European kingdoms, of the papacy, Lutheranism, and of the Prussian royal house.

PULCHERIA (399-453). Eastern empress from 450. Daughter of Arcadius, East Roman emperor from 395 to 408, she was made regent at fifteen for her younger brother Theodosius II* by the Constantinopolitan senate (414). Under the de facto rule of this pious saint of the Greek Church, the court assumed a charitable and ascetic character. Pulcheria arranged the marriage of Theodosius to Athenais, daughter of Leontius, a pagan philosopher of Athens (421). Assuming the name Eudocia, Athenais became a Christian and personal rival to Pulcheria. They differed in the Monophysite (Eutychian) and Nestorian controversies, Pulcheria espousing orthodoxy in both. We have Cyril* of Alexandria's letter to both women condemning the views of Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople from 428 until the Council of Ephesus (431).

In 438 Pulcheria healed the thirty-year religio-political schism in Constantinople by returning John Chrysostom's bones to be interred in the Church of the Apostles there. Her temporary eclipse and departure from court about 440 resulted from the conspiracy of Eudocia with the eunuch prime minister Chrysaphius. Pulcheria returned in 450, Eudocia having retired to Jerusalem estranged from her husband, and upon Theodosius's death became empress and nominal wife of Marcian, now Eastern emperor (until 457). The Council of Chalcedon* (451), which condemned Eutychianism* and Nestorianism,* was convened at her order. Pulcheria founded three churches to Mary and left her possessions to the poor. DANIEL C. SCAVONE

PULLEN, ROBERT (d. c.1146). English theologian and "Sentence writer." Born in England probably about 1080, he studied at Paris under William of Champeaux and Abelard.* By 1133 he was teaching Scripture at Oxford and was also archdeacon of Rochester, but with the troubles following the death of Henry I (1135), he returned to Paris to teach logic and theology, and among his pupils was John of Salisbury. Innocent II, influenced by Bernard of Clairvaux, summoned him to Rome, and in 1144 Pullen was made a cardinal. In 1145 he became chancellor of the Holy Roman Church. In his "Sentences" he tried to unify theological contradictions by the dialectical and Aristotelian methods.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

PUNSHON, WILLIAM MORLEY (1824-1881). Methodist minister. Born, educated, and ordained (1849) in England, he served there for eighteen years, then went to the Metropolitan Church in Toronto in 1868. He returned to England in 1873. A man of "moving eloquence," he had a vision of Canadian Methodism united from Atlantic to Pacific, and was the prime mover behind the negotiations for the unification which led in 1874 to the emergence of the Methodist Church of Canada.

PURCELL, HENRY (1659-1695). English composer. The Purcell family produced several musicians active in the Restoration period of English history. Henry is considered the only great and original genius between Elizabethan times and the renaissance of music that occurred in England with Elgar and Vaughan Williams at the end of the nineteenth century. During that period, except for relatively minor figures, foreign-born composers dominated the British musical scene. Purcell was organist of Westminister Abbey from 1679 until his death. He was also active in the Chapel Royal until its virtual dissolution with the advent of James II. His anthems were written for that institution, many of them with exacting solos for the famous bass, John Gostling. Purcell wrote much secular music throughout his short life, but his best anthems still rank high among his works. The simpler ones have been most performed in more recent times. Best known is his beautiful "Rejoice in the Lord alway," normally rendered without the elaborate string interludes ("symphonies") he wrote for the chapel of Charles II.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

PURDIE, JAMES EUSTACE (1880- ). Canadian clergyman and educator. Born in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, he graduated from Wycliffe Theological College, Toronto, was ordained in 1907, then ministered successively in several Anglican parishes in E and W Canada and in the USA. He was noted for his evangelistic fervor and his deeper-life and healing ministries. While rector of St. James', Saskatoon, in 1919, he received a Pentecostal spiritual experience including "speaking in tongues." This brought contact with leaders of the emerging Pentecostal assemblies of Canada; subsequently he became principal of the first Pentecostal Bible college in Canada, which post in Winnipeg he retained until partial retirement in 1950. His theological materials formed the basic curriculum for other Pentecostal colleges at home and overseas. Other writings include a catechism, Concerning the Faith (1951), which was translated into several languages, and a booklet, What We Believe (1954). He deserves much of the credit for the stability and basic orthodoxy of much of the early twentieth-century charismatic revival in Canada.

KENNETH R. DAVIS

PURGATORY. Roman Catholic theology maintains that while eternal punishment and the guilt of moral sin is absolved by the sacrament of penance, the requirement of satisfaction and temporal as opposed to eternal punishment is not. If appropriate satisfaction has not been made for sins committed and absolved in life, then satisfaction must be made after death. Purgatory is not hell, since all the souls in purgatory are on their way to the heavenly Jerusalem, though it is a place of temporal punishment. The Catholic Church has usually appealed to texts such as 2 Maccabees 12:39-45; Matthew 12:31ff.; 1 Corinthians 3:11-15 to support the idea of an intermediate place between heaven and hell, where the unfinished business of earth is settled.

The notion of purgatory appears fairly early in the writings of the Greek Fathers. Clement of Alexandria* near the end of the second century alludes to the sanctification of deathbed penitents by purifying fire in the next life. Even when the Greek Fathers do not talk about purgatory, they do advocate prayers and eucharistic services on behalf of the dead. The Latin Fathers echo these sentiments. Augustine,* for example, teaches purification through suffering in the afterlife. The medieval doctors systematized and developed the patristic heritage, teaching that the smallest pain in purgatory is greater than the greatest pain on earth, though the souls in purgatory are comforted by the knowledge that they are among the saved and are aided by the prayers and Masses offered for them by the church. The doctrine was developed and popularized by Gregory the Great,* and Thomas Aquinas* gave the idea greater elaboration.

The Greek Church had difficulty with the final form of the Latin doctrine of purgatory, rejecting the notion of atonement through suffering and the idea of material fire. The Greeks and Latins, however, were able to agree at Florence* (1439) that there is such a place as purgatory, and that prayers for the dead* are both useful and appropriate. In the West, purgatory was questioned and categorically denied by the Protestant Reformers, but was reaffirmed at the Council of Trent.*

See B. Bartmann, Purgatory (1936), and H. Berkhof, Well-Founded Hope (1969).

PURITANS; PURITANISM. Initially a movement within the English Church during the reign of Elizabeth I,* whose general aim was to implement a full Calvinistic reformation in England, Puritanism later also became a way of life, an interpretation of the Christian pilgrimage in terms of an emphasis upon personal regeneration and sanctification, household prayers, and strict morality.

The Bible, interpreted in the spirit of the early continental Reformers (e.g., Bullinger* and Beza*), was held by Puritans to be the only valid source from which doctrine, liturgy, church polity, and personal religion should be constructed. The spread of biblical theology was seen as the only way to halt the advance of Antichrist (Roman Catholicism). Bible reading in the homes from the annotated Geneva Bible* was encouraged. So also was regular biblical preaching from parish pulpits and weekly catechizing of parishioners in their homes. Various schemes were put forward and executed to train more preaching ministers (e.g., the founding of Emmanuel College, Cambridge).

The history of Puritanism may be divided into three periods: (1) from the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the crushing of the Presbyterian movement by her in 1593; (2) from 1593 to the calling of the Long Parliament in 1640; and (3) from 1640 to the restoration of Charles II* in 1660.

From 1559 to 1593 the governing classes became Protestant, the House of Commons created a Protestant National Church, and the queen decided in favor of a traditional diocesan episcopate rather than a Reformed episcopate favored by some of her subjects. Returning from exile in the Rhineland and Switzerland from 1558 onward, convinced Protestants had great hope for the Elizabethan church, but they were disappointed with the Settlement of Religion (1559) and what followed it, since they felt that too many relics of Roman Catholicism were preserved. They and their friends in Parliament pressed for further reformation according to the Word of God and the example of the best Reformed churches. Some people called them "Puritans," since they wanted to purify the church of all ceremonies, vestments, and customs inherited from the medieval church. Certain clerical Puritans also wanted to reform the polity of the church along presbyterian lines, but Elizabeth would have none of this.

After James I* (VI of Scotland) made it clear at the Hampton Court Conference* (1604) that he did not intend to make any important changes in the church, Puritans—especially ministers—faced real problems. Many compromised to the extent that they gave a minimum conformity and then used the parish as a center of evangelism by means of preaching and catechizing. Others became lecturers and preached on market days and other agreed times, being financially supported by voluntary gifts, not tithes. Yet others became Separatists* and of these some went to Holland and New England (e.g., the Pilgrim Fathers). After 1630 there was a large exodus of Puritans to Massachusetts, where they sought to create a purified Church of England, as an example to the homeland.

In 1640 Puritans were united in their desire to purify the national church and remove prelacy. Thus they were the religious force behind Parliament in the civil wars. They preached and fought for the opportunity to create a godly nation before the last days of the age dawned. However, the atmosphere of freedom that war brought led to open divisions in the Puritan movement. With the execution of Charles I and the advent of the Commonwealth and Protectorate, the Puritans became divided and opposed to each other. Cromwell in his liberally conceived national church sought to unite them, but it was not possible. Henceforth there were Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Quakers, and other groups; the Clarendon Code* of the Cavalier Parliament ensured that the former Puritans remained outside the church. Thus Nonconformity was born. The Puritan spirit continued in various ways—e.g., in the emphasis on practical divinity and on sabbatarianism—but the Puritan ideal of the Reformed nation and church was gone forever.

PURVEY, JOHN (c.1353-c.1428). Colleague of John Wycliffe.* Said to have been a native of Lathbury, Buckinghamshire, and possibly educated at Oxford, though he was never referred to as a graduate, he was ordained in 1377. He was closely associated with Wycliffe at Lutterworth, and to him is attributed the revision into vernacular idiom of the verbatim translation of the Vulgate into English by Wycliffe and Nicholas of Hereford.* This revision was more intelligible and less pedantic and was probably completed in Bristol between 1388 and 1395. In 1387 Purvey was forbidden by the bishop of Worcester to itinerate in his diocese. He was imprisoned at Saltwood, Archbishop Arundel's castle, and in March 1401—just before the passing of the act De Heretico Comburendo and at the end of the week in which the first Lollard martyr, William Sawtrey,* was burned—he recanted. He was inducted to the vicarage of West Hythe, Kent, but resigned in 1403 because he could not conscientiously abandon his Lollard convictions. He was imprisoned in 1421 by Archbishop Chicheley, and was alive in 1427, but nothing further is known of him. Presumably he continued to disseminate Lollard doctrines as circumstances allowed.

PUSEY, E(DWARD) B(OUVERIE) (1800-1882). Leader of the Oxford Movement.* Educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated in 1819, he became fellow of Oriel College in 1822. During 1825-27 he studied biblical criticism in Germany, and in the process acquired a good knowledge of oriental languages. Although the book he published on his return was understood to sympathize with the rationalism he had studied in Germany, Pusey denied this, and all his subsequent biblical work was strongly conservative; the best known is his commentary on the Minor Prophets and on Daniel. In 1828 he was appointed regius professor of Hebrew. As a member of Oriel he was already acquainted with Keble* and Newman,* and when the latter began the Tracts for the Times in 1833, Pusey also contributed. Two of them, one on baptism and the other on the Eucharist, were much longer than the previous tracts. Pusey was instrumental also in the publication of the Oxford Library of the Fathers.

Outside his academic studies he further contributed to the Oxford Movement by his opposition to Dr. Hampden's appointment as professor of theology, and by his support of Newman in the storm over the publication of Tract 90. In 1843 he was inhibited as a university preacher because of a sermon on the Eucharist. When in 1845 Newman seceded to the Roman Church, Pusey became the best-known figure in the Church of England. The very fact of his staying in the Church of England retained many others who might otherwise have left also. He founded sisterhoods, encouraged private confession, and supported the revival of ritualism, though he himself kept to a very simple ceremonial.

His own desire for reunion with the Roman Church led to his publishing in three stages his Eirenicon, which met with a disappointing response, especially after Vatican I* in 1870. In later years, however, he was more occupied with combating the growing strength of liberalism represented in Oxford by Benjamin Jowett,* in publications such as Essays and Reviews (1860), and in proposals to truncate or omit the Athanasian Creed.* A man of great personal devotion, his private life was haunted by tragedy: his wife, to whom he was devoted, died after eleven years of marriage, and all but one of his children predeceased him. After his death Pusey House in Oxford was founded as a center for theological study, and this contains his library.

See Lives by H.P. Liddon (4 vols., 1893: full list of Pusey's works) and G.L. Prestige (1933).

PETER S. DAWES

PUSEY, PHILIP EDWARD (1830-1880). English scholar. Only son of E.B. Pusey,* he was both deaf and crippled. He graduated from Oxford in 1854, and when his physical defects prevented his ordination, he resolved to devote his life to helping his father. This he did by preparing a critical edition of the Peshitta and the works of Cyril of Alexandria. Despite his ill-health, he pursued his studies with exemplary thoroughness, visiting libraries throughout Europe and the Near East.

QUADRAGESIMA. The forty days of Lent. The term has been used also to denote the first Sunday in Lent.

QUADRATUS (second century). This name heads a list of apologists from the early second century, with the few references placing him within the administrative period of Emperor Hadrian* (117-38). These specifically reflect the impact of the incipient Christian Church as a result of imperial policy and rescripts against Christianity by Hadrian and his predecessor Trajan. The occasion for Quadratus's Apology may have been Hadrian's visit to Athens in the winter of 124/5. Other than a brief fragment quoted by Eusebius, this writing is assumed lost, though some suggest it is preserved in the *Epistle to Diognetus, with the Eusebian fragment fitted into the lacuna. The Quadratus who became bishop of Athens subsequent to the martyrdom of Publius could be the apologist. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

QUAKERS, see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF

QUARLES, FRANCIS (1592-1644). English poet. Born near Romford, he was educated at Cambridge, studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and held official positions in royal and episcopal service. In 1639 he became city chronologer of London. He supported the king in the Civil War and as a result suffered the loss by plunder of his manuscript collection. His works include A Feast for Worms (1620), Sion's Elegies (1625) and Divine Emblems (1635). Such fame as he has rests upon this last work. The emblems were drawn from two continental collections, Herman Hugo's Pia Desideria (1624) and Philippe de Mallery's Typus Mundi (1627). They form a version of the Bible moralized, in which Quarles includes a good deal of that paradoxical mode now often associated with the Metaphysical poets.
ARTHUR POLLARD

QUARRIER, WILLIAM (1829-1903). Founder of the Orphan Homes of Scotland. Born into a humble Greenock home, fatherless at three, starving Glasgow slum-dweller at five, he was working the following year for one shilling a week and became a journeyman shoemaker at the early age of twelve. He probably had no formal schooling. Converted at seventeen, he never forgot the plight of children such as he had known. So the work began: a shoeblack brigade, a news(paper) brigade, a parcels brigade, an orphanage in Glasgow, the sending of residents to new lives in Canada. In 1878 the first cottage homes were opened at Bridge of Weir, in Dr. Barnardo's presence. Then came the first tuberculosis sanatorium in Scotland. Quarrier made no appeals, had no collectors, bazaars, or entertainments for money-raising purposes, relying on God's supply. When Quarrier died, having arranged for the country's first (and only) colony for epileptics, 1,526 children were in care at Bridge of Weir, with kindred work in Glasgow, Argyllshire, and Canada.

QUARTODECIMANISM. An early church practice, especially in Asia Minor, celebrating Easter on 14 Nisan (die quarta decima), the day of the Jewish Passover. About 155, Polycarp,* bishop of Smyrna, tried unsuccessfully to persuade Pope Anicetus to adopt Quartodeciman practice. Pope Victor* was determined that Quartodecimans should join the rest of Christendom in observing Sunday as the day of resurrection. There seemed legitimate objection to observing the chief Christian feast on the same day as the Jewish Passover. Irenaeus* of Lyons protested against Victor's efforts, and the Quartodecimans later separated and continued as a sect into the fifth century. It has been argued that the two traditions were not concerned to commemorate the same event, but rather were complementary festivals, both rooted in the Israelite calendar. Quartodecimans did not mourn Christ's death; only with the Franciscans* did Western Christians begin to dwell on the Passion. Ultimately the debate turned on differing theological interpretation; the Sunday Pasch triumphed, subsuming all that was commemorated on 14 Nisan.

QUATTRO CORONATI (Lat. = "four crowned ones"). Martyrs commemorated in the Western Church on 8 November. Roman tradition lists them as four brothers (Severus, Severian, Carpophorus, Victorinus) who held offices of trust in Rome and were beaten to death publicly and buried on the Lavican Way at the beginning of the Diocletian persecution about 304. They are confused with five Pannonian stonemasons (Nicostratus, Claudius, Symphorian, Castorius, Simplicius), who, refusing to sacrifice to the gods, were enclosed in leaden boxes and drowned. Modern hagiographies have been unable to distinguish the two groups. An ancient basilica on the Celian Hill, Rome, is dedicated to them. They are the patrons of stonemasons. J.G.G. NORMAN

QUEBEC ACT (1774). An Act of the British Parliament which superseded the Royal Proclamation of 1763, this was the constitution of the colony of Quebec. The Act extended the boundaries to the west and south so that they approached the earlier French limits of the colony. The Roman Catholic Church was officially recognized and permitted to collect its accustomed dues. The colony was given French civil law, but English criminal law remained in force. The Act marked the abandonment of the policy of assimilation or Anglicization and was resented by the English in Quebec and the other British North American colonies.

QUENTIN, HENRI (1872-1935). Biblical scholar. Born at St. Thierry, France, he studied at Reims and entered the Benedictine abbey of Maredsous, Belgium (1894-95). Transferred to Solesmes, France (1897), he was ordained in 1902. Pius X called him to Rome in 1907 to serve on the Commission for Revision of the Vulgate. He superintended the photographing of most of the important Vulgate MSS and was editor-in-chief of the Pentateuch. He became a member of the Pontifical Roman Academy of Archaeology (1923), and Pius XI appointed him to the historical section of the Congregation of Sacred Rites* (1930). He had a substantial part in the creation of the new Sacred Heart liturgy (1928). He was made first abbot of the Abbey of St. Girolamo, Rome, in 1933. J.G.G. NORMAN

QUESNEL, PASQUIER (1634-1719). French Jansenist* theologian. Educated by the Jesuits, he studied philosophy and theology at the Sorbonne and joined the Congregation of the Paris Oratory in 1657, subsequently becoming director. In 1672 he produced his Réflexions morales, a reprint of the NT with moral comments on every verse. The bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne commended it, and it was generally well received, but as new editions were prepared, it was alleged to be increasingly rigorist and Jansenist in tone. It was praised by the archbishop of Paris, but Quesnel's work was fiercely attacked, especially by the Jesuits, and he moved to Brussels to escape harassment. Louis XIV, convinced that Jansenism was a public danger, had Quesnel's arrest in Brussels engineered by Philip V of Spain, but he escaped to Protestant Holland where he continued to defend his views. In 1708, after fourteen years of discussion, the Réflexions morales was condemned by Pope Clement XI. Quesnel's reply led to further bitter controversy, complicated by the Gallican issue, and in 1713 the bull Unigenitus condemned 101 propositions, which amounted to the entire theological, ascetic, and moral doctrine of Jansenism. Quesnel died in Amsterdam without retracting his beliefs. HOWARD SAINSBURY

QUIERCY, SYNODS OF. Several such assemblies were held in the ninth century. The first met in 838, when Florus,* a supporter of Agobard,* archbishop of Lyons, alleged that parts of Amalar of Metz's* book on liturgical ritual were heretical. At Quiercy, Amalar's interpretation of the ceremonies of the Mass was condemned. A second synod of Quiercy met in 849 to condemn the views on double predestination allegedly held by the Augustinian theologian Gottschalk,* a monk of Fulda. The local archbishop, Rabanus Maurus,* attacked Gottschalk's position, and the Council of Mainz (848) condemned Gottschalk. Through the efforts of Hincmar* of Reims the Synod of Quiercy confirmed this condemnation in 849, and Gottschalk was scourged, defrocked, and imprisoned. Hincmar discovered, however, that other noted scholars—Ratramnus* of Corbie, Lupus of Ferriers, and Prudentius* of Troyes—broadly supported Gottschalk's position. The latter's opponents, who themselves held Semi-Augustinian views, argued that he had made God the author of sin, but in fact his position is based on "prescience" and not on "pre-ordaining."

At Charles the Bald's suggestion, Hincmar held a third synod at Quiercy in an effort to sort out the problem. Four propositions were passed: predestination to glory was accepted, and the reprobate, from not being helped, would go to hell through their own free choice; grace restores man's ability to do good; God desires to save all men; and Christ suffered for all men. These propositions were not universally accepted, and further synods subsequently met, including two at Quiercy (857-58), in an effort to achieve a solution based on the moderate Augustinianism of the Council of Orange* (829). QUIETISM. This system of spirituality spread rapidly in Christendom in the later seventeenth century, and is best understood as an introverted and mystical reaction to the dogmatism and oppressions of the Thirty Years' War. It had three leading advocates—Fénelon,* Molinos,* and Madame Guyon*—and many lesser supporters. Most of these were persons of intense spirituality who suffered constraint or persecution, especially when their movement was condemned by Innocent XI* in the bull Coelestis Pastor (1687).

Quietism is basically an exaggeration of the orthodox doctrine of interior quiet, and of elements found in the medieval mystics—indeed the term is first encountered in the fourteenth century. It teaches firstly that the human soul's highest attainment is passive contemplation of the divine. This passivity is deliberately stressed: there is no recall of the medieval mystics' belief that contemplation implies a "busy rest" and calls for energetic human response to God's outgoing love, nor, as with Quietism, had it been generally held that the intellect as well as the will and emotions must be renounced in the quest for spiritual union, or that the Christian soul ultimately loses itself in the boundlessness of infinity. Secondly, Quietism insists that the soul surrenders to God in one decisive act after which it enjoys, despite all temptations, irrefragable union with the divine (cf. the Reformed doctrine of final perseverance). Lastly, the doctrine of pure or disinterested love, found especially in the popular and less informed ranks of Quietists, teaches that the renunciation of self and of desire is reached only by disregarding thoughts of heaven and hell and all external distractions, including spiritual exercises and the ordinances of the church. The result is a state of "mystic death," a dehumanization of man and a vague pantheism which is closer to Buddhism than to Christianity.

The antiecclesiastical implications of Quietism were at once seized upon by Rome, which condemned the movement as a logical outcome of the Reformation: the Quietists, however, derived far more from John of the Cross* and other Counter-Reformation mystics than from any Protestant source.

QUIMBY, PHINEAS PARKHURST (1802-1866). Founder of mental healing in America. Born in Lebanon, New Hampshire, he abandoned clockmaking to become a mesmerist after hearing the lectures of Charles Poyen in 1838. By 1847 he forsook mesmerism for mental healing, establishing settled practice in Portland, Maine (1859). He felt all disease arose in the mind, that it came mostly from erroneously attributing illness to physical causes. He held that God, or Wisdom, constituted all reality, and that matter was either an illusion or a manifestation of God. Quimby's philosophy became the foundation for Christian Science*—his term for properly understanding the relation between the divine and the human. Based on his treatment and manuscripts, his patient and disciple, M. B. Eddy,* practiced his methods after his death, and by 1875 established Christian Science as a distinct religion. By 1900 Quimbyites Warren Evans and Julius Dresser constructed the New Thought movement from his ideas. D.E. PITZER

QUIÑONES, FRANCISCO DE (1480-1540). Spanish reforming cardinal. Born at Léon, he entered the Franciscan Order in 1498 and originated the mission of the "Twelve Apostles" to Mexico in 1523. He was subsequently for five years minister-general of his order, became cardinal in 1527, and bishop of Coria, 1531-33. He negotiated with Charles V on behalf of Pope Clement VII* and prepared the treaty of Barcelona in 1529. He defended the interests of Catherine of Aragon in the matter of Henry VIII's* divorce. As representative of the Catholic reformation movement, he was asked by Clement to compile a new Breviary, which was published in 1535. He reduced to a minimum readings from the lives of the saints, and eliminated all elements of a choral nature. He also introduced the recital of all the Psalms through the week and the reading of nearly all the Bible through the year. It became a best seller until proscribed in 1558, and greatly influenced Thomas Cranmer* in his preparation of the Book of Common Prayer.* J.G.G. NORMAN

QUINQUAGESIMA. The period which begins with the Sunday immediately preceding Lent, and ends on Easter Day. The term is applied also to the first week of this period, and also to the Sunday before Lent.

QUIRINIUS PUBLIUS SULPICIUS (d. A.D. 21). Roman imperial legate. The fixed events in his career, based on Tacitus and the interpretation of supporting Latin inscriptions, include being in 12 B.C. consul with Marcus Valerius Messalla Barbatus, in A.D. 2 adviser in the East to Gaius Caesar (the emperor's grandson), and in A.D. 6 the legate of Syria, succeeding Lucius Volusius Saturninus with a commission to make a tax census of the newly incorporated procuratorial Judea (cf. Luke 2:1, 2). There is identified for him also a campaign against a desert tribe while he was proconsul of Crete and Cyrene (c.15 B.C.) and the governance of Galatia some years later with a victory over the Homonadenses. To the gospel allusion the events of Acts 5:37 are compounded by the use of Josephus, whereby Quirinius's name and office have become the main obstacle in computing the year of Jesus' birth, if Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.) is involved. QUR'AN (Koran). The holy book of Islam,* containing 114 chapters or surās, varying greatly in content. As well as historical material, it includes doctrinal and legal argument, exhortation, warnings and eschatological teachings. According to Muslim tradition, the Qur'ān exists in heaven on a preserved tablet; its contents were revealed to Prophet Muhammad by Archangel Gabriel. There is evidence that Muhammad was familiar with at least parts of the Old and New Testaments, and the Qur'ān contains references to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David—and Jesus. Jesus is called "the son of Mary, the apostle of God" (4:156, etc.), and "Messiah"; but "the Messiah the son of Mary is only a prophet" (5:79)—since the radical monotheism of Islam does not permit any attribution of sonship to Jesus or any other. In Muslim tradition the Qur'ān is held to be divinely inspired and therefore infallible. There have of course been disputes over interpretation, but the basic authority of the Qur'ān is never contested. Consequently historical criticism has made very little headway among Muslims. E.J. RABANUS MAURUS (c.776-856). Archbishop of Mainz. Born of a noble family at Mainz and educated at Fulda where he was made deacon in 801, he went the following year to Tours. There he studied under Alcuin,* from whom he received the name "Maurus," referring to St. Maur, disciple of St. Benedict, in recognition of his scholastic abilities. He became master of the monastery school at Fulda, one of the most influential in Europe, where Walafrid Strabo* and Otfrid of Weissenburg were pupils. Ordained in 814, he was abbot of Fulda from 822 to 842, advancing its intellectual, spiritual, and temporal welfare, erecting buildings, collecting manuscripts and art, and engaging in writing. In the struggle between Louis the Pious and his sons he supported Louis and then Lothair I, but with the defeat by Louis the German (840) he fled the monastery, returning briefly before retiring to nearby Petersberg for prayer and study. In 847 he became archbishop of Mainz, where he instructed clergy and laity, combated social disorders, and defended sound doctrine. He held three provincial synods: on ecclesiastical discipline (847), on Gottschalk* and his doctrine of predestination (848), and on the rights and disciplines of the church (852).

His writings are immense in subject and number: a study on grammar, a collection of homilies for the church year, two penitentials, a martyrology, and Latin poetry. A manual for monks and clerics in three books (De institutione clericorum) dealt with, e.g., sacraments, public prayer, and fasts, and relied much on Augustine, Gregory the Great, and Isidore. He also wrote many commentaries on Scripture. Learned in Scripture and patristics, he was not an original thinker; his writings are largely compilations, more important for their place in the Carolingian Renaissance* than for themselves. Not canonized but honored as a saint, he was acclaimed praeceptor Germaniae.

RABAUT, PAUL (1718-1794). French Huguenot leader. Born into a Protestant family, he decided at the age of sixteen to accompany and help the itinerant preacher Jean Bétrine. The four years' experience thus gained served him well when he began in 1738 his work as a pastor and an opponent of repressive legislation. Except for a brief period in a seminary at Lausanne in 1740, he was associated with the church in Nîmes all his life. In 1756 he was voted president of the national synod of the Huguenot* Church, which at this period was in difficulties due to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.* Though encountering many problems both from the state and from his own church, he fought on and did much to rehabilitate the Protestants of France. With Antoine Court* he is to be regarded as of major importance in the history of eighteenth-century French Calvinism. One significant success in which he and his sons shared was the passing of the Edict of Toleration in 1787.

RABBI. This Greek word is derived from a Hebrew title used to honor the Jewish religious teachers, dating from the first century before Christ. Jesus is addressed by His disciples as "rabbi," because the outward form of His life appeared like that of a Jewish teacher of the law. But the gospel writers interpret the term so as to underscore His lordship (cf. Mark 9:5; Luke 9:33), thus indicating that early Christians thought of Him as much more than a rabbi. The term does not occur in early Christian literature subsequent to the closing of the canon. As the recognized title given to teachers of the law in the Jewish community, it is passed on from teacher to pupil by ordination, and qualifies one who has the proper training to function as preacher, teacher, and pastor in the Jewish synagogue.

PAUL K. JEWETT

RABBULA (c.350-435). Syrian theologian. Born near Aleppo of a Christian mother, he entered the civil service and became a prefect. He was converted about 400 and became a monk. In 411 he was elected bishop of Edessa and devoted himself to church reform, strongly opposing Jewish, pagan, and Gnostic influences in Syria. He supported Cyril* of Alexandria at the Council of Ephesus* in 431, and attacked Nestorianism,* especially the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia.* Many scholars hold that he made the Peshitta version of the Syriac NT, issuing it to supersede the unorthodox Tatian's *Diatessaron. He translated Cyril's De Recto Fide into Syriac. He is credited with having written some of the hymns in the Jacobite liturgy.

RACISM. According to Pierre van den Berghe, this is any set of beliefs that organic, genetically transmitted differences (whether real or imagined) between human groups are intrinsically associated with the presence or absence of certain socially relevant abilities or characteristics, and these differences form a legitimate basis for invidious distinctions between groups socially defined as races. It is not so much the presence of objective physical differences between groups that creates races, but the recognition of such differences as socially significant. "Race," which emphasizes physical appearance, should be distinguished from "caste"—a hereditary social group limited to persons of the same rank, occupation, or economic position—and "ethnic group"—one sharing a common and distinctive culture.

Race or color prejudice far antedates the period of European expansion. In Greek, Latin, Persian, and Sanskrit the words for "black" had negative connotations (bad, wicked, dismal, unlucky) while those for white were more favorable. This symbolism of color with its association of moral qualities was taken over by Christianity, and religious language from the beginning was full of dark deeds and fair promises, black thoughts and white angels. Thus the metaphors of light and darkness came to be applied to human conduct. The devil and those who scourged Christ were often portrayed as being black. Bede* asserted that the Ethiopian eunuch's skin was changed after his baptism by Philip (Acts 8) so he would no longer have to wear the badge of evil. Teresa of Avila* on successfully resisting temptation had a vision of a Negro boy enraged at his frustration. James I* of England in his Demonologie asserted a black man presided over witches' covens.

There were several historical factors in the development of the Western variety of racism. The capitalist exploitation of non-European peoples, particularly the institution of Negro slavery in the New World, fostered a complex ideology of paternalism and racism in which the black was seen as inferior, childish, and needful of civilization. The egalitarian and libertarian ideals of the Enlightenment* and the French and American revolutions led to a dichotomy between civilized and savage peoples, wherein these ideals applied only to the white, civilized ones. Extremely important was Darwinism, which regarded races as permanent, specieslike divisions possessing differential hereditary capacities for achieving civilization. Social Darwinists held that due to the processes of natural selection whites were far ahead of other races in the struggle for power. Now most scholars hold that qualitative differences between races are cultural rather than genetic in origin.

Although racism in the United States conflicts with the nation's democratic ethos, it has been institutionalized in the structure and culture of society. Neighborhood segregation remains basic even though nearly all legal supports to discrimination have been removed. The most extreme form is the apartheid policy of South Africa and Rhodesia which prescribes concrete measures for the total separation of the races—Whites, Coloureds, Indians, and Blacks—and the dominance of the white minority. The racial problem in Great Britain represents possibly more an expression of a general xenophobia—a resentment against immigrants from the West Indies, Pakistan, and India and desire to limit their numbers—than race prejudice as such. The Northern Ireland conflict is more ethnic, cultural, and religious than racial in nature, in spite of popular views to the contrary. The violent excesses of National Socialism in Germany transformed anti-Semitism in modern Europe from a policy of ethnic and religious discrimination to out-and-out racism.

Race prejudice also prevails in such non-Western areas as Brazil, China, India, and Africa. Varieties of black racism include the "Negritude" concept developed by writers in Francophone West Africa which emphasizes a sense of power and identity, and some African zionist and messianic movements, in which a black prophet seeks a new Jerusalem on earth for his chosen people or excludes white men from heaven. The pastoral Tutsi in Burundi rule over the agricultural Hutu in a racist manner, while the open animosity against Indians in East Africa possesses strong racial overtones. Both the Black Muslim movement, with its policy of territorial separation, and black anti-Semitism are expressions of black racism in the USA.

Although greatly at variance with the principles of biblical Christianity, white Christian racism is especially pervasive. The existence of separate races and the institution of slavery viewed as divinely ordained, and scriptural prooftexts (such as the "curse of Ham," slaveholding by the patriarchs, and instructions concerning the behavior of slaves and masters) are utilized to justify Negro subordination. Others argue that Christians should devote their attention to "spiritual" matters, and regard race prejudice as merely a "secular" concern.

In the USA, after the colonial era, blacks were segregated within the churches by the early nineteenth century and soon were pressured to form separate congregations. The Negro church became their fundamental social institution, serving both as a refuge from the hostile white society and as the training school for black leadership. Although some white Christians were involved in the abolitionist campaign, their acceptance of racism was evidenced by their consistent support of segregationist laws and practices in both the North and South in the post-Civil War decades.

The civil rights movement, initiated by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (founded 1910), gained momentum after World War II and reflected a strong Christian dimension, e.g., Martin Luther King, Jr.* and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.* Although most of the early initiatives came from theological liberals, there were some noteworthy actions by American evangelicals on the racial front. These included Billy Graham's decision in 1953 to desegregate his meetings, the initiation of a distinctively evangelical civil rights publication The Other Side in 1965, the Tom Skinner Crusades, and the formation of urban ministries in such cities as Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago. Nevertheless, there is still strong resistance to racial equality in many quarters of conservative and evangelical Christianity in America, and this has been accentuated by reactions to the new militancy of the "black power" movement and concomitant campaigns.

RACOVIAN CATECHISM. One of the earliest confessions of modern Unitarianism,* it appeared in 1605 just after the death of Faustus Socinus. It is a very clear expression of Socinian* theology. Beginning with the question, "What is the Christian religion?" it gives as the answer: "The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life." The catechism clearly indicates that Unitarianism of the Socinian type held that both the OT and NT are inspired documents. But reason alone apprehends their spiritual truths. The truths of revelation are superior to reason, but are never contrary to its dictates. Christ is more than man, but not truly God, for if he had been truly divine he could not have died.

RADICAL REFORMATION. The term covers congeries of movements flourishing from the 1520s which were often initially indebted to the "magisterial reformation" of, e.g., Zwingli* and Luther,* but wished to push changes farther and on different bases. Especially in its earliest stages, the radical reformation was a continuation of medieval movements of lay piety, heresy, and social protest. It drew many recruits from peasants and lower orders of townspeople and craftsmen, who were then in economic difficulties.

A radical movement appeared early in Wittenberg, where Luther's colleague A.B. von Carlstadt* introduced a vernacular Mass, abandoned vestments and the use of images, adopted a thoroughly lay interpretation of the priesthood of all believers, and was drawn to a mystical Quietism. Prophets claiming direct inspiration from God influenced T. Münzer* who, combining genuine compassion for the poor with apocalyptic fanaticism, was killed in the Peasants' War.

In Zwingli's Zurich, radicals such as C. Grebel* appeared in 1525-26, questioning infant baptism, and those who survived magisterial persecution were dispersed widely. A lively movement in the Tyrol was begun by G. Blaurock* and J. Hutter (see HUTTERITES). In Moravia a moderate movement under the pacific conservative spiritualist B. Hubmaier and M. Sattler (d.1527) lost the support of rulers after the more socially radical J. Hut (c.1490-1527) arrived. The movement, reorganized more conservatively by Hutter, issued in the Hutterite communities.

Other radicals traveled down the Rhine; Strasbourg was the scene of lively debates, 1528-34, involving C. Schwenkfeld (see SCHWENKFELDERS), S. Franck,* M. Servetus,* and M. Hofmann. The last inspired a strong movement (Melchiorites) in the Netherlands, long a hotbed of religious deviance, which became more militantly apocalyptic under the leadership of J. Matthijs and John of Leyden* and took over the Lutheran town of Münster (1535-36), set up a millennial community, restoring Paradise and Old Israel in anticipation of the universal rule of Christ; the practice of polygamy and the violent charismatic rule of the saints produced terror, and Catholic and Protestant forces combined to restore order after a long siege. Münster ensured that the term "Anabaptist"* symbolized, for over a century, social disorder and immorality; yet it was the last purgative outburst of visionary fanaticism in the radical movement. The future lay with more pacific Anabaptist church movements, like the Hutterites, the Mennonites,* and with a less orthodox, more rationalist wing in the Socinians.* Through such movements the radical reformation has continued to play an influential part in the history of Christianity.

The radical reformation was spasmodic, turbulent, and fragmented through persecution, travel, partisan strife, and theological debate. Its principles cannot therefore be characterized without allowing for large exceptions and paradoxes, but a sketch must be attempted here. Radical reformation rested on the thorough separation of the church and the world, of believer and unbeliever. It was not denied that sinners might be in the church; but no theoretical or practical concession was made to the presence of the unregenerate. The church was to be consistently defined as the company of true believers and disciples, one with the suffering and/or exalted Christ, and so not essentially conditioned by the world or the flesh. They had little patience with Luther's Augustinian theology of election and bondage of the will and the consequent acceptance of the hiddenness of the true church. Believers' baptism and the ban (excommunication), the distinctive life of the church, gathered in brotherly love and separate from the world (abstention from secular office, bearing the sword, oaths), and the experience of martyrdom as the climax of the practical imitation of Christ were all fruits of a quest for the visibility of the true church.

This stress on visibility went with a cultivation of inward spirituality, which occasionally made outward forms unnecessary (Schwenkfeld, Socinus), but more commonly was treated as their basis. This deeply felt spiritual unity with Christ sometimes produced unorthodox christologies, and was the basis for the spiritualist exegesis of Scripture, since it was held that spiritual experience not academic learning was the key to Scripture—in part this was a lay attack on professionals. Generally the movement did not bypass Scripture, but claimed to read it spiritually, and often this meant literally, to the point of challenging the reason or order of the world.

The movement was constantly inspired by the biblical concept of the people of God; sometimes this was understood more in terms of the warlike saints of some parts of the OT, or of Christ's suffering pacific people.

Not all the radical groups were initially Anabaptist, but the practice became increasingly important and widespread. Rebaptism was significant because it not only effected a visible church of confessing believers and was a restoration of primitive Christian practice; but implied also a break with the partnership of church and civil order, essential to Christendom, in which paedobaptism ensured that all citizens could be treated as Christians. Reformers like Zwingli who were occasionally attracted by the biblical arguments for believers' baptism resisted the radicals so harshly because they wished to reform, not to destroy, the traditional order of Christendom.

RAIKES, ROBERT (1735-1811). Promoter of Sunday schools. Born in Gloucester, he succeeded his father as publisher of the Gloucester Journal, which business enabled him to maintain his interest in neglected children. After a meeting with Thomas Stock (1749-1803), who had started a Sunday school in Ashbury, Berkshire, he set up one in his own parish in 1780 which met a glaring need. The idea caught fire, and schools sprang up in other places. Despite popular opinion, however, he is not the movement's founder, and never claimed to be. By 1786 some 200,000 children were being taught in England, and a London society for establishing Sunday schools had been organized (1785) by William Fox. They spread into Wales (1789) through Thomas Charles* of Bala, and to Scotland, Ireland, and America. John Wesley encouraged them, and Adam Smith praised their cultivating good manners. They taught children to read and write along with giving Bible instruction. An interview Raikes had with Queen Charlotte led to Mrs. Trimmer's starting schools visited by George III. At first teachers were paid, later they volunteered. In 1803 a Sunday School Union was founded. Although Raikes was accused of excessive vanity, his immense benevolence cannot be disputed.

RAINOLDS (Reynolds), JOHN (1549-1607). Moderate Puritan theologian. Born at Pinhoe in Devon, he was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where after graduation he became a tutor and lecturer in Greek. One of his students was Richard Hooker,* Rainolds's lectures brought him fame in the university, but after some controversy in his college, he moved in 1586 to Queen's College; he also held at this time a lectureship "for the confutation of popish tenets." When Queen Elizabeth visited the university in 1592, it is said, she advised him to proceed in religion with moderation. In December 1593 he was made dean of Lincoln in order to facilitate his subsequent promotion to the presidency of Corpus Christi. He was well known as a moderate Puritan and a convinced Calvinist. He used the Book of Common Prayer, but objected to certain ceremonies—e.g., the churching of women and use of the sign of the cross. At the Hampton Court Conference* in 1604 he represented the Puritan interest, and afterward took a major part in the translation of the Bible (King James Version). PETER TOON

RAINY, ROBERT (1826-1906). Scottish minister and scholar. Born in Glasgow, he graduated from the university there, studied theology at New College, Edinburgh, and in 1851 became minister of the Free Church of Scotland* at Huntly. In 1854 he transferred to the Free High Church, Edinburgh, and after eight years assumed the chair of church history at his former college, a post he held for the next forty-four years and with which from 1874 he combined the college principalship. Not naturally a controversialist, he found himself nevertheless drawn into great issues of the time. He opposed public lotteries and the Boer War, and was much criticized for his (reluctant) acquiescence in the deposition of W.R. Smith (1881).

Reunion of the Scottish Presbyterian churches was a burning cause with him, and he saw disestablishment of the Church of Scotland as the only expedient way. This brought him into correspondence with a not unsympathetic Prime Minister Gladstone, who in 1895 called him "unquestionably the greatest of living Scotsmen." He led the Free Church into union with the United Presbyterian Church* in 1900, and his own third moderatorial term was over the United Free Church* assembly. His Three Lectures on the Church of Scotland (1872) completely refuted Dean A.P. Stanley's* astonishing denigration of Covenanters* and Seceders. Rainy's other works included The Bible and Criticism (1878). His funeral, delayed because he had died in Australia, was reported to have been the greatest spectacle Edinburgh had seen since that of Thomas Chalmers in 1847. J.D. DOUGLAS

RAMABAI, PANDITA (1858-1922). Indian Christian reformer. Daughter of a Brahman who had a remote hilltop ashram, she was born near Mangalore, lost both her parents during pilgrimage in South India in 1874, and with her brother wandered on, making a living by reciting the Hindu scriptures. In Calcutta Ramabai's prowess in Sanskrit so impressed pandits that she was designated "Pandita," a name retained even after she was a Christian. Her drift from orthodoxy was seen in her association with a reform movement, by her speeches in favor of female emancipation, and then by her breaking caste in marrying a man of lower caste who died two years later (1882).

Meanwhile, in Bengal Ramabai had met Christians and discovered the Bible. She went to Poona, organizing women's societies for reform and pursuing her new interest in Christianity in which she was helped by father Nehemiah Gore, an Anglican who was a convert from her own caste. The Wantage Sisters helped her go to Britain for education in 1883, and she and her young daughter were baptized at Wantage. In 1886 she went to America, studying kindergarten methods and getting support for a scheme to educate high-caste widows. A Ramabai Association guaranteed finance for ten years, and her book on The High-Caste Hindu Woman (1887) paid for Marathi textbooks and stirred concern in the West. Her boarding school opened at Bombay (1889) and later moved to Poona. Support from eminent Hindu reformers withered when some of her child widows were attracted to Christianity. Ramabai's evangelical conversion in 1891 made her an ardent evangelist as well as social worker, and baptisms followed.

Land purchased at Kedgaon, near Poona, became the scene of Ramabai's greatest work when she rescued hundreds of girls and women after the famines of 1896-97 and established a Mukti ("Salvation") Mission which grew to a community of over 1,300. Mukti was in 1905 a notable center of revival. During her last eighteen years Ramabai made a simplified Marathi translation of the Bible. After her death Mukti Mission continued, having a strong link with the Christian and Missionary Alliance, but as a separate organization. In 1971 there was a community of 649.

RAMSAY, SIR WILLIAM MITCHELL (1851-1939). Classical scholar and archaeologist. Born in Glasgow, he studied at the universities of Aberdeen, Oxford, and (briefly) Göttingen. During 1880-90 and 1900-14 he engaged in extensive exploration among the antiquities of W Turkey. He was the first professor of classical art and archaeology at Oxford (1885-86) and then professor of humanity (i.e., Latin) at Aberdeen (1886-1911). His chief significance lies in his contribution to classical archaeology and geography. His The Historical Geography of Asia Minor (1890) lays the foundation for all future work in this area, and his Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia (1895 and 1897), Asianic Elements in Greek Civilization (1927), and The Social Basis of Roman Power in Asia Minor (1941) are still standard works.

He also made important contributions to the study of the NT. His early work, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170 (1893), set the tone of his future writings, but it is his St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen (1895) which is best known. Though he had earlier accepted the conclusions of radical German scholarship concerning the historicity of Acts (see F.C. BAUR), his study led him to an increasingly high estimate of Luke as a historian. His work on the NT served to fill in the historical background for the life of Paul, establish the so-called South Galatian destination of the epistle to the Galatians, and commend the historical reliability of the Lucan writings to scholars. His principal writings were a series of articles in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible (1898-1904), A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (1899), Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia (1904), and The Cities of St. Paul (1907).

RAMSEY, ARTHUR MICHAEL (1904- ). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1961 to 1974. Educated at Repton and Magdalene College, Cambridge, where he read classics, and then theology in which he gained a first class degree, he was ordained in 1928 and served a curacy at St. Nicholas', Liverpool. From 1930 until 1936 he was subwarden of Lincoln Theological College, where he wrote his first major theological work, The Gospel and the Catholic Church. After parochial work in Boston (Lincolnshire) and Cambridge, he was appointed professor of divinity at Durham in 1940. In 1945 he published The Resurrection of Christ, and in 1949 The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ—two profound biblical-theological works. By this time he was recognized as one of the outstanding modern Anglican theologians.

In 1950 he was appointed regius professor of divinity at Cambridge. Two years later he succeeded to the see of Durham, and was translated to York in 1956 and to Canterbury in 1961, continuing his theological writing alongside all his episcopal duties. An Anglo-Catholic himself, he showed sympathy for and understanding of other traditions, and committed himself to work for church unity. In 1964 he paid a visit to Pope Paul VI, and he created strong contacts with the Orthodox as well as the Free churches at home. In preaching and writing Ramsey has emphasized the importance of personal spirituality; has taken an uncompromising stand for social justice; and has proved himself a stable leader.

He retired upon his seventieth birthday in 1974. JOHN A. SIMPSON

RAMUS, PETER (1515-1572). French humanist. From Picardy, he was educated at the Collège de France and led an anti-Aristotelian movement. By 1551 he had become a professor at his alma mater and in 1561 was converted to Protestantism. After spending the years 1568-71 in Germany to escape persecution, he returned to France in 1571 and was killed in the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day.* For a time Ramus engaged in an effort to establish congregational government in the French Calvinist churches (1568-71), but it is as a reformer of Aristotelian logic that he is best known. He believed that the concepts and abstractions of the human mind draw their validity, not from temporal or expedient constructs, but from eternal truth in the mind of God. Hence man can develop a methodology for inferring such universals from his experience and then relating them to infinity. Absolute truth then becomes available through the careful analysis of human perception. In practice the Ramist felt that facts could be analyzed in a series of sucessive dichotomies. These analyses were often arranged in a diagram which became a hallmark of the Ramist method. Ramism was especially popular among the Puritans in England and New England.

RANDALL, BENJAMIN (1749-1808). Founder and organizer of Freewill Baptists. Born in New Castle, New Hampshire, he early went to sea with his sailor father, and became a sailmaker. Three sermons by George Whitefield* and the shock of Whitefield's death converted him in 1770. He became a Congregationalist, but immersionist Arminian views led him in 1776 to become a Baptist. He joined in 1778 an Arminian Baptist church in New Durham, New Hampshire, where by 1780 he was ordained and organized a Free Baptist Church. He drew up the covenant which became the basis for the later Freewill Baptist Church. His ardent evangelism won so many that by 1783 he organized a quarterly and in 1792 a yearly meeting of his group. When he died, there were about 6,000 adherents. EARLE E. CAIRNS

RANKE, LEOPOLD VON (1795-1886). Lutheran historian. Born in Saxony, he became professor at the University of Berlin (1825-71), and is most significant in church history for his History of the Popes (2 vols., 8 editions, 1834-85). Although mainly on the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in the last editions it covered the period from the Reformation to the Vatican Council (1869-70). He wrote many other works, especially separate histories of Germany (5 vols., 1839-47), France (5 vols., 1852-61), and England (7 vols., 1859-68), mainly of the Reformation period. He is rightly credited with transforming historiography from polemic to systematic history. This he did through fresh archival work in Italy and Germany and a commitment to write history as a task distinct from apologetics; he tried to be fair to Catholics and the popes. Protestants commonly charged him with favor to Catholics, while Gregory XIV added his work to the Index (1841).

Ranke's histories reflected a distinctive perspective: a Lutheran and Prussian concentration on political and diplomatic affairs led by great figures as the core of history; his treatment of the popes, for example, was largely political. He stood against revolution and secularistic progress, and for the stabilizing hand of the established authorities as rooted in national traditions. He believed in God's Providence in history. The Prussian state named him official historian (1841) and granted him the aristocratic title von (1865) for his efforts. Secular positivists in England wrongly attributed to him a belief in their notion of historical objectivity.

RANTERS. An epithet given to an antinomian movement during the time of the English Commonwealth (mid-seventeenth century). They were part of the effort of the time to restore primitive, apostolic Christianity. This involved a repudiation of the Church of England in its established form and much greater emphasis on individual thought and action. The individualism of the movement tended to produce a great variety of groups around prominent leaders so that England appeared to "swarm with sects." The Ranters, so far as they can be differentiated from this general ferment, showed two marked characteristics: they were pantheistic and antinomian. Joseph Salmon and Jacob Bauthumley represent two characteristic examples of Ranter leaders. Bauthumley wrote The Light and Dark Sides of God (1650) which develops an extreme doctrine of the Inner Light. Salmon authored a strange tract recounting his experience with God and teaching an extreme pantheism. Contemporary writers agreed in the opinion that the Ranters led morally disordered lives and that they considered themselves above the usual distinction of right and wrong. George Fox* wrote against them and converted many to Quakerism. Richard Baxter* also denounced the Ranters. Many of them were severely punished for their immoral and blasphemous acts; thus the movement was suppressed.

RAPHAEL, SANZIO (1483-1520). Renaissance painter. He studied first under his father, and later under Perugia in his native town of Urbino. At Florence he became famous under the tutelage of Leonardo da Vinci* and Michelangelo.* From the former he learned the softness and the sweetness, from the latter the strength and the drama, and from them both the depth of composition and the pyramidal figured masses that characterized virtually all his later works. He continued his study in Rome under these masters, with whom he became linked as symbols of the Renaissance, and in Rome he died. In the main, Raphael's subjects were religious or philosophical and were intentionally symbolic, even allegorical. Thus in his School of Athens, Plato is pictured as a grave old man, pointing upward to the heavenly font of Forms; Aristotle, a vigorous and youthful figure, points downward, whence his truth came. Though Raphael is best known for his Madonnas, his subjects include the whole of the life of Christ. So great has been his influence that the image of Bible personages to our day is the image literally made colorful by the genial and ever-popular Raphael. MILLARD SCHERICH

RAPHAEL THE ARCHANGEL. One of the seven archangels. The name is not found in the canonical writings, but appears in the OT Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. In Tobit 12:15, Raphael described himself as "one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints." In Enoch 10:7 he is described as having healed the earth when it was defiled by the fallen angels; this tradition is based on the meaning of the name Raphael, i.e., "God has healed" (Hebrew). Raphael became canonized in both Eastern and Western churches. Since the sixteenth century he has often figured as the patron of travelers.

RASHDALL, HASTINGS (1858-1924). Anglican moral philosopher and theologian. Educated at Harrow and New College, Oxford, he taught philosophy at Lampeter, Durham, and Oxford. An advanced liberal and moderate High Churchman, he strove to revive the inspiration of the Cambridge Platonists* in contemporary Anglicanism, and deplored the current immanentist theology as well as Inge's* mysticism and Ritschl's* historicism. To many he seemed to deny the validity of religious experience altogether and to profess a cold moralism. A notable book, The Theory of Good and Evil (1907), tried to work out a harmony between Utilitarian and Idealist ethics and adumbrates Rashdall's curious doctrine of a limited God, for God as Personality must be less than the Absolute which contains him. Vice-president of the Modern Churchman's Union from its foundation in 1898, Rashdall delivered the Bampton Lectures on The Idea of the Atonement (1915) which have been called a brilliant restatement of the Abelardian or Exemplarist theory; in fact they combine distorted criticism of Paul, Augustine, and the substitutionary view with a wayward interpretation of Scripture and a doctrine of the Atonement far more rationalistic than Abelard ever professed. RAS SHAMRA TABLETS. The cuneiform documents discovered by archaeologists (from 1929 onward) at the tell of Ras Shamra in N Syria. The site was a major Canaanite city of the third and second millennia B.C., named Ugarit; the city was destroyed in the early twelfth century B.C. by invaders akin to the Philistines. The work of excavation, and of the publication and translation of the many documents found, still continues. The majority of the tablets are in the Ugaritic and Akkadian languages; the former was unknown prior to the discoveries, but although the script (alphabetic cuneiform) was completely new to scholarship, the language itself is NW Semitic, and a very close relative of early Hebrew. Ugaritic lexicography is therefore being increasingly used in the elucidation of biblical Hebrew. For OT study in general, the most valuable Ras Shamra documents are the mythological texts, which have greatly increased our knowledge of Canaanite religious beliefs and practices. D.F. PAYNE

RASTAFARIANS. A Jamaican movement, originating in the early 1930s, placing the political pan-Africanism of Marcus Garvey (1887-1940) in a mythological and messianic setting. Emperor Haile Selassie (Ras Tafari, crowned 1930) is the only true God; Ethiopia is the only heaven. While biblical texts (e.g., Rev. 5:5) are used in support, and modified Methodist and Sankey hymns regularly sung, Rastafarians denounce Christian preachers as false prophets, since the whites have perverted the Scriptures to hide the black identity of Adam, Israel, and Jesus. God's (i.e., Ras Tafari's) parousia to accomplish Black deliverance is imminent; meanwhile political activism is pointless. Rastafarians are predominantly male, bearded, and unkempt, from deprived urban areas with high unemployment. Ganja (marijuana) is greatly valued, and its use ascribed to Solomon. The movement seems to have gained no tangible results from a tour of African states in 1961 or the more recent visit of Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie to Jamaica. A.F. WALLS

RATHERIUS (c.890-974). Bishop and polemicist. Born in Liège of a noble family, his career was filled with polemics. He served sporadically as bishop of Verona (three terms between 931 and 968) and of Liège (953-955). His first stay in Verona ended with imprisonment in Como, from which he escaped in 939; he returned to Lobbes in 944 and to Italy in 946, but became a prisoner of Berengarius until he regained his see in 946. Forced to flee again in 948, he unsuccessfully joined forces with Ludolph of Saxony to reclaim his position. He taught briefly at the cathedral school in Cologne before he was named bishop of Liège. Forced to Lobbes from Verona in 968, he had to retire to the monastery in Aulne, Flanders, where he died. JOHN GROH

RATISBON (Regensburg), COLLOQUY OF (1541). This marked the high point of Charles V's efforts to reconcile the Roman Catholics and Lutherans; it came after the colloquies of Hagenau* and Worms.* Here Melanchthon,* Bucer,* and Pistorius were the spokesmen for the Protestants; for the Roman Catholics, Pflug,* Eck,* and Gropper.* Gropper and Bucer were largely responsible for the Regensburger Buch, which contained twenty-three doctrinal articles. Not much difficulty was experienced in agreeing on the first four articles: Man before the Fall; Free Will; the Cause of Sin; Original Sin. The fifth article, concerning Justification, did not state either Luther's doctrine or the later Tridentine position clearly. Gaspar Cardinal Contarini* endorsed it. In Rome and Wittenberg (by Martin Luther) it was rejected. There was no agreement at Ratisbon on the formulation of the article concerning the church. Melanchthon upheld the Lutheran view of the Lord's Supper. No agreement was reached on other doctrines. The Colloquy of Worms did not succeed in healing the breach between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.

CARL S. MEYER

RATRAMNUS (d. c.868). Early medieval theologian. Little is known of his life. His importance rests on his books and his involvement in a number of theological controversies. His most famous work, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini was written in reaction to a tract on the sacrament written by his former teacher, Radbertus,* which taught an excessively realistic doctrine. Ratramnus emphasized a more symbolic interpretation which denied the identity of Christ's sacramental and historical body. His book was condemned in 1050 as medieval theology moved in the direction of defining the doctrine of transubstantiation.* During the Reformation some of the Reformers cited Ratramnus as a precedent for their teaching, and the book was placed on the Index* in 1559, where it remained until 1900. In 850 Ratramnus wrote De Praedestinatione in support of Gottschalk's position on double predestination.* His last book, Contra Graecorum Opposita, was written at the urging of Nicholas I* and provided a defense of the Latin Church against the attacks of the Eastern Church. He pleaded for unity, but maintained that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Filioque), and he held to the primacy of Rome. RUDOLPH HEINZE

RAUCH, CHRISTIAN HEINRICH (1718-1763). First Moravian missionary to the American Indians. Born in Anhalt, he became a missionary under the Moravians and arrived in New York in 1740. He soon made contact with a group of Mohicans, who accepted his offer to serve as a teacher among them. Rauch located in the village of Shekomeko, and after months of severe hardships baptized several converts in the presence of Count Zinzendorf.* By 1743 the Shekomeko mission prospered, and a chapel was built, but growing white settler opposition resulted in the expulsion of the Moravians and termination of the work by 1746. Rauch then served charges in Pennsylvania and North Carolina for ten years before going to Jamaica, where he spent his last years working among black people.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER (1861-1918). Baptist minister and educator. Born in Rochester, New York, of German immigrant parents, he was early educated in Germany and graduated from Rochester University (1884) and Seminary (1886). His pastorate (1886-97) at the Second German Baptist Church in New York City led him to see the plight not only of immigrants but all classes of society who were socially and economically disadvantaged. He taught NT (1897-1902) and church history (1902-17) at his former seminary, and soon gained a national reputation for strong views on social change. He distinguished his brand of (Christian) socialism from the doctrinaire socialism of Marxism. Democracy to Rauschenbusch was both an economic and a political ideal, but he was not overly optimistic about the realization of these goals in history. There is a more sobering view of sin in his theology. His commitment to social Christianity gained him the title "Father of the Social Gospel in America." His works include Prayers of the Social Awakening (1910), Christianizing the Social Order (1912), and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). He was ostracized for his German ancestry in the years preceding World War I.

DONALD M. LAKE

RAYMOND NONNATUS (1204-1240). Patron saint of midwives. Very little is known about him except what has survived in a sixteenth-century manuscript. He was born in Portello, Spain, and apparently delivered by Caesarean section after his mother's death in childbirth—hence his name "non natus" ("not born"). He was a member of the Order of Our Lady of Ransom which ransomed Christian prisoners on the Barbary coast of North Africa. The Muslims at times subjected him to gross ill-treatment. He persevered in his work, and on one occasion even surrendered himself as surety for the ransom of others. After his return to Spain, Gregory IX made him a cardinal (1239). He died at Cerdagne at the start of a journey to Rome. L. FEEHAN

RAYMOND OF PENAFORT (c.1175-c.1275). Spanish canonist. Born near Barcelona where he studied and taught rhetoric and logic at the cathedral school until 1210, he then left for Bologna, where in 1216 he was appointed professor of law. In 1222 he joined the Dominicans and returned to Spain, where with Peter Nolasco* he helped to found the Mercedarians,* an order dedicated to redeeming Christian captives. He was appointed confessor, chaplain, and grand penitentiary to Gregory IX, who commissioned him to organize the papal decretals, a prodigious task he completed in four years (1234). His Summa de poenitentia, a handbook on penance, exercised a decisive influence on subsequent practice. In 1236 Raymond again returned to Spain where he became general of his order, and in this role reissued the constitutions of the order in definitive form. Resigning from the generalship, and concerned with the conversion of Jews and Muslims, he set up schools for the study of Hebrew and Arabic, and commissioned Thomas Aquinas to write his Summa contra Gentiles. He was canonized by Clement VIII in 1601.

MARY E. ROGERS

RAYMOND OF SEBONDE (fl.1434-36). Spanish physician, philosopher, and theologian. Latterly regius professor of theology at the University of Toulouse, it was there he wrote his major work, Liber naturae sive creaturarum, originally written in Spanish, a landmark in the development of natural theology, though Raymond never employs the term. Influenced by Raymond Lull,* and opposing the position of such thinkers as William of Ockham* that faith and reason, theology and philosophy are irreconcilable, Raymond asserted that the book of nature and the Bible are concordant divine revelations, the one general and the other specific. He claimed to find rational, extrabiblical proof for the basic Christian doctrines, particularly through self-knowledge, since man is the image of God, and made it a practice in his work to cite neither Scripture nor other authorities. The Latin translation was printed repeatedly under the title Theologia naturalis from about 1484, most later editions omitting the Prologus, placed on the Index* in 1595. Montaigne popularized it in a French translation (1569).

MARY E. ROGERS

REBMANN, JOHANNES (1819-1876). German missionary to East Africa.* Born in Württemberg and trained at Basle, he was sent to East Africa by the Church Missionary Society in 1846. With J.L. Krapf* he established the Rabia Mpia mission among the Nyika. He undertook several exploratory journeys, was the first European to see Kilimanjaro (1848), and prepared a map which helped inspire the Burton-Speke expedition (1857). His linguistic studies in three vernaculars laid sound foundations for future workers. After 1855 he was alone at Rabai except for a brief period. In 1875 he returned to Württemberg, blind and broken in health. His death coincided with the effective entry of the CMS into East Africa. D.G.L. CRAGG

RECARED (sixth century). Visigothic king who ruled in Spain from 586 to 601. The younger of two sons, he succeeded his father Leovigild in 586 and set to work at once in crushing several Arian revolts. The Lusitanian peninsula in Portugal was officially Arian until he converted to Roman Catholicism in 586, although the Arian kings had been extraordinarily tolerant. In 589 the Third Council of Toledo proclaimed Catholicism as the kingdom's official religion. Thereafter little was heard of Arianism*; the king ordered Arian books to be burned, and no Gothic text from Spain has survived. With religious barriers removed, the Visigothic invaders and the native Hispano-Romans, who continued to follow Roman law, could assimilate. JOHN GROH

RÉCOLLETS. A reformed branch of the Franciscan* Order, they were asked by Samuel de Champlain* to give aid in the evangelization of the Indians in Canada. In 1615 three fathers and a lay brother arrived in Quebec to begin their devoted and self-sacrificing labors among the Algonquin tribes whose nomadic way of life soon made the fathers despair of their conversion. They decided therefore to seek out more settled tribes and traveled west to labor, with some success, among the Hurons. Financial problems in 1623 forced them to ask the Jesuits for assistance, but cooperation between the two orders was difficult. The Récollets encouraged intermingling of Indians and French and cooperation with the Huguenots* in civil matters; the Jesuits held opposite views. The English in 1629 and again in 1760 put an end to the Récollets' labors, but in each case they returned to continue their Canadian ministries.
ROBERT WILSON

RECTOR. In the Church of England, an incumbent who has charge and care of a parish and, as distinct from a vicar, receives the full amount of the tithe rent therefrom. In the Episcopal churches of Scotland and the USA, the term is used more loosely of the generality of parish priests. In the Roman Catholic Church, a rector is an ecclesiastic in charge of a congregation, an important mission, a college or religious house, especially a Jesuit seminary. In seventeenth-century literature the term is often applied to God Himself as ruler of mankind.

RECUSANTS. The name given to those in England and Wales and Ireland who refused to obey the Act of Uniformity* (1559) which required all subjects to acknowledge Queen Elizabeth as the Supreme Governor of the church and to attend services conducted according to the Prayer Book. The term was derived from the Latin verb recusare, "to refuse." Although at first a fine of one shilling was levied against all those who disobeyed the law, because of threats of Roman Catholic invasions, plots against the queen's life and efforts, particularly in the north of England, to stir up rebellion, the penalties were greatly increased, culminating in death for treason. Numerous civil disabilities were also laid upon recusants, particularly in Ireland, reaching their climax after the "Glorious Revolution of 1688." Not until the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829 were most of the restrictions removed throughout Great Britain. A Roman Catholic still cannot become king or queen by the terms of the coronation oath. W.S. REID

REDACTION CRITICISM, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS, NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM

REDEMPTION. The idea comes from legal and religious transactions in OT life. The firstborn male child was regarded as uniquely owed to God, unless he was redeemed by some kind of sacrifice. The Hebrew root word used for this kind of redemption was padah (Exod. 13:13; Num. 18:25ff.). By payment of a price of redemption a man could save his own life from being forfeited if his ox killed another man (Exod. 21:30). Within family life, redemption (root ga'al) was a process by which, if a man had forfeited property or had himself fallen into slavery, what was lost could be brought back to its true ownership or liberty through repurchase (Lev. 25:25; Ruth 4:4-6). The redeemer was in this case the next of kin who thus protected and upheld the rights of the unfortunate relative. Sometimes the obligation to redeem a kinsman in this way meant avenging him of wrongs committed against him. The essential purpose of redemption was therefore deliverance from loss or bondage.

When God is described in the OT as bringing about the redemption of Israel, the phrase is to be interpreted by such analogies, especially by that of the kinsman-redeemer. In this role God effects the redemption of His people from Egypt (Deut. 9:26) and from Babylon (Isa. 43:1). Indeed, God is given the name of the "Redeemer." The redemptive action of God in these great historical events is regarded as a sign that His redeeming hand can extend in the same way over sin, evil powers, and even death (Isa. 33:22f.; Ps. 130:8). It is recognized too that His redemptive activity is also exercised toward the individual when he is involved in a helpless struggle with life's varied ills (2 Sam. 4:9, 10; Ps. 34:22).

Redemption, in the NT, describes an aspect of salvation. The use of the word reminds us that Christ has come to free man from the control of every alien power, from all the tyrannies that oppress the individual and cast a blight upon his life, and from all iniquity (Titus 2:14; cf. Rom. 7). It includes the redemption of the body (Rom. 8:23; cf. Phil. 3:4). Though the price of this redemption has been fully paid, and the immediate fruits of this payment are fully enjoyed in reconciliation with God, the full enjoyment of the ultimate fruits of redemption must wait until the Second Coming (Eph. 4:30; Rom. 8:23).

Jesus regarded His healing of the sick, casting out of devils, and raising of the dead as signs of the redemptive aspect of His work. He described Himself as the Son of Man who came "to give his life a ransom [lutron] for many" (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45). In this description he seems to have had in mind the suffering servant of Isaiah 53, whose life was yielded up as a vicarious sacrifice to bring healing and liberty to many. The suggestion is that Jesus' own sufferings and death as a substitutionary sacrifice pay the cost of man's redemption. The OT recognizes that any act of redemption carried out with what any mere man has to offer, even though he gives his best, is totally inadequate to meet the deepest human need (Ps. 49:7,8). But God is willing to lavish what He has, regardless of cost (Isa. 43:3ff.), to win His people back to Himself. It is in this context that the NT speaks of the blood of Christ, i.e., the offering of His obedient life poured out in death, as the cost of our redemption (1 Pet. 1:18, 19; Rom. 3:24, 25; Heb. 9:14).

REDEMPTORISTS. A name commonly given to the "Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer," a community of priests and lay brothers, founded by Alphonsus Maria di Liguori* at Scala, Italy, in 1732 for mission work among the poor. It has steadfastly refused to engage in purely educational activities. Its purpose is the sanctification of members through the imitation of Christ and through preaching. The order received papal approval in 1749, and a community of nuns (the Redemptorines, also founded by Alphonsus) was approved in 1750. Under Clement Hofbauer* the Redemptorists moved across the Alps into N Europe, and they entered the USA in 1832 and England in 1843. They are governed by a "Rector Major" who holds office for life and resides in Rome. J.G.G. NORMAN

REES, THOMAS (1815-1885). Welsh religious historian. He was born at Penpontbren, Carmarthenshire. His only formal education was three months of elementary school. He became a coal miner at Aberdare in 1835, but soon gave it up and opened a school. He was ordained in 1836 minister at the Congregational church at Craig-y-fargod, Merthyr Tydfil, and supplemented the stipend of ten shillings a month which he received from the twelve members of the church by opening a shop. This proved a failure, and he suffered a week's imprisonment as a debtor. His fortunes revived, however, and his subsequent career as a minister was a distinguished one. He ministered at Aberdare, Siloa (Llanelli), Beaufort, and finally at Ebenezer, Swansea (1861-85). He was twice elected to the chair of the Union of Welsh Independents and, in 1885, to the chair of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, but died before taking up his duties.

He was a prolific writer, but his most substantial contribution was in historical studies. He is best known to English readers for his History of Protestant Nonconformity in Wales (1861, extended in the 1883 edition). He was also coauthor with John Thomas of Liverpool (1821-92) of a four-volume history of the Welsh Congregational churches (to which Thomas added a fifth volume in 1891). When it is recalled that Thomas Rees was virtually self-educated, his work as a historian is outstanding. He had a gift for discovering manuscript sources at a time when their significance for historical study was not generally appreciated. Unfortunately he was cavalier in his use of them. He would abbreviate or omit passages without warning as the whim took him, and his strong prejudices in favor of Congregationalism and moderate Calvinism often tempted him to interpret evidence in a tendentious fashion. But when all his faults are admitted, his historical writing is still of great use and interest to the student of modern Welsh religious history.

Rees possessed a winsome personality and was in great demand as a preacher whose sermons never failed to move the hearts of the large congregations that loved to hear him. His hymns still find a place in the collections of the various churches. R. TUDUR JONES

REES, THOMAS BONNER (1911-1970). English evangelist. Born in Blackburn and converted in his teens, he immediately engaged in active evangelism and subsequently became youth organizer and lay worker at St. Nicholas' (Anglican) Church, Sevenoaks. He also joined with the Church Pastoral Aid Society in arranging camps for London slum boys. After leaving Sevenoaks he conducted many united missions in Northern Ireland, where thousands were converted. For several years he served on the staff of the Scripture Union. After World War II he conducted fifty-four mass rallies in the Royal Albert Hall, London, and campaigns in a number of major British cities. He went to America more than fifty times for campaigns, Bible conferences, and church retreats, and he was a speaker at the famous conventions at Keswick and Portstewart. He founded successively three conference centers, and the work at Hildenborough Hall is continued by his son Justyn as a memorial to his work. Among Tom Rees's written works was Breakthrough, a complete handbook on home evangelism. J.D. DOUGLAS

REES, WILLIAM (1802-1883). Welsh Congregational minister, author, and social leader, better known by his pen name, "Gwilym Hiraethog." Born at Llansannan, Denbighshire, Rees obtained his only formal education in a few terms at the local school. He spent his early years as a farm laborer and shepherd. This did not prevent him from acquiring a considerable amount of the literary culture that was available to him in the Welsh language. He became a Congregational minister and served at Mostyn (1831-37); Denbigh (1837-43); Tabernacle, Liverpool (1843-53); and Salem, Liverpool, until his retirement in 1875. Rees provides the most vivid example of the way in which evangelical Christianity in its Calvinistic form inspired cultural and political activity of a radical kind in nineteenth-century Wales. He was one of the most powerful preachers of the midcentury and no mean theologian when it is recalled that he had no formal training in its study. His little catechism (Y Cyfarwyddwr, 1833) proved popular and influenced the minds of many young people. He wrote a treatise on natural and revealed religion in 1841, most of which is devoted to an exposition of the divine authority of Scripture.

Like many Victorians, Rees was a man of boundless energy. He published a vast amount of poetry—his hymn "Dyma gariad fel y moroedd" became a kind of "signature-tune" during the 1904-5 Welsh Revival—but much the greater part of his work has not survived the test of time. His prose works are now of more interest, and in this field again he was a prolific author. His most influential work was done as an editor. He edited the newspaper Yr Amserau ("The Times") from 1843 to 1852, and in articles cast in the form of an old countryman's letters he introduced the main themes of radical politics to Welsh readers. He was also one of the founding fathers of modern Welsh nationalism. He corresponded with the Italian patriot Mazzini, and a Hungarian deputation visited him to express gratitude for the support he had given Kossuth. William Rees was one of the key figures in linking the evangelical churches of Wales with what later became Liberalism, but unlike that of some of his contemporaries, his theological and religious enthusiasm was not overshadowed by social interests.

REFORMATION, THE. A broad term used to denote a religious movement in Western Christendom which arose about 1500 and culminated around the mid-seventeenth century, with direct antecedents going back to the fourteenth century. Although conditioned by political, economic, social, and intellectual factors, the course of events and the writings of the Reformers themselves reveal that it was above all else a religious revival which had as its goal Christian renewal.

The Reformation occurred against a vast backdrop of unrest and change in Europe. Politically the most salient feature of the era was the emergence of national states which challenged the old order, including traditional papal prerogatives and the medieval concept of higher loyalties. In the economic realm it was a time of mounting discontent among the exploited peasantry as well as a period of revival of trade, the return of the money economy, and the growth of cities. These developments brought into existence a virile new socioeconomic class, the bourgeoisie. This upset tidy medieval social arrangements and led to increasing political tensions because of the rising expectations of the middle class. Further, beginning in the fourteenth century, the Renaissance* produced a new era of cultural achievement and expression, as well as widespread intellectual unrest. Moreover, a high moral sentiment, the desire for a restoration of past greatness, and growing racial and ethnic pride are common themes in the pre-Reformation literature of discontent.

But most important of all was the troubled state of the Western Church on the eve of the Reformation. It was an age of decline for a church faced with persistent heresy (e.g., the Waldenses* in the Alps, the Lollards* in England, and the Hussites [see HUS, JAN] in Bohemia); an outburst of popular piety (e.g., the flowering of German mysticism and the preaching of Savonarola* in Florence); a loss of papal credibility resulting from the years of "Babylonian Captivity"* in Avignon, the Great Schism* which followed, and a secularized Renaissance papacy; widespread clerical ignorance and abuse; and the unrelenting insistence of the Christian humanists that the church be reformed. Thus the seeds for Reformation in the sixteenth century were nurtured in the fallow soil of discontent at nearly every level of human existence.

The actual beginning of the Protestant Reformation in 1517 in Germany was a combination of the confluence of events with a man of dynamic personality, considerable talent, and deep religious concerns. In the coming of the Reformation, Martin Luther* was the catalytic individual, and the sale of indulgences* near his parish at Wittenberg the precipitating event. Convinced that it was time to challenge the perversion of the doctrine of indulgences and the papal authority which made such abuses possible, Luther drafted his Ninety-Five Theses for debate among theologians. At the time, he had no thought of disrupting the church or starting a new religious movement. Rather, his concern flowed from his desire to reform the church and his conviction that it had departed from its apostolic foundations. Luther, in a desperate search for personal peace with God, had found it, not in the sacraments or the works of merit prescribed by the church, but in Jesus Christ. Luther had recovered, he maintained, NT Christianity with its prescription of salvation by grace through faith in Christ, and not by works of righteousness (sola fide).

Thus Luther never espoused a radical rupture with the church's immediate past or its abolition as an institution as did the Anabaptists,* but only reform based on apostolic principles. Nevertheless, a combination of papal inability to comprehend the nature and intensity of the religious issues raised by Luther and of the temper of the times led to a breach between Rome and the German priest. After several debates over papal authority, and after attempts to reconcile and then coerce Luther, the fundamental differences between Roman and Lutheran Christianity became increasingly clear. The Reformation spread with the preaching of justification* through faith in Christ, and Luther's doctrinal position developed more fully to include biblical authority in the place of the teaching church as mediated by the pope, the priesthood of the believer, and two rather than seven sacraments. After his confrontation with the emperor and church authorities at Worms* in 1521 in which Luther refused to recant his views, the rupture was complete.

By 1529, when the imperial diet convened at Speyer,* six German princes and the representatives of fourteen upper German cities embraced the name "Protestant" ("protesting" the emperor's attempts to suppress Luther) and identified themselves as adherents of the Reformation. Luther's own town of Wittenberg in Saxony became the center of the movement which had by the time of the Reformer's death spread to every German-speaking land. By midcentury the Lutheran Church had taken form and become the dominant faith of much of Germany and most of Scandinavia. It also had by this time made a significant impact on the religious life of the remainder of Europe.

Ulrich Zwingli* of Zurich was one of those touched by the Lutheran Reformation. Guided partly by Luther and partly by his own biblical insights, Zwingli introduced the Reformation in his native canton. Gradually the movement spread westward through German Switzerland, finally reaching the French cantons, where John Calvin* became its leader. Calvinism* became the most important expression of the Reformation, historically speaking, and by the middle of the century Geneva replaced Wittenberg as the main center of the Protestant world. In the last half of the sixteenth century Calvinism became the driving force of the Reformation, especially in Switzerland, W Germany, France,* the Netherlands and Scotland, and to a lesser extent in England, E Germany, Hungary,* and Poland.*

Calvinism triumphed in Scotland largely because of the work of John Knox,* who was the guiding spirit behind the Scots Confession* adopted by the Parliament of that land in 1560. Knox, impressed by Calvin's example, established the church of Scotland* on Presbyterian polity and Calvinist theology while at the same time linking the fortunes of the Reformation as closely as possible with growing Scottish national feeling against the Roman Catholic Mary, Queen of Scots.*

In England the fortunes of Calvinism were more varied. The development of the English Reformation was uneven compared with the reform movement in other countries. Beginning as an act of state in 1534 when Henry VIII* severed connections with Rome and assumed the title of Supreme Head of the Church, the Reformation soon became a genuine attempt to restore the ancient Christian faith to England. Building on the work of John Wycliffe* and his Lollards, the English Christian humanists, and imported Lutheran and Calvinist ideas, the Church of England* began to take shape. More thoroughgoing reform during the reign of Edward VI* was erased by Mary Tudor* when she tried to restore the English Church to the Roman fold. Her attempt failed, and under Elizabeth I* the Church of England once and for all became non-Roman, but not entirely Protestant. Rather, it developed as a via media between the former Roman faith on one hand and Protestant Calvinism on the other.

Often overlooked as an important part of the Reformation are the Radical Reformers. These advocates of the Radical Reformation* appeared early in the sixteenth century, represented the left wing of the movement away from Rome, and emphasized "restitution" rather than "reformation." Anabaptists and other Radicals to their left wanted to abolish all the accumulated practices, traditions, and ceremonies of the medieval Catholic Church and instead build a restored church entirely on NT principles. The majority of Anabaptists felt the true church was local, autonomous, governed by democratic polity, and composed only of heartfelt believers who had been baptized after their confession of faith in Jesus Christ.

Although there were a few notable exceptions, such as the fanatical millenarians of Münster (1534-35) and the unitarian Socinians,* most Radicals did not participate in politics and were pacifists. They were also the first in modern times to call for full religious liberty and separation of church and state. After 1535, Menno Simons* a former Roman priest, emerged as the primary leader of the Anabaptists in the Low Countries.* Gradually mainstream Anabaptists became known as "Mennonites."* Other enduring expressions of the Radical Reformation include the Hutterites* and Schwenkfelders,* while the Baptists* and Quakers* of the next century grew out of related and similar foundational principles and impulses.

Finally, the Catholic Reformation represented an attempt to renew the established church from within, both in reaction to the Protestant threat and in response to certain internal developments. The Oratory of Divine Love (founded 1517), a reformed papacy, the establishment of the Jesuits* (1540), the reforming Council of Trent* (1545-63), the Roman Inquisition, and Spanish mysticism were all expressions of this growing emphasis on reform, renewal, and retrenchment within the Roman Church (see COUNTER-REFORMATION).

Unlike the Renaissance, the Reformation directly affected nearly every European and forced almost everyone to make a choice between the old and the new. As it did, the Reformation movement profoundly changed the course of Western civilization and touched every facet of human existence. The modern, pluralistic, culturally fragmented Western World, for better or for worse, is largely the child of this tumultuous and significant movement.

REFORMED CHURCHES. Those ecclesiastical bodies or denominations which hold to the system of doctrine and government or polity as set out by John Calvin* in the sixteenth century, and expressed in various "Reformed" confessions. They include the Calvinistic churches deriving from Europe which are specifically known as "Reformed," as well as the "Presbyterian" churches of the English-speaking world. Some Baptist churches claim to be Reformed in doctrine, and some Anglicans also hold that the Church of England is "Reformed," a position denied by the Anglo-Catholics. In 1875 the Alliance of Reformed Churches was formed and still exists; the Reformed Ecumenical Synod was later established, made up of churches not in the Alliance.

REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. Known also as the Dutch Reformed Church,* this was one of the continental groups transplanted to the United States. It came with the original Dutch settlers to New Amsterdam, but the first congregation was not organized by Jonas Michaelius until 1628. During the seventeenth century it received much strength from the flow of Dutch to the colony, but it remained dependent on the church in the Netherlands for its ministers. The change to English rule in 1664 had little effect on the church, and the harmony between the church in the colonies and the classis of Amsterdam prevailed until after 1700.

With the arrival of T.J. Frelinghuysen* in 1720 and the Great Awakening,* tension developed between opponents and proponents of the revival. Frelinghuysen and his group felt that the church in the colonies should not be dependent on the Netherlands and should train its own ministers. As a result, the classis of Amsterdam finally agreed to the creation of a subordinate assembly, or coetus, which in 1770 obtained a charter for and organized Queen's College (now Rutgers) which after the revolution emerged as a college for the training of Christian ministers. Hope College in Michigan was chartered in 1866. In 1794 a general synod based on the Constitution of 1792 was formed from the various particular synods. During the nineteenth century the church expanded westward to Illinois, Michigan, and the Pacific coast and Canada. In 1867 it became known as the Reformed Church in America. It is Calvinistic in theology and Presbyterian in government.

REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH. This schism from the Protestant Episcopal Church* in America was founded by G.D. Cummins,* its first presiding bishop, in 1873, because of deep dissatisfaction with the rising ritualism and sacerdotalism among American Episcopalians. Their bishops trace their consecration from Canterbury, yet are not a third order in addition to deacons and presbyters, but rather first among equals. Its government involves much lay participation at all levels. Clergy from other groups are received without reordination, and laity without reconfirmation. Their Book of Common Prayer of 1874 is based on the Prayer Book of 1785, the colonial church's revision of the BCP under Bishop William White. Their doctrine of ministry is Reformed in that the minister is a minister of Word and sacrament rather than a mediator. Absolution, baptismal regeneration, and transubstantiation are not held, and the Prayer Book contains their own 1873 Declaration of Principles and Articles of Religion. It is an American church, divided into the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, the Synod of Chicago, and the Jurisdiction of the South, each with its own bishop. A few parishes exist in Canada and England (Free Church of England*). The total American membership is a little over 7,000. Its theological seminary is located in Philadelphia.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. A body which claims unbroken descent from the Scottish Covenanters* who contended for a pure Gospel, a simple form of worship, national righteousness, and civil and religious freedom. The name indicates that in the matter of church government it is Presbyterian, and in doctrine and practice adheres to the attainments of Scotland's Second Reformation (1638-49). After 1690 the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Scotland consisted of the remnant societies that had adhered to Richard Cameron* and James Renwick.* They had no minister until 1706, and from then until 1743 only John MacMillan served their needs. A second minister enabled them to form a presbytery in 1743, and an increase in numbers led to the forming of a synod in 1811. Ministers were trained at a theological hall in Stirling and Paisley. Dissension on the question of the parliamentary elective franchise split the church in 1863, and the majority who favored leaving the matter an open question joined the Free Church of Scotland* in 1876. A small denomination of five congregations still survives and adheres to the Covenanting position.

The origin of the church in Ireland is related to the coming of Scottish settlers to Ulster in the early seventeenth century. The majority of them approved of the Presbyterian form of church government and signed the Solemn League and Covenant* in 1644. At the Revolution Settlement of 1690 a small minority adhered to Covenanting principles and became the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Ireland. They had no minister after the death of David Houston in 1696 and were dependent on visits from Scottish ministers until William Martin was ordained in 1757. In 1763 a presbytery was formed, and rapid growth after 1800 led to the formation of a synod in 1811. For many years their ministers were educated in Scotland, but a theological hall was established in 1854 and still operates with four part-time professors.

The two churches in Scotland and Ireland united to begin mission work in Syria in 1871. After almost a century in the Middle East, the mission field has since 1963 been Ethiopia. Close links are maintained with the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, organized by settlers from Scotland and Ulster in the mid-eighteenth century. Despite divisions and secessions the church still maintains a witness with about seventy congregations. It supports a theological seminary at Pittsburgh, a liberal arts college at Beaver Falls, and active missions in Cyprus and Japan.

The church accepts the continuing obligation of the Scottish Covenants. In worship the Psalms only are sung without instrumental accompaniment. Members do not participate actively in politics and do not join societies which require an oath of secrecy at initiation. The doctrinal standards are the Westminster Confession of Faith* and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. Total membership with adherents is estimated at 20,000. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

REGENERATION. A supernatural work of the Holy Spirit in the individual heart in which a new and holy spiritual life is imparted. The actual term occurs only twice in the NT (Matt. 19:28; Titus 3:5 KJV), and in the first of these it refers not to the individual but to the universe. The idea represented by the word is frequent, however (e.g., John 1:12ff.; 3:1-10; Gal. 4:23,29; James 1:15-18; 1 Peter 1:3,23; 1 John 2:29). Moreover, the ideas of spiritual resurrection, new creation, and circumcision of the heart are further figurative expressions conveying the same idea of an act of God involving a decisive break with the past. The language used brings out its supernatural character. There has been controversy as to the relation of regeneration to baptism and to conversion. Evangelicals see baptism as the sign and seal of regeneration while Roman Catholics see it also as conveying the regenerating grace it signifies. Calvinists see regeneration as the cause of conversion (repentance and faith) while Arminians see conversion as the cause of regeneration.

REGINALD OF PIPERNO (c.1230-c.1290). Theologian. Born in Italy, he joined the Dominican Order at Naples and around 1260 became the confessor of Thomas Aquinas* as well as his constant companion. In 1272 he took a teaching post in Naples, succeeding Thomas in the chair of philosophy in 1274. He zealously collected Thomas's works, including the four Opuscula which he recorded from his master's lectures.

REGULAR (Lat. regula, "rule"). General term for members of the clergy who are bound by the vows of religion and live in community, following a "rule," in distinction from the "secular" clergy, i.e., priests living in the world. Monastic "rules" go back as far as Pachomius* (c.305); one of the most influential was that of Benedict of Nursia* (529).

REICHSBISCHOF. Protestant church office in Nazi Germany. Following Hitler's accession to power, many churchmen favored uniting the twenty-eight separate provincial churches into one with a national (Reich) bishop as head. The pro-Nazi German-Christians* supported the candidacy of Ludwig Müller (1883-1945) for the post, but he lost the election in 1933 to Friedrich von Bodelschwingh,* director of the Bethel charitable foundation in Westphalia. The German-Christians, with Nazi support, forced his resignation, and Müller was elected later that year at a national synod in Wittenberg. The Nazis soon abandoned the German-Christians, and with the creation of the Ministry of Church Affairs in 1935 the reichbishop was deprived of any effective authority. RICHARD V. PIERARD

REIMARUS, HERMANN SAMUEL (1694-1768). German scholar. Born in Hamburg, he was educated at Jena, taught philosophy at Wittenberg, and in England came under the influence of the English Deists. He was rector of the Hochschule at Wismar (1723-27) before becoming professor of Hebrew and oriental languages in the Gymnasium Johanneum in Hamburg. He published works on Dio Cassius, logic, and the instincts of animals, and worked from 1744 on a comprehensive study which remains as a whole only in manuscript (perhaps because of its controversial content), though segments of its 4,000 pages were published piecemeal and anonymously after his death under the title Wolfenbüttel Fragments. One published fragment, "The Object of Jesus and His Disciples," provided a perspective on Jesus which was to revolutionize the image of Him in modern theology, and to become the point of departure for A. Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus. Though Reimarus's historical reconstruction was too influenced by Deistic rationalism concerned to eliminate the miraculous, he was one of the few in the history of Christian thought to identify correctly that Jesus had proclaimed the nearness of the messianic age to the Jews. Reimarus's efforts, were premature, since his generation was not prepared to break its traditional conception of the preaching of Jesus for a consideration of an imminent eschatological expectation.

REINKENS, JOSEPH HUBERT (1821-1896). Old Catholic* bishop. Born at Burtscheid, near Aix-la-Chapelle, he was professor of church history (1850) and rector (1865) at Breslau University. He opposed the Vatican Council* definition of papal infallibility (1870), joining J.J.I. von Döllinger* in the Nuremberg Declaration. Excommunicated, he was elected the first bishop of the German Old Catholics at Cologne (1873), with his see at Bonn. Consecrated by Bishop Hermann Heykamp of Deventer of the Old Catholic Church of Utrecht, he in turn consecrated Edward Herzog as the first Swiss Old Catholic bishop (1876). He took a prominent part in the Bonn* Reunion Conferences (1874-75) and devoted the rest of his life to the Old Catholic cause. He visited England (1881) and defended the validity of Anglican orders against the Dutch Old Catholics (1894). He wrote a treatise on Cyprian and the unity of the church (1875). J.G.G. NORMAN

REITZENSTEIN, RICHARD (1861-1931). German historian of religions and classical philologist. Beginning in 1889 he held several posts in German universities; from 1914 he taught at the University of Göttingen. After spending some years studying philology, he developed an interest in applying its methodology to the study of ancient religions, particularly the origins of Christianity. Interested in the Hermetic* literature, he attempted in Poimandres (1904) to show that the religion devoted to Hermes Trismegistus had some influence on early Christianity. Broadening his attempt to show Christian dependence on Gnosticism and mystery-religions, he published in 1910 Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, and in 1916 Historia Monachorum und Historia Lausiaca. Such attempts did not win much scholarly acceptance. KEITH J. HARDMAN

RELICS. According to Roman Catholics, the material remains of a saint and any other objects which have had contact with him. These are to be venerated on the grounds that the bodies of the saints, now with Christ, were once living members of the church and temples of the Holy Ghost, destined to be raised to eternal life and glorification. Since the Godhead makes them the occasion for miracles, they are to be venerated by the faithful for in this way God bestows many gifts on men. Biblical justification for this cult is sought in Acts 19:12, where healing power is shown to be in handkerchiefs which had been in touch with Paul's body. OT references are also cited (e.g., 2 Kings 2:14; 13:21, where miracles are said to have occurred through Elijah's mantle and Elisha's bones).

The earliest classical instance of the veneration of relics is said to be found in a letter written by the inhabitants of Smyrna about 156, describing the death of Polycarp* in which they said, "We took up his bones, which are more valuable than precious stones and finer than refined gold, and laid them in a suitable place, where the Lord will permit us to gather ourselves together, as we are able, in gladness and joy, and to celebrate the birthday of his martyrdom." The cult spread rapidly in both East and West, and the increasing demand for relics which arose led in the East to the translating and dismemberment of the bodies of the saints. In 1084 the Council of Constantinople approved the veneration of relics for the Eastern Church, although it has always been overshadowed by the widespread use of icons. At Rome the cult was associated with the prayer services held in the catacombs (burial places for Christians), and from the fourth century the Eucharist was celebrated over the tombs of the martyrs. Unlike the East where no repugnance was felt over dismemberment, in Rome the Theodosian Code expressly forbade the translation, division, or dismemberment of the remains of the martyrs. The practice was, however, introduced in the West in the seventh and eighth centuries. The Council of Nicea* (787) decreed that no church should be consecrated without relics. The Crusades* gave a special impetus to the cult since relics, often spurious, were brought back in abundance from Palestine to Europe.

The cult has often been associated with superstitious practices, inevitable perhaps because of the influx of converted pagans into the church. Veneration of relics is said to be a primitive instinct of man and has been associated with many non-Christian religions such as Buddhism. The very nature of the cult lends itself to abuses, and with religious centers eager to be known as possessors of some unusually startling relic, fabrications were inevitable. The ecclesiastical authorities have made some efforts to secure the faithful against deception. Canon law forbids relics to be venerated which have not been authorized by a cardinal or bishop, and the sale of genuine relics as well as fabrications or distributions of false ones is punished by excommunication. It is still true, however, that many of the ancient relics exhibited for veneration in the great sanctuaries of Christendom are open to grave suspicion.

RELIEF CHURCH. Formed in Scotland in 1761 by Thomas Gillespie* and two other ministers, "for Christians oppressed in their Church privileges." The reference is to those who had been compelled to accept a minister appointed by the patron, contrary to their wishes. Gillespie had been deposed by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland for his support of the town council, kirk session, and members of the parish of Inverkeithing who protested against the patron's choice of minister there. In 1766 it is reported that the Relief Church and the Associate Synods drew as many as 100,000 to their places of worship. In 1847 there was a union with the United Secession Church* to form the United Presbyterian Church.* J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

RELIQUARY. A box, shrine, or casket used to keep or display a relic.* In the early Middle Ages the supernatural power of the unseen world was viewed as accessible to men in relics. Appropriately encased, they were carried by armies and noblemen and hidden in royal crowns and necklaces, which served as reliquaries. Charlemagne's throne, built to the specifications of Solomon's, was filled with cavities for the deposit of relics. Treaties were signed and oaths taken on reliquaries. St. Louis built Saint-Chapelle in Paris as a reliquary to house the crown of thorns purchased from Baldwin II of Constantinople after he used the item as collateral to secure a Venetian loan. Pilgrims were drawn to Canterbury, Compostela in Spain, Regensburg, Alt-Ötting in Bavaria, and other places by reliquaries and their contents.

JOHN GROH

REMBRANDT VAN RIJN (1606-1669). Dutch painter. Nurtured in the humanistic culture of Holland's "golden age," at Leyden University, he broke young into the fashionable art patronage circle with his group portrait, The Anatomy Lesson of Dr. Tulp (1632). From the time of his marriage to Saskia till her early death (1634-42), Rembrandt flourished by painting life-size portraits, biblical story topics, and fantastic landscapes in the fashionable Baroque manner; touches of oriental exotica and his own genial, somewhat darker chiaroscuro gave the vigorous, framebursting action or penetrating character study an extra dimension of aplomb—e.g., the éclat of the wall-size masterpiece, Night Watch (1642).

Thereafter the paintings grew with a darkling mysteriousness, so that the golden light spots did not dramatize external features and events so much as illumine covert meanings, depths deeper than meets the eye. That warm black, which Picasso has said he covets to have painted, leaves behind mythological fantasies and rules out mere sense perception; the darkness of Rembrandt's later portraits reveals the creatural truth of how men can suffer misfortune while still believing in the presence of God. The stern look of authority determined to be just, the pensive tenderness of an ennobling sadness, and the ache of life's troubled happiness come through again and again in the enormously richly colored, almost sketching, heavy brush strokes or thick impasto scraped away by Rembrandt's palette knife; see, for example, Man With a Gilt Helmet (1652), Bathsheba After the Bath (1654), Saul and David (c.1660). Other late works like the glorious Flayed Ox (1655, in the Louvre), the famous Syndics of the Cloth Guild (1662), and the unforgettable (Jewish) Bridal Couple (c.1665) show a dimension of insight not surpassed in the history of painting.

The truth rediscovered by the Reformation—that men in our sin-filled world can still disclose the handiwork of God, and that vocation, God's calling man to a task, is an intangible but everlasting reality, and that Grace can be inside daily human life, sanctifying matters as normal and pervasive as work and marriage—Rembrandt softly and masterfully paints for men with eyes to see.

CALVIN SEERVELD

REMIGIUS (Remi) (c.438-c.533). Archbishop of Reims and "Apostle of the Franks." Son of a count of Laon, he was proclaimed archbishop of Reims at age twenty-two. In 496 he had his greatest achievement—the baptism of Clovis,* king of the Franks, and 3,000 of his subjects after the battle of Tolbiac. Various legends are associated with the relationship of Remigius and Clovis, e.g., that the bishop conferred on the king the power of "touching for the king's evil." By his untiring efforts he also founded bishoprics at Arras, Cambrai, Laon, Térouanne, and Tournai, and sent missionaries to the Arians in Burgundy. His remains were transferred to the Abbey of St. Remi by Leo IX in 1049. PETER TOON

REMIGIUS OF AUXERRE (c.841-908). Leader in the later Carolingian Renaissance.* He was educated at the Benedictine monastery of St. Germain at Auxerre, where he later taught. He taught also at Reims and made a significant contribution to the revival of classical learning which had been begun during the reign of Charlemagne. He wrote glosses and commentaries on a number of Latin authors, including Virgil and Terence. In addition, he wrote a commentary on Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae, and homilies on the gospel of Matthew.

REMONSTRANTS; REMONSTRANCE (1610). The Remonstrants were a revisionist group in Dutch Calvinism, associated with the controversies leading to the Synod of Dort* (1618-19), and there condemned. They were followers of Arminius (Hermandszoon), whose teachings at the theological faculty at Leyden aroused extensive controversy. After Arminius's death in 1609, Uytenbogaert took the lead in drawing up the Remonstrance of 1610, directed to the Estates of the province of Holland (where Leyden was located), and presenting the positions of the Arminian* party. The Remonstrance sets forth five points, all dealing with Arminius's attempt to soften the orthodox Calvinist idea of predestination and save something of man's free will. It holds that the decree of predestination is not absolute, but conditioned on man's response; that the offer of salvation is directed to all men, and all men in principle can be saved; that man can exercise his free will properly only after receiving grace; but, that this grace can be accepted or denied; thus, believers can fall from grace.

Acceptance of these points would have meant revising the Belgic Confession* and the Heidelberg Catechism,* generally accepted as doctrinal standards by the Dutch Calvinist churches. The Remonstrance provoked the Contra-Remonstrance of 1611, setting forth the orthodox position; to the Contra-Remonstrants it seemed as though a Semi-Pelagian* position was clearly proposed, and thus the assurance of salvation taken away. The controversy became mixed with political issues; the Remonstrants were supported by the powerful Oldenbarneveldt, but opposed by the stadhouder Maurice of Orange. The Estates-General issued edicts forbidding further controversy; these were ignored. By 1618 the political struggle was ended with the imprisonment of Oldenbarneveldt, and the Estates called the Synod of Dort to settle the religious issue. Deprived of their chief political supporter, the Remonstrants were helpless, and the synod speedily declared their teachings erroneous. Remonstrant minsters, some 200, were ousted from their pulpits, and many exiled for disturbing the peace. Uytenbogaert and Episcopius* established the Remonstrant Brotherhood, starting with the ousted ministers, and at the death of Maurice in 1625 the Remonstrants were again tolerated. A seminary was founded at Amsterdam (1630), with Episcopius as its leading figure, becoming steadily more "liberal" as time went on, under the able theologians Courcelles (d.1659), Limborch (d.1712), Leclerc* (d.1736), and Wettstein* (d.1754). During the 1700s the Remonstrants declined in numbers, losing members to Socinianism and Deism. During the later 1800s, however, as many found the Dutch Reformed Church too orthodox for their taste, they enjoyed a modest growth. The seminary was moved to Leyden in 1873. Present membership is over 25,000.

RENAISSANCE, THE. A term used by historians to describe a special period of European history, roughly the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. Etymologically the word itself is French for "rebirth," meaning in general a revival of culture, although most historians today tend to see it more as an age of movements and accelerated transition rather than one of sharp departure from the medieval past.

The Renaissance began in Italy with a renewal of interest in the study of the classics known as "humanism." Thus, intellectually the Renaissance was a period of intense study of both the form and content of classical texts. Petrarch* (d.1374) is generally thought of as the "first humanist," followed by a host of other brilliant men of letters: Giovanni Boccaccio (d.1375), Lorenzo Valla* (d.1457), and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola* (d.1494), to name a few. The focus of this classical revival in Italy was more on man and his relation to the present material world than on God and the world to come, as had been true in the medieval past. But above all, the Italian Renaissance was a time of supreme cultural achievement. It was a period studded with geniuses and men of influence: Leon Battista Alberti (d.1472), Leonardo da Vinci* (d.1519), Raphael* (d.1520), Niccolò Machiavelli (d.1527), Michelangelo* (d.1564), and Benvenuto Cellini (d.1571), for example.

As the Renaissance moved north of the Alps in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, it became more religious in tone and emphasis. The majority of northern humanists were more interested in the Christian classics (e.g., the NT and the Fathers) than in pagan texts. They also were concerned with reforming the church according to apostolic principles. Because of their desire to apply humanism to the question of reform, these northern scholars generally are called "Christian humanists." Among their number were John Colet* (d.1519), Johannes Reuchlin* (d.1522), Thomas More* (d.1535), Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples* (d.1536), and the great Erasmus* (d.1536).

Although the question of the exact relationship between the Renaissance and the Protestant Reformation is still debated, it is clear that the former movement affected the course of Christian history in several important ways. First, Renaissance attitudes, values, and practices penetrated the Roman hierarchy in this period. By the time Martin Luther* (d.1546) drafted his Ninety-Five Theses in 1517, the papal chair had a long history of occupants insensitive to the spiritual needs of the faithful and more interested in real estate than reform, more concerned with politics than piety. Second, the Christian humanists' sharp criticisms of clerical abuse, and their call for reform, added to the growing unrest in Western Christendom. The old saw that "Erasmus laid the egg that Luther hatched" contains a great deal of truth. Third, after 1517 many younger humanists turned Protestant, for example, Ulrich Zwingli* (d.1531), Philip Melanchthon* (d.1560), John Calvin* (d.1564), and Theodore Beza* (d.1605).

ROBERT D. LINDER

RENAN, JOSEPH ERNEST (1823-1892). French humanist historian of religion and oriental philologist, who unsettled both Catholics and Protestants with La Vie de Jésus (1863). Using the new German textual and philological criticism with a rationalist skeptic's assumptions, he depicted Jesus as a truly remarkable itinerant preacher, but certainly not the Son of God. His portrait came at the right historic moment for him and achieved immense popularity among enlarging skeptical readership. The work expanded into Histoire de origines du christianisme (7 vols., 1863-81), with further studies of the apostles, Paul, Antichrist, the early church, and the end of the ancient world. He wrote Histoire du peuple d'Israël (5 vols., 1887-93) with the same perspective. Renan was raised Catholic and prepared by seminary study to enter the priesthood. This he abandoned (1845) along with his Catholic faith. Thereafter he went on numerous archaeological digs in the Near East and became professor of Hebrew at the Collège de France (1862) until removed because of the furor over his Jésus. He was reinstated (1870) and appointed director of the college (1879) under the secularist Third Republic.

C.T. MC INTIRE

RENAUDOT, EUSÈBE (1646-1720). Roman Catholic scholar. Although trained for the Society of Jesus, he became a secular priest. He was particularly noted for his knowledge of oriental languages, becoming one of the principal advisers of Louis XIV's minister Colbert on matters relating to the East. His writings were mainly devoted to showing the relationship between the Orthodox and the Roman churches, as he sought to prove the "continuity of the faith" in opposition to Protestant contentions that the Roman Catholic Church had perverted the faith. His most important works were De la Perpetuité de la foi de l'église sur les sacrements et autres points (1713) and Historia patriarchum Alexandrinorum (1713).

W.S. REID

RENQVIST, HENRIK (1789-1866). Finnish pastor. While still at school he experienced a personal revival and was greatly influenced by a book on conversion by Arthur Dent, the English Puritan. During Renqvist's hard inner struggles he came into contact with the "Prayer Movement," and his own conviction became clear. He liked especially the emphasis on "repentance" and "conversion" in the Pietistic movement called the "Prayers." Another important influence on him was the Scot, John Paterson, who underlined the work of the Bible Society (founded in Britain in 1804). Thereafter Renqvist was especially interested in the printing and spreading of inexpensive Bibles and Christian literature. He started writing and translating Christian books—some sixty titles altogether. In his own religious outlook he was a mystic. He stressed in his books the necessity of spiritual exercise, especially praying on one's knees. He was a pioneer in temperance work and missions in Finland.

STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

RENUNCIATION OF THE DEVIL. From early times a formal renunciation of the devil accompanied the Christian's confession of faith at baptism. In the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c.215) the form is: "I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy service and all thy works" (xxi.9). Later in the West, the renunciation took the form of response to an interrogation. At Jerusalem in the fourth century, the renunciation was recited facing west, and likewise the baptismal creed facing east, and the turning thus became a symbol of conversion. This practice spread widely in the church, and a relic of it remains in turning east for the creed.

RENWICK, JAMES (1662-1688). Last of the Scottish Covenanter* martyrs. Born at Moniaive, Dumfriesshire, the only son of poor and God-fearing parents whose several daughters had died in infancy, he showed early signs of piety, though his sensitive mind was at times clouded with doubt. While a student at Edinburgh University, he heard Donald Cargill* preach and saw his martyrdom. Cargill's influence led him to associate with the Covenanting societies that had adhered to Richard Cameron.* They sent him to Holland to train for the gospel ministry. He was ordained there and returned to Scotland through Dublin in the summer of 1683. He began a passionate four-year ministry at Darmead, preaching in all weathers and at all hours. In one year he baptized 600 children. Though anxious to refrain from violence, he could not allow the enthronement of James II* to pass without a solemn Protestation that denounced the king as a murderer and idolater, and an enemy of true religion. He was arrested in Edinburgh condemned to die, and executed at the Grassmarket. Letters and sermons are extant that give valuable information about his character and the times in which he lived.

ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

REORDINATION. Strictly speaking, the term is a misnomer since in practice it applies only to those who have received ordination which is regarded as "invalid"—that is, as no ordination at all—and who consequently are in need of ordination* rather than reordination. In the early church the appearance of heretical or partially heretical sects and schismatic groups forced the issue into prominence. Unanimity of judgment is not to be found, however. Cyprian* (third century), for instance, insisting that outside the Catholic Church there could be no salvation, regarded every action of separated bodies as null and void: their baptism was no baptism and their orders were no orders, and acceptance was to be gained only by (re)baptism and (re)ordination in the unity of the Catholic Church, which is reality were first, not second, baptism and ordination.

The Council of Nicea* (325) represents a more moderate position which attempts a distinction between, on the one hand, heretics whose sacraments and orders were judged invalid, and on the other hand, schismatics who otherwise were orthodox in their articles of belief and whose sacraments and orders were judged acceptable in the event of their wishing to end their schism. The position of greatest tolerance is represented by Augustine* (d.430), in whose view rebaptism and reordination were unnecessary for the reconciling and acceptance of those who hitherto had been divorced from the Catholic Church, since Christ—not man or the church—is the source of grace and validity.

The Cyprianic position regarding orders (but not baptism) has been that of the Roman Catholic Church since the Reformation. Nonpapal orders have been dismissed as invalid and to all intents and purposes nonexistent. It is an attitude, too, that has become widely accommodated in the Anglican Communion,* though it is contrary to the teaching and practice of classical Anglicanism. The insistence, whether explicit or implicit, on the necessity of episcopal ordination (and therefore, despite pious talk regarding the blessing of the Holy Spirit that has attended nonepiscopal ministries, on the invalidity or insufficiency of such ministries) has proved a stultifying factor in attempts to achieve reunion between Anglican and nonepiscopal churches, especially when "catholic" Anglicans demand a method of reconciliation which can be interpreted by them as a reordination of ministers who lack episcopal orders. In view of the nonrecognition of Anglican orders by Rome, such manipulations have a distinctly Gilbertian flavor.

In the situation now prevailing, when there is so much disunity and fragmentation, the Nicene principle—according to which adherence to the apostolic faith is the criterion of the genuineness of a minister's calling and ordination, and the ground of reunion without question of reordination—is the principle which should consistently be applied. REPENTANCE. The English translation of the Greek metanoia, signifying "a change of mind," and which is often used in the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew nacham. So defined, repentance might appear to be purely intellectual. In fact this is not the case, for the biblical writers were strongly aware of the unity of human personality. To change the mind was to change the attitude and so, at least in principle, to change the actions and even the whole way of life. It is an important element in biblical preaching (Jer. 25:1-7; Mark 1:15; 6:12; Luke 1:16f.; Acts 2:38, etc.). An OT passage which does not use the word well expresses the meaning of it (Prov. 28:13). Repentance is one aspect of conversion, the other being faith. They are two aspects of the one experience in which a man turns from sin to Christ. Initial repentance should lead to habitual renunciation of sin. It should not be confused with "penance,"* which appears as a translation of metanoia in the Roman Catholic Douai Version. Penance is understood in modern English as the performance of ecclesiastically prescribed acts to make satisfaction for postbaptismal sin, and this has no place in NT Christianity. G.W. GROGAN

REPROBATION (Gr. adokimos, "rejection after test"). In the NT it is normally applied to man's sinful condition and implies that judgment will fall on the man thus described (Rom. 1:28; 2 Tim. 3:8; Heb. 6:8). In 1 Corinthians 9:27 it has sometimes been understood to refer rather to disqualification from Christian service, while in 2 Corinthians 13:5ff. Paul's readers are told to test themselves concerning their Christian standing. A study of these passages will reveal that the cause of such rejection by God is represented as man's sin. In none of them is this related to the eternal counsels of God. The idea that it is so related has sometimes been seen in 1 Peter 2:8; Jude 4 (where the actual word adokimos is not in fact used), although what is in view in these passages may simply be the fact that the men referred to were the subject of OT prophecy. Romans 9:1-29 deals with the specific problem of the apparent rejection of Israel by God. Note that although Paul speaks of God as the personal Author of salvation (v.23), he uses an impersonal form of expression when he speaks of damnation (v.22). In chapter 10 he goes on to show that in fact God's rejection of them is due to their rejection of Him. G.W. GROGAN

REQUIEM. A musical Mass for the dead, celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church. It receives its name from the first word of the Introit. Requiem aeternam dona eis Domine ("Give them eternal rest, O Lord"). This introit is also often recited by itself as a prayer for the departed soul. Although the requiem was intended to be sung only at funerals, at anniversary memorials for the departed, and on All Souls' Day (1 November), due to its limited use it became a concert form. The opening sections of the requiem uses traditional Gregorian chant melodies, and by the eighteenth century orchestral accompaniment had gained importance. Guiseppe Verdi's Requiem in memory of Italian novelist A. Manzoni is probably the best known. ROYAL L. PECK

REREDOS. A medieval Anglo-French word meaning "screen," this denotes the decoration found behind and above the altar in the chancel of a church, and usually under the east window. In its earliest manifestation it took the form of Christian paintings on the wall, but developments in the Middle Ages led to the production of elaborate rich silk or jeweled metal screens. Other forms which became common were carved wooden panels and sculptured stone or alabaster figures and symbols. Though used widely in Episcopalian churches of all types, evangelical Anglicans tend to dislike their usage.

RESCISSORY ACT (1661). Passed by the Scottish Parliament after the Restoration of Charles II,* this rescinded without distinction all the statutes passed since 1633. This erased much that was worthy in Presbyterian legislation and was the prelude to the reestablishment of Episcopacy and the persecution of Covenanters.* Even some of the nobility argued this Act, but they were overruled.

RESERVED SACRAMENT. The practice of keeping the bread (and sometimes the wine) consecrated at the Eucharist for the purpose of Communion, especially for the sick. Justin Martyr mentions the custom of sending a portion of the elements to those absent. Tertullian spoke of reservation on fast-days, and of the practice of home-communion. Reservation by private persons in their own homes was common at least until the late fourth century, surviving among hermits till the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. From the fourth century, however, it was normally kept in churches. The custom was liable to abuse and was prohibited by the Council of Saragossa (380) and by a fourth-century Armenian canon (apart from sick-communion). There is no trace of reservation for the purpose of adoration before the development of the doctrines of transubstantiation* and concomitance. Luther and the Reformers rejected reservation. In Anglicanism, the first Prayer Book (1549) provided for reservation for the sick. This was dropped in the second Prayer Book (1552), and the 1661 Prayer Book ordered the elements remaining after the service to be consumed. By the nineteenth century the practice among Anglicans died out largely, though the Scottish Episcopal Church retained it, and it has now been widely restored. J.G.G. NORMAN

RESOLUTIONERS. In December 1650 the Estates in Scotland ordered the commission of the general assembly to decide whether it was lawful to reinstate those formerly purged from the army by the 1649 Act of Classes, which had excluded from civil and military posts all who were hostile to the National Covenant* and the Solemn League and Covenant.* The commission agreed that it was lawful to reinstate all but a small minority, and this decision was known as the first Public Resolution. In March 1651 the commission was asked about the legality of admitting to the Committee of Estates those who, formerly debarred, had now renounced their anti-Covenanting attitude. The commission recommended the admission of all save a few "pryme actors against the State." This was the second Public Resolution. Those who upheld these decisions were known as Resolutioners, and they were mostly moderate Presbyterians and moderate Royalists. Those who disagreed were called "Protesters."* J.D. DOUGLAS

RESTORATION, THE (1660). A title used by British historians to describe the return of Charles II of the House of Stuart to the throne of England. He landed at Dover on 25 May after an exile on the Continent. On 8 May he had been proclaimed king by Parliament, but previous to this and since the execution of his father in 1649 he had been persona non grata in London. His return to the throne was followed by the restoration of the old character of the national church, with prelates and Prayer Book. For the Scots, who had crowned him ten years earlier, the Restoration meant the recovery of national independence.

RESTORATIONISM. The doctrine of universal salvation, or universalism, also known as "Apocatastasis." It claims that all free moral creatures—men, angels, devils—will ultimately be saved. If there is a hell, it is purgative only. Some have held that it is taught in the NT (e.g., C.H. Dodd on Romans 11). The doctrine seems present in Clement of Alexandria* and clearly appears in Origen,* who hoped that the devil would be finally redeemed, though even Origen's universalism needs to be qualified by his insistence on the eternity of man's freedom. Gregory of Nyssa* supported restorationism, but it was attacked by Augustine* and formally condemned in the first anathema against Origenism* at the Council of Constantinople (543). It was held by John Scotus Erigena (ninth century), by mystics like Eckhart and Tauler, by Johannes Denck and some Anabaptists, and by several Moravians and Pietists. In modern times exponents include Friedrich Schleiermacher, Erskine of Linlathen, F.D. Maurice, Ethelbert Stauffer, and many others in all sections of Christendom. J.G.G. NORMAN

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. The belief that Jesus Christ had really died upon the cross and had been raised by God to life in a new sphere is central to the NT and was constitutive of the Christian Church. Its importance for the historical and theological assessment of the truth of Christianity today is generally recognized as being paramount. There was little teaching about resurrection in the OT. After death, men were thought to go to Sheol, the place of the departed, to an unsatisfying sort of existence (Ps. 88). But it was realized that God was there (Ps. 139:8) and there was therefore hope of deliverance (Ps. 16:10). Specific ideas of resurrection are found in Isaiah 26:19 and Daniel 12:2, where there is a connection with the thought of judgment.

There are also instances of life being restored to dead children by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:17-23; 2 Kings 4:32-36), but they resume the same sort of life that they had before. The instances of the raising Jairus's daughter and the son of the widow of Nain in the gospels (Mark 5:35-43; Luke 7:11-17) belong to the same category, though raising the dead is quoted by Jesus as being one of His messianic works (Matt. 11:2-6; Luke 7:18-23). Even the raising of Lazarus, who had been in the tomb for four days, was a restoration of him to the life that he had before (John 11:1-44). It is in a sense a dramatic foretaste of the resurrection of Jesus, but it has a different nature. By the time of the ministry of Jesus there had been some development in Jewish thinking beyond the OT, but Pharisees* and Sadducees* were divided about the doctrine of resurrection (Mark 12:18-27; Acts 23:6-8).

Jesus' own teaching about resurrection was largely concerned with predictions that He Himself would rise from the dead (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:34, etc.). The use of the phrase "after three days" located it as a definite action in the sphere of history. Many passages in the synoptic gospels about judgment may be taken to assume the idea of resurrection, but only in Luke 14:14 is recompense at the resurrection made explicit. The only discussion of resurrection occurs in the answer to the trap question of the Sadducees (Mark 12:18-27). John's gospel records teaching about the resurrection of life and the resurrection of judgment (John 5:28f.), and Mary of Bethany voices a belief in the resurrection at the last day (John 11:24). Jesus, however, claims to be the Resurrection and the Life, operating in the present as well as in the future (John 11:25f.).

The vague hopes and dim foreshadowings that had gone before are replaced in the apostolic proclamation by the certainty of resurrection because of the certainty of the resurrection of Christ. The qualification for apostleship was to have been a witness of the resurrection (Acts 1:22), and the fact that Jesus had been raised from the dead was at the center of the preaching of the apostles, whether by Peter at Jerusalem (Acts 2:29-32) or by Paul at Athens (Acts 17:30-32). Paul states that the point of first importance in his teaching was the death and resurrection of Jesus, with its attestation (1 Cor. 15:3-11). It is of course to the gospels that we must go for a fuller account of the resurrection.

There is no description of how it happened in any of the canonical gospels. They all agree in referring to two things—the empty tomb and the appearances to the disciples, though in the case of Mark, the original ending of which may have been lost, the latter is predicted and not described in the authentic text (Matt. 28; Mark 16:1-8; Luke 24; John 20–21). The accounts differ in detail as to the number of women who went to the tomb, and concerning the inclusion of a reference to an angel (Matthew), a young man (Mark), or two men (Luke) to give them a message about the resurrection. Mark predicts and Matthew describes an appearance in Galilee, while Luke records appearances in Jerusalem and John includes appearances first in Jerusalem and then in Galilee. It is possible to make some sort of harmony of the accounts, but this is speculative and it is more important to see the basic agreement in essentials, together with an uncontrived variety of presentation which does much to suggest experience rather than propaganda. The narrative as we have it in Mark gives a vivid impression of the resurrection representing the end, for it is the breaking in of the world to come. Matthew stresses that the permanent presence of the risen Christ is connected with the world-mission of the church, and Luke likewise sees the resurrection as a key piece of the framework of redemption history which is to be continued through the gift of the Holy Spirit. In John the resurrection brings everything to a climax (John 20), but the appendix to the gospel is a reminder that there is work to be done before the final consummation (John 21).

The consequences of the resurrection for the present and the future are worked out in the epistles, particularly in Paul's magnificent exposition in 1 Corinthians 15. It is a guarantee of the efficacy of the Atonement and the sure pledge of the resurrection of believers in the future. This must be distinguished from Greek ideas of the immortality of the soul because it implies that the present physical body is the seed of the future "spiritual body." It is a clear proof of the reality of the new order of creation and the ultimate victory of God in Christ. Elsewhere the Christian is said to have gone through an experience similar to Christ's, symbolized in baptism (Rom. 6:1-11; Col. 2:12), and this means the ability to have heavenly aspirations (Col. 3:1) and to enjoy the power of the risen Christ (Phil. 3:10).

From the earliest times there have been those who have been unwilling or unable to believe in the resurrection of Christ. Alternative theories have included the suggestions that He never really died, that the women went to the wrong tomb, or that either His friends or His enemies stole the body. None of these suggestions will bear critical examination or account for the extraordinary psychological and moral change induced into so many different people and with such lasting effects in the face of those who had every reason to discredit the belief if they could. Nor will it do to believe in some sort of spiritual presence of the risen Christ without the raising of His body from the tomb. History, theology, and experience combine to show that "the glorious fact is that Christ did rise from the dead" (1 Cor. 15:20, Phillips).

RETREAT. This signifies, in general, those periods of time specifically set apart for spiritual contemplation, religious devotions, and inward renewal. Participants usually seclude themselves from their normal occupations. The practice is not uniquely Christian, but Christians have drawn inspiration from the examples of Jesus praying in the desert (Matt. 4), and from the apostles tarrying in the upper room before Pentecost (Acts 1: 13,14). Ignatius Loyola fully developed a complete, practical method of retreat in his volume Exercitia spiritualia, approved by Paul III in 1548. Taking inspiration from the Jesuits, Roman Catholic retreat houses have sprung up in phenomenal numbers around the world. Canon law obligates all priests to attend one retreat every three years and members of all religious orders to attend at least one each year. Retreats are not, however, limited to the Roman Catholic Church. They were practiced in the Oxford Movement* and adopted formally by the Church of England in 1856. Keith Miller, director of Laity Lodge in Texas, has given the retreat method of spiritual renewal great impetus in the USA since 1961.

RETZ, CARDINAL DE (1614-1679). Archbishop of Paris. After taking part in abortive plots against Richelieu,* he devoted himself to an ecclesiastical career and was made coadjutor and successor to his uncle, the archbishop of Paris. In Notre Dame he became a popular preacher and encourager of political pamphleteers; when de Conde opposed the king, de Retz supported the court party. In 1651 he was made cardinal, which aggravated the enmity between him and the all-powerful Mazarin. Mazarin had him imprisoned in 1652 in Vincennes, from where he escaped to Rome. Upon the death of his uncle de Retz made legal claim to the see of Paris, instructing his clergy by letters which were publicly burned. On the death of Mazarin, Louis XIV made it known that de Retz would be unwelcome in Paris. He therefore resigned, compensated with the abbey of St. Denis, the revenues of which were greater than those of the see of Paris. He exercised greater influence in Rome than the French ambassador, and took part in the elections of Alexander VII, Clement IX, and Clement X; he also mediated in the struggle between Louis XIV and Rome. He traveled in Germany and Holland on his own behalf and in support of the restoration of the Stuarts in England. He was a church politician rather than a churchman.

REUBLIN, WILHELM (c.1482-c.1559). Anabaptist* reformer. Born at Rottenburg, he studied at Freiburg, receiving there a clerical consecration. After parish work in Tübingen and Griessen, he became people's priest in Basle (1521). Crowds listened to his Scripture expositions, and supported him when the bishop complained about his attacks on the Mass. He went to Zurich, and was the first Swiss priest to marry (1523). With others he was expelled after the 1525 Disputation. During his subsequent wanderings, he won B. Hubmaier and the city of Waldshut to the Anabaptist cause, debated on baptism with Capito* in Strasbourg, called Michael Sattler to Horb, was whipped from Esslingen (1528), and denounced as a false prophet by fellow Anabaptists in Moravia (1531). By 1535 he had withdrawn from Anabaptism, and latterly lived in Znaim, Zurich, and Basle. J.G.G. NORMAN

REUCHLIN, JOHANNES (1455-1522). German humanist. Born in Pforzheim, he studied under the Brethren of the Common Life* in Schlettstadt; he attended the University of Paris and studied law at Paris, Freiburg, Basle, and Orléans. He served as legal adviser to the duke of Württemberg. Erasmus hailed him as "the triple-tongued" Reuchlin for his expert knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was the outstanding Hebraist among the humanists of the early sixteenth century. His Rudimenta Hebraica was the authoritative Hebrew grammar of the period. Reuchlin steeped himself in Greek philosophy and became a proponent of Pythagorean philosophy. His study of Hebrew writings involved him deeply in cabalistic speculations. He wrote On the Wonder-Working Word and On the Cabalistic Art.

Reuchlin became involved in a controversy with the theologians of Cologne, especially Johannes Pfefferkorn and Jakob Hoogstraten. In A Mirror for the Jews (1506) Pfefferkorn argued that all Hebrew books should be confiscated. In 1509 Maximillian I issued a decree ordering the Jews to turn in their books. Reuchlin, when consulted, replied that the books should not be destroyed, saying that only those which were openly blasphemous might be burned after they had been condemned according to proper legal procedure. He defended the use of Jewish works on philosophy and science, the Talmud, the Kabbalah, biblical manuscripts, prayer books, and hymns in Hebrew. Hoogstraten cited Reuchlin to appear before his Court of Inquisition on the charge of heresy. Through John von der Wyck, Reuchlin won an appeal to Rome. The controversy evoked not only A Mirror for the Jews by Pfefferkorn, but also Reuchlin's famous reply Augenspiegel (A Mirror for the Eyes). The humanist world rallied to the side of Reuchlin; Letters of Famous Men (1515) contained their testimonies. Cortus Rubeanus (the first edition) and Ulrich von Hutten (the second edition) produced the scathing satires, Letters of Obscure Men.

Although he recommended Philip Melanchthon,* his grandnephew, to Frederick the Wise as instructor at Wittenberg, Reuchlin did not join the Lutheran cause. However, he hindered the burning of Luther's books in Ingolstadt. Leo X finally condemned Reuchlin's writings (1520). Nevertheless, he ranks as the outstanding German humanist of the first years of the sixteenth century, a promoter of Greek and Hebrew scholarship.

CARL S. MEYER

REUNION. The theological premise upon which any concept of reunion is founded is that the visible church of God on earth is properly, or at its best, or archetypally, a single entity—a body, or an organism. The concept will be opaque wherever Christians hold either that the only proper unity of the church is invisible (and eschatological) and thus indivisible, or that the given oneness of the visible church (e.g., in and by baptism) is totally indivisible. On either of these views the church is a union which cannot be broken and thus does not admit of reuniting. The former view is characteristic of classical independency or Brethrenism, the latter of twentieth-century ecumenists rationalizing their failures.

In 1 Corinthians Paul seems to indicate that, while it was theologically unthinkable and virtually immoral for division to enter into the body, yet it was in fact not only possible but actually happening. It was the harmony and true oneness of the local "body" which was endangered, and Paul does not allocate blame separately to either party, but simply appeals to them to belong and live with each other, acknowledging no "party leaders" lower than Christ.

The post-apostolic church, in various ways, had to make more sophisticated appeals than this. The existing institution had prior claims to be "the church" and those who separated themselves had to return to that unity. The true church was identifiable to Ignatius, Irenaeus, Cyprian, and their contemporaries as those who held the true faith and were joined to a true bishop; the difficulty was that in disputes there were no higher courts of appeal to decide who had the true faith and which bishops were true ones. The true church had in the last resort to be self-authenticating to its members, and if more than one organization was thus self-authenticating, then sheer weight of numbers or the secular power (as with Augustine and the Donatists) had to settle it.

In the early centuries this concept of the single universal body of the church meant that reunion had to come through individual seceders or schismatics returning into union. What it could not mean was that two equal and mutually respecting denominations merged, with each making its contribution to the future. A schismatic returning had to renounce all that he had known and done while in schism; he reunited by submitting. Augustine of Hippo* made one small step toward the Donatists* when he afforded recognition to baptisms and orders given in schism, but this was novel—and perhaps ultimately misleading also in terms of Augustine's own ecclesiology. It gave some first shadow of respectability to reunion in that it allowed certain ecclesial marks to the Donatists.

The major schism of the church in the centuries following was that between East and West, formalized in 1054, but probably inevitable from long before that. At this point the theological thinking of each part about the other became obscure. There was an uncertain claim (coming down to the present day) on each side that it alone was the true church to which submission was required from the other. But it was uncertain, and each side retained at least some concept that the schism needed to be "healed" by something less than total surrender by the other. Attempts were occasionally made toward reconciliation, the Council of Florence* (1438-39) being the most notable.

The Reformation* brought new ecclesiologies in its train, and new concepts of the unity of the church in consequence. The Reformers took the view that Rome had left the truth, to which they clung, and therefore the guilt of schism and the duty to "return" lay with the pope. They differed as to whether Rome still exhibited the marks of the Christian Church at all, and they were far more concerned to protect themselves from her than to promote reunion with her. Their view of their own churches was broadly cuius regio eius religio, and this left them with no constitutional duties to each other except a fraternal strengthening of each other's hands. Finally they showed various degrees of tolerance to dissenters who arose within their parishes or districts, but the tolerance was rarely more than grudging, and in England the persecution of the Puritans* (as under Whitgift* and Bancroft*) became almost fanatical. There never existed two or more bodies which could face each other with mutual understanding and sympathy, and seek to unite with each other. The Hampton Court* and Savoy* conferences (1604 and 1661) from this standpoint were parodies of conferences—however they were occasioned, they quickly became mere instruments of triumphalist policy by the ruling (i.e., Anglican or Episcopalian) party. A greater possibility emerged in 1689 when the two parties had worked together in the overthrow of James II,* but the upshot was not a comprehensive united church (as many had hoped), but a wider tolerance for a multiplicity of churches.

A rare and interesting variant on these moves was found in the early part of the eighteenth century when Archbishop Wake* corresponded for some time (1717-19) with Du Pin, a Roman Catholic theologian of the Sorbonne. The end in view was an Anglicanizing of the French Church away from the new Ultramontanism* until the Churches of England and France could meet in a fraternal unity. More bizarre was the temporary flirtation of the English Nonjurors* with Eastern Orthodoxy.

The eighteenth century in England itself saw the Evangelical Revival. This led to the building of Methodist chapels alongside parish churches throughout the land, and fixed a deep division between the two—a division which was cultural and sociological as well as theological, a prime instance of the part "nontheological" factors play in the keeping of Christians separate from each other. The problem was now exactly that to which 1 Corinthians had been addressed, that of rival denominations cheek-by-jowl with each other. No attempt was made at reunion once John Wesley* had died, and the Oxford Movement* added the impression of a strong theological division to justify the already existing separation. England was a very powerful force in the nineteenth-century missionary expansion, so that the English divisions reproduced themselves around the world, with the further complications added of Lutheranism, Presbyterianism, and Moravianism from the Continent.

In the twentieth century the ecumenical movement has spawned or strengthened moves to corporate reunion throughout the world. Mention can be made of Scottish Presbyterian unions in 1900 and 1929, English Methodist union in 1932, and Presbyterian-Congregationalist union in 1972, and the formation of the United Church of Canada.* Anglicans were involved in the Church of South India* in 1947 and in the Churches of North India* and Pakistan* in 1970, in company with six other denominations. Many other unions have been projected but a number not implemented, including schemes in the USA, between Anglicans and Methodists in England (finally defeated in 1972), in Nigeria, East Africa, Australia, and New Zealand.

In all these moves neither the Roman Catholic Church nor the evangelical independent churches have been involved, due to their ecclesiologies and traditions. A stage is now arriving where Roman Catholics can and do become very sympathetic "observers" in schemes between other churches, but they have no mandate to negotiate toward local or national unions. There has at the same time arisen among those most in favor of reunion an impatience, or at least an ennui, concerning the whole concept of schemes for reunion. There is a proneness to trace the rise of antiinstitutional Christianity to the preoccupation with institutions which has marked the schemes of recent years. Thus in the early 1970s the specific schemes for reunion which have been projected but not yet implemented lie somewhat under a cloud, with the question arising as to whether institutional Christianity has not more important items on its agenda.

REUSCH, FRANZ HEINRICH (1825-1900). Old Catholic* theologian. Born in Westphalia, he studied at Paderborn, Bonn, Tübingen, and Munich, was ordained priest in 1849, and taught OT exegesis at Bonn from 1854 (professor from 1861). Close friend of J.J.I. von Döllinger,* he strongly opposed the Vatican Council* infallibility decrees (1870), being present at the Nuremberg Declaration.* He was excommunicated in 1872, served an Old Catholic church in Bonn, was Bishop Reinkens's* vicar-general, and in 1873 became rector of Bonn University. He took a leading part in organizing the Old Catholic Church, and arranging the Bonn* Reunion Conferences. Disagreeing with the Old Catholic abolition of clerical celibacy in 1878, he retired into lay communion. He wrote many books on OT subjects and modern ecclesiastical history, some with von Döllinger, notably a history of post-Tridentine moral theology (1899). J.G.G. NORMAN

REUSS, EDWARD (1804-1891). Biblical scholar. A native of Strasbourg, he spent most of his life there. He taught at the Protestant seminary from 1834 (professor of NT from 1836 and of OT from 1864), and also at the state theological faculty from 1838. When the seminary was incorporated into the theological faculty of the new German university in 1872, Reuss was the first dean. Reuss was a keen advocate of the historico-critical approach to the Bible. His opposition with H.J. Holtzmann* to Baur's tendency criticism led to the latter's decline.

While recognizing a Jewish element in the early church, he considered Baur's theory of a conflict with Hellenism exaggerated and untenable. As early as 1834 he advocated a late date for the Grundschrift, later called the "Priestly Document," behind the Pentateuch. His views paved the way for the later hypotheses of Graf, Kuenen, and Wellhausen. He founded the Theologische Gesellschaft (1828) and was a regular contributor to Colani's Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie. His many writings brought the ideas of German critical theology before the French public. He was an editor of the standard edition of Calvin's works in the Corpus Reformatorum (59 vols., 1863-1900). Reuss produced a new French translation and commentary on the Bible (16 vols., 1874-81). Reuss's writings include Geschichte der heiligen Schriften Neuen Testaments (1842), Histoire de la théologie chrétienne au siècle apostolique (2 vols., 1854), Geschichte der heiligen Schriften Alten Testaments (1881), and Das Alte Testament (7 parts in 6 vols., 1892-94).

RÉVEIL, LE. Literally, "The Awakening," it was an evangelical revival which began in French-speaking Switzerland in the early nineteenth century and spread to France and the Netherlands by 1825. It shook the state churches of Geneva and Vaud, spawned free churches in those two cantons, deeply touched the French and Dutch Reformed communities, and complemented contemporary revivals in the British Isles and the United States. Le Réveil was basically a reaction against the rationalism and materialism which the Enlightenment* had brought to the established churches of the Continent. Its leaders reemphasized historic Reformed doctrines, especially biblical authority, the sovereignty of God, the lost condition of man, justification by faith in Christ, and the necessity of personal conversion.

The revival began as early as 1810 with the formation of a society of "friends" in Geneva which began to study the Scriptures in search of spiritual renewal. A number of outside influences stimulated the awakening, including visits from Scottish evangelicals Robert Haldane* (d. 1842) and Henry Drummond* (d.1860). However, the movement was not a mere reflection of British revivalism, but developed its own distinctive character under the able leadership of César Malan* (d.1864), François Gaussen* (d.1863), and Merle d'Aubigné* (d.1872) in Geneva; Alexandre Vinet* (d.1847) in Vaud; Felix Neff (d.1829), Henri Pyt (d.1835), Adolphe (d.1856) and Frédéric (d.1863) Monod* in France; and Willem Bilderdijk* (d.1831), Isaak da Costa* (d.1860), and Guillaume Groen van Prinsterer (d.1876) in the Netherlands. By the end of the century, Le Réveil had won over a majority of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, permeated the French Reformed Church, and rejuvenated hundreds of Dutch congregations. REVELATION. A central concept in modern theological discussion, concerned as it has been with questions about how God may be known, about religious authority, and (more recently) about language. The idea of God making Himself known in acts of redemption and judgment and in prophetic, interpretative utterances pervades the Bible. It is not so much a biblical idea, as it is the biblical idea. Man is lost in his sinful ignorance unless and until God discloses Himself. Revelation is therefore gracious. Thus, to think of revelation as being essentially man's response to God, or as his insight into the ways of God, though a dominant viewpoint in much modern theology, is profoundly unbiblical.

God's revelation in history must be understood against the background of general or natural revelation. The Bible itself teaches that God reveals Himself to men generally, in nature, in history, and in their moral consciousness (Ps. 19; Rom. 1). However, such general revelation is rendered ineffectual by sin. Thus God's special revelation is redemptive in character. He reveals Himself, not generally—to all men—but specially—to His own chosen people. It was God's eternal purpose thus to display His glory by revealing His provision of redemption for a rebellious creation.

In the history of Christian thought about revelation, various emphases have been placed on the two aspects of "general" and "special" revelation. For Aquinas, general revelation (and with it the idea of natural theology) is very prominent. Man is able, by the use of his reason, to come to a rudimentary knowledge of God on the basis of God's natural revelation. For Calvin, natural theology is not prominent. A man knows God (and in knowing God knows himself) in Scripture, and true knowledge is conditioned upon inner spiritual illumination. For Karl Barth, revelation is understood in activistic terms—God makes Himself known now, as Scripture is read and preached and received in faith. So Scripture is not revelation, but the vehicle of it.

Special revelation concerns the activity of God in human affairs. It is therefore historical, and it proceeds in stages. The mode of revelation is thus suited to the epoch and the stage of redemptive history, but it has its culmination in "the fact of Christ." God has spoken, finally, in His Son, in His teaching, His work of atonement, and in the interpretative apostolic testimony. The OT revelation prepares for Christ. Christ does not repudiate the OT, He fulfills it.

The historical character of revelation makes clear its uniqueness. It is not a mere republication of the truths of natural religion, nor is it to be thought of in the same terms as the "revelations" of mysticism or the occult. Further, by calling revelation "historical," stress is laid on the actuality of the events recorded in Scripture. The events are not simply projections of the religious consciousness onto history. The testimony of the Christian Church is that God revealed Himself in human history, and now, in Scripture—in the very words and propositions of Scripture—God reveals Himself.

REVELATION, BOOK OF. The last book of the Bible is generally regarded as a typical apocalypse. Apocalyptic literature* flourished in the last two centuries B.C. and the first of our era. It is marked by a lavish use of symbolism, often of a bizarre kind, by a pessimism as to the outcome of man's best efforts, and by a conviction that God is in supreme control. He will deliver His people out of their current trouble and will bring in the end of the world when His kingdom will be set up. Revelation is like the apocalypses in many respects (indeed the name of this book in Greek, apokalypsis, gives its name to this class of literature). But it differs in not being pseudonymous (most apocalypses are fathered onto some great figure of the past like Moses or Enoch, whereas our author gives his name as John). And it is specifically called a prophecy more than once (1:3; 22:7,10,18,19). It differs also in its more stringent demand for repentance where the apocalypses set out simply to comfort God's people (there is comfort, of course, in Revelation, but there is also the other note). This is not to say that there are not apocalyptic features in this book. There are, especially in the symbolism. But we must not simply view it as no more than another apocalypse.

It has been interpreted very variously throughout church history. The preterists see it as referring to events of the day under its symbols, with the author conveying to the church the message that God would help them in due course. The historicists hold that the book sets out the whole of human history in a panoramic view; unfortunately, most see it in terms of the history of W Europe—and even so there is no agreement as to what events are referred to. The futurists think the book a prophecy of events at the last day; as such it has no relevance to any generation of Christians except the last. Idealists do not see events at all; they think the author has imaginatively set forth with his vivid symbolism some important ideas for the Christian as he lives out his faith.

Probably elements from more than one view are needed. We cannot hold that the book was meaningless to its first readers, so it must refer in some way to current needs. But we should not (with the preterists) confine it to the first century. There is surely more than that. It seems that the best view is that which sees it as setting forth a theology of power. It sets out the great principles which we may observe in God's moral government of the world. There are references to contemporary happenings which illustrate the point, but the book goes far beyond that and pictures those principles as active to the end of time. Indeed, they will be especially operative at the end, and John's conviction that God will one day bring this present system to an end dominates the whole.

REVIVALISM. A spontaneous spiritual awakening by the Holy Spirit among professing Christians in the churches, which results in deepened religious experience, holy living, evangelism and missions, the founding of educational and philanthropic institutions, and social reform. Revival should not be confused with evangelism, which is a result of revival. Revival has been linked with the Anabaptists,* Puritans,* and Pietists* and has occurred mainly in Protestantism since the Reformation.

As a determinative influence in America, revivalism may be dated from the Great Awakening* which began after 1720 when T.J. Frelinghuysen* came from European centers of Pietism to pastor four New Jersey Dutch Reformed churches. Under his influence, revivals were held by the Presbyterian Gilbert Tennent,* whose father William* had founded the "Log College," which produced many revivalists. In 1734, revivals broke out in New England under the preaching of Jonathan Edwards,* and by 1740 when George Whitefield* arrived bearing the spirit of the Wesleyan revival in England, the Awakening was widespread in America. Many were swept into the churches, controversy raged, denominations were split, and humanitarian efforts and the spirit of democracy were strengthened.

The Second Awakening occurred mainly among middle- and upper-class Anglicans in England after 1790 and in America in college awakenings, such as that in Yale under Timothy Dwight* in 1802 and with great emotional and physical manifestations in the Western America frontier camp meetings.* This latter technique, first used by Presbyterians in Kentucky, was developed by Baptists and especially the Methodists. Charles G. Finney's* urban revival meetings of the 1830s has been considered a later flowering of the Second Great Awakening.*

A lay interdenominational revival which developed through noonday prayer meetings in New York in 1857 led to more than half a million coming into the churches. A revival in 1863-64 in the Confederate Army brought 150,000 soldiers a vital Christian experience. Similar awakenings occurred in Britain and on the Continent.

After the Civil War, professional, planned, urban mass evangelistic meetings held in public auditoriums by men such as D.L. Moody* and R.A. Torrey* and in the twentieth century by Billy Sunday* and Billy Graham* replaced the earlier spontaneous, rural, pastoral congregational awakenings with the exception of the 1904 Welsh revival, which stimulated world-wide revival. Since 1904 there has been no general revival in Western industrial societies, but there have been regional revivals in less advanced societies in Korea, East Africa, and Ethiopia.

REYES Y FLORENTINA, ISABELO DE LOS (1864-1938). Filipino journalist, radical, and amateur theologian. For writing revolutionary, antifriar propaganda he was exiled to Spain. There he attempted a translation of the Scriptures into Tagalog (Filipino). On his release he was commissioned by Aglipay* to negotiate with Rome for the rights of Filipino clergy (1899-1901). Having failed to obtain their request, he returned to the Philippines* and founded the Philippine Independent Church, which he persuaded Aglipay to lead. As the PIC's theologian, he led it increasingly to a Unitarian position. He was deeply involved in politics and labor disputes all his life. In 1936, after a political disagreement with Aglipay, he retracted all his writings and was reconciled to the Roman Catholic Church.

RICHARD DOWSETT

REYNOLDS, EDWARD (1599-1676). Bishop of Norwich. Educated at Merton College, Oxford, he was a moderate Anglican with Puritan sympathies. Member of the Westminster Assembly* in 1643, he served on the committee of twenty-two which examined ministers presented by parishes, and took the Solemn League and Covenant* in 1644. From 1645 to 1662 he was vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry and in 1647 one of the parliamentary visitors to Oxford University. He was vice-chancellor of Oxford in 1648, and dean of Christ Church, 1648-50, and again in 1659, when he refused to subscribe the Engagement and was ejected. At the Restoration he conformed, and in June 1660 drew up proposals for reconciling Episcopalians and Presbyterians. In 1661 he made similar efforts at the Savoy Conference* and was made bishop of Norwich, where he treated dissenters with moderation. The numerous sermons and short religious works which he published remained popular until the nineteenth century.

RHENANUS, BEATUS (1485-1547). German humanist. Born in Alsace, son of a butcher, he studied at Paris (1503-7) when Lefèvre d'Étaples* was teaching Aristotelian philosophy there. At Basle (1511-26) he took an active share in the publishing activities of John Froben, returning to Schlettstadt (his birthplace) to pursue his studies. He wrote a biography of Geiler von Kaysersberg* (1510), published editions of the classics and the Fathers, especially Tertullian (1521), and his studies of German antiquities, Rerum Germanicarum libri tres (1531). While at Basle he became a close friend of Erasmus, and published his works and a biography in nine volumes (1540-41). He was also a friend of Luther and Martin Bucer, introducing Bucer to the works of Erasmus. At first, like Erasmus, Rhenanus favored the Reformation, but later reacted against it. He died at Strasbourg.

RHENIUS, KARL (1790-1838). Missionary to South India. From a Prussian officer's family, he attended Jänicke's* mission school in Berlin and went to India under the Church Missionary Society in 1814. After serving briefly in Madras, he moved to Tinnevelly where he proved to be a competent scholar, effective teacher-catechist, and outstanding organizer. He prepared a Tamil grammar and NT, and introduced a system linking the village church and school where the schoolmaster had responsibility for worship and religious instruction. The work was self-supporting and self-propagating, and so many lower-class people were converted that the British authorities feared social unrest. Having never received Anglican orders, Rhenius ordained Indian ministers himself, but the CMS forbade the practice. In 1835 he challenged this and was discharged. Because many Tinnevelly congregations remained loyal to him, he formed a separate church, but the schism was healed after his death.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

RHODES, KNIGHTS OF, see HOSPITALLERS

RHODO (second century). Anti-Gnostic apologist. All that is known of him is recorded in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History (5.13). Born in Asia Minor, a disciple of Tatian in Rome, he wrote against the Marcionites. In particular, he had a confrontation with Apelles, an aged disciple of Marcion* in Rome. He also wrote a commentary on the Hexaemeron.

RICASOLI, BETTINO (1809-1880). Italian politician and patriot. He worked for the unity of Italy, was minister of Tuscany, and later, after Cavour's death (1861), was prime minister of Italy. In touch with the leaders of Tuscan evangelism and with Swiss Protestant circles, he was greatly influenced by them and hoped for a reform of the Roman Catholic Church. He never, however, severed his connection with the latter. As a minister he tried in vain to solve the problem of the relationship between the Italian state and the Vatican.

RICCI, MATTEO (1552-1610). Missionary to China. An Italian Jesuit, he reached Macao in 1582 in response to an appeal from Alexander Valignano in that city. He at once set about mastering the spoken and written Mandarin dialect of China. In 1583 he entered China proper at the invitation of the magistrate of Chao-ching and there translated the Ten Commandments while enduring much opposition from the people. But gradually his famous map of the world, his clocks, his books, and his mathematical instruments made an impression upon the learned. In 1594 Ricci moved to Shao-chow where he adopted the dress and the etiquette of the Chinese literati. In 1599 he set up a base in Nanking and was introduced to the learned society of that city, where he also instructed Paul Hsü Kuang-ch'i, the father of the mission at Shanghai. In 1600 Ricci set out for Peking, but reached the capital in 1601 only after imprisonment in Tientsin.

Once Ricci arrived in Peking he never left it, and he soon won the esteem of the learned and of the emperor for his scholarship and knowledge of Chinese culture. By his sympathetic approach to Confucian culture, which he did not regard as inconsistent with the Christian faith, and by his approval of the Confucian Rites ceremonies he started what became known as the Chinese Rites Controversy.* He witnessed many conversions, including some among the highest court officials. He died in Peking and was buried in the Tartar City in land granted by the emperor.

RICCI, SCIPIONE DE' (1741-1810). Bishop of Pistoia-Prato. A Florentine, he was influenced by Jansenism* in the Roman College, and while a student at Pisa encountered Gallicanism* and a rigid Augustinianism. Ordained in 1766, he became vice-general of the archdiocese of Florence (1775-80), and bishop of Pistoia-Prato in 1780, through Leopold I of Tuscany. He introduced severe disciplinary, liturgical, and doctrinal changes and enabled Jansenist writings to be published widely. In 1783 he founded a theological college at Prato, where lecturers were sympathetic with his views. He presided over the Synod of Pistoia* (1786), where his schismatic propositions brought his downfall. He resigned his diocese in 1791 and spent his final years in confinement in Rignana. His zeal for reform lacked proper training and culture, making his innovations dangerous and subject to political pressures.

RICE, LUTHER (1783-1836). American missionary to India and promoter of missionary interest among Baptist churches. Born in Northboro, Massachusetts, he was one of the group of students who sparked the formation of the first American foreign mission society. When the American Board appointed its first four missionary couples in 1812, Rice's name was added a few days before sailing, on condition that he secure his own support. Ordained a Congregational minister, after reaching India he experienced the same change of mind about baptism as did Adoniram Judson,* and became a Baptist. To stimulate missionary interest among Baptists, they decided he should return temporarily to the USA. He helped start the Baptist foreign mission society and was so effective in gaining support for the mission that he never returned to the Orient.

HAROLD R. COOK

RICHARD I (1157-1199). King of England from 1189. Known as Coeur-de-lion ("Lionheart"), he was a leader of the Third Crusade, together with Philip Augustus of France and Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. The latter died en route, and when Richard and Philip arrived by sea (1191), they found Guy of Lusignan besieging Acre and helped in its capture and the massacre of its inhabitants. Richard and Philip quarreled incessantly. They failed to capture Jerusalem, but Richard had a series of victories and made a treaty (1192) by which the Christians held the coastal cities as far south as Jaffa and were granted access to the Holy Places. Returning home, Richard was captured and held for ransom by Emperor Henry VI. He died in battle in France.

J.G.G. NORMAN

RICHARD, TIMOTHY (1845-1919). Missionary to China. Born in Wales, he went to China with the Chinese Evangelization Society in 1870. Later he joined the Baptist Missionary Society. Like Ricci,* he planned to evangelize China through influencing the devoutly religious and the intelligentsia by adapting Christianity to Chinese culture and by education and literature. He hoped to see all phases of China's life transformed. During the 1877 famine in Shansi, Richard lectured to officials and scholars. In 1891 he became secretary of the newly formed Christian Literature Society and started an ambitious publications program. He also became adviser to the liberal reformers, some of whom were friendly toward Christianity. Finally he succeeded in forming a university in Taiyuan, the Shansi capital, with Boxer indemnity money, and remained in charge for ten years.

LESLIE T. LYALL

RICHARD OF CHICHESTER (1197-1253). Bishop of Chichester. Born at Droitwich, he studied at Oxford and Paris before becoming chancellor of Oxford University in 1235. But soon afterward he was called away to be chancellor to Edmund (of Abingdon) at Canterbury. When Edmund went into exile, Richard accompanied him, remaining with him until his death in 1242. After being ordained priest in France, Richard returned to England, where he was elected bishop of Chichester against the wishes of Henry III. He was a good diocesan administrator as well as a reforming cleric, with no sympathy for simony and other abuses. He died in the Maison Dieu at Dover, the day after consecrating a new church in honor of Edmund. He was canonized by Urban IV in 1262, and his shrine was in Chichester Cathedral until destroyed in 1538 during the reign of Henry VIII.

PETER TOON

RICHARD OF MIDDLETON (d. c.1300). Philosopher. His birthplace, "Mediavilla," is of unknown location, some claiming a French, others an English or Scottish site. He joined the Franciscans, and the early 1280s found him a theologian, philosopher, and preacher in Paris. In 1283 he was appointed to a commission investigating the views of P.J. Olivi.* By 1295 he had completed his commentary on the four volumes of Peter Lombard's* Sentences. At several points he favored Thomistic over traditional Augustinian positions, e.g., Thomas's theory of knowledge. He rejected Anselm's ontological argument. Although the close of his life is obscure, he served as tutor in Naples for the sons of Charles II of Sicily and may have accompanied them to Barcelona when they were taken hostage. A number of other works have been attributed to him, perhaps erroneously. He certainly wrote 45 Quaestiones disputatae and Quodlibeta. The latter reflects his interest in hypnosis and telepathy.

JAMES DE JONG

RICHARD OF ST.-VICTOR (d.1173). Scholar and mystic. Born in Scotland, at an early age he entered the abbey of St.-Victor in Paris, becoming superior (1159) and prior (1162). Learned in Scripture and the Latin Fathers and given to theological questions and contemporary problems, he—like his esteemed master, Hugh of St.-Victor*—possessed great grammatical, dialectical, and rational ability. He shared more with Augustine, Anselm of Canterbury (using his rationes necessariae method), and Bonaventura than with Abelard, Peter Lombard, and Gilbert de la Porrée. Contemplation he practiced and understood, breaking it down into six stages; and his

Benjamin minor and Benjamin maior demonstrate these processes personally. Each stage corresponds to the progressive categories of knowledge—imaginatio and ratio to intelligentia—and has its own object from the visible to the spiritual and invisible. In De Trinitate he tried to understand the personal nature of God, which led to analyzing supreme goodness. This teaching was not followed later, although his mystical theology had influence through Bonaventura and the Franciscan school. He adumbrated Aquinas, but also believed more in speculative reasoning to unravel doctrines like the Trinity. He also wrote Liber de Verbo incarnato; De statu interioris hominis; De Emmanuele; and Adnotationes mysticae in psalmos.

See A.M. Éthier, Le 'De Trinitate' de Richard de Saint-Victor (1939), and G. Dumeige, Richard de Saint-Victor et l'idée chrétienne de l'amour (1952). C.G. THORNE, JR.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND-JEAN DUPLESSIS, DUC DE (1585-1642). French cardinal and statesman. Born in Paris of a noble family, he was trained for the army at the Collège de Navarre (Paris). The family needed money, however, and instructed him to seek ordination to become bishop of Luçon—a see at their disposal. In 1606 he was consecrated bishop, and spent nearly ten years building up the parish. In 1616 he managed to insinuate himself into political life, being appointed secretary of state. Until 1624 he served intermittently as Marie de Medici's principal adviser; with her assistance he was created cardinal in 1622. In 1624 he was made head of the royal council, and for the next eighteen years virtually ruled France, although not in full control as first minister until the "Day of Dupes" (1630).

Richelieu was ambitious and ruthless, but not so much for personal gain as for the state. Above all, he labored to make France great. He supported Gallicanism* and pursued an anti-Hapsburg foreign policy designed to centralize power in the king. A centralized state required destruction of the political and military power of the Huguenots* and the nobility. The Huguenots were taken care of at the Siege of La Rochelle (1628), but the struggle with the nobility was protracted and bitter. He systematically nullified their privileges by demolishing their fortresses (1626), by forbidding dueling (1627), by creating officials (called intendants) directly responsible to the king, and by attempting a national army. Recalcitrant nobles were mercilessly executed. Internationally he opposed the Hapsburgs by building a navy and by bringing France into the Thirty Years' War* on the "Protestant" side. France emerged from the conflict the dominant power in Europe, but Richelieu died before seeing this lifelong dream fulfilled. A patron of the arts and literature, he founded the French Academy (1635), supported playwrights (e.g., Corneille), and built great edifices (e.g., the Palais Royal and Sorbonne Chapel). He wrote widely, but not brilliantly.

RICHTER, JULIUS (1862-1940). German missiologist. After serving fifteen years as a pastor in Germany, he became professionally interested in the science and history of missions. He presided over various missionary committees and organizations, and succeeded Gustav Warneck as editor of the Allgemeine Missions-Zeitschrift in 1911. In 1920 he was appointed to the first chair of missions at the University of Berlin. His wide travel and extensive personal connections made him one of the major ecumenical personalities of his time. Author of thirty books and innumerable essays on the development of missions and the church on all continents, he devoted special attention to the historiography of missions. His most significant work was a five-volume history of Protestant missions, Allgemeine evangelische Missionsgeschichte (1906-32).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

RIDLEY, NICHOLAS (c.1500-1555). Reformer and bishop of London. Born near Haltwhistle in Northumberland, he went to Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1518. In 1524 he became a fellow of Pembroke and in 1527 went to the Sorbonne and Louvain, where he may have witnessed some of the Reformation controversies. He came back to Pembroke in 1530 where he spent much of his time reading the Scriptures and learning them by heart. In 1537 he was appointed chaplain to Cranmer* and the following year vicar of Herne, Kent, in Cranmer's diocese. In 1540 he became a chaplain to the king, and master of Pembroke. In 1547 he was consecrated bishop of Rochester and in 1550 was translated to London.

Ridley's long involvement in academic life was to stand him in good stead for the brief period of his episcopate. He seems to have been won round toward reformed views of the Eucharist through the study of De Corpore et Sanguini Domini, the work of a ninth-century monk, Ratramnus* or Bertram, who was refuting transubstantiation.* He had previously thought transubstantiation to be a primitive doctrine. From 1545 Ridley was convinced of the error of transubstantiation, and the following year he persuaded Cranmer, who in his turn persuaded Latimer.* His influence was recognized by Brooks, who said at his trial, "Latimer leaneth to Cranmer, Cranmer to Ridley, and Ridley to the singularity of his own wit." Ridley helped compile the Book of Common Prayer* of 1549 and its revision in 1552, in which his eucharistic theology was given clearer liturgical expression. He was prominent in carrying through reforms in both his dioceses and when in London took the lead in the removal of stone altars and the substitution of wooden Communion tables. He was active in preaching on social questions and promoted the foundation of schools and hospitals.

He was to have returned to his native see of Durham, but on the death of Edward VI* he supported the attempt to put Lady Jane Grey on the throne, and when that failed he was deprived and imprisoned. In 1554 he was taken with Cranmer and Latimer to Oxford, where they had to engage in various disputations. He stood firm by his views and, after burning of the Reformers had begun in 1555, Ridley and Latimer were sentenced to die at the stake. As the fires were lit Latimer cried out, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out!"

RIENZO, COLA DI (1313-1354). Italian leader. Son of a Roman innkeeper, he was a man of genius, but exhibited also signs of madness. Partly through his very considerable knowledge of the classical Latin authors, Rienzo became obsessed with the restoration of Rome to its former greatness. Petrarch's* laureation at the Capitol in 1341 intensified this obsession. In 1343 Rienzo was sent to Avignon to seek Clement VI's* return to Rome and the consequent end of the existing misrule by the leading Roman noble families—the Colonni, Orsini, and Savelli families. The mission failed, but Rienzo gained Clement's favor and was made a notary of the Camera Urbana.

In 1347, by accident or design, popular revolution broke out in Rome and Rienzo was swept into power. He was proclaimed "Tribune" and given wide-ranging powers. His government consciously looked back to ancient Rome. At first his rule was enlightened. He organized a Civic Guard and deprived the ruling families of their powers. Gradually his pretensions grew. He called on the pope to return to Rome. He called on the rival claimants to the imperial throne to look to him for judgment. He tried to convene meetings of all the Italian governments to formulate a common Italian policy under his leadership. The pope decided that Rienzo's intentions were a threat to papal power and turned against him in September 1347; the Colonni revolted, unsuccessfully, against him in November.

Meanwhile Rienzo's arrogance and luxurious life were alienating popular support. He was excommunicated for heresy, and when the Colonni again revolted, the Romans would no longer support him. He therefore abdicated and fled from Rome in December 1347 to the Franciscan Spirituals in the Abruzzi where he remained for two years. Then he went to Prague to urge Emperor Charles IV to be a "real" Roman emperor and bring peace, harmony, and justice to the world. Charles imprisoned Rienzo for two years. Then he handed him over to Clement VI, who sentenced him to death. Clement soon died and his successor Innocent IV,* hoping to use Rienzo in his Italian schemes, released him. In 1350 the Romans had again revolted, but Rienzo, sent to Italy in 1354 with Cardinal Albornoz, was successfully reestablished in control, this time as "Senator." His cruelty and luxurious life again alienated the Romans, and they slew him at the Capitol. L. FEEHAN

RILEY, WILLIAM BELL (1861-1947). Baptist minister and educator. Born in Indiana, he graduated from Hanover College (1885) and the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary (1888). He was ordained to the Baptist ministry in Kentucky and was pastor of several Indiana churches; Calvary Baptist Church, Chicago (1893-97); and First Baptist, Minneapolis (1897-1942). Riley founded and was president of Northwestern Bible Training School (1902) and Northwestern Evangelical Seminary (1935) and founded Northwestern College (1944). He strongly opposed theological liberalism and evolution. He was president of the Minnesota Baptist Convention (1944-45). The forty-volume Bible of the Expositor and the Evangelist (1924-38) is one of his major writings.

RINCKART (Rinkart), MARTIN (1586-1649). Born in Saxony, a cooper's son, he was educated at Eilenburg and Leipzig, where he graduated in theology. A good musician, he became a Lutheran cantor, then deacon at Eisleben. In 1617 he became archdeacon at Eilenburg, a walled town of refuge during the Thirty Years' War* which suffered from famine and pestilence. For some time he was the only clergyman there and in 1637, it is said, he buried nearly 5,000 people, including his wife. He also dissuaded a Swedish commander from imposing on the town an excessive tribute. "Now thank we all our God" (Winkworth*), a grace for his children based on Ecclesiasticus 50:22-24 and the Gloria Patria, became a thanksgiving for the Peace of Westphalia. Rinckart was also a poet and dramatist.

RISORGIMENTO. The period in Italian history between 1815 (the Congress of Vienna) and 1870 (the liberation of Rome). After the defeat of Napoleon, Italy (a merely geographical expression) was divided into various small states: the Kingdom of Sardinia under a Savoy king; the Lombard Venetian kingdom directly governed by Austria; the duchies of Parma, Modena, and Lucca, and the grand duchy of Tuscany; the Papal States*; and the kingdom of the two Sicilies under a Bourbon king.

Most of the Italian people accepted the situation, but some of the more enlightened had high ideals of independence, constitutional liberty, and unity and so formed secret societies. Their activity led to various uprisings in which temporary successes were followed by repression and the reinstatement by Austrian and French forces of the old regimes. Patriots were executed, imprisoned, or exiled. Gioberti* for a time considered a confederation of Italian states under Pius IX* as the best solution. That pope by his liberal attitude had raised great hopes in the minds of the patriots, but dashed them later by a complete volte-face. Finally, however, the wars of independence completed the unity of Italy (except for Trento and Trieste) when in 1870 Italian troops marched on Rome, causing the pope to withdraw into the Vatican.

Many reforms were badly needed: a constitutional regime, equality of citizens, and that separation of civil and religious powers so essential for religious liberty. It is important to see how the Roman Catholic Church and other religious movements were connected with the great political and national developments. The papacy, and Gregory XVI* (1831-46) in particular, held a position of marked conservatism, opposing any liberal and progressive movement. In the Papal States, bishops and the Inquisition tribunal had unlimited power, and there was no participation of the laity in government. Manzoni* and Rosmini* pointed out the importance of a closer association between church and people, suggesting even a renewed liturgy. Lambruschini* urged liberalism in all its aspects, but this was condemned by Pius IX both in 1864 and in the dogma of papal infallibility (1870). The laws of Guarentigie, establishing the relationship between the Vatican and the newly formed Italian state, were refused by Pius, who remained in voluntary exile in the Vatican. Roman Catholics were ordered not to vote—and thus to withdraw from political life.

Not to be overlooked is the contribution of the various "evangelical" movements to social and educational reform and the cause of religious liberty. Though small in numbers, they made their presence felt by their missionary zeal and by the opposition they met everywhere. Various factors contributed to the birth and growth of evangelism in nineteenth-century Italy: the Waldenses* in their valleys with a well-established church, the activity of Reformed foreign churches in most Italian cities, the contacts established with European Protestantism by many political and religious exiles, the development of philanthropic enterprises financed by rich Protestant foreigners. A great impact was made also by publication of S. Sismondi's Histoire des republiques italiennes dans le Moyen Age (1818), which attributed to the Roman Catholic Church and its ethics the decadence of Italian customs. Finally there was the great influence of *Le Réveil.

The Gospel spread at first especially in Tuscany, where there was a certain religious tolerance under Grand Duke Leopold II. Of great importance was a meeting held in Florence in 1844, in the house of a Swiss Christian, Charles Cremieux, at which leading reformers such as Lambruschini, Guicciardini,* and Montanelli were among those present. All considered religious reform an essential part of the national movement, but while some thought this would be better achieved from within the Roman Church, others wished to break away from it. The failure of the 1848-49 uprisings and the suppression of reformers brought the cause of Italian liberty to international notice, and in Britain particularly public opinion rose against the reactionary government which was stifling liberty of conscience.

The religious exiles in Geneva, Malta, and London formed evangelical communities. In London, Ferretti* published a journal aimed at spreading the Gospel among Italians and exposing the errors of Roman Catholicism. In Piedmont, however, the constitution had not been revoked, and the Waldensians had obtained permission to build a church in Turin (1851) while other communities were founded in Genoa and Nice. Desanctis* and Mazzarella* collaborated for a time with the Waldensians. In 1854 Guicciardini settled at Nice; in 1857 his collaborator Pietrocola-Rossetti* settled in Alessandria, a small Piedmontese town. An independent evangelical movement was thus started, and gradually communities of believers were formed in many places in Piedmont and thereafter throughout Italy. The communities formed were called Free Italian Churches, and it was the intention of the founders that the movement should be neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant, but simply Christian.

In the 1860s a division occurred within the Free Italian Churches. A. Gavazzi* had joined the movement hoping to overthrow the papacy and unite Italians into one national Protestant church, but his sermons were mainly political and violently anti-Roman Catholic. He founded a new Free Italian Church which at the turn of the century was absorbed by the Methodist mission. Most of the communities of the original movement are still in existence, with many more added to them, under the name of Christian Brethren Churches (Chiesa cristiana dei fratelli).

With the gradual liberation of Italy, foreign missions also increased their efforts, and contributed to the spread of the Gospel. Between 1860 and 1870 three Baptist missions (two British and one American) and two Methodist missions (one Episcopalian and one Wesleyan) were founded. Because of social conditions and appalling illiteracy, side by side with all missionary endeavor, whether Italian or foreign, has gone the founding of schools, orphanages, and hospitals.

Lastly, mention should be made of the attempts to found an autonomous Roman Catholic Church by those who opposed the dogma of papal infallibility. A first attempt in 1872 failed, but a second lasted from 1885 to 1900 when the founder of the movement, Count Campello, returned to orthodox Roman Catholicism and his collaborator Ugo Janni joined the Waldensian Church.

RITES, CONGREGATION OF SACRED. A department of the Curia responsible for the liturgy of the Latin Rite and the canonization of saints. It was created on 22 January 1588, when Sixtus V issued his famous bull Immensa aeterni Dei, reorganizing the church's central government into fifteen commissions of cardinals. These commissions replaced the ancient use of consistories in regulating church affairs. The Congregation is presently composed of some twenty cardinals and oversees its two areas of responsibility by means of three subsections dealing respectively with theological questions concerning sainthood, the commission for liturgical emendations, and historical questions concerning both liturgy and sainthood. Following the will of Vatican Council II, Paul VI de-Italianized and liberalized this and the other Congregations of the Curia, issuing his radical Apostolic Constitution Regimini Ecclesiae Universae.

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT (1822-1889). German Protestant theologian. Born in Berlin, son of an Evangelical bishop, he studied at various German universities, and was thereafter professor at Bonn (1852-64) and Göttingen (1864-89). He began his career as a disciple of F.C. Baur* and defended Baur's thesis of a radical conflict between Petrine Judaism and Pauline Hellenism, but the second edition of Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (1857) broke with the theory. Ritschl's chief works were The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation (ET 3 vols., 1870-84); Die christliche Vollkommenheit (1874); Geschichte des Pietismus (3 vols., 1880-86); Theologie und Metaphysik (1881); and Gesammelte Aufsätze (2 vols., 1893-96). His brief Instruction in the Christian Religion (ET 1901) provides a compact survey of his views.

Ritschl's thought was characterized by his rejection of metaphysics. This was expressed in his opposition to speculative reinterpretations of Christianity in terms of Hegelian idealism, and also in his caution about doctrines which went beyond verifiable history and immediate Christian experience. In this he was influenced by H. Lotze. It led to the celebrated distinction between judgments of fact and judgments of value (Werturteile). Thus the divinity of Christ is an expression of the revelational value of the church's faith based on Christian experience; it is not a matter of objective demonstration. Mysteries may be recognized, but they transcend knowledge, and hence nothing more may be said about them.

Ritschl believed in the uniqueness of Christ who was the historical author of the church's communion with God and fellowship among its members. He saw Christianity as an ellipse with two foci: the kingdom of God, and personal redemption or justification. Christ's vocation was to found the kingdom of God among men and be the bearer of God's ethical lordship over them. It is man's vocation to practice his civil calling morally and to serve the kingdom of God. The latter was understood in moral terms as the goal of God's plan for man living in mutual love. Through justification man is put in a position to realize it by the removal of his consciousness of guilt which issues in his reconciliation to the will of God.

He rejected the concept of the penal wrath of God. Christ's death was not a propitiation of just judgment, but the result of His uttermost loyalty to His vocation. Christ's object was to bring men into the same fellowship with God by sharing His own consciousness of Sonship which He preserved to the end. For Ritschl, religion was always social, and the individual can experience the effects which proceed from Christ only in connexion with the community founded by Him. Among the many scholars influenced by Ritschl were A. Harnack,* W. Herrmann, N. Söderblom,* and J. Kaftan.*

RIZAL, JOSE (1861-1896). Filipino physician and political writer. He studied in various European universities, where he was influenced by Masonry and theological and political liberalism. His parents were turned off their family lands by Dominican friars. He wrote much propaganda against the tyrannical Spanish colonial rule in the Philippines* and against the corruption of the friars. Notable examples of this were Noli Me Tangere (1887) and El Filibusterismo (1891). He was also strongly critical of much traditional Roman dogma which he regarded as superstition. He worked for reform in the Philippines, but was opposed to the use of violence. He was nevertheless branded as a revolutionary, and first exiled and later shot by a Spanish firing squad. His death was used by revolutionary leaders to arouse Filipino fury. Formerly a saint of the Philippine Independent Church, he is venerated as the Philippines' national hero. Roman Catholic historians dubiously claim that he recanted and returned to the Roman fold before he was executed. Various Rizalista cults now worship him as a "Second Christ," and even look for his return.

ROBERT OF ABRISSEL (c.1055-1117). Itinerant preacher and founder of the Order of Fontevrault. He studied at Paris under Anselm of Laon and taught at Anger between 1085 and 1090. He then took up life as a hermit and attracted a number of disciples. He founded a monastic community at La Roe, and in 1096 Urban II visited him and urged him to become an itinerant preacher. He spent the remainder of his life preaching, and was particularly noted for his work among the poor and prostitutes. He gained a reputation for his saintly life, and a number of miracles were attributed to him. In 1100 he built a monastery at Fontevrault and in 1116 drew up a constitution for the new order. RUDOLPH HEINZE

ROBERT OF JUMIÈGES (d. c.1055). Archbishop of Canterbury, 1051-52. Prior of St. Ouen, Rouen, and then abbot of Jumièges, he befriended in Normandy the exiled English royal claimant, Edward the Confessor,* and went to England with Edward when the latter became king in 1042. Robert established himself as one of the king's closest advisers and the leader of the Norman group at court. He was bishop of London (1044-51) and archbishop of Canterbury (1051-52), and he might have been responsible for modeling Edward's Westminster Abbey on the abbey church at Jumièges. It has been suggested that while Robert was on his way to receive his pallium from the pope in 1051 he also visited William of Normandy to tell him that Edward was recognizing him as his heir. In 1051 Robert's political rival, Godwin, the king's father-in-law and the leader of the English party at court, rebelled and was exiled, only to return in 1052, when Robert fled to Rome. He died at Jumièges a few years later. PETER TOON

ROBERT OF MELUN (d.1167). English scholar and bishop. Student and successor of Abelard* at St. Geneviève, he taught John of Salisbury* and Thomas à Becket* at Melun, and may have held a chair of theology at St.-Victor. After teaching in France for forty years he was summoned home about 1160 by Thomas à Becket, who hoped for his support, and was consecrated bishop of Hereford in 1163. Robert at first cast his weight on Henry II's side and tried to moderate Becket's rigidity, but he also deterred Henry from any violence against the archbishop, and was one of the mediators sent by Becket to request the king's permission to leave England. Robert later veered to Becket's side and was intending to obey the archbishop's summons to join him on the Continent when he was prevented by royal authority, and he died soon afterward.

In his thinking, Robert was a moderate realist, as evidenced in his Sententiae, his best-known work, in which his position provided a transition from the nominalism of Abelard to the realism of the school of St.-Victor. In this work, which may well have influenced Thomas Aquinas,* Robert did not hesitate to counter Bernard of Clairvaux and to side in part with Abelard in the controversy on the Trinity. His other major works were his Quaestiones de divina pagina, a work in the style of Abelard's Sic et non, which went beyond its model in providing resolutions for the issues, and his Quaestiones de epistolis Pauli, which established him as the founder of a school of commentators on Paul. In all his works, Robert exhibited a sturdy intellectual independence.

MARY E. ROGERS

ROBERT OF MOLESME (c.1027-1111). Abbot of Molesme in Burgundy. Of noble birth, he entered the abbey of Moutier-la-Celle when fifteen years old, and later became prior. He spent a brief period at St.-Michel-de-Tonnerre, but here, as at his first abbey, he was unable to promote the observance of a stricter interpretation of the Benedictine Rule. In response to the call of some hermits living in the forest of Colan he was able to join them in founding a monastery at Molesme on strict principles. This establishment flourished, but after some disagreements Robert and some monks left to found a new monastery at Cîteaux (of which Bernard of Clairvaux was to be a member in 1113). Robert, however, agreed to return to Molesme, which under his long rule became a famous Benedictine house. PETER TOON

ROBERTS, EVAN JOHN (1878-1951). Welsh revivalist. Born in Glamorgan, the ninth of the fourteen children of Henry Roberts, pitman, and his wife Hannah, his education at the parish school ended when at twelve years of age he accompanied his father to the coalmine. In 1902 he was apprenticed as a blacksmith, but was accepted as a candidate for the ministry by the Calvinistic Methodist* Church in 1904, and entered a preparatory school at Newcastle Emlyn. Even as a young man he was a remarkable character. For eleven years he devoted himself to intense intercession for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. He was also granted visions and vivid experiences of the divine presence.

By 1904 there were indications in many parts of Wales that a revival was about to happen, and in that year while attending a meeting to deepen the spiritual life at Blaenannerch, Roberts underwent a profound experience of being anointed by the Holy Spirit. He returned home to Loughor and began to hold prayer meetings at his home church, Moriah. On successive nights these meetings drew ever larger crowds, and within a matter of weeks the revival had swept across Glamorganshire with tremendous power. The most significant feature of the revival was its concentration on the gift of the Holy Spirit; the meetings, even when Evan Roberts was present, were conducted with complete spontaneity. People were urged to pray, testify, confess, or sing as the Spirit moved them. Soon Roberts and a group of young friends began to make revival tours, first in Glamorgan, then Liverpool, Anglesey, and finally Caernarvonshire (November 1904–January 1906).

Yet the revival was by no means limited to places visited by Roberts: it was a national phenomenon and it was calculated that it led to some 100,000 conversions. By any standards it was a mighty movement of the Spirit, and since it was followed in great detail by the press, it had worldwide publicity. But physically the revival broke Evan Roberts. He retired from public life and went to live in Leicester. He returned to Wales about 1925 and died some twenty-five years later at Cardiff.

ROBERTSON, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1816-1853). Anglican preacher. Educated at Edinburgh and Oxford universities, he became incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, where in the six years before his death he established a reputation as preacher equal to that of any man in the nineteenth century, Newman not excluded. Robertson was a Celt with all the fire of his race, but he was also apparently subject to fits of depression. He began as an Evangelical, but the practice of some of those professing this view of Christianity during his first curacy at Cheltenham did much to drive him from any sympathy with them. Nonetheless, he brought Evangelical passion to his beliefs and his preaching.

Robertson's fame coincided with the rise of Christian Socialism* under F.D. Maurice,* and his views were closely allied with those of the movement. He was, indeed, variously accused of being a socialist and a rationalist, and he certainly had a social gospel to preach, but he was not a socialist in the secular political sense of the term. Nor was he a rationalist. He would perhaps have been considered to approach the modernism of the early twentieth century, with his moral equations of biblical phenomena, characters, and events. He sought to interpret in the light of man's actual experience; the Virgin, for instance, epitomized the adoration of womanly purity. This is what points to Robertson's strength. He was a great psychological preacher, understanding the motivations of those characters who formed his subjects and relating these to the motivations of his hearers. His style—and all he left is notes—is simple, direct, forceful, a mirror of the feverish energy and wholehearted dedication which he brought to his task. His Sermons were published in 1906.

ROBINSON, HENRY WHEELER (1872-1945). English Baptist scholar. Born in Northampton, he was educated at Edinburgh University and Mansfield College, Oxford, then studied at continental universities. He held Baptist pastorates at Pitlochry in Scotland and Coventry before becoming tutor in Rawdon Baptist College in 1906. Thereafter for fourteen years he showed the teaching skill and administrative gifts which he was to display most notably when he was appointed principal of Regent's Park College, a post he held until his retirement in 1942. Known widely in scholarly circles beyond his own denomination, he served also for seven years from 1934 as reader in biblical criticism at Oxford. His many works include The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament (1913; rev. 1956), The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928), and Redemption and Revelation (1938). J.D. DOUGLAS

ROBINSON, JOHN (c.1575-1625). English Separatist and pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers. He was born in England, though early records of Robinson's life are scanty. He may have graduated at Cambridge in 1598. He was for a time curate in a Norwich church. He imbibed Puritan views and joined a Separatist* group at Scrooby Manor of which he became pastor. He fled to Holland with this group to avoid persecution, settling in Leyden by 1609. He was ordained as the pastor of their newly formed church in May 1609. For a time he was a student at the University of Leyden. He held a Separatist view of Communion, sided with the Calvinists in the Arminian* controversy, and advocated congregational church government. He urged emigration, and a small part of his church sailed from Holland, stopping first at England in 1620. The Mayflower landed at Plymouth, Massachusetts, on 11 November 1620. Robinson never emigrated, choosing rather to remain as pastor of the major portion of the church, which stayed in Holland. Though he was never to arrive in New England, his influence on the Plymouth Separatists was profound, due to his teaching before the voyage, his tracts and letters to the flock, and his guidance of Brewster as their spiritual adviser in New England. He is perhaps best known for his farewell sermon to the Pilgrims at Leyden on 21 July 1620. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

ROCH (c.1350-c.1378). Late medieval miracle-worker. Little trustworthy information is available on his life, despite early biographies which unfortunately are filled with legend and chronological errors. Born in Montpellier, France, he went to Italy where he became famous for his ability to bring about miraculous cures of the plague by prayer and the sign of the cross. After his death he was widely venerated in France and Italy, and a cult of St. Roch developed. He became the saint to invoke against the plague, and Luther mentioned him in this context in his denunciation of medieval saint worship in his Large Catechism. Roch's relics were taken to Venice in 1485, where a shrine was erected in his honor. RUDOLPH HEINZE

ROCK, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1678-1749). German religious leader. Born at Oberwälden, Württemberg, of poor parents, he became a harnessmaker, but in 1707 underwent a mystical experience, was "seized with inspiration," and became a prophet or "vessel" of the ecstatic communities of the True Inspired, closely related to, if not descended from, earlier French prophetic movements. He led his sect together with Eberhard Ludwig Gruber till 1728, and thereafter alone. A powerful teacher and leader, he lost many followers through personal quarrels, including that with Zinzendorf* in 1734 over Rock's rejection of preaching and the sacraments, through defections to the Herrnhutters and allied movements, and through emigration to America. After Rock's death his mystical communities declined rapidly, despite a temporary revival in Germany and America in the early nineteenth century. IAN SELLERS

RODEHEAVER, HOMER ALVAN (1880-1955). Song evangelist and publisher. Born in Hocking County, Ohio, he learned the cornet during boyhood in Newcomb, Tennessee. He studied music, becoming a trombonist, at Ohio Wesleyan University between 1896 and 1904. As music director for evangelists W.E. Biederwolf* and Billy Sunday* he developed group singing techniques to a fine art, effectively using lively, nondoctrinal gospel songs such as "Brighten the corner." His Rodeheaver Publishers of Sacred Music (1910-35) and Rodeheaver Hall-Mack Company (since 1935) became the world's largest gospel music publishers. "Rody" wrote many songs and after 1920 conducted the Rodeheaver Sacred Music Conference annually at Winona Lake, Indiana. In 1950 he founded Rodeheaver Boys' Ranch, Palatka, Florida. D.E. PITZER

ROGERS, JOHN (c.1500-1555). Protestant martyr. Born near Birmingham, he was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, was from 1532 rector of a London church, then in 1534 became chaplain to the English merchants in Antwerp, where he assisted in smuggling forbidden books into England. Here he met William Tyndale,* then engaged in his translation of the OT, and embraced the Reformed faith, After Tyndale's martyrdom he used his manuscripts together with the already published translation of Miles Coverdale* to produce his influential "Matthew's Bible"* in 1537. Rogers's own share in the work was largely confined to the prefaces and marginal notes. Matthew's Bible was to be a major inspiration in all those translations which led up to the Authorized Version of 1611. Rogers now married and removed to a pastorate at Wittenberg, where he studied Melanchthon's* writings, some of which he later translated. He returned to England in 1548, was presented to two crown livings in London in 1550, and a year later was made prebendary and divinity lecturer at St. Paul's Cathedral. His advanced political and religious views had already caused him trouble under Northumberland's protectorate. With the advent of Queen Mary he was arrested and put into Newgate Gaol with J. Hooper* and others. After cruel sufferings he was burnt at the stake in 1555 in the presence of his wife and children—the first Protestant martyr of the new reign. IAN SELLERS

ROLLE OF HAMPOLE, RICHARD (c.1295-1349). Born in Thornton Dale, Yorkshire, he studied at Oxford, leaving at nineteen to live as a hermit. Moving from place to place, and preaching, he spent his last years at Hampole near a convent of Cistercian nuns who were under his spiritual guidance. He left seven treatises in Latin, a dozen commentaries on and translations of books of Scripture in Latin and English, several letters, and a number of English lyrics. Standing within the late medieval mystical tradition, he left as his two major works Incendium Amoris and Melum Contemplativorum. Read until the Reformation, he directed his writing not to the cloistered community but to those in the world, expressly using the vernacular and simple language. He does not reckon with the higher degrees of the mystical life, not having experienced that, nor did he know contemporary German mystics and the Dionysian influence there. While at Oxford he rebelled against the Scholastic teaching, which explains the simplicity and lack of formal learning in his work, despite the seeming influence of Augustine, Hugh of St.-Victor, and Bonaventura. He comes down equally on piety and learning as well as worldliness and fashion, and views the hermit as not inferior to the prelate or monk. Later English mystics knew his work, and he did influence the Lollards.

ROMAINE, WILLIAM (1714-1795). Evangelical Anglican. Born in Hartlepool and educated at Houghton-le-Spring Grammar School, Durham, he graduated from Christ Church, Oxford, was ordained in the Church of England, and served curacies at Lewtrenchard, Devon, and Banstead, Surrey. He was chaplain to Daniel Lambert in his year of office as lord mayor of London in 1741. One of his absorbing interests was the Hebrew language, and he spent much time preparing a new edition of the Hebrew Dictionary of Marios de Calasio (d.1620). Moving to London in 1748, he became lecturer at St. George's, Billingsgate, and later at St. Dunstan-in-the-West. By this time he was a convinced Evangelical and the friend of George Whitefield, the countess of Huntingdon, and others. Excelling as a preacher, he attracted large crowds in London and on preaching tours in the country. He wished to see the Gospel penetrate the whole church and nation, and organized days of prayer to this end. In 1766 he was appointed rector of St. Anne's Blackfriars, and remained there until his death. He also continued his lectureship at St. Dunstan's. His message was a warm, Calvinistic evangelicalism. His most famous work is the trilogy, The Life, Walk, and Triumph of Faith (1771-94). A new edition with biography (ed. P. Toon) was published in 1970.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM. In the past the unchanging character of Rome made it comparatively straightforward to describe Catholicism. The shattering developments of the twentieth century have made that task much more complex. The constantly changing situation means a wide variety of opinions, making a comprehensive survey almost impossible, especially within the restricted confines of a short article. It is, however, possible to detect two major groupings within Rome, and while admitting that the dividing lines are not always clearly drawn, it seems legitimate to speak of "traditional" Catholicism and "the new Catholicism" and to survey the whole from these two aspects.

Traditional Catholicism. The dogmatic formulation may be found in the decrees of the Council of Trent,* the Creed of Pope Pius IV,* the decrees of Vatican I* and II,* papal utterances claiming infallibility, and the body of Roman canon law.* Alongside these there is the liturgy, and behind them the hierarchically organized church.

It is in fact the doctrine of the church which is fundamental to an understanding of traditional Catholicism. Developed across the centuries, it bears the marks of the Middle Ages when the imperial background lent weight to the concept of the church as an imperium with a resultant stress on ecclesiastical structure, on the hierarchy, and on the claims of the pope as absolute monarch. These claims reached their zenith in the bull of Boniface VIII,* the Unam Sanctam issued in 1302 with its affirmation: "extra ecclesiam nulla salus" ("outside the church there is no salvation"). Submission to the authority of the pope was written into the terms of salvation.

The stormy days of the Reformation* with the subsequent attempt by the Counter-Reformation movement to regain ground led to a continued rigidity and an emphasis on structure and organization. This trend was accelerated dramatically at the First Vatican Council in 1870 when the dogma of papal infallibility was promulgated—the concept of the imperium had reached its climax.

But there is another element in the traditional doctrine of the church which has its roots in the Pauline analogy of the church as the body of Christ. Paul, however, does not make the disastrous mistake which has vitiated so much Roman Catholic thinking on this issue—he does not so overstress the unity of the head and members that he ignores the distinction. Christ always remains the head with the strong overtones of authority implicit in that headship. Rome on the contrary has so emphasized the unity of head and members as virtually to identify them. Hence the emergence of the concept of the church as the extension of the Incarnation. Just as Jesus of Nazareth was the Son of God incarnate, so, it is claimed, the church is Christ continuing incarnate in the world. The two streams of thought—the church as imperium outside which is no salvation, and as the continuing incarnation—flowed together in the encyclical of Pius XII,* the Mystici Corporis issued in 1943. The body of Christ is firmly equated with the hierarchical Roman Catholic Church in which Christ speaks and works as He did in Nazareth and at Calvary.

The traditional line continued at Vatican II. Pope Paul VI in a speech declared the church to be "Christ's continuation and extension." His speech was echoed in the Vatican II decree on the church. While there is a new stress on the biblical idea of the people of God, the old conception still stands. "We must not think of the church as two substances but a single complex reality, the compound of a human and a divine element ... the nature taken by the divine Word serves as the living organ of salvation in a union with Him which is indissoluble" (I:8). Hence it is stated that the church "is incapable of being at fault in belief" (II:12). The church, it must be stressed, is still assessed by Vatican II in traditional terms: "this church ... has its existence in the Catholic Church under the government of Peter's successor and the Bishops in communion with him" (I:8).

This fundamental concept colors the interpretation of Christ's messianic office. As prophet He still speaks within His church with the same infallibility as in the days of His earthly ministry. As priest He still offers Himself on the altar in the Mass as really as He did on the cross. As king He exercises His royal authority through His appointed agency the hierarchy of the church. The consequence of all this is quite clear: the church deprives herself of the divinely given corrective to error, for she equates the Word of God in Scripture and the Word of God in the church. She becomes herself the standard of truth. Such a church, says a critical Catholic, Hans Küng, turns itself into a revelation.

Allied to this basic doctrine is Rome's sacramental interpretation of Christianity. The sacraments which are ministered by the church are channels by which the grace of God flows to the recipient. There are seven sacraments—baptism, confirmation, the Mass, holy orders, penance, matrimony, extreme unction. While baptism may be administered in extremis by a layman, the normal administration of this sacrament and the essential administration of the others are by a priest or a bishop. In a valid sacrament three conditions are required—there must be the correct matter (e.g., water in baptism), the right form (e.g., words of consecration), and the true intention (the one who ministers must intend what the church purposes). Granted that the recipient places no obstacle in the way, the sacraments work ex opere operato ("by virtue of the performance of the work").

In baptism, original sin is cleansed and original righteousness restored by the infusion of grace. Behind this teaching lies the Roman view of man. Man's original righteousness is viewed as a donum superadditum ("an additional gift"). The Fall meant the loss of that gift, but not the impairment of his essential integrity. So original sin is dealt with by the replacement of the gift. This infusion of sanctifying grace is deepened in confirmation and is sustained by the Mass and by the regular ministry of the sacrament of penance in the confessional.

The focal point of traditional Roman Catholic worship is the Mass. The dogma which lies behind the Mass is that of transubstantiation.* Promulgated at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 and reaffirmed with great vigor by Pope Paul in the Mysterium Fidei issued during Vatican II, this dogma asserts that after the words of consecration, the substance of the bread and wine become actually and really the body and blood, the soul and divinity of Christ. With transubstantiation accepted, and with the conception of the priest as himself another Christ (see the encyclical of Pius XI* Ad Catholici Sacerdotii), the Mass is viewed as the sacrifice of Christ. Although now offered in an unbloody manner, yet the sacrifice is the same as that at Calvary. It is a "propitiatory" sacrifice to meet the judgment of God, and an "impetratory" one to invoke and to ask for specific blessings. The comment on this whole position is the strong emphasis of the epistle to the Hebrews on the finished work of the once-for-all sacrifice and on Christ as the one, only, and all-sufficient high priest.

Vatican II in its decree on the priestly life continues the traditional teaching. Priests are "given the power of sacred Order, to offer sacrifice, forgive sin, and in the name of Christ publicly to exercise the office of priesthood in the community of the faithful" (chap. 1, para. 2). This fails to face the fact that in the NT the term for a sacrificing priest (hiereus) is never applied to a Christian minister; he is an elder, a pastor, a bishop, but never a priest.

The confessional has always played a key role in traditional Catholicism with the sacrament of penance* as its basis. Sins are classified as mortal, which deprive the soul of sanctifying grace, and venial, which are not so serious. Repentance* is either contrition (i.e., true sorrow for sin) or attrition (i.e., sorrow for sin for a lesser motive, such as fear of punishment). Venial sin may be dealt with by attrition, moral sin either by contrition or by attrition plus recourse to confession—though it should be noted that contrition implies an intention to go to confession. Guilt requires not only absolution but reparation to be offered to divine justice, hence the imposition of penance and hence also the practice of indulgences,* in which the benefits of the alleged heavenly treasury of merit* may be set to the sinner's account either at his own request or at his friends' request after his death and during his detention in purgatory.* Comment on this must be sought in the NT stress on the sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice and the complete satisfaction of God's justice.

Mary. A prominent feature in Roman Catholic worship is the cult of Mary.* Consideration of this provides an appropriate transition to a description of the new Catholicism, for "Mary" provides a common ground on which very varied viewpoints come together so that Vatican II theologians as radical as Schillebeeckx of Holland can be as conservative as any traditionalist in dealing with Mary—witness his book, Mary the Mother of the Redemption. Development of the cult stems from the period when the Constantinian settlement brought an influx of pagan ideas into the churches—the mother goddess of the Mediterranean world, the female goddess with such titles as "Star of the sea" and with such roles as "Our lady" of this or that city, the mother and child motif of the Horus and Isis cult in Egypt. All these were to be reflected in Marian developments. The centuries-old debate between Dominicans and Franciscans was finally settled by Pius IX* in 1854 with the promulgation in the bull Ineffabilis Deus of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* of Mary—that Mary was conceived without sin. It marked the triumph of the Franciscan theory of Duns Scotus* that in Mary we see "redemption by exemption," i.e., her preservation from the stain of original sin. The cult was carried further in 1950 by the dogmatic pronouncement of Pius XII* in the Apostolic Constitution Munificentissimus of the bodily Assumption* of Mary. Vatican II in spite of the reservations of some liberals went further still in pronouncing Mary the mother of the church and in giving a tacit recognition to Marian devotions.

The cult of Mary is significant theologically in that, as Sebastian Bullock pointed out (Roman Catholicism), it embodies the Roman Catholic view of human merit and of human cooperation in the work of salvation which are exemplified supremely in Mary. It is significant emotionally in that it shows how such a cult can exercise so firm a hold. It is significant in the contemporary situation as it indicates the difficulty of a liberal Catholic in breaking from his traditional past. In reply to the cult, one must point to the total silence of the NT on the roles and honors accorded by Rome to Mary and to such telling evidence against them as Mark 3:33-35; Luke 1:47; 2:49; 11:27, 28. He offered Himself (1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 9:14; John 10:18)—it was not Mary who offered Him.

The New Catholicism. The prelude to the present developments in Rome may be traced to the modernist movement at the turn of the century. Pius X* acted firmly and condemned the movement in the decree Lamentabili and in the encyclical Pascendi of 1907, and in 1910 the antimodernist oath was imposed on the clergy. The reaction against modernism continued as far as the pontificate of Pius XII,* whose encyclical Humani Generis in 1950 firmly asserted the teaching authority of the papal office.

It was Pope John XXIII* who opened the door to the progressives both by convening the Vatican Council, which was to give them an invaluable forum, and also by introducing a distinction, vitally significant to them, when in his speech at the opening of the council he declared that "the substance of the ancient doctrine of the deposit of faith is one thing, and the way in which it is presented is another." Pope Paul VI* tried to stem the flood. His assertion of traditional eucharistic dogmas and devotions in the Mysterium Fidei was a counterblast to the reforms proposed in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. His Credo delivered at the time of the Uppsala* meeting of the World Council of Churches was a further call for a return to traditional dogma. But the tide was running too swiftly and continues to surge forward, so that Hans Küng, for example, in his Infallible can tear papal infallibility to shreds with the vigor of an old-style Protestant controversialist and substitute for the dogma of infallibility his own emphasis on the indefectibility of the church. At the same time transubstantiation is being replaced by trans-signification; clerical celibacy* is in the arena of debate; cherished positions and devotions are questioned, and in many cases abandoned.

It is difficult to generalize about a movement which is itself in state of flux—today's description can be quickly dated. Then again, the variety of men involved means a variety of opinions. However, one can detect certain governing aims in the movement. There is an attempt to be biblical. There is a strong ecumenical emphasis. There is a firm desire to remain within Rome and to work for reform.

Undoubtedly there is a new biblical emphasis, not only in the realm of theological studies, but also at the popular level of encouraging Bible reading. There is an attempt to get away from the Council of Trent's* insistence on two sources of revelation, "Scripture and Tradition," and to make tradition the living voice of the church commenting on Scripture, although Vatican II retained the traditional position. The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation firmly welds together in a unity "sacred tradition, holy Scripture and the Church's magisterium" (II:10). The biblical emphasis of the progressives is also affected by their acceptance of the theories of contemporary radical biblical criticism with its "demythologizing" approach. There is also in some quarters a measure of agreement with the radical Protestant's rejection of the whole conception of propositional truth—existential experience rather than divine revelation becomes the criterion.

The ecumenical interest has moved the "new" Catholics away from the old view of Protestants as heretics. The latter have become "separated brethren," unity with whom being the aim. But it is not the ultimate aim, for the progressives look beyond the churches of the Reformation and Greek Orthodoxy to Judaism, to the great non-Christian religions, and even to atheism as they increasingly emphasize the ultimate synthesis which is Catholicism's goal. Behind this far-reaching vision is the widespread acceptance of some form of universalism. Behind that again is the incarnational theology which sees Christ sanctifying everything by His coming and redeeming all men by His death. The old idea of a latent faith is introduced, allied to the acceptance of "baptism by desire." The way is open, not only to acknowledge Protestants as "brothers by baptism," but to see in Muslims, Hindus, and even atheists those who by exercising "implicit" faith are in the "hidden" church in contrast with those whose explicit faith and sacramental initiation make them members of the explicit church.

Their attempt to remain loyal to Rome meets the countercharges of the conservatives that they are the old modernists in a new guise. The liberal reply has been developed at length by Hans Küng. It is that the earlier dogmatic statements are accepted, but words must be interpreted and a sixteenth-century creed must be understood in its own setting. The resultant interpretation of a "new Catholic" differs markedly from that of a traditionalist—hence the tension and at times the acrimonious debate.

Catholic Pentecostalism. This movement emerged in the autumn of 1966 among faculty members at Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Influenced by Protestant Pentecostalism, they yet remained firm in their attachment to Rome; and within six years they were claiming 50,000 adherents. The early leaders of the movement in the USA were mainly laymen. They viewed the movement as heaven's answer to Pope John's prayer for a renewal of the wonders of Pentecost, hence their avoidance of what they considered some of the excessive emotionalism of Protestant Pentecostalism, hence too their encouragement of their followers to remain within Rome.

There is a warm stress in the movement on personal faith in Christ. Prayer, both personal and corporate, is a prominent feature. Bible study is encourged—as of course it is in the wider field of the new Catholicism. Witness to the outsider is emphasized. All these are elements linking the movement with Protestant evangelicals, but there are other features which root the movement firmly in Roman Catholicism, and still others which point in a radical direction.

The sacramentalism of traditional Catholicism is strongly taught. Leaders in the American movement (like Kevin and Dorothy Ranaghan) or in the English wing (like Simon Tugwell) expound the idea of "Baptism in the Spirit" as an explicit realization and manifestation of the divine life received in a hidden way, and ex opere operato, in baptism in water. Speaking in tongues is seen as one step in the process by which one is permeated by the divine life imparted in baptism—it involves handing over "one little bit of our body to God." The result, it is claimed, is a deeper appreciation of the Mass (with the traditional background of transubstantiation) and of the confessional.

The cult of Mary is particularly prominent. The Ranaghans quote testimonies of a new devotion to Mary and of the use of the Rosary. They found special significance in a tongue-speaking session where the initial "Hail Mary"—spoken in Greek, recognized as such by a participant and interpreted—led to a Marian emphasis which to their added delight proved to be a prelude to the next day—one of the major Marian festivals of the year.

One is forced to ask how it can be claimed that the Spirit of truth can lead into such doctrines as transubstantiation and the eucharistic sacrifice, and how the Spirit whose ministry is to glorify Christ could lead men to derogate from that glory by devotion to Mary. But the question comes even more insistently when it is discovered that the universalism already noticed in the new Catholicism appears, and the Pentecostal experience is linked with Zen, Transcendental Meditation, and even Marxism as steps toward the ultimate Catholic synthesis of human experience.

The ultimate criterion in the movement turns out to be experience. Scripture and tradition may be invoked, but ultimately it is the intensity of experience which authenticates the doctrine. The old position was that "doctrine precedes exegesis"; now, however, we read Scripture through the eyes of experience. This approach is more akin to existentialism than to the biblical stress on the mind—"faith comes by hearing," not by a blind leap in the dark.

ROMANIA. The origins of Christianity in the area comprising modern Romania are uncertain. The Roman occupation of the region (Dacia) ended in A.D. 275. There may have been Christians among the Roman legions and colonists. By the fourth century, Christian communities had grown up in the Dacian regions as missionaries from centers on the right bank of the Danube carried on an expanding ministry. Shortly after this period, the waves of barbarian invasions began, and not until the medieval epoch can one speak of a full-fledged Christian church in Romania. With the establishment of the two principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, organized Christianity began the thread which leads to the present. The metropolitanate of Ungro-Vlahia was founded in 1359, that of Moldavia in 1401; their recognition by the patriarchate of Constantinople signaled an acceptance of important religious and political developments rather than their inception.

With the fall of Constantinople in 1453, Romanian princes, notably Stefan the Great (1457-1504) and Neagoe Basarab (1512-21), became for a time the heirs of Byzantium and secular leaders of the entire Orthodox Church. They led campaigns against the infidel Turks, assumed patronage over Athos* monasteries, sponsored cultural advances, and instituted a remarkable series of monastic foundations whose architectural and artistic brilliance can still be seen. At the same time began an influx of Greek churchmen and culture. Their intellectual and theological influence led to a Romanian-Greek-Slavonic synthesis of merit, but their moral impact was not always as salutary.

The apogee of the Romanian Orthodox Church came in the seventeenth century. Powerful, cultured rulers coincided with notable church metropolitans. Under their aegis, theological synods were held, prolific presses established, monastic reforms enacted. Church leaders such as Varlaam (1632-53) and Dosofteiu (1671-86) of Moldavia, and Stefan (1648-68), Teodosie (1668-1708), and Antim (1708-16) of Wallachia carried on a wide program of cultural and religious activities, with key achievements being the establishment of the Romanian language in the liturgy and the publication of the Bucharest Bible in 1688, the first complete translation into Romanian.

In the next century, however, the Romanian Church fell increasingly under Greek domination as Phanariot princes replaced native rulers. More and more monasteries became Greek fiefs, and the general level of religious life declined. The language remained Romanian, however, and important reforms were carried out on lower levels. In the latter part of the century, Eugumen Paisie sparked a reform in Moldavia, and this spread into the nineteenth century under Metropolitans Iacob Stimati (1792-1803) and Veniamin Costache (1803-42). Both were men of the Enlightenment,* possessors of vast erudition and literary skill. The union of the two principalities in 1859 produced various attempts at unifying the church also. These schemes failed, though the Romanian Church became officially autocephalous in 1885. The secularization of the Greek-controlled dedicated monasteries in 1863 was an important event. The nineteenth century saw also the challenge of "new" denominations which transcended ethnic lines. Most important of these were the Baptists, who spread eastward from Hungary* beginning in 1870. At the same time Roman Catholicism became strong enough in Romania to form the archbishopric of Bucharest (1883).

Transylvania, the third Romanian principality, fell under Hungarian domination in the eleventh century, becoming subsequently the target of strenuous Catholic missionary efforts under the sponsorship of the Crown. These met with little success among the Romanian population. In the sixteenth century, Hungary's defeat by the Turks coincided with the beginnings of the Reformation,* and the German (Saxon) population of Transylvania was rapidly Lutheranized under the Reformer Johannes Honterus. The Magyar nobility, on the other hand, slowly became Calvinists (and a few, Unitarians) through a complex of events. The ethnic Romanian population remained staunchly Orthodox. The Reformation in Transylvania produced the first printed books in Romanian as well as a general religious and cultural revival among all the national groups of the area; its influence on the other side of the Carpathians remained largely cultural.

The brief unification of all three Romanian principalities under Michael the Brave (1600-1601) saw the first stable Orthodox hierarchy in Transylvania. The restoration of the now-Calvinist Magyar nobility forced the new church to accept many points of Reformed doctrine, though the great metropolitan, Sava Brancovici (1656-80), gained a brief reduction of Calvinist influence. In 1691 Transylvania came under (Hapsburg) Catholic rule again, and Catholicism (with Calvinism, Lutheranism, and Unitarianism) was declared one of the four "received religions." Jesuit efforts were unsuccessful, but in 1698 the Transylvania Greek Catholic Church (Uniate) was born through the adherence of the Orthodox metropolitan Anastasiu. In exchange for the suzerainty of the pope and the doctrines of purgatory and the Filioque, the Romanians kept their dogma and liturgy intact and were granted equal rights with the "received" clergy. The great majority of Orthodox clergy and believers refused to accept the new church, but the Transylvania Orthodox Church disappeared for half a century anyway.

The Transylvania Uniate Church, paradoxically, became the rallying center of the great Romanian national revival of the eighteenth century. Educational and spiritual reforms were effected, a vote obtained in the Diet, and the right established to build Romanian schools and churches. In 1758 the Orthodox hierarchy of Transylvania was reconstituted and included more than 80 per cent of the Romanian population. Reform began under Episcop Vasile Moga of Sibiu (1811-46) and his successor Andreiu Saguna (1848-73), the greatest modern Romanian churchman, who refounded a Transylvanian metropolitanate free of Serbian control in 1864 and reorganized and democratized church structure.

The union of all three Romanian principalities resulting from World War I led to a unification of the three Orthodox hierarchies. In 1925 Miron Cristea was named the first patriarch of Romania. The Orthodox and Uniate cults were designated as the "national" cults, comprising respectively 72.6 percent and 7.9 percent of the population (the two were merged after 1948). The Catholics (7 percent), Calvinists (3.9 percent), Lutherans (2.2 percent), and Unitarians (0.4 percent) continued their previous status as "received" cults, while the Baptists (0.3 percent) and other Protestant groups were classified as "tolerated" cults.

PAUL E. MICHELSON

ROMANOS (d.556). Greek hymnwriter, known as "Melodus." A Syrian by birth, he served as deacon in the Church of the Resurrection at Beirut, then went to Constantinople under the patronage of Patriarch Anastasius I. There he wrote over 1,000 hymns of which only some eighty survive. They are dramatic and vivid and have at least twenty-four strophes. Their subjects include the OT and NT and the church year. The most famous is the Christmas Day hymn, "On this day the Virgin gave birth to the Transcendent One." This was regularly sung on Christmas Eve in the imperial palace until the twelfth century.

ROME. The oldest settlement was made seventeen miles NE upstream from the Tiber mouth on the Tyrrhenian coast of the Italian peninsula, where a cluster of hills provided a natural location for village farming complexes. The river valley itself was too swampy and unhealthy for original occupation, but provided a burial ground both for cremation (Villanovan; northern) and inhumation (Picene; southern) practices from the ninth to the sixth centuries B.C., the Tiber serving as a rough distinguishing boundary. At the site of Rome, however, their overlapping complicates the use of burial practice for identifying its particular settlers. The late first-century annalist Tacitus summarized the most ancient history of Rome thus: "In the beginning Rome was ruled by kings." His predecessor Titus Livius set the traditional date of foundation at 21 April 753 B.C.

With the passing of the kings the Republic came into being, late enough in time (509 B.C.) for its chroniclers not to resist the achievement before them of the democratic governments of the Greek city-states, especially Magna Graecia and Sicily. The defining event which initiated actual Roman achievement was the sacking of the city in 387 B.C. by marauding Gauls. Thereafter Rome by sword wielded, colonies founded, and roads constructed brought all Italy south of the Po into a political confederation. For eight centuries the city was to stand inviolate, confirming in history her own mythos, but by no means immune from internal wranglings. Gradually the exploiting of party politics and the city's inhabitants transformed the republican empire into the imperial state. Yet the architectural impact of this process, with corresponding levels of "full" employment throughout the Roman world as well as in the city, was remarkable. The enormous profits from political murders and confiscations were turned into building programs that gave external symbolization to the revolution. Pompey brought Rome its first stone theatre, the Campus Martius; Caesar built a great new basilica in the republican forum, and to its north began a new Forum which was to serve as prototype for his imperial successors.

By the time of Augustus the population seems to have been well over one million. The period from Augustus to Diocletian and the next great reform of state, a span of three full centuries, may be divided into two phases. The first lists those sixteen emperors beginning with Tiberius and ending with Commodus, through the first two centuries A.D., of whom eight died natural deaths, ten had reigns of ten years, and three (Tiberius, Hadrian,* Antoninus Pius*) more than twenty. While unrest beset succession with the suicide of Nero,* the whole period has been termed Pax Romana, reflecting the stability of the internal economy and the transfer of power as well as of the external peace.

It was during this phase that Christianity came into being. Individual Christians, presumably undifferentiated from Jews, were in Rome already in the reign of Claudius, as his edict forcing Jews to leave the city affected Priscilla and Aquila. Yet Paul's* letter to the Romans, written not later than A.D. 56, reflects a continuing church there which he had not yet visited. Acts* terminates with Paul's arrival and initial work in Rome. The tradition, as cited by Irenaeus and Eusebius, denotes by unbroken list the succession from Paul and Peter,* beginning with Linus,* but records and dates are scanty before the Latin-speaking Victor* at the end of the second century. Apart from Paul and Peter, five names are given for the first century, nine for the second, and seventeen (including two antipopes) until the reign of Diocletian.* Of these the two dissidents, Hippolytus* and Novatian,* are best known, though to the first-century Clement* is ascribed a near-canonical epistle.

Those decisions of Roman policy made about Christianity are also a reflection of the currents constituting the other side of the Pax Romana; even Augustus had not finally solved the larger human problem inherited from the Republic. Under at least six of the rulers of the first phase of the succession, Christianity was beset by some governmental opposition, with increasing severity as the Flavian century wore on. Such interaction between church and state inspired the apologetic series of Christian literature.

The second phase of the succession from the Severi to Diocletian involves no less than twenty-eight imperial claimants, of whom only one (Septimus Severus) died a natural death, and only one other (Alexander Severus) reigned more than ten years. Nevertheless only four of the names (if one excludes Diocletian) are identified as persecutors. In this phase the church as institution emerged with properties, some at least above the subterranean level of the catacombed cemeteries—all of which lay outside the walls of the city (see CATACOMBS). But of the estimated 450 older churches now within urban Rome, not one survives as a pre-Constantinian structure in whole or part, though it may be definitely asserted that such "house-churches" existed in this phase, as both the interrogation of martyrs and imperial rescripts of restitution bear witness. That pre-Constantinian imperial public buildings were later converted into churches of the post-Constantinian state only reflects the subsequent changed relationship of church and state.

Diocletian's reorganization of the Empire, though attacked by Lactantius* as a result of the emperor's renewed assault upon the highly organized church, was a genuine effort to salvage the state by terminating military anarchy and recognizing East-West division. That the main beneficiary in time to come was the church reflects the debt owed to him. While Rome remained capital of the Western portion, the division posed the problem of retaining unity for a state with two centers. Constantine* was committed to Diocletian's genuine reform program, and at his death there emerged the dual state with two capitals after his creation of the "New Rome" in the East. Constantinople* was built from the ground up as a Christian version of the imperial capital.

While Diocletian and Constantine might restore the internal stability by economic measures and political reorganization, nothing could alter the developing situation beyond the frontiers of the fourth-century empire. The increased Germanic pressures on the Rhine-Danube line were matched beyond the Euphrates by the resurgence of a new Sassanid Persia. Rome itself as capital became less advantageous, and once it had proved vulnerable to Visigothic assault in A.D. 410 it was not long before all vestige of imperial government was withdrawn to safer terrain less distant from the fronts. That the sacking of the city after 800 years proved critical for a state newly allied to Christianity is borne out by Augustine's City of God. But that the city, now grossly reduced in dignity and size—estimates suggest a fourth-century population as low as half a million—should become instead the Christian Rome is but a reflection of its bishop being the sole remaining officer of rank within, when first the imperial government was transferred north, and then in 476 officially ceased to exist.

The symbolism of Rome's change of hands is best illustrated in its bishop, Leo, assuming the defunct title pontifex maximus. The Christian Church was thus successor to the ancient religion which was the city, and in such terms the primacy of the Church of Rome came to be declared. Thereby also the city was prepared to survive, though barely, the sequence of besieging disasters that followed: in 455 at Visigothic hands; in 537-38, 546, and 549 in the wars between Ostrogoths and Byzantines, both equally destructive of the city. The latter events saw the city become at one point uninhabited and her aqueducts destroyed (her water supply unrenewed until the sixteenth century). The Saracen threat of 846 saw Leo IV enwall the Vatican, where the circus of Gaius and gardens of Nero had given way to Constantine's basilica dedicated to Peter—the center of a Christian Rome.

ROSARY. In Roman Catholicism a Marian prayer composed of fifteen decades of "Hail Marys," with an "Our Father" preceding and a "Glory be to the Father" following each decade. The recitation is accompanied by meditation upon the fifteen mysteries pertaining to the joys, the sufferings, and the glories of Christ and the Virgin. In Romanism it is a very characteristic aspect of devotion to the Madonna. Existence of the Rosary is attested to by the twelfth and thirteenth centuries among the monks and nuns of the Cistercian* and Mendicant* orders. Later, use of the chaplet (endless string of beads) and the meditations were added to the vocal recitations. Pius V established the formula of the Rosary as it is known today. The feast of the Rosary (7 October) commemorates the victory of Charles VI over the Turks at Lepanto in 1571. The victory was attributed to the intervention of the Virgin. ROYAL L. PECK

ROSCELLINUS (c.1050-1125). Regarded as the founder of medieval Nominalism.* He was probably born at Compiègne and studied at Soissons and Reims. He then taught at Compiègne, and in 1902 was accused of Tritheism at the Synod of Soissons. Although he denied the charge, the synod ordered him to recant and he complied. He then went to England, where he came into conflict with Anselm and returned to France. He became a canon at Bayeaux and taught at Loches, where he again became involved in controversy. He was once again teaching his original position on the Trinity, and Peter Abelard,* one of his students, attacked the position and defended the unity of God in the Trinity. A letter defending himself is the only one of Roscellinus's writings that has survived; therefore his philosophical and theological teachings are known primarily from descriptions of his enemies: Anselm,* Abelard, and John of Salisbury.* His reasoning applied to theology implied that the three persons of the Trinity were three separate Gods. A Nominalist, he does appear, however, to have tried to preserve the unity of the Trinity by maintaining that the three persons had one will and power.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

ROSE, HUGH JAMES (1795-1838). Pre-Tractarian High Churchman. Born at Little Horstead, Norfolk, and educated at Uckfield and Cambridge, he was ordained priest in 1819, served in several parishes, was professor of divinity at Durham (1833-34) and principal of King's College, London (1836-38). Rose was a NT scholar and a member of the group of early nineteenth-century High Churchmen known as the "Clapton Sect" or "Hackney Phalanx." In 1824 he traveled in Germany and wrote a book exposing the dangerous trends of German radical criticism, for which he was, surprisingly, criticized by Pusey. In 1832 he founded the British Magazine, in which Newman's and Keble's "Lyra Apostolica" were first published. A meeting at Rose's Hadleigh Rectory in 1833 is rightly said to mark the beginning of the Tractarian* Movement. Though critical of some of the latter's tendencies, he managed to hold the Oxford and Clapton schools together until his death. IAN SELLERS

ROSENMÜLLER, ERNST FRIEDRICH KARL (1768-1835). German biblical scholar. Born in Hessberg, son of an Evangelical Lutheran pastor, he was educated at Leipzig and taught there from 1792, becoming professor of oriental languages in 1813. He prepared in sixteen parts Scholia for the OT (1788-1817), drawing together the insights from the writings of rabbis, Church Fathers, and medieval and Reformation scholars. He published also (1823-31) a handbook to the natural history of the biblical world. Living on the verge of the rediscovery of the ancient Near East, he contributed significantly to the accumulation of knowledge and interpretation which preceded that event, placing it within the restored framework of a concern for the literal meaning of the text. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

ROSE OF LIMA (1586-1617). Peruvian ascetic. Baptized "Isabel de Flores," she later took the name "Rosa de Santa Maria" for the special place of the Virgin Mary in her life. Catherine of Siena* was her model. Enduring mortifications from childhood and forbidden to leave her home, she joined the Third Order of St. Dominic at twenty. Living in a hermitage in the garden, she had an infirmary in the house to care for the destitute children in Peru. Widely known for her mystical gifts and admired by all classes in Lima, she was noticed but untouched by the Inquisition. She prophesied her death exactly, and has been proclaimed patron saint of Peru, all America, the Indies, and the Philippines. She was canonized by Clement X in 1671. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ROSICRUCIANS. One must distinguish between Rosicrucian ideas and Rosicrucian societies. The name derives from Christian Rosenkreuz (Rosycross), who is probably an allegorical figure (c.1378-1484). Between 1614 and 1616 four pamphlets described his travels in the East and his initiation into occult secrets. A Lutheran pastor, J.V. Andreae,* may have been the author of one or more. The pamphlets hinted at a Rosicrucian Fraternity with supernormal powers, but no such society can be traced, until in the eighteenth century several Rosicrucian groups were formed in Germany, Russia, and Poland. They were closely associated with Freemasonry,* and Masonic lodges still have an optional degree, established in 1845, known as the Rose Croix of Heredom, which includes the candidate's symbolic death and resurrection. In Britain this rite is Trinitarian and includes the reading of Isaiah 53. The American rite is given a wholly pagan interpretation.

The Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia was founded by Wentworth Little in 1865. Although not recognized by Masonry, this society limits its eight degrees to Masons only. Early in the present century H. Spencer Lewis founded the Ancient Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), which now is centered in California and advertises postal courses in good-class periodicals. Its publications include the "lost" Book of Jashar, an obvious forgery compiled by Jacob Ilive in 1751, and also a book of the Secret Teachings of Jesus. Its chief rival is the group associated with the late Max Heindel, also based in California.

Although there are secrets for initiates only, the indications are that they are gnostic-theosophical. An AMORC brochure suggests that it concentrates on developing psychic powers. Max Heindel has publications on the Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception, dealing with the world's past evolution under the guidance of great creative hierarchies, and including lost civilizations of Lemuria and Atlantis. Reincarnations provide fresh experiences, rather than the working out of karma, as Theosophy holds. The cross is not the symbol of Christ's atonement, but represents the human body. In the rose at the center there is a chaste and pure vital fluid to overcome the passion-filled blood of the human race.

J. STAFFORD WRIGHT

ROSMINI, ANTONIO (1797-1855). Also "Rosmini-Serbati." Italian philosopher and founder of the order later known as the Suore della Provvidenza ("Sisters of Providence"). Born in Rovereto Trentino, he was ordained priest in 1821. Despite early conservative views, he became the author of many significant progressive works dealing with various aspects of philosophy, politics, law, economics, and natural science. His treatise Delle cinque piaghe della Santa Chiesa, which he wrote after the election of Pius IX in 1846, denounces the insufficient education of the clergy, the divisions among bishops, and the riches of the church, and advocates its return to apostolic poverty and freedom. He laments, moreover, the division between clergy and lay people who are the vital part of the church, and proposes a far greater participation in worship and other church matters. With Gioberti* he hoped for a confederation of Italian states under the leadership of the pope, whose temporal power he considered essential to guarantee his freedom. DAISY RONCO

ROSMINIANS. The Institute of Charity founded by Antonio Rosmini-Serbati,* the Italian philosopher, at the instigation of Maddalena Canossa (1828). It was formally approved by Gregory XVI (1839). Members profess the three religious vows and live retired in prayer and study until called by the pope or by a particular need to some kind of external work such as teaching, preaching, missions, and literature. There are two grades: the presbyters (who take a fourth vow of obedience to the pope) and the coadjutors. There is no distinctive habit, only the cassock. In 1832 the congregation became associated with the Sisters of Providence, founded by one of Rosmini's disciples. The Rosminians went to England in 1835, introducing there the clerical (or Roman) collar and other innovations. There are houses also in Eire and the USA. The central house of the Institute is at St. John at the Latin Gate, Rome.

J.G.G. NORMAN

ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA GEORGINA (1830-1894). Anglican poetess. Daughter of a Dante scholar and sister of two Pre-Raphaelites, she was educated at home and later helped her mother run a school. A High Anglican, she rejected two suitors on religious grounds. These disappointments and ill-health, which led to a secluded life, intensified her religious temperament. She published several books in prose for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Her books of verse, beginning with Goblin Market, and Other Poems (1862) and ending with New Poems (1896), are rich in devotional feeling. Her sonnet sequences, Monna Innominata and Later Life, exalt divine over human love. Some of her poems are sung as hymns, e.g., "In the bleak midwinter"; "Love came down at Christmas"; and "None other Lamb, none other Name."

ROSSETTI, TEODORICO PIETROCOLA, see PIETROCOLA-ROSSETTI

ROTHMAN, BERNT (c.1495-1535). German Anabaptist* leader. A priest of obscure origins and a powerful preacher, he was the chief evangelical Reformer of his native town of Münster. He introduced a Lutheran-style Reformation into Münster in 1532-33 in spite of vigorous official opposition. However, the course of reform in Münster took an unexpected twist when in May 1533 Rothman became an Anabaptist. Events took yet another turn in early 1534 when large numbers of Melchiorities, including the charismatic Dutchmen Jan Matthijs (d.1534) and Jan van Leyden (d.1535), flocked into the city. Rothman then changed his religious orientation once more and accepted Matthijs's radical Melchiorite millennialism. In February 1534 the radicals took over Münster in order to make ready for "the kingdom of God" to be established there shortly at Christ's second coming. First Matthijs and then van Leyden became the dictator of a theocratic state in which both communism and polygamy were introduced. Rothman seems to have been swept along with the tide and served as state preacher. When the ill-fated Münster kingdom fell to a besieging force in June 1535, Rothman reportedly died in the fighting. He left behind several books written at stages in his theological pilgrimage from Rome to radical millenarianism, including his Restitution (1534). ROBERT D. LINDER

ROUAULT, GEORGES (1871-1958). French painter. Born in Paris, he helped for a time on the restoration of the stained glass windows in Chartres Cathedral. He never worked from the Renaissance ideal of pleasing proportion, but reached back, in a fully modern artist's way, to a medieval awareness of suffering, death, and painterly decoration. His apprenticeship in stained glass carried over into his studies of prostitutes, judges, and clowns, where glowing colors of hopeful rage are closed in black-bordered compartments so that the ugliness of sin, the brutality of corruption, the bitterness of human misery come through firmly with a horrified and compassionate understanding. Rouault's black India ink drawings begun around World War I made into prints, Miserere (et Guerre), are a moving series of black and white penitential tears at the ruinousness of war and human inhumanity; the stark, controlled sprawl of lines have a Hebraic roughness, solitary grief muted by dignity. Many of his Christ figures have a mustard-olive, pasty, or bloodied character; but later in life red, green, and yellow friendlier colors come gently and serenely more to the fore, as in the joyous, smiling Sarah (1956), an earnest of the resurrection. But there is always something Jansenist* about Rouault, both sensuous and austere, disquieting and soaring, earthy and mystical together, kindred in spirit to the music of his French compatriot Oliver Messiaen.

CALVIN SEERVELD

ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES (1712-1778). French writer and philosopher. Born in Geneva and raised a Calvinist, he converted to Catholicism in 1728. A former Pietist and his benefactress for the next decade, the French Madame de Warens contributed to the formation of his religious outlook, a Deism tempered by Quietist sentimentalism. After immersing himself in contemporary philosophical literature, Rousseau went to Paris in 1742. Denis Diderot* introduced him to the circle of the philosophes, and he contributed several articles on music to the Encyclopedia. Around 1746 he took Thérèse Levasseur, a servant girl, as his common-law wife. They had five children, all of whom he placed in an orphanage. Rousseau made his literary debut in 1750 with a prize-winning essay submitted to the Dijon academy. This Discourse on the Sciences and Arts contended that public morals and character were corrupted by the progress of knowledge and art. Virtue could be found only in simplicity, when man lives close to nature. After returning to Geneva and the Calvinist faith, he produced his "second discourse" in 1755, an unsuccessful contest entry. It argued that inequality among men was the result of organized society. The natural man was free and happy, but class divisions and despotism arose from land ownership and laws.

Settling in Montmorency in 1756, Rousseau composed three of the eighteenth century's most influential books. In Julie, or the New Héloïse (1760), a passionate love story, he popularized the idea of irresistible love and the beauty of nature, and propounded a natural religion necessary for morality. In Emile (1762), a treatise on education in novel form, he set forth a pedagogical scheme to protect man, inherently good, from the corrupting influences of society. The program's religious aspect was summarized in the chapter on the vicar from Savoy, an unfrocked priest who advocated a sentimental Deism. This included a belief in the existence of God (whose law is written in the conscience) and the immortality of the soul, but no eternal punishment. The Social Contract (1762) contained Rousseau's concept of a just state. The free man voluntarily surrenders his will to the community and submits to its laws which are based on the general will of the people. Particularly significant is his idea of the civil religion, a civic faith necessary for a government's stability. Although the regime fixes its doctrines and they are binding on all citizens, other religions are permitted, if they do not claim absolute truth.

After his works were officially condemned in 1762, he spent the next eight years wandering. In 1765 he produced the Confessions, a curious autobiographical mixture of vanity and self-accusation, and a number of other literary works in his last years upon his return to Paris.

Rousseau's emphasis upon irrationality, subjectivism, and sensualism made him the forerunner of both Romanticism and modern totalitarianism, while his elevation of the individual above society contributed to individualism and democratic thought. By substituting a sentimental faith for revealed religion and by removing Christian doctrines from their supernatural context, he paved the way for humanistic liberalism.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

ROUTH, MARTIN JOSEPH (1755-1854). English patristic scholar. Most of his life he was associated with Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became president in 1791, an office held until his death. He was made deacon in 1777, but not priested until 1810. Routh was a patristic scholar much revered by the Tractarians.* When Samuel Seabury* sought episcopal succession for the American Church, Routh advised him to approach the Scottish Episcopal Church. Descended from a niece of Archbishop Laud, theologically he linked the outlook of the Nonjurors* and Caroline Divines with the Oxford Movement,* to which he gave support. He opposed the Hampden appointment, and also the censuring of Tract 90. JOHN A. SIMPSON

ROWLAND, DANIEL (1713-1790). Welsh Methodist leader. With Howel Harris* he has the distinction of being co-founder of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism.* He was born at Pantybeudy, Cardiganshire, the son of Daniel Rowland, parish priest of Nantgwnlle and Llangeitho. Information about his youth and education is scanty. He was ordained deacon (1734) and priest (1735) and served as curate to his brother, John, at the parishes served by their father. He was converted under the ministry of Griffith Jones of Llanddowror and began a preaching ministry of great power in the neighborhood of Llangeitho. He soon extended his labors beyond his own parishes and made contact with Howel Harris in 1737. Like Harris he began to found "societies" where his converts could be established in their newfound faith.

For a number of complex reasons, the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales split into two groups in 1752, Harris leading one group and Rowland the other. Ten years passed before reconciliation was effected. Meanwhile Llangeitho became the national center of Welsh Methodism since Harris had withdrawn from public work for a time. People traveled from all parts of Wales to hear Rowland preach and to receive Holy Communion at his hands. His position in the church was an anomalous one. When his brother was drowned in 1760, the authorities passed over Daniel Rowland and gave the living to his son, to whom he now became curate. But he was finally dispossessed in 1763 and continued his ministry in the "New Church" that had been built for him at Llangeitho. Rowland was both a hymnwriter and an author, but above all he was a preacher whose influence extended all over Wales. His sweetness of spirit and the magnetism of his delivery kept congregations spellbound—sometimes for hours on end—as he expounded the Gospel to them at Llangeitho. R. TUDUR JONES

ROWLEY, HAROLD HENRY (1890-1969). English Semitist and biblical scholar. Educated at Bristol and Oxford universities, he became successively minister of the United Church, Wells, Somerset (1917-22); professor in Shantung Christian University, China (1924-29); lecturer in Hebrew in University College, Cardiff (1930-34); professor of Hebrew in University College, Bangor, North Wales (1935-45), and in Manchester University (1945-59). In addition to his many published contributions to scholarship (among which his studies of the linguistic and critical problems of the Book of Daniel take preeminent place), which were characterized by judicial wisdom and comprehensive and exact bibliographical knowledge, he excelled himself at the end of World War II by his efforts to restore international correspondence and cooperation among OT scholars. In the postwar years, as foreign secretary of the (British) Society for Old Testament Study, he gained worldwide esteem immense and well-merited. F.F. BRUCE

ROWNTREE, JOSEPH (1801-1859). Quaker social reformer. Born in Yorkshire, he left school at thirteen, later becoming a grocer and member of the Merchants' Company, with a lifelong interest in education. He was a founder of the York Quarterly Meeting Boys' and Girls' Schools (1828, 1830) at Bootham and The Mount, and of the Friends' School at Rawdon (1832) for children of a different class. A founding trustee of the Flounders' Institute, Ackworth, for training teachers, he with Samuel Tuke helped establish the Friends' Educational Society (1837) and served on the committee of the Friends' Retreat for the insane at York. An alderman from 1853, he declined the mayorship of York in 1858 on conscience. He inaugurated several schemes for municipal reform, wrote pamphlets on colonial slavery and on education, and helped reform the marriage regulations of the Society of Friends, so that marriage to a non-Quaker would no longer mean disownment. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ROYAL SOCIETY. On 15 July 1662 the young society was incorporated by a royal charter; further charters, extending its privileges, followed in 1663 and 1669. The origin of the society was in the meetings for scientific experiment and study held in Wadham College, Oxford, during the Commonwealth and Protectorate. At the Restoration the meetings were transferred to London. During the seventeenth century virtually all the members were orthodox Christians. Since the presidency of Isaac Newton (1703-27) the relationship with orthodox Christianity has diminished. The Royal Society is the national academy for science for Great Britain, but it is not controlled by the government. Over the years, however, it has advised governments on many matters (e.g., change of calendar in 1751) and conducted surveys for governments. Its headquarters are in Somerset House, London, where its massive library and historical museum are located.

PETER TOON

RUBENS, PETER PAUL (1577-1640). Flemish painter. He glorifies whatever he paints with a passionate, red-blooded, lusty life of adventure. The mock heroic trappings of classical mythology, the Baroque bravura of superabundance, brilliant color, intense light, swirling lines of movement: the Rubens style of grand turbulence exalts man, woman, flower, and tree into being bigger than life. Nothing ordinary is conceivable in a Rubens canvas. His women figures have the weight and power of Michelangelo bodies softened by warm, Titian tints, all reconceived and heightened by a buxom exuberance peculiar to the Flemish master. Motifs of imaginary reality, historical occurrence, and an Italian Renaissance sense of the timeless past swim together richly in Rubens's composition and cast the spell of an empyreal Nature. The spirit of the paintings, no matter it be Christ on the cross, is one of Titanic desire, unchristened naïveté, and pure human nobility.

CALVIN SEERVELD

RUFINUS "THE SYRIAN" (late fourth/early fifth century). Palestinian presbyter, author of a Treatise on the Faith (Liber de Fide, first published 1650). He was probably the presbyter Jerome* sent from Bethlehem to Milan in 399 on a legal mission. His Treatise, written c.400 in Rome, like Jerome condemns Traducianism* and especially Origenism.* Marius Mercator* depicts him as the Syrian inspirer of Pelagius, but he more clearly influenced Celestius,* who appealed to his denial of transmission of sin at his trial in Carthage in 411, and similarly taught that infants were baptized not for forgiveness but to inherit the kingdom. Unlike Celestius, he held that Adam, though born mortal, would not have died had he remained sinless (like some persons in the OT). The Treatise, possibly implicitly critical of Augustine's published opinions, was attacked in the latter's The Merits and Remission of Sins. Rufinus perhaps also wrote a markedly anti-Origenist Pamphlet on the Faith (Libellus de Fide), a defense against his alleged errors, which included a form of perfectionism. His Syrian affiliations, though not explicit, appear reasonably identifiable. He probably died before the Pelagian* storm broke.

D.F. WRIGHT

RUFINUS TYRANNIUS (345-410). Presbyter and scholar. Born near Aquileia in N Italy, he was at school in Rome when he began a long association with Jerome.* He went to Egypt, suffered in the persecution which followed the death of Athanasius (373), settled in Alexandria for eight years, studied Scripture and Origen under Didymus the Blind* and Gregory of Nazianzus,* and visited the Desert Fathers. In 381 he founded a monastery in Jerusalem. His many translations of Greek theological works into Latin aided Western asceticism and theology. The works included Basil's Rule for the monks at Pinetum, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Eusebius with additions, as well as his own commentary on the Apostles' Creed with the earliest Latin text of its fourth-century form. His rendering of Origen's De Principiis, simultaneously vindicating its orthodoxy, led to damaging strife with Jerome.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

RUINART, THIERRY (1657-1709). French Benedictine scholar. Born at Reims, he studied in his native city before entering the Benedictine abbey of St.-Remi in 1674. Eventually he went to the monastery of St.-Germain-des-Prés, the great center of Maurist* learning. Here he became a pupil and friend of Jean Mabillon, with whom he collaborated in producing volumes VIII and IX of Acta sanctorum ordinis sancti Benedicti (1701). Ruinart's quiet life in the monastery enabled him to pursue his academic aims, and among other books he wrote A Life of Jean Mabillon, A Life of Pope Urban II, and An Apology for the Mission of St. Maurus.

RUMANIA, see ROMANIA

RUOTSALAINEN, PAAVO (1777-1852). Finnish Pietist leader. Son of a farmer, he already in his youth experienced a personal revival in a Pietistic spirit. His spiritual discernment developed only later through a blacksmith counselor who told him: "Lacking one thing, you lack everything—the inner knowledge of Christ." This sentence has become a motto for the Pietistic Movement. He appears as one of the greatest leaders in Finland, succeeding in uniting two branches of the Pietistic revival there, and developing what is now the biggest and perhaps the most significant movement in Finland which still influences large groups of people. In their regular annual summer meetings outdoors some 20,000-30,000 people gather. Ruotsalainen has influenced the Christian life in Finland more than anyone else in that country's modern church history.

STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

RUPERT OF DEUTZ (c.1075-1129). Medieval theologian and exegete. Born in Germany, he early entered the Benedictine monastery of St. Laurence at Liège. He wrote and taught at Liège and Siegburg before being appointed abbot of Deutz near Cologne about 1120. He was strongly opposed to simony, to strict predestinarianism, and to the introduction of logic into theology. Possessing no formal theological system, he defended the mystical theology traditionally held by the Benedictines, especially against the dialectic methods of Anselm of Laon* and William of Champeaux.* He was a noted scriptural exegete, writing several commentaries and other works, in which he interpreted the Bible literally, allegorically, and morally. He developed an Augustinian theology of history. His imprecise language has led to conflicting interpretations of his doctrine of the Eucharist.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

RURAL DEAN. Each diocese in the Church of England is divided into deaneries. The rural dean is the bishop's deputy in the deanery. He is sometimes elected by the clergy, but more often chosen by the bishop. The office in England dates back to the eleventh century, although its modern form largely stems from the nineteenth century. His chief duty is to preside over the chapter (the clergy in the deanery) and at rural deanery conferences of clergy and laity. With synodical government he is a joint chairman of the deanery conference (clergy and lay), and in some dioceses new titles are being introduced for the office since particularly in large towns the title "rural" is inapposite. Other functions include an annual inspection and seeing that provision is made for services in parishes where for whatever reason there is no minister. PETER S. DAWES

RUSKIN, JOHN (1819-1900). Victorian author and critic. Born into a wealthy Evangelical family, he trained early for the ministry. His memorization of large portions of the Bible affected his opinions and tastes permanently. His father, a wine merchant, took his son on continental tours and introduced him to beautiful landscapes, architecture, and art, which inspired in him a profound love of beauty. While at Oxford (1836-40) he won the Newdigate Prize for poetry and gave up his ministerial ambitions. The first period of his career was devoted to problems of art. Modern Painters (2 vols., 1843-46) was begun as a defense of the painter J.M.W. Turner; it accepted the principle that art is based on national and individual integrity and morality. Ruskin also defended the work of the Pre-Raphaelites. His interest in architecture is seen in The Seven Lamps of Architecture (1849) and The Stones of Venice (1851-53), the latter maintaining that the Gothic architecture of Venice reflected national and domestic virtue, while Venetian Renaissance mirrored corruption.

Despite recurring mental illness during his last years, accentuated in part by an indifferent public and unhappy personal life, Ruskin wrote without much study in the area of political economy: The Political Economy of Art (1857), Unto This Last (1860), and Munera Pulveris (1862-67), which attacked the ugliness of industrial England. Other works include Sesame and Lilies (1865), The Crown of Wild Olive (1866), six volumes of his lectures on art delivered while he was Slade professor of fine arts at Oxford (1869-79, 1883-84), Fors Clavigera (letters to workmen), and his autobiography to Praeterita (1871-74).

His works were to influence the British Labour Party and such writers as William Morris, George Bernard Shaw, and D.H. Lawrence.

RUSSELL, CHARLES TAZE (1852-1916). Founder of Jehovah's Witnesses.* As a young man he built up a chain of drapery shops in Allegheny, Pennsylvania. He reacted against doctrines of hell and was attracted by date-fixing for the Second Coming, which he estimated first as 1874, then as 1914. He caricatured the Christian doctrine of the Trinity as "three gods in one person" and held that Christ was the first created being. In 1879 he launched a magazine, Zion's Watchtower and Herald of Christ's Presence. In 1884 he set up Zion's Watchtower Tract Society in Pittsburgh, and this publishing house produced Russell's six volumes of Studies in the Scriptures (1886-1904). These set out what has remained basically the Jehovah's Witnesses' theology. A seventh volume on the Book of Revelation was completed by others in 1917 after Russell's death, and Arius and Russell are called two of the angels of the Seven Churches.

Russell's wife left him in 1897 and obtained a legal separation in 1906. Neither party asked for divorce. In 1911 Russell advertised so-called "Miracle Wheat" in his magazine, to be sold in aid of the society's funds. The Brooklyn Eagle challenged his claims; Russell sued for libel and lost. He lost also a libel case against the Rev. J.J. Ross, who attacked his doctrines and scholarship. During the hearing Russell committed perjury by asserting under oath that he knew the Greek alphabet, whereas he could not name the letters when he was shown them in court.

He traveled widely and was an able writer and speaker. His sermons were syndicated in some 1,500 newspapers. He produced a photo-drama of the Bible story, with colored slides, films, and synchronized gramophone records. It lasted eight hours (four parts of two hours each) and included twelve talks by Russell.

RUSSIA. Although Christianity was introduced into Russian lands in the first century A.D. and had some success, it was not lasting. Very little penetration of Christianity took place in the next 700 years until in the ninth century the Church of St. Elias was established at Kiev, where there was a minority of Christians. In 867 the first Russian metropolitanate was set up by the patriarch of Constantinople and was probably located at Tmutorakan.

The first Kievan ruler to accept Christianity is usually considered to be Olga, who was regent between 945 and 964. The traditional account states that she was converted and baptized in Constantinople, refused an imperial offer of marriage, and returned to Kiev where her faith had little influence upon either her son or her people. Because of problems in reconciling the Byzantine records with the Russian Chronicle, many historians believe Olga was probably converted in Kiev around 955 and went to Constantinople in 957 to plead for autonomy for the Russian Church. Because she did not gain what she sought, the pagan party remained in power in Kiev under her son Sviatoslav.

Vladimir,* the grandson of Olga who reigned from 978 to 1015, was the man responsible for the Christianizing of Russia. After a strong pagan revival, the story is told of Vladimir's sending out missions to study the religions of Judaism, Islam, Roman Christianity, and Greek Christianity. His acceptence of Greek Christianity was supposedly on the basis of the beauty of its worship. It could be argued, however, that political and economic ties with Constantinople were advantageous to the Kievan state at this time. Included in the agreement of conversion for Vladimir was his marriage to Anna, the sister of the Byzantine emperor. In 988 Christianity was proclaimed the official faith of the realm, and baptism was ordered for Vladimir's subjects. The upper classes and those in the cities accepted the faith, but only slowly did it penetrate the lower classes and the countryside, which remained pagan until the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Orthodoxy became the state religion and remained so until 1917. The church was under the leadership of the metropolitan of Kiev until the fourteenth century, when the leadership changed to Moscow. The Russian Church also remained subject to Constantinople during the Kievan period, and the metropolitans chosen for the Russians were usually Greek.

Monasticism played an important role in early Russian Christianity. The most significant monastery was the Monastery of the Caves in Kiev. It was founded in the eleventh century by Antony and then reorganized by his successor, Theodosius, who emphasized poverty and humility.

The Mongol invasions of Kievan Russia started in 1237, and by 1240 Russia was under the Tartar yoke. Christianity survived, and the church helped to keep alive Russian national consciousness. Three men, all canonized by the church, are significant in the Mongol period. Alexander Nevsky, the victor over the Swedes and Teutonic Knights in the 1240s, is credited with saving the church from the papacy. Stephen of Perm in the fourteenth century became a missionary to the Zyrian tribes, and Sergius of Radonezh established the Monastery of the Holy Trinity, which became the greatest religious house in the land. Sergius encouraged resistance to the Mongols in the fourteenth century and helped the advance of Moscow by inspiring colonist monks to go into the forest regions.

With the rise of Moscow, Peter, the metropolitan from 1308 to 1326, moved the seat of the church there. After the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453, Moscow increasingly advanced the claim of being the "third Rome." Ivan III's marriage to Sophia, niece of the last Byzantine emperor, helped to enhance that claim. After 1448 a council of Russian bishops elected the metropolitan. The Mongols were finally defeated in 1480, and a powerful Russian state developed under Ivan IV.

At a church council in 1503 a dispute between Nilus of Sora and Joseph, abbot of Volokalamsk, resulted in the formation of two groups. The Possessors, Joseph's followers, emphasized the social obligations of monasticism in caring for the sick and poor. The Non-Possessors, Nilus's followers, insisted that almsgiving is the duty of the laity, while a monk's major work is prayer and detachment from the world. The Possessors supported the ideal of the "third Rome" and believed in a close alliance between church and state. Their victory eventually led to a great subservience of the church to state, especially during the reign of Ivan IV. In 1589 the head of the Russian Church was elevated from the rank of metropolitan to patriarch.

Following the "Time of Troubles," the election of Michael Romanov as ruler in 1613 initiated a dynasty that was to reign until World War I. Church reforms were started by Abbot Dionysius, Philaret,* and Avvakum.* Then in 1652, during the reign of Czar Alexis, the new patriarch, Nikon,* attempted to reform the Russian Church by bringing it in line with the ideas of the four ancient patriarchates. There was great opposition to the reforms, especially among those of the Josephite traditions who eventually formed a separate sect known as Old Believers.* They were the conservatives opposing an official church which they thought had carried reform too far. Old Believers still remain in Russia and are divided into the Popovtsy who have kept the priesthood and the Bezpopovtsy who have no priests. The church accepted Nikon's reforms, but he was deposed and exiled.

Under Peter the Great, no new patriarch was appointed when Adrian died in 1700. In 1721 Peter abolished the patriarchate and set up a Holy Synod composed of twelve members. Its members were nominated by the Czar, and thus the church became a department of state. This system of church government continued until 1917. The synodal period is often described as a period of decline and of Westernization, but others would say true Orthodox life continued, and in the nineteenth century there was a revival in the Russian Church. New enthusiasm for missionary work occurred. The religious renewal began at Mt. Athos, where a monk named Paissy laid emphasis upon continual prayer and obedience to an elder, or starets. This was the age of the starets, and the greatest of them was Seraphim of Sarov. He was followed by the elders of Optino. In theology Russia broke with the West, and Aleksei Khomyakov,* leader of the Slavophile circle, became the first original theologian of the Russian Church.

In 1917, after the abdication of Nicholas II, an all-Russian church council met in Moscow and began a program of church reform which eventually restored the patriarchate and elected Tikhon* to that office in November. After the Bolshevik Revolution, the Soviet government decreed the separation of "church from state, and school from church." Tikhon was arrested following his criticism of Communist policies. The "Living Church" was organized with Communist recognition and was used by the regime for political purposes. It convened a council which unfrocked Tikhon and abolished the patriarchate. Tikhon was released after promising not to oppose Soviet rule. Following Tikhon's death in 1925, Peter was named head of the church, but was exiled the next year. The League of the Militant Godless was formed in 1925 and grew rapidly, claiming a membership of five million in 1932. When Sergei succeeded Peter, the Soviet regime refused to recognize him until 1943.

Stalin attacked the church directly, closing churches and monasteries. The Soviet constitution of 1936 guaranteed freedom of religious worship but at the same time granted freedom of antireligious propaganda. With the coming of World War II the regime eased its antireligious campaigns and got the church to cooperate with the war effort. In May 1944 Sergei died, and Metropolitan Aleksei of Leningrad was elected patriarch early in 1945. No statistics are available as to the number of Christian believers still in Russia and as to the number involved in persecutions and purges.

Besides the Orthodox Church in Russia, other forms of Christianity have existed. Roman Catholicism entered Russia mainly from Poland* and was propagated by Jesuits and Dominicans. Protestantism entered from Germany in the sixteenth century and from France and Holland in the eighteenth century. Out of the Protestant groups and some of the dissenting sects native to Russia have come strong evangelical groups. There is some evidence to indicate that such evangelical groups have grown in numbers and religious zeal even under Communist restrictions.

RUTHENIAN CHURCHES. Name given to Uniate Churches* found mostly in Polish Galicia, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, with colonies in North America. The name is simply a Latinized form of "Russian." Sometimes they are known as "Ukrainians," and occasionally as White Russians and Slovaks. Their ancestors, converts of Vladimir,* were part of the Russian Church under the metropolitan of Kiev until his expulsion after the Union of Florence (1443). Pope Pius II appointed a Roman Catholic metropolitan of Kiev (1485) who was permitted by Casimir IV of Poland to exercise jurisdiction over the eight eparchies of the province under the control of Poland and Lithuania. In the sixteenth century they reverted to Orthodoxy, but in 1595 the metropolitan of Kiev, with the bishops of Vladimir, Lutsk, Pololsk, Pinsk, and Kholn, sought communion with Rome, which was achieved by the Union of Brest-Litovsk (1595-96). They were joined by the bishops of Przemysl (1694) and Lvov (1700). Despite a decree of Urban VIII (1624), during the seventeenth century most of the nobility and landowners in Poland adopted the Latin Rite.

After the partition of Poland (1795), most of the Ruthenians (except in Galicia) passed under Russian control and were gradually suppressed in favor of Orthodoxy. In the Kholn district (ceded by Austria in 1815), they survived till c.1875. Byzantines were still illegal, so most of the survivors passed to the Latin Rite. The Ruthenians of Galicia under the sovereignty of Austria were separated politically from their metropolitan, so Lvov was constituted an archbishopric (1807) to look after the interests of Lvov and Przemysl. They enjoyed religious toleration during the nineteenth century, but political troubles in E Europe have since engendered ill-feeling between the Latin Poles and the Byzantine Ruthenians.

A Ruthenian college was founded in Rome by Leo XIII (1897) which since 1904 has been controlled by Ruthenian Basilian monks. There is a strong monastic element, especially fostered by the austere Studites (founded c.1900). The Ruthenian liturgy is based on the Byzantine Rite with certain modifications adopted from Rome.

The Podcarpathian Ruthenians are another Ruthenian community who were granted a separate jurisdiction by the setting-up of the eparchy of Mukachevo, subject to the primacy of Hungary by Clement XIV (1771). The eparchy was created to settle the dispute between the Ruthenian metropolitan north of the Carpathians and the settlement, dating from the fourteenth century, of Little and White Russians south of the Carpathians, who had been brought into communion with Rome by the Union of Uzhgorod (1646).

There are considerable Ruthenian communities in the USA, Canada, Brazil, and Argentina. The Ruthenians are the largest Uniate group, numbering about 4,500,000. Since 1946, those in the Ukraine have been separated from the Roman Catholics and aggregated to the Russian Orthodox Church.

J.G.G. NORMAN

RUTHERFORD, JOSEPH FRANKLIN (1869-1942). Successor of C.T. Russell* as head of the Jehovah's Witnesses.* As a lawyer he had served as a special judge in Missouri. In June 1918 he and six others were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment for propaganda against military service, but the sentence was quashed on appeal after nine months in prison. He wrote some twenty-two books and many booklets and laid the foundations of the directed dogmatic studies that characterize Jehovah's Witnesses. Russell had taught that Jesus Christ would return in 1914 or shortly afterward. Rutherford rallied his disappointed followers by discovering in 1921 that Christ had in fact returned invisibly in 1914 and had begun to purge his spiritual temple in 1918. Rutherford also "received" the new name for the Watchtower followers in 1931, i.e., "Jehovah's Witnesses." When Armageddon was delayed and Witnesses numbered more than the expected 144,000, he found a way of including a second class in God's future blessings. He maintained also that the "higher powers" of Romans 13:1 were Jehovah and Jesus Christ, and not earthly rulers—an interpretation which has been rejected by current Jehovah's Witnesses' publications. J. STAFFORD WRIGHT

RUTHERFORD, MARK. Pen name of William Hale White (1831-1913), English novelist. Born and educated at Bedford, he studied for the Congregational ministry, but was expelled for doctrinal deviation. He subsequently enjoyed a successful career in the civil service. Two of his novels describe his own spiritual history, The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford (1881) and Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885). He wrote also four others, The Revolution in Tanner's Lane (1887), Miriam's Schooling (1890), Catherine Furze (1894), and Clara Hopgood (1896). Rutherford's novels are poorly constructed and rather colorless in tone, but they convey a sympathetic and realistic view of the world of the petty bourgeoisie who made up the Dissenting congregations with which he dealt. He manages to bring out particularly well the impact in the mid- and late-nineteenth century of the new scientific ideas and higher criticism of the Bible on the fundamentalist attitudes of such people. The Autobiography deals with his own emancipation from Calvinism. ARTHUR POLLARD

RUTHERFORD, SAMUEL (1600-1661). Scottish pastor and theologian. He was born of farming stock at Nisbet in Roxburghshire, and gave evidence of grace and of spiritual insight in boyhood; his mind was always sensitive to spiritual impressions. He entered Edinburgh University in 1617, graduated M.A. in 1621, and two years later after a competitive examination was appointed professor of Latin language and literature in the university. Some unpleasantness in his relations with his colleagues that may have been connected with his marriage led him to resign his office and study theology. He was ordained at Anwoth in Kirkcudbrightshire in 1627 and exercised a fruitful ministry there until 1636, when he was deposed from office for Nonconformity and ordered to be confined to prison at Aberdeen during the king's pleasure. From there came his famous Letters to former parishioners and friends at Anwoth. These 365 letters are classics in the field of devotional literature. Released from prison in 1638, he returned to Anwoth for eighteen months before being appointed professor of divinity at St. Andrews.

In 1643 he went to London as one of the Scottish commissioners to the Westminster Assembly* of Divines. His insight and devotion contributed significantly to the Confession and Catechisms. Two children died during his four years absence in London, and his experience of this sorrow enlarged his compassion for the sorrowing. During his time in London he was an industrious student and a prolific writer, largely on matters of church polity. His monumental work was Lex Rex, or The Law and The Prince; a Dispute for the Just Prerogatives of King and People. It dealt more with political science than theology and is still regarded as a classic on constitutional government. The Revolution Settlement of 1690 embodied the principles of Lex Rex.

In 1647 Rutherford was appointed principal of St. Mary's at St. Andrews, and later, rector of the university. He was preeminent in Scotland as a scholar and leader. He was well known on the Continent and in 1648 and 1651 declined appointments to Dutch universities. The Restoration of Charles II in 1660 put him in great peril. He was removed from office, but died on 29 March 1661 before the full fury of the storm of persecution broke. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

RUYSBROECK, JAN VAN (1293-1381). Flemish mystic. Born near Brussels, and ordained a priest in 1317, he was for nearly three decades vicar at St. Gudele in Brussels. In 1344 he retired to the nearby wooded valley of Groenendaal, where after some years he founded an Augustinian monastery (1350). At Groenendaal he did most of his writing, and acted as spiritual adviser. Tauler,* Groote,* and many others came to him for advice on the life of the spirit. Ruysbroeck was one of the great fourteenth-century mystics. Written in powerful and often exalted Flemish prose, his writings helped shape the language. He wrote in the tradition of Augustine, Bernard, and perhaps especially Richard of St.-Victor.* The aim of mysticism is the union of the spirit with its Creator, by way of three stages: the active life, the inner life, and the final vision of God. His best-known work is Die Chierheit der gheestelijke Brulocht (tr. as The Spiritual Espousals, 1952). He opposed abuses in the church (writing during the "Babylonian Captivity" of the church of Avignon) and pantheistic versions of mysticism. He was beatified in 1908, and his feast is observed locally. His works were translated into Latin and influenced later mystics such as John of the Cross. A complete modern edition is available (4 vols., ed. J. Van Mierlo et al., 1944-48). DIRK JELLEMA

RYCAUT (Ricaut), SIR PAUL (1628-1700). English traveler, diplomat, and writer. Born at Aylesford, Kent, he was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1650. After traveling in Europe, Asia, and Africa, he spent eight years as secretary to H. Finch, earl of Winchelsea, ambassador extraordinary to Turkey. The Present State of the Ottoman Empire, in three books ... (1670) resulted, a widely circulated history. In 1666 he became a member of the Royal Society and published in the Philosophical Transactions a treatise on sable mice. In 1667 he began a twelve-year consulate at Smyrna for the Levant Company. From this experience he wrote The Present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches ... (1679). He was knighted in 1685 by James II, and served William III as resident in Hamburg and the Hanse towns where he remained until shortly before his death. BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

RYERSON, ADOLPHUS EGERTON (1803-1882). Methodist leader and educationalist. Born and educated near London, Ontario, he was called to the Methodist ministry and became a successful saddlebag preacher and missionary to the Credit River Indians. In 1829 he became the first editor of the influential Christian Guardian and secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. An early advocate of the secularization of the clergy reserves* and other political reforms, he refused to support W.L. Mackenzie's rebellion in 1837. Vitally concerned about education, he helped found the Upper Canada Academy, which became Victoria College in 1841 with himself as principal. The educational system of Ontario after 1870 was largely based upon his 1846 Report which he wrote while superintendent of common schools. Probably the most influential Canadian Methodist of his time, he was from 1874 to 1878 the first president of the general conference of the Methodist Church of Canada.

ROBERT WILSON

RYLE, HERBERT EDWARD (1856-1925). Anglican bishop and preacher. Son of Bishop J.C. Ryle,* his strong Evangelical home background gave him a deep personal faith and an evangelistic outlook, although he moved away from his father's theological views. After Eton and a brilliant academic career at Cambridge, he won distinction as a moderate and cautious OT higher critic. He became principal of Lampeter College in 1886, Hulsean professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1888, and president of Queens' College, Cambridge, in 1896. Thereafter he was successively bishop of Exeter (1900) and Winchester (1903). In 1911 weak health obliged him to accept the less onerous deanery of Westminster, and his fame rests on his preaching and leadership there in World War I. His gospel sermons were called "wonderfully simple and simply wonderful." He did much to establish the (Church of England) church assembly.

G.C.B. DAVIES

RYLE, JOHN CHARLES (1816-1900). Bishop of Liverpool. Born at Macclesfield and educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, the son of a wealthy banker, he was destined for a career in politics. A fine athlete, he rowed and played cricket for Oxford, and also took a first class degree in Modern Greats, but declined offers of a college fellowship. He was spiritually awakened in 1838 on hearing Ephesians 2 read in church, and was ordained by Bishop Sumner at Winchester in 1842. Country livings followed at Helmingham and Stradbrooke in Suffolk, until at the age of sixty-four he was appointed in 1880 at Disraeli's recommendation as first bishop of Liverpool.

Ryle was a prolific writer, the author of numerous tracts and books, of which Knots Untied is probably the best known. His leadership of the Evangelicals was sound and sensible, persuading them not to isolate themselves from the mainstream of church life by boycotting church congresses, and so leave Anglo-Catholics alone to put forward their views. In his diocese he exercised a vigorous and straightforward preaching ministry, and was a faithful pastor to his clergy, taking particular care over ordination retreats. He formed a clergy pension fund, built over forty churches, and proved an able administrator. A commanding presence and fearless advocacy of his principles were combined with a kind and understanding attitude in his personal relationships, while vast numbers of working men attended his special meetings. His strength of character was shown in that, despite strong criticism, he declared it his policy to put first the raising of clergy stipends rather than commence the building of a cathedral.

SABAS (439-532). Founder of the Order of Sabaites. Born in Cappadocia, he entered a monastery at the age of eight. In 457 he went to Jerusalem and lived as a hermit monk in the desert. He became renowned for his holiness, and founded a number of monasteries. He was ordained into the priesthood in 490, and in the later years of his life was an active defender of the orthodox faith against Origenism* and Monophysitism.*

SABATIER, LOUIS AUGUSTE (1839-1901). French Protestant scholar. Of Huguenot stock, he was brought up in the early nineteenth-century Protestant revival and became a leading exponent of liberal Protestantism in France. His work in the Protestant faculty of theology in Strasbourg (1868-70) was cut short for political reasons, but eventually in 1877 he helped to refound the faculty in Paris. From 1886 he taught also in the nonsectarian religious studies department of the École des Hautes Études of the Sorbonne. His theology was evolved in relation to his wide interests in modern cultural problems, evidenced in prolific regular writings on literature and politics. His view that concepts in religion could be no more than symbols undermined the traditional authority of dogma. He held that the proper method of theology was the historical and psychological study of religious phenomena, which at once relativized dogma, seen as changing historical forms, and revealed faith as the enjoyment of God's gift of spiritual life, which was the unchanging essence of religion. His presentation of this approach has a christological center, reminiscent of Schleiermacher.* His chief works were Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion (1897) and The Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit (1903). HADDON WILLMER

SABATIER, PAUL (1859-1928). French Calvinist scholar and pastor. After studying at Besançon and Lille, he enrolled at the Protestant faculty of the University of Paris where his brother, Auguste Sabatier,* and Ernst Renan* were among his teachers. After serving from 1885 to 1889 as vicar of the Protestant church in Strasbourg, he was expelled from Germany. Returning to France, he was a pastor from 1889 to 1894, resigning to devote himself to a life of scholarship. His historical interests caused him to travel to Assisi in Italy where he studied the life of Francis and the Franciscan Order. Later he became professor of Protestant theology at Strasbourg (1919) and continued teaching there until his death. His Life of St. Francis of Assisi (1893, ET 1894) was an immediate success and went into forty editions within his lifetime. The biography shows a sympathetic understanding of Francis, but Sabatier has been accused of molding him after the image of a nineteenth-century liberal. In addition, he studied and published early Franciscan sources and documents such as the Actus Beati Francisci et Sociorum Ejus (1902) and the Speculum Perfectionis (1898).

Sabatier also became involved (1904-14) in the modernist movement within the Roman Catholic Church, writing An Open Letter to His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons (1908) and delivering the Jowett Lectures on Modernism (1908). When World War I broke out, he wrote a defense of the spiritual ideals of the allies, A Frenchman's Thoughts on the War (1915) and served as interim minister for pastors who were in the armed forces. He made monumental contributions to Franciscan scholarship, and his Franciscan Studies (1932) reveal a much deeper understanding and sympathy for the medieval religious outlook than his earlier work. RICHARD V. PIERARD

SABATIER, PIERRE (1683-1742). French biblical scholar. Born in Poitiers, he studied in the monastery of St.-Germain-des-Prés, the great center of Maurist* learning, under Thierry Ruinart.* After the latter's death he made his life's work the search for the pre-Vulgate Latin text of the Bible. Though not completed at his death, his virtually exhaustive collection of manuscript material was published in 1743 at Reims as Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinae Versiones Antiquae. This was the first work of its kind and is still of great value today. Known as a deeply pious man, he removed to Reims in the latter part of his life because of accusations that he was a Jansenist.*

SABBATARIANISM. In its developed form, Sabbatarianism demands a strictly religious use of Sunday which transfers the rest of the Jewish Sabbath to the Christian Sunday. Some communities like Seventh-Day Adventists* regard the rest of Christendom as seriously in error because Sunday has replaced the literal Sabbath, but increasingly, strict observance of Sunday is declining even among churches of Anglo-Saxon origin, where it reached its most striking development. Resting on the conviction that the Fourth Commandment is part of the perpetual moral law, Sabbatarianism has led not only to ecclesiastical censures, but also to strict civil law against work and recreation on Sundays. Though there were signs of popular strictness in keeping Sunday in the early and medieval church, civil and canonical requirements were based on tradition and utility rather than natural law.

Saints' days were observed far more strictly than Sundays and during the Reformation of the sixteenth century this legalism was strongly attacked by Reformers without insisting on similarly strict observance of Sunday. Reformers like Beza* and Zanchius emphasized that the Fourth Commandment was natural, universal, and moral. In continental churches this did not lead to Sabbatarianism, but in England and Scotland this doctrine combined with strongly antipapal attitudes and local needs to produce a strictness of Sunday observance which was unique. Originally a feature of Puritanism it gained wide support, and Commonwealth legislation was consolidated in 1677. Future legislation in 1781 and 1871 closed further loopholes, and similar legislation was found in many colonies and parts of North America. There were fierce nineteenth-century battles over Sunday trains, opening of museums, libraries, and limited recreational facilities, but groups like the Lord's Day Observance Society (1831) have had decreasing success since 1945. Reaction against legalistic and joyless Sabbatarianism has been practical rather than theological, and the theological issues involved have largely been ignored by modern Protestantism, except by K. Barth.*

SABBATH. Denoting the seventh day of the Jewish week, the name derives from a Hebrew word meaning "to desist" (cf. Gen. 2:2, God desisted from His work of creation). It was a day to be set apart for God, no work for purely human profit being done on it, the lighting of a fire being especially prohibited (Exod. 35:3). The stress is on avoiding normal work, not obtaining rest, though the latter is included. No real traces of the Sabbath can be found outside Israel. None of the many efforts to derive it from Mesopotamian religion or from the phases of the moon carry conviction. Exilic and postexilic Judaism* considered that its institution was part of the Mosaic lawgiving (Ezek. 20:12; Neh. 9:14). The widely held Christian belief that it was part of a primitive revelation seems to be a false interpretation of Genesis 2:3; had it been, it is difficult to believe that no traces would have survived outside Israel.

Amos 8:5b shows that the Sabbath was generally enforced in the preexilian period, though Jeremiah 17:19-23 and Ezekiel 20:16,21 suggest that a good deal of laxity was shown. A more rigorous attitude is attributed to Nehemiah (13:15-22), and Sabbath observance soon became an outstanding characteristic of Judaism. In 168 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes's representative took advantage of the Sabbath to capture Jerusalem (2 Macc. 5:25); a little later, a large group allowed itself to be massacred rather than defend itself on the Sabbath (1 Macc. 2:29-38). As a result, self-defense on the Sabbath was permitted. The enumeration of thirty-nine main classes of work prohibited on the Sabbath probably antedates the NT period, though many of their subdivisions are later. The Rabbis insisted on the joyous nature of the Sabbath and so, in contrast to Qumran and the later Karaites, they were concerned to make its observance no burden. Not merely worship and the study of the Torah, but also promotion of family life and the joyful use of God-given food were enjoined.

It is clear that Jesus, His disciples, and the Jewish Christians observed the Sabbath. The clash between Jesus and the Pharisees on the subject was confined to a narrow area. When Jesus' disciples plucked the ears of corn (Mark 2:23-28), there was a conflict of duties, for they were enjoined to avoid hunger on the Sabbath. Jesus' "fault" was His claim to have the right to legislate (Mark 2:28). The remaining incidents are connected with miracles of healing. The Rabbis permitted medical care on the Sabbath only where there was a risk to life. Jesus laid down the principle that acts which glorified God were not a breach of the Sabbath (cf. Heb. 4:9f.).

For the Sabbath in the primitive church, see SUNDAY.

SABELLIANISM. Another name for Modalistic Monarchianism* or Patripassianism. This was an influential theological movement at the beginning of the third century A.D. It seems to have originated in Asia Minor. Noetus* of Smyrna taught Patripassian views; his disciple Epigonus brought the teaching to Rome, where through Praxeas* and Sabellius it gained a strong foothold. Sabellius, whose name is given to the movement, was active in Rome during the early third century. Tertullian* in North Africa vigorously opposed Praxeas, as did Hippolytus* at Rome. Motives for the struggle may not be unmixed. However, while Bishop Zephyrinus* at Rome fought Montanism* (which Tertullian favored) and Zephyrinus and his successor Callistus* engaged in a bitter power struggle with Hippolytus, the theological implications of Sabellianism on the orthodox side were serious. A modern form of Sabellianism is Unitarianism.*

Little is known about Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius except through the writings of Tertullian (Adversus Praxean) and Hippolytus (Refutation, Contra Noetum) and other secondary sources. Sabellianism was an attempt to solve the problem of how to accept the deity of Christ and also maintain the unity of God. The Sabellians achieved this at the expense of a trinity of persons in the Godhead. They reduced the status of the persons to modes or manifestations of the one

God. The term is frequently coupled with the word "monarchy" to denote the primacy of God as the Father. The Son and Holy Spirit are thus revelatory and apparently temporal modes of God the Father's self-revelation. Tertullian sneered that Praxeas had put the Holy Spirit to flight and crucified the Father. If God the Father became incarnate, then He also suffered (Patripassianism).

SACRAMENT. A religious rite variously regarded as a channel or as a sign of grace. In all its work and witness, the NT church gave a prior place to preaching (see HOMILETICS) through which, it recognized, Christ gave men fellowship with Himself and participation in the power of His death and resurrection. It recognized also, however, that Christ meant the Word to be accompanied in this unique ministry by baptism and the Lord's Supper, and it gave to both these ordinances also a special place in its life. It was always characteristic of God's approach to man in the OT that when He wanted to speak to men and have communion with them, He not only used words, but also gave signs along with the Word. For example, He used dreams and visions, symbolic objects and miracles, in addition to speaking. These sometimes illustrated and drew attention to what He had to say, or were sometimes simply signs that He was really present there and then in the saying of it. It was characteristic of Jesus that in His own ministry on earth He not only preached, but He added miracles and other signs to help to effect and to draw attention to what His Word proclaimed. Miraculous signs as seals of the Word continued within the early church for only a short time, and it was accepted that baptism* and the Lord's Supper* were to continue as the settled permanent signs attached to the Word.

In later days these two ordinances were called "sacraments." This word is the Latin for the Greek mysterion, which in the NT denotes the divine plan of salvation hidden in past ages, but now brought to light in the preaching of the Word. This mystery proclaimed in the Word was fully realized in the God-man Himself, in His person and work, and is now being realized in the union of the individual to Christ by faith. The revelation of this fulfilled mystery will be consummated in the last day (cf., e.g., Eph. 3:3-6; 1 Tim. 3:16; Col. 1:27; 1 Cor. 15:51,52). In the thinking of the ancient Catholic Church there was only one sacrament or mystery—that of Christ Himself —but baptism and the Lord's Supper were called "mysteries" or "sacraments" because they enabled men to participate in this sacramental union of God and man, through the atoning death and resurrection of Christ. The sacraments were regarded as effecting within the church nothing more than the Word itself effected when it was received by faith. They too required the same faith.

It was Augustine* who first gave the general definition of "a sacrament" which later became traditional—i.e., an outward and temporal sign of an inward and enduring grace. This general definition led later to the incorporation of other sacramental ceremonies into the life of the church. A sacramental theology developed in which ultimately seven sacraments were regarded as containing and causing grace. The church came to regard itself as a sacramental institution dispensing a special grace for every important occasion in life. The sacraments were regarded as effective ex opere operato, provided the recipient placed no obstacle in the way of their reception. The Reformers used the Augustinian definition of a sacrament and restricted their number to the two for which they believed they had Christ's command and promise. They insisted that the sacraments were given to serve the Word of God and were effective only when received by faith within a personal relationship with Christ.

SADDUCEES. We first meet them in Josephus's account of John Hyrcanus (135-104 B.C.). Our information about them is meager and derived exclusively from hostile sources. Clearly they consisted mainly of the most influential priestly and aristocratic families. Normally their name is interpreted as "descendants of Zadok," i.e., David's high priest. They may have preserved some of the Hellenistic views adopted by many priests in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, but they are presented essentially as the preservers of ancient priestly traditions.

In most conflicts with the Pharisees* they were clearly defending an older view. The greater popularity of the Pharisees among the people was mainly due to their trying to interpret the law of Moses, with all their strictness, with the needs of the poor in mind. Many of the Sadducean leaders were murdered by the Zealots* during the revolt against Rome, as real or suspected collaborators; the destruction of the Temple deprived their survivors of their position of religious significance. They disappeared, and the Pharisees saw to it that they left no traces behind them. Though they respected the prophetic books, they denied normative value to them. Hence they denied the resurrection as unprovable from the Pentateuch. They also maintained the concept of complete freedom of the will, and rejected scribal traditions. The denial of angels and spirits (Acts 23:8) was presumably as media of revelation.

SADOLETO, JACOPO (1477-1547). Cardinal, humanist, and biblical scholar. Born at Modena, he joined Oliviero Cardinal Carrafa as a minor poet in 1498. As a member of Clement VIII's Curia from 1524 to 1527, Sadoleto emerged as an exegete. He left Rome after its sacking in 1527, and from the diocese of Carpentras in France published the De Laudibus philosophiae (1538) and a controversial commentary on Romans (1535). Reginald Pole* warned Sadoleto not to neglect theology and was greatly impressed by him; Sadoleto responded that Pole was his guide. "The book of the Gospels contains the entire way and knowledge of our salvation," he held. John Calvin* replied to Sadoleto's famous letter to the Genevans (1539), deploring Sadoleto's emphasis on the safety of one's soul in contrast to God's glory. Whether for his Catholic friends like Pole or Protestant foes like Calvin, Sadoleto never ceased to work for reform. A great mass of his diocesan work at Carpentras remains unexamined, while his presence on the papal reform commission of 1536 guarantees his place as an irenic bishop in a polemical age.

SAILER, JOHANN MICHAEL (1751-1832). Jesuit scholar. Born in upper Bavaria, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1770 and was ordained to the priesthood in 1775. Five years later he became professor of dogmatics at Ingolstadt, and other academic appointments followed at Dillingen (1784) and Ingolstadt (1799), which latter university was in 1800 removed to Landshut. As the mentor of prospective priests, Sailer influenced a circle of evangelicals which included Martin Boos,* Johannes Gossner,* and Baron von Wessenberg.* Sailer's appointment to the bishopric of Augsburg was rejected by the Curia in 1819. After serving as vicar-general for four years he was appointed in 1829 to the see of Regensburg.

SAINT-CYRAN, ABBÉ DE (1581-1643). Jansenist* theologian. Born Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, he was a pupil of Justus Lipsius at the Jesuit College, Louvain, and a fellow-student and close friend of Cornelius Jansen at Paris (1604-10) and Bayonne (1611-17). He became secretary to Bishop de la Rocheposay (1617) and abbot of Saint-Cyran (1620), thereafter living mainly in Paris. Attracted to the writings of Augustine,* he sought with Jansen to combat the Jesuits' moral laxity and to reform Catholicism on Augustinian lines in the hope of defeating Protestantism with its own weapons. From 1623 he was closely associated with the Arnauld family and the Cistercian convent of Port Royal, near Paris. As spiritual counselor at Port Royal from 1633, he exerted immense influence, making it the center of Jansenism in France. He devised a lay community, les Solitaires de Port Royal, which numbered among its adherents some of the most distinguished scholars of the age. Jansen wrote him a long series of letters from Louvain between 1617 and 1635. Cardinal Richelieu* considered him dangerous and had him incarcerated in the donjon at Vincennes from 1638 till Richelieu's death (1643). Here he wrote Letters chrétiennes et spirituelles (pub. 1645). Later Jansenists regarded him as a martyr.

J.G.G. NORMAN

SAINTS. According to Roman Catholic doctrine, saints are those now in heaven because of their exemplary lives, who can make intercession with God for the living as well as for those in purgatory.* The practice of the veneration of saints claims biblical foundation, e.g., Genesis 18:16-31; Matthew 19:28; Hebrews 12:1; Revelation 6:9f.; see also Paul's doctrine of Christ's mystical body, with all members as "fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Eph. 2:19). The nonbiblical sources for the practice range through Christian history, beginning in the pre-Nicene period with the *Odes of Solomon and the Martyrium Polycarpi (c.156). Origen* was probably the first of the Fathers to permit the cult of martyrs a theological claim, and Cyril* and Chrysostom* made the distinction between those commemorated at the Eucharist and the ordinary dead.

As devotion to the saints grew, idolatry arose, to counter which theologians tried to make clear the difference between worshiping God and honoring the saints: the Greek terms latreia and douleia respectively. By the Carolingian period, popular devotion was flowering with pilgrimages,* greater concern with relics,* naming of patrons, and even making feasts civil festivals. The first formal canonization occurred in 993 with Ulrich.* Increasingly the "lives" were publicized, more stereotype than fact, which only added abuses. The great task of revising these lives, begun by Lipomani, Surius, and Baronius,* was critically done by Jean Bollandus (1596-1665) in his Acta Sanctorum, which provided a model. Leo I,* Gregory I,* and John of Damascus* furthered the theology of the practice, while liturgical developments reflected popular devotion and patristic teaching. Iconography grew accordingly, and even some angels were elevated (Raphael,* Gabriel,* Michael*).

A saint, by description not title, could be designated unofficially without beatification* or canonization.* These many practices brought protest from within, at the councils of Avignon (1209) and the Fourth Lateran (1215), as well as without (Cathari,* Waldenses*). The fiercest objections came at the Reformation from Zwinglians and Calvinists. The Council of Trent* approved the practice, but encouraged moderation, with Robert Bellarmine's* principles governing much of the present teaching. The modern practice is governed by canon law,* distinguishing between the worship of God and the honoring of Mary, the saints, and angels.

The Eastern Churches are similar to Rome in their attitude on the subject. With Protestant refusal to venerate the saints (since sanctity is potentially the province of all who enjoy salvation) their legends have diminished. The literary interest of John Milton* and some of his contemporaries kept them alive, but the Enlightenment,* especially Voltaire* and the Encyclopedists,* only reinforced the Protestant view. In the Anglican Communion the practice was revived with the Oxford Movement* despite early Tractarian misgivings.

SAINT-SIMON, CLAUDE HENRI DE ROUVROY (1760-1825). French social philosopher. Although he came from a noble family in Paris, he was convinced by the French Revolution and industrialization that the end of the Catholic and aristocratic era had come. After an undistinguished military career and life as a titled profligate, he abandoned his titles of nobility in support of the Revolution. He engaged in intensive reflection (from 1797), culminating in a brief period (1814-25) in which he formulated his new societal and cultural ideas. Especially important were the periodicals L'Industrie (from 1816), and its successor L'Organisateur (1819-20). He considered the new industriels as the hope for the future, for they could administer society and arrange production for the good of all, whose life would be devoted to productive work of all kinds, for which they would receive just reward. The plan rested on the conviction that science—first physics, later biology—could point the way to social reconstruction. Positive science and industry, he believed, had replaced medieval Christianity and feudalism, as historical evolution had progressed. In Nouvelle Christianisme (1825) he argued that the ethics of Christianity could be useful to insure the solidarity of the new society, but it had to be stripped of its dependence on elements he considered metaphysical, supernatural, and dogmatic. Auguste Comte, a younger collaborator of Saint-Simon from 1817-24, later developed positivism as an implication of his teacher's scientific treatment of social organization. A group of Saint-Simonians, including Barthélemy Enfantin, developed his incipient biological organicism more romantically into a "utopian" socialism.

SAINT-VALLIER, JEAN BAPTISTE DE LA CROIX DE CHEVIERES (1653-1727). Second bishop of Quebec. Ordained at the age of twenty-two, the French-born Saint-Vallier became one of Louis XIV's chaplains, then was nominated by Laval to succeed him in Quebec. He arrived in Canada in 1685 as vicar-general of the diocese and in 1688 was consecrated bishop. Zealous, pious, dictatorial, and undiplomatic, he was constantly in conflict with the civil authorities and other ecclesiastics over his efforts to maintain a high moral tone in colonial life by enforced asceticism. Constantly on the move, he faithfully administered his vast diocese and demonstrated his concern for the welfare of the poor by building several hospitals and setting up a rudimentary welfare service. Requests for his recall were often sent to the king, but it was the English who obliged his enemies by capturing him in 1704, so that he was absent from his diocese for thirteen years. ROBERT WILSON

SAKER, ALFRED (1814-1880). Missionary to Cameroon. Born at Borough Green, Kent, he was an engineer who joined the Baptist Mission which left Jamaica to work among liberated slaves in Fernando Po (1843). In Cameroon (1845) he founded Bethel station in Douala country, giving himself to preaching, teaching, and translation. When the Spanish authorities forbade Protestant worship on Fernando Po (1858), Saker with ninety families founded a settlement at Victoria on Cameroon mainland. He introduced crafts and building work and completed the Douala Bible (1872). With Sir Richard Burton he made the first ascent of Cameroons Mountain (13,352 feet). Retiring to England in failing health in 1876, he encouraged the founding of the Baptist Missionary Society Congo Mission in his closing years. J.G.G. NORMAN

SALESBURY, WILLIAM (1520?-1584?). Welsh NT translator. He sprang from a family that had gained money and social prestige since the fourteenth century. He was born at Llansannan, but spent most of his life at Plas Isa in Denbighshire. No more detail is available about his university career except that he was educated at Oxford. After a period at the Inns of Court he became a lawyer in the service (possibly) of the lord chancellor. But he seems to have retired early to Wales to devote himself to his scholarly pursuits.

He dedicated himself to the task of providing the Welsh people with the Scriptures in their own language. After trying his hand as an author by publishing seven books, he began the great work of his life by publishing Kynniver llith a ban ("all the lessons and articles") in 1551, a Welsh translation of the lessons for Holy Communion according to the 1549 Book of Common Prayer. Salesbury was a typical man of the Renaissance in his scholarship and linguistic expertise, and it is apparent that in translating into Welsh he made use of Erasmus's Greek Testament, Luther's German, the Vulgate, Tyndale's NT, and the Great Bible. But he was always selective in his choice of translation. With the accession of Elizabeth I,* it became imperative to complete the work of translation. The Act of 1563 commanded the Welsh bishops together with the bishop of Hereford to have a Welsh translation of the Bible and of the Book of Common Prayer available by 1 March 1567. Salesbury was invited by Bishop Richard Davies to cooperate in the work of translation.

In May 1567 the Welsh Book of Common Prayer was published, followed by the NT in October. It is now agreed that the Common Prayer was very largely the work of Salesbury. While Bishop Davies translated 1 Timothy, Hebrew, James, 1 and 2 Peter, and Thomas Huet, dean of St. David's, translated Revelation, the remainder was Salesbury's work. By now the Geneva Bible had been published as well as Theodore Beza's great work on the NT (1565). They influenced Salesbury to be more meticulous about the details of the Greek text and to adopt a literal translation very frequently rather than an idiomatic one—the common emphasis among Calvinistic translators. All in all, Salesbury's work was a very fine achievement, and although his NT is marred by the adoption of idiosyncratic ideas about Welsh orthography, it is nevertheless the basis of all subsequent translations. It was Salesbury who fused the spiritual energy of the Protestant Reformation and the enthusiasm of the Renaissance into the context of Welsh national life.

SALESIANS (The Salesian Society of St. John Bosco). Founded in Turin in 1841 by Giovanni Bosco,* it is the third largest Roman Catholic order. In 1970 it had 20,423 members throughout the world and supported 1,533 institutions. Don Bosco envisioned reaching young men spiritually by means of song festivals (a daily average of 576 festivals are sponsored). Soon the work spread to operating orphanages, day schools, evening schools, savings banks, sports associations, asylums for poor students, and agricultural colonies. The order maintains 140 mission stations in Asia, Africa, and South America and cares for nearly half-a-million orphans. Pius IX gave the order apostolic approval in 1868. ROYAL L. PECK

SALMASIUS, CLAUDIUS (Claude de Saumaise) (1588-1653). French Protestant scholar. Born in Semur, Burgundy, he studied philosophy at Paris (1604-6) under Isaac Casaubon,* through whom he was converted to Calvinism. While studying jurisprudence in Heidelberg he discovered the manuscript of the Palatine anthology. He edited two previously unprinted fourteenth-century tracts against papal supremacy by Nilus of Salónica and the monk Barlaam (1608). After publishing classical works, including an edition of Solinus's Polyhistor (1629), he became professor at Leyden (1632), succeeding J.J. Scaliger. Here he remained apart from a visit to the court of Queen Christina of Sweden (1650-51). He defended the compatibility of usury with Christianity in De usuris liba (1638) and De modo usurarum (1639). His Defensio regia pro Carolo I (1649), an accusation of regicide against the English people, provoked a counterblast from John Milton, Pro populo anglicano defensio (1651). J.G.G. NORMAN

SALMON, GEORGE (1819-1904). Anglican divine. Born at Cork, Ireland, son of a Protestant linen merchant, he had a brilliant career at Trinity College, Dublin, and this led to a lifetime in the college as fellow (1841), professor (1866), and finally provost from 1888. He had been ordained in the Church of Ireland in 1845. He pursued two separate academic disciplines. Internationally recognized as a mathematician, he was also widely known for his theological writings. A strong Protestant, he cooperated with Archbishop Whately* in Cautions for the Times (1853), an answer to the Tractarians.* His widely read Infallibility of the Church (1889) was a brilliant, trenchant exposition of Roman claims which he answered with clarity, learning, and humor. His Introduction to the New Testament (1885) punctured several extravagantly liberal theories concerning Christian origins. He later questioned successfully many of the less happy hazards of Hort's Greek NT text. An able administrator, Salmon's financial acumen aided the Church of Ireland after the shock of disestablishment.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

SALTMARSH, JOHN (1612?-1647). Anglican writer and controversialist. As rector of Heslerton he was a keen conformist, but changed his views and resigned in 1643, becoming rector of Brasted in 1645 and, according to Thomas Fuller, "a violent oppressor of bishops and ceremonies." He was a prolific pamphleteer in favor of greater latitude in church government, with a gentle, quaint, controversial style. In 1646 he became an army chaplain and "prophesied" to Fairfax at Windsor that "the army had departed from God." He is chiefly memorable for the controversy with the Westminster divine Thomas Gataker over Saltmarsh's sermon Free Grace (1645), which Gataker regarded as dangerously lacking in emphasis on Christian responsibility. Saltmarsh with others was labeled "Antinomian" because of insistence that Christians have no responsibility to keep the law of God because they are God's children and so not "under law"—probably an unwise exaggeration of the biblical teaching of justification through the free grace of God, but not necessarily antinomian. Saltmarsh's views were further expounded in Sparkles of Glory (1647).

PAUL HELM

SALVATION. In the Bible the word may mean deliverance by God from almost any kind of evil, whether temporal and material or spiritual—defeat in battle (Exod. 15:2), trouble (Ps. 34:6), enemies (2 Sam. 3:10), exile (Ps. 106:47), death (Ps. 6:4), sin (Ezek. 36:29). It does not necessarily have a theological connotation. At first the Israelites thought of salvation primarily as deliverance in a material sense and as a national thing, but as their sense of moral evil deepened, salvation acquired a profound ethical meaning, and it gradually was seen to include Gentiles as well as Jews (Isa. 49:5,-6; 55:1-5). With the unfolding of the messianic idea, it came to be used of their deliverance from sin to be brought in with the Messianic Age. Among the Israelites, salvation was acquired through a sincere observance of the law, moral and ceremonial. The ritual sacrifices could not of themselves bring pardon of sin, for they were merely typical of the Lamb of God who was to die for the sins of the world (Isa. 53).

In the teaching of Jesus, salvation usually denotes deliverance from sin, to be experienced now, although its complete fulfillment is eschatological. He taught that salvation is only through Him, the incarnate Son of God (John 3:16). In the apostolic age salvation is through the death of Christ (Eph. 2:13-18) and includes all the redemptive blessings which believers have in Christ, chief of which are conversion, regeneration, justification, adoption, sanctification, and glorification. It is God's solution to the whole problem of sin, in all its aspects. It brings deliverance not only from the guilt of sin, but also from its power, and ultimately from its presence. Although provided through Christ's sufferings, death and resurrection, salvation becomes realizable in experience through the Holy Spirit, on the condition of faith. Its effects will someday embrace the whole universe. The curse will be removed from nature, and all history will find its consummation and completion in Christ (Rom. 8:21,22; Eph. 1:10).

SALVATION ARMY. Founded by William Booth* as the "Christian Mission" in East London in 1865, the Salvation Army first took that name in 1878. It was an essentially evangelical movement, biblically orientated, theologically conservative. Its basis of belief includes the divine inspiration of the Bible, the doctrine of the Trinity, the salvation of believers "by faith through grace," the "immortality of the soul," the resurrection of the body, the final judgment. The doctrinal distinctives of the Army include an Arminian emphasis on free will and a "holiness" experience which can be subsequent to conversion—this is traceable to William Booth's Methodist origins—and the nonobservance of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

By 1879 William Booth "commanded" eighty-one stations, manned by 127 full-time evangelists, with another 1,000 voluntary speakers holding 75,000 services a year. Fifty-one new stations were opened in 1878; in that same year the first brass band featured in an Army event, and soon Salvationist words were being set to secular song tunes and bands were springing up everywhere. In 1880 standard uniforms were adopted, preceded in 1878 by the first volume of Orders and Regulations for the Salvation Army. Also in 1880 came the first overseas advance, into the USA; in 1882, Canada was "invaded," followed by India. By 1884 the Army had more than 900 corps, over 260 of them outside Britain, and headquarters in the city of London. This in spite of fierce opposition, at times leading to serious rioting.

The Army was inevitably led to operate on a broader front, faced with the appalling social needs of Victorian London and other great cities. A sensational case in which William Booth's son Bramwell was involved in exposing the white slave traffic forced the Army into prominence. Within five years, thirteen homes for girls in need of care and protection had been set up in the United Kingdom, and a further seventeen overseas. The first Prison Gate home for discharged prisoners was opened in Melbourne in 1883. In 1887 Booth, seeing homeless men sleeping rough on London Bridge, decided to do something practical. After intense research he set out the facts in a best-selling book, In Darkest England—and the Way Out, appealing for a fighting fund of £100,000. Cheap food depots, an unofficial employment exchange, a missing persons bureau, night shelters, a farm colony, soup kitchens, leper colonies, woodyards in the USA, home industries in India, hospitals, schools, and even a lifeboat for the fishermen of Norway—these marked successive stages in the Army's massive program of social action. Permeating it all was the basic concern for personal salvation which had been the motivation of its beginnings.

World War I gave many opportunities for service which broke down further barriers of prejudice and misunderstanding, and helped the Army to its present general acceptance both as an agency of goodwill and compassion, and as a member of the world family of Christian churches. Today the Army is at work in 74 countries, and numbers altogether some 2 million members. There are 25,039 full-time officers. Typical statistics for a recent year (1970) include: 20 million low-cost meals served, 10 million hostel beds provided, 7,035 missing persons traced, 19,722 unmarried mothers cared for. The Salvation Army has 40 general and specialist hospitals, with some 148,000 in-patients in a recent year.

SALVIAN (c.400-c.470). Christian writer. Of a noble Christian family and probably born near Cologne, he had married early a young woman (Palladia) of pagan background, with whom by mutual consent the ascetic life had been chosen, to the vexation of her family. Separating according to agreement, he joined the community first at Lérins, later at Marseilles as presbyter. Apart from nine known letters, Gennadius provides what little else is known of the man. Under Augustinian influence Salvian composed (after 439) in eight books a treatise de Gubernatione Dei, falling back upon the fundamental biblical perspective of greater moral judgment upon the elect, while providing a vivid picture of the corrupt bureaucratic administration and its socioeconomic practices. As agent of the divine retribution, the "barbarian" peoples served rather than contravened Providence because of the greater perversity of the Romans in their sexual laxity, addiction to the games, and oppression of the poor. A work in four books also survives, concerning the willing of possessions to the church rather than to familial heirs. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SAMARITANS. The name "Samaria" came to be used for that central section of Palestine coinciding approximately with the tribal portions of Ephraim and Western Manasseh. Its inhabitants, an amalgam of those Israelites not deported by the Assyrians and the various foreign elements introduced by them (2 Kings 17:24; Ezra 4:2,10), were known as Samaritans. At first their religion was syncretistic, but by the time of Zerubbabel the heathen elements seem to have been eliminated. Disappointed in their hope of sharing in the Jerusalem temple and worship, except on Judean terms, they built a temple on Mt. Gerizim in the fifth or fourth century B.C., served by a Zadokite priest from Jerusalem, whose descendants still function among them. This temple was destroyed about 107 B.C. by John Hyrcanus, rebuilt in A.D. 135, and finally destroyed in 484 for political rather than Christian motives. The Passover lambs are still sacrificed annually on Mt. Gerizim.

The chief features separating them from Rabbinic Jews is that they accept only the Pentateuch as canonical, their interpretation of it being stricter than that of the Talmud, and they consider Mt. Gerizim to be the site chosen by God for the Temple. Though Rabbinic tradition calls them "Cutheans," it also recognizes their right to share in the worship of Israel, if they abandon their special principles. They remained a prosperous, closely knit community until they began to decline owing to Muslim persecution. By 1955 they numbered about 250 in Nablus and seventy near Tel Aviv, but since then they have shown signs of increase.

SAMSON OF ARBIL (d.123). First known martyr east of the Roman Empire. Deacon to Paqida, the first bishop of Arbil (104-114) in what is now N Iraq, he himself succeeded to the diocese when in 120 he was consecrated by the bishop of Bait Zabdi. Samson carried out successful evangelism among surrounding villages whose inhabitants followed a debased form of fire-worship involving annual child-sacrifice. Arrested in 123 by nobles and Magians, he was tortured and decapitated.

SANCROFT, WILLIAM (1617-1693). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1678 till 1689. Graduate and fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he was ejected in 1651 and went abroad for some years, studying in Padua, and returned to England at the Restoration. He became chaplain to Bishop Cosin and was involved with him at the Savoy Conference* and afterward on the work of revising the Prayer Book. He also became chaplain to Charles II, and a prebendary of Durham in 1662. In the same year he became master of Emmanuel and founded a new college chapel. After a brief period as dean of York (1664), he became dean of St. Paul's and was closely associated with Wren in rebuilding that cathedral after the Great Fire. He became archbishop of Canterbury in 1678 and in that capacity crowned the Roman Catholic James II* in 1685, having revised the service to omit Communion. He refused to serve on James's ecclesiastical commission or to read his declaration of indulgence.* He was imprisoned in the Tower with six other bishops for his opposition. He supported actively the intervention of William of Orange, but refused to recognize him as lawful king, for which he was suspended in August 1689 and then deprived. With others of like mind he founded the schismatic body of Nonjurors*, but spent his last years in retirement.

SANCTIFICATION. The separation of one's entire being from all that is polluting and impure, and a renunciation of the sins toward which the desires of the flesh lead. Both the Greek hagiasmos and the biblical doctrine of sanctification disallow any idea of progressively becoming holy. What God has once made holy in election and redemption is always thereafter holy, and there can be no degrees in the state of absolute holiness. Our moral progress is not a growth into holiness out of a state of comparative unholiness, but a growth in holiness effected by a supernatural act of God. The Christian can and is expected to cooperate by the proper use of the means God makes available (Rom. 12:1,2), but it is God who does the all-important work (Gal. 5:16-25). Sanctification involves the mortification of the old man (Col. 3:8-10; Rom. 6:6), and the giving of vitality to the new man, created in Christ unto good works (Rom. 6:11-23).

SANCTUARY, RIGHT OF. Sanctuaries or asylums, wherein people could find temporary protection, existed among many different peoples—e.g., the cities of refuge of the Jews. Christian sanctuaries, first recognized by Roman law in 399, were given further legal rights in 419 and 431. Justinian, however, in a statute of 535, limited the privilege to persons not guilty of the grosser crimes. Canon law later allowed sanctuary for a prescribed time to persons guilty of crimes of violence so that terms of compensation might be worked out and agreed. In English common law a person accused of felony could have sanctuary within a church, but once there had to decide between submitting to a trial or confessing the crime and leaving the country. If no decision was made after forty days, he was starved into submission. In the sixteenth century the right of sanctuary was severely curtailed throughout Europe. Henry VIII limited it to seven cities of refuge—Wells, Westminster, Northampton, Manchester (later Chester), York, Derby, and Launceston. In 1623 James I abolished sanctuaries in cases of crime; in 1697 the law was tightened by the "Escape from Prison Act," and in 1723 a further act completed the work of extinction. In Scotland sanctuary was abolished at the Reformation, but certain debtors were accorded sanctuary around Holyroodhouse, Edinburgh, until about 1700. In Europe the practice lingered on until the time of the French Revolution.

PETER TOON

SANDAY, WILLIAM (1843-1920). Biblical scholar. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, from 1866 until 1869 and then a country clergyman in three different parishes before becoming principal of Hatfield Hall, Durham, in 1876. In 1882 he returned to Oxford as Dean Ireland's professor of the exegesis of Holy Scripture and was Lady Margaret professor of divinity from 1895 until 1919. He was one of the original fellows of the British Academy. A patient and thorough scholar who embraced modernist convictions from 1912, he published a large number of books. Most of his work was in the field of the gospels, as is shown by his earlier works The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel (1872) and The Gospels in the Second Century (1876). His Bampton Lectures were published with the title Inspiration (1893). The work for which he is best remembered, however, is the commentary on Romans, written with A.C. Headlam for the International Critical Commentary in 1895 because he felt that a professor of exegesis should do some exegetical work. After his appointment to the Lady Margaret chair he concentrated on the life of Christ. His works included Outlines of the Life of Christ (1905), The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1908), The Life of Christ in Recent Research (1907), Christologies Ancient and Modern (1910), and Personality in Christ and in Ourselves (1911). In conjunction with his seminar he also published Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911). R.E. NIXON

SANDEMANIANS. A body of Bible-loving Christians founded by John Glas* (hence the alternative name "Glasites") which flourished from 1725 until about 1900. Robert Sandeman (1718-71), son-in-law of Glas, came to the fore after the publication of James Hervey's Theron and Aspasio (1755), a Calvinist evangelical work which Sandeman attacked on the ground that it made faith a work of man which earns salvation. Sandeman held that bare assent to the work of Christ is alone necessary. After the controversy many new churches were founded; numerous Inghamite churches in Yorkshire joined the movement after 1759, and the London church in the Barbican area, of which Michael Faraday* was a member, was founded in 1760. Sandeman left England in 1764 to found churches in the USA, where the group survived until 1890. Sandemanians upheld the views of Glas and Sandeman: infant baptism and foot-washing were practiced; churches were organized with several coequal presbyters; and agreement (not a majority vote) was deemed essential. Excommunication was practiced. The sect was exclusive, and intermarriage was usual. It was the butt of much ill-informed criticism. Conditions of membership were strict (the church could control the use of members' private money), and membership low, although attendance at worship was large, at least in London.

Sandeman's works, which compared with those of Glas are repetitive and of low intellectual level, include Some Thoughts on Christianity (1762) and Discourses on Passages in Scripture (the 1857 edition of which contains a biography of Sandeman). R.E.D. CLARK

SANDERS, NICHOLAS (c.1530-1581). Roman Catholic scholar and controversialist. Born in Surrey and educated at Winchester and Oxford, he became a lecturer in canon law at Oxford (1551) until the accession of Elizabeth in 1558 made him leave England for the Continent. By 1561 he had been ordained priest at Rome, and he served as theologian at the Council of Trent* in the entourage of S. Cardinal Hosius.* Sanders's abilities were further recognized in 1565 with his appointment as professor of theology at Louvain, and there followed seven years in which he produced a number of works upholding the claims of Rome against the Anglican Church. He was summoned to Rome in 1572 to advise Gregory XIII* on English affairs, and worked and schemed for a military invasion of England by Catholic armies, with mixed results. He went to Ireland in 1579 in pursuance of his plans, but died there two years later. His works include The Rock of the Church (1567), De Visibili Monarchiae Ecclesiae (1571), and an uncompleted volume which was translated into English and published in 1877 as The Rise and Growth of the Anglican Schism. J.D. DOUGLAS

SANDYS, EDWIN (1516?-1588). Archbishop of York. After a brilliant academic career at St. John's College, Cambridge, he was chosen in 1547 as master of Catherine Hall and two years later became a canon of Peterborough. In 1553 he was appointed vice-chancellor of Cambridge. When Mary became queen he was arrested for his support of Lady Jane Grey's cause, but he escaped to Strasbourg where he enjoyed the friendship of Peter Martyr.* After Elizabeth's accession he became successively bishop of Worcester (1559), bishop of London (1570), and archbishop of York (1575). He helped to translate the Bishops' Bible, and was firmly committed to maintaining the Protestant character of the Church of England. He did, however, somewhat modify his earlier pronounced Puritanism after he became a bishop. PETER TOON

SANGSTER, WILLIAM EDWYN ROBERT (1900-1960). Methodist preacher and scholar. Born in London, he was educated at Shoreditch Secondary School and Richmond College, Surrey. He served in World War I, was ordained into the Methodist ministry (1926), and ministered at Bognor Regis, Colwyn Bay, Liverpool, Scarborough, and Leeds. He was for sixteen years minister of Westminster Central Hall, London, where his passionate, scholarly preaching drew large crowds. He was president of the London Free Church Federation (1944-46) and president of the Methodist Conference (1950). He was Cato Lecturer (1954) and member of the Senate of London University (1944-56). He became secretary of the home mission department of the Methodist Church. His doctoral thesis was published as The Path to Perfection (1943), a study of John Wesley's doctrine. His many other books include The Pure in Heart and several on preaching.

SANHEDRIN (Gr. synedrion, "a council"). The term was used by the Rabbis both for the supreme council and court of the Jews in Jerusalem of seventy-one members and for the lesser tribunals of twenty-three. The rules governing them are found in tractates Sanhedrin and Makkot of the Mishnah, but it is certain that in their present formation they are later than the fall of Jerusalem, and many probably represent an ideal. The Sanhedrin in this form probably began with the election of Simon to the high-priesthood (142 B.C.); it became an ideal when John Hyrcanus broke with the Pharisees. It may have been reintroduced under Alexandra Salome (76 B.C.), but it certainly ceased to exist from the time of Herod. In the NT the Sanhedrin was a body dominated by the high priest and aristocratic Sadducees. Büchler's idea that there were two sanhedrins, one political and the other religious, has little to commend it. H.L. ELLISON

SANKEY, IRA DAVID (1840-1908). Singing evangelist and associate of D.L. Moody.* Born in Lawrence County, Pennsylvania, he early acquired musical talent. After service in the Union Army during the Civil War, he returned to Newcastle, Pennsylvania. Singing soon became his chief interest. He often sang at Sunday school conventions. In 1870 as a delegate to the international convention of the YMCA at Indianapolis, he impressed D.L. Moody, who persuaded Sankey to join him in his evangelistic work in Chicago. This meeting inseparably linked the two for the next quarter-century. He assisted Moody in a remarkable series of meetings in the British Isles (1873-75), during which their popular Sankey and Moody Hymn Book was published. On their return to the USA they were national figures. Sankey's baritone voice was not exceptional but, accompanying himself on a small reed organ, he could pour great feeling into the simplest hymn. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

SANQUHAR DECLARATION (1680). Delivered at the Burgh Cross of Sanquhar in S Scotland by Richard Cameron* and a band of Covenanters,* this was an audacious but significant piece of defiance against Charles II. The Declaration directs its anathemas against him as the chief author of the persecution against the Covenanters, and does so, moreover, for his civil as well as ecclesiastical tyranny. It warns against the implications of the (Roman Catholic) duke of York as heir to the throne, and is the first Covenanting statement in which allegiance to Charles II was renounced because of his claim to supremacy over the church. Ostensibly a futile gesture, representing only a tiny minority in 1680, it was to represent the mind of Great Britain as a whole nine years later, when it was the basis for the Revolution Settlement. J.D. DOUGLAS

SAPHIR, ADOLPH (1831-1891). Presbyterian minister. Born in Budapest, Hungary, the son of a Jewish merchant, he and the rest of his family were converted to Christianity by the Jewish mission of the Church of Scotland. Deciding to enter the ministry, he studied at the Free Church College, Edinburgh, and the universities of Aberdeen and Glasgow (M.A., 1854). He served as a missionary to the Jews in Hamburg in 1854, as minister of English Presbyterian churches at South Shields, Greenwich, Notting Hill, and Belgrave, London. Throughout his lifetime he maintained a great interest in the conversion of Jews and other non-Christians in Europe, serving in many capacities in various missionary agencies. His writings include Christ and the Scriptures, (1864), Expository Lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews (1874-76), and The Divine Unity of Scripture (1892). KEITH J. HARDMAN

SARABAITES. A widely spread pre-Benedictine class of ascetics who lived either privately or in small groups in or near cities, with neither superior nor definite rule, keeping the result of their manual labors. Jerome speaks of them under the name of "Remoboth," and John Cassian notes their existence in Egypt and elsewhere, both references being adverse. The name, of which the original meaning is undetermined, later signified degenerate monks.

SARACENS. A word used by medieval Christians to describe the infidels and Muslims during the period of the Crusades.* The term appears on ancient inscriptions and seems to have applied originally only to a single tribe in the Sinai area. Later the meaning was expanded to refer to nomads in general, and after the Arab conquests of the seventh century the Byzantine empire called all Muslims Saracens. Western Christians adopted the term during the Crusades, and it was common to call all Muslims Saracens until the fall of Constantinople in 1453.

SARAVIA, HADRIAN (1531-1613). Anglican scholar. Born in Hesdin, Artois, to a Spanish Protestant, he was a drafter of the Belgic Confession and a refugee in Guernsey and England before returning to a chair of theology in Leyden (1582). Unsuccessful in persuading Elizabeth I of England to intervene more actively in the Netherlands, and finding his position untenable, Saravia returned to England in 1587 and became rector of Tattenhill the following year. Friendship with men like L. Andrewes* and R. Hooker* profoundly modified his Calvinism. Though firmly upholding the supremacy of Scripture, he insisted that no doctrinal changes would be introduced against the witness of the Fathers. He engaged in vigorous controversy with T. Beza* over divine-right Presbyterianism, argued powerfully for episcopacy, and attacked Calvin's views on Christ's descent into hell and predestination. Saravia received considerable preferment and was one of the OT translators of the Authorized Version as well as one of the first Protestant advocates of foreign missions. IAN BREWARD

SARDICA, COUNCIL OF (342). A council summoned by the emperors Constans and Constantius at the request of Pope Julius to settle the orthodoxy of Athanasius,* Marcellus of Ancyra,* and Asclepiades of Gaza, deposed at the Council of Tyre (335). Though it was intended to be an ecumenical council, the seventy-six Eastern bishops—including Acacius of Caesarea, Basil of Ancyra, Maris of Chalcedon—and the Western bishops Ursacius of Singidunum and Valens of Mursa refused to take part because Athanasius was accepted as a proper council member. Nearly 300 Western bishops met under the presidency of Hosius* of Cordova and Protogenes of Sardica. They confirmed the restoration of Athanasius, acquitted Marcellus of heresy, and restored Asclepiades. They deposed Acacius, Basil, Gregory of Alexandria, Ursacius, and Valens, among others, as Arians. They also passed disciplinary canons, among which canons 3, 4, and 5 constituted the bishop of Rome as a court of appeal for accused bishops in certain circumstances. They set the date of Easter for the following fifty years. They also promulgated in general terms a formula of faith declaring that the "hypostasis" of the Father and Son was one, taking the word in the sense of nature or substance.

The Eastern bishops withdrew to Philippopolis, where they subscribed the Fourth Creed of Antioch (341). They explained in more detail their reasons for deposing Athanasius and Marcellus and issued their own list of condemnations, which included Julius, Hosius, Protogenes, and Maximin of Treves. The Council of Sardica began a schismatic process leading straight to the East/West separation of 1054. Sardica is the modern Sofia. J.G.G. NORMAN

SÄRKILAX, PETER (Pietari Särkilahti). (d.1529). Finnish Reformer. At the time of the Reformation, Finland was politically joined with Sweden. The first impulses towards a reformation of the Church of Finland came, however, not from Sweden but through a Finnish scholar. Särkilax studied from 1516 at the University of Rostock and thus was in Germany when the Reformation began. Returning to Finland in 1523, he was seized with the spirit of the Wittenberg movement, acting boldly and openly in favor of it as a member of the diocesan board of Åbo (Turku). During his time in Germany he married, and so was one of the first Lutheran pastors to break the celibacy regulations. In his work he was constantly stressing the necessity of a pure doctrine free from papal heresy. The most important result of his activity was that Mikael Agricola,* the chief figure in the Finnish Reformation, during his youth was deeply influenced by Särkilax.

SARPI, PAOLO (1552-1623). Servite* theologian. He attended a school for nobility in Venice, coming under the Servite tutelage of Gian Maria Capella. At eighteen the bishop of Mantua made Sarpi a reader in canon law. After studying Greek, Hebrew, philosophy, law, natural science, and history, he was elected provincial of the Servite Order. While in Rome during 1580 and between 1585 and 1588 he met Bellarmine* and other influential men. Meanwhile in 1578 Sarpi took a doctorate at Padua and mingled in Venetian society. He was a close friend of French Protestants, many of whom he met in Venice. While yet in his twenties, he was accused by the Inquisition in Milan for denying that Genesis 1 taught the Trinity. In 1601 the papal nuncio reported his identity with the errors taught possibly by Morosini. The pope blamed Sarpi in 1606 for dissensions in Venice, using this as one excuse for the famous interdict of 1606. Sarpi prepared the Venetian defense for the Senate's formal reply; his defense of Venetian liberties stands behind his famous Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, a critical account of Trent's* attempt to reform Catholicism (ET 1619). SATURNINUS (second century). Gnostic. In the catalogs of earliest Gnostics and their systems, found in Justin Martyr and Irenaeus and repeated in Eusebius, Saturninus is the third named in the chain stemming from Simon Magus through Menander, and issuing in the further developments of Basilides, the Ophites, and Valentinus. The movement was already established in the late first century, and Saturninus can be dated no later than the first decades of the second. Like Menander he taught at Antioch, his teaching falling into the kind of pattern outlined in the Apocryphon of John, which originated in Greek but has been recovered from Coptic papyri. The material also shows an affinity to the kind of development stemming from the gospel of John, which found its earliest commentators in those same Gnostic circles (see GNOSTICISM).

SATYRUS (d. c.375). Elder brother of Ambrose,* whose household and property he managed. Ambrose preached his funeral oration (De Excessu Fratris), paying warm tribute to one who passed on an "undivided patrimony ... neither distributed nor diminished but preserved" with Ambrose and his sister as "stewards, not heirs."

SAUL OF TARSUS, see PAUL THE APOSTLE

SAVA (Sabas) (c.1175-c.1235). Patron saint of Serbia. The third son of the Serbian monarch Stephen Nemanya, he retired in 1191 to the monastery of Mt. Athos. Five years later his father abdicated and joined him. Sava and his father founded the monastery of Khilandari which became a center of Serbian culture, and Sava remained there until 1208 when he returned to become active in political affairs. He was the first archbishop of an autonomous Serbian Church, and was responsible for the organization of the Serbian Church and the building of many churches. He died in Bulgaria while returning from a trip to Palestine.

SAVONAROLA, GIROLAMO (1452-1498). Italian reformer. Born in Ferrara and destined at first for a career in medicine, he joined the Dominicans (1474) and served in several N Italian cities. Although at first unsuccessful as a preacher, he achieved oratorical confidence and fame through a series of sermons on the Apocalypse preached at Brescia (1486). In 1490 he settled in Florence, where he preached at the Medici foundation of San Marco, calling for repentance on the part of the city's leaders and pleading the cause of the poor and oppressed. Elected prior of San Marco and invited to preach in the cathedral, he grew in influence. By 1494 he predicted a flood of divine judgment would be unleashed on Florence.

When the French king, Charles VIII, invaded Italy, it seemed that God's wrath had struck. Twice Savonarola persuaded the king not to sack the city, and finally Charles left without having done any deliberate damage. At the approach of the French the Medici "boss" of the city, Piero, had left, and then with the removal of Charles it seemed to Savonarola that divine grace had intervened in behalf of Florence. He announced that a "golden age" had come and the city would soon have temporal and spiritual power over all Italy. He encouraged the establishment of a republican government similar to that of Venice. Under this administration he held the city in moral tension and initiated tax reform, aided the poor, reformed the courts, changing Florence from a lax, corrupt, pleasure-loving city into an ascetic, monastic-type community. This was done through the use of censorship and violent methods—for example, during the carnival of 1496 he inspired the "burning of the vanities" when the people made a great bonfire of their gambling equipment, cosmetics, false hair, and lewd books.

Savonarola also denounced Alexander VI* and the corrupt papal court. The pope, unhappy because of Florence's alliance with the French and the preaching of the "meddlesome friar," excommunicated Savonarola and threatened to place the city under an interdict if he was permitted to preach again. Although Savonarola denied the validity of the ban since, as he put it, Alexander was the representative of Satan not Christ, the people of Florence were frightened. Moreover, some of the wealthy citizens were impatient with the friar's ideas. The Franciscans arranged an ordeal in which one of their number and a follower of Savonarola would march through a fire. When the flames were kindled for the test, an argument broke out between the two groups and a sudden rainstorm quenched the fire. This incident helped to discredit Savonarola, who was tried for heresy, found guilty, and executed.

SAVOY CONFERENCE (1661). An official conference of twelve Anglican bishops and twelve Puritan (mostly Presbyterian) divines, with nine coadjutors for each side, called after the Restoration of Charles II* and episcopacy (1660) to settle differences concerning the Book of Common Prayer.* The Puritans were determined to revise the sections which had caused so much agitation in the past—sections calling for the wearing of the surplice, kneeling at Communion, making the sign of the cross at baptism, bowing at the name of Jesus, and so on. The design was, of course, that the Puritans would gain concessions allowing them to serve in good conscience in the established church. Richard Baxter* and Edmund Calamy* led the Puritans, Gilbert Sheldon* and Accepted Frewen the Anglicans. The bishops took a defensive and unyielding position, rejecting Baxter's alternate liturgy. The Royalist sentiment in Parliament supported their hard line. No substantial changes resulted, and the 1662 Act of Uniformity* deprived more than 2,000 Puritans of their livings.

SAVOY DECLARATION (1658). The first and basic English Congregational (or Independent) statement of doctrine and church polity. It was the product of a semi-official meeting of Congregational churchmen at the Savoy Palace in London. The reasons for it, its composition, and its daily agenda are imperfectly known. Probably about 200 representatives attended, with the majority probably laymen. Most of the leading Congregational ministers, however, were present, including Philip Nye,* Thomas Goodwin,* John Owen,* William Bridge,* William Greenhill,* and Joseph Caryl. Philip Nye was most likely the moderator. In a remarkably short time and with remarkable unanimity the group drafted and approved three documents which make up the Declaration—a preface, a confession of faith, and a church polity. The preface is notable only for its verbosity and tolerant spirit. Except for the chapters on church government, the confession is essentially the same as the Westminster Confession*—not surprisingly, since all who worked on it were at Westminster, excepting John Owen. The church polity section is brief and clear, establishing complete autonomy for local congregations under the headship of Christ. The confessional section became more or less standard in New England Congregationalism.

SAWTREY, WILLIAM (d.1401). Lollard* martyr. A priest in Norfolk in 1399, he was summoned before the bishop of Norwich and charged with heresies, which he supposedly abjured. In 1401, while he was attached to St. Osyth's, London, his heretical teaching came to the attention of Archbishop Arundel.* Sawtrey was the first to be tried before the newly passed statute De Haeretico Comburendo, appearing before convocation at St. Paul's. The charges were that he refused to adore the cross save as a symbol; maintained that priests should omit repetition of the hours for more important duties such as preaching, holding that money spent on pilgrimages should instead be distributed to the poor; and believed that bread after consecration was essentially unchanged. He appealed to king and Parliament on the basis of the NT and Augustine. The archbishop tried to force a change of heart, but Sawtrey held his ground. He was condemned as a relapsed heretic, in view of his former abjuration, degraded from priest to doorkeeper, and stripped of every clerical function and vestment including his tonsure. Finally he was burnt in chains at Smithfield.

SAXON CONFESSION (Confessio Saxonica) (1551). Protestant confession of faith drawn up by Philip Melanchthon* at the emperor's request for the Council of Trent.* It appeared first in Latin at Basle, 1552. It followed the main lines of the Augsburg Confession* (1530), but was less conciliatory, there remaining no hope of Protestant-Roman Catholic reconciliation. The Scriptures as understood by the ancient church in the ecumenical creeds were declared the only and unalterable foundation of faith. The distinctive Christian doctrines were elaborated around the two articles in the Apostles' Creed* on the forgiveness of sins and the church. The former was held to exclude merit and justification by works; the latter to prove the church to be spiritual though visible communion of believers in Christ. The sacramental character of the eucharistic gifts was asserted to be confined to their use in the service. Unlike the Augsburg Confession, only the theologians signed, among them Melanchthon, J. Bugenhagen, and Georg Major. It was presented to the Council of Trent in 1552, together with the Württemberg Confession.* J.G.G. NORMAN

SAYBROOK PLATFORM (1708). A confessional document produced by the Congregational churches of Connecticut, it contained a confession (a reaffirmation of the Savoy Confession) and articles (a fifteen-point statement of ecclesiastical polity). The articles provided for the establishment of consociations in each county, with powers of oversight of the local congregations; ministerial associations in each county, with powers to examine ministerial candidates on doctrine and morals; and a general annual association, with undefined responsibility but composed of delegates from each consociation. Participation in the general association was voluntary. The Saybrook Platform replaced the Cambridge Platform* of 1648 as the most important confessional document of New England. DONALD M. LAKE

SAYCE, ARCHIBALD HENRY (1845-1933). Assyriologist. Born at Shirehampton, son of a vicar, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he became a fellow in 1869. Ordained and unmarried, he pursued a life of leisurely scholarship—in part a reflection of that fragile appearance which took him almost every winter from 1879 to 1908 to his "houseboat on the Nile." He became deputy professor of comparative philosophy in 1876, and first professor of Assyriology in England from 1891 until retirement in 1919. He was a member of the OT revision company (1874-84). No literalist, he nonetheless became—with his sharp wit and realization of the importance of discoveries—a sagacious opponent of a rampant higher criticism too preoccupied with its own theories of literary formation to look again at the empirical evidence. He held that Wellhausen's Pentateuchal literary divisions were as foolish as those of Homer by F.A. Wolf, since both were based on the same error that writing had not antedated the fifth century B.C. His Reminiscences (1923) were full of insight into the early history of, and men responsible for, the rediscovery of the ancient Orient. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SAYERS, DOROTHY LEIGH (1893-1957). English writer. Born in Oxford, she graduated at the university there and then embarked on a teaching career. In 1923 she published her first of a long series of detective novels which were to make her probably the most popular mystery writer in England. During World War II she lived in Essex and was a member of the group that included C.S. Lewis, Charles Williams, J.R.R. Tolkien, and Owen Barfield. By nature and by preference she was a scholar and an expert on the Middle Ages. Her translation of the Divine Comedy is one of the finest, with unexcelled notes illuminating the Christian meanings of the poem. The Man Born to Be King (1941) is a series of radio plays on the life of Christ which displays her fine insights and her substantial endowments as a dramatist. In The Mind of the Maker she is at her best as a lay apologist for Christian doctrine, especially the doctrine of the Trinity. PAUL M. BECHTEL

SAYINGS OF JESUS. This term is used to denote either the extracanonical sayings of Jesus ("Agrapha") or collected sayings of Jesus ("Logia") supposedly in "Q," the Gospel of Thomas,* and other writings. The Oxyrhynchus* discoveries (papyri I, 654, 655 and 840) are examples of collected sayings of Jesus. Recent scholarship indicates that the Oxyrhynchus collections are based upon the Gospel of Thomas.

SCALIGER, JOSEPH JUSTUS (1540-1609). Huguenot* scholar. Of Italian descent, he was born in Agen in S France, son of a renowned humanist, J.C. Scaliger, of whom he was companion and student in Latin from age fourteen. On his father's death in 1558 he went to Paris where he taught himself Greek before he could pursue the lectures of Adrianus Turnebus. In 1563 Scaliger, by then a Huguenot, was introduced to the nobleman Louis Chasteigner, with whose family he traveled and lived from time to time over the next thirty years while he pursued private research under their patronage. He escaped the St. Bartholomew's Day* Massacre by retreating to Geneva (1572-74), where he lectured until his return to France. His interest in textual criticism was enlarged by his study of ancient astronomy, and he it was who initiated the modern science of chronology. In 1593 he went to Leyden as professor of classics and there continued his studies toward his Thesaurus Temporum (1606), which had at its base his recovery of the Chronicle of Eusebius. Among the disciples he influenced were Daniel Heinsius (1580-1655) and especially Hugo Grotius.* CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SCHAFF, PHILIP (1819-1893). Theologian, church historian, and pioneer ecumenist. Born in Switzerland, son of a carpenter, he gained his education through scholarships. After graduating from the gymnasium at Stuttgart, he entered Tübingen University where he studied under F.C. Baur. Later he attended Halle and Berlin universities, where he studied with F.A.G. Tholuck, E.W. Hengstenberg, and J.A.W. Neander. A brilliant student, he was invited in 1844 to become professor of church history and biblical literature in the theological seminary of the German Reformed Church at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. The Principle of Protestantism (1844; new ed., 1964), his inaugural address, viewed the history of the Christian Church as a divine development leading to a merger of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism into a renewed evangelical Catholicism. This address caused him to be cited for heresy, but he was later exonerated. In the following years he and John Nevin* shaped the Mercersburg Theology.* From 1870 until his death he was professor at Union Theological Seminary, New York. Beginning in 1866, he was also active in the cause of Christian unity through working in the Evangelical Alliance.* A prolific writer, he published A History of the Christian Church (7 vols., 1858-92) and The Creeds of Christendom (3 vols., 1877). He edited the translated editions of Lange's Commentary (1864-80) and the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1884) and helped to prepare the Revised Version of the Bible. In 1888 he founded the American Society of Church History and served as its first president.

SCHALL, JOHANN ADAM (1591-1666). Jesuit missionary to China. Born in Cologne, he became a Jesuit, and in 1619 arrived in Macao. In 1630 he succeeded Ricci* in Peking, and by prophesying an eclipse gained an immediate reputation and a place on the board of astronomy engaged in reforming the calendar. He also became chaplain of a chapel within the imperial palace, having won the esteem of the first Manchu emperor. Many palace eunuchs were converted. After again successfully predicting an eclipse in 1645, Schall was appointed president of the board of astronomers, but he suffered through his support of Ricci in the Chinese Rites Controversy.* Moreover Confucian literati, envious of him, falsely accused him of planning a Portuguese invasion. An amnesty saved him from a cruel death, and eventually he died naturally in Peking. LESLIE T. LYALL

SCHEEBEN, MATTHIAS JOSEPH (1835-1888). German Roman Catholic theologian. After studies at the Gregorian University, Rome, he became professor of dogma at the Cologne seminary from 1860 until his death. His vast writings combined patristic and Scholastic learning with speculative thought. Although written in a style which was sometimes obscure, they have exerted considerable influence. Scheeben was regarded as the greatest speculative Catholic theologian of his day and a pioneer of Neoscholasticism. He was a great opponent of rationalism, and a leader of conservative Catholic theology. He took a vigorous part in the controversies attending the First Vatican Council* (1869-70), was a staunch defender of papal infallibility, and an opponent of Döllinger* and the Old Catholicism. His writings include Nature and Grace (1861; ET 1954); Die Mysterien des Christentums (1865); and the magisterial Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik, I-III (1873-87; 4th volume added later by L. Atzberger). A Manual of Catholic Theology based on Scheeben's "Dogmatik" was published in English in 1890. Extracts were published as Mariology (1946). A Festschrift celebrating the centenary of his birth was published in Rome in 1935. COLIN BROWN

SCHEEL, OTTO (1873-1954). German church historian. Born in N Schleswig, Scheel studied historical theology at Halle and Kiel and was appointed professor of church history at Tübingen in 1906. For many years he was chairman of the Verein für Reformationsgeschichte. His most significant work, Martin Luther: Von Katholizismus zur Reformation (1914-17), was not merely an analysis of Luther's youth, but also a study of education in the period. Scheel left it uncompleted when he accepted a new chair of Schleswig-Holstein local history at Kiel in 1924. He became interested in his homeland, especially the influence of Pietism and the social history of the peasantry, and he was active in organizations that promoted cultural identity among N Schleswigers. RICHARD V. PIERARD

SCHEFFLER, JOHANN (Angelus Silesius) (1624-1677). Polish hymnwriter. Son of a Lutheran Polish nobleman, he graduated in medicine and about 1649 became physician to the duke of Württemberg-Oels. His interest in mysticism, aroused by the Dutch followers of Boehme,* made him clash with Lutheran leaders. He resigned his post in 1652 and returned to Breslau, where in 1653 he became a zealous Roman Catholic. In 1671 he entered a monastery. His hymns, mostly uncontroversial and written while he was a Lutheran, were collected in Heilige Seelenlust (1657), e.g., "Thee will I love, my strength, my tower" (tr. J. Wesley); "O God, of good th'unfathomed sea" (Wesley); and "O Love, who formedst me to wear" (Winkworth). His religious epigrams were collected in his Cherubinischer Wandersmann (2nd ed., 1675). JOHN S. ANDREWS

SCHEIDT, SAMUEL (1587-1654). German composer. Most of his creative life was spent as organist of the Moritzkirche in Halle. He studied organ in Amsterdam with Sweelinck and ranks as one of the first great masters of the organ-chorale (chorale prelude). He is perhaps the first composer of such pieces whose works have more than an antiquarian interest to the church organist today. His Tabulatura nova (1624) is the first great collection of organ music in Germany to use staff notation exclusively instead of letter tablature. He also wrote many choral concertatos based on the Lutheran chorales. Later he published the Görlitz Tabulaturbuch (1650) containing 100 chorales in four-part harmony, ostensibly for the purpose of accompanying congregational singing. It is the first known book of its kind. He is in the first generation of great N German organists that leads up to Buxtehude and so to Bach.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

SCHEIN, JOHANN HERMANN (1586-1630). German composer. With his two contemporaries, Schütz and Scheidt, he stands out as one of the great Lutheran musicians of the early Baroque era. He was one of a number of distinguished names who acted as cantor of the Thomasschule in Leipzig, the position held by J.S. Bach a century later. Along with Scheidt, he contributed largely to the development of the Lutheran chorale concertato, one of the forerunners of the church cantata of Bach's time. He applied the Italian style of the early Baroque to such works as these, breaking up the chorale melody into florid passages and employing dramatic declamatory sections. He was probably the first to publish a chorale book with just the melodies and the continuo bass, which later became the norm in such collections. Schein also holds an honored place in the development of the instrumental suite.

SCHELLING, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON (1775-1854). German idealist philosopher. Son of a Württemberg pastor, he was trained at Tübingen, and from 1798 to 1803 held a professorship at Jena, the center of German Romanticism. He became friends with its leading figures—Friedrich and August Schlegel, Fichte, Hegel, and Goethe. Schelling's transcendental idealism, with its emphasis on the importance of the individual, the value of art, antirationalism, organicism, and vitalism, was the epitome of German Romantic philosophy. He later taught at Würzburg, Erlangen, and Munich and finally went to Berlin in 1841. His thought underwent considerable change and development. Starting from subjective idealism, he gradually worked out a philosophy of nature where the pure object and subject were integrated into an absolute unity of spirit and nature in God, the divine essence which can only be apprehended by will. The root of existence is God, the ungrounded, the eternal nothing, and only he is reality. Finite things are unreal and can only exist in removal from the Absolute, who then creates his own counterpart which is freedom. Schelling later became dissatisfied with this logical pantheism, stressed ideas as a route to ultimate reality, and even tried to reconcile Christianity with his philosophy. This emphasis resembles that of modern existentialism and has resulted in a renewed interest in Schelling.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

SCHERESCHEWSKY, SAMUEL ISAAC (1831-1906). Missionary and translator. Born at Taurrogen in Russian Lithuania, of Jewish parents, he graduated from Breslau University. Through reading the NT he became a Christian. Going to the USA, he was baptized in a Baptist church (1854), studied in a Presbyterian seminary (1855-58), joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and studied further at the General Theological Seminary, New York (1858-59). He served as a missionary in Shanghai (1859) and Peking (1863-75); gifted in languages, he collaborated with others in translating the Prayer Book and NT into Mandarin, and undertook the OT by himself. He became bishop of Shanghai in 1877, but four years later was struck with paralysis. Despite his incapacity, one of his later achievements was the translation of the whole Bible into Wen-li, typing with one finger.

SCHISM (Gr. schisma). Ecclesiastical term for division in or separation from a church, distinguished from heresy in that the separation involved is not basically doctrinal. It may not entail loss of orders, i.e., schismatic ordination and administration of sacraments are valid. In this technical sense the word first occurs in Irenaeus.* Cyprian* discussed the relation of the church to schism, and he condemned schismatics for endangering men's souls, regarding them as worse than apostates and their baptism as worthless. Augustine* took a similar view, but did not regard schismatic sacraments as invalid. In time obedience to the Roman pontiff became the test of catholicity. Outstanding schisms include the Novatianist* and Donatist* churches, the "Great Schism"* between the Greek and Latin churches (finally established in 1054), the Avignon* schism (1378-1417), and the schism between the Church of England and Rome (since 1570).

J.G.G. NORMAN

SCHLATTER, ADOLF VON (1852-1938). Swiss NT scholar. Born in St. Gall, he studied theology at Basle and Tübingen. His later essay on J.T. Beck* suggests a primary influence on his thought. After a pastorate in Switzerland he taught at Bern (1880-88) before becoming NT professor successively at Griefswald (1888), Berlin (1893), and Tübingen (1898) where he remained until retirement in 1922. He was allied with no school, ecumenical in outlook, and concerned to mediate between liberals and Pietists. With A.H. Cremer* he edited from 1897 the Beiträge zur Förderung Christlicher Theologie, to which he frequently contributed and on whose origins and importance for his own theological work he bore witness. His theological writing from Der Glaube im Neuen Testament (1885) to his mature theology of the NT in two volumes—Die Geschichte des Christus (1921) and Die Theologie der Apostel (1922)—puts the emphasis on the importance of Jesus, finding anchorage in the facts of faith rather than in speculative thought. Schlatter stressed that both theology and history must not forget God, and he wrote histories both of Israel from Alexander to Hadrian (1901) and of the early church (1926; ET 1955). His specific studies on NT books displayed similar independence; he was one of the few to break with the trend of his times to continue support for the priority of Matthew.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SCHLATTER, MICHAEL (1716-1790). Organizer of the German Reformed Church in the Thirteen Colonies. Born in St. Gall, Switzerland, and educated at the University of Gelmstadt, he was ordained in 1739 as a minister in the German Reformed Church. In 1746 he was sent to America to organize and supervise the scattered German Reformed congregations, and did so ably. In 1751, on a trip to Europe to secure ministers for the colonial churches, one of those recruited was Philip Otterbein.* Schlatter served as superintendent of schools in Philadelphia (1754-56) and as a British army chaplain (1756-59). He then became a pastor in Philadelphia. His ardent patriotism led to loss of property and imprisonment in the Revolutionary War.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST (1768-1834). German theologian. Of Silesian Pietistic background, he in his student days rejected the narrowness of Pietism,* but in later life regarded himself as a Pietist, only of a higher order. He studied at Halle and was ordained in 1794. In 1796 he became minister of the Charité Hospital, Berlin, and in this period he was drawn into the circle of Romantic writers who constituted the intellectual avant-garde of the time. Returning as a professor to Halle (1804), his next years were overshadowed by the Napoleonic Wars and the revival of German nationalism. From 1809 Schleiermacher was minister of the Dreifaltigkeitskirche in Berlin. The closing of the University of Halle led to the foundation of a new university at Berlin. Schleiermacher played a leading part in its foundation and in the establishment of its theological faculty, in which he was a professor. He was the first dean of the faculty, and for a time rector of the university. He was instrumental in bringing Hegel* to Berlin, though their relationship became strained through differences of outlook. Schleiermacher was a great supporter of German national unity and a leading advocate of the scheme to unite the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Prussia. He preached regularly and wrote voluminously. His writings embraced systematic theology, hermeneutics, philosophy, translations of Plato, and ten volumes of sermons.

Schleiermacher's first major work, On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799; ET 1894), is sometimes regarded as a theological expression of Romanticism. As an apology for Christianity in the post-Enlightenment world, it was neither a restatement of biblical orthodoxy nor a refurbishing of enlightened moralistic religion. It defined religion as "sense and taste for the infinite" and sought to show that life without religion is incomplete.

In many ways the work anticipated Schleiermacher's fuller statement of belief, The Christian Faith (1821; 2nd ed., 1830-31; ET 1928). Schleiermacher sought to avoid the alternatives of an orthodoxy based on revealed truth and a natural theology based on abstract speculation. He adopted a positive approach to religion based on a descriptive analysis of religious experience. He sought to analyze the essential elements in Christian experience and show how they were related to the main articles of Christian faith. The basis of religion is neither activity nor knowledge, but something which underlies them both: the continuum of feeling or awareness which we call self-consciousness. The common factor of religious experience is the feeling or sense of absolute dependence. This concept became not only the key to understanding religion, but the criterion for assessing the teaching of the past and the means of reinterpreting Christianity for modern man.

Sin is seen as essentially a wrongful desire for independence. The orthodox two-natures doctrine of Christ is replaced by the picture of a man in whom dependence was complete. It was his profound experience of God through his sense of dependence that constitutes an existence of God in him. On account of it, Jesus is able to mediate a new redemptive awareness of God to humanity. The same approach was elaborated in the posthumously published lectures on Einleitung ins Neue Testament (1845) and Das Leben Jesu (1864). Although he was ostensibly empirical, the question may be asked whether Schleiermacher was empirical enough: whether his concept of religion was not in fact too narrowly defined and used in an arbitrary and unrealistic manner. The result is that Christian doctrine is forced into the straitjacket of a preconceived system.

Schleiermacher's influence extended far beyond his disciples who made up the school of Mediating Theology (Vermittlungstheologie) in the mid-nineteenth century. To Karl Barth* he epitomized the liberal approach to religion which dwelt upon man rather than God. He has found renewed following among twentieth-century radicals. In many respects his method, his view of God and of man, and his Christology anticipated those of Paul Tillich* and J.A.T. Robinson.

SCHMIDT, GEORG (1709-1785). Missionary to South Africa. He joined the Moravian Brethren* at Herrnhut in 1727, was imprisoned by Catholic authorities, and recanted after six years to obtain his freedom. As a punishment for this "weakness" he was sent alone to the Cape as first missionary to the Hottentots. Arriving in 1737, he settled at Baviaanskloof (later Genadendal), some eighty miles from Cape Town, where he gathered a small community of interested Hottentots. In 1742 Zinzendorf* ordained him by letter, and he baptized five converts. This action was resented by the local Dutch Reformed clergy who already doubted Moravian orthodoxy. Schmidt was told to discontinue baptisms pending the decision of the Amsterdam Classis. Lonely and depressed, he left for Holland in 1744, hoping to remove obstacles to his work and to return. This was not permitted, and only in 1792 was Moravian work resumed. After 1752 Schmidt lived at Niesky, a Moravian settlement, where he died.

SCHMIEDEL, PAUL WILHELM (1851-1935). NT scholar. Professor of NT exegesis at the University of Zurich from 1893 to 1923, he tended toward a very radical criticism of the NT. He is best known for his famous thesis concerning the nine "pillar-passages" foundational for "a truly scientific life of Jesus" (his words), which was set forth in the lengthy article on the "Gospels" which appeared in the Encyclopedia Biblica in 1901. He also penned the article on "Acts" in the same encyclopedia (1899), in which he took a very poor view of the historicity of Acts. In a study of the fourth gospel (1906; ET 1908) he strongly contrasted John and the synoptics as sources for knowledge of Jesus. His Die Person Jesu im Streit der Meinungen der Gegenwart (1906) was the center of much controversy in his day.

W. WARD GASQUE

SCHMUCKER, SAMUEL SIMON (1799-1873). Lutheran clergyman. Dominant figure of American Lutheranism in his day, he sought to Americanize the eastern churches, organized as the General Synod in 1821. A founder of the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania (1825), the first of its professors, and the creator of Pennsylvania (now Gettysburg) College (1832), he asserted that Lutheran Pietism was the best weapon against rationalism. Lutheranism, however, had to be freed from German culture and "her former lifeless and distracted condition." Accordingly he published Elements of Popular Theology (1834), the first English-language Lutheran theology in America, and declared in A Fraternal Appeal (1838) that Lutheranism could thrive as ally of New School evangelicalism. An organizer of the American branch of the European-based Evangelical Alliance* (1846), he attempted to have Lutherans adopt his "Definite Synodical Platform" (1855), but this prompted critics, notably C.P. Krauth,* to form the General Council to resist attempts at ecumenism.

SCHOLASTICISM. The theology and philosophy taught in the medieval schools from the eleventh to fourteenth centuries, and revived in later periods such as in the late sixteenth and seventeenth and nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It features the application of Aristotelian categories to the Christian revelation and attempts to reconcile reason and faith, philosophy and revelation. As a theological method it is associated with organized textbook theology and the thesis method.

The movement appeared in the cultural unity created by Christianity in Carolingian times. Despite the breaking up of Charlemagne's empire, the Carolingian intellectual tradition continued in the monasteries such as those emanating from Cluny and Cîteaux and the Franciscan movement. Scholasticism was taught in the monastic and cathedral schools, and with the founding of the universities (c.1200) such as Oxford, Pisa, Bologna, and Salerno the tradition was given great impetus. The rise of humanism in the fifteenth century and the Reformation* of the sixteenth helped to destroy the medieval synthesis that made Scholasticism possible. Later attempts to revive it have never been so successful as the medieval effort, since the knowledge explosion and the fact that no one system has a monopoly on truth have altered the condition that produced and fostered its growth.

John Scotus Erigena,* who used a system of education based on Greek thought and relied on the use of reason in studying revealed data, is sometimes called the first Scholastic, but that honor seems rather to belong to Anselm of Canterbury,* who asserted that faith should precede understanding but understanding could in turn deepen faith through reason. One of the best known and most creative figures of early Scholasticism was Peter Abelard,* who in his revolt against tradition and his insistence upon the right of the philosopher to use his own reason did much to shape medieval thought. In Sic et Non (Yes and No) he demonstrated that tradition and authority were insufficient in themselves by making a list of questions—such as, Is God omnipotent? Do we sin without willing it? Is God a substance? Is faith based upon reason?—and then quoting authorities on both sides of the question. Although Abelard left these questions unresolved, Peter Lombard* and Thomas Aquinas* used the same method and supplied answers. These scholars wrote a type of formal treatise, a summa, which dealt exhaustively with a given subject. In works like these a reader could find the distinctions necessary for a complete, logical analysis of all the arguments for and against each proposition that made up the subject. The Bible was the basis for Scholastic theology, and the Church Fathers were referred to when there was an especially difficult passage to deal with. The use of Aristotelian logic by men like Abelard led to controversies such as the problem of universals. Early medieval thought was Platonic, insisting on the reality of ideas such as Soul, Honor, Tree, or Chair. However, during the twelfth century the Nominalists, who believed that reality consisted of individual items, challenged the Realists. Abelard worked out a compromise idea, called Conceptualism, that ideas are real in the human mind.

By the early thirteenth century, Scholastics were caught in a new wave of thought as they were forced to cope with the influx of a vast philosophic and scientific literature, including the advanced work of Aristotle* translated from Arabic and Greek. For the first time they confronted a world-system which relied completely on reason and operated without reference to the Christian God. Such ideas as the prime mover, eternal motion, a denial of providence and creation, uncertainty about immorality and the soul, and a morality based on reason alone caused much anguish for many medieval scholars. Some such as Siger of Brabant* followed the work of a Muslim commentator, Averroes (d. 1036), and advocated a theory of double truth, i.e., that there is one truth in human reason—Aristotle—and another in religion —the Christian revelation. Others rejected Aristotle completely, and in 1215 and 1231 decrees were passed by the University of Paris and the papacy prohibiting the study of some of his works. The problem of Aristotle, however, was solved not by censorship but by intellectual debate.

In the end, it was not Siger's ideas that won out, but the Rational Scholasticism of the Dominicans.* The greatest of these men was Thomas Aquinas, whose method represents the ultimate Scholastic refinement of the organization of knowledge. Even more important than his method, however, was Thomas's use of reason. He believed that reason can tell what God cannot be, and one can assume that what is left is something like what He is. There is, he felt, no contradiction between faith and reason as long as rational inquiry is properly conducted. When the two do conflict, faith is to correct reason. If faith leads to a conclusion that defies human reason, the incompatibility exists because of a failure of rationality. Thomas accepted the Aristotelian view that the universe is orderly, but this is due to the reflection of order of the divine mind in the universe. In harmonizing Aristotelian metaphysics with Christianity, it is the Aristotelian elements that must be fitted into the Christian system. Critics have pointed out that this is done by taking particular statements from Aristotle out of context and placing them into a new Thomistic context.

Thomas fashioned a view of the universe in which a being was good to the extent that it resembled God. Since God is a simple, incorporeal, purely spiritual being, that which is most spiritual is closest to God and that which is most material is farthest away from Him. This permits the construction of a Great Chain of Being consisting of God, angels, men, animals in order of their intelligence, plants, and inanimate objects. The moral plan of the universe is rational, hence reason as well as revelation can tell men what to do since God wills nothing arbitrary, but everything according to man's needs. Good and evil are objective realities. For example, God forbids theft and adultery because they disrupt society and make people unhappy. Aristotle had stated that the happiness of man consists in realizing his true nature, and Aquinas agreed, adding that man's true nature is union with God.

The position of Aquinas was attacked by scholars like William of Ockham* who advocated a type of double truth, but a more effective countertrend came from the Mystical Scholasticism of Bonaventure.* A professor of theology at Oxford and governor-general of the Franciscans,* he taught that rational knowledge of God is impossible, because God is different from man in quality as well as quantity. Thus knowledge of God can only be equivocal, hazy, and analogous. One may prepare for an understanding of God by separating himself from the world and by looking for reflections or shadows of God in objects. Then a man may advance to finding God within himself and experiencing His presence through grace. Finally, God's being is infused within the soul.

Another variety of Scholasticism, that based upon Empiricism, helped to prepare the way for modern science. Franciscans were the leaders in this movement as in Mystical Scholasticism, and two of their great scholars at Oxford, Robert Grosseteste* and Roger Bacon,* studied optics and the behavior of light, investigating perspective and the properties of prisms, rainbows, and mirrors. These scholars emphasized three principles of science now taken for granted: first, they believed in a scientific cosmology, a view of the world consistent with the observations of the senses; a second contribution was their emphasis on experimentation; and a third approach was the use of measurement and of quantitative concepts in the explanation of the world.

More modern Scholasticism is generally associated with a method of systematically applying reason to revealed knowledge. The Roman Catholic Church in the Counter-Reformation* used Scholasticism; in fact, at the Council of Trent* in the sixteenth century the works of Aquinas* lay open on the high altar along with the Bible as works of reference. A nineteenth-century revival of Scholasticism was inspired by the papal encyclical Aeterni Patris, which declared Thomism eternally valid.

Following the first generation of Reformers, despite Luther's condemnation of Aristotle and the Schoolmen, "Protestant Scholasticism" developed. A struggle within Lutheranism after the founder's death between the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philippists was brought to a close by the Formula of Concord* (1577). This developed into a system of doctrine resembling Scholasticism and led to the late seventeenth-century growth of Pietism* as a challenge to orthodoxy. The Calvinists attempted to use the Institutes as the same sort of dogmatic statement as the Formula, but this led to a long series of disputes and the growth of the Arminian* movement. The major statement of Reformed Scholasticism is the decrees of the Synod of Dort* (1618-19). The contemporary heirs of Protestant Scholasticism are groups such as the American fundamentalists. The Scholastic emphasis of the Roman Catholic Church has been modified during the twentieth century, especially since the meeting of Vatican II.*

SCHOOLMEN. Teachers of philosophy and theology at the medieval European universities ("Schools"). They were the exponents of Scholasticism,* which developed after the Dark Ages, and which was concerned to systematize theology and to justify the claims of theology to reason. They discussed the Aristotelian logic and applied it to the doctrines of the church. Their chief method of teaching was known as "Dialectic"—i.e., investigating the truth of opinions by logical discussion. Prominent earlier Schoolmen include Anselm* and Abelard,* and after the thirteenth century many of the greatest came from the Mendicant Orders*—e.g., Thomas Aquinas* the Dominican, and Duns Scotus* the Franciscan.

SCHÜRER, EMIL (1844-1910). German Protestant scholar. Following studies at the universities of Erlangen, Berlin, Heidelberg, and Leipzig, he taught successively at Leipzig (1869-78), Giessen (1878-90), Kiel (1890-95), and Göttingen (1895-1910). His life-work was to establish the study of Judaism of the late intertestamental and early Christian periods on a firm historical basis. Begun as a student's handbook of NT history (1874), his famous History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus (3 vols., 1886-90; ET in 5 vols., 1890-91) represents the fruit of his labors and, though dated, remains a standard work. Other influential publications included a study of the preaching of Jesus in relation to the OT and to Judaism (1882) and a monograph on the messianic consciousness of Jesus (1903). He was the founder of the journal, Theologische Literaturzeitung, which he edited from 1876 to 1880 and from 1888 to 1910.

W. WARD GASQUE

SCHÜTZ, HEINRICH (1585-1672). German composer. Unlike his great Lutheran contemporaries, Schein and Scheidt, Schütz (who was also known as Henricus Sagittarius) left no purely instrumental works. He can be confidently asserted to be the greatest Lutheran composer before J.S. Bach, who was born just 100 years later. He was sent by his patron, the landgrave of Cassel-Hesse, in 1609 to Venice to study with Giovanni Gabrieli.* There he remained until after his teacher's death in 1612, and there his first collection of works, a set of magnificent Italian madrigals, was published. These revealed him to be already an outstanding master.

Apart from a single opera now lost, the first by a German, Schütz's subsequent output was exclusively sacred. In his full maturity, this remarkable man returned to Venice to study with Gabrieli's successor, the outstanding Monteverdi.* Schütz was Kapellmeister at the court in Dresden for fifty-five years, except for an interim when the disruption of the Thirty Years' War forced him to find sanctuary in Copenhagen. His many modest but beautiful Kleine geistliche Konzerte (settings for solo voices and organ of texts from the Psalms) were the product of these years when few performers were available. Earlier he had written many works in the monumental style of the Venetians, his Symphoniae sacrae. He attained unprecedented refinement in the musical setting of the German language. A later collection, Geistliche Chormusik, consisted of magnificent scriptural motets, in which he produced a remarkable fusion of Renaissance and Baroque elements. One of these is his exquisite five-part setting of John 3:16. Rarely did Schütz employ any of the traditional Lutheran chorale melodies, but a few of them did appear among his own in his simple settings of Becker's metrical psalms. His oratorio, The Story of Christmas, the Seven Words from the Cross, and his three Passions (those of Matthew, Luke, and John) which adopt an extraordinary, severe, and economical style are works of his old age.

SCHWABACH, ARTICLES OF. Lutheran confessional document written in 1529. Probably composed by Luther on the basis of his Confession Concerning the Last Supper of Christ (1528) prior to the Colloquy at Marburg,* and shortened to serve as the fifteen Marburg articles, the text was reworked by Luther, Melanchthon, and Jonas (among others) after the Marburg Colloquy (3 October 1529) and submitted to the elector of Saxony and the margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach at Schwabach on 16 October 1529.

Whatever the history of these articles prior to their acceptance by the princes at Schwabach (evidence on this matter having been the subject of some dispute), the seventeen articles in their final form became the basis for the first part of the Augsburg Confession* (1530) and the test of admission to the Lutheran League of the North German States. The articles were directed against Catholics, Zwinglians, and Anabaptists, and affirmed the main lines of the Lutheran understanding of the Eucharist. The tenth article, for example, asserted "that in the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ are truly present, according to the word of Christ."

Walther Köhler maintained that the Schwabach Articles were not narrowly Lutheran, but should be understood as a union formula which had as its goal the reconciliation of Wittenberg and Strasbourg and the exclusion of the Swiss alone. In this view the Schwabach Articles were not simply the basis for the Augsburg Confession, but also the forerunner of the Wittenberg Concord* (1536). The text is in the Corpus Reformatorum 26 (1857), cols. 151-60. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

SCHWARTZ, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (1726-1760). Missionary to India. Born at Sonnenberg, Prussia, son of a master baker, he was educated at Halle University, the Pietist center. There he encountered Benjamin Schultze, a former missionary who had extended the work of Ziegenbalg* of Tranquebar (and completed the latter's Tamil translation of the Bible), and this led to the call to India. Having learnt Tamil even before sailing, Schwartz arrived in India in 1750 and spent his first years at the Danish-Halle Mission in Tranquebar. In 1760 he paid a notable visit to Ceylon. During his travels out from Tranquebar he opened up work at Trichinopoly, and in 1767 was appointed chaplain to the British there. He was therefore one of the remarkable succession of Germans who built up "English" missions in South India.

From 1772 his work moved to the kingdom of Tanjore, at the invitation of the rajah, who showed his estimate of Schwartz by wishing to appoint him guardian of the heir to the throne. The British in turn used Schwartz as emissary to their enemy in Mysore, Hyder Ali, who equally trusted the missionary; and for a period he was virtually prime minister of Tanjore. All of these political duties never deflected him from his primary calling as missionary. At Tinnevelly in the far south he appointed the catechist Sattianaden, and thus had a share in building what became a famous church. Often regarded as the greatest of the eighteenth-century German Protestant missionaries in South India, Schwartz died at Tanjore. ROBERT J. MC MAHON

ty in ancient languages. From 1887 he held chairs in six universities, including Strasbourg and Göttingen, before settling at Berlin in 1919. Early in his career he turned his attention to the early history and literature of the church, and published editions of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History (with T. Mommsen) and Tatian's Oration to the Greeks. Later followed studies on Athanasius, Nestorius, Theodosius the Deacon, and Constantine and the church. His greatest work was the publication (interrupted but not stopped by World War I) of the Acta Conciliorum Oecumenicorum, an edition of the Greek councils. In it were critical editions of the "decrees" of the councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451). A friend of the English scholar C.H. Turner, he saw through the press for him the seventh fascicule of Turner's Ecclesiae Occidentalis Monumenta in 1939. PETER TOON

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (1875-1965). German theologian, medical missionary, and musician. Born in Alsace, he gave himself to his own study till he was thirty, achieving much in theology and music (he became an expert on J.S. Bach and organs). From 1905 he studied medicine, and in 1913, loosely associated with the Paris Missionary Society, went to Gabon to found a hospital at Lambaréné. Except for interruptions in and after World War I, and for money-raising lecture and recital tours, he gave the rest of his life to developing the hospital on idiosyncratic lines, incurring criticism sometimes for old-fashioned paternalism, sometimes for his slowness to make Western standards normative for his people.

As a theologian Schweitzer was an heir of the nineteenth-century German Protestant tradition of historical and critical theology at the time of its high prosperity. Yet his work is part of that self-questioning and loss of confidence that beset it already in the 1890s. In his study of Jesus (cf. especially The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1906; ET 1909), he believed he had discovered the real Jesus from the gospels by historical means, thus bringing the century-long quest to a successful conclusion. The common assertion that he ended the quest by showing that it is impossible is false, but he argued that the historical Jesus was so different from the figure beloved by the Christian humanism of liberal Protestantism that the latter position could claim no foundation in historical fact.

He maintained that Jesus was dominated throughout His career by the world-negating expectation of the imminent coming of God's kingdom as that was understood in contemporary Jewish apocalyptic, and that Jesus finally tried to force its coming by seeking His death. This view ("consistent" or "thoroughgoing" eschatology) meant that the teaching of Jesus, with its radical demand, was to be seen as appropriate to the situation in which there was only a short time left to the world ("Interim Ethic"). It implied too that Jesus' life was centrally directed by His mistaken expectation. But Schweitzer argued paradoxically that Jesus' saving achievement was partly to destroy, in His death, the eschatology by which He had lived and so to free men from it. Thus Schweitzer revealed how much of a liberal Protestant he remained. He followed the same method in his interpretation of Paul, treating Jewish eschatology as the distinctive basis of Pauline mysticism and sacramentalism. He has had considerable influence in NT scholarship, though few would now hold his extreme and distinctive positions.

Schweitzer was uncertain about traditional Christian dogma; for instance, he veered between theism and pantheism. But his own life shows how seriously he believed that Jesus' call to discipleship could still be heard in a way that determined the whole of life. Ethics was in fact a predominant concern of his. He thought philosophical ethics had failed by becoming too remote from life; in Africa he discovered and developed the ethical principle of "reverence for life" as an answer to this problem. Like many Germans of his generation, in the shadow of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, he was dismally assured of the decay of civilization, and he became well known for his thought on its restoration.

In his last years Schweitzer was much honored, notably in the award of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1952. He had shown himself to be something of a polymath and a modern St. Francis together.

SCHWENKFELDERS. Those who follow the teachings of the aristocratic German diplomat and lay theologian, Kaspar von Ossig Schwenkfeld (1489-1561). Early acquaintance with Andreas Carlstadt* and Thomas Münzer* led him to adopt many of the principles of the Reformation,* but he had definite convictions of his own concerning the Lord's Supper, Christology, and church discipline, and these led him into successive conflicts with Luther,* Zwingli,* the Catholics, and Bucer.* He was forced to leave Silesia (1529) and Strasbourg (1534). The event that precipitated the 1540 Lutheran anathema was the publishing of Schwenkfeld's most characteristic doctrine—the deification of the humanity of Christ—in the Grosse Confession of 1540. In it he expressed his belief that all creatures are external to God, and God is external to all creatures. Therefore Christ's relationship to God must be entirely unique, and this uniqueness comes because He was "begotten" and not "created." God is the Father of Christ's humanity and deity. Christ's flesh stood in a very special relationship with God. This led to Schwenkfeld's being branded as a religious outlaw in 1540 by a convention of Evangelical theologians led by Melanchthon.*

With his followers he withdrew from the Lutheran Church after 1540 and established a community of worshipers who were originally called

"Confessors of the Glory of Christ." Following a middle way between the great ecclesiastical and religious parties of their day, their congregations grew most readily in Silesia and Swabia, in the towns their founder had visited, and in Prussia. The movement flourished in the vicinity of Goldberg until 1720 when an adverse tract caused Emperor Charles VI to dispatch a Jesuit coercive mission against them. Some escaped by emigrating into Saxony and, being denied tolerance, proceeded to Holland, England, and finally by 1734 to E Pennsylvania. The colony in Silesia was restored by Frederick the Great in 1742 and existed until 1826. A small group of about 2,500 still exists in Pennsylvania and is very similar to Quakers in practice and belief.

SCIENTOLOGY. Founded by Lafayette Ronald Hubbard (b.1911 in Nebraska), millionaire explorer and retired U.S. naval officer, the Church of Scientology of California teaches what it calls "an applied religious philosophy" aiming at "spiritual recovery and the increase of individual ability." The methods of Scientology (originally called "Dianetics") are claimed to be "technological," and make extensive use of apparatus, elaborate types of classification, and an involved—frequently cryptic—quasi-scientific language in expounding the stages by which the individual may progress, under close guidance, toward total self-determination. Its basic concept is "survival," and Scientology teaches the techniques by which the individual may "survive" most effectively.

Although passing reference is sometimes made to, for instance, "Supreme Being, the ultimate Creator, and God, when so meant" (the implications of the last clause are obscure), Scientology maintains that "the human mind and inventions of the human mind are capable of resolving any and all problems which can be sensed, measured, or experienced directly or indirectly." Man, then, is to be his own savior. Scientology further denies the existence of absolute good and absolute evil in the world of matter, energy, space, and time, and holds that "that which is good for an organism may be defined as that which promotes the survival of that organism." Use of the word "religious" to describe the methods, techniques, and aims of Scientology seems therefore entirely arbitrary, since Scientology is in no way concerned with any power or powers external to man.

Its authoritarian teachings and techniques have aroused much controversy, not least in Britain. In 1968, foreign Scientologists were prohibited from entering Britain, and an official inquiry was instituted into the movement's activities. It has nevertheless continued to expand and in 1968 claimed two to three million followers. Its international headquarters are near London.

Scientology is a type of "mind-cure" movement, more sophisticated than those known in the West for more than a century, and extremely wealthy. It is notable only as an example of the sort of mental and spiritual panacea so often resorted to in times of stress by those who are strangers to living faith. E.J. SHARPE

SCILLITAN MARTYRS. A group from Scilli in Numidia (location unknown) beheaded at Carthage on 17 July 180 by the proconsul Saturninus, the first persecuting governor in Roman Africa, according to Tertullian. The account of their trial is the earliest literary evidence of African Christianity and the oldest dated Christian document in Latin. Saturninus's sentence lists seven men and five women, but apparently only three of each were tried on this occasion (the others perhaps previously, if they are not interpolated). Their names suggest they belonged to the non-citizen classes. They had with them "the books" (gospels?) and Paul's epistles, indubitably in Latin. Their simple steadfastness verged on provocative defiance ("I do not recognize the empire of this world"). D.F. WRIGHT

SCOFIELD, C(YRUS) I(NGERSON) (1843-1921). American biblical scholar. Born in Michigan and raised in Tennessee, Scofield won the Confederate Cross of Honor while serving with Lee's army. Turning to law, he was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1869. After two years as U.S. attorney, he practiced law in St. Louis. After his conversion he was ordained to serve a small Congregational church in Dallas (1882-95). At Moody's request he took over the Moody Church in East Northfield, Massachusetts (1895-1902). He returned to the Dallas church (1902-7) before taking up Bible conference work at home and in the British Isles, and founding the Central American Mission. The year 1909 saw the publication of his dispensational, premillennial Bible, which he edited with the financial assistance of prominent businessmen. EARLE E. CAIRNS

SCOPES TRIAL (1925). So named after the defendant, John T. Scopes, a young Tennessee high school science teacher, who was charged with teaching biological evolution contrary to a recently enacted state law. The trial was, however, transformed into a sensationally publicized national contest pitting William Jennings Bryan*—a famous agrarian politician and champion of fundamentalism, literal interpretation of Scripture, and antievolution—against Clarence Darrow—a leading criminal lawyer, representing Scopes and modern skepticism. Although Scopes was found guilty and fined $100, the trial (reinforced by the death of Bryan a few days after its conclusion) helped to discredit fundamentalism in the public mind. Perhaps as a result, the strength of fundamentalism in major American churches declined very sharply after 1925. GEORGE MARSDEN

SCOTLAND. Although there is evidence to show that Christianity first came to Scotland during the Roman occupation, we have little information concerning it at that time. The first Christian missionary of whom we have any knowledge is Ninian,* who about 400 set up a church in the southwest at Whithorn, whence he carried on missionary work in the interior and up the east coast. In the sixth century other missionaries, mainly from Ireland, came to Scotland, the most famous being Columba,* who founded the monastery on the island of Iona,* off the west coast of Argyll in 563. The Celtic Church,* resulting from the work of these men, was different from that of Rome in the form of the tonsure, the date of Easter, and in not accepting the authority of the bishop of Rome. Endowed with strong missionary zeal but rather unorganized, they carried Christianity as far south as the River Thames, but in 663/4 at the Synod of Whitby* the king of Northumbria, Oswy, accepted the Roman supremacy, with the result that Celtic Christianity withdrew into Scotland and Ireland, eventually conforming to Roman practices and submitting to Roman authority.

The spread of Roman control in Scotland was brought to its culmination in the reign of Malcolm Canmore (1057-93), through the influence of his Anglo-Saxon queen, Margaret. Under her influence and that of their sons, monasticism spread rapidly through the country, and the church was gradually organized on a diocesan basis. As Scotland had no primate, however, the archbishop of York sought to bring the church under his control. To this the Scots objected, with the result that in 1225 Pope Honorius III granted the bishops the right to hold a council without a metropolitan. It was largely this anti-English attitude that made most of the clergy take a stand on the side of Scottish nationalism during the Wars of Independence (1296-1328) under Wallace and Bruce. They did so even against the orders of the pope, whom they defied for some twenty-five years. Even though they later submitted once again to papal authority, their relations with Rome were often strained, as indicated in their support of conciliarism and their violent opposition to the papal creation of the archbishopric of St. Andrews in 1472. Despite formal submission to Rome, therefore, the Scottish Church always adopted a rather independent attitude toward the central administration.

Although the Scottish Church during the Middle Ages produced a number of important scholars and ecclesiastical leaders, by 1400 it was probably one of the most decadent churches in Europe. This was one reason why the new doctrines of the English "heretic" John Wycliffe* made headway in certain parts, particularly the southwest. Real reform began, however, only with the activities of the followers of Martin Luther* and later of John Calvin.* Under the influence of Patrick Hamilton,* George Wishart* (both martyrs for their faith), John Knox,* Andrew Melville,* and others supported primarily by the gentry and the burgesses of the towns, a radical Calvinistic reformation took place. A Reformed church was established that has since exercised a wide influence both within and without Scotland. The Scots Confession* and the First and Second Books of Discipline* have formed the basis of most of the English language formulae of doctrine and church polity in use even today.

Since the sixteenth century there has been constant conflict in Scotland over the question of Christianity. Naturally the Roman Catholic minority has striven to maintain itself against the Reformed church. At the same time, there have been divisions to right and to left of the established church. The Scottish Episcopal Church has sought to maintain a position very similar to that of the Church of England, although not subordinate to Canterbury. On the other hand, the question of patronage by the landowners was a constant irritant that has caused a number of schisms, the most important and largest being that of the Disruption* of 1843 which led to the formation of the Free Church of Scotland.* At the same time, "moderatism" which grew out of the rationalistic Enlightenment of the eighteenth century has likewise caused many problems in all the Scottish churches. Nevertheless, with the disappearance of the Scottish Parliament in the Union of 1707, the Church of Scotland* became the only popular representative of the Scottish people. While it no longer holds that position, the Scottish churches probably still represent the people more effectively and fully than any existing political body, which is quite appropriate since Christianity has had a stronger influence upon Scotland than upon most nations.

SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF. Since the Reformation in 1560, Scotland's national church has been Presbyterian, except for two periods of modified episcopacy enforced by the Stuart kings. John Knox* is generally regarded as the founder of the modern Church of Scotland; his successor, Andrew Melville,* has been described as the "father of Presbyterianism."* After the Stuarts were deposed, William III* reestablished Presbyterianism as the national form of church government, and successive monarchs since the 1707 England-Scotland parliamentary union have sworn at their coronation to maintain this polity. Controversy arose when the early nineteenth-century Moderates* were accused of neglecting the Reformation principle which gave the people a voice in the election of ministers. Battle was joined over the vexed question of patronage, to maintain which system the civil power was appealed to in a number of notorious cases. This led to the 1843 Disruption,* when more than one-third of the ministers formed the Free Church of Scotland.*

The breach was largely healed finally in 1929 (see UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND), and all but some 50,000 of Scottish Presbyterians are now in membership of the Church of Scotland—i.e., about 1.1 million—constituting a larger proportion of population than any other Protestant church in the English-speaking world. National and free of state control (the present position regulated by the 1921 Act of Parliament), the Church of Scotland is organized in twelve provincial synods and sixty-four presbyteries, in each of which as well as in the general assembly there is equal representation of ministers and laity. Appeal to the assembly is open to any member of the church. Since 1694 the sovereign's Lord High Commissioner* has attended each general assembly, but his presence is not necessary for the transacting of the church's business. Ministers are elected by individual congregations, subject to formal ratification by the local presbytery, and all ministers have equal status.

The church's courts are courts of the realm, to carry out the decisions of which the assistance of the civil courts can be enlisted if necessary. The church's four theological colleges are virtually also the divinity faculties of the four ancient Scottish universities, thus maintaining the Scottish tradition which demands of its ministry a high educational standard. The Church of Scotland professes the evangelical faith, and bases its doctrine on Holy Scripture. The Westminster Confession* is still officially regarded as its subordinate standard. Two sacraments are celebrated—baptism, normally of infants and as part of morning worship; and the Lord's Supper, generally celebrated quarterly or semiannually, but there is now a tendency, particularly in city parishes, toward more frequent celebration. In some parts of the more conservative Highlands and in the Western Islands, on the other hand, this sacrament is an annual occasion, extending from the Fast Day service on Thursday right through to Thanksgiving on Monday.

The Church of Scotland, in addition to its four presbyteries in England, Europe, and the Near East, maintains work in twenty-one overseas mission fields.

SCOTS CONFESSION. The Scots Confession was prepared in four days in August 1560 and submitted to the Scottish Parliament which ratified it with very little opposition. The individuals responsible for its preparation were John Winram, subprior of St. Andrews; John Spottiswoode, later superintendent of Lothian; John Willock, later superintendent of Glasgow and the West; John Douglas, rector of St. Andrews; John Row, minister of Perth; and John Knox,* minister of St. Giles's, Edinburgh—the "six Johns." The dominant figure in the preparation was undoubtedly Knox, who had already been involved in the formulation of a number of confessions on the Continent—in Frankfurt, in Geneva, and perhaps also in France.

The confession's theology is Calvinistic, although the document itself is by no means merely a copy of a statement by Calvin or some other continental leader. It would seem that Knox and his collaborators took into account the thinking and statements of a number of Reformers. The "marks of the church" were taken over from Valerian Poullain's Liturgia Sacra used in the French church in Frankfurt, while some of the other elements show clearly the influence of the French Confession prepared and adopted at the First National Synod of the Reformed Church in Paris in 1559. Although adopted by Parliament in 1560, Queen Mary, still in France, refused to ratify the decision, with the result that it did not become the official confession until 1567, when Parliament reenacted it after her deposition. It remained the confession of the Scottish Reformed Church until the adoption of the Westminster Confession* of Faith in 1647. W.S. REID

SCOTT, THOMAS (1747-1821). Biblical commentator. Born at Braytoft, Lincolnshire, son of a grazier, Scott was employed for nine years in menial farm work which permanently ruined his health. Driven from home by his father's cruelty, he was ordained deacon in 1772 by the bishop of Lincoln, held a number of curacies, and in 1781 succeeded John Newton at Olney. From 1785 to 1801 he was chaplain at the Lock Hospital and lecturer at St. Mildred's, London, and from 1801 to 1821 rector of Aston Sandford, Buckinghamshire, where he helped to train missionaries for the Church Missionary Society. Apart from his theological works (5 vols., 1805-8), he is chiefly famous for Force of Truth (1779), his spiritual autobiography which recounts his development from early Unitarianism to the adoption of evangelical Calvinism, under the influence of Newton, and for his Commentary on the Bible which appeared in weekly numbers between 1788 and 1792. Scott's exegesis, though occasionally wooden, is remarkable for its candor, and as an exercise in experimental Christianity, eliciting the meaning of each passage of Scripture for the author's own soul. The commentary became immediately popular, but brought its author no financial rewards—and charges of Arminianism from extreme Calvinist critics. IAN SELLERS

SCOUGAL, HENRY (1650-1678). Devotional writer. Born at Leuchars, Fife, son of Patrick Scougal, bishop of Aberdeen, he attended King's College, Aberdeen, and became a college tutor on graduating in 1668. In 1672 he was ordained and inducted to the parish of Auchterless, Aberdeenshire, but after a year returned to King's as professor of divinity. He died of consumption five years later. As a teacher he shared the aims of Archbishop Robert Leighton* to make sure that his lectures recommended holiness of life as well as orthodoxy of theology. Scougal is famous for the classic The Life of God in the Soul of Man.

SCRIPTURE UNION. Founded in England in 1867 as the "Children's Special Service Mission," Scripture Union is now an international, interdenominational evangelical youth and Bible-reading movement, with offices or representatives in seventy countries, mostly former or present British Commonwealth territories. Its international structure is regionalized; the international secretariate is in Switzerland, and there are some 220 full-time executive staff around the world. Basic activities are children's evangelism and youth work, especially through schools' groups. In most countries there is a related program of vacation camps and house parties which serve both for evangelism and training.

Scripture Union Bible-reading aids for personal use are issued in graded series for all ages and levels of Christian experience and are used by more than one million readers throughout the world. Scripture Union, especially in Britain, publishes books and booklets: a complete range of graded Sunday school lesson aids; story books for children and youth; training literature and discussion group material, as well as soundstrips and other audiovisual material. Bookshops are operated in many of the major cities of the British Commonwealth. Control of the movement is through national and state committees, mostly made up of laymen. A. MORGAN DERHAM

SCRIVENER, FREDERICK HENRY AMBROSE (1813-1891). NT scholar. Born in Southwark and educated at Falmouth School and Trinity College, Cambridge, he taught for ten years at King's School, Sherborne, was headmaster of Falmouth School (1846-56), and prebendary of Exeter (1874-91). Throughout his entire working life he studied NT texts; he published the texts of twenty manuscripts and listed all known manuscripts. He was an ardent supporter of the Textus Receptus, the Byzantine text (substantially that of the Codex Bezae) used in the King James Version, in opposition to the Westcott and Hort text used in the Revised Version—in which view he failed to convince other scholars. He also devised a method of classifying ancient manuscripts.

SCROGGIE, WILLIAM GRAHAM (1877-1958). Baptist minister, Bible expositor, and author. Educated in Exeter, Malvern, and Bath, he studied for the ministry at Spurgeon's College, London. After early pastorates in London, Halifax, and Sunderland, he began in 1913 his most influential ministry at Charlotte Chapel, Edinburgh, remaining there till 1933. There his notable expositions of Scripture drew large audiences from many denominations, and in 1927 the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him by the university. From 1933 to 1937 he exercised a traveling ministry in South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, North America, and the British Isles. He was pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London (1938-44), and from 1948 to 1952 he was lecturer in English Bible at Spurgeon's College. He wrote many books, mostly expository studies. J.G.G. NORMAN

SCROPE, RICHARD LE (c.1360-1405). Archbishop of York. Of noble family, after ordination (1377) he became chancellor of Cambridge University (1378). In Rome (1382) he was made auditor of the Curia. Appointed bishop of Coventry and Lichfield (1386), at Richard II's request he was translated to the archbishopric of York (1398). He acquiesced in Richard's abdication (1399) and assisted at Henry IV's enthronement, but growing disillusioned with the new ruler, he took up arms with Northumberland and Bardolf. He composed a manifesto demanding justice, security, and lighter taxation, and gathered an army of discontented citizens. The earl of Westmorland, pretending agreement with the reforms, tricked him into disbanding his followers. He was popularly venerated in N England as St. Richard Scrope. J.G.G. NORMAN

SCUDDER, IDA SOPHIA (1870-1960). Missionary doctor and founder of the Christian Medical College at Vellore in South India. Born in Ranipet in then Madras Presidency where her father, Dr. John Scudder, was in the North Arcot mission of the (Dutch) Reformed Church of America, she was at first determined not to be a missionary. She was on only a short-term commitment to India, really to be near her sick mother, when in 1893 she received a "call" which was not the least remarkable feature of a remarkable life. Three different men came to her door, asking her to come and attend to their respective wives in childbirth; they refused the services of any male doctor, such as her father, preferring rather that their wives die. Ida could do nothing, and the wives died; but the experience sent her home to America to study medicine and commit her life to service for India and its women. She returned as a doctor in 1900 and opened a hospital at Vellore. Later she began a nursing school and, in 1918, the medical college for women. This involved a great fund-raising campaign in America. A great new hospital arose and, at a separate site, the college, which later (1947) accepted men students as well, affiliated with the full Madras University medical course (1950) and was one of the outstanding interdenominational Christian institutions of Asia.

SCUDDER, JOHN (1793-1855). American Dutch Reformed missionary to India. Graduate of the College of New Jersey (1811) and the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons (1813), he was turned to missions in the reading of a tract. In 1819 he and his wife left for Ceylon under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Following ordination in 1821, Scudder founded a hospital and several schools in Ceylon, later establishing a printing press and mission at Madras, India. Failing health caused him to go to South Africa, where he died. Scudder printed many tracts in Tamil and English. Seven of his sons became medical missionaries and pastors in India. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

SEABURY, SAMUEL (1729-1796). First bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church (USA). Born in Groton, Connecticut, he graduated from Yale

(1748), then studied theology and medicine in Edinburgh. He was ordained in 1753, served as a missionary in New Brunswick (1754-56), and thereafter was rector in Jamaica, Long Island (1757-66), where he also practiced medicine and taught school. He was rector in St. Peter's, Westchester, thereafter for eight years. His Tory sympathies, evidenced in pamphlets he wrote, brought brief imprisonment during the American Revolution, after which he went over to the British side and served as a hospital and later regimental chaplain. He was chosen bishop by Connecticut Episcopal clergymen in 1783 and consecrated in 1784 at Aberdeen by Scottish bishops. He served as rector of St. James's Church, New London, Connecticut (1785-96), and became presiding bishop of the new Protestant Episcopal Church in 1789 as well as being bishop of Connecticut and Rhode Island. His death came while making parish calls.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

SE-BAPTISTS, see SMYTH, JOHN

SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF. Members of the so-called Thundering Legion who were left naked on the ice of a frozen lake at Sebaste, Lesser Armenia, about 320, and who froze to death in sight of baths of hot water set on the bank to tempt them to apostatize. The place of one who gave way was taken by one of the pagan guards who was moved to conversion by what he saw. The martyrs' ashes were recovered by the empress Pulcheria and were venerated in the East. The incident was recorded by Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nyssa.

SEBASTIAN. Nothing is known of him historically, other than the mention in Depositio martyrum that he is buried in the cemetery in catacumbas (catacomb on the Appian Way). Ambrose affirms that Sebastian was from Milan and perished in Rome during the persecution of Diocletian. Many legends are connected with his name, and artists have depicted him pierced with many arrows. In 1967 Roman Catholic scholar Lancelot Sheppard refuted this Renaissance concept as false.

SECESSION CHURCH, see ORIGINAL SECESSION CHURCH; ERSKINE, EBENEZER

SECKER, THOMAS (1693-1768). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1758. A distinguished ecclesiastical career which included a royal chaplaincy, the sees of Bristol and Oxford, and the deanery of St. Paul's culminated in his appointment to Canterbury. Secker was a conformist, readily accepting established dogma and doctrines. His theology was of that rational, ethical brand usually associated with his predecessor, John Tillotson,* but it went somewhat beyond this in his doubts about the sufficiency of a prudential morality. His characteristic note, however, is moderation, so much in contrast with his contemporary Wesley; and his style matches his tone—dignified, sane, but rather colorless. ARTHUR POLLARD

SECOND COMING. The teaching that Christ will return in glory to judge the living and the dead and to terminate history. The main Christian traditions, while holding that Christ's words predict the certainty of a final judgment and the replacing of the present order by the eternal state, yet have opposed speculation as to the exact manner and time of the coming. Many believers, however, have advocated a more detailed plan of the event and believe that there will be a reign of Christ on earth for a long period, the Millennium, before the last judgment. They feel that the coming of Christ will be followed by a binding of Satan and the resurrection of the saints, who will join Him in a temporal kingdom when He reigns on earth. At this time the prophetic statements of the OT which indicate that there will be a kingdom of peace, plenty, and righteousness are to be fulfilled (such as Isa. 11).

The early church holding this premillennial view looked for the imminent return of Christ as witnessed by the writings of Papias, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Methodus, Commodianus, and Lactantius. When the Christian Church was given a favored status under Emperor Constantine (fourth century), the Millennium was reinterpreted. This amillennial view was presented most clearly in the work of Augustine, who taught that the 1,000-year period is no literal piece of history; it is a symbolic number coextensive with the history of the church on earth between the resurrection of Christ and His return. Hence there is to be no millenial reign of Christ either before or after His second coming. Throughout the Middle Ages the Augustinian view held sway except for the teaching of isolated individuals such as Joachim of Fiore.*

In the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries premillennial teaching about the second coming of Christ was emphasized once again by men such as J.H. Alsted* and Joseph Mede,* and it encouraged many of the participants in the English Civil Wars of the 1640s. At the close of the seventeenth century the development of postmillennial views and the growth of Enlightenment thought led to a decline of premillennialism. Daniel Whitby* and other postmillennialists believed that the return of Christ would not occur until the kingdom of God had been established by the church in human history. Thus Christ will triumph through the church and after this golden age will return to raise the dead, judge the world, and inaugurate the eternal order.

During the nineteenth century there was a revival of premillennialism which has continued to the present. A new element, Dispensationalism, added through the Plymouth Brethren* movement, held that the references to the Second Coming in Scripture are primarily concerned with the fate of restored Israel in the last days and not with the church. This interpretation of the Second Coming has become prominent among evangelicals in the twentieth century through the work of men such as W.E. Blackstone,* C.H. MacIntosh, Harry Ironside,* A.C. Gaebelein,* C.I. Scofield* (and the Scofield Reference Bible), John F. Walvoord, and most recently Hal Lindsey.

SECOND GREAT AWAKENING. This second "national revival" in the United States (c.1787-1825) served as a corrective to the spiritual declension that set in during and following the revolutionary period. Deism and skepticism were popular among the educated, especially the students. The rigorous life on the rapidly expanding frontier without benefit of church and society was demoralizing.

The revival in the East was centered in the colleges and towns along the coast. Hampden-Sydney College experienced revival during 1787, and the movement spread to Washington College. At Yale under the preaching of Timothy Dwight* revival came in 1802. Amherst, Dartmouth, and Williams colleges became part of the movement. Through the influence of students and preachers the revival spread. The eastern phase was characterized by orderliness and restraint.

The revival in the West was filled with religious excitement and emotional outbursts. It apparently began in 1797 in the three Presbyterian churches James McGready* pastored in Logan County, Kentucky, which climaxed in a large outdoor Communion service during the summer of 1800. Barton Stone* carried the revival to Cane Ridge, Kentucky, where a year later (1801) a larger interdenominational six-day camp meeting* was held with 10,000 to 20,000 in attendance from as far away as Ohio. This technique was widely used later by the Methodists. The revival, accompanied by unusual physical phenomena, spread throughout the western frontier, largely among the Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists.

Significant church growth, improvement of morals and national life, check to the spread of Deism, schism and emergence of new religious groups such as the Cumberland Presbyterians* and Disciples,* home and foreign missionary outreach, abolition and social reform movements, introduction of the camp meeting, and influence upon great men like Archibald Alexander,* Adoniram Judson,* and Samuel J. Mills—these were all results of this Awakening.

HOWARD A. WHALEY

SECRÉTAN, CHARLES (1815-1895). Swiss Protestant philosopher and theologian. Born in Lausanne, he studied at Munich under F.W.J. Schelling and Franz Baader, who led him into a speculative, mystical view of religion. He held professorships at Lausanne (1839-45, being dismissed for political reasons), Neuchâtel (1850-66), and again Lausanne (from 1866). With A.R. Vinet* he was a leader of liberal Swiss Protestant thought. He increasingly emphasized, under Kant's* influence, the moral significance of faith and the importance of freedom, adopting a Scotist view of deity as "absolute indetermination." His chief book was La philosophie de la liberté (1849-79).

J.G.G. NORMAN

SECTARY. A term applied to some Protestant dissenters in England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Translations of the works of Luther and other Reformers used it to describe Anabaptists* and others of the Radical Reformation.* In modern times it is occasionally used in a derogatory sense about overzealous adherents of different opinions.

SECULAR CLERGY. A term used since the twelfth century to distinguish priests living in the world (Lat. saeculum) from the "regular clergy" who were members of religious orders living according to "rule" (Lat. regula). They are not bound by vows, but owe canonical obedience to their bishops, and may possess property. According to canon law they must be celibate. They take precedence over regular clergy of equal rank.

SECULARISM. A term invented by G.J. Holyoake (1817-1906) to indicate a way of life which leaves out of consideration God, revelation, heaven, and hell, but bases morality on that which will enhance the public good. Originally no denial of religious belief was implied, but as a result of Charles Bradlaugh's (1833-91) later powerful advocacy of secularism, the term increasingly became associated with atheism.* In later usage it often means the view that religion should not be taught in schools.

SEDULIUS SCOT(T)US (fl. 848-858). Poet and scholar. During ten years at Liège, which he established as an important center of his native Irish culture, Sedulius gained a reputation for versatility if not profundity. His poetry, whether religious, bucolic, mock epic, or occasional, is unique in its time for variety of meter. He compiled unoriginal collectanea on Paul's epistles and Matthew; that on grammar exhibits wide reading, especially Cicero. His theologically oriented de rectoribus Christianis, on Christian government, was perhaps a Fürstenspiegel for his pupil, a son of Lothair I, Carolingian emperor. Based on patristic, especially Augustinian, authority, it held that kings have primacy over religious leaders.

DANIEL C. SCAVONE

SEEKERS. A small seventeenth-century sect of Independents* which was heir to a Quietistic tendency on the Continent first noted by Sebastian Franck* in his Chronica (1531) and embraced by Dirck Coornheert,* a Dutch theologian. The visible church, with its "notions" (i.e., doctrines), organization, and ceremonies, was repudiated, while the true believer waits and "seeks" for the church of apostolic power which God will establish. The English "Seekers" during the Cromwellian period developed these ideas. The word "Seekers" as the name of a sect first appears in Truth's Champion (1617), probably written by John Murton. Seeker ideas had been taught by Bartholomew Legate (c.1575-1612), an English cloth merchant trading with Holland, who was burnt at Smithfield for Arianism.* The Seekers were earnest, peaceable, spiritually minded people, and appear to have had large meetings in N England and in Bristol. From 1652 they were almost entirely absorbed by the Quakers.* Other names for them are "Legatine-Arians" and "Scattered Flock." J.G.G. NORMAN

SEELEY, SIR JOHN ROBERT (1834-1895). English historian. Born in London, son of a publisher and author, he was educated at the City of London School and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he read classics. He then returned to teach at his old school and later became successively professor of Latin at University College, London (1863), and professor of modern history at Cambridge (1869), where he succeeded Charles Kingsley.* He wrote voluminously on history and politics, especially on the life of Napoleon and the foundation of the British Empire. He is best known, however, for his brilliantly written (originally anonymous) Ecce Homo (1865) which tells the story of Jesus and His subsequent influence on the morals of the world. As it dealt only with the human side of the story, the book was construed as an attack on Christianity and gave rise to much controversy. Seeley followed it up with Natural Religion, a less successful book in which he tried to show that religion can subsist in the absence of supernaturalism. R.E.D. CLARK

SEGNERI, PAOLO (1624-1694). Jesuit preacher. Born at Nettuno, he studied at the Roman College, entered the Jesuit Order (1637), and was ordained (1653). He was a pupil of Sforza Pallavicino, whose sacred oratory much influenced him and led to the study of classical and patristic oratory. His preaching ministry, sometimes accompanied by self-flagellation and penitential processions, began in cathedral pulpits, and from 1661 until 1692 he conducted many popular missions and Lenten series. Innocent XII called him to Rome as his preacher (1692), making him theologian of the Sacred Penitentiary. Likened to Savonarola,* he did much to reform pulpit oratory. He also wrote works against Quietism* and Probabiliorism.* C.G. THORNE, JR.

SELDEN, JOHN (1584-1654). Jurist and Orientalist. Born in Sussex, he was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford (1602-4), and Clifford Inn, London, before being called to the bar in 1612 and practicing in the Temple. His interests were wider than law, however, and included history, oriental studies, and Judaism. The book for which he is most famous is The History of Tythes (1617) in which his contemporaries believed he argued that tithes were not by divine ordinance. Nevertheless their collection was legal. Thus, when he launched his political career in 1621 he already had made a name for himself. In Parliament he continued to gain fame as a defender of the common law and the ancient "liberties" of Englishmen. As a result he was imprisoned in 1629 for two years. He became prominent again in the Long Parliament, and he sat in the Westminster Assembly,* where his learning and Erastianism* were a double embarrassment to many divines. In 1645 he declined the mastership of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and spent the last years of his life quietly pursuing his literary work. He had a vast memory and a large collection of books, most of which are still in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. PETER TOON

SELEUCIA, COUNCIL OF (359). This assembly of the Eastern Church was called by Emperor Constantius to settle the Arian* controversy. Constantius had endorsed a creedal formulation which was intended to be a compromise between the contending parties in this controversy. It conceded to the Semi-Arians the view that Christ comes before all time the Son who is like, but not the same as, the Father. Despite the emperor's wishes, the council stood firm on this issue, whereupon Constantius instructed the council to send ten delegates who were persuaded to accept a compromise creed like that accepted by the Council of Arminum* (Rimini) in the West. This compromise was later reaffirmed by the Council of Constantinople in 381. C. GREGG SINGER

SELWYN, GEORGE AUGUSTUS (1809-1878). First Church of England bishop of New Zealand. Educated at Eton and St. John's College, Cambridge, he became a fellow of his college and was ordained in 1833. He gained parish experience in Windsor and was a private tutor at Eton. He was consecrated bishop of New Zealand in 1841 and reached Auckland, which later became his see city, in 1842. He traveled widely throughout New Zealand. Through an error of latitude in his letters patent he claimed that his diocese took in much of the Pacific. From 1848 he made frequent journies to Melanesia. He founded a college in New Zealand to train young men from the islands for the proposed mission. In 1861 he was instrumental in making Melanesia a separate diocese under J.C. Patteson.* The impetus for this missionary program came from the 1850 conference of the Australasian bishops under W.G. Broughton* in Sydney. Selwyn also planned the division of his diocese in the years following his visit to England in 1854. In 1857 a constitution for the church in New Zealand was drawn up. By 1859, when the first general synod met, there were four other bishoprics.

Selwyn was a pioneer in the concept of the independence of the Church of England in the colonies. Despite differences of churchmanship from the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, Selwyn supported their evangelization of the Maoris even in the difficult days of the Maori wars. In 1867, while present at the first Lambeth Conference,* Selwyn was appointed bishop of Lichfield and did much to pioneer industrial chaplaincy work there until his death. NOEL S. POLLARD

SEMI-PELAGIANISM. The designation since the seventeenth century of a largely monastic reaction against Augustine's* developed anti-Pelagianism, better called "Semi-Augustinianism." In 426/7 monks at Hadrumetum in Byzacena (Susa in Tunisia) were alarmed that Augustine's Ep. 194 on predestination apparently undermined free will and hence monastic and missionary endeavor. After disappointing inquiries, a deputation visited Augustine, who produced Grace and Free Will and, when this seemed to invalidate moral correction, Rebuke and Grace (427). To Vitalis,* a Carthaginian monk who c.427 affirmed that the unaided will performed the initial act of faith, Augustine's Ep. 217 stressed the necessary preparation of the will by prevenient grace.

Widespread anxieties arose in S Gaul in the monasteries of Lérins (founded c.410 by Honoratus) and Marseilles. John Cassian's Conferences (428/9) argue implicitly against Augustine's works for Hadrumetum, that the beginning of the good will is man's doing, but grace supervenes immediately thereafter. Such criticism, shared by others like Helladius (Euladius?), bishop of Arles, were reported to Augustine by two lay Marseilles monks, Hilary and Prosper of Aquitaine* (429). Augustine's response was Predestination of the Saints and The Gift of Perseverance (ET by M.A. Lesousky, 1956).

After Augustine's death Prosper became his stalwart champion, replying seriatim to questions or objections raised by two Genoese presbyters, anonymous Gallic critics and probably Vincent of Lérins* (cf. too his Commonitory). Prosper sought Roman backing, but Pope Celestine I* generally praised Augustine and condemned sophistic innovations, and Sixtus III and Leo I* were no more explicit. In Rome Prosper concentrated more on opposing Semi-Pelagianism than defending Augustinianism (attacked there c.450 by Arnobius Junior,* an African monk).

Semi-Pelagian beliefs remained dominant in Gaul. Faustus of Riez,* formerly abbot of Lérins, forced his priest Lucidus to retract apparently Augustinian views condemned by councils at Arles (472/3) and Lyons (474), and wrote The Grace of God and Free Will (473/5), which verged at points on Neo-Pelagianism. Gelasius I* criticized bishops who tolerated attacks on Jerome* and Augustine, and called for a confession of faith from Gennadius and Honoratus of Marseilles (496). The writings of Julianus Pomerius, an African presbyter of Arles, reveal continuing agitation.

At Constantinople in 519, Scythian monks led by John Maxentius inquired through Possessor, an African bishop then in Constantinople, about the orthodoxy of Faustus of Riez. Pope Hormisdas's* reply referred them to the Scriptures, councils, and Fathers, notably the later Augustine. The Scythians consulted refugee African bishops in Sardinia, where a synod condemned Faustus (523); and Fulgentius* of Ruspe wrote a lost refutation, which influenced Caesarius of Arles, trained at Lérins but suspected in Gaul for his Augustinian convictions. Under him the Second Council of Orange* (529) condemned Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian opinions and endorsed a moderate Augustinianism, in terms drawn largely from Prosper's extracts from Augustine submitted earlier to Pope Felix IV (probably from a preliminary synod at Valence) and amended by him. Confirmation by Pope Boniface II (531) made Orange the basis of medieval teaching on grace.

SEMLER, JOHANN SALOMO (1725-1791). German biblical scholar. Born in Thuringia, son of a Pietistic pastor, he entered the University of Halle and came under the influence of the rationalist J.S. Baumgarten whose assistant he became. He was professor at Coburg and Altdorf before returning to Halle in 1752 as professor of theology. When Baumgarten died five years later, Semler became head of the theological faculty. Semler pioneered in biblical and church historical criticism, investigating the origins of NT books in a manner unacceptable to Lutheran orthodoxy, and developing a threefold classification of Greek manuscripts which enabled textual criticism to go beyond quantity to quality based on age and geographical origin (Alexandrian, Oriental, or Occidental). He produced a major work on the canon (4 vols., 1771-75) in which a historical view of its development was first introduced. But when he replied to the fragments of H.S. Reimarus's* work published by Lessing, it appeared that he was moving away from his rationalistic stance.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SENS, COUNCIL OF (1141). This most important of the many councils held in the French town was called to hear the charges of heresy launched against Abelard* by Bernard of Clairvaux.* In 1121 Abelard had been forced to burn his own works, particularly his treatise on the Trinity, on the ground that he was advocating tritheism. Abelard was later charged by William of St. Thierry* with thirteen errors concerning the doctrines of the Trinity, the person of Christ, the Holy Spirit, and the grace of God in the redemption of man. Although Abelard had personally accused Bernard of instituting novel practices at Clairvaux, Bernard nevertheless visited Abelard in a vain effort to persuade him to retract his errors. Abelard refused to retract. Bernard came to Sens determined to have Abelard condemned for his heresy, and formally presented charges against him. Abelard refused to defend himself and appealed the case to Innocent II, apparently expecting to receive a more friendly hearing by the pope. But Innocent declared Abelard a heretic and imposed on him the penalty of perpetual silence and banishment. C. GREGG SINGER

SEPARATISTS. During the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth I of England, a small number of people took the doctrines of Puritanism to their logical conclusion and separated themselves from the "impure" national church to form small gathered churches. Though never more than several hundred in numbers, they were hunted down and severely punished by the agents of Elizabeth and James I, as well as being strongly criticized by the Puritan preachers. Famous names connected with this movement were Robert Browne,* John Smyth,* and John Robinson.* Some of these men became martyrs. Separatism, often termed "Brownism," was illegal until in the Commonwealth and Protectorate (1649-59) it became widespread and acceptable. Under the Clarendon Code* after 1660 it became illegal again.

SEPTUAGINT. The conventional name of the earliest translation of the OT into Greek (from Septuaginta, Lat. "seventy" = LXX). In the Letter of Aristeas (second century B.C.), it is alleged that seventy-two Jewish translators sent from Jerusalem produced the version for Ptolemy II (Philadelphos) for his library. This cannot be accepted as historically true, but it contains reliable indications, namely that the version is of third-century B.C. origin, was made in Egypt by companies of translators, but was a product of community needs rather than imperial request. The prologue to the Greek Ecclesiasticus shows that the whole canon was in Greek by 132 B.C., but it is clear on internal grounds that the translation was first made of the Pentateuch, and that Prophets and Writings were rendered later, in that order. Compared with the Hebrew OT there are a number of additional books and portions thereof in this corpus.

While modern scholarship appears to accept the concept of an "original text" (Urtext), it is clear from the materials available in Dead Sea fragments, quotations in NT, early Fathers, and others (e.g., Josephus), that a number of distinct local texts arose, in part by correction of paraphrastic renderings, in part for theological reasons, in part from different Hebrew bases. In the early Christian centuries, stimulated by controversy, several new translations were undertaken by Jews, giving a more literal rendering of a now standard text, close to the Massoretic (viz., by Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus), sometimes on the basis of the earlier local texts. In the early third century, Origen,* largely for controversial reasons, set out in six columns (Hexapla) the Hebrew text, a transliteration, the three Jewish translations, and the LXX with an apparatus of signs showing the divergences of the latter from the Hebrew in omission and addition. Ironically this work complicated the textual problem further by the contamination of other texts from this column.

In Antioch, in the late third or early fourth century, Lucian* produced a recension to some degree closer to the Hebrew. A third recension mentioned by Jerome, that of Hesychius, has proved impossible to identify. Modern research has identified in some books the R-recension transmitted in the catenae. Modern scholarship, based on some fine eighteenth-century antecedents, took its rise from Paul de Lagarde* and his pupil Alfred Rahlfs. Lagarde sought the Urtext; Rahlfs concentrated more upon the recensions. Their work has more recently been continued by M. Margolis and P. Katz (P. Walters). Two major publications are in progress: the larger Cambridge Septuagint, named "Brooke-MacLean" after its first editors; and the Goettingen Septuagint, whose first editor was J. Ziegler. The establishment of both the Urtext and the recensional forms is of great significance for the history of Hellenistic Judaism, early Christianity (for which the LXX was inspired Scripture), and the history of the Greek language.

SERAPION (d.211). Bishop of Antioch. He remains almost unknown despite identification by Eusebius as eighth in the succession of bishops of Antioch. Eusebius quotes from a letter, conjointly signed by other bishops, sent by Serapion to Caricus and Pontius, persons unknown, as a supporting cover for a writing of Claudius Apollinarius,* bishop of Hierapolis, against the Montanists.* Otherwise Eusebius knows only a few other epistolary compositions, including one to the church of Rhossus in Cilicia against the Gospel of Peter, the Docetic imprint of which had led to Serapion's rejection of it.

SERAPION OF THMUIS (d. c.362). Bishop of Thmuis. Superior of a colony of monks and friend of Antony, he was consecrated bishop of Thmuis, Lower Egypt, before 339. He was sent by Athanasius with four other Egyptian bishops in 356 to the court of Emperor Constantius II to refute Arian charges. Later he was ousted from his see by an Arian, Ptolemaius (359). He reported to Athanasius concerning some Egyptian Christians who held that the Holy Spirit was merely a "creature," doubtless forerunners of the Pneumatomachi.* Athanasius wrote him four letters, Ep. ad Serapionem, which constitute the first formal statement of the deity of the Spirit (c.359). Serapion wrote a treatise Against the Manichaeans (pub. 1931), a lost work on the titles of the Psalms, and letters (three of which are extant) addressed to Bishop Eudoxius, the monks of Alexandria, and some disciples of Antony. He was also author of a sacramentary, the Euchologion.

SERGIUS (d.638). Patriarch of Constantinople. Born in Syria, he quickly gained preferment in the church and was consecrated patriarch in 610. Emperor Heraclius looked to him for advice in ecclesiastical matters, and since a major problem was that of the Monophysites,* Sergius sought a way to reconcile them to the rest of the church. He approved the formula "one mode of activity" (energeia) in Christ, which had been agreed to by the emperor and Monophysite leaders. Later this doctrine was modified to state that there was only one will (mia thelēsis) in Christ. In the Ecthesis, written by Sergius and issued by the emperor in 638, Monothelitism* was formally propagated. It was accepted by two synods at Constantinople in 638 and 639, but the West rejected it and ultimately so did the East at the Council of Constantinople in 681. Apart from his fame as the propagator of Monothelitism, Sergius is traditionally regarded as the author of the famous Greek hymn, the "Akathistos," in honor of the Virgin Mary, sung during Lent. PETER TOON

SERGIUS (c.1314-c.1392). Russian saint. Born at Rostov, he became a monk in 1336 and built a chapel in honor of the Trinity in the forest of Radonezh which later became the famous monastery of Troitskaya Laura. He gained a reputation for miracles and visions, and was active in the political life of Russia. Several times he intervened to stop civil wars between the Russian princes, and he encouraged Dmitri Donsloi's resistance to the Mongols in 1380. In 1387 he refused to accept the patriarchate of Moscow, and he continued as a humble monk for the remainder of his life. He was canonized in the mid-fifteenth century and is considered one of the most important Russian saints.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

SERGIUS I (d.701). Pope from 687. A native of Palermo of Syrian descent, he was elected pope after a contest between two other candidates. He consecrated Willibrord, bishop of the Frisians (695), and ordered Wilfrid of York restored to his see. His refusal to recognize as authoritative the Trullan Synod which favored Eastern custom over Latin led the emperor to seek his arrest Byzantine power was, however, weak in Italy at the time, and Sergius was able to defy him.

SERIPANDO GIROLAMO (1493-1563). Archbishop of Salerno. Born at Troja (Apulia) of noble parentage, he lost his parents when very young and at the age of fourteen entered the house of the Augustinian Order at Viterbo. He studied Greek, Hebrew, theology, and philosophy. In 1515 he began to lecture at Siena, moving in 1517 to Bologna to be a full professor. Subsequently he became vicar-general (1532) and then superior-general (1539) of his order. He attended the Council of Trent* during 1546-47 where he showed great concern in the debates to preserve the doctrine of the purity of the text of Scripture and to make known his somewhat unorthodox views on original sin and justification. After acting as legate to Pope Paul III he refused the offer of the bishopric of Aquila. In 1551 he also resigned as superior-general and withdrew for two years to the quietness of a small convent, from where he emerged in 1553 to go on a mission for the city of Naples to Emperor Charles V. This complete, he became archbishop of Salerno. Pius IV made him a cardinal and second legate of the Holy See at the Council of Trent. Upon the death of his colleague, Cardinal Gonzaga, Seripando became president of the council. He was a prolific writer and controversialist. He wrote commentaries on Paul's letters to Galatia and Rome (1569, 1601) and a book on prayer (1670). PETER TOON

SERVETUS, MICHAEL (1511-1553). Anti-Trinitarian theologian and physician. Born in Spain of a pious family, he studied the biblical languages as well as mathematics, philosophy, theology, and law at the universities of Zaragoza and Toulouse, then went as a secretary to Charles V's confessor. He left the imperial court for Basle, then for Strasbourg where he met Martin Bucer* and possibly some of the Anabaptist leaders. These contacts stimulated his early radical theological ideas.

Servetus came to believe that in order to convert the Moors and Jews, the Christian teaching of the Trinity would have to be reinterpreted. He decided that the most serious error involved in Trinitarian doctrine was the belief in the eternal existence of the Son. He expressed his ideas in several books (1531-32), which led to attacks on his work by orthodox theologians. To avoid further trouble he adopted a disguise and began a second career as a physician. After studying at Lyons, he published a description of the pulmonary circulation of the blood and worked on geography and astrology. He also worked for a time in Vienne as physician to the archbishop and returned to his study of theology. Repeating his earlier attacks on the doctrine of the Trinity, he also rejected infant baptism, while proclaiming a christocentric pantheism developed from Neoplatonic, Franciscan, and Cabalistic elements.

In answer to Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion he wrote Restitutio Christianismi (1553). He was arrested and condemned by the Inquisition in Vienne, but escaped and went to Geneva. Again he was arrested and condemned, and this time he was burnt. His execution provoked a controversy over toleration of religious differences.

SERVITES. The Order of the Servants of the Blessed Virgin Mary was founded in 1240 by seven influential Florentines, who had already withdrawn from the world in order to enter the service of Mary. The Servites adopted a black habit and the Rule of St. Augustine, modified to some extent by provisions taken from the constitutions of the Dominicans. Servite piety centers on the Sorrowful Virgin. While the Second Order of Servite nuns is principally a contemplative religious community, Servites also engaged in activity in the world. Servite missionaries had reached India by the second half of the thirteenth century, and Servite nuns of the Third Order (founded in 1306) devoted themselves to the relief of the sick and the poor and to the training of the young. The order received official sanction for its work from Pope Benedict XI in 1304.

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS. A religious denomination that grew from the work of William Miller* (d.1849), who began to preach that the end of the world was at hand, that a fiery conflagration would usher in the new heaven and the new earth, and that the date for this would be sometime between 21 March 1843 and 21 March 1844. The movement weathered its first difficulty when the deadline passed; another date was set: 22 October 1844. A general apocalyptic fervor aided the growth of the group, and it soon had between 50,000 and 100,000 adherents. The new date passed, and the early Millerite fervor was largely diminished. A few, however, continued to believe that the end was near. One of these, Hiram Edson, saw a vision of Christ entering the second compartment of heaven. This proved to Edson that Miller's prophetic calculations were correct, though the event foretold was not the Second Advent, but the opening of an investigative judgment in heaven to determine who among the dead are worthy of resurrection.

Other adventists believed that the Second Coming* had been hindered by their failure to maintain the biblical law of keeping the seventh day as the Sabbath. Sabbath-keeping was also confirmed by visions, especially those of Ellen G. White* (d.1915), whose importance to the movement cannot be overstressed. Although possessing only a third grade education, she wrote 45 major books and over 4,000 articles. One of her works, Steps to Christ, sold more than 5 million copies and appeared in 85 languages. The early Adventists were found chiefly in the New England states, but by 1855 their westward expansion was marked by the establishment of a headquarters in Battle Creek, Michigan. The denomination was organized in 1863, and by 1874 their first missionary, J.N. Andrews, was sent out.

Seventh-day Adventists today believe that the only prophetic texts awaiting fulfillment concern their church and its ministry. When the Gospel message has been proclaimed throughout the world and the church has grown to its predetermined size, then the end of the age will come. At that time the righteous dead will be raised and together with the righteous living will be taken to heaven, where they will spend the Millennium. While believers enjoy heavenly bliss, Satan will be left on earth for 1,000 years. At the end of this period, Christ will descend with His saints, destroy the wicked with fire, and create a new earth with the New Jerusalem as its center. Adventists also teach soul sleep, free will, the deity of Christ, and believer's baptism by immersion. Holy Communion is observed four times a year, preceded by a foot-washing service. The Sabbath, from sundown Friday until sundown Saturday, is scrupulously observed. Despite the relatively low economic status of its membership, insistence on tithing has led to the church's being among the leading American churches in per capita giving.

Adventists operate parochial schools from primary through university level. They also insist upon the proper care of the body, abstaining from foods forbidden in the OT such as pork, ham, and shellfish; do not smoke or drink; and conduct an extensive medical program with hospitals and clinics centering at Loma Linda University in California. The church also opposes secret societies, card playing, gambling, and the use of jewelry and cosmetics. "Worldly entertainments" such as motion pictures, television, the theater, and dancing are also avoided by them.

The church operates a sizable publishing industry. Their leading paper, Review and Herald, is one of the oldest continuously published religious periodicals in America. Adventists have a congregational government which is tied to a series of local and national conferences. The denomination's activities are centralized in the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists at Washington, D.C. Sessions of this group consisting of delegates elected from the local conferences meet every four years. Between sessions of the world conference, business is conducted by an executive committee. About four-fifths of the church's 2.5 million members live outside North America.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

SEVERIAN (d. c.408). Opponent of John Chrysostom.* Bishop of Gabala, Syria, who came to Constantinople about 401, Severian was well received by Chrysostom, but attempted to undermine the latter's authority during his absence in Asia. At the Synod of the Oak* (403), under Theophilus's influence, he acted as accuser and judge of Chrysostom. Again he accused him (404) and finally effected Chrysostom's exile to Cucusus, demanding in 407 his removal to a severer place of exile. He wrote several homilies, including six on the Hexaemeron.

SEVERINUS (Severin) (d.482). "Apostle of Austria." An Eastern monk of Latin origin, after Attila's death (453) he came to Noricum Riponse, then occupied by barbarian invaders. For thirty years he evangelized the lands around Comagene and Astura (modern Stockerau and Haineburg), founding monasteries at Boiotro (near Passau) and Faviana. He established a kind of theocracy in Noricum when the district was left unprotected by Rome, caring especially for the poor. He won the friendship and respect of all, including that of Odoacer, the barbarian leader. He died at Faviana, and his body was taken to Lucullanum, near

Naples (488), where his companion Eugippus wrote his life (511). J.G.G. NORMAN

SEVERUS (OF ANTIOCH) (c.460-538). Leading Monophysite* theologian. Born in Pisidia, he studied in Beirut and Alexandria and showed a keen interest in theology at an early age, although he was not baptized until 488. Soon he became a monk in Egypt, then took up residence in Constantinople to represent Monophysitism. After visiting the court there from 508 to 511, he was consecrated patriarch of Antioch in 512. With his accession to power, Monophysites came into full control of Antioch, and soon after his consecration he condemned the Council of Chalcedon* and the Tome of Leo.* He encountered great difficulty with bishops and clergy hostile to his position, and perhaps used violence to retain his position.

Exiled from Antioch in 518 when Justinian I became emperor, he sought refuge in Alexandria where the Monophysite patriarch Timothy welcomed him. He visited Constantinople several times, including in 536 when Monophysites and Chalcedonians were engaged in religious debate there. In Alexandria he firmly opposed Bishop Julian of Halicarnassus, another Monophysite in exile. His theology was widely accepted in Syria, and he retained his position of primacy among the Monophysites until his death. He rejected attempts to separate Christ's two natures and to gloss over his humanity, but was probably closer to the Chalcedonians than his writings indicate. Syriac translations remain of his Greek treatises (including Philalethes), sermons, liturgical writings, and 4,000 letters. JOHN GROH

SEVERUS, GABRIEL, see GABRIEL SEVERUS

SEVERUS, SULPICIUS (c.362-early fifth century). Hagiographer. Born of a noble family in Aquitaine, he received that classical education in rhetoric which prepared him for the law. He partially followed the pattern of his friend Paulinus of Nola,* (among whose letters there remains one to Severus) into a semi-monastic life under the guidance of Martin,* bishop of Tours, who ordained him presbyter. Severus began a "life" of Martin and thereby contributed to the development of Christian hagiography. While this work shows itinerary and contacts through Gaul of his time, the form is almost devoid of general historical data—a situation partly remedied by Severus's Chronicle in two books based on biblical and classical materials, extended to 403, devised as a textbook for the Christian reader. Whether Severus died before or after the sacking of Rome (410) is not known. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SEXTUS, SENTENCES OF. A collection of 451 Greek religious and ethical maxims compiled in the late second/early third century by an unknown Christian, largely from Pythagorean material partly Christianized. The compilation reflects a Hellenizing or paganizing of Christianity. Origen cited it as a Christian work and attested its popularity, and about A.D. 400 Rufinus* of Aquileia translated it into Latin under the title The Ring (Anulus), recording the "traditional" ascription to Pope Xystus II (d.258). This version was widely read, e.g., by Pelagius, but condemned as Pythagorean paganism by Jerome the anti-Origenist (he earlier quoted it with approval). The Sentences were expanded and translated also into Syriac, Armenian, and Georgian. They appealed chiefly to ascetic and monastic circles committed to Christian perfection.

D.F. WRIGHT

SHAFTESBURY, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, Seventh Earl of (1801-1885). Evangelical social reformer. He was educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, then entered Parliament in 1826. He was a Tory, though his growing concern with social issues—particularly his desire to improve working-class conditions which had been created by the Industrial Revolution—made him more independent politically. In 1828 he became a member of the Metropolitan Lunacy Commission and began his work for the mentally ill. In 1845 he persuaded Parliament to establish a permanent Lunacy Commission for the whole country, and he was its chairman until he died. From 1833 to 1847 his main political concern was with the factory question, which after a long battle resulted in the Ten-Hours Act (1847), though the question continued to occupy his attention until the Factory Act (1874).

From 1840 he gave his support to other social questions. He championed the cause of the women and children working in mines and collieries, and secured the setting up of a Royal Commission of Inquiry into children's employment in general. It was not, however, until 1864 and 1867 that parliamentary acts regulated child and female labor, and not until 1875 did the Climbing Boys Act protect children used as chimney sweeps. He also promoted legislation to protect milliners and dressmakers. From 1859 Shaftesbury devoted more of his time to direct social work in connection with the slums, the Ragged School Union (of which he was chairman), and his own schemes of industrial schools and training ships. He was the leading evangelical in the mid-century, and strongly opposed Ritualism and Rationalism. He supported Catholic Emancipation (1829). As Lord Palmerston's stepson-in-law, he advised him on ecclesiastical appointments during his premiership. He was president of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and closely associated with the London City Mission, Church Missionary Society, YMCA, and Church Pastoral-Aid Society.

SHAKERS. The common name of the celibate and communistic "United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing," originating in the Quaker revivals of mid-eighteenth-century England. Mother Ann Lee* (d.1784) is generally considered the founder of the movement. Persecution, limited success, and a direct revelation led Mother Ann and seven followers to emigrate to New York in 1774. In 1787 the first Shaker settlement was established at New Lebanon, New York, which became the main base for the society's missionary enterprise in America. By the time Ann died, in spite of bitter opposition, there were growing numbers of Shakers in New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. The movement spread in the wake of revivalism* on the American frontier throughout the first part of the nineteenth century. Shaker communities were established as far west as Kentucky and Indiana. The society reached its zenith in the decade before the American Civil War when there were some 6,000 members in eighteen different settlements. After the war, the order began a steady decline which has lasted to the present. In 1900 there were fewer than 1,000 members; by 1970 only a handful of Shakers remained in three small communities.

Shaker celibacy rested on a form of dualism imposed on the society by Ann Lee, who came to regard sexual intercourse as the cardinal sin. According to Ann, God was both male and female, as was Christ who appeared in Jesus as the male principle. In Mother Ann the female principle of Christ was manifested and in her the promise of the Second Coming was fulfilled. From that time on, for believers, the two sexes were to be equal but separate. The Millennium started with the official foundation of the United Society in 1787. A Shaker's faith began with confession of sin and included celibacy, common property, separation from the world, uniformity of dress, the healing gift, and unstructured freedom of expression in worship which often involved dancing, marching, laughing, barking, singing, and shaking. Today the Shakers are largely remembered for their unique form of worship, their legendary thrift and industry, and their high quality craftmanship, especially in the making of furniture.

ROBERT D. LINDER

SHARP, JAMES (1613-1679). Archbishop of St. Andrews. Born in Banff, he graduated from King's College, Aberdeen, was appointed professor of philosophy at St. Andrews in 1643, and in 1649 became minister of nearby Crail. His ambition, Episcopal sympathies, and persistent reports of a scandalous private life made him an object of suspicion in more thoroughgoing Covenanting circles, but prior to the Restoration of Charles II he was sent to London as the representative of the Resolutioners,* to ensure that the Kirk's lawful privileges were maintained. Cromwell had labeled Sharp an atheist, and Charles II regarded him as "one of the worst of men." Nevertheless the king was to use him for his own ends.

Sharp betrayed the moderate Presbyterians whose emissary he was, and when Episcopacy was restored in Scotland he was Charles's choice as archbishop of St. Andrews. As primate his ruthless persecution of the Covenanters* involved deceit and treachery deplored even by Sir Thomas Dalziel, the king's Scottish military commander whom the Scots called "the Muscovy Brute." An unsuccessful attempt was made on Sharp's life in 1668, but a second was more successful when in 1679 his coach was ambushed on Magus Moor, near St. Andrews, by a group of nine zealots. His murder was swiftly repudiated by the Covenanting leaders, but it precipitated the second major rebellion of Charles's reign. An astonishing inscription in Latin is still decipherable in Holy Trinity Church, St. Andrews, referring to Sharp as a "most holy martyr" and "an example of piety."

J.D. DOUGLAS

SHAW, WILLIAM (1798-1872). Wesleyan Methodist missionary to South Africa. Born in Glasgow, he accompanied the 1820 settlers to South Africa. Although officially chaplain to one party, he established Methodism throughout Albany and used this settler church as a base for advance beyond the frontier. Between 1823 and 1830 he planted six missions in the Ciskei and Transkei, others being added later. He also supervised work north of the Orange River from 1838 and in Natal from 1842. Shaw's high standing among the settlers and friendship with several African chiefs gave him unique breadth of outlook and sympathy. Most colonial governors respected his advice. In 1856 he returned to England. His proposal for a South African conference was premature, and he did not return to the field. He was elected president of conference in 1865, a fitting tribute to the father of South African Methodism.

D.G.L. CRAGG

SHEDD, W(ILLIAM) G(REENOUGH) T(HAYER) (1820-1894). American theologian. Born in Massachusetts and educated at the University of Vermont and Andover Theological Seminary, he gained pastoral experience in both Congregational and Presbyterian churches, but the major portion of his life was spent first as professor of English literature at the University of Vermont, then in teaching in the theological seminaries at Auburn, Andover, and Union (New York). His theology was strongly conservative and Calvinistic. His Dogmatic Theology (3 vols., 1888-94) is a clear statement of Westminster Presbyterian Calvinism. He defended orthodoxy in controversy with his colleague at Union, C.A. Briggs,* whose OT critical views led eventually to his dismissal from the Presbyterian Church and the withdrawal of Union from the Presbyterian denomination. Shedd's other major works are Lectures on the Philosophy of History (1856); History of Christian Doctrine (1863); Homiletics and Pastoral Theology (1869).

DONALD M. LAKE

SHEEN, FULTON JOHN (1895- ). Roman Catholic bishop and broadcaster. Born on a farm at El Paso, Illinois, he graduated from St. Viator College, Catholic University of America, and the University of Louvain (Ph.D., 1923). He was ordained in 1919, taught philosophy at Catholic University (1926-50), and then until 1966 was national director of the Society for Propagation of the Faith. From 1930 to 1952 his broadcasts of the "Catholic Hour" were heard around the world, while he was also in the same period preacher at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. His telecast "Life is Worth Living" was seen by an estimated 30 million each week from 1951 to 1957. He was made auxiliary bishop of New York in 1951, and bishop of Rochester in 1967. He has written many books on philosophical, devotional, and anti-Communist topics. EARLE E. CAIRNS

SHELDON, CHARLES MONROE (1857-1946). Clergyman and writer. Born in Wellsville, New York, he was educated at Phillips Academy, Brown University, and Andover Theological Seminary, and received Congregational ordination in 1886. He held pastorates in Vermont and Kansas, but is best known as author of many books. In His Steps (1896) became a religious best seller because it poignantly challenged Christians to base their behavior on the answer to the question "What would Jesus do?" and because, never copyrighted, numerous publishers printed it. Although many thought its sales second only to the Bible's, it is generally conceded that six million might be a realistic estimate of copies sold. He became editor-in-chief of Christian Herald (1920-25) and contributing editor thereafter. D.E. PITZER

SHELDON, GILBERT (1598-1677). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1663. Educated at Trinity College, Oxford, he was elected a fellow of All Souls in 1622, the year of his ordination. In 1626 he became warden of All Souls and actively supported William Laud's* university reforms. During the Civil War he was often with Charles I,* and consequently in 1648 was ejected from his wardenship and imprisoned for a time. Under the Commonwealth he lived quietly in the Midlands. At the Restoration he became bishop of London, but during Juxon's* archiepiscopate he exercised the real power. In 1663 he succeeded to Canterbury. A strong Laudian, he supported the severe measures against dissenters, and the restoration of the Anglican Church to its pre-Civil War position was due mainly to him. He negotiated with Clarendon the arrangement whereby Convocation no longer taxed the clergy. Chancellor of Oxford University (1667-79), he built the Sheldonian Theatre at his own cost. JOHN A. SIMPSON

SHEMBE, ISAIAH (c.1870-1935). Founder of the nativistic ama-Nazaretha in South Africa. He grew up in a heathen environment in Natal, but in response to revelations he began to preach and heal. He was baptized and ordained by a minister of the African Native Baptist Church, but later formed his own organization to which he applied all OT references to the Nazirites. His headquarters were fixed at Ekuphakameni ("the high place") near Durban, but he traveled throughout Natal and acquired immense influence among the Zulu. He composed many remarkable hymns (Izihlabelelo zama Nazaretha). Biblical influences mingled with traditional Zulu beliefs and practices in his teaching and ritual. He claimed to be the Zulu Messiah, and is revered as such by his followers who believe he has risen. The leadership was inherited by his son, J.G. Shembe. D.G.L. CRAGG

SHENOUTE (d.451). Abbot and Sahidic scholar. About 388 he succeeded his uncle, Pgol, who about 350 had established an important cenobitic community, and White Monastery, based on the Rule of Pachomius,* near Sohag, some fifty miles downstream from Nag Hammadi.* Several accounts of his life remain, the oldest by his pupil and successor Besa, which describe his severe temperament and organizational abilities. Extant also is a considerable volume of expository epistles and sermons, nearly half unpublished. Shenoute was present at the Council of Ephesus* (431) —he dates his ministry from some forty-three years earlier—and influential on the deliberations of Chalcedon (451), having aided the church against both Gnosticism* and Monophysitism.* CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SHEPHERD, ROBERT HENRY WISHART (1888-1971). Missionary to South Africa. Born near Dundee, Scotland, he was ordained in 1918 and went to South Africa in 1920 as a missionary of the United Free Church of Scotland.* After seven years in Tembuland he moved to Lovedale as chaplain (1927-42) and principal (1942-55). On his retirement Lovedale passed into government control. He was a gifted writer and edited the South African Outlook (1932-63). As director of Lovedale Press and literary secretary of the Christian Council of South Africa he encouraged African authorship and promoted Christian literature. He was elected moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1959, and was a member of the Monckton Commission which visited Central Africa in 1960. D.G.L. CRAGG

SHEPHERD OF HERMAS, see HERMAS

SHEPPARD, HUGH RICHARD LAWRIE ("Dick") (1880-1937). Anglican clergyman and pacifist. After schooling at Marlborough he entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and thereafter Cuddesdon for theological training. He was ordained in 1907 and held various curacies in the London diocese before his appointment as vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields in 1914. He had a deep concern to reach people and made St. Martin's one of the best-known churches in Britain. With the invention of broadcasting, he was one of the first to appreciate and use its immense possibilities for Christian influence. He believed in the necessity of ecclesiastical reform and identified himself with the Life and Liberty Movement in its early stages, though he was dissatisfied with the reform achieved by the Enabling Act of 1919. Because of ill-health he resigned St. Martin's in 1926, but held the deanery of Canterbury from 1929 to 1931, and was a canon of St. Paul's for a year from 1934. In his last years he was an ardent pacifist, forming the Peace Pledge Union in 1936. JOHN A. SIMPSON

SHIELDS, ALEXANDER (1660-1700). Scottish Covenanter.* Born at Haughhead on the Scottish Borders, he grew up in a Covenanting atmosphere and was probably familiar with conventicles from boyhood. Educated in Holland and committed to the Covenanting cause, he suffered frequent imprisonments in London, Edinburgh, and on the Bass Rock. After the martyrdom of James Renwick* (1688) he became leader of the Covenanting minority. At the Revolution Settlement he left the Covenanting societies to join the newly reestablished Church of Scotland (Presbyterian). In a short busy life he was successively chaplain to the Cameronian Regiment in Scotland and Flanders, minister in London and St. Andrews, and chaplain to the ill-fated Scots expedition to Darien, where he died. Despite his many activities and travels he wrote A Hind Let Loose, a unique work which expounded a philosophy of the rights of man, social, political, and spiritual, and exposed the folly of the Stuart claim to the Divine Right of Kings.* ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

SHIELDS, THOMAS TODHUNTER (1873-1955). Baptist minister. Born and educated in Bristol, England, he emigrated to Ontario where he preached in various towns from 1897. In 1910 he began his forty-year ministry at Jarvis Street Baptist Church, Toronto. A militant fundamentalist, he founded and edited in 1922 the Gospel Witness, which he used to attack modernism and McMaster University (of which he was a one-time board member). The virulence of his popular and controversial sermons drew a vote of censure against him by the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec. He therefore founded the Ontario-Quebec Association of Regular Baptist Churches, which in turn was soon split by his anti-dispensational views, and the Independent Baptist Fellowship was formed. He was president of the Baptist Bible Union of North America from 1923 to 1930, and for a brief period in 1927 was the acting president of Des Moines University. Jarvis Street remained the heart of his movement, for it was the home of Toronto Bible Seminary, of which he became president in 1927, in addition to being the center of his pulpit ministry.

ROBERT WILSON

SHOEMAKER, SAMUEL MOOR (1893-1963). Episcopal clergyman and writer. Born in Baltimore, Maryland, he studied at Princeton University and was ordained priest after graduation from Union Theological Seminary in 1921. (Between Princeton and seminary he had served for two years as a YMCA secretary in China.) From 1925 he was rector of Calvary Episcopal Church, New York. Attracted by Frank Buchman's Moral Re-Armament* Movement, he later left it, but without loss of his evangelical enthusiasm. As a popular lecturer, counselor, and radio speaker, Shoemaker inspired laymen of all walks to put warm Christian faith into practice in their everyday lives, and to evangelize on a personal basis. He assisted also the founders of Alcoholics Anonymous in the formulation of their useful "Twelve Steps." His numerous books included Realizing Religion (1921); Religion That Works (1928); Twice Born Ministers (1929); How You Can Help Other People (1946); and By the Power of God (1954). ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

SHORT, AUGUSTUS (1802-1883). First Church of England bishop of Adelaide. Educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, where he became a tutor in 1829 and censor in 1833, he was influenced by the Tractarians* and wrote a defense of Tract 90. In 1835 he accepted the living of Ravensthorpe, and in 1847 became bishop of Adelaide, Australia. On his arrival he found five clergy, and by 1851 all state aid was discontinued. As a result of the 1850 conference of all the Australian bishops held in Sydney, and of legal advice gained in England in 1853, Short decided to organize his diocese as a voluntary body in 1855. In 1856 the creation of the diocese of Perth relieved him of his oversight of Western Australia. In 1881 he retired through ill-health. He died in Eastbourne, England.

NOEL S. POLLARD

SICARD (1160-1215). Bishop of Cremona. He studied in Bologna and taught canon law and theology at Paris, thereafter teaching in the cathedral school of Mainz before becoming bishop of Cremona in 1185. He won the city's independence from Frederick I, defended it against Brescia and Milan, and planned its fortifications. In 1202-5 he assisted the papal mission of Peter of Capua in Armenia and Constantinople. His chief works are Mitrale (1200), on liturgy; Chronica universalis (1213), a history from Creation, especially valuable for the Fourth Crusade; and Summa decretorum, his Paris lectures reworked at Mainz following only the form of Gratian's Decretum. C.G. THORNE, JR.

SICILIAN VESPERS. The massacre of the French in Sicily (30 March 1282), signaled by the tolling of the bell for Vespers. Three to four thousand died. It marked the end of the ambitions and intrigues of Charles of Anjou and Pope Martin IV,* and led eventually to Sicilian independence at the treaty of Caltabellota in 1302.

SICKINGEN, FRANZ VON (1481-1523). Perhaps the most colorful among the German knights, an anachronism at the beginning of the Modern Era, von Sickingen fought for Emperor Maximilian I and supported Charles V, but lost his life in the Knight's War, or Sickingen Feud (1522-23). The decline of feudalism, the rise of national states, the importance of the burgher class because of the growth of industry and commerce, and even the impact of humanism were not understood by him, although he contended for social reform. He was a religious independent, ready to support Martin Luther. He offered Luther a haven in 1520, if he should have to leave Saxony. He gathered some troops together outside Worms at the time of the Diet (1521), but a question remains if he would have used them to protect Luther had he been hired as a mercenary to side against him. Von Sickingen was disappointed in Luther's leadership, because Luther disclaimed the use of the sword for the spread of the Gospel. Luther dedicated his book On Confession (1522) to him, and Oecolampadius served as his chaplain during 1522. As a freebooter he earned the animosity of his neighbors. In 1522 von Sickingen attacked Trier, whereupon Richard von Greiffenklau, archbishop of Trier, the elector of the Palatinate, and Philip of Hesse* combined against him. They defeated him at

Landstuhl, and von Sickingen fell, mortally wounded. CARL S. MEYER

SIDETES, PHILIP, see PHILIP SIDETES

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, G. SOLLIUS (c.431-c.482). Gallic Latin poet and bishop of Clermont. Born into a noble family of Auvergne and well educated, Sidonius wrote panegyrics to the emperors Avitus, his father-in-law (456), Majorian (458), and Anthemius (468), which won for him his statue erected in Trajan's Forum and two terms as prefect of Rome (456 and 468). Reluctantly accepting the see of Clermont though not a cleric (468), he was naturally weak in Scripture and dogma but always faithful to his religious duties. From the same time he ceased adding to his total of twenty-four secular poems (carmina) and began his flow of 147 epistles, valuable sources for the history of his era, especially the resistance of Auvergne (469-75), which he led, and its ignominious surrender to Euric, Visigothic king, by Emperor Nepos. His writing was graceful, but jejune in content, reflecting the life of an urbane Roman gentleman, despite the barbarians' encroachments. Sidonius influenced the Middle Ages in his epistolary and panegyric styles and in his late classical rhetorical mannerism.

SIEUR DE MONTS (Pierre Du Guas de Monts) (1560?-1611). French colonizer in Canada. He belonged to the gens de robe of his day. Having fought in the cause of Henry IV* of France, carrying his Calvinist convictions with great pride, he nonetheless, in the interest of trade, agreed to have Indians in New France instructed in the dogmas of the Church of Rome. To exploit his trading monopoly in furs which extended over 40-46 degrees north latitude, he organized a trading company in 1604. He used the ablest and the worst elements of French society to colonize Acadia. De Monts distinguished himself as trader, explorer, and the first lieutenant-governor in Acadia. He is credited with having been the founder of the first permanent settlement in New France. Some accounts give his dates as 1558-1628. EDWARD J. FURCHA

SI-GAN-FU STONE. An inscription in Chinese and Syriac discovered in 1625 by Jesuit missionaries. The text believed to be dated between 779 and 781 describes the fortunes of the (Nestorian) Christians since 635 when the emperor T'ai-tsung received Alopen.* Under his successor Kao-tsung, permission was granted to create monasteries in several regions, some monks being supported by the emperor. A bishopric was established in 650. Later in that century there were conflicts with Buddhists and persecutions, but in the early decades of the eighth century Catholicos Selibhazekha became metropolitan of China. Many of the Christians seem from their names to have been Syrian or Persian, but there is evidence for some native names in the inscription. The stone set up by a synod of 779 contains also a confession of the Christian faith: this is noteworthy by its considerable adaptation to the Chinese idiom and religious-philosophical terminology. It may indicate that Christianity had lost some distinctive features in its eastward journey, or that Christians hesitated to speak openly of their mysteries.

SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX (c.1030-1112). Medieval chronicler. Born probably near Gembloux, he was educated at the monastery there. He taught for twenty years in Metz and returned in 1070 to Gembloux, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a highly respected teacher and an extremely productive writer. He also became involved in the Investiture Controversy* and wrote three tracts in support of the imperial position. His most important works were written in the last years of his life. His Chronica is a history of events from 381 to 1111, and De Viris Illustribus is a collection of ecclesiastical biographies. He also was the author of a number of saints' lives, and a history of the abbots of Gembloux.
RUDOLPH HEINZE

SIGER OF BRABANT (c.1235-c.1282). Radical Aristotelian philosopher. A canon at St. Martin's, Liège, he later taught philosophy in Paris (c.1266-76). He expounded a heterodox Aristotelianism while professing Christianity, and was attacked by Bonaventura* and Thomas Aquinas.* Thirteen errors taken from his teaching were condemned by the bishop of Paris (1270). This was ineffective and, summoned to appear before an inquisitor in 1276, Siger fled to Italy. The so-called Great Condemnation followed, when 219 propositions were condemned by the bishop, Étienne Tempier (1277). Siger retired to Orvieto where he was reportedly stabbed to death by an insane cleric. Siger was leader of a group inaugurating purely rational teaching, unconcerned with Christian dogma. His chief source was Aristotle*; secondary sources included Proclus,* Avicenna,* Averroes,* Albertus Magnus, and Aquinas. Typical teachings were: the First Being is the immediate cause of a single creature; all other creatures derive indirectly from God by a progressive emanation; the created world is necessary and eternal, and every species of being (e.g., man) is eternal; there is only one intellectual soul for mankind, and consequently one will; this unique soul is eternal, but human individuals are not immortal; human will is a passive potency moved by the intellect.

SIGISMUND (1361-1437). Holy Roman Emperor. Second son of Emperor Charles IV, Sigismund inherited the mark of Brandenburg on his father's death in 1378. For six years thereafter he studied at the Hungarian court. In 1385 he married Maria, daughter of King Louis of Hungary and Poland, and in 1387 he succeeded his father-in-law as king of Hungary. Domestic Hungarian problems, Turkish attacks, and intrigues in his bid for succession in Germany and Bohemia weakened his rule. In 1410 he was elected German king, or "king of the Romans." Solution of the Great Schism being in the best imperial interest, he pressured John XXIII* to convoke the Council of Constance* (1414-18), and his international travels and appeals during the sessions were instrumental in restoring a unified papacy. He guaranteed John Hus* safe passage to the council, where the Reformer was martyred. The Hussite Wars in Bohemia (c.1420-36) erupted after Sigismund succeeded Wenceslas as king of Bohemia in 1419 and pledged to prosecute heresy. Vexed by yet another Ottoman advance on Hungary, Sigismund was unable to consolidate his power in Germany. Although Pope Eugene IV crowned him Holy Roman Emperor in 1433, Sigismund died without having achieved his goal of unifying Christendom against Islamic advance.

SIGN OF THE CROSS. The act done by both clergy and people of reproducing the shape of the cross of Christ with the general idea of recalling that from Christ's death the grace of God flows to the church. In services of baptism and confirmation, from early times the priest or bishop has made the sign of the cross as part of the giving of God's blessing to the candidates. Also, in worship the priest gives God's blessing while making the sign of the cross in front of himself. Ordinary worshipers are taught to make the sign of the cross as they enter churches and during certain services. The traditional way is to take the right hand from forehead to the center of the chest, then from shoulder to shoulder, and then back to the center of the chest. In the West, the crossing of the chest is from left to right, and in the East from right to left.

PETER TOON

SIMEON, CHARLES (1759-1836). Evangelical leader. Educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, on entering the latter he discovered that attendance at Holy Communion was compulsory. His preparation for taking the sacrament was the main factor in his subsequent conversion. His own adoption of Evangelical views was fostered by his friendship with Henry and John Venn.* Appointed vicar of Holy Trinity in Cambridge in 1782, he ministered there until his death. He overcame early opposition mainly through his pastoral care, and while firmly attached to the Church of England, he became the center of evangelicalism in Cambridge. He had immense influence with undergraduates both from the pulpit and in small groups. As well as encouraging the British and Foreign Bible Society, he helped to found the Church Missionary Society and the London Jews Society (later the Church Mission to Jews), and his curate, Henry Martyn,* as a chaplain of the East India Company became one of India's best-known pioneer missionaries. He established the Simeon Trust (which still exists) which purchased livings for Evangelicals. His own sermon outlines, Horae Homileticae, were collected and published in twenty-one volumes in 1840.

PETER S. DAWES

SIMEON OF THESSALONICA (d.1429). Greek Orthodox archbishop and theologian. Little is known of his life; his fame rests primarily on his chief work, Dialogue Against all Heresies and on the One Faith. The first part of the book was devoted to a discussion of the Trinity and Christology, while the second section dealt with the liturgy and the sacraments. The work included polemics against Jews, Bogomiles,* and Muslims, and questioned the primacy of the papacy. Simeon was willing to grant the pope considerable authority if he upheld the true faith, but since the papacy had added the word Filioque to the Creed, Simeon maintained it had forfeited its primacy. He also wrote a number of shorter works dealing with the Nicene Creed* and doctrinal questions.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

SIMEON THE STYLITE (c.390-459). Pillar ascetic. Born in Cilicia, son of a shepherd, he moved to Antioch where as a teenager he became an anchorite. For twenty years he lived in various monasteries in N Syria. About 423 he started to live on a pillar at Telanissus (Dair Sem'an). For thirty-six years he lived in great austerity on a platform at the top of the pillar, the height of which was gradually increased until it reached sixty feet from the ground. Thousands came to see him and hear his preaching, with the result that his influence was extensive. After his death a monastery and sanctuary were built on the site of the pillar. A famous disciple of his was Daniel the Stylite.

PETER TOON

SIMON. Apostle. One of the Twelve, he is called by Matthew and Mark "the Cananaean" (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18 RSV), and by Luke "the Zealot" (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). The latter is a translation of the Aramaic underlying the former. Little is known about him, but his designation suggests that at some stage he had been associated with the active opposition to Roman rule which was characteristic of the Zealot* party. Some early Christian writers identified him with Simeon, son of Clopas, said by Hegesippus to have succeeded James as the head of the Jerusalem church.

SIMON MAGUS. A sorcerer mentioned in Acts (8:9-24) as combining the practice of magic with a Hellenistic-Jewish syncretism. He claimed to be a divine emanation: "that power of God which is called Great" (RSV). For a time he professed Christian faith, but was later condemned by Peter for seeking to obtain spiritual powers by the payment of money (hence the term "simony"). The passage in Acts is the only mention of Simon in the NT, though he features in later Christian literature. Justin Martyr says Simon was a native of Gitta in Samaria and was widely acclaimed as a god; he came to Rome during the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41-54). Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius consider him the prototype of the later Gnostic heresies and describe the alleged doctrines of his followers; it is uncertain how reliable their accounts are. Simon features in the later pseudo-Clementine literature (third/fourth century) as the opponent of Peter, but the material is clearly fictitious. It has been suggested that the heresiarch mentioned by the Fathers and Simon of Acts 8 are two different people, the former living in the second century.

W. WARD GASQUE

SIMON OF SUDBURY (d.1381). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1375. Born at Sudbury, he studied at Paris, afterward becoming chaplain to Innocent IV who in 1361 appointed him bishop of London. He was soon active in politics, and it was of advantage to the Lancastrian party when Gregory XIII appointed him archbishop of Canterbury in 1375. He was lenient toward the Wycliffites, and when he had to try John Wycliffe* (1378) he dismissed him with an injunction to silence. He was, however, stern in denouncing clerical abuses, particularly that of nonresidence. In 1380 he became chancellor, and his poll tax made him unpopular. In the revolt of 1381 his lands were spoiled and with Richard II he took refuge in the Tower of London. Though he resigned the chancellorship, the mob beheaded him.

SIMON PETER, see PETER THE APOSTLE

SIMONY. The term is derived from Simon Magus (Acts 8:18-24) who attempted to purchase from the Apostles Peter and John the gift of conferring the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands. Throughout Christian history it has assumed sophisticated and nuanced definitions in both civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence. Essentially, however, simony refers to the deliberate conferment or acquisition of anything spiritual or sacred for remuneration, monetary or otherwise. An unsolicited gratuity, therefore, is not generally considered simony. Its classic manifestation was the medieval traffic in indulgences* and sale of clerical preferments. The legal recognition of Christianity under Constantine and the church's subsequent rise to wealth and power insured the appearance of simony as a problem of some magnitude. In its several forms it was condemned by such councils as Chalcedon (451), Third Lateran (1179), Trent (1545ff.) and by such leaders as Gregory I and Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas contributed significantly to its treatment in Roman Catholic canon law. Both Wycliffe and Hus polemicized against it in major writings. Wherever discovered, simony always requires ecclesiastical restitution and in extreme forms may result in deposition from office or even in excommunication. In some countries the offense is punishable under civil statutes. JAMES DE JONG

SIMPLICIANUS (d.400). Bishop of Milan. He was first heard of in Rome (c.350-60), where he was instrumental in the conversion of Victorinus, a Platonist professor of rhetoric. When his pupil Ambrose became bishop of Milan (373), he removed there to prepare him for baptism and ordination. He helped the seeking Augustine by recounting the story of Victorinus's conversion and encouraging him in his reading of the Platonists; some of Augustine's early treatises were addressed to him. He succeeded Ambrose as bishop in 397.

SIMPLICIUS (d.483). Pope from 468. His pontificate saw the final collapse of the Western Empire when Odoacer assumed title as king of Italy in 476. Unlike his famous predecessor Leo I, Simplicius exercised very little influence over the political developments in Italy and was unable to maintain that high degree of leadership which made the papacy impressive from 440 to 461 in the midst of political upheaval. His influence was at best minimal, and he seems to have been the captive of the events of the day.

SIMPSON, SIR JAMES YOUNG (1811-1870). Discoverer of the anaesthetic effect of chloroform. Son of a Scottish village baker, Simpson qualified in medicine at Edinburgh University and in 1840 was elected to the chair of medicine and midwifery. Ether was used in an operation in Edinburgh in 1846 and Simpson, experimenting on himself, looked for more suitable compounds for application, especially in midwifery—and in 1847 discovered the effect of chloroform. Violent controversy ensued which died out after 1853, when Queen Victoria was given chloroform at the birth of Prince Leopold. In his later days Simpson's fame was worldwide.

As a student Simpson showed little interest in religion; after his marriage in 1839, however, he joined the kirk. Duns believes he was converted about this time. He made good use of his detailed knowledge of the Bible, imbibed from his deeply religious home background, in his Religious Objections to the Employment of Anaesthesia (1848). In this he effectively argues that God Himself used anaesthesia to prevent pain (Gen. 2:21), that "sorrow" in the curse of Genesis 3:16, 17 does not mean "pain" but "labor," and that in any case the curse was not immutable (otherwise it would be sinful to pull up thorns and thistles or to use a tractor).

SIMPSON, JAMES YOUNG (1873-1934). Scottish natural scientist. He studied at Edinburgh University where he became involved in the evangelical work of the day (e.g., the Moody mission). Strongly influenced by Henry Drummond,* who persuaded him to take up science as a Christian work, Simpson became professor of natural science at Edinburgh. He wrote five books on science and religion, the best known being Landmarks in the Struggle between Science and Religion (1925) in which he effectively demolished A.D. White's History of the Warfare of Science with Theology (1896). Where White saw a struggle between religion and science, Simpson saw one between each older generation of scientists and the new generation about to succeed it. His own forebear and great-uncle, Sir James, had strongly opposed Joseph Lister, inventor of antiseptic surgery. R.E.D. CLARK

SIN. When the Bible seeks to describe the deepest of all the problems of human existence, it speaks in terms of sin, its consequences, and its guilt. It is sin done by man, and/or consented to by man, which creates the situation which requires the atonement with its infinite cost to God in the death of His Son. Sin involves man in many forms of personal failing within himself—loss of integrity, self-centeredness, and failure to measure up to the external standards and laws which even he himself sets for his achievement. Though such aspects of sin are taken note of in the OT, sin in itself is regarded as an attitude of hatred and mistrust toward God, of senseless pride before God. It is calculated to make impossible any true personal relationship to God (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; Rom. 5:10). The NT regards the true nature of sin as having been revealed in the attitude and response of men to the truth, love, and challenge of God in Christ (Acts 3:14,15,19). The true nature of Paul's own sin, for example, was brought home to him most forcibly when he found himself persecuting Christ and His church (1 Cor. 15:9; 1 Tim. 1:15; Gal. 1:23; Phil. 3:6).

Sin manifests itself in various ways. Some sins are regarded as more serious than others. The OT separates sins done through haste or weakness from sins done "with a high hand" (Num. 15:28-31). Jesus was more severe in His condemnation of certain types of pride and hypocrisy than in His condemnation of some other human failures. He spoke of some failures as meriting "few," some "many," stripes (Luke 12:47,48). Yet though acts are regarded as sinful, sin is much more than a series of overt misdeeds. The badness which makes sin sin is deeply entwined in the depth of man's personality. Sin belongs to the man and dwells in the man (Rom. 7:20,23) rather than in the act. A Christian has to ask pardon for what he is as well as for what he does. Paul regards sin as a power which can not only dwell in a man, but can possess and reign over him (Rom. 5:12; 6:6, 14). The whole of man's being which is infected with sin ranging from sensuality to pride Paul calls "the flesh." Even man's goodness can become tragically perverted by the evil will of the flesh.

Sin is regarded in the Bible as the result of man's being left free to choose to trust and love God. His refusal to do so is absurd, but its consequences are infinitely tragic. It is denied that God has any responsibility or complicity in this refusal. God foresaw sin, even risked the occurrence of sin. Sin is not essential to His creation. Nor does He hold sin in being as He holds good things in being. Sin can only be a perversion of what is good. God can cause the sinner's activity, but not His sin. When sin occurs it seems to fall in such a way under His sovereign power and purpose that it can seem to have been ordained. But God is in no sense its author.

SIRICIUS (c.334-399). Pope from 384. Roman-born, he was much influenced by Ambrose,* but had his own decided views about the exalted status of his office and responsibilities. This was made clear in a letter to Bishop Himerius of Tarragona, regarded as the first papal decretal. During his pontificate the Melitian Schism* was ended, Priscillianism opposed, extremism of various kinds disapproved of, and the new basilica of St. Paul dedicated.

SIRMIUM, COUNCIL OF (357). Technically in the jurisdictional sphere of the Western Empire, the city was the venue chosen by the emperor Constantius, an Arian sympathizer, to bring the Western bishops into Arian line. It began with the expurgation of the Greek concepts ousia ("substance"), homoousios, and homoiousios, on the ground that they were nonscriptural and above human understanding, substituting a baptismal Trinity and a subordinated, begotten Son. Hilary of Poitiers* who reports upon the events and gives the Latin text of the creed, identifies it as the "Blasphemy of Sirmium."

SIRMOND, JACQUES (1559-1651). Jesuit scholar. Born at Riom, Auvergne, France, he studied at the Jesuit college in Billom, and became a member of the order in 1576. He taught literature at Pont-à-Mousson and Paris (1581-90) and was secretary to the Jesuit general, C. Aquaviva, in Rome (1590-1608). He returned to Paris, becoming rector of the Collège de Clermont (1617) and confessor to Louis XIII (1637-43). One of the greatest scholars of the age, from 1610 he published many works, especially editions of the Fathers—e.g., Fulgentius, Paschasius Radbertus, Theodoret, Eusebius of Caesarea, and Rufinus. He also distinguished between Dionysius the Areopagite and Pseudo-Dionysius. J.G.G. NORMAN

SIX ARTICLES, THE (1539). The Act of Six Articles was pushed through Parliament by Henry VIII of England and came to be known as "the whip of six strings" because noncompliance with it (classed as a felony) was punishable by death and confiscation of property. Protestants complained that the "Reformation goes backwards" in England because this was merely a restatement of some basic tenets of Romanism under the auspices of the English state church which Henry now headed. The English Church had become independent of Rome, but it did not change its theology under Henry. The Six Articles taught transubstantiation,* auricular confession to a priest, celibacy of the clergy, and Communion in one kind (bread only need be given to laymen). HOWARD F. VOS

SIXTUS II (d.258). Pope 257-58. He resumed relations with the churches of Africa and Asia Minor, as well as with Cyprian, so ending a rupture over the validity of baptism by heretics. The latter he held valid, as had his predecessor Stephen I. He was nevertheless tolerant toward the rebaptism policy of the Eastern churches, probably influenced by Dionysius of Alexandria. Among the most highly venerated of the early martyrs (he was beheaded under Valerian while conducting services in the cemetery of Praetextatus), his name was in the Roman calendar of the mid-fourth century, and remains in the Canon of the Mass. There is no proof for his having written Ad Novatianum or composed, even edited, the "Pythagorean Sentences of Sextus" translated by Rufinus of Aquileia. C.G. THORNE, JR.

SIXTUS IV (1414-1484). Pope from 1471. Born Francesco della Rovere, he entered the Franciscan Order early, studied at the universities of Padua and Bologna, and became general of his order in 1464. Further promotion soon came: cardinal in 1467, pope four years later. His international forays and plans involving Turks, French, and Russians met with little success, but he did establish the University of Copenhagen in 1475. Thereafter he concentrated on Italian politics, becoming embroiled in strife, nepotism, and conspiracy to an astonishing extent. Nevertheless he condemned abuses in the Spanish Inquisition, championed the Mendicant Orders, was a patron of the arts, built the Sistine Chapel, and enriched the Vatican Library. J.D. DOUGLAS

SIXTUS V (1521-1590). Pope from 1585. Born at Grottamare, Felice Peretti was educated by the Franciscans of Montalto and took the habit at the age of twelve. Ordained priest in 1547, he soon became a noted preacher and friend of Loyola and Philip Neri. In 1560 he was appointed Consultor of the Inquisition, becoming general of his order and bishop of St. Agata in 1566. In 1570 he was created cardinal by Pius X and was bishop of Fermo from 1571 to 1577, but during the pontificate of Gregory XIII (1572-85) was kept deliberately in the background. In 1585 he was chosen as pope.

At once the somewhat uncritical scholar and book collector showed himself an energetic reformer, suppressing brigandage in the Papal States by frequent executions, reforming the Curia and the cardinalate, over which he asserted papal authority, and placing the finances of Rome on a sounder footing by increased taxation and the elimination of graft. With the help of the architect Fontana he erected massive structures in Rome itself in the then fashionable Rococo style: the Lateran Palace, the Via Sistina, the Vatican Library, and the restored aqueduct renamed after him the Acqua Felice are all his creation. In foreign policy he was less able, trying with some vacillation to restore a balance of power among the Catholic powers and restrain Philip of Spain's ambitions at the expense of France. The revision of the text of the Vulgate known as the Sistine was also begun during this pontificate.

SLEIDANUS, JOHANNES (1506-1556). Annalist of the Reformation. Born in Schleiden, near Aachen, he studied classics at Liège and Cologne, and law at Paris and Orléans. He entered the service of Cardinal du Bellay and represented Francis I in diplomatic negotiations with the Smalcald League* (1537). Dismissed for his Protestant opinions, he settled at Strasbourg (1542). As Sleidanus was accustomed to copying all papers bearing upon the Reformation to which he had access, Martin Bucer* persuaded Philip of Hesse to appoint him historian of the Reformation (1544). The first volume was finished in 1545. He used diplomatic visits to England and Marburg to collect materials. When war interrupted his work, at Cranmer's intercession he was granted a pension from Edward VI of England. He represented Strasbourg and a group of imperial cities at the Council of Trent (1551). Appointed professor of law at Strasbourg, he finished his great work, entitled De Statu Religionis et Republicae Carolo V Caesare Commentarii (1555). He died in poverty. His book remains the most valuable contemporary history of Reformation times, containing the largest collection of documents. Because of its impartiality, however, it pleased neither Protestant nor Catholic. J.G.G. NORMAN

SLESSOR, MARY (1848-1915). Missionary to West Africa. Born in Aberdeen, Scotland, and brought up in Dundee, she came of a very poor family, but her mother was a devout Christian deeply interested in the United Presbyterian Church's Calabar Mission. Mary was converted in her teens, and after experience of youth work in the Dundee slums she sailed for Nigeria in 1876 and worked there almost continuously until her death, first in the Okoyong area and then at Itu among the Ibo people. She fought against witchcraft, drunkenness, twin-killing, and other cruel customs. She believed in "the daily mixing with the people" to break down suspicion and fear. She acquired great skill in the languages and had an almost uncanny insight into the African mind.

Such was her influence over men that even the most savage and powerful chiefs made her a trusted arbiter in disputes of all kinds. She was instrumental in establishing trade between the coast and inland areas to their benefit, and in beginning the Hope Waddell Institution to train Africans in useful trades and to carry out medical work. She became the first woman vice-consul in the British Empire when British rule was established in the area. She had an unusual combination of qualities, humor and seriousness, roughness and tenderness, vision and practicality. These with a cool nerve and disregard for personal health and comfort helped to make her a powerful influence for Christianity. As a result of her work under God the Ibo people became more Christian than tribes in other parts of Nigeria.

SMALCALD ARTICLES (1537). Drawn up by Martin Luther, the Smalcald Articles were subscribed to by the leading Lutheran theologians as their response to the invitation of Paul III to the council called to be held in Mantua in 1537. To them is appended the "Treatise of the Power and Primacy of the Pope," written by Philip Melanchthon.* They were endorsed by the princes and estates, although not formally accepted by the Smalcald League.* They belong to the Lutheran Confessions, or Symbols.

The Smalcald Articles consist of three parts, after an introduction. The first part briefly reaffirms the ancient creeds. The second part deals with Christology, the Mass, chapters and cloisters, and the papacy. Purgatory, pilgrimages, monastic life, relics, indulgences, and the invocation of saints are condemned. The pope is branded as the "very Antichrist" and the apostle of the devil. Fifteen points of doctrine are singled out in the third part for special treatment: sin, the Law, repentance, the Gospel, baptism, the sacrament of the altar, the Keys, confession, excommunication, ordination and the Call, the marriage of priests, the church, how one is justified before God and of good works, monastic vows, and human traditions. Extended treatment is given to the "False Repentance of the Papists."

In Melanchthon's "Of the Power and Primacy of the Pope" the claim that the pope rules by divine right is repudiated by citations from the Scriptures and the Fathers. The arguments of the Roman Catholics are countered. The power and jurisdiction of the bishops are taken up separately. Among those signing "the Augsburg Confession and the Apology" and the Articles at Smalcald in 1537 were Martin Bucer, Ambrose Blaurer, Paul Fagius of Strasbourg, and the Scot, John Aepinus, superintendent of Hamburg.

SMALCALD LEAGUE. A league of Lutheran princes formed to protect their religious interests. In 1525 the Roman Catholic princes had come together to form the League of Dessau. Early in the following year Elector John the Constant of Saxony and Landgrave Philip of Hesse made an alliance, which other princes joined. After the Diet of Augsburg the formal organization of the Smalcald League took place (December 1530). It was purely a defensive league. Strasbourg, Ulm, Constance, Reutlingen, and other cities joined in. In 1535, at the Diet of Smalcald, it was agreed that new members would have "to provide for such teaching and preaching as was in harmony with the Word of God and the pure teaching of our [Augsburg] Confession." Henry VIII of England found this stipulation one barrier, which prevented him from joining the League in 1536 and 1538. Attempts to reconcile the Lutherans and Roman Catholics failed at Ratisbon in 1541. In 1546, at the meeting with the emperor, no agreement was reached. The Smalcald War culminated in the defeat of the Smalcald League in the battle of Muehlberg and the Wittenberg Capitulation (1547). Mortiz of Saxony joined the emperor—for which he received the electorate—and thus insured the defeat of the Smalcald League. In the Peace of Augsburg* (1555), by the principle cuius regio, eius religio the Lutheran princes secured the right to regulate the religious affairs of their territories. CARL S. MEYER

SMART, CHRISTOPHER (1722-1771). Religious poet. He was born at Shipbourne, Kent, and educated at Cambridge, where he gained the Seaton prize for religious poetry on several occasions. He moved to London and worked as a hack journalist, and eventually he became insane. During his confinement he wrote A Song to David (1763) and Jubilate Agno, a work not published until the 1930s. He also produced a version of the Psalms and wrote several hymns. Though some of these were specifically written "for the fasts and festivals of the Church of England," his is a highly individualistic, even "enthusiastic" faith. He approaches questions of belief through the imagination, and hence his is visionary poetry. Thus A Song to David is a sustained, but also highly patterned, paean on the abundant and beneficent creativeness of God. David was the chosen of God, and Smart saw himself in the same capacity —an instrument of praise who must be pure for the task he had to fulfill. Jubilate Agno is even more complex in its pattern than A Song to David and owes much to Smart's knowledge of Hebrew.

ARTHUR POLLARD

SMART, PETER (1569-1652). Puritan divine. Educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, he was ordained in 1595 and became master of Durham Grammar School in 1598 and, later, prebend of Durham Cathedral. Under the rule of the High Church bishop Neile (1617-27) he absented himself from the services and in 1628 published a sermon directed against John Cosin (a fellow prebend) and the "ritualistic" services. He was suspended and fined, and his sermon was burned. Refusing to pay the fine, he was imprisoned in 1631 and remained in custody until released by the Long Parliament in 1641. His further publications—e.g., Catalogue of Superstitious Innovations (1642) and A Short Treatise of Altars (1643)—reveal that imprisonment had not changed his views, which were similar to those of the sermon, The Vanity and Downfall of Popish Ceremonies (1628). After receiving several sequestered benefices, he died at Baxter Wood, near Durham. PETER TOON

SMITH, EDWIN WILLIAM (1876-1957). Missionary, writer, and anthropologist. Born of missionary parents in Aliwal North, South Africa, he entered the Primitive Methodist* ministry. Between 1902 and 1915 he worked among the Ila people of Zambia, producing a grammar, dictionary, and NT translation. He served the British and Foreign Bible Society (1916-39), latterly as editorial (translations) superintendent, and also taught in various American Negro colleges. Although he had little academic training, he achieved international recognition as an anthropologist, notably for his works, The Ila-Speaking People of Northern Rhodesia (with A.M. Dale) and The Golden Stool. He was elected president of the Royal Anthropological Institute (1933-35) and received various distinctions. He published numerous books on topics related to African religion and missions. D.G.L. CRAGG

SMITH, ELI (1801-1857). American Congregational missionary and Orientalist. Born at Northford, Connecticut, he graduated from Yale (1821) and Andover Seminary (1826). Ordained the latter year, he engaged in mission work under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Malta and Syria. In 1830, with H.G.O. Dwight, he explored Asia Minor, Armenia, Georgia, and Persia. The two published a book dealing with their trip which led to the establishment of the American mission among Nestorian Christians. In 1838 he and Edward Robinson explored Sinai, Palestine, and S Syria. The last ten years of Smith's life were spent translating the Bible into Arabic. He died at Beirut.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

SMITH, SIR GEORGE ADAM (1856-1942). OT scholar. Born in India, where his father was editor of the Calcutta Review, he read arts and theology at Edinburgh and pursued further studies at German universities and in Cairo. Following a brief period as tutor at the Free Church College, Aberdeen, after the suspension of W.R. Smith, he became minister of Queen's Cross Free Church in the city (1882-92). He saw the issues involved in Smith's trial and set himself "to reconcile the outlook of an advanced scientific scholar with the spirit of devout reverence" (his wife's words). While professor of OT at the Free Church College, Glasgow (1892-1909), he campaigned for proper labor conditions and also undertook four lecture tours in America. His Yale lectures, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament (1901) threatened a heresy trial in Scotland. From 1909 until retirement in 1935 he was principal of Aberdeen University. He became a knight, Fellow of the British Academy, moderator of his church's assembly, and a royal chaplain in Scotland. His many publications include the incomparable Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1894; rev. 1931). C.G. THORNE, JR.

SMITH, HANNA WHITALL (1832-1911). Quaker author. Member of a pious Quaker family in Philadelphia, she is best known as the writer of The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life (1875) and as speaker with her husband, Robert Pearsall Smith, at interdenominational "Higher Christian Life" meetings in America and England. Undergoing early years of depression and skepticism, she was converted in 1858 under Plymouth Brethren influence at the same time as her husband, a Presbyterian layman. In 1867 she entered into a new experience of faith in Christ based upon Romans 6:6. She now testified to a life of spiritual victory and rest through complete commitment to Christ. Her husband, skeptical at first, later testified to the same experience and joined her as leader of Christian assemblies devoted to the study of biblical teaching on the life of victory in Christ. In 1872 they moved to England because of her husband's declining health. For two years they experienced phenomenal success in interdenominational meetings devoted to biblical exposition of their newfound religious experience. The movement thus initiated led to the founding of the Keswick Convention* in 1874, where annual sessions are still devoted to a consideration of biblical teaching on the higher life for the believing Christian. S. RICHEY KAMM

SMITH, HENRY PRESERVED (1847-1927). OT scholar. Born in Troy, Ohio, of Puritan descent, he was educated at Amherst College, Lane Theological Seminary, and the University of Berlin. He taught at Lane from 1874 (apart from a year at Leipzig, 1876-77), was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, and until about 1882 companied with conservatives. But already his mind was changing, for in that year an article on Wellhausen in the Presbyterian Review carried his observation that textual corruption of the Bible implied noninfallibility. It was not, however, until he defended C.A. Briggs* that he too was tried for heresy by the Cincinnati presbytery (1892), suspended from the ministry, denied appeal by the general assembly (1894), and forced to give up his Lane professorship and his home in Cincinnati. Subsequently he taught at Amherst (1898-1907), Meadville (Pennsylvania) Theological School (1907-13), and Union Theological Seminary (1913-25). His books included The Religion of Israel (1914), Essays in Biblical Interpretation (1921), and his autobiographical Heretic's Defense (1926). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SMITH, JOHN TAYLOR (1860-1937). Bishop and chaplain-general. He was converted at the age of eleven, educated at Kendall Grammar School and St. John's Hall, Highbury, and after five years' curacy in Norwood, sailed in 1891 to Sierra Leone as canon missioner, becoming bishop in 1897. An honorary chaplain to Queen Victoria, he was appointed chaplain-general in time for World War I, retiring in 1925. "Everybody's Bishop" was jovial, rotund, and saintly, a constant helper of the Children's Special Service Mission and the Keswick Convention.* Early rising for prayer, reading, and physical exercise was his lifelong custom. Daily he passed on to his friends his celebrated "Best Thought," gleaned in his morning devotions. He believed in, and relied upon, God's minute ordering of his life. He died aboard ship in the Mediterranean and was buried at sea. ARTHUR CLARKE

SMITH, JOSEPH (1805-1844). Mormon* prophet and founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Born into a shiftless, frontier family in Vermont, he moved in 1816 to Palmyra, New York. Here he experienced conversion during a religious revival four years later. Subsequently he claimed to have received a direct revelation from God engraved upon golden plates. The contents he translated and published as the Book of Mormon (1830) with the assistance of Sidney Rigdon, a former Campbellite minister. A Book of Commandments (1833), authored by Smith and later republished as Doctrine and Covenants (1835), provided the basis of Mormon theology. Smith's practice of polygamy, for which he claimed divine approval in a revelation announced in 1843, and his continued mismanagement of community affairs led to his downfall. Non-Mormon Illinois neighbors arrested Joseph and his brother and confined them in the nearby Carthage jail, where they were murdered by a mob in 1844. S. RICHEY KAMM

SMITH, RODNEY ("Gipsy") (1860-1947). English evangelist. Born in a tent near Epping Forest, he was the son of gipsies who traveled in East Anglia. He was greatly affected by his mother's death from smallpox. Soon after, his father was converted and began to hold services. Rodney was himself converted in 1876 in Cambridge, and in 1877 joined William Booth* in his "Christian Mission," serving as a captain in the Salvation Army until 1882. In 1889 he went to America on an evangelistic tour, after which he joined the Manchester Wesleyan Mission. Following a world preaching tour (1897-1912) he was missioner for the National Free Church Council. He served with the YMCA during World War I, and George VI made him a member of the Order of the British Empire. His preaching was characterized by "the wooing note" and constantly revealed his love of nature and the Bible. He sang simple gospel solos.

J.G.G. NORMAN

SMITH, SYDNEY (1771-1845). English clergyman, writer, and wit. Educated at Winchester and Oxford, he was ordained in 1796. In 1802 he helped to found the Edinburgh Review and contributed to it for twenty-five years. Bigotry and tyranny, hypocrisy and cruelty were his particular targets. Particularly noteworthy were The Letters of Peter Plymley on Catholic emancipation. His own prejudices, however, led him to unjustified attacks on William Carey* and other early missionaries abroad as well as evangelicals at home whom he described as "fanatics . . . in one general conspiracy against common sense and rational orthodoxy Christianity." A fine talker and wit, he was prevented from receiving a preferment by his outspoken views, except to a canonry first at Bristol and then at St. Paul's, London, which at least delivered him from his vicarage in the rural countryside which he loathed.

PETER S. DAWES

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1846-1894). Scottish Old Testament scholar. A son of the manse, he was educated in Scotland and Germany and in 1870 appointed professor of Oriental languages and Old Testament exegesis at the Free Church College, Aberdeen. Seven years later he was suspended after contributing to the Encyclopaedia Britannica articles that allegedly undermined belief in the inspiration of Scripture. The charges were dropped in 1880, but renewed attacks on him, coupled with an uncompromising spirit that was the despair of his friends, led to dismissal from the college in 1881. He subsequently became editor-in-chief of the Encyclopaedia Britannica and professor of Arabic at Cambridge (1883-94), where he also served for a time as chief librarian. His books included The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1881), The Prophets of Israel (1882), and Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (1889). J.D. DOUGLAS

SMYTH, JOHN (c.1565-1612). Father of English General Baptists. Born in E England, he studied theology at Cambridge, becoming fellow of Christ's College. His tutor was Francis Johnson, later Separatist pastor. Ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, Smyth became lecturer at Lincoln Cathedral (1600), only to be dismissed for "personal preaching" (1602). He served as pastor of a Brownist congregation in Gainsborough, but to escape persecution they went to Amsterdam (1607). He did not join existing Separatist groups because of differences of view on the church, but formed a new congregation. Among its members was Thomas Helwys,* a friend from Lincoln days. Smyth had come to a new understanding of the church as a company of believers, and of the necessity of believer's baptism. In 1608 he baptized himself (which led to his being called "Se-Baptist"), then Helwys and the others on confession of faith. For a meeting-house they acquired a bakehouse belonging to a Mennonite, Jan Munter. Becoming distrustful of his self-baptism, Smyth made overtures to the Waterlander Mennonite congregation. Helwys and about ten others held back, having misgivings about the Hofmannite Christology of the Mennonites. Smyth died before he could be received by the Waterlanders. His last book was a plea for full liberty of conscience in religion.

SOBORNOST. From the Russian sobor, "gathering" or "synod," corresponding somewhat to the Greek koinōnia, with no proper English equivalent, this term in the Russian Orthodox Church denotes an ineffable unity. Viewing the Roman Church's unity as superficially based on exterior authority and Protestantism's individuality as inherently disruptive, the Orthodox claim a sobornaja, "oneness," among clergy and laity, for example through the liturgy. This highly personal-corporate approach they account as ecumenically viable ultimately (cf. the work of the Society of SS. Alban and Sergius).

SOCIAL GOSPEL. No clear definition can be given to the term, nor can its first use be dated, but the ideas it represents were those of the nineteenth century. The variants center on the theme of the relationship of the Christian gospel to the improvement of the social environment, and all represent a response to the Protestant doctrine that the salvation of the individual is the center of the Christian gospel, and that only through a prior reformation of the individual will society be improved through the fruit of the Spirit in the lives of individuals. That orthodox belief led some to engage in active social work as a means of Christian witness, the most notable being the Salvation Army,* and so to provide one, less common, interpretation of the term "Social Gospel."

Its more common use can be traced to the response to a number of beliefs held by different groups in the nineteenth century. First, some Christians virtually advocated a position which minimized the importance of all things material, regarding them as passing phenomena, and so had no interest in their amelioration—the "pie in the sky" attitude so lampooned by their critics. Second, and more widespread, was a fear that participation in works of social improvement would lead to evangelistic activities being swamped in social work. To avoid the danger, the form of social work adopted was narrowed to include care for the individual but to exclude concern with forms of institutional change, especially if they involved work of a political nature. It was understandable that some reacted to these two beliefs by stressing the need for institutional and environmental changes apart from the changes in the individual. The reaction led to the adoption of a position which could easily lead to a denial of the need for change in the individual.

The move from orthodoxy was encouraged still further by a third influence of the nineteenth century, the ideas of the biological and social scientists. An optimistic doctrine of man and of his improvement in society was accepted by many in the eighteenth century, but the optimism of the psychological basis of such theories was increased by the biological studies of the nineteenth. In the Western world they could be related to the economic progress of the time, and so it became easy to adopt a position which was contrary to the orthodox Christian view, and which held that society may be improved by institutional change. Man was to be perfected through change in society. ROY H. CAMPBELL

SOCIETY OF ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST. Popularly known as the "Cowley Fathers," this is the oldest men's religious community in the Church of England. In 1850 R.M. Benson was appointed vicar of Cowley, and in 1866 took the vows with three others. The society has worked in India, and now works in the USA, Canada, and Africa. The members are in demand as conductors of missions and retreats and as spiritual directors to other communities. In recent years they have played an increasing part in ecumenical affairs.

SOCINIANISM. A rationalist movement that grew from the thought of Lelio Sozzini (1525-62) and his nephew Fausto (1539-1604) which became one of the forerunners of modern Unitarianism.* Lelio, a Sienese lawyer, was led by his attempt to restore primitive Christianity to denounce the "idolatry of Rome." The opposition this provoked forced him to wander through Switzerland, France, England, Holland, Germany, Austria, Bohemia, and Poland. He died at Zurich. Fausto, influenced by Italian humanism and his liberal uncle, also left his native land, settling in Basle. In 1578 he moved to Poland, where he spent the remainder of his life organizing a church of his persuasion. The most important of his writings is De Jesu Christu Servatore (1578).

Socinianism taught: a rationalist interpretation of Scripture with an emphasis on the early part of the OT and the NT; an acceptance of Jesus as the revelation of God but nevertheless solely a man; nonresistance; the separation of church and state; and the doctrine of the death of the soul with the body except for selective resurrection of those who persevered in obeying Jesus' commandments.

Fausto's work in Poland with the Minor (Reformed) Church led him to revise the Catechism of Racov (1574). This document, published in 1605 as the "Racovian Catechism," became the most famous expression of Socinianism. The Minor Church, centered in a communitarian settlement at Racov, NE of Cracow, propagated its teachings through an academy (at one time having more than 1,000 students enrolled) and a printing operation that published books and pamphlets in many languages. In addition to this center there were about 300 churches in Poland, including among their leadership such men as Andreas Wiszowaty (d.1678), Socino's grandson, and Samuel Przypkowski (d.1670). These churches attracted a number of converts from German Protestantism who moved to Poland.

In 1638, responding to the Counter-Reformation, the parliament of Poland closed the school at Racov and destroyed its buildings. The publishing house was also forced out of business, and churches were suppressed. A number of ministers were banished while others left voluntarily. In 1658, when the parliament passed the death penalty for adherents to the Racovian confession, there was a mass migration of Socinians to Hungary (Transylvania), Germany (Silesia and Prussia), England, and the Netherlands.

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Socinian influences in England can be traced in the opinions of Latitudinarianism* and Arians in the Church of England, in the Cambridge Platonists,* in the views of philosophers and scientists such as Isaac Newton* and John Locke,* and in the ideas of early Unitarians such as Stephen Nye—whose History of Unitarianism, Commonly Called Socinianism touched off the Trinitarian controversy in the Church of England in 1687.

SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION. The sociologist of religion is interested in the vast range of differences and similarities in beliefs and practices. Therefore his definition of religion cannot be the specific definition of any one religious cult. The only possible alternative is a functional definition which concentrates upon the function of religion and ignores the basic faith presuppositions. This is acceptable only if the sociologist realizes what he has done in the construction of his definition. Milton Yinger, taking this approach, defines religion as "a system of beliefs and practices by means of which a group of people struggle with the ultimate problems of human life."

If one defines sociology as the study of man in society and accepts the position that a complete analysis of human action requires the study of social, cultural, and personality facts, then sociology of religion may be defined as the scientific study of the reciprocal influences of religion and society, culture, and personality.

Sociology of religion is a very young science and as such is experiencing the growing pains of youth. Much interest is being shown, but little scientific theory is being developed, yet it takes time and competent, interested researchers to develop sound theory. At times sociological inquiry into religion has been central to the most important work being done in sociology; this was true at the turn of the century during the "golden era" of Ernst Troeltsch,* Max Weber, and Emil Durkheim. However, during the period between World Wars I and II, little attention was given to this field of endeavor. Since World War II there has been a resurgence of interest; even more recently hope has been rekindled by the establishment of dialogue between the three principal types of persons addressing themselves to the problem: college and university professors, seminary professors, and religious researchers. The right questions are beginning to be asked at both empirical and theoretical levels.

The earliest scientific approaches to a study of religion were highly influenced by August Comte's hierarchy of intellectual disciplines. Theological thinking was primitive and completely outmoded in the positive society. Religion would survive only in the form of liturgy based on science rather than revelation. In America two different groups developed. One viewed religion as a type of cultural lag and was antireligious in nature. A second group, of whom Walter Rauschenbusch* is a striking example, saw the possibilities for a "Social Gospel." Sociology could form the basis of a religious, social reform. Many of the early American sociologists were recruited from the ranks of the Protestant clergy. However, this "cult of progress" phenomenon vanished under the onslaught of two world wars and a world depression.

The development of functional sociology began to have its effects upon the sociological study of religion in the early twentieth century. In Germany this was marked by the works of Weber, Troeltsch, and Georg Simmel. The French parallels to these social theorists were Durkheim and Robert Will. In the USA, the attack upon the positivistic views of religion came from the field of anthropology. Bronislaw Malinowski found that primitive man was forced to seek answers to the unknown in order to adjust to his cultural environment. Therefore religion had a functional value in enabling man to meet the problems of life, and religious ritual strengthened the moral beliefs and social cohesion essential to community life.

The work of Talcott Parsons represents an attempt to systemize the ideas of the structure-function approach, and it allowed the American sociologists to make a break with the Comtian emphasis on religion as a passing phenomenon. Parsons prepared the way for an understanding of socioreligious organization, while detailed sociological analysis of relevant phenomena was carried on by William I. Thomas, Florian Znaniecki, M.E. Gaddis, Arthur E. Holt, Samuel Kincheloe, W. Lloyd Warner, and others. Systematic treatments with broad perspective have been undertaken more recently by Pitirim Sorokin and Joachim Wach.

The sociological theorists who have been most concerned with religion are usually identified as functionalists. In the struggle to relate religion to society, culture, and personality they have been able to isolate at least six basic functions of religion.

(1) Religion provides support, consolation, and reconciliation. In the face of uncertainty, men need support; the pain of disappointment demands consolation; alienation from the goals and norms of society gives rise to a longing for reconciliation.

(2) Through cultic practices and formal worship, religion offers a transcendental relationship which provides security in the midst of contingency.

(3) The norms and values of established society are sacralized by religion. This allows the group goals to be maintained over individual wishes.

(4) In contradiction to the above, religion can also provide a prophetic function as it provides the standards of value in terms of which institutionalized norms may be critically examined and found seriously wanting.

(5) Religion performs important identity functions. It is within the realm of religion that many are able to find the answers to who they are and what they are.

(6) Finally, there is a relationship between religion and maturation. Religion sacralizes norms and ends which support the expectations for each age level.

The functionalist is not without his critics, and even he is willing to admit that this approach has its weaknesses. Yinger points out that functional analysis is sometimes used to "prove" the ultimate validity of some specific practice or belief. This empirical proof of a nonempirical proposition is impossible.

The field of sociology of religion branches out into several specific areas of interest: Religion and the Economic Order, Religion and Family, Religion and Social Stratification, Religious Leadership and Authority, Religion and Conflict, Religious Attitudes, Typology of Religious Institutions, etc. The growing edge of the discipline is interested in religious organization, leadership, and authority. The sociological theories of organization, bureaucracy, and role-playing are being incorporated into the study of religious organization, leadership, and authority.

The immediate future holds much promise for the work on religion more akin to social psychology than sociology. Here the relationships between religious values and other kinds of values in the culture will be explored. Recent developments in methodology such as small-group research, interviewing techniques, survey research, and conceptual analysis have paved the way for this type of study.

SOCRATES OF ATHENS (469-399 B.C.). Greek philosopher and one of the great stimulating forces in Western philosophy. He died by drinking hemlock following his condemnation for "not believing in the gods the state believes in, and introducing different new divine powers; and also for corrupting the young." Socrates's background was in Sophism, his philosophical method that of a "midwife"—the raising of questions, the creation of a climate of doubt about accepted truths by a process of cross-examination ("dialectic"), combined with high intellectual standards and a sense of moral purpose. His magnetic personal influence, indifference to wealth, and freedom from ambition made the conservative elements suspicious and led to the political charge. Plato's Crito and Phaedo offer an intriguing portrayal of Socrates's last days. Despite his enormous influence, there is no agreement on the contribution of Socrates. Part of the difficulty is that he wrote nothing on philosophy. At one extreme there is the view that the Socrates of Plato's Dialogues is historical, at the other that nothing is known about him. Superficial parallels have led some to make rather fanciful comparisons between Socrates and Jesus Christ. PAUL HELM

SÖDERBLOM, NATHAN (1866-1931). Archbishop of Uppsala and ecumenist. Born at Trönö , son of a Pietistic pastor, he was educated at the University of Uppsala and soon proved himself to be a brilliant scholar, not least in esoteric byways of Orientalism. Ordained to the Lutheran ministry in 1893, he was successively chaplain in Paris, professor and pastor in Uppsala, and professor at Leipzig before his unexpected election as archbishop and primate of Sweden in 1914. Despite his father's misgivings, Söderblom never forgot his upbringing, told his daughter that he could not live one day "without unceasing prayer," and once electrified an American dinner audience by interrupting his address to deliver himself of all five verses of "There were ninety and nine." He participated in dialogue with Lambeth, early ecumenical stirrings in South India, talks with the Orthodox, and tentative advances toward Rome, and he organized the 1925 Stockholm Conference.* His concept of ecumenicity, according to his biographer, "was to emphasize the importance for the movement of its being nurtured by worship and prayer rather than [its being] an alliance of secretaries." His ecumenical work was recognized in 1930 when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Among his writings were Christian Fellowship (1923) and the substance of his Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh in 1931, published two years later as The Living God: Basal Forms of Personal Religion.

SOGA, TIYO (c.1829-1871). First African ordained minister in South Africa. Son of a Christian mother and a polygamous councillor of Chief E Ngqika, he entered Lovedale Seminary in 1844 and was sent to Scotland when war closed the institution in 1846. He returned to South Africa in 1848 as a catechist, but went back to Scotland for theological training (1851-56). As a minister of the United Presbyterian Church he served at Mgwali (1857) and Tutura (1868), proving himself a fine preacher and a faithful pastor. His work on the revision of the Xhosa Bible and a translation of Pilgrim's Progress (1866) revealed great literary ability. Ill-health prevented the full expression of his gifts, and he died at the early age of forty-two. D.G.L. CRAGG

SOISSONS, COUNCIL OF (1121). This was called to deal with the writings of Peter Abelard,* particularly with the heretical tendencies in his Sic et Non. The charge of heresy resulted from Abelard's insistence on applying reason or logic to the doctrine of the Trinity. How heretical this work was is not entirely clear, but it gave the impression that the Fathers of the Church were in great disagreement over important doctrines. The root of the problem lay in his insistence that unless we understand we cannot believe. The council forced him to retract his position, and ordered his book to be burned.

SOLAFIDIANISM. The doctrine that eternal salvation is had only through faith by grace in the work of Jesus Christ. This work of Christ is His obedience to the will of His Father and emptying or humbling of Himself. He died to reconcile man to God, overcoming sin, death, the devil, and hell as Victor and as the sacrifice and propitiation for all the sins of all men of all times, thereby obtaining the forgiveness of their sins. The acceptance and seal of this death by God is attested by Christ's resurrection and session. Justification of the sinner, therefore, is through faith, not as a work, but as a gift of God. Solafidianism opposes synergism in any form, whether it be Pelagianism* or Semi-Pelagianism* or any variations of these. It is not antinomian, but insists that good works are not necessary for salvation; they are the fruits of faith. The propounders of Solafidianism cite Scripture passages such as Galatians 2:16; 3:11; Ephesians 2:8; and Romans 4:5. Sola fide, "faith alone," was one of the principles of the Reformers of the sixteenth century, together with sola gratia, and sola Scriptura; sometimes the three are brought together into one phrase, solus Christus. CARL S. MEYER

SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT (1643). Drawn up by Alexander Henderson,* this was approved by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland and transmitted to the English Parliament for ratification. After slight changes, the English legislators publicly swore to maintain the provisions of the League, jointly signing it along with the members of the Westminster Assembly* of Divines. The document was for a religious alliance between England and Scotland, rather than either a military or civil agreement. It guaranteed the maintenance of the Reformed Church of Scotland (Presbyterian) and promised to reform the churches of England and Ireland according to the Scriptures and the examples of the "best Reformed churches," without identifying the latter. It also promised loyalty to both Parliament and Crown. Thus it prepared the way for the establishment of Presbyterianism in England and Ireland in place of the churches of England and Ireland as then constituted. As a consequence of its acceptance by the English Parliament, Scottish commissioners attended the Westminster Assembly, taking in it a prominent and influential part.

The reason for the signing of this bond of mutual agreement was that in the spring and summer of 1643, the parliamentary forces fighting Charles I were in serious difficulties. Thus Parliament wished to have the assistance of the effective Scottish army led by experienced soldiers such as the Leslie brothers. Some of the English leaders were opposed to the League, but had to agree for military reasons. Charles II later signed the League in 1650, but never kept it. W.S. REID

SOLOMON, ODES OF. A series of hymns, forty-two in number, preserved as a whole (Ode 2 is completely missing) only in Syriac, which version appends the eighteen Psalms of Solomon. Five are known in the Coptic Gnostic Pistis Sophia. One has recently come to light in Greek. Many scholars consider Greek the original language, others argue for Syriac origin. They were known only by reference until 1905, when J.R. Harris discovered them. They present in allusive language an early Syriac Christianity akin to John's gospel and Ignatius's letters, and with much common to the *Acts of Thomas. While most are general praises of God, with an emphasis upon mystical communion with Him, some more-developed theological themes are found: a Logos Christology akin to Jewish Wisdom thought; the notion of a miraculous birth, without pains of labor for His mother; the passion of Christ described with much reminiscence of the Psalms; the resurrection linked to the notion of the "harrowing of hell." The specific date and milieu of the Odes has not been determined with precision. Within the church a setting as baptismal hymns has been proposed, while recently a hinterground in the Jewish circles of Qumran has been investigated, but not certainly established. J.N. BIRDSALL

SOLOVIEV, VLADIMIR SERGEEVICH (1853-1900). Russian theologian and philosopher. The son of a Russian historian, he was graduated from the University of Moscow in 1873 and was appointed a fellow in the faculty of philosophy. After research in London and Egypt he returned to Moscow in 1876. In 1877 he moved to the University of St. Petersburg. Dostoevsky* and Leo Tolstoy* were among those present at his lectures on "Godmanhood." He was forced into retirement in 1881 after he advocated mercy for the assassins of Alexander II. He then devoted his life to his writings.

Soloviev was deeply influenced by German idealistic philosophy and Gnostic mysticism. The nucleus of his religious and philosophical system was his doctrine of Godmanhood, by which he meant the union of humanity and divinity through identification of man with Christ, the Incarnate Word. Included in this is the concept of "positive total unity," his synthesis of religion, philosophy, and science. His Sophiology which originated in his early mystical experiences is identified with Eternal Womanhood or Divine Wisdom. He advocated the reunion of the Eastern and Western churches and the establishment of a universal theocracy. Because of his connection with Rome, he is sometimes called "the Russian Newman." In 1896 he made his profession as a Byzantine rite Catholic. Among his works are Lectures Concerning Godmanhood (1878), The History and the Future of Theocracy (1886), La Russie et l'Église Universelle (1889), and Three Conversations (1899-1900).

SON OF MAN. The commonest title used by Jesus to refer to Himself. In the OT it is often found in Ezekiel as the name by which God calls the prophet. It is sometimes found as a parallel to "man" (e.g., Pss. 8:4; 80:17), and in Daniel 7 it has an apocalyptic significance. This last idea is expanded in the Similitudes of Enoch, where there is particular emphasis on his role in judgment. The term is found frequently in the gospels as a self-designation of Jesus. Outside the gospels it is found only in the NT, in Acts 7:56; Revelation 1:13; 14:14. This makes it clear that it was not a term in general use after the Resurrection, when clearer messianic and divine titles could be used. There can therefore be little doubt, despite the objection of some modern scholars, that it was a term used of Himself by Jesus during His ministry which has been faithfully retained by the Evangelists.

Recently there has been a good deal of discussion about the source and meaning of the term as it is used in the gospels. It is possible that the varied OT usage and that of Enoch had some influence. The meaning of the term seems to fall into three main categories. First, there are passages where the term is a periphrasis meaning simply "I" (Matt. 8:20; 11:19) or may possibly mean "man" (Mark 2:10,28). Secondly, there are those sayings which refer to the suffering and death of the Son of Man followed by the resurrection (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33f., etc.). This has been closely linked with the idea of Jesus as the suffering Servant of the Lord, and has sometimes been held to have something of a corporate significance, including the disciples with Jesus. Thirdly, there are references to the Son of Man as the exalted Lord who will come again in glory as judge of the world (Mark 8:38; 13:26; 14:62, etc.). In John the emphasis is on the Son of Man's being the ladder between heaven and earth (John 1:51), and His descending and ascending again (John 3:13f.; 6:62f.; 8:28). Paul's doctrine of the Second Adam (Rom. 5:12ff.; 1Cor. 15) may be linked with the idea of the Son of Man.

SOPHRONIUS, PATRIARCH (c.560-638). Patriarch of Jerusalem. Born in Damascus, he is probably to be identified with Sophronius "the Sophist." He was a monk in Egypt (c.580), then in the Jordan area, and from 619 in Theodosius Monastery, Jerusalem. He opposed the doctrinal compromise concocted by Emperor Heraclius, Cyrus of Alexandria, and Sergius I of Constantinople which endeavored to reconcile the Monophysites* by a Monothelite formula. When elected patriarch of Jerusalem (634), he issued the customary encyclical which included his own statement of faith, holding that the Chalcedonian doctrine of two natures necessarily implied two wills. Shortly after, Jerusalem was captured by the Saracens under Caliph Omar (637), hastening his death. He wrote sermons and poems, and lives of Cyrus and John, Alexandrian martyrs.

SOTO, DOMINIC DE (1494-1560). Spanish theologian. Born in Segovia, he was a sacristan before reading logic and philosophy at Alcalá and theology at Paris. He taught briefly, spent some time in a Benedictine abbey, then made his profession in the Dominican Order in Burgos (1525). After teaching for seven years in the house of studies in Segovia, he went to Salamanca (1532) to take his order's university chair in theology. Charles V, to whom he was later confessor, appointed him imperial theologian to the Council of Trent.* Refusing the see of Segovia, he was elected prior at Salamanca in 1550, and two years later took the first chair of theology there. His writings include De institia et iure (1556), Deliberatio in causa pauperum (1547), and commentaries on Romans (1550) and Aristotle (1544).

SOUL. Usage of this term in the history of the Christian Church has been affected by three main factors: the biblical data, particularly about man's creation in the image of God, and the resurrection of the body; dualistic philosophies, both ancient Greek and modern Cartesian and post-Cartesian versions; and, through Thomas Aquinas,* the influence of Aristotle.* "Soul" has thus often been a theory-laden term and even in popular usage has reflected the theories of metaphysics as well as the data of revelation.

According to Greek dualism—e.g., Plato's teaching in the Phaedo—the human person consists in an immortal soul, which has had preexistence, enclosed in a mortal body. This view is clearly incompatible with God's creation of man, "a living soul." Moreover, the influence of this Greek dualism has often had an unfortunate effect on Christian ethics—e.g., in the idea that man is a composite of "higher" and "lower" elements ("soul" and "body"), and hence that bodily activities and desires as such are unworthy of the true Christian (see MANICHAEISM). In Cartesian dualism the soul is an "incorporeal substance" located in a corporeal substance, the body. The chief philosophical difficulty is in accounting for an interaction between the two substances. Besides the philosophical difficulties there are other features of Cartesianism that are unwelcome from a Christian standpoint—e.g., the Cartesian idea of free will, and the view that the soul is in principle inaccessible to scientific investigation. Cartesian dualism has been heavily attacked in Gilbert Ryle's Concept of Mind (1949).

Aristotle's monistic view that the soul is the form of the body may come nearer to the biblical view in making intelligible the idea of bodily resurrection, but it seems to entail the noncontinuity of the individual as an individual after death, and before resurrection. The many conceptual problems in this area are partly due to the apparently untechnical and often opaque character of biblical terminology—e.g., Paul's phrase "a spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:44). Perhaps some of the difficulties can be at least minimized by thinking of "soul" and "body" not as names for two substances, but as referring to two levels at which the human person can be regarded.

SOUTER, ALEXANDER (1873-1949). Scottish NT and patristic scholar. Educated at Aberdeen and Cambridge universities (where he was respectively influenced by W.M. Ramsay and J.E.B. Mayor), Souter was Yates professor of NT Greek and exegesis at Mansfield College, Oxford (1903-11), then regius professor of humanity, Aberdeen University (1911-37). He is widely known for his trilogy of handbooks to the study of the Greek NT: the Oxford Greek Testament (1910; rev. ed., 1947), in which he provided a select apparatus criticus for the text presumed to underlie the Revised Version of 1881; The Text and Canon of the New Testament (1913; posthumous revision, 1954); and A Pocket Lexicon to the Greek New Testament (1916).

But his most important work was done in the study of the Latin Fathers, especially the commentators on the Pauline epistles—a field where two great interests, the Latin language and Paul, converged; cf. his Princeton Stone Lectures, The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (1927). Two outstanding achievements in this field were (1) his demonstration in A Study of Ambrosiaster (1905) that the author of the pseudo-Ambrosian commentaries on Paul (called "Ambrosiaster"* since Erasmus's time) was identical with the author of the pseudo-Augustinian Quaestiones Veteris et Noui Testamenti (which he edited for the Vienna Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, 1908), and (2) his recovery and publication of the original text of Pelagius's expositions of the Pauline epistles (2 vols., 1922, 1926; with the pseudo-Jerome interpolations, 1931). His Glossary of Later Latin to A.D. 600 (1949) presents the quintessence of over half a century's research in Latin lexicography.

SOUTH, ROBERT (1634-1716). Anglican clergyman. Born at Hackney, he was educated at Oxford, where in 1660 he became public orator. He accepted a royal chaplaincy, but declined further preferment. South's sermons are among the classics of English divinity. He himself prescribed clarity, simplicity, and fervor as the necessary ingredients of a good sermon. He was extremely conscious of his preaching mode and reacted against the differing extravagances both of the Puritans and of a man like Jeremy Taylor. His prose is fluent and skillfully modulated, and he has a penchant for memorable statement—a quality aided by his very ready, epigrammatic wit and his occasional acerbity. ARTHUR POLLARD

SOUTHCOTT, JOANNA (1750-1814). Self-styled prophet. Born in Devon, daughter of a farmer, she was naturally religious, albeit eccentric, from an early age. Originally an Anglican, she became a Methodist in 1791. In 1792 she began to write a book of prophecies, the first of over sixty publications all "equally incoherent in thought and grammar." In 1802, for a charge, she began to issue seals to the faithful, including one to Mary Bateman, the notorious murderess. In 1805 she had a chapel in London, and in 1813 announced that—though unmarried—she was to bear a child called "Shiloh." She died of unknown causes. She left a box which was to be opened only in the presence of twenty-four bishops. In 1927, when it was opened in the presence of one bishop, it was found to contain only trivia. Rival followers, some still believed extant, claimed that it was the wrong box and that the real one still awaited opening. PETER S. DAWES

SOUTHERN AFRICA. Although Roman Catholic missionaries entered Mozambique and E Rhodesia in the sixteenth century, the Dutch settlement at the Cape was more significant for the development of Christianity in Southern Africa. For over a century only the Dutch Reformed Church was permitted, and it remains the spiritual home of most Afrikaners. The evangelization of the indigenous Hottentots and imported slaves received little attention until the late eighteenth century when Dii. van Lier and Vos awakened missionary interest among the Dutch colonists. This led eventually to a strong Dutch Reformed Mission Church among the Cape Colored people. After 1857, missions to Africans were also undertaken.

The first missionary at the Cape was the Moravian, Georg Schmidt,* who returned to Europe in 1744 after seven frustrating years. The Moravians resumed operations in 1792, and their work at Genadendal won universal respect. In 1799 the London Missionary Society entered the field, first among the Hottentots and subsequently among the Griqua and Tswana outside the colony. The concern of its missionaries, notably J.T. Vanderkemp* and John Philip,* for the rights of indigenous people made the LMS highly unpopular with the colonists. Methodism arrived with British soldiers at Cape Town and British settlers on the Eastern Frontier, and spread among black and white throughout South Africa. Although Anglicanism had official status after the British occupation of the Cape in 1806, its development awaited the arrival of Robert Gray, first bishop of Cape Town, in 1848. Roman Catholicism became well established after the arrival of its first bishop in 1838; its expansion owed much to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate and other missionary orders.

A healthy climate and relatively safe conditions attracted numerous societies. They included the Glasgow Mission (Ciskei, 1821), the Rhenish Mission (Cape and South-West Africa, 1829), the Paris Evangelical Mission (Lesotho, 1834), the American Board (Natal, 1835), and the South Africa General Mission (1889). The Berlin Mission (Cape, 1834) and the Hermannsburg Mission (Natal, 1854) found their most important fields in the Transvaal, where continentals were preferred to "meddling Anglo-Saxons."

Church life. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the Afrikaner trekboer ("wandering stock farmer") led an isolated existence. The paterfamilias conducted family devotions and occasionally took his clan to the distant town for nagmaal ("Communion"). Conservative Calvinism was the norm, and theological liberalism received short shrift when it appeared in the 1860s. British settlers transplanted the religious patterns of the homeland. In Anglican circles the tension between High and Low Churchmen led to a rift between the predominant Church of the Province and the small conservative-evangelical Church of England in South Africa—a division which has persisted to this day.

Missionaries gave devoted service as evangelists, translators, educators, administrators, and friends of their people. Unfortunately they often passed on denominational rivalries and paid insufficient attention to the indigenization of Christianity. During the nineteenth century the mission station was central to missionary strategy. In the Cape Colony it gave the Hottentots an alternative to vagrancy and farm labor. Among the Africans it both stemmed from and emphasized the rift between Christian and tribal society. As an interim measure it was perhaps inevitable, but Christianity only took deep root in African society when the Church was carried outside the mission station by African evangelists. In course of time the major mission stations became important educational centers, with the Scots at Lovedale setting the pace. Elementary schools were established in most congregations, and Christianity became almost synonymous with education. Provincial governments gradually assumed financial responsibility, but relied upon missionary managers until the Bantu Education Act (1954) asserted full government control and applied apartheid to educational policy.

Church development. South African churches began to emerge during the nineteenth century. The British occupation severed the links of the Cape Dutch Reformed Church with Holland, and in 1843 it was freed from government control. Legal and political considerations led to the establishment of separate synods in Natal, the Orange Free State, and Transvaal, but a general synod was formed in 1963. This does not include the Hervormde and Gereformeerde (Dopper) churches which originated in the Transvaal.

In 1853 the LMS began to withdraw financial support from its missions in the Cape Colony. The independent Coloured congregations eventually joined white Congregationalists in the Congregational Union of South Africa (1877). The Church of the Province of South Africa was constituted in 1870 as an independent member of the Anglican Communion, and the Methodists formed a South African conference in 1883. These so-called English denominations were (and remain) multiracial. By contrast the Dutch Reformed Church has established daughter churches for the Cape Coloured, African, and Indian communities. During the twentieth century, many overseas missions have formed self-governing local churches, some of which have sought a federal or organic relationship with white coreligionists.

A significant feature of the past eighty years is the growth of an estimated 3,000 independent African churches. These range from orthodox denominations, like the Presbyterian Church of Africa, to nativistic sects in which Christian elements have merged with traditional beliefs and customs. The complex causes of this movement include the rejection of white control; the search for significance and status in a small, personalized group; and the reaction of unsophisticated people to detribalization and urbanization.

Ecumenical movement. The ecumenical movement has made limited progress. There have been several confessional unions, and the Anglican, Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches have set up a church unity commission. The general missionary conferences (1904-32) promoted understanding and fellowship. They made way for the Christian Council (now South Africa Council of Churches) which is growing in importance and enjoys some cooperation with the Roman Catholic Church. The Dutch Reformed Church has, however, withdrawn from ecumenical contact, largely for political reasons, while black activists question the reality and value of racial partnership in the church. Many theologically conservative groups regard ecumenism with suspicion.

Christianity and politics have always been interrelated in South Africa. The DRC played a major role in the development of Afrikaner nationalism and has given its blessing to apartheid. On the other hand, there is a long-standing tradition of missionary support for black interests, but its influence is severely limited by the apathy of white churchmen and the concentration of political power in white hands. The Christian response to the developing political situation in Southern Africa will be fundamental to the future standing of the church in this region.

Rhodesia. Attention was drawn to Central Africa by the travels and writings of David Livingstone.* The LMS established a mission at Inyati in 1859, but general Christian penetration of Rhodesia followed its occupation by the Chartered Company in 1890. The pattern of evangelism and education was similar to that which evolved in South Africa, and many of the missions involved were the same. The Christian Council of Rhodesia promotes common action, and several of its member churches, together with the Roman Catholic hierarchy, have confronted (1968-72) the Smith government on aspects of its racial policy. Many Rhodesian missions are still heavily dependent upon overseas assistance.

Malawi. The attempt of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa to enter Malawi in 1861 ended in disaster. Not so the Scottish missions, which arrived in 1875 and exercised widespread influence from their headquarters at Livingstonia (Free Church) and Blantyre (Church of Scotland). The Dutch Reformed Church also entered this field in 1896 and joined the Scots in the Church of Central Africa Presbyterians in 1926. The UMCA undertook work among Muslims in the 1890s.

Zambia. Zambia was entered from several directions. F. Coillard* came from Lesotho to found the Barotse Mission in 1886, closely followed by the Primitive Methodists. The LMS entered Bembaland from Tanganyika; the Presbyterians, Dutch Reformed, and Anglicans came from Malawi; and the Wesleyan Methodists from Rhodesia. The development of the Copper Belt after 1925 led to the spontaneous formation of an African Union Church, and to united action by several missions. In 1965 the United Church of Zambia brought together churches in the Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian traditions, but it did not embrace considerable bodies such as the Plymouth Brethren, Reformed, and Anglicans.

In the 1920s and 1930s the government suppressed nativistic prophet movements which were blamed, perhaps unduly, upon the Watchtower Movement which has a large following. Another nativistic movement, the Lumpa Church of Alice Lenshina, was involved in violent conflict with the Zambian government after independence.

Mozambique. The sixteenth-century Roman Catholic mission faded away. During the late nineteenth century, work was resumed throughout Central Africa under the control of the White Fathers* and, in Rhodesia, the Jesuits. In Portuguese East Africa the missionaries had the support of a Catholic government which restricted Protestant missions, of which the most important were the Swiss Mission and the American Methodists. Since Vatican Council II, Roman Catholic pressure on Protestants had eased, and the White Fathers have recently clashed with the government on political issues.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. The largest non-Roman Catholic religious body in America. It is a voluntary organization of Baptist churches contributing financially to the programs of its various agencies. According to the constitution of the SBC, its purpose is to organize Baptist churches "... for promotion of Christian missions at home and abroad and any other objects such as Christian education, benevolent enterprises, and social services which it may deem proper and advisable for the furtherance of the kingdom of God." The Convention neither claims nor exercises authority over any other Baptist body, whether local church, association, or state organization.

Baptists in the southern USA trace their origins to New England, and the Southern Baptist Convention to the older nationwide Triennial Convention. Baptists became the largest denomination in the South largely because of the great revival of 1755-75 and the work of Shubal Stearns (d.1784), a man of remarkable natural gifts and a profound sense of mission. A spinoff of the Great Awakening in New England, under Stearns's able leadership Baptist missionaries won thousands of people to Christ on the southern frontier in this period. In 1814 the Baptist churches of the South joined with those of other parts of the country to form the Triennial Convention, a nationwide Baptist fellowship organized to promote missions, education, and youth work.

However, the Triennial Convention faltered in the pre-Civil War period and the southern churches withdrew to form their own organization. Three factors led to this breakdown of national Baptist life. First, there was a basic difference between North and South over the associational principle, Southerners tending to place more emphasis on the role of the association. Second, many Baptist leaders in the South objected to the neglect of their region by the Baptist Home Mission Society, one of the agencies of the Triennial Convention. Third, foremost, and the precipitating cause of the split was the question of slavery. This divisive problem cut deep into American life because it was at once a political, economic, social, moral, and religious issue. When Baptist abolitionists insisted that slaveowners be ineligible to serve as missionaries, and some Northerners even suggested that their brethren in the South withdraw from the Triennial Convention, Southern Baptists met in Augusta, Georgia, in May 1845 to discuss the matter. Churches from eight states and the District of Columbia sent 293 representatives who voted to form the new Southern Baptist Convention.

The growth of the fledgling SBC was slow but steady in the period 1845-61. However, it suffered badly as a result of the Civil War (1861-65) and the subsequent withdrawal of its black members to form Negro Baptist churches. In the latter half of the nineteenth century it also was rent by quarrels between antimissionary Calvinists and evangelistically oriented general Baptists (the latter won), and between Landmark exclusivists and ecclesiastically unstructured elements (which was indecisive). In the early twentieth century the Convention emerged from these disputations strongly committed to evangelism and largely untouched by the Fundamentalist–Modernist controversy then raging in most of the other major denominations. Through it all, the SBC grew from 4,126 churches with 351,951 members in 9 states in 1845, to 34,441 churches with 11,826,463 members in all 50 states in 1971.

Southern Baptists hold the same basic beliefs as most other Baptist groups throughout the world: (1) the Bible as the sole norm for faith and practice in the Christian life; (2) a regenerate church membership safeguarded by baptism of believers only, and that by immersion; (3) autonomous local churches with Christ as the Head and democratic polity; and (4) religious liberty buttressed by the institutional separation of church and state. Above all, Southern Baptists are known as "people of the Book," meaning the Bible. Although rejecting binding creedal statements, messengers to the 1925 meeting of the SBC adopted a general confession known as "The Baptist Faith and Message" intended as a consensus document "for the general instruction and guidance of our own people" but "having no authority over the conscience." Individual Southern Baptists have the reputation of being devout, aggressively evangelistic, relatively strict Christians whose lives are oriented about the Bible and the fellowship of the local church.

The main features of Southern Baptist life include a heavy emphasis on evangelism and missions, a tradition of ministry to the common people, and a deep independent streak. The SBC's interest in evangelism is reflected in its steady growth and missions expenditures of $160,546,250 in 1971. Southern Baptists also claim a long tradition of eloquent evangelistic preachers, which includes more recently George W. Truett (d.1944), Robert G. Lee (b.1886), W.A. Criswell (b.1909), and Billy Graham* (b.1918). Further, many frontier observers recorded of the Baptist minister that "the common people heard him gladly." This is still largely true of the SBC, although there is some evidence of increasing class consciousness and a growing ecclesiastical inferiority complex in a few of the more affluent churches in the South. As far as independence is concerned, any annual gathering of the Convention clearly demonstrates that it is one of Southern Baptists' most cherished prerogatives.

In addition to normal growing pains, a number of serious problems face today's Southern Baptist Convention including how to deal with Landmarkism (especially the issues of "open Communion" and alien immersion); how to fulfill its new role as a national rather than a regional organization; how to decentralize its national agencies in accordance with historic Baptist principles without destroying their effectiveness or their contributions to Southern Baptist life; and how to shift from a fundamentally rural-oriented to a basically urban-oriented strategy for preaching the Gospel.

The Convention accomplishes its work through its Executive Committee, four general boards (Foreign Mission, Home Mission, Sunday School, and Annuity), six seminaries, seven commissions (American Baptist Seminary, Brotherhood, Christian Life, Education, Historical, Radio and Television, and Stewardship), two standing committees (Denominational Calendar and Public Affairs), and three associated organizations (Women's Missionary Union, Baptist World Alliance, and American Bible Society). Along with a number of other Baptist bodies, it also supports the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs, Washington, D.C., which acts as both a watchdog and an informational clearinghouse for political matters of concern to Baptists.

SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE. Established by Martin Luther King* in 1957 to coordinate local nonviolent, direct-action movements emerging in the South, its goals are to win "full citizenship rights," including equality and integration of black people in American life. The SCLC's methods have combined the use of Ghandian nonviolent resistance and of the ballot box. Hence it encouraged not only voter-registration projects, but also mass demonstrations and civil disobedience. It also provides services to help black people obtain their rights. Despite its successes, it has been thwarted by the increasing decline of youthful support, primarily because of the alleged ineffectiveness of nonviolence, and the assassination of its founder (April 1968). The latter was succeeded as leader by Ralph D. Abernathy. DARREL BIGHAM

SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF. The result of a union of three churches effected 27 September 1947; noteworthy for being the first-ever union of episcopal and nonepiscopal bodies. The uniting churches were: the Anglican dioceses of Madras, Tinnevelly, Travancore and Cochin, and Dornakal (dioceses of the Church of India, Burma, and Ceylon); the South India province of the Methodist Church; and the South India United Church, which was originally formed by a union of Presbyterians and Congregationalists in 1908. The Church of South India had at its inauguration fourteen dioceses, of which one (Jaffna) was in Ceylon.

Negotiations toward union are generally reckoned to have begun at the 1919 Tranquebar Conference of Indian ministers from the Anglican and the South India United churches. Their published manifesto stressed that the existence of episcopacy in a united church need not call into question the "spiritual equality" of all members, nor imply any particular theory or doctrine about episcopacy. It was also proposed that a special service of "commissioning" by the laying on of hands by the bishops of the united church should give to each minister authority to officiate throughout the united church. An official joint committee of the two churches was appointed. Approaches were made to the Methodists, and they joined the committee in 1925. Then at Trichinopoly in 1926 the Anglicans suggested dropping "mutual commissioning," and the adopting of an "interim period" of the ministries growing together in a common episcopal frame. On this basis the first draft of a Scheme of Union was published in 1929.

From then until the seventh and final edition of the scheme in 1941, most interest and controversy centered upon the nature of the "interim period." Lambeth 1930 (see LAMBETH CONFERENCES) had given a cautious encouragement to the proposal, but in the latter stages the scheme provided that the thirty years' interim period would be terminated not by an exclusive rule requiring all ministers to be episcopally ordained, but by a review of the regulations which would not bind the united church to any particular course of action. This led to growing Anglo-Catholic opposition in England in the late 1930s and early 1940s, and in South India to a reconsideration of the old idea of "mutual commissioning." However, the four Anglican bishops in the area rescued the concept which had been in every draft of the scheme by announcing in 1946 that after union they would each without hesitation receive Communion from ministers not episcopally ordained. This was the breakthrough; the new church was inaugurated in 1947.

Anglo-Catholic hostility to the union continued; one Anglican society cut off all official grants to South India. In the Nandyal area, moreover, twenty Anglican clergy, with some 25,000 laity, refused to join the union and remained part of the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon (ultimately joining the North India union in 1970). Lambeth 1948 reflected some of the suspicion from Catholic sources, and withheld approval. It and the succeeding Lambeth both recommended other areas to unite on the basis of "mutual commissioning" rather than by the South India procedure. Provinces of the Anglican Communion would not enter full communion with South India, as this would have involved accepting nonepiscopal ministers in principle in their own ministerial ranks.

In 1968, however, the Lambeth Conference and the Church of England Commission on Intercommunion (in its report Intercommunion Today) both recommended by majority votes that churches of the Anglican Communion should reexamine their relationship with the Church of South India with a view to entering full communion with it. Various churches and provinces have indicated their desire to do so, but none at the time of writing has altered its rule as to episcopal ordination.

The Church of South India now comprises roughly a million members with nearly a thousand presbyters. It has developed its own liturgical forms, and the South India Eucharistic Liturgy (1950) pioneered trends which have had an effect throughout the world. The church has striven to be free of dependence upon money from abroad, and has worked at being a genuinely Indian church. It has a small missionary work of its own in Thailand. It has also been engaged in far-reaching, further conversations with the Lutheran churches in South India and has always viewed its own unity as only partial, a challenge to continue a movement started as far back as 1908. It has made an international impact far greater than its size might be thought to warrant, both because its scheme of union has become a departure point in drafting elsewhere (e.g., the abortive Nigeria scheme wherein three drafts from 1957 to 1963 repeated the South India scheme verbatim for a very large part of its contents), and also because it has nurtured ecclesiastical statesmen like Bishop Lesslie Newbigin and, indirectly, Bishop Stephen Neill.

SOUTH SEAS. Christianity in this area began with Jesuit missionaries to the Marianas (1668-1769). There are tantalizing hints of Catholic influence in the Marquesas, Hawaii, and parts of Melanesia before rapid expansion of European contacts in the nineteenth century. Protestant missions began with the London Missionary Society in Tahiti and Tonga in 1797, at a time when many Polynesians were dissatisfied with traditional social and religious patterns and willing to undergo major changes to take advantage of the new horizons opened by Europeans. In Hawaii, Kamehameha I (1735-1819) made important political changes, and his wife Kaahumanu and son Liholiho overthrew traditional religion before American missionaries were admitted on trial (1820) after careful consultation with Tahitians about their experience. The Gilbertese similarly rejected their traditional culture for literacy and Christianity in 1868-69.

Enormous variety in language and culture, especially in Melanesia, made evangelism unusually difficult, and missionaries' attempts at individual conversion initially bore little fruit. Alongside considerable aversion to missionary teaching, difficulty of translating Christian concepts like sin often led to serious misunderstanding. When conversions came, they were often linked with the political aims of chiefs like Pomare II of Tahiti (c.1782-1821) and Cakobau of Fiji (1817-80), plus a desire for literacy as a key to European wealth, as in the Cook Islands (1821) or Samoa (1830). The resulting tribal movements created serious problems of education and pastoral care, and few missionaries realized the extent to which islanders were accepting Christianity on their own terms. On Tanna, European goods were obtained through the Queensland labor trade, and missionary preaching had no effect from 1842 till 1904, when the labor trade had ceased.

Early missionaries were often unprepared for island life. Of the ten pioneer artisans landed in Tonga, three were killed, one went native, and the remainder thankfully escaped to Australia. Deep dedication and a growing stock of experience led to an increasingly important religious impact. Allied with Islander readiness to travel for the Gospel, just as their ancestors had traveled for trade and war, this led to remarkable indigenous missionary effort, without parallel elsewhere in the nineteenth century. Great missionaries like J. Williams* (1796-1839) helped to inspire the pattern by leaving eight Tahitian teachers in Samoa (1830), but Tongans arrived in Fiji independently about 1823. Others reached parts of the New Hebrides by 1842 and the Loyalty Islands by 1841, thirteen years before European missionaries. Ta'unga from Rarotonga worked in New Caledonia and left a striking journal. Work in Melanesia was much more difficult because of language barriers and hostility to strangers, but pioneer evangelists like Soga and Marsden Manekalea laid the foundations of the church on Ysobel, and in 1925 Ini Kopuria founded an important missionary order—the Melanesian Brotherhood.

Protestant rivalries were sometimes sharp, but implicit or explicit comity agreements frequently led to Christian "kingdoms" like Tahiti and Tonga where missionaries exercised a considerable political role strikingly in contrast with their free church backgrounds. Their wishes to exclude undesirable European influences foundered on the resistance of traders and a combination of French imperialism and Roman Catholic missionary zeal (partly focused by P. Dillon, 1785-1847) which led to the annexation of Tahiti (1843) and New Caledonia (1853). Oceania was divided initially between the Picpus Fathers and the Marists, and though both were as anxious to convert Protestants as heathens, notable pioneering was done by P.M. Bataillon (1810-77) on Wallis and Futuna, which led to their conversion by 1849. Islanders utilized sectarianism to their own advantage, as in Fiji (1844), and by the end of the nineteenth century there were few groups without strong Catholic communities, organized in apostolic vicariates. The South Seas Evangelical Mission (1904) has also been used within the context of traditional tribal rivalries.

German annexation of Papua (1885) introduced yet another major denominational pattern into the Pacific. Although Australia assumed control of German territories in 1914, the work of the Neuendetteslau and Rhenish Missions (1886 and 1887) has resulted in a good-sized and well-organized Evangelical Lutheran Church, responsible since 1956 for its own affairs. The work of C. Keysser (1877-1961) and the success of his "tribal conversion" methods have profoundly affected missions on this huge island, where the Dutch began work in 1861, the London Missionary Society in 1871 with men like J. Chalmers,* S.M. McFarlane (1837-1911), and W.G. Lawes (1859-1907), not to mention Ruatoka of Mangaia and numerous other Polynesian pastors. Marists followed in 1885, Anglicans in 1891, Seventh-Day Adventists in 1914, and the Unevangelized Fields Mission in 1932, with expansion inland carefully controlled by the Australian government in order to ensure as far as possible missionaries' safety.

By the end of the nineteenth century a number of strong churches had emerged, and missionaries played a vital part in lessening the disastrous effects of European diseases, the labor traffic, and the brutal exploitation of some traders. Depopulation was heavy. In 1875, some 30,000–40,000 died from measles in Fiji alone, and in Hawaii population fell from c.300,000 in 1775 to 30,000 in 1900. Combined with the end of the labor trade and the needs of planters for workers, it led to the introduction of Asians, with particularly serious results in Fiji, where Indians now outnumber Fijians.

The relation of Christianity to traditional culture is still an unsolved problem, and in Melanesia has led to a number of movements with affinities to African independent churches. The Valaila Madness (1919), John Frum (1941 on), Marching Rule (1940s), and Federal Council (1951) are the most notable examples, and the administration and churches alike have found them very difficult to handle. The latter are still largely dominated by Europeans despite valiant official attempts at devolution of responsibility in line with developments elsewhere since 1945. In the Anglican diocese of Melanesia, for instance, local suffragan bishops were elected as late as 1963 and a house of laity was only introduced in 1958. The development of political independence in Western Samoa (1962), the Book Islands (1965), Nauru (1968), Fiji (1971); rapid moves toward responsible government in Papua-New Guinea and the Solomon Islands; and some devolution of responsibility in French territories have already had profound effects on the churches because of the unusually important place that they have in the community.

Migration and urbanization have already created serious social problems, and the development of secondary and tertiary education has necessitated radical changes in theological education inter-island and ecumenical cooperation, symbolized by Pacific Theological College in Suva (1966) and the Melanesian Council of Churches (1946), the Pacific Conference of Churches (1966), and the United Church of Papua-New Guinea and the Solomons (1968). Substantial pockets of paganism still exist in Melanesia and many village Christians are ill-equipped for dealing with their new political responsibilities. Most island economics cannot support welfare policies and rising economic expectations without substantial external aid, and few churches are as well placed as Lutherans where extensive plantations help to finance schools and hospitals.

European Christianity has helped to end cannibalism and tribal warfare, contributed some new economic skills, and significantly influenced family life, but the process has not been one-way colonialism. In many areas Christianity has been closely integrated into Island societies on local terms, and Christians can face their future with an enviable sense of community.

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT (c.1561-1595). Roman Catholic poet. Born in Norfolk, he was educated at Douai, Paris, and Rome. He became a Jesuit and returned to England in 1586 as chaplain to the countess of Arundel. He was arrested in 1592 and executed three years later. His prose works include St Mary Magdelene's Tears, A Short Rule of Good Life, and The Triumphs over Death, but it is as a poet that he is now remembered, if at all. Even here he lives largely by a single poem, "The Burning Babe," which manifests early Metaphysical characteristics, tinged with that exotic sensuality that one associates with his fellow-Catholic Metaphysical, Crashaw. There is a note of intense adoration in his writing, which goes not unaptly with his daring comparisons that remind us of the poetic manner in which he was an early participant. ARTHUR POLLARD

SOWERBY, LEO (1895-1968). American composer. While his output of music has included orchestral and organ works, his name is inevitably connected with music for the church. He served much of his life as an Episcopal church organist and choirmaster, particularly at St. James' Church, Chicago. He might well be considered the leading figure in American church music at midcentury. In 1946 he was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for his Canticle of the Sun. His Passiontide cantata, "Forsaken of Man" (1940), is one of the finest works of its kind in recent years. Many of his anthems are on an ambitious scale, but he has also written a number of pieces of moderate difficulty and less pronounced modernity, such as "Love came down at Christmas." He served prominently on the Hymnal Commission of the Episcopal Church and on the Joint Commission on Church Music. At the end of his life he was active in the school of church music associated with the cathedral in Washington, D.C.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

SOZOMEN (Salaminius Hermias Sozomenus) (fifth century). Church historian. A lawyer at Constantinople, but originally from Bethelia near Gaza in Palestine, he is named most commonly in the trilogy with Socrates and Theodoret as continuator of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, which as the Tripartite History was translated into late sixth-century Latin traditionally by Cassiodorus, perhaps by Epiphanius under the former's inspiration. Sozomen has been assumed to be the least independent of these initiating histories of the Christian Roman Empire, for large sections share directly without reference the parallel Socrates. Both have a concern to report the growth of monasticism as created by Christian Egypt. Yet he may have intended to revamp Socrates with fuller details both of the Western Empire and Church and of the Eastern Persian front with its Christian martyrs. The work in nine books specifies that it covered the period from the third consulate of the Caesars, Crispus and Constantine (324), to the seventeenth of Theodosius II (439), to whom it is dedicated before his death in 450. The conclusion is now missing, as is Sozomen's earlier epitome in two books of church history from the Ascension to the defeat of Licinius (323).

SPACE EXPLORATION. The idea of space exploration can be traced back at least to the second century A.D. when the Greek satirist, Lucian, described an imaginary lunar voyage. Others have described space travel in fiction. In modern times the theoretical basis of space navigation was developed by R.H. Goddard in America, H.J. Oberth in Germany, and K.E. Tsiolkovsky in Russia. After World War II the early work on rockets carried out in Germany was continued in the USA and the USSR. In 1961 Yuri Gagarin was the first man in space, and the Russians triumphantly announced that he found no sign of God in the sky. In 1969, when Americans were the first men on the moon, Neil Armstrong and Edwin Aldrin read the Bible back to earth and partook together of the Lord's Supper on the surface of the moon. Space exploration and its kindred developments inevitably raise some questions of Christian concern: (1) Do they merit expenditure of so much money and resources when there is so much need on earth? (2) Do they bring nearer the concept of the superstate as prophesied (cf. Rev. 13, assuming the futurist interpretation)? (3) Has God made other intelligent creatures? Are they sinful? If so, by what means does He redeem them, since Christ died once only for sin? These questions are, of course, unanswerable in view of our ignorance. Man is beginning to realize, nevertheless, how vast is God's universe—so vast as to suggest that man's extraterrestrial investigation is circumscribed in God's comprehensive plan.

SPAIN. According to tradition, Spain first received Christianity from St. Paul and St. James. Certainly by the third century, as Tertullian averred, a flourishing national church was in existence and a council was held at Elvira* in A.D. 300. The country was adversely affected by various heresies, and in the fifth century the Arian Visigoths overran the land, but their successors at the Third Council of Toledo* (589) accepted the Catholic faith. From 711 onward the country was taken over by the Muslim Moors who were at last checked by Charles Martel at Tours in 732. The Christian Church was now persecuted, but a reconquest was begun c.1000 and was finally completed with the absorption of Granada in 1492 and the union of the kingdoms of Aragon and Castile in 1494. Throughout this period French influence became everywhere predominant, the new religious orders arrived, and the ancient Spanish Mozarabic liturgy which had always been unpopular with the popes was suppressed.

In 1479 also the Inquisition* was introduced into Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella, the two "Catholic" monarchs, and a studied persecution of Marranos and Moriscos (Jews and Muslims) was begun; of the former alone 350,000 were accused of heresy, and 12,000 burnt. The Reformed faith was treated similarly, and in the sixteenth century —the age of Spain's greatest prosperity and expanding imperial power—the native church became the pope's most faithful ally against both France and England, and largely helped to shape the Counter-Reformation. St. Teresa,* St. John of the Cross,* and Ignatius Loyola* were notable figures of this period. Soon, however, Spanish power began to decline, the church during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries became hopelessly intolerant and corrupt, and even drastic measures such as Charles III's expulsion of the Jesuits (1767) failed to halt the decline.

With the French occupation of Spain (1808) political liberalism and anticlericalism were introduced into the country, and these new forces confronted traditionalism in church and state and led to a century-and-a-half of civil strife. Socialism, anarchism, and various regional nationalisms latterly added weight to the forces of disruption. The Civil War of 1936-39 resulted in a victory for the Nationalists and the restoration of the Catholic Church, which had suffered severely during the period of the Republic (1931-36). Church and state were at one again, and a notable concordat was concluded in 1953, but of recent years individual church leaders have taken a more critical view of the Franco regime.

The Spanish Church today is divided into nine archbishoprics and sixty-one bishoprics. The secular clergy probably total 30,000 and the religious 45,000. Though Spain is regarded as the most devout of nations, probably only about 20 per cent of her people are practicing Catholics, while anticlericalism is widespread. The principal features of church life include an exaggerated cult of the Virgin Mary unparalleled elsewhere, the prominence of miracle-working relics, and elaborate and semi-pagan processions and pilgrimages connected especially with Holy Week.

Protestantism in Spain began with various pre-Reformation movements, especially those connected with Raymond Lull,* the thirteenth-century missionary to the Muslims; Alfonso de Madrigal, the expositor; and Pedro de Osuma, often called "the Spanish Hus." No doubt the sixteenth-century Reformation would have taken firmer root on Spanish soil but for the vigorous, if partial, reform of the church carried out by Jiménes de Cisneros* at the turn of the century consequent on the union of the Peninsular states. As it was, Protestantism made its appeal almost entirely to the privileged and educated classes and was confined to isolated families and individuals. Particularly noteworthy are Francisco de Enzinas, who translated the NT into Spanish and was for a time professor of Greek at Cambridge; Juan de Valdés,* who maintained his Protestant witness from Italy; Rodrigo de Valder, the "Spanish Wycliffe," who preached openly in Seville till he was imprisoned for life; and Archbishop Carranza of Toledo, primate of Spain who died after great suffering in 1576. No separatist churches were formed, however, and after 1530 the Inquisition vigorously suppressed all Reformed teaching; the first *auto-da-fé was held in 1559.

The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a time of intellectual torpor and extreme social conservatism, saw the Reformed faith firmly excluded from Spanish soil. Not till the nineteenth century did Protestantism make a significant return to the country: in 1832 William Rule was preaching there, and in 1837 George Borrow,* as an agent of the International Bible Society, embarked on those adventures which he later described in The Bible in Spain. After the republican revolution of 1868, Protestantism could enter the country more freely, American, English, Irish, Swiss, and Swedish missionaries of various denominations being prominent in the field. Slowly native Spanish churches were built up: the Episcopal Reformed Church of Spain—whose first bishop was consecrated by three prelates of the Church of Ireland (to the anger of British High Churchmen) in 1894—which remains small, has recently developed liturgical interests and claims to preserve the native Mozarabic Rite in its purest form; the Spanish Evangelical Church (Congregational/Presbyterian and American in origin); the Baptists; and the Brethren.

With the revolution of 1931, Protestant activities could proceed unimpeded: churches were opened as well as schools, including El Porvenir, reputed to be the finest secondary school in Spain. The Nationalists, however, denounced the Protestants as being abettors of Republicanism, and after 1939 persecution began again. Only slowly has the position of this despised minority been improved, though evangelism and theological education have both been less restricted since the promulgation of the Organic Law of the State (1966). Even so, disabilities still attach to Protestants, in regard to marriages and burials, professional advancement, the printing and distribution of literature, and the position of the young Protestant conscript. In recent years Pentecostalism has been spreading to Spain in a manner not unlike its progress in the former Spanish American colonies. The total Protestant community in Spain is now about 43,000, which means that it has doubled during the last forty years.

SPALATIN, GEORGE (1482-1545). German Reformer. Born "George Burkhard" at Spalt near Nuremberg, Spalatin (his Latinized name) attended the universities of Erfurt and Wittenberg. In 1505 he entered St. George's Monastery in Erfurt. In 1508 he became tutor to the future elector of Saxony, John Frederick. He served also as adviser and secretary to the elector Frederick the Wise. In 1525 he was made pastor at Altenburg, but continued to serve Elector John the Constant and John Frederick the Magnanimous. He was one of the earliest of Martin Luther's friends and promoters of this movement and greatly influenced Frederick the Wise in his tolerant and protective stance toward the Reformer. He carried on a voluminous correspondence throughout his active lifetime, only partially published. He outstandingly contributed to the promotion of education as a member of various church visitations. He helped to establish schools and libraries, actively trained pastors in pastoral theology, and helped in the training of young people. Spalatin's friendship for Luther during the last thirty years of his life (especially during the crucial years between 1517 and 1521) was of great significance in the work of Martin Luther.

CARL S. MEYER

SPANGENBERG, AUGUST GOTTLIEB (1704-1792). Moravian missionary and church leader. Son of a Hanoverian court preacher, he first studied law and then theology and finally became a teacher in Halle. When he joined the Herrnhut* community in 1732, Zinzendorf* assigned him to conduct legal negotiations with various European colonial powers for permission to establish mission works abroad. He took personal charge of the Moravian group that settled in Georgia in 1735, and greeted and advised John Wesley who arrived there in February 1736. The next month, Spangenberg joined the Schwenkfelder colony in Pennsylvania as a simple farmer, and within a short time was preaching to the Indians. In 1744 he was placed in charge of the Moravian work in America and devoted himself intensely to Indian missions. Appointed Zinzendorf's successor in 1760, he returned to Herrnhut two years later and led the group until his death.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

SPEER, ROBERT ELLIOTT (1867-1947). Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, a post he held for forty-six years. Born in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania, he was one of the early Student Volunteers and traveled for a year for the movement. After becoming mission secretary, he made six extended visits to the fields, four to Asia and two to Latin America. A prolific writer, he authored sixty-seven books, many on missions. During World War I he was on the advisory committee on religious and moral activities of the army and navy, and was chairman of the General Wartime Committee of Churches. He chaired the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America from its inception until his retirement in 1937. He served as president of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, as well as one term as president of the Federal Council of Churches. In 1927 he became the second layman to be elected moderator in the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

HAROLD R. COOK

SPENCER, JOHN (1630-1693). Hebraist. Born in Kent, he was educated at King's School, Canterbury, then entered Corpus Christi College, Cambridge (1645), where he remained for the rest of his life. He was master of the college from 1667 until his death. In his De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685) he compared the laws and rites of the Jews with those of other Semitic nations, thus laying the foundations of comparative religion. His work was little heeded in his day, but was continued by Wellhausen and others of the Tübingen School* two centuries later.

SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB (1635-1705). German Lutheran Pietist leader. Born in Rappoltsweiler, Alsace, and raised in a highly protective and deeply religious atmosphere (characterized by a mixture of Puritanism and Arndtian Pietistic mysticism), he studied theology at Strasbourg in 1651-59 under the strict Lutheran J.K. Dannhauer. During academic wanderings in 1659-62 to Basle, Geneva, Stuttgart, and Tübingen he came into contact with Reformed theology and Jean de Labadie, who preached repentance and regeneration. In 1663 he became a free preacher at Strasbourg, received a doctorate in theology in 1664, and served as pastor and senior of the ministerium in Frankfurt am Main (1666-85), where he emerged as the leader of the Pietist Movement. He was appointed court chaplain at Dresden in 1686, but his relations with the Saxon ruling family soon became strained, and in 1691 he accepted the invitation of the elector of Brandenburg to the pastorate of St. Nicholas Church in Berlin.

At Frankfurt he reformed religious instruction by preaching on whole books of the Bible, restoring the confirmation service, and setting aside days of fasting and prayer. He proclaimed the necessity of conversion and holy living, and in 1670 set up a conventicle (collegia pietatis) within the church where pastors and laymen met to study the Bible and pray together for mutual edification. He saw such conventicles as ecclesiolae in ecclesia which would aid the pastor in his spiritual duties and return the church to the spiritual level of the of the early Christian communities. Modeled upon similar bodies among the Reformed, the institution spread throughout Lutheran areas. In the tract Pia Desideria (Pious Desires), published in 1675 as a preface to Johann Arndt's* True Christianity, Spener set forth the essence of his Pietistic doctrines—the central importance of Bible study, restoration of the priesthood of all believers, true faith expressed not in knowing but in deeds of love to one's neighbor, avoidance of theological disputation, emphasis upon spiritual life and devotional literature in the training of ministers, and preaching that should awaken in the hearers faith and its fruits.

As Spener's popularity spread, he became an increasingly controversial figure and his disciples were even expelled from Leipzig in 1690. Although little of his teaching was original (most had been expressed by Arndtian and Reformed Pietists before), his emphasis upon the new birth and exemplary life effectively undermined the position of scholastic orthodoxy and revitalized German Lutheranism.

SPEYER, DIETS OF. Speyer (Spires) on the Rhine in Bavaria was host to four meetings of the Diet, or parliament, of the Holy Roman Empire during the Reformation period. In each case religious and politico-military considerations became intertwined. Emperor Charles V wanted support of the princes of Germany in his struggle against the Frankish-Ottoman alliance, and he wanted suppression of Lutheranism as required by the Edict of Worms. Some leading princes (e.g., Frederick of Saxony) would not grant both, however. As Lutherans, they demanded relaxation of religious suppression as a price for military support. Some Catholic princes supported the Lutherans because they wanted a greater degree of freedom from imperial control. So at Speyer in 1526 the emperor was forced to accept the resolution of the diet: "Each one [prince] is to rule and act as he hopes to answer to God and his Imperial majesty." This opened the way for the spread of Lutheranism.

In 1529 Charles felt strong enough to demand that the diet of that year rescind the 1526 decision and ordered the rulers of Germany to enforce the Edict of Worms. Most complied but several, joined by fourteen free cities, drew up a strong protest to the emperor. Signatories came to be known as "Protestants," and all who eventually left the Catholic Church were given the same name. The military situation continued to be grave, and Charles needed the aid of Lutheran princes. At the third diet of Speyer in 1542, to get help against the Turks, and at the fourth in 1544, to get help against the French, he made concessions. Though he later tried to crush the Protestants by military force, he ultimately had to grant recognition to Lutheranism at the Peace of Augsburg* in 1555. HOWARD F. VOS

SPINOZA, BENEDICT (or "Baruch") DE (1632-1677). One of the foremost Rationalist philosophers. A Jew, he was expelled from the synagogue in 1656 for his unorthodox views. Most of his life was spent in Amsterdam, where he earned his living as a lens-grinder. Spinoza was an independent, original thinker whose work is difficult to interpret because of its self-contained character. Fundamental is the view that truth is formed of a system of interconnected deducible propositions. In his Ethics, geometrical-type reasoning was meant to lead to substantive ethical conclusions. This is only remotely plausible given Spinoza's rationalistic account of logical relations, and his failure to distinguish logical connections from causal connections.

Spinoza's view that there could only be one infinite substance entails pantheism, for any creation over against a creator would involve a limitation of the creator. With no concept of divine transcendence there can be no place for the idea of divine purpose; God's creativity is understood by Spinoza as nature's activity. Finite minds are modes of God's thought, bodies modes of God's extension. Spinoza has variously been described as a religious "God-intoxicated" thinker, and as irreligious, according to which side of the God-Nature equation has been stressed. His view that the Bible is written in the manner of unreflective irrational man was, historically, influential in the growth of rationalistic criticism of Scripture.

SPIRITISM. "Spiritism" and "Spiritualism" are terms, often used interchangeably, referring to the belief in communication between the living and the living spirits of the dead. History records periodic surges of interest in the spirit phenomenon, but as an organized religion it began at Hydesville, New York, in 1848. John D. Fox and his wife traced strange, tapping sounds in their home to the room of their teenage daughters, Margaret and Katie. After the continued experience of this and bedclothes pulled off the bed by invisible hands and chairs and tables removed from their places, the two girls devised a means of intelligent communication with the author of the noises, who would reply to questions with a number of raps. This widely advertised event set off a Spiritism revival in the United States that soon spread to England and Europe.

The breakdown of faith in the traditional, authoritarian doctrine in religion by the scientific revolution in the nineteenth century gave Spiritism an added boost. The number of adherents to the new faith grew rapidly, and at its heights the movement claimed over 10 million followers. Among the distinguished converts were Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Oliver Lodge, and Alfred R. Wallace. Probably one of the most famous of the mediums was D.D. Home (1833-86), whose amazing feats and manifestations in the presence of leading scientists still stand without plausible explanation.

The Spiritism Movement produced many spirit-oriented phenomena: table-tipping, playing on musical instruments, levitation of various objects and even of the medium, appearance of objects in the atmosphere, spirit writing, rappings, mediumship, and materialization. Some mediums go into a trance and become a passive instrument for the spirit, while others report what they hear or see spirit forms say or do. The trance state is not generally practiced today. In the materialization séance a foggy, smokelike substance called "ectoplasm" (defined as "exteriorized protoplasm") is said to emanate from the body and mouth of the medium, forming an image. Usually materialized spirits do not give messages.

The Spiritualists draw heavily on the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg,* Franz Mesmer, and Andrew Jackson Davis. Davis's book, entitled Nature's Divine Revelations (1847), stated the fundamentals of Spiritism. The doctrines of the Trinity and of the deity of Christ are rejected; they hold to the existence of an Infinite Intelligence expressed in the phenomena of nature, both physical and spiritual; true religion is the correct understanding and living in accordance with the Infinite Intelligence; personal identity continues after death; communication with the dead is possible; the highest morality is contained in the Golden Rule; the doorway to reformation is never closed against any human soul, here or hereafter; Christ was a medium; the teaching of God as love is central.

Spiritism is now organized on a basis similar to denominationalism. In the USA the main associations are the International General Assembly of Spiritualists, the National Spiritual Alliance of the U.S.A., and the National Spiritualist Association of Churches. The latter group is the orthodox body of American Spiritualism and the most prominent; they maintain a seminary for the training of their ministers. Regular services are held by the churches, and many of the standard religious rituals are observed—singing, praying, etc. This is combined with the practice of mediumship. Camps provide convenient centers for worship, instruction, and practice. Although the actual membership of the Spiritualist groups in the United States is much less than 200,000, the groups claimed in 1971 that there were over 1,000,000 believers.

As a result of the rise of Spiritism, the Society for Psychical Research was organized in 1882 in London, and similar societies were later organized in the United States. Psychical research, or "parapsychology" as it is now termed, has cast doubt on the proof of spirit survival by the evidence of mediums. Studies in extrasensory perception have shown that the mind can, at times, reach out beyond itself to acquire information which the senses and the reason could not obtain. It is quite possible that mediums possess such powers and simply attribute them to spirit origin. Much more research is needed in order to substantiate the claim.

SPIRITUAL HEALING. Healing by spiritual and religious as distinct from scientific and medical means; also called "faith-healing," "divine healing." The means, as well as prayer, sometimes are sacramental, viz., unction, imposition of hands, Eucharist. It is a matter of dispute how far suggestion and psychological influences are involved—e.g., some regard cures at Lourdes* or Holywell as due at least partly to suggestion.

It was the oldest form of healing, and early medical practice grew up alongside it. It was known in Greece in the Dionysiac mysteries, and at the temple of Aesculapius, Epidaurus, and the healing gods (e.g., Apollo, Aesculapius, Zeus) were entitled Soter. The OT miracles of Elijah and Elisha foreshadowed the healing miracles of Jesus, which were a prominent feature of His ministry, and the apostolic healings in Acts.

During the patristic period the practice continued unbroken, the churches rivaling the pagan temples as places of healing. Tertullian wrote of Christ, "He reforms our birth by a new birth from heaven; He restores our flesh from all that afflicts it; He cleanses it when leprous, gives it new light when blind, new strength when paralyzed, when possessed by demons He exorcises it, when dead He raises it to life." Cyprian said that from the indwelling Spirit "is given power that is able to quench the virus of poisons for the healing of the sick, to purge out the stains of foolish souls by restored health." Irenaeus argued that the Gnostics, though they can produce miraculous effects, cannot perform works of healing like Christians, who "heal the sick by laying their hands upon them." Hermas said that those who know the sufferings of men, yet do not relieve those sufferings, commit great sin. A famous healer was Gregory Thaumaturgus* (c.213-c.270).

Though declining after the third century, the transition being marked by a growing veneration of relics,* the phenomenon recurred during the Middle Ages, healings being reported of Francis of Assisi,* Bridget,* Charles Borromeo,* Cuthbert,* Patrick,* among others. English monarchs of the eleventh through eighteenth centuries touched numerous people to cure them of "the King's Evil."* Spiritual healing proper reappeared among the Waldenses* and Bohemian Brethren.* Cures were recorded of Martin Luther and other Reformers.

In the seventeenth century, healings were effected by English Baptists (e.g., Hanserd Knollys, William Kiffin, Vavasor Powell); by Quakers (e.g., instances recorded in George Fox's Journal); and in other Puritan sects. A notable healer was Valentine Greatrakes (1629-83), who healed many in Ireland and England between 1662 and 1666 by laying on hands with prayer. In the eighteenth century John Wesley recounted several instances in his Journal, and the German Pietists also practiced healing. A famous nineteenth-century German healer was Prince Hohenlohe-Waldenburg-Schillingsfürst, canon of Grosswarden, and in Russia there was Father John of Kronstadt (1829-1909).

The Peculiar People* in sickness relied on oil, prayer, and nursing. Groups like the Irvingites and Mormons* practiced healing, and Christian Science* promoted it by teaching that pain and disease are an illusion. The Pentecostal churches* have always advocated healing; it came to the fore, however, in the campaigns of George Jeffreys between 1925 and 1935, and in America with Aimee Semple McPherson.* Recently there has been a revival among the older churches, e.g., "the Guild of Health" and "the Guild of St. Raphael" in Anglicanism, and in the Iona Community in the Church of Scotland. The Eastern Orthodox Churches have always retained a service of healing in their regular work. Their seventh sacrament is "Holy Unction" which, however, unlike the Roman practice in recent centuries, is the anointing with oil of the sick for recovery, in accordance with James 5:14f.

SPITTA, KARL JOHANN PHILIPP (1801-1859). Lutheran hymnwriter. Born in Hanover and originally apprenticed to a watchmaker, he eventually graduated in theology at Göttingen (1824). As a result of his conversion about that time, he stopped writing secular verse, such as had appeared in his Sangbüchlein der Liebe. After four years as a tutor, he took Lutheran orders. He held clerical posts at Hamelin, Wechold, Wittingen, Peine, and finally Burgdorf. His Psalter und Harfe (two series, 1833-43) enjoyed in Germany a popularity comparable with that in Britain of The Christian Year by John Keble. The hymns were translated in full by R. Massie as Lyra Domestica (1860-64), and in part by others, notably Jane Borthwick* and Sarah Findlater.

JOHN S. ANDREWS

SPITTLER, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (1782-1867). Swiss-German mission founder. A clerk from a German pastor's family, he became secretary of the Basle Christentumsgesellschaft in 1801. He helped to establish the Basel Mission Society in 1815, and during the 1820s sought to organize a work in Greece. His principal achievement was the St. Chrischona Pilgrim Mission which he founded in 1840. He opened a missionary training school for skilled craftsmen in a church near Basle, and its graduates first ministered among German immigrants in America. After 1846 the primary field became Palestine. Inspired by Samuel Gobat* in Jerusalem, Spittler attempted to extend the St. Chrischona work to Ethiopia, but his plan to establish a chain of mission stations along the Nile to link Jerusalem to Ethiopia came to naught. After his death St. Chrischona restricted itself to home missions until 1895 when it opened a China field in cooperation with Hudson Taylor.* RICHARD V. PIERARD

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834-1892). Baptist preacher. He was born in Kelvedon, Essex, with Dutch and Dissenting ancestry. His father and grandfather were Independent pastors. Early in 1850 he was converted in Artillery-street Primitive Methodist Chapel, Colchester, Essex, into which he came because of snowy weather. After baptism he became pastor of Waterbeach Baptist Chapel in 1851. In 1854 he was called to New Park Street Baptist Chapel, Southwark, London, which was soon filled to overflowing, necessitating the building of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in 1859.

In 1856 he married Susanna Thompson and also began the "Pastor's College" for training men "evidently called to preach the Gospel," which continues today as "Spurgeon's College." For fifteen years he bore the whole cost, after which the Tabernacle shared the burden. In 1865 he was one of the founders of the London Baptist Association, and in 1869 he established an orphanage at Stockwell, known now as "Spurgeon's Homes." Other charitable and religious organizations he founded and supported included Temperance and Clothing societies, a Pioneer Mission, and a Colportage Association.

He suffered periodic bouts of illness which sometimes kept him out of the pulpit. He preached at the Tabernacle for the last time on 7 June 1891 and died the following January at Mentone, S France. During his thirty-eight-year London ministry he had built up a congregation of 6,000 and added 14,692 members to the church.

During his early ministry he fought battles on two fronts, against hyper-Calvinism and Arminianism.* In 1864 he preached a sermon attacking the baptismal doctrine and practice of the Church of England, thus initiating the "Baptismal Regeneration Controversy." He accused the evangelical Anglicans of perjury in using the Prayer Book when they did not believe in baptismal regeneration. In the resulting furor he felt compelled to resign from the Evangelical Alliance for a time. In 1874 he was involved in a dispute on smoking. The "Downgrade Controversy" of 1887-89 arose out of his concern at the growth of radical teaching among Baptists. Several, including the Baptist Union secretary, pleaded with him to try to stop the trend. He made his protest, but was disregarded, so in October 1887 he withdrew with others from the Union. His resignation was accepted, and a motion of censure, never rescinded, was passed. The affair deeply grieved him and may have shortened his life, but he refused to form a new denomination.

Spurgeon was an evangelical Calvinist. He read widely and especially loved the seventeenth-century Puritans. A diverse author, he wrote biblical expositions, lectures to students, hymns, and the homely philosophy of "John Ploughman," among other works. Preeminently he was a preacher. His clear voice, his mastery of Anglo-Saxon, and his keen sense of humor, allied to a sure grasp of Scripture and a deep love for Christ, produced some of the noblest preaching of any age. His sermons have been printed and distributed throughout the world. Two popular works still widely used today are Treasury of David and Morning and Evening, the latter a compilation of devotional readings.

SPURGEON, THOMAS (1856-1917). Baptist pastor. Twin son of C.H. Spurgeon,* he studied theology at the Pastors' ("Spurgeon's") College, and art and wood-engraving in London. In 1877 he visited Australia and Tasmania, and returning to Australasia two years later, he accepted a Baptist pastorate in Auckland in 1881, afterward being an evangelist for the New Zealand Baptist Union (1889-93). He then went to London as pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, which he saw burned and rebuilt. He resigned for health reasons in 1908. He was also president of his old college, of the Colportage Association, and of Stockwell Orphanage. His son (Thomas Harold, 1891-1967) served for many years in Dublin as principal of the Irish Baptist College.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

SPYRIDON (Spiridion) (d. c.348). Bishop of Tremithius, Cyprus. According to tradition he was a simple shepherd who suffered in Diocletian's persecution and who, after becoming bishop, attended the Council of Nicea* (325). He certainly attended the Council of Sardica about 343. Many stories have gathered around him, recorded by Socrates, Rufinus, and Sozomen in their histories. He is reputed to have recited a statement of the Christian faith at the Council of Nicea to a pagan philosopher, Eulogius, who had previously refuted other Christian disputants, which led to Eulogius's conversion and baptism.

STAINER, SIR JOHN (1840-1901). English composer. Although his music is much out of favor with musicians today, he made a great contribution to his time. As the influential organist of St. Paul's Cathedral in London, he did much to raise the standards of choral performance by precept and example. He was a fine organist and teacher, and his manual on playing the organ attained a great circulation. As scholar and music historian, Stainer has a name respected still. His Dufay and His Contemporaries was one of the first important musicological works by a Briton.

His compositions were too facile and abounded in the clichés that have endeared them to countless churchgoers, while offending the taste of connoisseurs. "Grieve not the Holy Spirit," still in use with many choirs, illustrates his flair for dramatic expression. The Crucifixion, with all its musical banalities, provided a work easy enough for average choirs, while containing a timely message in a framework large enough to rank as an oratorio. The solo movements suffer from the sentimentalism of the age, but the recitative is dramatic and well fitted to the accentuation of the text. A number of the hymntunes, included after the example of a Bach Passion, have memorable melodies. The one really good ensemble piece, "God so loved the world," is a fine bit of vocal part-writing. With his musical gifts, had Stainer been reared in a more sophisticated tradition, his numerous anthems might well have had greater musical value.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

STALKER, JAMES (1848-1927). Scottish minister, scholar, and writer. Born in Crieff and educated at Edinburgh, Berlin, and Halle, he was ordained in the United Free Church* and ministered in Kirkcaldy and Glasgow before becoming professor of church history in the United Free Church College, Aberdeen (1902-26). He was well known as a visiting lecturer in various American colleges and seminaries, and the lucidity of his scholarship is seen in his many writings, among them his lives of Paul and (notably) Jesus (1891). Nevertheless it is as a preacher that he was best remembered. He had shared in the revival movement following the 1873 Moody and Sankey mission, and it had a lasting effect upon him. With evangelistic preaching he coupled also a marked social concern which "caused some douce hearers to become uneasy." He was fearless, untroubled by personal ambition (he declined both a principalship and the moderatorial chair), and encouraged every movement that carried the Gospel to the people. J.D. DOUGLAS

STANFORD, SIR CHARLES VILLIERS (1852-1924). English composer. His name is linked almost inevitably with his distinguished contemporaries, Sir Hubert Parry and Sir Edward Elgar. The former, who was professor of music at Oxford and wrote the first authoritative life of Bach in English, made a contribution of some importance in the choral realm, but affected the course of church music less than Stanford. Elgar, who was the most original and distinctive composer of the three, distinguished himself with his oratorios and symphonic works. All three men helped to bring in a new era in British music, a veritable renaissance of native talent that led directly to the achievements of the present century.

Stanford was born in Ireland, received the best musical education available in England, and studied also in Germany. As well as teaching composition at the Royal College of Music, he was professor of music at Cambridge. A whole generation of significant figures were at some time his pupils—among them Tertius Noble, who became so influential in the USA, and R. Vaughan Williams.* Stanford wrote much music of every kind, but it is his church music that has lived. He was the first to apply to English anthems and cathedral services the technique of motivic development and sound formal construction found in the works of the great European masters from the classical era onward. His services in B-flat and C are the best known. The Te Deum and the Magnificat from the former, for example, found wide acceptance separately as anthems apart from their planned liturgical function, and illustrate well the important aspects of their composer's work. They have unity and musical logic, effective modulations, and the organ accompaniments possess a degree of independent interest without obscuring the text. J.B. MAC MILLAN

STANISLAUS (1030-1079). Bishop of Cracow and martyr. Nobly born at Szczepanow, Poland, he was educated at the cathedral school of Gnesen and then at Paris. While Stanislaus was canon and preacher at Cracow, Alexander II appointed him bishop there in 1072. Opposing King Boleslaw II because of his long expedition against the Grand Duchy of Kiev (1069) and other scandalous conduct, Stanislaus excommunicated the king, only to be slain by him during Mass for treason. While the defeated king spent his remaining years penitent among Benedictines in Hungary, miracles and legends surrounded the martyred bishop, which cult extended to Lithuania and the Ukraine. He became the patron saint of Poland and was canonized by Innocent IV in 1253.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

STANLEY, ARTHUR PENRHYN (1815-1881). Dean of Westminster. Son of a rector who had private means and noble connections, he was educated at Rugby and Balliol, coming into touch with Pusey and the Tractarians.* He was elected a fellow of University College, Oxford, in 1839 and was ordained. In 1856 he became professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford. Like the Tractarians, he desired more earnestness and order in the Church of England, which at this time suffered from lack of devotion, absenteeism, plurality, and indifference, but he was the antithesis of a sacramentalist. He was noted rather for Broad Church views, was strongly in favor of the state connection, and wanted a truly comprehensive Church of England. He would not have barred Unitarians, and he worked for the admission of Nonconformists to the universities. After he became dean of Westminster in 1863 he invited Keble, Liddon, and Pusey to preach; all refused, feeling that to do so would compromise them in view of Stanley's sympathy with German liberalism. Queen Victoria liked him, however, and would have made him a bishop but for Palmerston and Gladstone. He was a member of the NT revision committee of 1870 and one of those who wanted to remove the anathemas from the Athanasian Creed in 1872. He opposed the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland. A widely traveled man, Stanley produced many books, including Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians (1855), Lectures on the Eastern Church (1861), and Memorials of Westminster (1868).

P.W. PETTY

STAPLETON, THOMAS (1535-1598). Roman Catholic apologist. Born in Sussex, he graduated from Oxford, but when Elizabeth became queen he left for Louvain and Paris. In 1569 he joined the English College at Douai, and in 1584 entered the Jesuit Order, subsequently leaving for health reasons. In 1590 he taught theology at Louvain. He was a skilled defender of controversial Roman Catholicism. Among his works is a translation of Bede's History of the Church of England (1565), a life of Thomas More* (1588), and a discourse appended to his translation of Staphylus's Apologie ... of holy Scripture (1565). In five million Latin and one million English words, Stapleton warned the English about the folly of abandoning Bede's faith. Like More, he was a persistent opponent of the Reformation.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

STARETZ (Starets). A spiritual counselor in the Russian Church in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Not surprisingly in view of the traditional aridity of church establishments, they were not professional appointees in the accepted sense. Originally those in this category were usually monks ministering to their fellow-monks, but gradually there was developed also a ministry to the laity, and the startsy were frequently the object of pilgrimages. Many heard of them for the first time in Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov.

STATES OF THE CHURCH, see PAPAL STATES

STATIONS OF THE CROSS. A series of pictures or carvings depicting fourteen incidents in the last journey of Christ before His burial. They are usually placed around the walls of churches and used for popular devotions during Lent or Holy Week. The congregation goes from one picture to the next, led by the priest, recalling Christ's last hours before His death. The fourteen incidents are: (1) Pilate condemns Jesus to death; (2) Christ receives His cross; (3) Christ falls to the ground; (4) Christ meets His mother; (5) Simon of Cyrene takes the cross; (6) Christ's face is wiped by Veronica; (7) Christ falls a second time; (8) Christ tells the women of Jerusalem not to weep for Him; (9) Christ falls a third time; (10) Christ is stripped of His garments; (11) Christ is nailed to the cross; (12) Christ dies on the cross; (13) Christ's body is taken down from the cross; (14) Christ's body is placed in the tomb. The keeping of the Stations of the Cross was instituted by the Franciscans, but the form of service was not finally settled until the nineteenth century. Many Anglican churches as well as the Roman Catholic Church use this Lenten devotional service.

PETER TOON

STAUPITZ, JOHANNES VON (1460/69-1524). Roman Catholic scholar. Born in Motterwitz, Saxony, he studied at Leipzig and Cologne. He joined the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine and completed his studies at Tübingen (Th.D., 1500). He was prior in Munich and then professor of Bible at the University of Wittenberg. He became vicar-general of the Reformed Congregation of the Hermits of St. Augustine. Staupitz encouraged Martin Luther to study for his doctorate in theology. He tried to modify Luther's position in the first years of the Lutheran movement, but failed. In 1521 he received permission to join the Benedictines in Salzburg. In his theology Staupitz spoke of a covenant between God and man in which God set forth the terms, fulfilled them in Christ, and offered them to the elect unconditionally. He stressed the doctrine of election as central to soteriology. Grace in justification makes God pleasing to man, emphasizing the advent of Christ in grace.

CARL S. MEYER

STEBBINS, GEORGE COLES (1846-1945). American gospel hymnwriter. Born in East Carlton, New York, he studied music at Rochester, Chicago, and Boston. He was music director at Chicago's First Baptist Church from 1868, and in 1874 took up a similar post at Boston's Clarendon Street Church, and later at Tremont Temple. He was a lifelong acquaintance of D.L. Moody, Ira Sankey, P.P. Bliss, and D.W. Whittle. For nearly fifty years he led choirs, wrote music, and worked as an evangelistic music director. Stebbins produced over 1500 hymns, and was coauthor of several hymnbooks. Of his many popular gospel hymns one of the best known is "Take time to be holy."

STEINER, RUDOLF. see ANTHROPOSOPHY

STEPHEN (d. c. A.D. 36). Proto-martyr. As early Christianity emerged, according to Acts 6–7, the earliest response to the protest by Hellenists against discriminatory practices of the Hebrews saw the Twelve summoning the whole body of disciples and picking seven from the former group to perform the requisite ministry of service. Stephen headed the list. His vigorous ministry brought him into debate with the officials of the larger Judaism, from which the earliest Christian community was not yet distinguished. This led to his execution near Jerusalem (at least four sites are competitive) by stoning, in the presence of Saul as consenting bystander. Form-critical analysis of the summary of Stephen's theology (Acts 7:2-53) shows it stands in the tradition of "credo" passages wherein the proclamation of the activity of God is described by a recitation of that sacred history which gave structure to the OT narrative. Punning his name, Eusebius identifies him as first to win the crown (stephanos) reserved for martyrs; Sozomen's fragmented termination breaks off with the discovery of his relics presumably during the administration of Theodosius II (408-450), thereby intensifying that cult which keeps "the feast of Stephen" (26 December).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

STEPHEN I (d.257). Pope from 254. A native Roman, he had a brief pontificate which saw several confrontations with Cyprian of Carthage* who held that "no one of us sets up to be bishop of bishops." Stephen restored two Spanish bishops, Basilides and Martialis, who had been deposed and replaced; refused to depose the bishop of Arles for Novatianism; and did not insist on rebaptism where the rite had been performed by heretics, so long as it had been done in the name of the Trinity. On the latter point Cyprian and eighty-seven of his colleagues differed, denying the validity of heretical baptism, at the Council of Carthage (256). J.D. DOUGLAS

STEPHEN II (III) (d.757). Pope from 752. A native Roman, he was chosen to succeed Zacharias as pope, in place of Stephen II who was elected but died before he could be consecrated. At his accession he appealed in vain to Constantinople for aid against a Lombard threat. After fruitless negotiations with the Lombard king, he secured protection from Pepin the Short (754). The papacy was now allied with the Franks rather than the Eastern emperor. Pepin compelled the Lombards to restore lands confiscated from the exarchate of Ravenna and from Rome. In a second campaign (756) Pepin forced the Lombard king to surrender to Stephen these and other territories, which were the foundation of the Papal States*; this "Donation of Pepin" established the papacy as a temporal power. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

STEPHEN III (IV) (d.772). Pope from 768. A Sicilian monk, he was elected in opposition to Constantine II and the antipope Philip, both the creatures of factions. Philip was forced to resign, Constantine was degraded and blinded, and terrible reprisals were inflicted upon their supporters. Charlemagne and Carloman, the Frankish rulers, sent several bishops to a Lateran council (769) that confirmed Stephen's election, excluded laymen from papal elections, decreed life imprisonment for Constantine and nullified his irregular election and ordinations, and condemned the iconoclastic synod of 754. Lack of unity among his Frankish allies forced Stephen to reach an agreement with the Lombard king that sacrificed the anti-Lombard party which had elected him. This weak and vacillating pope was regarded as a disgrace to the Roman church.

STEPHEN HARDING, see HARDING, STEPHEN

STEPHEN OF HUNGARY (c.975-1038). First king of Hungary. Baptized as a boy at the same time as his father, Duke Geza, by Adalbert of Prague,* he married Gisela, sister of the emperor. After succeeding to his father's dukedom he received a royal crown from Pope Sylvester II,* and in 1001 was made the first king of Hungary. He worked hard to convert his people to Christianity, founding both episcopal sees and monasteries. Unfortunately his last years were inglorious due to personal ill-health and quarrels about the succession to the throne. He was canonized in 1083, as was also his son Emeric (Imre) who was killed in a hunting accident.

STERN, HENRY AARON (1820-1885). Missionary to the Jews. Born to Jewish parents in Hesse-Cassel, he was educated at Frankfurt. At seventeen he began a commercial career in Hamburg, but became interested in Christianity, and he was baptized in London in 1840. He trained as a missionary in the College of the London Jews' Society. In 1844 he sailed for Baghdad and en route was ordained deacon by Bishop Alexander in Jerusalem. He worked among Jews and Muslims in Asia Minor and Persia until 1853, when he was transferred to Constantinople. In 1858-59 he went on missionary journeys to the Crimea and Arabia, and then joined J.M. Flad* in his work among the Falasha Jews of Ethiopia. Two years later, twenty-two were baptized, representing the firstfruits of the work. Later he incurred the hostility of the eccentric King Theodore, and he was imprisoned and tortured (1863-67), together with Flad and the consul and all other Europeans resident in the capital. Eventually Flad was released and brought the news to the British authorities, and an expeditionary force under Sir Robert Napier defeated Theodore, who committed suicide. Stern and the others were liberated and returned to England. The remaining years of his active ministry were spent in London, where he wrote and distributed literature among the Jews and became famous for his missionary sermons in Spitalfields and Whitechapel. Among his books were two on Ethiopia published in 1862 and 1868. J.G.G. NORMAN

STERNE, LAURENCE (1713-1768). English writer. He is rarely thought of as a theologian, even though he was for many years rector of Coxwold and prebendary of York. His fame rests on the whimsical, idiosyncratic, and even occasionally bawdy Tristram Shandy (1760-67), but in the same years he also published several volumes of the Sermons of Mr Yorick. Full though they are of unacknowledged borrowings from earlier writers, these sermons are as characteristically Sternean as anything he ever wrote. His biographer, Cross, described the best of them as "embryonic dramas," and so they are with their vivid account of incident, depiction of character and presentation of dialogue, and their unpredictable manipulation of language. In his preoccupation with conduct Sterne does not get much beyond eighteenth-century orthodoxy, but he is alone in presenting this with such original, versatile, and penetrating insights. Sterne's sermons are literature, because they are imaginative creations.
ARTHUR POLLARD

STERNHOLD, THOMAS (c.1500-1549). Versifier of Psalms. Educated at Cardinal College (Christ Church), Oxford, he became groom of the robes to Henry VIII, who left him a bequest of one hundred marks, and to Edward VI. He was a member of Parliament for Plymouth from 1545 to 1547. He composed metrical versions of the Psalms "for his own godly solace"—the precursor of the English Psalter. The first edition of nineteen Psalms appeared in 1547, dedicated to Edward VI, and a second edition of thirty-seven posthumously in 1549. In 1557 a third edition with seven further Psalms by John Hopkins, a Suffolk clergyman (d.1570), became well known as the "Sternhold and Hopkins" collection. Sternhold used mainly the ballad meter of "Chevy Chace," which helped to popularize psalm-singing in Elizabethan times. J.G.G. NORMAN

STERRY, PETER (d.1672). Chaplain to Oliver Cromwell.* Educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he became a fellow there in 1636. During the 1640s he was a chaplain to Lady Brooke, a member of the Westminster Assembly* of Divines, and an occasional preacher before Parliament. In 1649 he became a regular preacher to the council of state of the Commonwealth, and also acted as a chaplain to the Lord Protector. After the latter's death he moved to Hackney where he taught some students in his home. Following the Restoration of Charles II, he was known as a Nonconformist and preached at conventicles. This period saw also some of his best literary work—e.g., A Discourse of the Freedom of the Will, published posthumously in 1675. He was a Calvinistic mystic, influenced by Neoplatonism and by such mystics as Jakob Boehme.* PETER TOON

STIGMATA. Bodily wounds. This can be also a non-Christian phenomenon, but among Christians it dates back to later medieval times, despite references that have been made to Galatians 6:17. Stigmata were received on the hands, feet, side, shoulder, chest, or back and were reckoned to be a visible sign of participation in Christ's passion. Whether visible or invisible there is pain, sometimes accompanied by afflictions like lameness or blindness without logical causes, and nearly total abstinence from food and sleep. Stigmata are reported to resist treatment and to bleed periodically, especially during holy days and seasons, occur supernaturally and self-imposedly, and can represent evil as well as mystical contemplation. They spring from ecstasy, which can mean weakness; they can appear before or after a revelation, and to those of inferior piety and morality they are sometimes incomplete. Because of the connection with Christ's passion, there is even concern over their bodily position and shape. The Roman Catholic Church tends to be cautious over stigmata, and they have never been a reason for canonization. Francis of Assisi,* Catherine of Siena,* Teresa of Avila,* and Julian of Norwich* are well-known examples of those who have experienced stigmata, but the cases are numerous and involve especially women. The non-Roman Catholic traditions do not have this history, though they have known not dissimilar manifestations. C.G. THORNE, JR.

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD (1635-1699). Bishop of Worcester. Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, he gained rapid advancement through his great learning. He was preacher at Rolls Chapel and reader at the Temple Church, becoming a prebendary of St. Paul's in 1667 and dean in 1678. He wrote on the authority of Scripture and was an early advocate of the possibility of "comprehension" between Anglicans and Presbyterians. He also wrote antiquarian works, including Origines Britannicae in 1685 on the commencement of the British Church. He strongly defended the right of bishops to sit in the House of Lords, and was concerned with the reform of procedure of the consistory court. Frequently consulted by the bishops of his day, he was a close adviser of Archbishop Tillotson* on such controversial matters as the erroneous doctrines of Roman Catholics and Socinians. As one of the early Latitudinarians, he was appointed bishop of Worcester after the Revolution in 1689, where he proved himself an energetic and active pastor. G.C.B. DAVIES

STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE. An ecumenical gathering called the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work which met in August 1925. Its moving spirit was Archbishop Söderblom.* Through World War I and afterward, Söderblom, a member of a neutral country, had sought to keep the ecumenical ideal alive. The conference dealt with the relationship between Christ and economics and industry, social and moral problems, and international relations and education. There were 600 delegates from thirty-seven countries, the latter figure surprisingly large since the war had left divisions which some thought could not be breached. There was some tension on the question of war guilt, but more concerning the question of whether the kingdom of God can or should be sought for here on earth. This was the first ecumenical conference when members were official delegates of churches and not just interested individuals. Particularly interesting was the presence of the Orthodox Church. Stockholm through its continuation committee may be seen as the initial step which led via Oxford* 1937 to the formation of the World Council of Churches* in 1948. PETER S. DAWES

STODDARD, SOLOMON (1643-1729). American Congregational pastor. Born in Massachusetts, he graduated from Harvard College and became its first librarian (1667). Ordained in 1672, he was pastor of the church at Northampton from 1672 until 1729. He was partially responsible for the formulation and defense of the Half-Way Covenant*; his apology for this practice was set out in his first major work, Doctrine of Instituted Churches Explained and Proved from the Word of God (1700). He moved further away from traditional Puritanism with his teaching that baptized persons should be admitted to the Lord's Supper even if they could not testify to a conversion experience. Stoddard argued that the Lord's Supper might act as a "converting influence." His other works include An Appeal to the Learned (1709), Questions on the Conversion of the Indians (1723), and Safety in the Righteousness of Christ (4th ed., 1792). Stoddard was the grandfather of Jonathan Edwards.* DONALD M. LAKE

STOLBERG, FRIEDRICH LEOPOLD VON (1750-1819). Poet and diplomat. Born in Holstein, he was educated in a Lutheran Pietistic environment, thereafter reading law at Halle and at Göttingen, where he was a member of the Hainbund, a German poets' circle. Influenced by F.G. Klopstock* and himself a friend of Goethe,* he was envoy of the Protestant prince-bishop of Lübeck to the Danish court (1777), chief administrator at Eutin (1781), and Danish ambassador to Berlin (1789). His conversion to the Roman Catholic Church (1800) was widely noticed, and he resigned his posts. He wrote songs, plays, hymns, and odes, translated Homer, Plato, and Aeschylus, and produced Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi (15 vols., 1806-18), which covered the period from OT times up to A.D. 430.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

STONE, BARTON WARREN (1772-1844). American frontier Presbyterian evangelist. Born in colonial Maryland, he crossed into Kentucky at the close of the American Revolution, with strong, pietistic reactions to war-induced vices. Essentially an Arminian revivalist, he broke with his Presbyterian heritage over unconditional election and limited atonement after the great Cane Ridge Meeting (1801), in which he was participant and recorder. He and five others set forth the Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery (1804), a declaration of biblical authority and the oneness of Christ's church. He organized the "Christian Church." His ecumenical outlook brought him into contact with many other "Christians" of "the Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," including especially Alexander Campbell,* with whose "Disciples" many of the Christians merged in 1832. Stone's Address (1814) and Letters to Blythe (1824) and the paper The Christian Messenger (1826) were molded by revivalism or the frontier experience—involvement in which moved him continually westward, despite successes in the Ohio Valley.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

STONE, JOHN TIMOTHY (1868-1954). Presbyterian minister. Educated at Amherst College and Auburn Seminary, he held Presbyterian pastorates in New York State, Baltimore, and Fourth Presbyterian, Chicago (1909-30). His work in Chicago became the basis for the New Life Movement in the Presbyterian church nationally, while his own congregation showed remarkable growth. He served as chaplain in World War I. From 1928 to 1940 he was president of McCormick Seminary, Chicago, being made emeritus both there and at Fourth Church. He was moderator of his denomination's general assembly in 1913, and the author of devotional and practical books, notably Winning Men (1946).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

STONEHOUSE, NED BERNARD (1902-1962). NT scholar. Born at Grand Rapids, Michigan, he became a member of the Christian Reformed Church, and graduated in Arts from Calvin College in 1924. His theological studies were pursued first at Princeton, where in 1927 he received degrees in theology. Awarded the Alumni Fellowship in NT, he continued his researches at the University of Tübingen and the Free University of Amsterdam, which granted him its doctorate in 1929. Thereafter as instructor (1929), assistant professor (1930) and professor (1937) he served the NT department at Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, till his death. He was a gentle but penetrating scholar who gave particular attention to the synoptic gospels and to the Book of Revelation. Careful and prudent, he was tireless in his researches; his conclusions were widely respected because adequately based. His works include The Witness of Matthew and Mark to Christ (2nd ed., 1959); The Witness of Luke to Christ (1951); and Origins of the Synoptic Gospels (1963). He edited two posthumous volumes of the work of J. Gresham Machen* and wrote his biographical memoir (1954). Stonehouse was the founding editor of The New International Commentary on the New Testament, with which he was associated until his death.

PAUL WOOLLEY

STORCH, NICHOLAS, see ABECEDARIANS

STOWE, HARRIET ELIZABETH BEECHER (1811-1896). Abolitionist and author. Born in Litchfield, Connecticut, she studied and taught in Hartford. When Lyman Beecher,* her father, became president of Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, in 1832, she went with him and married a professor, Calvin E. Stowe, in 1836. They sheltered fugitive slaves in their home until they moved in 1850 to Brunswick, Maine. Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life Among the Lowly appeared in the magazine National Era in 1851-52, and as a book in the latter year. It evoked strong antislavery sentiment. For nearly thirty years she produced almost a book a year.

STRACHAN, JOHN (1778-1867). Educator and bishop. Born in Aberdeen, Scotland, he taught school while studying at the university there. In 1799 he emigrated to Canada and taught school in Kingston until 1803, when he was ordained in the Church of England and became curate of Cornwall. He was rector of St. James' Church, Toronto, from 1813 until 1867, during which period also he served for many years as a member of both the executive council and the legislative council of Upper Canada. He upheld the sole right of the Anglican Church to income from the Clergy Reserves.* From 1839 he was bishop of Toronto, and from 1827 the first president of King's College (University of Toronto) until he founded the University of Trinity College in 1851 and served as its first chancellor.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

STRACHAN, ROBERT KENNETH (1910-1965). Protestant missionary leader. Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, son of Harry and Susan Strachan, British missionaries who later started the Latin America Evangelization Crusade (now Latin America Mission), he was educated in the United States, then joined his parents in the mission in Costa Rica in 1936. Following their death, he became general director in 1950. He developed a forward-looking team of workers in a multifaceted mission that came to include nationals in its membership. He was responsible for the beginning and the basic ideas of Evangelism-in-Depth.* His article on evangelism in the International Review of Missions in 1964 sparked a notable debate on that subject. In 1964-65 he was visiting professor of missions at Fuller Theological Seminary, where he helped establish the School of World Mission. His lectures there were published as The Inescapable Calling.

HAROLD R. COOK

STRANG, JAMES JESSE (1813-1856). Mormon* leader. Born of Baptist parents in Scipio, New York, he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1836. He became interested in Mormonism through his wife's brother-in-law, Moses Smith, and was converted through Joseph and Hyrum Smith in 1844. When the former was killed, Strang claimed to be his successor, eventually forming the Mormon sect known by his name in St. James, Big Beaver Island, Lake Michigan, where he was crowned "king" in 1850. He was twice elected to the state legislature. He announced a revelation proclaiming plural marriage a divine institution (1850), himself taking four wives. He made many enemies and was finally assassinated.

J.G.G. NORMAN

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH (1808-1874). German theologian. Born near Stuttgart, he studied under F.C. Baur* at Tübingen, where he obtained his doctorate and taught briefly. He achieved instant notoriety with his Life of Jesus, Critically Examined (2 vols., 1835-36; ET 3 vols., 1846). This destroyed for him all prospect of a career in theological teaching. The study consisted largely of a detailed examination of the events of the gospels, making extensive use of the concept of myth already known to German theology. Strauss admitted there was a basic historical framework behind the life of Jesus recorded in the gospels, but held that it had become so embellished and overlaid by pious reflection and fantasy that the life of Jesus had been mythically rewritten so as to make it repeat and fulfill the legends and prophecies of the OT. Thus the miracles of Jesus were virtually predetermined by popular expectation of how the Messiah should act. The true significance of Christianity is to be seen in the light of Hegelian philosophy. It is to be understood symbolically as the manifestation of the Absolute Spirit in man.

An enormous controversy followed. Strauss produced a sequel, Christliche Glaubenslehre (2 vols., 1840-41), arguing that biblical teaching cannot be harmonized with modern knowledge, and proposing a mixture of Platonic and Hegelian philosophy in its place. For the next twenty years he turned his back on theology, but returned with a study of Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1862) and a second life of Jesus (1864) which again ruled out the supernatural and miraculous and made considerable use of myth. But the Hegelianism of the first life was dropped in favor of the older rationalism of the Enlightenment.* A religion of humanity must supersede Christianity. Other writings include an attack on Schleiermacher* (1865) and a post-Darwinian statement of belief, The Old and the New Faith (1872; ET 1873).

In his day Strauss had more influence on freethinkers like George Eliot than on the mainstream of theology. His teaching on myth seems to have had little direct influence on Bultmann.*

COLIN BROWN

STREETER, BURNETT HILLMAN (1874-1937). Biblical scholar. He was a member of Queen's College, Oxford, as student, fellow, and provost, during 1893-99 and 1905-37 (the intervening years being spent at Pembroke College, Oxford). In 1899 he was ordained deacon in the Church of England despite doubts about aspects of the Christian faith. A shy and retiring man, he nevertheless had great influence among students and won considerable respect from his colleagues. The liberal cast of his mind was shown by the fact that he was one of the seven contributors to Foundations (1912). In his latter years he came under the influence of Frank Buchman* and the Oxford Group,* and it was during his return from staying in Switzerland with members of the group that he was killed in an air crash. His works include Reality: A New Correlation of Science and Religion (1926) and The Buddha and the Christ (1926), but his most influential writings were on gospel criticism. His most famous work, still in wide use today, is The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (1924). His origins were the "Four-Document Hypothesis," the "Proto-Luke Theory," and the demonstration of an early Caesarean text of the gospels.

R.E. NIXON

STRICT BAPTISTS. A group of Baptist churches, generally Calvinist in theology, which denies that saving faith is the duty of unbelievers. Saving faith is "not a legal duty, but the sovereign and gracious gift of God." Communion is restricted to "baptized believers" in the NT sense of those words, and the rule of life for believers is the Gospel, not the moral law. Early emphasis was placed on itinerant preaching, and recent efforts have failed to establish a more settled type of ministry. Strict Baptists withdrew their support, on theological grounds, from the Baptist Missionary Society, and founded in 1861 the Strict Baptist Mission. They maintain an aloofness from public affairs and show little interest in the social implications of the Christian faith.

JAMES TAYLOR

STRIGEL, VICTORINUS (1524-1569). German theologian. One of Melanchthon's* most distinguished associates, he was born in Kaufbeuren, Swabia, and after study at Freiburg and Wittenberg, taught at Magdeburg, Erfurt, and Jena. His biblical commentaries and historical and philological works showed him to be a wide-ranging scholar, in addition to being a notable theologian. Unfortunately he taught in territories wracked by bitter disputes among Lutherans on synergism and the Eucharist. Not willing to agree with definitions like the Book of Confutation, and sympathetic to Reformed theology, he found his position in Jena becoming more and more difficult because of his public disagreements with M. Flacius* and the inability of the duke of Saxony to reconcile the opposing factions. A move to Leipzig in 1562 brought a temporary remission, but by 1567 he was once again in difficulties and inhibited from teaching, because of suspected Calvinist views on the Lord's Supper. Appointment to a chair at Heidelberg in 1567 offered Strigel a congenial theological environment, but he died shortly after appointment. He was widely respected among Reformed theologians, including English scholars like W. Perkins.*

IAN BREWARD

STRONG, AUGUSTUS HOPKINS (1836-1921). American Baptist pastor and educator. Born in Rochester, New York, he graduated from Yale (1857) and Rochester Theological Seminary (1859) and studied at the University of Berlin. Ordained in 1861, he held pastorates in Massachusetts and Ohio. He was elected president of Rochester Theological Seminary (1872-1912) and was also professor of biblical theology. Although clearly conservative in theology, Strong was open to certain trends developing late in the nineteenth century, such as theistic evolution and German idealism. He was always active in the life of the American (Northern) Baptist denomination, serving as president of the American Baptist Missionary Union (1892-95) and first president of the Northern Baptist Convention (1905-10). He toured Baptist mission fields in 1916-17. His major writings include Systematic Theology (3 vols., 1886), Philosophy and Religion (1888), The Great Poets and Their Theology (1897), and Christ in Creation and Ethical Monotheism (1899).

DONALD M. LAKE

STRONG, PHILIP NIGEL WARRINGTON (1899- ). Anglican primate in Australia. After service in World War I, he graduated from Cambridge in 1921 and was ordained the following year by Bishop Hensley Henson to serve in the diocese of Durham, in which he became in 1931 vicar of a Sunderland parish. Five years later he was consecrated as bishop of New Guinea, which in 1941 became the last land buffer between Australia and the Japanese forces. Bishop Strong, fifteen of his clergy, three laymen, and eighteen women missionaries chose to remain at their posts when the Japanese occupation came. The death in 1942 of eight missionaries and two Papuan Christians put a heavy burden on the heart and conscience of the bishop, but he devoted his energies unsparingly to the care of Papuan Christians and Australian soldiers alike, and was frequently exposed to great danger.

After the war Strong fostered the steady expansion of an increasingly indigenous church, and he was delighted in 1960 to consecrate a Papuan as assistant bishop: the first indigene anywhere in the Pacific to attain this office.

In 1962 Bishop Strong was elected archbishop of Brisbane, and in 1966 he became also primate of the Church of England in Australia, where his influence extended far beyond his own diocese, and was recognized when in 1970 he became a Knight Commander of the British Empire (KBE), a rare award for a churchman.

MARCUS LOANE

STROSSMAYER, JOSEPH GEORGE (1815-1905). Roman Catholic bishop. Born of German parents in Croatia, he was ordained to the priesthood in 1838 and nine years later became professor of canon law at Vienna. In 1850 he was elevated to the bishopric of Bosnien with its seat at Diakovár. At Vatican Council I* (1869-70) he opposed the promulgation of papal infallibility and then was the last bishop to publish the decrees of the council (December 1872). He persisted in maintaining relations with J.J.I. von Döllinger* and J.H. Reinkens* until October 1871. In spite of his German heritage, Strossmayer was an enthusiastic pan-Slavist, which brought him into conflict with Vienna. The pan-Slavic movement he advocated resulted in the formation of Yugoslavia after World War I. WAYNE DETZLER

STRYPE, JOHN (1643-1734). English church historian and biographer. Born at Houndsditch, London, he was educated at Cambridge and eventually became curate at Leyton, followed or accompanied from 1689 by a lectureship at Hackney and (1711) the sinecure of West Tarring, Sussex. A poor historian and worse stylist, he was a great and an unscrupulous collector of documents. His principal contribution is the publication of these sources in the valuable Annals of the Reformation ... (2nd ed., 4 vols., 1725-31) and Ecclesiastical Memorials (4 vols., 1721-33), and also in numerous appendices in biographies, e.g., of Archbishops Cranmer (1694), Grindal (1710), Parker (1711), and Whitgift (1718), and (especially worthwhile) of the Edwardian humanists Sir Thomas Smith (1689) and Sir John Cheke (1705).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

STUBBS, JOHN (1543?-1591). Protestant controversialist. Born in Norfolk and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn, he then returned to Norfolk to live on the family estate. He abhorred Roman Catholicism and viewed any compromise with it as dangerous. A proposed marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Catholic Henry, duke of Anjou, was the occasion for his Discoverie of a gaping gulf whereinto England is like to be swallowed ... (1579). For this publication his publisher and his printer and he himself were arrested, and after much legal discussion, Stubbs and William Page, the publisher, had their right hands cut off (1679). Stubbs protested his loyalty to the queen, but was still sent back to prison, to be released a few months later. After his release he continued to defend Protestantism, and he also translated a book of Theodore Beza* on the Psalms. He was elected member of Parliament for Yarmouth in 1589 and died at Le Havre when on a visit to France. PETER TOON

STUBBS, WILLIAM (1825-1901). English historian and bishop. Born at Knaresborough, he passed from Ripon Grammar School to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1844. In 1848 he was elected a fellow of Trinity, and from 1850 to 1866 he was vicar of Navestock. Between 1864 and 1889 he produced his remarkable editions of English Medieval Chronicles, which made him the outstanding historian of his time, and the person who has laid the foundations of the modern approach to the study of medieval history. In 1866 he was appointed regius professor of modern history at Oxford, and in 1870 he published Select Charters —the history of the English constitution up to Edward I from original documents. This was followed (1873-78) by the Constitutional History of England (to 1485), a work which gave him a worldwide reputation. He became bishop of Chester in 1884 and was translated to Oxford in 1889. Theologically he was a High Churchman and called Pusey "the Master"; politically he was Conservative. JOHN A. SIMPSON

STUDD, C(HARLES) T(HOMAS) (1862-1931). Pioneer missionary. Third son of Edward Studd, a wealthy retired planter who was converted under D.L. Moody in 1877, he was himself converted in 1878. Educated at Eton and Trinity, Cambridge, he excelled at cricket and was in the England team in 1882. He volunteered for missionary service, and as one of a group of students known as the "Cambridge Seven" aroused much enthusiasm on missions in Edinburgh and elsewhere. He sailed for China with the China Inland Mission in 1885 and gave away his inherited fortune to Christian causes. Invalided home in 1894, he was working two years later among students in America, and the Student Volunteer Missionary Union was formed. He was pastor of the Union Church, Ootacumund, South India, in 1900-1906, until forced home again through illness. After a period of preaching around Britain, contrary to medical advice he sailed in 1910 for Africa, where he founded the "Heart of Africa Mission" in 1912, which later became the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade. He labored with Alfred Buxton and others in Central Africa until his death. J.G.G. NORMAN

STUDENT CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT. The British section of the World Student Christian Federation,* founded by John R. Mott* in 1895. Each national movement preserves its autonomy as a fellowship of students who "desire to understand the Christian faith and live the Christian life." The SCM was the product of several student movements in the latter part of the nineteenth century, of which the Student Volunteer Missionary Union was of special importance. This had begun in Cambridge in 1892 through the inspiration of the "Cambridge Seven." With a growing desire to include High Church and liberal representatives, the SCM gradually moved away from its Evangelical origins, till the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union withdrew from membership of the movement on doctrinal grounds in 1910. Its desire for "comprehensiveness" included a determination to "shake itself free" from the conservative approach to the Bible.

In evolving the principle of being an "interdenominational" movement rather than "nondenominational," each denomination making its special contribution, the SCM paved the way for the modern ecumenical movement, many of whose leaders sprang from its ranks—J.H. Oldham,* William Temple,* N. Söderblom.* Through conferences and study groups it has sought to grapple with the relevance of Christianity to the contemporary world. Besides work in universities and among theological students, the movement operates also in schools. In 1929 the Student Christian Movement Press Ltd. was set up, primarily to supply students with literature at low cost, which has now grown into a substantial publishing house. Through the WSCF international contacts are maintained and encouraged.

See T. Tatlow, The Story of the Student Christian Movement of Great Britain and Ireland (1933). J.W. CHARLEY

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT. A movement dedicated to enlisting Christian college students for foreign missions. It originated in a summer Bible study conference in 1886 at Mount Hermon, Massachusetts, called by the YMCA and presided over by D.L. Moody. Students like Robert P. Wilder* aroused concern for missions, and before the conference ended one hundred had signified their intention of becoming missionaries. The following school year, Wilder and another toured the schools to stimulate more interest. In 1888 the movement organized formally, with John R. Mott,* one of the original hundred, as chairman, a position he held for thirty years. The often misunderstood motto became "The evangelization of the world in this generation." In 1891 came the first general convention in Cleveland, Ohio. After 1894 conventions were held quadrennially, reaching a peak at Des Moines, Iowa, in 1920, when 6,890 attended. Then came rapid decline. Before 1940 the SVM had lost its effectiveness. A brief resurgence after World War II was short-lived. In 1959 the organization was merged into the National Student Christian Federation which in 1966 became part of the University Christian Movement. In 1969 the UCM voted itself out of existence. During its lifetime the SVM saw more than 20,000 of its members become foreign missionaries.

STUNDISTS. Russian evangelical sects tracing their origin to a group of Bible students in SW Russia about 1845. A certain Reformed pastor Bohnekämper conducted pietistic devotional hours (Stunden) for Russian peasants as well as German settlers. Under his son Karl the religious movement called "Stundism" arose about 1862, freed itself from all connection with the Reformed Church, and became purely Russian in character. Despite persecution by church and state, Stundism spread widely. The majority gradually linked up with Russian Baptists, being called "Stundo-Baptists" in distinction from the Baptist group originating from J.G. Oncken. The Stundists proper sought to maintain the original connection with the Stundenhalter among the Swabian colonists. J.G.G. NORMAN

STURM, JAKOB (1498-1553). Reformer and statesman. Born at Strasbourg, he was of a family that had given the city able magistrates for two centuries. He studied at Heidelberg and Freiburg with Capito and Eck. He joined the faculty at Freiburg in 1503 and later became a city councillor. He was appointed chief magistrate (Stettmeister) of Strasbourg in 1526, representing the city ninety-one times in the government of the empire. An early adherent of Reformation doctrine, he advocated an alliance of all German and Swiss evangelical groups, supported in this by Martin Bucer.* He was one of the original "Protestants" at the Diet of Speyer* (1529), took part in the Marburg Colloquy,* and presented the Tetrapolitan Confession* to the Augsburg Diet (1530). Through his influence Strasbourg joined the Smalcald League* (1531), but after the disasters of the Smalcaldic War had to sue for the pardon of his city from Charles V. He stood for liberty of conscience in church matters and was respected by all parties. J.G.G. NORMAN

STURM, JOHANNES (1507-1589). Protestant educationalist. Born at Schleiden (Sleida), he was educated at a school of the Brethren of the Common Life* and at Louvain University. Joining himself to the French humanists, he lectured on classics at Paris (1530-36). Bucer* influenced him to Protestantism, and he went to Strasbourg, actively furthering the Reformation. Conciliatory in spirit, he sought the reconciliation of all religious parties, including Protestants and Roman Catholics. He reorganized the educational system of Strasbourg, founding the gymnasium on a humanistic model (1538) with himself as rector. An academy followed in 1564. Generally regarded as the greatest educator of the Reformation, he was consulted by Calvin and by Thomas Platter of Basle. His ideas greatly influenced German education—and also the Jesuit educational system. He was expelled from Strasbourg in 1581 for his liberalism and extraconfessional sympathies, but was eventually permitted to return. His many writings include a life of Beatus Rhenanus.

STYLITE (Gr. stulos, "pillar"). An ascetic who lived permanently on the top of a natural or artificial pillar. Usually a kind of hut or platform was placed on the top of the stone in order to give protection from the weather. Food and basic requirements were normally provided by admiring disciples. Apart from the solemn duties of prayer and fasting, stylites were often gifted preachers and theologians, addressing the crowds which gathered at the foot of their pillars and pronouncing on current theological controversy. The traditional founder of this form of the religious life was Simeon the Stylite.* It was through his example that others sought to become hermits and stylites, so that in the Near East this form of asceticism was fairly common until the tenth century.

SUÁREZ, FRANCISCO DE (1548-1617). Spanish Jesuit philosopher and theologian. Probably the greatest of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Scholastics, and perhaps even the greatest Jesuit theologian, he was born at Granada, studied canon law at Salamanca (1561-64), but after joining the Jesuits turned to theology and philosophy (1565-71). He was ordained in 1572 after he had already begun a lifelong career of teaching in Spanish universities (except for a five-year period at the Roman College from 1580). His last and longest appointment was as professor primarius at Coimbra (1597-1615).

Suárez published widely and made original contributions in legal and political theory, philosophy, and theology. His political and juridical doctrine is found primarily in De legibus (1612) and the polemical Defensio fidei . . . adversus anglicanae sectae errores (1613). With Francisco de Vitoria he helped lay the basis for international law, positing a natural community of nations whose relations are regulated by the "law of nations" (jus gentium)—a sort of natural/public law for the international community. His political doctrine is based on man's natural rights and on the idea that the people form the basis of political authority. He thus repudiated James I's* theory of divine right.* He held that the pope may depose for reasons of heresy (as a matter of Christian law), but may not violate a nation's natural rights.

His Metaphysical Disputations (1597?) combined Aristotelian and Thomistic logic with Scotist objections, producing a philosophical text widely used in Protestant and Catholic schools alike throughout the seventeenth century, and creating the system sometimes called "Suárezianism" or "Suarism." In theology, though basically a commentator on Aquinas's Summa, he contributed to the bitter Jesuit-Dominican dispute over the role and efficacy of grace on the side of the Jesuits, proposing a system known as "Congruism"—that God disposes an individual to salvation by giving congruent graces which by foreknowledge He sees will be useful in a given situation.

SUBLAPSARIANISM. This term refers to the position taken by one group of Calvinist theologians as the development of Calvinist scholasticism in the later sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries brought up the question of the precise purpose of predestination.* The opposing view was Supralapsarianism.* The Sublapsarian position held that God, in His decree of predestination, had as its object mankind-as-fallen. That is, loosely stated, that God created man with the possibility of the Fall, which happened, and then elected some men to salvation, leaving the rest in enmity with God. At issue is the logical order of the decrees, not the chronological (since God, as eternal, is outside time). The issue was thus notably difficult and abstruse, and Calvinist assemblies refused to make either position binding. Theologians concerned with working out a complete and logical dogmatic system tended toward Supralapsarianism. As the Sublapsarians pointed out, this position ran the danger of making God the author of sin. DIRK JELLEMA

SUBMERSION, see BAPTISM

SUBORDINATIONISM. An early, anti-Trinitarian, widely diffused sub-Christian Christology. One form of the doctrine concerned the origin of the preexistent Logos.* Most Christians rejected the Gnostic idea of intermediate beings, but that Christ is a divine being somewhat below the highest divine principle and that He derives His existence from it appealed to some, especially Origen.* Some see Subordinationist tendencies in Justin Martyr,* Irenaeus,* and Clement of Alexandria.* The fourth-century Arians (see ARIANISM) moved the christological issue back to the preincarnate origin of the Logos. Today, Jehovah's Witnesses* assign to Jesus Christ a preincarnate, derived existence.

Another form centered upon the man Jesus. He was a unique Galilean, perhaps sinless but still only a man, who was divinely endued (with the Christ) at his baptism for a special mission. The Ebionites,* Cerinthians, (see CERINTHUS) and Paul of Samosata* held similar views. The teachings condemned in 1 John are probably those of Cerinthus. The Trinitarian form of Subordinationism is "Dynamic Monarchianism." More recent Subordinationist Christologies are those of John Knox of New York and Norman Pittenger. The church has resolutely rejected christological reductionism in favor of the apostolic doctrine that Jesus Christ is the eternal Son of God made flesh.

SUBUNISTS. Name given to the party in Bohemia in the fifteenth century which defended the practice of Communion in one kind against the Utraquists* (Calixtines), according to the practice of the medieval church. The name derives from the Latin sub una specie ("under one kind"). With the Calixtines they received ecclesiastical recognition at the Prague Compacts (1433).

SUFFRAGAN. As the Latin etymology suggests, the concept is related to the vote and those processes involving its casting (suffrag-), with implications of favor or support. The late Roman Empire from the time of Constantine already had the problem of financial patronage for votes, and while often uprooted, the practice as often revived. The church likewise knew the practice; in the negative sense, the suffragan was that bishop whose vote could be counted upon by his metropolitan in synod. On the positive side, in the English Church from the thirteenth century the term could identify any auxiliary bishop who did not have the right of succession, in contrast to the coadjutor—though usage does not always bear out the distinction. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SUICER, JOHANN KASPAR (1620-1684). Swiss Reformed theologian. Born at Frauenfeld and educated at the French academies of Montauban and Saumur, he taught Latin, Greek, and Hebrew at Zurich from 1644, and was professor of Greek at the Collegium Carolinum (1660-83). After publishing several works on Greek linguistics, he brought out his magnum opus, Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus e Patribus Graecis Ordine Alphabetico (2 vols., 1682). This work shows immense erudition and extensive reading of patristic literature, and is still indispensable for students of the vocabulary of the Greek Fathers and of Greek ecclesiastical institutions (2nd enlarged ed., 1728). His son, Johann Heinrich (1646-1705), succeeded him at the Collegium Carolinum in 1683. J.G.G. NORMAN

SUICIDE. The act of taking one's own life. Traditional Christian teaching has consistently regarded suicide as a crime, and in this it has the support of most religious and moral codes. Some societies have tolerated suicide, but even these have attempted to limit it to certain categories, of which the religious suicides of Japan and the courageous suicides of the Greco-Roman world are examples. Greek and Roman philosophers were divided on the subject. It was condemned by Plato, Aristotle, and Cicero, but regarded as a reasonable exercise of freedom by the Epicureans and Stoics, especially Seneca. The latter view found support in the work of Thomas More* and John Donne,* and also in that of Voltaire,* Montesquieu, and Hume.* More recently it has been defended as permissible or even virtuous on the grounds that a man's life is his own and that in the last resort he must be allowed to terminate it at his own discretion, or more narrowly, that suicide is justifiable in cases of extreme senility or painful and incurable disease.

The traditional Christian view has no direct support from the Bible, in which various cases of suicide are mentioned but without reference to a penalty and without condemnation of it—perhaps because the biblical emphasis is on the joyous acceptance of life as a gift from God. It was formulated by Augustine* and other early Fathers of the Church. Augustine condemned suicide on the grounds that it was self-murder; that it precluded any opportunity for repentance; and that it was a cowardly act. These views found expression in church law, by which suicide was denounced by a series of councils and was elaborated by Aquinas* and other Scholastics during the Middle Ages. Aquinas condemned suicide as being contrary to the natural law, to man's natural inclinations, and to a proper self-love. He held that man has no right to deprive society of his presence and activity or to reject the gift of life given him by God.

In the twentieth century, increasing attention has been paid to the psychopathology and sociology of suicide, and this has led to certain modifications of the Christian view. It now seems clear that suicide is probably only rarely a carefully premeditated act, but is more often the result of mental illness, of an overwhelming sense of failure or rejection, of loneliness, or of the loss of status and income during severe economic depression.

SULPICIANS. The Society of St.-Sulpice was organized in 1642 by J.J. Olier* in the parish of St.-Sulpice in Paris. Sulpicians are secular priests whose principal task is the theological education of parish clergy. As secular priests, Sulpicians take no special vows and are permitted to hold private property. Nevertheless they are expected to use their property in the service of Christ and to own it as though they did not have it. Theological training has never meant for the Sulpicians merely instruction in Scripture and dogmatics without spiritual formation and devotion to prayer and ascetism. To encourage the spiritual formation of their students, Sulpicians live a common life with them and share their spiritual exercises. In the past Sulpicians were strongly Thomist in their theology, though their spirituality followed the methods developed by their third superior-general, L. Tronson (1676-1700).

The society spread to Canada in 1657, even before it received papal sanction and its own constitutions. While suffering a partial eclipse during the French Revolution, it was restored during the reign of Napoleon. In 1791, under J.A. Emery, the order founded St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, the oldest Roman Catholic seminary in the USA, now a pontifical university. The society has numbered among its members many distinguished theologians, such as the French Church historian P. Pourrat and the American biblical scholar Raymond Brown.

SUMMA (Lat. summa, "the totality"). A treatise giving a summary of the essence of a subject; in medieval times a compendium, used in the Schools as a textbook, of philosophy, theology, or canon law. The most famous summae are the Summa Theologica and Summa contra Gentiles of Thomas Aquinas,* but there were many others —e.g., the Summa Creaturis of Albertus Magnus.* Usually in the summae the subject under discussion is expounded by means of first stating, and then answering by means of the dialectical method, a series of questions. The Summae replaced the Sentences (e.g., those of Peter Lombard*) from the time of Aquinas onward.

SUMNER, CHARLES RICHARD (1790-1874). Bishop of Winchester. Brother of J.B. Sumner,* he was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, ordained in 1814, and was made a royal chaplain by George IV who had a high regard for him. In 1826 he was consecrated bishop of Llandaff, which post he held in conjunction with the deanery of St. Paul's, and in 1827 was translated to Winchester. Although a convinced Evangelical, he voted for the 1829 Catholic Emancipation Bill (against the king's wishes) and later regretted it. In 1850 he strongly protested against the restoration of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Sumner established new churches and poor schools in his diocese and improved the lot of agricultural laborers. Among his writings are the Ministerial Character of Christ Practically Considered (1824) and an edition of Milton's De Doctrina Christiana. He resigned his see in 1869. J.D. DOUGLAS

SUMNER, JOHN BIRD (1780-1862). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1848. Educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, he taught briefly at Eton, was ordained in 1803, became a canon of Durham (1820), and in 1828 was consecrated bishop of Chester, a see he held for twenty years before going to Canterbury. A strong Evangelical like his brother, C.R. Sumner,* he nevertheless like him voted for the Catholic Emancipation Bill in 1829. Later he opposed the Oxford Movement* and denied that baptismal regeneration was a fundamental doctrine of the Church of England. His published works include Apostolical Preaching (1815), A Treatise on the Records of the Creation (2 vols., 1816), and The Evidence of Christianity (1824). J.D. DOUGLAS

SUNDAR SINGH, SADHU (1889-c.1929). Indian Christian and mystic. The youngest of four children of wealthy Sikh parents in Rampur, North Punjab, he was deeply attached to his mother and was much distressed when she died in 1902. For a time he attended an American Presbyterian Mission school, but he was bitterly opposed to Christianity and publicly burned a copy of the gospels. Two days later he had a vision of Christ and was converted. Driven from home by his father, he became a preacher, wearing the saffron robe of a Sadhu ("holy man") in an endeavor to evangelize the Hindus. In 1905 he was baptized into the Church of England, but later refused to be restricted to a particular denomination. He traveled widely in Asia and visited the West, but was saddened by the love of comfort and luxury evident there. Despite ill-health, he persisted in evangelizing Tibet and disappeared there in 1929. J.G.G. NORMAN

SUNDAY. The primitive church in Palestine was almost entirely Jewish and as such continued Sabbath observance; it was a social necessity. In the Diaspora, Jewish Christians continued the practice as long as they preserved their Jewish identity, but Gentile Christians normally did not unless they accepted circumcision under the pressure of Judaizers. To be noted is that Sabbath observance was regarded as a specifically Jewish privilege and hence was not one of the Noachic commandments, the keeping of which was a prerequisite for social relationships between Jews and Gentiles, and so was not demanded by the council in Jerusalem (Acts 15:28f.). Paul mentions the Sabbath only once directly (Col. 2:16) and twice obliquely (Rom. 14:5f.; Gal. 4:10), thus showing how little practical importance the question had in his day. The social conditions of many Gentile converts, especially slaves, made Sabbath-keeping impossible, and provided a powerful motivation against its observance.

Most Jewish Christians continued to attend the synagogue until forced out—a process effectively carried through by the birkat ha-minum (about A.D. 90). This made the church's most natural time for the Lord's Supper Saturday evening, i.e., the beginning of Sunday, as seems to be the case in Acts 20:7. When under Trajan these evening gatherings apparently became illegal, the Supper was moved to the early Sunday morning. This move cut the last links with the Sabbath and made the connection with Christ's resurrection as a justification for specifically Sunday worship—something that must have been there from the first—virtually self-evident. The change from a natural tendency to a fixed rule will have been gradual but swift. The Quartodeciman* controversy shows that as late as the end of the second century it was not self-evident to all Christians that Easter had to fall on Sunday. 1 Corinthians 16:2 does not refer to a church gathering. While "the Lord's day" (Rev. 1:10) is probably Sunday (is Revelation from the time of Nero or Domitian?), it is unprovable. Sunday is called "the Lord's day of the Lord" in Didache 14 and "the Lord's day" by Ignatius. For Justin Martyr* the Sunday service is standard. From then on, the term "the Lord's day" rapidly became the norm. Melito* of Sardis (d. c.190) wrote a thesis on The Lord's Day.

No evidence for the equating of Sabbath and Sunday is found before the end of the third century, but by that time there was an increasing stress on the true, i.e., spiritual, observance of the Sabbath, and it was, at least in theory, observed as a day of worship alongside Sunday. Emperor Constantine in 321 issued an edict requiring "rest on the venerable day of the sun" by the cessation of public works and the closing of the law courts, but agricultural labor was expressly excepted. From then on we find a growing stress on the necessity of Sunday rest, but the reason given is that men should be free to attend worship, not that Sunday is the "Christian Sabbath"—a phrase not found until the twelfth century. This stress on worship is the Roman Catholic and Orthodox position today.

The earlier Reformers—e.g., Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, Tyndale, Cranmer, Knox—insisted on the value of Sunday as a day of rest and worship, but refused to regard it as the Christian fulfillment of the Sabbath. In Britain, but not Europe, a rigorist reaction by the Puritans set in. Nicholas Bownde gave it classical expression in 1593 (see bibliography). Scotland adopted Sabbatarian legislation already in 1579; England followed suit after the Puritan triumph in the Civil War, and the legislation was only slightly relaxed under Charles II. Similar laws were enforced in most of the New England states in America. The Evangelical Revival and the growth of middle-class respectability led to a stiffening of these laws in Britain, and to the growth of Sabbatarian groups in Europe where, however, they never exercised much influence.

In Britain, especially in England, the observance of Sunday, both religiously and legally, has been steadily eroded since the mid-nineteenth century. The main influences have been the growth of the large towns; the steady rise of the working class, in large measure alienated from organized religion; the growth of public utilities demanding Sunday work for their functioning; radio and television; and two major world wars. The church is rapidly returning to the position it found itself in during the first two centuries as far as Sunday observance is concerned.

SUNDAY, WILLIAM ASHLEY ("Billy") (1862-1935). American evangelist. A professional baseball player who worked between seasons as a fireman on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, he experienced an evangelical conversion through the Pacific Garden Mission (1886). After serving as assistant secretary of the religious department of Chicago YMCA (1891-93), he helped J. Wilbur Chapman* in mass evangelism for two years. From 1896 he worked independently, combining superb organization with sensational preaching. His campaigns, held in many American cities, were conducted in huge wooden tabernacles.

Because of the organizational methods, the impact of his campaigns was citywide. The "Sunday Party," a group of at least twenty experts, was responsible for such matters as advance planning, publicity, music, specialized work among businessmen, businesswomen, students, and so on. In addition to the central meetings, sectional meetings were held throughout the city, and "delegations" from various sectional interests were arranged. Thousands of church members were recruited to assist the running of the campaign, and the churches were closed for its duration. Sunday developed a preaching style which combined crude humor with florid rhetoric. He nevertheless played down emotionalism, and called for a down-to-earth commitment to Christ. Of the 100 millions who heard him preach, one million are said to have "hit the trail." Strongly fundamentalist in theology, he opposed evolution and advocated temperance. HAROLD H. ROWDON

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. The beginnings of an organized movement are usually dated from 1780 when Robert Raikes,* a Gloucester journalist, established a small school to care for local slum children who were neglected and illiterate. He wrote an article about his work which caught people's imagination and encouraged the setting up of Sunday schools throughout England. The first schools taught reading and writing as well as Scripture. The movement spread to the Continent and to America, where the First Day Society was established in Philadelphia in 1790. Raikes saw the culmination of his efforts when the Sunday School Union was founded in 1803 and received great support in evangelical circles. When general education became widespread in the nineteenth century, the Sunday schools concentrated increasingly on religious education. Most of the classes in Britain and the USA have been conducted by voluntary teachers with no special training for this type of work.

SUPERINTENDENT. A literal translation of the Greek work episkopos usually rendered into English by "bishop." In the OT it was applied to the seventy delegated to assist Moses, and later to other officials during the period of the monarchy. In the NT this term is also employed, but usually is equated with "elder" (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet. 2:25). At the time of the Reformation the Lutheran churches in Germany and Scandinavia tended to use the term in place of "bishop," which had become distasteful to Protestants by virtue of its association with the great prelates of the Roman Catholic Church. After the Saxon visitation of 1527 they were instituted as state officials, but soon they came under the control of the consistory, a supervisory body with no very clearly defined powers.

The superintendent usually had authority over the clergy and congregations within his province, inducted pastors to their parishes, had general oversight of discipline, particularly excommunication, and acted as the church's administrative officer. In some areas there were general superintendents over other superintendents. In recent years the office has changed considerably. Attempts have been made to prove that the superintendents established in Scotland by the first Book of Discipline were of the same type, and while the title may have been taken over from the Lutheran churches, there were important differences, i.e., the office was temporary, the superintendents were directly responsible to the general assembly, and the superintendent could act in a number of instances only with the concurrence of the local ministers and church sessions. The office was finally abolished as the presbyteries became established.

W.S. REID

SUPRALAPSARIANISM. Particularly applied to the position taken by some Calvinist theologians as the development of Calvinist scholasticism after the mid-sixteenth century brought to the fore the knotty problem of the precise meaning of predestination.* Theologians such as Beza,* eager to have a fully worked out and internally consistent dogmatic, tended to be Supralapsarian (as against Sublapsarian*). At issue was the question of the logical order of God's actions in predestination (not the chronological, for God, as eternal, is outside time), and the problem was thus notably abstruse. The supra position held that God created mankind with the original idea in mind that some would be saved and some would not be; and then allowed the Fall, to bring about this intention. This seemed to imply, as the Sublapsarians pointed out, that God willed the Fall and was thus the author of sin. This the Supralapsarians denied, accusing their opponents of weakening God's sovereignty and indirectly holding to man's free will. Calvinist assemblies refused to support either position as binding. Thus, at the Synod of Dort,* Gomarus's attempt to have the supra position upheld failed; in the Swiss churches, later attempts to have the supra position condemned failed (cf. Formula of Consensus, 1675).

SUPREMACY, ACT OF (1534). This piece of legislation passed by the English Parliament during the reign of Henry VIII* declared the king to be "the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England." Although it was repealed during the reign of the Roman Catholic queen Mary Tudor,* it was restored under Elizabeth I* in 1559, except that the reference now was to "supreme governor." This is the basis on which diocesan bishops are still appointed by the sovereign on the advice of the prime minister.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS: RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. Religious liberty in the United States is a fundamental principle of the American constitutional system at both state and federal level. It is a tangible expression in law of the view laid down by Roger Williams,* Puritan "Seeker," that Christianity, being a life of personal faith, has no need of political support. This was expressed in part by various acts of religious toleration in the English colonies. The disestablishment of the Anglican Church in the State of Virginia (1786) laid the groundwork for the clause in the new Federal Constitution (1789) which forbade a religious test for public office.

Religious liberty is guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Federal Constitution which forbids Congress to legislate "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This provision has been extended by the Supreme Court, chief arbiter of constitutional questions, to state governments under the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment placing definite limitations upon state control of the civil rights of American citizens.

The "free exercise" clause received its first major test in Reynolds v. United States (1879). The court upheld a federal statute outlawing polygamy by denying its practice under constitutional guarantees of religious freedom. The court admitted that it could not pass upon the validity of religious beliefs because of "a wall of separation between Church and State" laid down by the First Amendment. It declared, however, that men's actions were subject to legal regulation in the interest of public welfare. Later the court upheld the power of Congress to annul the charter of the Mormon* Church for violation of federal law, and denied that Congress was creating "an establishment of religion" by barring the franchise to Mormons practicing polygamy.

Subsequent rulings involving religious liberty issues employed the public-welfare principle to justify a grant of federal funds to a nonsectarian hospital corporation, whose services were maintained by a Catholic sisterhood, and the purchase of textbooks by state funds for parochial school pupils.

More recently the "free exercise" clause has been invoked in cases involving Sunday closing laws, religious tests for public office, and the orthodoxy of religious tenets. The court continues to deny jurisdiction in matters of belief. It supports Sunday closing laws on public-welfare grounds, and protects individuals against loss of employment benefits because their religious convictions prohibit work on Sunday or Saturday.

To claim exemption from compulsory military service under the "free exercise" clause was long recognized by the court as legitimate, provided the applicant was a member of a church or sect whose tenets denied the morality of war. In 1970 the court modified this position by accepting "deeply held moral, ethical, or religious beliefs" as a basis for such exemption.

In Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940), the first of the Jehovah's Witnesses* cases, the First Amendment guarantees of religious liberty were extended to a state government under the restraining clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. There followed a number of cases involving the right of this sect to propagate its views through the distribution and sale of handbills and religious books, and the right to claim exemption for their children from saluting the flag in the schools. The power of municipal corporations to tax vendors of such literature, the propriety of enforcing child labor laws in regulating the use of children in the distribution of religious propaganda, and objection to the verbal content of recorded messages became related issues.

The court early ruled that a state could require the flag salute as a demonstration of loyalty, but reversed its position in a succeeding opinion. In most instances the court considered the guarantees of the First Amendment, including religious liberty, as occupying a privileged position in American rights. Child labor laws, however, could be enforced, objectionable language was not protected, religious parades could be restricted by police regulations, and vendors could be limited when their presence in public or private premises became a recognizable public nuisance.

The court was unprepared for the controversy which developed over its opinion approving the busing of parochial school students at public expense. Justice Black, speaking for the majority in Everson v. Board of Education (1947), reaffirmed the "wall of separation" doctrine and denied that the use of public money for such purpose was "an establishment of religion." Rather, it was the use of tax power for the general welfare. Justice Jackson and others found this to be an important step toward breaking down the "wall of separation," even though the money was paid directly to the parents and not to the school. The court appeared to contradict itself the next year in McCollum v. Board of Education when it outlawed the use of public school facilities for "released time" (time devoted during the school day) religious instruction under church auspices. Such use, said the court, involved an "establishment of religion." Four years later it approved "released time" instruction when offered in other than school facilities.

Congressional approval of direct financial aid to private and public schools in 1965 alarmed those who feared that the establishment clause had been violated. Parochial aid statutes implementing these grants were adopted in New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. The first, requiring school boards to provide textbooks to all children at public expense, was approved by the court in 1968. The Pennsylvania statute, granting financial aid to parochial schools for instruction in nonreligious subjects, was invalidated in 1971, as was the Rhode Island attempt to supplement the salaries of parochial school teachers. The court declared that aid thus granted must have a secular legislative purpose, must neither advance or inhibit religion, and must not foster "an excessive government entanglement with religion." Champions of church and state separation were unhappy with a simultaneous decision approving construction grants to colleges and universities, regardless of their affiliation with religious bodies, under the Higher Education Facilities Act. The court justified its opinion on the ground that there was less danger of religious influence in higher education and that the facilities constructed would be conspicuously neutral.

Whatever controversy was engendered by the financial support issue appears minimal when compared with the public furor over decisions outlawing prayer and Bible reading in the public schools. In Engel v. Vitale (1962) the court held that the voluntary recitation of a prayer composed by representatives of the leading faiths and approved for use in the schools by the state was a step toward "an establishment of religion" and must be disallowed. Similarly, the court found that a Pennsylvania statute requiring the reading of ten Bible verses daily in the schools constituted state support of religion. Three successive efforts were made up to 1974 to secure congressional approval for an amendment to the First Amendment that would permit students to engage in voluntary prayer on school premises. All failed.

S. RICHEY KAMM

SURIN, JEAN JOSEPH (1600-1665). French mystic. He was born in Bordeaux and studied in the Jesuit college there, and at Collège de Clermont, Paris, entering the order in 1616. At Cardinal Richelieu's request he went to Loudun (1636) to be the exorcist in a community of Ursuline nuns diabolically possessed. As a result, he believed himself to be possessed, which devastating experience persisted for twenty years, finally advancing his own spirituality as a mystic. He was accused of Quietism and of overstressing the extraordinary in the mystical life. The Italian translation of his Catéchisme spirituel was put on the Index, though Bossuet defended his orthodoxy and Fénelon esteemed him. Les Fondements de la vie spirituelle (1667), Dialogues spirituels (1704-9), and other works emphasize purification through suffering and self-denial.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

SURPLICE. A liturgical garment, medieval and monastic in origin. The term is a corruption of the Latin superpelliceum, meaning "to be worn over the pelisse or fur gown." In the unheated churches of N Europe it was necessary to wear a fur-lined gown, and the difficulty of getting the more primitive, tight-sleeved albe over this garment led to the evolution of the larger surplice. By the fourteenth century it was the essential choir-vestment everywhere, but it was never worn by the celebrant at the Eucharist. The 1552 English Prayer Book retained it as the only vestment, and under Elizabeth I the Puritans strongly objected to its use as "papistical." Parker's Advertisements (1566) and the 1604 Canons ordered its use for all church services. In the Revised Canons, it is one of the permitted forms of eucharistic vesture, and customary for all other services. The modern surplice is shorter and less full than the medieval.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

SUSO, HENRY, see HENRY SUSO

SUVERMERIAN. A term used to describe the eucharistic doctrine held by Archbishop Cranmer* between 1549 and 1555. Charles Smyth in his Cranmer and the Reformation under Edward VI (1926) reintroduced this term of a theology when in fact Saxon theologians latinized Schwarmer as swermeros to apply to theologians. More recently, Horton Davies has substituted the term "Virtualism" to link Cranmer with Bucer, Bullinger, Calvin, and Peter Martyr.

SVERDRUP, GEORG (1848-1907). American church leader. Of Norwegian origin, he studied theology in Oslo and at German universities. In 1874 he was called to America as a professor of theology at Augsburg Seminary, Minneapolis. Norwegian immigrants to America were mainly Lutherans, but by theological and ecclesiastical persuasion they were divided in several organized church bodies. By family tradition Sverdrup had a liberal political outlook, and he did not believe in an authoritarian church system such as the one he had known in Norway.* He had accepted the ideal of "living" Christianity, and in his new country he felt convinced that this would prosper only in the frame of a free church with lay preaching and independent congregations. He became therefore the champion of the free-church ideal. The Norwegian Lutheran Church was founded in 1897 and organized according to Sverdrup's ideas. A six-volume edition of his works was published in 1909-12.

CARL FR. WISLOFF

SWAINSON, CHARLES ANTHONY (1820-1887). Anglican theologian. Son of a Liverpool merchant, he was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, from 1837. Later he became a fellow of Christ's College (1841), principal of Chichester Theological College (1854), Norrisian professor of divinity at Cambridge (1864), master of Christ's College (1881), and vice-chancellor of the university (1885). He was an authority on church creeds and liturgies; he traveled widely to view early manuscripts and published several works on the subject. His book, The Greek Liturgies (1884), is still used. Generous, unselfish, and devoted to the practical work of the ministry despite his high academic standing, he reckoned himself a disciple of Hooker* and the older English divines.

R.E.D. CLARK

SWEDEN. Politics and religion joined hands in early missionary enterprises; when Louis the Pious sought further domains, the missionary he chose was Anskar* (801-65). Failing in Denmark,* the latter turned to Sweden. King Bjorn gave permission to preach and build a church, the first in Scandinavia. Few Swedes responded, and the work faded for a time, but in the latter tenth century Christianity became established with bishops. Early in the eleventh century, King Olof Skotonung was baptized and established an archbishopric at Skara (1020). Later, under Svenkers (1130-55), paganism was overcome with the help of Cistercian monks from England and Germany, one of whom—Stephan—became first archbishop of Uppsala. Soon the Swedish bishops became subordinate to Rome.

For Sweden, as elsewhere, the Reformation was bound up with political reaction to foreign power —in this case, Denmark. Christian II attempted to subdue Sweden and murdered eighty of its leaders in 1520 ("The Stockholm Blood Bath"). The young Gustavus Vasa* gathered a peasant army, drove the Danes out, and was crowned king in 1528. All sympathizers with Christian fled, including Archbishop Tolle. Denuded of ecclesiastical leadership and finance, Vasa appropriated the possessions and revenues of the church.

Lutheranism came through Olavus Petri* (1480-1552), who taught at the cathedral school in Strangnas, becoming friendly with the archdeacon, Lars Anderson (1450-1552). Vasa met both men and invited them to Stockholm, Petri as preacher, Anderson as chancellor. Rome disapproved, whereupon Vasa applied for the consecration of four bishops-elect, adding that Sweden was unable to pay the customary annates. If the request were denied, the bishops would be consecrated by "Christ the only and highest pontiff." Two bishops who still protested their loyalty to Rome performed the consecration, thus maintaining the "apostolic succession." The rift with Rome was complete; 1527 saw the first national Protestant church established, in Sweden. Reforms included abolition of compulsory confessions, clerical celibacy, and preaching aided by a Swedish Bible as an important part of worship.

Lars Anderson, Olavus Petri, and his brother Lars Petri (1499-1573), later archbishop of Uppsala, played a significant part in the reforms. Olavus prepared a Swedish hymnal and a Swedish Mass, in all of which Luther was a prime influence. They saw that the principle of the Peace of Augsburg,* that rulers could determine religion, was reversed in Sweden, where faith was decided by the people. Restricting Vasa's power caused a rift between king and bishops, but his plan to restrict episcopal power was defeated by his death.

Thereafter there were many attempts to change church structure: Eric XIV introduced Calvinism; John III sought a rapprochement with Rome; Charles IX introduced Calvinism again. All failed, and the country remained Lutheran.

In 1638 commercial and evangelical interests in the Indians produced a Swedish colony in Delaware, and until 1791 the Church of Sweden continued to send clergy and finance. After 1815 and the humiliations of the Napoleonic Wars, there was a reaction against eighteenth-century rationalism, aided by Pietists and Moravians. Two theological trends appeared: Lund stressed the Church and became the center of High Church tendencies, Uppsala stressed a subjective and philosophical view of Christianity, discounting the Church. Furthermore, through the work of George Scott, an English Methodist, Bible and tract work developed; Sunday school and foreign missions were concentrated on, and the result was the Swedish Mission Covenant in 1878, bringing together most free churches.

With the religious revival, a church council, the Kyrkomote, came into being in 1863. Lay organizations and evangelism grew. In 1894 the World Student Christian Movement was inaugurated in Sweden. The Evangelical National Institute, formed in 1856, became a leading missionary movement. Nevertheless the effects of the nineteenth-century theological debates in Europe were evident; ideologies such as Marxism were being accepted; and noticeably in industry men were forsaking the faith. Having said that, it remains true that Protestantism was more vigorous in 1914 than in 1815.

Sweden made a distinguished contribution to the ecumenical movement through Nathan Söderblom.* Among those who reacted to nineteenth-century liberalism were the scholars Gustav Aulén* and Anders Nygren.*

GORDON A. CATHERALL

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL (1688-1772). Swedish scientist, philosopher, and theologian. Born in Stockholm, he was the son of a minister who was later appointed bishop of Skara. Emanuel was a keen student who studied the classics and Cartesian philosophy at Uppsala and became interested in mathematics and natural sciences. In 1709 he went abroad to study languages and mechanics at London, Oxford, Amsterdam, and Paris. After his return to Sweden (1715), he was appointed an assessor of the royal Board of Mines, a post he held until 1747 when he resigned to study the Scriptures. In 1719 he was made a noble by Queen Ulrika Eleanora and assumed the name "Swedenborg." He described his mining and engineering accomplishments in a large work, Opera Philosophica et Minerazia (3 vols., 1733), which explained the origin of the universe in a mechanical manner. Swedenborg abandoned the materialist view, however, and the next year he published A Philosophical Argument on the Infinite and Final Cause of Creaton, which followed the Neoplatonic teachings of the seventeenth-century Protestant mystics.

From this time he applied himself to discovering the nature of the soul and spirit by means of anatomical studies. For this purpose he studied at Paris, Venice, and Rome (1736-39) and published his results in the Economy of the Animal Kingdom (1739). Here he developed his doctrine of series and degrees which states that the soul must descend into matter by four degrees. Swedenborg experienced strange dreams and visions which increased in frequency after 1739. This led to a profound spiritual crisis (1743-45) relieved by a vision of Jesus Christ which he felt confirmed his interpretation of Christianity. Thereafter he spent the rest of his life expounding the ideas of the true Christian religion—in reality a Neoplatonic philosophy which admitted the historical Jesus Christ.

His first exegetical work was the Heavenly Secrets (8 vols., 1749-56), followed by many others, including The True Christian Religion (1771). In these works characterized by vivid descriptions of his experiences in the spiritual world, Swedenborg teaches the existence of spirits and angels, denies the Trinity and vicarious atonement, and describes God the invisible spaceless timeless One as manifesting himself on earth as Jesus Christ (the soul being the eternal Father, the body the son of Mary, and the Holy Spirit the action caused by the union of two). He held that man's spirit lives after death according to its earthly justification—good men gather in heaven, and the selfish seek their kind in hell. He also believed that the churches over the years had destroyed the original meaning of God's word and the Swedenborgian mission was to restore its primary sense. This message marked the transition in 1757 to a new age foretold in Scripture by the statements about the return of Messiah and the foundation of the New Jerusalem. Swedenborg did not try to win converts, however, but confined himself to publishing his revelations. His influence has been considerable, particularly on the Romantic movement and psychical science. In 1787 his religious followers organized into a group known as the New Church, or New Jerusalem Church.*

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

SWEELINCK, JAN PIETERSZON (1562-1621). Dutch composer. From about 1580 until his death he was organist of the Oude Kerk in Amsterdam. It is not clear that he ever went to Italy, but he was certainly greatly influenced by Zarlino, the great Italian theorist, for he left a theoretical work based on the Venetian's work. Sweelinck was much influenced by the English keyboard masters such as John Bull. In turn he was the chief figure behind the N German school of organists, a number of whom studied with him—notably Scheidt. He wrote many fine motets with Latin text, which show a growing sense for major and minor tonality rather than the older modes. Best known is his brilliant setting of the popular Christmas text "Hodie Christus natus est," a perennial favorite with cappella choirs. Some of his finest work is in his four volumes of motetlike settings of the Genevan Psalms, employing the original French texts. In view of the Calvinistic disapproval of polyphonic music, these were written not for church but for a collegium musicum of Dutch musical amateurs. Sweelinck was the last great composer to use extensively the Genevan Psalms.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

SWEET, WILLIAM WARREN (1881-1959). Methodist scholar. Born in Baldwin, Kansas, he was educated at Ohio Wesleyan University, Drew Theological Seminary, and Crozer Theological Seminary. After five years in the ministry he earned a Ph.D. at the University of Pennsylvania; his dissertation, published as The Methodist Episcopal Church and the Civil War (1912), initiated that prolific publication that was to make him "the dean of the historians of Christianity in America." He taught at Ohio Wesleyan (1911-13), DePauw University (1913-27), and the Divinity School of the University of Chicago (1927-46). His fundamental concern was to give such a reputation to church history that secular historians could no longer ignore its role. He influenced both the writing of general American history by calling attention to those often neglected "civilizing and cultural forces" of religion, and that of denominational histories by broadening individual examples to see their place within the total development of America and its peculiar form of Christianity. His many works include Religion on the American Frontier (1931-46), The Story of Religion in America (1930; 2nd rev. ed., 1950), and Religion in Colonial America (1942).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SWETE, HENRY BARCLAY (1835-1917). Anglican scholar. A clergyman's son, he was born in Bristol, educated at King's College, London, and at Cambridge, and after ordination served a number of parishes before becoming professor of pastoral theology in King's College, London (1882-90). He edited the Latin text of Theodore of Mopsuestia's commentary on Pauline epistles (1880-82) and issued The Old Testament in Greek (3 vols., 1887-91). In 1890 he became regius professor of divinity at Cambridge, from which post he retired in 1915. The Cambridge years were productive of various topics in liturgy and theology, and of the origination of the lexical project for patristic Greek (1906; published 1961-68) which emerged from his studies of various aspects of early Christian history. Apart from the Septuagint his Greek texts edited and annotated included the gospel of Mark (1898) and the Book of Revelation (1906). He was instrumental in founding the Journal of Theological Studies (1899), and the publication with J.H. Srawley of The Cambridge Handbooks of Liturgical Study (1910). He edited the Gospel of Peter from a newly discovered fragment (1893) and wrote major studies of the Holy Spirit in the NT (1909) and in the early church (1912).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

SWIFT, JONATHAN (1667-1745). Irish satirist and clergyman. Born in Dublin, he was educated there at Trinity College. After a period as secretary to Sir William Temple, he took orders and became prebendary of Kilroot in Ireland. There he wrote A Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books, two of his wittiest satires. He received some ecclesiastical preferment, but his real interest in the first decade of the new century lay in London and politics, where he attached himself in particular to the Tories under Harley and Bolingbroke. After the Hanoverian succession in 1714 he withdrew from politics and spent the rest of his life as dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, suffering periodically and ultimately continually from painful mental disorder. His greatest work is Gulliver's Travels with its ingenious but also very gloomy view of humanity. Swift had little faith in his fellowmen and immense capacity for showing it. Together these qualities make him one of the most powerful satirists in any literature. His prose is forthright and straightforward, and these same characteristics are to be found in his sermons with their short sentences, logical progression, and calm assurance.

ARTHUR POLLARD

SWISS GUARD. Formed in 1506 by Pope Julius II, it is entrusted with the personal protection of the pontiff. Members of the corps must be Swiss in nationality, Roman Catholic in faith, and eligible for service in the Swiss army. There are about sixty guards in all, and since the disbanding of three other corps of papal guards in 1970 they remain the only military order in the Vatican. The Guard retains its colorful Renaissance costumes, and although members are trained in the use of modern weapons they carry only the halberd and broadsword.

SWITHIN (Swithun) (d.862). Bishop of Winchester. Probably a secular clerk, he advised Egbert, king of Wessex, and taught his son Ethelwulf. Consecrated bishop on Ethelwulf's succession, he became one of his chief counselors. By his own wish his body was buried outside the cathedral's north wall. It was moved inside in 971, giving rise to the legend connecting forty days' rain with St. Swithin's Day (15 July). It was moved again in 1093. He was canonized by popular tradition, and his shrine was destroyed by Henry VIII.

SYLLABUS OF ERRORS. A list of eighty propositions condemning the doctrines of liberalism attached to the encyclical Quanta Cura issued by Pius IX* on 8 December 1864. The first impulse toward the drawing up of the Syllabus came from the Provincial Council of Spoleto in 1849 when Gioacchino Vincenza Pecci, bishop of Perugia (later Leo XIII*) requested a condemnation of modern errors. He wanted to bring together under the form of a constitution the chief errors of the time. Preparation of the Syllabus began in 1852 and continued over a period of twelve years. In 1860 O.P. Gerbet issued a Pastoral Instruction in which he listed eighty-five errors. This list, which became the basis of the Syllabus, was modified into sixty-one theses and was approved by an assembly of bishops at Rome in 1862. The final stage of preparation began with the appointment of a new commission by Pius IX which incorporated thirty of the approved sixty-one theses in its formulation of the eighty errors to be condemned. The wording of the errors was taken from the earlier official declarations of Pius IX. A reference was added to each of the eighty theses to indicate its content so as to determine the true meaning and theological value of the subjects treated.

The Syllabus was arranged under ten headings: Pantheism, Naturalism, and Absolute Rationalism; Moderate Rationalism; Indifferentism and False Tolerance in Religious matters; Socialism, Communism, Secret Societies, Bible Societies, and Liberal Clerical Associations; the Church and its Rights; the State and its Relation to the Church; Natural and Christian Ethics; Christian Marriage; Temporal Power of the Pope; and Modern Liberalism.

The pope's enemies saw in the Syllabus a formal rejection of modern culture and a declaration on the modern state. Belgians objected to it on the ground that it infringed constitutional rights. On 1 January 1865, publication of the Syllabus and encyclical was forbidden in France, although the prohibition was later withdrawn. In France and Germany it was seen as creating a cleavage between the church and the modern world. The Syllabus was a blow to liberalism. Roman Catholics saw the intellectual movement of the nineteenth century as a threat to the foundations of human and divine order in the world. They regarded the Syllabus as a necessary attempt to stem this tide which was undermining the influence of the Catholic Church on the life of nations and individuals. S. TOON

SYLVESTER II (Gerbert) (c.945-1003). Pope from 999. One of the important leaders of the intellectual revival of the late tenth century, he was born in Auvergne, was educated at the Benedictine monastery as Aurillac, and later studied in Spain. He became a teacher at the cathedral school at Reims and was noted for his knowledge of mathematics and natural science. He may have introduced Arabic numerals to W Europe, and he is credited with the invention of the pendulum clock. In addition, he was an avid and skilled letter writer, and his surviving letters are important historical sources. In 983 he aided Empress Theophano in securing the German crown for her son, Otto III. He also supported the election of Hugh Capet, the first Capetian king of France, in 996. In the following year he went to Otto III's court to become his teacher, and through Otto's influence he was made archbishop of Ravenna in 998, and pope in 999.

He was the first Frenchman to become pope, and he headed the church at a time when it was plagued by serious corruption. He attacked the outstanding evils of the day by fighting secular control of ecclesiastical appointments, simony, and nepotism. He was influential in the spread of Christianity in E Europe. He granted Poland its first archbishopric in 1000, and established an archbishopric and new bishoprics in Hungary. He was also skilled in philosophy, and wrote a philosophical tract, De Rationali et de ratione uti. A treatise on the Eucharist, De Corpore et Sanguine Christi, has also been attributed to him.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

SYLVESTRINES. A minor monastic order following a rather Benedictine rule, stressing poverty, founded by Sylvester Gozzolini (1177-1267) in 1231. Centered in Italy except for a few houses in Portugal, Brazil, and Ceylon (where they have had a large mission since 1855), they have also a convent of nuns. The habit is blue, the abbot-general resides in the mother-house in Rome, and the constitutions of 1690 obtain, following the short-lived union with the Vallumbrosans* (1662-80).

SYMMACHUS. This second-century Ebionite* is remembered primarily for his translation of the Hebrew OT into Greek. The translation was readable, but it lacked verbal accuracy and thus the extant fragments of his work have been of little value to textual critics, although Origen* did incorporate Symmachus's work into his Hexapla. He was particularly offended at the many anthropomorphic expressions in the OT and promptly removed them. He is referred to in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History.

SYMMACHUS (d.514). Pope from 498. A double papal election followed when Pope Anastasius II died in 498. Division and schism marked the whole pontificate of Symmachus. Anastasius II had alienated many by accepting repentant schismatics. In 483 Pope Simplicius had bound his successors against the alienation of church property. At Anastasius's death each party elected a pope. One party decided on the intractable Laurentius and the other on Symmachus. There were riots and street battles as general disorder prevailed. Theodoric the Ostrogothic king intervened in behalf of Symmachus. Laurentius forced Symmachus to appear at Ravenna to clear his name. Theodoric chose a council of bishops who met at Rome in May 500. When Symmachus refused to appear, the bishops would not condemn him in absentia. Theodoric forced them to remain until the deadlock was resolved in October 501. The dating of Easter* was one point of dissension between Theodoric and Symmachus. The council broke up, giving "absolution by default." Laurentius reappeared in support of Theodoric. Symmachus called a synod which declared in November 502 that his see was beyond man's judgment. The decree of 483 was null and void. Not until Theodoric withdrew support of Laurentius in 507 was Symmachus undisturbed.

The Symmachan Forgeries appeared when Ennodius* of Milan argued that only God could judge the bishops of Rome. The popular works which support the decision of 501 purported to be the Acts of Sinuessa under Pope Marcellinus, the Constitution of Pope Sylvester I, the Gesta of Pope Liberius,* and certain acts clearing Pope Sixtus III. As incorporated in the *Liber Pontificalis, these forgeries became history. The fourth-century *Liberian Catalogue of Roman bishops was the primary authority for the first compiler of this papal biography written during the pontificate of Symmachus. Both sides wrote similar documents, evidence that papal schism could become a stimulus to propaganda.

SYNAGOGUE, see JUDAISM

SYNCELLUS. This Byzantine concept is a Greek-Latin hybrid: Greek kella from Latin cella, found in inscriptions from the second century A.D., identified a room or chamber especially for storage of wine, papyri, etc., whence it came to designate the "cell" of a monk. The chamber-mate, synkellos, known from the fifth century, was the ecclesiastic who shared living quarters with another. In the case the latter was a ranking prelate, the duties of the former were those of domestic chaplain, but it appears he functioned often as little more than ecclesiastical spy. Yet his association could make him an obvious choice for succession.

SYNCELLUS, GEORGE, see GEORGE SYNCELLUS

SYNCRETISM. The mixture of various systems of thought; a union of opposites on the basis of what they hold in common. Syncretism is to be distinguished from eclecticism* in that the latter results in a new system, whereas the elements in a syncretizing process still retain their old character. Syncretism can also be thought of as an attempt to distinguish between essential and non- or less-essential elements in a religion or philosophy. More specifically, the name is given to a movement in the Lutheran Church in the seventeenth century led by individuals such as Georg Calixtus* in the direction of interconfessional union coupled with a protest against what was regarded as dogmatic rigidity in Lutheran and Reformed churches. The interconfessional and, sometimes, interfaith emphasis of the modern ecumenical movement bespeaks the strong syncretist current in it. PAUL HELM

SYNERGISM. The view that the will of man cooperates with the action of divine grace by having an independent part to play in conversion. As such, synergism is Semi-Pelagian* in character, denying the efficacy of divine grace and man's spiritual "death." Synergism came into prominence in second- and third-generation Lutheranism as a reaction against the strongly monergistic, Augustinian emphasis of Luther* himself ("Free will determined without grace has no power with respect to righteousness, but is necessarily involved in sin"). Melanchthon,* in his later period, taught the universality of divine grace and forbade further investigation into the divine and human factors in conversion. He spoke of "the Word, the Holy Spirit, and the will, not absolutely inert, but struggling against its own infirmity" as the "three concurrent causes of good action." The inadequacies of synergism reflect the methodological failure of attempting to analyze a theological issue in psychological terms. PAUL HELM

SYNOD. An ecclesiastical deliberative and legislative assembly. In the Roman Catholic Church it is a gathering of priests and clergy of a diocese, called by the bishop to determine legislation for the diocese or to apply the canon law to particular situations. Benedict XIV ruled that a synod must always be considered as a convocation of the diocese, as opposed to a council, which is a convocation of all the bishops of the Catholic world. The first synod was probably held under Bishop Siricius in Rome in 387. Originally a synod differed from a council only in its finality. Vatican II gave rise to a nondiocesan synod in its teaching concerning the collegiality of bishops. In 1969 Paul VI opened the first biennial synod, composed of representative bishops elected by their respective episcopal conferences as delegates.

In Presbyterian churches, synod is a court of review immediately superior to the presbytery, and consists of all ministers and elders who are members of presbyteries. Synod in the Waldensian Church is the annual legislative assembly composed of clergy and laity. ROYAL L. PECK

SYNOPTIC GOSPELS. The first three gospels, Matthew, Mark and Luke, are known as the Synoptic Gospels because they share a common outline of events as contrasted with the Fourth Gospel. Their basic similarity of structure, however, allows for considerable variation in the order of separate units of narrative. The similarity stretches not only to the considerable quantity of common material, but also to verbal agreements in much of the material. It is the combination of similarity and dissimilarity which constitutes the synoptic problem mentioned below.

These gospels are of utmost importance as sources of knowledge for the life of Christ. Since information from noncanonical sources is almost nonexistent, and since the character of the fourth gospel has caused many to question its validity as a historical source, the historian of Jesus Christ has relied almost exclusively on the synoptic gospels. From the Acts* and Epistles* only the barest outline of the historical Jesus is possible, while the secular evidence can do little more than establish the bare fact that he lived and died. Although the quest for the historical Jesus has itself been considered invalid by some modern schools of interpretation (notably form-criticism*), historians find it difficult to account for the subsequent emergence of the Christian Church unless some historical validity is granted to the records of his life and work. The synoptic gospels have therefore been in the forefront of the modern critical debate concerning Jesus Christ.

As documents which purport to be historical, the question of origin is of basic importance. It has engaged the attention of scholars throughout the period of criticism. The types of solution which have been proposed may be summarized in the following way.

(1) One theory is that all three synoptic gospels were composed from basically the same oral tradition and that the variations are the result of each author's choice regarding the material to be used. But most scholars do not see how so much common material in a fixed sequence could have been preserved by oral tradition. It is possible that insufficient weight has generally been given to the remarkable facility of memory possessed by the oriental mind and the Jewish religious practice of preserving the traditions of the elders by oral means.

(2) The most widely accepted theory is that Mark was the basic gospel, which both Matthew and Luke used as the core of their gospels. In addition to Mark, they both used another basic source ("Q") from which they derived their additional material. A modification of this proposes to restrict "Q" to material common to Matthew and Luke and postulates other sources for their special material ("M" and "L" respectively). Although this theory has wide support it is not without its problems. Many who accept some form of it do so for want of a better.

(3) A development of the source theory outlined above is the form-critical approach. This explains the origin of the sources by postulating that these were composed out of traditional material circulating in units, which can be classified according to the literary form in which they were preserved. This approach is therefore an attempt to describe the methods by which the oral tradition circulated. It is when its advocates assess historicity on the basis of "forms" that serious differences arise, some like Bultmann* taking a skeptical view which accepts very little as authentic history, and others treating the forms simply as literary units and declining to assess historical validity on this basis.

(4) A still further development from form-criticism is redaction-criticism, which sees the evangelists as theologians rather than as historians. There is clearly some advantage in emphasizing the personal contribution of the authors rather than thinking of the synoptic gospels as collections of isolated units. But there is a tendency to place theological interest over against historical data, with the result that many redaction-critics place little reliance on these gospels as sources of information regarding the historical Jesus. It must be noted that gospels written with a theological purpose need not be treated as unhistorical. Indeed a theological end would be better served by historically valid data than by data which was the product of imagination.

The three gospels possess individual characteristics which show their distinctive importance. Matthew's main theme is the messianic position of Jesus, who is seen as the fulfillment of OT predictions with special emphasis on His kingship. It is Matthew who records most of the attitude of Jesus toward the Law; it is clearly seen that He did not come to destroy the Law, but to fulfill it. Moreover He went beyond it to bring out the true spiritual implications of the Law. A characteristic expression of Jesus in this gospel is "Moses said, . . . but I say." In some respects the teaching of Jesus, which in this gospel is arranged in five great blocks of material, appears in the role of a new Law for the Christian Church.

Mark's gospel places considerably more stress on the activity of Jesus than on His teaching. The dominant portrait of Jesus is as the Son of Man. Unlike Matthew's gospel there is no interest in the pre-ministry experience of Jesus, except a bare mention of the temptation and baptism. Mark launches his account immediately with a sequence of incidents in which he illustrates the relationships of Jesus with various groups with whom He mixed. The climax of the ministry of Jesus in his gospel, as also in Matthew and Luke, is found at Caesarea Philippi with Peter's confession, which marks the beginning of that period which led up to the cross and resurrection.

Luke's most distinctive feature is the concluding section of his gospel in which he incorporates in the form of an extended travel section from Galilee to Jerusalem much material which either does not occur at all in the other gospels or else occurs in a different context. Luke's portrait of Jesus is said to be less tragic than the others. But the passion narrative still occupies a major part of the gospel and shows the importance which Luke gave to the events surrounding the death of Christ. He includes more than the others on the theme of joy and on the activity of the Spirit. He also records more incidents which reflect the human interests of Jesus. Although each of the three gospels contains its own particular emphasis, it cannot be denied that they are alike in showing general agreement on the personality and purpose of Jesus.

It was not long before these gospels were received by the early church as part of their Scriptures. The need for authoritative books about the life and teaching of Jesus to be read alongside the OT arose at a very early stage. The fact that the synoptic gospels were known and used by the Gnostics of the early second century shows that they must have circulated long before that time in orthodox circles. In spite of a spate of pseudo-gospels, many showing dependence on the synoptic gospels, there was no serious consideration given to any other than these gospels and the gospel of John (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF). That true apostolic connection was the criteria used is evident from Tertullian's comment that, whereas Matthew and John were the work of apostles, Mark and Luke were written by pupils of apostles and could therefore be regarded as coming from Peter and Paul respectively. Although form-critics would discount this line of argument, there is no doubt that it played an important part in the final acceptance of the synoptic gospels and the gospel of John.

SYRIAC. A Semitic language belonging to the East Aramaic group. Originally the dialect of Edessa, it was already in use there in pre-Christian times. With the increased stature of Edessa as a center of Christianity, the use of Edessan Syriac spread throughout Mesopotamia. As a literary language it is represented by texts from the second to the thirteenth centuries. By A.D. 800 Syriac had been replaced by Arabic as the language of Mesopotamia, but some Syriac-speaking communities survived, and Neo-Syriac dialects, chiefly of East Syriac, are still spoken in parts of Turkey and Iraq. The name "Karshuni" is given to Arabic texts written in Syriac script. Three distinct Syriac scripts, all of them cursive, were used. The oldest inscriptions and manuscripts are in Estrangelo; following upon the christological disputes and the division of the Syriac-speaking church in the fifth century, two other scripts were adopted by the respective traditions: Nestorian in the East, and Jacobite (or Serta) in the West. Separate systems of vowel notation were also evolved in the latter part of the first millennium A.D., the Jacobite being influenced by the Greek vowel symbols. Syriac literature is almost entirely Christian; much of the literary activity was centered upon the Edessan School of the Persians until its closure, by command of the emperor Zeno, in 489. In addition to the translation of Greek theological treatises, original Syriac works in prose and poetry were composed.

SYRIAC VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. There are three OT and five NT versions:

(1) Old Testament. (a) Peshitta: whether the Peshitta was originally a Jewish or a Christian translation is still a matter of debate. Some scholars stress the West Aramaic Targumic elements in the Pentateuch and argue that it must have originated among Jews who had a close connection with Palestine; later it will have been taken over by Christians. Kahle associated the translation of the Pentateuch with the province of Adiabene where the royal house embraced Judaism in the first century A.D. The Targumic influence has also been explained as the result of consultation of Jewish sources by Christian translators, probably converts from Judaism. Irrespective of its place of origin, the Peshitta was in use among Christians by the beginning of the third century. No uniform translation technique exists for other OT books: some are literal, some tend toward paraphrase; the degree of influence of the Septuagint and Targums varies greatly. As revision of the Peshitta proceeded, many Targumic features were eliminated and the text brought into greater conformity with the Septuagint.

(b) Some fragments of a Palestinian Syriac text of the OT have been preserved; the translation was made from the Septuagint sometime in the fifth century A.D. (see PALESTINIAN SYRIAC TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT).

(c) Syro-Hexaplar: a Syriac translation of the fifth column of Origen's Hexapla made by Paul, bishop of Tella, in A.D. 616-17. It is an important witness to Origen's text of the Septuagint and reproduces the Hexaplaric signs; many readings from the minor Greek versions are noted. Reconstruction of the Septuagint vorlage is greatly helped by the slavishly literal nature of the translation.

(2) New Testament. (a) Diatessaron: a harmony of the four gospels composed by Tatian about A.D. 170 during his stay in the West; whether the original composition was in Greek or Syriac is uncertain. The version enjoyed immense popularity in the East for over two centuries and was often quoted by Syriac-speaking commentators; Ephraim Syrus wrote a commentary on it (see also DIATESSARON).

(b) Old Syriac: see separate entry.

(c) Peshitta version of the NT: The preparation of the standard text of the New Testament was completed sometime in the fifth century. By then the Diatessaron was in disfavor and the Old Syriac in obvious need of revision. The translation gives evidence of multiple authorship, but the name of Rabbula* is closely associated with the final phase of the standardization. The revision was made according to the regnant Byzantine Greek text and was sufficiently advanced to be retained by both sections of the Syrian Church after the division of 431. Manuscripts of the Peshitta go back to the fifth century.

(d) Philoxenian and Harklean Versions: in 508 Philoxenus, bishop of Mabbog, commissioned a new translation of the NT in which the Antilegomena were rendered for the first time. The version of Thomas of Harkel published in 616 was either a revision of the Philoxenian text or simply a reissue with marginalia added. The Harklean marginal readings for Acts are an important witness to the Western Text.

(e) Palestinian Syriac Version of the NT: see separate entry.

SYRIAN CHURCHES. Christianity was established in Syria by the end of the second century; legend links it with Jesus Himself. Its gospel was the Diatessaron of Tatian. Its mode of life included a strong emphasis upon celibacy and asceticism. Its great teachers were Afrahat and Ephraem, its centers Edessa and Nisibis. The doctrinal division of the church after the Council of Chalcedon* (451) left its mark very clearly upon Syrian Christianity, and the number of Syrian churches still witnesses to this. Already after the Council of Ephesus* (431) the Syrian churches of East Syria and Persia adhered to the teaching of Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM).

The Nestorian Church flourished, was tolerated under Islam, conducted missions in central Asia, and reached China in the seventh century. From the thirteenth century, Roman Catholic overtures were made, and some part became Roman Catholic. Both churches still survive, mainly in Iraq, after dreadful persecution in the early twentieth century. Most Christians in W Syria followed the Monophysite teaching after 451 (see MONOPHYSITISM); due to the organization by Jacob Baradaeus they prospered, being called Jacobites* after him. They flourished, adopted Arabic at length as their language, and are found in great numbers in the Near East. The links of some of them with Rome date from the seventeenth century. In South India (Malabar*) are Christians using Syriac in liturgy. These are no doubt the result of Jacobite or earlier missionary endeavor. After 451 the few who remained Orthodox were called Melkites*: these too survive in small numbers, some in communion with Rome. A small Syrian group adhered to the Monothelite* formula of reunion after it had been condemned in 680; centered around the shrine of St. Maro, they are called Maronites.* They became reunited with Rome in the twelfth and fifteenth centuries and are centered in Lebanon.

SYRIAN TEXT. One of the four different types of texts or text-families of the Greek NT distinguished by Westcott* and Hort.* A mixed text resulting from a revision made in the fourth century (cf. Lucianic Text*), it was regarded by Westcott and Hort as the furthest removed from the originals. It is best represented today by Codex Alexandrinus (in the gospels), the later uncial MSS, and the great mass of the minuscules. The Textus Receptus* is the latest form of the Syrian (=Byzantine=Koine) text.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY. In theology, faith seeks to interpret, understand, and unfold the wealth of the revelation of God with which it is confronted in His Word. Revelation,* as it is received by us, appears to consist of a multitude of events, saving facts, and truths which find their expression in a collection of separate theological doctrines. On the basis of the belief that God is one and intends to reveal Himself in the unity of His activity, theology seeks to present the whole range of its knowledge of revelation as one coherent, living whole.

Theological discussion has therefore always been undertaken in as orderly a manner as possible. Early attempts to seek to do justice to the unity of revelation were made, e.g., by John of Damascus* in Fons Scientia, and in the West by Peter Lombard* in his Sententiae. Aquinas* also tried to give unity to a theological system by absorbing it into what he regarded as a Christian philosophy. At the Reformation, Melanchthon* in his Loci tried to give a "system of doctrinal positions" drawn from the Word of God. Such theologies tended to take the order of discussion suggested in Holy Scripture, beginning with Creation and man's sin, then discussing the Law and the Gospel, and finishing with the Last Things.

More than any of his predecessors, Calvin* in his Institutes sought to do justice to the belief that the unity and rationality of the one God was reflected in His revelation. He sought to show how each doctrine was interconnected with the other and must be interpreted as part of the living whole. He tried to make Christ, rather than any one principle, the controlling center. In the seventeenth century, theology tended to relapse again into a discussion of a series of distinct doctrines, each of which apart from the whole could be justified in itself. Scripture, moreover, tended to be used atomistically in the support of individual propositions without reference to the whole of salvation history.

Schleiermacher* has been regarded as the first theologian ever to lay hold of a central theological principle, and in the light of it to build up a whole system in which each doctrine is carefully discussed in relation to the unity of the whole in the light of the controlling principle. In the nineteenth century, under pressure of the idea that revelation in itself had no inherent rationality, theologians, instead of using philosophy as a tool and medium for theological illustration, allowed their philosophy to subdue and refashion their theology, and to impose on it the pattern of contemporary thought in the production of systems that had often little relation to the Gospel or the Bible. Yet no one system can ever become finalized over against revelation and Scripture.

TABORITES. The most radical branch of the Hussite movement. Centered in S Bohemia where Hus had spent much of his exile between 1412 and 1414, the Taborites nevertheless did not really reflect his teachings. They were fundamentalists in the tradition of John Wycliffe and wished to confine doctrine to what was explicitly stated in the Bible. They rejected transubstantiation, purgatory, saints, relics, and the distinction between priests and laity. They were also militant millenarians who believed in an imminent second coming of Christ preceded by a period of turmoil. In addition, they represented the lower economic classes and were concerned about social and economic reforms. The movement became a mass movement in July 1419 when 40,000 people are said to have gathered on a hill to which the biblical name of Tabor was given. Under the brilliant military leadership of John Zizka they defeated the imperial crusades directed against them and were able to maintain a degree of unity with the more moderate party, the Calixtines.* This unity collapsed after Zizka died in 1424, and the Calixtines came to an agreement with Rome in 1433. The following year they combined with Catholic nobles to defeat the Taborites at the Battle of Lipany where their new leader, Procopius, was killed and the Taborite movement destroyed.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

TACHE, ALEXANDRE ANTONIN (1823-1894). Canadian Roman Catholic bishop. Born in Riviere du Loup, Quebec, and educated at the College of St. Hyacinthe and the Theological Seminary of Montreal, he became in 1844 a member of the Oblate Order, was ordained in 1845, and sent as a missionary to the Red River area of Manitoba. He became the second bishop of St. Boniface in 1853, and was consecrated archbishop and metropolitan there in 1871. He helped restore order during the 1869-70 Riel Rebellion by a too-generous promise of amnesty which involved him in later controversy. He was also a leader in the Manitoba separate-school struggle.

TACITUS, CORNELIUS (c.55-117). Secular Latin writer. Probably our most important single source for Roman history from Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) to Domitian (81-96), he provides independent confirmation for the NT at several points, and useful if biased background information about the more corrupt aspects of politics under the emperors. In recounting the persecutions of Nero* after the fire of A.D. 64 in Rome, Tacitus outlines the rise of Christianity ("a subversive cult," "atrocious practices," and more tellingly "its enmity against mankind") and mentions Christ's execution under Pilate, but his main target is Nero's perverted and pointless cruelty. Felix, procurator of Palestine in Acts 24 and brother of an influential freedman of the emperor Claudius, is condemned for serious misrule. Tacitus's account of the Jewish War of A.D. 66-70 (Histories 5.1ff.) supplements the fuller narrative of Josephus.* GORDON C. NEAL

TAIT, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (1811-1882). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1868. Born of Scottish Presbyterian parents, he went from Glasgow University to Balliol College, Oxford, where he subscribed to the Thirty-Nine Articles* in accordance with the university statutes. In 1836 he took Anglican orders. He was one of the four tutors who publicly protested against Tract 90 in 1841. In 1842 he succeeded Thomas Arnold as headmaster of Rugby. Six years later an attack of rheumatic fever left him permanently weak and forced him to take lighter duty as dean of Carlisle. In 1856 Palmerston unexpectedly appointed the inexperienced Tait to the demanding and influential bishopric of London. He declined an invitation to move to York in 1862; and then in 1868 Disraeli, also against expectation, offered him Canterbury. The queen's influence was probably decisive.

By his strong leadership Tait restored the see of Canterbury to its position of preeminence in the Church of England. His chairmanship of the second Lambeth Conference in 1878 ensured its continuance as a regular meeting of Anglican bishops. Tait was a Broad Churchman in theology, though he opposed Essays and Reviews. He retained his Presbyterian distaste for ceremonial, and took vigorous steps to bring to order ritualistic clergymen like A.H. Mackonochie. He was the originator of the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874. A firm believer in the establishment, Tait based his policies on his sense of the weight of opinion among the English people.

See R.T. Davidson and W. Benham, Life of Archibald Campbell Tait (2 vols., 1891); and P.T. Marsh, The Victorian Church in Decline: Archbishop Tait and the Church of England, 1868-1882 (1969). JOHN TILLER

TAIZÉ COMMUNITY. Founded in 1940 by the present prior, Roger Schutz, when he began to receive Jewish and other refugees into his home at Taizé in Burgundy. In 1942 the Gestapo forced him away, but in 1944 he returned with three brothers to begin the common life. By 1949 the monastic tradition took hold with the first seven brothers pledging themselves to celibacy, authority, and common property. More than seventy men from different Christian traditions from Europe and the Americas now make up the community, and a group of Franciscans and Eastern Orthodox monks have come to live with them. From 1968 Roman Catholics have joined, and the prior and a few brothers spend one month each year in Rome. Truly ecumenical, there are solid links with Rome, Constantinople, and the World Council of Churches (where brothers are on the staff). For social development, brothers go in small groups to many nations, notably Latin America and Africa, to live and work among varying situations ranging from scientific efforts to dishwashing. Wherever they are, brothers pray at appointed times thrice daily. Taizé has become a place of pilgrimage. Youth assemblies meet there regularly. C.G. THORNE, JR.

TALLIS, THOMAS (c.1505-1585). English composer. Considered the greatest composer in England before Byrd,* Tallis in his latter years was closely associated with the latter; they were jointly granted by Queen Elizabeth a twenty-one-year monopoly to print music in the realm. Tallis was organist of Waltham Abbey until the dissolution of 1540. Shortly thereafter he became a gentleman of the Royal Chapel, where he remained until his death. Probably much of his music has been lost, but the quantity which remains reveals him to be a refined and skillful craftsman. His Lamentations and office hymns are particularly beautiful. He wrote a tour de force—his motet, Spem in alium, for eight choirs of five parts each, which builds up to a climax in which all forty parts combine. Some of his English anthems are adapted from earlier Latin motets, but he wrote also much fine music for the English service, including the well-known "If ye love me." His responses, preces, and cathedral services have been much used. J.B. MAC MILLAN

TALMUD, see JUDAISM

TAMBARAM CONFERENCE (1938). Convened by the International Missionary Council,* the conference met near the Indian city of Madras during the closing days of 1938. It was notable for the impressive representation from the younger churches, whose problems were discussed and whose delegates brought a new dimension to the plea for Christian unity and the task of world mission. The conference, under the chairmanship of John R. Mott,* comprised 471 delegates from sixty-nine countries.

TARASIUS (c.730-806). Patriarch of Constantinople. Born in Constantinople, a well-educated layman and granduncle of Photius, he was secretary to the regent, Irene II, during the infancy of Constantine VI. At Irene's insistence he was elected patriarch, succeeding Paul in 784. He sought better relations with Rome, and persuaded Irene and Pope Hadrian I to call a council to condemn iconoclasm (see ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY). An attempt to assemble it at Constantinople (786) failed through rioting inspired by iconoclasts. It met eventually in Nicea (787) under Tarasius's presidency as the seventh ecumenical council. Iconoclasm was condemned and the orthodox doctrine of image-veneration defined. Tarasius exercised leniency toward inconoclastic bishops who recanted, but was forced by rigorist monks to act against simony. In 795 he was attacked for his failure to condemn the adulterous second marriage of Constantine VI, though after Constantine's deposition he excommunicated the monk who performed the ceremony. In 802 he crowned as emperor Nicephorus, who had dethroned Irene. J.G.G. NORMAN

TARSICIUS (d. late third or early fourth century). Martyr. A poem by Damasus I (366-84) tells that Tarsicius was attacked by a pagan mob while carrying the sacrament, and accepted death for himself rather than defilement of the holy. Possibly a deacon who carried the Eucharist from the pope's Mass to the principal Roman churches as a sign of unity, he could have been an acolyte or layman appointed to bear the Eucharist to Christian prisoners.

TATE, NAHUM (1652-1715). Poet and dramatist. He was born in Dublin and educated there at Trinity College. Three of his children were killed and his house burned when he reported plans of a revolt to the government. He then left Ireland and settled in England, where he wrote poems and plays in which he adapted the work of earlier dramatists. With Nicholas Brady* he wrote a widely used metrical version of the Psalms (1696). The hymn "While shepherds watched" is attributed to him. Tate became poet laureate in 1692, but at the end of his life was very poor, and he died in debt.

TATIAN (c.110-172). Christian apologist and Gnostic. An Assyrian from Nisibitis on the Euphrates, he came to Rome about 150, was converted, and later became a pupil of Justin Martyr.* Like his master, he engaged in the defense of the faith against pagan misrepresentation. His "Address to the Greeks" (c.160) marks a retrograde step when compared with Justin's apologia. Unlike the latter's tolerant and courteous attitude to Greek learning and culture, Tatian had only mockery and contempt for pagan philosophy. After Justin's death he retired to Syria, where he became the founder of a group later called the Encratites.* Tatian's chief claim to fame is his Diatessaron, * used as a liturgical book in the Syrian Church until the fifth century. G.L. CAREY

TAULER, JOHN (Johann) (c.1300-1361). German mystic. Born in Strasbourg, he entered the Dominican Order of Preachers there about 1315 and came under Eckhart's* influence. Thomism was a part of him, but unlike Eckhart his ends were practical. He wrote only in German, never in Latin, and did not write learned works. His sermons were preached mainly to nuns. His was a simple, homely method, though obscurities do occur in the more mystical passages; dialogue was used by him for illustration to include his audience. His imagery, moreover, was local, derived from hunting, war, farming, trade, and natural history.

His was the kind of mysticism that was to dominate the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, with its immense concern for everyone's spiritual health: no longer was mysticism only for the spiritual elite. Eckhart bridged Scholasticism and mysticism, and Tauler translated an academic approach to spirituality into a practical Christianity of high personal demands, designed for all men. His sermons demonstrate this where, with little biblical quotation and no personal testimony, the meaning of being a Christian is carefully unraveled. Many sermons have been ascribed to him due to his popularity, but only some are genuine. During the Black Death* period (1348) he devoted himself completely to the sick. His years in Basle (1338-43) found him a central figure in the Friends of God* (Gottesfreunde). He owed a great debt to the Waldensian layman Nicholas of Basle,* who advised him to stop preaching and meditate, which he did for two years amid his ministry with remarkable results. Luther read him profitably.

TAUSEN, HANS (1494-1561). Danish Reformer and bishop. In his youth a monk of the monastery of St. John of Antvorskov, he pursued theological studies in Rostock from 1516, Copenhagen (1521), Louvain (1522), and Wittenberg (1523). While studying in Germany, he became a fully convinced adherent of the Reformation. In 1525 he was recalled to Antvorskov and shortly afterward transferred to Viborg. Before long a large congregation gathered around his dauntless and popular preaching of evangelical truth. Tausen's superiors were alarmed and tried to stop him by expelling him from the monastery and from his order. He nevertheless continued preaching, and in 1526 King Frederik I put Tausen under his personal protection, so that he might continue his work of reformation unhindered by the clerical authorities. From 1529 he worked in Copenhagen, and here again his preaching gave rise to a vigorous reformation movement. After the official accomplishment of the Reformation in Denmark* in 1536, Tausen went on with his preaching ministry in Copenhagen, and from 1538 became also a lecturer in theology in Roskilde. In 1541 he was appointed bishop of Ribe. In this capacity he worked at the practical accomplishment of the Reformation within his diocese until his death. Tausen is the most outstanding figure among the pioneers of the Reformation in Denmark, not so much because of his originality as because of his frankness and lucidity. N.O. RASMUSSEN

TAYLOR, J(AMES) HUDSON (1832-1905). Missionary pioneer. Born in Yorkshire, the son of a Methodist chemist, he underwent at seventeen a deep conversion and soon felt a strong call to the almost closed empire of China.* He landed at Shanghai in 1854, after part-medical training, as agent of the short-lived Chinese Evangelization Society. The inefficiency of its home base threw him back on faith and prayer for his support, and a succession of providences caused him to sever connection. He made several evangelistic forays into the closed interior, and adopted Chinese dress. In 1858 he married Maria Dyer in Ningpo despite the opposition of other missionaries who viewed him as a "poor, unconnected Nobody." Invalided back to England, he bore a burden for inland China and the millions without Christ which grew even stronger. On the opening of the empire to Westerners, he could find no mission willing to back him, so he founded the interdenominational China Inland Mission (1865), asking God to send "24 willing, skillful laborers," two for each unreached province. They sailed in 1866. Maria died four years later.

Despite opposition from missionaries and mandarins, some internal dissension, and several riots, the CIM established itself as the "shock troops" of Protestant advance. Taylor's aim was to bring the Gospel to every creature: he was happy for others to reap where his pioneers had sown, although many CIM stations became permanent. By 1895 he led 641 missionaries, about half the entire Protestant force in China. His great spiritual qualities and the caliber of the CIM, together with his writings and world travels, gave him an influence far beyond China, and led to similar faith-missions being founded. Among his chief emphases were: identification with the people (e.g., all to wear Chinese dress), the direction of the mission to be on the field, not from the home base; dependence on God alone for supplies, with scrupulous efficiency in administration; the deepening of Christian life in the home churches as a sure means of encouraging missionary vocations. Taylor retired in 1901 and died four years later at Changsha, capital of the last province to open.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613-1667). Anglican bishop and writer. Born at Cambridge and educated there, he early attracted through his eloquence the attention of William Laud,* who nominated him as his chaplain and enabled him to be elected fellow of All Souls. He chose to be loyal to the king in the Civil War, but on the collapse of the royal cause he attached himself to Lord Carbery, remaining at his house in Carmarthenshire until the return of Charles II in 1660. His Liberty of Prophesying (1647) is a plea for toleration. It was followed by The Life of Christ (1649), Holy Living (1650) and Holy Dying (1651), and the manual of devotion, The Golden Grove (1655). After the Restoration his loyalty was recognized in his preferment to the see of Down and Connor, but his was a difficult task in an age when the toleration he so much valued was so little in fashion.

In addition to the works mentioned above, Taylor also published XXVIII Sermons Preached at Golden Grove (1651) and XXV Sermons (1653), as well as several scattered, individual sermons. He is the last practitioner of a "golden age" of preaching that began with Donne* and Andrewes.* Mason called him the "Shakespeare of divines." More accurately, Coleridge described him as the "Spenser of prose"—more accurately, because Taylor's prose compares in its color and elaborateness with the highly artificial work of the Elizabethan poet. The texture of his work consists in a wealth of biblical, patristic and classical allusion, woven in a rich and complex pattern. Basically Taylor's prose is still Ciceronian, but compared, say, with Hooker's at the end of the previous century, it has developed a certain mannered quality that is best described as baroque. This is revealed especially in his imagery, where he draws on his rich sensory, and especially his visual, imagination.

TAYLOR, JOHN (1694-1761). Nonconformist* minister. Following a lengthy pastorate in Norwich, he was appointed in 1757 to the divinity chair of Warrington Academy. After reading Samuel Clarke's* Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, Taylor adopted Arian views of the person of Christ, and in The Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin (1740), as well as in Key to the Apostolic Writings, he claimed that the orthodox Reformed view of the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity lacked biblical support, and that Adam's sin had only natural, not moral, consequences. His views were fully answered by Jonathan Edwards* in The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin Defended (1758), but they continued to be influential in England and the USA. PAUL HELM

TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM (1786-1858). American theologian and educator. Born in Connecticut, he graduated from Yale (1807) where he studied theology under Timothy Dwight.* After ordination and a pastorate at the First Church of New Haven (1812-22), he was appointed the first professor of theology at Yale Divinity School, where he remained the rest of his life. He tried to construct a consistent theology of revivalism suited to the Second Great Awakening.* This modified Calvinism was based on the earlier Edwardean revivalistic theology. Taylor's main thesis concerned the problem of moral depravity, and although he taught that sin was inevitable, each person was nevertheless responsible for his own moral choice—a position consistent with revivalistic preaching. His views created such controversy among Congregationalists that a more orthodox and Calvinistic seminary was formed at Hartford (1834). Taylor's works include Practical Sermons, Lectures on the Moral Government of God (1859), and Essays and Lectures upon Select Topics in Revealed Religion (1859). DONALD M. LAKE

TAYLOR, WILLIAM (1821-1902). American Methodist evangelist and missionary. Born in Vermont, he had not much early education, but in due course entered the Methodist ministry and was assigned to the tented city of San Francisco. His open-air meetings drew thousands of listeners and brought many conversions. Taylor organized the first Methodist church in the city. During 1856-61 he itinerated throughout North America; thereafter world travels took him to England, Australia, the West Indies, South America (three times), the Middle East, and South Africa. Elected missionary bishop for Africa in 1884, he systematized work particularly in the Congo and Liberia, advocating self-supporting missions wherever possible. His zeal and methods sometimes alarmed his home board, but his results were often impressive. He found time to write also; his works include Seven Years' Street Preaching in San Francisco (1856), Christian Adventures in South Africa (1867), and Story of My Life (1896). J.D. DOUGLAS

TE DEUM. The name of an early Christian hymn written in Latin which comes from its first two words or, when its longer title is used, its first three words, Te Deum Laudamus ("We praise thee, O God"). There have been various traditions about its composition, the best known being that which ascribed it to Ambrose* and Augustine* at the latter's baptism. Nowadays it is generally accepted that the author was Niceta,* bishop of Remesiana about A.D. 400. The first nine verses are an ascription of praise, and the next twelve a confession of faith ending with prayer. The last eight verses are suffrages which became attached to it at an early date. The Te Deum has a central place in the morning worship of the Western Church. R.E. NIXON

TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE (1881-1955). Roman Catholic Jesuit priest and paleontologist who advocated an evolutionary hypothesis that synthesized modern science and traditional Christian theology. Marie-Joseph-Pierre Teilhard de Chardin was born in Sarcenat, France, and after study at the Jesuit College of Mongré, Jersey and Hastings, he was ordained in 1911. His work at the Museum of Paris as a paleontologist was interrupted by the war, during which he served as a stretcher-bearer. He subsequently finished his doctoral thesis at the Sorbonne in 1922 and soon departed for China to serve as a consultant to the geological survey where he was associated with the discoveries of Pithecanthropus and Sinanthropus. He returned from China after World War II, but his teachings and ideas concerning cosmogenesis (that the world develops according to a law of increasing complexity and consciousness until the appearance of man) and Christogenesis (that the process converges in a rhythm of hypersocialization toward an Omega point) led his order to prohibit him from accepting a professorial chair at the Collège de France and from publishing The Phenomenon of Man. He moved to the USA and spent his last years working with the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research in New York.

Teilhard's ability as paleontologist was never questioned, and his more than 170 articles and technical papers declare his ability. However, his desire to incorporate the total knowledge of man into the understanding of the phenomenology of man led to controversy. His ideas bear some striking similarities to process philosophy.

TELEMACHUS (d.391). Eastern monk. Unknown but for his martyrdom (recorded by Theodoret), he rushed into the arena in 391 to separate the gladiators, only to be stoned to death by the exasperated spectators. As a result Emperor Honorius abolished gladiatorial combats soon after. Absence of this edict from the Theodosian Code has cast doubt on the historicity of the story, but Constantine's Edict already existed, and gladiatorial fights appear to end with Honorius; wild beast shows continued.

TELEOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. Otherwise known as the "argument from design," this has an analogical form, claiming that the purposiveness of the natural order requires the postulation of a designer, and that this designer is God. Probably originating in its modern form in William Derham's works, especially Physico-Theology (1713), the argument was popularized by rationalistic anti-Deists such as William Paley* and Joseph Butler.* It was effectively criticized by David Hume* in his Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779), on the grounds that the evidence of design is ambiguous and establishes at best only a finite designer or designers, not God. Despite this criticism, the argument figured largely in popular Protestant apologetics in the nineteenth century and was given further currency by, e.g., the Bridgewater Treatises (1833-40). The impact of Darwinian evolutionary theory upon Protestantism is largely to be accounted for by the fact that that theory seemed to many to provide an alternative, naturalistic explanation of design.

TELESPHORUS (d. c.137). Martyr; bishop of Rome from about 127. According to the Liber Pontificalis he was a Greek. He apparently always observed Easter on Sundays, as against Quartodeciman* practice. Irenaeus* mentions him as the first Roman bishop to be martyred. His, in fact, is the only name known to us as a martyr of the emperor Hadrian's* reign.

TEMPERANCE. A nineteenth-century reform movement designed to encourage individuals to limit or abstain from the use of alcoholic beverages. It promised to improve the physical and moral well-being of individuals. Economic benefits, it was assumed, would follow.

Sporadic efforts of eighteenth-century ministers and humanitarians to encourage temperance were given medical support by Dr. Benjamin Rush's An Inquiry into the Effects of Ardent Spirits on the Human Mind and Body (1784). In 1826 the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance was formed in Boston under the dynamic leadership of Lyman Beecher.* Over 8,000 auxiliary societies were formed by 1835, representing about 1.5 million signers. Eleven weekly and monthly journals were published to promote temperance; millions of tracts were distributed. Songs and essays, plays and novels were written to dramatize the evils of strong drink. Timothy Shay Arthur's Ten Nights in a Barroom (1854) is the best known.

Division appeared within the American Society by 1836 over the issues of total abstinence from all alcoholic beverages, antislavery, and the legal control of the liquor traffic. The American Temperance Union, then formed, continued its campaign for total abstinence in the face of declining interest. Meanwhile the voluntary-abstinence movement gained new strength from the Washingtonians, a society of ex-drunkards formed in Baltimore on Washington's birthday, 1840. Members were enlisted through "experience meetings." John B. Gough became their leading evangelist and lecturer.

Many in the temperance movement now campaigned for government regulation of the sale and distribution of hard liquor and alcoholic beverages. Neal Dow, a Portland, Maine, merchant, headed the movement in that state. The legislature responded in 1846 by restricting the retail sale of intoxicating beverages. By 1851 it completely outlawed the liquor traffic. Within five years thirteen Northern states followed suit. Meanwhile the temperance movement gained strength in Britain, Ireland, and Canada. A World's Temperance Convention assembled in London, 1846, and in New York, 1853.

The temperance movement in America after the Civil War was characterized by a campaign for total abstinence on the part of individuals and the outlawing of liquor sales by local, state, and national governments. The Women's Christian Temperance Union, formed in 1874 under the leadership of Frances Willard,* spearheaded the drive for total abstinence. The National Prohibition Party (1869) entered local, state, and national political campaigns to insure the election of public officials committed to the abolition of the liquor traffic. Ably assisted by the Anti-Saloon League (1893), the prohibition forces secured congressional approval of wartime prohibition in 1919. A constitutional amendment outlawing the "manufacture, sale or transportation" of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes was proposed by Congress in 1918 and approved as the Eighteenth Amendment the following year. The amendment was repealed in 1932 in spite of strenuous support from the Methodist Board of Prohibition and Morals and the two organizations previously mentioned.

TEMPLARS. A military religious order founded c.1118 by Hugh des Payens, a knight from Burgundy, and Godfrey of St.-Omer, a knight from N. France. The original purpose of the Templars was to aid and protect pilgrims on their way to the Holy Land, thus acting in conjunction with the Knights of St. John, or Hospitallers,* who tended sick pilgrims in Jerusalem. These warrior-knights took the monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and refrained from adopting many of the pompous rites and garbs prevalent among religious orders at the time. The official name of the order, "the Poor Fellow-Soldiers of Christ and the Temple of Solomon," is derived from their early state of poverty and from the portion of the king of Jerusalem's (Baldwin II) palace in which they lived, known as the Temple of Solomon.

After their modest beginnings the Templars grew rapidly during the twelfth century in purpose, size, and wealth. Their duties were expanded to include the defense of the Latin states of Palestine. In January 1128, at the Council of Troyes, a rule of order prepared by Bernard of Clairvaux* was accepted and the Knights were allowed to wear a white mantle, to which was added a red cross in later years. By the middle of the century, "commanderies" were established throughout Europe, governed by a hierarchy centering in the Holy Land headed by the grandmaster of the Temple of Jerusalem. Although knighthood was required of applicants during the early years of the order's existence, gradually three ranks were recognized in the membership: Knights, who joined for life; sergeants, consisting of wealthy bourgeois; and chaplains, who were priests, bound for life, to perform religious services for the Knights. As the Templars grew immensely wealthy due to gifts from royalty and pious donations, their influence spread to include financial and banking operations in Europe, and they even loaned money to the sultan of Damascus at one time.

With the fall of Jerusalem in 1187 and the expulsion of all Christians from the Holy Land after the fall of Acre in 1291, the Templars lost their crusading function. As a secret organization, independent of secular authority, they continued to acquire wealth and began to evoke hostility from European royal houses. In 1307 Philip IV* the Fair, king of a bankrupt France, moved against the Templars. By destroying this order Philip felt he could acquire much-needed land and money as well as striking indirectly at the authority of the papacy. In 1312 Pope Clement V,* pressured by Philip, issued the bull Vox in excelso, formally dissolving the order throughout Europe. In spite of protestations of innocence on charges of heresy, witchcraft, and sodomy, 120 Templars were executed in France, including Grand Master Jacques de Molay. Although Philip's debts to the disbanded order were eradicated and he seized much of their property, his desire to acquire all their wealth was not realized. Most of their possessions were transferred by the pope to the Hospitallers, with the exception of the Spanish and Portuguese branches, whose holdings went to other military religious orders.

TEMPLES. Temples and holy places were integral to ancient society. Where the temple of Jerusalem differed from others was in the belief that God had chosen to dwell there and was in no way dependent upon it. He could forsake it and even destroy it (e.g., Jer. 7). In others words, the temple in the biblical tradition is part of the order of revelation and grace. The temple of Solomon (1 Kings 6–7) was built by Phoenician workmen, and its design had much in common with the temples of Egypt and Mesopotamia. But it soon inherited the theological traditions which had grown around the ancient tent of meeting, particularly when the ark was installed in it, and it did more than anything else to unite the tribes of Israel into a nation (cf. Deut. 12). Thus, in the exilic period the restoration and reunification of the scattered nation was symbolized in the hope of a new and glorious temple (Ezek. 40–48; cf. Isa. 54:11f; 60:13f.)

The temple which was built after the Exile seems to have had a rather pedestrian beginning, at least in the minds of contemporaries (Ezra 3:-12). At any rate, the desire for the glorification of the temple continued and grew in intensity (Mal. 3:1-4; cf. Tobit. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:18). In apocalyptic thought, and subsequently in the rabbinic writings, the new temple is sometimes described in terms of a heavenly or supernatural temple descended to earth (Enoch 90:28f., etc.). Simultaneously another development, equally interesting, was taking place in the spiritualizing of the temple among the Jews of Qumran; here the company of believers is the "true temple."

The temple of Herod the Great was the third and last temple of Jerusalem. Herod had the existing temple considerably enlarged and magnificently embellished, but this temple met a sorry end in the war of A.D. 66-70. However, its destruction appears to have been less of a catastrophe than the destruction of its predecessor in 586 B.C. By this time the law and the synagogues, i.e., a nonsacrificial form of worship, had come to occupy a central place, with the result that Judaism could and did exist without a temple.

In the NT the Christian community is described as God's "new temple" (1 Cor. 3:16f.; 2 Cor. 6:16,17; Eph. 2:19-22; 1 Pet. 2:5; cf. 1 Cor. 6:19f.). Clearly our Lord's cleansing of the temple of Jerusalem was interpreted as more than an attempted reform of the cult. This is most apparent in the fourth gospel (John 2:19-22), where the saying of Jesus about the destruction of the temple is connected with the cleansing of the temple; but it is also present in the synoptic gospels (Mark 15:38; cf. 14:58). Whether the temple image is used to convey the unity and holiness of the church (1 and 2 Corinthians) or its inclusive character (Ephesians), the temple is always the temple of God and not (as in the image of the body) of Christ. Where Christ is mentioned, He is thought of as a part of the building (Eph. 2:19; 1 Pet. 2:4ff.; cf. 1 Cor. 3:11). The connection in 1 Peter 2:4ff. of the temple image with the image of Christ as the stone (cf. Mark 12:10; Acts 4:11) also points to the fact that the conception of the church as the "new temple" belongs to a very early tradition.

In Hebrews the concept of the heavenly temple is used, on the one hand, in a Platonic sense, to demonstrate the superiority of Christianity over Judaism (Heb. 8:5; 9:14), and, on the other hand, to depict the ongoing ministry of Christ (6:20; 8:1f; 10:21). In Revelation the heavenly temple forms the stage for the outworking of the divine drama in chapters 3–20 and is not in itself important. It is in chapter 21 that one finds the author's creative reinterpretation. There we read that the New Jerusalem has no temple (21:22). This bold thought can be taken to mean either that in the place where one would normally expect to find the sanctuary one finds God Himself (God and the Lamb), immediately accessible to all, or that the New Jerusalem is all temple. In any event, the meaning is the same.

TEMPLE, FREDERICK (1821-1902). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1896. Born in Greece where his father was a diplomat, he was educated largely by his widowed mother, to whom throughout his life he was closely attached. He entered Oxford on a Balliol scholarship and gained a first in classics and mathematics. In 1842 he was lecturer at Balliol and in 1846 was ordained. In 1850 he became principal of Kneller Hall, a training college for schoolmasters. In 1857 he was appointed headmaster of Rugby School where he gave vigorous leadership. His liberal sentiments had already found expression in his contribution to the celebrated volume Essays and Reviews, two of whose contributors were condemned by the church courts. Echoes of this controversy were found when in 1869 Temple was appointed bishop of Exeter and objections were made to his consecration. In Exeter he exhibited his lifelong interest in education, especially in the wake of the 1870 Education Act; another noteworthy field was in temperance reform.

He continued his interest in social questions after his appointment to the bishopric of London in 1885. In 1889 he helped to find a way of solving the dockers strike. In 1896 he was appointed archbishop of Canterbury, sold Addington Park, and with the proceeds bought the old Palace at Canterbury for his residence. He presided over the Queen Victoria Diamond Jubilee in 1897 and in the same year the Lambeth Conference.* He crowned Edward VII king. Throughout his time as primate he was involved in the ritual troubles. Straightforward and direct, often giving the impression of curtness, he was nevertheless a man of deep affection, as can be seen in his letters to his children, one of whom, William Temple,* also became archbishop of Canterbury.

See E.G. Sandford (ed.) Memoirs of Archbishop Temple by Seven Friends (2 vols., 1906).

PETER S. DAWES

TEMPLE, WILLIAM (1881-1944). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1942. Son of Frederick Temple,* he was educated at Rugby, then became an exhibitioner at Balliol, gaining a double first. In 1904 he was appointed a fellow of Queen's. In 1906 he was refused ordination by Bishop Paget of Oxford, who thought Temple was insufficiently certain concerning the doctrines of the Virgin Birth and resurrection. After further discussion (and with Paget's consent) he was ordained by Archbishop Davidson in 1908. In 1912 he became headmaster of Repton and contributed to the volume Foundations. He became in 1914 rector of St. James', Piccadilly, which he later resigned during the war years to become the secretary of the Mission of Repentance and Hope and later the leader of the Life and Liberty movement which resulted in the enabling act setting up church councils and the church assembly.

In 1921 he was appointed bishop of Manchester, and in 1929 archbishop of York. In 1942 he became archbishop of Canterbury. Temple combined a first-rate philosophical mind with theological acuteness and great social awareness. He was for many years president of the Workers Education Association. He chaired the Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship in 1924, and his last book was entitled Christianity and Social Order. He was also in the forefront of ecumenical affairs and presided at the meeting which inaugurated the British Council of Churches. He had a great deal to do with commending the Church of South India* to the Lambeth Conference.*

His concern to express the Christian faith was done both in sermons, particularly in well-known missions to the universities, and in his books; particularly noteworthy among these are Mens Creatrix, Christus Veritas, and his Gifford Lectures Nature, Man and God. At the same time, his Readings in St. John's Gospel shows that his scholarship was matched by his devotion.

Toward the end of his life he himself noted the divergence between his own incarnational theology and that of the theology of redemption then coming into fashion. He was often said to be too much of a philosopher for the theologians, and too much of a theologian for philosophers. His sudden death in 1944 was widely felt as a serious loss to the worldwide church.

PETER S. DAWES

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. All three synoptic gospels record that Jesus was tempted after His baptism and before He began His ministry. The account in Mark is very brief (Mark 1:12f.). Matthew and Luke give fuller accounts, the only substantial difference being the order of the last two temptations (Matt. 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13). Matthew's account seems to work toward a psychological climax while Luke's appears to be more governed by geography. Jesus is tempted to turn stones into bread, to throw Himself off the pinnacle of the Temple so that God will rescue Him spectacularly, and to gain control of the world through worshiping Satan. Each of the temptations seems to be directed both to His personal relationship to His Father and to His mission on earth. "If you are the Son of God . . ." echoes the declaration made at His baptism and is heard again when His other period of intense testing in the passion reaches its climax on the cross (Matt. 27:40,43).

The temptations to be dissatisfied with God's provision, God's methods, and God Himself are all answered from the Book of Deuteronomy. This signifies Jesus' understanding that He was in His forty days in the wilderness recapitulating the experience of Israel in their forty years in the wilderness. Similar examples of Israel's temptations as also being experienced by Christians are found in 1 Corinthians 10:1-13. It seems as if there is also a parallel with the temptations of mankind as a whole as shown in Genesis 3 (cf. 1 John 2:16). Thus Jesus faces and overcomes representatively the temptations of all men (Heb. 2:14-18; 4:14-16, 5:7-10). The season of Lent, which was originally a preparation for the Easter baptism, in due course became a forty-day remembrance of the temptation of Jesus. R.E. NIXON

TEN ARTICLES, THE (1536). A summary of articles of faith of the "new" Church of England, these were adopted by Convocation to comply with the wishes of Henry VIII. The Bible, the three universal creeds, and acts of the first four councils were said to be authoritative. Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and penance were accepted sacraments. Transubstantiation in the Lord's Supper was not mentioned, but the real presence was asserted. Images could be used, but were not to be worshiped; but intercession might be made to the saints. Justification was more closely linked with faith, although works helped to justify. Prayers and Masses for the dead and purgatory were denied. These articles, which revealed Lutheran influence, were replaced in 1537 by another statement, the Bishops' Book.* EARLE E. CAIRNS

TENISON, THOMAS (1636-1715). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1695. Ordained privately by Bishop Duppa in 1659, he became a fellow of his own Cambridge College (Corpus Christi) in 1662. As a don he attacked the views of Thomas Hobbes,* and as vicar of St. Andrew-the-Great won respect by his example during the plague. He became rector of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, in 1680. He preached the funeral sermon of Nell Gwynne (1687), attended Monmouth at his execution (1685), published An Argument for Union with the Dissenters (1683), and joined the seven bishops in their stand against James II. In favor after the Revolution for his Latitudinarian views and Whig sympathies, he became archdeacon of London in 1689, was consecrated bishop of Lincoln in 1692, and promoted to Canterbury three years later. As a member of the 1689 commission working on a comprehensive scheme, he compiled a list of all the Dissenters' scruples over the liturgy. The Tories greatly reduced his influence in Anne's reign, but he took active steps to secure the Hanoverian succession. He is also remembered for establishing the first public library in London (1684) and for his vigorous support for the foundation and early growth of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. John Evelyn approved of Tenison's stand for Christian morality in the loose-living days of Charles II.

TENNENT, GILBERT (1703-1764). Presbyterian minister and revivalist. Eldest son of William Tennent,* he was born in Ireland, read theology under his father, and was licensed to preach in 1725. Next year he was ordained by Philadelphia Presbytery and became minister of the New Brunswick Presbyterian Church in New Jersey. Theodore Frelinghuysen* befriended him and guided him in his revivalistic ministry among the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians in what was the opening phase of the Great Awakening.* The New Brunswick Presbytery, founded by Tennent and graduates from his father's "Log College," became the center of Presbyterian revival and controversy in the middle colonies. Tennent accompanied George Whitefield* through the colonies in 1740-41.

His famous sermon, "The Danger of an Unconverted Ministry" (1740), was a broadside against the Philadelphia Synod's opposition to ordaining graduates of the Log College and was a factor in causing the Old Side-New Side schism in 1741. From 1743 until his death Tennent pastored the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. He and Samuel Davies* visited Britain (1753-55) to raise money for the new College of New Jersey (Princeton). HOWARD A. WHALEY

TENNENT, WILLIAM (1673-1746). Presbyterian minister and educator. Born in Ireland, he graduated from the University of Edinburgh, and in 1706 was ordained priest in the Church of Ireland. About 1717 he emigrated to Philadelphia, where he was admitted to the Presbyterian ministry. He held pastorates in Pennsylvania and New York before becoming minister at Neshaminy, Pennsylvania, where he stayed for the rest of his life. About 1735 he built a small log building on his property, where he educated his three younger sons for the ministry. Some fifteen other men were trained in what came to be derisively called the "Log College" by its detractors because the influential young men trained there were active revivalists who did not meet the educational requirements set by the Philadelphia Synod. In the ensuing controversy Tennent sided with the New Side Presbyterians. His sons Gilbert,* William Jr., John, and Charles and the "Log College men" bear eloquent testimony to Tennent's great contributions to Presbyterian history, especially to the Great Awakening.* HOWARD A. WHALEY

TEN YEARS' CONFLICT (1834-1843). A confrontation between Evangelicals and Moderates* in the Church of Scotland. Both parties believed in ecclesiastical establishment, but patronage was divisive—the presentation of a minister to a congregation upon the nomination of a patron, despite the opposition of the congregation. The Moderates espoused this procedure. Rejected at the Reformation and in the Revolution Settlement, patronage was reintroduced in 1712. Making the minister dependent on the aristocracy, it tended to separate him from his congregation. The patron's social round was not always conducive to pastoral priorities. If the congregation showed any unwillingness to accept the minister, the civil magistrate would endorse the patron's choice. During the heyday of Moderatism the Church of Scotland lost one-sixth of its membership to secession groups bearing the Presbyterian name.

In 1834 the Evangelical party wanted to make the congregation's consent essential to the issuing of a call, and by passing the Veto Act gave the congregations the right to refuse the patron's nominee. That year the patron presented to the congregation of Auchterarder a nominee whom the congregation refused to accept; the presbytery upheld this decision. The nominee took action in the civil courts which declared his right to ordination and the emoluments of the church. After further clashes elsewhere between church and state, it became clear that the Church of Scotland was not free to govern itself. Evangelicals were faced with the choice of rescinding the Veto Act or leaving the church. Parliament would not move to help them. In 1843, therefore, the Disruption* took place, and the Ten Years' Conflict ended with the birth of the Free Church of Scotland.*

TERESA, MOTHER (Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu) (b. 1910). Missionary to India. Born in Yugoslavia, daughter of an Albanian grocer, she went to India in 1928 as a teacher under the Roman Catholic Church. Her heart soon went out to the poor of Calcutta, and after nursing training she moved into the slums. In 1948 she founded the Order of the Missionaries of Charity and organized schools and dispensaries. She became an Indian citizen, and adopted the sari as the habit of her order, which received canonical sanction from Pius XII in 1950. A leper colony was built, and the blind, crippled, aged, and dying were served. In 1963 the Indian government honored her. In 1964 Paul VI on his visit gave her a limousine which she promptly disposed of, giving the proceeds to aid her leper work. In 1971 she received the first Pope John XXIII Peace Prize. By the mid-seventies her order numbered some 700 nuns in 60 centers in Calcutta and 70 worldwide centers from Britain to Australia. J.D. DOUGLAS

TERESA OF AVILA (1515-1582). Carmelite reformer, mystic, and writer. Born into a good Spanish family at Avila and educated by Augustinian nuns, she entered the Carmelite Convent of the Incarnation there in 1533, at first suffering from serious illness which caused her withdrawal. Reentering, but purposeless, it was not until the 1550s that she sought the life of perfection, praying before a statue of the scourged Christ at the pillar, and soon to have divine locutions and heavenly visions. She knew ecstasy, and among her spiritual experiences was the mystical piercing of the heart by a spear of divine love. She wrote about this but never stressed it unduly, recognizing the dangers. Domingo Banez,* a Dominican priest, influenced her much in these years.

In middle life, with Peter of Alcántara* as her confessor, she founded a convent under the original (discalced) Carmelite Rule, St. Joseph's at Avila (1562). There she wrote her first work, The Way of Perfection, as instruction for her nuns. From 1567 she traveled in Spain, founding houses for both nuns and friars and receiving much assistance from John of the Cross.* She wrote Life (autobiography to 1562), Book of Foundations (account of her convents), and The Interior Castle which made her a doctor of the spiritual life, scientifically delineating the life of prayer from meditation through mystical marriage and noting intermediate stages. As the reformer of the Carmelite Order and a mystic, she proved in her distinguished life that great practical achievement and highest contemplation could coexist properly.

See V. Sackville-West, The Eagle and the Dove (1943), and E.A. Peers, Mother of Carmel (1945).

TERESA OF LISIEUX (1873-1897). Carmelite and devotional writer. Born Marie Françoise Thérèse Martin, she had a most trying childhood, including a grave illness. This led, however, at Christmas 1886 to a conversion experience that led to her monastic commitment. Religious from her earliest years, she now discovered what surrender and personal rebirth meant, and special permission was given her to enter the Carmelite convent in Lisieux at only fifteen. From 1893 she was acting novice-mistress and wrote Little Way; Benedict XV said it "contained the secret of sanctity for the entire world." Dying of tuberculosis, she wrote her autobiography, the wide circulation of which has led to her extensive cult. Canonized exceptionally early (1925), she has been named patroness of foreign missions and joined with Joan of Arc as patroness of France (1947).

TERMINISM. The teaching that there is a specific period of grace within which an individual can be converted. The view arose within the German Pietist Movement as a protest against what was regarded as the ineptitude of "deathbed" conversions. Originating as a response to an awkward pastoral situation, it soon became a point in speculative theology in which it was claimed that there is a time of grace for everyone, determined only by the will of God, beyond which it is unwarrantable to seek conversion. The issue is a good example of the speculative dogmatizing that has arisen out of acute practical problems. The chief controversialists were J.G. Böse (1662-1700), A. Rechenberg (1642-1721), and T. Ittig (1643-1710). It remained a general issue within Lutheran theology until about 1704. PAUL HELM

TERRITORIALISM. A theory of church government brought in with the Reformation but formulated later—e.g., by C. Thomasius (1655-1728) and J.H. Böhmer (1749). The temporal ruler, by virtue of his office, possesses the right of regulating his country's ecclesiastical affairs and of banishing those disturbing the peace of the church. He himself is not subject to ecclesiastical discipline. Only one religion is permitted in a territory. It is summarized in the formula adopted at the Peace of Augsburg* (1555): cuius regio, eius religio. Opposite views are the "Collegialism" of H. Grotius,* S. Pufendorf,* and C.M. Pfaff, and the "Confessionalism" of the Anabaptist* tradition. J.G.G. NORMAN

TERSTEEGEN, GERHARD (1697-1769). German hymnwriter. Born in Westphalia, he received a classical education, after which he was apprenticed at fifteen to his brother, a Mülheim shopkeeper. After his conversion in the following year, he spent much time in prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. For some years he lived alone near Mülheim as a ribbon-weaver. He suffered great spiritual depression, but found assurance of faith in 1724. He left the Reformed Church, mainly because he would not take Communion with open sinners, but formed no sect. In 1725 he began to speak at prayer meetings in Mülheim and became known as a religious leader. He gave up weaving and was supported by gifts from friends. His cottage was known as a Pilgerhütte, a retreat for the Stillen im Lande. His influence spread throughout Germany, Holland, and Scandinavia, although temporarily restricted by a Prussian law against conventicles. He conducted an immense correspondence, translated works by mystics and Quietists, including Madame Guyon,* and delivered sermons which were published as Geistliche Brosamen von des Herrn Tisch gefallen (1769-73). Most of his 111 hymns were published in his Geistliches Blumen-Gärtlein (1729), which ran through many editions. The best known in English were both paraphrased by John Wesley*: "Thou hidden love of God" and "Lo, God is here!"

TERTIARY. A lay person who belongs to the third order in a monastic order, after monks and nuns. Tertiaries entered the Franciscans* in the thirteenth century, the Augustinian Hermits* in 1400, the Dominicans* in 1405, the Servites* in 1424, and the Carmelites* in 1452. They were found also in other orders. Their order was established to permit lay people to participate in the orders' work. They were subject to the order's leadership in inner discipline, but external discipline rested with the bishop alone. Priests in the orders formed chapters of tertiaries who recited an office, underwent novitiate, were bound by discipline, but professed no vows. Tertiaries regular live in a convent. Only the Franciscan tertiaries regular have a separate Rule for themselves. JOHN GROH

TERTULLIAN (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus) (c.160/70-c.215/20). African moralist, apologist, and theologian. Few details of his life are certain. Reared in the cultured paganism of Carthage, he imbibed a solid literary, rhetorical, and perhaps legal training. He possibly practiced as an advocate, but is not identifiable with the Roman jurist Tertullianus, though he probably visited Rome. After moderated immorality he became a Christian in unknown circumstances, plausibly influenced by the fortitude of martyrs. He married a Christian wife, and may have had children and become a widower, rejecting remarriage as a Montanist.* He was not a presbyter, but most likely a catechist or teacher. After espousing "the new prophecy," he left the catholic church c.206. Augustine* reported that he later abandoned Montanism and founded the Tertullianists, whose last remnant had rejoined the catholic church in Carthage in Augustine's lifetime. However, "Tertullianist" was probably the African name for Montanist.

Tertullian is known almost exclusively through his writings. His Greek works (on baptism, games, and shows, and on veiling of virgins, i.e., for local Greek-speaking Christians) have not survived, but thirty-one Latin works remain, the first significant corpus of Christian Latin literature. (Lost works included Ecstasy, Paradise, Fate, The Hope of Believers, Flesh and Soul, and Against the Apellians.) His writings span the period roughly from 196 to 212; their order and individual dating are often uncertain. They are nearly all controversial, revealing an initial preoccupation with apologetic and Christian mores, later partly displaced by refutation of heretics and Gnostics, though Montanism accentuated his ethical-ascetic thrust.

Several apologies, notably the Apology itself (c.197), highlight the legal and moral absurdities of persecution, while To the Martyrs (197) encourages Christian "athletes" in prison. The Stoic-indebted Testimony of the Soul (198) discerns the anima naturaliter Christiana in spontaneous ejaculations like "Good God!"

The Prescription of Heretics (203; ET S.L. Greenslade, 1956) refuses them appeal to the Scriptures, which rightfully belong only to churches with apostolic pedigrees. Gnostics* and Docetists* are the targets of several works c.204-7, especially The Soul (c.206; ed. J.H. Waszink, 1947), a lengthy learned rebuttal of Gnostic psychology. Against Marcion (207/8; ET E. Evans, 2 vols., 1972), twice rewritten and expanded, utilizes earlier lost refutations and constitutes an invaluable source. The Montanist Against Praxeas (c.210; ET Evans, 1948) is the most advanced exposition to date of Trinitarian doctrine.

From the first, Tertullian's practical works advocate disengagement from pagan society. Idolatry (196/7; ET Greenslade, 1956) blacklists numerous professions contaminated by paganism (cf. The Soldier's Garland, 208) while other treatises deal with Women's Dress (196-c.206) and Shows (196/7). His move into Montanism intensified this rigorism. After reluctantly condoning remarriage in To His Wife (c.200), he condemned it outright in Monogamy (c.210; both ET W.P. Le Saint, 1951). Once he tolerated flight from persecution, but later Flight in Persecution (c.208) outlawed any "unspiritual" avoidance of martyrdom. The catholic Penitence (c.200) permitted one postbaptismal penance, but when the bishop of Carthage extended it to adultery and fornication, the Montanist Purity (c.210; both ET Le Saint, 1959) reserved its authorization to the "pneumatics" who judged it never expedient.

Tertullian also produced the earliest exposition of the Lord's Prayer in Prayer, and the first extant treatise on Baptism (both c.200; ET Evans, 1953, 1964). They are homiletic-catechetical in form, like Penitence and Patience (c.200); other writings may have similar origin or structure.

Tertullian's sophistic brilliance and literary versatility, ruthless vigor as disputant and polemicist, fecundity in uttering memorable dicta, and fervent religious immediacy make him a captivating writer as well as a priceless mirror of early African Christianity. He influenced magisterically the ethos of the African Church and subsequent theology not only in the West, by providing terminology for classical Trinitarian and christological formulations and by advancing dogmatic development. He fostered juridically colored Latin interpretations of the work of Christ and relations between God and man, although facile assumptions have magnified the importance of his legal expertise. The chief non-Christian influences on his thought were Stoicism and the rhetorical tradition.

TESTAMENT OF OUR LORD IN GALILEE. Known under this title from the earliest edited version (Ethiopic, in which it is combined with other writings), the Epistula Apostolorum is also known in Coptic, on which the best edition is based, and in a Latin fragment. In the form of a circular letter from the eleven apostles to the universal church, it deals with such supernatural questions as the Incarnation and Ascension, somewhat mythologically, but in an explicitly anti-Gnostic way, emphasizing the true flesh of Christ. First dated in the sixties of the second century and ascribed to Asia Minor, it has more recently been linked with Egypt in the early second century. Its antecedents are to be seen in Jewish Christianity, and the Dead Sea Scrolls* may cast some light on it. J.N. BIRDSALL

TESTAMENT OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST. An apocryphal work purporting (like, e.g., the *Gospel of Thomas) to give post-resurrection words of Jesus to the disciples. An apocalypse of the end is followed by detailed prescriptions for church layout, services, ministry, and catechumenate. The prayers have a warm, devotional quality. The "church order" has clearly drawn on, inter alia, the lost Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus,* but reflects a later period, with security for the church. The date is impossible to determine: probably in the fifth, perhaps the fourth century. Apollinarian or Monophysite ingredients are sometimes alleged but remain uncertain, though its later use in Monophysite churches may have affected the translated versions. The place of origin is also obscure: references in the Apocalypse suggest Asia Minor, the provenance Syria or Egypt.

The colophon of the published Syriac indicates its translation from Greek in A.D. 687. Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions exist, and a Latin arrangement of the Apocalypse. The direct attribution of these prescriptions and liturgies to the Risen Lord is the climax of a series of "apostolic" church orders, and perhaps reflects anxious championship of a particular local use.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (1530). A Protestant confession of faith drawn up by Martin Bucer* and Wolfgang Capito* at the Diet of Augsburg, and presented by Jakob Sturm in the name of the cities of Strasbourg, Memmingen, Lindau, and Constance. Its purpose was to prevent a rupture in German Protestantism. It had Zwinglian affinities, but its doctrinal formulae were based on the Augsburg Confession, of which the compilers had obtained a copy. It was not generally accepted as was the Augsburg document, but it did become the symbolic formula of the four cities. With Bucer's "Greater Catechism" it was accepted by Strasbourg as binding on that city (1534), on the basis of which the magistrates decreed the banishment of persistent Anabaptists.*

TETZEL, JOHANN (c.1465-1519). Dominican friar. His one claim to fame is his hawking of indulgences* at Jüterbock, near Wittenberg, but just beyond the borders of Saxony. His exaggerated claims stirred Martin Luther's pastoral concerns (many Wittenbergers had bought indulgences from Tetzel) to such a degree that he formulated a set of theses for academic debate. These are the Ninety-Five Theses* of 31 October, 1517. Tetzel was subcommissary of the regions of Magdeburg and Halberstadt, and the indulgences were ostensibly meant for the building of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, although the elector of Mainz profited in part from payment of debts to the Fuggers. CARL S. MEYER

TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, ORDER OF. German religious and military order. Founded by Lübeck and Bremen merchants during the siege of Acre in the Third Crusade and confirmed by Pope Clement III in 1199, it soon became an important order in Germany. After aiding Hungarian King Andrew II in repulsing the Cumans, the knights were invited by Polish Duke Conrad of Masovia to help crush the heathen Prussians. Frederick II named Grandmaster Hermann of Salza (1209-39) a prince of the empire in 1226 and authorized the acquisition of East Prussia. The Teutonic Order began the conquest in 1231, sponsored large-scale colonization by German peasants and merchants during the next century, and transferred its residence to the fortress Marienburg in 1309.

The order failed to unite its East Prussian and Livonian holdings and declined in the face of Polish, Lithuanian, and Russian resurgence. After the defeat at Tannenberg (1410) and a series of subsequent military disasters, the Treaty of Thorn (1466) reduced its territory to a portion of East Prussia. Grandmaster Albert of Hohenzollern (1490-1568) accepted Lutheranism in 1525 and secularized it as the duchy of Prussia under the suzerainty of the Polish king. Those remaining Catholic transferred the seat to Mergentheim in Franconia, and some participated in the Turkish wars. Although Napoleon dissolved the order in Germany in 1805, its existence continued in Austria with an archduke as grandmaster until 1918. It received a new Rule in 1929 establishing its strictly religious character, and the order now works chiefly in schools and hospitals.

TEXTUS RECEPTUS. A Latin term meaning "the received text" of the NT. The discovery and collection of Greek manuscripts of the NT at the time of the Renaissance and the invention of printing led to a number of printed editions of the Greek NT in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Erasmus* published his edition in 1516 and the "Complutensian Polyglot"* came out in 1522. These were used by R. Stephanus in producing his edition of 1550. There followed ten editions by Theodore Beza,* beginning in 1565. The Dutch brothers Elzevir drew especially upon Stephanus (only 287 variants are found between them) in their editions of 1624 and 1633. In the preface to the latter they use the phrase "Textum ergo habes, nunc ab omnibus receptum" ("You have the text which is now received by all"). This text was basically the Byzantine Text* appearing in most of the late manuscripts, and was assembled before the science of textual criticism had been developed. It underlies the Authorized Version (KJV). R.E. NIXON

THADDAEUS. The name is found only in the lists of the twelve apostles recorded in the first two gospels (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18). In its place Luke has Judas the son (or brother) of James (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). The unpopularity of the name "Judas" because of the treachery of Iscariot may have led to this man's being known by another name. "Thaddaeus" is thought to have been derived from Aramaic meaning the "breast nipple." This might suggest that he was a character of almost feminine tenderness. Some Western manuscripts read "Lebbaeus" at Matthew 10:3. This is usually thought to be inauthentic and, as probably derived from Hebrew leb, "heart," may have been an explanation of the name "Thaddaeus." If Judas is the same as Thaddaeus, he is not likely to be the brother of our Lord or the author of the epistle of Jude, though he may be the same as "Judas (not Judas Iscariot)" of John 14:22. Jerome equates Thaddaeus, Lebbaeus, and Judas of James, and tells how he was sent on a mission to Abgar, king of Edessa. He was thought by Eusebius to be one of the seventy disciples sent out by Jesus (Luke 10:1). R.E. NIXON

THAILAND. The story of Protestant Christian missionary work in this Buddhist land is one of repeated disappointments and frustration. Yet it has enjoyed the services of some outstanding missionaries. Karl Gutzlaff,* a German, was one of the first two to arrive in 1828. In less than three years he saw the Bible completely, though imperfectly, translated into Thai, and he produced a grammar and dictionary. But his wife and infant twin daughters died in 1831, and he himself had to leave the country, apparently in a dying condition. In all, sixty-one missionaries have died on this field.

The American Board took up the challenge in 1831 with David Abeel, but in 1849 it officially withdrew. The American Missionary Association, taking on the support of former American Board missionary Daniel Beach Bradley, had a longer history, but it came to be almost exclusively a one-man work. Physician and printer as well as preacher, no missionary made a more lasting impression on the country than Bradley. He was a good friend of King Mongkut. Yet he had few converts. After his death in 1873, the AMA also withdrew.

American Baptist work began with John Taylor Jones in 1833. He completed translating the NT in 1843 and baptized several Chinese, who comprise an important minority in the country. The Chinese Baptist Church organized in 1837 was the first Protestant church in the Far East. This mission's efforts were sporadic, and they ended in 1893.

The major continuing work is that of the American Presbyterians, begun in 1840. They had little success among the Thai of the south, but when Daniel McGilvary went to Chiengmai in the north in 1867 he began an important work with Laos and other hill tribes. He was largely responsible for the edict of toleration in 1878. In 1934 the Presbyterians formed the Church of Christ in Thailand with 8,713 members. In 1957 the mission dissolved and turned over all the work to this national church.

In 1929 the Christian and Missionary Alliance* entered neglected E Thailand from neighboring Cambodia. But the great influx of new missions came after World War II and the closing of China. Overseas Missionary Fellowship (the former China Inland Mission) began in 1951 primarily to reach hill tribes similar to those in China. It now has the largest number of missionaries. Work has extended also to the many Muslim Malays of the southern peninsula.

In spite of increased conversions, Christians still represent not more than 1 percent of the population. The Church of Christ in Thailand is a member of the World Council of Churches. It was host to the East Asia Christian Conference in 1949. It does not, however, represent many of the newer works.

THANKSGIVING DAY. An annual holiday in the USA and Canada for expressing thanks to God for the harvest and other blessings. The original Thanksgiving of the Pilgrims was ordered by Governor Bradford after the first harvest in Plymouth Colony (1621). Special days were often appointed in Puritan New England for thanksgiving or fasting. Beginning in Connecticut (1649), the observance of an annual harvest festival spread throughout New England by the end of the eighteenth century George Washington proclaimed the first national Thanksgiving in 1789. With Lincoln's proclamation (1863) it became an annual observance. By an act of Congress (1941) Thanksgiving Day is the fourth Thursday of November. Although church services may be held, Thanksgiving is typically a family festival. The second Monday in October is observed in Canada.

THEANDRIC ACTS. A term coined by Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite (fifth century) to denote the characteristic activity of the God-Man. Christ "did not perform divine acts as God nor human acts as man, but as the God-Man he manifested a kind of new theandric activity." It was used by Monophysites and Monothelites (e.g., Severus* of Antioch) of the one nature and one will in Christ, substituting "one" for "new." Cyrus of Alexandria was won over to the formula by Sergius of Constantinople, including it in the Act of Union (633) by which the Theodosian Monophysites of Egypt were reconciled with the church. Its Monothelite use was condemned by Martin I* (Lateran Council, 649), who permitted it only to designate the union in Christ of the two distinct operations. Maximus the Confessor* and John of Damascus* used it in an orthodox sense.

J.G.G. NORMAN

THEATINES. An order founded early in the sixteenth century by Gaetano of Tiene, Bonifazio da Colle, Paolo Consiglieri, and Giovanni Pietro Caraffa (later Pope Paul IV) to combat heresy. Growing out of the work of the Oratory of Divine Love, this order made up of regular clergy sought to maintain the integrity of the Roman Catholic Church primarily by preaching, although in cooperation with the Inquisition* it became one of the principal instruments for suppressing the Reformation in Italy. The order spread across the Alps into France, Germany, Poland, and Spain. In some ways it provided a pattern for the organizational structure of the Society of Jesus.*

THEBAIC VERSION, see EGYPTIAN VERSIONS

THEISM. The term originated in England in the seventeenth century. It may refer either to a philosophical theory about the nature of God, or to a central, necessary aspect of historic Christianity. The latter is theistic in that it affirms that God is the creator of the universe (He is transcendent), and also that He sustains it, and by acts of particular providence and gracious redemption is redeeming it (He is immanent). It is possible to conceive of various versions of theism, e.g., dualistic or polytheistic, but the classic Christian view is monistic, hence the metaphysical problem of the origin of evil. Theism is usually contrasted with Deism,* the view that God is simply the transcendental "ground" of the universe, and with pantheism,* the belief that God is to be identified with the universe. Christian theism, although always recognizing the problem of referring to the transcendent God (see, e.g., Thomas Aquinas's doctrine of analogy and Calvin's view of "accommodation"), has come under heavy attack in modern times from antimetaphysical philosophies such as Logical Positivism and Existentialism,* and from those theologians who, like Karl Barth,* attempt to give an account of Christian theology in "christological" terms.

PAUL HELM

THEOBALD (d.1161). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1138. Norman-born, he became a monk at Bec and was later abbot. As archbishop he crowned Stephen in 1141, and his administrative capacity was shown during the politics of that reign. Appointed papal legate in 1150, having been bypassed earlier by Innocent II in favor of Henry of Blois, he worked for cooperation between church and state. In defiance of Stephen he attended the Council of Reims in 1148, whereupon he was exiled, which act led Eugenius III to put England under interdict. Again, in 1152, Theobald refused under papal orders to crown Stephen's son Eustace, and fled to Flanders. Having reconciled Stephen and Henry of Anjou in 1153, he crowned Henry II in 1154 and recommended Thomas Becket* as chancellor. John of Salisbury* was his own secretary and chief advisor during that time. He encouraged the study of canon law and opposed the monastic claims for exemption from diocesan ruling.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

THEOCRACY. The term was coined by Josephus to express the concept of a God-governed state. The Hebrew people expressed a distinct belief in this type of government, although it took various forms during their historical existence as a nation. At Sinai they became the "holy nation" of the Lord (Exod. 19:6) and soon established an amphictyony—a religious confederation of tribes pledged to the service of Yahweh their king. Later, during the period of the monarchy, the king became the representative of Yahweh's rule, "the Lord's anointed" (Ps. 2:2; 20:6). Therefore God could use His prophets to dethrone even the king (1 Sam. 15:26; 16:1ff.). Still God remains the real King whom Isaiah sees as high and lifted up (Isa. 6:1). During the postexilic period, the mediation of Yahweh's spiritual rule was transferred to the priest, particularly the "high priest" (Hag. 2:2; Zech. 3:1). In the NT, the rule of God is more eschatological in nature, but this depends on one's interpretation of the Kingdom of God* concept. Islamic politics, Calvinism in Geneva, and Puritanism in New England are further examples of attempts at theocracy. It should be recognized that theocracy is always more idealistic than realistic and is an article of faith rather than a demonstrable system. JOHN P. DEVER

THEODICY. The question of the justification (dikē) of God Himself (theos) is raised as a response to the problem of actual human experience within a world in which fulfillment is qualified or shattered by premature death, mental or physical retardation, destructive social conditions including war, the accidents of natural or man-made catastrophe, or the terror of history itself. The term appears first in the title of a work published by G.W. Leibnitz* in 1710, and the ensuing discussion is shaped by the spirit of the so-called Enlightenment; but the problem is ancient, as illustrated by reference to the religio-secular wisdom literature of the Near East; Babylonian, Egyptian, and biblical. Presumably the problem rests ultimately in the effort to do justice to finite freedom in relation to divine creativity. Tillich* has rightly raised the observation that the appropriateness of the question of theodicy is maintained only with respect to the consideration of " 'my' creaturely existence," and that the correlate question cannot therefore be raised "with respect to persons other than the questioner," which observation is not far removed from that Reformation principle of the ultimate sovereignty and mystery of God upon which all notions of destiny and predestination rightly depend.
CLYDE CURRY SMITH

THEODORA I (c.500-548). Wife of the Byzantine emperor Justinian I.* After a notorious career as an actress, with adventures in Syria and North Africa, she became a Christian and married Justinian in 523, after he had persuaded his uncle Justin I to repeal the law forbidding the marriage of senators with actresses. Justinian and Theodora were crowned together in 527, and afterward she exercised a great influence over his policy. She took the side of the Monophysites (see MONOPHYSITISM), whom she had known in Egypt, and so caused the reactionary policy of Justinian which led to the Three Chapters Controversy.* She showed great bravery during the insurrection at Nika in 532, and she opened homes for prostitutes. There is a contemporary portrait of her in mosaic in the apse of the church of San Vitale, Ravenna. PETER TOON

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (c.350-428). Antiochene exegete and theologian. Of wealthy Antiochene parentage, educated with John Chrysostom* under the eminent rhetorician and philosopher Libanius, like John he abandoned a secular career c.369 for the monastic school of Diodore* (of Tarsus). When marriage and the bar proved tempting, John persuaded him to persevere. He was ordained presbyter by Flavian c.383 and in 392 made bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia. During his lifetime his erudition and prolific literary versatility were renowned and his orthodoxy virtually unquestioned, but after the Council of Ephesus* (431) his standing became posthumously entangled with that of his condemned pupil Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM). Rabbula* of Edessa pressed the attack, Cyril* of Alexandria wrote Against Diodore and Theodore, and despite Chalcedon's* apparent favor, Theodore and his writings were anathematized in the first of the Three Chapters* by Justinian* (543/4) and the Second Council of Constantinople* (553), although defended by the West, especially Facundus* of Hermiane.

Scholars have judged the extracts from Theodore used by Leontius of Byzantium* to incriminate him so tendentious that modern expositions of his theology trust rather his undoubted works, several of which, mostly exegetical (see bibliography), have been recovered from manuscript catenae and translations, chiefly Syriac (whose reliability is sometimes questionable). With the Commentary on the Minor Prophets and numerous fragments—e.g., on Gen. 1–3 (he commented on most biblical books)—these reveal the most brilliant Antiochene exegete ("the Interpreter" of the Nestorian Churches) employing varied critical methods with remarkable insight (even rejecting the canonicity of some OT and NT books), though not wholly eschewing spiritual or typological meanings. His was the first attempt to place the Psalms historically. His lost Against the Allegorists adequately explains the Origenists' promotion of his condemnation.

Although only fragments (often uncertain) of his dogmatic-controversial works—mostly against Arius, Eunomius, and Apollinaris—are extant (except for a Disputation with Macedonians in defense of the Spirit's divinity in 392 at Anazarbus; Syriac ed. F. Nau, 1913), his creative contribution to Christology, especially in refuting Apollinarianism,* is increasingly acknowledged. If hindsight exposes his shortcomings, particularly in terminology, he also partly anticipated Chalcedon. The raw materials of Theodore's theology were more biblical and less philosophical than the Alexandrians'. It focused on immortality, achieved by a conjunction with God patterned on the divine-human conjunction in Christ and initiated through the sacraments. Thus his baptismal catecheses delivered at Antioch c.390 (his sole surviving practical works; lost are treatises on priesthood, monasticism, against magic, and his letters) reject a symbolic view of the Eucharist (yet interpret "daily bread" of normal food). They are invaluable commentaries on Antiochene baptismal, eucharistic, and penitential practices.

Theodore entertained Julian of Eclanum* c.421, wrote a lost anti-Augustinian Against Defenders of Original Sin, and was made the "father of Pelagianism"* by Marius Mercator.* His supposed teaching on the effects of Adam's sin and man's created mortality appears significantly similar, but again recently discovered works allegedly suggest otherwise. The Syrian affinities of Pelagian ideas are under renewed scrutiny (see RUFINUS "THE SYRIAN").

THEODORE OF RAITHU (sixth century). Monk and presbyter of a monastery in Raïthu, located on the SW coast of the Sinai peninsula. Some scholars claim that he is identical with Theodore of Pharan. The one work that can be attributed to him with certainty, Proparaskuē (Praeparatio), was written between 537 and 553. It defended Chalcedonian Christology (see CHALCEDON) and the theology of Cyril* of Alexandria, and attacked two Monophysites, Julian of Halicarnassus and Severus* of Antioch. It also tried to counter the views of Manes, Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM), Eutyches*, Apollinarius, Paul of Samosata*, and Theodore of Mopsuestia.*

THEODORE OF STUDIUM (759-826). Byzantine abbot. Born in Constantinople, he became monk (787) and abbot (794) of Saccudion monastery in Bithynia. Having opposed Constantine VI's adulterous second marriage, he was briefly exiled. In 797 the community at Saccudion, vulnerable to Muslim attack, transferred to Studius in Constantinople, which became a center of monastic reform. After another two-year exile because of differences with Patriarch Nicephorus*, Theodore was again in disputation when in 814 the Iconoclastic Controversy* was revived, and he led the opposition to the Iconoclasts. Exiled again, he was subsequently allowed to return, but barred from reassuming his post as abbot. Theodore stoutly maintained the church's independence of the state, did not hesitate to protest when he saw compromise in his patriarchs, and even appealed to the popes of Rome. Apart from his defense of image worship he is known for his adaptation of the Rules of St. Basil which became the norm in the Eastern Church. The author of many works, he left much of particular historical value in nearly 600 letters. J.D. DOUGLAS

THEODORE OF TARSUS (c.602-690). Archbishop of Canterbury from 669. Educated at Tarsus and Athens, Theodore was among numerous Eastern Christian refugees from the Arab invasions, bringing to England a high standard of culture. He was appointed to the see of Canterbury by Pope Vitalian, recommended by Hadrian the African*, the monk to whom the post had been offered. After touring England, Theodore worked at establishing the primacy of Canterbury by convoking the first council of the entire English Church at Hertford* in 673 and regulating affairs of dioceses. With Hadrian and Benedict Biscop*, Theodore promoted conformity with Rome and sent to Pope Agatho a declaration of orthodoxy written at the synod of Hatfield (680). The school at Canterbury, enriched by Theodore's manuscripts, became a leading center of education for Roman law and Greek, whence Roman influence spread to Wearmouth and Jarrow monasteries in Northumbria, both founded by Benedict. None of Theodore's scholarly writings survives.

DANIEL C. SCAVONE

THEODORET (c.393-c.458). Bishop of Cyrrhus (Syria). Born in Antioch, he seems to have been early intended for the religious life, and duly entered a nearby monastery about 416. Seven years later he became bishop of Cyrrhus (an unwanted elevation), where he spent all but two years of the rest of his life, making for himself a reputation not only as theologian, historian, and controversialist, but as a faithful and diligent pastor. In the christological controversy sparked by Cyril* of Alexandria, Theodoret accepted neither of the extreme positions, but held that Christ had two natures, united in one person but not in essence. At the Council of Ephesus* (431) Theodoret protested against both Cyril's procedural opportunism and his doctrine, and afterward wrote a refutation of the anathemas directed by Cyril against Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM; THREE CHAPTERS CONTROVERSY; CONSTANTINOPLE, SECOND COUNCIL OF). Theodoret's continued opposition led to his deposition and exile at the Robber Synod of Ephesus* in 449, but he was restored at the Council of Chalcedon* in 451, though obliged to participate in condemning Nestorius and to accept Theotokos as the title of the Virgin Mary.

As an exegete Theodoret was of the Antiochene* School, and this is reflected in his highly commended short commentaries on the Song of Solomon, the Prophets, Psalms, and the Pauline epistles. His other works included a collection of thirty biographies of monks, and a church history which continues the work of Eusebius down to 428. Of his letters 232 have survived.

THEODORE THE LECTOR (early sixth century). Church historian. He was a "reader" of the Hagia Sophia Church, Constantinople. He wrote two historical treatises. The first (c.520-30) was a Tripartite History compiled from the histories of Socrates, Sozomen*, and Theodoret.* The second was his own composition carrying the history from 438 to the accession of Justin I (518). The first has partially survived, but only fragments of the second remain.

THEODOSIUS I (c.346-395). Roman emperor from 379 (surnamed "the Great"). A Spaniard by birth, son of Count Theodosius who between 367 and 374 delivered Britain and Africa from barbarians, he distinguished himself in a campaign against the Sarmatians in 374. Appointed co-emperor by Gratian, he was given the task of restoring order in the Eastern provinces. Mostly by careful diplomacy with the Goths he did this. He was baptized in 380, gave up the use of the title pontifex maximus, and made it illegal to depart from the Nicene faith. In 381 he outlawed heretical churches and sects (e.g., Arians), and put their property at the disposal of the orthodox, and called the (First) Council of Constantinople.* In 390, while in a fit of temper, he ordered the punishment of the citizens of Thessalonica after a riot there; 7,000 were killed. Afterward, in response to the demands of Ambrose of Milan, he publicly acknowledged his guilt. PETER TOON

THEODOSIUS II (401-450). Eastern Roman emperor from 408. Grandson of Theodosius I, he was born in Constantinople and became ruler of the East after his father's death. He had to face difficulties caused by the invasion of Vandals in North Africa and by the accession of Attila, north of the Danube. In 425 he founded the University of Constantinople and three years later appointed Nestorius patriarch of the city. This led to the Nestorian controversy which he did not welcome (see NESTORIANISM). He called the Council of Ephesus* in 431, published the Theodosian (Law) Code in 438, and refortified Constantinople in 447. He had great respect for Simeon the Stylite,* from whom he accepted advice. He died after a fall from a horse. PETER TOON

THEODOTION (second century). Editor of a Greek version of the OT. Little is known of him; Irenaeus called him a Jewish proselyte, Jerome an Ebionite Christian, and Epiphanius a Marcionite. He was associated with Ephesus. His translation is a revision of the Septuagint from the Hebrew, in a style more readable than that of Aquila. Origen used it to fill lacunae in the Septuagint text, and the translation of Daniel entirely superseded that of the Septuagint. It is also especially valuable for the texts of Jeremiah and Job. Origen placed his text next after the Septuagint in his Hexapla; from this source considerable fragments survive.

THEODULF (c.750-821). Bishop of Orléans. A Goth by descent who fled his native Spain, he joined the court of Charlemagne. His intimate friendship with court personages, including Alcuin,* is engagingly depicted in his Carmina, a book of poems. The king appointed him bishop of Orléans by 798 and also to several neighboring abbacies. His administration produced a scholarly edition of the Vulgate,* established schools, reformed worship, and left architectural and artistic masterpieces, especially lavishly produced Bibles. Versus contra judices poetically describes his 798 mission to Visigothic France, and recommends legal reform. He accompanied Charlemagne* to Rome in 800 to adjudicate in charges against Leo III.* He pleaded against Adoptianism and for the Filioque in De spiritu sancto, and wrote a treatise on baptism. "All glory, laud and honor," a Palm Sunday hymn, is Theodulf's work. In 818 he was stripped of his benefices by Louis the Pious for alleged complicity in King Bernard of Italy's revolt. JAMES DE JONG

THEOGNOSTUS (d. c.282). Alexandrian priest and theologizer about whom little is known save through quotations in the writings of Photius, Athanasius, and Gregory of Nyssa. He authored a work titled Hypotyposes (in seven books), parts of which were hardly orthodox. In it he spoke of angels and devils having bodies, of Jesus Christ as a creature, and of the Holy Spirit in terms no more orthodox than Origen,* whose views he followed. As head of the Catechetical School he wielded some influence. Despite Theognostus's Origenistic tendencies and language, Athanasius* appealed to his writings in his struggle against Arianism.*

THEOLOGIA GERMANICA. An anonymous treatise probably originating in the late fourteenth century. It was written in the mystical tradition of the late Middle Ages associated with the names of Tauler* and Eckhart.* It emphasized humility, self-negation, and a mystical union with God. The work impressed Martin Luther, who thought he found in it precedents for his own theology, and he published an incomplete edition in 1516. In 1518 he published a complete edition with a preface in which he stated: "no book except the Bible and St. Augustine has come to my attention from which I have learned more about God, Christ, man and all things." The book does not in fact teach Luther's theology, but reveals the influence of a number of medieval theological traditions. It was placed on the Index* in 1621, although it contained nothing that made it antithetical to the doctrine of the Medieval Church. Since the Reformation it has appealed to a wide variety of different groups, including later German Pietists. Over 150 printed editions of the work have been identified since its first publication. An English translation by Susanna Winkworth with introduction and notes by W.R. Trask was published in 1949. RUDOLPH HEINZE

THEOPASCHITES. From a Greek word denoting those who teach that God suffered. The description was applied by contemporaries to that group of so-called Monophysites* who taught that when Jesus suffered on the cross it was in fact God who suffered; as their formula put it, "One of the Trinity suffered in the flesh and was crucified." This doctrine was publicly taught from 519 in Constantinople by certain Scythian monks, as well as by John Maxentius. Though their claim to orthodoxy was accepted by Emperor Justinian, it was disputed by the local patriarch and by the pope, with whom has gone the verdict of history.

THEOPHANY (Gr. theos, "God," phainesthai, "to appear"). A manifestation of God in some empirical form. The OT contains many such, but scholars are divided in their interpretations as to whether God Himself, or some divine agent, made the appearance. The problem revolves around the divine assertion, "God is spirit" (John 4:24), "No man has ever seen God" (John 1:18), and "You cannot see my face" (Exod. 33:20 RSV). But against this, see Genesis 32:30, "I have seen God face to face." There is no need to assume that in each case an angel or some other divine being appeared in the place of God, if we understand that it is the Father who remains spirit, and that the Son has manifested the Godhead empirically throughout history. This would be more correctly the concept of "Christophany." It would be a needed corrective to thinking that Christ assumed the likeness of the human form beginning at His conception in Mary's womb, however much His previous forms may have possessed superhuman powers. John 1:18 seems to hint at this interpretation. KEITH J. HARDMAN

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS. A Deistic sect founded in France at the Revolution during the rule of the Directory, with the object of establishing a religion completely free of dogma. Their chief patron was the director, L.M. La Réveillière-Lépeaux (1753-1824). In Manuel des théophilanthropes, J.B. Chemin-Dupontes set forth their creed as belief in God, virtue, and immortality, drawing his inspiration from Voltaire and Rousseau. In 1797 they met in Paris and were given by the director the use of Notre Dame cathedral and seventeen other Parisian churches. They appealed to few apart from some scientists, politicians, and artists, including Jacopus David. After the reestablishment of Catholicism by the Concordat of 1801* they lost ground, and Napoleon restored the churches to Roman Catholic worship (1802). Unsuccessful attempts were made to revive Theophilanthropism in the nineteenth century. J.G.G. NORMAN

THEOPHILUS (late second century). Christian apologist and bishop of Antioch. Of his works only his Apology, addressed to a pagan friend Autolycus, has survived. This work is in three books and seeks to show the superiority of the Christian revelation over pagan mythology. Although Eusebius called this apology "elementary," it cannot be denied that Theophilus's doctrine of the Godhead marks an important advance on his Christian predecessors. Proceeding from a theology influenced by Middle Platonism, he distinguished between two phases of the Logos: the logos endiathetos is the Logos innate in God, and the logos prophorikos is the Logos expressed from God for the purpose of creation. Theophilus is reticent concerning the person of Christ, but he clearly regarded him as the second Adam. However, there is no special emphasis on the redemptive work of Christ. The stress instead is upon the disobedience of the first Adam and the obedience of the second Adam by following whose example we may be saved. Theophilus was the first theologian to use the word Triad (trias) of the Godhead. G.L. CAREY

THEOPHILUS (d.412). Patriarch of Alexandria from 385. A learned and gifted man, he conducted his office well during the early years of his administration, but in his efforts to destroy paganism in Egypt he turned to violence and intrigue. Originally an admirer of Origen,* he turned against his theology and drove the Origenist monks from Egypt. When about fifty of these monks found a warmer welcome from Chrysostom* at Constantinople, he went to that city where he held a council of thirty bishops which drew up false charges against Chrysostom and deposed and banished him (403). His treatment of the venerable Chrysostom brought Theophilus into disrepute. C. GREGG SINGER

THEOPHYLACT (fl. 1070-1081). Archbishop of Achrida, and Byzantine exegete. Born in Euboea, he entered a monastery early in life. Quickly he showed great promise as a scholar and was chosen tutor to the young Prince Constantine, son of the emperor Michael VII (1071-78), to whom he dedicated a treatise "On the Education of Princes." About 1078 he became archbishop of Achrida (Ochrida), an uncivilized area. In his letters he often complained of the wickedness, ignorance, and bad manners of the Bulgars, who composed the majority of his flock. Nevertheless he was able to continue his literary work. He was a disciple of Michael Psellus* (c.1019-c.1078), the first professor of philosophy at the University of Constantinople, and this ensured his mastery of classical learning. He wrote commentaries on all the NT books except the Book of Revelation, as well as on several OT books. While his exegetical methods owed much to earlier Greek commentators, he was not himself lacking in lucidity of idea and expression. Apart from the commentaries, other extant works include homilies, letters, poems, and a conciliatory treatise concerning the Greak Schism.* The date of his death is not known, but he survived the accession of Alexius Comnenus in 1081. PETER TOON

THEOSOPHY. There are groups of Gnostic ideas that may be classified as theosophical, appearing in one form or another in such movements as Rosicrucianism,* occultism, advanced forms of Spiritualism,* and Anthroposophy.* They include reincarnation, the development of psychic and occult powers, the belief in karma, the influence of spirits of several grades, and enlightenment from great Masters, Adepts, or Mahatmas, who have completed their cycle of incarnations and yet have chosen to return once more to guide events from behind the scenes. God is generally an unknown God, or else God and the universe are treated in a pantheistic sense.

The term "Theosophy", however, is commonly identified with the Theosophical Society, founded in New York in 1875 by Colonel H.S. Olcott (1832-1907) and Mme. H.P. Blavatsky (1831-1891). They claimed to have been prompted by the latter's Himalayan Mahatmas. They were succeeded as leaders by Mrs. Annie Besant* (1847-1933), who was converted to the movement in 1889, after passing from a romantic Anglo-Catholicism into free thought under Bradlaugh. She was assisted for a time by C.W. Leadbeater, who later became bishop of the so-called Liberal Catholic Church.

At an early stage Olcott and Blavatsky moved to India, where Annie Besant also spent many years. Hence their ideas were much influenced by Hinduism* and Buddhism.* In 1912 Mrs. Besant and Leadbeater proclaimed a Hindu boy, Krishnamurti, as the reincarnation of the Supreme World Teacher. This led to the defection of Rudolf Steiner, who thereafter developed a more Western Anthroposophy. Krishnamurti repudiated his role.

The stated aims of the society are: "1. To form a nucleus of the Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, without distinction of race, creed, sex, caste or colour. 2. To encourage the study of comparative religion, philosophy, and science. 3. To investigate the unexplained laws of nature and the powers latent in man." The works of Annie Besant fill twenty-four columns in the British Museum catalog.

THEOTOKOS (Gr. theotokos, "God-bearer"). A title of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Favored by the Alexandrian School of theologians from the time of Origen* onward, this title helped to preserve for them the "Word-flesh" Christology. In the fifth century it was attacked by Nestorius who, wanting to emphasize the humanity of Jesus, proposed the compromise titles Christotokos ("Christ-bearer") or even Theodochos ("God-receiving"). Theotokos, however, had the militant support of Cyril* of Alexandria in his Paschal Letter of 429, and it was approved by the councils of Ephesus* (431) and Chalcedon* (451). The usual Latin equivalent was Dei Genetrix ("Mother of God"), not the literal Deipara. PETER TOON

THERAPEUTAE. An ancient sect of ascetics and recluses thought to have resided in the vicinity of Alexandria and Lake Mareotis, Egypt, in the first century A.D. The only account concerning them is in De Vita Contemplativa, attributed to the Jewish philosopher Philo.* There they are described as devoted to the study of the OT, particularly the Law and the Prophets, in the utmost solitude. From sunrise to sunset, the times for prayer, the OT was studied. Some of this sect ate only every second day, and others ate only once a week. On the Sabbath they met in worship and heard their oldest scholars discourse on their tenets. Their entire lives were regulated in the most austere manner, intended to promote piety.

Since only this one source remains for their existence and practices, scholars have had to conjecture concerning many matters. Previously some assumed they were Christians, following the error of Eusebius. Jerome, similarly confused, reckoned Philo to be an ecclestiastical writer of the Christians. In more modern times they were thought to be a branch of the Essenes,* but this was challenged by the church historian Adolf Harnack. While these two monastic groups do resemble each other especially in their strict discipline, other than their both being second- or first-century B.C. radical groups coming into being in that time when many new groups emerged, there was probably no direct connection.

THESSALONICA (modern Salonika). Political capital and chief seaport of Macedonia, it is situated at the head of the largest gulf on the Aegean Sea. It has been a cosmopolitan and important commercial center ever since its founding (c.316 B.C.) by Cassander, who named it for his wife, the sister of Alexander the Great. When Macedonia was divided into four districts in 167 B.C., Thessalonica was made the capital of the second district which extended between the rivers Strymon and Axius. Then in 148 B.C. Macedonia was made a Roman province, and Thessalonica became the seat of the Roman administration and later was declared a free city. The Roman road, Via Egnatia, was built through the city and walls were built around the city. It was ruled by politarchs (Acts 17:6), which has been recently confirmed by the discovery of inscriptions. In Paul's day Thessalonica had about 200,000 inhabitants, with an important Jewish community, with many Gentile converts (Acts 17:4). The ease with which the Jews at Thessalonica could influence the civil authorities reveals their power (Acts 17:5) against Paul and Silas. The incident of their imprisonment and deliverance suggests that the politarchs were bent on justice and legal protection for Paul and his companions, for the inability of free cities to keep public order always raised the threat of Roman interference.

Because of its continued occupancy, little archaeological information of the Thessalonica of Paul's day has been excavated. The main street is still the alignment of the Egnatian Way. Until 1876, at the western extremity of the city stood the Roman arch built by the citizens in honor of Octavian and Antony, and known as the Vardar Gate. It is one of the inscriptions on it that makes mention of the city politarchs, a previously unknown word, yet accurately described in the narrative of Acts 17:6. It probably dates from the period 30 B.C. to A.D. 143. Because of its location, Thessalonica has remained an important city throughout the Christian era, and now it has a population of almost 400,000.

THEUDAS. In his speech to the Sanhedrin about policy to be adopted toward the Christian movement, Gamaliel refers to Theudas who made an unsuccessful attempt at rebellion (Acts 5:36). He is said to have antedated Judas of Galilee who also failed in his uprising, made at the time of the census, which was in A.D. 6. Josephus refers to someone of that name who was a magician who promised to lead his followers through Jordan dry-shod. He was killed by the troops of the procurator Fadus (c. A.D. 46-48). It has often been argued that Luke has misread Josephus. This is most unlikely in view of Luke's known accuracy in other places, and it is much more probable that there were two men of this name who lived at different times and were both engaged in some sort of public disorder. R.E. NIXON

THIERRY OF CHARTRES (c.1100-c.1156). Scholastic philosopher and theologian. He was the younger brother of Bernard of Chartres, who was chancellor of Chartres from 1114 to 1119 and was a major figure in the humanist and Platonic tradition characteristic of the cathedral school at Chartres. Thierry followed the same emphasis. He taught at the cathedral school while his brother was chancellor, and in 1136 he became archdeacon of Dreux. He also taught in Paris where John of Salisbury* was one of his pupils. In 1141 he succeeded Gilbert de la Porrée as chancellor at Chartres. He attended the trial of Gilbert in Reims in 1148, where Gilbert was accused of a heretical position on the Trinity, and in the following year he attended the Diet of Frankfurt. Little is known of the remainder of his life, except that he probably spent his last years in a Cistercian monastery. His humanist emphasis is illustrated in his Heptateuchon, a manual of the seven liberal arts which provides an excellent description of the available knowledge in the period. He differed from his brother and Gilbert in his emphasis on scientific knowledge, and he was one of the first to promote Arabic science in the West. He wrote a commentary on creation, De Sex Dierum Operibus, which reveals his scientific interests and the influence of Platonic philosophy. In addition he wrote a commentary on Boethius's De Trinitate and Cicero's De Inventione.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

THIRTEEN ARTICLES (1538). A Latin manuscript entitled A Book containing Divers Articles de Unitate Dei et Trinitate Personarum, de Peccato Originali, etc. discovered among papers belonging to Archbishop Cranmer.* Possibly connected with discussions between conservative Lutheran divines invited to England in 1538 by Henry VIII* and an English committee of three bishops and four doctors, it may have been the basis of negotiation, or perhaps a record of doctrines actually agreed. The articles are closely akin to the Augsburg Confession.*

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. A doctrinal statement of the sixteenth century arising out of the controversies of the period, and defining the position of the Church of England* in relation to them. The Articles were not intended to be creedal, or a complete theological system. Their origin can be traced to the Ten Articles* of 1536, a compromise statement designed to establish Christian "quietness and unity" at a time of revolution, when the separation between church and state was just beginning. These Articles were followed in 1537 by the Bishops' Book (revised in 1543 as the King's Book), which expounded certain tenets of Christian doctrine, and dealt with the relationship between the Church of England and Rome. In 1539, when Thomas Cranmer's* influence was declining, the Six Articles* were brought in by Henry VIII* to check the growth of Reformed theology and practice. The year 1553 saw the publication under Edward VI* of the Forty-two Articles,* which were intended to avoid controversy and establish unity "in certain matters of religion"; they were largely the work of Cranmer and Nicholas Ridley.

The history of the Articles was interrupted by the reign of Mary Tudor* and began again under Elizabeth I.* Matthew Parker,* now archbishop of Canterbury, drew up as an interim measure his own profession of faith in the Eleven Articles of 1561. In 1563 Convocation* revised the Forty-Two Articles into thirty-nine—although Elizabeth struck out Article 29 (dealing with the "wicked, who do not eat the body of Christ") to placate the Romanists, and added an opening clause to Article 20, asserting the authority of the church to decree rites and ceremonies. The Convocation of 1571 restored Article 29, to give us the Thirty-Nine Articles as we now have them. Despite subsequent Prayer Book revision, the Articles have remained unchanged ever since.

The main reasons for enforcing the Articles at that time are set out by Matthew Parker in a letter to the queen dated 24 December 1566: (1) they are concerned with the advancement of true religion; (2) they are agreeable to God's Word; (3) they condemn doctrinal errors; (4) they establish unity. The Articles chiefly cover the Catholic and Reformed doctrines of Scripture, the triune God, salvation, and the church's sacraments and ministry. They should not be regarded as a compromise statement midway between Rome and Geneva, but as an answer to Roman and Anabaptist* extremities.

Assuming that the Thirty-Nine Articles have an interest which is more than historical, their positive function now, as well as in the past, may be conceived as fivefold: (1) to preserve the dogmatic order of the Anglican Church and Communion; (2) to exercise a purifying influence on liturgical and canonical action: (3) to test new teaching; (4) to provide a framework for continuing debate; (5) to maintain the challenge of a biblical and apostolic norm (G.W. Bromiley).

Clerical subscription to the Articles has been required since 1865. In the Report of the Archbishop's Commission (1968), the revision of the Articles, subscription to them and the formula of assent were discussed with an eye to Christian unity; but few positive proposals were made (see esp. pp. 38-45).

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

THIRTY YEARS' WAR (1618-48). This highly complex conflict in central Europe was three struggles telescoped into one—Protestants vs. Catholics in Germany, a civil war in the Holy Roman Empire between the emperor and estates, and an international contest between France and the Hapsburgs (Austrian and Spanish) for European hegemony in which other powers were implicated. Historians commonly divide the war into four periods:

(1) Bohemian, 1618-23. Hostilities began with the Bohemian revolt against the Hapsburgs (Defenestration of Prague, 1618). The Czechs deposed Emperor Ferdinand II* (1619-37) as king, replacing him with the Calvinist head of the Protestant Union, Frederick V, Elector Palatine. The Catholic League leader, Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, supplied the emperor with an army commanded by Count Tilly which crushed the rebellion in 1620 (Battle of White Mountain). In Bohemia a ruthless policy of reconversion, expulsion, and confiscation of Protestant property ensued. In 1521 Ferdinand gave Frederick's electoral title to Maximilian, Tilly overran the Palatinate, and Spain and Bavaria partitioned it.

(2) Danish, 1625-29. The controversial Albrecht von Wallenstein raised an imperial army for Ferdinand, while King Christian IV of Denmark entered the war with English subsidies. Wallenstein and Tilly subjugated N Germany in 1626-28, and Ferdinand concluded the Peace of Lübeck with Christian in 1629. He also issued an Edict of Restitution which ordered the restoration of church lands secularized since 1552.

(3) Swedish, 1630-35. Because of Catholic opposition to his vague nationalistic schemes, Wallenstein was dismissed soon after Swedish king Gustavus Adolphus* landed in Germany. Traditionally viewed as the Protestant savior of Germany, he has more recently come to represent the intervention of foreigners that caused the war to degenerate into a quest for power. The Protestant forces defeated the imperial army at Breitenfeld (1631), plundered Bavaria, and captured Prague. At Tilly's death in early 1632, Ferdinand recalled Wallenstein. Gustavus was killed at Lützen (November 1632), while Wallenstein was dismissed for privately negotiating with the enemy and was assassinated in 1634. At the Peace of Prague in 1635 a compromise was reached over the Edict of Restitution.

(4) French, 1635-48. Further devastation resulted as France, the ally of Sweden and the German Protestants, battled Austria, Spain, and Bavaria. After years of negotiation the Peace of Westphalia* was concluded at Münster and Osnabrück on 24 October 1648. The Franco-Spain and Baltic struggles continued outside Germany for another decade.

The peace marked the end of both the medieval papacy's political influence (Innocent X's* objections were ignored) and the medieval empire's significance. The recognition of Calvinism and designation of 1624 as the cut-off date for possession of ecclesiastical lands settled the German religious dispute. Princes could, if they wished, permit both faiths to exist in their territories. The Count Palatine was restored as the eighth elector. The independence of Holland and Switzerland was confirmed and autonomy granted to the 300 German entities.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

THOLUCK, FRIEDRICH AUGUST GOTTREU (1799-1877). German Protestant theologian. Concentrating on the study of oriental languages at the universities of Breslau and Berlin, he was converted to Christ under Pietist influences and turned to the study of theology. After a brief period of teaching at Berlin, he was professor of theology at Halle for forty-nine years (from 1826), where he exerted a powerful influence on students and on the churches. A steadfast opponent of rationalism in biblical and theological studies, his important works include Die Lehre von die Sünde und dem Versöhner (1823), commentaries on Romans (1824), John (1827), the Sermon on the Mount (1833), Hebrews (1836), and the Psalms (1865), as well as a history of rationalism (1865). Through his connection with the revival movement and in his pastoral ministry among the students he did much to further the cause of believing scholarship in his day. W. WARD GASQUE

THOMAS. Apostle. The name apparently comes from an Aramaic word meaning "twin," but it is not certain whose twin he was. In the lists of the twelve, which are arranged in three groups of four, his name occurs in the second group, suggesting neither eminence nor obscurity (Matt. 10:2-4; Mark 3:16-19; Luke 6:14-16; Acts 1:13). He is most prominent in John's gospel and the Greek version "Didymus" is used three times (11:16; 20:24; 21:2). We find him here associated particularly with the death and resurrection of Jesus. He is prepared to go with Jesus to the tomb of Lazarus (John 11:16) even if it means death. He confesses himself to be ignorant of the meaning of Jesus when He talks about His departure (John 14:5), and he is unwilling to accept the account given him by the other disciples of the risen Jesus whose appearance he missed seeing (John 20:24f.). The climax of the fourth gospel comes when "Doubting Thomas" is given the evidence for which he asked, and in return ejaculates the supreme confession of faith, "My Lord and my God!" The last great beatitude is then pronounced on those who have not seen and yet believe. Thomas is named also in John 21:2. He was almost certainly active in missionary work in the East, possibly in Parthia (Eusebius), Persia (Jerome), or India (as the Mar Thoma Church believes). R.E. NIXON

THOMAS, ACTS OF. An aprocryphal account of the Apostle Thomas,* depicted as Christ's twin and recipient of His secret words. Thirteen wonderful deeds of the apostle are told, concluding with his martyrdom. Throughout the work, both in the symbolism of the stories and in explicit teaching, a Gnostic element of teaching is found, based on the myth of the soul sought by the Savior to be freed from this world and bodily bondage, and counselling asceticism. This aspect of the book is most strikingly seen in the two famous hymns, the Marriage Song, praising the "daughter of light" (probably heavenly wisdom), and the Song of the Pearl, or Hymn of the Soul, which depicts in terms of legendary adventure the Savior's quest for the soul. The teaching has close links with early Syriac Christianity, e.g., Bardaisan, and the book was taken over by the Manichaeans and bears some marks of their editing. It retained its appeal in orthodox circles, however, and in its Syriac version has undergone some accommodation to Catholic teaching. Its main transmission is in a Greek form, although it was composed in Syriac. A Syriac version is known, with Latin, Ethiopic, and Armenian. Among the Manichaeans,* it circulated in a five-book corpus with the Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, and Paul.

J.N. BIRDSALL

THOMAS, APOCALYPSE OF. In the so-called Decretum Gelasianum,* a sixth-century list of books declared to be canonical and noncanonical, an item appears in the Apocryphal Books section entitled "Revelation which is ascribed to Thomas." Another attestation of this document is found in the Chronicle of Jerome of the Codex Philippsianus No. 1829 in Berlin, in which the circumstances of the giving of this revelation to Thomas are described. Evidence shows that the book is fifth-century and tainted with a Manichaean flavor. It exists in two recensions, a longer and a shorter (ET of both versions is given in M.R. James, The Apocryphal New Testament, 1924); and there are critical comments on the two versions in New Testament Apocrypha II (ET ed. R. McL. Wilson, 1965, pp. 798ff.). The book based on the canonical Revelation describes the scenes presaging the events of the end-time, and does so according to a schema of seven days.

RALPH P. MARTIN

THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. An apocryphal work discovered in the Nag Hammadi* Coptic Gnostic library, in Codex II written c.350. Three third-century Oxyrhynchus* papyri (nos. 1, 654, 655) contain fragments of a Greek version, compiled c.140, of which the Coptic is a more gnosticized translation. It consists of some 120 "secret words" of "the living Jesus," many very close to synoptic parallels, others more obviously syncretistic, arranged according to no discernible pattern, except when connected by link-words. Its form (Gattung) is nearer the collection of (proverbial and parabolic) "words of the Wise" (cf. "Q" and The Sentences of Sextus, identified in fragments of Codex XII from Nag Hammadi) than the typically Gnostic post-resurrection "revelation." Though used by Naassenes* and Manichaeans,* it more plausibly reflects the encratism (return to unisex paradise, life of ascetic exile on earth) of early Christian Syria, its likely provenance, than Gnosticism proper. Its versions of (synoptic) sayings of Jesus preserve traces of a tradition more primitive than and independent of the canonical gospels, attested in other Jewish-Christian and Syriac sources (so especially G. Quispel in many studies). It may contain one or two authentic noncanonical (Agrapha) sayings of Jesus. It is not to be confused with the Infancy Gospel of Thomas.

THOMAS, NORMAN MATTOON (1884-1968). Presbyterian clergyman and frequent presidential candidate. Born in Marion, Ohio, he studied at Princeton University and Union Theological Seminary. After ordination in 1911 he became pastor of East Harlem Church, and chairman of an American parish settlement house in New York City (1911-18). He then was secretary of the pacifist Fellowship of Reconciliation* and until 1921 edited its magazine, The World Tomorrow, which he had founded. He was co-director of the League for Industrial Democracy (1922-37). He demitted the ministry in 1931. Gradually assuming leadership of the Socialist Party, he ran unsuccessfully for several political offices, including the U.S. presidency (six times). He helped to forge his party's policies, giving "critical support" to the war effort in World War II and opposing Communism, Fascism, and social injustice. In later years he turned to the problem of international peace. He helped found the American Civil Liberties Union. Later writings include A Socialist's Faith (1951); The Test of Freedom (1954); The Prerequisites for Peace (1959); and Socialism Re-examined (1963).

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

THOMAS, OWEN (1812-91). Welsh Calvinistic Methodist minister and author. He was born at Holyhead, son of a stone-mason, and followed his father's craft when the family moved to Bangor in 1827. He entered Bala College in 1838 as a candidate for the Calvinistic Methodist* ministry and completed his studies at the University of Edinburgh. He was ordained in 1844. After serving several pastorates he moved in 1865 to Liverpool and spent the remainder of his ministry there. He received every honor that his church could bestow and was twice moderator of its general assembly (1868, 1888).

He was an outstanding figure in the life of the Welsh evangelical churches in the Victorian Age. His powerful preaching was characterized by seriousness and intensity. He was a learned theologian and possessed an exceptionally fine private library that showed the breadth of his interests in divinity and history. He was a firm defender of Calvinism in the moderate form that derived from the thinking of Dr. Edward Williams.

His literary output was extensive. Apart from a constant flow of articles in various journals and in the monumental Welsh encyclopedia known as Y Gwyddoniadur, he translated Thomas Watson's work on sanctification and Kitto's NT commentary. But his finest work was in the writing of the biographies. His biography of Henry Rees (1798-1869) is a late work, published in two volumes in 1890, and although accurate and imposing, it lacks the vigor of his earlier work. His greatest achievement was the huge biography of John Jones, Tal-sarn (1796-1857), published in 1874. Although John Jones was a preacher of quite exceptional influence, the book is more than his biography—it is the biography of Welsh evangelicalism in the first half of the nineteenth century. Its analysis of the development of theology in Wales during that age, and its description of Welsh preaching and its exponents, make it a basic document for the study of nineteenth-century Wales.

THOMAS, WILLIAM HENRY GRIFFITH (1861-1924). Anglican scholar and teacher. Born in Shropshire, he was educated at King's College, London; read theology at Christ Church, Oxford; and was ordained in 1886. After curacies and a ministry at St. Paul's Portman Square, London (1896-1905), he became principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford (1905-10). Removing to Canada, he was professor of OT at Wycliffe College, Toronto, from 1910, and active in Canadian Anglicanism. A dispensationalist, he was a founder of Dallas Theological Seminary and would have lectured there but for his death. He contributed weekly to The Sunday School Times and to the Toronto Globe and was the author of numerous books. A supporter of the Keswick Movement, he assisted the Victorious Life Testimony in America.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

THOMAS À KEMPIS (c.1380-1471). German mystic. Born in Kempen near Köln, his original name was "Hemerken" or "Hammerlein." He was educated in the school at Deventer run by the Brethren of the Common Life.* Later he entered the Augustinian Convent of Mt. Saint Agnes near Zwolle, which was a daughter house of Windesheim and of which his brother was prior. Thomas was ordained priest in 1413, became subprior in 1429, and spent his whole life in this house. He worked as a copyist and is said to have copied the whole Bible at least four times. As a director of the spiritual life he was much in demand; his methods and approach followed those of Gerard Groote* and Florentius Radewijns.* All his writings—letters, poems, homilies, etc.—are of a devotional nature, but his great fame rests primarily on De imitatione Christi et contemptu omnium vanitatum mundi (usually called in English The Imitation of Christ). This is a manual of devotion to help the soul achieve communion with God. What has made it acceptable to others than Roman Catholics is its supreme stress on Christ and fellowship with Him. It has gone through over 2,000 editions and printings. There is some doubt, however, that it was Thomas who wrote this book. From Bellarmine* in the seventeenth century until the present day, there have been those who denied his authorship.

For the complete works of Thomas, see the critical edition by M.J. Pohl (7 vols., 1902-22).

THOMAS AQUINAS, see AQUINAS, THOMAS

THOMAS OF CELANO (c.1190-1260). Best known for his two biographies of Francis of Assisi,* he was founder of the Order of Friars Minor. Thomas joined the order c.1215 and was later sent to Germany. In 1228 the order's protector, Gregory IX,* appointed Thomas as the saint's biographer. The Vita Prima of 1229 remains the best single source for the life of Francis. At the 1244 general chapter, the then minister-general, Crescentius, asked all who knew stories about Francis to send them to Assisi. Thomas decided to incorporate these reminiscences of the saint's companions into a new life of Francis—the Vita Secunda (c.1246). In 1266 the order's general chapter directed that all previous lives of Francis be destroyed and that a recent biography by Bonaventure—the Legenda Maior—should become the official life. Fortunately copies of Thomas's two biographies escaped the destruction. He also wrote the Tractatus de miraculis de Sancti Francisci and the Legend of St. Clare.

PETER TOON

THOMAS OF JESUS (à Jesu) (1564-1627). Carmelite* leader and writer. Born in Spain, he took doctorates in law and theology at Salamanca. Entering the Discalced Carmelite novitiate at Granada because of the influence of Teresa of Avila's* autobiography (1585), he made his profession at Valladolid (1587) and became professor and vice rector of the College of Alcalá. He instituted an eremitical life in the order by establishing "deserts" at Bolarque (1593) and Las Batuecas (1599), was provincial of Castile (1597-1600), vicar, then prior, of Las Batuecas (1606), and prior of Zaragoza (1607). Called to Rome by Paul V in 1607, he met opposition there and left to found communities in Brussels (1610), Louvain (1611), Douai (1612), Cologne (1613), Lille (1616), and Marleine (1619), finally seeing the erection of the Belgian and German provinces. He wrote on mystical theology (De Contemplatione Divina, 1620; Divinae Orationis Methodus, 1623) and missions (Stimulus Missionum, 1610; De Procuranda Salute omnium gentium, 1613).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

THOMAS OF MARGA (ninth century). Nestorian* historian. In 832 he entered the Nestorian monastery of Beth-'Abhe, east of Mosul in Syria. After serving as chaplain and secretary to the Patriarch Abraham from 837 to 850, he was consecrated bishop of Marga. He is best known as the writer of the Liber Superiorum (Book of Governors) which is a history of his monastery and an important source for the early history of the Nestorian Church. The Syriac text of this with an English translation was published in London by E.A.W. Budge in 1893.

THOMISM. The term covers both the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas* and their development in the Roman Catholic Church.

THOMPSON, FRANCIS (1859-1907). English poet. Born at Preston and educated at Ushaw for the Roman Catholic priesthood, he was never ordained but chose instead to study medicine at Owens College, Manchester; again, however, he did not complete the course. Moving to London, he became an opium addict and was rescued from a vagrant life by Wilfred Meynell, who with his wife cared for Thompson for the rest of his life. He wrote on Shelley and St. Ignatius; but his poems are more important than his prose. These appeared in Poems (1893), Sister Songs (1895), and New Poems (1897). Thompson is a poet of the nineties with all the overwrought emotion and colorful expression of that decade. He is now remembered almost solely for "The Hound of Heaven," which appeared in the 1893 volume. It has the hectic intensity of the pursued fugitive that one finds in the work of other opium-afflicted poets, and like Herbert's poem "Love" it concludes in tender acceptance of the pursuing God:

Ah, fondest, blindest, weakest,
I am He Whom thou seekest!
Thou dravest love from thee, who dravest Me.

See Poems (1937); and J.C. Reid, Francis Thompson (1959). ARTHUR POLLARD

THOMSON, WILLIAM (Lord Kelvin) (1824-1907). Physicist. Second son of a mathematician and author of textbooks, he was educated at home and at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and in 1846 was appointed professor of natural philosophy at Glasgow, holding the chair for fifty-three years and becoming the doyen of science. He made numerous discoveries: he was co-founder with J.P. Joule and others of the science of thermodynamics; he was the originator of the absolute (Kelvin) scale of temperature; founder of geophysics; inventor of numerous electrical instruments; pioneer of the first Atlantic cable (1858) and of electrical power transmission. In early life he was inspired by Faraday; his early researches originated in the desire to discover when God had created the world.

Thomson's character was exemplary: he was modest, never claimed priority in discovery, took special delight in praising the work of others, even the most junior, and treated assistants and students with the same deference as fellow professors. His niece, A.G. King, says she loved going to church with him ("there was something in his humble and quiet reverence which seemed to strengthen one's faith and bring one directly into the presence of God"). She tells also of his deep interest in and knowledge of the Bible. From about 1860 he was often involved in courteous controversy with geologists and materialistic evolutionists on topics relevant to the Christian faith.

See S.P. Thomson, Life of Lord Kelvin, (1910); and A.G. King, Kelvin the Man, (1924). R.E.D. CLARK

THORN, CONFERENCE OF. Colloquy held in 1645, at Thorn in West Prussia, then under Polish protection, called by Wladislaw (Ladislaus) IV of Poland, who ruled over a religiously divided kingdom. The delegates included Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed representatives. The controversial Lutheran ecumenicist Georg Calixt (Calixtus*) was present, as well as the irenic Moravian J.A. Comenius.* Hampered by Jesuit opposition and Lutheran internal quarreling, the conference resulted in little ecumenical progress. Perhaps surprisingly, the Lutheran and Calvinist delegates were able to agree that the (Polish) Consensus of Sandomir (1570), which combined Calvinist, Lutheran, and Moravian ideas, as well as the German "Saxon Confession"* (Revised Augsburg Confession) of 1551, agreed on scriptural essentials. The Calvinist "Declaration of Thorn" was composed at the conference and was adopted as a creedal standard by the Calvinist churches of Brandenburg. It is noteworthy for its explicit stress on continuity with the ancient church. DIRK JELLEMA

THORNWELL, JAMES HENLEY (1812-1862). Presbyterian minister and scholar. Born in South Carolina and educated at South Carolina College, he engaged in pastoral work for a few years before becoming professor at that college which was later the University of South Carolina. He became president in 1851, but four years later moved to Columbia Theological Seminary as professor of systematic theology. He founded the Southern Presbyterian Review in 1847 and was moderator of his church's general assembly that same year. He helped to establish the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States during the Civil War.

THORVALDSEN, A.B. (1770-1844). Danish sculptor. Living and working in Rome from 1797 to 1838, he was more attracted in his classicism by the deities of Greek mythology than by biblical figures. Nevertheless his most famous works are the biblical sculptures he made on request for the decoration of the cathedral of Copenhagen: the Christ figure, the twelve apostles, the kneeling angel with the font of baptism in his hands, and, on the frontal frieze of the cathedral, a more complex composition that represents John the Baptist preaching.

THREE CHAPTERS CONTROVERSY. The three chapters were three "subjects" condemned by Emperor Justinian* in an edict of 543/4. His purpose was to conciliate the powerful Monophysite* group and retain their allegiance to church and crown. The three chapters were (1) the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia*; (2) the writings of Theodoret* of Cyrrhus against Cyril* of Alexandria and in defense of Nestorius; (3) the letter of Ibas* of Edessa to the Persian, Bishop Mari of Hardascir.

Although this edict did in fact undermine the authority and teaching of the Council of Chalcedon* (which had declared Theodoret and Ibas to be orthodox), the Eastern patriarchs accepted it without opposition. Pope Vigilius* rejected it at first, but after a visit to the emperor in Constantinople he endorsed it and made this public in his Judicatum of April 548, addressed to the patriarch of Constantinople. In the West, however, there was much opposition to the edict, and it found a leader in Bishop Facundus* of Hermiane.

When the Fifth Ecumenical Council met in May 553 at Constantinople, it decided in favor of the condemnation of the Chapters and against the efforts of Western bishops to have the condemnation withdrawn. A little later, Vigilius declared his submission to the decision of the council, but parts of the Western Church refused to follow the pope. The churches of N Italy, led by the clergy of Aquileia and Milan, broke off communion with Rome and caused a schism which lasted for half a century. PETER TOON

THYATIRA. A city in W Asia Minor, in the Hermus valley, a tributary of the Caicus. Situated on a fertile plain at about 330 feet, it had no significance as a stronghold, but its position on the imperial post road linking Italy-Greece-Asia Minor with Egypt, gave it commercial importance. Lydian in origin, Thyatira was refounded by Seleucus Nicator as an outpost against Macedonia, and then a Pergamene outpost. When the Pergamene kingdom became the Roman province of Asia in 133 B.C., it passed into control of Rome. It is probable there was a Jewish colony there (Acts 16:14), but it is not clear when Christianity reached Thyatira. One possibility is that Paul or one of his helpers ministered there from Ephesus (Acts 19:10). What is certain is that by about A.D. 95, when John addressed the church there, it was quite a strong church (Rev. 2:18-29). But little is known of Thyatira, and no archaeological excavations have been carried out. The ancient site is now occupied by the modern town of Akhisar (population about 30,000). JAMES M. HOUSTON

TIELE, CORNELIUS PETRUS (1830-1902). Dutch theologian. Born at Leyden, and educated in Amsterdam and at the seminary of the Remonstrant Brotherhood, he was pastor at Moordrecht and Rotterdam, and then professor at the Remonstrant seminary. He became professor of religious history, a chair specially founded for him, at Leyden University (1877-1901). During his professorship he exercised a great influence on the development of the study of comparative religion, especially in the Netherlands. He wrote many books, the best known being Geschiedens van den Godsdienst tot aan der Heerschappij der Wereldgodsdiensten (1876; ET Outlines of the History of Religion, 1877). He also gave the Gifford Lectures entitled The Elements of the Science of Religion (1897-99). These works came out of a vast knowledge of ancient languages and history and were widely useful because of their lucid and orderly arrangement. J.G.G. NORMAN

TIILILÄ, OSMO ANTERO (1904-1972). Finnish theologian. Ordained a Lutheran minister in 1926, he renounced the ministry in 1960 and later withdrew from membership in the Lutheran Church of Finland. This was done as a protest against the influence of liberal theology within the church without any disciplinary action taken against those who brought in the new teachings. Tiililä also wanted to point out that the social activities and duties of the church were stressed too much at the expense of the preaching of the Gospel. Member of the executive committee of the Lutheran World Federation and of its theological commission, and member of the Academy of Sciences in Finland, he also had a large literary output, including Das Strafleiden Christi (1941) and "A Hundred Years of Systematic Theology in Finland," in Theologia Fennica IV (1949). He edited the Finnish theological journal Teologia ja kirkko. STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

TIKHON (Vasili Belavin) (1866-1925). Patriarch of Moscow. Born near Pskov, he trained for the priesthood in St. Petersburg and subsequently became bishop of Lublin before going to North America, where he held various posts (1899-1907) and was finally archbishop. He returned to Russia,* and after holding two more posts became in 1917 metropolitan of Moscow, then patriarch (the first holder of that post since 1700). When the Bolsheviks commandeered church land, withdrew church subsidies, decreed civil marriage only, and took over schools, Tikhon pronounced the anathema on the country's new rulers and their supporters. Four days later, church and state were officially separated, giving the signal for priests and congregations to be attacked.

During the famine in 1922 the government declared confiscation of all church treasures to relieve the hungry, though Tikhon had already called for all unconsecrated objects of value to be disposed of for this purpose. Priests who resisted the plundering were murdered or jailed. Tikhon himself was taken into custody, and released only because of the pressure of international opinion in 1923. During his imprisonment he concluded from Romans 13 that since the Soviet government was now the divinely sanctioned government, the church owed it secular obedience—an exegesis approved even by the Communists. His viewpoint was not shared by a section of his clergy, and his last years saw a division and the increased difficulty of a so-called Living Church Movement with more than a dash of socialism about it which the conservative Tikhon resisted.

TILAK, NARAYAN VAMAN (c.1862-1919). Marathi hymnwriter and poet. Born in Ratnagiri district of Maharashtra, he was a high-caste Chitpawan Brahman, but his father had forecast from a horoscope that the child would one day forsake Hinduism. Even before the break, his poetic gift and ardent religious spirit made him almost a youthful sadhu. On a train journey a foreigner gave him a NT, and thus began the road to Christianity (he had already been questioning Hindu orthodoxy). He was baptized at Byculla, Bombay, in 1895. Tilak found congenial scope for his gifts, and wise guidance, in the American Marathi Mission, and after ordination in 1904 worked as a preacher at Ahmadnagar. Writing was his great ministry: his hundreds of bhajans gave the Marathi Church a worthy Indian medium of praise in place of translated hymns in Western meter (though Tilak provided also worthy translations of his own). His greatest work was to be a life of Christ in verse, the Christayan, but only the first part had been completed by his death. In 1917 he left mission service in order to form a brotherhood of "the baptized and unbaptized disciples of Christ," with an ashram at Satara.

ROBERT J. MC MAHON

TILLEMONT, LOUIS SÉBASTIEN LE NAIN DE (1637-1698). Roman Catholic historian. Born in Paris and educated at Port-Royal under Pierre Nicole, he entered the seminary of Beauvais (1661), was ordained (1676), and collaborated with G. Hermant on the lives of SS. Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus and Ambrose, and with others in Paris on editions of patristic texts: Origen, Tertullian, Augustine. Returning to Port-Royal (1667), he was forced out by the persecution in 1679 and he retired to Tillemont, where he worked privately, as well as catechized children and helped the poor. He never accepted ecclesiastical office and even permitted his own work to be published under others' names. A member of the Jansenist sect, he took no part in the controversy. Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (16 vols., 1693-1712) established his reputation with its immense learning. Edward Gibbon spoke of its "inimitable exactitude" which led him through the rocky roads of Roman history with the surefootedness "of an Alpine mule." Histoire des empereurs (6 vols., 1690-1738) was intended as part of the Mémoires, but censorship demanded separate publication. He wrote a life of St. Louis which was published much later (6 vols., 1847-51).

TILLICH, PAUL (1886-1965). Protestant theologian and philosopher. Born in Starzeddel, Germany, son of a Lutheran pastor, Tillich received schooling in the universities of Berlin, Tübingen, Halle, and Breslau. From the last he received his Ph.D. for a dissertation on Schelling.* After four years as chaplain in the army during World War I, he taught successively at Berlin, Marburg, Dresden, and Leipzig. In 1929, while professor of philosophy at the university of Frankfurt, he became involved in the Religious-Socialist movement. His opposition to Hitler and National Socialism led to his dismissal from the university in 1933; almost immediately he came to the USA, where he taught at Union Theological Seminary and Columbia University (1933-55), Harvard (1955-62), and the University of Chicago (1962-65).

The sources and philosophical foundations of Tillich's philosophical theology can be traced back to Platonism, medieval mysticism (Jakob Boehme), German Idealism (Schelling), and existentialism (Kierkegaard and Heidegger). His theological methodology, the "Method of Correlation," argues for a complementary role and relationship between philosophy and theology: philosophy poses the problems (questions) of ontology (the metaphysical structures of being or reality) with regard to the human situation, while theology provides the answers to these questions. In his three-volume Systematic Theology (1951-63) God is understood as the "Ground of Being" whom man knows as "ultimate concern." Existentially man derives his own being by "participation" in the "Ground of Being." "Ultimate concern" means the courage to affirm oneself ultimately in the face of non-being. The question of human existence also points to the issue of Christology, since Jesus Christ is the "New Being." In the sacrifice of Jesus upon the cross, He became "transparent" to the "Ground of Being" —i.e., the "New Being" or "The Christ." In the area of epistemology, Tillich has been one of the leading advocates of symbols or myths as signs that participate in the reality to which they point. Myth or symbol is therefore man's only way of grasping cognitively the meaning and structure of reality—God, who is the "Ground of Being."

The most serious charges against Tillich's theology are his dependence upon idealism which strongly implies pantheism and an impersonal deity, and his failure to grasp the sola scriptura principle of the Protestant tradition in which he stood. Other major works of his include The Interpretation of History (1936), The Protestant Era (1936), The Courage to Be (1952), Love, Power and Justice (1954), Dynamics of Faith (1957), and Theology of Culture (1959).

TILLOTSON, JOHN (1630-1694). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1691. He was born near Halifax, son of a Presbyterian, and educated at Cambridge. He accepted the Act of Uniformity* in 1661 and became an Anglican, thereafter securing speedy preferment to the deanery of Canterbury in 1672. He tried hard in troublous times to bring the Dissenters within a comprehensive Church of England. Tillotson was probably the most influential preacher in the history of the English sermon. He had as many imitators in the eighteenth century as Milton had among its poets. Yet his style was "plain and unaffected," to use his own phrase. He sought no heights, but both in language and structure his work is unsurpassed in its lucidity. As Bishop Burnet said in the funeral sermon, no man "knew better the art of preserving the majesty of things under a simplicity of words."

TIMOTHY. A native of Lystra, son of a Greek and a Jewess (Acts 16:1; 2 Tim. 1:5), he was probably converted on Paul's first missionary journey and became the companion of Paul and Silas on the second. To avoid difficulties with the Jews, Paul had him circumcised (Acts 16:3). He was first sent to Thessalonica to encourage the church there (1 Thess. 3:2) and then to Macedonia and Corinth (1 Cor. 4:17). He went to Jerusalem with Paul, taking the collection (Acts 20:4f.), and was associated with Paul at the time of writing of the Philippian and Colossian epistles. Two of the Pastoral epistles are addressed to him, and he is shown there to have become Paul's representative at Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3). At some stage he was imprisoned (Heb. 13:23). The general picture of his character, seen chiefly from the Corinthian letters and the Pastorals, is of an affectionate and loyal companion of Paul who lacked forcefulness of character and was self-conscious about his youthfulness. His role in his latter years, like that of Titus,* was that of "apostolic delegate." R.E. NIXON

TIMOTHY I (728-823). Patriarch of the East from 780. After study at Bashosh, he was appointed bishop of Bait Baghash near Arbil before 769 through the influence of his uncle. He obtained election as patriarch in 780 by unworthy methods, but was not accepted until 782. Despite this unpromising start, he was one of the greatest of the patriarchs of the East. On good terms with contemporary Caliphs, especially al-Mahdi (775-785) and Harun-al-Rashid (786-809), he shifted the patriarchal center from Ctesiphon to Baghdad and built a palace there. A firm and able administrator, he created at least six new metropolitan provinces—Damascus, Armenia, Rai, Dailam, Turkestan (Kashghar), and Tibet (Tangut). Widely read in both Church Fathers and Greek philosophy, he translated Aristotle's Topics into Arabic and arranged for the transcription of three copies of Origen's Hexapla. His famous Dialogue with al-Mahdi is a classic which has been a model for much Christian apologetic among Muslims since. It was not, however, effective as evangelism, and under Timothy there seems to have been no evangelization of Muslims.

In other spheres, Timothy was an outstanding missionary statesman, choosing the right men for missionary work and handling them sympathetically and imaginatively. Outstanding missionaries were the Arab Christian Shubhal-ishu', who died a martyr before 895; his successors Yab-alaha the scribe and Qardagh the bookbinder; and Elijah of Moqan.* Their spheres of labor were the heathen on the shores of the Caspian, and the Turks and Tartars eastward on the silk-route to China. Timothy wrote 200 letters, of which 59 are extant. His style is pithy, and his letters give an interesting picture of the conditions of his time. His correspondence extended even to India.

TIMOTHY, PATRIARCH (d.517). Monophysite patriarch of Constantinople. Appointed by Emperor Anastasius I when the Chalcedonian patriarch Macedonius II was deposed (c.511-12), he was previously in charge of the cathedral ornaments of Constantinople. After some initial hesitation he became a leading exponent of Monophysitism.* In 512 he was involved in Severus's* attempt to introduce the Theopaschite* formula, "who was crucified for us," to the Trisagion, which provoked a riot. He formally condemned the Chalcedonian doctrine at a synod in 515, continuing to work with Severus, now bishop of Antioch. Theodore the Lector* ascribed to him the regular use of the Nicene Creed* in the liturgy of Constantinople; it had probably been introduced earlier at Antioch by Peter the Fuller.*

J.G.G. NORMAN

TIMOTHY AELURUS (d.477). Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria. His nickname ailouros, "weasel," was given by opponents because of his small stature. As presbyter he led the Alexandrian Monophysites. He became patriarch in 457 after Proterius had been lynched by the mob, but being unacceptable to the majority of bishops was banished by Leo I* in 460. In exile he wrote much to propagate Monophysitism.* He held that Christ is by nature God, not man; He became man only by oikonomia ("dispensation") thus His humanity is not His phusis ("nature"). However, he anathematized Eutyches* for holding that Christ's body was not of the same substance as other human bodies. Recalled by Basiliscus in 475, he died before another decree of banishment by Zeno could be carried out. Extant writings include three letters in a Syriac translation, and a collection of treatises and letters against the Council of Chalcedon* in Syriac and Armenian are attributed to him. He is venerated as a saint in the Coptic Church. J.G.G. NORMAN

TINDAL, MATTHEW (c.1656-1733). Deist writer. Son of a country clergyman, he was educated at Oxford and became a fellow of All Souls in 1678, a position he retained to the end of his life. He was subsequently a doctor of law. His High Church principles led him briefly to join the Roman Church under James II, but soon discerning "the absurdities of Popery," he returned to the Church of England. He began to advocate Erastian principles, first arousing a storm of opposition with The Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other Priests who claim an Independent Power over it (1706). The House of Commons had it burned by the common hangman in 1710. Christianity as old as the Creation (1730), hailed as "the Deists' Bible," was his mature and constructive attempt to show that true revealed religion is simply a republication of the religion of nature. It was answered by more than a hundred writers, but its translation into German extended Deistic influences to the Continent. J.W. CHARLEY

TINTORETTO, JACOPO (1518-1594). Italian painter. He worked in Venice most of his life. A sign supposedly hung on his studio wall read: "The drawing of Michelangelo, the color of Titian." This tells a great deal about Tintoretto's ambition and achievement. He reached success at the age of twenty-seven with his painting Miracle of Saint Mark. For the most part he was self-taught; Titian* threw him out of his studio after only a few weeks. Tintoretto's temperament was unusual. When the Scoula de San Rocco announced a competition for a painting of their patron saint, many famous painters were invited to compete. When the day came for the judging, the contestants arrived with their sketches—except for Tintoretto, who brought a huge finished painting. He excused himself by saying this was the way he worked.

Perhaps as a result, he became the club's official painter for nearly thirty years. In this place he attempted to marry the styles of Michelangelo* and Titian, but the result was wholly Tintoretto. His compositions exuded vitality with their dramatic lighting, brilliant color, and lithe bodies in unusual perspective. In his Last Supper, Tintoretto represents the moment when Jesus offered the bread and wine as the sacrificial body and blood of man's redemption. To illuminate the scene, Tintoretto bathed his canvas in a supernatural luminosity that emanates partly from the figure of Christ and partly from the flickering flames of the oil lamp, the smoke of which is formed into an angelic choir hovering around the head of Christ. He was perhaps the most skilled of the direct painters, painting onto the canvas without sketch or underpainting—a remarkable feat for any artist. ALVA STEFFLER

TISCHENDORF, LOBEGOTT FRIEDRICH KONSTANTIN VON (1815-1874). German Protestant theologian and textual critic. He studied at Leipzig, where he came under the influence of J.G.B. Winer,* the grammarian, who led him to combine a careful concern for Greek philology with a love for the sacred text. Though he was professor in the theological faculty at Leipzig for many years, he devoted himself to textual criticism and spent the greatest part of his time in the libraries of Europe and the Near East searching out unpublished ancient manuscripts. During his lifetime he published more manuscripts and critical editions of the Greek NT than any other scholar. His most famous discovery was the Codex Sinaiticus at St. Catherine's Monastery in Sinai, which he visited several times. Other important manuscripts which he edited include Codex Ephraemi rescriptus (1843-45), Codex Amiatinus (1850), and Codex Claromontanus (1852). His critical edition of the Greek Testament, the famous editio octava critica maior (2 vols., 1869-72), with its enormous critical apparatus, remains a basic reference tool for the NT scholar.

W. WARD GASQUE

TISSOT, JAMES JOSEPH JACQUES (1836-1902). French illustrator. Born at Nantes, he studied at the Academy of Fine Arts in Paris and fled to England when the Commune took over (1871). He gained a reputation as a portrait and genre painter, but finally became an illustrator (see his series of watercolors, La femme à Paris, and aquarelles on life in London). Returning to Paris, he experienced great attraction to Christ, arising from his work on La femme qui chante dans l'église, which took him regularly to church. This practice then inspired his Christ appears to console two Unfortunates in a Ruin, and OT illustrations later. After a year of study in Palestine, he spent ten years on several hundred aquarelles on gospel scenes. Vie de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ (1896). C.G. THORNE, JR.

TITIAN (1477-1576). Italian painter. This widely heralded artist was unique in his versatility. He painted vast altarpieces alive with ecstasy and Christian tenderness, lusty alcove pictures, battle scenes with hundreds of people, and many portraits. His virtuosity made him the most sought-after painter of his time. Always in robust health, he lived to the age of ninety-nine. He was a good husband and father, a faithful friend, and a man of dignity. Early in his life, Titian's father recognized the outstanding talent in his son and sent him to Venice to learn painting. After some study in design and color with a mosaic-maker, Titian went to the studio of Giovanni Bellini. While there, he was more greatly influenced by Bellini's student, Giorgione, whom Titian admired and followed as a friend. Titian became famous with a series of paintings he and Giorgione did for a German warehouse.

Titian's paintings sparkled with a wide range of hues. In painting flesh, his method produced unusually natural results, looking as if the flesh would bleed if touched with a knife. His coloring became the model for later notable Venetians such as Tintoretto, and for the Baroque masters Rubens* and Velasquez. After Raphael's* death, Titian was much in demand. His style developed into an energetic painterly technique. In some of his later group portraits, quick slashing strokes endow the whole canvas with the spontaneity of a first sketch. His uncanny grasp of human nature is also observed in this freer technique. In Christ Crowned with Thorns, a masterpiece of Titian's old age, the shapes emerging from the semi-darkness now consist wholly of light and color; the shimmery surfaces have lost every trace of material solidity and seem aglow from within. Consequently the violent physical action of the moment has been suspended. What lingers in the mind is not the drama of the event, but a mood of deep religious serenity. ALVA STEFFLER

TITUS. A Gentile, he became one of Paul's missionary companions. He is mentioned only in Galatians, 2 Corinthians, and the Pastoral epistles. It is unlikely that he is the same as Titius Justus in Acts 18:7; W.M. Ramsay made the guess that he might not have been named in Acts because he was Luke's brother. On Paul's second visit to Jerusalem he took Titus with him, and the fact that he did not have to be circumcised was an important point of principle in the acceptance of the Gentiles. In 2 Corinthians he is shown as Paul's emissary to deal with strained relationships between the apostle and the church at Corinth. He seems to have had a more robust character than Timothy* (2 Cor. 7:14f.), and he was sent back to Corinth to supervise the taking of the collection. The epistle to Titus shows that he was sent by Paul to Crete to supervise the work there (Titus 1:5f.). He had to rejoin Paul at Nicopolis (Titus 3:12) and it was perhaps from there that he was sent to Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10). His role in his latter years seems to have been a roving one as a sort of "apostolic delegate." R.E. NIXON

TOLAND, JOHN (1670-1722). Deistic writer. Born of Roman Catholic parents in Ireland, he became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. His studies took him to Glasgow and Edinburgh, then to Leyden where he concentrated on ecclesiastical history. In Christianity not Mysterious (1696), clearly indebted to Locke,* he claimed to endorse all the essentials of Christianity, but stressed the primacy of reason and the subordinate role of revelation in merely supplying supplementary information. After revelation there was no "mystery" left. Nothing in Scripture was out of harmony with reason or above it.

Condemnation by the Irish Parliament compelled him to flee the country. A Life of Milton (1698) was thought to question the authenticity of the gospels, but on further elucidation he claimed reference only to apocryphal writings, of which he showed a remarkable awareness. His political works included Anglia Libera (1701), supporting the Hanoverian succession, which led to several visits to the court in Germany. In Nazarenus (1718) he anticipated F.C. Baur* in distinguishing Jewish and Gentile branches of Christianity. Finally he produced Pantheisticon (1720), a parody of Anglican liturgy, indicating the goal of his religious development. A facile rather than profound writer, he possessed a flair for expressing the latent feelings of the moment. Though his indiscretions compelled him to become a hack author, he was a notable exponent of Deism.

TOLEDO, COUNCILS OF. Eighteen councils between 400 and 702 were held at Toledo in the Visigothic kingdom in Spain. Sometimes ten other councils held there from the eleventh to the sixteenth centuries are also included. The early councils were primarily assemblies of bishops called to deal with ecclesiastical affairs. The first (c.400) condemned Priscillianism,* and the second (527 or 531) dealt with the education of clerics and the obligation of celibacy. Considered one of the most important was the third council, summoned in 589 by King Recared* after his conversion from Arianism in 587. It recognized the orthodox creeds and established orthodox Christianity as the official state church in the Visigothic kingdom. After this the councils began to deal increasingly with political matters. The fifth (636) dealt with only one religious question, and the thirteenth (683) was both a political assembly and a church council concerned mostly with political matters. The canons of the councils are important sources for the study of the history of the Visigothic church, dealing with a variety of questions ranging from disciplinary decrees for the clergy through anti-Semitic legislation. The decrees for all but the last council have survived.

TOLERATION. The question of the toleration of Christianity by Roman authorities did not become serious so long as the early church was regarded merely as a movement within Judaism. Christians were accorded the same peculiar status which Rome had granted the Jews. The fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), however, soon made it evident that the Church was distinct from Judaism, and Christianity soon became a religio illicita. For the next 240 years the church was subject to a series of persecutions, the last of which took place under Diocletian.*

The failure of persecution as a policy, and the precarious position in which Constantine* found himself, brought a drastic change in policy, and in 313 the emperor issued the Edict of Toleration which went beyond that which had been issued in 311 by Galerius.* Christianity thereby became a religio licitor, and Christians were not only free to profess their faith, but were also freed from the legal disabilities imposed on them by previous emperors. Theodosius (I)* the Great went even further in the policy of toleration when he issued the Edict of 380, making Christianity the official religion of the empire.

With the coming of the Reformation, the problem of toleration entered a new phase in which Protestants now were seeking toleration from Roman Catholic regimes, and in some cases, such as England and Germany, free-church groups were seeking toleration from those Protestant churches which had become established as the state church. Such toleration was not achieved in Germany until the 1648 Peace of Westphalia,* when Calvinism gained a recognition which it had not received in the 1555 Peace of Augsburg.* In England, dissenters from the Anglican Church received a new status with the passage of the 1689 Act of Toleration* which, however, did not cover Roman Catholics and Unitarians. The latter were granted toleration under George III, and a similar act passed in 1828 granted emancipation to Roman Catholics if they would change their attitude to the temporal supremacy of the papacy.

In colonial America, religious toleration came gradually, beginning in such colonies as Pennsylvania and Rhode Island before 1776, and coming to Virginia immediately after the War of Independence. The First Amendment to the Constitution proved to be an effective foundation for complete religious toleration.

"Toleration" is generally construed as the right to worship, often distinct from "freedom of religion," in which all religions have an equal base of civic rights. True religious liberty exacts no penalty of dissenters from an established church.

TOLERATION ACT (1689). Passed by Parliament in England after the toppling of the Stuart dynasty, this provided a limited measure of relief to Nonconformists, apart from Unitarians. They were permitted to have their own places of worship (registration by the authorities was, however, mandatory), and to have their own pastors and teachers if such were willing to take certain oaths of loyalty and accept most of the established church's Thirty-Nine Articles.* The act did not remove social and political disabilities, and Nonconformists (like Roman Catholics) were still debarred from public office.

TOLKIEN, JOHN RONALD REUEL (1892-1973). English writer. Born in Bloemfontein, South Africa, where his father, who died in 1897, was a bank manager, Tolkien was sent to England for his education and graduated from Oxford in 1915. After service in World War I, he returned to Oxford as a professor of Anglo-Saxon and English literature. He has been a gifted and diversified writer of scholarly treatises, essays, novels, poems, and a play. The Hobbit (1937) and The Lord of the Rings (1954-55) are the works that have made Tolkien most widely known—the latter based on a series of myths of his own devising. A trilogy, the myths describe a cosmic war between good and evil in which the forces of evil are routed in a great struggle through courage and sacrifice. Peace and harmony are reestablished in the world order. Tolkien's work often reveals his enthusiasm for philology, legend, myth, and quests as a part of his fictional design. Like many medieval characters, Tolkien heroes are often engaged in perilous adventures that prove their moral strength. It is in this moral growth that there are often religious implications. Before he became a popular writer, Tolkien established his reputation as a serious scholar with critical studies of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (1925) and Beowulf: The Monsters and the Critics (1936). He retired from active teaching in 1959.

TOLSTOY, LEO (1828-1910). Russian novelist and social reformer. Born into a family of the ruling class, he knew comfort and social prestige in his youth on the family estate in Tula. After serving in the Crimean War, he returned home to write and study. In 1861 he freed his serfs. Tolstoy matured during the era when Russia was feeling the pressure for social reform. In the midst of his fame he experienced a mystical transformation and cast his lot with the peasants, adopting their dress and laboring in their trades. He rejected Russian orthodoxy and evolved his own form of faith, emphasizing as a central creed the nonresistance to evil. Disowning his title and his wealth, he turned over his property to his wife. In his later years he became embittered and left his home in company with his daughter. His best novels are War and Peace (1860), centered on the Napoleonic invasion of Russia; Anna Karenina (1877); Kreutzer Sonata (1890); Resurrection (1899); and an essay, What is Art (1899), which sets forth the conviction that good art is moral art. He stresses the conflict between reason and the natural desire to live without the restraints of social convention. He writes with a large comprehensiveness and is a master of analysis, characterization, and moral insights. PAUL M. BECHTEL

TOME OF LEO. A letter addressed by Leo I* to the Patriarch Flavian* of Constantinople in 449, containing a lucid and systematic exposition of the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation. The occasion of the Tome was chiefly the appeal made to Leo by Eutyches* after he had been deposed for Monophysitism* by Flavian. The Tome, which upheld Flavian's condemnation of Eutyches, was endorsed by the Council of Chalcedon* two years later.

TOME OF ST. DAMASUS (Fides Damasi). The collection of canons (Post Concilium Nicaenum) presented by Pope Damasus I* to bishops at a Roman synod which is variously dated between 369 and 382. It consists of a creed (a Latin rendering of Nicea, 325), to which are added twenty-four famous anathemas against heretics and schismatics, among them Sabellians, Eunomians, Macedonians, Melitius of Antioch, and Apollinarians. In the canons the Holy Spirit is said to be of one power and substance with the Father and the Son, and must be adored by all creatures, just as the Father and the Son. Damasus included the tome in his epistle Per Filium to Paulinus of Antioch. J.G.G. NORMAN

TOMLINSON, AMBROSE JESSUP (1865-1943). Church of God leader and revivalist. Born in a Quaker home near Westfield, Indiana, he was converted in 1892 and served as an American Bible Society colporteur in North Carolina. He joined the Pentecostal Church of God movement in Tennessee in 1896 and rapidly rose to leadership. He assumed the title of "general overseer" (1903-23) and established the headquarters of his Church of God at Cleveland, Tennessee (1908). He traveled widely and was especially successful in winning converts among poor Appalachian whites. His authoritarian rule, however, created friction, and factions had developed by 1917. After several secessions, his group took the name of "the Original Church of God." Two schisms after his death were headed by his sons, Homer A. and M.A. Tomlinson. Four large Tomlinson groups survive, and over forty religious groups can be traced to his movement.

TONSURE. The shaving of the hair at the top of the head of a priest or monk, by which he is distinguished from a layman. Traditionally the shaven area is said to represent the crown of thorns and to have been instituted by the apostles Paul and Peter. Probably the custom entered Christianity through the ascetics of the fourth and fifth centuries who perhaps adopted the custom from heathenism—e.g., the priest of Isis. In contemporary Roman Catholic practice the rite of entrance to the clerical life involves the cutting of five pieces of the candidate's hair, with full tonsure later (except in the USA, England, and some other countries); the tonsure, however, is much smaller than the earlier Roman or coronal tonsure which left only a fringe of hair around the head. Originally the Orthodox Church required the shaving of the whole head, but now it is usual for the hair to be cut short instead. The early British (Celtic) Church required a tonsure for which the hair was cut at the front and at the sides, leaving one half of the head with hair. PETER TOON

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE (1740-1778). Anglican hymnwriter. Educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Dublin, he was converted through a Methodist lay preacher, took Anglican orders in 1762, and later became vicar of Broadhembury, Devon. In 1775 he assumed the pastorate of the French Calvinist chapel in London. He was a powerful preacher and a vigorous Calvinist, bitterly opposed to John Wesley.* He wrote the Historic Proof of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England (2 vols., 1774) and The Church of England Vindicated from the Charge of Arminianism (1769). His fame rests, however, on his hymns, e.g., "A debtor to mercy alone"; "A sovereign Protector I have"; "From whence this fear and unbelief?"; and especially "Rock of Ages" (appended to an article calculating the "National Debt" in terms of sin).

TORGAU ARTICLES, THE (1576). Twelve in number, these were adopted by the Lutheran theologians of Germany as "opinions as to how the dissensions prevailing among the theologians of the Augsburg Confession may, according to the Word of God, be agreed upon and settled in a Christian manner." The Torgau Book was submitted to the Lutheran princes (about twenty-five); most of the theologians in their territories approved it. Because some of them objected to its length, James Andreae* prepared an Epitome. James Andreae, Martin Chemnitz, and Nicholas Selneccer met at Cloister Bergen in March 1577. They met there again in May 1577, when they were joined by Andreas Musculus, Christopher Carnerus, and David Chytraeus. Here they completed the revision of the Torgau Book, known also as the Belgic Book or the "Solid Declaration" or the "Formula of Concord."* The Torgau Articles or the Epitome were also approved. The twelve articles deal with: (1) Original Sin; (2) Free Will; (3) the Righteousness of Faith Before God; (4) Good Works; (5) the Law and the Gospel; (6) the Third Use of the Law; (7) the Lord's Supper; (8) the Person of Christ; (9) the Descent of Christ into Hell; (10) Church Rites; (11) God's Eternal Foreknowledge (Predestination) and Election; (12) Other Factions (Heresies) and Sects.

TORQUEMADA, JUAN DE (1388-1468). Spanish theologian and cardinal. One of the leading defenders of papal authority against the conciliar theorists, he entered the Dominican Order in 1403 and attended the Council of Constance* in 1417. Afterward he finished his studies in Paris and taught in Spain, where he became prior of the Dominican house at Valladolid and Toledo. He attended the Council of Basle from 1432 to 1437 where he defended papal rights in a series of treatises. When the council deposed Eugenius IV, he led the faction which reconvened the council at Ferrara and was a leading figure in the negotiations with the Greek Orthodox Church which led to a short-lived decree of unity signed in 1439. He also wrote additional treatises defending papal primacy, and engaged in public debate with a leading conciliarist. For his services he was granted the title "Defender of the Faith" and was made cardinal in 1439. His major work, Summa de Ecclesia (1448), was a defense of the church both against heretics and conciliarists. In the last years of his life he was further rewarded by being appointed bishop of Palestrina in 1455 and of Sabina in 1463. RUDOLPH HEINZE

TORQUEMADA, TOMÁS DE (1420-1498). Spanish Grand Inquisitor. Born in Valladolid, he was the nephew of the cardinal and Dominican theologian Juan de Torquemada.* After graduating from the San Pablo Dominican convent he became the prior of Santa Cruz convent in Segovia (1452) and confessor to King Ferdinand V and Queen Isabella I in 1474. After Pope Sixtus IV* was prodded by the queen into making the Inquisition* a national institution in Spain (1483), Torquemada was given the power to organize the tribunals, and he did so with such effectiveness that the inquisitorial apparatus he set in motion lasted for three centuries. The regulations for the Spanish Inquisition were set down in Torquemada's Ordinances (1484). The victims of his persecution included Moors, Jews, Marranos (Jewish converts), Moriscos (Islamic converts), and other religious deviants from the Catholic norm. Since the Spanish Inquisition was not answerable to the papal Inquisition, complaints to the pope of Torquemada's excesses were usually unfruitful. Torture was used to extract evidence and confessions from prisoners. Some 2,000 executions occurred and numerous other methods of punishment were inflicted during his reign as Grand Inquisitor. His ruthless efficiency in enforcing his own austere religious character on those of other persuasions has left him with a reputation of cruelty and intolerance even for the times in which he lived.

TORREY, C(HARLES) C(UTLER) (1863-1956). Linguist who specialized in OT Aramaic, Apocrypha, and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, the Aramaic background of the NT and (later) Islam. He taught at Andover Seminary (1892-1900) and Yale University as professor of Semitic languages (1900-1932; emeritus 1932-56). Torrey was the first director of the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem (1900-1901). His writings include The Translations Made from the Original Aramaic Gospels (1912); The Composition and Date of Acts (1916); The Four Gospels (1933; rev. ed., 1947); The Apocryphal Literature (1945); and Documents of the Primitive Church (1946). His critical reconstructions of various OT books and theories regarding alleged Aramaic originals of large portions of the NT have found little acceptance among scholars. W. WARD GASQUE

TORREY, R(EUBEN) A(RCHER) (1856-1928). American evangelist and Bible scholar. A graduate of Yale College and Seminary, he also studied in German universities. He was ordained to the Congregational ministry in 1878, and became superintendent of the Congregational City Missionary Society of Minneapolis. He had a long association with D.L. Moody* and was the first superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute (1889-1908). He went on several world preaching tours between 1902 and 1921, visiting Britain and other European countries, Australia and New Zealand, and Asia. From 1912 to 1924 he was dean of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles and pastor of the Church of the Open Door in the same city from 1915 to 1924. He wrote numerous devotional and theological books; the most important were What the Bible Teaches, How to Work for Christ, and The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit.

TOTAL DEPRAVITY. A position associated particularly with Calvin* and Calvinism,* although held by the Reformers generally, and associated with their return to Augustinian emphases. It concerns the definition of human nature. Medieval Scholasticism generally held that man was created with, and human nature consists of, both natural gifts (e.g., reason) and added or supranatural gifts (e.g., love of God), and that only the latter were lost at the Fall. "Total depravity," in contrast, holds that this distinction is false, that the totality of human nature was affected by the Fall, that man-as-totality turned against God at the Fall. Thus man cannot find truth about God through reason, nor turn to God with his will, but must be redeemed as a whole, a totality.

TOWARDS THE CONVERSION OF ENGLAND. In 1943, at the request of the church assembly, the then archbishop of Canterbury (William Temple*) set up a commission of nearly fifty people under the chairmanship of the bishop of Rochester to "... survey the whole problem of modern evangelism...." This report, entitled Towards the Conversion of England, was published in 1945. The report considered the Gospel itself, the need for laity to be fully involved in evangelism, the different needs of town and country, young and old, and the new opportunities in the postwar situation. The report, which had many practical suggestions, was widely acclaimed* (it was reprinted eight times in the first eight months), but never had any substantial effect. A recent writer, Roger Lloyd, has described it as a "damp squib."

Although the death of Archbishop Temple before the report was published may be one reason for its lack of influence, other reasons were the preoccupation of the Church of England with canon law revision, and the great and rapid theological and social changes unforeseen in the report. The report is confident in what the Gospel is; many in succeeding years were not. The report speaks of moral standards having reached a low point because of the war; there is no suggestion that they were to fall even further. The parish system and the 1662 Book of Common Prayer were still regarded as satisfactory; no radical reform of ministry or worship was contemplated. Furthermore, England was still seen as a Christian country to which "other nations look for leadership." Finally, the report—while making valuable suggestions in many different spheres—was never really a "plan" as the subtitle describes the report.

TRACT. Though this term is applied sometimes to the chant sung in Roman Catholic churches at Mass on certain penitential days, it more often refers to a type of propagandist literature larger than a handbill but shorter than a treatise, designed to promote spiritual or moral edification. Although the fondness of the Oxford reformers of the 1830s for this type of literature led to the term "Tractarians"* being applied to them, tracts and the colporteurs who distribute them are generally thought of as specifically Protestant. Thus the lesser writings of Wycliffe,* the Puritan *Marprelate Tracts (1588), and the ephemeral literature of the Civil War period all fall into this category. The eighteenth-century Evangelicals relied heavily on tracts, and the famous Religious Tract Society was founded by George Burder and others in 1799, to be followed by numerous parallel societies in America, the continent of Europe, and the mission fields. Tracts are today used extensively by aggressive heretical sects.

IAN SELLERS

TRACTARIANISM. The name given to that stage of the Oxford Movement* when the Tracts for the Times were being issued. The first three Tracts were four-page leaflets published anonymously in 1833. In the first, J.H. Newman* sounded a clarion call to the clergy of the Church of England to exalt their office because of its "Apostolical Descent." The disciples of the Tract writers personally distributed the Tracts widely up and down the country vicarages. The Tracts began to change in character when E.B. Pusey* began to write in 1834. He produced longer theological documents, like Tract 18 on fasting which was signed with his initials. As the Tracts continued, they also included reprints of selections from the writings of the Caroline Divines,* with whom the Tractarians claimed affinity. The Tract writers included R.H. Froude,* R.I. Wilberforce, R.W. Church,* J.B. Mozley,* and I. Williams,* as well as the leaders of the Oxford Movement. Characteristic of their approach to religious teaching was the expression in two of the Tracts of "reserve in communicating religious knowledge." The Tracts came to a sudden end in 1841 with Tract 90 by J.H. Newman. His attempt to interpret the Thirty-Nine Articles in a "catholic" direction brought a storm of protest and forced the closure of the series.

NOEL S. POLLARD

TRADITION. The Greek word paradidōmi, from which paradosis ("tradition") is derived, means "to hand something over." The NT employs the verb in a variety of ways (Matt. 11:27; Acts 14:26; 1 Pet. 2:23), but the noun is reserved for teaching which has been handed down. Apostolic teaching—which included facts about Christ, their theological importance, and their ethical implications for Christian living—was described as tradition (1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Thess. 2:15). It had divine sanction (1 Cor. 11:23; Gal. 1:11-16) and, once committed to writing, was to be preserved by the church (Jude 3; 2 Tim. 1:13; Rom. 6:17). Jesus rejected tradition, but only in the sense of human accretion lacking divine sanction (Mark 7:3-9).

In the patristic period, the apostolic paradosis was usually distinguished from the church's didaskalia, or teaching, but a looser usage of paradosis is also discernible. Legends about the apostles, liturgical practices, biblical interpretation, and unwritten teachings, said to have come either openly or secretly from the apostles, were included under this rubric.

The Council of Trent* extended this practice, saying that revelational truth is to be found "in written books [Scripture] and unwritten traditions." Vatican I* also spoke of revelation being contained partly in the "written books" and partly in "unwritten traditions." More recently this unwritten paradosis has been identified, not so much with the Magisterium's teaching, as with the church's religious perception (sensus fidei). Vatican II,* therefore, attempted to overcome the traditional polarization between Scripture and tradition by positing that there is only one source of revelation, not two. Scripture and tradition alike contain and reflect this one revelation, being its derivatives.

The Reformers distinguished between apostolic and post-apostolic tradition. The former they identified with divine revelation (cf. 1 Tim. 5:18; 2 Pet. 3:15; 1 Thess. 2:13), and the latter with human teaching. The latter was to be received only when it did not violate the former. The apostolic paradosis should be allowed to inform and structure Christian thought, providing an unchanging element of continuity through all ages.

TRADITIONALISM. An early nineteenth-century French Catholic response to European Enlightenment rationalism and the French Revolution, and a doctrine instrumental in forming ultramontanism.* Its main founder was Louis de Bonald (La législation primitive, 1802), who was joined by F.R. Lamennais* in his early years, and Joseph de Maistre.* It was a search for a principle of authority, necessitated by what was seen as a collapse of rationalism and social order. Individual human reason was incapable either of discerning metaphysical or moral truth by itself or of establishing right order in society. Instead, they argued, it was God who revealed the truths to men, through the first man, and embodied them in tradition—the transmission of God's original truth from generation to generation through the organic development of history, by instruction, and within the structures of authority, specifically the papacy for things spiritual and the rulers for things temporal. Belief was the certain apprehension and acceptance of this tradition.

The doctrine represented in Catholic philosophy a swing toward the pole of faith, denying that "natural reason" could attain such "natural truths" as God's existence, the principle of authority, and the moral law. Its contributions to Ultramontanism were accepted while its doctrines of faith and tradition were periodically condemned in mid-nineteenth-century papal encyclicals as blind faith. The decrees of Vatican I* and the reestablishment of Thomism* by Leo XIII* (1879) further destroyed the doctrine.

TRADITORS (Lat. traditores, "traitors"). A name given in Africa to Christians who saved their lives during Diocletian's* persecution by surrendering copies of the Scriptures. The Donatist* schism was partly caused by the Donatists' refusal to recognize Caecilian* of Carthage because he was consecrated bishop by an alleged traditor, Felix of Aptunga. Felix was later cleared of the charge. At the Council of Arles (314), persons consecrated by traditors were held to be duly recognized.

TRAHERNE, THOMAS (1637-74). English poet. He came from the Welsh borders, was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and was subsequently rector of Credenhill (Herefordshire). In 1673 he published Roman Forgeries, a criticism of the Roman Catholic Church based on extensive reading in early church history. Christian Ethics appeared in the year after his death, but the works by which he is best known were not printed until the present century: Poems (1903) and Centuries of Meditation (1908). Despite a certain limitation both of idea and of expression, Traherne is a fit member of the succession of Metaphysical poets. He shared Vaughan's delight in childhood and sense of the glory of the created universe. His meditative works also show his links with the Cambridge Platonists,* but his elevation into rhapsody on the divine love and wisdom takes him into a realm that borders on the mystical. He is a store of devotional wisdom, whose work has been not unaptly compared with that of Thomas à Kempis.*

TRANSCENDENTALISTS. The American Unitarian Association was formed in 1825, but by 1836 the Boston churches were torn again as rebellious young preachers, members of the "Transcendental Club," abandoned Unitarianism,* feeling it to be complacent and sterile in its rationalism. Among the most prominent were R.W. Emerson,* George Ripley (1802-80), Theodore Parker,* James Freeman Clarke (1810-88),

Orestes Brownson (1803-76), and the layman Henry David Thoreau (1817-62). Much influenced by S.T. Coleridge's Aids to Reflection, they tried to introduce a strong note of mysticism and contemporary Romanticism's view of individual intuition, flashes and insights into truth, as the highest form of knowledge. Their thinking was basically syncretistic, viewed God as immanent in nature, rejected external authority, and saw every created thing as possessing deep religious meaning. For several years much of their writing appeared in the Dial (1840-44), and Emerson's "Divinity School Address" and Parker's sermon on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity" were expositions of their thought, although they disagreed among themselves often in their intense individualism. KEITH J. HARDMAN

TRANSFIGURATION. The event in the life of Jesus when His appearance became radiant in the presence of Peter, James, and John (Matt. 17:1-9; Mark 9:2-10; Luke (9:28-36; 2 Peter 1:16-21). Three wonders accompanied the event: the transformation of Jesus' face and garments, the appearance of Elijah and Moses, and the voice of God speaking from a cloud. Tradition associates the event with Mt. Tabor, but a location in the foothills of Mt. Hermon provides a more likely setting. The gospel accounts of the event are laden with symbolic overtones: the revelation of Jesus' true nature (light), the fulfillment of the Law and the Prophets in Jesus' ministry (Moses and Elijah), the presence of God in the life of Jesus, and the divine commendation of His mission (cloud and voice). W. WARD GASQUE

TRANSUBSTANTIATION. The doctrine of the Eucharist maintained by the Roman Catholic Church and first defined by Radbertus, a Benedictine of Corbie in 831 on the basis of John 6. The influence of Greek views of substance and accident blurred the doctrine in the writings of Ockham* and Scotus,* while Biel* confessed that the miraculous presence of Christ was a mystery to be accepted only because of God's omnipotence. The Council of Trent* closed off other options by stating Christ is "truly, really and substantially contained in the sacrament under the appearance of sensible things.... By the consecration of the bread and wine a change is brought about of the whole substance of the body of Christ our Lord and of the whole substance of the wine into the body of his blood. This change ... is called transubstantiation." Vatican II* said of the Eucharist in terms of the body of believers, "Truly partaking of the body of the Lord in the breaking of the Eucharistic bread, we are taken up into communion with Him and with one another." And "no Christian community ... can be built up unless it has its basis and center in the celebration of the ... Eucharist." ROBERT B. IVES

TRAPP, JOHN (1601-1669). English Bible commentator. Son of Nicholas Trapp of Kempsey, Worcestershire, he was born at Croome d'Abitot. Educated at Worcester Free School and Christ Church, Oxford, he became usher (1622) and headmaster (1624) of the Free School, Stratford-upon-Avon, and preacher at Luddington. He became vicar of Weston-on-Avon (1636). In the Civil War he sided with Parliament. Afterward he served as rector of Welford, Gloucestershire, but the former incumbent, Dr. Bowen, was reinstated in 1660, whereupon Trapp returned to Weston. He wrote commentaries on the whole Bible, furnishing an example of Calvinistic scholarship at its best, characterized by quaint humor and profound learning. The best-known edition is that of 1867-68. J.G.G. NORMAN

TRAPPISTS. Cistercian* monks of the reform instituted in 1664 by Armand Jean Le Bouthillier de Rancé,* abbot of La Trappe, a Cistercian abbey near Soligny, Normandy. One of the strictest orders, it emphasizes liturgical worship, demands absolute silence with no allowance for recreation, and imposes community life with a common dormitory. Meat, fish, and eggs are forbidden. The monks devote themselves to liturgical prayer and contemplation, theological study, and manual labor. Their habit is white with a black scapular and cowl. The order of nuns is called "Trappistines." The expulsion of monks during the French Revolution led to Trappist foundations in other parts of Europe and in China, Japan, and the USA. In 1817 they returned to La Trappe, and in 1898 they recovered possession of Cîteaux Abbey which had been secularized during the Revolution, and they declared it the mother church of the Reformed Cistercians. J.G.G. NORMAN

TRAVERS, WALTER (c.1548-1635). Puritan divine. Born in Nottingham, he matriculated at Christ's College, but studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, becoming a fellow in 1569. Whitgift's* new university statutes forced him out of Cambridge, and he traveled to Geneva where he became a close friend of T. Beza* and a convert to Presbyterian polity as the divinely ordained form of church government. His ideas on the subject were set out in De Ecclesiasticae Disciplinae ... Explicatio (1574). After a brief return to England in 1576, he became minister to the Merchant Adventurers in Antwerp, but tensions led to his resignation. His refusal to accept Anglican orders and his leadership in the classical movement made him unacceptable to Whitgift. He was passed over for the mastership of the Temple and finally inhibited from preaching. His last important post was the first provostship of Trinity College, Dublin, between 1594 and 1598, and for the rest of his life he lived in comparative obscurity. Though he played a vital role in editing the draft Book of Discipline, widely discussed by the classical movement, his final book, Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1630), suggested that he no longer so explicitly equated Christianity and Presbyterianism. His defense of Reformed theology and exposition of Presbyterian polity of this deeply learned man made him one of the most influential Elizabethan Puritans.

TREGELLES, SAMUEL PRIDEAUX (1813-75). English NT textual critic. Brought up among the Society of Friends,* a fact which prevented him from pursuing a university career, he showed exceptional talent as a teenager by learning Greek, Hebrew, Aramaic, and Welsh while working at the same time in an iron works. His scholarly abilities were recognized by G.V. Wigram, who employed him to work on his famous Englishman's Greek and Hebrew Concordances. Quite independently he developed critical principles which paralleled those of Lachmann.* He traveled extensively across Europe for the purpose of systematically examining and collating all the then-known uncials and many of the more important minuscules; he was able to correct many erroneous citations by previous editors.

In An Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament (1854), Tregelles surveyed previous work and laid down the principles for his own work. His Greek NT was published in six parts between 1857 and 1872. In addition to translating Gesenius's Hebrew Lexicon into English (1847), he authored many books on "Bible prophecy," including The Man of Sin (1840), The Hope of Christ's Second Coming (1864), and The Prophetic Visions of Daniel (1845), in which he defended what later came to be known as "post-tribulational premillenialism." Associated with the Plymouth Brethren* in the early days of the movement (he was the brother-in-law of B.W. Newton*), he later worshiped with the Presbyterians and finally the Church of England.

TREMELLIUS, JOHN IMMANUEL (1510-1580). Italian Reformer and Semitic scholar. Born in Ferrara of Jewish parentage, he was educated at Padua and won to Christianity through Cardinal Pole in 1540. The following year, while Tremellius was teaching at Lucca, Peter Martyr Vermigli's influence led him to adopt Protestantism. He fled the Inquisition* (1542), journeying to Strasbourg, where he taught Hebrew in Johannes Sturm's school. In 1547, during the Smalcaldic War, he fled to England, and in 1549 became reader in Hebrew at Cambridge. At the accession of Mary Tudor he left England for the Continent, serving as tutor to the children of the duke of Zweibrücken (1555-59), as headmaster of the Hornbach gymnasium (1559-60), and professor of OT studies at Heidelberg (1561-77). He ended his career teaching Hebrew at Sedan, where he died. Tremellius is best known for his Latin translation of the Hebrew Scriptures (5 vols., 1575-79), long used as the most accurate Latin Bible. He also translated Calvin's Catechism into Hebrew and Greek (1551) and published Bucer's Ephesians Commentary from lectures he heard at Cambridge (1562), and an Aramaic and Syriac Grammar (1569).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

TRENCH, RICHARD CHEVENIX (1807-1886). Archbishop of Dublin. Educated at Harrow and Cambridge, he was ordained in 1832. He was professor of divinity at King's College, London (1846-58), and dean of Westminster (1856-63) before going to Dublin. There he opposed unsuccessfully the disestablishment of the Irish Church and did much to settle the church after legislation had been passed. A High Churchman of saintly character, he had wide sympathies and versatile scholarship. His numerous works included Notes on the Parables of our Lord (1841), Notes on the Miracles of our Lord (1846), and Lectures on Mediaeval Church History (1877). He retired in 1884.

J. D. DOUGLAS

TRENT, COUNCIL OF (1545-63). By Roman Catholic reckoning the nineteenth ecumenical council, it was brought about by the continuing success of the Protestant Movement. The council was delayed by many problems. For example, although Charles V* was in favor of a council, he was opposed by Francis I of France. Charles envisioned the council as the means to reunite Christendom, while the papacy saw the council as the means to halt Protestantism.

Pope Paul III* summoned a council for Mantua in 1537, but it failed to meet. The council was transferred to Vicenza in 1538, but the indifference of Charles V and the Protestants resulted in the conference at the appearance of only a few churchmen. The failure of the conference at Ratisbon* spurred Paul III to try calling another council, this time for 1542, but the war between Charles V and Francis I prevented its meeting. After the peace of Crépy, the council was decreed by the bull Laetare Hierusalem issued 11 November 1544. The council was to meet in Trent on 15 March 1545 to settle the religious disputes brought about by the Protestants, to reform certain ecclesiastical abuses, and to begin a crusade against Islam. Due to another disagreement with Charles V over the purpose of the council, it was not convened until December of 1545. The council met in three stages: 1545-47, 1551-52, and 1562-63.

During the first stage, some basic ground rules were established that influenced the other two stages. First, the voting was to be by head rather than by nation; this gave the majority vote to the Italian representatives and thus to the papacy. Second, after some discussion with Charles V over which topics had precedence—reform or doctrine—it was decided to consider both concurrently. Those who could vote during the council included bishops, abbots, and generals of orders. Although the first stage included only thirty-four churchmen, the later meetings did include more. The majority of the participants came from Italy, Spain, France, and Germany. Although Protestants did attend some of the sessions, their impact on the council's deliberations was negligible.

During the first meeting of the council, the following important actions were taken: in session III, the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed was affirmed as the basis of faith; tradition and Scripture were declared to be equal sources of the faith: the canon of Scripture was fixed, and the Vulgate* was declared to be authentic for matters of faith; the Pelagian* and Protestant views of original sin were rejected; the critical problem of justification by faith was considered, with the affirmation made that man is inwardly justified by sanctifying grace and thus capable of good works only after his cooperation with the gratuitous divine assistance. In this same session, the Protestant position on the number of sacraments was rejected, and the council decreed there were seven, conferring grace ex opere operato. Apparently an epidemic broke out, and with political tension growing after some of the council left for Bologna, the pope suspended the council in 1547.

The second meeting of the council began in 1551, but the French were forbidden to attend on orders from Henry II; the Spanish representatives took a more independent stance with the support of Charles V; the Jesuits made their appearance in the form of Laynez* and Salmeron; and the Protestants made a brief appearance. A revolt of princes against Charles V plus internal friction brought an end to the meeting. The following actions were taken: the concept of the Eucharist* was carefully defined with the rejection of the Zwinglian and Lutheran positions; session XIV defined and affirmed the importance of auricular confession, the judicial character of absolution, the church's position on penance, and extreme unction; it also issued the reform decrees on discipline of the clergy.

With the third meeting of the council, called by Pius IV,* all hope of reconciliation with Protestantism was gone. One of the reasons for resummoning the council was apparently the fear of Pius IV that without the council France might become Calvinist. The council met in January of 1562, and 113 were present. The discussions were now more internal than previously. The struggle was not with Protestantism, but between pro- and antipapal forces. The latter usually were victorious, due partly to the consummate skill of Cardinal Morone.* The following actions were taken: a number of books were added to the Index in session XVIII; session XXI affirmed the belief that Christ is totally present in both species during the Eucharist, but only the bread was to be distributed to the laity; more precise definitions on the sacrificial aspects of the Mass* were arrived at. This was probably the second-most-important decision of Trent. A crisis arose over the appearance of the French bishops in November 1562 and their position on the question of clerical residency. The French and Spanish churchmen were opposed to the papal reform, but after ten months of adjournment due to this issue, a strict decree was promulgated. Other decrees were issued on matrimony, orders, founding of seminaries, and establishment of synods. The council ended 4 December 1563, and the decrees were confirmed 26 January 1564. Later in 1564 Pius IV issued a summary of the council's work called the "Tridentine Creed."

Although the council did not satisfy Protestants and some Catholics, it did provide the foundation for a revitalization of Catholicism through, for example, the Roman Catechism of 1566, the Revised Breviary of 1568, and the Missal of 1570. The council set the boundaries of Catholic belief, but did not always carefully and minutely define the details of belief, thus allowing some hope for further ecumenical efforts.

TRINITARIANS. The "Order of the Most Holy Trinity," founded at Cerfroid, Meaux, in 1198 by John of Matha* and Felix of Valois, with approval from Innocent III. Known also as "Mathurins," they followed an austere form of the Augustinian Rule, wearing a white habit. Devoting themselves to redeeming Christian captives, they took a fourth vow to sacrifice their own liberty if necessary, using one-third of their revenues as ransoms. By the fifteenth century there were 800 houses as collecting centers and hospitals; they were particularly numerous in the British Isles. A reform movement, the "Barefooted Trinitarians," founded by Juan Bautista of the Immaculate Conception in Spain (1596), is the only surviving body, engaged in education, nursing, and ransoming of Negro slaves. Trinitarian nuns were affiliated from earliest times. The "Barefooted Trinitarian Sisters" date from 1612. J.G.G. NORMAN

TRINITY. The central tenet of the Christian faith is that God is one, personal, and triune. Trinitarian theology coheres with belief in the personal nature of God,* the Incarnation,* the Atonement,* the life in the Spirit, and the ultimate relation of redeemed men to God in Christ.

The Athanasian Creed* states: "We worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity; neither confounding the Persons, nor dividing the Substance." The truth that in the unity of God there is a trinity of persons can be known only by revelation,* but the truth is seen as neither irrational nor peripheral to faith. Trinitarian faith does not derive from the Church Fathers, but from the apostolic faith and teaching. The controversies of the first four centuries do not comprise attempts to impose alien Greek or other ideas upon Christianity, but attempts by the Fathers to assimilate adequately the empirical facts of the Christian revelation in an age which had neither categories nor language adequate to the new Christian realities.

The faith that the Father is God is held by all Christians. Monotheism* is deeply embedded in both Old and New Testaments, but the OT does contain important clues to plurality in God, including the Sh'ma, "Hear O Israel, Yahweh our Gods (Elohim) is Yahweh a unity;" the plural in Genesis 1:26 and 3:22; the three visitors to Abraham (Gen. 18:1-22); the captain of the Lord's hosts (Josh. 5:13-16); the Spirit of Yahweh passages (Gen. 1:2; Isa. 40:13); the triune invocation of the divine name (Isa. 6); and the striking words of Isaiah 48:16.

Historically, Trinitarian doctrine originated in the necessity Christians faced to distinguish Jesus from God, yet to identify Him with God. With the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, the empirical facts were all in hand for the subsequent formulation of the doctrine. Hence there is no hint of embarrassment in the NT to Jewish Christians due to Trinitarian theology. The doctrine is solidly embedded in the fabric of the NT (Matt. 28:19; 1 Cor. 12:3-6).

Through the Incarnation the first Christians learned to distinguish the Father and the Son while maintaining the faith that both are God. The Fatherhood of God was known in the OT. The unique NT teaching is that the Father and the Son are God, and that God is "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3).

Thus the doctrine of the Trinity is derived from the truth of the Incarnation and is to be tested by it. Jesus Christ is truly God the Son and distinctly God the Son (John 1:1,18; 20:28; Col. 2:9; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8,10). Subordinationism* and Adoptianism (Dynamic Monarchianism*) comprise two active, polemically minded erroneous alternatives. In the former the Son has a derived existence, in the latter he is only a man divinely energized for a mission. Neither of these alternatives adequately handles the empirical data of apostolic experience and witness. Their anti-Trinitarianism derives from a presupposition regarding the meaning of unity, rather than from the truth of the Incarnation.

While all Christians acknowledge the Holy Spirit* to be God, there remain two further levels of biblical understanding: the Holy Spirit is personal, and He is distinctly personal. Recent biblical studies are reluctant to make of the Spirit simply divine pervasive or invasive power. Some tend to identify Christ and the Spirit, although the Scriptures nowhere say that the Spirit is Christ. While some biblical passages do not demand a personal reading of the Spirit's reality, the controlling passages unambiguously declare the Spirit to be distinctly personal (Mark 3:22-30; Luke 12:12; John 14:26; 15:26; 16:7-15).

The most intractable problem faced by Christians has been how to conceive of the Trinity in unity. Traditional presuppositions that unity is simple and undifferentiated have forced many (including Subordinationists and Sabellians*) to jettison Trinitarian faith. However, if one sees unity as inclusive rather than exclusive, the problem is at least mitigated. If all approximations to unity are to be measured by a scale of degrees of absence of internal multiplicity, then Trinitarian theology and monotheism are irrevocably incompatible. But if the degree of unity is be be measured by the intensity of the unifying power in the life of the whole, then there is the prospect for at least partially comprehending the unity of the Godhead (cf. John 17:20-23) and other complex unities.

That God sent His Son to the cross and that God was in Christ is comprehensible on Trinitarian terms alone. Athanasius declared that only if Christ is truly God do we have contact with God in Him. Trinitarian faith in the NT enriched Christian experience. The Christian is said to be joined to the Trinitarian life of God through the redeeming work of Christ and the fellowship of the Spirit (Eph. 4:2-6).

TRITHEISM. Belief in three gods which denies the unity of substance in the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. Popular expressions of Trinitarian doctrine and some transactional soteriological theories can be tritheistic. Historical tritheism appeared in Monophysite circles c.550, associated with Johannes Askunages and Johannes Philiponus. Philoponus was an Alexandrian philosopher who opposed the Chalcedonian Christology, contending that Christ's was a single nature compounded of the divine and human, and that there are three divine substances (ousiai) in the Trinity. A speculative rather than a practical tritheism, it was opposed by John of Damascus in de Fide orthodoxa.

In medieval times the extreme Nominalism* of Roscellinus* of Compiègne and the exaggerated Realism of Gilbert de la Porrée led them into tritheistic positions which were condemned at the Councils of Soissons (1092) and Reims (1148) respectively. Gilbert's teaching influenced Joachim of Fiore,* who conceived the oneness of the three persons as a mere generic unity. Joachim's doctrine was condemned at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), which defined clearly the numerical unity of the divine nature.

Anton Günther (1783-1863), opposing Hegelian pantheism, taught that the Absolute determined itself three times in a process of self-development. The divine substance is trebled, and the three substances attracted to one another through consciousness make a formal unity. This was condemned by Pius IX (1857). J.G.G. NORMAN

TROELTSCH, ERNST (1865-1923). Liberal German theologian, historian, and philosopher of religion. He taught mainly in Heidelberg and Berlin between 1894 and 1923, and served also for a time as minister of education in the government. Early associated with the "religionsgeschichtliche Schule," he devoted himself to the problem raised for religion by the historical consciousness and method dominant in the West since the eighteenth century, and to relating Christianity to the cultural situation. He denied that dogmatic theology could have access to a super-historical absolute truth. The claims of all religions were depicted as relative to their total cultural settings, which both made them possible and limited them. His belief that Christianity could be shown to be the highest of religions weakened between Die Absolutheit des Christentums und die Religionsgeschichte (1902; ET The Absoluteness of Christianity, 1971) and Der Historismus und seine Ueberwindung (1924; ET Christian Thought, Its History and Application, 1923). Yet he feared the skepticism of historical relativism and believed it could be overcome by living decisions, taken responsibly in the light of history. Thus Christianity was still the religion best suited to the Western world.

He was intensely concerned with social and political questions, and his interest in the possibilities and conditions for a fruitful contemporary relation between Christianity and civilization issued in The Social Teaching of the Christian Church (1931; first published in 1912 as Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen), a work best but misleadingly known perhaps for its use of church, sect, and mysticism as three types of Christianity. By his classical explorations of the problem of historicism in relation to religion, Troeltsch could be regarded as marking an epoch in modern theology.

TROPHIMUS. A Gentile Christian who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem as a representative of the churches of Asia (Acts 20:4). He is identified as an Ephesian by the Western Text and in Acts 21:29. The supposition that Paul had brought him into the forbidden area of the Temple occasioned the riot which resulted in Paul's arrest and appearance before Felix and eventually his appeal to Caesar. 2 Timothy 4:20 refers to Trophimus as left behind sick at Miletus, ostensibly when Paul himself had been hurried under arrest to Rome with few trusted companions remaining.

The name is frequently recorded from Ephesus and district (e.g., British Museum Inscrs. 591; Jahreshefte des österreichischen archäologischen Instituts XLIV, 1959, Beiblatt, col. 369).

An early bishop of Arles named Trophimus is first mentioned in the fifth century. Tradition has attempted to identify him with the companion of Paul. COLIN HEMER

TROTTER, ISABELLA LILIAS (1853-1928). Missionary to North Africa. Daughter of a London businessman, she was privately educated, and converted under the ministry of Mr. and Mrs. Pearsall Smith. In 1876 she made the acquaintance of John Ruskin,* who admired her expert miniatures and exhorted her to devote her life to painting, but she determined to sail as a missionary to North Africa. She began her work in Algeria in 1888, making heroic and dangerous missionary journeys, securing converts among Arabs, French, Jews, and Negroes, and establishing preaching stations. Her Algiers Mission Band grew steadily from three to thirty full-time workers. Her translations of the NT into Algerian colloquial and her illustrated tracts for Muslim readers were greatly admired. She died while still on active service; her society is now incorporated in the North Africa Mission. IAN SELLERS

TRUCE OF GOD (Lat. pax, treuga Dei). A suspension of hostilities ordered by the Roman Catholic Church. The custom originated in France in the tenth century and was meant to lessen the impact on the lower orders of society of the incessant quarreling of the feudal nobles. Since the armistice was ordered by the church, it was traced back to the will of God and called "the truce of God." At first the period was from Saturday evening to Monday morning, but later holy days or seasons (e.g., Easter) were included. After the eleventh century the practice died out.

TRUMBULL, CHARLES GALLAUDET (1872-1941). Evangelical writer and journalist. Born in Hartford, Connecticut, he graduated from Yale and joined The Sunday School Times, founded by his father in 1893. He became editor in 1903 and later director (it ceased publication in 1967). He was for a long time a staff writer for the Toronto Globe, and he also wrote the weekly Sunday school lesson for several daily newspapers, including the Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger. His many interests included membership of the Victoria Institute, the Palestine Exploration Fund, and the Archaeological Institute of America. A supporter of missions, he wrote books that were evangelistic and prophetic.

TÜBINGEN SCHOOL. In the early nineteenth century there was a Tübingen School of conservative theology led by J.C.F. Steudel at the University of Tübingen. But the Tübingen School commonly referred to is that headed by F.C. Baur,* who taught there from 1826 until his death in 1860. Baur's teaching was characterized by his anti-supernaturalistic attitude to history, tendency criticism in the interpretation of biblical writings, and the use of idealist philosophy in the interpretation of history. He saw a fundamental conflict between the Jewish church led by Peter and the Hellenistic Gentile church led by Paul. The degree in which NT books exhibited tendencies of this conflict determined their authenticity. Baur assigned most of them to the second century.

The organ of Baur's circle was the Tübinger Theologische Jahrbücher (1842-57), continued by A. Hilgenfeld* as the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie (1858-1914). Baur wrote in defense of the school in An Herrn Dr. Karl Hase. Beantwortung des Sendschreibens "Die Tübinger Schule" (1855) and Die Tübinger Schule und ihre Stellung zur Gegenwart (1859, rev. 1860). It is questionable, however, whether the school ever amounted to more than Baur and his immediate circle. Despite the attention Baur attracted, nineteenth-century German liberal theology tended to follow other paths. Of his disciples, A. Schwegler adopted Baur's approach in his Geschichte des nachapostolischen Zeitalters (2 vols., 1846), as did O. Pfleiderer.* But Baur's most famous pupils —D.F. Strauss,* E. Zeller,* and A. Ritschl*—developed their own approaches. After the death of his colleague F. Kern in 1842, Baur felt himself increasingly isolated within the Tübingen faculty and German academic theology.

COLIN BROWN

TUCKER, ALFRED ROBERT (1849-1914). Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa (1890-98) and of Uganda (1898-1911). He renounced an artistic career for the Anglican priesthood, and after seven years in English parishes he joined the Church Missionary Society and reached East Africa in 1890. His main achievement was to consolidate and extend the Anglican Church in Buganda and neighboring chiefdoms. He nurtured a locally supported African ministry, promoted educational and medical work, and traveled widely to supervise established missions and pioneer new work. His progressive views on church government aroused opposition among European missionaries who rejected full integration with the local church. Nevertheless, synodical government was accepted in 1909. Tucker campaigned for the British protectorate over Uganda (1894) and frequently championed the interests of its people. Ill-health compelled his resignation in 1911, at which time he became canon of Durham.

D.G.L. CRAGG

TUCKER, WILLIAM JEWETT (1839-1926). Congregational clergyman and educator. Educated at Dartmouth College and Andover Theological Seminary, he pastored churches in New Hampshire and New York City before teaching at Andover (1879-93). He was also associate editor of Andover Review (1884-93). Influenced by Horace Bushnell,* he asserted that only humane theology, or "progressive orthodoxy," would improve society. Because of this he founded in 1881 Andover House in Boston, patterned after Toynbee Hall. He was tried with others for heresy, but was acquitted. From 1893 until his retirement in 1909 Tucker was president of Dartmouth. Not a prolific writer, he best expressed his thinking in the autobiographical My Generation (1919), in which he praised the growth of the Puritan conscience in America.

DARREL BIGHAM

TUCKNEY, ANTHONY (1599-1670). Cambridge Puritan. Born in Lincolnshire, he was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, becoming a fellow and tutor of his college, which posts he held with distinction for nearly ten years. Three of his pupils were Benjamin Whichcote and Henry and William Pierrepont. In 1629 he became mayor's chaplain and in 1633 (in succession to John Cotton*) vicar of Boston, Lincolnshire. He served as a member of the Westminster Assembly* and on the drafting committee for the "Larger Catechism." In 1645 he became master of Emmanuel and eight years later, master of St. John's College. In 1654 he was appointed one of Cromwell's "Triers" and in 1655 regius professor of divinity. At the Restoration he lost his Cambridge posts and moved to London to live quietly in the parish of St. Mary Axe, but occasionally preached in private. Though nominated as a member of the Savoy Conference* (1661), he never attended. He published little, but did edit two books by Cotton.

PETER TOON

TULCHAN BISHOPS. The name comes from an old Scots rural practice of stuffing a calf's skin with straw and leaving it beside the cow to induce it to give milk more freely. In 1572, during the infancy of James VI, through the influence of Regent Morton certain influential Protestant ministers were persuaded to agree to the retention in the kingdom of episcopal titles. The persons appointed to the vacant sees entered into an agreement with Morton and other powerful nobles to ensure that the incumbent should retain only a modest proportion of the episcopal emoluments and give the rest to their patrons. "The bishop," it was said, "had the title, but my lord had the milk." The general assembly denounced the practice, which did not long survive the end of Morton's regency (1578).

TUNSTALL, CUTHBERT (1474-1559). Bishop of Durham. While studying at Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, he made friends with William Warham,* Thomas More,* Erasmus,* and other foreign scholars. Warham made him his chancellor in 1511, and Henry VIII* sent him on various political missions, making him bishop of London in 1522 and of Durham in 1530. He at first opposed the royal supremacy, but later preached vigorously in its favor. This support of Tunstall was of crucial importance to Henry VIII because of the wide respect in which he was held. Tunstall remained Catholic in doctrine, however, defending auricular confession and striving to keep the Bishops' Book* of 1537 as Catholic as possible. Under Edward VI* he had second thoughts on royal supremacy, though he enforced the Act of Uniformity* in his diocese after voting against it in Parliament. He also voted against the abolition of chantries in 1547, and the act permitting priests to marry in 1549. In consequence he was imprisoned in his house in 1551, and in 1552 deprived of his bishopric. While in prison he wrote a defense of the Catholic view of the Mass, De veritate corporis et sanguinis domini nostri Jesu Christi in eucharistia (published in Paris in 1554). He was restored by Mary Tudor* in 1554, but took no part in persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth* he refused to take the Oath of Supremacy, or to help consecrate Matthew Parker* as archbishop of Canterbury. He was again deprived and kept in custody at Lambeth Palace until his death a few months later.

TURNER, CUTHBERT HAMILTON (1860-1930). Anglican historian of early Christianity, and NT scholar. He came to Oxford as a student in 1879 and there remained until his death, serving in various capacities as research scholar and lecturer, latterly as fellow of Magdalen College (1889-1930) and Dean Ireland's professor of exegesis (1920-30). His research centered in matters of chronology and textual criticism related to the Fathers and canon law. He failed to complete several major writing projects, but published in fascicles an extensive collection of documents relating to early Western canon law Ecclesiae Occidentalis Monumenta Juris Antiquissima (1899-1930) and a flood of learned essays—the more important being a classic study of NT chronology in Hastings's Dictionary of the Bible (vol. 1, 1898); "Greek Patristic Commentaries" in the same dictionary (extra vol., 1904); a general sketch of the development of early canon law for the Cambridge Medieval History (vol. 1, 1911); "Apostolic Succession" in Essays on the Early History of the Church and the Ministry, which he co-edited with H.B. Swete* (1918); and his inaugural lecture on The Study of the New Testament, 1883 and 1920 (1920).

Two collections of his writings were published under the title Studies in Early Christian History (1912) and Essays: Catholic and Apostolic (posthumous, with a memoir by H.N. Bates, 1931). Turner was the first editor of Journal of Theological Studies (1899-1902), to which he contributed throughout his life, and a collaborator in the Patristic Greek Lexicon initiated by H.B. Swete and completed only recently. W. WARD GASQUE

TWELVE ARTICLES, THE (1525). A statement of the grievances of German peasants against their feudal lords, drawn up at Memmingen. The peasants wanted abolition of serfdom, rights to fish in streams, hunt game and cut wood, just rent, abolition of feudal death taxes as well as the right to appoint their pastors and control the amount of tithes. The last article asserted that their demands must be in conformity with Scripture and would be withdrawn if such were not the case. Luther agreed with these demands and urged the feudal lords to grant these articles, but when the peasants revolted against their feudal lords, Luther turned against the peasants and in a tract urged the lords to exterminate them to prevent anarchy.

TYCONIUS (fl. c.370-c.390). Donatist lay theologian. For his "Catholic" views he was attacked by Parmenian, the Donatist bishop of Carthage, and excommunicated by a council at Carthage (?), but evidently did not become a Catholic. Two lost works, On Internal War and Expositions of Various Causes, discussed the Donatist–Catholic dispute. His Book of Rules, the first Latin essay in hermeneutics, presents seven keys to spiritual exegesis, which through Augustine's adoption (On Christian Instruction 3:30:42–37:56) had a wide influence. His spiritualizing Commentary on the Apocalypse may be recoverable from a partially extant Catholic recension and the later commentaries of Caesarius,* Primasius,* Bede,* and Beatus* of Liebana. Tyconius differed with Donatist theory in holding the church to be truly universal and "bipartite," an intermingling, inseparable until the end, of pure and impure, the "cities" of God and the devil. On this and other themes, including grace and faith, he decisively influenced Augustine; both were zealous Paulinists whose thought focused on the church.

TYE, CHRISTOPHER (c.1500-1573). English composer. For a time he was organist at Ely Cathedral, then sometime after the triumph of Protestantism he took orders in the Church of England, and died as rector of Doddington. A representative quantity of his Latin church music has survived and shows him to have been a superior composer. Most of his music with English text is adapted. His versification of fourteen chapters of Acts is inferior, but the music has yielded several much-used hymns. The short anthem, "O come ye servants of the Lord," is also an adaptation.

TYLER, BENNET (1783-1858). American Congregational theologian. Born at Middlebury, Connecticut, he graduated from Yale College in 1804. After studying theology, he was ordained in 1808. He became president of Dartmouth College in 1822, and pastor of the Second Church, Portland, Maine, in 1828. By this period the USA had entered the final phase of the Second Great Awakening,* which had begun in 1799. Charles G. Finney* and other evangelists interpreted popularly the doctrines of Nathaniel W. Taylor* and the "New Divinity" issuing from Yale. Orthodox Calvinists became increasingly alarmed, not only at the "new measures" used by revivalists, but more so at the concessions to Arminianism* in teaching human ability and choice. Open conflict broke out in 1828 when Taylor's address to the Connecticut Congregational clergy, Concio ad Clerum, dealt with the crucial issue of natural depravity and stated that men's depravity does not "consist in a sinful nature, which they have corrupted by being one with Adam, and by acting in his act." This made it certain to the conservatives that the New Divinity departed from orthodox Calvinism at a most essential point.

Bennet Tyler, a Yale classmate of Taylor, in 1829 entered into discussions with him which continued for some years. The first results of the conflict was the founding of a Pastoral Union in 1833 and a Theological Institute at East Windsor (later Hartford Seminary) in 1834, with the express purpose of combating the New Haven Theology.* Tyler was called to assume the presidency and remained in this position until 1857. In his later years he entered into discussion with Horace Bushnell* on emerging theological issues. He published many sermons, articles, and books, on such subjects as the sufferings of Christ, the New Haven Theology, and New England revivals.

KEITH J. HARDMAN

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (c.1494-1536). English Reformer and Bible translator. Born in the west of England, he was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and afterward at Cambridge. He became tutor to Sir John Walsh's family, but seeing the ignorance of clergy and laity alike, he grew convinced that "it was impossible to establish the lay people in any truth, except the Scripture were plainly laid before their eyes in their mother tongue." From Cuthbert Tunstall,* bishop of London, he received no encouragement, so he left England, never to return. The printing of his first NT in English was begun in 1525 at Cologne, but a police raid stopped the work, and it had to be finished later that year at Worms. Tunstall, Thomas More,* and William Warham,* archbishop of Canterbury, attacked him relentlessly, and secret agents were sent to trap him as he moved around from his Antwerp base where sympathetic English merchants protected and helped him. Tyndale continued to revise his NT, though plagued by pirated versions and betrayed by his erstwhile helper George Joye who ran off another pirated version. Tyndale also embarked on the Pentateuch and left other OT translations uncompleted.

At the same time, he was writing OT commentaries, replying to More's longwinded attacks, writing NT expositions (1 John and Matt. 5–7), propounding justification by faith alone in The Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1528), penning a major constitutional and theological treatise in The Obedience of a Christian Man (1528), and dealing with Joye's speculations on the afterlife as well as the Anabaptist doctrine of soul-sleep (the subject of Calvin's first theological work). Tyndale's output was impressive, as the conditions under which he worked—a shipwreck and loss of manuscripts, secret agents after him, police raids on his printer, betrayal by friends—were daunting. His quality nevertheless remained high. He pioneered English Bible translations from the original languages. His style was lucid, crisp and concise, and above all appealed to ordinary people for its down-to-earth character. His literary work is now universally recognized. His theological works were often translations or rough paraphrases of Luther or Lutheran works, but there are traces from 1529 onward of the growing influence of Swiss Protestant theology. Arrested at Vilvorde near Brussels in 1535, he was finally strangled and burnt in the following year.

TYPOLOGY, BIBLICAL. A system of biblical interpretation which features particularly in the NT treatment of the OT, and which has since been applied by some exegetes to the NT in turn. The term "typology" is derived from the Greek word typos, "pattern" or "figure" (cf. Rom. 5:14); the NT antitypon (cf. Heb. 9:24) means much the same thing. Typology and allegory* overlap to some extent, but typology is in general more historical in character; a "type" is accordingly an event, person, or object which by its very nature and significance prefigures or foreshadows some later event, person, or object. Thus Adam is explicitly described in Romans 5:14 RSV as "a type of the one who was to come" (i.e., of Christ), because of his special place in human history. The most fruitful OT source for NT typology was, however, the Passover and Exodus complex of events: cf. John 3:14; 6:31-35; 1 Corinthians 5:7; 10:1-5. Also used as types are Noah, Melchizedek, and Jonah. Galatians 4:22-31, though not dissimilar, is described by Paul as allegory. Typology began in the OT itself, as in the treatment of the Exodus theme in Isaiah 43:16ff.; 51:10f., and continued into postbiblical Jewish and Christian exegesis, especially at Alexandria.

TYPOS (Gr. tupos tes pisteos, "model of faith"). An edict issued by Emperor Constans II in 647 or 648 superseding Heraclius's Ecthesis. With a view to securing theological peace, it forbade anyone to assert either Monothelite* or Dyothelete* beliefs, and required that teaching should be limited to the definitions of the first five ecumenical councils. It was drawn up by Paul, the Monothelite patriarch of Constantinople. At the Lateran Council (649), Martin I condemned both the Ecthesis and the Typos, and was banished.

TYRRELL, GEORGE (1861-1909). Roman Catholic modernist. Born in Dublin of an Anglican family, he studied briefly at Trinity College there before conversion to Roman Catholicism led to his entering the Jesuit Order in 1880. Ordained in 1891, he taught philosophy at Stonyhurst College (1894-96), then was called to his order's English headquarters in Farm Street, London. There he produced acceptable orthodox publications until 1899 and was remarkably successful in spiritual counseling. Among those he helped was the daughter of F. von Hügel,* who introduced Tyrrell to the works of French modernists.

An article on "Hell" in the Weekly Register (1899), in which be began overt questioning of Roman Catholic theology, led to his transfer to a provincial mission house, but Tyrrell maintained an active devotional life; and though superiors were uneasy about his tendencies, his books up to and including Lex Orandi (1903) were published with the Imprimatur.* His Lex Credendi (1906), with its oblique criticism of the church, was overshadowed that same year by a pseudonymous Much Abused Letter which led to dismissal from his order. Undeterred, Tyrrell wrote two letters to The Times in 1907, replying to Pius X's condemnation of modernism, and this led to his being refused the sacraments. In his publications he made the distinction between the "prison of theology" and the "liberty of faith."

When he died at forty-eight, having been plagued by ill-health all his life, he still considered himself a Catholic, but was unrepentant about his works. He was refused a Catholic burial, and lies in an Anglican churchyard in Sussex. Von Hügel, who ignored the virtual excommunication and continued to address Tyrrell as "Father," admitted his recklessness in correspondence, his bitterness, and his excessive reaction against extremism in others, but added: "if to be a saint is to be generous and heroic, to spend yourself for conscience and for souls, then T. is a saint."

TYRRELL, WILLIAM (1807-1879). First bishop of Newcastle, Australia. Educated at Charterhouse and St. John's College, Cambridge, he was ordained in 1833 and became incumbent of Beaulieu in Hampshire in 1839. Eight years later, when W.G. Broughton* divided the diocese of Australia, Tyrrell became bishop of the northern part of Eastern Australia based on the small town of Newcastle. He arrived in 1848 to find only eleven clergy to cover his vast diocese of over 20,000 square miles. In 1859 the diocese of Brisbane was separated from Newcastle, and in 1867 after a long delay the diocese of Grafton and Armidale took the northern part of New South Wales from Tyrrell's diocese. He was generous in supporting his clergy and building churches in his diocese. He died at Morpeth where he had lived, and left a large property as an endowment for the diocese.

UBERTINO OF CASALE (1259-c.1330). Franciscan Spiritual leader. Born at Casale, near Vercelli, Italy, he entered the Franciscan Order about 1272. He studied and lectured in Paris (1289-98), then returned to Italy as a preacher and teacher. Influenced by John of Parma* and P.J. Olivi,* ardent Spirituals, he became a leader of this party of strict Franciscans in Tuscany and Umbria. His principal work, Arbor vitae crucifixae Jesu (1305), written during enforced retirement, includes an account of Christ's life and suffering and a commentary on the Apocalypse following ideas of Joachim of Fiore,* with severe attacks upon the papacy and those Franciscans who abandoned rigid observance of the vow of poverty. For his part in the poverty controversy and failure to be reconciled to his order, John XXII* transferred him to the Benedictines (1317). Charged with heresy, he fled Avignon (1325). He preached against John XXII at Como in 1329; otherwise nothing is known of his last years.

UBIQUITARIANISM. This doctrine, derived by Luther from a variety of patristic and medieval sources, asserts that Christ is present in His human nature everywhere and at all times. The view was developed by the Reformer in two important works of 1527 and 1528 to uphold his belief in the Real Presence in the Eucharist.* Calvin and Melanchthon both recoiled from the doctrine, and Zwingli flatly denied it. It was hotly debated by Lutheran scholars of the Swabian and Saxon schools till the intellectual trends of the later seventeenth century caused christological argument to recede into the background.

UCHIMURA, KANZO (1861-1930). Founder of the Japanese non-church movement. The first son of a samurai (warrior-knight) family, he entered Sapporo Agricultural College, but within three months was won to Christianity by the zealous evangelism of students of Dr. W.S. Clark.* Under Uchimura's leadership the "Sapporo Band" became the first independent Japanese church in 1881. The years 1884-88 he spent mostly in New England, and on his return to Japan he became a prominent interpreter of Western culture and literature, and a fearless prophet of social righteousness, denouncing evils in society, government, churches, and missions. He is best known as founder and exponent of nondenominational Japanese Christianity, called mukyokai (non-church movement), and for his greatest legacy: a twenty-two-volumed Bible commentary—the fruit of his first love, the study of the Bible.

DAVID MICHELL

UDALL, JOHN (1560?-1592). Elizabethan Puritan divine, sometimes called "Uvedale." Educated at Christ's and Trinity College, Cambridge, where one of his friends was John Penry,* he served as a curate from 1584 at Kingston-on-Thames and was soon known as a Puritan. For the publication of his views he was summoned before the Court of High Commission at Lambeth, but was not severely punished. This was due in part to the help of aristocratic friends, such as the countess of Warwick. Still at Kingston, he continued to adopt a critical attitude toward the prelates and the church, and it was noted that he continued his friendship with Penry, who was implicated in the production of the *Marprelate Tracts.

After being deprived of his living in 1588, Udall accepted an invitation to minister at Newcastle-on-Tyne. After a year there he was accused of complicity in the production of the Marprelate Tracts and summoned to appear before the Privy Council in London in January 1590. As a result he was put in prison until July, when he was tried at the Croydon Assizes, accused of the authorship of two anonymous tracts, A Demonstration of the Truth of the Discipline... (1588) and The State of the Church of England (1588). Later he was also tried at Southwark Assizes, found guilty of felony, and sentenced to death. Several eminent people, including Sir Walter Ralegh, tried to get him released. Eventually the governors of the Turkey Company offered to send him to Syria as a chaplain, but in June 1592 when all was set for his release he fell ill and died. Apart from his controversial writings, he did publish important works revealing his skill in Hebrew; the Commentary on Lamentations (1595), for example, was later highly prized by James I of England.

PETER TOON

UDALL, NICHOLAS (1505-1556). English scholar and dramatist. Going from Winchester College to Oxford in 1520, he gained a reputation for making Latin verses and for being favorably disposed to Lutheranism. In 1534 he was appointed headmaster of Eton, but was removed seven years later for "unnatural crime." After some time in jail he held benefices in the Church of England. He translated the first volume of Erasmus's NT into English which was published in 1548. He also wrote a tract against the rebels who opposed the first Edwardian Book of Common Prayer. When Mary Tudor came to the throne he reverted to Roman Catholicism, and later became head of Westminster School, but died shortly afterward. His best-known work is a play Ralph Roister Doister, probably written for presentation by the students at Eton. W.S. REID

ULFILAS (Ulphilas) (c.311-c.381). Bishop of "the Christians in Gothia." Hard facts about him are scarce and amount to little more than that he translated a large part of the Bible from Greek into Gothic, involving him in the devising of a new alphabet, and that he took a leading part in the conversion of the Visigoths to a form of Arianism.* He is said to have come from north of the Danube; been consecrated (c.341) at the instigation of Eusebius of Nicomedia,* Arian bishop of Constantinople; obtained imperial permission to move his people into Roman territory south of the Danube to escape persistent persecution; and been conciliatory when Theodosius I* restored Nicene orthodoxy to the Roman Empire in 379. J.D. DOUGLAS

ULLMANN, KARL (1796-1865). German Lutheran theologian. He was deeply influenced by Schleiermacher* and Neander* and served as professor of theology in Heidelberg University from 1821, with the exception of a seven-year interlude at Halle (1829-36). Ullmann was the leading advocate of the theology of mediation (Vermittlungstheologie), and in contrast to rationalism he stressed the significance of salvation through Jesus. He also occupied several posts in the Baden church, including director of the consistory (1856-61). He tried to influence the Baden church in the direction of Pietism by introducing changes in the confession, order of worship, and catechism, and this led to his overthrow by liberals. In 1848 he assisted in founding the German Evangelical Kirchentag. RICHARD V. PIERARD

ULRICH (c.890-973). Bishop of Augsburg. His chief source of fame is that he is known as the first "saint" whose canonization was decreed by a pope (John XV), after an account of Ulrich's life and miracles had been submitted to the Lateran Synod in 993. A letter which circulated in the eleventh century against clerical celibacy and ascribed to him has been shown to be a forgery. The principal, albeit brief, source for his life is the biography by his contemporary, Gebhard, provost of Augsburg Cathedral. This reveals that Ulrich was firmly committed to the policy of Emperor Otto I,* and was a reforming bishop.

ULTRAMONTANISM. A movement of Catholic revival, especially after the French Revolution, which rediscovered and hoped to reimplement the unity and independence of the Roman Church under the papacy. This reassertion of Catholic Christian faith found inspiration in the pre-Renaissance Christian Commonwealth and the Catholic Reformation of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The motifs of Romanticism, especially the new awareness of the medieval, were contributory. The movement, situated mainly in France but also in S Germany and England, wanted to terminate the power over the church of Enlightenment rationalism, especially as this was realized in the secularist state domination of the church since Louis XIV's time. This implied a renunciation of Gallicanism.*

The French Revolution was the decisive moment. Structurally Ultramontanism meant centralization of the church under absolute papal authority, coupled by independence of the Roman Church from state control and where possible subordination of the state and the rest of society to papal Catholic dogmatic and moral principles. The term, used derisively since the seventeenth century, implied attachment to Rome i.e., "beyond the mountains" (the Alps). The movement was shaped by the resistance of Pius VII* to Napoleon, by the support of subsequent popes, and public figures such as Joseph de Maistre* and Louis de Bonald, and Cardinal Manning* in England, by the reestablishment of the Jesuits* (1814), and the establishment of new orders, but especially by the singular devotion of countless parish clergy and faithful.

Because of its antirevolutionary role, Roman Catholicism was linked to hierarchical and legitimist societal ideals, the alliance of Throne and Altar. Pius IX* led the movement by his obvious Catholic devotion, exemplified by the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* of Mary (1854), by his resistance to the attacks on his temporal (political) power (1859-70), and especially by the dogma of papal infallibility* (1870). Vatican I* (1869-70) meant the official triumph of Ultramontanism as the church's stand and showed its view of the proper relation between pope and general council. The newfound spiritual power was the sine qua non of Leo XIII's* profound social encyclicals.

UNAMUNO, MIGUEL DE (1864-1937). Spanish scholar and writer. Born in Bilbao and educated at Madrid, he became professor of Greek at Salamanca, where he was later rector at different times and where he spent most of his working life. For his political opinions, which clashed with those of the ruling dictatorship, he was in 1924 exiled to the Canary Islands, spent some time in France, and did not return to Spain for six years. In due course, however, he became as much the critic of the socialists as of the monarchists.

He continually sent words to war in the service of ideas. "My painful duty," he said, "is to irritate people. We must sow in men the seeds of doubt, of distrust, of disquiet, even of despair." The world contained much that he disliked: parochialism, complacency, hypocrisy, dogmatism, and useless tradition. Although a religious man who called himself a Catholic and denounced twentieth-century materialism, he was regarded with alarm by the church and two of his books were placed on the Index.* He was described by some as a Catholic heart at war with the Protestant spirit. Out of his mystical and philosophical preoccupations and his mastery of some sixteen languages came a stream of publications: essays, tragedies, novels, religious poems, his uneasy spirit reflected in some of the titles—The Tragic Sense of Life in Men and in Peoples (ET 1926) and The Agony of Christianity (1928), with its reminder that Christ had not come to bring peace but a sword. It has been widely suggested that his San Manuel Bueno, mártir (1933; ET 1956), with its treatment of an unbelieving priest, expresses his own longing for immortality.

UNCTION. A term for anointing with oil, used at baptism (and confirmation), ordination, coronations, consecrations of churches, on dead bodies, and on the sick. Called "chrism,"* it was linked with baptism almost universally from early times until the Reformation. It originally meant the consecration of Christians to the royal priesthood. It was also associated with the Spirit, especially when "laying on of hands" was dying out, signifying the gift of the Spirit at Christ's baptism.

For unction of the sick, the NT warrant was Mark 6:13; James 5:14f. Early references are many, and from the fifth century it is even more often cited, until Bede* could represent the rite as well established. The term "extreme unction" appeared first in Peter Lombard,* and from the twelfth century it was commonly regarded as a preparation for death, though in the Latin Rite it looks hopefully "for the health of body and soul." From the thirteenth century it was numbered among the seven sacraments.* Aquinas* expounded the medieval doctrine, and official Roman Catholic teaching was established at the Council of Trent.*

The Greek Orthodox Church called the rite Euchelaion ("oil of prayer"). When administered in full the ceremony is very long, involving seven priests. Primarily aimed at physical cure, it is also frequently received as a preparation for Communion, even by those not ill. Other Eastern Churches have the rite, though it has gone out of use among the Ethiopians and Nestorians.

In Anglican usage, the First Prayer Book (1549) permitted anointing if the sick desired it. Later versions omitted it, though the Nonjurors* restored it. The Scottish and American prayer books (1929) and others make provision for it.

See F.W. Puller, The Anointing of the Sick in Scripture and Tradition (1904).

UNDERHILL, EVELYN (1875-1941). English mystic. Daughter of a distinguished London barrister, she was educated at King's College, London, of which she was later made fellow. She was reared an Anglican, and her spiritual life began in 1907 while visiting a Franciscan convent. She professed conversion in 1911 with leanings toward the Roman Church. Mysticism, her first book, appeared that year, followed by The Mystic Way in 1913. Friedrich Von Hügel* was the divide in her life, and she was under his close direction for four years until he died in 1925—experiencing Christianity most personally and making a commitment to the Church of England. From 1911 her life was religious work: personal cases, social work, addresses, retreats, and books. Two volumes (The Spiral Way and The Path of the Eternal Wisdom) she published under the pseudonym "John Cordelier." She produced critical editions and translations of Ruysbroeck, Hilton, and other mystics and contributed to periodicals. Practical Mysticism (1915) and The Essentials of Mysticism (1920) were guidebooks. Her great work was Worship (1937) which includes the Orthodox Churches and their liturgy.

UNDERWOOD, HORACE GRANT (1859-1916). Dutch Reformed missionary to Korea. Born in London, he emigrated to America in 1872 with his family and in 1881 graduated from New York University, and three years later from New Brunswick Theological Seminary. He studied also in France. He went to Korea in 1885 under the Presbyterian Board for Foreign Missions, and four years later married the queen's physician. He mastered the language, taught theology, helped establish a hospital and college, and also the Sai Mun An Church. A trusted confidant of the royal family, through his persistent efforts he brought more freedom for Christian missions. He published several volumes about Korea before his death at Atlantic City, New Jersey.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

UNIAT(E) CHURCHES. Eastern Christian churches in communion with Rome who have retained their own liturgies, liturgical language, and ecclesiastical customs and rites—e.g., Communion in both kinds, baptism by immersion, marriage of the clergy. The name is derived from the Latin unio through the Polish unia, and was used in a derogatory sense by Russian and Greek Orthodox opponents of the Union of Brest-Litovsk (1595-96), when Byzantine Christians in the province of Kiev adhered to the Roman see. The term is now a common expression for all Roman Catholics of any Eastern rite. Its hostile flavor has not been lost, and it is not used in any Roman Catholic documents or by the groups so designated. The churches fall into several categories:

(1) Antiochene Rite. (a) The Maronites were the earliest Uniates, being Syrian Christians named from John Maron, patriarch of Antioch (eighth century), originally Monothelites who renounced Monothelitism and united with Rome (1182). They use the Syriac "St. James" and other Anaphoras,* and elect their own patriarch whose see town is Jebeil. (b) The Syrian Uniates are descended from the "Jacobites"* (Monophysites) who established relations with Rome in the sixteenth century, but who seem to have disappeared c.1700. The present church owes its existence to Mar Michael Garweh, a Roman Catholic who became archbishop of Aleppo (1783). (c) The Malankarese Church dates from 1930, resulting from an amalgamation of some Malabar Christians* with Jacobites in the seventeenth century, who negotiated for reunion with Rome in 1925.

(2) Chaldean Rite. (a) Armenian Uniates. There were always some Armenians who recognized Rome's authority, but during the Crusades (1198-1291) there was more formal contact under the patriarch of Cilicia at Beirut. From 1741 they had their own hierarchy and a patriarch at Constantinople. (b) Chaldean Uniates. Descended from the ancient Nestorians,* a group of which from Turkey and Persia were united with Rome in 1551, they had their first patriarch of Babylon at Mosul in George Hormuzd, appointed by Pope Pius VIII (1830). (c) The Malabar Christians: see separate article.

(3) Alexandrine Rite. (a) The Coptic Uniates, a small church numbering c.4,000 date from 1741 when Athanasius, Coptic bishop of Jerusalem, joined the Roman Catholics. (b) The Ethiopian Uniates, dating from 1839, live mostly in Eritrea and are governed by a vicar-apostolic. They observe the rites and canon law of the old church of Ethiopia.*

(4) Byzantine Rite. (a) The *Ruthenians of E Galicia and Subcarpathian Russia date from the Union of Brest-Litovsk (1595-96). Since 1946 they have been aggregated to the Russian Orthodox Church. (b) The Rumaics, or Romanians of Transylvania, linked up with Rome under the archbishop of Abba Julia (1701). Since 1948 they have been aggregated to the Orthodox Church of Romania.* (c) There are also very small groups of Hungarians (reunited with Rome in 1595), Yugoslavs (1611), *Melchites (1724), Bulgars (1860), Greeks (1860).

(5) The Italo-Greek-Albanian community of S Italy, which has never separated from Rome, are permitted to follow similar practices, under the bishop of Lungro.

UNIFORMITY, ACTS OF. These British parliamentary measures were four in number.

(1) The Act of 1549. This statute of Edward VI* commanded the use of the First Book of Common Prayer in English churches. Various penalties were imposed on clergy who failed to conform: a fine and imprisonment for the first offense, deprivation of one's living and imprisonment for the second, and life-imprisonment for the third. The act also declared that all services save in the universities and private devotions were to be in English.

(2) The Act of 1552. Another statute of Edward VI, but passed during the Protectorate of Northumberland, a time of growing political and religious conservatism, this enforced the use of the Revised Prayer Book and extended the penalties of the former act to include absence from church services and attendance at private conventicles. The acts of 1549 and 1552 were both repealed by the Catholic queen, Mary Tudor* in October 1553.

(3) The Act of 1559. This enforced Queen Elizabeth's* compromise religious settlement and regulated the ecclesiastical discipline of the Church of England for the next ninety years. It repealed all the legislation of Queen Mary which had restored Roman practices and commanded the use of a slightly modified edition of the 1552 Prayer Book. Penalties were again laid down, and ecclesiastical dress and ornaments were to be such as obtained in 1549, the queen as head of the church reserving for herself the privilege of introducing further needful ceremonies and rites—a provision to which the Puritans were later strongly to object.

(4) The Act of 1662. This was the most important of the laws restoring the Anglican establishment passed by the Cavalier Parliament of Charles II* following the Restoration, and the first of those acts of systematic repression known as the Clarendon Code.* It commanded universal adoption of a slightly revised form of the Elizabethan Prayer Book and received royal assent on 19 May. Before the ensuing St. Bartholomew's Day (24 August), all ministers had publicly to give their "unfeigned consent and assent" to the Book, and obtain episcopal ordination if not so ordained. A declaration of loyalty and repudiation of the National Covenant* had also to be taken. These provisions led to the "Great Ejection" of about 2,000 Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist ministers, the final parting of the ways between Anglicans and Puritans, and the consequent birth of English Nonconformity. So far as Dissenters were concerned, the Act was made practically inoperative by the Toleration Act of William and Mary (1689), but it remained effective in regard to the Church of England, though it was later modified in several directions—most notably during the archiepiscopate of A.C. Tait.* Historically, Broad Churchmen have valued it as providing for unity based on comprehensiveness within the Established Church, and evangelicals have held to it as a safeguard for the Thirty-Nine Articles,* but High Churchmen, especially of the more extreme sort, have found it vexatious and restrictive.

UNITARIANISM. A system of religious thought which rejects the doctrine of the Trinity and the deity of Christ, and seeks to show that genuinely religious community can be created without doctrinal conformity. It has evolved from emphasis on scriptural authority to a foundation on reason and experience. Unitarians believe in the goodness of human nature, criticize doctrines of the Fall, the Atonement, and eternal damnation, and require only openness to divine inspiration. In polity they are congregationalists.

As an organized movement Unitarianism, first in Poland and Hungary, dates from the Anabaptists* of the Reformation, but not until recently have there been Unitarian denominations. In the early church, implicit anti-Trinitarianism was expressed in Dynamic Monarchianism,* Arianism,* and Adoptianism,* and later in Paulician* circles. Severely limited by Nicene orthodoxy, it grew nonetheless in certain areas, notably Spain, until the condemnation of Felix of Urgel* by the Frankish Church in A.D. 799. It was revived in the Reformation period and was most obvious among Socinians.* It spread particularly in Poland and Hungary in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and later in England and America. Prominent anti-Trinitarian proponents were Girgio Blandrata, Francis David, Michael Servetus,* Fausto Sozzini, and John Biddle.* Servetus died at the stake for his views, but others fared better. In Poland the Piedmontese physician Blandrata dominated the early phases of the movement from 1558 until 1563. In 1565, Polish Unitarians were excluded from the synod of the Reformed Church, but under the Italian Sozzini from 1579 until 1604 they created their own synods as the "Minor Church" and issued the Unitarian Racovian Catechism* in 1605. They built a church college at Racow and had about 125 congregations, but after the death of Sozzini (1604) they lost influence. In 1638 Jesuits took over their college, and in 1658 Unitarians were expelled from Poland.

Meanwhile Blandrata had gone to Hungary as court physician (1563) and won his monarch John Sigismund to anti-Trinitarianism. David, made Unitarian bishop in 1568, had troubles after the king's death in 1570, partly because Blandrata was now retreating from Unitarianism, partly because David opposed prayer to Christ. Blandrata was instrumental in having him imprisoned, and in 1579 David died in the dungeon. Although harassed by the government, Unitarians created a common confession in 1638, and later were recognized.

English Unitarianism is traced to John Biddle, although no separate congregation existed until Theophilus Lindsey formed Essex Chapel, London, in 1774. A notable contemporary of Lindsey was Joseph Priestley,* the scientist, who ministered to Unitarian congregations in Leeds and later Birmingham before a mob, angry at his support of the French Republic, destroyed his chapel and his belongings. In 1794 he went to the United States and formed a church at Northumberland, Pennsylvania. English Unitarians were recognized by law in 1813; the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed in 1825; and in 1881 the national conference was created. One vehicle of Unitarian expression was the Robert Hibbert Fund, which sponsored the Hibbert Journal and the Hibbert Lectures.

The most successful Unitarian church body has been in the USA. Although prominent Americans like Thomas Jefferson* held anti-Trinitarian ideas, and although the first Unitarian congregation—King's Chapel, Boston—was formed out of the oldest Episcopal parish in America when the rector, James Freeman, ignored references in the Book of Common Prayer to the Trinity and the divinity of Christ (1785), American Unitarianism developed in the Congregational churches of E Massachusetts. Anti-Trinitarians won their first victory in 1805 when Henry Ware, a liberal, was appointed to the theological chair at Harvard. The Dedham decision by the Massachusetts Supreme Court in 1818 allowed the selection of unorthodox ministers by all voters in the parish, and many churches went over to Unitarianism. Prominent leader of the group was W.E. Channing* who in an 1819 sermon described the true church as creedless: "men made better, made holy, by His religion." Unitarians created a missionary and publication society, the American Unitarian Association, in 1825, but it was not until activities with the United States Sanitary Commission in the Civil War that they built a stronger national organization. Their first national conference was held in 1865.

In the early years much conflict existed over whether Jesus was divine or if the Bible was the Word of God, and that, combined with Unitarianism's alleged Rationalism, prompted R.W. Emerson* to break with the church in 1838 and to help form Transcendentalism.* Traditionally centered at Harvard Divinity School, American Unitarianism created other seminaries and preparatory schools, and in later years came much closer to Emerson's position. Its foreign work was carried out through the International Association for Liberal Christianity and Religious Freedom in Utrecht, Holland. Its growing national concern was manifest in 1940, not only in the creation of the Unitarian Service Committee and the United Unitarian Appeal, but also in its support of social justice movements. Unitarians were prominent, for example, in both the antislavery and civil rights movements of the USA. In 1961 it merged with Universalism* to form the Unitarian Universalist Association.

Unitarianism, briefly, has grown along rational, not biblical, lines. Begun by anti-Trinitarians, many of whom were otherwise orthodox, it has evolved into a creedless movement stressing the many forms of divine revelation and the inherent goodness of man. Many have held Unitarian ideas, therefore, without belonging to a Unitarian church. Unitarianism now stresses the religion of the Sermon on the Mount and the oneness of the human family.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. An American denomination, organized in 1800, which developed out of the activities of P.W. Otterbein* and Martin Boehm* among German settlements, chiefly in Pennsylvania, and out of conferences they held with other "United ministers." The new Methodist-type denomination was evangelical, Arminian, and perfectionist in doctrine, and episcopal in government. Otterbein and Boehm were the first bishops. When a new constitution was adopted in 1889, a group separated as the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution). In 1946 the parent body merged with the Evangelical Church, with which it had much in common, forming the Evangelical United Brethren.* The latter united with the Methodist Church in 1968 to create the United Methodist Church.*

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA. Union negotiations between the Methodist Church and the Presbyterian Church in Canada were initiated in 1902 when the highest courts of these two prominent Protestant denominations agreed to initiate joint discussions. The union was consummated in solemn assembly in Toronto on 10 June 1925. It included the Congregationalist Churches in Canada and some 3,000 union churches, most of which had existed in the West for some time prior to this time. A large number of Presbyterian churches reorganized immediately to form the Presbyterian Church of Canada.* Nonetheless, the Union proved to be a successful one. It is delineated by a Basis of Union which seeks to incorporate the best traditions in Reformed theology and polity.

A presbyterial structure was developed which maintains a healthy balance between the various elements of the three uniting bodies in the nature and function of the various ecclesiastical courts. The general council, normally meeting every other year, is the chief legislative assembly. It is representative of the various lower courts and consists of an equal number of clergy and laymen. The ten conferences are in turn made up of Presbyteries in which local congregations have their membership. The basic structure of a congregation is the official board, which combines the session and the board of stewards. It is generally chaired by the minister, who is a member of the session. Items of concern and interest to the membership of the congregation are dealt with at the annual congregational meeting.

Ministers are ordained by the conference upon recommendation from colleges and presbyteries under whose oversight they trained for ministry. After an initial period of settlement every minister is eligible to be called to a charge, but he may also submit himself to the settlement committee of conference. Evangelism and social service of the United Church, the missionary outreach at home and abroad, and other important functions of the church are under the direction of boards and divisions, centralized in Toronto, but reproduced on conference and presbytery level throughout the church. Ecclesiastical affairs are laid down in The Manual of the United Church.

Experiments in restructuring courts of the church have introduced greater diversity and some amount of flexibility in recent years. Serious union negotiations have led to close cooperation with the Anglican Church in Canada and make the United Church one of the foremost agents of ecumenical concern on the Canadian scene.

The United Church is officially represented by the moderator, who is elected at the meetings of the general council for a two-year term. The secretary of general council plays an important administrative role. The United Church of Canada is in fraternal association with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* with Methodist world bodies, and with the World Council of Churches.* Its motto, Ut Omnes Unum Sint, seeks to express the goal of the church to act as an agent of unity among Christians in Canada. Several unions with other Christian communions have enriched the church in its history since 1925.

UNITED EMPIRE LOYALISTS. Lord Dorchester, governor-general of British North America, proposed in 1789 to honor all those who had by their act adhered to the unity of the empire. These emigrants to British North America who came during and immediately after the American Revolution and settled in the Niagara Peninsula and in Nova Scotia were inscribed on a list and entitled to distinguish themselves by affixing the letters U.E. to their names. Under Lord Simcoe, further emigrants from the thirteen colonies came to British North America, but these are not properly called United Empire Loyalists. It is generally estimated that one-third of the inhabitants of the thirteen colonies was against the Revolution. However, no exact numbers are known for those who migrated north. A conservative estimate places the number of emigrants at the time at about 50,000. The Loyalist migrations altered the distribution of French and British in favor of the British.

UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. This body was formed in 1900 by the union of a majority of the Free Church of Scotland* and the United Presbyterian Church.* Unsuccessful efforts at union had been broken off in 1873 because of the strength of opposition in the Free Church. Thereafter both churches, which were opposed to the Church of Scotland,* were active in a disestablishment campaign aimed at the political parties. It failed, but it did something to bring the two groups together. Other factors were at work: revolt against hyper-Calvinism which found expression in doctrinal Declaratory Acts,* reverent biblical criticism, the spiritual awakening under Moody and Sankey, and changes in public worship by the introduction of instrumental music and hymns. In 1898 both churches accepted a modified formula to be signed by ministers and office-bearers by which they pledged their adherence to the fundamental doctrines and principles of the Church. The next two years were spent in fruitless efforts to bring in those who were to continue as the Free Church.

In 1929 the United Free Church united with the Church of Scotland to bring into being a church which had within its fold four-fifths of the churchgoing population of Scotland. As in 1900, however, a minority remained outside the union and called themselves the United Free Church (Continuing). With over ninety congregations and a membership of some 17,000, the denomination in recent years has entered into discussions about union with the Church of Scotland and several Scottish non-Presbyterian bodies.

J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. One of the three Methodist Churches in England to participate in the union of 1932. In 1907 the Methodist New Connexion, the Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Churches came together in a single communion known as the United Methodist Church.

The Methodist New Connexion* was the first to secede from the parent body of Wesleyans. In 1797 Alexander Kilham* had unsuccessfully petitioned the conference to allow Methodists to receive Communion from their own preachers. He founded the "New Itinerancy" or "Methodist New Connexion" with equal representation of ministers and laymen in its oversight.

The Bible Christians* were so called because of their attachment to the Scriptures in drawing up the rules which governed their societies. Their Cornish founder, William O'Bryan, prefixed "Arminian" to the title as an indication of his theological standpoint. In his evangelistic zeal he launched out independently in a way which brought him under the discipline of the Stratton quarterly meeting. In 1815 he eventually established his own circuit at Week St. Mary, with James Thorne as his coadjutor. In 1829 O'Bryan himself left the connexion after a dispute over the leadership.

The United Methodist Free Churches date back to 1857, when the Wesleyan Reformers and the Wesleyan Methodist Association amalgamated. The Grand Central Association came into being in 1834 in protest against the growing authoritarianism of the Wesleyan Conference. In 1836 they were joined by the Protestant Methodists, formed in 1827 because of similar objections, and in successive years by the Arminian or Faith Methodist of the Midlands and some Independent Methodists from Wales and the North. Another dissident group known as Wesleyan Reformers had also seceded, and in 1857 most of them joined forces with the Wesleyan Methodist Association to comprise the United Methodist Free Churches, although a rump remained separate to establish the Wesleyan Reform Union in 1859.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (Scotland). A body formed in 1847 by the union of the United Secession Church* and the Relief Church,* representing respectively the main bodies of the first secession (1733) and the second secession (1761) from the Church of Scotland.* The union was not effected without difficulty, for the two churches differed considerably in nature. The former had a strictness of ecclesiastical discipline whereas the latter was more broadly evangelical and laxer in doctrine and discipline by the standards of the times. The United Presbyterian Church had 518 congregations and was largely confined to the cities and towns. In 1900 it united with the Free Church of Scotland* to form the United Free Church.* Among its contributions to the Christian cause was its zeal for missionary work in Calabar (now Nigeria) and India.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (USA). The largest of the American Presbyterian denominations following the merger in 1958 of the Presbyterian Church, USA and the United Presbyterian Church of North America. The roots of the denomination were in seventeenth-century immigration from Scotland and Ireland. The first essentially Presbyterian church was organized in 1629 in the Massachusetts Bay Colony with Samuel Skelton as pastor. Francis Makemie,* an early missionary, provided organizational structure for Presbyterians.

The first presbytery was formed in Philadelphia in 1706 by seven ministers representing ten congregations and 800 members, and with no official relationship to the church in Scotland. A synod of four presbyteries was organized in 1716. Immigration from Scotland and Northern Ireland and the Great Awakening* increased the numbers. The need to train new ministers led to the founding of academies, the most famous of which was William Tennent's* "Log College" in Neshaminy. It was replaced in 1747 by the College of New Jersey, later Princeton University.

Early tensions divided the church into three groups: the traditional and formal Scotch-Irish, the Log College men, and men trained in New England. The issues were: emotionalism in revivals, educational qualifications of ministers, polity, and itinerant ministers. George Whitefield's* preaching in 1739-40 aided the American groups. The basic struggle theologically was over latitude in interpreting the Westminster Confession,* a question resolved in 1729 by the Adopting Act which made the Westminster Confession and Catechisms official dogma. Disputes over revivalism and licensing untrained men to preach brought division into Old and New Side from 1741 to 1758, but the groups reunited in 1758.

In May 1789 the general assembly was formed in Philadelphia. John Witherspoon* presided. By 1900 the membership had increased to about one million members. This reflected nineteenth-century immigration patterns, revivals, and the growth and prosperity of the country. Frontiers were revival areas where men like James McGready* and Charles Finney* labored. The Plan of Union* for cooperation on the frontier with Congregationalists from 1801 to 1858 benefited Presbyterians most.

New growth led to the formation of Sunday schools and founding of foreign missions programs, but the revivals brought dissatisfaction from those who felt they sacrificed good theology and that the resultant church growth led to weakening the qualifications for ministers. These issues led to the secession of the Cumberland Presbyterians* in 1810 and brought hostility between the conservative Old School and the New School. Growth also led to the founding of seminaries to maintain the standards of the ministry—Princeton in 1812, and in the ensuing twenty years Western, Lane, and one in Chicago.

Division between Old School and New School lay partly in the influence on a growing number of ministers, such as Albert Barnes,* associated with the theology of Samuel Hopkins* and Nathaniel Taylor* and their weakening of the doctrine of original sin. It was affected also by slavery; the Plan of Union; polity differences; relation to voluntary societies such as the American Bible Society and the issue this raised of the nature of the church; and freedom in interpreting the Westminster Confession. These factors brought a split in the 1837 general assembly. The two groups finally reunited in 1870. Most of the Cumberland Presbyterians rejoined the main body in 1906.

The church in the twentieth century faced the effects of urban life with growing social concern, increased lay leadership, and a growing secularization of the clergy. The democratic character of the church made it increasingly difficult to discipline men or to obtain consensus on social and theological questions. Mass evangelism, with men like (non-Presbyterian) Billy Graham,* continued to add numbers to the church, as did the population growth and shift to the suburbs and the Western part of the country. By 1971, despite declines, some 13,000 ministers were serving nearly 8,700 churches with over 3.2 million members.

A strong missions program led by men such as R.E. Speer* declined in the latter part of the century because of conservative dissatisfaction with mission goals and because of the changing attitude toward missions in developing countries. Historical distinctives lost ground, paving the way for church mergers and federations in which E.C. Blake* took a major role, both as general secretary of the World Council of Churches and as proposer of the plan known as the Consultation on Church Union.

The conservative-liberal antithesis remained, focused in the fundamentalist-liberal controversy; among the names associated with it were H.E. Fosdick* and J.G. Machen.*

UNITED REFORMED CHURCH. Britain's first union across denominational lines took place in 1972 when the Congregational Church in England and Wales merged with the Presbyterian Church of England. Negotiations had gone on since 1945. Less than 20 percent of the Congregationalists had exercised their right to vote and, on the other hand, some Congregationalists planned to opt out and continue as a Congregational association. In the much smaller Presbyterian Church, the two congregations in the Channel Islands declined to enter the new body and have been accepted into the Church of Scotland. The URC is divided into twelve provinces, each with a moderator, and sixty-one districts. Ministers number 1,100, and estimated membership is 200,000. Overseas work is carried out through the Council for World Mission (Congregational and Reformed). J.D. DOUGLAS

UNITED SECESSION CHURCH. Formed in Scotland in 1820, it was a union of the New Light segments from Burghers* and Anti-burghers, which latter groups were children of the 1733 Secession under Ebenezer Erskine* and his brother Ralph. Though traditional Secession discipline was to some extent retained in the new body, the practice of renewing the National Covenant* and the Solemn League and Covenant* was abandoned. The "United Secession Synod" comprised some 280 congregations. In 1847 it united with the Relief Church* to form the United Presbyterian Church.*

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. Christianity in the United States, like the Christian faith in other ages and lands, reveals the marks of time and space. The discovery of America and the birth of Protestantism were almost contemporaneous events. This fact helps explain the prevailing "protestant" character of American Christianity transplanted from the Old World. The major space factor is found in the fact that for almost three centuries of her history America and her churches were in continuous contact with frontier conditions and frontier needs. This combination of time and space shaped a unique type of Christianity, clearly distinguishable from the Christian faith in other ages and in other realms.

The English policy of private enterprise in establishing new colonies, and the westward spread of America's peoples, gave ample opportunity for the spread of religious diversity in the new land. From the settlement at Jamestown (1607) to the Civil War this denominational diversity was almost altogether within the Protestant, and chiefly the Puritan,* tradition. The second half of the nineteenth century saw much greater variety appear in the emergence of indigenous religious cults and large numbers of immigrants from Europe, most of whom had no part in the Puritan past.

The Founding Fathers of the new nation recognized this religious pluralism in the colonies and wrote into the First Amendment to the Constitution the separation of church and state, "the fair experiment," as Thomas Jefferson called it: no single church could stake a firm claim to a privileged status in the new nation. Thus the adoption of the First Amendment to the Constitution (1791) safeguarded the freedom for all by granting privileges to none.

The religious needs of the frontier coupled with this disestablishment policy of the new government forced the churches to employ new techniques, based on voluntaryism*, for winning people to the Christian faith. Revivals proved to be the highly successful means of planting vital Christianity across the continent. The Great Awakening,* the successful colonial crusade for souls, became the model for a series of spiritual awakenings spanning America's religious history.

Revivals consisted of appeals for conversions to Christ and His church, They were aimed at individuals. Thus the independent-minded pioneer found a kindred spirit in the leaders of the spiritual awakenings. This expression of individualism in religion, as well as politics, nurtured an almost endless assortment of voluntary societies aimed at bringing the kingdom of God to the American continent.

These characteristics of Christianity in the USA —religious pluralism, separation of church and state, revivalism,* and individualism—are (as well as social activism and ecumenism) the chief marks of America's religious uniqueness.

The history of Christianity on the American shores may be divided into four major periods: the Formative Years 1607-1776, the Frontier or National Years 1776-1860, the Critical Years 1860-1914, and the Post-Protestant Years 1914 to the present.

(1) The Formative Years 1607-1776. The Protestant Reformation* led to a host of national churches, sects, and dissenters. The refuge for many of those persecuted for conscience in Europe was colonial America. While politics, economics, and social advantage had their part in the early growth of the colonies, religion was responsible for the founding of more colonies than any other single factor. These colonies were English colonies, and the multiplicity of religious bodies within them was largely the result of a policy of toleration pursued by English authorities. The colonies were also commercial ventures. To be profitable they needed people to clear the forests and plant the fields. Thus colonial authorities promoted religious toleration in the New World as an inducement for persecuted peoples.

To this economic advantage we must add the growing religious diversity within England herself. Through the 1600s the British were struggling toward greater religious toleration at home. Many religious minorities, caught up in this struggle, chose the opportunities of the New World over the continued conflicts in their homeland. Although religious diversity early became a fact of life in the colonies, this multiplicity of sects was within an overarching unity. The vast majority of the religious groups stood within a common tradition, British in background and Puritan in theology. The first census in 1790 revealed this British predominance: 70 percent of the population was of English stock, and an additional 15 percent was of Scottish or Scotch-Irish descent. Even among the remaining non-British minorities—Germans, Dutch, French, Swedes—the Protestant background prevailed.

Once firmly rooted, this American Puritanism was naturally subject to change. The Great Awakening, in particular, gave Puritanism in the new land a decidedly evangelical character, even as it helped to create an American religious consensus. New England, where Puritanism first took root, is the best illustration of the difficulties encountered by Christians who attempted to maintain the traditional establishment idea. The first congregation in New England was the little Separatist group at Plymouth, planted in the New World by the 1620 landing of the Mayflower. Eight years later the much larger Puritan immigrations began in and around Boston. By securing a charter for the Massachusetts Bay Company and transporting it to the colony, the early Puritans were able to display to the whole world what a true church "after God's order" was like.

The first General Court of the colony (1631), composed of the governor and the freemen, linked the franchise with church membership. Five years later the court, in order to ensure religious uniformity, gave magistrates power over the churches. The clergy, however, through control of the franchise and through influence upon the magistrates, exerted considerable influence over public conduct. This functional alliance between magistrate and minister was the heart of the "holy commonwealth."

Dissent, however, was never far removed. Roger Williams,* who arrived in Boston in 1631, was among the first to challenge the Puritan "theocracy." He spread the idea that civil authority and spiritual authority should be separated. His persistence in this novelty led in 1635 to a sentence of banishment from the colony. By fleeing the colony in the middle of winter he was able, after securing land from the Indians, to settle at the present site of Providence, Rhode Island. After being joined shortly by others, he set up a new colony founded on the separation principle. Thus religious uniformity in New England was gravely threatened almost from the start. Other attempts at religious establishments—the Dutch in New Amsterdam and the Anglicans in the southern colonies—were even less successful than the Puritans in New England.

By the end of the century the shell of Puritan orthodoxy lingered in New England, but much of the spiritual vision of the first generation—a church of "visible saints"—had vanished. The recovery of a vital religious experience is the story of the Great Awakening.

(2) The Frontier Years 1776-1860. When winds of revolution filled the colonial air, many of the churches supported the cause of independence. The Congregationalists, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists were almost universally in favor of it. Understandably the Episcopalian Church suffered most. While more Episcopalians signed the Declaration of Independence than any other colonial denomination, the royal governors and other colonial officials were usually Church of England men and many Loyalists were found within the church. Because of the religious diversity in the colonies, the founding documents of the new nation banned any religious test for public office and separated the spheres of state and church. Although a few state constitutions were slow in following the lead of the national documents, notably Massachusetts till 1833, most Christians regarded the "experiment" in religious freedom a wise course.

The Constitution had hardly been adopted when people began streaming westward. By 1860 states were rapidly forming west of the Mississippi. This movement of population continued until the entire continent had been peopled. The denominations most successful in moving with the people and in establishing churches in the new territories became, understandably, the largest bodies in the new nation. The Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians proved most adaptable to the frontier, while a fourth denomination, the Disciples of Christ, was born in the Ohio Valley through the preaching of Barton W. Stone* and Alexander Campbell.*

The technique widely used in reaching the unchurched masses was revivalism, a type of preaching that sought to make listeners vividly aware of their eternal destiny and of the importance of a thoroughgoing conversion to the Christian faith. A special type of revivalistic meeting also came into being by 1800, the "camp meeting."* These meetings were great outdoor gatherings for preaching that lasted several days. First employed by Presbyterians, they later became a characteristic Methodist technique for inducing excitement and conversions. The revivalistic spirit was in time tamed and channeled into voluntary societies. These were extra-church agencies, formed for specific purposes by individuals and unrelated structurally to the denominations. Societies were created for establishing Sunday schools, publishing literature, founding academies, and advancing a host of social reforms.

By midcentury this combination of revivals and social reforms had created an evangelical mood that minimized denominational differences before the greater cause of advancing Christ's kingdom throughout the youthful nation. By 1850 the Methodists were the largest denominational body, with a membership nearing 1.5 million, followed by the Baptists with about a million and then the Presbyterians with about a half-million. Major challenges to this evangelical consensus were not long in coming. The generation just prior to the Civil War was marked by controversy and division among the denominations. The Roman Catholic Church, whose roots in America ran back to the founding of Maryland and to the earlier Franciscan missions in the Southwest, received large numbers of immigrants, especially from Ireland. This sudden influx of Catholics aroused Protestant fears. In a similar way Lutherans, who had shown a willingness to adopt the cooperative spirit of the revivalistic denominations, were thrown into new internal tensions after 1830 with the arrival of many conservative Lutherans from Germany.

The greatest cause of controversy, however, was the national slavery issue. By 1830 a far-reaching agricultural revolution in the South made the region dependent upon slave labor. At the same time a radical abolitionist movement in the North contributed to the widening breach between the two sections of the country. Most of the denominations were torn apart by the diverging ideologies. The Presbyterians, owing to the presence of theological problems, divided first in 1837. In 1845 southern Methodists and Baptists split and formed denominations. The divisions among Presbyterians and Baptists have yet to be healed.

(3) The Critical Years 1860-1914. During Reconstruction, various church agencies poured money and men into the South to bring religion and education to the masses of Negroes just released from slavery. A number of independent Negro churches also gave expression to the newfound freedom. Baptist and Methodist churches made the greatest appeal to the Negro; by the end of the century most Negro Christians could be found in the National Baptist Convention, the African Methodist Episcopal Church, or the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (see AMERICAN NEGRO CHURCHES).

The years following 1860 also witnessed continued waves of immigrations destined to change markedly the religious face of the USA. Large numbers of Scandinavians, especially in the upper Midwest, led to the formation of independent Lutheran churches—generally along nationality lines—and made Lutherans the third-largest Protestant denomination. Other immigrations from E and S Europe after 1880 resulted in millions of additional Roman Catholics in the USA.

The critical nature of these years is most evident, however, in the turmoil created by the influx of new ideas relating to the Bible. German Idealism and the evolutionary theory, as set forth by Charles Darwin* in his Origin of Species, had serious implications for the traditional view of God and creation; and higher criticism, which tested the authenticity of the biblical writings by the same methods used in testing other ancient literature, appeared to undermine the foundations of traditional evangelical supernaturalism. Positive or negative attitudes toward these new views of the Bible threatened to divide the evangelical denominations and paved the way for the controversy involving "modernists" and "fundamentalists" after the turn of the century.

A related conflict swirled around the emerging social conscience within the churches. Evangelical denominations, chiefly Methodists and Baptists, which had once been identified with the poor, were rapidly becoming churches of the upper middle class. At the same time, the industrial and urban society that arose after the Civil War was attracting the attention of certain Protestant leaders who called for the application of the principles of Jesus to the new industrial-urban problems. This new concern was labeled the "Social Gospel."* It found its most persuasive advocate in Walter Rauschenbusch* and its specific goals stated in the Social Creed of the Federal Council of Churches. Nor could traditional revivalism escape these pronounced changes in American society. Revivals became mass, urban, professional, and organized movements through the ministry of D.L. Moody* and Ira Sankey.* Then, supported by Moody's great reputation, the Bible school* and Bible conference movements rallied many conservatives attempting to stem the tide of liberal views of Scripture. This wedding of revivalism and biblical conservatism fashioned the cradle of twentieth-century fundamentalism.*

(4) The Post-Protestant Years 1914-1970. These conflicting views of the Bible and plans of social actions resulted in the fundamentalist-modernist debate of the 1920s. This controversy produced a fundamentalism largely interdenominational in character and major Protestant denominations led by men more concerned with programs of action than theological soundness.

Scarcely had modernism tasted a measure of victory over fundamentalism in the traditional evangelical denominations than it was faced with a new theological challenge. The 1930s disclosed a deepening criticism of modernism's basic affirmations. The new mood was difficult to characterize, but was given an able American statement in the writings of Reinhold Niebuhr.* It was often popularly called "Neoorthodoxy."* This new theology reasserted the sovereignty of God and repudiated the notion that man has almost unlimited potential for good. Neoorthodoxy also rediscovered the "original sin" of man, not in the sense of an act of disobedience by a man named Adam, but in the sense of man's universal moral failure. Finally, the new theological mood stressed the central importance of the Bible and Christ as indispensable mediators of God's special revelation to man.

The years between the two world wars also witnessed the growth of the ecumenical spirit through interdenominational cooperation, organic reunion, and confederation.* The Student Volunteer Movement* and the formation of the United Presbyterian Church,* USA, illustrate the first two methods. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, organized in 1908, was an early example of confederation. But the Federal Council gave way in 1950 to the more comprehensive National Council of Churches. In addition to the Federal Council, the new council embraced the Foreign Missions Conference of North America and the International Council of Religious Education and represented more than thirty denominations. Because of the long-standing differences with the Federal Council's liberal social orientation and doctrinal deficiencies, conservative evangelicals preferred to cooperate along the lines of voluntary agencies. The National Association of Evangelicals* (1942), the National Sunday School Association (1945), and the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association* (1945) were among the host of interdenominational agencies giving continued evidence of conservative cooperation.

The 1960s in the USA found the country filled with social unrest. Racial tensions and war-peace fevers were especially evident in the life of the churches. Churchmen were prominent in the public arena, demonstrating for racial justice or for peace in Vietnam. Against this background a "secular theology" arose which saw Christ as "a man for others" and the church's primary mission in terms of "humanizing" the social order. Conservatives, on the other hand, poured their energies into support of Billy Graham* Crusades or other evangelistic endeavors with the submerged hope that the world could be changed by the conversion of masses of individuals. These two emphases tended to polarize Christians into camps of "social activists" and "individual salvationists."

Late in the 1960s a rather unusual revival of fundamental Christianity erupted from the youth counterculture. The "Jesus Movement," as national magazines labeled it, was marked by remarkable conversions of former drug users, Bible study, some "speaking in tongues," and a lifestyle more in harmony with the earlier hippie culture than that of suburban churches.

UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY. This began when in 1887 the wife of Charles Fillmore (1854-1948), a crippled real estate agent, was gradually healed of tuberculosis in an unusual manner. The Fillmores studied Christian Science* and New Thought, and from these studies emerged a new ideology to which Charles was converted by 1890. The Unity School is an independent institution of religious education that specifically denies sectarianism or denominationalism. Located at Unity Village, near Lee's Summit, Missouri, the school maintains a large printing and publishing house, a training school, a radio and television ministry, a personal prayer service (Silent Unity), and training and retreat facilities for students. The Silent Unity ministry answers over one-half million personal inquiries a year. No inquirer is asked to leave his own denomination. The Fillmores taught that God is Spirit or "Principle" and that Jesus was the perfect expression of the Divine Principle. Man is a trinity of spirit, soul, and body and receives his salvation through a series of reincarnations and regenerations of the body. All men will eventually become like Christ. Man overcomes want and illness through correct personal thought. The Unity School carries on a worldwide ministry through licensed teachers and ordained ministers who hold services in local "centers."

UNIVERSALISM. An amalgam of several traditions including Gnosticism,* Anabaptism,* and mysticism.* Universalism was created in eighteenth-century America. The first congregation was organized in 1779, and the first creed was adopted in 1790. At first Universalists agreed on little beyond congregational polity and creedlessness, but the Winchester Platform (1803) was more specific in its stress on the perfectibility of man, the ultimate salvation of all men, the varied character of divine revelation, and the humanness of Christ. Prominent early leaders were John Murray,* Elhanan Winchester, and Hosea Ballou.* Many Universalists were also nonresistants. Disagreement over such matters as the reliability of the Scriptures, the nature of Christ, and the credibility of the Winchester document prompted the convention of 1899 to assert, among other things, unitarianism,* perfectionism,* and humanitarianism. By 1942 the group welcomed all humane men, Christian or not. It merged with Unitarians in May 1961, to form the Unitarian-Universalist Association. DARREL BIGHAM

UPPSALA ASSEMBLY (1968). Fourth assembly of the World Council of Churches.* Meeting 4-19 July in the Swedish university town, it had as its theme "Behold! I make all things new" and has been described as "the most document-laden Christian gathering in the last nine hundred years." The major issues were the gap between rich and poor nations, and the need to "humanize" the world. Elected as WCC presidents at the assembly were Hans Lilje, Ernest Payne, D.T. Niles, Alphaeus Hamilton Zulu, John Coventry Smith, and Patriarch German. The central committee chose as its chairman the Indian layman M.M. Thomas. Because of involvement in secular, economic, and social issues, the assembly contributed little that was fresh theologically. Of the 704 delegates, 3 per cent were from developing countries, 75 per cent ordained, and there were 15 Roman Catholic observers with nearly 200 other Roman Catholics present.

The main work proceeded in six study sections which met to discuss and amend 2,500-word drafts:

(1) "The Holy Spirit and the Catholicity of the Church." This revealed differences between the Protestant view of the Church as invisible and catholic, and the "Catholic" view of it as an unbroken, visible eucharistic unity; and emphasized the impossibility of intercommunion. It defined unity in terms of mankind and not of the church. Continuity comes in the future as well as the past, thus tradition relates to renewal. Catholicity is "the quality by which the church expresses the fulness, the integrity and the totality of life in Christ"—in economic, social, and political matters.

(2) "Renewal in Mission." This section found great controversy between evangelicals who viewed conversion and evangelism in terms of the individual, and those who saw conversion in terms of this world's societal structures and values; between those concerned with preaching and those concerned with dialogue. The report defined mission as "to serve suffering humanity and to aid the developing nations," to make "the world's agenda the church's business." Modern missions are not only in traditional areas, but in urban centers and among revolutionary movements where "Christian presence and witness are required." But there was no concern showed for man's spiritual hunger comparable to that expressed for physical hunger (pointed out one evangelical delegate). More delegates applied to join this section than any other.

(3) "World Economic and Social Development." Youth participants pressured this group to be more revolutionary. The group stressed the need for Christians to be more politically effective. It opposed the status quo, isolationism, violence in revolution, yet held that violent changes are "morally ambiguous." It was concerned to end discrimination, to cope with unemployment and underemployment, and with the questions posed by population growth and food shortages.

(4) "Toward Justice and Peace in International Affairs." In a time of political turmoil, "human rights cannot be safeguarded in a world of glaring inequalities and social conflicts." The discussion criticized U.S. involvement in Vietnam, inviting the comment by George McGovern, "no nation comes to this Assembly with clean hands." Christian peace is built on love of enemies, and reconciliation is based on the reconciling work of God in Christ; so Christians need to identify with the poor and oppressed in their struggle for justice. Opposition to war, particularly nuclear war and weapons control, desire to protect human rights, including support for the United Nations and protection of minority rights, and support for all efforts toward world peace including support for selective conscientious objection to war were stressed in the report.

(5) "Worship." A wide divergence of liturgical views were represented, with some finding joy in the old forms, as the Orthodox. Many Western churches wanted contemporary worship forms, evidenced in performance at the assembly of Sven Erik Back's "Mass of the Departure," Bo Nilsson's "Mass for Christian Unity," Sven Erik Johanson's "Cross in the Space Age," and Olov Hartman's "On That Day." The group opposed indiscriminate administration of baptism as a social custom and stressed the need for baptism to take place in the presence of the community. Desire was expressed for the Eucharist to be celebrated weekly, in new styles. "The eucharist shows the essential meaning of Christian worship, for the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins, is a communion meal in which Christians share in his life."

(6) "Toward New Styles of Living." This section, which had the highest proportion of women, laymen, and youth participants, defined "Styles" as the outward manifestations of inward convictions. The section disputed contextual ethics and moral principles, attempting to distinguish the ethics of the Gospel from cultural mores; but its members were unable to resolve the problem. They described a world divided along three lines —color, wealth, and knowledge—which bred specific problems: birth control, changes in traditional family patterns, chastity, and antinomian contextualism. They suggested that a Christian style of living is characterized by concern for suffering of other people, struggle for social justice, and rules open to the Spirit.

Roman Catholics cooperated in many areas. Nine Roman Catholic theologians were added to the Faith and Order Commission, and Jesuit Father Robert Tucci gave an assembly address stressing that Roman Catholic membership in the World Council of Churches may soon come. A joint working group was established by the assembly to work out principles of cooperation. The Orthodox Churches remained the largest confessional group, with 140 delegates. The assembly established a new secretariat on racial equality and admitted four new denominations.

URBAN II (1042?-1099). Pope from 1088. Born in France, Odo of Lagery studied at Reims under Bruno, and entered the monastery at Cluny (c.1070) where he eventually became prior. Recommended to Gregory VII* by Abbot Hugh, he was called to Rome and in 1078 was made cardinal bishop of Ostia. He served also as legate to France and Germany. In 1088 he succeeded Victor III in the papacy as Urban II. The opposition, however, of the German king and emperor Henry IV,* the antipope Clement III (Guibert of Ravenna), and their supporters prevented him from settling permanently in Rome until 1093. He took possession of the Lateran Palace in the following year.

Adhering to the ideals professed by Gregory VII, Urban sought in a cautious and diplomatic manner to free the church from lay investiture and influence, and to strengthen the church internally by requiring priestly celibacy, eliminating simony, and healing the breach between Greek and Latin Christianity. All but the last of these objectives were given considerable attention at the Councils of Melfi (1089), Piacenza (1095), and Clermont* (1095). A serious effort to reunite Eastern and Western Christians was made at the Council of Bari (1098). In each area Urban achieved some measure of success. He is, however, probably most widely remembered for having proclaimed the First Crusade. In response to an appeal by the Eastern emperor Alexius I Comnenus to the Council of Piacenza for recruits for his own hard-pressed forces. Urban at the Council of Clermont called for the establishment of a papal army to rescue the Holy Places from Muslim hands. The Crusade not only achieved this goal, but also enhanced papal prestige and influence. Urban died, however, before news reached him of the capture of Jerusalem. His formal beatification was proclaimed in 1881.

URBAN V (1310-1370). Sixth pope from 1362 of the Avignonese line. Born Guillaume de Grimoard, of a noble family at Grisac, he was placed in the Benedictine monastery of Chirac as a child. He studied at Montpellier, Toulouse, Avignon, and Paris and taught canon law before becoming abbot of St.-Germain at Auxerre in 1352, and then of St.-Victor at Marseilles in 1361. His election as pope in 1362 resolved an impasse in the Curia. The fact that—though he had served on papal missions to Italy—unlike his predecessors he had no previous high administrative experience contributed both to his strengths and his weaknesses. His choice of the name "Urban" signaled his identification with both the initiator of the crusades and the original seat of the Holy See.

As pope he was a moderate reformer, living an exemplary monastic life in the papal palace, an overly generous patron and builder, especially devoted to educational projects. A methodical canon lawyer, he continued the policy of centralizing the ecclesiastical administration, and improved the papal palace at Avignon, adding gardens in good Benedictine fashion. His hopes of ending the conflict in the West and renewing the Crusade seemed in sight of fulfillment following the Peace of Bretigny and his humiliating peace with the Visconti, and encouraged his premature return to Rome in 1367. There he accepted the submission of Emperor John V Palaeologus and received Charles IV. The renewal of the Hundred Years' War forced his return to Avignon, where he died. Praised even by Petrarch, that captious critic of the Avignonese papacy, Urban is the only one of the Avignonese popes to have been beatified (1870). MARY E. ROGERS

URBAN VI (c.1318-1389). Pope from 1378. A native of Naples, he was archbishop of Acerenza (1363), then of Bari (1377), and a capable and irreproachable administrator to Gregory XI,* his predecessor, who ended the long Avignon residency of the papacy by returning to Rome in 1377. Four months after Urban's election, the French cardinals declared it invalid, claiming the Roman populace had forced them to choose an Italian. They were actually alienated by Urban's refusal to restore the papal court to Avignon, and by his tactlessness and evident intention to institute reform. In September they elected a new pope, Clement VII (Robert of Geneva), and thus initiated the Great Schism* which for thirty-nine years scandalized Christiandom, with two popes claiming to be the sole head of the church. Europe was almost equally divided, each pope's support based upon political expediency. Urban became involved in Italian quarrels. Deposing Queen Joanna of Naples, he gave her kingdom to Charles of Durazzo. He later placed Naples under interdict and had five cardinals killed for an alleged conspiracy with Charles to restrict Urban's authority. Urban died at Rome, possibly by poisoning. Despite good intentions, his pontificate was marked by anarchy and left the church confused and divided. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

URBAN VIII (1568-1644). Pope from 1623. This politically minded pope, classical scholar, and embellisher of the city of Rome was born into the wealthy Florentine Barberini family, and given the Christian name "Maffeo." Educated by the Jesuits in Florence, he later studied at their Roman college and eventually took a doctorate of laws at Pisa (1589). He returned to Rome and held several offices in the church and Curia. He was legate and later nuncio to France (1601, 1604), was created cardinal (1606), made bishop of Spoleto (1608), legate of Bologna and prefect of Segnatura di Guistizia (1617), and finally was elected pope. Politically and militarily active, he spent great sums to establish an arms factory in Tivoli and various fortifications (including the Castel St. Angelo and Fort Urban), and even made the Vatican Library into an arsenal. He was jealous of the papal temporal power and pursued a balance-of-power policy consonant with that end. He reversed the pro-Hapsburg policy of his successor by fighting Spanish-imperial interests in Italy, and perhaps by supporting France and Sweden in the Thirty Years' War,* thus contributing to the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire.

Urban was also reform-and mission-minded. He issued decrees on canonization, introduced reform into the Roman Breviary, enforced the Trent guidelines on episcopal residence, reduced the number of obligatory holy days, and approved new reform orders (including the Vincentians). He strongly supported missionary activity by opening the Far East to missionaries other than Jesuits and by founding Urban College for training missionaries (1627). His actions against heretics included the condemnation of Galileo* in 1632 (for the second time) and of Cornelius Jansen's Augustinus (1642). He spent great sums on projects to beautify and build up Rome. Works he sponsored include the Barberini Palace, the Fountain of the Triton, Bernini's refurbishing of St. Peter's Basilica, and the Vatican Seminary. Though his private life was above reproach, Urban was the last pope to practice nepotism widely.

URSINUS, ZACHARIAS (1534-1583). German Reformer and theologian. Born at Breslau, he studied at Wittenberg, 1550-57. He is best known for his Heidelberg Catechism (1562), which exudes the spirit of Melanchthon* and agrees with the teaching of his favorite theologian, Peter Martyr* Vermigli. After a lengthy academic visit to Geneva in 1557, Ursinus taught at Breslau, where his 1559 thesis on the sacrament led to his dismissal. At Vermigli's request Elector Friedrich III appointed Ursinus to Heidelberg in 1561, where until 1568 he lectured on dogmatics. In 1570 the Palatinate adopted a church discipline at Ursinus's urgent request. He left Heidelberg in 1577 to continue with Zanchius at Neustadt. By their influence Ursinus and Zanchius made Melanchthon's Loci Communes standard reading for generations of Reformed pastors at Heidelberg.

URSULINES. The oldest women's teaching order of the Roman Catholic Church. Founded at Brescia (1535) by Angela Merici* and named after St. Ursula, patron of the foundress, it was a society of virgins dedicated to Christian education while living at home. Approved by Paul III (1544), regular community life and simple vows were introduced in 1572 at the instigation of Charles Borromeo.* On profession, members took a fourth vow to devote themselves to education. Paul V allowed the Ursulines of Paris solemn vows and strict enclosure (1612). Convents on these lines, following a modified Augustinian Rule, multiplied in France under Madeleine de Sainte Beuve, assisted by Madame Acarie, and Ann de Xainctongé. Temporarily halted during the French Revolution, growth again continued in the nineteenth century. In Quebec, Canada, convents were founded under Marie Guyard.* At a congress in Rome (1900), numerous convents belonging to different congregations united in the "Roman Union," members of which take simple perpetual vows. Many converts which have remained independent have solemn vows and papal enclosure. Their habit is black with long sleeves; the professed wear black veils, while novices and lay sisters wear white veils. J.G.G. NORMAN

USSHER, JAMES (1581-1656). Irish archbishop and scholar. Born in Dublin and educated there (he was one of the first students of Trinity College), he was appointed in 1607 regius professor of divinity and chancellor of St. Patrick's Cathedral. An outstanding scholar, at the age of nineteen he engaged successfully in controversy with a learned Jesuit, Henry Fitzsimons. In 1615 Usshher showed his support of Calvinism when he shared in an attempt to introduce into the Irish Church a Calvinistic confession based on the Lambeth Articles* of 1595. In 1621 he became bishop of Meath and Clonmacnoise, and in 1625 archbishop of Armagh. During the years that followed, in which he made many visits to England, he did much to preserve the independence of the Irish Church and particularly its Calvinistic character. In 1640 he went to England for what he anticipated would be a short visit, but in 1641 rebellion broke out in Ireland and he was never able to return. He shared in ecclesiastical discussions thereafter. He was asked to be one of the commissioners at the Westminster Assembly* (1643), but declined. Despite his associations with Charles I, Ussher was indulgently treated by Cromwell, who accorded him a public burial in Westminster Abbey.

Among Ussher's many writings are a history of the Western Church from the sixth to the thirteenth centuries, Discourse of the Religion currently Professed by the Irish and British (1622), Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates (1639), and Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti (1650-54), which included his famous scheme of biblical chronology. Basing his dates on biblical genealogies, he concluded that the world was created in 4004 B.C. His scheme is generally discarded, but ranks as the first serious attempt to formulate a biblical chronology.

USUARD, MARTYROLOGY OF. The most popular martyrology in medieval times. Usuard was so successful in obtaining relics of the saints for his order, the Benedictines, and for Charles the Bald that he was commissioned by Charles to draw up a martyrology. Taking into account the work of Ado, Bede, Florus, and the pseudo-Jerome, he completed his work in 875. The work proved very popular in monasteries throughout W Europe. In 1580 Gregory XIII ordered it to be revised and improved, and thus it became the basis for the Martyrologium Romanum (1583). The first critical edition of Usuard's work was prepared by Dom J. Bouillart and published at Paris in 1718.

PETER TOON

USURY. Although at present the term means an exorbitant or illegally high rate of interest on money, it originally meant any charge for the use of money. (Thus "usury" and the present meaning of "interest" would be identical.) In the OT the exacting of interest was forbidden in the case of Jewish debtors (Exod. 22:25; Deut. 23:19f.). Ancient Greek philosophers also condemned interest as unjust. Aristotle* taught that money is barren and that if two coins are put in a bag they will never reproduce; hence demanding the repayment of a larger sum than what is loaned not only violates justice, but also nature. The NT does not state anything explicit about the lending of money, but in the patristic age usury was condemned by most of the Church Fathers. During the Middle Ages the teachings of Aristotle were accepted by Scholastics like Aquinas. In the Decree of Gratian and at the Third Lateran Council (1179) usury was condemned, although Jews were allowed to engage in the practice by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

With the rise of capitalism, opposition to lending money for interest was gradually abandoned. Although some sixteenth-century Protestant Reformers like Luther, Zwingli, and Latimer condemned the practice, others such as Calvin and Beza justified it by distinguishing between consumption loans and those for production, insisting that in the latter case money was fertile or productive. Laws were passed in Geneva that allowed for a moderate rate of interest. Later (1571) England and Germany along with other continental lands followed suit, although in France interest was not legalized until 1789. Some scholars in the Roman Catholic Church began to shift their attitudes on usury during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but as late as 1745 Pope Benedict XIV reaffirmed the Scholastic opposition to the charging of interest. By the nineteenth century, however, the Curia issued statements indicating that those who lend money at moderate rates of interest are "not to be disturbed," although the theoretical justification for the practice has never been settled in the Roman Church.

UTRAQUISTS. The more moderate group within the Hussite movement. Their name derives from the Latin sub utraque specie ("under both kinds") and refers to the bread and wine of the Communion. They believed that laymen should receive both elements, not merely the bread as the church decreed, and that certain clerical abuses should be eliminated. Their membership centered in Prague and consisted of many of the nobility and university professors of that city. They defeated the rival Hussite faction, the Taborites,* in the Battle of Lipany. Then they formulated a more moderate position and at the Council of Basle* were given an official status in the Roman Church. They remained the established church of Bohemia until the Thirty Years' War* (1620) resulted in the restoration of Catholicism.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

UTRECHT, DECLARATION OF. A creedal summary issued in Utrecht in 1889, important in the history of the Old Catholic* movement. The original Old Catholic Church grew out of the Jansenist* controversies: Cornelius Steenhoven in 1724 was consecrated by a Catholic bishop (without papal approval) as archbishop of Utrecht, and the "Jansenist" Old Catholic Church continued as a small group thereafter, with some claim to valid orders. In the 1870s, when a larger secession from the Roman Church took place in protest against Vatican I's adoption of the doctrine of papal infallibility, they turned to Utrecht for ordination. J.H. Reinkens* was ordained bishop of the Old Catholic Church in Germany, and Edward Herzog similarly for Switzerland. The 1889 meeting in Utrecht thus brought together the bishops of the Old Catholic churches. The Declaration affirmed adherence to Catholicism, but rejection of Roman perversions of it, notably including the doctrine of papal infallibility. It was accepted as a doctrinal statement by the Old Catholic churches (including, since 1897, the Polish Old Catholic movement in the USA).

VAISON, COUNCILS OF. Two church councils (synods) were held at Vaison in SE France in the fifth and sixth centuries. The first (442) enacted ten canons, most of which were aimed at strengthening the power of bishops: e.g., presbyters should not have fellowship with those who were enemies of their bishop. The president was probably Nectarius of Vienne. The second was held in 529 and enacted five canons, one of which required regular prayers to be said for the bishop of Rome. Others related to the Mass, one of them requiring the repetition of the Kyrie Eleison ("Lord, have mercy").

VALDÉS, JUAN DE (c.1500-1541). Spanish humanist and reformer. He and his twin, Alfonso, were born at Cuenca, Castile. Educated at Alcalá University (1527), he was greatly influenced by Erasmus.* He accepted Luther's doctrine of justification, but remained a Catholic. He collaborated with Alfonso in two dialogues—Mercury and Charon and Lactancio and the Archdeacon—which criticizes the church, while he wrote his own Dialogue on Christian Doctrine which provoked a lawsuit and made it expedient for him to move to Italy (1531). He became chamberlain to Pope Clement VII (1533) and met Peter Carnesecchi and Ercole Cardinal Gonzaga. After Clement's death (1534) he lived in Naples, serving as Spanish imperial inspector of fortifications and becoming the spiritual adviser of Lady Giulia Gonzaga, the cardinal's sister, who presided over a group anxious for reform and spiritual revival. He wrote his Christian Alphabet (1536) based on discussions with Lady Giulia, and later wrote 110 Considerations, commentaries, and translations of part of the Bible into Spanish. He paved the way for Protestant ideas by his emphasis on religious feeling and his disregard of ecclesiastical authority, so that after his death many of his friends, including Peter Martyr* Vermigli and Bernardino Ochino,* left the church. His followers were called "Valdesians." J.G.G. NORMAN

VALENCE, COUNCILS OF. Numerous church councils were held in this city on the Rhone River in the province of Dauphiné, France. Several are of particular significance. In 374 about twenty-four bishops convened and acted on four disciplinary issues. They ruled the ordination of digamists to be unacceptable; they defined the penance required of lapsed virgins and of idolatrous-then-rebaptized Christians; they considered the problem of clerics renouncing ordination on false pretexts. The last issue assumed concreteness in an extant conciliar letter regarding Acceptus, who refused the bishopric of Forum Iulii (Frejus).

About the time of the Council of Orange* (592), a council met in Valence to consider the doctrine of grace. Rejecting Pelagianism* and Semi-Pelagianism,* it favored the position of Caesarius of Arles,* also adopted by Pope Boniface II. A similar issue was treated by the Council of Valence called by Emperor Lothair in 855. Having investigated charges against the bishop of Valence, the council under the leading of Archbishop Remigius of Lyons refuted the position defended by Hincmar* of Reims and the Council of Quiercy* (853). It asserted double predestination in a manner guarding divine holiness and human responsibility, and it affirmed Christ's death for the elect only. Jansenists* later appealed the approval given these canons by Pope Nicholas I.*

Other councils were held in Valence in 585, 890, 1100, and 1209. In 1248 a so-called Council of Valence meeting at Montelimar anathematized Emperor Frederick II* and promoted the Inquisition.* JAMES DE JONG

VALENS (c.328-378). Co-emperor from 364. At the unexpected death of Julian,* the army had compromised on Jovian*; his equally sudden demise saw the choice fall to Valentinian (364), who a month later associated his younger brother Valens as co-augustus for the East. The brothers were from Christian peasant stock of Pannonia—Valentinian the more able militarily, Valens in finance. While both operated within Jovian's principle of broad religious toleration, Valens sought to deal with the internal dissension within Christianity which stemmed from the Arian* controversy. The synodical sessions since Nicea* (325) had in the East moved away from the homoousion position, and Valens undertook from 371 to suppress or remove from office remaining supporters. But the chief problems were at the frontiers. The Huns pushing behind the Goths had set the latter in motion. Valens received a petition for their resettlement in the empire, but before the matter could be negotiated they broke over the Danube. Without awaiting reinforcements coming from the West, Valens attempted to stop them at Adrianople, where in the ensuing disaster for the Roman legions he also met death. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

VALENS (late fourth century). Bishop of Mursa in Pannonia secunda. He was included with Auxentius (of Durostorum; later of Milan), Saturninus (of Arles), and Ursacius (of Singidunum) in the anathema of the Synod of Paris (361), with the latter alone in a letter to Athanasius* attempting reconciliation, and in the treatise of refutation by Hilary of Poitiers* (Adversus Valentem et Ursacium) who had actively championed their prosecution in preliminary synods and at Paris. This treatise of Hilary's, known to Jerome, has survived only in fragments. Valens was identified as an active proponent of Arianism* in the West, but his specific thought remains unclear. Since he is associated with Anomoeans* at Arles (353), but Homoeans* at Arminum (359), he may well have reflected those variations in compromising efforts under the impact of imperial pressures which sought to avoid homoousion extremes between the councils of Nicea* (325) and Constantinople* (381), by which date their generation of men had passed.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

VALENTINIAN III (419-455). Western Roman emperor from 425. He was the son of Constantius III and Galla Placidia. Throughout the long regency of his mother (425-450) and the de facto military authority of Aetius,* Valentinian remained dependent and degenerate. Though Attila's* famous march on Rome in 452 proved innocuous, the Western Empire declined greatly during his reign. Championing orthodoxy, Placidia's first acts in Valentinian's name in 425 were to restore church privileges revoked by the recently executed imperial usurper John, to exclude Jews and pagans from the bar and military rank, and to exile heretics and astrologers from the cities. Valentinian's Novella 17 of 445 endowed the bishop of Rome, then Leo I, with authority over provincial churches in the West, including Greece—an important advantage in the pope's rivalry with other patriarchs for universal supremacy. Valentinian was assassinated in 455.

DANIEL C. SCAVONE

VALENTINUS (second century). Prominent Gnostic, founder of the Valentinian sect. If one were to attempt to reconstruct the thought of Valentinus on the basis of the few fragments preserved in his earliest critics Irenaeus* of Alexandria, Clement, and Hippolytus,* he would appear but as another in that chain of Gnostics cataloged in their refutations, inseparable from his successor Ptolemaeus, who headed up the Valentinian school from about 160 and who was a sufficient systemizer to warrant more than fragmentary citation. Thus Irenaeus incorporated major passages of an extended work of the latter plus a portion of a commentary on John's gospel, and Epiphanius* quoted a most reasonable statement of the Valentinian position under the title "Letter to Flora."

Again, with quotations chiefly derived from the earliest opponents, Eusebius put together what was known of Valentinus within the framework of his historical chronology: Valentinus was understood to have arrived in Rome during the four-year bishopric of Hyginus (138-42), which he dated from the first year of Antoninus Pius. Tertullian's Adversus Valentinianos, built on his predecessors, likewise provides little fresh information about Valentinus himself other than the cryptic remark that Valentinus nearly became bishop of Rome—that is, he presumably failed to be elected, and thence withdrew from the community. Considering the low-key attack upon the person, it can only be assumed that Valentinus's thought was too close to Christian for comfort, originating from a strange but not impossible reading of John's gospel, and through it the synoptics, especially the teachings from Matthew. Certainly Alexandrian Christian commentaries on the NT are a response to Valentinian exegesis, and hardly distinguishable.

The discoveries of Coptic Gnostic papyri at Nag Hammadi* in Upper Egypt in 1945 have reopened the consideration of Valentinus, for among the texts were a series of writings which could very well be associated with him—particularly the one called the Gospel of Truth, which has been specifically named as his by Irenaeus. The text of this gospel is still close to revelatory in style; systematization had not yet set in. It is an announcement or declaration of what has not been known—namely, the name of the Father, possession of which enables the knower to penetrate that ignorance which has separated him and all creation from the Father. And Jesus the Christ in His work as Savior has functioned as the revealer of that name through a variety of modes laden with a language of abstract elements. The retention of belief in creation as the work of the Father makes this gospel an alternative to the contemporary Marcion,* but the notions are finally too esoteric for popular consumption, and the followers of Valentinus can only have been the learned.

VALERIAN (Publius Licinius Valerienus) (third century). Emperor before October 253. Like the data for most of the Roman rulers of the troubled third century, the sources are less than adequate. Valerian would have been born near the beginning of the century, since at the time he became emperor, the son he associated with him, Gallienus (235-68), was already in his mid-thirties; Valerian must have been about sixty. He was from a noble family, and in the midst of the anarchical conditions of crisis from frontier assaults and internal disorder, he had already played important roles under preceding emperors. Under Decius (249-51), he was special finance officer, wherein he assisted in the efforts to compel by libelli revival of the state religion, which was the condition for the major persecution of the church. Under Gallus (251-53) he was military commander of troops from Raetia, but he was unable to prevent that emperor's death at the hands of soldiers in the conflict with the rival Aemilianus (253), who within three months met a similar fate when Valerian's troops made him the rival.

With his co-augustus he strove for stabilization, but the Goths and the Persians kept the fronts critical. Persecution of Christians remained severe under their joint administration; notable martyrs (258) include Sixtus II* of Rome, his deacon Laurence* and Cyprian of Carthage.* But in the campaign on the Persian frontier, presumably by treachery, Valerian and his army were captured by Shapur I—a scene frequently cut in relief by the Persian. Neither the date of the disaster nor that of Valerian's subsequent death in captivity has been determined. But thereafter Gallienus brought a peace to the church which lasted for the next forty years, in spite of continuing internal revolt and strain on the frontiers.

VALERIAN (d. after 460). Bishop of Cemenelum. Among the minor ecclesiastical writers of the mid-fifth century is this bishop of a diocese of Alpes maritimae on the SE coast of Gaul, noted for homilies in the rhetorical style patterned after Seneca. He is associated in time, location, and thought with the developing monastic traditions of Lérins, just off that coast, which has been founded at the outset of the century and was by this time under abbot Faustus,* bishop of Riez, sending forth monk-bishops who were setting up daughter institutions in their episcopal cities, and from which was to spread during the sixth century the missionary enterprise to the non-Christian peoples of NW Europe. Valerian is identified as a kinsman of Eucherius* of Lyons. He attended the councils of Riez (439) and Vaison* (452), protesting with eighteen like-minded bishops on behalf of the primacy of Arles with its bishop Hilary* against Leo I* of Rome. Valerian's homilies provide the next major glimpse after Salvian of the movement and nature of the barbarian resettlement of Gaul, in the context of a strong emphasis upon the discipline of work. While not dogmatic in nature, Valerian represents a Semi-Pelagian* stance like those with whom he was associated. The rapid changes in the area reduced his see, and many of his homilies either disappeared or were ascribed to others, such as Eucherius or Petrus Chrysologus. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

VALLA, LORENZO (1407-1457). Italian philologist and rhetorician, perhaps the most brilliant mind of the Renaissance. He was born in Rome, and after studying under Vittorino da Feltre he became teacher of Greek and Latin, wandering to Pavia, Milan, Genoa, Ferrara, Mantua, and Naples. The last decade of his life was spent at Rome working for Pope Nicholas V* in a position that gave him time for his literary activities. Valla's best-known book, Elegances of the Latin Language (1441), became a standard guide for humanists interested in precise expression and graceful style. Always a critical and independent thinker, he was led by his work into many controversies. His most famous book was the Declamation Concerning the False Donation of Constantine (1440) in which he demonstrated the spurious character of the document that allegedly proved that Constantine* had given central Italy over to papal control when he moved the Roman capital to the East. Valla demonstrated that the Donation* was an eighth-century forgery and thus could not be used to support papal claims to temporal power. Although his work aroused the ire of some churchmen, it had little practical importance, since the Renaissance popes did not base this claim to political power on the document. Valla's works, however, exerted a strong influence on Erasmus* and the Protestant Reformers. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

VALLUMBROSAN ORDER. John Gualbert established this contemplative order about 1036 with a mother house in Vallombrosa near Florence. He incorporated many eremitic elements into the pattern of Benedict's Rule, including poverty, strict enclosure, and perpetual silence. Only the order's lay brothers, the conversi, worked the fields. The order still has a few followers in Italy, but the number of abbeys has fallen from a high of sixty to about eight cloisters. The mother house has been closed.

VALOIS, HENRI DE (Henricus Valesius) (1603-1676). French lawyer and classical scholar. Educated at the Jesuit college of Clermont and at Bourges, he renounced the bar in 1630 to devote himself to classical study. In 1650 he began to do research in early Greek church historians. Of special value was his Latin translation (1659-73) of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, which covers the period up to 324. Later Valois issued translations of the church histories of Socrates and Sozomen (1668), and Theodoret and Evagrius (1673).

VANDERKEMP, JOHANNES THEODORUS (1747-1811). Missionary to South Africa. Born in Rotterdam, he revealed in his early career as army officer, doctor, and amateur philosopher a blend of intellectual ability, unconventionality, and stubborn independence. He was converted from Deism* in 1791 shortly after the drowning of his wife and daughter, and offered his services to the London Missionary Society in 1796. In 1799 he reached the Cape as leader of the pioneer LMS party. After an unsuccessful period among the Xhosa, he began work among the Hottentots and established a missionary institution at Bethelsdorp (1803). Conditions here were poor, and discipline weak. This drew criticism from the colonists, as did Vanderkemp's simple manner of life and marriage to a Malagasy slave. But his chief offense in their eyes was his defense of Hottentot interests in the face of widespread injustice.

VAN DYCK, ANTHONY (1599-1641). Flemish painter. Born to a bourgeois family in Antwerp, he was by seventeen already an independent artist, and two years later was admitted into the reputable Guild of Saint Luke as a master. In common with all the younger artists of Antwerp, Van Dyck was drawn into Rubens's* circle. His exact relationship with Rubens is difficult to define, although Rubens referred to him as a disciple. Van Dyck worked for him for two years, during which time the former carried on a sizable practice in portrait painting. In 1620 Van Dyck made his first visit to England, where he was briefly employed by James I. Two years later he went to Italy, where from his base in Genoa he visited the major cities. In 1632 he became court painter to Charles I, by whom he was knighted; yet his life was unsettled and unsatisfied. Van Dyck returned to Antwerp a number of times, each time hoping for an important religious commission.

His style passed through four phases which are generally labeled according to his place of activity at the time: thus his first and second Antwerp period, his Genoese and English periods. A fine example of his early Antwerp style is Christ Crowned with Thorns, painted when he was no more than twenty. In this and other works he brought an insistence on the down-to-earth realism of sacred events, as is evident in the bold, bare feet of the kneeling man who hands Christ the derisory scepter. Van Dyck interprets the scene at its most brutal level. Pathos is created by the relaxed, resigned body of Christ in comparison with the aggressive energy of His persecutors. The only sign of life in Christ is a raised index finger which reminds the onlooker that Christ suffered for mankind.

His output was large for a man who died at forty-two; yet there is no single great work by which he is remembered today. His compositions do not stand out against the mass of his portraits, and he lacks Rubens's robustness and fire. In England, however, he long remained the perfect example to which all portrait painters aspired.

VANE, HENRY (1613-1662). Statesman and Puritan. Educated at Oxford and abroad, he was early converted to Puritanism. In search of religious liberty he went to New England in 1635, and in the following year became governor of Massachusetts. He became involved in doctrinal controversies, however, and returned to England in 1637. Through the influence of his father, Sir Henry Vane, he entered public life and in 1640 became a member of Parliament and was knighted. Although showing a religious tolerance not always evident in the Puritans he briefly lost the confidence of Charles I* for opposing episcopacy, and was a strong critic of William Laud.* He was one of the English representatives in drawing up the Solemn League and Covenant* with the Scots (1643), though he had some misgivings about Presbyterian attitudes. Vane did not approve of the execution of the king and took no part in the trial. He held office under Cromwell, but in 1653 differed from him and was later imprisoned for criticizing his regime. Imprisoned after the Restoration (1660), he was tried for treason and executed on Tower Hill. J.D. DOUGLAS

VAN ESS, LEANDER (1772-1847). German biblical scholar. Born at Warburg/Westphalia, he entered the Benedictine Order (1790) and assumed the name "Leander" in place of his christened names "Johann Heinrich." His ordination to the priesthood came in 1796. Appointed professor of Catholic theology at Marburg in 1812, he remained there until 1822. In 1807 he collaborated with his cousin Karl in producing a German translation of the NT. The OT followed in 1822. Divergence from the Vulgate* led to Van Ess's version being placed on the Index in that same year. Nevertheless more than 500,000 copies of the NT were circulated with financial aid from the British and Foreign Bible Society. WAYNE DETZLER

VAN EST, see ESTIUS

VAN EYCK, HUBERT (c.1366-1426) and JAN (c.1390-1441). Flemish painters. Hubert was called "second to none" on the inscription of the frame of the Ghent masterpiece, The Adoration of the Lamb, in the cathedral of St. Bavon. Apart from beginning this famous painting (which his brother finished in 1432) he is reckoned by many art historians to be the painter of The Three Marys at the Sepulchre in the Van Beuningen Collection, Rotterdam. The rest of his work is lost. Jan, however, is much better known. Between 1422 and 1424 he painted for John of Bavaria, bishop of Liège. In 1425 began his relationship with Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy. He was treated not as an artisan but as a friend, and he was also able to paint for wealthy Italians resident in the Netherlands. No painter has been more preoccupied with artifacts-e.g., the way a pin fits in a door hinge. This was probably because he pushed the problem of representation in art further than any other painter. The great emphasis on detail has the effect of spiritualizing the subject so that the division between secular and religious art is virtually done away with.

For a list of Jan's extant paintings and their whereabouts, see The Van Eycks (ed. R. Hughes, 1970). PETER TOON

VAN MANEN, WILLEM CHRISTIAAN (1842-1905). Dutch theologian. Born at Nordeloos, he studied at Utrecht and became a preacher in the Dutch Reformed Church.* Recognized as an able theologian, he moved from a relatively orthodox position steadily toward an advanced higher critical viewpoint. In his early forties he was appointed professor at Leyden (1885) and became a brilliant exponent of radical higher criticism. He concluded that the Pauline epistles were sub-apostolic (in his Paulus, 3 vols., 1890-96) and extended this to most of the NT, dating it from the second century and seeing it as part of an effort to transform Judaism into a universal religion.

VÁSQUEZ, GABRIEL (1549-1604). Jesuit philosopher and theologian. Born near Belmonte, Spain (he was sometimes known as "Bellomontanus"), he read philosophy at Alcalá (1565-69) and became a Jesuit (1569). Lecturing in philosophy at Alcalá (1571-75), he also read theology there. He taught at Ocana and again at Alcalá, then for six years was at the Roman College until 1591, when he returned to Alcalá to succeed Francisco de Suarez* as professor of theology. His most important work is Commentarii ac Disputationes on Aquinas's Summa (8 vols., 1598-1615). He wrote a paraphrase and exposition of Paul's letters, and his Disputationes metaphysicae was formed out of assorted works by Murcia de la Llana (1617). Occasionally called "Augustine redivivus" and given to poverty, he often mis-directed his learning; he labored heavily under Suarez's shadow and opposed his teaching.

VATICAN I. Reckoned by Roman Catholics to be the twentieth ecumenical council, the First Vatican Council was convened by the papal bull Aeterni Patris on 29 June 1868. It sat from 8 December 1869 until 18 July 1870. The closure of the third session was precipitated by the withdrawal of French troops from Rome, due to the outbreak of war between France and Prussia, and by the occupation of the city by Italian troops.

In assessing the council it is necessary to take into account the political, cultural, and theological background. Politically the pope was still viewed as a temporal prince. Admittedly the Papal States had been taken over by the new Italy, and after 1860 only Rome remained. But across Europe there were grave suspicions that the concern for papal primacy and infallibility marked a reassertion of the old claims of the dominion of church over state. Culturally it was the period when Romanticism was in the ascendant and anti-intellectualism was strong—an opportune moment for a firmly traditional council.

Theologically the scene was set for a decisive step forward (though the minority was to consider it a long step backward). Already the pope had promulgated the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* in 1854. Ten years later he had issued the Syllabus Errorum,* the reactionary trumpet blast against every manifestation of liberal or progressive thinking. The time had come in the judgement of Pius IX* and his supporters to put the coping stone on the edifice of papal absolutism gradually built up over a period of centuries via the forged pseudo-Isidorian decretals and the claims of such powerful medieval popes as Gregory VII,* Innocent III,* and Boniface VIII.*

The two theories which clashed in the Vatican debates carry the names Gallicanism* and Ultramontanism.* The Gallican theory went back via J.B. Bossuet (1627-1704) to the great conciliar theologians D'Ailly* and Gerson,* who at the time of the Council of Constance* asserted the supreme authority of a general council. Gallicanism did not go so far as the Protestant Reformers, but nevertheless it did reject the temporal claims of the papacy, subjected the pope to a general council, and denied that his decrees were beyond reform. The Ultramontane theory—this word meaning "across the mountains"—presented a traditional Italian and strongly papal position. Its classical exponent was the sixteenth-century cardinal Bellarmine,* and in the mid-nineteenth century there were advocates like the editor of the Dublin Review the English convert W.G. Ward, and the French editor of L'Univers ouis Veuillot,* who would have pushed the theory to its ultimate limits. In any event, Vatican I saw the decisive defeat of the Gallican theory and the triumph of Ultramontanism.

The key figure in the council was the pope himself. Pius IX succeeded to the papal throne in 1846. He began by favoring liberal ideas and Italian nationalism, but the revolution of 1848, his flight to Gaeta, his restoration to Rome by the French army in 1850—all these were a prelude to a thoroughly reactionary policy for the rest of his long reign (he died in 1878). Hans Küng* rather scathingly assessed him as being "without a trace of churchmanly or theological critical self-reflection." He himself made his own convictions clear in his famous reply to one dissident bishop—"Tradition? I am tradition."

The composition of the council helped the pope's ambitions. The 276 Italian bishops outnumbered the 265 from the rest of Europe. The 195 nondiocesan bishops were particularly dependent on the pope. Many of the bishops were theologically mediocre and so were open to the pressures of the majority party. The leaders of the latter were not unduly scrupulous about the methods used. Archbishop Manning* from England, exulting in the fact that he was the only "convert" at the council, and dedicated to the task of pushing through the decree, described the council as "a running fight" in which his group aimed "to watch and counteract" what the minority bishops were doing. By skillful intrigue he succeeded in packing the Deputation—the commission responsible for drawing up the doctrinal statement—so that every opponent was excluded.

The minority party included many outstanding leaders, such as the great historian Hefele,* two Austrian cardinals, Dupanloup* of France, Moriarty of Ireland, and many others. From outside the council they were supported by such notable figures as J.H. Newman* and Döllinger,* one of the foremost Roman Catholic theologians. They resisted the decree on various grounds—that it was unbiblical and unhistorical, that it denied the status of the bishops, that it made future councils redundant, that it was inopportune—this last objection coming from the Eastern Catholics from Orthodox lands and those from the Protestant nations.

But the resistance was in vain. On 13 July 1870 the placets ("ayes") numbered 471, 88 voted non-placet, 62 agreed in principle but not in detail, while 76 abstained. On 13 July 1870 the constitution Pastor Aeternus was passed by 533 placets to two non-placets. The rest abstained, many leaving Rome to avoid having to vote against the pope. Newman might query the validity of the decree because of the lack of unanimity, the Old Catholic* breakaway movement might claim many adherents, but the decree was a fact. Döllinger was excommunicated. The bishops who had fought so hard gradually capitulated. To the outsider they appeared as beaten men prepared to go against their conscience, but to a Roman Catholic commentator like Butler they appeared as good Catholics ready to sacrifice private judgment to the supreme authority of their church.

Vatican I dealt with other matters, including the promulgation of the Constitution on the Catholic Faith, but it is remembered chiefly for its formulation of the papal primacy and infallibility. Its dogmatic definitions present a major problem today to the New Catholicism.

VATICAN II. The Second Vatican Council was the unexpected project of one whose election as pope was looked on as an interim appointment because of his age, but whose pontificate was to prove a landmark in the history of the Roman Catholic Church. Pope John XXIII* had been in office for only ninety days when on 25 January 1959 he declared his intention of convening the twenty-first ecumenical council. Although he did not live to see the council completed—he died during the preparations for the second session—the impact of his personality on the council deliberations was marked.

Pope John was himself a blend of the traditional Catholic approach and the new forward-looking attitude which was to be such a marked feature of the council. The impact of a kindly and genial personality, the obvious concern with people, the desire to let a breath of fresh air into the turgid atmosphere of the Vatican—all these should not lead us to the erroneous conclusion that in his doctrine he was a liberal, for in fact he was markedly conservative. Hence, while his liberal attitude opened the door for progressive thinkers, his own theological position was traditional. On the one hand, he gave the progressives a mandate for action with his often-quoted distinction between the unchanging affirmations of the faith and the changing representations (opening speech 11 October 1962). On the other hand, in his encyclical Ad Petri Cathedram he came down firmly on the side of the traditional doctrines of the Mass and of Mary, and made his appeal both to Scripture and tradition.* So too on the one side he changed dramatically the approach to those who were formerly heretics, but were now designated "separated brethren," yet at the same time he made it quite clear that reunion meant their return to the one true church and to the pope as center of unity.

This pattern is seen throughout the council's documents. While they are addressed to the twentieth century and while they bear evidence of the new movements of theological thought within Rome, they are at the same time in the mainstream of Catholic orthodoxy and in fact frequently reiterate their endorsement of both Vatican I* and Trent.* Where they seemed to go too far, as in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the Lumen Gentium (on the church), the pope replied—it was now Paul VI*—with counterbalancing statements of strongly traditional doctrine, the Mysterium Fidei on the Eucharist, and the appendix on papal prerogatives affixed to the decree on the church.

The council had four sessions. The first lasted from 11 October until 8 December 1962. The second session lasting from 29 September until 4 December 1963 produced the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication. The third session from 14 September until 21 November 1964 saw the promulgation of major documents on the church, on Ecumenism, and on the Eastern Catholic Churches. The fourth session from 14 September until 8 December 1965 produced a final quota of eleven documents. There were the decrees on the Bishops' Pastoral Office, on Priestly Formation, and on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life; and the declarations on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions and on Christian Education. These were promulgated 28 October and were followed on 18 November by the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation and the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity. Finally, on 7 December 1965 came the last act of the council in the promulgation of four texts—the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, and the Declaration on Religious Freedom.

Before turning to a consideration of some of these documents, some significant factors in the situation at Vatican II need to be kept in mind. This was the first Roman Catholic council at which there were non-Roman observers. Their presence strongly emphasized the ecumenical aims of the council and was clearly a factor in the debates, although of course they did not actually take part. Allied to this was the unprecedented blaze of publicity which made the council a major news item across the world, and which let not only the body of the Catholic faithful but outsiders as well see what was happening. A further significant element was the participation of the periti, the theological experts who were there as advisers to the council fathers. Their presence, particularly of those from N Europe and America, was to bring the ferment and turmoil of the current theological debate to the floor of St. Peter's. One final factor was the change in the papacy. Paul VI had been looked on as a liberal, but he clearly viewed with alarm the rapidity of the change developing within Rome, and the radical character of some of the proposals—hence his interventions. These were designed either to moderate the advances gained by the progressives, or (as in his personal intervention in the debate on religious toleration) to delay matters and to gain some measure of agreement in a situation where the depth of feeling between conservatives and liberals was leading to a dangerous polarization.

The Documents. First in order of importance, if not in order of promulgation, is the Lumen Gentium ("the light of the nations"), the decree on the church, the "De Ecclesia." It is the result of a drastic revision of the schema originally presented. This represented a traditional and polemical attitude and was replaced by a new document drafted between the first and second sessions, debated during the second and third, and promulgated at the end of this session on 21 November 1964. The basic conviction of the document is the traditional view of the church as the continuing incarnation of Christ. The analogy is quoted of the indissoluble union between the Word and His human nature in the Incarnation—the church is a like incarnation. "The Church exists in Christ as a sacrament or instrumental sign of intimate union with God and of unity for the whole human race." This church moreover is quite firmly stated to be the Roman Catholic Church, for although other Christian communities have marks of holiness, they cannot be accepted as being on the same level as the Roman Catholic Church.

It is true that the conception of the church as "the people of God" is brought into prominence, and the biblical testimony to the continuing people of God in the Old and New Testaments is expounded. But this biblical emphasis is vitiated in two ways. For one thing, the people of God in its fullness really means the Roman Catholic Church, and for another there is still the traditional distinction between people and priest. In the Bible laos embraces the whole people of God, but traditional Catholicism maintains a firm gap between the priesthood and the laity. Admittedly there is an attempt to accord priestly functions to the people of God as a whole. But in fact the old position of the priest remains the same—this is seen not only in the "De Ecclesia," but also in the Decree on the Priestly Ministry and Life. "There is an essential difference between the faithful's priesthood in common and the priesthood of the ministry or hierarchy, and not just a difference of degree" ("De Ecclesia"). Priests, defined in a levitical sense, are "given the power of sacred Order to offer sacrifice, forgive sin and in the name of Christ publicly to exercise the office of priesthood." By "a special sacrament . . . they are signed with a specific character and portray Christ the priest." "They reconcile sinners to God and the Church through the sacrament of penance. . . . They sacramentally offer the Sacrifice of Christ in a special way when they celebrate Mass" (Decree on Priestly Ministry.) They "share, at their own level of the ministry, the office of Christ, the sole mediator" ("De Ecclesia").

The church as defined above "is incapable of being at fault in belief." This involves a supernatural gift imparted to the people of God as a whole to recognize and to accept the authoritative teaching of the magisterium or teaching authority. This infallibility focused in the pope is diffused throughout the college of bishops. This area of teaching has, however, received a mixed reaction from theologians. One comment from a major commentary on the decree aptly sums up their reaction: "A dispersed episcopate which is infallible, but never quite knows when is a puzzling paradox."

The papal prerogatives are firmly stated in the decree with its stress on "the institution, the perpetuity, the power and the nature of the sacred primacy of the Roman Pontiff, and of his infallible magisterium." Papal definitions "stand in no need of approval of others and they admit of no appeal to another court." This very strong reaffirmation of papal infallibility was accompanied by a stress on the college of bishops for whom the claim is made that they "have a life-giving contact with the original apostles by a current of succession which goes back to the beginning." Their authority and infallibility are, however, hedged around by the proviso that they can never function without the head, viz., the pope. This aspect of the supreme, overriding, and unique authority of the pope was defined even more precisely in the "Nota" (the notes of explanation) appended to the "De Ecclesia."

Other traditional elements retained in the "De Ecclesia" are the belief in purgatory, prayers for the dead, and the invocation of the saints. Of particular significance is the section devoted to the position of Mary. That a special decree was not allocated to this subject was seen as some measure of victory for the progressive wing; but in fact the traditional dogmas are vigorously restated, and indeed a further dogmatic stage is reached. Mary is again declared to be immaculate in conception, perpetually virgin and sinless, sharing in the work of atonement, raised incorruptible to heaven where she reigns as queen; now she is also presented as the mother of the church. Far from minimizing or rejecting the excesses of the Marian cult, the council called for "a generous encouragement to the cult of the Blessed Virgin, especially to the liturgical cult."

The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation stands in clear lineal descent from the Council of Trent with its appeal to the two sources of revelation—Scripture and tradition. In spite of the new emphasis in Roman Catholic thinking and writing on the Bible, the Council still maintained the position that "both Scripture and Tradition should be accepted with equal sentiments of devotion and reverence." Both of them "form a single sacred deposit of the word of God." This conviction is linked with an acceptance of the infallible teaching authority of the church to produce the conclusion: "sacred Tradition, holy Scripture and the Church's magisterium are by God's most wise decree so closely connected and associated together that one does not subsist without the other two." The final authority in interpreting Scripture is thus the magisterium of the church.

The Decree on Ecumenism considers the possibilities of reunion from the standpoint of a firm insistence on the traditional claim of Rome to be the one true church. "Only through the Catholic Church of Christ, the universal aid to salvation, can the means of salvation be reached in all their fulness." The Eastern Churches have a special status because of their close approximation to Rome in doctrine, church order, and liturgy. The Anglican Communion also has particular mention because of her retention of Catholic traditions. The other churches while being defective from Rome's standpoint are still acknowledged to retain some elements of Catholic truth. What then is the basis for unity? It is the idea of "brothers by baptism." Baptism sets up a bond of unity which it is hoped will develop into a fully integrated unity and an ultimate return to the unity which Rome alone possesses.

Vatican II may be viewed either as a rearguard action by the conservatives, or as a transition to more radical developments in the future. The assessment may well be more an indication of the standpoint of the observer than of the essential position. Time will doubtless demonstrate which assessment is vindicated by subsequent events.

VATICAN CITY, see PAPAL STATES

VAUGHAN, CHARLES JOHN (1816-1897). Dean of Llandaff, Wales. Educated under Thomas Arnold at Rugby, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1839, Vaughan was ordained in 1841. After a short period in Leicester he became headmaster of Harrow, which he raised from some sixty ill-disciplined boys to a flourishing and well-organized school between 1844 and 1859. When vicar of Doncaster (1860-69) he began training young men for the ministry, who were known as "Vaughan's doves," continuing this work after he became master of the Temple (1869-94). Among his 450 pupils was the future archbishop, Randall Davidson. Vaughan was a good parish priest and an exceptionally fine preacher, his expository sermons being impressively delivered with strong conviction. He was hostile to High Church practices and to the contemporary German critical views of the Bible. When dean of Llandaff (1879-97) he refused several offers of preferment. His Nonconformist sympathies brought close links with the founding in 1883 of University College, Cardiff. He left strict instructions that no biography of him should be written. G.C.B. DAVIES

VAUGHAN, HENRY (1621-1695). Poet. From a Welsh family, he was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, fought briefly for the Royalists in the Civil War, and spent the rest of his life as a country doctor. He acknowledged the influence of George Herbert* in his religious poems, Silex Scintillans (1650, enlarged 1655), but in his experience he is more of a mystic than Herbert. In this regard he may owe something to the Hermetic interests of his twin brother, Thomas. Two of his emphases deserve particular mention. One is the link he saw between the nonhuman creatures and God in, by contrast with man, an unfallen intercourse; the other, his quasi-Platonic view of the prenatal existence of the soul with God. As a poet his work is uneven, and he is often unable to sustain the inspired level at which he opens a poem. ARTHUR POLLARD

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, RALPH (1872-1958). English composer. Son of a clergyman in the west of England, he studied at Cambridge, at the Royal College of Music, and with Bruch in Berlin. For a time he was a church organist, but soon gave it up and devoted himself primarily to composition. He was noted as a lecturer, a folksong collector, and a choral conductor. He was a deep student of Elizabethan music, which was one of the contributing factors to his striking and original personal style. Like Schütz,* in his maturity he took time out to study with an acknowledged master, Maurice Ravel.

Although his personal views bordered on agnosticism, he was the only major twentieth-century composer for whom religious music has been a highly significant part of his total output throughout his career, from his early and unconventional oratorio, The Holy City, to his large Christmas cantata, Hodie, written at eighty-two. He was musical editor of The English Hymnal (1906, rev. 1933), to which he contributed such stirring original tunes as Sine Nomine and King's Weston, together with many adaptations of folk melodies, and many Welsh hymntunes previously little known outside of Wales. He also shared in editing Songs of Praise and The Oxford Book of Carols. Although his number of anthems is not great, these are fresh and new in approach. His festival setting for congregation, choir, organ, and full orchestra of "All hail the power of Jesus' name" is the most ambitious of all his pieces based on hymns. The unaccompanied Mass in G minor is an outstanding work. There are several compositions based on Pilgrim's Progress, culminating in the fullscale opera of 1951, which he called A Morality.

While not strictly church music, there are various other works that draw their inspiration from Christian themes: the Mystical Songs on poems by George Herbert, the Tallis Fantasia for string orchestra, the Fantasia on Old 104th Psalm Tune for piano, chorus, and orchestra are representative. It would not be too much to say that Vaughan Williams has been the greatest single force in Protestant music in the English-speaking world thus far in the present century. He is also the composer of nine symphonies, a variety of concertos, orchestral works, operas, and chamber music.

VEDAST (Vaast) (d.539). Bishop of Arras. Born possibly in W France, he came into contact with Clovis, the first Christian king of the Franks. Vedast accompanied Clovis* to Reims for the latter's baptism after his legendary conversion in a battle against the Alemanni. On the way Vedast is reputed to have cured a blind beggar by prayer and the sign of the cross. This miracle is reported to have confirmed Clovis in the Christian faith. Vedast became bishop of Arras in 499 and spent the remainder of his life restoring Christianity to that area.

VENN, HENRY (1724-1797). Anglican clergyman. Descendant of a long line of clergymen, he was born at Barnes and educated at Cambridge, where he graduated in 1745. He became fellow of Queens' College in 1749, the year also of his ordination. He served various curacies until his appointment in 1759 as vicar of Huddersfield in Yorkshire. He found the town, says Bishop J.C. Ryle, "dark, ignorant, immoral," but when he left for health reasons twelve years later it was "shaken in the centre by the lever of the gospel." He then became vicar of Yelling in Huntingdonshire until just before his death. As a preacher he was esteemed highly by many, including the Countess of Huntingdon, William Cowper, and Charles Simeon. He was chosen to give the funeral orations for William Grimshaw and George Whitefield. Although the author of two volumes (The Complete Duty of Man and Mistakes in Religion), Venn is perhaps more highly regarded as a letter-writer. Living in a controversial age of Calvinism against Arminianism, he held a theological position evidently both scriptural and well-balanced in disputed points and also in pastoral counseling. J.D. DOUGLAS

VENN, HENRY (1796-1873). Anglican clergyman. Eldest child of John Venn,* he was born at Clapham Rectory. A fellow of Queens' College, Cambridge, he was presented by Wilberforce to the living of Drypool in 1827 and was incumbent of St. John's, Holloway, from 1834 to 1846. His greatest work was as secretary of the Church Missionary Society from 1841 until shortly before his death (for the first five years in conjunction with his pastorate). Venn saw in Matthew 28:19 the emergence of national churches, with marked national characteristics, throughout the world; missionary policy should thus aim at the "euthanasia of a mission" through the stimulation of "self-governing, self-supporting and self-propagating churches" (the "three-self" formula is attributed both to Venn and Rufus Anderson). His secretaryship witnessed a vast increase in "native clergy" and—sometimes against missionary opposition—in the responsibilities they carried, and the beginnings of the indigenization of the episcopate. His death saw his policies drastically modified, but never formally abandoned. A.F. WALLS

VENN, JOHN (1759-1813). The son of Henry Venn,* born shortly before the latter's institution at Huddersfield, he was educated at Cambridge, became rector of Little Dunham, Norfolk, in 1783, and by Charles Simeon's* instrumentality, became rector of Clapham in 1792. The Thorntons, Wilberforce, and Zachary Macaulay were among his parishioners, and he became virtually chaplain to the Clapham Sect* of Christian political activists. He took an active part in the formation of the Church Missionary Society, carried the main burden of its administration in its early years, and drafted some of the normative memoranda and reports. His health, always bad, required his resignation of these duties in 1808.
A.F. WALLS

VERBECK, GUIDO HERMAN FRIDOLIN (1830-1898). Dutch-American missionary to Japan. Reared in the Netherlands town of Zeist under Moravian influence, he studied engineering in Utrecht and at the same time developed linguistic, literary, and musical skills. Emigrating to the USA (1852), he studied at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Auburn, New York (1855-59), then was ordained by the Dutch Reformed Church and sailed to Japan as a missionary. He established a school in Nagasaki and taught English through the Bible. At government request he opened a school for Japanese interpreters, using the NT and the American Constitution as textbooks. Several of his students became prominent in national affairs. In 1869 he headed a school in Tokyo which became eventually the Japanese Imperial University. Later he was appointed official translator of foreign documents and treatises for the Japanese government. In 1879 he returned to missionary activity, teaching in the theological school, lecturing, and preparing literature for the Japanese church. S. RICHEY KAMM

VERBIEST, FERDINAND (1623-1688). Jesuit missionary to China.* A Dutchman trained in mathematics and astronomy, he became assistant to J.A. Schall* in Peking and unsuccessfully defended the Jesuits against the false accusers who would have had Schall executed. After the latter's death and a controversy over the Calendar, he was appointed, like Schall had been, president of the board of astronomy in succession to his discredited Chinese predecessor. Verbiest and other missionaries had close and friendly contacts with Emperor Kang Hsi (who studied mathematics under Verbiest's tuition), for whom they conducted all kinds of public works. Although the emperor turned a blind eye to the law that prohibited Chinese from becoming Christians, Verbiest was convinced that the future of Christianity lay in the hands of the Chinese clergy, and he founded a seminary in which they could be trained.

VESPERS. The evening Daily Office of the Western Church. It is preceded by None and followed by Compline.* Its structure and solemnity are similar to that of Lauds* (the morning Office), with four or five Psalms, a Bible-reading, a hymn, the *Magnificat, and a collect. Often the altar is incensed during the chanting of the Magnificat. Appropriate changes and additions are made on holy days, ember days, etc. With Lauds it has the distinction of being the oldest of the seven daily offices, and its celebration in the late afternoon rather than at night may be traced back to the time of Benedict (c.500). The Anglican service of Evensong* is based on Vespers, but with additions, e.g., from Compline. PETER TOON

VESTIARIAN CONTROVERSY. The dispute in the English Church over clerical dress which began about 1550 and reached its peak in 1566. The controversy was in two parts. The first, principally involving John Hooper,* who had returned from exile in Switzerland, took place in 1550-51 in the reign of Edward VI.* Hooper refused to be consecrated bishop of Gloucester if he had to wear the surplice and rochet as required by the Prayer Book of 1559. Eventually he compromised, but only after a literary debate with N. Ridley* had begun, the advice of Jan à Lasco,* Martin Bucer,* and Peter Martyr* had been sought, and the Privy Council had acted. The second part came early in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I,* who restored vestments in her royal chapel in 1549. In 1560 the bishops required their clergy to wear a cope during Holy Communion and a surplice in other services. The "hotter" Protestants in Parliament and Convocation protested about this compulsion. The authorities, however, pressed on and in 1566 Archbishop M. Parker* issued his Advertisements which made certain vestments compulsory. Then followed a determined attempt, especially in London, to enforce conformity, and as a result some Puritan ministers were deprived of their livings.

A literary warfare broke out with many tracts (e.g., A brief discourse against the outwarde apparell and Ministring Garments of the Popish Church) attacking the compulsory use of vestments. For Parker the use of vestments belonged to those things termed adiaphora, but for the men who opposed him their use was a relic of popery. Though many Puritan ministers acquiesced, the opposition to vestments never left Puritanism, and it was very evident among the Elizabethan Separatists and later among the sects of the Puritan Revolution.

See J.H. Primus, The Vestments Controversy (1960). PETER TOON

VESTMENTS. The traditional eucharistic apparel of the Eastern and Western churches are, in origin, the dress worn by the Roman citizen in the first centuries A.D. In the primitive church there was no special ministerial garb for services, but from 400 to 800, while secular fashions changed, the clergy continued to wear in church the dress of earlier centuries. The albe, amice, chasuble, dalmatic, girdle, maniple, stole, and pallium were established liturgical vesture by the ninth century; and as the Middle Ages advanced, additions were made, and various symbolic, fanciful explanations were given to the different eucharistic garments, together with special prayers to be used when vesting. The albe was a development of the tunica alba of the Roman gentleman; the chasuble of the paenula, a cloak covering the body, sewn in front and put over the head; the maniple of the mappula, a handkerchief; and the stole of the orarium, a napkin. All these garments underwent modifications, particularly in size, in order to facilitate movement, and also by the addition of apparels and orphreys.

The 1549 Prayer Book allowed the use of a plain, white albe and a vestment or cope (a choir and processional vestment, dating back to the sixth century), but these were abandoned in the Second Prayer Book. The 1559 Ornaments Rubric may have allowed their use, but not until the nineteenth century was their use revived by the Anglo-Catholics. In the Revised Canons (1969) they are one of the permitted forms of eucharistic vesture, though with no particular doctrinal significance.

See H. Norris, Church Vestments: Their Origin and Development (1949), and C.E. Pocknee, Liturgical Vesture (1960). JOHN A. SIMPSON

VESTRY (Lat. vestiarium, "robing-room"). In England until the end of last century this was the place where ratepayers of a parish met to carry out parochial business, but the name came to be applied also to the collective body of parishioners. The vestry is still responsible for certain aspects of ecclesiastical business. In the USA, each Protestant Episcopal Church parish has a vestry with clearly delineated duties. In Scotland the word is used to describe the minister's retiring room where, in the case of small parishes, meetings of the kirk session are held.

VEUILLOT, LOUIS (1813-1883). French Roman Catholic writer. Born near Orléans, this self-taught son of a cooper returned to a living Catholic faith during a visit to Rome in 1839. Thereafter he devoted his exceptional journalistic skills to the defence of the Ultramontane* cause in France, chiefly as editor of L'Univers (1843-60 and 1867-74). He made it the most powerful Catholic journal of the time. His influence was especially great among the conservative lower rural clergy. He criticized Napoleon III's policy, particularly when it endangered the Papal States or other Catholic interests, and Napoleon suspended the journal from 1860 to 1867. His aggressiveness and hostility to any compromise with liberalism made him unpopular with more liberal Catholics, but he was generally protected from even episcopal critics like Dupanloup* by the support of Pope Pius IX.* Veuillot strove continually for a full restoration of Catholic order to France, thus reversing the French Revolution and its consequences. At first he opposed the Falloux Laws (1850) which once more allowed Catholic schools; he wanted nothing less than a totally Catholic educational system. He accepted the Laws only at the pope's persuasion. Residing in Rome during Vatican I,* he gave energetic support to the cause of the definition of papal infallibility. HADDON WILLMER

VICAR (Lat. vicarius, "substitute" or "representative"). Ecclesiastically the term applies to Christ's earthly representatives. In the Roman Church it means the pope, who (as the "Vicar of Christ") claims universal jurisdiction from Christ's words to Peter (John 21:16ff.), and until the ninth century it referred also to emperors. Among Protestants, chiefly in the Anglican Communion, it can mean the parish priest, perpetual curate, or a minor cathedral official (vicar-choral). In the medieval office, the tithes went usually to a monastery in return for religious services, and when a secular priest was substituted for the religious he was called vicar also.

See too VICAR GENERAL and VICAR APOSTOLIC. C.G. THORNE, JR.

VICAR APOSTOLIC. Formerly one to whom the pope delegated responsibility in some distant outpost of his jurisdiction, the vicar apostolic is now more usually a titular bishop appointed to a territory either without bishops of its own, or where the latter are for some reason unable to carry out their episcopal functions.

VICAR GENERAL. A term known to have been applied to the pope, but more often used in the Church of Rome to describe the representative of a bishop, usually an archdeacon. In 1535 Henry VIII of England gave the title to Thomas Cromwell* as his representative in church matters. In the modern Church of England the title survives as a separate office only in one diocese; usually it is combined with the function of chancellor of the diocese.

VICELIN (c.1090-1154). Missionary bishop and apostle to the Wends. Born at Hameln, Germany, he studied at Paderborn, was a canon and teacher at Bremen, and a student at Laon, France. In 1126 he was ordained and sent by Bishop Adalbero of Bremen as a missionary to the Wagrian Wends. His little success depended upon rare intervals of peaceful relations between the pagans and neighboring Christian princes. After several disappointments, he founded a monastery of Augustinian Canons* at Neumünster in Holstein (1141) on the German-Wendish border, the center of his missionary attempts. Unfortunately the devastation of Wendish lands by Holsteiners and a crusade against the Wends in 1147 swept away the results of many years' labor and destroyed any possibility of peaceful conversion of the Wends. Vicelin was consecrated bishop of Oldenburg beyond the German frontier (1149) and became embroiled in an investiture conflict. He died at Neumünster two years after he became completely paralyzed. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

VICTOR (fifth century). Bible commentator. A presbyter of Antioch, he compiled a Greek commentary on Mark from studies in Matthew, Luke, and John by earlier writers such as Origen, Titus of Bostra, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria. The earliest extant commentary on Mark, it was very popular in the East, and survived in more than fifty codices of the gospels. Victor wrote also a commentary on Jeremiah.

VICTOR (d.554). Bishop of Capua from 541. Very little is known of his life, and only fragments of his writings survive. Victor wrote a treatise on the date of Easter which was cited by Bede, a book on Noah's Ark, and a work on the Resurrection. Only fragments of these works are known, but his most important work, a Latin harmony of the gospels, was later translated into German and has survived intact. This work, the Codex Fuldensis, is based on the *Diatessaron of Tatian but utilizes the Latin of the Vulgate.

VICTOR I (d.198). Pope from 189. Born in Africa of Latin stock, he was the first pope to bear a Latin name. The most significant feature of his ten years in office was his clash with the Quartodecimans* led by Polycrates,* bishop of Ephesus, with each side claiming apostolic authority for its dating of Easter. Victor seems to have regarded the matter just as much as a challenge to his authority, and to have seen it as a choice between Rome and Ephesus. He threatened with excommunication Polycrates and his fellow bishops from Asia Minor, and when they defied him went through the motions of carrying out the sentence. Irenaeus* considered the action too drastic, and though he disagreed with the Easterners he intervened, as did others, on their behalf. While it appears that the pope withdrew the sentence, the interlude did something to consolidate the position of the bishop of Rome. Nevertheless the matter was not finally disposed of until the Council of Nicea (325) when the Roman view was upheld. Victor acted with severity also in the case of others suspected of heresy. J.D. DOUGLAS

VICTORINUS (d. c.303). Earliest Latin exegete, and martyr under Diocletian. He was bishop of Pettau, near Vienne. Jerome, our chief source, lists commentaries by Victorinus on various biblical passages, but only that from Revelation is extant. Jerome criticized his style and repudiated the Millenarianist tendencies of this exegesis. Victorinus was influenced by Origen* especially, Papias* of Hierapolis, Irenaeus,* and Hippolytus.* Victorinus's belief in the reign of Christ on earth beginning with the resurrection of the just in the seventh millennium also appears in his partially extant De fabrica mundi. This latter is no longer considered to be part of his lost commentary on Genesis, but actually a treatise on the week of creation, in which symbolic emphasis is placed on the number seven. Probably because of his Millenariani views, Victorinus's writings were included among the apocryphal works by the *Decretum Gelasianum. The treatise Against All Heresies attributed to him by Jerome is lost, but stylistic and other internal evidence suggests it is not identical with that treatise which was appended to Tertullian's Prescription of Heretics. DANIEL C. SCAVONE

VICTRICIUS (c.330-c.407). Bishop of Rouen. At the age of seventeen he enlisted in Roman military service, but renounced this when he was converted shortly afterward. He was flogged and sentenced to death, but following a miraculous delivery he later studied philosophy and theology, and was chosen bishop about 380 while still a layman. He founded many churches in rural areas, encouraged the monastic life, and brought many relics from Rome to the Rouen cathedral. He preached among the heathen in Gaul, Flanders, Hainault, and Brabant. When his orthodoxy was impugned, he went to Rome to defend himself. He met Emperor Honorius and Innocent I, who sent him a famous decretal relative to disciplinary matters. He died before 409, as a letter to Augustine from Paulinus does not name him in a list of living eminent bishops of Gaul. HAROLD LINDSELL

VIENNE, COUNCIL OF (1311-12). Church council which is considered the fifteenth ecumenical council by the Roman Catholic Church. It was convoked by Clement V and was in session from 16 October 1311 until 6 May 1312. A major reason for calling it was the question of the Knights Templar.* The transfer of the papacy to Avignon in 1309 made the pope more subject to the influence of the king of France, Philip IV,* who desired the property of this wealthy crusading order. In 1307 he had ordered the arrest of the Templars in France and by torture had exacted confessions of heresy and immorality. He then brought pressure on Clement V to suppress the order—and his presence at the council forced the pope to meet the royal demands and to suppress the order. The council discussed also a new Crusade which, despite Philip's promise to undertake it, never materialized. The council tried to settle a dispute among the Franciscans,* condemned the Beguines and Beghards,* prescribed the teaching of Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldaic at universities to aid in missionary work, and issued a number of canons dealing with church reform. RUDOLPH HEINZE

VIGILANTIUS (b. c.370). Gallo-Roman opponent of excessive asceticism. Born in Calagurris, Aquitaine (Cazères), and brought up in an inn, he managed the estates of Sulpicius Severus,* acquired a considerable literary culture, and was ordained presbyter at Barcelona (395). He traveled in the East, but was repelled by the extreme asceticism there. Meeting Jerome* at Bethlehem, he returned to Gaul after a quarrel with him and published an attack on Jerome's asceticism and intolerance, labeling him an Origenist.* He declared that honor paid at martyrs' tombs was excessive, that hermit life was cowardice, and that presbyters should be married before ordination. Jerome replied in Contra Vigilantium (406), a work full of violent invective, from which most of our knowledge of Vigilantius comes. He nicknamed him "Dormitantius" (i.e., "Dormant" instead of "Vigilant") for his rejection of vigils.* J.G.G. NORMAN

VIGILIUS (c.500-555). Pope from 537. Although his father, a Roman noble, served in Theodoric's Gothic administration, Vigilius's destiny lay with Byzantine political forces. When a Roman deacon, he was Boniface II's intended successor. In 532 the Roman clergy and senate blocked his consecration, and he was sent as Agapetus I's apocrisarius to Constantinople, where he became confidant of the Monophysite empress Theodora.* When the Goths abandoned Rome, Vigilius became the imperial candidate for the papacy. On the pretext of treason Silverius was deposed, tried, and exiled by the Byzantine general Belisarius, and Vigilius succeeded him in the spring of 537.

Acting contrary to his alleged commitment to Theodora, Vigilius demonstrated an effort to avoid secular manipulation of the papacy by refusing to exonerate and reinstate Anthimus, a deposed Monophysite patriarch, and by defending Chalcedonian orthodoxy in correspondence with Emperor Justinian* and Patriarch Menas.* Consistent with Western clerical conviction, Vigilius dissented from Justinian's 543/44 edict—an obvious concession to Monophysites—against the Three Chapters.* Forcibly brought to Constantinople under imperial orders, Vigilius was with difficulty persuaded to accept Justinian's position. He did so only after expressing reservations based on the Chalcedon decrees, stating his position in Iudicatum (548). Intense Western reaction to his concession moved him to return to his initial stance, which he set forth in Constitutum. When the Council of Constantinople* (553), over which Vigilius had refused to preside, confirmed the emperor, Vigilius again vacillated and under protracted pressure acquiesced in the council's decision. Allowed after a seven-year absence to return to Rome, he died on the way. His role in the Three Chapters Controversy has been cited as historical evidence against the Roman claim of papal infallibility in doctrinal matters. JAMES DE JONG

VIGILIUS OF THAPSUS (fl. c.470-500). Bishop of Thapsus. After being summoned to appear before the Arian king Huneric at Carthage about 484, he fled to Constantinople, where he was well received. Here he wrote his Libri quinque contra Eutychetem ("Five Books Against Eutyches") in which he defended Chalcedonian orthodoxy and refuted Monophysitism.* He wrote other books against the developed Arianism* which still existed in the East, but only the Dialogue is extant. Not a few treatises attributed to him have now been shown to be by other authors.

VIGILS. Periods of prayer, services of worship, or times of fasting* held during the night or on the day before a church festival. Nocturnal services began very early in Christian history and were possibly influenced both by the example of Jesus praying at night and by His parable of the Ten Virgins with the arrival of the Bridegroom at midnight. Certainly by about A.D. 200, vigils were kept for a part of the night before the services at Easter and Pentecost. In the Western Church the vigils have gradually become daytime rather than nighttime activities. They are regarded as periods of fasting and preparation for major festivals. In the Roman Church a vigil of fasting is enjoined before Whitsunday and before the feasts of the Assumption, All Saints, and Christmas, while periods of devotional preparation are expected for others. The Church of England's Prayer Book enjoins sixteen vigils for sixteen holy or feast days. PETER TOON

VILMAR, AUGUST FRIEDRICH CHRISTIAN (1800-1868). German Lutheran theologian. Vilmar's studies at Marburg (1818-20) led him to embrace Rationalism, a creed which he found increasingly less satisfying over the course of the next two decades. He began his career as a secondary school teacher in Rotenburg (1823), Hersfeld (1827), and Marburg (1833). Elected as a liberal candidate to the newly formed parliament of Hesse and appointed to a ministerial committee for religious education, he contributed significantly to the improvement of the quality of religious instruction and general education in Hesse.

His unhappiness with certain movements of his own time, and his studies in the Church Fathers and the Lutheran confessions, led him to break with the Rationalism and liberalism of his earlier years and to become a leader of the political and theological conservatives in Hesse. Refused confirmation as the successor to the general superintendent of Kassel, Vilmar was called instead to the chair of theology in Marburg (1855). His theological stance was reflected in his most famous book, Die Theologie der Tatsachen wider die Theologie der Rhetorik (1856). Vilmar contrasted the objective facts of salvation and their effect in human experience with theology that is nothing more than mere "talk" or "intellectual knowledge." These facts are embodied in the institutional church, which is identical with the body of Christ. Vilmar deemphasized the priesthood of all believers and stressed the mediation of salvation through the ministerial office. He regarded the institutional church as the last wall of defense against the disintegrating and disruptive forces at work in nineteenth-century Europe. Most of his theological words appeared posthumously, including Die Augsburgische Konfession (1870); Die Lehre vom geistlichen Amt (1870); Christliche Kirchenzucht (1872); Pastoraltheologie (1872); Dogmatik (1874); Theologische Moral (1871); Collegium Biblicum (6 vols., 1879-83); and Predigten and geistliche Reden (1876.)

VIMONT, BARTHÉLEMY (1594-1667). French Jesuit missionary to Canada. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1613 and was ordained priest in 1626. In 1629 he came to North America as a missionary, where he served as chaplain to a settlement on Cape Breton Island, Canada, returning to France the following year. He arrived in Canada again in 1639 as third superior of the Jesuits in New France and served as curé of Notre Dame in Montreal. He returned to France nearly twenty years later and died there.

VINCENT, JOHN HEYL (1832-1920). Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Sunday school educator. Born in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, he studied briefly in the Wesleyan Institute in New Jersey and was ordained elder in 1857. He held pastorates in Illinois, pioneered in Sunday school improvements such as uniform lessons (1872), and with Lewis Miller in 1874 started the world-famous Chautauqua* conferences in W New York State. The general conference of his church elected him bishop in 1888. He served in Switzerland from 1900 to 1904. The Chautauqua Movement (1886) is one of his more important books.

VINCENT DE PAUL (1581-1660). Founder of the Lazarists.* Born in Landes, France, of a peasant family, he studied humanities at Dax (1595-97) and theology at Toulouse (1604). He was for two years a slave in Tunisia after capture by pirates (1605-7). Following his conversion he was almoner to Queen Marquerite of Valois (1610); pastor of a congregation at Clichy (1612-26); and chaplain to the family of Philippe-Emmanuel de Gondi, general of the galleys, which included looking after their household staff and the peasants on their estates. Seeking God rather than benefices, he decided for a life of serving the poor; in 1617 he founded the first Confraternity of Charity. He was appointed superior of the Visitation convents in Paris (1622); principal of the Collège des Bons-Enfants, Paris (1924); superior of the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentians or Lazarists), and Daughters of Charity (1633). He started retreats for ordinands, organized the Tuesday Conferences for clergy, founded seminaries, established provincial relief during the Wars of Religion, ministered to Louis XIII, served on Louis XIV's Council of Conscience, actively opposed Jansenism,* and lived to see his work increase in and spread beyond France. Canonized in 1737, he was in 1885 named patron of all works of charity for which he is in any way the inspiration.

VINCENT FERRER (1350-1419). Dominican preacher. He was born at Valencia and entered the Order of Preachers in 1368. After studying at Tarragona and Barcelona and then teaching natural sciences and logic, he completed his studies at Toulouse in 1379 and became prior at Valencia. There he wrote his De vita spirituali. In 1384 he resigned in order to teach in the local cathedral school. His growth in holiness and intellect were parallel: "study followed prayer, and prayer study." Marvels accompanied his prayers. Keen to heal the Great Schism,* he supported Clement VII,* the Avignonese claimant, for whom he wrote De moderno Ecclesiae schismate to Pedro IV of Aragon. Repudiating Benedict XIII* for prolonging unnecessarily the travesty, he took no part in the Council of Constance which ended the Schism. Morally concerned, in 1399 he set out from Avignon to preach for the next twenty years across Europe. Known as "Angel of the Judgment," he also protected and converted the Jews.
C.G. THORNE, JR.

VINCENTIAN CANON. The test of religious truth laid down by Vincent of Lérins* (early fifth century) in Adversus profanas omnium novitates haereticorum Commonitorium, an attack on Augustine's predestination teaching. The criterion states "what has been believed everywhere, always and by all." Vincent maintained that the final ground of truth lies in Scripture; by this threefold test of universality, antiquity, and consent the church can differentiate between true and false traditions. The order of the tests should be noted: certain nineteenth-century English writers frequently misquoted the canon by putting "always" first.

VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS (c.1190-1264). Medieval French encyclopedist. Born in Beauvais, he studied at the University of Paris and entered the Dominican Order about 1220. He returned to Beauvais in 1228 and between 1247 and 1259 completed his major work, Speculum Maius, an effort to collect all the knowledge of his day in a great encyclopedia. The completed work consisted of eighty books and is the most extensive encyclopedia written during the Middle Ages. He was a close friend of Louis IX of France and became lector in the royal court about 1240. At the request of the king he wrote also a treatise on the education of princes.

VINCENT OF LÉRINS (d. before 450). Semi-Pelagian* presbyter in the monastery on the island of Lérins (now called St. Honorat off Cannes). Under the pseudonym "Peregrinus," Vincent wrote two Commonitoria or "Notebooks" (434), of which only one has survived. With the growth of theological options in the West and with them growth in the number of questions, it was necessary to find a new standard by which the validity of a point of view might be assessed. Holy Scripture alone cannot resolve the controversies, since Scripture itself can be interpreted in different ways. All teaching must be assessed by the Catholic principle of tradition, the so-called Vincentian Canon.* While there may be growth in the understanding of the dogmatic deposit of faith, there may be no alteration in its content. Antiquity is in every case to be preferred to theological novelty or innovation. Vincent directed this principle against Augustine, whose doctrine of grace he regarded as a novelty. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

VINEGAR BIBLE. The popular name of a fine folio edition of the Bible, printed at Oxford in 1716-17 by John Baskett (d.1742), the king's printer. The headline of Luke 20 reads "The Parable of the Vinegar" instead of "The Parable of the Vineyard."

VINES, RICHARD (1600-1656). Puritan divine. Born in Leicestershire and educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, he was ordained and taught in a grammar school at Hinckley before becoming rector of nearby Caldecote. Apart from these posts he lectured weekly at Nuneaton. When Civil War broke out, he went first to Coventry and then to London for safety. Here he was granted the sequestered rectory of St. Clement Danes. Appointed by Parliament to the Westminster Assembly,* he served on the drafting committee for the Confession of Faith. In 1644 he was made master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where despite his other duties he did useful work by increasing student enrollment. He was not happy about the rise to prominence of the Independents,* and he solemnly opposed the execution of Charles I.* He refused the Engagement of Loyalty to the Commonwealth and was removed from the mastership of Pembroke. However, knowing his abilities, the parishioners of St. Lawrence Jewry, London, called him to be their minister. He accepted and later increased his influence by participating in regular lectures at St. Michael's, Cornhill. When Cromwell's first Parliament discussed in 1654 what were the fundamentals of the faith, Vines was one of the divines whose advice was sought. He was named also as a ministerial assistant to the ejectors in the London area in Cromwell's "National Church."

In theology he had views similar to R. Baxter.* He would have been happy with a modified episcopacy in the English Church, and on the Atonement he held Amyraldist* ideas. His publications are few, but his reputation with his contemporaries was such that by some he was called "the Luther of England." PETER TOON

VINET, ALEXANDRE RUDOLPHE (1797-1847). French-speaking Swiss theologian, often called the "Schleiermacher of French Protestantism." Born in Lausanne, he studied theology there, taught French at Basle for twenty years, then returned to Lausanne in 1837 as professor of practical theology. Ordained in 1819, he tended to deprecate traditional doctrines unless they had been confirmed by personal experience, and he put great stress on good conscience and right conduct. He advocated separation of church and state, wrote a book on the subject (ET 1843), and took a leading part in the founding in 1845 of the Free Church in the canton of Vaud. His other works included Études sur Blaise Pascal (1848). J.D. DOUGLAS

VIRET, PIERRE (1511-1571). Protestant Reformer. An important figure in the Calvinist Reformation, he acquired an interest in the study of the NT from Romain before attending the College of Montaigu at Paris (1518-31). There he joined the Reformers under the influence of G. Farel,* and became a preacher serving Reformed congregations at Payerne, Neuchâtel, and Lausanne. He joined Farel in Geneva (1534), where an attempt to poison him damaged his health. Later at Lausanne he was instrumental in founding the Reformed church and establishing a flourishing academy. His work here ended due to the opposition of Bern (1559). Viret was a trusted friend and correspondent of Calvin and was associated with him at the Lausanne disputation (1536) and in Geneva (1541-42; 1559-61). He transferred his activities to S France and presided over a Reformed national synod at Lyons (1563). Viret was an extremely effective preacher and a gifted writer. His major work is Instruction chrestienne en la doctrine de la Loy et l'Évangile (1564)—three volumes which contain a popular version of Calvinist teaching in dialogue form. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

VIRGILIUS OF SALZBURG (c.710-784). Early medieval Irish scholar, abbot, and bishop. Little is known of his early life. He began his career in Ireland where he served as abbot of the monastery of Aghaboe and gained a reputation for geographical knowledge. In 743 he went to the court of Pepin,* who later sent him to Bavaria to become bishop of Salzburg. Virgilius, however, refused consecration and administered only the temporal affairs of the diocese. He soon came into conflict with his archbishop, Boniface,* who disapproved of the arrangement. Boniface first directed Virgilius to rebaptize all who had been baptized by a priest who had utilized a grammatically incorrect version of the baptismal formula. Virgilius appealed to Pope Zacharias and was upheld. In 748 Boniface charged Virgilius with holding a heretical view on the spherical shape of the earth, and with making intrigue against him. No trial seems ever to have been held, and Virgilius was not condemned. In 767 he finally accepted consecration, and among the significant services he rendered the church was the conversion of the Alpine Slavs in 772. He was canonized in 1233 by Gregory IX. RUDOLPH HEINZE

VIRGIN BIRTH, THE. The two synoptic accounts of the birth of Jesus are complementary, yet they are evidently written to serve a different interest. Luke (1–2) stresses the personal intervention of God in the life of Mary, whose intimate feelings are recorded. In Matthew (1–2) the emphasis falls on the fulfillment of OT prophecy, with use made of the proof-text, Isaiah 7:14 (Septuagint). If Matthew follows an "apologetic" or evidential line, Luke's narratives raise questions of a metaphysical character (H. von Campenhausen prefers to call this "dogmatic"). Luke's record focuses on the relationship between the Son of God and Mary's child.

The remaining NT data are at best circumstantial and largely inferential, based on references to Jesus as "Mary's son" (Mark 6:3), as though the event of His birth lay under a cloud of suspicion, and to Paul's descriptions, such as Gal. 4:4: "born of a woman." Early patristic commentators looked to John 1:13 which was read as a singular: "qui ex deo natus est." It must, however, be acknowledged that the Virgin Birth does not belong to the public kerygma of the NT writers. Its esoteric character is best explained on the assumption that there were "secret traditions" (disciplina arcani) which were not divulged to the pagan public but reserved for believers once they had confessed the faith.

The two tracks of a "dogmatic" and an "apologetic" motif in this teaching are followed in the sub-apostolic age. Ignatius cites the teaching as part of the church's confessional statements; he is obviously intent on refuting docetism* by this assertion of the Lord's full humanity in His taking a human body. On the other side, Justin's apologetic writing against the Jew Trypho includes the Virgin Birth as an item fulfilled by the Messiah. The use of the teaching for theological purposes does not come until Irenaeus who, with his doctrine of recapitulation, needed to show that the last Adam as true man won back all that had been lost by the first Adam in paradise. Also as anti-Gnostic polemic it was needful to stress the taking of a human body against the idea that matter was inherently sinful. Once established in the church's dogmatic system, it was the dogmatic line which was pursued, especially when the mission to Israel petered out. By a strange irony of history, however, the dogma that began as an assertion of Jesus' full humanity was used to buttress an ascetic theology and practice, as the celibate state became highly valued.

VISSER 'T HOOFT, WILLEM ADOLF (1900- ). Dutch ecumenical leader. Born in Haarlem, he studied theology at Leyden and was successively secretary of the World Alliance of YMCAs, general secretary of the World Student Christian Federation,* and general secretary of the World Council of Churches* (not formally constituted as such until 1948). He was the author of numerous publications that distinguished him as one of the foremost ecumenical statesmen of modern times. A multilinguist with sound Dutch common sense, he was associated with many aspects of the WCC which raised doubts in evangelical circles. Nevertheless he never succumbed to the aridity often encountered in professional ecumenists, and just before his retirement in 1966, answering a question from Christianity Today, he expressed three convictions: "that it is the duty of every Christian to proclaim the divine lordship of Jesus Christ; that this Gospel is to be addressed to every man, whatever his religious or cultural background may be; that it is to be given in its purest form, that is, in accordance with the biblical witness and unmixed with extraneous or cultural elements."

VITALIAN (d.672). Pope from 657. Born at Segni, he was enthroned as successor of Eugenius I, and announcing his accession to the emperor Constans II, thereby instituted friendly relations between Rome and Constantinople during the early part of his reign and also during the Monothelite* controversy. Unsuccessful in attempts to exert jurisdiction over Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, who refused to appear in Rome, he had good relations with England since he consecrated Theodore* as archbishop of Canterbury in 668. Relations between East and West were not helped when Vitalian's name was removed from the Diptychs (list of people for whom prayers were said) in the church of Constantinople.

VITORIA, FRANCISCO DE (c.1486-1546). Spanish Dominican theologian and philosopher. Born at Vitoria in the Basque country, he joined the Dominicans in 1504 and later studied at the University of Paris, where he encountered Nominalism and Renaissance humanism. From 1523 to 1526 he lectured in theology at Gregorian College, Valladolid, and from 1526 till his death held the prime chair of theology at Salamanca. Though he made original contributions in politico-legal theory, he himself published nothing, and his ideas are to be found in the summaries of his classroom lectures posthumously published. Most famous are De Indis, De Iure Belli, and De Potestate Civili. Following Aristotle,* he saw that man must live in an organized society, but argued for the independence, self-sufficiency, and sovereignty of a local state whose power lies in the body politic, and whose purpose is to promote the common good and protect its citizens. The sovereign local state is in turn part of an international society. In dealing with the governance of this international society Vitoria pioneered the ideas, later developed by Suárez,* which form the basis of international law. There is a natural "law of nations" (jus gentium) which must legally govern the international community. Building upon these politico-juridical ideas, Vitoria developed his most famous position—a staunch advocacy of the rights of the New World Indians, and severe criticism of Spanish exploitation.

VITRINGA, CAMPEGIUS (1659-1722). Protestant Orientalist and biblical exegete. Born at Leeuwarden, son of the recorder of the supreme council of Friesland, he learned Greek and Hebrew early, and studied philosophy and theology at Franeker and Leyden universities. From 1860 he taught at Franeker, refusing to leave for more prominent positions at Utrecht and Leyden, holding the chairs of oriental languages and of theology (1682) and becoming professor of sacred history (1693). His biblical exegesis from the orthodox Calvinist standpoint was marked by freshness and penetration. His chief work was a commentary on Isaiah (1714-20). Other writings include De Synagoga Veteri (1696; ET The Synagogue and the Church, 1842) and Anakrisis Apocalypseos Ioannis Apostoli (1705), a commentary on Revelation combining the Recapitulation and Chiliastic interpretations. This last was widely influential, and made Chiliasm popular among German Pietistic circles, despite the Augsburg and Helvetic confessions, which branded Millenarianism as a Judaistic heresy.

VITUS (d.303?). Martyr. He is said to have been born of pagan parents in Lucania, S Italy, and secretly brought up as a Christian by his nurse Crescentio and her husband Modestus. All three were martyred in Diocletian's* persecution. He is invoked against sudden death, hydrophobia, and the convulsive disorder known as chorea or "St. Vitus' Dance." His cult spread in the Middle Ages, especially among Germans and Slavs. He is sometimes regarded as the patron saint of comedians and actors.

VLADIMIR (956-1015). Prince of Kievan Russia responsible for the Christianization of Russia. He came to power about 980, after a civil war with his two brothers at a time when Russia was experiencing a pagan revival. The first Christian ruler of Russia was his grandmother, Olga (945-62), but her conversion does not seem to have made a significant impact on her subjects, and her son Sviatoslav did not adopt his mother's faith. According to legend, Vladimir investigated Judaism, Islam, and Western Christianity before adopting the Eastern Orthodox faith around 988. Two years later he proclaimed Christianity as the faith of his realm and ordered his subjects to be baptized. He was later canonized by the church and called "equal to the apostles" for his work in converting Russia. In addition, he is remembered as an able and successful ruler.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

VOETIUS, GISBERTUS (Gijsbert Voet) (1588-1676). Dutch Calvinist theologian. Born at Heusden near Utrecht, he studied at Leyden as the disputes between Gomarus* and Arminius* began the "Remonstrant controversy." As a minister and young theologian, he supported the Contra-Remonstrant party, which defended an orthodox and systematized Calvinism. He was a delegate to the Synod of Dort* (1618-19), which condemned the Remonstrants. As a mature scholar, skilled in oriental languages as well as theology, Voetius moved to Utrecht as a professor in 1634, and for three decades and more was known internationally as a defender of scholastic Calvinism. He defended vigorously the independence and importance of the church, attacking the idea (associated with the Remonstrants) that the state should oversee it and allow a wide range of doctrinal positions in it. He rejected state patronage, held that toleration of erroneous doctrines weakened both church and state, and viewed usury and related economic questions as matters for the church to judge. Holding that truth in religion and philosophy began with Scripture, he viewed with alarm the methodology of Descartes* and engaged in heated controversy with his Utrecht colleague Regius (De Roy) and with Descartes himself (1640s).

Voetius's personal religious life was devout, influenced by Puritan devotional writings, and Pietist. At first supporting the mystical pietism of Jean Labadie, he later denounced him for his disregard of the organized church. The most influential of his controversies was perhaps that with Cocceius* (De Cock), an able Dutch Calvinist theologian, who developed a system stressing a succession of divine-human covenants. This implied, as Voetius soon discerned, that OT regulations (e.g., on the Sabbath) would not apply under the "new covenant." The resultant polemics split the Calvinist church and theological faculties into contending factions for a generation after Voetius's death in 1676.

VOLTAIRE (François-Marie Arouet) (1694-1778). French Enlightenment philosopher and littérateur. He was an extremely versatile figure and the greatest formulator of the new Enlightenment* vision of secular and rationalist regeneration. Educated by the Jesuits, he was introduced early to Descartes,* Montaigne, and Pierre Bayle.* Exile in England (1726-29), where he learned from the English Deists* and especially Locke,* permanently transformed his worldview. His commitments were published in Lettres philosophiques (1734). Throughout most of his life he was out of favor in official France because of his biting and penetrating critique of the Establishment. He did serve Frederick II as philosopher-poet (1750-52), but his most productive years came under the patronage of Mme. de Chatelet in provincial Lorraine (1734-49), and his country estate at Ferney near Switzerland where as a kind of patriarch he implemented his social ideals (1758-78). Ferney became a model Enlightenment village of 1,200 people with a watch factory, a silk-stocking mill, and social contentment under paternalistic Voltaire. During his final year (1778) he was treated in Paris as virtually a living human deity. The devotees of the Revolution gave him a grand burial in the Pantheon (1792).

Voltaire's gifts were especially literary. In over twenty plays, beginning with Oedipe (1718), he forcefully presented his ideals; theater was one of his chief means of "evangelizing" the French social élites during fifty years. He was a master of wit and devastating ridicule. His satire Candide (1759) summarized his critique against prevailing notions of the ultimate goodness of evil. As historian he reversed traditional historiography with its emphasis on Divine Providence by recasting human history immanentistically, as in his Essai sur les moeurs et l'ésprit des nations (1769) and Philosophie de l'histoire (1765). His heroes were philosophers, scientists, and poets, not kings and generals.

He called himself a Theist,* but his god was, as Torrey puts it, "a vague impersonal being with no particular concern for the affairs of men." The organized Christian Church was an abomination to him. Christ he admired as a great man, and Christian ethics he considered correct insofar as they concurred with elements found in other religions. He had an intense commitment to humanistic justice, which he believed would be achieved by enlightened amelioration of society which he called "progress." His many articles in the Dictionnaire Philosophique summarized his religious and cultural ethic. He conducted an immense correspondence with kings, philosophers, poets, merchants, and ordinary people throughout the world—more than 20,000 letters to over 1,200 correspondents. Thirty-nine of his works were placed on the Index. A Voltairian outlook typified a large sector of the educated classes in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. He was the supreme example of the proud, self-sufficient humanist.

VOLUNTARYISM. The belief that membership in a religious body should be free and uncoerced. It follows that such bodies should not be supported by the state but rather by voluntary contributions, and that all groups should stand equal before the law and independent of it and of each other. Voluntaryism is generally considered to be an American movement which grew out of the early insistence on the separation of church and state, and which by its belief in the legitimacy of a variety of religious tastes and ideas led to a pluralism of churches. Another effect of the movement was, on the one hand, to play down theology that tended to be a divisive issue and, on the other, to encourage an activism which emphasized the role of the laity and resulted in the founding of missions and the conducting of education and charitable work. Voluntaryism was a term used also by English Nonconformists, particularly in the nineteenth century, generally to distinguish their position in relation to the Church of England and more specifically to refer to their efforts to maintain an educational system which was church-directed and free from government aid and control. E. MORRIS SIDER

VOLUNTEERS OF AMERICA. An evangelical, social welfare organization founded in 1896 at New York City by Ballington Booth, son of Salvation Army leader William Booth, because his father refused to democratize the Army's administration. Retaining the quasi-military character of the Salvation Army,* the Volunteers hold nondenominational Protestant services and Bible classes, distribute Christian literature, comfort the aged in hospitals, and serve prisoners through the Volunteer Prisoners League. Dispensing social and material aid to over 2 million annually at nearly 600 service centers, they operate girls' homes, rehabilitation centers, summer camps, and day nurseries. Led by Maud Charlesworth Booth, Ballington's widow, from 1940 to 1948 and by their son Charles Brandon Booth after that, they now number about 33,000. D.E. PITZER

VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH (1852-1925). Roman Catholic philosopher and writer. Born at Florence, Italy, of an Austrian diplomat father and a Scottish mother, Friedrich went to England with his family when he was fifteen and stayed there for the rest of his life, apart from periods of travel. Baron of the Holy Roman Empire (an inherited title), student of many subjects, and master of seven languages, he never held an office in the Roman Catholic Church, and consorted indeed with its stormy petrels such as G. Tyrrell* and Loisy.* One of his major preoccupations was the relation of Christianity to history, but he is chiefly remembered as a guide and encourager of souls—and not always in an orthodox way. He was a Roman Catholic who did not believe in purgatory hereafter, a religious man who expressed horror that E.B. Pusey* read only religious books, and a mystic who walked the world with open eyes. He wrote copiously, his published works including a study of Catherine of Genoa (1908), Essays and Address (1921) and The Reality of God (1931). Not surprisingly, however, since he was one of the dying race of thoughtful correspondents, his Selected Letters (1928) have proved to be the most durable. His tombstone in an English country churchyard bears the simple inscription, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

VORSTIUS, CONRADUS (Konrad von der Vorst). (1569-1622). Reformed theologian, a leader of the Remonstrant party in the Dutch Reformed Church.* Born in Cologne, he studied at Heidelberg, and then at Geneva under Beza.

Teaching at the academy at Steinfurt near Heidelberg, he was charged with Socinian* tendencies and had to clear himself before the Heidelberg theological faculty. Meanwhile, in the Netherlands the "Remonstrant controversy" was in full swing. Arminius,* at Leyden, tried to soften the orthodox Calvinist teachings on predestination. After Arminius's death (1609), Uytenbogaert and other followers issued the Remonstrance* of 1610. Vorstius was asked to take Arminius's place at Leyden, and accepted (1610). But a book on the nature and attributes of God aroused an immediate storm; the theological faculty at Heidelberg, and James I of England, an amateur theologian, were among those who felt that Vorstius followed Socinius and denied the divinity of Christ. Vorstius became involved in a series of bitter polemics with the Contra-Remonstrants,* and especially with the Frisian theologian Lubbertus.*

In 1612, though his salary at Leyden was continued, he was forbidden to teach; he retired to Gouda, where he translated some of Socinius's works. The Remonstrant controversy continued, mixed in with political factionalism, and grew more embittered. The Synod of Dort* (1618-19) upheld traditional Calvinist orthodoxy, condemned the Remonstrants, and arranged the exile of the Remonstrant leaders. Vorstius spent his last years in Holstein, dying at Tönningen.

VOSS, GERARD JAN (1577-1649). Dutch church historian, associated with the Remonstrant or Arminian* controversy. Educated at Leyden, he served for several years as rector of the Latin school at Dort. There he developed his textbook on Latin grammar (published in 1618), which remained in use in the Netherlands for two centuries. A supporter of the Remonstrant ("liberal") party in the heated polemics over the revisionist ideas of Arminius and his followers, he was named regent of one of the colleges at the University of Leyden (1615). After the Synod of Dort* condemned the Remonstrants (1619), he was ousted from his post, but soon (1622) made professor of chronology and rhetoric, and later (1625) professor of Greek. In 1632, at fifty-five, with an established reputation, he was called to the new university at Amsterdam as professor of general and church history. Voss's mature field of study was the history of dogma, and he was one of the first to apply historical methodology to that sensitive field. His major work was his 1642 Dissertationes tres de tribus symbolis in which he demonstrated that the traditional attribution of the "Athanasian Creed"* to Athanasius* could not be correct. His collected works were published at Amsterdam after his death (6 vols., 1695-1701).

VULGATE, THE. The Latin version of the Bible, derived from the work of Jerome,* declared by the Council of Trent* in 1546 the only authentic Latin text of the Scriptures. In 382 Pope Damasus* commissioned from Jerome a revision of the Latin gospels. He proceeded to revise the Psalms ("Roman" psalter) and other OT books, perhaps of his own accord. In 386 he settled in Bethlehem, where he engaged in patristic translation and commentary work: he revised more thoroughly the Old Latin psalter ("Gallican" psalter), and continued to revise further OT books on the basis of the Septuagint, but with reference to the Hebrew and Origen's* Hexapla. Little remains of this: Job and prefaces to Chronicles and works of Solomon. Increased knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic made him convinced that a version on a Hebrew basis was necessary, and to this he applied himself from about 390; the end of 404 saw its completion. The different parts of the OT differ much in execution. For the NT, there are good reasons for denying to Jerome any part in the revision of any books other than the gospels.

The translation did not meet with acceptance at first, especially the OT. Even two centuries later we find some divergent opinions, and Old Latin biblical manuscripts continued to be copied for centuries in some areas. It was thus inevitable that by transcriptional error and by contamination Jerome's work should become obscured and in need of purification. The medieval process of edition, recension, and correction produced a complex history. The most significant names in this are as follows, although the part ascribed to some by earlier scholarship is not necessarily correct: Victor* of Capua, and Cassiodorus* (Italy, late sixth century); Peregrinus and Isidore of Seville* (Spain, fifth and seventh centuries); Ceolfrid (England, early eighth century); Theodulf* and Alcuin* (court of Charlemagne, ninth century); and a number of Cistercian, Dominican, and Franciscan scholars of the late Middle Ages. Although neither Greek nor Hebrew was widely known in the West, some knowledge was from time to time found, and this with the additional influence of exegetical interests and traditions left its mark on different recensions.

After the invention of printing, a number of impressions appeared, the Clementine Vulgate (1592-98) at length emerging as the authorized version. Modern philology has produced much advance in knowledge on both Old Latin and Vulgate. Two critical editions are outstanding. The NT was edited by a succession of British scholars between 1898 and 1954. Meanwhile, in 1908 Pius X commissioned an international group headed by Aidan Gasquet* to revise the Vulgate text of the whole Bible. Centered in the Benedictine Abbey of St. Jerome in Rome publication began in 1926, and in 1969 had reached the thirteenth volume, Isaiah. A hand edition edited by R. Weber appeared in 1969, containing the whole Bible with Apocrypha and some spuria such as the Epistle to the Laodiceans.

WACE, HENRY (1836-1924). Dean of Canterbury. Born in London and educated at Rugby and Oxford, he was ordained in 1861 and for seven years from 1863 was curate of St. James's, Piccadilly, during which time he began regular contributions to The Times. He held a variety of other ecclesiastical positions in London (1872-1903), some of which overlapped: chaplain and preacher of Lincoln's Inn; professor of ecclesiastical history and principal, King's College; rector of St. Michael's, Cornhill; royal chaplain. In 1903 he was appointed dean of Canterbury, which post he held until his death. A strong exponent of Reformation principles, he never hesitated to make his views known in the church's assemblies. Himself a man of versatile scholarship, he rejected the claims of higher criticism. He wrote several books, including The Gospel and Its Witnesses (1883) and The Bible and Modern Investigations, but he is best known for his collaboration with William Smith in the Dictionary of Christian Biography (4 vols., 1880-86), and with Philip Schaff in the second series of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (14 vols., 1890-1900). J.D. DOUGLAS

WAKE, WILLIAM (1657-1737). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1717. Educated at Oxford, he became chaplain to Lord Preston, the English ambassador to France, and went to Paris in 1682. He attained prominence through theological dialogues with Bossuet,* and met Gallicanism* which advocated the independence of the Roman Catholic Church in France from papal authority. On his return to England in 1685, he became successively preacher at Gray's Inn, rector of St. James, Westminster, dean of Exeter (1703), and bishop of Lincoln (1705) before going to Canterbury. In 1693 he published an English Version of the Genuine Epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, and in 1700 The Principles of the Christian Religion (commenting on the Catechism). In the convocation controversy he wrote The Authority of Christian Princes over their Ecclesiastical Synods Asserted (1697) and The State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Convocations (1703) in answer to Francis Atterbury's Rights and Privileges of an English Convocation. The archbishopric was a reward for his support of the Whigs and the Protestant succession during Anne's reign, but he opposed the government's bill to repeal the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts in 1718. He engaged in discussions (1717-20) with French ecclesiastics on a projected union between the Anglican and Gallican churches, but these ended without result after the death of Louis Ellies du Pin. Wake regarded the Church of England as a via media between Rome and Geneva, but recommended changes in the Prayer Book to meet the scruples of Nonconformists.

See J.H. Lupton, Archbishop Wake and the Project of Union (1717-20) (1896); and N. Sykes, William Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1657-1737 (1957). JOYCE HORN

WALAFRID STRABO (c.808-849). Theologian and monk, named from Latin strabus, "squint-eyed." Trained at Reichenau, he studied under Rabanus Maurus* at Fulda and there befriended the famous Gottschalk.* Chaplain of the empress Judith after 829, he was named abbot of Reichenau in 838, but was unable to divorce himself from the political struggles between Charles the Bald and Charlemagne's successors. His scientific and theological writings showed him to be one of the second-generation scholars of the Carolingian Renaissance.* Cultural historians owe him a debt for studies of the day's liturgical and religious customs.

WALCH, JOHANN GEORG (1693-1775). Protestant theologian. Born at Jena and inclined to Pietism in his youth, he taught at Jena all his life, as professor of philosophy (1718), poetry (1721), and theology (1734). He attacked the ideas of Wolff in the name of Lutheran orthodoxy, though his heavy dependence on natural theology reveals his indebtedness to the Enlightenment.* He treated of Lutheranism in two massive works, one historical (5 vols., 1733-36), and one doctrinal (5 vols., 1730-39). He also edited Luther's works in twenty-four volumes (1740-52) with valuable introductions and critical apparatus. From 1754 he was ecclesiastical councillor for Saxe-Weimar. His sons Johann (1725-78) and Christian (1726-84) were also noted Lutheran theologians.

WALDENSES. The key dates in Waldensian history are 1210—the Albigensian-Waldensian Crusade; 1532—the synod of Chanforans; and 1848—the Albertine Statute of Emancipation. Before 1210 much is legendary prehistory, but under the phrase the "first Reformation," the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries are currently studied by V. Vinay and the Czech A. Molnar for the mutual interplay of Waldensian, Hussite, Wycliffite, and Bohemian Brethren* ideas. The "second" (sixteenth-century) Reformation turned the Waldensians from a movement into a church, the Synod of Chanforans being the focal point. For 300 years before 1848 their history illustrates the tragic side of Cuius regio, eius religio, in an unbroken sequence of persecution, guerrilla war, exile, and return. Since 1848, it is a story of the cultural and evangelical penetration of the Italian nation and its overseas dependencies.

Notions of Waldensian origins have varied with the propaganda slant of the historian. The vestigial community in the Cottian Alps provided the early Protestants in their mainly theological or ecclesiological debates with a splendid riposte to the question, "Where was your Church before Luther?" just as in the earlier reformation, with its sociopolitical radicalism, did legends of fourth-century bishops who rejected the Constantinian church-state establishment, and of the ninth-century bishop Claudius who rejected Charlemagne's restatement of it. Radical Waldensians today prefer to derive their name from Peter Waldo and the Poor Men of Lyons in the eleventh century, recognizing a debt too, to Arnold of Brescia,* Peter de Bruys,* and Henry of Cluny.

The marks of the medieval Waldensians were: evangelical obedience to the Gospel, especially the Sermon on the Mount; a rigorist asceticism; a "donatist"* aversion to recognizing the ministry of unworthy-living priests; belief in visions, prophecies, spirit-possession, and Millenarianism; and a concern for social renewal. Though anti-Constantinian, anti-imagery, and anti-hierarchy, they tended to reject only Catholic practices that were clearly contra-Scripture. At times they attended Mass, being content that their own meetings were private ones after the style of religious societies. Their clergy (Barbes) itinerated. During the "first" (Hussite) Reformation, Waldensian influence spread all over Europe. We hear of communities with episcopal as well as presbyterian ministries. Possibly, however, "Waldensian"—especially on the pen of Catholic writers, and these are practically all the sources we have—was a portmanteau word for all varieties of un-Roman activity. This first Reformation was, of course, almost completely suppressed north of the Alps, and south of them survived only in such inaccessible parts as the Waldensian valleys and Calabria.

In the "second" Reformation Geneva and the Waldensians made early contact, and 1532 saw the latter accepting the pattern of a Reformed church and ministry that they have since retained. Their worship was now to be open and ordered, with no Mass, and they were to have regular Genevan Confession of Faith (a little light, perhaps, on anti-Constantinianism, but accepted). As Savoyards they were French-speaking (their Scriptures being Olivetan's* version), and under the Catholic House of Savoy they were to face 300 years of persecution, at first physical and violent (cf. Milton's 1655 sonnet), later civil and economic. These sufferings made them see themselves not just as a Reformation Church, but as an elect people with a God-given destiny—"the Israel of the Alps."

Their modern epoch began with the Statute of Emancipation of 1848 (celebrated on 17 February each year). Admired, assisted, and advised by Anglo-Saxon evangelicals (notably General Beckwith, who said to them, "Evangelize or perish"), they exploited fully Cavour's policy of "A Free Church in a Free State," and abandoning their French patois, they exchanged their ghetto image for that of an Israel in diaspora—a cultural and religious leaven at work all over Italy. By founding a theological college in 1855, first in Florence and later in Rome, they have come to terms with the highest values in Italian culture. From it Luzzi gave Italy an Italian Bible, and Giovanni Miegge a distinctive Barthian theology that supported intellectual, spiritual, and physical resistance to Fascism. Latterly, the Facoltà Valdese in Rome played a vital role in ecumenical contact with Roman Catholic theology, and V. Subilia is perhaps the acutest Protestant assessor of Vatican II. A daughter college in Buenos Aires (shared with Methodism) serves South American Protestantism.

The supreme court of the church, a synod meeting annually in Torre Pellice, elects a moderator (for seven-year terms) and an executive board (Tavola). Though only 20,000 communicant members strong, the church has schools, orphanages, homes for the aged, hospitals, and a publishing house (Claudiana). It supports missions in Africa as well as Servizio Cristiano in Riesi and Palermo, Sicily. In this last work, Tullio Vinay pioneers the sociopolitical involvement of radical Christianity.

All Italian Protestantism has been strongly influenced by the Waldensian ethos. No church union has taken place, but with the Italian Methodist Church, cooperation has reached the stage of mutual recognition of ministry and membership, and the regular holding of joint meetings of the two synods.

WALDENSTRÖM, PAUL PETER (1838-1917). Swedish theologian and churchman. Born at Lulea, he studied at Uppsala, then taught biblical languages and theology at Gävle, a seaport on the Gulf of Bothnia. Ordained in 1864 in the national church, he found its theological outlook depressing. Deeply interested in the revival movement, he stressed Scripture rather than creeds, and insisted that salvation came through a personal commitment to Christ. The Fall he held to have alienated man, not God. "God is love, and does not need to be reconciled, but a reconciliation which takes away the sin of the world is needed, and has been given in Christ." He resigned from the national church's ministry in 1882 and worked for the Evangelical National Association, a movement founded in 1856 for the reform of religion in Sweden, of which Waldenström became leader and editor of the movement's publication Pietisten. In 1878 he organized the Swedish Mission Covenant which, though technically still within the national church, adhered to congregational principles. Many of its members emigrated to the USA where they formed what is now the Evangelical Covenant Church. Waldenström was also a member of the Swedish Riksdag. His devotional writings were widely regarded as the best reading after the Bible. J.D. DOUGLAS

WALES. Welsh Christianity traces its ancestry to the period of the Roman occupation although nothing is known about its first introduction to Britain. Three British bishops were present at the Council of Arles* (A.D. 314), and despite the crumbling of Roman power and the incursions of invaders, Christianity was able to survive. It was given a new unity and sense of purpose by Illtud and Dubricius between A.D. 500 and 547. Their work culminated in an upsurge of spiritual vigor in the period commonly labeled "the Age of Saints" when men of the caliber of Deiniol, Padarn, Cybi, Seiriol, Teilo, and David left an indeliable imprint not only on the minds of the Welsh people but on their place-names. Welsh Christianity had by now developed traditions that it would not abandon, even at the behest of Augustine of Canterbury (603), and in consequence Welsh and English Christianity parted. The period of isolation in the history of the Welsh Church lasted until 750 when, belatedly, it accepted the Roman method of calculating Easter. Despite the tempestuous nature of European life in the following centuries, the Welsh Church was able to maintain its vigor and to withstand the challenge of barbarism.

By the time of the Norman Conquest, the church in Wales was virtually a national church. But changes were in the offing. By the middle of the twelfth century, the Welsh bishops had submitted to Canterbury. During the same period too the dioceses were defined and territorial parishes came into existence. In its internal life and administration the church began to follow the patterns of Western Christendom generally. The clas, the characteristic ecclesiastical unit of the Celtic Church, disappeared, and continental monasticism penetrated into Wales, with the Cistercian Order taking pride of place. At the same time, the English crown tightened its hold on the church and its revenues. After 1323, when the pope began to intervene in elections, there was a marked increase in the tendency to appoint foreigners to Welsh livings and offices. Inevitably there was growing frustrations among Welsh clergy as was demonstrated by the support they gave to the national insurrection under the leadership of Owain Glyn Dwr in 1400. Despite the ravages of that war of liberation and its failure, the church enjoyed a period of revival in the latter half of that century, in piety, discipline, and monastic vocations. But as in Western Europe generally, the beginning of the sixteenth century was also the time when decline set in. Although Wales was hardly touched by those spiritual and cultural forces which elsewhere made for reformation, its rather romantic attachment to the House of Tudor, its anticlericalism together with a gradual decay in spiritual seriousness, led it to acquiesce in the changes introduced by Henry VIII.*

The Protestant Reformation came to Wales by the same legal processes as it did in England. It was the Welsh language that constituted the main difference. The Book of Common Prayer* and the NT appeared in Welsh in 1567, translated mainly by Bishop Richard Davies* and William Salesbury.* In 1588 came William Morgan's* translation of the whole Welsh Bible—one of the most momentous events in Welsh history. Although a powerful group of Welsh Roman Catholic exiles kept alive the hope of reconverting Wales, the Reformation came to be accepted by the Welsh people. The hold of Protestantism on the Welsh people was greatly strengthened by Puritanism* and Methodism.* Under the leadership of men like Walter Cradock, Vavasor Powell,* Morgan Llwyd,* and John Miles,* Puritanism found support on a modest scale; Baptist, Congregationalist, Presbyterian, and Quaker congregations came into existence. They maintained their ground in the persecutions between 1660 and 1689, but suffered a period of stagnancy at the beginning of the eighteenth century.

In 1735 the Evangelical Revival started under the leadership of Howel Harris,* and he was soon joined by such men as Daniel Rowland* and William Williams,* Pantycelyn. By about 1780 this revival was developing into a massive folk-movement with far-reaching social and cultural effects. The Methodists themselves, hitherto a group within the Church of England, withdrew in 1811 to form the Calvinistic Methodist* Church of Wales. The older denominations shared in the new spiritual vigor and by midcentury Nonconformity* had become the dominant form of Welsh Christianity. It left no aspect of the life of the nation untouched, and by the Victorian Age it was the major force in education, culture, and politics. It was inevitable that the Church of England would have to be disestablished, and this occurred eventually in 1920. Welsh religious life throughout the nineteenth century continued to be revivified by religious revivals, the greatest of which occurred in 1859-60 and 1904-5.

But in the twentieth century Welsh Christianity ran into very great difficulties. After reaching a new zenith about 1908 it began to decline in its hold upon the public. The reasons for this are extremely complex. The decline of spirituality, the loss of a dynamic theology, the temptations of power, the intrusion of anti-Christian philosophies, World War I, the social distress that followed it—all these severely affected the churches. Yet by today there are real signs that this ancient Christian tradition is being revived in its faith.

WALKER, THOMAS (1859-1912). Anglican missionary to South India. "Walker of Tinnevelly" (Tirunelveli) was born at Matlock Bath, Derbyshire; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained in 1882; and sent by the Church Missionary Society to Tinnevelly in 1885. Apart from his evangelism and his Bible teaching in the Tamil field, he was noted for preaching at conventions (on Keswick lines), particularly at hill stations, and he exerted considerable influence among the reformed section of the Syrian Orthodox Church (newly gathered into the Mar Thoma Church*) by preaching tours in Kerala at the Syrians' invitation, and especially at the Maramon Convention. He was associated closely also with the work of Amy Carmichael* of Dohnavur, who wrote his biography. ROBERT J. MC MAHON

WALKER, WILLISTON (1860-1922). American church historian. Born in Portland, Maine, he was educated at Amherst College, Hartford Seminary, and Leipzig University. In 1888-89 he lectured at Bryn Mawr College, then for twelve years was professor at Hartford Seminary before becoming professor of ecclesiastical history at Yale, where he remained till his death. A member of many learned societies, he wrote books ranging from On the Increase of Royal Power under Philip Augustus (1888) to American Congregationalism, biography of churchmen, The Reformation (1900), French Trans-Geneva (1909), and his most noted, A History of the Christian Church (1918).

WALTER OF ST.-VICTOR (d. c.1180). Prior of the canons regular of St. Augustine connected with the former abbey of St.-Victor in Paris. The house was founded between 1108 and 1110 by William of Champeaux,* teacher of Peter Abelard, and chartered in 1113. It swiftly became a home for a series of distinguished theologians, mystics, and biblical commentators. Walter, though not the most famous of the Victorines, gained a certain prominence with a treatise called Against the Four Labyrinths of France, which attacked Abelard,* Peter Lombard,* Peter of Poitiers, and Gilbert de la Porrée. Walter described the theology of these four masters as a danger to the church and castigated the dialectical method which they employed. His charges, however, did not seriously impede the growth in popularity of the dialectical method among his contemporaries. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

WALTHER, CARL FERDINAND (1811-1878). American Lutheran theologian. Born in Langenchursdorf, Saxony, he attended the Gymnasium at Schneeberg and the University of Leipzig, was ordained into the Lutheran ministry in 1837, and made pastor in Braeunsdorf. While at Leipzig he had come under Pietistic influences, which combated the Rationalistic influences of his younger years. He was profoundly influenced by Martin Stephan, pastor in Dresden, and came into the Erweckungsbegung, the newly awakened Lutheran confessional movement. He joined the emigrants under Stephan, arriving in Missouri early in 1839. Here he was made pastor at Dresden and Johannisberg, Perry County, Missouri. He played an active role in the deposition of Martin Stephan, who had developed autocratic tendencies and was accused of moral turpitude. In 1841 Ferdinand succeeded his brother Otto Herman as pastor of the Saxon church in St. Louis. In 1849 he became professor of theology at Concordia Seminary, which was moved from Perry County to St. Louis in December of that year. Walther retained the post of chief pastor of the Gesamtgemeinde (the Lutheran congregations in St. Louis as they were newly established became part of the one-parish structure) while serving as professor and president of the seminary.

He was the first president of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and Other States (The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod), founded in 1847, and the first president of the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of North America, founded in 1872, a federation of German and one Norwegian Lutheran synods which was strictly confessional. Walther participated in various theological controversies in his lifetime: the controversy on church and ministry with the so-called Buffalo Synod, with Wilhelm Loehe* and the Iowa Synod, a controversy with the German Methodists, a controversy within his own synod on Millennialism, and a controversy within the synodical conference on predestination and election. He was regarded as an outstanding preacher and the published output of his sermons is fourteen volumes.

His chief theological writings are on the question of church and ministry (mainly Die Stimme unserer Kirche in der Frage von Kirche und Amt), a manual on pastoral theology (Americanisch-Lutherishe Pastoraltheologie), and his lectures on Law and Gospel (Die rechte Unterscheidung von Gesetz und Evangelium translated as The Proper Distinction between Law and Gospel). Walther is generally regarded as the outstanding Lutheran theologian in America in the nineteenth century.

WALTHER, JOHANN (1496-1570). German composer. A competent but not outstanding composer, he was closely associated with Martin Luther at Wittenberg. In 1524 they published in that city the famous Geystlich Gesangk-Buchleyn (Little Sacred Songbook). This was not a collection of hymns, but a choral collection in four and five vocal parts. The first edition contained forty-three pieces: five Latin motets, and the rest consisting of German Lieder (part-songs), of which twenty-three employed texts by Luther. It was the first Protestant book of its kind and went through many editions with changes of contents; it marked the beginning of the enormous literature of Lutheran choral music.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

WALTON, BRIAN (1600-1661). Bishop of Chester. Born in Yorkshire, he entered Magdalene College, Cambridge, in 1616, transferring later to

St. Peter's College. In later years he held numerous ecclesiastical posts. Around 1641 he aroused much opposition in controversy about city tithes in which, as a result of much legal research, he supported the rights of the clergy. After he had summoned his London parishioners for nonpayment of tithes, Parliament removed most of his preferments, and he was imprisoned for a short term. At the Restoration his benefices were returned, and the bishopric of Chester was conferred upon him. In the intervening years he worked on the vast English "Polyglot Bible" (6 vols., 1657), one of the first English works published by private subscription. This contained the entire Bible in nine languages. R.E.D. CLARK

WANGEMANN, HERMANN THEODOR (1818-1894). German mission executive. Influenced by the Pomeranian revival movement, he studied theology and in 1849 became director of a Lutheran teachers' college. Appointed director of the Berlin Mission in 1865, he held this post until his death. His leadership was so strong-willed and even authoritarian that the agency was popularly referred to as the "Wangemann Mission." His first love was the South African field, which he visited in 1867 and 1884-85, and he was not enthusiastic about the mission's move into China (1882) and German East Africa (1890). He built up a supportive constituency by organizing many local associations in E Germany, but he was seldom interested in cooperative efforts with other missions, either at home or abroad.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

WAR. This has been defined as any struggle between rival groups, featuring the use of arms or other means, which can be recognized as a legal conflict. Thus riots or individual acts of violence are excluded, but insurrections and armed rebellion would be included. The teachings of Christ if fully applied would rule out the use of violence (Matt. 5–7). However, since Christians live in a world where evil often predominates they have found it necessary to rationalize the use of force. In the process three major attitudes toward war have been articulated. Some, including most of the early churchmen, have adopted a pacifist position. Others have tried to formulate codes of just war. This attitude became prominent when Emperor Constantine made Christianity the most favored religion of the state and the barbarians invaded the Roman Empire. During the fourth and fifth centuries the church adopted from classical thought the teaching of the just war. As propounded by Augustine this type of conflict was to have as its goal the establishment of justice and the restoration of peace. It should be waged only under the authority of the ruler and be conducted justly (i.e., faith should be kept with the enemy, there should be no looting, massacres, or profaning of places of worship). Also, the clergy both secular and regular were not to participate in warfare.

The third major outlook toward war, the crusading ideal, became prominent during the Middle Ages. A crusade was a holy war fought under the auspices of the church for the sake of the ideal, the Christian faith. This represented a new way of thinking when compared with the just-war concept of justice conceived in terms of life and property. Since to the Crusades* the enemy was considered as a representative of evil, counsels of moderation toward the opposition tended to break down.

The pacifist, just war, and crusading views were well established by the close of the Middle Ages. With various adjustments they reappeared during the modern period of church history. At the time of the Reformation the Wars of Religion again forced Christians to articulate views of war. The Lutherans and Anglicans adopted the Roman Catholic position of the just war, the Reformed churches emphasized the crusade, and pacifism* was advocated by the Anabaptists* and the Quakers.* During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries there was little Christian thought on the subject of war, but in the twentieth century, with the development of huge national armies and the advent of two world wars, the three historic Christian positions have been restated. The crusading ideal predominated in the major churches with regard to World War I, pacifism was prominent between the two wars, and the mood of the just war was present during World War II.

Today, under the charter of the United Nations, many authorities believe that warfare between nation states is illegal and that the only legal war is an international police action to prevent aggression or to punish aggressors. However, some nations have opposed the United Nations forces, claiming that their legal national interests were at stake. Despite the fact that the Roman Catholic Church and the major Protestant bodies have taught the principle of the just war, due to the development of rocketry and nuclear weapons since World War II many leaders of the major Christian groups have espoused pacifism.

WARD, NATHANIEL (c.1578-1652). English Puritan clergyman and author. Born at Haverhill, Suffolk, he graduated from Cambridge, and after practicing law for a short time, turned to the ministry (1624-33). In 1634 he went to America because of persecution for Puritan views and became minister of a congregation at Ipswich. Although ill-health forced him to retire from the active ministry, his law degree from Cambridge made him extremely useful to New England's Massachusetts Bay Colony. He had a prominent part in writing the Body of Liberties (1641), the first codification of Massachusetts law. He is best remembered for his pseudonymous The Simple Cobler of Aggawam (1647). This was a satirical rebuke of English Puritans for yielding to the pressures of toleration. He returned to England in 1647 to participate in the Civil War.

DONALD M. LAKE

WARFIELD, B(ENJAMIN) B(RECKINRIDGE) (1851-1921). American Presbyterian scholar. Born near Lexington, Kentucky, into an old American family, he prepared for college by private study, then took his Arts degrees at Princeton (1871, 1874). He traveled in Europe for a year, then became an editor of the Farmer's Home Journal. Later he trained for the ministry at Princeton Theological Seminary, studied at the University of Leipzig (1876-77), and became assistant minister at the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. In 1878 he became instructor of NT language and literature in Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, holding the rank of professor from 1879 to 1887. In the latter year he became professor of didactic and polemical theology at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he succeeded A.A. Hodge.*

Warfield published a score of books on theological and biblical subjects, in addition to numerous pamphlets and addresses. An accomplished linguist of Hebrew, Greek, and modern tongues, he was at home in patristics, theology, and NT criticism. He was a committed Calvinist with a high regard for the Westminster Confession of Faith.* He held dogmatically to an inerrant Scripture, original sin, predestination, and a limited atonement. Among his writings are An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, The Lord of Glory, The Plan of Salvation, The Acts and Pastoral Epistles, and Counterfeit Miracles. After his death, collections of his articles were published in book form, entitled Revelation and Inspiration, Studies in Tertullian and Augustine, Calvin and Calvinism, The Westminster Assembly and Its Works, and Perfectionism (2 vols.). He fought a running battle with C.A. Briggs* and H.P. Smith* over biblical inerrancy, which he and Charles Hodge* defended vigorously. Some of Warfield's articles appeared in the Presbyterian and Reformed Review and in its successor, the Princeton Theological Review, both of which he edited. Perhaps no theologian of that age is as widely read and has had his books kept in print so long as Warfield.

HAROLD LINDSELL

WARHAM, WILLIAM (c.1450-1532). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1504. Educated in law at Oxford, he was sent by Henry VII on legal business to Rome and Antwerp (1490-91) and on a political mission to Flanders (1493). He became Master of the Rolls (1494), precentor of Hereford (1493), and archdeacon of Huntingdon (1496). He acted as envoy to Scotland, to Burgundy, and to the emperor Maximilian (1496-1502), negotiated treaties, and helped arrange the marriage of Arthur and Catherine of Aragon. Made bishop of London in 1502, he was translated to Canterbury in 1504, and appointed lord chancellor. In 1506 he arranged the marriage of Henry VII and Margaret of Savoy. He crowned Henry VIII* and Catherine of Aragon in 1509, and befriended Erasmus.

Wolsey* replaced Warham as lord chancellor in 1516, and from 1518 when Wolsey was made papal legate there was friction between them over precedence. Warham attended Henry VIII to France in 1520. Eight years later he was appointed counsel for Queen Catherine in the divorce proceedings, but was afraid to do anything to support her cause and was forced by Henry to advise Pope Clement VII* to annul the marriage. In 1531, when the clergy were obliged to recognize the king as supreme head of the church, Warham added the phrase, "so far as the law of Christ will allow." He protested ineffectively in 1532 against all parliamentary measures prejudicial to the pope's authority since 1529. He was a patron and benefactor of the New Learning, though entirely unsympathetic to Protestants.

See W. Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1888).

JOYCE HORN

WARNECK, GUSTAV (1834-1910). Founder of the science of missiology. First a pastor and then an official in the Barmen (Rhine) Mission (1871-77), he was a biblicist and stood close to the Heiligungsbewegung. He founded in 1874 the important scholarly journal of German missions, the Allgemeine Missionszeitschrift, initiated in 1879 the practice of holding regular missions conferences in the German churches, assisted in founding the Evangelical Bund in 1885, and occupied the first university chair of missiology in Germany at Halle (1896-1908). In an 1888 paper he called for decennial general missionary conferences supported by a continuing central committee which would coordinate Protestant missionary activity, a vision that was finally realized with the Edinburgh Conference* of 1910 and the formation of the International Missionary Council* in 1921. Warneck's five-volume synthesis of mission theory, Evangelische Missionslehre (1892-1903), and his many historical works establish him as Germany's leading missiologist.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

WASHINGTON, BOOKER TALIAFERRO (1856-1915). Negro educator. Son of a slave mother and a white father, he was educated at Hampton Institute, where he came to believe that only vocational training produced income and virtue for blacks. Called in 1881 to organize Tuskegee Institute, an Alabama school for Negroes, he grew more convinced that manual training, unlike classical education, would prevent Negroes from learning egalitarian ideas and provide them with jobs—neither of which was offensive to whites. At the Atlanta Exposition of 1895 he further pleased whites by declaring that blacks were interested in hard work, not social advancement. Washington hoped that sobriety and perseverance would eventually prompt white recognition of human equality, but that also encouraged whites to consider blacks only as manual laborers, and projected artisan and yeoman status for blacks in an increasingly mechanized society. Whatever the merits of his ideas, he was the leading spokesman of blacks in his day.

DARREL BIGHAM

WATERLAND, DANIEL (1683-1740). Theologian. Born in Lincolnshire and educated at Lincoln School and Magdalene College, Cambridge, he became master of his college (1714-40) and vice-chancellor of the university (1715). Much of his life was involved in the Deist* controversy. His accurate scholarship and brilliant writing did much to restore Trinitarianism in England against Arians* and Deists. His scholarly work Critical History of the Athanasian Creed (1713) remained the standard work on the subject for 150 years. In A Vindication of Christ's Divinity (1719) he attacked Samuel Clarke* and Daniel Whitby.* Waterland placed little faith in the evidential value of mystical experience or philosophical argument; he sought always to base Christian faith on objective evidence.

R.E.D. CLARK

WATKINS, OWEN (1842-1915). Wesleyan Methodist missionary. Born near Manchester, he entered the ministry in 1863. In 1876 he was sent to Natal for health reasons, and in 1880 became first chairman of the Transvaal and Swaziland district of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. He and his colleagues traveled extensively contacting independent African evangelists, setting up stations, purchasing mission farms, and providing pastoral care for white communities, especially on the Witwatersrand gold fields. In 1891 he visited Mashonaland with the Rev. Isaac Shimmin and obtained land grants from Cecil Rhodes. He contracted fever while walking two hundred miles from Umtali to Beira, and was invalided home in 1892. His ambition to lead an advance into Central Africa was unfulfilled, and he finished his ministry in British circuits.

D.G.L. CRAGG

WATSON, RICHARD (1781-1833). Wesleyan minister. Apprenticed to a Lincoln joiner, he received his first conference appointment as a Methodist preacher when only sixteen (his name does not appear in conference minutes until later). At nineteen his first publication appeared. His inquiring mind—and his argumentativeness—brought him under suspicion of heresy in his circuit, and he resigned in 1801, becoming later a preacher with the Methodist New Connexion* and secretary of their conference. In 1807 shattered health induced his resignation. He became editor of a Liverpool newspaper. In 1812 he reentered the Wesleyan ministry and became, with Jabez Bunting,* one of its outstanding figures. For twelve years he had secretarial responsibility for Wesleyan missions, of which, as of the abolition of slavery, he was a leading advocate. His impressive Christian Institutes (1823) were the first major work of Methodist systematic theology.

A.F. WALLS

WATTS, ISAAC (1674-1748). Hymnwriter. He was born at Southampton, son of a Dissenting schoolmaster, and was educated at Stoke Newington Academy. After a few years as a private tutor he became pastor of the London nonconformist church at Mark Lane in 1702, a post he retained, despite recurrent ill-health, for the rest of his life.

He is now best known for his hymns, which first appeared in Hymns and Spiritual Songs in 1707 and ran through sixteen editions with numerous alterations in the author's lifetime. This work had been preceded by his collection of religious poems, Horae Lyricae (1706), and was followed, among others, by Divine Songs (1715) for children and The Psalms of David Imitated in the Language of the New Testament (1719). These last include two of his most famous pieces, "O God, our help in ages past" and "Jesus shall reign," based respectively on Psalms 90 and part of 72. To these should be added among his more celebrated pieces "When I survey the wondrous Cross" and "There is a land of pure delight." In his own day, and later, he was renowned as an educationalist, not least for Logick (1725) and The Improvement of the Mind (1741).

Watts stands at that point in Dissenting history which marks the transition from Calvinism to Unitarianism, and there is evidence in his work of the influence of this movement. But he never subscribed to those versions of Calvinism which espoused the doctrine of total depravity. The "remains" of reason after the Fall might be "ruinous," but Watts insisted on making the best use of them.

In his hymnwriting, despite his Christianizing the Psalms, there is an austere OT quality about his vision, especially of God as all-powerful Jehovah, and in his epic sweep of time and eternity. His simple measures and familiar images serve only to emphasize the majesty of this vision.

See A.P. Davis, Isaac Watts (1943), and J. Hoyles, The Waning of the Renaissance (1971).

ARTHUR POLLARD

WAYLAND, FRANCIS (1796-1865). Baptist pastor and educator. Born in New York City, he had intellectual gifts which enabled him to enter the sophomore class at Union College, from which he graduated in 1813. His immediate interest was medicine, but after completing a course of medical study he experienced a profound religious change which led him to Andover Theological Seminary for a year of study in 1816. From 1817 to 1821 he taught various subjects at Union College, then came a five-year pastorate at the First Baptist Society of Boston before he returned to Union College as professor of moral philosophy. In 1827 he was elected to the presidency of Brown University, which post he held with distinction until his retirement in 1855. He was author of a plan for free public schools in Rhode Island. He gained a national reputation for a printed sermon, "The Moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise," and sponsored prison reform, emancipation of slaves, and free trade. Baptist historians have hailed him as one of the strongest defenders of religious freedom and toleration. His many published works include Domestic Slavery Considered as a Scriptural Institution (1845).

WEBB, CLEMENT CHARLES JULIAN (1865-1954). Anglican religious philosopher. The son of Benjamin Webb, founder of the Cambridge Camden Society, he spent the whole of his academic life at Oxford. He was distinguished in two spheres. As a historian of both medieval and modern religious philosophy, he produced a critical edition of the works of John of Salisbury,* and two important studies: Religious Thought in the Oxford Movement (1928) and Religious Thought in England from 1850 (1933). As a religious philosopher on his own account, Webb, working within the philosophical climate of late nineteenth-century Idealism, strove in a series of three volumes published between 1911 and 1920 to reconcile the idea of God as all-inclusive Absolute to that of God as Personality, apprehended in religious experience. His mediating position between the two schools of Absolute and Personal Idealism (he himself inclined to the latter) is not regarded as altogether satisfactory by modern scholars.

WEBB-PEPLOE, HANMER WILLIAM (1837-1923). Anglican clergyman. Born in Herefordshire and educated at Marlborough and Cheltenham colleges and Pembroke College, Cambridge, he was ordained priest in the Church of England (1863), he served as curate of Weobley, chaplain of Weobley Union, then as vicar of King's Pyon with Birley, Herefordshire, and St. Paul's Onslow Square, London (1876-1919), and prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, from 1893. A champion gymnast, he suffered an injury while at Cambridge, putting him on his back for three years in which position he did all degree and ordination examinations. A leader of the Evangelical party and chief promoter of Keswick, he also addressed the Northfield Bible Conference (1895) and wrote several books, including Christ and His Church and Calls to Holiness. He was also a strong supporter of missions, particularly among the Waldensians. C.G. THORNE, JR.

WEE FREES. A description often employed, usually by other Scottish Presbyterians and with a degree of affection, of the Free Church of Scotland.* The term may also be applied, perhaps even with greater accuracy, to those who, leaving the Free Church of Scotland, founded the Free Presbyterian Church* in 1893.

WEIGEL, VALENTIN (1533-1588). Lutheran mystical writer. Born at Naundorf, he studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and from 1567 was pastor at Zschopau, near Chemnitz. Suspected of holding impure doctrine (1572), he managed to clear himself, but his studies proceeded in an increasingly heterodox direction. In numerous writings, not printed till the following century, Weigel developed—under the supposed guidance of the inner light and from his readings in the Gnostics and medieval mystics—both an intensely subjective mysticism and a vast pantheistic system which left little room for Scripture, the church, or the means of grace, but all clothed misleadingly in Christian terminology stripped of its historic sense. Weigelianism became popular in the seventeenth century and exerted an influence on Boehme* and on the development of Rosicrucianism.* IAN SELLERS

WEIL, SIMONE (1909-1943). French Jewish writer, social and political activist, and religious seeker. A graduate of the École Normale Supérieure, she employed her talents as a teacher for a time, then took a position of laborer in order to identify with the worker, and later joined the International Brigade against Franco in the Spanish Civil War. She was forced to flee France during World War II, but soon returned from the United States to London to work for the Free French government. Because of an empathetic, forced diet, death came at the age of thirty-four. Her agnostic and anticlerical position was weakened during the latter part of her life by a sincere attraction to Christianity. Until her death she was torn between the two positions. In her writings she makes clear her continued "waiting for God."

JOHN P. DEVER

WEISS, BERNHARD (1827-1918). German Protestant NT scholar. He taught at the universities of Königsberg (1852-63), Keil (1863-77), and Berlin (1877-1908). Demonstrating that criticism and positive evangelical theology were not mutually exclusive, Weiss is one of a long line of conservative German scholars who have not been given the recognition they deserve. In addition to an important handbook of NT theology (1868; ET 2 vols., 1882-83), an influential NT Introduction (1886; ET 2 vols., 1889), and a Life of Jesus (2 vols., 1882; ET 3 vols., 1883-84), he wrote commentaries in the famous Meyer series on Mark and Luke (6th-9th eds., 1878-1901), John (6th-9th eds., 1880-1902), Romans (6th-9th eds., 1881-1902), Mtthew (7th-9th eds., 1883-97), the Pastorals (5th-7th eds., 1885-1902), Hebrews (5th-6th eds., 1888-97), epistles of John (5th-6th eds., 1888-1900), and many other commentaries. He was a strong critic of the Tendenzkritik ("tendency criticism") of F.C. Baur* and the Tübingen scholars. W. WARD GASQUE

WEISS, JOHANNES (1863-1914). German Protestant NT critic. Son of B. Weiss,* the famous conservative scholar, he was educated at the universities of Marburg, Berlin, Göttingen, and Breslau, and later taught NT at Göttingen (1888-95), Marburg (1895-1908), and Heidelberg (1908-14). With W. Bousset, H. Gunkel,* and R. Reitzenstein,* he represented the comparative religions (religionsgeschictlich) approach to the study of the Bible. His book Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, 1892), in which he interpreted the message of Jesus entirely in terms of futuristic or "consistent" (konsequent) eschatology, was his most influential work. Along with the similar works of Wrede and Schweitzer,* Weiss's work marked the end in Germany of the older liberal interpretation of Jesus and His message—which had interpreted the kingdom of God as an inward, spiritual experience, or as a system of ethics—and paved the way for the work of Bultmann* and his followers. In an article on the literary history of the NT which appeared in the first edition of the reference work Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1912), Weiss expounded the principles of form-criticism which were later developed by M. Dibelius,* K.L. Schmidt, and Bultmann. His monumental history of early Christian history and literature, Das Urchristentum (1914; ET 1937) was completed and edited by R. Knopf and published posthumously. W. WARD GASQUE

WEIZSÄCKER, KARL HEINRICH VON (1822-99). German Protestant theologian. Successor to F.C. Baur* as professor of church history at Tübingen (1861ff.), he was the founder of the journal Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, which he edited from 1856. In his work on the history of the gospels (1864) he attempted a rapprochement between the radical criticism of Baur and more conservative criticism. His most influential work was Die christliche Kirche in apostolische Zeitalter (1886; ET The Apostolic Age, 2 vols., 1894-95), in which he insisted that one take a more positive view of the fourth gospel than had been common in critical circles. He also rejected the Baurian hypothesis of the Pauline-Petrine conflict in early Christianity. He was active in both ecclesiastical and academic life, holding offices from time to time in the church and in the university (being elected chancellor of the University of Tübingen in 1890). His translation of the NT into German was widely read and appreciated.

WELD, THEODORE DWIGHT (1803-1895). American abolitionist. Born at Hampton, Connecticut, he grew up in W New York where he was profoundly influenced by Capt. Charles Stuart, principal of Utica Academy. Converted under C.G. Finney's* preaching, he spent two years preaching in the latter's "Holy Band," but by 1830 his concern had shifted to the abolition of slavery. He enlisted New York philanthropists Arthur and Lewis Tappan in the abolitionist cause in the financing of Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, where Weld and some of Finney's converts took up studies under the presidency of Lyman Beecher.* When abolitionist activities were banned, Weld and his followers transferred to Oberlin College. After 1835 Weld was employed by the American Anti-Slavery Society* he helped found. Using Finney's methods, Weld's agents spread the cause of abolition through writing and training of personnel. After 1836 he focused his energies on the society's publicity and lobbying in Washington, DC. His most influential writings were The Bible Against Slavery (1837) and American Slavery As It Is (1839), which provided the stimulus for H.B. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852). HOWARD A. WHALEY

WELLHAUSEN, JULIUS (1844-1918). German biblical critic. Born in Hameln, Westphalia, he studied at Göttingen, taught there for two years, then went as professor of OT to Greifswald (1872), where orthodox Lutherans were alarmed at the doubts he cast on the inspiration of Scripture; he resigned in 1882. He transferred to the teaching of oriental languages, first at Halle, then as professor at Marburg (1885) and Göttingen (1892). Building on the work of earlier scholars, he attracted widespread attention by suggesting that the basic document of the Pentateuch ("P") was the youngest rather than the oldest element, and that the development of OT religion became clearer if the Pentateuch were viewed as a composite document. His History of Israel (1878; ET 1883) gave him a place in biblical studies comparable, it was said, to that of Darwin in biology. Wellhausen also contributed significantly to Islamic and NT studies. J.D. DOUGLAS

WELSH BIBLE. The NT first appeared in Welsh in 1567, translated from the Greek mainly by William Salesbury,* who also collaborated with Richard Davies,* bishop of St. Davids, to produce the Welsh Prayer Book published the same year. Salesbury's NT was accurate and idiomatic, and served as the basis for the complete Bible published in 1588 by William Morgan,* bishop of St. Asaph, aided by Edmund Prys. A revision by Morgan's successor, Richard Parry (1560-1623), probably helped by John Davies (c.1567-1644), his chaplain, was published in 1620. This Bible, still in general use, used the language of the bards and was a formative influence on Welsh prose language. J.G.G. NORMAN

WENTWORTH, PETER (1530?-1597). Puritan leader. A man of property with considerable Puritan connections both by friendship and marriage, he was from 1571 to 1593 leader of the Puritan party in the House of Commons. Successively member for Barnstaple, Tregony, and Northampton, he delivered bold and (to the queen) impertinent speeches, demanding a revision of the Thirty-Nine Articles,* reforms in the church, a reduction of the powers of the higher clergy, and a clear settlement of the succession question as well as his championship of the privileges of the House of Commons. These led three times to his being committed to the Tower, where he eventually died. In the tone and content of his addresses he anticipates the next generation of Puritan leaders, especially Pym and Hampden.

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707-1788). The "sweet singer" of Methodism. Born at Epworth Rectory, Lincolnshire, the eighteenth child of Samuel and Susanna Wesley, Charles was at the age of nine sent to Westminster School. A distant Irish relative, Garret Wesley, wanted to adopt him and settle an inheritance on him. The offer was declined, and Charles went up to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1726. He was instrumental in forming the "Holy Club"* and in 1735 joined his brother John in an abortive mission to Georgia, acting as secretary to the governor, James Oglethorpe.

On his return to England he came under the influence of Peter Boehler,* the Moravian. Lying ill at the house of John Bray, he first read Luther on Galatians. On Whitsunday, 1738—three days before his brother—Charles experienced an evangelical conversion. "I now found myself at peace with God, and rejoiced in hope of loving Christ," he testified. He composed the birthday hymn, "Where shall my wondering soul begin."

He now threw himself into the work of evangelism. He began in the houses of friends, visited the prisons, and preached in the churches until the doors were closed against him. Eventually he took to the open air and became one of the most powerful of the field preachers in the revival. In 1749 he married Sarah (Sally) Gwynne, daughter of a Welsh magistrate, and made his home at the New Room in Bristol until he moved to London in 1771 where he supplied the City Road pulpit, among others.

He was the most gifted and most prolific of all English hymnwriters. Some 7,270 such compositions came from his pen—of varying quality, but including many of the very highest order. He gave expression to evangelical faith and experience in language at once biblical and lyrical.

WESLEY, JOHN (1703-1791). Founder of Methodism.* He was the fifteenth child of Epworth rector Samuel Wesley and his wife Susanna. Although John's father was a staunch High Churchman of the old school, both his grandparents were Puritan Nonconformists. Educated at Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford, John Wesley was elected in 1726 to a fellowship at Lincoln College in the same university. He had been ordained deacon the previous year and had preached his first sermon in South Leigh. On two separate occasions he served as his father's curate. In 1728 he was ordained priest by John Potter.

Returning to Oxford, he found that his brother Charles had gathered a few undergraduates, including George Whitefield,* into a society for spiritual improvement. The scope of what was nicknamed the "Holy Club"* was widened when John Wesley joined it and eventually took over the leadership. Its members met for prayer, the study of the Greek Testament, and self-examination. To their devotional exercises were added works of charitable relief.

In 1735 the Wesleys accepted an invitation from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to undertake a mission to the Indians and colonists in Georgia. The project proved a fiasco, and when he got back to England in 1738 Wesley wrote: "I went to America to convert the Indians; but, oh, who shall convert me?"

On the journey to America the Wesleys had met a company of twenty-one German Moravians whose simple faith had made a considerable impression on them. When, therefore, John Wesley was introduced in London to another Moravian, Peter Boehler,* he was predisposed to lean toward him. In the event, Boehler was to be the pedagogue to bring Wesley to Christ. As a result of conversations with Boehler, Wesley was "clearly convinced of unbelief, of the want of that faith whereby alone we are saved." On 24 May 1738, his heart was "strangely warmed" as he listened to a reading from Luther's preface to Romans at a meeting in Aldersgate Street. This experience made him an evangelist. "Then it pleased God," he declared, "to kindle a fire which I trust shall never be extinguished."

Shortly after his conversion, Wesley visited the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut and met Count Zinzendorf.* He returned to England and embarked on his life-work. His objective was clear. He set out "to reform the nation, particularly the Church, and to spread Scriptural holiness over the land." He declared that he had only "one point of view—to promote so far as I am able vital, practical religion; and by the grace of God to beget, preserve, and increase the life of God in the souls of men." Wesley knew himself to be an apostolic man, sent by God with an extraordinary commission to evangelize Great Britain.

In April 1739 he took to open-air preaching at the instigation of Whitefield. It was at Kingswood, Bristol, that he ventured on "this strange way of preaching in the fields," as he described it. But the most effective medium for reaching the masses had been discovered, and Wesley was to exploit it for the rest of his itinerancy. It gave him a flexibility which could have been acquired in no other way and brought him face to face with the common people who heard him gladly. The churches were increasingly reluctant to welcome him on account of his evangelical doctrine, and henceforward his preaching was largely extramural.

To conserve the gains of evangelism, Wesley formed societies in the wake of his missions. The organization of Methodism was thus a direct outcome of his success in preaching the Gospel. London, Bristol, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne represented the three points of a triangle so far as his itineration in England was concerned. He soon extended his journeys to include Ireland and Scotland. Wales was left to Howel Harris.* Although Wesley himself did not again visit North America, he sent preachers there and in 1784 ordained Thomas Coke* to superintend the work. Wesley's own account of his mission to the nation and beyond is contained in his now classic Journal. His other published writings consist of sermons, letters, expositions, treatises, tracts, translations, histories, and abridgments.

WESLEY, SAMUEL SEBASTIAN (1810-1876). English composer. This influential cathedral organist and composer of anthems was the natural son of Samuel Wesley (1766-1837), the highly talented but somewhat unstable son of Charles Wesley.* Anglican prejudice against the Wesleys hampered him in his earlier years; he was successively organist at Hereford, Exeter, Winchester, and Gloucester cathedrals. Like Bach, he suffered from inadequate forces to carry out his ideals and was angered by official indifference. In 1849 he published a scathing monograph, "A Few Words on Cathedral Music and the Musical System of the Church, with a Plan of Reform" (rep. 1961). How much Wesley's influence was felt in later reform is open to argument. He did, however, write some fine anthems, certainly the best of his generation. "The Wilderness," with its effective choruses and beautiful bass solo is one of the classics of its genre. "Blessed be the God and Father" has still much appeal, and his Cathedral Service in E is a dignified and worthy example from a period when dullness and mediocrity were the rule. His well-known tune Aurelia, heard with "The Church's one foundation," was originally written for "Jerusalem, the golden." J.B. MAC MILLAN

WESSEL, JOHANN (Johann Wessel of Gansfort) (1419-1489). Biblical humanist. Born at Groningen in the N Low Countries, and educated at Deventer under the Brethren of the Common Life,* he went on to Cologne, Louvain, and Paris. He taught at Heidelberg and then at Paris. An able scholar, he knew both Greek and Hebrew, which was unusual at the time. His pupils included Reuchlin and Agricola. At first a Thomist, Wessel turned to Augustinianism, and added Ockham's Nominalism. His attempts to combine Nominalism* and mysticism* earned him the nickname of "Master of Contradictions." Around 1474, in his mid-fifties, he returned to Groningen, where he directed a nuns' cloister, and talked of spiritual matters with a warm circle of friends (including David of Burgundy, bishop of Utrecht). He did not write extensively, exercising influence mostly through teaching.

In some ways he can be regarded as a forerunner of the Reformation (Luther, in 1521, edited some of his writings). He opposed superstition, clerical abuses, papal and conciliar infallibility. Man is forgiven because grace enables him to repent: justification is by faith (which must express itself as love), at least in a sense: Christ is love personified and lifts man to the divine likeness: Christ is present at the Eucharist, and transubstantiation does take place, but in a sense He is present only to believers. Wessel's theology was not notable for clarity. His writings were placed on the Index in the 1500s.

WESSENBERG, IGNAZ HEINRICH KARL VON (1774-1860). Radical Roman Catholic churchman. He was born in Dresden; his theological studies took him to Dillingen for lectures by Sailer, to Würzburg, and to Vienna. From Austria he went to Augsburg where he was recruited by Bishop Dalberg for the diocese of Constance. There he occupied posts as vicar-general (1802), priest (1812), and administrator (1814). Upon Dalberg's death in 1817 he was chosen unanimously by the cathedral chapter for the vacancy. While the grand duke of Baden supported his nomination, the Roman Curia refused to approve it. Von Wessenberg served as bishop-elect until 1827, when he retired to private life. The reasons for curial rejection lie in Von Wessenberg's liberal policies. These included the expansion of education for priests, more elementary schools, the conversion of monasteries into hospitals and schools, the suspension of clerical celibacy, permission for mixed marriage with Protestants, and the vernacular Mass. WAYNE DETZLER

WEST, JOHN (1775-1845). Church of England clergyman. He was born in Farnham, Sussex, England; some authorities give 1778 as the year of his birth. After studies at Oxford he was ordained priest in the Church of England in 1804, was appointed chaplain to the Hudson Bay Company in 1819, but did not arrive in the Red River Settlement until 1820. His three years under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society were filled with extensive travels on foot, by canoe, etc. A service of worship according to the rites of the Church of England, held in 1820 on the shores of the Hudson Bay, is the beginning of regular acts of worship in the area. West's letters, published by the CMS, and the substance of a journal of his missionary activities established his reputation as a pioneer churchman. During 1825-26 he traveled once again on Canadian soil on behalf of the New England Company to investigate the educational system in Nova Scotia and elsewhere. An account of the mission to the Mohawks was published in 1827. Little is known of the latter part of his life. EDWARD J. FURCHA

WEST AFRICA. This article covers countries south of the Sahara from Senegal to Congo People's Republic (the former French Congo). Countries are referred to by their current names.

Early Christian activity was mainly Roman Catholic and Portuguese. The kings of Portugal received from the papacy by the ius patronatus powers which included a commission to evangelize. A Wolof (Senegal) chief was baptized in 1489; Sao Tomé became a suffragan bishopric in 1539 and a diocesan bishopric in 1584. A Christian king ruled in Benin from 1550, and in Sierra Leone, King Farama III was converted in 1604.

A German Lutheran named Joachim Dannenfeldt was sent to the Gambia in 1654/55 as chaplain and missionary. W.J. Müller combined the same functions at Fort Frederiksborg (Ghana) from 1661 to 1669. The Anglican Thomas Thompson worked in Cape Coast (Ghana) from 1752 to 1756. His Ghanaian pupil Philip Quaque was ordained in 1765 as the first non-European Anglican priest. Scripture selections were published in Fante (Ghana) in 1764.

In the 1790s Sierra Leone became a home for freed slaves from England and Nova Scotia. Many of these were Christian. Early missionary work from 1795 by Baptists and others was unsuccessful, but more enduring work was begun in 1806 by German Lutheran missionaries of the (Anglican) Church Missionary Society (CMS), who were joined in 1811 by British Wesleyan Methodist missionaries. Sierra Leone long remained an important center for Christian expansion throughout West Africa.

Episcopalian ministers accompanied the first American settlers to Liberia in 1820-21. Baptist missionaries followed in 1822, and Methodists in 1833. In 1821 a British Methodist missionary arrived in the Gambia. In Ghana, the Basel Missionary Society began operations at Christiansborg (Accra) in 1828, and abortively at Kumasi in 1839. In 1834 a British sea captain found groups of Africans meeting for Bible study at Cape Coast, and addressed an appeal to British Methodists which they answered in the same year. Most of the early missionaries soon died or were invalided home, but there were notable exceptions, such as the British Methodist Thomas B. Freeman,* who lived in Ghana almost uninterruptedly from 1838 to 1890.

In the early 1840s, former slaves who had become Christians in Sierra Leone returned to their homes in Nigeria and elsewhere and appealed for missionaries. Anglican and Methodist work began in W Nigeria in 1841. British Baptists set up a mission in Fernando Po in 1841, and in Cameroun in 1844. Scottish Presbyterians began in 1846 to work around Calabar, where Mary Slessor* was to do outstanding work from 1876 to 1915. West Indian missionaries played a significant role in this area. American Presbyterians reached Gabon in 1842 and Rio Muni in 1864, later extending their activities into Cameroun. In 1866, Ga (Ghana) became the first West African language to have a translation of the whole Bible.

Throughout the nineteenth century, Roman Catholic missions were predominantly French. The Holy Ghost Fathers reached Gabon in 1844, followed by Roman Catholic sisters in 1849, by which time J.R. Bessieux of Gabon was responsible as vicar apostolic for Roman Catholic work throughout West Africa. This responsibility was divided in 1863. The Société des Missions Africaines de Lyon opened stations in Dahomey (1861), Nigeria (1868), Ghana (1879), and Liberia (1884).

African church leadership developed to a limited extent during the nineteenth century, and African lay initiative was often prominent. Three Senegalese Roman Catholic priests were ordained in 1840, but their number did not increase rapidly. The Anglican Samuel Ajayi Crowther* was in 1864 consecrated bishop "on the Niger," and in 1874 the Sierra Leonean Charles Taylor became chairman of the Sierra Leone Methodist district.

The training of African ministers formed part of a wider educational program, of which Fourah Bay College in Sierra Leone (founded 1827, affiliated to Durham University 1876) was an outstanding but not an isolated example. Christian education was generally practical as well as academic. The Holy Ghost Fathers developed handicrafts and agriculture, and the Basel Mission formed a Mission Trade Society in 1859.

Opposition to Christianity broke out violently from time to time. Baptists had to withdraw from Fernando Po in 1858, and Jesuits in 1870. All missionaries were expelled from Abeokuta in 1867. Baptist work in Douala (Cameroun) was destroyed in 1885.

With the Berlin Conference of 1884-85, the colonial "scramble for Africa" began in earnest, with mixed effects on the life of the churches. In 1886 the Basel Mission took over British Baptist work in Cameroun, and German Pallotines and Baptists entered the country four years later. French missions in British territories, and British missions in French, suffered certain disadvantages, and tended to co-opt, especially for educational work, missionaries of the same nationality as the colonial power. A painful reorganization, under missionary control, of Crowther's Niger Mission took place in 1890. Divisions within the church had occurred in Sierra Leone from the 1790s, but it was not until much later that the first important independent churches came into being (Native Baptist Church, 1888; United Native African Church, 1891—both in Nigeria).

During the period 1890-1945, the expansion of Christianity generally gained momentum, despite two world wars and the economic depression of 1929-31. Missions already active extended their work. In 1896 the Basel Mission finally established a center at Kumasi. Two years before, a Roman Catholic mission had entered the Central African Republic. In 1900 the CMS entered the largely Muslim area of N Nigeria; American Presbyterian activity increased in S Cameroun; N Ghana was entered by British Methodists in 1911.

New missions arrived, such as the Qua Iboe Mission from Northern Ireland (E Nigeria, 1897), the Sudan Interior Mission (N Nigeria, 1893), the Sudan United Mission (N Nigeria, 1904), the Africa Inland Mission (Chad, 1909), the Christian and Missionary Alliance (French-speaking Guinea, 1918), the Brethren Church of the United States (Brazzaville, 1918), the Assemblies of God (Upper Volta, 1921), and the World Evangelization Crusade (Ivory Coast, 1935). Many of these missions were conservative in theology and American in origin. New Roman Catholic orders entered the area (e.g., Sittard missionaries of the Heart of Jesus, Cameroun, 1911; Capuchins, Chad, 1929; St. Patrick's Society for Foreign Missions, Calabar, 1932).

Outstanding missionaries (the best-known being Albert Schweitzer,* Gabon, 1913-63) continued to take the lead in most churches, but Africans assumed increasing responsibility. The growth of Christianity was stimulated by a number of African prophets, such as Garrick Braid (Nigeria, from 1909), W.W. Harris (Ivory Coast, 1913-15), Sampson Opong (Ghana, c.1920), and Joseph Babalola, who in 1928 began in Nigeria a ministry which led to the founding of the Christ Apostolic Church and the Church of the Lord (Aladura) in Nigeria and Sierra Leone. Most of these movements led both to the extension of mission work and were one source independent churches now a major factor in West African Christainity.

The encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae (1926) crystallized Roman Catholic thinking on the indigenous priesthood. The first African Roman Catholic assistant bishop was consecrated in Sierra Leone in 1937.

World War I caused the repatriation or internment of German missionaries, particularly in Togo and Cameroun. The International Missionary Council* under its secretary J.H. Oldham* was largely responsible for organizing help for such "orphaned missions" when peace returned. Cooperation among missions, and between missions and government, increased, especially in education and medicine. An Eastern Nigerian Missionary Conference was held in 1911. Fourah Bay became an interdenominational college in 1919. Similar cooperative institutions were established at Kumasi, Lagos, Bunumbu (Sierra Leone), and elsewhere. The formulation of educational policy was advanced by a survey undertaken in 1920-21 by the Phelps-Stokes Commission, on the initiative of American missionary societies.

After 1945, churches developed (often before political independence) toward full autonomy under African leadership. An African was appointed chairman of the GHana Methodist district in 1948. The first African Anglican diocesan bishops since Crowther were consecrated in 1951, within an autonomous province. African Roman Catholic diocesan bishops were consecrated in Cameroun (1955), Dahomey (1957), and elsewhere; an African archbishop in Dahomey (1960) and the first West African cardinal (Paul Zougrana of Upper Volta) in 1965.

Interchurch cooperation became the norm in such areas of the churches' life as theological education, Christian literature, agriculture, and medical work. The All Africa Conference of Churches was inaugurated at Ibadan in 1958; the more conservative Association of Evangelicals of Africa and Madagascar was founded in 1966. No major church union, however, had taken place by 1971.

WEST INDIES. Christianity in the West Indies may be divided into two phases, "colonial" and "evangelical." The colonial church was that which came with the Europeans and was intended for them, although it could, and ultimately did, include Indians and Africans. Evangelical Christianity, dating from the eighteenth century, was a true mission, intended for everyone, but primarily the slaves.

European colonists of whatever nationality brought their faith with them and rapidly established churches in the islands they colonized. The Spanish had a fully developed hierarchy by 1522, but neither the British nor the French were so well organized. As first-comers, the Spanish had to cope with the Indians, and men like Las Casas carried on a running fight with the colonists over the humanity of the Indians, and therefore their right to decent treatment, winning significant improvements in the law, but less in practice. Officially the church came around to a constructive attitude; at a synod in 1622 elaborate regulations governing the treatment of Indians were promulgated. As African labor replaced Indian, steps were taken to incorporate the newcomers into Christianity as quickly as possible, although with instruction. The priesthood was largely provided by European regulars, although some Creole whites were included. The quality varied, and there were never enough, for the islands soon became a backwater, and traditional Christianity in some places was seriously altered by African imports, as can be seen in the syncretistic Voodoo cult in Haiti, perhaps the clearest example. Nevertheless the Catholic Church in Spanish and French islands has proved very resistant to Protestant infiltration.

The British made no attempt to convert the slaves, considering the project at best quixotic and at worst dangerous. The only serious attempt was that of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel on its estates at Codrington, Barbados. British settlers accepted only as much of the church as they wanted, and that included neither evangelists nor episcopate. The real growth of the Anglican Church thus begins in 1825, with the arrival of bishops.

The earliest evangelicals were the Moravians, arriving in the Danish Virgins in 1732, and extending to a number of islands by 1800. Between 1786 and 1790 Thomas Coke* established the Methodists widely throughout the islands, and in 1782 a group of black American exiles opened a Baptist church in Jamaica. The black Baptists developed a number of African variations on evangelical Christianity, both in Trinidad and Jamaica, in the middle of the nineteenth century, but in the last hundred years this tradition has tended toward orthodox Pentecostalism.

Other missions entered early in the nineteenth century. Between 1800 and 1845 church growth was rapid, but those islands with a functioning establishment—Barbados (Anglican), most Windwards, and Trinidad (Catholic)—resisted the evangelicals. The Spanish and French islands were not attempted, except for a Methodist bridgehead in Haiti. By 1800 most evangelicals favored abolishing slavery, but pressure from the planters required them to keep their opinions to themselves. They were primarily interested in salvation from sin, and only when that object was threatened, as in Jamaica after the revolt of 1831, did even radical evangelicals like the Jamaica Baptists openly declare their views.

Emancipation came in the middle of a period of rapid growth and involved the churches heavily in education. Except for Trinidad and Guyana, which were still expanding ecclesiastically and economically, most churches stalled in the mid-forties, and advance was not resumed until after 1870. Although the church was largely white-led, the local ministry became more significant, educational and institutional development was marked, especially among the Anglicans who successfully adjusted to disestablishment after 1870. Serious missionary work was undertaken, both among West Indian migrants in Central America, and in Africa. Most significant of all was the growth of the church among the East Indian sugar workers, although the most important group in this field were the Canadian Presbyterians, who specialized in the problem after the arrival of John Morton in Trinidad in 1868. Their influence extended beyond Trinidad to Guyana, Grenada, St Lucia, and Jamaica. The Catholic Church shared in the general revival of Catholicism in the period, except in the Spanish islands, where its development was hindered by various political difficulties.

The twentieth century has been marked by the rapid growth of Pentecostalism and Holiness groups, mainly from the United States, which merged in Jamaica and Trinidad with the native tradition. The older churches have not grown much, but since World War II an indigenous theological movement has appeared, concentrating on the related problems of nationalism, identity, race, class and poverty.

WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS (1825-1901). Bishop of Durham. He attended King Edward's School, Birmingham, where he was much influenced by the headmaster, James Prince Lee. In 1844 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1849. His pupils included his old schoolfellows J.B. Lightfoot* and E.W. Benson,* and also F.J.A. Hort.* He was ordained in 1851 and the following year went to teach at Harrow School. In 1869 he was appointed a residentiary canon of Peterborough and the next year, at Lightfoot's instigation, was recalled to Cambridge as regius professor of divinity. He tidied up the courses and syllabi and himself lectured for the first three years on early church history and then for five years mainly on Christian doctrine. Thereafter he took books or selected passages of the NT. He was active in university administration and also in pastoral concern. He was prominent in the formation of the Cambridge Mission to Delhi and the founding of the Cambridge Clergy Training School (later known as "Westcott House").

In 1890, at the age of sixty-six, he was appointed to succeed Lightfoot as bishop of Durham. He did not have to face problems of reorganization similar to those facing Lightfoot, and he built upon his predecessor's work, particularly with the ordination candidates at Auckland Castle. He showed a deep concern for the social and industrial problems of the diocese and held conferences at Auckland for representatives of both sides of industry and of social work. He often addressed the miners, and in 1892 he helped to settle a coal strike.

Westcott published a considerable number of books, but he is best remembered for his work with Hort in establishing the text of the NT (1881) by making a scientific evaluation of the vast mass of manuscript evidence which had become available, and for his NT commentaries. It was intended that Lightfoot, Westcott, and Hort should between them write a complete commentary on the NT. Westcott was to undertake the Johannine literature and Hebrews, and he completed his share (apart from the Book of Revelation) with definitive volumes on John's gospel (1881), the epistles of John (1883), and the epistle to the Hebrews (1889). Westcott's knowledge of the patristic commentaries was unrivaled, and if at times he was oversubtle, his exegesis and exposition were always marked by great theological and spiritual depth. His theological position combined the learned historical conservatism of Lightfoot with the incarnational approach to social problems of F.D. Maurice,* whose works he avoided reading for fear of losing his originality.

WESTERN TEXT. The name given by Westcott* and Hort* to a type of text of the Greek NT which had special affinities with the West. Its chief representatives are Codex Bezae (D) for the gospels and Acts, and Codex Claromontanus (Dp) for the Epistles (in both of which the text is written in Greek and Latin), the Old Latin version, and the Curetonian Syriac. Most of the Latin Fathers—including Marcion, Tatian, Justin, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, and Cyprian—made use of the Western form of the text in their quotations. The date of origin of the Western Text is thought consequently to have been as early as the middle of the second century. The characteristics which Westcott and Hort found in it included an apparent freedom to change things in order to bring out the meaning better. This might involve the omission or insertion of words, clauses, or even whole sentences. They also found a tendency to assimilate words and phrases found close to each other and, more seriously, through a process of harmonization to obliterate differences in similar or parallel passages.

This process of harmonization is of course most readily found in the gospels, where it was particularly easy through carelessness or particularly tempting in the interests of consistency to make passages conform to each other. It was in the writings of Luke, particularly in Acts, that the Western Text was found to diverge most from the other types. The Western Text may not have been a deliberate recension, as were the other text types. Westcott and Hort had a very low view of its value except in the passages which they called rather cumbersomely "Western non-interpolations," i.e., passages where the Neutral Text* had interpolations not found in the Western Text. Nowadays much less reliance is placed on the a priori likelihood of a particular text type being right or wrong, and readings from various sources are assessed on their merits.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. According to legend, the abbey was founded in 616, and certainly existed by 785. Refounded by Edward the Confessor* as an abbey of Benedictine monks in 1050 with extensive property, its new abbey church was consecrated in 1065. The following year Edward was buried there, his canonization in 1161 subsequently attracting large numbers of pilgrims. Adjacent to the royal palace of Westminster, it held a central place in national life, with special privileges of sanctuary, and for three centuries the House of Commons met in its chapter house. Kings were traditionally crowned here, and from 1296 the Stone of Scone, the Scottish coronation stone, was incorporated into the throne. The present building was begun in 1245 and Henry VII's chapel was completed in 1519. In 1540 the abbey was dissolved and reorganized with a dean and twelve prebendaries. Some of the monastic buildings were used for the new Westminster Grammar School. Thomas Thirlby was bishop of Westminster in 1540-50, but the see was then suppressed. The west front and towers were designed by Christopher Wren* and Nicholas Hawksmoor and completed, 1740-50. From the eighteenth century the abbey has been the burial place for numerous national celebrities.

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1643). During the English Civil War between Charles I and Parliament, the latter continued its program of reforms and declared its intention of establishing a church government that would be "more agreeable to God's Word and bring the Church of England into a nearer conformity with the Church of Scotland and other Reformed Churches abroad." To implement this design, Parliament convened "an Assembly of learned, godly and judicious Divines to consult and advise of such matters and things as should be proposed unto them. . . ." The Assembly consisted of 121 divines with ten lords and twenty commoners as assessors with equal debating and voting rights. The Church of Scotland was asked to send commissioners and appointed four ministers and two elders. The Assembly was representative of very different viewpoints in matters of church government.

Sessions were held from 1 July 1643 to 22 February 1649. The Assembly was not a church court, and possessed no ecclesiastical authority. It was simply a council summoned by Parliament to give advice and guidance to the civil authorities for the promotion of unity and uniformity in the work of Reformation. Average daily attendance ranged between sixty and eighty members, though only about twenty took a leading part in all the debates. The Westminster Assembly was early associated with the Solemn League and Covenant,* approved the document, and was joined at its meeting place, St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, by both houses of Parliament for a formal swearing of the Covenant.

Main work of the Assembly was the preparation of the Westminster Confession* of Faith, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Form of Church Government, and the Directory for Public Worship.* Rouse's metrical version of the Psalter was examined and approved for general use in the public worship of the church. The Westminster Standards were adopted by the Church of Scotland by a special act in 1647, and with minor adjustments became the subordinate standards of Presbyterian Churches throughout the English-speaking world. Some of these have in recent years relegated the standards to "historic document" status.

WESTMINSTER CONFESSION. One of the most influential creeds of Calvinism, a creedal standard for all Presbyterian churches, drawn up at Westminster (1643-46). The immediate background to the Confession lies in the tensions between Charles I* and his subjects, growing in large measure out of Charles's insistence on imposing Anglicanism. In an age when it seemed obvious that the state, concerned with the welfare of its citizens, was hence concerned with religious affairs, such a stance had political implications. The Puritans* felt that the creeds of the Church of England* must be revised, so that a pure religion would be taught and preached. The Scots, convinced Calvinists, resisted any attempt to remodel their creeds. In 1638 the historic National Covenant* affirmed this, and a Scots invasion of N England forced Charles to call Parliament into session. But it demanded far-reaching concessions from Charles which he refused, and by 1642 civil war had broken out.

In this context, as part of parliamentary efforts at reform, an assembly was called to meet at Westminster to formulate a creed suitable for the English and Scottish churches (1643). Civil strife continued as the assembly met. Dominated by Puritan Calvinists, with only a few Puritan "Independent" delegates, the assembly also included Scots Calvinists (from England, 121 clergy, 30 laymen; from Scotland, 4 clergy, 2 laymen; some 35 of the delegates did not appear due to the civil strife). Meeting for three years (1643-46), the delegates had little difficulty in agreeing on doctrine (two-thirds of the Confession), but the chapters on church and state took somewhat longer to draw up. The creed is a systematic exposition of orthodox Calvinism, in scholastic formulation. The sovereignty of God is stressed, and election to salvation emphasized. Questions disputed among Calvinists (notably Supralapsarianism) were avoided. Adopted in England and Scotland, the Confession stayed on as a creedal standard in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

In England, Cromwell rose to power, the king was executed (1649), and the Commonwealth set up. Resting on the power of the army, where Puritan "Independents" were strong, it granted religious toleration to all Protestants. Cromwell had to conquer Scotland by force (the Scots, though Calvinist, supported their royal family), and in Ireland, Catholicism was temporarily driven underground. The Commonwealth lasted but a decade. Charles II* became King (1660), and the Anglican Church again became the established church in England. Scotland retained its established Presbyterian Church.

WESTON, FRANK (1871-1924). Bishop of Zanzibar. Brought up as an Evangelical, he early became through school and university an extreme Anglo-Catholic. Graduating with a first in theology at Oxford, he served curacies in London before going to Africa under the auspices of Universities' Mission to Central Africa. Initially he was concerned in educational work and in the training of ordinands. In 1908 he was made bishop of Zanzibar, in which country he served until his death with zeal and a love for souls, but with all the strength and weaknesses of a nature akin to fanaticism.

He is best remembered for his opposition to the tentative scheme of reunion proposed at Kikuyu for the Protestant churches in East Africa.* In 1920, however, he was a strong supporter of the Appeal on Reunion issued by the Lambeth Conference, a support which was not wholly reechoed by all the Anglo-Catholic party. He was also implacably opposed to the liberal tendencies of his day, and when the bishop of Hereford (H.H. Henson*) made B.H. Streeter* a canon he excommunicated the former. It was this controversy which led him to write his best book The One Christ which, while opposing the prevalent kenotic theories, suggested a milder form which would preserve belief in our Lord as an infallible teacher. Like many of his contemporaries, he was from his undergraduate days interested in social affairs, an interest which bore fruit in his strong opposition to forced labor in East Africa.

WESTPHALIA, PEACE OF (1648). Collective term for the decisive treaties concluding the Thirty Years' War.* Discussions began in two Westphalian towns in 1643—at Münster with France, and at Osnabrück with Sweden. Little progress was made until in January 1648 Spain unexpectedly made peace with the Dutch (granting them de iure independence), whereupon the emperor negotiated settlements with France and Sweden. The settlements, based upon the principle of the sovereignty and independence of individual states, mark the practical end of the Holy Roman Empire and of the medieval age wherein religion and the concept of respublica christiana had dominated. They represented major triumphs for France and Sweden, opening the way for France to dominate completely European affairs for nearly two centuries. Germany was doomed to decentralized impotency for two centuries as some 343 separate sovereign states were confirmed within her borders. Religion was determined on the principle cuius regio, eius religio among Catholic, Lutheran, and Calvinist.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

WETTSTEIN (Wetstein), JOHANN JAKOB (1693-1754). Swiss NT scholar. Born at Basle, he wrote a dissertation on variant NT readings (1713). He traveled in Switzerland, France, and England in search of manuscripts, meeting Richard Bentley (1716) who encouraged him in his textual studies. Made a deacon in Basle (1717), he became his father's assistant in St. Leonard's (1720). He devoted himself to NT study, and his rejection of the reading theos for hos in the Textus Receptus of 1 Timothy 3:16 led to his deposition in 1730 for alleged Socinianism.* Having answered his opponents (1732), he became professor of church history in the Remonstrants' college at Amsterdam (1733), remaining there till death. He published the prolegomena to his new edition of the Greek NT in 1730, the edition itself appearing in two volumes at Amsterdam, 1751-52. This was notable for its large collection of variants and the introduction of the sigla for denoting manuscripts still in common use.

WEYDEN, ROGIER VAN DER (1399-1464). Flemish painter. He was among the first to use oil paint, capitalizing upon its rich, brilliant color and shaded hues potential to give traditional biblical topics the appearance of veritable, three-dimensional reality and ordinary life settings simultaneously the luster of heightened, sanctified meanings. Rogier used less gold and worked with shadows on people's faces, complex folds in their robes, detailed attention to postural nuances, all of which focused sculpturally on the grief and sadness or interior emotions felt by the personages in the paintings. Rogier tuned the exacting, atmospherically real depiction of things pioneered by the van Eyck* brothers on a cosmic scale down to a disclosure, very warmly done, of human sensitivities. This double emphasis—oil detail and emotional intensity—of the Flemish master practically set the standard for painting on both sides of the Alps during the last half of the fifteenth century. CALVIN SEERVELD

WEYMOUTH NEW TESTAMENT. The New Testament in Modern Speech, subtitled "An idiomatic translation into everyday English from the text of the Resultant Greek Testament," was the work of Richard Francis Weymouth (1822-1902). Weymouth was a fellow of University College, London, and at one time headmaster of Mill Hill School. He was a classical scholar, and his Resultant Greek Testament was an edition based on the greatest measure of agreement between the leading nineteenth-century editors. His translation was not intended to supplant the versions then in general use, but to act as a compressed running commentary on them. He expressed the hope that someday there might be a new translation of the Bible which would supersede the King James Version and the Revised Version. His own intention was to be free from doctrinal and ecclesiastical bias. He includes brief introductions to the various NT books and a fair number of linguistic footnotes. The translation was not published until 1903, the year after he died. In 1924 the fourth edition was published after the original had been revised by several scholars. R.E. NIXON

WHARTON, HENRY (1664-1695). Anglican scholar. Born at his father's rectory of Worstead in Norfolk and educated by him before entering Caius College, Cambridge, he studied diligently there under Isaac Newton and others. From 1686 he contributed very considerably—and without much acknowledgment—to W. Cave's Historia Literaria. Ordained under the canonical age because of his learning, Wharton worked first for T. Tenison,* producing treatises on celibacy and on the Scriptures, and for W. Sancroft.* In 1689 he took the oaths, separating from his Nonjuror* friends and ending his ecclesiastical hopes. The first two volumes of Anglia Sacra appeared in 1691—a masterly survey of English bishops and dioceses with a collection of relevant original texts. A third posthumous volume is unequal in quality. G.S.R. COX

WHARTON, PHILIP (Fourth Baron Wharton) (1613-1696). Philanthropist and friend to Nonconformist ministers. A member of both the Long Parliament and Westminster Assembly, as well as a soldier in the Civil War, he was a friend of Oliver Cromwell* but took little part in national affairs from 1649-60. After the Restoration and during the period of the persecution of Nonconformists (1660-89), he did what he could in Parliament to oppose repressive legislation—e.g., he opposed the second Conventicle Act* of 1670. At his home at Woburn he entertained Nonconformist leaders and helped them financially. By a deed made in 1662 he settled some of his lands at Healaugh, Yorkshire, upon trustees for 1,050 Bibles and Catechisms to be given to poor children. PETER TOON

WHATELEY, RICHARD (1786-1863). Archbishop of Dublin. Born in London, he graduated from Oriel College, Oxford, in 1808 and was appointed a fellow in 1811. Fellow-students included Sir Robert Peel, John Keble, and John Henry Newman. From 1822 he spent four years as a parish minister on the borders of Norfolk, and for five years he served as president of St. Alban's Hall. In 1831 amid controversy he was appointed archbishop of Dublin. Though gifted with originality of thought, he was a poor preacher but showed his gifts as an essayist and satirist, a leader in education at a time when four university colleges were established in Ireland, and a stern disciplinarian who made many enemies. He was instrumental in establishing a chair of political economy in Trinity College, Dublin, and did much to raise the standard of theological education. He published about sixty volumes of essays and sermons. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

WHEATON DECLARATION. A statement adopted by the Congress on the Church's Worldwide Mission at Wheaton (Illinois) College in 1966. Called by the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association* and the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association,* 938 delegates from seventy-one countries representing over 250 groups registered for the conclave. Major study papers were written in advance on the relation of mission to ten specific problem areas: syncretism, neo-universalism, proselytism, neo-Romanism, church growth, foreign missions, evangelical unity, evaluating methods, social concern, and a hostile world. After extensive discussion by small groups, a final drafting committee, which drew upon their conclusions, prepared the Wheaton Declaration. It was adopted unanimously by the delegates as the collective opinion of the congress. The document dealt with the above issues, but clearly asserted biblical authority, proclamation of the Gospel, and social action as evangelicals. RICHARD V. PIERARD

WHEELOCK, ELEAZAR (1711-1779). Congregational minister; founder and first president of Dartmouth. Graduating from Yale in 1733, he became two years later pastor of the Second or North Parish in Lebanon, Connecticut. While at Yale he was a member of a group similar to the "Holy Club"* at Oxford of which the Wesleys were members. During the first year of his pastorate a revival broke out in Wheelock's church under the influence of Jonathan Edwards'* ministry at Northampton, Massachusetts. During the Great Awakening,* Wheelock gave himself unstintingly to promotion of revival, preaching in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. Though accused of encouraging radical separatists, he was a moderate, opposed to both the radicals and the Old Lights. Interested in converting and educating the Indians, he received from Col. Joshua More a gift of a house and schoolhouse at Lebanon to aid in his work. This became known as More's Charity School, which was later moved to Hanover, New Hampshire, under a 1769 charter and renamed Dartmouth College. HOWARD F. VOS

WHICHCOTE, BENJAMIN (1609-1683). Cambridge Platonist.* Born in Shropshire and educated at Cambridge where he eventually became provost of King's College, he lost his post at the Restoration. He was incumbent of St. Lawrence Jewry, London, from 1668 till his death. Whichcote's main works are his Discourses and Moral and Religious Aphorisms. He was one of the leading members of the group of liberal divines known as the Cambridge Platonists. Indeed, his insistence on the text from Proverbs, "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord" emphasizes the Platonists' belief in man's reason as the ultimate seat of authority in religion, while the importance for him of Paul's "For God's temple is sacred, and you are that temple" indicates the religious significance of moral behavior for this group. For Whichcote, God was "the Original of Man's being, the centre of his soul, his ultimate end."

ARTHUR POLLARD

WHISTON, WILLIAM (1667-1752). Church historian, mathematician, and translator. Son of the manse, he entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1686, where he studied mathematics, became friendly with Newton, and was appointed a fellow in 1693. In 1698 he became vicar of Lowestoft, but in 1703 returned to Cambridge to succeed Sir Isaac Newton* as Lucasian professor of mathematics, on Newton's own recommendation. Unlike the cautious Newton, however, Whiston tactlessly vented his doubts in public, with the result that after four or five years of legal proceedings he was finally expelled from the university in 1710 on a charge of Arianism.* He suffered intensely as a result and thereafter lived in considerable poverty. Barred from the Anglican Communion, he at first held meetings in his home, but later (1747) joined the Baptists.

He regarded the Reformation as only half-completed: it showed the way back to the church of Augustine's time but not to the NT. He believed that when the works of the anti-Nicene fathers were translated, the way would be opened for a restoration of primitive Christianity, and to this end he worked unceasingly. He held that the miracle-gifts of the Holy Spirit were withdrawn from the church when the papists introduced alleged wonder-working relics, and he sought in his writings to establish the connection historically. Like Newton, he repudiated both the Athanasian Creed* and infant baptism. In his earlier days at least Whiston often seemed to write as Newton's mouthpiece; only on some aspects of prophecy did they differ sharply, but his intellectual level is set at a far lower level than Newton's. He wrote much on science and religion, but many of his ideas are unacceptable today. Of his piety and passionate desire to follow Christ whatever the consequences there can be no doubt; his Arianism, if mistaken, was based only on his understanding of Scripture. Today he is chiefly remembered as the translator of Josephus.*

WHITAKER, WILLIAM (1548-1595). Cambridge Puritan theologian. Born in Lancashire and educated in his hometown of Burnley and (with the aid of his uncle, Dean A. Nowell) at St. Paul's School, he then went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow. He excelled at Greek and translated the Book of Common Prayer,* as well as Nowell's Larger Catechism, into that language. In 1578 he became a canon of Norwich and two years later regius professor of divinity. Like other Puritans he was totally committed to Protestant principles in opposition to those of Roman Catholicism, and he heartily defended his views against those of R. Bellarmine* and T. Stapleton.* His Puritanism nearly prevented his being appointed master of St. John's in 1586 but once in this post, as also when he was master of Trinity (1593-95), he made sure that Calvinistic orthodoxy was the theology taught in college. He was one of the group of men responsible for the Lambeth Articles* (1595). Most of his twenty or so treatises were written in Latin and enjoyed a wide readership in Europe. PETER TOON

WHITBY, DANIEL (1638-1726). Anglican scholar. An erudite clergyman trained at Oxford, he engaged in several controversies, including an attack on Roman Catholicism, an attempt to gain concessions for Nonconformists so that they would join the Church of England, and a refutation of Calvinism. Among his thirty-nine published works the most famous is a Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament (2 vols., 1703). This work continued to be used throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Its area of great significance was in popularizing Postmillennialism. Whitby held that the world would be converted to Christ, the Jews restored to the Holy Land, and pope and Turks defeated, after which the world would enjoy a time of universal peace, happiness, and righteousness for a thousand years. At the close of this millennium Christ would personally come to earth again and the last judgment would be held. This view was adopted by most of the leading eighteenth-century ministers and commentators. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

WHITBY, SYNOD OF (663/4). An important turning point in the history of the church in England. English Christianity in the seventh century had two main streams. One came from Rome via Augustine of Canterbury and Paulinus, and the other from the Celtic Church via Iona and Lindisfarne. There were a number of differences of ethos and of religious observance between these two streams, the most notable of the latter concerning the date on which Easter* was to be celebrated. The issue came to a head in 663 when King Oswy of Northumbria saw that in the following year he would be celebrating Easter when his wife, who had been brought up in Roman ways, would be observing Lent.

A synod was called at Streanshalch (Whitby) in Yorkshire, the site of Hilda's abbey. The delegates of the Celtic persuasion were King Oswy, who presided; Cedd,* bishop of the East Saxons; Hilda*; and Colman,* bishop of Lindisfarne. The Roman representatives included Oswy's son Alchfrith; Agilbert, bishop of Dorchester; Wilfrid,* abbot of Ripon; and James the Deacon. Colman argued that the Celtic tradition went back through Columba* and Polycarp* to John the Evangelist. Wilfrid pleaded the near-universality of the observance of a tradition going back to Peter and Paul. The king judged in favor of the Roman party on the grounds that he would rather be on good terms with "the keeper of heaven's gate" than with Columba. The decision caused some bitterness among the Celtic party and was influential in bringing England within the mainstream of Christendom (with its administrative advantages and theological dangers) for the next eight and three-quarter centuries. WHITE, ELLEN GOULD (1827-1915). Most prominent leader of the Seventh-day Adventist* Church. Born at Gorham, Maine, she received almost no formal education because of poor health. Her parents were devout Methodists, but in the 1840s embraced William Miller's* Advent preaching and were disbarred from the church. Miller's preaching and Mrs. White's testimony of her own revelations formed the beginning of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which stresses a strong prophetic and eschatological note and health reform. She became the inspired leader and messenger, marrying Elder James White in 1846. In 1855 they moved to Battle Creek, Michigan, where the church headquarters became located. She spent some time in Europe and Australia after her husband's death in 1881. In 1903 the headquarters was moved to Washington, D.C. A woman of deep religious persuasion, she insisted she was not a leader but simply a divinely appointed messenger. Sixty-four of her works have appeared in print in English.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

WHITE, FRANCIS (c.1564-1638). Bishop of Ely. Educated at Cambridge, he was ordained in 1588 and held livings at Broughton Astley, Leicestershire, and at St. Peter, Cornhill. In 1617 he published The Orthodox Faith and Way to the Church against a Roman Catholic treatise entitled White dyed Black. He was employed by James I* in 1622 in two disputes against the Jesuit John Fisher,* a report being later published as The Fisher Catched in his owne Net. He was made dean of Carlisle (1622) and bishop of that diocese, with some suspicion of simony (1629), and was translated to Norwich (1629) and to Ely (1631). White opposed the Puritan view of the Sabbath, in a conference with Theophilus Brabourne.* In 1635 he published his Treatise of the Sabbath Day, written at the command of Charles I* and dedicated to William Laud,* and in 1637 A Brief Answer to a late Treatise of the Sabbath Day.

WHITE, JOHN (1866-1933). Wesleyan missionary. Born in Cumberland, he served in Southern Rhodesia (1894-1931), and as chairman of the district from 1903 supervised a growing work south and north of the Zambesi. He was the founder of Waddilove Institution and governor for two periods, a founder and chairman of the Southern Rhodesia Missionary Conference, and the translator of the Shona NT. White laid equal stress upon personal salvation and the social implications of the Gospel. Throughout his ministry he championed Shona interests, denouncing injustice, opposing discriminatory legislation, and earning much unpopularity among Europeans. His health was never robust and broke down completely in 1931. D.G.L. CRAGG

WHITE, WILLIAM (1748-1836). Organizer of the Protestant Episcopal Church* in the USA. Born into a wealthy Philadelphia family, he graduated in 1765 from the College of Philadelphia (University of Pennsylvania) and then studied theology. He was ordained priest in England in 1772 and served in Christ Church and St. Peter's in Philadelphia from 1772 until 1836. He was joint chaplain of the Continental Congress and its successor. He led in the formation of the Protestant Episcopal Church by drafting a constitution for a church free of the state in which laity were equally represented with the clergy, by writing a revised Book of Common Prayer and promoting conventions in 1785 and 1789 which created the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was elected bishop of Pennsylvania in 1786, was consecrated in London, and served in Philadelphia from 1787 till his death. He became presiding bishop in 1796. EARLE E. CAIRNS

WHITE FATHERS. The common name for the "Society of Missionaries of Africa," taken from their white cassocks and mantles. The society was founded in 1868 by Charles Cardinal Lavigerie (1825-92), archbishop of Algiers, to evangelize Africa. The Fathers are secular priests, together with lay brothers, who live in community, not taking the vows of regular religious communities, but bound by oath to lifelong work in African missions and to obedience to their superiors. They began their missions in Algeria and Tunisia. Early attempts to penetrate the Sahara were unsuccessful, so the missionaries withdrew from the desert to work in oases on the northern fringe, and to demonstrate the Gospel in loving action rather than by preaching. Later they entered Buganda, where they were very successful, subsequently going to Tanganyika, Nyasa, and Congo. They were also much concerned with the abolition of slavery, the improvement of agriculture, and the scientific exploration of Africa. J.G.G. NORMAN

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714-1770). English preacher. Born at Gloucester, he was educated there and at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he associated with those who formed the "Holy Club"* and who would later be known as the first Methodists. There also he experienced an evangelical conversion. He was subsequently ordained, and his first sermon—in his native town—was of such fervor that a complaint was made to the bishop that he had driven fifteen people mad. He preached in several London churches, but quickly accepted an invitation from John and Charles Wesley* to go to Georgia where, with the exception of a notable visit home, he remained from 1737 to 1741. The visit home included his first attempt at open-air preaching, in Bristol. He was to continue the practice to the end of his life, regularly delivering up to twenty sermons a week, covering vast distances that included fourteen visits to Scotland and, in those days of long and hazardous voyages, no less than seven journeys to America, where he died shortly after preaching his last sermon.

The association with Wesley in the early years quickly gave way to differences and even to bitter feud. This arose mainly from their opposed views of the availability of salvation, Wesley adopting the Arminian* interpretation and Whitefield the Calvinistic. As a result, the latter became closely associated with the work of the countess of Huntingdon,* and in his later years he opened several of the meetinghouses of her Connexion as well as the theological college at Trevecca in 1768.

In his kind Whitefield is supreme among preachers, sharing his eminence only with Latimer.* Others might be more learned, even more stylish, but none was more eloquent or more moving. J.C. Ryle has justly claimed, "No preacher has ever retained his hold on his hearers so entirely as he did for thirty-four years."

His theme is the basic evangelical message of man's irremediable sinfulness and Christ's effective salvation. Indeed, as we read them, there is a sameness about Whitefield's sermons that becomes rather tedious, an effect no doubt of too much preaching and too little preparation. Nevertheless this does not detract from their vividness. His vision of heaven and, more particularly, hell was too immediate for that, and his regard for the eternal welfare of the souls of each of his hearers too insistent. There is thus an intimate note in all his work, displaying itself in his earnestness and importunity. "My brethren, I beseech you" is a recurrent expression. Like open-air preachers before him, like the friars and like Latimer, his work abounds with vivid colloquial phrases and apt, familiar analogies. And none knew better than he how to use question and exclamation to produce a tense, dramatic atmosphere. He added antithesis, repetition, brevity, assertion to his range. Above all, he was, as contemporary record witnesses, a supreme actor, gifted in voice and gesture to pull out all the stops.

Others—Pope, Johnson, Fielding among them—criticized him. To William Cowper,* who thought and felt as he did but who in his timidity differed so much from the sometimes strident self-confidence of Whitefield, was left the task of tribute:

> He followed Paul—his zeal a kindred flame,
> His apostolic charity the same.

WHITELAW, THOMAS (1840-1917). Scottish Presbyterian minister and biblical scholar. Born in Perth, he was educated at St. Andrews and the United Presbyterian Theological Hall, Edinburgh, and was ordained in 1864. He held pastorates in Glasgow and Kilmarnock, refused a call to Australia, and was a special commissioner for the United Free Church* at the union of Australian Presbyterian churches in 1901. U.F. Church moderator in 1912-13, he traveled widely. He served on many key committees and wrote many books, including commentaries on Genesis, John, and Acts and a study of the divinity of Christ.

WHITGIFT, JOHN (c.1530-1604). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1583. He studied at Cambridge under Nicholas Ridley* and John Bradford* and adopted Reformed doctrinal views. In 1563 he became Lady Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge, and in 1565 petitioned against the use of the surplice, but soon he became a convinced upholder of Anglican ritual and episcopal government. He became regius professor and master of Pembroke Hall (1567) and master of Trinity (1570). He secured the expulsion from Cambridge of Thomas Cartwright,* who had powerfully attacked episcopacy, and engaged in prolonged pamphlet controversy with him. In 1577 Whitgift became bishop of Worcester and vigorously enforced conformity by Puritans.* Recognizing the similarity of their aims, Elizabeth I* made him primate in 1583. With his private fortune he lived magnificently and had the queen's approval and friendship. Ministers were obliged to conform and increased powers secured for the Court of High Commission. Stringent control of printing by the bishops led to the secret publication of the Marprelate Tracts, whose instigators Whitgift punished most severely. In 1593 he secured the passing of an act banishing nonattenders at church, and some Nonconformists went to Holland. He tried to remedy the lack of precision in the Thirty-Nine Articles by defining predestination more closely (and in an entirely Calvinist manner) in the Lambeth Articles* of 1595, but the indignant queen forced him to withdraw them. After attending Elizabeth on her deathbed, he was obliged by James I* to confer with Puritans at the Hampton Court Conference* of 1604, and died later that year.

WHITMAN, MARCUS (1802-1847). Presbyterian medical missionary. Born at Rushville, New York, he qualified in medicine and for eight years practiced in Canada and New York. In 1835 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions sent him to study the possibility of Indian missions in the American Northwest. In 1836 his new bride Narcissa and a small missionary band accompanied him across the Rockies, founding a chain of mission stations in the Walla Walla River Valley. Encouraging at first, his work encountered multiplying obstacles. In the fall of 1842 he began a famous 3,000-mile horseback journey to Boston, convincing the Board to rescind its decision to close part of the work. He conferred with government officials in Washington and returned in 1843 with immigrants to the Oregon Territory. Due to a tragic misunderstanding, Cayuse Indians murdered him, his wife, and twelve others. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

WHITTIER, JOHN GREENLEAF (1807-1892). American Quaker poet and abolitionist. Born near Haverhill, Massachusetts, he had little formal education, but read extensively. His first book of poems was published in 1831. In 1833 he entered politics as an abolitionist, served in the Massachusetts legislature (1835), and was an important writer in the antislavery movement. He broke with W.L. Garrison by 1843, but continued a political activist, influencing the formation of the Republican Party and supporting Lincoln for the U.S. presidency. After the Civil War, poetry was his main interest and he became popular, especially on the rural New England themes that appear in his best-known work, Snow-Bound (1866). In old age he turned to religious verse, and his "Dear Lord and Father of mankind" and "Immortal Love forever full" are still widely used.
ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

WHITTINGHAM, WILLIAM (c.1524-1579). Dean of Durham. After education at Oxford, he went to Orléans, Germany, and Geneva (1550-53), returning to England a convinced Protestant. As Mary Tudor* was now queen, he left after four months for Frankfurt, inviting other English exiles to gather there. He took a leading part in organizing the English congregation, but divisions arose between those content with Edward VI's* second Prayer Book, led by Richard Cox,* and those like John Knox* wanting a more thorough reformation. Knox was expelled in March 1555, and Whittingham in September followed him to Geneva, where he was successively elected elder, deacon, and minister. He was largely responsible for the translation of the Geneva (or "Breeches") Bible,* and when the other translators returned to England on the death of Mary in 1558, he remained in Geneva until it was printed in 1560. Whittingham also made metrical versions of the Ten Commandments and many psalms.

In 1563 he was made dean of Durham despite Elizabeth's dislike of his Puritanism. He held services twice daily, removed images, and improved the grammar and song schools. Proceedings were begun against him in 1566 for his refusal to wear the surplice, but Whittingham gave way. He incurred the hostility of Edwin Sandys, archbishop of York,* for resisting his attempt to visit the cathedral. Sandys questioned the validity of his ordination and attempted to deprive him, but Whittingham died before a decision was reached. His memorial inscription in Durham Cathedral stated that he married Catherine, sister of John Calvin, but this is erroneous.

See "A Brief Discourse of the Troubles at Frankfurt" in The Works of John Knox (ed. D. Laing, vol. IV, 1855); and contemporary life (ed. M.A. Everett Green) in The Camden Miscellany, VI (1871). JOYCE HORN

WHOLE DUTY OF MAN, THE. A work first published anonymously in London in 1658 and which has been attributed to various authors, although Archbishop Sterne of York seems one of the most likely candidates. Written from a Church of England and royalist point of view, it yet has much in common with the practical writings of Richard Baxter,* the contemporary Presbyterian divine. Seeking to deal with the ethical aspects of the Christian life, it was very popular in its own day and has been reprinted in numerous editions down to the present time.

WHYTE, ALEXANDER (1836-1921). Scottish minister, often described as the "last of the Puritans." Born in Kirriemuir, he was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and at the Free Church of Scotland's* New College, Edinburgh. For four years from 1866 he was assistant minister of Free St. John's, Glasgow, then he was called to Edinburgh as colleague and successor to R.S. Candlish at Free St. George's. During nearly forty years there he established a reputation as a graphic and compelling preacher to an extent probably unparalleled even in a nation of preachers. In 1909 Whyte became principal of New College and taught NT literature there. He was moderator of the Free Church general assembly in 1898 and the author of a number of devotional books.
J.D. DOUGLAS

WICHERN, JOHANN HINRICH (1808-1881). German Protestant minister and founder of the Innere Mission.* Born in Hamburg, where he was influenced by the piety of the Erweckungsbewegung, Wichern studied theology at Göttingen under Lücke (1829-31) and at Berlin under Neander and Schleiermacher.* Returning to Hamburg as a candidate for ordination, Wichern was moved by the plight of underprivileged children in the poorer sections of that city. In 1833 he founded a school for neglected children in the village of Horn near Hamburg and christened it Rauhes Haus ("Rough House"). Under Wichern's strong leadership the school grew and expanded. In 1842 he established a training institute for his assistants and in 1844 began to publish a monthly periodical, Die Fliegenden Blätter aus dem Rauhen Hause. Children in the school were divided into families of approximately twelve, under the guidance of an overseer—generally a candidate for the ministry—and two assistants.

At the First Congress of the Evangelical Churches in Wittenberg in 1848, Wichern called for the coordination of all charitable activities in Germany through a single agency, the Innere Mission. While holding firmly to the confessions of the evangelical churches, Wichern wanted to bind the preaching of the Gospel to active social service and thus give practical expression to the Reformation principle of the priesthood of all believers. Wichern took part in prison reform in Prussia (1857) and in the establishment of the Johannisstift in Spandau (1858). He organized the Felddiakonie to minister to the wounded in the wars of 1864, 1866, and 1870-71. In 1872 he returned to the Rauhes Haus, and died in Hamburg.

WILBERFORCE, SAMUEL (1805-1873). Anglican bishop. Third son of William Wilberforce,* he was educated at Oxford, inherited his father's political skill, strong sense of mission, and charm, but earned the nickname "Soapy Sam." Brought up an evangelical, he was influenced strongly at Oxford by J.H. Newman* and by H.E. Manning,* to whom he was related by marriage. He broke with both on their conversion to Rome. Ordained in 1828, he spent ten years in parish work (more evangelical than Tractarian* in tone), and became successively bishop of Oxford (1845) and Winchester (1869), being known as a High Church bishop. Prime Minister Gladstone would have made him primate. Wilberforce was killed by a fall from his horse. He is remembered as the pioneer of the modern-style episcopate, organized chiefly for the pastoral care of the diocese; for pioneering the corporate training of ordinands (he founded Cuddesdon Theological College); and for the 1859 debate at Oxford on Darwin's theory, at which his intervention precipitated the later nineteenth-century conflict between science and religion. JOHN C. POLLOCK

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759-1833). Slave trade abolitionist. Born in Hull, where his house still stands as a museum to him, he was educated first at Hull Grammar School where he came under the influence of Joseph Milner,* the headmaster, and his brother Isaac. The latter used to lift the small boy onto the table so that the other scholars could hear him read with his beautiful voice. When he had been less than two years at the school, his father died; he went to live at Wimbledon with an aunt who was a staunch Methodist. His mother wanted to remove him from religious influences of this kind and brought him back to Yorkshire, where he went as a boarder to Pocklington School. At the age of fourteen he wrote a letter to a York paper about the evils of the slave trade. He largely wasted his time at St. John's College, Cambridge, but when he was twenty-five he met Isaac Milner* at Scarborough and invited him to come to Europe with him. He was converted through their conversation and study of the NT together on this trip. In 1780 he had been elected member of Parliament for Hull, after laying out a great deal of money on the election, and in 1784 he was again returned for his native city, but took instead the county seat for Yorkshire to which he had been chosen without a contest, and he was unopposed for that seat for twenty-three years. At this election James Boswell records how his smallness of stature was forgotten in the midst of his eloquence—"the shrimp grew and grew and became a whale."

Wilberforce became associated with the Clapham Sect,* a group of Evangelicals who were active in public life. Through his friendship with John Newton* and Thomas Clarkson* on one hand, William Pitt on the other, he was persuaded to put most of his energies into the abolition of the slave trade. The intellectual climate of the time was favorable to ideas of human liberty and happiness, and it was on the grounds of economics or national policy that slavery was defended. By a brilliant use of all the weapons available to them, he and his friends gradually undermined both the main grounds of defense, and in 1807 the slave trade was abolished. The complete abolition of slavery was not achieved until just before his death in 1833.

He was involved in many other good causes. In 1787 he founded a society for the reformation of manners, and ten years later published his Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country contrasted with Real Christianity, which was a best seller for forty years. He and his friends sought to evangelize the upper classes as Wesley had the lower classes, and also to use their wealth and influence in a multitude of good causes. He helped in the formation of the Church Missionary Society (1799), and the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804).

WILBUR, JOHN (1774-1856). Quaker preacher. A native of Rhode Island, descended from Samuel Wilbur, he taught in the public schools of Rhode Island, was recorded a minister of the Society of Friends in 1812, and became known as a rugged, effective speaker. On a preaching tour of the British Isles (1831-33) he zealously opposed the evangelical movement's entering Quakerism under the leadership of Joseph Gurney, Elizabeth Fry's brother. He published letters written to George Crosfield defending the old Quaker position on the Inner Light, and attacking "dangerous innovations" (1832). When Gurney preached in America (1837-38), Wilbur opposed him and was expelled (1843), becoming leader in 1845 of five hundred separatists known as "Wilburites" (officially the "New England Yearly Meeting of Friends"). Other groups supported him in New York, Ohio, and Philadelphia. He preached again in England during 1853-54. J.G.G. NORMAN

WILDER, ROBERT PARMELEE (1863-1938). Missionary to India and virtual founder of the Student Volunteer Movement.* Born in Kolhapur, India, he was studying and promoting missions at Princeton College when D.L. Moody* called for the summer Bible conference out of which the SVM came. For two years he visited colleges on behalf of the movement. In 1892, on his way to India, he founded the British Student Volunteer Missionary Union. In India he worked with students through the YMCA. When ill-health forced him to leave India in 1902, he spent fourteen years in Europe promoting the World Student Christian Federation.* From 1919 to 1927 he was general secretary of the SVM. Then for six years he was executive secretary of the Near East Christian Council, residing in Cairo.

HAROLD R. COOK

WILFRID (634-709). Bishop of York. Son of a Northumbrian nobleman, he was educated at Lindisfarne then went to study the Roman form of religious life at Canterbury. After visiting Rome with Benedict Biscop* in 654, he returned to England as abbot of Ripon. At the Synod of Whitby* (663/4) he was the chief and most vehement advocate of the Roman tradition concerning the dating of Easter. Shortly after the synod he was appointed bishop of Northumbria with his seat at York. He went to Gaul for consecration by Frankish bishops. Due to his dallying there for two years, King Oswy had Chad,* abbot of Lastingham, consecrated as bishop of York. On his return in 666 Wilfrid went to Ripon, but Theodore of Tarsus* (archbishop of Canterbury) had him installed at York in 669.

He was an ambitious and able man with a forceful personality. He fell foul of King Ecgfrith, and in 678 Theodore, concerned at Wilfrid's love of power, divided the diocese of York into four and appointed other bishops for the various sections. Wilfrid appealed to Theodore and then to Pope Agatho. The papal synod upheld his case, but on his return to England he was imprisoned by Ecgfrith. After his release he went to Sussex, where he had some success evangelizing the heathen South Saxons. After the death of Ecgfrith in 686 he was reconciled to Theodore and returned north as bishop of Ripon and abbot of Hexham. In 691 he was banished after a dispute with King Aldfrith. King Ethelred of Mercia invited him to become bishop of Leicester. In 703 the synod called by Archbishop Brihtwold at Austerfield in Yorkshire decreed that he should resign the see of York and retire to Ripon as a monk. He appealed again to Rome. His claims were upheld, but he agreed to the appointment of John of Beverley* as bishop of York and himself as bishop of Hexham.

He spent his last years in the monastery at Ripon till his death at the monastery at Oundle in Northamptonshire. His importance lies in the large part he played in the Romanization of the Celtic Church.

See J. Raine, The Historians of the Church of York and its Archbishops (ed. B. Colgrave, 1927), and B. Colgrave, The Life of Bishop Wilfrid by Eddius Stephanus (1927). R.E. NIXON

WILKES, PAGET (1871-1934). Missionary to Japan.* Son of an Anglican clergyman, he was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, was deeply influenced by the activities of the Oxford Inter-Collegiate Christian Union, and left to serve in Japan under the Church Missionary Society in a group led by the Rev. Barclay Buxton in 1897. Here Wilkes felt unduly restricted by orthodox Anglicanism and founded the interdenominational Japan Evangelistic Band, pledged to aggressive evangelism and the distinctive holiness doctrines associated with the Keswick Convention* movement. In 1903 the headquarters of the work was centered at Kobe, under the name of the "One by One Band." The whole of Wilkes's active life was spent in Japan, but his name became widely known through his books, of which the best known were The Dynamic of Service (1920), The Dynamic of Faith (1921), and The Dynamic of Redemption (1923). Though he seldom visited England, when he did come to Oxford or Cambridge he strongly urged students to offer for missionary service. G.C.B. DAVIES

WILKINS, JOHN (1614-1672). Bishop of Chester. After studying at Oxford, he became vicar of Fawsley, Northamptonshire, in 1637, and subsequently became a private chaplain, devoting his leisure to scientific studies. His first work in 1638, The Discovery of a World in the Moon, sought to prove the moon habitable, and in 1640 he published A Discourse concerning a New Planet, showing the probability that the earth was a planet. From 1645 he promoted weekly meetings for scientific discussion in London, anticipating the Royal Society.* A supporter of the parliamentary side, he took the Solemn League and Covenant* and was made warden of Wadham College, Oxford, in 1648. Tolerant of Royalists, he gathered a distinguished group of scientists around him and held weekly meetings on the London pattern. He married Cromwell's sister in 1656 and became master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1659, but was deprived the following year. He accepted the Restoration settlement and after various preferments was made bishop of Chester (1668). In 1662 he became first secretary of the Royal Society, of which he was virtual founder. As bishop of Chester, he tried to promote the toleration and comprehension of dissenters. Besides mathematical works, he wrote On the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion, defending natural theology.

WILKINSON, JEMIMA (1752-1819). Religious leader. Born in Cumberland, Rhode Island, her religious interest was roused about 1758 by George Whitefield's* sermons and by the meetings of the "New Light Baptists." In 1774 she was influenced by Ann Lee,* the founder in America of the "Shakers." Following fever, she claimed to have died and that her body was inhabited by the "Spirit of Life." Taking the name "Public Universal Friend," she held open-air meetings, led processions on horseback clad in a long robe over masculine attire, and established churches (1777-82). Her disciples' claim that she was Christ come again aroused hostility, forcing her to leave New England; she eventually established a colony "Jerusalem" in Yates County (1790). Internal disputes affected the movement, which disintegrated entirely after her death. J.G.G. NORMAN

WILLAERT, ADRIAEN (c.1490-1562). Flemish composer. A pupil of Jean Mouton, an outstanding follower of Josquin Desprez, Willaert went to Italy early in his career, like so many of his countrymen. There he was active at Rome, Ferrara, and Milan, being closely associated with the Este family. In 1527 he was elected Maestro di cappella at St. Mark's in Venice. In his compositions he strove for the utmost perfection, and exemplified the humanistic desire for complete clarity of the text. He experimented with the expressive use of chromaticism. In Venice, partly because of the placement of his choral forces in the basilica, Willaert gave special attention to writing for multiple choirs, a feature that was further developed by his successors there. He is considered the founder of a distinct Venetian school. Zarlino, the greatest theorist of the time, was his pupil, and transmitted his master's ideas in his writings. Andrea Gabrieli also studied with him, carrying on his traditions at Venice, becoming a great organist also, and the teacher of his illustrious nephew Giovanni Gabrieli. Willaert was equally important as a composer of instrumental and vocal secular music.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

WILLAN, HEALEY (1880-1968). Musical composer. A native of England, he spent most of his professional life in Canada. He came to the prominent organist's position at St. Paul's Anglican Church, Toronto, in 1914, but soon transferred to the High Church atmosphere of St. Mary Magdalene's, where he served for the rest of his life. Here his a cappella gallery choir and chancel choir of men formed an attraction for connoisseurs of liturgical music for many years. Although he has written anthems not unlike Stanford, Wood, and Noble, his most characteristic works are the shorter, unaccompanied pieces, which he probably wrote for his own choir at St. Mary Magdalene's. A number of hymn anthems, based on traditional melodies such as "Sing to the Lord of Harvest," are in excellent taste and have wide appeal. The Three Kings, for six-part mixed chorus, has fine contrasts of choral timbre. An Apostrophe of the Heavenly Host, with a text from the Eastern liturgy coupled with the tune, "Lasst uns erfreuen," is a more exacting work for eight-part chorus. Willan has also written larger works with orchestral accompaniment, and a quantity of useful hymn-preludes and other works for organ. Willan taught for many years at the conservatory in Toronto, and exerted a wide influence.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

WILLARD, FRANCES ELIZABETH CAROLINE (1839-1898). Educator, temperance leader, and suffragist. Born of Puritan ancestry at Churchville, New York, she grew up on the Wisconsin frontier. She attended Milwaukee Female College and graduated from Northwestern Female College, Evanston (1859), where she was converted, later becoming a Methodist. Never married, she taught at Pittsburgh and at Genesee before becoming president of Evanston College for Ladies (1871-74). She became president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union (1879) and of the World's Woman Christian Temperance Union (1891) and helped organize the Prohibition Party in 1882. A women's rights reformer, she was National Council of Women president. She wrote Woman and Temperance (1883) and Glimpses of Fifty Years (1889).

D.E. PITZER

WILLEHAD (d.789). Missionary to the Saxons. Born in Northumbria and educated for the priesthood at York, he went in 765 as a missionary to Friesland. His work was partly inspired by the example of the earlier Northumbrian, Willibrord,* the "Apostle of Frisia." At the direction of Charlemagne* he went about 780 to seek to evangelize the Saxons in Wigmodia (between the lower Weser and the Elbe), but his work was cut short by an insurrection in 782. After a visit to Rome he spent a few years at the monastery of Echternach (founded by Willibrord) copying ancient manuscripts. Then he returned to his earlier work, and in 787 became bishop of Bremen. He built for his diocese a cathedral dedicated to the Apostle Peter, which was opened in 789. PETER TOON

WILLIAM III (1650-1702). King of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Born at The Hague, he was thoroughly educated at Leyden, raised a Calvinist (though religiously tolerant), and proved himself an iron-willed soldier-politician. From his birth until 1672 the Republican party dominated Dutch politics; when France invaded the United Provinces, the Republicans, who stood for appeasement, were overthrown and William appointed stadholder and captain-general for life. He managed the war defense successfully and dedicated his life to foiling Louis XIV's plans of European hegemony. To that end he married Mary, daughter of the future James II of England, in 1677. When the latter succeeded his brother Charles II and pursued pro-French and pro-Catholic policies, William was invited by English nobles to take the throne. He did; James fled. William and Mary were crowned as joint monarchs in 1689. William decisively influenced religious and political affairs, and though he was dead by 1702 after a fall from his horse, he brought his country to greatness in Europe by helping to seal the downfall of France in the War of the Spanish Succession. BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE (c.1180-1249). Bishop of Paris. He studied in Paris and became a teacher first in the faculty of arts and then in the faculty of theology. In 1223 he became a canon of Notre-Dame, and in 1228 bishop of Paris. When suspicion of Aristotle* in ecclesiastical circles was rife, he tried to synthesize the traditional Augustinian method and doctrine with these new Neoplatonic, Arabian, and Aristotelian philosophical ideas, and so prepared the way for his more successful followers, Alexander of Hales,* Albertus Magnus,* and Thomas Aquinas.* In 1229 William, who is known also as "Guillaume d'Auvergne" or "Guillaume de Paris," was rebuked by Pope Gregory IX* for his laxity in dealing with problems in the university. Gregory expressed regret at William's election as bishop. His most important philosophical writings are De Universo and De Anima and, theologically, De Virtutibus, De Sacramentis, and De Trinitate.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

WILLIAM OF AUXERRE (1150-1231). Philosopher and theologian. After serving as archdeacon of Beauvais and then proctor of the University of Paris at the Roman Curia under Honorius III (1216-27), he was appointed (1230) by Gregory IX as a member of a commission of three to correct the physical treatises of Aristotle in order to bring him into line with Christian thought and to make him acceptable at the University of Paris. William died, however, before he could complete his part in this important assignment. He was largely influenced by Augustine* and Anselm of Canterbury* in his theology, and to some degree by Hugh* and Richard of St.-Victor.* His most famous work is his Summa Aurea (1215-20), which generally follows the pattern of the Sentences of Peter Lombard,* but covers some issues not treated by the latter. C. GREGG SINGER

WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX (c.1070-1121). Medieval philosopher, theologian, and reforming bishop. He is best known for his controversy with Abelard on the question of universals. Reacting against Roscellinus* of Compiègne's Nominalist position of universals, William taught an extreme Realist doctrine. In 1100, while teaching at the cathedral school in Paris, Peter Abelard,* his pupil, attacked the position by illustrating the ludicrous logical results of this teaching. William left his post shortly afterward and retired to the Abbey of St.-Victor, where he modified his teachings and started a school of theology. He was consecrated bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne in 1113 and was responsible for a reform of the clergy in his diocese. Few of his writings have survived, and his views on universals must largely be based on the descriptions of Abelard.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

WILLIAM OF CONCHES (c.1080-c.1154). Norman philosopher. He was a disciple of Bernard of Chartres and himself taught at Chartres, where he sought to further classical learning and literature. John of Salisbury,* one of his pupils, considered him an accomplished grammarian. After 1140 he was attacked by opponents of classical studies and by William of St.-Thierry,* who detected in his writings the influence of Abelard's* heresies. Withdrawing from public teaching to the court of Geoffrey Plantagenet, he taught the future king of England, Henry II. He wrote commentaries on all the basic Platonic texts of the early Middle Ages. His treatises Philosophia Mundi and Pragmaticon reveal strongly Platonistic and Realistic tendencies. Leaning toward pantheism, he identified the Holy Spirit as the world soul. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY (c.1090-c.1143). English historian and monk. Educated at Malmesbury Abbey in SW England, he became a monk there and helped to build up the library. He evidently could have become abbot in 1140, but relinquished it in favor of a colleague. Taking Bede* as his pattern, he set out to write English history in a popular form. His Gesta regum Anglorum (record of the kings of England from the end of the sixth century) was published about 1125, closely followed by Gesta pontificum Anglorum (which covered the English Church hierarchy over roughly the same period). His Historia novella, dealing with events after 1126, breaks off abruptly at the end of 1142. His chronology has been at points criticized, but William's work contains interesting anecdotes and perceptive comments and strictures, all presented in vivid and powerful style. He testified to the quality and discipline found in contemporary English monks. Many know his writing only for the striking and much-quoted passage in which he tells of the high moral motives that made men undertake the First Crusade (preached about the time he was born).

J.D. DOUGLAS

WILLIAM OF MOERBEKE (c.1215-1286). Philosopher and translator. He was born at Moerbeke, Belgium, and studied at Cologne. By 1260 he had served in the Dominican Order in Thebes and Nicea and, urged by Thomas Aquinas,* began to edit and translate ancient Greek authors. He translated much of Aristotle into Latin and became the most important and prolific translator of Greek in the thirteenth century. Translating Greek commentators, and writings of Proclus, Archimedes, Eutochius, Ptolemy, Hero, Galen, and Hippocrates, he through his work gave impetus to Neoplatonism* in the late Middle Ages. He was a chaplain and confessor to popes Clement IV and Gregory X. Zealous for reunion with the Greek Church, he participated in the Council of Lyons* (1274) and was appointed archbishop of Corinth (1278), where he resided until his death.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

WILLIAM OF NORWICH (1132-1144). Supposed victim of a Jewish ritual murder. A pious tanner's apprentice in Norwich, William was—according to certain ecclesiastics, especially the prior, William Turbe—lured from his home in Holy Week and sacrificed by the Jews during their Passover celebrations. In fact he had probably died of a cataleptic fit and been buried prematurely by his parents. At first the civil authorities refused to believe this tale, which was the first accusation of ritual murder in English, and indeed European, history (there is no continental parallel till 1171), but William's reburial in Norwich Cathedral in 1151 aroused a wave of superstitious fanaticism. Visions and miracles were reported at the tomb, and the boy's relics were venerated as those of a saint and martyr till the Reformation. This ugly episode began a whole series of discoveries of boy saints and martyrs elsewhere, details of which are based suspiciously on the Norwich prototype. IAN SELLERS

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (c.1280-c.1349). Medieval Scholastic theologian and philosopher. Born in Surrey, England, he entered the Franciscan Order about 1310 and studied at Oxford between 1318 and 1324. His ideas led to a summons to Avignon (1324) to answer charges of heresy. A dispute between Pope John XXII* and the Spiritual Franciscans was then at its height, and William identified himself with the Spirituals in opposition to John. In 1328 he left the city and went to the court of the emperor Louis of Bavaria. Excommunicated, William is supposed to have said to the emperor: "You defend me with your sword and I will defend you with my pen." From 1328 until his death he produced powerful defenses of the imperial theory against those who favored the pope. After Louis's death in 1347 William made an effort to be reconciled with his order and the church, but the outcome of this attempt is not known.

His writings fall into two groups associated with the two phases of his life. While working for Louis (1333-47) he wrote works about the relation of church and state such as Dialogus Inter Magistrum et Discipulum, Octo Quaestiones Super Potestate ac Dignitate Papali, and Tractatus de Imperatorum et Pontificum Potestate. The nonpolitical works that contain his contributions to philosophy and theology were written while he was at Avignon and Oxford (1317-28). These include lectures on Peter Lombard's* Sentences, an explanation of Aristotle's* Physics, commentaries and treatises on logic and natural science. His most important philosophical work is Summa Logicae, which he completed before he left Avignon.

Ockham criticized the accommodation of the philosophical system of Aristotle with Christian doctrine that had been fashioned by the thirteenth-century Schoolmen such as Thomas Aquinas.* This method had tried to achieve an accord between faith and reason by reinterpretation of the philosophical assumptions of Aristotle. Its purpose was to keep the philosophic system of Aristotelianism intact. Franciscan scholars from Bonaventure to Duns Scotus tried to argue for the Christian faith by destroying Aristotle's philosophy. All of these thirteenth-century systems, however, depended on the doctrine of Realism. Oakham rejected this teaching on the basis of a radical empiricism in which the base of knowledge is direct experience of individual things (Nominalism*). Involved in his explanation of reality is his view that "What can be done with fewer assumptions is done in vain with more" ("Ockham's Razor"). Called the via moderna as opposed to the via antiqua of Aquinas, Ockham's Nominalism was of great significance for science, since it suggested that natural phenomena could be investigated rationally. God to Ockham, however, was above all knowledge. He cannot be apprehended by reason, as the Thomists taught, or by illumination, as the Augustinians believed, but only by faith.

WILLIAM OF ST.-THIERRY (c.1085-1148). Scholastic philosopher. Born of a noble family, at Liège, he studied under Anselm of Laon* and entered the Benedictine Abbey of St. Nicasius of Reims (1113); he was later elected abbot of St.-Thierry, near Reims (1119). In the next three years he wrote De Natura et dignitate amoris and De contemplando Deo. He formed a lasting friendship with Bernard of Clairvaux,* but was refused admission there. In the conflict between Cluniacs and Cistercians (1120s) he urged Bernard to defend Cîteaux, resulting in Bernard's dedicating his Apologia (1124) and De Gratia et libero arbitrio (1128) to him, with a return favor of De Sacramento altaris (1128). Between 1128 and 1135 he wrote several treatises based on the Fathers: the Canticle of Canticles after Gregory the Great, Ambrose, and Origen; De Natura Animae et corporis; a study of Romans. He took part in the first general chapter of Benedictines of Reims province (1130), but resigned his abbacy in 1135 for a strictly contemplative life, joining the Cistercians at Signy. His writings increased: Meditativae orationes (1130-45) showing his inmost soul; Speculum fidei and Aenigma fidei; and an attack on Abelard. He also began, but did not complete, a life of Bernard. C.G. THORNE, JR.

WILLIAM OF TYRE (c.1130-c.1185). Archbishop of Tyre. Born in Jerusalem of a European merchant family, he returned to Europe c.1145 where for twenty years he pursued his studies of arts and theology in France, and civil and canon law at Bologna. Peter Lombard* and Hugh de Porta Ravennata were among his teachers. Ordained before 1161, he returned to Palestine in 1165, becoming archdeacon in 1167, and was consecrated archbishop of Tyre in 1175. Diplomatic missions took him to Constantinople and Rome in 1168-69. In 1170 he was appointed tutor to Baldwin,* son of Amaury the king of Jerusalem (1163-74), from whom he had been given earlier a stipend to write the official history of his reign, Gesta Amaurici.

At royal request, c.1170 he began his Historia rerum in partibus transmarinis gestarum, covering Crusade events from 1095 to 1184. This was translated into French in the thirteenth century and printed in Basle as early as 1549. A signal work of medieval historiography, it was the primary authority from 1127, where Fulcher of Chartes had stopped, and a contemporary chronicle from 1144. Though confusion exists in chronology, men and events are judged honestly in terms of religion, morality, and politics, even to comment on human physical and intellectual characteristics. He was also familiar with the works of Albert of Aachen, Fulcher of Chartes, and Balderic of Bourgueil, as with versions of the Gesta Francorum. A polyglot, he knew Latin, Greek, French, and Arabic. One of his lost works is the Gesta orientalium principum, on the Arabs, and another is on the Third Lateran Council. He became chancellor of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem in 1174, led the Jerusalem delegation to the Third Lateran Council (1179), and failed to procure the patriarchate of Jerusalem in 1183. He retired to his Historia, writing the Prologue in 1184 declaring his determined objectivity.

WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM (1324-1404). Bishop of Winchester. Born in humble circumstances, he was educated at Winchester and held various royal administrative posts before becoming chancellor in 1367. He received numerous ecclesiastical livings from 1357 although he was not priested until 1362. Five years later he was consecrated bishop of Winchester. Anticlerical agitation led to his dismissal from the chancellorship (1371), and John of Gaunt had him brought to trial (1376) to answer for his conduct while in office. Though found guilty on only one minor count, he was sentenced to forfeit the temporalities of his see and dismissed from court. On the accession of Richard II he was pardoned, and twelve years later resumed the chancellorship. His importance lies in his generous educational patronage; he endowed a college at Oxford (now New College) in 1379, and a school at Winchester in 1382. His school was the first independent and self-governing school in the country and became the pattern for Henry VI's foundation at Eton.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

WILLIAM (FITZHERBERT) OF YORK (d.1154). Archbishop of York. Of noble birth, he was a chaplain of King Stephen of England, and by 1114 had become treasurer and canon of York Cathedral. As Stephen's candidate he was elected archbishop in 1142. He was opposed, however, by the Yorkshire Cistercians, whose candidate was the strict Cistercian, Henry Murdac. They attributed his election to simony and royal pressure, and Theobald,* archbishop of Canterbury, refused William consecration. Both sides appealed to Rome. Despite the opposition of Bernard of Clairvaux* and his whole Cistercian Order, Innocent II cleared the way for William's consecration at Winchester (1143) by Henry, bishop of Winchester, who was the king's brother as well as papal legate. Complaints were renewed against William at the accession of a Cistercian to the papacy. Influenced by Bernard, Eugenius III suspended William from office in 1147. He was deposed by the Council of Reims (1147) after his supporters burned the Cistercian Fountains Abbey where Murdac was now abbot. Murdac was elected to York in his place, and William, who found refuge with his friend, the bishop of Winchester, devoted himself to prayer and study.

When Bernard, Eugenius, and Murdac died (1153), William's appeal for restoration was granted by Pope Anastasius IV (1154). William's death, one month after his return, was said to have been caused by poisoning. Considered a martyr and revered for his sanctity as well as for miracles alleged in connection with his return and after his death, William was canonized in 1226. The events of his career constitute a notorious example of twelfth-century ecclesiastical politics.

WILLIAMS, CHARLES (1886-1945). English writer. Born in London and educated at St. Albans and University College, London, he spent the greater part of his career in the service of the Oxford University Press. As a writer his range was wide, covering religious drama (Thomas Cranmer of Canterbury in 1936 followed Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral at the Canterbury Festival in the preceding year); Arthurian legend, best represented by Taliesin through Logres (1938); what he himself described as "metaphysical thrillers"; biography, criticism, and theology. The last includes He Came Down from Heaven (1937), Descent of the Dove (1939), and The Forgiveness of Sins (1942).

Williams in his youth had links with the group of "Rosicrucians,"* of which Yeats was at one time a member. To this association with the occult should be added the influence of the Christian mysticism of Evelyn Underhill.* The relationship of different spiritual states to various parts of the body, an idea central to the symbolism of Taliesin, owes something to the Kabbalah. The importance of Dante must also be noted in Williams's development, especially in the positive affirmations of his faith. Hence his stress on the Incarnation and on the active work of the Spirit in history (Descent of the Dove) and the life of society. For Williams there could indeed be a real civitas Dei.

He is perhaps best known as a novelist, but even here he appeals only to a special taste, prepared to accept his treatment of serious religious themes in a thriller mode and through stylized dialogue. His work in the drama also employs symbolism, but less subtly, and in any case his plays are altogether lesser achievements. In the end he will probably be remembered most for the difficult and Blake-like Taliesin through Logres, a poem which grapples with the religious significance of the Arthurian story in a series of epic odes.

ARTHUR POLLARD

WILLIAMS, DANIEL (1643?-1716). Presbyterian divine and founder of Dr. Williams' Library in London. Born near Wrexham in Wales, he became an itinerant preacher by the age of nineteen. Without formal academic training but nevertheless widely read, he accepted the post of chaplain to the countess of Meath in Ireland in 1665. From 1667 he was a Nonconformist pastor in Dublin. There he gained his largely theoretical admiration of Presbyterianism. Leaving Ireland in 1687 during the troubles, he moved to London where he became pastor of the Presbyterian congregation in Hand Alley, Bishopsgate. During the 1690s he was the acknowledged leader of the London Presbyterians, especially so after the death of Richard Baxter. His Calvinism was of the Amyraldian* variety, deemed "Neonomianism" by those with whom he engaged in bitter controversy. He was twice married, and it was money received from his wives that enabled him to be a philanthropist—hence the library.

PETER TOON

WILLIAMS, SIR GEORGE (1821-1905). Founder of the Young Men's Christian Association.* He was born at Dulverton, Somerset, the son of a farmer. Apprenticed to a draper in Bridgwater, he was converted through reading the work of C.G. Finney* and joined the local Congregational church. In 1841 he went to work in a London draper's, and later rose to be a partner in the firm. In 1844 a meeting of twelve young men in Williams's room is generally recognized as marking the founding of the London YMCA. Thereafter the history of that international movement cannot be understood without reference to the tireless labors, practical wisdom, and catholic spirit of this businessman, evangelist, temperance advocate, and social reformer. He was knighted in 1894.

WILLIAMS, ISAAC (1802-1865). Welsh Tractarian* poet and theologian. Born at Cymcynfelyn near Aberystwyth and educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Oxford, he was deeply influenced by John and Thomas Keble and by Richard Hurrell Froude. Ordained in 1829, he was tutor and dean of Trinity by 1833, and curate to J.H. Newman* at St. Mary's. He contributed verses to the Lyra Apostolica (1836) and wrote many other poems, including "The Cathedral" (1838) and "The Baptistery" (1842), and produced many translations of hymns from Greek and Latin, of which the best known is "Disposer Supreme." He was generally recognized to be the natural successor to John Keble* for the professorship of poetry at Oxford in 1841/2, but his Tract 80 on Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge aroused great alarm and antagonism in the Anglican Church and cost him the chair. He spent the rest of his life in semi-retirement, writing hymns, poetry, sermons, and devotional works.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

WILLIAMS, JOHN (1796-1839). Protestant missionary, known as "the Apostle of Polynesia." He and his wife were sent out by the London Missionary Society in 1817 to Eimeo, one of the Society Islands near Tahiti. In 1823 he discovered Rarotonga and founded a mission there. He later translated parts of the Bible and other books into Rarotongan. He was a born leader and a man of great zeal. A training school to augment the missionary force for carrying the Gospel to other islands was launched by Williams. He built a vessel, The Messenger of Peace, to be used in evangelizing the South Sea Islands. By 1834 no island of importance within 2,000 miles of Tahiti had been left unvisited. From 1834 to 1838 he returned to the British Isles to conduct an extensive speaking tour, familiarizing many with the evangelistic opportunities in the South Seas* and creating much enthusiasm. His Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands (1837) helped in this. Returning there on 20 November 1839, he landed at Dillon's Bay, Erromanga, in the New Hebrides, to be met by savages, killed, and eaten, in return for cruelties previously inflicted by British sailors. Thousands of converts mourned his martyrdom. A new burst of enthusiasm for missions was generated, and a succession of ships bearing the name John Williams was employed in evangelizing the area for many years.

WILLIAMS, ROGER (1603?-1683). Founder of Rhode Island. Born in London, he so impressed the famed jurist Edward Coke with his ability at shorthand that Coke sent him to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he graduated and went on until episcopally ordained in 1629. He became chaplain to William Masham's family, married, then in 1631 because of Separatist views migrated to Boston. There he refused a position as teacher because the church was not separated from the Church of England. He then traded with the Indians and was assistant pastor to Ralph Smith for house and land in Plymouth (1631-33). He became teacher in the Salem Church in 1633 until in 1635 his views brought his banishment. He fled to Providence in 1636, bought land from the Indians to found Rhode Island, and founded also a Baptist church. He went to England in 1642 and secured a charter for the colony. He engaged in a pamphlet war with John Cotton* and wrote The Bloody Tenet of Persecution (1644) and The Bloody Tenet Yet More Bloody (1652). During a second stay in England (1651-54) he was able to safeguard the colony's charter, and on his return became president of Rhode Island until 1657. His views that the church and state must be separate and that the state must not coerce the conscience of the individual are a treasured part of the Baptist heritage in America.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

WILLIAMS, SAMUEL WELLS (1812-1884). Early American missionary, diplomat, and authority on China. Specially trained as a printer, he was sent by the American Board to Canton in 1833. There he cooperated with Elijah Bridgman* in editing and printing The Chinese Repository and other literary works. Unsettled conditions forced them to move the press to Macao in 1835. During an extended furlough in the USA (1844-48), Williams produced his great two-volume Middle Kingdom, for many years the standard work on China. He also learned Japanese from some shipwrecked sailors and in 1837 was part of the expedition that tried to return them to Japan. After 1853 he became involved in diplomatic affairs, first as interpreter on Commodore Perry's visit to Japan, then for twenty years as secretary and interpreter to the American legation in China. He was professor of Chinese language and literature at Yale (1877-84), ninth president of the American Bible Society (1881-84), and president of the American Oriental Society.

HAROLD R. COOK

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM ("of Pantycelyn") (1717-1791). Welsh Methodist leader, author, and hymnwriter. Although known to English readers as nothing more than the author of "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah," Williams, whose work is almost entirely in Welsh, is the most significant literary exponent of the mind and spirit of the Evangelical Revival. He was born at Cefncoed, Llanfair-ar-y-byrn, Carmarthenshire, son of a ruling elder at the Congregational Church at Cefnarthen. Williams was educated at the Dissenting Academy at Llwyn-llwyd and it was then that he experienced evangelical conversion under the ministry of Howel Harris* when the latter was preaching in the churchyard of Talgarth. He joined the Church of England and was ordained deacon in 1740, but he was refused ordination as a priest in 1743. In the intervening years he served as a curate. After this unhappy experience, he devoted himself to the Methodist Revival as an itinerant preacher and the ablest conductor of the societies that were springing into existence.

Williams was the most prolific of Welsh Methodist authors. Some ninety titles were published under his name between 1744 and 1791. His greatest contribution was as a hymnwriter and poet. In these productions the power, the unction, and the passion of the Methodist Revival are fully expressed. In two long poems, Golwg ar Deyrnas Crist (View of Christ's Kingdom, 1756, 1764) and Bywyd and Marwolaeth Theomemphus (Life and Death of Theomemphus, 1764, 1781), he describes the objective christological framework of his thinking on the one hand, and on the other the spiritual trials and eventual triumph through grace of the redeemed sinner, Theomemphus. These two works provide the golden threads that run through his hymns, which were published from time to time in twenty-four publications. His masterly exploration of the inner life —its joys, fears, trials, and victories—was a unique contribution to evangelical literature. The other golden thread is his "praise of the Lamb" (to use Moravian terminology). Ann Griffiths* alone among Welsh hymnwriters comes close to him in the ability to celebrate successfully the grace and power of the Redeemer. Williams's hymns were not merely literary exercises, but were intended as a practical contribution to the work of the Revival; its history in Wales cannot be fully written without putting adequate emphasis on the role of these hymns in evoking and sustaining the revival spirit.

Williams's prose writings do not reach the same standard as his poetry and hymns, but they are of great interest to the student of the period. His Ductor Nuptiarum (1777), for example, is a treatise bearing upon sexual ethics that is far removed from the prudery that characterized Evangelicals of a later age. His handbook for conducting society-meetings (Drws y Society Profiad, 1777) throws valuable light on the principles that animated Methodist leaders at their class-meetings. The breadth of Williams's interests—the kind of enthusiasm that was later to flower in the foreign missionary enterprises—is demonstrated in his very substantial account of the religions of the world (Pantheologia, 1762-79).

Amid all these literary labors, Williams, like his colleagues, was constantly engaged in preaching tours throughout Wales. Of all the Methodist leaders, he was the ablest spiritual physician, with a rare gift for assisting people in their religious and psychological difficulties. His stature as a poet has continued to increase in the estimation of critics, and his influence continues among Welsh Christians, since large numbers of hymns are included in all the denominational hymnbooks.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Biography by G.M. Roberts, Y Pêr Ganiedydd; his works are in process of being published in a definitive edition; S. Lewis, Williams Pantycelyn (1927), is a brilliant (though controversial) literary appraisal. There are a vast number of articles and monographs on his work.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM ("o'r Wern") (1781-1840). Welsh preacher. He was born in the parish of Llanfachreth, Merioneth, the son of a carpenter, a craft which he himself followed in early life. He was educated at Wrexham Academy and ordained into the Congregational ministry at Wern, near Wrexham, in October 1808. He moved to the Tabernacle, Crosshall Street, Liverpool, in 1836, but returned to Wern in 1839 and died there five months later. Tradition has it in Wales that Williams, John Elias,* and Christmas Evans* are the three greatest names among the nation's preachers. Unlike the two others, Williams's preaching style was quiet and persuasive rather than tempestuous. The very large congregations that gathered to hear him would listen in rapt silence to his carefully developed themes, and the stillness would be broken by an occasional sob. He was an early protagonist of the "Modern Calvinism" of Dr. Edward Williams, and in his sermons he demonstrated the philosophical cast of his mind by the care and lucidity with which he developed the doctrinal theses which were his chosen topics. His influence brought many congregations into existence in the Wrexham district, and throughout N Wales he brought a new evangelical and missionary enthusiasm into being just at a time when the great flood of the Methodist Revival was showing signs of ebbing. R. TUDUR JONES

WILLIBRORD (658-739). Anglo-Saxon missionary and "Apostle to the Frisians." Born in Northumbria, Willibrord was educated at the monastery of Ripon, near York, headed by Wilfrid.* In his twenties he went to Ireland, where he became enthusiastic about becoming a missionary; his mentor, the Anglo-Saxon monk Egbert* (active in trying to influence the Irish Church to join the Anglo-Saxon Church* in recognizing papal direction) suggested Frisia, where Wilfrid had already briefly preached in 677. Frankish power had just expanded northward, under Pepin of Heristal, to include the commercially important southern edge of Frisia (which at that time included the coastal regions from Schleswig south to Flanders). In 690 Willibrord and eleven companions sailed across the Channel to Frankish Frisia, were greeted by Pepin, and began missionary work. At thirty-seven Willibrord went to Rome in 695, to be made archbishop of a new Frankish church province to be centered at Utrecht. He established the famed monastery of Echternach, in Luxembourg, and supervised a vigorous mission effort, which gained much success in the area under Frankish control. The N Frisian counterattack after Pepin's death, led by the pagan Radbod, halted progress temporarily (715-19); but under Charles Martel the Franks regained S Frisia. Aided by Boniface,* Willibrord continued working with the Frisians, and much of the Frankish-controlled region was Christianized by the time of his death. Boniface carried on his work.

WILSON, DANIEL (1778-1858). Anglican bishop. Son of a rich London silk manufacturer, Wilson was intended for a business career, but experienced an evangelical conversion and decided to enter the ministry. He studied at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, of which he was later vice-principal, and exercised several highly successful ministries, one of which was at St. Mary's, Islington (1824-32). Then through the influence of Charles Grant he was made bishop of Calcutta at the late age of fifty-four. He found the affairs of the diocese in confusion, but by unrelenting work and spiritual discipline restored order and established his influence over chaplains and missionaries alike. He waged war on the caste system, built Calcutta Cathedral and many new churches, secured in 1833 freedom of missionary activity from the control of the East India Company, and created two new sees (Madras and Bombay) which gave him metropolitan status over the whole of India. Vigorous, unbending, and determined to hold others to his own high standards, he helped the Anglican Church in India to grow in power, zeal, and esteem. He was in Serampore during the Mutiny, and died at Calcutta.

WINCHELSEA, ROBERT OF (c.1240-1313). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1293/4. Born probably at Winchelsea, Sussex, he studied at Paris, where he became rector (1267), and at Oxford, where he was made chancellor (1288). In 1283 he was appointed archdeacon of Essex, and in 1293 was elected archbishop of Canterbury, but a vacancy in the papacy delayed his consecration until 1294. As champion of ecclesiastical rights and papal authority, he resisted Edward I's demands for clerical subsidies for war with France, but delayed for a year publishing Boniface VIII's bull Clericis laicos (1296) forbidding clergy to pay taxes to lay rulers. Accommodation was finally reached; but when Edward's vassal became Pope Clement V, Winchelsea was suspended (1306-8) until Edward's death. Recalled by Edward II, he was soon at odds again, joining the barons in their struggle with the king. Winchelsea was a capable administrator; he loved power, was jealous of his dignity, and was constantly involved in political and religious quarrels in which he used the power of excommunication.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

WINDISCH, HANS (1881-1935). Biblical scholar. Born in Leipzig, he began his teaching career as a private tutor in his home city. In 1914 he became a professor of biblical literature in Leyden; in 1929 he moved to Kiel, and in 1935 to Halle. He was a leading member of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (History of Religion School, i.e., the use of comparative religious material in the interpretation of Christianity). His publications were either commentaries on books of the NT (e.g., on 2 Corinthians and Hebrews), expositions of parts of the Bible (e.g., The Meaning of the Sermon on the Mount, 1929), or studies of early Christian thought (e.g., Baptism and Sin in Primitive Christianity, 1908; and Philo's piety and its significance for Christianity, 1909).

WINEBRENNER, JOHN (1797-1860). German Reformed pastor. Born in Maryland, he studied at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania (1855-58). He was a pastor in the German Reformed Church from 1820 to 1825 at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. At that time he conducted revivals among the Germans in the surrounding area and was censured for his evangelistic preaching. He withdrew from the German Reformed Church and in 1830 formed the General Eldership of the Church of God, stating his opposition to all creeds, forms, and nonbiblical names. The only creed was to be the Bible, since manmade creeds had led to sectarianism. The only cure for this was the restoration of the primitive apostolic faith and purity. By 1845 three elderships had been founded, and these were brought under the General Eldership of the Church of God in North America, the title still used. Arminian doctrines were held, and the ordinances of baptism, the Lord's Supper, and foot-washing became obligatory. Each local church has a council consisting of the pastor and of elders elected by the congregation. Originally in Maryland and Pennsylvania, the churches are now found elsewhere in the United States.

WINER, JOHANN GEORG BENEDIKT (1789-1858). Protestant NT scholar. Born and educated in Leipzig, he became privatdocent in theology there. He was called to a chair at Erlangen in 1823, but returned to Leipzig as professor of theology (1832-58). He fixed the rules of grammatical interpretation of the NT, especially in his Biblisches Realworterbuch (1820). Of his many works, the most notable is his Grammatik des neutestlichen Sprachidioms (1821). W.F. Moulton* translated and edited the third edition of this work in 1870, and it is still invaluable within its limits, despite more recent advances in understanding Hellenistic Greek.

WINKWORTH, CATHERINE (1829-1878). Translator of hymns. She lived near Manchester, England, until 1862, when she moved to Clifton. She was a pioneer in women's higher education, a founder of Clifton High School, and she prepared the ground for the establishment of the University College at Bristol. In 1853 she first met C.C.J. von Bunsen,* whose Gesang- und Gebetbuch (1833) she drew upon for her translations of German hymns. Over 300 were published in her Lyra Germanica (2 series, 1855-58) and The Chorale Book for England (1863; new ed., 1865), the latter having as music editors W.S. Bennett and O. Goldschmidt. In her biographical Christian Singers of Germany (1869) she included more than 100 translations, some having previously appeared. Among her many fine translations are those from Gerhardt,* Heermann,* Neander,* Nicolai,* Rinckart,* and Scheffler.*

JOHN S. ANDREWS

WINSLOW, EDWARD (1595-1655). American Pilgrim leader. Born at Droitwich, Worcestershire, of prosperous parentage, he received a private education and became associated with John Robinson's* Separatist movement in the Netherlands, where he married Elizabeth Barker in 1618. Winslow sailed with the Mayflower, landing at Plymouth in December 1620. He was employed as an Indian agent and envoy to England on several occasions. He was often Plymouth's assistant governor from 1624 to 1646, and governor in 1633, 1636, and 1644. He helped to found the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Indians in New England" (1649). Archbishop Laud* imprisoned him for four months while he was in England in 1634, for teaching and performing marriages as a layman. After serving under O. Cromwell* in a maritime dispute, he died on the way back to Plymouth in 1655 and was buried at sea. His published narrative of the years 1621-23 are an invaluable source to historians of early Plymouth.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

WINTHROP, JOHN (1588-1649). English lawyer who became governor of Massachusetts. Born in Suffolk, he attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and then studied law at Gray's Inn. Elected governor of the migrating Puritans, he led the exodus of 1630 to Massachusetts where he served as governor many times. His principles, enunciated in A Model of Christian Charity (1630), focused the life of the colony on the covenant of God with His people, patterned after OT Israel, in which corporate obedience to God's law of love was the major condition determining whether God would bless or curse the enterprise. The civil magistrates accordingly attempted to maintain both moral purity and theological conformity, the latter principle leading to the exiling of Anne Hutchinson* and Roger Williams.* Winthrop helped to organize, and was the first president of, the New England Confederation of 1643.

GEORGE MARSDEN

WISEMAN, NICHOLAS PATRICK STEPHEN (1802-1865). English cardinal, first archbishop of Westminster (1850-65), and chiefly responsible for the reestablishment by Pius IX* of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in England (1850). Anglo-Irish by birth, rector of the English College, Rome (1828-40), he began promoting the restoration, based on hopes of Catholic revival and the conversion of England, prompted by news of the Oxford Movement.* He returned to England as president of Oscott College, Birmingham, and coadjutor bishop to the vicar apostolic of the Midlands (1840). In 1847 he undertook a special mission, in the name of the English bishops, to the new Pope Pius IX to urge restoration, which occurred in September 1850. Pius IX named him cardinal and first English Catholic primate. Wiseman's enthusiastic announcement of it (October 1850) awakened popular anti-Catholicism, abetted by Prime Minister Lord John Russell's alarm against "papal aggression." Wiseman promoted Ultramontane* principles and practices, established English branches of religious orders, and organized basic Catholic ministries among the newly immigrant Irish. Among many writings he published a scholarly study on Syriac (1827) and lectures on science and the Bible (1835), founded the Dublin Review (1835), and wrote a popular novel Fabiola (1854).

C.T. MC INTIRE

WISHART, GEORGE (c.1513-1546). Scottish Reformer and martyr. Born into a family with aristocratic connections, he evidently graduated from Aberdeen, having acquired a knowledge of NT Greek which he taught pupils at school in Montrose. Charged with heretical tendencies, he went first to England, then to the Continent, where he became acquainted with the first Helvetic Confession* which he was the first to translate into English. He returned to England about the end of 1542, spent a year teaching at Cambridge, then in 1543 or 1544 went back to Scotland and preached the Gospel, particularly in Angus. He based his exposition on the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed. In Dundee he ministered fearlessly to those sick and dying of the plague, and survived an attempt on his life. The converted priest John Knox* was found thereafter bearing a sword for his protection. Finally seized at Ormiston in East Lothian, he was taken to St. Andrews, and against the will of regent and people, at the instigation of David Cardinal Beaton* he was condemned to death and burnt at the stake.

J.D. DOUGLAS

WITCHCRAFT. The use of natural and/or supernatural powers to coerce or harm others in a way which arouses community concern. The boundaries between witchcraft and magic are indefinable, and both are closely related to prescientific cosmology, in which man is part of a world of spirit. Historically the demise of witchcraft in Europe is recent, and witch beliefs are still potent in Africa and Asia, where they have important social functions in relationships and as an explanation of misfortune. Yet witchcraft persists in the midst of technological and highly literate nations, and as recently as the mid-twentieth century has experienced a revival in which it takes the form of an organized and even institutionalized religion.

Christian attitudes to witchcraft have been shaped by the Bible, Roman law, and the folk customs of Europe. The early Christians believed that membership of Christ conferred immunity from demonic powers and that sin exposed one afresh. Witchcraft was associated with idolatry and a denial of love and truth, so that the sorcerer was the opposite of the saint. Penance was imposed for recourse to witches, and some penalties of Roman law were incorporated into canons. By the sixth century the witch was frequently regarded as a servant of Satan, but early medieval writers were skeptical about many of the alleged powers of witches, like aerial flight, following Augustine's argument that much witchcraft was based on illusion. Canonical sin and civil wrongs were distinguished, and though the medieval penitentials suggest the persistence of pagan witchcraft practices, there was no intellectual foundation for treating the witch as the menace to society. Eastern Churches developed no persecuting streak, but it is difficult to isolate the reasons for the European witch-craze.

The threat of dualist heresy, the stresses generated by Crusades, and development of the theology of Satan removed earlier ambiguities and skepticism and provided the intellectual basis for witch beliefs which were to lead to tragic persecutions in the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries. Alexander IV (1258) and John XXII (1320) permitted the Inquisition* to deal with witchcraft if it was associated with heresy. The influential Malleus Maleficarum (1487) further systematized witch beliefs and emphasized the need to rid society of witches. Though humanists and Reformers rejected some attributes of the medieval witch, they offered no challenge to the basic assumptions underlying witchcraft beliefs. G. Bruno* (1548-1600) showed the Renaissance fascination with the occult, and classical and biblical references to witchcraft were regarded as authoritative by Reformers.

Yet more is involved than the imposition of witch beliefs by a clerical elite. There is considerable evidence for persistent folk-beliefs, and witch-crazes which reached their peak between 1580 and 1650 also owe something to disease, deviant sexual behavior, personal and mass hysteria, blasphemous actions, hallucinogenic drugs, deceit, the search for social scapegoats, and the effect of village rivalries which were all readily interpreted in the framework of witch beliefs, which developed a momentum of their own. Torture undoubtedly led to gross exaggerations and confessions which the inquisitors like B. Carpzov (1595-1666) wanted to hear, but in England, where there was no judicial torture for witchcraft, many of the unpleasant details of continental trials still emerged. Fears of witches were also heightened by religious conflicts, social tensions, and suspicions of any strangers or extraordinary behavior. J. Weyer's (1516-68) attempts to explain that witches were only harmless old women (De praestigiis daemonum, 1563) was, for contemporaries, convincingly refuted by J. Bodin (1529-96) in Démonomanie des sorciers (1580).

Serious questions have recently been raised against the exclusively Protestant origins of witch beliefs in England, where the Essex trials were alleged to have close links with Puritan ideas about witchcraft imported from Europe. Translations of L. Daneau (1530-95) and L. Lavater (1527-86) and W. Perkins* (Discourse on the damned art of witchcraft, 1608) undoubtedly had some influence on the literate, but they did not erect the full-blown demonology of Europe, and magistrates were more influenced by legal precedents in sentencing than by theological considerations. Except for a brief period during the Civil War (1645-47) when M. Hopkins hunted out witches remorselessly, English witch accusations were rarely official in origin. Most Essex trials stemmed from tensions of village life, breakdown of mutual help for the needy, and the end of the ritual protections against witchcraft which had been provided by the Medieval Church. Recourse to law was provided by acts of 1563 and 1604, providing an important channel for the release of tensions over grievances and misfortune, until men began to apply other explanations.

Witchcraft beliefs retained considerable power in the latter part of the seventeenth century, as the Swedish trials (1668-77) and the Salem craze (1692) showed. In tolerant Holland, B. Bekker (1634-98) was disgraced for his denial of Satan in Betoorverde Weereld (1691), and another critic of witchcraft beliefs in Germany, C. Thomasius (1655-1728) was careful to assert his belief in both witches and a devil, but attacked witch trials (1701). Many great names were still to be found supporting the intellectual superstructure of witch beliefs.

The reasons for the decline of witch beliefs in Europe during the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries are obscure. More was involved than declining religious fanaticism and expanding rationality, for anthropological studies of modern witchcraft suggest that the replacement of witch beliefs is a long and complex process. A new cosmology, deepened insight into the theology of creation, decline in angelology and demonology, rejection of torture and witch hunts as a satisfactory legal procedure, growing religious skepticism—all contributed. Recourse to "cunning" men and women was still common, but witchcraft was no longer used as an overall explanation for the mysterious and misfortune, even though technology was not advanced enough to make magic superfluous. There were important regional differences in the process. Changes in legal procedure (abolition of the charge of sorcellerie sabbatique in 1672) were significant in France, while in England the emergence of a more individualistic social morality and public acceptance of responsibility for poor relief removed some of the tensions which inspired witchcraft accusations. In England there was also a growing reluctance to convict. The last trial was held in 1717 and the witchcraft laws were repealed in 1736, though in England and elsewhere there were extralegal acts of violence against suspected witches as late as the nineteenth century.

Witchcraft beliefs survived in small, esoteric groups in Europe, but they are still a serious practical problem in African churches where Christians remain close to the old cosmology. Between 1956 and 1964, Chikanga exercised enormous influence in Central and East Africa, and African Zionist churches show the power of the old beliefs.

WITHERSPOON, JOHN (1723-1794). President of Princeton University. Born at Gifford, East Lothian, a lineal descendant of John Knox, he graduated at Edinburgh in arts and divinity and was successively minister of the parishes of Beith (1745) and Paisley (1757). His Ecclesiastical Characteristics (1753) and Serious Apology (1764) attacked abuses and satirized the Moderates* as "paganized Christian divines." After refusing calls to Dublin and Rotterdam and the presidency of Princeton, he accepted the latter post (1768) and held it for twenty-five years. He improved finances, natural sciences, and languages, and himself lectured in divinity, moral philosophy, and eloquence. In American Presbyterianism he worked for union with Congregationalists and Dutch Reformed, favored a general assembly, and influenced Scots and Irish Presbyterians to support the Whigs. A member of several political assemblies and the Continental Congress (1776-79; 1780-83), he encouraged the Declaration of Independence and was the only cleric and educator to sign it. C.G. THORNE, JR.

WITTENBERG, CONCORD OF (1536). An agreement reached by Lutheran and Zwinglian theologians on the disputed doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Following a preliminary conference between Bucer* and Melanchthon* at Cassel in 1534, a large group of theologians including Luther gathered at Wittenberg. A doctrinal statement drawn up by Melanchthon, setting forth an essentially Lutheran doctrine (though not insisting on ubiquity), was accepted. Bucer admitted Luther's phrases, even the crucial statement proposed by Bugenhagen,* pastor of Wittenberg, that the body and blood are truly offered to the "unworthy," who receive it to their condemnation (understanding "unworthy," however, not as "unbelievers," as did Luther, but as "careless believers"). The reunion soon collapsed, largely through the refusal of the Swiss Zwinglians to accept the Concord. The S German pastors, however, used it as a bridge to cross over into Lutheranism. J.G.G. NORMAN

WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS. A German Deist tract written by H.S. Reimarus,* after whose death the manuscript was given to G.E. Lessing* who published portions of it between 1774 and 1778 as "Fragments by an Anonymous Writer." It rejected the validity of biblical revelation and explained the origins of Christianity from a purely naturalistic standpoint. Jesus was merely a fervent mystic whose dream of a kingdom on earth was shattered on the cross. The apostles invented the fable of his resurrection to conceal his defeat.

WOLSEY, THOMAS (c.1475-1530). English cardinal. He was born at Ipswich and educated at Oxford. He became a fellow of Magdalen College in 1497 and was ordained priest in 1498. In 1503 he became chaplain to the governor of Calais and so began his public career. He served both Henry VII and Henry VIII as chaplain. Royal service speedily led to ecclesiastical preferment. Among the many rewards he received, in 1514 he was made bishop of Lincoln and archbishop of York. In the following years he added further bishoprics and other important appointments. From all of these he gained enormous profit. The year 1515 marked the zenith of his power, when he was made cardinal by the pope and lord chancellor by the king. When in 1518 he was made papal legate, he became supreme in both church and state under the king.

He was thoroughly an ecclesiastic, although he was immersed continuously in affairs of state. He was trained in Scholastic theology, although he was no theologian. He was not purely a secular figure and frequently said Mass. Although he was not zealous in the pursuit of heresy, he was an orthodox Catholic in his outlook. His religion was "probably highly conventional, but not purely formal."

Throughout his career the two authorities whom he served—pope and king—were in harmony. When that harmony was broken by the king's "divorce," Wolsey's career was shattered. His great house, Hampton Court, his college at Oxford, and most of his appointments and wealth were confiscated in 1530. In the days after his fall he made an attempt to fulfill his duties as archbishop of York for the first time. None of this saved him, and only his death on the way to London cheated the royal executioner. He is well described as "not creative or reflective," but an "uncomplicated activist" who was "a magnificent if extravagant manipulator of what was available."

NOEL S. POLLARD

WOMEN IN THE CHURCH, PLACE OF. Although Christ was not married and none of the Twelve was a woman, women played a decisive role in His ministry, which was often directed to the needs of the female sex (cf. Matt. 9:20ff.; Mark 7:25ff.; Luke 10:38; John 4:7ff.). At the crucifixion "many women were there, watching from a distance. They had followed Jesus from Galilee to care for his needs" (Matt. 27:55). Mary Magdalene and the "other Mary" were first at the tomb on Easter morning. The Book of Acts calls special attention to the women who were in the upper room after the Ascension (Acts 1:14). Both men and women were baptized in the early church (Acts 8:12). Much attention was given to the important women who were attracted to the faith in this period of the church (Acts 13:50; 17:4,12).

Paul specifically excludes women from the official ministry of the Christian community, and requires that they neither practice the tongues gift in corporate worship or exercise places of leadership in the church (1 Cor. 14:26-36; 1 Tim. 2:8-15; 5:1-16). Perhaps more important is the fact of service rendered by women and the strong emphasis upon their full participation in the reality of the church as the body of Christ. In the former case, the important role of Priscilla and Aquila should be noted (cf. Acts 18:2,18,26; Rom. 16:3; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Tim. 4:19). In the extended list of believers to be greeted in the church at Rome, a large number were women (cf. Rom. 16:1-16). The specific mention of Phoebe as a "deaconess of the church at Cenchreae" clearly implies a recognized ministry of service if not of leadership. The early church never failed to note the purpose of the Incarnation as the Redeemer coming to "serve," not to be served (Mark 10:45). To speak of a "deaconess" ("one who waits on tables") is to pay the highest tribute to the role of women in the early church. Her full participation in the community is guaranteed also by the fact that sexual distinctions disappear in the body of Christ, and the marriage relationship derives its significance from the relationship of Christ and the church (Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11; Eph. 5:21-33).

Specific mention should be made of the practice in the apostolic age of widows in the church. The ministerial class of deacons probably had its origin in the issue surrounding the neglect of the Greek-speaking (Hellenist) Jewish widows. The apostolic church seems to have assumed material responsibility for widows, but Paul warns of the abuses and dangers of this practice (1 Tim. 5:1-15; Acts 6:1-7).

Probably the two most distinguishing features of female relationships in the church in the post-apostolic age are Syneisaktism and monasticism.* Syneisaktism (Gr. suneisaktoi; Lat. subintroductae) was a form of spiritual marriage appearing very early. The female partners were known as agapētae from the Greek term for "love" or "beloved." Some scholars have interpreted Paul's statement in 1 Corinthians 7:36-38 as referring to a spiritual marriage which under the stress of the sexual instinct has made legal marriage necessary; the former vow of spiritual marriage is then appropriately set aside. Syneisaktism grew out of the ascetic ideals popularized primarily in the East, and the strong emphasis in ecclesiastical circles upon the life of brotherly love. Evidence for this practice appears in the Shepherd of Hermas, and in the churches at Antioch under Paul of Samosata* and Constantinople under John Chrysostom.* At a later time, Irish monasticism was characterized by mixed communes which often led to charges of sexual abuses. A number of early church synods and councils condemned the practice, especially Nicea* (325), as well as church leaders such as Chrysostom and Cyprian.*

With the development of binding clerical celibacy* in the Middle Ages, it became customary for clergymen to have dwelling with them housekeepers whose relationship was functional as well as spiritual, if not sexual. From the same ascetic ideals developed a form of Christian monasticism among women. Macrina* is credited with being the founder of women's conventual life, especially in the Eastern Church. Paula,* one of Jerome's converts, took up the monastic calling and assisted Jerome throughout his life with his scholarly pursuits. Francis of Assisi* was equally successful in winning converts from the female section of the church, and established the Poor Clares.*

During the period of the Avignon papacy, Catherine of Siena* exercised a great influence in returning the papacy to Rome; in her is seen a kindred movement to monasticism—mysticism.* Noted mystics are Gertrude the Great,* Mechthild of Hackborn (d.1310), Mechthild of Magdeburg,* Bridget of Sweden.* The women of the Middle Ages always drew inspiration from the Virgin Mary, and stimulated the development of Mariology.* With the appearance of the Mendicant Orders of the thirteenth century, women began to play a more decisive role in education and social service, as did the monastic movement generally. Ordination and administration of the sacraments were never open to women throughout the postapostolic and medieval period.

With the Protestant Reformation came a general decline in the monastic movement, and Christian marriage took on a more positive appearance. Luther played matchmaker in arranging marriages between monks and nuns who were leaving convents and monasteries. Even within the Catholic Church, women such as Teresa of Avila* helped to bring about reform. The Sisters (or Daughters) of Charity carried on a commendable work among the poor and sick. Nevertheless women still played minor roles so far as ecclesiastical life was concerned, and general education of women, except in rare cases, did not begin until the nineteenth century.

During the second decade of the following century, Congregationalists and Baptists, particularly in England, were the first to admit women into the official ministry, as in the case of Agnes Maude Royden (originally an Anglican). But such women as Selina, countess of Huntingdon,* a patroness of evangelicalism, are also important. The Salvation Army* was a notable pioneer in giving opportunities for women to minister, and from the second half of the nineteenth century the role of missionary was open to women (in some cases the missionary movement was almost exclusively their responsibility). From 1950 most of the major denominations, apart from Roman Catholics and Orthodox, allowed women to be ordained, though their position in the Anglican Communion* is still to be precisely determined. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA approved the ordination of women in 1977.

In 1780 Robert Raikes* secured the services of four women to teach the catechism to children on Sunday. From these beginnings, the Sunday school* has become largely the responsibility of women in the church at almost every level. Not a few denominations, particularly in America, owe their origins to the leadership of women (see, for example, ANN LEE, MARY BAKER EDDY, and AIMEE SEMPLE MCPHERSON).

WOODSWORTH, JAMES (d.1917). Canadian Methodist clergyman. He was born in Toronto and was ordained to the Methodist ministry in 1864. The same year he was sent to the Portage la Prairie circuit in the West, where he served for the rest of his life. For many years he was superintendent of Northwest missions for the Methodist Church. Memories of his days in W Canada are recorded in the book, Thirty Years in the Canadian North-West (1917).

WOOLLEY, SIR CHARLES LEONARD (1880-1960). Archaeologist and author. His early life was spent in poor surroundings in Bethnal Green, London, and he was dependent on scholarships for education at St. John's School, Leatherhead, and at New College, Oxford, where he studied theology. His interest rapidly turned to biblical archaeology; for over forty years he was to excavate ancient sites, remaining a free lance throughout, although he received support from the British Museum and other institutions. In 1907 Woolley excavated in Nubia, and in 1914 (with T.E. Lawrence) he studied the ancient routes between Egypt and Palestine. He was taken prisoner (1916-18) by the Turks, and when released worked on the ancient Sumerian civilization. He is best known for his excavations in Ur of the Chaldees (1922-34), where he discovered the royal cemetery. Diggings at Atchana in the Hatay followed (1937-39; 1946-49). He had a remarkable flair for knowing where to dig.

WOOLMAN, JOHN (1720-1772). American Quaker advocate of the abolition of slavery. Born in Northampton, New Jersey, he spent his youth on a farm. He always lived by the labor of his hands, principally as a tailor. Deeply pious, he became a recorded minister of the Society of Friends* in 1743 and traveled throughout the Thirteen Colonies. His Journal reveals a simple character lacking worldly or selfish motives, and conspicuous for an intense mystical piety. He preached against conscription and taxes for military supplies, Negro slavery, and ill-treatment of the Indians. His testimony ended in 1776 the practice by Quakers of the Philadelphia yearly meeting of owning slaves. Woolman died of smallpox on a visit to English Friends, and was buried at York. His main writings, Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754) and his Journal (1774), greatly influenced nineteenth-century abolitionists.

WOOLSTON, THOMAS (1669-1733). English Deist. Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, he wrote Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour (1727-29), a blunt attack on the miracles of Christ in which Woolston claimed that they were allegories. He was a keen student of Origen* and a lover of allegorizing. As a result of publishing his theory he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100. He died in prison, unable to pay the fine. There is reason to believe that Woolston may have been mentally unbalanced.

WORDSWORTH, CHRISTOPHER (1807-1885). Bishop of Lincoln. Son of a master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and a nephew of the poet, he had a brilliant career in classics and mathematics at Cambridge. He was headmaster of Harrow from 1836 to 1844, when he became canon of Westminster. He was Hulsean Lecturer in 1848-49. He then took a country living until 1869, when he was consecrated bishop of Lincoln. His many ecclesiastical works include S. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome (1853), a reply to Bunsen; A Commentary on the Whole Bible (1856-70); and Church History to A.D. 451 (1881-83). In his Holy Year (1862) he provided hymns for every phase of every season. Some are still popular, eg., "Gracious Spirit, Holy Ghost"; "See the Conqueror mounts in triumph"; and "O Lord of heaven and earth and sea." A conservative High Churchman, he was involved in controversy with the Wesleyans in 1873.

JOHN S. ANDREWS

WORDSWORTH, JOHN (1843-1911). Bishop of Salisbury. Elder son of Christopher Wordsworth,* he first attained distinction as a Latin scholar. From 1878 he worked on a critical edition of the Vulgate text of the NT, amassing and collating a vast amount of manuscript material. He gave the Bampton Lectures of 1881 on comparative religion, entitled The One Religion, and became the first Oriel professor of the interpretation of Scripture in 1883. Made bishop of Salisbury in 1885, he was the close friend and adviser of Archbishop E.W. Benson.* He hoped for church reunion on the basis of episcopacy, maintained relations with Eastern Churches and especially studied the Swedish Church. His writings include The Ministry of Grace (1901), a history of Christian ministry.

WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. The oldest international Protestant confessional body, the Alliance grew out of the cooperation engendered by the revivals and missionary movements of the nineteenth century. Professors J. McCosh of Princeton College and W.G. Blaikie of Edinburgh first mooted the possibility. Steps toward a meeting were initiated at the New York meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and after extensive correspondence a meeting was held at the English Presbyterian College, London, in July 1875. The Alliance was the result. Its full title was "Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the world holding the Presbyterian system." Membership was open to any church organized on Presbyterian principles, which holds the supreme authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in matters of faith and morals and whose creed is in harmony with the consensus of the Reformed Churches.

The Alliance has a confederate structure and since the first general council of 1877 has met regularly. There have been occasional constitutional changes like those of 1954, but the Alliance's role remains essentially consultative and advisory. An executive committee meets annually, and regional groupings of varying vitality exist in every part of the world. The Alliance has made major contributions to cooperation and understanding between Reformed Churches, and its significance has not been lessened by the growth of the World Council of Churches.* In addition to relief work, mutual theological consultation, and joint activities like editing Calvin's writings, the Alliance has played an invaluable role in dialogue with Rome since Vatican II. At the Nairobi General Council (1970), the Alliance merged with the International Congregational Council* and since 1963 has held conversations with Lutheran representatives in both Europe and North America. The Lüneburg Concord of September 1971 was a vital step in removing historic divisions between the two families and will have far-reaching ecumenical implications if taken seriously by member churches. The Alliance publishes a periodical called The Reformed World.

WORLD CONGRESS ON EVANGELISM. This major global gathering devoted to fulfilling Christ's great commission to evangelize the earth was held in 1966 in West Berlin. Major ecumenical assemblies and conferences had been sponsored by the World Council of Churches* to discuss church unity, faith and order, and church and society concerns. The World Congress on Evangelism was a para-ecumenical effort inspired by the massive crusades of evangelist Billy Graham,* who served as honorary chairman. It was sponsored as a tenth anniversary project by the evangelical Protestant magazine Christianity Today whose founding editor, Carl F.H. Henry, was Congress chairman.

The congress drew participants dedicated to evangelism in more than 100 countries, most being nationals carrying evangelistic tasks in ecumenically aligned and independent denominations. Their identification within seventy-six church bodies inside and outside the conciliar movement constituted the Berlin Congress in some ways more ecumenical in scope than the World Council. Participants went back historically as far as the Mar Thoma Church* in India. Others came from young churches in Africa and Asia; youngest of all was the Auca church in Latin America sprung from the witness of five American missionary martyrs. The congress achieved a significant emphasis on evangelistic priorities and a correlation of theological and evangelistic concerns in a time when neo-Protestant reconstruction of both the doctrine and task of the church was displacing historic Christian commitments.

As the church moved into the last third of the twentieth century, Christianity represented only 28 percent of the world population and without new evangelistic vitality was doomed to become a diminishing remnant. Evangelistic momentum was slackened by Free World materialism and Communist-sphere atheism, by mass media emphasis on this-worldly concerns, and by the institutional church's preoccupation with sociopolitical issues.

The Berlin Congress achieved a significant correlation of theological and evangelistic concerns. Churchmen singled out as critically important target areas for contemporary engagement: the expanding great cities, the 20 million college and university students, the mass media, involvement of the laity, the world of computer technology, and the social dimensions of human life. Since the world population is expected to double by the year 2000, the importance of moving gospel witness into the space age and mass media age was evident. It was also noted that in the so-called silent world of 800 million illiterates, which revolutionary political forces are exploiting, evangelical Christianity has 40,000 Bible-teaching missionaries already familiar with the languages of people with an illiteracy problem.

The World Congress has stimulated subsequent regional and national conferences, including East Africa (Nairobi, 1968), Asia-South Pacific (Singapore, 1968), Latin America (1968), Eastern Europe (Novi Sad, Yugoslavia, 1969), United States (Minneapolis, 1969), Canada (Ottawa, 1970), and Western Europe (Amsterdam, 1971). In the USA, Key '73 signaled an attempt to coordinate evangelical energies at city and community levels in simultaneous and cooperative evangelism.

Asian and African interest in evangelism coincides with ecumenical missionary retrenchment abroad. Two-thirds of the world population now lives in Asia, where Christians who represent only 3 percent of the population have opened a coordinating office for Asian evangelism. A quarter of the human race, in mainland China, is sealed off from evangelism.

CARL F.H. HENRY

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Founded in 1948, this is the main international agency of cooperation between the Christian churches. Its membership includes virtually all major autonomous Christian churches from both East and West, except the Roman Catholic Church and the most confessionally minded or separatist of evangelical bodies. Progressive steps in the formation and development of the WCC are symptomatic of the march of the ecumenical movement* itself in this century.

The point of origin is usually taken to be the Edinburgh (Missionary) Conference* in 1910. This was not specifically concerned with matters of Faith and Order, but with the cooperation of societies conducting missions to non-Christian peoples. The conference, however, led some to a vision of a united church, and this necessitated the facing of differences of belief through further forms of conference. Within weeks, movements were started which led to the formation of Faith and Order. World War I caused delay, and the first conference met at Lausanne* in 1927. The second was at Edinburgh* in 1937, from which came a proposal (which was accepted) made by the Life and Work Movement to form a "World Council of Churches."

Life and Work was a similar international agency, but its concern was the social program and political responsibilities of the churches. The stimulus came from Christian efforts toward peace in the decade 1910-20 (marked particularly by the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the churches, and a conference it held on the eve of World War I). In 1919 a committee for Life and Work took on an existence independent of the World Alliance, and they convened a conference at Geneva in 1920 (which spent some energies on questions of war guilt). From there the movement went to its first Life and Work conference proper at Stockholm* in 1925; in the process the committee quoted approvingly the dictum "Doctrine Divides, but Service Unites."

At the second conference at Oxford* in 1937, proposals were received for the formation of a WCC, and were passed on with approval to the Faith and Order conference at Edinburgh that year. When both conferences had approved, a joint committee was appointed to bring the WCC into existence. In 1938 at Utrecht a provisional constitution was agreed, and a provisional committee of the "World Council of Churches in process of formation" set up, with headquarters at Geneva. World War II prevented the inaugural assembly from happening until 1948, when at Amsterdam* the delegates of 147 churches from 44 countries resolved that the formation of the WCC was now completed. The WCC has since held assemblies at Evanston* (Illinois) in 1954, New Delhi* in 1961, and Uppsala* in 1968, while its own departments, such as Faith and Order, continue their own conferences under the direction of the WCC itself and of its central committee.

The third strand of ecumenical work deriving most directly from the 1910 Edinburgh conference was the International Missionary Council.* This was formed in 1921 and was kept in touch with the formative stages of the WCC, without wishing to integrate with it, but it finally joined the WCC at New Delhi in 1961.

The basis of WCC membership, as amended at New Delhi, is: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God the Saviour according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit."

National councils of churches (which used to be the delegating bodies to the International Missionary Council) do not send delegates to the WCC themselves, but are recognized by the WCC as "Associated Councils." The delegates are from member churches, and at Uppsala in 1968 there were 704 delegates from 235 member churches. Observers were also admitted at Uppsala, and the Roman Catholic Church, which until then had had no form of presence at all, participated in this way.

The year 1968 saw also a swing from the "Faith and Order" emphasis of the first two decades to a stronger "Life and Work" emphasis (often of a radical sort). A new leadership was also starting to emerge, and the long ecumenical careers of J.R. Mott,* J.H. Oldham,* and many others belonged to history. Actual progress toward union schemes was either being consummated or was in the doldrums. The needs of a torn world and the possibilities of a reformed Roman Catholicism predominate in the current thinking.

WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP. This body was set up in 1951 at Woudschoten, Holland, from members of the former British-based World's Evangelical Alliance, founded in 1846 (see EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE). The European former members of the WEA did not join the new body until 1967. Membership of the WEF is at present open to national evangelical fellowships which represent a substantial proportion of the conservative evangelical community in their countries, though this is under review. Members must subscribe to a basis of faith similar to that of a number of other conservative evangelical organizations. In 1967 a WEF office was set up in Lausanne, but administration has since been transferred to London, in the care of the Evangelical Alliance there. The WEF has three associated programs: the theological assistance program; international Christian assistance, administered through Britain's Evangelical Alliance Relief Fund; and evangelistic and Bible ministries. WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION. Uniting forty autonomous Christian student groups, the Federation was founded in Sweden in 1895. Student leaders from Scandinavia, Europe, Great Britain, the United States, and nations receiving missionaries met under the leadership of John R. Mott,* then student secretary of the International Committee of the YMCA. For Mott and many others this was the culmination of a movement which had been drawing together such organizations for some years. Mott and others had been active in missionary-recruitment conferences previously, and growing enthusiasm in these endeavors was channeled in 1888 into a permanent organization, the Student Volunteer Movement,* which adopted as its motto "The evangelization of the world in this generation." The Federation reflected this evangelistic thrust in its stated purpose, "to lead students to accept the Christian faith in God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—according to the Scriptures, and to live together as true disciples of Jesus Christ." It is active today in organizing international conferences and projects in many areas, and in publishing. KEITH J. HARDMAN

WORMS, COLLOQUY OF (1540-41). The adjourned Colloquy of Hagenau* met in Worms in November 1540, although the talks did not get under way before January 1541. Johann Eck* was the spokesman for the Roman Catholics; Philip Melanchthon* for the Protestants. Agreement was reached on the doctrine of original sin. Because of the impending diet at Ratisbon,* however, the discussions were broken off, to be resumed there.

WORMS, DIET OF (1521). Charles V,* in accepting his election as emperor of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, had pledged himself to call a diet as soon as possible. Moreover the Golden Bull of 1356 made a diet mandatory.

A pestilence in Nuremberg made it necessary to hold the diet elsewhere, and Charles chose Worms. In January the several estates of the empire started gathering in that city. The diet was confronted with the "Gravamina of the German Nation," the problem of what to do about Martin Luther,* and the problem of civic administration because of the many territories outside of the Holy Roman Empire held by Charles.

On 28 November 1520 Charles commanded Elector Frederick the Wise* of Saxony to bring Luther with him to the diet. Negotiations carried on by the papal legate caused Charles to rescind this request, and the causa Lutheri became a political question. Finally on 2 March, the emperor gave his consent to Luther's summons and promised safe conduct. Luther was required to appear because of his "teachings and books." The summons was handed on 26 March by Kaspar Sturm. Luther left Wittenberg on 2 April and arrived in Worms on the 16th. On 17 April he appeared before the diet and was asked whether the books present were his and whether he still subscribed to their contents. Luther's request (in his own words) "for time to think, in order to satisfactorily answer the question without violence to the divine Word and danger to my soul" was granted, and he was given one day for deliberation. On the 18th he answered (in part): "Unless I am convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures or by clear reason (for I do not trust either in the pope or in councils alone, since it is well known that they have often erred and contradicted themselves), I am bound by the Scriptures I have quoted, and my conscience is captive to the Word of God. I cannot and will not retract anything, since it is neither safe nor right to go against conscience. I cannot do otherwise, here I stand, may God help me, Amen." At least, so tradition has the last sentence.

On the 19th Charles notified the estates that he would defend the ancient faith against Luther. On the 24th Luther met with the archbishop of Trier and seven other princes or churchmen. At this meeting Luther continued to insist on the authority of Holy Scripture. The next day further attempts were made to deter him from his stand. Luther left Worms on the 26 April for his return trip to Wittenberg. En route he was kidnapped and taken to the Wartburg Castle. The Edict of Worms, dated 8 May 1521, declared Luther an "outlaw," together with his adherents. Other matters occupied the attention of the diet, especially the cause of justice (Kammergericht), but these have largely been forgotten because of Luther's appearance before the diet.

CARL S. MEYER

WORSHIP, EARLY CHURCH. The church which meets us in the pages of the NT is a worshiping community of believing men and women. This is clear from the descriptions in the Acts of the Apostles (1:14; 2:42,46; 4:31; 5:12,42; 13:1-3; 20:7-12) and from the statements of Paul in his letters (notably 1 Cor. 10-14). By an application of the methods of form-criticism* to the NT epistles it is possible to gain a further access to the worshiping life of the Christian communities as liturgical passages (containing putative hymns, creeds, and confessions of faith) are exposed to view, and these sections are tentatively placed in a Sitz im Leben of the corporate life of the early Christians as they engaged in the worship of God.

From these data it is a reasonable deduction to conclude that, while Christian worship arose directly out of the matrix of the Jewish traditions in the Temple and synagogue, some distinctively new elements were added from the beginning. Many of the Jewish forms (such as the blessing of God as Creator and sustainer of life, the so-called berakah) were taken over and can be seen clearly in NT statements which open with "Blessed be God" (2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3 KJV), and in responses such as the familiar "Amen" (Cor. 14:16) are found. But these forms were filled with a new content which belongs to the new situation in the history of God's saving purposes for the world. Christians of the apostolic era were conscious of living in days of eschatological fulfillment which flowed from the Incarnation and redeeming achievement of Jesus of Nazareth in whom they recognized Israel's Messiah and the world's Savior. It was this conviction which stamped itself on their worship in every aspect and gave it a distinctiveness which is unique.

Tokens of that distinctively Christian pattern may be set down. Standing high in the list of features which marked out Christian worship from its antecedents in the OT and rabbinic Judaism and from the contemporary world of Greco-Roman religion is the christological reality of the risen Jesus whose promise to be with His people who assembled in His name (Matt. 18:20) was claimed and known. While there is a verbal parallel to this thought of worshipers meeting together in accord and being promised the divine presence (Pirqe Aboth 3:6 in the Mishnah, based on Mal. 3:16), the personal presence of the living Lord speaks of a dimension which is quite new. Several parts of what we may judge to be the structure of early Christian assemblies are explained only on the basis of Christ's coming to meet His people.

(1) Prayers were offered in His name (Acts 4:24; Eph. 5:20; Heb. 13:15) and hymns sung in His honor. The great christological declarations of the epistles (Phil. 2:6-11; Col. 1:15-20; 1 Tim. 3:16) most probably had their origin in gatherings for worship since they retain many of the poetic and hieratic features which enable us to classify them as hymnic in form and strophic in arrangement. Independent evidence from Pliny from a post-NT decade confirms this view of hymns offered to the cosmic Christ who as risen and exalted is now world Ruler. Ignatius appeals for church unity on the ground that a worship service is like a choir which sings hymns to Jesus Christ (Ephesians 4); and Tertullian alludes to the passage from Pliny in his description of Christian worship.

(2) The characteristic Christian liturgical act is the solemn meal of bread and wine which are taken "in remembrance of" Jesus Christ. Scholarly discussion has reached no consensus as to the historical origin of this meal, whose rubric was taken from the last supper which Jesus held with His disciples before His death. Both the setting of the last meal and the precise transition by which the "last supper" became the "Lord's Supper" are subjects of debate. The simplest view is that Jesus' meal was set in the framework of the Jewish Passover meal, and that the followers of Jesus continued to observe a breaking-of-bread service in thanksgiving for what Jesus had accomplished as the counterpart of the Paschal sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7,8) and the new life which they had come to share as the Israel of the new covenant. By the eschatological significance thus given to historical events, the Christian Communion* was practiced neither as a cult observance of a dead leader nor as a Christianized version of a Hellenistic mystery-religion, but it was a sacramental "representation" of Jesus Christ, once crucified now alive, who came to greet His church and to extend His living presence to them. Only thus can we understand Paul's teaching in 1 Corinthians 10:16; and fit the invocation Maranatha, "Come, O Lord!" (1 Cor. 16:22) into a meaningful pattern. See Didache 10 for a eucharistic setting which places in central position an invitation to the risen Lord to come to His people.

The history of the origin of the Lord's Day may be seen in this light. The shift from the Jewish holy day (Sabbath*) to the "eighth day" (Barnabas 15:8,9) of the new creation was made in recognition that Jesus "rose from the dead" and appeared to His own at a meal (so Luke 24; Acts 10:41). The thesis that the Lord's day was hailed as the first day of the week in remembrance of the appearance of the risen Lord in the context of the holy Supper is ably maintained by W. Rordorf, Sunday (ET 1968).

(3) It is not otherwise with the practice of baptism.* Again there are antecedent practices within Judaism,* both mainline and sectarian, which attest the influence of rites of washing as preparatory for a new spiritual experience. But the most decisive fact to leave its impress on Christian baptism was Jesus' use of the term to prepare for His impending death and vindication (Luke 12:50; 13:32,33). In Pauline teaching the roles of death-baptism are exchanged, so that whereas Jesus saw His death as a baptism, Paul describes the Christian's baptism as a death to sin (Rom. 6:4ff.; Col. 2:12). In both cases baptism was seen as an event which lacks meaning unless Christ is risen. It is not surprising therefore that baptism as initiation into the body of Christ by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:12,13) became a badge of Christian profession under the image of a "seal" (cf. Abercius's inscription, c. A.D. 182).

Attempts to find traces of a "church order" in the NT are not conspicuously successful, though parts of Ephesians and 1 John have been appealed to. The latter is supposed to contain allusions to confirmation and a confessional system. The early church is known, in its canonical literature, more for its spontaneity, improvised forms of worship (as in 1 Cor. 14:26f.), vivid awareness of the Spirit in His charismatic gifts (1 Cor. 12:4ff.; 14:1ff.; Rom. 12:6ff.) and rudimentary ministerial offices (Phil. 1:1; Eph. 4:11f.; 1 Tim. 3:1ff.; 5:17ff.; Heb. 13:17). Nothing resembling the Ignatian bishop's authority (see Ignatius, Smyrnaeans 8) is found, and there is no suggestion that worship is to be conducted only by a clerical elite. Signs of development in the direction of a standardizing of worship, both in structure and personnel, are seen in the *Didache (c. A.D. 100) and 1 Clement (A.D. 96) as well as Ignatius; and with these changes from spontaneous "congregationalism" of the earlier letters of Paul to a more ordered pattern with the use of rubrics for hymns and Scripture readings (in the later Pauline books) the ground is prepared for a decisive step toward a fixed form of worship in which the sacraments* play a vital role, church officers exercise full authority, and the Sunday* worship follows a set pattern (so, in Justin, A.D. 150).

WORSHIP OF GOD, DIRECTORY FOR THE PUBLIC. Prepared by the Westminster Assembly* of Divines, this was adopted by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland and the English Parliament in 1645 as a replacement for the Church of England's *Book of Common Prayer. Its purpose, as its title indicates, was to provide direction, rather than to lay down a liturgy that was to be followed exactly. The preface points out that the obligatory use of the Anglican Prayer Book had proven to be a detriment rather than a help to true worship, as it had insisted upon read prayers, had curtailed preaching, and had generally made worship a mechanical act. Therefore the Directory had been prepared in order to guide ministers in the conduct of services of worship, but not to provide a set form, since different circumstances might call for different orders and different actions. The principal interest of the authors was the stimulation of the spontaneous worship of God and the edification of the people. This work has formed the basis of most English-language orders of Presbyterian service drawn up since its publication.

WREN, CHRISTOPHER (1632-1723). Architect. Son of a clergyman and educated at Westminster School, he went up to Wadham College, Oxford, in 1650, where there was a scientific club (later the Royal Society*). He became a fellow of All Souls, where he developed some of his scientific interests. In 1657 he became professor of astronomy at Gresham College, London, and in 1661, Savillian professor of astronomy at Oxford. He held the latter post until 1673, but well before this date his major interest had moved from natural philosophy to architecture. In the 1660s he designed the new chapel at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford. His fame, however, is associated primarily with the City of London. After the Great Fire of 1666 he laid before Charles II plans for the restoration of the city. Soon afterward he became "surveyor general of the royal works." He designed St. Paul's Cathedral and some fifty-two churches and other important buildings in London. He died at the great age of ninety-one and was buried under the south aisle of the choir of St. Paul's.

PETER TOON

WULFSTAN (c.1010-1095). Bishop of Worcester. Ordained before 1038, he held various monastic offices in Worcester before his consecration in 1062—the only bishop, it was said, who obtained his see on spiritual grounds. Although he was a friend of King Harold—who said that he would go thirty miles out of his way to talk with him—he submitted to William at the Norman Conquest, and was the only Saxon bishop not replaced by a Norman. The invaders were appalled at the depths to which the English Church had sunk; Wulfstan was retained because of what William of Malmesbury calls his "simple goodness." With Archbishop Lanfranc* of Canterbury he strove against the slave trade till the practice was abandoned. Wulfstan was canonized by Innocent III in 1203.

WÜRTTEMBERG CONFESSION (1552). This document was one of a number of Interims prepared by Protestant theologians after the opening of the Council of Trent* as bases for ecumenical debate with the Roman ecclesiastics. Following on the Augsburg Confession* of 1548, Melanchthon's Leipzig Interim of 1549 and his Saxon Confession* of 1551, J. Brenz* at the request of Duke Christopher of Württemberg drew up this statement of belief containing thirty-five articles and reflecting the mind of the Protestant church in that state. Predominantly Lutheran, it contains some concessions to the Calvinists and a number to the Roman Catholics, especially in respect to the Real Presence, in which Brenz was inclined to pursue dogmatic definition more systematically than Luther. Though dispatched to the Protestant representatives at the council, the Confession was rendered abortive by the unexpected armed intervention of Elector Maurice, and all thoughts of such Catholic-Lutheran reconciliation were ended by the Settlement and Peace of Augsburg* (1555). The Confession influenced Archbishop Parker* and the Convocation of 1563, when the Edwardine Forty-Two Articles* were refashioned into the more conservative Thirty-Nine Articles,* particularly in relation to free will, justification, the canon of the OT, the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, and the Lord's Supper. A new edition of the Confessio Virtembergica was published in 1952, and it has featured in recent Lutheran-Catholic dialogue.

IAN SELLERS

WYCLIFFE, JOHN (c.1329-1384). English Reformer. A Yorkshireman who attended Oxford University, receiving the doctorate in theology (1372), he spent much of his life in association with the institution. By 1361 he was a lecturer at the university, but received his living from churches to which he was appointed rector. Wycliffe was a brilliant scholar, and master of the late Scholastic tradition. His talents were useful to John of Gaunt (duke of Lancaster), the son of Edward III, who summoned him to court (1376-78). Gaunt was the effective ruler of England from the death of his father until the emergence of Richard II from his minority (1381).

Wycliffe offended the church with his nationalist, pro-government views, among these being the idea that the civil government should seize the property of immoral clerics. Consequently a meeting was held at St. Paul's (1377) to which Wycliffe was called to answer for his ideas. The duke of Lancaster and the presiding bishop, William Courtenay, argued over their respective rights in the conduct of the session, and the meeting broke up without a word from Wycliffe. By 1377 the pope condemned Wycliffe's teaching in a series of bulls and warned the university to exclude him. Later (March 1378) Wycliffe appeared before the archbishop at Lambeth House, and even though an order from the government forbade his condemnation, he was told to stop spreading his views.

As long as Wycliffe's criticisms were limited to the wealth of the church and the civil power of the clergy, he kept many friends, both among the friars and the aristocracy. But when he attacked the doctrine of transubstantiation and taught a doctrine of the Real Presence (c.1380), he lost much of his support. There were also two other developments that hurt his cause, namely, the Great Schism* of 1378 which caused the English to form closer ties with the Roman Curia, and the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. Although he was not directly involved in the rebellion, his critics claimed that the disaster was implicit in his heresies.

This situation enabled Bishop Courtenay to force Wycliffe's followers from Oxford. Since he was ill, Wycliffe went to live at his parish of Lutterworth (1382). He died of a stroke (1384) and was buried in the church graveyard. In 1428, due to his heresy, Wycliffe's body was exhumed and burnt and the ashes were thrown into the Swift River.

Wycliffe was a prolific writer. Even during the last ten years of his life, when he was the focus of a sharp attack by the papacy and involved in several trials and hearings, he was so productive that even his enemies were amazed. During these years he completed a Summa Theologica, at least six other books, and numerous pamphlets. He instigated a translation of the Vulgate* into English (see BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS), preached hundreds of sermons, continued to lecture at the university until his health failed, and counseled those involved in the "poor priest" movement. His earlier writings dealt with logical and metaphysical subjects. Later he turned to the problem of the relations between the church and the state. Some scholars believe that he was alienated from the papacy because he did not receive an important position; but it is just as likely that the Avignon* papacy caused his alienation.

He has been called "the Morning Star of the Reformation." Certainly his belief that the Bible was the only authoritative guide for faith and practice would substantiate this claim. In other ways he was a proto-Protestant. He denied tran-substantiation, attacked the institution of the papacy, repudiated indulgences, and wished to have religious orders abolished. Wycliffe's teaching did not have much effect in England. His connection with the Lollard* movement is a matter of dispute. The persecution of his followers, especially by the act De heretico comburendo (1401), was effective. What failed in England was successful in Bohemia. Students from that land attended Oxford and took his teachings back to Prague. Through this means Jan Hus* and his followers adopted the ideas of Wycliffe and kept them alive until the Reformation era.

WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS. An organization dedicated to producing translations of the Bible in languages that heretofore had none. It came from the vision and initiative of L.L. Legters and W. Cameron Townsend. In 1934 they started Camp Wycliffe in Arkansas as a summer school in descriptive linguistics for pioneer missionaries. Work began among Mexican tribes in 1935. In 1942 they decided to organize formally. Two corporations were set up. The Summer Institution of Linguistics represents the scientific linguistic and cultural aspects, is non-sectarian, makes contracts with governments, and directs work on the fields. It conducts summer training programs in cooperation with state universities. Wycliffe Bible Translators represents the religious aspect, promotes the work among churches, secures financial support, and screens candidates. To qualify for service with SIL, candidates must also be accepted by WBT. Another organization, Jungle Aviation and Radio Service (JAARS), provides transportation and communications. Since 1944 operations have become worldwide with more than 1,800 active members.

WYTTENBACH, THOMAS (1472-1526). Swiss Reformer. Born at Biel (Bienne), after study at Tübingen he lectured at Basle on the Sentences, and was influenced there by humanism and the new methods of biblical study. He lectured on the NT, especially Romans, and attacked indulgences in public several years before Luther. Zwingli* was among his pupils (1506) and said he learned from Wyttenbach that "the death of Christ alone is the price of the forgiveness of sins," and also claimed that he owed him his first serious contact with Scripture. He was people's priest at Biel from 1515, and from 1523 publicly supported the Reformation. His marriage in 1524 led to his deposition. After his death the reform of Biel was carried through by his successor, Jakob Würben.

XYLOLATORS. From two Greek words meaning "worshipers of the wood," this was used as a term of reproach by the eighth-century Iconoclasts against the orthodox who reverenced both the symbol of their faith and representations of sacred persons and objects, which had led to the veneration of pictures, icons, and images. The Iconoclasts held that only the eucharistic bread was a true image of Christ; all other images signified a return to pagan idolatry.

YORK. City, county, and parliamentary borough and see town of the archbishopric of York. It was founded in A.D. 71 as Eboracum by the Romans as a headquarters for the ninth legion. It became the Roman military capital in Britain and was visited by the emperors Hadrian, Severus, and Constantine Chlorus (who died there). Constantine was proclaimed emperor at York. Mention is made of a bishop of York at the Council of Arles* in 314, but the Roman occupation ended soon after A.D. 400 and little is known about York or the church there till the appointment of Paulinus* as bishop in 625. Edwin, king of Northumbria, was baptized at York in 627 and founded a church there. Paulinus departed to Rochester in 633 after the defeat of Edwin by Cadwallon. For the next thirty years York came under the spiritual oversight of the bishops of Lindisfarne, who followed the Celtic customs of the church.

At the Synod of Whitby* in 663/4 King Oswy decided that the Northumbrian church should follow Roman customs and soon after, Wilfrid,* who was the leader of the Roman party, was appointed bishop of Northumbria with his see at York. He went to Gaul for consecration, and because of his delaying there, Chad* was appointed in his place. The see was restored to Wilfrid in 669, but in 678 Theodore,* archbishop of Canterbury, divided the diocese into four and appointed other bishops. In 735 under Egbert* the see was made into an archbishopric and a school was founded which included among its pupils the scholar Alcuin.* From the eleventh until the fourteenth centuries there was a struggle for precedence between the sees of Canterbury* and York. It was finally decided that the archbishop of Canterbury had precedence with the title "Primate of All England," while the archbishop of York was to be "Primate of England." Famous archbishops include Thomas Wolsey and William Temple. York Minster, dating largely from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, stands on the site of Edwin's church, and the city has a unique collection of medieval parish churches still in use, as well as other ecclesiastical remains. YOUNG, BRIGHAM (1801-1877). Founder of the Mormon* settlement in Utah. Born in a worker's home in Whitingham, Vermont, he had little schooling, but great leadership ability. He joined Joseph Smith's* Mormons in 1832, led the group to Kirtland, Ohio, became an apostle in 1835, and chief of the Twelve Apostles in 1838. He led the Mormons from Independence, Missouri, to Nauvoo, Illinois, and thence to Salt Lake in 1847, and organized the state of Deseret. He became in 1850 governor of the Territory of Utah. He did most of the planning for the Mormon Temple in Salt Lake City and founded the University of Utah.

YOUNG, EDWARD (1683-1765). English poet. Born at Upham (Hampshire) and educated at Winchester and Oxford, he included among his works satires (The Love of Fame, 1725-28) and plays (Busiris, 1719), but his best-known work is Night Thoughts (1742-45). He had entered the church in 1727, becoming rector of Welwyn in 1730. His Conjectures on Original Composition (1759) place him among the early theorists of Romantic views of literature. Young thus belongs to two worlds, the Augustan and the Romantic. Likewise in matters religious, he is of the transition. Night Thoughts originates in real sorrow, in the bereavement of his wife and stepdaughter, but there is much in it of the rational Augustan theology with its moral and cosmological arguments. Meant as a poem of Christian triumph over death, Night Thoughts is often dismissed as a prolix and gloomy work. There is indeed too much argument, but there are also flashes of joy, particularly in the fourth Night with its celebration of Christ's victorious death and resurrection. These flashes show the intuitive response in its rare emergence from behind the repelling façade of reason. ARTHUR POLLARD

YOUNG, EDWARD JOSEPH (1907-1968). OT scholar. After graduating from Stanford University (1929) he continued his education by travel, especially in Spain and in the Near East. He trained in theology, first in Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, then under Albrecht Alt in Leipzig, before taking his Ph.D. (1943) at what is now Dropsie University, Philadelphia. He was instructor (1936-39), assistant professor (1939-46), and professor (from 1946) of OT at Westminster Theological Seminary. Young was especially outstanding for his linguistic brilliance, his gentleness and modesty, and his tenacious loyalty to the inerrant Scriptures. He conversed easily in many languages, including Russian and Arabic. Hebrew and other Semitic languages were his familiar companions. He presented his views with a genuine humility, and his deference to faculty colleagues was notable. Yet he would never surrender any demand made by the authoritative Scriptures, and he constantly adhered to that line. His major works include An Introduction to the Old Testament (1949); The Prophecy of

Daniel (1949); My Servants the Prophets (1952); Thy Word is Truth (1957); and the magisterial Book of Isaiah (3 vols., 1965ff.).

PAUL WOOLLEY

YOUNG, PATRICK (1584-1652). Biblical and patristic scholar. Born in Forfarshire, the fifth son of Sir Peter Young, he studied at St. Andrews (1603) and became librarian to the bishop of Chester. Incorporated at Oxford in 1605, he was ordained and made chaplain of All Souls. He became one of the most proficient Greek scholars of his time. He was librarian to Prince Henry, James I, and Charles I, assisting James in making a Latin translation of his works. He visited Paris in 1617, was made a burgess of Dundee in 1618, and became prebendary and treasurer of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, in 1621. From 1623 he was rector of Hayes, Middlesex, until deposed at the time of the Westminster Assembly (1647). In 1633 Young published from the recently arrived Codex Alexandrinus the editio princeps of the epistles of Clement. He published many other works until interrupted by the Civil War. After Charles I's execution he retired to his son-in-law's house in Essex.

YOUNG, ROBERT (1822-1888). Scottish theologian and Orientalist. Born in Edinburgh and apprenticed to a printer, he combined this work with bookselling from 1847, and spent much time in the study of languages. In 1856 he went to India as literary missionary and superintendent of the mission press at Surat, retaining his missionary interests when he returned in 1861. A Calvinist in theology, associated with the Free Church, and a man of meticulous mind, he is best known for his comprehensive Analytical Concordance to the Holy Bible (1879), which has gone through many editions.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. The YMCA, as an organized body of young men determined to win their fellows to a saving faith in Christ, appears to have had independent beginnings in several European countries, but its origin is traditionally ascribed to George Williams* and his meetings in London in 1844. These Bible classes and the Exeter Hall lectures that sprang from them were patronized by leading Evangelical laymen, including the Earl of Shaftesbury, and soon the movement had spread to France, Holland, the USA, and the British Empire. A series of international discussions where the presiding genius was that of Williams culminated in an important conference at Paris in 1855 which adopted the "Paris Basis" as the declaration of faith of the movement, and in 1878, enormously strengthened by the Second Evangelical Awakening, the World's Alliance of YMCAs set up a permanent executive at Geneva, the Central International Committee (CIC). In 1894 the jubilee of the movement was celebrated, appropriately enough in London.

These early decades were not untroubled, and Williams's primacy and single-minded purposefulness were often resented by British and foreign colleagues alike. Criticized at various times for being either too broad or too narrow, particularly in its prohibition of games and smoking, the YMCA gradually overcame prejudice and added recreational and relief work to its original evangelistic concern. In the world wars, with its symbol of the Red Triangle, it strove to provide especially for the needs of soldiers, the wounded and prisoners-of-war. Today with its elaborate organization of hostels, clubs, cafeterias, gymnasia, vocation training centers, and holiday homes, the YMCA has throughout the world about six million members. Students and young men living away from home or traveling abroad now chiefly avail themselves of the organization's resources. In the USA, where its principal strength now lies, education has been particularly stressed, and a number of degree-giving institutions are supported.

IAN SELLERS

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. This was originally two separate organizations, both founded in Britain in 1855 by Emma Roberts and Lady Kinnaird. They united in 1877, and the first World Committee of YWCAs met in London in 1894, to be followed by the first World Conference in 1898. With the Blue Triangle as its symbol, it has had numerical growth and spread of its activities parallel to those of its brother organization. Internationalism and interdenominationalism remain the keynotes of both movements, and the original evangelistic inspiration is still to be found in them.

YOUTH FOR CHRIST, INTERNATIONAL. Set up in 1945, this organization engages in teenage evangelism, high school Bible clubs, and juvenile delinquency prevention programs. The first "Youth for Christ" rally was conducted by Paul Guiness in 1934 in Brantford, Ontario. From then on, but especially in 1943-44, Saturday night evangelistic youth rallies proliferated in large American cities. YFCI was founded in 1945 at Winona Lake, Indiana, and Torrey Johnson, leader of the Chicago rallies, was elected president. A conservative creed was adopted to help the organization keep "Geared to the Times and Anchored to the Rock." Through Saturday night rallies, "Teen Teams" sent overseas, and high school Bible clubs, youth has been evangelized at home and abroad. Youth Guidance programs help juvenile delinquents as well as prevent delinquency by counseling. Youth Guidance, Campus Life magazine, and high school Campus Life chapters are major thrusts in the seventies. The first world congress in 1948 in Switzerland demonstrated its spread from its present headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois.

ZABARELLA, FRANCESCO (1360-1417). Cardinal-deacon of Florence and distinguished canon lawyer. Trained in the church's legal traditions at Bologna, he taught canon law at Florence (1385-90) and at Padua (1390-1410), while serving simultaneously in the diplomatic corps of Padua and Venice. He was summoned to Rome by Boniface IX to aid in overcoming the Great Schism.* After participating in the Council of Pisa* (1409), he was created a cardinal by John XXIII* in 1411. His indebtedness to John did not prevent him from supporting the Council of Constance* (1414-18) and recommending the abdication of John as a step toward the reconciliation of the divided halves of Latin Christendom. His Tractatus de schismate (1402-8), based on the work of the decretists and decretalists, made proposals similar to those advocated by John of Paris,* an early conciliar theorist. The church was a corporation presided over by the pope. Papal power was of a derivative and limited kind, conferred on the pope by the members of the church. Should the pope fail to call a council in the crisis then rending the church, the right to summon a council would pass immediately to the cardinals and in the event of their inaction to the emperor, the representative of the whole people. Zabarella's defense of the supremacy of a council over a pope, and his untiring efforts at Constance, promoted the eventual healing of the schism, though he himself died before the council had completed its work.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

ZACHARIAS (d.752). Pope from 741; last of the Greek popes. A Greek from Calabria, he was the first pope to be elected without reference to imperial authority. He was noted for his charity, learning, and diplomacy, and for translating the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Greek. He prevailed upon the Lombard king to abandon an attack upon Ravenna and to return four cities to the Roman duchies. A truce of twenty years was concluded. He wrote the Byzantine emperor Constantine V Copronymos in opposition to iconoclasm. He supported Boniface,* the "apostle to the Germans," whose mission everywhere extended papal authority. Zacharias had Boniface consecrate Pepin III* ("the Short") as king of the Franks, replacing the weak Merovingian line, creating the Carolingian-papal alliance, and establishing a precedent to papal claims to the right to make and depose kings. In turn, Pepin recognized the pope as head of the Papal States,* another precedent of lasting significance. Zacharias called synods in 743 and 745.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

ZACHARIAS SCHOLASTICUS (c.465-after 536). Church historian and bishop of Mytilene. Also known as "Zacharias Rhetor," he was educated at Gaza, and later studied philosophy and law. In 492 he went to Constantinople to practice law. His two names "Scholasticus" ("advocate") and "Rhetor" ("pleader") refer to his legal career. Later in life he took up an ecclesiastical career, and although little is known of his activities, it is clear that by 536 he was bishop of Mytilene. Nothing is known of his later years, and even the date of his death cannot be established. Zacharias is best known for his church history, which was probably written before 515. It is a valuable source for events in Egypt and Palestine from 450 to 491. Among his other surviving works are biographies of Severus of Antioch and Peter the Iberian. He also wrote two polemical works, Disputatio de Mundi Officio and Disputatio Contra Manichaeos.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

ZAHN, THEODOR (1838-1933). German Lutheran biblical and patristic scholar. He taught at the universities of Göttingen (1868-77), Kiel (1877-78), Erlangen (1878-88 and 1892-1909), and Leipzig (1888-92). Though he was one of the greatest scholars of his day, he did not have the impact that he might have had, due possibly to his defense of orthodox theology in a day when this was far from popular and also to a tendency toward eccentricity in his exegesis. He was the author of many important monographs and commentaries, including twelve volumes on the canon of the NT (Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, 2 vols., 1888-92; Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, 10 vols., 1881-1920), seven commentaries (Matthew, 1903; Luke, 1913; John, 1908; Acts, 2 vols., 1919-21; Romans, 1910; Galatians, 1905; Revelation, 2 vols., 1924-26), and a massive introduction to the NT (2 vols., 1897-99; ET 3 vols., 1909). In addition he edited (with Harnack and von Gebhardt) the works of the Apostolic Fathers (ed. major, 1875-78; ed. minor, 1877).

W. WARD GASQUE

ZAIRE (formerly Belgian Congo). H.M. Stanley's explorations in the basin of the Congo brought the first Protestant missionaries in 1878. The first two societies were the Livingstone Inland Mission and the British Baptists. The former was a branch of the Regions Beyond Missionary Union, and when the parent body found itself overextended, the Congo mission was handed over to the American Baptists.

Other missions followed until they totaled some forty-six societies, a high percentage of them American. Two thirds of these societies entered after World War I. Yet in this vast region of more than 900,000 square miles there was little overlapping. Partly this was because of the Congo Protestant Council. The council began as a general conference of missionaries in 1902, when there were only eight missions and about 200 missionaries in the country. It developed into the authoritative voice for Protestantism in the Congo and a most effective channel of comity and cooperation. Today this intermission organization has been succeeded by an interchurch organization under Congolese leadership.

It was the missionaries who revealed the atrocities committed during the time of King Leopold's personal rule. This obliged the Belgian government to step in and take control in 1908. The Roman Catholic government showed a distinct favoritism toward Roman Catholic missions, which had followed the Protestants into the field, until after World War II, when a more liberal party came into power. For the next fifteen years all missions were officially on the same basis, enjoying considerable support from the government. This included subsidies for educational programs that met government standards. The government preferred to leave primary education in the hands of the missions, Roman Catholic or Protestant, with freedom to teach religion.

Medical work also has played an important role in the Congo, with most missions involved to some degree. A recent example of inter-mission cooperation is the medical center at Nyankunde, with doctors of four missions trying to meet the needs of the NE region.

By the time of independence in 1960, roughly half of the population were professed Christians, Roman Catholics outnumbering Protestants about two to one. Congo has been the scene of various native "prophet" movements, especially since 1960. The largest in all Africa is one that began with the late Simon Kimbangu in 1921 and now counts about half a million adherents.

Independence brought chaos to much of the country. In the next few years many missionaries had to be evacuated, some two or three times. A number were killed, both Catholics and Protestants, along with uncounted numbers of Congolese Christians. The church in Congo came out of these trials more self-reliant than before. The missionaries have returned, but now in a new relationship to the church, as assistants in the work.

ZAMORA, NICOLAS (1875-1914). Filipino pastor. Grandnephew of the martyred priest Jacinto Zamora,* he was born into a family that was already studying a smuggled Bible. His father was exiled for this crime, but Nicolas continued Bible study secretly as a student of arts and then law. As a soldier in the revolutionary army, he translated his Spanish Bible into dialect and read it to the men. When the Methodists began evangelistic meetings in Manila in 1899, he was invited to speak because the Spanish interpreter failed to arrive. He attracted crowds. He was ordained deacon in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1900, the first Protestant Filipino clergyman. After a few months of seminary study in Shanghai, he worked widely and effectively as an itinerant evangelist. From 1904 he became pastor of the largest Protestant church in Manila, where he normally preached in the local dialect.

In 1906 he was asked to quiet some nationalistic Methodists who wanted independent Filipino Methodism. Zamora eventually came to agree with them, and objected to the church's being foreign-financed and dominated by paternalistic missionaries. On 28 February 1909, after a question of church discipline had been raised by a foreign Methodist bishop, he announced the formation of La Iglesia Evangelica Metodista en las Islas Filipinas. Many of the older Tagalog Filipinos joined the new denomination. Zamora died in a cholera outbreak in 1914 while he was general superintendent of the new church.

RICHARD DOWSETT

ZEALOTS. The nationalistic Jewish partisans of the first century A.D., particularly those active in the Jewish War (66-70). The word "zealot" is Greek zelotes, and in the NT and the writings of Josephus represents the Hebrew qanna' or its Aramaic equivalent qan'ana; one of Jesus' disciples was a "zealot" or "Cananaean" (cf. Mark 3: 18; Luke 6:15 RSV). The term could signify a religious enthusiast in general, then a militant nationalist, and finally a member of the religio-political party, the "fourth philosophy" (Josephus) of first-century Judaism,* which took a prominent part in the struggle against Rome.

The chief spiritual antecedents of the Zealot movement were the Maccabees, whose ardent religious zeal inspired them to take up the sword and wage a victorious campaign against their pagan Greek overlords in the second century B.C. The Maccabean ideal was not forgotten, and it revived after the Roman conquest of Palestine. The Zealot party as such was probably formed, or had its immediate origins, in the abortine revolt caused by the Roman census of A.D. 6; its first leader was Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37), whose sons carried on the movement after his death. The last stand of the Zealots was at the fortress of Masada, captured by the Romans in A.D. 73.

ZEISBERGER, DAVID (1721-1808). Moravian missionary to American Indians* for sixty-three years. Born in Zauchtenthal, Moravia, he was five when the family fled to Herrnhut* in Saxony. In 1736 the parents joined the Moravian colony in Georgia, David following two years later. In 1745, after moving to Pennsylvania, he began his missionary work with such acceptance that the Six Nations made him a sachem and "keeper of their archives." His greatest work, however, was with the Delawares and demonstrates the frustrations of Indian missions; persecuted in Pennsylvania, in 1772 they migrated to Ohio, where their settlements were destroyed in the Revolution. Particularly shocking was the massacre at Gnadenhütten in 1782 by colonial militia. Zeisberger accompanied his Indians to Michigan and finally to Canada, where he founded Fairfield. In 1798 Congress restored the Indians' land, so he returned to Ohio and built Goshen. HAROLD R. COOK

ZELLER, EDUARD (1814-1908). German Protestant theologian and philosopher. A student and later son-in-law of F.C. Baur,* Zeller first taught theology at Tübingen (1840-47), Bern (1847-49), and finally Marburg (1849-62); in 1862 he changed to philosophy, going first to Heidelberg (1862-72) and then Berlin (1872ff.). He was the founder of the journal Theologische Jahrbücher (1842-57), which served as an organ for publication of the views of the Tübingen School.* In a series of articles (1848-51) which were later published in book form under the title The Acts of the Apostles according to its Contents and Origin Critically Investigated (1854; ET, 2 vols., 1875-76), he attempted a detailed application and demonstration of the Tübingen theory of early Christian origins to Luke's second volume. Here he combined the Tendenzkritik (tendency-criticism) of Baur with the "mystical" approach of Strauss* and proceeded to call into question the essential historicity of Acts. Zeller also wrote a classic history of Greek philosophy (3 vols., 1845-52), a history of modern German philosophy (1873), and a biography of D.F. Strauss (1874).

ZENO. Little is known of this fourth-century bishop of Verona (c.362-75), except that he was an African by birth. His sermons, known as Tractatus, have certain affinities with the writings of Tertullian, although these did not come into circulation until the Middle Ages, and therefore were not known to Jerome.

ZEPHYRINUS (d.217). Bishop of Rome from 198. He succeeded Victor, but despite his nineteen-year pontificate little is known of his life. His severe critic, Hippolytus,* described him as being "lax" in the matter of enforcing the church's position against certain heresies—e.g., Sabellianism* —and characterized him as a man "without education." Zephyrinus did, however, excommunicate Theodotus, the "money changer" who defended Dynamic Monarchianism, since he had given support in large measure to two disciples of Noetus* (Epigonus and Cleomenes) who defended the Modalistic position. Tradition says Zephyrinus was martyred.

ZIEGENBALG, BARTHOLOMAEUS (1682-1719). Co-founder with H. Plütschau* of the first Protestant mission to India,* and the first to translate the NT into an Indian language. Born in Saxony, he was converted at sixteen, and was a theological student at Halle when a request came for missionaries to the overseas territories of Frederick IV of Denmark. After some hesitation about their official acceptance, Ziegenbalg and Plütschau arrived in 1706 at the Danish settlement of Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast. There they encountered incredible opposition from the authorities, apart from the predictable hostility of Hindus and Roman Catholics. As a result of one controversy Ziegenbalg was imprisoned for four months by the commandant. This first attempt to establish a Protestant mission to Indians was fought tooth and nail, but Ziegenbalg had the needed tenacity. The missionaries gathered Portuguese-speaking and Tamil congregations and built a church. The Tranquebar method became a pattern for later missions: schools, orphanage, Bible translation, printing, training of preachers, catechizing the young, and all aimed at personal conversion. Ziegenbalg produced the Tamil NT (1714) and translated the OT up to the Book of Ruth.

Annual letters of the missionaries, sent out from Halle and distributed in Britain, had great influence in stirring missionary interest (e.g., in the rectory where the Wesleys grew up). Ziegenbalg was received by the king and the archbishop of Canterbury when he visited Britain on his one home leave. "English" missions in the territories out from Tranquebar came to be financed from England although staffed by the German Lutherans of the Danish-Halle Mission. In the "home board" of the mission at Copenhagen, however, Ziegenbalg's institutional methods were severely criticized. and apparently unfairly, in his latter years. His writing on Hinduism was presumably an irrelevance to some in Europe, for it appeared in print only long after his death (one book in 1926). In every sense a pioneer, Ziegenbalg swam against the tide. He died at Tranquebar.

ZILLERTHAL EVANGELICALS. Protestant residents of Zillerthal, one of the Tyrol valleys, who seceded from the Roman Catholic Church and migrated to Prussia in the 1830s. Though Zillerthal was not officially Tyrolean until 1816, the people felt themselves to be Tyroleans even before the Protestant Reformation. For centuries, however, the valley had been under the archbishopric of Salzburg. A Baptist movement had been totally suppressed early in the seventeenth century, but a strong Lutheran group would not yield to the Catholic pressures. From certain other Austrian provinces Protestants had emigrated en masse in search of a land where religious toleration was practiced. Tyrol, however, had been traditionally more lenient and had avoided such mass migrations. But late in the seventeenth century two brothers named Stainer of Mairhofen preached the evangelical doctrine in the Ziller valley with such effect that the Catholic hierarchy was alarmed. Over a period of several generations they attempted by various means, including both teaching and harassment, to regain the people's loyalty. Their efforts never fully succeeded. When a Prussian court preacher named Strauss visited with them, he was so favorably impressed that he arranged for them to migrate to Prussia. In 1837 they set out in six wagons, arriving in Schmiedaberg in October of that year. They established a colony at Erdmannsdorf.

MILLARD SCHERICH

ZINZENDORF, NIKOLAUS LUDWIG, COUNT VON (1700-60). Founder of the Moravian Church. Born in Dresden to an Austrian noble family, he was the son of a high Saxon official who died during Zinzendorf's youth. He was raised by his maternal grandmother, a Pietist and close friend of Spener* and Francke,* and educated at the Halle Pädagogium (1710-16). A deeply religious youth, he became interested in foreign missions after meeting the Danish-Halle missionaries to India, but his family pressured him into a governmental career. In 1716-19 he studied law at Wittenberg, a center of orthodox Lutheranism, and he tried unsuccessfully to reconcile orthodoxy and Pietism.* While traveling in W Europe in 1719-20, he came into contact with Reformed theology, non-churchly groups, and Roman Catholicism which further broadened his understanding of Christianity. After entering the Saxon civil service in 1721, he sponsored religious assemblies in his Dresden home and purchased an estate at Berthelsdorf where in 1722 he invited a group of Bohemian Protestant refugees (Unitas Fratrum) to form a Christian community called "Herrnhut."* In 1727 he retired from government service to devote full time to the colony.

His religious thought matured during these years, and he broke with the Halle Pietists. He stressed "heart religion"—a deep mystical, spiritual, experiential faith—as well as Christian community, worldwide evangelism, and ecumenical relationships. He felt Francke's successors had become too rigid, while the Pietists questioned the validity of his conversion and criticized his extravagant mysticism, supposed heterodoxy, and utopian ideas of reunion with the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches. Orthodox Lutherans also attacked him, and in 1734 his beliefs were formally examined. He then became a theological candidate in Tübingen and in 1737 was ordained a bishop by the Berlin court preacher D.E. Jablonski,* which meant official recognition for Zinzendorf and his movement, although circumstances eventually forced the Moravians into a separate organization.

While visiting Copenhagen in 1731, a chance meeting with a West Indian Negro rekindled his interests in foreign missions. The first Moravian missionaries were sent to the Caribbean in 1734, and Zinzendorf himself visited St. Thomas in 1738-39. Expelled from Saxony in 1736, he settled in the Wetterau and traveled around Europe founding Moravian communities, the most significant being those in Holland and England. In 1741-43 he journeyed to America, where he labored in Indian missions and in building up the Moravian congregations. He attempted in vain to unify the German Lutheran churches in Pennsylvania, a task finally carried out by H.M. Mühlenberg* while the Moravian churches went their own way.

Zinzendorf returned to Herrnhut in 1747 and engaged in pastoral work there except for the five years (1749-50; 1751-55) he spent working with the congregation in England. His last years were marred by personal tragedy (death of his son and wife) and financial difficulties. His importance lies in the creation of a missionary, service-oriented, ecumenical free church based upon a common experience of salvation and mutual love, and the emphasis upon deep, emotional religious expression (especially in his hymns, prayers, poems, and "daily watch words") which infused new life into Protestant orthodoxy.

ZONARAS, JOHANNES (twelfth century). Byzantine historian and canonist. At first the commander of the bodyguard of Alexius Comnenus, the emperor, Zonaras later became secretary of the chancery and then left Constantinople to become a monk on Hagia Glykeria. His most important work, a chronicle that extended to 1118, relied heavily on Dio Cassius's study. Other writings included a lexicon, several sermons, a commentary on Eastern synodal canons, and one of the canons of third- and fourth-century fathers.

ZOROASTRIANISM. The dominant religion of Persia for more than a millennium preceding the Mohammedan invasion (636), founded on the teachings of the prophet Zarathustra. (Zoroaster is the corrupt Greek form of the Iranian Zarathustra.) The historical personality is practically lost in the legendary promulgations of the followers. Although disputed, the most logical date of his birth is about the sixth or fifth century B.C. in Iran. At the age of thirty or a little later, Zarathustra had a life-changing religious experience in which he met Ahura-Mazda ("the Wise Lord"). This experience plus other revelations led him to become the prophet of a new, purified religion. Tradition says this new prophet was successful in converting King Vishtaspa, the ruler of E Iran, and found a powerful protector of the faith in Vishtaspa's son, Darius the Great. Zarathustra died at age seventy-seven.

He taught a new ethical religion that was firmly rooted in the old Iranian folk-religion. He bitterly attacked the cult of the gods of popular religion and promoted the worship of the one Spirit, Ahura-Mazda (later called Ormazd.) The good man joined the battle against Angra Mainyu (later called Ahriman), the chief agent of evil, in preparation for the final judgment involving the resurrection of the dead and the confinement of the wicked to the regions of torment. Each individual was to be judged according to his deeds. It is thought that this eschatology came to influence Jewish eschatology through exilic contact with the Persians. The scriptures, the Avesta, became the bases for the cultus which was administered by the priestly class known as the Magi. A major part of the worship is centered around the fire altar.

Zoroastrianism became the spawning grounds for other religions such as Mithraism* and Manichaeism,* but it came to a sudden end in Persia with the seventh-century Muslim conquest. It survives now in a small Parsi community in India located chiefly in and around Bombay. The followers have emphasized education and, therefore, hold many of the influential positions in Bombay.

ZOSIMUS (d.418). Pope from 417. Greek by birth, he inherited the controversy over Pelagianism* from Innocent I,* was initially deceived by the smooth-talking Celestius,* and summoned to Rome the African bishops, including Augustine, who had condemned Pelagius and Celestius. The Africans not only refused to comply, but mustered such support, including that of the emperor, for their viewpoint that Zosimus executed a volte-face. He issued a letter requiring Western bishops to endorse the condemnation. Those who refused to comply, among them Julian of Eclanum,* were deposed. Zosimus was thwarted also when he rashly tried to interfere in ecclesiastical affairs in Gaul. Several of his letters are extant.

ZOSIMUS (early sixth century). Byzantine historiographer. He provided a narrative of the Roman imperial state from its inception, skimming rapidly through its transition, but concerning events in detail from 270 until the city was sacked by Visigoths in 410. The account was heavily dependent especially upon the fifth-century authors Eunapius of Sardis and Olympiodorus of Egyptian Thebes, thereby preserving them. Consequently, considering also the nonpreservation of Books I-XIII (up to 351) of the major late Roman historian, Ammianus Marcellinus (whose Book XXXI terminates with 378), whom he does not cite, Zosimus becomes a principal source for the reigns of Constantine* and his sons, and again for Gratian* and his successors. Most importantly identified, however, not only as the last pagan historian, but as the first historian of Rome's fall, this proponent of the position that Rome's difficulties were due to the abandonment of the old gods and to the alliance with Christianity gave paradigm to Gibbon.

ZURBARAN, FRANCISCO DE (1598-1662). Spanish painter. Born at Fuente de Cantos, Estremadura, he painted directly from nature with pure colors, bluish tone, and careful shadow, his figures reflecting devotion and asceticism. Painting on the whole for monastic orders (1623-39), he was appointed about 1630 as painter to Philip IV who, according to legend, said: "Painter to the king, king of painters." The Madrid years (1634-39) made his style softer and lighter, later to return to earlier patterns, and influenced finally by Murillo.* His commissions were numerous: several of Bonaventura; Apotheosis of St. Thomas Aquinas; many for the Carthusians at Xeres; thirteen on Jerome for the Hieronymites at Guadalupe; a series of full-length portraits of Hieronymite monks; and great founders of religious orders from Elias to Loyola for the Capuchins at Castellon.

ZURICH AGREEMENT (Consensus Tigurinus). In 1546 Bullinger* sent to Calvin* a work on the sacraments. Calvin criticized it frankly, and the ensuing correspondence resulted in the first draft of the Consensus in November 1548, consisting of twenty-four propositions, which Calvin prepared and Bullinger annotated. The two met in Zurich in May 1549 to draw up the twenty-six articles on the sacraments which were published in 1551. The Consensus was received by Zurich, Geneva, Neuchatel, Basle, St. Gall, Schaffhausen, and the Grisons. It stated that in the Lord's Supper we partake of Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit and the lifting of our souls to heaven. The sacramental grace, however, comes only to the elect.

ZWEMER, SAMUEL MARINUS (1867-1952). "Apostle to Islam." Born in Michigan to a Dutch Reformed family, the thirteenth of fifteen children, he became a Student Volunteer when Robert Wilder* visited Hope College after the Mt. Hermon conference—and became a leader in the movement. At seminary he and James Cantine planned to start a mission in the world's most difficult field. The outcome was the Arabian Mission. Cantine went out in 1889, Zwemer in 1890. They concentrated on the Arabian Gulf area. In 1894 the Reformed Church in America assumed responsibility for the mission. In 1906 and 1911 Zwemer organized and chaired general conferences on Islam at Cairo and Lucknow. In 1911 he started The Moslem (now Muslim) World, and edited it for forty years. From 1913 to 1929 he made Cairo his center, worked with the Nile Mission Press, and traveled throughout the Islamic world, including India and NW China. From 1929 he had a ministry of teaching, first at Princeton Theological Seminary, later at Biblical Seminary in New York and the Missionary Training Institute at Nyack. He was also a gifted writer and authored some fifty books.

ZWICKAU PROPHETS. Also known as "Storchites," Luther dubbed these three German radical reformers "the Zwickau prophets." Nicholas Storch, Thomas Drechsel, and Marcus Stübner, influenced by Taborite* and Waldensian* teachings, preached a radical biblicism which included rejection of infant baptism, denial of the need for a professional ministry and organized religion because all godly men were under the direct influence of the Spirit, special revelation through visions and dreams, the imminent return of Christ, and perhaps psychopannychism. Driven from the Saxon town of Zwickau where they originated and where they had influenced Thomas Münzer,* they visited Wittenberg in December 1521 during Luther's absence. Philip Melanchthon,* impressed with their biblical knowledge, gave them a hearing. However, their millennial enthusiasm and outspoken criticism of the Wittenberger's liturgy led to their expulsion in 1522. Little is known of their activities after this date except that they won a number of temporary converts including Gerhard Westerburg and Martin Cellarius.

ROBERT D. LINDER

ZWILLING, GABRIEL (Didymus) (c.1487-1558). German Reformer. Born at Annaberg, he was an Augustinian monk and a colleague of Luther in the Wittenberg Reformation, together with Melanchthon* and Carlstadt.* During Luther's exile in the Wartburg (1521), Carlstadt and Zwilling gave a more radical turn to the Reformation, encouraged by the Zwickau Prophets* who joined forces with them. Zwilling was a fiery preacher and by October was denouncing the Mass and urging the abandonment of clerical vows. He gained a large following, especially in the Wittenberg Augustinian monastery, many monks renouncing their vows. Soon he was attacking images, and by December was leading in iconoclastic riot, encouraged by Carlstadt. The Wittenberg town council recalled Luther to restore order, which he did in March 1522. Luther recommended Zwilling to a pastorate in Zwickau; subsequently the patron dismissed him, despite protests from the people and Luther. In 1549 he spurned the Leipzig Interim of Duke Maurice, and suffered for it. He died in Torgau.

ZWINGLI, ULRICH (Huldrych) (1484-1531). Swiss Reformer. Son of a village magistrate in the Upper Toggenburg, he came from a family typical of that class of prosperous farmers who controlled the local government of the German Swiss cantons and looked to the church as the best means of improving their children's status. After attending the Latin school of Heinrich Wölflin (Lupulus) at Bern, Zwingli entered the University of Vienna where he made friends with Joachim von Watt (Vadianus), became aware of humanism, and was introduced to the via antiqua by Vellini (Camerinus). He completed his studies at Basle, where he absorbed the biblical interests of his teachers Thomas Wyttenbach* and Johann Ulrich Surgant, and formed a circle of friends, including Leo Jüd* and Glarean, which later brought him into direct contact with Erasmus.*

Erasmian humanism and his own experience as a chaplain with Swiss mercenaries in Italy led him to oppose the system of mercenary service. These views, which were expressed in terms of opposition to French influence in the Confederacy, and the fact that he was a papal pensioner led to his transfer from Glarus to the chaplaincy at Cloister Einsiedeln in 1516. At the end of 1518 he was called to be people's priest at the Zurich Great Church, largely because his views on the mercenary system were shared by an influential segment of the Zurich establishment. Despite opposition from some of the canons who feared him as a reform-minded Erasmian and accused him of immorality, his appointment was confirmed after he explained that his "immorality" was confined to contact with a known prostitute.

Between 1519 and 1525, when the Mass was abolished in the city, Zwingli advocated a practical program of reform in cooperation with the magistracy. His approach to the question of public worship and his view of the sacraments represented a far more radical break with past traditions than did the Lutheran reform movement. Indeed Luther had no profound influence upon Zwingli as he moved beyond Erasmus to form his own Augustinian-biblical theology within the environment of a Swiss city-state. Zwingli can be rightfully remembered as the first of the "Reformed" theologians. His own radical followers, led by Conrad Grebel* and Felix Manz,* endangered his alliance with the magistracy, whose support he believed was essential. After the Second Disputation in October 1523 they broke with him and in January 1525 formed a separate church, a conventicle, at Zollikon in which membership was symbolized by rebaptism. The rebaptizers (now called Täufer, then called Anabaptists*) were viewed as a threat to public order; the first of them were drowned in Lake Zurich with Zwingli's approval in 1527.

Zwingli's last years were marked by increasing political activity. He hoped both to open the entire Confederacy to the preaching of the Gospel and to create a European-wide anti-Hapsburg alliance. By 1528 the urban cantons Basle, Schaffhausen, and Bern, the most powerful of the Confederates, as well as Constance, had accepted Zwingli's reform program and had allied themselves with Zurich, but his hopes to extend the alliance to include the German Protestants led by Philip, landgrave of Hesse, were disappointed when he and Luther failed to reach agreement on the question of Christ's presence in the Eucharist (Marburg Colloquy,* 1529). This failure, with Bern's preoccupation with westward expansion, left the Swiss Protestants divided and exposed to a counteroffensive by the Forest Cantons which ended with Zwingli's death in the battle of Kappel and halted the expansion of the Reformation in German Switzerland.

Though frequently a member of one or another of the commissions set up by the Zurich government to find solutions for various domestic and diplomatic problems, Zwingli never held political office. His influence was the result of his ability and personal connections. He was able to exercise this influence in part because his own view of the church and his doctrine of election allowed the visible church in the world to be identified with civil society, a corpus permixtum, and left him free to grant the Christian magistrate the right to determine the external forms of the church's worship and life, and to govern the Christian Commonwealth in cooperation with the prophet who expounded the Scriptures for the spiritual well-being of the entire community. Zwingli's interpretation of the Eucharist* has been widely misunderstood, for during his last years he moved away from his earlier view which appears close to mere memorialism toward a doctrine of spiritual presence (spiritualis manducatio).
